

BIOGRAPHIA

BRITANNICA.

VOLUME THE SECOND.

Biographical Dictionary

OF THE

LIVES

OF

Most eminent PERSONS

OF GREAT BRITAIN

GREAT BRITAIN
BIOGRAPHICAL

LIVES OF

Most eminent PERSONS

OF GREAT BRITAIN

OF GREAT BRITAIN

OF GREAT BRITAIN

LIVES

OF GREAT BRITAIN

OF GREAT BRITAIN
LIVES
OF GREAT BRITAIN

Biographia Britannica:

OR, THE

L I V E S

O F T H E

Most eminent PERSONS

Who have flourished in

G R E A T B R I T A I N

A N D

I R E L A N D,

From the earliest Ages, down to the present Times :

Collected from the best Authorities, both Printed and Manuscript,

And digested in the Manner of

Mr BAYLE's HISTORICAL and CRITICAL

D I C T I O N A R Y.

V O L U M E T H E S E C O N D.

L O N D O N:

Printed for W. INNYS, W. MEADOWS, J. WALTHOE, T. COX, J. and P. KNAPTON, T. OSBORNE, S. BIRT, D. BROWNE, T. LONGMAN, H. WHITRIDGE, R. HETT,
C. HITCH, T. ASTLEY, S. AUSTEN, C. DAVIS, R. MANBY and H. S. COX, C. BATHURST,
J. and R. TONSON and S. DRAPER, J. ROBINSON, J. HINTON, J. and J. RIVINGTON, J. WARD, and M. COOPER.

M DCC XLVIII

Biographia Britannica;

OF THE

LIVES

OF THE

ADAMS 1774

Most eminent PERSONS

Who have flourished in

GREAT BRITAIN

AND

WALLES

From the earliest Ages down to the present Time:

Collected from the best Authorities, both British and Foreign;

And digested in the manner of Mr BAYLE'S Historical and Critical Dictionary.

D I C T I O N A R Y

OF THE

L O N D O N

Printed and Sold by R. DODD, at the Sign of the Crown, in Pall-mall; and by J. HODGKINS, at the Sign of the Anchor, in Strand; and by J. BARNARD, at the Sign of the Sun, in St. Paul's Church-yard.

T H E L I V E S

O F T H E

Most eminent P E R S O N S

Who have flourished in

GREAT-BRITAIN, and IRELAND,

From the earliest Ages, down to the present Times.

B E.

BENNET or BENET (HENRY) Earl of Arlington, an eminent statesman in the reign of King Charles II, and in great favour with that monarch. He was descended of a very ancient and honourable family, seated at Arlington in the county of Middlesex, being the second son of Sir John Bennet, Knight, by Dorothy, daughter of Sir John Grofts, of Saxham in the county of Norfolk, Knight (a), so that he came into the world with all the advantages, in point of birth, that a private gentleman could have [A]. He was born some time in the year 1618, and having received

(a) Pedigree of the family of Benet.

[A] In point of birth that any private gentleman could have.] The reader will hereafter see, that when this Gentleman came to his highest preferments, the Great Duke of Ormond was pleased to stile him one whom he had known a very little Gentleman (1).

Dugdale is entirely silent on this head; and when he treats of him as a Peer, does not so much as tell us who was his father (2). It is however certain, that he was born of a very good family, and that there was not the least reason for treating him as an up-start.

We find mention made of William Benet in the reign of Edward the Third (3), but whether this family is derived from him is uncertain. The highest we can trace them is to the year 1433 (4), when John Bennet was seated in the county of Berks, whose grandson was Thomas Bennet, of Clapcot near Wallingford in that county, who, by his wife Anne, had issue Richard Bennet his son and heir, and Thomas Bennet who was Lord Mayor of London, and knighted by King James the First, on the 26th of July, 1603, in the first year of his reign, which Sir Thomas Bennet left a numerous posterity of both sexes, who married into some of the best families in England (5).

As for Richard Bennet, the eldest son and heir of Thomas Bennet before-mentioned, he married Elizabeth, daughter of Thomas Tisdale of Deanly, in the County of Berks, Esq; and had issue Ralph Bennet his son and heir, from whom those of Moredon in Surrey derive themselves; Sir John Bennet, Knt. second son, ancestor to the present Earl of Tankerville; Thomas, third son, Alderman of London, who dying Anno 1622, left issue three sons, whereof Richard the eldest son, by his first wife, left only one daughter Jane, married James Scudamore, eldest son and heir of John Lord Scudamore; likewise by his second wife, he had an only daughter Dorothy, married to Sir Henry Capel, Knight of the Bath, created Lord Capel of Tewkesbury, but died without issue. Thomas the second son was seated at Baberham in Cambridgeshire, and was created a Baronet on the 22d of November, 1660, but this title is now extinct. Sir John Bennet, Knt. second son of Sir Richard Bennet, was seated at Dawley in the county of Middlesex, and was created on the 6th of July, 1589, 31 Eliz. Doctor of Laws by the university of Oxford (6), having been one of the Proctors there. He was afterwards Vicar-General in Spirituals to the Archbishop of York, and Prebendary of Langtoft in the church of York. In the 24th of Eliz. bearing the title of Doctor of Laws, he was in commission with the Lord-keeper Egerton (7), the Lord-Treasurer Buckhurst, and several other Noblemen, for the suppression of Heresy. He was also in that reign returned to Parliament for the city of York, and was a leading member of the House of Commons, as appears from several of his speeches in Townshend's Collections. He received the honour of knighthood from King James before his coronation, on the 23d of July, 1603, at Whitehall, and was made in that reign Chancellor to Queen Anne (consort of King James), Judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, and Chancellor to the Archbishop of York. In the beginning of the year 1617, he was sent Ambassador to Brussels to question the Archduke, in behalf of his master the King of Great Britain, concerning a libel wrote and published, as it was supposed, by Erycus Puteanus, who neither apprehended the author, nor suppressed the book, until he was solicited

(6) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 138.

(7) Rymer's Fœdera, Tom. XVII. p. 386.

(1) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 552.

(2) Baronage, P. iii. p. 483.

(3) Rymer's Fœd. Tom. IV. p. 402.

(4) Fuller's Worthies, in Berkshire.

(5) From the Pedigree of the family of Benet, for so they formerly wrote their names.

received the rudiments of learning in his father's house, was afterwards sent to Christ-church-college in Oxford, where he soon distinguished himself by the vivacity of his parts; as well as by his strict application to learning. But what was chiefly remarkable in him at this time, was his turn for English poetry, so that there are very few of the university collections upon solemn occasions, while he was at college, in which there are not one or more pieces of Mr Bennet's (b). But upon the King's coming to Oxford, after the breaking out of the civil war, Mr Bennet was soon introduced to him, had the honour of kissing his hand, and entered in a double capacity into his service; for first of all he entered himself a volunteer, and was afterwards made choice of by the famous George Lord Digby, then Secretary of State, to be at the head of his office, which was a very early as well as honourable employment, for so young a man (c). This brought him very soon into business, and into an intimate acquaintance with the greatest persons in the kingdom. His civil employment might certainly have excused him from any immediate service in the army, if he had been so inclined; but he thought it a shame to remain safe at Oxford, when the King his master, the Prince of Wales, and the Princes Rupert and Maurice, were daily exposing themselves in the field, and therefore he let no opportunity slip of signalizing his courage in the royal cause, and was particularly in a very sharp rencounter which happened at Andover, where he received several wounds, of which he lay some time ill at Oxford (d). Thus, at a time of life when many young gentlemen have scarce finished the ordinary course of their studies, he had rendered himself considerable in the different capacities of a Wit, a Soldier, and a Statesman. While he remained in the university he took the degrees of Bachelor and Master of Arts, but at what time does not appear, owing, as I conceive, to some omission in the registers, in those times of public confusion. He attended the King his master as long as it was possible, and when it was no longer in his power to serve the royal cause at home, or even to remain in England with safety, he retired to France, and from thence went into Italy, but whether with any private commission, or purely for the sake of travel and improvement, we have no certain information (e). But it was not long, before either his own inclinations; or the commands of the royal family (f), brought him back again to France in 1649, where he became Secretary to his Royal Highness James Duke of York, not by his own choice, but by the express direction of his brother King Charles II, who, in the summer of the year 1654, recommended him to his Royal Highness in the strongest terms possible (g) [B]. It is certain that no man was in greater credit than Mr Bennet with the Queen-mother,

(b) Wood's Fast. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 156.

(c) Memoirs of what passed during the King's residence at Oxford, p. 13.

(d) Wood, ubi supra.

(e) Miscellanea Aulica, p. 130.

(f) Cowley's Letters, p. 1.

(g) See that recommendation in the King's own words, in note [B].

by the King's agent there, only interdicted it, and suffered the author to fly out of his dominions. In 1620, being intitled Judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury, he was in a special commission with the Archbishop of Canterbury, and other Noblemen, to put in execution the laws against all Heresies, great errors in matters of Faith and Religion, &c. and the same year bearing the title of Chancellor to the Archbishop of York, he was commissioned with the Archbishop of York, and others, to execute all manner of ecclesiastical jurisdiction within the province of York. He died in the parish of Christ-church in London, in the beginning of the year 1627, having had issue by Anne his wife, daughter of Christopher Weekes of Salisbury in the county of Wilts, Esq; Sir John Bennet, his son and heir; Sir Thomas Bennet, Knt. second son, Doctor of the Civil Law, and Master in Chancery; and Matthew, third son, who died unmarried. His eldest son, Sir John Bennet of Dawley, received the honour of knighthood in the life-time of his father, at Theobalds, on the 15th of June, 1616. He married Dorothy, daughter of Sir John Crofts, of Saxham in the county of Norfolk, Knt. by whom he had issue six sons, John his son and heir; Henry, second son, afterwards created Earl of Arlington, who is the subject of our present article (8). His eldest brother was made Knight of the Bath at the coronation of King Charles II. was advanced to be Captain of the Band of Gentlemen Pensioners, and by letters patents, dated the 24th of November, 1682, was created Baron of Ossulston, one of the hundreds of the county of Middlesex; and his son Charles Lord Ossulston having married the only daughter and heiress of Ford (Grey) Earl of Tankerville; he was by King George the first, October 19, 1714, created Earl of Tankerville, on account of that marriage, and was father to the present Earl of Tankerville (9).

(8) Pedigree of the family of Bennet.

(9) Peerage of England, Vol. II. p. 133.

[B] Recommended him to his Royal Highness in the strongest terms possible.] It is not very hard to guess at the reasons which made Mr Bennet so great a favourite with the King, he had known him as long as any man, there was a great resemblance in their tempers, Mr Bennet had been a man of business in his father's court, and his family were then engaged in the King's service in England, with great danger and expence to themselves. Mr Bennet had been for some time about the Duke, as appears from several letters to him from Mr Abraham Cowley, who was Secretary to Lord Jermin, afterwards Earl of St Alban's; but now he was especially appointed his Secretary, or the person who was to have the care of his business, on whom both himself and the King was to rely, as will appear from the following paper written by King Charles II. with his own hand, and sent to him at the time Mr Bennet was to take possession of his office, and which therefore deserves the reader's notice (10).

Private Instructions for my Brother the Duke of York, July 13, 1654.

I. You know the model of my affairs in England, and therefore will not employ any persons to treat there. When I go myself for Scotland, I will transmit to you the business of England, with all particulars; in the mean time it must be managed by myself, and in the way I have put it. II. You must not employ or trust Bansfield in any thing, since I am resolved to have nothing to do with him; and to forbid all my friends to give credit to him in any thing that concerns me. III. As soon as I think of making any general officers of an army, I will advertise you of it, and I pray do not make any promises of such offices to any person whatsoever, without first acquainting me with your thoughts. IV. Let nobody persuade you to engage your own person in any attempt, or enterprize, without first imparting the whole design to me, which will be easily done whilst there is no sea between us; and when that comes to be the case, assure yourself I will desire nothing more, than either to have you with me, or in action in some other place. But, to deal freely with you, till I am myself in action in some part of my dominions, which I will endeavour as soon as possible, I should be very sorry to see you engaged before me, and therefore let no man persuade you to it under what pretence soever. V. I have told you what the Queen hath promised me concerning my brother Harry in point of religion, and I have given him charge to inform you if any attempt shall be made upon him to the contrary; in which case you will take the best care you can to prevent his being wrought upon, since

(10) Miscellanea Aulica, p. 108, 109.

Queen-mother, the King, the Duke of York, the Duke of Gloucester, and all the royal family; he was not only trusted by them as a faithful servant and an able Minister, but cared for also as an intimate friend, and a thorough favourite, which is the more extraordinary, because even in those difficult and dangerous times, there wanted not factions in their little court, nor was the harmony amongst themselves altogether so great, as, under such circumstances, might have been reasonably looked for and expected. But Mr Bennet took no share in any of these divisions, remaining for several years in the same high degree of favour with all the royal personages beforementioned. It is however certain, that he had trouble enough in his office about the Duke of York, who was very far from being the most governable person; and therefore it is no wonder that Mr Bennet was very soon weary of his place, and would willingly have quitted it, if that had been consistent with the King's affairs (b), but as it was not, and as his Majesty signified this to him in the most obliging manner, he was content to remain where he was, till some favourable alteration happened. At last, in 1658, the King found that opportunity which he had long expected, of sending him into Spain, which he proposed very soon after he was reconciled to that Court, and had liberty to go and reside in the Austrian Netherlands; but wanted a convenient occasion, which offering itself now, his Majesty, in the month of March, conferred upon him the honour of knighthood, and sent him very soon after, in quality of his Minister, to the Court of Madrid. This is certainly a genuine account of that matter, though it differs in some respects from what we are told by the Noble Historian, in reference to this matter, which shews that even the greatest men may be in some measure mistaken, as to points with which they think themselves most perfectly acquainted (i) [C]. It is on all hands agreed, that Sir Henry Bennet conducted himself

(b) Miscellaneous Aulica, p. 109.

(i) History of the Rebellion, p. 685.

‘ since you cannot but know how much you and I are concerned in it. VI. You must be very kind to Harry Bennet, and communicate freely with him; for as you are sure he is full of duty and integrity to you; so I must tell you, that I shall trust him more than any other about you, and cause him to be intrusted at large in those businesses of mine, when I cannot particularly write to you myself, &c.’

CHARLES Rex.

These instructions are very curious, and will appear more so to the reader when some of them are explained. The first gives us the reason why Mr Bennet was now appointed his Secretary by the King, after having acted in that quality to the Duke of York for several years. It appears that his Majesty had at this time thoughts of making some attempt for the recovery of his dominions, and this attempt was designed in Scotland; in which case the care of English affairs was to be transferred to the Duke of York, by which means his Secretary would have been, in effect, Secretary of State, and therefore the King thought it necessary to make a special appointment of Mr Bennet to this office. It is necessary to observe here, that in the year 1650, when the King was before in Scotland, his Royal Highness acted a very strange part; for being then at Paris, he was prevailed upon by Sir Edward Herbert and Sir George Ratcliff to leave that city and go to Brussels (11), upon a presumption that the King was dead, and this without the knowledge of the Lord Byron his Governor, or Mr Bennet his Secretary, who were however ordered by the Queen his mother to attend him thither, which exploit made the King a little tender of trusting him ever after, especially without some check, which, in the present case, his Secretary Bennet was intended to be. In the second article there is mention made of one Bamfield, who was a spy of Cromwell's, and kept a constant correspondence with Secretary Thurloe (12); from whence it appears, that this caution of the King's was very necessary. He is continually complaining in his accounts of Mr Bennet, who, he says, intercepted his letters, and whom he represents as having such an interest at Paris, that there was no being safe for him, and therefore he was obliged to send his letters a great way round (13.) The third and fourth articles shew how much the King was afraid of his brother's enterprising temper at that time, for which he had very good reasons, as we learn from more authors than one. The fifth was occasioned by the repeated endeavours of the Queen-Mother to pervert the Duke of Gloucester to Popery, which on his steady refusal had once proceeded so far as turning him out of doors, and leaving him in want of a dinner or a bed, if Lord Hatton had not generously supplied him, with great risk to himself (14). The last article is a clear proof of the King's entire dependance upon Mr Bennet, as one he was sure would adhere steadily to his duty, and contribute all he could by his advice to keep the Duke, his master, within the like bounds. We may therefore very well conclude from hence, that Mr Bennet needed no recommendations to, or intercessor with, the King his master, who certainly confided in him (15) as much as in any man about him during his exile; and for any thing that appears from History, had very good reasons so to do, since nobody served him better, more affectionately, or with greater fidelity.

[C] With which they think themselves most perfectly acquainted.] There is no doubt to be made that the Earl of Clarendon had great opportunity of knowing what he wrote, and that he set down faithfully what he knew, yet in respect to this transaction he is somewhat mistaken; and there is so much the more reason to correct this mistake, because hitherto all the writers, who have mentioned this affair, have followed him implicitly. After having related the manner in which the Earl of Bristol had contributed to the surprising St Ghislain, he proceeds thus (16). ‘ This service was of very great importance to the Spaniards, and no less detriment to the French, and consequently gave great reputation to the Earl, who then came to the King at Bruges, and said all that he thought fit of Don Juan to the King; and, amongst the rest, that Don Juan advised his Majesty, to send some discreet person to Madrid to solicit his affairs there, but that he did not think the person he had designed to send thither (who was Sir Henry de Vic, that had been long resident in Brussels) would be acceptable there. This was only to introduce another person who was dear to him, Sir Henry Bennet, who had been formerly in his office when he was Secretary of State, and bred by him, and was now Secretary to the Duke of York; but upon the factions that were in that family, was so uneasy in his place, that he desired to be in another post, and was about this time to come to the King as a forerunner, to inform him of the Duke of York's purpose to be speedily with him, being within a few days to take his leave of the court of France. Bennet had been long a person very acceptable to the King, and therefore his Majesty very readily consented that he should go to Madrid instead of De Vic; so he returned with the Earl to Brussels, that he might be presented and made known to Don Juan, from whom the Earl doubted not to procure particular recommendation.’ It is very clear from the whole of this account, that in the judgment of the noble author, Sir Henry Bennet stood indebted to the Earl of Bristol for his being appointed Minister in Spain; but from what has been said in the last note, it will appear very evident, that he had as good an interest with the King as that Earl or any body else. But the truth is, that he was sent into Spain because he had been all along intrusted with the secret of that negotiation, as appears from the instructions given him

(11) History of the Rebellion, p. 611.

(12) The reader may be satisfied of this, by consulting Thurloe's Letters.

(13) Thurloe's Letters, Vol. V. p. 435, 510.

(14) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, p. 663. Carte's History of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 164, 165, 167.

(15) Miscellaneous Aulica, p. 127.

(16) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, p. 685.

himself with great wisdom and discretion in this negotiation, and thereby did his master so much service, with Don Lewis de Haro, then his Catholick Majesty's Prime-Minister, that he obtained from him leave to invite his master to those conferences, which were to be held between him and Cardinal Mazarine, previous to the peace between the two crowns (k). At the same time that he advised the King to this journey, he gave a great proof of his attachment to his service, independent of all private obligations; for he at the same time gave his Majesty a caution not to bring the Earl of Bristol with him, in which however the King declined following his advice, though, in the course of his journey, he had sufficient reason to repent his not doing it. The Earl, who thought he had a greater interest in the Spanish Ministry than he really had, first led the King out of the way, and would then have carried him to Madrid, in which, if he had prevailed, it might have been in many respects prejudicial to the King's service (l). Don Lewis de Haro complained loudly of this to Sir Henry Bennet, who undertook to prevent it, and though the treaty was over, promised to bring the King to that Minister, and to prevent his taking any steps in Spain but by his advice, in which he effectually succeeded, to the great satisfaction of Don Lewis de Haro, who, after several conferences with the King, advised him to return to Brussels, and made him a present of seven thousand pistoles in gold, for the expences of his journey (m). Sir Henry Bennet continued to manage his Majesty's affairs at the Court of Madrid, after the King his master was restored, which seems to be the true cause of his not returning so early, as might otherwise have been expected, to England (n). Though it is indeed reported, that he had changed his religion before this time, and therefore was afraid to return 'till he heard of Lord Colepepper's death, who had threatened him upon that head, and upon a supposition that he had been instrumental in persuading the King to turn Papist (o), which, though very confidently affirmed by some authors, appears however not a little uncertain [D]. It was not

(k) Memoirs of the King's Exile, p. 139.

(l) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, p. 79c.

(m) Id. ibid. p. 710.

(n) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. II. p. 156.

(o) Carte's History of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 254.

him two years before, when he was sent to Paris to acquaint the Queen-Mother and the Duke of York with that measure. These instructions are dated June the 20th, 1656; the last article of which will sufficiently prove, that before his going into Spain he knew as much, or more, of these transactions, than the Earl of Bristol himself did. That article is the fourth of the paper, intitled, Instructions for Harry Bennet (17).

(17) Miscellanea Aulica, p. 125.

' You must remember, that I formerly told you how much the Count of Fuenfaldagna and Don Alfonso insisted, when we first entered into the treaty, upon the point of secrecy; and how jealous they expressed themselves to be, that any thing should be known in France which passed between us; and how they obliged me from any communication of that matter for some certain time; and this is the true reason why I have not been able to impart what I desired to the Queen of it.'

We are told on the other hand, on the authority of the Marquis, afterwards Duke, of Ormond, that before Sir Henry Bennet's being sent into Spain, there were very high differences between the Earl of Bristol and Sir Henry Bennet, the Earl alledging that Sir Henry had persuaded the King to declare himself a Papist, which himself thought would be his ruin (18). The Earl of Clarendon himself says, that Sir Henry advised the King to leave the Earl of Bristol behind him (19) when he came into Spain, which one can hardly imagine he would have done, if he had owed that employment to the Earl's recommendation. The noble Historian likewise thinks that Sir Henry acted very prudently in that negotiation, and his reason for it is, because he crossed the Earl of Bristol's proposals in every respect (20), and had so much a better interest with his master, that he engaged him to follow his and not the Earl's opinions. But what seems to put this matter out of doubt is, that before the Earl of Bristol's journey with the King into Spain, he addicted himself entirely to Don Juan, and therefore one would have thought, if Sir Henry Bennet had been promoted by him, he would have taken the same course, whereas he took the quite contrary, and applied himself wholly to Don Lewis de Haro. Upon the whole therefore, there is the greatest reason to believe that he did not owe this employment in the least to the Earl of Bristol's interest with the King, but to his own merit (18) See that passage at large in note [D].

(19) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, p. 709.

(20) Ibid. p. 710.

[D] Appears however not a little uncertain. We have very different accounts of this matter, and such as place Sir Henry Bennet's going over to the Church of Rome at very different times. We have what follows as taken down by a Prelate (21), from the mouth of the Great Duke of Ormond, in reference both to Sir Henry's and the King's conversion. ' The Duke had

(21) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 254, 255.

' some suspicion of it from the time that they removed from Cologne into Flanders; for though he never observed that zeal and concern for divine things, which he often wished in the King, yet so much as appeared in him at any time looked that way. However, he thought it so very little, that he hoped it would soon wear off upon returning to his kingdoms, and was not fully convinced of his change, 'till about the time the treaty of the Pyrenees was going to be opened. The Duke was always a very early riser, and, being then at Brussels, used to amuse himself at times, when others were in bed, in walking about the town and seeing the churches. Going out one morning early, and seeing a church, where a great number of people were at their devotions, he stepped in, and, advancing near the altar, he saw the King on his knees at mass. He readily imagined that his Majesty would not be pleased that he should see him there, and therefore retired as cautiously as he could, went to a different part of the church near another altar where nobody was, kneeled down, and said his own prayers, while the King was gone. Some days afterwards Sir Henry Bennet came to him, and told his Grace, that the King's obstinacy, in not declaring himself a Roman Catholick, put them to great difficulties: That the Kings of France and Spain pressed him mightily to it, and their Embassadors solicited it daily, with assurances, that if he would make that publick declaration, they would both assist him jointly with all their powers, to put him on the throne of England like a King: That he and others had urged this, and endeavoured to persuade him to declare himself, but all in vain: That it would ruin his affairs if he did not do it, and begged of the Duke of Ormond to join in persuading him to declare himself. The Duke said, he could never attempt to persuade his Majesty to act the hypocrite, and declare himself to be what he was not in reality. Sir Henry thereupon replied, that the King had certainly professed himself to be a Roman Catholick, and was a real convert, only that he stuck at the declaring himself so openly. The Duke of Ormond answered, he was very sorry for it, but he would not meddle in the matter; for the King having never made a confidence of it to him, would not be pleased with his knowledge of the change he had made, and for his own part he was resolved never to take any notice of it to his Majesty, 'till he himself first made him the discovery. Some time afterwards George Earl of Bristol came to the Duke, and complaining of the folly and madness of Bennet, and others about the King, who were labouring to persuade him to what would absolutely ruin his affairs. The Duke asking what it was, the other replied, it was to get the King to declare himself a Roman Catholick, which, if he once did, they should not long however after the King's Restoration, and his affairs being settled in England, that should be all undone, and therefore desired his Grace's assistance to prevent so fatal a step. The Duke of Ormond said, it was very strange that any body should have the assurance to persuade his Majesty to declare himself what he was not; especially in a point of so great consequence. Bristol answered, That was not the case, for the King was really a Roman Catholic, but the declaring himself so would ruin his affairs in England; and as for the mighty promises of assistance from France and Spain, you (my Lord) and I know very well, that there is no dependence or stress to be laid on them, and that they would give more to get one frontier-garrison into their hands, than to get the Catholic Religion established, not only in England, but all over Europe; and then desired his Grace to join in diverting the King, from any thoughts of declaring himself in a point which would certainly destroy his interest in England for ever, and yet not do him the least service abroad. The Duke allowed that the Earl judged very right in the case, but excused himself from meddling in the matter, because the King had kept his conversion as a secret from him, and it was by no means proper for him to shew that he had made the discovery. There is a very different detail of this given us by Bishop Kennet, who, after transcribing the Earl of Clarendon's account of the King's journey into Spain, proceeds thus (22). 'It is farther certain, that the Earl of Bristol, who was the King's companion and guide to the place of this treaty, and Sir Henry Bennet, who was the prime agent for the King, did both of them turn Papists about this time, as if they did it upon a compact then made; and there is a story to confirm all, which I have reason to think true. Sir Henry Bennet was soon after seen to wait upon the King from mats, at which sight the Lord Culpepper had so much indignation, that he went up to Bennet, and spoke to this effect. I see what you are at: is this the way to bring our master home to his three kingdoms? Well, Sir, if ever you and I live to see England together, I will have your head, or you shall have mine. Which words struck such a terror upon Sir Henry Bennet, that he never dared to set foot in England, till after the death of the Lord Culpepper, who met with a very abrupt death within a few months after the King's return. When he was taken out of the way Sir Henry Bennet came to Court, and soon rose into honours and preferments, and was in disguise, a meer creature of the Papists, and had the dying courage to take off that disguise (23). This passage is confirmed, or rather copied, by another reverend Historian, in the following words. 'He was immediately succeeded in his place by Sir Henry Bennet, lately the King's Resident in Spain, a person of no mean ability, but one who secretly espoused the cause of Popery, and one who had much influenced the King towards embracing that religion, the year before his Restoration, at Fontarabia, for which he was so much threatened by the Lord Culpepper, that it is believed he durst not return into England till after the death of that Nobleman. Not only the removal of Secretary Nicholas, and the settlement and influence of the Queen-Mother, but likewise the absence of the Duke of Ormond, seemed to conspire towards the diminution of the Chancellor's interest. That great man and firm friend had been sent over into Ireland, where, as Lord-Lieutenant, he was received with greater honour and triumph, with more magnificence and larger presents, than was ever known in that kingdom.' These accounts differ very much from one another, so that it is impossible they should be all true, though it is not easy to say how far they may be all false. The first of them is said to have been taken from the mouth of the Duke of Ormond; but there are some passages in it that I cannot account for; as for instance, the Duke of Ormond took it for granted the King was a Papist, because he saw him at prayers in a church at Brussels, and to avoid being seen by the King went to another altar in the same church, kneeled down, and said his own prayers. If the King had seen him in this posture, he might have pronounced the Duke a Papist, upon as good grounds as he did him, and perhaps have been as much in the right; for the Earl of Clarendon, long after this, declares positively, that the King was a sound Protestant (24); and, if I am not mistaken, the King declared as much to all the Papists in England, in writing, by an Agent of theirs about that time (25). It is very strange that Sir Henry Bennet should urge the King to declare himself a Papist, which was so directly contrary to his own conduct, if himself was one; but it is not at all strange that the Earl of Bristol should dissuade his Majesty from that step, who, though he both lived and died in the profession of Popery, was by his own daughter, the Countess of Sunderland, thought never to have been a Papist in his heart. At the time he exhibited articles against the Earl of Clarendon in the House of Lords, he charges him, amongst other things, with insinuating that Sir Henry Bennet was a Papist, though he avers that he was a Protestant (26). So that there is great contrariety of evidence even from the same persons, but with respect to the story of Lord Culpepper, which is very largely refuted by the honourable Roger North (27), it could not be true for this plain reason, which however is not taken notice of by any writer, viz. that Lord did not attend the King in his Journey, Sir Henry Bennet never returned to Brussels; therefore it is impossible that any such discourse could pass between them, or that his Lordship should be poisoned to make way for Sir Henry Bennet's coming safely home. Bishop Burnet, who had much better opportunities of knowing passages of this nature, than either of the two last writers, gives us a very different account of the matter, and I believe the truest character of the noble person, of whom we are speaking, that is any where to be met with (28). 'Not long after the Restoration, says he, Bennet advanced afterwards to be Earl of Arlington, was by the interest of the Popish party made Secretary of State, and was admitted into so particular confidence, that he began to raise a party in opposition to the Earl of Clarendon. He was a proud man; his parts were solid, but not quick; he had the art of observing the King's temper, and managing it beyond all the men of that time: He was believed a Papist, he had once professed it, and when he died he again reconciled himself to that Church: Yet in the whole course of his ministry he seemed to have made it a maxim, that the King ought to shew no favour to Popery, but that his whole affairs would be spoiled if ever he turned that way; which made the Papists become his mortal enemies, and accuse him as an apostate and the betrayer of their interests.' We will conclude this note with what is said by Mr North beforementioned, in answer to the passage already cited from Bishop Kennet, the facts mentioned in which are most certainly true. Having mentioned that Prelate's remark with respect to Bennet Earl of Arlington, that he lived a disguised Papist, and had the dying courage to take off the disguise (29), 'The sense, says Mr North, of this reflection is, That the King was a disguised Papist as well as he, but had not the courage, even at his death, to pull off the disguise. The Lord Arlington lived as a Protestant, had Chaplains, and our service in his family, and built a very fine church at Euston, where the Church-Service was constantly used, and he, as Courtiers commonly, might have little regard for religion. But if he shewed any partiality that way it was towards the Fanatick, and so far, which was not a little, he appeared inclinable to Popery. His courage had been greater to have dismasked it in full health; and as for his declaring on his death-bed it is not strange, that one who had lived as he had done, coming to die, which is no Court-trick, should have qualms come over his conscience, and he desirous of some religious reconciliation; and then his former deliberations abroad came into his weak mind, and Priests still exaggerated no salvation out of their holy Church; as under such circumstances their way is to gain the fame of a feeble convert, he submitted to the forms which the author calls taking off the disguise. I look on this to be the most material part of our noble person's history, if it were possible to clear it up to one's entire satisfaction; and from what has been laid down, as well as from what will hereafter appear, I persuade myself that the reader will not be much deceived, if he takes it for a truth, that Sir Henry Bennet, afterwards Lord Arlington, neither professed himself a Papist, nor did any service to the

(24) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, p. 725.

(25) Thurloe's Letters, Vol. I. p. 744.

(26) Complete History of England, Vol. III. p. 246.

(27) In his Examination, or an Enquiry into the Credit and Veracity of a pretended Complete History, 4to. 1740.

(28) Burnet's History of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 39.

(29) North's Examination, or Enquiry, &c. p. 29.

(22) Complete History of England, Vol. III. p. 220.

(23) Echard's History of England, p. 805.

that he recalled Sir Henry Bennet from Madrid, and soon after his coming home, appointed him Privy Purse, 'till some other employment should fall more worthy of his acceptance, and of the friendship and kindness with which his Majesty had always honoured him (p). It was not long before an occasion offered, or, as some say, way was made for his promotion, by Sir Edward Nicholas resigning the office of Secretary of State, whom he succeeded October 2, 1662 (q). It is commonly supposed, this was the first step to the forming a party against the Earl of Clarendon, then Lord-Chancellor, and that it was brought about by the Popish faction; who, at that time, favoured Sir Henry Bennet (r); but those who are contented with plain facts, rather than the refined motives which make the chief merit of Secret Histories, may meet with many other, and perhaps no less certain, reasons for the King's bestowing on him this preferment [E]. In the latter end of the succeeding year, viz. September 28, 1663, the university conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Laws, as a testimony of the respect due to him from Oxford (s). On the fourteenth of March following, he was created Baron of Arlington in the county of Middlesex (t), and was then looked on as a great Minister of State, and one of his Majesty's most favoured servants. He had, as Secretary, almost the sole management of foreign affairs, and has left us ample testimonies of his abilities, in his letters during this period, in relation to various points of importance (u). Almost all our historians agree, in setting him at the head of the party against the great Chancellor Clarendon, and say he promoted his fall; but his letters shew nothing of this, and that Earl himself, who corrected and put his History into order at Rouen, in the time of his exile, speaks very respectfully of him upon all occasions. It is certain; Lord Arlington had a great share in the first Dutch war, but he likewise appears to have had no small concern in the negotiations for peace, which he pushed in such a manner, as by no means shews him to have loved war, or to have advised the King his master to pursue it beyond measure (w). In this space, on the recommendation of the Duke of Ormond, he brought Mr Temple, afterwards Sir William Temple, into business, and employed him in the treaty with the Bishop of Munster, for attacking the Dutch by land, while we did it by sea (x). He afterwards fixed that famous Minister at Brussels, and we may perceive as much friendship and confidence on one side, and as much respect and gratitude on the other, in the letters passing between them, as it was possible for words to express, or men to conceive (y). Whatever difference therefore grew afterwards between them,

(p) History of the King's Restoration, p. 195.

(q) Kennet's Register, p. 788.

(r) Complete History of England, Vol. III. p. 245.

(s) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. II. col. 156.

(t) Dudgale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 243.

(u) These Letters were published by Mr Bebbington of Gray's-Inn, in two Volumes, 8vo. 1701.

(w) Arlington's Letters, Vol. I. p. 142.

(x) Temple's Works, Vol. II. p. 7.

(y) Arlington's Letters, Vol. I. p. 14, 35, 78. Temple's Works, Vol. II. p. 51.

Popish faction during the reign of King Charles II; so that whatever notions he might have when worn out with years and business, his abilities were entirely Protestant, and, generally speaking, applied as they ought to be, to the joint service of the King and nation.

[E] No less certain reasons for the King's bestowing on him this preferment.] It is a very difficult thing to give an account of Court transactions at any distance of time; and it is still more difficult to disprove matters which are very positively asserted, and that too by men of great character, and who are presumed to have been very well acquainted with the facts that they relate. But a person who has any share in a work of this nature, is certainly under the strongest obligation to represent things fairly, which must be my apology for differing upon this occasion from some of our greatest writers. It was natural for the Earl of Clarendon to be displeased with this promotion, for almost all the reasons that a man could have to be displeased with any thing. The person removed was an old Minister, with whom the Earl had lived long in the strictest friendship. The person that was to come in was one he did not like, and who, he was thoroughly persuaded, did not like him. There was still a third reason, as strong as any of the former, and stronger it could not well be. The old Secretary was entirely governed by the Earl, so that removing him was taking from Clarendon, as a Minister, so much power. We need not wonder therefore that he was so angry at it, that he considered it as the first step to his fall, and that he treated it in this light in his petition to the House of Lords, which was the last public act he did in this kingdom (30). All our Historians are governed in this respect by what Lord Clarendon says, without ever considering that all he said was in anger. This alone ought to put us upon enquiring what was said, or might be said, on the other side, and that I find may be reduced to these particulars. The King found his government weak on the side of foreign affairs, and upon enquiring into the causes of it, he found that neither of his Secretaries understood them; he thought it reasonable therefore to have at least one Secretary that was fit for his business; and knowing that Sir Edward Nicholas was old, infirm, and willing to retire, he was content he should do so; and to make this the easier to him, as well as to afford him an effential mark of his esteem for his long services, he was contented to give him, by way of equivalent for what he might have acquired by remaining in his office, ten thousand pounds. There is nothing in all this that reflects at all upon the King's judgment, or upon the tenderness that he ought to have had for his father's old servant and his own. But it may be enquired upon what authorities these facts are grounded, in answer to which I shall give Bishop Burnet's character of the two Secretaries; and I presume it cannot be objected that this Prelate was inclined to misrepresent men in great posts in compliment to King Charles II. His words are these (31.) 'Another man raised by the Duke of Albemarle was Maurice, who was the person that had prevailed with Monk to declare for the King. Upon that he was made Secretary of State. He was very learned, but full of pedantry and affectation. He had no true judgment about foreign affairs, and the Duke of Albemarle's judgment of them, may be measured by what he said when he found the King grew weary of Maurice, but that in regard to him he had no mind to turn him out. He did not know what was necessary for a good Secretary of State, in which he was defective, for he could speak French and write short-hand. Nicholas was the other Secretary, who had been employed by King Charles I. during the war, and had served him faithfully, but had no understanding in foreign affairs. He was a man of virtue, but could not fall into the King's temper, or become acceptable to him.' These characters very clearly shew, that the nation did not at all suffer by the King's resolution to remove one of these Secretaries, to make way for one he had reason to believe better versed in the business of his office. As to the money which was paid to Sir Edward Nicholas, we take that on the credit of Lord Clarendon, who is not contradicted by any writer that I have met with. I look therefore upon what has been said in the text to be fully made good, and that we may, with a great probability of being right, suppose that the King made this change upon very reasonable and just motives, as that he did it purely to gratify the Popish party, who, from any thing that appears from facts, were no gainers by it, or what followed from it.

(31) Burnet's History of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 99.

them, we must allow to the honour of Lord Arlington's memory, that he distinguished the great talents of that admirable person; and first produced them to the world, by bringing him on the theatre of publick action. By the correspondence between them it very plainly appears, that though the view of uniting the crowns of Great Britain and Sweden with the States-General, in setting bounds to the ambition of France, and securing the Spanish Low-Countries, was Sir William Temple's own, yet it as plainly appears that he opened this to, and was supported therein by, Lord Arlington, who was then in the highest point of trust and favour. It was he who brought that glorious design to bear, and though he never pretended to the honour of making the TRIPLE ALLIANCE, yet the love of truth obliges one to say, that without him it never had been made. We might be able to set all these matters in a much clearer point of light, if the first part of those Memoirs were extant, in which Lord Arlington made so great a figure, the second and third parts of which do him so little honour, and perhaps the first were burnt, and the two last preserved, for that very reason (z) [F]. But however that matter may be,

(z) See a remarkable passage from the Preface before the third part of Temple's Memoirs, in note [F].

it

[F] The first was burned, and the two last preserved for that very reason] It was certainly a very singular and a very great advantage to Mr Temple, that he came abroad and into business, recommended by the Duke of Ormond, and supported by the Earl of Clarendon and Lord Arlington (32). His first negotiation was in the year 1665 with the Bishop of Munster, and he was afterwards employed as the King's Resident at Brussels to the Governor of the Spanish Netherlands, and had his patent for a Baronet sent him over thither. All this was plainly the effects of Lord Arlington's kindness for him, who testified upon all occasions a very just, that is, a very high, esteem for his abilities; and there is very little reason to doubt that Sir William Temple, who was a very polite, well-bred man, made very proper returns to this Minister, though it must be confessed, that there is not much of this kind to be found in such of his letters as have been made publick: Yet, for the satisfaction of the reader in this point, I shall give him the close of a letter from Lord Arlington to Sir William Temple, when he was appointed Resident, as is before mentioned, which will shew how far he was dependant upon that noble Peer, and how sensible he was at that time of his good offices (33). This letter is dated October 26, 1665.

' King of Great Britain. Sir William Temple ought not to be less satisfied with the readiness wherewith the States have passed over to the concluding and signing these treaties, for which he came hitber, than they (the States) are with his conduct and agreeable manner of dealing in the whole course of his negotiation. It appears, my Lord, that you thoroughly understand men, and bestow your friendship only upon such as deserve it, since you cause persons to be employed who acquit themselves so worthily. I think myself happy to have negotiated with him, and that by his means your Lordship hath been pleased to give me a testimony of your good-will. For the favour you say his Majesty is pleased to have for me, I have no other ways deserved it, than by my respects for his Royal person, whereof I shall endeavour to give proofs upon all occasions his Majesty will please to afford me. In the mean while I shall wait with impatience for some opportunity to shew how sensible I am of all your Lordship's civilities, which I shall ever acknowledge by a true esteem for your merits, and by a strong passion to let you see that I am with as much sincerity as you can desire,

' My Lord, your's, &c.

' Herewith you receive his Majesty's credentials for you to the Marquis Castel Rodrigo, which gives you possession of your Residency with him. It ought to be accompanied with new instructions to you, but I must defer them 'till my next, against which time I hope we shall have some other matters riper for your knowledge than they are now. I will not return you compliments in proportion to the length and warmth of your's, lest they should troublesomely multiply on both sides, contenting myself only with assuring you that I am, &c.'

It was very decent and proper for the Grand Pensionary to pay these compliments to Sir William Temple, whose conduct in negotiating and concluding the Triple Alliance can never be enough admired or applauded, considering it was the subject of this letter; but Sir William himself, in a letter to Lord Arlington about the same time, speaks of this very matter in the following terms (37). 'I cannot but rejoice in particular with your Lordship upon the success of this affair, having observed in your Lordship, as well as my Lord-Keeper, a constant steady bent in supporting his Majesty's resolution, which is here so generally applauded, as the happiest and wisest that any Prince ever took for himself or his neighbours. What in earnest I hear every hour, and from all hands, of that kind, is endless, and even extravagant. God of heaven send his Majesty to run on the same course, and I have nothing left to wish, since I know your Lordship will continue to esteem me what I am, with so great passion and truth, my Lord, your's, &c.'

(37) Temple's Letters, as before, p. 51.

This affords us at once an instance of our Minister's gratitude, and of his Patron's modesty. Their friendship continued uninterrupted for about three years, during all which time he constantly corresponded with Lord Arlington, and received from him those instructions that did belong to his place to give. We must also observe, that these three years proved equally honourable for the Secretary and the Minister, they both acquired much reputation within that space, at the latter end of which Sir William Temple tells us, it was a common saying (34) among the Politicians abroad, That there had been for nine months the greatest Ministry in the world in England. The reader will observe, that this was before the Cabal came into play, and when foreign affairs were in a manner wholly under the management of Lord Arlington (35). It may not be amiss to confirm the truth of what is advanced here and in the text, by the testimony of the famous John de Witte, than whom a more illustrious witness cannot be produced in support of Lord Arlington's character. This letter is dated February 14, N. S. 1668, and runs thus (36).

It was the just sense Sir William Temple had of the honour this transaction did to the King and his Ministry, that put him upon writing Memoirs (38) of all that happened in relation to it; and Dr Swift in his preface to the third part of his Memoirs, gives us a very plain and probable account of what became of them, which, when perused, will leave nothing necessary to be farther said upon this topic.

(38) The second part of Sir William Temple's Memoirs was published, by himself; and the third, by Dr Jonathan Swift.

' My Lord,
' AS it was impossible to send a Minister of greater capacity, or more proper for the temper and genius of this nation, than Sir William Temple; so I believe no other person either will, or can, more equitably judge of the disposition wherein he has found the States, to answer the good intentions of the

' The subject of the first part was chiefly the Triple Alliance during the negotiation, of which my Lord Arlington was Secretary of State and chief Minister; Sir William Temple often assured me, he had burnt those Memoirs, and for that reason was content his letters, during his embassies at the Hague and Aix-la-Chapelle, should be printed after his death, in some manner to supply that loss. What it was that moved Sir William Temple to burn these first Memoirs, may perhaps be conjectured from some passages in the second part, formerly printed. In one place the author has these words: My Lord Arlington, who made so great a figure in the former part of them, was now grown out of all credit, &c. In other parts he tells us, that Lord was of the Ministry which broke the Triple

(32) Life of Sir William Temple, prefixed to the first Volume of his Works, p. 51.

(33) Arlington's Letters, Vol. I. p. 34, 35.

(34) Temple's Letters in his Works, Vol. II. p. 180.

(35) Burnet's History of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 34.

(36) Temple's Letters in his Works, Vol. II. p. 68.

it will always do honour to this noble person's memory, that while he was looked upon to be at the head of the ministry, his master's affairs had the most flourishing aspect, our concerns went easy and harmoniously at home, and the nation's credit abroad was at its greatest height. It is indeed too true, that this fair prospect was but of a short continuance, though at the same time we may affirm, it lasted full as long as his absolute interest, and never declined, 'till other men came to have at least an equal, by degrees a superior, credit with the King his master, who was but too apt to prefer, in his Ministers, quick parts to solidity of understanding. There was, besides the Duke of Bucks, another man of the same stamp, who came at this time into the King's favour, and had for some time afterwards, much more interest with the King, and with his brother the Duke of York, than he deserved; this was Sir Thomas Clifford, a concealed, but a zealous Papist, a staunch friend to the French, and an implacable enemy to the Dutch (a). Lord Arlington, who had hitherto maintained a strict friendship with the Lord-Keeper Bridgman, and for some time directed absolutely foreign affairs, found himself now under a necessity of either retiring from business, or entering into some degree of friendship with these new favourites; and the person he fixed upon was the Duke of Bucks, who professed himself, though very falsely, a friend to moderate measures, and to that system of foreign affairs, which had been both framed and established by Lord Arlington. Lord Ashley, afterwards the famous Earl of Shaftesbury, was likewise brought into high favour at this time; and finding that the King remembered the business at Chatham, where the Dutch burnt his fleet, when a treaty of peace was not only negotiating, but on the point of signing at Breda; he struck in with this disposition of the King's, and being a man that liked storms and tempests, as the weather that suited him best, he projected a second Dutch war (b). It has since appeared, that Lord Arlington had done much better, if he had quitted his post when he visibly declined in his credit, but he had been long in business, loved a Court, and the King was very unwilling to part with him; so that he flattered himself with the hopes of taking some favourable opportunity of bringing things about again, and by this means was drawn in to join with men, who had neither the good of the nation, the honour of their master, or the success of his measures at heart; and though it is certain that Lord Arlington struggled a long time, in supporting the Duke of Ormond, and in his endeavours to prevent a new war, yet he was forced to give way at last, and from having been at the head of a Ministry, that had gained the greatest reputation of any this nation ever saw, came to act no very considerable part in an administration, which was the worst that ever was entrusted with power since we were a nation [G].

The

(a) See the article of CLIFFORD, (THOMAS) in this Dictionary.

(b) Kennet, Burnet, Oldmixon, &c.

'Triple League, advised the Dutch war and French alliance, and, in short, was at the bottom of all those ruinous measures which the Court of England was then taking; so that, as I have been told from a good hand, and as it seems very probable, he could not think that Lord a person fit to be celebrated for his part in forwarding that famous League while he was Secretary of State, who had made such counter-paces to destroy it.' This is an unexceptionable proof of his being at the head of one Ministry; and in the course of this article the reader will have a very clear account of the share he had in the other; for men of ordinary capacities think it justice to shew both sides of a character, and not barely that which gratifies either their immediate interests or inclinations.

[G] The worst that ever was entrusted with power in this nation. One seems to be justified in saying this, because hitherto no writer that I know of has ever ventured to say a word in their vindication. It is very just that it should be so, for these people forced themselves into the administration without either having, or pretending to have, any sort of principles, nay Lord Arlington only excepted, who seems to have complied than rather acted with them, and therefore is represented as a man of inferior genius to the rest. The engine by which they raised themselves, was a pretended influence over the Parliament. The King, to gratify his own inclination of being rid of the Lord Chancellor Clarendon, had suffered a great spirit to be raised against him in the House of Commons, and had seen the same kind of spirit managed under his own eye in the House of Lords for the like purpose, and by this strange conduct made way for all that followed (39). Those who in this conjuncture gained themselves credit in Parliament, made themselves so formidable thereby to the King, that he was obliged to take them for his Ministers, as being sensible that they had it both in their will and in their power, to disturb and distress any others of whom he had made choice. As this was their first step to greatness, so to make sure of the administration, and not to leave the King at liberty to turn them out, they resolved to change the whole system of affairs. The Duke of Bucks had always kept fair with the Sectaries, and he insisted upon an indulgence for them against Law. Lord Ashley, afterwards Earl of Shaftesbury, projected the circumscribing the power of the House of Commons, and was in reality the author of the war, though in that, as well as in the shutting up of the Exchequer, Clifford appeared to be the man (40). The Earl, afterwards Duke of Lauderdale, answered for Scotland, that the King might enlarge his power there, which he did to the utmost extent; and that nobleman used it with so much violence, that never any man was more hated and feared than his Grace. Lord Arlington suffered himself to be persuaded that these men meant his master well, and so he kept his post of Secretary, with some small share in the direction of things, and a much larger in the confidence of his master, which enabled him to prevent his going all the lengths these men would have carried him; And when Shaftesbury saw this, he struck into the same path, and began to take measures for his own safe retreat. This, as far as one can judge from the histories of those times, was the true character of this motley Ministry; but it is requisite that the reader should also see what other authors have delivered upon so important a subject; and when he has done this, compared what they say, and considered their respective characters, he may possibly be the better pleased with that short account that we have given him, without the least degree of prejudice or partiality to any. Mr Echard tells us (41), that the King and his Ministry at this time began more and more to practise the arts of dissimulation, of which they were all thought to be masters, to enter into dark and foreign designs, and to pursue different measures from those of the Parliament; and that the Ministry was now made up of a different species of persons, than in the first and most happy part of the reign, consisting of a heterogenous body of Counsellors, a select Cabinet of five noted men, Clifford, Ashley (afterwards Shaftesbury), Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale, the initial letters of whose titles, caused them to obtain that well known name of the CABAL, which was judged to have been so ominous to the English affairs. The projects and proceedings, says Mr Echard, of this remarkable set of men, proved manifestly and highly prejudicial to the main interest of the nation. Father Orleans the Jesuit (40) See North's Examen, P. I. chap. ii.

(39) See Kennet, Echard, Burnet.

(41) History of England, p. 264, 265.

The former scheme of politicks being entirely overturned, Buckingham and Shaftesbury came to have the direction of all affairs at home, and, in conjunction with Clifford, introduced a new system with respect to foreign affairs, which consisted in a close conjunction with France, in a war against the Dutch, wherein the Lord Arlington does not appear to have acted farther, than he was obliged to act as Secretary of State (c), which nevertheless did not protect him from the resentment of the nation, very justly provoked by the consequences with which this war was attended. Yet if any judgment can be formed from facts, he was the only person, that in this sad scene of affairs, had it either in his thoughts, or in his power, to secure his master from being involved in a new civil war, or the nation from being oppressed, by the change of the constitution into an absolute monarchy. The four other great Lords thought this last measure practicable, and though it is certain that two of them hated the King, and very far from being certain whether any of them loved him, yet they were so infatuated with the thoughts of governing all things at their own will under his name, that they pressed him, as they had gained the Duke of York, to continue firm in his resolutions, and to venture all in order to bring this desperate project to bear, towards which, in their several stations, they went boldly as far as they could (d). Arlington, however, could never be brought to relish this measure, nor is he charged with it by any one writer of credit. On the contrary, there is the best authority to prove, that he was the first who saw the King's danger, and the only one that endeavoured to make him see it and sensible of it. In the month of April 1672, his Majesty was pleased to raise him to the dignity of Earl of Arlington in the county of Middlesex, and Viscount Thetford in the county of Norfolk (e). On the fifteenth of June following, he was elected one of the Knights Companions of the most Noble Order of the Garter (f), and was soon after appointed, in conjunction with the Duke of Buckingham, and the Earl of Halifax, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary at Utrecht, where the French King then kept his Court, to treat of a peace between the Allies and the States-General (g); but this negotiation came to nothing. But the war proving not so successful, at least for us, as was expected, his Majesty began to be more inclinable to hearken to a peace, which is attributed to the influence of the Earl of Arlington, the cabal being now separated, Lord Clifford having resigned the post of High-Treasurer, which was bestowed upon Sir Thomas Osborne, afterwards Earl of Danby, and in process of time Duke of Leeds; and it was also known, that the King intended to take the Great-Seal from the Earl of Shaftesbury, which however was delayed 'till the meeting of the Parliament, that it might be seen what service he could do there (h). The session was accordingly opened October 20, 1673, but it very soon appeared that the House of Commons disliked the war, and were determined to call those Ministers to an account, who had either advised or promoted it, but this was prevented for the present by a prorogation, soon after which the Seal was taken from the Earl of Shaftesbury, and given to Sir Heneage Finch (i). On the seventh of January the Parliament met again, not at all

(c) See the proofs of this in note [c].

(d) North's Examen, p. 453, 454.

(e) Bill sign. Apr. 20, ann. 24, Car. II.

(f) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 483.

(g) From a Letter of the Lord High-Treasurer Clifford to Sir B. Gascoyne, dated June 22. 1672.

(h) Complete History of England, Vol. III. p. 296.

(i) North's Examen, p. 49.

in

who fancied he had sufficient information of this and other matters from the mouth of King James II. himself, after discoursing of that Prince's long concealment of his religion, mentions an extraordinary project, which gave him hopes of the liberty to discover it, which he tells us was as follows (42). 'That in the year 1670, the Court of England perceiving that the republican spirit insensibly creeping into the Parliament again, seriously considered how to remedy that evil, which foreboded many more. That the managers of that enterprize were five Lords, who were called the Cabal, as well from the first union amongst them, as from the first letters of their names composing that word.' He tells us then, that the Earl of Arlington had the least genius of the five, but that this was well supplied by his experience, which gained him great knowledge in foreign affairs. 'These Lords, continues Father Orleans, firmly bound to their master by their high places and favours, could not without indignation observe, what advances the republican spirit, which began to revive again, had caused the Parliament to make against the regal authority, among others, the Triple Alliance, to which that republican Cabal had forced the King against his will, appeared to them as an audacious inroad upon the prerogative, of which the consequences were to be prevented. Filled with these just resentments, they persuaded the King to be as absolute, as he was intitled by the Crown and the laws of the Realm, to confine the Parliament to the bounds prescribed them by immemorial custom; and to take care that a mixture of commonwealth with monarchy, introduced by violence and subjects usurpation, did not produce a monstrous anarchy, which might again expose England to that dreadful confusion, from which it was scarce recovered. To effect all this, it was necessary

(42) Revolutions of England, p. 91.

'to have a war, which might furnish the King with a pretence to raise an army, and this they had against the Dutch, and the more favourable, because the honour of the English nation was equally concerned, for the old controversy about the Flag began to be renewed, and the East-India merchants daily complained that they were unfairly treated by the Dutch. This, I say, was the pretence; but the real motive for pitching upon this war, rather than any other, was the close correspondence between the English republicans and those of Holland, the latter incessantly infilling into the minds of the former, that love of liberty, there so highly valued, to make them averse to monarchy, and to excite them to throw off the yoke of regal dominion, being always ready to support any faction that should attack it.' This French Historian writes our History as most of the French Poets do their plays, without considering where the scene is laid, or the manners proper for the characters he would represent; so that though his work may deserve reading, yet the very stile in which it is penned shews plainly it deserves no credit. As to what he says here with so much confidence, every man who is but indifferently skilled in our History, must at first sight perceive it to be as absurd and foolish, as it is false and unfounded. In all King Charles the Second's reign there never was so able, or so well principled a Ministry, as that by whom the Triple Alliance was made; so that, as there was no colour for abusing them at all, there could be no abuse so glaringly groundless, as calling their administration republican. But it is possible Father d' Orleans, hearing King James say something on this subject, mistook the persons he spoke of, and threw in the epithet republican in the wrong place.

in a better temper than when they met last, and therefore determined to proceed against those they esteemed evil Ministers. The first they fell upon was the Duke of Lauderdale, against whom they voted an address for removing him from his employment, and from the King's presence and councils (k). They next fell upon the Duke of Bucks, who desired to be heard, which was complied with. The first day he fell into such confusion that he could not speak, upon which he complained that he was ill, and the hearing was put off to the next day. He then made a very florid speech, in which he hinted some things to the prejudice of the King and Duke, but laid the greatest blame, in the heaviest and most express terms, upon the Earl of Arlington. His Grace submitted afterwards to answer interrogatories, and in them charged the Earl still more deeply (l). The House thought fit thereupon, not only to vote an address against the Duke, of the same nature with that against Lauderdale (m), but likewise resolved to proceed against the Earl of Arlington, who thereupon desired to be heard in his own defence as the Duke had been. When he came accordingly into the House for that purpose, he made a very long and clear speech, in which he much exceeded the hopes of his friends, and laid a foundation for defeating the designs of his enemies (n) [H]. But, however, he did not so far satisfy the Commons, as to prevent further proceedings, yet they did not vote an address, as in the two former cases, but chose rather to frame articles of impeachment, which were drawn up in very strong terms, though afterwards this came to nothing, and his Lordship was by a small majority acquitted (o). The heads of this impeachment are curious and of great importance, for which reason they are inserted in the notes [I]. The Earl, in the mean time, continued to press the King to consent

to

[H] For defeating the designs of his enemies.] This was certainly a very trying conjuncture, the Earl of Shaftesbury had reconciled himself to the Country Party by very extraordinary steps, and the Duke of Buckingham visibly followed his example, so that Arlington seemed delivered up as a victim. The Duke of Lauderdale was condemned, Buckingham and Shaftesbury were become informers, the King and Duke seemed not well pleased with this method of applying to the House of Commons, yet the Earl persisted in his resolution. He spoke very modestly, and with much decency, accusing nobody, but excusing himself (43). He said the East-India company and the Merchants complained of the Dutch that the Flag was disputed, the King personally insulted, and therefore the war was judged absolutely necessary, as the Lord Chancellor Shaftesbury told them in his speech after it was begun. That believing the war necessary, he discharged the duty of his office in pursuing of it, but that delenda est Carthago, the utter ruin of the Dutch republic was no maxim of his. That he was against our accepting towns, because he looked upon this as a war of reparation, and not of conquest (44). That as to the making the Triple Alliance it was the work of Sir William Temple, and a measure he supported and applauded, as well as the subsequent Treaty at Aix-la-Chapelle, but that he did not conceive those transactions tied the King's hands from vindicating the honour of his crown, and his title to the dominion of the British seas, which made him jealous of his Flag. That throughout the whole war he had either done nothing but by the King's command, or with an honest well-meaning view towards peace. That he received new honours to give lustre to his embassy; and if he failed of bringing home the Olive Branch, it was not owing to any want of endeavours in him, but to the haughtiness of a Prince, who fancied victory must always attend him. That he wished them to consider he had been near twelve years Secretary of State, that in a long course of business he might well commit some mistake, not through any error of his will, but of his judgment. That he always inclined to peace and moderate measures, and was a friend to Parliaments. That he hoped these points considered, and the necessity some were under to blacken others to secure themselves, they would regard facts and not rumours; but that if they determined to proceed against him, he desired it might be judicially, and with an opportunity of making a defence, and not by a censure, that would crush him without reply, and with his places and honour deprive him of the means of enjoying the remainder of his days in peace, which he could never taste while under their displeasure. The King was very well pleased at his making so well timed and so well managed a defence; but the Duke was not of the same opinion. He looked upon all compliances as mean, and imputed the Earl's behaviour to a want of firmness, and thenceforward they proceeded very different ways in their political journey, as the reader will see in the text. Yet in this case the Duke's resentment did him no hurt, for the House of Commons thought it a sign he spoke truth, and was the man he professed himself, which saved him.

[I] For which reason they are in the notes.] The charge against him was digested under the following title, Articles of treasonable and other crimes of high misdemeanor against the Earl of Arlington, Principal Secretary of State; in which they accuse him, I. That he had been a constant and vehement promoter of Popery and Popish councils; 1. By procuring commissions for all the Papists lately in command, who made their application to him only as a known favourer of that faction, there being not one commission signed by the other Secretary, many of which commissions were procured and signed by him since the several addresses of the two Houses of Parliament to his Majesty, and the passing of the late Act against Popery. 2. By procuring his Majesty's letter, commanding Irish Papists and rebels to be let into corporations, and to be admitted into the commissions of the peace, and other offices of trust, military and civil, contrary to the established laws and constitutions of that realm, to the great terror of the King's Protestant subjects there. 3. By not only setting up and supporting the aforesaid Papists there, but bringing the most violent and fiercest of them to command companies and regiments of the King's English subjects here, to the great dishonour and danger of this kingdom. 4. By openly and avowedly entertaining and lodging in his family a Popish Priest, contrary to the known laws of the land, which said Priest was a noted solicitor of the Popish faction, and hath since fled out of this Kingdom. 5. By procuring pensions in other mens names for Popish officers, contrary to and in illusion of the late Act of Parliament. 6. By obtaining grants of considerable sums of money to be charged upon the revenues of Ireland, for the most violent and pernicious Papists there, particularly two thousand pounds for one Colonel Fitz-Patrick, a notorious Irish rebel, whose mother was hanged in the late wars for murdering several English, and making candles of their fat; this grant being procured for the said Fitz-Patrick, at a time when he was accused to the said Lord Arlington of high crimes by the now Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland. 7. By procuring his Majesty to release to several of the Irish Papists, some whereof were deeply engaged in the rebellion of that kingdom, the chiefties or head-rents reserved to the Crown out of the aforesaid estates of the Papists there, being a principal part of his Majesty's revenues in that kingdom. 11. That the said Earl hath been guilty of several undue practices to promote his own greatness, and hath imbezelled and wasted the treasure of this nation; 1. By procuring vast and exorbitant grants for himself, both in England and Ireland, breaking into

(k) See the Journals of the House of Commons, Jan. 1673-4.

(l) See the Speech in the Journals.

(m) Echard's History of England, p. 900, 901.

(n) Burnet's History of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 363, 366. Echard's History of England, p. 907.

(o) Burnet's History of his own Time, ubi supra.

(43) Copied from a MS. Journal, formerly in the hands of Auditor Dene.

(44) See the Duke of Buck's Speech, in Echard's History, p. 907.

to a separate peace with the Dutch, and when he had brought this about, procured Sir William Temple to be charged with that negotiation, and it was intended that he should have gone to the Hague (p) for that purpose, but the States-General, in the mean time, having sent full powers to the Marquis del Fresno, the Spanish Ambassador Extraordinary, it was agreed to treat with him, and in three conferences the treaty was concluded and signed, chiefly by the interposition of this noble Lord, and his great interest with the King, as even those writers agree, who cannot be suspected of an intention to flatter him (q) [K]. This great point being over, and the Earl of Arlington being the settlement of that kingdom, and dispossessing several of the English adventurers and soldiers, of the properties and freeholds in which they were legally and freely staid, without any colour of reason or suggestion of right. 2. By charging excessive and almost exorbitant sums for false and deceitful intelligence. 3. By procuring his Majesty's hand for the giving away, from his first entrance into his office, the value of three millions of sterling money at the least, the several grants whereof are extant countersigned by him, and by him only. 4. That the said Earl presuming to trample on all estates and degrees of the subjects of this realm, the better to subdue them to his will and pleasure, he causelessly and illegally imprisoned many of his Majesty's subjects. 5. That he did procure a principal Peer of the realm to be unjustly imprisoned, and to be proclaimed a traitor, without any legal proceeding or trial, and did maliciously suborn false witnesses with money to take away his life, upon pretence of treasonable words. III. That the said Earl hath falsely and traitorously betrayed the great trust reposed in him by his Majesty, as a Counsellor and Principal Secretary of State; 1. By entertaining a more than usual intimacy with the French Ambassador, not only lodging him in his house, but letting him into the King's most secret councils. 2. By altering in private, and singly by himself, several solemn determinations of his Majesty's council. 3. By procuring a stranger to have the chief command of the late raised army, and for the invasion of Holland, to the great dishonour and discouragements of all the legal nobility and gentry of this nation. 4. By advising his Majesty to admit of a squadron of French ships to be joined with our English fleet (the sad consequence whereof we have since felt), notwithstanding the King of France had agreed to send a supply of men, in order to have the fleet wholly English. 5. Whereas the King was advised by several of the counsellors, to press the French King to desist from making any farther progress in the conquest of the inland towns in Holland, whereof England was to have no benefit, and to turn his army upon those maritime towns that were by the treaty to be ours; his Lordship gave the King counsel to desist, whereby that part of our expedition was wholly frustrated. 6. Whereas the King was advised by several of his council, not to enter into this war till his Majesty was out of debt, and had advised with his Parliament, his Lordship was of opinion to the contrary, and gave his advice accordingly. 7. When the French ships were dispersed after the late fight at sea, and had lost all their anchors and cables by reason of the foul weather that then ensued, he persuaded his Majesty to send them eighty cables and anchors, although it was then objected, that his Majesty had not at that time any more in his stores to supply his own ships, in case of the like necessity. 8. He hath traitorously corresponded with the King's enemies beyond the seas, and, contrary to the trust reposed in him, hath given intelligence to them.

(p) Temple's Memoirs, second part, in his Works, Vol. I. P. 376, 377.

(q) Burnet, Oldmixon, &c.

These articles appear to be of a very high and heinous nature, but then, like those against the Earl of Clarendon, they were in all probability difficult to be proved, otherwise his Lordship had hardly escaped. The charge of his being popishly affected was a thing of course, and the circumstances alledged in support of it from grants, &c. countersigned by him, is grounded on what he did of course in his office, but the grants were procured by the Lord-Treasurer Clifford. The reason there were none signed by the other Secretary was, because they were not in his province. In the many years that he held his office, he must have signed abundance of warrants for money as any other Secretary would have done; and he also signed in the like capacity warrants for commitments, that of the Lord abovementioned was the Duke of Bucks, who was as forward as any of the Ministers in the Cabal, though now to save himself the most bitter enemy the Earl of Arlington had in the world. The French Minister he was so intimate with was M. Rouvigny, a Protestant, whose son was created Earl of Galway by King William, and commanded the British forces in Portugal in the reign of Queen Anne. The foreign General he brought over was M. Schombergh, afterwards the famous Marshal of that time, and created an Irish Duke by King William. He was for a French fleet's fighting, that they might not be bare spectators of the war between the Maritime Powers, and maintain their naval force entire, while we were wasting ours. He was against obtaining the Dutch maritime towns, as not aiming at the destruction of the Republick, as the Earl of Shaftesbury and Lord Clifford did at the beginning of the war. By giving intelligence to the King's enemies, no more is to be understood than his corresponding with his wife's relations, (for he had married a Dutch Lady) in order to the bringing about a peace, to which he was the only one of the Cabal that ever was inclined. This was the substance of what was said for him by his friends, when these articles were read in the House, but there is not the least notice of them in any of our histories, wherein to say the truth, this whole affair is very strangely hurried over, and many of it's most important particulars omitted (45). Bishop Burnet very justly observes, that his coming off was the more extraordinary, considering the many orders and warrants he had signed as Secretary, and ascribed his acquittal to his speech entirely, in which he says he excused himself without blaming the King; but it is not easy to understand the consequence he draws, 'That the care he took of himself, and his success in it, lost him his high favour with the King, and as the Duke was, out of measure, offended at him, he quitted his post, &c. (46). — We shall shew that this was really a favour, and consequently no foundation for such a reflection. Yet, after all, it was neither his speech nor his cause that brought him off, but the personal friendship of a noble person nearly allied to him, viz. the Earl of Ossory, eldest son to the Duke of Ormond, and then the most popular man of his quality in England, who stood for five days that the debate lasted in the lobby of the House of Commons (47), and solicited the Members in his favour as they entered the House: This brought over some of the most violent men on the other side, and induced others to attend who might probably have declined it (48).

[K] Suspected of an intention to flatter him.] The great points to be settled here is, whether the English nation were gainers by this treaty of London beyond what they were by that of Breda; and, if they were, to whom they owed the obligation of bringing the King to conclude this peace. Bishop Burnet gives us his sentiments on both heads, thus (49). 'The Prince of Orange brought the States to make application to the King in the stile of those who begged a peace, though it was visible they could have forced it. In conclusion, a project of peace with England was formed, or rather the peace of Breda was writ over again, with the offer of two or three hundred thousand pounds for the expence of the war, and the King signed it at the Lord Arlington's office. He came up immediately into the drawing-room, where, seeing Rouvigny, he took him aside, and told him he had been doing a thing that went more against his heart than losing his right hand. He had signed a peace with the Dutch, the project being brought him by the Spanish Ambassador. He saw nothing could content the House of Commons, or draw money from them; and Lord Arlington had pressed him so hard, that he had stood out till he was weary of his life. He saw it was impossible for him to carry on

(45) See Echarde's History, p. 902.

(46) Burnet's History of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 366.

(47) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 505.

(48) History of the reign of Charles II. p. 197.

(49) Burnet's History of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 367.

being unwilling to run any more such hazards, determined to retire from the post of Secretary of State, which he had the King's leave to sell, and accordingly treated with Sir William Temple for that purpose, to whom he offered it for six thousand pounds, and on his refusal, bargained with Sir Joseph Williamson for that employment (r). At the same time, however, the Earl of St Albans being inclined to resign the office of Lord-Chamberlain (probably for a valuable consideration) the Earl of Arlington was appointed to succeed him, and September 11, 1674, the White-Staff was delivered him with this publick declaration from the King his master, That it was in consideration of his long and faithful service, particularly in the execution of his office of Principal Secretary of State, for the space of twelve years, to his great satisfaction (s). He was soon after this sent over, with his brother-in-law the Earl of Ossory, and the Lord-Treasurer Danby's eldest son, into Holland, on a commission of very high importance to the Prince of Orange, some parts of which were of a nature not to be well received, and therefore could be undertaken from no motive of ambition, but purely for his master's service, and of this journey we have two accounts from great men, who valued themselves upon being in the Prince of Orange's confidence, and speaking from his own mouth. Their relations are very curious and entertaining, and give us an excellent picture of courts and courtiers, and in that respect deserve very well the reader's notice (t) [L].

But

(r) See the Life of Sir W. Temple.

(s) Dugdale's Baronage, Tom. III. p. 485.

(t) Temple's Memoirs in his Works, Vol. I. p. 337, 338.

(50) Id. ibid. p. 368.

(51) Temple's Memoirs, Part II. p. 337, 338.

'the war without supplies, of which it was plain he could have no hopes (50).' After this account of the peace, the same Prelate tells us what effect it had upon all parties, closing the whole with this remark. 'But Lord Arlington, who had brought all this about, was so entirely lost by it, that tho' he knew too much of the secret to be ill used, yet he could never recover the ground he had lost.' There is no question the Bishop spoke as he thought, and took it for granted that the money prevailed on the King to sign the Breda treaty over again; but he was misinformed in these particulars. The King had little or none of the money; it went to the Prince of Orange, who persuaded the States to beg a peace, as they really did. The treaty of London was so far from being like the peace of Breda, that it was the most honourable and advantageous we ever made with the States General, as appears by the incontestible evidence of Sir William Temple (51). 'The articles, says he, being publick, need no place here. The two points of greatest difficulty were that of the Flag, and the recalling all English troops out of the French service. This last was composed by private engagements, to suffer those that were there to wear out without any recruits, and to permit no new ones to go over; but at the same time to give leave for such levies as the States should think fit to make in his Majesty's dominions, both of English and Scotch regiments. The other of the Flag was carried to all the height his Majesty could wish, and thereby a claim of the Crown, the acknowledgments of it's dominions in the narrow seas, allowed by treaty from most powerful neighbours at sea, which had never yet been yielded to by the weakest of them that I remember in the whole course of our pretence, and had served hitherto but for an occasion of quarrel, whenever we or they had a mind to it, upon other reasons or conjectures. Nothing I confess, had ever given me a greater pleasure, in the greatest publick affairs I had run through, than this success, as having been a point I ever had at heart, and in my endeavours to gain upon my first negotiations in Holland; but I found Monsieur de Wit even inflexible, though he agreed with me that it would be a rock upon which our firmest alliances would be in danger to strike and to split, whenever other circumstances fell in to make either of the parties content to alter the measures we had entered into upon the Triple Alliance. The sum of money given his Majesty by the States, though it was not considerable in itself, and less so to the King, by the greatest part of it being applied to the Prince of Orange's satisfaction for his mother's portion that had never been paid; yet it gave the King the whole honour of the peace, as the sum given by the Parliament upon it, and the general satisfaction of his people made the ease of it; and thus happily ended our part of a war, so fatal to the rest of Christendom.' There were very few people in that age more capable of judging of what concerned the general system of affairs than Sir William Temple; none was more likely to speak his mind freely upon them; and as to this matter he knew it more thoroughly than any man, as appears from the language in which he speaks of it,

Here indeed he says nothing of the Earl of Arlington (for he never mentions him but where it is necessary) but in his letters he owns his bringing about this peace, and approves his notions with respect to the Dutch after he was again settled in his embassy at the Hague (52). Upon the whole therefore, nothing can be clearer, than that, setting our system of foreign affairs right again, was the work of this noble person, and was what chiefly drew on him the hatred of the popish faction.

[L] Deserve very well the reader's notice. Amongst all the transactions of King Charles's reign, there is not one of more importance than this journey of the Earl of Arlington's to Holland, and the commission with which he was intrusted to the Prince; but the great difficulty is to come at the truth of this, and to see the whole transaction in it's natural light, and as it really happened (53). Sir William Temple thought he was the most capable man in the world of shewing it, and it was chiefly to draw up the history of this journey, that he penned the second part of his ingenious Memoirs, in which he tells us (54), that the Earl of Arlington found himself a sufferer by having so deeply engaged in the Cabal, and that his country was against him, and that the King was displeas'd at his ill success. However, he still thought himself out of danger with the Parliament, and therefore appeared zealous for their sitting, and to increase his reputation with them, and to become a favourite, he set himself all he could to prosecute the Roman Catholics, and to oppose the French interest. To shew his zeal against the first, he revived some old dormant orders for prohibiting Papists to appear about the King, and put them in execution at his first coming into his office of Lord Chamberlain; and he had gone so far, as to join with the Duke of Ormond and Secretary Coventry, to persuade the King to remove his brother wholly from Court and publick business, as a means to appease the discontents of the Parliament, occasioned by the late conduct of affairs. By this counsel he had very much offended the Duke, and finding himself ill both with his Royal Highness and the people, and daily declining in credit with the King, he thought that there was no way of retrieving his interest, but by making himself the instrument of some secret and close measures, that might be taken between the King and the Prince of Orange abroad; he first infused into his Majesty the necessity and advantage of such a negotiation, and then that of his being employed in it, from the interest which his Lady's friends and kindred in Holland would be able to give him, as well as from the credit of having been so long in the secret of the King's affairs, and so best able to give them such colours as might render the late conduct of them less disagreeable to the Prince. The reader will observe, that all this time Sir William Temple was himself in Holland, and so could no way gain an absolute certainty of these circumstances which attended the Earl of Arlington's voyage, but must have trusted to his intelligence from London, and his own sagacity in making the most of it. But with regard to the progress of this negotiation, as it fell more immediately under his own notice and observation, and he had so great a share in it himself, that he could not but know every particular, we may

(52) Temple's Works, Vol. II. p. 327.

(53) See Kennet, Echar'd, &c.

(54) Temple's Works, Vol. I. p. 396.

But with respect to fact, most certainly there are some mistakes or misrepresentations in both, the better depend upon it, especially considering the writer's sincerity. Though he professed a great friendship for Sir William Temple, then at the Hague, yet he represented him as unlikely to be trusted with such confidence from the Prince, as was requisite in this critical affair, for having been so intimate with De Wit in his former embassy. His suggestions prevailed upon the King, who could not refuse an old servant, into whose family he had married a son, and so he went over with all the auxiliaries that seemed useful in this expedition, carrying not only his own Lady, sister of the Dutch ambassador Odyke, but her sister, Madam Beverwaert, married to the Lord Ossory, which Lady's conversation was agreeable to the Prince; Sir Gabriel Sylvius, who pretended a great intimacy with Monsieur Bentinck; Dr Durrel, a man proper to deal with Monsieur de Marett, a French Minister, in credit with the Prince and the Lord Ossory, who had a great share in the Prince's esteem and kindness, as well from his marriage in the Beverwaert family, as from his bravery, so much applauded in all the actions where he had been, which was a quality loved by the Prince, though employed against him. All this was concerted without the knowledge of the Lord-Treasurer Danby, who had been made to believe that a letter from the Prince to Monsieur Odyke had given occasion to this journey, as if the Prince had desired some person at the Hague from the King, with whom he might enter into the last confidence. But his Highness assured Sir William Temple, who gives the whole account of this affair, that there was no such thing, and that therefore Monsieur de Rouvigni, the French Ambassador at London, had more part in the journey than he, and perhaps any man else, and that all the endeavours used towards a general peace came from that side. However instructed, at least thus accompanied, the Lord Arlington went to the Hague, and told Sir William Temple at their first meeting, that he came over to set things right between the King and the Prince, which he doubted were amiss, and settle a perfect kindness and confidence between them, to effect which, he must go to the bottom of the fore, and rake into things past, which was an unpleasant task, and which Sir William could not do, as having no part in the King's business during that time, wherein the Prince took his offence at the councils of England, that his Majesty had chosen him for this office, because he could best justify his Master's intentions to his Highness in the whole course of that affair. That as for the intended peace, though his Majesty offered it, yet he would not meddle in it, unless the Prince of himself made any overtures about it, but would only endeavour to give the Prince what light he could, as to the state of things in general, and what he might hope from his allies, as well as from France. That if the Prince had made no advances to him upon it, he would let it fall, and leave it in Sir William Temple's hands. He said besides, that having fought the King's battle with the Prince, he must fight another of his own, who did not deserve the coldness which his Highness had of late expressed to him, and when that was done all his business was ended; he therefore desired Sir William to introduce him and the Lord Ossory the first time to the Prince, and after that he would give his Excellency no more trouble. Sir William told his Lordship, that he was glad to see him let his business be what it would. That he should be gladder yet, that the King's business should be done let it be by whom it would, but much more that it might be done by him. That for setting matters right between the King and the Prince, he thought it the best office which could be done them both. That for the way which he mentioned of raking into the fore, and fighting battles in defence or justification of what was past, he knew not what to say to it, but would leave it to his own prudence; but from what he knew in particular as to the Prince's humour and thoughts, whatever he did of that sort he believed should be very gentle, and not go too deep, being of opinion, that expostulations were very apt to end well between lovers, but ill between friends. Sir William Temple was told by the Lord Arlington what he thought fit of all that passed between the Prince and him; and his Highness told him not only the thing but the manner of it, which was more important than the matter itself, for this had no effect, but the other a great deal, and that lasted long. His Lordship told him much of his expostulations, and with what good turns of wit he had justified both the King's part in the late war and his own, but that upon all he found the Prince very dry and sullen, or at the best uneasy, and as if he wished it ended. That upon discourse of the state of Christendom, and what related to the war, which he was engaged in, he made no overture at all, nor entered further, than that the King might bring him out of it with honour if he pleased, and with safety to Europe, if not, it must go on till the fortunes of the parties changing, made way for other thoughts than he believed either of them had at that time. That this might happen after another campaign, which none but his Majesty could prevent, by inducing France to yield to such terms as he thought just and safe for the rest of Christendom. On the other side, the Prince told Sir William Temple with what arrogance and insolence the Lord Arlington had entered upon all his expostulations with him, shewing not only in his discourse as if he pretended to deal with a child, whom he could by his wit make believe what he pleased, but in the manner of it, as if he had taken himself for the Prince of Orange and him for the Lord Arlington. That all he said was so artificial, and giving such false colour to things which every body knew, that he who was a plain man could not bear it, and was never so weary of any conversation in his life. In short, says Sir William Temple, all the Prince told me of it looked spighted at my Lord Arlington, and not very well satisfied with the King's intentions upon this errand, though he said he was sure his Majesty never intended he should treat it in the manner he had, if he remembered that he was his nephew, though nothing else. After the first conversations, Lord Arlington itaid near six weeks in Holland, either upon contrary winds to return his dispatches, or to carry him away, often at dinner with the Prince at Court, or at Count Waldeck's, or Monsieur Odyke's, or with Sir William Temple, putting on the best humour and countenance, affecting the figure of one who had nothing of business in his head, or in the design of his journey, but at heart weary of his stay in Holland, and unwilling to return with no better account of his errand; and, as it proved, he had reason for both. The Pensionary and Count Waldeck perceived that his bent was to draw the Prince into such measures of a peace as France then so much desired, into a discovery of those persons who had made advances to the Prince, or the States, of raising commotions in England during the late war, into secret measures with the King, of assisting him against any rebels at home, as well as enemies abroad, and into hopes or designs of a match with the Duke's eldest daughter. Though they said that the Earl found the Prince would not enter at all into the first, was obstinate against the second, treated the third as disrespect to the King, to think that he should be so ill beloved, or so imprudent, to need it; and upon mention made by Lord Ossory of the last, he took no further hold of it, than saying that his fortunes were not in a condition for him to think of a wife. Thus ended this mystical journey, which, says Sir William Temple, I have the rather unveiled, because perhaps no other could do it; nor I without so many several lights from so many several hands; and because though it brought forth no present fruits, yet seeds were then scattered, out of which sprung afterwards some great events. The Lord Arlington after his return was received but coldly by the King, and ill by the Duke, who was angry that any mention should be made of his daughter the Lady Mary, though it was only done by the Lord Ossory, and whether with order from the King or not, was not known; so that never any strain of Court skill and contrivance succeeded so unfortunately as this had done, and so contrary to all the ends which the author of it proposed to himself. Instead of advancing the peace, he left it desperate; instead of establishing a friendship between the King and the Prince, he left all colder than he found it; instead of entering into great personal confidence and friendship with the Prince, he left an unkindness which lasted ever after; instead of retrieving his own credit at Court, which he found waning by the increase of

VOL. II. No. LXI.

S R

Lord

(u) See the note [M], where this fact is impartially examined.

both, which it is very fit, should, for the sake of truth, and the satisfaction of posterity, be set in a clear light (u) [M]. At this distance of time, there can be no just cause, why

we

(55) History of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 377.

Lord Danby's, he made an end of all that he had left with the King, who never afterwards used him with any confidence further than the forms of his place, and found also the Lord Treasurer's credit with the King more advanced in six weeks, which he had been away, than it had in many months before. We have another account of this extraordinary affair from Bishop Burnet, which is a good deal shorter, but I think full as curious as the former. He takes notice of some correspondence there was between the Malecontents in Holland and the Prince of Orange; and that one Castairs, who had been employed between them, had been seized; then he proceeds thus (55). 'The alarm that those discoveries from Holland gave our Court, made Lord Arlington offer at one Tryal more for recovering the King's confidence; he offered to go over to Holland with the Earl of Ossory, for they fancied they had a great interest with the Prince by their having married two of Bevervard's daughters, and the Prince had always a particular affection for Lord Ossory. Lord Arlington said he would go to the bottom of every thing with the Prince, and did not doubt but he would bring him into an entire dependence on his uncle, and particularly dispose him to a general peace, on which the King was much set, it being earnestly desired by the French. It was likewise believed, that he had leave to give the Prince the hope of marrying her, whom he afterwards married. The Duke told me he knew nothing of the matter. He had heard Lord Arlington had talked as if the managing of that was his chief errand; and upon that he had asked the King, who assured him, that he had positive order not so much as to speak of that matter. Whether notwithstanding this he had a secret order, or whether he did it without order, he certainly talked a great deal of it to the Prince, as a thing which he might depend on, if he would in all other things be governed by the King.' It is plain enough, that in various circumstances these accounts do not very well agree, though in the main they do, and may be taken together for one way of telling the story.

[M] For the sake of truth, and the satisfaction of posterity, be set in a clear light. According to the best lights that at this distance of time are to be had concerning this matter, from private memoirs and letters of persons then living, and deeply engaged in publick affairs, the Earl of Arlington was neither the principal person in, nor the contriver of, this affair. The King was desirous of passing the remainder of his reign in peace, and, if possible, securing quiet to his subjects after his demise, in order to which he judged it necessary to come to a right understanding with the Prince of Orange; and to secure him to his brother's interests, resolved to give him the Lady Mary, his Royal Highness's eldest daughter, being very sensible this match would prove very acceptable to the nation in general, to whom he was now endeavouring to give as much content as it was possible. When his Majesty had digested this project in his own mind, he began to consider of proper persons to be intrusted with this delicate negotiation, for he resolved to employ one person to expostulate with his Highness as from himself, and that another should be charged with the compliments of the Duke, and none of the disagreeable part of the commission. For this he soon cast his eyes upon the Earl of Ossory as the fittest person in his dominions, for many reasons, as he was a man of very high quality, great parts, and unblemished reputation; as having married a Lady who was very near in blood to the Prince of Orange, and as being known to stand higher in his Highness's favour than any other Englishman whatever. In making choice of the Lord Chamberlain for his own part of the negotiation, his Majesty wanted not many reasonable motives, for he was best acquainted with the grounds of his master's conduct, as having been a Minister constantly employed during his reign; he had married also a Dutch Lady (sister to the Countess of Ossory), had great correspondencies in Holland, had always expressed much zeal for his Highness's service, and been thanked for it by him. Besides, he was considered in Holland as the Minister who had made the peace, and his relation to and intimacy with the Earl of Ossory, made him the properest person in the world to accompany him, who was to act not for the King but the Duke. They set out from London, Nov. 10, 1674, and return'd Jan. 6, 1674-5, and in their own opinion were neither ill received by the Prince abroad, or by the King and Duke upon their coming home. It falls out very happily that the Earl of Ossory gave an account of this transaction to the Duke of Ormond his father (who did not love Arlington) in a private letter, dated Jan. 15, 1674-5, which is still preserved, and so far as it regards this matter runs thus (56). 'When I have given you an account of my late commission, you will judge who and what influences affairs at present. The King judged an alliance by the Duke's daughter to the Prince of Orange to suit most with his occasions, as also a right understanding between them. My Lord Chamberlain was commissioned to handle the eclairecissement on the King's side, and my part was that relating to the Duke. The objection that the King made was, that the Prince of Orange, during and since the war, had endeavoured to raise up sedition at home. His answer was, that before the peace he used his best endeavours to obtain, if not contrain, the King to it, but not by any thing tending to a rebellion. That afterwards he would own himself a villain, if ever he had done any thing that might give any suspicion thereof. My Lord Lauderdale had one Caritaires seized upon and examined, who said that the Prince of Orange bid him compliment Duke Hamilton. This he owned, for it was not unlawful (he thought) after wars to be civil to persons of worth and honour. This was all the quarrel on our side. Upon the King's desiring to know who he had treated with, and the King's promise that the persons named should not suffer, he desired to be excused, with this promise, that if for the future any thing came to his knowledge that might disturb the quiet of the kingdoms, he would give notice of it in time. The Prince of Orange's complaints were, that the King, instead of helping him in his greatest distress, had sent over Ambassadors, who made a stricter league with France, but that he forgot all things past which could not be helped. He said, that it was insinuated to him that something was intended for the Duke of Monmouth to his prejudice. To this we gave him satisfaction by the King's reiterated commands. That which most touched was, the King's conniving at levies for France, and his strictness against such as desired to serve under him; upon which he pressed extremely that those troops might be recalled, or that he might have leave to raise some for the service of the States. To this he received not the satisfaction he wished; upon which he several times said, that he was to expect little from us, during our partiality and fear of displeasing France, and that whilst those of my Lord Lauderdale's principles had so much credit, the French interest would over-balance his. At our parting he bid us not only thank the King, but assure him, that if occasion were, he would venture for his service his life and fortune. I come now to my part. The King told me, his nephew and his neice's marriage was the only thing capable of helping the Duke, and that for that, as well as other reasons, he had spoke to the Duke of it, who consented that, upon the Prince of Orange's desiring it, I should undertake the proposition would be accepted. This commission I had from both, and upon it's being moved to me by the Prince of Orange, I declared to him so much, and shewed him the account I gave of it to the Duke, from which letter, by my making a comma instead of a full stop, the criticsk would infer that I had made the offer first. Upon this the Duke expressed all the anger imaginable, but the Prince's letter by me fully justified the contrary. The Duke will have the whole letter to be a civil denial, to which I have nothing to say, but that I am sure the Prince thought it otherwise, for I shewed it him, who approved thereof. During our absence, the King's mind had been wrought upon in this affair so much, as I believe those, who wish not a good understanding between him and his nephew, will have their

(56) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II, p. 448.

we should give any preference to the Lord-Treasurer's, or the Lord-Chamberlain's, party. It is certain that the former got the better of the latter in the King's confidence, and that the Earl lost also the affection of the Duke of York, for advising his being sent from Court, which however is allowed to have been a very right measure for King Charles's service (22). It is also said, that the King, by degrees, lost all esteem for the Earl of Arlington to such a height, as to suffer some to mimic him in his presence, on the score of his pretending zeal against Popery, and, whether true or not, the story is worth the hearing [N]. But however that Monarch might behave on some occasions, most certainly he gave all outward testimonies of esteem and favour to the Earl of Arlington, even to the last moment of his life (x). He not only continued him in his office of Lord-Chamberlain, but in his Privy-Council in all the changes it suffered, and those were not a few, and he married his favourite son, the Duke of Grafton, into his family, and trusted him in all his business, when those who had supplanted him were no longer seen at Court. So that, at the King's death, except the Duke of Ormond, he left not an older servant behind him than his Chamberlain the Earl of Arlington. It was, perhaps, owing to this, that King James, though he did not love him, continued his Lordship in that office to the day of his death, which happened July 28, 1685, early in the morning, at the age of sixty-seven. His corps was afterwards conveyed to Euston in Suffolk, and interred in a vault under the church there, which was of his own erecting. On his death-bed, as some writers say, he was reconciled to the Church of Rome (y), but it is most certain that he professed himself, and educated his only daughter, a Protestant. As to his character, the reader will meet with it in the notes [O].

(22) See Temple's Memoirs.

(x) North's Examenen, p. 29.

(y) Complete History of England, Vol. III. p. 220.

He

'their aim. I almost forgot to tell you, that the Duke, before our going, said, he would not have his daughter marry before a peace was made. But this the King opposed, believing, that when we had nothing to say upon that account, it would give a jealousy that other ends were sought under this negotiation, which he would not have any way clogged. The Duke's expostulation was mingled with much kindness, but avowing that he liked not the thing from the first, and accusing me of too much haste. His carriage since to me is very fair and open. I find the Duke of Monmouth much of the same mind, there being besides crossness of interests, some private piques between the Prince and him. I fear I have been too tedious in my narratives as to publick concerns.' By comparing these accounts, and considering the views, the characters, and the dispositions of their respective authors, the reader will be able to discover much of the truth; whereas, by reading them separately, he can only learn what another person would have him take for truth, which may be quite another thing.

[N] Whether true or not, the story is certainly worth the hearing. We have this tale from Mr Archdeacon Echard, who assures us he had it from an unquestionable hand; as he does not name his authority, however, we can take it on his credit only. It runs thus (57). 'As the credit of this Earl declined, so several persons at Court took the liberty to act and mimic his person and behaviour, as had been formerly done against the Lord Chancellor Clarendon, and it became a common jest for some Courtier to put a black patch upon his nose, and strut about with a white staff in his hand, in order to make the King merry. Yet he held his Lord Chamberlain's place to the day of his death. The reason of the King's coldness, or perhaps displeasure, is believed to proceed from his late turning towards the popular stream, and more especially his outward proceedings against the Papists, when the Court believed him to be one inwardly himself. Concerning this I have received an unquestionable story from an unquestionable hand; namely, that Colonel Richard Talbot, afterwards Earl of Tyrconnel, having been some time absent from the Court, upon his return found the Earl of Arlington's credit in a low condition, and seeing him one day acted by a person with a patch and staff, he took occasion to expostulate this matter with the King, with whom he was very familiar, remonstrating how very hard it was, that per Harry Bennet should be thus acted, after he had so long and faithfully served his Majesty, and followed him every where in his exile. The King hereupon began to complain too, declaring what cause he had to be dissatisfied with Harry Bennet's conduct, who had of late behaved himself after a strange manner; for not content at come to prayers as others did, he must be constant at sacraments too. Why, said Talbot, interrupting him, Does not your Majesty do the very same thing? God's fib, replied the King with some heat, I hope there is a difference between Harry Bennet and me. This very story, if true, very fully proves that the Earl of Arlington was considered at Court as a person concerned in a strict and steady opposition to the Popish faction, and as a person of great gravity and circumspection, which his enemies studied to represent as meek pride and grimace. But we have a much stronger and better proof of this in Coleman's Letters (58); wherein it is expressly said, that there was a time, when all the King's Ministers were willing to have come into and professed the Duke of York's measures, the Earl of Arlington only excepted; and upon this information it was, that the French court entered into such suspicion of his Lordship, as to direct their Embassadors to live no longer in strict correspondence with him, as being a man capable of making them believe the execution of their instructions was in many points impracticable, and so discouraging them from attempting it.

[O] The reader will meet with it in the notes. It fares with the characters as with the pictures of great men, we see many drawn for them, but few like them. The circumstances of the Earl of Arlington's life and fortunes bring him into general Histories and private Memoirs, so that accounts of him are frequent, and yet none of them do him strict justice. He entered the world very early, as appears by a copy of verses of his, printed in a university collection, when he was but nineteen (59), and thenceforward he composed either in English or Latin on all such occasions. He was but three and twenty at the time he entered into the service of King Charles I. at Oxford, and he continued in a very uniform conduct in respect to loyalty from his first coming into business, to his going out of this world. He was Secretary to the Duke of York long, but never a favourite; he was in that capacity trusted by the King, and served him faithfully. In the business of the Duke's excursion, and in his embassy to the Court of Spain, we find Bennet's conduct irreproachable by such as loved him least (60). His becoming Secretary of State, Privy-Counsellor, and Minister, was the pure effects of his capacity, and that it was every way equal to his posts, Sir William Temple confesses, even when he was least pleased with him (61). He shewed his genius most when in the zenith of his power, and least when he consented to share that power by making one in the Cabal. It was with difficulty he recovered himself, but he scorned to do it by laying any load upon his master. He ruined himself with the Duke, by advising what he thought necessary to prevent the ruin of the King. His journey to Holland was another proof of his being determined to serve but one master. He had so much good sense to put little in the power of his enemies, and so much sincerity, that he never wanted friends. He remained a Courtier from his birth to his grave, came into place before he could well write man, and through all storms, tempests, and changes, held it till he was an old man, sometimes in danger, often in a state of coolness, but never in disgrace.

(58) Ibid. p. 628.

(59) Coronæ Carolinæ Quadratura, Oxoniae 1636, 4to.

(60) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, Vol. III. p. 388, 389, 613.

(61) Temple's Letters in his Works, Vol. II. p. 749.

(17) History of England, p. 911.

He married Isabella, daughter to Lewis de Naffau, Lord Beverwaert, son to Maurice, Prince of Orange and Count Naffau, by whom he had his only daughter Isabella, who married, August 1, 1672, Henry Earl of Euston, son to King Charles II, by Barbara, Duchess of Cleveland, created afterwards Duke of Grafton. Her father's honours being limited to her, she assisted, after the death of the Duke her husband, at the ceremony of King George the First's coronation, as Countess of Arlington, &c. in her own right, and, on her decease, Feb. 7, 1722-3, those titles descended to her only son Charles, the present Duke of Grafton (z).

(z) Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 64.

grace. ——— In many things however he might seem unhappy, as in being opposite to the Earl of Clarendon, and thereby drawing on himself an angry reflection fatal to his peace, his credit, and his memory. In his difference with Sir William Temple, who had the better of him as a writer, though not as a Statesman; yet Bishop Burnet has done severe justice, in giving the grounds of their quarrel (62): Arlington had thrown him off, and Temple was too proud to bear contempt, or forget such an injury soon. In falling in with Buckingham and Shaftesbury, Clifford and Lauderdale, all men of flame and violence, who had no great kindness for him, and who meant nothing but their own advantage. His view, on the other hand, was to keep some share of power, and be within reach of the King. In bringing himself under the imputation of Popery, though he defended the King from Papists. In having the Prince of Orange prejudiced against him, because he would have deterred him from corresponding with the malecontents against his uncle's government. In bringing upon himself the Duke's resentment, by advising what he disliked, and yet was obliged to obey. In provoking the Papists, by preventing their approaching the Royal person, which he thought necessary for the King's safety, and they resented as the highest insolence of office. In causing a suspicion amongst the friends of the Church, that he courted the Fanatics. And, finally, in having the misfortune to suffer by men of all religions, while either he had none, or dissembled what he had. ——— But notwithstanding these abatements, few Statesmen's accounts have appeared fairer when balanced. He was perfectly uniform in his political conduct; he was affectionate to his Prince, and thought this best expressed by loving his people. No engagements ever came into competition with these; he disliked Papists, not personally, but as a party; he married a Dutch woman, without sacrificing the principles of an English Statesman; he durst venture any thing for the King,

(62) History of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 378.

as appears evidently by his courting neither the Duke of York nor the Prince of Orange. While sole Minister he made the Triple Alliance. He saved the King or the nation by dissolving the Cabal. The current of common opinion, and parliamentary resentment, never ran so strong against any man without bearing him down, and yet in saving himself he never sacrificed his master. He served his friends not only without boasting, but without mentioning his services; but then he expected to be considered and treated as one that could serve them. On this head the Duke of Ormond, who had high notions of his own quality, made a strange excuse (63). That Lord, said he expects to be treated as if he had been born with a blue ribband, and forgets Harry Bennet that was but a very little gentleman. He formed very true judgments of men, things, and circumstances, and expressed himself on them freely to his master, whose affairs went always best when Lord Arlington was most in favour. His life was diversified with a vast variety of scenes, but it must be allowed, that all of them are very properly disposed. His younger years spent in travel, not idly, but in business; his middle age in the most arduous employment in the state, in which he executed all that was proper for him to execute himself; his decline of life in an honourable retirement. In a word, his parts recommended him to the Royal favour, his fidelity preserved it, and his engaging the King to sign the treaty of London, secured his throne and the honour of the FLAG to this nation. His honours were many, because his services were great; and having raised, in the space of twenty-five years employment, a moderate, not a ministerial, fortune, he bestowed the heirs of it on the son of him from whom it came, by the Lady to whom he had the highest obligations, and left behind him various testimonies, that a man may be an excellent Courtier, and at the same time a friend to the people. Many more glittering characters than his, appear in British history, more amiable, but few. E

(63) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 552.

BENNET (CHRISTOPHER), an eminent Physician of the XVIIth century, and author of some pieces mentioned below [A], was the son of John Bennet of Raynton in Somersetshire, and became a Commoner of Lincoln-college in Oxford, in Michaelmas term 1632, being then fifteen years of age. After he had taken the degrees of Bachelor and Master of Arts, he entered upon the Physic Line, but was created Doctor in that faculty elsewhere. He was afterwards chosen a Fellow of the College of Physicians in London, where he practised with great success. Dr Bennet died in April 1655, and was buried, on the second of May, in St Gregory's church, near St Paul's in London (a).

(a) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 191.

[A] His writings. He gave the public a Treatise on Consumptions, intitled, Theatri Tabidorum Vestibulum, &c. Lond. 1654, in 8vo. Also Exercitationes Diagnosticae, cum historijs demonstrativis, quibus alimentorum et sanguinis vitia delectantur in plerisque morbis, &c. Our author corrected and enlarged a book written originally by Dr Thomas Moufet, and intitled Health's Improvement; or, Rules comprizing or discovering the nature, method, and manner of preparing all sorts of food used in this nation. Lond. 1655, in 4to. Dr Bennet had one or two more pieces ready for the press at the time of his death (1).

(1) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 191.

BENNET (Dr THOMAS) an eminent Divine in the XVIIIth century, was born in the city of Salisbury in Wiltshire, on the seventh of May 1673, and educated in the free-school there: where he made so great a progress in learning, that he was sent to St John's college in the university of Cambridge, in the beginning of the year 1688, before he was full fifteen years of age (a). He regularly took the degrees of Bachelor and Master of Arts; the latter in 1694, when but twenty-one years old: And was chosen Fellow of his college. In 1695, he wrote a copy of Hebrew verses on the death of Queen Mary, printed in the collection of poems of the university of Cambridge upon that occasion. As he was mostly considerable as a writer, this article will chiefly consist of an account of the several things he published. The first was, 'An Answer to the Dissenters Pleas for Separation, or an Abridgment of the London Cases; wherein the Substance of those books is digested into one short and plain Discourse.' Lond.

(a) General Dictionary, under the article BENNET (Dr THOMAS).

1699,

1699, 8vo. [A]. About the end of the year 1700, he took a journey to Colchester, to visit his friend Mr John Rayne, Rector of St James's in Colchester; and finding him dead when he came, he undertook the office of preaching his funeral sermon, which was so highly approved of by the parishioners, that their recommendation was no small inducement to Dr Compton then Bishop of London (b), to present him to that living (c). He had institution to it January the 15th, 1700-1 (d). In this large place he applied himself with great diligence and success to the several duties of his function; and being a person of great learning, of a strong voice, and good elocution, he was extremely followed and admired; and the more, as most of the other livings were but indifferently provided for: so that he became Minister, not only of his own two parishes (e), but in a manner of that whole noble, and then flourishing town. And the subscriptions and many presents he had from all parts, raised his income to near three hundred pounds a year. But that afterwards was very much reduced, as will appear in the sequel. In the beginning of the year 1701, he published 'A Confutation of Popery, in III parts. Wherein, 1. The Controversy concerning the Rule of Faith is determined. 2. The particular Doctrines of the Church of Rome are confuted. 3. The Popish Objections against the Church of England are answered.' Cambr. 8vo [B]. About the same time, he was engaged in a controversy with some Dissenters, which produced the following book of his, 'A Discourse of Schism: Shewing, 1. What is meant by Schism. 2. That Schism is a damnable Sin. 3. That there is a Schism between the established Church of England, and the Dissenters. 4. That this Schism is to be charged on the Dissenters side. 5. That the modern pretences of Toleration, Agreement in Fundamentals, &c. will not excuse the Dissenters from being guilty of Schism. Written by way of letter to three Dissenting Ministers in Essex, viz. Mr Gilson and Mr Gledhill of Colchester, and Mr Shepherd of Braintree. To which is annexed, An Answer to a Book intitled, 'Thomas against Bennet, or the Protestant Dissenters vindicated from the Charge of Schism.' Cambr. 1702, 8vo [C]. This book being animadverted upon by Mr Shepherd, our author

(b) The Bishop had lately purchased that living, with several others, from Mr Audley of Beerchurch.

(c) General Dict. ut supra.

(d) Newcourt's Repertorium Eccles. Vol. II. edit. 1710. p. 170.

(e) With St James's he held St Nicolas by sequestration.

[A] An Answer to the Dissenters Pleas for Separation, &c.] In the preface Mr Bennet observes, that the 'Collection of Cases and other Discourses, written by the most eminent of the Conforming Clergy, to recover Dissenters to the Communion of the Church of England, had met with such an universal approbation, that he needed not speak any thing in commendation of it.' — But the Collection itself being large and dear (1), he thought it convenient to reduce it to a less bulk and smaller price, that those persons who had not either money to buy, or time to peruse, so big a volume, might reap the benefit of it upon easier terms. He next informs us, that he had used his best endeavours to avoid obscurity, and all other faults commonly charged upon Abridgments; and had omitted nothing material, though the number of sheets in his Abridgment is not the Sixth Part of those contained in the original. The 11th and 12th chapters, he tells us, received the corrections of Dr Sharpe, then Archbishop of York, author of the Discourses therein epitomized; and other parts were submitted to the censure of other worthy persons. Archbishop Tillotson's Discourse of Frequent Communion is omitted, as wholly foreign to the design of the Collection. This preface is dated from St John's-college in Cambridge, October 2, 1699. — As for the several Tracts contained in the Abridgment of the London Cases, they are as follow, according to the method they are disposed in by our author. I. 'Archbishop Tennison's Argument for Union, taken from the true interest of those Dissenters in England, who profess and call themselves Protestants (2)'. II. Bishop Williams's Case of Lay-Communion with the Church of England. III. Dr Sherlock's Resolution of some Cases of Conscience, with respect to Church-Communion. IV. His Letter to Anonymus, in answer to his Three Letters to Dr Sherlock about Church-Communion (3). V. Bishop Williams's Case of indifferent things used in the worship of God. VI. His Vindication of the Case of indifferent things, &c (4). VII. Dr Scott's Cases of Conscience resolved, concerning the lawfulness of joining with Forms of Prayer in publick Worship. In two parts (5). VIII. Dr Claggett's Answer to the Dissenters Objections against the Common-Prayers, and some other parts of Divine service prescribed in the Liturgy of the Church of England (6). IX. Dr Hicker's Case of Infant-Baptism (7). X. Dr Resbury's Case of the Cross in Baptism (8). XI. Mr Evans's Case of kneeling at the Holy Sacrament (9). XII. Bishop Fowler's Resolution of this Case of Conscience, Whether the Church of England's symbolizing, so far as it doth, with the Church of Rome, makes it unlawful to hold Commu-union with the Church of England. XIII. His Defence of the Resolution, &c. XIV. Dr Hooper's Church of England free from the imputation of Popery (10). XV. Dr Freeman's Case of Mixt Communion (11). XVI. Dr Hefcard's Discourse about Edification. XVII. Bishop Patrick's Discourse of profiting by Sermons (12). XVIII. Archbishop Sharpe's Discourse concerning Conscience. In two parts (13). XIX. Dr Calamy's Discourse about a scrupulous Conscience (14). XX. His Considerations about the Case of Scandal, or giving offence to weak brethren (15). XXI. Dr Cave's Serious Exhortation, with some important advices relating to the late Cases about Conformity. XXII. Bishop Grove's Persuasive to Communion with the Church of England (16). The Abridgment of these several Tracts is comprized in fourteen chapters, besides the Introduction and Conclusion.

[B] A Confutation of Popery, &c.] The author observes in his Preface, That though the nation is plentifully furnished with books against Popery in our own language, yet some treating only of one or more particular disputes, and being full of learning, and likewise very numerous, so that a good collection is scarcely to be found, and not to be purchased but at a great price; and others being too short and unsatisfactory, he had therefore thought it advisable to publish this Confutation of it; which he was persuaded, would give the reader a full view of all the material branches of the Popish Controversy. This preface is dated from Colchester, Feb. 13, 1700-1. In the first part of the book he overthrows Tradition, and proves, That the Scriptures are the only rule of Faith. In the second he shews, That Transubstantiation is absolutely false, as are also the other particular doctrines of the Church of Rome, viz. Adoration of the Host, Communion in one kind, Purgatory, &c. In the third he answers the Popish objections against the Church of England; namely, 1. The Charge of Schism. 2. The Pretence of our many Divisions. 3. The pretended Novelty of our Religion. 4. The Invalidity of our Orders.

[C] A Discourse of Schism, &c] In the Preface, dated Colchester, Feb. 21, 1701-2, he tells us, That he had endeavoured in that Discourse to make our tedious and intricate disputes concerning Schism, both short and clear, and level to the understandings of the most unlearned persons. To that end he had been obliged to explain the nature of Schism, and manage the charge of it against the Dissenters, in a Manner somewhat different from that of our best authors, who have formerly writ upon the same subject. However, that his Principles and Notions are the very same, which have been constantly received and maintained by

(10) Chap. VIII.

(11) Chap. IX.

(12) Chap. X.

(13) Chap. XI.

(14) Chap. XII.

(15) Chap. XIII.

(16) Chap. XIV.

(17) Conclusion.

(1) It was published at first in several Tracts, 4to. commonly bound in three Volumes; afterwards in one Volume, fol. 1698, and in three Volumes, 8vo, 1718.

(2) This is the Introduction, in the Abridgment.

(3) Chap. I. of the Abridgment.

(4) Chap. II.

(5) Chap. III.

(6) Chap. IV.

(7) Chap. V.

(8) Chap. VI.

(9) Chap. VII.

author published, 'A Defence of the Discourse of Schism: in answer to those Objections, which Mr Shepherd has made in his three Sermons of Separation, &c.' Cambr. 1703; 8vo [D]. And, towards the end of the same year, 'An Answer to Mr Shepherd's Considerations on the Defence of the Discourse of Schism.' Cambr. 8vo [E]. As also a treatise intitled, 'Devotions, viz. Confessions, Petitions, Intercessions, and Thanksgivings, for every day in the week: and also before, at, and after, the Sacrament; with occasional prayers for all persons whatsoever.' 8vo. In 1705, he published 'A Confutation of Quakerism; or a plain proof of the falshood of what the principal Quaker writers (especially Mr R. Barclay in his Apology, and other works) do teach concerning the necessity of Immediate Revelation in order to a saving Christian Faith; the being, nature, and operation of the pretended Universal Light within; it's striving with men, moving them to prayer, and calling them to the Ministry; Regeneration, Sanctification, Justification, Salvation, and Union with God; the nature of a Church; the Rule of Faith; Water-Baptism, and the Lord's-Supper. Diverse Questions also concerning Perfection, Christ's Satisfaction, the Judge of Controversies, &c. are briefly stated and resolved.' Cambr. 8vo [F]. In 1707, he caused to be printed in a small pamphlet, the Conforming Divines. 'The whole Controversy (as he goes on) turns upon the determination of this single question, Whether the Established Church does impose any one unlawful Term of Lay-Communion, or no. If the Established Church does impose any one unlawful Term of Lay-Communion with her, doubtless she is schismatical, and the separation of the Dissenters is not only lawful, but necessary. But if the Established Church does not impose any one unlawful Term of Lay-Communion with her, then 'tis utterly impossible for the Dissenters to justify their separation from her, &c.' To confirm his sentiments, he quotes several passages out of Mr Mead's Two Sticks made one; Dr Bryan's Dwelling with God; Mr R. Baxter, and other eminent Dissenters. — The annexed Answer to Thomas against Bennet, was occasioned by a book so intitled, written by a Dissenter; wherein the author endeavoured to shew, that Mr Bennet's Confutation of Popery was inconsistent with his Abridgment of the London Cases, and will vindicate the Dissenters from the charge of Schism.

[D] A Defence of the Discourse of Schism, &c. Mr Shepherd having, among other things, intimated (17), That the Dissenters out-preach the Clergy of the Established Church; our author inquires, in one part of this Defence (18), 'Whether the Sermons of the Dissenters are preferable to those of the Established Church.' Which gives him occasion to quote passages out of the sermons of Ni. Lockyer, Provost of Eaton in Oliver's time, and of R. Gouge's, Teacher at Coggeshall, abounding with glaring absurdities, and most egregious nonsense; equal to any thing mentioned by Dr Echarid in his Contempt of the Clergy.

[E] An Answer to Mr Shepherd's Considerations, &c. In the preface he complains, That it was his great misfortune to be engaged with an adversary, who was neither able nor willing to make the Controversy depending between them two useful to the reader. Then he adds, 'Were not He my neighbour, and had not Providence placed me in a very great town full of all sorts of Dissenters and Enthusiasts; I should have thought it unlawful for me to misemploy the smallest portion of my time in answering such a writer, as does neither understand the matter he treats of, nor know when he is confuted, &c.' And indeed he was a most sorry and incoherent writer. This Preface is dated March 24, 1702-3.

[F] A Confutation of Quakerism, &c. In the Preface, dated March 10, 1704-5, he observes, That he cannot but think Quakerism one of the vilest and most pernicious Heresies that our unhappy nation has ever been infected with. And therefore he was heartily grieved that the Clergy of the Established Church, who have written with great learning and accuracy upon most other points, should almost wholly neglect the Quaker Controversies. 'Tis possible, adds he, some of those great men, who have so frequently triumphed over other adversaries, are of opinion, that the Quakers are below their notice. — 'Tis true this Sect, when it first appeared in the world, distinguished themselves by such an incredible variety of Enthusiastick Freaks, as made their persons utterly ridiculous. Their books also were then studded with such prodigious quantities of Ribaldry and Jargon, of Bitterness, most unchristian Language, and even Blasphemy itself; as inclined all sober persons to believe, that they ought rather to be burnt than confuted. — At length Mr William Penn, Mr George Keith, and Mr Robert Barclay, arose. These dressed up their religion to the best advantage. The two last especially endeavoured to refine Quakerism. — Afterwards he observes, that 'Mr Barclay's Apology is certainly the exactest piece that ever was written in defence of Quakerism.' And This is what our author hath undertaken to confute in this book now before us. In the first nine chapters he proves, That there is no necessity of immediate Revelation in order to a Saving Christian Faith; and explains several texts that have been perverted by the Quakers, to serve their purpose. In the Xth, XIth, XIIth and XIIIth chapters, he shews, That there is no such Universal Light within as the Quakers pretend; and reflects upon several of their doctrines that depend thereon. The XIVth, &c. contain reflections upon divers others of their doctrines. And, from the XVIIIth to the end, he treats of Baptism. — This book was answered by Benjamin Lindley, in two volumes, 4to, 1710 and 1713, under the title of 'The Necessity of Immediate Revelation toward the Foundation and Ground of true Faith proved, &c.' And a passage in the Xth chapter of it (19) was severely animadverted upon by one Richard Claridge, formerly Rector of Peopleton in Worcestershire, who turned afterwards Independent and Quaker (20). Mr Bennet's words were, — 'Whereas we affirm, that the Nature of the Messiah, or Man Christ, is compounded of the Godhead and the Manhood immediately united; our adversaries affirm, that the Nature of the Messiah, or Man Christ, is compounded, 1. Of the Godhead. 2. The Light. 3. The Manhood, viz. Human Soul and Body; which two last, viz. the Light and the Manhood, they affirm to be immediately united to the Godhead.' — This, Claridge calls 'An assertion so grossly erroneous, that to use our author's own phrase (21), it threatens destruction to the Gospel of our Lord, by sapping the very foundations of it; since it lays the axe to the root of Christianity, and sets up a new and another Christ than the holy Scriptures testify of. For, 1. If the Messiah, or Man Christ, is compounded of the Godhead and Manhood, then he is, as the Socinians falsely say, a mere creature. For, composition plainly implies something made out of other things, which it was not before. And if Christ be a mere creature, then he is not God blessed for ever. And if so, what is become of the foundation of the Christian Religion? 2. If the Messiah is compounded of the Godhead and the Manhood, then he had no existence antecedent to this composition; for the thing compounded has no existence as such, before it is compounded. 3. This composition renders Christ neither perfect God nor perfect man; for if he is compounded of both, he cannot be truly either. 4. It destroys the distinction of the Godhead and Manhood in Christ, and of the essential properties of both natures; for, if they are compounded, they cannot remain distinct the one from the other, as the common opinion is. — Such a Christ as this, says R. Claridge, is T. Bennet's Christ, one not of two compleat and distinct Natures, but of two Natures compounded; out of which composition he fancies arises a certain third thing, which he affirms to be the Messiah or Man Christ (22).

(17) Page 74.

(18) Chap. XV. p. 80.

(19) Page 113

(20) See Wood Athenæz, edit. 1721, Vol. II. col. 945.

(21) Preface to the Confutation of Quakerism, p. 3.

(22) J. Whiting's Rector corrected, &c. Lond. 1708, 8vo. p. 129.

pamphlet, 12mo, 'A Discourse of the Necessity of being baptized with water, and receiving the Lord's-Supper; taken out of the Confutation of Quakerism.' Cambr. for the sake of those, who wanted either money to purchase, or time to peruse, the Confutation of Quakerism. The year following he published, 'A brief History of the joint use of precomposed set forms of prayer; shewing, 1. That the antient Jews; our Saviour, his Apostles, and the primitive Christians, never joined in any prayers; but precompos'd set forms only. 2. That those precompos'd set forms in which they join'd, were such as the respective congregations were accustomed to, and thoroughly acquainted with. 3. That their practice warrants the imposition of a National precompos'd Liturgy. To which is annexed, A Discourse of the Gift of Prayer, shewing, That what the Dissenters mean by the Gift of Prayer, viz. a Faculty of conceiving Prayers extempore, is not promis'd in Scripture.' Cambr. 8vo. - The same year he published likewise, 'A Discourse of joint Prayer; shewing, 1. What is meant by joint Prayer. 2. That the joint use of Prayers conceiv'd extempore hinders Devotion; and consequently displeases God: whereas the joint use of such precompos'd set Forms; as the Congregation is accustomed to, and thoroughly acquainted with, does most effectually promote Devotion; and consequently is commanded by God. 3. That the Lay Dissenters are oblig'd; upon their own Principles, to abhor the Prayers offer'd in their separate Assemblies; and to join in Communion with the Establish'd Church.' Cambr. 8vo. (f) [G]. Towards the end of the same year he published, 'A Paraphrase with Annotations upon the Book of Common Prayer, wherein the Text is explained, Objections are answered, and Advice is humbly offer'd, both to the Clergy and Laity, for promoting true Devotion in the use of it.' Lond. 8vo [H]. The next thing he put out was, 'Charity Schools recommended;

(f) The Preface to these two books, is dated from Colchester, Octob. 27. 1707.

[G] A brief History of the joint Use of precomposed set Forms of Prayer, &c. ——— A Discourse of joint Prayer, &c.] Several answers were returned to these books; namely, 1. 'A brief Reply to the Scriptural and argumentative part of Mr Bennet's Brief History of the joint Use of precomposed set Forms of Prayer, &c.' by John Horsley. 2. 'A direct and full Reply to Mr Bennet's Discourse of joint Prayer, with a Preface, containing a short Vindication of the Brief Reply to Mr Bennet's brief History, from the unjust and scurrilous censures of the Censura Temporum for the month of March 1709.' By the same author. Lond. 1710. 8vo. 3. 'Brief Remarks upon Mr Bennet's Brief History, &c.' By Dr. Wainwright. 4. 'Some Reflections on Mr Bennet's Discourse of joint Prayer; by a Presbyter of the Church of England.' Supposed to be Mr Ollyffe; who asserts (23), that Mr Bennet's notion, which he so warmly espouces, is contrary to the general sense not only of Dissenters, but of all that have been acquainted with it, and seems to be a stock upon the reason of mankind. 5. Dr John Edwards, formerly our author's fellow-collegian, and a rigid Calvinist, doth also feverely reflect, in the third part of his Preacher, on these books; and some others written by Dr Bennet (24).

[H] A Paraphrase, with Annotations; upon the Book of Common-Prayer; &c.] As for the occasion of this work, the author himself gives it us in the following words (25). 'Tis too notorious, that the Book of Common Prayer is very little understood by some, and very negligently used by others, even of our own Communion; and that the Dissenters have raised almost innumerable objections against it, hoping thereby to justify their Separation from us. The consideration of these great evils has constrained me to publish the following Paraphrase, &c. wherein the Text is explained, Objections are answered, and Advice is humbly offer'd, both to the Clergy and the Laity, for promoting true devotion in the use of it.' — His method is this. He hath printed the Morning and Evening Service, Litany, Collects, Communion, Public Baptism, and other occasional Offices, with a Paraphrase interwoven into the Text. And at the bottom of the page, Notes to explain the Text, to clear Difficulties, answer Objections, &c. — He is of opinion (26), That a mere Deacon may pronounce the Absolution; and observes, That the Morning Prayer, the Litany, and the Communion Service, were intended and used as distinct Offices in former times; though they are now generally used at one and the same time, in one continued order, contrary to the first intention of our Church (27). At the end, there is an Appendix, containing Five Discourses. No. I. 'A Discourse of the Original of the Book of Common-Prayer; shewing, that 'tis not taken out of 'the Mass-Book, and other Popish Liturgies.' In this he divides the matter of the Book of Common-Prayer into four parts. 1. Such particulars as are not at all to be found in any of the Popish Liturgies. 2. Such as, though they be found in the Popish Liturgies, are notwithstanding borrowed out of the Scriptures. 3. Such as, though they be found in the Popish Liturgies, are notwithstanding borrowed by them out of the Apocryphal writings, or the antient Fathers of the four first centuries. 4. Such as must be acknowledged to be found in the Popish Liturgies, and in no other book written before the year of Christ 400 (28). — Now, if we set aside the three first sorts of particulars, there remains in the whole Morning Prayer but about one Fourteenth part. All the rest is either new made, as the Confession, &c. or taken from either the Scriptures, as, O come let us, &c. the Versicles and Responses, &c. or the Apocryphal writings, as, O all ye works, &c. or the writings of the four first centuries, as the Apostles Creed, and, We praise thee, O God, &c. or the Greek Church, as the prayer ascribed to St Chryostom. — Of the Evening Prayer about one Eleventh part is taken from the Popish Liturgies — About one Tenth part of our Litany, and the last and shortest prayer of the eleven subjoined to the Litany; and not one of the eight Thanksgivings following those prayers, are taken out of the Popish Liturgies. — Of the Collects for the day, many were taken out of the Popish Liturgies, but several amended and corrected, and a great number new made. — Of the Communion-Office about one Eleventh part, and of all the following Offices, even to the end of the Communion, almost nothing is taken out of the Popish Liturgies. — After which he adds, 'If such an inconsiderable quantity is all that we owe to the Papiests, how can it be said that we had our Offices from them? It may with vastly greater reason be said, that they were taken out of the Scriptures, or wholly made new. For, if one part must give a denomination to the whole, certainly the far greater part ought to do it (29)'. To proceed, No. II. Of the Appendix is, 'A Discourse of the Church's using 'Apocryphal Lessons.' No. III. 'A Discourse of our Church's using that which is commonly called 'the Athanasian Creed.' No. IV. 'A Discourse of praying against Sudden Death.' No. V. 'Of kneeling at the Holy Communion.' Under this last head he shews (30), 'that the Christians of the first ages, long before the monstrous doctrine of Transubstantiation was heard of, received in an adoring posture; which was either kneeling or standing, according to the difference of circumstances. And whereas it is pretended, that Kneeling at the Sacrament was introduced by Pope Honorius III, it is a mistake; for what that Pope introduced, was only a bow at the elevation of the Host, and at the carrying it to sick persons.'

(28) Page 246.

(29) Page 248, 249, 250.

(30) Page 311.

[I] The

(23) Page 24.

(24) Preacher, third Part, p. 4, 5, 6, 145, 146, 152, &c.

(25) Preface, p. 2. This Preface is dated from Colchester, April 16, 1708.

(26) Page 27, note 22.

(27) Page 156.

‘ recommended, in a Sermon preached at St James’s Church in Colchester, on Sunday ‘ March 26, 1710. Published at the request of the Trustees.’ 8vo. The same year he wrote, ‘ A Letter to Mr B. Robinson, occasioned by his Review of the Case of Liturgies,
 ‘ and their Imposition.’ And, ‘ A second Letter to Mr B. Robinson, &c. on the same ‘ Subject.’ Both printed at London 1710, 8vo. In 1711, he published ‘ The Rights ‘ of the Clergy of the Christian Church: or, A Discourse shewing, that God has given ‘ and appropriated to the Clergy, Authority to Ordain, Baptize, Preach, Preside in ‘ Church-Prayer, and consecrate the Lord’s Supper. Wherein also the pretended Divine ‘ Right of the Laity to elect either the persons to be ordained, or their own particular ‘ Pastors, is examined and disproved.’ Lond. 1711, 8vo [I]. He had begun a second part of this work, but it was never published. Therein, he intended to shew, that the Clergy are, under Christ, the sole spiritual Governors of the Christian Church; and that God has given and appropriated to them, authority to enact laws, determine controversies, inflict censures, and absolve from them. The pretended divine institution of lay Elders was also disproved, and the succession of the present Clergy of the Established Church vindicated. And thereto was annexed a Discourse of the Independency of the Church on the State, with an account of the sense of our English Laws, and the judgment of Archbishop Cranmer touching that point (g). About this time he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity. In 1714, he published ‘ Directions for studying I. A general ‘ System or Body of Divinity; II. The Thirty-nine Articles of Religion. To which is ‘ added St Jerom’s Epistle to Nepotianus.’ Lond. 8vo [K]. The year following was published his ‘ Essay on the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, agreed on in 1562, and ‘ revised in 1571; wherein (the text being first exhibited in Latin and English, and the ‘ minutest variations of eighteen the most antient and authentic copies carefully noted)
 ‘ an Account is given of the Proceedings of Convocation in framing and settling the text ‘ of the Articles; the controverted clause of the Twentieth Article is demonstrated to be ‘ genuine; and the case of Subscription to the Articles is consider’d in point of Law, History,
 ‘ and Conscience. With a Prefatory Epistle to Anthony Collins, Esq; Wherein the egre‘ gious Falshoods and Calumnies of the author of Priestcraft in Perfection, are exposed.’
 Lond. 1713, 8vo [L]. Before the publication of this book, he found it necessary to leave Colchester.

(g) It was never finished, though about four chapters of it were actually printed off.

[I] The Rights of Clergy of the Christian Church, &c.] The Preface to this book is dated from Colchester, Jan. 13, 1710-11. And the chief Heads of it are, That the Catholic Church is one, holy, spiritual, and perpetual Society, of which Christ is the Head, which was instituted by God, and of which also ’tis necessary for every person to whom the Gospel is preached, to become and continue a member. That Baptism, the Lord’s Supper, Church Prayer, and preaching in Christian Assemblies, are perpetual Ordinances in the Church. That from the beginning of Christianity down to our own times, there have always been certain Officers in the Church, whose business it was to administer the Ordinances aforesaid. That from the beginning of Christianity there have been Deacons in the Church. That from the beginning of Christianity down to our own times, the Clergy have been authorized to exercise their functions by Almighty God, either immediately or mediately. That Church-authority is not derived from the people. Then, after examining the pretended instances of Lay-Ordination, he shews, That the power of ordaining is appropriate to the Clergy by Divine Right. That the Laity have no Divine Right to elect the Clergy, — nor to chuse their own particular Pastors. Next, he examines the Scripture, and other pretences, for Lay-Baptism, and Lay-Preaching; and enquires into the validity of Lay-Baptism.

[K] Directions for studying, I. A General System of Divinity, &c.] In the Preface, dated from Colchester, Jan. 16, 1713-14, he informs us, That this ‘ Letter, wherein he hath given directions for studying a general System or Body of Divinity, was written in the year 1705, at the request of a young Gentleman, to whom, as the beginning shews, he had made a promise of it. Whilst it lay by him, he bestowed some leisure hours in correcting it; and at length determined to make it public, because he conceived that something of this was much wanted. — He adds, That he hath subjoined such Directions for studying the XXXIX Articles of Religion, as will, if he mistakes not, set them in a different light, and give a more distinct and particular view of them, than may be found elsewhere.’ And indeed he hath laboured to give a rational explication of them, and to render them as consistent with Scripture and truth as possible. He was ‘ forced to add St Jerom’s Epistle to Nepotianus, because ’tis not to be met with otherwise than amongst his works, or in some collection of his epistles, which all persons can’t command the use of.’

[L] An Essay on the Thirty-nine Articles of Religion, &c.] This was written by way of Answer to a Pamphlet, published in London in 1709, 8vo, and intitled, ‘ Priestcraft in perfection; or, A Detection of the Fraud of inserting and continuing this clause (The Church hath Power to Decree Rites and Ceremonies, and Authority in Controversies of Faith) in the Twentieth Article of the Articles of the Church of England.’ Supposed to be written by Anthony Collins, Esq; who made it his chief business and delight to invent what he thought would vex or distress the Clergy. That pamphlet began in the following manner. ‘ The Articles of the Church of England were agreed to and subscribed by the Archbishops and Bishops of both Provinces, and the whole Clergy, in a Convocation held at London, in the year of our Lord, 1562, and the fifth of Queen Elizabeth. They were afterwards reviewed by another Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, held at London in the year 1571, and in the beginning of that year (which was the 13th of the Queen) they were ratified in Parliament under the Title of Articles of Religion which only concern the Confession of the true Christian Faith, and the Doctrine of the Sacraments, comprized in a book imprinted, intitled, “ Articles whereupon it was agreed, &c. “ From which Act alone arises their Legal Authority. These being the Authorities upon which the Articles of our Church stand, we have no other way of knowing what, and how many these Articles are, but from the Records of the Proceedings of the before-mentioned Convocations, and from the imprinted Book, referred to in the Act of Parliament. And if we are to be governed by these, it will be evident that the first clause of the 20th Article, viz. (The Church hath a power to decree Rites and Ceremonies, and Authority in Controversies of Faith) printed in all our modern editions of the Articles since the year 1617, is a perfect Forgery, and never passed either the Convocation of 1562, or the Convocation of 1571; nor was it contained in the imprinted Book that was ratified by Parliament. For, 1st, We have the Original Manuscript of the Articles which passed the Convocation of 1562, of which my Lord of Sarum (31) gives the following account, That this manuscript is without doubt an Original; that the hands of the Subscribers are well known

(31) The late Bishop Burnet, Exposition of the XXXIX Articles, p. 16.

Colchester. For, the other livings being filled up with persons of good reputation and learning, his large congregation and subscriptions fell off, so that his income did not amount to threecore pounds a year [M]. Wherefore, by the advice of his friends, he accepted of the place of Deputy-Chaplain to Chelsey-Hospital, under Dr Cannon. Soon after, preaching the funeral sermon of his friend Mr Erington, Lecturer of St Olave's in Southwark, it was so highly approved of by that parish, that he was unanimously chosen Lecturer in the next vestry, without the least canvassing (b). Upon that, he entirely left Colchester, in January 1715-16, and fixed himself in London (i): Where he was likewise appointed Morning-Preacher at St Lawrence-Jewry, under Dr Mapletoft. In 1716, he published a pamphlet intitled, 'The Nonjurors Separation from the publick Assemblies of the Church of England examined, and proved to be schismatical upon their own Principles.' Lond. 8vo [N]. And, 'The Case of the Reformed Episcopall Churches; known; that it belonged to Archbishop Parker (who was President of that Assembly, and that it was left by him to Corpus-Christi college in Cambridge, and is signed with a particular care; for at the end of it there is not only a sum of the number of pages, but of the lines in every page. And though this was the work of the Province of Canterbury, yet the Archbishop of York, with the Bishops of Durham and Chester, subscribed it likewise; and it is also subscribed by the whole Lower House. And, 2dly, We have an original manuscript of the Articles that were reviewed in the Convocation of 1571, left to the same college by Archbishop Parker (who was President likewise of that Convocation) but that is only subscribed by the Archbishop, and ten Bishops of his Province; whereas those of 1562 are subscribed by both Houses of the Province of Canterbury, and some Bishops of the Province of York. Now that the clause of the Church's power is not in the beginning of the 20th Article of either of these manuscripts, appears from several collations that have lately been made of our modern printed editions with them. 3dly, As to the imprinted book of Articles that was ratified by Parliament, either it was never tacked to the original Record of the Act, or else it has been since purloined from it; for upon examination in the Office where the Records are kept, the imprinted book referred to in the Act of Parliament is not to be found.' This is the substance of the pamphlet before us: Let us now see what Dr Bennet's Answer thereto contains. — After a very smart Prefatory Epistle to Anthony Collins, Esq; dated Chelsea, April 20, 1715, the Doctor exhibits a collation of all the antient copies of the Articles, both printed and manuscript, both in Latin and English; and sets down under the text of the Articles, in English on one side, and Latin on the other, the minutest variations in those antient Copies, being eighteen in number. The printed Latin Copy he puts the highest value upon, is that of Reginald Wolf in 8vo, 1563, which hath the controverted clause in the 20th Article (*). — In chap. II. he gives a transcript from the Records produced by Archbishop Laud in the Star-chamber in 1637; and of the Register of the Upper House of Convocation in 1562, published by Bishop Gibson in his Synodus Anglicana, &c. wherein that clause was recorded. [The original Records of the Convocation were destroyed in the great fire at London, 1666.] In chap. VII. he proves, That when the Articles were passed by the Clergy in Convocation, they were recorded in the Registry of the Archbishop of Canterbury. But this Record of the Articles in the Registry of the See of Canterbury was not subscribed, nor had the Broad Seal affixed to it (32). The author supposes therefore, that a Copy of the Articles was engrossed, in a Text hand, and after the Broad Seal was affixed thereto, that instrument of them was deposited in some of the Royal offices (33). He shews in chap. XI. that the Articles were passed, recorded, and ratified in 1562, in Latin only. After having given, in chap. IV. An exact and very particular account of the Latin MS. in Bennet-college library, which was signed by the Bishops on Jan. 29, 1562. (and on which A. Collins lays so much stress) he proves, in Chap. VIII. that That MS. is no Record. And of this he alleges the following proofs. 1. 'Because Archbishop Parker had no more right or power to dispose of the Records of Convocation by will, than the Lord Chancellor has to dispose of the Records of Parliament after the same manner. 2. He appeals to any man of common sense, whether a

(b) General Dictionary, as above.

(i) See Preface to his Discourse of the ever-blessed Trinity in Unity, &c. p. 2.

MS. so frequently and so oddly corrected, sometimes with red lead, at other times with black ink; in which so many portions, great and small are struck out, and so many particulars inserted, nay in which English and Latin are mixed together, &c. could ever be intended for a Record in a matter of so high concern.' — Next, as to the other Bennet-college MS of 1571, our author says, 'tis no wonder it has not the Clause, considering it was grounded on the old unauthorized English translation, in which the Clause was first omitted. And, besides, after the 11th of May, when this MS was signed, many alterations were made in the translation, which are not in the MS. And consequently this controverted Clause might at the same time be restored to the place it had in the Record of 1562. He shews likewise, That those English Copies of the Articles printed in 1571, which have the Clause above-mentioned, are genuine, and those which want it are spurious (34). — In answer to what A. Collins had said, concerning the imprinted Book being tacked to the Record, the Doctor observes, that the very form of the Rolls is such, that any man who has seen them would as soon expect to find, that an imprinted book had been tacked to our author's nose, as to any of the Rolls of Parliament (35).

[M] So that his income did not amount to threecore pounds a year.] The one being but about forty, and the other fifteen pounds per annum. And yet he declared to his friend the rev. Mr Sherlock, that he would have even been contented with them, if he could have made threecore pounds a year of them two together. Bishop Compton had indeed given him the small vicarage of Mark's Tay near Colchester, but it was no more than enough to pay for a Curate (36); and accordingly he let his Curate enjoy it.

[N] In 1716 he published a pamphlet, intitled, The Nonjurors Separation, &c. It was occasioned by 'A Collection of Papers written by the late rev. George Hickee, D. D.' and published in 1716, wherein the Church of England was charged with Heresy, Schism, Perjury, and Treason. Dr Bennet, in the 1st chapter his book, defines Schism to be 'a breach of that union which ought to be maintained in the Christian Church or Society.' In the 2d chapter he shews, That Dr Compton continued rightful Bishop of London to the day of his death; since he did not cease to be Bishop of London by resignation, or deprivation, or forfeiture; nor forfeit his diocese, by maintaining communion with those Bishops, who were placed in Sees of the deprived ones; and therefore that all separation from him was a Schism. In the 8th chapter he endeavours to prove, that the Nonjurors separation from the communion of Bishop Robinson [successor to Bishop Compton] is schismatical, because they have no diocesan Bishops; and therefore those Bishops who are now possessed of the dioceses of England, are the only true and rightful Bishops, there being no other claim against them. — But this Tract proving unsatisfactory to many persons, several Answers were given to it; namely, 1. 'The Layman's Vindication of the Church of England, as well against Mr Howell's Charge of Schism, as against Dr Bennet's pretended Answer to it.' Lond. 1716, 8vo. 2. Another intitled, 'Dr Bennet's Concessions to the Nonjurors proved to be destructive to the Cause, which he endeavours to defend, as they make the Nonjurors to be the Catholics, and his own Communion to be Schismatical; in a Letter to a Friend.' Dated October 22, 1716. Lond. 1717, 8vo. 3. Mr James Pierce, an eminent Dissenting Minister, wrote likewise 'A Letter to Dr Bennet, occasioned by his late Treatise concerning (34) Page 336, &c.

(35) Prefatory Epistle, p. vi.

(36) From the Gen. Dictionary, and private information.

(*) See also, p. 232.

(32) Chap. IX.

(33) Chap. X.

in Great Poland, and Polish Prussia, considered, in a Sermon preach'd on Sunday, November 18, 1716, at St Lawrence-Jewry, London, in the morning, and St Olave's Southwark, in the afternoon.' Lond. 8vo [O]. Soon after, he was presented by the Dean and Chapter of St Paul's, to the vicarage of St Giles's Cripplegate, London, which afforded him a plentiful income of near five hundred pounds a year [P]. But he had little, or at least no quiet, enjoyment of it. For, endeavouring to recover some dues that unquestionably belonged to that church, he came thereby to be engaged in tedious lawsuits; which, besides the immense charges they were attended withal, gave him a great deal of vexation and uneasiness, and very much imbibed his spirits: However, he recovered a hundred and fifty pounds a year to that living. After he was settled in it, (namely in the year 1717) he married Mrs Elizabeth Hunt of Salisbury, a gentlewoman of great merit; and by her he had three daughters. The same year he published, 'A Spital Sermon preach'd before the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, &c. of London, in St Bridget's Church, on April 24, 1717.' Lond. 8vo. And in 1718, 'A Discourse of the ever blessed Trinity in Unity, with an Examination of Dr Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity.' Lond. 8vo [L]. But, from this time, the care of his large parish, and

'the Nonjurors Separation, &c.' Dated at Exeter, November 13, 1716, and printed at London, 1717, 8vo.

[O] The case of the Reformed Episcopal Churches in Great Poland, &c. This sermon was occasioned by a Brief for the relief of those Churches. Our author observes in his sermon (37), 'That these Protestants are descended from those persons, who forsook the corruptions of the Church of Rome, by the influence principally of those eminent saints and martyrs, John Hus and Jerome of Prague, who received their doctrine in a good measure from our truly famous countryman John Wicleff, to whom we are obliged for the first dawning of the Reformation.' — After that, he answers several objections that had been made against relieving them, particularly, that they have no true Episcopacy amongst them. In opposition to which he shews, that they regularly derive their succession from three persons who were consecrated Bishops by certain Bishops of the Vaudois (38); and that each of their Bishops is truly and properly a Diocesan, having a determinate number of Pastors with the respective congregations, over whom he exercises ecclesiastical jurisdiction; and they have not only Bishops, but also Priests and Deacons, which are three distinct orders with them as they are with us (39).

[P] Which afforded him a plentiful income of near five hundred pounds a year. It cannot well be imagined what the author of his life (40) means, when he makes this wise remark upon that occasion — 'Which was the utmost of his preferment, tho' the whole of it, when the salary of Curates and other charges were paid, was not full four hundred pounds a year clear.' But surely near four hundred pounds a year clear is very noble preferment; and so Dr Bennet thought it, as appears from the Dedication to his Discourse of the ever Blessed Trinity in Unity; in which he returns his humblest thanks to his most honoured Patrons for so remarkable an instance of their favour, as he wanted words to express; namely, Their conferring upon him, in the most generous and obliging manner, one of the most principal parochial benefices in the kingdom; in which (says he) 'as I have opportunity of doing a large share of our Great Master's work; and thereby earning everlasting wages (which is the most valuable consideration), so I reap the advantage of a plentiful income, which affords me even a temporal reward for the labours of my present station.' — It seems Dr Hoadley, the present Bishop of Winchester, was very helpful to him, though privately, in obtaining that preferment.

[L] A Discourse of the ever Blessed Trinity in Unity, &c. This he dedicated 'To his most honoured patrons (41) the Rev. Dr Henry Godolphin, Dean of St Paul's, London, and Provost of Eton college; the Rev. Dr William Stanley, Dean of St Asaph; the Rev. Dr John Younger, Dean of Sarum; and the Rev. Dr Francis Hare, Dean of Worcester; the Rectors of St Paul's, London.' It is the only book of his that has a Dedication. 'Tis dated, as well as the Preface, from Cripplegate, London, October 23, 1717. The occasion of this work he gives us in the following words (42). 'Every body knows, that many writers, of different spirits and abilities, attacked the Doctor [Dr Sam. Clarke, author of The Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity] in different manners, as their inclinations or judgments led them. But notwithstanding this variety of opposition, I heartily wish I could not say, that what to me seemed in such a case the most desirable, or rather absolutely necessary, was totally neglected. For though much commendable zeal was spent against the book in general, and divers parcels of it were particularly questioned and taken to pieces; yet none of the Doctor's adversaries attempted a confutation of his whole scheme, and a thorough examination of every branch of his doctrine.' This, as he says, a little lower, determined him to write a full Reply to that celebrated Treatise of his learned friend. — He spends the greater part of his Discourse, in proving the Divinity of the Son, or Second Person; as being the principal point in the whole controversy concerning the Trinity, and that which has been the most largely and warmly debated (43). After having given the occasion and design of his work, he treats, in chap. II. of the Paternity of God; and shews, That the very God is the Father of all mankind by a general Paternity, of all Christians by a particular or federal Paternity, and of our Lord Jesus Christ by a special Paternity. And in chap. IV. that God was especially the Father of the man Jesus Christ in these two respects, because he was to him instead of an human Father, and because he raised him from the dead. See Rom. i. 4. Chap. III. is concerning the Union of the Divine and Human Natures in our Lord Jesus Christ; in which he delivers it as his opinion, That Jesus Christ consists of the λογος, or Word of God; of an human body, and an human soul; and concludes, That our Lord Jesus Christ was, and is, very man, consisting of an human Body, and an human Soul; and that to this Man the Word was, and is still united (44). In chap. V. he lays down the state of the Controversy between Dr Clarke and himself, in the following words. 'Tis confessed on both sides, 1. That the blessed Jesus, has a Divine Nature, viz. the Word. 2. That the Word, or Divine Nature of the blessed Jesus, is called God.' But the question is, Whether the Word, or Divine Nature of the blessed Jesus, be the very God, i. e. the One self-existent Being. I affirm that he is; and you deny it, making him a Being distinct from, and inferior to, the one self-existent, or very God.' Before he comes to produce texts of Scripture to establish his opinion, he examines, in chapters VI. and VII. those several texts which speak of Christ's Humiliation, or Exaltation (particularly Philipp. ii. 5—11); in a word, all those that seem to intimate that Jesus Christ is inferior to the Father. And, in chap. VIII. endeavours to prove, That during the time of our Saviour's ministry, the Disciples did not believe that he was any thing more than a mere Man, conducted and assisted by the Spirit of God. As also, in chap. IX. That during the time of our Saviour's ministry, the Word was quiescent in the Man Christ Jesus. Next, he examines several other texts (45), particularly Mark xiii. 32. Jobn xiv. 28, &c. and then concludes, that there is not one text which speaks of our Blessed Saviour, in such a manner as implies his being inferior to the very God, but what either necessarily must, or most fairly may, be understood of the Man Christ Jesus, or our Saviour's Human nature only. — Having thus cleared the way, he shews in chap. XII. That the Holy Scriptures do teach, that the Word

(37) Page 8, second edition, 1716.

(38) Vide Regenwoltzii Historia Eccles. Slavon. Provin. edit. Trajecti ad Rhenum, 1652, p. 314, &c.

(39) Sermon, as above, p. 14, &c.

(40) In the General Dictionary.

(41) Patrons of St Giles Cripplegate, and by whom it was given him.

(42) Preface, p. 1.

(43) Preface, p. 3.

(44) Page 15.

(45) Chap. X. XI.

and other affairs, so engrossed his thoughts, that he had no time to undertake any new work; except an Hebrew Grammar [R], which was published at London in 1716, 8vo, and is reckoned one of the best of the kind. He mentions indeed in one of his books (k), written about the year 1716, that he had then 'several tasks' in his hands, 'which would find him full employment for many years;' but whatever they might be, none of them were ever finished, or made publick. He died of an apoplexy at London, October the 9th, 1728, aged fifty-five years, five months, and two days; and was buried in his own church. As to his person, Dr Bennet was tall, and of a strong and robust constitution. He was a man of strong passions, and not without haughtiness, but of very great integrity. With regard to his learning, he was a perfect master of the Eastern, and other learned, languages; well skilled in controversy, and a valiant champion for the Church of England. We are moreover informed (l), that we have had few scholars, who have equalled him as an exact reasoner, and an accurate textuary; and that though he had an uncommon share of knowledge in various kinds of learning, he wisely gave himself up to the improvement of those talents, in which his chief excellence lay. One of his antagonists does not scruple to own (m), that he could truly esteem and respect him for his valuable abilities, for his industrious application of mind to an examination and enquiry into the important matters of our Christian religion, and for divers other worthy qualities; particularly for his candour and civility; and for his resolute contempt of those false topics of persuasion, by which ignorant and degenerate minds are led captive into error, or lose the praise of it, if it should be into truth, viz. all human decisions, by Councils, or Churches authority, when their judgment is not agreeable to the Holy Scriptures: in which case, he speaks as if he had the courage and honesty to oppose the most triumphant errors of the age. Finally, he declares he esteemed him, for his zealous profession of integrity, and exciting others to act honestly and openly according to their judgments, and not to use arts of disguise and hypocrisy in sacred matters.

(k) Discourse of the ever blessed Trinity, &c. p. 3.

(l) See Weekly Miscellany; No. 113.

(m) T. Emlyn; in the Preface to his book mentioned below; note [2].

or Divine Nature of our Lord Jesus Christ is the very God.' And in chap. XIII. 'That the Holy Ghost is the very God.' Chap. XIV. 'is concerning the Trinity in Unity.' Wherein, among other things, he affirms (46), that 'the word Person, when applied to the Son and Holy Ghost, does not signify a distinct intelligent Being separate from the Father. For though we can't exactly define what a Divine Person is, yet we can say what 'tis not.' He sums up the whole in these words (47), 'Briefly therefore, the Father, the Word, and the Spirit, are one and the same Being with each other: That is, though they are distinct in, yet they are co-essential to, and necessarily constitutive of, one and the same Being. Even as the Soul and the Body are distinct in, though co-essential to, and necessarily constitutive of, the same being, Man.' — He hath one particular notion, besides that hath been already mentioned, and that is, He supposes that the Human Soul of Christ pre-existed before his Incarnation (48), and was the Shechinah or habitation of the Glory of God the Father. But, at the Incarnation, this pre-existing Human Soul of Christ emptied himself of the Glory he had with God before the world was; and in that state of humiliation Christ did suffer and die for the sins of the whole world (49). At the end of the book there is a short 'Examination of Dr Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity.' — Several Answers were returned to this Discourse: The 1st by Mr Thomas Emlyn, intitled, 'Dr Bennet's New Theory of the Trinity examinated, or some Considerations on his Discourse of the ever Blessed Trinity in Unity, and his Examination of Dr Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity.' Lond. 1718, 8vo. The 2d was by Mr John Jackson, Rector of Rossington in Yorkshire, under this title; 'A modest Plea for the Baptistal and Scripture notion of the Trinity. Wherein the schemes of the Rev. Dr Bennet and Dr Clarke are compared.' Lond. 1719. 8vo. The 3d was by William Stephens, M. A. one of the Vicars of Bampton, thus intitled, 'The Catholick Doctrine concerning the Union of the two Natures in the One Person of Christ stated and vindicated; a Sermon preached at the Triennial Visitation of the Right Reverend Father in God, John Lord Bishop of Oxford; held at Witney on Tuesday, July 21, 1719. In which also Dr Bennet's late notion of the total Quiescence of the Divine Nature in our Saviour during his Ministry, is considered and examined.' Oxford, 1719, 8vo.

[R] Except an Hebrew Grammar, &c.] It was intitled, Thomæ Bennet, S. T. P. Grammatica Hebræa cum uberrimâ Praxi in usum tironum, qui Linguam Hebræam absque Præceptoris vivâ voce (idque in brevissimo temporis compendio) ediscere cupiunt. Accedit Consilium de studio præcipuarum Linguarum Orientalium, Hebrææ, scil. Chaldææ, Syriæ, Samaritanæ; & Arabicæ, insituendo, & perficiendo. This Grammar was designed by the author for the use of such as want to learn Hebrew without the assistance of a master. C

(46) Page 218.

(47) Ibid.

(48) Page 70.

(49) Page 260.

BENTHAM (THOMAS) a learned and pious English Divine, who was Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry in the XVIth century, was born about the year 1513 (if about forty-six years of age when made a Bishop (a) in 1559) at Shirebourne in Yorkshire (b), and educated at Magdalen-college in Oxford (c). He took his Bachelor's degree in Arts, Feb. 20, 1543 (d), and was admitted Perpetual Fellow of that college, November 16, 1546, and took his Master's degree in Arts the year following (e), about which time he applied himself wholly to the study of Divinity and the Hebrew language, in which he was extremely well skilled, as well as in the Latin and Greek tongues (f). A certain author tells us, he was converted from Popery in the first year of Queen Mary (g), but we find him very zealous against the Popish religion during the reign of King Edward VI, upon which account, and his assisting one Henry Bull of the same college, in wresting the censer out of the hands of the Choristers, as they were about to offer their superstitious incense, he was ejected from his fellowship, by the Visitors appointed by Queen Mary to regulate the university (h) [A]; soon after which he retired to Zurich, and afterwards to (c) Wood's Fasti; p. 71.

(f) Wood's Athr. Oxon. ut supra. Whitlocus. See note [D].

(g) Anglorum Spec. in York-shire, p. 889.

(h) Laur. Humfred. in Vita & Morte J. Juelli, edit. 1573, p. 72, Basil 73.

(a) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 192. p. 704.

(b) Balede Script. sui Temporis, p. 113. Whitlocus.

(c) Brown Wil- lis's Surrey of Cathedrals, p. 293.

(d) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. p. 67.

[A] He was ejected from his fellowship by the visitors, appointed by Queen Mary to regulate the univer- sity. Mr Wood informs us, that he was particularly obnoxious on account of his behaviour, for in Henry the

(i) Wood's Ath. Oxon. ut supra.

(k) Fuller's Worthies in York-shire, p. 198.

(l) Being, says Wood and Heylyn, the only church that the Protestants had in those times.

(m) Heylyn's History of the Reformation, History of Queen Mary, p. 79, 80.

(n) Brown Willis says, his Congé D'Elire was dated Dec. 26, 1559; his election, Jan. 15; and consecration, March 24; in Bishops of Lichfield and Coventry, Vol. I. p. 392.

(o) Pat. 2 Eliz. Godwin. de Praeful. p. 325, edit. 1743.

(*) Registr. K. K. f. 36. 6. MS. Wood.

Basil in Switzerland, and became Preacher to the English Exiles there, and expounded to them the entire book of the Acts of the Apostles (i), a proper subject and portion of Scripture this, as Fuller observes (k), to recommend patience to his banished countrymen; as the Apostle's sufferings so far exceeded theirs: this exposition was left by him at the time of his death, very fairly written, and fit for the press, but Mr Wood knew not whether it was ever printed. In exile, as at home and in college, he led a praise-worthy, honest, and laborious life, with little or no preferment. Afterwards, being recalled by some of his brethren, he returned to London under the same Queen's reign, where he lived privately and in disguise, and was made Superintendent of a Protestant congregation in that city (l) [B], whom Bentham, by his pious discipline, diligent care and tuition, and bold and resolute behaviour in the Protestant cause [C], greatly confirmed in their faith and religion, so that they assembled with the greatest constancy to divine worship, at which there often appeared an hundred, sometimes two hundred persons; no inconsiderable congregation this to meet by stealth, notwithstanding the danger of the times, daily, together at London, under the nose of the vigilant and cruel Bonner (m). At length, when Queen Elizabeth came to the throne, he was soon provided for, and was, in the second year of her reign, nominated for the See of Lichfield and Coventry (n), upon the deprivation of Dr Ralph Bayne, a violent persecuting Papist, and had the temporalities of that See restored to him, Feb. 20, 1559 (o), being then about forty-six years of age. On the thirtieth of October 1556, he was created, with some others, Professor of Divinity at London, by Laurence Humfrey, S. T. P. and John Kenal, LL.D. who were deputed by the university of Oxford for that purpose (*); and in the latter end of October, 1568, he was actually created Doctor of Divinity (p), being then highly esteemed on account of his distinguished learning. He published a Sermon on Matth. iv. 1—11. printed at London, 8vo. Bishop Burnet, in his History of the Reformation, tells us, that our author translated into English the Book of Psalms, at the command of Queen Elizabeth, when an English version of the Bible was to be made, and that he likewise translated Ezekiel and Daniel (q). He died at Ecceshal in Staffordshire (r), the seat belonging to the See, Feb. 19, 1578, aged sixty-five years, and was buried under the south wall of the chancel of that church, being succeeded in his bishoprick of Lichfield and Coventry, by Dr William Overton (s). He left a widow named Matilda, but we do not expressly find that he left any children; Brown Willis, however, mentions one Thomas Bentham, that was promoted to be Prebendary of Lichfield and Coventry, about two months after the decease of the Bishop (t), who might probably be his own son, as we find he had several children: see the description of his tomb in note [D].

(p) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. p. 704.

(q) Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, Vol. II. p. 376, 377, anno 1559.

(r) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. p. 704.

(s) Brown Willis's Survey of Cathedrals, p. 392.

(t) Brown Willis, ubi supra, in the Prebendaries of Lichfield and Coventry, p. 454. April 24, 1578.

BENTINCK.

the Eighth's time he was only a complier with, no promoter of, Popery; but in the first year of Queen Mary, repenting his former compliance, he refused not only to say Mass, but to correct the scholars of the university for their absence from divine service. Wood's words are these (1). Cum Thomæ autem Benthamo Decano præciperet antedictus Readus ut Juniores propter absentiam a sacris castigaret, respondet ille se quidem simulati sub Henrico VIII, cum Pontificiis consensus penitentiam egisset, neque ad repudium denuo cultum redire statuisse; iniquum vero ducens in illos animadvertere, quorum facta sciens ac volens imitaretur. Sodalitio itaque egressus, &c. That when the aforesaid Sir Richard Read, one of the Visitors, commanded Thomas Bentham, as Dean of the college, to correct the junior scholars for their absence from divine service, he made answer, He had indeed but too much already repented his ever having given a feigned compliance to the Popish religion in the reign of Henry the VIIIth, and was resolved never to return to that forsaken worship; and that he esteemed it unjust to punish that in others, which he himself would willingly and knowingly do; which (with his other behaviour) was the cause of his being deprived of his fellowship, &c. To this purpose also see Laurence Humfrey in the Life of Bishop Jewell (2).

(1) Historia & Antiquitates Universitatis Oxoniensis, lib. i. p. 275.

(2) L. Humfred. in Vita, &c. J. Juelli, ut supra.

(3) Dr Heylyn's Hist. of Reformation, p. 80. History of Queen Mary.

[B] Made Superintendent of a Protestant congregation of that city.] Dr Heylyn informs us of this in his History of the Reformation (3), where he tells us also, that this Mr Bentham continued Minister of the Protestant congregation in London till Queen Mary died; and that by the encouragement and constant preaching of this pious man, the Protestant party did not only stand to their former principle, but were resolved to suffer whatsoever could be laid on them, rather than forfeit a good conscience.

[C] By his bold and resolute behaviour in the Protestant cause.] For when it was strictly charged and commanded, that no man should either pray for, or speak to, or once say, God bless them (that is, persons condemned, or about to suffer for their religion), notwithstanding this rigid proclamation, Bentham seeing the fire set to some of them, turning his eyes to the people, said, We know they are people of God, and therefore we cannot curse but wish them well, and say, God strengthen them; and so he boldly cried out, Almighty God, for Christ's sake, strengthen them; upon which all the people with one accord, cried, Amen, Amen. The noise whereof was so great, and the cryers so many, that the officers knew not whom they were to seize on, or with whom they were to begin their accusation (4). [D] And was buried in the chancel of the church there.] Having over his grave a stone of alabaster, with the effigies of himself, his wife and four children, inscribed with the two following verses.

Hæc jacet in Tumbâ Benthamus Episcopus ille Doctus, Divinus, Largus, pacens, pius, Almus.
Obiit 19 Feb: 1578: (5)

Bentham the Prelate good these stones enshrine, A pious Pastor, and a learn'd Divine.

(4) Heylyn's History of the Reformation, History of Queen Mary, p. 79, 80.

(5) Brown Willis has it Doctor in Lichfield and Coventry, p. 392.

But the three last words, and the date of his death, is torn off. Some authors make the date of his death the 21st of February, 1578, and give us nevertheless this his epitaph, with the date annexed, as above.

To these verses on his tomb we may likewise add the following distich, which Laurence Humfrey, in his Life of Bishop Jewell, tells us was made by a nobleman, a scholar of his, upon Bentham's being constituted Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry (6).

Clarus Doctrinâ, Clarus pietate, fideque
Benthamus Christi præsul et exul erat.

*Religion, learning, faith, are Bentham's fame,
Prelate and exile, Christian still the same.*

(6) Laurence Humfred, in Vita & Morte.

To these verses we shall add another small character of him, which though repeated already in the text, may not be improperly inserted here from the original. De Thomâ nostro sic scribit Whitlocus, vir fuit in omni generi doctrinâ feliciter educatus infra academiam Oxoniensem, itique theologicam professor, inque Trans- marinis academiis per certos annos feliciter in studiis versatus, Linguae sanctae callentissimus, Graeci non minus quam Latini Sermone peritus, &c. (7). Of our Thomas thus writes Whitlock. — 'He was a man happily educated in all kind of learning at the university of Oxford, where he professedly studied Theology, and in foreign academies for several years; being no less studious and diligent, made a great progress in all parts of Literature, he was excellently well skilled in the Hebrew language, as well as the Greek and Latin tongues; &c.' R

BENTINCK, or BENTHINCK (WILLIAM) Earl of Portland, &c. one of the greatest Statesmen of his time; and the first that advanced his family to the dignity of the English peerage. M. Bentinck was a native of Holland, being descended of an antient and noble family of that name in the province of Guelderland (a) [A]. After a liberal education, he was, by the interest of his friends, promoted to be Page of Honour to William, then Prince of Orange, (afterwards King William III. of England) in which station, his good behaviour and address so recommended him to the favour of his master, that he preferred him to the more honourable post of Gentleman of his Bed-chamber. In this capacity he accompanied the Prince into England, in the year 1670; where, going to visit the university of Oxford, he was, along with the Prince, created Doctor of Civil Law (b). In 1672, the Prince of Orange being made Captain-General of the Dutch forces, and soon after Stadtholder, M. Bentinck was promoted, and had a share in his good fortune, being made Colonel and Captain of the Dutch regiment of guards, afterwards esteemed one of the finest in King's William's service, and which behaved with the greatest gallantry in the wars both in Flanders and Ireland. In 1675, the Prince falling ill of the small-pox, M. Bentinck had an opportunity of signalizing his love and affection for his master, in an extraordinary manner, and thereby of obtaining his esteem and friendship, by one of the most generous actions imaginable; for the small-pox not rising kindly upon the Prince, his Physicians judged it necessary, that some young person should lie in the same bed with him, imagining that the natural heat of another, would drive out the disease, and expel it from the nobler parts (c): no body of quality could be found in all the Court to make this experiment; at last, M. Bentinck, though he had never had the small-pox, resolved to run the risk, and accordingly attended the Prince during the whole course of his illness, both day and night; nothing was given him, nor was he ever removed in his bed by any other hand; and his Highness said afterwards, that he believed M. Bentinck never slept, for sixteen days and nights, he never called once, that he was not answered by him as if he had been awake (d). It is from this time we may date that intimacy, and particular affection, which his Highness ever after shewed to M. Bentinck, who, upon the Prince's recovery, was immediately seized with the same distemper, and attended with a great deal of danger, but however recovered, just soon enough to attend his Highness into the field, where he was always next his person; and his courage and abilities equally answered the great opinion his Highness had of him, who ever found him an excellent counsellor and faithful servant, and from hence forward employed him in his most secret and important affairs (*). In the year 1677, M. Bentinck was sent by the Prince of Orange into England, to solicit a match with the Princess Mary, eldest daughter of James, at that time Duke of York (afterwards King James II.) which was soon after concluded [B]. And in 1685, upon the Duke of Monmouth's invasion of this kingdom, he was sent over to King James to offer him his master's assistance, both of his troops and person, to head them against the rebels (†). But, through a misconstruction put on his message, his Highness's offer was rejected by the King [C]. In the year

(a) History of Europe, anno 1709.

(b) Wood's Fasti Oxon. p. 857.

(c) Political Remarks on the Life and Reign of King William III.

(d) Life of King William, p. 55, 56, 12mo.

(*) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 309.

(†) Rapin's Hist. of England. Echard, Kennet, &c.

[A] Descended of an antient and noble family of that name, &c.] He was the son of Henry Bentinck, Heer van Diepin, whose father Bentinck had also issue, Joseph Bentinck, a General Officer in the service of the States of Holland; and four daughters, Eleanor, married to the Baron of Nienurcn Huisben in Overijssel; Anne, married to the Baron Van Zandenburgh in Utrecht; Sophia, wife to the Baron Van Engelenburgh; and Joanna-Maria van Bentinck, who died unmarried, anno 1705 (1).

[B] To solicit a match with the Princess Mary, which was soon after concluded.] The Prince of Orange had unbosomed himself on this delicate affair of his marriage to Sir William Temple, when his Highness was upon the point of opening the campaign the preceding year (2). Lord Danby, however assures us (3), that it was not till May, 1677, that this project was ripe enough to be communicated to King Charles, nor till at least two months after that his Majesty gave any hopes of his allowing any treaty about it; and though the Prince sent M. Bentinck over into England about the beginning of June, to desire leave to make a journey thither as soon as the campaign was over, his Majesty civilly discouraged it, by expressing his wishes that he would first think of making a peace, and rather defer his journey till that was concluded. M. Bentinck was nevertheless most graciously received by the King (4), and most cordially by the Lord Treasurer, and returned home with a promise, that his Majesty would enter into a confidence with the Prince, and would send over to him a person he could rely upon to carry on the correspondence between them (5). Accordingly the Prince came over to England in October following, and in less than a month after his marriage with the Princess Mary was solemnized

[C] But through a misconstruction put on his message, his Highness's offer was rejected by the King.] The affair was this: The Prince of Orange, we are told by Bishop Kennet (6), sent over his favourite, M. Bentinck, to acquaint King James, that though he looked upon the Duke of Monmouth to be a man of no great parts, yet that he had a warlike genius, and was better skilled in the military art than any the King had to employ against him, and therefore if his Majesty pleased, he would not only lend him his troops, but come in person to head his army. The same offer had been before communicated to Skelton the King's Minister at the Hague, who was either so jealous of the Prince, or so malicious to him, that he gave the King notice of it with a wrong turn of suspicion and fear; so that the King put off M. Bentinck with desiring him to acquaint his Master, that their common interest required the Prince's staying in Holland; and farther opened his mind to him in such terms, as sufficiently

(4) Danby's Memoirs.

(5) Sir William Temple's Letters, &c. p. 45.

(6) Compleat History of Engla. Vol. III. p. 4.

(7) Godwin, de Praefulibus, p. 325, edit. 1743.

(1) Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 309.

(2) Temple's Memoirs, p. 11.

(3) Danby's Memoirs, Vol. II. p. 256.

year 1688, when the Prince of Orange intended an expedition into England, he sent M. Bentinck, on the Elector of Brandenburg's death, with his compliments to the new Elector, and also to lay before him the state of affairs, to communicate to him his design upon England, and to solicit his assistance to put it in execution, &c. In this negotiation M. Bentinck was so successful, that he carried to his master a more favourable and satisfactory answer than the Prince had expected; the Elector having generously granted even more than was asked of him (e). M. Bentinck had also a great share in the glorious Revolution, on which our present happy establishment is founded; in which difficult and important affair, he shewed all the prudence and sagacity of the most consummate and able Statesman. It was he that was applied to, as the person in the greatest confidence with the Prince, to manage the negotiations that were set on foot, betwixt his Highness and the English nobility and gentry, who had recourse to him, to rescue them from the danger they were in [D]. And he was two months constantly at the Hague, giving the necessary orders for the Prince's expedition, which was managed by him with such secrecy, that nothing was suspected all the time; and never was so great a design executed in so short a time, a transport fleet of 500 vessels having been hired in three days (f). M. Bentinck accompanied the Prince in his expedition to England; and after King James's abdication, during the interregnum, he held the first place among those who composed the Prince's cabinet at that critical time, and that, in such a degree of super-eminence, as scarce left room for a second; and we may be sure he was not wanting, as far as his services could avail, in endeavouring to procure the Crown for the Prince his master [E], who, when he had

(e) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 757.

(f) Burnet's History of his own Times.

(7) Echard's History of England.

(8) Orleans's History of the Revolution.

(9) Hist. of his own Times, Vol. II.

(10) Caveat against the Whigs, P. ii. p. 14.

sufficiently discovered that he did not take his Highness's zeal for his service to be at that time seasonable. Mr. Echarde (7) follows the Bishop step by step in this account, but with some additional bitterness; for, according to him, Skelton looked on the Prince as one of those Politicians whose steps are always suspicious. Both copy after Father Orleans (8), who imputes his Highness's zeal on this occasion to his rage against the Duke of Monmouth for assuming the title of King, as he had just done, and which he would have us believe was contrary to the agreement between them. However this be, M. Bentinck unfortunately had his audience at Whitehall on the very day that Monmouth was proclaimed at Tauton, which to be sure gave a disreputable to his embassy, though he had also orders from the States of Holland, as well as from the Prince of Orange, to make a tender of whatever forces his Majesty should have occasion for; and it is but reasonable to think that both were sincere, for it was the real interest of the States to secure the friendship of the King; and whatever distant views the Prince had entertained, it was notoriously his immediate concern to crush as soon as possible so dangerous a rival as the Duke of Monmouth. Orleans, as Dr Burnet tells the story (9), would have us believe that King James had formed a design to get the Duke seized at the Hague, which the Prince having notice of, sent M. Bentinck to make his Grace acquainted with it, as also to furnish him with money, and that Skelton actually seized certain papers at the Duke's house, after he was withdrawn, which contained positive proofs of the correspondence which had been kept up between his Grace and M. Bentinck. He further insinuates, that there was a sort of contract between the Prince and the Duke, by which the latter stood engaged to make a transfer of whatever conquests he should make to his Highness; and that how little soever there was of the Politician in his Grace, he made such counter professions to the Prince and his republican followers, with no other view than to deceive both. Others are of opinion (10), that the Prince was not the man imposing on, but that under his shew of kindness to Monmouth there was nothing real; that he looked upon him as one who stood in his way to the Crown he had so long aimed at, and was willing to be rid of him; and accordingly took his measures for the ruin of the man he pretended to aid. But this, as well as the pretended correspondence between the Duke and M. Bentinck, is all to be looked upon as the blast of a malevolent faction. The whole course of the Duke of Monmouth's expedition contains a series of proofs that he was a meer adventurer, (and a very unfortunate one) without any alliance of any kind to support him.

[D] Who had recourse to him to rescue them from the danger they were in.] In the State Tracts of those times, there is a piece intitled, 'A Memorial of the English Protestants to their Royal Highnesses the Prince and Princess of Orange, concerning their grievances, and the birth of the pretended 'Prince of Wales.' Which was sent by express to M. Bentinck, and addressed to him to be communicated to the Prince and Princess. It is without name or date, and those who sent it conclude their billet to M. Bentinck, with a compliment upon his fidelity to the Prince, and a hint, that he might hereafter know who they were. It is calculated to prove, that the people of England had a right to call upon their Highnesses for assistance, and that their Highnesses had an equal right to grant it.

[E] He was not wanting, as far as his endeavours could avail, in endeavouring to procure the Crown for the Prince his master.] After the throne was declared vacant upon King James's abdication, and the question arose who should fill it, several consultations were held thereupon by many who formed themselves into parties, and, among the rest, we find M. Bentinck labouring to procure the Crown for the Prince of Orange alone, as we learn from Bishop Burnet, who, speaking of Lord Halifax's project to compliment the Prince with the Throne at the expence of the two Princesses, who were not to enjoy it 'till after the Prince's death, says thus (11). 'How far the Prince himself entertained this, I cannot tell; but I saw it made a great impression upon Bentinck. He spoke of it to me, as asking my opinion about it, but so that I plainly saw what was his own; for he gave me all the arguments that were offered for it, as that it was most natural that the sovereign power should be only in one person; that a man's wife ought only to be his wife; that it was a suitable return to the Prince for what he had done for the nation; that a divided Sovereignty was liable to great inconveniencies; and though there was less to be apprehended from the Princesses of any thing of that kind, than from any woman alive, yet all mortals are frail, and might at some time or other of their lives be wrought on.' The Bishop says, he opposed this very warmly, and used many arguments against it; and adds, 'We talked over the whole thing for many hours, 'till it was pretty far in the morning. I saw he was well instructed in the argument, and he himself was possessed with it: So next morning I came to him, and desired my Congé. I would oppose nothing in which the Prince seemed to be concerned, as long as I was his servant, and therefore I desired to be disengaged, that I might be free to oppose this proposition with all the strength and credit I had (12).' To this M. Bentinck replied, 'that it was time enough for me to do that when any step was taken, but 'till then, he wished I would stay where I was.'

As M. Bentinck was at this time, as it were, the Prince's second self, we may conclude that his Highness was the prompter in this discourse; and indeed by what follows, it appears pretty plainly he was so; for we are told (13), that among other consultations held in several places about these matters, there was one appointed at Mr William Herbert's lodgings at St James's, who had obtained it, was as forward on his part, in rewarding the faithful and signal services of M. Bentinck, as the sequel of his life will demonstrate. Immediately upon the Prince's accession to the British crown, M. Bentinck was made Groom of the Stole, Privy-Purse, first Gentleman of the Royal Bedchamber, and was the first commoner upon the list of Privy-Counsellors; and, to fit him for greater honours, was soon after naturalized by act of Parliament (g); and by letters patent bearing date the ninth day of April 1689, two days before the King and Queen's coronation, he was created Baron of Cirencester, Viscount Woodstock, and Earl of Portland [F]. In the year 1690, the Earl of Portland, with many others of the English nobility, attended King William to Holland, where the Earl acted as Envoy for his Majesty, at the Grand Congress held at the Hague the same year (b); an assembly the most honourable to the English nation, that is any where to be read of [G]. In the year 1695, King William made this nobleman a grant of the lordships of Denbigh, Bromfield, Yale, and other lands, containing many thousand acres, in the principality of Wales, which being part of the Demefne thereof, the grant was opposed, and the House of Commons addressed the King to put a stop to the passing it, which his Majesty accordingly complied with, and recalled the grant, promising, however, to find some other way of shewing his favour to Lord Portland, who, he said, had deserved it by long and faithful services, and this promise the King soon after made good. There was scarce any thing that came under the consideration of Parliament during the reign of King William, that made so great a stir and noise, as this affair of the grant to the Earl of Portland, and we have therefore given a more particular account of it in the notes [H].

(11) Burnet's History of his own Times, Vol. I.

(12) Burnet, ibid.

(13) Burnet, Vol. II.

(g) Hist. of Europe, anno 1709. Peccage of England.

Continuation of the History of England, Vol. II. p. 58, 71. Complete Hist. Vol. III. p. 612.

(b) Prior's Hist. of his own Time, p. 10.

It

who was then ill of the Gout, and so concerned at the great Favourite's urging it was best to make the Princess no Sovereign, and only a Queen-Consort, that, rising out of bed with earnestness, he protested against ever drawing a sword on the Prince's side, if he could have imagined him capable of such usage to his wife. This so alarmed and convinced M. Bentinck of the impossibility of obtaining a point, which even so interested a Courtier as Herbert refused comply in, that in half an hour's time he brought them assurance from the Prince of his not insisting on it, and of his being content with a conjunctive Sovereignty, on condition he might have the sole administration; which last they consented to, because the Princess desired it.

[F] Was created Earl of Portland.] The title of Portland was first dignified with the title of an Earldom in the person of Richard Weston, created Earl of Portland by King Charles I, 1632 (14); in which family the title became extinct at the death of his son Thomas, and was not revived again till now in the person of M. Bentinck.

[G] An assembly the most honourable to the English nation, that is any where to be read of.] King William's favourite project, during his whole government both in Holland and England, was to humble the French King, who had rendered himself formidable not only to Protestants, but even to all the Catholic Princes in Christendom. On this principle was formed the Grand Alliance, at the head of which was King William, who had the pleasure to see half Europe unite under his conduct, and a Senate of Princes meet to assist his councils and second his wishes. We need but mention the number of illustrious persons who met at the Hague upon this occasion, to form an idea of the splendor of this assembly. Besides two Electors of the Empire, there were near sixty foreign Princes, Landgraves, Dukes, Counts, Generals, &c. near twenty of the English nobility, and Envoys from most of the Kings and foreign Princes of Europe; the whole forming a more glorious constellation than any age can parallel (15).

[H] We have therefore given a more particular account of it in the notes.] In order to be acquainted with the nature of this Grant, and the reasons that occasioned it's opposition, we must attend to the arguments made use of by the Gentlemen who opposed it. These were collected together, and printed in a pamphlet, under the title in the margin (16). According to our Historians (17), the Earl of Portland had begged of his Majesty the grant of these Lordships, which he readily obtained, to him and his heirs for ever. The warrant for this Grant coming to the Lords of the Treasury, the Gentlemen of the county had notice of it, that they might be heard if they had any thing to object against it. Accordingly several of them attended, and were heard before the Lord Godolphin, Sir William Trumbull, Sir Stephen Fox, and John Smith, Esq; Chancellor of the Exchequer; when Sir William Williams, son of a Divine of that country, alleged, 'that these Lordships were the antient Demefnes of the Prince of Wales; that the Welsh were never subject to any but God and the King; that in the Statute for granting free-farm rents, there was an exception of the rents belonging to the Principality of Wales, which imported that the Parliament took those revenues to be unalienable; that upon creation of a Prince of Wales, there were many acknowledgments payable out of those Lordships; and though there was at present no Prince of Wales, yet he hoped to see one of the King's own body, &c.' Sir Roger Puleston argued, 'That the revenues of those Lordships supported the government of Wales, by paying the Judges and other officers, their stated salaries, and, if given away, there would be a failure of justice.' Mr Price, a Lawyer of Herefordshire, afterwards made a Baron of the Exchequer, made a long and very warm speech against the Grant. 'He said, it was of a large extent, being five parts in six of a whole county, which was too great a power for any foreign subject to have; that the people of the country were too great to be subject to any Foreigner; that there are fifty mean Lordships held under those manors, and above fifteen hundred Freeholders; that Courts were kept in all those Lordships in the King's name; that all or most of the Gentry of that county were tenants to the King, and suitors to his Court, and thereby obliged to the King by a double allegiance, their general allegiance as subjects, and their particular allegiance as tenants; and if the King gave away one, it was to be feared it would lessen the bounds of the other, since it is observable that interest and property have an ascendant over duty; that this revenue belongs to the Prince of Wales, in failure of whom it vesteth in the Crown, rather as an usufructure than a property, till a Prince be created; that the King having only an estate for life in possession, in the Crown, by the Act of Settlement, how can he grant away the inheritance and absolute fee of the Principality of Wales? that it was not for the King's honour or interest that he daily gave away the revenues of the Crown, and, what is more, the perpetuity of them to his foreign subjects, &c.' When he had done speaking, the Lord Godolphin asked, If the Earl of Leicester had not those Lordships in grant to him in Queen Elizabeth's time? To which Sir Robert Cotton answered, 'That the Earl of Leicester had but one of those Grants, which was Denbigh; that he was so oppressive to the Gentry of the county, that he occasioned them to take up arms and oppose him, for which three or four of his (Sir Robert Cotton's) relations were hanged; but it ended not there, for the quarrel was still kept on foot, and the Earl, glad to be in peace, granted it back to the Queen, since which it had always been in the Crown.' Lord Godolphin then said, they had offered many weighty reasons, which should be represented to his Majesty. — From the Treasury the

(14) Collier's great Historical Dictionary, Vol. II.

(15) Prior's Negotiations, p. 6. & seq.

(16) Speech of an antient Briton in Parliament, against an exorbitant Grant, &c. London, 1708.

(17) Kennet, and Oldmixon.

It was to this nobleman, that the horrid plot for affassinating King William, in the year 1695, the Gentlemen of Wales attended the Grant to the Privy-Seal, where their reasons and complaints were heard, and received with great candour and impartiality, and the Grant was superled; but this did not content them, they must have it recalled, and so brought the affair into the House of Commons, by a petition signed by Sir Thomas Grosvenor, Sir Richard Middleton, Sir John Conway, Sir Robert Cotton, Sir Roger Puleston, Edward Vaughan, Esq; Edward Breton, Esq; and Robert Price, Esq; the Gentleman beforementioned, who spoke to it in Parliament, where he was a Member, in the same stile as he had before in the Treasury. It cannot be amiss to give the reader the substance of this memorable speech, which was much taken notice of for some very severe reflections upon the Grant and Grantee. We shall do this in as few words as possible. Among many other things, says he, 'If I could conceive how the glory or grandeur of England was, or could be, upheld by a poor landless crown, and a miserable, necessitous people, I could then be easily persuaded to believe that his Majesty was well advised to grant away all the revenues of the Crown, and that his Government would be thereby well secured, and his people best protected when they had little or nothing left; but I am sure they were not English, but foreign Politicians, who might revere the King, and yet hate his people. That the Kings of England always reigned best when they had the affections of their subjects, of which they were secure, when the people were loved the King was entirely in their interest, and loved the English soil as well as the people's money, &c.

'The great Lordships of Denbigh, Bromfield, and Yale, in the county of Denbigh, for some centuries have been the revenues of the Kings of England and Princes of Wales, and contain thirty miles in extent; the present rents to the Crown are but 1000 l. per annum, besides reliefs, mises, waives, estreats, perquisites of Courts, and other contingent profits; there are also great profitable waives of several thousand acres of rich and valuable mines, besides other great advantages a mighty favourite and great Courtier might make. That they had found, that not only the three Lordships, but near 3000 l. per annum of their antient inheritance was expressly granted; so that if all had been presented that was comprized in the Grant, it had been a very noble Royal gift, worth at least 100,000 l. nor was that Grant for any short time to this noble Lord, but to him and his heirs for ever; and yet not much to the advantage of the Crown, having only a reservation of six shillings and eight-pence a year, to the King and his successors.

'These Royal dominions in most reigns have been attacked by great and powerful favourites; for in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, some of them were granted to some of her creatures, but attended with so many law-suits and general distractions, that the Queen interposed, and the Freeholders gave large compositions for their peace, the Queen confirming their estates by a Charter. In the fourth year of King James the First, these Lordships were settled on his heirs, Kings of England, but his servants got some Grants of most part of that revenue, which proved so vexatious and troublesome to the country, that the Freeholders came to another composition, and gave 10,000 l. for their peace, and had another Charter of confirmation of their rights, and for settling of their estates, tenures, &c. which was confirmed in Parliament in the fifth of King Charles the First. In the late reign (however calumniated) there were many and great applications made for Grants of some lands of these Lordships, which were always rejected, as too useful for a subject. If part were so, what would the whole be?

'History and Records tell us, that the Grants of these Lordships have ever been fatal either to the Prince or Potentate: the one either losing his Crown, or the other his head: 'Tis therefore dangerous meddling with such ominous bounties.

'There is a great duty lies upon the Freeholders of these Lordships on the creation of the Prince of Wales; they pay a fine of 800 l. for mises, which is such a duty, service or tenure, that is not to be sever'd from the Prince of Wales; and it will be very difficult to find how this tenure can be made reconcileable to this noble Lord's Grant. If we are to pay these mises to this noble Lord, then he is quasi a Prince of Wales, for this duty was never paid to any other; but if it is to be paid to the Prince of Wales, and to this noble Lord too, then are we doubly charged; but if it be to the Prince of Wales, when he has no Royalty left in that dominion, and not to this noble Lord, (who by this Grant is to have the whole Lordships) it relates a repugnancy in the tenure of our estates.

'Far be it from me to speak any thing in derogation of his Majesty's honour, or care for us. It cannot be expected he should know our laws, who is a stranger to us, and we to him, any more than we do his councils, (which I wish we did) I mean those of his now immediate advisers and Ministers, through whose hands this Grant did pass, by advising the King to grant what by law he could not. These Counsellors and Ministers are guilty of the highest violation of the laws and liberties of England, and strike at the very foundation of succession, and tear up the Bill of rights and privileges by the root. It was their province and duty to have acquainted the King of his power and interest, that the antient revenues of the Crown are sacred, and unalienable in the time of war and peoples necessities.

'The Commons of England always entertained an honourable jealousy of their Prince, when they perceived their expences at home or abroad, or their gifts or boons to favourites, to be too large and exorbitant. When our Princes entertained Foreigners of their council and chief advisers, the people of England were restless and uneasy, 'till they were removed out of the King's presence, nay out of the nation; and in History and Parliament are many instances of this, where great men (favourites) procured to themselves too large a proportion of the Royal revenues. How can we hope for happy days in England, when this great Lord and the other Foreigners, though naturalized, are in the English, and also in the Dutch councils: If these strangers, thou now confederates, should be of different interests, to which is it to be supposed these great foreign counsellors and favourites would adhere? I shall make no severe remarks upon this great man, for his greatness makes us little, and will make the Crown both poor and precarious. I desire redress rather than punishment; therefore I shall neither move for an impeachment against this noble Lord, nor for the banishment of him, but shall only beg, that he may have no power over us, nor we any dependance upon him. I therefore move, that an address be made to his Majesty to stop the Grant that is passing to the Earl of Portland, of the Lordships of Lenbigh, Bromfield, and Yale, and other lands in the Principality of Wales, and that the same be not granted but by consent of Parliament.'

This bold speech made so great an impression, that Mr Price's motion was carried by unanimous consent, and on January the 22d the following address (which shews the just sense the Commons had of the vast importance of these Grants to the Crown, and the ill consequences of separating them therefrom) was presented to the King by the Speaker, attended by the whole House.

'May it please your Most Excellent Majesty,

WE your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses in Parliament assembled, humbly lay before your Majesty, that whereas there is a Grant passing to William Earl of Portland and his heirs, of the manors of Denbigh, Bromfield, and Yale, and divers other lands in the Principality of Wales, together with several estates of inheritance, enjoyed by many of your Majesty's subjects by virtue of antient Grants from the Crown.

'That the said manors, with the large and extensive regalities, powers, and jurisdictions to the same belonging, are of great concern to your Majesty

1695, was first discovered; and his Lordship, by his wife counsel and indefatigable zeal, was very instrumental in bringing to light the whole of that execrable scheme [I]. The same

• Majesty and the Crown of this realm; and that the same have been usually annexed to the Principality of Wales, and settled on the Princes of Wales for their support; and that a great number of your Majesty's subjects in those parts hold their estates by Royal tenure, under great and valuable compositions, rents, Royal payments, and services to the Crown and Princes of Wales; and have by such tenure great dependance on your Majesty and the Crown of England; and have enjoyed great privileges and advantages with their estates under such tenure.

• We therefore most humbly beseech your Majesty, to put a stop to the passing this Grant to the Earl of Portland, of the said manors and lands; and that the same may not be disposed from the Crown, but by consent of Parliament; for that such Grant is in diminution of the honour and interest of the Crown, by placing in a subject such large and extensive royalties, powers, and jurisdictions, which ought only to be in the Crown, and will sever that dependance which so great a number of your Majesty's subjects in those parts have on your Majesty and the Crown, by reason of their tenure, and may be to their great oppression in those rights which they have purchased, and hitherto enjoyed with their estates; and also an occasion of great vexation to many of your Majesty's subjects, who have long had the absolute inheritance of several lands (comprehended in the said Grant to the Earl of Portland) by antient Grants from the Crown.

To which his Majesty was pleased to return this answer.

GENTLEMEN,

• I Have a kindness for my Lord Portland, which he has deserved of me by long and faithful services; but I should not have given him these lands, if I had imagined the House of Commons could have been concerned; I will therefore re-call the Grant, and find some other way of shewing my favour to him.

It must be owned, that the Grant of these parcels of the Principality of Wales was unadvisedly, or ill advisedly, done; and the Lord Portland was blamed by the King's friends for procuring it of his Majesty; the disaffected called him in derision our new Prince of Wales; and hence the opposition made thereto was extremely just and noble, in those whose only views were the saving those lands from alienation; yet, if it had been carried on with more temper and moderation, (we might say decency) it had gained a more general applause; but Mr Price's great zeal for his country transported him beyond the bounds of decency, and his angry speech favours much of party-pique and discontent, and shews him to have been no hearty friend to the Revolution.

It was not long after King William re-called these Grants, before his Majesty found means to make Lord Portland others, in recompence for the revenues of the Principality of Wales, viz. a Grant of certain buildings in Whitehall for forty-five years, at the rent of six shillings and eight-pence; a Grant of the manor of Grantham in the county of Lincoln, Honour of Penrith in the county of Cumberland, manor of Dracklow and Rudneith in Cheshire, manor of Torrington in Norfolk, manors of Partington, Bristol-Garth, Homsey, Thwing, Burnisley, and Leven, in the county of York, all parcel of the antient revenue of the Crown of England; the manor of Pevensey in the county of Sussex, parcel of the duchy of Lancaster, and all the lands and tenements, &c. thereunto belonging, to hold to his Lordship and his heirs; and also his Majesty's manor of East-Greenwich in the county of Kent, under the rent of 4*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* a year. There was also granted to his Lordship all the little remainder of the fee-farm rents, worth to be sold above 24000*l.* which last Grant was afterwards vacated by the said Earl (18).

Though Lord Portland was suffered to possess these Grants quietly during King William's reign, yet there was an attempt in the next reign to have them, and other Grants of King William, re-called, in a pamphlet published in 1703, intitled, 'The Exorbitant Grants of William the Third examined and questioned; shewing the nature of Grants in successive and elective Monarchies; and proving by Law and History, that Crown-lands are inalienable, that resumptions were common all the world over, and that where a Prince hath no hereditary title, he can make no hereditary right; and that Kings set up by Parliament can dispose of no lands but with consent of Parliament, which renders William the Third's Grants totally void.' This pamphlet is addressed to Queen Anne, and is declared in the Dedication to her Majesty, that it is intended to bring back those valuable branches of the revenue, which her predecessor had lost from the Crown. It is a very bold piece, and makes very free with King William, falling foul on his miscarriages, even in the dedication. How it was received we know not, but the attempt proved vain and fruitless.

[I] And his Lordship by his wife counsel and indefatigable zeal, was very instrumental in bringing to light the whole of that execrable scheme.] The person who first discovered the conspiracy to Lord Portland, was one Captain Fisher (19), one of the conspirators. His first opening of the plot to his Lordship was only five days before it was to have been executed. He gave the Earl an account not only of the design itself, but also of the manner in which it was to have been executed, but peremptorily refused to tell the names of the actors, which made the King, when Lord Portland told him of it, conclude that it was only a story invented to affright him with a false alarm; and so his Majesty, notwithstanding Fisher's story, gave orders for hooting on the very day appointed by the conspirators for the execution of their bloody design, and he could not have avoided the blow had it not been for a special act of providence; for the very next day before it was to have been committed, February the 14th, Lord Portland, as he was returning, from visiting his daughter the Countess of Essex, to Kenfington, where the Court then was, very luckily recollected, that he had appointed a person to come to him upon business that evening in town, so he turned back again to his lodgings at Whitehall, where, besides the person he expected, he found a stranger waiting for him, who told him he had an affair of very great importance to communicate to his Lordship, and going close up to him, without further ceremony, thus bluntly assailed him. 'Pray, my Lord, persuade the King to stay at home to-morrow, for if he goes to hunt, he will be murdered.' He then confirmed Fisher's account of the plot, but insisted, as a condition of his further discovery, that he should not be made use of as an evidence. He added, that his name was Pendergrafs, and that as his business required all possible dispatch, he thought he could not make his address to a person that would be more careful than his Lordship, who left no means unattempted to persuade Pendergrafs to name the conspirators, which he resisted with an invincible constancy. When the Earl came to Kenfington, which, notwithstanding all the haste he could make, was very late, he found the King was retired, and had given the necessary orders for hunting the next day, and even the fresh confirmation he received of the conspiracy to murder him, could scarce alter his resolution; and it was with great difficulty that his Majesty was at last overcome by Lord Portland's repeated importunities. At length the number of discoverers increasing, and their accounts all agreeing, his Majesty began to take some care of his safety, and he desired Lord Portland and Sir William Trumbull, Secretary of State, who likewise had some discoveries made to him, to enquire strictly into the progress and circumstances of the design. But this did not succeed, the two principal discoverers, Pendergrafs and La Rue, still peremptorily refusing to name the conspirators, which might have been of fatal consequence if Lord Portland had not found out the happy expedient to prevent it, by persuading his Majesty to give himself the trouble of examining them separately in his closet, but before witnesses, that if they should be brought to enter into particulars, it might serve to convict the criminals.

(19) Blackmore's Hist. of the Assassination Plot. See.

(18) Debates in Parliament, by Chanaler, anno 1696.

same year another affair happened, in which this noble Lord gave so shining a proof of the strictest honour and integrity, as has done immortal honour to his memory. The Parliament having taken into consideration the affairs of the East-India company, who, through mismanagement and corrupt dealings, were in danger of losing their charter; strong interest was made with the members of both Houses, and large sums properly distributed, to procure a new establishment of the company by Act of Parliament (i): among those noblemen whose interest was necessary to bring about this affair, Lord Portland's was particularly courted, and an extraordinary value put upon it, much beyond that of any other Peer, for he was offered no less than the sum of 50,000 pounds for his vote, and to use his endeavours with the King to favour the design. But his Lordship, possessed of a greatness of soul that placed him above corruption, treated this injurious offer with all the contempt and indignation it deserved, telling the person employed in it, that if he ever so much as mentioned such a thing to him again, he would for ever be the company's enemy, and give them all the opposition in his power. This is an instance of publick spirit not often met with, and did not pass unregarded; for we find it recorded in an eloquent speech of a worthy member of Parliament, who took occasion to relate this noble action to the House of Commons, much to the honour of Lord Portland (k). It was owing to this nobleman, that the Banqueting-House at White-Hall was saved, when the rest of the Palace was destroyed by fire (*). Going on thus in a course of honour and prosperity, his Lordship, in February 1696, was created a Knight of the most noble Order of the Garter, at a chapter held at Kensington, the Sovereign and ten Knights being present, and was installed at Windsor on the 25th of March 1697, at which time he was also Lieutenant-General of his Majesty's forces (l); for his Lordship's services were not confined to the cabinet, he likewise distinguished himself in the field on several occasions, particularly at the battle of the Boyne, battle of Landen, where he was wounded (m), siege of Limerick, Namur, &c. As his Lordship thus attended his royal master in his wars both in Ireland and Flanders, and bore a principal command there, so he was honoured by his Majesty with the chief management of the famous peace of Ryfwick; having, in some conferences with the Marshal Boufflers, settled the most difficult and tender point, and which might greatly have retarded the conclusion of the peace [K]: this was concerning the disposal of King

James;

(i) Compleat History of England, Vol. III. p. 680. Oldmixon's Hist. of England, Vol. II.

(k) Speeches and Debates in Parliament, anno 1695.

(*) Boyer's Account of famous Men, at the end of his Life of Queen Anne.

(l) Peerage of England, by Collins, edit. 1735, Vol. I. p. 310.

(m) Journey thro' the Austrian Netherlands, 320. P. 47.

(20) Compleat History, Vol. III. P. 704.

criminals when they should be brought to trial (20). This good advice the King followed, and having examined Pendergrafs before the Earl of Portland and Lord Cutts, and La Rue before the same Earl and Brigadier Levison, succeeded so well, that the informers being no longer able to resist the awful but persuasive eloquence of injured Majesty, gave a very particular and circumstantial account of the whole affair, and discovered the names of all the conspirators, which entirely frustrated their hellish intrigues and designs.

[K] Having, in some conferences with M. Boufflers, settled the most tender point, &c.] King William wisely considering, that the usual formalities of solemn negotiations were no small hindrance to their progress, and finding that more time was likely to be lost in this treaty than was consistent with the urgency of the affair, his Majesty resolved to shorten as much of it as related to himself, by a quicker way of negotiating, and to commit his personal interests, and those of his dominions, to the arbitration and management of the Earl of Portland on his Majesty's part, and M. Boufflers on the part of the French King. Accordingly the confederate army being encamped at Cocklebergh near Brussels, and the French not far from thence, the Earl of Portland having received the King's commands and instructions, demanded as from himself, according to Bishop Kennet (21), a private interview with M. Boufflers, which being readily granted, though other accounts make M. Boufflers the first mover in this interview (22), the two Generals met, June 10, 1697, N. S. at an equal distance from their respective camps, attended each by the same number of guards, and accompanied by several officers of note. This preliminary conference was soon after followed by three others, at the last of which, July 26, the two Negotiators, after they had been some time together in the open field, retired into a house in the suburb of Halle, and in an hour adjusted several points that the Plenipotentiaries at Ryfwick would not perhaps have agreed upon in a year. The Earl of Portland told Dr Burnet himself (23), that the subject of these conferences was concerning King James, that King William desired to know how the King of France intended to dispose of him, and how he could own King William, and yet support the other; and it was said, that the Earl of Portland insisted that King James and his family should be sent out of France, which M. Boufflers would not yield to, nor would the King of France renounce the protecting him by any article of the treaty; so it was at last agreed between them, that the King of France should give him no assistance, nor give King William any disturbance on his account, and that he should retire from the Court of France, either to Avignon or Italy; that his Queen should have 50,000*l.* a year, which was her jointure settled after King James's death, and that it should now be paid her, he being reckoned as dead to the nation; and in this the King very readily acquiesced. These differences being adjusted, the treaty went on with much greater dispatch. On the 2d of August, Lord Portland and M. Boufflers signed the paper they had drawn up some few days before, whereupon his Majesty left the army, and dispatched the Earl of Portland to the Hague, to acquaint the Congress, 'that as for what concerned his Majesty and his kingdoms, all things were so adjusted with France, as would occasion no delay in the general peace; and therefore he earnestly pressed the other allies, and particularly the Emperor, to contribute all that in them lay, towards concluding so great a work.'

The French were so little pleased with this treaty, that they made very severe reflections on their Plenipotentiaries, and lampooned them publicly all over the kingdom, whilst the resolution and wisdom of King William were universally celebrated and admired. One of the best writers at that time in France said, 'The towns delivered up at the treaty of Ryfwick, the enemy would not have taken in twenty years time (les ennemis n'eussent pas repris en vingt ans de tems).' The same author, speaking of King William's chusing the Earl of Portland to confer with M. Boufflers, says, 'King William, who knew how to take advantage of every thing, knew well that the Earl of Portland had at least as good a head as M. Boufflers.' And indeed the French themselves had a much higher opinion of his Lordship than of their own minister; for the account published in France of the negotiations between those two Ministers, says, that Lord Portland having sent a trumpeter to M. Boufflers to desire a private interview, without any mention of business, it was consented to; and that the Earl having proposed to him to remove some differences there, which would require too long a time at Ryfwick, the Marshal sent to know the King of France's pleasure, whose great desire for peace made him approve of the Earl's proposal, 'without considering what advantage that Lord might have over the Marshal in a superior genius.' The account then shews the inconvenience of putting the Earl of Portland upon a level with a Marshal of France. That it was true, indeed, that the King

(21) Compleat History, P. 737.

(22) Hist. Europe, 1709. Burnet, Vol. II. P. 200.

(23) Burnet, ibid.

James; the King of France having solemnly promised, in an open declaration to all Europe, that he would never lay down his arms 'till he had restored the abdicated King to his throne, and consequently could not own King William, without abandoning him. Not long after the conclusion of the peace, King William nominated the Earl of Portland to be his Ambassador Extraordinary to the Court of France; which honour, though it raised the envy of those who were jealous of the extraordinary favour and affection shewed to this nobleman, yet was justly due to him, for the share he had in bringing about the late glorious treaty of Ryfwick; and the King could not have fixed upon a person better qualified to support the high character he had given him, with the greatest dignity and magnificence: besides, that the French in general had a great opinion of his Lordship's capacity and merit, and no Ambassador was ever so respected and caressed in France as his Lordship was, who, on his part, filled his employment with equal honour to the King, the British nation and himself, the magnificence of his publick entry into Paris, outshining what had ever been beheld at that gaudy Court since the Duke of Buckingham's entry, when he went to demand the Princess Maria Henrietta in marriage for King Charles I. (n). A more particular account and description of this most splendid and famous embassy of Lord Portland's, may perhaps be worthy the reader's notice, and we have therefore given it in the note [L]. According to the Historian cited in the margin (o), the (n) Compleat History, Vol. III. p. 753.

(o) Prior's Negotiations, p. 39.

King had raised Boufflers from a Cadet of Picardy to the dignity of a Duke, Peer, Marshal of France, and Knight of his Order; and so King William had raised Lord Portland from a Gentleman of Guelderland to an Earl and Peer of England, and Knight of the Order of the Garter. But then there was this difference still, that the one commanded an army, which the other never did; besides, there was also that to be said, that the French King had never owned King William. Be this as it will, the Marshal de Boufflers valued himself not a little upon his negotiations with Lord Portland; and the writer of his Life pays a great compliment to that Lord, when he says (24), 'two things had helped to spoil Boufflers, namely, the Marshal's staff, and his conferences with the Lord Portland; for since his negotiations with that great Minister, he thought himself capable even of the most important employments, and believed that the peace had been more advantageous for France, if it had been left solely to his management.'

(24) Vie de Boufflers.

[L] And we have therefore given it in the note.]

The Earl of Portland set out on his embassy the 10th of January, and in eleven days reached Paris, having in his way thither been received with most extraordinary marks of respect (25). The guns were every where fired, companies of soldiers drawn up in several places through which he passed, and others were appointed for his guard; the officers waited upon his Lordship, and the Magistrates made him their compliments, and brought him presents. Three days after his Lordship's arrival at Paris, he was magnificently entertained at supper by the Duke of Grammont, with the Marshals de Villeroy and Boufflers, the Dukes of Valentinois, Clerembault, and Roquelaure, Count Tallard, (whom the French King had named to the embassy in England) and several other persons of the first rank and quality in France; and the next day he was admitted to a private audience of the King, Dauphin, Dukes of Burgundy, Anjou, and Berry, and the rest of the Royal Family, by all of whom he was received with singular marks of kindness and distinction, and afterwards entertained at dinner by the Marquis de Torcy, Secretary of State for foreign affairs. The 9th of March, N. S. being the day appointed for his Lordship's publick entry (26), he went privately in one of his own coaches to Rambouillet, the place from whence Ambassadors usually make their entry, as did all the English gentlemen in theirs. Upon his arrival there, the Princes of the Blood sent their coaches, and a Gentleman in each, to compliment his Excellency; as did likewise the foreign Ministers and Envoys then in France, and at three in the afternoon came the Marshal de Boufflers, who was appointed by the King to receive and accompany the Lord Ambassador in his publick entry, to the grandeur of which the Marshal contributed all he could, being himself extremely fond of pomp and pageantry, and consequently omitted nothing upon this occasion that might heighten his own grandeur, and do honour to the King his master, of which his Majesty was very sensible, and well knew he could not have chose any one so properly qualified for that purpose. If the reader will pardon the digression of a few lines, we would relate a very singular instance of the Marshal's vast profuseness and prodigality, and which perhaps is not easily paralleled (27). The King, this present year 1698, having ordered a camp to be formed at Compeigne, as was pretended, in honour of his grandson the Duke of Burgundy, he appointed the Marshal de Boufflers to command it under that young Prince; and as his Majesty knew he was a person that would even ruin himself to maintain the dignity conferred on him, made him a present of 50,000 crowns before he marched, though the camp was to continue only three weeks, which sum the King thought pretty reasonable for so short a time. But the Marshal, who affected to appear like the great Turenne, in regarding nothing but his glory, and despising wealth, lived after such a prodigious rate in the camp, that twice that large sum scarce excused him. He kept five tables, noon and night, all equally served, and abounding with the greatest rarities and niceties in the kingdom. He had above an hundred principal cooks, besides great numbers of others who served under them; those who worked in the morning taking their rest in the afternoon. He had an infinite number of carriages in the field to bring his provisions, and two for ice only, which was brought from Paris every day. He had purveyors not only in that city, but in all the great towns within twenty-five leagues of the camp.

(25) Life of King William, Vol. III. p. 336.

(26) Hist. of Europe, 1709.

(27) Life of Boufflers.

But to return to our embassy. His Excellency the Earl of Portland, accompanied by the Earl of Westmoreland, the Lords Cavendish, Hastings, Pafton, Woodstock (his Excellency's son), Lord Raby, Mr Prior, Secretary of the embassy, Mr Fielding, Mr Boyle, and several other gentlemen, proceeded to make his publick entry in the following order; the Marshal Bouffler's coach, with his Pages on horseback, and his Gentleman of the Horse before it, his servants in rich liveries went about thirty paces before the rest; then came one of the King's messengers, his Excellency's second Gentleman of the Horse, twelve sumpter horses very richly caparisoned, and led by twelve Grooms on horseback; his Excellency's first Gentleman of the Horse, followed by twelve Pages on horseback, and fifty-six Footmen, all cloathed in exceeding rich liveries; the King's coach, in which were the Lord Ambassador, the Marshal de Boufflers, Monsieur Bonneville, Introducer of Ambassadors, and the Earl of Westmoreland; the Dukes of Burgundy's, Duke of Orleans's, and Madame's coaches, and those of the rest of the Princes and Princesses of the Blood in their order, in which were their own Gentlemen of the Horse, and the English Noblemen and Gentlemen, their Footmen all in his Excellency's rich liveries, walking by the coaches; then came his Excellency's magnificent body coach empty, drawn by eight horses, before it two Swiflers on horseback, and at the portals two servants on foot in his Lordship's livery, and two Gentlemen on horseback; the second and third coach with eight horses, his Excellency's chariot with six, another coach with eight, another chariot with six; in these coaches were Gentlemen who immediately belonged to his Excellency's family. The whole procession was closed by the coaches of M. de Torcy, Secretary of State, and M. Bonneville. Thus did this splendid cavalcade proceed to the Hôtel, a house reserved for the entertainment the Earl of Portland went on this embassy with reluctance, having been for some time alarmed with the growing favour of a rival in King William's affection, namely, Keppel, lately created Earl of Albemarle, a Dutchman, who had also been Page to his Majesty. And, says our author (*), 'his jealousy was not ill-grounded, for Albemarle so prevailed in Lord Portland's absence, that he obliged him, by several little affronts, to lay down all his employments, after which he was never more in favour, though the King always shewed tainment of foreign Ambassadors, through multitudes of spectators, who were astonished at the grandeur and opulence of the English nation. Being arrived at the Hôtel, the Marshal de Boufflers, after a short stay with his Excellency, took his leave, and soon after the Duke D'Aumont came from the King with a compliment to his Excellency, and the usual compliments were made from the Princes and Princesses of the Blood.

