' Sharply he opened and reproved sin, sweetly he preached Christ crucified, pithely he ' impugned heresies and errors, earnestly he perswaded to a godly life (s).' He became so eminent for the sermons he preached in London, chiefly at Paul's Cross; and several places in Lancashire (t); where it seems from his own words (u), that he had been diligently instructing his countrymen in their duty to God, and each other, all the summer of the year 1552; that he was sworn to serve the King, as one of his Chaplains, about the beginning of the next year, as appears in one of his examinations; wherein we shall find, that he was sworn no less than six times in that reign, never to consent, in any wise, to the Pope's authority in this Kingdom. In one of the sermons he preached at Court, before the said King Edward in Lent, that last year of His Majesty's reign 1553, he shewed the tokens of God's judgments at hand, for the contempt of his Gospel, in several recent examples; as that of those gentlemen, who crossing the Thames in a wherry, to see the bear-baiting at Paris-Garden on a Sunday, were all drowned; and of a dog that was met at Ludgate, carrying

(q) The Life of Mr Bradford before his Examination, as above.

(r) T. Sampson's Preface, &c.

(s) Fox, Vol. III. p. 233.

(t) Sampson's Preface, as before.

(u) Mr Bradford's Epist. before his Sermon of Repentance, then preached, and printed the year following, at the request of several of his auditors, with Enlargements; and reprinted by T. Sampson, as above.

[C] A circumstance unmentioned hitherto by any writer of his history.] Our authority for it, is derived from the Bishop's own words; who in a letter he wrote to Mr Cheke, afterwards, the well-known Sir John Cheke, now one of the said Council, has these words: ' Syr, in God's cause, for God's sake, and in his name I beseech you, of your helpe and furtherance towards God's word: I did talk with you of late, what ease I was in, concerning my Chaplens. I have got the good will and grant, to be with me, of three preachers, men of good learning; and, as I am persuaded, of excellent virtue; which are able, both with life and learning; to set forth God's word in London, and in the whole dioecese of the same; where it most neede, of all parts in England: For from thence, goeth example, as you know, into all the rest of the King's Majesties whole realme. The mens names be these, M. Grindall, whom you know to be a man of virtue and learning; M. Bradforde, a man by whom, as I am assuredly informed, God hath, and doth work wonders, in setting forth of his worde: The thirde, is a preacher, the which for detesting, and confuting, the Anabaptists and Papists in Essex, both by his preaching, and his writing, is enforce'd now to beare Christ's crosse, &c. (19)'. The Bishop proceeds to tell Mr Cheke, that there was now fallen a Prebend in Paul's called Cantrilles, by the death of one Layton; and calls it an honest man's living, of thirty-four pounds and better, in the King's books. This he wanted to give Mr Grindall; but William Thomas, one of the Clerks of the Council, having formerly set some of that board upon the Bishop, to grant, That Layton might alienate the same to him, and his heirs, and the Bishop, not consenting to it, without he might acquaint the King therewith, before the collation of it, Mr Thomas despaired of procuring it for himself, therefore prevailed on his said friends to inform the Bishop, That the King had appropriated it to the furniture of his Majesty's stable. Whereupon the Bishop beseeches Mr Cheke, for God's sake, to speak to whomsoever he thought he could do any good withall, in the redress of this grievance; and if he could not speak himself, that he would let this letter speak to Mr Gates, Mr Wrothe, and Mr Cecil; all whom he takes for men that fear God. And he is the more sollicitous to know the King's pleasure herein, and whether he may bestow this living upon Mr Grindall, as he is very desirous of doing, because he was a man so noted for his virtue, honesty, discretion, wisdom, and learning; and such were now more especially wanted; since the Bishops were so lately charged by the King, and his council themselves, both in their own persons, and by their preachers, to cry out against the unsatiable serpent of covetousness: so he concludes with asking, ' What preachers shall

' I gett to open and set forth suche matters, and so, as the King's Majestic and the Council do command them to be set forth, if either ungodlye men, or unreasonable beastes bee suffered to pull away, and devour the good and godlye learned preachers livings?' Dated from Fulham, the 23d of July, 1551, and signed Nicholas London. Tho' this Prebend was now designed for the said Mr Grindall, who was afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, it rather appears that the Bishop gave it, or another, if his enemy above got that, as below it should seem he did, to Mr Bradford: For all the old writers of his story agree (20), That upon his entering into orders, the Bishop gave him a Prebend in his cathedral of St Paul's. And for Mr Grindall, those who have written most accurately of him, inform us, That he was collated, in August the same year last mentioned, Præcentor of St Paul's, void by the death of John Sherry (21), and the next year was installed, a Prebendary indeed, but it was of the then cathedral church of St Peter at Westminster (22). As for that William Thomas, against whom, Bishop Ridley, above, so heartily exclaims; he was a Wellhman born, a learned and ingenious man, but of a violent and desperate temper. He fled the kingdom in 1544, and, after King Henry's death, returned out of Italy, well acquainted with that country, and it's language, of both which, we have his books in print; and of his manuscripts, there are, his Dialogue, entitled Le Peregryne, in defence of King Henry VIII. dedicated to the famous Tuscan Poet, Pietro Aretine; and about half a dozen political Discourses more, preserved in the Cotton Library (23). There was a French Dialogue called Le Peregrin printed in the Gothic letter at Paris, 8vo. 1540. quare if the same. In April 1550, he was made Clerk of the Council (24); soon after, a Prebend of Cantleours, in St Paul's, lately convey'd to the Crown, as we are told, and parson of Prebend in South Wales (25); but being said to have imbibed the principles of Christopher Goodman against the regimen of women, and too freely vented them, with perhaps something against the Spanish match, he was deprived of all by Queen Mary. Whereupon perpetrating revenge, he attempted her Life, as some writers agree (26), only Bale says, his design was upon Bishop Gardiner (27); for which he was imprisoned in the Tower of London, in the latter end of the year 1553, with Sir Nicholas Throkmoreton and others; where, hopeles of reprieve, he stabbed himself with a knife in the breast; but the wound not proving mortal, he was, after trial and condemnation at Guild-Hall, for conspiring the death of the Queen, hanged, drawn and quartered, at Tyburn, on the 18th of May 1554. And in his last speech declared, He died for his country (28).

(20) As the Life of Mr Bradford before his Examination. T. Sampson's Preface. Fox, &c.

(21) J. Strype's Life of Archbishop Grindall, fol. 1710, p. 6. J. Le Neve's Lives of the Archbishops since the Reformation, 8vo, 1720, p. 30. And his Fasti, or Church Dignitaries, fol. 1716, p. 201. Ex Regis Bonner, fol. 312.

(22) Le Neve, ut supra, ex Regis Westm.

(23) Sub. Efig. Vespasian, D. XVIII.

(24) The Journal of King Edward VI. Also The Council Book for the four last years of his Reign.

(25) Anthony Harmer's Specimen of Errors in Dr Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, 8vo, 1693, p. 159.

(26) See Richard Grafton's Chron. N. ch. Sanders, John Stow, &c.

(27) De Script. Britan. Part ii. p. 110.

(28) Ath. Oxon. Vol I. col. 90.

(19) Certain most Godly, Fruitful, and Comfortable Letters, of such true Saints, and holy Martyrs of God, as in the late bloody Persecution here, within this Realme, gave their Lives for their Defence of Christes Holy Gospel; Written in the Time of their Affliction, and cruel Imprisonment. Published by Miles Coverdale (some time Bishop of Exeter) Printed by John Day, 4to, 1564, p. 683, &c.

carrying a piece of a dead child in his mouth; upon which he broke out in a prophetic spirit to the congregation, and summoned them all to the Judgment of God: for, said he, it is at hand; as shortly after, in the beginning of July following it came to pass, in the death of that excellent young King (w). Soon after which, Mr Bradford preaching another sermon, he did, in his entrance upon the high character of the said Prince's great virtues, and pathetick lamentations for the kingdom's loss of him, in a manner foretew the further miseries which befel it; of which himself indured so great a share as we shall soon relate. But in no part of that character, and account of the King's death, is it any ways so much as intimated, that the King fell a sacrifice to the endeavours that were used by him (x), to frustrate a Popish succession in his sister Mary, as by so undaunted a Preacher it would probably have been, had he thought it true [D]. Though by the death of this Prince, the religion was now changed to Popery under Queen Mary, yet Bradford changed not; but kept diligently preaching on the Reformed Doctrine, 'till he was unjustly, there being as yet no law against it, deprived both of his office, his liberty, and at last his life, by her cruel Council, more especially the ecclesiasticks therein; to the performing whereof, because they had no legal cause, they took occasion to inflict these sufferings, for an action so charitable, as even among Turks and Infidels would have been most thankfully rewarded [E], and with great favour accepted; as indeed it did no less deserve (y). Tho' his great humanity in this action, is sufficiently apparent in the note last referred to, and his generosity in saving the life of a Popish Priest, with so great danger to his own; yet was the prejudice of the Papists so violent against him, that by the most perverse and barbarous interpretation, they made his very merits criminal. For three days after, on the 16th of August in the year aforesaid, he was summoned by the Council and Bishops to the Tower of London, where the Queen then was, and charged in the action aforesaid with

(w) T. Sampson's Preface.

(x) See Archbishop Cranmer's Apologetical Letter to Queen Mary, in which he declares he was not moved by the Duke of Northumberland, but by the King himself, to sign his Will, whereby his sister was excluded; in Bishop Coverdale's Letters of the Martyrs, 4to, 1564, p. 2.

(y) Acts and Monum. as above.

[D] As by so undaunted a Preacher it would probably have been, had he thought it true.] For all that Bradford says of King Edward is this, 'You all know, ' he was but a child in yeares; defiled he was not, with ' notorious offences; defiled, quoth he! Nay rather ' adorned, with so many goodly giftes, and wonderful ' qualities, as never Prince was, from the beginning of ' the worlde, should I speake of hys wysedom, of hys ' rypeness in judgment, of hys learning, of hys godly ' zeale, heroicall heart, fatherly care for his commons, ' nurcelly sollicitude for religion &c. I say, so many ' things are to be spoken in the commendation of God's ' exceeding graces in this childe, that as Salust writeth ' of Carthage, I had rather speak nothing than too ' little, in that too much, is too little. This gift God ' gave unto us Englishmen, before all nations, under the ' funne; and that of his exceeding love towards us: But ' alas and welaway, for our unthankfulness sake, for ' our sins sake, for our carnality and prophane living, ' God's anger hath touched, not only the body, but ' also the mynd of our King, by a long sickness, and ' at length hath taken him away by death, death, ' cruel death! fearfull death! (29).' And yet we find it, in a Popish author, so little heeded to make his party liable to be suspected with the most horrid wickedness herein, that it is said, 'The Apothecary who ' poisoned him, for the horror of the offence, and ' the disquietness of his conscience, drowned himself: ' and that the landress who washed his shirt, lost the ' skin off her fingers (30).' However it may be meant to reflect on the Duke of Northumberland, who is indeed strongly insinuated by others to have hastened the King's death, but by the hands of a certain gentlewoman (31), thro' his impatience for the coronation of his daughter-in-law, the Lady Jane; which, manifestly enough, brought them both to a violent end; as, among others, Michaelangelo Floria has related at large (32). And how greedy, at his execution, the people were of the Duke's blood, catching it in their handkerchiefs, under the scaffold, thro' the crevices thereof, in abhorrence of his ambition, or affection to his cause, may be seen in a scarce tract, written not long after, by a foreigner, who having been about that time in London, might he an eye witness thereof, and among some other remarkable observations in our country, has recorded the same (33). But on that Popish author's aforesaid account of the King's death, a Protestant author has made this reflection; 'If his History be no better than his Divinity, we who justly ' condemn the one, can do no less than suspect the ' other (34).' And Speed, who expressly mentions the King's disease to have been a consumption of the lungs, does not, in the least, suggest any other cause of his death (35).

[E] Such a charitable action, as even among Turks and Infidels, would have been most thankfully rewarded.

ed.] The fact was this: On the 13th of August, in the first year of Queen Mary's reign aforesaid, Gilbert Bourne then preacher at Paul's Cross, but not then Bishop of Bath as Fox mistakes (36), he not being elected to the said See before the beginning of the next year, (37) made a seditious sermon at the said cross; wherein, he so much traduced the late king, and harangued so intolerably in favour of Popery, that it moved the auditory with such indignation, as made them ready to pull him out of the pulpit. Neither could the reverence of the place, nor the presence of the Bishop of London, nor the authority of the Lord-Mayor, restrain their rage. Bourne, seeing himself in this peril, and his life particularly aimed at, by a drawn dagger that was hurled at him in the pulpit, which narrowly missed him, turned about, and perceiving Bradford behind him, he earnestly begged him to come forwards and pacify the people; good Bradford was no sooner in his room, where he recommended peace and concord to them, but with a joyful shout at the sight of him, they cry'd out, Bradford, Bradford, God save thy life, Bradford! and then, with profound attention to his discourse, heard him enlarge upon the topick of peaceful and christian obedience; which when he had finished, the tumultuous people, for the most part, dispersed; but, among the rest who persisted, there was a certain gentleman, with his two servants, who coming up the pulpit stairs, rushed against the door, demanding entrance upon Bourne; Bradford resisted him 'till he had secretly given Bourne warning, by his servant, to escape; who thereupon, flying to the Mayor, once again escaped death. Yet conceiving the danger not fully over, Bourne beseeched Bradford not to leave him 'till he was got to some place of security; in which Bradford again obliged him, and went at his back, shadowing him from the people with his gown, while the Mayor and sheriffs, on each side, led him into the nearest house, which was Paul's School; and so was he a third time delivered from the fury of the populace. Let the reader now consider Bourne's peril (38), thro' the resentment of the multitude; and Bradford's charity, which rescued that railing preacher against King Edward from death, not without the hazard of his own life, which those who would have been revenged on that preacher, did not dissemble; among whom, one gentleman cry'd out, Al Bradford, Bradford, dost thou save his life, who will not spare thine? Go, I give thee his life, but were it not for thy sake, I would thrust him through with my sword. The same Sunday, in the afternoon, Bradford preached at Bow-Church in Cheap-side, and sharply rebuked the people for their outrageous behaviour aforesaid (39). Thus has our reader had the whole account of Mr Bradford's generous and christian deportment in this tumult, whereby it may be judged what reward he deserved; you shall next above hear, what reward he received.

(36) Acts and Mon. Vol. III. p. 233.

(37) Bishop Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation. P. II. p. 276; also Rymer, Vol. XV. p. 334.

(29) Bradford's Sermon of Repentance, 8vo, 1574: The Epistle to which is dated July 12, 1553, six days after that King's death.

(30) Mat. Paterson's Image of both Churches, Hierusalem and Babel, Unity and Confusion, Obedience and Sedition, &c. 8vo, Tournay 1623; & Lond. 1652. p. 423.

(31) Sir J. Hayward's Life of King Edward, 4to 1630, p. 177.

(32) Historia de la Vita e de la Muerte de Giovanna Graia, già Regina eletta e pubblicata d'Inghilterre, 8vo, 1607.

(33) Descrip. Des Roialmes d'Angleterre, & d'Escoffe, par Estienne Perlin, 8vo, Paris, 1558, p. 13, 14.

(34) T. Fuller's Church History, lib. vii. p. 425.

(35) Hist. of Great Britain, fol. 1122.

(38) The Lyfe of Mr Bradford, before his Examinations, &c.

(39) Ibid. Also in Fox, Abel Redivivus, &c.

with sedition; and in his preaching with heresy. All his purgations availed him not; but they committed him close prisoner where he was. Of his examination here, there is nothing now extant, except one passage repeated in his next (z). But there he was kept in restraint near a year and half, then they removed him into other prisons, and from thence into the flames. While he thus lay in the Tower, and those other places of confinement, he wrote several pious discourses and exhortations, which were suspected to have reclaimed some who had revolted to Popery, and known to have confirmed many who were unsettled in the Protestant Faith; but all by stealth, for he was denied the use of pen and ink. But nothing more irritated his adversaries, than the many epistles he secretly wrote, and conveyed from thence to the citizens of London, the University and town of Cambridge, the towns of Walden and Manchester; also to many noble and learned friends, as well as his pious relations; which letters and discourses are most of them extant [F]. In these letters shine

(z) Bradford's Life, in Abel Redivivus, p. 18.