(*) Ibid.

Two days afterwards his Excellency was admitted to his first publick audience at Versailles, whither he was conducted in the same manner as at his entry, and was received with the utmost grandeur; in the first court of the palace the Foot-guards were drawn up, the French on one side, the Swisssers on the other, the drums beating, colours flying, and the officers saluting with their hats. In the second court, the guard called Hoquelous were ranged, all the coaches went in, and his Excellency alighted at the chamber of Ambassadors, and all his retinue. After a short stay here, M. Bonneville informing his Excellency that the King was ready to receive him, he proceeded to his audience. The Marquis Blainville, Great Master of the Ceremonies, received his Excellency at the foot of the great stairs, which were lined with the Swisss guards, and conducted him to the guard-chamber, at the entry of which he was received by the Captain of the guard in waiting, and thence conducted to the King's bed-chamber, which was filled with persons of the highest quality.

(28) Compl. Hist.

According to Bishop Kennet (28) it was a distinguishing mark of honour, that his Excellency was admitted to his audience in the King's bed-chamber, and even within the rails round the bed, where the King stood, with the three young Princes his grandsons, and the Count de Thoulouze, Duke d'Aumont, and Marshal de Noailles (29). His Excellency having made his speech, covered, and delivered his credentials, the King answered him in very obliging terms, both in relation to his Royal Master and himself. His Excellency then presented the English Noblemen and Gentlemen to the King, and retired; after which he had audience of the Dauphin, and all the rest of the Royal Family, and was, together with his retinue, entertained at dinner at several tables, and in the afternoon was conducted back to Paris, with the same ceremonies as at his coming; the whole performed with the greatest order and regularity, as well as magnificence. The whole French Court, not only in imitation, but by express direction of the King, shewed his Lordship most singular marks of honour and respect. He was entertained by the Princes of the Blood and Grantees of the Court, and in his turn entertained them; and 'tis observable (19) Hist. of Europe, 1709.(30) Compl. Hist.(31) Ibid.(32) Oldmixon.

(30), that his Lordship was attended in all the visits he made by the same numerous and splendid train as at his publick entry (31); and the magnificence of his table was answerable to the grandeur of his attendance and equipage, his Lordship seldom dining without the company of those of the first rank in the kingdom, who admired the plenty, elegance, and order of his entertainments. There is a circumstance mentioned by one of our Historians (32), in itself immaterial, and of no other concern than as it serves to shew that this noble Lord, though not an Englishman born, yet had the honour and credit of England as much at heart as if he had been a native of it, and indeed supported it's dignity better than any English Ambassador at the Court of France, either before or after him. 'His Excellency, says our author, had frequently surloins of English beef sent him from Dover, which being landed at Calais, were dispatched thence by messengers on purpose, to come fresh to Paris. This he did for the honour of England. He had also large quantities of the finest Herefordshire eyder, and Burton ale, which were so fine, that the Custom-house officers on the Seine said it was Vin d'Espagne, Canary, and would have seized it if it had not belonged to his Excellency.'

'Tis easy to imagine what a mortification it must be to the abdicated King, and his Court at St Germain's, to hear what extraordinary honours were paid to the Minister and favourite of the Prince who filled the throne he vainly called his. During the Earl of Portland's stay in France there was a review of the troops of the household, at which the King, Dauphin, young Princes of France, King James, and his son, the titular Prince of Wales, and divers persons of quality, were present; and likewise the Earl of Portland, not knowing that King James and his son would be there. This latter, by his father's directions, endeavoured to join conversation with the Lord Woodstock; but the Earl of Portland his father, seeing his design, ordered his son to avoid him, as he himself did all those that belonged to the Court of St Germain's; and King James himself did all he could to engage Lord Cavendish, and the other English Noblemen to accost him, but they all imitated the Earl of Portland (33).

(33) Compl. Hist.

In the beginning of May, King William having appointed the Earl of Jersey to succeed Lord Portland as Ambassador Extraordinary to France, his Excellency had first his publick, and then private audience of leave of the King and all the Royal Family (34). The King sent his Lordship the usual present of his picture set with Diamonds, but with this difference, that the stones were worth three times as much as is usual in the like gifts. Besides which, his Majesty presented the Earl with all the stamps and prints engraved at the Louvre, contained in twelve large volumes in folio; in return for which, his Excellency made the King a present of nine very fine English horses (35).

(34) Ibid.(35) Compl. Hist.

On the 28th of June his Excellency left Paris, and went to Chantilly, a house belonging to the Prince of Condé, where he was entertained in a grand manner, 'till the 11th, when he took leave of his Highness, and proceeding on his journey, arrived at Kenfington on the 19th. Thus ended this famous embassy, the expence of which, according to the French account (36), was only 100,000 crowns; but, according to our own Historians (37), almost three times that sum, 80,000 £. and one of them writes (38), that he has been informed Lord Portland was 25,000 £. out of pocket more than his allowance for the charge of the embassy, and that his Lordship was never reimbursed it, but rightly adds, that he will not answer for the truth of this. Salmon says it cost King William near 150,000 £. (39). However this be, 'tis certain the money that was spent upon this occasion was to very little purpose; and Mr Prior might well say, as he does (40), that this embassy was rather a matter of ceremony than business, the Earl of Portland, with all his endeavours, having been able to obtain nothing for the advantage of his Royal Master. His Lordship had it in his instructions, to insist upon the removal of the late King James to a further distance from the Court of France. This demand King James concluded would be complied with, and was preparing to retire to Avignon, but Lewis XIV. would not listen to the proposal, though Lord Portland offered in King William's name, to give King James and his Queen an honourable pension, and ease the French King of 50,000 Louis d'ors a year, which he allowed King James, besides smaller pensions and appointments to his followers, amounting in the whole to a very great sum (41). — From hence it appears, how ill the French King observed his engagements with King William, it having been expressly agreed in the conferences between Lord Portland and Marshal de Boufflers (42), that the King of France should give King James no assistance, and that he should retire from the French Court, either to Avignon or Italy; which the French King now absolutely refused Lord Portland to comply with; and King William now saw he could not obtain any thing by remonstrances, which he had neglected to stipulate in the treaty of Ryfwick; but this is not to be wondered at, when we reflect how short a time that treaty itself was found binding in it's most material articles.

(36) Annales de la Cour.(37) Compl. Hist.(38) Hist. of Europe, 1709.(39) Salmon's Modern History.(40) Hist. of his own Time, p. 38.

(41) Oldmixon, Kennet, &c.

(42) See the notes [K].

‘ shewed an esteem for him.’ Bishop Burnet (p) gives this account of the affair. That the Earl of Portland observed the progress of the King’s favour to the Lord Albemarle with great uneasiness; they grew to be not only incompatible, as all rivals for favour must be, but to hate and oppose one another in every thing; the one (Lord Portland) had more of the confidence, the other more of the favour. Lord Portland, upon his return from his embassy to France, could not bear the visible superiority in favour that the other was growing up to; so he took occasion, from a small preference given Lord Albemarle in prejudice of his own post, as Groom of the Stole, to withdraw from Court, and lay down all his employments. The King used all possible means to divert him from this resolution, but could not prevail on him to alter it. He indeed consented to serve his Majesty still in his State-affairs, but would not return to any post in the household. This change, says Bishop Kennet (q), did at first please the English and Dutch, the Earl of Albemarle having cunningly made several powerful friends in both nations, who, out of envy to Lord Portland, were glad to see another in his place, and it is said (r), that Lord Albemarle was supported by the Earl of Sutherland and Mrs Villiers, to pull down Lord Portland: however, though the first became now the reigning favourite, yet the latter, says Bishop Kennet, did ever preserve the esteem and affection of King William: though the same author had before said, that Lord Albemarle was become entire master of the King’s confidence. But King William was a Prince of another sort of genius, than are those Princes who are governed by favourites; he was his own Minister in all the greater parts of government, as those of war and peace, forming alliances and treaties, which, in the main, were the effects of his own knowledge and experience, and he knew well the merit of those he employed in his service. We have before seen, that even by the acknowledgment of the French, enemies to Lord Portland and his friends, his Lordship was superior in capacity to M. de Boufflers, then a leading man at the Court of France, and there was no Minister of State then in Europe, whose character was more than equal to Lord Portland’s, in policy and negotiation. King William was sensible of this, and, as such a Minister, Lord Portland never lost ground in the good opinion and esteem of his master, though possibly he might in his affection or personal love; for the affections and passions of Kings are variable as other mens, and consequently the situation of favourites is very precarious, and there have been very few instances of those, who could boast a reign so quiet and undisturbed, as never to suffer any interruption or diminution of their Prince’s favour. Kings see with other mens eyes, and hear with other mens ears, and there are never wanting those about a Court, who endeavour to traduce that virtue in others, which they cannot, or will not, imitate themselves. The Earl of Albemarle had been in his Majesty’s service from a youth, was descended of a noble family in Guelderland, attended King William into England as his Page of Honour, and being a young Lord of fine address and sweet temper, with a due mixture of heroism, it is no wonder his Majesty took pleasure in his conversation in the intervals of State business, and in making his fortune, who had so long followed his own; which, however, was not making him master of his confidence, as the Historian says. Bishop Burnet (s) says, it is a difficult matter to account for the reasons of the favour shewn by the King, in the highest degree, to these two Lords, they being in all respects, not only of different, but of quite opposite characters; secrecy and fidelity being the only qualities in which they did in any sort agree. Lord Albemarle was very cheerful and gay, had all the arts of a Court, was civil to all, and procured favours for many; but was so addicted to his pleasures, that he could scarce submit to attend on business, and had never yet distinguished himself in any thing. On the other hand, Lord Portland was of a grave and sedate disposition, and indeed, adds the Bishop, was thought rather too cold and dry, and had not the art of creating friends; but was indefatigable in business, and had distinguished himself on many occasions (t). With another author, a pretty censorious one (u), his Lordship has the character of carrying himself with a very lofty mien, yet was not proud, nor much beloved nor hated by the people. But it is no wonder if the Earl of Portland was not acceptable to the English nation; his Lordship had been for ten years entirely trusted by the King, was his chief favourite and bosom-friend, and the favourites of Kings are seldom favourites of the people, on the contrary, are generally objects of national jealousy, and oftentimes of publick hatred: and as it must be owned King William was immoderately lavish to those he personally loved, of whom Lord Portland was the most distinguished instance, no doubt but his Majesty’s extraordinary bounties and honours heaped upon this nobleman, raised much envy, and created him many enemies; for the amassing of wealth, and aggrandizing a family, are in themselves sufficient to render a Minister and Favourite unpopular; but as long as History has not charged his memory with failings that might deservedly render him obnoxious to the publick, there can be no partiality in attributing this nobleman’s unpopularity, partly to the above reasons, and partly to his being a foreigner, for which he suffered not a little from the envy and malice of his enemies, in their Speeches, Libels, &c. of which there were some, levelled, as well against his royal patron King William, as against his Lordship, that were filled with reproaches and reflections, not only severe, but scandalous in the highest degree, and whose titles as well as contents are therefore best concealed. We shall only observe farther, that the same aversion to foreign favourites soon after shewed itself against Lord Albemarle,

(p) Burnet’s History of his own Times, Vol. II. p. 224.

(q) Compleat History of England, Vol. III. p. 754.

(r) Mackey’s Memoirs, p. 67.

(s) Burnet’s Hist. of his own Times, Vol. II. p. 225.

(t) Ibid.

(u) Mackey, in his Characters of the English and Scotch Nobility, p. 62.

(w) Compleat
Hist. of England,
Vol. III. p. 783.

(x) Ibid.

(y) Prior's Negociations, p. 176, 177.

(z) Mackey's
Memoirs, p. 63.

who, as he grew into power and favour, like Lord Portland, began to be looked upon with the same jealousy; and when the King gave him the Order of the Garter, in the year 1700, we are told (w) it was generally disliked, and his Majesty, to make it pass the better, did at the same time confer the like honour on Lord Pembroke (an English nobleman of illustrious birth); yet it was observed, that few of the nobility graced the ceremony of their installation with their presence, and that many severe reflections were then made on his Majesty, for lavishing away a Garter on his favourite (x): and another writer says (y), the King lost many friends by his attachment to Lord Albemarle, and that the creating him Knight of the Garter, gave a general disgust to the nobility. The King had for a long time given the Earl of Portland the entire and absolute government of Scotland (z), and his Lordship was also employed, in the year 1698, in the new negotiation set on foot for the succession of the Crown of Spain, called by the name of the Partition Treaty, the intention of which being frustrated by the treachery of the French King, the treaty itself fell under severe censure, and was looked upon as a fatal slip in the politics of that reign, and Lord Portland was impeached by the House of Commons, in the year 1700, for advising and transacting it, as were also the other Lords concerned with him in it. As his Lordship had so considerable a share in this memorable transaction, it cannot be amiss to give a more particular account of it, as to its design and occasion, as well as the extraordinary and unusual method of proceeding of the House of Commons, against Lord Portland, and the other impeached Lords, for their share therein. For this, see the note [M]. This same year, Lord Portland was a second time attacked, together with the [M] For this see the notes.] The Treaty of Partition is said to have been first projected by the famous Count Tallard, and to have laid the foundation of his future fortunes (43): But the first proposal of it was made by the French King himself to Lord Portland, while he was in France; and it was probably in order to make King William come the more readily into it, that Lewis endeavoured to dazzle his Majesty's eyes by the extraordinary reception he gave to his Ambassador, and the marks of esteem and affection which he shewed him in several letters; for, after the peace of Ryfwick, that Monarch's thoughts were wholly turned upon securing in his own family the succession of the Spanish monarchy, the King of Spain having no issue, and his death being daily expected; and, on the other hand, King William was no less bent upon preventing any such succession from taking place (44). The French King, to accomplish his ends, kept up a very considerable army, and made all the necessary preparations for sending out great numbers of men of war and galleys, in order to seize upon Spain as soon as the present Monarch was dead; and it happened that King William's whole forces at this time amounted but to seven thousand men. Thus was the French King left in a condition to execute almost any thing. It was in his power to take possession of the whole Spanish monarchy in the various parts of the world, before any Prince but the Emperor, whom he had little reason to fear, could oppose him. It was therefore no wonder that King William was prevailed upon to listen to a proposal for dividing those dominions, and thereby preventing the Spanish monarchy, with all its dependencies, from falling into the hands of France. His Majesty, it is said, entered into this project by the advice of Lord Portland, and, being then in Holland, sent over to England to Lord Somers for his advice in this important affair, desiring him to send over the full powers under the Great Seal, to treat with Count Tallard, who had made some propositions to his Majesty in person; but withal, enjoined inviolable secrecy to Lord Somers, who soon after sent the King a commission under the Great Seal, and likewise some advice about the affair, which his Majesty however did not stay to receive, for before it's arrival, August 29, N. S. (45) a treaty was concluded, and signed by the Earl of Portland and Sir Joseph Williamson on the part of England, Count Tallard on the part of France, and by eight Plenipotentiaries of the States General, to this purport: That in case the King of Spain should die without issue, the kingdoms of Naples and Sicily, with the places then depending upon the Spanish monarchy, situate on the coast of Tuscany, or the islands adjacent, the marquisate of Final, the Province of Guipuscoa, several towns and all places on the French side of the Pyreneas, and other mountains, with all the ships and galleys, &c. should be given to the Dauphin in consideration of his right (46). That the Crown of Spain, and the other kingdoms and places, both within and without Europe,

(43) Life of King
William, p. 334.

(44) Cole's Memoirs, p. 29, &
179.

(45) Prior's Ne-gociations, p. 51.

(46) Ibid.

should descend to the Electoral Prince of Bavaria; and that the duchy of Milan should be allotted to the Archduke Charles, the Emperor's second son (47). This treaty was not long in force, for the Electoral Prince of Bavaria, appointed successor to the King of Spain, died in February following, upon which Lord Portland soon after began to treat about a new partition in favour of the Archduke Charles. The Earl of Jersey was sent into France on this occasion, and he and Lord Portland were joined in a commission by his Majesty, as his Plenipotentiaries, for concluding a new Partition Treaty (48), which was done in March following; the conditions of which were, I. That Spain, Flanders, and the West-Indies, which by the former treaty had been allotted to the Prince of Bavaria, should devolve to the Archduke Charles, the Emperor's second son. II. That Naples and Sicily, with the rest of the Spanish Provinces on the coast of Italy, &c. should be assigned the Dauphin. III. That Lorraine should be annexed to France, the duchy of Milan conferred on the Duke of Lorraine, and the county of Bitche on the Prince of Vaudemont. King William and the States had certainly no other view in this treaty but to establish the peace and tranquility of Europe, and to form a Barrier in the Netherlands for the security of the United Provinces; to which end this treaty might seem to be made at a very critical juncture, though by the treachery of the French it had another effect, they having very different designs which they clandestinely carried on; and while they were amusing King William with the Partition Treaty, were labouring by all manner of means to pave the way to the Spanish throne for a Prince of the House of Bourbon; for which purpose they procured a Will from the dying King, signed the 2d of October, N. S. whereby he constituted the Duke of Anjou, second son to the Dauphin, his universal heir, in default of issue, and made other provisions for continuing the succession. This memorable Will was the contrivance of the Marquis d' Harcourt, and Cardinal Portecarrero, and the King survived it but barely a month, dying on the 1st of November. The French King seemed at first doubtful whether to accept this Will, or observe the Treaty of Partition; but this was only a feint, for he did not long waver in his resolution. On the 16th of November the Duke of Anjou was declared King of Spain at the French Court, and proclaimed at Madrid on the 24th of the same month, notwithstanding the Pope and the Emperor protested against this step; and the English and Dutch Ministers likewise represented, that it was not agreeable to the Treaty of Partition so lately signed. Thus was the design of the Partition Treaty entirely defeated, and that which was intended to preserve the publick tranquillity, was now censured as the sole occasion of breaking it. The Parliament began to shew their disapprobation of it, and the secrecy with which it was transacted. The House of Peers, March 20, 1700, in an address, represented to his Majesty the ill consequence of it to the

(47) Hist. of Europe, anno 1698.
Compleat History, &c.

(48) Prior's Ne-
gociations, p. 57.

the other favourite, Lord Albemarle, by the House of Commons, when the affair of the disposal the peace and safety of Europe; for that, besides the occasion it might have given the late King of Spain to have made his Will in favour of the Duke of Anjou, if the treaty had taken effect, the prejudice to his Majesty and his subjects, and indeed to all Europe, by the addition of Sicily, Naples, several parts of the Mediterranean, duchy of Lorraine, &c. had been not only very great, but contrary to the pretence of the treaty itself, which was to prevent any umbrage that might have been taken, by uniting so many States and Dominions under one head: That this treaty was never considered in any of his Majesty's councils, and therefore they beseeched his Majesty, that he would for the future be pleased to admit, in all matters of importance, the advice of his natural born subjects, whose known probity and fortunes might make him and his people a just assurance of their fidelity to his service; and that in order thereto, he would be pleased to constitute a council of such persons, to whom his Majesty might be pleased to impart all affairs, both at home and abroad, which might any ways concern him and his dominions; for interest and natural affection for their country would incline them to wish the welfare and prosperity of it, much more than others who had no such ties upon them, and their experience and knowledge of their country, would also render them more capable, than strangers, of advising his Majesty in the true interest of it, &c. It is pretty plain against whom this address was designed. The Commons likewise addressed his Majesty against the treaty, and censured the negotiating it without the advice of the Parliament or Privy-Council. As things now seemed advancing to a crisis, and the Lord Portland seeing himself so visibly struck at in the Lord's address, and fearing the impending storm might fall too heavy on him, got the King's leave to communicate the whole matter to the House (49), where, being soon after charged with negotiating the said treaty, his Lordship said in his excuse, that he had not concluded the treaty alone, for besides Lord Jersey, who was joined with him in the negotiation, he had likewise, by the King's order, acquainted six of his chief Ministers with it, who were the Earls of Pembroke, and Marlborough; the Lords, Somers, Londale, Halifax, and Orford; and Secretary Vernon; to which those Peers replied, that they did acknowledge they had seen the rough draught of the treaty, but that the Earl of Portland had drawn it up himself in French, and they had never given nor refused their consent to it, because the treaty was never communicated to the Privy-Council. Many warm speeches were made upon this occasion, reflecting upon the Court; and the House of Commons were so angry, and their debates ran so high, that more than one of their Members broke in upon common decency and good manners. Mr How particularly said, the Partition Treaty was a felonious treaty, and compared it to the distribution of other mens goods among highwaymen. At length, April the 1st, they came to a resolution, 'That William Earl of Portland, by negotiating and concluding the Treaty of Partition, which was destructive to the trade of this kingdom, and dangerous to the peace of Europe, was guilty, and should be impeached of high crimes and misdemeanors; and they ordered Sir John Levison Gower to go up to the Lords, and at their bar to impeach the said Earl, and to acquaint their Lordships, that they would in due time exhibit articles against him. They then desired a conference with their Lordships, at which they desired their Lordships to communicate to them, what information they had received of any transactions relating to the Partition Treaty, particularly of some transactions between Lord Portland, and Mr Secretary Vernon: Whereupon their Lordships delivered to them the two Latin commissions of powers, granted to the Earls of Portland and Jersey, for negotiating the said treaties; and also a private paper of the Lord Portland's, which he had given in himself to the House, and which shews that it was with some reluctance his Lordship engaged in this troublesome affair. It runs thus. 'At the beginning of the summer of the year 1699, when I was in Holland at my country-house, and when the King would have me be concerned in the negotiation of this treaty, being very unwilling to meddle with business again, from which I had retired; before I would engage myself, I advised with my friends in Holland, and writ into England to Mr Secretary Vernon, as my particular friend, whether it was advisable for me to engage in business again? To which Mr Vernon answered in substance, that this would engage me but for a little while; that I being upon the place, and generally acquainted with the foreign Ministers, it would be easier for the King, and proper for me to be employed in it than any body else, who must otherwise be sent for on purpose.' The Commons then proceeded to impeach the Lords Orford, Somers, and Halifax; and, not content with this step, on the 23d of April they addressed his Majesty to remove the Earl of Portland, and the other impeached Lords from his councils and presence for ever. His Majesty could not but be very uneasy at this severe dealing with his Counsellors and Ministers; when he knew the error, if any, was only an error of judgment, and that rather of his own, than of those employed by him. But by the courtesy of England our Kings are understood to do nothing but by advice, and consequently their Ministers are supposed to be answerable for their misdeeds. The King kept his temper, and only answered, that he would employ none in his service, but such as should be thought most likely to improve a mutual trust and confidence between him and his Parliament. But as the names of those Lords still remained in the council, it might be judged the King did not intend to grant their request. Such an address had never gone along with an impeachment before; the Commons indeed had begun such a practice in King Charles the Second's time (50), where they disliked a Minister, but had not matter to ground an impeachment on, and so took this method of making an address against him; but to come with an address after an impeachment, was a new attempt; this was punishing before trial, contrary to an indispensable rule of justice, of not judging before the party is heard. The Peers of England behaved with great prudence and good affection at this critical juncture; they were alarmed at the address of the Commons, and looked upon it to be an ill precedent for persons to be censured before they were tried; besides, that it made their judicature ridiculous, when in the first instance of an accusation, application was made for a censure, and a very severe one, for few misdemeanors could deserve a harder sentence. (51). For this reason the Lords thought proper to interpose with this counter-address to the King; that the Commons having impeached the Lords Portland, &c. and designed to exhibit particular articles against them, and make good the same, they desired his Majesty would be pleased not to pass any censure upon those Lords, till they were tried upon the said impeachments, and judgment was given according to the usage of Parliament, and the laws of the land. Thus matters rested till the 5th of May, when the Commons not having given in articles of impeachment against the Lords, the House of Peers began to think that their Members had been impeached by the Commons, without a serious intention of prosecuting the charge against them; they therefore sent a message to the Commons, to remind them, that there were yet no articles preferred against the impeached Lords; this extorted from them articles against Lord Orford; and soon after against Lord Somers; and on the 24th of the same month, the Lords sent another quickening message to the Commons, and after that another; representing to them, that after impeachments had so long depended, it was a hardship to the persons concerned, and not agreeable to the usual methods of Parliaments in such cases, and pressed them to make good their impeachments against Lord Portland and Halifax. This occasioned a breach between the two Houses, the Commons insisting upon it, that they, as prosecutors, were proper judges when articles of impeachment ought to be brought up, and would not proceed faster than they thought fit. But the truth is, the Commons being defective in their proofs (52), were not forward to prosecute this accusation, and the majority of them began to wish they had never entered upon this untoward affair. In short, they found their impeachments must come to nothing, for that they had not the majority in the House of Lords to judge in them as they should direct; and therefore they had before resolved on a shorter way to fix a severe censure on the impeached Lords, by addressing

(49) Burnet, Vol. II. p. 267.

(50) Burnet, Vol. I. p. 259.

(51) Ibid.

(52) Burnet, Vol. II. p. 267.

disposal of the forfeited estates in Ireland was under their consideration. It appearing upon enquiry, that the King had, among many other grants, made one to Lord Woodstock, (the Earl of Portland's son) of 135,820 acres of land; and to Lord Albemarle two grants, of 108,633 acres in possession and reversion; the Parliament came to a resolution to resume these grants; and also resolved, that the advising and passing them was highly reflecting on the King's honour, and that the officers and instruments concerned in the procuring and passing those grants, had highly failed in the performance of their trust and duty; and also, that the procuring or passing exorbitant grants, by any member now of the Privy-Council, or by any other that had been a Privy-Counsellor, in this, or any former reign, to his use or benefit, was a high crime and misdemeanor, and to carry their resentment still farther, the Commons fell immediately upon impeaching, as we learn from a letter wrote by Mr Prior to the Earl of Manchester (a), and that the persons they named were the Earls of Portland and Albemarle, and the articles upon which they were going, were for procuring for themselves exorbitant grants (b). This impeachment, however, did not take place, but the Commons voted an address to his Majesty, that no person who was not a native of his dominions, except his Royal Highness Prince George of Denmark, should be admitted to his Majesty's Councils in England or Ireland. This blow, it is easy to see, was aimed chiefly at the two favourites, Lord Portland and Albemarle; but the King, not thinking it proper to receive such an address, had no other way to hinder it's being presented, but by going suddenly to the House of Lords, passing the bills that were ready, and putting an end to the session, which his Majesty did the very next day. The Partition Treaty was the last publick transaction we find Lord Portland engaged in; the next year after his impeachment, 1701, having put a period to the life of his royal and munificent master, King William III; but not without having shewn, even in his last moments, that his esteem and affection for Lord Portland ended but with his life, for when his Majesty was just expiring, he asked, though with a faint voice, for the Earl of Portland, but before his Lordship could come, the King's voice quite failed him; the Earl, however, placing his ear as near his Majesty's mouth as could be, his lips were observed to move, but without strength to express his mind to his Lordship; but, as the last testimony of the cordial affection he bore him, he took him by the hand, and carried it to his heart with great tenderness (c), and expired soon after. His Lordship had before been a witness to, and signed his Majesty's last Will and Testament, made at the Hague in 1695; and it is said (d), that King William, the winter before he died, told Lord Portland, as they were walking together in the garden at Hampton-Court, that he found his health declining very fast, and that he could not

(a) Extant in Mr Prior's Negotiations, p. 171.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Burnet's History of his own Times, Vol. II. p. 303.

(d) Life of King William, Vol. III. Compleat Hist. Vol. III. p. 839. Hist. of Europe, Anno 1709.

addressing to have them removed from the King's councils for ever; and their impeachments were only for form sake, and to give a colour to that address, for they really intended to let the matter sleep, thinking that what they had already done had so marked those Lords, that the King could not employ them any more, which was the chief end of their proceedings. At a conference between the two Houses, the Lord Haverham having cast some reflections upon the Commons impeachments, they now made this a plea for their delay, refusing to proceed till they had received satisfaction for the affront offered by that Lord, which was no more than his having said, that it was a plain demonstration, that the Commons thought these Lords innocent, since there were several Lords equally guilty, whom the Commons left at the head of affairs near the King's person, to do what mischief they were inclined to. The Commons having sent up a charge against Lord Haverham for this speech, that Lord in his answer thereto, justified what he had said, and further insisted, that the impeachment against Lord Portland could not have reference to any other treaty than that of 1699, the treaty of 1698 not being before the House of Commons till after the impeachment, and that the Commons had shewn themselves partial, and even unjust, in proceeding against the impeached Lords, while they suffered the Earl of Jersey, who actually signed the said treaty of 1699, as a Plenipotentiary with the Lord Portland, to stand unimpeached, and to continue at the head of affairs, as likewise Mr Secretary Vernon, Sir Joseph Williamson, &c. who were engaged in the same transactions. The Commons having exhibited articles against Lord Halifax (but none against Lord Portland) the Peers sent another message, to put them in mind of their impeachment against Lord Portland; and finding they would not proceed to try the other impeached Lords, the Peers themselves resolved to try them, which they did, and acquitted them, and also dismissed the charge against Lord Haverham, and the impeachment against Lord Portland, there having been no articles exhibited against him.

(53) Ibid. p. 274. Bishop Burnet says (53), that the forbearance of the Commons to frame articles against Lord Portland was represented to the King as an expression of their respect to him, which, if true, shews that Lord Portland was yet in great favour with his Majesty. The arbitrary, and indeed, unjust proceedings of the Commons, put the nation into a high ferment, the generality of people disliking their behaviour, a bold testimony of which was given in the Kentish petition delivered to the House of Commons; and, after that, a still more daring affront was offered them by the famous Memorial, called by the name of the Legions Letter, said to be wrote in the names of 200,000 people. This consisted of complaints of a great number of unlawful and unwarrantable practices of the Commons, and among the rest were these following, which may serve to shew the sense of the people in general upon the late measures.

I. ' Addressing the King to displace his friends upon bare surmises, before the legal trial, or article proved, is illegal, and inverting the Law, and making execution go before judgment, contrary to the true sense of the Law, which esteems every man a good man, till something appears to the contrary.

II. ' Delaying proceedings upon capital impeachments, to blast the reputation of the persons without proving the fact, is illegal and oppressive, destructive to the liberty of Englishmen, a delay of justice, and a reproach to Parliaments.

III. ' Suffering faucy and indecent reproaches upon his Majesty's person to be publicly made in the House, particularly by that impudent scandal of Parliaments, John How, who said openly, That his Majesty had made a felonious treaty to rob his neighbours; insinuating, that the Partition Treaty (which was every way as just as blowing up one man's house to save another's) was a combination of the King to rob the Crown of Spain of it's due. This is making a Billingsgate of the House, and setting up to bully your Sovereign, contrary to the intent and meaning of the freedom of speech which you claim as a right, is scandalous to Parliaments, undutiful and unmannerly, and a reproach to the whole nation.'

There

live another summer, but charged his Lordship not to mention this 'till after his Majesty's death. We are told (e), that at the time of the King's death, Lord Portland was Keeper of Windsor, great Park, and was displaced upon Queen Anne's accession to the throne; we are not, however, made acquainted with the time, when his Lordship became first possessed of that post. After King William's death, the Earl did not, at least openly, concern himself with publick affairs (f), but betook himself to a retired life, in a most exemplary way, at his seat at Bulstrode in the county of Bucks, where he erected, and plentifully endowed, a free-school; and did many other charities. His Lordship had an admirable taste for gardening, and took great delight in improving and beautifying his own gardens, which he made very elegant and curious. At length, being taken ill of a pleurisy and malignant fever, after about a week's illness he died (g), November 23, 1709, in the sixty-first year of his age, leaving behind him a very plentiful fortune, being at that time reputed the richest subject in Europe (h). His corpse being conveyed to London, was, on the third of December, carried with great funeral pomp, from his house in St James's square to Westminster-Abbey, and there interred in the vault under the east window of Henry the VIIIth's chapel. His Lordship married (i) to his first wife, Anne, daughter of Sir Edward Villiers, Knight-Marshal, and sister to Edward-Earl of Jersey, at that time Maid of Honour to Mary, Princess of Orange, the Royal Consort of King William III, by whom he had issue three sons and five daughters, viz. William, who died in his infancy; Henry, second son, afterwards Earl and Duke of Portland; and another William, who died young in Holland (k). Lady Mary, the eldest daughter, married to Algernoon, Earl of Essex, and since his decease, to the Honourable Conyers d'Arcy, Esq; only brother to Robert, late Earl of Holderness. Lady Anna Margareta, the second daughter, married to M. Duyvenorde, one of the principal Nobles of Holland (l). Lady Frances Williamyna, third daughter, married to William, Lord Byron, and died March 31, 1712. Lady Eleanora, fourth daughter, died unmarried. Lady Isabella, youngest daughter, married to Evelyn Pierpoint, Duke of Kingston, and died February 23, 1727-8 (m). His Lordship, on the sixteenth of May 1700, took to his second wife, Jane (n), sixth daughter of Sir John Temple, of East-Sheen in the county of Surrey, Bart. sister to Henry, Lord Viscount Palmerston, and widow of John Lord Berkeley of Stratton; and by her (who, in 1726, was Governess to the three young Princesses, eldest daughters of his present Majesty) had two sons (o), William, one of the Nobles of Holland, who, in 1733, married Charlotta-Sophia-Hedwige-Eleonora, Countess of Aldenburgh, only daughter to Anthony, Count Aldenburgh, Seigneur de Varel, Kniphausen, &c. in Germany; and Charles-John, an officer in the service of the States-General; as also four daughters (p). Lady Sophia, married March 24, 1728-9, to his Grace Henry de Grey, Duke of Kent. Lady Elizabeth, married to Dr Henry Egerton, Bishop of Hereford, Brother to his Grace Scroop Duke of Bridgewater (q). Lady Harriot, married to James Hamilton, Viscount Limerick of the kingdom of Ireland (r). Lady Barbara unmarried.

(e) Mackey's Characters of the English & Scotch Nobility, p. 62.

(f) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 311.

(g) Ibid.

(h) Mackey's Memoirs, p. 62.

(i) Peerage of England, supra.

(k) Ibid.

(l) Ibid.

(m) Ibid.

(n) Ibid.

(o) Ibid.

(p) Ibid.

(q) Ibid.

(r) Ibid.

(53) Discourse of the Contents in Athens and Rome.

There appeared about this time a pamphlet (53), supposed to be wrote by Dean Swift, upon the subject of those impeachments; in which there are these reflections. 'For a few popular orators, says he, upon the score of personal pique, or to employ their pride in seeing themselves at the head of a party, or as a method of advancement; for such men, I say, when the State would of itself be quiet, and has besides affairs of the greatest importance upon the anvil, to impeach Miltiades (Lord Orford) after a great naval victory, (La Hogue) for not pursuing the Persian fleet; to impeach Aristides (Lord Somers) the person most versed among them in the knowledge and practice of their laws, for a blind suspicion of his acting in an arbitrary manner; to impeach Pericles after all his services (Lord Halifax) for a few paltry accounts; or to impeach Phocion (Lord Portland) for no other crime but negotiating a treaty for the peace and security of his country; what could the continuance of such proceedings end in, but the utter discouragement of all virtuous actions and persons, and consequently the ruin of a State?' It was certainly an impolitick thing in the Parliament to put such an affront upon King William's councils, at a time when they ought in a more especial manner to have supported the credit and authority of them, since he must necessarily be at the head of the next confederacy that appeared, as he was at the last; and when the retrospecting the affair of the Partition Treaty could be of no service to the common cause, but was sure to obstruct and weaken it. But it seems pretty plain, that this affair was set on foot purely by a spirit of party and personal pique against those Lords (*), since the others equally concerned with them were not questioned. There are few prosecutions of this kind, but there is a great deal of private pique, interest, and resentment, mixed with views of publick good. The impeached Lords were the Chiefs of the Whigs, and had long reigned at Court without controul; and the Tories who succeeded them, had a view perhaps of preventing them from returning to their posts, as well as of bringing them to justice for negotiating the Partition Treaty. Bishop Burnet says (54), it was the effect of the influence and intrigues of France, which had set all it's engines at work to involve us into such difficulties and contentions at home, as should wholly take off our attention from affairs abroad; or, however, if it was not the effect of French direction, it was at least the animosity of a party, to ruin those who had served the King faithfully (55), and to discourage others from engaging so far in his interests as those Lords had done. See the articles SOMERS (Lord Somers), RUSSELL (Earl of Orford), and MOUNTAGUE (Earl of Halifax).

(*) Hist. of the Revolutions of Spain, 8vo. Vol. V. p. 270.

(54) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. II. p. 274.

(55) Hist. of the Revolutions of Spain, 8vo. Vol. V. p. 269, 270.

(*) See the above article.

(a) Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 312.

BENTINCK (HENRY) second son of (*) William Earl of Portland, whilst he was a Commoner, was elected, in two Parliaments (a), in the reign of Queen Anne, one of the Knights of the shire for the county of Southampton; and on the twenty-first of July, 1710, was made Captain of the first troop of horse-guards, in the room of the Earl of Albemarle. He was created by his late Majesty, Marquis of Tichfield in Hampshire, and Duke of Portland, by letters patent, bearing date the sixteenth of July, 1716, in whose patent of creation there are these remarkable expressions, which shew the just sense his late Majesty had, of the traitorous designs of the Ministers, in the last year of the Queen, against the Protestant succession, and the liberties of our country; where, speaking of Lord Portland, then created a Duke, it is said, 'he promoted the great work of the succession in the Protestant line, at the utmost hazard of his fortune and honours, at a time when our succession was in the most imminent danger: he stood firm against all the promises and repeated offers of a Court, and frequently declared, how ready he was to resign his high post in the late Queen's guards; which he at length was deprived of in an extraordinary manner, as apprehending, lest, by the specious suggestions of gratitude, he should be prompted to enter into measures, which might have a tendency to betray the liberties of his country (b).' When the King went to Cambridge in 1717, and the ceremony of admitting and creating several degrees, was, according to custom, performed in his royal presence, his Grace the Duke of Portland was created Doctor of Laws. His Grace was also one of the Gentlemen of the late King's Bedchamber; and on the ninth of September, 1721, was appointed Captain-General, and Governor of the island of Jamaica, where his Grace departed this life, of a fever, on the fourth of July, 1726, in the forty-fifth year of his age, greatly lamented, being of a most noble, generous, and courteous disposition, and was generally esteemed one of the most accomplished Noblemen at Court (c); and there was this remarkable in his Grace's education, that he had for his tutors the two greatest Historians of the age, Dr La Vassor, a Father of the Oratory in France, who embraced the Protestant Religion, and left that kingdom upon it; and after him M. Rapin de Thoyras, author of the History of England (d) [A]. The success of their cares, appeared in his Grace's excellent conduct in the government of Jamaica. His Grace married the Lady Elizabeth Noel (e), eldest daughter and co-heir of Writhiothesly Baptist Noel, Earl of Gainborough, by whom he had several children, and left issue two sons and three daughters; William, now Duke of Portland, and Lord George, now an officer in his Majesty's service, and to whom the late King was godfather, and was born December 27, 1715; Lady Anne, Lady Isabella, and Lady Amelia. His Grace was succeeded by his eldest son William, now Duke of Portland, who after three years travel in France and Italy, returned to England in the year 1733 (f).

(b) Oldmixon's Hist. of England, Vol. 11. p. 620.

(c) Oldmixon, ubi supra.

(d) Preface to Rapin's History of England.

(e) Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 312, 313.

(f) Ibid.

[A] And after him Monsieur Rapin de Thoyras, author of the History of England] In the Life of Monsieur Rapin, inserted in the preface to his History of England, it is said, that in 1693 the Earl of Portland, who had heard of M. Rapin's character, resolved to make him Governor to his son (the late Duke of Portland): Accordingly, when M. de Rapin thought nothing of the matter, he received in Ireland, where he then was, an order from the King to repair forthwith into England, and enter upon his employ of Governor; and his Majesty gave him a pension of 100*l.* a year, 'till such time as he should provide for him better, which however never happened, and he enjoyed his pension only during the King's life, after which it was taken from him, and in lieu of it he had a place given him of a moderate income (1).

(1) Preface to Rapin's Hist. of England.

BENTLEY (RICHARD) Doctor, and Regius Professor of Divinity, and late Master of Trinity-College, Cambridge; a great and extraordinary critic, as any the last age has produc'd [A], was, we find, by birth, a Yorkshire man (a), and son (as I have been informed) of ——— Bentley, a tradesman, viz. either a Tanner, or a Blacksmith, at Wakefield, in the West Riding of Yorkshire. He was born in the year 1662;

(a) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. 11. p. 903.

[A] A great and extraordinary critic as any the last age has produced.] In vindication of this assertion, it may not be improper here to refer to a few of those distinguishing appellations the commonwealth of Letters have been in their books pleased to bestow upon him, and few or none but himself. See Spanheim's Callimachus, and Julian; Grævius's Callimachus, his Alberti Rubenii Dissertatio, dedicated to Dr Bentley (*); Albertus Fabricius, his Marinus's Vita Procli, dedicated to Dr Bentley; Bibliotheca Græca; Mr Wolfius's Dissertatio de Manichæismo hujus ævi; his Origen's Philosophemena Olearius Philestratus, Gr. Lat. Hemsterhusius's Pollux, Gr. Lat. &c. Our own countrymen, Dr Potter in his Lycophron; Mr Needham in his Hierocles, Mr Davis in his Tusculanæ Questiones, &c. However, we may venture to speak the sense of all these from a learned author, whose name is particularly revered, and is sufficiently known to all that are not entire strangers to the Republic of Letters, who, besides the general epithets of Eruditissimus, Præstantissimus, Illustris perspicacissimus, Clarissimus, ΠΟΛΥΜΑΘΗΣΑΤΟΣ, &c. &c. (1) has these peculiar expressions concerning him, Vir supra captum sæculi sui Doctus: Vir egregius et maximum literarum decus: magnum hodie literarum decus et incrementum: incomparabile auctoritatis sui judicium et acumen, &c. And in the same work the most learned and incomparable Spanhemius, the King of Prussia's Ambassador to her Majesty, thus styles Dr Bentley, Vir insigni et reconditâ doctrinâ: Vir consummatissimâ eruditione; magnum hodie literarum ac eruditæ Britannicæ decus: Vir ut exquisitæ doctrinæ et reconditis literis, ita sagacitate incredibili, &c. — The decisive words of that transcendent critical genius of our age, Dr Bentley, is also applied to him by a person of no final note (2), the great Dr Clarke, who was himself so excellent a critic, and consequently an unexceptionable judge thereof, in the following words gives this opinion of the learned Dr Bentley: Criticus unus omnes longè, longèq̃ — antecellens (3), which compliment is still greatly heightened by the learned and ingenious Dr Hoadley, Bishop of Winchester, who, after repeating them, says, and whom every one will know by that title, without my naming him (4). But we shall stop here, and proceed no farther in this affair: for, were we to gather together all the encomiums bestowed upon this great man and his works by the learned world, both at home and abroad, we should greatly transgress upon the bounds of our undertaking, and the patience of our readers. We have, we imagine, (if there are any who can be so ignorant as to be unacquainted with, or so envious as to doubt of, or deny, the great abilities and profound erudition of this ornament and honour to the English nation) produced sufficient certificates and testimonies for the point we labour to prove.

(*) Spanheim in Julian, p. 19. in Callimachus, p. 455. Ibid., p. 605. Grævii Pref. ad Callim. & Rubenii Dissertatio. See note [B] (7).

(1) Dr Kuster's edition of Aristophanes.

(2) Emlyn's Tracts, p. 78.

(3) Dr Clarke's Preface to his edition of Cæsar's Commentaries, 1712.

(4) The Preface to Dr Clarke's Works, with an Account of the Life and Writings of the author, by Benjamin, Lord Bishop of Salisbury, 1730.

1662; but in what school he laid the foundation, or first rudiments for that stock, he afterwards acquired, of profound learning, or who was the Preceptor, and afterwards Tutor of this great man, with some other circumstances, we have not been able to find, from want of an intimacy with some of his family, or any of his particular acquaintance. Having, at a very early age, made a surprizing progress and uncommon proficiency in the learned languages; his inclination towards, and great capacity for, critical learning, soon began to display itself; for before the age of twenty-four, he had wrote with his own hand a sort of Hexapla, a thick volume in quarto, in the first column of which was every word of the Hebrew Bible, alphabetically disposed, and in five other columns, all the various interpretations of those words, in the Chaldee, Syriac, Vulgate Latin, Septuagint, and Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodosian, that occur in the whole Bible; this he made for his own private use, to know the Hebrew, not from the late Rabbins, but the antient version, when, bating Arabic, Persic, and Ethiopic, he must then have read over the whole Polyglott. He had also at that time, made for his own private use, another volume in quarto, of the various lections and emendations of the Hebrew text, drawn out of those antient versions, which, though done in those green years, would have made a second part to the famous Capellus's Critica Sacra (b). July 4, 1689, we find him of St John's college, Cambridge, where he had then taken his Master of Arts degree, being that day incorporated into the university of Oxford, in Wadham-college, as such, and mentioned by Anthony Wood (though then but a young man, a good deal under thirty) as a genius that was promising, and to whom the world was likely to be obliged, for his future studies and productions (c). Some time after that, he was made domestic Chaplain to the Right Reverend Edward Lord Bishop of Worcester (*) (d). In the year 1691 [B], he published a Latin Epistle to John Mill, D. D. containing some critical observations relating to Johannes Malala, Greek Historiographer, published at the end of that author at Oxon. in 1691, in a large octavo, which was the first piece that our author published.—Nor was religion less indebted to him than learning; for much about this time, he had the honour to be selected out, and pitched upon, as the first person to preach at Boyle's Lectures (e) [C], (founded by that

(b) Dr Bentley's Proposals, for printing a new edition of the Greek Testament, and St Hierom's Latin Version, with a full Answer to all the Remarks of a late Pamphleteer; by a Member of Trinity-college, Camb. subscribed J. E. 1721, p. 79.

(c) Wood's Fasti, ut supra.

(*) To whose son he had for some time been private Tutor, and in whose family he tells us he spent fourteen years.

(d) Wood's Fasti, ibid.

(e) Bentley's Sermons at Boyle's Lectures, fol. Vol. I. Lond. 1739.

[B] In 1691, he published his Epistle to Dr Mill. Malala's Chronicon is now finished, and will be published in a few days. We owe the edition of this manuscript, taken out of the Bodleian library, to Mr Hody of Wadham-college, and Mr Bentley, Chaplain to the Lord Bishop of Worcester (5). Though this book bears the date of 1691, it was not published, as we find by the preceding and following quotations, 'till February 1692. The title of the whole runs thus. Johannis Antiocheni Cognomento Malalæ Historia Chronica & Msi Cod. Bibliothecæ Bodleianæ, nunc primum edita cum interp. et notis Edm. Chilmeadi et triplice indice rerum, autorum et vocum barbararum. Præmittitur dissertatio de autore, per Humsfredum Hodium, S. T. B. Coll. Wadhani Socium. Accedit Epistola Richardi Bentleii ad Cl. V. Jo Millium, S. T. P. cum indice scriptorum, qui ibi emendantur 8vo. Oxonii E theatro Sheldoniano 1691. Mr Bentley's remarks in the letter to the Rev. Dr Mill are worthy to be taken notice of, as they correct a great number of passages of the ancient Poets, and other Greek authors, which by Malala are quoted very negligently; occasionally also correcting several passages from authors not quoted by Malala; in both which corrections the ingenious author is, for the most part, peculiarly happy (*).

It will not be improper to insert, in this place, the opinion of the learned Grævius on this Epistle, in answer to some faults found with it by Mr Boyle, or at least his party, as that it was a confused rhapsody, &c. (6). But as we shall have farther use for the whole passage, we will here transcribe it all, and refer to it as occasion serves (7). Nec manes tantum Rubenii sed omnes humanitatis cultores tibi pro hoc in se merito devinxisti. Hi nunc tuas curas in Maniliu, He-sychium, aliosque scriptores desiderant, et expectant cupide. Nam eruditissima illa Epistola, quam sub-textuisti Malalæ Chronicis, tam multa recondita nos docuit, ut incredibilem expectationem tui ingenii commoverit. Nihil nobis longius est, nihil desideratius, quam ut illa videamus, quorum spem fecisti cum publice omnibus, tum mihi de tuis in Callimæcho animadversionibus, quarum pulcherrimum specimen mihi misisti, &c. i. e. that not only the ashes of Rubenius, but all lovers of polite learning, were deservedly beholden to you for retrieving the MS. and that they were in great expectations of, and longed to have your labours in MANILIUS, HESYCHIUS, and other authors; for that most learned Epistle, joined to the Chronology of Malala, has shewn us such a stock of profound learning and discoveries, as has given us incredible expectations from your genius. Nothing is more desired or wished for by us, than to see your remarks and animadversions upon Callimachus, of which you sent me a delightful specimen, as we have reason to hope made publick to all as well as me. — This Epistle to Dr Mill, was wrote and published, by the express desire of the Right Rev. the Bishop of Lichfield (†).

[C] He was selected out, and pitched upon, for the first person to preach at Boyle's Lectures. He was chosen into this honourable office, March 17, 1692, by the Trustees of the Hon. Robert Boyle, by Will appointed for that purpose, viz. the Right Rev. Father in God, Thomas, Lord Bishop of Lincoln; Sir Henry Ashurst, Bart. Sir John Rotheram, Serjeant at Law; and John Evelyn, Esq; (*). His I. sermon, the Folly of Atheism, &c. was preached in the church of St Martin's in the Fields, March 7, 1691-2, on Psalm xiv. 1. The II. lecture or sermon was, That Matter and Motion cannot think, &c. preached at St Mary le Bow, April 4, 1692, on Acts xvii. 27. The III. A Confutation of Atheism, from the structure and origin of Human Bodies, was preached at St Mary le Bow, May 2, 1692, on the same text. IV. Was preached on the same text, June 6, 1692. V. On the same text, was preached September 5, 1692. VI. Was a Confutation of Atheism, from the origin and frame of the world, preached October 3, 1692, on Acts xiv. 15, &c. VII. On the same text, November 7, 1692. And the VIII. and last on the same subject and text, December 5, 1692. These eight sermons were, as in the text, published by particular desire, in quarto, in 1693-4. Lond. and are deservedly esteemed and ranked among the best of those performances. Mr Molyneux, and Mr Locke, in their Letters concerning the reception of his Essay on the Human Understanding, mention Mr Bentley's name and these sermons with no small respect and deference (8). But that your doctrine should be so soon heard out of our pulpits, is what is much more remarkable; he that even ten years ago should have preached, that Idea Dei non est innata, that the idea of God is not innate, had certainly drawn on him the character of an Atheist; yet now we find Mr Bentley very large upon it in his sermons at Mr Boyle's Lecture, sermon I, p. 4, and sermon III. p. 5. — To which paragraph Mr Locke writes in return (9). 'However you are pleased to rejoice, that my notions have had the good luck to be vented from the pulpit, and particu-

(5) The Works of the Learned, for January, 1691-2.

(*) See an abstract of this whole work, and several instances of the usefulness of Mr Bentley's corrections, in The Works of the Learned, Febr. 1691-2.

(6) A short Account of Dr Bentley's Humanity, p. 78.

(7) See Grævius's Dedication to Dr Bentley, in the Life of Theodorus Manilius.

(†) Bentley against Boyle, Pref. p. lxxxviii.

(*) See his Pref. and his Sermons, printed. 1693-4.

(8) Mr Molyneux to Mr Locke, Dublin, Sept. 26, 1696.

(9) Mr Locke to Mr Molyneux, 22 Feb. 1696-7.

honourable gentleman, to assert and vindicate the great fundamentals of Natural and Revealed Religion) where he successfully applied Sir Isaac Newton's Principia Mathematica, to demonstrate the being of God, and altogether silenced the Atheists, who have ever since that time sheltered themselves under Deism. The subject of his discourses was the folly of Atheism, even with respect to the present life, and that matter and motion cannot think; or a confutation of Atheism from the faculties of the soul, from the structure and origin of human bodies, and the origin and frame of the world itself; and though but young, and even only in Deacon's Orders when called to this honour, laid the basis and foundation upon which all the successors to that worthy office have since built, making his lectures their standard. And we may, without flattery, apply to the Doctor, what is said of one of his successors in that office, viz. 'This was a province, for which, if ever any man was peculiarly fitted by natural parts and learning, he was the man, executing his trust in such a manner, that he at once surprized and instructed his most understanding hearers, exceeding the expectations of those, who knew him enough to expect great things from him, and laid the foundations of true religion too deep and strong to be shaken, either by the superstition of some, or infidelity of others (f).' Though a task of great extent, and no small difficulty, yet he so well answered the religious and generous design of the excellent founder, and acquitted himself with so much reputation, that the trustees not only publicly thanked him for them, but did moreover, by especial command and desire, prevail upon him to make the said discourses publick (g); upon which he gave the world a volume containing eight Sermons, which have not only undergone a number of editions, but have been translated abroad into several languages. Upon the death of Mr Justel, the Doctor was immediately thought upon to succeed him, as Keeper of the Royal Library at St James's, and accordingly, a few months after his decease, had a warrant made out for that place, from the Secretary's office, Dec. 23, 1693, and had his patent for the same in April following; and soon after he was nominated to that office, before his patent was signed, by his care and diligence, procured no less than a thousand volumes of one sort or other, which had been neglected to be brought to the library according to the Act of Parliament, which prescribes, that one copy of every book printed in England, should be brought and lodged in this library, and one in each university library.—It was about this time, and upon this occasion, of his being made Library-Keeper, that the famous dispute between him and the honourable Mr Boyle, whether the Epistles of Phalaris were genuine or not, in some measure, at first took rise, which gave occasion to so many books and pamphlets, and has made so much noise in the world. We shall endeavour to give the reader as intelligible and full an account of the motives and rise of this dispute, as our present scope will allow, in note [D]. This controversy upon a point of learning, in itself

(f) Hoadley's Preface to Dr Clarke's Works, and account of his Life & Writings.

(g) His Preface, to the above.

(10) Mr Molyneux to Mr Locke, March 16, 1696-7.

(*) Boyle against Bentley, p. 2.

(11) But in the Epistles of Phalaris examined; the Doctor proves he had it in a month after he was Library-Keeper, and offered voluntarily, p. xviii, also 66. and says he informed him how soon he should want it, p. xxi. and 66.

(12) The Doctor denies ever hearing the collation was not perfected, p. 66. affirming, that the whole MS. would not take up above four hours collating, p. xxvi.

(13) Boyle against Bentley, p. 3.

early by Mr Bentley, yet matters go not so clear as you imagine, for a man of no small name, as you know Dr Sherlock is, has been pleased to declare against my doctrine of no Innate Ideas, from the pulpit of the Temple, and charged it with little less than Atheism. To which Mr Molyneux answers (10), 'Both Mr Whiston and Bentley are positive against the Idea of God's being innate; and I had rather rely on them (if I would rely on any man) than on Dr Sherlock. 'Tis true the latter has a great name, but that I am sure weighs not with you nor me.' Mr Bentley, as is observed in the text, was at that time but in Deacon's Orders.

[D] We shall endeavour to give the reader as intelligible and full an account, of the motives and rise of this dispute, as our present scope will allow.] Dr Aldrich, Dean of Christ-Church, desiring Mr Boyle to put out a new edition of Phalaris (*), he readily set about it; but wanting to consult a MS. Phalaris, in the King's library, sent to Mr Bennet, Bookseller in London, to get him the MS. by applying himself to Dr Bentley in his name. After earnest solicitations, and great delays (11), for many months, Mr Bennet at last got possession of the MS. who, imagining there was no great hurry to return it, did not immediately set the Collator to work upon it; but Dr Bentley being to go a journey into Worcestershire at that time for six months; about six days after the MS. had been delivered, called for it again, and would by no means be prevailed upon to let him have the use of it any longer, though he told him the collation was not perfected (12), and denied his request in a very rude manner (13), throwing out many slighting and disparaging expressions, both of Mr Boyle and the work. This is the case as told by Mr Bennet, Mr Boyle, &c. who thinking himself ill used, towards the end of his preface, where he is giving some account of the edition of Phalaris, and the MSS. consulted in it, added the following words: Collatas etiam (vid. Epi- stolas) curavi usque ad Epist. 40. Cum manuscripto in Bibliotheca Regia, cuius mihi copiam ulteriorem Bibliothecarius pro singulari sua humanitate negavit. I likewise gave orders (says he) to have the Epistles collated with the MS. in the King's library; but my collator was prevented from going beyond the fortieth Epistle, by the singular humanity of the Library-Keeper, who refused to let me have any further use of the MS (14). The Epistles being published, Dr Bentley sends a letter (as he says) the very day that he saw Mr Boyle's new Phalaris in the hands of a person of honour, to whom it had been presented, while the rest of the impression was not yet published, to Mr Boyle at Oxford, to give him a true information of the whole matter; wherein, as Mr Boyle acknowledges (15), having expressed himself with great civility, he represented the matter of fact quite otherwise than he had heard it, expecting, that upon the receipt of the letter, he would put a stop to the publication of the book, 'till he had altered that passage, and printed the page anew, which might have been done in one day at the expence of five shillings. He says he did not expressly desire Mr Boyle to take out that passage, and reprint the whole leaf, thinking that was too low a submission. To which letter Mr Boyle says he immediately returned a civil answer, to this effect,—that Mr Bennet, whom he had employed to wait upon the Doctor in his name, gave him such an account of his reception, that he had reason to apprehend himself affronted; and since he could make no other excuse to the reader for not collating the King's manuscript, but because it was denied him, he thought he could do no less than express some resentment for that denial; that he should be very much concerned if Mr Bennet had dealt so with him as to mislead him in his account, and if that appeared, should be ready to take some opportunity of begging his pardon, expressing himself (Mr Boyle says) in such a manner, that the Doctor might understand he meant to give him satisfaction as publickly as he had injured him.

(14) In the Pref. to Mr Boyle's edition of Phalaris.

(15) Bentley's Dissertation examined, p. 4.

itself as dry and insipid as could possibly be, was managed and interspersed on both sides, with an infinity of wit and humour, and was universally read and admired, as it justly deserved. The world was at that time a little biased in favour of the production of the young nobleman, at least as to the genteel raillery of his pieces, whether so much as to the real affair in hand, (*) viz. the genuineness of the Epistles of Phalaris, is not so easily determined; since the best judges almost universally now, (the prejudice of opinion being worn off) give it in that respect to Dr Bentley; nor does he much, if at all, fall short of Mr Boyle, in throwing a deal of life and spirit into the controversy, particularly in his answer to Mr Boyle, which is interspersed, as well as Mr Boyle's piece, with abundance of wit and humour: and is, upon the whole, reckoned much the best book. Having thus, in the text and note, given the reader some account of one of the important passages of Dr Bentley's life, or at least of a part of his works, that made a great noise in the learned world: we shall next regularly descend to give a catalogue of his works, as near as we are able, according to the date they first bore, or the years they were published in, and what remarks we may be able to gather upon each of them, we shall add by way of note. This is, we imagine, all that can be expected in the life of this eminent Critic, except what, part of his education, his preferments, and a few family affairs, will afford; as to the unhappy disagreement between his college and him, to render that, and the distinct account of him as a Critic, the clearer, we shall separate them, and first consider him with regard to his works and preferments, &c. and shall afterwards treat separately of his dispute with the college, with as much perspicuity, as so puzzled and intricate him. — Here the matter rested for two years and a half after the edition of Phalaris, when Dr Bentley, in an Appendix to Mr Wotton's Reflections on ancient and modern Learning, inserted his Dissertation on the Epistles of Themistocles, Socrates, Euripides, Phalaris, and the Fables of Æsop; asserting, that the Epistles which had been ascribed to Phalaris for so many years past, were spurious, and the production of some sophist; and partly in anger, for the sting in Mr Boyle's preface to them, falls foul with some warmth on Mr Boyle's new edition and version, saying he had foolishly busied himself about a contemptible and spurious author, and had made a bad book worse by a very ill edition of it, &c. &c. (16) and in part of the book justifies himself as to the affair of the MS. in the following words: A Bookseller came to me, in the name of the EDITORS, to beg the use of the manuscript; it was not then in my custody, but as soon as I had the power of it, I went voluntarily and offered it him, bidding him tell the Collator not to lose any time, for I was shortly to go out of town for two months; 'twas delivered, used, and returned; not a word said by the bearer, nor the least suspicion in me that they had not finished the collation. (17). Thus Dr Bentley puts the affair in a quite different light by his assertions, which are replied to, and that reply again answered, and so on, till the whole is so perplexed and confounded, that there is no judging of, or coming at, the truth and reality of the affair (18). We may, however, adjust these accounts, and bring their differences somewhat nearer to a balance, by considering the distance of time, viz. full three years from the beginning of this transaction to the end of the controversy, and the partiality with which each must naturally recall to his remembrance his own words, actions, and behaviour. As to the real affair, viz. the genuineness of the Epistles of Phalaris, it is of too great length for us to interfere at all in, or rehearse any part of the controversy; we shall only add here, as above in the text, that the Doctor is not now (whatever he might then be out of partiality to a young shining Nobleman) imagined to have the worst of the argument, or to have handled it without some merit and applause as to wit and humour; though Mr Boyle, as the humour and caprice of the age then ran, only received congratulations on this occasion. Thus Dr Garth in the Dispenary (19).

(*) Had Phalaris been the author of those ingenious Epistles which the Doctor has fully proved he has no title to, &c. An humble Address, and serious Representation of the Present State of Trinity-college, Cambridge, in a Letter to a noble Lord, p. 2. r. a well wrote piece, but with much warmth against Dr Bentley.

*So Diamonds take a lustre from their foil,
And to a BENTLEY 'tis we owe a BOYLE.*

The Doctor had also some wags who were his enemies even at Cambridge, who drew his picture in the hands of Phalaris's guards, who were putting him into their master's bull, and out of the Doctor's mouth came a label with these words, I had rather be ROASTED than BOILED (20). And Dean Swift, in his Tale of a Tub, has some strokes at Dr Bentley upon this occasion, but more especially in his Battle of the Books (21), where, on account of Dr Bentley's dissertation of Phalaris, &c. being annexed to Mr Wotton's Reflections on learning, and their being great friends, he makes Mr Wotton and Dr Bentley standing side by side, in each other's defence, to be both transixed to the ground by one stroke of the javelin of Mr Boyle, and this he heightens by the simile of a Cook's spitting a brace of woodcocks.

But to give a regular account of the proceedings of this debate, that is, of the books as printed — About 1694 Mr Boyle published his very fine edition of Phalaris, with the Greek text, translated in a nervous and classical Latin style.

About two Years and a half after this, in 1697, Dr Bentley published his Dissertation upon the Epistles of Themistocles, Socrates, Euripides, Phalaris, and the Fables of Æsop, at the end of the second edition of Mr Wotton's Reflections of Antient and Modern Learning; but in the third edition, in 1705, the Dissertation on Phalaris, being of considerable bulk, is omitted, because afterwards printed by Dr Bentley entire, and added with great additions to his further defence of it, in answer to Mr Boyle; but what concerned the Epistles of Themistocles, Socrates, Euripides, and the Fables of Æsop, being printed no where else, is reprinted in that and the other editions of Mr Wotton's book.

In 1698 came out Dr Bentley's Dissertations on the Epistles of Phalaris and the Fables of Æsop, examined by the Honourable Charles Boyle, Esq; a book more commonly known by the title of Boyle against Bentley. The publication of this book was hindered by Mr Boyle's business, which sent him into, and detained him in, Ireland, else he had answered Dr Bentley's Dissertation (22) sooner. The second edition of this book was published in 1742.

Then in 1699 followed Dr Bentley's Answer to the above, commonly known by the name of Bentley against Boyle, a curious piece, interspersed with a great deal of true wit and humour. This is at present a scarce book, and the curious have for some time expected it would be reprinted, as well as Mr Boyle's piece. These were the several pieces concerned in this great dispute, excepting some few that were published against the Doctor, hardly any of which have had the honour to come down to us even in this small period of time (*). There is one indeed of them which we have quoted, and shall quote again, therefore we shall give the title of it here, and conclude this note, which we have been obliged to stretch a little, to give a clear idea of the whole affair. — A short account of Dr Bentley's Humanity and Justice to those authors who have written before him, with an honest vindication of Thomas Stanley, Esq; and his notes on Callimachus. To which are added, some other Observations on that Poet, in a Letter to the Honourable Charles Boyle, Esq; with a Postscript, in relation to Dr Bentley's late look against him. To which is added, an Appendix, by the Bookseller; wherein the Doctor's misrepresentations of all the matters of fact, wherein he is concerned in his late book about Phalaris's Epistles, are modestly considered, with a Letter from the Honourable Charles Boyle on that Subject, 8vo. 1699. Lond.

(22) As he tells us in the Preface.

(*) Among the rest, in 1701, a short Review of the Controversy between Mr Boyle and Dr Bentley, 144 pages, 8vo.

(16) Dr Bentley's Dissertations on the Epistles of Phalaris, par sim.

(17) Ut supra, p. 68.

(18) The Matter being confounded with many flat contradictions, may properly be reduced to this short question, Utri creditis, Quiritæ, Dr Bentley, or Mr Bennet, the Bookfeller?

(19) Dr Garth's Dispenary.

(20) Budgett's Lives of the Boyles, p. 193.

(21) The Episode in the Battle of the Books, p. 256, &c. in the Tale of a Tub, par sim, particularly p. 22, 82, 93, 203.

intricate an affair will allow of. But to return; at the express desire of his friend Mr Grævius, he set about, compiled, and published, his Animadversions and Remarks on the Poet Callimachus (b) [E], making at the same time a collection of some scattered pieces or fragments of that author. These he finished and sent over to Mr Grævius, towards the latter end of his dispute with Mr Boyle, and Mr Grævius published them abroad in 1697 (i). In the year 1700, upon the death of Dr North, he was by the Crown presented to the Mastership of Trinity-college, Cambridge, which is reckoned worth near 1000 l. per Annum, upon which preferment he resigned his prebend of Worcester (k). But June 12, 1701, on Dr Saywell's death, was collated and made Archdeacon of Ely (l). What next employed his critical genius, were the two first comedies of Aristophanes; upon these he made some curious annotations, which were published at Amsterdam in 1710, as was, much about the same time, at Rheims, his emendations, &c. on the fragments of Menander and Philemon, in the feigned name of Phileleutherus Lipsiensis: under this character he appeared again in 1713, in remarks upon Collins's Discourse of Free-Thinking, a book which had made no small noise in the world at that time, this he handles and confutes in so critical, learned, and yet familiar a manner, that the world may not think themselves a little obliged to him, for these judicious and learned remarks, which may be reckoned among his capital pieces. But, as his appearing under that feigned and foreign title may seem a little inconsistent, with publishing his remarks in English upon that English pamphlet, we shall just transcribe enough of the preface to that work, to explain that in note [F]. Just before his Remarks on Free-Thinking, in 1711, came forth his so long expected and celebrated edition of Horace [G]. What he intended, was [E] His Animadversions and Remarks on the Poet Callimachus.] The title of which, as given in the Bibliotheca Bodleiana. runs thus. Annotationes, in Callimachum ultra, 1697. Collectio fragmentorum Callimachi & Annotationes ad ead. in ibid (*). This was an accurate edition of that Poet, published by the learned Grævius, to whom Dr Bentley sent over his animadversions and remarks, great part of which he is charged with having stole from manuscript remarks of the learned Mr Stanley's, which were lent him by Sir Edward Sherburne †. How this matter stands we shall not pretend to say, shall only observe what even on this very piece his inveterate enemies, then vilifying and writing against him, were obliged to yield to him as his undoubted right in this point, viz. It ought to be acknowledged, that Dr Bentley has made some additions to Mr Stanley's Collections; it ought to be confessed that Dr Bentley has made some additions of his own to what was collected to his hands so readily, besides a number of observations which are granted him as his own. But now let us see, what, upon the whole, are the foreign opinions of this edition, and the Doctor's performance therein. See Grævius's preface to Dr Bentley before in note [B]; Mr Spanheim in Callimachum; Grævii præf. ad Callim. We have also since this been obliged by the Doctor with an edition for schools, &c. of this author, in octavo, in the year 1741, in which is the hymns and a parcel of the select epigrams of Callimachus, joined with some other things. After having given us his reasons for this edition in his preface, he adds a little Essay of about twelve pages, of the pronunciation of the Greek tongue.

[F] To explain that in the note.] In 1713 came out a piece, intitled, A Discourse of Free-thinking, occasioned by the rise and growth of a Sect, called FREE-THINKERS. This was managed by Mr Collins, Des Maizeaux, and several others. Soon after the Doctor comes out with his remarks upon it, in a Letter to F. H. D. D. by Phileleutherus Lipsiensis. Before which is prefixed the following letter, of which we shall take the liberty to transcribe a part.

To my very learned and honoured friend, F. H. D. D. at London, Great Britain.

S I R,
YOUR many and great civilities to me since your first acquaintance in the Low-Countries, and the kind office you did me in conveying my annotations on Menander to the press, but, above all, your taciturnity and secrecy, that have kept the true author of that book undiscovered hitherto, if not unguessed, have encouraged me to send you these present remarks to be communicated to the publick, &c.

He then tells us, how he came by the Discourse, viz. that an Englishman just come from London, where this book was just published, and had made much discourse, made him a present of it, knowing him to be an admirer of English books, and one that (during his stay at Oxford) had made himself a competent master of the English language. Then goes on; 'I, who (as you well know) have been trained up and exercised in free thought from my youth, and whose borrow'd name, Phileleutherus, sufficiently denotes me a lover of freedom, was pleased not a little with so promising a title. But when once the curtain was drawn, and by a perusal of the book, the private Cabala and mysterious scheme within became visible and open; under the specious shew of free-thinking, a set and system of opinions are all along inculcated and dogmatically taught; opinions the most slavish, the most abject and base, that human understanding is capable of. This irksome disappointment that my fine present should dwindle so far, as to be below the value of waste paper, raised a hasty resolution in me to write some remarks on it. And I find I shall have much the same employment as I had before on Menander, for I am here too to deal in fragments, the main of the book being a rhapsody of passages out of old and new writers, raked and scraped together by the joint labour of many hands, to abuse all religion. O infelices laborum! Had I been at their consultation, I could have furnished them with many more. And I will now inform them, that if they will read all Galen, and the Greek Commentators on Aristotle, they may find two or three passages much fitter for their purpose than any they have brought, &c. (†).'

[G] In 1711 came forth his so long expected and celebrated edition of Horace.] This, which is also a very correct, elegant, and neat edition, was printed in quarto, and dedicated to Lord Oxford from Trinity-college, Cambridge, upon the very birth-day of Horace, viz. the 6th of the Ides of December. In his preface to this he tells us, that having much care and business upon his hands, he was obliged to forsake more difficult studies; but that he might not entirely forget his old love for the Muses, he resolved to undertake some easy and pleasant work, which did not so much require a free and undisturbed mind, but might rather conduce to make it so. Horace, he says, was the author he pitched upon, not so much that he imagined there were more faults to correct in that than in any other of the Ancients, but because most pleasing to the generality of his readers, and himself; keeping himself within these bounds, viz. only to meddle with such things as should belong to the genuine and right reading, altogether neglecting what the generality of Commentators have laboured in, viz. what regards the history, customs, and manners of the Ancients. This indeed he acknowledges to be a very material work, but, as already done, there was no occasion for farther remarks in that way. He owns he adds more from his own imaginations and conjectures than from manuscripts or books. Then proceeds to give us an account of the several manuscripts and editions of Horace that he had consulted.

(†) The Letter before the Remarks on Free-Thinking.

(l) Bentley against Boyle, in the Preface.

(i) Bibliotheca Bodleiana.

(k) Willis on Cathedrals in the Prebends of Worcester, p. 672.

(l) Willis on Cathedrals in the Prebends of Worcester, p. 376, in the Archdeacons of Ely.

(*) Catalogus impressorum Librorum in Bibliotheca Bodleiana, p. 136.

† A short account of Dr B's Humanity, &c. ut supra, p. 29.

was not properly to explain his author, but only to correct what he judged remained still corrupted in the text, as he himself tells us in his preface (*), and this, by the help and assistance, either of ancient manuscripts, old editions, or by a happy sagacity in divination and conjecture: this, it must be confessed, was a nice and dangerous undertaking, if the author had not been perfectly master of the subject and argument, the language, stile, and genius of his author; and even received originally from nature, that particular niceness of taste, and peculiarly happy talent, which is proper and requisite to succeed in such a nice and hazardous attempt; as we may see more fully at large, in the Doctor's own preface (†). (†) Ut supra.

Dr Bentley, however, succeeded very well, correcting a much greater number of passages, than any, or all his former interpreters, ever had done; furnishing us, in this his new edition of our elegant Roman poet, with a great number of very plausible, and highly probable, not to mention some, which are indeed certain and genuine emendations. But as the republick of Criticks, is full of curious and litigious minds and spirits, as well as rash and presumptuous ones, not to mention, that even the most able and impartial, are not in all things infallible, nor of the same opinion; there won't want some therefore, that will not every where approve Dr Bentley's guesses and conjectures [H]. The commonwealth of consulted. The title runs thus: Q. Horatius Flaccus ex recensione, Et cum notis et emendationibus, Richardi Bentleyi. It has gone through abundance of editions, and been printed according to his emendations and corrections in various sizes. We shall only further add, with reference to the Amsterdam edition, compared with the Cambridge one (23), that it seems much more convenient and better disposed, the notes being every where here placed under the text, whereas they were all before at the end of the volume, and the additions also put and inserted in their proper places, which before were only at the end of the second tome. The copies all which are printed upon large paper seem far to surpass in beauty and goodness those of England, although the larger as well as lesser ones, are both sold much cheaper than the English ever were. But what is still more considerable, the Dutch booksellers have printed in the same letter Daniel Aveman's Index of Horace's words and phrases; to which Mr Verburg has added all the various readings in Dr Bentley's edition, and has besides augmented it with 300 quotations, and striking out all there was in it relating to the conjunctions and other undeclinable particles, which no reader ever has any occasion to enquire or search for. This Index alone therefore, if there was nothing else besides, will recommend this edition, and make it preferable to the other.

[H] There won't want some therefore that will not every where approve Dr Bentley's guesses and conjectures.] As to Foreigners, M. Le Clerc's Judgment and Censure of Horace is the only one we have perused on that subject, though there are doubtless some others in the foreign Journals and Bibliothèques. As to (24) M. Le Clerc's opinion, the reader has great part of it, except what relates to any particular criticisms, in the text, as also in the foregoing note. In the year following the Doctor's edition, viz. 1712, came out by various hands, the Odes and Epodes of Horace in sixpenny numbers, making in the whole two volumes in octavo; the titles of which are, The Odes and Epodes of Horace in Latin and English, with a Translation of Dr Bentley's Notes. To which are added Notes upon Notes, done in the Bentleian stile and manner: To which, as the preface is short, and something pertinent in this place, we shall here add it. 'We humbly hope that the reader will encourage the following Essays upon several accounts. First, As they are designed to shew him the best author of Augustus's age in his native purity. Secondly; To give him a further proof how far all attempts to render him into English, even after the best version now extant has succeeded no better, must fall short of the original. Thirdly, to convince him how ridiculous it is to presume to correct HORACE without authority, upon the pretended strength of superior judgment in Poetry. And lastly, How easily such a presumption may be turned upon the authors, and sufficiently expose them in their own way (25).' This last paragraph seems indeed to have been the greatest part of the design of this work, which is executed with a great deal of spirit and humour. These and other pieces are, we find, hinted at by the learned Johnson (author of the Grammatical Commentaries) in the following words, in his Aristarchi Anti-Bentleiani (26). 'Sed elapso anno uno, atque item altero, cum adversariis, quos tres vel quatuor habuit, nihil viderem argumento dignum prodidisse: neque de iis quidquam dictum in quibus Bentleius maxime peccaverat.' But a year or two being passed without any of Dr Bentley's antagonists, of which he had three or four, advancing any thing worthy of notice, having never touched upon the places where he was most faulty; Mr Johnson, as he informs us, was resolved to have a stroke or two at the Doctor himself, but was delayed three or four years by an indisposition, which also made him examine the Doctor no farther than the XXXVIth ode, or first book of Horace, in his first part (27). (27) Præfat. p.

vii.

This piece, as the reader may perceive by the title in the margin, is in Latin, and was printed in octavo at Nottingham, at least six years after the Doctor's edition of Horace. Before it is prefixed a Latin preface of about eighteen pages, in which he gives us reasons for undertaking this work, and for using the Doctor so familiarly, or rather rudely, as he does. This he pretends is by way of retaliation for the great men
(28) Dr Bentley has made free with, where he accordingly sums up what the Doctor says of himself, and what of others. However, the De se dicta of Mr Johnson, even in this preface, are not inconsiderable. At the end of the first part of Mr Johnson's remarks, consisting of 108 pages, is a stanza of an old ballad, with annotations after the manner of Dr Bentley; and after that follows a second part, which goes through with an examination of the other books, Epodes, Satires, and Epistles of Horace; and tho' there is no doubt but a great many of the observations of that eminent Grammarian are very just and true, yet we can no ways agree with Mr Edmund Miller, either in his opinion of Aristarchus, or Dr Bentley's Horace. His words are these (29). 'But the Doctor has had the ' ill fortune to fall into the hands of Mr Johnson, who
' (by giving himself the trouble of examining only
' into the first book of this applauded performance)
' has in his Aristarchus abovementioned discovered so ' much want of judgment, so many absurdities, incon' sistencies, silly affected alterations, together with so ' much carelessness, even to the writing not only im' proper but false Latin in many instances, besides a ' knavish arrogance of assuming other peoples disco' veries to himself, that he has made it plain (in much ' better Latin than his own) that the Doctor in this ' edition, as well as his other actions, had his chief ' view upon profit.' But Mr Miller's learning, taste for criticism, or books, will never hurt Dr Bentley.
However, as we have now mentioned it, and shall have occasion for to take farther notice of it, we cannot help giving something of a character of it from a late ingenious author (30). Another trifling pamphlet, in relation to this University, has been lately thrust into the world, with little design, I fear, of instruction, but rather to irritate a party sufficiently enraged against our famous Universities, and to hasten a visitation; take it, such as it is, published under the title of, &c.
But we shall wind up our observations on this noted performance of the Doctor's (which, as I remember somewhere to have read, cost himself no less time than the taking of Troy did the Greeks), with a passage even of the preface of Mr Johnson's Aristarchus; which shews the true merit and value of that work, and the opinion the Learned entertained of it at that time, and which (*) See note [C].

(†) Ut supra.

(27) Præfat. p. vii.

(28) Præf. p. vii. to p. xviii. Bentleyi de se & aliis dicta.

(29) An Account of the university of Cambridge, &c. by Edmund Miller, p. 100.

(30) Rawlinson's English Topographer, p. 13.

it

(23) From the French of M. le Clerc's Judgment and Censure of Dr Bentley's Horace.

(24) Le Clerc's Censure and Judgment of Horace, translated from the French.

(25) Preface to Bentley's Horace, notes upon notes.

(26) Aristarchi Anti-Bentleiani nonaginta Bentleii per notas universas Latinitate Lapsus sedissimos ostendens, Præfat. p. vi.

of learning is now so free, that every one pretends a right to speak his mind and sentiment, how dissonant or opposite soever it may prove, even to that of the greatest and ablest pens, or those of the first rank and order therein. On the fifth of November, in the year 1715, the Doctor preached a sermon at St James's against Popery, on which somebody soon after published Remarks, which occasioned Dr Bentley's answer, intitled, Reflections on the scandalous Aspersions cast on the Clergy, by the Author of the Remarks on Dr Bentley's Sermon on Popery, &c. this was printed in the year 1717, in octavo. In the year 1716, the Doctor had two printed Letters inscribed to him, dated Jan. 1; to which also were added his Answer; these were concerning his intended edition of the Greek Testament, giving some account of what was to be expected in that edition; and in them we are informed, that he intended to make no use of any manuscript in this edition, that was not a thousand years old or above; of which sort, he had got at that time twenty together in his study, which made up, one with another, 20,000 years [I]; and after having had this affair in agitation for about four years, he at last published proposals for it (*), which, notwithstanding the difficulty of the times, met with prodigious encouragement from all true lovers of learning, and people of the best rank and quality at London. But soon after came out Remarks, paragraph by paragraph, on these proposals, by Dr Conyers Middleton, the afterwards known author of this piece, who sets out, by assuring his reader, that it was neither personal spleen, nor envy to the author of the proposals, that drew the following remarks from him, but a serious conviction, that he had neither talents nor materials proper for the work, and that religion was much more likely to receive detriment than service from it. The time, manner, and other circumstances of these proposals, says he, make it but too evident, that they were hastened out to serve quite different ends, than those of common Christianity; and I think it my duty to obviate, as far as I am able, the influence they might have on some, whom big words, and bold attempts, are apt to lead implicitly into an high opinion and admiration of the merit and abilities of the undertaker. He then proceeds to criticize paragraph by paragraph on the Doctor's proposals, of which, as it was a famous dispute, and quite overthrew the Doctor's design, (though he had at first met with all imaginable success) we shall endeavour to give the reader some idea, by extracting from the pamphlets that passed on that occasion, below in note [K]. But as to matters of mere learning

(*) As below in note [K].

it justly deserves. 'Cæteris eum in deliciis esse, ut unicum Horatii interpretem, laudibus in cælum ferri: librum adolescentibus in manus ubique tradi, quo demum linguæ tantæ veros sensus, atque elegantias quò in multis linguæ Latinæ rationem internoscerent (31).' Others were so delighted with him, that they used to extol him up to the skies, as the only Commentator (or interpreter) of Horace. His book was every where given into the hands of youth, from which alone they could come at the true sense and elegancies of that great Poet, and from whence alone in many cases they could arrive at the true knowledge of the Latin tongue.

[I] Of which sort he had got at that time twenty together in his study, which made up, one with another, 20,000 years.] 'Mr Martin of Utrecht, speaking upon the subject of this very letter, says, that our Editor is not a little indebted to his good fortune for having found twenty manuscripts well told, which are of 1000 years ago, or above, it being one of the most extraordinary discoveries in this kind of Literature that has been made in our days (32).' And again in another place (33), 'the point will be, says he, whether these MSS. lately discovered be really as old as Dr Bentley takes them to be, for we are not ignorant how difficult it is, not to say impossible, to pass always in these cases a certain judgment free from all doubts.'

[K] As below in the notes.] Proposals for printing a new edition of the Greek Testament, and St Hieron's Latin version. Η ΚΑΙΝΗ ΔΙΑΘΗΚΗ Græcè Novum Testamentum versionis vulgatæ, P. S^{um} Hieronymum ad vetusta exemplaria Græca castigatæ et exactæ ——— utrumque ex antiquissimis Cod. MSS. cum Græcis tum Latinis edidit Richardus Bentleyus.

I. The author of this edition observing, that the printed copies of the New Testament, both of the original Greek and ancient Vulgar Latin, were taken from manuscripts of no great antiquity, such as the first editors could then procure; and that now, by God's providence, there are manuscripts in Europe (accessible, though with great charge) above 1000 years old, in both languages, he believes he may do good service to common Christianity, if he publishes a new edition of the Greek and Latin, not according to the recent and interpolated copies, but as represented in the most antient and venerable manuscripts, in Greek and Roman capital letters.

II. The author revolving in his mind some passages of St Hieron, where he declares, that (without making a new version) he adjusted and reformed the whole Latin Vulgate to the best Greek exemplars, that is, to those of the famous Origen; and another passage, where he says, that a verbal or literal interpretation out of Greek into Latin is not necessary, except in the Holy Scriptures; ubi ipse verborum ordo mysterium est, where the very order of the words is a mystery; took thence the hint, that if the oldest copies of the original Greek, and Hieron's Latin, were examined and compared together, perhaps they would be still found to agree both in words and order of words; and upon making the essay, he has succeeded in his conjecture beyond his expectation, or even his hopes.

III. The author believes, that he has retrieved (except in very few places) the true exemplar of Origen, which was the standard to the most learned of the Fathers at the time of the council of Nice, and two centuries after; and he is sure that the Greek and Latin manuscripts, by their mutual assistance, do so settle the original text to the smallest nicety, as cannot be performed now in any classic author whatever; and that out of a labyrinth of thirty thousand various readings, that crowd the pages of our present best editions, all put upon equal credit to the offence of many good persons; this clue so leads and extricates us, that there will scarce be two hundred out of so many thousands that can deserve the least consideration.

IV. To confirm the lessons which the author places in the text, he makes use of the old versions, Syriac, Coptic, Gothic, and Ethiopic; and of all the Fathers, Greeks and Latins, within the first five centuries; and he gives in his notes all the various readings (now known) within the said five centuries; so that the reader has under one view what the first ages of the Church knew of the text; and what has crept into any copies since is of no value or authority.

V. The author is very sensible, that in the sacred writings there is no place for conjectures or emendations; diligence and fidelity, with some judgment and experience, are the characters here requisite; he declares therefore, that he does not alter one letter in the text without the authorities subjoined in the notes; and

(31) Aristarchi Anti-Bentleiani Præfat. p. v.

(32) Martin's Defence of his Dissertation, in English.

(33) Ibid. p. 16.

learning and criticism, or dispute and malicious rallery, we shall purposely omit that, as it to leave the free choice to every reader, he places under each column the smallest variations of this edition, either in words or order, from the received Greek of Stephanus, and the Latin of the two Popes Sixtus V, and Clemens VIII; so that this edition exhibits both itself and the common ones.

VI. If the author has any thing to suggest, towards a change of the text, not supported by any copies now extant, he will offer it separate in his Prolegomena; in which will be a large account of the several manuscripts here used, and of the other matters which contribute to make this edition useful. In this work he is of no sect or party, his design is to serve the whole Christian name; he draws no consequences in his notes, makes no oblique glances upon any disputed points, old or new. He consecrates this work as a Κεφάλαιον, a Κτίσιμα ἑσσεαι, a Charter, a Magna Charta, to the whole Christian Church, to last, when all the ancient manuscripts here quoted may be lost and extinguished.

VII. To publish this work, according to it's use and importance, a great expence is requisite. It is designed to be printed, not on the paper, or with the letter of this specimen, but with the best letter, paper, and ink, that Europe affords; it must therefore be done by subscription or contribution. As it will make two tomes in folio, the lowest subscription for smaller paper must be three guineas, one advanced in present; and for the great paper five guineas, two advanced.

VIII. The work will be put to the press as soon as money is contributed to support the charge of the impression, and no more copies will be printed than subscribed for. The overseer and corrector of the press will be the learned Mr John Walker of Trinity-college in Cambridge, who with great accurateness has collated many manuscripts at Paris for the present edition; and the issue of it, whether gain or loss, is equally to fall on him and the author.

Then follows the specimen, viz. the last chapter of the Apocalypse, with a Latin version, and the various readings of the several manuscripts in the notes. Soon after these proposals, in 1721, came out Dr Middleton's remarks upon them, paragraph by paragraph, as above in the text. In these he observes our author makes no scruple to destroy the authority of all our published scriptures, crying down all the current editions as corrupt and adulterate; and then, in vindication of the former editions, Dr Middleton endeavours to prove the excellency of two or three of the principal ones, viz. the celebrated Complutensian, printed in 1515, which had all the manuscripts of the Vatican, besides many others of the greatest antiquity, procured by Cardinal Ximenes, with no small trouble and expence, from Rome, Spain, and other foreign parts; insomuch that seven only of these manuscript copies, fetched from different countries, cost him 4000 crowns (34).

Next Erasmus's edition, formed by collating and comparing many of the most correct and antient manuscripts, both Greek and Latin; Dr Mill compares one of Erasmus's Greek Manuscripts to the Alexandrian itself, which is supposed to be above 1200 years old; and then instances Robert Stephens, who collected the text of his edition from no fewer than sixteen of the best manuscripts, some of which are described by him to be ipsa vetustatis specie panè adorandas. I need not mention, says he, the many other editions we have of good note, but shall leave it to the reader to determine from these, how just and modest our author has been in this paragraph; and whether manuscripts of no great antiquity, recent and interpolated, be the proper translations of Antiquissimæ, Emendatissimæque venerandæ vetustatis, spectatæque fidei, for these are the epithets given to those manuscripts. Besides the last edition of the learned Dr Mill, who with incredible pains and industry for thirty years together, has drawn together in his elaborate edition, not only what had been collected by all other authors and editors before him, but the collations likewise of all manuscripts whatsoever which he had heard of, or were at all in fame in any part of Europe, there are many in his collections above 1000 years old, and in capitals too. But the author of the remarks, carries his remarks on the beginning of this article by much too far, the matter being drawn up in as tender and modest terms as the nature of the thing would bear, without any the smallest reproach or reflexion on the prior editors (35). The Doctor then reduces him to the following dilemma, no man can possibly give a better edition than those already extant; or the man that can do it, ought necessarily to say in his proposals, that the extant editions are erroneous and imperfect (36). Did not Erasmus, without public censure, refine by repeated editions not only upon the Complutenses, but even upon himself? How came Robert Stephens, a mere Printer, with public acceptance and applaus, to refine upon them both (37).

— The venerable manuscripts of the Complutenses did not hinder Erasmus from varying from them in a thousand places; nor did Erasmus's correct and antient manuscripts deter Robert Stephens from doing the like by his. — The world is now advanced, adds he, two whole centuries in age since the date of the Complutensian and Erasmus's edition, and as much within thirty years since that of Robert Stephens; within that time older manuscripts have been brought to light than those editors knew, every thing is comparatively old or recent: In those days, when no better was seen, they gave the titles of antient and venerable to manuscripts that are now scarce reckoned in the 2d or 3d rate. — But that his edition would chiefly turn upon eight Greek manuscripts, the most recent of which is one thousand years old (38), and that without the concurrence of some of these, he will scarce put one word in his text. Now of all these eight, not one was used either by the Complutenses or Erasmus, and only one of them by Robert Stephens, and that very negligently. As to Ximenes, seven manuscripts; 4,000,000 crowns would not buy the manuscripts that the Doctor got collated for this edition; and though he had no Cardinal's purse, spent nevertheless a thousand crowns only for the bare use of them (39), and that four of these eight manuscripts (and the four principal, abating the Alexandrian) were never collated by or for Dr Mill (40), besides having collated with his own hand a score of old Latin Testaments which he had procured at his own expence. This pamphlet, called a Defence of Dr Bentley's Proposals, for printing a new edition of the Greek Testament, &c. is again answered by Dr Middleton in his own proper name (41), by summing up, in something a stronger manner, what he had before said, and still insisting upon the excellence and antiquity of the manuscripts of the former editions, and turns the Doctor's answer wholly into pride and arrogance of himself. He then proceeds to enquire into the true state of his materials in this manner. — The first account I have met with of his manuscripts, says he (42), is in a printed letter of his, upon the subject of his edition, as above in the text. Thus, says Dr Middleton (43), his twenty old manuscripts sink at once to eight, and he is forced again to own, that even of these eight, there are only four which had not been collated and made use of by Dr Mill. He ought however, methinks, to oblige his subscribers with a more particular and satisfactory account of the four manuscripts he pretends to; whether, though never used by Dr Mill, they were not still collated by Dr Kuster; whether any one of them, or all together, make out the whole New Testament, for 'tis a great rarity to find any one of value which contains above a part of it; and our editor tells us himself, that there are very few good ones, nay, not so much as one of any antiquity, besides the Alexandrine, which comprehends the whole; so that whenever he thinks fit to answer these queries, his little stock will probably be reduced once more to half; nay, he will be left, I am almost confident, with nothing more than some piece only of the New Testament in manuscript; for I will not pretend to deny (44), that our author may possibly have met with, and collated some few manuscripts, which Dr Mill had not heard of or made use of; but what reason or pretence can this give him for such a triumph and insult over all editors before him. I might also, says Dr Middleton, properly enough observe, the many blunders and errata of the press (as remarkable in this specimen as in the very worst of our printed editions), to shew that there is no kind of inaccuracy but what may be justly charged upon it. Dr Bentley, in defence of the incorrectness of his specimen, alledges, that the proposals were drawn up in haste in one evening by candlelight, and printed next day from the first and sole draught, which haste likewise hindered him from re-

(35) Dr Bentley's Proposals for printing a new edition of the Greek Testament, and St Hierom's Latin version, with a full Answer to all the Remarks of a late Pamphleteer, by a Member of Trinity-coll. Cambridge, 1721. p. 11.

(35) Ibid. p. 12.

(37) Ibid. p. 13.

(38) Ibid. p. 13.

(39) Ibid. p. 15.

(40) Ibid. p. 14.

(41) Some farther Remarks, Paragraph by Paragraph, upon Proposals lately published for a new edition of a Greek and Latin Testament, by Richard Bentley, containing a full Answer to the Editor's late Defence of his said Proposals, as well as to all his Objections there made, against my former Remarks, by Censers Middleton, D. D. price 2s. p. 4, 5.

(42) Two Letters to Dr Bentley, and the Doctor's Answer, dated Trin. Coll. Jan. 1, 1716-17.

(43) Some farther Remarks, &c. containing a full Answer to the Editor's late Defence of his Proposals, &c. p. 8.

(44) Ibid. p. 24.

(34) Gemefius, De Rebus Gestis Ximenii, lib. ii.

it would abundantly transgress the limits we must necessarily set ourselves upon this occasion, referring the curious reader to the tracts themselves for a fuller account. Soon after these Remarks paragraph by paragraph, came out the Proposals, with a pamphlet, intitled, A full Answer to all the Remarks of a late Pamphleteer, by a member of Trinity-college, Cambridge, 1721, signed I. E. this Dr Middleton, and all, imagined could be none but the Doctor himself, as well from the style; as the letters I. E. being the two first vowels of Richard Bentley, and upon this supposition, Dr Middleton and others, in their future Remarks, make that one great handle of abusing him. It is, however, somewhat uncertain, whether Dr Middleton might not be as much mistaken as to the author of those Remarks, as the very author of those Remarks was, with respect to the author of the Remarks Paragraph by Paragraph, who took them to be made by Dr Colbatch [L]. But soon after this came out a pamphlet, with some farther Remarks, &c. containing a full answer to the editor's late defence of his Proposals, as well as all his objections there made, against my former Remarks, by Conyers Middleton, D. D. As also, an anonymous Letter to the Reverend Master of Trinity-college, Cambridge, editor of a new Greek Testament. We also find, under the catalogue of the Doctor's works in the Bibliotheca Bodleiana, much about this time, somewhat analogous and relating to this affair, viz. An Enquiry into the Authority of the Primitive Complutensian edition of the New Testament, in a Letter to Archdeacon Bentley, in 1722, 8vo. (n). As to these Proposals, Dr Middleton takes upon him to say, that they were only published with a view 'that some noise should be made in the world in his favour, to support his declining character; by something great and popular, to recover esteem and applause to himself, and throw an odium and contempt upon his persecutors, &c. (o).' But another author makes us still more obliged to the dispute between him and his college, 'and next (by the help of favourers of learning, falsely so called) to gain an impunity for what he is accused of; it may be truly said; as to whatever he has published, within these last seven years, (if there has been any merit in it) it has been more owing to his prosecution than to himself (p).' Was this the cause, as Dr Middleton, and the learned Mr Miller seem to imagine, the world is indeed not a little indebted to that college, for their quarrels and disputes with this great man; which it is likely was done from this publick spirited view. And it is indeed much to be regretted, that they could not find means of continuing their animosity and prosecutions as long as the (n) As also Philo-leutherus Londinensis ad F. V. Prof. Amstelod. Epistole due de Bentlei editione N. T. Lond. 1721. Bib. Bod. Vol. II. p. 102.

(o) Some farther Remarks, &c. p. 22.

(p) Miller's Account of the University of Cambridge, p. 100, 101.

vising it, and so left several false accents and points in the specimen; and afterwards adds, that he feared not that all men of common sense and common candour would look on 340 hints in that chapter of specimen (45), and not from two small slips, imagine, that all those agreements came by chance without the translator's design or thought; who look more on the 30 variations that appeared before his specimen (46), between the two texts, and are now reconciled from the best copies, than on two trifling variations that still remain.

(45) Ibid. p. 25.

(46) Ibid. p. 32.

[L] Who took them to be made by Dr Colbatch.]

Cambridge, Jan. 20.

FINDING myself to be treated after a most barbarous manner in a virulent libel, which bears the title of Dr Bentley's Proposals, with a full Answer, &c. upon pretence of my being the author of the Remarks upon the Proposals lately published by Richard Bentley, &c. I think it necessary, upon several accounts, to declare as follows:

That I am not the author of those Remarks, nor any part of them; and that they were undertaken and written without my assistance or knowledge.

That R. B. certainly knew, or easily might have known, that they were written by the Reverend and Learned Dr Middleton, who had owned them to several of his friends, by whose means he verily believes that R. B. was informed that he alone was the author: For my own part, presently after the Remarks were published, I took all occasions to declare as above, being obliged in justice so to do, lest my silence might in some measure contribute to deprive my worthy friend of the honour due for so excellent a performance; nor do I question but R. B. before he began to write his libel, had been acquainted with what I said on those occasions. That those foul aspersions, which are cast upon me in almost every page, are as false in fact, as they are apparently malicious, which is notorious to all who know me, and to none more than R. B. himself. That I never wrote any libels against the Government, the College, or Master, as he falsely asserts. I never wrote any thing at all relating to the Government, or published any thing concerning the College, or Master, except a Commemoration Sermon. Dec. 1. 1717, which the Master pretended to approve of, giving it under his hand that he would subscribe to every word of it. As to other matters relating to either, I have hitherto thought them fit only for the cognizance of a Visitor.

John Colbatch, D. D. Senior Fellow of Trinity-college, and Casuistical Professor of Divinity in the University of Cambridge (47).

Cambridge, Feb. 27, 1720-1.

At a meeting of the Vice-Chancellor and Heads.

WHEREAS the Rev. John Colbatch, D. D. and Casuistical Professor of this University, hath made complaint to us of a book lately published, annexed to proposals for printing a new edition of the Greek Testament, &c. and called a full Answer to all the Remarks of a late Pamphleteer, by a Member of Trinity-college, subscribed I. E. wherein the said John Colbatch conceives himself to be highly injured, as being represented under the most reproachful and infamous characters, and hath therefore applied to us for redress: We the Vice-Chancellor and Heads of Colleges, whose names are underwritten, having perused the said book, do find that the said Dr Colbatch had just ground of complaint, it appearing to us that he is therein described under very odious and ignominious characters; and do declare and pronounce the said book to be a most virulent and scandalous libel, highly injurious to the said Dr Colbatch, contrary to good manners, and a notorious violation of the statutes and discipline of this University; and, as soon as the author of the said libel can be discovered, we resolve to do justice to the said Dr Colbatch, by inflicting such censures upon the offender, as the statutes of this University in that case do appoint.

| | |
|------------------------------|---------------|
| Tho. Cross, Vice-Chancellor, | Edw. Lavy, |
| John Couche, | R. Jenkin, |
| C. Ashton, | W. Grigg, |
| Barthley Visser, | D. Waterland, |
| | Wm. Savage. |

[M] At

(47) At the end of the Preface to Some farther Remarks, &c.

the Doctor's life, that the world might have been still farther obliged to them, for some other performances of their learned Master; we say obliged to them, for doubtless as they had found out the Doctor's foible, it was only with this publick spirited design, that they gave him and themselves so much trouble; and neither (it is to be hoped) through any great offence on his side, no more than any personal pique or maliciousness on theirs to him, any more than to his learned predecessors, especially Dr North, his last predecessor but one (*) in that office. The Doctor, however, was permitted to live the remainder, or last twenty years of his life, without prosecution, in ease and idleness, only giving us his Terence, Phædrus, and Milton, in all that time. In 1725, at a Publick Commencement on the sixth of July, the Doctor made an elegant Latin speech, on creating seven Doctors of Divinity; in which, at the several periods, by little notes below, is set forth the whole form of the creation of a Doctor of Divinity; this piece is usually joined to his edition of Terence and Phædrus, at least to the Amsterdam edition of it [M], in 1727, which is a very neat edition, upon a good paper and print, adorned with a curious frontispiece, and dedicated by Dr Bentley to the Prince of Wales. The Doctor has not only obliged us with his notes on this author, but has also added those of the learned Gabriel Faernius, and taken great pains in amending and correcting the author, not only from those the most antient manuscripts, which Gabriel Faernius had procured, but also from whatever manuscripts the Royal Library, those of Cambridge, or any of his friends, could afford, some of which he assures us were of great antiquity, and at least next, and very little inferior to, those of Faernius, whose orthography, as the most antient manuscript, he altogether follows (q), but has altered the text in abundance of Places, never however without giving in the notes, the manner and reason for such alteration; then follows the Schematism of the metre and accents of Terence, by which the Doctor proves that Terence is wrote all in verse, consisting of about nineteen pages (r). This however has been a matter of some controversy, between the learned Bishop Hare and our author, upon which, as disputes ran pretty high, an ingenious author has made an observation which we shall mention below [N]. About the year 1732, he published his Milton's Paradise Lost, when he was, as he says in his preface, about seventy years old (s). This is a very elegant and beautiful edition of that poem, and also the truest and correctest that has yet appeared, as to the faults in orthography; distinction by points and capital letters, accents and elision of vowels; which are all here very carefully and judiciously corrected, but errors in those respects swarm in the prior editions. However not one word is altered in it [O], but all the conjectures that attempt a reformation of the genuine Milton, cast in the margin, and explained in the notes; so that every reader has his free choice, whether he will accept or reject what is offered him: this, with the goodness of the paper and type, make this edition truly valuable, though the Doctor's remarks on this poem, have not met with the approbation from the world [P], that a man

(*) In the foregoing sheet, p. 738. line 6, for on the death of Dr North, read on the death of Dr Mountague.

(q) See the Preface to Terence.

(r) Ibid.

(s) Vide Prefat. ad eundem.

(49) Phalaris's Epistles examined, p. 63.

[M] At least to the Amsterdam edition of it.] This we take to be the best edition of it, as well as his Horace, being supplied with two copious indexes, and neatly printed upon an excellent paper, and sent over there as corrected for a second edition, with the Doctor's own hand. This we find from a little prefatory discourse to the reader, in which, as he tells Mr Boyle (49), among a great many other places, ejus humanitas singularis, is said of him seriously and candidly, as he always made it his endeavours to oblige even Foreigners by all courtesy and humanity, and much more to encourage and assist any useful design at home. But to return to his Terence. It was first published here in 1726, under the following title: P. Terentii Afri Comœdiæ recensitæ notæque suas et Gabrielis Faerni addidit Richardus Bentleyus. To which the Amsterdam edition adds, Editio altera, denno recensæ ac indice amplissimo rerum et verborum tam in textum quam notas omnia, Amstelædemi, 1727. To this is adjoined a beautiful edition of Phædrus, under the following title: Phædri Augusti liberti fabularum Æsoparum, lib. V. Publii Syri et aliorum veterum sententiæ. Recensuit et notas addidit Richardus Bentleyus. To which is also added a copious index.

[N] Upon which, as disputes ran pretty high, an ingenious author has made an observation, which we shall mention below.] 'However, as I heartily wish that the present difficulties and discouragements to the study of the Scriptures, so accurately represented by Dr Hare, were taken away; so do I think no such difficulties ought to discourage great and good men among the Clergy, from bending their own studies to their own profession, especially in it's present circumstances; and I venture to add this, that if once such as these would be themselves in earnest with Christianity, and would in earnest fall to this great work, the Collins's, the Tindal's, the Toland's, and the Woolston's, would soon become contemptible, and the religion of our Blessed Saviour, now at so low an ebb, would soon flourish and spread itself over the world. To observe laymen, as Grotius, Newton, and Locke, laying out their noblest talents in sacred studies, while such Clergymen as Dr Bentley and Bishop Hare, to name no others at present, have been, in the words of Sir Isaac Newton, fighting with one another about a Playbook (Terence). This is a reproach upon them, their holy religion, and holy function, plainly intolerable (50).

[O] However, not one word is altered in it.] Changes indeed are suggested, and accordingly put into the margin, but not in the text, and not obtruded on the reader. They are generally in this stile: It may be adjusted thus; among several ways of change this may be one, or this may not be absurd, or disagreeing from the Miltonian character or stile. So that the following remarks made upon his Milton in a public paper (51) cannot be reckoned of any force against his work, being only intended to cast reflections upon it's author, viz. 'for a person, who though allowed to be a very learned Critic, was never imagined to be a Poet, to publish his extemporary, crude, and indigested Criticisms, upon the completest poem in the English language (52), to pretend to alter and correct it in every page, to strike out a great many verses, and to put in several of his own, treating the heroic poem of Great Milton like the exercise of a school-boy.'

[P] Though Dr Bentley's remarks on this poem have not met with approbation from the world.] Several papers and pamphlets published about this time, viz. in 1732, take notice and criticise upon this the Doctor's performance on Milton; the Grubstreet-Journal (53) in particular has several remarks, observations, and criticisms, after the Bentleyian stile and manner, besides some copies of verses and epigrams on the same subject, both in Latin and English. But the best and only thing that was published material against it was, Dr

(50) Whiston's Historical Memoirs of Dr Clarke.

(51) The Grubstreet Journal.

(52) See note [2].

(53) Particularly No. 82, 87, 99, 100, 101, 108, 113, 116, 118, 125, 137, and several others.

(t) Dr Pearce's Reviews of the text of Milton.
See remark [P].

(u) See note [R].

(w) Dissertation upon the Epistles of Phalaris, with an Answer to the Objections of the Hon. Charles Boyle, Esq; p.
xliv. xlix. lxxi.
See note [B]. (7).

(x) Epistle to Dr
Mill, p. 39.

man of his extensive genius, so deservedly distinguished for his superior talent in critical knowledge, might have reasonably expected. Yet his very antagonist, that published Remarks upon his Milton (t), allows he has given us some (he might have said many) useful and judicious remarks, and only says, he has made many emendations which may justly be called in question. But it may not be improper here, to take notice of some part of the Doctor's preface to Milton, which may in some measure excuse, or rather account for, the indifferent reception this book met with from the publick [Q], excepting what caprice and ill nature might produce, which were more upon the account of the author than of his works, but generally levelled indiscriminately at either. Besides he tells us in his preface (u), that the notes were made extempore, and put to press as soon as made [R], so that any thing very great could not surely be expected, especially by such who took him up on this occasion, and would hardly in any case allow him even common merit and learning. These are all the critical works that the learned Dr Bentley published, or such only as came to our knowledge, for it is not to be doubted but that he wrote and published several others, which perhaps some of his friends may be better acquainted with. He tells us he had prepared a new edition of the poet Manilius for the press [S], which he had published, had not the dearth of paper, and the want of good types, and some other occasions, hindered him (w). He had also some design of publishing an edition of Hefychius, as we find by Mr Grævius's letter to him, in which he was so well read, as to assure Dr Mill, he could if he pleased, correct five thousand faults in that author (x). His emendations on the Tusculan Questions of Cicero, are adjoined to Mr Davis's edition of that author. This being all we have been able to gather from his critical works, we shall now proceed to enquire into the complaint of mal-administration, urged against him by the college, which was the occasion of a long suit, whether

Dr Pearce's Review of the text of Milton's Paradise Lost; in which the chief of Dr Bentley's emendations are considered, and several other emendations and observations are offered to the public. This was published at three different times, in three different parts. In the preface to which, he tells us (54), 'that having been conversant in Milton's poetical writings, and having carefully examined the emendations which Dr Bentley offered to the world in his new edition of Paradise Lost, he thought it not improper to communicate his observations to the public on this occasion. Dr Bentley is deservedly distinguished for his superior talents in criticism; they are owned by the unanimous consent of the learned world, and have gained him a reputation which is real and substantial; but this will be understood with exception to what he has done on Milton's poems. — In the emendations, which the author of these sheets offers as from himself, he never ventures farther than to propose words of the like sound, which a blind Poet's ear may be presumed to have been sometimes mistaken in, when the proof-sheets were read to him, and but few of this sort are mentioned; the greatest part arises from the alteration of the points, in which it is not improbable that Milton trusted much to the care of the Printer and Reviser.'

[Q] Which may in some measure excuse, or rather account for, the indifferent reception this book met with from the public. For above sixty years, says he, this poem, with such miserable deformities by the press, and not seldom flat nonsense, passed upon the whole nation for a perfect and faultless composition; the best pens in the kingdom contending in it's praises, as eclipsing all modern essays whatever, and rivalling, if not excelling, Homer and Virgil; the reason of which he looked upon to be, that it's readers first acceded to it, possessed with awe and veneration from it's universal esteem, and have been by that deterred from trusting to their judgments; and even in places displeasing, rather suspecting their own capacity, than that any thing in the book could possibly be amiss. Who durst oppose the universal vogue? and risk his own character, while he laboured to exalt Milton's? I wonder rather that it is done even now: Had these notes been written forty years ago, it would have been prudence to have suppressed them for fear of injuring one's rising fortune; but now when seventy years Jamadum memorem monuerunt, and spoke loudly in my ears,

Mitte leves spes & certamina divitiarum,

I made the notes extempore, and put them to the press as soon as made, without apprehension of growing leaner by censures, or plumper by commendations. (55).

[R] That the notes were made extempore, and put to the press as soon as made.] Upon which some of his opposers observe, that it was six years before the publication that Dr Ashenhurst declared at Bristol, that Dr B. was then engaged in making notes on Milton; nor did he speak of it as a work just then begun, for he had not then seen the Doctor for two or three years; so that this work may have cost him as many years labour as even his Horace. The person who received this account from Dr Ashenhurst is ready to attest the truth of it, when called upon so to do (56). This might possibly be the case, and yet the Doctor's assertion be true; for the Doctor might probably acquaint Dr Ashenhurst with his scheme while yet in embryo, before perhaps at all carried into execution, when he had only in reading made a few cursory remarks, between which, indisposition in a person of the Doctor's age, or a hundred other things, might intervene to delay his setting about it in earnest, and going methodically through with it from beginning to end; so that Dr Ashenhurst might perhaps be acquainted with the scheme, and the Doctor reported to be absolutely employed about it, and yet the notes in a manner made extempore, and even put to the press as soon as made.

[S] He tells us he had prepared a new edition of the Poet Manilius for the press.] Which design being known abroad, first occasioned his acquaintance with Sir Edward Sherburn, who had formerly translated the first book of that Poet into English verse, and explained it with a large commentary, and had besides got together several old and scarce editions of that Poet; besides those, he had purchased at Antwerp by means of a Bookseller a whole box full of papers of the famous Gasper Gevartius, who undertook an edition of the same Poet, but was prevented by death. All these Sir Edward Sherburn sent to Dr Bentley for the use of his intended edition of Manilius; among which papers, he tells us, he found none of any consequence, except a treatise about Theodorus Mallius; written, as he had good reason to believe, by Albertus Rubenius, whose posthumous works the learned Grævius was then publishing; this therefore, with Sir Edward's leave, he sent over to him, who promised to take care to let the world know to whose kindness they were obliged for this piece, but entirely forgot this; dedicated it to Dr Bentley, and never so much as mentioned Sir Edward's name. This gave occasion to the Doctor's enemies to accuse him of falsifying his word to Sir Edward Sherburn (57), by not letting Mr Grævius know from whence he had it, and not desiring him to make an honourable mention of Sir Edward, as the person that had obliged the world with it. But Mr Grævius clears him of this aspersion, and confesses his own forgetfulness and neglect of what Dr Bentley had expressly wrote to him on this subject (58).

(56) Grubstreet Journal.

(57) See the Account of Dr Bentley's Humanity, &c. p. 27, 28; and Boyle against Bentley, p. 16.

(58) Grævii Epistola Richardo Bentleio.

(54) The Preface to Dr Pearce's Review.

[T] The

whether the Crown or the Bishop of Ely was General Visitor. A party in the College, displeas'd at some regulations endeavour'd by the Master, began to talk of the fortieth statute, de Magistris (si res exigat) Amotione, and to cabal about complaining to the Bishop of Ely: the Master hearing this, went to Bishop Patrick, then at Ely, to acquaint him with their design; the Bishop told him, he had never heard before, that, as Bishop of Ely, he had any thing to do in the Royal College of Trinity; called his Secretary to him, and bid him seek if there was any precedent of it in the Bishop's archives; but not one was found, not so much as a copy of Trinity-college Statutes. Upon that, the Doctor lent him one, and for that Bishop's time the matter was dropped. But in his successor Dr More's time, the party found great encouragement to apply to the Bishop; which they accordingly did in 1709, and a vast number of articles about dilapidations, but not one of immorality, bribery, or fraud, were exhibited against the Master; these, as below in note [T], contain a good deal of malice, and many vilifying [T] These as below in the notes.] I received this appeal from the Fellows of Trinity-college, by the hands of Mr Edmund Miller, the tenth of February, 1709. JOHN, Ely.

The Petition of the Fellows of Trinity-college against Dr Bentley.

To the Right Reverend Father in God, John, Lord Bishop of Ely, Visitor of Trinity-college in Cambridge, upon the fortieth chapter of the College Statutes, intitl'd, De Magistris (si res exigat) amotione.

The humble petition and complaint of the Vice-Master, Senior Fellows, and many of the Doctors in Divinity and Masters of Arts, Fellows and Members of the College of the Holy and Undivided Trinity of the University of Cambridge, of King Henry the Eighth's foundation, in behalf of themselves and the rest of the Members of the said College, against Richard Bentley, Doctor in Divinity, now Master thereof,

Shew,

THAT the Fellows, and all the Members of the said College, having for many years lived with a great respect and love to their former Masters, and in a perfect amity one with another; in the year of our Lord God 1700, when the said Dr Bentley first came to be their Master, the peace of the said College was soon disturb'd, by his demanding and taking of the said College several unusual and great sums of money, which he applied to his own use; and almost every year since, by his continual making new demands of profits and perquisites for himself, and by his taking, and threatening to take away, sometimes with the forced consent of the governing part of the College, and sometimes without any consent at all, several known privileges and perquisites from the rest of the College in general, and even Fellowships and Scholarships from several in particular, and by threatening and assuming to inflict several unstatutable and (before his time) unheard-of punishments upon several of the Fellows, for no other reason but because he heard they talk'd against his proceedings; and by his using violence and unworthy methods, whereby he has prevail'd with some few of the College to espouse his separate interest, the peace of this royal and ample foundation has not only for many years been wholly broken, but the statutes have been violat'd, and the goods of the College wast'd, and many of the Fellows reduced to great necessity, by his lessening the value of their fellowships, which were before but very small; nevertheless, the Fellows and Members of the said College, out of a peaceable disposition, and being persuad'd by the said Dr Bentley's fair promises, which he constantly made upon gaining any new advantage, that they should enjoy peace and quietness for the future; and out of respect to those that made him their Master, though they could not be wholly silent, they were unwilling publickly to complain to their superiors, till now again this last year the said Dr Bentley, not only making another exorbitant demand of profits to himself, but, in order thereto, endeavouring to make an alteration almost throughout the whole College in their dividends and dues, whereby they are maintained, and which they and their predecessors have for many years enjoyed, and that in a partial manner, and by such methods as are before mention'd. We are necessitat'd at this time to petition and complain to your Lordship, promising within a convenient time to lay before you, in such method as you shall appoint, the several particulars, wherein the truth of what is here alledg'd will manifestly appear; humbly craving in due time such sentence as to your Lordship's wisdom and justice shall seem meet.

Feb. 6, 1709. Signed by 30 of the College.

This the Bishop sent immediately to Dr Bentley, viz. on the 11th of February, and the Doctor answer'd it on the 13th (59); but as there were several pieces published on both sides on this occasion, we shall endeavour to give the reader some account of them (60).

A true Copy of Articles against Dr Bentley, exhibited to the Right Rev. Father in God John More, Lord Bishop of Ely, by many of the Fellows of Trinity-college in Cambridge; together with the College Statute, de Amotione Magistris, and several other clauses of the College Statutes, with References to the Articles. Lond. 1710, 8vo.

The present State of Trinity-college in Cambridge, in a Letter from Dr Bentley, Master of the said College, to the Right Rev. John, Lord Bishop of Ely. Published for general information by a Gentleman of the Temple. Lond. 1710, 8vo.

Some Remarks upon a Letter, intitl'd, The Present State of Trinity-college in Cambridge. Written by Richard Bentley, D. D. now Master of the said College, to the Right Rev. John, Lord Bishop of Ely. With some Remarks also upon the Preface, pretended to be written and published together with the Letter by a Gentleman of the Temple, by Mr Miller, Fellow of the College. Lond. 1710, 8vo.

Some Considerations humbly offer'd to John Lord Bishop of Ely, on a Book, intitl'd, The Present State of Trinity-college in Cambridge, by Dr Bentley; by a Master of Arts, and Fellow of the said College. Lond. 8vo.

The true State of Trinity-college, in a Letter to a residing Fellow of that Society; wherein the trifling impertinencies, malicious aspersions, and bold falsehoods of Dr Bentley, are answer'd in such a manner as they deserve. Published for the information of the Students, Scholars, and Fellows of both Universities. Lond. 1710, 8vo.

Besides these, the first of which alone we were not able to procure, we also find the following ones published at this time, and upon this account, all which we have consult'd and made use of in this work.

A full View of Dr Bentley's Letter to the Lord Bishop of Ely, in a Discourse to a Friend; wherein the whole strain of that celebrated piece throughout is fairly, familiarly, and largely consider'd, by Tho. Blomer, M. A. Fellow of Trinity-college, Cambridge. 1710.

A true and impartial Account of the present Differences between the Master and Fellows of Trinity-college, Cambridge, consider'd. In a Letter to a Gentleman, some time Member of that Society, 1711.

An humble and serious Representation of the Present State of Trinity-college in Cambridge. In a Letter to a noble Lord.

But to return to the subject of the petition at the beginning of the note. The Doctor, far from being guilty of what he is charg'd with in that petition, seems to have been rather their great benefactor, laying several sums of money out of his private purse

(59) This Letter is dated at her Majesty's Library, Febr. 12, 1709-10.

(60) Mr Rawlinson, in his English Topographer.

fyng aspersions, and were the subject of many pamphlets pro and con upon that occasion, viz. His Lordship received the charge; intending to proceed upon it, which he conceived himself sufficiently authorized to do, required Dr Bentley's answer, which he declined for some time to give (y), pleading want of form in the charge; because other members of the college, besides the Seniors, had joined in the accusation, and the Seniors themselves, as he alledged, had never yet admonished him, from whence he inferred, that all proceedings on such a charge, and whatsoever should follow on the same foot, would be ipso facto null and void (z); but the Bishop, it seems, did not think this plea to be material, for he insisted upon Dr Bentley's answer to the charge, who, upon that, began to question what authority his Lordship had over him; and by a petition presented to the late Queen, prayed 'that her Majesty would take him and the college into her protection, against the Bishop's pretensions, and maintain her sole power and jurisdiction over her royal foundation and the Masters thereof.' This petition was referred to the then Attorney and Solicitor-General, and they ordered fully to consider the matter, and report their opinions thereupon. Notice was given at the same time to the Bishop, that her Majesty having taken this affair into her cognizance, his Lordship was to stay proceedings 'till the Queen's pleasure was further known. Mr Attorney and Solicitor-General, took some time to consider, and were of opinion, the Bishop had power over the Master; but this report not proving satisfactory to some persons then in power, a letter was brought to the Bishop from Mr Secretary St John, dated 18 June 1711, acquainting him, 'that the matter of the petition of Dr Richard Bentley, Master of Trinity-college in Cambridge, together with the report of Mr Attorney and Mr Solicitor-General, being then before the Queen, and ordered to be taken into consideration by my Lord Keeper, assisted by her Majesty's Counsel learned in the Law, her Majesty thought it to be a business of such weight and consequence, that she had commanded him (the Secretary) to signify her pleasure to his Lordship, that he should stop all further proceedings, according to her Majesty's direction.' But the Master seeing that all discipline and studies would be lost in the college, if that controversy was not one way or other decided, applied to the then Ministry, to take his trial under any Visitor the Queen should appoint, or if none would be so appointed, that he might have leave, salvo jure regio, to be voluntarily tried under the Bishop. Upon this, the inhibition was taken off by Mr Secretary St John, by order of the Queen, signifying, that his Lordship was at liberty to proceed, so far as by the law he might. But his Lordship did not think fit to proceed, 'till he was served with a Rule of Court from the King's-Bench, in Easter term 1714, to shew cause why a writ of Mandamus should not issue out against him. The Bishop being then at Ely, was applied to by joint-messengers on both sides, to make a step to the college, and there he might have ended the matter in two days. But this was not thought so proper, and Ely house at London was pitched on, where, instead of two days, the trial lasted at least six weeks, and the college paid a thousand pounds for it; three learned Lawyers, who in repairing and beautifying the College, which by his care has been greatly ornamented and improved; but the chief thing that he had disguised them by was, his prudent regulations of several enormous and expensive abuses, in open breach and violation of the Statutes; for this, rather than any real suffering on their part, or male-administration on his, seems the chief of their quarrel or uneasiness grounded; and their several letters, remarks, and considerations on this letter and subject, seem rather actuated by a spirit of private malice, envy, revenge, or personal pique (*); but we cannot here enter into the whole affair pro and con, but, after reading over the several pieces wrote against him, must partly imagine, (if not too much biased in his favour by his great learning) that the case was in a great measure as we have above stated it. The reader, to be convinced of this, need only read over the Doctor's letter to the Bishop of Ely, and almost any one of the pieces wrote against him above mentioned. But on this subject we cannot introduce any thing more to the purpose than the following quotation: 'When I remember the state of that College before Dr Bentley came to it, and compare it with the flourishing condition of it at present, I am amazed at the vile ingratitude of those narrow-soul'd wretches, that, not content to defraud that great man of the honour and thanks due to him, for recovering a Society to some splendour and figure, are not ashamed to talk as if Trinity had been ruined by one that has been visibly so great a benefactor to it. What a devotion to malice and stupidity must these people pay, that after so many noble improvements that Dr Bentley has made in this College, in every possible particular, can have the face to say such things of him, as in the confession of one of their tribe here, shamelessly describing his own talent this way, hardly any man but himself would bear the scandal or odium of, for all his preferments and learning. Has the utmost malice of a few railing incendiaries ever produced any thing that should lessen Dr Bentley in any man's esteem? No, nor ever will, but amongst such as a great and generous spirit passes with for a proud and haughty one; who, because Trinity-college is one of the handsomest in Europe, cry out plunder and dilapidation; and are ready to swear that he has impoverished the Society, because it is twelve hundred pounds a year the richer merely by his good management. The Gentlemen of that Society are sensible, I believe, that it would be a long panegyric to give Dr Bentley all the praises due to him upon the account of his mastership; and though there are some few, even amongst those who have been the most obliged to him, of different taste and sentiment, 'tis not to be wondered at: There is a Genus Hominum, that, whether from the natural make and constitution of the men, or from a certain acquired antipathy to merit, seem incapable of doing justice to it in others. When men will quit their gratitude to take up the most absurd prejudices, there is no persuading them that ten dividends are not more than twenty, or that two or three and twenty lads a year admitted in Dr M—gue's time, are not more than forty in Dr B's. It is a reflection to the honour of that College that it afforded but four Fellows, and those, without flattery, none of the wisest, that could entertain such a stupid notion of duty, privilege, and conscience, as to give their votes for their Master's degradation. And a famous Lawyer, that was of the counsel against him at his trial, has since, as I have heard, declared, that he was sure Dr Bentley must be a very good and virtuous man, since, in the course of that trial, nothing inconsistent with that character could be proved against him (61).

(61) A Review of the Proceedings against Dr Bentley, in the University of Cambridge; in Answer to a late pretended full and impartial Account, &c. pag. 69, 73, 74.

(y) A Vindication of the Bishop of Ely's visitatorial Jurisdiction over the College in general, and over the Master thereof in particular, p. 18; this however does not appear, since his Answer was given in within three Days after the Petition had been given to the Bishop. See note [7].

(z) The present State of Trinity-College, in Cambridge, in a Letter from Dr Bentley to the Bishop of Ely, 1710, p. 10.

(*) See Oldmixon's Hist. and Reign of the Stuar-arts, p. 629.

who could know but very little of the matter, being admitted on each side, to make eloquent harangues, answers, and replies, upon questions arising from above fifty articles, in which there was scarce any thing material, that might not easily be determined, upon a bare inspection of the college Statutes, Registers, and Books of Accompts. The trial being ended, and the cause ripe for sentence, the Bishop's death prevented his giving judgment [U]. Thus the matter dropped for the present, but was afterwards revived in the year 1728, when new articles of complaint against Dr Bentley, charging him with having in many instances made great waste of the college revenue, and violated the Statutes, all founded on the 40th of Elizabeth, were again exhibited to my Lord of Ely, as specially authorized and appointed to receive the same, and to proceed thereupon. Though the matter was long before decided in favour of the Crown, as having the general visitatorial power [X]. Upon which, a petition was subscribed by the college, and presented [U] The Bishop's death prevented his giving judgment. Some time after the Bishop's death came out the following piece: 'A true account of the Present State of Trinity-college in Cambridge, under the oppressive government of their Master, Richard Bentley, late D. D. Lond. 1720, 8vo.' The Gentleman who wrote this piece, having thought fit to acknowledge it, and do justice to one who was suspected as the author of it, gave the following publick notice to the world.

Cambridge, Feb. 19, 1719-20.

WHEREAS the Master of Trinity-college is prosecuting the author and publisher of a book, intituled, A true account of the Present State of Trinity-college in Cambridge, under the oppressive government of their Master Richard Bentley, late D. D. for preventing all unnecessary trouble and expense in such prosecution, I hereby voluntarily acknowledge myself to be the sole author of the said book; and do declare, that the several facts therein mentioned, are no other than what have either been proved upon the Master at a publick trial before the late Bishop of Ely, (who died before sentence was given) or will certainly; with many more of the same kind, be charged and proved upon him by the Fellows, whenever there shall be a Visitor assigned for that purpose, for which they have long been petitioning; and I solemnly protest, that I had no other view in writing the said book, but to promote and bring on such a visitation, by shewing the necessity of it, and to do justice to my worthy oppressed friends of that College (whereof I was not long since a Fellow) which they are not able to do for themselves, but at the hazard of their own Fellowships; (the Master having, since the publication of this book, attempted to deprive a Reverend and Learned Member of the Seniority, for the bare suspicion of his being the author of it) and I do affirm, that I have said nothing material in the said book, but under the utmost conviction of it's truth, either from my own knowledge, or upon the best evidence and information, as will easily appear whenever there shall be occasion; and if in the mean while the Master, or any of his friends, will undertake to answer me in print, I hereby promise either to defend and prove every article alledged against him, or to make him the satisfaction of a publick recantation.'

CONYERS MIDDLETON, D. D.

[X] Though the matter was long before decided in favour of the Crown, as having the general visitatorial power. The Statute by which the Bishop of Ely claimed a visitatorial power, was, the 46th of Edward the VIth (62); but from the general visitatorial power, if not from the particular one of the Master, he was thus excluded by the opinion of the most eminent in their profession (63). 'We are of opinion, that these Statutes of King Edward VI. were not of perpetual obligation, or unalterable, but were alterable by the Statutes made by Queen Elizabeth, they being accepted and acted under by the College. — We are of opinion the Statutes of Queen Elizabeth are valid, and were intended as a complete body of Statutes for that College, and the original Statutes made by King Edward VI, expressed to have been under the Great Seal, being now without the same, from which they may be presumed to have been cancelled on the making of those of Queen Elizabeth; and the Bishops of Ely, from the making of the Statutes of Queen Elizabeth, having never exercised or claimed the power of a Visitor, we humbly apprehend the 46th chapter of the Statutes of King Edward VI, de visitatore, was omitted in the body of Statutes of Queen Elizabeth; — and we are humbly of opinion, that her Majesty, with the acceptance of the College, if the Statute de visitatore be in force (64), may repeal the same; but her Majesty's declaration without such acceptance will not be effectual.'

Anno, 1711-12.

Tho. Powys, J. Conyers,
Edw Northey, Tho. Lutwyck,
Rob. Raymond, John Ward (65).
Nich. Hooper,

First, we shall observe how forceable the argument used by the Queen's counsel is, that Edward's Statutes by being without the Broad Seal now, which once was affixed to them, must from thence be presumed to have been cancelled (66). Besides, the Crown always nominates the Master of Trinity, but the Fellows and Scholars are chosen by the College: Is it not then absurd to think that the Crown should so carefully refuse to itself the power over the Fellows and Scholars whom it does not elect, and abandon the Master alone, it's own Elect and Nominee, to an external visitation? The result of all is, that since Queen Elizabeth, no Bishop of Ely meddled in Trinity-college before the present Master's voluntary trial under Bishop More. Fellows and Scholars have the King only for their Visitor; the Master, if this 40th Statute be in force, is to have both King and Bishop too. That being absurd and impossible, it was put as a question to the Queen's learned counsel, Whether the Crown could not take from the Bishop that imagined power over the Master, by Letters Patent under the Great Seal; and the answer was, That by Letters under the Great Seal, the Queen might annul this 40th Statute, the cause of the disturbance, and make the Crown sole visitor of the Master, as well as the College, if the College accepted them, and that the College now desires and petitions for; but in reverse, if the King should be induced to give the right of the Crown by Letters Patent to the Bishop, the College, to say the least, would have the extremest reluctancy to accept such Letters, they being thereby abjoined from the more immediate care of the Crown, which even from the date of Elizabeth's Statutes, had been always thought to have the visitatorial power over them, and has accordingly exercised it. The College have before declared under their Common Seal in their petition to his Majesty, and they now do, that they don't desire to avoid any enquiry into the state of their Society, or the conduct of any Members thereof, being earnestly desirous that the same may be made by any legal authority; which legal authority, or general visitatorial power over them, for the reasons above-mentioned, they apprehend to be vested in the Kings of this realm, as successors to the Royal Founder of their Society. If this point be determined, as the Society hope it will, by the King's most honourable Privy-Council, the Master and Fellows of the said Society, in vindication of their own honour, and in justice to themselves, humbly propose forthwith to beseech his Majesty, to condescend to nominate Commissioners, to visit and enquire into the state of the said Society; or if it be not proper to be determined by the honourable Privy-Council, they hope, as the right of the Crown is in question, en issue at Law, or such other method, as in their wisdom shall seem most proper, will be by them directed; so that the ques-

(64) That is, whether the Bishop had a visitatorial power over the Master in particular, tho' not over the College in general.

(65) The Case of Trinity-college in Cambridge, whether the Crown or the Bishop of Ely be General Visitor, p. 24.

(66) Ibid. p. 17.

(62) A Vindication of the Lord Bishop of Ely's visitatorial Jurisdiction over Trinity-college in general, and the Master in particular.

(63) As the Bishop acknowledges in his Petition, Nov. 2, 1728.

presented to his Majesty under the Common-Seal, the 10th of August 1728, and the cause carried before the King in Council; for the college itself now engaged as party in the cause against the Bishop, and above fifteen hundred pounds out of the revenues of the college, was spent in carrying it on. This being referred to a Committee of his Majesty's most honourable Privy-Council, Dr Fleetwood, then Lord Bishop of Ely, on the second of November 1728, also presented a petition to his Majesty, to be heard touching his right, which was likewise referred to the said Committee. The Lords Committee, just before the day appointed for a hearing, viz. March 13, 1728, had a printed pamphlet put into their hands, intitled, The Case of Trinity-college; Whether the Crown or the Bishop of Ely be General Visitor (a)? at the end of which, as well as in their petition, the college applied to the King, to take the visitatorial power (as by the opinion of Counsel he might with their consent) into his own hands, that they might be only visited by the Crown, but not with a view or intent of avoiding a visitation or enquiry into the state of the society, for which they were very pressing, both in their petition, and at the end of this pamphlet. On the fifteenth, the Cause came on before the Lords of the Committee of Privy-Council, but was from thence referred to the King's-Bench (b) [Z], where the May following it was tried by way of Prohibition, and after a long pleading, the Judges unanimously determined it in favour of the Bishop, as to his visitatorial power over the Doctor (c); and the June following, the Fellows exhibited their articles of complaint against him before the Bishop of Ely, his Lordship having two assistants, viz. Sir Henry Penrice, and Dr Bettesworth (d). But it being urged, that the Bishop was going to exercise a general visitatorial power, another petition was preferred to his Majesty and Council, by the Master and Fellows, and a further hearing appointed in this cause, in the Court of King's-Bench, in November 1729, &c (e). and in November 1731, we find the cause had gone against the Bishop of Ely, by his taking out a writ of Error, for carrying the cause by appeal into the House of Lords (f). The Crown, however, at last, to put an end to the dispute and disturbance (as fully impowered (g) to do) took both College and Master, according to their petition, into it's own jurisdiction and visitation, and here the matter ended. ——— The proceedings of the University against him in the year 1717 also, made much noise in the world, and were represented as violent and unjustifiable, as the effects of a power falsely usurped, or scandalously abused, being influenced by the malice of a party disaffected to the government (h), were the cause of great ferment and uneasiness in the University, and raised the curiosity, and drew the eyes of the whole nation upon them; for which reason we shall beg leave to be a little particular and full in our account, that we may give the reader a just idea of them. In October 1717, the day after his Majesty's visit to the University, when several Doctors in Divinity, named by mandate, were attending in the senate-house to receive their degrees. Dr Bentley, on creation, made a demand of four guineas from each of them, as a fee due to him as Professor [Z], over and above a broad-piece, which had by custom been allowed as a present on this occasion; and absolutely refused to create any Doctor, 'till this fee was paid him. This occasioned a long and warm dispute, 'till at last many of them, the Doctors, and Dr Middleton among the rest, consented to pay the fee in question, upon this

(a) See note [X].

(b) Monthly Chronicle for March, 1729.

(c) Monthly Chron. for May, 1729.

(d) Ibid. for June, 1729.

(e) Ibid. for November, 1729.

(f) Ibid. for November, 1731.

(g) See note [X].

(h) See Oldmixon's History and Reign of the Stuarts, p. 629.

‘ stion now depending, Whether the Crown or the Bishop of Ely be General Visitor, may receive a full and a proper determination (67).

(67) The Case of Trinity-college, Cambridge, whether the Crown or the Bishop of Ely be General Visitor, p. 17, 18.

(68) The Statute of 16 Car. I. cap. 10.

[Y] On the 15th the cause came on before the Lords of the Committee of Privy-Council, but was from thence referred to the King's-Bench.] The Attorney and Solicitor-General were Counsel for the Master and the Fellows, and Dr Henschman and Mr Fazakerley for the Bishop. There was a very full Committee of Council, and, after hearing the arguments of the Counsellors on both sides, An Act for regulating the Privy-Council (68) was read; which, among other things, says, ‘ That neither his Majesty, nor his Privy-Council, have, or ought to have, any jurisdiction, power or authority, by English bill, petition, article, libel, or any other way whatsoever, to examine, or draw into question, determine, or dispose of lands, tenements, hereditaments, goods or chattels, of any the subjects of the kingdom, but that the same ought to be tried and determined in the ordinary Courts of justice, &c.’ Whereupon the Lords declined making any order or report.

[Z] Made a demand of four guineas from each of them, as a fee due to him as Professor.] In answer to such as may plead the illegality and unstatuteness of demanding this fee, it may not be improper to ask, ‘ What Statute had Dr Gooch for taking two guineas as Vice-Chancellor, of each of the King's Doctors that went out under him? What Statute had Dr Grigge, when he was Vice-Chancellor, to demand of each of those Doctors that went out under him, two guineas quatenus Secretary to the Duke of Somerset, and two more quatenus Vice-Chancellor? Dr Grigge could take four guineas, because of his double capacity; and when he was succeeded by Dr Gooch in the Vice-Chancellorship, he still demanded his two guineas quatenus Secretary, and Dr Gooch claimed the other two, as being Vice-Chancellor. The Proctors, the Register, the Beadles, had some their two guineas, others, one guinea, from each Doctor; by what statute? For 'tis known the Register's fee is but six-pence by Statute, and the others proportionable. Dr Bentley may be condemned for claiming these four guineas; but then Dr Gooch must be condemned for exacting two guineas; and Dr Grigge for exacting four guineas, and all the rest for exacting their guineas equally. These fees are all equally unstatutable, and equally unjust. Besides, the Vice-Chancellor gave orders (as the Impartial Account tells us) ‘ that any other Doctor of Divinity should perform the ceremony, by which you are not to understand that the Vice-Chancellor transferred the Professor's right to Dr Fisher; so that according to this notion, it is a province that does not more statutablely belong to the Professor than to any other Doctor. Since then the office belongs to the Professor as a Doctor of Divinity only, and may consequently be performed by any other Doctor, then might he refuse to do it, but on his own terms, and might set what price he pleased upon his own labour. From whence it appears, that the University could not oblige him to do it at any fixed rate, and even had no authority to command him to do it at all; and though the Professor may be condemned for exacting such a fee, he may be fully justified in it upon this supposition (69).’

(69) The Case of Dr Bentley, &c. p. 13, 14, 15, 32, and 33.

[A] The

this condition, that he should restore the money if it was not afterwards determined to be his right. In the next meeting, those who had paid the fee were created, but he refused to create such as would not pay it; upon which Dr Grigge, then Vice-Chancellor, gave orders, that some other Doctor should perform the ceremony instead of him, and accordingly Dr Fisher, the Master of Sydenham-college, created several for the usual gratuity of a broad-piece; they sent, at the same time, a state of the Case to the Chancellor, the Duke of Somerset. Dr Bentley still insisted upon his claim; but at last, instead of money, was content with a note from the rest, promising the payment of it, if it should be determined for him by the King, or any authority delegated from him; and at last submitted to create one of the King's Doctors, who came last, and some others who commenced afterwards, without either fee or note. Matters went on thus for near a twelvemonth, the Doctor being in quiet possession of the money and notes; but nothing being determined about his right or title to it, Dr Middleton thought he had reason to expect his money again, and accordingly (as it is said) made (b) a demand of it, first by letter, which was taken no notice of, and afterwards in person, and then applied to the Vice-Chancellor for a decree, which, from the tender regard the Vice-Chancellor had for Dr Bentley, he was some time before he could obtain. At length, however, the decree was granted, and a known enemy of Dr Bentley's employed to serve it (i), who went to Trinity-lodge on Tuesday the twenty-third of September, but whether through ignorance in his own business, or that he believed Dr Bentley, who told him that it signified nothing, not having the consent of nine heads to it, or that he had some other design than that of arresting him, he leaves the arrest, decree, &c. with the Doctor, and came away without executing the Vice-Chancellor's orders at all (k). Dr Bentley was afterwards arrested by another Beadle, on the first of October, with a second decree, which doubtless argued the invalidity of the first. The Professor supposing the authority of the arrest not sufficient, refused to submit to it; but on farther consideration obeyed the writ, and put in bail. Every body, but such as were let into the secret, expected this four guineas affair would end here. Friday the third of October being appointed for the trial, the Doctor only appeared there by his Proctor, which was looked upon as a contempt of the Vice-Chancellor's jurisdiction [AA]. Dr Middleton, therefore, by the leave of the Court, appointed

(b) A full and impartial Account of all the late Proceedings in the University against Dr Bentley, p. 9.

(i) A Review of the Proceedings, &c. p. 14.

(k) Ut supra, p. 15.

[AA] The Doctor only appeared there by his Proctor, which was looked upon as a contempt of the Vice-Chancellor's jurisdiction.] The Doctor's non-appearance in person being alleged against him as a chief article in this affair, it may not be improper to search a little into this. One author tells us, 'No man can appear in our court by his Proctor, who does not first appear in person, (unless it be in case of sickness) and desire the Judge to assign him a Proctor (70).' Another informs us, 'His non-appearance was such an instance of contempt, as has seldom been known in the University; and that to tell us, as Dr Bentley did afterwards, that he had sent a Proctor to appear for him, is so far from excusing, that it aggravates his offence; for by our express Statutes, and the practice of the Court, no party can be in judgment, or allowed to appear by proxy, till he has personally asked and obtained the Judge's leave to constitute a Proctor; and if the plaintiff be present, which was the case, and the defendant absent, his Proctor cannot be admitted: And farther, if either party shall presume to procure or retain one to act for him, contrary to the tenor of the Statute, he shall, if the plaintiff, for that very reason lose his cause; if the defendant, be looked upon as convict, and censured accordingly (*).—Now it seems it is the constant practice to dispense with a debtor's personal appearance; so that the Professor could not be charged with any contempt on that account, unless the Vice-Chancellor had given him notice that he was resolved to set aside that practice, which is as sacred to other Courts as a Law. But in truth the Statute supposes no contempt, but says expressly, that in that case the defendant shall be held convict, but not as the Impartial Account adds, (without authority) and censured accordingly. For, as the plaintiff not appearing shall lose his cause, the defendant shall forfeit his debt; or, as it is ordered in a later Grace, (of greater force, where it differs from it, than the old Statute or Decree before us, which was never confirmed by Royal authority) shall forfeit his bail-bond. Nor can a Vice-Chancellor put even that Statute in execution, if the Proctor be ready to swear, that his client is detained by sickness, or any other lawful reason, from making his appearance in Court. So that, including all the circumstances, if the Vice-Chancellor had resolved at this time to break through the practice of his Court, he could not, without a direct breach of Statute, (which he is equally bound to observe with every other Member of the University) have punished him, in the manner he did, for non-appearance. Besides, it cannot be pretended, that this drew on the suspension, because the Vice-Chancellor declared, that he postponed that affair of the debt, and then ordered the Beadle's deposition to be read; on which an unlucky record was made, bearing witness, that the Professor was accused of contempt as contained therein. How ridiculous then must these vindicators of the Vice-Chancellor appear, who ground their arguments on the truth of a fact, which is contradicted by his own declaration, by the very acts of his Court (71).' It is asserted by the two authors quoted in this note, who wrote against Dr Bentley, that the Statutes justify the Professor's punishment on account of contempt, which must either consist in his non-appearance, or in the matters alleged against him in the Beadle's deposition; for the former, that could only be punished by the forfeiture of his bail-bond; for, besides what we have just mentioned of Statutes, he was arrested for a debt; in which circumstances no man can be guilty of contumacy, for the person of the debtor is required either of his bail, or the arresting officer. The debtor himself is not at all concerned. Dr Middleton brought an action of debt against him, to this the Doctor gave bail; in which case the Statutes of the University are express, that if the person arrested does not appear, his bail is answerable, which is common likewise to all Courts in England. Now as the Doctor did not appear, and no favour was shewn, why did not the Vice-Chancellor secure to Dr Middleton his debt in a statutable way, by laying hold on the bail? Why should Dr Bentley be suspended for not appearing, when the Statute expressly provides for the security of the creditor another way, and therefore did not require the appearance of the debtor. Can a Court be contemned by forfeiture of the bail-bond? An action for debt is here plainly confounded with a process for crimes and misdemeanors, by insisting on personally asking and obtaining the Judge's leave to constitute a Proctor, and on the contempt of the Court in not appearing, &c. whereas they ought to prove it an incivility and disrespect to the Vice-Chancellor, or to any Judge, to forfeit a man's bail-bond. Was this cleared up, the proceedings might be a little justified perhaps, in condemning Dr Bentley uncited and unheard, and in making

(71) The Case of Dr Bentley, Regius-Professor of Divinity truly stated, &c. p. 26, 27.

(70) The Proceedings of the Vice-Chancellor and University of Cambridge, against Dr Bentley.

(*) The Impartial Account, p. 16.

appointed Mr Cook his Proctor, who accused Dr Bentley of contempt for not appearing, and moved for some censure upon it, and called for the Beadle to make a return of the first decree (l); but he being confined in his chamber, by a fit of the gout, there made an affidavit, by improving some circumstantial talk he had with the Doctor and some other gentlemen (m), the subject of which was, a complaint of the ill usage he had met with in his attending at Dr Bentley's lodgings, who amongst other things (he deposed) said to him, I will not be concluded by what the Vice-Chancellor and two or three of his friends shall determine over a bottle (n) (thereby reflecting on the clandestine way they had proceeded against him, without the formal consent of such a number of Heads, as he thought necessary to make a statutable (o) arrest); for this expression, the Vice-Chancellor suspended the Doctor from all his degrees [BB], who had no citation, no hearing, not so much as any notice, from any hand, of what was then doing; declaring, he would vacate his Professorship in two or three days, if he did not make his humble submission (p). 'Three Court-days are allowed for this submission, viz. the 7th, 9th, and 15th of October. On the two former days his name was not mentioned, and on the last, the Vice-Chancellor would certainly have forgot to summon him, if he had not been reminded by his brother the Dean of Chichester. That same day the Vice-Chancellor requires the Professor to submit, and own himself rightly suspended. So that, he first puts it out of the Professor's power to vindicate himself, and then commands him to confess a fault that he had not been guilty of, and to acknowledge the justice of a sentence, that has no precedent here, nor any parallel in History. The only remedy that was now left, the Professor applied to, viz. an appeal to the Delegates of the University [CC]; which was arbitrarily refused him. But thinking it prudent to have the sanction of the University to back him, the Vice-Chancellor calls a Congregation, tells his own tale, and has the pleasure to behold the madness of the people (q). For this he had also another very strong motive, viz. to prevent the Professor's being ever restored by the single power of any succeeding Vice-Chancellor, by engaging the University to proceed, where he had left off; and after an illegal suspension, to assume a power of degrading (r). The 15th of October, the third Court-day after the suspension, the Vice-Chancellor informed the University of the steps he had taken, and the message he had sent the Professor, which was, That he required him to come and acknowledge his crime, the legality of his suspension, and humbly beg to be restored to his degrees; to which the gentleman (he said) had returned no answer; and then he commanded it to be registered, that he would deliberate farther of what was to be done, towards the maintenance of the University privileges and his own authority. Eight Heads were present in the Consistory, viz. two Visitors of Bennet-college, Dr Cowell and Dr Balderston; three late Chaplains to his Majesty, Dr Laney, Dr Adams, and Dr Sherlock; the rival Professor, Dr Fisher; the Masters of Clare-Hall, and St John's-college, Dr Grigg and Dr Jenkins. These gentlemen, at a consultation the same afternoon, in the Master of Peterhouse's lodge, appointed a Congregation the next morning to

(l) A full and impartial Account, p. 16.

(m) A Review of the Proceedings, &c. p. 15.

(n) These words the Vice-Chancellor was pleased to insist upon as criminal, on account of which his suspension, and consequently degradation followed.

(o) The Case of Dr Bentley truly stated, p. 3.

(p) Ut supra, p. 4.

(q) Ibid. p. 11.

(r) Ibid. p. 9.

making it a term of his re-admission, that he should own the justice of the sentence of suspension.—As to the case of a contempt offered with respect to the Decree, Beadle, &c. it must be a contempt offered to the first writ, which was in reality acknowledged to be no writ; for if the first was good and lawful, why was a second granted? Should a legal writ be contemned? But 'tis a sure indication, that they are conscious of having taken a wrong step, when they grant a second writ upon the same action, without endeavouring to vindicate the contempt of the first. The contempt then was the contempt of a writ, which the Vice-Chancellor himself did at first condemn, for to the second writ Dr Bentley surrendered himself. Now if the first arrest was not valid, the usage of the Beadle can never be interpreted a contempt of any jurisdiction, because in that case he had no right to act as an officer. But suppose the arrest valid, a process ought to have been issued out, if it had been a matter of a criminal nature; but he had no citation.

[BB] The Vice-Chancellor suspends Dr Bentley from all his degrees. The latter part of the Journal for that day runs thus: Exhibuit depositiones Edw. Clarke, Bedell. Arm. quibus depositionibus lectis, Cook accusavit contemptum dicti rev. viri, prout in iisdem continetur; & dominus ad ejus petitionem pronunciauit rev. virum suspensum ab omni gradu suscepto (72). From this account of the suspension, it appears that the Vice-Chancellor pronounced Dr Bentley suspended from all his degrees, at the petition of Mr Cook, Dr Middleton's Proctor, (in a cause of debt) who accused Dr Bentley of contempt, contained in the depositions of Mr Clarke the Beadle. As to the suspending him at the desire of Mr Cook, ad ejus petitionem, how this came into the Acts is a little surprising; since Mr Cook said to some of his brother Lawyers, if that may be credited, soon after it was over, that he was as much surprized at the suspending of the Doctor as they;

and never desired any such thing, nor so much as thought on it. Moreover the Vice-Chancellor knew he was talking in relation to the debt affair only; for he interrupted him, waving the hand, and told him, that he would postpone his cause, and consider only Dr Bentley's great contempt of the authority and jurisdiction of the University, in calling a regular meeting of the Heads, to which he himself was invited, the Vice-Chancellor and his friends, over a bottle, &c. he then appealed to the Heads there present, and they giving their consent, he was suspended (73).

[CC] The only remedy now left, the Professor applied to, viz. an appeal to the Delegates of the University. The first step which this contemner of the University jurisdiction took, was, to appeal to the University itself, from the irregular sentence of its officer; who out of great concern, no doubt, for their rights and privileges, absolutely refused to let them be judges of what, in the plenitude of his own power, he had been pleased to order, and refused the Doctor the appeal; which refusal was plainly as great an insult upon the privileges of the University as could be, in direct opposition to all manner of Statutes, an appeal being allowed from the Vice-Chancellor to the Body in all cases, without any exception, nor has he ever any power at all to hinder it; it cannot be refused to any one that thinks himself injured, and will make it, and belongs to the Delegates to determine whether the ground of it be just or not; if it be, to give him relief; if not, then, and not till then, to remit the appellant to the Vice-Chancellor: Therefore when Dr Gooch hindered the Professor's appeal, he both denied him a right that he had by Statute, and was guilty of the very crime, upon pretence of which he suspended him, viz. contempt of the authority and jurisdiction of the University (74).

(73) A Review of the Proceedings against Dr Bentley, p. 27.

(72) The Journal of the Court.

(74) The Review of the Proceedings against Dr Bentley, p. 66, 67.

to degrade the Professor. But, when the time came, a friend of the Professor's being that day one of the Caput, other business was proposed but not concluded. On Friday morning, no mention was made, as ought to have been, of the proceedings at the last Congregation, but the grand affair being found practicable, was proposed to the Caput [DD]. And in the afternoon a vote of the body deprived the great Bentley of all the privileges, honours, and degrees, that he had received from it, and lost perhaps more honour than it took from the Professor. But if the suspension of Dr Bentley was arbitrary, unstatutable, and illegal, (as we imagine we have almost convinced the reader from text and notes) how much more so must the consequence of it, the degradation of this great man, from all his degrees, rights, and titles, in the university be. Upon this Dr Bentley (which we shall still venture to call him) drew up a petition, which he presented to his Majesty, Oct. 30, 1718, complaining of the proceedings of the Vice-Chancellor and University, begging his Majesty's relief and protection, as supreme Visitor of the University. The King, in Council, taking the said Petition into consideration, was pleased to order the same to be sent to the Reverend Dr Gooch, Vice-Chancellor; who was thereby directed to attend his Majesty in Council, on Thursday the sixth of November, 1718, to give an account of the proceedings which occasioned this complaint; on which day the case was heard between the University and the Doctor, before King and Council, and afterwards referred to a committee of Council. But the Ministry being unwilling to interpose their authority, with regard to the proceedings, the matter was farther referred, in a judicial way, to the Court of King's-Bench, where we imagine it was kept some time in agitation; at length, however, the proceedings of the University were reversed by that Court, and on February the 7th, 1723, the Court of King's-Bench sent down a Mandamus to the university of Cambridge, to restore Mr Bentley, Master of Trinity-college, to all his degrees, and whatever he had been deprived of, &c. according to a prophetick passage at the end of one of the pamphlets, at that time printed in his defence: 'When our present heats are over, I question not, but our Professor's Case will be looked upon with another eye, if it be not already seen, that the honour of the University was made a pretext only, to cover the resentments of some particular persons amongst it's members: as the determination of it lies at present before a judgment, where merit and not malice is likely to be regarded; we shall in a little time, I make no doubt, with a more scholar-like pleasure than can be perceived in this usage of the learned Bentley, congratulate ourselves upon his restoration to his well-merited honours.'—As to his particular preferments, and the exact times thereof, with the more private affairs and occurrences of his life, we shall be able to add very little upon that head, from want, as we before hinted, of an intimacy with some of his particular friends and acquaintance; all that we can farther add, to what we have before given, is, that in 1692, when under thirty years of age, we find him Tutor in Extraordinary to the Bishop of Worcester's son, and afterwards Chaplain to that learned Prelate, in whose family he spent fourteen years, with no small credit and applause. Mr Boyle hints (s) at his having been Amanuensis to the Bishop, but Dr Bentley tells us he never used one, and denies ever being in that capacity to any one. At the time of his being with the Bishop, he held a correspondence, not only with the most learned men of his own nation, but also with many foreigners, who even at that early age, gave him such testimonies of the great regard and esteem they had for his learning and abilities, as few besides himself can produce. Before he was made

(s) Boyle against Bentley, p. 223.

Library.

[DD] The grand affair found practicable was proposed to the Caput. The Caput, mentioned above, is a Committee of six persons chosen from different parts of the University, to consult and determine of what is proper to be proposed to the University, the Vice-Chancellor always being one. Every Grace, before it can be offered in congregation, must pass the scrutiny of the Caput, where each Member has a negative upon it; the Vice-Chancellor is the only person can propose any to them. The Grace was no sooner proposed to the Caput, but without any difficulty, or the least scruple, consented to; and so hearty were they in the cause, that it was proposed to expel Mr Bentley the University. This was not however done, which is very strange, since we are told they were all unanimous in the opinion, that he had statutablely deserved it, and that there wanted neither precedent, nor power, nor consent, for doing it (75). However, the Grace for degradation, which is as follows, was thought the most proper way. This was accordingly read and approved by the Caput, and concluded the business of the morning.

A Copy of the GRACE.

CUM Reverendus vir, Richardus Bentley, Collegii Trinitatis magister, ad summus in hac Universitate titulos et honores vestro favore dudum promotus, adeo se immemorem et loci sui et vestra authoritatis dederit, ut debite summonitus ad comparendum et respondendum in causa coram Pro-Cancellario obedientiam, recusaveret, ministrum Universitatis summonentem indignis modis tractaverit, Pro-Cancellarium et Capita Collegiorum, opprobriis impetiverit, jurisdictionem denique Universitatis, longo usu, Regis Chartis, et auctoritate Parliamenti stabilitatem pro nihilo habendam esse declaraverit; cumque idem Richardus Bentley super his causis ab omni gradu, suspensus fuerit, et postea per tres dies iudicatos expectatus comparere tamen neglexerat; placeat vobis ut dictus Richardus Bentley ab omni gradu, titulo et jure in hac Universitate dejiciatur & excludatur.

In the second meeting of the Congregation, in the afternoon, the Grace was again read, and voted in both Houses.

| | | |
|--|---|------------------|
| It passed in the Regent-house | { | Placets — 40 |
| | { | Non Placets — 15 |
| It passed likewise in the Non-Regent-house (76). | { | Placets — 62 |
| | { | Non Placets — 35 |

(75) An Account of the Proceedings against Dr Bentley, as delivered to his Majesty in Council.

But though the majority which voted the degradation was considerable, viz. 102 voices against 50, he had the honour to have for his friends, all that were remarkable for their steady affections to the government (77).

(77) The Case of Dr Bentley, &c.

[EE] For

(75) A full and impartial Account of the proceedings, &c. p. 39.

Library-Keeper to his Majesty, he was, we find by Mr Boyle, Library-Keeper to a learned Dean (t). He was Chaplain in Ordinary to King William III, as also to Queen Anne; had a good rectory in the Isle of Ely, and about the year 1729, was elected Regius-Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, for which chair, when he stood candidate, he held a very famous lecture [EE]. Soon after he was preferred to the mastership of Trinity, he married his Lady, by whom he had several children; she bore an excellent character, and died before him, in the year 1740. He died aged eighty years, on the fourteenth of July, 1742, and is buried in Trinity-college chapel [FF].

[EE] For which chair, when he stood candidate, he held a very famous lecture. Wherein he entirely gave up that famous text in the first epistle of St John, chap. v. 7. concerning the Three that bear record in heaven, and publicly proved it to be spurious. Mr Emlyn wrote an express treatise on that subject, at the desire of Dr Clarke and Mr Whiston, to which treatise Dr Bentley also alluded in this famous lecture; on which occasion Dr Waterland being asked, 'Whether Dr Bentley's arguments did not convince him?' replied, 'No; for he was convinced before (78).'

(78) Historical Memoirs of the Life of Dr Samuel Clarke, by Mr Whiston, p. 101. See also, An Epigram of Dr Bentley's, &c. ut supra, p. 21.

[FF] And is buried in Trinity-college chapel.] The inscription on the stone that covers him is only this:

H: S: E.
Richardus Bentley
S: T: P: R.
Obit xiv. Jul. 1742.
Ætatis 80.

These are all the monumentary honours of this great man, who indeed needed not the inscription of a tomb-stone to transmit his memory to posterity. R

The reader is desired to correct a mistake in this Life, in page 740, line 4 in the text, for at St James's, read before the University.

BERNARD (NICHOLAS) a learned Divine of the last Century, was born in England, and educated in the university of Cambridge, where he took the Degree of Master of Arts, and was incorporated (a) to the same Degree at Oxford, on the fifteenth of July 1628. He was created Doctor of Divinity of the university of Dublin, (as we think) but of this, or the time when it was done, we cannot speak with any certainty, for the reasons given in the remark [A]. He was ordained (b) by Primate Usher, in the year 1626, in St Peter's church, Droghedah, while he was only a Bachelor of Arts, and made his Chaplain, and soon after, by the Primate's interest, was promoted to the Deanery of Ardagh. His Grace having daily opportunities of taking notice of the parts, and the solidity of learning and judgment of Mr Bernard, employed him in making collections for some works he was then meditating, and more particularly for the Antiquities of the British Churches, which did not appear in publick till the year 1639. The Primate always expressed great friendship and esteem for him, and upon taking his leave of him at Droghedah in 1640, gave him (c) 'A serious Preparative against the heavy Sorrows and Miseries that he should feel before he saw him again, and spoke of them with that confidence, as if they had been within his view.' This serious discourse of the Primate's, proved in the event to be a prophecy [B]. The year following he published a book and a sermon, which gave offence to some of the over-rigid bigots of the Church of England [C]; but the Primate had too just and generous a way of thinking to withdraw from him his favour or countenance, for adhering strictly to the truth. The same year was published a pamphlet of his writing, upon a fact of which he was an eye-witness [D]. In the summer of 1642, having lost most of his substance, he returned safe to

(a) Fast. Oxon. Vol. I. p. 244.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Bernard's Life of Primate Usher. See also Harris's Bishops, p. 109.

[A] Cannot speak with any certainty for the reasons given in the remark.] The registries of the university of Dublin, preceding the times of the Restoration, are not in being; but as Dr Bernard was Chaplain to Primate Usher, from the year 1626 to the death of that learned Prelate, it is probable he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity some time before the year 1641, when he fled out of the kingdom at the time Droghedah was besieged by the Irish rebels, in which he had taken refuge, or soon after.

[B] This discourse of the Primate's proved in the event to be a prophecy.] It is taken notice of as a prophecy both by Dr Bernard, and Mr Parr, another chaplain of the Primate's, in the Lives they wrote of that Prelate, and by several other writers; and so is an expression of his in a sermon preached in the year 1601. upon Ezekiel iv. 6. And thou shalt bear the iniquity of the house of Judah forty days: I have appointed thee each day for a year; which words of Ezekiel, concerning the destruction of Jerusalem and the Jews, he applied to Ireland, and made use of this observable expression, i. e. 'From this year I reckon forty years, and then those whom you now embrace shall be your ruin, and you shall bear their iniquity.' Which time exactly answered to the rebellion which broke out forty years after. This matter bore heavy on his mind, as appears by his preparative to Dr Bernard, who suffered greatly in the rebellion the year following, was stripped of the greater part of his substance, drove from his ecclesiastical preferments, obliged to take shelter in Droghedah under the protection of the English army, was often in danger of his life, and at length, in the summer of 1642, made his escape to England to attend on the Lord Primate.

[C] Gave offence to some of the over-rigid bigots of the Church of England.] The book and sermon mentioned in the text were, I. The Penitent Death of a woful sinner; or, The Penitent Death of John Atherton, late Bishop of Waterford in Ireland, who was executed at Dublin the 5th of December, 1640; with some Annotations on several passages. Lond. 1641, 4to. 1642, 8vo. II. A Sermon preached at the burial of John Atherton, the next night after his execution, in St John's Church, Dublin. Lond. 1641, 4to. 1642, 8vo. Dr Bernard had the best opportunity in the world of knowing the truth of the fact for which Bishop Atherton suffered, having attended him in his exemplary preparation for death, and in his last moments; and he gives us his behaviour and confession fairly and honestly; yet some, out of a mistaken zeal for religion, think the story ought not to have been related though it were true, as if religion suffered, because all the members of it are not Saints; and one gentleman (1) is so hardy as to deny the fact, though the Bishop confessed it. These things are the effect of bigotry, and only becoming the schools of the Jesuits. See this matter fully told in the article ATHERTON.

[D] Was published a pamphlet of his writing, upon a fact, of which he was an eye-witness.] This pamphlet was a letter to a friend in Dublin from the siege of Droghedah, dated the 7th of January, 1641, and published immediately after.

(1) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 67.

to England to attend on the Lord Primate, and carried with him a welcome present in those times of calamity and distress, for which the whole kingdom of Ireland may with justice be said to be his debtor [E]. Upon his arrival in England, he was presented (d) by the Earl Bridgwater, to the rich rectory of Whitchurch in Shropshire, and after the declension of the Royal Cause, was made Chaplain to the Protector, one of his Almoners, and Preacher to the Society of Gray's-Inn. Being thus comfortably settled, in the year 1642, he found leisure, from his pastoral charge, to publish a few small treatises [F], mentioned in the remarks. After the Restoration of King Charles II, in 1660, being not satisfied of the thorough and firm settlement of the State of Ireland, he was terrified from venturing himself into it again, and therefore declined returning, and taking possession of his deanry, and continued at Whitchurch to his death, which happened in the winter of 1661. He left behind him several monuments of his industry, besides those before mentioned, a catalogue of which, from Anthony Wood (e), may be consulted underneath [G].

(d) Ath. Oxon. ibid.

(e) Ibid.

[E] Present—for which Ireland may be said to be his debtor.] The furniture of the Primate's house at Droghedah, and, which was more welcome, his choice library of books were secured by the care and diligence of Dr Bernard. After the Primate's death the library was removed to Ireland, and is now deposited in the college of Dublin for the use of the kingdom.

[F] He found leisure to publish some treatises.] These were, I. The whole proceedings of the Siege of Droghedah in Ireland; with a thankful remembrance of it's wonderful delivery, raised with God's assistance, by the prayers and sole valour of the besieged; with a relation of such passages as have fallen out there, and in the parts near adjoining. To which is added an Appendix, concerning other occurrences fallen out since. London, 1642. Dublin, 1642, 4to. Again Dublin, 1736. II. A Dialogue between Paul and Agrippa. London, 1642, 4to.

[G] A catalogue of his works from Anthony Wood.] They are—A farewell Sermon of Comfort and Concord, preached at Droghedah, printed 1651, 8vo.—The Life and Death of Dr James Usher, late Archbishop of Armagh, Primate, and Metropolitan of all Ireland, in a Sermon preached at his funeral in the abbey of Westminster, on the 17th of April, 1656. Lond. 1656, 12mo, afterwards enlarged. — The Judgment of the late Archbishop of Armagh and Primate of Ireland; concerning first, the extent of Christ's death and satisfaction; secondly, of the Sabbath, and observation of the Lord's-day, and of Ordination in other Reformed Churches, with a vindication of him from a pretended change of opinion in the first, some advertisements upon the latter, and, in prevention of further injuries, a declaration of his judgment in several other subjects. Lond. 1657, 8vo.

—This treatise was answered (3) by Dr Peter Heylyn, in a book, intitled, Respondet Petrus; or, The Answer of Peter Heylyn, D. D. to so much of Dr Bernard's book, intitled, The Judgment of the late Primate of Ireland, &c. as he is made a party by the said Lord Primate in the point of the Sabbath. London, 1658, 4to. — He also published several Letters which passed between him and Dr Heylyn, —and published and enlarged several posthumous works of Dr Usher, as His Judgment on Babylon, being the present See of Rome, Rev. xviii. 4. with a Sermon of Bishop Bedell's upon the same words, London, 1659. — Devotions of the antient Church, in seven pious prayers, &c. London, 1660, 8vo. — Clavi trabales, or Nails fastened by some great masters of assemblies, confirming the King's Supremacy, the Subject's Duty, and Church Government by Bishops; being a collection of some pieces written on these subjects by Archbishop Usher, Mr Hooker, Bishop Andrews, and Dr Hadrian Saravia; with a Preface by the Bishop of Lincoln. London; 1661, 4to. D

(3) Ibid. Vol. II. p. 283.

BERNARD (EDWARD) a most learned Astronomer, Linguist, and Critick, in the XVIIth century, was born at Perry St Paul, commonly called Paulers-Perry, near Towcester in Northamptonshire, on the second of May 1638 (a). He was the son of Joseph Bernard, Rector of that parish (b), and Elizabeth, daughter of John Lenche or Linche, of Wyche in Worcestershire, both of them of good parentage. He had his first education at Northampton, where his father removed some time after his marriage. But before he was six years of age his father died. Whereupon his mother sent him to London to his uncle; who took care of his education, and placed him, in 1648, in Merchant-Taylors-School, of which the most famous William Dugard was then Head-Master (c). Here he continued seven years [A], namely, 'till June 1655, when he was elected Scholar of St John's-college in Oxford (d). By this long stay at school, he had the advantage of laying-in an uncommon fund of learning; so that, when he first went to the University, he was master of the beauties and propriety of the Greek and Latin tongues, very conversant in the classical authors, and not unacquainted with Hebrew. He had also by frequent use gained a tolerably good Latin style for his age; and could make verses well. This poetical faculty remained with him as long as he lived; so that even to his dying day, he used sometimes to divert himself in making epigrams, which were smart and witty (e). But when he came to be settled in the University, he slighted this, which he looked upon as comparatively trifling, and applied himself with the utmost attention and diligence, to the more useful studies of History, Philology, and Philosophy; particularly to Philology, which he had a very great inclination to, and of which he was infinitely fond. Therefore, he first carefully read over, and attentively perused, the Greek and Latin authors, with the commentaries and emendations of the most famous antient and modern Criticks. Then, not satisfied with the knowledge of the languages of Greece and Rome, he would also be acquainted with Hebrew, Syriac, Arabic, and Coptic; and that not in a superficial manner, but so as thoroughly to understand them (f). Next, he turned his thoughts to the Mathematicks, of which he learned the elements under the most celebrated Dr J. Wallis; but by his own indefatigable application soon made himself master of every branch of that useful science. Three years after his admission into the University, he was made (a) Vita clarissimi & doctissimi Edwardi Bernardi, &c. Scriptore Tho. Smitho, S. T. P. at the end of Bishop Huntington's Epistles, Lond. 1704, 8vo, p. 1. Wood's Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. edit. 1721, col. 1084.

(b) Dr Smith says, he thinks his father was Rector of that parish — in ipso viculo, ut puto, sacrum parochi minus obibat — Vita &c. p. 1. but Mr Wood styles him Gentleman, ubi supra.

(c) Vita, &c. ut supra.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Vita, &c. ut supra, p. 4.

(f) Ibid. p. 7, 8.

[A] Here he continued seven years.] He staid two or three years in the upper form, that he might have an opportunity of being chosen into St John's college (1).

(1) T Smith, ubi supra, p. 3.

- (g) Ibid. p. 4. made Fellow of St John's-college (g). February the 12, 1658-9, he took his Degree of Bachelor of Arts (b), and that of Master, April the 16th, 1662 (i): and was now much esteemed and beloved, on account of his great parts and learning, and his remarkable sweetness of temper (k). In the year 1667, he was chosen one of the Proctors of the Univerfity: and on the 9th of June, 1668, took his Degree of Bachelor of Divinity, in compliance with the ftatutes of the founder of St John's-college (l); but fo great was his modefty, that he could not be prevailed upon to take his Doctor's degree 'till feveral years after (m). About December 1668 he went to Leyden, in order to confult feveral oriental manufcripts, left to that Univerfity by Jofeph Scaliger and Levin Warner; and particularly to examine the fifth, fixth, and feventh books of Apollonius Pergæus's Conic Seftions, of which the Greek text is loft, but are preferved in the Arabic verfion of that author. This verfion, the learned James Golius had brought from the Eaft, and it was now in the poffeffion of his executors; who finding that Mr. Bernard's chief defign in coming to Holland, was to confult that manufcript, allowed him the free ufe of it. Whereupon he tranfcribed the three books abovementioned, and the diagrams; intending to publifh them at Oxford with a Latin verfion, and proper notes, with a view to fupply the defect of the Greek, and correct the errors of the Arabic tranflation (n), but he was hindered from putting his defign in execution [B]. During his ftay in Holland, he contracted a friendfhip with the Profefors, and other eminent and learned men, at Leyden. At his return to Oxford, he applied himfelf with frefh vigour to his ftudies; and collated, or examined over again, the moft valuable manufcripts in the Bodleian library, which he had already collated, as well for his own ufe, as that of his friends. And fo obliging was he in this refpect, that he fpared neither time nor pains, to ferve the learned. This obliging temper, joined to his exact judgment and approved fidelity, induced all fuch as publifhed any antient authors, to defire his obfervations, or emendations from the manufcripts at Oxford; which he very readily imparted to them, and indeed oftener than fome did acknowledge. By this means, he came to be engaged in a very extenfive correpondence with the learned men of moft countries (o). About the year 1669, the famous Christopher Wren, L.L. D. Savilian Profefor of Astronomy at Oxford, being appointed Surveyor-General of his Majesty's works, and like to be much detained in London, obtained leave from the Vice-Chancellor to nominate a Deputy, and pitched upon Mr Bernard; which engaged the latter to a more intenfè application to the ftudy of Astronomy (p). In 1672, the Prefident and Fellows of his college, prefented him to the reftory of Cheame in Surrey. The February following, Dr Peter Mew, Prefident of that college, being advanced to the bifhoprick of Bath and Wells, appointed our author one of his Chaplains (q). Hereby, he was put into the direct road to good preferment, but he loft all views and hopes of it, by accepting of the place of Savilian Profefor of Astronomy, vacant by the refignation of Sir Christopher Wren [C], into which he was admitted April 9, 1673 (r). About this time, there was a noble defign formed in the Univerfity of Oxford, of collecting together, and publifhing, all the antient Mathematicians: this was chiefly promoted and encouraged by the worthy Dr John Fell, Dean of Chrift-Church, and Bifhop of Oxford; who endeavoured to obtain a fubfcription for the fupport of that extenfive work. Mr Bernard, who had it very much at heart, and firft formed the project of it, collected together all the old books upon that fubject, publifhed fince the invention of printing, and all the manufcripts he could difcover in the Bodleian and Savilian libraries; and difpofed them in order of time, and according to the matter they contained (s). Of this he drew a Synopfis, or Scheme, wherein the whole was divided into fourteen volumes; and prefented it to Bifhop Fell [D]. For a fpecimen of this noble defign, he publifhed a few fheets of Euclid in folio, containing the Greek text and a Latin verfion, with Proclus's Commentary in Greek and Latin, and learned fcholia and corollaries, and the figures neatly and accurately engraven on copper, at his own expence (t). And in order to promote the ftudy of Astronomy, which he looked upon as his proper profefion, he undertook an edition of the Parva Syntaxis Alexandrina [E]; in which, befides Euclid, are contained the fmall treatifes of Theodofius, Autolyceus, Menelaus, Ariftarchus, and Hipficles: but this was never publifhed (u). In the year 1676, at the recommendation of the Earl of Arlington, he was fent to France by King Charles II, to be Tutor to the Dukes of Grafton and Northumberland, natural fons of that King, by Barbara Villiers, Duchefs of Cleveland, who then lived with their mother

[B] He was hindered from putting his defign in execution.] But this book was publifhed at length by the learned Dr Edmund Halley, (at Oxford, 1710, fol.) who has given a Latin tranflation of the three laft books out of Arabic, and fupplied by his own ingenuity and induftry the eighth book, which was entirely loft.

[C] Vacant by the refignation of Dr Wren.] For, by the ftatutes of the founder, (Sir Henry Savile) the Profefors are not allowed to hold any other office, either ecclefiaftical or civil, that they may constantly apply themfelves to their proper ftudies, and not be diverted from them (2).

[D] Of this he drew up a Synopfis or Scheme, &c.] It was publifhed by Dr Tho. Smith, at the end of his Life of our author, under the title of Veterum Mathematicorum Græcorum, Latinorum, et Arabum, Synopfis, Collectore Viro clariffimo & doctiffimo, D. Edwardo Bernardo. And, at the end of it, there is a catalogue of fome Greek writers, who are fuppofed to be loft in their own language; but are preferved in the Syriac or Arabic tranflations of them.

[E] Parva Syntaxis Alexandrina.] Or Μικρὰς Ἀστρονομίας, of the contents of which there is an account in the Veterum Mathematicorum Synopfis, mentioned in the laft note, p. 17.

(2) Smith, Vita, &c. as above, p. 86.

mother at Paris. But being a man of a meek spirit, and great modesty, though however without the least moroseness, he was not so acceptable in that station, as a person of a more gay and courtly temper would have been (w). Therefore, after about a year's stay there, he returned to his beloved retirement at Oxford; having, in that voyage, reaped the pleasure and advantage, of becoming acquainted with the learned in France [F], of collating several antient and valuable manuscripts, and of buying many scarce and curious books for his own library (x). Upon his return to Oxford, he resumed his studies with greater alacrity. And though, according to the duty of his professorship, he spent most of his time in the Mathematicks; yet he had a much greater inclination to History, Chronology, and Antiquities. This made him undertake a new edition of Josephus [G], which, however, for some reasons, was never completed. In 1683, he went a second time to Holland, in order to be present at the sale of Nicholas Heinsius's library by auction; where he purchased, at a great price, several of the classical authors, that had been either collated with manuscripts, or illustrated with the marginal notes of Joseph Scaliger, Bonaventure Vulcanius, the two Heinsius's, and other great Critics (y). There he renewed, or contracted, an acquaintance with several persons of eminent learning [H]; and so taken was he with the civilities and humanity of the Dutch, and the great opportunities in that country, of making considerable improvements in Oriental learning, that he almost determined to settle at Leyden; if he could have been chosen Professor of the Oriental tongues in that university; but missing of that, he returned to Oxford. He began now to be weary of the dry and unentertaining study of Astronomy, which, as he complained, rendered life neither better nor more happy; and his health declining with his years, he was willing, upon proper terms, to resign his professorship to Mr Flamstead or Mr Halley, who had cultivated that science with great industry and wonderful success, and with the applause of all Europe. But not being able to obtain any other settlement, he was forced to hold his place eight years longer (z). October 30, 1684, he was prevailed upon to take his degree of Doctor in Divinity (a). In 1691, he was presented, by his good friend and patron Dr Mew, Bishop of Winchester, to the rich rectory of Brightwell in Berkshire. That benefice lying about nine miles from Oxford, he could conveniently reside at either place, according to the different seasons of the year; and for that purpose he was persuaded by his friends to keep his house in Oxford. Soon after he resigned his professorship, after having enjoyed it eighteen years, and was succeeded therein by David Gregory, Professor of the Mathematicks at Edinburgh (b). In 1692, he was employed in drawing up a Catalogue of the manuscripts in Great Britain and Ireland [I]. August 6, 1693, he married a handsome young Lady, named

(w) He was but ill used, and called in contempt the Schoolmaster, ibid. p. 27.

(x) Ibid. p. 25, 27.

(y) Ibid. p. 42.

(z) Vita, &c. ut supra, p. 29—45.

(a) Wood's Fassi, Vol. 11. col. 225.

(b) Vita, &c. p. 47.

[F] Of becoming acquainted with the Learned in France. Particularly with Peter Carcau, Keeper of the King's library; Henry Justel, Ismael Bullialdus, Daniel Huet, afterwards Bishop of Avranches; John Mabillon, Paschasius Quesnel, Andrew Dacier, Eusebii Renaudot, &c (3).

[G] This made him undertake a new edition of Josephus Several years before, Bishop Fell had resolved, with our author's assistance, to print at the Theatre at Oxford a new edition of Josephus, more correct than any of the former. But, either for want of proper means to complete that work, or in expectation of one promised by the learned Andrew Bosius, this design was for a while laid aside. Upon the death of Bosius it was resumed again; and Mr Bernard collected all the manuscripts he could procure out of the libraries of Great Britain, both of the Greek text and Epiphanius's Latin translation, and purchased Bosius's valuable papers of his executors at a great price. Then he published a specimen of his edition of Josephus, and wrote great numbers of letters to his learned friends in France, Holland, Germany, and others countries, to desire their assistance in that work. He laboured in it a good while with the utmost vigour and resolution, though his constitution was much broken by his intense application to his studies. But this noble undertaking was left unfinished, for these two reasons. First, Many persons complained of Epiphanius's translation, because it was defective and not answerable to the original in many places, and required a new version, or at least to have that of Gelenius revised and corrected. Secondly, Great faults were found with the heap of various readings that were to be introduced in this edition, and with the length of the commentaries, in which whole dissertations were inserted without any apparent necessity, that ought to have been placed at the end of the work, or printed by themselves. These things occasioning a contest between Mr Bernard and the Curators of the Oxford-press, the printing of it was interrupted; and at last the design of having it done at the expence of the University, was quite broken off by the death of Bishop Fell. However, about six or seven years after, Mr Bernard was prevailed upon by three Bookfellers of Oxford to resume that work, and to publish it in a less form upon the model of his specimen; but they not being able to bear the expence of it on account of the war, after a few sheets were printed off, desisted from their undertaking (4). These repeated discouragements hindered the learned author from proceeding further than the four first books, and part of the fifth, of the Jewish Antiquities; and the first book, and part of the second, of the Destruction of Jerusalem; which were printed at the Theatre at Oxford in 1686 and 1687, and published in 1700, fol. In the notes, the learned author shews himself an universal scholar, and discerning critic; and appears to have been master of most of the Oriental learning and languages. These notes have been incorporated into Mr S. Havercamp's edition.

[H] He renewed, or contracted, an acquaintance with several persons of eminent learning. Namely, J. G. Grævius, Frederic Spanheim, James Triglandius, James Gronovius, James Perizonius, Theodore Ryckius, Servatius Gallæus, Evaldus Rulæus, and especially Nicholas Witsen, Burgomaster of Amsterdam, who presented him with a Coptic dictionary, brought from Egypt by Theodore Petraeus of Holfatia; and afterwards transmitted to him in 1686 the Coptic and Ethiopic Types, made of iron, for the use of the printing-press at Oxford (5).

[I] He was employed in drawing up a catalogue of the manuscripts, &c. He had rather the oversight than the drudgery of making this catalogue, which had been begun by other hands. The most considerable share he had in this work, was the drawing up a most useful and complete alphabetical Index; to which he prefixed this title, Librorum manuscriptorum Magnæ Britannicæ & Hibernicæ, atque externarum aliquot Bibliothecarum Index secundum alphabetum Edwardus Bernardus construxit Oxonii, An. Dom. MDCCXCVI. In this Index he mentions a great number of valuable Greek manuscripts, which are to be found in several foreign libraries, as well as our

(4) Vita, &c. p. 29—35.

(5) Ibid. p. 43, 44.

(3) Vita, &c. as above, p. 27, 28.

(c) Wood's Ath. col. 1c34.

named Eleanor Howell, descended from the Princes of Wales (c), with whom he lived very happily. In September 1696, though he had been for some time afflicted with the stone, and almost worn out with infirmities, he resolved to take a third voyage to Holland, accompanied only with his wife, in order to be present at the sale of Golius's manuscripts [K], a great number of which he purchased at the request and expence of (d) Vita, &c. ut supra, p. 49, 51.

Dr Narcissus Marsh, Archbishop of Dublin (d). After six or seven weeks stay in Holland, he returned to London (e), where having continued about a fortnight, to refresh and recover himself from his voyage, he removed to Oxford about the end of November.

(e) Ibid. p. 52.

There he immediately fell into a languishing consumption, attended with a dysentery, which put an end to his life, January 12, 1696-7, before he was quite fifty-nine years of age (f). Four days after he was interred in a very solemn manner in St John's-college chapel, his pall being held up by six Doctors, among whom were his former colleague, Dr Wallis, and his successor Dr Gregory; and his corps was attended by the Vice-Chancellor and Heads of the university (g). A monument of white marble was soon after erected for him by his widow [L]. The works he published were as follow:

(f) Ibid. p. 53.

(g) Ibid. p. 54.

I. 'Tables of the Longitudes, Latitudes, right Ascensions, and Declinations, of the chief fixed Stars, according to the best ancient Observers, written in Latin to Dr Robert Huntington, Provost of Trinity-college, Dublin, in a Letter dated March 25, 1684, and published in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 158. p. 567.' II. 'The Oblivity of the Ecliptic from the observations of the Ancients; in Latin. Inserted in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 163. p. 721 [M].'

III. A Latin Letter to Mr John Flamstead, containing observations on the Eclipse of the Sun, July 2, 1684, at Oxford, inserted also in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 164. p. 747. IV. A Treatise, 'of the ancient Weights and Measures,' printed first at the end of Dr Edward Pocock's Commentary on Hosea, Oxford, 1685, fol. and afterwards reprinted in Latin, with very great additions and alterations, under this title, De mensuris & ponderibus antiquis Libri tres, Oxon. 1688, 8vo [N]. V. 'Private Devotions; with a brief Explication of the Ten Commandments,' Oxford, 1689, 12mo. VI. Orbis eruditi Literatura a charactere Samaritico deducta; printed at Oxford from a copper-plate, on one side of a broad sheet of paper: containing at one view, the different forms of Letters used by the Phœnicians, Samaritans, Jews, Syrians, Arabs, Persians, Brachmans, and other Indian Philosophers, Malabarians, Greeks, Cophts, Russians, Slavonians, Æthiopiens, Franks, Saxons, Goths, &c. all collected from ancient inscriptions, coins, and manuscripts: together with the abbreviations used by the Greeks, Physicians, Mathematicians, and Chymists.

VII. Etymologicum Britannicum, or derivations of the British and English words from the Russian, Slavonian, Persian, and Armenian Languages; printed at the end of Dr Hicke's Grammatica Anglo-Saxonica and Mæso-Gothica, Oxon. 1689, 4to. VIII. He published Mr William Guise's Misæ pars prima, ordinis primi Zeraim tituli septem, Oxon. 1690, 4to. IX. Chronologia Samaritana Synopsis (h), in two Tables; the first, containing the most famous epochas, and remarkable things, from the beginning of the world; the second, a catalogue of the Samaritan High-Priests from Aaron. The author sent it to the most learned Job Ludolphus, who had it published in the Acta Eruditorum Lipsiensia, April 1691, p. 167, &c. He also was author of the following things; X. Notæ in fragmentum Seguierianum Stephani Byzantini; or, Notes on a fragment of Steph. Byzantinus in the library of Monsieur Seguier, Chancellor of France: part of which, relating to Dodone, were published by the great James Gronovius, at the end of his Exercitationes de Dodone, or Dissertations on Dodone, Lugd. Batav. 1681. XI. Annotationes in Epistolam S. Barnabæ, Notes upon St Barnabas's Epistle, published in Bishop Fell's edition of that author, Oxon. 1685, 8vo. XII. Short Notes, in Greek and Latin, upon Cotelierius's edition of the Apostolical Fathers, printed in the Amsterdam edition of them. XIII. Veterum Testimonia de Versione LXXII Interpretum, i. e. the Testimonies of the Ancients concerning the Greek Version of the Old Testament by the Seventy, printed at the end of Aristeæ Historia LXXII Interpretum, published by Dr Henry Aldrich, Oxon. 1692, 8vo. (i). XIV. He translated into Latin, the Letters of the Samaritans, which

(h) Mr Wood gives it the title of Chronica Samaritica Breviarium, which is wrong, col. 1c85.

(i) Wood's Ath. col. 1c85.

own, that men of learning might know where to have recourse to them. Those foreign libraries are, those of Augsburgh, Heidelberg, now removed to the Vatican at Rome, Leyden, the Emperor Leopold's at Vienna, of the Princes di Medici at St Laurence and St Mark at Florence, of the University of Padua, of Monsieur Seguier, Chancellor of France; and the Vatican at Rome. He prefixed a learned Preface to this Index, shewing the great usefulness of it (6). This catalogue was published at Oxford in 1697, fol.

(6) Vita, &c. ut supra, p. 47, 48, 61, 62, 63.

[K] In order to be present at the sale of Golius's manuscripts. His executors had unwisely refused a very considerable sum offered them for the whole library, twenty-eight years before, by the University of Cambridge; and now they were selling them by auction (7).

(7) Ibid. p. 49.

[L] A monument of white marble was soon erected for him by his widow. In the middle whereof there is the form of an Heart carved, circumscribed with these words, according to his own direction a little before he died, HABEMUS COR BERNARDI; and underneath, E. B. S. T. P. Obiit Jan. 12, 1696. The same is also repeated on a small square marble, under which he was buried (8).

(8) Vita, &c. ut supra, p. 54.

[M] Tables of the Longitudes, Latitudes, &c. and, The Oblivity of the Ecliptic, &c.] The Latin titles of these two pieces are, I. Canon præcipuarum e Stellis fixis secundum observata Majorum. II. Observata ex Græcis, Arabicis, Persicis, Judaicis, Latinisque Scripturis de obliquitate Zodiaci.

[N] De mensuris & ponderibus antiquis libri tres, &c.] At the end of this edition are subjoined two Letters to the author. One from Nicholas Fatio de Duillier, containing a new description of the Brazen Sea of Solomon, with a draught of it. The other from Dr Thomas Hyde, concerning the Weights and Measures of the Chinese.

Dr R. Huntington procured them to write to their brethren, the Jews in England, in 1673, while he was at Sichern (k). Dr Smith having obtained a copy of this translation, gave it to the learned Job Ludolphus, when he was in England, who published it in the Collection of Samaritan Epistles, written to himself and other learned men (l). Besides what hath been here mentioned, he also assisted several learned men in their editions of books, and collated manuscripts for them [O]. He left behind him in manuscript many books of his own composition, with very large Collections [P]; which, together with the books enriched in the margin with the notes of the most learned men, and collected by him in France and Holland, were purchased by the Curators of the Bodleian Library, for the sum of two hundred pounds. They likewise bought a considerable number of curious and valuable books out of his library, which were wanting in the Bodleian, for which they paid one hundred and forty pounds. The rest of his books were sold by auction, all men of letters striving to purchase those which had any observations of Dr Bernard's own hand (m). As to this learned man's character, Dr T. Smith, who knew him well, gives him a very great one. He was, says he (n), of a mild disposition, greatly averse to contests and quarrels: and if he happened to be where disputes ran high, he would deliver his opinion with great modesty, and in few words, but entirely to the purpose. He was a candid judge of other mens works: not too censorious even on trifling books, if they contained nothing inconsistent with good manners, virtue, or religion: But when wit, learning, or good sense shone in them, he was always ready to give them their due praise. Though he was a true son of the Church of England, and a zealous asserter and advocate of it's apostolical doctrine, from which no considerations, offers, or advantages whatsoever, could ever have tempted him to depart; yet he judged favourably and charitably of Dissenters of all denominations. He wished, that peace and unity might be restored among the Churches of a different communion, by removing the causes of those disputes wherewith the Christian world is rent asunder, and purging Christianity of the leaven of the Schoolmen's opinions; but, without hurting pure and uncorrupt Christianity as delivered in the Gospels, or intrrenching upon the rights of Bishops. His piety and prudence never suffered him to be hurried away by an immoderate zeal, in declaiming against the errors, or most specious innovations of others. His piety was sincere and unaffected, and his devotions both in publick and private, were very regular and exemplary (o). Of his great and extensive learning, his works are a sufficient evidence:

(k) See Vita D. R. Huntingtoni Scriptore Tho. Smith, edit. Lond. 1704. Svo. p. 12, 13.

(l) Vita D. E. Bernardi, as above, p. 42.

(m) Ibid.

(n) Vita, &c. ubi supra, p. 54, 55:

(o) Ibid. p. 59; and

[O] He assisted several learned men in their editions of books, &c.] Particularly the learned Paschasius Quesnel, in his edition of the works of Leo Magnus (9); and collated Palæphatus and Cornutus, with the manuscripts, for the use of the learned Dr Tho. Gale, who published them among his Opuscula Mythologica, Ethica, & Physica (10).

[P] He left behind him in manuscript many books of his own composition, with very large collections, &c.] Which were as follow, I. Chronicon omnis ævi, sive Canon Chronicus; a very learned and laborious work in several tables, comprehending the most famous Epochas of all nations, the Fassi Consulares, and a Chronology from Christ for several centuries. II. Calendarium Ecclesiasticum & Civile perarumque Gentium. The chief of these nations were the Greeks and Romans, Persians, Arabians, Syrians, Copts, and Ethiopians. He gave the copy of this to a Bookseller of Leipzig, who promised to have it printed, but it never appeared. III. Index Librorum Manuscriptorum Angliæ & Hiberniæ (11). IV. 'Large Commentaries on the private Devotions, drawn from the Ecclesiasticks of the three first centuries of Christians, and from the Gentile authors, Greek and Latin, and Oriental.' He put this other title to this manuscript, 'Private Devotions; with a brief Explication of the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, and the Apostles Creed, in seven books.' V. Observationes varii generis. VI. Notæ ad Scriptores veteres-tam sacros quam profanos. VII. Etymolog. Græcum & Latinum. VIII. Lexicon Ægyptiacum. IX. Lexicon Russicum. X. Euclides, Græcè & Latine. In 1694 he prepared for the press all Euclid's works; and revised, corrected, and collated with the Greek and Arabic copies, his Data, (of the Paris edition, 1625, 4to.) for which he had a very great value. XI. Synagma de Mathesi; or, the Principles and Elements of the Mathematicks, left unfinished. XII. Dissertatio de Literaturâ; or, Collections on the Letters and Alphabets of several nations. XIII. Linguarum insularum Britannicæ & Hibernicæ originis Persicæ & Armenicæ. XIV. In the Polyglott Bible, which he had in twelve volumes, he had inserted the Synopsis Criticorum, the Armenian Version, and other books of Scripture, in their proper places, for the more easy comparing of them. And in the margin had made critical Notes and Scholia, and collated the original with the Greek, Arabic, and Syriac Versions, and the Samaritan Pentateuch, and also with the manuscripts, and the writings of the Fathers. This most valuable sett of books was permitted to go out of the kingdom; it being bought, at the sale of Dr Bernard's books, by the learned Olaus Wormius of Denmark, for the sum of twenty pounds (12). XV. He collated the four first books of Apollonius's Conic Sections (13), with the Arabic Version, and with the Greek, which he added in the margin; and translated the three last into Latin. To this he added the Lemmata of Archimedes in Arabic and Latin, with figures and notes, and a learned Preface. XVI. He collated Aristarchus the Samian, concerning the magnitudes and distances of the Sun and Moon, published in Latin at Pisauo in 1572, 4to, with the Arabic Version, and with the Greek Original, which he added in the margin from a manuscript. This book was published at Oxford in 1688, by Dr Wallis. XVII. He also collated Vitruvius, and Cleomedes's tract of Meteors, with the manuscripts, and made notes on the last, taken from the ancient Scholiast. XVIII. He compared the book of Sacred Liturgies, Liber divinarum Liturgiarum, published by Robert Stephens at Paris, in 1560, fol. especially the Liturgies of St Basil and St Chryostom; with the manuscripts. XIX. He wrote notes on the whole English Liturgy; and also Commentaries and Annotations on several chapters and verses of the Bible. XX. He intended to have composed a large Commentary on the whole book of Psalms, of which he published a specimen. XXI. He designed to publish the Psalter in Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, with the old French and Roman Versions, and one made immediately from the original, and likewise with the Coptic. For that purpose, having met with the Psalter published by Jac. Faber Stapulensis in 1508, he procured Father Mabillon to collate the French and Roman Versions, and the Hebrew in that edition, with a manuscript of good authority in the monastery of St Germain's. XXII. Collections of Arabic Proverbs, translated into Latin, partly by himself, and partly by Dr Pocock. XXIII. Notes on the Glossaria Græco-Latina & Latino-Græca, published by Vulcanius in 1600. For this purpose, in 1676, when he was at Paris, he collated an old Greek and Latin Lexicon, which

(9) Vide Pasch. Quesnel Præfat. ad opera S. Leonis magni.

(10) Vide Præfat. ad Lectorem, prefixam Opuscul. Mythol. &c.

(11) See above, note [L].

(12) Vita, &c. p. 71, 72.

(13) They were published in Latid at Bologna in 1556.

(p) See Testimonia & Elogia, &c. at the end of Dr Bernard's Life by Dr T. Smith.

and on this account he has been much applauded both at home and abroad (p). Mr Wood, in particular, says of him (q), that he was 'a person admirably well read in all kind of ancient learning, in Astronomy and Mathematicks, a curious Critick, an excellent Grecian, Latinist, Chronologer, and Orientalian.'

(q) Athens, V. l. II. col. 1084.

which is to be found at the end of some Tracts of Cyril, with a manuscript in the library of St Germain des Prez. XXIV. Observations on Gerardi Vossii Etymologicum Linguae Latinae. And he intended once to write an Etymological Canon of the origin and variations of that language; and to reprint Henry Stephen's Theaurus of the Greek tongue, or rather to compile a new work of that kind. In a word, he collated, or made curious observations on all the ancient and modern books he read. C

BERNARDI (JOHN) was the son of Count Francis Bernardi, Resident here in England from the republick of Genoa, and was descended from a very antient and honourable family, created, for their services to the House of Austria, Counts of the Holy Roman Empire (a) [A]. He was born in 1657, and was very early enured to misfortunes and imprisonment; for his father being disgusted at some ill usage he received from the government of Genoa, refused to return thither, and being himself a native of England, retired into Worcestershire, where he settled; and being a great lover of gardening, spent a considerable fortune in improvements of that kind, which, however, did not so far amuse or divert him, as to extinguish his sense of the injuries he had received, which soured his temper to such a degree, that he frequently confined his son John, for very slight causes, to a dark room, where he allowed him only bread and small beer for several days, which hard usage so wrought upon his disposition, that he resolved, at all events, to leave his father's house, and to throw himself into the world, though a perfect child (b). Accordingly, in 1670, he quitted his father's seat, with a full resolution never to return thither while the old man lived. He travelled that night sixteen miles in the road to Coventry, and as day-light began to appear, he took shelter in the house of a Wheelwright, who, upon hearing his melancholy story, promised to conceal him, which he performed, and put him into a little room from whence he could look upon the road, and in which he had not been long before he saw his father on horseback, who enquired of the Wheelwright, if he had seen such a boy as he described, which being answered in the negative, prevented the young man from being carried back to confinement (c). When the second night came on, he set out again for Packington-hall, the seat of Sir Clement Fisher, who married the famous Mrs Jane Lane, very instrumental in preserving King Charles II, after the fatal battle at Worcester (d). But on his coming thither, being informed that Sir Clement and his Lady were in London, he followed them up to town, and was very hospitably received; the Lady having been very kind to him at his father's, and often intreated the old gentleman to deal more indulgent with his son, and to afford him a liberal education. He was by her recommended to a near relation, Capt. Littleton Clent, who was then in garrison at Portsmouth, who took him into his company, and caused him to be taught his exercise as a soldier, which gave him the first taste for a military life. While he was under the protection of this gentleman, he very narrowly

(a) Bernardi's History of his own Life, p. 1. Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. V. p. 156, 157, 158.

(b) Bernardi's Life, p. 5.

(c) From M. Bernardi's own mouth.

(d) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, Vol. III. p. 419—421.

[A] For their services to the House of Austria, Counts of the Holy Roman Empire.] The family of Bernardi was originally of Lucca, where they had flourished from the year 1097, and from about the year 1384, had enjoyed the most considerable offices in that Republick; particularly that of Standard-bearer, which with much reputation and fidelity they discharged. Philip de Bernardi, the grandfather of the person of whom we are speaking, resided twenty-eight years with a publick character in England, and is said to have rendered important services to the House of Austria, more especially the Spanish branch of it, at the imminent hazard of his life. He likewise married in this kingdom Mary Dampart, of an antient and honourable Catholick family, by whom he had issue two sons, Philip and Francis, the latter of which was the father of our Major Bernardi. In consideration of the services and circumstances before-mentioned, the Emperor Ferdinand II, by letters patent signed with his own hand, and under his imperial seal, dated the 24th of September, 1629, in the eleventh year of his reign over the Empire, the twelfth over Hungary, and the thirteenth over Bohemia, created him Knight and Count of the Holy Roman Empire, with remainder to his sons Philip and Francis, and his and their heirs and successors, male and female, in lawful wedlock begotten, ratifying and confirming their hereditary nobility and antient coat-armour, which is thus blazoned in the patent, viz. the shield quarterly, the first and fourth Or, charged with an eagle displayed, sable, crowned of the field, respecting each other, their beaks open, langued gules, holding in their fore-paws a reed proper; over all in an escutcheon gules, two battle-axes saltirewise, the shield adorned with two crests each on an open helmet, issuing out of an imperial crown, that on the left a demy lion crowned, as in the field; that on the right a black eagle crowned as in the field, respecting each other; and the mantling on the left, from the top of the helmet on the outside, Or, and gules, lined with argent and azure; on the right side, from the top of the helmet on the outside, Or, and sable; lined with sable and argent covering the whole shield. Amongst other privileges granted by this patent, there are these, that himself and his descendants have the liberty of using red wax in all letters, writings, deeds, patents, and other instruments; that they shall be exempt from all jurisdiction, except that of the Imperial Aulick Council; that they shall have a power of nominating and appointing Publick Notaries and ordinary judges throughout the empire, administering to them an oath of office set forth in the said patent; that they may legitimate and restore in blood all bastards and other spurious issue, except those of Princes, Counts, and Barons, giving them thereby full power to inherit; to grant liberty to slaves; to restore infamous persons to credit; to create Doctors in Divinity, Law, Physick, and Philosophy, and other inferior degrees, after due examination, in as ample manner as the Universities of Vienna, Paris, Pavia, or any other University, or even his Imperial Majesty, could do; to grant armorial ensigns, or coat-armour, to any persons at their pleasure; and all other privileges and immunities of right belonging to, or which have been exercised by Counts or Knights of the Empire (1).

(1) All these particulars are extracted from the Patent, which is published at large in Latin and English, in the Appendix to Bernardi's Life.

[B] W'hib

narrowly escaped a misfortune, which had put an early end to his troubles and his life [B]. On the conclusion of the Dutch war, Captain Clent being broke, was no other way in a condition of expressing his kindness for Mr Bernardi, than by making him a present of twenty pounds. But the loss of his patron was not the only mischief which befel him in the year 1673, for he had the small-pox soon after, which reduced him very low both in constitution and fortune (e). In this distress he addressed himself to his godfather, Col. Anselme, who proposed to him going over to Holland, with which he readily complied, and soon after his arrival, entered as a private soldier into the service of the States, and then lifted in one of the English independent companies. He was in the famous action of Seneff, in which the Prince of Condé fell on the rear of the Prince of Orange's army, and took part of his baggage, but after an obstinate engagement was obliged to retire (f). He was also present at the siege of Oudenarde, and afterwards at that of Grave, where he served in the company of Capt. Philip Savage, and had his share in a very dangerous attack on the counterscarp, in which he was wounded. The place surrendered on the twenty-ninth of October, 1674. Soon after this, the English troops in the service of the States being regimented, Mr Bernardi obtained an Ensign's commission from the Prince of Orange, dated the second of February, 1675, in the company of his godfather, who was appointed Lieutenant-Colonel of Disney's regiment (g). In June following, he was removed, with his godfather, to another regiment, commanded by Sir John Fenwick, and at the close of the year, had the misfortune to be wounded in endeavouring to part two gentlemen in a duel. He was present, the succeeding year, at the siege of Maestricht, where he had the misfortune to lose the sight of one of his eyes, and to be shot through one of his arms, the bones of which were shivered to splinters, when taking his arm in the lappet of his coat, he crowded back to the breach, and fell down to the bottom among the dead. A soldier of his, seeing him fall, jumped after him, took him up in his arms, and carried him to the surgeons in the trenches, where he was dressed. The Prince of Orange being informed of his behaviour, and that the Lieutenant of the Major's company of that regiment was killed in the attack, gave his commission to Mr Bernardi. But it appearing afterwards that the Lieutenant was only taken prisoner, he missed of this preferment. In April 1677, he married a Dutch lady of a good family, with whom he lived comfortably eleven years. He had a share in the next campaign in the battle of St Omers, and at the close thereof, was appointed Lieutenant in Capt. Philip Savage's company, in which he first served by a commission from the Prince of Orange, dated September 6, 1677. He was present the next year in the battle of Mons, which was the last action in the war. After the peace, his godfather, Col. Anselme was so reduced, as to be obliged to serve as a private man under Mr Bernardi, who allowed him double pay, and excused him from duty (h). In 1683, Mr Bernardi was made Captain-Lieutenant in Col. Monk's company, and at this time he was in so great favour with the Prince of Orange, that upon the death of Capt. Jasper Paston, brother to the Earl of Yarmouth, he had his company given him by a commission from the Prince, dated the seventeenth of November, 1685, which was confirmed by a commission from the States, dated the third of December following. At this time his circumstances were very easy, and he had just reason to be thankful to Providence for the condition he was in, having obtained by his merit a company at the age of twenty-seven, the profits of which, together with his wife's fortune, brought him in a clear revenue of five hundred pounds a year (i). But it was not long that he continued in this easy and happy situation, for King James II, in the year 1687, having conceived some displeasure against the States-General, demanded the six regiments of British troops that were in their service, and which had been so for fifteen years (k). This the States refused, but at the same time did not constrain the officers to serve them against their will, though care was taken to represent to them, in very strong terms, the difference between remaining upon a settled establishment, and returning home upon an uncertainty [C]. This had such an effect, that out of two hundred and forty officers that

(e) Bernardi's Life, p. 12.

(f) Life of King William III. p. 37-41.

(g) See the Copy of this Commission; in the Appendix to Bernardi's Life. See also the article of FENWICK (Sir JOHN).

(h) Bernardi's Life, p. 13-45.

(i) Ibid. p. 49.

(k) Life of King James II. p. 435.

were

[B] Which had put an early end to his troubles and his life.] This accident happened thus: While he continued as a cadet in Captain Clent's company, he had leave given him in the year 1671 to go to a gentleman's house not far off, which he did, as he was wont to do, in coloured cloths, which subjected him to the accident of being seized, by a press-gang belonging to the Royal James, at Fareham, within four miles of Portsmouth, to which place he was carried. This was justly esteemed one of the finest ships in the royal navy, had been built in the dock there by Commissioner Dean, with whose service in this respect King Charles II was so well satisfied, that, as a mark of his esteem and favour, he made him a present of a silver axe (2). If Mr Bernardi had listened to the persuasions of those who carried him to Portsmouth, and had resolved to try his fortune at sea, which, considering his youth, and the advantages that might have been proposed to him, it is a wonder that he did not, his first and last voyage had been the same; for this fine ship, on board of which the Earl of Sandwich soon after hoisted his flag, was burnt by a Dutch fireship on the 28th of May 1672, in the famous battle off Southwold-Bay, and that noble Lord, and the best part of a thousand brave men, perished in her (3). But our young adventurer had better fortune; he wrote a letter to his Captain, acquainting him with what had fallen out; and upon his being brought to Mr Stevenfon, then Clerk of the Cheque, to have his name registered, he found Captain Clent with him, who claimed him as belonging to his company (4), and procured thereby his immediate discharge, which left him at liberty to prosecute his fortune in it's former channel; which, as the reader will see, he some years after did with very good effect.

[C] And returning home upon an uncertainty.] In order to the reader's understanding this matter perfectly, it is necessary to inform him, that King Charles II, during the second Dutch war in his reign, had sent a considerable body of his subjects into the service of France, under the command of the Duke of Monmouth and the Earl of Dumbarton, who merited so well of the French King, that they were put upon

(3) Historian's Guide, p. 85. Burchet's Naval History, p. 402, 403.

(4) Bernardi's Life, p. 10.

(2) From the Papers of Mr Peys, relating to the Navy.

were in the whole brigade, no more than sixty thought proper to obey the King's commands, amongst whom was Captain Bernardi. King James was no sooner informed of this, than he ordered a yacht to sail for Holland to bring those gentlemen over, to whom he sent also three months pay, and upon their arrival in England, immediately raised three new regiments, in order to re-place those officers in their commands, and at the same time issued a proclamation, declaring all officers that remained in the service of the States of Holland, rebels (l). But the scene was very soon changed; his Serene Highness proceeded soon after on his expedition to England, which brought about the Revolution. One of the first steps taken by his Highness after the King was withdrawn, was to send an association to every one of the regiments then in being, which all the officers were required to sign, importing, that they were determined to defend the Prince against all persons whatever, and such officers as refused it, were ordered to quit their commands. Amongst these was Capt. Bernardi, who having obtained a pass for himself and his family, he transported them to Calais, where, finding many persons of his own principles in great distress, the Captain pledged his effects for fifty pounds for their relief, though they were worth double as much, and the consequence was, that he lost both effects and money. He proceeded from thence to St Germain, where he was very kindly received, and after a short repose, made a long and fatiguing march to Brest, to wait the return of the French fleet, which carried King James to Ireland, and speedily transported two thousand three hundred of his subjects to the same kingdom (m). This was in the month of April, 1689, and it was with great difficulty they landed these people in Bantrey-Bay, on the first day of May, and the next day engaged the English fleet under Admiral Herbert (n). The Earl of Dover, who was appointed by King James to receive these recruits, conducted them directly to Dublin, where they were formed into separate corps, and all the officers had commissions given them. Amongst the rest, Mr Bernardi was appointed Major of an Irish regiment, which was soon disbanded for mutiny; and then he had the like command in the regiment of Mac Carthy Moor, a great Irish Chief, under whom he served for some time (o). After Marshal Schombergh landed in that kingdom with twenty thousand men from England, King James found his affairs in a very declining condition. However, as he had still a superior army, he marched to Ardee, which he fortified, and thereby kept the Marshal in his camp near Dundalk, which being a marshy, unwholesome place, half his troops soon died of fluxes (p). While King James was at Ardee, he formed a design of sending the Earl of Seaforth into Scotland, in hopes the presence of that nobleman might supply the loss of the famous Viscount Dundee, then lately killed in his service. To assist the Earl in this enterprize, the King directed Major Bernardi, and another Field-Officer, to attend him, which they did, and embarking on board a man of war at Galway, in the west of Ireland, steered their course for Scotland; but before they got clear of the Irish coast they met with a storm, by which their bowsprit and fore-mast were both broke to pieces, upon which the Captain with much difficulty and danger worked the ship into Broad-Haven, in the province of Connaught, from whence the Earl sent Major Bernardi to King James, then in his camp at Ardee, to acquaint him with this unlucky accident, which hindered his intended voyage (q). King James thereupon ordered the ship back again to Galway, and put off the Earl's voyage to the next spring, when he proceeded, with Sir Thomas Southwell and Major Bernardi, for Scotland, where he speedily raised a great body of men for King James's service, and made the necessary dispositions for joining Major-General Buchan, who commanded the remains of Lord Dundee's forces, in order to form the siege of Inverness (r) [D]. But the Earl was disappointed upon a very good establishment; and it is said that the Earl of Dumbarton might have had the Staff of Marshal of France, if he had not been recalled (s). When therefore the peace was made with the Dutch, the Prince of Orange, as the King's nephew, thought himself well intitled to demand a corps of English troops for the Dutch service, which, as we have seen, he obtained about the year 1673. The Earl of Offory, son to the old Duke of Ormond, was General of these troops by a commission from the States (6), and upon his death the King named the Earl of Pembroke to succeed him, part of whose equipage was actually sent to Holland; and Bernardi tells us, he had the use of them, but some disputes arising, and the Dutch being very flow in their resolutions, the Earl of Pembroke never went over in person (7). These six regiments were sent by the Dutch to the assistance of King James on Monmouth's rebellion, and he permitted them to return again to the service of the States, who knew the value of them so well, and were so thoroughly satisfied of their fidelity, that it was no wonder they were unwilling to part with them. Among other arguments that were used to induce the officers to remain where they were, notwithstanding the King's commands, one was, the fate of the officers and soldiers recalled out of the French service by King Charles II, the former being left unprovided for, and many of the latter begging and starving in the streets (8). This argument had, without doubt, very great weight in one sense, that is, with regard to the officers changing a certainty for an uncertainty; but in other respects it was singular enough, for in the first place those troops were recalled chiefly at the instance of the States themselves; and secondly, it was a full proof that the French thought the King of England had a clear right to re-call his subjects out of their service. However, as most of the officers were very well settled in Holland, and many of them had acquired fortunes and establishments independent of their military commands, they were very willing to remain where they were, especially at a time when King James was making the greatest efforts at home in favour of the Popish religion, and might be presumed to withdraw these forces, and increase his own, with no other view than to be in a better condition of carrying his designs into execution.

[D] In order to form the siege of Inverness. This expedition of the Earl of Seaforth is a very curious and very important point of history, and yet very little, indeed hardly at all, known. When King James had received advice of the death of the Viscount of Dundee (9), he resolved immediately to send this Nobleman over to supply his place; and if it had not been for the accident of his disappointment, as related in the text, in all probability he would have kept the Highlanders

(l) Hist. of the Revolution, p. 9.
Bernardi's Life, p. 52.
See the article of MACKAY (HUGH).

(m) Bernardi's Life, p. 50—54.

(n) Butcher's Naval History, p. 416.

(o) Bernardi's Life, p. 61.

(p) Parker's Memoirs of Military Transactions in Ireland, &c. p. 16.

(q) Bernardi's Life, p. 64—67.

(r) Balcarras's Memoirs, p. 125.

(s) Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland, p. 191.

(6) See the article of BUTLER (THOMAS) Earl of Offory.

(7) Life of Bernardi, p. 47.

(8) See the article of MACKAY (HUGH).

(9) Life of King William III. p. 226.

disappointed in this design, by the speedy march of Major-General Mackay, with a considerable body of regular troops, into those parts, and while things were in this situation, the news came of the total defeat of King James's army at the Boyne, upon which Sir Thomas Southwell prevailed upon the Earl to dismiss his forces, and to surrender himself prisoner to Major-General Mackay upon honourable terms. The Earl taking this step, without the consent of his uncle, Mr Colin Mackenzie, and the rest of his friends, it provoked them to such a degree, that they would have cut Sir Thomas Southwell to pieces, if Major Bernardi had not interposed and prevented it. This Mr Colin Mackenzie, took Major Bernardi, and the rest of the officers that came with him from Ireland, under his protection, and conducted them safely to Major-General Buchan, who was then at an hundred miles distance, and who, upon hearing of the Earl of Seaforth's conduct, had dismissed most of his forces. Major Bernardi had now nothing more to transact in the Highlands, and therefore, as his presence there could be of no service, he desired to go to England, and Major-General Buchan approved of it, and sent for the Laird of Glenco, to come with forty of his vassals, to receive Bernardi at Invergarry, and to conduct and guard him to the Braes of Monteth, being near an hundred miles, and very difficult travelling over rocks and mountains in that season of the year; near the end of October; a great part of the journey was to be performed in the night-time, several detachments of King William's forces lying in their way, particularly at Inverlochry, or Fort William, a place where was a garrison of twelve hundred men, and there was no other way to climb up an high mountain, but near the gate of the said fortress, so that it was impossible to pass them but when asleep and their gate locked (s). The Laird of Glenco's country lying within twenty miles of that garrison, Major Bernardi arrived safe at that gentleman's house, and remained there some days, to rest himself and recover his strength. After having reposed himself there six days, he desired to proceed on his journey, and the Laird appointed forty of his best men, under the command of a relation of his own, to conduct him to the Braes of Monteth, places as dangerous and difficult to pass as any of the way he had come before. The same inconveniences; of small garrisons of the government were in their way, and their parties were continually about the country in the day-time. This made the second part of Major Bernardi's journey to be mostly night-work. However, he arrived safe at the Braes, at which place he was recommended, by Major-General Buchan, to one Col. Duncan Graham, to be than farther directed by him. Major Bernardi proceeded on his journey from the Braes of Monteth, under the conduct of a guide appointed him by Col. Graham, and having no more need of guards, he arrived at Edinburgh in the month of November, in the year 1691. The Magistrates of that city having heard that some gentlemen were come from the Highlands, ordered their gates to be shut, and a general search to be made for them. Bernardi's landlord getting notice of it, conducted him out of town but half an hour before the order was put in execution, otherwise his journey at that time had terminated in some prison at Edinburgh; but escaping that, and some other dangers, he travelled on from thence to London, meeting with no more difficulties than those of a long winter's journey (t). Having finished his affairs in London, by disposing of some effects he had left with a friend, when he went out of England, and by selling his Scots horses, he purposed to go over to Flanders, and meeting with two gentlemen of his acquaintance ready to make the same voyage, he went with them to Colchester, where they were recommended to the Master of a ship, who was in a short time to carry over a lady of great quality to Ostend, but the wind happening to be fixed in the east, the lady ordered her trunks to be put on board, and

(s) Ibid. p. 67—
75.(t) Ibid. p. 75—
80.

Highlanders together, and have given the Government a great deal of trouble in Scotland, for there was no man had a larger interest in the Highlands, or was more respected by the Clans. Besides, at that time King James was able to have spared him some regular troops from Ireland, and his country lay extremely convenient for the landing of those troops: But by this disappointment King James's friends in Scotland were so disheartened, that the greatest part of them dispersed, and many of them submitted and made their terms with the Government, which made his second expedition of much less consequence than otherwise it would have been. It was in his return to King James's camp that the Earl met with Sir Thomas Southwell, who, with about threescore other Gentlemen, had been convicted and condemned as traitors, for taking up arms against the Duke of Tyrconnel; and upon his procuring Sir Thomas's pardon, that Gentleman thought himself obliged in gratitude, or perhaps for his safety, to accept a commission in King James's service, and therefore went in quality of Captain under the Earl of Seaforth, into Scotland (10). When the Highlanders were assembled to the northward of Inverness, they appeared to be a very formidable number of men, considering the regular troops the Government had at that time in that country; and the more so, since General Buchan, whose body of horse was of very little consequence in itself, when joined to these men under the command of experienced officers, would have made up a very formidable army, which, if successful in the attack of Inverness, or any other action of consequence, could not have failed spreading the flame of war through the Highlands, the inhabitants of which were, generally speaking, disaffected. But Sir Thomas Southwell observing the Earl much affected with the news of King James's defeat at the Boyne, laid hold of that opportunity to shew him security and peace on one side, and great hazards and difficulties on the other, which inclined him to follow his advice, and to make use of his assistance in obtaining reasonable terms from General Mackay, which put an end to the troubles in Scotland, and consequently to the diversion that might have been made on that side, if he had continued firm to his first purpose, his forces being superior at the time he submitted to Mackay's, and the war continuing long after in Ireland, which would have made such a diversion extremely troublesome, and therefore it is no wonder that Sir Thomas Southwell's service was considered in so high a light by King William; and very probably it was with a view of doing this service, or something like it, that Sir Thomas accepted this command, which are points that were never hitherto cleared up.

(10) Life of Bernardi, p. 66, 67.

and then went to a gentleman's house about five miles off, charging the Master to send for her as soon as the wind came fair. Bernardi and his friends met with two other gentlemen who were strangers to them, and also unknown in the town, who were come thither to get a passage over in the same ship. They joined company and lodged all together for some nights at Mr Cook's, then Post-Master in Colchester; but having notice of some peoples inquisitiveness about them, Bernardi and his two friends went to a gentleman's house about a mile out of the town, and the other two gentlemen went to the Master of the ship's house. The second night after Bernardi and his friends went into the country, intimation was given, that Sir Isaac Rebow, a justice of the Peace, had issued out his warrant to apprehend them, and bring them before him, and the wind coming fair the same night, they went directly to the Master of the ship's house, to go on board. The Master of the ship told them, that he had sent a messenger to the lady, and expected her in an hour more, and sent one of his men to conduct them on board a-ship, and said he would follow them, with the other two gentlemen at his house, as soon as the lady came. A message came from the lady, that she could not possibly come before the next day in the afternoon. Bernardi and his two friends continued on ship-board to avoid the Justice's warrant. The next day, towards the evening, came a company of Trained-Bands, with five hundred country people, to the kay, where the ship then lay dry at low water; about two miles from the town, and Bernardi, and the two gentlemen with him, were seized, and carried directly to Colchester goal, where the other two gentlemen, and the Master of the ship, had before been made prisoners (u). The lady, who occasioned all this stir, was the Countess of Errol, with whom Mr Bernardi was not at all acquainted; however, it cost him a great deal of trouble, and hindered him from pursuing any settled course of life, 'till a year and a half afterwards, that a bill being preferred against him and his friends in Essex for high-treason, was rejected, by which he escaped indeed any farther suffering on this head, but at the expence of several hundred pounds, an accident almost insupportable to a man already of a broken fortune (w). He went afterwards over to Holland, with the Earl of Nottingham's pass, who was then Secretary of State, and returning within the time prescribed, merited thereby some farther indulgencies from his Lordship. The times being now dangerous for a man of Major Bernardi's sentiments, who could scarce live so cautiously as not to give some offence, he resolved to retire into the country, where he lived peaceably, and without seeing much company, for some months, at a house near Brentford (x). But being obliged to quit this house, on account of its changing its owner, he came to London again about Christmas 1695, which proved his ruin by a series of very unfortunate accidents, supposing what he constantly professed to be true, that he was in no respect privy to the base and barbarous conspiracy for assassinating King William (y). For being unhappily at a tavern on Tower-Hill, with one Capt. Rookwood, who was his old acquaintance, and who was involved in that affair, they were seized together, and sent to the compter, and afterwards committed to Newgate, which was extremely tho' not equally fatal to them both [E]. He was committed on the twenty-fifth of March

(u) Ibid. p. 80—
84.

(w) Ibid. p. 85.

(x) Ibid. p. 86.

(y) Pointer's
Chronological
History, Vol. II.
p. 426.
Life of King William III, p. 449.
Oldmixon's Hist.
of the Stuarts,
Vol. II. p. 130.

(11) State Trials,
Vol. IV. p. 684,
685.

[E] Tho' not equally fatal to them both. We have shewn in the text, that Major Bernardi quitted his house near Brentford at Christmas, 1695, upon which he came up to London. It was in February following that the plot was discovered, and the first proclamation that issued was dated the 23d of that month, in which Mr Rookwood's name was inserted (11); but to understand this matter clearly, and the grounds of Mr Bernardi's imprisonment, it will be requisite to give his account of it in his own words. 'Captain Rookwood came to Bernardi of a Saturday, soon after the said horrid plot broke out, and his countenance and behaviour seemed to discover disturbance of mind. Bernardi thereupon asked him, If any evil had happened to him? To which he answered, No; but said, that if any body should be so malicious as to give information of his being come over at that time, he should certainly be taken up. But it seems his name was in a proclamation, which came out upon that very day to seize him, as one of those who was concerned in the said assassination-plot, though Bernardi had not then heard any thing of the matter; and Rookwood concealed it from him, intending, as appeared by his behaviour afterwards, to spend the evening with Bernardi; but Bernardi told him, that he was under a promise and engagement to sup that night at a tavern on Tower-hill. Captain Rookwood said, that if the meeting there was not upon private business, he desired he might be one of the company; which Bernardi readily complied with, and he and Rookwood, with other company, supped there accordingly; and making it too late to go home to their lodgings, Rookwood and Bernardi staid all night at the tavern, and went to bed together there. The next morning some constables, and other armed men, came into the house, and entered the room where Bernardi and Rookwood were in bed, and producing their warrant to search for and seize them, required submission thereto. Bernardi and Rookwood readily yielded to their authority, not making the least resistance, and got up and dressed themselves as soon as possibly they could; but Mr Constable's orders being to carry them, and all the people belonging to the tavern, before the Recorder of London, who was gone to church, they were obliged to remain in the tavern 'till noon, guarded by twenty men. This delay gave Bernardi an opportunity to make some enquiry into the cause of all that hurly-burly. The senior Constable told him, that a neighbour's servant-maid came to the tavern the night before, and seeing some Gentlemen at supper, she asked the drawer who they were? and he making her a surly answer, she went with her brother, a journeyman shoemaker, directly to the Recorder, and gave information that some evil-minded men were at the tavern, and that the people of the house refused to discover who they were, and therefore it was reasonable to believe, that they might be such persons as the Government then sought for by divers proclamations. It was the latter end of February, and the before-mentioned horrid conspiracy was discovered about the middle of the same month. The Constables having notice of the Recorder's being at home, they carried Bernardi and Rookwood, with all the family, before him, who examined them separately and very strictly; and told them, that he could do no less than commit them at that disturbed time, though he found no other cause than suspicion for so doing; and therefore, as a favour, would send them to the two Compters, and not to Newgate, that they might with less difficulty and expence obtain their liberty, when the storm was blown over; he ordered the March 1696, for high-treason, but not upon oath (z). Some time after this, the witnesses against the conspirators were examined before the Lord Chief-Justice Holt, in order to the trial of Major Lowick, Major Bernardi, Capt. Knightly, and Capt. Rookwood, but no evidence at all appearing his name was struck out of the list; and Mr Cranburn's inserted in his stead, and those four were afterwards tried and convicted (a). After all the trials were over, six gentlemen, who were confined, entered their prayer at the sessions in the Old-Bailey, and were first bailed and then discharged, though five of their names had been in proclamations, and one thousand pounds reward, paid, for apprehending them (b). There then remained in prison Major Bernardi, Capt. Counter, Mr Cassils, Mr Meldrum, and Mr Chambers; who were confined in different parts of the goal, and had no communication with each other; but their friends, after the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act expired, and the other gentlemen had been discharged, entered prayers for them at the next sessions, in order to their being tried or bailed, but at the request of the Solicitor of the Treasury, the Court was adjourned; and the Parliament being fitting, a bill was brought in for imprisoning them a year, on a suggestion, that in that time evidence might be found against them; and when this bill came up to the House of Lords, Mr Blackbourne's name was inserted, tho' he was discharged before, and taken into custody of a Messenger while the bill was depending in the House of Common, without any fresh charge against him (c). This act having passed, and the year expired, a second act was passed for the same purpose, for another year. On the expiration of the second act there passed a third, for confining them during the pleasure of King William, and his Majesty, upon the application of the late Earl of Burlington, was graciously pleased, to promise that he would deliver them in a short time, but his kind intention was frustrated by his illness and death, which followed soon after. An act was then passed for confining them during the pleasure of Queen Anne, in whose reign Capt. James Counter was discharged, tho' the only one of the six that was committed upon oath, and the like promise was obtained from her Majesty, in favour of Major Bernardi, at the request of the Duke of Buckingham, and for Mr Blackbourne, at the instance of the Earl of Oxford. But no order was made before the Queen's death, when an act passed for confining them during the pleasure of the late King, and a sixth in the beginning of the present reign (d). Under this confinement, Robert Meldrum, James Chambers, Robert Cassils, and John Bernardi, died, the latter on the 20th of September, 1736, after very near forty years imprisonment (e); and Mr Robert Blackbourne, by the clemency of his present Majesty, was removed to the King's Bench. There is nothing farther to be added in respect to this gentleman; but that in the

(z) See the copy of this commitment, in Bernardi's Life, p. 110, 111.

(a) State Trials, Vol. IV. p. 667.

(b) These were the three Hignons's, Captain Stow, Capt. Walbank, and Mr Blackbourne.

(c) Bernardi's Life, p. 95-97.

(d) Ibid. p. 97-103.

(e) London Magazine, 1736, p. 521, col. b. Gentleman's Magazine, 1736, p. 533, col. a.

the family belonging to the tavern to give bail the next day; Bernardi and Rookwood remained quiet under their respective and different confinement near a month, without any communication with each other, either by letter or message, in all that time. Captain Charnock, King, and Keys, were taken up on the first proclamation, which came forth on or about the 22d day of February, and between that time and the 18th day of March next following they were all three condemned and executed. And upon the 23d day of the same month of March, came forth another proclamation, in which Bernardi's name was inserted, and the reward of a thousand pounds was thereby offered to apprehend him. Captain Rookwood reposing an entire confidence in the friendship of one Mr George Harris, intrusted him with the knowledge of his and Bernardi's being imprisoned in the Compters, as before related; and here it is to be observed, that although Captain Rookwood was in a proclamation, which came forth but the day before he and Bernardi went together to the tavern on Tower hill, and of which, without doubt, he had been apprized at the time of his first coming to Bernardi, who then knew nothing of the matter; yet Captain Rookwood thought fit to conceal the same from the knowledge of Bernardi as long as he could, and judging it conducive to his safety he changed his name, and prevailed on him so to do, but without acquainting Bernardi with the proclamation as a reason for his so doing. Capt. Rookwood was often visited by the said Mr Harris, to whom these particulars were communicated by Capt. Rookwood; and as soon as the proclamation of the 23d of March came forth, which was the last that was published to apprehend conspirators, and was published at some weeks distance from the rest, and wherein Bernardi's name was inserted, with a reward of a thousand pounds to apprehend him, as before-mentioned; Harris went and discovered Capt. Rookwood and Bernardi for the sake of the reward; and they were taken out of the Compters by a detachment of the guards in the night of the 24th of the same month of March, and were carried to the Tilt-yard, and examined by the Lords of the Council the next day, and committed close prisoners to Newgate, loaded with heavy irons, and put into separate, dismal, dark, and stinking apartments, not being allowed to speak to each other from the time of their first being taken out of the two Compters. Bernardi did never see Rookwood afterwards, who was soon after tried and condemned, and was executed at Tyburn on the 29th day of April following (12). It appears from this account, that Major Bernardi was guilty of very great indiscretions in the course of this affair, by carrying Captain Rookwood into the company of his friends at the tavern upon Tower-hill, which involved many innocent persons in much trouble; in continuing there all night, which had a very suspicious aspect; in changing his name when he was committed, and submitting quietly to that imprisonment, which had with respect to him the same aspect as in regard to Capt. Rookwood. After all, Major Bernardi was the only person amongst those who fell under this extraordinary confinement that had just reason to complain. Mr Chambers is mentioned as the person who was to give notice of King William's going out, in order for the conspirators to follow and attack him (13). Captain Counter is sworn to have delivered arms to some of the conspirators (14); and Blackbourne is positively sworn to have been one of them that was to have acted under Capt. Rookwood (15); but with respect to Major Bernardi, there is only Mr Harris's account that he had seen him in the company of Mr Rookwood; and considering the character that witness gives himself, we may very well judge, that, after what Bernardi says in his relation, he could not do less than name him in the manner he did, having got his name inserted in the proclamation. It is indeed strange that the six other persons should be bailed and discharged, considering that as much or more had been said against them in the trials of such of the conspirators as were convicted, than against those that were detained with Bernardi: but the truth seems to be, that the consequences of discharging so many desperate people under so high an imputation so soon, had not been then sufficiently considered; and that this was the true reason, and not any partiality to one set of men, or prejudice against the other, appears from the apprehending Blackbourne the (12) Life of Bernardi, pag. 87-92.

(13) State Trials, Vol. IV. p. 568.

(14) Ib. p. 688.

(15) Ib. p. 687.

(f) Bernardi's
Life, p. 228.

year 1712, he married a second wife, by whom he had ten children while in Newgate, and by whose care and industry he was chiefly supported (f). Major Bernardi was a little brisk man, of a very cheerful disposition, and who bore his misfortunes, more especially his long imprisonment, and frequent indispositions by the breaking out of old wounds, with great constancy of mind; and was much respected and beloved by all who knew him.

second time, and causing his name to be inserted in the bill for imprisoning the rest when it came up to the House of Lords. These remarks follow naturally from a view of the facts which occasioned them, and which they are intended to explain; and, as such, it is hoped the reader will consider them, and make proper allowances for what one man is naturally apt to say in his own case, and the light in which things appear to another who enquires only after truth, and is not at all sollicitous on which side he finds it. E

BERTIE, the name of a very ancient, illustrious, and noble family, ancestors of the present most noble Peregrine, Duke of Ancafter, and also of the Right Honourable the Earl of Abingdon. There are few families more ancient than this, for we can, with great certainty, trace it as far back as the days of King Ethelred II, between seven and eight hundred years ago. That we may make the more room for this article, we shall give the genealogy of the family down to Peregrine, the first nobleman thereof, in the note [A], and shall confine ourselves in the text, to the Lives of PEREGRINE, ROBERT,

[A] We shall give the genealogy of the family in the notes.] This family originally came into England from Bertiland in Prussia, when the Saxons invaded this nation; and by the gift of one of the Saxon Kings had a castle, and also a town, which was denominated from thence, Bertieset, now Bertsted, near Maidstone in Kent; Sted, and Stad, denoting in the Saxon language a town (1). It appears from an old manuscript in the Cotton library, that Leopald de Bertie, was Constable of Dover-castle, in the reign of King Ethelred, from whom descended Hieronymus de Bertie, founder, or at least a great benefactor to one of the monasteries in Kent, the north part of which he built at his own expence, and was himself buried in a chapel there, where these arms were put up against a pillar, viz. Three Battering Rams in pale (*). The said Leopald quarrelling with the Monks of St Austin at Canterbury about tithes, which the Monks endeavouring to carry off by force of arms, a fight began, wherein a son of Leopald's was slain; of which he complained to the King, but receiving no satisfaction, he flew to Sweyn, King of the Danes, for assistance, who invaded the kingdom with a powerful fleet, which was divided into two squadrons, one steering towards Northumberland, and the other for Kent, where they joined Leopald's forces, and laid siege to Canterbury, which they took in the year 1011, leading the Archbishop away captive; but Sweyn dying, the scale soon turned, for Ethelred miserably persecuted the Danes; and Burbach Bertie, the only surviving son of Leopald, conscious of his father's actions, went to Robert, King of France, who received him honourably; and having married a French woman, settled there, where his posterity continued 'till the year 1154, when Philip Bertie, with his family, accompanied King Henry the Second into England, and by that Prince's favour recovered his patrimony in Bertsted. This Philip had issue Martin, who was father of Robert, and he of William, who had issue Edward, father of Jerome, who lived at Bertsted aforesaid in the reign of King Henry the Fifth. This Jerome one Sunday in Lent, hearing a Monk in a church exclaiming against the murder occasioned by his ancestor, rushed in upon him, and slew him; for which rash act he was excommunicated by the Archbishop, and was obliged to go to Rome to get absolution; which he did, upon condition that he should ask pardon of the Archbishop and Monks of Canterbury at public mass, and pay two pieces of gold to the Convent, as the fruit of his repentance, and for the souls of his ancestors. He afterwards became a benefactor, by new building their church at his own charge. To this Jerome succeeded Robert, who had also issue Robert, father of William, who had issue Thomas, who was Captain of Hurst-castle in the Isle of Wight (2), in the reign of Henry the Seventh, and left issue Richard Bertie, Esq. This Richard had his education, first, in Corpus-Christi-college, Oxford (3), of which House he was a Fellow, and afterwards under Thomas Wriothesly, Earl of Southampton, Lord Chancellor of England; and being singularly learned in the French, Italian, and Latin tongues, and an accomplished Gentleman, he gained the affection of that great Duchess Katharine, the fourth wife of Charles Brandon, Duke of Suffolk, who left her a widow in 1545. She was, in her own right, Baroness Willoughby of Eresby, being daughter and sole heir of William, the last Lord Willoughby of Eresby (4). This Lady, being very zealous for the Reformation in the reign of King Edward the Sixth, drew both herself and her husband into danger, through the malice of Bishop Gardiner (5), restored by Queen Mary, who having sent for Richard Bertie her husband, in the first year of the Queen's reign (6), amongst other questions, touching his religion, asked, 'Whether the Lady his wife was now as ready to set up mass as she had been to pull it down, when in her progress she caused a dog in a rochet to be carried, and called by his (Gardiner's) name?' Upon this, Mr Bertie being advised by his friends, that the Bishop meant to call the Duchess his wife to an account for her religion, and foreseeing the danger, he procured the Queen's licence to travel beyond sea, under colour of looking after such debts as were due from the Emperor to the late Duke of Suffolk, his Lady's former husband; and having obtained it, passed the seas at Dover in June, the same year, leaving her behind, who, in January following, went disguised from her house in Barbican, and passing to Leigh in Essex, privately took shipping (7), and after much danger at sea, met her husband at Santon in Cleveland, where, after some stay, being like to be called to account for their faith by the Bishop of Arras, were obliged to haste away on foot with her daughter, a child, and two servants, to Wesel, a hanse-town in the duchy of Cleves; where, after going through many hardships, at length met accidentally with one who knew them, and had formerly been under obligations to the Duchess, and who therefore kindly entertained them 'till they got a protection from the Magistrates for their stay there. They hired a house, and the Duchess was brought to bed of a son, October 12, 1555, who was christened Peregrine, because he was born in a foreign country, (Terra peregrina) (8); since which, it is observable, there has been constantly one of that name in the family. Mr Bertie and his Duchess thinking themselves happily settled at Wesel, intelligence was sent them, that it had been contrived in England to seize them there; upon which they were obliged to fly to Winheim, a town in the Palgrave's dominions, where, having staid 'till necessaries began to fail them, it providentially happened that the King of Poland, hearing of their distress, kindly invited them into his country (9). They set out from Winheim in 1557, but in their way underwent divers great hardships, and were in danger of their lives from the Landgrave's soldiers, who, upon occasion of a quarrel about a spaniel which they had along with them, thrust boar-spears into the waggon where the Duchess and her children were; and pursuing her husband into a village, had murdered him, but that he forsook his horse, and ran up a ladder which was set to the top of a house, and thereby escaped. After this they passed on quietly to Poland, where they were courteously entertained by the King, and were honourably placed in the Earldom of Crozan in Sanogelia; in which place having the absolute power of governing, they continued in great quietness and honour 'till the death of Queen Mary, and then returned into England.—In the sixth year of Queen Elizabeth, Mr Bertie having waited

(4) Collins's
Peerage, Vol. I.
p. 255.
Lloyd's Memoirs,
p. 306.

(5) Historical Account of the present Nobility, p.
156.

(6) Hollingshed,
p. 1143.
Dugdale's Baro-nage, Tom. II.
p. 408.

(7) Dugdale, ut
supra.
Hollingshed, p.
1144.

(8) Dugdale's Baro-nage, p. 109.
Hollingshed, p.
1145.
Camden's Britannia, by Gibson,
p. 478, 479.

(9) Dugdale, ut
supra.
Hollingshed, ut
supra.

(1) Collins's
Peerage of England, Vol. I. p.
255.

(*) The present arms of the family.

(2) Historical Account of the Nobility of England,
p. 156.

(3) Wood's Fasti
Oxon. Vol. I. p.
689.
Hist. & Antiq.
Univ. Oxon. lib.
1. p. 276.
Hollingshed, Chr.
of England, pag.
1142.

ROBERT, and MOUNTAGUE BERTIE, three persons renowned for their valour and loyalty, and ornaments to their country; and, as such, highly deserving a place in English Biography.

(10) Collins's Peerage of England, ut supra.
 (11) F. F. in Offic. Arm. p. 271.
 (12) Catal. of Nob. by R. B.

on the Queen to Cambridge, when the University for five days entertained her with comedies, tragedies, and orations; he had then the degree of Master of Arts conferred on him (10). He died in 1582, aged sixty-four, having survived his Duchefs two years (11), and having issue an only son, Peregrine Bertie, before-mentioned, and a daughter, married to Reginald Grey, Earl of Kent (12). — In the year 1680, Charles Bertie, (13) Camden's Brit. by Gibson, p. 479. Peerage of England, ut supra.

BERTIE (PEREGRINE) son and heir of Richard Bertie, by Katharine, Duchefs of Suffolk, and (in her own right) Baroness Willoughby of Eresby (a), was, in the first year of Queen Elizabeth, made a free denizen, by patent bearing date the second of August, 1559 (b). On the death of his mother, he claimed the dignity and title of Lord Willoughby of Eresby, wearing his mourning-apparel at her funeral in all points as a Baron: the Queen having appointed Sir William Cecil, Knight, Lord Burleigh, Lord High-Treasurer of England; Thomas, Earl of Suffex, Lord High-Chamberlain; and Robert, Earl of Leicester; to hear and see the petition and proofs exhibited by the said Peregrine Bertie, for the dignity of Lord Willoughby of Eresby; and they having made their report to her Majesty of his right and title to the same, she commanded them to declare to him, that, according to his right, her pleasure was, that he should be admitted to the dignity, and be named and called by the title of, Lord Willoughby of Eresby (c), which they did in the Star-Chamber, on Friday the 11th of November, 1580, (his father being then living) and placed him at the table with them according to his rank, above many other Barons who dined with them, and all of them drank to him by the name of Lord Willoughby; and on Monday the 16th of January following, he took his seat in Parliament, next to Lord Zouch of Haringworth, according to his rank (d). In the year 1582, the Lord Willoughby, with the Earl of Leicester, and several other noble men, was commanded to attend the Duke of Anjou, (then in England, and who was to have married Queen Elizabeth) to Antwerp, which he did (e) the Queen herself going with them as far as Canterbury; and before the end of that year, his Lordship was sent Embassador to Frederick II, King of Denmark, under colour of carrying him the Order of the Garter, but the chief motive of his embassy was, to induce that Prince to desist from certain customs, which the English merchant-ships paid him in passing the Sound, in which, however, it was not possible to succeed (f). The Lord Willoughby, however, invested his Danish Majesty with the ensigns of the Order, put on the collar of roses about his neck, and the Garter about his leg, but the other ensigns the King took to keep and lay up, refusing to put them on because they were outlandish (g); and he likewise refused to take the usual oath, having denied the same thing before, when he was admitted to the Order of St Michael, by the French King (h). In 1586, he distinguished himself at the siege of Zutphen in the Netherlands, where, in a sharp encounter with the forces of that garrison, he overthrew George Cresfiack, at that time Commander in Chief of the enemy's horse, and took him prisoner (i). The year after, he was made General of the English auxiliary forces in the United Provinces, in the room of the Earl of Leicester, who was re-called home (k); there he most valiantly defended Bergen-op-zoom, against the Duke of Parma, who had besieged it (); and did many other signal services in Flanders, and acquired great applause and reputation. In the year 1589, he was one of the Peers that sat on the trial of Philip Earl of Arundel (l); and the same year he was sent General of four thousand auxiliaries into France, to the King of Navarre's alliance; and also carried with him, twenty-two thousand pounds sterling in gold (m). He assisted, and was very serviceable at the siege of Paris, also at the reduction of Mons, Alençon, Falais, Luxon, and Honfleur, and after the fatigue of a long winter's expedition, and a march of about five hundred miles, his troops were disbanded with great commendations for their good service (n), and a present of a diamond ring from the King of France, to their brave General the Lord Willoughby; which his Lordship at his death left his son Peregrine, with a charge, upon his blessing, to transmit it to his heirs (o). We do not find his Lordship engaged in any military exploits, after this expedition to France. He had already atchieved enough to establish his reputation as a great and able Commander, and there wanted nothing to raise his renown higher than it now was, to render him fairer in the eye of publick estimation, or to place him in a higher degree of confidence and esteem with his Sovereign. Of this we have an incontestable proof, in a letter wrote by the Queen, with her own hand, to this nobleman, by way of congratulation upon the recovery of his health, at the same time gently exhorting him to return again to his employments and to Court, from which he voluntarily absented himself (), for he had a magnanimity and greatness of spirit, that could not submit to the servileness and flattery of a Court. This letter is penned in such a friendly and familiar stile, with such kind expressions of gratitude for his Lordship's services, and genteel but just encomiums upon his merit, as shew much good sense and good nature in the writer. Where his Lordship was, at the time her Majesty paid him this honour, we are not informed; but, from the

(a) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 258. Lloyd's Memoirs of the Sufferings of worthy Persons, 8vo, p. 306. Historical and Genealogical Account of the present Nobility, p. 156. Dugdale's Baronage of England, Tom. II. p. 409.

(b) Pat. r. Eliz. pag. 2. Hollingshed's Chronicle of England, pag. 1142.

(c) Camden's Annals of Queen Elizabeth, p. 3. Rapin's Hist. of England, 8vo, Vol. IX. p. 23. Camden says, it was with much ado that the Queen admitted him to the title of Lord Willoughby. Complete Hist. of Engl. Vol. II. p. 488.

(d) In Rot. Parl. 22 Eliz. Dugdale's Summons to Parliament, p. 528. Journal of Parliament.

(e) Peerage of England, ut supra. Rapin's Hist. of England, Vol. IX. p. 21. Camden's Annals of Queen Elizabeth, ann. 1582. Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. II. p. 488. Dugdale's Baronage, Tom. II. p. 409. Hollingshed, p. 1143. Echard's Hist. of England, p. 349.

(f) Camden's Annals.

(g) Rapin, ubi supra. Camden, ubi supra. Compleat Hist. ut supra.

(h) Compl. Hist. of England, Vol. II. p. 488.

(i) Peerage of England, ubi supra. Camden, ann. 1586. Dugdale's Baronage, c. 409.

(k) Rapin's Hist. of England, Vol. IX. p. 117. Camden's Annals. Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. II. p. 541.

(*) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 409.

(l) Historical Account of the Nobility, p. 157. Camden's Annals. Dugdale's Baronage, Tom. II. p. 409.

(m) Rapin. Vol. IX. p. 136.

(n) Echard's Hist. of England, pag. 363.

(o) Dugdale's Baronage, Tom. II. p. 409. Camden's Annals, p. 16. Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. II. p. 557. Hollingshed, p. 1143.

(*) Sir Robert Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia, p. 22.

(o) Peetrage of England, Vol. I. p. 261. Camden's Annals. Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. II. p. 643. Woodhall, qu. 58. Dugdale's Baro-nage, p. 409.

(p) Lloyd's Memoirs, p. 308.

(q) Camden's Annals, p. 257. Compleat Hist. Vol. II. p. 643. Collins's Peetrage, Vol. I. p. 261.

(r) Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia, p. 22.

(s) Lloyd, in his Memoirs, p. 308.

(t) Camden's Britann. by Gibson, p. 322.

(u) Dugdale's Baronage, ut supra. J. 8, in Officio Arm. fol. 13. a. Collins's Peetrage, ut supra.

letter, it should seem, that he was somewhere abroad, though probably he might be only at Berwick, of which place he was Governor about this time, or however soon after, for his Will bears date 7 Aug. 1559, at Berwick (o), five years after the date of the Queen's letter, which we have preserved in the note [A], as a curiosity our readers will, doubtless, be pleased to see. Her Majesty had some years before this given his Lordship a proof of her regard for him, by voluntarily offering to stand god-mother to his first born son Robert, (the young General (p) as she then called him) and which words he verified, as we shall see hereafter. This great nobleman departed this life, in the beginning of the year 1601 (q), and was buried, according to his desire, in the parish church of Spilsby, in the county of Lincoln, where a monument was erected to his memory. His Lordship's Will is remarkable, and we have therefore given an extract or two from it in the note [B]. Sir Robert Naunton (r) says of him, 'that he was one of the Queen's first swordsmen, and a great master in the art military.' Another writer (s) records two or three things of him, which indeed shew a great spirit and manly resolution. They are briefly these. His Lordship having, in one of his campaigns, taken a fine gennet, managed for the war, and intended as a present for the King of Spain, he was importuned by the Spanish General to return it, with the offer of a thousand pounds down, or an hundred pounds a year during his life. To which the Lord Willoughby replied, 'That if it had been a General or Commander he had taken, he would have freely sent him back; but it being an horse, he loved him as well as the King of Spain, and therefore would keep him.' Once, when his Lordship was confined to his bed with the gout, he had an insulting challenge sent him, to which he answered, 'that although he was lame of his hands and feet, yet he would meet his adversary with a piece of a rapier in his teeth.' He used to say, 'That a Court became a soldier of good skill and great spirit, as a bed of down would one of the Tower Lyons.' Camden (t) gives him the character of having a very generous temper and true martial courage. His Lordship married Mary, the daughter of John Vere, Earl of Oxford, sister and heir of the whole blood to Edward, the seventeenth Earl of Oxford, and left issue by her five sons, Robert, Peregrine, Henry, Vere, and Roger; and a daughter, married to Sir Lewis Watton, of Rockingham castle, in the county of Northampton, afterwards Lord Rockingham (u). His Lordship was succeeded by his eldest son, Robert Bertie.

[A] The Queen's letter, which we have preserved in the note. It is as follows:

' Good Peregrine,

' WE are not a little glad, that by your journey you have received such good fruit of amendment; especially when we consider how great a vexation it is to a mind, devoted to action and honour, to be restrained by any indisposition of body from following those courses, which, to your own reputation, and our great satisfaction, you have formerly performed. And therefore, as we must now (out of our desire of your well-doing) chiefly enjoin you to an especial care, to increase and continue your health, which must give life to all your best endeavours; so we must next as seriously recommend to you this consideration, that in these times, when there is such appearance that we shall have the trial of our best and noble subjects, you seem not to affect the satisfaction of your own private contentment, beyond the attending on that which nature and duty challengeth from all persons of your quality and profession. For if necessarily (your health of body being recovered) you shall elloigne yourself by residence there from those employments, whereof we shall have too good store, you shall not so much amend the state of your body, as happily you shall call in question the reputation of your mind and judgment, even in the opinion of those that love you, and are best acquainted with your disposition and discretion.

' Interpret this our plainness, we pray you, to our extraordinary estimation of you; for it is not common with us to deal so freely with many; and believe, that you shall ever find us both ready and willing, in all occasions, to yield you the fruits of that interest, which your endeavours have purchased for you in our opinion and estimation; not doubting, but when you have with moderation made trial of the success of these your sundry peregrinations, you will find as great comfort to spend your days at home, as heretofore you have done, of which we do wish

' you full measure, however you shall have cause of abode or return.

' Your most loving Sovereign,

' E. R.

' GIVEN under our Signet, at our manour of Nonfuch, the seventh of October, 1594, in the 37th year of our reign.'

[B] We have given an extract or two from his Will in the note. It begins thus: ' In the name of the blessed divine Trinitie in persons, and of omnipotent Unitye in Godhead, who created, redeemed, and sanctified me, whom I steadfastlye beleve will glorifye this sinfull, corruptible and fleshye bodye, with eternal happyness by a joyefull resurrection at the general Judgment, when by his incomprehensible justice and mercye, having satisfied for my sinfull soule, and stored it uppe in his heavenlye treasure, his almightye voice shall call all hestte to be joined together with the soule to everlasting comforte or discomforte. In that holye name I Peregrin Bertye, Knighte, Lorde Willoughbie of Willoughbie, Beke, and Eresbie, &c.' He then proceeds to dispose of his estates and effects among his children, and goes on to request her most gracious Majesty, in most humble and dutiful manner, that in some respect of his loyal and ready heart always to do her all faithful service, her Majesty would be graciously pleased to grant the education and wardship of his son and heir, and one lease of her Majesty's third part of his lands, during his nonage, to the Lord Edward Zouch, &c. whereby her Majesty would most loyally respect his long and affectionate service towards her. And for a small remembrance of his loyalty and duty, which he had always observed toward her Majesty, he desired she would accept of a cup of Gold to the value of 100 l. or some jewels of that value, as may best content her, and best represent the loyalty of his heart, &c.'

H

(a) Lloyd's Memoirs, p. 307.

(*) See the preceding article.

BERTIE (ROBERT) born at London, December 16, 1582 (a); her Majesty Queen Elizabeth, the Earls of Essex and Leicester, were his sponsors (*). This nobleman when he was very young, shewed an unusual forwardness and inclination to arms and military exercises, was present at several sieges, as that of Amiens, under Sir John Baskerville,

(b) Lloyd's Memoirs, p. 309. Baskerville, and Sir Arthur Savage (b); that of Cadiz, under the Earls of Essex and Nottingham, in 1596, where he was knighted for his valiant behaviour; at the famous battle of Newport, fought between Prince Maurice and the Arch-Duke, in the year 1600, when he was three times unhorsed, but still undaunted, and where eight hundred Englishmen lost their lives (c). He was also with the Earl of Cumberland when he took the Caracks at Porto-Rico; and also with Sir Richard Leveson, and Sir William Mounson, in 1602 (d), when they took the great Spanish carack, worth a million of crowns, and dispersed eleven gallees that guarded her (e). Having seen most of the Courts and countries in Europe, his Lordship, in the first year of King James I, set up his claim to the earldom of Oxford, as also to the title of Bulbeck, Sandford, and Badlesmere, and to the office of Lord High-Chamberlain of England, as son and heir to Mary, the sole daughter to that great family (f); and after much dispute had judgment in his behalf, for the office of Lord High-Chamberlain (g); and the same year took his seat above all the Barons (b). His Lordship was afterwards created a Knight of the Bath, at the installation of Prince Charles, afterwards King of England (i). During the peaceable reign of King James, he lived quietly at his seat in Lincolnshire (k); but in the next reign, which found employment enough for the most active mind, he greatly distinguished himself. In the second year of King Charles I, he was advanced to the dignity of Earl of Lindsey (l). In 1628, he was made Admiral, in the room of the Duke of Buckingham, murdered by Felton at Portsmouth; in a few days after which, he sailed with a large fleet to the relief of Rochelle, where he made many brave attempts, to break through the great barricado across the entry of that port, but all in vain (m). And four years after, was elected a Knight of the most noble Order of the Garter, and one of his Majesty's most honourable Privy-Council (n). The next year, the seventh of King Charles I, he was made Lord High-Constable of England, for the trial of Lord Rea and David Ramsay, in the Court Military (o); which patent was revoked the twentieth of May (p). In the ninth of Charles I, he commanded a fleet of forty sail of men of war, for securing the Narrow Seas, and the trade of England (q). In the eleventh of Charles I, he was constituted Lord High-Admiral of England (r), having, according to the Historian (s), been Admiral at sea in several expeditions; and in 1639, on the Scots taking arms, he was made Governor of Berwick. In 1640, he was made Lord High-Constable of England, for the trial of Lord Strafford, of which he had the management (t), being also, at that time, Speaker of the House of Peers. This same year his Majesty declared him General of his forces (u), and he was ever near his Majesty's person, assisting him to the very utmost of his power and abilities; with his advice in council, and his experience and valour in the field, as we shall, but too soon, see. He, and his son, the Lord Willoughby of Eresby, afterwards Earl of Lindsey, were, to their honour be it spoken, among those Lords who left the House of Peers, and followed their King to York, in 1642 (w), where they entered into, and signed a solemn engagement, to stand by his Majesty, in defence of his person, crown, and dignity, and the maintenance of the established laws and religion, with their lives and fortunes (x): and accordingly, the Earl of Lindsey and his son; raised the counties of Lincoln and Nottingham, for the King's defence (y). They afterwards joined with the other Lords, then with the King at York, in a declaration or testimony, in vindication of his Majesty, protesting, they were fully persuaded he had no intention of making war upon the Parliament, as was then reported, but that all his endeavours tended to the firm and constant settlement of the Protestant religion, the just privileges of Parliament, the liberty of the subject, and the law, peace, and prosperity of his kingdom (z). Both which Declarations were printed and published, with the Lords names thereto, remaining as monuments of their loyalty and zeal, for the honour of their much injured Sovereign. The brave Earl of Lindsey, this same year, gave the last proof of his affection for his Majesty, and of his own personal bravery, in the battle of Edgehill, fought on the twenty-third of October, 1642, in which his Lordship was killed, receiving a shot in his thigh, at the head of his own regiment, and his son, the Lord Willoughby, taken prisoner (a). It is very proper to give a more particular account of this famous battle, which we shall do, briefly, in the note [A]. After his Lordship was wounded, and taken away by the rebels,

(c) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, 8vo. edit. Vol. I. p. 673.

(i) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 47.

(u) Rushworth's Historical Collections, the Abridgement, 8vo. Vol. III. p. 54.

(v) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 62. Peerage of England, ut supra. Echar'd's Hist. of England, p. 496. Rapin's Hist. of England, folio, Vol. II. p. 565. Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. I. p. 673.

(w) Monteth's History of the Troubles of Great Britain, p. 101.

(x) Rushworth's Historical Collections, Vol. IV. p. 379. Monteth, p. 107. Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, 8vo. Vol. I. p. 654. Whitlock's Memorials, p. 60.

(y) Lloyd's Memorials, p. 312.

(z) Rushworth, ut supra. Monteth, p. 108. Clarendon's Hist. p. 655.

(a) Dugdale's Baronage, p. 409. Clarendon, Rushworth, Rapin, Whitlock, Compleat Hist. &c.

[A] It is very proper to give a more particular account of this famous battle, which we shall briefly do in the note.] The King's army consisted of about 14,000 men; that of the Parliament, under the command of the Earl of Essex, of near 16,000 (1). The two armies being in sight of each other, near Keinton in Warwickshire, on Sunday, the 23d of October (2), the King drew up his army in the morning on Edgehill, from whence might be seen all Keinton plain, where the Parliament's army stood in battle array. The Earl of Lindsey was General of the King's whole army by his commission; and, says the Historian, was thought very equal to it (3). But Prince Rupert, the King's nephew, who was General of the horse, was, by the King's particular favour and regard for him, exempted from receiving orders from any body but the King himself; by which step all the horse was entirely separated from any dependance upon the General (4); whose advice also concerning the order of battle, and disposition of the troops, the King rejected for Prince Rupert's. It had been happier for the King, perhaps, if the Lord Lindsey had been sole director of the army, since it was the rashness, or too great eagerness, of Prince Rupert, that lost the day. Besides, this partiality of the King's to his nephew had created some discontent in the army, and made the Earl of Lindsey uneasy, but was far from shaking his loyalty; and accordingly, the army having marched down the hill, and the King having given orders to charge the enemy in a valley under it, called the Valley of the Red Horse, a name not unsuitable to it that day (5), the General himself alighted at the head of his own regiment of foot, his son the Lord Willoughby being next to him with the King's regiment of guards, and bravely

(4) Clarendon, ut supra.

(5) Monteth, ubi supra.

(b) Lloyd's Memoirs, p. 309.
 (c) Rapin, Vol. IX. p. 195.
 (d) Lloyd, ut supra.
 (e) Rapin, p. 217.
 (f) Dugdale's Baronage of England, Tom. II. p. 409.
 (g) Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 265.
 (h) Journal of Parliament. Historical Account of the Nobility, &c. p. 157.
 (i) Dugdale's Summons to Parliament, p. 540.
 (j) Lloyd's Memoirs, p. 310.
 (k) Lloyd, ibid.
 (l) Pat. 2 Car. I.
 (m) Compleat History of England, Vol. I. p. 49.
 (n) Memoirs of the Duke of Buckingham, p. 133.
 (o) Peerage, ut supra.
 (p) Lloyd, ut supra. Infit. of the Garter, by Ashmole.
 (q) Pat. 7 Car. I. p. 20.
 (r) Pat. 8 Car. I. p. 21.
 (s) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 23.
 (t) Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 31.
 (u) Pat. 11 Car. I. p. 5.

(1) Rapin's Hist. of England, Vol. II. p. 11, 13.
 (2) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 64.
 (3) Monteth's History of the Troubles of Great Britain, p. 118.
 (4) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. II. p. 43.

(6) Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. II. p. 52, 53.

he continued, even with his dying breath, his endeavours to serve his royal master, by seriously exhorting the rebel officers to return to their obedience and duty to the King, as we learn from the Lord Clarendon (6), in his character of this nobleman, which is as follows: 'The Earl of Lindsey, says he, was a man of very noble extraction, and inherited a great fortune from his ancestors, which though he did not manage with so great care, as if he desired much to improve, yet he left it in a very fair condition to his family, which more intended the increase of it. He was a man of great honour, and spent his youth and vigour of his age, in military actions and commands abroad: and albeit he indulged to himself great liberties of life, yet he still preserved a very good reputation with all men, and a very great interest in his country, as appeared by the supplies he and his son brought to the King's army; the several companies of his own regiment of foot, being commanded by the principal Knights and gentlemen of Lincolnshire, who engaged themselves in the service, principally out of their personal affection to him. he was of a generous nature, and punctual in what he undertook, and in exacting what was due to him; which made him bear that restriction so heavily, which was put upon him by the commission granted to Prince Rupert; and by the King's preferring the Prince's opinion, in all matters relating to the war, before his: nor did he conceal his resentment; the day before the battle, he said to some friends with whom he used freedom, that he did not look upon himself as General, and therefore he was resolved, when the day of battle should come, that he would be at the head of his regiment, as a private Colonel, where he would die.' (Which words of his proved truly prophetic, as did also the other, when, going into the battle, he cast his eye upon young Prince Charles, and said, (*) There is the child that will end the war we now begin.) 'He was carried out of the field to the next village, and if he could then have procured surgeons, it is thought his wound would not have proved mortal. And as soon as the other army was composed by the coming on of the night, the Earl of Essex, about midnight sent Sir William Balfour, and some other officers, to see him, and to offer him all offices, and meant himself to have visited him. They found him upon a little straw, in a poor house, where they had laid him in his blood, which had run from him in great abundance, no surgeon having been yet with him, only he had great vivacity in his looks, and told them he was sorry to see so many gentlemen, some of whom were his old friends, engaged in so foul a rebellion; and principally directed his discourse to Sir William Balfour, whom he put in mind of the great obligations he had to the King, how much his Majesty had disobliged the whole nation by putting him into the command of the Tower, and that it was the most odious ingratitude in him to make him that return. He wished them to tell the Lord Essex, that he ought to cast himself at the King's feet to beg his pardon, which if he did not speedily do, his memory would be odious bravely charged the enemy in front (6). Prince Rupert, with the King's right wing of horse, advancing to charge the enemy's left wing, on a sudden Sir Faithful Fortescue, who commanded a troop of the Parliament's horse, moving forwards with his whole troop from the grove of the enemy's cavalry, and discharging their pistols on the ground, presented themselves to Prince Rupert, and directly joined with him in charging those they had just deserted (7). This unexpected desertion struck the Parliament's horse with such a terror, each man looking upon his companion as upon an enemy, that they were entirely routed, and pursued above two miles from the field of battle. But this long and unadvised pursuit lost the King a complete victory. The Parliament's right wing stood their ground no better than the left, for they ran away full speed, and were pursued with the same fury and the same imprudence. What was moreover fatal to the King was, that a regiment of horse which served for a body of reserve, thinking that the victory was now unquestionable by the flight of the enemy's cavalry, with spurs and loose reins followed the chace, and could not be kept back by their commanders. All this while the foot of both armies were engaged, without victory inclining to either side; 'till at length Sir William Balfour, to whom the Earl of Essex had given the command of the reserve, turned the scale; for as soon as he saw the King's horse so eagerly employed in the pursuit of the flying troops, he went and charged the foot in flank, and put them into such disorder, that the King, with the two Princes his sons, were in danger of being made prisoners. Then it was the brave General, the Earl of Lindsey, being far engaged (8), received a shot in the thigh, with which he fell, and was presently encompassed with the enemy; and his son, the Lord Willoughby, piously endeavouring to rescue his father, was taken prisoner along with him (9); or, according to the author cited in the margin (10), seeing his valiant father wounded and taken prisoner, voluntarily yielded himself to a Commander of horse on the rebels side, that he might be near and attend him. At length, Prince Rupert returning from his fatal pursuit of the rebels, found the hope of so glorious a day totally vanished; but his return, however, prevented the King from being entirely routed: For Sir William Balfour, who had only a small body of reserve, seeing the cavalry coming back from the chace, suddenly quitted the fight, and went and screened himself near the Earl of Essex's foot; and could the King and Prince Rupert have persuaded their horse at that time to have charged the Parliament's infantry, who had hardly any cavalry to support them, it is very probable they would have routed them, and obtained a complete victory. But the horse that were returned from the pursuit in extreme disorder, could not be brought to charge the enemy, who stood in good order, though they were in great danger. It was three o'clock in the afternoon before the fight began, and it was now too late for the King to attempt to rally his infantry, who were in great disorder; and thus both armies kept their posts all night, and even the next whole day faced one another without renewing the battle. At last the Earl of Essex ordering his baggage to be drawn off, the King withdrew to the quarters he had taken the day before the battle; and the Earl of Essex marched to Warwick (11). The number of slain on the field of battle, and in the pursuit, was above 5000, of which the King's loss was about a third part (12); and the King's party took from the enemy seventy colours and standards, with seven pieces of cannon (13), and lost only sixteen colours (14). Nevertheless, both parties claimed the victory, though perhaps neither was more intitled to it than the other; for each in it's turn was victorious, and each beaten. Indeed the Parliament lost more men, colours, standards, and cannon; yet they kept the field in very good order, the doing which at least saved them from the dishonour of a defeat. But their loss was much

(*) Echarde's Hist. of England, p. 543.

(6) Rushworth's Hist. Collections, Vol. IV. p. 547. Echarde's Hist. of England, p. 543.

(7) Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 47. Rapin's Hist. Vol. XII. p. 17, 18.

(8) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 64.

(9) Dugdale's Baronage, p. 409. Clarendon's Hist. Vol. II. p. 48. Rapin's History, Vol. XII. p. 18. Rushworth's Historical Collections, Vol. IV. p. 547.

(10) Collins, in his Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 267.

(11) Clarendon, Vol. II. p. 56. Rapin, Vol. XII. p. 20.

(12) Clarendon, ut supra.

(13) Monteth's Troubles of Gr. Brit. p. 119.

(14) Rushworth's Historical Collections, Vol. IV. more p. 546.

‘ odious to the nation: and’ continued this kind of discourse with so much vehemence, ‘ that the officers by degrees withdrew themselves, and prevented the visit the Earl of Essex intended him, who only sent the best surgeons to him. But, in the very opening ‘ of his wounds, he died before the morning, only upon the loss of blood. He had very ‘ many friends, and very few enemies, and died generally lamented.’ The Lord Lindsey’s wound not being thought mortal, nor even dangerous, his death was imputed to the Earl of Essex, as if he had purposely neglected, or forbid the performing of any necessary offices to him, out of the insolence of his nature, and in revenge of some former unkindnesses that had passed between them. But the above account clears him from such imputation; and the Lord Clarendon, in another part of his work (c), acquits his Lordship, attributing the unfortunate Lord Lindsey’s want of assistance, to the hurry and distraction the rebels were in at that time. This great nobleman married Elizabeth, the only child of Edward, the first Lord Montague of Boughton in Northamptonshire, by whom he had five daughters and nine sons (d); Montague, his successor; Roger, Knight of the Bath at the coronation of King Charles I; Robert, Peregrine, Francis, who was Captain of horse, and killed in the King’s service in Ireland, in 1641; Robert, sixth son; Henry, who was also Captain of horse, and lost his life in the King’s service at the battle of Newbury; - Vere, and Edward. His Lordship was succeeded by his eldest son Montague Bertie.

(c) Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. II. p. 51.

(d) J 8. in Officio Arm. f. 74. Ibid. f. 13. Dugdale’s Baronage, p. 410.

more than equalled on the other side, by that irreparable one of the great Earl of Lindsey, than whom the King had not a more valiant, experienced, or faithful officer, left in his army. The King himself was very sensibly affected with the loss of this great man, and the imprisonment of his son; and in a few days after the battle, with all the tenderness of a parent, he wrote the following letter with his own hand, directed For the Earl of Lindsey, Lord High-Chamberlain of England, and signed with his Sign Manual. This letter, so much to the honour of the family, is no where extant but in Mr Echard’s History of England (15), who had it from the Honourable Charles Bertie of Uffington, on purpose to be by him published, which it never had been till then. We shall therefore give it a place here, as highly deserving the reader’s notice.

(15) Echard, P. 549.

LINDSEY,

‘ YOU cannot be more sensible (as I believe) of your father’s loss than myself, his death confirming the estimation I ever had of him; as for yourself, the double sufferings you have for my sake, both in your father’s person and your own, puts upon me the stricter obligation, not only to restore you to your liberty (now unjustly detained from you), but also to shew the world by my actions how really I am Ayno, 27 Oct. 1642.

‘ Your most assured,

‘ Constant friend.

‘ CHARLES R.’

H

BERTIE (MONTAGUE) whom, in the last article, we have followed (by the name of Lord Willoughby of Eresby) to the battle of Edge-hill, where, we have seen, he was taken prisoner, endeavouring to rescue his father. Being afterwards exchanged (a), he went to Oxford, where the King then was, who joyfully received him (b); and he as resolutely adhered to his Majesty’s service, commanding the regiment of life-guards in several battles, as at Newbury twice, Cropredy, Leftwithiel, and other places; as also in the fatal battle of Naseby (c), where he was wounded; and had a share in all the misfortunes of that King, being one of the Gentlemen of his royal Bedchamber, and of his Privy-Council, attending him even to the time his Majesty put himself into the hands of the Scots (d). At the treaty in the Isle of Wight, the King sent for him, to be one of his Commissioners and advisers (e). After the execrable murder of the King, the Earl of Lindsey, together with the Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Hertford, and Earl of Southampton, desired leave to perform the last duty to their dead master, and to wait upon him to his grave, which they were permitted to do, and accordingly they attended the royal corpse to Windsor, where it was buried (f). After this, the Lord Lindsey compounded, and lived privately, expecting and endeavouring the restoration of Monarchy and Episcopacy; which being effected, King Charles II. constituted him one of his Privy-Council (g), and his Lordship was also appointed one of the Judges at the tryals of the regicides (h); and afterwards elected a Knight of the most noble Order of the Garter, at a chapter held at Whitehall, the first of April, 1661. And at the King’s coronation, exhibiting his claim for the exercise of that great hereditary office of Lord High-Chamberlain of England (i), and for the reception of such fees and benefits, as his noble ancestors had heretofore enjoyed, did accordingly, on that solemn occasion, execute the office of Lord High-Chamberlain, and receive those fees and benefits which were of right his due (k). His Lordship died at Campden-house in Kensington, the twenty-fifth of July, 1666, aged fifty-eight years, and was buried at Edenham, in the vault with his noble father. Mr Archdeacon Echard gives this character of the Lord Lindsey (l). ‘ He was, ‘ says he, one of the Quadrivirate, that had been so eminently distinguished for their ‘ unparalleled loyalty to the late King; a brave, experienced soldier; a great patron of ‘ useful learning and ingenuity; an honest, frugal, and faithful Englishman; and a true ‘ patriot and imitator of the antient nobility, whose grandure consisted neither in rich cloaths ‘ nor fine courtship; after he had waded through an ocean of difficulties, he died in quiet, ‘ peace, and honour.’ He married to his first wife Martha, daughter of Sir William Cockayne of Ruffton in Northamptonshire, widow of the Earl of Holderness, by whom he had issue five sons, Robert, Peregrine, Richard, Vere (one of the Barons of the Exchequer in

(a) Collins’s Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 267.

(b) Whitlock’s Memorials, p. 48.

(c) Clarendon’s History of the Rebellion, 8vo. Vol. III. p. 656. Rapin’s Hist of England, 8vo. Vol. XII. p. 307. Dugdale’s Baronage of England, Tom. II. p. 409. Rushworth’s Historical Collections, the Abridgment, Vol. V. p. 527.

(d) Peerage of England, ut supra.

(e) Rushworth’s Historical Collections, Vol. VI. p. 475. Clarendon’s Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. III. p. 188.

(f) Clarendon’s History of the Rebellion, Vol. III. p. 259.

(g) Rapin, Vol. XIII. p. 240. Continuation of the Hist. of England, Vol. I. p. 9. State Tryals. Tryals of the Regicides, &c.

(h) Continuation, Vol. I. p. 21.

(i) Dugdale’s Baronage, Tom. II. p. 409.

(k) Dugdale’s Baronage, Tom. II. p. 409. Journal of Parliament.

(l) Echard’s History of England, p. 827.

the reign of King Charles II, and afterwards one of the Judges of the Common-Pleas) and Charles; and three daughters. By his second wife he had two sons, James and Henry, the first of which (who was Lord Norris by descent from his mother, who was in her own right, Baroness Norris of Rycote) was, on account of his noble descent and eminent services to King Charles II. (as his patent sets forth) by him created Earl of Abingdon, the thirtieth of November, 1682, 34 Car. II, and was the grandfather of the present Earl of Abingdon. To Montague, Earl of Lindsey, succeeded Robert, his eldest son, who, the same year his father died, was sworn of his Majesty's Privy-Council. He was succeeded by his eldest son Robert, the fourth Earl of Lindsey, who was one of the Privy-Council to King William III, and Lord Lieutenant, and Custos Rotulorum, for the county of Lincoln. On the twenty-ninth of December, 1706, the fifth of Queen Anne, he was created Marquis of Lindsey (m); and in the next reign, on the first of October, 1714, he was sworn one of his Majesty's Privy-Council; and in the same month he was made Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum for the county of Lincoln, being likewise, on the twenty-ninth of July, 1715, created Duke of Ancaster and Kesteven. His Grace dying in 1723 (n), was succeeded by his eldest surviving son, Peregrine, who soon after was sworn of the Privy-Council, and appointed Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of the county of Lincoln, in which posts he was also continued by his present Majesty, and dying a few years since, was succeeded by his eldest son Peregrine, the present Duke of Ancaster. H

(m) Oldmixon's History of England, Vol. II. p. 383.

(n) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 269.

(a) Baleus, de Script. Brit. Centur. VI. n. 89. & Pitt. de Illust. Angl. Script. an. 1381, n. 670.

(b) Historia Wickleffiana, in calce Harpsfieldi Flist. Eccles. edit. Duaci. 1622, p. 684. See the article WICKLIFF.

(1) Bale and Pitts, ubi supra.

(2) Bale, ibid.

BERTON (WILLIAM) an eminent Divine of the XIVth century, and Doctor in that faculty, flourished about the year 1381, in the reign of Richard II, and was some time Chancellor of the university of Oxford (a). He is chiefly remarkable for his opposition to the doctrines of Wickliff: for, by virtue of his office, as Governor of the university, he appointed twelve Censors, six of the order of Mendicants, and six Seculars, consisting of Divines and Lawyers, to examine Wickliff's opinions; who accordingly declared him an Heretic (b). He wrote likewise against that pretended Heresiarch [A]. And for this reason it is, that his character is so differently represented by Bale and Pitts [B].

[A] He wrote against Wickliff. He wrote several pieces upon the subject of Wickliff's pretended Heresy; particularly Determinations against Wickliff; a Treatise concerning his just condemnation; and another against the Articles extracted from his writings (1).

[B] His character is differently represented by Bale and Pitts. Bale, as a Protestant, abuses him plentifully for his prosecution of Wickliff, whom he calls a most pious Divine. He represents our Chancellor as exalting the Pope (whom he styles Romulus's Vicar in parricide) above all that is called God, or that is worshipped. 'Primus omnium fuit, qui Romuli in parricidio vicarium Papam superbissimum, super omne quod dicitur Deus, aut quod colitur, extollens, Joannem Wickleffum, pissimum Theologum, publicè damnavit, et apostolicis bullis hereticum declaravit (2).' Next to Berton, he falls upon the twelve Censors, whom he treats as actuated by a spirit of fanaticism, and as condemning the Truth of God himself in their condemnation of Wickliff. 'Qui omnem in illum exercentes tyrannidem, fanatico spiritu agitati, vocibus et scriptis Dei veritatem in eo damnabant (3).' (3) Ibid. Pitts, on the contrary, being a zealous Papist, commends the piety, learning, prudence, and sagacity, of the Chancellor, in detecting the erroneous and pernicious doctrines of Wickliff, and his judgment in thinking it his duty to bring them under public censure. Hic cum esset vir pius, doctus, prudens, et ingenio perspicaci, vidit pestilentem Wickleffi doctrinam ad Ecclesiam perniciem tendere, et ad multarum animarum interitum. Quare ad officii sui rationem pertinere judicavit super hoc religionis negotio inquirere, et re accuratius examinata, competentes judices in tota causa constituit (4). Behold here the strange and deplorable effect of religious prejudice! The same action, in the opinion of one writer, is no less than maintaining the cause of Antichrist; in another's, it is the dictate of piety, prudence, and every good quality; and the same doctrine is at once a pestilent error, and the truth of God himself. T

(4) Pitts, ubi supra.

BETTERTON (THOMAS) the most famous Actor upon our stage, and who might be very justly stiled the English Roscius. He was son of Mr Betterton, Under-Cook to King Charles I, and was born in Tothil-street in Westminster, some time in the year 1635 (a). Having received the rudiments of polite learning in several schools, and shewing a great propensity to reading, it was once proposed he should have been brought up to some learned profession; but the violence and confusion of the times putting this out of the power of his family, it was, at his own request, agreed, that he should be bound apprentice to a Bookfeller (b), and accordingly he was so put to Mr John Holden, a person in those days very famous, and much in the confidence of Sir William D'Avenant (c), tho' this, as almost every other circumstance of the earlier part of Betterton's life, is subject to some dispute [A]. It is therefore a very difficult thing to tell how, or when, he came upon

(a) See this point cleared in note [A].

(b) From the information of the late Mr Southcote.

(c) He printed Sir William's Poem, called Gondibert.

(1) The title of this book is, The Life of Mr Thomas Betterton, the late eminent Tragedian. Wherein the Action and Utterance, of the Stage, Bar, and Pulpit, are distinctly considered, &c. Lond. 1710, 8vo. It is dedicated to Richard Steele, Esq; and the Dedication subscribed Charles Gildon.

[A] Is subject to some dispute. There are very few lives, in which the dates and circumstances are more difficult to be settled with tolerable certainty than this; which probably arises from nothing so much as persons affirming facts upon memory, in which they were liable to be mistaken, and others committing them to writing without discerning their mistakes. As for instance, Mr Charles Gildon, who drew up a kind of rhapsody, to which he gave the title of Mr Betterton's Life (1), tells us, that at his decease he was seventy-five years of age. Another author says, that he was about seventy (2); and a person, who had reason to be better acquainted with his history, assures us, that he was considerably above that age (3). In all this we have nothing of certainty; but the late Mr Southernc, who was very well acquainted with Mr Betterton, when applied to upon this head, recollected, that, on his last benefit, Mr Betterton declared he was in his seventy-fifth year; if so, that fixes the time of his birth very exactly. It is affirmed also by Mr Gildon, that he was bound to Mr Rhodes a Bookfeller, and that he was fellow-prentice with Mr Kynaston (4); but if Mr Betterton might be allowed to know this fact better than any body else, he told the late Mr Pope, that he was bound to Mr Holden:

(3) Cibber's Life, p. 99.

(4) Life of Betterton, p. 5.

(2) History of the Stage, p. 91.

upon the stage, not because we have no accounts of this matter, but because those accounts differ from, and indeed are irreconcilable to, each other; yet upon examining them closely, and comparing all their circumstances, it seems to be highly probable, that he began to act under the direction of Sir William D'Avenant, in 1656 or 1657, at the Opera-House in Charter-House Yard (d) [B]. He continued there 'till the Restoration, when the face of theatrick affairs changed entirely, and two distinct companies were formed by royal authority, the first in virtue of a patent granted to Henry Killegrew, Esq; his heirs and assigns, which was called the King's Company; the other in virtue of a like patent, granted to Sir William D'Avenant, his heirs and assigns, which was styled the Duke's Company (e). The former acted at the Theatre Royal in Drury-Lane, and the latter at the Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields. In order that every thing might appear to the utmost advantage, and the English Theatre want none of the decorations used abroad, Mr Betterton, by command of King Charles II, went to Paris to take a view of the French stage, that he might the better judge of what would contribute to the improvement of our own (f). Upon his return, such measures were taken, as it was apprehended would give the utmost lustre to the English stage; and for several years, both companies acted with the highest applause, and the utmost reputation (g) [C]. The Theatre in Lincoln's-Inn-

(d) Wood's A. B. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 412. Phillips's Theatrum Poetarum, p. 197. Life of Betterton.

(e) Apology for the Life of Mr C. Cibber, by himself, London, 1740, 8vo, p. 75.

(f) Life of Betterton.

(g) See the Prologues to the Plays in those times, Dryden's Prefaces, and other records of Dramatick History.

(1) Mr J. Richardson's Life of Milton, p. 90.

Holden (5): But whether he might not afterwards live with Mr Rhodes, is a question not easy to be answered at this distance of time; and when there are so few people living to whom any application could be made, with any tolerable hopes of receiving an answer with certainty.

[B] At the opera-house in Charter-house-yard] We are told by a certain author, from a kind of tradition, that Betterton, being a Bookfeller's prentice, and coming to the play-house about his master's business, took a fancy to the stage, and so became a player (6). Mr Gildon, in his book before-mentioned, gives us quite another account of the matter (7). 'That, says he, which prepared Mr Betterton and his fellow-prentice for the stage was, that his master Rhodes having formerly been wardrobe-keeper to the King's company of comedians in the Black-Fryers, on General Monk's march to London in 1659 with his army, got a licence from the powers then in being, to set up a company of players in the Cockpit in Drury-lane, and soon made his company compleat; his apprentices, Mr Betterton for mens parts, and Mr Kynaston for womens parts, being at the head of them. Mr Betterton was now about twenty-two years of age, when he got a great applause by acting in the Loyal Subject, the Wild-Goose Chase, the Spanish Curate, and many more: But while our young actor is thus rising under his master Rhodes, Sir William D'Avenant getting a patent of King Charles II, for erecting a company under the name of the Duke of York's servants, took Mr Betterton, and all that acted under Mr Rhodes, into his company.' We find this account copied by several writers, though it is evidently inconsistent in it's parts, and hardly one of the facts related in it true. According to this account, Mr Betterton became an actor in 1659, and yet at the age of twenty-two (1657) he had great applause by acting, that is, he was a great actor before he was an actor at all. Sir William D'Avenant is said to have erected a company after the Restoration, and to have composed it chiefly of Mr Rhodes's actors; whereas in fact he was Master of a play-house before the Restoration, and indeed of that very house, and of those actors which are here bestowed upon Mr Rhodes (8); so that it is very plain that this account is false, or at least very inconsistent and inaccurate. The truth of the matter was this, Sir William D'Avenant with much difficulty obtained leave from those, who were then possessed of the government, to represent a kind of Operas, for Tragedies and Comedies he was not permitted to act; and he opened at Rutland-house in Charter-house-yard, May 23, 1656, and afterwards removed to the Cockpit in Drury-lane, which was over-against the Castle tavern; and there it was that Mr Betterton first appeared. For his Master Mr Holden (9), having printed Sir William's poem, called Gondibert, and afterwards many other performances of his, Betterton became thereby known to that Gentleman, who, finding him a very capable person, took great pains in the instructing him, and gave him the first relish for theatrick entertainments, as himself frequently acknowledged; and therefore we have reason to think, that this point is at last freed from those difficulties with which it has been hitherto incumbered,

(6) History of Europe, 1710, p. 16.

(7) Life of Betterton, p. 5.

(8) See the article D'AVENANT (SIR WILLIAM).

(9) Life of Betterton, p. 5.

and that the fact ought to stand as it has been represented in the text.

[C] Acted with the utmost applause, and the highest reputation:] It has been supposed, that Betterton introduced moving scenes into our theatre, which before had the stage only hung with tapestry. I cannot positively say whether the fact be true or not; but if it was true, and as it is also said, instead of being applauded, he was censured for it, his case was certainly hard; for, as Mr Gildon very justly observes, these scenes help the representation, by giving the spectator a view of the place; which, though not necessary, where the unity in that respect is strictly observed, is however very convenient where that is dispensed with, as generally it is in our plays (10). The taste for dramatick entertainments was never higher than while these two companies played; and Mr Cibber, who is certainly a very good judge of the subject, has given us three strong reasons for it. First, That plays having been so long prohibited, people came to them with greater eagerness, like folks after a long fast to a great feast. The second was, that women were now brought upon the stage, which must have been a very great advantage; for, on all former stages, female characters were performed by boys, or young men, of the most effeminate aspect. The third, that a rule was established, by which no play acted at one house could be attempted at the other. All the capital plays, therefore, of Shakespear, Fletcher, and Ben Jonson, were divided between them, by the approbation of the Court, and their own alternate choice; so that when Hart was famous for Othello, Betterton had no less a reputation for Hamlet. By this order the town was supplied with greater variety of plays than could possibly have been shewn, had both companies been employed at the same time upon the same play; which liberty too must have occasioned such frequent repetitions of them, by their opposite endeavours to forestall and anticipate one another, that the best actors in the world must have grown tedious and tasteless to the spectator. When these reasons are considered, and withal the number of great actors that were then upon the stage, and the many new plays that appeared while these two companies continued, we shall not be surprized at the reputation the theatre was then in, or ascribe it to mere prejudice, that many sensible people have spoken in so high terms of the dramatick performances of those days (11). To say the truth, the stage was then so much the care of the State, or at least of the Court, that whenever any disputes arose, they were generally decided either by the King, or his brother the Duke of York, which not only kept the players in order, and in that obedience which was requisite to the patentees, but gave them likewise figure and character in the world as gentlemen, and the immediate servants of their Prince (12). So that if this account justifies the high sentiments entertained by some of our most judicious writers, it at the same time shews us, upon what motives these sentiments of theirs are grounded; and clearly proves, that if performers were better in those times than in ours, it was because they were in a better condition, that is, were under better regulations; for as to pay, it was very far from being so good. Mr Hart, the best performer

(10) This Reflection occurs in the Life of Betterton, p. 6.

(11) See Dryden's Prefaces, Rymer's Criticisms, and Cibber's History of the Stage.

(12) There were some of the King's Company actually sworn of his Majesty's Chamber, and had scarlet cloth and lace assigned them, as menial servants.

Inn-Fields being very inconvenient, they caused another to be built for them in Dorset Gardens, which was called the Duke's Theatre, to which they removed, and followed their profession with all the success they could desire, under a reign, which might be truly stiled a reign of pleasure (b). In 1670, Mr Betterton married a gentlewoman on the same stage; one Mrs Saunderfon, who excelled, as an Actress, every thing but her own conduct in human life. In her he was compleatly happy, and by their joint endeavours, even in those days, they were able, not only to acquire a comfortable subsistence, but also to save what might maintain them in their advanced age (i). After Sir William D'Avenant's death, the patent came into the hands of Dr Charles D'Avenant his son, so well known to the learned world, for his admirable political writings. But whether his genius was less fit for the administration of such a government, than that of his father, or that the King's Company was really superior to his in acting, so it was, that they gained the hearts of the town, and Dr D'Avenant was forced to have recourse to rich scenes and fine musick, for the support of a stage upon which Betterton played (k). The Doctor himself wrote the Opera of Circe, which came first on the stage in 1675, and was received with such applause, as gave hopes of succeeding in this new way [D]. The same year a Pastoral of Mr Crowne's was represented at Court, called Calisto, or The Chaste Nymph, which was written at the desire of Queen Katharine, and the Ladies Mary and Anne, daughters to the Duke of York, who afterwards did honour to the English throne, performed parts in it (l). On this occasion, Mr Betterton instructed the noble Actors, and supplied the part of Prompter, and Mrs Betterton gave lessons to the young Princesses, in grateful remembrance of which, Queen Anne settled a pension of one hundred pounds a year upon her (m). All this time the theatrical war went on between the two Companies, in which the Duke's had much the better of the King's in all respects. A certain writer assures us, this advantage was gained by open force, and the frequent use of their new stage-artillery, viz. musick, machines, and scenery; but besides these, I find some other arts practised in the way of negotiation, by which the King's Company were at least as much distressed as by the Operas (n) [E]. It was by these measures, that, at length, the

(b) Life of Betterton.

(i) From the information of Mr Southerne.

(k) Cibber's Life, p. 79.

(l) Account of English Dramatic Poets, by G. Langbain, Oxford, 1691, 8vo, p. 92.

(m) Life of Betterton.

(n) See this explained in notes [D] and [E].

former in the King's company, had but three pounds a week, and very probably Mr Betterton had not then so much; and besides, benefits were things unheard-of in those times. So that we may plainly perceive, that it may be affirmed with truth, a profession is not always in the highest credit when it produces the greatest profit; which however is a maxim not altogether confined to play-houses, for in this, as in many other cases, the theatre and the world are but too much alike.

[D] As gave them hopes of succeeding in this way. It is a very difficult thing to write the history of the theatre with accuracy, and yet it is very well worth the knowing. Few authors have done so much towards this as Mr Cibber; and no wonder, since perhaps never any man understood this subject better. What he says of the decline of the Duke's company is very clear, and very consistent with good sense and truth (13). 'These two excellent companies were both prosperous for some few years, till their variety of plays began to be exhausted. Then of course the better actors (which the King's seem to have been allowed) could not fail of drawing the greater audiences. Sir William D'Avenant, therefore, Master of the Duke's company, to make head against their success, was forced to add spectacle and musick to action, and to introduce a new species of plays, since called dramatick operas; of which kind were the Tempest, Psyche, Circe, and others; all set off with the most expensive decorations of scenes and habits, with the best voices and dancers. This sensual supply of sight and sound coming in to the assistance of the weaker party, it was no wonder they should grow too hard for sense and simple nature, when it is considered how many more people there are that can see and hear, than think and judge.' The reader will easily perceive that I differ from this author in point of time; he fixes the declension of the Duke's company, and ascribes the introduction of Operas on the stage of the Duke's theatre to the administration of Sir William D'Avenant; but in this he is certainly wrong. Psyche (14), written by Mr Thomas Shadwell, did not appear till 1675. Circe came upon the stage the same year, and the Tempest, as it was altered by Sir William D'Avenant and Mr Dryden in 1676. But Sir William died April 7, 1668 (15), full five years before his company were reduced to the necessity of supporting sense by sound, and making use of machinery, when they found that plain acting would not do the business.

[E] Were at least as much distressed as by the Operas. It is observed by Mr Cibber, that the wanton change of the publick taste, after the introducing Operas at the Duke's theatre, began to fall as heavy upon the King's company, as their greater excellence in action had before fallen upon their competitors. He likewise observes, that Major Mohun and Captain Hart began to grow old, and the younger actors, such as Goodman and Clark, grew impatient to get into their parts; and to these causes he attributes the declension of the King's company. But though doubtless these might help, yet he seems not to be acquainted with the principal cause, which, as it relates immediately to Mr Betterton, I am obliged to mention. He had by this time a concern in the management of the Duke's company, and finding that these struggles hurt both theatres, projected the union of them as the sole means of recovering the credit of the stage; to which it seems the King's company, looking upon themselves as the strongest, were exceedingly averse; and in order to render them more tractable, it was found expedient to take off two of their best actors, Mr Kynaston and Captain Hart. This was a singular transaction, and of such a nature as not to deserve credit; if the original article, containing this secret treaty, were not actually in being; and as it contains abundance of curious particulars, in relation to play-house policy, it may not be amiss to insert it (16).

Memorandum, October 14, 1681.

'It was then agreed between Dr Charles D'Avenant, Thomas Betterton, Gent. and William Smith, Gent. of the one part; and Charles Hart, Gent. and Edward Kynaston, Gent. on the other part; That the said Charles D'Avenant, Thomas Betterton, and William Smith, do pay, or cause to be paid, out of the profits of acting, unto Charles Hart and Edward Kynaston, five shillings a piece for every day there shall be any Tragedies or Comedies, or other representations, acted at the Duke's theatre in Salisbury-court, or wherever the company shall act during the respective lives of the said Charles Hart and Edward Kynaston, excepting the days the young men or young women play for their own profit only. But this agreement to cease, if the said Charles Hart or Edward Kynaston shall at any time play among, or effectually assist, the King's company of actors, and for as long as this is paid they both covenant and promise not to play at the King's theatre.

'If Mr Kynaston shall hereafter be free to act at the Duke's theatre, this agreement with him, as to his pension, shall also cease.

(16) Life of Betterton, p. 8.

(13) Cibber's Life, p. 79.

(14) Langbain's Account of the English Dramatic Poets, p. 449, 450.

(15) See Dryden's Preface to the Tempest, as altered by him and Sir W. D. from Shakespear.

the King's company were compelled to come into the scheme, which those at the head of the Duke's company had formed, of submitting to a coalition, from whence it was hoped, a new company might spring, superior, in every respect, to all that had gone before them (o). This was one of the most singular revolutions in theatrick government that ever happened, and one of the most important events of Mr Betterton's life, but as to the time in which it was accomplished, we cannot be positive; though as to the circumstances we have been tolerably exact, and it is from a comparison of these we are led to judge, that it must have fallen out in the year 1685 or 1686, though many writers place it sooner [F]. It was in this united company, that the merit of Betterton shone with unrivalled lustre, and that having survived the famous Actors upon whose model he had formed himself, he was now at liberty to discover his mighty genius in it's full extent, by replacing many of them with advantage in those very characters, in which, during their life-times, they had been thought inimitable (p). Of this it would be hard to yield belief, and harder still to gain a just notion of what we ought to believe about it, if we had not from a living, a capable, and candid writer, as authentick a testimony, and at the same time, as clear, and as distinct an account of his excellence in this respect, as our own, or indeed any language will bear, and which may be justly esteemed, a description equally expressive and worthy of it's subject (q) [G]. Happy, in the notice of his Sovereign, the (o) Cibber's Life, p. 81.

(p) See the article of DRYDEN (JOHN).

(q) Cibber's Life, p. 81-99.

' In consideration of this pension, Mr Hart and Mr Kynaston do promise to make over, within a month after the sealing of this, unto Charles D'Avenant, Thomas Betterton, and William Smith, all the right, title, and claim, which they, or either of them, may have to any plays, books, cloaths, and scenes, in the King's play-house.

' Mr Hart and Mr Kynaston do both also promise, within a month after the sealing hereof, to make over to the said Charles D'Avenant, Thomas Betterton, and William Smith, all the title which they or each of them have, to six and three-pence apiece for every day there shall be any playing at the King's theatre.

' Mr Hart and Mr Kynaston do both also promise to promote with all their power and interest, an agreement between both playhouses; and Mr Kynaston for himself promises to endeavour, as much as he can, to get free, that he may act at the Duke's theatre; but he is not obliged to play unless he has ten shillings per day for his acting, and his pension then to cease.

' Mr Hart and Mr Kynaston do promise to go to Law with Mr Killigrew to have these articles performed, and are to be at the expence of the suit.

' In witness of this agreement, all the parties have hereunto set their hands this fourteenth day of October, 1681.'

[F] Must have fallen out in 1685, or 1686, though many writers place it sooner.] Mr Gildon says positively, that Mr Hart and Mr Kynaston performed their promises so well, that the union was effected in 1682 (17). But Mr Cibber says, that it was brought about in 1684 by the King's advice, which amounted to a command (18). In Mr Dryden's poems we have a Prologue and an Epilogue upon the union of the two companies, which is dated in 1686; and I am apt to think this the true date of that transaction for several reasons (19). It was the first of King James's reign, which might possibly be the cause why his own company of comedians had so great advantage in the manner of this conjunction. In the next place, I find that Mr Cibber is mistaken, in supposing that Mr Hart quitted the stage upon the score of this union, because it manifestly appears, from the paper cited in the former note, that he had quitted the King's company several years before he was engaged to promote this union, and very probably did so. But for all this, I am very far from being positive on this head, and therefore I have given the reader the dates, the authorities, and the reasons, which occur to me for preferring the last date; and from hence I hope to escape censure, even should it appear hereafter that I am mistaken. By this union a new company was formed, composed of the best actors that ever appeared upon the English stage together, as appears from the following list given us by Mr Cibber, in 1690, when he came into the company, viz. Men, Mr Betterton, Mr Mountfort, Mr Kynaston, Mr Sandford, Mr Nokes, Mr Underhill, and Mr Leigh. Women, Mrs Betterton, Mrs Barry, Mrs Leigh, Mrs Butler, Mrs Mountfort, and Mrs Bracegirdle

[G] A description equally expressive, and worthy of it's subject.] What I intend to give the reader in this note is, the character of Mr Betterton as a player, drawn by Mr Cibber, whose long acquaintance with him in that character, must have given him great opportunities of knowing him thoroughly, and whose excellence in that profession, and the great skill he shewed for many years in the management of a theatre, must render him a very competent judge. I have endeavoured to bring what he has delivered concerning our great actor into as narrow a compass as possible; and though it is still pretty long, yet I am persuaded that it will not appear tedious. Betterton was an actor as Shakespear was an author, both without competitors! formed for the mutual assistance and illustration of each other's genius! How Shakespear wrote, all men who have a taste for nature may read and know; but with what higher rapture would he still be read, could they conceive how Betterton played him! then might they know the one was born alone to speak, what the other only knew to write! Pity it is that the momentary beauties, flowing from an harmonious elocution, cannot, like those of poetry, be their own record! That the animated graces of the player can live no longer than the instant breath and motion that presents them, or at best can but faintly glimmer through the memory, or imperfect attestation of a few surviving spectators. Could how Betterton spoke be easily known as what he spoke, then might you see the Muse of Shakespear in her triumph, with all her beauties in their best array, rising into real life, and charming her beholders. But, alas! since all this is so far out of the reach of description, how shall I shew you Betterton? Should I therefore tell you that all the Othellos, Hamlets, Hotspurs, Macbeths, and Brutus's, you may have seen since his time have fallen far short of him, this still would give you no idea of his particular excellence. Let us see then what a particular comparison may do, whether that may yet draw him nearer to you? You have seen a Hamlet perhaps, who on the first appearance of his father's spirit has thrown himself into all the straining vociferation requisite to express rage and fury, and the house has thundered with applause, though the misguided actor was all the while (as Shakespear terms it) tearing a passion into rags. I am the more bold to offer you this particular instance, because the late Mr Addison, while I sat by him to see this scene acted, made the same observation, asking me, with some surprize, if I thought Hamlet should be in so violent a passion with the ghost, which, though it might have astonished, it had not provoked him? for you may observe, that in this beautiful speech the passion never rises beyond an almost breathless astonishment, or an impatience limited by filial reverence to enquire into the suspected wrongs that may have raised him from his peaceful tomb! and a desire to know what a spirit so seemingly distressed might wish or enjoin a sorrowful son to execute towards his future quiet in the grave? This was the light into which Betterton threw this scene which he opened with a pause of mute amazement! Then rising slowly to a solemn trembling voice, he made the ghost equally terrible to the spectator as to himself!

(17) Life of Betterton, p. 10.

(18) Cibber's Life, p. 153.

(19) Original Poems and Translations, by John Dryden, Esq; Vol. II, p. 259.

the protection of the nobility, and the general respect of all ranks of people, who considered him ‘ himself! and in the descriptive part of the natural emotions which the ghastly vision gave him, the boldness of his expostulation was still governed by decency; manly, but not braving; his voice never rising into that seeming outrage, or wild defiance, of what he naturally revered. But, alas! to preserve this medium between mouthing, and meaning too little, to keep the attention more pleasingly awake by a tempered spirit, than by meer vehemence of voice, is of all the master-strokes of an actor the most difficult to reach. In this none have equalled Betterton ——— (20). He that feels not himself the passion he would raise, will talk to a sleeping audience. But this never was the fault of Betterton; and it has often amazed me to see those who soon came after him, throw out in some parts of a character a just and graceful spirit, which Betterton himself could not but have applauded; and yet, in the equally shining passages of the same character, have heavily dragged the sentiment along like a dead weight, with a long toned voice and absent eye, as if they had fairly forgot what they were about. If you have never made this observation, I am contented you should not know where to apply it. A farther excellence in Betterton was, that he could vary his spirit to the different characters he acted. Those wild impatient starts, that fierce and flashing fire, which he threw into Hotspur, never came from the unruffled temper of his Brutus (for I have more than once seen a Brutus as warm as Hotspur). When the Betterton Brutus was provoked in his dispute with Cassius, his spirits flew out of his eye; his steady looks alone supplied that terror which he disdained an intemperance in his voice should rise to. Thus, with a fetid dignity of contempt, like an unheeding rock, he repelled upon himself the foam of Cassius. Perhaps the very words of Shakespear, will better let you into my meaning.

“ Must I give way and room to your rash choler?
“ Shall I be frighted when a madman stares?

• And a little after,

“ There is no terror, Cassius, in your looks, &c.

• Not but in some part of this scene, where he reproaches Cassius, his temper is not under this suppression, but opens into that warmth which becomes a man of virtue; yet this is that hasty spark of anger, which Brutus himself endeavours to excuse: But with whatever strength of nature we see the poet shew at once the Philosopher and the Hero, yet the image of the actor's excellence will be still imperfect to you, unless language could put colours in our words to paint the voice with. Et si vis similem pingere, pinge sonum, is enjoining an impossibility. The most that a Vandyke can arrive at is, to make his portraits of great persons, seems to think; a Shakespear goes farther yet, and tells you what his pictures thought; a Betterton steps beyond them both, and calls them from the grave to breathe, and be themselves again in feature, speech, and motion, when the skilful actor shews you all those powers at once united, and gratifies at once your eye, your ear, your understanding. To conceive the pleasure arising from such harmony! You must have been present at it! 'tis not to be told you! — After some very just remarks upon the many defects in Lee's Alexander the Great, and shewing that the general reception that tragedy met with, was owing to the judgment of the actor, and not of the Poet, he proceeds thus ——— (21). ‘ When this favourite play I am speaking of, from it's being too frequently acted, was worn out, and came to be deserted by the town upon the sudden death of Mountfort, who had played Alexander with success for several years. The part was given to Betterton, which under this great disadvantage of the satiety it had given, he immediately revived with so new a lustre, that for three days together it filled the house, and had then his declining strength been equal to the fatigue the action gave him, it probably might have doubled it's success; an uncommon instance of the power and intrinsic

‘ merit of an actor. This I mention, not only to prove what irresistible pleasure may arise from a judicious elocution with scarce sense to assist it. But to shew you too, that though Betterton never wanted fire and force when his character demanded it, yet, where it was not demanded, he never prostituted his power to the low ambition of false applause. And further, that when from a too advanced age he resigned that toilsome part of Alexander, the play for many years after was never able to impose upon the publick; and I look upon his so particularly supporting the false fire, and extravagancies of that character, to be a more surprising proof of his skill than his being eminent in those of Shakespear, because there truth and nature coming to his assistance, he had not the same difficulties to combat, and consequently we must be less amazed at his success where we are more able to account for it. Notwithstanding the extraordinary power he shewed in blowing Alexander once more into a blaze of admiration, Betterton had so just a sense of what was true or false applause, that I have heard him say, he never thought any kind of it equal to an attentive silence; that there were many ways of deceiving an audience into a loud one, but to keep them hushed and quiet was an applause which only truth and merit could arrive at, of which art there never was an equal master to himself. From these various excellencies he had so full a possession of the esteem and regard of his auditors, that upon his entrance into every scene, he seemed to seize upon the eyes and ears of the giddy and inadvertent! To have talked or looked another way would then have been thought insensibility or ignorance. In all his soliloquies of moment, the strongest intelligence of attitude and aspect drew you into such an impatient gaze and eager expectation, that you almost imbibed the sentiment with your eye before the ear could reach it. I never heard a line in tragedy come from Betterton, wherein my judgment, my ears, and my imagination, were not fully satisfied, which since his time I cannot equally say of any one actor whatsoever. Not but it is possible to be much his inferior with great excellencies. Had it been practicable to have tied down the clattering hands of all the ill judges, who were commonly the majority of an audience, to what amazing perfection might the English theatre have arrived, with so just an actor as Betterton at the head of it.' — He speaks then of the capacity of an actor what he ought to know, and how far he should be able to judge of sentiment and poetry. He proceeds next to examine the talents requisite in the profession; and after confessing that with all these, it is not impossible a man may fail, he puts the question, What shall we say will infallibly form an actor? and he answers it in the following terms ——— (22). (22) Ibid. p. 95. ‘ This, I confess, is one of nature's secrets, too deep for me to dive into. Let us content ourselves therefore with affirming, that genius which nature only gives, only can complete him. This genius then was so strong in Betterton, that it shone out in every speech and motion of him; yet voice and person are such necessary supporters to it, that by the multitude they have been preferred to genius itself, or at least often mistaken for it. Betterton had a voice of that kind, which gave more spirit to terror than to the softer passions; more strength than melody. The rage and jealousy of Othello became him better than the sighs and tenderness of Castalio; for tho' in Castalio he only excelled others, in Othello he excelled himself; which you will easily believe, when you consider, that in spite of his complexion Othello has more natural beauties, than the best actor can find in all the magazine of poetry to animate his power and delight his judgment with. The person of this excellent actor was suitable to his voice, more manly than sweet, not exceeding the middle stature, inclining to the corpulent; of a serious and penetrating aspect; his limbs nearer the athletic than the delicate proportion; yet, however formed, there arose from the harmony of the whole a commanding mein of majesty, which the fairer faced, or (as Shakespear calls them) the curled darlings of his time, ever wanted something to be equal masters of.

(20) Ibid. p. 86.

(21) Ibid. p. 91.

him as an honour to the stage and to his country, he might have passed through life with as much ease, satisfaction, and peace of mind, as any man of his time, as having actually saved, even out of his moderate allowance, if not an ample, at least a competent estate; had he not been persuaded to attempt becoming rich, which unluckily engaged him in a design, which swept away all his capital, and left him in real distress (r). This fell out in 1692, and though nothing could fall harder upon such a man, and at such a time of life, yet he bore it with manly patience, not only without murmur or complaint, but even without mention, and was so far from suffering this severe stroke of ill fortune, fallen upon him, by following the advice of one he thought his friend, to prejudice that friend, who ventured and lost more than himself, that, on the contrary, he continued his friendship to his daughter, after his decease, and did for her all he could have done for his own (s) [H]. Such was the virtue! such the integrity! such the magnanimity of Mr Betterton! who in his private character was as great as in any he borrowed from the poets, and was therefore always considered as the head of the Theatre, though vested there with very little power. The patentees, as there was now only one Theatre, considered it as a means of accumulating wealth to themselves by the labours of others, and having this maxim once in their minds, it began to have so strong an influence on their conduct, that the Actors soon found themselves in a very dismal condition. They were oppressed without decency, left without means of redress for the present, and without hopes for the future. In this dismal situation, Betterton endeavoured to convince the Managers of their folly, and laboured to shew, from reason and experience, that the means they used were very ill suited to the ends they proposed, and that every government must fail, where the few forget their obligations to the many. This language, in the ears of this theatrical ministry, sounded like treason; and therefore, instead of thinking how to remedy the mischiefs complained of, they bent their thoughts to get the better of their monitor, as if the not hearing of faults was equivalent to mending them. It was with this view, that they began to give some of Betterton's best parts to young Actors, supposing this would lessen his character and abate his influence (t). This policy ruined them, and assisted him; the publick repented having Plays ill acted, when they knew they might be acted better. The wisest and best Players attached themselves wholly to Betterton, and desired him to turn his thoughts on some method of procuring himself and them justice. Thus, stage-tyranny brought about the destruction of that power by which it was exercised, and the very steps taken to render

(r) From the information of an intimate friend of Mr Betterton's lately Deceased.

(s) See this transaction more fully explained in note [H].

(t) Cibber's Life, P. 153.

of. There was some years ago to be had, almost in every print-shop, a metzotinto from Kneller, extremely like him. In all I have said of Betterton, I confine myself to the time of his strength and highest power in action, that you may make allowances from what he was able to execute at fifty, to what you might have seen of him at past seventy. For though to the last he was without his equal, he might not then be equal to his former self; yet so far was he from being ever overtaken, that for many years after his decease, I seldom saw any of his parts in Shakespear supplied by others, but it drew from me the lamentation of Ophelia upon Hamlet's being unlike what she had seen him.

‘ Ah! woe is me!

‘ T’ have seen what I have seen, see what I see!’

[H] Did for her all he could have done for his own.] This extraordinary shipwreck of Mr Betterton's small fortune hath been very differently represented, and it is not an easy matter to come at the truth. Mr Gildon is very concise upon this head. ‘ Mr Betterton, says he, was so sensible of friendship, that though he lost near eight thousand pounds by the father, yet he took care of the daughter (23).’ The like imperfect accounts we have elsewhere; but I presume no reader can be very well satisfied with such an abrupt hint, in relation to the most singular and extraordinary circumstance of Betterton's life, and therefore I shall endeavour to give him as clear and circumstantial an account of this matter, as at this distance of time can be reasonably expected. As Mr Betterton's character in private life was extremely fair, and his company very agreeable, he had abundance of friends at all ends of the town, but more especially in the city. Amongst these there was a Gentleman, whom I forbear to name, of great reputation, and of considerable fortune, who not only honoured him with his favour and protection, but entered with him also into the strictest intimacy and friendship. This Gentleman, in the year 1692, was concerned in an adventure to the East-Indies upon the footing then allowed by the Company's Charter, which vessels so employed were stiled interlopers. The prospect of success was great, the gain unusually high; and this induced Mr Betterton, to whom his friend offered any share in this business that he pleased, to think of so large a sum as eight thousand pounds; but it was not for himself, for he had no such sum in his power; and whoever considers the situation of the stage at that time, will need no other argument to convince him of it. Yet he had another friend, whom he was willing to oblige, which was the famous Dr Radcliffe; so Mr Betterton advanced somewhat more than two thousand pounds, which was his all, and the Doctor made it up eight thousand. The vessel sailed to the East-Indies, and made as prosperous a voyage as those who were concerned in her could wish; and the war with France being then very warm, the Captain very prudently came home north about, and arrived safely in Ireland. But whether obliged by the orders of his owners, or elated by his success hitherto, so it was, that in his passage from Ireland he was taken by the French. His cargo was worth upwards of one hundred and twenty thousand pounds, which ruined Mr Betterton, and broke the fortune and the heart of his friend in the city. As for Dr Radcliffe, he expressed a great concern for Mr Betterton, and none at all for himself. It is, said the Doctor wittily, only trotting up some hundred pair of stairs more, and things are as they were. The Gentleman in the city left behind him an only daughter, whom Mr Betterton took home, educated with all the care, and treated with all the tenderness of a parent, till she thought fit to marry herself to Mr Bowman the Player, who is but very lately dead, and whose behaviour was such, as not only recommended him to the personal esteem of all that knew him, but gave credit to the reports of the excellency of the old stage, when Players in general were like him (24). This is a testimony of respect due to his memory, which I am very glad to have this occasion of paying; for so long as this work shall last, I hope it will be of use in consecrating to posterity the fame of worthy persons deceased of all ranks, as well as the candour and impartiality of those to whom providence has assigned the great charge of doing justice to the dead, and which it is their duty to perform with religious exactness.

(24) These facts are many of them well known, but the whole of them was communicated by a person who desires to be concealed.

[I] Pointed

(23) Life of Mr Betterton, p. 17.

(u) Case of the Actors laid before the Lord Chamberlain.

(w) Cibber's Apology for his own Life, p. 157.

(x) Case of the Actors, before-mentioned.

render Betterton desperate, pointed out the way to his deliverance (u) [I]. The general acquaintance he had amongst persons of the first distinction, gave him an opportunity of representing his case to them, and his case was so very reasonable in itself, that being truly represented, it was sufficient to affect all great and generous minds, with a desire of procuring so worthy and so extraordinary a person, relief (w). But though the quality of those who sought this was great, and the thing sought very reasonable, yet for all that it was far from being easily brought about. But at length, partly through the hardship Mr Betterton and his people endured, and partly through the obstinacy of the patentees, who would listen to nothing, it was held equally legal and just, that the royal authority should interpose for the cure of an evil, which sprung entirely from an abuse of royal favour (x) [K]. King William granted this favour at the instance of the famous Earl of Dorset, the friend, the favourite, and protector of the Muses; the Nobility also, led by his example, contributed, by a voluntary subscription, to raise a Theatre

[I] Pointed out the way to his deliverance. It does not appear that Mr Betterton had any intention of distinguishing his own interest from those of the Patentees, till they convinced him by their behaviour, that they were already distinguished in their opinions. The person they fixed upon to come into Betterton's parts was one George Powell, a man as opposite to the person he thought to supplant, as nature could well form him (25). He had fire without judgment, confidence without merit, and strength of lungs which very much exceeded the strength of his understanding. With these abilities, or rather with this want of ability, he stepped into Betterton's parts, and which was no less welcome to him, from forty shillings to four pounds a week salary. At the same time this step was taken amongst the men, another of the like kind was attempted in reference to the women. Mrs Bracegirdle was then a young player, but had given such an earnest of what she afterwards performed, that no scruple was made of offering her the parts of Mrs Barry, the greatest actress that had appeared upon the English stage; but Mrs Bracegirdle shewed her capacity and her virtue at the same time by a steady refusal. Mr Betterton, when things were come to this pass, thought fit to provide for his own security, by setting on foot a kind of association amongst the actors, which sufficiently demonstrated his influence and their good sense, since the ablest and most esteemed amongst them readily agreed to support him (26). The Patentees had recourse to the same method, and lifted such and so many as they could on their side. But though Betterton had a visible advantage over them in this method of proceeding, yet he was a man of too much judgment and good sense, not to foresee that any conquest would be prejudicial to the victors, as well as the vanquished; and therefore the only use he made of his success was, to propose an accommodation, as a thing most for the benefit of both parties; but this the Patentees rejected with that haughtiness incident to weak minds, who fancy the desire of quiet, is a mark of want of strength, or of a want of resolution. They did not consider of how much consequence it is in all such disputes to be, and to be thought, in the right, or at least they did not reflect, that by the making this proposition, Mr Betterton and his party would secure the good opinion of the publick. They were heated with a fond presumption of their own power, and blinded by a false notion they had conceived, that it was not to be controuled. They thought they had the Law on their side, and that whatever became of the justice of their cause, the power vested in them by their royal patents would enable them to triumph over all opposition. These were their maxims, and indeed the maxims of all tyrants; and these were the steps by which they provoked and produced that rebellion which they meant to prevent, and which they might have so easily have prevented, if they had distinguished better their true interests, from what they were persuaded by their passions to mistake for their interests; a lesson which was soon after sufficiently taught them by experience, though their pride hindered them from learning it at present.

[K] Which sprung entirely from the abuse of royal favour. It was in the winter of the year 1694, that this quarrel rose to so great a height, and the interruption it occasioned in their playing, proved the loss of a thousand pounds to the Patentees before Christmas. They flattered themselves with the hopes of going on better during the remaining part of the season, by drawing off some of those who sided with Mr Betterton, in which they met with an unforeseen disappointment by the death of Queen Mary, which occasioned a total suspension of all publick diversions (27). This gave Mr Betterton and his friends leisure to enquire upon what ground they stood, and whether it might not be in the power of the Earl of Dorset, then Lord Chamberlain, to redress their grievances. His Lordship was known to be well inclined, but it was not found that his office enabled him to compel the Patentees to do what it was reasonable they should have done in favour of the actors. Upon this the subject was canvassed at Court, and even in the circle, so that at last it reached the Royal ear (28). The King, who naturally hated oppression, signified a willingness to relieve these people from a yoke they were not able to bear, and with which the publick also was highly displeas'd. The Lawyers were not long in finding out how this might be done, they had indeed given their opinions that the former patents were good, but they agreed now that a new patent would be as good. By this the knot was cut that could not be untied, and Mr Betterton and his friends left at liberty to entertain the town on a stage of their own; and to enable them to do this, several persons of distinction subscribed forty guineas apiece, and it was agreed to build a new theatre, where the Tennis-court then stood, in Lincoln's Inn-Fields (29). The managers of the old patent then found, when it was too late, that they had pushed the matter too far, and that when Betterton and his party left them, they should be too weak to attempt any thing with success. They had however the good fortune to draw over Mr Williams and Mrs Mountfort from their adversaries, which did them some hurt, and the managers a great deal of good. They likewise endeavoured to obtain recruits from the country, in which they were not altogether unsuccessful, for this brought Mr Johnson and Mr Bullock to the house; nor were they altogether deprived of good actors by the going off of Mr Betterton, since they had still with them Mr Cibber, Mr Kent, Mr Verbruggen, Mr Powell, and Mr Haynes. As for women, they had only Mrs Rogers, and Mrs Verbruggen; and to these we must add Mr Williams, and Mrs Mountfort, to whom the other company refused shares, as Mr Cibber very justly observes against that principle of equity on which they should have founded all their proceedings (30). I have been the more particular in this account, because it serves to shew how excellent the other players must have been when in this condition; the Patentees proceeded with fear and trembling, as knowing that Betterton's company would, in the opinion of all proper judges, prove infinitely superior to them; though, as we have shewn, setting this comparison aside, their company was very far from being despicable. They had indeed one advantage, which was that of opening before their rivals, and they did not fail to make use of it; but at the same time, they had the misfortune to make use of a very bad Play, which they revived upon this occasion. It was Adelazar, or, The Moors Revenge, very poorly written by Mrs Behn, and they acted it before a numerous audience (31). The stage however appeared so indifferently filled when Mr Betterton, Mrs Barry, and Mrs Bracegirdle, were absent, that the very next night their audience sunk to nothing; so that they were not long in doubt as to the consequences of this separation with respect to themselves. The Patentees saw plainly their error, and that whatever became of the other company, their own, by dint of their wise management, was fallen as low as their bitterest enemies could wish it, without any visible prospect of their being able to raise it again.

[L] That

(27) Life of King William, p. 372.

(28) See the article of SACKVILLE, (COUNTESS) Earl of Dorset.

(29) Life of Betterton, p. 10.

(30) Cibber's Apology for his own Life, p. 152.

(31) See Lambain's Account of English dramatic Poets, p. 2.

(25) Cibber's Apology for his own Life, p. 153.

(26) History of the Stage, p. 137.

Theatre for them to play in, and this produced the new Play-House, near that which is still standing in Lincoln's-Inn-Fields (y). This Theatre was opened in April 1695, with very great advantages. Mr Congreve accepted a share with this company, as Mr Dryden had formerly with the King's company, and the first Play they acted was his admirable Comedy of Love for Love. The King honoured it with his presence, there was a large and splendid audience, Mr Betterton spoke a prologue, and Mrs Bracegirdle an epilogue suitable to the occasion, and it appeared plainly, by the reception they met with, the town knew how to discern and reward that merit, the ill-judging Patentees had treated so ill (z) [L]. But with all these vast advantages, Betterton's company were not able to maintain this flow of prosperity beyond two or three seasons. Mr Congreve was an excellent, and therefore a slow, writer; the other house had the advantage of two authors who produced without pain, Vanbrugh and Cibber, they wrote, if not finished, at least taking Plays, and though they were sometimes mauled by the criticks, they were sure of being applauded by the people (a). This gave such a turn in their favour, that with all their merit, Betterton's Actors had been undone, but for the seasonable relief of The Mourning Bride, and the Way of the World, which came like reprieves, and saved them at the last gasp (b). In a few years, however, it appearing plainly, that without a new support from their friends, it was impossible for them to maintain their independance, the protectors of Mr Betterton set on foot a new subscription, for building a Theatre in the Hay-Market, under the direction of Sir John Vanbrugh, which was finished in 1706 (c). This favour was kindly received by Mr Betterton, but he was now grown old, his health and strength much impaired by constant application, and his fortune in a condition still worse than those of his personal circumstances. He chose therefore, all things considered, and more especially an untractable spirit grown up amongst his Actors, occasioned by losses and disappointments, to decline his post, and put the whole design under the conduct of Mr Congreve and Sir John Vanbrugh (d). The former of these abandoned it soon after to Sir John entirely, and Betterton's strength failing, many of the old Players dying, and other accidents happening, a re-union of the companies became not only expedient but necessary, and accordingly it took place soon after. We are now released from the task of pursuing the stage history any farther, hitherto it was that of Betterton, with whom it grew, it flourished, it reached perfection, it declined, it decayed; and as the story of a great Prince carries in it that of his people,

(y) Life of Betterton.

(z) Cibber's Life, p. 160.

(a) Historical Remarks on the British Theatre, p. 195.

(b) Cibber's Life, p. 161.

(c) Memoirs of Vanbrugh's Life, p. 65.

(d) Cibber's Life, p. 262.

[L] That merit the ill-judging Patentees had treated so ill.] It is very certain, that if true merit alone could have supported an undertaking of this kind, Mr Betterton's company would have met with constant and universal approbation. The actors he carried with him to Lincoln's-Inn-Fields were such, as, together with himself and his wife, might have raised any stage to reputation; which may the more easily be credited, when we reflect that their memories are still fresh, amongst those who are the best judges of the pieces they performed. Amongst the men were Mr Underhill, Mr Smith, Mr Bowman, Mr Dogget, Mr Sandford, and Mr Bowen. Amongst the women, Mrs Barry, Mrs Bracegirdle, Mrs Bowman, Mrs Ayliff, and Mrs Leigh (32). The Prologue at their opening was very happily written, and contains a very beautiful and easy compliment to those who had assisted them in obtaining this establishment. The reader perhaps being now so well acquainted with the subject, will the better relish the following lines from it (33).

We who remain would gratefully repay
What our endeavours can, and bring this day
The first-fruit offering of a Virgin-Play.

The Epilogue, spoke by Mrs Bracegirdle, also contains some farther remarks upon this theatrical revolution, and alludes to the players having formerly had recourse to the same method, and to the same part of the town, in time of distress, I shall quote some lines from thence for the reasons before given (34).

(34) Ibid. p. 175

Sure Providence at first designed this place
To be the players refuge in distress;
For still in every storm they all run hither,
As to a shed that shields them from the weather.
But thinking of this change which last befel us,
'Tis like what I have heard our Poets tell us:
For when behind the scenes their suits are pleading,
To help their love, sometimes they shew their reading;
And wanting ready cash to pay for hearts,
They top their learning on us, and their parts.
Once of Philosophers they told us stories
Whom, as I think, they call'd—Py—Pythagorics.
I'm sure 'tis some such Latin name they give 'em,
And we who know no better must believe 'em.
Now to these men, (say they) such souls were giv'n,
That after death ne'er went to Hell nor Heaven;
But liv'd, I know not how, in beasts; and then,
When many years are past, in men again,
Methinks we Play'rs resemble such a soul,
That does from bodies, we from houses stole.
Thus Aristotle's soul that was,
May now be damn'd to animate an ass;
Or in this very house, for ought we know,
Is doing painful penance in some beau:
And thus our audience, which did once resort
To shining theatres to see our sport,
Now find us tosd into a Tennis-court.

(32) From private information of a person then upon the stage.

(33) See this Prologue in the second Volume of Congreve's Works.

The husbandman in vain renews his toil
To cultivate each year a hungry soil,
And fondly hopes for rich and generous fruit,
When what should feed the tree devours the root.
Th' unladen boughs he sees bode certain dearth,
Unless transplanted to more kindly earth.
So the poor husbands of the stage, who found
Their labours lost upon ungrateful ground,
This last and only remedy have prov'd,
And hope new fruit from antient stocks remov'd.
Well may they hope when you so kindly aid,
Well plant a soil which you so rich have made.
As nature gave the world to man's first age,
So from your bounty we receive this stage.
The freedom man was born to you've restor'd,
And to our world such plenty you afford,
It seems, like Eden, fruitful of it's own accord.
But since in Paradise frail flesh gave way,
And when but two were made, both went astray;
Forbear your wonder, and the fault forgive,
If in our larger family we grieve
One falling Adam, and one tempted Eve (*).

(*) Alluding to Mr Williams and Mrs Mountfort.

(e) See Betterton's Life.

(f) Cibber's Life, p. 337.

(g) See the Tatler quoted in the notes.

(h) Life of Betterton.

so to write the life of Betterton fairly, is to give the History of the Theatre during his time (e). At last, indeed, they separated, but by degrees, and not with any unkindness. After Mr Betterton reached seventy, his infirmities grew on him greatly, his fits of the gout were more lasting and more severe. His circumstances also, which had not been mended by his having the conduct of the Theatre, grew daily freighter, and all this joined to his wife's ill state of health, made his condition but melancholy, at a time of life, when the highest affluence could not have made them cheerful. Yet even under all these pressures he kept up his spirit, and was as serene as ever, though somewhat less active; nay, he acted still when his health would permit, which, however, was but seldom (f). The publick (in those days grateful) remembered the pleasure that Betterton had given them, and could not suffer, after fifty years service, to deserving a person should withdraw, without some considerable marks of their bounty. It was in the spring 1709, that a benefit, which was not then, as now, a common favour, much less a thing of right, was granted to Mr Betterton, and the Play of Love for Love (g) was acted at the Theatre Royal, on the seventh of April, for that purpose. Two of the best Actresses that ever graced our stage, and who had then quitted it, came upon that occasion to render it more advantageous, the part of Valentine was played by Betterton, Angelica by Mr Bracegirdle, and Mrs Barry performed that of Frail. The epilogue spoke by her was written by Mr Rowe, who had deserved the laurel he wore if it had been his single performance; and so well was this affair conducted, that we are told it produced Mr Betterton five hundred pounds, and a promise the favour should be annually continued (h) [M].

These

[M] A promise that the favour should be annually continued. In order to justify this fact, I find myself obliged to quote a paper, in which this transaction is set in the fairest light by Sir Richard Steele, who describes every action of humanity with almost as much warmth as he felt it. After mentioning the Ladies and Mr Dogget's behaviour with just commendations, he goes on thus (35). 'There has not been known so great a concourse of persons of distinction as at that time; the stage itself was covered with Gentlemen and Ladies, and when the curtain was drawn, it discovered even there a very splendid audience. This unusual encouragement, which was given to a play for the advantage of so great an actor, gives an undeniable instance, that the true relief for manly entertainments and rational pleasures is not wholly lost. All the parts were acted to perfection: the actors were careful of their carriage, and no one was guilty of the affectation to insert witticisms of his own, but a due respect was had to the audience for encouraging this accomplished player. It is not now doubted but plays will revive, and take their usual place in the opinion of persons of wit and merit, notwithstanding their late apostacy in favour of drefs and sound. This place is very much altered since Mr Dryden frequented it; where you used to see Songs, Epigrams, and Satires, in the hands of every man you met, you have now only a pack of cards; and instead of the cavils about the turn of the expression, the elegance of the stile, and the like, the learned now dispute only about the truth of the game. But however the company is altered, all have shewn a great respect for Mr Betterton; and the very gaming part of this house have been so much touched with a sense of the uncertainty of human affairs, (which alter with themselves every moment) that in this Gentleman they pitied Mark Anthony of Rome, Hamlet of Denmark, Mithridates of Pontus, Theodosius of Greece, and Henry the Eighth of England. It is well known, he has been in the condition of each of those illustrious personages for several hours together, and behaved himself in those high stations, in all the changes of the scene, with suitable dignity. For these reasons we intend to repeat this favour to him on a proper occasion, lest he who can instruct us so well in personating feigned sorrows, should be lost to us by suffering under real ones.' He was no less indebted to his friend Nicholas Rowe, Esq; than he was to Sir Richard Steele, for the Epilogue which he wrote for Mrs Bracegirdle was of such a nature, as could not but convey to every generous heart and elegant mind, a tender feeling for the distress of him for whose sake it was written. The passage therein, which relates to Shakespear, is very fine and very poetical, at the same time that it is very natural and very moving. The reader will hereafter see the cause that very probably suggested this thought to Mr Rowe; but in order to judge the better of it, it is requisite that he should see the piece itself. Indeed I am greatly mistaken if this method of comparing occasional poems with the narratives of the events, by which they were occasioned, is not the best way of disclosing their beauties, and doing justice to their authors. Such poems make really a part of the memoirs of that life to which they relate, and therefore are never more properly introduced than in this manner, provided they are not too numerous, and the life to which they relate has dignity enough to deserve such illustrations. That of Mr Betterton needs no apology of this kind; for if Cicero took so much pains to raise the character of the Roman Roscius, I certainly run no hazard of being censured of over fondness for him, whom the best judges have deservedly stiled the Roscius of England. But it is now time to come to the poem which gave occasion to these remarks, and which I take to be equally correct and gallant (36).

(36) This Epilogue is prefixed to the Life of Betterton.

As some brave Knight, who once with spear and shield
Had fought renown in many a well-fought field,
But now no more with sacred fame inspir'd,
Was to a peaceful hermitage retir'd;
There, if by chance disastrous tales he hears,
Of matrons wrongs and captive virgins tears,
He feels soft pity urge his generous breast,
And vows once more to succour the distress.
Buckled in mail he sallies on the plain,
And turns him to the feats of arms again.

So we to former leagues of friendship true,
Have bid once more our peaceful homes adieu,
To aid old Thomas, and to pleasure you.
Like errant damsels boldly we engage,
Arm'd, as you see, for the defenceless stage.
Time was when this good man no help did lack,
And scorn'd that any She should hold his back:
But now, so age and frailty have ordain'd,
By two at once he's forc'd to be sustain'd.
You see what failing nature brings man to;
And yet let none insult, for ought we know
She may not wear so well with some of you.
Tho' old, you find his strength is not clean past,
But, true as steel, he's mettle to the last.
If better he perform'd in days of yore,
Yet now he gives you all that's in his power;
What can the youngest of you all do more?
What he has been, tho' present praise be dumb,
Shall haply be a theme in times to come,
As now we talk of Roscius and of Rome.
Had you with-held your favours on this night,
Old Shakespear's ghost had ris'n to do him right;
With indignation had you seen him frown
Upon a worthless, witless, tasteless town:

Griev'd

(35) Tatler, No. 1. under the head of Will's Coffee-House.

These extraordinary marks of publick gratitude, had a proper effect upon Mr Betterton, who, instead of indulging himself on their bounty, exerted the spirits given by this seasonable act of generosity, in their service, and appeared and acted as often as his health would permit (i). On the twentieth of September following in particular, he performed the character of HAMLET, with such vivacity, as well as justice, that it gave universal satisfaction to the best judges (k). This activity of his in the winter, kept off the gout longer than usual, but the fit was the more violent for it when it came upon him in the spring. This was the more unlucky, by it's being about the time of his benefit, when the success of his Play, was sure to depend, in a great measure, upon his own performance. The day fixed was April the thirteenth, and the Play he made choice of, was The Maid's Tragedy, in which he acted the part of Melantius, and notice was given accordingly by his good friend the TATTLER (l), but the fit intervened, and that he might not disappoint the town, Mr Betterton was forced to allow of outward applications to reduce the swelling of his feet, which had such an effect, that he was able to appear on the stage, though he was forced to use a slipper. He acted that day with unusual spirit and briskness by which he obtained universal applause (m). But this could not defend him from paying a very dear price for these momentary marks of approbation, since the gouty humour, repelled by fomentations, soon seized upon the noble parts, which being, perhaps, weakened by his extraordinary fatigue on that occasion, he was not able to make a long resistance, but on the twenty-eighth of April 1710, paid that tribute to nature, from which neither heroes, nor those who play them, can be exempted (n). His behaviour raised his reputation and character, in his life-time, as high as he could wish; he received the strongest proofs of publick esteem, we may say, almost literally, in his last moments; and such honours were paid his memory after death, as only his memory could deserve. For on the second of May following, his corps was, with much ceremony, interred in Westminster-abbey (o), and such an account given of this solemnity, by the most agreeable writer of those times, as will outlast even brazen monuments, and perhaps the very Abbey itself [N]. As to the character of this great man, in the way of his profession, the

(i) Hist. of the Stage, p. 139.

(k) The Tatler, No. 71.

(l) Ibid, No. 157.

(m) Cibber's Apology for his own Life, p. 99.

(n) Le Neve's Monumenta Anglicana, Vol. V, p. 211.

(o) Antiquities of St Peter's Westminster, Vol. II, p. 183.

reader

Griev'd and repining, you had heard him say,
 Why are the Muses labours cast away?
 Why did I only write, what only he could play?
 But since, like friends to wit, thus throug'd you meet,
 Go on, and make the gen'rous work complete;
 Be true to merit, and still own his cause;
 Find something for him more than bare applause.
 In just remembrance of your pleasures past.
 Be kind, and give him a discharge at last:
 In peace and ease life's remnant let him wear,
 And hang his consecrated BUSKIN here.

[N] And perhaps the very Abbey itself. It would have been the easiest thing in the world to have referred the reader to the Tatlers for this fine discourse; but then we should have run the hazard of it's not being immediately read, or connected with what has been said upon the subject, which would leave this account imperfect, and hinder the reader's perceiving all the beauties of that (37). For these reasons we have judged it more expedient to give the whole a place here, as securing by that means the finest picture of this great man that was ever drawn, and the most pleasing likeness. We may add also to these another, and perhaps a stronger reason. This humane and admirable paper discovers the sentiments of those days, and how just, how grateful, and full of reverence, the publick was to those who deserved well of it in any character. They were not then satisfied to read a few lines of when and where a man was born, how long he lived, and when he died, but listened with pleasure to his whole story, admired sincerely all his good qualities, deplored his loss, and favourably received the endeavours of that writer, who aimed at doing justice to the dead, and placed his own merit in celebrating that of other men. May we on all sides emulate so laudable a practice!

From my own Apartment, May 2.

HAVING received notice, that the famous actor Mr Betterton was to be interred this evening in the cloysters near Westminster-Abbey, I was resolved to walk thither, and see the last office done to a man whom I had always very much admired, and from whose action I had received more strong impressions of what is great and noble in human nature, than from the arguments of the most solid Philosophers, or the description of the most charming Poets I had ever read. As the rude and untaught multitude are no way wrought upon more effectually, than by seeing publick punishments and executions; so men of letters and education feel their humanity most forcibly exercised, when they attend the obsequies of men who had arrived at any perfection in liberal accomplishments. Theatrical action is to be esteemed as such, except it be objected, that we cannot call that an art which cannot be attained by art. Voice, stature, motion, and other gifts, must be very bountifully bestowed by nature, or labour and industry will but push the unhappy endeavourer in that way, the further off his wishes.

Such an actor as Mr Betterton ought to be recorded with the same respect as Roscius among the Romans. The greatest Orator has thought fit to quote his judgment, and celebrate his life. Roscius was the example to all that would form themselves into proper and winning behaviour. His action was so well adapted to the sentiments he expressed, that the youth of Rome thought they wanted only to be virtuous to be as graceful in their appearance as Roscius. The imagination took a lovely impression of what was great and good; and they who never thought of setting up for the art of imitation, became themselves inimitable characters.

There is no human invention so aptly calculated for the forming a free-born people as that of a theatre. Tully reports, that the celebrated player of whom I am speaking used frequently to say, The perfection of an actor is only to become what he is doing. Young men, who are too unattentive to receive lectures, are irresistibly taken with performances. Hence it is, that I extremely lament the little relish the gentry of this nation have at present, for the just and noble representations in some of our Tragedies. The Operas, which are of late introduced, can leave no trace behind them that can be of service beyond the present moment. To sing and to dance, are accomplishments very few have any thoughts of practising; but to speak justly, and more gracefully, is what every man thinks he does perform, or wishes he did.

I have hardly a notion, that any performer of antiquity could surpass the action of Mr Betterton, in any of the occasions in which he has appeared on our stage. The wonderful agony which he appeared in, when he examined the circumstance of the handkerchief in Othello; the mixture of love that intruded upon his mind upon the innocent answers Desdemona makes, betrayed in his gesture such a variety and vicissitude of passions, as would admonish

a man

(37) Tatler, No. 167.

reader has seen it very fully represented, by authors every way equal to the task, and who thought it did honour to their own Genii, to do right to the great Genius of Betterton. But some other particulars there are, relating chiefly to his private life, of which I think it becomes me to take notice. He was a man of great study and application, and in regard to the subjects which employed his attention, as knowing, and as much a master, as any man could be. He was an excellent critick, more especially on Shakespear and Fletcher, not in remarking their defects, but in searching out, and producing to light, all their minute and hidden beauties. In this he was so accurate and so successful, that Mr Rowe (p), who was himself an excellent judge, and had also studied the same authors with deep attention, says the strongest things that man can say of Betterton's skill in this respect. His knowledge of Shakespear's merit, gave him so strong, and so perfect an esteem for him, that he made a journey, or rather a pilgrimage, into Staffordshire to visit his tomb, and to collect whatever particulars, relating to his history, tradition might have preserved, and these he freely communicated to the same friend, who acknowledges with much candour, that the memoirs of Shakespear's life he published (from which later lives have been taken) were the produce of that journey, and freely bestowed on him by the collector (q). Yet, extensive as his knowledge was, and high as he stood in reputation and esteem, he was the modestest man living. The young Actors revered him as a parent, but they loved him as a parent at the same time. He was gentle in his language, mild in his behaviour, ready in commendation, sincere in advice, and so indirect in his reproofs, that he had an art of shewing men their foibles without their seeing that this was what he intended, and the secret was the better kept, because he never mentioned such failings to another man. Mr Booth, who knew him only in his decline, said, he never saw him, either upon the stage or off, without learning from him, and frequently observed, that Mr Betterton was no Actor, that he put on his part with his clothes, and was the very man he undertook to be, till the play was over, and nothing more. So exact in following nature, that the look of surprize he put on in the character of Hamlet, struck him so in that of the Ghost, (when he first played it), as to disable him, for some moments, from going on (r). Yet he was so communicative, that in those parts he played highest, he would enter into the grounds of his action, and explain, as far as it was possible to explain, the principles of his art. He was admirably versed in the action of the stage, considered as independent of sentiment, and knew perfectly the dependance, connection, and business of the scenes, so as to attract, preserve, and satisfy, the attention of an audience, an art extremely necessary to an Author, and yet the hardest to be acquired of any. He was so far from putting on assuming looks, and a supercilious air to young authors, that he always insisted on their reading his parts to him, and took their instructions in the acting them, with the utmost deference and respect (s). But what shewed his accurate

(p) Account of Mr W. Shakespear, p. 61 and 62. The Life and Death of Thomas Lord Cromwell.

(q) Ibid.

(r) From Mr Booth's frequent mention of this passage at Betterton's.

(s) Cibber's Apology for his own Life, p. 95.

' a man to be afraid of his own heart, and perfectly ' convince him, that it is to stab it, to admit that ' worth of daggers, jealousy. Whoever reads in his ' closet this admirable scene, will find that he cannot,
' except he has as warm an imagination as Shakespear
' himself, find any but dry, incoherent, and broken
' sentences: But a reader that has seen Betterton act
' it, observes there could not be a word added; that
' longer speeches had been unnatural, nay, impossible,
' in Othello's circumstances. The charming passage
' in the same tragedy, where he tells the manner of ' winning the affection of his mistress, was urged with
' so moving and graceful an energy, that while I ' walked in the cloysters, I thought of him with the ' same concern, as if I waited for the remains of a ' person who had in real life done all that I had seen ' him represent. The gloom of the place, and faint ' light before the ceremony appeared, contributed to ' the melancholy disposition I was in; and I began to ' be extremely afflicted, that Brutus and Cassius had ' any difference; that Hotspur's gallantry was so un' fortunate; and that the mirth and good humour of ' Falstaff could not exempt him from the grave. Nay,
' this occasion in me, who look upon the distinctions
' amongst men to be merely scenical, raised reflections
' upon the emptiness of all human perfection and great' ness in general; and I could not but regret, that the ' sacred heads which lie buried in the neighbourhood
' of this little portion of earth in which my poor old ' friend is deposited, are returned to dust as well as he,
' and that there is no difference in the grave between
' the imaginary and the real monarch. This made ' me say of human life itself with Mackbeth:

' To-morrow, to-morrow, and to-morrow,
' Creeps in a stealing pace from day to day
' To the last moment of recorded time!
' And all our yesterdays have lighted fools

' To their eternal night! Out, out, short candle!
' Life's but a walking shadow, a poor player
' That struts and frets his hour upon the stage,
' And then is heard no more.

' The mention I have here made of Mr Betterton,
' for whom I had, as long as I have known any thing,
' a very great esteem and gratitude for the pleasure he ' gave me, can do him no good; but it may possibly be
' of service to the unhappy woman he has left behind ' him, to have it known, that this great Tragedian was ' never in a scene half so moving, as the circumstances ' of his affairs created at his departure. His wife, after ' the cohabitation of forty years in the strictest
' amity, has long pined away with a sense of his de' cay, as well in his person as his little fortune; and,
' in proportion to that, she has herself decayed both
' in her health and reason. Her husband's death, added
' to her age and infirmities, would certainly have ' determined her life, but that the greatness of her ' distress has been her relief, by a present deprivation
' of her senses. This absence of reason is her best ' defence against age, sorrow, poverty, and sickness,
' I dwell upon this account so distinctly, in obedience
' to a certain great spirit, who hides her name, and
' has by letter applied to me to recommend to her
' some object of compassion, from whom she may be ' concealed.
' This, I think, is a proper occasion for exerting
' such heroick generosity; and as there is an ingenuous
' shame in those who have known better fortune to be ' reduced to receive obligations, as well as a becoming ' pain in the truly generous to receive thanks; in this ' case both those delicacies are preserved; for the per' son obliged is as incapable of knowing her bene' factress, as her benefactress is unwilling to be known accurate and thorough skill in dramattick entertainments, was his own performances as an author, which, to those who read them, may possibly seem too high a compliment, because it will be thought, and indeed justly, that we have many better writers of Comedies than he; but yet, as to the single point I commend him for, he has been excelled by none (t) [O]. As he had the rare felicity of passing through life without envy or reproach, though not without misfortunes, so this felicity was also heightened by his fortunate choice of a wife, with whom he passed his days in domestick quiet, though they were of very different tempers. He was naturally chearful, and had a very high confidence in Providence; but she was of a thoughtful and melancholy temper, more especially after their great loss, and when she saw his health began to decline (u). She was so strongly affected by his death, which, as we have shewn, was in some measure sudden, that she ran distracted, though she appeared rather a prudent and constant, than a fond and passionate, wife. She was extremely useful to the Theatre, and more happy in the instructing young actresses than any other had been, so that her misfortune was a great, indeed a publick, loss [P]. She did not long survive Mr Betterton, according to our best information, about six months, but this was long enough for Queen Anne to express her compassion, by giving her a pension, which was hardly settled upon her before it ceased. She is said to have recovered her senses a little before she expired (w).
' by her.'

(t) See this explained in the notes.

(u) From accounts of a Lady intimate with her for many years.

(w) Reported by the same Lady.

[O] As to the single point for which I commend him, he has been excelled by none.] The works of Betterton, as a dramattick Poet, are but few, viz. I. The Woman made a Justice. II. The Unjust Judge; or, Appius and Virginia. This was written originally by Mr John Webster, an old Poet, who flourished in the reign of James I. It was altered only by Mr Betterton, who was so cautious and reserved upon this head, that it was by accident that the fact was known, at least with certainty (38). III. The Amorous Widow; or, The Wan or Wife; a play written on the plan of Moliere's George Dandin. The Amorous Widow is a second plot, interwoven to accommodate the piece more to the English taste. This comedy was acted in Mr Betterton's life-time with great applause, but notwithstanding this he could never be prevailed upon to publish it; so that the world saw it only as a posthumous performance (39). The chief merit of this, and indeed of all his performances, lay in the exact disposition of the scenes, their just length, great propriety, and natural connection; to all which was owing their being justly esteemed the best acting plays that had been brought upon the stage; and of how great consequence this is to the fate of tragedy and comedy, may be learned from all Banks's pieces, which, though they have nothing else to recommend them, seldom fail to affect an audience as much, or more, than some that are deservedly in better reputation (40). This remark may be of use to those who write for the stage, since there are many more plays lost for want of attending to this, than from any deficiency of wit or judgment.

[P] So that her misfortune was a great, indeed a publick, loss.] All who remember the theatre in those days, and whom pains have been taken to consult, agree, that Mrs Betterton deserved in every respect the character given in the text, and was of infinite service to the English stage. We will give her praises more particularly from one of them (41). 'She was, says Mr Cibber, though far advanced in years, so great a mistress of nature, that even Mrs Barry, who acted Lady Macbeth after her, could not in that part, with all her superior strength and melody of voice, throw out those quick and careless strokes of terror from the disorder of a guilty mind, which the other gave us with a facility in her manner, that rendered them at once tremendous and delightful. Time could not impair her skill, tho' he had brought her person to decay. She was to the last the admiration of all true judges of nature and lovers of Shakespear, in whose plays she chiefly excelled, and without a rival. When she quitted the stage, several good actresses were the better for her instruction. She was a woman of an unblemished and sober life, and had the honour to teach Queen Anne, when Princess, the part of Semandra in Mithridates, which she acted at Court in King Charles's time. After the death of Mr Betterton her husband, that Princess, when Queen, ordered her a pension for life, but she lived not to receive more than the first half year of it.' Thus the reader has seen in this matchless couple, that all professions honestly and ably discharged are honourable; and that it is not at all impossible for persons of real worth, to transfer the reputation they acquire on the stage to the characters they sustain in life. E

(41) Apology for the Life of Mr Cibber, p 134, 135:

(38) Langbain's Account of the Dramattick Poets, p. 509.

(39) It is added to his Life, written by Gildon, and consequently, first printed in 1710.

(40) See the article of CONGREVE (WILLIAM).

BETTS (JOHN) an eminent Physician in the XVIIth century, was son of Mr Edward Betts by his wife Dorothy, daughter of Mr John Venables of Yapley, in Hampshire. He was born at Winchester, and educated there in grammar learning. From thence he was elected a Scholar of Corpus-Christi College in Oxford, in February, 1642 (a). He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, February 9, 1646 (b). Being ejected by the Visitors appointed by the Parliament in 1648, he applied himself to the study of Physick (c), and commenced Doctor in that faculty, April 11, 1654, having accumulated the degrees (d). He practised with great success at London, but chiefly among the Roman Catholics, being himself of that persuasion. He was afterwards appointed Physician in Ordinary to King Charles II. The time of his death is not certainly known. Dr Betts wrote the two physical treatises mentioned below [A].

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1028.

(b) Id. Fast. Ox. Vol. II. col. 52.

(c) Id. Athen. ib.

(d) Id. Fast. ib.

[A] He wrote two Physical Treatises.] The first is intitled, De Ortu et Natura Sanguinis; i. e. 'Of the Origin and Nature of the Blood.' Lond. 1669, in 8vo. Afterwards there was added to it, Medicina cum Philosophia Naturali Consensus; i. e. 'The Harmony between Physic and Natural Philosophy.' Lond. 1662, in 8vo. Dr George Thomson, a Physician, animadverted upon our author's treatise De Ortu et Natura Sanguinis, in his True way of preserving the Blood in it's integrity. Dr Pett's second piece is intitled, Anatemia Thomæ Parri annum centesimum quinquagesimum secundum et novem menses agentis, cum clarissimi viri Gulielmi Harveii aliorumque adstantium Medicorum Regionum observationibus; i. e. 'The Anatomy of Thomas Parr, who died in the 152d year and ninth month of his age, with the Observations of the celebrated Dr William Harvey, and others of the King's Physicians, who were present (1). T

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon Vol. II. col. 1028.

BEVERIDGE (WILLIAM), a learned Divine in the XVIIth century, and made Bishop of St Asaph in the beginning of the XVIIIth, was born at Barrow in Leicestershire, in the year 1638 (a). On the 24th of the May, 1653, he was admitted into St John's college in Cambridge; and took his degrees, of Bachelor of Arts in 1656, of Master of Arts in 1660, and of Doctor of Divinity in 1679 (b). At his coming to the university, he closely applied himself to the study of the learned languages; and, by his great diligence and application, soon became so well skilled, particularly in all Oriental Learning, that when he was not above eighteen years of age, he wrote a Treatise of the Excellency and Use of the Oriental Tongues, especially the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, and Samaritan, with a Syriac Grammar, in three books; which he published when he was about twenty years of age [A]. He also distinguished himself, at the same time, by his early piety and seriousness of mind, and by his exemplary sobriety and integrity of life, all which procured him very great esteem and veneration. The third day of January, 1660-1, he was ordained Deacon, in the church of St Botolph Aldersgate, by Robert, Bishop of Lincoln: and Priest, in the same place, the 31st of that month (c). About which time (d), Dr Sheldon, Bishop of London, collated him to the vicarage of Yealing in Middlesex. On the 22d of November, 1672, he was chosen, by the Lord-Mayor and Aldermen of London, Rector of St Peter's Cornhill, London, and then he resigned the vicarage of Yealing (e). Upon his being thus placed in the metropolis of this kingdom, he applied himself, with the utmost labour and zeal, to the discharge of his Ministry in it's several parts and offices. And so instructive was he in his discourses from the pulpit; so warm and affectionate in his private exhortations; so regular and uniform in the publick worship of the Church, and in every part of his pastoral function; and so remarkable were his labours crowned with success, that as he himself was justly stiled 'the great Reviver and Restorer of primitive piety,' so his parish was deservedly proposed, as the best model and pattern, for the rest of it's neighbours to copy after (f). His singular merit having recommended him to the favour of his Dioecesan, Bishop Henchman, he was collated by him, on the twenty-second of December, 1674, to the prebend of Chifwick in the cathedral of St Paul's, London (g). And by his successor, Bishop Compton, he was also, on the third of November, 1681, collated to the archdeaconry of Colchester (h). In this dignity he behaved, as he had done before in every station of life; namely, in a most regular, watchful, and exemplary manner. For, not satisfied with the false, or at least imperfect, reports, given in by Church-Wardens at Visitations, he visited every parish within his archdeaconry in person [B]. November the 5th, 1684, he was installed Prebendary of Canterbury, in the room of Dr Du Moulin, deceased (i). He became also Chaplain to King William and Queen Mary. In 1691 he was offered, but refused, the See of Bath and Wells [C], then vacant by the deprivation of Dr Thomas Kenn, for not taking the oaths to King William and Queen Mary (k). But though he refused that See, because, probably, being a man of a tender conscience, he would not eat Dr Kenn's bread, according to the language of those times; he afterwards accepted of that of St Asaph, vacant by the translation of Dr George Hooper to Bath and Wells, and was consecrated July 16, 1704 (l). Being placed in this eminent station, his care and diligence increased, in proportion as his power in the Church was enlarged; and as he had before discharged the duty of a faithful Pastor over his single fold; so when his authority was extended to larger districts, he still pursued the same pious and laborious methods of advancing the honour and interest of religion, by watching over both clergy and laity, and giving them all necessary direction and assistance, for the effectual performance of their respective duties. Accordingly, he was no sooner advanced to the episcopal chair, but in a most pathetic and obliging Letter to the Clergy of his diocese, he recommended to them, the 'duty of catechising' and instructing the people committed to their charge, in the principles of the Christian religion; to the end they might know what they were to believe, and do, in order to 'salvation.' And told them, 'He thought it necessary to begin with that, without which, whatever else he, or they, should do, would turn to little or no account, as to the main end of the ministry (m).' And to enable them to do this the more effectually, he sent them a plain and easy Exposition upon the Church Catechism. This good man, though worthy of a longer life, did not enjoy his episcopal dignity above three years, seven months, and twenty days: for he died at his lodgings in the cloysters in Westminster-Abbey, March the 5th, 1707-8, in the 71st year of his age (n); and was

[A] A Treatise of the Excellency and Use of the Oriental Tongues, &c. The whole title of it is as follows: De Linguarum Orientalium, praesertim Hebraicae, Chaldaicae, Syriacae, Arabicae, & Samaritanae, praesentia & usu, cum Grammatica Syriacae tribus libris tradita, per G. Beveridgium. Lond. 1658, 8vo.

[B] He visited every parish within his archdeaconry in person. And took a very particular and exact account of every church he visited; the condition it was in; what utensils it had, or wanted; what repairs were necessary, and the like. The same method he used with regard to the Clergy's houses. And all those things he set down distinctly in a book, now in the possession of his successor, the present worthy Archdeacon of Colchester, who follows his commendable example of visiting his archdeaconry parochially.

[C] He was offered, but refused, the See of Bath and Wells. Upon which occasion there was published, 'A Vindication of their Majesties authority to fill the Sees of the deprived Bishops. In a Letter out of the Country; occasioned by Dr B———'s refusal of the Bishoprick of Bath and Wells.' Licens'd May 29, 1691, 4to.

[D] Institutionum

(a) From his Will in the Pre-rogative-Office: See also the time of his death, below.

(b) From the College and University Registers, communicated by the learned Dr W. Richardson.

(c) Regist. Sanderson, Linc. See Bishop Kennet's Register and Chronicle, &c. Lond. 1728. p. 553.

(d) Viz. Jan. 4 Kennet, ibid. or Regist. Sheldon and Newcourt's Report. Ecclesiastic. Vol. I. p. 764.

(e) Newcourt, ubi supra, p. 526, and 93.

(f) Preface to his Private Thoughts upon Religion.

(g) Newcourt, ubi supra, p. 140.

(h) Ibid. p. 93.

(i) Le Neve, Fasti Ecclesiae Anglicanae, p. 15. edit. 1716.

(k) Compleat History of England, Vol. III. edit. 1719. fol. p. 624. and Wood, Fasti, Vol. II. col. 176.

(l) Le Neve, as above, p. 25.

(m) Preface to his Private Thoughts on Religion; and to his Sermons.

(n) J. Le Neve, Fasti, &c. as above, p. 23.

was buried in St Paul's cathedral (o). He left the main of his estate to the Societies, for Propagating the Gospel, and Promoting Christian Knowledge. To the curacy of Mount-Sorrel in particular, and vicarage of Barrow in the county of Leicester, in a thankful remembrance of God's mercies vouchsafed to him thereabouts, he bequeathed twenty pounds a year for ever, on condition that prayers be read morning and evening every day, according to the Liturgy of the Church of England, in the chapel and parish-church aforesaid; with the sum of forty shillings yearly, to be divided equally upon Christmas-eve, among eight poor house-keepers of Barrow, as the Minister and Church-wardens shall agree, regard being had especially to those who had been most constantly at Prayers, and at the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, the foregoing year. And if it should so happen, that the Common-Prayer could not be read in the church or chapel aforesaid; his will then was, that what should have been given in either place for that, be in each place allowed to one chosen by the Vicar of Barrow to teach school, and instruct the youth in the principles of the Christian religion, according to the doctrine of the Church of England (p). His works were many, and full of great variety of learning. Those published by himself were as follows. I. De Linguarum Orientalium, præsertim Hebraicæ, Chaldaicæ, Syriacæ, Arabicæ, & Samaritanæ, præstantiâ & usu, &c. mentioned above. Lond. 1658, 8vo. II. Institutionum Chronologicarum libri duo, una cum totidem Arithmetices Chronologicæ libellis. Lond. 1669, 4to [D]. III. Συνοδικον, sive Pandectæ Canonum SS. Apostolorum, & Conciliorum ab Ecclesiâ Græca receptorum; necnon Canoniarum SS. Patrum Epistolarum; una cum Scholiis antiquorum singulis eorum amplexis, & scriptis aliis huc spectantibus; quorum plurima e Bibliothecâ Bodleianâ aliarumque MSS. codicibus nunc primum edita: reliqua cum iisdem MSS. summâ fide & diligentia collata. Totum Opus in duos tomos divisum Guilielmus Beveregius Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Presbyter recensuit, Prolegomenis munivit, & Annotationibus auxit. Oxonii, 2 vol. fol. 1672, [E]. IV. Codex Canonum Ecclesiæ Primitivæ vindicatus & illustratus. Lond. 1679, 4to [F]. V. The Church Catechism explained, for the use of the diocese of St Asaph. Lond. 1704, 4to, reprinted several times since in a smaller volume. Next follow Bishop Beveridge's works, published after his decease by his executor Mr Timothy Gregory. To speak the truth, they do not seem to have been designed by the author for the press; and therefore the publication of them was, in general, a great injury to the good Bishop's memory. However, they are, I. 'Private Thoughts upon Religion, digested into twelve articles, with practical Resolutions formed thereupon.' Written in his younger years, (when he was about twenty-three years old) for the settling of his principles and conduct of Life. Lond. 1709. II. 'Private Thoughts upon a Christian Life; or, Necessary Directions for it's beginning and progress upon earth, in order to it's final perfection in the Beatifick Vision.' Part II. Lond. 1709. III. 'The great Necessity and Advantage of publick Prayer and frequent Communion. Designed to revive primitive Piety; with Meditations, Ejaculations, and Prayers, before, at, and after the Sacrament.' Lond. 1710. These have been reprinted several times in 8vo and 12mo. IV. 'One hundred and fifty Sermons and Discourses on several Subjects.' Lond. 1708, &c. in 12 vol. 8vo; reprinted at London, 1719, in 2 volumes, fol. V. Theſaurus Theologicus; 'or,

(o) Stow's Survey of London, with Strype's Addit. Vol. II. Appendix I. p. 138.

(p) From his Will in the Prærogative-Office, London.

A com-

[D] Institutionum Chronologicarum Libri duo, &c. The first edition was published in 1669; a second came out in 1705, 4to; and a third beautifully printed in 1721, 8vo. This volume is a very good introduction to Chronology. In the first and second books the author treats of the nature and parts of Chronology, and of the terms and other particulars belonging thereto. And in the third and fourth books has given a short System of Characteristic Arithmetic, (which had never been handled before by any writer) as far as is necessary for understanding Chronology thoroughly.

[E] Συνοδικον, sive Pandectæ Canonum, &c. This beautiful edition contains, in Vol. I. The Canons attributed to the Apostles; the Canons — of the first Council of Nice; of the first Council of Constantinople; of the Council of Ephesus; of the Council of Chalcedon; of the sixth Council in Trullo; of the second Council of Nice; of the first and second Councils of Constantinople, held in the church of the Apostles; of the Council of Constantinople, held in the church of Sancta Sophia; of the Councils of Carthage, Ancyra, Neocæsarea, Gangra, Antioch, Laodicea, Sardica, Carthage: And the arguments and Arabic paraphrase of Joseph the Egyptian, on the Canons of the four General Councils. The II^d volume comprehends the Canons of Dionysius Alexandrinus; of Petrus Alexandrinus; of Gregory Thaumaturgus; of S. Athanasius; S. Basil; S. Gregory Nyssen; the Canonical Answers of Timothy, Bishop of Alexandria; the Canons of Theophilus, Archbishop of Alexandria; the Catholic Epistles of Cyril, Archbishop of the same; Verses of St Gregory the Divine and S.

Amphilochius, shewing what books of the Old and New Testament are to be read; a Circular Letter of Gennadius, Patriarch of Constantinople; a Letter of Tarasius, Patriarch of Constantinople, to Pope Adrian; a Synopsis of the Canonical Letters of Alexius Aristenus. Part. II. An Alphabetical Index or Syntagma, by Mathew Blastaris, of the Contents of all the Canons; of the Synod, which restored the Patriarch Photius to the See of Constantinople; the Acts of the eighth Synod of Constantinople. Lastly, Mr Beveridge's large and learned Notes upon the whole. All the particulars above-named are printed in two columns, the Greek on one side, and the Latin translation on the other; with the notes of Theodorus Balsamon, John Zonaras, and Alexius Aristenus, on several of the Canons.

[F] Codex Canonum Ecclesiæ Primitivæ vindicatus, &c. This Book is a vindication of the author's opinion concerning the Authority of the Apostolical Canons, and the time when they were made. In his Notes on these Canons (1) he had fixed the date of them at the end of the second, and beginning of the third century (2); taking a middle course between Fran. Turrianus, who affirmed that they were all made by the Apostles at the Council of Jerusalem; and John Daillé, who maintained (3) that they were not composed 'till the fifth century, by some impostor, and did not appear 'till the end of that century. In the Notes above mentioned, Mr Beveridge had made some reflexions on this opinion of Daillé, whereupon an anonymous author published Observations upon Mr Beveridge's Reflexions; to which the Codex Canonum Ecclesiæ Primitivæ vindicatus is a reply.

(1) Page 2—3.

(2) Ibid. p. 4.

(3) De Pseudepigraphis Apostolicis, published in 1652.

[G] Exposition

‘ A complete System of Divinity, summed up in brief Notes upon select places of the Old and New Testament; wherein the sacred Text is reduced under proper heads, explained and illustrated with the Opinions and Authorities of the ancient Fathers, Councils, &c.’ Lond. 1711, 4 vol. 8vo. VI. ‘ A Defence of the book of Psalms, collected into English Metre by Thomas Sternhold, John Hopkins, and others; with critical Observations on the New Version, compared with the Old.’ Lond. 1710, 8vo. In this book he gives the old version the preference to the new. VII. ‘ Exposition of the XXXIX Articles. Lond. 1710, 1716, fol. [G]. Bishop Beveridge’s character is in general represented in a most advantageous light. He was a person of the strictest integrity, of true and sincere piety, and exemplary charity, and of great zeal for religion. For all which excellent qualities he was so highly esteemed, that, when he was dying, one of the chief of his order deservedly said of him, ‘ There goes one of the greatest, and of the best men that ever England bred (q).’ He is also celebrated as a man of extensive and almost universal learning; furnished, to a very eminent degree, with all useful knowledge; and much to be admired for his readiness in the Scriptures, which he had thoroughly studied, so that he was able to produce suitable passages from them on all occasions, and happy in explaining them to others (r). Mr Nelson says (s), that he cannot forbear acknowledging the favourable dispensation of Providence to the present age, in blessing it with so many of those pious discourses, which our truly primitive Prelate delivered from the pulpit; and that he the rather takes the liberty to call it a favourable dispensation of Providence, because the Bishop gave no orders himself that they should be printed, but humbly neglected them, as not being composed for the press. But that this circumstance is so far from abating the worth of the sermons, or diminishing the character of the author, that it raises the excellency of both, because it shews at once the true nature of a popular discourse; which is to improve the generality of hearers, and for that purpose to speak to them in a plain and intelligible style, and also the great talent the Bishop had that way. Dr Henry Felton says (t), that our learned and venerable Bishop hath delivered himself with those ornaments alone, which his subject suggested to him, and hath written in that plainness and solemnity of style, that gravity and simplicity, which give authority to the sacred truths he teacheth, and unanswerable evidence to the doctrines he defendeth. That there is something so great, primitive, and apostolical, in his writings, that it creates an awe and veneration in our mind; that the importance of his subjects is above the decoration of words; and what is great and majestic in itself, looketh most like itself, the less it is adorned. The author of one of the Guardians (u), having made an extract out of one of the Bishop’s sermons (w), tells us, that it may for acuteness of judgment, ornament of speech, and true sublime, compare with any of the choicest writings of the Ancients, who lived nearest to the Apostles times. But the author of a pamphlet published in 1711 (x) passes a very different judgment upon Bishop Beveridge’s works; in order to stop, as he says, the mischief they are doing, and that which the publication of his Articles may do.— With regard to the Bishop’s Language, he observes (y), that he delights in jingle and quibbling; affects a tune and rhyme in all he says, and rests arguments upon nothing but words and sounds.— And as to his Principles and Arguings, he establishes, saith that author, falshood and truth with equal strength (z). His writings are full of mistakes in Logic.— That some of his sermons are a perplexed going round from one thing to another, and from that in return back again to it; and abound in contradictions (a). That he proves even the most important points by arguments that are not conclusive (b). That he is a downright Calvinist; and speaks in such a manner of the Satisfaction of Christ, as would in any one else have been called by a man of the Bishop’s zeal no less than blasphemy (c). That he makes many things necessary to salvation, which the Scripture speaks not one word of (d). That, though he dares say the Bishop was far enough from Popery, yet there are some things in him which are agreeable to it (e). And finally, that he destroys That which is the foundation of all Religion, and of all other knowledge in the world, That which is the gift of God, and the glory of our nature, our senses, and our reason.— But perhaps this animadverter will by some be ranked among the persons, of whom Dr Lupton gives the following character (f). ‘ Those who are censorious enough to reflect with severity upon the pious strains, which are to be found in Bishop Beveridge, &c. may possibly be good judges of an Ode or Essay, but do not seem to criticise justly upon Sermons, or express a just value for ‘ spiritual things.’ After all, whatever faults may be found in Bishop Beveridge’s posthumous works, must be charged upon the avarice or injudiciousness of his executor. He is not indeed to be ranked among Tillotson, S. Clarke, Clagett, and the two Sherlocks, for closeness of reasoning, and elegancy of style; but his honesty and goodness will always be had in reverence.

(q) Preface to Private Thoughts upon a Christian Life.

(r) Preface to his Sermons.

(s) Life of Bishop Bull, second edit. Lond. 1714, pag. 75, 76.

(t) Dissertation on reading the Classics, &c. fourth edit. Lond. 1730, 8vo, p. 190.

(u) No. 74. Vol. I.

(w) Sermon on Exodus iii. 14.

(x) Mentioned below in note [G].

(y) Page 3.

(z) Page 7, &c.

(a) Page 14, 15.

(b) Page 17, &c.

(c) Page 46.

(d) Page 48.

(e) Page 57.

(f) In a Letter to Mr Nelson, Nov. 25, 1712. See Bishop Bull’s Life, p. 494.

[G] Exposition of the XXXIX Articles, &c.] Upon the publication of this, there came out a pamphlet, intitled, ‘ A short view of Dr Beveridge’s writings, which may serve as a preliminary discourse to an ‘ Examination of his Articles.’ Lond. 1711, 8vo. A pamphlet, wherein the good Bishop’s works are severely attacked, and often justly. The Exposition upon the first Article was published at first by itself in 1710.

C.

BEVERLY (JOHN OF), in Latin Joannes Beverlaci, Archbishop of York in the eighth century, was born of a noble family among the English Saxons, at Harpham, a small town in Northumberland (a). He was first a Monk, and afterwards Abbot of the monastery of St Hilda (b). He was instructed in the learned languages by Theodore, Archbishop of Canterbury, and was justly esteemed one of the best scholars of his time (c). Alfred of Beverly, who wrote his Life, pretends he studied at Oxford, and took there the degree of Master of Arts; but Bishop Godwin assures us this cannot be true, because such distinction of degrees was not then known at Oxford, nor any where else in the Christian world (d). Our Abbot's merit recommended him to the favour of Alfred King of Northumberland, who, in the year 685, advanced him to the See of Hagustald or Hexham, and, upon the death of Archbishop Bosa, in 687, translated him to that of York (e). This prelate was Tutor to the famous Bede, and lived in the strictest friendship with Acca, and other Anglo-Saxon Doctors, several of whom he put upon writing Comments on the Scriptures. He likewise founded, in 704, a college at Beverly for secular priests [A]. After he had governed the See of York thirty-four years, being tired with the tumults and confusions of the Church, he divested himself of the episcopal character, and retired to Beverly; and four years after died in the odour of Sanctity, on the seventh of May, 721 (f) [B]. The day of his death was appointed a festival by a Synod

(a) Ba'eus de Script. Brit. Cent. I. c. 94.

(b) Pits, de Illust. Angl. Scriptor. an. 721.

(c) Bale and Pits ubi supra.

(d) Godwin, de Praesul. Angl. inter Archiep. Ebor. an. 687.

(e) Bede, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Anglor. l. v. c. ii, iii. Chronic. Joan. Bromton, apud X. Scriptor. col. 794. & Thom. Stubbs, Act. Pontif. Ebor. ibid. col. 1692, 1693.

(f) Bale & Pits, ubi supra.

(1) Britannia, by Bishop Gibson, last edit. Vol. II. col. 891.

[A] He built a college at Beverly for secular priests.] Camden informs us (1), that the memory of John of Beverly was so sacred among our Kings, (particularly Athelstane, who honoured him as his guardian Saint, after he had defeated the Danes) that they endowed this college with very considerable immunities. Among other privileges, it had that of an Asylum or sanctuary for debtors, and persons suspected of capital crimes. Within it stood a chair of stone, with this inscription :

HÆC SEDES LAPIDEA Freedstool DICITUR, i. e. PACIS CATHEDRA, AD QUAM REUS FUGIENDO PERVENIENS OMNIMODAM HABET SECURITATEM.

That is,

This Stone-Seat is called Freedstool, i. e. the Chair of Peace, to which what criminal soever flies has full protection.

The same author tells us, the town of Beverly had a church before the time of John of Beverly, dedicated to St John the Evangelist, which this Archbishop converted into a chapel for his new erected monastery. He adds, 'The Minister here is a very fair and neat structure. — At the upper end of the quire, on the right side of the altar place, stands the Freedstool above-mentioned, made of one entire stone, (said to have been removed from Dunbar in Scotland) with a well of water behind it. At the upper end of the body of the church, next the quire, hangs an ancient table with the pictures of St John, (from whom the church is named) and of King Athelstane the founder of it; and between them this distich :

' *Als free make I thee
' As heart can wish, or egh can see (2).'*

(2) Camden, ib. & col. 892.

But we have a more particular account of the foundation and history of the church of Beverly, in the Appendix to Leland's Collectanea, published by Mr T. Hearne. It is intitled, Out of a loose paper lying in a fol. MS. (containing Excerpta out of Leland's Collectanea, that I have before printed) in the hands of my learned friend, Roger Gale, Esq; The account is as follows. 'Out of the Great Register, or Town-Book of Beverly. The First Foundation of the Collegiate Church of Blessed John of Beverly. The Collegiate Church of Blessed John of Beverly was antiently founded in the county of York, in a certain country called Deyira, to wit, in the wood of the Deyirians, in the time of Lucius, the most illustrious King of (England, then called) Britany, the first King of the same, the son of Coil, a Pagan King, anointed by Pope Eleutherius, the thirteenth after Peter, in the year of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God the Father Almighty, Creator of heaven and earth, together with the Holy Ghost, according to the computation of the Church of England, 126. Afterwards it was destroyed by the Pagans Orfe and Hengist, and is again renewed and founded by the aforesaid Blessed John Archbishop of York, is ordained a monastery of black Monks, of religious Nuns, Virgins, seven secular Priests for the service of God, and divers other ministers, to wit, in the year of our Lord 704. And also again it is destroyed by the Pagans Hubba and Hungar, Danes, the sons Swayn, King of the Danes. After that it is re-founded and augmented by the most illustrious King of England, Athelstane, who endowed the said church with divers privileges, gifts, and benefices; and so it remained honourably endowed under the government of seven Canons, until the coming of William called the Bastard, the Conqueror and King, and so until the year of our Lord 1082. And then with the consent of William called Rufus of England, by Thomas Archbishop called the Elder, by the assent of the Canons, and others whom it concerned, Thomas the nephew of the said Lord Archbishop, a priest, was ordained and called the first Provost; to whom succeeded Thurstan of blessed memory, to whom Thomas called the Norman, to whom Robert, to whom, &c. to whom the venerable father and lord, Lord Peter of Chester; who purchased many tenements, revenues, and services to the said Provostship and Provost thereof, and left implements of diverse goods and chattels in all the manners of the said Provostship, both quicke and dead; to whom, &c (3).'

VOL. II. No. 67.

[B] He died, &c.] Godwin tells us (4), he was buried in the church porch of his monastery; but this is not consistent with what Camden tells us concerning the discovery of his remains about the middle of the 16th century. Let that Antiquarian speak for himself. In the year 1564, upon opening a grave, they met with a vault of squared free-stone, fifteen feet long, and two feet broad at the head, but at the feet a foot and a half broad. Within it was a sheet of lead four feet long, and in that the ashes, and six beads, (whereof three crumbled to dust with a touch, and of three remaining two were supposed to be corneli-ans) with three great brass pins, and four large iron nails. Upon the sheet lay a leaden plate, with this inscription :

(3) See Append. to Leland's Collectan. Part ii. p. 45.

(4) De Praesul. Angl. inter Archiep. Ebor. an. 687.

+ ANNO AB INCARNATIONE DOMINI MCLXXXVIII.

COMBUSTA FUIT HÆC ECCLESIA IN MENSE SEPTEMBRI, IN SEQUENTI NOCTE POST FESTUM SANCTI MATHÆI APOSTOLI: ET IN AN. MCXCVII. VI. IDUS MARTII FACTA FUIT INQUISITIO RELIQUIARUM BEATI JOHANNIS IN HOC LOCO, ET INVENTA SUNT HÆC OSSA IN ORIENTALI PARTE SEPULCHRI ET HIC RECONDITA, ET PULVIS CEMENTO MIXTUS IBIDEM INVENTUS EST ET RECONNITUS.

In English thus :

In the year of our Lord 1188, this church was burnt in the month of September, on the night following the feast of St Matthew the apostle; and in the year 1197, on the sixth of the ides of March, enquiry was made after the reliques of St John in this place, and these bones were found in the east part of the sepulchre, and were buried here, and there also dust mixed with mortar was found and buried.

(g) Godwin, ubi supra.

Synod held at London in 1416 (g). Bede, and other Monkish writers, ascribe several miracles to John of Beverly, of which we shall give the reader a taste in the remark [C]. Between three and four hundred years after his death, his body was taken up by Alfric, Archbishop of York, and placed in a shrine richly adorned with silver, gold, and precious stones (b). Bromton relates (i), that William the Conqueror, when he ravaged Northumberland with a numerous army, spared Beverly alone, out of a religious veneration for St John of that place. This prelate wrote some pieces, which are mentioned in the remark [D].

(i) Tho. Stubbs, ubi supra, col. 170.

(c) Ubi supra, col. 966.

Pits helps us to another JOHN of BEVERLY, so called from the place of his nativity. He was a Carmelite Monk in the fourteenth century, a very learned man, and Doctor and Professor of Divinity at Oxford. He flourished about the year 1390, in the reign of Richard II, and wrote, I. Questiones in Magistrum Sententiarum; i. e. 'Questions on the Master of the Sentences.' In four books. II. Disputationes ordinariæ; i. e. 'Disputations on the usual topics.' In one book (k).

(k) Pits, ubi supra, an. 1390.

'Cross over this lay a box of lead, about seven inches long, six broad, and five high; wherein were several pieces of bones, mixed with a little dust, and yielding a sweet smell; as also a knife and beads. All these things were carefully re-interred in the middle alley of the body of the minster, where they were taken up. But a seal, which was also found therein, was not re-interred with the rest, but came into the possession of a (*) private hand: Which account agrees not with what Bishop Godwin has left us about this Saint; namely, that he was buried in the church-porch. For though what is mentioned in the inscription was only a re-interment upon the inquisition made, yet it looks a little strange, that they should not lay the reliques in the same place where they found them; unless we solve it this way, that but part of the church was then standing, and they might lay him there with a design to remove him when it should be rebuilt, but afterwards either neglected or forgot it (5).'

(*) Marmaduke Nelson.

(5) Camden, ubi supra.

[C] Bede, and others, ascribe several miracles to this Saint.] A youth, that had been dumb from his infancy, being brought to the good Bishop, he ordered him to put out his tongue; and making the sign of the cross upon it, he commanded him to draw it in again. Then he bad him pronounce the letter A, which he readily did; then the letter B, and so on quite through the alphabet. Next he tried him with single words, and afterwards with sentences; and from that time the young man had the free and entire use of speech (6). A nun in the monastery of Watton, named Quonaburg, having been blooded in the arm, and the wound festering, was, through the violence of the pain occasioned thereby, brought in danger of death. The Abbess hereupon desired the Archbishop, who was come thither, to visit the poor girl, and assist her with his prayers; which John accordingly did, and gave her his benediction. From that instant her pain began to abate, and she was soon restored to perfect health (7). Another time, having consecrated a church, and being invited to dinner by a nobleman, named Puch, whose wife lay sick in bed; John sent her some of the consecrated water, ordering her to drink it; by which means she was instantly made whole, and served the good Bishop at table (8). Of the same stamp are the other miracles recorded by Bede (9). Bromton tells a story (10) of a miraculous appearance of the Holy Ghost, in the shape of a dove, and sitting on the altar, whilst the holy man was praying in the porch of St Michael's church in York. William of Malmshbury (11), and Matthew of Westminster (12), report a very strange thing, which continued to their time, and was shewn as it were for a sight. They tell us, that the people of Beverly used to bring bulls, the wildest and fiercest they could meet with. These unmanageable creatures they used to bring hampered with cords, with several strong men to drag them along; who, as soon as they entered the church-yard of Beverly, dropped their fierce and formidable nature, and were as tame as if they had been metamorphosed into sheep. And the people were so well assured of their inoffensiveness, that they used to turn them loose, and play with them.

(6) Bede, Hist. Eccles. Gent. Anglor. lib. v. cap. 2.

(7) Ibid. c. 3.

(8) Ibid. c. 4.

(9) Ib. c. 5, & 6.

(10) Apud X. Scriptor. col. 794.

(11) De Gest. Pontif. Angl. l. iii. p. 269. ap. Scriptor. post Bedam, Francof. 1601.

(12) Flores Hist. an. 721.

[D] He wrote some pieces.] Bale and Pits mention the following. I. Pro Luca exponenda; i. e. 'An Essay towards an Exposition of St. Luke,' addressed to Bede. II. Homilia in Evangelia; i. e. 'Homilies on the Gospels.' III. Epistola ad Hildam Abbatissam; i. e. 'Letters to the Abbess Hilda.' IV. Epistolæ ad Heribaldum, Audenum, et Bertinum; i. e. 'Letters to his disciples Heribaldus, Audenus, and Bertinus.'

T

(a) Short Account of the Life of J. Biddle, prefixed to the first Vol. of Socinian Tracts, printed at London, 1697, 4to.

Mr Wood says, his father was a Taylor; which is much the same, Athenæ. edit. 1727, Vol. II. col. 300.

(b) Wood, ibid.

(c) Life, &c. as above, pag. 4, col. 1.

(d) Wood, ubi supra.

BIDDLE (JOHN), a very eminent Socinian writer in the seventeenth century, and son of Edward Biddle, a middle sort of Yeoman, who also dealt in woollen clothes (a), was born at Wotton-Under-Edge in Gloucestershire, and baptized the 14th of January, 1615 (b). He was educated in the free-school of his native place, and being a hopeful youth, was taken notice of, particularly by George Lord Berkeley; who, for his encouragement, allowed him an exhibition of ten pounds a year, among other poorer scholars; though, being under ten years of age, he was not qualified, according to the common method, for that donation. This caused him so vigorously to apply himself to his studies, that he made a great progress therein, and whilst at school was author of some Translations that were published [A]. But the benefit of the exhibition on one hand, and perhaps his want of a sufficient maintenance at the University on the other, detained him longer in that school than was otherwise for his improvement; for he continued there till he was about nineteen years of age. However, having manifested even in that station a singular piety of mind, and contempt of secular affairs (c), he was sent in 1634 to the University of Oxford, and entered a Student in Magdalen-hall (d) [B]. On the 23d

[A] Whilst at school was author of some Translations that were published.] Namely, of Virgil's Bucolics, and the Two first Satyrs of Juvenal. Both which were printed at London in 1634, 8vo, and dedicated to John Smith of Nibley in the county of Gloucester, Esq; He likewise composed, in the beginning of that year, and recited before a full auditory, an elaborate Oration in Latin, at the funeral of an honourable schoolfellow

(1) Wood, Athenæ, ubi supra.

(1).

[B] And entered a Student in Magdalen-hall.] 'Here, as the author of his life informs us (2), he did so philosophize, as it might be observed, he was determined more by reason than authority; however, in divine things he did not much dissent from the common doctrine, as may be collected from a little Treatise he wrote against Dancing.'

(2) Life, as above, p. 4, col. 2.

[C] Chose

23d of June, 1638, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (e), and then became an eminent Tutor in the Hall just now mentioned. Before he took the degree of Master of Arts, he was invited by the overseers of the school of his native place to succeed in the mastership of it, but he declined that offer, and recommended to them another fit person, whom they accepted of (f). May the 20th, 1641, he took the degree of Master of Arts (g); soon after which the magistrates of Gloucester, upon ample recommendations from the principal persons in the University, chose him Master of the free-school of Crypt [C] in that city, where he went and settled, and was much esteemed for his diligence in his profession, and other valuable qualities (b). But falling into some opinions concerning the Trinity, different from the received ones [D], and expressing his thoughts of the same with too much freedom, he was accused to the magistrates of Heresy: And, being summoned before them, he exhibited in writing a confession, dated May 2, 1644 [E]; which not being thought satisfactory, he made another, more express than the former, to avoid imprisonment, wherewith he was threatened (i). But, how distinct soever he might be in his conceptions concerning the Trinity, he was not determinate enough in his expressing of that doctrine; as he became not long after, by further searching the Scriptures, and conversing with his acquaintance (k). When he had digested this point, he comprised it into 'XII Arguments drawn out of the Scripture; wherein the commonly received opinion, touching the Deity of the Holy Spirit, is clearly and fully 'refuted [F];' which he intended soon to publish (l). But an unfaithful acquaintance, who had a copy of them, betraying him to the magistrates of Gloucester, and to the Parliament Committee then residing there, he was, after the perusal of his book, committed on the 2d of December, 1645, to the common goal, (though at that time afflicted with a fore fever) to remain in that place 'till the Parliament should take cognizance of the matter. However, an eminent person in Gloucester, who had a respect for him [G], procured his enlargement, by giving security for his appearance when it should please the Parliament to send for him (m). About June, 1646, Archbishop Usher passing through Gloucester in his way to London, had a conference with our author about his notions, but without any success (n) [H]. Six months after he had been set at liberty he was sum-

(e) Idem. Fafii, Vol. I. col. 275.

(f) Idem Athenæ, and Life, ubi supra.

(g) Wood, Fafii, Vol. II. col. 2.

(b) Wood, and Life of J. Biddle, as above.

(i) Wood, and Life, as above.

(k) Life, &c. as above.

(l) Wood, ubi supra.

(m) Wood, and Life, &c. as above.

(n) The third Part of Gangrana, &c. by T. Edwards, Lond. 1646, 4to. p. 87.

[C] Chose him Master of the free-school of Crypt.] Not of Crisps, as the author of his life has it (3); but of the free-school in the parish of St Mary de Crypt in that city. It was founded by one Mrs Cooke, who endowed the Master with ten pounds per annum if a priest, and nine pounds a year if a layman. But later benefactions have augmented the Master's salary to thirty pounds a year, and there are sixteen pounds given for an Usher (4).

[D] But falling into some opinions concerning the Trinity, different from the received ones.] The author of his life tells us (5), that 'having laid aside the impediments of prejudice, he gave himself liberty to try all things, that he might hold fast that which is good. Thus diligently reading the holy Scriptures, (for Socinian books he had read none) he perceived the common doctrine concerning the holy Trinity was not well grounded in Revelation, much less in Reason. And being as generous in speaking, as free in judging, he did, as occasion offered, discover his reasons of questioning it.' Those that accused him were the Presbyterian party (6). And what his particular opinions were, see in the next note.

[E] He exhibited in writing a confession, dated May 2, 1644.] Which was as follows. 'I believe there is but one Infinite and Almighty Essence, called God. II. I believe, that as there is but one Infinite and Almighty Essence, so there is but one Person in that Essence. III. I believe that our Saviour Jesus Christ is truly God, by being truly, really, and properly united to the only person of the Infinite and Almighty Essence.' But when this did not satisfy the Magistrates, and they still pressed him to acknowledge three Persons in the divine Essence; he, it seems, knowing that the word Persons, when ascribed to God, is taken both by the ancient Fathers, and by modern writers, in various significations, did, about fourteen days after, confess, 'that there are three in that one divine Essence, commonly termed Persons (7).'

[F] XII Arguments drawn out of the Scripture, &c.] They are as follow. I. 'He that is distinguished from God, is not God. The Holy Spirit is distinguished from God. Ergo.' This he grounds upon those passages of Scripture, where the Holy Spirit is called the Spirit of God, said to be sent by God, &c. II. 'If he that gave the Holy Spirit to the Israelites to instruct them, be Jehovah alone, then the Holy Spirit is not Jehovah, or God. But he that gave the Holy Spirit to the Israelites to instruct them,

'is Jehovah alone. Ergo.' Nehem. ix. 6, 20. III. 'He that speaketh not of himself, is not God. The Holy Spirit speaketh not of himself. Ergo.' John xvi. 13. IV. 'He that heareth from another what he shall speak, is not God. The Holy Spirit doth so. Ergo.' John xvi. 13. V. 'He that receiveth of another's, is not God. The Holy Spirit doth so. Ergo.' John xvi. 14. VI. 'He that is sent by another, is not God. The Holy Spirit is sent by another. Ergo.' John xvi. 7. VII. 'He that is the Gift of God, is not God. The Holy Spirit is the Gift of God. Ergo.' Acts xii. 17. VIII. 'He that changeth place, is not God. The Holy Spirit changeth place. Ergo.' Luke iii. 21, 22. John i. 32. IX. 'He that prayeth unto Christ to come to judgment, is not God. The Holy Spirit doth so. Ergo.' Rev. xxii. 17. X. 'He in whom men have not believed, and yet have been disciples and believers, is not God. Men have not believed in the Holy Spirit, and yet have been so. Ergo.' Acts xix. 2. XI. 'He that hath an understanding distinct from that of God, is not God. The Holy Spirit hath understanding distinct from that of God. Ergo.' John xvi. 13, 14, 15. XII. 'He that hath a Will distinct in number from that of God, is not God. The Holy Spirit hath a Will distinct in number from that of God. Ergo.' Rom. viii. 26, 27. These several arguments are illustrated by reasonings and proofs, too long to be inserted here. At the end of them there are Expositions of the following texts. Matth. xxviii. 19. 1 John v. 7. Acts v. 3, 4. 1 Cor. vi. 19, 20. Matth. xii. 31. Isa. vi. 9, 10. 2 Cor. iii. 17. And, 'An Answer to the grand Objection of the Adversaries, touching the supposed Omnipresence of the Holy Spirit.' These 'XII Arguments, &c.' were first published, as is said above, in 1647, and reprinted in 1653, and lastly, in 1691, 4to, in a collection of Socinian Tracts, intitled, 'The Faith of One God, &c.' They were answered by Matth. Poole, M. A. the learned editor of Synopsis Criticorum, in his Plea for the Godhead of the Holy Ghost, &c. (8), and by Nich. Estwick, M. A. as also by Dr Cloppenburch, and Sam. Des Marcts, Professors in Holland.

[G] However, an eminent person in Gloucester, who had a respect for him, &c.] For Mr Wood informs us (9), that, 'except his opinions, there was little or nothing blame-worthy in him.'

[H] ——— Archbishop Usher ——— had a conference with our author about his notions, but without any success.] The author, from whom we have this particular

(8) Wood, as above, col. 301.

(9) Athenæ, col. 300.

(3) Ubi supra.

(4) See Sir Robert Atkyns's Gloucestershire, in Gloucester.

(5) Ubi supra.

(6) Wood, ubi supra.

(7) Life, &c. as above, p. 5. col. 1.

moned to appear at Westminster, and the Parliament immediately appointed a Committee to examine him; before whom he freely confessed, 'That he did not acknowledge the commonly received notion of the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, as he was accused; but, however, was ready to hear what could be opposed to him, and if he could not make out his opinion to be true, honestly to own his error (o).' But being wearied with tedious and expensive delays, he wrote, on the 1st of April, 1647, a letter to Sir Henry Vane [I], a Member of his Committee (p); wherein he besought him, either to procure his discharge, or to make a report of his case to the House of Commons. Sir Henry proposed it, and shewed himself a friend to our author (q); but the only result of it was, his being committed to the custody of one of their officers, (which restraint continued the five years following) and being referred to the Assembly of Divines, then sitting at Westminster for his conviction, before some of whom he often appeared, gave them in writing his Twelve Arguments against the Deity of the Holy Spirit (r), which were published the same year. Upon their coming out they made so great a noise in the world, that the author was summoned to appear at the bar of the House of Commons; where being asked, 'Whether he owned that book, and the opinions therein,' he answered in the affirmative. Whereupon being remanded to prison (s), the House ordered, on the 6th of September, 1647, that the said book, as blasphemous against the Deity of Christ, should be called in and burnt by the hangman, and that the author should be examined by the Committee of plundered Ministers; accordingly the book was burnt the 8th of the same month (t). But Mr Biddle drew a fresh and more dangerous storm upon himself, by two Tracts he published in the year 1648 [K]. For, upon their appearing, the Assembly of Divines at Westminster

(o) Life, &c. as above.

(p) Wood, ubi supra.

(q) Ibid.

(r) Life, &c. as above, p. 5. col. 2.

(s) Wood, &c. as above.

(t) Whitlock's Memorials, &c. edit. 1732, p. 265.

(10) T. Edwards, ubi supra.

particular (10), tells us, that 'Bishop Usher, that learned and godly Divine, coming through Gloucester, spake with him [Biddle], and used him with all fairnesse and pittie, as well as strength of arguments, to convince him of his dangerous error. A minister of the city of Gloucester told me, the Bishop laboured to convince him, telling him that either he was in a damnable error, or else the whole Church of Christ, who had in all ages worshipped the Holy Ghost, had been guilty of idolatry; but the man was no whit moved either by the learning, gravity, piety, or zeal of the good Bishop, but continued obstinate.'

[I] He wrote on the 1st of April, 1647, a letter to Sir Henry Vane.] It was published before his Twelve Arguments, &c. in 1647, under the title of, 'A Letter written to a certain Knight, a Member of the Honourable House of Commons.' And reprinted in the collection of Socinian Tracts, Lond. 1691, 4to, where it is intitled, 'A Letter written to Sir H. V. a Member of the Honourable House of Commons.' It begins thus: 'Sir, having now attended for the space of sixteen months, partly in the country, and partly in Westminster, that I might come to my answer before the Parliament; and finding, after all this tardiance, that I am still as far from having my cause determined as ever, I am even forced to make my address to you, and to beseech you, if you have any bowels towards them that are in misery, that you would either procure my discharge, or at least make report to the House, touching my denial of the supposed Deity of the Holy Spirit. For that this only is the matter in contestation, you very well know, having both heard my confession before the Committee, and remembering how, when I was urged to declare my judgment concerning the Deity of Christ, I waved the question, as neither being that I was accused of, nor which I had yet sufficiently studied, to engage myself publicly therein.' — Then he proceeds to deliver his opinion touching the Holy Spirit, which he confirms by several passages of Scripture. And complains of his adversaries, who being unable to justify their practice by argument, resorted to the arm of flesh, and intigated the Magistrate against him.

[K] Two Tracts he published in the year 1648.] They were, 'A Confession of Faith touching the Holy Trinity, according to the Scripture.' And the Testimonies of Irenæus, Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Novatianus, Theophilus, Origen, (who lived in the two first centuries after Christ was born, or thereabouts). As also of Arnobius, Lactantius, Eusebius, Hilary, and Brightman; concerning that 'One God, and the Persons of the Holy Trinity. Together with Observations on the same.' These were reprinted in 1653, 8vo, and in the collection of Socinian Tracts, Lond. 1691, 4to. The Confession of his Faith is comprized in the six following articles. I. I believe that there is one most High God, Creator of Heaven and Earth, and first Cause of all things pertaining to our Salvation, and consequently the ultimate object of our Faith and Worship; and that this God is none but the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the first person of the Holy Trinity. II. I believe that there is one chief Son of the most High God, or Spiritual, Heavenly, and perpetual Lord and King, set over the Church by God, and second Cause of all things pertaining to our Salvation, and consequently the intermediate object of our Faith and Worship; and that this Son of the most High God is none but Jesus Christ, the second Person of the Holy Trinity. III. I believe that Jesus Christ, to the intent he might be our brother, and have a fellow-feeling of our infirmities, and so become the more ready to help us, (the consideration whereof is the greatest encouragement to piety that can be imagined) hath no other than a Human Nature, and therefore in this very nature is not only a Person, (since none but a Human Person can be our brother) but also our Lord, yea our God. IV. Whence, though he be our God, by reason of his Divine Sovereignty over us, and Worship due to such Sovereignty, yet is he not the most High God, the same with the Father, but subordinate to him. V. Again; Though he be a God, subordinate to the most High God, as having received his Godhead, and whatsoever he hath, from the Father; yet may not any one thence rightly infer, that by this account there will be another God, or two Gods. For though we may, with allowance of the Scripture, say, that there are many Gods, yet neither will the Scripture, nor the thing itself, permit us to say, that there is another God, or two Gods; because when a word in it's own nature common to many, hath been appropriated, and ascribed to one by way of excellency, (as that of God hath been to the Father); albeit this doth not hinder us from saying, that there are many of that name: yet doth it from saying, that there is another, or two, since that would be all one as if we should say, that there is another, or two most excellent, (which is absurd); for when two are segregated in this manner out of many, they claim excellency to themselves alike. Thus though some faithful man be a Son of God, subordinate to the chief Son of God Christ Jesus, yet we may not thereupon say, that there is another Son of God, or two Sons of God, (since that would be to make another, or two Sons of God by way of excellency, whereas there can be but one such a Son) howbeit otherwise the Scripture warrants us to say, that there are many Sons of God. VI. I believe that there is one principal Minister of God and Christ, peculiarly sent from Heaven to sanctify the Church, who, by reason of his eminency and intimacy with God, is singled out of the number of the other heavenly Ministers or Angels, and comprized in the Holy Trinity, being the Third Person thereof; and that this Minister of God and Christ

Westminster solicited the Parliament, in whose hands was the supreme power at that time; and procured a severe Ordinance, May 2, 1648 [L], for inflicting the punishment of death upon those that held opinions contrary to the established ones about the Trinity, and other doctrines accounted blasphemies and heresies, and severe penalties upon those who differed in lesser matters. This seemed a damnatory sentence against our author, which there was no escape from. But he was saved by a dissension in the Parliament itself; to the greatest part of which the army joined its power, for this reason among others, because there were many, both officers and soldiers, liable to the severities of the Ordinance above-mentioned, which therefore from that time lay unregarded for several years. After the death of King Charles I, when a kind of universal toleration was introduced, our author had more liberty allowed him by his keeper, who suffered him, upon security given, to go into Staffordshire (u), where he lived some time with a Justice of Peace (w), who not only entertained him courteously, but at his death left him a legacy; which was a very reasonable supply to him, as he had already spent in a manner all he had gotten at Gloucester, or elsewhere, though not inconsiderable, in now about four years chargeable restraint. But he could not continue long here, before notice was given to Serjeant John Bradshaw, President of the Council of State, his mortal enemy, who caused him to be re-called by his keeper, and to be kept more straitly. In this long confinement, what proved most grievous to him was, that by reason of his lying under the imputation of blasphemy and heresy, all people in general were so alienated from him, that he could hardly have any one to converse with: And of the Divines, whose duty it was to have endeavoured his information, not one vouchsafed him a visit in his seven years confinement, except Mr Peter Gunning, afterwards Bishop of Ely. Here he spent his whole substance; so that not having wherewithal to pay for an ordinary meal, he was glad of the cheaper support, of drinking a draught of milk from the cow morning and evening (x). Being thus in a manner reduced to great indigence, he was, through the recommendation of a learned man, employed by Roger Daniel of London, to correct the impression of the Greek Septuagint Bible, which that Printer was about to publish with great accuracy. And this employment, with another in private, gained him for a time a comfortable

(u) Life, &c. as above, p. 5, 6.

(w) Who made him his Chaplain, and also Preacher of a church there. Wood, ubi supra; col. 302.

(x) Life, &c. p. 6.

‘Christ is the Holy Spirit.’ — These six articles he endeavours to confirm by texts of Scripture, and by several other arguments. — At the end of his Testimonies out of Irenæus, &c. he makes this remark. ‘Those Human Testimonies abovementioned have I allowed, not that I much regard them as to myself (who make use of no other rule to determine controversies about religion, than the Scripture; and of no other Authentick Interpreter, if a scruple arise concerning the sense of the Scripture, than Reason); but for the sake of the adversaries, who continually crake, the Fathers, the Fathers (11).’ Nich. Estwick wrote an Examination of this confession of Faith, Lond. 1656, 4to.

[L] And procured a severe Ordinance, May 2, 1648.] This Ordinance declared all such persons guilty of Felony, as should ‘willingly, by preaching, teaching, printing, or writing, maintain and publish, that there is no God, or that God is not present in all places, doth not know and foreknow all things, or that he is not almighty, that he is not perfectly holy, or that he is not eternal, or that the Father is not God, the Son is not God, and the Holy Ghost is not God, or that they Three are not one eternal God; or that shall in like manner maintain and publish, that Christ is not God, equal with the Father; or shall deny the Manhood of Christ, or that the Manhood or Godhead of Christ are several natures, or that the Humanity of Christ is not pure and unspotted of all sin; or that shall maintain and publish, as aforesaid, that Christ did not die, nor rise from the dead, nor is ascended into Heaven bodily; or that shall deny his death is meritorious in the behalf of believers; or that shall maintain and publish, as aforesaid, that Jesus Christ is not the Son of God; or that the Holy Scripture, of the Old and New Testament, is not the word of God; or that the bodies of men, after they are dead, shall not rise again; or that there is no day of judgment after death. — All such persons, upon complaint and proof made of the same, before any two of the next Justices of the Peace for that place or county, by the oaths of two witnesses, or confession of the party; the said party so accused shall be by the said Justices committed to prison without bail or mainprize, until the next gaol-delivery, and the witnesses bound over to give their evidence at the said gaol-delivery; at which time the party shall be indicted for felonious publishing and maintaining such error. And in case the indictment be found, and the party upon his trial shall not abjure his said error, and defence and maintenance of the same, he shall suffer the pains of death, as in case of felony, without benefit of Clergy; but in case he shall recant, he shall nevertheless remain in prison, until he finds two sureties to be bound with him, before two or more Justices of the Peace, that he shall not thenceforth publish or maintain the said errors any more, and the Justices shall have power to take bail. And if any person indicted formerly for maintaining and publishing erroneous opinions, shall again publish and maintain the same, he shall suffer death, as in case of felony, without benefit of Clergy.’ — The Ordinance further enjoins, that all persons who should publish or maintain, That all men shall be saved; or that man by nature hath free-will to turn to God; or that God may be worshipped in or by pictures or images; or that the soul of any man after death goeth to Purgatory: — or that Revelations, or the workings of the Spirit, are a rule of Faith or Christian life, though diverse from, or contrary to, the written word of God; or that man is bound to believe no more than by his reason he can comprehend; or that the moral Law of God, contained in the Ten Commandments, is no rule of Christian life; or that a Believer need not repent, or pray for pardon of sins; or that the two Sacraments are not commanded by the word of God, or are unlawful; — or that the Churches of England are no true Churches, nor their Ministers and Ordinances true Ministers and Ordinances; or that the Church-Government by Presbytery is unchristian or unlawful; or that all use of arms, though for the publick defence, (and be the cause never so just) is unlawful: — That all persons, I say, who should publish or maintain any of the said errors, and be convicted thereof, should be ordered to renounce them in the publick congregation of the same parish from whence the complaint comes, or where the offence was committed. And in case of refusal, to be committed to prison by two of the next Justices, until he find two sufficient sureties, that he shall not maintain or publish the said errors any more.’ This Ordinance was published in 1648, 4to, and is preserved in the Introduction prefixed to an edition of Fr Chyennell’s Chillingworthi Novissima; the author of which Introduction justly observes, that though ‘the Presbyterians were possessed of their power but a very short time, yet in that space they were for carrying their Ecclesiastical Tyranny beyond what themselves charged on their former oppressors.’

(11) Socinian Tracts, entitled, The Faith of One God, &c. Lond. 1691, 4to.

a comfortable subsistence. In 1651, the Parliament published a general Act of Oblivion, that restored, among others, our author to his full liberty; which he improved among those friends he had gained in London, in meeting together every Sunday for expounding the Scripture, and discoursing thereupon; by which means his opinions concerning the Unity of God, Christ his only Son, and his Holy Spirit, were so propagated, that the Presbyterian Ministers at London became exceedingly uneasy at it, but could not hinder it's progress by the secular power, which then admitted an universal liberty of religion and conscience. In the year 1654 he had three public disputations in his Meeting with Mr P. Gunning, afterwards Bishop of Ely, concerning the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, and of Christ, and concerning Punitive Justice (y). The same year he published his Twofold Scripture-Catechism [M], which coming into the hands of some of the Members of Oliver Cromwell's Parliament, which met September 3, 1654, a complaint was made against it in the House of Commons. Whereupon the author being brought to the bar in the beginning of December, and asked, Whether he wrote that book? He answered by asking, Whether it seemed reasonable, that one brought before a judgment-seat as a criminal, should accuse himself? After some debates and resolutions [N], he was, on the 13th of December, committed close prisoner to the Gatehouse; prohibited the use of pen, ink, and paper, or the access of any visitant, and his books were ordered to be burnt; which was accordingly done the 14th of the same month (z). A bill likewise was ordered to be brought in for punishing him; so that he had nothing less than capital punishment to expect. But, after about six months imprisonment, he obtained his liberty at the Court of the Upper, or King's, Bench, May 28, by due course of Law (a). Scarce was a year expired, when another no less formidable danger overtook him, by his rashly engaging in a dispute with an Anabaptist Teacher [O]. For he was upon that account first cast into the Poultry-Compter, July 3, 1655, and afterwards into Newgate; and tried for his life the next sessions, on the Ordinance against blasphemy, mentioned above. After the reading of the indictment, he prayed that Counsel might be allowed him to plead the illegality of it; which being denied him by the Judges, and the sentence of a Mute threatened, he at length gave into Court his exceptions ingrossed in parchment, and with much struggling had Counsel allowed him, but the trial was deferred to the next day. In the mean time, the Protector well knowing it was not for the interest of his Government to have him either condemned or absolved [P], took him out of the hands,

of

(y) Life, &c. p. 6, 7, and Wood, ubi supra, col. 502. The author of his Life tells us, that J. Biddle acquitted himself with so much learning, judgment, and knowledge in the sense of the Holy Scriptures, that instead of losing, he gained much credit both to himself and his cause.

(z) Whitlock's Memorials, as above, p. 609. Life, &c. and Wood, ubi supra.

(a) Wood, and Life, ibid.

[M] The same year he published his Twofold Scripture Catechism. That is, a larger, and a shorter Catechism, in which the answers are expressed in the very words of Scripture. The title of the first is, 'A Scripture Catechism; wherein the chiefest points of the Christian Religion being question-wise proposed, resolve themselves by pertinent answers taken word for word out of the Scripture, without either consequences or comments. Composed for their sakes that would be merc Christians, and not of this or that sect, in as much as all sects of Christians, by what names soever distinguished, have either more or less departed from the simplicity and truth of the Scripture.' Lond. 1654, 8vo. The title of the other is, 'A brief Scripture Catechism for Children; wherein, notwithstanding the brevity thereof, all things necessary unto life and godliness are contained. By John Biddle, Master of Arts, of the University of Oxford.' In three sheets, small octavo. This Twofold Catechism was animadverted upon by Dr John Owen, in his Vindicia Evangelicæ, or Mystery of the Gospel vindicated, &c. Oxon 1655, 4to.

[N] After some debates and resolutions. The matter was referred to a Committee, by whom Biddle was examined, and in conclusion he adhered to the answer he had before given to the House. Report being made of it by the Committee, the House voted, on the 12th of December, 'That the whole drift and scope of the said Twofold Catechism, is to teach and hold forth many blasphemous and heretical opinions; and that, in the Preface of the said Catechism, the author thereof doth maintain and assert many blasphemous and heretical opinions, and doth therein cast a reproach upon all the Catechisms now extant.' And therefore, that all the printed copies of the said Catechism should be burnt by the common hangman; that the Sheriffs of London and Middlesex should see it done; and that the Master and Wardens of the Company of Stationers should search for the said printed copies, and deliver them to the Sheriffs.—But this was not all, for the matter was agitated again in January following by the Committee, who resolved on the 16th of the same month, as above. And the matter being reported to the Parliament, they ordered a bill to be brought in for punishing Biddle; but they came at last to no resolution, though pressed eagerly by the Presbyterian Ministers to take away his life (12).

[O] By his rashly engaging in a dispute with an Anabaptist Teacher. That Teacher was one John Griffin; many of whose congregation having embraced Biddle's opinion concerning the Trinity, he thought the best way to regain them, and to stop the spreading of their errors, would be openly to confute their seducer. For that purpose he challenges Biddle to a publick disputation at his Meeting in the stone chapel in St Paul's Cathedral, on this question, 'Whether Jesus Christ be the most High, or Almighty God?' Biddle would have declined the dispute, as knowing Griffin to be inferior to him in learning, &c. but at last accepted it: And they two meeting, amongst a numerous audience, some of whom were greatly prejudiced against our author; Griffin, either imprudently, or for some worse end, repeats the question, asking, 'If any man there did deny, that Christ was God most High?' To which Biddle resolutely answers, 'I do deny it.' And by this open profession gave his adversaries the opportunity of a positive and clear accusation, which they soon laid hold of. But Griffin being baffled, for want of knowing the true way of arguing, the disputation was deferred till another day; and Griffin, though not able to cope with Biddle, had the confidence to consent to a second meeting, when Biddle was to take his turn of proving the negative of the question between them. In the mean while, Griffin and his party not thinking themselves a match for our author, they accused him of fresh blasphemies, and procured an order from the Protector to apprehend him on the 3d of July, (being the day before the intended second disputation) and to commit him to the Compter, &c. as is related above (13).

[P] The Protector well knowing it was not for the interest of his Government to have him either condemned or absolved. For, on the one hand, the Presbyterians, and all enemies to liberty of religion, of which there appeared a great number at his trial, would be offended at his release; and all that were for liberty, especially many congregations of Anabaptists, had petitioned the Protector for his discharge from prosecution upon the Ordinance abovementioned, by which their liberties

(12) Wood, ubi supra, col. 303.

(13) Life, and Wood, as above.

were

of the Law, and detained him in prison, intending to dispose of him otherwise (b). But being wearied with receiving petitions for and against him [2], he banished him for life to St Mary's castle in the isle of Scilly, and sent him thither in the beginning of October, 1655 (c). Soon after he allowed him a hundred crowns a year for his subsistence (d). In this exile Biddle continued about three years, during which time he employed himself in studying several intricate matters, particularly the Revelation of St John [R]. When he had continued a prisoner 'till the beginning of the year 1658, the Protector, at length, through the intercession of many friends, suffered a writ of Habeas Corpus to be granted out of the Upper-Bench Court, (as it was then called) and to be obeyed by the Governor of Scilly, whereby the prisoner was brought back, and nothing being laid to his charge, was set at liberty. Upon his return to London, he resumed his long-interrupted exercises among his friends; and, according to some [S], was Pastor of an Independent Church of that city. But he could not long continue there, for Oliver Cromwell dying September 3, 1658, his son Richard succeeded, and called a Parliament, dangerous certainly to J. Biddle, if any other; as consisting chiefly of Presbyterians, whom, of all men, he most dreaded: Therefore, by the advice of a noble friend, he retired privately into the country. That Parliament being soon dissolved, he returned to his former station 'till the restoration of King Charles II (e), when the liberty of Dissenters was taken away, and their Meetings punished as seditious. On which account our author refrained himself from public to more private assemblies. But he could not even so be safe; for on the first of June, 1668, he was seized in his lodgings in London, where he and some few of his friends were met for divine worship, and carried before a Justice of Peace, who committed them all to prison, without admitting them to bail. There they lay, 'till the Recorder took security for their answering to the charge brought against them at the next sessions. But the Court not being then able to find a Statute whereon to form any criminal indictment, they were referred to the sessions following, and therein proceeded against at Common Law; when every one of the hearers was fined in twenty pounds, and J. Biddle in one hundred, to lie in prison 'till paid (f) [T]. But in less than five weeks after, through the noisomeness of the place, and the pent air (very offensive to him, whose only recreation and exercise had been for many years to walk daily into the open air), he contracted a disease [U], which put an end to his life on the 22d of September, 1668, in the 47th year of his age (g). He was buried in the cemetery near Old Bethlem in Morfields, London; and an altar-monument of stone was erected over his grave, with an inscription, shewing 'that he was Master of Arts of the University of Oxford, 'and had given the world great specimens of his learning and piety, &c. (b).' As for his

(b) Wood, and Life, ibid.

(c) Ibid. Wood, col. 304.

(d) Life, pag. 8. col. 1.

(e) Life, &c. as above.

(f) Ibid. & Wood, ubi supra.

(g) Ibid.

(b) Wood, col. 305.

were threatened, and the capital article of the Protector's Government infringed; which runs thus: 'That such as profess Faith in God by Jesus Christ, (though differing in judgment from the Doctrine, Worship, or Discipline, publicly held forth) shall not be re-stained from, but protected in, the profession of their Faith, and exercise of their Religion, &c.' Art. 37. And, 'That all Laws, Statutes, Ordinances, &c. to 'the contrary of the aforesaid liberty, shall be 'esteemed as null and void.' Art. 38 (14).

[2] But being wearied with receiving petitions for and against him.] For several of the leaders among the Anabaptists, who had embraced his opinions, drew up a petition in his behalf, in September 1655, and presented it to Cromwell: But, instead of complying with their desires, he presented to them, 'how inconsistent it was for them, who professed to be members of the Church of Christ, and to worship him with the worship due to God, to give any countenance to one who reproached themselves, and all the Christian Churches in the world, as being guilty of 'of Idolatry.—Shewing also, that if it be true, which Biddle holds, 'That Jesus Christ is but a Creature, 'then all those that worship him with the worship due to God, are Idolaters, and that the maintainers of that opinion of Biddle are guilty of great blasphemy against Christ (15).— To the famous Mr Thomas Firmin, who likewise presented a petition for his release from Newgate (16), the Protector gave this short answer. 'You curl-pate boy, you, do you think I'll shew 'favour to a man that denies his Saviour, and disturbs 'the Government (17).— At length, his Highness yielded to the repeated solicitations of the Presbyterian and Independent Ministers, who were continually teasing and importuning him to send him into banishment (18).

[R] Particularly the Revelation of St John.] After his return to London, he published 'An Essay to the 'explaining of the Revelation; or, Notes on some of 'the chapters of the Apocalyp's.' In which he treats of the Beast in the Apocalyp's, Antichrist, the personal reign of Christ on earth, &c. (19):

[S] And, according to some, was Pastor of an Independent Church, &c.] The person who relates this, is Sir Peter Pett, in the Preface to his Happy Future State of England (20); where he further tells us, that this congregation held the following notions: 'That the Fathers under the old covenant had only temporal promises; that the universal obedience performed to the commands of God and Christ was the saving Faith; that Christ rose again only by the power of the Father, and not his own; that justifying Faith is not the pure gift of God, but may be acquired by men's natural abilities; that Faith cannot believe any thing contrary to, or above, reason; that there is no Original Sin; that Christ hath not the same body now in glory, in which he suffered and rose again; that the Saints shall not have the same body in Heaven which they had on earth; that Christ was not Lord or King before his resurrection, or Priest before his ascension; that the Saints shall not before the day of judgment enjoy the bliss of Heaven; that God doth not certainly know future contingencies; that there is not any authority of Fathers or General Councils in determining matters of Faith; that Christ before his death had not any dominion over the Angels; and that Christ by dying made no satisfaction for us.'