[F] Which letters and discourses are, most of them, extant.] The number of Mr Bradford's letters, in Bishop Coverdale's collection, is seventy-two, besides an admonition, written before a New Testament; and they take up near thirty sheets, or a third part of the volume: The time they were written in, as appears from those that are dated, was between the sixth of October 1553, and the twenty-fourth of June 1555. The places they are written from, are the Tower, the King's-Bench prison, and the Poultry-Counter: The persons to whom, more particularly, they were written, are, To the Faithful Professors of God's Word in the City of London. To the true Professors in the University and Town of Cambridge. To those in Lancashire and Cheshire. To those at Walden. To Queen Mary, the Council, and Parliament; as a preface to a supplication (against the Popish Bishops) To the Lady Vane. To his mother, sisters, and other relations. To the Lord Ruffel (afterwards Earl of Bedford). To Sir James Hales, prisoner in the Counter. To Sir William Fitzwilliams, Marshal of the King's-Bench. To Dr Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer. To Dr Hill the Physician. To Mr Lawrence Saunders, John Philpot, and John Careless. To Richard Hopkins, Sheriff of Coventry, and prisoner in the Fleet. To Robert Cole, N. Shatterden, Mr Warcop, George Eaton, Mr Sha'crossie, Mr Coker at Malden, and Augustine Bernhere (*); also to John Trew, and Thomas Abington, and other maintainers of Free-Will, with the Pelagians and Papists, &c. (†). His Letters to these persons are not here enumerated as they are printed in the book, nor printed there in the due order of time; to which many indeed would not give direction, being without dates. In this collection of Coverdale's, there are none of those letters before quoted out of Fox, which Bradford sent to Mr Traves, before he took upon him the Ministry of the Gospel. In Fox's account of Bradford, besides those letters of his to the said Mr Traves, which are ten in number, and no where else printed, that we know of, there are many printed out of Coverdale's collection, to the number of about forty-five; taking up nine sheets and a half; not in the same order as in Coverdale, not yet in the regular order of time.— There are other letters and treatises written by, to, and concerning, Mr Bradford, which have not been gathered into either of those collections; whereof some are in print, others in manuscript. The first of them in print, were, as before mentioned, what he called his Primitiæ, or First-Fruits, being some translations which he published upon his going to the University, as we observed, in 1548, and which he complains were faultily printed (40). There was A Godly Treatise of Prayer, translated into English by John Bradford, printed in St Paul's Church-yard by John Wight, 8vo. without date: It was written by Philip Melancthon, and the translator has a preface before it of six leaves, in which it appears it was published soon after his sermon on Repentance, a copy of which was in the Harleian Library (41), and is the same work that has been ascribed to him by others (42). There was also a remarkable piece published in his name, while he was in the Tower, as we compute, and not long before King Philip was married to Queen Mary, entitled, The Copy of a Letter sent by John Bradford to the Earls of Arundel, Darby, Shrewsbury, and Pembroke, declaring the nature of Spaniards, and discovering the most detestable Treasons which they have pretended most falseley against our most noble Kingdome of Englande, &c. This little book is printed in 8vo. without any name of the printer, editor, place where, or time when, it was printed; and the preface insinuates, that though many men have one name, the author has so plainly distinguished himself in his said letter, that if he should be found where the Spaniards had any power, he could not escape their vengeance. And in the letter itself we are led to imagine, it was not this John Bradford we are here speaking of, but another of the name, who wrote this sharp invective against the Spaniards, exhorting those ministers of State above, and the rest, most honestly and heartily, by many substantial arguments, like a true patriot and lover of his country, to prevent the coronation of Philip and Mary, as what would, many ways subject the same to slavery and ruin; one John Bradford, who in King Edward's time, served Sir William Skipwith of Lincolnshire, but was afterwards, as it is pretended, Chamberlain to one of King Philip's Council, and now in Flanders. Some singularities might be taken notice of in the printing of this book, which yet do not, to me, sufficiently give it the air of a foreign publication; and the subject of it may be compared to that, which in the next reign, was written against the match proposed between Francis Duke of Anjou, brother to Henry III. King of France, and Queen Elizabeth (43); for which the author, John Stubbs of Lincoln's-Inn, Gent. and his publisher, William Page, had their right hands cut off in the market-place at Westminster, according to an Act of Philip and Mary, against the Authors and Publishers of seditious Writings (44), occasioned in all probability, by the publication of that letter above, by John Bradford, among other things. Less doubtfully however, may be ascribed to our author, another tract, entitled His Complaint of Verity; it was printed in 8vo, 1559, but whether any translation or imitation of John Constable's QUERELA VERITATIS, my author knows not (45). His Three Examinations by the Commissioners, and his private Talk with their priests, were published, as we have before observed, in 8vo, 1561; with The Original of his Life prefixed, by the anonymous editor. This is the work of which H. Holland speaks in these words, Reliquit nobis accuratissimas adversus Populos Prelatos Disputationes suas (46): He left us his most accurate Disputations against the Popish Bishops, &c. these are reprinted in Fox; we have also, before-mentioned, his Two notable Sermons: One Of Repentance, dated at the end of the author's preface, July 12, 1553: Republished with the other, on The Lord's Supper (*), never before printed, by T. Sampson, 8vo, 1574, whose preface has been above useful to us. They were reprinted, or the latter of them, in 1631. His Answer to certain Letters, desiring to know, whether one might go to Mass, is undated in the authors who mention it (47), but it may be prefixed to his tract called The Hurt of hearing the Mass; one edition whereof was printed in 8vo, 1580. And those letters might be written by the Lady Vane, as it may appear by his answers to her (48). We find moreover ascribed to him, Godly Meditations made in Prison, called his Short Prayers; and, Two Godly Letters for the Consolation of such as are afflicted in Conscience, 8vo, 1613. Also Meditations on the Lord's Prayer, Belief, and Ten Commandments; with a Defence of Predestination; and some other Meditations and Prayers, 8vo, 1622 (49), perhaps reprinted, in part, from some of the pieces above. Another of his tracts is entitled, The good old Way; or A Treatise of Repentance, 8vo, 1652 (50); and lastly, A Letter written by Mr John Bradford the Martyr, never before printed; and published by Dr Gilbert Ironside; with Bishop Ridley's tracts on the Sacrament, &c. 4to, Oxon. 1688 (51). Of his Manuscripts, (43) Entitled, A Discoverie of a Gaping Gulph wherinto England is likely to be swallowed, by another French Marriage, if the Lord forbid not the Banes, &c. 8vo. 1579.

(44) Camden's Eliz. anno 1581.

(45) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 14.

(46) Her. Anglic. fol. 151.

(*) Whether that is a Treatise of the Communion which he communicated to Bishop Ridley, as mentioned in the Letters of the Martyrs, p. 60, or, Whether this was only his Translation of that Bishop's Disputation at Oxford on the same subject into English, as mentioned in the said Letters, p. 197, we cannot be sure.

(47) H. Holland, as before; and Bradford's Life, in Abel Rediv.

(48) Bishop Coverdale's Collection, &c. p. 534, 335, &c.

(49) Catal. Imp. pref. Libr. Bibl. Becl. fol. Oxon. 1738, p. 183.

(50) Idem.

(51) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 9.

(*) Of Switzerland; and was Latimer's fervent, a faithful Minister in King Edward's reign, and diligent attendant upon the Prisoners in Q. Mary's. He communicated his Master's sermons to the prels.

(†) There was also one Henry Harte, described to have then been a chief Maintainer of Man's Free Will, and enemy to God's Free Grace: Thereof were one of those opposed by Bradford, see Letters of the Martyrs, p. 358.

(40) Fox, Vol. II, p. 299.

(41) Catalogus Bibliothecæ Harleianæ, 8vo. Vol. I. 1745, p. 327.

(42) Hollandi Her. Anglic. p. 52. And the Life of Mr Bradford, in Abel Rediv. p. 190.

(*) 'Tis erroneously dated April 1555, in the first printed Examination, but rightly corrected as to the month by Fox, whom we herein follow; and the year is corrected, both from the preceding and subsequent matters of fact.

(52) See Coverdale's Letters of the Martyrs, p. 471.

(53) Codices Manuscripti Tho. Bodlei.

(54) Cod. Manuf. Collegii Emanuel.

(55) See a Letter of Bradford's to the said Erk. Rawlins, in Fox, Vol. III. p. 263.

(56) Thus far, of these MSS. from a Note-Book of the late Bishop Tanner's, in 8vo. MS. communicated by Mr Joseph Ames.

(57) Coverdale's Collection, &c. p. 469.

(*) Stephen Gardener, of whom see Bishop Poynter's character in one of his pamphlets.

(†) Dr Robert Farrar was sentenced to death by his usurping successor Henry Morgan, and burnt at Caermarthen, Mar. 30, 1555. Rymer, Vol. XV. Morgan was deprived in 1559, and died before the year was out. Ib. et Ath. Oxon. See also Fox, and Fuller's Ch. Hist. of the horrid disease he endured from the time of that condemnation to his death, lib. viii. p. 24.

(||) The bloody Edmund Bonner, whose true, or paternal name, most suitable to his nature, was Savage; since neither sex, age, nor quality, escaped his brutish inhumanity; having most cruelly murdered two hundred persons in the compass of three years; yet was he suffered afterwards, under the Protestants in Queen Elizabeth's reign, to die quietly in his bed! See Fox, and Fuller's Ch. Hist. lib. viii. p. 18.

shine forth such a spirit of inflexible constancy in his principles, such a primitive and apostolical zeal for the propagation of truth, such a sincere abhorrence of the gross, mercenary, and presumptuous delusions of the Church of Rome, that it is as little wonder they have been so carefully transmitted to us, by the friends and favourers of the Reformation, as that the enemies to it should cut off, as soon as they could, the increase of them. They having therefore ordered Bradford to be removed to the King's-Bench in Southwark; he was soon afterwards, on the 22d of January 1554 (*), led to his examination before Stephen, Bishop of Winchester, then Lord Chancellor; Edmund, Bishop of London, and others of them in commission for that purpose. The substance of this Examination we shall relate below [G]. After it was over, he was sent back to the said prison, under stricter restraint than there are some copies remaining in the Universities both of Oxford and Cambridge, as his Treatise of Predestination, a more enlarged work it seems, than his letter before-mentioned upon the same subject (52). He also writ a treatise Not to fear Death. These two, among other discourses, written by and to Mr Bradford (54), Bernebere, &c. against the doctrine of Predestination, are preserved among the MSS. in the former of those Universities (53); and in the latter, there are, among the volumes of Letters, Disputations, Prayers, &c. of the Holy Martyrs, and Confessors, in Queen Mary's days, several written by and to Mr Bradford (54). The titles whereof we shall here recite, as they were drawn out from the manuscripts themselves, by a late learned Prelate, in one of the books wherein he was wont to minute down what he thought observable in his historical researches, and might propose to make use of in his own compositions: Only we shall alter the interspersed manner in which they are transcribed; and mention those pieces which were of Mr Bradford's writing, first, by themselves, then those written by other persons to him; and so, they may appear thus—The Explication of the Words Flesh and Spirit, by J. Bradford. A Preface of J. Bradford's out of Prison, to a Book recommended to the Nobility and Gentry, (mentioning a brave Jury of Londoners) 1555. prin. after this book came to my hands, &c. A Meditation of John Bradford, Pr. This heavenly banquet wherein thou dost witness thyself, &c. A Prayer by John Bradford, to be said at the Stake, by all them that God shall count worthy to suffer for his Truth; Pr. O merciful God, and Father, &c. A Godly Letter from Erkinwald Rawlins at Antwerp, to Mr John Bradford, being Prisoner in the King's-Bench, Southwark, 22 Jul. 1554. Pr. Altho' my dearly beloved, &c. (55). A Letter from Eliz. Longho, to J. Bradford, Pr. Grete Cause have, &c. John Carelcs his last Letter to John Bradford; Pr. Before that I had red, &c. (56). He also seems to have been the author of a treatise, not mentioned among his pieces above, either in print or manuscript, upon The Baptism of Children, which he sent a little before his death to Augustine Bernebere for him to transcribe, and when that was done, he told him he should have other things (57).

[G] The substance of this Examination we shall relate below. After the said Lord Chancellor (*), and the residue of the Queen's Council in Commission with him, had ended their talk with Master Farrar, late Bishop of St David's (†), the Under-Marshal of the King's-Bench was commanded to bring in Master Bradford; whom the Chancellor looked earnestly upon, as if he would out-face him; and he, as steadfastly fixt his eyes on the Chancellor; only once cast them up to Heaven, and so out-faced him. Then the Chancellor told him, he had been long imprisoned justly, for his behaviour at Paul's-Cross, the thirteenth of August 1553, for his false preaching, and arrogance, in taking upon him to preach without authority. But now said he, the Time of Mercy is come; therefore the Queen by us hath sent for you to give you the same, if you will with us return: If you will do as we have done, you shall find as we have found. To which Bradford obediently answered, my Lords, I confess, that I have been long imprisoned and unjustly, for that I did nothing seditiously, falsely, or arrogantly, in word or fact, by preaching or otherwise, but sought peace as an obedient and faithful subject, both in attempting to save the present Bishop of Bath, then Master Bourne, the preacher at the Cross, and in preaching for quietness accordingly. Here the Chancellor cut him short, and told him, he lied. The fact was seditious, said he, as you, my lord of London (||) can bear witness. You say true, answered he, I saw him with mine own eyes, when he took upon him to rule, and lead the people malapertly; thereby declaring that he was the author of the sedition. Bradford answer'd, with wonderful patience, That notwithstanding the Bishop's seeing and saying what he had told, was truth, which one day God Almighty would reveal; yet, in the mean time, because he could not be believed, he was ready to suffer, as now, by what he had said, so whatsoever God should license him to do. I know, said the Chancellor, thou hast a glorious tongue, and godly shews thou makest; but all are lyes that thou doest. I have not forgotten how stubborn thou wert before us in the Tower, to which thou was committed concerning Religion. I have not forgotten thy behaviour and talk; where, worthily thou hast been kept in prison, as one that would have done more hurt than I will speak of. My Lord, said Bradford, I stand as before you, so before God, as one day we shall all stand before him: Truth will then be the truth; though you will not now so take it: Yet I dare say, my Lord of Bath will witness with me, that I sought his safeguard, with the peril of my own life. That's not true, quoth Bonner, for I saw thee take upon thee too much. No, said Bradford, I took nothing upon me undesired, and that of Master Bourne himself, as if he were here, I dare say he would affirm; for he desired me both to help him to pacify the people, and not to leave him 'till he was in safety: And as for my behaviour in the Tower, if I did, or said any thing that did not become me, and your Lordships would inform me, I would speedily make you answer. Well, said the Chancellor, to leave this matter; How sayest thou now, wilt thou return again, and do as we have done, and thou shalt receive the Queen's mercy and pardon? My Lord, said Bradford, I desire mercy with God's mercy, but mercy with God's wrath, God keep me from; tho' I thank God my conscience does not accuse me of doing or speaking any thing there, that should need mercy or pardon: For all that I did, or spake, was agreeable to God's laws, and those of the Realm, at that present; and did make much quietness. Well, said the Chancellor, if thou wilt make this babbling, rolling in thy eloquence, being altogether ignorant and vain-glorious, and wilt not receive mercy offered to thee; know, for truth, that the Queen is minded to make a purgation of all such as thou art. The Lord knows, replied Bradford, before whom I stand, as well as before you, what vain-glory I have sought! his mercy I desire, and also would be glad of the Queen's favour, to live, as a subject, without clog of conscience; but otherwise the Lord's mercy is to me, better than life. And I know to whom I have committed my life, even to his hands which will keep it, so that no man may take it away before it be his pleasure. There are twelve Hours in the day, and as long as they last, so long shall no man have power thereon (58): Therefore his good will be done; life, in his displeasure, is worse than death; and death, in his favour, is true life. I know, said the Chancellor, that we should have glorious talk enough from thee, be sure therefore, that as thou hast deceived the people with false and devilish doctrine, so shalt thou receive. I have not deceived, said Bradford, the people, nor taught any other doctrine, than by God's grace I am ready, and hope shall be ready, to confirm with my life: and as for devilishness and falseness in the doctrine, I would be sorry you could so prove it. Why, said the Bishop of Durham (*), what do you say to the administration of the Communion, as you now know it is? Here Bradford replied to them, I have been six times favored, in no case to consent to the practising of any jurisdiction, or any authority on the Bishop of Rome's behalf within this realm of England; therefore, I humbly pray your Honours

(58) See Bradford's Letter, touching his Faith in God's Election and Predestination; which he confirms by his Translation of St Paul's Epist. to the Ephesians, cap. i. from the Greek. In Bishop Coverdale's Letters of the Martyrs before quoted, p. 391; he likewise wrote a distinct Tract on that topic, as we shall hereafter see. Coverdale also inclines to the same Opinion in several of his notes on those Letters. Bishop Latimer, in one of his Sermons, uses the same argument with this of Bradford's in the text; and Bishop Ridley wrote a learned and godly Treatise on God's Election and Predestination, as Coverdale informs us, in the Collection above, p. 359, which he promises should come to light, p. 65.

(*) Cuthbert Tunstall.

than before, especially as to the exercise of his pen; but the sweetness of his comportment toward his keepers, so mollified and won upon them, that it defeated the severity of his enemies commands in that particular; and his arguments, thus discharged out of prison, were like gunpowder that makes a louder report, and has but a stronger effect the closer it is confined; thereby doing their cause more hurt, than all the terror of their tyrannical treatment did it good. A week after, that is, on the 29th of the same month, he was brought before them in the church of St Mary Overies to his second examination, in which, as there was some fresh matter of debate, as well as a repetition of several circumstances that past in the first, we shall but touch upon the heads of those passages which have been already spoken of; and a little more expressly, in the same note, relate such as have not [H]; but so comprehensively we hope, as neither to overburden the reader, nor leave him

Honours to tell me, whether you ask me this question by his authority or not? If you do, I dare not, may not answer you any thing in his authority, you shall demand of me, except I would be forsworn, which God forbid. Hast thou been sworn six times, said Secretary Bourne? What offices hast thou borne? Here's another lye, said the Chancellor. Bradford returned it upon him in these words: I was thrice sworn in Cambridge; when I was admitted Master of Arts; when I was admitted Fellow in Pembroke-Hall; and when I was there, the Visitors also came thither and swore the University: again, I was sworn, when I entered into the Ministry; when I had a Prebend given me; and when I was sworn to serve the King, a little before his death. Tuth, said the Chancellor, Herod's oaths, a man should make no conscience at. Bradford replied, my Lord, these othes were no Herod's othes, no unlawful othes, but cthes according to God's word, as you yourself have well affirmed in your book De Vera Obedientia. Here another of the Council, presum'd to be M. Rochester (*), said, I never knew wherefore this man was in prison before now, but I see well, it would not have been good that he had been abroad: whatsoever was the cause he was laid in prison I know not, but I now see well, that not without cause he was, and is to be kept in prison; ycs, said Secretary Bourne, it was reported, this present parliament time, by the Earl of Darby, that he has done more hurt by letters, and exhorting those that have come to him, in religion, than ever he did when he was abroad by preaching. In his letters he curseth all that teach false doctrine, for so he calls that which is not according to what he taught; and most earnestly exhorteth them, to whom he writes, to continue still in that they have received by him, and such like as he is. All which words divers others of the Council affirmed; whereunto the said Master Bourne added, saying, How say you, firrah, speaking to Bradford, have you not thus seditiously written, and exhorted the people? I have, said Bradford, neither written, nor spoken any thing seditiously; and I thank God I have not admitted any seditious cogitation, nor I trust ever shall. Yea but thou hast written letters, quoth Bourne. Why speakest thou not, said the Chancellor, hast thou not written as he saith? That, replied Bradford, which I have written, I have written. Lord God, quoth M. Southwell †, what an arrogant and stubborn boy is this, that thus stoutly and dallyingly behaves himself before the Queen's Council; and they all looked upon one another disdainfully. My Lords, and Masters, said Bradford, the Lord God, which is, and will judge us all, knoweth that as I am certain I stand now before his Majesty, so, with reverence in his sight, I stand before you, unto yours; and accordingly, in words and gesture, I desire to behave myself. If you otherwise take it, I doubt not but God in his time will reveal it. In the mean season, I shall suffer with all due obedience, your sayings and decds too, I hope. These be gay, glorious words, quoth the Chancellor, of reverence, reverence! but as in all other things, so here-in thou dost nothing but lye. Well, said Bradford, I would God, the author of truth, and abhorrer of lyes, would pull my tongue out of my head before you all, and shew a terrible judgment on me here presently, if I have purposed, or do purpose, to lye before you, whatsoever you shall ask me. Why then, said the Chancellor, dost thou not answer? Hast thou written such letters, as here is objected against thee. As I said, my Lord, quoth Bradford, That which I have written I have written. I stand now before you, who either can lay my letters to my charge, or not: If you lay any thing to my charge that I have written; if I deny it I am then a liar. We shall never have done with thee,

I perceive now, replied the Chancellor, Be short, be short, wilt thou have mercy? I pray God, said Bradford, to give me his mercy, and if therewith you will extend yours, I will not refuse it; otherwise, I will not. — Here was now much ado among them, one speaking this, another that, of his arrogancy, in refusing the Queen's pardon, which he so lovingly offered him. To which Bradford answered: My Lords, if I may live as a quiet subject, without clog of conscience, I shall heartily thank you for your pardon; if otherwise I behave myself, then I am in danger of the fault. In the mean season, I ask no more than the benefit of a subject, 'till I be convinced of transgression. If I cannot have this, as hitherto I have not had, God's good will be done. Upon these words, the Chancellor began a long process of the false doctrine wherewith people were deceived in the days of King Edward; so asked Bradford, what he thought of it? who answered, He believed the doctrine, then taught, was God's pure religion; which he believed in more now, than ever he did. And therein, said he, I am more confirmed, and ready to declare it, by God's grace, even as he will to the world, than I was, when I first came into the prison. What religion mean you, said the Bishop of Durham, in King Edward's days? What year of his reign? even that same year of his reign, replied he, that the King died, and I was preacher. Here Secretary Bourne wrote something down. And after some pause, the Chancellor declared, that the doctrine taught in King Edward's days, was hereby; using for demonstration thereof, no scripture, nor reason, but this, that it ended with treason and rebellion; so concluded, that the very end of his reign was enough to prove the doctrine in it nought. Ah, my Lord, said Bradford, that you would enter into God's sanctuary, and mark the end of this present doctrine you now so magnify! What meanest thou by that, said he, I suppose we shall have a snatch of rebellion enough now. No, replied Bradford, my Lord, I mean no such end as you gather: I mean an end which none seeth but they who enter into God's sanctuary. If a man look but on present things, he will soon deceive himself. Here his Lordship did again offer Bradford mercy, and he answered as before; mercy, with God's mercy, should be welcome; but otherwise, he would have none: whereupon the Chancellor rung a little bell, to call in some of the attendants, for there were none present, but those before named, and the Bishop of Worcester (*). When a person was entred the room, Secretary Bourne said, it is best that you give the keeper a charge of this fellow; so was the Under-Marshal called in. You shall take this man to you, said the Chancellor, and keep him close, without conference with any man, but by your knowledge; and suffer him not to write any letters, &c. for he is of another manner of charge with you now, than he was before, and so they departed; and Bradford preserved the same cheerfulness of countenance, as any indifferent man could do, manifesting thereby, a desire to lay down even his life, as a confirmation of what he had taught and written; and he was animated with thinking, that if he were forced to do so, he should destroy more of the Philistines, as Sampson did, by his death, than ever he did in his life (59).

[H] And a little more expressly, in the same note, relate such as have not.] In this second Examination, before those Bishops, &c. Bradford, after the excommunication of John Rogers, was called in, and told by the Chancellor, That they had offered him on the twenty-second of January, the Queen's pardon, which he had both contemned, and professed he would defend his erroneous doctrine in publick. Yet this and all (*) Mautic. Griffith was Bishop of Rochester from April 1534, to his death in Nov. 1558. Rym. r. Vol. XV. Strype's Annals, p. 30. He was the first who, in Queen Mary's reign, condemned a Woman, Margery Polley, to be burnt for religion. Dr Fuller's Church Hist. lib. viii. p. 18.

(+) Sir Richard Southwell, one of the Privy-Council; who, with Gardener and others, signed the Order of Thanksgiving for Queen Mary's great Belly. See A. Harmer's Spec. of Errors in Burnet's Hist. of the Reformat. p. 177. Also John Speed's Hist. of Great Britain, edit. fol. 1623, p. 1147; and Fox, Vol. III. p. 93.

(*) Richard Pate. Vid. Godwin, de Presul. & Rymeri Fed. Tom. XV.

(59) The Effect of Mr Bradford's first Examination, &c. 2vo, 1661. And Fox, Vol. III. fol. 235.

him in obscurity. In this examination, we see he was still intractable to all their seducements all his behaviour, declared but hypocrisy and vain glory. He also laboured much about clearing himself from thirsting after guiltless blood; but insisted upon Bradford's fact at Paul's Cross, as presumptuous, arrogant, and assuming to lead the people, which could not but turn to much disquietness; and therefore being so refractory and stout in religion; he was then committed to prison, and now continued there; whence he had written letters, to the great detriment of the people; as, by the Earl of Derby, in Parliament, was reported. And as he had so stubbornly behaved himself the last time before them, therefore, he now more directly demanded of him his doctrine and religion? Bradford answered, That as to hypocrisy and vain glory, he trusted in God, to open one day, both their true and hearty dealings therein; in the mean time, would content himself with the testimony of his own conscience; which, if it yielded to hypocrisy, would make God and man against him: As for his fact at Paul's Cross, and his behaviour at the Tower, he doubted not, but God would reveal it to his comfort: And for his letters and religion, he answered as he did before. Here the Chancellor taxed him with saying, he would maintain the doctrine in King Edward's days. Bradford repeated his having been six times sworn against the Pope's authority, therefore said, he durst not answer to any thing that should be demanded on that head, least he should by any unwary consent thereto be forsworn; that he was now more confirmed in the doctrine preached in that King's days, than he was before he was in prison; and thought, he should be found more ready to resign his life for the confirmation thereof. Here the Chancellor would have persuaded him, that the oaths he had taken against the Pope, were of no validity; but he still refused to enlarge upon that topick, lest he should be decoyed, or drawn, to make any compliance therein. Much disputation there was upon this head; 'till the Chancellor told him, he followed the course of crafty covetous merchants; who, because they would lend no money to their needy neighbours, pretend they had often sworn they would lend no more, because their creditors had so often deceived them: So do you now, said he, to cast a mist in the people's eyes, and bear them with heresy, greater and more hurtful to the Commonwealth, pretend your oath; whereby the people might make a conscience, where they should not. To which, Bradford said, If he dared to answer him, for fear of being lead into perjury, he would shew him the difference between oaths, which obliged him to keep this inviolable. Then the Chancellor urged, that this against the Bishop of Rome, was against charity. Bradford answered, That could not be against charity, which was not against God's word. Is it not against God's word, said the Chancellor, That a man should take a King to be supreme head of the Church in his realm? No, replied he, It is with God's word. Where find you that, quoth the Chancellor? Bradford answered, where St Paul writes, That every soul should be obedient to the superior power: And what power? Quæ gladium gestat: Which bears the sword, and that is not the spiritual, but the temporal power, as Chrysostom well notes upon the same place. Here the Chancellor was much stirred, and said, that Bradford went about to deny all obedience to the Queen, and so would make God's word a warrant of disobedience: For he would answer, when she says, Now swear to the Bishop of Rome, or obey his authority; No, for I am then forsworn; and so make the Queen, no Queen. No, said Bradford, I go not about to deny all obedience, by denying it in this part; I was sworn to King Edward, not simply, that is, not concerning his own person, but also concerning his successors. Therefore in denying the Queen's request herein, I deny not her authority, nor become disobedient: Yes that dost thou, returned the Chancellor. And so he began a long tale, how if a man should make an oath, to pay an hundred pound by such a day, and the creditor should forgive the debt; the debtor would say, no, you cannot do it, for I am forsworn, &c. But Bradford seeing into the sophistry of this, and how improperly applicable to the purpose, told the Chancellor, he wondered how he could make such trifles of solemn oaths made to God, and so great a matter of vows, as they call them, made to the Bishops for the marriage of Priests. Here the Chancellor was highly disgusted, and objected again to his refusing obedience. No, my Lord, said Bradford. I do not deny obedience to the Queen, if you will discern between Genus and Species; because I may not obey in this, to reason, ergo I may not obey in the other, is not firm; as if a man let, or sell a piece of his inheritance, yet all his inheritance is not let, or sold: so all obedience I deny not, because I deny it in this branch. I will have none of these similitudes, said the Chancellor; I would not use them; replied Bradford, if you went not about with them to persuade the people, I mean that which I never meant; for I myself, not only mean obedience, but will give example of all most humble obedience to the Queen's Highness; so long as she requireth not obedience against God. No, no, said the Chancellor, all men may perceive your meaning; there is no man, tho' he be sworn to the King, doth therefore break his oath, if afterwards he be sworn to the French King, and to the Emperor. Here Bradford shewed him how different the case was; Thou shalt not swear, said he, to the Bishop of Rome at any time; if, in like manner, we were sworn, Thou shalt not serve the Emperor, &c. You see there were some alteration, and more doubt. But I beseech your honour to remember, what you yourself have written, answering the objections here against, in your book De vera Obedientia, Vnus at modo Domini verbi veritas; Let God's Word and the reasons thereof prevail. Here the Chancellor was thoroughly incensed, and turned the discourse upon Bradford's writing seditious letters, perverting the people, and defending the doctrine in King Edward's time; all which, Bradford denied; but said, what he had written and spoken, he would never deny: and now resolved to answer, whatever he should ask, though he saw his life depended thereon. Then the Chancellor asked him, what he said to the Sacrament, and whether he believed Christ to be present, in his natural body? To which, when he answered, That he thought Christ might be corporally present unto faith; the Chancellor wanted more words of him, to explain himself. But Bradford answered, I have been now a year, and almost three quarters (*) in prison, and in all this time, you never questioned me herein; when I might have spoken my conscience without peril; but now, you have a law, to hang up, and put to death, if a man answer freely, and not to your appetite (†); and so you now come to demand this question: ah my Lord, continued he, Christ used not this way to bring men to faith; no more did the Prophets, or the Apostles. Remember what Bernard writeth to Eugenius the Pope, Apostolos lego stetitse judicandos, sedisse judicantes non legi: Hoc erit, illud fuit. I read that the Apostles stood to be judged: but I have not read that they sat to judge: This shall be, that was, &c. Here the Chancellor was appeased (‡), as it seemed, and spake most gently, that he used not this means; but that it had been objected to him, he had been too gentle oftentimes; which others of his colleagues agreed in. To which Bradford said, my Lord, I pray you, stretch out your gentleness, that I may feel a little of it; for hitherto I never felt it. At this the Chancellor, thinking he would comply, again proferred him mercy, if with them he would return. Return! said Bradford, God save me from going back: I mean, said he, that I was three quarters of a year in the Tower, without paper, pen, or ink, and never, in all that time, nor since, did I feel any gentleness from you; but have rather looked for, as I have hitherto found, extremity; and, I thank God, I perceive now, you have kept me in prison thus long, not for any matter you had, but for matter you would have: God's good will be done. Here several persons came in, telling his Lordship it was dinner time; whereupon, leaving Bradford speaking, he rose up and said, that in the afternoon they would talk more with him; so he was led into the vestry, and waited there 'till it was dark night (†). In the mean while, about four o'clock the same afternoon, Mr T. Husley, before mentioned in the text, came into the vestry, under a pretence of inquiring for a person who was not there, and seeing Mr Bradford, he made himself soon known to him, and told him, he would come and have some conversation with him the next morning; which Bradford did

(*) This is over-reckoned about a quarter of a year.

(†) The author of Bradford's Life in Abel Rediviv. says, p. 189, that all men observed, how they had first committed him without Law; and then, after a year's imprisonment, made one, to take away his life.

(‡) Appalled, Fox.