[T] And J. Biddle in one hundred, (pounds) to lie in prison 'till paid.] One of the Sheriffs would have been satisfied with ten pounds for him, and even have paid it; but Sir Richard Brown, the Justice who had committed him, could not be induced to consent thereto upon any terms; but threatened him with a seven years imprisonment, though he should pay the whole hundred pounds. This was the cause of his continuing in prison (21).

[U] He contracted a disease.] Notwithstanding the violence of it, Sir Richard Brown could not be moved to grant the sick prisoner the present comfort of a removal, in order to a recovery; but Sheriff Maynel did grant it. However, the second day after his removal, between five and six o'clock in the morning, Sept. 22, he expired, as is related above (22).

(20) Lond. 1683 fol.

(21) Life, &c. p. 9.

(22) Ibid.

[W] As

(14) Life, &c. p. 8. and Whitelock, as above, p. 576.

(15) Wood, ubi supra, col. 304.

(16) This Mr Firmin was a disciple of our author's, and gave him bed and board for a while before he was sent to Scilly. Life of T. Firmin, Lond. 1698, p. 10.

(17) Bishop Kennet's Register and Chronicle, &c. Lond. 1728, fol. p. 760.

(18) Wood, as above, col. 304.

(19) Idem, col. 305.

his character, bating his mistaken opinions, he is, in general, acknowledged to have been a man most eminent for piety and virtue, as well as learning and knowledge; as will appear by the instances which we shall give in the note [W].

[W] As will appear by the instances which are shall give.] These we take from his Life, which, as Mr Wood informs us (23), was written by John Farrington of the Inner-Temple, and published in Latin at London in 1682, 8vo. The author of that Life, highly commends J. Biddle for 'his great zeal for promoting holiness of life and manners; for (says he) this was always his end and design in what he taught. He valued not his doctrines for speculation, but practice; inasmuch that he would not discourse of those points wherein he differed from others, with those that appeared not religious according to their knowledge. Neither could he bear those that dissimulated in profession for worldly interests. He was a strict observer himself, and a severe exactor in others, of reverence in speaking of God, and Christ, and holy things; so that he would by no means hear their names, or any sentence of holy Scripture, used vainly or lightly, much less any foolish talking, or scurrility. He would often tell his friends, that no religion would benefit a bad man, and call upon them to resolve, as well to profess and practise the truth that is according to godliness, as to study to find it out. — His Learning in matters of religion was gained by a diligent study of the holy Scriptures, especially of the New Testament; wherein he was so conversant, that he retained it all in his memory word for word, not only in English, but in Greek, as far as the 4th chapter of the Revelation of St John. This thorough knowledge in the Scriptures, joined to a happy and ready memory, whereby he retained alio the sum of what he had read in other authors,

'gave him great advantage against all opponents, and in all discourses, but without the least appearance of boasting — No tincture of Ambition appeared in him, nor the least degree of Covetousness; for he always sustained himself by his own industry, when he was in a capacity of using it; and would never accept of any supplies, though offered, but when his necessities, arising from imprisonment, sickness, or the like, forced him to it; for he had learned to be contented with a little, and fought not more, yea, out of that little would contribute to the necessities of others. Temperance was at all times most conspicuous in him, as well in eating as in drinking; and he thought it not enough to be very chaste, but that he ought to avoid all suspicion of unchastity, inasmuch that he would not willingly look upon a woman without just occasion; and was very uneasy if left in a room with one alone, 'till relieved by more company. — He would be merry and pleasant, and liked well that the company should be so too; yet even in his common conversation he always retained an awe of the Divine Presence, and was sometimes observed to lift up his hand suddenly, which those that were intimate with him knew to be an effect of a secret ejaculation. But in his closet-devotions he was wont to prostrate himself upon the ground, after the manner of our Saviour in his agony, and would commend that posture of worship also to his most intimate friends. Finally, he was as eminent for his justice and charity towards men, as he was for his piety towards God.' C

BILSON (THOMAS), a learned writer, and Bishop, in the end of the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVIIIth, century, was born in the city of Winchester (a); being the son of Harman Bilson, the same probably who was Fellow of Merton-college in 1536 (b); and derived his descent by his grandmother, or great-grandmother, from the Duke of Bavaria [A]. Thomas, of whom we are now writing, was educated in Wykeham's school near Winchester; and in 1565 admitted perpetual Fellow of New-college, after he had served two years of probation (c). October 10, 1566, he took his degree of Bachelor, and April 25, 1570, that of Master of Arts (d). Also, that of Bachelor of Divinity, June 24, 1579, and finally the degree of Doctor of Divinity on the 24th of January 1580 (e). In his younger years, he was a great lover of, and extremely studious in, Poetry [B], Philosophy, and Physick (f). But when he entered into Holy Orders, and applied himself to the study of Divinity, which his genius chiefly led him to, he became a most solid and constant preacher; and so compleat, for skill in languages, for readiness in the Fathers, and for judgment to make use of his reading (g), that he was one of the most accomplished scholars of his time. The first preferment he had was that of Master of Winchester-school [C]; next he was made Prebendary of Winchester, and afterwards Warden of the college there (h). To which college he did a very important service, about the year 1584, by preserving the revenues of it (i), when they were like to be swallowed up by a notorious forgery [D]. In 1585, he published his book of 'The true difference betweene Christian Subjection and Unchristian Rebellion [E], and dedicated

(a) Fuller's Worthies in Hampshire, p. 7. A. Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 142. and Athen. Oxon. edit. 1721, Vol. I. col. 403.

(b) Wood, Athen. ibid.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Idem, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 97, 104.

(e) Ibid. col. 119, 121.

(1) Wood, Athen. ubi supra. Strype's Life of Archbishop Whitgift, Lond. 1713, fol. p. 497.

(2) Wood, ibid. col. 405.

(3) Church Hist. by T. Fuller, book x. p. 39.

[A] And derived his descent, by his grandmother, or great-grandmother, from the Duke of Bavaria.] Harman's father was Arnold Bilson, son and heir of Arnold Bilson, by his wife, the daughter of the Duke of Bavaria; but whether natural or legitimate is unknown (1).

[B] In his younger years, he was a great lover of, and extremely studious in, Poetry, &c.] He composed several Poems, Orations, and other things, in Latin; which were in manuscript in Mr Wood's library (2), but have never been published.

[C] The first preferment he had, was that of Master of Winchester-school.] While he was in that station, Garnet, who was afterwards executed for being concerned in the Gunpowder-plot, resolved, with some other of the scholars, to cut off their Master's right hand [Bilson's], but their wicked design was happily discovered, and prevented in time (3).

[D] He did a very important service to Winchester-college, by preserving the revenues of it, when they were like to be swallowed up by a notorious forgery.] Of which take an account in his own words. — There hapned an injurie to be offered to the Inheritance of 'the College where I am, by a false title derived from before the foundation of the House, and so strengthened on every side with ancient Deeds and Evidences, that the forgerie was hard to be discerned, and harder to be convinced, but by infinite searching in the muniments of many Churches and Bishopsricks, as well as in our owne, and re examining sundrie large and laborious commissions which they had taken out before my time, to testifie the keeping, and justifie the delivering, of these suspected Deeds and Ligiers. To the detecting and impugning of this, no person was, or would be used, but myselfe, the Caute was so huge, the comparing of the circumstances and contrarieties both of Deeds and Witnesses, so tedious; the Proofs so perplexed and intricate: and the Danger so nearly touched the whole State of the House: I was forced for two years to lay all Studie aside, and addict myself wholly, first to the deprehending, and then to the pursuing of this falsehood (4).'

[E] The true difference betweene Christian Subjection and Unchristian Rebellion.] The rest of the title is as follows: — Wherein the Princes lawfull Power to command

(f) Briefe View of the State of the Church of England, &c. by Sir John Harrington, Kt. Lond. 1655, 12mo, p. 72. and Wood, Athen. col. 403.

(g) Ibid.

(h) Ibid.

(i) See Epistle to the Reader, before Dr Bilson's True Difference between Christian Subjection and Unchristian Rebellion, London, 1585, 8vo.

(4) Epistle to the Reader, before The true Difference between Christian Subjection, &c.

dedicated it to Queen Elizabeth. In 1593, came out his book entitled, 'The perpetuall Government of Christes Church: Wherein are handled, The fatherly Superioritie which God first established in the Patriarkes for the guiding of his Church, and after continued in the tribe of LEVI and the Prophetes: and lastlie confirmed in the New Testament to the Apostles and their Successors: As also the points in question at this day, Touching the Jewish Synedrion: the true kingdome of Christ: the Apostles commission: the Laie Presbyterie: the Distinction of Bishops from Presbyters, and their succession from the Apostles times and hands: the calling and moderating of Provinciaall Synods by Primates and Metropolitans: the allotting of Diocesnes, and the Popular electing of such as must feede and watch the flock: And divers other points concerning the pastoral regiment of the house of God [F]' On the 20th of April, 1596, he was elected, confirmed June the 11th, and the 13th of the same month, consecrated Bishop of Worcester [G]; and translated in May following to the bishoprick of Winchester, and made a Privy-Counsellor (k). In 1599, he published, 'The Effect of certaine Sermons (l) touching the full redemption of Mankind by the Death and Blood of Christ Jesus; wherein besides the Merite of Christs Suffering, the Manner of his Offering, the Power of his Death, the Comfort of his Crosse, the Glorie of his Resurrection, Are handled, What Paines Christ suffered in his Soule on the Crosse: Together, with the place and purpose of his descent to hel after death: &c. Lond. 4to. These Sermons being preached at Paul's Crosse in Lent 1597, by the encouragement of Archbishop Whitgift (m), greatly alarmed most of the Puritans (n), because they contradicted some of their tenets [H]. Whereupon, they uniting their forces, and making their observations thereon, sent them to Henry Jacob, a learned Puritan (o), who published them with his Collections, and under his own name [I]. The Queen being at Farnham-castle (p); and, to use the Bishop's words, 'taking knowledge of the things questioned between him and his opponents, directly commanded him neither to desert the doctrine, nor to let the calling which he bore in the Church of God, to be (k) Godwin, de Praefulibus, Lond. 1616, 4to. p. 24, & 302. Survey of the Cathedrals of Yorke, &c. by Br. Willis, Esq; Lond. 1727, p. 648.

(l) On Galatians vi 4.

(m) Life and Acts of Archbishop Whitgift, by J. Strype, book iv. p. 503, edit 1718.

(n) Wood, Ach. Vol. I. col. 404.

(o) Wood, Athen. ubi supra, col. 404, 404.

(p) Which belongs to the Bishops of Winchester.

trampled command for truth, and indepriveable Right to beare the Sword, are defended against the Pope's Cenſures, and the Jesuits Sophismes, uttered in their Apologie, and Defence of English Catholics: With a Demonstration, that the things Reformed in the Church of England, by the Lawes of this Realm, are truly Catholike, notwithstanding the vaine shew made to the contrarye in their late Rhemish Testament.' Oxford, 1585, 4to; London, 1586, 8vo. The book is divided into four parts, and written dialogue-wise. In the first and second part Dr Bilson answers Dr Allen's 'Apology and true Declaration of the Institution and Endeavours of the two English Colleges.' [at Rome and Rhemes] Wherein Queen Elizabeth's Government was charged with Heresy, Tyranny, and Blasphemy. And it was asserted, that none of her Ecclesiastical Lawes were orderly or duly made. — That her Sovereignty was a thing improbable, unreasonable, unnatural, impossible; and the Oath of Allegiance to her intolerable, repugnant to God, the Church, her Majesty's honour, and all mens consciences. The third part contains an Answer to 'A Defence of the English Catholics that suffer for their Faith.' In which it was affirmed, that subjects bearing arms against their natural Princes, upon the Pope's warrant, do a holy, just, and honourable service. In opposition to which, Dr Bilson shews, that Princes are placed by God, and so not to be displaced by man, and subjects threatened damnation by God's own mouth, if they resist. The fourth part is an answer to the Rhemish Testament. — In this book are many passages in favour of the Right of Subjects in some Cases to resist their Princes; which have very much puzzled the patrons of Passive Obedience and Non-Resistance (5). Nay one affirms, that Dr Bilson was employd by Queen Elizabeth to write it, when she designed to take the Low-Countries into her protection; and that to justify the revolt of Holland, he gave strange liberty in many cases, especially concerning religion, for subjects to cast off their obedience (6).

[F] The perpetuall Government of Christ's Church.] It was printed at London, 4to, in the old English letter. In this book the author shews, that the Church of God hath been always governed by an inequality and superiority of pastors and teachers among themselves. It is one of the best books written in favour of Episcopacy.

[G] On the 20th of April, 1596, he was elected, confirmed June the 11th, and the 13th of the same month consecrated, Bishop of Worcester.] His competitor to that See was the learned Dr Thomas James, Keeper of the public library at Oxford, recommended by Archbishop Whitgift; but the Lord Treasurer's interest prevailed in favour of Dr Bilson (7).

[H] These Sermons — greatly alarmed most of the Puritans, because they contradicted some of their tenets.] The Puritans notions reflected upon, and contradicted, in these Sermons, were, 1. That Christ suffered for us in his Soul the Wrath of God, and the Pains of Hell, and finished all his Sufferings upon the Crosse before he died. 2. That Christ, after his death, went not into Hell in his Soul, to triumph there (as was imagined) over Satan, as he had done on the Crosse over Death and Sin; and that the word Hades, which was commonly rendered Hell, did not signify the place of the damned, but only the state of the dead, or the invisible world (8). — In opposition to that, Bishop Bilson maintained, 1. That it is no where recorded in the holy Scriptures, nor justly to be concluded from thence, that Christ suffered the true pains of Hell. 2. That as the Scriptures describe to us the paines of the damned, and of Hell; there are manie terrors and torments, which without evident impietie cannot be ascribed to the Sonne of God. 3. That the death and blood of Christ Jesus were evidently, frequently, constantly set downe in the writings of the Apostles, as the sufficient price of our Redemption, and true meane of our reconciliation to God, and sealed with the Sacraments of the New Testament, as the verie groundworke of our Salvation by Christ, and so have been received, and believed in the Church of God, 1400 years before ever any man made mention of hell-paines to be suffered in the Soule of Christ. Lastly, Where the Scriptures are plain and pregnant, that Christ died for our finnes, and by his death destroyed him that had the power of death, even the divell, and reconciled us when we were strangers and enemies in the body of his flesh through death: besides, that the Holie Ghost in these places by expresse words nameth the bodily death of Christ, as the meane of our Redemption and reconciliation to God; no considerate Divine might affirme or imagine Christ suffered the death of the Soule; for so much as the death of the Soule must exclude Christ from the Grace, Spirit, and Life of God, and leave in him neither faith, hope, nor love, sanctitie, nor innocencie, which God forbid any Christian should so much as dreame (9).

[I] Who published them with his Collections, and under his own name.] With this title, 'A Treatise of the Sufferings and Victory of Christ in the work of our Redemption, &c. Written against certain Errors in these points publickly preached in London, 1597.' Lond. 1598, 8vo. — In 1600 he published 'A Defence of this Treatise, &c.' Lond. 4to, to which Bishop Bilson's Survey, &c. abovementioned is an Answer (10).

(5) Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, Lond. 1733, 8vo, Vol. 1. p. 584.

(9) Preface to those Sermons, p. 2.

(10) Wood, Ath. Vol. I. col. 415.

(5) See Hist. of Passive-Obedience, Amst. 1689, p. 27. Mr Collier says, that it gives a dangerous liberty to subjects in many cases. Eccles. Hist. Vol. II. p. 709, edit. 1714, fol.

(6) Cressy's Exomolgesis, ch. xii.

(7) See Life and Acts of Archbishop Whitgift, by J. Strype, p. 495, edit. 1718.

(g) Preface to the King's Majesty, before The Survey of Christ's Sufferings for Man's Redemption, &c. p. 7.

(r) Wood, Athen. ubi supra, col. 404.

(s) Church Hist. book x. p. 71.

(t) Wood, Athen. col. 403.

(u) Fuller's Worthies, in Hants-shire, p. 7.

(w) A. Wilson's Life and Reign of King James I. p. 692. in Complait Hist. edit. 1706. Frankland's Annals, p. 1, &c. Julius Coquinarius, &c. Lond. 1650, 12mo. p. 113, &c.

(x) The Court and Character of King James, by Sir Anth. Weldon, Lond. 1650, 12mo. p. 77. and Rapin's Hist. of England, fol. Vol. II, p. 184.

(y) Mr Fuller, by Mistake, says it was in 1618. Worthies, ubi supra.

'trampled under foot by such unquiet Refusers of truth and authority (g). Upon which royal command, he writ that most learned treatise, chiefly delivered in Sermons, which was published in 1604, under the title of 'The Survey of Christ's Sufferings for Mans redemption: And of his Descent to Hades or Hel for our deliverance.' Lond. fol. [K]. It was this learned person also, that preached the Sermon at Westminster before King James I and his Queen, at their Coronation on St James's day, 25 July, 1603, from Rom. xiii. 1. which was published at London, 1603, 8vo (r). In January, 1603-4. he was one of the Speakers and Managers at the Hampton-Court Conference, in which he spoke much, and, according to Mr Fuller (s), most learnedly. And, in general, he was one of the chief maintainers and supports of the Church of England; as were also Dr Richard Field of Oxford, and Dr William Whitaker, and Mr Fulke of Cambridge; while John Rainolds and Tho. Sparke were promoters of Non-conformity (t). The care of revising, and putting the last hand to, the new Translation of the English Bible in King James 1st's reign, was committed to our author, and to Dr Miles Smith afterwards Bishop of Gloucester (u). His last publick act, recorded in History, was, the being one of the Delegates (w) that pronounced and signed the sentence of Divorce between Robert Devereux Earl of Essex, and the Lady Frances Howard, in the year 1613 [L]: And his son being knighted soon after, upon this very account as was imagined, the world was so malicious as to give him the title of Sir Nullity Bilson (x). This learned Bishop, after having gone through many employments, and lived in continual drudgery for the publick good, departed this life on the 18th of June in 1616 (y), and was buried in Westminster-Abbey, near the entrance into St Edmund's chapel, on the south-side of the monument of King Richard II (z). His character is represented to the utmost advantage by several persons. Sir Anth. Weldon calls him 'an excellent Civillian, and a very great Scholler (a):' Mr Th. Fuller, 'a deep and profound Scholar, excellently well read in the Fathers (b).' Bishop Godwin, 'a very grave man; and how great a Divine (adds he) if any one knows not, let him consult his learned writings (c).' Sir John Harrington, 'I find but foure lines [in Bishop Godwin's book] concerning him; and if I should give him his due, in proportion to the rest, I should spend foure leaves. Not that I need make him better known, being one of the most eminent of his ranck, and a man that carried prelature in his very aspect. His rising was meerly by his learning, as true Prelates should rise. Sint non modo labe mali sed suspicione carentes, not onely free from the spot, but from the speech of corruption (d).' He writ in a more elegant style, and in fuller and better-turned periods, than was usual in the times wherein he lived.

(z) Wood, Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. ii. p. 172. and Athen. Vol. I. col. 403.

(a) Court and Character of King James, ubi supra, p. 77.

(b) Church Hist. book x. p. 71.

(c) De Praefulibus, as above, p. 302.

(d) Briefe View, &c. as above, being a Character and History of some of the Bishops, p. 71.

[K] The Survey of Christ's Sufferings for Man's redemption; and of his descent to Hades or Hel for our deliverance.] This book, as was observed in the last note, contains an Answer to Henry Jacob's 'Defence of a Treatise touching the Sufferings and Victory of Christ in the work of our Redemption (11).' And is a full and learned vindication of the Sermons, and the Doctrine, mentioned above in the note [H]. The author gives us (12) the substance of this Survey in the following words. 'The maine ground of the Gospel was this, that Christ died for our Sinnes according to the Scriptures, and was buried, and rose the third day. Since then we are reconciled to God by the death of his Sonne, we must acknowledge no other death of Christ, than that which he suffered in the bodie of his flesh, which death the Scriptures most apparently describe to be the death of Christ's body. — The Scriptures do no where teach, nor mention the death of Christ's Soul, or the death of the damned, which is the second death, to be needfull for our Redemption. — The true and full Satisfaction for our sins, must not be derived from the singularity and infinity of Christ's pains, longer and greater than which the devils and damned do every one suffer; but from the dignity of the person, who being the only and eternal Son of God that made us, humbled himself in our stead, and in our nature, to restore us, and offered recompense for our sins, which was 'his submission and obedience unto the death of the Cross, more pleasing to God than our condemnation to hell could have been.' In the second part, treating of Christ's descent into hell, he shews that Christ's Soul did not, at his death, ascend to heaven, and there remained 'till his resurrection, but actually went into hell; to 'destroy the devils kingdom, triumph over powers and principalities, spoil them by delivering all his elect, dead, living, and yet unborn, from the right, power, and fear of eternal death; taking into his hands the keys of death and hell, that he might be Lord of all, in Heaven, Earth, and Hell.' In the same part he endeavours to prove, that Sheol, or Hades, when distinguished from the death of the body, or referred to the soul after death, apparently signifieth Hell.

[L] He was one of the Delegates that pronounced and signed the sentence of divorce between the Earl of Essex, and the Lady Frances Howard.] That affair is so well known, and related by so many of our Historians, that it need not be enlarged upon here. However, besides the authors cited above in the margin, see a book intitled, Truth brought to light by Time (13). Two several commissions were issued out upon this occasion, which is not commonly taken notice of. In the first Bishop Bilson was not put in, but he was in the second (14).

(13) Lond. 1651, 4to, p. 79.

(14) See Julius Coquinarius, ubi supra.

(11) Wood, ibid.

(12) Resolutions of the Survey, in the beginning of it.

(a) For these particulars we are obliged to his son, the Rev. R. Bingham, Rector of Havant.

BINGHAM (JOSEPH) the learned author of Origines Ecclesiasticae, or, the Antiquities of the Christian Church, was born at Wakefield in Yorkshire in September 1668: and learned the first rudiments of Grammar at a school in the same town, under Mr Edward Clarke. In 1683, at the age of fifteen, he was admitted into University-College in Oxford; where he behaved in a very sober and studious manner. He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1687, and soon after was chosen Fellow of the college just now mentioned. He proceeded to his Master's degree in the year 1690 (a). Not long after [A], he was presented by the most famous John Radcliffe, M. D. to the rectory

[A] Not long after, &c.] This I infer from a passage in the Preface to the first volume of his Origines Ecclesiasticae, where he says, that 'Providence removed him early from the University.'

[B] Wit

rectory of Headbourn-worthy, a living of an hundred pounds a year, near Winchester in Hamshire; without any importunity or seeking of his own (b). In that country-retirement, with all the disadvantages he lay under for want of many useful and necessary books [B], he undertook a very learned and laborious work, of which he published the first Volume in 1708, under this title, 'Origines Ecclesiasticæ; Or, The Antiquities of the Christian Church [C].' And which he compleated afterwards in nine volumes more,

(b) From the same information. See also Preface to Vol. I. of our Author's Origines Ecclesiasticæ.

[B] With all the disadvantages he lay under for want of many useful and necessary books. Of this he complains in the following words (1). 'I confess, indeed, this work will suffer something in my hands for want of several books, which I have no opportunity to see, nor ability to purchase; but that perhaps may tempt some others, who are at the fountains of learning, and have all manner of books at command, to add to my labours, and improve this Essay to a much greater perfection. — The chief assistance I have hitherto had, is from the noble benefaction of — the renowned Bishop Morley; who, among many other eminent works of charity and generosity, — has bequeathed a very valuable collection of books to the church of Winchester, for the advancement of learning among the parochial Clergy: And I reckon it none of the least part of my happiness, that Providence removing me early from the University (where the best supplies of learning are to be had) placed me by the hands of a generous benefactor (2), without any importunity or seeking of my own, in such a station, as gives me liberty and opportunity to make use of so good a library, though not so perfect as I could wish.' — He complains likewise elsewhere (3) 'of his own difficult circumstances, under which he was forced to labour for want of proper assistance of abundance of books.' — And yet, what vast numbers he used and consulted, see in the Index Auctorum at the end of the work.

[C] Origines Ecclesiasticæ; or, The Antiquities of the Christian Church, &c. The Contents of the several books and chapters of this curious work are as follow. Book I. Of the several names and orders of men in the Christian Church. Ch. 1. Of those titles and appellations which Christians owned and distinguished themselves by. Ch. 2. Of the names of reproach which Jews, Infidels, and Hereticks, cast upon the Christians. Ch. 3. Of the several orders of men in the Christian Church. Ch. 4. A more particular account of the Believers, and their several titles of honour and privileges above the Catechumens. Ch. 5. Of the distinctions of Believers from the Rulers; where, of the distinction observed in the names and offices of Laity and Clergy, and of the antiquity of these distinctions. Book II. Of the several superior orders of the Clergy in the primitive Church. Ch. 1. Of the original of Bishops, and that they were a distinct order from Presbyters in the primitive Church. Ch. 2. Of the several titles of honour given to Bishops in the primitive Church. Ch. 3. Of the offices of Bishops, as distinct from Presbyters. Ch. 4. Of the power of Bishops over the Laity, Monks, subordinate Magistrates, and all persons within their diocese; and of their office in disposing of the revenues of the Church. Ch. 5. Of the office of Bishops, in relation to the whole Catholick Church. Ch. 6. Of the independency of Bishops, especially in the Cyprianick, and in the African Churches. Ch. 7. Of the power of Bishops in hearing and determining secular causes. Ch. 8. Of the privilege of Bishops to intercede for criminals. Ch. 9. Of some particular honours, and instances of respect, shewed to Bishops by all persons in general. Ch. 10. Of the age, and some other particular qualifications required in such as were to be ordained Bishops. Ch. 11. Of some particular laws and customs observed about the ordination of Bishops. Ch. 12. Of the rule which prohibits Bishops to be ordained in small cities. Ch. 13. Of the rule which forbids two Bishops to be ordained in one city. Ch. 14. Of the Chorepiscopi, Προσβυται, and Suffragan Bishops; and how these differed from one another. Ch. 15. Of the Interecessores and Interventores in the African Churches. Ch. 16. Of Primates or Metropolitans. Chap. 17. Of Patriarchs. Ch. 18. Of the Αυτοκέφαλοι, or Independent Bishops. Ch. 19. Of Presbyters. Ch. 20. Of Deacons. Ch. 21. Of Archdeacons. Ch. 22. Of Deaconesses. Book III. Of the inferior orders of the Clergy in the primitive Church. Ch. 1. Of the first original of the inferior orders, and the number and use of them; and how they differed from the superior orders of Bishops, Presbyters, and Deacons. Chap. 2. Of Subdeacons. Ch. 3. Of Acolythits. Ch. 4. Of Exorcists. Ch. 5. Of Leitores, or Readers. Ch. 6. Of the Ofitarii, or Door-keepers. Ch. 7. Of the Psalmistæ, or Singers. Ch. 8. Of the Copiatæ, or Fessarii. Ch. 9. Of the Parabolani. Ch. 10. Of the Catechists. Ch. 11. Of the Defensores, or Syndicks of the Church. Ch. 12. Of the Oeconomi, or Stewards and Guardians of the Church. Ch. 13. A brief account of some other inferior Officers in the Church. Book IV. Of the elections and ordinations of the Clergy, and the particular qualifications of such as were to be ordained. Ch. 1. Of the several ways of designing persons to the Ministry, in the Apostolical and primitive ages of the Church. Ch. 2. A more particular account of the ancient manner and method of elections of the Clergy. Ch. 3. Of the examination and qualifications of persons to be ordained in the primitive Church; and first of their Faith and Morals. Ch. 4. Of the qualifications of persons to be ordained, respecting their outward state and condition in the world. Ch. 5. Of the state of Digamy and Celibacy in particular; and of the laws of the Church about these in reference to the ancient Clergy. Ch. 6. Of the ordinations of the primitive Clergy, and the laws and customs generally observed therein. Ch. 7. The case of forced ordinations and re-ordinations considered. Book V. Of the privileges, immunities, and revenues of the Clergy in the primitive Church. Ch. 1. Some instances of respect which the Clergy paid mutually to one another. Ch. 2. Instances of respect shewed to the Clergy by the Civil Government; where particularly of their exemption from the cognifiance of the secular Courts in Ecclesiastical Causes. Ch. 3. Of the immunities of the Clergy in reference to Taxes and civil Offices, and other burthenfome employments in the Roman Empire. Ch. 4. Of the Revenues of the ancient Clergy. Ch. 5. Of Tithes and First fruits in particular. Ch. 6. Of the management and distribution of the Revenues of the ancient Clergy. Book VI. An account of several Laws and rules relating to the employment, life and conversation of the primitive Clergy. Ch. 1. Of the excellency of these rules in general, and the exemplariness of the Clergy in conforming to them. Ch. 2. Of Laws relating to the life and conversation of the primitive Clergy. Ch. 3. Of Laws more particularly relating to the exercise of the duties and offices of their function. Ch. 4. An account of some other Laws and rules, which were a sort of out-guards and fences to the former. Ch. 5. Some reflections on the foregoing Discourse, concluding with an Address to the Clergy of the present Church. Book VII. Of the Asceticks in the primitive Church. Ch. 1. Of the difference between the first Asceticks and Monks; and of the first original of the Monastick Life. Ch. 2. Of the several sorts of Monks, and their different ways of living in the Church. Ch. 3. An account of such ancient Laws and Rules as relate to the Monastick life, and chiefly that of the Cenobites. Ch. 4. The case and state of Virgins and Widows in the ancient Church. Book VIII. An account of the ancient Churches, their original, names, parts, utensils, consecrations, immunities, &c. Ch. 1. Of the several names and first original of Churches among Christians. Ch. 2. Of the difference between Churches in the first ages, and those that followed; and of Heathen Temples and Jewish Synagogues turned into Christian Churches. Ch. 3. Of the different forms and parts of the ancient Churches; and first of the exterior Narthex, or outward Ante-Temple. Ch. 4. Of the interior Narthex, and the parts and uses of it. Ch. 5. Of the Naos, or Nave and body of the Church, and it's parts and uses. Ch. 6. Of the Bema, or third part of the Temple, called the Altar part, or Sanctuary, and the parts and uses of it. Ch. 7. Of the Baptisteries, and other out buildings, called the Exedra of the Church. Ch. 8.

(1) Preface to Vol. I.

(2) Dr Radcliffe.

(3) Dedication to Vol. I.

more, 8vo, containing in the whole XXIII books. He discovers in that work a prodigious

Of the Donaria and Anathemata, and other ornaments of the ancient Churches. Ch. 9. Of the consecration of Churches. Ch. 10. Of the respect and reverence which the primitive Christians paid to their Churches. Ch. 11. Of the first original of Astylms, or places of Sanctuary and refuge, with the Laws relating to them in Christian Churches. Book IX. A Geographical description of the Districts of the ancient Church, or an account of it's division into Provinces, Dioceses, and Parishes; and of the first Original of these: With several Maps. Ch. 1. Of the state and division of the Roman Empire, and of the Church's conformity to that in modelling her own external polity and government. Ch. 2. A more particular account of the nature and extent of Dioceses, or Episcopal Churches, in Africa, Egypt, Arabia, Palestine, Syria, Phœnicia, and other Eastern provinces. Ch. 3. A continuation of this account of Dioceses in the Provinces of Asia Minor. Ch. 4. A continuation of the former account in the European Provinces of Thracia, Macedonia, Greece, Illyricum, &c. Ch. 5. A particular account of the seventeen Provinces of the Roman and Italic Dioceses, and of the Episcopal Dioceses contained in them. Ch. 6. Of the Dioceses in France, Spain, and the British Isles. Ch. 7. The Notitia, or Geographical description of the Bishopricks of the ancient Church, as first made by the order of Leo Sapiens in the IXth century, compared with some others. Ch. 8. Of the division of the Dioceses into Parishes, and the first original of them. The Conclusion, wherein is proposed an easy and honourable method for establishing a primitive Diocesan Episcopacy (conformable to the model of the smaller sort of ancient Dioceses) in all the Protestant Churches. With an Appendix, containing a Catalogue of the ancient Dioceses in the six African Provinces. Book X. Of the institution of the Catechumens, and the first use of the Creeds in the Church. Ch. 1. Of the several names of the Catechumens, and the solemnity that was used in admitting them to that state in the Church; also of Catechizing, and the time of their continuance in that exercise. Ch. 2. Of the several classes or degrees of Catechumens, and the gradual exercises and discipline of every order. Ch. 3. Of the original, nature, and names of the ancient Creeds of the Church. Ch. 4. A collection of several ancient forms of the Creed out of the primitive records of the Church. Ch. 5. Of the original, nature, and reasons, of that ancient discipline, of concealing the sacred mysteries of the Church from the sight and knowledge of the Catechumens. Book XI. Of the Rites and Customs observed in the administration of Baptism in the primitive Church. Ch. 1. Of the several names and appellations of Baptism in the primitive Church. Ch. 2. Of the matter of Baptism; with an account of such Hereticks as rejected and corrupted Baptism by water. Ch. 3. Of the ancient form of Baptism; and of such Hereticks as altered or corrupted it. Ch. 4. Of the subject of Baptism, or an account of what persons were antiently allowed to be baptized. Where particularly of Infant-baptism. Ch. 5. Of the Baptism of adult persons. Ch. 6. Of the time and place of Baptism. Ch. 7. Of the renunciations and professions made by all persons immediately before their Baptism. Ch. 8. Of the use of Sponsors or Sureties in Baptism. Ch. 9. Of the unction and the Sign of the Cross in Baptism. Ch. 10. Of the consecration of the water in Baptism. Ch. 11. Of the different ways of baptizing by immersion, trine immersion, and aspersion in the case of Clinick Baptism. Book XII. Of Confirmation, and other ceremonies following Baptism, before men were made partakers of the Eucharist. Ch. 1. Of the Time when, and the persons to whom Confirmation was administered. Ch. 2. Of the Minister of Confirmation. Ch. 3. Of the manner of administering Confirmation, and the ceremonies used in the celebration of it. Ch. 4. Of the remaining ceremonies of Baptism following Confirmation. Ch. 5. Of the Laws against re-baptization both in Church and State. Book XIII. General observations relating to Divine Worship in the ancient Church. Ch. 1. Some necessary remarks upon the antient names of Divine Service, which modern corruptions have rendered ambiguous. Ch. 2. That the devotions of the antient Church, were paid to every person of the Blessed Tri-unity. Ch. 3. That in the antient Church religious worship was given to no Creature, Saint, or Angel, Cross, Image, or Relick, but to God alone. Ch. 4. That antiently Divine Service was always performed in the Vulgar Tongue, understood by the people. Ch. 5. Of the original and use of Liturgies, in stated and set Forms of Prayer, in the primitive Church. Ch. 6. An Extract of the several parts of the antient Liturgy out of the genuine writings of St Chrystostom, following the order of his works. Ch. 7. Of the use of the Lord's Prayer in the Liturgy of the antient Church. Ch. 8. Of the use of habits and gesture, and other rites and ceremonies in the antient Church. Ch. 9. Of the times of their religious Assemblies, and the several parts of Divine Service performed in them. Ch. 10. The Order of their daily Morning Service. Ch. 11. The Order of their daily Evening Service. Book XIV. Of that part of Divine Service which the Antients comprized under the general name of Missa Catechumenorum, the Service of the Catechumens, or Ante-Communion Service of the Lord's Day. Ch. 1. Of the Psalmody of the antient Church. Ch. 2. A particular account of some of the most noted Hymns used in the Service of the antient Church. Ch. 3. Of the manner of reading the Scriptures in the publick Service of the Church. Ch. 4. Of Preaching, and the usages relating to it in the antient Church. Ch. 5. Of the Prayers for the Catechumens, Energumens, Competetes, or Candidates of Baptism, and the Penitents. Book XV. Of the Missa Fidelium, or Communion-Service. Ch. 1. Of the Prayers preceding the Oblation. Ch. 2. Of the Oblations of the people, and other things introductory to the consecration of the Eucharist. Ch. 3. Of the Obligation or Consecration Prayers, and the several parts of them. Ch. 4. Of Communicants, or persons who were allowed to receive this Sacrament, and the manner of receiving it. Ch. 5. A resolution of several questions relating further to the manner of communicating in the antient Church. Ch. 6. Of their Post-Communion-Service. Ch. 7. How the remains of the Eucharist were disposed of; and of the common entertainment called Agape, or Feast of Charity. Ch. 8. Of the preparation which the Antients required as necessary in Communicants, to qualify them for a worthy reception. Ch. 9. Of frequent Communion, and the times of celebrating it in the antient Church. Book XVI. Of the unity and discipline of the antient Church. Ch. 1. Of the union and communion observed among Catholics in the antient Church. Ch. 2. Of the discipline of the Church, and the various kinds of it; together with the various methods observed in the administration of it. Ch. 3. Of the objects of Ecclesiastical Censures, or the persons on whom they might be inflicted; with a general account of the crimes for which they might be inflicted. Ch. 4. A particular account of those called Great Crimes. Of transgressions of the first and second commandments. Of the principal of these, viz. Idolatry. Of the several species of Idolatry, and degrees of punishment allotted to them, according to the proportion and quality of the offences. Ch. 5. Of the practice of curious and forbidden arts, Divination, Magick, and Inchantment; and of the Laws of the Church made for the punishment of them. Ch. 6. Of apostacy to Judaism and Paganism; of Heresy and Schism; and of Sacrilege and Simony. Ch. 7. Of Sins against the third commandment, Blasphemy, profane Swearing, Perjury, and breach of Vows. Ch. 8. Of Sins against the fourth commandment, or violations of the Laws enjoining the religious observation of the Lord's Day. Ch. 9. Of great transgressions against the fifth commandment, viz. disobedience to Parents and Masters; treason and rebellion against Princes; and contempt of the Laws of the Church. Ch. 10. Of great transgressions against the sixth commandment; of murder and manslaughter, parricide, self murder, dismembering the body, exposing of infants, causing abortion, &c. Ch. 11. Of great transgressions against the seventh commandment, fornication, adultery, incest, polygamy, &c. Ch. 12. Of great transgressions of the eighth commandment, theft, oppression, fraud, &c. Ch. 13. Of great transgressions against the ninth commandment, false accusation, libelling, informing, calumny and slander, railing and reviling.

prodigious fund of reading, especially in the Fathers; as likewise a great deal of judgment, sincerity, and candour: And gives, at the same time, a specimen of what industry and a diligent application, are capable of doing (c). But, besides this difficult and voluminous undertaking, he published other books: Namely, 'The French Church's Apology for the Church of England: Or, the Objections of Dissenters against the Articles, Homilies, Liturgy, and Canons of the English Church, considered, and answered upon the Principles of the Reformed Church of France. A work chiefly extracted out of the authentick Acts and Decrees of the French National Synods, and the most approved writers of that Church [D], Lond. 1706, 8vo. And, 'A Scholastical History of the Practice of the Church, in reference to the Administration of Baptism by Laymen. Wherein an Account is given of the practice of the Primitive Church, the Practice of the Modern Greek Church, and the Practice of the Churches of the Reformation. With an Appendix, containing some Remarks on the Historical Part of Mr Lawrence's Writings touching the Invalidity of Lay-Baptism, his Preliminary Discourse of the various Opinions of the Fathers concerning Rebaptization, and invalid Baptisms, and his Discourse of Sacerdotal Powers.' Part I. Lond. 1712, 8vo. 'A Scholastical History of Lay-Baptism. Part II. With some Considerations on Dr Brett's and Mr

(c) See Preface to Vol. X.

reviling. Ch. 14. Of great transgressions against the tenth commandment, envy, covetousness, &c. Book XVII. Of the Exercise of Discipline upon the Clergy in the antient Church. Ch. 1. Of the difference of Ecclesiastical Censures inflicted on Clergymen and Laymen. Ch. 2. Of reducing the Clergy to the state and communion of Laymen, as a punishment for great offences. Ch. 3. Of the punishment, called Peregrina Communio, or reducing Clergymen to the communion of Strangers. Ch. 4. Of some other special and peculiar ways of inflicting punishment on the Clergy. Ch. 5. A particular account of the crimes for which Clergymen were liable to be punished with any of the forementioned kinds of Censure. Book XVIII. Of the several Orders of Penitents, and the method of performing publick Penance in the Church, by going through the several stages of Repentance. Ch. 1. A particular account of the several Orders of Penitents in the Church. Ch. 2. Of the Ceremonies used in admitting Penitents to do publick Penance, and the manner of performing publick Penance in the Church. Ch. 3. A particular account of the Exomologesis, or penitential Confession of the antient Church; shewing it to be a different thing from the private or auricular Confession introduced by the Church of Rome. Ch. 4. Of the great rigour, strictness, and severity, of the Discipline and Penance of the antient Church. Book XIX. Of Absolution, or the manner of re-admitting Penitents into the Communion of the Church again. Ch. 1. Of the nature of Absolution, and the several sorts of it; more particularly of such as relate to the penitential Discipline of the Church. Ch. 2. Of the circumstances, rites and customs antiently observed in the publick Absolution of Sinners. Ch. 3. Of the Minister of Ecclesiastical Discipline, and particularly of the Minister of Absolution. Two Sermons, and two Letters to the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Winchester, concerning the Nature and Necessity of the several sorts of Absolution; shewing how far that Necessity extends, and where it ceases. Book XX. Of the Festivals observed in the primitive Church. Ch. 1. Of the distinction to be made between Civil and Ecclesiastical Festivals. Ch. 2. Of the original and observation of the Lord's Day among Christians. Ch. 3. Of the observation of the Sabbath, or Saturday, as a weekly Festival. Ch. 4. Of the Festival of Christ's Nativity and Epiphany. Ch. 5. Of Easter, or the Paschal Festival. Ch. 6. Of Pentecost, or Whitsuntide. Ch. 7. Of the Festivals of the Apostles and Martyrs. Ch. 8. Of some other Festivals of a later date and lesser observation. Book XXI. Of the Fasts in use in the antient Church. Ch. 1. Of the Quadragesimal, or Lent Fast. Ch. 2. Of the Fasts of the Four Seasons; of monthly Fasts; and the original of Ember-Weeks and Rogation-Days. Ch. 3. Of the weekly Fasts of Wednesdays and Fridays, or the Stationary days of the antient Church. Book XXII. Of the Marriage-Rites observed in the antient Church. Ch. 1. A short account of the Hereticks who condemned or vilified Marriage antiently, under pretence of greater purity and perfection; and of such also as gave licence to community of Wives, and Fornication. Ch. 2. Of the just impediments of Marriage in particular cases, shewing what persons might, or might not, be lawfully joined together; and of the times and seasons when the celebration of Marriage was forbidden. Ch. 3. Of the manner of making espousals preceding Marriage in the antient Church. Ch. 4. Of the manner of celebrating marriage in the antient Church. Ch. 5. Of Divorces; how far they were allowed or disallowed by the antient Christians. Book XXIII. Of Funeral Rites, or the Custom and Manner of burying the Dead, observed in the antient Church. Ch. 1. Of Cemeteries or Burying-places; with an enquiry, how and when the custom of burying in Churches first came in. Ch. 2. Some farther observations concerning the place, and manner, and time of burying. Ch. 3. How they prepared the Body for the Funeral, and with what religious ceremonies and solemnities they interred it. Ch. 4. An account of the Laws made to secure the Bodies and Graves of the dead, from the violence of robbers and sacrilegious invaders, and buyers and sellers of relics, and their worshippers.

[D] The French Church's Apology for the Church of England. He informs us in the Preface, that what first put him upon compiling this work, and furnished him with the principal part of the materials for it, was the perusal of a book, intitled, 'Synodicum in Gallia Reformata'; or, The Acts, Decrees, and Canons of the National Councils of the Reformed Churches in France.' Published in two volumes, fol. Lond. 1692, by Mr John Quick, Minister of the Gospel (that is, a Dissenting Minister among the Presbyterians). The whole collected out of the original manuscript Acts of those Synods; being a work never before extant in any language; wherein are contained many excellent expedients for preventing and healing of schisms in the Churches, and for re-uniting the dismembered body of divided Protestants. Our author considered therefore, that if these Synods afforded any such expedients, they were likely to weigh as much with Dissenters, especially those of the Presbyterian Party, as any other arguments: Considering, 1. That they themselves have commonly made their appeals to the Foreign Churches against the Church of England; blaming her establishments and methods, and measures of Reformation; and requiring her to be reformed in Doctrine, Worship, Discipline, and Government, according to the example of the best Reformed Churches; which are the very words of the Solemn League and Covenant. 2. That in all probability they will freely own the French Church to be one of the best Reformed Churches, and let her authority be of some consideration with them. 3. That the Translator and Publisher of these Synods being (one of themselves) a professed Dissenting Minister, cannot by them be suspected to have translated any thing partially in favour of the Church of England. Mr Bingham endeavours therefore to make appear to them out of these very Synods, (which are the most publick and authentick rule of the French Church) in Book I. That the methods and measures of Reformation in the Church of England, are the same that the French Church did take, or would have taken if she could; and that our expedients for preventing and healing schisms in the Church, are no other than what are laid down and prescribed in these Synods. Book II. That our Articles and Homilies contain no other Doctrine, but what is publicly taught in the Articles and Homilies of the French Church. Book III. That the objections against our Liturgy and Rubrics, will

(d) Lawrence's; an ingenious Layman.

'Mr L——'s (d) Answers to the first Part.' Lond. 8vo [E]. To which is prefixed, 'The State of the present Controversy.' And, at the end there is 'An Appendix containing some Remarks on the Author of the Second Part of Lay-Baptism invalid.' He published likewise 'A Discourse concerning the Mercy of God to Penitent Sinners: Intended for the use of Persons troubled in mind.' Being a Sermon on Psalms ciii. 13. Printed singly at first: and reprinted among the rest of his Work, in two Volumes, fol. Lond. 1725. Notwithstanding his great learning, merit, and other excellent qualifications, he continued only Rector of Headbourne-worthy, 'till the year 1712, when he was collated to the rectory of Havant near Portsmouth, by Sir Jonathan Trelawney Bishop of Winchester, to whom he dedicated several of his books. This learned and industrious person died Aug. 17, 1723, in the 55th year of his age; and was buried in the church-yard of Headbourne-worthy. He expressed, in his Will, a dislike to any such thing as a monument over his grave; which is the reason why none is yet erected to his memory. But there was one intended, with an inscription which we shall give in the note [F]. As to his character; Though he had not the strongest constitution (e), he was a person of very great industry, and indefatigable application, as his works abundantly testify. He was at the same time a great lover of truth (f); and of so free and disinterested a temper, that 'though he loved not to enter into dispute with any men, yet he did not think any Great Names so venerable, as to be of sufficient Authority to lead others by their Dictates only, especially in Matters of Fact and History, unless they assign just Grounds and Reasons for their Assertions (g).'

(e) See his Works in folio, Vol. II.
p. 417.

(f) Ibid. p. 587,
701, &c.

(g) Ibid. p. 523.

will hold as well against the Liturgy and publick Offices that are used among them. Book IV. That our Canons require but the same things, or things equivalent to what the Canons of these Synods enjoin. In these three last Books, the Dissenters objections against the Articles and Homilies, Liturgy and Canons of the Church of England, are considered and answered from the principles and practice of the Reformed Church of France. The principal person whom he takes objections from, and answers them upon the principles and grounds of the French Church, is Mr Rich. Baxter, in one of his books, intitled, 'English Nonconformity, as under King Charles II and King James II, stated and argued,' 4to, Lond. 1689, where he has summed up their principle reasons for their Nonconformity. To these our author returns answers, either from the French Synods, or their most approved writers, as the subject requires. Towards the conclusion of his Preface, he makes this pertinent remark. — 'I cannot think the true method of preventing the dangers arising from our divisions, is to make such concessions to Dissenters, as will shake and destroy the present Constitution; but to reason them into Union upon such principles as are common to all the Churches of the Reformation.'

[E] A Scholastical History of the practice of the Church, in reference to the administration of Baptism by Laymen, &c.] His design in this work, briefly, is to shew, that although Laymen were always prohibited to baptize in ordinary cases, yet they were allowed to do it in cases extraordinary; and this extraordinary Baptism of theirs was counted valid, without any need of Rebaptization.

[F] But there was one intended, with an inscription, &c.

The Inscription is as follows.

Obstuscesce Viator!
Venerandi hic conduntur Cineres
Josephi Bingham A. M.
Nati Wakefeldiæ apud Eboracenses Collegii Universitatis apud Oxon.
quondam Socii.
Cujus multiplicem si spesces Doctrinam
Quam Scriptis prodidit,
Si exactam veteris Disciplinæ et Consuetudinum Ecclesiasticarum
Notitiam,
Cyprianicâ ætate vel etiam Ignatianâ
Moribus quoque primævis
Vixisse agnoscas,
Nisi quod non esset Episcopus.
At væ Sæculo meritum immemori
Et ingrato!
Cum qui Patriarchatum in Ecclesiâ
Meruit,
Nonnisi Headbourn-Worth & Havanti in Agro Hanton.
Parochus, obiit
Decimo Septimo die Aug.
Anno { Christi 1723.
 } Ætatis 55.

(a) Winstanley's Lives of the English Poets, p.
180.

(b) Wood's Ath.
Oxon. Vol. II.
col. 639.

(c) A reasonable Argument to per-swade all Grand Juries to petition for a new Parliament. London,
1677, 4to. p. 19.

(d) Wood's Ath.
Oxon. Vol. II.
col. 639.

(e) Wood's Fæti
Oxon. Vol. I.
col. 282.

BIRKENHEAD or BERKENHEAD (Sir JOHN) a very famous political author in the XVIIth century (a). He was the son of Richard Birkenhead, of Northwych in the county of Chester, an honest Sadler (b), and if some authors may deserve credit, he kept also a little alehouse (c). Our author was born, as the university registers shew, about the year 1615, and having received some tincture of learning in the common grammar schools, came to Oxford, and was entered, in 1632, a Servitor of Oriel-college, under the tuition of the learned Dr Humphrey Lloyd, afterwards Bishop of Bangor (d), by whom being recommended to Dr William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, he became his Amanuensis, and in that capacity discovered so great parts and diligence, that the Archbishop, by his diploma, created him Master of Arts in 1639, and the year following, by letter commendatory, from the same great Prelate, he was chosen Probationer-Fellow of All-Souls-college in the same university (e). This preference brought him to reside constantly in Oxford; and on King Charles I. making that city his head quarters, during the Civil War, our author was made choice of to write a kind of Journal, in defence or support of the Royal Cause, by which he gained great reputation (f) [A]. His labours in this way being equally useful and acceptable to the Royalists,

[A] By which he gained great reputation.] In those days, the Press being entirely at liberty on both sides, the war was carried on from thence with the greatest vigour. The work, under the care of Mr Birkenhead, was intitled, I. 'Mercurius Aulicus; communicating the intelligence and affairs of the Court to the rest of the kingdom.' It was printed weekly in one sheet, and sometimes more, in quarto; and was

(f) Grey's Examination of Neal's History of the Puritans, Vol.
II and III, in a multitude of places.

Royalists, his Majesty was pleased to recommend him to be chosen Reader in Moral Philosophy, which was accordingly done; and he enjoyed this employment, though with very small profit, 'till 1648, when he was expelled by the Parliament Visitors (g). He retired afterwards to London, where adhering steadily to his principles, he acquired, amongst those of his own sentiments, the title of the Loyal Poet, and suffered, from such as had then the power in their hands, several imprisonments, which served only to sharpen his spleen, without abating his courage. He published, while he thus lived in obscurity, and, as Wood says, by his wits (b), some very tart performances, which were then very highly relished, and are still admired by the curious. These were like his former productions, levelled against the Republican grandees, and were all written with the same vindictive poignancy that was then fashionable [B]. Upon the Restoration of King

(g) List of the reverend and worthy Persons who suffered for their loyalty in the University of Oxford.

(b) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 612. Winstanley's Lives of the English Poets, pag. 180.

was chiefly calculated to raise the reputation of the King's friends and commanders, and run down and ridicule those who sided with the Parliament. They came out regularly, from the beginning of 1642 to the latter end of 1645, and afterwards occasionally. When Mr Birkenhead was otherwise engaged, Dr Peter Heylyn supplied his place, but was not thought so capable of that kind of writing, that is to say, he did not excel in that sort of low, popular wit, which is necessary to render such kind of pieces acceptable to the publick, the only method of making them answer their intention (1). The Parliament thought fit to oppose this Court Journal by another of their side of the question, under the title of Mercurius Britannicus, written by one Marchmont Needham, to whom the Royalists gave the name of fool-moutbed Needham; who, finding himself somewhat unequal to the Oxford writer, thought fit to ascribe the Mercurius Aulicus to several persons, that his deficiency might do the less prejudice to his party (2). 'The penning, says he, of these Mercurii Aulici was the act of many, viz. Birkenhead the Scribe, Secretary Nicholas the Informer, and George Digby the Contriver.' But to make the inequality appear still greater, he (3) insinuated farther, that a weekly assessment of wit was imposed on every college in the University, for the better furnishing this performance. There has been a very strange mistake committed by a late writer upon this subject. He had heard that this gentleman was a Poet, and from thence took it for granted, that whatever he wrote must be in verse; this induced him to give the following character, which shews how necessary it is to supply the defects of such collections by a work of this nature (4). 'The steadfast adherence, says he, of this gentleman to the Royal Cause, procured him the title of the Loyal Poet; and though the reward of his loyalty was the most severe imprisonment, yet his principles were immovable in all changes of fortune. Among his other pieces, the poem, intitled Mercurius Aulicus, will do him immortal honour, which a writer of that time thus justly celebrates:

' Whilst laurel sprigs another's head shall crown,
' Thou the whole grove may't challenge as thy own.

' This worthy patriot lived to see the Restoration, and had not only that happiness, but likewise to be a spectator of the deserved execution of some of the rebels, who had so basely conspired to take away his life, and whom he had so truly delineated in his admirable poem above-mentioned.'

[B] All written with the same vindictive poignancy, that was then fashionable. It would be a very difficult thing to give a correct catalogue of this gentleman's writings; but, however, it may not be amiss to mention some of the most considerable, the rather, because at present remarkably scarce; and such as have mentioned them don't always speak of them with tolerable accuracy or exactness.

II. The Assembly-man. This was written by our author in the year 1647, but was printed, as Mr Wood tells us, in 1662-3. It was printed again in 1681-2; and the reader may form a tolerable notion of it from the subsequent quotation, in which he gives us an account, after his manner, of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, which was, properly speaking, the Parliament's Convocation (5).

' This Assembly at first was a full century, which should be reckoned, as the Scholiast's Hecatomb, by their feet, not heads; or count them by scores, for in things without heads sixscore go to an hundred. They would be a new Septuagint; the old translated scriptures out of Hebrew into Greek, these turn them into ' four Stillings a day. And these Assemblers were begot

' in one day, as Hercules's fifty bastards all in one night.
' Their first list was sprinkled with some names of honour (Dr Sanderfon, Dr Morley, Dr Hammond, &c.); but these were Divines too worthy to mix with such scandalous Ministers, and would not assemble without the Royal Call. Nay, the first list had one Archbishop, and a Bishop and an half (for Bishop Browning was then but elect): But now their assembly (as Philosophers think the world) consists of atoms, petty small Levites, whose parts are not perceptible. And yet these inferior postern teachers have intoxicated England (for a man sometimes grows drunk by a glister). When they all meet they shew beasts in Affrick, by coupling together monsters. Mr Selden visits them (as Persians use) to see wild asses fight. When the Commons have tired him by their new Law, these Brethren refresh him by their mad Gospel. They lately were gravelled 'twixt Jerusalem and Jericho: They knew not the distance 'twixt those two places; one cried twenty miles, another ten. 'Twas concluded seven, for this reason, that fish was brought from Jericho to Jerusalem market. Mr Selden smiled, and said, perhaps the fish was salt-fish, and so stopped their mouths. Earl Philip goes thither to hear them spend; when he heard them tofs their National, Provincial, Classical, Congregational, he swore damnablely that a pack of good dogs made better musick.'

III. 'News from Pembroke and Montgomery; or, Oxford Manchester'd, &c. 1648; consisting of a single sheet in quarto.' This is a speech which our author was pleased to put into the mouth of Philip Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, upon his being sent by the Parliament to new model the university of Oxford, in the same manner that Edward Earl of Manchester had treated Cambridge, when he visited it as Chancellor. This speech is supposed to have been delivered by the Earl in the Convocation-house at Oxon, on the 12th of April, 1648, and is beyond question a very humorous performance, in which that Peer's wild way of talking is happily imitated, and the purpose our author meant to serve, as effectually prosecuted as in that satyrical method could be done.

IV. 'Paul's Church-yard; Libri Theologici, Politici, Historici, nundinis Paulinis (una cum templo) profant venales, &c. printed in three sheets, quarto 1649.' These sheets were published separately, as if they had been parts of one general catalogue. They consisted of the feigned titles of books, and of Acts of Parliament, with several queries upon the times. They were written with great wit and spirit (6), allowing for the taste of that age, had a very quick sale, and contributed not a little to make those laughed at for the use of their power, who were otherwise very terrible from their possession of it.

He wrote besides several other small pieces in the same way, particularly The four-legged Quaker, a ballad, to the tune of the Dog and Elder's Maid. A New Ballad of a famous German Prince, without date. Some other pamphlets published in those times, seem from their stile and manner to be of his composition, though never owned by him either at the time they were published, or after the Restoration, when it was safer as well as more honourable. Perhaps he had private reasons for not owning them, as they were most of them personal satires against men, some of whom, having changed their principles, were not without power in the reign of King Charles II.

Our author has also several copies of verses and translations extant, to which are vocal compositions set by Mr Henry Lawes; as particularly Anacreon's Ode, called the Lute, translated from the Greek, and to be sung

(6) Grey's Examination of Neal's History of the Puritans, Vol. III. p. 98, 170, 261, &c.

(1) Life of Dr Heylyn. Wood's Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 639. Winstanley's Lives of English Poets, p. 13.

(2) Mercur. Brit. tan. No. xvi.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Jacob's Lives and Characters of English Poets, Vol. I. p. 8, 9, all, but the blunder of making Mercurius Aulicus a Poem, being stolen from the Account given by Winstanley.

(5) Assembly-Man, p. 1.

(i) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. II. col. 144.

(k) Gibson's Cod. Jur. Vol. 1. p. 145. Kennet's Register, p. 620.

(l) History of the Restoration, p. 195.

(m) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 639.

(n) Sprat's Hist. of the Royal Society, p. 431.

(o) A seasonable Argument, &c. ubi supra.

(p) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 639, 640, 641.

(q) Ibid. ubi supra.

King Charles II, our ingenious author came to be as eminently distinguished as his great merit deserved. He was created, April 6, 1661, on the King's letters sent for that purpose, Doctor of the Civil Law by the University of Oxford (i), and, in that quality, was one of the eminent Civilians consulted by the Convocation on the question, Whether Bishops ought to be present in capital cases? and with the rest, Feb. 2, 1661-2, gave it under his hand, they ought and might (k). He was, about the same time, elected a Burgess, to serve in Parliament for Wilton in the county of Wilts, and continuing his services to his Master, was by him promoted, on the first vacancy, to some office at Court, which he quitted afterwards, and became Master in the Faculty Office (l). He was knighted November 14, 1662, and upon Sir Richard Fanshew's going with a publick character to the Court of Madrid, Sir John Birkenhead succeeded him as Master of Requests (m). These were the rewards of his wit and loyalty; but it may not be amiss to mention another evidence of his good sense and learning, which is his being elected a Member of the Royal Society (n), an honour done to none who were not well known in the Republick of Letters, as men capable of promoting the truly noble designs of that most learned and famous Body. He lived afterwards in credit and esteem with witty and learned men, and received various favours from the Court, in consideration of the past, and to instigate him to other services (o); which, however, drew upon him some very severe attacks from those who opposed the Court, and hated all who favoured it. Anthony Wood has not only preserved some of their coarsest imputations, in what he is pleased to say of our author, but is also disposed to throw some unkind insinuations himself to hurt his reputation (p); but this will probably have the less effect, since his memory has been transmitted with honour to posterity by others (q) [C]. He died in Westminster, fung by a Base alone; and an Anniversary on the Nuptials of John Earl of Bridgewater, 22 July, 1652. He wrote likewise a poem on his staying in London, after the Act of banishment for Cavaliers; and another called the Folt, made upon Cromwell the Protector's being thrown out of his coach-box in Hyde-Park.

He published Mr Robert Waring's (7) Effigies Amoris sive quid sit Amor efflagitanti responsum. London, 1649, in 12mo, from the original at the author's desire, who was willing to be concealed. The third edition was published after the Restoration by William Griffith of Oxford, with an epistle before it, written by him to Sir John Birkenhead; wherein he gives the character of that gentleman as well as of the author. This was the same piece afterwards translated into English by the famous Mr Norris of Bemerton (8), and published under the title of The Picture of LOVE unveiled.

We meet also with several copies of verses written by this gentleman, and prefixed to the works of the most eminent wits and greatest Poets of his time; and they are such as shew he was a person who excelled in that way himself, as well as one who admired the good sense of other men. The following lines are from a poem of his prefixed to the works of Beaumont and Fletcher, in which he speaks thus of the death of the former.

— But as when fate one eye deprives,
The other strives to double that survives:
So Beaumont died, yet left in legacy
His rules and standard wit (Fletcher) to thee.
Still the same planet, though not fill'd so soon,
A two-horn'd crescent then, now one full moon;
Joint love before, now honour doth provoke;
So the twin-giants forcing a huge oak,
One slipp'd his footing, th' other fees him fall,
Grasp'd the whole tree, and single held up all, &c.

Of Beaumont's performances he gave this commendation.

I grieve not now that old Menander's vein
Is ruin'd to survive in thee again:
Such in his time was he, of the same piece,
The smooth, even natural wit, and love of Greece;
Whose few sententious fragments shew more worth,
Than all the Poets Athens e'er brought forth.

But his Latin lines under Fletcher's picture are justly considered as doing him as much honour as any that ever fell from his pen, and shall therefore be here preserved.

Felicitis ævi, ac Præfulis natus; comes Beaumontio; sic quippe Parnassus, Biceps;
FLETCHERUS unam in pyramida furcas agens.
Struxit chorum plus simplicem vates duplex;
Plus duplicem folus: nec ullum transtulit;
Nec transferendus: Dramatum æterni sales,
Anglo theatro, orbi, sibi, superstites.
FLETCHERE, facies absque vultu pingitur;
Quantus! vel umbram circuit nemo tuam.

[C] Has been transmitted with honour to posterity by others.] It is not easy to conceive why Mr Wood, who is otherwise ready enough to bestow praises upon men of this gentleman's principles, should be notwithstanding inclined to treat him very harshly, and with great disrespect. In speaking of his conduct, after he was driven from Oxford to London, he makes use of the following terms (9). He lived by his wits in helping young gentlemen out at dead lifts, and making Poems, Songs, and Epistles on and to their respective mistresses; as also in translating and writing several little things, and other petite employments. He afterwards cites more gross abuse than his own, from a pamphlet written with an avowed design of abusing every body that is mentioned in it; and, not satisfied with this, he has also written a Comment upon this abuse in the following terms. 'The truth is, had he not been given to so much bantering, which is now taken up by vain and idle people, he might have passed for a good wit. And had he also expressed himself grateful and respectful to those who had been his benefactors in the time of his necessity, which he did not, but rather slighted them (shewing thereby the baseness of his spirit), he might have passed for a friend and a loving companion.' One would imagine from hence, that Mr Wood must have been acquainted with these facts of his own knowledge; and yet in his life written by himself, and in which abundance of little circumstances relating to almost every body that he knew are set down, there is not one word of our author, which induces me to believe, that he took this upon trust from papers that were sent him; for I find in this life, as in most others, he sets down many things as his own opinion in the words of other persons, without taking the least notice of those from whom he transcribed. But men of as great reputation as Mr Wood, and who had an opportunity of knowing Sir John Birkenhead to the full as well as he, mention him in very different terms, and as a person of quite another character. The celebrated Mr Dryden calls him his learned and worthy friend (10). He is mentioned with great respect by Langbaine in his Account of English dramatick Poets (11). And another author, who has treated upon the same subject, excuses his giving us but a very short

(9) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 639, 640.

(10) Defence of an Essay upon Dramatick Poetry, prefixed to The Indian Emperor.

(11) Account of English Dramatick Poets, pag. 206.

account

Westminster, December 4, 1679, and was interred at St Martin's in the Fields (g), leaving his executors, Sir Richard Mafon and Sir Muddiford Bamfton, a large and curious collection of pamphlets on all subjects. (g) Obituarium; by J. Beauchamp; MS. p. 195.

(12) Winstanley's Lives of English Poets, p. 181.

account of his performances, by saying, that (12) as for his learned writings, those who were ignorant of them, must plead ignorance both to wit and learning. There might be much more said upon this subject, but that we are not at all inclined to tire the reader with a tedious train of laboured commendations. It is enough if we have set this life in a clearer light than that in which it has hitherto stood, and vindicated the author's merit from the prejudices of a peevish writer, or of one who willingly employed his pen in transcribing the effects of other people's malice. E

BLACKALL (OFFSPRING) (a), Bishop of Exeter at the beginning of the present century, was born in London in the year 1654, and was educated at Katharine-Hall in the university of Cambridge. In 1690, he was promoted to the living of St Mary Aldermanbury in London. In 1695, he was chosen Lecturer of St Olave in the Old Jewry; which lectureship he resigned, in 1698, for that of St Dunstan's in the West. He was likewise one of King William's Chaplains in Ordinary; though it is said, he had refused for two years to take the oaths to King William and Queen Mary [A]; In 1699, he animadverted upon Mr Toland for maintaining, that King Charles I. was not author of the Icon Basilike [B]. In 1700, he preached a course of Sermons at Mr

(a) The particulars of the text of this article, excepting what relates to the Bishop's writings, are extracted from the authors of the General Dictionary, to whom they were communicated by his widow, &c.

[A] It is said, he had refused for two years to take the oaths to King William and Queen Mary. This is asserted in a pamphlet published in 1705, intitled, Dr Blackall's Offspring.

Aut pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo. Juv.

London, printed for the use of the Vestry of St Dunstan's in the West. It was occasioned by a Sermon of the Doctor's on Proverbs xxiv 21. intitled, The Subjects Duty, preached at the parish-church of St Dunstan's in the West, Tuesday, March the 8th, being the anniversary of her Majesty's happy accession. The pamphlet pretends, that the principles advanced in the Sermon seem altogether irreconcilable to a gentleman's character, who made a keck in a late reign at the oath of allegiance to the people's election; and calls upon the Doctor to reconcile his sticking out two years against taking the oath of allegiance to the late King and Queen, with his reasons of compliance afterwards (1).

(1) Page 3, 4, 5.

[B] He animadverted upon Mr Toland for maintaining, that King Charles I. was not author of the Icon Basilike. That author, in his Life of Milton, having stated the proofs, that Dr Gauden, afterwards Bishop of Exeter, was the true author of the book in question, makes the following reflection. 'When I seriously consider how all this happened among ourselves, within the compass of forty years, in a time of great learning and politeness, when both parties so narrowly watched over one another's actions, and what a great revolution in civil and religious affairs was partly occasioned by the credit of that book, I cease to wonder any longer how so many supposititious pieces under the name of Christ, his Apostles, and other great persons, should be published and approved in the primitive times, when it was of so much importance to have them believed; when the cheats were too many on all sides for them to reproach one another, which yet they often did; when commerce was not near so general as now, and the whole earth entirely overspread with the darkness of superstition. I doubt rather the spurioufness of several more such books is yet undiscovered, through the remoteness of those ages, the death of the persons concerned, and the decay of other monuments, which might give us true information.' This observation gave offence to many; and, among the rest, Mr Blackall, in a Sermon preached on the 30th of January before the House of Commons, upon John ix. 3. particularly took notice of it in these words. We may cease to wonder, that he should have the boldness, without proof, and against proof, to deny the authority of this book, who is such an Infidel as to doubt, and is shameless and impudent enough, even in print, and in a Christian country, publicly to affront our Holy Religion, by declaring his doubts, that several pieces under the name of Christ and his Apostles (he must mean those now received by the Christian Church, for I know of no other) are supposititious, though, through the remoteness of those ages, the death of the persons concerned, and the decay of other monuments, which might give us true information, the spurioufness thereof is yet undiscovered.

VOL. II. No. 68.

Mr Toland, in his Amyntor (2), endeavoured to vindicate himself by shewing, that, in the passage animadverted upon, his meaning was, that a great many spurious books were early fathered upon Christ, his Apostles, and other great names, part whereof are still acknowledged to be genuine, and the rest to be forged; in neither of which assertions, says he, I could be justly supposed to mean any books of the New Testament. This occasioned our author to publish a little pamphlet in 12mo, intitled, Mr Blackall's Reasons for not replying to a book lately published, intitled, Amyntor; in a Letter to a Friend, April 21, 1699. And the principal reason assigned is, because Mr Toland, in explaining his meaning, had agreed with him, that the books of the New Testament are genuine; which was all he (Mr Blackall) ever meant to contend for (3). In this piece Mr Blackall mentions an objection made by Mr Toland, in the conclusion of his Amyntor, against the observation of the 30th of January, and the Sermons which have been preached on that day; a subject (he says) more proper to be debated in Parliament, than by private persons (4). But he speaks directly to another remark of the same author's, who pretended, that several persons took offence at his calling King Charles I. in that Sermon, the best of Kings, and the best of men, and especially, because he had not excepted his (then) present Majesty. He might have added, says our author (5), that it was a greater fault in me, than it would have been in another, because I write myself Chaplain to his Majesty. But the author, I think, does not say, he himself was offended at this expression; and I suppose those several (if indeed there were any that upon this account only were angry at it) were only such as not only have not been conversant in antient authors, but are not yet so far read even in their Testament, as to the beginning of St Luke's Gospel, where, verse 3, he styles Theophilus most excellent, by which, I suppose, few, even of these beginners to read, do think that St Luke meant to make a comparison between him and other excellent persons, and much less to prefer Theophilus before all other men, the holy Apostles of our Lord not excepted. And therefore this being so manifestly an invidious cavil, I think, needs no answer, especially when, in the Sermon itself, though I commend King Charles I. for his virtues, I did allow, that he had faults. But the faults that were then, and have been since charged upon him, being only such as he might be, and I believe was, led into by misinformation, and a mistake of the extent of his power and prerogative, I said, they were only such as were consistent with integrity of mind; and such faults as these can hardly, I think, be called Vices and Immoralities. As to the reflections (adds Mr Blackall) which he has almost in every page made upon me, particularly as to the meanness of my parts, and my great want of learning, I value them not. Let the world believe of me as it pleases: or if I was minded to make any answer to these parts of his book, it should be only this: That my natural parts are such as God was pleased to give me, to which I can no more add, than to my stature. How-

(1) Published in 1699; p. 15.

(3) Dr Blackall's Reasons, &c. p. 10.

(4) Ibid. p. 16.

(5) Ibid. p. 17.

Mr Boyle's Lecture in the cathedral church of St Paul's. He was consecrated Bishop of Exeter the 8th of February, 1707. In 1709, he was engaged in a controversy with Mr Hoadly [C], the present Bishop of Winchester (b), concerning the institution of Civil Government, and the measures of submission. This worthy Prelate died at Exeter, the 29th of November, 1716, and was buried in the cathedral there. His Sermons [D] were collected and published together, in two volumes in folio, Lond. 1723. Sir William Dawes, late Archbishop of York, gives (c) our author a most excellent character [E].

(b) In his Preface to Bishop Blackall's Sermons.

ever, such as they are, I am contented with them, and thankful for them: And that my learning is as much, as by moderate study with such parts I have been able to attain. And to this perhaps I should subjoin a prayer, in which I make no doubt J. T. (*) would think himself included (as well as he is thought by some to be in the prayer for Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Hereticks), viz. That they, who have better parts and more learning, may use and improve them to the glory of him that gave them, and do more good in the world than I am able to do.

(*) J. Toland.

[C] He was engaged in a controversy with Mr Hoadly. It was occasioned by his Sermon upon Rom. xiii. 3, 4. intitled, The Divine Institution of Magistracy, and the gracious design of it's institution, preached before the Queen at St James's on Tuesday, March 8, 1708, being the anniversary of her Majesty's happy accession to the throne, and published by her Majesty's special command. The next year, 1709, Mr Hoadly animadverted upon the Bishop's Sermon, in a piece, intitled, Some Considerations humbly offered to the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Exeter, occasioned by his Lordship's Sermon before her Majesty, March 8, 1708 (6). Upon which the Bishop published An Answer to Mr Hoadly's Letter, dated from Bath, May the 10th, 1709. Mr Hoadly endeavoured to vindicate himself in An Humble Reply to the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Exeter's Answer; in which the Considerations offered to his Lordship are vindicated, and an Apology is added for defending the foundation of the present Government. London, 1709, in 8vo. For the subject matter of this controversy, the reader is referred to the pieces themselves. It need only be observed here, that Bishop Blackall defends the High-Church, Tory, principles (as they are usually called), of the Divine Institution of Magistracy, and unlimited Passive Obedience and Non-resistance; which Mr Hoadly opposes. There were several pamphlets wrote on the side of the Bishop against Mr Hoadly; particularly one, intitled, The best Answer that ever was made, and to which no Answer will be made; supposed to be written by Mr Lesley, a Nonjuring Clergyman, and which Mr Hoadly animadverted upon in the Postscript to his Humble Reply.

(6) It is extant in Mr Hoadly's Tracts, p. 307, Lond. 1715, 8vo.

(7) In his Dissertation on reading the Classics, &c. Lond. 1730, in 12mo, p. 138.

[D] His Sermons.] Dr Felton, speaking of the celebrated authors in Divinity (7), says, 'Bishop Fleetwood's softness, and Bishop Blackall's plainness, are their characters: excellent writers both!' And Sir William Dawes, archbishop of York, in his Preface to these Sermons, tells us, it might seem abundantly sufficient to recommend them to the world, only to assure it, that they are indeed the Sermons of our author, whose constant way of preaching was well known in the city of London, to have been so excellent, easy, clear, judicious, substantial, pious, affecting, and upon all accounts truly useful and edifying, that he had universally acquired the reputation of being one of the best preachers, which the last century, above all others fruitful of good ones, had bred: That they are a complete set of Discourses upon one of the noblest and most important subjects of our Holy Religion, viz. a System of Christian Morality, according to it's utmost improvement and perfection, delivered by our Lord himself in his Sermon on the Mount.

[E] Sir William — gives our author a most excellent character.] Having told us, that his Sermons contain a complete System of Christian Morality (8), he adds, 'The author was, by his happy temper of mind, and truly Christian conversation of life, peculiarly fitted to treat well on this subject; and was indeed himself all that he preached, and had lived over every rule of this divine Philosophy, before he presumed to teach it to others; and by so doing he had feelingly and experimentally learned it's reasonableness, usefulness, necessity, practicableness, and true way of practising it, and it's conduciveness to attain that blessed state, which it proposed and promised to mankind.' I, continues the Archbishop, who had the happiness of a long and intimate friendship with him, do sincerely declare, that, in my whole conversation, I never met with a more perfect pattern of a true Christian life in all it's parts, than in him; so much primitive simplicity and integrity; such constant evenness of mind, and uniform conduct of behaviour; such unaffected, and yet most ardent piety towards God; such orthodox, and steadfast faith in Christ; such disinterested and fervent charity to all mankind; such profound modesty, humility, and sobriety; such an equal mixture of meekness and courage, of cheerfulness and gravity, of pleasing and profiting all he conversed with; such an exact discharge of all the relative duties; and, in one word, such an indifferency to this lower world, and the things of it; and such an entire affection and joyous hope and expectation of the things which are above; as are rarely to be found altogether even in very good Christians.

(8) See the preceding Remarks.

T

(a) See the Genealogy of this family in Ashmole's Berkshire, Vol. III. p. 329.

(b) Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria, Vol. I. p. 43—48.

BLAGRAVE (JOHN) a very eminent English Mathematician, who flourished in the XVIIth and XVIIIth centuries. He descended from an antient and honourable family in Berkshire, and was second son to John Blagrave, of Bulmarsh-Court, near the town of Sunning in that county, by Anne, daughter of Sir Anthony Hungerford, of Down-Ampney in Gloucestershire, Knight, but when born is uncertain (a). His family having been long settled near Reading, and having a good estate in that neighbourhood, where it still flourishes (b) [A], he was bred to the first rudiments of learning in the school

(1) See the Genealogy of this family in Ashmole's Berkshire, Vol. III. p. 329.

(2) From private information.

[A] A good estate in that neighbourhood, where it still flourishes.] This family, according to a very antient pedigree, seems to have been originally from Staffordshire; at least Ralph Blagrave was of that county, and removed from thence into Berkshire, where he settled at Bulmarsh, or, as it written in some authors, Bulnashe; but the time is not very certain (1). He had two sons, Richard and Robert; the latter fixed in London, and married Anne, the daughter of Mr Pyke of Surrey, by whom he had John Blagrave; to whom, leaving a considerable estate, he also thought fit to follow the eldest branch of his family, and to settle near Reading (2). This gentleman married Anne, daughter to Sir Anthony Hungerford, by whom he had four sons and one daughter. The name of the eldest son was Anthony; of the second, John, of whom we are now speaking; of the third, Edward; of the fourth, Alexander; and the daughter's name was Dorothy (3). Our author's eldest brother, Anthony, was High-Sheriff of Berkshire in the second year of King James I. (4), and had served as Burgeses for Reading in the last Parliament of Queen Elizabeth (5). I cannot precisely say in what degree of relation Sir John Blagrave stood to our author, who was Sheriff of Berkshire in the 22d of King James I. (6), and who, I believe, was a Lawyer, but it is very probable he was very nearly allied to him. The family have continued ever since in that neighbourhood, and one of the Representatives of the Borough of Reading has been of this family in every reign down to the present.

(3) See the Genealogy above referred to.

(4) Fuller's Worthies, Berkshire, p. 110.

(5) Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria, Vol. I. p. 47.

(6) Fuller's Worthies, ubi supra.

[B] Their

school there, and afterwards removed to St John's-college in Oxford, then very lately founded by his countryman Sir Thomas White (c). It does not appear that he was so solicitous about the fame of learning, as about the thing itself; for having acquired this, he soon quitted the University, without so much as taking a degree, and retired to his own patrimonial seat, at South-cote-Lodge within the Parish of St Mary at Reading, where he enjoyed a learned privacy, but not inglorious ease (d). His bent was towards the Mathematicks, which he studied with much assiduity while at Oxford, and for the sake of studying which without interruption, he addicted himself to a retired life (e). But in doing this he had a due regard for the publick, and employed himself in compiling such laborious and useful works, as might serve to render speculative Mathematicks accurate, and practical parts of them easy (f). As these are things which usually require the whole man, and are not to be accomplished without strict and constant application; so our author, being conscious of his genius for such enquiries, and desirous of assisting others to the utmost of his power, spent several years in this way, and finished some large, learned, and instructive volumes, for the times in which they were wrote, and such as were justly admired and commended by posterity (g). Their titles may be seen in the notes, with some account of them [B]. He was also a person of much virtue; candour, and beneficence in private life. Having a very sincere affection for his family; and foreseeing it would be numerous, though he thought proper not to enter into the married state, he took provident care of them, as far as was in his power (h). His father had bestowed upon him the lease of the lands of Southcote for ninety-nine years, commencing in 1591, and he left all the posterity of his three brothers the sum of fifty pounds each, payable at the age of twenty-six, and he calculated this donation so well, that very near fourcore of his nephews, and their descendants, were the better for his legacy (i), which was always regularly paid. Besides this provision for futurity, he was very liberal towards those in his life-time with whom he was acquainted. His tenderness for his relations did not, however, exceed his charity for the poor, and as he provided for his kindred to the utmost verge of his lease-hold estate, so he settled certain lands he had at Swallowfield in the same county, for the provision of the poor for ever; and this too was a charity which shewed the prudence as well as piety of the donor (k) [C]. We have no farther particulars of this gentleman's life worth mentioning, only it may not be amiss to observe, he is omitted by Fuller in his Worthies, though a more considerable and remarkable person than many he has mentioned. Our author deceased at his own house near Reading, August 9, 1611, and lies interred near his mother in the church of St Lawrence there, with a fine monument to his memory, and an inscription (l) which is not exactly copied by Anthony Wood, and therefore is preserved in the (c) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 370.

(d) See his Character in Ashmole's Berkshire, Vol. III. p. 371.

(e) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 370.

(f) See the titles of his books in no. c [B].

(g) See the monumental Inscription in note [D].

(h) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 370.

(i) Ashmole's Berkshire, Vol. III. p. 372.

(k) See the Inscription in note [D].

(l) Ashmole's Berkshire, Vol. II. p. 359.

notes

[B] Their titles may be seen in the notes, with some account of them.] The worthy end which this learned and ingenious gentleman proposed in all his writings, was to render those sciences familiar to his countrymen, which hitherto had been but in a few hands, and were rather superstitiously admired than thoroughly understood. That he might effect this the more easily, he made it his business to shew the general usefulness of such studies, and to convince his readers, that instead of being amusements only fit for scholars and speculative persons, they were of general advantage, and in truth of indispensable necessity for providing the conveniencies of common life. He likewise shewed, that they were very far from being so hard and difficult to be acquired, or so much exalted above ordinary understandings, as was commonly imagined; and that moderate abilities, and a reasonable share of application, would enable men to conquer those difficulties which vulgar prejudices had represented as insuperable. Amongst these practical treatises were these that follow.

I. A Mathematical Jewel, shewing the making and most excellent use of an instrument so called; the use of which Jewel is so abundant, that it leadeth the direct path-way through the whole art of Astronomy, Cosmography, Geography, &c. London, 1585, fol.

II. Of the making and use of the Familiar Staff; so called, for that it may be made useful and familiarly to walk with, as for that it performeth the Geometrical mensuration of all Altitudes. London, 1590, 4to.

III. Astrolabium Uranicum generale; A necessary and pleasant solace and recreation for Navigators in their long journeying; containing the use of an instrument, or Astrolabe, &c. London, 1596, in quarto.

IV. The Art of Dialing, in two parts. London, 1609, in 4to. Mr Wood seems to intimate, that he also wrote several other things (7), which may very possibly be true; but I have never met with any of them, or so much as their titles; and considering he did not survive above two years after publishing the book last mentioned, the fact may admit of some doubt, unless the reader should be of opinion, that what is contained in the succeeding note [D], amounts to an argument of the truth of Mr Wood's conjecture, since the Instruments therein mentioned, might very well refer to other works than those of which we have set down the titles.

[C] A charity which shewed the prudence as well as piety of the donor.] As he was born in, and had spent most of his days near, the town of Reading in Berks, he was very desirous of leaving therein some lasting monuments of his beneficent disposition, which might have equal reference to each of the three parishes in their town, viz. St Mary's, supposed to be built where the nunnery stood in the Saxon times: St Lawrence, which stands beyond the river Kennet; and that of St Giles, at the farthest end of the town (8). The legacies he bequeathed were equally calculated for the benefit of those who were to receive them, and of the inhabitants of that antient Borough in general. The best account we have, is that preserved by Mr Ashmole, in the following words (9).

You are to note, that he doth devise that each Church-warden should send on Good-Friday, one virtuous maid that has lived five years with her master. All three maids appear at the town-hall before the Mayor and Aldermen, and cast dice. She that throws most has ten pounds put in a purse, and she is to be attended with the other two that lost the throw. The next year come again the two maids, and one more added to them. He orders in his Will, that each maid should have three throws before she loses it; and if she has no luck in the three years, he orders that still new faces may come and be presented. On the same Good-Friday he gives eighty widows money to attend, and orders ten shillings for a good sermon; and so he wishes well to all his countrymen. It is lucky money, for I never heard but the maid that had the ten pounds suddenly had a good husband.

(8) Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria, Vol. I. p. 43.

(9) Ashmole's Berkshire, Vol. III. p. 372.

[D] The

(7) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 370.

notes [D]. There was a learned Lawycr of both our author's names, viz. Sir John Blaggrave, who read upon the Statute of 32 Hen. VIII. cap. x. concerning Jointures, which work was published, and very probably he was of the same family (m). There was also onc Joseph Blaggrave, who published the Astrological Practise of Physick (n), but him I take to have been beholden to our author's books for his knowledge, though not for his opinions. I cannot tell whether we ought to attribute to him, or to some other person of his name, a Discourse upon the same subject, which was never printed, but had been in the hands of some very learned persons, who have borrowed from it largely in their writings on this topick; and I mention it the rather, because, if it be still in being, the possessor may be encouraged to make it publick, as it contains abundance of very curious, and some very useful remarks on things which were formerly the objects of superstition, as they are now of contempt [E].

(m) Hyde's Catalogue of Books printed from 1636 to 1673, by B. C.

(n) Ibid. Vol. II. p. 359.

[D] Therefore is preserved in the notes. The following account is taken from the indefatigable Elias Ashmole, Esq; who had it from his own inspection of the monuments and inscriptions in the parish-church of St Lawrence in Reading; and from the circumstances before related, the whole is rendered perfectly clear and perspicuous; whereas in Wood it is so mangled, as to be scarce intelligible, especially as he has no distinct relation of the charity left to the maids, upon which the verse part of the inscription chiefly turns (10).

'On the north side against the wall is a noble monument, representing a man under an arch to the middle, holding one hand on a globe, the other on a quadrant. He is habited in a short cloak, a cassock and a ruff, surrounded with books on each side of him. On one side of him is the figure of a woman to the breasts naked, holding an instrument in her hand, as offering it to him, and under her feet the word CUBUS. On the other side is another woman, somewhat naked, though with a scarf thrown closely round her, and offering in like manner; under her feet, ΤΗΤΡΑΓΩΝΟΝ. On the top are two women leaning on their arms, inscribed ΟΚΤΑΗΔΡΟΝ — ΔΟΔΙΚΑΔΡΟΝ. In the middle of them a person armed, cap a pee, intitled ΙΚΟΤΗΔΡΟΝ.' And under the first figure mentioned, this inscription following in an oval.

JOHANNES BLAGRAVE, totus Mathematicus,
cum matre sepultus.

*Here lies his corps, which living had a spirit, Wherein much worthy knowledge did inherit;
By which with zeal our GOD he did adore,
Left for maid-servants, and to feed the poor.
His virtuous mother came of worthy race,
A Hengerford, and buried near this place.
When GOD sent Death their lives away to call,
They liv'd below'd, and dy'd bewail'd of all.*

[E] Formerly the objects of superstition, as they are now of contempt. This treatise I formerly saw in the hands of a person who bought it at the sale of the library of an eminent Physician near Covent Garden, and read it over with great satisfaction. In the first leaf it was said to be written by Mr J. Blaggrave, and is addressed to Mr B. of Swallowfield. The title was, A Remonstrance in favour of Antient Learning, against the proud pretensions of the Moderns, more especially in respect to the Doctrine of the STARS. The size of the book was a middling quarto, the character small, but very fair; and from the mentioning more than once the Royal Society, and some of it's members, it appeared to have been written about 1669, or 1670. It was divided into five chapters, and those chapters into several sections, the substance of which is as follows:

I. Of the different Objects of antient and modern learning. Under this head he endeavours to maintain, that the Antients were rather given to practical and useful, than refined and speculative sciences. He instances in Architecture, of which they wrote but few books, and those too very concise; but they left behind them buildings, which are allowed to be master-pieces in their kind, and which the greatest of modern artists boast of imitating. He next mentions Physick, in regard to which he confesses they did not cultivate Anatomy, Pharmacy, or Chemistry, so assiduously as those that came after them; but for the art of curing diseases, he thinks it was never carried much farther than by Hippocrates. He instances lastly in Tactics, or the art of ranging armies in the field; in respect to which he observes, that though there are no systems left of this art, yet history shews us the Antients were perfectly acquainted with it. He then proceeds to the Doctrine of the Stars, and labours to prove that the Antients did not think an enquiry into the motions of the heavenly bodies of so great use to mankind, as the disquisition of their influences; and in this he defends them by many ingenious arguments.

II. Of the Astrology of the Antients considered as a Science. He observes, that the true meaning of the word is no more than the Doctrine of the Stars, and that the confining it to the signification of their aspects is a late distinction, and ought not therefore to prejudice the notions of those great men, who meant to signify thereby the entire knowledge of the heavenly bodies, so far as it was attainable by the human understanding. He farther takes notice, that the observation of the motions of the heavenly bodies considered abstractedly, is a science of far less use to mankind, than the application of it for the perfecting other branches of knowledge. He gives an instance of this in the art of Navigation, to which it hath been applied both by the Antients and Moderns; from whence he concludes, that the application of this kind of science to Physical purposes is equally rational, and that there is no absurdity in supposing, that by due attention it may be improved to equal advantage. He concludes this chapter with several curious comparative instances drawn partly from the writings of other men, but chiefly from his own observation and experience.

III. Of the disadvantages the Antients were under in their-writings. In reference to this the author lays it down, that the wise men among the Antients laboured under great difficulties, particularly from the prevailing of false religion, which obliged them to accommodate their thoughts to the prevailing superstitions of their respective countries, from the constant practice of concealing all kind of sublime science, from the knowledge of the vulgar, which induced them to make use of fables, allegories, and other such like kind of writings, as always disguised, and too often irretrievably darkened the truth; from the subjection, that they laboured under to the Civil powers, who either from views of their own, or to gratify the universal superstition of their subjects, discouraged all such as were inclined to speak plainly, or to write clearly. On each of these points he justifies his own sentiments by those of the learned in all ages, and produces a vast variety of instances, as proofs of what he has advanced. He concludes upon the whole, that the greatest advantage the Moderns have over the Antients, is their embracing the Christian religion, which allows them to think, argue, and write freely. But notwithstanding all this he is of opinion, that great use may be made of what was delivered by the Antients, when the hidden sense of their works can be extracted; and of this also he gives many curious and instructive examples, after the manner in which the famous Lord Bacon has explained the fables, and thereby justified the wisdom of the Antients.

IV. Of the Hypotheses in use amongst the Antients. He observes with respect to these, that the Moderns have not so great advantages as is generally imagined; since the old systems of Democritus and Ptolemy contain in every respect all that has been since advanced, as to the distribution of the universe, or rather of the several bodies of which it is composed; so that later writers are rather revivers than inventors, if we except Tycho Brahe, whose system however never met with general approbation. He then shews, that the Astrological scheme of the twelve houses, is as much an hypothesis as any of the rest; and that if it has faults or imperfections, they ought rather to be enquired into and amended, than exploded and rejected with scorn and contempt. He takes care however to qualify this, by shewing, that those absurdities which have brought the Physical Doctrine of the Stars into derision, are not justly chargeable upon the Antients, but were introduced in later times by men of far less capacity, and who had recourse to notion and fancy instead of reason and experiment. He gives various instances in support of his opinion, and with great judgment and discretion, distinguishes between the follies of Judicial Astrology, and the true knowledge of Astral Influences, without which, as he remarks, no just account can be given of the variations of seasons, of the difference of the tides, of periods in diseases, and of many other things; with respect to which, the doctrines of the Antients, however perplexed and obscure, are to the full as reasonable and intelligible as those of the Moderns, who, by endeavouring to reject them, have been frequently obliged to dispute against, and sometimes absolutely to deny certain and evident truths. In proof of this also he brings many instances, which shew a very unusual extent of learning.

V. Of the true Method of prosecuting useful Science. In this chapter he takes a great deal of pains to prove, that it is not agreeable either to the dictates of reason, or the lights of experience, to destroy, without reserve, those edifices that have been erected in antient times, and have been preserved and repaired through a long course of ages. And he labours to prove, that the Physical Doctrine of the Stars ought to be considered in this light. He shews, that the celebrated Roger Bacon, whom he honours with the title of the Parent of Modern Learning, was of this opinion, and that he has written upon the subject with much learning and good sense. He observes, that Tycho Brahe concurred likewise in this sentiment; as did also the famous Kepler, whom he calls the Father of Modern Astronomy; and he produces also several passages from the writings of the learned Verulam to the same purpose. From all which he concludes, that instead of decrying Astrology as false and fallacious, we ought to study how to render it reasonable and intelligible, by establishing right principles, and reasoning upon them in a proper manner; for want of which, he says, one of the noblest and most elevated branches of human knowledge is in danger of being lost, and laughed out of doors.

As the matter and the manner of this learned work seem both of them to render it worthy of public notice, and as the very memory of it, as well as the piece itself, was in danger of being lost, if this short extract of it had not been accidentally made several years ago, we judge the inserting it here could not fail of being agreeable to our readers in general, at the same time that it will serve to secure to the real author the honour of his performance, in case at any time hereafter it should see the light. E

BLAKE (ROBERT), one of our most famous Admirals in the last century, was descended from the antient family of Blakes, of Plansfield, in the parish of Spaxton in the county of Somerset (a). His father's name was Humphrey, and his occupation that of a Merchant, being settled at Bridgwater, in the neighbourhood of which he had purchased an estate, having, by the Spanish trade, raised a considerable fortune for those times (b). He had several children, of whom the eldest, Robert, was born in the month of August, 1589, and educated, during his father's life-time, at a free-school in Bridgwater. He removed himself to Oxford, where he was matriculated, in Lent term 1615, as a Member of St Alban's Hall (c). Some time after he stood for a Scholarship of Christ-Church, but lost it. From Alban-Hall he translated himself to Wadham-college, in which many of his countrymen studied. On the tenth of February, 1617, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (d). In 1619, being then about twenty-one years of age, he was candidate for a Fellowship in Merton-college, but missed again of his hopes, as some thought, on account of his low stature, for Sir Henry Savile, who was then Warden of that college, had great respect to the comeliness of students persons (e). A strange foible in to great a man! In 1623, Mr Blake wrote a copy of verses on the death of Mr Camden (f), and some time after left the university [A]. While he continued there, he was taken notice of as an early riser and a very studious young man, yet he was not so much given up to his books, but that he took a great deal of exercise delighted in fishing, and fowling, with other such like sports, and if the scandal of those times might be credited, would now and then steal swans (g). He could not be less than five and twenty when he left Oxford, which would incline one to credit, what we are told by several authors, that he was Master of Arts, if Wood did not positively assert the contrary (h). Mr Blake lived at Bridgwater in a private manner, and was distinguished among the good fellows in his neighbourhood, as a plain-dealer. He was naturally of a grave, severe temper, but would readily unbend in an evening, when he discovered an humorous bluntness in his conversation,

(a) Lives British and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 75, Lond. 1704, 8vo.

(b) Wood's Faffi Oxon. Vol. I. col. 203.

(c) Wood, ubi supra.

(d) Wood's Faffi Oxon. Vol. I. col. 204.

(e) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 75.

(f) Wood's Faffi Oxon. Vol. I. col. 204.

(g) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 75. Wood, ubi supra.

(h) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, Oxf. 1717, 8vo. Vol. III. P. II. p. 601. Bates, Elench. Mot. p. 228. Faffi Oxon. Vol. I. col. 203.

[A] Some time after left the university] It is a little strange, and in my judgment much to be regretted, that no better account is to be had of Mr Blake's family; and I think it so much the more so, considering it as a proof of the little care taken by our ancestors to preserve the memory of worthy men, when they had it so much in their power, as it must have been in this case, though now, by the particular accidents which have befallen this family, it is become a thing not easy to be rectified. Mr Wood, in his account of our author (1), says, that he was descended from the Blakes of Blanchfield in Somersetshire; and I confess that I have not been able to find any such place in that county, whence I am inclined to think another author more in the right, who calls it Plansfield, and says, it is in the parish of Spaxton (2), for such a place there is, and at no great distance from Bridgwater (3). The author of his life says expressly, that his father sent him to the university (4); but I am inclined to think, that he was dead before that time, and this from the following passage in Lord Clarendon's character of our Admiral. He was, says his Lordship, a man of a private extraction, yet had enough left him by his father to give him a good education, which his own inclination disposed him to receive in the university of Oxford (5). The reader will determine how far this passage will support what is advanced in the text. With respect to his scholarship, Mr Wood delivers himself pretty oddly; he was put aside, says he, from his scholarship, whether for want of merit or friends, he could not tell. And when he speaks of his disappointment as to a fellowship, he adds, whether it was want of scholarship, or that his person was not handsome, he could not say (6). The noble Historian, with greater freedom and dignity, tells us, that Blake was enough versed in books for a man who intended not to be of any profession, having sufficient of his own to maintain him in the plenty he affected, and having then no appearance of ambition to be a greater man than he was (7). His own verses on the death of Mr Camden may possibly clear up this dispute.

(5) Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. III. p. 601.

(6) Faffi Oxon. Vol. I. col. 204.

(7) Clarendon's History, Vol. III. p. 601.

(1) Faffi Oxon. Vol. I. col. 203.

(2) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 75.

(3) Speed's Map and Table of Somersetshire.

(4) Ubi supra.

(i) Clarendon's
Hist. Vol. III.
p. 602.

(k) Wood's Fashi
Oxon. Vol. 1.
col. 204.
Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II.
p. 76.

(l) Wood, ubi
supra.

(m) Clarendon's
History, Vol. III.
p. 602.

(n) Rushworth's Historical Collections, Vol. V.
p. 685.

conversation, which was very agreeable and entertaining (i). He was tinctured pretty early with Republican principles, and disliking that severity with which Dr Laud, then Bishop of Bath and Wells, pressed Uniformity in his diocese, he began to fall into those opinions which were stiled Puritannical. His innate roughness and sincerity led him to speak freely upon all occasions; insomuch that his sentiments were generally known, which inclined the Puritan party to procure his being elected Member for Bridgwater, in that Parliament which sat in April 1640 (k). It was dissolved too early for him to make any figure, and in the next, which was the Long Parliament, he lost his election. When the war broke out between the King and Parliament, he declared, according to his principles, for the latter, and entered very early into their service, though it does not appear exactly when, or in what quality, but he was soon made Captain of dragoons (l). In 1643, however, we find him at Bristol, under the command of Col. Fiennes, who intrusted him with a little fort on the line, in which he first gave the world a proof of his military virtues; for on the twenty-sixth of July, when Prince Rupert attacked that important place, and the Governor had agreed to surrender it upon articles, Mr Blake still held out his fort, and killed several of the King's forces, which exasperated Prince Rupert to such a degree, that he talked of hanging him, had not some friends interposed, and excused him on account of his want of experience in war, at whose request, though not without much difficulty, he was at last prevailed upon to give up the fort (m). After this he served in Somersetshire, under the command of Popham, who was Governor of Lyme, to whose regiment Blake was Lieutenant-Colonel. As he was much beloved in his country, and as the greatest part of the regiment were Somersetshire men, he had so good an intelligence in those parts, that he, in conjunction with Sir Robert Pye, surprized Taunton for the Parliament (n), where he found ten pieces of cannon, and a great deal of ammunition. In 1644, he was constituted Governor of that place, which was of the utmost importance, being the only garrison the Parliament had in the West. The works about it were far from being strong, he had no very numerous garrison, yet by keeping a strict discipline, and treating the townsmen well, he made a shift to keep it, though no great care was taken to furnish him with supplies, and notwithstanding he was sometimes besieged, and often blocked up by the King's forces. At length, Goring came before the place with near ten thousand men, and pressed Blake so close, that in spite of a vigorous resistance he made a breach, and actually took from him a part of the town; however, he held out the rest of it, and the castle, with wonderful obstinacy till relief came. For which extraordinary service, the Parliament gave the garrison a bounty of two thousand pounds, and Col. Blake a present of five hundred. All who have wrote of that unhappy war, allow this to have been a very gallant and soldier-like action [B]. In April 1646, Col. Blake, with part of his garrison, reduced

Dunster-

[B] A very gallant and soldier-like action.] We have a very distinct account of this matter in the life of Blake, out of which we will take some particulars which are personal. The Parliament having notice of the ill condition Blake was in, ordered relief to be immediately sent him, who, though he was in great want of ammunition and provisions, yet held out both town and castle to admiration. Colonel Windham, Governor of Bridgwater for the King, was then in the Royal army, and knowing Colonel Blake, he undertook to manage the business with him; he first sent a threatening summons to surrender on pain of fire and sword; and by a second trumpeter he mildly endeavoured to persuade him to it, for that the works were inconsiderable, the place indefensible, and to prevent the effusion of Christian Blood. Blake returned this answer: 'These are to let you know, that as we neither fear your menaces, nor accept your proffers, so we wish you for time to come to desist from all overtures of the like nature to us, who are resolved to the last drop of our blood to maintain the quarrel we have undertaken, and doubt not but the same God, who has hitherto protected us, will, e'er long, bless us with an issue answerable to the justice of our cause: However, to him alone we shall stand or fall.' Soon after the receipt of this letter, the besiegers were charged by a body of the Parliament's forces, who broke through the King's, and supplied the town with provisions, and what other necessities they wanted. However, the Parliament's main army could not advance so fast as Colonel Blake's necessities required; the self-denying ordinance had newly passed, Essex was out, and Sir Thomas Fairfax made General, all Colonels and other Officers, who were Members of Parliament, were obliged to lay down their commissions, and attend the service of the House. The army was modelled, and all this took up so much time, that Blake was had put to it to defend the castle of Taunton. The besiegers had destroyed the suburbs and half the town; Sir Richard Greenville had taken Colonel Popham's house at Wellington, which was some small help to Blake while it was in the Parliament's hands. These things being represented to the House, they ordered Major-General Skippon to join Sir Thomas Fairfax, and hasten to the relief of Taunton with 8000 men, horse and foot; money, provisions, and a train of artillery, were sent after them. In the mean while Colonel Blake was in great straits, and the besiegers knowing his distress, summoned him again to surrender; but he answered, he would eat his boots first; and though the Royalists had posted themselves in part of the town, he hindered their penetrating farther. He barricaded that part of it, which he still held, with all sorts of lumbers, and made the Cavaliers pay dearly for every inch of ground they got of them. Prince Rupert and Goring having left the siege with a considerable body of troops, General Fairfax thought that Colonel Weldon and Colonel Greaves, with three thousand foot and fifteen hundred horse, might be able to relieve Taunton. They accordingly performed it on the 11th of May, 1645, so much to the satisfaction of the inhabitants, that they appointed a kind of anniversary thanksgiving for this deliverance, which is still kept up (8). The Royalists lost a thousand men before the place, besides which they carried off twelve waggons full of the wounded. This however did not hinder a second siege of that place, wherein not only Blake, but Weldon was now besieged. The latter being at the head of five thousand men, scorned to be cooped up, and therefore attempted to break through the Royalists, which however he could not effect. Blake being informed of his distress, and that he was retiring precipitately towards Taunton, sallied from thence at the head of two troops of horse; vigorously charged the pursuers, and thereby gave Colonel Weldon's men time to retire into the town; after which he made good his own retreat, but was pressed closely by the besiegers. The Common-Council, and many eminent citizens of London, on news of the second distress of Taunton, voluntarily raised 4000 £. to mount a thousand horse to join Major-General

(8) Lives English and Foreign, Vol.
II. p. 81, 82.

neral

Dunster-castle, an ancient seat belonging to the family of Lutterel, after which he returned in triumph to Taunton. This was one of the last actions in the war (o). Some time after this, when the Parliament had voted, No farther addresses should be made to the King, Col. Blake joined in an address from the borough of Taunton, expressing their gratefulness for this step taken by the House of Commons (p). Yet the writer of his Life tells us, that when the King came to be tried, Blake disapproved that measure as illegal; and was frequently heard to say, that he would as freely venture his life to save the King's; as ever he did to serve the Parliament (q). But this must be entirely imputed to the generosity of his temper, for after the King was murdered, he fell in roundly with the Republican party, and indeed, next to Cromwell, he was the ablest and most successful officer the Parliament had. He satisfied himself in all the changes of those times, with adhering, as far as he was able, to his country's interest, and doing all he could to exalt her glory, of which he was passionately fond, a circumstance which gave men of less honour and more cunning, an opportunity of using his great abilities and undaunted courage to serve their own purposes [C]. Feb. 12, 1648-9; he was appointed, in conjunction with Col. Deane and Col. Popham, to command the fleet (r). Soon after, he was ordered to sail, with a squadron of men of war, in pursuit of Prince Rupert and Prince Maurice, who were in the Irish seas to assist the Marquis of Ormond, then in arms for King Charles II. in Ireland (s). Blake arrived, in June 1649, before Kingsfale, where

(o) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 85.

(p) Ibid. p. 87.

(q) Ibid.

(r) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. II. col. 204. Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 87.

(s) Heath's Chronicle of the Civil Wars, p. 256.

neral Mafsey, whom the House ordered to attempt the relief of the place. The Committee of Kent raised two troops of horse and dragoons for the same service; and all was not enough, considering the danger Blake and Weldon were in. The Governor wrote to the Parliament, that he should be put to great straits if success came not speedily; he assured them he would never hear of a parley with the enemy: That the garrison had some ammunition, and resolved to feed upon their horses. He desired the house to take their share into consideration, and left all to God and them. The Parliament answered, that he should be speedily relieved; that they would pay what money he took up. They defended him and his men to go on in their vigilance and valour, and they should never want encouragement. Accordingly a regiment of dragoons was ordered to be raised, and to march with Mafsey towards Taunton. In the mean while their affairs went ill in the West; Colonel Blake could get no intelligence of the progress made by the two Houses for his relief, at last Colonel Ciely, Governor of Lyme, found a way to inform him of Mafsey's advancing westward, and at the same time convey'd a small supply of powder into the town. On this, Blake commanded a party of the garrison to fall out on the besiegers; these, with the loss of one hundred men, killed four hundred of Goring's, drove the enemy back, and enlarged their quarters five or six miles in compass. In another skirmish he had yet greater success, and soon after he was entirely relieved, the King's affairs being totally ruined (14). It is not impossible that he might be soured by the treatment he met with, when he fought academical preferment. It appears from many of his own declarations, that he loved his country and hated arbitrary power, which seemed to have been the governing maxims in all his conduct. There were many of his sentiments at this time in the nation, and one of the wisest things Cromwell ever did, was his providing proper employments for such spirits. Thus he early disposed of Monk into Scotland, and of Blake to Sea: I say he disposed of them, for though he had not as yet assumed the supreme power, yet by his arts he chiefly directed all the publick Councils, and pointed out such as he thought proper for all publick employments. Had it been otherwise, Blake in all probability had not been sent to sea, since it is certain the Parliament had some diffidence of him at the time of the King's murder, when they sent him five hundred pounds, with directions to disband part of his forces (15). Yet after the thing was done, and a Commonwealth established, there is no great wonder that Blake fell in with this new Government, since it was agreeable to his own way of thinking, influenced probably by observing to what high reputation republicks antiently rose. This is Mr Hobbes's sentiment, who thinks it was one great source of our publick troubles; that men were bred in such high opinions of the heroes of Greece and Rome, at the same time that the constitution of their country differed so much from the Governments under which those great men flourished (16). If this remark could be applied to any man, it might certainly to Blake, of whom Dr Bates says justly, as well as elegantly, that there was nothing blameable in his conduct, but that he joined with the parricides (17). His anxiety for the glory of his country determined him to serve her under what Government soever prevailed; and this maxim he always stuck to, behaving bravely wherever he was trusted, never canvassing for any employment, much less disturbing the State by his intrigues. This made him beloved by all parties, and even by the Royalists, to whom he was also recommended by the tenderness he shewed for them upon all occasions, granting them better articles than any other officer either would or durst (18), except Sir George Ayscue, who suffered for his generosity towards the Lord Willoughby, the King's Governor of Barbadoes (19). As these were Blake's own notions, so he endeavoured to inculcate them into his officers, advising them to wish their country always well, and to serve the publick assiduously without disturbing it; which doctrine very probably disposed them to act as occasion required, when after Blake's death his colleagues, Monk and Montague, brought about the King's Restoration (20). In short, our Admiral was a man, who with all the courage and conduct of a great Commander, never affected the character of a Politician, but contented himself with doing his utmost to execute whatever orders were sent him, whence he was suspected by none of the parties among his contemporaries, and at the same time was revered by all.

(14) Colamy's Abridgment of Baxter's Life, Vol. II. p. 137; 152, 263.

(15) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 87.

(16) Echemoth, or Account of the late Civil War, Lond. 1679, 8vo. p. 2, 3.

(17) Bates, Elenc's Motuum, Lond. 1672. p. 223.

(18) See the original articles to Sir John Grenville, in the Library of the Society for promoting Christian Knowledge, and propagating the Gospel.

(19) Heath's Chronicle, p. 323. Clarendon's Hist. Vol. III. p. 466.

(20) Heath's Chronicle of the Civil War, p. 350.

(9). It may not be amiss to observe, for the sake of truth, that Blake's obstinate defence of this town was one great cause, if not the principal cause, of the Parliament's success in this war. It was upon a report of the great distress of the place, and the moral certainty there was that it could not hold out above a few days, that his Majesty detached a considerable body of troops into Somersetshire, which proved the loss of the decisive battle of Naish, which in all probability Sir Thomas Fairfax would never have hazarded, if the King's army had been entire (10). The Parliament therefore had reason to stile this gentleman, as Wood says they did, their inescapable Commander (11); and this circumstance considered, few readers will think this note tedious, though it is a long one.

[C] His undaunted courage, to serve their own purposes. We shall take occasion in this note to examine a little into Mr Blake's political principles, as far as facts and good authority can lead us. Wood tells us roundly, that before the civil war he was observed to be puritanically inclined, that afterwards he sided with the Presbyterians, and took arms for the Parliament (12). The Earl of Clarendon tells us, that they who knew him inwardly discovered that he had an antimonarchical spirit, when few men thought the Government in any danger (13). As to his being puritanically inclined we need the less wonder at it, since there was always a strong party of that sort of people in his native town of Bridgwater. It is possible he might receive some tincture from his countrymen in the university, for I find many of his standing among the Nonconformists, who were ejected after the Restoration

(9) Ibid. p. 84, 85. Rushworth's Historical Collections, Vol. VI. p. 28.

(10) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 85.

(11) Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 204.

(12) Wood, ubi supra.

(13) Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. III. p. 601.

where the two Princes lay in harbour; Deane cruised off Plymouth, Popham between the Downs and Portsmouth, and Sir George Ayscue lay in Dublin-Road: thus were the Parliament masters of the sea, and their enemies ships either blocked up, or flying every where before them. Prince Rupert's men deserted daily, and came over to Admiral Blake. The Prince, to hinder their desertion, hung up ten of his men for offering to run away. Blake kept him in the harbour 'till the beginning of October, when despairing of relief by sea, and Cromwell being ready to take the town by land, provisions of all sorts falling short, he resolved to force his way through Blake's squadron; Blake sunk three of his ships as he bore out of the harbour, but the Prince's little fleet, making all the sail they could, got clear of the Parliament's, and steered their course to Lisbon, where his Highness was protected and caressed by the King of Portugal (t). The Parliament declared war with that King for receiving their enemies, and Blake followed the two Princes to Portugal. From before the river of Lisbon, he sent to the King for leave to enter, and coming near with his ships, the castle shot at him. Blake dropped anchor, and sent a boat to know the reason of this hostility; the Captain of the castle answered, he had no orders from the King to let his ships pass. However, the King commanded one of the Lords of the Court to compliment Blake: the Portuguese Lord desired him not to come in except the weather proved bad; for he said, his master feared, lest some quarrel might happen between him and Prince Rupert in his harbour; the King sent him, at the same time, a large present of fresh provisions. The weather proving bad, Blake went up the river into the Bay of Wyers, but two miles from the place where Prince Rupert's ships lay, and thence he sent Capt. Moulton, to inform the King of the falsities in the Prince's declaration. The King refusing still to admit the Admiral to fall on Prince Rupert's ships, Blake took five of the Brazil fleet richly laden, and gave the King to understand, that unless he would command the Prince's ships out from his river, he would endeavour to seize the rest of the Portuguese fleet from America (u). In September 1650, the Prince endeavoured to get out of the harbour, but was soon driven in again by Blake, who sent home nine ships outward bound to Brazil, which he had taken; and in October following, Blake and Popham met with a fleet of twenty-three sail from Brazil bound for Lisbon, of whom they sunk the Admiral, took the Vice-Admiral, and eleven other ships, having ten thousand chests of sugar aboard, and burnt three more; the rest were small ships, and during the action got into the river (w). In his return home, he met with two ships laden with provisions for his fleet, which determined him to sail back in search of the Prince, whom he followed up the Streights. In this cruize, he, in his own ship the Phoenix, took a French man of war, the Captain of which had committed hostilities, and this prize was reputed of immense value (x). He proceeded next to Carthage, where the Prince lay, and as soon as he came to an anchor before the fort, he acquainted the Spanish Governor by a message, 'That an enemy to the State of England was in his port, that the Parliament commanded him to pursue him, and the King of Spain being in amity with the Parliament, he desired leave to take all advantages against their enemy.' The Governor replied, he could not take any notice of the difference of any nations or persons amongst themselves, only such as were declared enemies to the King his master, that they came in thither for safety, and therefore he could not refuse them protection, and that he would do the like for the Admiral. Blake still pressed the Governor to permit him to attack the Prince, and the Spaniard put him off 'till he could have orders from Madrid (y). While the Admiral was cruising in the Mediterranean, Prince Rupert got out of Carthage and sailed to Malaga. General Blake having notice of his destroying many English ships there, followed him with all the expedition possible, and finding him in the port, attacked him, without the ceremony of asking leave of the Spanish Governor, and burnt and destroyed his whole fleet, two ships only excepted, the Reformation, in which Prince Rupert himself was, and the Swallow, commanded by his brother Prince Maurice (z). This was in January, 1651. In February General Blake took a French man of war of forty guns, and sent it, with four other prizes, before him into England. Not long after, he came with his squadron to Plymouth, where he received the thanks of the Parliament, and was by them made Warden of the Cinque Ports (a). On the fourth of March following, an Act passed, whereby Col. Blake, Col. Popham, and Col. Deane, or any two of them, were appointed Admirals and Generals of the fleet for the year ensuing (b). The first service he was put upon was the reducing the isles of Scilly, which were still held for King Charles II. The matter was of great importance, for besides that some privateers from thence did a great deal of mischief, by disturbing trade and taking of ships, it was also known, that the Dutch had a view upon those islands, and had actually sent Van Trump, with a squadron of twelve men of war, whose instructions were, either to purchase or reduce them (c). General Blake failed in May, with a body of eight hundred land troops on board. Sir John Greenville commanded there for the King, who after some small resistance submitted, knowing well, that a longer dispute would have been to no purpose (d). The General then sailed for Guernsey, which was held for the King by Sir George Carteret. He arrived there in the month of October, and though the sea was very rough, landed what forces he had on board the very next day, and did all that could be expected of him, in order to make a speedy conquest of the island, which, however, could not be completed that year. In the beginning of the next, however, the brave Governor, finding all hopes of relief vain,

(t) Bates, Elenchus Motuum, P. ii. p. 72.

(u) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 89.

(w) Bates, ubi supra.

(x) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 91.

(y) Bates, ubi supra.

(z) Life of Prince Rupert. Heath's Chron. of the Civil Wars, p. 275.

(a) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 92. Wood's Fasti, Oxon. Vol. II. col. 204.

(b) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 93.

(c) Bates, Elenchus Mot. P. ii. p. 77. Heath's Chron. of the Civil War, p. 288.

(d) Original Articles, agreed on this xxiii day of May, 1651, between Admiral Blake and Col. Clarke, Commanders in Chief of all the forces by sea or land, in or about the Islands of Friscoe and Briar, on the one part; and Sir John Greenville, Knt. Governor of the Islands of St. Maries and Agnes in Scilly, on the behalf of his Majesty on the other part; touching the Rendition of those Islands, together with all the Castles, &c. to the Parliament of England, MS. in the Library of the Society for propagating the Gospel, &c.

vain, thought proper to make the best terms he could, and to the honour of Blake we may affirm, that though no man proceeded more briskly, while the sword was drawn, yet in all treaties he was remarkably condescending, detesting to be made an instrument of oppression, though ready to hazard his life at any time to do his country justice (e) For this signal and important service he had, as he well deserved, thanks from the Parliament, he was also elected one of the Council of State, and much courted by Cromwell, who began now to think of setting up for himself (f). March 25, 1652, Blake was constituted sole Admiral for nine months, on a prospect of a Dutch war. It is generally conceived, that this was fought by the States rather than by the Parliament, for they were very confident of their force at sea, and vexed at the firmness of the new Commonwealth of England, which inclined them to attempt, by some sudden blow, to support their own, and lessen the reputation of their rival (g). With this view, they sent Van Trump with forty-five sail of men of war into the Downs, to insult the English Admiral, and, in the mean time, laboured hard to equip another fleet of 150 sail, which they thought would be more than sufficient to crush the whole naval power of England. It is certain they could not have chose a more improper man to have practised upon in this manner than Blake, who though he had but twenty-three ships, and could expect no succour but from Major Bourne, who commanded eight more, yet being attacked by Van Trump, he fought him bravely, notwithstanding this great inequality, and forced him to retreat (h). This was on the nineteenth of May 1652, and as it was a very remarkable action, the reader will find some authentick particulars in the notes [D].

(e) Clarendon's Hist. Vol. III. p. 465. See note [C]. Heath's Chron. of the Civil Wars, p. 306.

(f) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 98.

(g) Clarendon's Hist. Vol. III. p. 458. Heath's Chron. of the Civil Wars, p. 314.

(h) The Answer of the Parliament of England to the Ambassador of the States-General; as also, A Narrative of the late Engagement between Gen. Blake and Admiral Trump, &c. London, printed by John Field, Printer to the Parliament of England, 1652, 4to.

Alter

[D] Some authentick particulars in the notes.] We cannot better discharge this promise, than by giving the reader an extract from the narrative of this engagement, printed by order of the Parliament of England. Upon Tuesday the 18th of May, 1652, in the morning, General Blake being gone to the westward as far as Rye Bay eight days before, with twelve or thirteen ships, leaving Major Bourne in the Downs with eight ships only, there appeared upon the back side of the Godwin a Holland fleet of men of war, consisting of two and forty ships, one whereof had a flag on the main-top-mast head, the rest jacks and ancients; and being come to the South Sand's head, two of them bore up towards the English ships in the Downs; whereupon Major Bourne sent out the Greyhound to examine them, and to know the reason of their so near approach; who answering that they had a message to the Commander in chief in the Downs, were permitted to come in; and having saluted the flag, the two Captains, named Tyfon and Aldred, came aboard Major Bourne, and acquainted him that they were sent by Van Trump, to let him know that he had been riding about Dunkirk with his fleet, where, by reason of foul weather, they had lost many of their cables and anchors, and the wind being northerly, were driven farther to the southward than they intended, which Van Trump thought fit to signify, to prevent any misapprehensions or jealousies. And having said this, and received for answer, that the reality of what they said would best appear by their speedy drawing off from this coast, they departed to their fleet, and immediately, upon their arrival with them, the whole fleet stood up to Dover, and came to an anchor, within little more than gun-shot of the castle, the same day in the afternoon. Upon their coming before Dover-castle, and riding there with a flag in the main-top, without saluting the castle, the castle made three shot at them; notwithstanding which the Dutch Admiral kept up his flag, and rode there at anchor until the next day at noon, and exercised his musqueteers, by discharging volleys of small shot many hours together. Upon Wednesday, about twelve o'clock, the Dutch fleet weighed anchor, and stood off towards Calais, some few leagues unto the south-east. About the same time, the English fleet under General Blake, coming from the west towards the Downs, discovered them, and supposed by their course that they had been going back. Major Bourne likewise was in sight, coming from the Downs to join with General Blake. About an hour or two after the Holland fleet altered their course, came back again, made all the sail they could, and bore directly with General Blake. Van Trump, the headmost with his flag in the main-top, and being come within shot, the General shot a gun at his main-top, and then two single shot more; whereupon Trump shot a single shot through the General's flag, and then immediately gave the first broadside, and took in his pendants, and hung out his red flag under the Holland colours, which was the signal on their part for the whole fleet to engage: And so the fight began, which happened between four and five o'clock in the afternoon, and continued until nine o'clock. In the fight the English took two of the Holland fleet, one whereof, having six foot water in the hold, they left, taking the Captain and officers aboard; the other being a ship of thirty guns. General Blake lay all night where the fight began, or near thereabouts; and the Holland fleet was espied about four leagues distant towards the coast of France next morning (21). To this let us subjoin the letter written by the Admiral himself, on account not only of several curious circumstances contained therein, but also because it may serve as a specimen of the plain blunt temper of this illustrious Hero. It was addressed to the Right Honourable William Lenthall, Esq; Speaker of the House of Commons, and conceived in the following terms (22).

(21) The Answer of the Parliament of England, &c.

(22) Heath's Chronicle of the Civil War, p. 316. Appendix to the Answer of the Parliament, &c.

Right Honourable,

I Have dispatched away this express to your Honours, to give you an account of what passed yesterday between us and the Dutch fleet. Being in Rye Bay, I received intelligence from Major Bourne, that Van Trump, with forty sail, was off the South Sand-Head; whereupon I made all possible speed to ply up towards them, and yesterday in the morning we saw them at anchor in and near Dover road. Being come within three leagues of them, they weighed, and stood away by a wind to the eastward; we supposing their intention was to leave us, to avoid the dispute of the flag. About two hours after they altered their course, and bore directly with us, Van Trump the headmost; whereupon we lay by, and put ourselves in a fighting posture, judging they had a resolution to engage. Being come within musquet-shot, I gave order to fire at his flag, which was done thrice; after the third shot he let fly a broadside at us. Major Bourne, with those ships that came from the Downs, being eight, was then making towards us. We continued fighting 'till night; then our ship being unable to sail, by reason that all our rigging and sails were extremely shattered, our mizen-mast shot off, we came, with advice of the Captains, to an anchor, about three or four leagues off the Ness, to refit our ship, at which we laboured all the night. This morning we espied the Dutch fleet about four leagues distance from ours, towards the coast of France; and, by advice of a Council of war, it was resolved to ply to windward to keep the weather-gage, and we are now ready to let fall our anchors this tide. What course the Dutch fleet steers we do not well know, nor can we tell what harm we have done them; but we suppose one of them to be sunk, and another of thirty guns we have taken, with the Captains of both; the main-mast of the first being shot by the board, and much water in the hold, made Captain Lawson's men to forsake her. We have six men of ours slain, and nine or ten desperately wounded, and twenty-five more not without danger; amongst them our Master and one

After this dispute at sea, the States grew more tractable, and seemed very well inclined to peace, but the new Commonwealth of England stood upon such high terms as were not to be complied with, and therefore both sides prepared to carry on the war, which had been thus hastily begun, without much reason on either, and perhaps out of meer emulation on both sides (i). Blake, while he continued in the Downs, re-inforced his fleet, and prepared for another engagement, holding, in the month of June, a solemn fast, or day of humiliation (k). After which, finding that a general engagement was not likely to ensue, he resolved to prosecute the war by taking the enemy's merchant ships, in which he had surprizing success, for on the tenth of that month, a detachment from his fleet fell upon six and twenty sail of Dutch merchant-men, and took them every one; so that by the end of June, the Admiral sent up forty good prizes, and had so effectually cleared the seas, that, on the second of July, he was at liberty to sail with a strong squadron northwards (l). In his course he took a Dutch man of war, and by the latter end of the month, he took the whole Dutch fishing convoy, consisting of twelve men of war, one hundred of their herring-busses, and dispersed the rest (m). By the twelfth of August he returned into the Downs, with six of the Dutch men of war he had taken, and nine hundred prisoners. Thence he stood over to their own coast, having for some time upwards of a hundred men of war under his command. Towards the latter end of the same month of August, part of his fleet fell upon a squadron of French men of war, going to the relief of Dunkirk, took them, and carried them into Dover (n). At last, on the twenty-eight of September, the fleet being under a fresh gale, Admiral Blake discovered the Dutch about noon, and though he had only three of his own squadron with him, Vice-Admiral Pen with his squadron at some distance, and the rest a league or two a-stern, he bore in among them, and was bravely seconded by Pen and Bourne; the fight began warmly on both sides: Blake sailing to the windward of their Admiral was aground; the Sovereign struck several times, so did the Resolution, the St Andrew, and Pen's ship, but they got off again without any harm; three of the enemy's ships were wholly disabled at the first brunt, and another as she was towing off. The Rear-Admiral was taken by Capt. Mildmay; the victory was entirely on the English side, and had not night prevented them, it was thought scarce a ship of the Dutch fleet would have got off. On the twenty-ninth, as day broke, the English spied the Dutch N. E. two leagues off, the General bore up to them, but the Dutch having the wind of him, he could not reach them; he commanded his light frigates to ply as near as they could, and keep firing while the rest bore up after them; some shot was spent between the English and Dutch, who soon hoisted

of his mates, and other officers. We have received about seventy great shot in our hull and masts, in our sails and rigging without number, being engaged with the whole body of the fleet for the space of four hours; being the mark at which they aimed. We must needs acknowledge it a great mercy, that we had no more harm, and our hope is, the righteous God will continue the same unto us, if there do arise a war between us, they being first in the breach, and seeking an occasion to quarrel, and watching as it seems an advantage to brave us upon our own coast, &c.

From aboard the James, three leagues off the Hydes, the 20th of May, 1652.

Your humble Servant,

ROBERT BLAKE.

It would be to no great purpose to take notice of the different accounts given of this matter by later authors, because it cannot be supposed that they have any better authorities than those which have been already produced. As to what is asserted by the Dutch writers, it differs so little from the account already given, except in one circumstance, that it need not be taken notice of. This circumstance is, the firing of the first broadside, which they assert was done by Blake, and so I find it in Admiral Trump's letter to the States. In this letter, which is dated the 30th of May, 1652, N. S. he asserts that Bourne's squadron consisted of twelve ships, though Bourne himself says he had but nine, and names them. He also says, that Admiral Blake, being within cannon-shot, fired once over them, and they not answering, fired a second time; being answered by another shot, he fired a broadside upon Trump. He owns the loss of two ships, and does not seem to dispute that the English had the better (23). There is indeed a more particular account, with respect to the personal conduct of Blake, which deserves notice. When Blake came into the Downs, says this author, Van Trump bore up to his fleet, which consisted of no more than twenty-three sail, nearer than he had any occasion to do. Upon this, Blake saluted him with two guns without ball, to require him to strike sail; Trump, in contempt, shot on the contrary side; Blake fired a second and a third gun, which Van Trump answered with a broadside. The English Admiral perceiving it was his intention to fight, singled out himself from the rest of the fleet to treat with Van Trump about that point of honour, and to prevent the effusion of blood and a national quarrel. When Blake approached nearer to Van Trump, he and the rest of his fleet, contrary to the law of nations, the English Admiral coming with a design to treat, fired on Blake with whole broadsides. The Admiral was in his cabin drinking with some of his officers, little expecting to be saluted, when the shot broke the windows of his ship, and shattered the stern, which put him into a vehement passion, and curling his whiskers, as he used to do when he was angry, he commanded his men to answer the Dutch in their kind, saying, when his heat was somewhat over, he took it very ill of Van Trump that he should take his ship for a barudy-house, and break his windows. Blake singly sustained the shock of the Dutch fleet for some time, till his own ships and Major Bourne's could join him, and then the engagement grew hot and bloody on the enemies side, till night put an end to it (24). General Ludlow, in his Memoirs gives us a very clear and distinct account of this action; and when he has so done, he tells us, that on a report from the Council of State, the Parliament justified Blake's conduct, resolved to demand satisfaction of the States, put their Ambassadors, who lodged at Chelsea, under a guard, and sent Cromwell and Dennis Bond to Dover, to encourage the sailors, and to promise them, that nothing should be wanting on the side of the Parliament to reward their vigilance and valour, in case they continued to do their duty as bravely as they had done (25). The Earl of Clarendon has preserved a very extraordinary circumstance not to be met with elsewhere, viz. that Trump received an express ketch with instructions from the States immediately before he fired his broadside (26).

(24) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 99.

(25) Ludlow's Memoirs, Vol. I. p. 406.

(26) Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. III. p. 459.

[E] Made

(i) Le Vie de Cromwel, par Greg. Leti, Vol. II. p. 249. Heath's Chron. p. 314. Ludlow's Memoirs, Vol. I. p. 406.

(k) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 100.

(l) Clarendon's Hist. Vol. III. p. 461.

(m) Heath's Chronicle, p. 322.

(n) Clarendon's Hist. Vol. III. p. 463. Heath's Chron. p. 375. Ludlow's Memoirs, Vol. I. p. 421.

(23) Heath's Chronicle of the Civil War, p. 319.

hoisted their sails and ran for it. On the thirtieth, the enemy were almost out of sight, the English still pursuing them, 'till they saw them run into the Goree; the General then called a Council of War, and seeing the ships were so near the shallows, and that some of them wanted provisions, it was resolved to return to the Downs. The English lost few men, not one ship; the enemy had their Rear-Admiral taken, two sunk, and one blown up, two thousand wounded men were landed out of the Dutch fleet, and Admiral Witte Wittens laid the fault on the cowardice of some of his Captains, and on the numbers of the English. General Blake, after the fight, ordered several ships to the coast of Holland, and sent others on a cruise, which not only secured the English merchants in their trade, but wonderfully annoyed the subjects of the States-General, and made them heartily weary of the war (o) [E]. Some pressing occasions having obliged General Blake to make large detachments from his fleet, Van Trump, who had once again the command of the Dutch navy, then consisting of fourscore men of war, resolved to take this opportunity of attacking Blake in the Downs, who, he knew, had not above half his number of ships (p). Accordingly, he sailed away to the back of the Godwin, near the place where he had fought before, of which Blake having notice, he called a Council of War, wherein it was resolved to fight, though at so great a disadvantage. The battle began on the twenty-ninth of November about two in the morning, and lasted 'till near six in the evening. The General was in the Triumph, and always in the hottest of the action; his ship, the Victory, and the Van-guard, did, and suffered, most, engaging at one time with twenty of the enemy's best ships. Blake finding the Dutch had two ships to his one, that the English were very much disabled, and that the Dutch had also the advantage of the wind, drew off his fleet in the night into the river of Thames, having lost the Garland, and the Bonaventure taken by the Dutch, a small frigate burnt, and three sunk; his remaining ships were shattered and disabled: Trump bought this victory dear, one of his flag-ships was blown up, all the men drowned, his own ship and De Ruyter's were both incapable of service 'till they were repaired (q) [F]. This advantage, for such it really was, puffed

(o) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 104.

(p) Heath's Chronicle, pag. 329, 330.

(q) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 104.

[E] Made them heartily weary of the war.] We have several accounts of this engagement, out of which we have selected the substance of the clearest, and inserted it in the text. There is particularly a pretty long one in Whitlock's Memorials (27); as also another in Ludlow's Memoirs, attended with some circumstances that are not to be found elsewhere; he says, that when the Dutch fleet arrived at Goree, the Captains were not permitted to go ashore 'till an enquiry was made into their conduct. In the mean time, the Dutch were so much provoked against the English, that in order to encourage their own countrymen to serve against them, they exhibited the death of the late King in the most tragical manner upon the stage, and the faction of the Prince of Orange entertained hopes, that the people would rather sacrifice their liberties, than not be revenged of the English Common-Wealth (28). This, however, seems to be his own conjecture; for another writer tells us, that the States, out of meer apprehension of the Prince's becoming Stadtholder, sent soon after the engagement to the Parliament of England, to desire a peace, but with very indifferent success; for the Parliament still stood upon their old demands of satisfaction and of reparation. The same author tells us, that De Wit, when he failed on this expedition, was obstructed by a mutiny, the seamen refusing to go on board 'till they received their wages; for which two of them were executed at Amsterdam, and some of the Burghers of that city shot, on a sudden surmise of a rescue. On his return there was another tumult at Flushing, occasioned partly through his want of success, and partly out of hatred to him as an enemy to the House of Orange; which cross accidents made De Ruyter desirous of resigning his commission, and so vexed De Wit that he fell sick. The States however appointed Commissioners to enquire into the conduct of the Captains who were charged with misbehaviour, and took a great deal of pains to repair and to recruit their fleet (29). On the other hand, the Parliament of England passed an Act, whereby they required all seamen, who were on board any foreign ships in Europe, to return home in forty days, and such as were in the Indies in twelve months, directing that all such Carpenters, Shipwrights, &c. that were found on board the enemy's ships, should be thrown overboard without mercy (30). It was the latter end of the year, Admiral Blake had orders to send Captain Ball with a squadron of eighteen men of war into the Sound, in order to serve as a convoy for two and twenty merchantmen, whom the King of Denmark had stopped in his port of Copenhagen, under pretence that he was apprehensive of their being taken by the Dutch, in case they attempted to return. The Captain, on his arrival at Elinore, easily discovered that double-dealing of the Danish King, who now absolutely refused to deliver up the ships, pretending that he kept them for certain sums of money due to him from the late King Charles I; whereupon Ball returned with his squadron into England, but by the way took fourteen Dutch ships, and brought them with a man of war, which he likewise took, to Yarmouth (31). This was the largest of those detachments spoken of in the text, whereby Blake weakened himself so much, as to encourage the Dutch to run the hazard of another battle, notwithstanding their late defeat. This, however, must not be understood as any oversight in Blake, who acted only in obedience to the orders he received, and cannot therefore be made answerable for their consequences.

[F] Incapable of service 'till they were repaired.] There is a large and curious account of this obstinate battle in Heath, which will give the reader full satisfaction as to all the material circumstances relating to it. Intelligence was now, says he, given to Van Trump, as there had been before to the States, that the English fleet was no way recruited, that most of the ships with which De Ruyter engaged were gone into port, and that now Blake might be easily beaten in the Downs, and so the mouth of the river stopped, the war come to a period, and the Dutch have satisfaction for the damage done them, and sea-towns in England put into their hands for future security; for nothing less would content Hans in this top-gallant humour. On the 29th of November, Trump presented himself with eighty men of war and ten fire-ships on the back-side of the Godwin again, and according to expectation found General Blake, attended with no more than forty odd sail, as if he had been ignorant how to use his late victory, which came now to the dispute, and to be an undecided controversy again; yet Blake generously disdaining to be affronted again in the Downs, having called a Council of War, it was concluded he should fight, though at so unequal disadvantage; but the wind rising, the engagement was hindered 'till the next day, and anchoring the night before a little above Dover road, fair by the enemy, near morning both fleets plyed westward, we having the weather-gage, and about eleven or twelve o'clock engaged near the same place, where the first encounter was, but not with the same success, for half the fleet did not engage; the Victory, Vanguard, and the Triumph, the Admiral's ship, bore most of the stress of the fight, being at one time engaged with twenty Dutchmen, and were sorely torn in their rigging, sails, yards, and hulls; yet they fought 'till after

(31) Ibid. pag. 328.

(27) Memorials of the English Affairs, p. 526.

(28) Vol. I. pag. 428.

(29) Heath's Chron. p. 326.

(30) Ibid. p. 327.

puffed up the Dutch exceedingly, infomuch that Van Trump sailed through the Channel with a broom at his main-top-mast, to signify that he had swept those seas of English ships (r); they likewise made ballads, wherein they spoke with great triumph of their having taken the English Garland, and began to threaten taking from us all our plantations in the West-Indies (s). But in the mean time Blake repaired and recruited his fleet, Monk and Deane being now joined in commission with him, and so diligent they were, that on the eighth of February, 1653, they sailed from Queensborough with sixty men of war, and were presently joined by twenty more from Portsmouth. On the eighteenth of the same month, they discovered Van Trump with a fleet of seventy sail, and no less than three hundred merchant-ships under his convoy. Blake, with twelve ships, came up with, and engaged, the Dutch fleet, and were very severely handled. Himself, in the Triumph, had like to have been lost, had he not been timely relieved by Lawson in the Fairfax. In this warm service, Blake lost the Captain of his own ship whose name was Ball, a brave active officer, and Mr Sparrow his Secretary; himself was grievously wounded in the thigh, yet he continued the fight 'till night, by the advantage of which, the Dutch, who had six men of war sunk and taken, retired. Having set his wounded men on shore at Portsmouth, Blake followed the enemy, and came up with them the next day, about three in the afternoon, when the fight was renewed with very great loss to the Dutch; who continued retreating towards Bulloign. All the night following Blake continued the pursuit, and in the morning of the twentieth of February, the two fleets fought again with incredible fury 'till four in the afternoon, when the wind blowing favourably for the Dutch, they reached the Sands of Calais, anchored there, and thence tided it home. In these three engagements the Dutch lost eleven men of war, thirty merchant-ships, and had, according to their own accounts, fifteen hundred men slain. The English lost only one ship, the Samson, but not fewer men than the enemy (t) [G]. In the month of April, Cromwell turned out the Parliament, and shortly after assumed the Supreme Power. The States hoped great advantages from this, which, however, they did not immediately receive, Blake and his colleagues wisely declaring, that whatever happened at home, they would not suffer their country to endure either injuries or insults from abroad, and in this they were as good as their words (u) [H].

Towards

it was dark, a little before which the Garland (whose venturous Captain, out of a noble resolution, boarding Van Trump himself, was slain in the fight, and overpowered with his reserves) a Navy ship of the third rate with forty guns, was boarded by two Dutch flags, and taken; as likewise the Bonaventure, attempting to relieve them, its Captain, Hookton being slain before the Triumph could succour them; and this was not done without great hazard; for Blake was boarded twice, and had his topmast shot by the board, and had not the Vanguard and Sapphire stood resolutely by him, might have gone near to be lost; the Hercules was likewise run on shore, and all the whole fleet that engaged was miserably rent and torn, and had it not been for the night, would hardly have come off, whereas now they retreated to Dover, and so into the river against Leigh, to save themselves. The Dutch triumphantly continued where they were, resolving to fall upon Blake with their whole fleet and freships the next day at two o'clock; but missing of them, sent their scouts to Harwich and Yarmouth, to see if they were there, purposing to pursue the same resolution. In the mean time some of their seamen went ashore into Rumney Marsh to steal sheep, but the troopers were in a readiness, and killed six of them, and took eight more. Trump still continued with his fleet plying between the Isle of Wight and the Northforeland, somewhat betwixt Calais and Dungeness, having put ashore the Lieutenant of the Garland and other seamen, who informed that one Dutch ship was blown up, and but two men saved; and that Trump, and another flag-ship, and De Ruyter, had received damage. Amidst all this fray, a rich Streights English ship, called the Employment, valued at 200,000 l. got safe into harbour at Portsmouth, being pursued by seven Dutch sail of frigates (32). Whitlock gives pretty near the same account (33); but writing from his memory, places this action in the beginning of December. Rapin, who throughout the whole account of this war is extremely tender of the Dutch, says (34), that Admiral Blake having received a wound, it threw his fleet into such disorder, as rendered it impossible for him to hinder Van Trump from pursuing his course; yet our own writers say nothing of Blake's being wounded, and therefore I suppose that he confounds this with the next engagement, wherein Blake was actually wounded in the thigh. The secret of this defeat is said to lie in the little care taken by the Parliament's Committee for repairing such ships as were damaged, and for sending timely supplies to the fleet; neither have there been wanting writers honest enough to tell us why they did this. They were it seems grown extremely jealous of military men, and men of action, fearing that they should grow too high, and overtop them (35). These are the words of my author, and therefore I use them. Perhaps this conduct might pave the way to the treatment the Parliament soon after met with, viz. April 20, 1653, when they were turned out of their House by Cromwell and his officers, to whom also the fleet unanimously adhered.

[G] But not fewer men than the enemy] It is needless to trouble the reader with several accounts of the battle mentioned in the text; I shall therefore only take notice of some little particulars which are not there inserted. General Blake, the better to man his fleet, had put on board some regiments of soldiers, who behaved extremely well, and to whom, according to some accounts, the honour of the day was chiefly due (36). We must not from hence imagine, that land forces are always equally proper at sea, but consider the circumstances which distinguish this from other cases. The troops had been but a few days on board, the fleet was only employed on a cruize, and therefore, there was no danger of their being weakened by sickness, or other accidents at sea. Rapin extenuates as much as possible the defeat of the Dutch, and indeed their own writers have not been sparing in their pains to cover it, but with very little success.

[H] They were as good as their words.] The author of Blake's Life hath given a very candid and succinct account of this affair. He tells us, that when Cromwell turned the Rump out of the government, and took it upon himself and his council of officers; Blake, Deane, and Monk, and the rest of the admirals and sea-officers, published a declaration of their resolution, notwithstanding the late change, to proceed in the performance of their duties and the trust reposed in them, against the enemies of this Commonwealth. And the General was of opinion, on the revolution which happened afterwards, that 'twas his and his men's duty, to act faithfully abroad in their stations, so as might conduce most to the publick peace and welfare, whatever irregularity there was in the councils at home; saying to his officers, It is not for us to mind state affairs, but to keep Foreigners from fooling us (37). This conduct induced even Anthony Wood to say, that

(r) Heath's Chronicle, P. 381.

(s) Ibid. P. 334.

(t) Bates, Elench. Mot. P. ii. pag. 174. Clarendon's Hist. Vol. III. p. 438.

(u) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 109. Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 204.

(35) Life of Cromwell, by Carrington, pag. 109.

(36) Heath's Chronicle of the Civil War, pag. 335.

(32) Chronicle of the Civil Wars of England, &c. p. 329, 330.

(33) Memorial of English Affairs, p. 526.

(34) Hist. d'Angleterre, Vol. V. liv. xxii. p. 175.

(37) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 109.

Towards the end of the month, Blake and his colleagues, with a grand fleet of a hundred sail, stood over to the Dutch coast, and forced their fleet to fly for shelter into the Texel, where, for some time, they were kept by Monk and Deane, while Blake sailed northward; at last Trump got out, and drew together a fleet of a hundred and twenty men of war. On the third of June, the Generals, Deane and Monk, engaged the enemy off the North-foreland with indifferent success. On the fourth, General Blake came in to their assistance with eighteen fresh ships, and thereby gained a compleat victory, insomuch, that if the Dutch had not once again saved themselves on Calais Sands, their whole fleet had been sunk or taken (w) [I]. In the mean time, Cromwell had called, or rather appointed, a sort of Parliament, called the Little Parliament, in which Mr Blake had a seat, as one of the Commissioners from Somersetshire (x), and was by the same Parliament continued one of the Generals of the fleet; however, his health was so impaired, that he could not possibly go to sea, and therefore had no share, but by his advice, in the last great victory gained over the Dutch, on the twenty-ninth of July, for which, however, the Parliament ordered him a gold chain, as well as the rest of the Admirals who actually served there (y). On the tenth of October he came to London, and took his seat in the House, where he received their solemn thanks for his many and faithful services (z). The Protector, Oliver, having called a new Parliament, consisting of four hundred, Mr Blake sat therein as Member for his native town of Bridgwater (a). On the sixth of December he was constituted one of the Commissioners of the Admiralty for six months, and as he was treated with great respect by Cromwell, so he behaved towards him with much fidelity, though perhaps no great affection, since he was naturally inclined to a Commonwealth (b). In the month of November, 1654, Cromwell thought fit to send him, with a strong fleet, into the Mediterranean, with instructions which he knew would please him, viz. to support the honour of the English Flag, and to procure satisfaction for any injuries that might have been done to our merchants (c). In the beginning of December Blake came into the road of Cadiz, where he was treated with all imaginable respect; a Dutch Admiral would not hoist his flag while he was there. A French squadron having stopped one of his tenders, which had been separated from Blake in a storm, the Admiral, as soon as he knew to whom he belonged, sent for the Captain on board, drank the General's health before him with great ceremony, under a discharge of five guns, and then dismissed him (d). The Algerines were so much afraid of him, that they stopped the Saltee Rovers, obliged them to deliver up what English prisoners they had on board, and then sent them freely to Blake in order to merit his favour. All this, however, did not hinder his coming on the tenth of March before Algiers, sending an officer on shore to the Dey, with a message, importing, that he had orders to demand satisfaction for the piracies committed on the English, as also the release of all such English captives as were then in the place. To this the Dey answered, that the ships and captives taken belonged to particular men, and therefore he could not restore them without discontenting all his subjects; yet he might if he pleased redeem what English captives were there, at a reasonable price set on their heads, and, if he thought good, they would conclude a peace with him, and, for the future, offer no acts of hostility to those of his nation. He accompanied this answer with a very large present of fresh provisions, and it seems at that time to have satisfied Blake, who, leaving Algiers, sailed to Tunis on the same errand (e). The Dey of Tunis, who was a very brave man, but a little obstinate, refused to give him any answer, or even to

(w) A true Relation of the late great Sea Fight, in a Letter to His Excellency the Lord-General Cromwell, from General Blake and General Monk, dated from on board the Resolution off Ostend, July 4, 1653, Lond. printed for H. Hills, 4to.

(x) Heath's Chronicle, p. 331.

(y) Winstanley's England's Worthies, p. 555. Heath's Chron. p. 349.

(z) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 112.

(a) Heath's Chronicle, p. 463. Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 113.

(b) Clarendon's Hist. Vol. III. p. 487.

(c) Clarendon's Hist. Vol. III. p. 577. Bates, Elenchus Mot. P. II. p. 205.

(d) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 114.

(e) Heath's Chronicle, p. 366.

to

that ever after Blake continued a fortunate vindicator of his country's privileges from the encroachments of insulting neighbours, a victorious enemy of the Spaniards, and was highly valued by all, even the Royalists (38). To say the truth, it is hard to conceive how Admiral Blake could have acted any other part than he did, consistent with his regard to his country; since it is certain, that the Parliament began to be suspected of intending to perpetuate themselves, which would have been little better than enslaving the rest of the nation. Besides, the officers on board the fleet were very little satisfied with the conduct of the Committee, who, by virtue of the powers given them by Parliament, were a sort of Lords of the Admiralty; and as we have spoke twice of these, it may not be amiss to name them; they were Sir Henry Vane, junior, Mr Saloway, Colonel Thompson, and Mr John Carew (39).

[I] Their whole fleet had been sunk or taken. We are told by Rapin, that the two fleets met the second of June and came to an engagement, which was renewed the next day, in which second battle, Trump fighting with great disadvantage, was obliged to retire in disorder, having lost many ships, which were sunk or taken by the English (40). This is a very blind account of so remarkable an action, especially, when he might so easily have had a better; besides, the date is false, for it was not the second but the third of June. As to the loss on both sides, the most particular account I have met with follows (41). On the side of the Dutch, there were without doubt a great number slain, but how many is uncertain, perhaps it may be guessed at by the subsequent articles. Prisoners, there were one thousand three hundred and fifty, and of these, six were Captains. Ships sunk, six. Men of war taken, eleven. Of the English there were slain General Deane, and one Captain. Of private men, one hundred and twenty. Wounded, two hundred thirty-six; but not so much as one ship was either sunk or disabled. But the importance of this victory will be best declared by the consequences of it, which are thus represented by Heath, who wrote at the very time (42). The English, says he, after their victory still lay upon the coasts of Holland, into whose ports and harbours, upon the pursuit, as far as the Texel, they had driven and scattered the Dutch fleet, which had so brought down the stomachs of the Hollander, that that Province having as before sent away a boat with a white flag, with a messenger for a passport, and a safe conduct for two Ambassadors; and having obtained it, sent away the Lords Youngfall and Vande Peere, to follow two others newly gone before. These arrived the twentieth of June, and had audience the twenty-second: Their message being of such importance, for every day their merchant-ships were taken coming home, and there was no stirring out for any; so that there was an absolute cessation there of trade, no less than thirty ships richly laden, having been taken by our fleet riding in the mouths of their havens.

(41) Chronicle of the Civil Wars of England, p. 346.

(38) Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 204.

(39) Heath's Chronicle, p. 331.

(40) Histoire d'Angleterre, iv. xxii.

(41) The Perfect Politician, or the Life of Cromwell, p. 178.

to suffer him to take in fresh water, supposing that the extraordinary pains he had taken to fortify the place were sufficient to defend it; but he was extremely mistaken, for Blake forced him to an humble submission, and to a peace extremely advantageous for his country, after he had demolished his castles, and burnt all the shipping in the haven of Tunis (f) [K]. He in like manner terrified the piratical state of Tripoli into making peace with England, and also brought the Knights of Malta to a composition for the injuries they had done to this nation (g). These last exploits were performed in the spring of the year 1655, and raised the glory of the English name so high, that most of the Princes and States in Italy, thought fit to pay their compliments to the Protector, particularly the Grand Duke of Tuscany, and the free State of Venice, who sent magnificent embassies for that purpose (b). The war in the mean time was grown pretty hot with Spain, and Blake, in pursuance of the Protector's orders, did all that in his power lay to ruin their maritime force in Europe, as Penn had done in the West-Indies (i). But these extraordinary and continual cares, falling on a constitution already not a little impaired, brought General Blake into so bad a state of health, that fearing the ill consequences that might happen, in case he should die without having any colleague, who in such a case might take charge of the fleet, he wrote letters into England, suggesting the expediency of joining some proper person in commission with him, upon which General Montague was sent with a strong squadron to assist him, and was made Joint-Admiral with him according to his desire (k). Soon after his arrival in the Mediterranean, Blake and he sailed with their whole fleet, to block up a Spanish squadron in the bay of Cadiz, which they accordingly did for several months. At last, in September, finding they were in want of water, Blake and Montague stood away for the coast of Portugal, leaving Capt. Stayner, with seven ships under his command to look after the enemy. While they were gone the Spanish plate fleet appeared, steering for Cadiz, but were intercepted by Stayner, who took the Vice-Admiral, and another galleon, which were afterwards burnt by accident, the Rear-Admiral with two millions of plate on board, and another ship richly laden. These prizes, together with all the prisoners, were, on the return of the fleet, sent into England under General Montague, and Blake alone remained in the Mediterranean (l). Notwithstanding his distempers, which now appeared to be the dropsy and scurvy, grew upon him daily, yet he kept up his spirits to the last, and being informed that another plate fleet had put into Santa Cruz, in the island of Teneriff, he, in the month of April 1657, sailed thither with a fleet of twenty-five men of war. On the twentieth of that month, he came into the road of Santa Cruz, and notwithstanding the Spanish Governor had timely notice, was a man of great courage and conduct, and had disposed all things in the properest manner possible, for the preservation both of the ships and the place, and from a view of the provision he had made, looked upon an attack, as a thing no wise Admiral would think practicable; yet Blake, having once summoned him and received a short answer, determined to force the place, and to do his utmost to burn the fleet that was therein, which he performed in such a manner, as astonished the ablest seamen of those times, and appears next to incredible in these (m). It is allowed to be one of the most remarkable actions that ever happened at sea, and therefore we have given a particular account of it in the notes [L.] In this bloody [K] Burnt all the shipping in the bay of Tunis. The answer sent by the Dey to General Blake was haughty and full of contempt. Here, said he, are our castles of Goletta, and Porto Ferino, do you wench, do you think we fear your fleet? On the hearing this, Blake, as his custom was, when in a passion, began to curl his whiskers, and after a short consultation with his officers, bore into the bay of Porto Ferino, with his great ships and their seconds, and coming within musket-shot of the castle and the line, he fired on both so warmly, that in two hours the castle was rendered defenceless, and the guns on the works along the shore were dismounted, though sixty of them played at a time on the English. The General found nine ships in the road, and ordered every Captain, even, of his own ship, to man his long-boat with choice men, and these to enter the harbour, and fire the 'Tunisens, while he and his fleet covered them from the castle, by playing continually on it with their cannon. The seamen in their boats boldly assaulted the pirates, and burnt all their ships with the loss of twenty-five men killed, and forty-eight wounded. 'This daring action spread the terror of his name thro' Africa and Asia, which had for a long time before been formidable in Europe (43).

[L] A particular account of it in the notes. On the twentieth of April 1657, the English fleet under the command of Admiral Blake, were fair in the offing of Sancta Cruz, where they discovered how bravely the Spanish ships, sixteen in number, were barricaded in this bay, where they lay in a manner semi-circular. Near in the mouth of this haven stands a castle, sufficiently furnished with great ordnance, which threatened destruction to any that durst enter without its leave into the harbour; besides this, there stood seven forts more round about the bay, with six, four, and three great guns a piece, and united together by a line of communication from one fort to another, which was manned with musqueteers. To make all safe, Don Diego Diagues, General of the Spanish fleet, was not idle, in making provision for the best defence of his armado; he caused all the smaller ships to be moored close along the shore, and the six great galleons stood further out at anchor, with their broadsides towards the sea. It happened at this time, there was a Dutch Merchant-ship in the bay, the master thereof seeing the English ready to enter, and that a combat would presently be commenced, it made him fear, that among all the blows that would be given, he could not avoid some knocks; therefore to save himself, he went to Don Diego, and desired his leave to depart the harbour, for, said he, I am very sure Blake will be presently amongst you. To this the resolute Don made no other reply, but get you gone if you will, and let Blake come if he dares. They that knew Blake's courage, could not but know it needless to dare him to an engagement. All things being ordered for fight, a squadron of ships was drawn out of the whole fleet to make the first onset; these were commanded by Captain Stayner in the Speaker frigate, who no sooner had received orders, but immediately he flew into the bay with his canvas wings, and by eight in the morning fell pell-mell upon the Spanish fleet, without the least regard to the forts,

(f) Clarendon's Hist. Vol. III. p. 580.

(g) Heath's Chronicle, p. 366.

(b) Le Vie de Cromwell, par Greg. Leti, Vol. II. p. 347.

(i) Clarendon's Hist. Vol. III. p. 580.

(k) Ibid. Vol. III. p. 586.

(l) Heath's Chronicle, p. 383. Waller's Poems, Lond. 1750, 12mo, p. 121.

(m) Clarendon's Hist. Vol. III. p. 600. Bates, Elenchus, Mot. P. ii. p. 227. Heath's Chron. p. 391. Sir Philip Warwick's Memoirs, p. 383. Life of Cromwell, by Carrington, p. 109. La Vie de Cromwell, par Greg. Leti, Vol. II. p. 446.

(44) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 115.

bloody engagement it so fell out, that Capt. Benjamin Blake, the Admiral's brother, was guilty of some mistake in his conduct, for which the Admiral caused him instantly to be removed, his regard for his country obliging him to prefer strict justice to any ties of natural affection (n). As soon as the news arrived in England of this extraordinary action, the Protector sent his Secretary to acquaint his second Parliament, then sitting, therewith, whereupon they ordered a publick thanksgiving, and directed a diamond ring, worth five hundred pounds, to be sent to Blake. One hundred pounds were given to the Captain who brought the news, and the thanks of the House was ordered to all the officers and seamen, and to be given them by their General (o). These, as they were the last honours, so the receipt of them was the last news this brave officer received from his dearly-belov'd country. For, returning into the Mediterranean, and cruising some time before Cadiz; he found his end draw on so fast, that it determined him, if possible, to return home. Accordingly he sailed for England, and in his last sickness often enquired for land, which, however, he never lived to see, dying as the fleet was entering Plymouth-Sound, on board his ship the St George, the seventeenth of August, 1657, being about fifty-nine years of age (p). His body was the next day embalmed and wrapped up in lead, his bowels were buried in the great church at Plymouth, and his corps conveyed by sea to Greenwhich-House, where it lay in state for some time; from thence, on the fourth of September, it was carried by water in a barge of state, covered with velvet, adorned with escutcheons and pencils, accompanied by his brother, relations, and servants, in mourning; by Oliver's Privy-council, the Commissioners of the Admiralty and Navy, the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London, the Field-Officers of the army, and many other persons of honour and quality, in a great number of barges and wherries covered with mourning, marshalled and ordered by the Heralds at Arms, who directed and attended the solemnity. Thus they passed to Westminster-bridge, and at their landing, proceeded in the same manner through a guard of several regiments of foot to the Abbey, his dear friend General Lambert (q), though then in disgrace with the Protector, attending on his horse. The procession over, the body was interred in a vault, built on purpose, in the chapel of King Henry VII (r), whence it was removed on the twelfth of September, 1661, and re-interred in St Margaret's Church yard (s). He was a man but of a low stature, however, of a quick lively eye, and of a good soldier-like countenance. He was, in his person, brave beyond example, yet cool in action, and shewed a great deal of military conduct in the disposition of those desperate attacks, which men of a cooler composition have judged rather fortunate than expedient. He certainly loved his country with extraordinary ardour, and as he never meddled with intrigues of State, so whatever Government he served, he was sollicitous to do his duty. He was upright to a supreme degree, for notwithstanding the vast sums which passed through his hands, he scarce left five hundred pounds behind him of his own acquiring. In fine, he was altogether disinterested and unambitious, exposing himself on all occasions for the benefit of the publick and the glory of the nation, and not with any view to his own private profit or fame. In respect to his personal character, he was pious without affectation, strictly just, and liberal to the utmost extent of his fortune. His officers he treated with the familiarity of friends, and to his sailors he was truly a parent. The State buried him as it was fit, at the publick expence they gave him a grave, but no tomb, and though he still wants

(n) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 121.

(o) Heath's Chronicle, p. 392.

(p) Mercurius Politicus, No. 375. Whitlock's Memorial, p. 664. Heath's Chron. p. 402.

(q) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 205. Winstanley's England's Worthies, p. 578. Heath's Chron. p. 402.

(r) Kennet's Register and Chronicle, p. 536. Perfect Politician, or Life of Oliver Cromwell, pag. 247.

(s) Kennet's Register, ubi supra. Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 205. Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 123, 124.

an forts, that spent their shot prodigally upon him. No sooner were these entered into the bay, but Blake following after, placed certain ships to pour broad sides into the castle and forts. These played their parts so well, that after some time the Spaniards found their forts too hot to be held. In the mean time, Blake strikes in with Stayner, and bravely fought the Spanish ships, which were not much inferior in number to the English, but in men they were far the superior. Here we see a resolute bravery many times may carry the day, and make numbers lie by the lee; this was manifest, for by two of the clock in the afternoon, the English had beaten the enemies out of their ships. Now Blake, seeing an impossibility of carrying them away, he ordered his men to fire their prizes; which was done so effectually, that all the Spanish fleet were reduced to ashes, except two ships that sunk downright, nothing remaining of them above water, but some part of their masts. The English having now got a compleat victory, were put to another difficulty by the wind, which blew so strong into the bay, that many despaired of getting out of it again. But God's providence was miraculously seen, in causing the wind on a sudden to veer about to the South-West, (a thing not known in many years before) which brought Blake and his fleet safe to sea again, notwithstanding the Spaniards from the castle played their great guns perpetually upon him as they passed by. The wind, as it proved a friend to bring the English forth, so it continued to carry them back again to their former station near Cadiz (44). — The Earl of Clarendon's reflexions on this extraordinary exploit are extremely worthy of notice. 'The whole action, says he, was so miraculous, that all men who knew the place wondered, that any sober men, with what courage soever endued, would ever have undertaken it; and they could hardly persuade themselves to believe what they had done; whilst the Spaniards comforted themselves with the belief, that they were devils and not men, who had destroyed them in such a manner. So much a strong resolution of bold and courageous men can bring to pass, that no resistance and advantage of ground can disappoint them. And it can hardly be imagined, how small loss the English sustained in this unparalleled action, no one ship being left behind, and the killed and wounded not exceeding two hundred men, when the slaughter on board the Spanish ships and on the shore was incredible (45). — Sir Philip Warwick seems to have looked upon this action in another light, for thus he speaks of it: Blake's rash and daring attempt proved very fortunate and glorious upon the Spanish ships in Sancta Cruz; where, if the wind had not almost to a miracle veered about to bring him off, the conqueror must have necessarily been conquered. For as he was not able to bring off his prize, and therefore burnt it, so he had not been able to bring off himself, unless the wind had been thus favourable to him (46).

(44) Heath's Chronicle of the Civil War, pag. 391.

(45) Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. III. p. 601.

(46) Memoirs of Affairs after the King's Murder, p. 383.

(t) See the note [M].

(u) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 125.

(w) History of England, during the reign of the Royal House of Stuarts, Vol. I. p. 421.

(x) General Dict. Vol. III. p. 371.

an epitaph, writers of all parties have shewn an eagerness to do his memory justice (t) [M]. We find it very positively asserted, that Captain Benjamin Blake, brother to the General, suffered for many hardships for being a Dissenter, in the latter end of the reign of King Charles II, that he found himself under a necessity of selling his patrimony, and transporting himself and his family to Carolina (u). Another author (though some indeed think it is the same) relates this story of Mr Humphry Blake, the General's brother, and tells us, the family estate was worth two hundred pounds a year, which he was obliged to dispose of, to pay the fines laid upon him for his Nonconformity (w). It is, however, strange, that every one of the General's nephews and nieces, by his sister Susannah, who married a gentleman at Minebrand in Somersetshire, should be totally unacquainted with this transaction, and that none of the family still living, should be able to give any account of that matter, which, however, is said to be the case (x), and therefore it seems to be justly doubted, whether there be any truth in the story, or whether it is only grounded on there being a considerable family of his name settled in that province, one of whom, when it was in private hands, was a Lord Proprietor.

[M] To do his memory justice. We will begin with the writer nearest his own time, the author of the State Paper, or Gazette of those days, who gave the publick the news of his death in these words. 'August 20, 1657. This morning came the unwelcome news of the death of that gallant General, Blake, a man of great honour, that hath wholly devoted himself to the service of his country, and who gave many proofs of an extraordinary courage and conduct in actions both by sea and land. He had been a long time a decaying, and in his return, being come to the Lizard Point, finding himself to fail, he called several of the Commanders of the other ships abroad his own to confer with them; afterwards, drawing on towards his last, he willed them to bear up with all speed to Plymouth, hoping to have reached land before his death, but in the very entrance into the Sound of Plymouth he expired. His body being embowelled, and closed in a sheet of lead, the bowels were interred there in the cathedral church, and his corpse was sent along with the ships towards the Downs

(47) Mercurius Politicus, No. 375.

(47). — Dr Bates, who was Physician to King Charles I, the Protector Oliver, and to King Charles II, speaks thus of Blake. He became famous by many actions abroad, for he humbled the pride of France, reduced the Portuguese to submission, broke the strength of the Dutch, and drove their fleets out of the sea, subdued the Pirates in the Mediterranean, and twice triumphed over the Spaniards, blameable only in this, that he joined himself with the Parricides. At the beginning of this character, he tells us Blake was a man ab hoste laudandus, deserving praise through an enemy, which makes it the more remarkable (48). — Clarendon having run through the series of Blake's employments, to the time of his first going on board the fleet, concludes thus. He then betook himself wholly to the sea, and quickly made himself signal there. He was the first man that declined the old track, and made it manifest that the science might be attained in less time than was imagined, and despised those rules which had been long in practice, to keep his ship and his men out of danger; which had been held in former times a point of great ability and circumspection, as if the principal art requisite in the Captain of a ship had been to be sure to come home safe again. He was the first man who brought the ships to contemn castles on shore, which had been thought ever very formidable, and were discovered by him to make a noise only, and to fright those who could be rarely hurt by them. He was the first that infused that proportion of courage into the seamen, by making them see by experience what mighty things they could do if they were resolved, and taught them to fight in fire as well as upon the water; and tho' he hath been very well imitated and followed, he was the first that gave the example of that kind of naval courage, and bold and resolute achievements (49). — Bishop Burnet hath preserved a passage very honourable to his memory, which I insert here, because I do not exactly know where it ought to have been placed in order of time. While Blake lay in the road of Malaga, before the war broke out with Spain, some of his seamen going ashore, met the Host carrying about, and not only paid no respect to it, but laughed at those who did. One of the Spanish priests put the people upon resenting this indignity, and they fell upon them and beat them severely. When they returned to their ships, they complained of this usage; upon which Blake sent a trumpet to the Viceroy, to demand the priest, who was the chief instrument in that ill usage. The Viceroy answered, that he had no authority over the priests, and so could not dispose of them. General Blake upon that sent him word, that he would not enquire who had the power to send the priest to him, but if he were not sent within three hours, he would burn their town. The Spaniards hearing this, obliged the Viceroy to send the priest to Blake, and he justified himself upon the petulant behaviour of the seamen. Blake answered, that if he had sent a complaint to him of it, he would have punished them severely, since he would not suffer his men to affront the established religion of any place, at which he touched; but he took it ill that he had set on the Spaniards to do it, for he would have all the world to know, that an Englishman was only to be punished by an Englishman; so he treated the priest civilly, and sent him back, being satisfied that he had him in his power. Cromwell was much delighted with this, and read the letters in Council with great satisfaction, saying, that he hoped he should make the name of an Englishman as great as ever that of a Roman had been (50). — An author, who was contemporary with Blake, wrote the following verses upon his death.

(48) Elenchus Motuum, Lond. 1676, p. 323. In the English edition, Part. ii. p. 228.

(49) Clarendon's History, Vol. III. p. 602.

(50) Hist. of his own times, Lond. 1724, fol. Vol. I. p. 80, 81.

Here lies a man made Spain and Holland shake,
Made France to tremble, and the Turks to quake:

Thus he tam'd men, but if a lady stood

In's fight, it rais'd a palsy in his blood;

Cupid's antagonist, who in his life

Had fortune as familiar as a wife.

A stiff, hard, iron soldier; for he

It seems had more of Mars than Mercury;

At sea he thundered, calm'd each raging wave,

And now he's dead, sent thund'ring to his grave (51).

(51) Winstanley's English Worthies, p. 571.

From these verses it looks as if the Admiral had been little addicted to the fair sex; and indeed the author of his life, who lived some time in his brother's family, informs us, that he died a bachelor, not five hundred pounds richer than his father left him, the estate of the family descending to his brother Benjamin Blake mentioned in the text (52). There has been a grievous complaint made, that, after the Restoration, the bones of this true patriot, and victorious Admiral, were taken out of his grave and ignominiously thrown into a ditch (53). But this, not to call it a falsity, is a violent exaggeration (54). After the Restoration, there was an order to remove the dead bodies of the rebels that had been buried in the Abbey, amongst the rest Cromwell, Ireton, &c. whose remains were ignominiously treated; but as for those of Blake, they were with great decency re-interred in St Margaret's Church-yard (55).

(52) Lives English and Foreign, Vol. II. p. 125.

(53) Oldmixon's History of England, &c. Vol. I. p. 421. Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, Vol. IV. p. 174.

(54) Grey's Impartial Examination of Neal's History, Vol. III. p. 315.

(55) Kennet's Historical Register, p. 536.

BLOOD (THOMAS) generally called Colonel Blood, as extraordinary an adventurer, as ever lived in this or any other country. He was, according to some accounts, the son of a Blacksmith in Ireland (a), but from other impartial evidences, I rather conclude his father to have been concerned in iron-works, and to have acquired an easy fortune in that kingdom, to the prospect of which this man was born (b), and so might be said to come into the world a gentleman [A]. It is also not a little uncertain when he was born; but from a comparison of circumstances, it appears probable it was in 1628, or thereabouts (c). He came over into England while a very young man, and married in Lancashire, the daughter of one Mr Holcraft, a gentleman of good character in that county; this seems to have been in 1648, for he was in England when Col. Rainford was surprized and killed at Pontefract (d). He returned afterwards into Ireland, and though his family owed the best part of what they had to the pure favour of the Crown, yet he struck in with the prevailing party, and served as a Lieutenant in the Parliament forces, and obtained a certain quantity of land assigned him for his pay; besides which, Henry Cromwell, when he governed that country, had so good an opinion of him, as to put him into the commission of the peace, though scarce two and twenty years of age (e). These favours, and the turn of his education, in all probability gave him such an inclination to these sort of people, as was not to be reformed, and after the King's Restoration there happened some accidents, which contributed to increase his disaffection to the Government. The Act of Settlement in Ireland, and the proceedings thereupon, certainly affected him deeply in his fortune, and he believed unjustly, which easily drew him to turn his thoughts any way that promised redress (f). He knew there were multitudes in the same condition that had been old soldiers, and were equally capable of contriving, concealing, and carrying into execution, a plot, for altering or subverting any form of government, of which he had seen some examples. Upon associating a little with the malecontents, he found his notions exactly justified, that there was a design on foot for a general insurrection, which was to be begun by surprizing the castle of Dublin, and seizing the person of the Duke of Ormond, then Lord-Lieutenant (g). Into this he entered without any hesitation, and though many of the persons involved in this dangerous undertaking, were much his superiors in rank, yet he very soon was at the head of the affair, presided in all their councils; was the oracle in laying their projects, and depended on for conducting them in their execution. He shewed his dexterity in things of this nature, by laying such a plan for surprizing Dublin Castle, and the Duke's person at the same time, as nothing but its being divulged could have prevented, and at the same time, he penned a Declaration so accommodated to the humour and understanding of the soldiers, as would infallibly have drawn over the best part of the army (h). But on the very eve of its execution, the whole conspiracy, which had been long suspected, was absolutely discovered, and so Col. Blood had only the honour of the contrivance (i) [B]. His brother-in-law, one Lackie a Minister, who

(a) Sir Gilbert Talbot, in his Narrative and Remarks on Col. Blood's attempt on the Regalia.

(b) Remarks on Mr Blood's Life, p. 1.

(c) He was made a Justice of the Peace in the time of the Troubles when scarce of age.

(d) Remarks on Blood's Life, p. 1.

(e) Ibid. ubi supra.

(f) Kennet's Complete Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 280.

(g) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 420.

(h) See the Resolution of the Irish House of Commons, in note [B].

(i) Remarks on the Life of Mr Blood, p. 2.

[A] Might be said to come into the world a gentleman.] It is in the account drawn up by Mr Edwards and his son (1), of the manner in which Blood took the crown out of the Tower, that he is said to be the son of a Blacksmith. But this seems to be questioned by a very intelligent author (2), who informs us, that whatever his parents were, he had by Letters patent, dated June the 12th, in the 16th of King Charles I, a Grant of the towns and lands of Sarney, Beatorwne and Foylestowne, in the barony of Dunboyne in the county of Meath, as also five hundred acres of unprofitable mountain in the territory of Glammabur, alias le Glims, in the county of Wicklowe. Another author, who seems to be very well acquainted with all the remarkable passages of his life (3), speaks thus of his parentage, which does not seem to agree with the report of his being the son of a Blacksmith, though it must be confessed that it is not very explicit. 'His birth was such as gave him those advantages that usually distinguish a man from the vulgar; for though wit and parts, courage and strength, are not hereditary to the gentility, yet it is a great felicity to be born of such parents, as are above those wants that deprive them of bestowing the benefits of education upon their children; and so far from the reproaches of poverty, that they are never spoken of by the world but with a decent and becoming character. Such were Mr Blood's parentage, serious, honest, and of no inferior credit and possession in the country where they lived; which made them take that care that their offspring should not be degenerate from the virtues and repute of his ancestors, for forming and shaping his conditions according to the rules of strict and sober education, which had that influence upon him as to preserve him from those extravagancies that usually attend upon metallal and active spirits.'

[B] So Col. Blood had only the honour of the contrivance.] The reader is to observe, that there were two distinct designs on foot in 1663; the one a general insurrection, the other, the surprizing the castle of Dublin. The latter was indeed only a branch of the former, but different persons were concerned in them, only Blood embarked in both, and was of the council both in the country and in Dublin; and it was intended to have executed the scheme of surprizing the Lord-Lieutenant on the 9th or 10th of March, but one Mr Philip Alden, who was of the council, gave intelligence to the Duke of Ormond, who thereupon took such measures as might have discouraged men of less spirit and resolution; but in respect to them these steps only served to quicken them, so that they determined to put their scheme in execution on the 5th of March, 1663 (4). The design was not ill laid, several persons with petitions in their hands were to wait within the castle, as if they staid to present them to the Lord-Lieutenant, and about fourscore of the old daring disbanded soldiers were to stay on the outside, dressed like Carpenters, Smiths, Shoemakers, and other ordinary mechanicks. As soon as the Lord-Lieutenant went in, a Baker was to pass by the main guard with a large basket of white bread on his back, which, by making a false step, he was to throw down, which might create a scramble among the soldiers, and offer the fourscore men aforementioned an opportunity of disarming them, while the others with petitions in their hands secured all within, and being once master of the castle and the Duke of Ormond's person, they were to publish their declaration (5). But the principal conspirators were seized about twelve hours before the time appointed for the execution of the design, in which no less than seven Members of the House of Commons (for the Parliament of Ireland was then sitting) were concerned. This brought the matter to be examined before that assembly, who, after giving their Members a day to be heard, which they declined, came amongst other resolutions to these that follow (6), viz.

9 X

I. That

(1) Stowe's Survey of London, by Strype, Vol. I. B. 1. p. 92.

(2) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 420.

(3) Remarks on the Life of the famed Mr Blood, London, 1680, fol. p. 1.

(4) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 420.

(5) State Letters of the Earl of Ortery, p. 63, 70.

(6) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. In the Appendix, p. 30.

was embarked in the business, was, with many others, apprehended, tried, convicted, and executed, but Lieutenant Thomas Blood made his escape, and kept out of reach, notwithstanding the Duke of Ormond, and the Earl of Orrery, both laboured to have him secured, and a proclamation was published by the former, with the promise of an ample reward for apprehending him (k). Nor was he only so lucky as to prevent confinement and punishment, but by an audacity still more singular, had almost frightened away the guards that attended Lackie's execution, and even alarmed the friends of the Lord-Lieutenant on the score of his safety (l). So high was Blood's fame for sagacity and intrepidity at this time, and so capable he was held of undertaking any thing his passion or interest dictated, and of conducting skillfully whatever was by him undertaken, how desperate or difficult soever [C]. He stayed as long among the Sectaries and remains of Oliver's forces, as he found it practicable to conceal himself, and then had recourse to the mountains, and the protection of the old native Irish, and the better to attach those he conversed with to his interests, he became all things to all men, he was a Quaker to some, an Anabaptist to others, an Independent where that would best recommend him, and to bespeak the favour of the poor ignorant natives, he took the character of a Priest (m). By these arts he shifted about from one place to another, making himself acquainted with all parties in the island, and with all their interests and connections at home and abroad (n). At last, finding all his haunts known, and that it was impossible to raise, at that juncture, any insurrection, he found means to get over into Holland, where he was very well received, and admitted into great intimacy with some of the most considerable persons in the Republick, particularly Admiral de Ruyter (o). He went from thence to England, with such recommendations to the Fifth-monarchy-men, and other malecontents, that he was immediately admitted into all their councils, and had a large share in all those dark intrigues that were then carrying on, for throwing the nation again into confusion (p). In this situation he gave another strong instance of his bold enterprising genius, which almost exceeds belief [D]. But finding the Government apprized of their designs, and foreseeing

(k) Orrery's Letters, p. 69, 70.

(l) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 423.

(m) Ibid.

(n) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 423.

(o) Remarks on the Life of Mr Blood, p. 3.

(p) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 420.

I. That all and every the said persons were engaged in the said desperate and traitorous plot.

II. That the said plot (had it not been prevented by the blessing of God upon the great wisdom and vigilancy of his Grace the Lord-Lieutenant) would probably have engaged the three kingdoms under dreadful and sad consequences.

III. That the paper being an intended declaration, written with the hand of Thomas Blood, late of Sarney, one of the ringleaders in the said conspiracy, and sent by the Lord-Lieutenant, with the other examinations, informations, and confessions, this day to the House, and distinctly read, is scandalous treasonable, and false in every particular, and that upon the knowledge of this House; and therefore that his Grace would be pleased, if he thinks fit, to command the said paper, or copy thereof, to be burnt by the hand of the common hangman, at the most publick place in this city.

[C] Whatever was by him undertaken, how desperate or difficult soever. His brother Mr Lackie, the Minister, endeavoured to secure himself from punishment for the share he had in this treasonable design, by pretending madness, but that had no effect; he was tried and condemned, and, in pursuance of his sentence, was brought to the place of execution, when a rumour was spread among the populace, that Captain Blood was coming with a party to rescue the prisoner; upon which every one, even to the hangman, shifted for himself, and left the prisoner with a halter about his neck alone under the gallows; but nobody appearing, the Sheriff's officers recovered their spirits, returned to their posts, and saw the poor man hanged

(7) Remarks upon the Life of Mr Blood, p. 2.

(8) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 423.

(9) A Letter to the Author, &c. at the close of Sir Richard Cox's Hist. of Ireland, p. 6.

(7). It was not long after this, that the Lord-Lieutenant took a journey into the country, either for business or pleasure, with no other attendance than a few of his own servants; he was advised by the Lord Mount-Alexander to be more careful of his person, as he had information that Blood had been lately in that neighbourhood, where he laboured to stir up the people to sedition, and frequently declared, that the seizing the Duke of Ormond would have been off greater service to their cause, than surprizing the castle of Dublin (8). It appears from these two instances, that both the vulgar and the better sort of people were alike frightened and alarmed, from the apprehension of this man's cunning and boldness. Indeed, considering the number of the disaffected in that kingdom, and the temper of those people, it was no great wonder, since after the first plot on the castle of Dublin was detected, they went on with their general design, 'till that also was discovered, and the principal persons concerned in it either seized or dispersed (9).

[D] Another strong instance of his bold enterprising genius, which almost exceeds belief. All the facts mentioned in the text are so well supported by authorities, that there is not the least reason to doubt of the truth of them, though it is very difficult at this distance of time to fix the dates of his several enterprises. This, of which we are to speak, seems to have happened in the year 1665, a little after the discovery of an insurrection that was to have been raised by these people in the North and in the West, and which was a branch of the same general design, wherein Mr Blood was engaged in Ireland, and for which several had suffered in Yorkshire, in the beginning of the year 1664 (10). All these discoveries and disappointments could not deter these resolute and discontented people from prosecuting their original design, and notwithstanding it had been divulged in a Court of Justice, that they had a secret council constantly sitting in London for the management of their intrigues, yet that council continued to sit, and Mr Blood was of it, and for their security they had about thirty stout fellows posted about the place where they met, in the nature of a Corps de Garde (11). It fell out that two of the members of the council, to secure themselves, and perhaps for the sake of a reward, betrayed all their transactions to the Ministry, which Mr Blood soon suspected, and in a short time got to the bottom of the whole affair. He appointed these people to meet him at a tavern in the city, where he had his guard ready, who secured them without any noise, and carried them to a private place provided for the purpose, where he called a kind of Court-Martial, before whom these two persons were tried, found guilty, and sentenced to be shot two days after in the same place. When the time appointed came, they were brought out, and all the necessary preparations made for putting the sentence in execution, and the poor men seeing no hopes of escape, disposed themselves to suffer as well they could. At this critical juncture Mr Blood was graciously pleased to grant them his pardon, and at the same time advised them to go to their new master, tell him all that had happened, and request him in the name of their old confederates to be as favourable to such of them as should at any time stand in need of his mercy (12). Whether these unfortunate people carried Mr Blood's message to the King or not, does not any where appear. It is however certain, that not long after the whole conspiracy was discovered, in consequence of which, on the 26th of April, 1666, Col. John Rathbone and some other officers in the late disbanded army, were tried and convicted at the Old Bailey for a plot to surprize the Tower, and to kill General Monk; and it appeared in evidence upon their trial,

(10) Kennet's Complete Hist. Vol. III. p. 247.

(11) History of Plots, p. 195.

(12) Remarks upon the Life of Mr Blood, p. 45.

foreseeing the persons principally concerned could not escape being apprehended, he resolved to withdraw into Scotland, where he so wrought upon the discontents of the people, that he contributed not a little to the breaking out of the rebellion there; and was present in the action of Pentland-Hills, Nov. 27, 1666, in which the rebels were routed, and above five hundred killed (7). He fled, after this defeat, back to England, and from thence to Ireland, where he landed within three miles of Carrickfergus, but Lord Duncannon pursued him so closely, that he was obliged to retire very speedily into England (7). He had not been long in this kingdom before he performed a fresh exploit, which was as extraordinary, more successful, and made much greater noise in the world than any thing he had yet done. As the circumstances attending it are very little known, we have given the only distinct narrative that remains of it a place in the notes [E]. Before he engaged himself that to facilitate this design, the city of London was to have been set on fire, and that the 3d of September following was fixed upon from Lilly's Almanack as a lucky day for that purpose (13). Nor is it amiss to observe, that though these people suffered according to their sentence so long before, yet that dreadful fire, which consumed so great part of this metropolis, actually began upon the same fatal day these men had fixed for its destruction; which occasioned Lilly's being examined before the Committee of the House of Commons appointed to enquire how that fire began; to whom he declared it was his sentiments, that it fell out merely by accident (14).

(7) Historian's Guide, p. 62.

(7) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 420.

[E] The only distinct narrative that remains of it a place in the notes. This occurs in the life of Mr Blood, and runs thus. Among those that were apprehended was one Captain Mason, a person for whom Mr Blood had a particular affection and friendship (15).

This person was to be removed from London to one of the northern counties, in order to his trial at the assizes, and to that intent was sent down with eight of the Duke's troop to guard him, being reckoned to be a person bold and courageous. Mr Blood having notice of this journey, resolves by the way to rescue his friend. The prisoner and his guard went away in the morning, and Mr Blood having made choice of three more of his acquaintance, set forward the same day at night without boots upon small horses, and their pistols in their trousers, to prevent suspicion. But opportunities are not so easily had, neither were all places convenient, so that the convoy and their prisoner were gone a good way beyond Newark before Mr Blood and his friends had any scent of their prisoner. At one place they set a sentinel to watch his coming by, but whether it was out of fear, or that the person was tired with a tedious expectation, the sentinel brought them no tidings either of the prisoner or his guard, inasmuch that Mr Blood and his companions began to think their friend so far before them upon the road, that it would be in vain to follow him; and yet not willing to give over an enterprise so generously undertaken, upon Mr Blood's encouragement they rode on, though despairing of success, 'till finding it grow towards evening, and meeting with a convenient inn upon the road in a small village not far from Doncaster, they resolved to lie there all night, and return for London the next morning. In that inn they had not sat long in a room next the street, condoling among themselves the ill success of such a tedious journey, and the misfortune of their friend, before the convoy came thundering up to the door of the said inn with their prisoner, in regard that Captain Mason had made choice of that inn, as being best known to him, to give his guardians the refreshment of a dozen of drink. There Mr Blood, unseemly, had a full view of his friend, and the persons he had to deal with. He had bespoken a small supper, which was at the fire, so that he had but very little time for consultation, finding that Captain Mason's party did not intend to alight, so that he only gave general directions to his associates to follow his example in whatever they saw him do. In haste therefore they called for their horses, and threw down their money for their reckoning, telling the woman of the house, that since they had met with such good company they were resolved to go forward. Captain Mason went off first upon a sorry beast, and with him the commander of the party, and four more; the rest staid behind to make an end of their liquor. Then away marched one more single, and in a very small time after the last two. By this time Mr Blood and one of his friends, being horsed, followed the two that were hindmost, and soon overtook them.

These four rode some little time together, Mr Blood on the right hand of the two soldiers, and his friend on the left. But upon a sudden Mr Blood laid hold of the reins of the horse next him, while his friend, in observation to his directions, did the same on the other hand, and having presently by surprize dismounted the soldiers, pulled off their bridles, and sent their horses to pick their grafs where they pleased. These two being thus made off, Mr Blood pursues his game, intending to have reached the single trooper; but he being got to the rest of his fellows, now reduced to six, and a Barber of York that travelled in their company, Mr Blood made up, heads the whole party, and stops them; of which some of the foremost looking upon him to be either drunk or mad, thought the rebuke of a switche to be a sufficient exercise of such a rash presumption, which they exercised with more contempt than fury, 'till by the rudeness of his compliments he gave them to understand he was not in jest, but in very good earnest. He was soon seconded by his friend that was with him in his first exploit, but there had been several rough blows dealt between the unequal number of six to two, before Mr Blood's two other friends came up to their assistance; nay, I may safely say six to two, for the Barber of York, whether out of his natural propensity to the sport, or that his pot-valiantness had made him so generous to help his fellow-travellers, would needs shew his valour at the beginning of the fray, but better had he been at the latter end of a feast; for though he shewed his prudence to take the stronger side, as he guessed by the number, yet because he would take no warning, which was often given him, not to put himself to the hazard of losing a guitar finger by meddling in a business that nothing concerned him, he lost his life, in regard they were forced to dispatch him in the first place for giving them a needless trouble. The Barber being become an useless instrument, and the other of Mr Blood's friends being come up, the skirmish began to be very smart, the four assailants having singled out the champions as fairly and equally as they could. All this while, Captain Mason being rode before upon his thirty shilling steed, wondering his guard came not with him, looked back, and observing a combustion, and that they were altogether by the ears, knew not what to think. He conjectured it at first to have been some intrigue upon him, as if the troopers had a design to tempt him to an escape, which might afterwards prove more to his prejudice, just like cats, that with regardless scorn seem to give the distressed mouse all the liberty in the world to get away out of their paws, but soon recover their prey again at one jump. Thereupon, unwilling to undergo the hazard of such a trial, he comes back, at what time Mr Blood cried out to him, Horse, horse, quickly! an alarm so amazing at first, that he could not believe it to be his friend's voice when he heard it; but as the thoughts of military men are soon summoned together, and never hold Spanish councils, the Captain presently settled his resolution, mounts the next horse that wanted a rider, and puts in for a share of his own self-preservation. In this bloody conflict Mr Blood was three times unhorsed, occasioned by his forgetfulness, as having omitted to new girth his saddle, which the ostler had unloosed upon the wadding his horse at his first coming into the inn. Being then so often dismounted, and not knowing the reason, which the occasion would not give him leave to consider, he resolved to fight it out on foot; of which two of the soldiers taking the advantage, singled him out and drove him into a court yard, where he made a stand with a full body, his sword in one hand, and his pistol

(13) Kennet's Complete Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 262. But there is a mistake as to the date of the Gazette, which was of the 26th, not 30th of April, 1666.

(14) Lilly's Hist. of his own Life and Times, p. 98.

(15) Remarks on the Life of Mr Blood, p. 5.

himself in this affair, he had placed his wife and son in an Apothecary's shop under the name of Weston, and had lived himself at Rumford by the name of Ayliffe, and pretended to practise Physick (s). After he was cured of his wounds, and heard that all that were concerned with him were safe, which was in about six weeks, he returned to Rumford, and lived there under the same disguise for a considerable time, without being suspected or molested, notwithstanding a proclamation was published, with an offer of five hundred pounds reward, for apprehending the person concerned in this rescue (t). It was impossible for one of his busy, restless, and impatient temper, to continue long quiet, but whether his next enterprize was entirely his own contriving, or was intended purely to serve his own purposes, is a point, at present not to be decided. However that might be, the undertaking was in every respect more singular, and more hazardous, than any he had hitherto attempted, and as it was altogether without example that he went upon it, so it is certain no such thing was ever thought of since; it was the seizing the person of his old antagonist the Duke of Ormond in the streets of London, but whether with a view to murder, or carry him off 'till he had answered their expectations, is not perfectly clear (u). He actually put his design in execution, Dec. 6, 1670, and was very near completing his purpose on his Grace, whatever that purpose might be. However, the Duke was fortunately rescued out of his hands, but himself and his associates all escaped, though closely pursued (w) [F]. An account of this amazing transaction was immediately published by authority,

(s) Remarks on the Life of Mr Blood, p. 5.

(t) History of Plots, p. 295.

(u) Echar's History of England, p. 869.

(w) Complete History of England, Vol. III. p. 220.

in the other. One of the soldiers taking that advantage of his open body, shot him near the shoulder-blade of his pistol-arm, at which time he had four other bullets in his body, that he had received before; which the soldier observing, flung his discharged pistol at him with that good aim and violence, that he hit him a stunning blow just under the forehead upon the upper part of the nose between the eyes, which for the present so amazed him, that he gave himself over for a dead man; yet resolving to give one sparring blow before he expired, such is the strange provocation and success of despair, with one vigorous stroke of his sword, he brought his adversary with a vengeance from his horse, and laid him in a far worse condition than himself at his horse's feet. At that time full of anger and revenge he was just going to make an end of his conquest, by giving him the fatal stab, but that in the very nick of time Captain Mason having by the help of his friends done his business where they had fought, by the death of some, and the disabling of others that opposed them, came in and bid him hold and spare the life of one who had been the civilest person to him upon the road; a fortunate piece of kindness in the one, and of gratitude in the other; which Mr Blood easily condescending to, by the joint assistance of the Captain the other soldier was soon mastered, and the victory, after a sharp fight that lasted above two hours, was at length completed. You may be sure the fight was well maintained on both sides, while two of the soldiers, besides the Barber, were slain upon the place, three unhorfed, and the rest wounded. And it was observable, that though the encounter happened in a village, where a great number of people were spectators of the combat, yet none would adventure the rescue of either party, as not knowing which was in the wrong or which in the right, and were therefore wary of being arbitrators in such a desperate contest, where they saw the reward of assistance to be nothing but present death. After the combat was over, Mr Blood and his friends divided themselves, and parted several ways.

[F] Himself and his associates all escaped, though closely pursued. The clearest account that we have any where of this surprizing transaction, is given us by Mr Carte, to this effect (16). The Prince of Orange came this year into England, and being invited on December 6, to an entertainment in the city of London, his Grace attended him thither. As he was returning homewards, in a dark night, and going up St James's-street, at the end of which, facing the palace, stood Clarendon-house, where he then lived, he was attacked by Blood and five of his accomplices: The Duke always used to go attended with six footmen; but as they were too heavy a load to ride upon a coach, he had always iron spikes behind it, to keep them from getting up, and continued this practice to his dying-day, even after this attempt of assassination. These six footmen used to walk on both sides of the street, over against the coach; but by some contrivance or other, they were all stopped, and out of the way, when the Duke was taken out of his coach by Blood and his son, and mounted on horseback behind one of the horsemen in his company. The coachman drove on to Clarendon-house, and told the porter the Duke had been seized by two men, who had carried him down Piccadilly: The porter immediately ran that way; and Mr James Clark, chancing to be at that time in the court of the house, followed with all possible haste, having first alarmed the family, and ordered the servants to come after him as fast as they could; Blood, it seems, either to gratify the humour of his patron, who had set him upon this work, or to glut his own revenge, by putting his Grace to the same ignominious death which his accomplices in the treasonable design upon Dublin-castle had suffered, had taken a strong fancy into his head, to hang the Duke at Tyburn. Nothing could have saved his Grace's life, but that extravagant imagination and passion of the villain, who leaving the Duke mounted and buckled to one of his comrades, rode on before, and (as is said) actually tied a rope to the Gallows, and then rode back to see what was become of his accomplices, whom he met riding off in a great hurry. The horseman to whom the Duke was tied, was a person of great strength, but being embarrassed by his Grace's struggling, could not advance as fast as he desired. He was, however, got a good way beyond Berkeley (now Devonshire) house, towards Knightsbridge; when the Duke having got his foot under the man's, unhorfed him, and they both fell down together in the mud, where they were struggling when the porter and Mr Clark came up. The villain then disengaged himself, and seeing the neighbourhood alarmed, numbers of people running towards them, got on horseback, and having, with one of his comrades, fired their pistols at the Duke, (but missed him, as taking their aim in the dark, and in a hurry) rode off as fast as they could to save themselves. The Duke (now sixty years of age) was quite spent with struggling; so that when Mr Clark and the porter came up, they knew him rather by feeling his star, than by any sound of voice he could utter; and they were forced to carry him home and lay him on a bed to recover his spirits. He received some wounds and bruises in the struggle, which confined him within doors for some days. We are told by Bishop Kennet, that certain persons whom he names, were, with great probability, suspected, viz Richard Holloway, a Tobacco-cutter, in Frying-pan-alley in Petticoat-lane; Thomas Allen, alias Ally, alias Ayliffe, a pretended Surgeon or Doctor; Thomas Hunt; and one Hurst; but, continues the Prelate, the chief of them was Blood, a notorious traitor, out-lawed in Ireland, who with his own hand pulled his Grace out of the coach, and with the help of one Ralph Alexander, mounted him behind his eldest son (17). In this account there are several mistakes; for in the first place, Thomas Allen, the pretended Doctor, was really Mr Blood, under that fictitious name. In the next place, his son was not at all concerned in the affair, being then but a boy of thirteen years of age; but the mistake was occasioned by Blood's calling one of them his son, who was Thomas Hunt, his son-in-law (18). The same reverend writer says, that Blood's pretence was, that he intended to keep the Duke in private on the

(16) Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 421.

(17) Complete Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 280, 281.

(18) Mr Oldmixon follows him in this, and mentions Brigadier General Blood by name, History of England, &c. Vol. I. other p. 454.

authority, together with a royal Proclamation, offering a reward of one thousand pounds for apprehending any of the persons concerned therein, but to no purpose, though some of their names were discovered; however, Blood was not so much as thought of or suspected (x). The miscarriage of this daring design, instead of daunting him, or creating the least intention of flying out of the kingdom, put him on another more strange and hazardous design, to repair his broken fortunes. He proposed to those desperate persons who assisted him in his former attempt, to seize and divide amongst them the royal ensigns of Majesty kept in the Tower of London, and as they were blindly devoted to his service, they very readily accepted the proposal, and left it to him to contrive the means of putting it in execution. He devised accordingly a scheme for that purpose, suitable to so bold and base an undertaking, which was so cunningly laid, and executed with such an audacious spirit, May 9, 1671, that he so far carried his point, as to get the Regalia into his possession, and was near carrying off his booty, when he was pursued and taken, by which means the crown, and all the jewels belonging to it, were happily recovered (y) [G]. Upon this disappointment his spirits failed him, and while he remained

(x) See the Gazette, December 8, 1670.

(y) See Sir Gilbert Talbot's Narrative, in Stowe's Survey of London, by Strype, Vol. 1. p. 92.

other side of the water, 'till his Grace had signed some writings for restoring to him an estate which he had forfeited by rebellion in Ireland (19); Mr Echard, on the other hand, assures us, that Blood intended to have hanged the Duke at Tyburn, and to have pinned a paper upon his breast, containing the reasons which induced him and his associates to perpetrate this fact. The reader will determine for himself which of these accounts appear to him the most probable; but if Mr Richard Baxter's (20) authority be of weight, he agrees with Bishop Kennet.

[G] All the jewels belonging to it were happily recovered. The best account of this affair is that of the Edwards's, given to Sir Gilbert Talbot to this effect (21). About three weeks before Blood made his attempt upon the crown, he came to the Tower in the habit of a clergyman, with a long cloak, calsock, and canonical girdle, and brought a woman with him, which he called his wife, though his wife was then sick in Lancashire. This pretended wife desired to see the crown, and having seen it, pretended to have a quail come upon her stomach, and desired the keeper of the crown, old Mr Edwards, to send for some spirits, who immediately caused his wife to fetch some; when she had drank, Mrs Edwards invited her to repose herself upon a bed, which she accepted of, and soon recovered. At their departure they declared themselves very thankful for this respect. About three days after Blood came again to Mr Edwards's, with a present of four pair of fine new gloves from his wife; and having thus begun the acquaintance, made frequent visits to improve it, professing that he should never sufficiently acknowledge their kindness. Having made some small repite of his compliments, he returned again, and told Mrs Edwards, that his wife could discourse of nothing but of the kindness of the good people in the Tower; that she had long studied, and at length be thought herself of a handsome way of requital. You have, said he, a pretty gentlewoman to your daughter, and I have a young nephew, who has two or three hundred pounds a year in land, and is at my disposal; if your daughter be free, and you approve of it, I will bring him hither to see her, and we will endeavour to make it a match. This was easily assented to by old Mr Edwards, who invited the pretended parson to dine with him that day, and he has readily accepted the invitation, who taking upon him to say grace, performed it with singular devotion, and lifting up of eyes; and also concluded his long-winded blessing with a hearty prayer: for the King, Queen, and Royal Family. After dinner he went up to see the rooms, and discovering a handsome case of pistols there, he expressed a great desire to buy them, to present to a young Lord who was his neighbour, probably to disarm the house against the time he intended to put his design in execution. At his departure, which was with a canonical benediction of the good company, he appointed a day and hour to bring his young nephew to his mistress, which was that very day that he made his bold attempt, the ninth of May, about seven in the morning.

At that time the old man was got up ready to receive his guests; and the daughter had put herself into her best dress to receive her gallant; when, according to appointment, Parson Blood, with three more, came to the jewel-house, all armed, with rapier blades in their canes, and every one a dagger, and a pair of pocket-pistols; two of his companions entered in with him, and the third staid at the door, for a careful watch. The daughter thought it not meet for her to come down 'till she was called, but sent her maid to take a view of the company, and to bring her a description of the person of her gallant: The maid imagined that he who staid at the door was the intended bridegroom, because he was the youngest of the company; and returned to her young mistress with the character she had formed of his person. In the interim, Blood told Mr Edwards that they would not go up stairs 'till his wife came, and desired him to shew his friends the crown, to pass away the time 'till then: As soon as they were entered the room where the crown was kept, and the door as usually was shut behind them, they threw a cloak over the old man's head, and clapped a gag into his mouth, which was a great plug of wood, with a small hole to take breath at, that was tied on with a waxed leather, which went round his neck. At the same time they fastened an iron hook to his nose, that no found might pass from him that way. Having thus secured him from crying out, they plainly told him.

That they were resolved to have the crown, globe, and sceptre, and if he would quietly submit to it, they would spare his life, otherwise he was to expect no mercy. He thereupon forced himself to make all the noise he possibly could to be heard above, upon which they knocked him down with a wooden mallet, and told him that if he would be quiet, they would spare his life, but if not; upon the next attempt to discover them, they would kill him, and pointed three daggers at his breast; still he strained himself to make the greater noise, at which they gave him nine or ten strokes more upon the head with the mallet, and stabbed him into the belly. The poor man, almost fourscore years old, fell, and lay some time in trance, when one of them kneeling on the ground, to try if he breathed, and not perceiving any breath from him, said, He's dead, I'll warrant him. Mr Edwards recovering a little, heard his words, and conceiving it best for himself to be so thought, lay very quietly. Concluding him dead, they omitted to tie his hands behind him; and Parret, one of the companions, put the globe into his breeches; Blood kept the crown under his cloak; the third was designed to file the scepter in two, because too long to carry conveniently, and then to put it into a bag, brought for that purpose. But before this could be done, young Mr Edwards, son of the old gentleman, just come from Flanders, chanced to arrive at that very instant that this was acting, and coming to the door, the person who stood sentinel for the rest, asked him with whom would he speak; he made answer, he belonged to the house; but perceiving by his question, that he himself was a stranger, told him, that if he had any business with his father, he would go and acquaint him with it, and went up stairs, where he was welcomed by his mother, wife, and sister. In the mean time, the sentinel gave notice of the son's arrival, and they immediately hastened away with the crown and the globe, but left the scepter, not having time to file it. The old man returning to himself, got suddenly up, pulled off the gag, and cried out, treason! murder! the daughter hearing him, ran down, and seeing her father thus wounded, rushed out upon the Tower-hill, and cried, Treason! the crown is stolen! This gave the first alarm; and Blood and Parret making great haste, were observed to jog each other with their elbows as they went, which

(19) Complete Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 211.

(20) Hist. of his own Life and Times, p. 88.

(21) Stowe's Survey of London, published by Strype, Vol. I. B. 1. p. 92.

Kennet's Complete History of England, Vol. III. p. 28.

Echard's History of England, p. 876.

Oldmixon's Hist. of the Stuarts, Vol. I. p. 560. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 2-2.

mained a prisoner in the jail of the Tower, he appeared not only silent and reserved, but dogged and fullen. He soon changed his temper however, when, contrary to all reason, probability, and his own expectation, he was informed, the KING intended to see and examine him himself. This was brought about by the Duke of Buckingham, then the great favourite and First Minister, who infused into his Majesty, over whom he had for some time a great ascendancy, the curiosity of seeing so extraordinary a person, whose crime, great as it was, argued a prodigious force of mind, and made it probable, that if so disposed, he might be capable of making large discoveries (x). These insinuations had such an effect upon the King, that he consented to what the Duke desired, which in the end proved disadvantageous to them all (a), for it brought discredit on the royal character, and indelible load of infamy upon the Duke, and this afterwards produced Blood's ruin. Such are the consequences of inconsiderate actions in persons in high stations, who ought always to be jealous of their dignity, and of doing what may hazard the wounding publick opinion, upon which that dignity is chiefly founded. Col. Blood was no sooner acquainted that he was to be introduced to the royal presence, than he conceived immediately he stood indebted for this honour to the notion the King, or some about him, had of his intrepidity, and therefore was not at all at a loss about the part he was to act, and on the acting of which well his life entirely depended. He is allowed on all hands to have performed admirably upon this occasion; he answered whatever his Majesty demanded of him, clearly, and without reserve; he did not pretend to capitulate or make terms, but seemed rather pleased to throw his life into the King's hands, by an open and boundless confession (b). He took care, however, to prepossess his Majesty in his favour, by various, and those very different, methods. At the same time, he laid himself open to the law, he absolutely refused to impeach others, while he magnified the spirit and resolution of the party to which he adhered, and had always acted against Monarchy, he insinuated his own and their veneration for the person of the King; and though he omitted nothing that might create a belief of his contemning death, yet he expressed infinite awe and respect for a Monarch, who had condescended to treat him with such unusual indulgence (c). In short, the particulars of this examination were curious, and highly worthy of the reader's notice [H]. It was foreseen by the Duke of Ormond,

(c) Baxter's Hist. of his Life and Times, p. 88.

(a) See this remark explained and justified in the subsequent notes [H] and [L].

(b) Remarks on the Life of Mr Blood, p. 11.

(c) Baxter's Hist. of his own Life, p. 88, 89.

caused them to be suspected and pursued. By this time young Edwards, and one Captain Beckman, upon the cry of their sister, were come down, and left their father likewise, to run after the villains, but they were advanced beyond the main guard; and the alarm being given to the warden the draw bridge, he put himself in a posture to stop them. Blood came up first, and discharged a pistol at him; the bullet missed him, but the powder or fear made him fall to the ground, whereby they got safe to the Little-ward-house gate, where one Sil, one of Cromwell's soldiers, stood sentinel, who, though he saw the other warden shot, made no resistance, by which means the villains got over that draw-bridge, and through the outwards upon the wharf, and made all possible haste towards their horses, which attended at St Katharine's-gate, called the Iron gate, crying themselves, as they ran, Stop the rogues! and the grave canonical habit made them thought innocent. Immediately after Captain Beckman got up to them, at which Blood discharged his second pistol at the Captain's head, but he stooping down, avoided the shot, and seized upon him with the crown under his cloak! yet, Blood had the impudence, though he saw himself a prisoner, to struggle a long while for the crown; and when it was wrested from him, he said, It was a gallant attempt, though unsuccessful, for it was for a crown. A servant belonging to Captain Sherborne, seized upon Parret before Blood was taken; and there was so much consternation amongst all men; and so much confusion in the pursuit, that it was a miracle that several innocent persons had not suffered, for young Edwards, overtaking one that was bloody in the scuffle, and supposing him to be one of his father's murderers, was going to run him through, had not Captain Beckman hindered him; and as this Captain himself made vast haste in the pursuit, the guards were going to fire at him, thinking him to be one of the rogues; but one of them, who fortunately knew him, cried out, He is a friend! Blood and Parret being both seized; Hunt, another of them, and son-in-law to Blood, leaped to horse, with two more of the conspirators, and rid far away; but a cart in the street chanced to turn short, Hunt run his head against a pole that stuck out, which made him fall astonished from his horse, and recovering his legs, and putting his feet into the stirrup, a cobbler running in, cried, This is Tom Hunt, who was in the bloody business against the Duke of Ormond, let us secure him! A constable being accidentally there, seized him upon this affirmation; and he was, with Blood and Parret, committed to safe custody in the Tower. Parret was a silk dyer in the Borough of Southwark; and in the Rebellion had been Lieutenant to Major-General Harrison: In the struggle for the crown, the great pearl and fair diamond fell off, and were lost for a while, with some other smaller stones; but the pearl was brought by a poor sweeping woman to one of the warders, and the diamond by a barber's apprentice, and both faithfully restored. Other small stones were picked up by several persons, and brought in. The fair ballas ruby belonging to the scepter, was found in Parret's pocket, so that nothing considerable was wanting; the crown only was bruised, and sent to be repaired.

[H] The particulars of this examination were curious, and worthy the reader's notice. The first question the King asked (22), was in relation to the attempt upon the Duke of Ormond; for Hunt being known to have had a large share in that affair, and being taken with Colonel Blunt in this, rendered it highly probable that the same set of people were concerned in both villainies. Blood immediately, and without hesitation, confessed the fact; being asked who were his associates, he answered, that he would never betray a friend's life, nor deny a guilt in defence of his own. He was asked next, what provocation he had to make so bold an assault upon the Duke of Ormond; he said, the Duke had taken away his estate, and executed some of his friends; and that he and many others had engaged themselves, by solemn oaths, to revenge it. It was now more apparent from his forward confession of his conspiracy against the castle of Dublin, that he aimed at great esteem by the extravagancy and audacity of his achievements; and left the concealment of any of his villainies should lessen the romance of his life, in his examination about the crown, he voluntary, though perhaps falsely, confessed to the King, 'That he had been engaged in a design to kill his Majesty with a carbine, from out of the reeds, by the Thames side, above Battersea, where he often went to swim. That the cause of this resolution, in himself and others, were his Majesty's severity over the consciences of the GODLY, in suppressing the freedom of their religious assemblies; that when he had taken his stand in the reeds to that purpose, his heart was checked with an awe of majesty; and he did not only relent himself, but diverted the rest of his associates from the design. He further told his Majesty, that he had, by these his confessions, sufficiently laid himself

(22) Sir Gilbert Talbot's Narrative, in Stowe's Survey of London, Vol. I. B. i. p. 94. Kennet's Compl. Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 284.

Ormond, as soon as he knew the King designed to examine him, that Blood had no cause to fear, and indeed such an impression his story and behaviour made on the mind of his Sovereign, that he was not only pardoned, but set at liberty, and had a pension given him to subsist on (d). This conduct of his Majesty, toward so high and notorious an offender, occasioned much speculation and many conjectures, of these some are still preserved, amongst which, the sentiments of Sir Gilbert Talbot are very sensible (e) [I]. He himself open to the law; and he might reasonably expect the utmost rigour of it, for which he was, without much concern of his own, prepared. But withall, he declared that the matter would not be of that indifference to his Majesty, inasmuch as there were hundreds of his friends yet undiscovered, who were all bound together by the indispensable oath of conspirators, to revenge the death of any of the fraternity, upon those who should bring them to justice, which would expose his Majesty, and all his Ministers, to the daily tear and expectation of a massacre. But, on the other side, if his Majesty would spare the lives of a few, he might oblige the hearts of many, who, as they had been seen to act daring mischiefs, would be as bold, if received into pardon and favour, in performing eminent services to the crown (23).

(d) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, p. 421.

(e) Stowe's Survey of London, by Strype, Vol. I. p. 94.

We have some other particulars recorded by several writers, who perhaps were not so well informed. The famous Richard Baxter (24) magnifies his boldness, who says, he spoke to the King, that he was admired by all; to justify which, he gives us a very religious speech of his, and adds farther, that he had been in the service of King Charles I, which is likewise hinted by the author of his life. Mr Oldmixon would have us believe he bullied the King (25). The whole Court, says he, was frighted, and thought it safer to bribe him than to hang him. But there is a circumstance relating to this examination, which better deserves to be known, than any of the conjectures made about it (26). After the King had, with great coolness and moderation, gone through the whole examination, he turned to Colonel Blood, and said, What if I should give you your life? To which the Colonel answered, I will endeavour to deserve it. There passed, at that time, nothing farther; but soon after the King directed Colonel Blood to write a letter of submission to the Duke of Ormond, to obtain his forgiveness, which he accordingly did, in terms of the deepest humility, and with the most fervent expressions of his sorrow and concern for the injury and insult which he had offered to his Grace (27). One may reasonably conclude from hence, that the King believed what Blood told him with respect to his design upon the Duke, and did not apprehend that his intention was to murder him; for otherwise, one can hardly think that he would have pardoned him, much less have suffered him about the Court, or admitted him, as he frequently did, into his presence, because such a conduct would have been as little consistent with his known good sense, as with regard to justice and his royal dignity.

[I] Sir Gilbert Talbot's reflections on this subject are sensible. Since, says he (28), this villain's crimes are visible to all mankind, and his merits altogether incomprehensible, every man will take the liberty to conjecture what consideration could possibly begot his pardon, his crimes were without controversy the highest breaches of human laws: Murder acted upon a poor old gentleman, for defending his trust; and murder intended to be acted upon a great Peer, with all the circumstances of contempt; a design laid to surprize the King's castle, a violent seizure made of his crown and sceptre, and a confessed lying in wait to destroy his person.

It requires a great measure of mercy in a Prince (for it is not decent to attribute it to any thing else) to forgive such injuries done to himself; but it is above his mercy to pardon the offence committed against another, because Heaven, which is all merciful, forgives not the trespasses which we commit against our neighbours without restitution. Yet the Lord Arlington came in his Majesty's name to the Duke of Ormond, to tell him that he would not have Blood prosecuted, for reasons which he was commanded to give him. The Duke replied, that his Majesty's command was the only reason that could be given, and that therefore he might spare the rest. It was a gallant answer of his Grace, and such as well became the loyalty of his family; but it is great pity in the mean time that the world should want the knowledge of his Lordship's reasons, which had weight enough with them to smother a matter of that high concernment, to the dishonour of justice and the dignity of peerage.

How great a mystery however it is to the world, Blood and his associates were not only pardoned and set free, but the arch-villain himself had a considerable estate in land conferred upon him in Ireland, and that meritorious person admitted into all the privacy and intimacy of the Court, no man more assiduous than himself in both Secretaries offices. If any one had a business in Court that stuck, he made his application to Blood, as the most industrious and successful solicitor; nay, many gentlemen courted his acquaintance as the Indians pray to the devils, that they may not hurt them.

Blood had nobody but his own black deeds to advocate for him, yet thus was he rewarded; and though many solicited for old Mr Edwards, and had raised their arguments from his fidelity, courage, and wounds received, yet all that could be obtained for him was, a grant of two hundred pounds out of the Exchequer, and one hundred to his son who assisted, the payment whereof was so long delayed, and surgeons calling upon him daily for satisfaction for their drugs and pains, he was forced to sell his order for one hundred pounds ready money, and the son his for fifty pounds, and lived not long to enjoy the remainder, for he died within a year and a month after the wounds received. But now, to reflect a little, as I promised, not only upon the mysterious redemption of this rogue from the gallows, but upon the (never to be enough wondered) recompence for his villainies of five hundred pounds per annum, a reward which the most meritorious virtue had seldom met with. Let us therefore consider him first as taken in so flagrant a crime, that no plea could possibly lie in favour of his life, nor no hopes could be so impudent as to expect it. Observe then what he doth; he maketh a voluntary confession of three other rapping crimes. One, his attempt upon the Duke of Ormond, and his alleged provocation to that was by consequence a confession of his conspiracy upon the castle of Dublin. Thus much he thought necessary to acknowledge, to shew his power and audacity, that in case he was brought to execution, he should stand recorded in story to have died like a daring sinner, and not as a petty malefactor. Then he declareth freely, and of his own accord, his intention to assassinate his Majesty in the river. I ask any man of reason, what other consideration could move him to that confession, but to bring in this other part of his story; he was to tell his Majesty, that his heart relented, being surprized with awe and reverence of his person (he had none of his crown), and that he not only forbore the execution himself, but dissuaded his associates likewise from it.

There is so great a probability that this professed tender forbearance of his tended only to dispose his Majesty (who of all mankind is captivated with good nature) to return the like mercy towards him, that with the good favour of Mr Blood's check of conscience, which delivered him from the execution, it is easy to be conjectured that there was never any such design really laid, but that the story was feigned to work upon his Majesty's tenderness towards him.

But least that should not prevail, Blood seemed not to be at all troubled with the apprehension of his own death, for which he stood prepared; but it grieved him sooth to consider the sad consequence of it, which would be an attempt of revenge upon the person of the King and his Ministers, by the surviving conspirators being bound by oath, &c. so that (if mercy were defective) he could try what fear could operate, and lest both these should fail, he hath another fetch in store, which is to persuade them to pardon him upon the score of good politicks, by shewing how useful an instrument he can be to quiet the minds of all the disaffected party, and secure the Government from popular insurrections if his life may be spared.

I cannot

(23) Baxter's History of his Life and Times, p. 88. Echard's Hist. of England, p. 877.

(24) Baxter's History of his own Life and Times, p. 39.

(25) Hist. of the Stuarts, Vol. I. p. 502.

(26) Remarks on the Life of Mr Blood, p. 11.

(27) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 225.

(28) See Stowe's Survey, Kennet and Echard's Histories, as before.

(f) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol II. p. 424.

(g) Remarks on the Life of Mr Blood, p. 11.

(h) Examen, or an Enquiry into the Credit and Veracity of a pretended Complete History, &c. by Roger North, Esq; Lond. 1740, 4to, p. 311.

(i) History of Plots, p. 131.

He seems to think the King's apprehensions determined him. Another writer (f) suggests, that the Duke of Buckingham having put him on the first design, to prevent it's becoming publick, was obliged to procure his pardon for the second. But it is more probable, that he insinuated his interest with some desperate malecontents then in Holland, whom he could induce to come home and live peaceably. At least this is certain, that on the breaking out of the war soon after, a Proclamation was published, requiring such persons to come over, upon which Desborough, Relfey, and many more came, surrendered, and had pardons, very probably at Blood's request, for with him they met almost every day, in a room kept on purpose for them, at White's coffee-house near the Royal Exchange (g). His interest was, for some time, very great at Court, where he solicited the suits of many of the unfortunate people of his party with success; but as this gave great offence to some very worthy persons while it lasted, so after the disgrace and falling to pieces of the Ministry stiled the C A B A L, it began quickly to decline, and perhaps his pension also was ill paid, for we find him again amongst the malecontents, and acting in favour of popular measures, that were displeasing to the Court. In the busy time of plotting too, so active a person as Col. Blood could not but have some share, he behaved, however, in a new manner, suitable to the great change of times, and instead of attempting on the persons of great men, took up the character of a great man himself, and expressed an apprehension that attempts might be made upon his person (h) [K]. In this manner he spun out between nine and ten years, sometimes about the Court, sometimes excluded from it, always uneasy, and in some scheme or other of an untoward kind, 'till at last he was met with in his own way, and either circumvented by some of his own instruments, or drawn within the vortex of a sham plot, by some who were too cunning, even for this master in his profession. It seems there were certain people, who had formed a design of fixing an imputation of a most scandalous nature upon the Duke of Buckingham, who was then at the head of a vigorous opposition against the Court, and who, notwithstanding he always courted and protected the Fanaticks, had not, in respect to his moral character, so fair a reputation as to render any charge of that kind incredible. But whether this was conducted by Col. Blood, whether a counter-plot was set on foot to defeat it and entrap Blood, or whether, some whisper thrown out to alarm the Duke, which he suspected came from Blood, led his Grace to secure himself by a contrivance of the same stamp, better concerted, and more effectually executed; so it was, that his Grace, who was formerly supposed so much a patron to the Colonel, thought it requisite, for his own safety, to contribute to his ruin (i). What notion Mr Blood inclined the world should entertain of this affair, may be discovered from the Case which he caused to be printed of it, and which, to prevent it's being entirely lost, is preserved in the notes [L]. But it fell out, that I cannot easily be persuaded that this proffer of service in Blood could much prevail upon his Majesty's judgment; because it is natural to conclude, that he who is able to quiet a party, is likewise able to irritate it; and that he who is bribed by five hundred pounds per annum to do the one, may be gained with a thousand pounds per annum to do the contrary; and what security can there be that he will not, but the bare word of a villain.

In the mean time nothing can more betray the weakness of a Government, than that it shall have recourse to such instruments to support it. Nor can any thing make it's authority more despicable, than that it should be terrified from the execution of justice upon the greatest malefactor that history from the creation hitherto recordeth, for fear that Blood's ghost should rise, or his surviving confederates meditate revenge.

Besides, it is as far from reason that a man of Blood's principles, should be trusted with the power and interest that must go to the managing of a party; as that those who trust him, should expect any good services from the confessed author of so many black deeds, or Heaven give a blessing to the endeavours of such an impious creature.

[K] Apprehension that attempts might be made upon his person. If we consider attentively the history of the times, from the breaking out of the popish plot to the death of King Charles II, and reflect on the numerous company of conspiracies and counter conspiracies, of true plots, sham plots, and plots to charge innocent people, with having a share in both sorts of plots, we must conclude there never was a season, when plain, well meaning people were in greater danger, or when busy, bold enterprising men had so fair a chance of making their fortunes at the expence of other men's, and the small trivial addition of their own consciences into the bargain. But, however, I must confess, that very little is to be met with in relation to Mr Blood in those days, except the following short passage in a valuable work lately published, which I give the reader in the author's own words, that he may see his judgment also of those perilous times (29), when swearing was a trade, and perjury a sort of venial transgression.

' Nay, there was another sham-plot of one Netter-wile, which allied himself to Dangerfield, by the pretence of steering the popish plot upon the Presbyterians. And here the good Colonel Blood, (that stole the Duke of Ormond, and, if a timely rescue had not come in, and hanged him at Tyburn, and afterwards stole the crown, though he was not so happy to carry it off) no player at small games; he, even he, the virtuous Colonel, as this sham plot says, was to have been destroyed by the Papists. It seems these Papists would let no eminent Protestant be safe; but some amends were made the Colonel, by sale of the narrative licenced Thomas Blood. It had been strange if so much mischief had been stirring, and he not come in for a snack.'

It may not be amiss to take notice here of a mistake in the Index to the work above-mentioned, but there is no mistake in the work itself, where the author, speaking of the impeachment of Fitz-Harris, takes notice of a motion made by one Colonel B. (30), that the thanks of the House should be given to Sir William Waller, for the service he had done in that respect, with this addition, that it was great service done the nation, and not the first that Sir William had done. In the Index this motion is said to have been made by our Colonel Blood, which is a very great mistake; for, in the first place, he never was a member, and in the next, he was dead before this affair happened. The Colonel B. mentioned in the book from the journal of the House of Commons, was Colonel Birch, a very active member in that Parliament at Oxford, and especially in Fitz-Harris's affair.

[L] Which, to prevent it's being entirely lost, is preserved in the notes] There are scarce any traces to be met with in our histories of this dark transaction about the Duke of Buckingham, and yet it must have made

(29) North's Examen, or an Enquiry into the Credit and Veracity of a pretended Complete History, Lond. 1740, 4to, p. 311.

(30) Id. ibid. p. 284.

a great that the Court of King's-Bench took the thing in so different a light, that he was convicted upon a criminal information for the conspiracy, and committed to the King's-Bench prison, and while in custody there, he was charged with an action of scandalum magnatum, at the suit of the Duke of Buckingham (k), in which the damages were laid so high as ten thousand pounds, but notwithstanding this, Col. Blood found bail, and was discharged from his imprisonment. He then retired to his house in the Bowling-alley in Westminster, in order to take such measures as were requisite, to deliver him out of these difficulties, but finding fewer friends than he expected, and meeting with other and more grievous disappointments, he was so much affected thereby, as to fall into a distemper that speedily threatened his life. He was attended in his sickness by a clergyman, who found him sensible but reserved, declaring he was not at all afraid of death. In a few days he fell into a lethargy, and Wednesday Aug. 24, 1680, he departed this life (l). On the Friday following he was privately but decently interred, in the new chapel in Tothill-Fields. Yet such was the notion entertained by the generality of the world of this man's subtilty and restless spirit, that they could neither be persuaded he would be quiet in his grave, nor would they permit him to remain so. For a story being spread that this dying, and being buried, was only a new trick of Col. Blood's, preparative to some more extraordinary exploit than any he had been concerned in; it became in a few days so current, and so many circumstances were added to render it credible, that the Coroner thought fit to interpose, ordered the body to be taken up again upon the Thursday following, and appointed a jury to sit upon it. But so strongly were they prepossessed with the idle fancy of it's being all an amusement, that though they were his neighbours, knew him personally, and he had been so few days dead, they could not for a long time agree, whether it was or was not his body (m). An intimate acquaintance of his, at last, put them on viewing the thumb of his left hand, which, by an accident that happened to it, grew to twice it's natural size, which was commonly known to such as conversed with him. By this, and the various depositions of persons attending him in his last illness, they were at length convinced, and the coroner caused him to be once more (k) Remarks on the Life of Mr Blood, p. 12.

(l) Ibid.

(m) Postscript to the Remarks on the Life of Mr Blood.

(31) History of Plots, p. 135.

(32) The Historian's Guide, p. 124.

a great noise in those days, and seems to have been drawn into a great length; for I find (31), that on the 5th of April, 1680, the Attorney-General had orders to prosecute several persons upon this account, and a few days afterwards I find that Sir William Waller was struck out of the commission of the peace for Middlesex, who had been also very busy in this affair; but it was not till the 25th of June, in the same year, that the great affair was brought on, when (32) Mr Thomas Blood, Mr Edward Christian, Arthur Obrian, with others, were brought to their trial at the King's-Bench-Bar at Westminster, for a conspiracy against the said Duke of Bucks, and were found guilty. The following paper was printed by itself in one sheet, under the title of The true state of the Case of Lieutenant-Colonel THOMAS BLOOD; and it is also taken into that account of his life, which has been so often cited. The true design of the case, as I apprehend, was to give such a colour to the cause of Mr Blood, as, with the assistance of the interest he still had, might procure some alleviation in his sentence, which however, from a comparison of circumstances, I am inclined to think he never received, but that the very apprehensions of it broke his heart. Thus the reader sees, that if the Duke of Bucks had any concerns with Colonel Blood in the affair of the Duke of Ormond, or if his pardon for stealing the crown was obtained by his Grace, he was but indifferently required.

That he was desired by the woman that keeps the Saint John's-Head, or Heaven tavern, to come and speak with her at such a time: That upon his coming to her, she told him that two shabby fellows had been with her some time before, to tell her that they had something of great consequence in reference to the welfare of the publick to reveal, but that they wanted a discreet person to manage it: That thereupon Mr Blood made answer, that if there were any thing fit to be taken notice of, he would bring them to those that had sufficient authority to take notice of it, and thereupon promised to meet the persons.

That upon his second coming to meet the discoverers, they refused to speak with him; for that understanding he was the person with whom they were to discourse, they averred they would have nothing to do with him, for that he was the Duke of Buckingham's friend: That thereupon the woman of the house; that Mr Blood might see she had not told him a lye, persuaded one of the persons to shew himself to Mr Blood, who to that purpose, as he passed by, stepped into the room where Mr Blood was, and going in, told, that he and his fellows had business of great concernment to discover, but could not then by reason of another appointment, and so concluded upon another day: That Mrs Bradley upon this came to him to his house, and told him she believed the fellows were rogues and trepanners, and advised him to seize them and carry them before a magistrate: That Mr Blood, weighing the consequence of the woman's advice, and being informed by her of their lodgings, according to the directions of one Mr Curtis, went to Dr Chamberlain, one of the Justices of the Peace for the county of Middlesex, and told him the story, who thereupon not only gave Mr Blood his warrant, but accompanied him till the execution of this warrant.

That two persons were by him apprehended, by name Philemon Codan, and Samuel Ryther: That upon their apprehension and first examination severally before Dr Chamberlain, they seemed to wonder what he meant, when he told them he heard they knew of a plot, and wanted a magistrate to reveal it to: That thereupon the Justice of the peace told them all that Mr Blood had told him, concerning their discourse with Mrs Bradley, and their appointment of meeting Mr Blood.

That to this one of them, viz. Codan, replied, that it was about the Duke of Buckingham, who, he said, owed them several hundreds of pounds upon account of wages, and that they wanted some body that was able to cope with him, to whom, one Curtis standing by, replied in these words:

How; did I not hear you say at such a place, that you knew of a greater plot yet undiscovered, than either Mr Oates or Bedloe had hitherto made out. To which the said Codan gave no satisfactory answer, and Ryther protested he knew nothing of a plot, or any thing like it: That to all this the Doctor urged, that it was not to be thought that any discreet person should be so overseen, as to interpose between master and servant about wages, especially so great a person as the Duke, and therefore that could not be the reason of their meeting at heaven. Thereupon one of them starting up in a violent passion before the Justice of peace, swore that he would be revenged upon the Duke of Buckingham, and that he would swear any thing that might tend to the doing him a prejudice, and that he himself would swear Sodomy against him.

That upon this the Justice of the peace having told them, that he neither did believe nor would hear any thing relating to the Duke, asked them jointly, why they ran away at the sight of Mr Blood at Mrs Bradley's?

(n) History of Plots, p. 231.

more interred, and left in his vault in quiet (n). Such were the transactions of this man's life, whose real adventures exceed in strangeness, what would appear fictitious even in romance, astonished his contemporaries, and were never before reduced into regular order for the information of posterity.

'Bradley's? To which they replied, that they were 'mistrustful of him, because they had heard he was 'the Duke's friend.

'That thereupon Dr Chamberlain, taking them for 'impertinent fellows, dismissed them, with directions 'to consider what they had said, and to attend him at 'such a time at his house, where he would be ready 'to hear whatever they had to discover concerning 'any plot: That accordingly they came with one 'Whitaker and Jenks, where Mr Blood likewise attended. At what time Dr Chamberlain asking them 'the meaning of their former shuffling stories, they replied they had a farther design to carry on for the 'good of the publick, but would come to no particulars, whereupon Dr Chamberlain dismissed them.

'That soon after Sir W. W. went for Blood to a tavern in Westminster, whither when he came, he found Ryther, Codan, Whitaker, and Jenks, in Sir William's company, and what more surprized him, he found Ryther and Codan in a genteel equipage and alomode accoutrements, whom he looked upon before as very mean fellows.

'That presently then Sir William told him, he was very much troubled for the premunire he had brought himself into, for that Ryther and Codan were come to depose upon oath, that he had attempted several times to corrupt them with money and other rewards to swear Sodemy against the Duke of Buckingham: That upon Mr Blood's making strange of it, Codan started up and confirmed the same.

'Thereupon Mr Blood asked them, how they could be so impudent as to invent such a thing against him, whom they had never seen but once at heaven, and another time with Dr Chamberlain: That thereupon Mr Whitaker and Jenks stood up, and bid Mr Blood be honest and just, and confests. To whom Mr Blood replied, you have been these two years last employed to asperse me, and could you find no better invention than this?

'That after this, Mr Blood directing his discourse to Sir William Waller, desired of him to know the meaning of the whole story, which was a thing unknown to himself; upon which Mr Whitaker and Mr Jenks jointly affirmed Codan and Ryther to be honest men, and pressed Sir William for justice: That thereupon Sir William desired Mr Blood very civilly to be put in bail; to which Mr Blood replied, that he would consider of it, and so for that time went about his occasions: That the next morning he went to Sir William's house for a copy of his mittimus, which at length was granted him: The next day he was met by a constable, who told him he had a warrant against him from Sir William Waller, mistaking a mittimus for a warrant, and thereupon he went away with the constable to a tavern, where he continued under restraint of the constable several hours: That while he was under custody, Sir William, apprehensive of some mistake, as is pretended, sent one of the witnesses to the constable to know how he had disposed of Mr Blood, and whether he had carried him to prison; who made answer, that he had not sufficient authority for so doing, and that Mr Blood might bring him into trouble for so doing, as not having been carried before a Justice of peace, as he ought to have been first of all. Thereupon the witness went back to Sir William, and not long after returned to the constable, and brought him a warrant to seize Mr Blood, and for want of bail to carry him to the Gate-house: That upon that warrant, Mr Blood gave in bail before Sir William Poultney to answer the accusation; upon which accusation Mr Blood, with the rest, were found guilty. E

BLOUNT, a very antient, once noble, and still truly honourable family. Of this house there have been three distinct races of Peers, of whom we shall give some account [A]. Thence also have sprung persons, rendered illustrious by almost all the titles of honour which this nation can boast, allied more than once by marriage to the Royal Family, and employed in the first offices, almost in every reign since the Conquest, of which it may not be amiss to give some instances. John Blount was Custos of the city of London, from the year 1301 to the year 1307, that is, from the twenty-ninth of Edward I. to the first of Edward II (a). Thomas le Blount was Steward of the King's household the twentieth of Edward II (b). Sir Thomas le Blount was Treasurer of Normandy the first of Henry V (c). Walter Blount was Lord High-Treasurer of England in the fourth of Edward

(a) Stowe's Survey of London. fol. 1720, Vol. I. p. 107.

(b) Dugdale's Baronage of England, 1675, fol. Vol. I. p. 519.

(c) Idem, ibid.

[A] Of whom we shall give some account.] They were originally Normans, and derived their name of le Blound, from their having yellow hair (1). Two young Lords of this name, coming over with William surnamed the Conqueror, he made the elder, Robert, Baron of Ixworth in Suffolk (2). Of his son and heir Gilbert, Mr Camden having occasion to speak, he styles him Vir magnæ Nobilitatis, a man of high nobility. This line ended in William le Blound, who was killed in the battle of Lewes in the reign of King Henry III, leaving behind him two sisters. Besides these there were other Barons, summoned to Parliament in the reigns of Edward II. and Edward III; but the first Baron of Mountjoy was Sir Walter Blount of Elwaston in Derbyshire, so created by Edward IV. Of this noble Lord and his family I have a curious pedigree, whence I shall give their descents (3). Sir Walter Blount, the first Baron of Mountjoy, married Helena, daughter of John Biron, Esq; by her he had three sons, Sir William Blount, who married Margaret, daughter and heiress of Thomas Lord Itchingham, who died in the life-time of his father; Sir John Blount, and Sir James Blount. William Blount left issue John Blount Lord Mountjoy, who died childless; Edward Blount Lord Mountjoy, who also died without children; Elizabeth, wife of Andrew Lord Windsor; Alice, first married to Sir Thomas Uxenbridge, Knight, afterwards to Sir David Owen of Midhurst in the county of Suffex. Sir John Blount, second son of Walter Lord Mountjoy, married Lora, daughter of Sir Edward Barkley of Beverton, by whom he had Sir William Blount, afterwards Lord Mountjoy, who married first Elizabeth, daughter and coheiress of Sir William Say, by whom he had two daughters; Gertrude, who married Henry Courtney Marquis of Exeter; and Katharine, first married to Mr Chambern, then to Sir Maurice Barkley. The second wife of this William Lord Mountjoy was Dorothy, daughter of Sir Henry Keeble of London, Knight, by whom he had Charles Blount. His third wife was another Dorothy, daughter of Thomas Gray Marquis of Dorchester, widow of Robert Willoughby Lord Brooke, by whom he had John Blount, and two daughters, Dorothy and Mary. His son and heir Charles Blount, Lord Mountjoy, married Anne, daughter of Robert Lord Willoughby of Brooke, by whom he had two sons James and Francis. James Lord Mountjoy married Catherine, daughter of Thomas Leigh of St Oswald in the county of Devon, Esq; by whom he had issue William Blount Lord Mountjoy, who died childless in 1594, and Charles Blount Lord Mountjoy, afterwards Earl of Devonshire. In him, of whom we shall speak in a distinct article, this line failed, he leaving no lawful issue, but his natural son, Mountjoy Blount, was created Baron Mountjoy in Ireland by King James I, and Baron Mountjoy of Thurveston in Derbyshire, and Earl of Newport in the Isle of Wight by King Charles I, as the reader will be told elsewhere.

[B] Four

(1) Camd. Britan. in Suffolk.

(2) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. I. p. 519. Camden, Britan. ubi supra.

(3) Communicated to me by the Reverend Mr Knipe, in a curious MS. of several antient families.

Edward IV (d). Sir Thomas Blount a Knight Banneret the fifth of Henry VIII (e). Charles Blount, Lord Mountjoy, was appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, the forty-second of Elizabeth; and continued, and made a Privy-Counsellor by King James (f). There have been likewise of this family, four Knights of the Garter [B]. And at this day, Mary, Duchess of Norfolk, the first Duchess in this Kingdom, is the daughter of Edward Blount, of Blagdon, near Torbay in the county of Devon, Esq; and was married to Edward Howard, Duke of Norfolk, in 1727 (g). There are still several flourishing families, two of Baronets, and others, persons of ample fortune, of this illustrious line, of whom the reader will find some particulars in the notes [C].

(f) Camden's Annals, Vol. III. p. 805. Chauncy's Hertfordshire.
(g) Collins's Peerage of England, edit. 1741. 8vo, Vol. I. p. 21.

[B] Four Knights of the Garter.] The first of these was Sir John Blount, who flourished in the reigns of Henry IV. and Henry V. becoming a Knight of the Order some time between the years 1416 and 1420 (4). Walter Blount Lord Mountjoy, who was a great favourite of Edward IV, was the second Knight of the Garter of this family, and received that honour 1472 (5). The third was William Blount Lord Mountjoy, who became a Knight of the Garter in the reign of Henry VIII, in the year 1526 (6). The fourth was Charles Blount Lord Mountjoy, afterwards Earl of Devonshire, on whom Queen Elizabeth conferred the Order 1597 (7).

in the notes.] The chief of this family is Sir Edward Blount of Sodington in Worcestershire, and Mawly n Shrophire. He is lineally descended from the original Norman founder of this family, Sir Robert Blount or Blount before-mentioned, and Sir Edward Blount, who succeeded his uncle Sir George Blount, Baronet, in 1732, was the nineteenth in succession from the Conquest (8). The second family of Baronets of this name is Sir Harry Pope Blount of Tittinghanger (9) in Hertfordshire, son of Sir Thomas Pope Blount, and grandson of Sir Thomas Pope Blount, of whom we shall speak in a subsequent article. We may add to these the Blounts of Maple-Durham in Oxfordshire, &c.

(8) English Baronetage, Vol. II. p. 674-676.
(9) Ibid. Vol. III. p. 665-677.

[C] Of whom the reader will find some particulars

(2) Idem, ibid.
(3) Peacham's Compleat Gentleman.
(4) Ashmole's History of the Garter, p. 610.
(5) Id. ibid. p. 712.
(6) Id. ibid.
(7) Mills's Catalogue of Honour, p. 493.

BLOUNT (JOHN) called in Latin Blondus or Blundus, a very eminent Divine in the XIIIth century. He received the first tincture of learning in the university of Oxford, and went afterwards for his improvement to Paris, where he quickly distinguished himself; among many of his learned contemporaries, by the vivacity of his wit (a). On his return into England, he again settled himself at Oxford, and read Divinity Lectures there with universal applause. The reputation of his learning obtained him also several other preferments, particularly those of Prebend and Chancellor in the church of York (b). In 1232, the archiepiscopal See of Canterbury being vacant by the death of Richard Wethershed, and the rejection of two of his successors, Ralph Nevil, Bishop of Chichester and Chancellor of England, and John, Sub-Prior of Canterbury, by the Pope, our Dr Blount was, by the Chapter of Canterbury, elected Archbishop (c). He did not, however, enjoy that dignity, for the Pope immediately objected to him, and after a summary enquiry into the validity of his election, declared it void for several reasons, of which our historians take notice (d), though very probably Bale has hit upon the true cause, which, however, was never alledged (e) [A]. Many of our modern writers, and particularly Bishop Godwin, fall into frequent inaccuracies concerning this Prelate, sometimes mistaking his surname, and sometimes confounding him with Richard Blount Bishop of Lincoln (f). After his return from Rome, and being deprived of his high dignity, he retired once again to Oxford, and, as Leland tells us, consoled himself under his misfortunes, by an ardent application to his studies (g). In this manner he spent sixteen years, during which time he composed several learned works, and amongst them

(a) Leland, Comment. de Script. Britan. Vol. II. p. 276. Matth. Paris, Hist. Angl. Vol. I. p. 354, 377.
(b) Matth. Paris, Hist. Angl. Vol. I. p. 755.
(c) Godwin, de Præful. Angl. edit. 1616, 4to, p. 127.
(d) M. Paris, Hist. Angl. Vol. I. p. 385.
(e) Script. Britan. edit. 1559, fol. p. 280.
(f) De Præful. Angl. p. 127.
(g) Comment. de Script. Vol. II. p. 276.

[A] Which however was never alledged.] The whole of this transaction has hitherto been very darkly treated. We will endeavour to clear it up in this note, as far as the authorities which remain at this distance of time will permit. The reader must observe, that during the reign of Henry III. the Popes assumed greater authority than at any other time, except in the days of his father, in the realm of England, and were especially busy in the confirmations of the Archbishops of Canterbury (1) Richard Wethershed, who had succeeded Stephen Langton in the archiepiscopal See of Canterbury, deceased, in 1231 (2), whereupon Ralph Nevil, Bishop of Chichester, was elected his successor; but the Pope knowing the great parts of this Prelate, and his affection to the Crown, absolutely refused to confirm him, for fear he should withdraw the King from that slavish submission he had hitherto paid to the Sec of Rome; however, his Holiness gave leave to the Monks of Canterbury to proceed to a new election, with an admonition however to be careful in their choice, that the new Archbishop should be sincerely attached to the Sec. of Rome (3). Upon this they elected John their Sub-Prior, who went in person to Rome in order to his Confirmation. The Pope thereupon directed that he should be examined by the Cardinals as to his abilities; but notwithstanding they reported in his favour, his Holiness declared him infirm, and therefore incapable, directing the Chapter of Canterbury to make a new choice (4). They did so, and then fixed on our Dr Blount, to whom the Pope objecting a simoniacal contract with Peter Bishop of Winchester, and also alledging, that Blount having held two benefices with cure of souls, without a dispensation, he was to be considered as a reprobate, and consequently incapable of so high preferment; and this judgment he pronounced, notwithstanding Blount pleaded that he held such benefices before the decree of that General Council, whereon this sentence was founded. Thus, says Matth. Paris, the Church of Canterbury was in the same state with Sarah the daughter of Raguel and wife of Tobias, as being thrice a widow in so short a space, for this fell out in the spring of the year 1233 (5). Perhaps, says Bale, Blount was more learned than the Court of Rome, desired an Archbishop should be (6). In truth, whoever considers the character of Gregory IX, one of the warmest and boldest men that ever sat in the papal chair, and reflects upon his rejecting the Bishop of Chichester on account of his loyalty, and the Sub-Prior of Canterbury for insufficiency, after he had stood an examination of three days on nineteen several articles, and came off with applause; whoever I say attentively reflects on this, and on our Blount's being supported by the Emperor's interest (7), will not think that Bale's heat did in this case carry him too far; but rather that there is just reason to suppose his abilities rendered him obnoxious to the Court of Rome, more than his having had two livings, which whatever crime it might have been in those days, would have been thought a small fault in succeeding times.

(5) Hist. Angl. Vol. I. p. 385.
(6) Script. Britan. p. 280.
(7) Matth. Paris, Hist. Angl. Vol. I. p. 370-385.

(1) Hist. des Papes. Vol. III. p. 155-236.
(2) Matth. Paris, Vol. I. p. 370. Nich. Trivet. Annal. Vol. I. p. 184.
(3) Matth. Paris, Hist. Angl. Vol. I. p. 370.
(4) Hist. Prior. Cant. apud Wharton. Anpl. Sac. Vol. I. p. 140. M. Paris, Vol. I. p. 370.

[B] As

(b) Bale, Script. Britan. p. 280.

(j) Matth. Paris, Hist. Angl. Vol. I. p. 385.

(k) De Academ. Britan.

various Commentaries of the Holy Scriptures (b). He was celebrated by his contemporaries, for the elegance of his stile, and for the extensiveness of his learning (i). John Rofs of Warwick, no contemptible Historian, and who did not live above a century after his time, speaks of him as a prodigy of science (k). Yet Pits very confidently tells us; that his writings did by no means speak him worthy of such commendations (l). A censure in itself of little authority, and all circumstances considered, of none at all, as will be shewn in the notes [B]. This very learned, though unfortunate person, having attained unto a good old age, and unto a high reputation for his knowledge, prudence, and piety, deceased in 1248 (m), having always shewn an equality of mind, which demonstrated him worthy of the highest station, by enabling him to bear with fortitude his fall from thence.

(l) De Illust. Angl. Script. p. 319.

(m) Matth. Paris, Hist. Angl. Vol. I. p. 755.

[B] As will be shewn in the notes.] Leland, in his life of this learned person, owns ingenuously, that he was so unlucky as never to have met with any of those elegant writings which rendered our author's memory famous, adding a doubt whether any of them were extant (8). Bale in the first edition of his work omitted this life, and when he added it afterwards he only copied Leland, adding that Blount had written Summarium Sacræ Facultatis, lib. 1. Disceptationes aliquot, lib. 1. and several Commentaries on the Scriptures (9). Then comes Pits and transcribes Bale, adding the censure mentioned in the text (10); yet takes no notice of any other works than those which Bale had before noted, and, which is very remarkable, does not give us the beginning of any of them, as his custom always is, wherever he had seen such books, or could meet with any accounts from other people who had seen them. It is therefore more than probable that he boldly published this calumny, in order to support the credit of the See of Rome, by lessening the reputation of a person whom it had so vehemently persecuted. E

(10) De Illust. Angl. Script. p. 319.

(8) Comment. de Script. Britan. Vol. II. p. 277.

(9) Script. Britan. p. 280.

(a) Trivet. Ann. Vol. I. p. 198. M. Paris, Hist. Angl. Vol. 1. p. 686.

(b) Wharton, Angl. Sacr.

(c) Godwin, de Præful. Angl. p. 460, 461.

(d) Trivet. Ann. Vol. I. p. 203. M. Paris, Hist. Angl. Vol. 1. p. 944.

BLOUNT (RICHARD) called also in Latin Blundus or Blondus, an eminent Divine in the XIIIth century. He became first Chancellor, and then Bishop of Exeter in 1245, being the twenty-ninth of Henry III (a), and is said to have been a person of a very sweet and gentle disposition, which inclined him to trust others too much in the management of his own affairs, and in those of the Church (b). In consequence of this, his dependants entered into a conspiracy, for defrauding the church of Exeter of a great part of it's revenues, by forging certain grants, to be by them produced after his decease. The names of these persons were, Lodewel, his Chancellor; Sutton, his Register; Fitzherbert, his Official; and Ermeston, the Keeper of his Seal (c). The good Bishop died in 1257 (d) [A]. Not long after which, they put in practice their base design, which succeeded as such designs generally do, that is to say, it created some stir and dispute at first, but at last appeared in it's true colours, a base and black forgery, for which all the conspirators were compelled to do publick penance in the cathedral church, on the nineteenth of March, 1267 (e).

(c) Godwin, de Præful. Angl. p. 460, 461.

[A] The good Bishop died, &c.] According to the character given us of this Prelate by Bishop Godwin, one could scarce have said so much for him as is said in the text; to justify this therefore we must observe, that we have the authority of Matth. Paris, who was his contemporary, to support us. For he, speaking of his accession to the episcopal dignity, says, that he was a man superior to censure, and in his life and learning equally commendable. Vir sine querela, moribus et literis omnibus commendabilis (1).

(1) Hist. Angl. Vol. I. p. 686.

(a) See Baronage of England, by Sir Will. Dugdale, Vol. 1. p. 527.

BLOUNT (CHARLES) the eighth Lord Montjoy, created afterwards Earl of Devonshire, was born in the year 1563 [A], being the second son of James, Lord Montjoy (a). He had his education at Oxford, and the Inner-Temple (b). When he was at this last place, 'being about twenty years of age, of a brown hair, a sweet face, a most neat compofure, and tall in his person (c);' he made his first appearance at Court, where he was distinguished by Queen Elizabeth [B]. His fortune at that time was very small (d); however, so good was his interest, that he was chosen one of the (b) Wood, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 138. Lond. 1731. Fragmenta Regalia, by Sir Rob. Naunton, Lond. 1653, 12mo, p. 73.

(c) Naunton, ibid. (d) Idem, p. 73.

(1) W. Imhoff, Reg. Parium; Mag. Britan. Hist. Genealog. Norimb. 1690.

(2) Fragmenta Regalia, edit. 1653, 12mo, p. 73.

[A] Was born in the year 1563.] He was in the forty-third year of his age in 1606 when he died (1), and consequently must have been born in the year 1563.

[B] He made his first appearance at Court, where he was distinguished by Queen Elizabeth.] Sir Robert Naunton gives the following account of it (2). 'As he came from Oxford he took the Inner-Temple in his way to Court, whither he no sooner came, but (without asking) he had a pretty strange kind of admission, which I have heard from a discreet man of his own, and much more of the secrets of those times. The Queen was then at Whitehall, and at dinner, whither he came to see the fashion of the Court; the Queen had soon found him out [he being a very handsome man, as is related above in the text], and with a kind of an affected frown, asked the Lady-Carver what he was? She answered, she knew him not; inasmuch as enquiry was made from one to another who he might be, till at length it was told the Queen he was brother to the Lord William Mountjoy. This inquisition, with the eye of ' Majesty fixed upon him, (as she was wont to do, and to daunt men she knew not) stirred the blood of this young gentleman, inasmuch as his colour came and went; which the Queen observing, called him unto her, and gave him her hand to kiss, encouraging him with gracious words and new looks; and so diverting her speech to the Lords and Ladies, she said, that she no sooner observed him, but that she knew there was in him some noble blood, with some other expressions of pity towards his house: And then again demanding his name, she said, Fail you not to come to the Court, and I will bethink myself how to do you good. And this was his inlet, and the beginnings of his grace. Where it falls into consideration, that though he wanted not wit and courage, (for he had very fine attractions, and being a good piece of a scholar) yet were they accompanied with bashfulness and a natural modesty, which (as the tone of his house, and the ebbe of his fortune then stood) might have hindered his progression, had they not been reinforced by the infusion of Sovereign favour, and the Queen's gracious invitation.'

[C] Inheritance

(e) Notitia Parliamentaria, by Br. Willis, Esq; Vol. II. p. 129. Lond. 1716, 8vo.

(f) Ibid. p. 276. His brother was Lord of the Manors of St Ives and Berealston. Ibid. p. 125, 374.

(g) Morgan, Sphere of Gentry, p. 88.

(h) Camden's Annals of Queen Elizabeth, ad ann. 1588, in Complete History of England, edit. Lond. 1706, Vol. II. p. 547.

(i) Wood, ubi supra, col. 123.

(j) Willis, ubi supra, p. 376.

(k) Camden, ubi supra, p. 594. Dugdale, Vol. I. p. 521, and Vol. II. p. 287.

Burgesses for the Burgh of St Ives in Cornwall, in the parliament which met at Westminster in 1585, being then not above two and twenty years of age (e). The next year he was returned one of the Burgesses for Berealston in Devonshire (f), and the same year was knighted (g). In 1588 he was one of those young noblemen and gentlemen who hired ships at their own charge, to go and join the English fleet, when it was in pursuit of the Spanish armada (h). On the 16th of June 1589 he was created Master of Arts at Oxford (i): And, a second time, was chosen one of the Burgesses for Berealston, in the parliament which met at Westminster in February 1592-3 (k). Upon the death of Henry, Earl of Suffex in 1594, he was made Governor of Portsmouth (l). And the same year succeeded to his elder brother's title of Lord Montjoy (m), and inheritance of one thousand marks [C]. With this he lived, as Sir Robert Naunton expresses it (n), 'in a fine way and garb, and without any great support, during all Queen Elizabeth's times. And, as there was in his nature a kind of backwardness, which did not befriend him, nor suit with the motion of the court, so there was in him an inclination to arms, with a humour of travelling; which, had not some wise men about him laboured to remove, and the Queen herself laid in her commands, he would, out of his natural inclination, have spoiled his own fortune. For, as he was grown by reading (whereunto he was much addicted) to the theory of a soldier, so he was strongly invited by his genius to the acquaintance of the practical part of the war, which were the causes of his excursions. For he had a company in the Low-Countries, from whence he came over with a noble acceptance of the Queen; but, somewhat restless in honourable thoughts, he exposed himself again and again, and would press the Queen with the pretences of visiting his company so often, that at length he had a flat denial. And yet he stole over with Sir John Norris into Bretagne, where was then a hot and active war; till at last the Queen took his decessions for contempts, and confined his residence to the Court, and her own presence.' In 1597 he was made Knight of the Garter (o); and employed in the expedition to the Azores islands, being Lieutenant-General of the land forces under the Earl of Essex (p), and Commander of the ship Defiance (q). The same year, there being an universal Irish rebellion intended, with the assistance of Spain, in order to shake off the English government (r); the Lord Montjoy was constituted Lieutenant under the Earl of Essex, of the forces appointed for the defence of that kingdom (s). In 1598, he was designed for the Lieutenancy of Ireland, but durst not stand in competition with the great favourite of his time, the Earl of Essex; who coveting this great authority and station [D], and once gratified his own ambition, and his enemies malicious designs, which desired nothing more than his absence from Court (t). However, upon this Earl's disgrace, he was invested with that honour towards the end of the year 1599 (u). So great was the opinion the Queen had of his worth and conduct, that she would have him, and none other, to finish and bring the Irish war to a propitious end, as Sir Robert Naunton observes (w). For it was a prophetic speech of her own, That it would be his fortune and his honour, to cut the thread of the fatal Irish rebellion, and to bring her in peace to the grave; wherein she was not mistaken. He embarked at Beaumaris, February the 23d, 1599-1600, and landed the next day in Ireland (x); where he showed himself the best foldier that kingdom had seen in many years, because he found out the true way of making war with the Irish; for being well supplied with necessaries from England, he plainly saw, that if he could attack them at a time when they wanted all conveniencies to keep the field, he should meet with very little or no resistance; and therefore he supplied his frontier-garrisons with men and provisions; and they by their frequent excursions did such executions on the persons and estates of the Irish, that by one winter's war he reduced them to the necessity of eating one another (y). On the 24th of December 1601, he gained a compleat victory near Kinsale, over the Irish and six thousand five hundred Spaniards, newly come over to their assistance; wherein twelve hundred of the enemy were slain, and about eight hundred wounded, whereas less than twenty of the English were killed or wounded (z). This was a decisive blow, for soon after, a total end was put to the Irish wars, by the voluntary submission of the arch-rebel Hugh O Neal, Earl of Tiroen, to the Lord Montjoy, who brought him over along with him

(m) Dugdale, Vol. I. p. 251.

(n) Ubi supra, p. 75.

(o) Milles's Catalogue of Honour. Stow (Annales, edit. 1631, fol. p. 783.) calls him Knight of the Order, when he was appointed Lieutenant-General; so that he was most likely so before this expedition.

(p) Stow, Annales, ubi supra. Camden, p. 597.

(q) Naval Hist. by T. Lediard, p. 353.

(r) R. Cox's History of Ireland, Lond. 1689, Part i. p. 414.

(s) Dugdale, ubi supra, p. 521.

(t) Dugdale, ibid. Camden, ubi supra, p. 613. R. Cox, ubi supra, p. 416.

(u) Camden, Annales, p. 619. Pacata Hibernia, p. 2.

(w) Ubi supra, p. 77.

(x) Pacata Hibernia, by Tho. Stafford, Lond. 1633, fol. p. 2.

(y) R. Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Part ii. Epistle to the Reader, p. 2.

(z) Pacata Hibernia, as above, p. 232, &c.

[C] Inheritance of one thousand marks. As the Blounts were a very ancient, honourable, and numerous family (3), their estate was originally very considerable (4). But the Lord Montjoy's patrimony was very much reduced, through his grandfather's exorbitant expences in the wars in France, his father's vanity in the search of the Philosopher's stone, and his brother's untimely prodigalities; all which seemed to conspire to ruin the house, and altogether to bring it to nothing (5).

[D] But durst not stand in competition with the Earl of Essex, &c. The Earl of Essex might oppose his advancement to that high station, both out of jealousy and a private pique; for the Lord Montjoy (when he was but Sir Charles Blount) having one day had the good fortune to run very well a tilt, the Queen was so well pleased with it, that in token of her favour she sent him a Queen at chess of gold, richly enamelled, which his seryants fastened the next day to his arm with a crimson ribband. My Lord Essex, as he passed through the privy-chamber, espying it, with Sir Charles's cloak cast under his arm, the better to commend it to view, enquired what it was, and for what cause there fixed? Sir Fulk Grevil told him, it was the Queen's favour, which the day before, and after the tilting, she had sent him. Whereupon my Lord Essex, in a kind of emulation, and as though he would have limited her favour, said, 'Now I perceive every fool must have a favour.' This bitter and publick affront coming to Sir Charles Blount's ear, he sent him a challenge, which was accepted by my Lord, and they met near Marybone-Park; where my Lord was hurt in the thigh, and disarmed (6).

(6) Naunton, ubi supra, p. 66.

(a) R. Cox, Part ii, p. 8. Life of James I, by Ar. Wilton, in Complete Hist. Vol. II, p. 664. Stow's Annals, p. 835.

(b) Pat. 1 Jac. I. p. 14.

(c) Camden's Ann of King James I, in Complete Hist. Vol. II, p. 641.

(d) Orig. 1 Jacob. p. 5. Rot. 24. Dugdale, abt fupra, p. 521. Stow, p. 826.

(e) Camden, Britannia, edit. 1722, col. 63.

(f) Fines, Moryson's Travels, Part ii. This Moryson was Secretary to Lord Montjoy in Ireland. Wood's Fasti, Vol. I. col. 141.

(g) Sir Walter Raleigh's Arraignment by Sir T. Overbury.

(h) Stow, Annals, p. 846.

(i) Idem, p. 881.

(7) Winwood's Memorials, Vol. II, p. 206.

(a) Chauncy's Hertfordshire, p. 24. See the Register at Ridge. Wood's Athen. Oxon edit. 1721. Vol. II, col. 712.

(b) Idem, ibid.

(c) Idem, ibid.

(1) From the information of Sir Harry Pope Blount.

him to England, in the beginning of the year 1603 (a). But, before his coming to England, that brave Lord was, on the 25th of April, constituted Lieutenant of Ireland (b) by King James I; and, the next month appointed one of the King's Privy-Council (c). The 21st of July ensuing he was advanced to the title of Earl of Devonshire (d). Moreover, in reward of his great services, his Majesty made him Master of the Ordnance in England; gave him Kingston-hall in Dorsetshire (e), two hundred pounds a year, old rent of affize out of the Exchequer, and as much more out of the Duchy for him and his heirs for ever; besides the county of Lecal in Ireland; together with other lands in the Pale there, which were to fall to the Crown upon the death of the Countess of Kildare, for want of heirs male of her body (f). He was in 1603 one of the Lords present at the arraignment of Sir Walter Raleigh (g). In 1604 he was one of the Commissioners to negotiate a treaty of peace between England and Spain (h). And in 1605 was also one of the Commissioners for the arraignment of the traitors concerned in the Gun-powder-plot (i). Besides the places and offices above-mentioned which he enjoyed, he had a company of horse in Ireland (k), and was Warden of the New Forest (l). He died at the Savoy in the Strand, the 3d of April 1606, after eight or ten days illness, of a burning fever and putrefaction of the lungs (m); and was buried with great pomp in St Paul's chapel in Westminster-abbey (n). Mr Camden styles him a person famous for conduct; and so eminent for courage and learning, that in those respects he had no superior, and but few equals (o). And his Secretary Moryson informs us, that he was beautiful in his person as well as valiant, and learned as well as wise (p). His greatest blemish was, that he took another man's wife, namely Penelope, daughter of Walter Devereux, Earl of Essex (q), which had been married several years to Robert, Lord Rich, and had brought him three sons and four daughters (E). The Earl of Devonshire left this Lady fifteen hundred pounds a year, and most of his moveables; and of five children, that she fathered upon him at the parting from her former husband, he provided for no more than three; leaving the eldest son, Montjoy Blount, between three and four thousand pounds a year, and to a daughter six thousand pounds in money (r). This Montjoy Blount, was, by King James I, created Lord Montjoy, of Montjoy fort in Ireland; and by King Charles I (s), Lord Montjoy of Thurveston in Derbyshire; and finally (t), Earl of Newport in the Isle of Wight. He died at Oxford the 12th of February 1665, and was buried in Christ-Church cathedral (u); being succeeded in his honours by his son and heir George Blount; and he, by Henry his brother (w).

[E] He took another man's wife, namely Penelope, &c.] It was, undoubtedly, upon account of this dishonourable action, that the author of a letter to Mr Winwood made use of these harsh expressions (7). 'The Earle of Devonshire left this life — soon and early for his years, but late enough for himself; and happy had he been if he had gone two or three years since, before the world was weary of him, or that he had left that Scandall behind him.' — The person it seems who married them was W. Laud, then Chaplain to the Earl of Devonshire, and afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, for which he was severely reflected upon by Archbishop Abbot, in the following words. 'It was an observation what a sweet man this was like to be, that the first observable act that he did,

' was the marrying of the Earl of D* to the Lady R †, when it was notorious to the world that she had another husband, and the fame a Nobleman, who had divers children then living by her. King James did for many years take this so ill, that he would never hear of any great preferment of him (8). — Mr Laud knew not, as he pretended, that she was then the wife of the Lord Rich, and therefore looked upon that action as one of the greatest misfortunes of his life, and set down the day into the catalogue of days of special observance to him, both in his diary and the manuscript book of his private devotions. The day in which they were married was December 26, 1605 (9).

(A) Winwood's Memorials, Vol. II, edit. Lond. 1725, fol. p. 173.

(1) Ibid. p. 206.

(m) Ibid. and Dugdale, Vol. II, p. 521.

(n) Ibid. and Brooke's Catalogue, &c. edit. Lond. 1619, p. 64.

(o) Britannia, edit. Lond. 1722, col. 49, 589.

(p) Travels, Part ii.

(q) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II, p. 178 and 388.

(r) Winwood's Memor. Vol. II, p. 206.

(s) Pat. 3 Car. I. p. 24.

(t) Pat. 4 Car. I. p. 11.

(u) Wood, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 138.

(w) Camden, Britannia, col. 153.

(*) Devonshire. (†) Rich.

(8) Rushworth's Collections, Vol. I, p. 440.

(9) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 55.

BLOUNT (Sir HENRY) a great Wit, a remarkable Patriot, and a considerable Writer in the last century. He was descended from a very antient and honourable family [A], and born December 15, 1602, at his father's seat at Tittenhanger in Hertfordshire (a). He received the first tincture of letters in the free-school of St Alban's, where he manifested an unusual quickness of parts, and having qualified himself for the university, was removed to Trinity-college in Oxford, and entered a Gentleman-Commoner there in 1616, before he was full fourteen years of age (b). Some years he spent in that learned society, with great reputation and universal respect, not so much on account of his family, by which he was nearly related to the founder, Sir Thomas Pope, as by reason of his personal merit. For in his youth he was of so cheerful a disposition, had so just a relish for the Antients, so sprightly a wit, so easy an address, and so frank and entertaining a conversation, that he charmed all who were of his acquaintance, and was justly esteemed as promising a genius as any in the university. In the year 1618 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and soon after left Oxford (c). Thence he went to Gray's-Inn, where for some time he applied himself to the study of the Law, and having perfected himself in all parts of a genteel education, he resolved to travel, which he did accordingly

[A] Of a very antient and honourable family.] He was the third son of Sir Thomas Pope Blount of Tittenhanger in the county of Hertford, Knight, by Frances his wife, daughter of Sir Thomas Pigott of Doddershall in the county of Bucks, Knight, and widow of Sir Thomas Nevil of Leicestershire, Knight (1).

The father of Sir Thomas Pope Blount was William Blount of Blounts-hall in Staffordshire, Esq; who was descended of Sir Thomas Blount, a younger brother of the antient house of Blounts, of Sodington in Worcester-shire (2).

(2) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II, col. 712. The English Baronage, Vol. II, p. 665, & seq.

accordingly in the spring of the year 1634, being then lately become of age (d). He made first the tour of France, part of Spain and Italy, and then passing to Venice, he there contracted an acquaintance with a Jannizary, with whom he resolved to pass into the Turkish dominions (e). With this view he embarked, on the seventh of May 1634, on board a Venetian galley, in which he sailed to Spalatro, and thence continued his journey by land to Constantinople. There he was very kindly received by Sir Peter Wiche, then our Embassador at the Porte. His stay at Constantinople was short, because, having an earnest desire to see Grand Cairo, and meeting with a sudden opportunity, he readily embraced it (f), and after a peregrination of near two years, returned safely into England, where, in 1636 (g), he printed an account of his travels [B]. This book made him known to the world, and much taken notice of, so that shortly after King Charles I, who desired to fill his Court with men of parts, appointed him one of the band of Pensioners, then composed of gentlemen of the first families in the kingdom (b). In 1638, his father, Sir Thomas Pope Blount, died, and left him the ancient seat of March's Hall in Staffordshire, and a very considerable fortune (i). On the twenty-first of March, in the succeeding year, the King conferred on him the honour of knighthood (k). At the first breaking out of the Civil War, he, following the glorious example of the elder branches of his illustrious family, who were eminently loyal, attended the King at York, at Oxford, and other places, was present at the battle of Edgehill, and had there (according to a tradition in the family) the honour of taking care of the young Princes (l). Afterwards he quitted his Majesty's service, and returned to London, where he was quickly questioned for his adhering to the King, but he being now grown a very wary and dexterous speaker, so well excused himself, by alledging his duty on account of his post, that he escaped all censure, and was thenceforward well received (m). Falling in with the times, he, in 1651, was named on a Committee of twenty persons, for inspecting the practice of the Law, and remedying its abuses (n). He declared himself very warmly against tythes, and would willingly have reduced the income of parish ministers to one hundred pounds a year. He also sat with Dr Richard Zouch, Dr William Clarke, Dr William Turner, Civilians, (d) Voyage to the Levant, pag. 2, 3.

(e) Ibid. p. 7, 8.

(f) Ibid. p. 35.

(g) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 713.

(h) The English Baronetage, Vol. III. p. 608.

(i) From the information of Sir Harry Pope Blount, great-grandson to our author.

(j) Wood's Ath. Oxon. ubi supra.

(k) From the information of Sir Harry Pope Blount.

(l) Wood, ubi supra.

(m) Wood, ubi supra.

(n) The English Baronetage, Vol. III. p. 668.

[B] Printed an account of his travels.] In these travels there are a great many passages relating to the personal history of the author, of which it may not be amiss to give some instances, as agreeable to the design of this life, and which cannot prove unentertaining to the reader. When he came into Egypt, and found that those who had been hitherto the companions of his travels, intended to make no stay there, but to pass immediately to Jerusalem, he resolved to remain behind. 'I, not so impatient of the climate, says 'he, nor loving company of Christians in Turkey, 'and but reasonably affected to relics, left them, 'and presumed to receive a longer entertainment; 'whereto I found an invital freely noble of itself, and 'with much regard to an honourable recommendation 'of me, sent by his Excellence the Lord Embassador 'of Holland at Constantinople, Sir Cornelius Haga, 'who having known my kinsman Sir James Blount, 'and some others of our name, was pleased in me to 'honour their memory. Here my abode in a family, 'which had there been resident twenty-five years, in- 'formed me of many things with much certainty. 'First, I must remember things upon record constant- 'ly renewed in office, as the multitude of the mes- 'cheteos, that is, churches and chapels five and thirty 'thousand; then the noted streets, four and twenty 'thousand, besides petty turnings and divisions; some 'of those streets I have found two miles in length, 'some not a quarter so long; every one of them is 'locked up in the night, with a door at each end, and 'guarded by a musqueteer, whereby fire, robberies, 'tumults, and other disorders are prevented (3).' As to the Turkish doctrine of Predestination, he gives us two notable instances of it, which in his own words run thus. 'One was at Rhodes, where, just as we 'entered the port, a French laquey of our company 'died with a great plague sore, which he had taken 'of the gunner's mate, who with one running upon 'him conversed and slept among us; the rest were so 'far from fear at his death, as they sat presently eat- 'ing and drinking with him, and within half an hour 'after his removal slept on his blanket, with his clothes 'instead of a pillow, which when I advised them not 'to do, they pointed upon their foreheads, telling me, 'it was written there at their birth when they should 'die; they escaped, yet divers of the passengers died 'thereof before we got to Egypt. The other was at 'my passage to Adrianople in Thrace; myself, the 'Jannizary, and one more, being in a coach, we passed 'by a man of good quality, and a soldier, who lying along with his horse by, could hardly speak so much 'as to intreat us to take him into our coach: The Jan- 'nizary made our companion ride his horse, taking 'the man in, whose brest being open and full of 'plague tokens, I would not have had him received; 'but he in like manner pointing to his own forehead 'and mine, told me, we could not take hurt, unless it 'were written there, and that then we could not avoid 'it. The fellow died in the night by our sides, and 'in our indemnity approved this confidence to be some- 'times fortunate, how wise soever (4).' His return 'from Egypt was by sea, first to Sicily, from whence he 'passed to Naples, the rarities of which entertained him 'some days; thence he went to Rome, afterwards to 'Florence and Bologna, and so to Venice, where he ar- 'rived in April 1635, having in that time, as he says, 'according to the most received divisions of Turkey, 'been in nine kingdoms, and passed six thousand miles 'and upwards, most part of it by land (5); a thing very 'unusual at that time, and which procured him, by way 'of distinction, the name of the Great Traveller. This 'book was published at London in 1636, in quarto, 'and soon after came to a second edition, and in 1638 'to a third in the same size (6). It was then printed in '12mo, and reached many editions; the title of the 'eighth runs thus. A Voyage into the Levant, being a 'brief Relation of a Journey lately performed from Eng- 'land by the way of Venice, into Dalmatia, Sclavonia, 'Bosnia, Hungary, Macedonia, Theffaly, Thrace, Rhodes, 'and Egypt, unto Grand Cairo; with particular obser- 'vations concerning the modern condition of the Turks, and 'other people under that Empire. By Sir Henry Blount, 'Knight. Of this work there have been several charac- 'ters, and very different ones given, of which we shall 'mention but two. It is so well esteemed abroad, says 'Mr Wood, that, (as I have been informed) it has been 'translated into French and Dutch (7). The author of 'an introductory discourse, containing a character of 'most books of Travels, prefixed to that great collec- 'tion of Voyages, commonly called Churchill's collec- 'tion, ascribed by some to Mr Locke, speaks thus 'of Sir Henry's book. 'Blount's Travels to the Le- 'vant, is a very short account of a journey through 'Dalmatia, &c. the whole very concise, and without 'any curious observations, or any notable descriptions. 'His account of the religions and customs of those 'people, only a brief collection of some other tra- 'vellers; the language mean, and not all of it to be 'relied on, if we credit others, who have writ better '(8).'

(4) Ibid. p. 112.

(5) Ibid. p. 79.

(6) Kenner's A-merican Library, p. 83.

(7) Athen. Oxon, Vol. II. col. 712.

(8) A Collection of Voyages and Travels, in six Volumes, folio, edit. 1732 Vol. I. p. xvii.

(3) Voyage to the Levant, 12mo, the 8th edit. 1671, p. 49, 50.

Civilians, and with several other eminent persons in the Court of King's (then called the Upper) Bench, in Westminster-Hall, on the fifth of July 1654, by virtue of a commission from Oliver Cromwell, for trying Don Pantalion Saa, brother to the Portuguese Ambassador, for murder, of which being found guilty, he was, much to the honour of the justice of this nation, by sentence of that court, adjudged to suffer death, and was executed accordingly (o). In the same year, by the death of his elder brother Thomas Pope Blount, Esq; the estate of Tittenhanger, descended to Sir Henry (p). His great reputation for general knowledge and uncommon sagacity, was the reason that his name was inserted in the list of twenty-one Commissioners, appointed, November 1, 1655, to consider of the trade and navigation of the Commonwealth, and how it might be best encouraged and promoted, in which station he did his country eminent service (q). It does indeed appear, that this was his sole view in complying with the forms of government set up between 1650 and 1660, and therefore we need not wonder that he was received into favour and confidence on the King's Restoration, as it appears he was, by his being appointed High-Sheriff of the county of Hertford, in 1661 (r). He lived thenceforward as an English gentleman, satisfied with the honours he had acquired, and the large estate he possessed, and having passed upwards of twenty years in this independent state, he died on the ninth of October, 1682, when he wanted but four months of fourscore, and was two days afterwards interred in the vault of his family, at Ridge in Hertfordshire, where a foreign writer, but erroneously, (unless he meant the parish) affirms he was born (s). As to the character of Sir Henry Blount, the reader will find it drawn by different hands in the notes [C]. As to what appears from his writings, he seems to have had strong parts, a lively imagination, and, in consequence of these, some very singular opinions. His style was manly, flowing, and less affected than could be expected, considering the times in, and the subjects on, which he wrote [D]. A Latin fragment, published by his son, better explains his sentiments than all the rest of his works, and demonstrates that he was a man of a deep, though irregular way of thinking, and had a capacity of colouring the most paradoxical opinions, so as to give them a great likeness unto truth [E]. For the first forty years of his life he was a boon companion, and much given to raillery, but in the other forty, of a serious temper, and a water drinker (t). He married 1647, Dame Hester Manwaring, relict of Sir William Manwaring of Cheshire, Knight, daughter and coheirefs of Christopher Wase, of Upper Holloway in the county of Middlesex, Esq; by whom he left three sons and one daughter (u). His arms were, Barry Nebule of 6, Or and Sable. Crest, a Wolf passant, Sable, between two Cornuts, Or, out of a ducal Coronet, proper (w).

(o) See an account of these proceedings in the first Volume of State Trials.

(p) From the information of Sir Harry Pope Blount.

(q) Cook's Description of the four last Reigns.

(r) Chauncey's Hertfordshire, p. 502.

(s) Nicéron's Memoires des Hommes Illust. Vol. XXIII. p. 398.

(t) From the information of Sir Harry Pope Blount.

(u) The English Baronetage, Vol. II. p. 669.

(w) From the information of Sir Harry Pope Blount.

[C] The reader will find his character by different hands in the notes. Anthony Wood tells us, he was esteemed by those that knew him, a gentleman of a very clear judgment, great experience, much contemplation (though not of much reading), and of great foresight into Government. He was also a person of admirable conversation, and in his younger years was a great banterer, which in his elder he disused (9). In a loose leaf of his Travels I once met with these remarks written, which, as they are founded on several passages in the book, I thought deserved to be transcribed. 'The author of this book, Sir H. B. appears to have been one of the Wits of that age, wherein it was fashionable to make a display of profound thinking, and quick penetration. He seems to have wrote this book, as the celebrated Osborne did another, on the same subject, purely to insinuate some notions of his own, which could not otherwise have been so safely published. Thus comparing the Turkish severity, which, in the beginning of wars, he says, makes use of colourable punishments, where just ones are wanting; with that tenderness shewn to light offenders in this part of the world, he adds, that it has more effect upon a bad age, than our Christian compassion, which is so easily abused, as we cannot raise two or three companies of soldiers, but they pilfer and rifle wheresoever they pass: Wherein, our want of cruelty upon delinquents, causes much more oppression of the innocent, which is the greatest cruelty of all (10). In another place, speaking of the Island of Patmos, and the cave wherein St John wrote his Revelation, he observes, that the privacy and aspect of those retreats being gloomy, still, and solemn, settle and contract the mind into profound speculations; but especially the quality of the air, a thing of main importance to dispose the wit. The air of those rocky caverns is not so damp and earthy as that of dungeons, nor so immaterial or wafting, as to unsettle and transport the phantasy, as that above ground; but of a middle temper, wherewith it affects the brain, in such a sort as is fittest to exercise it's intellectual faculty, to the height of what it's composition bears (11). Having told us how a Turk, to avoid being taken, tied his feet, and one of his hands together, and threw himself headlong into the sea; he adds, in this resolute end, he shewed by what a short passage many a years misery may be prevented, where other reasons, or fear masked in them, enthrall not (12). These strokes sufficiently shew the spirit of the man, and the scope of his book.'

[D] Considering the times in, and the subjects on, which he wrote. The rest of the works he published were these (13). 1. Six comedies, written by John Lilly, under the title of Court Comedies, by the care of Mr Henry Blount, London 1632, 8vo (14). 2. A satire, intitled, The Exchange Walk, in 1647. This, Mr Wood says, some of his relations informed him, fell from the pen of Sir Henry Blount, though his sons knew nothing of it. 3. An epistle in praise of tobacco and coffee, prefixed to a little treatise, intitled, Organon Salutis, written by Walter Rumsley, Esq; and printed in 1657, 8vo (15).

[E] So as to give them a great likeness unto truth. This Latin fragment is to be found in a Letter, addressed to the Right Honourable, and most ingenious Strephon, (supposed to be the Earl of Rochester) by Charles Blount, Esq; son to our author, dated Ludgate-Hill, February 8, 1679, and is printed in the Oracles of Reason, and in Mr Blount's works (16), and therefore thither we shall refer our readers. Wood observes, (17), that the Anima Mundi was supposed to have been, in a great measure, written by Sir Henry Blount, though published, as probably it was put into order, by his son, and this fragment makes the opinion so much the more probable, since it may be truly stiled the key to this performance, as containing in a narrow compass, the system that treatise seems to recommend, and a much better account of that sort of Philosophy than is to be found in all Spinosa's writings, who, with a darker head, had less depth of thought, than our ingenious author Sir Henry Blount.

(11) Ibid. p. 39.

40.

(12) Ibid. p. 77.

(13) Wood's Ath.

Oxon. Vol. I.

col. 296.

(14) Ib. Vol. II.

col. 713.

Nicéron. Memoires

des Hommes Illustres, Vol.

XXIII. p. 398.

(15) Wood's Ath.

Oxon. Vol. II.

col. 255.

(16) Vol. I. p.

154, 155, 156.

(17) Ath. Oxon.

Vol. II. col. 713.

(9) Voyage to the Levant, pag. 18.

BLOUNT (Sir THOMAS POPE) an eminent writer towards the close of the XVIIth century. He was the eldest son of Sir Henry Blount beforementioned, and was born at Upper Holloway in the county of Middlesex, Sept. 12, 1649 (a). He was carefully educated under the eye of his father, who took care to acquaint him with the several branches of polite literature, most worthy the notice of a person of his rank, and so great was the improvement he made under so able an instructor, that, even in his junior years, he was considered both as a judicious and learned man, and on this account, as well as for other marks of worth and genius, he was, by King Charles II, advanced to the degree of a Baronet (b), by a Patent dated Jan. 27, 1679, in the thirtieth year of his Majesty's reign, and in the life-time of Sir Henry Blount his father. He was elected Burgess for St Alban's in Hertfordshire, in the Parliaments in the thirtieth and thirty-first of King Charles II (c), and was Knight of the shire in three Parliaments after the Revolution (d), having also the honour to be elected Commissioner of Accounts for the three last years of his life by the House of Commons (e). He always distinguished himself as a lover of liberty, a sincere friend to his country, and a true patron of learning. His strong affection for literature, and his perfect acquaintance with the best writers in all ages and sciences, appeared fully in the great work he composed, first for his own use and satisfaction, and then published in the universal language for the benefit of others [A]. His capacity for writing in another manner, and on a great variety of important and entertaining subjects, appears

(a) From a MS; of Sir Henry Blount, now in the possession of Sir Harry Pope Blount, his grandson.

(b) The Baronetage of England; Vol. III. p. 672.

(c) Account of the Borough of St Alban's, MS. p. 195.

(d) Chauncy's Hertfordshire, p. 502.

(e) List of the Commissioners of Accounts, in the State Tracts.

[A] For the benefit of others.] The entire title of this most learned work, stands thus in the original edition, which was printed at London, in 1690, folio. Censura celebriorum authorum, sive tractatus in quo varia virorum doctorum de clarissimis, cujusque feculi scriptoribus judicia traduntur. Unde facillimo negotio lector dignoscere queat, quid in singulis quibusque istorum auctorum maximè memorabile sit, & quonam in pretio apud eruditos semper habiti fuerint. Omnia in studioforum gratiam collegit, & in ordinem digestit secundum seriem temporis quo ipsi auctores floruerunt Thomas Pope Blount, Anglo-Britannus Baronettos. i. e. A critick on the most celebrated writers, or a treatise in which the various opinions of the most learned men, as to the merit of the most famous authors in every age are delivered. Whereby the reader may, with great ease, discern what is most memorable with respect to each of those authors, and in what esteem they have always been among the learned. The whole for the use of the Studios, collected, and digested according to the order of time in which the authors flourished, by THOMAS POPE BLOUNT, an English Baronet. In 1694, a second edition was printed in 4to, at Geneva, in which all the passages which Sir Thomas had preserved in the modern languages, wherein they were written, are translated into Latin, in order to render the whole more uniform. It was printed a third time at the same place, in 1710, in 4to. What the true design of Sir Thomas was, will best appear from his epistle to the reader, which as it is short, curious, and what never appeared before in the English Tongue, may not displease the intelligent reader. 'The province I have undertaken was not the effects of any ambition, for a life retired, and free from noise, was always my supreme delight. This then was my sole motive, that, as far as in me lay, I might promote letters. When I first began the work, it was scarce in my thoughts to communicate it to the learned world; for my own use I drew it together, and now, at the request of persons of distinguished learning, give it to the Publick. The rather because having observed with what eagerness the Acta Eruditorum, and others books of the same nature, are caught up, not only by men of slender reading, but even such as are in the first forms of learning, I could not but hope, that even this collection of mine, such as it is, would not displease them. Learning is not without much study and pains to be acquired. It is Fanaticism for a man to think of becoming learned by inspiration; even a Poet by nature, will do little, if his genius, however bright, be not assisted by industry. Hence it is, that so few are truly learned, (whatever snatterers may boast) because they will not bestow the necessary pains and labour. That therefore you may receive the utmost fruits of reading, I have set before you a choice of authors, with the various sentiments of the most learned men, as to their merits, which if you diligently compare, you may both heighten and strengthen your own judgment, and avoid the loss of time and trouble in turning over works of little value. As to the utility of this work, this is its principal commendation, that it will assist you in compiling a library, by affording useful and necessary notices concerning authors; and for the want of these, it often happens, that men, in collecting books, are defrauded both of their time and money. To remedy this inconvenience, I have taken on me the labour of compiling this book: For therein you have, as it were, the picture of every author; thence you may learn when he flourished, and, generally speaking, when he died, what pieces were written by him, or at least, which were most esteemed, what his credit in the learned world, whether he was a Plagiary, and from what coffer he drew his stores, if put in the Index Expurgatorius, and, finally, of each author's works which is the best edition. All these you have at one view, if you deign to consult this book. It was not my intention to speak of all authors, that would have been too prolix a labour, but of those only which are in most esteem with the learned: I begin with Hermes Trifmegistus, not the fictitious writer, whose works are common, but the true and genuine author of that name, who is thought to have been coeval with Moses, and from him I descend to our own times. The authors of whom I treat are near six hundred, each of which stands according to the time in which he wrote. This method pleased me best, because I thought it would be more grateful to the reader to observe the flux and reflux of learning, than to run over things in alphabetical order, which seems fitter for a Dictionary than a literary History. You will perhaps admire, that considering the many excellent writers our country hath produced, you find so few touched by me; yet if you weigh this matter impartially, you will hold me excused; for the greatest part of these writers wrote in their own language, whence it has fallen out, that amongst learned foreigners who are not acquainted with our tongue, they are but little known, though of their country they deserved well, and are in just and high reputation at home. This is the cause that of English writers, the censures and observations of the learned, especially foreigners, are not easily found. Thus I have explained to you the method of this work. If our diligence in searching and collecting testimonies shall merit your esteem, it will give me great satisfaction, if otherwise, pardon me for this time, I shall hardly again run the hazard of your censure. Thomas Pope Blount. We are told by certain foreign critics, that our author had in view the same design which was undertaken by Tobias Magirus in his Eponymologium Criticum, which was published in 1644, and by Christian Eybenius, who republished that work in a more exact and extensive manner in 1687 (1). Niceron compares Sir Thomas's book (2) with the Jugemens des Savans by Baillet, but there is this essential difference between them, that Baillet reports other men's opinions in his own words, whereas our author transcribes theirs; so that the former is a work wherein boldness and vanity have a large share, and of the latter it is hard to say, whether the author's pains or his modesty be most conspicuous. This we may be the rather allowed to say, having often consulted Sir Thomas's book in order to enrich to our own.

(1) Acta Eruditor. Mens. Jan. 1691, p. 24.

(2) Memoires pour servir à la Hist. des Hommes Illustres, Tom. XXIII. p. 399.

appears from his Essays, which, in point of learning, judgment, and freedom of thought, are certainly no way inferior to those of the famous Montaigne [B]. His extensive knowledge, and his great modesty, are equally conspicuous, in another learned piece of his, wherein he presents the publick with the fruits of his reading, as to Natural History, without depriving those from whom he drew his knowledge, of any part of their reputation, a conduct which few have imitated, and which we can scarce enough commend [C]. What he has written on Poetry is in the same manner, and with the same modesty, at first probably drawn together for his own information, and in that respect a mark of his industry and judgment, afterwards sent abroad for publick use, which demonstrates his beneficence and ingenuous temper, as ready to communicate, as incapable of assuming to himself the merits of others [D]. Having thus satisfied, in his riper years, the great expectations which his friends had of him in his youth, having been steady to one party, without violence towards others, after acquiring honour in his several publick characters, esteem in private conversation, and affection in domestick life, he quietly ended his days at his seat at Tittenhanger, June 30, 1697, in the forty-eighth year of his age, and was buried the eighth of July following, in the vault of his family, at Ridge in Hertfordshire (f). He married Jane, daughter of Sir Henry Caesar, of Benington

(f) The Baronetage of England, Vol. III.
p. 673.

(3) Essays on feveral Subjects, by Sir Thomas Pope
Blount, Bart.
London, 320.

[B] No way inferior to those of the famous Montaigne. The Essays are in number seven (3), and their subjects follow. I. That Interest governs the world, and that Popery is nothing but Priestcraft, or an invention of the Priests to get Money. II. The great Mischief and Prejudice of Learning, and that a wife man ought to be preferred before a man of Learning. III. Of Education and Custom; the great Influence it hath upon most men; but that a good Education is not always effectual. IV. Of the Antients, and the respect that is due unto them; that we should not too much enslave ourselves to their Opinions. V. Whether the men of this present Age are any way inferior to those of former Ages, either in respect of Virtue, Learning, or long Life. VI. Of Passion, and whether the Passions are an Advantage or Disadvantage to men. VII. The Variety of Opinions, whence it proceeds; the Uncertainty of Human Knowledge. As to the author's design in this work, it is best learnt from his own words. 'It is, says he, as impossible for an author to please all mens fancies, as it is for a cook to gratify every man's palate; for the minds of men are of different frames and tempers, and therefore those notions that are pleasing to one man, do often prove nauseous to another. This then is the reason that authors are either doomed or approved, not according to their own merits or demerits, but even as the reader stands inclined, who generally frames his judgment from his own settled humour or opinion, and as the book agrees or disagrees with that, so is the author to receive his fate; and thus is verified that known saying, Quicquid recipitur, recipitur ad modum recipientis. What kind of reception this little treatise may find in the world, I neither know nor value: I wrote it in my idle hours for my own entertainment; and therefore if it relishes not thy gusto, the only way to be even with me is for thee to turn author, and then (possibly) I may have occasion to return the compliment. The age we now live in is both critical and censorious; and therefore, if there be any part of a book which (either through the unhappy stile of the author, or the ill nature of the reader) seems to admit of a double construction, the author may assure himself it shall be taken in the worst; upon which consideration I think it proper to acquaint thee, that whatsoever opinion the Clergy may please to have of this book, or it's author, I unfeignedly declare myself to be a true honourer of them, I mean of such of them as live up to the honour of that holy profession; and for those that do not, I as little court their favour, as I value their censure.' If the learned and judicious Niceron had ever seen this work, he would not have called our author, as he does, on the authority of Anthony Wood, a mere compiler.

[C] Which we can scarce enough commend. The entire title of this book runs thus (4). 'A NATURAL HISTORY, containing many, not common, Observations, extracted out of the best modern writers. By Sir Thomas Pope Blount, Baronet.' It is dedicated to Henry Lord Capel, and in the last paragraph of the dedication there is a very just account of the book. 'My Lord, says our author, what I now (with all deference) present to your Lordship, is not any superficial slight notion of my own, but that which ' is here tendered is a Natural History, drawn from the writings of the Beaux Esprits, or the greatest wits of the present age upon these several subjects; so that I question not but your Lordship will meet with some remarks that may be entertaining, useful, and not common. And if upon any account it be acceptable to your Lordship, I have then fully attained my end; since the utmost I can pretend to is but a pepper-corn acknowledgment from, &c.' The whole of this piece is a judicious common-place book of what the best authors have written on the most curious subjects, and will be always admired by good judges, though it may possibly be undervalued by mean ones.

[D] Assuming to himself the merits of others. The title of this work of his on Poetry sufficiently explains his design. Thus it stands (5). 'De Re Poetica; or, Remarks upon Poetry. With Characters and Censures of the most considerable Poets, whether antient or modern. Extracted out of the best and choicest Criticks. By Sir Thomas Pope Blount.' It is dedicated to John Earl of Mulgrave, so well known to the world, and to posterity afterwards, by the title of Buckinghamshire. In this dedication he tells him; 'My Lord, had I nothing at all of inclination to this address, as I hope your Lordship will easily believe I have a great deal, yet I do not know whether I ought not to have made it out of meer policy. 'Tis certain, my Lord, you are a very dangerous reader; a writer therefore who has but too much reason to apprehend your judgment, is bound in prudence to take you off if possible. 'Tis not that I look upon a dedication as a bribe; but I find that sometimes, when we have an idle present made us, which 'tis impossible to conceal, we are apt to be very favourable, and counterfeit a value of the thing we perhaps secretly despise, rather than own to the world that any has been so hardy to make us an offering of what we should think little. But however this be, your Lordship has been beforehand with me, and so much to my advantage, as to render such a consideration wholly needless: Already you have indulged this piece, and allowing it for useful, have given it the great character desired to satisfy the author's ambition. For as it is entirely a collection, wherein I have nothing to answer for, or hope any thing from, but the choice and distribution of the matter, if I have but made a profitable one, and employed my pains beneficially for the world, 'tis all I had to pretend to. After this, my Lord, I shall make you no excuses for the honour I do myself in this dedication; and if in it I seem any thing vain or presuming, I am contented so to do, provided I may find the justice to have it thought at the same time, that 'tis the good opinion not of myself, but of your Lordship that has made me so.' We cannot have a clearer or better view of this treatise than that which the author has here given us, nor could he have assigned a better reason for it's being esteemed than that which he has told us, that it was commended by the Nobleman to whom he inscribed it, since it is certain that our nation never boasted of a better Critick. This treatise is divided into two parts, the first contains remarks on Poetry, i. e. the sense of the best authors on all it's parts; the second contains the characters, or censures

(5) London:
Printed for R.
Bentley in Covent
Garden, 1694.
4to.

(4) London:
Printed for R.
Bentley in Covent
Garden, 1693.
22mo.

Benington Place in the county of Hertford, Knight, and by her left issue five sons, and nine daughters.

fures of Poets, sixty-seven in all, digested in an alphabetical order, beginning with Æschylus the Greek tragick Poet, and ending with the English Waller. One may justly say of this piece, that though it will hardly entertain an ignorant reader, it will greatly instruct a wife one, as containing in a narrow compass a vast variety of curious observations, and all perhaps that in the time it's author flourished had been written with strength or elegance, either of the subjects or poets therein treated. E

BLOUNT (CHARLES) younger son of Sir Henry Blount, and brother to Sir Thomas Pope Blount beforementioned, an eminent Writer also in the last century. He was born at his grandfather's seat at Upper Holloway in the county of Middlesex, April 27, 1654 (a). He was endowed by nature with a great capacity, and with a strong propensity to learning, which excellent qualities were properly cultivated by the assiduous care of his father, who took upon himself the direction of his studies. Under so able an instructor, he quickly acquired an extraordinary skill in the Arts and Sciences, without any thing of that pedantry, which is too frequently the consequence of young men's application to study in the common course (b). His pregnant parts and polite behaviour, brought him early into the world, so that his father, who was a true judge of men, thought fit to settle him when he was about eighteen. This he did by marrying him to Eleanora, daughter of Sir Timothy Tyrrel, of Shotover in the county of Oxford, and gave him a very handsome estate, having always esteemed his parts, and respected him as a friend, as well as loved him with the affection of a father (c). The year after his marriage, he wrote a little treatise which he published without his name [A]. In 1678, or, as is generally held, in 1679, he sent abroad his Anima Mundi, in which it is said, and with great probability, that he had the assistance of his father. The piece, it seems, had been long before handed about in manuscript by the acquaintance of it's author, with several passages in it much stronger than in that which was transmitted to the press, and licensed by Sir Roger L'Esrange. This did not hinder it's giving great offence, insomuch that complaint thereof was made to Dr Compton, then Lord Bishop of London, who, upon perusal, judged it not proper for all readers promiscuously, and therefore signified that he expected it should be suppressed, intimating, that he would thereupon rest satisfied. But afterwards, when the Bishop was out of town, an opportunity was taken by some zealous person to burn the book, which nevertheless hath been reprinted since (d) [B]. The same year he published a broad sheet under the title of

(a) This circumstance is ascertained from a MS. of Sir Henry Blount's, in the hands of Sir Harry Pope Blount.

(b) The Baronetage of England, Vol. III. p 67. See the Account of this gentleman's Life and Writings, said to be written by Mr. Gildon, and prefixed to the Miscellaneous Works of Charles Blount, Esq;

(c) See the Tract above referred to, and many of our author's Letters in the Oracles of Reason.

(d) Wood's Athr Oxon. Vol. II, col. 713.

Mr

[A] Which he published without his name] This tract was intitled (1), Mr Dryden vindicated, in reply to the friendly vindication of Mr Dryden, with Reflections on the Rota. In order to have some idea of the nature and occasion of this piece, we must take notice of the controversy on which it was written. One Mr Richard Leigh, a Player, on the coming out of Mr Dryden's Conquest of Granada, published a pamphlet, intitled (2), A Censure of the Rota on Mr Dryden's Conquest of Granada. Upon this appeared another smart pamphlet, under the title of (3) The Friendly Vindication of Mr Dryden from the censure of the Rota. It was against this pamphlet that our author drew his pen in the piece before-mentioned, written with fire, and yet not deficient in judgment, though the author was then very young. That he was really the author of this piece (4) could scarce have been recovered at this distance of time, but by the favour of his family.

[B] Which nevertheless hath been reprinted since.] Nobody could be more aware than the author of the opposition this book was likely to meet with, and therefore he took the pains of apologizing for it in his Preface. Methinks, says he, I already behold some haughty pedant, strutting and looking down from himself as from the devil's mountain upon the universe, where, amongst several other inferior objects, he happens at last to cast his eye upon this treatise; when after a quibble or two upon the title, he falls foul upon the book itself, damning it by the name of an Atheistical, Heretical pamphlet; and to glorify his own zeal, under the pretence of being a champion for truth, summons ignorance and malice for his seconds: But such a person understands not wherein the nature of Atheism consists, how conversant soever he may otherwise be in the practice of it. It were Atheism to say there is no God, and so it were (though less directly) to deny his providence, or restrain it to some particulars, and exclude it in reference to others. Such are Atheists who maintain such opinions as these, and so are those Hereticks who err in fundamentals, and continue obstinately in such errors. But the ignorant vulgar people (whose superstition is grounded upon the assimilating God with themselves) are apt to think that every one they hate are God Almighty's enemies, and that whoever differs from them in opinion (though in never so trivial a matter) are Atheists, or Hereticks at least, not rightly considering the words of St Peter, That in every nation, he who feareth the Lord and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him. And Minucius Felix says well to the same purpose, He is the best Christian who makes the honestest man. Heresy is an act of the will, rather than understanding; a lye, rather than a mistake; and thus St Austin expresses it, saying, errare possunt, Hereticus esse nolo. Heresy and Schism, (says the ingenious Mr Hales) as commonly now used, are two theological scarecrows; with which they who uphold a party in religion, used to fright away such, as making an enquiry into it, are ready to relinquish and oppose it, if it appear either erroneous or suspicious. For as Plutarch reports of a Painter, who having unskillfully painted a cock, drove away all the cocks and hens he could find, that so the imperfection of his own art might not appear by comparing it with nature; so men for some ends, not willing to admit of any fancy but their own, endeavour to hinder all enquiries by way of comparison, that so their own deformity may not appear. Therefore if any man blames me for comparing Christianity with Paganism, it shews nothing but his unworthy distrust of the sufficiency of that religion he professes. The enemies of this book have suggested, that all that is here said, and a great deal of the same sort in the book itself, was purely to save appearances, and that whatever the author might protest, the design of it was very pernicious. The book notwithstanding was much admired by men of very different persuasions, on account of the various learning contained therein, and particularly for the drawing together the thoughts of so many learned persons on so important a subject. The title of this work at large is, ANIMA MUNDI; or, An Historical Narration of the opinions of the Antients concerning man's Soul after this Life, according to unenlightened Nature. By CHARLES BLOUNT, Gentleman. Several answers were written to it, but the most solid refutation of the principles

(1) London, 1673, 4to.

(2) Oxf. 1673, 4to.

(3) Cambridge, 1673, 4to.

(4) Grounded on the information of Sir Harry Pope Blount, Baronet, grand-nephew to our author.

Mr Hobbs's last Words and dying Legacy. It was extracted from the Leviathan, and was intended to weaken and expose his doctrine, yet it seems he was no very warm antagonist, since there is still extant a letter of his to Mr Hobbs, wherein he professes himself a great admirer of his parts, and one who would readily receive his instructions (e) [C]. There could not well be a stronger testimony in favour of liberty, than Mr Blount shortly after gave in a pamphlet on the Popish Plot, and the fear of a Popish successor. This treatise is subscribed Junius Brutus (f), and is the strongest invective against Popery and Papists that was published even in that age, when almost all the wit of the nation was pointed that way. There are in it likewise such express recommendations of the Duke of Monmouth, as might well hinder the author from owning it, and give it, in the eyes of the Lawyers of those times, an air of sedition at least, if not of treason [D]. In 1680, he printed that work which hath made him most known to the world, The Life of APOLLONIUS TYANAÆUS, which was soon after suppressed, and only a few copies sent abroad. It was held to be the most dangerous attempt, that had been ever made against Revealed Religion in this country, and was justly thought so, as bringing to the eye of every English reader, a multitude of facts and reasonings, plausible in themselves, and of the fallacy of which, none but men of parts and learning can be proper judges (g). For this reason it is still much in esteem with the Deists [E]. The fate of this book, and the few copies that

(e) Oracles of Reason, p. 97. where it appears this Letter was written in 1678, and accompanied with a present to Mr Hobbs of the Anima Mundi.

(f) This Piece is preserved in the second Volume of Blount's Miscellaneous Works.

(g) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 713.

(5) Nicholls's Conference with a Theist, Vol. II. Part v.

(6) Bibliothec. Uffenbach. Tom. I. p. 765.

(7) Johan Vogt. Catalog. Histor. Critic. Libror. Rarior. p. 125.

(8) Oracles of Reason, p. 97.

principles therein contained is to be met with in the works of a learned Divine (5), who considered it only occasionally, and in conjunction with abundance of pieces of the same kind. A learned Foreigner has given this piece a place in his catalogue of rare books (6), but at the same time has branded it with the odious title of an atheistical piece, deservedly prohibited, and from him another foreign writer (7) has copied; so that very probably this opinion will be effectually spread in Germany and the North, though few of the books themselves can be thought to have come thither, and so be presumed to have received sentence after a fair hearing.

[C] Who would readily receive his instructions] In this epistle to Mr Hobbs there occur some very singular passages, which having relation to our author's sentiments, and to various particulars in his private life, seemed to require some notice here. It is very evident from the words of this epistle, that Mr Blount wrote it by the direction of his father Sir Henry Blount, whose notions therefore rather than his own it contained (8). The design of this Epistle is to compliment Mr Hobbs upon his Treatise on Heresy, which by the favour of Mr Croke the Book-seller, and no doubt by the permission of Mr Hobbs himself, they had seen in manuscript. But from the contents of this piece it is easy to discern, that it was calculated to shew Mr Hobbs, that the arguments he had made use of in the treatise before-mentioned might be carried much farther in support of that doctrine, which was of so great consequence to the cause of Free-thinkers in general. The method by which this is attempted differs not much from that of Mr Hobbs, since it is built upon Ecclesiastical History as well as his; but the end here aimed at, is to shew that as Heresies were not always so fully refuted by Scripture and argument as those who wrote against them concluded; so in point of authority also they were not so clearly and universally condemned as the Church historians imagined. In support of this position there is a succinct account given of the disputes between the Arians and the Orthodox, whom Mr Blount styles Trinitarians, with a view to prove, that as the decrees of General Councils were urged on both sides, it must follow from hence that General Councils might err, and consequently there was no competent judge in such controversies, even upon the grounds laid down by those writers who challenge an implicit obedience to the laws of the Church.

[D] An air of sedition at least, if not of treason.] The title of this extraordinary pamphlet at large runs thus. An Appeal from the Country to the City for the preservation of his Majesty's person, liberty, property, and the Protestant religion (9). It opens with a very strong panegyrick upon the city of London; in order to shew, that upon their conduct the safety of the whole nation depended: That the eyes of the people of England were upon them, and therefore it became them to justify by their behaviour, the indulgence shewn them by Providence in raising them to so great a height, and the confidence reposed in them by their fellow-subjects, who unanimously considered them as the champions of their liberty, by whose courage and conduct they must be preserved, or by whose timidity and ill-timed caution they must fall. The subsequent part of the work is divided into nine considerations, all written with great force and spirit, and perfectly well calculated to raise a strong spirit against the Papists, as well as to maintain the credit of the plot. The whole is interspersed with many curious remarks upon our own and foreign histories, very happily introduced, and very sensibly applied. There is great decency observed towards the King, who is represented as the sole bar to the designs of the Papists, as the succession of his brother the Duke of York is proved to be the basis and foundation of all their hopes. Take it altogether in point of method and matter, considering the scheme upon which the author writes, the circumstances under which he wrote, and the dexterity with which he introduced topics that at this time one would have thought no man who had any regard to his own safety, and had so considerable property to lose, would have ventured to mention; I say, taking in all these considerations, one may safely affirm that very few, if any one pamphlet in our language, is better written in every respect than this, more especially as it is short, comprehensive, and equally calculated for the use of learned, and of common readers.

[E] For this reason it is very much in esteem with the Deists.] The title of it ran thus, The two first books of Philostratus concerning the Life of Apollonius Tyanæus, written originally in Greek, with Philological Notes upon each Chapter. This book, which is a thin folio, was published in 1680, and it was chiefly the notes that gave offence, said to have been taken from the manuscript writings of the famous Lord Herbert of Cherbury (10). This book has made much more noise abroad than at home, and has been treated as a work truly dangerous to the Christian religion. It is very strange that such as are persuaded of the truth of our religion, should be apprehensive of it's being in danger, from any works of this kind. Apollonius Tyanæus died A. D. 96, his disciple Philostratus it is confessed, wrote his life with a view to hurt the Christian religion, and perhaps the translation was made with the same view; but what then, does it follow that this book, or this translation, must necessarily answer the end with which they were written? Those who think so, must believe the Christian religion to be false, for otherwise they will be in no pain about it. The providence of God shewed itself in the establishment of the Christian religion in spite of all opposition. The folly of men is shewn, in apprehending that what has been once proved true, should be in danger by being brought to a new trial. It must indeed be confessed, that such books may do a great deal of mischief, but the question is, Whether suppressing them will prove the means of preventing this mischief? I must own, I think not; and that it is much better to answer them, which, for any thing that appears to the contrary, is not so hard a thing to be done. Those who are proper judges of such questions, will then see on which side the truth lies; those who are not proper judges must read such books at their peril, if their curiosity leads them to run the hazard. But I am persuaded it will be found, that none cry out so loud against such books, and magnify so much the mischief they are capable

(10) Bayle's Historical and Critical Dictionary in the remark [I] on the article APOLLONIUS, Fabric. Biblioth. Græc. Vol. IV. lib. ii. cap. 24. p. 46.

(9) This is preserved in the second Volume of his Miscellaneous Works.

that came abroad, have also contributed to raise it's reputation, by placing it in the lists of those that are extremely rare [F]. In the same year he published his DIANA of the EPHESIANS, which, as the author foresaw, raised a new clamour, many suggesting that, under colour of exposing superstition, he struck at all Revelation, and while he avowed only a contempt of the Heathen, seemed to intimate no great affection for the Christian priesthood (b). The truth is, there cannot well be a more suspicious book [G]. The wit, learning, and zeal of our author, had, by this time, raised him to be the chief of his sect; and he took a great deal of pains to propagate and defend his opinions in his discourses and familiar letters, as well as by his books. But it seems he had not always the same sense in regard to these speculations, since we find him owning, in a letter to Dr Sydenham, that in point of practice, Deism was less satisfactory than the Christian scheme (i) [H]. The noise his former pieces had made, induced him to conceal, industriously, his being the author of a book, intituled, Religio Laici, published in 1683 (k); and one may reasonably suppose, that the same motives prevailed on him to drop a design, in which it appears he was once engaged, of writing the Life of Mohammed, the Turkish Prophet, which however has been since executed, in his manner, by a French author (l). That the world might perceive Mr Blount was capable of turning his thoughts to subjects very different from those he had hitherto handled, he, in 1684, published a kind of introduction to polite literature (m), which shewed the extent of his knowledge, and the perfect acquaintance he had in the several branches of Philosophy and Science [I]. He concurred heartily in the Revolution,

(b) See the Preface to this Treatise, in the second Volume of Blount's Miscellaneous Works.

(i) Oracles of Reason, p. 87.

(k) Post Boy robbed of his Mail, Vol. II. P. 472.

(l) The Life of Mohammed, by M. de Boulanvilliers.

(m) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 713.

capable of doing, as those who are really on that side the question, and are therefore prejudiced in favour of the champion, whose strength they seem to apprehend capable of such mighty feats.

[F] By placing it in the lists of those that are extremely rare. It is said to have been prohibited in 1693, and perhaps there were but a few copies of it came abroad at the time it was published, which has given occasion to some authors to put it into their catalogues of scarce books (11), which is another method of raising the credit of such performances, by suggesting on the one hand, that great pains have been taken to destroy such works; and that on the other hand, such as came abroad were eagerly bought up: In the present case neither of these can be strictly said to have any truth, for the book is publickly enough sold, and though not very common, is not either very scarce or very dear. It is requisite to take notice of this, that if our work should be printed abroad, foreigners may be deceived in their notions on this head, and avoid publishing for the future such groundless stories as they have done upon this subject, for want of due information.

[G] There could not be well a more suspicious book. The title of this treatise at large runs thus (12), Great is DIANA of the EPHESIANS; or, The Original of Idolatry, together with the Political Institution of the Gentiles Sacrifices. With these two Latin verses by way of motto, and at the same time to serve by way of key to the ensuing discourse, viz.

*Cum sis ipse, nocens, moritur cur vicima pro te?
Stultitia est morte alterius sperare salutem.*

That is,

Knowing thy guilt, why take the victim's breath,
Or hope for safety from another's death?

This short treatise is written with great bitterness against priestcraft; and though the author pretends to point out the impositions only of Heathen priests, and consequently to attack the truth only of the religions taught by them; yet it is very easy to see, that some other priests are aimed at. After all, it may be doubted, whether this performance of our author was intended against the Gospel system, or against that mixture of priestcraft which had been blended therewith. One would incline to think the latter, from the following passage in our author's preface, which might likewise tempt one to think he had in some measure changed his opinion of Apollonius Tyanæus. 'Such, says he, after exposing the follies of Paganism, were the mysteries of the Heathenish religions, and what I have here written concerns them only; for when Christ came into the world he delivered a doctrine so pious, just, and necessary, that (even in it's infancy) it's own merits supported it, without the assistances of princes or grandees. What is more reasonable than to forbear those lusts which will ruin us both here and hereafter, or who but a madman would condemn that law for unjust, which prohibits him from murdering himself? and Christ doth no more. Now if the law be good, what must the lawgiver be? For such as the fruit is, such must the tree be also. Some have even among the Heathens been reported to have wrought miracles, as Apollonius Tyanæus; others have delivered good doctrines, as Plato, Seneca, Epictetus, &c. but what one man ever did both to that perfection as Christ did? Many, in all religions have died to justify their own opinions; but who, except the primitive Christians, ever died to justify the truth of miracles, which they beheld with their own eyes; but this is unnecessary, for that I write not to Heathens but Christians.'

VOL. II. No. 71.

[H] Was less satisfactory than the Christian scheme. It is generally supposed that our author wrote a short treatise in defence of Deism, under the title of a Summary Account of the Deists Religion (13), for the sight of which, Dr Sydenham had applied to him, and which our author sent him, together with this letter which is dated from Rolleston, May 14, 1686; and as it is very short, we will give it the reader, because it seems to afford a new proof of what has been hinted in the former note, viz. That Mr Blount had in some measure changed his sentiments, and begun to entertain more favourable notions than formerly of the Christian religion.

(13) Published in the Oracles of Reason, p. 88.

S I R.

THE last time I had the happiness of your company, it was your request that I would help you to a sight of the Deists Arguments, which I told you I had sometimes by me, but then had lent them out; they are returned me again, and according to my promise, I have herewith sent them to you, whereby you'll only find that human reason, like a pitcher with two ears, may be taken on either side. However, undoubtedly in our travels to the other world, the common road is the safest; and though Deism is a good manuring of a man's conscience, yet certainly if sowed with Christianity it will produce the most profitable crop. Pardon the haste of,

S I R,

Your most obliged friend,

and faithful servant,

C. BLOUNT.

[I] The several branches of Philosophy and Science. The title of this work of our author's runs thus. JANUA SCIENTIARUM; or, An Introduction to Geography, Chronology, Government, History, Philosophy, and all genteel sorts of Learning (14). Our author calls this very modestly an Introduction; and it is evident enough from his plan, that he thought it very practicable to make young men of tolerable parts by reasonable application, masters of the most useful parts

(14) London, 1684, 8vo.

(11) Bibliothec. Uffenbach. Tom. I. p. 765, 763. Vogt. Catal. Histor. Crit. Libror. Rarior. p. 125, 126.

(12) This small Piece is also to be found in the second Volume of Blount's Miscellaneous Works.

(*) See this explained in note [K].

(o) This short Tract is preserved amongst the rest of Mr Blount's performances in the Work before-mentioned.

(p) Complete History of England, Vol. III. p. 657.

Revolution, and seems to have had very honest intentions of punishing those who were King James's evil counsellors, after the government was re-settled, by declaring the Prince and Princess of Orange King and Queen (n) [K]. He gave another strong testimony of his sincere attachment to his principles, and inviolable love to freedom, by a nervous defence of the liberty of the press; wherein he shews that all restraints thereon, can have no other tendency than to establish superstition and tyranny, by abasing the spirits of mankind, and injuring the human understanding (o). This little piece, therefore, has been always esteemed one of the best he ever wrote; and has furnished their strongest arguments to many succeeding writers [L]. The warmth of Mr Blount's temper, his great affection for King William, and his earnest desire to see certain favourite projects brought about, led him to write a pamphlet, in which he asserted King William and Queen Mary to be conquerors, which was not well relished by the House of Commons (p) [M].

We

of learning, without obliging them to run through so tedious and so troublesome a course, as that which they are generally compelled to in the schools, and which, instead of inclining them to the pursuit of knowledge, gives them very frequently a disgust to it. We may see from this performance that our author had the true spirit of his family, and was desirous of promoting useful and polite Literature, though he was an enemy, as well as his father Sir Henry, and his brother Sir Thomas, to whatever had the least tincture of superstition or pedantry.

[K] The Prince and Princess of Orange, King and Queen. This is no more than a letter to Sir W. L. G. that is, Sir William Leveson Gower, Baronet, concerning the regulations of Corporations, and surrenders of Charters in the year 1691 (15). It seems there was then a design to call those people to an account who had been concerned in the garbling Corporations during the two last reigns, and the reason that Mr Blount applied himself to this gentleman was, his serving for the borough of Newcastle Under-line in Staffordshire. We perceive in this short piece that Mr Blount was truly a patriot, and that he thought no pretences, interests, or connections, ought to screen such as had been concerned in schemes for ruining the free choice and independency of Parliaments. He lays it down, that Parliaments are the excellency of our constitution as they are representatives of the people, but that when they cease to be representatives they lose their excellency, and cease to be Parliaments; so that if it be treason to endeavour the deposing a King who has a legal title, and is owned by Parliament, it is a crime of as a high nature, if not an higher, to aim at the subversion of Parliaments, by so practising upon them, as that they shall become no longer representatives of the people. He therefore presses, that for the sake of justice, for the sake of that generation, but more especially for the sake of posterity, the persons engaged in these iniquitous practices should be punished in the most exemplary manner. But the gentleman to whom he wrote dying very soon after, and the Government not caring to come to extremities with those who had been deepest in those measures, that affair dropped; but our author's epistle remains a full proof of what the sentiments were of the disinterested patriots of those times as to this affair, which they apprehended to be attempting the subversion of the Constitution.

[L] Strongest arguments to many succeeding writers. This treatise in defence of the liberty of the Press (16), as it was one of the best, so it was also one of our author's most successful performances. It was written at a very critical time, that is, when the Act of Parliament for restraining the liberty of the Press, and permitting nothing to be published without the Imprimatur of a licenser was just expiring, and the design was to prevent that Act from being renewed, and therefore it was addressed to the Lords and Commons in Parliament assembled. It is digested into nine sections, each of which contains a distinct argument against the invasion of that liberty, which, as he observes, is the foundation, and, at the same time, the security, of all other kinds of liberty; for this being the power of speaking truth, and of publishing it with respect to persons and things in general, it follows, that while a people are in possession of this liberty, the rest are in a great measure safe; but if this is once weakened or taken away, it is impossible to say how soon the rest may follow. His advice in this respect, supported by the reason of the thing, and the general voice of the people, had a proper effect; that pernicious Act was suffered to expire, and the Press was set free, to the inexpressible benefit of this nation.

[M] Which was not well relished by the House of Commons. The title of this very singular and remarkable piece at large runs thus (17). King William and Queen Mary Conquerors; or, A Discourse endeavouring to prove, that their Majesties have, on their side against the late King, the principal reasons that make Conquest a good title: Shewing also, how this is consistent with that Declaration of Parliament, King James abdicated the Government, &c. Written with an especial regard to such as have hitherto refused the oath, and yet allow of the title of Conquest when consequent to a just war. This piece is now become very scarce, and, which is more extraordinary, is hardly remembered, though a very well written, and certainly as well intended a work as ever came from the Press. There is a long and excellent Preface before it, which because it is long we will not transcribe; but there is so much good sense, good nature, and true patriotism, visible in the last paragraph of this discourse, that the reader will certainly not think his time mis-spent in reading it. 'I shall now, says he, leave what I have written to the reader's sober thoughts, repeating my request, that he would consider maturely, and judge impartially. I know some will be apt to say, there is no occasion for so much caution to Protestants, whose interest may be supposed to be a bias on the side I write for, and not against it. But to such I observe, that a fancied reputation of extraordinary loyalty, scorn to change an opinion that a man has pleaded for, suffered for, and, perhaps, written for, having espoused a party and been considerable on that account, and imbittered against the contrary side. These and some other circumstances, do many times with some tempers out-balance even interest itself, and turn the scale of men's judgments against it. And of this I am so fully persuaded, that I cannot but fear worse effects from these, and such like prejudices, than from any thing that can be objected against what I have said. The God of light and love open our understandings, govern our wills, cool our heats, and temper all our affections, so as we may see and embrace the things that belong unto our peace, before they be hid from our eyes.' But the title of this performance giving many people offence, it met with a very severe censure, which probably gave great uneasiness to its author, whose last work it was.

A Right Reverend author relates the whole transaction thus (18). 'January the 21st, a complaint having been made to the House of Commons of a printed pamphlet, intitled, King William and Queen Mary Conquerors, as containing assertions of dangerous consequence to their Majesties, to the liberties of the subjects, and peace of the kingdom. The House, upon examination of the matter, ordered the same pamphlet to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman, and that his Majesty be desired to remove Mr Edmund Bohun the licenser from his employment, for having allowed the same to be printed. In this debate it was suggested, that Dr Burnet, Bishop of Sarum, had recommended this notion of Conquest in his Pastoral Letter to the Clergy of his diocese, tho' he had done it only upon a favourable supposition, not in a way of assertion. However, the majority, in the warmth of debating, and some of them for the sake of allusion to the author's name, passed the same censure on that excellent Letter, and ordered it to be publicly burnt by the common executioner. On January the 24th, the Lords came to the like resolution, (17) London: Printed for Richard Baldwin in Warwick Lane, 4to, 1693.

(15) This piece is inserted in the Oracles of Reason, p. 174.

(16) The title is, A just Vindication of Learning, and of the Liberty of the Press, by Charles Blount, Esq; It is the last piece in the second Volume of his Miscellaneous Works.

(18) Kennet's Complete Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 657.

We now draw towards the close of his life; and it would give us great satisfaction, if we could draw a veil over his death; but the regard we owe to truth, and to the publick, will not permit. After the death of his wife, he became enamoured of her sister, who we are told was a Lady of great beauty, wit, good humour, virtue, and discretion, who is said not to have been insensible on her side, but scrupulous only as to the lawfulness of the thing he proposed, viz. marrying her after her sister (r). Our author wrote a letter on this subject, wherein he states the case as of a third person, and treats it with great learning and address. It is also said, that he applied himself to the Archbishop of Canterbury, and other Divines, who having decided against his opinion, and the Lady thereupon growing inflexible, it threw him into a fit of despair, which ended in a frenzy, so that he shot himself in the head, which brought him to his grave (s). The wound, however, did not prove immediately mortal, he lived after it some days; and retaining still his passion for that Lady, he would receive nothing but from her hands, so long as he preserved life (t). He died in the month of August, 1693, and was interred with his family in the church of Ridge in Hertfordshire (u). Mr Bayle, who mentions this fact in his article of Apollonius Tyanæus, is mistaken in several circumstances (w) [N]. After Mr Blount's decease, abundance of his private letters were published, in a work called The Oracles of Reason, compiled by one Mr Gildon, who in his preface, gives some account of our author, in a letter addressed to a Lady, wherein he defends Mr Blount's manner of dying, and threatens to follow his example, but he lived to change his opinions afterwards (x). These Oracles of Reason were afterwards printed with several of our author's pieces, under the title of The Miscellaneous Works of Charles Blount, Esq; [O]. As to his character, he was certainly a man of sense and learning; had a faculty of writing with much seeming strength, where his arguments were not very cogent. His early dislike to superstition, hurried him into dangerous mistakes, and inclined him to believe all Revealed Religion priestcraft, because he saw plainly that some priests made a trade of religion. However, if any credit be due to his writings, (and sincerity seems to have been rooted in his temper) he was certainly a Deist; and therefore such foreigners as have set him down in their catalogues of Atheists (y), both injure his memory, and betray their (r) Histoire des Ouvrages des Scavans, Tom. X. p. 135.

(s) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 713.

(t) Nicéron, Mémoires des Hommes Illustres, Vol. XXII. p. 402.

(u) The English Baronetage, Vol. III. p. 670.

(w) See the remark [I] on this article in his Dictionary.

(x) Under the name of Linda-mour, and the person to whom they are addressed is styled Hermoine.

(y) Reimanni Histor. Atheism. Hild. 1725, 8vo, p. 451.

OWN

“ solution, That the assertion of King William and Queen Mary's being King and Queen by Conquest, was highly injurious to their Majesties, and inconsistent with the principles on which this Government is founded, and tending to the subversion of the rights of the people; which vote being communicated to the Commons, that House on the next day unanimously concurred with their Lordships, with the remarkable addition of some words, viz. Injurious to their Majesties right-ful title to the crown of this realm.”

[N] Is mistaken in several circumstances.] It is certain that Mr Bayle was generally speaking very accurate in his accounts, but in this very short story of our author he has made several mistakes (19), and these are the more extraordinary, because he quotes another foreign author, in whose works there are no such mistakes. He says, that Mr Blount was violently in love with his brother's widow, whereas the passion that was fatal to Mr Blount was for his wife's sister. Mr Bayle tells us next, that he pretended he might marry her without incest, and that he wrote a book to prove this, which is another mistake grounded upon the former, though it is true that he did write a short discourse, to shew the lawfulness of marrying two sisters successively. Dr Bernard delivers himself very correctly (20); he gives us an account of the Oracles of Reason, and sets down their contents exactly. He observes, that among these treatises, the eleventh upon the lawfulness of marrying two sisters successively, did not relate to a subject indifferent of the author. It was not, says he, a simple question of Theory, for, to it, if I may so speak, he died a martyr. He observes, that he applied himself to the Archbishop of Canterbury and other Divines upon this subject, and sets down other particulars mentioned in the text, which shews he was very well informed; yet other foreign writers have not only copied the mistakes of Mr Bayle, but have augmented them very considerably; as for instance Reimannus (21), who is pleased, instead of the Archbishop of Canterbury, to give us the Archbishop of Cambridge, and doubts whether his disastrous end was owing to disappointment in love or in fortune. This is literally copied by another writer, who takes the Archbishop of Cambridge without the least hesitation (22). Some very late editions of Moreri (23) follow Bayle exactly, and are therefore no more in the wrong than he. This shews the importance and utility of a work of this nature, as well as the impossibility that foreigners should be able to form a true judgment of the merit of English authors, whose works they very seldom see, and the very titles of which they sometimes misapprehend, notwithstanding which their errors are so spread, that throughout the greatest part of Europe things pass for undoubted facts which are known here to be downright falsehoods.

[O] Title of The Miscellaneous Works of Charles Blount, Esq;] We must in this note observe to the reader, that the Oracles of Reason were printed in a small volume by themselves, in 1693, in the life-time of Mr Blount, with a preface before them, subscribed C. Gildon. There is some reason to suspect, that this collection of small tracts were sent abroad for the sake of that which concerns the marriage of two sisters successively. This is subscribed by Mr Blount; but he states the case as of a third person, whom he calls Torrifmond, and the Lady Eugenia. His epistle is dated from Burton in Staffordshire, March the 8th, 1693; and of all the treatises in that collection, this seems to have been written with the greatest care and circumspection, with a great seeming spirit of candour, and as much learning as could be shewn upon the subject. But these, however, are not the sole reasons that induce me to think the Oracles of Reason were made publick, that this might appear amongst them: The preface seems to speak the same thing; and Mr Gildon labours very hard in adding new arguments on the side of his friend; but it seems they did him no service, and indeed they are very much inferior to those of Mr Blount, which are such as shew him to have been a man of great reading and profound learning. There are besides, in these Oracles of Reason, several other pieces of our author, besides those already mentioned, particularly his letters to a Nobleman, under the name of Strepbon; and one to Mr Gildon, with a translation of Ocellus Lucanus, and a translation and defence of the learned Dr Thomas Burnet's writings; which though first in the collection, were last written in point of time, as bearing date the twenty-third of March, 1693. After Mr Blount's death Mr Gildon thought fit to republish the Oracles of Reason, with the best of Mr Blount's writings, under the title of his Miscellaneous Works; to which he prefixed an account of the life and death of the author. These were printed in 1695, but they do not include the pamphlet before-mentioned, of King William and Queen Mary's title by Conquest, on account of it's being censured by Parliament.

[P] As

(19) See the Remark [I] on the article of APOLLONIUS (TYANÆUS).

(20) Histoire des Ouvrages des Scavans, Tom. X. p. 135, 136.

(21) Hist. Univ. Atheism. & A-theor. p. 450, 451.

(22) Vogt. Catal. Libror. Rarior. p. 125, 126.

(23) See the article of BLOUNT, in the edition of Moreri printed at Basle in 1731.

own want of judgment, as the reader will see more at large in the notes [P]. He left a son, Henry Blount, Esq; who was a Lieutenant-Colonel, and several other children (z).

(z) The English Baronetage, Vol. III. p. 671.

[P] As the reader will see more at large in the notes.] We have already mentioned Reimannus, but it is necessary here to take notice, that in his Universal History of Atheism and Atheists, the eighth chapter is dedicated to the history of such as have flourished in England; and in the seventh section he speaks of Mr Blount (24). But he does not pretend to have seen his writings, of which he mentions only his translation of the life of Apollonius Tyanæus, and the Oracles of Reason, and cites for his authorities, Bernard, Bayle, and Fabricius. He calls him, however, in express terms, an Atheist, without assigning any reason; and indeed, if he had seen his books, he must have been satisfied that he was very far from being so; but, however, he has placed him in very good company, since in the same chapter he sets down Dr Glisson, Lord Herbert, Dr Connor, Mr Collins, and Dr Garth, as Atheists; and mentions also Sir Thomas Browne, Mr Locke, Dr Clarke, Dr Cudworth, and Dr Grew, as suspected of the same opinions, though he is so kind as to acquit them. Upon the credit of this author, whose account of Mr Blount is entirely transcribed by him, the Reverend Mr Vogt, pastor of the cathedral church of Bremen, gives him the like character (25), and his writings are stamped with the title of Atheistical, by several other foreign authors, who, perhaps, had never seen them. It is inconceivable how these and other writers take upon them to treat, not only Mr Blount, but many other persons of great learning, unspotted characters, and unsuspected piety, in very harsh terms, on the slightest pretences, and without having any better notions of what they found their judgments upon, than are derived from extracts out of their writings, made by such as very indifferently understand them; or, perhaps, characters given of them and their writings by their declared adversaries, which, in a country like ours, where party-prejudices generally run high, are not to be depended upon. But the great mischief of all is, they become authorities to each other: and after the scandal is once published, either in Germany or Holland, it is, in the space of a few years, disseminated as undoubted truth over all Europe.

(24) Hist. univ. Atheismi & Atheorum, p. 43c, 451.

(25) Catal. Lib. Rarior. p. 125, 126.

BOADICEA (a), a famous British Queen (in the time of the Roman Emperor Nero) whose story is related by Tacitus (b), and Dion Cassius (c). She was widow of Prasutagus, King of the Iceni, and, having suffered the most barbarous indignities from the Romans [A], she excited the Britons to a revolt [B]. Accordingly, to the number of an hundred and twenty thousand, with Boadicea at their head, they attacked the Roman colony at Camalodunum, and slaughtered seventy or eighty thousand Romans, committing the most shocking and unheard-of cruelties [C]. But Suetonius Paulinus marching

(a) Or Bouduca, or Boudicea, or Boudica, or Boudicea, or Bodo, or Voadica.

(b) Annal. l. xiv. c. 31—37.

(c) Hist. Rom. l. lxii. typ. Wechel. 1606. p. 700—706.

[A] She suffered the most barbarous indignities from the Romans.] Her husband, Prasutagus, in hopes to secure the protection of the Romans to his kingdom and family, had by his Will, made the Emperor and his own daughter coheirs of his great treasures: but it happened quite contrary to his expectations; for his kingdom and treasures became thereby a prey to the Roman officers, who proceeded to such a pitch of brutality, as to order his Queen Boadicea to be publicly whipped, and the two Princesses, his daughters, to be ravished by the soldiers. Rex Icenorum Prasutagus, longa opulentia clarus, Casarem heredem duasque filias scripserat, tali obsequio ratus regnum et domum suam procul injuria fore: quod contra vertit; adeo ut regnum per Centuriones, domus per servos, velut capta vastarentur. Jam primum, uxor ejus Boudicea verberibus affecta, et filiae stupro violatae sunt (1). Dion Cassius, who is thought to have paraphrased upon Tacitus in this story, makes no mention, however, of these personal injuries offered to Boadicea and her daughters. But, as the author cited in the margin (2) justly observes, Tacitus, in relating the cruelties and injustices that Queen suffered, is worthy of belief against his own nation.

(1) Tacit. Annal. l. xiv. c. 31.

(2) Mr Bolton in his Nero Caesar, or Monarchie desproceed, an Historical Work. London, 1624, fol. ch. xxv. p. 100.

[B] She excited the Britons to a revolt.] Dion Cassius (3) has given us a long speech, which, he tells us, she made upon her first assembling the Britons together, in order to animate them to take up arms against the Romans. She begins with observing, 'that they could not but be convinced how much liberty was preferable to slavery, and how much they were deceived by the fair promises of the Romans, in preferring a foreign government to the laws and manners of their own country, having sustained all manner of calamities since the Romans entered Britain.' And she owns, 'that the Britons themselves had been the authors of their own misfortunes, by suffering the Romans at first to settle in the island.' The historian places her on a rising ground, dressed in a loose-bodied gown, with a spear in her hand, and a hare in her bosom, which, at the end of her harangue, she lets slip among them, as an omen of success. The author, referred to in the last remark (4), highly extols Boadicea's speech, as well worthy of that historian's eloquence, and the wit of a Greek, who, he says, was so greatly delighted with the wonder and worth of this argument, that he seems to have made the exquisite handling thereof his master-piece. For, he adds, there is not any thing of that bright author extant, upon which he can be thought to have dealt with greater care or endeavour than upon his Bouduca's story. But Mr Milton, after briefly relating the circumstances given us by the Greek historian upon this occasion, passes a general censure upon this and the like narrations. 'This they do, says he (5), out of a vanity, hoping to embellish and set out their history with the strangeness of our manners; not caring in the mean while to brand us with the rankest note of barbarism, as if in British women were men, and men women. I affect not set speeches in a history, unless known for certain to have been spoken in effect as they were written; nor then, unless worth recital. And to invent such, though eloquently, as some historians have done, is an abuse of posterity, raising in them that read other conceptions of those times and persons than were true.' By the way, this author is mistaken in placing this speech immediately before the last battle between Boadicea and the Romans (6); as is M. de Rapin Thoyras, who (7) places the artifice of letting slip the hare immediately after her speech before that last battle. Besides the injuries offered to the family of King Prasutagus, the Britons had other causes of discontent. The Roman Veterans, being newly planted in the colony of Camalodunum, had driven the inhabitants from their houses, dispossessed them of their lands, and treated them as slaves and captives; and, moreover, the temple, lately built in honour of the Emperor Claudius, seemed to them the foundation of a perpetual tyranny. And, as the Britons were animated with the hope of recovering their liberty, the Romans were discouraged by various omens; for the statue of Victory at Camalodunum fell down, without any apparent cause, strange noises were heard in the Court and Theatre, the sea looked bloody, and several enthusiastic women foretold the subversion of that colony (8).

(3) Hist. Rom. l. lxii typ. Wechel. 1606, p. 701.

(4) Mr Bolton, ubi supra.

(5) History of England, B. ii. In the Complete History of England, Vol. I. p. 18.

(6) See the remark [D].

(7) Hist. d'Angleterre, liv. i.

(8) Tacit. ubi supra, c. 31, 32.

(9) Ibid. c. 33.

(10) Ubi supra.

[C] The Britons committed the most shocking and unheard-of cruelties.] Tacitus (9) only relates in general, that they gave no quarter, but destroyed their enemies by sword, gallows, fire, and crucifixion. Neque enim capere aut venundare, aliudve quod belli commercium, sed caedes, patibula, ignes, cruces, tanquam reddituri supplicium, ac praecepta interim ultione, festinabant. But Dion Cassius (10) has particularized some of their cruelties upon this occasion. The men, he tells us, had their bowels cut out; and some of them were gored marching against them with about ten thousand men, a bloody battle ensued [D], in which eighty thousand Britons were slain, and the Romans gained the victory, with a very inconsiderable loss. This battle was fought in the year of Christ 61, of Nero 8. Some have thought it was fought on Salisbury-Plain, and that Stonehenge was erected as a monument to Boadicea [E]. This valiant Queen, whose person we shall give a description of in the remark [F], dispatched herself by poison, or died by sickness, soon after.

gored upon stakes, and others boiled to death. The most noble and honourable of the British ladies were stripped naked; their paps sliced off, and stitched to their mouths that they might seem feeding; and lastly were staked through their bodies.

[D] A bloody battle ensued. The Britons brought their wives and children into the field in waggons, to be spectators of the fight, and share with them in the victory. Boadicea, with her daughters by her side, in her chariot, rode from rank to rank, animating and encouraging the several nations. She told them, 'this was not the first time the Britons had been victorious under the conduct of their Queens; but that, upon this occasion, she considered not her royal descent, nor the loss of her riches and grandeur, but was come as a private woman to revenge the loss of liberty, the stripes inflicted upon her own body, and the violation of her daughters chastity; that neither age, sex, nor quality, could escape the unbounded lust of the Romans; however, that the Gods had already begun to make them feel the punishments they deserved, in the entire defeat of one of their legions, and the terror which had seized the rest; that, far from sustaining the efforts of a victorious army, they were not able to endure even the shouts of so great a multitude; that, if the Britons did but consider their own strength, and the causes of the war, they would be convinced they must either conquer or die; that, for her own part, though a woman, this was her resolution; the men might live if they pleased, and be slaves.' Solitum quidem Britannis fœminarum ductu bellare testabatur; sed tunc non ut tantis majoribus ortam regnum et opes, verum ut unam e vulgo, libertatem amissam, confectum verberibus corpus, contrectatam filiarum pudicitiam ulcisci; eo provellet Romanorum cupidines, ut non corpora, ne senectatem quidem, aut virginitatem impollutam relinquunt: Adesse tamen Deos justæ vindictæ; cecidisse legionem, quæ prælium ausa sit; cæteros castris occultari, aut fugam circumspicere; ne strepitum quidem et clamorem tot millium, nedum impetus et manus perlaturus; si copias armorum, si causas belli secum expenderent, vincendum illa acie, vel cadendum esse; id mulieri destinatum; viverent viri et servirent (11), Mr Milton, upon this occasion, is as much displeas'd with the Roman as the Greek historian (12). 'A woman also, says he (13), was their Commander in chief; for Boadicea and her daughters rid about in a chariot, telling the tall champions, as a great encouragement, that with the Britons it was usual for women to be their leaders. A deal of other fondness they put into her mouth, not worth recital; how she was lashed, how her daughters were handled; things worthier silence, retirement, and a veil, than for a woman to repeat, as done to her person, or to hear repeated before an host of men.' The reader, we believe, will join with us in opinion, that this ingenious writer has pushed his censure of Tacitus too far; for what is there of immodest or indecent in the terms made use of by that writer, Confectum verberibus corpus, contrectatam filiarum pudicitiam? And could she have used a topick more likely to inflame the Britons to a desire of revenge, than the contemptuous treatment, and personal insults, she, their Queen, and her children, had met with at the hands of the Romans? Besides, it seems a piece of false delicacy, to think the mention of such acts improper from a woman to men, under such extraordinary circumstances as Boadicea and the Britons were then in. But to return: while Boadicea was endeavouring to inspire courage into the Britons, Paulinus, though assured of the valour of his troops, exhorted them to despise the threats and cries of the Barbarians. He represented to them, 'that among the enemy there were more women than warriors; and that the greatest part of them, being without arms and without strength, would betake themselves to flight upon the first attack; that in the best armies the decision of the day depended upon a few; and that their glory would be so much the greater, as it was shared among fewer.' He exhorted them to keep their ranks close, and to have recourse to their swords, after they had flung their javelins; in fine, not to amuse themselves about plunder, which the conquerors could not fail of. This harangue being received with loud acclamations, the Roman General ordered the charge to be sounded. While the fight continued at a distance, the Britons thought to terrify their enemies by the superiority of their numbers; but when they perceived the legions advancing sword in hand, and with a dauntless countenance, they fell into the utmost disorder, and betook themselves to flight. But the waggons, in which they had placed their wives and children, intercepting most of them, a dreadful slaughter ensued, and the Britons suffered a total defeat (14).

[E] Some have thought — that Stonehenge on Salisbury-Plain was erected as a monument to Boadicea This is particularly the opinion of Mr Bolton, who thinks no other tomb so likely to be her's, as that admirable monument of stones. 'The dumbness of it, says he (15), (unless the letters be worn quite away) speaks, that it was not any work of the Romans, for they were wont to make stones vocal by inscriptions. The common opinion touching that Tropæa, or whatsoever else it may be called, would have it believed, that their structure was contrived in memory of the Britain Lords perfidiously murdered by the Saxons here upon an interview. Of that heinous assassinate Nennius hath a touch, but assigns not the place. Geoffrey Arthur or Monmouth is the man, who fetches these merveious stones (reported by him to be medicinal) from out of Ireland, for the purpose of a memorial, by Merlin's counsel and force of arms. — That Stonage (Stonehenge) was a work of the Britons, the rudeness itself persuades. And if that plate of mixed metal, mentioned by Camden, which was found about fourscore years since near to that monument, and inscribed with such characters as were not legible to the learned of that time, did appertain to Stonage, then may it easily be credited to have been some old British inscription, dedicated to the immortal fame of some or other great worthy, nor of any rather than, in my conceit, of the most mighty Bundera. — The bones of men, digged up at times near this place under little banks, convince it to have been sepulchral; but armours of a large and antique fashion, upon which the spade or pick-ax are sometimes said to hit, do clear the owners from having been in the number of those Britons, whom Pagan Hengist wickedly slew; for they came not armed, but weaponless.'

[F] A description of her person. We shall give it in the words of Mr Bolton, who copies it from Dion Cassius. 'Boadicea's body, says he (16), was big and burly, or rather huge; which some, translating the Greek into Latin, not thinking to be a fit parcel in the bill of a lady's praise, have turned tall. Her face, naturally good, and full of dignity, was of purpose set to the quality of the present service, after a most severe and serious manner; which moved famous Dio to hang (Βλοσυρωτάτη) an epithet of such an ambiguous sense, upon her countenance, as like a double picture represents her diversly to diverse understandings, excellently comely, or incomparably terrible. Her complexion very fair, which who will wonder at in a Lady born in Britain? her copious tresses dangling in compasse farre beneath her waste were of most bright yellow. And though by her colour her constitution might seem to be cold, yet her doings declared, that cholera had the mastery in her, even unto deceit and adulation. Her looks most eager, sharp and piercing; an argument perhaps, that her eyes were disproportionably small; and that was a sign, if artists err not, of fraud and cruelty. Nature, finally, to make the comfort of her properties complete, furnished her with an alarm-bell for the country, and a deadly knell for thousands, a tongue as harsh and rolling, as herself was high and great. — In Dio she doth not appear old or decayed, but a strong and perfect woman. Her picture hangs up there in such words, as shew the person of some martial bosse, or amazonian giantness.' T

(14) Tacit. ibid. c. 36, 37.

(15) Nero Cæsar, or Monarchie depraved, c. 25. p. 181.

11) Tacit. ubi supra, c. 35.

12) See the remark [B].

13) History of England, ubi supra.

(16) Ibid. p. 101.

BODLEY (Sir THOMAS), from whom the Bodleian or Publick Library at Oxford takes it's name, was the eldest son of Mr John Bodley [A] of Exeter, and born in that city the second of March 1544. He was about twelve years of age, when his father, being obliged to leave England on account of religion, settled with his family at Geneva [B], where he lived a voluntary exile during the reign of Queen Mary (a). In that university, then newly erected, young Mr Bodley applied himself to the study of the learned languages, and Divinity, under the most celebrated Professors [C]. Upon the accession of Queen Elizabeth in 1558, he returned into England, with his father and family, who settled at London; and soon after he was sent to Magdalen-College in Oxford, under the tuition of Dr Humphreys, afterwards President of that society. In 1563, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts; and the same year was chosen Probationer of Merton-college, and the year following admitted Fellow. In 1565, by persuasion of some of the Fellows, he undertook the publick reading of a Greek Lecture in the hall of that college (b) [D]. In 1566, he took the degree of Master of Arts, and that year, read Natural Philosophy in the publick schools. In 1569, he was elected one of the Proctors of the university; and after that, for a considerable time, supplied the place of University Orator. Hitherto Mr Bodley applied himself to the study of various faculties, without any inclination to profess any one more than the rest. In 1576, being desirous to improve himself in the modern languages; and to qualify himself for publick business, he began his travels, and spent near four years in visiting France, Germany, and Italy (c). Afterwards returning to his college, he applied himself to the study of History and Politicks. In 1583, he was made Gentleman-Usher to Queen Elizabeth; and, in 1585, married Anne, daughter of Mr Carew of Bristol, and widow of Mr Ball; a lady of a considerable fortune (d). Soon after, he was employed by Queen Elizabeth in several embassies, to Frederick King of Denmark, Julius Duke of Brunwick, William Landgrave of Hesse, and other German Princes, to engage them to join their forces with those of the English, for the assistance of the King of Navarre, afterwards Henry IV. of France; and, having discharged that commission, he was sent to King Henry III, at the time when that Prince was forced by the Duke of Guise to quit Paris (e) [E]. In 1588, he was sent to the Hague, to manage the Queen's affairs in the United Provinces; where, according to an agreement between the Queen and the States, he was admitted one of the Council of State, and took his place next to Count Maurice, giving his vote in every proposition made to that Assembly (f). In this station he behaved greatly to the satisfaction of his Royal Mistress, and the advancement of the publick service [F].

After

(a) See The Life of Sir Tho. Bodley, written by himself, p. 1, 2. in the Riquia Bodleiana, &c. published by Mr T. Hearne, London, 1703, 8vo.

(b) Ibid. p. 3.

(c) Ibid. p. 4.

(d) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. 1. col. 384.

(e) Life, &c. ubi supra, p. 4, 5.

(f) Ib. p. 6, 7.

[A] Eldest son of Mr John Bodley. By his father's side he was descended from an ancient family of the Bodleys, or Bodleighs, of Dunscumb near Crediton in Devonshire. His mother was Joan, daughter and heiress of Robert Hone, Esq; of Offery St Mary, nine miles from Exeter (1).

[B] His father, being obliged to leave England on account of religion, settled with his family at Geneva. My father, says Sir Thomas (2), in the time of Queen Mary, being noted and known to be an enemy to Popery, was so cruelly threatened, and so narrowly observed by those that maliced his religion, that, for the safeguard of himself and my mother, who was wholly affected as my father, he knew no way so secure as to fly into Germany; where after awhile he found means to call over my mother, with all his children and family, whom he settled for awhile at Wesel in Clevealand; (for there then were many English, which had left their country for their conscience, and with quietness enjoyed their meetings and preachings) and from thence we removed to the town of Franckford, where was in like sort another English congregation. Howbeit we made no long tarrance in either of these two towns, for that my father had resolved to fix his abode in the city of Geneva, where (as far as I remember) the English church consisted of some hundred persons.

[C] He studied under the most celebrated Professors. He frequented the publick lectures of Chevalerius in the Hebrew tongue, of Beroaldus in the Greek, and of Calvin and Beza in Divinity; besides his domestic teachers in the house of Philibertus Saracenus, a famous Physician of that city, with whom he boarded, where Robert Constantine, author of the Greek Lexicon, read Homer to him (3).

[D] He undertook the public reading of a Greek lecture in the hall of Merton-college. He read this lecture for some time without expecting or requiring any stipend for it; but afterwards the society of their own accord allowed him a salary of four marks per annum, and from thenceforth continued the lecture to the college (4).

[E] He was sent to King Henry III, at the time when that Prince was forced by the Duke of Guise to quit Paris. This commission, he tells us (5), he performed with extraordinary secrecy, not being accompanied by any one servant, (for so he was commanded) nor with any other letters than such as were written with the Queen's own hand to the King, and some select persons about him. The effect, continues he, of that message it is fit I should conceal; but it tended greatly to the advantage of all the Protestants in France, and to the Duke's apparent overthrow, which also followed soon upon it. Mr Camden says nothing more of this embassy, than that Queen Elizabeth not only assisted the King of Navarre, when he was intangled in a dangerous and difficult war, with money and other military provisions, but sent over Sir Thomas Bodley to support or encourage the French King, when his affairs seemed to be in a very desperate condition (6).

[F] He behaved greatly to the satisfaction of his Royal mistress, and the advancement of the public service. During all that time (says Sir Thomas (7)), speaking of his residence at the Hague) what approbation was given of my painful endeavours by the Queen, Lords in England, by the States of the country there, and by all the English soldiery, I refer it to be notified by some other's relation, sith it was not unknown to any of any calling that then were acquainted with the state of that government. For at my first coming there, the people of that country stood in dangerous terms of discontentment, partly for some courtes that were held in England, as they thought, to their singular prejudice; but most of all in respect of the insolent demeanour of some of her Highness's Ministers, which only respected their private emolument, little weighing in their dealing what the Queen had contracted with the States of the country; whereupon was conceived a mighty fear on every side, that both a present dissolution of the covenant would ensue, and a downright breach of amity, between us and them. Now what means I set a foot for redress of these perils, and by what degrees the state of things was reduced into order, it would require a long treatise to report it exactly. But this I may aver with modesty and truth, and the country did always acknowledge it with

(5) Ibid. p. 9.

(1) Life of Sir T. B. in the Riquia Bodleiana, &c. p. 1. and Wood, Athen. Oxon. Vol. 1. col. 384.

(2) Life, &c. ubi supra, p. 1, 2.

(3) Ibid.

(4) Ibid. p. 3.

(6) Annal. Eliz. Reg. ad ann. 1589.

(7) Life, &c. ubi supra, p. 6, 7.

After near five years residence in Holland, he obtained leave to return into England, to look after his private affairs; but was shortly after remanded back to the Hague. About a year after, he came into England again, to communicate some private discoveries to the Queen; and presently returned to the States for the executions of those councils he had secretly proposed. At length, having succeeded in all his negotiations, he obtained his final re-call in 1597 (g). After his return, finding his advancement at Court obstructed by the jealousies and intrigues of the great men, he retired from the Court and all publick business, and never could be prevailed with to return and accept of any new employment (h) [G]. The same year he set about the noble work of restoring, or rather founding

(g) Ib. p. 7, 8.

(h) Ib. p. 3—13.

with gratitude, that had I not of myself, without any direction from my superiors, proceeded in my charge with extreme circumspection, as well in all my speeches and proposals to the States, as in the tenour of my letters that I writ into England, some sudden alarm had been given to the utter subversion and ruin of the state of those Provinces, which in process of time must needs have wrought, in all probability, the same effect in the State of this realm. Of this my diligence and care in the managing of my business, there was, as I have signified, very special notice taken by the Queen and State at home, for I received from her Majesty many comfortable letters of her gracious acceptance; as withal from that time forward, I did never almost receive any set instructions how to govern my proceedings in her Majesty's occasions, but the carriage in a manner of all her affairs was left to me and my discretion.' A more particular account of Sir Thomas's negotiations with the States may be seen in Mr Camden's Annals of Queen Elizabeth, under the year 1595, and in a short piece, written by Sir Thomas himself, and published by Mr Thomas Hearne in his notes upon that passage of Camden, intitled, An Account of an Agreement between Queen Elizabeth and the United Provinces, wherein she supported them, and they stood not to their Agreement.

[G] He retired from Court and all publick business, and never could be prevailed with to return and accept of any new employment.] We shall enlarge upon this part of Sir Thomas's life in his own words. 'I cannot chuse, says he (8), in making report of the principal accidents that have befallen unto me in the course of my life, but record among the rest, that from the very first day I had no man more to friend, among the Lords of the Council, than was the Lord-Treasurer Burleigh; for when occasion had been offered of declaring his conceit, as touching my service, he would always tell the Queen (which I received from herself, and some other car-witnesses) that there was not any man in England so meet as myself to undergo the office of the Secretary; and since, his son the present Lord-Treasurer had signified unto me in private conference, that, when his father first intended to advance him to that place, his purpose was withal to make me his colleague. But the case stood thus in my behalf: Before such time as I returned from the Provinces United, which was in the year 1597, and likewise after my return, the Earl of Essex did use me so kindly both by letters and messages, and other great tokens of his inward favour to me, that although I had no meaning but to settle in my mind my chiefest dependance upon the Lord Burleigh, as one that I reputed to be both the best able, and therewithal the most willing, to work my advancement with the Queen; yet I know not how the Earl, who sought by all devices to divert her love and liking both from the father and the son, (but from the son in special) to withdraw my affection from the one and the other, and to win me altogether to depend upon himself, did so often take occasion to entertain the Queen with some prodigal speeches of my sufficiency for a Secretary, which were ever accompanied with words of disgrace against the present Lord-Treasurer, as neither she herself (of whose favour before I was thoroughly assured) took any great pleasure to prefer me the sooner; (for she hated his ambition, and would give little countenance to any of his followers) and both the Lord Burleigh and his son waxed jealous of my courses, as if underhand I had been induced, by the cunning and kindness of the Earl of Essex, to oppose myself against their dealings. And though in very truth they had no solid ground at all of the least alteration in my disposition towards either of them both, (for

I did greatly respect their persons and places, with a settled resolution to do them any service, as also in my heart I detested to be of any faction whatsoever) yet the now Lord-Treasurer, upon occasion of some talk that I have since had with him of the Earl and his actions, hath freely confessed of his own accord to me, that his daily provocations were so bitter and sharp against him, and his comparisons so odious, when he put us in a ballance, as he thought thereupon, he had very great reason to use his best means to put any man out of love of raising his fortune, whom the Earl with such violence, to his extreme prejudice, had endeavoured to dignify. And this, as he affirmed, was all the motive he had to set himself against me, in whatsoever might redound to the bettering of my state, or increasing my credit and countenance with the Queen. When I had thoroughly now bethought me, first in the Earl, of the slender hold-fast he had in the Queen; of an endless opposition of the chiefest of our Statesmen like still to wait upon him; of his perilous, feeble, and uncertain advice, as well in his own, as in all the causes of his friends; and when moreover for myself I had fully considered how very untowardly these two counsellors were affected unto me, (upon whom before in cogitation I had framed all the fabric of my future prosperity) how ill it did concur with my natural disposition, to become, or to be counted, a stickler or partaker in any publick faction; how well I was able by God's good blessing to live of myself, if I could be content with a competent livelihood; how short a time of farther life I was then to expect by the common course of nature; when I had, I say, in this manner represented to my thoughts my particular estate, together with the Earl's, I resolved thereupon to possess my soul in peace all the residue of my days; to take my full farewell of State employments; to satisfy my mind with that mediocrity of worldly living that I had of mine own; and so to retire me from the Court, which was the epilogue and end of all my actions, and endeavours of any important note, till I came to the age of sixty-three. Now although after this, by her Majesty's directions, I was often called to the Court by the now Lord-Treasurer, then Secretary, and required by him, as also divers times since, by order from the King, to serve as Ambassador in France, to go a Commissioner from his Highness for concluding the truce between Spain and the Provinces, and to negotiate in other very honourable employments; yet I would not be removed from my former final resolutions; insomuch as at length to reduce me the sooner to return to the Court, I had an offer made me by the present Lord-Treasurer (for in protest of time he saw, as he himself was pleased to tell me more than once, that all my dealing was upright, fair, and direct) that in case I myself were willing unto it, he would make me his associate in the Secretary's office: And to the intent I might believe that he intended it bona fide, he would get me out of hand to be sworn of the Council. And for the better enabling of my state to maintain such a dignity, whatsoever I would ask that might be fit for him to deal in, and for me to enjoy, he would presently solicit the King to give it passage. All which persuasions notwithstanding, albeit I was often assaulted by him, in regard of my years, and for that I felt myself subject to many indispositions, besides some other reasons, which I reserve unto myself, I have continued still at home my retired course of life, which is now methinks to me as the greatest preferment that the State can afford.' Mr Camden mentions the affair of Sir Thomas's dis-appointment in regard to the office of Secretary in these words: 'It raised in him (the Earl of Essex) a greater and more apparent discontent, than Sir Robert

(8) Ibid. p. 3—13.

(7) Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. i. p. 308. & l. ii. p. 50.

ing anew, the Publick Library at Oxford [H], which was completed in 1599 (7). After King bert Cecil was chosen Secretary in his absence; whereas he had some time before recommended Sir Thomas Bodley, on the force of his great wisdom and experience in the affairs of the Low-Countries, and had run very high in his commendations; but with so much bitterness, and so little reason, disparaged Cecil, that the Queen (who had by this time a mean opinion of Essex's recommendations) was the more inclinable to refuse to make Bodley Secretary; neither would she let the Lord-Treasurer join him in commission with his son; both which honours were designed him, till Essex, by too profuse and lavish praises, had rendered him suspected as a creature of his own (9).

King

[H] He restored, or rather founded anew, the Publick Library at Oxford.] Let us, first, hear Sir Thomas himself. Having given us the motives of his retirement from Court, and chusing a private life (10), he goes on thus: 'Only this I must truly confess of myself, that though I did never yet repent me of those, and some other my often refusals of honourable offers, in respect of enriching my private estate; yet somewhat more of late I have blamed myself and my nicety that way, for the love that I bear to my reverend mother the university of Oxon, and to the advancement of her good, by such kind of means, as I have since undertaken. For thus I fell to discourse and debate in my mind; that although I might find it fittest for me to keep out of the throng of Court contentions, and address my thoughts and deeds to such ends altogether, as I myself could best affect; yet withal I was to think, that my duty towards God, the expectation of the world, and my natural inclination, and very morality did require, that I should not wholly so hide those little abilities that I had, but that in some measure, in one kind or other, I should do the true part of a profitable member of the State. Whereupon examining exactly for the rest of my life what course I might take, and having fought (as I thought) all the ways to the wood, to select the most proper, I concluded at the last to fet up my staff at the Library door in Oxon, being thoroughly persuaded, that in my solitude and seclusion from the Common-wealth affairs, I could not busy myself to better purpose, than by reducing that place (which then in every part lay ruined and waste) to the public use of Students. For the effecting whereof I found myself furnished, in a competent proportion, of such four kinds of aids, as, unless I had them all, there was no hope of good success. For without some kind of knowledge, as well in the learned and modern tongues, as in sundry other sorts of scholastical literature; without some purse-ability to go through with the charge; without great store of honourable friends, to further the design; and without special good leisure to follow such a work, it could but have proved a vain attempt and inconsiderate. But how well I have sped in all my endeavours, and how full provision I have made for the benefit and ease of all frequenters of the library, that which I have already performed in sight, that which besides I have given for the maintenance of it, and that which hereafter I purpose to add, by way of enlargement of that place, (for the project is cast, and, whether I live or die, it shall be, God willing, put in full execution) will testify so truly and abundantly for me, as I need not be the publisher of the dignity and worth of my own institution (11).' Mr Camden (12), under the year 1598, tells us, 'Bodley, being at present unengaged from affairs of State, set himself a task, which would have suited the character of a crowned head, I mean, says he, the promotion and encouragement of learning; for he began to repair the Publick Library at Oxford, and furnished it with new books. 'Twas set up, he adds, by Humphrey Duke of Gloucester, but through the iniquity of the times was, in the reign of Edward VI, stripped of all the books; but he (Bodley) having made the choicest collection from all parts of the world of the most valuable books, partly at his own cost, and partly by contributions from others, he first stocked, and afterwards left it so well endowed at his death, that his memory deserves to bear a very lasting date amongst men of worth and letters.' The same author, in his Britannia (13), tells us, Duke Humphrey's library consisted of one hundred twenty-nine volumes, procured from Italy at a great expence. His translator adds, that they were valued at above a thousand pounds, and that the Duke in 1440 gave one hundred twenty-six volumes more, and in 1443 a much greater number, besides considerable additions at his death three years after (14). But, before Duke Humphrey's time, Richard de Bury, alias Aungervil (15), Bishop of Durham, in 1295, gave a great number of books to the university, which were kept in a place for that purpose in the college, which the Monks of Durham had founded in the north suburbs of Oxford; an account whereof may be gathered from a book written by himself, called Philobiblos, Sive de amore librorum, et institutione Bibliothecæ (16). And after him, in the year 1320, Thomas Cobham, Bishop of Worcester, built another over the old Congregation-house in the north cemetery of St Mary's (17). In 1597, Sir Thomas Bodley, taking into his consideration the ruinous condition of Duke Humphrey's library, and resolving to undertake the restoration of it at his own expence, wrote a letter, dated at London, Jan. 23, to Dr Ravis, Dean of Christ-Church, then Vice-Chancellor, to be communicated to the university; offering therein to restore the fabric of the said library, and to settle an annual income for the purchase of books, and the support of such officers as might be necessary to take care of it. This letter was received with the greatest satisfaction by the university, and an answer returned, testifying their most grateful acknowledgment and acceptance of his noble offer (18). Whereupon Sir Thomas immediately set about the work, and in two years time brought it to a good degree of perfection (19). He furnished it with a large collection of books, purchased in foreign countries at a great expence (20); and this collection in a short time became so greatly enlarged by the generous benefactions of several Noblemen, Bishops, and others, that neither the shelves nor the room could contain them. Whereupon Sir Thomas offering to make a considerable addition to the building, the motion was readily embraced, and, upon July the 19th, 1610, the first stone of the new foundation was laid with great solemnity, the Vice-Chancellor, Doctors, Masters of Arts, &c. attending in their proper habits, and a speech being made upon the occasion. But Sir Thomas Bodley did not live to see this part of his design completed, though he left sufficient to do it with some friends in trust; for, as appears by the copy of his Will, he bestowed his whole estate (his debts, legacies, and funeral charges defrayed) to the noble purposes of this foundation. By this means, and the help of other benefactions, in procuring which Sir Thomas was very serviceable by his great interest with many eminent persons, the University was enabled to add three other sides to what was already built; whereby was formed a noble quadrangle, and spacious rooms for schools of Arts (21). By Sir Thomas's Will 200 l. per annum was settled on the library for ever; out of which he appointed near forty pounds for the Head-Librarian, ten pounds for the Sub-Librarian, and eight for the junior (22). He drew up likewise a body of excellent statutes for the government of the library (23). In this library is a statue, erected to the memory of Sir Thomas Bodley, by the Earl of Dorset, Chancellor of the university, with the following inscription. THOMAS SACKVILLUS DORSETTIÆ COMES, SUMMUS ANGLIÆ THESAURARIUS, ET HUIUS ACADEMIÆ CANCELLARIUS, THOMÆ BODLEIO EQUIITI AURATO, QUI BIBLIOTHECAM HANC INSTITUIT, HONORIS CAUSA PIE POSUIT; i. e. 'Thomas Sackville, Earl of Dorset, Lord High-Treasurer of England, and Chancellor of this university, piously erected this monument to the honour of Sir Thomas Bodley, Knight, who founded this library.' The Bodleian library is justly esteemed one of the noblest libraries in the world, and, if travellers are to be credited, exceeds even the Vatican at Rome. King James I, we are told (24), when he came to Oxford in the year 1605, and, among other edifices, took a view of this famous library, at his departure, in imitation of Alexander, broke out into this speech; If I were not a King, I would be an university man; and if it were so that I must be a prisoner, if I might have my wish, I would have no other prison than that library, and be chained together with so many good

(14) Ibid.

(15) See his article.

(16) Printed at Paris, in 1500, and at Oxford in 1599 in 4to, and since in 8vo.

(17) Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. ii. p. 4.

(18) Id. ib. p. 308.

(19) Id. ib. l. ii. p. 50.

(20) Dr Willet, in his Synopsis Papismi, apud Prince's Worthies of Devon, p. 79, says, they were valued at about 10000*l.*

(21) Wood, ubi supra, p. 23.

(22) Id. ib. p. 51.

(23) See the remark [L].

(24) Vide Isaac Wake, Rex Platonius, sive Musæ regnantes.

(9) Camden, ubi supra, ad ann. 1596.

(10) See the last remark.

(11) Life, &c. ubi supra, p. 13—15.

(12) Ubi supra.

(13) By Bishop Gibson, fol. Vol. I. col. 311.

King James's accession to the throne, he received the honour of Knighthood (k). He died the 28th of January, 1612, and was buried, with great solemnity, at the upper end of Merton-college choir [I]. An annual speech in praise of Sir Thomas Bodley [K] is still made at Oxford on the 8th of November, at which time the visitation of the library is usually made. His statutes for the regulation of that library [L], were translated out of English into Latin, by Dr John Budden, Principal of Broadgate-hall, and incorporated with the university statutes (l), Sir Thomas wrote his own Life to the year 1609; which, together with the first draught of his Statutes, and a collection of his Letters, were published, from the originals in the Bodleian library, by Mr Thomas Hearne, under the title of Reliquiæ Bodleianæ, or, Some Genuine Remains of Sir Thomas Bodley (m). Sir Thomas had two younger brothers, named LAURENCE and JOSIAS BODLEY.

(k) Id. Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 385.

(l) Id. ib. col. 457.

(m) London. 1703, 822.

good authors. A catalogue of the printed books in the Bodleian library was published in 1674 by Dr Thomas Hyde, then chief librarian; another of the manuscripts was printed in 1697; and a new catalogue of both, which will contain four volumes in folio, has been for some years printing at Oxford.

[I] He was buried at the upper end of Merton college choir.] Over him is erected a monument of black and white marble, on which is placed his effigies, in a scholar's gown, surrounded with books: and at the four corners stand Grammar, Rhetoric, Music, and Arithmetic. On each hand of his effigies stands an angel; that on the left holds out to him a crown; and that on the right a book open, in which are these words; Non delibo nomen ejus de libro vitæ; i. e. 'I will not blot his name out of the book of life.' Underneath is the figure of a woman, sitting before the stairs of the old library, holding in one hand a key, and in the other a book, wherein the greatest part of the alphabet appears; and behind are seen three small books shut, inscribed with the names of Priscianus, Diomedes, and Donatus. Beneath all are engraven these words: Memoriæ Thomæ Bodley Militis, Publicæ Bibliothecæ fundatoris, sacrum. Obiit 28 Jan. 1612 (25).

[K] An annual speech in praise of Sir Thomas Bodley.] Dr John Morris, Canon of Christ-Church, bequeathed by his Will to the university five pounds per annum, for a speech to be made by a Master of Arts in praise of Sir Thomas Bodley; the person who made the speech to be nominated by the Dean of Christ-Church, and confirmed by the Vice-Chancellor for the time being. But this gift was not to take place till the death of Dr Morris's widow; which happening in November, 1681, the annuity then fell to the university; whereupon, the year following, Dr John Fell, Dean of Christ-Church, nominated Thomas Sparke, A. M. of his college; who, being approved by the Vice-Chancellor, made a solemn speech in the Schola linguarum, the 8th of November, 1682 (26).

[L] His Statutes.] The original copy of them, written by his own hand, is preserved in the archives of the Bodleian library. They provide, 1. That the Keeper, or Librarian, shall be a graduate, without cure of souls, and unmarried; and that both the electors, and elected, shall take an oath, prescribed in the Statutes; the election to be made after the same manner as in the choice of Proctors. 2. The Librarian's office is to keep the great register-book, in which are enrolled the names and gifts of all benefactors to the library; to preserve the disposition of the whole, and to range all books that shall be given under their proper classes; to attend in the library from eight to eleven in the morning, and from two to four or five in the afternoon, such days and times only excepted, as are specified in the Statutes. 3. To prevent accidents from fire, neither the keeper, nor any person frequenting the library, to be allowed candle, or any other kind of light. 4. The keeper to deliver the books into the hand of persons desiring them, to be used in sight, and restored before such persons depart; and no book, upon any pretence whatever, to be lent out of the library. 5. In case of sickness, or other necessary avocation, the keeper may be allowed a deputy, who must be a graduate, and take the same oath as the keeper did at his admission. He is allowed likewise an assistant in his office, and an inferior attendant (usually some poor scholar) to keep the library clean. 6. The revenue settled for the maintenance of the library, &c. to be lodged in the university chest, and managed by the Vice-Chancellor and Proctors for the time being. 7. None to enjoy the freedom of study there, but only Doctors and Licentiates of the three faculties, Bachelors of Divinity, Masters of Arts, Bachelors of Physick and Law, and Bachelors of Arts of two years standing; also Lords, and the sons of Members of Parliament, and those who become benefactors to the library; and all such, before admission to such privilege, to take an oath, prescribed in the Statutes. 8. Any graduate, or other person, who shall be convicted of dismembering, or purloining, or altering any word or passage of any book or books, to be publicly degraded, and expelled the university. 9. Eight Overseers or Visitors of the library are appointed, viz. The Vice-Chancellor and Proctors, the three Professors of Divinity, Law, and Physic, and the two Regius Professors of Hebrew and Greek, who are to inspect the state both of the building and the books, the behaviour of the keeper, &c. annually on the 8th of November; and, on the Visitation-day, forty shillings is allowed to be expended on a dinner or supper for the Visitors, and gloves to be presented them by a beadle, viz. seven pair, of ten shillings the pair, to the five Professors and two Proctors, and one pair, of twenty shillings price, to the Vice-Chancellor, besides forty shillings in money to each of the Proctors, and twenty nobles to the Vice-Chancellor (27), &c. T

(25) Wood, ubi supra, p. 89.

(26) Id. Athen. Oxon. col. 385.

(27) Vide Reliquiæ Bodleianæ, &c. p. 16, &c.

BODLEY (LAURENCE) a younger brother of Sir Thomas Bodley, mentioned in the last Article [A], was born in the city of Exeter, about the year 1546 (a). After a suitable education, though in what school is not known, he was sent to Christ-Church-college in Oxford, where he took the degrees of Bachelor and Master of Arts (b). From thence he removed into his native country, where his merit became so conspicuous, that he was made one of the Canons Residentiary of Exeter-cathedral, and Rector of Shobroke, about seven miles from that city, near Crediton; which was all the preferment he ever had [B]. Among other good things which he did, he was of great use to his brother Sir Thomas Bodley, in founding his famous library at Oxford (c): He was chief mourner at that great man's funeral; and the next day after it, namely March 30, 1613, was actually created Doctor in Divinity, as a member of Christ-Church (d). He died April the

(a) Prince's Works of Devon, &c. edit. Exeter 1701. fol. p. 32.

(b) Ibid. His taking those degrees is not mentioned in Wood's Fasti.

(c) Westcote, MS. Descript. of Devonsh. in Shobroke: and Prince, ubi supra.

(d) Wood, Fasti. edit. 1721, Vol. I. col. 195.

[A] A younger brother of Thomas Bodley, &c.] Mr Wood, by mistake, says (1), that he was Sir Thomas's elder brother. — Laurentio nimirum fratre — natu majori. — But Mr Prince positively affirms the contrary. He was the third son of the 19th, 1615, in the seventieth year of his age, and was interred in St Peter's Cathedral in Exeter, near the choir, under a flat marble stone (e), with an epitaph [C]. As to his character, we are told, that for his pious zeal, and continual labour in the faithful discharge of the duties of his function, he cannot be over-praised (f). He was at the same time of an hospitable disposition, very charitable, and pious. In his Will, he bequeathed to the Mayor and Chamber of Exeter, four hundred pounds in money, to purchase twenty pounds a year in lands, towards the maintenance of a preacher in that city (g). There is nothing of his writing extant, except an elegy on the death of the famous Bishop Jewel [D].

(2) Prince, as above, p. 84.

[B] Which was all the preferment he ever had.] These are Mr Prince's words (3); but Shobroke was undoubtedly a living of very considerable value, it being rated at 36*l.* in the King's books, and consequently might be worth near 400*l.* a year: So that the Doctor's preferment was not so very small, as Mr Prince seems to intimate.

(3) Ubi supra, p. 83.

(e) Prince, as above, p. 84.

(f) Westcote ubi supra. See Prince.

(g) Prince, as above.

(4) Survey of the county of Devon, &c. 8vo.

[C] With an epitaph. It is now obliterated; but hath been preserved by Mr Risdon (4), and is as follows.

Clarissimo viro, nec non reverendo, olim hujus ecclesie Canonico Residentiario Dno Laurentio Bodleo, Johes & Laurentius Bodleus, Nepotes, hunc dialogum, memorie sacrum devotissime consecrarunt.

Laurentius Bodleius.

Anagramma — Bonus Divos ille erat, Johan. Ille erat! Hoc miserum, non nunc; ubinam pia facta Virtutis, corpus, spiritus, ossa, caro?
 Laurent. Ossa jacent terrâ, & corpus, pia facta supersunt, (Prototypa virtutis) Spiritus astra colit.
Obiit decimo nono Aprilis A. D. 1615.

[D] Except an elegy on the death of the famous

Bishop Jewel.] It is inserted in Dr Humphreys's life of that Bishop; and part of it is as follows.

*Interea, Decor, O! Doctorum summe Virorum, Et pater, & patrie Gemma, Juelle, vale:
 Chave, vale: donec Superiorum sedis recepti,
 Perpetuo juncti, stabimus ante Deum.
 Tu modo præcedis, quia te præcedere dignum est:
 Nos per idem lati mox veniemus iter, &c.*

To conclude this learned person's life; Dr John Prideaux, Regius Professor of Divinity, and Rector of Exeter College in Oxford, dedicated to him an Act fermon of his on Revel. ii. 4. In which dedication he acknowledges himself indebted to him for some preferment; calling him his worthy patron, and commending him as a pattern to patrons, for disposing the Lord's portion, in those his days

(5) Prince, ubi supra.

BODLEY (Sir Josias) youngest brother to Sir Thomas, and Dr Laurence Bodley, mentioned in the two last articles (a), was, in all probability, born at Exeter, as well as his brothers. He was bred up a scholar, and spent some time in Merton-college in Oxford (b): But preferring a military to a studious life, he went and trailed a pike in the Low-Countries, which was then the grand theatre of war; where he behaved so well that he was advanced to the degree of a Captain (c). In 1598, he was sent into Ireland, with several old companies of English out of the Netherlands, amounting in all to above a thousand men, of which he was second Captain (d). There he signalized himself by his valour and conduct: and was at the taking of the isle of Loghrorcan (e); at the attack of Castle-Ny Parke (f); and at the siege of Kinfales, in 1601, where he was overseer of the trenches (g), as he was also at the sieges of Baltimore, Berchaven, and Castle-haven (h). For his good services upon which, and other occasions, he was knighted by the Lord-Deputy Chichester (i). He was living in Ireland in the year 1613, when he was Director-General, and Overseer of the fortifications of that kingdom (k). But how long he lived after that, and when or where he died, is unknown. He was author of some few things [A], which still remain in manuscript.

(a) He was the fifth and youngest son of John Bodley, Gent. mentioned above. Prince as above, p. 84.

(b) Wood, Athen. edit. 1721, Vol. I. col. 385.

(c) Prince, as above, p. 85.

(d) Fines Moryson's Itinerary, &c. Lond. 1617, fol. Part ii. p. 25.

(e) Ibid. p. 97, 98.

(f) Pacata Hibernia, Ireland appeared and reduced, &c. by T. Stafford, fol. London 1633, p. 215.

(g) Ibid. p. 220.

(h) Moryson ubi supra. See also Prince, as above.

(i) Prince, as above, p. 86.

(k) Moryson, p. 300.

[A] He was author of some few things. Namely, these that follow. I. 'Observations concerning the Fortresses of Ireland, and the British Colonies of Ulster.' MS. fol. some time in the library of Sir James Ware, afterwards in that of Henry, Earl of Clarendon. II. 'A jocular Description of a Journey by him taken to Lecale in Ulster, in 1602.' MS. in the same library (1). But we know not where they are at present.

(1) Wood, ubi supra.

BOETHIUS, BOECE, or BOEIS (HECTOR) a famous Scottish Historian, in part of the XVth and XVIth centuries, was descended from a very ancient and considerable family, and born at Dundee [A], in the shire of Angus, about the year 1470 (a). Having studied some time at Dundee (b), and at Aberdeen [in which latter place he was a Professor in 1497] (c). he went, for his further improvement, to the college of Montague, in the university of Paris, where he applied himself to Philosophy, and became a Professor of it there. He had an opportunity of cultivating at the same time, an intimate friendship with several persons of the most eminent learning, which were students in that university, particularly the great Erasmus, who kept a kind of correspondence with him afterwards (d). Dr William Elphinston, Bishop of Aberdeen, having founded the king's-college in that city, about the year 1500, sent over to Paris for our author, and made him Principal of that new university. When he arrived at Aberdeen, he found among the Canon-regulars there (into which order he himself entered) a great many learned men. Being installed in his place, he took for his colleague Mr William Hay, who had been educated with him under the same masters, both at Dundee and Paris: And by their joint care and labour, the kingdom was furnished with several eminent scholars (e). Upon the death of his Patron, Bishop Elphinston, in 1514 (f), he undertook to write his life; to which he added the lives of his predecessors in the See of Aberdeen.

(a) This is easily inferred from the dates hereafter mentioned.

(b) See the Lives and Characters of the most eminent Writers of the Scots Nation, &c. by G. Mackenzie, M. D. edit. Edinburgh. 1711. Vol. II. p. 376.

(c) Bishop Nicolson's Scottish Historical Library, edit. 1736. fol. p. 37.

(d) Ibid. & Mackenzie, ubi supra.

(e) Mackenzie; ubi supra, p. 382.

(f) See the same author, ibid p. 116.

[A] Born at Dundee. His father was Mr Boeis of Panbride (*).

[B] To ubi supra.

(*) Mackenzie, ubi supra.

Aberdeen (g). We shall give an account of this work below. Next, he applied himself (g) Ibid. p. 384. to write the History of Scotland; to which he prefixed a large description of that country [B]. This history he published, under the title of, Scotorum Historia ab illius Gentis Origine, Paris, 1526, fol. [C]. But he afterwards improved, and continued it 'till his death; which is supposed to have happened about the year 1550: For we find two persons of great learning then bewailing his loss. One is Bartholomæus Latomus; with whom our author was intimately acquainted at Paris; and the other, Joachim Wolfius, a learned German (b). His History of Scotland hath been highly censured by some [D], (b) Ibid. p. 445, and 447.

[B] To which he prefixed a large description of that country.] It was translated into English with considerable improvements, and inserted into our author's life, by Dr Mackenzie (1). But this geographical description of Scotland by our author, had been pretty severely, and justly, criticized upon by Bishop Nicolson (2); whose words we shall lay here before the reader.

— Boethius, says he, takes occasion to let his reader know, that he was singularly addicted to the study of Natural History, and much delighted with such physical curiosities, as were most extraordinary and surprising. His correspondents, he assures us, were persons of eminent learning in several parts of the nation; among whom, was Edward Bishop of Orkney, who furnished him with a faithful account of the healthy and vigorous constitution of the inhabitants of those isles. The rest, as the Bishop truly observes, did not (all of them at least) deal so fairly by him; several of them having most certainly imposed upon his good nature and easy faith. 'Tis a terrible story which Sir Duncan Campbel told him of the monstrous goose-footed otter of the Loch Garloil; which struck down great oaks with it's steer, and yet the fishermen escaped it's fury by climbing into trees. The sea-monks at the isle of Bafs, and Ja. Ogilby's wild men of Norway, (who could pull up the tallest fir, with as much ease as an ordinary body can root up a turnip) are proper comparisons for these; and the credibility of the three parallel stories must rest upon the reporters. But the author himself is only answerable for the account, which, amongst others, he gives of the clack-geese, or barnacle, which he affirms upon his own word; since what he pretends to have frequently observed, of a perfect bird, feathers and all, being formed in these shells, is extremely dissonant from what the Naturalists of our days have taught from as nice and credible experiments. He is more authentick in what he reports of the Gufards (or Bultards as the English call them) in the county of Mers, and the Salmon at Aberdeen; and, above all, he is to be applauded for what he hints of the Purple-fish, reckoning it amongst the Conchæ intortæ. This shews that he rightly understood Bede (3), who has somewhat to the same purpose; and that Mr Cole's discovery of this very fish (4) ought not to be reckoned among such as had not formerly been published by any author. He does not appear to have been quite so happy in the use he made of the same ancient Historian, and some others, in matters of antiquity; or else, he would hardly have placed the Brigantes in Galloway, the Silures in Carliſ, and the Deiri in Mers and Lowthian (5). The account he likewise gives of the first original of Ptolemy's Geography, seems to be far from the truth. He tells us (6), that it was begun by some mathematical gentlemen, sent purposely abroad by King Ptolemy Philadelphus; who having been regaled by King Reutha, as his own countrymen and kindred, and having narrowly inspected all the corners of the Scotch and Pictish territories, returned back to Egypt, wonderfully pleased with their finding a northern kingdom of the same language, manners, and government, with their own. Out of these observations, says he, King Ptolemy himself drew up part of a large volume of Cosmography; which, some centuries afterwards, in the Emperor Hadrian's time, was completed by his name-fake of Alexandria (7).

[C] Scotorum Historia ab illius Gentis Origine. Or, Scotorum Historia à prima Gentis Origine, &c. Libri XIX. The first edition of this history was given by Badius Ascensius, at Paris, 1526, fol. and consisted only of seventeen books, ending with the death of K. James I. The next (at Laufanne and Paris, in 1574, fol.) was larger, having the addition of the eighteenth book compleat, and part of the nineteenth. Thus far the author himself continued it: But what follows was the work of J. Ferrerius, a native of Piedmont, who carried it down to the end of James the Third's reign. The Continuer himself wanted the helps he expected (8); his great encourager, H. Sinclair, Dean of Glasgow, and afterwards Bishop of Rossie, being suddenly taken off, before he could furnish him with the intended materials. But he seems to be honest and impartial in setting down matters as he found them.—Boethius's whole history was translated into the Scottish language by John Bellenden, or Ballanden, Archdeacon of Murray, who died at Rome about the year 1550; and published in 1536, under this title, 'The History and Croniklis of Scotland, compilat and newly correctit and amendit be the Reverend and Noble Clerk, Mr Hector Boece, Chanon of Aberdene. Translated laity by Mr John Bellenden, Archdene of Murray, and Chanon of Rossie, at command of James the Fyffth, King of Scottis. Imprintet at Edinburgh, be Thomas Davidson, dwelling fornes the Fryere Wynde.' R. Holinshed published it in English (9), with several large interpolations and additions out of Major, Lesley, and Buchanan: but he was not the author of that translation.

[D] His History of Scotland had been highly censured by some.] Take the following account of it from Bishop Nicolson (10). In the six first books of his History there are a great many particulars not to be had in Fordon, or any other writers now extant; and unless the authors, which he pretends to have seen, be hereafter discovered, he will continue to be shrewdly suspected for the contriver of as many tales (11) as our Geoffrey of Monmouth. For these novelties he has been severely censured by H. Lhuyd (12); and Buchanan himself (13), though he makes Lhuyd as very a villain and blockhead as the other, acknowledges that he's never to be excused.—However, in matters relating to this nation, he certainly follows the most fabulous of our Historians more than he is willing to own, having only given a new turn of his pen to what he had written, and then commonly fathered it on Veremund, or Campbel. In his account of Achaius's treaty, Kenneth's victory over the Picts, the metropolitan power of the See of York, &c. he's extremely formal and tedious, giving us large samples of his oratory in the occasional speeches which he puts into the mouths of his several great men. To these he adds a collection of prodigies and miracles which happened upon every considerable revolution, and either he, or his friend the physician of Aberdene (14), garnishes every dith with flowers of choice observations in Natural History. His principles in polity are no better than those of Buchanan; whose Jus Regni is effectually confirmed by what he relates (15), of the making and deposing of Kings and Bishops by the sole creating power of the people. His eighteenth book is as highly commended by Ferrerius (16) as it can possibly deserve; in quo fusè omnia ita scribendo consecutus est, ut nihil plenius aut significantius a quopiam in re persimili fieri posse credam; i. e. 'That he has treated of all things there in so comprehensive a manner, that he believes no one could have done it more fully or significantly on the like subject.' Indeed the elegance of his expressions is fine, and well becomes the character which an eminent master of the like Rhetoric has given of it (17); Illius stylus tam est tersus ut Cæsaris puritatem decessisse; ac rationum verborumque ponderibus ita nervosus, ut Livianam gravitatem in suam naturam transulisse penitus videatur. 'His style has all the purity of Cæsar's, and is so nervous both in the reflections and diction, that he seems to have absolutely entered into the gravity of Livy, and made it his own.' 'Tis to be wished that he had been as nice and curious in the matter of his work. How far he failed in this,

(1) Page 384—446.

(2) Ubi supra, p. 4.

(3) Hist. Eccles. lib. i. c. 1.

(4) See Philosophical Transact. Vol. XV. No. 178, p. 1278.

(5) See Bishop Nicolson, ubi supra.

(6) Hist. Scot. lib. ii. fol. 20. b.

(7) Bishop Nicolson, ibid. p. 3.

(8) See his Dedicat. ad Jac. Beaton, Archiep. Glasg.

It was printed with his Continuation at Laufanne, as above; and also at Paris in 1574 and 1575.

(9) In the first Volume of his Chronicles.

(10) Ubi supra, p. 38.

(11) See them at large in Bishop Stillingfleet's Orig. Britan. p. 252, &c.

(12) See below, at the end of this note.

(13) Rerum Scot. lib. ii. sub finem.

(14) Vide Dempsteri Hist. Eccles. lib. ii.

(15) Confer. lib. vi. fol. 92. b. & lib. vii. fol. 128. b.

(16) In Epist. Dedicat. fol. 355. a.

(17) J. Lessæus, ib. ix. p. 414.

and as much magnified by others [E]: All which was owing to that natural partiality and antipathy which reigned then between the Scotch and English nations, but, 'tis to be hoped, is now entirely abolished. Besides his History of Scotland, our author published The the reader will best learn from the words of Sir Robert Gordon of Stralgh, who was as competent a judge of the performance as could be: *Displicet mihi, fays he (18), Historia Boethii: ut liberè ad te loquar. Ille legum Historiæ scribendæ ignarus, rudi sæculo ea scripsit quorum nos pudet. Quid illa de Ptolomæi regis legatione ad Geographiam nostræ regni vestigandam? Quis ille de Carataco tractatus è Tacito ad verbum descriptus? Illam nemo antiquitatis prudens regibus nostris annumeravit. Illum Buchananus, infitiæ tantæ gnarus, nè Boethius ludibrio haberetur, aut Historia labem apud exteros sentiret, nolens è Regum serie delere, magnifica tamen illa intacta relinquit. Nomen ipsam Caratacum arguit Provinciæ Britonem fuisse. Quale hoc, Silures nobis ascribi, quos hodiernæ Walliæ partem tenuisse Romani scriptores testatissimum faciunt? Quam portentosum de Cameloduno commentum? Quales sunt illæ regis nostri ad Casarem Julium Epistolæ minaces? Nonne hoc est serio delirare? Ignosco Gatheli fabulæ; cum nævus ille cunctibus tam communis: At illi plus satis immorari, omnia scigillatim, tanquam illorum temporum æqualis, referre, multum mihi displicet; i. e. 'To speak freely to you, I dislike Boeis's history. He being ignorant of the laws of history, has written in a barbarous age what we are ashamed of. For what else can you think of King Ptolemy's mathematical gentlemen (19)? Or of the story of Caratacus, taken word for word out of Tacitus? No man that knows any thing of antiquity would rank him among our Kings. And therefore though Buchanan, sensible of so gross a blunder, places him among our Kings; (that Boethius might not be exposed, and strangers should not perceive a blemish in our history) yet he passes over all the fine things that the other had said of him: The very name of Caratacus proves him to have been a South Briton. How stupid is it to fix the Silures among us, when the Roman writers declare that they were inhabitants of Wales? How monstrous is his fiction about Camelodunum? or our King's threatening letters to Julius Cæsar? Is not all that downright dotting and foolishness? I could forgive him the fable of Gathelus, since it hath been embraced by all our historians; but to dwell too long or too minutely upon it, is extremely disagreeable.' — Dr William Lloyd, late Bishop of Worcester, hath also spoken of our author with great sharpness and contempt (20). For he calls him, 'A late romancer (21), who could not only make stories, but authors too when he pleased; nay, that made a Bishop of St Alban's cloak Amphibalus (22).' That, 'to prove him a man of no credit is needless, when so many have done it (23).' He 'not only avers the same thing that J. de Fordon and J. Major had said, without naming them, but, like Hætor himself he ventures farther into the dark, and charges beyond all his company. He was the first (for ought I know, says the Bishop) that found there were Priests and Monks in Scotland, named Culdees, whom he makes to have been there above 150 years before there were Christians in that country (24). I doubt, says the Bishop elsewhere (25), whether Hætor Boethius had those authors whom he quotes; [Veremund, Archdeacon of St Andrew's, and John Cambel] for he never quotes him that was his author indeed, the Monk of Fordon (26), whom he seems to have followed in all his Antiquities.' Dr E. Stillingfleet, afterwards Bishop of Worcester, having also minutely examined this history, shews, 'That if Hætor Boethius did not forge all the names of the pretended first race of Scottish Kings, from Fergus I. to Fergus II, yet he did insert many things contrary to the antient genealogy in John de Fordon, l. 10. c. 2. And that finding the succession of those Kings very short and meagre, he set himself to make up what he found defective, and to put it together under the names of Veremundus and Cornelius Hibernicus, or others; out of these he framed a long series or catalogue of Kings, and filled up the story of these Kings, not out of their old annals, (as far as yet appears) but in a great measure out of his own invention (). Elsewhere he calls him, 'A mad who stands out at nothing ()', and 'the Geoffrey of Scotland (†)'. By the by I must observe, that Bishop Lloyd having in* the course of his book, represented Hætor Boethius's long succession of Scottish monarchs, from Fergus to Congallus inclusive, as a mere fiction; Sir George Mackenzie published (27) a violent and not very mannerly answer, intitled, 'A Defence of the Antiquity of the Royal Line of Scotland;' wherein he highly blames the Bishop for having 'cut off forty-four Kings, and exposing on a pillory as forgers the many and grave Scotch historians (28). Nay, Sir George admires, that any of the subjects of Great Britain did not think it a degree of Lesè Majesty (29), to injure and shorten 'the Royal line of their Kings (30).' But certainly such a conduct is monstrous; for all learned men must know, that there is a fabulous part in the history of every nation; which to undertake to defend, shews extreme weakness and ignorance; as to abuse those who ridicule it, is the height of petulance and madnes. Accordingly the Bishop was soon after vindicated with great wit and smartness by Dr Stillingfleet, in the preface to his Origines Britannicæ just now mentioned.—But to return; the last author I shall mention, who condemns H. Boethius's history, is Humphrey Lhuud our eminent English Antiquary; and he looks upon the whole history to be nothing else but a heap of lyes and fables from beginning to end, as appears from the following epigram of his (31).

Hætoris historici tot quot mendaciæ queris;
Si vis ut numerem (lector amice) tibi:
Idem me jubeas fluctus numerare marinos,
Et liquidi stellas dinumerare poli.

[E] And as much magnified by others.] Erasmus, who was intimately acquainted with him, says in one of his epistles, 'That he was a man of an extraordinary and happy genius, and of great eloquence.' Vir singularis ingenii felicitatis, & sacundi oris. And elsewhere (32), 'that he knew not what it was to lye.' Mr William Gordon, in a letter of his to the university of Aberdeen, at the beginning of the History, tells them, 'That they had much reason to rejoice, in that the History of their nation, written in a most eloquent style, faithfully and learnedly, had been first published by their university.' And says, that 'Boethius was a man excellently well skilled in all the Sciences.' Plurimum vobis gaudendum existimo, quod nostræ gentis historia disertissimo stylo, fideliter, atque erudite conscripta ex nostra Aberdonensi literaria officina primum prodierit in lucem.—[Boethius] vir in omni Philosophiæ genere apprime eruditus, &c.— John Ferrier, or Ferrerius, who continued this history, says (33), 'That Boethius was a man of great accomplishments and singular learning, who transmitted to posterity the noble and brave actions of the Scottish Kings and nation.' Hætor Boethius vir ornatissimus, & singulari doctrina præditus, qui regum vestrorum & Scotiæ gentis res clarissimo suscipias, & fortissime gestas memoriæ ad posteritatem tradidit. Paulus Jovius, Bishop of Nocera, in his description of Britain, speaking of our author, says, that 'he wrote the history of the Scottish Kings down to K. James III. with remarkable eloquence, and equal diligence; in insigni sacundia, & pari diligentia. Buchanan, tho' he frequently criticizes upon him, and takes notice of his faults (34), yet owns, that 'he was not only remarkable for his knowledge in polite literature above what was common in his time, but also that he was a man of singular humanity and courteousness.' — Non solum artium liberalium cognitione, supra quam illa seerebant tempora insignens; sed humanitate & comitate singulari præditum (35). Finally, Archbishop Spotiswood in his History of the Church of Scotland (36), speaking of our author, says, that 'he was a great Philosopher, and much commended by Erasmus for his eloquence and felicity of Iogine (37); yet is he traduced by some of the English writers for a fabulous and partial Historian; but they who like to peruse his History will perceive, that this is spoken out of passion and malice, and not upon any just cause.' However, it is not the English writers alone that call him a fabulous Historian, for Gerard Vossius owns (38), that he has put many fables into his History — fabulas multas Historiæ immiscuit.

[F] The

(18) Bishop Nicolson, ubi supra, p. 38.

(19) See the note [B].

(20) Hist. of the Government of the Church, as it was in Great Britain and Ireland, when they first received the Christian Religion, Lond. 1684, 8vo.

(21) Page 15.

(22) Ib. p. 151.

(23) Ib. p. 152. See Vossius de Historicis Latinis, edit. 1624, 4to, p. 615.

(24) Ib. p. 149.

(25) Preface, p. 26.

(26) Fordon was no Monk, says Sir George Mackenzie, Defence, &c. p. 34. See Mr Hearne's edit. of that author.

(*) Preface to Origines Britannicæ, p. xi. xvi.

() Ibid. p. xli.

(†) Orig. Brit. p. 64.

(27) Edinburgh, 1685, 8vo.

(28) Letter to the Earl of Perth at the beginning of the Defence, p. 4.

(29) A kind of high-treason.

(30) Ibid. p. 11.

(31) Fragm. Britan. Defcr. fol. 32, &c.

(32) Epist. Anno 1539, in Vit. Erasmi.

(33) In Epist. Dedicat. ad Jac. Betuum, ut supra.

(34) Lib. i. & ii. Rerum Scotiar. &c.

(35) Lib. ii. sub finem.

(36) Book ii. p. 68.

(37) i. e. Wit or Ingenuity; an old Scottish word.

(38) Vossius de Historicis Latinis, ubi supra.

the Lives of the Bishops of Aberdeen [F], just hinted at before. As to his character, he was a great master of classical and polite learning, well skilled in Divinity, Philosophy, and History; but somewhat credulous, and much addicted to the belief of legendary stories. With regard to his other accomplishments, he was discreet, genteel, well bred, attentive, generous, affable, and courteous (i). We shall take notice of a mistake committed by Bishop Lloyd, that has some relation to our author [G]; and for which that Prelate hath been severely censured.

(i) Mackenzie, ubi supra, p. 451. & Bale Scriptorium Britannicæ Centuria XIV. No. 61.

[F] The Lives of the Bishops of Aberdeen. Under this title, Vita Episcoporum Murbhacensium & Aberdonensium. Paris, 1522, 4to. He begins at Beanus, the first Bishop of that See, and ends at Gawin Dunbar, who was Bishop when the book came out. A third part of the whole is spent in the life of Bishop Elphinston, for whose sake the work was undertaken. But there is in the King's college at Aberdeen a valuable original Chartulary of Charters, Grants, &c. which would furnish a better history of the Bishops of that See than that of our author's, which upon the whole is but lame and imperfect (39).

[G] We shall take notice of a mistake committed by Bishop Lloyd, &c. And we shall give it the reader in his own words (40).— 'After the succession from Ferguson was published by Hector Boethius, it seems it was not then believed by the learned men of his own nation. For Polydore Virgil tells us (41), that when Hector's book was newly come forth, Gawen Douglas, Bishop of Dunkeld, warned him of it, and earnestly prayed him not to follow that history in writing of the Scottish manners. And that Bishop gave him

'another account of their original.'— Upon which Sir Geo. Mackenzie animadvertes in the following words (42),— And whereas the Bishop of St Asaph, [Dr Lloyd], to lessen the credit of Boethius, relates, 'that Bishop Gavin Douglas advised Polidor Virgil not to follow his history.' Polidor Virgil himself is appealed to, where there is no mention of Boethius at all, nor could it be; for Polidor regrets that Gavin Douglas died anno 1520 (43), whereas Boethius was not published 'till 1526, and Boethius himself informs us (44), that the records, from which he formed his history, were sent him from Icolmkill, anno 1525, and no sooner.'— Polydore Virgil's words are, — postea summe rogavit, ut ne historiam paulo ante à quodam suo Scoto divulgatam sequeretur.— It was undoubtedly John Major that was meant, whose history of Scotland was published in 1520 (45). Observe likewise, that whereas Sir George Mackenzie says Gavin Douglas died in 1520, Polydore Virgil expressly says it was in MDXXI (46). See Dr Stillingfleet's preface to his Origines Britannicæ (47).

(42) Defence, &c. as above, p. 30, 31.

(43) It was 1521. See Polyd. Virg. p. 73.

(44) Lib. vii.

(45) See Dr Mackenzie, Lives &c. as above, Preface to Vol. II. p. vii. See also p. 315, 345.

(46) Ubi supra, p. 73.

(47) Page liv.

BOLTON, or BOULTON (EDMUND) an ingenious writer, and Antiquarian, in the beginning of the XVIIth century, was a retainer to the great George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, under whom he probably enjoyed some office (a). He was a Roman Catholick (b): and distinguished himself by his several curious writings; which are as follow. 1. 'The Life of King Henry II.' to be inserted in Speed's Chronicle; but the author being found to favour too much the haughty carriage of Thomas Becket, another life was written by Dr Barcham (c). 2. 'The Elements of Armories, Lond. 1610, 4to.' 3. A poem upon the translation of the body of Mary Queen of Scots, from Peterburgh to Westminster-abbey, in 1612 [A]. 4. An English translation of Lucius Florus's Roman History, 5. 'Nero Cæsar, or Monarchie depraved. An historical worke, dedicated with leave to the Duke of Buckingham, Lord-Admiral.' Lond. 1624, fol. This book, which contains the life of the Emperor Nero, is printed in a neat and elegant manner, and adorned with several valuable and curious medals. At it is the most considerable work of our author, it will be proper to give some account of it; especially as it is not very common. The whole is divided into fifty-five chapters, in some of which are introduced curious remarks and valuable observations [B]. In chap. xii. he shows, how Nero devised to go beyond all examples, in making mankind beholden to him, by abolishing the taxes upon the portage, or sale, of wares. But he was diverted from it, by it's being represented to him, that those payments were among the sinews of the state, and that it was no more possible for Rome to have subsisted, had those returns of supply been withdrawn, than for a good husband to hold all together, where receipts do infinitely undergo expences. In the xvth he assigns the reasons which induced that unnatural monster, Nero, to resolve the death of his own mother Agrippina; namely, in order to bring about his marriage with his concubine Poppœa Sabina, which Agrippina opposed, out of regard to his wife Octavia; and also, for fear the same Agrippina, who was heir-general to Augustus Cæsar, should wrest from him the empire, as she sometimes threatened to do. Next he describes, how Nero contrived her destruction, by feasting her at Baïæ, and putting her on board a trap-galley, the cabin whereof was so made as to fall at once with her into the water; but this wicked design miscarried, and she was saved by the assistance of her own servants, who jumped into the water, despising death and danger. In the xxvth and xxvth chapters, he gives a large account of the revolt in Britain against the Romans, under the conduct of Boadicia [C], which he introduces with a recapit-

(a) See Epistle Dedicatory at the beginning of his Nero Cæsar.

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon. edit. 1721. Vol. II. col. 19.

(c) The Surfeit to A. B. C. Lond. 1656, 12mo, quoted by A. Wood, ibid. See also Vol. I. col. 530.

[A] A poem upon the translation of the body of Mary Queen of Scots, &c. It is entitled Prosopœia Basilica; and is extant in manuscript in the Cottonian library (1), having never been printed.

[B] In some of which are introduced curious remarks, &c. For instance: That the tower built by Caligula, was not at Brittenhuis, as is commonly supposed, but at Cherburg, or Boulogne (2). That the Roman standing forces in Britain, were not above 40,000 men (3). That the poll-money paid throughout the Roman empire, was but about six-pence per head (4). That the name of London occurs first in ancient authentic writers about the time of Boadicea's revolt (5). And he supposes, it is denoted by that coin of Britannicus in Camden's Britannia, the reverse of which he reads thus after Strada, Metropolis Etiminaei Ba. Lo. The metropolis of King Etiminaus London (6).

[C] Under the conduct of Boadicia. The author observes (7), that her name is variously written, namely, in Tacitus, Boadicia, Boudicea, and Voadica; in Dio, Bouduica; and perhaps in Camden's British Monies, Boduca.

(5) Page 115.

(6) Page 134, 135. See Camden's Britan. edit. 1722. Vol. I. p. cxix.

(7) Page 99.

(39) Bishop Nicolson, ubi supra, p. 57.

(40) Preface, &c. as above, p. 33, 39.

(41) Histor. Anglican. lib. iii. p. 7. edit. Lugd. Batav. 1649, 8vo.

(1) Titus, A. XIII. 23.

(2) Page 84.

(3) Page 90.

(4) Page 95.

a recapitulation of the affairs in Britain, from the Romans first entrance under Julius Cæsar, till that revolt under Nero. The battle in which that brave heroine was defeated, he supposes was fought * on Salisbury-plain between two woods (d); and he further supposes that she was buried in that plain, and that Stone-henge, or Stoneage, was erected for her monument [D]. In the xxviiiith, he shows when Nero first came upon the common stage, namely, in the tenth year of his reign; and gives a print of his seal, on which was represented the story of Mariyas. To please, as the author observes, the meaner sort of people, was the poor chief point of his policy, in thus appearing upon the stage: For in their affections he reposed his safety, and in their applause his glory. The xxixth is an account of the burning of Rome by Nero's order; in which he takes occasion to describe the prodigious bigness of that city. As Augustus left it, it was comprised within a wall of almost fourteen miles in circuit, enlarged afterwards to fifty, under the Emperor Aurelian. But that spacious body, and the suburbs thereof, might rather seem a whole country super-edified, than only a city. For the buildings ran out above thirty miles one way, and from the milliary pillar fixed in the Roman Forum, as a center of measure, a line of seventy thousand paces would not have included the Prætorian camp, and the furthestmost houses. Her increase of habitations was so manifold, that the seven and thirty gates thereof, could not let in more; and she had suburbs, which answered in quantity to so many several cities. For, to Ostia, the port of Rome, and mouth of Tyber, the banks were covered with buildings, twelve miles outright one way. He further takes notice, that the fire of Rome began the 21st day of July, the very day on which it had, many centuries before, been sacked and burned by the Gauls; and continued nine days. Chap. xxxvi. treats of the East-Indian trade in Nero's time; which was then carried on, not by the Cape of Good Hope, but some way up the river Nile, and from thence by caravans over land to the Red-sea, and so to the Indian ocean. The ready coin carried yearly from Rome upon that account, amounted, according to Pliny's computation, to above three hundred thousand pounds sterling. And the usual returns in December or January, yielded in clear gain an hundred for one. For, as the author observes, those oriental nations did always understand the use and value of our mints, and were so happy in the follies of the West, that while they sat in quiet at home, they were fought unto from the farthest coasts by sea and land, through all sorts of perils, to receive for their shadowy superfluities, our substantial payments. In chap. xlv, he relates Nero's attempt, to cut through the Corinthian Isthmus. And in the xlviith, how he caused the choice Antiquities, and all the prime monuments of the Greeks, to be brought away to Rome. At the end of this book, there is a small tract of eight leaves, intituled, 'An Historical Parallel; or, A Demonstration of the notable oddes, for the more use of Life, betweene reading large histories, and briefe ones, how excellent soever, as those of Lucius Florus. Heretofore, privately written to my good and noble friend Endymion Porter, Esq; one of the Gentlemen of the Prince's bed-chamber.' The occasion of that tract was this; The author having, in his epistle dedicatory to Lucius Florus, asserted, that 'Epitomes are in truth no better than anatomies,' he demonstrates the truth of it, by a parallel between the several accounts given by L. Florus (e), and Polybius (f), of the famous battle between Hannibal, and P. C. Scipio. From whence he observes, that Florus gives us, in proper words, the flowers and tops of noble matter; but Polybius sets the things themselves, in all their necessary parts, before our eyes. And concludes, that the oddes between an epitome and a just history are evidently as great, as between the contents of a chapter, and the chapter itself: And therefore, that all spacious mindes, attended with the felicities of means and leisure, will fly them as bane. 6. Besides the books above-mentioned, Mr Boulton hath written, 'Vindiciæ Britannicæ, or London righted by rescues and Recoveries of antiquities of Britain in general, and of London in particular, against unwarrantable prejudices, and historical antiquations amongst the learned; for the more honour, and perpetual just uses of the noble island and the city.'

(*) In September.

(d) §. xxviii. p. 161.

(e) Lib. ii. cap. 6.

(f) Lib. xv.

[D] He supposes, that she was buried in Salisbury-Plain, and that Stone-henge, or Stoneage, was erected for her monument. This he grounds upon that passage of Dio, where it is said, 'That the Britons entered her pompously, or with much magnificence,' which, as he imagines, cannot be better verified than by assigning these orderly irregular, and formless uniform heaps of massive marble to her everlasting remembrance. Various have been the hypotheses and conjectures of learned men, about the occasion and antiquity of this wild kind of structure, as it is termed by Mr Camden (8). For, besides what Mr Boulton thought of it;

(8) In his Britannia, edit. Lond. 1722, fol. Vol. I. col. 122.

(9) In, The most notable Antiquity of Great Britain, &c. restored, Lond. 1655, fol.

(10) In his Vindication of Stone-henge restored, &c. Lond. 1665, fol.

1. Mr Sammes, in his Britannia, fancied, that it was a work of the Phenicians; 2. Inigo Jones, Esq; (9), and Mr John Webb (10), that it was a temple of the Tuscan order, built by the Romans to the God Caerus, or Terminus; 3. Many of our Historians, that it was the burial place of Uther Pendragon, Constantine, Ambrosius, and other British Kings; or, according to others, that it was erected by Ambrosius, or his brother Uthe, with the help of Merlin, the Mathematician, in memory of the Britons slain there by treachery, in a conference with the Saxons. 4. Dr Charlton (11), that it was a Danish monument, erected either for a burial-place, or as a trophy for some victory, or for the election and coronation of their Kings. 5. Some have maintained, that it was an old triumphal British monument, erected to Anaraith, the goddess of Victory, after a bloody battle won by the illustrious Stanings, and his Cælgie giants, against Divitiacus and his Belgæ (12). 6. Finally, others have asserted, that it was a temple of the Druids, long before the coming in of the Romans (13). This opinion, which is the most probable, hath been embraced, and very well explained by Mr Toland, in his 'Specimen of a Critical History of the Celtic Religion' (14); He there supposes Stone-henge to have been a cathedral of the Druids. See also Mona Antiqua Restaurata, by H. Rowlands, Dublin, 1723, 4to, and An Account of Jersey by Ph. Falle, &c. Lond. 1734, 2d edit. 8vo.

(11) In his Glo-rea Gigantum, &c. Lond. 1663, 4to.

(12) See Camden, ubi supra, col. 123.

(13) J. Aubrey's Monumenta Britannica.

(14) Printed in Vol. I. of Collection of his Posthumous Pieces, &c. Lond. 1726, 8vo.

‘city [E].’ It consists of seven chapters. In the first he treats ‘of London before the Britann rebels sackt and fired it in hatred and defiance of Nero.’ In the second he shews, that ‘London was more great and famous in Nero’s days, than that it should be within the description, which Julius Cæsar makes of a barbarous Britann town in his days.’ In the third, he proves, ‘that the credit of Julius Cæsar’s writings may subsist, and yet London retain the opinion of utmost antiquity.’ In the fourth, ‘the same fundamental assertion is upholden with other, and with all sorts of arguments or reasons.’ The fifth bears this title, ‘The natural face of the seat of London (exactly described in this section) most sufficiently proved, that it was most antiently inhabited, always pre-supposing reasonable men in Britain.’ The sixth contains ‘a copious and serious disquisition about the old book of Brute [F], and of the authority thereof, especially so far forth as concerns the present cause of the honour and antiquity of London, fundamentally necessary in general to our national history.’ The last chapter is intituled, ‘special, as well historical, as other, illustrations, for the use of the coins in my Nero Cæsar, concerning London in and before that time.’ 7. Mr Boulton was also author of ‘Hypercritica, or a Rule of Judgment for writing or reading our histories. Delivered in four supererogatory addresses, by occasion of a censorian epistle, prefixed by Sir Henry Savile, Knt. to his edition of some of our oldest historians in Latin, dedicated to the late Queen Elizabeth. That according thereunto, a complete body of our affairs, a Corpus Rerum Anglicarum may at last, and from among ourselves, come happily forth in either of the tongues. A felicity wanting to our nation, now when even the name thereof is as it were at an end [G].’ 8. Moreover, it appears, that our author intended to compose, A General History of England, or an entire and complete Body of English affairs [H]. 9. And there is extant in the Cottonian Library, ‘the contents, or draught of a book, intituled, Agon Heroicus, or concerning arms and armories, by Edmund Bolton (g) [I].’ (g) Faustina, E. 1. 7.

10. He

[E] Vindicia Britannica, or London righted, &c. This book was never printed, though prepared by the author for the press. A copy of it, written very accurately in a thin folio of forty-five pages, is in the possession of Hugh Howard, Esq; (15). In an advertisement to the reader at the beginning of the book, Mr Boulton observes, that though these seven chapters of historical and antiquarian paradoxes, are wholly written in explication, defence, and full accomplishment of that, which is printed in the historical work of Nero Cæsar, concerning the state of Britain and London; yet they are made, of themselves, a body entire and independent, without the absolute necessity of having both the books, together. His chief design in this book, is to shew, ‘That London, the greatest, best, and most renowned city, of the greatest and best island of the whole Atlantick ocean, or of the universal world, was far more great and famous in Nero’s days, than that it should be within the description, which Julius Cæsar makes (16) of a barbarous Britann town in his days.’ — It was not a British or a Cornish Tre or town, but a Kaïr or city; nor simply a Kaïr or city, but a Dinas, the seat of a sovereign Prince, the seat of a Palace-Royal, as the last syllables of Londinum (formed out of Dinas, a palace) do most unquestionably testify. — Then he mentions the several names, which London hath borne at any time; namely, Tre-Nant, i. e. the town in the valley; Troy-Novant, i. e. New Troy; Kaïr-Lud, i. e. Lud’s city; Dinas Belin, i. e. Belin’s palace; Lban Dian, i. e. Diana’s sanc or temple; Lhong Dinium, i. e. the city or palace-royal of ships: And under the Romans, Augusta Britanorum, or Trinobantum.

[F] The old book of Brute. That is, the story of Brutus’s coming to Britain, (said to be so denominated from him; with his Trojans. This matter, which is generally looked upon as fabulous, is treated of at large by Geoffrey of Monmouth, and from him by most of our Chroniclers. Some truth there may be in Geoffrey’s books, but the main of it is unanimously condemned as fictitious.

[G] Hypercritica, or a Rule of Judgment, &c. This small piece, which is often mentioned with applause by A. Wood, in his Athenæ Oxonienses, was published by Dr Anthony Hall, at the end of Nicolai Trivetii Annalium Continuatio, ut & Adami Murimuthensis Chronicon, &c. Oxon. 1722, 8vo. In his preface, the Doctor styles Mr Boulton, ‘a considerable person,’ and ‘a very learned man.’

[H] Moreover, it appears, that our author intended to compose a General History of England, &c. This he intimates at the conclusion of his Hypercritica. — ‘I close up this argument with this final admonition to myself, or to whosoever else doth meditate the Herculean, and truly noble labour of composing an entire and complete body of English affairs, a Corpus rerum Anglicanarum, a general History of England; to which not only the exquisite knowledge of our own matters is altogether necessary, but of all other our neighbours whatsoever, yea of all the world; for where our arms and armies have not been, our arts and navies have.’

[I] Concerning arms and armories, by Edmund Bolton.

Contents, or a draught of a book, intituled, Agon Heroicus, By Edmund Bolton.

AGON HEROICUS.

1. How to reduce honor, and arms to better estimation then euer heretofore.
2. Of places according to the known qualitie of parties, as they are of virthue, or parts of minde.
3. Of the English Crosse, and of S. Georg.
4. The empire of virthue, and learning advanced by the studies of honor and antiquitie.
5. Excellent benefits comming to every good gouernment, and person by the studies of honor and antiquitie.
6. The antient mysterie of antient Maiesties ceremony.
7. Whither apprenticeship extinguisheth gentrie.
8. Of antient seals, and coigns, and of such as deface monuments of honor and arms.
9. Of such as usurp titles of gentrie, and notes of honor.
10. Of reuiuing publick reherfals of our works before they goe to the presse, or passe our hands.
11. On behalf of Brute, Monmouth’s founder of the Britann Monarchie.
12. Of Heathen Theologie among the Britanns and Saxens.
13. Of grants of arms.
14. Of Letters Patents, and other authentick instruments among the antient English.
15. Of Joseph of Arimathea, and the Abbie of Glastenberie, 16. Of Lucius, first Christian King of our land, and of S. Alban, first martyr of the same.
17. That the studies of honor and antiquitie, are not uoluptuarie, uain, or felicitated in the senses.
18. That no nature is good, which doth not uehemently incline to them.
19. Of Constantinus Magnus, and of his mother S. Helen.
20. Of the principal glorie of the Britann world, London.
21. Of Merlin, and his prophesies.
22. Of the most renowned ARTHUR.
23. Of antient English cheualric.

(15) See General Dictionary, under the article B O L T O N, Vol. III, p. 466.

(16) Comment. de Bello Gall. lib. v. c. 21. oppidum autem Britann vocant, quum Siluas impeditas vallo atque fossis munitur, i. e. what the Britons call a Town, is a thick wood fenced with a ditch and a rampart.

(b) This he in-crims us of, in his Nero Cæsar,
p. 82.