(†) Here ends the second Examination of Bradford, in the old Suo edition before used, these conferences which follow in this note, are not to be read in that edition 'till after Bradford's third Examination, being made introductory to the Private Talk he afterwards had with those who were sent to him by the Bishops; but Mr Fox, in due respect to the order of time, having judiciously rejoined these Conferences to this second Examination, we follow him herein.

ments and menaces, to all efforts of drawing him into that apostacy they had set him the pattern of; but still, not in utter despair of gracing their example, and justifying their own compliance by his, they ordered him up to their inquisition at the same place again the next day, and this being his last examination before that satanical synagogue (a), we must in another note, remit our reader to a brief rehearsal or summary of what is most material therein [I]. Thus we see, for not allowing the grossest impositions upon human understanding not refuse; the said Hussey being his old acquaintance, and had often received money of him, when he was Pay-master abroad, as we before observed. Bradford having waited in vain for further examination that day, was at night conveyed again to prison. The next morning, which was the thirtieth of January, the said Mr Hussey came thither into his chamber, to tamper with him, and, in a plausible speech, declared, how wonderfully well he had behaved himself before the Bishops yesterday, insomuch that his greatest enemies could perceive, they had no matter of objection against him; therefore advised him, as of his own good will, and without the privacy or direction of any one, to intreat for time, and some learned men to confer with; which Bradford absolutely refused, as what would give occasion of thinking he was doubtful, or unsettled in the doctrine he had professed. As they were thus talking, the door was unlocked, and in came Dr Seyton, who, when he saw Mr Hussey, said, What, Sir, are you come before me? which speech Bradford marking, as made to one, who had told him, no man knew of his coming, he inwardly admonished himself to beware of these men; for he saw they came to hunt the matter; that one might bear witness with the other. Then Dr Seyton, after some by-talk of Bradford's age, country, and the like, began a long sermon, pretending that Cranmer, Latimer, and Ridley, had required conference, in order to induce Bradford to request the like; but he answered as he did before. Then Dr Seyton began to wheedle, as the other had done; telling him, that Master Runcorne had reported at the Chancellor's table, That Bradford was able to persuade as much as any one he knew; and I myself, added he, though I never saw you before yesterday, yet thought your modesty was such, your behaviour and talk so without malice and impatience, that I should be sorry you should do worse than myself; and further told him, he perceived the Lord Chancellor had a favour towards him; so he also counselled him to desire respite, and to confer with the learned: but still, says Bradford, I kept to my Cuckoo. This constant and unwavering temper in Bradford, made a change in the Doctor's, who hereupon grew angry; called him arrogant, proud, and vain glorious. But this serving not his purpose, he then changed his note again, and urged how mercifully, and how charitably, he had been treated! But Bradford shewed him, he had not met with justice, much less charity; and that he was thus imprisoned, and handled, for nothing they had, but only something they wanted against him, out of his own confessions. Here the Doctor flew from point to point, in hopes of pitching upon that something, which might justify those sufferings; but all the Doctor said, having no effect, Master Hussey began to ask him, whether he would not admit of conference, if the Lord Chancellor should offer it him publicly? whereunto he answered, If that conference had been offered before the law had been made; or were offered so, that he might be at liberty to confer, and as free as him with whom he should confer, then, said Bradford, it were something; otherwise he saw not to what purpose it should be offered, but to defer that which must come at length, and the lingering might give more offence, than do good: Yet, said he, if his Lordship should make such an offer voluntarily, I will not refuse to confer with whomsoever shall come. Here the Doctor was in a fume again, about this conference, called him arrogant still, proud, and whatever came uppermost; till Bradford, very sedately besought them both, perceiving he should shortly be called for, to give him leave to confer with God, and beg grace of him; which, after their unwilling departure, he sought in prayer, and obtained; to his great comfort and support. Shortly after they were gone, he was carried out of prison, to St Mary Overies church, and there carried uncalled for, till eleven o'clock the same morning; that is, till Mr Saunders was excommunicated, and inhumanly given over to the severest of deaths (60).

(a) See Bishop Ridley's Letter to Augustine Bernher, in Coverdale, p. 7; and to Mr Bradford, p. 62.

[I] A brief rehearsal, or summary, of what is most material therein. After the excommunication of Lawrence Saunders, Bradford was brought into the church, before the Bishops; where, the Chancellor, as before, declared, what mercy he should find, if with them, he would conform to the Popish religion, and recant his doctrine. Bradford still insisted upon his oaths against the Pope, which he would not violate, he said, that when death came, as he expected from their hands, he should not be troubled with the guilt of perjury. The Chancellor, angry hereat, said, they had given him respite to deliberate, till this day, whether he would recant his heresy about the Sacrament. Bradford alledged, that they gave him no time for any such deliberation, nor that he said any thing of the Sacrament which they disallowed; for when, said he, I had declared the presence of Christ therein, to the faithful; you went from the matter; to purge yourself of cruelty, and so went to dinner. I perceive, said the Chancellor, we must begin all over again with you: Did I not yesterday tell thee plainly, that thou madest a conscience where none should be? Did I not make it plain, that the oath against the Bishop of Rome, was an unlawful oath? No, replied Bradford; indeed, my Lord, you said so, but proved it not; nor ever can do. Here the Chancellor had much dispute again, about oaths; which were good, and which evil; cautiously asking often of Bradford, a direct answer; which Bradford would not give simply, but with some distinction. This much offended the Chancellor; but Bradford still kept him at a bay, that the oath against the Bishop of Rome, was a lawful oath; still confirming himself, and consulting the Chancellor, out of his own book (*); withal, so closely proving the Word of God to be their judge, and by that Word the oath to be lawful, that the Chancellor quitted his hold, and flew again to Bradford's pretended denial of the Queen's authority. But here again, Bradford proved, that one special cause of obedience denied by conscience, makes no general denial of obedience in causes lawful. The Chancellor brought examples for his argument, as little to the purpose as before; and Bradford again reproached him, in like manner as before, with being so strict in vows for the marriage of Priests, made to themselves, and so careless in solemn oaths made to God and the Prince. When the Chancellor told him the Queen did dispense with them; Bradford answered, the Queen might remit her right, in things relating to herself or government, but not dispense with oaths made to God. Here the Chancellor was wonderfully discomposed, and plainly declared, that he slandered the whole realm of perjury, and took upon him to have more conscience than all the wise men in England; and yet, had none at all. At this, Bradford desired the audience to observe, who had most; adding, he had been a year and half in prison, and desired to know, why he was imprisoned, and for what punished? and because the Chancellor had said, that Bradford took upon him to speak to the congregation undesired, he appealed to Bishop Bourn, there present; affirming, that he desired in Christ's name, that he would speak to the people, by whom he had like to have been slain, with the dagger that was thrown, and touched his sleeve; and at his further request, did not leave, till he had safely hous'd him; and tho' it was dangerous to upbraid the people with their repentment towards the said Bourn, he yet, in his sermon the same afternoon, reproved the fact, and called it sedition, at least twenty times; for which, he had been so long rewarded with a prison, and was now about to be with death: he also taxed the Chancellor, with having owned, at his first being before him in the Tower, that the said fact was good, tho' he pretended the mind was evil: and to this he answered, I cannot otherwise declare my mind to man, than by saying, and doing; but God, I trust, will one day open, to my comfort, what my mind was, and your's is. Here the Chancellor was driven to eat his own words, and de-

(*) De Vera Obedientia, 800, 1535, &c.

(60) The Effect of the second Examination of J. Bradford in the temple of St Marie Overies, &c. 200, as before, and in Fox, Vol. III. fol. 236.

standing to be reasonable, and not believing such absurdities in the popish Doctrine, as those temporizing Prelates, those enemies to justice, truth, and humanity itself, could only for their interest pretend to believe, how he was given up to death. After his condemnation, we find him on the 3d of February, a prisoner in the Poultry-Counter, in the City of London (b), and that he lay there almost five months, bated and worried great part of the time, by some or other of the Bishops and their Chaplains or Priests, and others whom they set upon him, in hopes, all under the vizard of friendship and compassion, to worm out some confessions or other, of such erroneous tenets as might give some colour to the world for their barbarity towards him. But he was invincible to them all; steady as a rock, repelling the stormy waves that invaded it, and exposing their insolvency, by turning them into froth. His sagacity in discerning their snares, and his readiness in refelling their arguments from the Scriptures, the Fathers, and Themselves, were such, upon those politic and rational topics, of the Pope's authority here, and the real or carnal presence in the sacrament, for the denial of which he was condemned (c); that his most clamorous antagonists aid that he ever said so. But when this would not do, he said, that Bradford was put first into prison, for not conforming to the Queen's religion. Bradford answered, my Lord, you know, that you would not then reason with me on religion; but said, that a time should afterwards be found; and if, as you say, I were put in prison for religion, in that my religion was then authorized by the publick laws of the realm; could conscience therefore punish me, or cast me into prison? wherefore let all men judge in whom conscience is wanting. Here Mr Chamberlain, of Woodstock, came forth, and objected, that Bradford had been a serving-man with Mr Harrington, and had deceived his master of twenty-seven pounds (*); wherefore he went to be a Gospeller, and a Preacher, said he; adding, and yet you see, how he pretendeth conscience! My Lord, replieth Bradford to the Chancellor, I set my foot to his, whosoever he be, that can come forth, and justly vouch to my face, that ever I deceived my master; and as you are Chief Justice, by office, in England, I desire justice upon those that so slander me, because they cannot prove it. Here both the Chancellor and the other accuser were struck blank. Wherefore, Bonner try'd how successful another untruth would prove, from him; so charged Bradford with writing letters to Dr Pendleton; one, who was as great a time-server, and turn-coat in religion, as Bonner, or the Chancellor himself (61); which Bradford denying, and he being not able to prove, this was given up. Then came in one Allen, a Clerk of the Council, and remembered the Chancellor of Bradford's letters, written into Lancashire; for which the Chancellor said, they had his hand to shew. Bradford denied that they could shew his hand to any letters he had sent thither, which his heart would not stand to, and prove to be lawful. Here they were all answered; and the Chancellor driven back, in hopes of putting a new gloss upon an old objection, to alledge, that in his house, the other day, Bradford had contemned the Queen's mercy, and professed he would maintain the erroneous doctrine in King Edward's days. Upon which, Bradford acutely shewed them, how the Chancellor had plainly foiled himself; saying, Well, I am glad that all men see now, that you have had no matter to imprison me before that day: Now, say I, I did not contemn the Queen's mercy, but would have had it, with God's mercy; that is, without saying, and doing, any thing against God, and his truth; and, as for maintenance of doctrine, he repeated what he had said before; that he was better confirmed than ever in it, and was ready to give up his life in testification thereof. Then the Chancellor shifted again, to another branch of yesterday's controversy, his opinion of the Sacrament; and told him again, they gave him respite 'till this day, to deliberate. Bradford answered, he spoke nothing of the Sacrament that they reproved, and was appointed no time to deliberate. But when he was again asked whether he believed that Christ's body naturally, and really, was under the form of bread and wine? He answered again, he believed Christ there present, to the faith of the due receiver; but for Transubstantiation, he plainly, and flatly, told them he believed it not. Here was much dispute upon this head. And another Bishop asked him, whether the wicked man received Christ's body, or not? Bradford answered directly, No. And this raised many cavils, 'till Bradford put them to silence also in this, as he had done in the other arguments, and drove the Chancellor, to deny Christ had commanded any thing in the Sacrament, or the use of it; then confuted him from the express words of the text, in the imperative mood, Take and eat; adding withal, My Lord, if it be not a commandment of Christ, to take and eat the Sacrament, why do any take upon them to command, and make of necessity that which God leaveth free? As you do, in making it a necessary commandment, that once a year, all who are arrived at lawful discretion, should receive the Sacrament? Here the Chancellor called him Diabolus, or slanderer; and this brought on a tedious contention about commandments, 'till Bradford quoted a very affronting commandment upon them; How say you, my Lord, quoth he? Christ says, to you Bishops especially, Ita, predicato evangelium: Go and preach the Gospel; feed Christ's flock; Is this a commandment, or not? Here the Chancellor flew out beyond all bounds, and his reasoning evaporated into rage. Another question, of as great importance, was asked him by the Bishop of Durham,—When Christ began to be present in the Sacrament; before it was received, or not? Which Bradford shewed to be more nice than necessary to answer. Here was a great clutter again, and they all called him heretick. Thus perceiving all he could answer, did but the more inflame their rancour, and boil up their venom against him, he desired them to proceed, in God's name; as he looked for that which God suffered them to do. And when the Chancellor objected, his holding herein, another heresy, of fatal destiny; he replied, he spoke but as the Apostles did; 'Lord, see how Herod and Pontius Pilate, with the Prelates, are gathered together against Thee, Christ; to do that, which thy hand and counsel hath before ordained them to do.' At which words, the Chancellor began to read his excommunication, and therein, when he came to the name of Bradford, filed laicus, or layman, Why, said he, art thou no Priest? No, returned Bradford, nor ever was, either Priest, or benediced, or married, or any Preacher, before publick authority had established religion (*); but preached after publick authority had established religion; and yet, said he, I am thus handled at your hands; but God, I doubt not, will give his blessing, where you curse. And so he fell down on his knees, heartily thanked God, that he counted him worthy to suffer for his sake; and prayed, that he would give them repentance. After the excommunication was read, he was delivered up to the Sheriffs of London; who first conveyed him to the Clink (†); where he remained a day or two, and was then removed to the Poultry-counter; from whence he hourly expected to be carried, and converted to ashes (62). Thus we have gone through the three examinations of Mr Bradford; for a copy whereof, which he sent to Bishop Ridley, in prison at Oxford, that Bishop returned him his thanks, and opinion of his conduct throughout the same, in these words: 'Blessed be the Holy-Trinity, the Father, the Son, and the Holy-Ghost, for your threefold confession! I have read all three, with comfort, and joy, and thanksgiving unto God, for his manifold gifts of grace wherewith it is manifest to the godly reader, that God dyd assist you mightily; and blessed be God again, and again, which gave you so good a mind and remembrance, of your oath once made against the Bishop of Rome; least you should be partaker of the common perjury, which all men almost are now fallen into, in bringing in again that wicked usurped power of his (63).'

(b) Bradford's Private Talk with such as the Prelates sent to him; at the end of his Examinations beforementioned, 8vo, fg-nar. B. v.

(c) Bradford's Letter to the University and town of Cambridge, in Coverdale, p. 257; in Fox, p. 258.

(*) Seven score pounds, as it is printed in Fox, p. 240; but neither being true, 'tis no matter which Bradford was here charged with.

(61) See Bradford's character of this Dr Henry Pendleton, in his Letter To those who profess the true religion in Lancashire, &c. among his others, in Coverdale's Collect. p. 264; and for Bonner's opinion publickly professed against the Pope's Supremacy, read his Preface to Bishop Gardener's book de Vera Obedientia; and for Gardener's opinion against the same, read also his said book. In Dr W. Bulleyn's Dialogue Pleasant and Piteous, &c. 8vo edit. 1569, p. 16, &c. 'tis said of Bonner, that Avarus was his cousin-german, Perjurus his compupil, and that Ambodexter penned his Prologue or Preface to Gardener's book aforesaid.

(*) Or, Preacher, after publick authority had altered religion; as we read it in Fox, p. 241; which reading is also true.

(†) A Common Jail in Long Southwark, at the west end, on the bank side of the Thames, near where the stews formerly stood.

(62) The Effect and Summe of his last Examination, 8vo, as before, and in Fox, Vol. III, fol. 239.

(63) Bishop Ridley's Letter to Mr Bradford, in Coverdale's Collection, p. 65.

antagonists were struck with silence, and departed with admiration. To recite the confessions of these subordinate disturbers of him, verbatim, might prove as great a penance to our readers, as the hearing of them was to him; being longer, though succinctly related, than all his three examinations; therefore we shall only skim over the surface of them, to satisfy the curious how, upon what, and with whom, the short remainder of his time was employed; especially seeing it accounted for in the satisfactory form of a Journal [K].

But

[K] Seeing it accounted for in the satisfactory form of a Journal. The first day that Bradford was in the Poultry-Counter, which was the third of February, as was before said, Bishop Bonner came thither, to degrade Dr Taylor. When he saw Bradford, off went his cap, and out stretched his hand, to greet him, upon hearing he was desirous of conference; wherefore he had brought Archdeacon Harpsfield: but it proved a mistake; for Bradford kept to his old note, That he did not desire, yet was not afraid to confer with any man. And upon upbraiding the Bishop with condemning him for his faith, so soon as he uttered it at their request, before he had committed any thing against their laws, they parted. Upon the fourth of February came a gentleman of the Chancellor's to him, and told him how mighty well his Lord loved him, therefore he also offered him time to confer. This having the same answer, they parted. On the seventh of February came one Wollerton; a Chaplain of Bonner's, to prove Transubstantiation, and how wicked men received Christ's body. Bradford disproving his authorities, they agreed to exchange their reasons in writing, so they parted. The next day that Chaplain sent a paper, which no way inducing to consent, he came himself, and accused Bradford with swerving from the Church. Bradford shewed it was not from Christ's Church, but his; which robbed the people of the Lord's cup, and of Divine Service in their own tongue: and when the other insisted, that every thing must be learned of the Priest: Bradford answered, Then I see you would bring the people to hang up Christ, and let Barabbas go; as the Priests then persuaded the people. Upon which, the Chaplain had no stomach to talk any more: but Bradford winding up the discourse, with some reasons against Transubstantiation, he promised, upon parting, to send him an answer to them, which he never did. On the twelfth of February, one of the Earl of Derby's men, Mr Stephen Beich, came with his Lordship's wives, that he would have a regard to himself; to whom he said, he could not regard himself, more than God's honour. Then the other set before him his mother, sisters, kinsfolks, friends, &c. But he said, he had learned to forsake father, mother, brothers, sisters, and even himself; or he could not be Christ's Disciple. And when the other, upon urging that his death might do hurt, proposed, that if his Lord should obtain for him to depart the realm, whether he would be content with the Queen's appointment, where he should go? he answered, thinking it but just, that those who had resolved upon the sacrifice of his life, should have the shame of his death, that he had rather be burnt in England than beyond sea; and so they ended. On the fourteenth of February came another old acquaintance, named Percival Creswell, and with him a kinsman of Master Fecknam, to pray that they might make suit for him; he left them to their will, but still desired it not. In the afternoon they came again, and left with him a book of Sir Thomas More's, and desired he would name who he would confer with. But they were dismissed like the rest. Then came Dr Harding, the Bishop of Lincoln's Chaplain, whom Bradford seeing given up to Popery, and hearing himself accounted in a damnable state by him, tho' he had formerly maintained the doctrine which Bradford did, he bid this Doctor farewell. On the fifteenth of February came Creswell, and another again, with Nicholas Harpsfield, Archdeacon of London; and he made a long oration upon the way to heaven, thro' Christ, and the true Church; and they had much debate hereupon; but not agreeing at this meeting, Harpsfield, the next day came again, and made a sermon almost three quarters of an hour long, to prove the antiquity of his Church, with the succession of Bishops here in England, for eight hundred years; and desired him to shew such succession in his Church; Bradford did shew such succession, of greater antiquity; not by succession of High Priests, but the faithful professors of God's word: for his pretended pillars of the Church were the greatest persecutors of it; yet, not as contending for the law, but their interpretation of it. Harpsfield, tho' sorry to see him so settled, argued further with him about Transubstantiation, the real presence, and the receiving of Christ's body by the wicked, for which Bradford had been condemned; and finding, after all, that he would not intreat his interest for respite or conference, he left him the same man as he found him. After dinner, his keeper, Master Clayden, came to him from the Earl of Derby, who had promised to move the Queen in his behalf, if he thought well of it; he answered, If his Lordship would do it of his own good will, the favour would be more acceptable from him than any other. Then came an officer of the Queen's, and on his knees besought him to make some suit; but Bradford not liking his counsel, departed from him. On the seventeenth day he heard from Percival Creswell, that the Chancellor said, nothing would be done for him, if he did not make suit: but he refused to speed on that condition, and looked for the arrival of the Sheriff every moment; for he had heard that one of the Queen's guards, who were appointed to convey him into Lancashire, had said, they had a warrant the next day for him (†). When Bishop Ridley heard at Oxford, of this intended removal of Bradford, he wrote in a letter to him thus — 'Where the Martyrs for Christ's sake shed their blood, and lost their lives: O what wondrous things hath Christ afterwards wrought to his glory, and confirmation of their doctrine! If it be not the place that sanctifieth the man, but the holy man by Christ sanctifieth the place, brother Bradford, then happy and holy shall be that place, wherein thou shalt suffer, and be with thy ashes, in Christ's cause, sprinkled over. All thy country may rejoice of thee, that ever it brought forth such a one which would render his life again, in his cause, of whom he had received it (64)'. On the next day, which was the eighteenth, he heard that the writ for his execution was called in again, and the Sheriff of Lancashire discharged of him for the present. Here we may observe again, by the by, that after Bishop Ridley had heard of this delay of his death, he sent Bradford another letter, in which he has these words: 'Now, since, they have changed their purpose, and prolonged your death, I understand it is no other thing, than that once happened to Peter and Paul; the which, altho' they were of the first which were cast in prison, and as little shunned peril as any other did, yet God would not have them put to death with the first, because he had more service to be done by their ministry, which his gracious pleasure was they should do; so without doubt; dear brother, I am persuaded, that the same is the cause of the delay of your martyrdom (65)'. In the afternoon of the day aforesaid, Bradford heard from the Earl of Derby, that his Lordship had kneeled before the Queen for him, and that he should be granted books and time enough to peruse them; which he held needless, and what would but prolong his sufferings; however, he expressed his satisfaction thereat, that his Lordship, and others, might know he was not obstinate, or held any opinion, that he could not defend by authority of the Learned, and dared not abide the sitting of. On the nineteenth day Mr Clayden was sent from the Earl, to ask if Bradford would be willing to speak with the King's Confessor, and Alphonfus the Friar? Bradford answered, as he had all along done, that he neither desired nor feared to speak with any man. On the twenty first day, the Archbishop of York (¶), his old acquaintance, and the Bishop of Chichester (*) came to visit him; and after some ceremony, the Archbishop, commending his godly life, fell into argument with him upon the Scriptures. From thence they proceeded to the Catholick and Visible Church; and in the distinctions made here, Bradford was led to repeat the injustice of his condemnation; The Laws of the Realm being then on his side. After four hours controversy upon these and other topics, (†) Bradford had been at least ten days in expectation of being burnt in Lancashire: For in his Letter to Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer, at Oxford, dated 8 Feb. 1554-5, wherein he expresses God's mercy, that the death which is due to sin, should be made a testimonial of God's truth, he glories, that such a wretch as he calls himself was to be sent for, like Elias, in a fiery chariot; that he was going to leave his flesh where he had received it, and that he was to be conveyed thither, as Ignatius was to Rome, Leopardis, &c. Coverdale, p. 466.

(64) Ibid. p. 63.

(65) Ibid. p. 65.

(¶) Nicholas Heath.

(*) George Day.

But as we have observed here in the note, it descends no lower than the fifth of April, in the year 1555, and if he had any other private conferences, they were probably but to the same purpose. We are informed that, both while he lay in the King's-Bench, and now in the Counter, he preached twice a day, unless sickness hindered him; where also the Sacrament was often ministered; and through his keeper's indulgence, there was such resort of pious people to him, that his chamber was usually almost filled with them. He made but one short meal a day, and allowed himself but four hours rest at night (d). His gentle nature was ever relenting at the thoughts of his infirmities, and fears of being betrayed into inconsistency; his behaviour was so humane, so affecting to all about him, that it won even many Papists to wish for the preservation of his life. His very mein and aspect begot veneration; being tall and spare, or somewhat macerated in his body; of a faint sanguine complexion, with an auburn beard; and his eyes, thro' the intenseness of his celestial contemplations, were often so solemnly settled, that the tears would silently gather in them, 'till he could not refrain them from overflowing their banks, and creating a sympathy in the eyes of his beholders. The portions of his time he did not spend in prayer or preaching, he allotted to the visitation of his fellow-prisoners; exhorting the sick to patience, and distributing his money to the poor; some of them, those who had been the most violent opposers of his doctrines; nor did he leave the felons themselves without the best relief they were capable of receiving, under the distresses they had brought upon themselves; such as excited them to the most hearty and sincere repentance. But by what means he obtained such liberty after his condemnation, both of his pen and person, who was so much forbidden the same in both respects before it; the author next quoted, who gives us instances thereof, has not expressly revealed; but left room to conjecture, such lenity was now used by his persecutors, to work him into that conformity, which had been unsuccessfully attempted by their rigour: yet how little covetous he was of that liberty; how entirely abstracted from all other enjoyments of life; and how cheerfully prepared to resign it; may most evidently appear, not only in the particulars given by Mr Fox, but in the extracts here subjoined to them, from one or two only of the many letters written by, and to, Mr Bradford [L]. The last night he lay in the Counter, which was June the 29th; he was in which he had before silenced others, and after having reproved their relapse into Popery, and obstruction of the same, to the great disturbance of the nation, they were called away; so they packed up their common-place-books, withed him good in their words, and departed. On the twenty-second of February came early to him, the two Spanish Friars, Alphonus (+), and King Philip's Confessor. Here they had a long contention on the Sacrament all in Latin; and they grew so hot with him, that they made it a loud one at last, when they found they could not turn him out of his guard, nor his temper, but that he calmly and clearly repelled all their deceitful and beaten positions upon Transubstantiation, and the receipt of the carnal body, which he would no otherwise allow of, than to the faith of the worthy. To faith, said Alphonus, what's that? Bradford answered, as I have no tongue to express it, so you have no ears to hear and understand it: for faith says more than man can utter. Yes, replied the other; but I can tell all I believe. You believe not much then returned Bradford; for if you believe the joys of heaven, and believe no more than you can tell, you will not much desire to come thither: For as the mind is more receptive than the mouth, so it will conceive more than the tongue can express. In short, he so confounded them both, that they sometimes could only look upon one another, and at others, only vent themselves in anger, declaring they came not thither to be taught: so left him, without bidding him farewell. We meet with no further molestation of him 'till the twenty-first of March, then Dr Weston, Dean of Westminster, came to him, and offered him a lesson, which himself had never learnt, of forbearing to hold any opinions for the sake of vain glory; or singularity of private judgment; which he renounced: And lastly, the Doctor desired him to write him down the heads of his faith in Transubstantiation, and send them to him, which he did, in the Latin tongue; and the English translation is preserved by Mr Fox (66). After many invigilant arguments used by the doctor to convert him, and among others, some upon the Fears of Death, which Bradford said were to no purpose; the Doctor having drank with him, took his leave, and promised to return. On the twenty-eighth of March Dr Pendleton came to him, with others, and after Bradford had flattered him with a desire to know how he came to change his faith, he began to turn flesh and blood into bread and wine too, but as ineffectually as any of the rest had done; so he went his way, and promised to come back, but it appears not that he did. In the afternoon returned Dr Weston to defendant upon the paper of heads beforementioned, which Bradford had sent him. Before they began to read it, the Doctor told him, he had enquired of his conversation at Cambridge, and frankly acknowledged to his face, because, as he now said, he saw Bradford was not given to the glory of this world, (tho' he had just before cautioned him against vain-glory) that he had learned his life was such, always there, that all men, even his greatest enemies, could not but praise him; and therefore he loved him better than ever he did: so they fell to sifting and canvassing those heads which Bradford had sent him, but the Doctor's objections, arguments, and authorities, proving quite unsatisfactory; Bradford, after an hour's discussion upon the same things he had so often shewed himself settled in, quite weary, rose up; and the Doctor, after some promises, how greatly he would befriend him, parted very civilly as before. He returned on the fifth of April; said he had spoken to the Queen for him, and that death was not near him: But after some difference about the visibility of Christ's Church, he wished him well and departed. After this, his keeper, and the Lord Derby's man, Stephen Beich, treated him no otherwise than as his utter enemies. Henceforth we meet with no more of those Doctors visits and conferences, or alterations, upon any of the topics aforesaid; only a short colloquy that is recorded in Fox, between Mr Bradford, and the servant of a gentlewoman who had been severely afflicted by her own father and mother, for forsaking, as it seems, the Mass: in which colloquy there appears an instance of Bradford's fortitude against the fears of death, tho' he apprehended it so near him as the next day. Yet, indeed, from that last conference with Dr Weston, it was near three months before he was brought to his end.

[L] Not only in the particulars given by Mr Fox, but in the extracts from one or two letters only, written by and to Mr Bradford.] Mr Fox informs us, that while Bradford was prisoner in the King's Bench, he obtained licence, upon his bare promise to return again the same night, to go into London, without any keeper, to visit a sick person living near the Still-yard; and that he returned to prison again before his hour, rather than he would give the least apprehension of breaking his word. The same author also acquaints us, that while Bradford was in the said prison, and

Mr

(d) Fox, Vol. III.
p. 233.

(+) Mr Jer. Collier in his Eccles. Hist. P. ii. p. 382, calls this Alphonus the said King's Confessor; says, he was a Franciscan, and that in preaching before the King, he would declare against all sanguinary methods in religion, and inveigh against the severities in particular of our Bishops, for halting people to execution, because they could believe no better. He is called Alphonus a Castro by others. See Fra. S. Clara, whose true name was Christ. Davenport, in Hist. Min. Provincie Angliæ Fratr. Minor. m. p. 54. And the Antiq. of the Engl. Franciscans, 4^{to}. Lond. 1726, p. 230, &c. The other Spanish Friar's name, whom Bradford calls the King's Confessor, might also, in these authors, perhaps be found, if it were worth while to hunt after it.

(66) Vol. II.
p. 231.

was much troubled in his sleep, with dreams of the iron chain being brought to the prison gate,