10. He also wrote 'The Life of the Emperor Tiberius (b).' The time and place of our author's death are unknown.

24. Of English witts, and authors, with censures upon the cheif.

25. How the cheif care and assignation of armories came to bee a part of the crown-rights, or royal office, and why.

26. Of the law of arms as part of the lawes of nature, and of nations.

27. Of gentemen of bloud, and of name, and of arms, distinctly.

28. Of superscriptions, salutations, compliments in antiquitie among us, and of this Hemistichium in the Satyrists, — guadent prænominē molles.

29. Of old alligance.

30. Of praise and glorie for witt or learning.

31. Whither euer any Englishman attained to the height of commendation in any kinde of studie.

32. Of mechanical conspiracies in London against the aduancement and enrichment of the learned out of theyr own labours.

33. Of coat-armours in England, and theyr use.

34. Of the studie of the old Britann, Scottish, Pictish, Saxon, Mannish, Cornish; Welshford, and Irish tongues.

35. Of Robin-Hood, and other famous outlawes.

36. Of ancient inuentions appertaining to magnificence among us

37. Of the Historie of England, and of many late ignoble writers in that right noble subject, with censures upon them.

38. Of assuming new coats for antient, upon dislikes to theyr argument, or forms.

39. Whither the whole person of a man or woman may regularlie bee born in armories, being disallowed Impreses.

40. Whither the poetical bodies of a Sphynx, a Pegasus, a Gryfon, a Centaur, a Syren, an Argus, a Gorgon, &c. may regularlie bee born in armories.

41. Whither antient heralds, or heraldrie, were more exact and artificious then the modern.

42. Whither the studies of honor and antiquitie bee among those of that wisdome, which scripture prefers aboue riches.

43. Whither according to the accedence of armories the L. Paget's coat bee a Quadrate roial, and what a Quadrate is.

44. That to honor, and please God, to the glorie and splendor of Prince and countrey, is the supreme cause of the studies of Honor and Antiquitie.

45. How this sentence of Salomon

Fecit Deus hominem rectum, sed ipse se infinitis miscuit quæstionibus, is to bee sensed for our present purpose.

46. That the natural rectitude mentioned therein is only to bee magistratized by the studies of Honor and Antiquitie, in order to God.

EDMUND BOLTON.

Appendix ad Heroicum Agonem.

1. Of mere Materiators, enemies of style, and of mere Logodadalists, or phrase-wrights, enemies of matter.

2. That it is more profitable for uirtue among us to found a college for the studies of Honor and Antiquitie of Brittain, then to erect a Librarie as bigg as K. Ptolomes.

3. That the sphears of Cyclopedia move within the circle of Philarchæa.

4. That it would supplie the defect of a censor's office in the policie of our countrey, if the antient courses for noting coat armours with marks of bearers uices were recalled (17).

EDMUND BOLTON.

(17) Bibl. Cotton, Faustina, E. I. 7. fol. 63.

BOND (JOHN) a celebrated Grammarian of the XVIth century, was born in Somersetshire, and educated in Grammar learning at Winchester school. In 1569, being then nineteen years of age, he was entered a student in the university of Oxford, where he became either one of the Clerks or Chaplains of New College, and was much noted for his great proficiency in academical learning. In 1573, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts; and in 1579, that of Master; and soon after was promoted by the Warden and Fellows of New College, to the mastership of the free-school of Taunton St Mary Magdalen in Somersetshire: in which station he continued many years, and taught school with such great success, that many of his scholars proved afterwards eminent both in Church and State. Being at length tired of the drudgery of a school, he turned his thoughts to the study of Physick, though he had not taken any degree in that faculty, which he practised rather for pleasure than profit, and became very eminent therein. Mr Bond died the third of August, 1612, possessed of several lands and tenements in Taunton, Wilton near Taunton, and Newenton, and was buried [A] in the chancel of the church of Taunton (a). We have his Commentaries on Horace and Persius [B].

(a) Wood, Athen. Oxon. Vol. 1. col. 379.

(1) Wood, Athen. Oxon. Vol. 1. col. 379.

[A] — and was buried, &c.] Over his grave was put the following Epitaph (1).

Qui Medicus doctus, prudentis nomine clarus,
Eloquii splendor, pieridumque decus,
Virtutis cultor, pietatis vixit amicus,
Hic jacet in tumulo; spiritus alta tenet,

In English:

*Skill'd in the healing art, for prudence fam'd,
To crown whose memory the Muses love,
Who liv'd to vertue and her friend's a friend,
Here lies in dust, his spirit soars above.*

[B] We have his Commentaries on Horace and Persius.] His Horace has been several times printed, viz. Lond. 1606, 8vo; Han. 1621, 8vo; and Ludg. Batav. 1653, 8vo. His Persius was printed at London, 1614, in 8vo, cum posthumis Commentariis Johannis Bond; i. e. 'with the posthumous Commentaries of Mr John Bond.' It was published after the author's death by Roger Prowse, who had married his daughter Elizabeth (2), who in the dedication to Dr Montague, Bishop of Bath and Wells, informs us, that his father-in-law had not put the last hand to these Commentaries; which may be the reason of those considerable defects, especially with regard to some points of History and Philosophy, which M. Baillet tells us (3) are to be found in them. However, this author's notes on Horace and Persius are esteemed, as well as Farnaby's, on account of their conciseness, and are chiefly used by the younger students in our universities, and in most schools.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Jugemens des Savans, Tom. 11. n. 522. p. 241.

T

BONNEL L (JAMES) a man of strict virtue, and exemplary piety, was born at Genoa the 14th of November, 1653, being the son of Samuel Bonnell, Merchant (a), who resided some time at Genoa, and of Rebecca, daughter of Thomas Sayer, near Norwich, Esq; His grand-father was Daniel Bonnell of London, Merchant, and his great-grand-father, Thomas Bonnell, a gentleman of a good family near Ipres in Flanders, who, to avoid the Duke of Alva's persecution, removed with his family into England, and settled at Norwich, of which, before his death, he was chosen Mayor. Samuel Bonnell, father of James Bonnell, being bred up under that eminent Merchant, Sir W. Courteen, Knt. applied himself to the Italian trade, at Leghorn and Genoa, with such success, that about 1649, he was worth at least 10,000 l. and his credit much greater than his fortune. But both were soon impaired by several accidents, by great losses at sea, and particularly by his zeal for King Charles II, during his exile, and the rest of the Royal Family, which he privately supplied with large sums of money. About 1655, he removed with his family into England: And, at the Restoration, on account of the services he had done the Royal Family, and, as a compensation (b) for the large sums he had advanced them, (which, it seems, were never repaid otherwise) there was granted him a patent to be Accountant-General of the Revenue of Ireland, a place worth about 800 l. a year; his son's life being included in the patent with his own. But this he was not long possessed of, for he died in 1664, leaving his son, of whom I am now to speak, and one daughter. — After James Bonnell had been instructed in the first rudiments of learning at Dublin (c), he was sent to Trym-school, where he was eminent for sweetness of temper, and for a most innocent, gentle, and religious behaviour. At fourteen years of age, he left that place, and was sent to a private Philosophy School in Oxfordshire (d), kept by one Cole, who had formerly been Principal of St Mary-hall in Oxford; and staid there two years and a half. But finding his master was too remiss in matters of morality and religion, a thing quite unfuitable with his strict temper, and observing, there were in that place all the dangers and vices of the university, without the advantages, he removed to Katharine-Hall in Cambridge, where he prosecuted his studies with indefatigable diligence, and performed all his exercises with general approbation. After taking his degrees in Arts, he removed into the family of Ralph Freeman of Aspeden-Hall in Hertfordshire, Esq; as tutor to his eldest son (e); and there continued 'till 1678, when, going with his pupil into Holland, he stayed about a year in Sir Leoline Jenkins's family, at Nimeguen. From Nimeguen he went in the Ambassador's company through Flanders and Holland; and returning to England, continued with his pupil 'till 1683, when Mr Freeman was sent into France and Italy. In 1684 Mr Bonnell went into France, and met Mr Freeman at Lyons; and in his company visited several parts of France. Leaving Mr Freeman in France, he went directly from thence into Ireland (f), and took his employment of Accountant-General into his own hands, which had, since his father's death, been managed by others for his use. In the discharge of it, he behaved in so obliging a manner, and with so much diligence and faithfulness, that he soon equally gained the esteem of the government, and the love of all who were concerned with him. During the troublesome reign of K. James II, he neither unworthily deserted his employment (g), as others did; nor came into the arbitrary and illegal measures of the court; and yet was continued in his office [A], without his desiring it: which proved a great advantage to the Protestant interest in Ireland, since, whatever he received out of his place, he liberally distributed among the poor oppressed Protestants, taking all opportunities to relieve the injured, and boldly pleading for them with those who were then in power. But though his place was very advantageous, and he had in it great opportunities of doing good; yet, either the weight of that employment, or his ill state of health, or else his desire of entering into holy orders, (which he designed for a considerable time (h), but never effected) made him resolve to quit it; and he accordingly parted with it (i) to another person in 1693. — In the whole course of his life (k) he behaved in so upright and worthy a manner, that he was courted by his superiors, and revered by his equals. For, with regard to piety, to justice [B], and charity, to sobriety and temperance, few have outdone him. His devotion, though very intense, was calm and governable, confined within the strictest bounds of sobriety and reason, and free from the least appearance of affectation (l). His charity was also very extensive (m), for he commonly gave away the eighth part of his yearly income to the poor [C]. And, for humility, meekness, and a contempt of the world, he

(a) Life of James Bonnell, Esq; by W. Hamilton, Lond. 1718, 4th edit. p. 1, &c. Memoirs communicated.

(b) Memoirs communicated.

(c) Life of J. Bonnell, Esq; p. 4.

(d) Ibid. p. 89.

(e) Ibid. p. 12, 13.

(f) Ibid. p. 30.

(g) Memoirs, ut supra. Life of J. Bonnell, Esq; p. 47, 54.

(h) Ibid. p. 31, 34, 71, &c.

(i) Ibid. p. 71, 72.

(k) Memoirs, ubi supra.

(l) Life of J. Bonnell, Esq; p. 133.

(m) Page 215.

was

[A] And yet was continued in his office. Such an openness and sincerity shined in all his actions, such unshaken fidelity was his rule and guide, so known an enemy was he to faction and intrigue, that he was not only free from blame, but even suspicion; and the enemies of his religion revered his person. Life of J. Bonnell, Esq; p. 39. But it seems one reason of his being continued in his employment was, because at that time they could not be without his knowledge, nor do without him, in the revenue. Ibid. p. 275.

[B] To justice, &c. He never knew what gratuity or reward meant, confining his gains entirely to his salary. Life, &c. p. 209.

[C] He commonly gave away the eighth part of his yearly income, &c. He was eminent likewise for charity towards those who differed from him in opinion. ' Though no man was firmer to the Protestant religion ' established among us, and more truly zealous to support and enlarge it; yet force and violence he ' esteemed the fittest means in the world to attain ' that end. And he utterly condemned all persecutions for religion, and violence to mens consciences. ' — His charity was so generous and noble, that it ' effectually secured him from all narrowness of temper, and moreness of behaviour, towards those ' who differed from him in opinion. He used frequently to say, that most differences among Christians ' were chiefly in words, and that their sentiments were ' much

(n) His widow, in a Letter.

(o) Bishop of Londonderry's Letter in Pref to Mr Bonnell's Life, p. xvii.

(p) Life, &c. p. 80.

(q) Ibid. p. 76.

(r) Ibid. p. 72, 77.

was a pattern to all. Nay, a person who had the best opportunity of knowing him thoroughly, declares (n), 'I can with truth say, I never knew him do a thing, or heard him say a word, that I would have wished undone or unsaid, if he had died the next hour.'—He had, withal, an accuracy and exactness in his judgment that few can equal (o). And he was master of the accomplishing, as well as necessary parts of learning; had thoroughly digested the Greek and Roman authors, understood French perfectly well, and had made good progress in the Hebrew (p). In Philosophy and Oratory, he exceeded most of his contemporaries in the university; and applied himself with good success to Mathematicks and Musick. In the course of his studies, he read several of the Fathers; and translated some parts of Synesius into English [D]. This worthy person died of a malignant fever, April 28, 1699, and was buried in St John's church in Dublin (q). In 1693, he married Jane, daughter of Sir Albert Conyngham (r), by whom he had three children; whereof only one daughter survived him, but she died not long after his decease. A very neat monument of white marble was erected to his memory [E], by his relif, with an inscription given below in the note.

'much nearer than their expressions, — The divisions which prevail among Christians he heartily bewailed; he saw how much of passion and worldly interest there was in them, and how destructive they are to piety and charity. But then he considered, that charity obliged him to look upon all Christians as his brethren, as children of the same father, and members of the same family to which he belonged, and consequently that he must not hate nor persecute any of them; that he ought to lament their divisions, and do all that in him lay to heal their breaches and cure their animosities, but still they had a right to his charity and to his prayers.' Life of Bonnell, p. 222, 223, 225.

[D] And translated some parts of Synesius into English. There is however nothing of his published, but some Meditations and Prayers inserted in his life, and a Harmony of the Gospels done by another hand, but reformed and improved by James Bonnell, Esq; for his own use; printed at London for Joseph Downing.

[E] A very neat monument of white marble was erected to his memory, &c. At the top there is a bust of his head, underneath which are his arms. The inscription is as follows.

P. M. S.

Jacobi Bonnelli armigeri, cujus exuvia una cum Patris, et duorum filiorum Alberti et Samuelis, juxta sitæ sunt. Regibus Carolo 2^o Jacobo 2^o et Guilielmo 3^o erat a rationibus generalibus in Hiberniâ, temporibus licet incertis. Dominis fidus, ab omni factione immunis, nemini suspectus, omnibus charus. Natus est Novembris 14^o 1653, Patre Samuele, qui propter suppetias Regiæ familiæ largiter exhibitas, officio computatoris generalis Fisci Hibernici Anno Domini 1661, una cum Filio remuneratus est. Avo Daniele, Proavo Thoma, qui sub Duce Albano religionis ergo Flandriâ Patriâ suâ exul, Norvicum in Angliâ profugit, ubi mox Civis, et demum Prætor. Pietate avitâ, & bene congenitâ, imo primævâ & Apostolicâ, eruditione, prudentiâ, probitate, comitate, et morum simplicitate conspicuus. Manuædine, patientiâ, et super omnia chaitate insignis, Urbem hanc exemplo, et præceptis, meliorem, morte, mæstam reliquit. Obiit Aprilis 28. 1699. Monumentum hoc ingentis doloris publici, præsertim sui, exiguum pro meritis, posuit uxor mæstissima Jana Coninghamorum gente.

(a) Strype's Annals of the Reformation, Vol. I. 2d edit. 1723, fol. p. 575.

(b) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721. Vol. I. col. 158.

(c) Idem, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 27.

(d) Athen. ubi supra.

(e) Id. Fasti, ut supra, col. 39.

(f) Stow's Annals, edit 1631, fol. p. 556. Hollinshed's Chronicle, edit. 1587, p. 915.

BONNER (EDMUND) Bishop of London in the XVIth century, was born at Hanley in Worcestershire, being the son of an honest poor man of that place [A]. He was maintained at school by ——— Lechmore, ancestor to Nicholas Lechmore, Esq; one of the Barons of the Exchequer in the reign of the late King William (a). About the year 1512, he became a student in Broadgate-hall in Oxford, now Pembroke-college, then a famous nursery for Civilians and Canonists (b). Having made a sufficient progress in Philosophy and the Laws, he was admitted, on the 12th of June 1519, Bachelor of the Canon, and the day following, Bachelor of the Civil Law (c). He entered into holy orders about that time, and had some employment in the diocese of Worcester (d). On the 12th of July 1525, he was created Doctor of the Canon Law (e). He did not distinguish himself by his learning, but by his skill and dexterity in the management of affairs: For which he was much taken notice of by Cardinal Wolsey, who made him his Commissary for the Faculties. And he was with that Prelate at Cawood, when he was arrested of high-treason (f). At one and the same time he enjoyed these several ecclesiastical preferments; the livings of Blaydon, and Cherry-Burton in Yorkshire; of Ripple in Worcestershire; of East-Dereham in Norfolk; and the Prebend of Chiswick in the cathedral church of St Paul: but this he resigned in 1539, as he did his church of East-Dereham, in 1540 (*).

(*) Newcourt, Repertorium, &c. Vol. I. p. 26, 140. & Wood, Athenæ, ubi supra.

He

[A] The son of an honest poor man of that place. The common notion is, that he was the natural son of George Savage, Priest, rector of Davenham in Cheshire, natural son of Sir John Savage of Clifton in the said county, Knight of the Garter, and one of the Council to King Henry VII; which George Savage had seven natural children by three sundry women, viz. George Savage, Chancellor of Chester; John Wymesly, rector of Torperley in Cheshire, and made Archdeacon of London by his brother Edmund Bonner; Randal Savage of Lodge in the said county; Edmund Bonner, born of Elizabeth Frodsham, who was the wife (after Bonner had been begotten) of Edmund Bonner, a Sawyer, living with a gentleman called Armingham of Potters-Hanley in Worcestershire; besides three daughters, Margaret, Ellen, and Elizabeth (1). But Mr Strype informs us (2), that the late Baron Lechmore assured him, Bonner was certainly legitimately begotten, and born at Hanley in Worcestershire, of one Bonner, an honest poor man, in a house called Bonner's Place to this day, a little cottage of about five pounds a year; and that his great-grandfather, Bishop Bonner's intimate friend and acquaintance, purchased that estate of the Bishop in Queen Elizabeth's time, and that he had it still in his possession. He added, that there was an extraordinary friendship between the Bishop and his said great-grandfather; inasmuch, that the Bishop made leases to him of the value of 1000 l. a year, two whereof he remembered were Fering and Kelvedon in Essex. And that he had been told by some of his family, that Bonner shewed this kindness to this Gentleman out of gratitude, his father, or some of the relations, having put him out to school. But as to his birth the Baron said, he thought he could make it out beyond exception, that Bonner was begotten in lawful wedlock. And that he had several letters yet in his keeping between the Bishop and his great-grandfather, but of private matters.

(1) Wood, Ath. ubi supra. Godwin, de Præfulibus, edit. 1616, 4to, p. 250.

(2) Annals, ubi supra.

[B] H.

He was likewise Archdeacon of Leicester, into which he was installed, October 17, 1535 (g). After the Cardinal's, his patron's, death, being a forward and pushing man, he insinuated himself into the good graces of K. Henry VIII; and became one of his chaplains, a favourer of the Lutherans, a promoter of that King's divorce from Q. Katharine of Spain, and of all his proceedings in abrogating the Pope's supremacy in this kingdom (h). He found means likewise to insinuate himself into the favour of Thomas Cromwell [B], Secretary of State, by whose recommendation he was employed as Ambassador at several courts (i). Particularly, in 1532, he was sent to Rome, along with Sir Edward Karne, to excuse K. Henry's personal appearance, or by proxy there, upon the Pope's citation for that purpose: And since there were, upon that occasion, many threatnings to be used to the Pope and Cardinals, he was thought fittest for the employment, as being a very bold man (k). Again, in 1533, he was sent to Pope Clement VII, then at Marseilles, upon the excommunication decreed at Rome, against King Henry VIII, on account of his divorce; to deliver that King's appeal, from the Pope to the next General Council lawfully called: And he delivered the threatnings he was ordered to make, with so much vehemence and fury, that the Pope talked of throwing him into a cauldron of melted lead, or of burning him alive; whereupon he apprehending some danger, made his escape (l). He was employed likewise in other embassies, to the Kings of Denmark and France, and to the Emperor of Germany (m). In 1538, being then Ambassador in France (n) [C], he was nominated to the Bishopric of Hereford: He had the royal assent to his election, November 27, and the temporalities were restored to his proctor, March the 4th following (o). But, before Consecration he was translated to London; of which he was elected Bishop, October 20 (p), 1539; confirmed the 12th of November ensuing; took a commission from the King for the exercise of his ecclesiastical jurisdiction, immediately after (q); had restitution of his temporalities the 18th day of November just now mentioned; and was consecrated in his own cathedral, April 4, 1540, and enthroned the 16th of the same month (r). At the time of the King's death, in 1547, he was Ambassador with the Emperor Charles V (s). He had appeared, during that reign, zealous against the Pope; and concurred generally in the several steps taken to bring about a Reformation in this kingdom [D]. But it was either out of ambition, because he knew that to be the readiest way to preferment; or else out of a dread of the King's furious and violent temper, who would not be contradicted. For, he was all the while a thorough Papist in his heart, as appeared by his subsequent conduct. Among other instances; on the first of September,

1547,

[B] He found means likewise to insinuate himself into the favour of Thomas Cromwell.] And to him it was he chiefly owed his preferments and dignities, as he thankfully acknowledges in the following letter to that Lord, written from Blois in France, 2d September, 1538. 'My very singular especial good Lord, as one most bounden, I most humbly commend me unto your honourable good Lordship. And whereas in times past it hath liked the same, without any my desertes or merites, even only of your singular exceeding goodnes, to bestowe a great deale of love, benevolence and good affection upon me so poore a man, and of so small qualities, expressing in deede, fondry wayes, the good effectes thereof to my great preferment; I was very much bounde thereby unto your honourable good Lordship, and thought it alway my duetie (as indeede it was) both to beare my true hart againe unto your Lordship, and also remembering suche kindnes, to doe unto the same all such service and pleasure as might then lie in my smal power to do. But where of your infinite and inestimable goodnes, it hath further liked you of late, first to advance me unto the office of Legation from such a Prince as my soveraigne Lorde is, unto the Emperour and French King, and next after to procure and obtayne mine advancement to so honourable a promotion as the Bythoprike of Hereford: I must here knowledge the exceeding greatnes of your Lordshippes benefite, with mine own imbecillitie to recompence it. - - - &c (3).'

[C] Being then Ambassador in France.] But he was recalled from thence this year, at the desire of the King of France, to whom he had spoken a little too freely upon the following occasion. An English traitor skulking in France, King Henry ordered his Ambassador, Bonner, to demand him; but the King of France refused to deliver him up. Whereupon Bonner told that King, that in so doing he acted 'against God, against his honour, against justice, against reason, against honesty, against friendship, against all law, against the treaties and leagues between him and his brother the King of England, yea and against all together.' At which King Francis was so nettled, that he bid him write these three things to the King his master. '1. That his Ambassador was a great fool. '2. That he caused better justice to be done in his realm in one hour, than they did in England in a whole year. 3. That if it were not for the love of his master, he should have an hundred strokes with an halbert, &c.' And never rested till he had him recalled (4). At this time Bonner was greatly in the Lord Cromwell's favour, who was setting him up against Bishop Gardiner (5).

[D] And concurred generally in the several steps taken to bring about a Reformation in this kingdom.] J. Foxe assures us in general (6), that 'he was a great furtherer of King Henry's proceedings, and at first a favourer of Luther's doctrine.' — And as for particular instances of his concurring in the Reformation; we find, that, whilst he was Ambassador at Paris, he zealously promoted the printing of the English Bible there; and, after he was made Bishop of London, caused six of them to be set up in St Paul's cathedral (7). He was likewise one of those who subscribed to the Bishops book against the Pope (8). He put a Preface to Bishop Gardiner's book De vera Obolentia, in which he very plainly speaks against the Pope's exactions, and his false pretended Supremacy. Finally, when he was made Bishop of London he took an oath, 'never to consent or agree that the Bishop of Rome should practise, exercise, or have any manner of authority, jurisdiction, or power within this realm, or any other the King's dominions, but that he would resist the same at all times to the utmost of his power; and that from thenceforth he should accept, repute and take the King's Majesty to be the only supreme Head in earth of the Church of England; and, to the utmost of his power, observe and maintain all Acts and Statutes, made and to be made in extirpation and extinguishment of the Bishop of Rome and his authority, and in corroboration of the King's supremacy, against all persons whatsoever; and repute any oath he had made in maintenance, or favour, of the Bishop of Rome, vain and annihilate (9).' Yet, not long after, he acted in a Commission for the due execution of the Six Articles, and profecuted several persons upon the same. So complying was he with all changes, especially when they tended to promote Poperie (10)!

[E] And

(g) Fasti Eccles. Anglicanæ, &c. by J. Le Neve, Lond. 1716, fol. p. 164.

(h) Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

(i) Ibid. and J. Foxe's Acts and Monuments, &c. edit. 1; 83, Vol. II. p. 1088.

(k) Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, Vol. I. 2d edit. 1687, p. 120.

(l) Ibid. p. 134.

(m) Wood, ubi supra, and Life of King Henry VIII, by the Lord Herbert, in Complete Hist. of England, edit. 1706, Vol. II. p. 182.

(n) Wood, ut supra, col. 159. Godwin de Prefulibus, edit. 1616, 4to. p. 250. and Newcourt, and J. Foxe, ubi supra.

(o) Conventiones, Acta Publica, &c. published by Rymer, Vol. XIV. p. 599, 601.

(p) Wood says it was Octob. 1. Ubi supra.

(q) See Furnet, as above; in the Collection of Records, book iii. No. 14. p. 184.

(r) Wharton. de Episcop. Londin. 8vo. Newcourt, ubi supra.

(s) Wood, ubi supra.

(4) Ibid. p. 1093.

(5) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 249.

(6) Ubi supra, p. 1088.

(7) Ibid. p. 1191, 1206.

(8) Ibid. p. 1064.

(9) Ibid. p. 1093.

(10) Ibid. p. 1292. and Burnet, ubi supra, p. 290.

(3) J. Foxe, ubi supra, p. 1088.

1547, not many months after the accession of King Edward VI. he scrupled to take an oath, to renounce and deny the Bishop of Rome, with his usurped authority, and to swear obedience to the King, according to the statute 31 Henry VIII, and entered a protestation [E] against the King's injunctions and homilies (t). For which he became so obnoxious, that he was committed to the Fleet [F], though he submitted, and recanted his protestation (u). However, he was soon released (w): From which time he complied outwardly with the several steps taken to advance the Reformation [G], but used privately all means in his power to obstruct it. And yet he behaved so cautiously, that no legal advantage could be taken against him. But after the Lord Thomas Seymour's death, and the insurrections in several parts of the kingdom, he visibly appeared remiss in putting the court's orders in execution, particularly that relating to the use of the Common-Prayer-book, for which he was severely reproved by the Privy-council [H]. He seemed thereupon to redouble his diligence: But, notwithstanding, through his evil example, and especially his slackness in preaching, and his connivance at the mass in several places, many people in London, and elsewhere in his diocese, being observed to withdraw from the divine service and communion; this was laid to his charge, as a neglect in the execution of the King's laws and injunctions. So, the Council writ to him, on the 23d of July, 1549, to see to the correcting of these things, and that he should give good example himself. Upon which, on the 26th following, he sent about a charge to have the order in this letter executed, which he said he was most willing to do. Yet still it was observed, that whatsoever obedience he gave, was against his will (x). Therefore he was convened before the Privy-council on the 11th of August, when, after a sharp reproof of his negligence, he was enjoined to preach the Sunday three weeks after, at Paul's-cross, on some articles then delivered to him [I]; and also to preach there once a quarter for the future,

(t) J. Foxe's Acts and Monuments, &c. edit. 1583, Vol. II, p. 1309, 1310.

(u) His recantation is in Foxe, ubi supra, p. 1310. He first offered another, which being full of quiddities was rejected. Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, Part II, p. 36, 2d edit.

(w) Foxe, ibid.

(x) Burnet, ibid. p. 121, 122, and Foxe, as above, p. 1303, 1304.

[E] And entered a protestation.] Which was as follows: 'I do receive these Injunctions and Homilies, with this Protestation, that I will observe them, if they be not contrary and repugnant to God's Law, and the Statutes and Ordinances of the Church.' And immediately added with an oath, that he had never read the said Homilies and Injunctions (11).

(11) Foxe, ibid. p. 1309, and Burnet, ubi supra, in the Collection of Records, p. 112.

[F] That he was committed to the Fleet.] Mr Rappin makes this judicious reflection upon that occasion. 'The truth is, as several Acts in favour of the Reformation were intended to be passed in the ensuing Parliament, which was called for the 4th of November, the Reformers were very glad to free themselves from the troublesome opposition of this Prelate (12). He was released November 17 (13).

(12) Hist. of England, Vol. II, edit. 1733, p. 9.

(13) Heylyn's Hist. of the Reformation, p. 42.

[G] He complied outwardly with the several steps taken to advance the Reformation.] For instance; he readily transmitted to the Bishop of Westminster, the Archbishop's Letter for omitting the carrying of Candles on Candlemas-day, and of Alives and Palms on Ash-Wednesday and Palm-Sunday; likewise another for abolishing of Images, and one to the Dean and Chapter of St Paul's for suppressing private Masses in that cathedral (14). In a word, 'he executed every order that was sent him so readily, (as Burnet observes) that there was not so much as ground for any complaint (15).'

(14) J. Foxe, ubi supra, p. 1299, 1300, 1302.

(15) Hist. of the Reformation, as above, Part II, p. 121.

[H] For which he was severely reproved by the Privy-Council.] In a letter they writ to him July 23, 1549; wherein, among other things, they tell him, — that 'one uniforme order for Common Prayer and administration of the Sacraments having been set forth, — whereby much idolatry, wayne superstition, and great slanderous abuses be taken away; it was no small occasion of sorrow to them, to understand by the complaints of many, that the said book remained, in many places of the realm, either not known at all, or not used, or at the least very seldom, and in a light and irreverent manner. The fault whereof (add they) we must impute to you, and other of your vocation.' — In the conclusion they tell him — 'If we shall hereafter (these our letters and commandments notwithstanding) have estoones complaint, and finde the like faults in your dioces, we shall have just cause to impute the fault thereof, and of all that ensue thereof, unto you; and consequently be occasioned thereby to see otherwyse to the redresse of these things, whereof we would be sorry. And therefore we do estoones charge and command you upon your allegiance, to loke well upon your duty herein, as ye tender our pleasure, &c (16).'

(16) Foxe, as above, p. 1303.

[I] On some articles then delivered to him.] Being as follows. 1. That all such as rebel against their Prince, get unto their damnation, and those that resist the higher power, resist the ordinances of God, and he that dieth therefore in rebellion, by the woordes

God is utterly damned, and so looseth bothe bodye and soule. And therefore those Rebelles in Devonshire and Cornewall, in Northfolke, or elsewhere, who taking upon them to assemble a power and force against their King and Prince, against the lawes and statutes of the realme, and goe about to subvert the state and order of the commonwealth, not onely do deserve death, as traytors and rebels, but do accumulate to themselves eternal damnation, even to be in the burning fire of hell, with Lucifer the father and first author of pride, disobedience and rebellion, what pretence soever they have, and what Masses or holy water soever they pretende, or go about to make among themselves, as Chore, Dathan and Abiron, for rebellion against Moses, were swallowed downe alive into hell, although they pretended to sacrifice unto God. 2. Likewise in the order of the Church and externe rites and ceremonies of divine service, for so muche as God requireth humility of heart, innocencie of living, knowledge of him, charity and love to our neighbours, and obedience to his woorde, and to his Ministers and superioure powers, these we must bring to all our prayers, to all our service, and this is the sacrifice that Christe requireth, and these be those that make all thynges pleasaunt unto God. The externe rites and ceremonies be but exercises of our religion, and appointable by superior powers, in chosing whereof we must obey the Magistrates; the whyche things also we do see ever hath bene and shal be (as the time and place is) divers, and yet al hath pleased God so long as these before-spoken inward things be there. If any man shall use the old rites, and thereby disobey the superior power, the devotion of his ceremonies is made nought by his disobedience; so that, which els (so long as the lawe did so stand) myghte be good, by pride and disobedience nowe is made nought; as Saules sacrifice, Chore, Dathan, and Abiron, and Aaron's two children were. But who that joineth to devotion obedience, hee winneth the garland. For else it is a zeale sed non secundum scientiam, a wil, desire, zeale and devotion, but not after wisedome, that is a foolishe devotion, which can require no thanks or praise. And yet agayne, where ye obey, yee must have devotion, for God requireth the heart more than the outward doings, and therefore who that taketh the communion, or sayth or heareth the service appoynted by the King's Majestie, must bring devotion and inward prayer with him, or els his prayers are but vaine, lacking that whyche God requireth, that is, the heart and minde to pray to him. 3. Further, yee shal for example on Sunday come seventh night after the aforesayd date, celebrate the Communion at Pauls church. 4. Ye shal also set forth in your sermon, that our authoritie of royal power (17) is (as of truth it is) of no lesse authoritic and force in this our young age, then is, or was of any of our predecessors, though the same (17) i. e. The King's.

future, and be present at every sermon made there, except hindered by sickness, or other reasonable cause: to celebrate the Communion in that church, on all the principal feasts: to convene before him, and punish, such as did not come unto, and frequent the Common-Prayer, and service in the church, or did not come to God's board, and receive the Communion at least once a year: to search out and convene before him, more diligently than he had done, all adulterers: to keep the cathedral of St Paul's, and other churches in London, in due repair, and see that the tithes were duly paid to the respective incumbents: And, to abide and keep residence in his house in London, 'till he had licence from the Council to depart elsewhere (y). On the day appointed for his preaching, which was September 1, he made a sermon to a crowded audience (assembled on purpose to hear what he would say) on the points delivered to him. But he said not a word of the last, namely, 'of the King's royal power being of no less authority and force in his youth, than was that of any of his predecessors; and therefore that all his subjects were as much bound to obey him, as if he had been thirty or forty years old.' For this contempt, he was complained of to the King by John Hooper, afterwards Bishop of Worcester, and William Latimer, B. D. (z), whereupon Commissioners were appointed [K] to proceed summarily against him. He appeared before them September 10, 13, 16, 18, 20, 23, and October 1; and, after a long trial [L], was committed to the Marshalsey, and towards the end of October, deprived of his Bishopric (a). But he most severely revenged himself afterwards on his prosecutors. Not long after the accession of Queen Mary to the throne, he was restored to his Bishopric; namely, by a commission dated August 22, 1553 (b), which was read in St Paul's cathedral, the 5th of September following (c). In the Convocation which met in 1554, he was made Vicegerent, and President of the same [M], in the room of Archbishop Cranmer, newly committed to the tower (d). The same year, he visited his Diocese, in order to root up all the seeds of the Reformation (e), and was guilty of several furious and extravagant actions [N]. On the 25th of October, he sent an order to all parsons and curates within his Diocese, to put out such passages of scripture as had been painted on the church-walls, in the late King Edward's time (f): And set up the Mass again at St Paul's, before the act for restoring it was passed (g). The same year, he was in a commission to turn out some of the reformed Bishops (h). After he was reinstated in his see, he would not allow of several leases made

(y) Foxe, p. 1304, 1305. and Burnet, ubi supra, p. 121, 122.

(z) Foxe, ubi supra, p. 1311.

(a) Ibid. p. 1310 — 1320. Newcourt, ex Reg. Bonner, p. 210, says it was Octob 1; but it appears from Foxe, that the sentence was pronounced after that day.

(b) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 247.

(c) Registr. Bonner, c. 764. Immediately after he deprived all married Priests in his diocese of their livings, without staying for the Queen's order. Life of Archbishop Cranmer, by J. Strype, fol. p. 328, 329.

(d) Foxe, ubi supra, p. 1426.

(e) Ibid. p. 1474.

(f) Ibid. p. 1475. Burnet, Part ii. p. 289, 290, 291.

(g) Nov. 29. Burnet, ibid. p. 276.

(h) Ibid. p. 274, and Collect.

by were much elder, as may appear by example of Josias, and other young Kings in scripture; and therefore, all our subjects to be no less bound to the obedience of our precepts, laws, and statutes, than if we were of thirty or forty years of age (18).

[K] Whereupon Commissioners were appointed. Being Archbishop Cranmer, Bishop Ridley; Sir William Petre, and Sir Thomas Smith, Secretaries of State; and William May, LL. D. and Dean of St Paul's. Their Commission was dated Sept. 8, 1549 (19).

[L] And after a long trial. The matter laid to his charge was, 'Disobedience to the King's Majesty, in that he did not set forth in his sermon the King's royal power in his minority, according to the tenor of the article delivered to him for that purpose.' But he endeavoured to turn it off, and to make people think, that he was called to answer, not for his contemptuous disobedience, but for matters of religion; saying, that the cause of his trouble was not for the matter they pretended against him, but because he set forth in his sermon the true presence of the body and blood of Jesus Christ to be in the Sacrament of the altar. And he strove to blacken his accusers, by representing them as evil, infamed, and notorious criminal persons, manifest and notable hereticks and seducers of the people, especially touching the Sacrament of the altar; consequently excommunicate, and therefore not to be admitted as witnesses. Particularly concerning Hooper he said, 'where I preached and affirmed the very true body and blood of our Saviour Jesus Christ to be in the Sacrament of the altar, the selfsame in substance that was hanged and shed upon the crosse; he [Hooper] like an asse (as he is an asse indeed) falsely changed and turned the word that into as, like an asse, saying that I had said, as it hanged, and as it was shed upon the crosse (20). At another time he said to one of his accusers, that he spake like a goose; and to the other, that he spake like a woodcock. He likewise behaved with rudeness towards his judges, calling them pretended Commissioners, and the proceedings against him unjust and unlawful; and the people present daws, woodcocks, fools, &c. (21). The first day of his appearance he exhibited a protestation against the Commissioners jurisdiction (22), and the 20th of September appealed from them to the King, and sent a petition to the Privy-Council, dated the 7th of October, and another dated the 26th of the same month (23). But, notwithstanding all his endeavours, he was committed to the Marshalsey on the 20th of September, for not giving a full and perfect answer to the articles exhibited against him, and for refusing Secretary Smith to be his judge (24). And about the end of October was finally deprived (25). This sentence, we are told (26), was much censured, and by many thought over severe.

[M] He was made Vicegerent and President of the same. And made in it an oration in praise of Priesthood, which shews a great piece of his profound and deep learning, as is well observed by Mr Foxe, who hath preserved this fragment of it (27). 'Wherefore it is to be known, that Priests and Elders be worthy of all men to be worshipped, for the dignity-fake which they have of God, as in Matth. xvi. Whatsoever ye shall loose upon earth, &c. And whatsoever ye shall bind, &c. For a Priest by some means is like Mary the Virgin, and is shewed by three points. As the blessed Virgin by five words did conceive Christ, as it is said Luke i. Fiat mihi secundum verbum tuum; i. e. Be it unto me according to thy word; so the Priest, by five words, doth make the very body of Christ. Even as immediately after the consent of Mary, Christ was all whole in her womb; so immediately after the speaking of the words of consecration, the bread is transfubstantiated into the very body of Christ. — Therefore here is to be known, that the dignity of Priests by some means passeth the dignity of angels, because there is no power given to any of the angels to make the body of Christ; whereby the least Priest may do on earth, that the greatest and highest angel in heaven cannot do. — Wherefore Priests are to be honoured before all Kings of the earth, Princes and Nobles. For a Priest is higher than a King, happier than an Angel, maker of his Creator,' &c. Horrible absurdities (28)!

[N] And was guilty of several furious and extravagant actions. Particularly, at Hadham, he was excessively angry, because the bells did not ring at his coming, and the rood-loft was not decked, nor the Sacrament hanged up. So, swearing and fuming in the church at Dr Bricket the Rector, and calling him knave and heretick, he went to strike at him, but the blow fell upon Sir Thomas Joscelyn's ear, and almost stunned him (29).

(23) Ibid. p. 1325, 1328, 1330.

(24) Ibid. p. 1324 — 1326.

(25) Ibid. p. 1330.

(26) Burnet, ubi supra, Part ii. p. 127, and Collier's Eccles. Hist. Vol. II. p. 281.

(27) Page 1426.

(28) See Foxe, ubi supra, p. 1426.

(29) Ibid. p. 1474.

(18) Foxe, as above, p. 1310, 1311.

(19) Rymer's Acta Regia, Vol. XV. p. 191.

(20) Foxe, as above, p. 1313.

(21) Ibid. p. 1312.

(22) Ibid. p. 1313.

(i) J. Foxe, ubi supra, p. 1768.

(l) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 320.

(l) J. Foxe, Vol. II. Burnet, Part II. Book II.

(m) Burnet, ibid. p. 394.

(n) Ibid. p. 311. and Collect. B. II. No. 20. p. 285. He was usually called the common Cut-throat, and general Slaughter-Slave to all the Bishops of England. Foxe, ubi supra, p. 1842.

(o) Foxe, as above, p. 1881, 1882.

(p) Burnet, as above, p. 341. and Collect. of Records, Book II. No. 23, p. 301.

(q) Ibid. p. 347. and Collect. of Records, B. II. No. 32. p. 311.

by Bishop Ridley to his sister, and other persons, to their great injury (i); though Bonner's mother had been constantly entertained by that Bishop during his residence at Fulham, and treated as if she had been his own mother; besides his kindness to his other friends (k). In the years 1555, 1556, 1557, and 1558, he most inhumanly committed to the flames, and otherwise destroyed, hundreds of innocent persons [O], for their firm adherence to the Protestant Religion, and their refusing to embrace the gross errors of Popery (l). Being known to be fierce and cruel to the utmost degree, Bishop Gardiner, in 1555, left the condemning and burning of Hereticks wholly to him; who undertook it cheerfully (m): But, soon after considering how odious was the employment, he complained that the execution of the laws was left entirely to him, while the rest looked on. Therefore, when the Justices and Sheriffs sent up Hereticks to him, he sent them back, and refused to meddle further. Upon which, the King and Queen writ to him on the 24th of May, admonishing him, that when persons who leaned to any erroneous and heretical opinions were brought unto him, he should endeavour to remove them from their errors, or else proceed against them according to the laws (n). On the 14th of February, 1555-6, he came to Oxford (with Thirlby, Bishop of Ely) to degrade Archbishop Cranmer; whom he used with his wonted insolence (o) [P]. The 29th of December following he was put into a commission to search and raze all registers and records, containing professions against the Pope, scrutinies taken in religious houses, &c (p). And the 8th of February, 1556-7, he was also put in another very unusual commission, or kind of Inquisition, for searching after, and punishing all Hereticks; that is, all persons that were of the Protestant Religion (q). Upon Queen Elizabeth's accession to the throne, he had the confidence to go and meet her at High-gate, with the rest of the Bishops; but she looked on him as so much defiled with blood, that she could not show him any mark of her favour (r). For some months he remained unmolested (s), but being called before the Privy-Council, on the 30th of May 1559, he refused to take the oath of Allegiance and Supremacy then tendered to him (t): Upon which account he was deprived a second time of his Bishopric, the 29th of June following (u); and committed to the Marshalsey (w) [Q]. In pursuance of the statute 5 Eliz. chap. i. the oath of Supremacy being again tendered to him, he was, upon his refusing to take it, indicted of a Præmunire [R], but found means to come off (x). After having lived in his confinement some years, in a cheerful condition, [which made some compare him to Dionysius the tyrant (y), that behaved better in adversity

(r) Ibid. p. 374. She would not give him her hand to kiss. Stow's Annals, edit. 1631, fol. p. 635.

(s) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 396.

(t) Wood, Ath. ubi supra, col. 160.

(u) Strype's Ann. as above, p. 141.

(w) Wood ubi supra. Under a very easy restraint. See Bishop Godwin, ubi supra, p. 251.

(x) Strype's Ann. as above, Vol. I. p. 378, &c. Dyer's Reports, fol. 237. Mich. 6 & 7 Eliz. plac. 15.

(y) Briefe View of the State of the Church of England, &c. by Sir John Harrington, 12mo. Lond. 1653, p. 16.

[O] He most inhumanly committed to the flames, and otherwise destroyed, hundreds of innocent persons.] The persons whom he is recorded to have sent to the flames, or to whose death he was otherwise accessory, were, in 1541, John Porter. In 1546, Anne Akew. In 1554, Laur. Saunders, at Coventry. In the beginning of 1555, John Rogers, and Bishop Hooper. March 16, 26, he caused two to be burnt in Smithfield; and on the 26th one at Raleigh, and one at Horndon on the hill; the 28th one at Braintree, and one at Maldon; the 29th one at Colchester, all in Essex. April 24, one at Westminster. May 30, two in Smithfield. June 10, one at Rochford, one at Raleigh; one at Coggeshall, one at Chelmsford. June 14, one at Colchester; the 15th, one at Manningtree, and one at Harwich, all in Essex. In July, John Bradford, and another, in Smithfield. July 22, one at Lewes; the 23d, one at Stenyng, and one at Chichester, all in Suffex. Aug. 2, one at Bury; Aug. 8, two at Uxbridge; the 26th, one at St Alban's; the 28th, one at Uxbridge; the 31st, one at Walden, and one at Stratford. And likewise, in the same month, one at Stratford, one at Ware, and one at Barnet. December 18, John Philpot. In 1556, January 27, seven in Smithfield. April 24, six in the same place; April 28, six at Colchester. May 25, two at Stratford; the 16th, four in Smithfield. June 6, four at Lewes in Suffex; June 27, thirteen at Stratford. In 1557, March 6, five in Smithfield. August 2, five men and five women at Colchester. September 17, four at Illington. November 18, three in Smithfield. December 22, two in the same place. In 1558, March 28, three in Smithfield. May 26, three at Colchester. June 27, seven in Smithfield (30). July 14, six at Brentford, &c (31). In a word, he is reported to have burnt no less than two hundred in three years (32), besides many imprisoned for him for their religion, who died in different gaols; and others whom he whipped, or caufed to be cruelly tortured.

[P] Whom he used with his wonted insolence.] For, as he was degrading him, he insulted over him in the following manner. 'This is the man who hath ever despised the Pope's holiness, and now is to be judged by him. This is the man who hath pulled down so many churches, and now is come to be judged in a church. This is the man that contemned the blessed Sacrament of the altar, and now is come to be condemned afore that blessed Sacrament hanging over the altar. This is the man, that like Lucifer, sat in the place of Christ upon an altar to judge others, and now is come before an altar to be judged himself (33).' This last sentence alludes to the Archbishop's sitting at Bonner's trial, on a Scaffold erected for that purpose in St Paul's church, and it seems over one of the side-altars; but the Archbishop declares he knew it not.

[Q] And committed to the Marshalsey.] It shewed, as Dr Burnet observes (34), a great temper in the whole nation, that such a man as Bonner had been, was suffered to go about in safety, and was not made a sacrifice to the revenge of those who had lost their near friends by his means. — There were great complaints made against him, that he had in many things, in the prosecution of those that were presented for Heresy, exceeded what the Law allowed; so that it was much desired to have him made an example. But as the Queen was of her own nature merciful, so the reformed Divines had learned in the Gospel, not to render evil for evil.

[R] Indicted of a Præmunire.] Of which the punishment is, to be out of the King's protection, forfeit lands and goods, and be imprisoned and ranfomed at the King's pleasure; and if not to be found, outlawed (35). As he was going back from the place where the oath was tendered to him, to the Marshalsey, one of the multitude that stood gazing at him, said, 'The Lord confound, or else turn thy heart?' To whom he answered, 'The Lord fend thee to keep thy breath to cool thy porridge.' To another saying, 'The Lord overthrow thee;' he said, 'The Lord make thee as wise as a woodcock.' And in his lodgings afterwards, a Minister endeavouring to persuade him by many arguments to yield, and acknowledge the Queen's supremacy, he answered him tauntingly, 'By God, you are well learned.' To whom the Minister said, 'Where learned you, Mr Bonner, to swear?' — 'I pray you, said he, did not Christ swear, Amen, Amen, dico vobis;' i. e. Verily, verily, I say unto you (36).

(33) Foxe, as above, p. 1882.

(34) Ubi supra. Part II. p. 396.

(35) Statut. 16. Ric. II. c. 5.

(36) Strype's Annals, ubi supra, p. 378, 379.

[S] Added

(30) When these were led out to be burnt, it was proclaimed in the Queen's name, that no man should pray for them, or speak to them, or say, God help them. Burnet, as above, Part II. p. 364.

(31) See J. Foxe, Vol. II. throughout, and Burnet, as above, Part II. Book II.

(32) J. Collier's Eccles. Hist. Vol. II. p. 396, and J. Foxe, as above, p. 2043.

verity than prosperity] he died there September 5, 1569 (z). Three days after, he was buried, at midnight, in St George's church-yard in Southwark (a); attended with some of his Popish friends and relations: which was ordered to be done at that season of the night, and in that obscurity, to prevent any disturbances that might have been made by the citizens, who hated him extremely; for, having been the death of so many of their pastors, friends, and relations, if they should have seen him in the day-time carried with pomp and shew to his burial, as many of his acquaintance had intended to do. He stood excommunicate many years, and took no care for his absolution, and so might have been denied Christian burial; but the Bishop of London would not make use of that rigour (b). Such was the end of that bloody man, Bishop Bonner. He was, with respect to his character, a violent, furious, and passionate man, addicted to swearing [S]; and extremely cruel in his nature, as is but too manifest from his actions above related. He was generally looked upon as a person of no principle (c); but if so, 'tis a wonder he scrupled embracing the several alterations made in religion, in the reign of King Edward VI. He is likewise represented as an Atheist, and said to have believed, that there is neither heaven, nor hell, nor God, or devil (d): and indeed, his monstrous behaviour renders such an opinion but too probable. For, who that believes a God would burn people for speculative opinions? The Bishop, in his manner and conversation, was blustering and vehement (e); but withal fatirical, and sometimes full of witty repartees [T]. As to his person, he was very fat and corpulent [U]; which made one say to him, that he was full of guts, but empty of bowels (f). He was a great master of the Canon Law, being excelled in that faculty by very few in his time; and also was well skilled in Politics (g): But he understood little of divinity (h). Accordingly, he made no figure in the learned world. However, several things were published under his name, which are mentioned below in the note [W]. One important service he did to his Bishopric, in that, through his (z) J. Le Neve, Fasti, &c. as above, p. 180.

 (a) 'Tis more probable that it was there, as the Marshalsey stands in St George's parish; than that it should be in Barking church-yard, as Bishop Godwin asserts, De Praefulibus, &c. edit. 1616, 4to, p. 251. In loco burnatus est latronum & facinorosorum sepulchra distincta, cœmeterio, viz. Barkingensi.
 (b) Strype's Annals, ubi supra, p. 573.
 (c) Burnet, P. ii. p. 128.
 (d) Foxe, p. 1843. Strype's Annals, ut supra, p. 573.

(e) See Foxe, throughout, and Burnet, ubi supra. Book ii. Part ii. of the Hist. of the Reformation.
 (f) i. e. Compassion. Foxe, ubi supra. and Fuller's H. st. of Waltham Abbey, p. 18.
 (g) Dr Heylyn's Hist. of the Reformation.
 (h) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 128.

(37) See Foxe, as above, p. 1191, 2014, and in many other places.
 (38) Burnet's History of the Reformation. Part ii. Book i. Collect. Records, No. 37. p. 170.
 (*) Sometime, or formerly.
 (†) Always.
 (49) Harrington, ubi supra.
 (40) Alluding to the picture of him in Foxe, when whipping Thomas Hinshaw, p. 2043. After his deprivation, every ill-favoured fat fellow that went in the street was called Bonner. Harrington, ubi supra, p. 16.

[S] Addicted to swearing. See the note immediately before this. His usual oaths were, By God, Before God, By St Mary, By All the Saints, &c. (37). And in one of his letters he hath these shocking words, — 'If amongst you I have no puddings, then must I say, as Messer, our Priest of the Hospital, said to his mad horse, in our last journey from Hostia, Al diavolo, al diavolo, al tutti diavoli; i. e. To the devil, to the devil, to all the devils.' This he writ from the Marshalsey (38).
 [T] And sometimes full of witty repartees. For instance; after his deprivation, as he was once walking with his tippet in the street, one begged it of him, in scoffe, to line a coat; 'No, (saith he) but thou shalt have a fool's head to line thy cap.' To another that bad him 'Good morrow Bishop (*) quondam.' He straight replied, 'Farewel, Knave Jem-per (†). And one shewing him his own picture in the Book of Martyrs, in the first edition, on purpose to vex him, he laughed at it, saying, 'A vengeance on the fool, how could he get my picture drawn so right?' And when one asked him, 'If he were not ashamed to whip a man with a beard?' He laughed, and told him, 'His beard was grown since; but (saith he) if thou hadst been in his case, thou wouldst have thought it a good commutation of penance to have thy bum beaten, to save thy body from burning (39).'
 [U] He was very fat and corpulent. Upon which account the following Epigram was made upon him (40).

Quæ nova forma viri, quid virga, quid ora, quid alvus,
 Pondera quid ventris crassitidisque vestit?
 Corpus amaxæum, distento abdomine pigrum
 Rides annes stupes, lector amice, magis?
 Vasta quid ista velint, si nescis, pondera, dicam;
 Nam nihil hic mirum venter obesus habet.
 Carnibus humanis & sanguine vesituro atro,
 Duccotos annis hauscrat ille tribus.
 Ergo quid hoc monstri est, recto vis nomine dicam?
 Nomen nec patris, nec gerit ille matris.
 Qui patre Savago natus, falsoque Bonerus
 Dicitur: hunc melius dixeris Orbilium.

The sense of which, in two words, is, that the reason of his being so fat was, because he so voraciously fed upon human flesh and blood. And that he devoured two hundred persons in three years, &c.
 [W] Several things were published under his name, which are mentioned, &c. Being as follow. I. Preface to the Oration of Stephen Gardiner, Bishop of Winchester, concerning True Obedienc.

Printed at London, in Latin, 1534, 1535, and at Hamburg in 1536, 8vo. Translated into English by Michael Wood, a zealous Protestant, with a bitur Preface to the Reader, and a Postscript. Roan, 1553, 8vo. It is also inserted in J. Foxe's Book of Martyrs (41). In that Preface, Bonner speaks much in favour of King Henry VIIIth's marriage with Anne Boleyo, and against the Tyranny exercised by the Bishop of Rome in this kingdom. II. Several letters to the Lord Cromwell (42). III. A Declaration to the Lord Cromwell, describing to him the evil behaviour of Steven [Bishop of] Winchester, with special causes therein contained, wherefore, and why he disliked of him (43). IV. Letter of his about the Proceedings at Rome, concerning the King's Divorce from Katharine of Arragon (44). V. An Admonition and Advertisement given by the Bishop of London, to all Readers of the Bible in the English Tongue, 1540 (45). VI. Injunctions given by Bonner, Bishop of London, to his Clergie, [about preaching] with the names of Books prohibited, 1542 (46). VII. Letter to Mr Lechmore (47). VIII. Responsum & Exhortatio. Lond. 1553, 8vo; i. e. Answer and Exhortation to the Clergy in praise of Priesthood; spoken by our author in St Paul's Cathedral. London, 16 Octob. 1553, after a Sermon preached there before the Clergy, by John Harpesfield (48). IX. A Letter to Mr Lechmore, 6 Sept. 1553 (49). X. 'Articles to be enquired of in the general Visitation of Edmund Bishop of London, exercised by him in the year 1554, in the City and Diocese of London, &c (50).' To ridicule them, John Bale, Bishop of Orlory, writ a book, intitled, 'A Declaration of Edmonde Bonner's Articles, concerning the Cleargye of London Diocese, whereby that execrable Anty-Chryste is in his righte Colours reveled.' 1554 and 1561, 8vo. XI. A profitable and necessary Doctrine, containing an exposition on the Creed, Seven Sacraments, Ten Commandments, the Pater-noster, Ave Maria, and the Seven Sacraments; with certain Homilies adjoining thereunto, for the instruction and information of the Diocese of London. Lond. 1554, 1555, 4to. This Book was drawn up by his Chaplains John Harpesfield and Henry Pendleton; and the former part of it, which is a Catechism, is mostly taken out of the Institution of a Christen Man, set out by King Henry VIII, only varied in some points (51). XII. Several Letters, Declarations, Arguings, Disputes, &c. of his, are extant in J. Foxe's Book of Martyrs, Vol. last. XIII. His Objections against the Processe of Robert Horne, Bishop of Winchester, who had tendred the Oath of Supremacy to him the second time, are preserved by Mr Strype in his Annals of the Reformation (52). As is likewise a Letter of his concerning King Henry the VIIIth's appeal to the Pope, by Bishop Burnet (53).
 But

(41) Edit. as above, p. 1060.
 (42) lb. p. 1088, 1089.
 (43) Ibid. p. 1090.
 (44) Burnet, as above, Part i. Collect. p. 111.
 (45) Ibid. p. 251.
 (46) lb. p. 252.
 (47) Ibid. Part ii. Collect. p. 170.
 (48) Wood, Ath. ubi supra. See also above note [M].
 (49) Burnet, ubi supra, Part ii. Collect. p. 245.
 (50) Ib. p. 260, &c. and Part iii. Collect. p. 148.
 (51) Wood, ubi supra; and Collier's Eccles. Hist. Vol. II. p. 382, 383.
 (52) Vol. I. p. 379, &c.
 (53) Hist. of the Reformat. P. iii. Collect. p. 37.

his great interest with Queen Mary I, he obtained from her several Manors and Advowsons to be united to the see of London [X].

But upon the whole it appears, how false and ill-grounded is the great Character given [of some of the Popish Bishops, and] of him in particular, by Sanders; that they were 'all men excellent for their Learning and Gravity.' — Omnes doctrina & gravitate præstantes viri — (54).

[X] Through his great interest with Queen Mary I. he obtained from her several Manors and Advowsons to be united to the See of London.] Namely these following. St Alphage, St Anne Aldersgate, St Clement Eastcheap, St James Garlickhithe, St Catherine Coleman, St Magnus, St Martin's Ludgate, St Martin's in the Fields, St Matthew Friday-street, in London and Westminster; Hanwell in Middlesex; Ashwell and Sabridgeworth in Hertfordshire; Creshall, Fering, Patf-wick, Puckleham, Tay Parva, and Wennington, in Essex. They were granted to him and his successors by Letters Patent dated the 3d of March, 1553 (55).

(55) See Newcourt's Repertorium Eccles. &c. under those respective parishes.

BOOTH (BARTON) one of the best and most applauded Actors, more especially in Tragedy, that ever trod the English Stage. He descended from a very ancient and honourable family, originally seated (a) in the county palatine of Lancaster, in which he was born, and since spread into Cheshire and several other counties. His father, John Booth, Esq; was a person of great worth and honour, though his fortune was not very considerable, and highly attentive to the education of his sons, of whom Barton, the third, was born in 1681 (b). When he was about three years old, his father removed himself and his whole family to town, and settled in Westminster. At the age of nine years, Barton was put under the tuition of the famous Dr Busby, who was then at the head of Westminster-school, where he bred some of the ablest men, that, in the last and present age, have done honour to this nation (c). The great pregnancy of Mr Booth's parts were very quickly discovered, he had a strong passion for learning, and a peculiar turn for Latin poetry; he not only read it with attention, and studied the best authors with diligence, but fixed many of the finest passages so firmly in his memory, that he was able to repeat them, not only with propriety and correctness, but with such a graceful action, so fine a tone of voice, and such peculiar emphasis, that it was taken notice of by the whole school (d). It was in consequence of this, that when, according to the custom of the school, a Latin Play was to be acted, a considerable part therein was given to young Booth, who performed it with such excellence, as gained him the notice of the Doctor, as well as the universal applause of all the spectators [A]. This gave him first an inclination for the Stage, to the great concern of his father, who intended him for the Church, and with that view had been particularly careful in his education. But as the passions first implanted in youth commonly act with violence, especially when they meet with any restraint or contradiction; so when Mr Booth had reached the age of seventeen, and the time approached when he was to be sent to the university, he resolved to run any risk, rather than be obliged to enter upon a course of life, so inconsistent with the liveliness of his temper, and the natural bent of his inclination. It happened that there was then here one Mr Ashbury, who had been long Master of a company at Dublin, and was allowed to understand perfectly the management of a theatre, with whom young Booth became acquainted, and finding that under his direction there was no danger of his getting bread, he quitted all hopes and all pretensions in another way, stole away from school, and went over to Ireland

[A] As well as the universal applause of all the spectators.] There has been very few, if any, since the time of the famous Ben Johnson, that have come upon the stage with so much true learning as Mr Booth, which probably was the reason that he became so soon, and so good an actor. He was struck with the Roman Poets, when at Westminster, to a degree of enthusiasm. He was charmed with the found and cadence of their verses before he understood them; but his passion for harmony was so strong, that Virgil and Terence were familiar to him when he had very little acquaintance with Sallust or Livy. When he repeated his lessons, he did it with such propriety and force, and was himself so strangely affected with them, that the under-masters could not avoid taking notice of it; nor was it long before it reached Busby's ears (1). One might naturally imagine, from the opinion commonly entertained of this famous person, that such a report could not much recommend a lad to his notice; but the fact was otherwise. This propensity to playing was Busby's own foible. In his youth he had performed in a Play of Mr William Cartwright's, called the Royal Slave, with prodigious applause. He had always a prejudice in favour of this kind of eloquence, and thought nothing was so sure a mark of genius as a relish for dramatick poetry (2). When he heard therefore of Booth's strong inclination to this species of literature, he crossed instead of correcting him, examined his proficiency, and assigned him a principal part in the Latin Play, which, according to a custom introduced by this Dr Busby, was annually performed by the scholars, and perhaps this might have some share in quickening his diligence to get it up, which he did so well, that Dr Busby himself praised him with such warmth, as discovered sufficiently, that tho' upwards of ninety, he had not forgot the pleasure that equal praises gave him in like circumstances. But Mr Booth's father, who had an invincible aversion to the stage, would sometimes tell his son, alluding to this accident, that the old man poisoned him with his last breath. This happened about three years before he left the school, and chose this for his profession. How much the young people at Westminster value themselves upon Booth's coming from amongst them, will appear from the following Prologue, spoke during his life-time before one of their annual performances (3).

Your antique actors, as we read,
No more than anticks were indeed;
With wide-mouth'd masks their babes to fright,
They kept the countenance from sight.
Now faces on the stage are shewn;
Nor speak they with their tongues alone,
But in each look a force there lies,
That speaks the passion to the eyes.
See then which best deserves our praise,
The vizard, or the human face?
Old Roscins to our Booth must bow;
'Twas then but art, 'tis nature now.

[B] At

(54) De Schiffm. Anglic. edit. Col. 1631, 8vo, Agrip. p. 248.

(a) Dugdale's Bar-ronage, Vol. II. p. 481.

(b) Life of Barton Booth, Esq;

(c) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 923.

(d) From the information of the Rev. Mr Knipe.

(1) From the informations mentioned in the text.

(2) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 923.

(3) Hist. of the English Stage, p. 142.

Ireland with Mr Ashbury in 1698 (e). He very soon distinguished himself on the Stage at Dublin, where he had great natural advantages over most of his contemporaries, especially in Tragedy; he had a grave countenance, a good person, an air of dignity, a fine voice, and a very manly action. He spoke very justly, his pronunciation was very correct, and the cadence of his voice was extremely grateful to the ear. In short, he gained in three seasons so high a reputation in that country, and was complimented so much, upon his theatrical talents, by the English gentlemen who saw him there, that he resolved to return home, and try how far it was possible for him to push his fortune here (f). He accordingly came back to England in 1701, and applied himself to Lord Fitzharding, who was of the Bedchamber to Prince George of Denmark, and was by him recommended to Mr Betterton, who very readily took him under his care, and gave him all the assistance, in every respect, that was in his power, which he was the more enabled to do, as he was then at the head of a company (g). There never were two men better met. The tutor had all imaginable kindness for his pupil, and the pupil all possible veneration for his tutor. The first Play in which he acted was the Tragedy of Valentinian, in which he performed the part of Maximus; Mr Verbruggen played Valentinian, Mr Betterton Etius, and Mrs Barry, Lucina. It was scarce possible for a young Actor to hope, or even to wish, a better reception than he met with, and the kindness of the town had a very happy effect upon this new candidate for theatrical fame, as it gave him a proper degree of confidence without vanity, and inspired him with a just passion for maintaining, by his future behaviour, the early reputation he had acquired (b). The Ambitious Stepmother, a new Tragedy that came soon after upon the Stage, in which he performed the character of Artaban, added to the character he had acquired, and raised him justly to the reputation, of being one of the most considerable Actors then upon the Stage (i). In the year 1704, he married Mrs Frances Barkham, daughter of Sir William Barkham of Norfolk, Baronet, who lived with him six years, and died then without issue (k). In all the theatrical revolutions that happened in those days, Mr Booth, notwithstanding his great capacity, and his standing so well as he did with the Town, had very little share. He adhered constantly to Mr Betterton, as long as that could be of any use to him; and when his tutor retired from the management of the Stage, he trusted to his merit, and to the justice of the Publick, in which he was not at all deceived; for though he did not force himself into the management of the Drury-Lane Theatre, and though he opposed those that did, yet he was very well received there, purely upon the score of his abilities, which, after the death of Betterton, placed him very clearly at the head of his profession, in Tragedy at least (l) [B]. But we must now come to that period of time, in which Mr Booth's sole merit raised him into a superior point of light, and procured for him that reward which he had long deserved. The Tragedy of Cato, which had been written in the year 1703, or at least the four first acts of it, was brought upon the Stage in 1712, chiefly on a political principle, and to support the cause of the Whigs. It was so long before Mr Addison could be prevailed upon to venture it, that the proper season was elapsed, and the benefits came on in the month of April when it was first acted (m). The part of Cato was

(e) Hist. of the English Stage, p. 143.

(f) From the information of the late Mr. Elrington.

(g) Hist. of the English Stage, p. 143.

(b) Remarks on the British Theatre, p. 293.

(i) From a Letter to the late N. R. Esq; on the success of that Play.

(k) Life of Barton Booth, Esq;

(l) Remarks on the British Theatre, p. 297.

(m) See the article of ADDISON (JOSEPH.)

given

[B] At the head of his profession, in Tragedy at least. It has been shewn in another place, that very soon after the Restoration the two companies, stiled the King's and Duke's, were formed of persons perfectly skilled in their profession, and that when these companies united they composed the most complete set of actors this nation ever saw. It was from the sight of these extraordinary persons in his youth, that Mr Booth caught the passion he had for the stage, and under them he received those instructions that were requisite to give him that high degree of perfection he attained. There were however various circumstances that in this respect were very favourable: He was in the prime of his life when they were in their decline, so that he had vigour enough to carry fully into execution those lights which he derived from his experience. He was always studious in his profession, and had a very strong desire to support it's reputation, as well as his own; and this made him take great pains in the parts he played, and also made him cautious of accepting any, but those he could perform to advantage. He was very willing to receive all the instructions that either authors who brought new Plays could give, the seniors in his own profession could afford, or that might be derived from the remarks of the many able critics who flourished in those days, and shewed a peculiar regard for, and attention to, the entertainments of the theatre; such as Mr Manwaring, Mr Addison, Mr Steele, and many others. It was from his modesty and circumspection in all these points, and the gratitude he constantly expressed for any assistance that he received, his character came into general esteem, and he was reputed one of the ablest and most diligent of those that were then on the stage, when there yet remained several great and applauded actors. It is indeed true, that his taste for, and excellence in, Tragedy, rendered him a less general Player than some of his predecessors: But though this might in some respect make him less useful to the managers, yet it did not at all detract from his credit with the publick, more especially when it appeared, that in some of the parts he played in Comedy, he was extremely perfect, and gave them a gracefulness and propriety which few other actors could reach. In this point of light he stood, when, in compliance with the importunities of his friends, Mr Addison consented that Cato, which had been already perused and admired by the best judges, should be produced to the publick, and make it's appearance on the stage. The author himself and his friends were very sensible, that the success of this excellent Tragedy, would in a great measure depend on the manner in which the character was played, and therefore in putting it into the hands of Mr Booth, they might be said to rest in a great measure their expectations from that celebrated piece on his capacity and care. It is no less true, that from his first rehearsal of it they became in some measure confident of it's being received with applause; and it must be also allowed, that though Mr Booth did not excel himself in this character, for in that of Othello he was thought superior, yet he excelled all who have attempted that part ever since, and supported it with that dignity of behaviour, that captivated the minds of a well-judging audience, and rendered Cato as much admired and revered in Britain, as he ever had been in Rome. This might look like Panegyrick, if the world did not know, from the small interval of time since elapsed, that it is no more than naked truth.

given to Mr Booth without hesitation or dispute, the then managers, who were Players, being very well satisfied that no body else could perform it. To say that his action added in any degree to the character drawn by the Poet would be flattery, but to affirm that he entered fully into the spirit of his part, and came up to all that either the town or the author could expect, is barely doing justice to his memory, in support of which, we may depend upon the testimony of numberless living witnesses (n) who saw it. We may also take the liberty of affirming, that as party prejudices never ran higher than at that time, and the excellency of the Play was distinguished by the surprizing contest between both parties which should applaud it most; so the merit of the Actor received the same marks of approbation, both parties taking care to distinguish their satisfaction in that respect, by bestowing upon him (o) unusual and unprecedented rewards. But to enumerate the remarkable circumstances that attended our Actor's extraordinary display of his abilities upon this occasion, would too much interrupt the thread of our narration, and we have therefore given them a place in the notes [C]. The run of Cato being over at London, the Managers thought fit to remove to Oxford in the summer, where the Play met with so extraordinary a reception, that they were forced to open the doors at noon, and the house was quite full by one o'clock; the same respect was paid it for three days together; and tho' the universal applause this Play met with at London, surpassed every thing of that kind that had been remembered; yet the tribute of praise it received from this famous universality, surpassed even that (p). The reputation Mr Booth was now in, seemed to entitle him very justly to as great advantages from the Theatre as any concerned therein enjoyed, which at that time was very considerable, the management, as we before observed, being in the hands of three capital Actors, viz. Cibber, Dogget, and Wilks (q); yet this perhaps he would never have obtained from the bare consideration of what he deserved, but the favour he was in with that powerful Minister, the Lord Viscount Bolingbroke, was so great,

(n) Remarks on the British Theatre, p. 299.

(o) Cibber's Apology for his own Life, p. 379.

(p) Remarks upon the late excellent Tragedy of Cato, p. 23.

(q) Cibber's Apology for his own Life.

[C] Have therefore given them a place in the notes. The best way to come at all historical truths in general is, to have recourse to the most knowing and candid writers, because such will always take care to be well informed themselves, and be cautious how they deliver the facts they relate, that they may not misinform their readers. This rule is as necessary, and as essential towards instructing ones self well as to Theatrical History, as it is in respect to the History of the World, the same obstacles lying in the way of both, and thereby rendering the means equally difficult, though their ends are not of the same importance. This fully justifies taking the following copious and curious account from the very impartial Mr Cibber, who speaks thus (4):

Although Cato seems plainly written upon what are called Whig principles, yet the Tories of that time had sense enough not to take it as the least reflection upon their administration, but, on the contrary, they seemed to brandish and vaunt their approbation of every sentiment in favour of liberty, which by a publick act of their generosity was carried so high, that one day while the Play was acting they collected fifty guineas in the boxes, and made a present of them to Booth, with this compliment—For his honest opposition to a perpetual Dictator, and his dying so bravely in the cause of liberty. What was insinuated by any part of these words is not my affair; but so publick a reward had the appearance of a laudable spirit, which only such a Play as Cato could have inspired. Nor could Booth be blamed, if, upon so particular a distinction of his merit, he began himself to set more value upon it. How far he might carry it in making use of the favour he stood in, with a certain Nobleman then in power at Court, was not difficult to penetrate, and indeed ought always to have been expected by the meanest actors; for which of them (making the case every way his own) could with such advantages have contented himself in the humble station of an hired actor? But let us see how the managers stood severally affected upon this occasion. Dogget, who expected, though he feared not the attempt of what after happened, imagined he had thought of an expedient to prevent it; and to cover his design with all the art of a statesman, he insinuated to us (for he was a staunch Whig) that this present of fifty guineas was a sort of Tory triumph, which they had no pretence to, and that for his part he could not bear that so redoubted a champion for liberty as Cato, should be bought off to the cause of a contrary party. He therefore in the seeming zeal of his heart, proposed, that the managers themselves should make the same present to Booth which had been made from the boxes the day before. This, he said, would recommend the equity and liberal spirit of our management to the town, and might be a means to secure Booth more firmly in our interest, it never having been known that the skill of the best actor had received so round a reward or gratuity in one day before. Wilks, who wanted nothing but abilities to be as cunning as Dogget, was so charmed with the proposal, that he longed that moment to make Booth the present with his own hands, and though he knew he had no right to do it without my consent, had no patience to ask it. Upon which I turned to Dogget with a cold smile, and told him, that if Booth could be purchas'd at so cheap a rate, it would be one of the best proofs of his oeconomy we had ever been beholden to. I therefore desired he might have a little patience, that our doing it too hastily might be only making sure of an occasion to throw away the fifty guineas; for if we should be obliged to do better for him, we could never expect that Booth would think himself bound in honour to refund them. This seemed so absurd an argument to Wilks, that he began with his usual freedom of speech to treat it as a pitiful evasion of their intended generosity. But Dogget, who was not so wide of my meaning, clapping his hand upon mine, said, with an air of security, Oh! don't trouble yourself, there must be two words to that bargain, let me alone to manage that matter. Wilks, upon this dark discourse, grew uneasy, as if there was some secret between us that he was to be left out of. Therefore, to avoid the shock of his intemperance, I was reduced to tell him, it was my opinion, that Booth would never be made easy by any thing we could do for him; till he had a share in the profits and management; and that as he did not want friends to assist him, whatever his merit might be before, every one would think, since his acting of Cato, he had now enough to back his pretensions to it. To which Dogget replied, that nobody would think his merit slighted by so handsome a present as fifty guineas and that for his farther pretensions, whatever the Licence might avail, our property of house, scenes, and cloaths, were our own, and not in the power of the Crown to dispose of. To conclude, my objections, that the money would be only thrown away, &c. were over-ruled, and the same night Booth had the fifty guineas, which he received with a thankfulness that made Wilks and Dogget perfectly easy, inasmuch that they seemed for some time to triumph in their conduct, and often endeavoured to laugh my jealousy out of countenance. But in the following winter the game happened to take a different turn, and then, if it had been a laughing matter, I had as strong an occasion to smile at their former security.

(4) Apology for his own Life, p. 379.

great, that in 1713, he procured a new licence, recalling all former licences, in which Mr Booth's name was added to those of the former Managers (r). They were none of them pleased with this act of justice done to Booth's merit, at the expence of what they call their property, but none of them carried it so high as Mr Dogget, who absolutely refused to accept of any consideration for his share in the scenes and cloaths, which had, however, no other effect, than depriving him, through his own obstinacy, of his share, which brought him in one thousand pounds a year, though the best judge of this matter now living informs us, that this was only a pretence, and that the true reason of his quitting, was his dislike to another of the Managers, whose humour was become insupportable to him (s). At the time he came to have this share in the management of the house, he was certainly in the best condition for making it turn to the entire satisfaction of the publick, and the emolument of his associates, as well as his particular benefit, for he was at that time in the thirty-third year of his age, and in the highest reputation as an Actor (t). He was extremely diligent both in his profession and in his office, so that his abilities in the former, and his integrity in the latter, joined to the respect paid him as a gentleman of family, set him altogether in as high a point of esteem, as any man had attained in his station. He enjoyed these singular advantages for many years unenvied and unequalled, and his fame, as a Player, instead of sinking by degrees, as sometimes has happened to those who have been most applauded, increased very perceptibly, and audiences, instead of growing thin from a satiety of seeing the same parts performed by the same man, became fuller from the fear of losing him (u). Some years after this, he married Mrs Santlowe, who from her first appearance as an Actress, in the character of the Fair Quaker of Deal, to the time she quitted the Stage, had always received the strongest marks of publick applause, which were repeated, when, after a retreat for some time, she appeared there again. By her prudence, in managing the advantages that arose to her from the figure she made upon the Stage, and her great diligence in her profession, she acquired a considerable fortune, which was very useful to Mr Booth, who, from the natural turn of his temper, though he had a strict regard to justice, was not much inclined to saving (w). This second marriage, however, does not seem to have been founded on interest, but rather in affection, and, during the few years they lived together, there was the greatest harmony between them. By degrees, the health of Mr Booth began to decline, so that it was impossible for him to continue to act with as much diligence as usual, which did not, however, lessen the favour of the Publick towards him, but, on the contrary, afforded room for fresh instances of their esteem, by the crowded audiences his appearance drew, whenever the intervals of his distemper permitted him to tread the Stage (x). But when once his constitution began to decline he broke very fast, and being attacked by a complication of diseases, he at length gave way to Fate, May 10, 1733. He shewed his great modesty, and contempt of that kind of fame that some people are so fond of after death, by directing that he should be interred with all imaginable privacy, in the parish church of Cowley, near Uxbridge, in Middlesex, the constant place of his retirement in the summer, which was complied with, and no monument raised to his memory, though he intended to have erected one for his revered tutor and admired friend Mr Betterton (y). He testified likewise his sincere love for, and entire satisfaction in the conduct of, his wife, to whom he left all his fortune, for reasons therein assigned, which he declared amounted to no more, than two thirds of what he had received with his wife upon the day of marriage (z). His character, as an Actor, has been celebrated by some of the best judges, and was never questioned by any. To say the truth, it was more criticised by himself than by any other, for he carried his own notions of Betterton's merit so high, that he always considered his performance as inimitable, and treated all attempts to flatter his own manner of acting as equal to his master's, not only with contempt but indignation. This some have imagined was carried too far, and that it was the effects only of the vigorous impressions made by Betterton's manner of playing on the youthful mind of Booth, which took the stamp so deeply, that no length of time could wear it out (a). But others have judged that in this he was not at all mistaken, and that, if we are to look for the equals of Betterton, or, if it was possible, for his superiors, it must be in the records of earlier times, there being a great probability, that parts are best played soon after they are first writ, and when it is possible for the Actor to receive the instructions of the author; but this, perhaps, may be no more than an opinion as well as the former [D]. Amongst those, who, out of respect to his great abilities, have done honour to

(r) Short History of the Theatre, addressed to H. G. T. D. O. N. L. C.

(s) Cibber's Apology for his own Life.

(t) Life of Barton Booth, Esq;

(u) Remarks on the British Theatre, p. 300.

(w) See a Copy of his Will in the London Magazine, for 1733, p. 126.

(x) History of the English Stage, p. 145.

(y) He had spoke of this very seriously; perhaps the state of his affairs hindered him from performing it.

(z) See his last Will, as before cited.

(a) Remarks upon the British Theatre, p. 99.

[D] May be no more than an opinion as well as the former.] It appears from the most authentick writers of those times, that the original actors in Shakespear's best Plays were almost idolized by the populace, who set up the signs of their heads while they were living, and paid them such respect and veneration as we can hardly conceive or credit (5). Richard Burbage, who played Richard the Third, was one of these remarkable persons, and John Lowen, who played Hamlet, another. This last must have lived and acted to a good old age, if there be any truth in what some have suggested, that Sir William D'Avegant had seen him act Henry the Eighth, and from thence gave Betterton those instructions which enabled him to shine in that character (6). It is however allowed, that Shakespear himself did not succeed in playing; but for all that he might be very capable of instructing others, and so very probable he was, since the remarks upon acting in his play of Hamlet are allowed to be very judicious. A great critic of the last age, makes no sort of scruple in assigning the merit of the actors, as the true cause of the great success of our most taking old plays. As for instance, thus he delivers himself upon the subject (7). 'Amongst those who will be objecting against the doGrine

(6) An Answer to Mr Pope's Preface to Shakespear, in a Letter to a Friend, p. 19.

(7) The Tragedies of the last Ages, considered and examined in a Letter to Fleetwood Shephard, Esq; by Thomas Rymer, Esq; p. 5.

(5) See Stowe's Annals, p. 698. Wood's Fast. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 167.

to the memory of Mr Booth, Aaron Hill, Esq; a gentleman, who by the share he had in the management of the Play-House, could not but have sufficient opportunities of considering and becoming well acquainted with his merit, has given us a character of him at large, which, as it is every way worthy of the reader's notice, and is withal but short, we have placed in the notes (b) [E]. But the most perfect thing of it's kind that has appeared upon this subject, is the same character drawn by the hand of Mr Cibber, whose judgment and candour are equally commendable; since, in the History he has given us of the Theatre, there are a multitude of particulars, which shew how fit he was for the management of it, and all his accounts of contemporary Actors and Authors, are written with great justice and impartiality, so that it may be truly said, that he has taken freedom with no man's character but his own. What he says of Booth and Wilks is equally curious and entertaining, and we may be sure that he was very capable of entering deeply into their sentiments and tempers, whom he had known with intimacy for many years, and as Actors, during the course of their lives (c). He has given us their characters with much plainness and perspicuity, allowing their full share of merit to both, without lessening or concealing the failings of either, and thereby affords us more clear and certain light into the real advantages they had over other Actors, than could have been obtained any other way [F]. But it was not only in his profession, though it was chiefly in that, Mr Booth excelled.

(b) History of the English Stage, p. 147.

(c) Apology for Cibber's Life, p. 476.

'doſtine I lay down, may peradventure appear a sort of men who have remembered so and so, and value themselves upon their experience. I may write by the book (say they) what I have a mind, but they know what pleases. These are a sort of stage quacks and empiricks in Poetry who have got a receipt to please, and no collegiate like them for purging the passions. These say (for instance) A King and no King pleases. I say the comical part pleases; I say that Mr Hart pleases, most of the business falls to his share, and what he delivers every one takes upon content, their eyes are prepossessed and charmed by his action, before ought of the Poet's can approach their ears, and to the most wretched of characters he gives a lustre and brilliance which dazzle the sight, that the deformities in the poetry cannot be perceived; therefore a distinction is to be made between what pleases naturally in itself; and what pleases upon the account of machines, actors, dances, and circumstances which are merely accidental to the tragedy. Aristotle observes, that in his time there were some who (wanting the talent to write what might please) made it their care that the actors should keep out where the Muses failed.' In another place, criticizing the Maid's Tragedy, he says (8), 'We may remember, (however we find Melanthius and Amintor written in the book) that at the theatre we have a good scene acted, there is work cut out, and both our Æsopus and Roscius are on the stage together. Whatever defect may be in Amintor and Melanthius, Mr Hart and Mr Mohun are wanting in nothing. To these we owe for what is pleasing in the scene, and to this scene we may impute the success of the Maid's Tragedy.' But with all the deference due to so severe a judge, and so great a critick, may we not have leave to enquire, Whether this prodigious excellence of the actor arises entirely from himself, or whether it is not owing to his diligence and attention in studying his author, 'till he attains his full sense, and thereby acquires a capacity of expressing himself with so much force and vivacity? If there be any thing in this, as I believe every judicious reader will allow there is, then the actor is as much indebted to the poet, as the poet to the actor. This also affords us a solution of a question before-mentioned, which is, why the original actors are commonly superior to their successors? which may reasonably be supposed to arise from the opportunities they have of entering fully into the author's designs, and in which those who come after them must be deficient.

(8) Id. ibid. p. 133.

[E] And is withal but short, we have placed in the notes. The author of this little piece is still living, and from time to time obliges the publick with very entertaining performances in verse and prose. He has been thought to understand the business of the stage as well as most people, as having a double advantage from genius and experience.

The character of Mr B O O T H.

TWO advantages distinguished him in the strongest light from the rest of his fraternity, he had learning to understand perfectly whatever it was his part to speak, and judgment to know how far it agreed or disagreed with his character. Hence arose a peculiar grace, which was visible to every spectator, though few were at the pains of examining into the cause of their pleasure. He could soften and slide over with a kind of elegant negligence the improprieties in a part he acted, while on the contrary he would dwell with energy upon the beauties, as if he exerted a latent spirit which had been kept back for such an occasion, that he might alarm, awaken, and transport in those places only, where the dignity of his own good sense could be supported by that of his author. A little reflection upon this remarkable quality, will teach us to account for that manifest languor which has sometimes been observed in his action, and which was generally, though I think falsely, imputed to the natural indolence of his temper. For the same reason, though in the customary rounds of his business, he would condescend to some parts in Comedy, he seldom appeared in any of them with much advantage to his character. The passions which he found in Comedy were not strong enough to excite his fire, and what seemed want of qualification was only absence of impression. He had a talent at discovering the passions, where they lay hid in some celebrated parts, by the injudicious practice of other actors, when he had discovered he soon grew able to express them. And his secret for attaining this great lesson of the Theatre, was an adaption of his look to his voice, by which artful imitation of nature, the variations in which of his words gave propriety to every change in his countenance. So that it was Mr Booth's peculiar felicity to be heard and seen the same — whether as the pleased, the grieved, the pitied, the retroachful, or the angry. One would almost be tempted to borrow the aid of a very bold figure, and to express this excellence the more significantly, beg permission to affirm, that the blind might have seen him in his voice, and the deaf have heard him in his visage. His gesture, or, as it is commonly called his action, was but the result and necessary consequence of his dominion over his voice and countenance; for having by a concurrence of two such causes, impressed his imagination with such a stamp and spirit of passion, he ever obeyed the impulse by a kind of natural dependency, and relaxed or braced successively into all that fine expressiveness with which he painted what he spoke without restraint or affectation.

A. HILL.

It must be admitted, that with many signs of friendship and respect, this character carries in it sufficient marks of sincerity, and a just concern for truth. The author knew, that with great abilities Mr Booth had some failings, which he is far from concealing, though he attributes them to certain causes that do him no dishonour; and it falls out very happily, that in excusing him he does not violate probability in the least. All who knew Mr Booth must allow, that he has given a very fair account of his disposition, and very rightly ascribed to the temper of the man, those inequalities that were discovered in him as an actor; so that in this character he seems equally studious of doing justice to him and to the publick.

[F] Than could have been obtained any other way. There are a great many passages in Mr Cibber's book which excelled. He was a man of letters also, and an author in more languages than one. He had a taste for poetry, which discovered itself when he was very young, in translations from several Odes of Horace, and in his riper years, he wrote several songs and other original poems, which were very far from injuring his reputation. He was also the author of a masque or dramatick entertainment called Dido and Aeneas (d), that was very well received upon the Stage, which, however, did not get the better so far of his indolence, as to produce any thing of the same kind afterwards. But his master-piece was a Latin inscription to the memory of a celebrated Actor, who died while he was young, Mr William Smith, one of the greatest men of his profession, and of whom Mr Booth always spoke in raptures. This short elogy has all the strength, beauty, and elegance, which is necessary to recommend a thing of that kind, without any mixture of that flattery, which so often vitiates inscriptions of this nature, and is therefore the properest specimen that can be offered to the reader's notice, of our author's genius and learning.

(d) Jacob's Lives of the Poets, Vol. I, p. 282.

which relate to Mr Booth, and which we should have collected, as the best account of him in his theatrical capacity, if we had not been afraid of tiring the reader. But what follows (g) is so much to the purpose, so just a criticism, and so fair a representation of his excellencies and defects, that to have omitted it must have injured the end aimed at in this article. 'Tho' the majority of publick auditors are but bad judges of theatrical action, and are often deceived into their approbation of what has no solid pretence to it; yet as there are no other appointed judges to appeal to, and as every single spectator has a right to be one of them, their sentence will be definitive, and the merit of an actor must in some degree be weighed by it. By this law then Wilks was pronounced an excellent actor, which if the few true judges did not allow him to be, they were at least too candid to slight or discourage him. Booth and he were actors so directly opposite in their manner, that if either of them could have borrowed a little of the other's fault, they would both have been improved by it. If Wilks had sometimes too violent a vivacity, Booth as often contented himself with too grave a dignity. The latter seemed too much to heave up his words, as the other to dart them to the ear with too quick and sharp a vehemence. Thus Wilks would too frequently break into the time and measure of the harmony by too many spirited accents in one line, and Booth, by too solemn a regard to harmony, would as often lose the necessary spirit of it: So that (as I have observed) could we have sometimes raised the one and sunk the other, they had both been nearer to the mark. Yet this could not be always objected to them, they had their intervals of unexceptionable excellence that more than balanced their errors. The master-piece of Booth was Othello; there he was most in character, and seemed not more to animate or please himself in it than his spectators. 'Tis true he owed his last and highest advancement to his acting Cato; but it was the novelty and critical appearance of that character that chiefly swelled the torrent of his applause; for let the sentiments of a declaiming patriot have all the sublimity that poetry can raise them to, let them be delivered too with the utmost grace and dignity of elocution that can recommend them to the auditor, yet this is but one light wherein the excellence of an actor can shine, but in Othello we may see him in the variety of nature. There the actor is carried through the different accidents of domestick happiness and misery, occasionally torn and tortured by the most distracting passion that can raise terror or compassion in the spectator. Such are the characters that a master actor would delight in, and therefore in Othello I may safely aver, that Booth shewed himself thrice the actor that he could in Cato; and yet his merit in acting Cato need not be diminished by this comparison. Wilks often regretted, that in Tragedy he had not the full and strong voice of Booth to command and grace his periods with. But Booth used to say, that if his ear had been equal to it, Wilks had voice enough to have shewn himself a much better Tragedian. Now though there might be some truth in this, yet these two actors were of so mixed a merit, that even in Tragedy the superiority was not always on the same side. In sorrow, tenderness, or resignation, Wilks plainly had the advantage, and seemed more pathetically to feel, look, and express his calamity. But in the more turbulent transports of the heart, Booth again bore the palm, and left all competitors behind him. A fact perhaps will set this difference in a clearer light. I have formerly seen Wilks act Othello, and Booth the Earl of Effix, in which they both miscarried. Neither the exclamatory rage or jealousy of the one, or the plaintive distresses of the other, were happily executed, or became either of them, though in the contrary characters they were both excellent. When an actor becomes, and actually looks the character he stands in, I have often observed it to have had as fortunate an effect, and as much recommended him to the approbation of the common auditors, as the most correct or judicious utterance of the sentiments. This was strongly visible in the favourable reception Wilks met with in Hamlet, when I own the half of what he spoke was as painful to my ear, as every line that came from Betterton was charming, and yet it is not impossible, could they have come to a poll, but Wilks might have had a majority of admirers; however, such a division had been no proof that the preheminance had not still remained in Betterton; and if I should add that Booth too was behind Betterton in Othello, it would be saying no more than Booth himself had judgment and candour enough to know and confess. And if Booth and Wilks, are allowed in the two above-mentioned characters a second place to so great a master as Betterton, it will be a rank of praise that the best actors since my time might have been proud of.

VOL. II. No. LXXIV.

It has been before observed in speaking of BETTERTON, that his history included in a great measure that of the British theatre, from 1660 to 1710. We may with like justice assert in regard to BOOTH, that his article continues the same history twenty years lower, and therefore merited all the regard that has been paid to it. Some perhaps may imagine, that these characters are not of importance enough to deserve so great attention; but in a body of personal history, it is certainly right to have due regard to a point which has so necessary a connection with the representation of the times; and even the severest readers will find, that the history of the stage has it's uses, and that it would be no inconsiderable service done to the Republick of Letters, if due care was taken to furnish us with a compleat account of the characters of the principal performers before the Restoration, which perhaps we are not to expect in haste. As to the particulars of the behaviour of Mr Booth, considered in the light of a manager, it does not concern us so much, though it must be offered as an addition to his reputation, that during the twenty years he continued in this station the theatre was in the greatest credit, and that his illness, amongst other things, contributed not a little to it's declension. We have a very fair account of this matter from Mr Cibber, who, towards the end of his book, gives us the following detail of the ruin of their administration, by whose care the stage had been rendered equally beneficial to the managers, advantageous to those in their service, and satisfactory to the publick. A thing so much the more remarkable, as nothing like it ever happened before, or in all probability will happen again, at least in our times (10).

(10) Ibid. p. 487.

During our four last years, says he, there happened so very little unlike what had been said, that I shall conclude with barely mentioning those unavoidable accidents that drew on our dissolution.

10 K

The

(e) History of the English Stage, p. 148.

ing (e) [G]. In his private life he had many virtues, mixed with a few, and those very pardonable, failings. He was very just, punctual, and sincere in all his dealings. He was not hafty in giving his word, because he never broke it. He had no envy in his composition, but, on the contrary, readily approved, and as readily rewarded, merit, as it was in his power. He was something rough in his manner, and a little hafty in his temper, but very open and free to speak his sentiments, which he always did with an air of sincerity, that procured him as much credit with people at first sight, as he had with those to whom he had been known ever so long. He was very kind to all the Players whose circumstances were but indifferent, and took care not to make them uneasy, either in point of salary or of usage. He was no great speaker in company, but when he did, it was in a grave lofty way, not at all unlike his pronunciation on the Stage. He had a great veneration for his parents while they were living, and was also very useful to his brother and sister after their decease. In a word, he discharged all the duties of private and publick life in a genteel and generous manner, so that his death was very much regretted, and as, in his judgment, the Town saw nothing equal to Betterton after he quitted the Stage, so many are persuaded, that since the death of Mr Booth, his parts have been performed by none with superior grace.

‘ The first that for some years had led the way to greater, was the continued ill state of health that rendered Booth incapable of appearing on the stage. The next was the death of Mrs Oldfield, which happened on the 23d of October, 1730. About the same time too Mrs Porter, then in her highest reputation for Tragedy, was lost to us by the misfortune of a dislocated limb from the overturning of a chaise. And our last stroke was the death of Wilks, in September the year following, 1731.’

[G] Our author's genius and learning. It is a misfortune to the reader that we can give him no tolerable account of the person this memorable inscription referred to, beyond or exclusive of what is contained therein. His name was William Swith, and it is reasonable to believe he was of a good family, since he was a Barrister at Law of Gray's-Inn, before he quitted the Bar for the Stage. There is good reason to think that he came as early upon it as Betterton, or at least that he was not much his junior, since we find that he was embarked with him in the design of procuring a conjunction of the two companies, so long ago as the year 1681. We have reason therefore to believe, that the following lines were penned by our author in the earlier part of his life, while he preserved in their full perfection those literary qualifications which he had acquired at Westminster-school, and that happy turn in writing the Roman language, which peculiarly distinguishes such as have paid their first vows to the Muses in those venerable cloysters. The sentiments expressed in these few lines sufficiently shew Mr Booth's notions of his profession (11).

(11) Hist. of the English Stage, p. 148.

(a) Memoirs communicated by one who was most intimate with Dr Boulter from his youth to his death.

(1) Prerog. Office of Ireland.

BOULTER (HUGH) D. D. Archbishop of Armagh, Primate and Metropolitan of all Ireland, is one of those subjects that cannot be handled without panegyrick, the naked relation of his actions being such. He was born in or near London, of a reputable and estated family [A], and received his first rudiments of learning at Merchant-Taylor's school (a), in that great metropolis, where having with a quick proficiency got through Grammar learning, and such parts of knowledge as are usually taught in schools, he was admitted

[A] Born of a reputable and estated family. His father had an estate near Oxford, and in houses and ground-rents in the Minories and Cripplegate, London; as also in Bermondsey in Southwark, and in Kensington in Middlesex; all which Dr Boulter enjoyed to the time of his death, subject to a few small incumbrances left on them by his father: And he by his own Will, dated the 19th of November, 1729 (1), directed, that on the contingency of the death of his wife without issue by him, the said several estates (specially named in the Will) should be sold, and the money arising by such sale he ordered to be disposed of as follows; namely, First, to his brother Charles Savage he devised one hundred pounds; to Dr Robert Welsted one hundred pounds, or, if he were dead, one hundred pounds to his eldest surviving son; and the overplus of the money arising from such sale, together with the remainder of the money he had in the stocks, he directed should be remitted to his trustees in Ireland, to be laid out in manner following; namely, that out of the Scenicus eximius,

Regnante Carolo Secundo:
Bettertono Coætaneus & Amicus,
nec non propemodum Æqualis.
Haud ignobili stirpe Oriundus,
Nec Literarum rudis humaniorum, rem Scenicam
per multos feliciter annos administravit;
Justoque moderamine & morum suavitare;
Omnium intra Theatrum
Observantiam, extra Theatrum Laudem,
Ubique benevolentiam & amorem sibi conciliavit.

In English thus.

An Excellent Player
In the reign of Charles the Second:
The contemporary and friend of Betterton, and almost his equal.
Descended of no ignoble family,
nor destitute of polite Learning.
The business of the stage
He for many years happily managed:
And by his just conduct and sweetness of manners obtained
the respect of all within the Theatre, the applause of those without,
and the good will and love of all mankind.

E

money they returned, and the overplus of his effects undisposed in Ireland, his trustees should build four houses for the widows of such Clergymen as had been Curates at least ten years in the diocese of Armagh; and that an estate of fifty pounds a year should be bought by his trustees, to be equally divided among the said four widows, after deducting for necessary repairs; and that the said widows be nominated by his successors, and be subject to their order and visitation. And as to what should remain of such funds, he directed it to be paid to his successors, to be employed in augmenting poor livings, and buying glebes, according to the directions of the trustees of the first fruits. And for doing the more service with such money, he ordered, that whatever purchase was made with it in tythes or land, that the same should not be made over to any incumbent absolutely till such tythes or land should repay half the purchase-money without interest. And this he did in order to make the fund more considerable for the purposes intended.

[B] Rememberes!

admitted from thence a Commoner (b) in Christ-church in Oxford, some time before the Revolution. His merit became so conspicuous there, that immediately after that great event, he was elected a Demy (c) of Magdalen-college, together with the late Mr Addison, and Dr Joseph Wilcox, the present Bishop of Rochester, and Dean of Westminster. Dr Hough, who was then restored to the Presidentship of that college (from which he had been unwarrantably ejected in the reign of King James the II.) used to call this election by the name of the golden election (d), from the merit and learning of the persons who were chosen; and the same respectful appellation was long after made use of in common conversation in the college. He was afterwards made Fellow (e) of Magdalen-college, for which, as well as for Christ-church, he always retained sentiments of respect and gratitude, and, as a proof thereof, he afterwards remembered them both in his Will [B]. He continued in the university till he was called to London, by the invitation of Sir Charles Hedges, Principal Secretary of State in the year 1700 (f), who made him his Chaplain; and some time after he was preferred to the same honour (g) by Dr Thomas Tenison, Archbishop of Canterbury. In these stations he was under a necessity of appearing often at Court, where his merit and virtues fell under the notice of Charles Spencer, Earl of Sunderland, Principal Secretary of State, by whose influence and interest he was advanced to his first promotions in the Church, namely, to the parsonage of St Olave in Southwark, and to the archdeaconry of Surrey (b). The parish of St Olave was very populous, and for the most part poor, under which circumstances it required a vigilant Pastor, and in this particular Dr Boulter was by no means deficient (i), applying himself in season and out of season, to their instruction, correction, and reproof; nor was his purse wanting to help the necessitous, according to his abilities and their emergencies. When King George I. passed over to Hanover in the year 1719, Dr Boulter was recommended to attend him in quality of his Chaplain (k). During his abode there he took a good deal of pains to learn the German language; in which, nevertheless, he did not arrive to any great perfection (l). He also, at the King's instance, took Prince Frederick under his care, to instruct him in the English tongue; and for that purpose drew up for his use, A Set of Instructions in writing, which, together with his great moderation and sweetness of temper, riveted him in the King's favour, and caused his Majesty to lay hold of the earliest opportunity of promoting him in the Church, which soon happened (m). For, during his abode at Hanover, the bishoprick of Bristol, and deanery of Christ-church, Oxford, became vacant by the death of Dr George Smalridge, on the twenty-seventh of September 1719 (n), and the news thereof arriving at Hanover, the King of his meer motion granted to him that See and deanery, and he was consecrated (o) Bishop of Bristol, on the fifteenth of November following. In this last station he was more than ordinarily assiduous (p), in the visitation of his diocese, and the discharge of his pastoral duty, well knowing how much the interest of the Church depended upon a strict reformation of the lives and morals of the clergy, and a faithful and diligent execution of the trust committed to them. While he was employed in the business of one of these visitations, he received a letter (q) by a Messenger from the Secretary of State, acquainting him, that his Majesty had nominated him to the archbishoprick of Armagh, and primacy of Ireland, then vacant by the death of Dr Thomas Lindsay, on the 13th of July, 1724 (r), and desiring him to repair to London as soon as possible, to kiss the King's hand for his promotion. What would have given joy to another, to this good Bishop afforded only matter of grief; and we have heard it affirmed by indisputable testimony, that he never appeared more disconcerted in his life, than upon receiving the news of the King's pleasure. He consulted with his own thoughts for a few hours, and advised with such of his friends as were present, how he should conduct himself on this grand occasion. At length he called for a pen and ink, and sent an answer by the messenger, refusing (s) the honour the King intended him, and requesting the Secretary to use his good offices with his Majesty, in making his excuse. Whether his refusal was owing to an unwillingness in him to quit his native country, where he stood so fair in the King's favour, as to hope for high advancements, or to a timorousness of accepting a charge, that his great modesty judged was too weighty for him to support, must be left a doubt to posterity; but thus much may be affirmed with certainty, that the people of Ireland were upon the point of losing a man, for whom they will for ever have reason to be thankful to God. The Messenger was dispatched (t) back to him by the Secretary, with the King's absolute commands that he should

(b) Memoirs communicated, &c.

(c) Memoirs, &c.

(d) Memoirs, &c.

(e) Memoirs, &c.

(f) Memoirs, &c.

(g) Memoirs, &c.

(b) Memoirs, &c.

(i) Memoirs &c.

(k) Memoirs, &c.

(l) Memoirs, &c.

(m) Memoirs, &c.

(n) Court Register, p. 70.

(o) Court Register, p. 70.

(p) Memoirs, &c.

(q) Memoirs, &c.

(r) Bishops of Ireland, p. 132.

(s) Memoirs, &c.

(t) Memoirs, &c.

[B] Remembered Magdalen-college and Christ-Church in his Will.] Upon the contingency of his wife's death without issue by him, he bequeathed (2) five hundred pounds to Magdalen-college in Oxford, to be applied towards rebuilding the same; and on the like contingency he bequeathed a thousand pounds to Christ-Church in the same university, to be applied to the purchase of an estate for founding five exhibitions of equal value, to be distributed among five of the poorest and most deserving of the Commoners of that college, to be enjoyed by them for four years from the time of their election; and directed, that no Commoner of above three years standing should be elected into the said exhibitions. He vested the said election in the Dean and Canons of that house, and directed that the exhibitors should be chose upon a publick examination in the hall, and recommended the sons of Clergymen to be in the first place, cæteris paribus, considered. He also bequeathed the further sum of five hundred pounds to the last mentioned college to buy an estate, to be distributed in equal exhibitions to five Servitors of the said college, of whom none were to be capable of election who were of above two years standing, nor to enjoy the exhibition longer than for three years; and he vested the right of election in the Dean and Chapter.

(2) Prerog. Office of Ireland.

should accept of the post. He submitted to his Majesty's pleasure, though not without some reluctance, and soon after addressed himself to his journey to Court. Ireland was at that juncture not a little inflamed, by a ruinous project set on foot by one Wood [C], and it was thought by the King and Ministry, that the judgment, moderation, and wisdom of the Bishop of Bristol, would tend much to bring back matters to a calm there. He arrived in Ireland on the third of November, 1724, and had no sooner passed patent (u) for the primacy, than he set about studying the real and solid interest of that kingdom, in which his lot was cast for life, and which all his actions shewed, he ever after considered as his own. He appeared at all boards of publick concernment, and gave a weight and vigour to them; and in every respect, was indefatigable in promoting the good and real happiness of the people. It would tire the reader to be over minute in relating all the good actions of his Grace, nor would it be an easy task to do so, since they are branched out into such a multiplicity of parts; and more especially, as he rather studied to do good, than desire to have it published. Yet some things must not be passed over in silence, and it were to be wished that proper dates of facts could be ascertained, in order to carry on a thread of a relation, which now must be mentioned as they occur to memory, without observing any order of time.—In seasons of great scarcity in Ireland, he was more than once, under God, instrumental in averting a pestilence and famine, which threatened the nation [D]. When the scheme was set on foot for making a navigation, by a canal to be drawn from Lough-Neagh to Newry, not only for bringing coal to Dublin, but to carry on more effectually an inland trade in the several counties in the north of Ireland, through which it was intended to be carried, he greatly encouraged and promoted the design [E], not only with his counsel but his purse, to the vast benefit of the kingdom at present, and much more in expectation when the scheme is fully completed.

Droghedah

(u) Rolls Office
Ireland, Pat. 31
Aug. 1724.

[C] Ireland inflamed by a ruinous project of one Wood. This project was a patent Wood had obtained from the Crown, by false suggestions, for coining three hundred and sixty tons of copper into halfpence and farthings, to be issued in Ireland, of which he sent over great quantities struck in a base metal, and under weight. All ranks and degrees of people murmured at this proceeding. The Parliament, the Lords Justices and Council, and the County and City of Dublin, addressed his Majesty upon the occasion; the Prefs groaned with pamphlets written in opposition to the scheme, and some in particular were admirably well done by Dr Swift, Dean of St Patrick's Dublin, under the fictitious name of Letters from a Drapier, as if written by a tradesman to incite people against receiving this base coin, which the patent left at the liberty of the subject whether to receive or reject.

[D] Instrumental in averting a pestilence and famine which threatened the nation. In the winter of 1728, and the summer following, bread, corn, and all other esculents, bore and excessive high rate in Ireland, the middle price of wheat being then from 1*l.* 2*s.* 3*d.* to 1*l.* 5*s.* per Bristol barrel. The poor were thereby reduced to a miserable condition, and the nation not only threatened with a famine, but with the consequences of it, a pestilence. The Primate could not bear to see his fellow-creatures perish while he had abilities to relieve them, and accordingly he distributed vast quantities of corn for the relief of the poor through several parts of the kingdom, which, it is verily believed, was a great means of averting the threatened evil. The House of Commons was so sensible of the services he did upon this occasion, that they passed a vote of publick thanks to him, and ordered it to be entered in their Journals, and directed all the vagrant poor that crowded the streets of the city of Dublin to be received into the poor-house, where they were maintained at the private expence of this Prelate, 'till the following harvest brought relief.—In the latter end of the year 1740, and the spring, and part of the summer of 1741, Ireland was again afflicted with a great scarcity. Upon this occasion the Primate's charity was very extensive and remarkable, though conducted with more regularity than before. The poor were fed in the workhouse twice every day, according to tickets issued by people intrusted, of which, from January to August, the number of tickets amounted to seven hundred and thirty-two thousand three hundred and fourteen. The accounts of the distribution of this charity is kept in the workhouse in Dublin, and it is estimated thereby, that two thousand five hundred souls were fed there every morning, and as many every evening, mostly at the primate's expence, though some few others contributed to the good work. As a grateful memorial of his Grace's overflowing charity in relieving so many distressed families upon this occasion, in the year 1741, a few lay-gentlemen, at their private expence, erected, in the hall of the poor-house, a grand noble portrait of the Primate at full length, designed by Mr Bindon, an eminent Painter, attended with a lively group of proper objects of different ages and sexes, all waiting for food supplied by his bountiful hand.

[E] Encouraged and promoted the scheme for drawing a Canal from Lough-Neagh to Newry. Lough-Neagh is a large navigable meer of water, about twenty English miles long, and from ten to twelve miles broad, surrounded by the counties of Down, Londonderry, Antrim, Tirone, and Armagh; and Newry is a considerable trading town, seated on the Newry water, in the south of the county of Down, not far from the opening of Carlingford bay. A great fund of valuable coals being discovered on lands in the county of Tirone, bordering the said lake, it was judged by some gentlemen, who wished well to the wealth and trade of their country, that if a navigation was made by a canal from the lake to Newry, a great saving would arise to the kingdom by bringing coals through the said lake and canal to Newry, and from thence by a free good navigation by sea to Dublin. When the scheme for opening this navigation was proposed in Parliament, in the year 1729, the Primate patronized it with all his interest, and after passing the bill, and that the work was set about the year following, his Grace was very instrumental in carrying it on with effect. The colliery stood on the Sea-lands of Armagh, which were then in lease to a tenant. The Primate fearing that the lessee might be exorbitant in his conditions in suffering coals to be raised out of his lands, purchased in the lease at a large expence in order to accommodate the publick. He also gave timber out of his woods to carry on the work; and often, when the fund established by Act of Parliament for cutting the canal did not readily come in, his Grace advanced his own proper money for the occasion without interest, that no interruption might from thence arise to the design. See a description and account of this canal in a little treatise published in Dublin in the year 1744, intitled, The Antient and present State of the County of Down, chap. 4. The importance of this navigation, besides the article of coals, (of which the benefit is not yet fully felt) and the opening a trade by water-carriage among the northern counties, has appeared this present year 1745. For the wetness of the preceding harvest having occasioned a great dearth of corn, and scarcity of fodder in those parts, most of the carriage-horses in that country were destroyed; and when a relief of corn came to Newry from England, it would have been impossible to have distributed it seasonably through the country, if it had not been for the advantages of this navigation, by which it was laid down in the neighbourhood of most of the inhabitants of the said counties.

[F] After

Droghedah is a large and populous town within the diocese of Armagh, and his Grace finding that the ecclesiastical appointments were not sufficient to support two clergymen there, and the cure over burthenfome for one effectually to discharge, he allotted out of his own pocket a maintenance for a second Curate, whom he obliged to give publick service every Sunday in the afternoon, and prayers twice every day. He had great compassion for the poor clergy of his diocese, who were disabled from giving their children a proper education, and he maintained several of the sons of such in the university, in order to qualify them for future preferment. He erected four houses at Droghedah for the reception of clergymens widows, and purchased an estate for the endowment of them, after the model of Primate Marsh's charity [F]; which model, nevertheless, he enlarged in one particular; for as the estate he purchased for the maintenance of the widows, amounted to twenty-four pounds a year more than he had set apart for that use, he appointed that the surplus should be a fund for setting out the children of such widows apprentices, or otherwise to be disposed of for the benefit of such children, as his Trustees should think proper. He also by his Will directed (w), that four houses should be built for clergymens widows at Armagh, and endowed with fifty pounds a year; which building has been finished, and the endowment made since his death. During his life, he contracted for the building of a stately market-house at Armagh, which has been since finished by his executors, at upwards of eight hundred pounds expence. He was a benefactor also to Dr Stevens's Hospital in the city of Dublin [G], erected for the maintenance and cure of the poor. His charities for augmenting small livings, and buying of glebes, (particularly mentioned in the remark A) amounted to upwards of thirty thousand pounds, besides what he devised by his Will for the like purposes in England [H]. The wisdom of man could not contrive a more effectual method for the instruction of the poor Popish natives of Ireland in the principles of Christianity, and for inuring them to industry and labour, than the institution of the incorporated Society for promoting English Protestant working schools in that country. Though the original projection of this scheme cannot be imputed to Primate Boulter [I], yet he was a zealous and active, and the

(w) See for this particular under remark [A].

[F] After the model of Primate Marsh's charity.] Primate Marsh built and endowed alms-houses at Droghedah for the reception of twelve widows of decayed Clergymen, to whom he allotted a lodging, and twenty pounds a year for a maintenance; and he appointed that the widows intitled to the provision should be such whose husbands served cures in the diocese of Armagh, or, for want of such, in the diocese of Meath; and, if numbers did not offer to take up the charity in both these dioceses, then it was to go the widows of Clergymen who served cures in the province of Armagh at large. Primate Boulter founded his charity upon the same model.

[G] Was a benefactor to Dr Stevens's hospital.] Dr Stevens, a Physician of eminence in the city of Dublin, bequeathed by his Will an estate of about six hundred pounds a year to his sister Mrs Grizel Stevens during her life, and, after her decease, to build and maintain an hospital for the cure of wounded and diseased poor people, who should be judged to be curable. The Lady, from a principle of charity and goodness, set about the work, and finished the best half of the shell of the house, in which she has reserved an apartment for her own habitation, where she now resides; and she has allotted almost the whole estate for the support and maintenance of her brother's design. After the house was finished, several well disposed persons became contributors towards fitting up and furnishing the wards; and, among others, Primate Boulter subscribed fifty pounds, and also at a considerable expence furnished one of the wards for the reception of patients, and subscribed fifty pounds a year towards the charity, to continue during pleasure, which lasted during his life.

[H] Besides what he devised by his Will for the like purposes in England.] Upon certain contingencies mentioned in his Will (3), he appointed one thousand pounds to be disposed of by his English Trustees, towards augmenting ten poor livings in England, on condition that some other person for each hundred pound so advanced should pay in one hundred pounds more, in order to obtain from the governors of Queen Anne's bounty, two hundred pounds towards the augmenting such poor livings; and he left it to his Trustees what livings should be so augmented.

[I] The original projection of the scheme for Charter working schools not to be imputed to Primate Boulter.] The first rise of this scheme was thus effected, and from small and inconsiderable beginnings.— In the year 1717 Dr Henry Maule, late Bishop of Cloyne, afterwards of Dromore, and now the present Bishop of Meath, being at that time only a beneficed Clergyman, promoted a private society in Dublin for the encouragement of the English common charity-schools, for teaching poor children to read and write, and instructing them in the principles of religion and virtue. Many good Clergymen and well disposed laymen joined in the design, and the late Archbishop of Tuam, Dr Syngé, came among them, and gave a countenance to the undertaking. The members subscribed only half a crown a quarter. They had anniverfary sermons, some of which were printed and spread abroad, and by their influence many charity-schools were erected in town and country. In 1730 a proposal was drawn up by Dr Maule, being then Bishop of Cloyne, and Mr Dawson, a Clergyman, who was at that time Curate of St Michan's, intituled, An Humble Proposal for obtaining his Majesty's Royal Charter to incorporate a Society for promoting Christian Knowledge amongst the poor Natives of the Kingdom of Ireland. Printed, Dublin, 1730. What gave a foundation to this proposal was, the observations the Society had made on the great success of a legally established charter for propagating the Gospel in foreign parts, and that Scotland had grafted on the same model, and obtained a charter to enable them to receive two thousand pounds a year in land, and money to any sum, for promoting the like design. This proposal made it's way into the Court of St James's by the means of the late Marquis of Montandre, Master of the Ordnance in Ireland, and was well relished by his Majesty. The same year many Bishops and gentlemen of distinction met together at the Lord Primate's, to concert means for forwarding a petition to the King upon the occasion, which was then drawn up and signed in the Parliament-House a few days after, and, being laid before his Majesty, was graciously received; and, after the usual references, a charter was passed on the 24th of October, 1733, constituting the Duke of Dorset, then Lord-Lieutenant, the Lord Primate, all the Archbishops and Bishops, the Judges of the several Courts, the Prime Serjeant, Attorney and Solicitor-General, and most of the Nobility and prime Gentry of the kingdom, into a Corporation and Body Politick to endure for ever, by the name of the Incorporated Society in Dublin for promoting English Protestant Schools in Ireland. The Charter was opened with solemnity in the Council-Chamber on the 6th of February, 1733. The Lord-Lieutenant was elected President, and the Lord Primate Vice-President and Treasurer. A subscription was immediately set on foot, to which the late Earl of Kildare contributed five hundred pounds, and many others less sums. The

(3) Prerog. Office in Ireland.

the chief instrument in forwarding the undertaking, which he lived to see carried into execution with considerable success. These are a part, and only a part, of the Primate's publick charities, which have come to our knowledge; as to his private ones, they were so secretly conducted, that it is impossible to give any particular account of them; in general it may be confidently asserted, that they were very great, and suitable to his noble mind; and we have it affirmed by those who were in trust about him, that he never suffered an object to leave his house unsupplied, and he often sent them away with considerable sums, according to the judgment he made of their merits and necessities. — In relation to his political virtues, and the arts of government, when his health would permit him he was constant in his attendance at the Council-Table, and it is well known what weight and dignity he gave to the debates of that Board. As he always studied the true interest of Ireland, so he judged, that the diminishing the value of the gold coin would be a means of increasing silver in the country, a thing very much wanted; in order to effect which, he espoused and supported a scheme at the Council-Table, which raised the clamours of unthinking people against him [K]: But experience has demonstrated the wisdom of his proceedings. He was ten times one of the Lords-Justices, or Chief Governors of Ireland [L]; which office he administered oftener than any other Chief Governor since the commencement of the English power in Ireland. He embarked for England on the second of June 1742, and after two days illness died at his house in St James's Place, on the twenty-eighth of September following, to the inestimable loss of Ireland, leaving to his successors an example that is scarce imitable. He was buried in Westminster-Abbey, where a stately monument is erected to his memory. — His character results from the relation given of him; yet we must add a few particulars more, which have not fallen under any of the heads before-mentioned. His deportment was stayed and grave, his aspect venerable, and his temper meek and humble. He was always open and easy of access both to rich and poor. He was steady to the principles of liberty both in Religion and Politicks. His learning was universal, yet more in substance than shew; nor would his modesty permit him to make any ostentation of it. He always preserved such an equal temper of mind that hardly any thing could ruffle; and I have heard a gentleman of great worth and integrity, and at this day in high station, (who had lived fourteen years in his family as his domestick Chaplain) affirm, that in all that time he never saw him discomposed but once, and that upon a very provoking occasion; yet that he recovered his usual serenity and good humour in less than three minutes. He always maintained a steady resolution of serving his country, i. e. Ireland, which he often called by that name; and he readily embraced every thing proposed for the good of it, though by persons remarkable for their opposition to him: and when the most publick-spirited schemes were introduced by him, and did not meet with the reception they deserved, yet he never took offence at the partial proceedings of some few, who liked nothing that came from him; but was glad when any part of his advice for the publick good was pursued, and was always willing to drop some point, that he might not lose them all; often saying 'he would do all the good to Ireland he could, though they did not suffer him to do all he would.' His life was mostly spent in action, and therefore it is not to be expected that he should have left many remains of his learning behind him; nor do we know of any thing he hath written, except a few Charges to his clergy at his visitations, which are grave, solid,

and

Lord Primate was the main instrument of forwarding this good work, not only by his advice and counsel, but by his money. He paid all the fees for passing the Charter through the several offices out of his own purse, subscribed twenty-three pounds a year, afterwards paid upwards of four hundred pounds towards the building of a working-school on the lands of Santry near Dublin. Besides all this, the Society were often obliged to his Grace for their necessary support, who, to his annual and occasional benefactions, frequently added that of being their constant resource upon all emergencies, by answering the draughts made on him as Treasurer, when he had no cash of the Society's in his hands, which amounted to considerable sums. It was unhappy for the Society that his Grace made his Will in 1729 before the erection of the Charter, and was taken off with so short a warning, that he had not the power of altering it. For undoubtedly he would have been a noble benefactor to a scheme, which in his life-time he had so much at heart.

[K] Espoused a scheme that raised the clamours of unthinking people. The scarcity of silver coin in Ireland was excessive great for some years preceding that of 1737, occasioned by the sinking of the current value of gold coin in England some years before, the same having been reduced there six-pence in each guinea, which made it more advantageous to dealers to send over silver than gold in payment of the ballance of trade which lay against Ireland. To remedy this inconvenience, the Primate supported a scheme introduced at the Council-table to reduce the value of gold coin in Ireland three-pence in each guinea, and other pieces in proportion, in order to bring silver and gold nearer a par in value, and by that means to put a stop to the practice of sending silver abroad. This scheme was carried into execution by proclamation on the 10th of September, 1737, and experience has shewed that it had the intended effect, both by making silver more plentiful in the kingdom, and keeping down exchange to a more certain and moderate rate. Few people are capable of making a just judgment of the springs and motives of the actions of government, nor does it belong to any to do so, but to those who are placed by his Majesty at the head of affairs. The populace, encouraged by some dealers in exchange, who were the only losers by the alteration, grew clamorous, and laid the ruin of their country (as they ignorantly or maliciously called it) at the Primate's door. Many libels and bitter invectives were written against him upon the occasion, as if he were the author of woes, which were only felt in imagination. Conscious of his own integrity he despised the foolish noise, the people in a short time recovered their senses, and the Primate has left an example, perhaps unparallled in history, of a person, who, from a state of distaste and odium, recovered as high a degree of popularity, as has fallen to the share of any subject.

[L] He was ten times one of the Lords-Justices or chief Governors of Ireland. He enjoyed that office in 1726 with the Lord Chancellor West, and William Conolly, and instructive. It has been said indeed, that in his younger days he was the author of four or five occasional papers in the Free-thinkers, published for the encouragement of loyalty, virtue, and religion; but we cannot affirm this particular with any degree of certainty. In short, his constant business in this world was to do good to mankind.

Conolly, Esq; In 1728 with the Lord Chancellor Windham, and the said Mr Conolly. In 1730 with the said Chancellor, and Sir Ralph Gore, Bart. Speaker of the House of Commons. In 1732 with the same. In 1733 with the Lord Chancellor Windham. In 1734 with the Lord Chancellor Windham, and Henry Boyle, Esq; Speaker of the House of Commons. In 1736 with the same. In 1738 with the same. In 1740 with the Lord Chancellor Joceline, and Mr Boyle; and in 1741 with the same. D BOURCHIER or BOWSCHÏRE (a) or BOWCER (b) (THOMAS), (a) Dies Obituales Archiep. Cantuar. apud Wharton. Anglia Sacra, Vol. I. p. 63.

Archbishop of Canterbury in the successive reigns of Henry VI, Edward IV, Edward V, Richard III, and Henry VII, was son of William Bouchier Earl of Ewe in Normandy, and the Countess of Stafford [A], and brother of Henry Earl of Essex (c). He had his education at Oxford, and was Chancellor of that university three years, viz. from 1434 to 1437. His first dignity in the Church was that of Dean of St Martin's in London; from which, on the ninth of March 1434, he was advanced, by Pope Eugenius IV, to the See of Worcester [B]: but his consecration was deferred to the twentieth of April, 1435, by reason (as is supposed) of a defect in age. He had not sat a full year, before he was elected by the Monks of Ely Bishop of that See, and confirmed therein by the Pope: but, the King refusing his consent, Bouchier did not dare to comply with the election, for fear of incurring the censure of the laws, which forbid, under very severe penalties, the receiving the Pope's Bull without the King's leave. Nevertheless, seven or eight years after, the See of Ely still continuing vacant, and the King consenting, he was translated thither, the twentieth of December 1443 (d). The author of the Historia Eliensis (e) speaks very disadvantageously of him during his residence on that See [C], which was ten years, twenty-three weeks, and five days. At last he mounted to the pinnacle of Church preferment, being elected Archbishop of Canterbury, in the room of John Kemp, the twenty-third of April 1454. This election was the more remarkable, in that the Monks were left entirely to their liberty of choice, without any interposition either from the Crown or the Papal Chair. On the contrary, Pope Nicolas Vth's concurrence being readily obtained, the Archbishop was installed with great solemnity. In the month of December following, he received the red hat from Rome, being created Cardinal-Priest of St Cyriacus in Tbermis (f). The next year, he was made Lord High-Chancellor of England, but resigned that office in October the year following (g). Soon after his advancement to the See of Canterbury, he began a visitation in Kent, and made several regulations for the government of his diocese [D]. He likewise published a constitution for restraining the excessive abuse of Papal Provisions [E]. This Archbishop deserved highly of the learned

(b) Historia Eliensis, apud Wharton. ibid. Vol. I. p. 671.

(c) Hist. Eliensis, ibid.

(d) Continuatio Hist. de Episc. Wigorn. apud Wharton. ubi supra, p. 537.

(e) Ubi supra.

(f) Canonicus Lichfeldens. de Successione Archiep. Cantuar. apud Wharton. Vol. I. p. 123.

(g) Wharton, ibid. p. 795.

[A] He was son of William Bouchier, Earl of Ewe in Normandy, and the Countess of Stafford. If this genealogy be right, Bishop Godwin must be mistaken in saying he was the son of Henry Earl of Essex. Patre is natus est Henrico Bouchier Essexiæ Comite (1). Fuller tells us, this Prelate's father Sir William Bouchier was created Earl of Ewe in Normandy by King Henry V, and that it is supposed the Archbishop was born at Hawsted in Essex, one of the family-seats of the Bouchiers (2), or Bourchiers, of whom Robert Bouchier was Chancellor of England in the time of Edward III, from whom, Camden tells us (3), an honourable series of Earls and Lords are descended.

[B] He was advanced by Pope Eugenius IV. to the See of Worcester. The author of the Continuation of the History of the Bishops of Worcester (4) informs us, that, upon the death of Thomas Polton, Bishop of Worcester, Pope Eugenius, then sitting in the Council of Basil, conferred that Bishoprick, by right of Provision, on Thomas Brouns, Dean of Salisbury, and wrote letters to King Henry, desiring his approbation thereof. The King, on the contrary, sent letters to Thomas Brouns, commanding him to renounce the Provision, otherwise he would never suffer him to obtain any Bishoprick in England, much less that of Worcester. At the same time he wrote to the Pope, absolutely refusing his consent to the Provision, and offering this compromise, that if his Holiness would advance Bouchier, who was his kinsman, to the See of Worcester, he consented that Thomas Brouns might be promoted to that of Rochester. The Pope, not daring to oppose the King of England during the sitting of a General Council, complied with the proposition; and by this means Bouchier obtained the Bishoprick of Worcester.

[C] The author of the Historia Eliensis speaks very disadvantageously of him during his residence on that See. He tells us, this Bishop of Ely cruelly oppressed the Church in collecting the rents of his Bishoprick; that he falsely imprisoned several of their tenants, and refused to deliver them up by indenture to their bailiff, according to the form and custom of their lands; that, by the advice of John Hay his Seneschal, he amerced the Prior and several of the Monks in large fines; and that, excepting the day of his installation, he never once celebrated Mass or Divine Service in his cathedral church (5). What credit is to be given to this author, who was himself a Monk at that time in that very church, and how far he may have aggravated the truth, must be left to the reader's judgment.

[D] He made several regulations for the government of his diocese. To mention the most material; he decreed, first, 'that those Religious, who threw off the habit of the Cloister, and entered upon Parochial Cures, should be punished as revolters from their order.' Secondly, 'that benefices should not be let to farm without consent of the Bishop.' And Thirdly, 'that marriages should not be celebrated, nor Wills made, without two witnesses at the least.' These, with some other constitutions for the reformation of the Clergy and Laity, he ordered to be published at Paul's-Cross (6).

[E] He passed a constitution for restraining the excessive abuse of Papal Provisions. The avarice and partiality of the Court of Rome, in conferring benefices, were at this time carried to an extravagant height. For if men brought money and strong recommendations, that Court usually overlooked the considerations of probity and merit. The weight of these grievances put the university of Oxford upon addressing the Archbishop of Canterbury to step in to their relief, who made a Synodical Constitution, 'that for the future, no person should be admitted to Holy Orders, without a testimonial from the Archdeacon of the place, or the Chancellor of the university, or his deputy.' This expedient, though at first it gave

(1) Godwin, de Præful. Angl. inter Archiep. Cantuar. an. 1454.

(2) Worthies of England, Essex, p. 324.

(3) Britannia, by Bishop Gibson, last edit, col. 421.

(4) Apud Wharton. Anglia Sacra, Vol. I. p. 537.

(5) Historia Eliensis, apud Wharton. ibid. p. 671, 672.

(6) Council. T. XIII. col. 1394. ap. Collier, Eccl. Hist. Vol. I. p. 674.

learned world, for being the principal instrument in introducing the noble art of Printing into England [F]. He was strangely imposed upon by the specious pretences of Richard Duke of Gloucester, when he undertook to persuade the Queen to deliver up the Duke of York, her son, into the Protector's hands [G]. He presided over the Church thirty-two years [H], in the most troublesome times of the English government [I]. He gave the church of Canterbury a fine image or representation of the Trinity, of solid gold, adorned with precious stones, and a complete set of sacerdotal vestments (b); to his successor two thousand marks, to compensate for dilapidations; to the church of Worcester an image of the Virgin Mary, of silver gilt, to the value of sixty-nine pounds (i); to the church of Ely two hundred marks for repairing the steeple (k); and to the university of Cambridge 180 pounds [K]. This great Prelate performed the marriage ceremony between Henry VII and the

(6) Dies Obital. Archiep. Cantuar. ubi supra.

(7) Wharton, ubi supra.

(8) Godwin, de Praeful. Angl. inter Archiep. Cant. an. 1454.

(7) Wood's Hist. & Antiq. of the University of Oxford, B. i. p. 224.

some hopes of reformation, proved insignificant through the mercenary disposition of the Bishop's officers, who were generally too much in haste for their fees to wait for any testimonials of this kind (7).

[F] He was the principal instrument in introducing the noble art of Printing into England.] This discovery being so beneficial to learning, and it's introduction among us reflecting so much honour on this Prelate's name, a short account of it may not be unacceptable in this place. You are to know then, that the Archbishop of Canterbury being informed that the inventor, Toffan, alias John Guttenberg, had set up a Press at Harlem, was extremely desirous that the English should be made masters of so beneficial an art. To this purpose he persuaded King Henry VI. to dispatch one Robert Tournour, belonging to the wardrobe, privately to Harlem. This man, furnished with a thousand marks, of which the Archbishop supplied three hundred, embarked for Holland, and, to disguise the matter, went in company with one Caxton, a merchant of London, pretending himself to be of the same profession. Thus concealing his name and his business, he went first to Amsterdam, then to Leyden, and at last settled at Harlem; where having spent a great deal of time and money, he sent to the King for a fresh supply, giving his Highness to understand, that he had almost compassed the enterprize. In short, he persuaded Frederic Corfelli, one of the Compositors, to carry off a Set of Letters, and embark with him in the night for London. When they arrived, the Archbishop, thinking Oxford a more convenient place for printing than London, sent Corfelli down thither. And, lest he should slip away before he had discovered the whole secret, a guard was set upon the Press. And thus the Mystery of Printing appeared ten years sooner in the university of Oxford than at any other place in Europe, Harlem and Mentz excepted. Not long after there were presses set up at Westminster, St Alban's, Worcester, and other monasteries of note. After this manner Printing was introduced into England, by the care of Archbishop Bouchier, in the year of Christ 1464, and the third of King Edward IV (8).

(8) Wood, ibid. p. 226, 227.

[G] He undertook to persuade the Queen to deliver up the Duke of York into the Protector's hands.] Richard Duke of Gloucester, who, upon the death of his brother King Edward IV, had been appointed by the Council Protector of the realm, and secretly aspired to the Crown, having got into his power the young King Edward V, endeavoured likewise to secure the Duke of York his brother, whom Queen Elizabeth their mother, jealous of Richard's treacherous designs, had lodged for sanctuary in Westminster-Abbey. The Protector, to gain his point, made a speech to the Council, charging the Queen with sinister intentions in flying with her son to a sanctuary, and representing, that it was highly fitting the young Prince should be lodged and educated in the King his brother's Court; and therefore he moved, that some person of distinction and interest with the Queen, might be sent to persuade her to put the Duke of York into their hands. The Council approving the motion, the Archbishop of Canterbury was pitched upon as the properest person to undertake the business. This Prelate, suspecting no foul practices, waited upon the Queen, and did his utmost to prevail with her to deliver up her son, assuring her, that nothing was intended in the whole affair but what was honourable and just. But the Queen, whose fears were alarmed by her affection, and who seems to have dived farther into the Protector's designs, was by no means satisfied with the Archbishop's reasons for her parting with her son. She expressed her fears and apprehensions in the strongest terms, and declared she had not courage to put the young Duke into Richard's hands, who was already possessed of his brother, and who, if both the children should miscarry, might probably lay claim to the Crown. The Archbishop, perceiving the Queen's distrust of the Protector, and aversion to a compliance, thought it best to put the matter upon a short issue. He told her, that if she pleased to trust her son with himself, or any other Lord of the Council, he would pawn both body and soul for his security; but if she was unalterably resolved to the contrary, he would forbear soliciting, and give her Highness no farther trouble; adding withal, that he thought the Queen had a mean opinion of the honesty or understanding of himself and the rest of the Council; and that her suspicion amounted to a charge of treachery or want of common-sense. The Queen, seeing the Archbishop disconcerted, and ready to take his leave, and considering that it was impracticable to remove her son to any other place, concluded it more advisable to comply, than submit to force; for by voluntarily delivering up the young Duke, and committing him to their trust, she thought the honour and inclination of the Lords would be faster engaged for his preservation (9). The behaviour of Archbishop Bouchier on this occasion shews plainly, that he was too credulous, and that he was perfectly over-reached by the Protector.

[H] He governed the Church thirty-two years.] Godwin tells us, this was three years longer than Archbishop Chicheley sat, and that Bouchier had enjoyed the prelacy fifty-one years from the time of his first consecration; a longer term (he observes) than was to be found in the history of any other English Bishop. Diturnitate praesidendi Chicheleium tres annos supergressus, sedit archiepiscopus annos 32, vixit autem post primam consecrationem annum unum supra quinquaginta. Inter Anglos nostros non reperiri quonquam, qui unquam episcopatum tam diu gesserit (10).

(9) See Sir Tho. More's Life and Reign of Edw. V. apud Complete Hist. of England, Vol. I. p. 486—491. See also Collier's Eccles. Hist. of Great Britain, B. vii. Vol. I. p. 685.

[I] ——— in the most troublesome times of the English government.] Namely, those of Henry VI, and Edward IV; the former of whom, though accounted a most religious Prince, yet, through an inactivity unworthy of a monarch, ingloriously lost the kingdom of France, which his father had conquered; and Edward, by his attempts to dethrone Henry, plunged his country in a civil war, which lasted many years, nor had an end, 'till, a little before the death of this Prelate, by the happy marriage of Henry VII. with Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Edward, the factions of York and Lancaster were extinguished, and a solid peace restored. Majora praestitutum Bouchierium facile crediderim, nisi in tempora incidisset turbulentissima, Henrici nimirum sexti et Edwardi quarti, quorum ille, ob pietatem vir habitus sanctissimus, ob inertiam tamen inter pessimos reges numerandus (nam Galliam a patre subactam amisit turpiter, ac postea deinde Angliae etiam regno excidit) Edwardus vero paterque ejus, Henricum evertere satagentes, intestino bello multos per annos patriam gravissimè afflixerunt. Neque id finem habuit, priusquam, paulo ante obitum hujusce praefulit, felicissimo connubio Henrico Richmondano cum Elizabetha Edwardi filia primogenita conjuncto, Lancastrensi et Eboracensium factiones extinctae, ac pax tandem solida et diu exoptata coaluit (11).

(10) Godwin, ubi supra.

[K] He gave to the university of Cambridge 120 pounds.] This sum, together with 100 pounds given by one Billingworth, were laid up in a particular chest (called from thence Bouchier's and Billingworth's chest) to be lent, as occasion required, to poor scholars (12). Wharton tells us (13), it was thirty years after the Archbishop's death, before the university of Cambridge could recover this legacy of his executors.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Id. ibid.

(13) Angl. Sacra. Vol. I. P. 795.

[L] He

(1) Worthies of England, Essex, p. 324.

(m) Pitt. de Illustr. Angl. Script. in Append. p. 914.

(14) Fuller, ubi supra.

the daughter of Edward IV; so that, as Dr Fuller observes (1), his hand first held that sweet poise, wherein the white and red roses were tied together. And he had the happiness to be contemporary with many Prelates of the most distinguished birth in the English History [L]. He was certainly a man of good learning [M]; though nothing written by him has come down to us, if we except a few Synodical Decrees (m). Dart tells us (n), he founded a Chantry, which was afterwards surrendered to King Henry VIII. Archbishop Bouchier died at his palace of Knowle, on Thursday the thirtieth of March 1486 (o), and was buried on the north side of the choir, by the high altar, in a tomb of marble (p), on which is an inscription mentioned below [N].

[L] He was contemporary with many Prelates of the noblest birth in the English history.] This observation belongs to the author of the Worthies of England, who has enumerated those Prelates. Take it in his own words. 'I know not what generous planet had then influence on the Court of Rome; this I know, that England never saw such a concurrence of noble Prelates, who, as they were Peers by their places, were little less by their descent. I behold their birth a good buttress of episcopacy in that age, able in Parliament to check and crush any anti-prelatical project by their own relations. But let us count how many were contemporaries with Thomas Bouchier, from his first consecration of Worcester to the day of his death; John Stafford, son to the Earl of Stafford, Archbishop of Canterbury; Robert Fitz-Hugh — Bishop of London; Henry Beaufort, son to John Duke of Lancaster, Bishop of Winchester; William Gray, son to the Lord Gray of Codnor, Bishop of Ely; Marmaduke Lumley, extracted from the Lord Lumley, Bishop of Lincoln; Richard Beauchamp, brother to the Lord Saint Amand, Bishop of Sarum; Lionel Woodville, son to the Earl Rivers, Bishop of Sarum; Peter Courtney, extracted from the Earl of Devon, Bishop of Exeter; Richard Courtney, of the same extraction, Bishop of Norwich; John Zouch, descended of the Lord Zouch, Bishop of Landaff; George Nevile, brother to the Make-King Earl of Warwick, Archbishop of York; William Dudley, son to the Lord Dudley, Bishop of Durham; and William Percy, son to the Earl of Northumberland, Bishop of Carlisle (14).'

[M] He was a man of good learning.] Pits informs us, that this Prelate was more than once intrusted with an enquiry into Heresies, and that he wrote his opinion about these things to the Pope and the Court of Rome; that Jobannes Buriensis dedicated to him his work against Reginald Peacock; and that it appears from Polydore Virgil and Onuphrius Panvinius, that he wrote several pieces; but what they were, excepting some Synodical Constitutions, neither he nor they could find. From all which this author collects, that Bouchier was a learned man. Doctrinam humanis ex eo colligimus, quod examen hereticorum non semel illi fuerit conceditum, et quod super his rebus ad summum pontificem et curiam Romanam suam sententiam in scriptis miserit. Item quod Joannes Buriensis suum opus contra Reginaldum Peacockum seu Parvonom ei nuncupaverit. Ceterum ex Polydoro Virgilio et Onuphrio Panvino colligi potest, eum multa scripta edidisse, sed quoniam illa fuerint, præter decreta quædam Synodalia, et me latet, et illos (15).

[N] The inscription on his tomb.] It is as follows (16). Hic jacet Reverendissimus in Christo pater et Dominus, D. Thomas Bouchier, quondam Sacrosanctæ Romanæ Ecclesiæ et S. Cyriaci in Thermis Cardinalis, et Archiepiscopus hujus Ecclesiæ, qui obiit trigesima die Martii, 1486, cujus animæ propitiatur Deus. Amen. Which inscription is in old text characters, and engraved round the verge of the monument; in English thus. 'Here lies the most Reverend Father in Christ and Lord, the Lord Thomas Bouchier, some time Cardinal of the holy Roman Church, and of St Cyriacus in Thermis, and Archbishop of this Church, who died the thirtieth day of March, in the year of our Lord 1486, on whose soul God have mercy. Amen.'

(n) History of the Cathedral Church of Canterbury, p. 162.

(o) Wharton, ubi supra.

(p) Godwin, ubi supra.

(15) Pitt. de Illustr. Angl. Script. in Append. p. 914.

(16) Dart's History of the Cathedral of Caoterbury, p. 162.

BOYDE, the name of a very antient, noble, and once the most flourishing family in Scotland, the genealogy of which we shall give in the note [A], and begin this article with the first nobleman thereof, ROBERT BOYDE, whose great abilities raised him

[A] The genealogy of which we shall give in the notes.] With regard to the antiquity of this family, the Scotch genealogist, Mr Crawford, (1) observes, that the common bearing of the Boydes and Stewarts, (2) has given ground to a conjecture that they are branched from the Royal Family of Stewart; long before the name of Stewart was used by the younger sons of that illustrious family; but upon what occasion they assumed this name, he does not take upon him to say. The first who assumed the surname of Boyde, is said to be Robert the son of Simon, third son of Allan, Lord high-steward of Scotland, in the year 1111 (3); and in right of this Robert, from whom the Kilmarnock family is lineally descended, this branch of the name of Boyde claims to be chief, and acted as such when chieftainship was in repute in that part of the country; but for more than a century and an half, chiefs in that part of Scotland neither have nor claim any other advantage than that of precedence.

Historians have left a blank in the genealogy of the family, from the last mentioned Robert Boyde, in the year 1111, to a descendant of his, called Sir Robert Boyde, who, in the year 1263, gave signal proofs of his valour and military skill, in that famous battle of the Largs, fought between the Scots and Norwegians who had made a descent in that part of the country; for which he obtained a grant from the crown of several lands in the shire of Cunningham (4). He was succeeded by another Sir Robert, who added no small lustre to the family, by his loyalty, exercising his valour, like his predecessor, in defence of his King and country; and, like him, happening to live in an age when virtue was the only way to preferment, he received as a reward of his services and signal merit, the lands of Kilmarnock, from Robert the first, then King of Scotland, to whom he most faithfully adhered in all the vicissitudes of fortune that befel him. (5) These lands have continued ever since in the family, and given the title of Earl to four of them, the last of whom, was the unfortunate Lord who so lately suffered death for treason and rebellion to his King and Country.—To this Sir Robert succeeded his son Sir Thomas (6), a man eminent for learning and piety, and who discharged several employments of great trust and honour, to the satisfaction both of his King and Country; and was succeeded by his son Sir Thomas, who inherited his father's virtues as well as his wealth; he married one of the daughters and coheirs of Sir John Gifford of Yester, in the shire of Tweedale, by which marriage Sir Thomas got a third part of the barony of Yester (7); and was succeeded by Thomas his son, who held places of great trust under the crown, and was esteemed a man of such weight in his country, that he was received by the English as one of the hostages for the ransom of King James the first (8). He married Jane, a daughter of the family of Montgomery, and dying in 1432 was buried at Kilmarnock, where the portraiture of himself and his Lady are to be seen in stone, as big as the life, and an inscription, only shewing when they died (9). Sir Thomas was succeeded by a son of his own name, who did not long survive his father, for he was killed at Craignought-hill, by Sir Alexander Stewart, in 1439, in revenge for the Lord Darnley's death, whom Sir Thomas Boyde had killed. (Buchanan says treacherously) (10) in a feud, some time before. Historians make no other mention of this Sir Thomas, than that he was the father of the great Robert Boyde, the Lord Chamberlain, who is the principal subject of this article.

(5) Charta Penes Comitum de Kilmarnock. Nisbet's System of Heraldry, in the Remarks on Ragman Roll, p. 33.

(6) Chartain Rot. Reb. II. ad ann. 1374, per Tho. Fleming of Fulwood.

(7) Crawford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 242. Charta Penes Marchionem de Tweedale.

(8) British Compendium, p. 315.

(9) Historical Collection by Mr Timothy Pont, in the hands of Sir Robert Sibbald, M. D. MS.

(10) Buchanan, Hist. of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 7.

(1) Crawford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 242.

(2) The arms of the Boydes are; Sapphire, a Fess, Cheque, Pearl, and Ruby, and those of the Stewarts; Topaz, a Fess, Cheque, Pearl, and Sapphire.

There is no doubt but the Boydes are a branch of the family of Stewart; and Mr Nisbet says expressly they are, though they never took the surname of Stewart. Nisbet, Vol. I. p. 54.

(3) British Compendium, Vol. III. p. 315. Crawford's Hist. of Remfrew, p. 55.

(4) Crawford, ubi supra.

him to the highest pitch of grandeur, and whose life and actions therefore deserve particular notice. How, or where, he passed the first years of his life, or what age he was at the time of his father's death, is uncertain; but towards the end of the reign of King James II. of Scotland, he began to make a considerable figure in the world. He was a man of great penetration and sound judgment, knew mankind as well as any one of his time, was courteous and affable in his behaviour, by which means he acquired the esteem and confidence of all ranks of people, as well as of his Prince, by whose favour he was created a Baron, and called to Parliament, by the name and title of Lord Boyde of Kilmarnock. What added to his grandeur, was his alliance with many other great and noble families, and the large additions he had made to his own paternal inheritance. The first time we find his Lordship engaged in any publick employment, was in the year 1459, when he was, with several Prelates, Lords, and Barons, sent to Newcastle with the character of Plenipotentiaries, to prolong the truce with England, just then expired, which they did for nine years (a). Upon the unhappy death of King James II. in 1460, the Lord Boyde was made Justiciary (b), and named one of the Lords of the Regency, in whose hands the administration of affairs was lodged during the minority of the young King (c). Buchanan is mistaken in saying, that the Lord Boyde was at this time Lord Chancellor of Scotland, for that office was then held by the Lord Evandale, as appears plainly by a charter still extant, under the great seal of King James III, dated 23 Jan. 1461, which is witnessed by Andrea Domino Evandale Cancellario Nostro (d). Nor was the Lord Boyde ever in the post of Chancellor. His Lordship had a younger brother who had received the honour of knighthood, and was stiled Sir Alexander Boyde of Duncow, a man in great credit and favour with the King, whom he was appointed to teach the rudiments of military discipline, in the knowledge of which he was reckoned to exceed all others. As the Lord Boyde had a large share in the administration of publick affairs, by virtue of his office, so his brother Sir Alexander, by his constant access to the King's person, had a great influence over his youthful inclinations, insomuch, that the two brothers found means to engross most of the places and preferments about Court, to their own family and friends. Sir Alexander began to insinuate into the young King, then twelve years old, notions of manhood and liberty, insinuating that he was now capable of governing without the help of guardians and tutors, and that he might free himself from their restraint. This advice was readily listened to, and the King resolved to take upon himself the government, which, however, was no other than transferring the whole power, from the other Regents, to the Boydes. The King was at this time at Linlithgow, where the Lord Kennedy, another of the Regents, had a watchful eye over him; so it was necessary to remove his Majesty to Edinburgh, to take upon him the Regal Government. This the Boydes effected, partly by force and partly by stratagem, as the reader may see in the note [B]; and having got the King to Edinburgh, the Lord Boyde began to provide for his own safety, and to avert the danger which threatened him and his friends, for what they had done in the face of an Act of Parliament; and accordingly prevailed upon the King to call a Parliament at Edinburgh, in October 1466, which having then met, the Lord Boyde fell down upon his knees before the throne, where the King sat, and in a long and elaborate harangue, complained of the hard construction put upon the King's removal from Linlithgow, and how ill his service to the King in bringing him to Edinburgh was interpreted by his enemies, who threatened that the advisers of that affair should one day suffer punishment for the same; humbly beseeching his Majesty to declare his own sense and pleasure thereupon, and that if he conceived any ill-will or disgust against him for that journey, that he would openly declare it, that so the calumnies of his detractors might be prevented (e). The King, after advising a little with the Lords, made answer (f), that the Lord Boyde was not his adviser, but rather his companion in that journey, and therefore that he was more worthy of a reward for his courtesy, than of punishment for his obsequiousness or compliance therein, and this he was willing to declare in a publick Decree of the Estates, and thereby to silence his enemies; and in the same Decree provision should be made, that this matter should never be prejudicial to the Lord Boyde or his companions. His Lordship then desired, that this Decree might be registered in the Acts of the Assembly, and confirmed by Letters Patent under the Great Seal. This was also complied with, and the Declaration was recorded in the books of Parliament, and an

(a) Rymers's Feod. Angl. Tom. II. p. 423.

(b) Charta Penes Comitum de Wigton.

(c) Crawford's Lives of the great Officers of State in Scotland, p. 713.

Buchanan and Scott's Hist. of Scotland.

(d) Charta Penes Ducem de Montibus.

(e) Records of Parliament.

(f) Buchanan, Vol. II. p. 66, &c.

[B] Partly by stratagem, and partly by force, as the reader will see in the notes.] It was in this manner: The Boydes having ordered an hunting match for the King, on the 10th of July, 1466, they, with some other friends, instead of pursuing the chase, turned into the road leading to Edinburgh, in which they had not gone far, before the Lord Kennedy, who suspected this to be a game of state, came up with them, and laying his hands upon the bridle of the King's horse, requested him to return again to Linlithgow, and bid him beware of those guides who thus treasonably attempted to carry him away; for by a late statute it was declared high-treason to seize upon or carry away the person of the King, without the express consent of the Estates assembled in Parliament. But the Boydes thought the King's person would guard them from the penalty of the law, and that an after-statute, which they doubted not of obtaining, would cancel the former. With this assurance, Sir Alexander Boyde, as if he meant to resent the insolence offered the King, after some angry words, gave the Lord Kennedy a blow with his hunting staff, who thereupon went off, and left them to pursue their journey to Edinburgh (11). By this affair, not altogether justifiable on the part of the Boydes, the seeds of enmity were sown between the two families, which grew up to the great detriment of the nation; and at last, to the total ruin and destruction of one of them.

(11) Crawford's Lives of the Chancellors, p. 114. Buchanan, Scott, &c. Act of Approbation to the Lord Boyde, &c. in the Records of Parliament.

instrument importing the same thing, was granted to his Lordship under the Broad Seal, and still extant in the King's archives at Edinburgh. The Act of Approbation to the Lord Boyde and his friends, is also published in the Appendix to Mr Crawford's Lives of the great officers of State in Scotland. At the same time also, the King, by advice of his Council, gave him Letters Patent, whereby he was constituted sole Regent, and had the safety of the King, his brothers, sisters, towns, castles, and all the jurisdiction over his subjects, committed to him, till the King himself arrived to the age of twenty-one years (g). And the Nobles then present solemnly promised to be assistant to the Lord Boyde, and also to his brother, in all their publick actions, and that they would be liable to punishment, if they did not carefully, and with faithfulness, perform what they then promised. To this stipulation, or promise, the King also subscribed (h). Mr Crawford observes upon this occasion, that though the Lord Boyde was vested with such great powers, yet, in justice to the memory of so great a man, he acknowledges (i), (what, he says, no authors have done before him, because they did not look into the Records) that his Lordship's nomination to this great dignity and trust, was not done by a private junto, nor unduly or unfairly obtained, but openly and in full Parliament, and as the King himself declares, ex Consensu caterorum Dominorum nostri Concilii (k). Great as his Lordship was, he had not, however, yet arrived to the summit of his glory; the honours he had already received only paved the way to still greater; for having now the whole administration in his hands, it was not long before he had an opportunity of getting into one of the greatest offices in the kingdom, which was that of Lord Great-Chamberlain of Scotland, now vacant by the death of the Lord Livingstone. The Lord Boyd's commission for this great office (l), (which Mr Crawford has seen in the hands of the Earl of Kilmarnock) was pro vita, and passed the Great Seal, upon the twenty-fifth of August, 1467. It is necessary to observe, that though the Lord Boyde, now Lord Chamberlain, seemed to have the sole power and management of every thing himself; yet the Parliament had referred some particular matters which were of the highest concern and importance to the State (m), such as the marriage of the King, his sister, and his brothers, the Duke of Albany, and Earl of Mar, to the joint determination of the Lord Boyde, and others named and authorized by the Parliament for that purpose. This, however, did not hinder the Lord Chamberlain from making a very bold step, still farther to aggrandize his family; this was no less than the procuring the Lady Mary Stewart, the late King's eldest daughter, in marriage for his son Sir Thomas Boyde, and which, by his interest and address with the King, he found means to accomplish, notwithstanding the care and precaution of the Parliament. The Lord Boyde's son was a most accomplished gentleman, and this match and near alliance to the Crown, added to his own distinguished merit, raised him to a nearer place in the affection as well as confidence of his Sovereign, by whom he was soon after created Earl of Arran (n), perhaps to render the match more equal in point of rank with his royal bride, with whom he also obtained many lands (o), and, says Mr Crawford (p), was himself considered as the fountain from whence all honours and preferments must flow. The Lord Chamberlain, by this great accession of honour to his family, now seemed to have arrived at the highest pinnacle of power and grandeur, and this, in appearance, raised upon so firm a basis as not to be easily shaken. The King, we have seen, was his declared friend and patron; great part of the Nobility in league with him; the administration of the whole government in his hands; his brother in no less esteem and favour with the King; and the future greatness of his posterity secured by his son's marriage into the royal family: But such is the instability of human affairs, and of so deceitful are the smiles of fortune, that what seemed to be a prop and establishment of the power and greatness of this family, proved the very means of its overthrow, by stirring up its most bitter enemies to seek and determine its destruction. About this time, a marriage having been concluded, by Embassadors sent into Denmark for that purpose, between the young King of Scotland, and Margaret, a daughter of the King of Denmark; the young Earl of Arran was pitched upon, as a Nobleman every way qualified for so honourable and magnificent an embassy, to go over to Denmark, to espouse the Danish Princess in the King his brother-in-law's name, and to conduct her to Scotland. The Earl of Arran, judging all things safe at home, willingly accepted this honour, and in the beginning of the autumn of the year 1469, set sail for Denmark with a proper convoy, and a noble train of friends and followers (q). This was a fatal step to the downfall of this illustrious family, for the Lord Chamberlain, the Earl's father, being now much absent from the Court in the necessary discharge of his office, as well as through age and infirmities, the care also of his brother Sir Alexander Boyde; the Earl of Arran had no sooner set out on his embassy, than those enemies, which envy alone, that inseparable attendant on power and greatness, had raised him, set about contriving his ruin, and that of his family. The seeds of enmity, long since sown between the Kennedies and the Boydes, though hitherto unproductive of any bad consequences, now began to shoot out with greater vigour. Every art that malice could suggest was tried to alienate the King's affection from the Boydes. Every publick miscarriage was laid at their door; and the Kennedies industriously spread abroad reports, to inflame the people likewise against them: They represented to the King, that the Lord Boyde had abused his power during his Majesty's minority; that his matching his son, the Earl of Arran, with the Princess Mary, was

(g) Charta in Rotulis Jacobi III.

(h) Buchanan, Vol. II. p. 67, 800.

(i) Lives of the Lords Great Chamberlains of Scotland, p. 314.

(k) Records of Parliament.

(l) Charta Penes Comitern de Kilmarnock.

(m) Black Acts of Parliament.

(n) Chart. in Rot. Jac. III. Crawford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 243.

(o) Charta in pub. Archives.

(p) Lives of the Lords Chamberlains, ut supra.

(q) Buchan, Scott, &c. British Compendium, p. 315.

staining

(r) Abercromby from Ferrerius, p. 387.

(s) Crawford's Lives of the Chamberlains, p. 316.

(t) H.R. Vol. II. p. 69—93.

(u) Crawford's Lives, &c. p. 316.

(w) Crawford, ubi supra.

(x) Act of Parliament still extant in the Records.

(y) Extract of the whole Trial copied from the Records by Sir Lewis Stewart of Kirkall.

(z) Buchanan, Vol. II. p. 70, &c.

(a) Extract of the Trial, ut supra.

(b) Buchanan, ubi supra.

(c) Ibid.

(d) Lives of the Chancellors, &c. p. 317.

(e) Ubi supra.

staining the royal blood of Scotland, was an indignity to the Crown (r), and the prelude to the execution of a plot they had contrived of usurping even the sovereignty itself; for they represented the Lord Chamberlain as an ambitious, aspiring man, guilty of the highest offences, and capable of contriving and executing the worst of villainies (s): with what justice, History does not inform us. Buchanan (t) is the only one that says the Boydes were the occasion of the King's degeneracy into all manner of licentiousness, by their indulgence of his pleasures. The King, however, young, weak, credulous, and wavering, and naturally prone to jealousy, began to be alarmed, gave way to the importunities of his new counsellors, and being besides flattered by them with the prospect of filling his coffers out of the unhappy victim's confiscated estates, the consequence of their conviction, he quickly became the tool of the lowest revenge, and was prevailed on to sacrifice, not only the Earl of Arran, but all his family, to the malice and resentment of their enemies, notwithstanding their own and their ancestors great services to the Crown, and in spite of the ties of blood which united them so closely. At the request of the adverse faction, the King summoned a Parliament to meet at Edinburgh the twentieth of November 1469 (u), before which the Lord Boyde, the Earl of Arran, though in Denmark, and Sir Alexander Boyde of Duncow, were summoned to appear, to give an account of their administration, and answer such charges as should be exhibited against them. The Lord Boyde was astonished at this sudden blow, against which he had made no provision, and betook himself to arms (w), at least appeared with such attendance of armed men, as obliged the government to draw some forces together for its own defence; but the match being so unequal, the weaker party thought fit to disband, and his Lordship finding it impossible to stem the torrent, and having no confidence in the Parliament, which he knew his enemies found ways and means to model for their own mischievous purposes, and despairing of safety, took an opportunity to make his escape into England; but his brother, Sir Alexander, being then sick, and trusting to his own integrity, was brought before the Parliament, where he, the Lord Boyde, and his son the Earl of Arran, were, at his Majesty's instance, indicted of high-treason, for having laid hands on the King, and carried him, against an Act of Parliament, and contrary to the King's own will, from Linlithgow to Edinburgh, in the year 1466. Sir Alexander alledged in his defence, that they had not only obtained the King's pardon for that offence in a publick Convention, but it was even declared a good service by a subsequent Act of Parliament (x), and he desired that a copy of that pardon might be transcribed out of the Parliament rolls, but this was denied him, and no regard was had to it, because it was obtained by the Boydes when in power, and masters of the King's person (y). That the record only expressed that the King forgave him his personal resentment, which did not exempt them from the punishment of the law (z). Upon the whole, the crime being proved against them, they were found guilty by a jury of very noble Lords and Barons (a), and sentence of condemnation pronounced against them as in cases of high-treason: Sir Alexander Boyde, being present, was condemned to lose his head on the Castle-Hill of Edinburgh, which sentence was executed accordingly. The Lord Boyde had without doubt undergone the same fate, if he had not made his escape into England, as before related, where, however, he did not long survive his great reverse of fortune, which he might well lay to heart in his old age. He died at Alnwick in the year 1470. The Earl of Arran, though absent, and that upon the King's and the publick business, was declared a publick enemy, without being granted a hearing, or allowed the privilege which every man has a right to, of defending himself; and all their estates were confiscated (b). Things were in this unhappy situation, when the Earl of Arran arrived from Denmark, with the espoused Queen, in the Frith of Forth. Before he landed he had received intelligence of the wreck and ruin of his family, for his Lady, upon the first news of the approach of the Danish fleet, made immediately to her beloved Lord, and informed him there was no hopes of re-admission to the King's favour, his enemies having stopped all passages thereto (c). When he found it was not safe to set foot on his native shore, he resolved to retire into Denmark, and without staying to attend the ceremonial of the Queen's landing, or to trouble his weak and ungrateful master and brother, with the account of his embassy, he took the opportunity of one of the Danish ships which convoyed the Queen, and were under his command, and embarking his Lady, set sail for Denmark, where arriving, he met with a noble reception, suitable to his high birth and real merit. From thence he travelled through Germany into France, where he prevailed, according to Mr Crawford (d), with Lewis XI, to endeavour his reconciliation with King James, but in vain. Buchanan says (e), he could not obtain the French King's mediation at all; however this be, 'tis certain he left the French Court, and went to pay a visit to Charles Duke of Burgundy, who received him most graciously, and being then at war with his rebellious subjects, the unfortunate Lord offered him his service, which the Duke readily accepted, and finding him to be a brave and wise man, he honoured and supported him and his Lady, in a manner becoming their rank. But the measure of their afflictions was not yet full; the King their brother not yet satisfied with the miseries of their family, wrote over to Flanders to re-call his sister home, but knowing the great love she bore her husband, and fearing she would not be induced to leave him, he caused others to write to her, and give her hopes that his anger towards her husband might be appeased, and that f she would come over and plead for him in person, there was no doubt but she might prevail with her brother to pardon him, and restore him again to his favour (f). The Countess of Arran, flattered with these fair hopes, resolved to try if her presence and intreaties could not move her brother to compassion; she returned, and was no sooner arrived in Scotland, than the faithless King began to urge her to a divorce from her husband, cruelly detained her from going back to him, and caused publick citations, attested by witnesses, to be fixed up at Kilmarnock, the capital seat of the Boydes before their fall, wherein Thomas Earl of Arran was commanded to appear in sixty days, which he not doing, his marriage with the King's sister was declared null and void, and a divorce made, (according to Buchanan) the Earl still absent and unheard, and the Lady Mary was compelled, by the King, to marry James Lord Hamilton, a man much inferior to her former husband both in point of birth and fortune. This transaction was in the year 1474, and the Earl of Arran, now in the last stage of his miseries, and borne down with the heavy load of his misfortunes, soon after died at Antwerp [C], and was honourably interred there, at the expence of the Duke of Burgundy, who likewise erected a superb monument to his memory, with an inscription suitable to the great character he left behind him (g). The Lord Chamberlain Boyde, father of the Earl of Arran, by Marion his wife, daughter of Sir Robert Maxwell of Calderwood, had also issue two other sons, Alexander and Archibald, and a daughter who married the Earl of Angus, Chancellor to King James IV. But after the fall of the Boydes, the Barony and Lordship of Kilmarnock fell to the Crown, and there continued 'till the year 1482, when the King, taking compassion upon the innocent children of the late Earl of Arran, and out of the love he bore his sister the Countess, restored James her son to the barony of Kilmarnock, and the other lands of his ancestors, and to the title of Lord Boyde (b), but he dying without issue (Boëthius (i) says he was killed by the Lord Montgomery) the lordship of Kilmarnock returned again to the Crown, and the line was carried on by Alexander Boyde, second son of the Lord Chamberlain Boyde, and brother of the late Earl of Arran [D]. This Alexander, through the interest of the Earl of Angus his brother-in-law, and for his own dutiful behaviour, was, by King James IV, made Bailly and Chamberlain of Kilmarnock for the Crown (k), was restored to part of that lordship, and had also a grant of the lands of Bordland (l) Robert, his eldest son, succeeded, and was a person in great favour with King James V, whom he faithfully served both at home and abroad (m), wherefore that Prince bestowed on him the whole lordship of Kilmarnock, the twentieth of May, 1536 (n). He afterwards had, by grant of the Earl of Arran, Governor of Scotland during the minority of Queen Mary, many other lands that had formerly belonged to his ancestors, and at the same time is returned heir to James Boyde of Kilmarnock, his father's brother's son (o). In the person of his son Robert, the next generation saw the honour of the family revive; he was a nobleman of great parts, and possessed in an eminent degree, all those hereditary qualifications which had rendered his family illustrious. The troubles of the times during the unhappy reign of that

(f) Buchanan, ut supra.
 (g) Ibid.
 (h) Crawford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 243.
 (i) Hæctor Boëthius's Hist. of Scotland, translated by Bellandine, Book xii. C. v. edit. 1536.
 (k) Rymer's Fœd. Angl. ad annum 1501.
 (l) Black Acts of Parliament. Charta in pub. Archives, ad ann. 1494. Charta in Rot. Jac. IV.
 (m) Crawford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 244.
 (n) Chart. in pub. Arch. Jac. V.
 (o) Charta Penes Com. de Kilmarnock, dat. 23 Oct. 1544.

[C] This was transacted in the year 1474, and the Earl of Arran died soon after. We have related this story of Lady Arran's divorce, from Buchanan, because he is very particular in his relation of it, and the thing itself is very probable, tho' far from certain; for Boëthius (12) says, that the daughter of King James the second, after the death of Lord Boyde, (meaning the Earl of Arran) married the Lord Hamilton; and Mr Bellandine the translator of Boëthius was actually living at the very time; and Buchanan did not write 'till a century after; and possibly he might frame this story on purpose to ingratiate himself with his patron the Earl of Murray, who was a great enemy to the Hamiltons, and might be pleased to have it recorded of that family, that it's greatness, and alliance with the Blood Royal, was founded in adultery. The historian Mr Scott (13), (who in general copies Buchanan) concerning this affair, only says, that the King detained the Countess of Arran from returning to her husband, and urged her to sue for a divorce, to which she would not consent; but says nothing of her being compelled to marry Lord Hamilton; and adds, that Lord Arran finding himself bereft of his Lady, contracted great grief and died; and she remained a widow 'till the year 1474, which expression implies, that her husband had been dead some time before; but this is not probable, if we consider, that the Earl of Arran did not arrive in Scotland from his Danish embassy, 'till the year 1470, after which he retired to Denmark, from thence travelled thro' Germany into France, at both of which courts he might stay a considerable time; and at last went to the Duke of Burgundy's court, where he served in the wars, and his Lady bare him a son and a daughter there, and at length returned to Scotland; all which could not well be brought about much sooner than the year 1474, so that the Countess of Arran must have married Lord

Hamilton not long after her arrival in Scotland; and as it is certain, Lord Arran did not die 'till after she came there, and was refused leave to return back, it must have been very soon after (if not before) the Earl's death, that she married Hamilton; and as she was an affectionate wife to her first husband, it was perhaps rather by compulsion than choice, that she married a second son; or probably, a divorce was intended and actually begun by the King her brother, tho' not completed before Lord Arran's death; for the fact is very agreeable to the character of that prince, who was very unforgiving, and retentive of injuries, and to be sure would never cease persecuting the unhappy Earl of Arran, as long as he lived. The author of the British Compendium (14), places the Earl's death in 1470, but this appears from the above account, to be a great error.

[D] The line was carried on by Alexander Boyde, second son of the Lord Chamberlain. Mr Crawford, in his Peerage of Scotland (15), and from him other writers, are mistaken in saying, that upon the death of Lord Arran's son without issue, the line was continued by Sir Alexander, son of Sir Alexander Boyde of Duncow, brother of the Lord Chamberlain, and that from him are descended the Earls of Kilmarnock; for the Lord Chamberlain left two other sons besides Lord Arran, who, according to the order of succession, had a right of precedence before the son of Sir Alexander Boyde of Duncow, who was only the younger brother of the Lord Chamberlain; and it appears beyond doubt, that Alexander, the second son of the Lord Chamberlain, continued the line; for in a grant which he afterwards had of the lands of Bordland, he is styled Filius Roberti quondam D. mini Boyd (16). Mr Crawford has acknowledged this himself in his lives of the Chancellors (17).

(12) Page 71.
 (13) Page 243.
 (14) Page 317, in the notes.
 (15) Page 317, in the notes.
 (16) Charta in pub. Archives, ad ann. 1494.
 (17) Page 317, in the notes.

(12) Hæctor Boëthius's Hist. of Scotland, translated by Bellandine, printed in 1536. Book xii. chap. v.
 (13) History of Scotland.

unfortunate Princess, Queen Mary, gave him a sufficient opportunity of exerting his great talents. That Princess, in the year 1549, had been graciously pleased to recognize his title to the honour of Lord Boyde, by Letters Patent under the Great Seal (p), and he continued to be greatly trusted by her, to whom he faithfully adhered, and preserved his loyalty in the worst of times, and till the almost total suppression of her interest, assisting her with his counsels, and risking his life in her defence as often as he had an opportunity, though he condemned the imprudent measures which involved the Queen in the disasters of her reign, as well as the violent measures pursued by the subjects against her; and upon her marriage with Bothwell, in 1567, he had actually entered into an association with other Lords, to punish the King's murderers, and dissolve the Queen's marriage, according to Rapin (q); but Scott says, to defend the infant Prince her son, from his mother and step-father (r), yet this was only on account of her religion, in which he differed from her, and was one of those who advised her to issue a proclamation, to declare all tolerations formerly granted to Roman Catholics null and void, and to grant no further freedom to them than private worship. However, he continued to serve her, and was made one of the Lords of her Privy-Council the same year, 1567 (s), and was pitched upon by the Queen to treat with the rebel Lords about composing their differences, but they refused to treat with her. The Lord Boyde commanded a part of the Queen's army at the battle of Langside, where she was defeated in 1568. Upon the Queen's retiring into England, and Commissioners being appointed by Queen Elizabeth, and the Lord Murray Regent of Scotland, to hear and determine the controversy between the Queen of Scots and her subjects, Lord Boyde was appointed one of the Queen's Commissioners, to meet and vindicate her character. His Lordship was also employed in the fatal affair of the intended marriage of the Duke of Norfolk with Queen Mary, and was one of her Commissioners upon all occasions, and in all meetings with her opponents, till the year 1571, when, according to the Historian before cited (t), the Earl of Morton, at that time Regent, found means to tempt the Lord Boyde, together with the Earl of Argyle, to desert the Queen's party; for Morton having then several church-lands in his gift, offered a large share thereof to be divided between those Lords, which they accepted of, and joined the King's party. At the same time the Earl of Argyle was divorced from his Lady, and married to the Lord Boyde's daughter. If this account of Mr Scott's be true, it may very well be urged in Lord Boyde's defence, that the Queen's affairs were at this time so desperate, that it was scarce in the power of her most loyal subjects to do her any service, and that his Lordship was amongst the last of her friends, who submitted to the Regency during her son's minority, and in so doing, he only made a virtue of necessity, by complying with the times and humour of the people, who had set her infant son upon the throne without any regard to the mother's title. After this, his Lordship acted as one of the Regent's Commissioners in the treaty of Perth, and was one of the Commissioners to treat with the English about suppressing the incursions of the borderers (u). In 1581, he, with some other Lords, having joined in a confederacy to remove the Duke of Lenox, who was a Papist, from Court; in order to this, they seized the King and confined him at Ruthven House, where they in a manner compelled him to banish the Duke; but Lord Boyde had liked afterwards to have lost his life for this, and was obliged to go over to France (w), from whence returning in 1585, he was pardoned, and was the same year, with the Earl of Bothwell and another, sent Ambassador into England to conclude a league in defence of the Protestant religion (x), and for a firm and lasting peace between the two realms, which they concluded and signed (y) [E]. This Nobleman died in 1589, aged 72, and was interred with his ancestors in the church of Kilmarnock, under a fair tomb, with the following strange verses by way of epitaph, as in note [F], which, however, shew the great service and importance he was of to his country. He married Margaret, daughter and sole heiress of George Colquhoun of Glins, by which he made a considerable addition to his paternal inheritance. By her he had issue several daughters, one of whom married the Earl of Eglington; and a son named Thomas, who succeeded him (z). He married Marion, the daughter of Matthew Campbel of Loudon, ancestor to the Earl of that name, by whom he had issue a daughter, who married James Hamilton, Earl of Abercorn, and a son named Robert, who marrying the daughter of Mark Ker, Earl of Lothian, and died before his father, but left two

(p) Charta Penes Com. de Kilmarnock, ad ann. 1549.

(q) Rapin's Hist. of England, Vol. VIII. p. 359, 802.

(r) Scott's Hist. of Scotland, p. 468.

(s) Scott, ibid.

(t) Scott's Hist. of Scotland, p. 449.

(u) Crawford's Peccage of Scotland, p. 244.

(w) Scott, p. 489.

(x) Scott, p. 496.

(y) Camden's Annals of Queen Elizabeth.

(z) British Compendium, p. 316.

[E] Which league they concluded and signed. The occasion of this league was this; The Pope, Kings of France and Spain, and other Potentates of the Church of Rome, had entered into a league to extirpate the Protestant Religion; upon which Queen Elizabeth sent Sir Thomas Wotton her Ambassador to Scotland, to propose a league offensive and defensive with the King, in the cause of Religion; upon which King James having convened the Estates of the Kingdom at St Andrews, the same was agreed to, and Ambassadors appointed to go to Berwick and meet those from the Queen, who mutually ratified and signed the same (18), consisting of thirteen articles.

[F] As in note [F].

Here lies yat godly, noble, wife, Lord Boyd,
Who Kirk and King, and Commons, all ecor'd,
Which were, while they this jewel all enjoy'd,
Maintain'd, govern'd, and council'd by that Lord.

His antient House so of't peril'd, he restor'd,
Twice six, and sixty years he liv'd; and fine,
By death the third of January devor'd,
In anno thrice five hundred, eighty nine (19).

(18) Scott's Hist. of Scotland, p. 493.

(19) Monumental Inscriptions in the church of Kilmarnock.

sons, Robert, who succeeded his grandfather; and James, who afterwards also came to the estate. This Robert married Christian, daughter to Thomas Hamilton Earl of Haddington, by whom he had issue Robert who succeeded him, and was a nobleman of great hopes and parts, and died without issue much regretted, in 1640 (a). He was succeeded by James his uncle, who, dying in 1654, was succeeded by William his son (b); who gave early proofs of his abilities, and that he inherited all the shining qualities of his progenitors. He was esteemed a man of wit and learning, which recommended him to the gay Court of King Charles II. He was remarkably active in the interest of that Monarch, when there was the least prospect of his Restoration; for which, and some services he did the Crown afterwards, he was created Earl of Kilmarnock, by Letters Patent, bearing date August 7, 1661 (c). He married Janet, daughter to William Cunningham, Earl of Glencairn, and died in the year 1692. He was succeeded by his eldest son William, who survived his father but a few months, leaving issue William, the third Earl of Kilmarnock, and Thomas Boyde, a gentleman eminent in the profession of the Civil and Municipal Law of Scotland, who, for his distinguished merit, was promoted to the honour of Lord Advocate. William, the third Earl of Kilmarnock, was no less distinguished for his abilities than the rest of his predecessors: he was remarkably zealous in the Parliament of Scotland, for the famous Act called the Act of Security. He was somewhat wavering in his conduct with regard to the Union; and affected, in the beginning of that affair, to join the party headed by the Marquis of Tweedale, who were distinguished by the name of the Squadron Volante, on account of their pretending to join neither of the parties, but to cast the ballance between them; but the Earl at last left that party, and joined those who promoted the Union. In the rebellion 1715, he was very active in the service of the Government. He died in November 1716, leaving issue by Euphene his wife, daughter to William Lord Ross, William, the fourth and last Earl of Kilmarnock (d), the unfortunate Nobleman, who, by deviating from the steps of his illustrious ancestors, so lately fell a sacrifice to the justice of his country. We shall not long detain the reader with this Nobleman's History, as there is nothing remarkable recorded of him, 'till the last unhappy period of his life, having, 'till then, lived rather in a private station, without publickly concerning himself either with civil or military affairs. His Lordship was but thirteen years old when his father died, and discovered betimes a genius not unequal to his birth. He found the family estate pretty much encumbered, and great part of the patrimony alienated, and by no means answerable to his Lordship's generous and noble disposition. It was his Lordship's misfortune, to be too soon let loose among the gaities and pleasures of life; as he grew up, instead of applying himself to the dry amusements of study, he launched out into the world in pursuit of pleasures which were more expensive than his fortune could support, and by this means considerably reduced his estate, which, from the most probable conjecture, was the true reason of his taking up arms against the King. And indeed, his Lordship himself owns in his confession to Mr Foster (e), (while under sentence) that his rebellion was a kind of desperate scheme, proceeding originally from his vices, to extricate himself from the distress of his circumstances: for he says, 'the true root of all was his careless and dissolute life, by which he had reduced himself to great and perplexing difficulties; that the exigency of his affairs was in particular very pressing at the time of the rebellion; and that, besides the general hope he had of mending his fortune by the success of it, he was also tempted by another prospect of retrieving his circumstances, by following the Pretender's standard.' It does not appear that his Lordship was in the original design of the rebellion; on the contrary, he declares both in his speech at the Bar of the House of Lords, and in his petition to the King after sentence (f), that it was not 'till after the battle of Preston Pans that he became a party in it (g), having, 'till then, neither influenced his tenants or followers to assist or abet the rebellion, but, on the contrary, influenced the inhabitants of the town of Kilmarnock, and the neighbouring boroughs, to rise in arms for his Majesty's service, which had so good an effect, that two hundred men from Kilmarnock very soon appeared in arms, and remained so all the winter at Glasgow and other places. It is said, that when the Earl joined the Pretender's standard, he was received by him with great marks of esteem and distinction; was declared of his Privy-Council, made Colonel of the Guards, and promoted to the degree of a General (though his Lordship himself says, he was far from being a person of any consequence among them). How he behaved in these stations, (quite new to him, and foreign from his former manner of life) we cannot determine; but common fame says, he behaved with courage and resolution 'till the fatal battle of Culloden, when the Earl was taken, or rather surrendered himself, prisoner, to the King's troops, though involuntarily, and with a design to have facilitated his escape; for his Lordship acknowledged to Mr Foster (h), whilst under sentence, that when he saw the King's dragoons, and made towards them, he thought they had been Fitz-James's horse, and that if he could have reached them by mounting behind one of the dragoons, his escape would have been more certain, than when he was on foot. This it was proper to mention, because his Lordship, in his speech to the House of Lords (i), had made a merit of having surrendered himself, at a time when he said he could easily have made his escape, and in which he owned, when in a state of repentance, he had faltered. His Lordship was, after he had been taken some time, brought to the Tower, and on Monday the twenty-eighth of July,

(a) Balfour's Annals.

(b) Crawford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 245. Charta in Cancellaria, S. D. N. Regis.

(c) Charta in Rot. Carol. II. Crawford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 245.

(d) British Compendium, p. 317.

(e) See Mr Foster's Account of the Behaviour of Lord Kilmarnock, p. 10, 11.

(f) Appendix to Mr Foster's Account, &c. No. 3. p. 45.

(g) Proceedings in the House of Peers against Lord Kilmarnock, &c. p. 31.

(h) Mr Foster's Account, ut supra.

(i) See the Proceedings in the House of Peers, &c. ut supra.

1746, was, together with the Earl of Cromertie, and Lord Balmerino, conducted to Westminster-Hall, and at the bar of the Lord High-Steward's court, there erected for that purpose, arraigned, and pleaded guilty to his indictment, submitting himself to his Majesty's mercy and clemency. On the Wednesday following, the three Lords were again brought from the Tower to receive sentence, when the Lord Kilmarnock being asked by the Lord High-Steward, if he had any thing to offer why sentence of death should not be passed upon him? his Lordship, addressing himself to his Grace and the whole august Assembly, then consisting of an hundred and thirty-six Peers, delivered an eloquent speech (k), after which, sentence of death was pronounced upon him, and he returned to the Tower. After this, he presented petitions to the King, the Prince of Wales, and Duke of Cumberland (l), wherein he set forth his family's constant attachment to the Revolution interest, and that of the illustrious House of Hanover; his father's zeal and activity in support of both in the rebellion in 1715, and his own appearing in arms (though then but young) under his father, and the whole tenor of his conduct ever since that time. But the services of his forefathers could not satisfy the publick demand for justice, nor avail him so far as to procure him pardon. He was beheaded on Tower-Hill, August 18, 1746, and was interred in the Tower church, with this inscription upon his coffin, viz. Gulielmus Comes de Kilmarnock, decollat. 18 Augusti, 1746, etat. suæ 42. His Lordship's whole deportment, from the time he was condemned 'till his execution, was exceedingly becoming and suitable to one in his unhappy circumstances; and as he gave the most lively marks of a sincere humiliation and repentance for all his miscarriages, so his behaviour in the hour of death was resigned, but strictly decent and awful, free from an extreme dejectedness, yet not eager and rapid to meet death; it may therefore be said, that he died with a becoming resolution; for, as his Lordship himself observed with as much truth as goodness, that for a man who had led a dissolute life, and yet believed the consequences of death, to put on an air of daringness and absolute intrepidity, must argue him either to be very stupid or very impious (m). He was a nobleman of fine address and polite behaviour; his person was tall and graceful; his countenance mild, but his complexion pale; and he had abilities, which, if they had been properly applied, might have rendered him capable of bringing an increase of honour to his family, instead of ruin and disgrace. His Lordship lived and died in the publick profession of the Church of Scotland, and left behind him a widow (who was the Lady Anne Livingston, daughter of James Earl of Linlithgow and Callander, attained in 1715, with whom he had a considerable fortune) and three sons, the eldest of whom his Lordship had educated in the principles of duty and loyalty to his Majesty, and in whose service he now bears a commission; another son was in the rebellion with his father, and escaped somewhere abroad; and the third is in the sea service. With this dismal catastrophe of the last unhappy Earl of Kilmarnock, we are to close our memoirs of this illustrious family, having followed it through several centuries, from the earliest account of it to the present time. We have traced it from it's first rise or dawn, to it's meridian height of glory; we have then seen it the sport of fortune, sink into obscurity, emerge out of it again; and by degrees resume it's antient splendor; and glad should we have been, to have stopped at this happy period, and not have seen the lustre of so great a family sullied by so foul a crime as that of rebellion; to have seen, in one fatal day, the richest blood contaminated, and which for ages has ran untainted in an illustrious chanel; to have seen a Nobleman, who could boast a train of ancestors, as long and as noble as most families, and amongst whom were men singularly eminent for their loyalty, and conspicuous for their virtue, thus degenerate from their noble principles, and fatally pursue measures that involved himself and family in ruin.

H

BOYLE (RICHARD) one of the ablest Statesmen in the last century, who not only raised himself to the highest offices, and to the dignity of the peerage in Ireland, by his personal merit, but obtained also a very unusual addition to these honours, being generally stiled the great Earl of Cork. He was descended from an antient and honourable family, that had been long seated in Herefordshire, some think before the Conquest (a) [A].

But

[A] Seated in Herefordshire, as some think before the Conquest. It has been a common opinion, and as such is laid down in some Memoirs, that the noble Family of Boyle sprung from Sir Philip Boyle a knight of the Kingdom of Arragon in Spain (1), who came over to England, and signalized himself in a tournament held in the reign of King Henry VI. Thus much of truth there is in that notion, that the Family of Boyle is of great antiquity in Spain (2), and that this Sir Philip was of that family, yet no ancestor of the Earl of Cork, whose line may be traced much higher with great certainty. It is thought that this surname was antiently written Biuvile, and by degrees was changed or corrupted into Boyle. The first account we have of them is, that they were seated at Pixely Court near Leadbury in the County of Hereford, of which Humphry de Biuvile was Lord, as is recorded in Dooms-day Book, tit. 28. Terra Humfridi de Biuvile in Radelau Hund. Humfridus de Biuvile Lenet de rege Pichelei Ausil tenuit. These words Ausil tenuit, in the general construction of Antiquaries, import that it was in the time of Edward the Confessor (3). Lodowick Boyle, who lived in the reign of King Henry III, was father of John Boyle, and he of James, who had issue Lodowick, whose son was succeeded by James his son and heir, father of Lodowick Boyle of Bidney, and of the Friars in the city of Hereford, in the reign of King Henry VI (4). This Lodowick married Elizabeth, daughter of William Ruffel, Esq; and had issue a daughter, Eleanor, married to Watkin Ruffel; and two sons, John Boyle, Esq; who had the estate in Herefordshire, and Roger Boyle second son (5); this Roger married Jane, daughter of Thomas Parrishall of the County of Hereford, and had issue John Boyle of Hereford, Roger

(k) In the Proceedings of the House of Peers, &c. published by S. Billingsley.

(l) In the Appendix to Mr Foster's Account, &c. No. 3, 4, 5.

(m) Mr Foster's Account, &c.

(a) Letter from Dr John Beale to Mr Samuel Hartlib.

(1) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 2.

(2) Herrera, Histor. de las Indias Occidentales, Decad. 1. lib. ii. cap. 20. p. 63.

(3) Letter from Dr John Beale to Mr Samuel Hartlib.

(4) Visat. Com. Hereford. in Bibl. Harleian. 90 A. p. 72, 73. Seager's Baron. MS. in Bibl. Cot.

(5) Genealogies of Families omitted in the Baronage, MS. p. 131.

But his father, Roger Boyle, being a younger brother, and marrying Joan, the daughter of Robert Naylor of Canterbury, Esq; settled in Kent, where his second son Richard was born, October 3, 1566 (b). He was educated first at Canterbury, then sent to Cambridge by the care of his mother, having lost his father before he was ten years of age; studied there for some time in Bennet-college, thence he removed to the Middle Temple, proposing to have made the Law his profession (c). But his mother dying, and having little or no dependence, he, in some measure, dropped that design, and entered into the service of Sir Richard Manwood, Chief-Baron of the Exchequer. He did not remain long in that station, for finding he should rise very slowly thereby, he resolved to travel in order to better his fortune, which, as himself tells us, was very slender, when he left England (d) [B]. He landed at Dublin, June 23, 1588, and having good recommendations, was very soon brought into business, acting sometimes in one part of the country, sometimes in another, but residing chiefly in Dublin, where he was held in very great esteem by the principal persons employed in the Government, and was very serviceable to many of them, in penning memorials, cases, and answers, which gave him vast opportunities of acquiring a perfect knowledge of the kingdom, and of the state of publick affairs (e), of which he very well knew how to make a right use. In 1595 he married Joan, the daughter and coheirefs of William Ansley, of Pulborough, in the county of Suffex, Esq; with whom he had five hundred pounds per annum in land, which was the beginning of his fortunes (f). As he was of a very frugal disposition, and had a head very well turned for making an establishment in a country where land was cheap, and he had money to lay out, he quickly laid the foundation of an estate, but interfering in some of his purchases with powerful men there, they began to insinuate things to his prejudice at home, which forced him to go over to England, where he not only got over all the difficulties they had thrown in his way, but returned with fresh credit, and much greater honour, into Ireland (g) [C]. Sir George Carew (afterwards Earl of Tornens) being appointed

(b) Earl of Corke's True Remembrances.

(c) Queen Elizabeth's Worthies, MS.

(d) Earl of Corke's True Remembrances.

(e) Historical Reflections, by R. Vowel, p. 191.

(f) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. II. p. 359.

(g) Earl of Corke's True Remembrances.

Roger second son, and Michael Boyle of London, third son, who left a numerous issue; whereof Richard his second son was Bishop of Cork and Ross; being allowed also to keep the See of Cloyne in Commendam, was afterwards Archbishop of Tuam, and died March 19, 1644 (6). He left issue, Michael Boyle, Archbishop of Armagh, and Lord Chancellor of Ireland, who died aged 93, in the year 1702, and was father to Murrugh Boyle, created Lord Viscount Blessington (7); Michael, another son of the said Roger, was Bishop of Waterford and Lismore; and Sir George Boyle his fourth son died without issue (8); Roger Boyle, the second son, married Jean, daughter of John Naylor, of Kenville in the county of Kent, and had issue John Boyle, Bishop of Cork and Ross, in Ireland; Richard Boyle second son, Earl of Cork, of whom I am to treat; Hugh Boyle third son, who died without issue; and a daughter, married to Sir Pierce Power of Ireland, Knt. (9), a numerous and fortunate line.

[B] Was very slender when he left England.] This great man, when in the height of his prosperity, took pleasure to look back upon his slender beginnings, and that they might be truly known to posterity, he thought fit on the 23d of June 1632, to commit the most memorable circumstances of his life to writing, under the title of True Remembrances (10), and it is from these we have many particulars that otherwise would have escaped notice, and amongst them, this that follows in his own words.

'When first I arrived at Dublin in Ireland, the 23d of June, 1588, all my wealth then was twenty-seven pounds three shillings in money, and two tokens which my mother had given me, viz. a Diamond Ring, which I have ever since, and still do wear; and a Bracelet of gold worth about ten pounds; a Taffety Doublet cut with and upon Taffety, a pair of Black Velvet Breeches laced; a new Milan Fustian suit, laced and cut upon Taffety; two Cloaks, competent Linnen, and necessities; with my Rapier and Dagger; and since the Blessing of God, whose heavenly Providence guided me hither, hath enriched my weak estate in the beginning with such a fortune, as I need not envy any of my neighbours, and added no care or burthen to my conscience thereunto.'

[C] Much greater honour into Ireland.] We have various accounts of this transaction, which, tho' it may seem private in it's nature, yet has been very justly accounted a very remarkable proof of Queen Elizabeth's wisdom, as well as a singular instance of the true genius and spirit of her government (11); it may not be amiss to observe, that in none of the accounts I have seen, the year in which it happened has been fixed; but from the circumstances mentioned in the following relation taken from the noble person's own Remembrances beforementioned, it appears clearly to have been in the spring of the year 1598.

'When God had blessed me, says he (12), with a reasonable fortune and estate, Sir Henry Wallop of Wayers, Sir Robert Gardiner, Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, and Sir Richard Bingham, Chief Commissioner of Connaught, being displeas'd for some purchases I had made in the province; they all, joined together by their lies, complaining against me to Queen Elizabeth, expressing that I came over a young man without any estate or fortune, and that I had made so many purchases as it was not possible to do, without some foreign Prince's purse to supply me with money; that I had acquired divers castles and abbies upon the sea-side, fit to receive and entertain Spaniards, that I kept in my abbies fraternities and convents of Friars in their habits, who said Mass continually, and that I was suspected in my religion, with divers other malicious suggestions; whereof having some secret notice, I resolved to go into Munster, and so into England, to justify myself; but before I could take shipping the general rebellion in Munster broke out, all my lands were wasted, as I could say, that I had not one penny of certain revenue left me, to the unspeakable danger and hazard of my life; yet God preserved me, as I recovered Dingle and got shipping there, which transported me to Bristol, from whence I travelled to London, and betook myself to my former chamber in the Middle Temple, intending to renew my studies in the Law, till the rebellion were pass'd over. Then Robert Earl of Essex was design'd for the government of this kingdom, into whose service I was recommended by Mr Anthony Bacon: Whereupon his Lordship very nobly received me, and us'd me with favour and grace, in employing me in the issuing out his Patent and Commission for the government of Ireland; whereof Sir Henry Wallop having notice, and being conscious in his own heart that I had sundry papers and collections of Michael Kettlewell's, his late Under-Treasurer, which might discover a great deal of wrong and abuse done to the Queen in his late accounts, and suspecting if I were countenanced by the Earl of Essex, that I might bring these things to light, which might much prejudice or ruin his reputation or estate; altho' I vow to God, until I was provok'd, I had no thought of it: Yet he, utterly to suppress me, renewed his former complaints against me to the Queen's Majesty. Whereupon, by her Majesty's special directions, I was suddenly attacked and convey'd close prisoner to the Gate-house; all my papers seized and search'd; and altho' nothing could appear to (12) Earl of Corke's True Remembrances.

(6) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 622.

(7) Baronag. Hibern. p. 291.

(8) Thoresby's Hist. of Leeds, p. 64.

(9) Collins's Peerage, Vol. II. p. 358, 359.

(10) The MS. of this short piece was formerly in the hands of Mr Smith, Apothecary, in the Strand, who lived long with the Honourable Robert Boyle, Esq;

(11) Queen Elizabeth's Worthies, p. 93.

appointed Resident of Munster, Mr Boyle was, by the Queen, sent over with him as Clerk of the Council in that province, and the President knowing how well he stood with her Majesty, was remarkably kind to him (b). He was very soon made Justice of the Peace and of the Quorum, through the whole province, constantly attended the active Lord President in all his expeditions, and by intercepting Florence Mac Carthy's letters, written to promote rebellion, while entertained in the President's house, did the State eminent service, and justified the confidence reposed in him (i). On December 14, 1599, died his first Lady in child-bed of a still-born son, to his great grief, but he preserved the estate she brought him (k). The war against the Irish continued all this time, and as they were now openly assisted by the Spaniards, seemed more dangerous than ever, but by the prudence, vigilance, and skill of the Lord Deputy (Blount) Montjoy, and Sir George Carew, they were hindered from achieving any thing of consequence, and at last, upon the 24th of December, 1601, the Irish and their Spanish auxiliaries were totally routed near Kinsale, with the loss of 1200 killed, and 800 wounded (l). The President of Munster, knowing how welcome this news would be to Queen Elizabeth, dispatched Mr Boyle therewith to England, who performed his business with almost incredible expedition (m) [D]. Upon his return into Ireland, which was in the month of June following, he found the Lord President ready to attack the strong castle of Donboy near Beerhaven, which he accordingly performed on the eighteenth, took it by storm, and put all the garrison, consisting of one hundred and forty-three chosen men out of the whole Irish army, to the sword. He afterwards reduced the western part of the province, and leaving proper garrisons in them, set out on his return to Cork (n). As they were on the road together, the Lord President told Mr Boyle, it was his intention to send him over again into England, in order to procure the Queen's leave for his return; and, that their business might go on together, he advised Mr Boyle to purchase all Sir Walter Raleigh's estate in that island, promising him, if he approved this proposal, to do him all the service therein which lay in his power (o). Mr Boyle accepted the commission readily, and embraced the advice thankfully, came over speedily, and transacted his affairs very successfully [E]. He made no long stay in England, but having procured a licence for the Lord

(b) See that noble Person's account of his own administration, intituled, Libertaria Pacata.

(i) Cox's History of Ireland, Vol. I. p. 432.

(k) Earl of Corke's True Remembrances.

(l) Pacata Hibernia, p. 233.

(m) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 15.

(n) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. I. p. 450.

(o) Earl of Corke's True Remembrances.

' my prejudice, yet my close restraint was continued ' till the Earl of Essex was gone to Ireland, and two ' months afterwards; at which time, with much suit, ' I obtained the favour of her Sacred Majesty, to be ' present at my answers, where I so fully answered ' and cleared all their objections, and delivered such full ' and evident justifications for my own acquittal, as it ' pleased the Queen to use these words, viz. By God's ' death, these are but inventions against this young man, ' and all his sufferings are for being able to do us ser- ' vice, and those complaints urged to forestall him there- ' in: But we find him to be a man fit to be employed by ' ourselves, and we will employ him in our service; and ' Wallop and his adherents shall know, that it shall not ' be in the power of any of them to wrong him, neither ' shall Wallop be our Treasurer any longer. Thereupon ' she directed her speech to her Lords in Council there ' present, and commanded them presently to give her ' the name of six men out of which she might chuse ' one to be Treasurer of Ireland, her election falling ' upon Sir George Carew of Cockington. And then ' the Queen arose from Council, and gave orders not ' only for my present enlargement, but also discharged ' all my charges and fees during my restraint, and gave ' me her royal hand to kiss, which I did heartily, ' humbly thanking God for that deliverance.'

[D] With almost incredible expedition.] This decisive battle was fought upon a Thursday, which was Christmas Eve, some more Spaniards were landed a day or two after in Ireland, but finding their friends were beaten, thought fit to retire (13). This and the President's return to Cork, might probably hinder Mr Boyle from setting out 'till the twenty-eighth. The account he gives us of his journey, and of the consequences of it, are very singular and entertaining, and at the same time it is but necessary, to shew how expressly it is laid down in his own words, in order to be satisfied as to the fact, which, as Mr Budgell observed, nothing but the Earl of Cork's authority could make one believe (14).

' I attended the Lord President in all his employ- ' ments, and waited upon him all the whole siege of ' Kinsale, and was employed by his Lordship to her ' Majesty, with the news of that happy victory, in which ' employment I made a speedy expedition to the Court; ' for I left my Lord President at Shannon Castle, near ' Cork, on Monday morning about two of the clock, ' and the next day being Tuesday, I delivered my ' Packet, and supped with Sir Robert Cecil (being ' then Principal Secretary of State) at his house in ' the Strand; who after supper held me in discourse

' till two of the clock in the morning, and by seven ' that morning called upon me to attend him to the ' Court, where he presented me to her Majesty in her ' Bed-chamber; who remembered me, (calling me by ' my name, and giving me her hand to kiss) telling me ' she was glad that I was the happy man to bring the ' first news of that glorious victory; and after her Ma- ' jesty had interrogated with me upon sundry questions ' very punctually, and that therein I had given her ' full satisfaction in every particular, she again gave me ' her hand to kiss, and recommended my dispatch for ' Ireland, and so dismissed me with grace and favour.'

[E] Came over speedily and transacted his affairs ' very successfully.] It must have been in the winter of 1602 that Mr Boyle returned into England, bringing with him two letters from the Lord President, one addressed to Sir Robert Cecil, (then Secretary, afterwards Earl of Salisbury) in which his merit and abilities were much magnified, together with a request that he would assist in forwarding the proposed bargain with Sir Walter Raleigh; the other to Sir Walter himself, recommending Mr Boyle as a fit purchaser, and advising him to part with a concern, which, though it made a large found, was so far from producing any thing, that, to his, the Lord President's knowledge, it cost Sir Walter two hundred pounds a year to support his titles (15).

These letters produced a meeting between Sir Robert Cecil, Sir Walter Raleigh, and Mr Boyle, in which, by the mediation of the former, the purchase was concluded, and the assurances perfected. This, says our Noble Author, was the third addition and rise to my estate (16). A great augmentation it must have been, for, according to the lowest computation, Sir Walter Raleigh's estate consisted of twelve thousand acres in the counties of Cork and Waterford (17), which, from the foregoing account, it is evident enough that he bought at a very low rate, and living upon the spot being already a rich man, having a head the best turned that ever man had for such improvements, and coming immediately after into great power, there is no doubt that he very soon made those lands highly valuable; indeed there is direct and full proofs of the matter of fact, and that within the compass of a very few years. This estate was not only well tenanted, but the best settled, and absolutely in the most thriving condition (18) of any estate in Ireland. He might therefore well call it the third addition to his fortune, accounting what he acquired by marriage, the first; and his preferment in Munster, the second; though probably this purchase was more profitable than both.

(15) This was conferred on him by Queen Elizabeth for his services in Ireland.

(16) Earl of Corke's True Remembrances.

(17) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. I. p. 352. Oldys's Life of Sir Walter Raleigh, p. 29.

(18) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. in the Preface.

(13) Pacata Hibernia, p. 233.

(14) Earl of Corke's True Remembrances.

Lord President to return, he carried it to him in Munster, and then accompanied him back to Dublin, where he was to embark for England. In their journey thither, the Lord President took notice to him, that having now acquired so considerable an establishment, it would be prudent for him to think of another marriage (p), by which he might have issue to inherit it. This proposal also was readily embraced, and the Lady who was the daughter of Sir Geoffery Fenton, being likewise mentioned, the Lord President undertook the negotiation with her father, and prosecuted it so effectually, that they were contracted in his presence, March 9, 1602, to the great satisfaction of all parties (q). The marriage, however, was not immediately solemnized, which perhaps might be occasioned by the great change that in a few days happened, as well to them in their respective stations, as to the nation in general, by the death of Queen Elizabeth. His friend and patron, Sir George Carew, was appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland; his father-in-law was continued in his place of Secretary of State; and himself received from his patron's hand the honour of knighthood, July 23, 1603, the very day he celebrated his second marriage (r). He assures us himself, that interest had no share in this marriage, and that he never so much as thought of a fortune; but, however, Sir Geoffery Fenton, the Lady's father, gave him that very day, of his own motive, one thousand pounds in gold (s). We have another very singular circumstance in relation to this marriage, mentioned on the authority of the Countess of Warwick, his Lordship's daughter, which, though attended with many difficulties, may possibly be, and probably is, true (t) [F]. His fortune now began to proceed more briskly than before, and almost every day produced new accessions, either of dignity or estate. He owed the basis and foundation of his greatness to the kindness of Queen Elizabeth; but all the superstructure was raised under King James. Thus, in 1606, he was sworn at the Council-Board at Dublin a Privy-Counsellor for Munster, but the then Lord-President Dunkard refused to admit him to that office notwithstanding, but was at last forced to submit (u). He was, by this promotion, put into a condition of consulting his own and the publick interest at the same time, as he had a vast property in this province. He was very industrious in settling and improving his estates, taking due care to let his lands to English Protestants only, and to erect, as occasion required, several towns and boroughs, nay, and some castles too, for their security (w). Intending the promotion of the affairs of that kingdom, as well as his own private concerns, he thought proper to make a journey over the best part of that province,

(p) Id. Ibid.

(q) Earl of Corke's True Remembrances.

(r) Catalogue of Honours conferred in Ireland, by W. St Leger.

(s) Earl of Corke's True Remembrances.

(t) Birch's Life of the Honourable Robert Boyle, prefixed to his Works, p. 3.

(u) Earl of Corke's True Remembrances.

(w) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, in the Introduction to the second Volume. See also what is said in note [G].

in

[F] Though attended with many difficulties very probably may be, and possibly is, true. We have this story in a sermon, where the preacher positively asserts, that he had it from the mouth of the lady at whose funeral he delivered this discourse; his relation runs thus (19). Mr Boyle (after Earl of Cork) who was then a widower, came one morning to wait upon Sir Geoffery Fenton, at that time a great officer of state in the kingdom of Ireland; who being engaged in business, and not knowing who it was that desired to speak with him, a while delayed him access; which time he spent pleasantly with his young daughter in her nurse's arms. But when Sir Geoffery came and saw whom he had made stay somewhat long, he civilly excused it: But Mr Boyle replied, he had been very civilly entertained, and spent his time much to his satisfaction in courting his daughter, if he might obtain the honour to be accepted for his son-in-law. At which Sir Geoffery, smiling to hear one who had been formerly married, move for a wife carried in arms and under two years old, asked him if he would stay for her? to which he frankly answered him he would, and Sir Geoffery as generously promised him he should then have his full consent; and they both kept their words honourably; and by this virtuous lady he had thirteen children. We have, besides this, another direct evidence to the material part of the fact, viz. the ingenious and judicious John Evelyn, Esq; who, in a private letter to a friend of his, expresses himself thus (20). That Mr Boyle coming to advise with Sir Geoffery Fenton, now knighted, finding him engaged with another client, and seeing a pretty child in the nurse's arms, entertained himself with them till Sir Geoffery came to him, making his excuse for causing him to wait so long; Mr Boyle pleasantly told him, he had been courting a young lady for his wife; and so it fortune, that sixteen years after Mr Boyle made his addresses in good earnest, and married the young lady. The observation made upon this by the Rev. Dr Birch, is very pertinent and judicious (21). Both these accounts, says he, are attended with very great difficulties; especially that of Dr Walker, which is absolutely irreconcilable with the Earl of Cork's own narrative, from which it appears that his first Lady died on the 14th of December 1599; and that he married his second, Sir Geoffery Fenton's daughter, the 25th of July, 1603; so that it is impossible that while he was a widower, he should enter into any engagements for the latter, while she was in her nurse's arms, and under two years old; since there was only an interval of three years and eight months between the death of his first wife, and his marriage with the second. As to Dr Walker, he was a man of a very lively and fertile imagination, and therefore I lay no stress at all upon the circumstances with which he tells the story; and which, as they are manifestly false and absurd, so I see no reason to charge them on the Countess of Warwick, who very probably told the naked truth of this story, viz. That the Earl of Cork, her father, courted the Lady by whom he had all his children, in her nurse's arms, and this might be very true As to what Mr Evelyn says, it is also very agreeable to the Earl of Cork's short notes of his own life; for as he went over in 1588, and did not marry this lady till the Summer of the year 1603, this admits of between 15 and 16 years from the time he might first see the lady he afterwards married; and if she was then a little more than two years old, she might be near eighteen when he married her; neither was there any great disproportion between their ages, since he was then in his thirty seventh year. Besides it is not at all improbable, that his old master, the Lord Chief Baron Manners, might recommend him when he went to Ireland to Sir Geoffery Fenton; and if so, this interview might happen within a short time after his coming to Dublin; and thus all the difficulties relating to the principal matter of fact are clearly removed, and the story, as it is told by Mr Evelyn, shewn to be both possible and probable. But it may be objected, that at least this rests upon supposition, and that if the lady was older at the time of her marriage, all that I have laid down falls to the ground. But then this objection also is as much founded upon supposition, for I think it is impossible to prove that this lady was older. The inscription upon the fine tomb that was erected for her in St Patrick's Church, at Dublin, might have cleared up this, if any mention had been made therein of the lady's age (22); but as there is not, we can come at no greater certainty in this respect, than what arises from the foregoing conjectures.

[G] A

(19) Sermon preached at the Funeral of Mary Countess of Warwick, by Dr Anthony Walker, p. 45, 46.

(20) John Evelyn, Esq; to Dr William Wotton, dated Sept. 10, 1703, from Wotton in Surrey, formerly in the custody of Mr. Smith.

(21) Life of the Honourable Robert Boyle, Esq; prefixed to his Works, p. 3.