Mr Saunders in the Marshalsea, they met on the backside of those two prisons, and conferred together, when they would; where the place was so unconfin'd, and there was such liberty, that he might have escap'd at pleasure: but the Lord, says Mr Fox, had another work to do for him. Moreover, while Bradford lay there, his Keeper also gave him privilege to ride into Oxfordshire, to visit a merchant of his acquaintance; but he was prevented of taking that journey by sickness (67). Among others whom he ratified there, in the Protestant Faith, Bishop Farrar was one; who having so far yielded to the delusive persuasions of the Priests, as to promise that he would receive the Sacrament among them; Bradford used such means with him, that he ever after resisted their temptations, and by resigning his body to sacrifice convinced them of his incorruptible mind (68). Whether it was in the same prison or in the Counter, that author expresses not; but in one of them, an old friend came to Bradford, and asked, if he should get his liberty, what he would do, or whether he would go? Bradford answered as if he was indifferent, whether he went out or no; but if he did, he would marry, and still continue in England, and still teach the people as he had done, and as the times would suffer him (69). Of the last letters which passed between him and his friends here in the Counter, we shall first transcribe a few lines out of that in which he takes his final farewell of his mother, a week before he suffered, as follows. 'My most deare mother; in the bowels of Christ, I heartely pray and besech you to be thankful for me unto God, which thus now taketh me unto himself. I die not, my good mother, as a theife, a murderer, an adulterer, &c. but I die as a witness of Christ hys gospel and veritye; which hereto I have confessed, I thanke God, as well by preaching, as by prisonment; and now, even presently, I shall moste willingly confyrme the same by fyre. I knowlege, that God moste justlye myght take me hence, syply for my sinnes, whiche are manye, greate and grevous, but the Lord, for his mercy in Christe, hath pardoned them all, I hope; but now, deare mother, he taketh me hence by this deathe, as a confessour and witness that the religion taught by Christe Jesu, the Prophetes, and the Apostles, is Gods truth. The Prelates doe persecute in me, Christe, whom they hate; and his truth, which they may not abyde, because their workes are evil, and may not abyde the truth and lyght, lest men should see their darknes. Therefore, my good, and most deare mother, geve thanks for me to God, that hath made the fruit of your wombe to be a witness of hys glory, and attend to the truth, whiche, I thank God for it, I have truly taught out of the pulpit at Manchester: use often and continual prayer to God the Father, through Christe; harken, as you may, to the Scriptures; serve God after hys word, and not after custome: beware of the Romysh Religion in England, desyle not yourself wyth it; carry Cbristes crofs as he shall lay it upon your backe; forgoe them that kill me, pray for them, for they know not what they do, &c.' fo charging her to be mindful of her daughters, and do as she pleased with the writings he sent her by his brother Roger, &c. he takes his last farewell in this life; 'besecheng the Almighty and Eternal Father to grant, they may meet in the life to come, where they shall give him continual thanks and praise for ever.' Dated the twenty-fourth of June, 1555 (70). We shall only here add, two or three quotations out of another letter, written by Mr John Careles of Coventry, now prisoner in the King's-Bench; being an answer to one Bradford had sent him, full of the most prophetick promises and consolations; and that for his penitent and believing heart all his offences were clearly pardoned, and that he should not die (71), or be put to death for his faith, which indeed he was not, tho' he had long looked, and longed for that dignity, which the highest angels in heaven were not preferred to (72), but did in the prison aforesaid, about a twelve-month after Bradford. In return to this, Careles has, in his said last letter to Bradford, among others, these words, 'Ever since the good Mr Philpot shewed me your last letter, (my deare hart in the Lord) I have continued in great heavyness and perplexity; not for any hurt or discomfort; that I can perceive coming towards you, unto whom, double's death is made life, and great felicitie; but for the great loss that God's Church, here in England, shall sustain, by the taking away of so godly, worthy, and necessary an instrument, as the Lord hath made you to be. Ah! that my life, and a thousand such wretched lives more might go for your's (*). Ah! why doth God suffer me, and such other caterpillars to live, that can do nothing but consume the almes of the Church, and take you away, fo worthy a workman and labourer in the Lord's vineyard? But woe be to our fins and great unthankfulness, which is the greatest cause of the taking away of such worthy Instruments of God, as should set forth his glory, and instruct his people. If we had been thankful unto God for the good ministers of his word, we had not been so deprived both of it and them.' And a little further. 'But what go I about, to mingle your mirth with my mourning, and your just joy, with my deserved sorrow? If I loved you, indeed, as I have pretended, I should surely rejoice with you most heartily, and praise God on your behalf, from the very bottom of my heart: I should praise God day and night, for your excellent election, in and through his great mercy; and should give him most humble thanks for your vocation, by his Gospel, and your true knowledge in the same: I should earnestly praise him for your sweet justification, whereof you are most certain by God's grace and spirit; and should instantly pray unto him, for your glorification, which shall shortly ensue: I should rejoice, and be glad to see you so dignified with your crown of Martyrdom, and to be appointed to that honour, to testify his truth, and to seal it with your blood: I should highly extol the Lord, who hath given you a glorious victory over all your enemies, visible and invisible; and hath given you grace and strength to finish the tower that you have begun to build: Finally, if I loved you, I should most heartily rejoice, and be glad to see you delivered from this body of sin, and vile prison of the flesh, and brought into that heavenly tabernacle, where you shall be safely kept, and never offend him more. This, and much more should I do, if I had a good heart towards God, or you his dear child: But, alas, I am an hypocrite, and do seek nothing but my own commodity—Ah! my dear heart, now I must take my leave of you, and as I think, my ultimum valed, in this life; but in the life to come, I am right well assured, we shall merrily meet together, and that shortly I trust. And in taking my leave of you, my dear heart in the Lord, I shall desire you faithfully to remember, all the sweet messages that the Lord our good God, and most dear loving Father, hath sent you, by me, his most unworthy servant; which, as they are most true, so shall they be most truly accomplished upon you, eternally; and for the more assurance and certificate thereof, to your godly conscience, he hath commanded me, to repeat the same unto you, again, in his own name, and word: Therefore (as he goes on, in a more extraordinary strain) now give ear, and faithful credence. Hearken, O ye heavens, and thou earth give ear, and bear me witness at the great day, that I do, here faithfully, and truly, the Lord's message unto his dear servant, his singularly beloved and elect child, John Bradford. John Bradford, thou man so specially beloved of God! I pronounce and testify unto thee, in the word and name of the Lord Jehovah, that all thy sins, whatsoever they be, be they never so many, so grievous, or so great, be fully and freely pardoned, released, and forgiven thee, by the mercy of God, in Jesus Christ, thine only Lord and sweet Saviour, in whom thou dost undoubtedly believe. Christ hath cleansed thee with his blood, and clothed thee with his righteousness, and hath made thee, in the sight of God, his Father, without spot, or wrinkle: so that, when the sire doth his appointed office, thou shalt be received, as a sweet burnt-sacrifice, into heaven; where thou shalt joyfully remain in God's presence, for ever, as the true inheritor of his everlasting kingdom; unto which thou wast undoubtedly predesti-

(* It has been lately observed very justly, That this expression from an uncondemned man, as J. Careles was, to his friend Bradford, was truly generous, and that the late Lord Balmorino's wish, That he could pay the reckoning, both for himself, and his noble fellow-sufferer, the Earl of Kilmarnock, was but seeming-ly so: for these being both condemned, it spoiled the compliment; as he could then be at no greater expence in paying for both, than he was in paying only his own reckoning. Vid. Seasonable Reflections on the Dying Words and Department of Arthur Lord Balmorino, in answer to Mr T. Ford's Account of the Behaviour of those Lords, &c. 8vo, 1746, p. 11. said to be written by Mr Joseph Elderton, an Attorney.

(67) Acts and Mon. Vol. III. p. 233.

(68) Ibid. p. 234.

(69) Ibid.

(70) Coverdale's Collection, &c. p. 454.

(71) Fox. Vol. III. p. 602.

(72) Idem. p. 603.

gate, which was to bind him to the stake; also, of being removed the next day to Newgate, and burnt in Smithfield the morning after; all which exactly came to pass. He quitted his unquiet bed about three o'clock in the morning, and, by his old exercise of reading and prayer, soon recovered that composure of mind, which continued to the last. When the keeper's wife, almost beside herself, brought him intelligence the next day, that the chain was buying, and that he must die on the morrow; he pulled off his cap, and lifting up his eyes to Heaven, said, I thank God for it, I have looked for it a long time; therefore it comes not suddenly, but as a thing waited for every day and hour; the Lord make me worthy of it. When he shifted himself into the shirt he was to die in, he made such applications of it to the Wedding-Garment, as raised the admiration of all who were about him. When he went out of the prison, he distributed his money to every servant and officer of the house, and all the prisoners took their leave of him with weeping eyes; so, about midnight he was carried to Newgate, attended by a vast multitude of people, who, because they had heard he was to suffer by break of day, that the fewer spectators might be witnesses of his death; they either stayed in Smithfield all night, or returned in greater numbers thither by four o'clock the next morning, which was the first of July, 1555; but Bradford was not brought thither 'till nine o'clock, and then he came under a stronger guard of halberdeers than was ever known on the like occasion. As he came out of Newgate, he gave his velvet cap and his handkerchief to an old friend, with whom he had a little private talk. But his brother-in-law Roger Beswick, for only taking leave of him, had his head broke, 'till the blood ran down his shoulders, by the Sheriff Woodrofe (*). When he came to Smithfield, and in his company a Yorkshire youth, who was an apprentice in London, named John Lyefe, and to be burnt at the same stake with him, for maintaining the like faith in the Sacrament, and denying that Priests had any authority to exact auricular confession; Bradford went boldly up to the stake, laid him down flat on his face, on one side of it; and the said young man, John Lyefe (†), in like manner, went and laid himself on the other; where they had not prayed to themselves above the space of a minute, before the said Sheriff bid Bradford arise, and make an end; for the press of the people was very great [M]. When they were on their feet, Bradford took up a faggot and kissed it, and did the like to the stake. When he pulled off his cloaths, he desired they might be given to his servant; which was granted. Then, at the stake, holding up his hands and his face to Heaven, he said aloud, O England, England, repent thee of thy sins! Beware of idolatry, beware of antichrists, lest they deceive you. Here the Sheriff ordered his hands to be tied; and one of the fire-rakers told him, if he had no better learning than that, he had best hold his peace. Then Bradford forgiving, and asking forgiveness, of all the world, turned his head about, comforted the stripling at the same stake behind him, and embracing the flaming reeds that were near him, was heard, among his last words, to say, Strait is the way, and narrow is the gate, &c. So left the dross of his body among the ashes upon the earth, while his soul, by that searching separation, the purer ascended to Heaven, and

(*) The Construction which was made of the dreadful diseases which buried this cruel Sheriff in his bed eight years before he died, may be read in Fox and Fuller, in the Life of Mr Bradford, p. 138, &c.

(†) Fox, or his Printers, call him Leaf; but we perceive not any authority they had to vary from the spelling of his name as it is here restored, from the first Life of Mr Bradford, before his Examinations; &c. as before quoted.

'nate and ordained, by the Lord's infallible purpose and decree, before the foundation of the world was laid. And that this is most true, that I have said, I call the whole Trinity, the Almighty and eternal Majesty of God the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, to my record at this present; whom I humbly beseech, to confirm and establish in thee, the true and lively feeling of the same; Amen. Selas (73).

[M] For the press of the people was very great. Among the numerous throng of people, who were spectators at his execution, there was that memorable gentlewoman, Mrs Mary Waters, the daughter of Robert Waters, of Lenham in Kent, Esq; and wife of Robert Honeywood, Esq; of Charing, in the same county. This lady, in the days of Queen Mary, was wont to visit the prisons, and relieve the confessors there. Now, when Mr Bradford was at the stake, she being desirous of getting near it, that she might distinctly hear him, and see the end of his sufferings, was so crowded and pressed by the multitude, that her shoes were trodden off, and she forced to go barefoot from Smithfield to St Martins, before she could furnish herself with a new pair, for her money (74). This is the lady, whose mind being perplexed with some religious doubts of salvation, many ministers repaired to her; and, among the rest, Mr John Fox, the Martyrologist; and though she could not have chosen an abler instrument to reconcile her afflicted mind; all his arguments proved ineffectual; insomuch, that in the agony of her soul, she threw a Venice-glass, which she had in her hand, with great vehemence to the ground, and burst forth, at the same time, into this expression; 'I am as surely damned, as this glass is broken;' but it rebounded from the ground, and was taken up whole (75). This also is that Dame Honeywood, who by her only husband aforesaid, left alive at her decease, lawfully descended from her, three hundred sixty and seven children; that is, sixteen of her own body, one hundred and fourteen grand-children, two hundred and twenty-eight of the third generation, and nine of the fourth. She lived a most pious life, and in a christian manner died at Markeshall in Essex, the eleventh of May 1620, in the ninety-third year of her age, and the forty-fourth year of her widowhood (76). It should seem, that before Mr Bradford died, she had consulted him for satisfaction, in those doubts and despondency beforementioned, in like manner as after his death, she advised with Mr Fox; there being some letters of Bradford's writing, to a gentlewoman under the like perturbation of mind, extant among his others; but because her name is not mentioned, we shall forbear to make any transcripts from them; and also, because some readers may think this article of Bradford already copious enough; especially those who may not know, that what Mr Fox has thought worthy of preserving concerning him, is not comprehended in less than seventeen sheets of paper. Throughout the same, in what he has copied from preceding authors, we must do him the justice to say, he has, as far as we have had occasion to trace and collate them, approved himself a faithful historian. And tho' the sufferers under Popish governments, were not all to be admitted strictly as martyrs, nor were meant by him as such, who may appear in his calendar; tho' he might be mistaken in some recent examples, by the haste of delineating truth in her unsettled sight, upon the wings of report, and before her perfect form, features, and proportions, were fixed and confirmed in the writings of other men; tho' he might be misinformed in several parts of his intelligence (and purposely, 'tis presumed, in some, by his adversaries, to pave the way for a detection of those parts, and discredit the whole) which misinformations he yet afterwards corrected, in as much as came to his knowledge; inconveniences that must attend the compiler

(73) Coverdale's Letters of the Martyrs, p. 628. And Fox, Vol. III. as before.

(74) Fuller's Worthies, in Kent.

(75) Idem.

(76) So the inscription on her monument in Markeshall church.

and thus by his death, confirmed most effectually the truth of that doctrine, which he had so powerfully preached in his life.

piler of so large a body of modern history, as his chiefy is; no man being likely to receive, from various hands, such a multitude of matters of fact, as are all perfect truth, and digest and display them as perfectly without error; yet of what weight are these objections, or more of the like, which Stapleton, or Parsons, or any other Jesuit can offer, in contempt of the Foxian martyrs, to overthrow such a solid and immoveable fabrick? It is compiled of so many undeniable evidences of Popish barbarity, whereof, this Master Bradford is one, not the least conspicuous, that allowing all Mr Fox his own real, but involuntary, mistakes, they can never discountenance his work, 'till the slaves and scavengers of Rome, have purged their own legendary and lying martyrologies, of their wilful, their studied, yet stupid and most detestable, impostures: But as his Acts and Monuments, have long been, they will still remain substantial Pillars of the Protestant Church; of more force than many more volumes of bare arguments, to withstand the tide of Popery; and like a Pharos, should be lighted up in every age, to warn our unwary countrymen, from the deceitful and destructive Rocks therein.

BRADY (ROBERT), a noted Historian and Physician in the last century; was born in the county of Norfolk, and admitted in Caius-College in Cambridge, February the 20th; 1643 (a). He took his degree of Bachelor of Physick in 1653 (b), and was created Doctor in that Faculty, Sept. 5, 1666, by virtue of the King's mandatory letters (c). On the first of December the same year, he was, in pursuance of King Charles's mandate, elected Master of his College, upon the resignation of Dr Bachcroft (d). About the year 1670, he was appointed Keeper of the Records in the Tower of London (e); in which office, how well he employed himself in perusing those most valuable monuments in his possession, is abundantly plain from his historical works, of which an account will be given below. Some time after, he was chosen Regius Professor of Physick in the University of Cambridge (f). In 1679 he writ a letter to Dr Sydenham, which is published among that learned person's works [A]. But his largest and most considerable performance was, 'An Introduction to the old English History [B],' and, 'A Compleat History of England, from the first entrance of the Romans, unto the end of the reign of King Richard II. in three Vols. fol. [C],' about which he was employed several years. In the year 1681, he was chosen one of the Representatives for the University of Cambridge, in that Parliament which met at Oxford (g); and again in 1685, in the Parliament of King James II (h). He was likewise Physician in ordinary to this King: and, on the twenty-second of October 1688, was one of those persons who gave in their depositions concerning the birth of the pretended Prince of Wales (i). This learned Doctor died on the nineteenth of August 1700 (k). He was an accurate writer, and a curious and diligent searcher into our antient Records. But he hath also been charged with several faults. The chief is, that throughout his Compleat History, as he calls it, he is so wholly taken up in endeavouring to prove the novelty of Parliaments, that his book does by no means answer the title (l). For, in order to please an arbitrary Court, to whom the House of Commons hath always been an invincible check, and to represent the origin of that august body, as grounded upon the rebellion of Simon de Montfort, in King Henry the III's reign (m); he hath taken great pains to prove, 'That the Commons of England, represented by Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses

[A] He writ a letter to Dr Sydenham, &c. It is dated from Cambridge December 30, 1679, and is placed at the head of Dr Sydenham's Epistolæ responsoriæ duæ. In this letter, Dr Brady observes, That no Physician had yet duly considered the influence of the air on human bodies; nor showed the force of it, in fermenting, altering, and circulating the blood, and in all animal motions whatsoever: and therefore he commends Dr Sydenham, for his account of acute distempers, and their cure; and desires him, to publish what observations he had made of late years on that subject. Next, he intreats him, if he knew any thing particular on the use of the Indian (or Peruvian) bark, to communicate it to him. And lastly, Dr Sydenham having recommended frequent bleeding in the rheumatism, Brady enquires of him, whether, a less severe and cruel method could not be found out to cure that distemper? In answer to these several queries; Dr Sydenham wrote his Epistola responsoria prima, which is printed among his works. It was first printed at London, in 1680, 8vo.

[B] An Introduction to the old English History. What the contents of this book are, will best appear by the title; which is as follows. 'An Introduction to the old English History, comprehended in three several tracts. The first, An Answer to Mr Petyt's Rights of the Commons asserted; and to a book intitled, Jani Anglorum facies nova; The second edition very much enlarged. The second, An Answer to a book intitled, Argumentum Antinormannicum, much upon the same subject; never before published. The third, An exact History of the Succession of the Crown of England; The second edition also very much enlarged. Together with an Appendix containing several Records, and a series of great Councils and Parliaments before and after the Conquest, unto the end of the reign of Henry the Third. And a Glossary expounding many words used frequently in our ancient Records, Laws, and Historians.' One Vol. fol. London, 1684. The substance of the whole book may be comprized in these three Propositions. 1. That the Representatives of the Commons in Parliament [viz. Knights, Citizens, and Burgesses] were not introduced 'till the forty-ninth of Henry III. 2. That William, Duke of Normandy made an absolute conquest of the nation. 3. That the succession to the Crown of England is hereditary, (descending to the nearest of blood) and not elective.

[C] Introduction to the old English History, And a Compleat History of England, &c. The Introduction, as mentioned in the last Note, contains one Volume fol. and the History is generally bound in two more. The first was printed at London, 1685, and the second in 1700. At the end of each, is a large Appendix of Original Papers. This History is full of records, and other valuable materials for a History of England; but it is far from being a Compleat History. For the author hath neglected, or passed over, numberless facts, and omitted such as served not for his purpose: so that it can be justly and properly called nothing else but a heap of valuable undigested materials. It was in opposition to this History, and in order to set things in a different light, that James Tyrrell, Esq; writ his General History of England; in which he freely censures the Doctor's mistakes. Besides these three Volumes, Dr Brady writ 'a Treatise on Burghs,' in a thin folio.

[D] Unles

(a) College Register.

(b) University Register.

(c) Ibid. & Kennet's Register and Chronicle, &c. Lond. 1728, p. 251.

(d) Collegebooks, and Kennet, ubi supra, p. 270. and J. Le Neve's Fasti, p. 428.

(e) From Memoirs communicated to us. But Mr Holmes, Deputy-Keeper of the Records in the Tower, has since assured us, that he was not made Keeper of the Records 'till 1685.

(f) From the same Memoirs.

(g) Notitia Parliamentaria, &c. by Br. Willis, Esq; Lond. 1730, Vol. 1. p. 180.

(h) Ibid.

(i) See the several Declarations, together with the several Depositions, &c. concerning the birth of the Prince of Wales, p. 37.

(k) J. Le Neve's Fasti, &c. p. 428.

(l) Hearne's Duct. Historic. Vol. 1. third edit. Lond. 1714, p. 174.

(m) See the Antient Right of the Commons of England asserted, by Will. Petyt, Esq; Lond. 1680: and Jus Anglorum ab antiquo: and Hist. of England, by Ja. Tyrrell, Esq;

Burgeſſes in Parliament, were not introduced; nor were one of the three eſtates in Parliament, before the forty-ninth of Henry III (n); and, that, before that time, the body of the commons of England, or freemen collectively taken, had not any ſhare or votes, in making of laws for the government of the kingdom (o); nor had any communication in affairs of State, unleſs they were repreſented by the Tenents in capite [D]. Another point which he ſtrenuouſly maintains, and endeavours to ſupport with monſtrous heaps of quotations out of antient Hiſtorians and Records, is, 'That William, Duke of Normandy, did by degrees, tho' not at firſt, make an abſolute conqueſt of the Engliſh nation (p). That he altered the whole conſtitution; brought a new law, and impoſed it upon the people; and from him, and his Normans, we received our tenures, the manner of holding our eſtates in every reſpect, and the cuſtoms incident to thoſe eſtates. And further, he took away from the Engliſh their eſtates, and gave them to his Normans [E]; and this he did from his firſt coming in (q). So that all the Biſhops, Earls, and Barons of England, did hold their lands, earldoms, and baronies of the Crown, or of the King, as of his perſon, and that was in capite (r). All which Brady aſſerted and maintained, with a view (as was thought) to enlarge the prerogative, to overthrow all pretences to an original compact, and all claims of rights and privileges enjoyed by our Saxon anceſtors (s); and to repreſent the Engliſh nation as a parcel of ſlaves, who depend for their eſtates and fortunes upon the King (t); and whoſe liberties and laws, were the grants and conceſſions of our Kings (u); particularly, that the Commons right to ſend repreſentatives to Parliament, was extorted by force from the crown, and in rebellious times; and conſequently, that the whole might be repealed, or reſumed.

(n) Answer to W. Petyt's Rights of the Commons, &c. in the Introduction.

(o) Ibid.

(p) Answer to Argumentum Antinormannicum, in Introduction, to old Engl. Hiſt. p. 235.

(q) Answer to Mr Petyt's book, in the ſame Vol. p. 14.

(r) Ibid. p. 115.

(s) See Preface to the reader in Vol. I. of Brady's Hiſt.

(t) General Preface at the beginning of Vol. I. of Brady's Hiſt. p. vi-xvii.

(u) Ibid. p. xxiv. See Tyrrell's Preface to Biblioth. Polit. p. 111. and Preface to Appendix in Vol. III. of his Hiſt.

[D] Unleſs they were repreſented by the Tenents in capite.] This is the ſubſtance of his Answer to Mr Petyt's book, intitled, 'The antient Right of the Commons aſſerted; or, a Diſcourſe, proving by Records and the beſt Hiſtorians, that the Commons of England were ever an eſſential part of Parliament.' Lond. 1680. 8vo. and to Mr Atwood's book, called, 'Jani Anglorum facies nova; or ſeveral Monuments of Antiquity touching the great Council of the Kingdom.' Lond. 1680. 8vo. Mr Atwood replied, in his, 'Jus Anglorum ab antiquo; or, a Confutation of an impotent Libel againſt the Government by King, Lords, and Commons. Under pretence of answering Mr Petyt, and the author of Jani Anglorum facies nova.' Lond. 1681. 8vo. But the Doctour's moſt conſiderable and powerful opponent, was, James Tyrrell, Eſq; who, in the general Introduction to his Hiſtory (1), and in the Appendix to his third Volume (2), hath endeavoured to prove, 'That the great Councils, or Parliaments, conſiſted, in the Saxon times, of Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Ealdormen, and the whole body of Thanen, or Free-holders, who were then all Gentlemen, either by birth or eſtates (3); and, after the Norman conqueſt, were compoſed of Archbiſhops, &c. as above, the Commons having there alſo their Repreſentatives (4). The whole controverſy turns upon this; Parliaments, in the antientſt times, conſiſted unqueſtionably of Archbiſhops, Biſhops, Abbots, Earls, and Barons; and alſo of other perſons, which, in Records and Hiſtories, are ſtyled Wiſe, Great, Chief, Noble, &c. What perſons theſe were, is the queſtion. Brady ſays, It was only the Tenents in capite (5). And Tyrrell maintains, That they were the leſſer Barons, or conſiderable Freeholders, whoſe poſſeſſions were then very large; there being, in thoſe times, no ſuch little Freeholders as there is at preſent (6).

[E] He took away from the Engliſh their eſtates, and gave them to his Normans, &c.] This the Doctour aſſerted, and ſtrenuouſly maintained, in oppoſition to a book written by Mr Cook, and entituled, 'Argumentum Anti-Normannicum;' or an Argument proving, from ancient Hiſtories and Records, that William, Duke of Normandy, made no abſolute Conqueſt of England by the ſword; in the ſenſe of our modern Writers.' Lond. 1682. 8vo. Mr Cook's opinion is warmly eſpouſed, and ſtrongly ſupported, by Mr Tyrrell, in the Introduction to his ſecond Volume of the Hiſtory of England, and in the reign of William I. — After all their diſputes, the caſe may be thus fairly and impartially repreſented. William I. came to conquer and dethrone Harold, and ſubdue his adherents. After Harold's death, he took into protection all ſuch as would ſubmit to him; and, at his Coronation, ſwore, that he would govern both his Engliſh and French ſubjects by the ſame equal law (7). Many of them rebelling afterwards againſt him, he deprived them of their eſtates, which he diſtributed amongſt his favourites. Now, that is no more than what is done every day in caſe of Treason. Though perhaps he might carry his revenge, and extend his prerogative, further than he ought to have done.

(5) Answer to Mr Petyt, throughout.

(6) Biblioth. Politic. ubi ſupra. And Hiſt. in Gen. Pref. and Append.

(7) — Æquo jure Anglos, quo Francos, traſtaret. — W. Malmeſt. de Geſtis Pontific. p. 271, ed. Fraſcof. 1601.

(1) Vol. I. p. lxxviii, &c.

(2) Page 1, &c.

(3) General Introduction. ubi ſupra p. xciii. Bibliotheca Politica, Dialog. 6, 7, 8.

(4) Ibid. and Appendix to Vol. III.

BRADY (NICOLAS), D. D. was the ſon of Major Nicolas Brady, an officer of the King's army in the rebellion of 1641; being lineally deſcended from Hugh Brady, the firſt Proteſtant Biſhop of Meath [A]. He was born at Bandon in the county of Cork, on the twenty-eighth of October 1659, and educated in that county 'till he was twelve years of age, when he was removed to Weſtmiſter-ſchool, where he was choſen King's ſcholar, and from thence elected Student of Chriſt-Church, Oxford; after continuing there about four years, he went to Dublin, where his father reſided; at which Univerſity he immediately commenced B. A. and the following year M. A. (a). When he was of due ſtanding, his Diploma for the degree of Doctour of Divinity, was upon account of his uncommon merit, preſented to him from that Univerſity while he was in England, and brought over by Dr Pratt, then ſenior Travelling-Fellow, afterwards Provoſt of that College. His firſt preferment in the Church, was to a Prebend, in the Cathedral of St Barry's, in the city of Cork, and to the pariſh of Kinaglarchy, in the county of Cork; to which he was collated by Biſhop Wettenhall, to whom he was domeſtick Chaplain. He was a zealous promoter of the late happy Revolution, and an eminent ſufferer for it. In 1690, when the troubles broke out in Ireland, by his intereſt with King James's General, Mac-Carty, he thrice

(a) Regiſt. Coll. Dub.

[A] Fiſt Proteſtant Biſhop of Meath.] William Waſh, Biſhop of Meath, who was a Papiſt, was deprived in the year 1560, for preaching againſt the book of Common Prayer, then lately eſtabliſhed, and the Queen's ſupremacy. Hugh Brady was advanced (1) in his room, though not 'till the year 1563, the See being kept vacant, on account of the unſettled ſtate of Religion at that time.

(1) Pat. Camb. Hib. 21. Octo 5 Eliz.

[B] Gave

thrice prevented the burning of Bandon town, after three several orders given by that Prince to destroy it. The same year, having been deputed by the people of Bandon, he went over to England, to petition the Parliament for a redress of some grievances they had suffered, while King James was in Ireland. During his stay there, and to the time of his death, he was in the highest esteem among all ranks of persons in that kingdom, for his eminent attachment to the true interest of his country. Having quitted his preferments in Ireland, he settled in London; where he became noted for his abilities in the pulpit, and, upon that account, was elected Minister of St Catharine-Cree Church, and Lecturer of St Michael's Wood-street. He afterwards became Minister of Richmond in Surrey, and Stratford upon Avon in Warwickshire, and at length Rector of Clapham, in the county abovementioned; which last, together with Richmond, he held to the time of his death. He was also Chaplain to the Duke of Ormond's troop of horse-guards, as he was to their Majesty's King William and Queen Mary, and afterwards to Queen Anne. He died on the twentieth of May 1726, in the sixty-seventh year of his age; leaving behind him, the character of being a person of a most obliging, sweet, affable temper, a polite Gentleman, an excellent Preacher, and a good Poet; of which he gave proofs in some pieces [B].

[B] Gave proofs of his Poetry in some pieces.] Such of his poetical pieces as are published are (for what we know) only these. 1. A new Version of the Psalms of David, which are in part his work, and in part Mr Tate's, with whom he joined in this translation soon after he had settled in London, and it is now sung in most churches of England and Ireland, instead of that obsolete version made by Thomas Sternhold and John Hopkins in the reign of King Edward VI. — 2. The Æneids of Virgil, which were published by subscription in four Volumes in 8vo. the last of which came out in 1726, a little time before the author's death. — He also published in his life-time,

Three Volumes of Sermons in 8vo. each consisting of fourteen, all printed in London, the first in 1704, the second in 1706, and the third in 1713. After the Doctor's death, his eldest son, who is now a Clergyman, published three other volumes of his father's Sermons, each also consisting of fourteen, printed in London, 1730, 8vo. The first Sermon he published separately, was preached at his church of St Catharine-Cree, on the 26th of November, 1691, and printed, London, 1692, 4to. and a second, which he preached at St Bride's church, on Monday, November the 22d, 1697, being St Cæcilia's day, intitled, Church Music Vindicated. — Printed, London, 1697, 4to. D

BRAMHALL (JOHN) Archbishop of Ardmagh, in the seventeenth century; was born at Pontefract in Yorkshire, about the year 1593, being descended from an antient and genteel family (a) [A]. He received his first education in the place of his birth; and, when he was fit for the University, was sent to Sidney-College in Cambridge, where he was admitted February the twenty-first, 1608 (b), and put under the care of Mr Hulet (c) [B]. He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in the year 1612, and that of Master in 1616 (d); after taking the latter, he quitted the University, and entering into Holy-Orders, had a living given him in the city of York (e); he was likewise presented to the Rectory of Elvington, or Eterington, in Yorkshire, by Mr Wandesford, afterwards Master of the Rolls, and some time Lord-Deputy of Ireland. About the same time he married a clergyman's widow, of the Hally's family, an agreeable woman, and a good fortune; with whom he had a valuable library, left by her former husband; by which he was so wedded to his studies, that all the temptations of a new-married life, could not divorce him from them, nor give any intermission to his duty of constant preaching. This he performed with so much assiduity, prudence, and gravity, that he became as eminent in the Church, as before in the University, and greatly beloved by all degrees of men (f). In the year 1623, he had two publick disputations at North-Allerton, with a secular Priest and a Jesuit [C]; which gained him great reputation, and so recommended him in particular to the Archbishop of York's (g) esteem, that he made him his Chaplain, and took him into his confidence. During the life of the Archbishop, he was made Prebendary of York [D], and

(a) The Life of John Lord Archbishop of Ardmagh, prefixed to his Works, edit. 1677, fol. by John, Bishop of Limerick, p. 2. it is not paged.

(b) From Dr Sherman's Tabulæ Sidneiana.

(c) Sir James Ware's Works, edit. 1739, under the Life of our Primate.

(d) From the Grace-book of Sidney-college.

(e) Life, &c. as above.

(f) Life, p. 2, 3.

(g) Toby Matthews.

[A] Being descended from an ancient and genteel family.] Namely from the Bramhalls of Bramhall-Hall in Cheshire, related by intermarriage to the Keresfords of Keresford in Yorkshire, a house that has flourished in a direct line from the time of King Henry II (1).

[B] And put under the care of Mr Hulet.] The Right Rev. author of his life, Bishop Vesey, informs us, That 'he became there master of the arts and sciences before he had the degree; all his acts and exercises being still performed with that easiness and smoothness, which argues clean strength and sufficiency (2).'

[C] He had two publick disputations at North-Allerton, with a Secular Priest and a Jesuit.] These two Papiests (3) had sent a publick defiance to all the Protestant Clergy in that country, (at a time when the match between Prince Charles and the Infanta of Spain was in agitation, and they expected from thence great advantages and countenance to their own religion) and when none durst accept the challenge, our author undertook the combat. Though he was then but about thirty years of age, and a stripling in the School of controversy, yet he managed the dispute so well, that his antagonists, and their whole party, had reason to repent of the insolence of their adventure. One of the subjects of the disputation was the article of Transub-stantiation, from whence they easily sliding into that other of the Half-Communion, he shamefully baffled their doctrine of Concomitancy, and drove the disputant up to so narrow a corner, that he affirmed that eating was drinking, and drinking was eating in a material or bodily sense. Mr Bramhall looked on this as so elegant a solecism, that he needed no greater trophy, if he could get under his hand, what he had declared with his tongue, which being desired, was by the other, in his heat, and shame to seem to retreat, as readily granted. But upon cooler thoughts, finding perhaps after the heat of the contest was over, that he could not quench his thirst with a piece of bread, he reflected so sadly on the dishonour he had suffered, that not being able to digest it, in ten days he died. Archbishop Matthews hearing of this disputation, sent for Mr Bramhall, and at first rebuked him for his hardness in undertaking a disputation so publicly without allowance; but soon forgave him (4).

[D] During the life of the Archbishop he was made Prebendary of York.] So we are assured by the Right Rev. author of his life (5). But, according to Browne Willis, Esq; (6) he was not made Prebendary of York, 'till the thirteenth of June, 1633, five years after the death of Archbishop Matthews: So that one of these after of Rippon; at which last place, he went and resided after the Archbishop's death, (which happened in 1628) and conducted most of the concerns of that church, in the quality of Sub-Dean. Here he preached constantly for several years, and became so eminent, not only for his abilities in the pulpit, but also for his knowledge in the laws, that he was frequently chosen arbitrator between contending parties; and by that, and his good behaviour in all other respects, he obtained so much honour and interest, that there was scarce any publick transaction, over which he had not a considerable influence; even in the elections for Members of Parliament, such as he named at Rippon, and other corporations, carrying the vote and favour of the people. He was also appointed one of his Majesty's High-Commissioners; in which office he was very curious in the disquisition of all causes, and by some was accounted severe: but, however rough his speech might sometimes be, his dealings were generally smooth and gentle (b). In the year 1633, he took the degree of Bachelor, and in 1630, that of Doctor in Divinity (i) [E]. Soon after, he was invited to Ireland by the Lord Viscount Wentworth Deputy of that kingdom, and Sir Christopher Wandesford Master of the Rolls; and he accepted of their invitation, though he had a prospect of being promoted in his native country, and was offered to be made one of the King's Chaplains in Ordinary. Having therefore resigned all his Church-preferments in England, he went over into Ireland in the year 1623; and, a little while after, obtained the archdeaconry of Meath, the best in that kingdom. The first publick service he was employed in, was a regal visitation, in which he was either one of the King's Commissioners with Baron Hilton Judge of the Prerogative, or such a coadjutor that all was governed by his directions. In this visitation, he found the revenues of the Church miserably wasted, the discipline scandalously despised, and the Ministers but meanly provided. The bishopricks, in particular, were wretchedly dilapidated by fee-farms, and long leases and small rents [F]. But he applied, in process of time, proper remedies to these several evils. And likewise endeavoured to destroy some opinions of general credit, that he judged very prejudicial to a good life [G], which yet were revered almost like articles of faith (k). In the year 1634, he was promoted to the bishoprick of Londonderry, and consecrated the sixteenth of May, in the chapel of the castle of Dublin (l). While he enjoyed this See he very much improved it; not only in advancing the rents, but also in recovering lands (m) detained from his predecessors: by which means he doubled the yearly profits of that bishoprick (n). But the greatest service he did the Church of Ireland, was, by getting, with the Lord-Deputy's assistance, several Acts passed, in the Parliament which met in that kingdom, July 14, 1634 [H].

(4) Life, &c. as above, p. 3.

(5) As above, p. 4.

(6) Survey of the Cathedrals of York, &c. edit. 1727, 4to, Vol. I, p. 145.

In

(b) Life, &c. p. 4, 5.

(i) From the Grace-book of Sidney-college, as above.

(k) Ibid. p. 7, 8, 9.

(l) Sir James Ware, ubi supra.

(m) As Termin, Colahy, &c.

(n) Life, &c. as above, p. 10, 11.

two authors must be mistaken. The Prebend he had, was that of Hustwaith, in the Church of York.

[E] He took the degree of Doctor in Divinity.] The thesis he disputed upon, on that occasion, was this: Pontifex Romanus est causa vel procurans vel conservans, omnium vel saltem precipuarum controversiarum in orbe Christiano. i. e. 'The Pope is the author, or maintainer, of all, or at least of the chief, controversies in the Christian world.' And in all his exercises, then, he made it appear, that he had not lost his time in the country, nor evaporated all in pulpit-discourses, but that he had furnished himself with very substantial learning (7).

(7) Life, &c. as above, p. 5.

[F] The bishopricks were dilapidated by fee-farms, and long leases and small rents.] These had been granted, partly by the Popish Bishops, who resolved to carry as much with them as they could; and partly by their Protestant successors, who might fear another turn, and were, having their example, disposed enough to make use of the same arts. By such means on the one side and the other, many bishopricks were made extremely small; some reduced to one hundred pounds per annum; some to fifty, as Waterford, Killfenoragh; &c. Some to five marks, as Kilmacduagh; and particularly Cloyne, the Bishop whereof was called Episcopus quinque marcarum, the five marks Bishop. Aghadoc was only one pound one shilling and eight pence; and Ardferb but sixty pounds. Lymerrick had above five parts in six made away by fee-farms, or encroached on by undertakers. The like was done in Cashel, Emly, Waterford, Lismore, and Killaloe.—In some dioceses, as in Ferns and Leighlin, there was scarce a living left, that was not farmed out to the patron, or to some for his use, at two, three, four, or five pounds per annum, for a long time, three lives, or a hundred years (8).

(8) Ibid. p. 7, 3, 25.

[G] And likewise endeavoured to destroy some opinions of general credit, that he judged very prejudicial to a good life.] And he was very desirous to abate of their value, and to reduce them to what they ought only to pass for, school-opinions: That so men might have the liberty of their private reasons. He could not endure to see some persons enslave their judgment to a person or a party, that cry up nothing more than Christian liberty. He thought that liberty was much confined, by being chained to any man's chair, as if all he uttered, were oracles, and to be made the standard and test of orthodoxy. That the Christian faith and liberty are then most in danger, when so many things are crowded into confessions, that what should be practical, becomes purely a science, of a rule of life a useless speculation, of a thing easy to be understood, a thing hard to be remembered. That it was the interest of the Protestant Church, to widen her bottom, and make her articles as charitable and comprehensive as she could, that those nicer accuracies that divide the greatest wits in the world, might not be made the characteristics of reformation, and give occasion to one party to excommunicate and censure another. Thus he saw the Church of England constituted, both Calvinists and Arminians subscribe the same propositions, and walk to the house of God as friends (9).

(9) Ibid. p. 9.

[H] Several acts passed in the Parliament which met in that kingdom, July the fourteenth, 1634.] The first was, 'A statute for the maintenance and execution of pious uses, obliging all Archbishops and Bishops to perform every such trust, according to the true intent of the deeds, in that behalf made, or to be made (10).' The next was, 'A statute for confirmation of leases made by the Lord Primate, and other Bishops of Ulster, of such endowments as had been made by King James to the Archbishoprick of Armagh, the Bishopricks of Derry, Clogher, Raphoe, and Killmore, giving them power any time within five years, to make leases for sixty years of such lands (11).' By this statute, the Church was enabled, on the surrender of titles to free-farms, and some improvement of rent, to make leases, as above, for sixty years; by which means she was in many places bettered at present, and had a hopeful prospect of recovering her full right at last. But the best defence of the Irish Church, was the statute entituled, 'An Act for the preservation of the inheritance, rights, and profits of lands belonging to the Church, and persons ecclesiastical (12).' This limited them to time and rent, prescribed what they might set, and for what,

(10) Ibid. c. 1. fol. 50.

(11) Ibid. c. 1. fol. 56.

(12) Sess. 4. c. 1. fol. 78.

and

in pursuance of which, he abolished the fee-farms that were charged on church-lands; and obtained compositions for the rent, instead of the small reserved rents. He likewise was very instrumental, in getting such impropriations as remained in the Crown, vested by King Charles I, on the several incumbents, after the expiration of the leases. Some he recovered by law: and persuaded many persons possessed with tithes, to restore them, or sufficiently to endow the vicarages, or to grant a fit salary at least to the Curates. Moreover, he purchased himself abundance of impropriations; either with his own money; or by large remittances from England; by money given by his Majesty to pious uses; by borrowing large sums, and securing them out of the issues of the impropriations he bought; by voluntary contributions; and by a share of the goods of persons dying intestate. By these, and other means, he regained to the Church, in the space of four years, thirty or forty thousand pounds a year (o). In the Convocation that met at the same time, he prevailed upon the Church of Ireland to be united in the same faith with the Church of England [I], by embracing the XXXIX Articles of Religion agreed upon in the Convocation holden at London in the year 1562. He would fain also have got the English Canons established in Ireland; but, notwithstanding his utmost endeavours, he could obtain no more, than, that such of our Canons as were fit to be transplanted among the Irish, should be removed thither, and others new framed, and added to them. Accordingly, a book of Canons was compiled, chiefly by our Bishop, and having passed in Convocation, received the royal confirmation. For all these services, he met, from several quarters, with a great deal of detraction and envy; and, according to the fashion of those times, was charged with Arminianism and Popery: but he was not of a spirit to be scared from what he thought his duty with noise and ill-words (p). Having thus, for a considerable time, laboured for the good of others, he thought it time to make some provision for his own family. In order to it, he took a journey to England in 1637, and was received with much respect by persons of the highest quality, particularly in his native country. But when he came to London, he was surprized with the news of an information exhibited against him in the Star-Chamber [K], of which, however, he soon cleared himself. After having received much honour from King Charles I. and many civilities from Archbishop Laud, and other great persons, he returned to Ireland; and with six thousand pounds for which he sold his estate in England, (but brought over at several times) he purchased another of good value, and began a plantation at Omagh in the county of Tyrone. But the distractions in that kingdom hindered him from bringing it to perfection (q). For he was not without his share, in the troubles that brought Ireland to the brink of destruction. On the fourth of March 1640-41, articles of high-treason against him, and several of the Prime Ministers of State (r), were exhibited by the House of Commons to the House of Lords in Ireland; wherein they were charged with having conspired together, to subvert the fundamental laws and government of that kingdom, and to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical government; to have pronounced many false, unjust, and erroneous judgments, against law, which had occasioned divers seditions and rebellions; and to have laboured to subvert the rights of Parliament, and the ancient course of parliamentary proceedings (s). The Bishop was then at Londonderry, when he received intelligence of this accusation, on the sixth of March. All his friends

(o) Ibid. p. 14, 15, 16.

(p) Ibid. p. 17, 18, 19, 20. Never fear when the Cause is just, was one of his usual sayings. Ibid. p. 22.

(q) Ibid. p. 21, 22.

(r) Viz. Sir Rich. Bolton, Knt. Lord Chancellor of Ireland; Sir Gerard Lowther, Knt. Chief-Justice of the Common Pleas; and Sir George Radcliffe, Knt.

(s) See the Articles at length, printed in 1641, 4^{to}.

and how long, and is the security of succession.—Care also was taken of the inferior clergy, in another act, which enableth restitution of impropriations and tithes, and other rights ecclesiastical, to the clergy, with a restraint of aliening the same, and directions for the presentations to churches (13).

[I] In the Convocation that met at the same time, he prevailed upon the Church of Ireland to be united in the same faith with the Church of England.] The faith of both was the same in the main, only with this difference, that the Irish articles were more rigid and Calvinistical. Of which no better reason can be given, than that the first reformers in Ireland, on account of the great number of Papists in that kingdom, endeavoured to guard against them as much as possible. Therefore, like burnt children, which so much dread the fire, that they think they can never be far enough from their fear, they became very dogmatical in some propositions (most opposite as they conceived to the Church of Rome), left undetermined by the Church of England. Now Bishop Bramhall laboured, in the Convocation, to have the correspondence more accurate and entire: and discoursed with great moderation and sobriety, of the convenience of having the articles of peace and communion in every national Church worded in that latitude, that dissenting persons, in those things that concerned not the Christian faith, might subscribe, and the Church not lose the benefit of their labours, for an opinion which perhaps they could not help; that it were to be wished, such articles might be contrived for the whole Christian world, but especially that the Protestant Churches under the King's dominion might all speak the same language; and particularly, that those of England and Ireland being reformed by the same principle and rule of scripture, might confess their faith in the same form. Persuaded by these arguments, the Convocation drew up a canon, which is as follows. 'For the manifestation of our agreement with the Church of England in the confession of the same Christian faith, and the doctrine of the sacraments, we do receive and approve the book of articles of religion, agreed upon by the Archbishops and Bishops, and the whole clergy in the Convocation, holden at London in the year 1562, &c. And therefore if any hereafter shall affirm, that any of those articles are in any part superstitious or erroneous, or such as he may not with a good conscience subscribe unto, let him be excommunicated, and not absolved before he make publick revocation of his error (14).'

[K] An information exhibited against him in the Star-Chamber.] The charge was, 'That he was present at Rippon, when one Mr Palmes had made some reflecting discourse upon his Majesty, and that his Lordship had taken no notice of it, either to improve him or inform against him.' The words deserved no very capital punishment, if they had been true, being no more than, 'That he feared a Scottish mist was come over their town;' because the King had altered his lodgings from Rippon, where he had designed them, to one Sir Richard Graham's house, not far from that place: But the Bishop easily cleared the whole company (15).

(14) Lit. &c. p. 17, 18.

(15) Ibid. p. 22.

(13) Sess. 4. c. 2. fol. 75. In pursuance of, and by the benefit of these Acts, the Rents of the See of Ardmagh in particular, were improved 735l. 4s. 4d. yearly, more than usual. Lit. &c. as above, p. 13.

friends wrote to him to decline the trial, but he thought it dishonourable to fly. On the contrary, he repaired to Dublin, and shewed himself the next day in the Parliament-house, where his enemies stood staring upon him for a while, and then made him a close prisoner. But though all persons were encouraged to contribute to his ruin, they found little to object, but his endeavours to retrieve the ancient patrimony of the Church. Notwithstanding they examined all his actions with despight, they could not fix the least tincture of private advantage on him; none of his relations, family, or friends, being one farthing the richer for any thing he had recovered to the Church. Nor being able, therefore, to make any thing good on that head, they endeavoured to worry him, with the accusation of his having attempted to subvert the fundamental laws. In this distress he writ to the Primate Usher, then in England, for his advice and comfort [L]; who mediated so effectually in his behalf with the King, that his Majesty sent a letter over to Ireland, to stop proceedings against Bishop Bramhall. But this letter was very slowly obeyed; however, the Bishop was at length restored to liberty, but without any public acquittal, the charge lying still dormant against him, to be awakened when his enemies pleased.

(t). Shortly after his return to Londonderry, Sir Phelim O-Neil contrived his ruin in the following manner. He directed a letter to him wherein he desired, 'that, according to their articles, such a gate of the city should be delivered to him:' expecting that the Scots in the place would, upon the discovery, become his executioners. But the person who was to manage the matter, ran away with the letter. Though this design took no place, the Bishop found no safety there. The city daily filling with discontented persons out of Scotland, he began to grow afraid they would deliver him up. One night they turned a cannon against his house to affront him; whereupon, being persuaded by his friends to look on that as a warning, he took their advice, and privately embarked for England. He went into Yorkshire, where, by his example, his frequent exhortations from the pulpit, his incessant labours with the gentry, and his prudent advices to the Marquis of Newcastle, he put great life into the King's affairs. Moreover, he sent a considerable present of plate to his Majesty at Nottingham: and composed some things in favour of the royal cause, of which we shall give an account below (u). Thus he continued active all the time of his being in England; that is, 'till the unfortunate battle of Marston-moor: but, after that, the King's affairs being grown entirely desperate, the Bishop embarked with several persons of distinction, and landed at Hamburg, July 8, 1644 (w) [M]. Thence he went to Brussels, where he continued for the most part 'till the year 1648, with Sir Henry De Vic the King's Resident: preaching constantly every Sunday, and frequently administering the sacrament. The English merchants of Antwerp, ten leagues thence, used to be monthly of his audience and communion, and were his best benefactors. In the year 1648 he returned into Ireland; and after having undergone several dangers and difficulties [N], narrowly escaped thence in a little bark [O]. At his arrival into foreign parts,

(t) Life, &c. as above, p. 24, 25, 26.

(u) Ibid. p. 26, 27. See below note [U].

It was then he writ Fair Warning, Serpent-Salve, &c.

(w) Historical Collections, &c. by J. Rushworth, Vol. V. edit. 1721, p. 637.

[L] In this distress he writ to the Primate Usher, then in England, for his advice and comfort.] Part of his letter to him, was as follows. 'It would have been a great comfort and contentment to me, to have received a few lines of counsell or comfort in this my great affliction, which has befallen me for my zeal to the service of his Majesty and the good of this Church, in being a poor instrument to restore the usurped advowsons and appropriations to the Crown, and to increase the revenue of the Church, in a fair just way, alwaies with the consent of parties, which did ever use to take away errors: but now it is said, to be obtained by threatening and force. What force did I ever use to any? what one man ever suffered for not consenting? my force was only force of reason and law. The scale must needs yield when weight is put into it. And your Grace knows to what pass many