(22) See Borlase's History of the Reduction of Ireland, p. 210.

in which he was a Counsellor, and then made a journey to Dublin for the instructions of the then Governors, after which he embarked for England, and having given a very satisfactory account to his Majesty of the state of things in Ireland, he returned thither in the month of February 1612, and was on the fifteenth of the said month sworn a Privy-Counsellor of State for the kingdom of Ireland, by the Lord Deputy Chichester, in Chichester house, by the King's express command, as a reward for his good service in giving so clear and perfect a relation of the state of the publick (x). He continued the same diligence and activity in his station, and thereby so conciliated the affections of all ranks of people, and was of so great assistance to those entrusted with the Government, that his Majesty thought fit to raise him to the dignity of the Peerage, which he accordingly did, September 29, 1616, by the stile of Baron of Youghall in the county of Cork (y), and four years after, as a further mark of royal favour, he was created, Oct. 6, 1620, Viscount Dungarvan and Earl of Cork (z). His credit with two Sovereigns, appeared to be rather increased than diminished under a third; for Charles I. had not fat long upon the throne, before he manifested his kindness and regard for this noble Peer, in a manner very unusual and extraordinary, by conferring titles of honour on his younger sons, even in their infancy (a), not only in tacit consideration of the Earl's great services rendered to the Crown, and his acting like a good patriot in that island, but so expressed, as the royal motives to those singular marks of distinction [G]. He persisted still in the same

(x) Remarks on the principal events of the reign of King James.

(y) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. II. p. 370.

(z) Earl of Corke's True Remembrances.

(a) Collins, ubi supra, p. 363.

[G] As the royal motives to these singular marks of distinction. The case of these honours stood thus: The Lord Falkland being Lord Deputy of Ireland, and the Earl of Cork's great friend, here presented his services to the Crown and Nation in so fair a light, that King Charles was pleased to send his letter to the Deputy, dated the 30th of November, 1627 (23), in the third year of his reign, directing him to confer the honours of Baron and Viscount upon the Earl's second surviving son Lewis, tho' he was then only eight years old. This letter ran thus: 'Having taken in our gracious consideration the many eminent virtues and abilities of our right well beloved cousin Richard Earl of Cork, and his singular good deserving, as well in planting those remote parts of our dominions with several English colonies, in settling true religion, and introducing civility and government there, where he found barbarism and superstition, and in the erecting of several churches, towers, castles, and other buildings, at his own charge, for the perpetual security of those countries, and our good subjects inhabiting in them; as also in zealously pursuing all good causes tending to the advancement of our most important services there; and understanding that he hath many younger sons, whom he bred in true religion and virtuous discipline, thereby making them worthy and profitable members of that state. We are pleased, for his and their encouragement to bestow extraordinary marks of our favour upon them, and by that effect (by these our letters) to confer upon his second son Lewis Boyle, Esq; the honour, dignity, stile and title of a Baron and Viscount of that our kingdom, requiring and authorising you thereby, forthwith to cause our Letters Patent to be passed unto him, in consideration of his services done, and to be done, unto us and our crown; thereby to create, constitute, and ordain him Baron of Bandon-Bridge, and Viscount Boyle of Kinalmeaky in the County of Cork, to hold and enjoy to him and his heirs male of his body, and for default of such issue male, the said honours to be and remain to the heirs male successively of the body of the said Richard Earl of Cork, begotten, or to be begotten, and to the heirs male of their bodies, and for default of such heirs male descending of the body of the said Earl, then the same to be and remain to the heirs male of him the said Richard Earl of Cork, for ever; and it is our further pleasure, that you forthwith confer upon the said Lewis Boyle the honour of Knighthood.'

The Lord Deputy, by whose interest and intercession this favour was obtained, as well for his own justification, as in regard to the honour of this noble Earl, takes care, to enumerate the many and great services by him performed in his Fiat, dated the 28th of February 1627, which in English runs thus (24). 'We taking notice of the excellent virtues and high faculties of Richard Earl of Cork, in advancing our affairs in Ireland, not only in Council, but in the government of the province of Munster, in which he has shewed himself to be a person of high abilities, but also in many other works of great moment, viz. in building towns, and fortifying them with fair walls and towers, and filling them with English colonies, building churches, and reducing the people to civil obedience in establishing religion, extirpating superstition, defending the passes of that country with castles, building many bridges for the convenience of the publick, guarding the ports and maritime places of the said province, against foreign enemies, in first introducing manufactures and mechanic arts into the province, and afterwards establishing them by guilds and fraternities of artificers, to the plentiful increase of riches and civility, by planting and continually supporting leaders and other men experienced in arms from England, to the number at least of fifteen hundred, and to the perpetual security and defence of those parts, and all this he did at his own expence, and by his own industry; all which tends not only to the present utility and ornament of those parts, but to the perpetual security and defence of them really indeed excellent, and which it is difficult to say, whether the like were ever undertaken by any other subject in times past. In contemplation of which, our Father adorned the said Richard with many titles of honour, and placed him in the highest degree of nobility in Ireland, so that we have scarce any thing left us to heap upon our said cousin, unless we derive honours to his sons, and posterity of his name to the perpetual eulogy of his memory. And we being informed that our said cousin has had a second son named Lewis, a youth of great hopes, the true image of his father's genius, and in whom is easy to be seen a branch of that tree from whence he is sprung. We also to shew our good disposition to the said Earl, and to give him some token of our favour, which may remain to posterity in an indelible character, have thought proper to place the said Lewis, (for the sake of his father) though in his tender years, among the nobles of this kingdom; and therefore by the advice of the Lord Deputy Faulkland, and according to the tenor of our Privy-Seal, dated at Westminster, the 30th of November, in the third year of our reign, have and do advance the said Lewis Boyle to the state, title, and honour, of Baron of Bandon-Bridge, &c.'

At the same time by virtue of the King's letters the Lord Deputy by his Fiat of the same date, conferred the title of a Baron on Roger the Earl's fifth son, by the stile and title of Lord Boyle of Broghill; and as this young Lord was only between six and seven years old, a few lines from that instrument (shewing the reason of that creation) may not be improper (25). 'We considering the many acceptable services done not only unto us and to our Father, but to all Ireland, (especially in Munster) by Richard Earl of Cork, respecting also in him the nobility of his family, as being long made hereditary Lords, Viscounts, and his daughters married into many noble families, and having received an account from our said cousin, that he hath been blessed with another son called Roger, from whose genius and disposition great things are to be hoped, and willing to grant more ample favours to our said cousin, We, for the sake of his father, have taken the said Roger, (as it were out of the cradle) to place him in a rank of honour, as a Baron of Ireland' It was the more necessary to take notice of this, because of a very

(23) Transcribed from the original, and communicated by a person of great worth and learning at Dublin.

(24) Translated, transcribed, and communicated, by the same worthy person.

(25) Communicated by the same hand.

same course, omitted nothing that could contribute to the security or improvement of the English and Protestant interest in that island, and therefore it was thought proper, as well as conducive to the publick satisfaction, on the departure of the Lord-Deputy Falkland, to make him, in conjunction with the Lord Viscount Loftus of Ely, one of the Lords-Justices, and he was accordingly so constituted, Octob. 6, 1629 (b), and held that high office several years. The splendour of his publick character, could not, however, defend him from a severe stroke of fortune in his private capacity, for on the sixteenth of February he lost his Countess, by whom he had been the father of fifteen children, and for whom he had the most tender and sincere affection (c). He caused her body to be interred with great splendour and magnificencé in the cathedral church of St Patrick's in Dublin, where he erected a most pompous monument to her memory, which, long afterwards, he was, to his great sorrow and mortification, obliged to pull down and remove (d) [H]. As yet, however, his favour was so entire, that he procured a patent for the high office of Lord-Treasurer of Ireland, into which he was sworn, November 9, 1631, and by a felicity peculiar to himself, for which there was no precedent, and which has proved no precedent to any thing of a like kind, he had interest enough to obtain this high post should be made hereditary in his family, as it has ever since continued (e). As this was the greatest, so it was one of the last honours he received, for in July 1633 (f), Thomas Lord Wentworth was declared Deputy of Ireland, and soon after went over into that island, and took upon him the government. While the Earl held the post of one of the Lords-Justices, he promoted, amongst other things, the procuring Protestants to come over and settle there from England, with zeal and success. He, from the same principle, contributed also to set the frauds of the Popish Priests in their true light, by causing St Patrick's purgatory, a delusion which a long belief had rendered venerable, to be exposed as a trick and an imposture, as it really was, to all the world (g). He laboured also to suppress the insolency of that faction, by dispossessing them of some new mans-houses which they had opened in Dublin, without, and indeed against, law; and by other methods, which raised some clamour against him, but as plainly appears, from a letter written to him by Lord-Keeper Coventry, his services were well received, and he was encouraged to proceed in the same course, as indeed he did, so long as he remained in possession of authority (h). This letter therefore (as hitherto unpublished) we have thought expedient to place in the notes, for the information and satisfaction of the reader

(b) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 53.

(c) Earl of Cork's True Remembrances.

(d) Strafford's Letters, Vol. I. p. 298.

(e) Catalogue of Honours conferred in Ireland.

(f) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 53.

(g) Id. Ibid. p. 54.

(h) Borlase's Reduction of Ireland, p. 210.

very strange and groundless mistake in Mr Budgell's memoirs of this family, who says, that this young gentleman, after his return from his travels, was made a Captain of horse by the Earl of Northumberland, and Baron of Broghill by the interest of the Earl of Strafford, who had a mind to gain him to his party (26): Whereas it is very plain, that he had been raised to the Peerage very near six years before the Earl of Strafford went first to Ireland, who was so far from favouring any branch of the Cork family, that it is certain, he looked with an evil eye upon these very creations (27).

[H] He was to his great sorrow and mortification obliged to pull down and remove.] This Lady was privately interred on the 27th of February, 1629-30, but her funeral was publicly solemnized on the 11th of March following, soon after which, the Earl of Cork purchased from the Dean and Chapter of St Patrick's church, the inheritance of the upper part of the chancel where the vault was, in which the bodies of her grandfather by the mother's side, the Lord Chancellor Weston, and of her father Sir Geoffery Fenton were laid, over which the Earl her husband caused a fine marble tomb to be erected (28); this presently gave offence to some people, who suggested that it stood where the altar ought to stand, of which they complained to the King, who mentioned it to Dr Laud, then Bishop of London; who after the Lord Wentworth was made Lord Deputy of Ireland, and himself Archbishop of Canterbury, moved him that it might be enquired into, as it was, and this affair made afterwards a very great noise. The Earl of Cork procured a letter from Dr Usher, then Lord Primate of Ireland, and also from Dr Launcelot Bulkeley, then Archbishop of Dublin, justifying, that the tomb did not stand in the place of the altar, and that instead of being an inconvenience, it was a great ornament to the church; which letters Archbishop Laud transmitted to the Lord Deputy, and at the same time acquainted him that they did not give himself any satisfaction. The postscript to this letter, dated Lambeth, March 11, 1634, is very remarkable, and shews both the rise and the fallhood of the common opinion, as if it was the Lord Deputy, afterwards Earl of Strafford, set this matter on foot out of prejudice to the Earl of Cork, and being very short, I shall transcribe it (29). 'I had almost forgot to tell ' you, that all this business about demolishing my Lord of Cork's tomb, is charged upon you, as if it were done only because he will not marry his son to my Lord Clifford's daughter, and that I do it to join with you; whereas the complaint came against it to me out of Ireland, and was presented by me to the King before I knew that your Lordship was named for Deputy there. But jealousies know no end.' The Archbishop afterwards wrote in very strong terms to the Earl of Cork himself, in which he affirms the same thing, and deals very roundly with his Lordship upon that and other subjects, advising him to leave the whole to the Lord Deputy and the Archbishops. As to the issue of the affair, it appears clearly from a letter of the Lord Deputy Wentworth's, dated August 23d, 1634, to the Archbishop, in which he delivers himself thus (30). 'I have issued a commission according to my warrant, for viewing the Earl of Cork's tomb, the two Archbishops and himself, with four Bishops, and the two Deans and Chapters were present when we met, and made them all so ashamed, that the Earl desires he may have leave to pull it down without reporting further into England; so as I am content if the miracle be done tho' Mohammed do it, and there is an end of the tomb before it come to be entombed indeed.—And for me that my Lord Treasurer do what he please; I shall ever with his ways may be those of honour to himself, and dispatch to my master's affairs; but go it as it shall please God with me, believe me, my Lord, I will be still thorough and thorough one and the same, and with comfort be it spoken by myself, and your Grace's commendations.' I have placed all these facts together, because they relate to the same subject, and though they happened at different times, they could not well be divided without rendering them dark and obscure, whereas they are perfectly clear and well connected as they now stand, and fully explain a point, of which there are many hints, but no distinct account in any of the histories of those times: it may not be amiss to add, that tho' the tomb has been taken away above a century, yet the inscription that was upon it is still extant; but as we have given the substance of it already, it may suffice if we inform the reader where it is to be found at large (31).

(30) Ibid. p. 298.

(31) Collins's Peerage, Vol. II. p. 263.

(26) Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 34, 35.

(27) Earl of Strafford's Letters, Vol. I. p. 240.

(28) Earl of Cork's True Remembrances. Borlase's Reduction of Ireland, p. 210. Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. II. p. 263.

(29) Earl of Strafford's Letters, Vol. I. p. 211.

reader [I]. But this was far from being the only material service that he rendered the State, during the time he was at the head of it. He was very instrumental in putting the army, which was of prodigious consequence in that country, upon a right foot, and securing for it a regular and competent subsistence, and in transplanting a multitude of barbarous Irish Septs or Clans, out of the fruitful and well cultivated province of Leinster, into the wilds and deserts of the county of Kerry (i). He was also diligent and active in his office as Lord-High-Treasurer, and was at great pains in endeavouring to procure a mint to be settled in that kingdom, his reasons for which, that they may be preserved, which may perhaps be a means of procuring them their due weight, as they were never printed before, appear in the notes (k) [K]. On the coming over of the Lord-Deputy Wentworth, though some civilities passed between them, and they soon after engaged in a family-treaty for the marriage of the Lord Viscount Dungarvan with the daughter of Lord Clifford of Laneshorough (l), to whom the Deputy was nearly related, yet a coldness quickly

(i) Letter from the Lords-Justices to the Lord-Deputy, containing the State of Ireland, dated Dublin-Castle, Feb. 26, 1631.

(k) See the new Translation of Sir J. Ware's Works, Vol. II. c. xxxii.

(l) Strafford's Letters, Vol. I. p. 74.

[I] In the notes, for the information and satisfaction of the reader.] As soon as this noble Peer found himself at the head of the government in Ireland, he resolved to put the laws in execution against Papists, as being sensible, that good laws were of very little importance, by being made, if they were not also carried into effect; and therefore he directed that the statute in the 2d of Queen Elizabeth for prosecuting such Papists as did not come to church, should be given in charge at all the assizes, and he also thought fit to direct some mas-houses to be shut up, and some priests that had taken great liberties to be imprisoned; and of these proceedings, at the same time that he gave notice, as the duties of his office required, to the Secretaries of State in England, he (32) also wrote privately to the Lord Keeper, upon whose friendship he very much depended, who sent him the following epistle in return, in which as he promises him what service lay in his power, so it must be remembered to his honour, that he very religiously kept his word, and was at all times and in all circumstances the Earl of Cork's fast friend so long as he lived, tho' it cost him some ill-will from other great men who had not the same opinion of the Earl that he had.

(32) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 54.

The Lord Keeper Coventry to the Earl of Cork.

My very good Lord,

I HAVE received your Lordship's letters of the 9th of this month, whereby you have been pleased to give me private advertisement of that which, by your general letters to my Lords of the Council, was yesterday imparted to the board, concerning the late passages at Dublin, touching those superstitious houses, which, with such insolence and tumults, were fought to be maintained in that chief city of the kingdom, against the laws, his Majesty's strict proclamation, and the policy of the publick state and government. Wherein, as your Lordship will perceive, by the general letters from hence, in answer of your's, how graciously his Majesty (who was present in Council at the first reading of them) did, and doth accept that good service, and how ready the Lords were to give you the just applause and commendation of your own well deserving in it; so must I, in particular, acknowledge the respect you were pleased to shew me in your private letters, and return your Lordship many hearty thanks for the same: And if there shall fall out occasion hereafter for your making me beholden to you in the like kind, for any thing that shall concern his Majesty's service, your Lordship shall find me careful to do you right to his Majesty and the Lords, and in all respects towards your Lordship, to shew myself, your Lordship's very assured to do you service,

THO. COVENTRY.

Durham-house, 31 January, 1629.

It is very probable, that this letter encouraged the Earl of Cork, as one of the Lords-Justices, to proceed farther in this way, notwithstanding the people even at Dublin were so insolent, as to set at liberty by force a Priest he had committed (33). He therefore shut up fifteen new religious houses, and seized them to the King's use, as he did another principal house of theirs in the Back-Lane in Dublin, which was granted to the college; and thereupon a rector and scholars were sent thither, and lectures set up, to which the Lords-Justices came sometimes (34); but in Lord Wentworth's time this house was recovered by it's owners in a legal way, and afterwards let to the same use, which was made one of the articles of impeachment against him (35).

(33) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 54.

(34) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 15.

[K] As they were never printed before, appear in the notes.] In all the reigns from the conquest of Ireland, in that of Henry II, there was money coined in Ireland down to that of Queen Elizabeth, when the money coined for them was transmitted from England; these pieces were stamped with a harp, and from thence were called harpers, but they were not of pure silver, and of the value only of nine-pence. In the two last years of her reign, she sent over pieces in which the mixture of silver was so small, that what the people were commanded by proclamation to receive for a shilling, was worth no more than two-pence half-penny (36). King James and King Charles restored the harpers to their original value, but established no mint, to procure which, the Lord Treasurer transmitted the following reasons to England.

(35) Rushworth's Trial of the Earl of Strafford, p. 27, 63.

(36) Sir James Ware's Works, Vol. II. p. 218.

Reasons why a mint should be in Ireland.

- ' First, it is the fountain and the life of trade.
- ' Secondly, if there be money coined here it will be a great cause to keep it in England, and to enrich both kingdoms.
- ' Thirdly, few subjects have the means which they of this Kingdom have, to bring in Bullion; because the most part of their traffick is victual; so that (we think) if there were any imposition laid upon them, they would be very willing to bring in the tenth, or fifth part in Bullion for such commodities as they carry forth; to the setting forward of so good a work, being certain of such a rate as now it is in England.
- ' Fourthly, for want of this mint, the merchant is discouraged for bringing Bullion into this Kingdom, because we are not able to make a return, unless we transport the same into England to the mint there, which is an adventure contrary to the laws of the land, so that we cannot give a price answerable to their expectation.
- ' Fifthly, as concerning the charge that the undertakers of so noble a work shall be at, his Majesty (we conceive) will be willing that the fifths, which shall accrue and arise to himself, shall first go to satisfy the undertakers, in full satisfaction for their disbursements, towards that business, which (we conceive) in a short time will be regained again.
- ' Sixthly, this mint will be a means to bring over men of skill, and tools and instruments fitting to seek and make trial of mines in this kingdom, which we suppose may hereafter be found; and we suppose the mine here already found will be a help; and likewise this mint will be a means to bring in an assay and touch in this kingdom, that we may work at a certainty, according to the assay of England, which without an assay-master we cannot.'

22d October, 1632.

The reader will observe, that mention is made in these reasons of silver mines discovered in Ireland, which, by the King's authority, one Captain Whitmore was impowered to work, and the Earl of Strafford had great hopes of them, but at last they came to nothing (37), but it is not probable this had any influence on the proposal for a mint, which I suppose failed rather by our Earl's loss of power, and credit at court.

(37) Strafford's Letters, Vol. I. p. 218—224.

quickly arose, which swelled by degrees into unkindness and hatred on both sides. The Lord Deputy came over full of an opinion, that the Earl of Cork had too much power and too great interest, therefore he set himself immediately to lessen both, and encouraged all who shewed an inclination to oppose him; which, amongst many other controversies between him and other persons in office, produced one with the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, of which we are able to say something more than has been hitherto known (m) [L]. Abundance of suits were stirred up against him by the same means,

(m) See the methods practised to reduce the power of the Lord-Treasurer's Office, in Ware's Works, Vol. II. c. xxxii.

[L] To say somewhat more than has been hitherto known. It was very natural for the chief governors of Ireland, to be extremely displeas'd with the Earl's having obtained the office of Lord High-Treasurer in fee, and therefore since this act was not to be undone, they studied to reduce the power of the Lord-Treasurer, in which they have succeeded very well; but the first step was not quite so fortunate, since the Treasurer prevail'd in this contest; upon which he wrote to Mr John West, an officer of great knowledge in England, from whom he received the following clear and decisive answer; which, for some reasons contain'd therein, is not quite so clear as it otherwise might have been (38).

(38) Communicated by the same worthy person from Ireland.

To the Right Honourable the Earl of Cork, &c.

RIGHT Honourable and my singular good Lord, I have received your Lordship's letter by the hands of Mr Sidnam, wherein I found your Lordship's kind remembrance of the care I took for the recovery of the health of the young lady your Lordship's sweet daughter, which it pleas'd God to give a blessing unto, to my great comfort, your Lordship's noble favours to me, binding me hereto. I am much troubled that I received your Lordship's letters in a time wherein I was compass'd with so many extremities which had fallen upon me, as the stone and the gout, holding me with violence and intolerable pain in my right thigh, which I broke waiting on my old master King James, at Guildford in Surry; and lastly, a great weakness in my sight, which old age and much reading have brought upon me, having no other remedy for all this but patience, which it hath pleas'd God to grant me, and in his goodness I hope will more and more afford me.

As touching the answering those questions which are contain'd in your Lordship's letter, viz.

First, whether within the verge of the Exchequer, and coming from the Exchequer-Chamber into the Court of Exchequer, the Lord Treasurer or the Chancellor of the Exchequer have precedence; and so in their going out, which of them goeth foremost so long as they are within the court?

The Lord Treasurer without any question hath the precedence, and is chief officer of that court; and in the Exchequer Chamber hath the first place; but in the Exchequer Court the Chancellor sitteth uppermost, as it hath been always reputed.

Secondly, where they are plac'd within the court, and whether Mr Chancellor or Lord Treasurer taketh the upper hand?

This is answer'd in the first question.

Thirdly, upon English bills preferred in the Exchequer, to whom they are directed, with the words of the title or direction, whether it be to the Lord Treasurer, and Chancellor, and Barons; or to the Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, and Barons?

To the Lord Treasurer, Chancellor, and Barons.

Lastly, whether upon English bills preferred in that court; the subpoena requireth appearance to be, coram Cancellario, Thesaurario, & Baronibus, and under whose test those subpoena's go, and all other process upon English bills?

All the subpoena's are returnable coram Baronibus; and test the Chief Baron.

The subpoena's, ad audiend' judic' upon hearing of causes in the Exchequer Chamber are coram Thesaurario, Cancellario, & Baronibus, test. the Lord Chief Baron.

And thus having briefly answer'd the aforesaid questions, and not being able to enlarge my first aim further at this time, by reason of some of my friends absence out of town, with whom I meant to have had some conference, especially touching the Chancellor's sitting above the Lord Treasurer in the open Court, the Lord Treasurer always going before him at the rising — of the Court. When I shall have further satisfied my self herein, I will make bold to give your Lordship further satisfaction therein; for I am strong of opinion, that it is not by way of any precedence, but to make the Lord Treasurer's greatness the more eminent, by sitting in the midst as it were, having the Chancellor on the right hand, and the Chief Baron on the left, and this is my conceit; but hereafter your Lordship shall understand more. And this with the remembrance of my humble duty and service to your Lordship, I rest for ever your Lordship's humble servant, 19th December, 1635.

J. O. WEST.

His Lordship was so very sollicitous about this affair, that he wrote by the same messenger to Sir Julius Caesar on the same subject, from whom he received the following clear and decisive answer; as I have taken it from the original in his own hand-writing, communicated by a person of worth in Ireland.

The Master of the Rolls (in England) to the Lord Treasurer in Ireland.

Right honourable and my very good Lord,

I Have received your Lordship's by Mr Sidnam, in the first whereof, I find many of your most honourable favours both to myself, and my nephew July Smith, as likewise, to his father before him, being once your Lordship's chaplain, for all which I most humbly thank your Lordship, and will endeavour on my part by all possible means to requite the same. And I humbly beseech your Lordship to continue your favour towards my nephew July Smith, for his preferment hereafter, as occasion shall happen; and I pray your Lordship to rest assured, that I will always be thankful for the same. Now touching your Lordship's four questions; I know not your usage of Ireland, but I will answer in that I know, as being above twenty-one years since a Chancellor of the Exchequer in England myself, for the space of eight years at least.

I. That the Lord Treasurer of England hath the precedence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, both in the Exchequer and all places wheresoever.

II. That in their sitting in the Exchequer; albeit the Chancellor sits on the right hand of the Lord Treasurer upon the bench, yet the Lord Treasurer sitteth above him, for that he sitteth next to the King's arms in the Exchequer-Court, and in the Exchequer-Chamber sitteth alone upon the high bench, and the Chancellor upon the Bench of the right hand, and the Lord Chief Baron with the rest of the Barons on the Bench on the left hand.

III. That when there is a Lord Treasurer in being, the English bills in the Exchequer-Chamber are preferred to the Lord Treasurer, Chancellor, and Barons, and not to the Chancellor, Lord Treasurer, and Barons.

IV. That the subpoena's upon English bills preferred, in that court require the appearance to be coram Thesaurario, Cancellario, & Baronibus; and under the test of the Lord Chief Baron: And if it please your Lordship, thus much will be testified under the hands of all the ancient clerks of the Exchequer, who marvel very much that any one should doubt thereof; and I most humbly take my leave, your Lordship's humble servant,

JUL. CÆSAR.

Received as the former letter was, Jan. 13, 1635.

[M] Much

means, and besides the cutting insult offered to him in obliging him to demolish his Lady's tomb, though he would willingly have built a screen before it, he suffered daily new mortifications (n). The Lord-Deputy, afterwards Lord-Lieutenant and Earl of Strafford, continued firm in his purpose, and took care to keep those, upon whose assistance he depended most in England, in a continual state of jealousy as to the Earl of Cork, which he did not find very hard to do, the Archbishop of Canterbury being already a declared adversary to the Earl, on the score of supposed injuries done the Church (o); and Secretary Cooke seems to have approved the design of raising the King's revenue at any rate; so that after all his long services to the Crown, and notwithstanding all the improvements made for promoting the English Protestant interest in Ireland, the Earl of Cork was, for seven years together, abandoned to the resentments of a man, much inclined, and no less able, to hurt him [M]. But it was not many years before a new change happened, which delivered the Earl from this oppression, and in some measure put his antagonist in his power. The Earl of Strafford being impeached of high-treason in England, and the Earl of Cork being there in the spring of 1641, when that Lord was put upon his tryal, being brought by order of the House of Commons to support their charge, he gave evidence against him (p), which, though that great person took very much amiss, so far as to proceed to very injurious insinuations, yet the Earl of Cork declared, he did not come to England with any desire or design to injure or prosecute him for things past, and as a proof, owned that he had brought no papers or proofs over with him, but being in town and summoned, thought himself obliged to obey, submit to be examined, and tell the truth (q). He returned to Ireland soon after, and had not been there long before that fatal rebellion broke out, which was so detrimental to this, and shameful to that, country. It was very sudden and unexpected, as may appear from the first account the Earl of Cork had of it, who, in case it had been sooner detected, would scarce have been found from home at so critical a juncture, when both the publick, and all his private concerns, were at stake (r). This account, however, is unquestionably true [N]. It does not

[M] Much inclined, and no less able, to hurt him.] The controversy between these two noble persons, is a very curious and a very useful piece of history; we have several touches of it in some of the best books extant, in relation to those times; and there are some hints of it, even in our general histories, but we have no where any accounts, either of the rise of this misunderstanding, or how far it proceeded; and therefore, it may not be amiss to examine it a little more particularly. There seems to have been several causes of the Earl of Strafford's dislike of the Earl of Cork; but because we have little room, I will name only three. His Lordship was Deputy of Ireland, many months before he went over thither, and in that space of time, he wrote several letters to the Lords-Justices, of whom the Earl of Cork was one; and in these it plainly appears, that he was not a little offended with some points of their conduct, in which he thought his master's orders (but sent by his advice) were not respectfully enough obeyed (39). Another cause of his dislike was, the authority and interest of the Earl of Cork, which he makes no scruple of declaring in his letters, that he was determined to bring down, as supposing that if he could humble the great Earl of Cork, no body in that country could give him much trouble (40). A third reason was, that he looked upon the Earl of Cork, as a man chiefly promoted by the Lord Viscount Falkland, who had proved no friend to Strafford, and whose creatures therefore he disliked (41); we have mentioned in the text, various instances of the pains taken to disquiet the Earl of Cork, and we shall add some others here; as for instance, the forcing the Earl to appear at the Council-Table, in relation to an affair of no great consequence; threatening him with imprisonment in case he disobeyed the Lord Deputy's orders, and all this openly in the sight and hearing of such as attended the Council-Table, with a view to lessen his general credit and esteem (42). The causing informations to be preferred against him by the Attorney-General, in order to deprive him of part of his estate; which, in one case was carried so far, that the Earl was content to give fifteen thousand pounds to procure his pardon, and to have all the proceedings taken off the file (43). By bearing very hard upon families, to which he was nearly allied, and persons who stood in close relation to him; such as the Lord Chancellor Lofthouse, Viscount Ely, the Earl of Kildare, and others. The refusing him licence to go over to England when his affairs required it, merely to prevent his raising up a contrary interest at Court (44); but above all, Strafford's prejudice against the Earl of Cork, appears plainest from his own letters, in which he avowedly proposes to obtain a vast sum of money for the Revenue, by informations brought against this Nobleman, provided no favour was shewn him by the King, but he was left totally in the Lord Deputy's hands (45); lastly, the countenancing such as set up against him, or in any way endeavoured to disturb him in his peace, or in his possessions. Yet with regard to one instance of this kind that is commonly mentioned, it seems to be pretty much out of the case, I mean, the suit set on foot by Dr John Atherton, Bishop of Waterford and Lismore, who, though he was promoted by the Earl of Strafford, as himself acknowledged upon a very solemn occasion, yet I do not find, that he relied much upon the Lord Deputy's protection; since, on the 27th of June 1637 (46), he was contented to join with the Earl in a petition to the Lord Deputy and Council, the prayer of which was, that they would appoint arbitrators to decide their controversies, which was accordingly done; and the Bishop of Derry and the Master of the Wards were assigned upon this petition, and they afterwards made the report, by which it appeared, that the Earl had never purchased any thing directly from the Church, but from other persons for valuable considerations forty years before, when he was not so well acquainted with the state of Ireland, but for the sake of Religion; and because thro' the alienations of former Bishops, there was not then above fifty pounds a year left to the See, the Earl was content to forego a part of his rights, in consequence of which, the arbitrators awarded Lismore and the lands belonging thereto, to the Earl; and Armore with other lands to the Bishop (47); so that there seems to be no just cause in respect to this matter, either to blame the Earl of Strafford for supporting Bishop Atherton against the Earl, or to suggest, as some have done, that the Earl of Cork had too great a hand in bringing him to the gallows, that he might be free from the law-suits he had brought against him in right of his See; for these, as we have shewn, were over before, and consequently the Earl had less to fear from him, than from any of his successors. But notwithstanding these differences between the two noble Earls, it is certain, that Strafford had a great kindness for the Lord Viscount Dungarvan, the Earl of Cork's eldest son, and was very instrumental in his marriage with the Earl of Cumberland's daughter, by which the family acquired their English honours (48). He was likewise a very good friend to the Archbishop of Tuam, the Earl of Cork's near kinsman (49), and to his son-in-law the Lord Goring, son to the Earl of Norwich (50).

[N] This account, however, is unquestionably true.] The Irish Rebellion was so very closely carried, and some of those concerned in it, were such deep Politicians, that they found ways and means not only to blind such

(45) See his Letter upon this subject.

(46) Collections relating to Ireland, by P. W. P. 396.

(47) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. P. 58.

(48) See the article of BOYLE (RICHARD) Earl of Burlington and Cork.

(49) See his Letter to the Earl of Strafford, among that Earl's Letters, Vol. II. P. 356.

(50) Strafford's Letters, Vol. I. P. 155.

(e) See this point further explained in note [N].

(o) See Archbishop Laud's sharp Letter to the Earl of Cork, in Strafford's Letters, Vol. I. p. 222.

(p) Rushworth's Trial of the Earl of Strafford at large, p. 175, 176, 181.

(q) The Earl's own Account at the Bar of the House of Lords, ibid. p. 228.

(r) Letter to the Speaker of the House of Commons in England, dated Youghall, Aug. 25, 1642.

(39) Strafford's Letters, Vol. I. P. 77.

(40) Ibid. p. 305, 306.

(41) Strafford's Letters, Vol. I. P. 135.

(42) Rushworth's Trial of the Earl of Strafford, p. 175, 176.

(43) Answer of the Earl of Strafford, to the 4th article of the Commons impeachments.

(44) Strafford's Letters, Vol. I. P. 399.

not appear from any memorials now extant; that the Earl of Cork had served in his youth, and yet, in his attendance on Sir George Carew, he must have seen a good deal of service; he addressed himself, however, now it was necessary, to this new trade, of a foldier, as if it had been his old profession, and it is almost incredible, how great a figure he made therein. The castle of Lismore, his capital seat, he rendered a fortress capable of imposing respect on the Irish, his servants were armed and disciplined immediately, he repaired to Youghall, which was but a weak place, in person, and summoning all his tenants to serve under his sons, whom he put at their head without delay, he saw himself, before Christmas, at the head of a little army of five hundred horse and foot, well armed, well disciplined, and in good order, of his own people, under himself and his four sons, and which, perhaps, was no very pleasing circumstance, all in his own pay (s). He now reaped the benefit of his own great industry and caution in planting his country with English only, for they adhered to him steadily, and his appearance in Munster was so formidable, that it was the last part of the kingdom which the rebels ventured to attack. It is indeed worthy of memory, how he disposed and regulated his little force, so as to make it answer so many purposes; his eldest son, the Lord Viscount Dungarvan, he sent with a fine troop of horse, to join the Lord President St Leger; his second son, the Lord Viscount Kynelmeaky, was appointed to defend his own town, for his father had given it him, of Bandonbridge, well seated, well fortified, and well peopled, there being in it upwards of seven thousand souls, English Protestants, and not a single Papist in the place (t). His son Roger, Lord Broghill, was left in Lismore-castle to defend it; and his son Francis, the youngest that was able to act, remained with himself. In this posture he continued many months, gaining frequent advantages over the rebels, from whom, in less than the space of a year, his forces took several strong castles, and killed them upwards of three thousand men (u). But he paid his own troops all this time regularly; and when his money was gone, converted his plate into coin, thinking it better bestowed in defending his lands, than being buried in the earth to keep it out of the hands of the Irish. At last, however, his forces, his treasure, and his patience, were almost all wore out, which forced him to write to the Speaker of the English Parliament in very pressing terms, and to lay the condition of the province open in the most moving manner possible (w). But what is very extraordinary, and deserves to be for ever remembered to the honour of this noble person, when every body almost despaired of the publick safety, and were afraid of exasperating the rebels, he had the courage to think of punishing them for their offences, and that too in a legal way; neither was this in a few cases, or against particular persons, more easy to be brought to justice, or who might be supposed to have given immediate cause of resentment to this noble person, but generally (x). Bills were found, by juries free from all exception, against the Viscounts, Roch, Mountgarret, Ikerrin, and Muskerry; the Lords, Dunboyne, Castelconnel, and the heir of Lord Cahir, Theobald Bourke, Baron of Loughmere; and Richard Butler, Esq; of Killcash; brother to the Earl of Ormond, with all persons of note or figure, either laity or clergy, who dwelt, or had committed acts of rebellion in the counties of Cork or Waterford, to the number of eleven

(s) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II p. 95.

(t) From his own Letter to the Speaker, Lenthall

(u) Taken from the same Letter.

(w) See that Letter in Orrery's Letters p. 4.

(x) Orrery's Letters, p. 5.

as were most sincerely attached to the English and Protestant interest, but which is very extraordinary, made them subservient to their pernicious designs. The violent subversion of the Earl of Strafford was driven on by them, and the greatest part of the Irish Committee sent over to prosecute him in England, were Papists. But the most singular turn of all was, that they hindered 4000 men from being sent to Spain, because of the great danger the nation might be in, from having so many men returned upon them, perfectly well disciplined, and who knew every creek and corner of the country, out of a country always an inveterate enemy of England; but at bottom they wanted these very men to join them in the rebellion, as they afterwards did (51). By this thorough dissimulation, they had acquired such a degree of credit, that they were in hopes of seeing the military stores, and what quantity of arms were in the hands of the Government, and where placed; by giving out, that some of the Lord Strafford's creatures had framed a plot for blowing up the Parliament, and in this they had certainly succeeded, if Sir John Borlace, who was one of the Lords-Justices and Master of the Ordnance, had not wisely and stoutly refused it (52). But the fullest proof of the security of the Protestants, and the art of the Papists, will appear by the following singular account of the first notice the Earl of Cork had of the rebellion, which we have from the Rev. Mr Morrice, Chaplain to the first Earl of Orrery; who probably had it from that Lord's own mouth; we shall give it in his own words, observing only, that the day on which this transaction happened was the 27th of October, 1641 (53). 'About two or three days after Lord Broghill's arrival in Ireland, he waited on his father at Castle-Lyons, where the Earl of Barri-more, who had married Lord Broghill's sister, had invited them to dinner. They met at Castle-Lyons, Lord Muskerry, and some others of the Irish nation; all Papists, with whom they were very free and familiar; but it happened while they were at dinner, a gentleman came to my Lord of Cork with letters; who before he could be persuaded to sit down, desired to speak with his Lordship in private, and then; with horror in his face, told him, that the Irish had been in Rebellion three days. That they had committed many outrages and cruelties upon the English, and that in all the country from Leinster down towards Clonmel (through which he had passed) the Irish Rebels were in arms, so that he was forced to choose all the bye-ways he could find, that he might bring those sad tidings to his Lordship. My Lord of Cork would discover no surprize at this dismal news, but desired him to sit down to dinner, and say nothing. As soon as dinner was over, my Lord of Cork opened his packet, wherein he found proclamations to warn the English to be on their defence, declaring withal, that Rebellion, and the discovery of it. His Lordship communicated the account to the company then present, but Lord Muskerry seemed to make light of it; and treated it as a ridiculous thing without truth or foundation; however, they all forthwith prepared to return to their several homes, and my Lord of Cork sent notice of the tidings he had received, together with a proclamation, to Sir William St Leger, then Lord President of Munster, and went back with his company to Lismore. After the Earl of Cork was gone; Lord Muskerry also returned home, still persisting there was no such thing as a rising either then in being, or intended to be; but the next account was, that Lord Muskerry himself was up in Rebellion in the western parts, with many thousands of Irish'

(51) Hist. of the Reduction of Ireland, p. 72.

(52) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 71.

(53) Memoirs of Lord Broghill, afterwards Earl of Orrery, by the Rev. Mr Morrice; p. 6.

(y) His Letter to the Speaker (Lenthall) before cited.

(z) Borlase's Hist. P. 209.

(a) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. II. p. 363.

(b) See his own Letters to the Speaker, the Marquis of Ormond, and Lord Goring.

(c) Borlase's Hist. P. 209.

(d) Thoresby's Hist. of Leeds, p. 64.

eleven hundred, which bills of indictment his Lordship transmitted to England, signifying at the same time, his resolution to prosecute all these persons to an outlawry (y). One would have imagined, that this must have provoked the rebels to have employed their then superior forces against the province of Munster in general, and the country of the great Earl of Cork more especially; but Sir William St Leger, then President, kept them in awe as long as he lived, though he had but a very inconsiderable force (z). On his death, the Provisional Command was conferred, by common consent, upon the Lord Inchiquin, who married the President's daughter, the rebels either conceiving some hope because he was of an old Irish family, or beyond measure exasperated at his acting against them, marched with a numerous army to attack him, and September 3, 1642, they came to a battle at Lis-carrol, in which the rebels were defeated, and the only person of note killed on the side of the English, was the Viscount Kynelmeaky, whose body was interred in the tomb erected by the Earl of Cork for his family at Youghall (a). His father shewed his constancy in supporting this misfortune with firmness, and was not more affected with his private, than with the publick, calamity [O]. He continued his services to the kingdom with the same warmth and spirit, though he was no longer in a condition to do such mighty things as at the beginning, his estate being wasted and destroyed, his towns converted into garrisons, his houses into castles, his tenants in arms in the field, his servants doing duty in his presence, and his very goods disposed of to pay them. But what he could do he did, and continued his sons in arms, risking his whole family on the same bottom with the Protestant interest in Ireland (b). Yet how well soever he kept up his spirits in appearance, his inward concern, joined to the infirmities incident to old age, and the want of rest and quiet, made him break apace, and as if there had been some secret connection between this nobleman's fortune and that of his adopted country, he went to his grave on the very day (as is said) that the cessation was concluded with the Irish at Sigginstown, viz. Sept. 15, 1643 (c). He was interred in his own chapel, in his parish church at Youghall, near the noble monument he raised for his family, which is with great care and decency preserved to our times, with the inscriptions in relation to the honours he acquired, and the noble and numerous posterity he left behind him (d). His name is mentioned with honour by such as best understood the history of Ireland, and who considered him as one of the greatest promoters of the English interest, that ever settled in that island [P]. His wonderful rise, his vast estate, his prodigious improvements, [O] Was not more affected with his private, than with the publick calamity.] In this battle, which was very glorious for the English, who, with a force far inferior to that of the enemy, defeated them entirely; the Earl of Cork had four sons all at the head of troops of his own raising, viz. his eldest son, the Lord Viscount Dungarvan; Lewis, Lord Viscount Kynelmeaky; Roger, Lord Broghill, and Francis, afterwards Lord Shannon. They all distinguished themselves as became men descended from an antient English family; and Lord Kynelmeaky falling on the spot, his brother Francis, tho' not full twenty years of age, most gallantly rescued his body and his horse out of the hands of the rebels; of which fact we are ascertained by a letter under the Earl of Cork's hand, to the Marquis of Ormond, dated from Youghall, October 7, 1642 (54), in order to procure the company of foot which the deceased Viscount had commanded, for his elder brother Dungarvan; and the troop of horse which he also had, for his younger brother Francis. In this letter written on so melancholy an occasion, and so soon after so great a loss, the Earl shews a Roman magnanimity, and takes comfort for his son's death, from the glorious manner of his dying. His Lordship had also occasion to discover the same steadiness of mind, in respect to his son-in-law the Earl of Barrimore, who died September 29, in the same year, that is, about three weeks after the battle of Lis-carroll, of whom he tells the Marquis of Ormond, that he left a distressed wife with four children, an incumbered and disjointed estate, all his country and livelihood being little better than wasted, which induced him to solicit that generous nobleman, then commander in chief of the forces in Ireland, to continue the command of a troop of horse to the Earl's eldest son, for the better upholding of such an antient and honourable family (55). I mention this, the rather because it clearly shews the care taken by the Earl of Cork, to render the private establishments of his family beneficial to the publick, as they eminently were during the time of the great rebellion in Ireland, as the reader may easily collect from the account that will be hereafter given, of the manner in which his Lordship disposed of all his daughters (56).

(54) Orrery's Letters, p. 9.

(55) Orrery's Letters, p. 5.

(56) See this explained in note [R].

[P] One of the greatest promoters of the English interest, that ever settled in that island.] It is so natural, as well as so common a thing, for men so distinguished by their actions, as to merit a place in history, to be represented therein, under very different characters, that we cannot at all wonder this should happen to the Earl of Cork. He has however this advantage, that he is openly and heartily commended by those who designed that their labours should see the light, and that the reflections on his character are chiefly to be met with in the private letters of men who were his declared enemies, or in histories written since his time upon the credit of such memoirs. In proof of this, we shall observe, that an author well acquainted with Irish history, gives us the following character of, and a curious particular relating to, his Lordship, which is no where else mentioned (57). 'He was a person for his abilities and knowledge in the affairs of the world eminently observable, in as much as (tho' he was no Peer of England) he was admitted to sit in the Lord's house upon the wool-sacks, ut conciliarius, and for all the estate he arrived at, (which was the greatest in the memory of the last age) none ever taxed him with exorbitances, but such as thought Princes had too little, and religious men not enough.' Sir Richard Cox (58), who was both very knowing, and a very impartial writer; and could not but be perfectly well acquainted with the matters of fact which he mentions, speaks of this noble person in the following terms. 'The noble Earl of Cork, Lord High-Treasurer, was one of the most extraordinary persons, either that, or any other age hath produced, with respect to the great and just acquisitions of estate that he made, and the publick works that he began and finished, for the advancement of the English interest, and the Protestant religion in Ireland, as churches, alms-houses, free-schools, bridges, castles, and towns, viz. Lismore, Tallow, Clegbnakilly, Iniskeen, Castletown, and Bandon; (which last place cost him 14,000 pounds) insomuch, that when Cromwell saw these prodigious improvements, which he little expected to find in Ireland, he declared, that if there had been an Earl of Cork in every province, it would have been impossible for the Irish to have raised a rebellion. And whilst he was carrying on the solid works, he lived in his family at a rate of plenty, that exceeded those who consumed great estates in the lavish ways of ill-ordered excess. His motto, God's providence is my inheritance, shews from whence he derived all his blessings, the

(57) Borlase's Hist. p. 209.

(58) In his excellent Introduction to the second Volume of his Hist. of Ireland.

his amazing influence, and that spirit of œconomy and magnificence, which were so happily united in his manner of living, made him admired by the native Irish, to whom he owes the distinction or surname of the great Earl of Cork, by which he is amongst them always mentioned (e). A comparison between his beginning and conclusion is worth the making, not only in honour to his memory, and of the country which produced so extraordinary a man, but even of human nature, in respect to which such productions are rare. Such a comparison has been made with great force of wit and judgment, but being hitherto unpublished, we cannot certainly conclude this article better, than by giving it a place here (f) [Q]. As he enjoyed, while living, what are esteemed the most desirable and substantial blessings in this world, an honourable station for himself, and a very extensive power of doing good to others; so at his demise he left a family numerous and honourable, and may be very truly said, to have been no more distinguished by his good fortune in his life-time, than by the felicity of his descendants, many of whom will be subjects of succeeding articles, and all deserve very well to be remembered (g) [R].

(e) Budgell's Memoirs, p. 25.

(f) Worthies of Queen Elizabeth, MS.

(g) Thoresby's Hist. of Leeds, p. 64.

BOYLE

' the greatest of which was, the numerous and noble posterity he had to leave his estate unto.' The noble Earl himself assures us, as the reader has seen before, that tho' he raised such a fortune, as left him no room to envy any of his neighbours, yet he did it without care or burthen to his conscience (59); and one may reasonably presume, from the whole tenour of his life and conversation, that he was not a man capable of doing base or black actions without burthening his conscience; nor is it at all probable, that if he had known himself guilty of any such actions, he would have committed such a paragraph as that before referred to, amongst the rest of his true remembrances, to the perusal of his posterity; since this could have no other effect than to lessen their respect for his memory, and engage them to doubt the truth of all that he had written. One might add to this, numberless testimonies from his own letters (60), which according to the circumstances of time, visibly shew, that the procuring, promoting, maintaining, extending, or recovering the English interest in Ireland, was the great business of his life, from his first drawing in the air of that island, to the time that he breathed his last in that kingdom.

[Q] We certainly cannot conclude this article better, than by giving it a place here. There is hardly a reign in the English history, more fruitful in great events, or under which flourished greater men, than that of Queen Elizabeth, who was the first author of our Earl's fortune. This circumstance has put several upon recording the famous persons flourishing in her time, and I once saw part of a very large work, bearing the title of Queen Elizabeth's Worthies; it was divided into several books, one of which contained the Statesmen of her reign, and among the rest, Richard Boyle Earl of Cork, tho' he was not so created, 'till after her decease, part of whose character was delivered in these words. ' He was a person of very early as well as very great abilities, and had all the helps requisite to assist the parts which he had received from nature; for part of his breeding he had under a learned clergyman in Kent; part in the university of Cambridge, where he was remarkable for early rising, indefatigable study, and great temperance; the remaining part of his education in the Temple, where he acquired such a knowledge of the Law, as, tho' undervalued by himself, was much esteemed by others, and enabled him to form so true a judgment of such cases as fell under his consideration, that he was very seldom deceived in them. He went over to Ireland with fewer pounds in his pocket, than he acquired thousands a year; he was then about two and twenty, had a graceful person, and all those accomplishments requisite to make a young man succeed in a country which was so much a scene of action. He rendered himself useful to Sir Geoffery Fenton, who was long a Privy-Counsellor, and held several great offices in Ireland, to which it was thought, he chiefly attained by looking narrowly into the conduct of those, who were intrusted with the government, in reference to which, he held a constant correspondence with the Cecils, and it is believed, that Mr Boyle was one of his agents, which exposed him to the resentment of some great men, by whose procurement he was put into the Gate-house, when he first came over to England, ten years after his going to Ireland. But this proved more detrimental to them than to him, for his friends in England, procuring him a hearing before the Queen in Council, he there, in clearing himself, laid open their mismanagement so plainly, and supported all that he advanced with such pregnant proofs, that he was not only discharged, but preferred; and as the account he gave, procured Sir George Carew, descended from one of the first conquerors of Ireland, a great employment; so that worthy knight, whose merit afterwards raised him to a higher title, was ever a constant friend to Mr Boyle. He likewise became known about this time, to the renowned Sir Walter Raleigh, from whom he purchased his ship, called the Pilgrim; in which, well laden with arms and ammunition he returned to Ireland, where himself and his cargo were equally welcome. He thenceforward grew apace in reputation and fortune first, and then in places and titles of honour, which he affected not, until he was well able to maintain them, for he was in the thirty-seventh year of his age when he received the honour of knighthood, and in his fiftieth, when he attained to be a Baron; he made large purchases in Ireland, but not 'till he was able to improve them; and tho' he paid money for his lands, yet the rents that he received from them were the fruits of his own prudence, and he grew rich on estates which had ruined their former possessors, and increased his wealth, not by hoarding, but by spending; for he built and walled several towns at his own cost; but in places so well situated, that they were soon filled with inhabitants, who, tho' their rents were moderate, quickly repaid him the money he had laid out, with interest; and he as readily laid it out again; so that in the space of forty-years he acquired to himself, what in some countries would have been esteemed a noble principality, and as they came to years of discretion, he bestowed estates upon his sons, and married his daughters into the best families in that country; so that his power and credit were continually increasing, and he was generally esteemed, beloved by the English, and respected and obeyed by the natives; the former admired his wisdom, the latter stood amazed at his magnificence: For, as he had the power and property, so he had the soul and spirit of a Prince; and his castle of Lis more looked rather like the palace of a sovereign, than the residence of a private man, whose estate was of his own raising. He out-lived most of those who had known the meanness of his beginning, but he delighted to remember it himself, and even took pains to preserve the memory thereof to posterity, in the motto which he always used, and which he caused to be placed upon his tomb, viz. God's providence is our inheritance. He died in the 78th year of his age, having spent his last, as he did the first years of his life, in the support of the Crown of England against Irish Rebels; and in the service of his country.

[R] And all deserve very well to be remembered. The Earl of Cork by his second lady, had fifteen children, viz. seven sons and eight daughters (61). I. Roger, born August 1, 1606, at Youghall, died at Says-Court at Deptford in Kent, October 10, 1615. II. Alice, born at Youghall, March 20, 1607; married to David Barry, Earl of Barrimore. III. Sarah, born at Dublin, March 29, 1609; married to Sir Thomas Moor, son and heir of the Viscount Drogheda, afterwards to Robert, Lord Digby. IV. Lettice, born April 25, 1610; married to George Goring, son to the Earl of Norwich. V. Joan, born June 14, 1611; married to George, Earl of Kildare, first Earl of Ireland, August 15, 1628. VI. Richard, born at Youghall, October 21, 1612; married to the Lady Elizabeth, (61) Earl of Cork's True Remembrances. Thoresby's Hist. of Leeds, p. 64. Collins's Peerage, Vol. II. p. 366.

(59) See before in note [B].

(60) Many of them preserved in the Collection of the Earl of Strafford's and Lord Orrery's Letters.

Elizabeth, daughter and heiress of Henry Earl of Cumberland. VII. Katharine, born March 22, 1614; married to Arthur Jones, Viscount Renelagh. VIII. Geoffery, born at Youghall, April 10th, 1616; and died the same year. IX. Dorothy, born December 31, 1617; married to Sir Arthur Loftus, son and heir to the Viscount Ely. X. Lewis, born May 23, 1619; created Viscount Kynelmeaky in 1628; married Elizabeth, daughter of William Earl of Denbigh, he was killed in the battle of Lisfearoll, September 3, 1642; but his widow was created Countess of Guildford, in her own right, by King Charles II. XI.

Roger, born April 25, 1621. XII. Francis, born June 25, 1623, created afterwards Lord Viscount Shannon. XIII. Mary, born November 11, 1624; married to Charles, Earl of Warwick, a lady so kind to the poor, that it was said her husband had left his estate to charitable uses; she died April 13, 1678; and it was at her funeral, that Dr Anthony Walker preached the sermon before-mentioned (62). XIV. (62) See the note [F]. Robert, born January 25th 1626. XV. Margaret, born in Channel-Row, Westminster, April 30, 1629, who died unmarried. E

BOYLE (RICHARD) Earl of Burlington and Cork, son to the former, a Nobleman of unblemished loyalty in rebellious, and of untainted integrity in times of the greatest corruption. He was born at the college of Youghall, Octob. 20, 1612 (a), his father being then Sir Richard Boyle, and in the beginning of his prosperity. The sponsors, at the baptism of this noble person of whom we are now speaking, were, the Earl of Thomond, Sir Thomas Aldworth, Mr Thomas Ball of London, merchant, and Lady Anne Parsons. We have no distinct account of the place or manner of his education, but there is not the least question of his having all the care taken of him in this respect due to his quality, since the Earl his father was very strict and serious in that particular (b). It is also very probable, he distinguished himself remarkably in the prosecution of his studies, as the Lord Falkland, when Deputy of Ireland, conferred on him, at his father's house at Youghall, the honour of knighthood, Aug. 13, 1624 (c), when not quite twelve years old. We have no account of the manner in which the next seven years of his life were spent, but as the Earl himself was sometimes in England, and sometimes in Ireland, we may reasonably suppose, the Lord Dungarvan was seldom absent from him. But when he drew towards twenty, the Earl thought proper to finish his education by sending him abroad, which he did under a very discreet and prudent Governor, with an allowance of one thousand pounds a year, June 4, 1632 (d). He passed through Flanders, France, and Italy, and after two years stay and upwards, returned home a graceful and accomplished young Nobleman, which induced the Lord Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford, to promote earnestly a match between him and the Lady Elizabeth, daughter and sole heiress to Henry Lord Clifford, afterwards Earl of Cumberland, which though it met with some difficulties and impediments, yet was at last concluded, and the marriage with great pomp solemnized, in the chapel of Skipton castle in Craven, July 5, 1635 (e), which was a very great addition to the splendour of the family and to its interests [A]. By this marriage he came to be very well known and received at Court, where his conduct gained him the esteem of the Ministers, and the love of all who were about it. He was particularly loyal and dutiful to the King (Charles I.) for he took, according to the letter, the injunctions given him on this head by his parents and preceptors, and having in the fullness of his heart given his Majesty warm assurances of this kind, he made it the business and study of his life to come up to them (f). He raised, in the first troubles of the North, a gallant troop of horse, at the head of which he proposed, under the Earl of Northumberland, to serve against the Scots, in the army raised to chastise their first rebellion (g). He gained much honour by this step, and many friends, even amongst those who were not much affected towards his father. On the breaking out of the bloody and inhuman rebellion in Ireland, he was immediately in arms and in action. He did not only command troops but raised them, and for a long time paid them; yet he treated them always as if they had a nearer relation to him than what was created by service, and often put them in mind, they were not soldiers of fortune, but men in arms for the protection of

(a) Earl of Cork's True Remembrances.

(b) See the Life of the Hon. Robert Boyle, Esq; prefixed to his Works, p. 7.

(c) Earl of Cork's True Remembrances.

(d) Rev. Mr Morris's Memoirs of the Earl of Otrery, p. 1.

(e) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. I. p. 346.

(f) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 32.

(g) Life of the Hon. Rob. Boyle, prefixed to his Works, p. 10.

[A] Great addition to the splendour of the family, and to its interests.] It is not with any intention of speaking here at large, of the antient and noble family of Clifford, that we give this note upon the marriage of the Lord Dungarvan, because this belongs to, and will come in, in its proper place; and all that we have to do here is to point out to the reader, what accrued to the family of Boyle by this marriage. George Clifford, Earl of Cumberland, who distinguished himself in the reign of Queen Elizabeth by several naval expeditions, in which he hazarded both his person and his fortune, deceased October 30, 1605 (1); leaving issue by his Countess Margaret, third daughter of Francis Earl of Bedford, an only daughter, Anne, who first married Robert Earl of Dorset, by whom she had two daughters; and afterwards Philip Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery (2); to this Lady Anne, the Earl her father, by his last will and testament, bequeathed the sum of fifteen thousand pounds as a portion, leaving all his estates to Sir Francis Clifford his brother, on whom the dignity was entailed; but in case of the failure of his heirs male, to his daughter Anne before-mentioned (3). This Francis, Earl of Cumberland, took to wife Griffold, daughter of Thomas Hughs of Uxbridge in the county of Middlesex, Esq; widow of Edward Nevil, Lord Bergavenny (4), by whom he had his son Henry, and two daughters; the eldest of these daughters, Margaret, married Sir Thomas Wentworth, afterwards Viscount Wentworth, and Earl of Strafford; the second, Frances, married Sir Gervase Clifton, by whom she had several children (5). His son Henry, Lord Clifford of Lanelborough, or rather Lonsborough, in the county of York, married Frances, only daughter of Robert Cecil, Earl of Salisbury, and Lord High-Treasurer of England, by whom he had issue an only daughter, the Lady Elizabeth, born at the castle of Skipton in Craven (6), who in the twenty-second year of her age was married to the noble person of whom we are speaking; her grandfather, Francis, Earl of Cumberland, being then living, and a widower; so that she was considered as the presumptive heiress of this branch of the Clifford family, as the Lady Anne was of the elder house (7); which sufficiently distinguishes the descents of these two families, and that is all that we proposed in this note.

(4) See the Pedigree of the Clifford Family, in Dugdale.

(5) Thoresby's Hist. of Leeds, ubi supra.

(6) MS. Memoirs of the Clifford Family, cited by Dugdale, and now in the possession of the Earl of Leicester.

(7) Thoresby's Hist. of Leeds, ubi supra.

(1) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. 1. p. 345.

(2) Thoresby's Hist. of Leeds, p. 63.

(3) Dugdale, ubi supra.

of their country (b). He was in several sieges and rencountres, more especially in the action at Lisfearol, but he never struck in with those, who thought the best way to promote the Protestant Cause, was to carry on the war so as to render the Papists desperate. It was on the contrary principle that he concurred with, and even advised, the Marquis of Ormond, in the affair of the cessation, and that once over, in September 1643 (i), he set himself to procuring the King that assistance, from the hopes of which he had consented to this measure. He was so zealous in this affair, that, at his own request, his regiment was made part of the Irish Brigade sent to his Majesty's relief, and his Lordship, now Earl of Cork, commanded in person (k). He was received at Oxford, by the King, with all possible marks of favour and attention, and every body spoke of his behaviour in the terms that it deserved. In consideration, therefore, of these timely and effectual services, as well as of those rendered by his deceased father-in-law, he was raised to the dignity of Baron Clifford of Laneshorough, by patent (l) [B]. He continued to wait upon the King as long as any one place held out for him in England, and was then forced to compound for his estate with the powers in being, which he did for 1631 pounds (m), but going beyond the seas before he had perfected his composition, advantage was taken of this, and the House of Commons, in January, appointed a Committee to consider of the debt owing by the Earl of Cork, which drew on his Lordship many and great inconveniencies (n). He satisfied this demand, however, and then went over to live as quietly as he could upon his estate in Ireland, though from the hardships of the times, and his own generous temper, he was soon, notwithstanding his large paternal fortune, brought under great difficulties, to which, the people then in authority, in the year 1651, added new burthens, which obliged his Countess (himself disdaining it) to supplicate Cromwell for redress, which she did by an admirable letter, which lets us into the circumstances of his Lordship at that time, and therefore deserves the reader's notice (o) [C]. By this application, and the interest of Lord Broghill, the Earl was freed from

(b) Ancient and Present State of the county of Waterford, p. 58.

(i) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 133.

(k) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, p. 469.

(l) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. i. p. 346.

(m) Lloyd's Memoirs of Loyal Sufferers, p. 678.

(n) Whitlock's Memorials, pag. 237.

(o) Collection of Letters from and to Cromwell, &c. published by Mr Nickoll's, p. 84.

[B] Raised to the dignity of Baron Clifford of Laneshorough, by patent.] In order to shew how well this patent, which was the foundation of the English honours to which this noble family have attained, was merited from the crown, we shall take notice of some remarkable facts that deserve to be remembered. Francis, Earl of Cumberland died in 1641, and was succeeded in that title by Henry, Lord Clifford, his son, father to the Viscountess of Dungarvan (8). This Henry Earl of Cumberland, was a man of a peaceable disposition, of a noble and generous temper, and truly loyal to the King his master, to whom, in the beginning of the troubles, he repaired at York, and signed the famous Declaration dated from thence, June 13, 1642, at which time he was so much beloved in his country, that at the general request of all the loyal part of the county of York, the supreme command in military affairs was committed to this noble Peer (9), and that he was not in any degree biased by the love of authority, and the splendour of such a commission, appears clearly by the character the noble historian gives of him, who says, that he was a man of great honour and integrity, and lived with very much acceptance and affection from the gentlemen and the common people, but was not in any degree of a martial temper. He adds, the great fortune of the family was divided, the larger part carried away by an heir female, and his father had so wasted the remainder, that the Earl could not live with that lustre, or draw so great a dependence upon him, as his ancestors had done; but so much the more that it was repugnant to his nature, and incompatible with the circumstances, the loyalty of the Earl appeared in accepting of this commission, which he kept as long as it was necessary for the King's service, and no longer; but willingly resigned it to the Earl of Newcastle, who was fitter for the employment, and upon whom, for that reason only his Majesty bestowed it (10). This worthy Earl deceased, December 11, 1643, being the fifth Earl of Cumberland of his family, and his Countess died (11) the February following; in the same month the Earl of Cork, heir in right of his wife to the estates of this family, landed at Chester, and marched his forces into Dorsetshire, after which, as is mentioned in the text, he repaired to Oxford, and for his own and his father-in-law's great services was created Baron Clifford of Laneshorough in the county of York (12), November 4, 1644, in the 20th year of the reign of King Charles I. and so became the first Peer of his family in England.

[C] And therefore deserves the reader's notice.] This letter occurs in a collection, lately published, of papers that were formerly in the hands of the famous John Milton, which no doubt afford us, a far better picture of those unhappy times, than hitherto we had received; because private letters, more especially on such particular occasions, shew the true and genuine sentiments of people's minds, and the state of things, without any falshood or disguise; but to come to the piece itself.

The Countess of Cork's letter to the then Lord-General, Oliver Cromwell, (13).

My Lord,

IF this prove an unseasonable time to move you in any private business, I do only hope for your pardon upon what necessitates me thereto, which is my Lord's deprivation of that benefit and favour you were pleased formerly to grant him, (by licensing his return, and enjoyment of his estate in Ireland) by an order of late issued from the Commissioners-General to the Commissioners of the Revenue, for to stop some levies of monies intended by my Lord, in and about Bandon. This order, grounded merely upon an information, (as appears by a copy of it here-with presented to your Excellency) was, by these later Commissioners, stretched beyond what it will literally bear, for they have extended it to the stopping of my Lord's rents in all places, and in such a time, as the lands were just then to be set for the ensuing year; so that 'tis to be doubted, they will for the most part lie waste, if some redress be not had speedily, the tenants standing at gaze, not knowing what to do. To declare the ground of all this business, which I may very properly term a mistake, I do here, with much truth inform your Lordship, that about February last my Lord was infinitely pressed for money by his creditors, that he was reduced to the necessity of trying all ways to raise some for the allaying their fury, or else to give up his person to a languishing imprisonment here; whereupon he sent over among his friends and tenants, desiring a quarter's rent advance, only to give some stop to the persecutions against him by his creditors here, and to come more speedily among them, in hopes to live quietly there, and settle his affairs so as to bring more tenants upon the lands for the common good, and his own private advantage. This was all the mystery which was no way done in secret, for my brother Broghill was therewith acquainted; as for any other matter that may be laid to my Lord's charge, as having been of the King's party, your Lordship will I hope herewith receive satisfaction, if you please to peruse his discharge from Goldsmith's hall, which was upon Oxford articles, and clears him from all delinquency here; neither was the delinquent upon any higher score than for attend-

(13) Papers of State addressed to Oliver Cromwell, &c. published by Mr John Nickolls, p. 84, 85.

(8) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. I. p. 345.

(9) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, fol. edit. p. 76.

(10) Id. ibid. p. 282, 283.

(11) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. I. p. 346.

(12) Collins's Peerage, Vol. II. p. 370.

from these grievances, the weight of which, however, did not hinder him from contributing all he could to the Restoration, and supplying his Majesty, King Charles II, with considerable sums of money, 'till that could be brought about (p). In gratitude for, and to preserve the memory of, these services, his Majesty was graciously pleased, by letters patent bearing date March 20, in the sixteenth year of his reign, A. D. 1663, to raise him to the dignity of Earl of Burlington or Bridlington, in the county of York (q). A melancholy accident that happened not long after in his family, afforded a new opportunity for the King to manifest his affection for this noble Peer, whose second son, Richard, then a volunteer on board the fleet commanded by his Royal Highness the Duke of York, was killed by a cannon shot, June 3, 1665, in the battle off Solebay (r); upon the thirteenth of March 1666, constituted him Lord-Lieutenant of the West Riding of Yorkshire, of the city of York, and county of the same. This he enjoyed during all that reign, and from the year 1679, with the addition of being also Custos Rotulorum (s). Under King James II, he held the same employments as long as he thought proper to hold them, but when he found that unfortunate Prince expected him to make such uses of those offices as manifestly tended to overthrow the Constitution, he very magnanimously resigned them, upon which the lieutenancy was given to Lord Thomas Howard, a very zealous and busy Papist (t). His Lordship, upon the coming over of the Prince of Orange, went heartily into the measures he thought conducive to settling the Government and redressing grievances, but neither sought or accepted employment. However, July 16, 1689, in the first year of their reign, their Majesties King William and Queen Mary, called his only son, Charles Lord Clifford of Lanesborough, by writ, up to the House of Peers (u), an honour which he did not live long to enjoy, dying October 12, 1694 (w). This noble Peer, whose parts qualified him for the most active, naturally inclined to peaceful and less pompous offices, in which he gained the respect and esteem of the gentry his neighbours, as his affability and beneficence charmed the common sort, so that his influence was general, as appeared from the universal concern expressed by all ranks of people in Yorkshire on his decease, January 15, 1697-8, in the eighty-sixth (x) year of his age, which exceeded any of the like nature that could be remembered [D]. He was succeeded in his honours, by his grandson Charles Lord Clifford, who was a very great favourite with King William, and much esteemed by Queen Anne, being generally looked upon as one of the most accomplished Noblemen in the British dominions (y). He died Feb. 9, 1703-4, and was succeeded by the present head of this illustrious family, Richard Earl of Burlington and Cork, and left besides a numerous posterity (z), of which, as well as of the descendants of his father and grandfather, we shall give a very succinct account in the notes, that this, and the subsequent articles, may prove the more intelligible [E]. The reader will easily discern the utility of this precaution, in regard to a house that has produced more great, more distinguished, and more remarkable persons, in

(p) See the Preamble to his patent.

(q) Collins's Peerage, Vol. II. p. 367.

(r) Echard's Hist. of England, pag. 820.

(s) Remarkables in the Reign of Charles II. pag. 195.

(t) Sir John Reiney's Memoirs, p. 256.

(u) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. II. p. 368.

(w) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 33.

(x) Thoresby's Hist. of Leeds, p. 64.

(y) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 33.

(z) Hist. of Europe for the year 1704, p. 577.

'ing the King's person, for he never had any command in England nor in Ireland, but by joint consent of both King and Parliament, against the Irish rebels; and since his submitting to the first cessation, is all that can be laid to his charge there (which is since wiped off, by the articles of Dublin); and for the making good of those articles, the publick faith of the Parliament is engaged, by whose authority they were made and concluded. I hope upon your Lordship's reflection upon the whole matter, you will be pleased to interpose on my Lord's behalf with the Commissioners of Parliament in Ireland, that my Lord may receive the benefit of Dublin articles, and that you will vouchsafe us your Lordship's letters to my Lord-Deputy and the Commissioners to that effect; all which I hope will be agreeable to your judgment and justice, it being only to relieve one (by the Parliament's own rules) who has suffered as much abroad by the Irish, and as much at home under my Lord Inchiquin's power, as any Englishman, until freed by those articles, which having never since forfeited, I can't doubt of your Excellency's willingness to relieve us, but do of your leisure, which that I may not for the future disturb, in case delays should be still made of freeing my Lord's rents, I should humbly beg a letter of recommendation from your Lordship to Mr Scott, or some other friend of your Lordship's here, to whom I may address, with hopes to be heard, which I have not hitherto been successful in, that report your Lordship was pleased to recommend to the House, the day you left the town, having been never yet made, which I should not here mention to the addition of your trouble, were it not that all remote reckonings are charged upon, and daily levied upon my poor estate here, threatening it's utter ruin, and that of myself and six children. Thus your Lordship may from our sufferings in all places, discern it is not affection but utmost extremity that sends forth these ' complaints and requests, with no less unwillingness than necessity, presented to your Excellency by your most humble servant,

E. CORK.

[D] Exceeded any of the like nature that could be remembered.] It is very remarkable that this noble person was singularly happy in his private life, and in the circumstances of his family, for as he married a lady of great birth, and who brought him a large fortune, so she was, in every other respect, most agreeable (14); they were nearly of the same age, very like in their tempers, and, which is a thing unusual amongst persons of their rank, lived happily together fifty-five years, and had the satisfaction of seeing a numerous posterity (15.) By this lady the Earl had two sons mentioned in the text, and three daughters that lived to be married, viz. Lady Elizabeth to the Earl of Thanet; Lady Anne, to the Earl of Sandwich; Lady Henrietta, to the Earl of Rochester; by which two last daughters, the Earl of Cork saw many grand-children. His son and grandson became both Peers of England in his lifetime (16), and were no less happy in their families, which circumstances the reader may be pleased to consider, with the following prayer of his father the great Earl of Cork, on his behalf, when he was not as yet married. After having marked the time of his birth, and the names of his god-fathers and god-mothers, he proceeds thus (17). God grant he may serve and fear him religiously, and be a faithful subject and servant to the King's majesty and his heirs, and live many years full of good works and of virtuous children, and be a worthy pillar and patriot in this kingdom.

[E] The subsequent articles may prove the more intelligible.] We will begin here with Charles Lord Clifford, son to the first Earl of Burlington and Cork, who married first, Lady Jane, youngest daughter and co-heiress of William Duke of Somerset; by whom

(14) From the information of the Honourable Mr A. C. who knew both the Earl and his Countess.

(15) Collins's Peerage, Vol. II. p. 368.

(16) History of Europe, 1704, p. 577.

(17) Earl of Cork's True Remembrances.

in a variety of characters, than almost any these nations have to boast, and which, as it was originally well established by it's founder, has continued flourishing and increasing ever since.

8) Thoresby's R. of Leeds, 64. he had issue (18) Charles, who succeeded him, Henry who became Chancellor of the Exchequer in 1701, Secretary of state in 1710, and was afterwards created a Peer of this realm, by the title of Lord Carlton (19); Lady Elizabeth, who married James Earl of Barrimore; Lady Mary, married to James Duke of Queensbury and Dover; and Lady Arabella, to Henry Earl of Shelburne. By his second Countess, Arethusa, daughter to George Earl of Berkeley, he had only a daughter called after her mother, who married Mr Vernon, son to Mr Secretary Vernon (20). His eldest son Charles succeeded him in the Barony of Clifford, and sat in the house of Peers by that title, till, by the decease of his grandfather, he became Earl of Burlington and Cork (21). He married Juliana, daughter and sole heiress to Henry Noel, second son to Edward, Viscount Campden, by whom he had issue, Richard, the present Earl of Burlington; Lady Elizabeth, married to Sir Henry Bedingfield; Lady Juliana, to the Lord Bruce, afterwards Earl of Aylebury; Lady Jane, unmarried; Lady Henrietta, married to Henry Boyle, Esq; grandson to Roger, Earl of Orrery (22). Richard, the present Earl of Burlington and Cork, married March the 21st, 1721, the Lady Dorothy Saville, eldest daughter and coheirs to the late Marquis of

Halifax, by whom he had three daughters, but of these only Lady Charlotte is living, and unmarried (23). I might lay hold of this opportunity of telling the reader, that his Lordship inherits the virtues and abilities, as well as the estates and titles, of his family; that his merit has acquired him the most honourable reward of it in this kingdom, a blue ribbon; that he has had interest enough to obtain, and virtue enough to resign, great employments; that he has been a courtier above suspicion, a patriot without pique, or private views; a friend to his country in all circumstances of a publick nature; as well as an honour to it in his personal accomplishments, and correct taste in the polite arts, more especially architecture, in which it is not easy to say, whether his modesty or knowledge deserve applause most. But these are in a great measure beside our purpose, which is to do justice to the dead, not to court the favour of the living; nor should I think what has been already said pardonable, but that it is no inconsiderable addition to the glory of a house, which has given Peers to all the three kingdoms, to have the present Earl of Burlington and Cork for it's head, in which light I hope this liberty (taken from no other motive) will be considered and excused. E

(23) Collins's Peerage, Vol. II, p. 369.

9) Peerage of Ireland, Vol. 7, p. 191.

10) Thoresby, above.

11) Le Neve's Monument, Ang. ol. IV. p. 70.

12) Peerage of Ireland, Vol. 7, p. 193.

BOYLE (ROGER) Earl of Orrery, younger brother of Richard Earl of Burlington and Cork, and fifth son of Richard, stiled the great Earl of Cork (a); independent of descent and titles, one of the most learned, able, and valiant persons of the age in which he lived, and thereby a great instrument of good to his country and nation. He was born April 25, 1621 (b), and by the credit of his father with the Lord-Deputy Falkland, he was, as we have already shewn, raised to the state and dignity of Baron Broghill in the kingdom of Ireland, in 1628, when only seven years old (c). His education was at the college of Dublin, where he applied himself with such diligence to his books, and so happily digested what he gathered from them, that he was very soon distinguished as an early and promising genius, which induced his father to send him, about 1636, to make the tour of France and Italy, under the care of one Mr Marcombes, and in the company of Lord Kynalmeaky his elder brother (d) [A]. After his return from his travel, he found all things in England in very great confusion, and a war on the point of breaking out with Scotland, in which he was invited to serve with peculiar distinction, the Earl of Northumberland (e), who was appointed General and Commander in Chief of this expedition, putting him at the head of his own troop. But this flame being stilled for the present, his thoughts were turned another way, and as the old Earl of Cork loved to settle his children very early in the world, a marriage was proposed for Lord Broghill

(a) Thoresby's Hist. of Leeds, p. 64.

(b) Earl of Cork's True Remembrances.

(c) See the article of BOYLE (RICHARD) Earl of Cork, note [C].

(d) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. i.

(e) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 134.

[A] The care of one Mr Marcombes, and in the company of Lord Kynalmeaky, his elder brother. We have seen in our former article, that this was the method the Earl took to perfect his sons, when they had ran through the ordinary compass of a domestick education (1). It is very remarkable, that all his sons travelled under the care of this Mr Marcombes, who likewise attended the eldest son of the Earl of Orrery, of whom we are now speaking; so that he had the forming in this noble line for more than one generation. It was very excusable in a country clergyman, like Mr Morrice, to write this gentleman's name as it was pronounced (2); but one cannot so easily pardon Mr Budgell, who had so many opportunities of knowing better; the calling this governor of Lord Broghill, Mr Markham (3), and thereby if the Memoirs of this House had not fallen into more careful hands, burying in oblivion the very name of a person to whom this noble family owed many, and those singular, obligations, as the reader will see hereafter; but for the present we shall give him his character as drawn by the pen of the honourable Mr Robert Boyle, who was also under his care (4). He was a man who in his garb, his mien, and out-side, had very much of his nation, having been divers years a traveller, and a soldier; he was well fashioned, and very well knew what belonged to a gentleman; his natural, were much better than his acquired parts, tho' divers of the latter he possessed, though not in an eminent yet in a very competent degree; scholarship he wanted not, having in his greener years been a professed student in Divinity; but he was much less read in books, than men, and hated pedantry as much as any of the seven deadly sins; thrifty he was extremely, and very skilful in the slight of thrift, but less out of avarice than a just ambition, and not so much out of love to money, as a desire to live handsomely at last. His practical sentiments in Divinity were most of them very sound, and if he were given to any vice himself, he was careful, by sharply condemning it, to render it un Infectious, being industrious, whatsoever he were himself, to make his charges virtuous; before company he was very civil to his pupils, apt to eclipse their failings, and set off their good qualities to the best advantage; but in his private conversation he was cynically disposed, and a very nice critic both of words and men, which humour he used to exercise so freely with Philaretus, that at last he forced him to a very cautious and considerable way of expressing himself, which after turned to his no small advantage. The worst quality he had was his choler, to excess of which, he was excessively prone. Under the direction of this gentleman, the two Lords, Kynalmeaky and Broghill, went to Paris, where they saw Lewis the XIV, a child in his nurse's arms; they travelled from thence to Geneva, where they spent a whole year in the house of the famous Mr Deodati, which was of great advantage to him. They went from thence to Marseilles, where both the young Lords embarked for Genoa, and soon after their arrival in that city, were seized with the small-pox, but of a very kindly sort, from which they speedily and happily recovered; they went afterwards to visit some other cities in Italy, and then making the tour of Switzerland, returned through France into England (5).

13) See the article of BOYLE (RICHARD) Earl of Burlington.

14) Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. i.

15) Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 35.

16) Memoirs of his own Life under the name of Philaretus, by the on. Rob. Boyle.

(5) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. i.

[B] To

Broghill with the Lady Margaret Howard, daughter to the Earl of Suffolk, which was quickly concluded, and his Lordship, with his new married Lady, went over together to Ireland (f), where they landed the very day the rebellion broke out in that kingdom, viz. October 23, 1641. An account has been already given, of the manner in which the news came to his Lordship's family, and of their being immediately obliged to take up arms for their own and the publick security. The post assigned Lord Broghill, was the defence of his father's castle of Lismore, in which he behaved with all the spirit of a young, and all the discretion of an old, officer. An instance of the former, he gave in a bold falley he made for the succour of Sir Richard Osborn, who was besieged in his own house by the rebels, 'till relieved by Lord Broghill, who raised the siege, and saved him and all his family (g); and as strong a proof of the latter, in advising Sir William St Leger, then President of Munster, to act vigorously against the Irish, notwithstanding they produced the King's commission, which, though he was but twenty years of age, he had sagacity enough to discern must be a forgery, as it afterwards proved (h) [B]. After that cessation in Ireland, of which an account is given in the former article, Lord Broghill determined to go over to England, and pay his duty to King Charles I. at Oxford, which he accordingly did, and in several audiences which he had of that Monarch, he represented to him so fully the true character of the Irish Papists, and the falsehood of all the pretences of the Committee they had sent over to deceive and mislead his Majesty, that the King was entirely convinced the Irish never meant to keep the cessation, and therefore it was against the true interest of the loyal subjects of that island, to depend upon it (i). As a proof of this, he carried, on his return thither, a commission to Lord Inchiquin, then President of Munster, to prosecute the rebels on that side, and upon receiving this commission, he published a kind of Manifesto, containing his reasons against the cessation, and requiring the faithful subjects of Ireland, to give their assistance to suppress the rebels in that province (k). Lord Broghill, however, had much too great an interest in that country, to content himself with barely exciting the President of Munster to what he judged his duty, he contributed also, as far as lay in his power, to the discharge of it himself, and when, by the King's command, the Marquis of Ormond surrendered Dublin, and whatever was in his power, to the Commissioners named by Parliament, both Lords, Inchiquin and Broghill, obeyed them, as the only means of promoting the Protestant interest. It was not long, however, before the former thought proper to alter his conduct, and quit the service of the Parliament; but this did not influence Lord Broghill, who

(f) Orrery's Letters, p. 2, 3.

(g) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. vi.

(h) See this fully explained in the note [L].

(i) Memoirs of the Wars in Ireland, p. 395.

(k) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. iii.

[B] To discern must be a forgery, as it afterwards proved.] As this was one of the first actions of a publick nature, in which Lord Broghill distinguished himself; so perhaps in the course of his whole life there was none that did him greater credit, and therefore it is necessary that we should enter into all the particulars of it. When the Lord Muskerry entered Munster, at the head of a great body of Irish rebels, the Lord President, St Leger, with a small body of English forces, marched to meet him, and would have given him battle; but he sent a trumpet with one Mr Walsh, who demanded to speak with the Lord President, to whom he was well known; when he gave him audience, his Lordship could not help expressing his surprize, that he being a lawyer, should engage himself among the rebels; to which Walsh answered, that they were no rebels, for that they had taken up arms for the King's service, and Lord Muskerry had his Majesty's commission, which he offered to produce to him, if he might have leave to wait upon him again. The Lord President communicated this to the Earl of Barrimore, Lord Broghill, and his brother; the other two Lords were much astonished, but Lord Broghill without hesitation, said it was a cheat, that his Majesty could have granted no such commission, and advised the Lord President to be very cautious how he believed it; but, however, it was agreed, that he should promise the man a safe conduct, and that their forces should retire; Lord Muskerry also upon the return of Walsh drew off his men, and the next morning Walsh appeared again in the Lord President's quarters with a trumpet, who was immediately conducted to the Lord President's house, where being received, Walsh renewed the same request, that he might speak with the Lord President alone, and in private; which the other Lords opposed, but at last it was agreed, that one man should stand at the door with a drawn sword, and charged pistols; this being done, Walsh produced a large parchment, wherein was a very formal commission, drawn up for the Lord Muskerry, to raise four thousand men, and the broad seal affixed to it; St Leger having read it over, dismissed Walsh, and returned to the Lords, declaring to them that Muskerry had really a commission for what he did; and that he would dismiss his men, and stir no more in this business, saying he would die before he would be a rebel; whereupon the Lords all withdrew to their several homes, only Lord Broghill declared he could not but think it a cheat. But it seems the Lord President took this matter so much to heart, that he never held up his head afterwards, but within a short time died, and Lord Inchiquin was by the King appointed President in his room (6). Many years after this, when his Lordship was become Earl of Orrery, and went to pay a visit to the Duke of Ormond, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, at Kilkenny, he there met with my Lord Muskerry, and the very sight of him putting the old affair in his head, he took an opportunity one day, when alone with Muskerry, who happened then to be in a pleasant open humour, to ask him how the rebels obtained the commission, which they had thus shewed to the then Lord President, St Leger, under the King's great seal? Lord Muskerry answered, I will be free and unreserved with you; it was a forged commission, drawn up by Walsh and others, who having a writing, to which the great seal was fixed, one of the company very dexterously took off the sealed wax from the label of that writing, and fixed it to the label of the forged commission; whilst this was doing, an odd accident happened, which startled all present, and almost disconcerted the scheme. The forged commission being finished, while the parchment was handling and turning, in order to put on the seal, a tame wolf which lay asleep by the fire, awakened at the crackling of the parchment, and running to it, seized it, and tore it to pieces; notwithstanding all haste and struggle to prevent him, so that after all their pains they were obliged to begin a-new, and write it all over again. Lord Orrery, struck with the wickedness of this action, could not refrain expressing himself, to that purpose to Lord Muskerry; who, laughing, replied, It would have been impossible to have held the people together without this device (7). Such was the secret history of this fatal, this infamous, this execrable contrivance, which gained credit, purely from a supposition, that there could not be impudence and villany enough in men, to bring them to commit so foul and base an action, especially in persons well born, and who pretended to religion.

(6) Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, p. 7, 8.

(7) Ibid. p. 36.

who continued to act 'till the murder of the King (l) induced him to leave his country and estate, as ruined past all hopes, and hide himself in the privacy of a close retirement. How he came to alter his conduct, and strike in with a party which he had always abhorred, and this too both suddenly and warmly, is accounted for, as well as it can be, in the notes [C]. As soon as his Lordship had settled the business of his command in Ireland with Cromwell, he went immediately over into that country, without any force but his commission (m). This circumstance shewed the great extent of his personal interest, and the height to which he had already raised his reputation. In a very short time after his arrival, his friends came in, together with gentlemen that had served under him, so that he had presently a gallant troop of horse for the guard of his person, and in a very inconsiderable space, raised a regiment of fifteen hundred men, with which he hovered about Waterford, 'till Cromwell, according to his promise, came thither also, and then, conformable to his engagement, Lord Broghill joined him (n). But notwithstanding this apparent alteration in his Lordship's conduct, he still retained so great a regard for his old friends, that one of the first exploits at the head of his new army, was relieving Carrick, where the noble Marchioness of Ormond was besieged by the rebels (o). Cromwell pushing on the war with his usual impetuosity, found himself obliged to rely upon this Lord for keeping all safe at least, if not quiet, behind him, which with great military prudence he very happily performed, and grew thereby into esteem with that General (p). But this, though considerable enough in itself, was, however, very far inferior to what he did at Maccroom, where with two thousand horse and dragoons, without

(l) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II, p. 31.

(m) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. iv.

(n) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 49.

(o) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. vi.

(p) See the article of CROMWELL, (CLIVER) Lord Protector.

[C] Is accounted for as well as it can be, in the notes] Upon Lord Broghill's coming from Ireland, he withdrew to Marston in Somersetshire, an estate which his father had purchased from Sir John Hippesly, where he lived very close for some time (8); but the sight of the sad situation of the country he was in, and the remembrance of the misery of that which he had left, would not allow his thoughts any quiet. He was ashamed to sit the tame spectator of so much mischief, without moving a finger to remedy those disorders, which overspread his private property at the same time that they overwhelmed the publick (9). These reflexions, after rolling some time in his breast, at length produced something like scheme of action, worthy a man of his parentage, parts, and principles. Warm with this new plan, he hastened to put it into execution; he had resolved to attempt something in favour of the King, and, accordingly, under pretence of going to the Spaw for his health, he determined to cross the seas, and apply himself to King Charles II, for a commission to raise what forces he could in Ireland, in order to restore his Majesty, and recover his own estate. Having formed this resolution, he desired the Earl of Warwick, who had an interest in the prevailing party, to procure a licence for him to go to the Spaw. He pretended to the Earl that he intended nothing more by his journey, than the recovery of his health; but let some of his friends of the royal party, in whom he thought he could confide, into the bottom of his design; and having raised a considerable sum of money, came up to London to prosecute his voyage. The Committee of State, who spared no money to get proper intelligence, being soon informed of his whole design, determined to proceed against him with the utmost severity. Cromwell was at that time General of the Parliament's forces, and a member of the Committee: It is allowed by his enemies, that he knew every person of great abilities in the three kingdoms. He was consequently no stranger to Lord Broghill's merit; and reflecting that this young Nobleman might be of great use to him in reducing Ireland, he earnestly intreated the Committee that he might have leave to talk with him, and endeavour to gain him before they proceeded to extremities. Having with great difficulty, obtained this permission, he immediately dispatched a gentleman to the Lord Broghill, to let him know that he intended to wait upon him. The Lord Broghill was surprized at this message, having never had the least acquaintance with Cromwell, and desired the gentleman to let the General know that he would wait upon his Excellency. But while he was expecting the return of the messenger, Cromwell entered the room; who, when mutual civilities had passed between them, told him in few words, that the Committee of State were apprized of his design of going over, and applying to Charles Stuart for a commission to raise forces in Ireland; and that they were determined to make an example of him, if he himself had not diverted them from that resolution. The Lord Broghill interrupted him, and assured him that the intelligence which the Committee had received was false; that he was neither in a capacity, nor had any inclination to raise disturbances in Ireland; and concluded with intreating his Excellency to have a kinder opinion of him: Cromwell, instead of making any reply, drew some papers out of his pocket, which were the copies of several letters which the Lord Broghill had sent to those persons in whom he most confided, and put them into his hands. The Lord Broghill, upon the perusal of these papers, finding that it was to no purpose to dissemble any longer, asked his Excellency's pardon for what he had said, returned him his humble thanks for his protection against the Committee, and intreated his directions, how he ought to behave in so delicate a conjuncture. Cromwell told him, that though 'till this time he had been a stranger to his person, he was not so to his merit and character; but that he had heard how gallantly his Lordship had already behaved in the Irish wars: And therefore, since he was named Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, and the reducing that kingdom was now become his province, he had obtained leave of the Committee, to offer his Lordship the command of a general officer, if he would serve in that war. That he should have no oaths or engagements imposed upon him, nor be obliged to draw his sword against any but the Irish rebels; the Lord Broghill was infinitely surprized at so generous and unexpected an offer; he saw himself at liberty, by all the rules of honour, to serve against the Irish, whose rebellion and barbarities were equally detested by the royal party, and the parliament: He desired, however, the General to give him some time to consider of what had been proposed to him. Cromwell briskly told him that he must come to some resolution that very instant; that he himself was returning to the Committee who were still sitting; and if his Lordship rejected their offer, they had determined to send him to the Tower. The Lord Broghill finding that his liberty and life were in the utmost danger, and charmed with the frankness and generosity of Cromwell's behaviour, gave him his word and honour, that he would faithfully serve him against the Irish rebels; upon which, Cromwell once more assured him, that the conditions which he had made with him, should be punctually observed; and then ordered him to repair immediately to Bristol, to which place forces should be sent him, with a sufficient number of ships to transport him into Ireland. He added, that he himself would soon follow him, and was as good as his word in every particular. This story we have from Mr Morrice, who had it from the Earl of Orrery himself; and he adds, that it was very probable his Lordship's design was betrayed, out of pure love and affection, by his sister Ranelagh; but how this love and affection enabled her to foresee that Cromwell would interpose as he did, to take off the rope, which she thus (as he supposes) put about his neck, is what our reverend author does not explain.

(8) Memoirs of the interregnum after the King's Death, p. 133.

(9) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 41—48.

without waiting for his foot coming up, he attacked a body of Irish, consisting of upwards of five thousand, whom he totally defeated, and took their General, the titular Bishop of Ross, prisoner (q). This battle was fought May 10, 1650. Lord Broghill offered the Bishop his life, if he would order those who were in the castle of Carigdroghid to surrender, which he promised; but when he was conducted to the place, he persuaded the garrison to defend it to the last extremity. Upon this Lord Broghill caused him to be hanged (r), (though Mr Morrice says the soldiers hanged him without (s) orders) and then commanded his heavy artillery to be brought up, which astonished his own army exceedingly, they knowing he had not so much as a single piece of battering cannon. He caused, however, several large trees to be cut, and drawn at a distance by his baggage horses; the besieged judging, by the slowness of their motion, they were of a vast size, capitulated before they came up, as his Lordship advised, threatening otherwise to give them no quarter (t). He relieved Cromwell at Clonmell, when, according to his confession, nothing could otherwise have saved him, he assisted both him and Ireton in all their expeditions; but because he fought to moderate the fury of one, and mitigate the cruelty of the other, he incurred the suspicion of both; nay, Ireton went so far as to say, They could never be safe as long as Broghill lived. (u). His Lordship knew this, and did not want opportunities of paying them in their own coin, but he despised them; for his maxim was, to do what was right on all occasions, and trust GOD with the event. He went, therefore, to the assistance of Ireton, at the siege of Limerick, which was the best defended place in Ireland, though he knew of his aversion for, and ill-will towards, him, and it was chiefly by his means that design succeeded (w). For Ireton finding his force insufficient to take it by storm, and fearing that the Irish in the field would become strong enough to give him battle, and relieve it before it could be reduced to a necessity of capitulating for want, he gave Lord Broghill detachments from four regiments of horse, and twenty-six companies of foot, with orders to act in such a manner, as to hinder the several bodies of Irish, still in arms, from joining (x). In pursuance of this order, he marched with great expedition to attack his old antagonist Muskerry, who, with three times his force, was moving towards the army lately raised by the Pope's Nuncio. The diligence his Lordship used was such, that he came up with the enemy unexpectedly, drove in, amidst a storm of thunder and lightening, their advanced guards on their main body, which soon after he attacked. The Irish had all advantages, ground, numbers, and old officers from Spain, and had certainly been too hard for the English, but for a quick stratagem of Lord Broghill, who, in the heat of action, said to those about him, Repeat what I say, then raising his voice cried out, They run, they run; which was soon echoed on all sides (y). The first line of the Irish looked behind to see if their rear broke, those in the rear, hearing the noise of their enemies, and seeing the faces of their friends, concluded it was so, and broke immediately; after which they were absolutely defeated. This dispersed the Irish, made way for the taking of Limerick, and put an end to the war there (z). After Cromwell became Protector, he sent for Lord Broghill merely to have his advice; and we are told, that not long after his coming to England on that account, he made an attempt to engage the Protector to restore the old constitution, and secure himself, his family, and his friends, by marrying one of his daughters to the King (a). This extraordinary story, as it rests on the credit, so it shall be given to the reader in its author's own words [D]. He failed in that and some other schemes of the same nature,

but

[D] This extraordinary story, as it rests on the credit, shall be given to the reader in the author's own words. It may be urged to countenance this strange story, that we have some dark hints of it from other persons, that Lord Broghill was certainly the greatest favourite Cromwell ever had, and in all seasons a friend to his family; and that Mr Morrice, in his way of telling his tale, evidently shews, that he had not a capacity for inventing it. Thus it runs (10): His lordship had now and then opportunities of a secret correspondence with some persons about the King, by whom he had founded the King's inclinations, which were favourable to a design of making a match between his Majesty and one of Cromwell's daughters (the lady Frances, as I remember) to promote which, he had orders to do whatever lay in his power; and having his Majesty's leave, he took a fit occasion to move it to Cromwell, which he did in the following manner: He first acquainted Cromwell's wife and daughter with the design, and then caused a rumour of it to be spread abroad in the town; and one day, coming out of the city, and coming to Cromwell's closet, Cromwell immediately came to him, and walking with him alone, he asked where he had been? My Lord answered, in the city; Cromwell asked him what news there? My Lord answered, very strange news; Cromwell earnestly enquiring what it was, my Lord detained him a while, only by repeating it was strange news, and smiling at the same time; Cromwell, by the delay, became more earnest to know it; my Lord, at last, replied, that perhaps he would be offended to hear it. Cromwell, not enduring any longer delay, assured him he would not, and therefore conjured him to tell it; upon that, in a jocular way, my Lord told him, all the news in the city was, that he was going to marry his daughter Frances to the King; Cromwell then, with a merry countenance, asked him, And what do the fools think of it? My Lord then replied, all liked it, and thought it the wisest thing he could do, if he could accomplish it; upon that, Cromwell made a stand, and looking steadfastly in my Lord's face, asked him, And do you believe so too? His Lordship seeing him a little moved, he did believe it was the best thing he could do to secure himself. Cromwell then walked up and down the room, with his hands behind him, in a very thoughtful manner, and at last asked my Lord, What reason he had to be of that belief? His Lordship represented to him how little he could confide in his own party, being, upon every occasion subject to murmur and repine, how unlikely it was for him to continue long in that grandeur; the very same persons who set him up, being willing to pull him down; and, on the other hand, the King, in his great exigencies, would be ready enough to hearken to any proposition, rather than live in exile, so that he might make his own terms with him, and be General of all the forces during life; the loyal party would readily join with him in the work; and if his daughter had children by the King, (which was likely enough) he would thereby be endeared to King and

Country,

(q) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. Part ii. pag. 16. Hist. of the execrable Irish Rebellion, p. 240.

(r) Borlase's Hist.

(s) Memoirs of Roger Earl of Orrery, chap. iv.

(t) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. Part ii. p. 16.

(u) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. iv.

(w) Hist. of the War in Ireland, p. 359.

(x) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. Part ii. p. 67.

(y) Hist. of the War in Ireland, p. 359.

(z) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. Part ii. p. 67. Hist. of the execrable Irish Rebellion, p. 283. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 154.

(a) Oldmixon's Hist. of the Stuarts, Vol. I. p. 413.

(10) Morrice's Memoirs of Roger Earl of Orrery, chap. iv.

but he managed so dexterously, and shewed so true a desire of serving both parties, without betraying either, that after Ireton's death, which happened before he left Ireland, he was scarce ever suspected by Cromwell, who made him his companion, and thereby fixed him for his friend (b). In the year 1656, it was proposed to his Lordship by the Protector, to go down to Scotland with an absolute authority, either because he suspected Monk, or was willing to give the people of that country some satisfaction, who complained of his severity; but Lord Broghill was very unwilling to receive this charge, and took it at last on these singular conditions (c). The first was, that he should be left to himself and receive no orders; the second, that no complaints should find credit or procure directions in his absence; and the third, that he should be re-called in a year (d). These terms were agreed to and performed on both sides; Broghill acted absolutely enough; complaints came thicker against him than against Monk; but at the end of the year he came himself, disproved them, and gave Cromwell such satisfaction, as made him look on him as his best friend, and the ablest man in his service (e). He was very acceptable to the Scots, and gained a great influence over them, by speaking and acting moderately; but more especially by his disinterestedness, and by proceeding according to the dictates of his own reason, and not at all from lights received, or friendships contracted, in that country (f). After he came back, he was, with Whitlock and Thurloe, admitted into all the confidence, that could be expected from a person in the Protector's circumstances, who, if he had any cheerful moments, spent them in their company, where he appeared quite another person than in the ordinary course of his conduct, which was built on a policy peculiar to his condition, the people he had to deal with, and the critical conjuncture of the times (g). There were, no doubt, many in Cromwell's Court that envied and hated Lord Broghill, and did not fail to do him ill offices, but they had no effect; for the custom Cromwell had of taking nothing upon trust, and his experience of Lord Broghill's fidelity in times of the greatest danger, hindered him from giving way to suspicions; as, on the other hand, the circumstances of those times affording frequent opportunities, Lord Broghill lost none of them, but with zeal and prudence took every advantage, and rendered important services to his patron, the Protector (b) [E]. He stood high in his favour to the last, and it was, no doubt, in some measure

(b) See the article CROMWELL. (OLIVER) Lord Protector.

(c) Thurloe's State-Papers, Vol. V. p. 336.

(d) Morrice's Memoirs of Roger Earl of Orery, chap. iv.

(e) Memoirs of Oliver Cromwell, p. 395.

(f) Memoirs of the Earl of Castis, p. 33.

(g) Whitlock's Memoirs, p. 656.

(b) Oldmixon's Hist. of the Stuarts, p. 414.

Country, and would have such interest in the crown, that no body could ever attempt any thing against him, having a King his son-in-law, and heir apparent to the crown his grand-son, and the whole power of the nation, in his own hands; by all which, his greatness would be for ever established: Whereas, if he neglected these means, he could not expect to transmit his greatness to the next heir; and perhaps, would hardly be able to preserve it, during his own life. Cromwell gave great attention to those reasons; but, walking two or three turns, and pondering with himself, he told Lord Broghill the King would never forgive me the death of his father; his Lordship desires him to employ some body to sound the King in this matter, to see how he would take it, and offered himself to mediate in it for him; but Cromwell would not consent, but again repeated, The King cannot, and will not, forgive the death of his father, and so left his Lordship, who durst not tell him he had already dealt with his Majesty in that affair; upon this my Lord withdrew, and meeting Cromwell's wife and daughter, they enquired how he had succeeded, of which, having given them an account, he added, they must try their interest in him; but none could prevail, guilt lay so heavy upon him, that he thought there could be no reconciliation, and so that business broke off.

[E] Rendered important services to his patron the Protector.] His Lordship always thought he owed his life to Cromwell; and this induced him to be very faithful to him, and very careful of his interest: It very clearly appears in every step he took, both in England and in Ireland; but though Mr Budgell (11) is pleased to compliment the Protector with an understanding superior to that of Lord Broghill, yet I very much doubt whether he received any such gift from nature; and I rather think the contrary, because I find that he allowed his Lordship to take great liberties with him; commonly took his advice, and readily came in to his opinion, though opposite to his own. These, tho' they are certainly testimonies of Cromwell's being a man of parts, and good sense, yet are they proofs at the same time, that Lord Broghill had greater parts, and better sense; nor could it well be otherwise, considering the difference in their education; and the opportunities his Lordship had of knowing much more of the world. His advising the Protector to take the title of King (12), was certainly a proof that he wished him well, though Mr Morrice thinks otherwise; and perhaps his Lordship, after the Restoration, might not be displeas'd to have it so thought, whatever his sentiments might be, at the time of giving this advice. He always recommended legal measures to the Protector, and persuaded him to behave mildly to all sorts of people. The Protector himself was so sensible of this, that when he had intelligence of the Marquis of Ormond's being in London, he spoke of it to Lord Broghill, and gave him leave to make what use of it he pleas'd (13). It is true, that not long after he was angry with his Lordship about Lady Ormond, whose papers he had seiz'd, and among them, some tender letters to her Lord, in which were dark hints of designs against his government. Lord Broghill knew his humour, and desired to see those papers, which being complied with, he proved to him that they were not the Lady Ormond's letters, but those of another Lady, with whom the Marquis had both amorous and political intrigues, so that a conversation that began with warmth, ended in laughter; and his Lordship had a double pleasure in undeceiving the Protector, and preserving a very worthy woman from feeling the effects of his ill-grounded resentment (14). His Lordship oppos'd in parliament, and defeated the blackest measure that Cromwell ever enter'd into, which was the passing a law for decimating the royal party; and his Lordship's conduct in this, was by far the greatest action of his whole life. He made a fine speech, in which he shewed the injustice, cruelty, and folly, of that proposition; and finding upon the division that he should lose the question, which probably might have ended in losing his life; he had the boldness to say, that he did not think so many Englishmen could be fond of slavery; upon which, so many rose and followed him, that the Speaker, without telling, declared from the chair the Noes have it; and the bill was accordingly thrown out. Upon this he came immediately up to Cromwell, and said, I have done you this day as great a service as ever I did in my life. How? returned Cromwell; By hindering your government, from becoming hateful, which already begins to be disliked; for if this bill had pass'd, three kingdoms would have risen up against you, and they were your enemies, not your friends, who brought it in (15). This Cromwell so firmly believ'd, that he never forgave or trusted them afterwards. A little before the Protector's death, as Lord Broghill

(13) Morrice's Memoirs of Roger Earl of Orery, chap. v.

(14) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 60, 61.

(15) Morrice's Memoirs of Roger Earl of Orery, chap. v.

(11) Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 63.

(12) See his Reasons for this in the Arguments published on this Subject.

measure owing to his gratitude, that he attached himself so firmly as he did to his son and successor Richard. On his assuming the supreme power, none were observed to have more credit with him than Lord Broghill, Dr Wilkins, afterwards Bishop of Chester, and Col. Philips (i); but though they might be commonly called, yet sure they were never, strictly speaking, of his Cabinet Council, if they had, his administration had been more steady. Indeed, Lord Broghill was capable of being many ways useful to him, as enjoying at that time singular advantages. He was a General Officer in the army in Ireland, a Lord of Oliver's creation, or one of the other house, a Member of Parliament, in which he sat for some place in England, as in former representations he had sat for Edinburgh, and as knight of the shire for Cork, so that few people could be supposed to have better intelligence, or more extensive influence (k). In all probability, therefore, Richard's government might have lasted longer, and done him more honour, if he had really done nothing without the advice of such a Cabinet Council, instead of applying himself on emergencies only to Lord Broghill, who, in such cases, however, was always ready; particularly when he was first attacked by the Council of Officers at Wallingford-House, on which occasion he served him with equal firmness and dexterity (l) [F]. As this exposed him to the resentment of the warmest and most powerful men at that time in the kingdom, and as there never was a time when private piques were capable of doing even innocent and worthy men more mischief, we need not wonder, that the army-leaders, who

(i) Ludlow's Memoirs, Vol. II, p. 632.

(k) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 677.

(l) Morrice's Memoirs of Roger Earl of Ortery, chap. v.

Broghill was going with him in his coach to Westminster, and the crowd was so great, they could not get along, his Lordship observed the door of a cobbler's stall open several times, and saw something bright behind it; he took his sword from his side, and knocked against the door, upon which a tall man burst out; and though Cromwell called to his guards to seize him, he made his escape. He was known to be an officer that Cromwell had disobligeed in Ireland, and the Protector was so frighted at this design against his life, (for so he justly conceived it) that he would never go that way afterwards (16).

(16) Memoirs of Oliver Cromwell, p. 321.

[F] Served him on that occasion with equal firmness and dexterity.] It is a very singular thing to advance, but that there wants no evidence to support it, that Cromwell did not love his own family so well as Lord Broghill; he was asked upon his death-bed whom he appointed his successor; to which he answered, that in such a closet they would find his will, in which it seems he had named Fleetwood, but one of the Protector's daughters getting first to the drawer, took the will and destroyed it (17). Thus Richard obtained the government against his father's intention, and Lord Broghill endeavoured all he could to maintain him in it, even in spite of his own incapacity. Richard having consented to the meeting of a general council of officers without consulting those, called, his cabinet-council; the Lord Broghill blamed him for it, as of a dangerous consequence to the interest of his Highness, and on the day when the general council was to meet, he went thither with the Lord Howard, and Lord Falconbridge, who promised to assist him, to Wallingford-House (18); they found above five hundred officers assembled, after a long prayer by Dr Owen, major-general Desborough rose up, and in a tedious speech put them in mind, how gracious the Lord had been, and how their aims had prospered, tho' he feared this prosperity would not last long, since several sons of Belial had crept in amongst them, who, in all probability would draw down the judgments of heaven upon them; to prevent this, he thought it would be convenient to purge the army, and that the best method of doing so, would be, to propose a test, which all persons who refuse to take, should be turned out; and the test which he proposed was, that every one should swear, that he did believe in his conscience, that the putting to death the late King Charles Stuart, was lawful and just. This proposal of Desborough's was received with great applause by most of the assembly, who cried out, well moved! and the Lord Howard and Falconbridge thinking it in vain to oppose so apparent a majority, rose up and went to the Protector, to let him know of what was doing. The Lord Broghill, who had his wits about him, tho' vexed to see himself deserted by his two friends, as soon as the assembly was silent, rose up in his place, and said that he was not of the same opinion with the noble Lord who spoke last; that he was against imposing any test upon the army, as a thing which they had often declared against; and if they once came to put tests upon themselves, they would soon have them put upon them by other people, and consequently lose that liberty of conscience for which they so often fought; that he was against the particular test proposed, because he thought it unjust and unreasonable to require men to swear to the lawfulness of an action, which they were not present at; that many gentlemen on whom he had his eye, besides himself, were not present when the late king was put to death, and therefore could not swear to the lawfulness of a proceeding, the circumstances of which, they were unacquainted with; but that if they would have a test to purge the army, he conceived he had as good a right to propose one, as another man; and therefore should take the liberty to propose one, which he hoped would be found more reasonable, and more lawful than that mentioned by the noble Lord, who spoke before him. He then proposed, that all persons should be turned out of the army, who would not swear to defend the established government, under the Protector and Parliament; this test he said was reasonable, since their own being depended upon it, and lawful, because it was to maintain the present government; he added, that if this test should have the ill fortune to be rejected in this council, he would move it the next day in the House of Commons, where he was pretty confident it would meet with a better reception; upon the conclusion of this speech, there was a louder cry of well moved, than when Desborough had spoken before. While the noise continued, and the assembly were in some confusion, Lord Broghill changing his place, and getting between Colonel Whaley and Gough, two hot men, and easily fired, used such arguments to them, that each of them in a warm speech declared for the test, last proposed; Fleetwood and Desborough, with some of their most trusty friends, finding it impossible now to carry the test which would have modelled the army, as they desired, retired to consult what was to be done; after a short stay, they returned to the Council, and declared, that they had seriously considered of what the Lord Broghill had said; they confessed that they had not at first seen all the ill consequences of imposing tests upon the army, but were at present fully convinced of them; to avoid which, and that they might remain united among themselves, they proposed, that both the tests that had been offered should be withdrawn, to which the Lord Broghill after some little stiffness, consented. One cannot well conceive how an affair of this nature could be managed with greater dexterity, or presence of mind, and at the same time it gives us so perfect a notion of those times, and the spirit and genius of those who made a figure in them, that I can scarce believe we can meet with either more entertaining or instructive pieces of history, than those we have inserted in the course of this article (19). By them we plainly see, what an effect particular kinds of rule have upon human nature, and how soon the republican spirit had diffused itself through the more active part of this nation; for I presume that in Athens, or Rome, there never happened a freer debate than this, or where the issue was more plainly determined by the power of speaking. — The next note will confirm this notion by as strong an instance of the same kind.

(17) Morrice's Memoirs of Roger Earl of Ortery, chap. v.

(18) Oldmixon's Hist. of the Stuarts, Vol. I. p. 432. Eudgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 65, 66, 67. Hist. of the Interregnum from the King's death to the Restoration, chap. ix.

(19) There was a long account of this and other transactions, in a MS. intitled, Intrigues at Wallingford-House, once in the Library of the first Earl of Anglesey.

who were also in the House of Commons, transferred the campaign thither, and laboured to raise a spirit against him there, who had already got the better of them in another place. But in this too they miscarried, though their scheme was well laid, for his Lordship as easily baffled his own enemies in Parliament, as he had done the Protector's in the Council of Officers (m) [G]. But though he was so well able to defend his own power, he soon found it was impossible to support Richard, who wanted courage to maintain his own power, and firmness to retire into the city, and there declare for bringing back the King, and for a free Parliament; either of which, had he been well advised, or rather, could he have taken good advice, might have been very practicable (n). But when Lord Broghill saw that the honesty and good nature of Richard Cromwell would infallibly render him a prey to his enemies, of whom some were of his own household, he did not think it at all necessary to sink with a man he could not save. He had advised him honestly on both the topics beforementioned, and therefore, as soon as he had dissolved the Parliament, Lord Broghill thought the Government subverted, and himself absolved from all ties to the Cromwell family, considered as that of a Prince (o). To secure himself, therefore, at least from immediate danger, and to be out of the way of those new troubles which he foresaw would begin soon, he resolved to go over to his command in Ireland, which he accordingly did; but he was very cautious and expeditious in his journey, and thereby over-reached Fleetwood the third time, who had caused some steps to be taken in order to seize him, but too late, and which served only to convince his Lordship, how happy a thing it was for him, that he so prudently withdrew out of reach (p). As soon as he was fairly settled in Munster, he began to enquire, but with much circumspection, into the temper, interests, and power, of the several officers of the army in that kingdom; but before he was in any condition to work upon their sentiments, or discover his own, he was summoned by the Parliament Commissioners at Dublin to appear before them, which without hesitation he did, and though they had taken a resolution to confine him, yet he answered all they objected to him so clearly, and threw them into such a dilemma, by demanding the sole power of Munster upon their asking if he would undertake to keep it quiet, that they were glad to send him back, with an admonition to be true to them, to which he answered, he had been, and would be, always true, to the English and Protestant interest in that country (q). He soon saw, after his return to his command, that there subsisted no longer any kind of harmony amongst the officers, and that the body of the army were anxious for such a settled authority, as might secure to them the lands assigned them in that kingdom; these he judged to be circumstances favourable to his sincere design, of restoring the King and legal constitution, and as he conceived this rightly, he conducted it prudently, and accomplished it happily (r) [H]. It is somewhat strange, that

(m) Oldmixon's Hist. of the Stuarts, Vol. I. p. 432.

(n) Morrice's Memoirs of Roger Earl of Orrery, chap. v.

(o) Love's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, MS.

(p) Morrice's Memoirs of Roger Earl of Orrery, chap. v. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 203.

(q) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. Part. ii. p. 2. Oldmixon's Hist. of the Stuarts, Vol. I. p. 449.

(r) Love's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery. Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 85. Oldmixon's Hist. of the Stuarts, Vol. I. p. 450.

[G] As easily baffled his own enemies in Parliament, as he had done the Protector's in the Council of Officers.

In order to give a clear account of this matter, we are to resume the thread of the story from the last note. The Council of Officers broke up about eight at night, upon which Lord Broghill went directly to the Protector, Richard, whom he found with the Lords Howard and Falconbridge; having gently reproached these two noblemen for having deserted him in the day of battle, he was answered, that finding it impossible to oppose the torrent, and that Fleetwood and Desborough were fure of carrying their point; they thought themselves obliged to come away, and inform the Protector what was doing. The Lord Broghill then, to their no small surprize and satisfaction, gave an account of his success; but added, that he plainly saw, their council would do mischief if they were suffered to sit any longer (20); he therefore humbly advised the Protector to dissolve them immediately. Richard asked in what manner he should do it; Lord Broghill answered, that if his Highness pleased, he would draw up a short speech for him, which he might deliver the next morning at the general-council, after having sat amongst them about an hour. Richard promised he would do so, upon which, Broghill immediately drew up a short speech; the next day at ten in the morning, the Protector, as had been agreed, went to the council, and, to the surprize of the assembly, seated himself in a chair of state, which had been placed there for him, after having listened to their debates about an hour, he rose up, and with a much better grace than was expected, delivered himself to this effect

(21) Gentlemen, I thankfully accept of your services, I have considered your grievances, and think the properest method to redress what is amiss amongst you, is, to do it in the Parliament now sitting, and where I will take care you shall have justice done you. I therefore declare my commission for holding this assembly to be void, and that this general-council is now dissolved; and I desire that such of you as are not members of Parliament, will repair forthwith to your respective commands. This speech, tho' extremely mild, was a thunder-clap in the ears of Fleetwood, Desborough, and all their party. They immediately guessed the Lord Broghill was the author of it (22), and resolved to fall upon him in Parliament; accordingly, when the house met, they complained (with their eyes fixed on Lord Broghill) that they had been highly abused and affronted by a certain noble Lord in that assembly, that they thought themselves obliged to demand satisfaction, and therefore humbly moved, that an address should be presented to his Highness, the Protector, to know who advised him to dissolve the council of war, without the consent or knowledge of his Parliament. Some of Lord Broghill's friends who saw the storm was pointed at him, made signs to him to withdraw; his Lordship however sat still till his enemies had done scolding, when he rose up and spoke in the following manner; Mr Speaker, I am not against presenting this address, but humbly move, that another may be presented to the Protector at the same time, to know who advised the calling of a General-Council of officers, without the consent or knowledge of the Parliament; for surely if the man is guilty, who advised the dissolution of this Council, those people are much more guilty, who durst advise his Highness to call such a Council, without either the knowledge or consent of his Parliament. The house, who suspected the Council of officers no friend to their power, was highly pleased with this second motion; they cried out, well moved! and Fleetwood had the mortification to see himself baffled a second time, by the dexterity of the Lord Broghill.

[H] Conducted it prudently, and accomplished it happily. It is not easy to conceive an enterprize more difficult or dangerous than this undertaken by Lord Broghill, and undertaken too, at a time, when, as we have seen, he was greatly suspected by such as had the supreme authority in Ireland, and who had besides a sufficient measure of power to have secured and crushed him, if any circumstance of his design came to their knowledge before it was ripened to such a degree, as might enable him to oppose, force by force (23); yet under

(22) Oldmixon's Hist. of the Stuarts, Vol. I. p. 432, 433.

(23) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 83.

(20) Morrice's Memoirs of Roger Earl of Orrery, chap. v.

(21) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 71.

(s) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 731.

(t) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 203.

(u) Echard's Hist. of England, p. 753.

that after taking so much pains, and running so many hazards in bringing this important enterprize to bear, very few of our publick or general Histories, ascribe so much to him in this particular as he deserved; some accuse him of backwardness (s), others excuse his slowness in such a manner (t) as amounts to a new charge, and almost all agree, that, in this great event, he acted as an assistant or second to Sir Charles Coote (u). But upon a strict and impartial examination it will appear, that none of these imputations ought to stick on his memory, since there are the strongest proofs his loyal intentions were clear, his conduct prudent and discreet, and his declaration prior, in point of time, to under all these difficulties, and in the midst of so many dangers, he determined to hazard every thing for the King's Restoration, but at the same time, addressed himself to the carrying on of this work with all the secrecy and circumspection that was necessary; both to prevent the Parliament Commissioners from gaining any intelligence, and to secure to himself a party strong enough to deal with those, who either from principle, or interest, might be absolutely irreconcilable to the return of the Royal Family, and the reviving of the old constitution in Church and State, the number and force of which party, no man living knew better than he did, or consequently how to deal with them. He founded all the officers in his own regiments of horse, and regiment of foot, and found them very well disposed to follow his fortunes; only the Governor of Limerick, Colonel Wilfon (24), not being immediately under his command, he was for some time cautious of trusting him; but as that strong place would have been an insurmountable impediment to his design, he resolved to venture and try what he could do with him; accordingly he sent a messenger to desire him to come to my Lord as privately as he could, because he had something of the last importance to confer with him about. When the governor came, he took him into his closet, and after due preparation, began at first to discourse in general, of the present state of affairs, how unsettled they were; adding, What think you, Colonel? the latter replied, that he could wish they were otherwise, and settled some way or other; the Lord Broghill continued the discourse thus: I see plainly that those at the helm, will rather unsettle, than settle them; and therefore it would be well if some man of spirit would stir and try to bring things into a better order, for they cannot last as they are now. The Colonel said, you, my Lord, are a fit man to stir, I wonder why you don't? The Lord Broghill replied, I am not a man of any great interest, and am suspected already. No doubt, says the Colonel, many persons will be glad to join with you in so necessary an undertaking, for my part, I will be one; Well then, replied my Lord, will you indeed join with me in any good design? the Colonel answered, I will, there's my hand, and will stick close to you to the death; Lord Broghill proceeded, These kingdoms will never be well without a Free-Parliament, every one complains of the oppressions of Committees, will you join with me in declaring for a Free-Parliament? I will, says the Colonel, with all my heart I will. Will you do it continued my Lord, if there were a King at the bottom? The Colonel answered, I like it the better; then Lord Broghill acquainted him, what his intentions were, to send to his Majesty and invite him to come to Ireland, where all Munster was ready to receive him, adding, that he would send to Sir Charles Coote in the North, and to Colonel Monk, in Scotland, to desire them to declare for the same thing; which the Colonel highly approved of, and vowed that he would live and die with him in it; my Lord enjoined him to secrecy, upon which the whole matter depended, and the Colonel immediately swore it. After which he returned to Limerick, to prepare for putting the design in execution, and by a gentleman who accompanied him thither from Lord Broghill's house, he returned a letter to my Lord, in which he said, that he wrote it, and subscribed it purposely with his own hand, that if ever he proved false, that letter might rise up in judgment against him. The Lord Broghill dispatched a gentleman whom he could confide in, to Sir Charles Coote, in the North of Ireland, to dispose him to engage with him in declaring for a Free-Parliament, which Coote did very readily, wanting only such an invitation from a person of name and interest, for he had taken disgust at the superiority of Lieutenant-General Ludlow, and the Parliament's Commissioners, and thought that his services which had been very eminent, were not sufficiently rewarded by the Presidency of Connaught; when the gentleman returned from Sir Charles Coote, and told the Lord Broghill, what his resolution was, his Lordship procured a letter signed by most of the chief officers in Ireland, to invite the King, then at Brussels, into that kingdom, Lord Broghill's brother, the Lord Shannon, was sent with this letter, which his Majesty received before matters were quite settled with Monk, and resolved to embark at Calais for Cork; where the Lord Broghill promised to receive him with a good force, but before he could take shipping, an address came from the Convention in England, which invited him thither, and put off the voyage to Ireland; in the mean time it began to be rumoured, that Broghill and Coote had intelligence with Monk, and that their design was for a Free-Parliament; Coote, impatient of delay, made that declaration, having engaged a good part of the army in Ireland to join with him in it. Colonel Brayfield, Governor of Athlone, refusing to do it, Sir Charles brought down his forces before it, and by tampering with some of the garrison, and affirming that Brayfield would deliver them up to him, prevailed with them to open the gates of the castle, and betray the Governor into his hands; Colonel Temple, possessed himself of Carlow, and turned out Colonel Pretty; Captain Lisle dispossessed Colonel Deborough of Drogheda; Colonel Fouke, assisted by the cavaliers, seized Youghal; Major Stanley, had done the same at Clonmell; Colonel Cooper was removed from his command in the North, and a friend of Coote's put into it with little or no opposition, and left still in Munster; where the Lord Broghill declared for a Free-Parliament, tho' not so hastily as Sir Charles Coote did, which occasioned a letter from the latter to his Lordship, wherein he tells him that the design of declaring for a Free-Parliament, began to take vent, and I am therefore, says he, forced to declare before the time determined, lest I should be circumvented or hindered by the Rump-party; upon which account I desire your Lordship forthwith to do the same, that the whole force of the enemy may not be employed against me, but may be divided; remember your Lordship first put me upon this design, and therefore should not leave me, in what you first put me upon. Lord Broghill, who was ready to begin the work, if he had thought the time proper for it, could not help thinking that Coote had precipitated it; yet finding he had done so, resolved to support him, and accordingly declared for a Free-Parliament, which was then understood to be the King, whom they did not care directly to mention, it being made treason by so many laws, by this means the Parliament party were thrown into great perplexity, and knew not what method to take, being confined between the two powers, and Lord Broghill and Coote met with as little opposition as could well be expected, from persons who were in possession of the government. The gentlemen sent Captain Campbell to Colonel Mook, to acquaint him with their proceedings, but he had no more concern in the revolution in Ireland, than Lord Broghill had in that of England (25); it may however be affirmed, that this great turn of affairs in Ireland, could not but influence those of England in some measure, as it rendered it very apparent, that if the King was not brought in to prevent a war, nothing but a war could keep him out, and in making such a war, it had been very difficult for such as were most averse to the Royal Cause, to find officers and troops that they could trust, for tho' there might be many among the former, that did not love the King, yet at the same time they hated each other so heartily, that they were in no condition of acting in such manner as would have been requisite to oppose him (26), more especially after it became evident, that both Scotland and Ireland would declare for him.

Sir

(25) Oldmixon's History of the Stuarts, Vol. 4. p. 449.

(26) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 677, & seq.

Sir Charles Coote's, which are points that deserve to be discussed (w) [I]. He it was, that conducted the great step of recovering the castle of Dublin, which Sir Hardress Waller had found means to secure, after it's being seized by the officers well affected to the King; he it was, that conducted all things in the Convention, and, by slow and sure steps, led on that great change, in a manner equally happy for Prince and people; and he it was, made a just and honest stand for the Protestant interest against the Papists, who, though they began his father's troubles, would never yield Charles II. obedience, and at this time had not moved a finger in his quarrel, were now very loyal in their expressions, and thence hoped to run away with the reward (x). But Lord Broghill coming over to England, prevented many inconveniencies that might have happened, gave the King and his Ministers true notions of the affairs of that country, explained the views, and stated the force, of the several parties there, and pointed out the true means of bringing (w) Bugdell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 83, 84, 85.

(x) Love's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery.

[I] Which are points that deserve to be discussed. The great abilities, the great services, and the great favour, that Lord Broghill, afterwards Earl of Orrery, was in, drew upon him, as might be naturally expected, a heavy load of envy; and it has been, in some measure, the misfortune of that Nobleman, that those who were least acquainted with his affairs, as well as least satisfied with his conduct, have undertaken to give the world an account of it, which perhaps, has been too easily, and too generally believed. As for instance, the noble historian speaks of him thus (27). 'The Lord Broghill, who was president of Munster, and of a very great interest and influence upon that whole province, though he had great wariness in discovering his inclinations, as he had great guilt to restrain them, yet hated Lambert so much, that he less feared the King, and so wished for a safe opportunity to do his Majesty service; and he had a good post and a good party to concur with him, when he should call upon them, and think fit to declare.' One may very easily perceive that the Earl of Clarendon had conceived an ill opinion of Lord Broghill, and wrote under the influence of that conception, which induced him to think there was very little loyalty in that Lord's declaring for the King; but the business is to know whether the Earl's opinion was well founded; and there are many, and those unquestionable proofs, that it was not; but that Lord Broghill was always a loyal subject, and always esteemed so by such as knew him best, both friends and enemies. While the Irish war lasted, he thought it his duty to do his utmost in favour of the Protestant interest; and to do this, he served under the Parliament, in which he wanted not both rational and legal justifications (28). In 1648, when it was visible that their army had got the better of the Parliament, it appears, by a letter from the Marquis of Ormond to Lord Broghill; that the latter had offered himself; and all that was in his power, for the support of the royal cause (29). When he found it out of his power to stir in Ireland, he came over to live privately in England; but conceiving it dishonourable to remain at his ease, while his master knew not where to hide his head, he wrote a letter to King Charles II, and offered him his service. A copy of this letter, and of the King's answer, was found in Secretary Cowper's cabinet, at the taking of Guernsey castle, and sent to the Parliament, who resolved to take his life for it. But Cromwell knowing how useful he might be in Ireland, offered to be bound body for body, that he should drop his former design, and enter into their service, which he did, but not till he had asked the King's leave, who gave it with this gentle restriction, that when he was less in danger, he should remember his duty (30). How he served in that war has been shewn, and against whom; but Cromwell still suspected, and Ireton hated him. Nay, after Lord Broghill had been in Scotland; and had done him so much service there, he could not obtain leave to return to his command in Ireland, because Henry Cromwell represented to his father, that his interest in that country was so great, and his intentions to serve the royal family so well known, that it would not be safe to let him come there (31). It is indeed true that he had thoughts of shewing his loyalty to the King, without being ungrateful to Cromwell, or to his family, for whom he had much tenderness and respect, but even this was done not without hazard, for Oliver had his spies abroad, and when Lord Broghill, in company with the Protector's children, Lord Falconbridge and Lord Carlisle, had drank the King's health, one evening at the Bear at the Bridge-Foot, the Protector had notice of it before they got home, but thought fit to pass it by, for which his Lordship had not the less obligation to him (32). It is said that he managed his design in Ireland for the King's restoration with great secrecy, and this is ascribed to a certain habit in him, and surely that was no bad habit, since Sir George Booth about the same time had like to have lost his life, by declaring precipitately (33). But Sir Charles Coote sent over Sir Arthur Forbes to the King at Brussels; before Monk declared. And what then? Lord Broghill also sent over his brother, the Lord Shannon, with a Letter quilted in the neck of his doublet, signifying, that he had secured the town of Cork, and had a body of five thousand old Protestant troops ready for his Majesty's service (34). It is indeed true, that after the King came to London; he suffered himself in some measure, to be persuaded that Sir Charles Coote was the first man that stir'd for him in Ireland, but Lord Broghill soon set this to rights, by sending the King Sir Charles Coote's letter upon his declaring, in which was the following paragraph, than which nothing can be clearer: Remember, my Lord, that you first put me upon this design, and I beseech you forsake me not in that which you first put me upon, which was to declare for the King and Parliament (35). This, as might be well expected, placed every thing in a proper light; his Lordship was soon after made Earl of Orrery, sworn of the King's Privy-Council, appointed one of the Lords-Justices, and Lord President of Munster. To shew that these favours were not the effects of policy, but of a sincere sense of his Lordship's merit, the following letter will appear a most convincing proof, tho' wrote two years after the Restoration (36).

(32) Love's Memoirs of Lord Orrery.

(33) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 677.

(34) Love's Memoirs as above.

(35) Bugdell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 87.

(36) Orrery's Letters, p. 651.

The King to the Earl of Orrery.

MY Lord Orrery, I am so sensible of the many services you have done me, as I am ashamed this should be the first letter to thank you for them; and though I have been failing to you in this kind, I assure you I will never be wanting to myself and you in the essential part of what I owe for good a servant as you are to me, and be confident, that upon all occasions you shall find the value and kindness I have for you. I hope in a few days to dispatch the Act of Settlement with the rest you sent for my approbation, and will make all possible speed to send my Lord-Lieutenant to you, whereby the intire settlement of that kingdom may be finished, and I may receive the benefit of that which you have been so instrumental in. I shall not now enter into the particular thanks for every service you have done me; I should not have room in this sheet to say any thing else; but in the general, I hope you are so just to me as to believe I have that sense of them I ought to have. I will now tell you that I have read your first play, which I like very well, and do intend to bring it upon the stage as soon as my company have their new stage in order, that the scenes may be worthy the words they are to set forth, for the last I have only seen in my Lord-Lieutenant's hands, but will read it as soon as I have leisure. I have no more to say to you at present, but assure you, I am,

White-hall, Feb. 26th, 1662. Your very affectionate Friend,
CHARLES R.

[K] R

(27) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, p. 737.

(28) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 186.

(29) Carte's Hist. of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. III. p. 589.

(30) Love's Memoirs of Lord Orrery.

(31) Ludlow's Memoirs, Vol. II. p. 563.

(y) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. ii. p. 3. Carte's Hist. of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 212.

(z) Collins's Peerage, Vol. IV. p. 262.

(a) See the Table of Chief Officers of the Crown, &c. in the second Volume of the English Translation of Ware's Works.

(b) Cox's Hist. of Ireland.

(c) See this point clearly stated in note [K.]

bringing all things in that kingdom into regularity and order (y). In consideration of, as well as an incontestible proof of, these well-timed and essential services, his Majesty, by letters patent bearing date Sept. 5, 1660, advanced him to the honour of Earl of Orrery in the county of Cork (z); and Sir Maurice Eustace, a fast friend of the Duke of Ormond's, being appointed Chancellor, Roger Earl of Orrery, and Charles (Coote) Earl of Montrath, were, with him, made Lords-Justices, about the close of that memorable year (a). In the month of January following, he went over to that kingdom, and entered on the discharge of his high office (b). But we are told by some who wrote Memoirs of his Life, that he rendered a most singular service to the Protestants in Ireland before his departure, which totally defeated the schemes formed by the Irish, to render his Majesty's Declaration, as to the settlement of that kingdom, void and ineffectual, at least in a great measure (c). But I must acknowledge, that upon examining the matter strictly, and comparing all its circumstances, one cannot help suspecting there is some mistake, either as to the fact itself, or in the manner of relating it. The passage, however, is curious, and as there is reason to doubt whether it was ever before called in question, it shall be particularly examined in the notes [K]. His conduct, during the time [K] It shall be particularly examined in the notes.

One great design of this work is to rectify the mistakes made by general historians, in reference to personal history, and the opposite error to this; the transgressions of private memoir writers, against the truth of general history. It is commonly observed in respect to such as compose the memoirs, characters, or histories, of eminent persons, that they are carried to such undertakings, either from a grateful sense of favours conferred upon them; from a particular knowledge of some of the principal points, of which they undertake to write, or from a warm affection for the cause and conduct of the person whose memory they celebrate. It must be allowed, that all these are not only just but laudable motives to works of this sort; yet still they suppose a bias in favour of the person, whose actions are thus preserved, such a prejudice is not only incident to, but inseparable from, human nature, and tho' in strictness the must allow it a weakness, yet it is such a weakness as ought to be corrected without censure, which is what I aim at in this note. The noble person of whom I am speaking, made so great a figure in his life-time, that several persons undertook to write memoirs of his actions from their own knowledge, and the notices they received from their Friends, and tho' in general those performances are very useful, and let us into the truth of several transactions, about which we should be otherwise in the dark; yet they are not totally free from defects, as will be evident from the instance we are now going to give, and in order to place this in as clear a light as it is possible, we will first of all state the matter as these writers have represented it, and then shew to what objections their account is liable, how far it agrees with, and in what circumstances there are good grounds to suspect it deviates from truth. As for their account it runs thus (37) Morrice's Memoirs of Roger Earl of Orrery, chap. vi. Oldmixon's Hist. of the Stuarts, Vol. I. p. 497. Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 106, &c. seq.

(37) The Irish Roman Catholics soon after the King's return, presented a petition to him by Sir Nicholas Plunket, and others commissioned for that purpose, to desire they might be restored to their estates. This in effect would have ruined the Protestants, who chose the Earls of Orrery, Montrath, and six more to oppose their adversaries, before the King and the Council. The Irish Commissioners were so apprehensive of the Earl's eloquence, and address upon such occasion, that Mr Morrice, his chaplain, assures us, they came to him, and offered him eight thousand pounds in money, and to settle estates of seven thousand pounds per ann. upon him and his heirs, if he would not appear against them at the council-board. But the Earl rejected this proposal with a generous disdain, and told them, that since he had the honour to be employed by the Protestants, he would never have the baseness to betray them. This great cause was heard at length in a very solemn manner, before the King and Council; where, when the Irish Commissioners had offered all they thought proper, and expatiated upon the loyalty of their principles, the Earl, after an handsome compliment to the King, boldly affirmed that his Protestant subjects in Ireland were the first that formed an effectual party for restoring him, which the King readily bore witness to. He then represented, that the Irish Papists after the cessation of arms, had sent no assistance to the late King, as they had promised to do, and would have cut off the Marquis of Ormond, his Majesty's Lord-Lieutenant, at Kilkenny, which Lord Ormond averred to be true, and that they refused to receive him into Limerick, but endeavoured to intercept and murder him, in his return to Dublin. Then the Earl of Orrery produced a paper signed by Plunket, and several of the supreme council at Kilkenny, asking him if it was not his hand, and if the hands of others of them, then present, were not of their writing. The Marquis of Ormond seeing it, cry'd, Sir Nicholas Plunket, that is certainly of your writing; which neither he nor the others could deny, and it being read, appeared to be an order of the supreme council to prosecute the Marquis of Ormond by name, then Lord-Lieutenant, and his party, with fire and sword: Upon which the Earl of Orrery said, those must be very loyal subjects indeed, that had declared war against his Majesty's Commissioners! He added; it will be proved to this most Honourable Board, that the Irish did not only declare war against his Majesty's Lieutenant, but that Sir Nicholas Plunket himself had been impowered by them by a commission under the hands of the supreme council, which he also produced, and the Irish Commissioners could not deny the hand writing of Plunket, and others of them, to offer the Pope the Kingdom of Ireland; and if he refused it, to offer it to the King of Spain; and in case he would not accept of it, to make the same offer to the King of France, the Duke of Lorraine, or any other catholic Prince. Then his Lordship shewed the council another paper subscribed as before, and desired it might be read. It was a petition drawn up by the hands of the Irish nation, about the transplantation; wherein they gave the commonwealth parliament, the title and title of the supreme authority, acknowledging it to be justly and lawfully lodged in their assembly, to whom they submitted their lives and fortunes: Upon this the Irish petition was rejected, and Plunket and the other Popish deputies were forbidden the King's presence and Court. The Earl of Montrath, and the six other Protestant Commissioners, were very inquisitive to know how the Earl of Orrery procured these papers, and why he had not communicated them to his fellow-commissioners, before the hearing. His Lordship told them, That he would not trust his brother with them, for fear that if it were known he had such original papers, the Papists, who were confident of success without such evidence against them, might use some art or other to render them ineffectual, which if they were surprized with them they could not do. He said that the manner of his coming by such originals, was very extraordinary. That upon his being named one of the Deputies of Ireland, a plain, grave, country gentleman came to his house in Munster, and desired to speak with him in private; and being admitted, he said, That he heard his Lordship was going to court in such a commission, and knowing him to be a man of integrity, he had brought some papers, which he thought would be useful to him for the English interest, against the Irish; that he would not trust his own son with them, and therefore came in person to wait upon his Lordship, and deliver them to him. The Earl asked how he procured them? The gentleman replied, that he had had such a commission in the army, and one of his soldiers, in rifling the house of a papist of distinction, brought away these papers, which he took from him, and laid them time of his being at the head of the government there, was such as contributed to make the subjects easy and contented; and his moderation, in conjunction with the same good quality in his colleagues, helped to reconcile all the jarring parties and different religions in that kingdom to a quiet obedience, at least, of the new establishment (d). When, therefore, the Earl of Montrath, who had so generously concurred with him in the King's Restoration, was removed by death, his Lordship together with the Lord Chancellor Eustace, were continued, and sworn again Lords-Justices, Jan. 14, 1661 (e). He gave all the necessary lights, to the King and his Ministry, as to the affairs of that island; by which they proceeded here; he drew the bill of settlement with his own hand, by which he came nearer the character of a Legislator, than almost any modern Statesman our History has recorded. For by this he fixed the property, and gave titles to their estates to a whole nation; and as it was the work of his head to contrive, so it was left to his industry and influence to get passed, the Act of Settlement, which he performed to the lasting security of the Protestant interest in Ireland. It is very remarkable, that as great a service as this was to the English nation, as much as it contributed to the ease and safety of the government, and as far as it went in composing the disputes that were almost ready to have kindled a new flame in Ireland, yet nobody disputed this merit with the Earl of Orrery (f). The Act of Settlement, though as just and reasonable as a law of so general a nature could be, did not satisfy every body. The Irish Papists were provoked, the enthusiastick Fanaticks were ill pleased, and though the wiser, better, and major part of the people saw good cause to be grateful and content, yet those who were otherwise, were by much the more restless, clamorous, and uneasy; and all these discharged their gall very freely on Orrery (g). When matters were brought into this condition, and all things wore a peaceable and regular aspect, his Lordship was discharged of the burthen of government, his Grace the Duke of Ormond being sworn Lord-Lieutenant, July 28, 1662, and the Earl of Orrery remitted to his more confined exercise of power in his province of Munster (h). But in this situation he continued to labour all in his power for the publick advantage, giving such lights and informations to the Duke of Ormond as he desired, and which, as they are still preserved, remain indelible proofs of his publick spirit, and private friendship (i). Amongst other great services rendered in this manner, one was in the following year, 1663, when he acquainted the Lord-Lieutenant with a design formed for seizing Dublin-castle, and which is commonly called Jephson's plot (k) [L]. His Lordship's active and free course of life had brought upon him some diseases and infirmities, which gave him much pain and uneasiness, and a fever that fell into his feet, joined with the gout with which he was often afflicted, abated much of that vigour which he had shewed in the earlier part of his life; but his industry and application were still the same, and bent to the same purposes, as appears from his letters, which shew at once a capacity and an attention to business, which does honour to that age, (d) Lawrence's Interest of Ireland, Part iii. p. 99.

(e) See the large Table of supreme Governors and great officers in Ireland, in the second Volume of Sir James Ware's Works.

(f) See the Preface to the Earl of Orrery's State Letters.

(g) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 224.

(h) Cox's Hist. of Ireland.

(i) See his Letters during 1663; 1664, and 1665.

(k) Cox's Hist. of Ireland.

them up safe, to be made use of upon occasion, and none could be more proper than the present. — It is very true, that soon after the Restoration, and while the Convention was sitting at Dublin, Lord Broghill, afterwards Earl of Orrery, Sir Charles Coote, afterwards Earl of Montrath, and others, were sent over to represent the desires of the nation to the King; and it is also true, that these Commissioners supported the cause of the Protestants against such as appeared on behalf of the Irish Papists (38); but I do not find that Plunket was then their agent. Many months after this, when the Parliament was sitting, and the Earl of Orrery was one of the Lords-Justices, Commissioners were appointed to support the Act of Settlement in England, and those chosen by the house of Lords were the Earl of Kildare, the Lord Viscount Montgomery, the Bishop of Elphin, and the Lord Kingdon (39). After this, in 1661, the Lords-Justices sent the Bishop of Cork, the Lord Kingdon, and Mr Piggot, then Master of the Wards, as their agents to England, and these were the persons that produced the papers in question, and defeated all the endeavours of Sir Nicholas Plunket, and the rest of the Irish agents, by producing the instructions of Plunket, as is very evident, from the order of council, dated at Whitehall, March 14, 1661-2, in which the whole affair is very clearly stated (40). At this time the Earl of Orrery was one of the Lords-Justices, and in Ireland; the Earl of Montrath died the 18th of October preceding the transaction; and Mr Carte informs us, that the Bishop of Cork had, by some means or other, found the originals of the instruments before mentioned, and was the person who produced them at the council-table (41). As for the Earl of Orrery's zeal for the Protestant interest, the offers made him by the Irish Papists, and his rejecting them, they may be, and probably were true; but as to the Earl of Orrery's producing these papers at the council-table, after they had fallen into his hands, in so extraordinary a manner, it is plain they are circumstances added at random, and have no foundation in truth.

[L] And which is commonly called Jephson's plot.] We have in another place given the reader some account of this insurrection, and shall not therefore dwell upon it here. That it was discovered by the Earl of Orrery to the Lord-Lieutenant, appears to have been a thing of notoriety in those days (42), tho' there is no particular account of it in his Lordship's letters, but the following epistle from his most gracious master, which is preserved among them, will put the matter of fact entirely out of doubt, and establish this point of service as effectually as can be desired.

(42) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 6.

King Charles II. to the Earl of Orrery (43).

(43) Orrery's Letters, p. 71.

MY Lord of Orrery. Though I had before I received your's of May 23, a relation of the conspiracy against the castle of Dublin, from my Lord of Ormond, as also of the part you had in the discovery of it: Yet I was glad to read in your's many more particulars, especially for the application you used, to prevent the further growth of this villany, which was so much, according to my judgment, that I cannot but recommend to you the same manner of proceeding, if we shall be so unhappy as to meet with any more such occasions. In the mean time I desire you to be assured, that I have all the value I ought to have for your person, and affection to my service, and that I shall on all occasions requite it as White-hall, June 13th 1663. Your very affectionate Friend,

CHARLES R.

(8) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 212.

(9) Memoirs of the Affairs of Ireland, from the Restoration to the Revolution, p. 133.

(10) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 5.

(11) Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 244.

(l) Morrice's Memoirs of Roger Earl of Orrery, chap. vi.

(m) Love's Memoirs of Lord Orrery.

(n) Memoirs of Roger Earl of Orrery, ubi supra.

(o) See this explained in note [F].

(p) Orrery's Letters, p. 114-298.

(q) See his correspondence during that time, in his Letters.

(r) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 238. Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. IV. p. 257. Cox's History of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 59.

(s) Orrery's Letters, p. 237.

(t) See the vast importance of this Port, explained by the Earl himself in his Letters to the Duke of Ormond, July 18, 1667, p. 271.

(u) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, c. vi.

and may serve as an example for this (l). But on particular emergencies, when the State could not be served by speeches or pen and ink, the Earl of Orrery forgot his ill state of health and infirmities to such a degree, as shewed how far publick spirit can supply all things, even youth and strength, to such as are truly affected therewith. On the King's signifying his desire of seeing his Lordship in England, he went over in 1665, and found things at Court in some disorder (m). His Majesty had taken a resolution of removing the Earl of Clarendon, Lord High-Chancellor, on account of his behaving so imperiously, that one of his Majesty's complainant temper could no longer bear it; and he had so good an opinion of the Earl of Orrery's judgment, integrity, and fitness for that high employment, that he offered him the Seals, as Lord-Keeper, which, however, he declined, on account of his want of bodily vigour, which the King did not take at all amiss (n). But he accepted, and performed, a most difficult and disagreeable commission from his master, which was to expostulate with his brother the Duke of York, and bring him to ask pardon for some steps he had taken to support the Chancellor, and that, by the Earl of Orrery's persuasion, he was brought to do. In this situation of things, standing equally well with the royal brothers, he might have had any thing, but his Lordship desired no more than he had, and therefore, as soon as he had done what was expected from him here, he went back again to Ireland, neither greater nor richer than he came from thence; and though no creature of Clarendon's, yet no mighty friend to the Ministers that supplanted him (o). On his coming back to Munster, he found himself called to a new scene of action. The first Dutch war was then at it's height, and the French acting also in confederacy with them, and both using all their endeavours, to rake together the scattered ashes of rebellion, and by countenancing the regicides, and other dangerous persons abroad, to spirit up an insurrection either in England or Ireland, he, who knew better than any man, how to deal with and discover the intrigues of the Fanaticks, was put to keep a constant guard against their secret contrivances, and at the same time was obliged to watch with equal diligence, the attempts that might be made on the coasts, by the enemies joint naval force (p). How he discharged his trust in both, is largely set forth by his own pen, not in a studied account of his own services, but in papers occasionally written in direction to others, or to desire from the Lord-Lieutenant, with whom he stood then in high favour, instructions for himself (q). The scheme formed by the Duke de Beaufort, Admiral of France, for a descent upon Ireland, and securing the noble harbour of Kingale, was defeated by the Earl of Orrery, who discovered all the alacrity of a young man in repairing thither, assembling a force sufficient to cover the town and port, and guns to mount upon the works; at the same time that he also shewed the judgment and experience of an old Statesman, in laying hold of so fair an opportunity, to make the fright of the people, and the alarm of the Government, turn to the advantage of the country, by procuring a fort and regular fortifications to be erected (r). This was afterwards done under the direction of his Lordship, who had thereby an opportunity of signifying his skill (which was great) as an engineer in the construction of Fort Charles, and of demonstrating, which was very singular, his publick spirit as a Patriot, by contributing his private credit, and advancing his own money for the service of the nation (s). By his care in this particular, one of the best ports in the British dominions was put into a proper state of defence against enemies, and rendered a most commodious refuge in time of war, both for our East and West India fleets (t). But in the midst of all his labours, and in spite of all his services, in 1667, a dispute arose between him and his old friend the Duke of Ormond (u), then Lord-Lieutenant, of which it is necessary, and therefore I have said somewhat, though it is but too visible, that after all that can be said, in a great measure, posterity will remain still in the dark as to the true grounds of this quarrel [M].

But

[M] Posterity will remain still in the dark, as to the true grounds of this quarrel. It may to some seem tedious and to others trifling, to descend into a close examination of the differences and disputes between great men, who lived at such a distance of time. But when it is considered that these disputes, tho' private at the beginning, became at last of a publick nature, and produced first an attempt to frame an impeachment against the Duke of Ormond; and in revenge of this, the actual forming an impeachment against the Earl of Orrery, and this, in so short a space, after they were both highly advanced in honour, and closely united in friendship; I say, whoever considers this, cannot think such an enquiry trivial; or, if kept within proper bounds, tedious. We read with great pleasure, in Mr Bayle's admirable performance, differences and disputes of far less consideration, and with which, in comparison of these, we have little or nothing to do. Besides, this dispute had very considerable consequences: Some attribute thereto the removal of the Duke of Ormond from the Lieutenantcy of Ireland; but whether this was so or not, most certain it is, that it produced the suppression of the Lord President's court in Munster, which is a point of such importance, as renders any thing relating to it worth knowing. It is evident, that the coldness began on the side of the Duke of Ormond, and is thus accounted for by his historian (44).

'Lord Orrery gave the Duke of Ormond an early account of his being solicited in this manner; but it was only in general, and he would not discover the persons who had thus endeavoured to draw him into their combination, that his Grace might know against whose designs he was to guard himself. Nor did he ever give him the least notice of the King's letter. He had promised to let the Duke know what was like to be objected against him, and in performance of that promise, had sent him some articles, which his Grace deemed too senseless to be real, and his jealousy being already raised, he suspected some of them to be that nobleman's inventions.'

It may seem a little strange, that so wise a man as the Duke of Ormond, should take ill the notices given him by a man of Lord Orrery's quality, who made high professions of friendship to him, and, for any thing that appears to the contrary, was really his friend. But the news being unwelcome in itself, could not be well relished; from whatever hand it came, His Grace however had afterwards very full satisfaction

(44) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 365.

But upon what grounds soever it began, both Peers very soon felt the bad effects of it, and resorted into England, to defend their respective interests and pretensions, both having been attacked by their secret enemies, who suggested many things to their prejudice, as well as that, if their power was once taken away, all that was alledged would be speedily and fully made good (w). Such were the methods practised in those days, and perhaps since, to bring down great men, and against such methods, Who can be safe? But after all it is certain, that the King's affections to him were not easily shaken [N]. His coming over to England at that time, and the rumours which prevailed in Ireland as if he was intended for Lord-Lieutenant, increased the jealousy of the Duke of Ormond, which was not at all abated, by the Earl's promoting a scheme, for enquiring into and improving his Majesty's revenue in that kingdom (x). He failed in this, indeed, but it was not from any mistake of his, but from the King's applying great sums out of that revenue, which did not come plainly into account. This competition between Ormond and Orrery continuing, proved to them very disadvantageous, especially at a time when a new Ministry was coming in that liked neither, and was therefore employed in contriving to ruin both. The Presidential Court the Earl was directed to lay down, because the power was great, and the Earl of Orrery being exceedingly well qualified for executing that part of his office, made it appear greater, perhaps, than it really was (y). He submitted, immediately to his master's pleasure, that was signified by a most obliging letter, of which, however, there seems to be no copy remaining. In his next voyage to England, he perceived

(w) Remarkable Events under the reign of Charles II. p. 357.

(x) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 369.

(y) See the Preface to Lord Orrery's Letters.

as to the truth of it, and as to Lord Orrery's not declaring from whom he had it, his Lordship's account ought to have satisfied the Duke; for he told him, that the same person who gave him this advice, enjoined him secrecy, and at the same time told him, if he would join in the design, he would disclose to him the whole; but this the Earl positively refused, which put it out of his power to gain farther lights for the Duke. Some causes there were besides this which disgusted his Grace, and made him so suspicious of every thing that came from the Earl of Orrery; and what these causes were, will best appear from the account of this matter, given by the Earl's historian, which runs thus (45).

[N] But after all it is certain, that the King's affections to him were not easily shaken.] We have an account from Mr Morrice, of a letter written to the Earl of Orrery, some time after the fall of the Lord Chancellor Clarendon (47). 'He received, says he, a kind letter from his Majesty, written with his own hand, which I have seen, wherein the King gives him many thanks for his kind services to him; particularly for settling things in so good a posture in his province; assuring him, he would always be mindful of, and be ready to serve him in any thing he should desire: And in the conclusion his Majesty lets him know, he was very well pleased with that part of the Black Prince he had sent him, and conjured his Lordship to go on and complete it, which, if he could not do until he had a fit of the gout, he wished him a fit presently, that he might the sooner finish it. King Charles was the first who put my Lord upon writing plays, which his Majesty did upon occasion of a dispute that arose in his royal presence, about writing plays in rhyme. Some affirmed it was not to be done; others said, it would spoil the fancy to be so confined: But Lord Orrery was of another opinion, and his Majesty being willing a trial should be made, commanded his Lordship to employ some of his leisure time that way, which my Lord readily did, and upon that occasion composed the Black Prince.' It is impossible to fix the date of this letter, which is now no longer extant; but it seems to have been written before the difference broke out between his Grace of Ormond, and his Lordship; after which some endeavours were used to alter the kind sentiments which, as appears from this letter, the King then had for his Lordship, of which, it is possible, he might have notice, and might have expressed his concern thereat, nor is it in the least improbable, that the King should receive an account of this, for without supposing some such thing, it is not easy to give a reason for the King's writing him the following letter, which I take to be a clear and direct proof of what is asserted in the Text (48).

(47) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. vi.

(48) Carte's Appendix to the Life of the Duke of Ormond, No. lxvi.

The King to the Earl of Orrery.

MY Lord of Orrery, I am so well persuaded of your particular kindness to me, and so satisfied with the constant service you do me, upon all occasions, as I have omitted to say any thing to you till now, upon the late change I have made, because I hope you are so much assured of my true friendship to you, as no alteration could shake me in it; for you may be most confident, that you may stand upon your own legs, and that you need nobody's friendship with me, nor ought to fear the ill offices of any man can have any effect to your prejudice. Therefore I will say no more at this time, but to conjure you never to doubt of the constant kindness of White hall, Nov. 30th, 1667. Your very affectionate Friend,

CHARLES R.

[O] For

(45) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. vi.

(46) See the Preface to the Earl of Orrery's Letters.

'After the Earl of Orrery had been some time in Ireland, the Duke of Ormond, being Lord Lieutenant, went in progress through the chief parts of that kingdom, and upon his coming into Munster, Lord Orrery ordered all the Train-Bands of the several Baronies, through which his Grace was to pass, to be ready in arms to conduct him through the Barony, and he himself went to the confines of the province to receive him, and waited upon him throughout all the province. But this action was by some wicked people, presented to my Lord's great prejudice. For some did the ill office to insinuate, that this was too popular for a subject, and therefore not proper to be tolerated; and that this was only to shew what he could do, if he were disgusted, having so many at a day's warning ready to obey his command. From that time forward there grew an unhappy misunderstanding between the Duke and his Lordship, which my Lord Orrery never dreamed of, until it became too visible not to be remarked; for those wicked instruments, who first suggested this to the Duke, did not fail afterwards to misrepresent to him all other of Lord Orrery's words and actions.' This matter is still more fully explained by a very judicious writer, in the following words (46). 'His Grace of Ormond, who found himself unjustly, but sensibly declining, in his royal master's favour, and who saw in his progress into the county of Cork, the great interest and influence which the Earl possessed there, could not help listening to malicious insinuations, whispered to him against the then President of Munster: Nor could he think himself in perfect security, (for two suns cannot shine in one hemisphere) till the Presidency Court was suppressed; and till Lord Orrery was divested of all means to vie with the Lord-Lieutenant, either in grandeur or in power. — Statefmen cannot look with the eye of affection towards their successors: And the Duke of Ormond judged, that were he himself displaced, no man was so fit to supply the vacancy as Lord Orrery. So that urged on by jealousies on every side, the Duke of Ormond stopped the noble current of his nature, which flow'd most benevolently on all other occasions, and entertained suspicions of an old and intimate acquaintance, who had taken every opportunity to be his friend, and whom no provocation could ever force to be his enemy.'

ceived a great alteration both with regard to publick affairs and his own, the method used against Clarendon being esteemed infallible by those who employed it, and who were not long before they practised it against Orrery, by bringing a charge of high crimes and even of treason against him into Parliament, of which we shall say nothing here, for the best account that can be given, is that from the Journals of the House (z) [O]. He defended himself so well, that it produced no effect, except opening the eyes of such of his old friends as had differed from him, and who now saw, with how small reason they had taken this step, and how far he was from endeavouring to return it, refraining himself, on the contrary, within the strict bounds of a direct defence, as the answer to the charge shews, and in the notes may be found some other singular (though less important) circumstances, worth the reader's notice (a) [P]. But though this prosecution did not prove

(z) Journal of the House of Commons, Nov. 25, 1669.

(a) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. vi.

[O] For the best account that can be given, is that from the Journals of the House.] We have several accounts of this transaction, both in publick and general histories, as well as in private and secret memoirs; but as none of these deserve credit, farther than they are warranted by, or at least are consistent with, the Journals of the House of Commons, it cannot but be agreeable to the reader to have that account laid before them

On Thursday, the 25th day of November, 1669, a petition signed by Sir Edward Fitz-Harris, and Philip Alden, Gent. was read, to which a paper was affixed, containing articles of impeachment against Roger Earl of Orrery of high-treason and misdemeanours. The paper was also read, and the petitioners were then called in; who, at the bar of the house, avowed both the paper and the petition, affirming they were ready to make out the particulars by proof, and then they withdrew. They were after some time called in again; and Mr Speaker acquainted them, that the charge in the articles being in part treasonable, the house desired to know, whether as to that part they were witnesses or prosecutors. They answered they were only prosecutors to that part; and though one of their witnesses to make proof of it was in town, yet they had others who were not, and therefore desired a warrant of summons, and time to bring them in; after which they withdrew, and the matter was debated, the previous question being put, and passing in the affirmative, the main question was put, whether the charge against the Earl of Orrery doth contain in it treasonable matter; and this likewise passing, the following order ensued: Ordered, That the Serjeant at Arms attending this house, do go to the Lord Orrery, and let him know he has the order of this house to bring him into custody to this house, to answer a charge exhibited against him. And if he find him in a condition not able to come, then to leave a servant to attend 'till he is; and that he do also deliver him a copy of the charge exhibited against him.

On Wednesday, December the 1st, 1669, the Lord Orrery attending near the house, and desiring admittance to give in his answer, he was called in, and being informed, was permitted to give in his answer sitting in his place; and every one of the ten articles being distinctly read to him, he did, upon reading every particular article, give in his answer thereto, in order, as they were writ down and were read; and then he withdrew. The previous question being put, and carried in the affirmative; the main question was put: That a day be appointed for the accusers to produce witnesses, to make good the charge against the Earl of Orrery. The house divided, and the yeas went out; yeas 118, no's 121. So it passed in the negative. Then the question being put, that this accusation against the Earl of Orrery, be left to be prosecuted at law? It passed in the affirmative.

Friday, December the 10th, 1669, a debate being in the matter, touching Lord Orrery. Resolved, That his Majesty be humbly desired by such members of this house, as are of his Majesty's Privy-Council, that the witnesses in this matter, have liberty to come over out of Ireland, to give their testimony.

[P] Some other singular (tho' less important) circumstances, worth the reader's notice.] The Duke of Ormond had carried his point with respect to the Presidential Court of Munster, tho' as we have shewn in the text, the Earl of Orrery met with some alleviations in that affair; but in England the enemies of the Duke of Ormond had so far prevailed, that he was removed from his high office, and the Lord Roberts sworn Lieutenant of Ireland, September 10, 1669 (49). Thus the enemies of those two noble Peers found means to play them against each other, to their mutual detriment; for it is certain, they had very near the same enemies; and that those enemies would scarce had power to hurt either, if their differences had not made way for the lessening of both. The Duke of Ormond was now removed, but it was the sentiment of a great and dangerous minister, Sir Thomas Clifford, that he should be able to do nothing in Ireland, while Orrery was President of Munster; and this is the secret of bringing the impeachment against him into Parliament; the Earl having had timely notice of the designs of his enemies, came over and took his seat in the English House of Commons; but being seized with a violent fit of the gout, that opportunity was taken by his adversaries to bring on his affair, and to get him committed; which, tho' effected, did him no great prejudice, and consequently did them no great service; after this step they could not deny him some time, which was all that he wanted to make his defence (50). When the day appointed for that purpose came, his Lordship attended by a great number of real friends (for such only attend on these occasions) went from his house in Leicester-fields to Westminster, but his Lordship being scarce half recovered from his gout, went up the stairs leading from Westminster Hall to the Court of Requests but heavily; which a friend of his observing, and expressing his concern for his Lordship's pain and trouble, he answered him immediately in these words; It is true, Sir, my feet are weak, but if my heels will serve to carry me up, I promise you my head shall bring me safe down again (51). His Lordship prophesied right, for tho' there never were more pains taken in forming an accusation, or in giving dark colours to innocent and even to trivial things; yet his answer was so clear, so circumstantial, and so ingenuous, that it satisfied even such of his enemies as were men of integrity and honour; so that though the managers of this affair had interest enough to procure a vote, for bringing over witnesses, yet they had more wit than to trust the House, or his Lordship, with the examination of those witnesses, and so the matter fell. But notwithstanding the sense his Lordship had of his own interest in the House, as well as the goodness of his cause, he nevertheless thought it highly requisite to neglect no precaution that might avail him, if the malice of his enemies had been supported by a greater measure of power than he expected; for he sent his lady over to Ireland before the day of hearing came on, and she executed her commission, with so much diligence and dexterity, that whatever issue the impeachment might have had, with respect to his Lordship, his family must have been in all events safe; which sufficiently shews the violence of those times, when the very worthiest men, were sometimes at the mercy, and often in peril from the rage of factions, or the intrigues of wicked men; but if in the progress of this affair, his Lordship could not avoid meeting with some vexation, yet the end of it was not only to his satisfaction, but several concurring circumstances abated much of the uneasiness he would otherwise have felt. As for instance, the Lord Inchiquin, between whom and the Earl of Orrery there had been for some time a coldness, being a member of the House of Commons, and remarkably well heard in all matters relating to Ireland, taking up this matter roundly, and understanding it perfectly, shewed the charge to be in several respects groundless; in many directly false; in some full of gross misrepresentations; in all highly malicious; did his Lordship much more service thereby, than

(49) See the Table of General Governors and great Officers in Ireland, in the second Volume of War's Works.

(50) Love's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery.

(51) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. vi.

prove him guilty of any thing contrary to the publick welfare, or the King's service; yet it was such a convincing argument of the great influence of his enemies, that he is said to have accepted a present of eight thousand pounds from the King, as a compensation for the Presidency of Munster, which the Ministers were bent on having, and which, in such circumstances, it did not at all import the Earl to keep (b). But the loss of his employment, did not, in his judgment, discharge him from his Majesty's service; and as the King gave him subsequent marks of his favour and esteem, he came frequently to Court, and sometimes to Council, more especially after his return from a short visit to Ireland, whither he went chiefly to execute a design he had formed of repairing Castle-Martyr, an old ruined fortress, which he reduced to a very fair house, that he intended for the retreat of his old age (c). The King, who knew his abilities, laboured, when he came back, to bring him to relish the new system, intending to have used his advice in his affairs; but his Lordship continued to adhere to the former plan with inflexible steadiness, for which he was very much commended by some, who were far enough from pursuing the same conduct (d) [Q]. In another voyage to England, not long after, he saw what himself had foretold would come to pass, and found the King involved in numberless difficulties, and the Duke of York under still greater. The French war brought on the former, and the fear of Popery (for the Test Act had forced his Royal Highness to declare himself a Papist) had produced the latter. In this situation the Earl of Orrery was extremely welcome, both brothers knew his zeal for their service, his happiness in finding expedients, and his abilities for recommending them in the House of Commons, where they were sensible it would be a very hard matter to get them approved, if they were not proposed by some, who had no concern in the late offensive measures (e). His Lordship, in obedience to their commands, framed the Plan of an Act of Limitation, by which it would have been put out of the successor's power, to have encroached either on civil or religious liberties, and which, at that time, might, if proposed from the King, have been probably accepted; but whether his Majesty inclined to keep it in reserve, as a thing that might help in extremity, or whether the Duke was secretly against it, so it was, that this expedient was laid aside till the Exclusion Bill was set on foot, and then the season was past, no limitations were regarded as satisfactory, or even as practicable (f). This too his Lordship foretold at the time he offered this expedient, the rejecting which was fatal to the Duke, though at that time he judged otherwise. The King consulted him after this, and seemed uneasy at his design of returning to Ireland, being willing to have bestowed any employment to have kept him near his person; and a certain author tells us, he was thought of even for Lord Treasurer (g); but the Earl of Orrery told his Majesty plainly, that he was conducted by unsteady counsels, with which he could not act, and at the same time took the liberty to censure a custom the King had, of being in the streets in the night without guards or attendants (h). This shews how well he always stood with his master, and how much he deserved it. On his going back to Ireland, he resolved on leading a retired and quiet life, dividing his time between his houses at Charleville and Castle-Martyr, encouraging manufactures, and giving, as they needed it, protection and assistance to his tenants (i). But being attacked more cruelly than ever by the gout, his Physicians advised him to go over to England for advice, and he did accordingly in May 1675, but did not stay long. This, as himself foresaw and foretold, was his last voyage, and on his going home he sat down to his studies, that since he could be no longer useful in an active state, he might at least contribute his good wishes and advice, to his Sovereign and fellow-subjects (k). Yet even in this declining condition, he failed not to repair, in July 1678, to Kinsale, in order to rectify some mistakes made in the fort which was erecting there, and took also no small pains to enquire after, and obtain the best intelligence possible, of the cabals of the Irish Papists, for which (as one says) he was qualified by a natural sagacity (l), transmitting all he could discover to the Duke of Ormond, now once again Lord-Lieutenant, and to whom he was cordially reconciled. This seems to have been the last effort of publick spirit, the dying blaze of that virtue, which had so long

(b) See the Preface to the Earl of Orrery's Letters, p. vi.

(c) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, c. vi.

(d) See this explained in the note [Q].

(e) Remarkable Events under the Reign of Charles II. p. 371.

(f) Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. vi.

(g) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 391.

(h) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, c. vi.

(i) Lawrence's Interest of Ireland, Part. iii. p. 189.

(k) See what he says to this purpose, in his Dedication of the Art of War to his Majesty King Charles II.

(l) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 496.

if their former friendship had subsisted, without suffering any interruption (52).

[Q] By some who were far enough from pursuing the same conduct. The great point then laboured, was to reconcile his Lordship to the French alliance, and the reducing of the Dutch; neither of which were at all agreeable to his notions, and therefore that he might the more freely express the mischievous consequences which he apprehended from these measures, he digested his thoughts into a poem, of which we shall have occasion to speak hereafter; and this was very well received by the King, who hoped to make some impression upon his Lordship in his turn, in a long audience that he gave him for that purpose; but the Earl's duty would not allow him to listen to the King's reasons, when he was sensible that those reasons, however specious, were contrary to his Majesty's own interest, and those of his subjects; and this led him to declare in plain terms, that he could never concur in councils, that were calculated, either to aggrandize France, which was already too great, or to break the power of the Dutch, which was barely sufficient for their own defence (53). It is not possible to distinguish exactly the time when this transaction happened, because the author from whom we have it, very seldom mentions dates.

But there is a particular circumstance mentioned by him, which must not be omitted here. As the Earl of Orrery came from this audience of his Majesty, he was met by the Earl of Danby, who was then only Sir Thomas Osborne, and asked whether he had closed with the King's proposals, to which Orrery answered No. Then, replied the other statesman, your Lordship may be the honestest man, but you will never be worth a groat. This passage is the more remarkable, because this statesman was, in opinion, as much against France as the Earl of Orrery, and temporized purely for the sake of power (54), which cost him afterwards, a long imprisonment, and very narrowly missed costing him his life. So dear do even the wisest men pay for sacrificing their principles to their interests.

(53) Love's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery.

(54) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. vi.

(52) Letter of Sir John Reresby to the Marquis of Halifax.

long, and so warmly agitated his mind; for in two months after, he was seized with that distemper which brought him to his end; this disease, though deadly, was not violent in its beginning, so that, as it put him in mind of mortality, it gave him leisure to contemplate, and to fit himself for so great a change, which, when he had done, and given the strongest proofs of Christian patience, manly courage, and rational fortitude, he breathed his last, October 16, 1679, in the fifty-ninth year of his age (m), as much regretted by all degrees of people, as any man of his time, which was far from being barren of great men, in all, or any of, the senses of the word. His character has been often given, and generally to his advantage. If we seek it impartially from facts, it will appear great and good. His wit was pregnant and yet solid; his blossoms fair, but not fairer than the fruit. He came early into life with much credit, and maintained it to the last, for even the sun-set of his active life was glorious. He was always loyal, and shewed it as often, as far, and as effectually, as he could, of which his master, who was most concerned, was fully satisfied (n). His compliance with Cromwell was from necessity at first, and afterwards from gratitude; but the services he rendered the Protector were no way prejudicial to the King, perhaps they might, at least we know they were intended to, be otherwise. His merit in the Restoration was as great as any man's, Monk's only excepted, but the settlement of Ireland, and securing the English and Protestant interest in that kingdom, is a merit cannot be denied him, indeed it was the principal crime charged upon him by his enemies, that is the Papists and Fanatics, who, like Samson's foxes, tugged tail to tail in his impeachment. He was a friend to the Earl of Clarendon (o), but not to a degree inconsistent with his duty; he was heartily loyal to the King, and had a sincere regard for the Duke, which hindered him from having any thing to do with the Exclusion (p). In a word, as a Statesman, he gave generally soft, but always safe, counsels; no body knew better how to steer in storms than he, but he was not the less afraid of them. As a soldier, he was very intrepid, and did so many things by courage, as might have drawn his prudence into doubt, if he had not done many more purely by his conduct. He was esteemed an excellent officer by those, who, in that trade, could not be misled in their judgments; and he has also left us a memorial of his skill in that profession, which will evince to every competent judge, that he had few superiors in the art of war during the time he flourished (q). As an author, his fame was equal to that of any man of his quality, in an age, when it was no uncommon thing for titles to adorn title-pages; and he was an author in many different ways, in some he certainly excelled, in others he might be deficient, but in none appeared flat or trivial. His faults were the faults of the times, his beauties were his own, and such as shew him to have had a great genius. His writings will be more particularly taken notice of at the bottom of the page [R]. His private life was altogether as regular

(m) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, c. vi.

(n) See this justified in note [L].

(o) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 384.

(p) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. vi.

(q) See this farther explained, in the account given of his Works in note [R].

[R] His writings will be more particularly taken notice of, at the bottom of the page.] It is a very difficult task to give a full, distinct, and accurate account of this noble and learned person's writings; nor is the difficulty at all lessened by the many accounts already given, most of them being very erroneous, and all of them inconsistent with each other. The best is that of Walter Harris, Esq (55); which I shall make use of, with some additions and remarks, in order to render it agreeable to the design of this work; and, as far as it is possible, at this distance of time, to do justice to the performances, and thereby right to the memory of so excellent a Person. His works then, according to the best lights we could obtain, are these. I. The Irish colours display'd; in a reply of an English Protestant to a letter of an Irish Roman Catholic. London, 1662, 4to. This was written in answer to a piece penned by Peter Walsh, and addressed to the Duke of Ormond, to whom the same person likewise addressed a reply to this treatise, called, The Irish colours unfolded. This piece I have never seen, but from its subject, being written against Father Walsh, and printed in the same size and year, I fancy differs not much from the next. II. An answer to a scandalous letter lately printed, and subscribed by Peter Walsh, Procurator for the secular and regular Popish priests of Ireland, entitled, A letter desiring a just and merciful regard of the Roman Catholics of Ireland; given about the end of October, 1660, to the then Marquis, now Duke, of Ormond, and the second time Lord Lieutenant of that kingdom. By the Right Hon. the Earl of Orrery, &c. being a full discovery of the treachery of the Irish rebels, since the beginning of the Rebellion there, necessary to be considered by all adventurers, and other persons settled in that kingdom. Dublin, 1662, 4to. London, 1662, 4to. To this answer the letter itself is prefixed, which it answers for the information of the reader, and both have been reprinted at the close of the letters of the Earl of Orrery hereafter mentioned. One cannot part with this singular piece without observing, that if no other had ever fallen from his Lordship's pen, this alone might have procured him the character of an able Statesman, a great Lawyer, and a most correct and accurate Writer. I must next remark, that on perusing this admirable work, one may be tempted to suspect it is occasioned the story before reported, and refused, of his silencing the Popish deputies; for most of the facts mentioned in Mr Morrice's account of that affair, are actually set forth and urged in this treatise, in answer to the pretensions of the Irish Catholics. There was a reply also to this by Peter Walsh.

III. A Poem on his Majesty's happy Restoration (56). This we find mentioned by one of his Lordship's historians, it was presented by the Earl himself to the King; some copies were in those days handed about in MS. but we are told it was never printed, (which however I doubt) and yet we have no reason whatever assigned why it was not printed.

IV. A Poem on the death of the celebrated Mr Abraham Cowley. London, 1667, fol. It has been since prefixed by Dr Sprat, (Bishop of Rochester) to his edition of Cowley's works. Mr Budgell has also reprinted, and highly commended this Poem (57), as it justly deserves, there being none of the Poems sacred to the memory of that excellent person, which do him more honour.

V. The History of Henry V; a Tragedy. London, 1668, fol. I take this to have been the Earl of Orrery's first play, notwithstanding the contrary is expressly affirmed in the preface to the new edition of his Lordship's dramatick works (58), and the place given to the Black Prince, on the authority of a letter of his Lordship's to a friend, from which this passage is cited. 'I have now finished a play in the French manner, because I heard the King declare himself more in favour of their way of writing than ours: My poor attempt cannot please his Majesty, but my example may excite others who can; Sir William Davenant will have it acted about Easter. As it is wrote in a new way, he may possibly take confidence to invite the King to see it; which if his Majesty should condescend to, and if you at the same as his publick. He was very sincere in his religion, and that was the Church of England, but his conversation, did not, perhaps, recommend him to the zealots of any party. To the Prelates, and other well-beneficed churchmen, he talked of charity, forbearance, and moderation; but to the Dissenters he magnified Conformity, and the danger to which the Protestant cause was exposed, by their unmeaning feuds and divisions (r). He was a kind and good, as well as a very well-bred and courteous, husband, and Lady Orrery was esteemed one of the handsomest and most prudent women about the Court. He was a tender, and even a fond parent, but very attentive to the education and behaviour of his children, by which the benefit they received was not small. As a landlord,

(56) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. vi.

(57) Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 94.

(58) The Dramatick Works of the Right Honourable Roger Boyle, Earl of Orrery, Lond. 1739, two Vols. 8vo.

(r) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, c. vi.

he time should wait on him thither, I intreat you do not let him know who is the author of the play, unless you have double assurances that he does not dislike it. It is very evident this relates to his Lordship's first play, but nothing determines it to the Black Prince. I rather believe it refers to Henry V. 1. Because this play was to be perform'd by the Duke's company, whereas the Black Prince was first acted at the King's Theatre. 2. The vast respect paid to Henry V, by the royal Family, when acted at the King's Theatre. Mr Harris, who played Henry, having the Duke's Coronation suit; Owen Tudor, play'd by Betterton, (which gained him great reputation) wore the King's; and Mr Lilliston, to whom the part of Duke of Burgundy was given, wore the Earl of Oxford's (59). Why should all this be done, if Henry V. had been his Lordship's third play? 3. He had wrote two plays before the close of 1662, as appears by the King's letter and his Lordship's answer, one of which was to be very soon play'd (60; but this could not be the Black Prince, which was written during the first Dutch war, as will appear hereafter, from incontestible evidence.

VI. Mustapha, the son of Solyman, the Magnificent, a Tragedy. London, 1667, fol. and 1668. This seems to be the other play mentioned in the King's letter before-mentioned: It was very well received, and there are some very fine scenes in it, tho' it's being written in Rhime renders it unfashionable, and consequently unpleasing to us, at this time.

VII. The Black Prince, a Tragedy. London, 1672, fol. This, in the title-page of the new edition, is said to have been acted at the Duke of York's Theatre; but the actors names, as they are printed in that edition, shew this to be a mistake, and Langbaine says it was acted at the Theatre Royal (61), as undoubtedly it was. The prologue, by the Genius of England, alluding to the war with Holland and France, plainly proves it was acted in the winter of 1666, for the following spring; and we are also sure that it was written not long before, from a letter to his Lordship from the King his Master, in which notice is taken of this play as being unfinished, and of which his Majesty said pleasantly, If it was not to be completed, but in the Gout, (at which time his Lordship wrote most of his Poetry) he wish'd him a lussy fit of it (62).

VIII. Tryphon, a Tragedy. London, 1672. fol. The story is to be found in Josephus, and other historians, who have written of the affairs of the Jews; it is written, like the other plays, in heroic verse, and was acted with applause of the Duke's Theatre (63). There are very noble sentiments, and some very fine lines in it, which, however, will not atone with modern Critics, for the offences committed therein against the laws of dramattick Poetry. But as to such as have the history of the Earl of Orrery in their hands, and consider it purely as a piece of his writing, there will appear many things singular to a degree worthy notice, as well in the speeches of the several persons introduced therein, as in the general plan and disposition of the play. These four plays were collected and published together in folio, in 1690 (64), and make now the entire first volume of the new edition of the Earl's dramattick works.

IX. Paribenisfa, a romance in three volumes. London, 1665, 4to: 1677, fol. This romance is divided into six parts, the last written at her earnest desire, and therefore dedicated to her Royal Highness the Princess Henrietta Maria, Duchess of Orleans (65). Few performances of this kind, and certainly none in our language, have either deserved or received so much approbation; and tho' it has long been in a great measure thrown aside and forgot, yet, perhaps, this may be chiefly owing to it's remaining unfinished, a thing deservedly regretted by the lovers of that kind of writing. One may justly wonder, that a person of this Nobleman's rank and abilities, should turn his thoughts or employ his pen on such a subject. But it may perhaps contribute to lessen this surprize in an assiduous and intelligent reader, to suggest, that some things may be said in a romance, that might not find a place in true history, and that notwithstanding this sort of writing cannot well be defended, yet the severest critick on the perusal of Lord Orrery's romance, will confess it is very well worth reading.

X. A Dream (66). This poem and the time when it was written, have been before-mentioned. In it the genius of France is introduced, saying, every thing the French Minister could say to inveigle King Charles II. to endeavour at making himself arbitrary, or to deceive him into a mean and scandalous dependence on Lewis XIV; to all which the ghost of Charles I. is next brought in, giving clear and copious answers, fully proving, that the sole foundation of a Monarch's power, is the love and confidence of his people. The nature of this performance rendered it unfit for the eye of the publick, and the freedom with which it was penned, made it very improper to allow more than one copy to be taken, which was for the King himself. The original is long since destroy'd or lost. Upon this occasion two important and obvious remarks may be made; first, that his Lordship made no scruple of declaring fully and formally, against the political system of the Ministry, stiled the CABAL; secondly, that for various reasons, which here it would take up too much time to discuss, he chose to express his sentiments on the nicest and most important subjects, in the garb of poetry or fiction.

XI. The Art of War. London, 1677. fol. This work which with much elegance, good sense, and in an admirable stile, he addresses to the King, in a large dedication, was but the first part of what he intended upon the subject, and was so strangely received, that the second never appeared. Yet it may be justly affirmed, nothing in our own, or perhaps in any other, language, was ever better, more judiciously, or more correctly, written. In this all the qualifications of it's noble author appear to advantage, except his turn for poetry, he shews himself a Soldier, a Statesman, a Scholar, and in none of these a Pedant. All he says is not only sensible, but just, and gives pleasure to every man of sense, as well as satisfaction to the most understanding men of the trade, who all agree, that his experience is as conspicuous therein, as either his genius or his learning. But perhaps the historical instances, remarks; and political reflections, are not the least valuable parts of this performance, and the notions of our noble author, as to the superiority of the power of France; when oppos'd to that of a confederacy, will appear to a judicious peruser, such a proof of political foresight; as cannot but recommend such parts of the treatise, as he is less capable of entering into with the same exactness.

XII. Poems on the Fasts and Festivals of the Church. This, tho' printed and publish'd, was never finished by it's noble author. It was written in the last year of his life, under much weakness of body, and therefore Budgell's remark (67), that his poetry in this composition runs low, ought not deeply to affect his reputation, which in all situations; and under all disadvantages, stands much above the level of such criticks. Poetry unrevised will generally appear to run low, and there are subjects too, so very opposite to some mens way of thinking, that they will always have such a bias against what is written on them, as will discover them to be no very impartial judges. Upon the whole, we may affirm the subject is well chosen, and some parts of it well executed; but after all, we shall not deny, it would have been better to have suppress'd it.

(66) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. vi.

(59) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 89.

(60) See his Majesty's Letter in note [1].

(61) Account of English Dramattick Poets, p. 27.

(62) Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, chap. vi.

(63) Langbaine's Account of English Dramattick Poets, p. 28.

(64) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. fol. 639.

(65) This Dedication pleased Mr Budgell so well, that he has inserted it entire in his Memoirs of the Boyles, p. 99.

(67) Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 106.

The

he was both attentive to his own interest, and indulgent to his tenants. If a man was oppressed, no one more readily relieved him; if a farmer's family was numerous, or his circumstances narrow, his assistance was never wanting, but he was in all cases solicitous, that the people should thrive as well as obtain subsistence, and his saying was, That the greatest charity consisted in keeping people from needing it. With this view he procured, by the royal favour, grants of fairs and markets for Rathgogran and Ballymaathra, two villages of his, which, by this means, were so far improved, that he afterwards obtained charters, by which they were erected into boroughs, each sending two members to the Irish Parliament (s), and established, besides, manufactures in them for their better support. But in nothing his goodness and beneficence of heart appeared more, than in his treatment of his domesticks. He was alike careful of their bodies, estates, and minds; they lived in the utmost plenty, but he suffered no waste; and for debauchery, he had the utmost abhorrence. He provided for them according to their several capacities, that having lived well with him, they might not fall into indigence after they left him (t). He frequently observed, that the meanest of them had a soul to be saved as well as himself, and therefore, he not only obliged his Chaplain to have a due attention to their spiritual concerns, but frequently inspected the discharge of his duty in this particular (u). His Lordship loved company, and kept always an open table, to which all the gentlemen in the country were welcome, and this was a publick benefit, the conversation on such occasions being as delicate as the provisions (w). But it would carry us into too great a length, if we should pursue any farther this account of his Lordship's private life, and therefore we shall stop here, and subjoin an account of his posterity, as the proper conclusion of this article. This noble Earl, married, as we before observed, the Lady Margaret Howard, daughter to Theophilus Earl of Suffolk, highly commended for unaffected piety, love to her Lord, and sweetness of temper (x). He had issue by her two sons, Roger, the second Earl of Orrery; and Henry; and five daughters. Lady Elizabeth, married to Foliot Wingfield, Lord Viscount Powerscourt, who died in 1709 without issue. Lady Anne died young. Lady Margaret, married to William O'Brien, Earl of Inchiquin, Governor of Jamaica. Lady Catherine, wife of William Bret of the county of Somerset, Esq; and deceasing in the twenty-eighth year of her age, on the third of September 1681, lies buried at Richmond in Surry. Lady Barbara, married to Arthur Chichester Earl of Donegal, but died before him without issue (y). Henry Boyle, the youngest son of the Earl, was Lieutenant-Colonel of the Duke of Schomberg's regiment, and died in Flanders in the year 1691, leaving issue by the Lady Mary his wife, daughter to Murrough Earl of Inchiquin, four sons. 1. Roger, who died in 1705 unmarried. 2. Henry, seated at Castle-Martyr in the Kingdom of Ireland, who married the Lady Henrietta, daughter to Charles Earl of Burlington, and sister to the late Earl, some time Speaker of the House of Commons in Ireland, and one of the Lords-Justices, and Chancellor of the Exchequer in that Kingdom. He hath issue by his Lady, five sons and three daughters. Richard, Henry, William, Charles, Robert, Juliana, Henrietta, and Jane (z). 3. Charles, who was Captain of the ship Strombulo. And 4. William, who was Captain in Duke Schomberg's regiment of horse, and married the only daughter of the celebrated Sir Samuel Garth; as also two daughters; Elizabeth, married in 1709, to Bettridge Badham of the county of Cork, Esq; and Margaret, married to Joseph Dean, of the county of Meath in Ireland, Esq; Roger, the second Earl of Orrery, was of a very serious and contemplative disposition; one who loved retirement, and never inclined to enter into any of the scenes of busy life. He married the Lady Mary, daughter of Richard Earl of Dorset, by whom he had issue two sons, Lionel and Charles, and one daughter, Lady Mary, who was married to Clotworthy Upton, Esq; and died without issue (a).

(s) Collin's Peerage, Vol. IV. p. 257.

(t) Love's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery.

(u) Essay on Heroick Virtue, by R. B.

(w) Morrice's Memoirs of the Earl of Orrery, c. vi.

(x) It was upon this marriage (besides an express epithalamium) that Sir John Suckling wrote his elegant ballad, I'll tell thee, Dick, where I have been.

(y) Collin's Peerage, Vol. IV. p. 258.

(z) According to a private Letter from Ireland.

(a) Collin's Peerage, ubi supra.

The posthumous works of the Earl of Orrery are these that follow, viz. 1. Mr Anthony, a Comedy. London, 1692, 4to. which is not inserted in the last edition of his works. 2. Guzman, a Comedy. London, 1693, 4to. upon a Spanish plot, and written in the Spanish manner. 3. Herod the Great, a Tragedy. London, 1694, 4to. 4. Altemira, a Tragedy, brought upon the stage by Mr Francis Manning, in 1702, dedicated to Lionel, Earl of Orrery, grandson to the author, with a prologue by Henry St John, Esq; afterwards Lord Viscount Bolingbroke; and an epilogue by the Hon. Charles Boyle, Esq; the late Earl of Orrery, who also interspersed several songs in the work itself. We may add to these, his State Letters (68), which have been lately published in one volume in folio, and which do at least as much honour to his Lordship's memory, as any of his other writings. It is much to be regretted, that we have not more of these letters, for those that are published come no lower than his quarrel with the Duke of Ormond, and we may regret this the more, because in 1677, when that Duke was to hold a Parliament in Ireland, the King gave him orders to consult the Earl of Orrery, upon the points proper to be proposed therein, who gave his opinion very readily in five sheets of paper; wherein he proposed the most effectual methods to secure the nation from foreign and domestick enemies, increase his Majesty's revenue, confirm and settle claims to private property, and advance and protect the Protestant interest in that Island (69). These propositions were so well received, and so thoroughly approved, that both the Lord-Lieutenant and the Lord-Chancellor, wrote him letters full of acknowledgments upon the occasion. But with the rest of his Lordship's papers of all kinds, these perished in the flames when his house at Charleville was burnt to the ground, in the year 1690, by a party of King James's soldiers, with the Duke of Berwick at their head. Lionel, then Earl of Orrery, and grandson to our author, being a Minor, and abroad on his travels (70).

(68) London, Printed by James Bettenham, and sold by Charles Hitch, 1742.

(69) Translation of Sir James Ware's Works, Vol. III, p. 176.

(70) See the Preface to Lord Orrery's Letters.

in his honours by his brother Charles Boyle, Esq; who, after he became Earl of Orrery, married the Lady Elizabeth Cecil, daughter to John Earl of Exeter (b), by whom he had his only son John, now Earl of Orrery, who married, first, the Lady Harriot Hamilton, daughter to George Earl of Orkney, by whom he has two sons and a daughter; and after her decease, which happened August 22, 1732; his Lordship married his present Countess, Margaret, daughter of John Hamilton, Esq; of Caledon, in the county of Tyrone in the kingdom of Ireland, by whom he has also issue (c).

(b) See the article BOYLE (CHARLES) Earl of Orrery.

(c) Collins's Peerage, ubi supra.

(71) In a poem to his Lordship printed in Sir W. D'avenant's Works, p. 275. (72) In his elegant Dedication of his Play called the Rival La-

After so large an account of this noble person's performances as an author, it may not be amiss to add, that he was very much distinguished as a patron of learning, as appears by the compliments paid him by Sir William D'avenant (71), Mr John Dryden (72), and other wits of those times, who thought themselves highly honoured in being permitted to shelter their writings under his lordship's protection, whose credit stood equally fair with the political and learned world; and whose title to parts of every kind, was never question'd, even by envy herself (73).

(73) Langbain's Account of English Dramatic Poets, p. 28.

BOYLE (ROBERT) a man superior to titles, and almost to praise; illustrious by birth, by learning, and by virtue; but most so as the author and encourager of the New Philosophy; by which he has not only rendered his memory immortal, but has also derived honour to his country, which, perhaps, is the greatest felicity that human abilities can ever attain. He was the seventh son, and the fourteenth child, of Richard Earl of Cork (a), consequently the youngest brother of the two noble persons last mentioned. He was born at Lismore in the county of Cork, and province of Munster in the kingdom of Ireland, on the twenty-fifth of February, 1626-7 (b), and though he was the only one of his father's sons who attained to manhood without being honoured with a title, and also the only one that did not distinguish himself in publick business; yet his life deserves to be written with the utmost accuracy, and no pains can be too great, to fix all the dates therein as exactly as it is possible [A]. His father, who was very justly stiled the Great, and might with equal propriety have been called the Wise, Earl of Cork, committed him to the care of a country nurse, with instructions to bring him up as hardy as if he had been her own son, which she pursued, and thereby gave him a strong and vigorous constitution, that he afterwards lost, by being treated with too great tenderness (c). When he was about three years old he had the misfortune to lose his mother, for which he shews great regret, in some memoirs that he has left us of the more early part of his life, esteeming it a singular unhappiness, never to have seen one of his parents so as to remember her, and the more so, from the character he heard of her in his own family, and from all who knew her (d). Another accident happened to him while at nurse, which gave him no small trouble as long as he lived, and that was, his learning to stutter, by mocking some children of his own age, and of which, though no endeavours were spared, he could never be perfectly cured (e). His father sent for him home when he was towards seven years old, and not long after, in a journey to Dublin, he ran a very great risk of losing his life, if one of his father's gentlemen had not taken him out of a coach, that in passing a brook, raised by some sudden showers, was carried away by the stream and beat to pieces (f). While at home he was taught to write a very fair hand, and to speak French and Latin, by one of the Earl's Chaplains, and a Frenchman that he kept

(a) Earl of Cork's True Remembrance.

(b) Memoirs of the Hon. Robert Boyle, by J. C. MS. Wood's Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 163. Sir James Ware's Works, Vol. III. p. 180.

(c) His own Account of the earlier part of his life, under the name of Philareus, published by Dr Birch.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Memoirs of the Hon. R. B.

(f) His own Memoirs before cited.

[A] To fix all the dates therein as exactly as it is possible. The honour of having produced worthy and famous men, has been always dear to every wise nation; and it may be truly said, that there are few persons the nature or extent of whose reputation, would incline a prudent or virtuous people to pride themselves more on having him for their countryman, than the distinguished Philosopher to whom this article belongs: yet so it is, that some voluminous Collections of Lives, as for instance, Collier's great Dictionary, have not mentioned him at all; and in others there are such strange mistakes, that one knows not how to overlook or excuse them. It is said by several authors, who in this, no doubt, have one copied the other, that he was sent from school to the University of Leyden, in Holland (1); and yet, as the reader will see in the text, this could not be true, for if it had, Mr Boyle, who wrote very particular memoirs of the first fifteen years of his life, would never have omitted this circumstance; and indeed those very memoirs plainly shew, that the fact is absolutely false, and that he was so far from studying at Leyden in his youth, that he never went thither at all (2). It has been a common observation, that the real adventures of some great men, have been in themselves more strange and surprising, than the boldest writers have dared to feign, who wrote with any view of being believed. It may not only be affirmed, but proved, with respect to Mr Boyle, that the declamations in his honour, and the characters written to give the world a high idea of his merit, have actually fallen short of the naked truth, and cannot raise such an admiration in the mind of a judicious reader, as the bear recital of matters of fact. Bishop Burnet says (3), he began early to shew both a probity and capacity that promised great things. But this word early conveys no distinct idea, and not one reader in twenty will so much as suspect, that it ought to refer to the eighth or ninth year of his age; may it is very probable, the learned prelate himself might scarce apprehend that it reached so high, which however will very clearly appear from what is related in the text, and is farther explained in the subsequent note. To say the truth, the early part of Mr Boyle's life may be stiled the most remarkable, for although in his subsequent years he distinguished himself in a very extraordinary degree; yet the best judges of, and those who have look'd most closely into, human nature, cannot but allow that his early application to learning, and to those parts of learning to which he addicted himself, is still more surprising, and what would appear altogether incredible, if we had not as strong, as clear, and authentick proofs as the most severe critics can demand in reference to facts of this nature (4). The pains therefore that we have taken to digest into a regular series of time these kind of facts, and the amexing such explanations as are requisite, as well as the proofs that become necessary, will, we hope, be considered as useful and entertaining, as well as new and curious improvements upon this subject, which, though so often handled, and so much beaten, can hardly ever be exhausted.

(3) Sermon at the Funeral of the Hon. Robert Boyle, Lond. 1692, 4to; p. 24.

(4) See the Original Letters hereafter cited.

(1) See the article of BOYLE (ROBERT) in the General Dictionary, Vol. III. p. 541. Budge's Memoirs of the Boyles, p. 118. Sir James Ware's Works, Vol. III. p. 180.

(2) See Mr Boyle's own Memoirs prefixed to those of Dr Birch, and which are equally copious and curious.

(g) Ibid.

kept in the house (g). In the year 1635, when he was turned of eight years old, his father thought fit to fend him to England, in order to his education at Eaton, under Sir Henry Wotton, the Earl of Cork's old acquaintance and friend. With this view, in company with Mr Francis Boyle, his elder brother, afterwards Lord Shannon, he set out for Youghall, and from thence, not without great danger of being taken by some of the Turkish pirates that then infested the Irish coast, he crossed the seas to England, and landed happily at Bristol (h). On his arrival at Eaton, he was put under the care of Mr Harrison, then Master of the school, of whose attention for, and kindness towards him, he makes very honourable mention in his Memoirs, and observes, that it was chiefly by the prudent methods he pursued, that he came to have that taste and relish for learning, for which, even in the earlier part of his life, he grew so remarkable (i) [B]. While he remained at Eaton, there were several extraordinary accidents that befel him, of which he has given us an account, and which one would scarce think it possible he should have remembered so distinctly, considering they happened before he was nine years old, if the letters that he wrote about that time were not still preserved, which sufficiently demonstrate, how capable he was of collecting and preserving whatever appeared to him worthy of notice, even in the time of his childhood; so that we may well believe what he relates of his own care in this respect, from the testimonies that still remain, of his having a wit so much superior to his years (k) [C]. He remained at Eaton, in the whole, between three and four years, and then his father carried him to his own seat at Stalbridge in Dorsetshire, where he remained for some short time, under the care of Mr William Douch then Parson of the place, and one of the Earl of Cork's Chaplains (l). In the autumn of the year 1638, he attended his father to London, and remained with him at the Savoy, 'till his brother, Mr Francis Boyle, espoused Mrs Elizabeth Killigrew, and then, towards the end of the month of October, within four days after the marriage was celebrated, the two brothers, Francis and Robert, were sent abroad upon their travels, under the care of Mr Marcombes, who we have formerly mentioned as Governor to the Lords Kinealmeaky and Broghill (m). They embarked at Rye in Suffex, and from thence proceeded to Dieppe in Normandy, from whence they travelled by land to Rouen, so to Paris, and from thence to Lyons, from which city they continued their journey to Geneva, where his (h) Memoirs of the Hon. Robert Boyle, Strafford's Letters, Vol. I. p. 134, 138.

(i) His own Memoirs.

(k) The Life of the Hon. Mr Boyle, by the Rev. Mr Bolton, prefixed to the Abridgment of his Works.

(l) His own Memoirs.

(m) See the article of BOYLE (ROGER) Earl of Orrery.

[B] For which, even in the earlier part of his life, he became remarkable.] We cannot exactly say in what month Mr Boyle came to Eaton school; we know that it was some time in the year 1635, and when he was very little more than eight years of age (5), and though he came thither so soon, yet he did not come altogether uninstructed, for he not only wrote so as to be read, but a strong, fair, legible hand of the italic kind, and was tolerably acquainted with Latin (6): His diligence and application recommended him so much to Mr Harrison, that he was extremely kind to him, instructed him out of school hours in his own chamber, gave him true notions of the use and value of learning, considered as a thing respecting himself, as well as what was expected from him; but whether he recommended to him Quintus Curtius, whether it fell into Mr Boyle's hands by chance, or came to be taken up as a school-book, does not appear; yet this it seems was the author that struck him most, and the reading of which gave him such an appetite for learning, as his application thereto all his life after could never cloy. His own account of the matter is delivered in words that cannot be varied without changing the thought, and lessening the force of the expression. Speaking of himself, as he does throughout his memoirs in the third person, he treats this passage thus: In gratitude to this book I have heard him hyperbolically say, that he not only owed more to Quintus Curtius than Alexander did, but derived more advantage from the history of that great Monarch's conquests, than ever he did from the conquests themselves. There is certainly something in this book that operates strongly upon young minds; it is said the reading it made Charles the Twelfth of Sweden, a hero (7); and we have heard Mr Boyle himself confess, that he derived from it that passion for learning which made him a scholar.

[C] His having a wit so much superior to his age.] We have in his own memoirs, an account of several accidents that happened to him in this space of time, three of which were very near proving fatal to his life and hopes: The first was the sudden fall of the chamber where he lodged when himself was in bed; when, besides the hazard he ran of being crush'd to pieces, he had certainly been choaked with the dust, during the time he lay under the rubbish, if he had not had presence of mind enough to have wrapped up his head in the sheet, which gave him an opportunity of breathing without hazard. A little after this, he had been crush'd to pieces by a starting horse that rose up suddenly, and threw himself backwards, but Mr Boyle happily disengaged his feet from the stirrups, and cast himself from his back before he fell. A third accident befel him from the carelessness of an Apothecary's servant, who, by mistaking the phials, brought him a strong vomit instead of a cooling Julep. These, and many other circumstances of the like kind, he committed to memory first, and to writing afterwards. He made but few excursions from school, and those only to see his relations, such as his Sister Goring, at Lewes, in Suffex, and his Brother, the Lord Dungarvan, upon his coming to London: While he remained there he wrote the following letter (the original of which is before me) to his father, which will justify all that is said in the text.

My most honoured Lord Father,

HEARTILY praying for the continuance of God's favour to your Lordship still in soul and body, I humbly prostrate myself unto your honourable feet, to crave your blessing and pardon for my remissness, in presenting my illiterate lines unto your honourable kind acceptance. Whereas I have been heretofore cloy'd with our colledge exercise, I could not so often visit your Honour in writing; but now being by the ardent desire of our Brother, and the licence of Sir Harry Wotton, and our school-master, come to London, where we make four days residence, have found opportunity to offer unto your Honour that oblation due unto so good and so noble a Father, that is most humble duty, desiring your Honour to pardon him for his brevity, who strives to live after your Lordship's will and commandments.

London, decimo
4to Martii.

Truely and obediently,

ROBERT BOYLE.

Superscribed.

For my dear Lord Father, the Earl of Cork.

[D] Pursued

(5) Memoirs of the Hon. Robert Boyle.

(6) See his own Memoirs.

(7) Histoire de Suède, p. 597.

his Governor had a family, and there the two young gentlemen pursued their studies quietly and without interruption (n) [D]: Mr Boyle, during his stay here, resumed his acquaintance with the Mathematicks; or at least with the elements of that science; of which he had first obtained some knowledge at Eaton. He was now drawing towards fourteen, and his temper being naturally very grave and serious, his thoughts were often turned on religious subjects, but, however, not without some mixture of doubts and difficulties, as himself acknowledges, about the certainty of the Christian Revelation (o). This, instead of having any bad effects, was productive of very good consequences; he examined coolly and circumstantially the evidence in favour of the Gospel; and concluded, by dint of reasoning, that this was the only certain and sure way to salvation (p). We might possibly suspect the truth of this, considering his youth; and the little care that persons at such years take, or indeed are capable of taking, in matters of so great importance; but it so falls out, that we have an original letter of his written at this time to his father, which plainly proves that his capacity was; even at that early season, very capable of such arduous enquiries [E]. While he remained at Geneva, he made some excursions to visit the adjacent country of Savoy, and even proceeded so far as to Grenoble in Dauphiné, and took a view also of those wild mountains, where Bruno the first author of the Carthusian Monks lived in solitude, at the time he erected that order (q). In September 1641 he quitted Geneva, and passing through Switzerland and the country of the Grisons, entered Lombardy, and taking his rout through Bergamo, Brescia, and Verona, arrived at Venice, and having made a short stay there, returned to the Continent, and spent the winter at Florence, and during his stay in that city, the famous Galileo died at a village not far from thence (r). While he resided in this fair city, he had an opportunity of acquiring the Italian language, which he understood perfectly, though he never spoke it so fluently as the French, of which he became so great a master, that as occasion re-

(n) His own Memoirs.

(o) Id. ibid.

(p) See Burnet's Sermon at the funeral of Mr Boyle. Bolton's Life of Boyle.

(q) His own Memoirs.

(r) See the Life of Galileo Galileo, by Mr Salisbury prefixed to his Mathematical Collections.

quired,

(8) Memoirs of the Hon. Robert Boyle.

[D] Pursued their studies quietly, and without interruption. He informs us in his own memoirs, that while he was at Eaton, and was afflicted with an ague before he was ten years old, it was thought necessary to interrupt his studies, and to allow him to divert himself with any kind of writing that pleased him most, and as this happened to be romances, it brought upon him such a distraction (8) of thought, and so great an unsettledness of mind, that when he recover'd his health, he found it very difficult to fix his attention to any thing: All this we must allow has nothing in it strange or uncommon; but that a youth, or rather a child, at his age, should seriously seek a remedy for such an evil, and make choice of the extraction of the square and cube roots, and the solution of algebraical equations for that remedy, is certainly very extraordinary. It was this that gave him the first taste of mathematical science, which he improved at Geneva under the care of Mr Marcombes, who not only taught him the Theory of Geometry, but the Application of it also; for there was this singularity in Mr Boyle's temper, that as soon as he became acquainted with any science, he was for applying it to some use, and therefore the practical parts of Trigonometry delighted him much, and Fortification, instead of being considered as a study, appeared to him as the pleafantest amusement in the world; Geography was to him no more than travelling upon paper; Astronomy a voyage to the Heavens; and so of other things that commonly appear labours to others, he conceived in such a manner, that they appeared desirable to him. In these notions he was led on and sustained by his governor, who appears to have had great parts as well as prudence, and to have understood the art of educating youth, by making them conceive education their own business, which Mr Boyle did to such a degree, that both here and at Eaton his assiduity required rather a curb than a spur, and his preceptors were obliged to take more pains to abate the spirit with which he pursued learning, than they usually did to excite it in others. This he tells with great simplicity, and if he had not told us, we must have learned it from his letters and his books.

[E] Very capable of such arduous enquiries. In order to shew with how much strength of judgment he might enter into the deepest disputes of religion, we shall exhibit another original letter of his, written to his Father at this time, with an exactness and correctness hardly to be expressed; and yet, as some circumstances therein plainly shew, without the privacy, and consequently without the assistance, of his governor. The sentiments and language of this letter sufficiently demonstrate, that though the author was but in his fifteenth year, he had a general notion of the affairs of Christendom, otherwise he could not have wrote of them so clearly, and yet so succinctly as he does: but let us come to the letter itself.

My most honoured Lord and Father,

AS your Lordship's long silence hath extremely afflicted us, to the receipt of your Lordship's letters, dated the 25th of June, hath infinitely rejoiced us; for by them we are not only assured of your Lordship's health, (for the continuation whereof I pray God day and night) but also of the leave which we have so much desired to go into Italy the first of September. I wonder that Mr Killigrew should tell your Lordship, that we wore our old cloaths, and had no money in our pockets when he was here; for I assure your Lordship, that since we came to Geneva, we have been very far from wanting either the first or the last, and that Mr Marcombes hath too great a care of us to let us want the least thing that is necessary, either for our bodies or minds: we are in his house in perfect health (thanked be God) and grow great proficient in the Mathematicks, which is a study so pleasing and profitable, that when one hath once tasted the sweetness of it, it is almost impossible not to take delight therein, and by consequence not to ply it hard. The news here are, that the Count de Soissons forces, and one of the King of France's armies having met near Sedan, the King's army was beaten, and the Count de Soissons killed. They say also, that Piccolomini hath been shrewdly beaten in Germany, and that the King of France's affairs go very well in Catalonia, the Archbishop of Bourdeaux having beaten the Spanish fleet, and Tarragone being taken by one of the King's generals. Having no other news worthy the writing to your Lordship, I end my letter with them, beseeching you to believe that I lose no time here, and that in plying hard my studies and exercises, I will shew the ardent desire I have to be justly esteemed,

My Lord,

From Geneva, the 20th July, 1646.

Your most dutiful and obedient Son, and humble servant,
ROBERT BOYLE.

Superfcribed. For my most honoured Father, the Earl of Cork, at his lodgings at Court.

[F] With

- quired, he passed for a native of that country in more places than one during his travels (s). About the end of March he began his journey from Florence to Rome, which took up but five days, and after having surveyed that famous city, the heats disagreeing with his brother, he returned to Florence, from thence he went to Leghorn, and so by sea to Genoa (t). He made but a short stay there, and then passing through the county of Nice, crossed the sea to Antibes, from whence he went to Marseilles by land. He was in that city in the month of May 1642, when he received his father's letters, with a dreadful account of the rebellion just then broke out in Ireland, and advice likewise, that with great difficulty his Lordship had procured two hundred and fifty pounds, which he remitted his sons to enable them to return home, but of this money they never saw a farthing, for being put into the hands of one Perkins (u), a considerable trader in the city of London, he proved unfaithful to his trust, which drove these two noble youths to the utmost distress, till, with much ado, their Governor, Mr Marcombes, supplied them with as much as brought them to Geneva, where they continued with him for some time, and having neither supplies nor advices from England, he was obliged, in order to enable them to go home, to take up some jewels on his own credit, which they disposed of with as little loss as might be, and with the money thus produced, continued their journey for England, where they arrived in the year 1644 (w). On his arrival there he found his father dead, and though he had made an ample provision for him, as well by leaving him his manour of Stalbridge in England, as other considerable estates in Ireland, yet it was some time before he could receive any money (x). During this space he lodged with his sister, the Lady Ranelagh, and by her interest, and that of his brother Lord Broghill, he procured protections for his estates in England and Ireland, from those who had the power then in their hands (y). He also obtained their leave to go over for a short space into France, probably that he might have an opportunity of settling his accounts, with his old Governor and constant friend Mr Marcombes (z); but he did not stay long abroad, since we find him the December following at Cambridge. In the month of March, 1646, he retired to his own seat at Stalbridge, from whence he made various excursions, sometimes to London, sometimes to Oxford, applying himself as assiduously to his studies, as his own circumstances, or those of the times, would permit (a); and indeed it is very amazing to find, what a prodigious progress he made, not only in many branches of literature, but in some that have been always held the most difficult and abstruse. He omitted no opportunity, of obtaining the acquaintance of persons distinguished for parts and learning, to whom he was in every respect, a ready, useful, and generous assistant, and with whom he maintained a constant correspondence (b) [F]. He was also one of the first members of that small, but learned body, which held its first meetings at London, then removed to Oxford, styled by him, the Invisible, by themselves, the Philosophical College, and which, after the Restoration, were incorporated and distinguished, as they well deserved, by the title of the Royal Society (c).
It

[F] With whom he held a constant correspondence.
Of these persons who entered so early into an intimate acquaintance with Mr Boyle, and for whom he preferred his friendship as long as he and they lived, we shall mention a few. Mr Francis Tallents (who was afterwards so well known, and so much respected in the world, for that laborious performance which he published under the title of Chronological Tables, (9) which was the work of years) had been, while he was under-graduate, sub-tutor to several sons of the Earl of Suffolk, (one of whose daughters was married to Lord Broghill) being removed from Peter-house to Magdalen-college for that purpose, and about the year 1642 travelled abroad with them as their tutor. After his return, he became senior Fellow and President, or Vice-master, of his College, and having spent near twenty years in the University, was settled at Saint Mary's in Shrewsbury, where he was ejected for non-conformity in 1662. In the year 1670 he went a second time as tutor to two young gentlemen, Mr Boscawen and Mr Hamden. In the last part of his life he was pastor to a congregation of Protestant Dissenters at Shrewsbury, where he died April 11, 1708, in the 80th year of his age. Mr Samuel Hardlib (10) was another acquaintance of Mr Boyle's one for whom he had a great regard, and to whom he afforded considerable assistance. He was born in Prussia or in Poland, it is not easy to know which, for his father resided many years in both countries: he came over to England in 1630, and distinguished himself by many learned and useful writings, which gained him the friendship and esteem of some of the greatest men that age produced, which was so prolifick in great men; but among them there was none that either expressed a greater value for his useful qualities, or gave higher testimonies of the sincerity of his affection than Mr Boyle; and from hence arose that close and intimate correspondence, which, as it gave the greatest pleasure to them while it continued, so the publication of their letters will do honour to their memories, and be of service to the publick, as long as a true spirit of learning, and a just respect for Mr Boyle's writings, shall subsist. He was likewise very kind to Mr John Dury (11), a very worthy, well-meaning person, who spent many years, and took much pains in the prosecution of a design, which, however commendable, proved but very chimerical, which was the reconciliaton of the Lutherans and Calvinists. He was also very intimate with Dr William Petty, Mr John Beale, and many other persons distinguished by their genius and love for learning, before he had attained the age of twenty (12). It is also farther remarkable, that as he was always communicative in point of knowledge, to such as stood on a level with him in respect of fortune; so in regard to those who had no large stock of any thing but merit, he was not only civil and kind in his expressions, but useful and beneficent to them in every other respect; so that he fully justified what a great man who knew him very well said of him at this time, viz. That in his youth he had not only the proficiency, but the prudence of a man in years, and that at a time when others of his age thought of nothing but pursuing their pleasures, he made it his sole business to promote science, and delighted in nothing so much as in doing good. It was a great honour to Mr Boyle that this was said of him so early: but it was a much greater felicity, that it continued to be said of him for upwards of forty years afterwards, and that not by a few whom he obliged, or by such as hoped to be obliged, but by the world in general, and in the strongest terms by such as were acquainted with him best.

[G] Which

(s) Memoirs of the Hon. Robert Boyle.

(t) His own Memoirs.

(u) Id. Ibid.

(w) Memoirs of the honourable Robert Boyle.

(x) His own Memoirs.

(y) Memoirs of the Hon. Robert Boyle.

(z) This appears by a Letter of his to Lord Broghill, dated Aug. 25, 1645.

(a) Birch's Life of the Hon. Robert Boyle, p. 15.

(b) See the great Collection of his Letters in the fifth Volume of his Works, which are, however, but a part of what he left behind him.

(c) See this point discussed in Bishop Sprat's learned History of the Royal Society.

(9) Calamy's Life of Baxter, Vol. II. p. 548.

(10) See the article of HARTLIB (SAMUEL).

(11) See Worthington's Miscellanies, p. 249, 252.

(12) Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 21, 22, 23.

It is no small honour to this worthy person, that when he was so young a man, his merit and knowledge gained him admittance amongst persons, the most distinguished for the acuteness of their understandings and the singularity, as well as extent, of their science. We have an account of their first institution, written by the famous Dr Wallis, which deserves the reader's attention, and is therefore placed in the notes (d) [G]. The great diligence and application of Mr Boyle, was so much the more to be esteemed and commended, as at this time his health was very much disordered by frequent fits of the stone, a disease to which he was extremely subject, and to which his sedentary life, and close application to his studies, might possibly contribute (e). But notwithstanding this, and the frequent occasions he had to remove from place to place, sometimes on the score of business, at others to visit his many noble relations, yet he never suffered his thoughts to be disordered, or the designs he had formed to be broken or interrupted by any of these accidents, as appears by his having completed three regular and excellent pieces, before he had reached the age of twenty, viz. his Seraphick Love, his Essay on Mistaken Modesty, and the Swearer silenced, to which he afterwards gave the title that it now bears, of a Free Discourse against customary Swearing (f). Besides these, it plainly appears, as well from the writings he has published, as from many of his private letters, that he had made large collections upon other subjects, from some of which he afterwards drew distinct treatises (g). The retired course of life, which, for the sake of his health, from the bent of his temper, and from the nature of his designs, he took a pleasure to lead, could not hinder his reputation from rising to such a height, as made him taken notice of by some of the most eminent members of the Republick of Letters; so that in 1651, we find Dr Nathaniel Highmore, a very eminent Physician, dedicating to him his History of Generation, in which dedication he styles him both his patron and his friend (h). In 1652 he went over to Ireland, in order to visit and settle his estates in that kingdom, and there, if I am not mistaken, he met with a fall from his horse in a watery place, which gave him a very grievous fit of sickness (i). He returned from Ireland to England in August 1653, but was soon after obliged to return again into that kingdom, where he spent his time but very unpleasantly, and it would have been still more so, if it had not been for the acquaintance of Dr Petty, afterwards Sir William Petty, who was his intimate friend, and, as in it's proper place will appear, one of the greatest men of that, or indeed of any other age (k). In the summer of 1654 he returned to England, and put in execution a design he had formed when he was last in this kingdom, of settling at Oxford, as well for the sake of several of his ingenious friends who resided there, as for the many and extraordinary conveniencies which the place afforded, for the prosecution of his beloved studies in peace. He chose to live there in the house of Mr Crosse an Apothecary, rather than in a college, for the sake of his health, and because he had more room for making experiments (l). It was now that he found himself surrounded by a number of learned friends, who resorted thither chiefly for the same reasons that he had done, the Invisible College, as he called it, or Philosophical Society, being now transferred from London to Oxford (m) [H].

(d) It is published by Mr Hearne, in the Appendix to the Preface to Peter Laughton's Chronicle, p. clxi.

(e) Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 27.

(f) See these Pieces in the new Collection of Boyle's Works.

(g) This is evident from comparing these Treatises together.

(h) This Dedication is dated May 15, 1651, and the book was then admitted as very learned and curious.

(i) See his Preface to his Collection of Receipts in which this is related at large.

(k) See the article of PETTY (Sir WILLIAM).

(l) Boyle's Works, Vol. V. p. 629, 630. Papers formerly in the custody of Dr Wotton. See also Dr Wallis's Letter in the following note.

(m) This corrects Bishop Sprat's Account in his History of the Royal Society, p. 57, 58.

It

[G] Which deserves the reader's attention, and is therefore placed in the notes.] This letter was written by the famous Doctor Wallis to Doctor Thomas Smith, Fellow of Magdalen College, in Oxford, and with the rest of that great man's papers, fell into the hands of the indefatigable Mr Thomas Hearne, who has deserved so well of the publick, and whose memory has been so indifferently treated. In that letter Doctor Wallis gives an account of his own life, and therein is this remarkable passage (13). 'About the Year 1645, while I lived in London, at a time when by our civil wars academical studies were much interrupted in both our Universities, beside the conversation of divers eminent divines, as to matters theological, I had the opportunity of being acquainted with divers worthy persons inquisitive into Natural Philosophy, and other parts of humane learning; and particularly of what hath been called the New Philosophy, or Experimental Philosophy. We did by agreement divers of us meet weekly in London on a certain day, to treat and discourse of such affairs: of which number were Dr John Wilkins (afterwards Bishop of Chester), Dr Jonathan Goddard, Doctor George Ent, Doctor Glisson, Doctor Merret, (Doctors in Physick); Mr Sam. Foster, then Professor of Astronomy at Gresham College, Mr Theodore Hank, (a German of the Palatinate, and then resident in London, who, I think, gave the first occasion, and first suggested those meetings) and many others. These meetings we held sometimes at Doctor Goddard's lodgings, in Wood-street, (or some convenient place near) on occasion of his keeping an Operator in his house for grinding glasses for Telescopes and Microscopes, and sometimes at a convenient place in Cheapside, sometimes at Gresham College, or some place near adjoining. Our business was, precluding matters of theology and state affairs, to discourse and consider of philosophical enquiries, and such as related thereunto, as Physick; Anatomy, Geometry, Astronomy, Navigation, Statics, Magneticks, Chymicks, Mechanicks, and Natural Experiments, with the state of these studies as then cultivated at home and abroad: we there discoursed of the circulation of the blood, the valves in the veins, the venæ lactææ, the lymphatick vessels, the Copernican hypothesis, the nature of comets and new stars, the satellites of Jupiter, the oval shape (as it then appeared) of Saturn, the spots in the Sun, and it's turning on it's own axis, the inequalities and selenography of the Moon, the several phases of Venus and Mercury, the improvement of Telescopes; and grinding of glasses for that purpose, the weight of air, the possibility or impossibility of vacuities and nature's abhorrence thereof, the Torricellian experiment in quick-silver, the descent of heavy bodies, and the degrees of acceleration therein, and divers other things of like nature. Some of which were then but new discoveries, and others not so generally known and embraced as now they are, with other things appertaining to what hath been called the New Philosophy, which from the times of Galileo, at Florence, and Sir Francis Bacon, (Lord Verulam) in England, hath been much cultivated in Italy, France, Germany, and other parts abroad as well as with us in England.'

[H] Being now transferred from London to Oxford.] We have in the former note shewn (14), when, and how, these meetings were at first set on foot in London, and if the readers will consult the letters of Mr Boyle, interspersed through the large account of his life, prefixed to his Works, they will find undeniable evidence of the share he had in the institution of this

(14) See before, in note [G].

(13) E Col. Smithianis, Vol. XXII. p. 38.

It was during his residence here, that he invented the air-pump, which was perfected for him by the ingenious Mr Hooke in 1658 or 1659, by the help of which he made such experiments, as enabled him to discover and demonstrate several qualities of the air, by which he laid the foundations for a complete theory (n). He was not, however, satisfied with this, but laboured incessantly in collecting and digesting, chiefly from his own experiments, the materials requisite for this purpose. He declared against the Philosophy of Aristotle, as having in it more of words than things, promising much and performing little; in short, giving the inventions of men for indubitable proofs, instead of the results of such enquiries, as draw the knowledge of the works of nature from nature herself (o). He was so careful in, and so zealous for, the true method of learning by experiment, that though the Cartesian Philosophy made then a great noise in the world, yet he would never be persuaded to read the works of Des Cartes, for fear he should be amused and led away with a fair pretence of reasoning, and plausible accounts of things, grounded purely on conjecture (p). But Philosophy and enquiries into nature, though they engaged his attention deeply, did not occupy it entirely, since we find that he still continued to pursue his critical studies, in which he had the assistance of some as great men as have ever flourished in this kingdom, particularly Dr Edward Pococke, Mr Thomas Hyde, and Mr Samuel Clarke (q). He had also a strict intimacy with Dr Thomas Barlow, at that time Head-Keeper of the Bodleian Library, and afterwards Bishop of Lincoln, a man of various and extensive learning (r). He was likewise the patron of the very learned Dr John Pell, an eminent Mathematician (s); and the famous Dr John Wallis, who distinguished himself in that and other branches of learning, did him the honour to dedicate to him his excellent treatise on the Cycloid (t). In 1659, being acquainted with the circumstances of the learned Dr Robert Sanderfon, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln, he bestowed on him a stipend of fifty pounds a year, and that great man thankfully acknowledged the obligations he was under to so generous a patron, in a dedication of his Lectures, which were printed at Oxford the same year (u). After the Restoration, he was treated with great civility and respect by the King, and with much affection and esteem by his two great Ministers, the Lord-Treasurer Southampton, and the Lord-Chancellor Clarendon, by whom he was pressed to enter into Holy Orders, of which he had very serious thoughts, but at last thought fit to decline it, upon very just and disinterested motives (w) [I]. The same year he published two of his first pieces, one of which was printed at Oxford, and the other at London; the former was his New Experiments touching the Spring of the Air (x), which he addressed to his nephew the Lord Dungarvan, and this drew him into a controversy with Franciscus Linus, and the famous Mr Thomas Hobbes, whose objections he refuted with equal candour, clearness, and civility. The second was his Discourse on Seraphick Love (y), and both pieces were received with universal applause. The fame of his great learning and abilities extended itself, even at this time; beyond the bounds of our island, so that the Grand Duke of Tuscany, a Prince distinguished for learning, desired Mr (n) Life of Dr R. Hooke, by R. Waller, Esq; p. 3. Ward's Lives of the Professors of Gresham-college, p. 170.

(o) See Mr Boyle's observations on this purpose, in almost all his Philosophic Treatises.

(p) Boyle's Life, p. 33.

(q) Memoirs of the Hon. Robert Boyle.

(r) See his article in this Dictionary.

(s) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 461.

(t) The Latin title of this work is, De Cycloide, & corporibus inde genitis, and is in the Collection of his Works, published in 1699, in three Volumes, folio.

(u) See Walton's Life of Bishop Sanderfon, and Dr Barlow's Letter annexed.

(w) Burnet's Sermon at Boyle's Funeral.

(x) This work has borne three editions, viz. Oxford 1660, 8vo; Lond. 1662, 4to; with an Appendix, Lond. 1682, 4to.

(y) This, as we have shewed, was finished in 1648; it has run thro' many editions, and been translated into Latin.

this learned Society, though no mention is made of him in the passage we have cited from the writings of Dr Wallis; yet considering the distance of time between those transactions, and his relation of them, we may rather wonder that he remembered so many, than that amongst them a single name was omitted. Yet the same learned person, speaking of the removal of this Society, and the manner in which their assemblies were held at Oxford, fails not to mention Mr Boyle, as may be seen in the following passage (15). 'About the year 1648-9, some of our company being removed to Oxford, (first Dr Wilkins, then I, and soon after Dr Goddard) our company divided. Those in London continued to meet there as before, (and we with them when we had occasion to be there) and those of us at Oxford; with Dr Ward (since Bishop of Salisbury); Dr Ralph Bathurst (now President of Trinity-college in Oxford); Dr Petty (since Sir William Petty); Dr Willis (then an eminent Physician in Oxford); and divers others, continued such meetings in Oxford, and brought those studies into fashion there, meeting first at Dr Petty's lodgings (in an Apothecary's house); because of the convenience of inspecting drugs, and the like, as there was occasion; and after his remove to Ireland (though not so constantly) at the lodgings of Dr Wilkins (then Warden of Wadham-college); and after his removal to Trinity-college in Cambridge, at the lodgings of the Hon. Mr Robert Boyle, then resident for divers years in Oxford. Those meetings in London continued, and (after the King's return in 1660) were increased with the accession of divers worthy and honourable persons, and were afterwards incorporated by the name of the Royal Society, &c. and to continue to this day.'

[I] Upon very just and disinterested motives.] The great regard that the Earl of Clarendon had for the Church of England, was one great reason why he was so earnest, in persuading the Hon. Mr Boyle to enter into Holy Orders. His noble family, his distinguished learning, and, above all, his unblemished reputation, induced that great and good man to think, that any ecclesiastical preferments he might attain, would be so worthily discharged, as to do honour to the clergy, and service to the established Communion. All these arguments Mr Boyle considered with due attention, but to balance these he reflected, that in the situation of life he was in, whatever he wrote with respect to religion, would have so much the greater weight, as coming from a layman, from a person, who, in other respects, shewed himself free from all prejudice and prepossessions, concerned only to find out truth, and to stick close thereto wherever he found it: He considered likewise, that, in point of fortune and character, he needed no accessions, and indeed he never had any appetite for either. But a certain great Prelate (16) tells us, that what had the greatest weight in determining his judgment, was, the not feeling in himself any motion or tendency of mind, that he could safely esteem a call from the Holy Ghost, which, according to the form used in the Church of England, is affirmed by such as enter into Holy Orders. Now, whoever reflects upon either of these reasons, or takes them together under his consideration, cannot but discern, that what is asserted in the text is strictly true, and that it was impossible for any man to proceed in a matter of such weight and importance to himself and to the Church, more conscientiously, and with a quicker sense of justice and honour, than he did. To this we may add, that the last mentioned scruple evidently proves that there was nothing of enthusiasm in his disposition, and, consequently, this ought to give the greater weight, and afford the higher sanction, to all that he has written.

(16) Bishop Burnet, in his Sermon at the funeral of the Hon. Mr R. Boyle.

Mr Southwell, then Resident at Florence, to acquaint Mr Boyle with his desire of holding a correspondence with him (z). In 1661, he published his Physiological Essays and other Fraſts (a), which added greatly to the esteem, that all true lovers of learning had for his knowledge in things of this nature. Some time after, he sent abroad another curious and excellent work, intituled, The Sceptical Chymist (b), which was printed at Oxford; but several treatises that are mentioned in this and the former work, as being in great forwardness, and which the world very impatiently expected, were afterwards lost in the hurry of removing his effects at the time of the great fire. In 1662, a grant of the forfeited impropriations in the kingdom of Ireland, was obtained from the King in Mr Boyle's name, though without his knowledge, which did not hinder his interesting himself very warmly, for procuring the application of these impropriations, to the promoting true religion and learning (c). He interposed likewise, in favour of the corporation for propagating the Gospel in New England, and was very instrumental in obtaining a decree in the Court of Chancery, for restoring to that corporation an estate, which had been injuriously re-possessed by one Col. Bedingfield, a Papist, who had sold it to them for a valuable consideration (d). His activity in matters of this nature was so much the more honourable, as he was naturally inclined to, and, generally speaking, followed that inclination in leading a private and retired life. But whenever the cause of virtue, learning, or religion, required it, his interest and endeavours were never wanting, and, by the peculiar blessing of Providence, were seldom employed but with success. In 1663, the Royal Society being incorporated by King Charles II, by letters patent dated the twenty-second of April (e), Mr Boyle was appointed one of the Council, and as he might be justly reckoned amongst the founders of that learned body, so he continued one of its most useful and industrious members, during the whole course of his life [K]. In the month

(z) See Boyle's Works, Vol. V. p. 423, 404.

(a) At London in 4to. They were printed again, in 1669, 4to, with large additions, and translated into Latin.

(b) At Oxford, in 8vo. Again, at the same place, 1679, with considerable additions, in 8vo.

(c) Boyle's Life, p. 40.

(d) Baxter's Sermon at the Funeral of Henry Ashurst, Esq; p. 46.

(e) Sprat's Hist. of the Royal Society, p. 134.

[K] One of its most useful and industrious members during his whole life.] We have already mentioned the beginnings of this great Society, and now from the History of it written by the incomparable pen of Bishop Sprat, who, having first mentioned the occasional meetings at Oxford and at London, proceeds then to give us the following account of the manner in which this Society was reduced to that state in which we now behold it. 'These gentlemen (says he, meaning those who had formerly met for their mutual improvement in Philosophical (17) studies) finding the hearts of their countrymen enlarged by their joys, and fitted for any noble proposition, and meeting with the concurrence of many worthy men, who, to their immortal honour, had followed the King in his banishment, Mr Erskine, Sir Robert Moray, Sir Gilbert Talbot, &c. began now to imagine some greater thing, and to bring out experimental knowledge from the retreats in which it had long hid itself, to take its part in the triumphs of that universal Jubilee. And indeed, Philosophy did very well deserve that reward, having been always loyal in the worst of times. For though the King's enemies had gained all other advantages, though they had all the garriſons, and fleets, and ammunitions, and treasures, and armies, on their side, yet they could never, by all their victories, bring over the reason of men to their party. While they were thus ordering their platform, there came forth a treatise which very much hastened its contrivance, and that was, a proposal by Master Cowley of erecting a Philosophical college. The intent of it was, that in some places near London, there should liberal salaries be bestowed on a competent number of learned men, to whom should be committed the operations of natural experiments. This model was every way practicable, unless, perhaps, in two things, he did more consult the generosity of his own mind than of other mens, the one was, the largeness of the revenue with which he would have his college at first endowed; the other, that he imposed on his operators a second task of great pains, the education of youth. The last of these, is, indeed, a matter of great weight, the reformation of which ought to be seriously examined by prudent men. For it is an undeniable truth, which is commonly said, that there would be need of fewer laws, and less force, to govern men, if their minds were rightly informed and set straight while they were young and pliable. But, perhaps, this light is not so proper for experimenters to undergo, for it would not only devour too much of their time, but it would go near to make them a little more magisterial in Philosophy than became them, by being long accustomed to command the opinions, and direct the manners, of their scholars. And as to the other particular, the large estate which he required to the maintenance of his college, it is evident, that it is so difficult a thing to draw men in to be willing to divert an antient revenue, which has long run in another stream, or to contribute out of their own purses, to the supporting of any new design, while it shews nothing but promises and hopes, that in such cases, it were (it may be) more advisable to begin upon a small stock, and so to rise by degrees, than to profess great things at first, and to exact too much benevolence all in one lump together. However, it was not the excellent author's fault, that he thought better of the age than it did deserve. His purpose in it was like himself, full of honour and goodness, most of the other particulars of his draught the Royal Society is now putting in practice. Their purpose is, in short, to make faithful records of all the works of nature or art, which can come within their reach; that so the present age, and posterity, may be able to put a mark upon the errors which have been strengthened by long prescription; to restore the truths that have lain neglected; to push on those which are already known to more various uses; and to make the way more passable to what remains unrevealed. This is the compass of their design. And to accomplish this, they have endeavoured to separate knowledge of nature from colours of rhetoric, the devices of fancy, or the delightful deceit of fables. They have laboured to enlarge it, from being confined to the custody of a few, or from servitude to private interests. They have striven to preserve it from being overpressed by a confused heap of vain and useless particulars, or from being streightened, and bound too much up, by general doctrines. They have tried to put it into a condition of perpetual increasing, by settling an inviolable correspondence between the hand and the brain. They have studied to make it not only an enterprize of one season, or of some lucky opportunity, but a business of time; a steady, a lasting, a popular, an uninterrupted work. They have attempted to free it from the artifices, and humours, and passions, of sects; to render it an instrument whereby mankind may obtain a dominion over things, and not only over one another's judgments; and, lastly, they have begun to establish these reformations in Philosophy, not so much by any solemnity of laws, or ostentation of ceremonies, as by solid practice and examples, not by a glorious pomp of words, but by the silent, effectual, and unanswerable arguments of real productions. After a very large account of the qualifications of their Members, the manner of their enquiry, their weekly assemblies, their way of registering, and the communication and assistance they have received from persons of eminence both at home and abroad, he proceeds thus (18):

(18) Ibid p. 133.

(17) Hist. of the Royal Society, p. 58.

month of June 1663, he published his Considerations on the Usefulness of Experimental Natural Philosophy (f), which consisted of several Essays on useful and curious subjects, in which they are handled with great freedom, from a just zeal for truth, and for the common benefit of mankind, the points which he had always in view when he took his pen in hand. These pieces, thus published, were, as himself tells us, written on several occasions, to several persons, and at different times; but as, notwithstanding this, they had a mutual relation to each other, which made them fall very aptly under one common title, he took this method of sending them abroad, that the world in general might receive that satisfaction, which particular friends had testified on the perusal of them in writing.

(f) Printed at London in 8vo, and re-printed at the same place, in the same size, 1670. It was also translated into Latin.

(g) Printed at London in 8vo; at Oxford, 1663; in Latin; and again at London in 1675.

(h) See his Dedication to Lord Altham, of his father, the Lord Anglesey's, Memoirs of his Life.

(i) See Boyle's Works, Vol. V. p. 328.

(l) Printed at London in 8vo; re-printed in 1669, in the same size; translated into Latin, but never published.

(m) Printed at London in 8vo; re-printed there in 1683, in 4to.

These were followed by Experiments and Considerations upon Colours, to which was added, a Letter, containing Observations upon a Diamond that shines in the Dark (g), a Treatise full of curious and useful remarks, on the hitherto unexplained doctrine of light and colours; in which he shews great judgment, accuracy, and penetration, and may be said to have led the way to that mighty genius, who has since set that important point in the clearest and most convincing light possible. He likewise published this year, his Considerations on the Style of the Holy Scriptures (h), which was extracted from a much larger work, intitled, An Essay on Scripture, that was afterwards published by P. P. A. G. F. I. that is, Peter Pett, Attorney-General for Ireland, afterwards Sir Peter Pett, a man of great reading, a voluminous writer, but of an unfetted judgment, for whom, on account of his well meaning and upright intention, Mr Boyle had a great regard (i). In 1664, Mr Boyle was elected into the company of Royal Mines (k), and was all this year taken up in the prosecution of various good designs, and more especially in promoting the affairs of the corporation for propagating the Gospel in New England, which, in all probability, was the reason that he did not send abroad this year any treatises, either of Religion or Philosophy.

In 1665, came abroad his Occasional Reflections upon several Subjects (l), to which is prefixed, A Discourse concerning the Nature and Use of such Kind of Writings. This piece, though now published, had been written many years before, when the author was a young man, at times, and under circumstances, when few would have written any thing, and none could have written better. The attack made upon it, therefore, by a ludicrous writer, may be truly affirmed to be as cruel and unjust, as it is trivial and indecent [L]. A short time after, he published (m) Experiments and Observations relative to an Experimental History of Cold, with several pieces thereunto annexed. This work of his, as it was justly

‘ the very life and soul of this undertaking, the protection and favour of the King and the Royal Family. When the Society first addressed itself to his Majesty, he was pleased to express much satisfaction that this enterprize was begun in his reign. He then represented to them the gravity and difficulty of their work, and assured them of all the kind influence of his power and prerogative. Since that, he has frequently committed many things to their search; he has referred many foreign rarities to their inspection; he has recommended many domestick improvements to their care; he has demanded the result of their trials in many appearances of nature; he has been present, and assisted with his own hands, at the performing of many of their experiments, in his garden, his parks, and on the river. And besides, I will not conceal, that he has sometimes reproved them for the slowness of their proceedings, at which reproofs they have not so much cause to be afflicted that they are the reprehensions of a King, as to be comforted that they are the reprehensions of his love and affection for their progress. For a testimony of which royal benignity, and to free them from all hinderances and occasions of delay, he has given them the establishment of his letters patents (19).’

(19) Ibid, p. 134.

By these letters patents, William Viscount Brouncker, Chancellor to the Queen, was appointed the First President; and the following persons of the Council, viz. Sir Robert Moray, Knight, one of his Majesty's Privy-Council in Scotland; Robert Boyle, Esq; William Brereton, Esq; eldest son to the Lord Brereton; Sir Kenelm Digby, Knight, Chancellor to the Queen-mother; Sir Gilbert Talbot, Knight, Master of the Jewel-house; Sir Paul Neile, Knight, one of the Ushers of the Privy-Chamber; Henry Slingsby, Esq; one of the Gentlemen of the Privy-Chamber; Sir William Petty, Knight; Timothy Clark, Doctor of Physick, and one of his Majesty's Physicians; John Wilkins, Doctor of Divinity; George Ent, Doctor of Physick; William Erskyne, Esq; one of his Majesty's Cup-Bearers; Jonathan Goddard, Doctor of Physick; William Ball, Esq; Matthew Wren, Esq; John Evelyn, Esq; Thomas Henshaw, Esq; Dudley Palmer, of Gray's-Inn, Esq; Abraham Hill, of London, Esq; and Henry Oldenburgh, Esquire.

[L] To be cruel and unjust, as it is trivial and indecent.] The piece mentioned in the text is addressed to Sophronia, under which name he concealed that of his beloved sister the Viscountess of Ranelagh (20). The thoughts themselves are on a vast variety of subjects, written in the course of ten years or more; some, indeed, upon trivial occasions, but all with great accuracy of language, much wit, more learning, and with a wonderful strain of moral and pious reflection. It was this that exposed him to the single harsh censure that ever was passed upon him, and that too from the pen of a very ingenious wit, the late Dean Swift (21), who, to ridicule these discourses, wrote A pious Meditation upon a Broomstick, in the Style of the Honourable ROBERT BOYLE. This piece is so well known that I need say no more of it, but perhaps it may afford some amusement to the reader, to be told, that from this very Treatise of our great author, Dr Swift borrowed the first hint of his Gulliver's Travels. The passage upon which this conjecture is founded is very short, and therefore we will insert it; but it is necessary to premise, that some of these occasional thoughts are written by way of dialogue, and in that upon eating of Oysters (22), one of the persons introduced therein speaks thus: ‘ You put me in mind of a fancy of your friend Mr Boyle, who was saying, that he had thoughts of making a short romantick story, where the scene should be laid in some island of the southern ocean, governed by some such rational laws and customs, as those of Utopia or the New Atalantis; and in this country he would introduce an observing native, that upon his return home from his travels made in Europe, should give an account of our countries and manners under feigned names, and frequently intimate in his relations, (or in his answers to questions that should be made him) the reasons of his wondering, to find our customs so extravagant, and differing from those of his own country. For your friend imagined, that by such a way of exposing many of our practices, we should ourselves be brought unawares to condemn, or perhaps laugh at them, and should at least cease to wonder, to find other nations think them as extravagant, as we think the manners of the Dutch and Spaniards, as they are represented in our travellers' books.’

(20) See this Treatise amongst Boyle's Works, in the new edition, 1744, in the second Volume.

(21) Swift's Works, Vol. II. p. 35.

(22) See Boyle's Works, Vol. II. p. 220.

[M] Cannot

justly admired then, so it has been always in great esteem since, and may be truly said to have been the first work published, that gave inquisitive men any real light into the subjects which are therein examined. His Majesty, King Charles II. had now an opportunity of shewing his own great judgment in men, from his esteem and affection towards Mr Boyle; for Dr John Meredith, Provost of Eaton, dying in August 1665, the King, unasked and unsolicited, appointed Mr Boyle for his successor (n). This was certainly, all circumstances considered, the fittest employment for him in the kingdom; yet after mature deliberation, though contrary to the advice of his friends, he absolutely declined it, because he thought the duties of the employment might interfere with his studies; he was unwilling to quit that course of life, which, by experience, he found so suitable to his temper and constitution; and, above all, he was unwilling to enter into Holy Orders, which he was persuaded was necessary to qualify himself for it (o). In this year, and in the next, he was pretty much exercised in looking into an affair that made a very great noise in the world, and the decision of which, from the high reputation he had gained, was in a manner universally expected from Mr Boyle. The case was this, one (p) Mr Valentine Greatraks, an Irish gentleman, persuaded himself that he had a peculiar gift of curing diseases by stroking, in which, though he certainly succeeded often, yet he sometimes failed, and this occasioned a great controversy, in which most of the parties concerned addressed themselves to Mr Boyle, who conducted himself with such wisdom and prudence, as to get out of this affair without any loss of credit, which, all things considered, cannot but be esteemed a very high proof of his wisdom [M]. In 1666, Dr John Wallis addressed

(n) Boyle's Works, Vol. V. P. 334.

(o) Memoirs of the Hon. Robert Boyle.

(p) See the Hist. of the County of Waterford, by Mr C. Smith, P. 365.

[M] Cannot but be esteemed a very high proof of his wisdom.] As there is nothing more common, than for persons who take upon them to perform extraordinary and supernatural things to lose their own credit, and become ridiculous, instead of acquiring an extensive and lasting reputation; so it has often fallen out, that upon the appearance of such persons, and the noise which such kind of pretensions will always make: Men of great parts and learning who have either too hastily given their opinion, or have given it under the particular bias of some favourite notion, which such phenomena seem to confirm, have deeply suffered in their credit likewise, and by a single false step lost that consideration and regard, which, with much labour, and by many services rendered to the publick, they might, with great difficulty, have acquired (23). This Mr Valentine Greatraks was an Irish Gentleman of a good family and competent fortune, of a serious, or rather of a melancholy temper; and at the time of his coming into England, about thirty-seven years of age; about three years before he had an impulse on his mind that he could cure the King's Evil, which his wife, who was a notable woman, and from a charitable principle, had applied herself to the study of Surgery and Physick, treated as a fancy; but Mr Greatraks persisted in it, and upon some trials performed such extraordinary things, as in that kingdom made a very great noise; upon which he was cited into the Bishop's Court at Lismore; and not having a Licence for practising, he was forbid to lay hands on any for the future, which prohibition, however, he did not obey. In January 1665-6, the Earl of Orrery invited him into England, in hopes he might be able to cure the Viscountess of Conway, who had been for many years afflicted with an inveterate head-ach (24). He repaired for this purpose to her Lord's seat at Ragly in Warwickshire; and though he failed in his attempt, in respect to the Lady, yet his performances, in those parts, were so extraordinary, that Mr Stubbe, of whom we shall have occasion to say a great deal in the next note, thought fit to write a Treatise upon this subject intitled, The miraculous Conformerist: or, an Account of several marvellous Cures performed by the stroking of the Hands of Mr Valentine Greatracks; with a physical discourse thereupon, in a Letter to the Honourable Robert Boyle, Esq; with a Letter relating to some other of his miraculous Cures attested by E. Foxcroft, M. A. and Fellow of King's College in Cambridge. The letter to Mr Boyle is dated at Stratford upon Avon, Feb. 18, 1665-6. Wherein, after giving an account of the person about whom his Treatise was wrote, and the cures which he had seen him perform, he lays down this position, that God had bestowed upon Mr Greatraks a peculiar temperament, or composed his body of some particular ferments, the effluvia whereof being introduced sometimes by a light, sometimes by a violent friction, should restore the temperament of the debilitated parts, reinvigorate the blood, and dissipate all heterogeneous ferments out of the bodies of the diseased by the eyes, nose, mouth, hands, and feet. The rest of his piece is spent in explaining the nature and manner of this gentleman's working upon his patients for their cure: Mr Stubbe did not send, as in decency he ought, his manuscript to Mr Boyle, but a printed book, which he received on the eighth of March following in the evening. The very next day Mr Boyle wrote him a very long, a very learned, and a very judicious letter upon the subject, which was never published, 'till it appeared in his life prefixed to his works; and it is certainly one of the clearest testimonies of his vast abilities and extensive knowledge that is any where extant; for it appears from the letter itself, that he both read Mr Stubbe's Book in haste, and wrote himself in much hurry, being obliged to take horse to go out of town; yet, considered in any light, this letter will appear a very extraordinary performance, as being wonderfully correct in the diction and stile, remarkably clear in the method and form, highly judicious in the observations and remarks, and full of many pertinent and curious facts cited in support of whatever he advanced; the whole shewing such an admirable frame of mind, and such a temper with respect both to the evidence of cures on the one hand, and the difficulties attending the inferences drawn from those accounts on the other, as cannot but fill the reader's mind with a very high idea of the author's candour and prudence, as well as of his deep penetration, and his various and profound knowledge (25). A very little after, the reputation of Mr Greatraks was very warmly attacked, as it was supposed, by Mr David Lloyd Reader of the Charterhouse, in a pamphlet entitled, Wonders no Miracles: or Mr Valentine Greatracks's Gift of Healing examined, upon Occasion of a said Effect of his stroking, March the seventh, 1665, at one Mr Cressett's Houfe in Charter-house-yard, in a Letter to a Reverend Divine living near that place. This obliged Mr Greatraks to write a vindication of himself, against the imputations thrown upon him by this discourse, which he accordingly did, under the title of A Brief Account of Mr Valentine Greatraks, and divers of the strange cures by him lately performed. Written by himself, in a Letter addressed to the Honourable Robert Boyle, Esq; Whereunto are annexed, the Testimonials of several eminent and worthy Persons, of the chief Matters of Fact therein related. This letter is dated May the eighth 1666, and at the conclusion he intimates his design, when he had an opportunity, to answer all the queries which Mr Boyle had put to him, in a paper delivered into his hands, and which he was not then at leisure to satisfy: To this letter are subjoined testimonials by Mr Boyle, Dr Denton, Dr Fairclough, Sir William Smyth, Sir Nathaniel Hobart, and many other persons of distinction: He returned, 'not long afterwards, to Ireland, and though he lived there many years, yet I do not find, that he kept up the reputation of performing those strange cures which gained him the title of the Stroker, and has procured his name a place even in our general histories (26). But in this his case is very singular and remarkable, that, even on the strictest inquiry, no sort of blemish was ever thrown

(25) See this Letter of Mr Boyle's at large, in his Life, p. 47.

(26) See Echar'd's Hist. of England, P. 127.

3) Hist. of the county of Waterford, P. 365.

4) See his own pamphlet addressed to Mr Boyle.

(9) Philosophical Transactions, No. XVI, p. 264.

(4) The Latin title of this Treatise was, Methodus curandi Febres propter Observationibus super Brucia, Lond. 1668, 8vo, It. 1668.

(5) At London, in 8vo; it was also published in Latin.

(1) See Boyle's Life, p. 54.

(2) See instances of this in note [N].

(17) Hist. of the County of Waterford, p. 369.

(23) See a large Account of him in Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II, col. 560, 663, 665.

(29) See these Letters in Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 56—59.

addressed to Mr Boyle An Hypothesis about the Flux and Reflex of the Sea (q). The famous Physician, Dr Thomas Sydenham, dedicated to him, in the same year, his Method of curing Fevers, grounded upon his own Observations (r), a little piece, written in Latin, and truly worthy of so great a man. Himself likewise published that year, his (s). Hydrostatical Paradoxes, made out by new Experiments for the most part physical and easy, which he sent abroad at the request of the Royal Society, those experiments having been made at their desire about two years before. He also published that year another celebrated treatise of his, intituled, The Origin of Forms and Qualities, according to the Corpuscular Philosophy, illustrated by Experiments; a treatise which did equal honour to the quickness of his wit, the depth of his judgment, and his indefatigable pains in searching after truth. We must likewise observe, that both in this, and in the former year, he communicated to his friend, Mr Oldenburgh, several curious and excellent short treatises of his, upon a great variety of subjects, and others transmitted to him by his learned friends both at home and abroad, which are printed and preserved in the Philosophical Transactions of the Royal Society (t). It is very observable, that in the warm controversy raised in relation to that Society, Mr Boyle escaped all censure, which is more extraordinary, considering that Mr Stubbe, who was the great antagonist of the learned Historian of that Society, was one who set no bounds to his rage, and seemed to make it a point, to raise his resentment in proportion as there wanted grounds for it. Yet even this choleric and furious writer had so high an esteem for Mr Boyle, that at the very time he fell upon the Society in a manner so inexcusable, he failed not to write frequently to our author, in order to convince him, that how angry soever he might be with that body of men, yet he preserved a just respect for his great learning and abilities, and a true sense of the many favours he had conferred upon him (u) [N]. About this time, our upon his character; nor did any of those curious and learned persons, who espoused his cause, draw any imputation upon themselves; though at the same time it must be allowed, that there were several very eminent and knowing Virtuosi, who could not be brought to have any great opinion of his performances, but were rather inclined to attribute all he did to the bare efficacy of Friction (27). We shall, perhaps, have occasion, in another place, to examine this affair more closely, as designing no more, at present, than to set this matter in a clear light, so far as our author was concerned therein.

[N] True sense of the many favours he had conferred upon him.] It would far exceed the bounds of a note, should we attempt to give any account of this Henry Stubbe, who was a frequent and voluminous writer. It is sufficient to observe, that he was a constant antagonist to the famous Mr Glanville, and a declared enemy to the Royal Society (28), which makes it wonderful, that he should preserve any measures towards Mr Boyle, which, however, he did, at a time when he lost all decency, as well as patience, in regard to others; as appears very clearly from the following passage, taken from a letter of his to Mr Boyle, dated from Warwick December 17, 1669, in relation to Dr Sprat's History of the Royal Society (29). 'At the session of parliament you will see a censure upon certain passages in the history, with a defence of the censure, approved by as eminent Divines as this nation yields, which will convince you, how justly I say, that the history subverts the Protestant Religion, and Church of England. I never did any thing more unwillingly, than to enter upon Divinity; though, now, the XXXIX Articles, and Homilies, and the Protestant Religion, be the subject I defend against Popery and Socinianism. I understood of the King's displeasure at me, and that he said some severe things, but I was not troubled at it much, being content rather to serve him, than to flatter him. I did expect to have been imprisoned when I first undertook it, and therefore contrived how I might be freed again, never purposing to decline the other trouble. But, when I bring the case before the Commons, I am sure I shall here be powerfully abetted, and the Society will have the worse, and whatever they do before will add to my plea then; you will see, before Twelfth-day, that no inconsiderable persons will speak favourably of my intention, and avow the bravery and necessity of the performance. But I determined not to engage them to discourse their minds before the book came out.'

—To this letter he adds the following remarkable Postscript: 'I had forgot to suggest one thing to the consideration of your Society, that, perhaps, it may be manifested at the Parliament, that the historian, by this book, is chargeable with high-treason, and that we want not such as think, if your Society own it, they incur a Præmunire; so that whatever they may imagine to draw upon me (though I may suffer a while) will fall worse on them, when the world takes notice of the ground of their actions against me, and that they do all this, whom I had represented in my preface as unconcerned in the contest.' It is amazing that so angry, and so rash a writer, should be able to create any considerable opposition to so learned and great a body, embarked in so just, so generous, and so publick-spirited an undertaking as reason and good sense, then, and as the happy success of their labours, and a long, and uninterrupted experience now demonstrate the scheme of the Royal Society to be: Yet the same writer, in another letter to Mr Boyle dated June the fourth, 1670, not without some foundation of truth, boasts of having brought over numbers, and even some of those very great and considerable persons, to his sentiments; and very plainly tells our author, that he was the only man to whom he intended to give any quarter. 'What I believe you could never have apprehended is come to pass; the body of the nation, and all learned men abet me; the two Universities (especially that of Cambridge, which was most inclined to novelty) avow my quarrel; and they that favoured Experimental Philosophy judge those Virtuosi unfit to prosecute it: The Bishop of Chichester reads against them, and intends to hold his lecture a year or two, and that for this reason to overthrow the esteem of them. The concurrence to hear him is such as the University never saw before. The Elect of Bath is as much as any for me, and against Glanville. In sum, all men apprehend it is now their interest to oppose the Royal Society. I know not what any Physicians may, as the mode is, tell you to your face, but except it be such as Dr Sydenham and young Cox, I believe not one lives, that doth not condemn your Experimental Philosophy, and either the College, or Sir Alexander Frazer, and the principal of them, intend me a letter of thanks for what I have done, with the liberty to print it, and perhaps others will follow the precedent; and how consistent these things are, with the repute of the Society you adhere unto, judge you?—The Bishop of London hath licensed that against Sprat once more, and approved the preface and dedication to both Universities, wherein the passages are more severe than any yet published—being resolved to keep the controversy hot till the Royal Society submit to the terms I propose, and then they had as good dissolve. I acquaint you with these things, that you may consult your own ease, and let these comedians stand or fall alone; and then whatever reply, I shall, at the request of the Physicians at London, make to you, shall be as amicable as it is possible, and, if it please God to continue us a nation, perhaps, you shall see a nobler project for the advancement of useful knowledge, in reference to our author resolved to settle himself for life in London, and removed for that purpose to the house of his sister, the Lady Ranelagh, in Pall-Mall, to the infinite benefit of the learned in general, and particularly to the advantage of the Royal Society, to whom he gave great and continual assistance (w). He had likewise his set hours for receiving such as came, either to desire his help, or to communicate to him any new discoveries in science. Besides which, he kept a very extensive correspondence with persons of the greatest figure, and most famous for learning in all parts of Europe (x). In 1669, he published his Continuation of new Experiments, touching the Spring and Weight of the Air, to which is added, A Discourse of the Atmospheres of Consistent Bodies; and the same year he revised, and made many additions to, several of his former tracts, some of which were now translated into Latin, in order to gratify the curious abroad, with whom Mr Boyle stood in as high reputation, as with all the lovers of learning at home. In the succeeding year, he published a book that occasioned much speculation, as it seemed to contain a vast treasure of new knowledge, that had never been communicated to the world before, and this grounded upon actual experiments and arguments justly drawn from them, instead of that notional and conjectural Philosophy, which, in the beginning of this century, had been so much in fashion. The title of this treatise was, Of the Cosmical Qualities of Things (y), and as it is necessary, in such an article as this, to give at least one instance of an author's manner of writing, we thought it might not be improper to insert farther upon this in the notes [O]. About this time, Dr Peter de Moulin, the son of the famous French Divine of

Physick,

(w) See the several pieces communicated by Mr Boyle, as printed in the Transactions, and now collected in Mr Boyle's Works, and digested in their proper order of time.

(x) Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 60.

(y) Printed at Oxford, in 1679; and soon after translated into Latin.

Physick, than ever your Society was capable of, and which shall add glory to our Faculty. It was, indeed, the Popish interest to depress the Physicians, that so there might be nothing of learning in the nation to oppress them. Civil Law is gone; the number of learned Divines is small; and your Royal Society hath destroyed the succession. But there remains enough to retort the shame upon the authors, and cover you all with ignominy. I have no more to add, but that I shall never quit that respect which becomes

Your most humble Servant,

HENRY STUBBE.

[O] To insert farther upon this in the notes.] The ends proposed by Mr Boyle, in the publication of all his writings, were such as equally demonstrated the uprightness of his heart, the soundness of his head, and the diffusive beneficence of his nature. The treatise, before us, was composed of several short discourses, most of which bore some relation to other tracts the author had under his hand, which were not, at that time, in a condition to see the light. But he very justly considered, that if he delayed publishing any till all the tracts he had written, or intended, were fit to come abroad, the world might be deprived of many excellent discoveries, at a time, when an unusual spirit of improvement prevailed. He therefore chose to send such of them abroad, from time to time, as were in the best order; and gave thereby a noble proof of his preferring the service of mankind to his own reputation. The first tract in this collection is, an Introduction to the History of particular qualities; then follow his Discourses of the Systematical or Cosmical Qualities of things, Cosmical Suspensions, the Temperature of the subterranean Region, the Temperature of the submarine Region, and of the Bottom of the Sea. The introduction to the history of particular qualities, is preparatory to the rest; and herein the author shows, that his doctrine is not like that of the ancient philosophers, made up of sounding and unmeaning words, or simple conjectures imposed in a dogmatic style, but a plain and practical exposition of the discoveries, which, with much labour, and no less penetration, he had made by following nature and considering her operations. In the tract concerning the cosmical qualities of things, he shews, 1. That they depend partly upon the influence of external agents, as well as the primary affections of matter; so that there are many bodies, which, in several cases, act not, unless acted upon; and some of them act either solely, or chiefly, as they are acted on by general and unregarded agents. 2. That there are certain subtle bodies in the world, which are ready to insinuate themselves into the pores of any body disposed to admit their action, or by some other way to effect it, especially if they have the concurrence of other unobserved causes, and the established laws of the universe. 3. That a body, by a mechanical change of the texture, may acquire or lose a fitness to be wrought upon by unheeded agents, and also to diversify their operation on it, by a variation of it's texture. He proposes next the following cosmical suspensions. 1. That besides those more numerous and uniform sorts of minute corpuscles, which are by some of the modern philosophers thought to compose the æther, there may possibly be some other kind of corpuscles fitted to produce considerable effects when they find bodies to be wrought on by them. 2. That several persons have discovered pestilential streams in the air, before they acted as such upon other bodies. 3. That considerable, though slow, changes in the internal parts of the earth, may occasion a variation of the mariner's needle. 4. That the ebbing and flowing of the sea, and such like phenomena, are occasioned by some cosmical law of nature; or that the planetary vortex may be not a little concerned in producing such effects. 5. That all endemical and epidemical distempers, principally depend upon the influence of those globes which move about us, and the terrestrial effluvia of our own globe. 6. That those which are thought the grand rules by which things corporeal are transacted, and which suppose the constancy of the present fabrick of the world, and a regular course of things, are not altogether so uniformly complied with, as we presume at least as to the lines according to which the great mundane bodies move, and the boundaries of their motions. 7. That on the other hand, we may, perhaps, take such things for exorbitances, and deviation from the settled course of nature, as if long and attentively observed, will be a periodical phenomena of very long intervals, but because men have not sufficient skill and curiosity to observe them, nor a life long enough to be able to take notice of a competent number of them, they readily conclude them to be but accidental extravagances, which spring not from any settled and durable causes. In the discourses concerning the temperature of the subterranean and submarine regions, he observes, that there are different regions below the earth; that the first region of the earth is very variable, both as to bounds and temperature; that the second seems to be generally cold, in comparison of the other two; that in several places, which by reason of their distance from the surface of the earth, might be referred to, the middle region of it, the temperature of the air, is very different at the same seasons of different years; that the third region of the earth has been observed to be constantly and sensibly, but not uniformly, warm, being in some places considerably hot: that there are two different regions below the surface of the sea, the one extended from the superficies of the water as far downward, as the manifest operation of the sun-beams, or other causes penetrates; and the other from thence to the bottom; so that the upper region must vary as to it's extent, according to the difference of the climate, and the heat of the sun, or the nature of the soils about the shore, but that the lower region is generally cold; he farther tells us, that the bottom of the sea is very rough and unequal; that the water gravitates considerably upon bodies immersed in it; and that the bottom of the sea is not disturbed with storms, but that the water stagnates. We may, from this instance, fully discern the usefulness of the same name, who had travelled with Mr Boyle's nephews, dedicated to him his Collection of Latin Poems (z). But in the midst of his studies, and other useful employments, he was attacked by a severe paralytick distemper, of which, though not without great difficulty, he got the better, by adhering strictly to a proper regimen (a). In 1671, he published Considerations on the Usefulness of Experimental and Natural Philosophy, the second Part (b), as also A Collection of Tracts (c) upon several useful and important Points of Practical Philosophy, both which works were received as new and valuable gifts to the learned world. In 1672, came abroad his Essay about the Origin and Virtue of Gems (d), in which, according to his usual custom, he treated an old and beaten subject in a very new and useful manner; so that it may be truly said, that he not only threw an additional light upon a very dark and difficult subject, but also pointed out the only certain method of acquiring a perfect knowledge of the nature and virtues (if any such there be) of all kinds of precious stones. He published also, the same year, another Collection of Tracts, touching the Relation between Flame and Air (e), and several other useful and curious subjects, besides furnishing in this, and in the former year, a great number of short Dissertations upon a vast variety of topics, addressed to the Royal Society, and inserted in their Transactions. In the year 1673, he sent abroad his Essays on the strange Subtilty, great Efficacy, and determinate Nature of Effluvia, to which were added, Variety of Experiments on other Subjects (f). The same year, Anthony Le Grand dedicated to him his History of Nature (g), which he published in Latin, and in this dedication the author gives a large account of the great reputation which Mr Boyle had acquired in foreign parts. In 1674, Mr Boyle published A Collection of Tracts on the Saltiness of the Sea, the Moisture of the Air, the natural and preternatural State of Bodies, to which he prefixed, A Dialogue concerning Cold (h). In the same year, he sent abroad a piece that had been written near ten years before, intitled, The Excellency of Theology compared with the Natural Philosophy, in an Epistolary Discourse to a friend (i). This treatise, in which are contained a multitude of curious and useful, as well as just and natural, observations, was written in the time of the great plague, when the author was forced to go from place to place in the country, and had little or no opportunity of consulting his books. He also communicated to the world, the same year, another Collection of Tracts, comprehending some Suspicions about hidden Qualities of the Air, Animadversions upon Mr Hobbes's Problem about a Vacuum, A Discourse of the Cause of Attraction by Suction (k), in which several pieces, as there are many new discoveries made, so several old errors, and groundless notions, are refuted and exploded. In 1675, he printed Some Considerations about the Reconcilableness of Reason and Religion, by T. E. a Layman, to which was annexed, a Discourse about the Possibility of the Resurrection, by Mr Boyle (l). The reader will observe, that the former, as well as the latter, was of his writing, only he thought fit to mark that with the final letters of his name, and though the first of these Discourses promises a second part, that however, was not published. Amongst other pieces that he this year communicated to the Royal Society, there were two papers connected into one discourse, that deserve particular notice; the former was intitled, An Experimental Discourse of Quicksilver growing hot with Gold (m); the other related to the same subject, both of them containing discoveries worthy of so great a man, and facts that only on his credit could be believed [P]. In 1676, Mr Boyle published (z) The title of this book was Petrus Molinæ P.F. II A P E P T A Poematum libellus, Cant. 1670. 8vo.

(a) See his own Account of this matter in his letter to John Mallet, Esq; in Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 61.

(b) Printed at London, in 4to; re-printed, but with the old title, 1739.

(c) Printed at London, in 4to.

(d) Printed at London, in 8vo; and soon after translated into Latin, by which it became generally known and esteemed abroad.

(e) Printed at London, in 8vo.

(f) Printed at London, in 8vo; and translated into Latin.

(g) The title of this book ran thus, Historia Naturæ variis experimentis & Ratiociniis elucidata, secundum Principia Stabilitatis, in Institutione Philosophiæ edita ab eodem Autore, Lond. 1672, 8vo.

(h) Printed at London, in 8vo.

(i) Printed at London, in 8vo; and afterwards translated into Latin.

(k) Printed at London, in 8vo.

(l) Printed at London, in 8vo.

(m) Philosophical Transactions, No. CXXII. p. 515.

his usefulness and precision, as well as the curiosity and novelty, of Mr Boyle's writings; whence we may easily discern, how much they contributed, not only to the improvement of learning, and advancement of knowledge, by their contents, but by their example also; since the just fame that he acquired by his sagacious discoveries, and the freedom and candour with which he divulged them, induced many others to follow his steps, to the inexpressible benefit of such as are studious of true Philosophy.

[P] Facts that only on his credit could be believed.

All who are, in the least, acquainted with the writings of those who stile themselves Hermetick Philosophers, or, as they are commonly called, Alchemists, cannot be ignorant of the distinction they make between Common and Philosophick Mercury: or that many of them, amongst other qualities which they assign to their nobler kind of mercury, insit that this is one, viz. It will not only mix with, but upon being intermixed, will grow hot with gold. This such writers, as have endeavoured to overthrow the principles of the Alchemists, have absolutely denied; and it has even been given up by some of the modern writers upon that science themselves (30). But our noble author, who had a zeal for nothing but truth, and no aversion to any notions or principles whatever, that were not inconsistent therewith, thought it became him to acquaint the Royal Society with some discoveries he had made upon this subject many years before; and therefore communicated to their secretary some papers he had drawn up on this head, in which, besides his own excellent observations, are contained certain experiments that clearly determine the point, and put it beyond dispute, that there are various kinds of mercury, which may be so prepared as to mix, and to become hot with gold; that is, by the action of the particles of these two metals themselves upon each other, without the assistance of any other ingredient or of fire. But let us hear what himself says on that subject (31): 'Some years after I was in possession of this mercury, I found, in some of their books, that Chymists call Philosophers, some dark passages, whence I then guessed their knowledge of it, or of some other very like it; and in one of them I found, though not all in the very same place, an allegorical description of it, the greatest part of which was not very difficult for me to understand; but not finding there, any notice taken of the property of this mercury to grow hot with gold, I was induced to suspect, that either they had not the knowledge of it, or judged it unfit to be spoken of. But you will, I suppose, expect from me rather narratives than conjectures. And, indeed, it is but reasonable, that having but mentioned to you a phenomenon, whose credibility is by many denied; I should take notice of some circumstances fit to bring credit to it; and I shall the less grudge the pains of setting down several particular phenomena, because, I presume you have not met with them; and because also it may gratify some of your chymical friends, who may have, or discover, some noble mercury, by helping them to examine it, and to try whether it resembles ours.

'That, I might not then be imposed on by others; I several times made trial of our mercury, when I was all alone. For when no body was by me, nor probably (30) The mystical Doctrines of the Sons of Hermes explained, p. 15.

(31) Boyle's Works, Vol. II, p. 557.

his Experiments and Notes about the Mechanical Origin of particular Qualities (n), by several Discourses on a great variety of subjects, and, amongst the rest, he treats very largely, and, according to his wonted method, very accurately, of Electricity. He had been for many years a Director of the East-India company, and very useful in this capacity to that great body, more especially in procuring their charter, and the only return he expected for his labour in this respect, was, the engaging the Company to come to some resolution in favour of the propagation of the Gospel, by means of their flourishing factories in that part of the world; and, as a proof of his own inclination to contribute, as far as in him lay, for that purpose, he caused five hundred copies of the Gospels and Acts of the Apostles, in the Malayan tongue, to be printed at Oxford, and sent abroad at his own expence, as appears from the Dedication prefixed by his friend Dr Thomas Hyde to that translation, which was published under his direction (p). There came abroad, the same year, a Miscellaneous Collection of his Works in Latin, printed at Geneva, but without his knowledge, of which there is a large account given in the Philosophical Transactions (q). In 1678, he communicated to Mr Hooke, afterwards Dr Hooke, the short Memorial of some

(n) Printed at London, in 8vo.

(p) This Dedication is dated from the Publick Library at Oxford, Sept. 14, 1677.

(q) No. CXXX. this account is penned by Hen. Oldenburgh, Esq; then their Secretary.

probably dreamed of what I was doing; I took to one part of the mercury, sometimes half the weight, and sometimes an equal weight of refined gold, reduced to a calx or subtile powder. This I put into the palm of my left hand, and putting the mercury upon it, stirred it, and pressed it a little with the finger of my right hand, by which the two ingredients were easily mingled, and grew not only sensibly, but considerably hot, and that so nimbly, that the incalcescence did sometimes come to it's height in about a minute of an hour, by a minute clock. I found the experiment succeed whether I took altogether or but half as much gold as mercury, but the effect seemed to be much greater when they were employed in equal weight; and to obviate a suspicion, which, though improbable, might possibly arise, as if the immediate contact of the ingredients, and the skin produced a sense of heat, which was not due to the action of the metals upon one another: I had the curiosity to keep the mixture in a paper, and found not it's interposition to hinder me from feeling the incalcescence, though it much abated the degree of my sense of it.

I tried also the same mercury with refined silver reduced to a very fine powder, but I could not perceive any heat or warmth at all, though I am apt to think, that if I had had a sufficient quantity of leaf-silver to have made the experiment with, I should, after some time, have produced an incalcescence, though much inferior to what the same quantity of mercury would produce with gold, but this is only upon the bye. I shall now add, that to the end I might not be thought to impose upon myself, I did not make trial in my own hand, when it was in different temper as to heat and cold, but I did it in the hands of others, who were not a little surprized and pleased at the event. And this I did more than once or twice, by which means I had, and still have, divers witnesses of the truth of the experiment, whereof some are noted persons, and especially him to whom I last shewed it, which you will easily believe, when I tell you it is the learned secretary of the Royal Society, to whom having given the ingredients, I desired him to make the experiment in and with his own hands, in which it proved successful, within somewhat less than a minute of an hour. (The same experiment was afterwards tried by the Lord Viscount Brouncker, President of the Royal Society.) And that which makes this incalcescence the more considerable is, that being willing to husband my mercury, a great part of which had been, as I guessed, stolen from me before I employed it; I made these trials but with a drachm at a time, which scarce amounts, in quantity, to the bigness of half a middle sized bean; whereas, if I could have made the experiment with a spoonful or two of quicksilver, and a due proportion of gold, it is probable the heat would have been intense enough, not only to burn one's hand, but perchance to crack a glass-vial; since I have sometimes had of this mercury so subtile, that when I employed but a drachm at a time, the heat made me willing to put it hastily out of my hand.

These things being matters of fact, I scruple not to deliver them; but I would much scruple to determine thence, whether those that are mercurii captorum, and were made, as Chemists presume, by extraction only from metals and minerals, will each of them grow hot with gold, as, if I much mistake not, I found antimonial mercury to do. And much less would I affirm, that every metalline mercury (though never so disposed to incalcescence) or even that of silver or gold itself, is the same with that which the Chrysopean writers mean by their Philosophick mercury, or is near so noble as this. Nay, I would not so much as affirm, that every mercury obtained by extraction, even from the perfect metals themselves, must needs be more noble and fit (as Alchemists speak) for the Philosophick work, than that which may with skill and pains be at length obtained from common mercury, skilfully freed from it's recrementitious and heterogeneous parts, and richly impregnated with the subtile and active ones of congruous metals or minerals. These, and the like points, I should, as I was saying, much scruple at offering to determine in this place, where what I designed to deliver was historical, though I have not thought it impertinent to glance at the points lately mentioned, because those glances may intimate things conducive to the better understanding of what I have said, and have to say, in this paper.

It is very evident, from what we have cited, that our author had no sort of prejudices or prepossessions whatever; he very well knew, under what suspicions all the Alchemistical writers lay, and no body was a better judge than himself how far they deserved it: but this did not hinder him from reading, examining, and making use of their writings, or from publishing to the world the truths that he found in them, amongst which there was scarce any of greater fame or importance, than this singular discovery. To be convinced of this, the reader need only to be told, that as soon as the Transactions of the Royal Society, in which these papers were contained, became publick, the judicious Sir Isaac, then only Mr Newton, thought fit to write a letter to Mr Oldenburgh, Secretary to the Royal Society, thereupon, in which, after taking some pains to shew, that very possibly this particular kind of mercury might act otherwise upon gold than by the subtilty of it's parts, he shows a great concern lest the secret of making it should be divulged, and the reasons he gives for this are of such a nature, that the curious reader will think himself obliged to me for transcribing them (32). 'But yet, says he, because the way by which mercury may be so impregnated, has been thought fit to be concealed by others that have known it, and therefore may possibly be an inlet to something more noble, not to be communicated without immense damage to the world, if there should be any verity in the Hermetick writers; therefore I question not, but that the great wisdom of the noble author will sway him to high silence, till he shall be resolved of what consequence the thing may be, either by his own experience, or the judgment of some other that thoroughly understands what he speaks about, that is, of a true Hermetick Philosopher, whose judgment (if there be any such) would be more to be regarded in this point, than that of all the world beside to the contrary, there being other things besides the transmutations of metals, (if those great pretenders brag not) which none but they understand. Sir, because the author desires the sense of others in this point, I have been so free as to shoot my bolt; but pray keep this letter private to yourself, &c.'

(32) See the Extract of this curious Letter in Boyle's Life by Birch, p. 65.

(r) Lectioes Cut-lerianæ, No. ii.
p. 57.

some Observations made upon an artificial Substance that shines without any preceding Illustration (r), which that gentlemen thought fit to make publick. He published, in the same year, his Historical Account of a Degradation of Gold, made by an Anti-Elixir (s). This made a very great noise both at home and abroad, and is looked upon as one of the most remarkable pieces that ever fell from his pen, the facts contained in which would have been esteemed incredible, if they had fallen from the pen of any other [2]. In the year 1680,

(s) Printed at London in 4to and being become exceeding scarce, was re-printed after the first edition, 1739.

[2] Would have been esteemed incredible, if they had fallen from the pen of any other.] This discourse, like the Sceptical Chymist, and many other of our author's works, is penned in the way of dialogue; and the narrative is delivered by Pyrophilus, who, in discoursing with a learned Society informs them, that he had met with such an Anti-Elixir by accident, for that visiting a great Virtuoso, he there met with a stranger who had been a great traveller, and upon asking him, whether, in any of the Eastern countries he had visited, he met with Chymists, he answered that he had, and that, though less numerous in those countries, they were not at all less learned than in Europe; this produced a long conversation, and as is usual among Sages, a very close intimacy between them; in such that at his departure from England, which happened not long after, the stranger gave Pyrophilus a little piece of paper folded up, which, he said, contained all that he had left of a rarity he had received from an Eastern Virtuoso, which, he intimated, did give him occasion both to remember the donor, and to exercise his thoughts in uncommon speculations. Before he made any experiment, he resolved to take a witness or two, and made choice of an experienced Doctor of Physick, well skill'd in separating and coppelling of metals, for his assistant, to whom he did not reveal all that he expected from this trial, but told him, that he had received a powder from a foreign Virtuoso, which, he was told, had a power of rendering brittle, the most flexible and malleable of metals, gold itself. But as we are now come to the experiment, we must (for the sake of certainty) make use of our author's own expressions, who, in the person of Pyrophilus, proceeds in these words (33). 'Having thus prepared him not to look for all that I myself expected; I cautiously opened the paper, I lately mentioned, but was both surprized, and troubled (as he also was) to find in it so very little powder; that instead of two different trials, that I designed to make with it, there seemed very small hope left that it would serve for one (and that but an imperfect one neither). For there was so very little powder, that we could scarce see the colour of it (save, that as far as I could judge, it was of a darkish red); and we thought it, not only dangerous, but useless to attempt to weigh it, in regard we might easily lose it, by putting it into and out of the ballance; and the weights we had, were not small enough for so despicable a quantity of matter, which, in words, I estimated at an eighth part of a grain; but my assistant (whose conjecture, I confess, my thoughts inclined to prefer) would allow it to be, at the most, but a tenth part of a grain: wherefore, seeing the utmost we could reasonably hope to do, with so very little powder, was to make one trial with it; we weighed out, in different ballances, two drams of gold, that had been formerly English coin; and that I caused, by one that I usually employ, to be coppelled with a sufficient quantity of lead, and quartered, as they speak, with refined silver, and purged aqua fortis, to be sure of the goodness of the gold. These two drams I put into a new crucible, first carefully nealed, and having brought them to fusion, by the meeration of the fire, without the help of borax, or any other additament (which course, though somewhat more laborious than the most usual, we took to obviate scruples) I put into the well melted metal, with my own hand, the little parcel of powder lately mentioned, and continuing the vessel in the fire for above a quarter of an hour, that the powder might have time to diffuse itself every way into the metal; we poured out the well melted gold into another crucible, that I had brought with me, and that had been gradually heated before to prevent cracking. But, though, from the first fusion of the metal, to the pouring out, it had turned in the crucible like ordinary gold, save that once my assistant told me, he saw, that for two or three moments it looked almost like an opal; yet I was somewhat surprized to find,

(33) Boyle's
Works, Vol. IV.
p. 16.

when the matter was grown cold, that though it appeared upon the ballance, that we had not lost any thing of the weight we put in, yet instead of fine gold, we had a lump of metal of a dirty colour, and as it were overcast with a thin coat, almost like half vitrified litharge, and somewhat to increase the wonder, we perceived that there stuck to one side of the crucible, a little globule of metal, that looked not at all yellowish, but like coarse silver, and the bottom of the crucible was overlaid with a vitrified substance; whereof one part was of a transparent yellow, and the other of a deep brown inclining to red, and in this vitrified substance I could plainly perceive sticking, at least, five or six little globules that looked more like impure silver, than pure gold. In short, this stuff looked so little like refined, or so much as ordinary gold, that though my friend did much more than I marvel at this change, yet, I confess, I was surprized at it myself. For though, in some particulars, it answered what I looked for, yet in others it was very different from that which the donor of the powder had, as I thought, given me ground to expect. Whether the cause of my disappointment, were, that (as I formerly intimated) this Virtuoso's haste, or design, made him leave me in the dark; or whether it were that finding myself in want of sufficient directions. I happily pitched upon such a proportion of materials, and way of operating, as were proper to make a new discovery, which the excellent giver of the powder had not designed, or perhaps thought of.—Having rubbed it upon a good touchstone, whereon we had, likewise, rubbed a piece of coined silver, and a piece of coined gold, we manifestly found, that the mark left upon the stone, by our marks, between marks of the two other metals, was notoriously more like the touch of the silver, than that of the gold; next having knocked our little lump with a hammer, it was according to my prediction found brittle, and flew into several pieces. Thirdly, (which is more) even the sides of those pieces looked of a base, dirty colour, like that of brass, or worse, for the fragments had a far greater resemblance to bell metal, than either to gold or silver. To which we added this fourth, and more considerable examen, that having carefully weighed out one dram of our stuff (reserving the rest for trials to be suggested by second thoughts) and put it upon an excellent new, and well nealed coppel, with about half a dozen times it's weight of lead; we found somewhat to our wonder, that though it turned very well like good gold, yet it continued in the fire above an hour and a half (which was twice as long as we expected); and yet, almost to the very last, the fumes copiously ascended, which sufficiently argued the operation to have been well carried on; and when at last it was quite ended, we found the coppel very smooth and entire, but tinged with a fine purplish red (which did somewhat surprize us); and besides the refined gold, there lay upon the cavity of the coppel some dark coloured recrements, which we concluded to have proceeded from the deteriorated metal, not from the lead. But when we came to put out our gold again into the ballance, we found it to weigh only about fifty-three grains, and consequently to have lost seven, which, yet, we found to be fully made up by that little quantity of recrements that I have lately mentioned, whose weight, and fixity, compared with their unpromising colour, did not a little puzzle us, especially because we had not enough either of them, or of leisure, to examine their nature. To all which circumstances I shall subjoin this, that to prevent any scruples that might arise touching the gold we employed, I caused a dram and a half, that had been purposely reserved out of the same portion, with that which had been debased; I caused this (I say) to be, in my assistant's presence, melted by itself, and found it, as I doubted not but I should do, fine and well coloured gold.—I shall 1680, he sent into the world the following tracts, viz. The Aerial Noctiluca, and a Process of a fabitious self-shining Substance (t); besides which, he published also some small Discourses upon different subjects. It was upon the thirtieth of November, in this year, that the Royal Society, as a proof of their just sense of his great worth, and, of the constant and particular services, which, through the course of many years, he had rendered to their Society, made choice of him for their President; but he being extremely, and, as himself says, peculiarly tender in point of oaths, declined the honour done him, by a letter addressed to Mr Professor Hooke of Gresham-college (u). He was also, within the compass of this year, a considerable benefactor towards the publishing Dr Burnet's History of the Reformation (w), as he very readily was, on the like occasion, to every performance calculated for the general use and benefit of mankind. In 1681, he published his Discourse of Things above Reason (x), and the same year he was engaged in endeavouring to promote the preaching and promulgation of the Gospel amongst the Indians, bordering upon New England. In 1682, came out his New Experiments and Observations upon the Icy Noctiluca, to which is added, A Chymical Paradox, making it probable that their Principles are transmutable, so that out of one of them others may be produced (y). The same year, he communicated to the publick the second Part of his Continuation of New Experiments touching the Spring and Weight of the Air, and a large Appendix (z), containing several other Discourses. He published, in 1683, nothing that I find, except a short letter to the Rev. Dr John Beale (a), in relation to the making fresh water out of salt, published at the request of the patentees, who were embarked in Mr Fitzgerald's project for that purpose, the proposals for which were addressed to Mr Boyle, and the author acknowledges therein, the obligations he was under to him for his assistance. In the succeeding year, 1684, he printed two very considerable works, the first (b) was, his Memoirs for the Natural History of Human Blood; and his second, Experiments and Considerations about the Porosity of Bodies (c), divided into two parts; the first relating to animals, the second to solid bodies; and his Works being now grown to a very considerable bulk, the celebrated Dr Ralph Cudworth, whose praise alone was sufficient to establish any man's title to fame, wrote to him in very pressing terms, to make an entire Collection of his several Treatises, and to publish them in a body, and in the Latin tongue, in his own life-time; as well out of regard to his reputation, as to the general interest of mankind, and the peculiar satisfaction to the learned world (d). In 1685, he obliged the world with his Short Memoirs for the Natural Experimental History of Mineral Waters (e), with Directions as to the several Methods of trying them, including abundance of new and useful Remarks, as well as several curious Experiments. He gave the world also, in the same year, another

(t) Printed at London, in 8vo.

(u) See this Letter, dated Pall-Mall, Dec. 16, 1680. Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 74.

(w) See the Preface to the second Volume of that Work.

(x) Printed at London, in 8vo.

(y) At the same place, and in the same size.

(z) At the same place, and in the same size.

(a) This Letter is involved in a Treatise intitled Salt water sweetened, London, 1683, 8vo.

(b) Printed at London, in 8vo; and afterwards translated into Latin.

(c) Printed at the same place, and in the same size; as also in Latin, under the title of Tentamen Porologium.

(d) This Letter is dated Oct. 16, 1684.

(e) Printed at London, in 8vo.

excellent shall also inform you, that having provided myself of all the requisites to make Hydrostatical trials (to which, perhaps, I am not altogether a stranger); I carefully weighed, in water, the ill looked mass (before it was divided for the coppelling of the above-mentioned dram), and found, to the great confirmation of my former wonder and conjectures, that instead of weighing about nineteen times as much, as a bulk of water equal to it, it's proportion to that liquor was but that of fifteen, and about two thirds to one, so that it's specifick gravity was less by about one third, than it would if it had been pure gold.—Without launching into different speculations, or making use of disputable hypotheses, it seems evident enough, from the matter of fact, faithfully laid before you, that an operation very near, if not altogether as strange, as that which is called projection, and in the difficultest points much of the same nature with it, may safely be admitted. For our experiment plainly shews, that gold, though confessedly the most homogeneous, and the least mutable of metals, may be, in a very short time (perhaps not amounting to many minutes) exceedingly changed both as to malleableness, colour, homogeneity, and, which is more, specifick gravity; and all this by so very inconsiderable a portion of injected powder, that since the gold that was wrought on, weighed two of our English drams, and consequently an hundred and twenty grains, an easy computation will assure us, that the medicine did thus powerfully act, according to my estimate (which was the modeifest) upon near a thousand times (for it was above nine hundred and fifty) it's weight of gold, and according to my assistant's estimate did (as they speak) go near upon twelve hundred; so that if it were fit to apply to this anti-elixir (as I formerly ventured to call it) what is said of the true elixir by divers of the chemical philosophers, who will have the virtue of their stone increased in such a proportion, as that, at first, it will transmute but ten times it's weight, after the next rotation an hundred times, and after the next to that, a thousand; our powder may, in their language, be stiled a medicine of the third order.—He concludes thus: 'I presume, that it will not be the less liked, if I add, that I will allow the company to believe, that as extraordinary as I perceive most of you think the phenomena of the lately recited experiment; yet, I have not (because I must not do it) as yet acquainted you with the strangest effect of our admirable powder.'

We have been the more careful in stating the whole detail of matters of fact, in Mr Boyle's own words, because, notwithstanding this is stiled an anti-elixir, and the operation itself a degradation of gold; yet some of the students in Hermetick Philosophy have conjectured, from a variety of passages in this narration, all of which have been retained in this note, that this was, in reality, the true elixir, and that the powder employed in the experiment might possibly be recovered with some addition, as well as part of the gold. This, they imagine, is hinted at in the very last words relating to the concealed wonders of this extraordinary powder, which they interpret in their own favour; and if, after this hint, the reader will peruse the whole over again, or take the trouble of recurring to the discourse, at large, as it stands in the collection of our honourable author's works, he will be the better able to judge, how far this conjecture is, or is not founded. It may not be improper to add, that as Mr Boyle in many places intimates, that he did not absolutely disbelieve the possibility of transmutation, he must have had some very strong reasons to incline his opinion that way; and it is not easy to assign a stronger than this, if the conjecture, before mentioned, has any foundation in truth. But whether it has or has not, this discourse will lose nothing of it's merit, since taking it in what light one will, the experiment is one of the most extraordinary that has ever been mentioned; and cannot fail of leading a judicious person into such reflections, as will give him a greater insight into the true nature of metals, than almost any thing upon the subject, that has been published in our own or any other language.

excellent work, intituled, An Essay of the great Effects of languid and unbedded Motion, with an Appendix, containing an Experimental Discourse of some hitherto little-regarded Causes of the Infalubrity and Salubrity of the Air, and it's Effects (f), than which, none of his treatises were ever received with greater or more general applause. He published, in the same year, A Dissertation on the Reconciliableness of Specifick Medicines to the Corpuscular Philosophy, to which he added, a Discourse of the Advantages attending the use of simple Medicines (g). To these Philosophical, he added a most excellent Theological Discourse, Of the high Veneration Man's Intellect owes to God, particularly for his Wisdom and Power (h), being a part of a much larger work, which he signified to the world, to prevent any exception from being taken at the abrupt manner of it's beginning. At the entrance of the succeeding year, 1686, came abroad his Free Enquiry into the vulgarly received Notion of NATURE (i), one of the most important and useful pieces that ever fell from his pen, and which will be always admired and esteemed, by such as have a true zeal for Religion and intelligible Philosophy. In the month of June, the same year, his friend Dr Gilbert Burnet, afterwards Lord Bishop of Sarum, transmitted to him from Holland, his account of his travels through France, Switzerland, and Italy, which were afterwards published. In 1687, a work which he had drawn up in his youth, intituled, The Martyrdom of Theodora and Dydimia (k), came from the press to the hands of the publick. In 1688, he obliged the world with a most curious and useful treatise, intituled, A Disquisition into the final Causes of Natural Things (l), and whether, if at all, with what Caution a Naturalist should admit them. To which is added, An Appendix about vitiated Sight. In this piece he treats with great judgment and perspicuity, many of the deepest and most abstracted notions in Philosophy and Religion, so as to give satisfaction to the candid, without running into any offensive notions, in the opinion even of the most critical reader; which is a felicity, that, in cases of this nature, has very rarely attended the writings of any other author than Mr Boyle; whose care was equal to his quickness, and whose caution hindered him from hazarding any thing, that might shock weak minds or tender consciences. In the month of May, this year, our author, however unwillingly, was constrained to make his complaint to the publick, of some inconveniences under which he had long laboured, which he did by an Advertisement addressed to J. W. (m), to be communicated to such of his friends as are Virtuosi, to inform them of the loss of many of his writings, and that it might serve as an explanatory preface to some of his mutilated and unfinished pieces. One cannot well conceive any thing, that gives a higher or more expressive notion of the worth and excellency of this great man, than this paper, which, had it come from any other person, would have been either regarded as a common and trivial advertisement, or as a very glaring mark of self-conceit and vanity; but, in reference to Mr Boyle, it appears so necessary to himself, that it could not be omitted; of such importance to the publick, that it can never be forgot; and so cautiously digested, as to raise our admiration and esteem for it's author [R]. He began now to find, that his health, (f) At the same place, in the same size; reprinted in 1690.

(g) Printed at London, in 8vo; and published in Latin the next year.

(h) At the same place, in the same size; afterwards translated into Latin.

(i) Printed at London, in 8vo; again 1687, in Latin, 12mo.

(k) Printed at London, in 8vo.

(l) At the same place, and in the same size.

(m) See Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 78, 79.

(34) See the Advertisement at large in the Appendix to Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 142.

[R] As to raise our esteem for it's author. In this advertisement, Mr Boyle, in the first place, gives the immediate reason of his being obliged to publish it, which was to satisfy the lovers of learning in general, as well as the circle of his own friends and acquaintance in particular, why he did not perform the several promises he had made of publishing many discourses upon curious and useful subjects; and some that were absolutely necessary to the elucidation of pieces which he had already given to the publick (34). The fact was, that numbers of these were lost, or rather stolen from him. When he first began to write, he digested his materials in paper books, but he soon found the inconvenience of this, by their vanishing in such a manner, that he often lost a whole discourse at a time: He had then recourse to loose sheets, which he thought more secure, because it would be difficult to carry away any consecutive part of a discourse; but in this too he was mistaken, for after taking this method he lost four or five centuries of experiments, which were to have been inserted in his works; and besides this, seven or eight centuries of notions, remarks, explications, &c. yet even these losses were light in comparison of another that befel him by a very odd accident. He had a flat chest of drawers made on purpose for the security of his finished writings, and such as he judged to be already in or near a condition of being sent to the press; and his servant breaking a bottle of oyl of vitriol, the liquor run over the top of the chest, so that notwithstanding the drawers were immediately taken out, and the writings out of them, many whole treatises were entirely discharged, and the rest so spoiled in many places, that it was very difficult for him to set them right again. These misfortunes put him upon publishing such treatises, as he had most at heart, as quickly as it lay in his power, and in the best manner the expedition with which he was obliged to write, would admit. In order to this, having first settled the heads of these discourses, he wrote them by way of titles, upon different sheets of paper, and transferred his materials under those heads, as his conveniency would allow, chusing rather to run the hazard of some mistakes and imperfections, than that the world should be deprived of what, with infinite labour, he had collected for the service of learning and of mankind. At the same time that he did this, he thought it incumbent upon him to acquaint the world with these facts and reasons, not only that they might, in some measure, account for the seeming improprieties in the conduct of writings; but also that he might render them more intelligible, and that this advertisement might, as he declared he intended it should, serve as a kind of preface to his mutilated works: neither were these all hardships that he met with as an author (35), for many persons, both at home and abroad, copied his works without naming him; inserted his experiments with a few trivial alterations as their own, and arrogated to themselves several of his inventions: yet all these difficulties could not either disgust, or discourage him from continuing to serve the publick, as far as lay in his power. He knew the importance of his own discoveries; he was sensible of their consequence to posterity; and he had a true notion of the obligations, that a man is under, not to suffer the lights he has acquired, either by study, or communication, to perish with him; and it was these considerations that induced him to quicken his endeavours to fulfil his duty, as he found his strength decay, and, like a faithful servant, employ even his very last moments for the benefit of the Republick of Letters, which he considered as a society that did the greatest honour to human nature. Such were the real sentiments of Mr Boyle! which can never be insisted upon too long, and which it is impossible to commend enough.

(35) See these facts collected from his own Papers, in the Life of Mr Boyle, p. 79.

health, notwithstanding all his care and caution, began sensibly to decline, and his strength to decay, which put him upon devising every method that was possible, for husbanding his time for the future for the benefit of the learned world. In doing this, he preferred generals to particulars; and the assistance of the whole Republick of Letters, to that of any branch, by what ties soever he might be connected therewith. It was from this view, that he no longer communicated particular discourses, or new discoveries to the Royal Society, because this could not be done, without withdrawing his thoughts from tasks which he thought of still greater importance (n). It was the more steadily to attend to these, that he resigned his post of Governor of the Corporation for propagating the Gospel in New England; nay, he went so far as to signify to the world, that he could no longer receive visits as usual, and all this that he might have leisure to put his papers in order, to supply the blanks he had left in many of his treatises, and to repair the deficiencies in others (occasioned by the falling upon them of corrosive liquors); that, as he had been useful to the publick during the whole course of his life, so the vast collections he left behind him (of the importance of which he was the best judge) might not prove useless after his decease (o). This was certainly an instance of learned patriotism, worthy of admiration at least; and, if such a genius should ever rise again, of imitation. Among the other great works, which, by this means, he gained time to finish, there is great reason to believe, that one was a Collection of Elaborate Processes in Chemistry, concerning which he wrote a letter to a friend, which is still extant, but the piece itself was never published, nor some other curious tracts relating to the same subject, found amongst his papers, which has been considered as an irreparable loss, to such as have a fondness for these kind of studies (p); [S]. In 1690, he published his MEDICINA HYDROSTATICA: or, Hydrostatics applied to the Materia Medica, shewing how, by the Weight that divers bodies used in Physick have in Water, one may discover whether they be genuine or adulterate. To which is subjoined, A previous Hydrostatical Way of estimating Ores (q). He informs us, in the postscript of this treatise, that he had prepared materials sufficient for a second volume, which he promised, but it never appeared. He published, however, this year, another most excellent work, which bore the following title: The Christian Virtuoso (r); shewing, that by being addicted to Experimental Philosophy, a man is rather assisted than indisposed to be a good Christian. The first Part. To which are are subjoined, I. A Discourse about the Distinction that represents some Things as above Reason, but not contrary to Reason. II. The first Chapters of a Discourse, intituled, Greatness of Mind promoted by Christianity.

(n) He published an advertisement to this purpose by advice of his Physician, Sir Edmund King.

(o) See the Preface to the Works of the Hon. Robert Boyle, in five Volumes, fol. Printed for A. Millar, London, 1744.

(p) Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 81.

(q) Printed at London, in 8vo.

(r) Printed in the Savoy, 8vo.

[S] Such as have a fondness for these kind of studies. The person to whom Mr Boyle addressed the letter mentioned in the text, is to us unknown, but the reason and design of his letter is expressed in the text. What the nature was of that valuable work, which he committed to the charge of this friend, and which has been most unkindly withheld from the publick, will best appear in his own words (36), which, at the same time that they express his generous concern for, and love to, mankind, sufficiently explain how great a treasure we have lost. 'As to those, says he, who think it strange, that among my other experiments, about metals and minerals; I have not produced those gainful ones, that Alchemists call particulars; it may, I hope, suffice to represent, that being a bachelor, and, through God's bounty, furnished with a competent estate for a younger brother, and freed from any ambition to leave my heirs rich; I had no need to pursue luciferous experiments, to which I so much preferred luciferous ones, that I had a kind of ambition (which I now perceive to have been a vanity) of being able to find, that I cultivated Chemistry with a disinterested mind, neither seeking, nor scarce caring for, any other advantages by it, than those of the improvement of my own knowledge of nature, the gratifying the curious and industrious, and the acquits of some useful helps, to make good and uncommon medicines.

'If I may be allowed to judge of courses by the success, the entertainment that the publick has been pleased to give my endeavours to serve it, will not make me repent of the way I have made choice of to do it in. But, however, since I find myself now grown old, I think it is time to comply with my former intention, to leave a kind of Hermetick legacy to the studious disciples of that art, and to deliver candidly, in the annexed paper, some processes, Chemical and Medicinal, that are less simple and plain, than those barely luciferous ones I have been wont to affect, and of a more difficult and elaborate kind, than those I have hitherto published, and more of kin to the noblest Hermetick secrets, or, as Helmont styles them, Arcana Majora. Some of these I have made and tried, others I have, though not without much difficulty, obtained by exchange, or otherwise, from those that affirm they knew them to be real, and were themselves competent judges, as being some of them disciples of true adepts, or otherwise admitted to their acquaintance and conversation. Most of these processes are clearly enough delivered, and of the rest there is plainly set down, without deceitful terms, as much as may serve to make what is literally taught to be of great utility, though the full and compleat uses are not mentioned, partly because, in spite of my Philanthropy, I was engaged to secrecy as to some of these uses, and partly because I must ingenuously confess it, I am not yet, or perhaps ever shall be, acquainted with them myself. The knowledge I have of your great affection for the publick good, and your particular kindness for me, invites me, among the many Virtuosi in whose friendship I am happy, to intrust the following papers in your hands, earnestly desiring you to impart them to the publick faithfully, and, without envy, verbatim, in my own expressions, as a monument of my good affections to mankind, as well in my Chemical capacity, as in the others, wherein I have been sollicitous to do it service.'

But besides these papers, committed to the care of one whom he esteemed his friend, he left also very many behind him at the time of his death, relating to Chemistry, which, by a letter directed to one of his executors, it appears he desired might be inspected by three Physicians whom he named, that such of them as were most valuable might be preserved (37). The strongest mark, however, that he gave of his peculiar regard for Chemistry, was procuring, in the year 1689, the repeal of a dormant statute, passed in the fifth year of Henry IV, against the multiplying of gold and silver, which hindered all the disciples of the school of Hermes from practising in England, the penalty in that law being no less than felony (38). In that by which it was repealed, directions are given, that whatever gold or silver shall be obtained by this art, or extracted from other metals, shall be brought to the royal mint in the Tower of London (39), and be paid for, according to the current price of bullion.

(36) See this Letter in Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 81.

(37) Letter from Mr John Warr, sen. to his son Mr John Warr, jun. dated July 16, 1692.

(38) Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 83.

(39) See the Statute.

Christianity. In the advertisement prefixed to this work, he mentions a second part of the Christian Virtuoso, which he had begun, and which is actually published in the last edition of his Works, that is to say, imperfect, as he left it, with an Appendix to the first part (s). He communicated about this time, to Mr De la Crose, a very ingenious gentleman, who published a periodical Work, intituled, The History of Learning: An Account of some Observations made in the great Congregation of Waters, by lowering Bottles down into the Sea, six hundred feet deep from the Surface (t). This experiment was made on the second of January 1677-8, by a Captain of a man of war, a man of very good sense, in the presence of a great many other persons, and was, in the judgment of Mr Boyle, a thing of too great value to be lost, and therefore he took this method of preserving it. We are now come to the very last of his works published in his life-time, which was in the spring of the year 1691, and bore this title: EXPERIMENTA & OBSERVATIONES PHYSICÆ (u), wherein are briefly treated of several Subjects relating to Natural Philosophy, in an experimental Way. To which is added, A small Collection of Strange Reports. This is called in the title page the first part, and amongst his papers there were found the second and third parts, but whether compleat or not, I cannot say (w). As for his posthumous Works, they shall be mentioned in a note [T]. About the entrance of the summer of the year last mentioned, he began to feel such an alteration in his health, as induced him to think of settling all his affairs; and accordingly, on the eighteenth of July he signed and sealed his last Will, to which he afterwards added several codicils (x). In the month of October following his distempers increased, which might, perhaps, be owing to his tender concern for the tedious illness of his dear sister the Lady Ranelagh, with whom he had lived many years in the greatest harmony and friendship, and whose indisposition brought her to the grave on the twenty-third of December following. She was, in all respects, a most accomplished, and most extraordinary woman; so that her brother might very justly esteem it the peculiar felicity of his life that he had such a sister, and, in her, so useful a friend, and so agreeable a companion (y). He did not survive her above a week, for on the last day of the year 1691, or, as most authors account it, on Wednesday December the 30th, at three quarters past twelve at night, he departed this life, in the sixty-fifth year of his age (z), and was buried on the seventh of January following, at the upper end of the south side of the chancel of St Martin's in the Fields in Westminster, near the body of his beloved sister, Katharine Viscountess Ranelagh (a). His funeral was decent, and as much without pomp as it was possible, considering the number of persons of distinction that attended it, besides his own numerous relations. His funeral sermon was preached by Dr Gilbert Burnet, Bishop of Sarum, and there are many, who think his performance on that occasion the best he ever published [U].

As

[T] His posthumous Works, they shall be mentioned in a note.] These treatises were either such as were found amongst Mr Boyle's papers after his decease, or were deposited elsewhere, on a confidence of their not being sent abroad during his life-time. The titles of them follow: I. The General History of the Air, designed and begun (40). Concerning the nature and value of this work, we have the testimonies of two of the most ingenious persons of that age, the famous Mr Locke, and the judicious Mr Molyneux, the former, in a letter to the latter, says: 'Though this treatise was left imperfect, yet I think the very design of it will please you, and it is cast into a method, that any one who pleases may add to it, under any of the several titles, as his reading or observation shall furnish him with matters of fact. If such men as you, who are curious and knowing, would join, to what Mr Boyle has collected and prepared, what comes in their way; we might hope, in some time, to have a considerable History of the Air, than which, I scarce know any part of Natural Philosophy would yield more variety and use. But it is a subject too large for the attempts of any one man, and will require the assistance of many hands, to make it a History very short of complete.' Mr Molyneux, in his answer, writes thus: 'I am extremely obliged to you for Mr Boyle's book of Air, which lately came to my hands. It is a vast design, and not to be finished but by the united labours of many heads, and indefatigably prosecuted for many years, so that I despair of seeing any thing complete. However, if many will lend the same helping hands that you have done, I should be in hopes; and certainly there is not a chapter in all Natural Philosophy, of greater use to mankind than what is here proposed (41).' II. Medicinal Experiments: or, a Collection of choice Remedies, for the most part simple, and easily prepared (42). We shall have occasion to speak of this hereafter. III. General Heads for the Natural History of a Country, great or small, drawn out for the use of Travellers and Navigators (43):

To which are added, Other Directions for Navigators, &c. with particular Observations of the most noted Countries in the World. By another hand. These General Heads, were first printed in the Philosophical Transactions, being drawn up by Mr Boyle at the request of the Royal Society. The other Directions, added in this edition, were drawn up by various persons, at divers times, by order of the Royal Society, and printed in different numbers of the Philosophical Transactions (44), but being in pursuance of the plan sketched out by Mr Boyle, were very properly annexed to the preceding ones. IV. A Paper of the Honourable Robert Boyle's, deposited with the Secretaries of the Royal Society, and opened since his death; being an Account of his making the Phosphorus, &c. printed in the Philosophical Transactions (45). V. An Account of a Way of examining Waters as to Purity and Saltness, to be subjoined as an Appendix to a lately printed Letter, about sweetened Water, published in the Philosophical Transactions (46). VI. A Free Discourse against Customary Swearing, and a Diffusive from Cursing (47). VII. Medicinal Experiments: or, a Collection of choice Remedies, chiefly simple, and easily prepared, useful in Families, and fit for the Service of Country People. The third and last Volume published from the Author's Original MSS. Whereunto is added, Several other useful Notes explanatory of the same (48). The first edition of this book was printed in 1688, under the title of Receipts sent to a Friend in America; in 1692 it was reprinted, as we have said before, with the addition of a second part, and a new preface. So that this was, as the title page expresses, the third and last volume, and they have been all three several times reprinted since, in a single volume, and were justly accounted a very excellent collection, and by much the best in their kind. Our author had also drawn up some other pieces of a like nature, as appears from the list of his manuscripts, but these are now missing.

[U] His performance on that occasion the best he ever published.] His Lordship made choice, upon

(s) In the 5th Volume of Boyle's Works.

(t) Hist. of Learning for the month of July, 1691, p. 57, 58.

(u) Printed at London, in 8vo.

(w) See an Account of Mr Boyle's MSS. not printed, in the first Volume of his Works.

(x) Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 84.

(y) See her Character by Bishop Burnet.

(z) Mr Warr's MSS.

(a) Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 85.

(40) Printed at London, 1692, 4to.

(41) Locke's Posthumous Works.

(42) London, 1692, 12mo.

(43) Printed at London, 1692, 12mo.

(44) No. II, p. 186. No. XVIII, p. 315. No. XIX, p. 330.

(45) No. CXCVI, p. 583.

(46) No. CXCVII, p. 627.

(47) Printed at London, 1695, 12mo.

(48) Printed at London, 1698, 12mo.

As to the person of this great man, we are told that Mr Boyle was tall but slender, and his countenance pale and emaciated (b). His constitution was so tender and delicate, that he had divers sorts of cloaks to put on when he went abroad, according to the temperature of the air, and in this he governed himself by his thermometer (c). He escaped, indeed, the small-pox, during his life, but for almost forty years, he laboured under such a feebleness of body, and such lowness of strength and spirits, that it was astonishing how he could read, meditate, try experiments, and write, as he did. He had likewise a weakness in his eyes, which made him very tender of them, and extremely apprehensive of such distempers as might affect them. He imagined also, that if sickness should confine him to his bed, it might raise the pains of the stone to a degree which might be above his strength to support, so that he feared lest his last minutes should prove too hard for him. This was the ground of all the caution and apprehension he was observed to live in. But, as to life itself, he had that just indifference to it, which became so true a Christian. However, his sight began not to grow dim above four hours before he died, and when death came upon him, he had not been above three hours in bed before it made an end of him, (b) Mr Evelyn's Letter to Dr Wotton, March 29, 1696.

(c) From the information of Sir Hans Sloane, Bt.

this occasion, of a text extremely apposite to his subject, viz. For God giveth to a man that is good in his sight, wisdom, knowledge, and joy (49). In the first part of this discourse, he explains very clearly and solidly, the meaning of the words which we have just cited, by shewing, what was meant by a man good in the sight of God, and describing the nature of the wisdom, knowledge, and joy, bestowed upon him as his reward. He then enters on the second part of it, the application of this doctrine to the honourable person deceased, of whom, he tells us, he was the better able to give a character, from the many happy hours he had spent in conversation with him, in the course of nine and twenty years. He gives a large account of Mr Boyle's sincere and unaffected piety, and more especially of his zeal for the Christian religion, without having any narrow notions concerning it, or mistaking, as so many do, a bigotted heat in favour of a particular sect, for that zeal which is the ornament of a true Christian. He mentions, as a proof of this, his noble foundation for Lectures, in defence of the Gospel against infidels of all sorts, the effects of which have been so conspicuous, in the many volumes of excellent Discourses, which have been published in consequence of that noble, and truly pious, foundation. He had, says our Prelate, designed it in his life-time, though some accidents did, upon great considerations, divert him from settling it, but not from ordering it by his Will, that a liberal provision should be made for one, who should, in a very few well-digested Sermons, every year set forth the truth of the Christian religion in general, without descending to the subdivisions among Christians, and who should be changed every third year, that so this noble study and employment might pass through many hands, by which means many might become masters of the argument. He was at the charge of the translation and impression of the New Testament into the Malayan tongue, which he sent over all the East-Indies. He gave a noble reward to him that translated Grotius's incomparable book, of the truth of the Christian religion, into Arabick, and was at the charge of a whole impression, which he took care should be dispersed in all the countries where that language is understood. He was resolved to have carried on the impression of the New Testament in the Turkish language, but the Company thought it became them to be the doers of it, and so suffered him only to give a large share towards it. He was at 700 l. charge in the edition of the Irish Bible, which he ordered to be distributed in Ireland; and he contributed liberally, both to the impression of the Welsh Bible, and of the Irish Bible for Scotland. He gave, during his life, 300 l. to advance the design of propagating the Christian Religion in America; and as soon as he heard, that the East-India Company were entertaining propositions for the like design in the East, he presently sent 100 l. for a beginning, as an example, but intended to carry it much further, when it should be set on foot to purpose. When he understood how large a share he had in impropriations, he ordered very large sums to be given to the incumbents in those parishes, and even to the widows of those who were dead, before this distribution of his bounty. He did this, twice in his life-time, to the amount of above 600 l. and ordered another distribution, as far as his estate would bear, by his will. In other respects, his charities were so bountiful, and so extensive, that they amounted, as this Prelate tells us, from his own knowledge, to upwards of one thousand pounds a year. — But that part of his discourse, which concerns us most, is the copious and eloquent account he has given us of this great man's abilities. — (50). His knowledge, says he, was of so vast an extent, that if it were not for the variety of vouchers in several sorts, I should be afraid to say all I know. He carried the study of the Hebrew very far into the Rabbinical writings, and the other Oriental languages. He had read so much of the Fathers, that he had formed out of it a clear judgment of all the eminent ones. He had read a vast deal on the Scriptures, and had gone very nicely through the whole controversies of Religion, and was a true master of the whole Body of Divinity. He read the whole compass of the Mathematical Sciences; and, though he did not set himself to spring any new game, yet he knew even the abstrusest parts of Geometry. Geography in the several parts of it, that related to Navigation or travelling; History and books of travels were his diversions. He went very nicely through all the parts of Physick, only the tenderness of his nature made him less able to endure the exactness of anatomical dissections, especially of living animals, though he knew these to be most instructing. But for the history of nature, ancient and modern, of the productions of all countries, of the virtues and improvements of plants, of ores and minerals, and all the varieties that are in them, in different climates; he was by much, by very much, the readiest and the perfectest I ever knew in the greatest compass, and with the truest exactness. This put him in the way of making all that vast variety of experiments beyond any man, as far as we know, that ever lived. And in these, as he made a great progress in new discoveries, so he used so nice a strictness, and delivered them with so scrupulous a truth, that all who have examined them, have found, how safely the world may depend upon them. But his peculiar and favourite study was Chemistry, in which he engaged with none of those ravenous and ambitious designs, that draw many into them. His design was only to find out Nature, to see into what principles things might be resolved, and of what they were compounded, and to prepare good medicaments for the bodies of men. He spent neither his time, nor fortune, upon the vain pursuits of high promises and pretensions. He always kept himself within the compass that his estate might well bear. And as he made Chemistry much the better for his dealing in it, so he never made himself either the worse or the poorer for it. It was a charity to others, as well as an entertainment to himself, for the produce of it was distributed by his Sister and others, into whose hands he put it. I will not here amuse you with a list of his astonishing knowledge, or of his great performances this way, they are highly valued all the world over, and his name is every-where mentioned with most particular characters of respect. I will conclude this article with this, in which I appeal to all competent judges, that few men (if any) have been known to have made so great a compass, and to have been so exact in all the parts of it as he was.

(50) Burnet's Funeral Sermon, p. 36, 37.

him, with so little pain, that it was plain the light went out merely for want of oil to maintain the flame (d). The simplicity of his diet, was, in all appearance, that, which preserved him so long beyond all men's expectation. This he practised so strictly, that, in a course of above thirty years, he neither eat or drank to gratify the varieties of appetite, but merely to support nature, and was so regular in it, that he never once transgressed the rule, measure, and kind, which were prescribed him. In his first addresses, when he was to speak or answer, he sometimes hesitated a little rather than stammered, or repeated the same word, and this, as it rendered him slow and deliberate, so, after the first effort, he proceeded without the least interruption in his discourse (e). He was never married, but Mr Evelyn was assured, that he courted the beautiful and ingenious daughter of Cary Earl of Monmouth, and that to this passion was owing his Seraphick Love. But it does not appear, from any of his writings, that he had ever entertained thoughts of this kind (f). To say the truth, he seems to have been persuaded that he was born for nobler purposes than the ordinary lot of men, or at least, if he was not so persuaded, his actions were such as may so persuade us. We have, by the help of those industrious and worthy persons who had already provided the materials, followed him from his infancy to the grave, with that degree of wonder, reverence, and respect, which his knowledge, virtue, and piety, demand (g). The learned Prelate who preached his funeral sermon, and one who seldom wanted words when he meant to describe any character, owns himself at a loss in the performance of this last duty to Mr Boyle. We may, therefore, with greater reason excuse ourselves, as well on account of the great length of this article, as the difficulties that lie in the way of framing a character for one, whose memory, like the paintings of a great master, has been meliorated by time, and is now, not the object barely of admiration, but of veneration also. He was a man, who, in the beginning of his life, raised such hopes as hurt themselves, for those who considered him most attentively, scarce thought it possible that they should be answered, and yet, without fear of flattery, we may affirm, that these, even these, hopes, were exceeded. He attained the vigour of his age in those deplorable times, when the Church and State lay buried in confusion, which gave him so true a notion of the vanity of titles, and the danger of power, that he not only never courted either, but was industrious in shunning both. He made Philosophy the business of his life, from the two noblest motives that man could possibly conceive, the desire of doing good to others, and of manifesting the goodness of that Divine Being who is the parent of all. Yet, full of these serious and sublime intentions, he not only condescended to behave, in all the common offices of life, like other men, but even with a peculiar civility, which he shewed especially towards foreigners, by whom he was often visited, and who never went away from him but with full satisfaction. His temper was naturally haughty, but he corrected this so early in his youth, that except now and then in his countenance, it was never discerned afterwards. The sweetness of his disposition, and that meekness of mind which discovered itself in all he did, never led him into any of those faults, which usually attend the excess even of these amiable qualities. He could be warm when there was a proper occasion for warmth, that is, in the cause of truth, which he always vigorously defended; and we have an instance of his zeal for the essentials of religion, of which it would be an injury done his fame not to take notice [X]. The extensiveness of his knowledge surpassed every thing but his modesty, [X] Of which it would be an injury done to his fame not to take notice. As great as Mr Boyle's moderation and charity was, in respect to all the different sects in which Christianity was divided, yet he was a constant member of the Church of England, and went to no separate assemblies; but, some time before the Restoration (51), either out of curiosity, or, perhaps, from some more weighty motive, he went to Sir Henry Vane's house in order to hear him, who, at that time, was at the head of a new sect, who called themselves Seekers; neither was this visit of his attended with any disappointment, for he there heard him preach, in a large thronged room, a long sermon on the text of Dan. xii. 2. And many of them that sleep in the dust of the earth shall awake, some to everlasting life, and some to shame and everlasting contempt. The whole scope of Sir Henry's sermon was to shew, that many doctrines of religion that had long been dead and buried in the world, should, before the end of it, be awakened into life, and that many false doctrines, being then likewise revived, should, by the power of truth, be then doomed to shame and everlasting contempt. When Sir Henry had concluded his discourse, Mr Boyle spoke to this effect to him before the people; That being informed, that in such private meetings, it was not uncustomary, for any one of the hearers who was unsatisfied about any matters there uttered, to give in his objections against them, and to prevent any mistakes in the speakers or hearers, he thought himself obliged, for the honour of God's truth, to say, that this place in Daniel, being the clearest one in all the Old Testament for the proof of the resurrection, we ought not to suffer the meaning of it to evaporate into allegory; and the rather, since that inference is made by our Saviour in the New Testament, by way of asserting the resurrection from that place of Daniel in the Old. And that, if it should be denied that the plain and genuine meaning of those words in the Prophet, is to assert the resurrection of dead bodies, he was ready to prove it to be so, both out of the words of the text and context in the original language, and from the best expositors both Christian and Jewish. But that, if this be not denied, and Sir Henry's discourse of the resurrection of doctrines true and false, was designed by him only in the way of occasional meditations on those words in Daniel, and not to enervate the literal sense as the genuine one, then he had nothing further to say. Mr Boyle then sitting down, Sir Henry rose up and said, that his discourse was only in the way of such occasional meditations, which he thought edifying to the people; and declared, that he agreed that the literal sense of the words was the resurrection of dead bodies: and so that meeting broke up. Mr Boyle afterwards speaking of this conference to Sir Peter Pett, observed, that Sir Henry Vane, at that time, being in the height of his authority in the State, and his auditors at that meeting, consisting chiefly of dependants on him, and expectants from him, the fear of losing his favour, would, probably, have restrained them from contradicting any of his interpretations of Scripture, how ridiculous soever. But I (said Mr Boyle) having

(d) See Burnet's Funeral Sermon, p. 31.

(e) Mr Evelyn's Letter above-mentioned.

(f) Birch's Life of Boyle, p. 86.

(g) See the note [7] at the close.

(51) Sir P. Pett's Papers relating to Mr Boyle.

modesty, and his desire of communicating it, which appears equally in all his compositions; for in them we may discern his fear of offending, and his fear of concealing, and this, not from any timid apprehensions of opposition, but from a benevolent inclination to instruct without severity, and to part with wisdom as freely as he had received it. He had the justest conception of truth that the human mind can frame; so cautious in examining and reporting, as to avoid, in the opinion of all true judges, the least imputation of credulity; and, on the other hand, so well acquainted with the power of nature, that he never presumed to set any limits thereto, or hindered any accession of knowledge, by that sort of incredulity which sometimes attends superior learning. In a word, considered in every light, as a man, as a Philosopher, as a Christian, he came as near perfection as the defects of human nature would allow, and though he never sought it, yet the most universal praise, both at home and abroad, waited on his labours living, and have constantly attended his memory; for it may be truly said, that never any fame was more unquestioned, than that of Mr Boyle's both was, and is; and we may with great safety add, that as he is the peculiar honour of his family, and the great glory of this nation, so foreigners, who cannot contend with us in these points, endeavour to outvie us in their commendations [2]. In treating this subject, we have, perhaps, gone too far, no little awe of that kind upon me, thought myself bound to enter the lists with him, as I did, that the sense of the scriptures might not be depraved.

[2] Endeavour to outvie us in their commendations.] We have already observed, that even, in his life-time, the fame of Mr Boyle was so great, that it reached very distant countries, whither his books reached also; and this drew upon him a multitude of visits at home, which, however inconvenient, he bore as long as his health would permit, from the remembrance, as he said, of the satisfaction he had received when admitted to the sight of such as he had an inclination to converse with, when abroad (52). In this he succeeded to the honours that were paid to the great Chancellor Bacon, who foreigners visited as the glory of this country; (and he succeeded, likewise, to that civility and condescension for which that excellent person beforementioned was distinguished) so that Mr John Hughs had reason to say, after observing that Mr Boyle was born the same year that Lord Bacon died, he was the person designed by nature, to succeed to the labours and enquiries of that extraordinary Genius (53). But to proceed to the proper business of this note: The Virtuosi in Italy were among the first who did justice to his merit, and they are still as sensible of the obligations the learned world are under to him for his labours, as it is possible for men to be. Thus the famous Redi, who was himself a great cultivator of Experimental Philosophy, makes no scruple of affirming, that there never was any man so great in this way as our author; and that, perhaps, there never will be his equal in discovering natural causes (54). It would be easy to cite many other authors of the same country to the like purpose; but to avoid prolixity we forbear, and shall content ourselves with observing, that in the Popish Index Librorum Prohibitorum, published at Rome, by order of the Sacred College, dated the twenty-second of December 1700, he is styled a most worthy member of the Royal Society, though, at the same time, three of his books are forbid to be read, viz. His Considerations on the stile of the Scriptures; His Seraphick Love, and his Great Veneration that Man's Intellect owes to God (55). The most considerable of the German writers have shewn the utmost deference for this great man and his writings; as for instance, the most learned Daniel Morhoff mentions him frequently in his Polyhistor (56), and always with the highest applause. Stollius also commends him, but seems not to have been well acquainted with his works, or with his history, since he tells us, he was an English Knight, and expresses a great concern, that Bishop Burnet's funeral sermon on this great man had not been translated into Latin, or into High Dutch, that the excellence of his private character might be the better known (57). Mangetus applauds him highly, and assures us, that he was informed by an English clergyman, who was afterwards a Bishop, that a person, in a mean dress, came into our author's laboratory and made projection, adding, that himself had seen some of that gold; which story I have the rather mentioned, because I take it to be the best authority that can be mentioned for it, though it is very current amongst the lovers of Alchemy, who pretend that Mr Boyle was converted by this experiment (58). It would require a considerable volume to set down the commendations that have been bestowed upon him by the French writers only; and, therefore, we shall content ourselves with mentioning only a few of the latest. I will begin with Count Marilli, who, though an Italian by birth, addressed the most famous of his works to the French Academy of Sciences, of which he was a Member; he opens that work with observing (59), that the famous Robert Boyle was the first who thought of examining the sea, and making us acquainted with so considerable a part of the terraqueous globe. He mentions his treatise de Fundo Maris, and adds, that probably his death, or some other accident, hindered the Republick of Letters from receiving the advantage of his farther observations upon that subject; for, says he, it is apparent from many of his other writings, that he knew perfectly well how to finish whatever he once took in hand. The judicious Mr Bayle, as he had frequent occasion to mention the works of Mr Boyle in his Literary Journal, so he never loses the opportunity of paying both to him and them the respect that they deserve (60). The judicious Rapin speaks of him, as the worthy successor of the great Lord Bacon, and one to whom the learned world was extremely indebted for his care and industry in the improvement of Experimental Philosophy. Father Regnault, after copying from him a multitude of experiments, is pleased to say (61), 'Mr Boyle has contributed so much the more by experiments like these, to the discovery of the truth, in as much as he has taken pains, not only to relate his discoveries, and the manner in which he made them, but has informed us, likewise, in what he failed, as well as in what he succeeded. What he tried to no purpose, prevents our making such trials again; what he tried with effect serves us as well as him, verifies his discoveries, and puts us in the road of making new ones.' The famous Abbé Lenglet du Fresnoy speaks of our author with the utmost veneration, he styles him a great and judicious Chemist, one who was acquainted with all the secrets of that art; and says, that it was purely out of respect for his high character, that he forbore placing him amongst the alchemical writers (62); yet in his chronological table, he gives him his just place, and the praises which he deserves (63). We will conclude his eulogies by foreign writers, with the character bestowed upon him by the judicious Boerhaave. Among the writers, says he, who have treated of Chymistry, with a view to Natural Philosophy and Medicine, we may reckon among the chief, the Honourable Robert Boyle, Esq; through all his writings (64). Such is the extent of this admirable writer's fame, and such the honour he has done his age and nation in foreign countries, where his reputation will extend itself in the same proportion with true Science, and his glory last as long as there shall subsist a true spirit of learning.

But after all, the greatest justice that has been done his memory, we may safely ascribe to the care and industry of some very learned and worthy persons at home. Dr Shaw's (65) Abridgment, and his admirable character of our author and his philosophy, is a monument worthy even of him, and which nothing could surpass, but the late noble collection of the author's own works (66), with the accurate life prefixed to them

(59) Histoire Physique de la Mer, p. 1.

(60) Oeuvres de Bayle, Tom I. p. 79, 665, 726.

(61) L'Origine ancienne de la Physique nouvelle, Tom. III. p. 162.

(62) Histoire de la Philosophie Hermetique, Tom. I. p. 416.

(63) Ibid. p. 48a.

(64) Boerhaave's Chemistry, Vol. I. p. 55.

(65) In three Volumes in 4to, digested under proper heads, illustrated with notes, and other improvements. The second edition was published in 1738.

(66) In five Volumes, fol. 1744, cited through this article.

(52) Burnet's Sermon at Boyle's Funeral.

(53) Spectator, No. 554.

(54) Francisci Redi Experimenta Naturalia, p. 38, 39.

(55) Index Librorum Prohibitorum. Rom. 1704, 12mo, p. 383.

(56) Polyhistor. Literar. Philosoph. & Practic. l. i. ii. 2. l. 6, 4, 20. ll. 3, 5, 7. ll. 1, 15, 17. ll. 2, 1, 7, &c.

(57) Gottlib. Stoll. Introduct. in Histor. Literar. p. 676, 677.

(58) Biblioth. Chemic. Vol. II. in Praefat.

far, but whoever considers it attentively, will easily excuse a fault that it was almost impossible not to commit, and for which we can only atone, by confessing, that all we have, or could say, is so much below his merit, that it serves only to express our sense of it, and our desire of rendering him that justice, which, without abilities equal to his own, can never be performed.

by the Reverend Dr Birch, from the materials provided for Bishop Burnet and Dr Wotton; and those invaluable additions which were communicated by the Reverend and Learned Mr Henry Miles of Tooting in Surrey, Fellow of the Royal Society, who has, on all occasions, expressed a zeal for our author's memory, worthy of the trust reposed in him by Mr Thomas Smyth, late an Apothecary in the Strand, who lived with Mr Boyle seventeen years, and in whose hands his manuscripts were deposited (67). To all these I am greatly indebted for the materials from which this article is composed; and it is from a due sense of gratitude, and thankfulness, that I pay these publick acknowledgments, as having never enjoyed a higher satisfaction, than while using my utmost endeavours to place the life and character of this illustrious person, in such a light as may render it worthy the acceptance, and in some measure, of the approbation of posterity. E

BOYLE (CHARLES) Earl of Orrery in the kingdom of Ireland, and Baron of Marlton in the county of Somerset in Great Britain, was the second son of Roger, the second Earl of Orrery, by the Lady Mary Sackville, daughter to Richard Earl of Dorset and Middlesex (a). He was born in 1676, in the month of August, but upon what day of the month does not appear, at his father's house in Chelsea (b). So much care was taken of his education in his junior years, that when he was but fifteen he was fit for the university, and was accordingly entered as a Nobleman of Christ-Church in Oxford, in 1690 (c). He had for his tutors there, the celebrated Dr Francis Atterbury, afterwards Bishop of Rochester, and the reverend Dr Freind. His application to study was so vigorous, and withal so constant, that his friends were not a little apprehensive it might prove dangerous to his constitution, which was none of the strongest (d). But, however, Mr Boyle was not much affected with such representations; he knew that science was a higher blessing than life, and was persuaded that death was not a greater evil than ignorance. In short, his passion for letters was so strong and so sincere, that it gained him high reputation in the university, and recommended him so much to the famous Dr Aldrich, then at the head of that learned society, that it was originally for his use he drew up his learned Compendium of Logick, now read at Christ-Church, and in which he styles him the great ornament of our college (e). The first work that fell from the pen of our illustrious student, was The Life of LYSSANDER, translated from the Greek of Plutarch, in which performance he shewed his skill in that language, and the happy talent he possessed of writing well in his own (f). [A]. It was this that induced Dean Aldrich, who made a custom of publishing annually some good author or other, to recommend to Mr Boyle the care of a new edition of the Epistles of Phalaris, to which Mr Boyle applied himself with diligence, and sent it abroad in the beginning of 1695 (g). This book became accidentally the cause of a very long and furious dispute, in which, whoever lost, it is certain Mr Boyle gained a great deal of reputation, and wrote so extremely well in defence of his performance, that his adversary, from suspecting the Epistles of Phalaris to be none of his, because they were written with so great skill, began, from the learning shown in Mr Boyle's pieces, to doubt whether they were of his composing [B]. His father being dead,

[A] The happy talent he possessed of writing well in his own. We have Mr Budgell's authority upon this head, in terms much stronger than have been made use of in the text, and this makes it necessary to explain the matter here. Mr Budgell's words are (1); 'The first thing he published while he was a student at Christ-Church, was a translation of the life of Lyfander, as it now stands in our English Plutarch's lives.' It is indeed very true, that we have a Translation of Plutarch's lives by several hands, which was undertaken by the advice, carried on by the assistance, and the first volume of it published and dedicated by the immortal Dryden, to the Great Duke of Ormond, grandfather to the late Duke (2); but it is certain, that this work was undertaken in 1683, consequently when Mr Boyle was but in the eighth year of his age, and seven years before he came to the university; it is true indeed, that there have been various editions of the book since, and it is not impossible that alterations might be made in some of these editions; but in that which I have before me, printed in 1711, the life of Lyfander (3), which is in the third volume; is translated by William Leman, Master of Arts, of Cambridge. I apprehend therefore there is some mistake, and that this life of Lyfander, by the Honourable Charles Boyle, Esq; was written only, and not printed; because I cannot conceive how it should be left out of subsequent editions, if it had been inserted in any so early as 1694; at least of this opinion I shall remain till I am convinced of the contrary, by being so happy to meet with an edition, in which this Life, by Mr Boyle, is inserted. But I think it very probable, that such a translation as this, might be his first work; because I have heard from other hands, that he translated one of the orations of Demosthenes, which is certainly published, though I cannot take upon me to say with certainty, which of those orations it is; though I was once possessed of a copy, in which that oration was marked by the hand of the gentleman, from whom I received that information (4); and I very well remember that it was observed, this translation was not only very exact, but the harmony and turn of the periods were so happily preserved, that it had all the spirit and beauty of an original. I therefore presume that his perfect knowledge of the Greek tongue, being first manifested by the translation of the life of Lyfander, or some such exercise, induced Dean Aldrich to put him upon that work, of which mention has been made in the text, and a farther account will be given in the ensuing note.

[B] To doubt whether they were of his composing. As the history of this controversy has been already given in a former part of this work, I shall not detain the reader long upon it here (5). While Mr Boyle was preparing his edition, he had directed that the copy he made use of, should be collated with the manuscript in the King's Library, of which Doctor Bentley was the keeper; and it was accordingly collated as far as the fortieth epistle; but the Doctor being then about to go out of town, demanded the manuscript from Mr Bennet, Mr Boyle's bookseller; which hindered it's being

(67) See Dr Birch's Preface to his Life of Mr Boyle.

(a) See the article of BOYLE (ROGER) Earl of Orrery, towards the close.

(b) Memoirs of the Family of Boyle.

(c) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1056.

(d) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 156.

(e) Magnum adis nostrae Ornamentum, are the Dean's words.

(f) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 157.

(g) Phalaridis Agrigentinarum Tyranni, Epistolarum, Oxon. 1695, 3vo.

(1) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 157.

(2) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1104.

(3) Plutarch's Lives, Vol. III. p. 156.

(4) The Rev. Mr Knipe, Canon of Christ-Church.

(5) See note [D] in the article of BENTLEY (RICHARD).

and having himself quitted the university, he began to think of entering on the stage of publick life, and accordingly, in 1700, was chosen member for the town of Huntington, which, however, was attended with a petition, and as he spoke in support of his own election with great vivacity, this brought on a dispute of another nature with Mr Wortley (b). In short, they fought in Hyde-Park, in a gravel-pit near the gate which now leads to Grosvenor-square, where, though he had the advantage, his loss of blood was so great by the wounds he received, that he fell into a languishing condition, from whence it was with difficulty that he recovered (i). He was chosen twice afterwards for the same place, but his elder brother Lionel, Earl of Orrery, dying on the twenty-third of August 1703, without issue (k), he succeeded to that title, and entering into the Queen's service, had a regiment given him, at the head of which he distinguished himself so remarkably, that on the thirteenth of October, 1705, he was elected one of the Knights Companions of the most ancient order of the Thistle (l). In the spring of the succeeding year, he married the Lady Elizabeth Cecil, daughter to the Earl of Exeter, by whom he had his only son John, who succeeded him in his honours and estates; but his Lady did not survive many years (m). He was raised to the rank of a Major-General in the year 1709, and was sworn one of her Majesty's most honourable Privy-Council. At the famous battle of the wood, he gave the strongest proofs of his intrepid courage, remaining at the head of his regiment in the warmest part of the action, 'till the victory was compleat, which, as it was one of the most glorious, so it was the dearest bought of any in that war (n). His Lordship had also the honour of being appointed the Queen's Envoy to the States of Brabant and Flanders, in which quality he resided at Brussels, with an appointment of ten pounds per diem, and having discharged that trust with equal spirit and diligence, her Majesty was pleased, by letters patents dated the tenth of September, in the tenth year her reign, to raise him to the dignity of a British Peer, by the title of Lord Boyle, Baron of Marlton in Somersetshire (o). On the accession of the late King to the throne, his Lordship was not only continued in his military command as Colonel of the British Fusiliers, but was also made one of the Lords of the Bed-chamber, and on the third of December 1714, was constituted Lord-Lieutenant, and Custos-Rotulorum of the county of Somerset, having at that time, an equal share in his Majesty's confidence and favour (p). However, in the year 1716, while the King was a Hanover, his regiment was taken from him, upon which his Lordship thought proper to resign his post of Lord of the Bed-chamber.

(b) Parliamentary Register.

(i) Budget's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 202.

(k) See the former article of BOYLE (ROGER) Earl of Orrery, towards the close.

(l) Peerage of England, Tom. IV. p. 259.

(m) Memoirs of the Family of Boyle.

(n) See the article CHURCHILL (JOHN) Duke of Marlborough.

(o) See the Preamble to his Patent in Collins's Peerage, Vol. IV. p. 259.

(p) Budget's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 211.

being perfectly collated; of which Mr Boyle having complained in his preface, Dr Bentley took it so ill, that he was resolved to demolish the reputation which Mr Boyle had gained by publishing this work (6). It is certain, that Suidas, Stobæus, and Photius, looked upon these epistles as genuine, and that some very great modern critics were of the same opinion; which certainly might justify the publishing a new edition of them. There were certain other circumstances, that gave edge to the Doctor's resentment; and amongst these, we may reckon the following passage (7) in Sir William Temple's Essay upon ancient and modern Learning, dedicated to the University of Cambridge. 'It may perhaps be further affirmed in favour of the Ancients, that the oldest books we have, are still in their kind the best. The two most ancient that I know of in prose, among those we call profane authors, are Æsop's fables, and Phalaris's epistles, both living near the same time, which was that of Cyrus and Pythagoras. As the first has been agreed, by all ages since, for the greatest master in his kind; and all others of that sort, have been but imitations of his original; so I think the epistles of Phalaris, to have more race, more spirit, more force of wit and genius than any others I have ever seen, either ancient or modern. I know several learned men, or that usually pass for such, under the name of critics, have not esteemed them genuine, and Politian, with some others, have ascribed them to Lucian: but I think he must have little skill in painting, that cannot find out this to be an original; such diversity of passions upon such variety of actions, and passages of life and government; such freedom of thought, such boldness of expression, such bounty to his friends, such scorn of his enemies, such honour of learned men, such esteem of good, such knowledge of life, such contempt of death, with such fierceness of nature, and cruelty of revenge, could never be represented but by him that possessed them; and I esteem Lucian to have been no more capable of writing, than of acting, what Phalaris did. In all one writ, you find the scholar or the Sophist; and in all the other, the tyrant and the commander.' Mr William Wotton, a very knowing as well as a very learned man, having written against this celebrated piece of Sir William

Temple; Dr Bentley subjoined to his friend's book, his dissertation upon the epistles of Phalaris, in which he gives a character of them, diametrically opposite to that before quoted (8). 'It would be endless, says he, to shew all the silliness and impertinency, in the matter of these epistles; for take them in the whole bulk, they are a fardle of common-places, without either life or spirit, from action and circumstance. You feel by the emptiness and deadness of them, that you converse with some dreaming pedant, with his elbow on his desk; not with an active ambitious tyrant, with his hand on his sword, commanding a million of subjects; all that takes or affects you, is a stiffness, stateliness, and openness of stile, but as that is improper and unbecoming in all epistles, so especially it is quite aliene from the character of Phalaris, a man of business and dispatch.' To this Dissertation Mr Boyle replied with great spirit and learning, and the controversy soon grew so warm, that many, and those too no inconsiderable authors, engaged therein with great heat and violence; the truth of the matter was, that it became rather a party quarrel, between the friends and enemies of Christ-Church in Oxford, than a serious dispute, as to the genuineness of Phalaris's epistles; so, that the critics being on one side, and the wits on the other; it became very difficult, if not impossible, to know whether truth was with either; after all, perhaps, neither side was absolutely wrong or right; for as on the one hand, it could scarce be affirmed that Mr Boyle and his friends had cleared their author of all objections; so the most that could be said on the other side was, that Dr Bentley had shown these epistles were originally writ in another Dialect, and were in some places interpolated, which does by no means prove them spurious. A very learned and very judicious writer, I mean Dr Henry Felton, said a very just, and at the said time, a very handsome thing upon our author's dispute, with which we shall conclude this account of it (9). Perhaps (says he) Mr Boyle's book in defence of Phalaris, will be charged upon some sophist too, yet taking it for genuine at present; if we own Doctor Bentley is the better critic, we must acknowledge his antagonist is much the gentlest writer.

(8) Dissertation on Phalaris's Epistles.

(9) Dissertation on reading the Classics, and forming a just Stile, p. 59.

(6) The title of which at large ran thus: Phalaridis Agrigentinorum Tyranni Epistola. Ex MS. recensuit, versione, annotationibus, & vita insuper Autoris donavit Car. Boyle, ex Æde Christi.

(7) Temple's Works, Vol. I. p. 166.

(7) Memoirs of the Family of Boyle.

(r) Oldmixon's History of the Stuarts, Vol. II. p. 657.

(s) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 377.

(t) Memoirs of the Family of Boyle.

(u) Oldmixon's History of the Stuarts, Vol. II. p. 738.

(w) Collins's Feerage, Vol. IV. p. 261.

(x) From the information of those who were his intimate acquaintance.

(y) See the Preamble to his patent, before cited.

(z) Budgell's Memoirs of the Boyles, p. 248.

Bed-chamber. After this time his Lordship did not meddle much with publick affairs (q). He did indeed attend the House of Peers very constantly when in town, and voted agreeably to his sentiments, in regard to all matters of importance; but notwithstanding his extraordinary talents and great experience, he was no speaker (r). Things continued in this situation for some years, but upon the breaking out of what was called Laver's plot, his Lordship was so unfortunate as to fall under the suspicion of the Government, and on the twenty-seventh of September 1722, his Lordship was seized at his house at Britwel, at the same time that his Secretary, who was then in town, was taken into custody likewise, and his papers, in both places, were secured (s). He was brought up to town immediately, and examined before the Privy-Council, after which he was committed to the Tower. Upon the sitting of the Parliament about a month afterwards, the consent of the House of Lords was asked and obtained, for continuing his confinement. This lasted the longer, by reason of the suspension of the Habeas Corpus Act for a twelvemonth, and was so much the harder upon his Lordship, as his constitution was weak, and the small share of health he had, was chiefly preserved to him by the use of constant exercise (t). After six months imprisonment, upon the application of the learned Dr Mead, setting forth, how low he was reduced by a confinement in the highest degree dangerous to one of his tender constitution, he was admitted to bail, the present Earl of Burlington, and the late Lord Carleton, becoming sureties, each in twenty thousand pounds, and his Lordship entering into a recognizance of thirty thousand more, for his appearance (u). But after the strictest enquiries, there was nothing found that could be esteemed a sufficient ground for a prosecution of any kind; so that, after passing through the usual forms, he was absolutely discharged. This accident is thought to have had considerable effects upon his declining constitution, though he survived it several years, and maintained the same freedom, liveliness, and sweetness of temper to the last, dying unexpectedly, after a very short indisposition, on the twenty-eighth of August, 1731, in the fifty-sixth year of his age, extremely beloved and regretted (w). He resembled in his temper and character, and not a little also in his fortunes, his illustrious ancestor the first Earl of Orrery. Like him, he was an Author, a Soldier, and a Statesman. His parts were very quick, and yet, with much vivacity, he was capable of close thinking, and profound meditation. His learning was solid, not pedantick, and though he did not affect the orator in publick, yet, in private conversation, no man spoke with greater ease to himself, or pleasure to those who heard him (x). His studies were of a mixed nature, and his application to them much greater than the world imagined, of which, however, convincing proofs remain [C]. As an officer, he was generally esteemed and beloved, for with a courage fearless of danger, he had as much prudence and circumspection as those who had much greater experience. His soldiers loved him entirely, his superior officers admired and confided in him, his Sovereign knew him fit for, and trusted him in, the most important negotiations (y). As a Statesman, his notions were perfectly clear, as his intentions were entirely upright. He had a just concern for the interest, honour, and glory of his country, which he manifested upon all occasions, without courting popularity, or fearing power. He was a lover of learning, and a friend to learned men; an excellent master, a tender father, and beneficent to all with whom he had any thing to do. His frailties were few, and those of a nature the most excusable, as proceeding chiefly from his constitution, and tending rather to his own detriment than to that of others (z). He was happy in the general esteem of his country, and in the particular affection borne him by his friends, which was the less to be wondered at, since he was himself remarkably steady in his affections, and never thought any difference of fortune could justify the slightest declension in friendship, but with all his warmth of this kind, he had a coldness in another which was no less extraordinary; he not only forgave, but forgot, injuries, and never revenged them otherwise, than by rendering unexpected services to those from whom he had received them.

[C] Of which however convincing proofs remain. We have already seen, what he could perform when a very young man; and it is not easy to suppose, that if his genius for learning had not been somewhat extraordinary, a man of Dean Aldrich's figure and character in the world, would have paid him such compliments, as he did in his preface to his Compendium of Logic mentioned in the text; nor can one readily imagine, that the wits would have so warmly, and so unanimously, have espoused his cause, if they had not been fully satisfied of his having a good title to be one of the number. He wrote a comedy, entitled, As you find it, which was acted with great applause, and is now printed (10); though, I think, he would never allow it in his life-time; the only fault that was ever found with this performance, is, (as Mr Budgell truly says) that it has too much wit; and if this censure has occasioned that dearth, that has since happened, we ought not to be too forward in commending his lordship's play to posterity. He wrote also songs and occasional poems, particularly a copy of verses prefixed to Dr Garth's Dispensary; and a prologue to Mr Southern's play, called the Fate of Capua; but these were only amusements for his vacant hours; and his favourite studies were of another nature, as sufficiently appears in that noble instrument which bears his name, and will make it known to distant nations and latest ages. A machine contrived to represent, mechanically, the Solar System, according to the sentiments of the new Astronomers, and the bare execution of which is said to have gone very near turning the head of the ingenious artificer who made it (11). His lordship had also a strong inclination towards Physick, which induced him not only to buy, and read, whatever was published upon that subject, but put him also upon obtaining from his friends Botanical and Physical accounts of herbs and drugs when they resided in foreign countries. These circumstances abundantly justify all that is said of him in the text, and clearly demonstrate, that he was an honour to his family, and to his country. E

(10) In the second Volume of the Works of Roger Earl of Orrery.

(11) Budgell's Memoirs of the Family of the Boyles, p. 236.

BOYSE, BOYS or BOIS (JOHN) an eminent Divine, and one of the Translators of the Bible, in the reign of King James I (a). He was the son of Mr William Bois, Rector of West Stowe near St Edmunds-Bury in Suffolk; and his mother was descended of an ancient and honourable family in that county, and was also in herself a valuable woman, as we learn from our author in a short character he drew of her [A]. This John Bois who was their only surviving son, was born at Nettlestead in Suffolk, January 3, 1560 (b). He spent his infancy in the house of his father, who taught him with great industry the first rudiments of learning, inasmuch that when John had attained the age of five years, he read the Bible in Hebrew, and not only wrote that language intelligibly, but in a fair and elegant character by that time he was six (c). He went afterwards to Hadley school, where he contracted an intimate acquaintance with John Overall, afterwards Dean of St Paul's, Bishop of Norwich, and his colleague in the Translation of the Bible (d), as the reader will hereafter find. At the age of fourteen he was sent to the University of Cambridge, where he was admitted of St John's College, March 1, 1575, under the tuition of Mr Henry Coppinger. There he quickly distinguished himself by his great skill in the Greek language, of which he gave a strong instance by writing letters therein to the master and senior fellows, when he had been but half a year at college, and thereby obtained a scholarship (e). He afterwards applied himself to his studies so closely, that it was common for him in the summer time, to go to the University library at four in the morning, and continue there 'till eight in the evening without any intermission (f). He was elected Fellow when he had the small-pox, and was (to preserve his seniority) carried wrapped up in blankets to be admitted (g). He first intended to have applied himself to Physick, but fancying himself affected with every disease of which he read, he quitted that science for Divinity, and on June 21, 1583, he was ordained Deacon, by Dr Freaque Bishop of Norwich, and the next day, by virtue of a dispensation, Priest (h). He was chief Greek Lecturer in his college ten years together, all which time he read diligently every day, and for several years he voluntarily read a Greek Lecture at four in the morning in his own chamber, which was frequented by most of the fellows. On the death of his father, he succeeded him in the rectory of West Stowe; but his mother going to live with her brother, he resigned that preferment, though he might have kept it with his fellowship (i). At the age of thirty-six, he married the daughter of Mr Holt, Rector of Boxworth, and succeeded him in that living October 13, 1596; and on his quitting the University, the college gave him 100 l. His wife being very young, and himself wholly addicted to his studies, their affairs took an unhappy turn, so that finding himself deeply in debt, he was forced to sell his choice collection of books, which afflicted him so much, that he had thoughts of quitting his native country. He was however soon brought to a reconciliation with his wife, and they lived together many years after, in perfect harmony [B]. When he began to be acquainted with the neighbouring clergy, he agreed with twelve of them to meet every Friday at one of their houses by turns, to give an account of their studies, and to make a joint improvement of their several labours (k). He usually kept some young scholar in his house, for the instruction of his own children, and the poorer sort of the town, as well as for the benefit of several gentlemen's children who were sent to board with him. When King James I. directed a new translation to be made of the Bible, by persons of the greatest learning, as well at London as the two Universities; Mr Bois was elected one of the Cambridge Translators, and not only performed his own, but also the part that was assigned to another with great reputation, though with no profit, for, except his commons, he had no allowance made him for his close attendance from Monday morning to Saturday evening, in the discharge of this employment (l). As this was an undertaking worthy of it's royal author, so it was admirably conducted, and at length brought to a happy conclusion [C]. Four years were spent in this first service, and then three

(a) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. 1. col. 153. Fuller's Worthies in Suffolk, p. 71. Cambridge Worthies, MS. p. 191.

(b) Life of our author by Dr Anthony Walker, in Peck's Defiderata Curiosa, Vol. II. p. 38, --42.

(c) Some pieces of his writing at that age, were formerly in the hands of the Rev. Mr Dowlin, late Rector of Cottenham in the Isle of Ely.

(d) Fuller's Ch. History, Book x. p. 45.

(e) Peck's Defiderata Curiosa, ubi supra, p. 42.

(f) Dr Walkér was informed of this fact, by his contemporaries at Cambridge.

(g) Peck's Defiderata Curiosa, ubi supra.

(h) Ibid.

(i) We have these particulars from Dr Walker's own knowledge.

(k) Most of these circumstances were collected from the author's notes, in his Almanacks and other books.

(l) Peck's Defiderata Curiosa, ubi supra, p. 47.

[A] Short character he drew of her Her brother was patron of West Stowe, to which he presented our author's father. The account which Mr Bois himself gives of his Mother, was written in her Common-Prayer book, in the words following (1). 'This was my mother's book, my good mother's book. Her name was first Mirabel Poolye; and then afterwards Mirabel Bois; being so called by the name of her husband, my father, William Bois; who lived in the Ministry diverse years, and was buried at a village, not above four miles from St Edmund's Bury, called West Stowe, where he had been pastor, and remained so 'till the time of his death. My mother over lived my father about ten years. For being much alike in years when they married; my father died anno ætatis sue lxxviii, and my mother lxxviii, plus minus. She had read the Bible over twelve times, and the Book of Martyrs twice; besides other books not a few.' It was his custom to write such kind of notes (agreeable to their nature) in all his books, many instances of which are still in the hands of the curious (2).

[B] In perfect harmony.] The village of Boxworth lies in the hundred of Papworth, in the county of Cambridge, and at the distance of about five miles from that university. It was an advowson which he enjoyed in right of his wife; who, together with the living, was bequeathed to him by her dying father. He lived with the former 45, and enjoying the latter 47 years. We are told by the writer of his life, that notwithstanding this accident at the beginning of their wedlock, yet Mr Bois continued to leave all domestick affairs to her management; which shews how sincerely he was reconciled, notwithstanding the loss of his library touched him to the quick; for besides his having in it almost every Greek author then extant, he sold it to a loss as great as the sum to which the debt paid by what it produced, amounted (3). Such are frequently the deplorable distresses of men of great merit and too much modesty!

[C] Brought to a happy conclusion.] The history of this translation of the Bible, which is that still in use, deserves particular notice. There had been several before, and great objections had been made against them all. The first was that of William Tyndall, which brought himself, as well as his book; to the flames

(1) Walker's Life of our author, in Peck's Defiderata Curiosa, Vol. II. lib. viii. p. 38, 39.

(2) The author of this note has seen several of these Memoranda in the hands of clergymen at Cambridge, Ely, and other places.

(3) Peck's Defiderata Curiosa, Vol. II. p. 46.

three copies being sent from Cambridge, Oxford, and Westminster, to Court, a new choice was

(4) Collier's Ecl. Hist. Vol. 11. p. 183.

(5) Havlin's Hist. of the Reformation, p. 9.

(6) Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, P. ii. p. 406.

(7) Strype's Life of Archbishop Whitgift, p. 590, 591.

(8) Fuller's Ch. Hist. Book x. p. 45.

flames (4). However, the people of England were so well pleased with his performance, that, to get it out of their hands, the Bishops made a new translation, to which a learned and pious preface, written by Archbishop Craumer, was prefixed, together with King Henry VIII's instructions; and to give it still greater credit, it was recommended to the people by a royal proclamation, dated May 6, 1541 (5). In the reign of Edward VI. there was another translation, printed in 1549; but this, as well as the former, was not divided into verses. Queen Elizabeth directed a commission to several Bishops, commanding them to review both translations, and by their care came out a third, called from thence the Bishops Bible (6), which had hitherto been used; but after the Hampton-Court conference, King James determined to remedy the defects then complained of, carried immediately into execution a design (7) he had before meditated, of procuring a fourth translation; which he committed to the care of forty-seven reverend and learned persons, divided into six companies, in the following manner (8). I. The Pentateuch, Joshua, Judges, Ruth, first and second books of Samuel, first and second books of Kings, to be translated by ten persons at Westminster, viz. 1. Lancelot Andrews, D. D. Dean of Westminster, afterwards Bishop of Winchester. 2. John Overall, D. D. Dean of St Paul's, afterwards Bishop of Norwich. 3. Hadrianus a Saravia, D. D. 4. Dr Clarke, Fellow of Christ's College in Cambridge, Preacher in Canterbury. 5. Dr John Laifield, Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, Rector of St Clement Danes; he being well skilled in architecture, his judgment was much relied on, with regard to the fabrick of the Tabernacle and Temple. 6. Dr Leigh, Archdeacon of Middlesex, and Rector of Allhallows, Barking. 7. Mr Francis Burgeley. 8. Mr King. 9. Mr Thompson. 10. Mr William Bedwell, of Cambridge, Vicar of Tottenham High Crosse. II. The first and second books of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Job, Psalms, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, to be translated by eight persons at Cambridge, viz. 1. Mr Lively. 2. Mr John Richardson, Fellow of Emanuel College, afterwards D. D. Master first of Peter House, and then of Trinity College. 3. Mr Laurence Chaderton, afterwards D. D. Fellow of Christ's, and Master of Emanuel College. 4. Mr Dillingham, Fellow of Christ's College. 5. Mr Roger Andrews, afterwards D. D. Brother to the Bishop of Winchester, and Master of Jesus College. 6. Mr Harrison, Vice-Master of Trinity College. 7. Mr Robert Spalding, Fellow of St John's College, and Professor of Hebrew. 8. Mr Andrew Byng, Fellow of Peter House, and Hebrew Professor before Mr Spalding. III. The four greater, twelve lesser Prophets, and the Lamentations to be translated by seven persons at Oxford, viz. 1. Dr John Harding, President of Magdalen College. 2. Dr John Reynolds, President of Corpus Christi College. 3. Dr Thomas Holland, Rector of Exeter College, and Regius Professor. 4. Dr Richard Kilby, Rector of Lincoln College. 5. Mr Miles Smith, afterwards D. D. and Bishop of Gloucester; he wrote the preface to the translation. 6. Mr Richard Brett, beneficed at Quanton in Buckinghamshire. 7. Mr Fairclough. IV. The Apocrypha to be translated by seven persons at Cambridge, viz. 1. Dr John Dupont, Prebendary of Ely, and Master of Jesus College. 2. Dr William Braithwait, first Fellow of Emanuel College, and afterwards Master of Gonvil and Caius College. 3. Dr Radclyffe, one of the senior Fellows of Trinity College. 4. Mr Samuel Ward, Fellow of Emanuel College, afterwards D. D. and Master of Sidney College, and Margaret Professor of Divinity. 5. Mr Andrew Downes, Fellow of St John's College, and Greek Professor. 6. Mr John Bois, Rector of Boxworth in Cambridgeshire. 7. Mr Ward, Fellow of Queen's College, and afterwards Prebendary of Chichester, and Rector of Bishop Waltham in Hampshire. V. The four Gospels, Acts of the Apostles, and Apocalypse, to be translated by eight Persons at Oxford, viz. 1. Dr Thomas Ravis, Dean of Christ Church, afterwards Bishop of London. 2. Dr George Abbot, Master of University College, and afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. 3. Mr Eedes. 4. Mr Thomson. 5. Mr Henry Savile. 6. Dr Peryn.

7. Mr Ravens. 8. Mr Harmer. VI. The Epistles to be translated by seven at Westminster, viz. 1. Dr William Barlow, of Trinity Hall in Cambridge, Dean of Chester, and afterwards successively Bishop of Rochester and Lincoln. 2. Dr Hutchenfon. 3. Dr Spencer. 4. Mr Fenton. 5. Mr Rabbet. 6. Mr Sanderfon. 7. Mr Dakins. To these learned persons his Majesty was pleased to give the following instructions. 1. The ordinary Bible, read in the church, commonly called the Bishops Bible, to be followed, and as little altered as the original will permit. 2. The names of the prophets, and the holy writers, with the other names in the text, to be retained as near as may be, according as they are vulgarly used. 3. The old ecclesiastical words to be kept, viz. As the word Church, not to be translated Congregation, &c. 4. When any word hath diverse significations, that to be kept which hath been most commonly used by the most eminent fathers, being agreeable to the propriety of the place, and the analogy of faith. 5. The division of the chapters to be altered, either not at all, or as little as may be, if necessity so require. 6. No marginal notes to be affixed, but only for the explanation of the Hebrew, or Greek words, which cannot, without some circumlocution, so briefly and fully be expressed in the text. 7. Such quotations of places to be marginally set down, as shall serve for the fit reference of one scripture to another. 8. Every particular man of each company, to take the same chapter or chapters, and having translated or amended them severally by himself, where he thinks good, all to meet together, confer what they have done, and agree for their part, what shall stand. 9. As any one company hath dispatched any one book, in this manner they shall send it to the rest, to be considered of seriously and judiciously; for his Majesty is very careful in this point. 10. If any company, upon the review of the book so sent, shall doubt or differ upon any places, to send them word thereof, note the places, and therewithal send their reasons; to which, if they consent not, the difference shall be compounded at the general meeting, which is to be of the chief persons of each company, at the end of the work. 11. When any place of special obscurity is doubted of, letters to be directed by authority, to send to any learned man in the land, for his judgment in such a place. 12. Letters to be sent from every Bishop to the rest of his clergy, admonishing them of this translation in hand, and to move and charge as many as being skilful in the tongues, have taken pains in that hand, to send his particular observations to the company, either at Westminster, Oxford, or Cambridge. 13. The directors in each company to be the Dean of Westminster and Chester for that place, and the King's Professors in the Hebrew and Greek, in each University. 14. These translations to be used, when they agree better with the text than the Bishops Bible, viz. Tindall's, Matthews's, Coverdale's, Whitechurch's Geneva. Besides these directions, three or four of the most ancient and grave Divines, in either of the Universities, not employed in translating, to be assigned by the Vice Chancellor, upon conference with the rest of the Heads, to be overseers of the translations, as well Hebrew as Greek, for the better observation of the fourth rule, above specified. It was very far from being King James's intention, that these learned persons should remain unrewarded, as appears by his letter to the Bishop of London, after the death of Dr Whitgift, Archbishop of Canterbury, wherein he observes, that many of the intended translators had either no ecclesiastical preferment, or else so very small, as little suited their deserts; wherefore he requires him to write to the Archbishop of York, and to all the Bishops of his own Province, not to present to any Prebend or Parsonage, above the value of twenty pounds per annum, either in their own patronage, or that of any person whatsoever, 'till they certified his Majesty thereof, that he might commend some of these learned men thereto; and his Majesty further takes notice, that he had given the like directions as to any that were in his own gift (9). In respect to our author particularly, the King shewed his good will to him, by nominating him one of the Fellows of his new college at Chelsea, tho' he never had any was made of six to revise the whole, that is two from each assembly. Mr Downes and Mr Bois were sent from Cambridge, and meeting their fellow-labourers at Stationers-hall; they went through this second part of their task in nine months, having each from the company of Stationers during that time, thirty shillings a week (m). He afterwards assisted Sir Henry Savile, in the laborious undertaking of publishing the works of St Chrysoftom, in which he was very indefatigable, though in this too he was not very fortunate, for a present of a single copy, was the whole reward of many years labour (n) [D]. His reputation was now at a greater height than his fortune, which being taken notice of by Dr Lancelot Andrews then Bishop of Ely, he was pleased to bestow on him, unasked, a Prebend in his Church, into possession of which he entered August 25, 1615 (o). This was his last preferment, and he behaved himself therein with exemplary prudence and piety, preaching in his own course duly, and readily assisting others at their request (p). He was remarkably careful after his removal to Ely, that his parish should not suffer, and as to his scrupulous regard for the rites of the Church, an extraordinary instance will be found in the notes [E]. He spent the last twenty-eight years of his life in this easy retirement, abating a part, and continuing as his strength would give him leave the rest, of his labours; in his youth he was a great walker, and liked this exercise to the last; even in his old age he studied eight hours in a day, and though the greatest part of his writings were at the request, and for the service of his friends, yet he left a great many manuscripts behind him in his own study [F], particularly a Commentary on almost all the books of the New Testament. He constantly went to church twice if not thrice a day; his charity was very extensive, and rather beyond than according to his abilities. He was a kind master, and a good though in some respects a severe parent, a plain practical preacher, and though he composed his sermons with great diligence, yet in the pulpit he did not use notes. He shewed his loyalty in the worst of times, those in which it was esteemed patriotism to forget all duty to the father of his people, and affection to the Church when she was in the deepest distress (q). His wife died two years before him, and though he supported the loss with temper and moderation, yet he thence forward declined, and finding himself near his end, ordered that he should be carried into the room where his wife died, and there five hours after he departed this life, on January 14, 1643, in the 84th year of his age (r). His funeral was celebrated with much decency on the sixth of February following, Mr Thurston of St John's preaching upon that occasion; his second son, and his younger daughter, survived him; the rest being three sons and two daughters, died before him. As to his

(a) Registr. Whitgift, fol. 155. C.

(m) Fuller's Ch. History, lib. x. p. 45.

(n) Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, ubi supra, p. 49.

(o) Willis's Survey of Cathedrals, Vol. III. p. 277. Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, ubi supra, p. 50.

(p) Cambridge Worthies, p. 191.

(q) Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, ubi supra, p. 49—58.

(r) Willis's Survey of Cathedrals, Vol. III. p. 277.

any benefit thereby, that foundation taking no effect (10); on the contrary it may be presumed, that the very naming him to this might exclude him from other preferment.

[D] Of many years labour. This disappointment was owing to the death of Sir Henry Savile, who, as our author gathered from an expression of his, that he knew no reason why they two should not live together, intended to have made him Fellow of Eaton. This is certain, that at the end of the work, Sir Henry was pleased to manifest a greater approbation of our author's notes, than of those of Mr Downes, which so disgusted that otherwise great man, that he took a pique to our author, and was never reconciled to him, even to the day of his death; tho' Mr Bois had always a great respect for him, and spoke of him upon all occasions, as a person to whom he had great obligations (11).

[E] In the notes. There was a child dropt in his parish by some straggling people, of an age beyond that in which infants are commonly baptized, and yet too young to give testimony of it's own Christianity. There being therefore probability on both sides, and certainty on neither, he applied to Dr Nicholas Felton, then Bishop of Ely, for his direction, but received no satisfactory answer. He dealt to the same purpose with his successor, Dr Henry Buckeridge, but with as little success, and as ineffectual were his applications to Dr Francis White; yet this did not discourage him from informing Dr Matthew Wren, when he became Bishop of Ely, of all that had passed, and receiving his orders to baptize her, he went with great satisfaction from Ely to Boxworth, to perform it, when the woman was 29 years of age, before which time he would never admit her to the holy communion, but had taken care she should be instructed in the principles of religion (12), that she might be fit to receive it when this obstacle was removed, which thus, by his care, was at length effected.

[F] In his own study. Besides the five years he spent in translating the Bible, and his tedious labours about the edition of St Chrysoftom, his notes on the New Testament, and critical remarks on Greek authors, sent him by his friends, he left behind him as many leaves in manuscript, as might tell against the many days of his long life. The author of his life having; shewn how indefatigable he was in his studies, enters into a very curious account of his manner of living, which, for the sake of sedentary persons, deserves to be taken notice of. He made but two meals, dinner and supper, between which, if well, he never so much as drank. After meat he was very careful in picking and rubbing his teeth, by which means he carried them almost all to his grave. After dinner he either sat or walked an hour before he went into his study. Fasting he used occasionally, sometimes twice in a week, sometime once in three weeks. Towards the latter end of his life he would not study after supper, but diverted himself with cheerful conversation for two hours, at which time he would divert his friends with harmless and entertaining stories, of which he had a great fund (13). He had a saying in his mouth frequently, which he learned from Tully, viz. A miss-spent youth, leaves a spent body to old age (14). According to which rule his person, even at the time of his decease, gave evidence of his having lived virtuously and soberly in the days of his youth; for his brow was without wrinkles, his sight was quick, his hearing sharp, his countenance fresh, his head not bald, and his body perfectly sound, a rupture only excepted, which accident, when it first befel him, a person skilled in the cure of that distemper, told him, he could not survive half a year, in hopes of getting a considerable sum out of him, for renewing, which he pretended was in his power, of a lease so near expiring. But the Doctor, either having no opinion of this man's skill, or not thinking his own case so desperate, declined his assistance, and defeated his prediction, by living twenty years, without any great inconvenience. When he was a young student at Cambridge, he received from the learned Dr Whitaker, these three rules for avoiding those distempers which usually attend a sedentary life, to which he adhered with equal constancy and success. The first was to study always standing, the second never to study in a window, the third never to go to bed with his feet cold (15). At that time of day, when hard studying was the only road to reputation, at our Universities, the finding out such rules, and transmitting them to their disciples, was common amongst great men.

(13) Ibid. p. 54.

(14) Intemperans & libidinosa adolescentia, effatum corpus tradidit senectuti. TULL. de Senect.

(15) Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, ubi supra, p. 55.

(10) Fuller's Ch. Hist. Book x. p. 52.

(11) Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, Vol. II. lib. viii. p. 49.

(12) Ibid. p. 51.

his character, his life and labours sufficiently shew what it was. Sir Henry Savile styles him, the most ingenious and most learned Mr Bois (s). Anthony Wood honours him with the title of Profound, and styles him elsewhere an excellent Grecian and Divine (t), neither was his worth unknown to foreigners; only Mr le Clerc has thought fit to censure him for being a warm churchman (u). But as learned and accurate a critick as he, has given our author a much better character (w). That work of his which occasioned these remarks by foreign authors, is so little known here, that without producing their authorities I believe I should scarce be credited in affirming it has been published, and therefore I shall mention all I have met with on this subject in the notes (x). [G]. It is not impossible that other pieces of his may be also published, for it is certain that he left behind him many treatises in the hands of his friends, besides those that were found after his death in his study. He wrote a most admirable Latin stile, as appears particularly from a letter of his that is yet extant to Sir Henry Savile, in which he gives a character of the writings of St John Chryostom, and freely offers his service towards the preparing an accurate edition of the writings of that father for the press (y). It is our duty to discover as much as is possible of the latent works of such learned and laborious persons, that we may not seem less attentive to their merits than strangers, who with great reverence preserve, and are ready with due praises to publish whatever small pieces come to their hands, of eminent English authors, by means of their correspondence abroad; whence it frequently falls out, that such of our writers as have composed in Latin, are better known in foreign countries than in their own, and are, generally speaking, treated with great esteem and respect, unless it may be by some hasty critick, or warm controversial writer, who censures them for maintaining opinions opposite to his, which however is the common fate of the great men in all countries, who have distinguished themselves in the republick of letters (z), and more especially of such as, like our author, apply themselves to the reviewing as well as reviving antient writers, and vindicating them from those hasty judgments, which later authors may have passed upon them. The greatest foe to all scholars is a false critick, but he is most so to a true one.

(s) In Prefat. Oper. S. J. Chrysost. fol.

(t) Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 477. Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 153.

(u) Bibliothecae Universellae, Tom. XVI. p. 68.

(w) See this farther explained in note [G].

(x) Vid. Joh. Christoph. Wolf. in Curis Philolog. Tom. I. Praefat. P. 11.

(y) Pauli Colomnesii Opuscula, p. 161, 162.

(z) See note [E] in the article of BLOUNT (S. THOMAS POPE).

[G] I have met with on this subject in the notes.] The account we have of this work in Dr Walker's life of our author runs thus (16). 'He had written notes upon the four Evangelists, and the Acts of the Apostles, which bear this title, Collatio veteris Interpretis cum quibusdam aliis recentioribus. In these his scope and drift was, ut haberet Mater Ecclesia propriam loquendi formulam. He intended to have gone all through the New Testament; but when the Bishop of Winchester died, (who was his encourager therein) like King Henry the Sixth's builders (of whose work suddenly ended with his life, the half sawn stone in King's College chapel-yard, according to tradition, remains a monument, he desisted, having entered but a little way into the epistle to the Romans. Nor is it a marvel that that clock should leave striking, whose weights were taken off.' This may help to discover about what time Dr Walker penned our author's life, for evident it is, he wrote it before this work was published, as it afterwards was under the following Title. JOHANNIS BOISII Veteris Interpretis cum Beza aliisque recentioribus Collatio in IV Evangelii, et Actis Apostolorum. Londini, 1655, 8vo. But there was a very few printed, so that it has been for a long time excessively scarce. The very learned Isaac Casaubon mentions the great performance on St Chryostom with respect, and in terms which shew how much he approved the author's design, and how well pleased he was with it's execution (17). Mr Le Clerc went out of his way on purpose to censure our author, as not professing to give us any extract of his work, but contenting himself with pronouncing his judgment on him and his book, by saying, He was a great enemy to the Nonconformists, and condemns all that they approve, rather out of a spirit of party, than for any solid reasons (18). But he might as well have said, he was an enemy to any other set of men from whom he differed in opinion; since this is the sole evidence he can give of this enmity, for Mr Bois never engaged in any controversy against them. But the judicious and candid Mr Colomies, who was much better acquainted with our literary history than any foreigner, except the ingenious and learned Mr Des Maizeaux, gives us quite another account of the book, and of the man. He says, that he had very learnedly defended the Helena of the Papists, by which he means the Vulgar Translation of the New Testament, which, as he very justly observes, Albericus Gentilis had done before, in a book written expressly for that purpose (19). It may not be amiss to observe here, that this very learned Frenchman is somewhat mistaken, in calling our author Prebendary of Canterbury. It is indeed true, that there was one Dr John Boyse Dean of Canterbury, and contemporary with our author (20), who was also a man of learning, and an author; but he did not write the piece he referred to on this occasion, and consequently we must admit, that there is an error in the name, which may be the more easily pardoned, because in the title-page of the book in question, our author is not stiled Prebendary of Ely, probably because the book was printed in the time of the usurpation, when such distinctions were studiously omitted.

(18) Bibliothecae Universellae, Tom. XVI. p. 68.

(19) Pauli Colomnesii Opuscula, p. 162.

(20) Fuller's Worthies, Kent, p. 84.

(17) If. Casaubon. Epist. p. 85.

(a) Prince's Worthies of Devon, p. 52.

(b) Bale Script. Illustr. M. Byt. Cent. III. cap. xxviii. p. 282. edit. Basil. 1557. Pitts. Relat. Angl. p. 310.

(1) Ap. Prince's Worthies of Devon.

(2) Ibid.

BRACTON (HENRY de), a most celebrated English Lawyer and Judge in the XIIIth century. According to the sentiments of a certain Antiquary, this worthy writer was a native of Devonshire (a) [A]. He studied in his younger years at Oxford, and became a Doctor of both Laws. He afterwards applied himself to the study of our own laws, and became so considerable by his knowledge in them (b), that King Henry III, made him one of his Judges itinerant in the 29th year of his reign, that is about the year 1244 (c), and [A] This worthy writer was a native of Devonshire. This was first asserted by Sir William Pole, in his Description of Devonshire, which is still in MS (1). From him Mr Prince took it, who tells us farther, that in all probability he was born in the parish of Braeton or Bratton, near Oakhampton. That there was an antient Devonshire family of his name is out of doubt (2), neither it is at all improbable, that the Judge might be of it. Yet none of these writers pretend to say what became of his descendants, except that Mr Prince conjectures, his line might end in an heiress, who married one of the Cary family, because he finds the arms of Braeton quartered amongst many others by the Lord Hunfdon (3).

(c) Dugdale in Chion. Scr. p. 13.

(3) Keep's Monument, Westmon. p. 327.

and being still highly in his favour, about ten years afterwards he gave him the Earl of Derby's house in London, to serve him for his habitation in town, 'till the heir of that Earl became of age (d). Many of our modern writers have observed from Bale and Pits, that he was made Chief Justice of England, which post he is said to have held twenty years (e). Some doubts have been raised about this fact, because the accurate Sir William Dugdale takes no notice of this promotion, which however is reported on better authority than these late writers are aware of, as will be shewn in the notes [B]. He exercised his great office with much honour and integrity, at a time when other Judges acted in a very different manner (f). That which hath chiefly contributed to render him famous to posterity, is his excellent work of the Laws of England, to which it is said he himself gave the title of Brito (g), and hence perhaps so many mistakes happened in writing his name [C]. This work as it is one of the antientest, so it has been always esteemed, one of the most accurate and methodical treatises on our laws [D]. Some authors however who have quoted it very freely, have strangely mistaken the writer's meaning; and some who have pretended to criticise them, instead of mending matters have made them much worse [E]. We have no kind of certainty as to the time of our author's death; yet Bale and

(d) Id. Origin. Jurid. p. 56.

(e) See this article in the General Dictionary.

(f) Sir R. Cotton, in his Short View of the Long Reign of Henry III.

(g) Leland, de Script. Brit. cap. cclxxvi.

[B] As will be shewn in the notes.] We owe to Sir William Dugdale all the few dates which we have been able to insert in this life. In his Chronica Series, he tells us, that in the 29th of Henry III, Henry de Bracon and others were constituted Justices Itinerant, for the counties of Nottingham and Derby (4), and in the 30th of the same reign, for the counties of Northumberland, Westmorland, Cumberland, and Lancaster (5). In another place he recites the writ, whereby the King grants him the custody of the house of William de Ferrers, Earl of Derby, which bears date at Winchester, 25th of May, in the 38th of the said King (6). As to his being Chief Justice, it was first mentioned by the celebrated John Leland (7), and he tells us plainly, that he found it in one of the MSS. of our Judge's book, then preserved in a certain library. Hence also Bale took it, for he does not mention him in the first edition of his book, printed in 1549, because probably he had not the opportunity of consulting Leland's book, but in the edition of Basil, in 1557 (8), he transcribes Leland very exactly. Pits wrote after him only according to his usual custom, he runs out into a long panegyrick on the Judge's virtues (9), for which however he had no other warrant than what he met with in Bale. One thing is observable, that these writers call our author Braconus in Latin, whereas Leland calls him Brachedunus, which is one reason, perhaps, why his authority has been by many people overlooked. If we should suppose that he was made Chief Justice, when he had the house given him at London, we must then place his death in anno domini 1273, that is in the first year of Edward I. which agrees perfectly well with the other authorities, and with the dates in his own writings.

[C] So many mistakes happened in writing his name.] Bishop Nicholson tells us, that his name was variously written in the records nearest his own time, wherein, says he, we find him called Bratton, Breton, Bretton, Briton, Britton, and Brytton (10), he might have added a great many more, since at this time he took his name to be John, confounding him with John Breton, Bishop of Hereford, who was a Doctor of both laws, and who wrote a very large work, concerning the laws of England (11). It is to Leland we owe the knowledge of our author's giving the title of Brito to his work (12), which he found in the before-mentioned MS. though it is generally entitled, de Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ. In his first chapter, our author tells us fairly, that, 'whereas England was governed by unwritten customs, which differed in several places, these laws were liable to frequent misconstructions, not only from the ignorance of those who took upon them to decide before they were well versed in the laws, but also from the arrogance of others, who taking advantage of these differences, fought rather to follow their own opinions, than the laws, therefore, for the sake of the less knowing, he, the said Henry de Bracon, had resolved to reduce these things into a regular method, under proper heads, of which he desires the reader's favourable acceptance (13).' There are indeed some variations in the MSS. even in this passage, however we may be sure that Brachdon, Braçtoo, or Bratton, was certainly his name, and that all the other appellations must either be referred to his book, or to the before-mentioned Bishop. As to his christian name, there never was any dispute about it, Bishop Nicholson's calling him John (14), being a plain mistake, and not the only one neither into which he has fallen about our author, either for want of reading his work, or for want attending to what he read, as will sufficiently appear in some of the following notes.

[D] Methodical treatises on our laws.] We have already given the title of this book, wherein our author professes to treat of the laws and customs of England, and therefore we need not repeat it. It is divided into five books, and those again, except the two first Books, into several tracts, of which the third contains two, the fourth seven, and the fifth five. The method is plainly the same with that of the Emperor Justinian (15), as Bishop Nicholson observes from the preface to one of the printed editions (16), but it is a great mistake to say he begins with the several legal methods of procuring properties, for this is the subject of his second book. In the first he speaks of the division of things, of law in general, of the several kinds of laws, of personal distinctions, and of several kinds of estates. Then he shews how property may be lawfully acquired, how it is to be maintained and defended, and how recovered. Throughout the whole there runs a proper register of writs, and whatever he delivers as law, is justified by the report of cases adjudged, so that it is not easy to conceive how a more regular, or useful book could be composed at the time in which he lived. The author's great deference for the Papal power is the only thing that can be objected to him, and for this the author of the preface endeavours to account, by saying that Bracon wrote but a little after King John had resigned his crown to the Pope, in which Bishop Nicholson follows him precisely, tho' without quoting (17). But unluckily Bracon sets this excuse aside, since by the records he cites, it is plain that he did not set pen to paper 'till between fifty and sixty years after that event (18), and consequently he could not be much influenced thereby. The true reason of his writing in this stile, was his being himself a Canonist, and because in those days the laws of the land favoured the Papal power, the error therefore was in them, and not in him, so that any excuse is needless. The first printed edition of Bracon is at London, in 1569 in folio. In 1640 it was printed in 4to, and great pains was taken, by collating various MSS. to make the text as perfect as might be, of which we have a large account in the preface. There is also a table of various readings, and an excellent one of contents. Mr Selden mentions our author frequently in several of his works, particularly in his Titles of Honour (19). It may not be amiss to observe, that his remarks relate to the first edition, which was indeed very faulty.

[E] Instead of mending matters have made them much worse.] The trial and murder of King Charles I. were things of such an extraordinary nature, that we need not wonder those who had any hand in acting or defending them, should have recourse to any such passages in our law books as might seem to warrant things of this nature. Serjeant Bradshaw therefore, who was President of the High Court of Justice, cited Bracon in his speech at giving sentence (20) on the King. But Milton, in his defence of the people of England against Salmastius (21), quotes him more precisely, his words are these. 'Our antient and famous

(14) Page 139.

(15) Vide Prefat. per T. N. ad edit. Lond. 1640, 4to.

(16) English Historical Library, Part iii. p. 140.

(17) Page 141.

(18) Lib. iii. Tract. ii. c. xxxvii. §. 12. fol. 159.

(19) Edit. Lond. 1614, 4to, p. 263, 270, 281, 334.

(20) See his Speech in the State Trials, Vol. I. p. 993.

(21) Defens. Popul. Anglican. &c. edit. Lond. 1652, 4to, cap. viii. p. 155.

(4) Page 13.

(5) Ibid.

(6) Origin. Jurid. p. 56.

(7) De Script. Brit. cap. cclxxvi.

(8) Page 282.

(9) Page 310.

(10) English Historical Library, Part iii. p. 139. Lond. 1699.

(11) Vide Bale de Script. in Vit. Joan. Briton.

(12) De Script. Brit. cap. cclxxvi.

(13) De Legib. fol. 11.

(b) Bracton de Legib. edit. Lond. 1640, 4to, fol. 159.

(i) The Chronicles of England, Vol. III. p. 276.

and Pits seem to place him too high, when they say he flourished in 1240, since we are sure he did not write his book 'till after the year 1262 (b), perhaps not 'till ten years after, so that probably he survived his master, and died in the reign of Edward I. It is very true, that in Hollinshed (i), he is mentioned in the list of learned men, who flourished under the reign of Henry, and nothing is said of him under that of Edward; but this does not prove that he did not out-live King Henry, but that he did not long out-live him, or make a great figure under his son, which is allowed to be; and at this distance of time, we must, in reference to such things, with probable conjectures, learn to be content.

'mous Lawyer Bracton, in his first book, chap. 8. 'There is no King in the case, says he, where will rules 'the royal; and law does not take place.' And in his 'third book, chap. 9. A King is a King so long as 'he rules well; he becomes a tyrant when he oppresses 'the people committed to his charge. And in the same 'chapter, the King ought to use the power of law and 'right, as God's Minister and Vice-gerent; the power 'of wrong is the devil's, and not God's; when the 'King turns aside to do injustice, he is the Minister of 'the devil (22).—A little after he says. 'Since 'our Kings therefore are liable to be judged, whether 'by the name of Tyrants or of Kings, it must not be 'difficult to assign their legal Judges. Nor will it be 'amiss to consult the same authors upon that point. 'Bracton, book 1. chap. 16. Fleta, book 1. chap.

(22) A Defence of the People of England, by John Milton, 1695, 8vo, p. 194.

'17. The King has his superiors in the Government: 'The law, by which he is made King, and his Court, to 'wit, the Earls, and the Barons: Comites (Earls) 'are as much as to say, Companions; and he that has a 'Companion, has a Master; and therefore if the King 'will be without a bridle, that is, not govern by law, 'they ought to bridle him (23). It is no wonder that 'such as were no Lawyers, knew not how to answer 'these authorities. To avoid losing time therefore, we 'shall pass by their answers, and give the reader the 'passages from which Milton makes his citations at large 'in Bracton's own words, and then the reader will easily 'judge, what weight his authority ought to have. The 'first quotation is from a section which has this title. 'De Dignitate Regis et quod Rex non habet parem, that 'is, Of the Royal dignity, and that the King hath no 'equal (24). The whole section runs thus, Sunt et sub (24) Bracton de Legibus, lib. 1. cap. viii. §. 5. fol. 5, 6.

'Rege Milites, &c. 'There are under the King Knights 'or military persons, who are chosen to exercise arms, 'that with the King and the Nobility they may fight 'and defend their country, and the people of God. 'There are also under the King freemen, and such as 'are subject to them, but all are under him, and he is 'under none save God alone, for he hath no equal in 'his kingdom, otherwise the maxim would fail, an 'equal over his equal hath no authority; much less 'can he have any greater, or his superior, for then he 'must be beneath his subjects, and inferiors cannot be 'equal to superiors. The King therefore ought not to 'be under man, but under God and the law, and un- 'der the law because the law makes him King. The 'King ought to respect the law, because the law re- 'spects him, by giving him dominion and authority, 'for he is not a King where will, but where the law 'prevails. And that he ought to be under the law, 'as he is God's Vice-gerent evidently appears from 'his likeness to, in this respect, Jesus Christ, who 'came here upon earth, because the all merciful God, 'when he resolved to restore lost mankind, made 'choice rather of this method of destroying the works 'of the devil, not by the force of power, but of 'justice, and so would have him under the law, that 'he might redeem those who were under the law, de- 'clining to use force, but rather reason and judgment; 'and so the blessed Virgin Mary, the mother of our 'Lord, though by a singular privilege, she was above 'law, yet to give an example of humility, refused not 'submission to the legal institutions. In like manner 'the King, that his power may not be without re- 'straint, though there is none greater in his kingdom 'to do justice, ought, in submitting thereto, to shew 'the same readiness as the meanest of his subjects. But 'if any claim be made against him, as his writ cannot 'run against himself, the method must be by petition 'that he would correct and amend his own act, which 'if he doth not do, it is sufficient punishment for him 'that he must be accountable unto God. For no man 'must presume to dispute his actions, much less to 'controul them' Milton's next citation is from a 'section of our author's, wherein he proposes to speak 'of the King's ordinary jurisdiction. He tells us it con- 'sists in his acting as God's Vice-gerent, this he says is 'the duty and office of a King, whereas he who governs 'tyrannically, is the minister of the devil (25). Thence 'he takes occasion to shew of how great importance it 'is to Kings themselves, that they consider the dignity 'of their office and act suitably thereto. Immediately 'after he adds, 'But if a King be destitute of this know- 'ledge he destroys himself, because from a corrupt 'head there must descend corruption to the members, 'and if there be not sense and spirit in the governing 'member, it follows, that the rest cannot long per- 'form their functions.' As to the last citation it is 'drawn from that part of Bracton's book, wherein he is 'speaking of Royal Charters, and the best way to un- 'derstand his true sense is to consider his own words

(25) Lib. iii. Tract. i. cap. 9. §. 3. fol. 107. b.

(26) Id. lib. i. cap. xvi. 'None, says he, can judge either of the King's 'Act or of his Charter, so as to make the deed of our 'Lord the King void. But a person may say that the 'King ought to do justice, and in so doing that he 'acts right, and if he acts otherwise wrong, and then 'it is incumbent upon him to redress the injury, that 'he and his Justices may avoid punishment, at the 'judgment of the living God. For the King hath for 'his superior God, as also the law by which he is made 'King. Likewise his Court, consisting of Earls and 'Barons, the former being styled Comites, because they 'are as it were companions of the King, and he who 'hath a companion hath a Master, wherefore if the 'King be without a bridle, that is without law, then 'ought they to bridle him, lest they as well as the King, 'be without bridle, and in this case the subjects cry out 'and say, O Lord Jesus Christ, put a bit, and bridle 'in their jaws, and restrain them; to which our Lord 'shall answer, I will call a strong nation from afar, 'a nation whom they have not known, and whose lan- 'guage they are ignorant of, and they shall destroy 'them, and root them out from the earth, even such 'shall their Judges be, because they refuse to judge 'their subjects justly, and in the end, they shall be 'bound hand and foot, and be thrown into a lake of 'fire, and utter darkness, where there shall be weep- 'ing and gnashing of teeth.' It must be allowed that 'nothing in this passage of Bracton justifies a coercive 'power over the person of the King, because we must 'understand it in such a sense as is agreeable to the pas- 'sage first cited from him; and so it appears, that if 'Bracton be consistent with himself, the scope of his 'book must be inconsistent with that doctrine, which 'Mr Milton cites him to support. A late editor of 'another very ancient law writer, who entitled his book 'Fleta (27), I mean the very ingenious Mr Clarke of the 'Middle-Temple, observes, that both his author and 'Bracton have been cited by some magnifiers of royal 'power, as favourable to the boundless authority of 'Kings. But as he rightly observes, such authors are 'always to be understood, in a legal sense (28), and in- 'deed it were to be wished, that Kings and subjects 'would regulate their conducts, according to the max- 'ims of our old law books, wherein the former are said 'to be absolute in doing good, and incapable of doing 'evil, because none can be legally warranted by them 'so to do; as on the other hand, the latter are exhorted 'to a constant and perpetual obedience because it is for 'their own good. Before we take leave of Bracton, it 'may not be amiss to observe, that one of the most au- 'thentick MSS of this work of his was burnt in the 'fire which happened in the Cotton Library at Ash- 'burnham-house, October the twenty-third, 1731 (29).

(26) Id. lib. i. cap. xvi.

(23) Ibid. p. 195.

(27) Lond. 1735. folio.

(28) Page 28. note 4.

(29) Report from the Committee appointed to view the Cotton Li- brary, p. 42, xii.

BRADFORD (JOHN) a faithful Professor of, and valiant sufferer for, the Reformed Religion, under the cruel persecutions of Popery, in the reign of Queen Mary. He was born in the former part of King Henry the VIII's reign, of genteel parents, in the town of Manchester in Lancashire, where he received good education, not only in the Latin tongue, but arrived to great perfection in writing and accounts, so that he had few equals in those parts (a), for his qualifications of that kind. These excellencies of the pen he had attained to, recommended him to the service of Sir John Harrington, a noble Knight, in great esteem with that King, and his son Edward VI. under whom he was divers times Treasurer, and Pay-Master of the English forces, and builder of the military works or fortifications at Boloign in France (b); where Mr Bradford's dexterity in writing, his exactness in auditing accounts, and readiness of dispatch, rendered him a very useful and much approved clerk, so that it was scarce to be told, whether either lived to the other more beloved, or more profitable (c). He passed several years in this employment, lived in great credit, made a splendid appearance, and was in a fair way both to wealth and worship. Nor was he only entrusted with the care of transacting his master's business with the pen, but with his purse also; so that he appears rather his Deputy than his Clerk, from his own words; where speaking of one Master Thomas Hussey of Lincolnshire, who was some time an officer in the Duke of Norfolk's family, his coming to visit and confer with him, by private directions from the Prelates, when Bradford was, several years after, under their Examination at St Mary Overies for his opinions in religion; and saying, he would speak with me, says Bradford, for old acquaintance sake, he adds. 'For I was at Muttrel journey a Pay-master; in which he was, and had often received money at my hands (d).' And this seems to have been in the year 1544, when King Henry provoked beyond patience, at the assistance which the King of France afforded the Scots against him, went thither with an army in person, conquered Boloign, and article'd afterwards that it should not be restored 'till he was paid eight hundred thousand crowns (e). We have met with but one author who has discovered, and that with a commendable sincerity, the real occasion of Mr Bradford's changing this secular, for a religious course of life. 'Tis certainly one of the most remarkable circumstances in it; for to know how men came by the vicissitudes of their fortune or condition, is one of the most instructive and desirable particulars in their memoirs; and that incident being communicated to the world by an intimate acquaintance of his, it therefore highly deserved to have been revived by all who have related his story. Yet Fox, Holland, Fuller, and others, by whom he has been most largely commemorated, have been silent in this important occurrence; whether thro' their being unacquainted with it, or any needless tenderness towards his memory; as if a flaw in his private character, could diminish the merit of his suffering so heroically in a publick one, we leave for others to distinguish. In short, his pen which raised him to that station in civil life, removed him to an ecclesiastick one, in which he became more lastingly eminent, and exemplary; I say, the volubility of that pen, appears to have been such, that either by under or over-charging an article in his accounts, whereby the King was some considerable loser, he never rested at ease, especially after he had heard a sermon of Mr Latimer's upon Restitution, 'till he had made full satisfaction, and finally settled himself in a more severe calling, above the temptation of all worldly ensnarements. But first of all, after his retiring from that employment in the army, we find him residing for a while in the Inner-Temple; where, as it is said, he studied the common laws of this realm (f), and for some time solicited suits there, for Sir John Harrington, as Dr Fuller informs us (g). In another part of this author's works, it is said, that Bradford bestowed some few hours every day there, in hearing the Reader of the Common Law (h). But whatever he studied or heard in the Temple, it appears by his letters from thence, to his pious friend Mr Traves, that he heard more Sermons than Law-Lectures there; and that he was already grown a Divine, before he had taken the orders of one; but not a word, either of the practice or study of the Law does he mention: and indeed how little that profession interfered with the humiliation, contrition, and deep repentance which had now possessed his heart for the misconduct aforesaid, may be read in his own words, and those of other credible authors [A].

(a) See J. Fox his Acts and Monuments, &c. Vol. III. 1684, fol. 232. Also Dr Fuller's Abel Redivivus, 4to, 1651, p. 180. In the Life of Mr Bradford.

(b) Idem.

(c) See Mr John Bradford's Lyfe, prefixed to his Examinations, &c. before the Lord Chancellor Bishop of Winchester; the Bishop of London, and other Commissioners, &c. printed at London, by W. Griffith, 8vo, 1561, p. 2.

(d) The Examinations of the Constant Martyr of God Mr John Bradford, &c. as before, in the chapter of the private talk had with him, by such as the Prelates sent to him, p. 2.

(e) Speed's Hist. of Great Britain, fol. 1023, p. 1050, &c. Also John Stow's Annals, fol. 1615, p. 591. Also in Biblioth. Cotton. Tiberius, C.VIII. 53.

(f) Mr John Bradford's Lyfe, before his Examination. Also Fox, and Fuller, as above.

(g) Fuller's Worthies of England, in Lancashire.

(h) Abel Redivivus, in the Life of Mr Bradford, p. 181.

[A] May be read in his own words, and those of other credible authors.] Concerning that business of his repentance, and the restitution to be made, as above spoken of, we shall first recite what he mentions himself, in some of his Letters to his said pious friend, Mr John Traves, Minister of Blackley, both after he was removed to the Temple, and to Cambridge. In one of those letters, written from the Temple, the Sunday after the aforesaid famous sermon, as he calls it, which wrought so much upon him, was preached by Latimer, he has these words: 'Since my coming to London, I was with Mr Latimer; whose counsel is, as you shall hear, which I purpose by God's grace to obey. He willed me, as I have done, to write to my master, who is in the country, and to shew him, that, if within a certain time, which I appointed, fourteen days, he do not go about to make Restitution, that I will submit myself to my Lord Protector, and the King's Majestie's Council to confess the fault, and ask pardon. This life is uncertain, and frail; and when time is, it must not be deferred; and what should it profit me, to win the whole world, and to lose my own soul? If, as I justly have deserved, I be put to death for it, God's will be done. At the least, slander, reproach, rebuke, loss of worldly friends, loss of living, &c. shall ensue: What then? Lord, thy will be done, thine I am; if death come, welcome be it, if slander, &c. Even as thou wilt, Lord, so be it. Only grant me a penitent, loving, obedient heart; and of meer love to go forwards herein, and not to shrink; to stand, and not to fall; that thy name only be praised herein. Amen (1).' In another letter written by Mr Bradford to the said Mr Traves, he appears still very solicitous with Sir John Harrington,

(1) Fox's Acts and Monuments, as before, Vol. III. p. 296.

It appears by the earliest dates in those letters, that he was at the Temple in the year 1547, and Harrington, to accommodate this matter. He says therein, That his said master had been in London a few days after he wrote his last, and that he had entreated him to discharge the account, or he would submit himself. Sir John answered him, That if the books would declare it, he would give satisfaction. Bradford shewed the books; whereupon Sir John promised, says he, as much as I could ask. But Sir John being more moved than he had cause, Bradford desired to know how, and in what time, he would discharge them both? Hereupon Sir John thinking him over-curious, anxious, or scrupulous, said, he should not know; nor would he, by answering those words, have his head under his girdle. Yet did Bradford still desire, many times, to know, in what manner, and by what time the said discharge was to be effected; and 'doubting, says he, worldly wisdom, which useth delays, to reign in him, with this mammon, I was something more sharp, and told him, Non ego tamen sed gratia tua, Domine; I would obey God more than man: The which he lightly regarding, as it seemed, I departed, and went to Mr Latimer, to have had him brought me to my Lord Protector, who then purposed shortly to take his Journey to visit the Ports.' Wherefore Latimer advised him to stay 'till his return; which was to be before Easter. In the mean time, his master having made one of his sons an instrument to move Bradford with some worldly views, he thereat prevailed upon him to shew Sir John, more plainly, his further purpose; which when Sir John knew, it so moved and terrified him, that he began somewhat to relent, and then made fair promises, That whatever Bradford should propose, he would comply with: but Bradford's propositions pleased not. And his master, departing out of London, unknown to him, sent him word by another of his sons, who was not of so good principles as the former, and therefore more suspected, that he would do all things Bradford desired; only his fame and ability preserved. And by that son, his master also sent a bill, wherein he declared himself contented, within twelve months, to deliver into Bradford's hands the whole money: But he not thinking it so expressive as it might have been, drew another, and sent it to him, desiring he would sign and seal it; which Mr Latimer thought would be sufficient: 'But as yet, says Bradford, I hear not of it, doubting worldly wisdom; which was the whore that overcame Sampson; that moved David to slay Urias; that brought wise Solomon to idolatry; that crucified Christ; the which moved me to perpetrate hoc facinus; the which worketh in my master's heart; having higher place there, than Timor Domini.' In the conclusion of this letter, after mentioning the present he had made of a fair English and Latin Testament, in one print and volume, to Sir Thomas Hall, he desires Mr Traves to peruse a letter he had herewith sent, then seal and deliver it to Sir Nicholas Wolfenores, having not called it to remembrance this winter, of his being in the country; and wished, 'some occasion, if any could be had, before the delivery of the said letter, by some story or communication, that he did know that abomination to be sin; for I fear me, adds he, he thinketh it to be none: The Lord open our Eyes and forgive us, Amen, &c.

'From the Temple this 22d of March 1547: Yours, in Christ most bounden, John Bradford (2). In the next letter following, to the said father Traves, as our author calls him, the further progress of this business is thus mentioned. 'Concerning the great matter you know of, it hath pleased God to bring it to the end, that I have a bill of my master's hand, wherein he is bound to pay the sum afore Candlemas next coming. This, thinks Mr Latimer to be sufficient. Therefore I pray you to give the gracious Lord thanks, and thanks, and thanks upon it, for me, a most wicked ingrate sinner, who have also, in other things, no less cause to praise God's name, as for that I have and sustain my master's sore displeasure, the which hath brought me, God, I should say, through it, unto more contempt of worldly things, through the sequestration of such his business as tofore I had ado withal—There is yet another thing whereof, I will advertise you, even to this end, that 'you might pray, if it be God's will, that as I trust shortly to begin, so he may vouchsafe to confirm that he hath begun, as, if I be not deceived, I believe it is in working: If the thing seem by God's spirit in you, that I presume, then for the Lord's sake advertise me; for I am much given to that disease, the Lord deliver me, I have moved my master therein already by letters, to see if I shall have any living of him, as hitherto I have had; but I have thereof no answer, nor, as our natural speech is, any likelihood of any grant. Yet, that I have already, I trust will suffice me for three years.—I am minded, afore Midsummer, to leave London, to go to my book at Cambridge, and if God shall give me grace, to be a Minister of his word.—Perchance I do foolishly to forsake so good a living as I have. I will say no more hereof, but pray for me. I trust, as I said, for three years study, I have sufficient, if my master take all from me, and when this is spent, God will send more. I do not writ this, that you should think me to be in need of worldly help; and therefore as Friars were wont, secretly to beg. No, in the Lord's name, I require you not to take it so; for I had rather never send letter, afore I should be herein a cross to you; for sufficit sua diei afflictio: We are more set by, than many sparrows. But if my mother, or Sir Thomas Hall murmur at it or be offended with me, as you can, remedy it, with your counsel. Howbeit, as yet, I will not write to them of it, until such time as I be going. I am something sick-minded, and inconstant, therefore pray for me, that my hand being put to the plough, presumptuously spoken! I look not back. You may gather by my words in this letter, the heroical heart which lieth in me! I have sent you a book of Bucer against Winchester, in English, lately translated, which I never read, therefore I cannot praise it. And, as I call to remembrance, I did send you with the other books, more than you received; at least one of them I remember, which is called The Common Places, or The Declaration of the Faith, by Urbanus Rhegius. Ask for it, or send me word in whom the default is you have it not. Hereafter, and that shortly, by God's grace I will send you Primitivæ Laborum Meorum, a work or two, which I have translated into English; as soon as they be printed; which will be afore Whitson-tide, &c. (3). In the conclusion of this letter which is dated from the Temple, the 12th of May, 1548, he expresses his desire to speak with Sir Tho. Hall, and thinks he may chance to see him the winter following, if he discharges not himself of his office. But whether thereby is meant his office under his master aforesaid, or any other, he might have in that inn of court, we pretend not to explain. Thus have we seen from his own words what advancement this reparation was in, for the misdemeanour aforesaid; also what progress he had made in his studies, and what resolution he had taken to finish them at the University, in the profession of Divinity. Now we may compendiously see, how that Restitution was provided for, out of his own fortune, from the words of his intimate acquaintance, above in the text spoken of, named Thomas Sampson, some time Dean of Christ Church, Oxon. That author informs us, that during this time of his obstructions to enter into that holy life which he now coveted, and soon compassed, 'He was much helped forward by a continual meditation, and practice of repentance and faith in Christ; in which he was kept, by God's grace, notably exercised all the dayes of his lyfe; and that, even in this mean time (of those obstructions) he heard a sermon, which that notable preacher Maister Latimer made before King Edward the sixth, in which he did earnestly speake of Restitution to be made of things falsely gotten; which dyd so strike Bradford to the heart, for one dash of a pen which he had made, without the knowledge of his maister, as full often I have heard him confesse, with plentie of teares; beyng Clarke to the Treasurer of the Kyng's Campe beynd the seas, and was to the deceiving of the King, that he could never be quiet, 'tyll, by the advice of the same maister Latimer, a Restitution was made: Whych thyng to bring to passe, he did wyllingly forbeare and foregoe all that priuate and certain patrimonye which he had

(2) Fox, as before, to p. 298.

(3) Acts and Monuments, ibid.

and part of the year following, and that he is often censuring and upbraiding himself in them with great and undeserved severity; as if his mind was not fully weaned from worldly allurements, or his renunciation of them was not sincere, but that nature unwillingly yielded to those degrees of mortification, whereunto he was habituating himself; yet at last, his resolution to absolutely subdue that reluctance, which arose from a distrust of his abilities, that he removed to Cambridge about the month of August 1548, and there changed his study as well as his profession, as it may again appear from the words of those who knew him, as well as his own [B]. He soon took his degree of Master of Arts at Katharine Hall;

in earth. Let all bribers, and polyng officers, which get to themselves great revenues in earth, by such slippery shiftes, follow his example, left in taking a contrary course, they take a contrary way, and never come where Bradford now is (4). How, and in what degrees this restitution was finally made, will appear in the conclusion of the next note.

[B] From the words of those who knew him, as well as his own. His acquaintance aforesaid, Thomas Sampson, says also of those two changes in Bradford's life, thus; 'Touching the first, after that God touched his heart with that holy and effectual calling, he sold his chaynes, rynges, brooches, and jewels of gold, which before he used to wear, and did bestow the price of this his former vanitie, in the necessary relief of Christ's poor members, which he could hear of, or finde lying sicke, or pining in povertie. Touching the second, he so declared his great zeale and love to promote the Lord Jesus, whose goodness and saving health he had tasted, that to do the same more pithely, he changed his studye, and being in the Inner Temple, London, at the study of the common lawes, he went to Cambridge, to study divinitie (5).' And to the same sense, says another author, Ex rixoso causidico mitissimus Christi Apostolus (6). What he says himself of his removal to, and studies at, Cambridge, we shall gather briefly, from his letters to Mr Traves aforesaid: 'One wherof, he wrote to him, the day he went thither; tho' it is not dated. Therein he still arraigns his own presumption, in adventuring upon so high a charge, or vocation, as he was entering upon; and desires his friend, to pray for him, That God's will be done in him, whether he lives, or dies; so that His name be honoured. My master which was, adds he, hath denied me all his benefice: But I have, for this life, more than enough, thanks be to God, as this winter I intend by God's favour to declare more unto you. This book which I have sent (7), take in good part. It is the first, I trust it shall not be the last, God hath appointed me to translate. The print is very false, I am sorry for it. I pray you be not offended at my babbling in the prologues.' So concludes with this postscript, 'I will lye, God willing, this summer at Catharine Hall in Cambridge (8).'

Accordingly, in his next letter to the same person, we find him there in the middle of August, which we take to be in the year last spoken of, 1548: For he dates it from Catharine Hall upon the Assumption day (9). And in his next following, dated the 22d of October, he says, he has taken his degree of master of Arts; to qualify him for the fellowship he was promised (10). In his next, which seems to be written in 1549, he has these expressions; 'You know that God hath exonerated my loaden conscience, of the great weighty burthen; for so I did write to you. Yea, the Lord hath in a manner unburthened me of the lesser burthen also: For I have an assurance of the payment of the same by Candlemas. Lo, thus you see, what a good God the Lord is unto me! O Father Traves, give thanks for me and pray God to forgive me my unthankfulness! But what should I rehearse the benefits of God towards me? Alas, I cannot, I am too little for his mercies; yea, I am not only unthankful, but I am too far contumelious against God: For where you know the sun, the moon, and the seven stars, did forsake me, and would not shine upon me; you know what I mean, Per horum et heribus amicos; yet, the Lord hath given me here, in the University, as good a living as I would have wished for. I am now a Fellow of Pembroke Hall; for the which, neither I, nor any other for me did, ever make any suit. Yea, there was a contention between the master of Catharine Hall (11), and the Bishop of Rochester, who is master of Pembroke Hall (12), whether should have me: Fit hoc tibi dic- tum. Thus you may see, the Lord's carefulness for me, my Fellowship is worth seven pounds a year; for I have allowed me eighteen pence a week, and as good as thirty-three shillings and four pence a year; besides my chamber, launder, barber, &c. and I am bound to nothing, but once or twice a year to keep a problem (13). He concludes this letter, after many expressions of his own unworthiness, with a request to his correspondent, That he would exhort his mother, now and then, with his sifter Margaret, to fear the Lord; and, if his mother had not parted with the fox-fur which was in his father's gown, he desires, she would send it him, &c. which is here mentioned, that the reader may better guess at the profession of Mr Bradford's said father (14). In the last letter that has been preserved of his, written to the same person, while Bradford continued at Cambridge, after having made the like rigorous reflections upon himself, for his backwardness in spiritual improvements, as he had made in his foregoing letters, he tells Mr Traves concerning Father Latimer, 'I am as familiar with him, as with you: Yea, God so moveth him towards me, that his desire is to have me come and dwell with him, whensoever I will, and welcome. This do I write once more to occasion you to be thankfull for me to the Lord, &c. (15).' Thus we see it is not without reason that he has been described to have been a man in his disposition, behaviour, and conversation, singularly agreeable and engaging; since we saw before, how attractive they rendered him to Dr Sandys, and Bishop Ridley; and now, to Bishop Latimer; of which there is a further testimony in Dr Fuller; who says, 'It is a demonstration to me, that he was of a sweet temper, because, Persons (the Jesuit) who will hardly afford a good word to a Protestant, saith, That he seemed to be of a more soft and mild nature, than many of his fellows (16). Indeed continues Fuller, he was a most holy and mortified man; who, secretly in his closet, would so weep for his sins, one would have thought he would never have smiled again; and then, appearing in publick, he would be so harmlesly pleasant, one would think he had never wept before (17). Now for the conclusion of that great business which had so oppressed his mind; that burthen, before in this note spoken of, which he was so thankful to God, he should be eased of by Candlemas following; as Bishop Latimer was made privy to, and chiefly consulted in it, we conceived hopes he might possibly have preserved some other particulars of it. Therefore having, with some difficulty procured an old edition of that Bishop's sermons, we have diligently sought therein, for that above-mentioned, which wrought this notable conversion; and have found, as we shall read presently in his own words, that he preached the said sermon at court, in the time of Lent, and as we compute, in the year 1548. There are two sermons in this collection, or one divided into two parts, composed directly upon the subject, of rendering unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's; but they are said to have been preached by him at Stamford, and in the month of October, and two years later; all which may be true, and it may be the same sermon he preached at court in Lent, and in the year before mentioned, while Bradford resided in the Temple. But there is another sermon next following these, preached by Latimer before the said King Edward and his Council, in his court at Westminster, in the year 1550, which will give us light to some purpose in that important matter of the restitution above-mentioned: And yet has it been taken notice of by no writer of Bradford's life before. It is grounded upon a text, which nearly borders on the other, Videte, et cavete ab avaritia: Take heed and beware of covetousness. In that part of this sermon, where Latimer sends such a lecture, in his frank (13) Fox, as before, p. 300.

(14) Idem.

(15) Ibidem.

(16) See Rob. Persons his Three Conversions of England, Part ii, 300, 1603, in his Examination of Fox's Kalendar, for the Martyr's in July.

(17) Worthies of England, in Lancashire.

Tho. Sampson's Preface to the Reader, before Two notable sermons, made by a worthy Master John Bradford; the one of Repentance, the other of the Lord's Supper, 1574-5.

Idem. p. 3.

J. Bale, Description, Cent. VIII. Num. 27.

Mentioned in the foregoing note.

Acts and Monuments as before, p. 299.

Idem.

Ibid.

Dr Edwyn Sandys, afterwards Archbishop of York. MSS. Kiv. Tho. Baker.

Dr Nic. Ridley, as above-mentioned, in the text.

(i) T. Sampson, in the Preface to Bradford's Sermons, as quoted in the notes.

(k) Godwin, the Praesul. Angl. Rymeri Fued. Tom. XV. p. 164, 222.

(l) Mr John Bradford's Lyric, before his Examination, as above.

(m) The Life of Mr Bradford in Abel Rediv. aforesaid, p. 181, &c. As none of these authors mention his settling in any other college, we may look upon it as an error in H. Holland's Herologia Anglicana, fol. 151. And in Donald Lupon's Hist. of the Modern Protestant Divines, p. 222, where it is said, that Bradford was of Queen's-college, took all degrees there, and was Master thereof.

(n) The Life of Mr Bradford before his Examinations. See also Fox, and in Abel Redivivus.

(o) Tho. Sampson's Preface, as above, p. 11.

(†) At the end of note [B].

(p) J. Le Neve's Fasti Ecclesiae Anglicanae, fol. 1716, p. 180.

Hall; and Dr Nicholas Ridley, who was not then Bishop of London, as Bradford's friend mistakes (i), being Bishop of Rochester from near a twelvemonth before Bradford went to the University, to the beginning of the year 1550 (k), and also master of Pembroke-Hall, invited him before that year, together with his godly companion Master Thomas Horton, to become Fellows of that Hall, as it is observed by the first writer of his life, who says, 'he laboured so vehemently in the University at his studies, that the first year of his coming thither, he was made Master of Arts, and was soon after chosen Fellow of Pembroke-Hall, where he so profited by the heavenly dexterity of his wit, that he was had in estimation of all good men (l), which is pretty tolerably agreed to in the Computation of a later author, who was not over assiduous in guiding his readers by the light of Chronology, one of the best illuminators of History, where he says, 'That after a year and some few months spent in the University, he attained his degree of Master of Arts, whereunto others are hardly admitted after long examination, and seven years study. But such was his carriage, diligence, and proficiency, that this favour, tho' extraordinary and insolent, was thought well bestowed upon him by the whole University; and left any man may think it was rather differenced to his years, than his abilities, he was immediately hereafter without any interposal of time, chosen Fellow of Pembroke-Hall (m).'

The Jesuit who suggested, that Bradford could not be a man of great learning, because he was of so short standing in the University, did not, or would not pretend to know, that he was so good a scholar before he went thither, as to have translated books out of the Latin tongue, which were printed at his first going to Cambridge; as is already in the notes observed: for as Fuller, where he is last quoted, truly says of Bradford, 'he had always been a hard student from his youth; and his writings and disputings give a sufficient testimony of his learning.' Yet was his modesty and diffidence so great, that when Dr Martin Bucer, with whom he was in great esteem there, exhorted him to reserve his talents no longer in private, but to exercise them publickly through the Ministry of the Gospel in the great work of reformation; and he still pleaded his inability, Bucer would reply, 'Though thou couldst not feed them with fine cakes, and white bread, yet should you satisfy them with barley bread (n).' Such like frequent exhortations emboldened him to proceed, though he was sufficiently inclined of his own accord, and only had too scrupulous and humble opinion of himself. The manner of his laying his past sins before his eyes, by the catalogues he made of them, and his inward and retired exercise of Prayer; his praying with himself, as well as with his pupils; and, above all, the diary he kept of whatever was remarkable and serviceable to his steady advancement in the practice of piety, are particularly described among his exercises, whilst he was at the University, by the friend beforementioned, who could best do it; more especially of this last task, he speaks in these words, 'He used to make unto hym selfe an Ephemeris, or a Journal, in which hee used to write all such notable things as either hee dyd see, or heare, eche day that passed. But whatsoever hee dyd heare or see, hee dyd so penne it, that a man might see in that, the signes of his smitten heart. For if he dyd see or heare any good in any man, by that sight, he found and noted the want thereof in hymselfe; and added a short prayer, craving mercy and grace to amende. If he dyd hear or see any misery he noted it, as a thing procured by his own syns; and still added, Domine misere mei: Lord have mercy upon me. He used in the same booke, to note such evyll thoughts as dyd ryse in him; as of envying the good of other men; thoughts of unthankfulness; of not considering God in his workes; of hardness and unreasonableness of heart when he dyd see others moved and afflicted: And thus he made to hymselfe, and of hymselfe, a booke of daily practises of repentance (o).' In short, as a full proof of these practices, he had now made a restitution to the King, so voluntarily and uncompelled, of above five hundred pounds, in three yearly payments; that the last, which was made the year above-mentioned, was before the King, or his Council knew (and perhaps they never knew) who had wronged him, as we have more particularly observed before (†). And now his conscience being totally clear and disburdened, he vigorously proceeded in the heavenly progression; and, by the effectual courses he took to arrive at that spiritual perfection he aspired to, he became so eminent, that Bishop Ridley, who in the beginning of the year 1550, was translated to the See of London (p), sent for him from the University, to take and familiar manner, upon the abuses of the King's officers, as no doubt made the ears of some among them tingle upon hearing it, we have the following remarkable and pertinent passage.—'I have now preached three Lenten: The first time I preached Restitution. Restitution, quoth some! what should he preach of Restitution? Let him preach of Contrition, quoth they, and let Restitution alone: We can never make Restitution. Then, say I, if thou wilt not make Restitution, thou shalt goe to the devill for it. Now chuse thee either, Restitution, or els endless damnation. But now there be two manners of Restitution; secret Restitution, and open Restitution; whether of both it be, so that Restitution be made, it is all good enough.—At my first preaching of Restitution, One man tooke remorse of con- science, and acknowledged himself to me, that he had deceived the King; and willing he was to make Restitution; and so the first Lent, came to my hands twenty pounds, to be restored to the King's use. I was promised twenty pounds more, the same Lent, but it could not be made; so that it came not: Well, the next Lent came three hundred and twenty pounds more; I received it myself, and paid it to the Kinges Council; so I was asked, what he was that made this Restitution; But should I have named him? Nay, they shoulde as soon have this weasand of mine: Well, now, this Lent, came one hundred, fourscore pounds, ten shillings; which I have payd and delivered this present day to the Kinges Council; and so this man hath made a godly Restitution (18).'

upon him Deacon's orders; which having received, together with a Licence (q), he soon became such a famous Preacher of Piety, and such an exemplary pattern of what he preached, that the said Bishop obtained of the Privy-Council, a grant, that he might be admitted one of his chaplains; a circumstance unmentioned hitherto by any writer of his history [C]: Tho' one of them partly intimates as much, where having informed us, that the Bishop now gave him a Prebend at St Paul's church; he adds, that he also lodged him in his own house, and set him to work in preaching (r). And now, from this time to the end of King Edward's reign, he did so constantly, so ardently, and prevailingly, engraft the true principles of religion, not in the ears only, but in the hearts and minds of the people; so reformed the vicious, reclaimed the perverted, and fixed the wavering, that no Preacher of his time was more followed, or more famed than Master Bradford.

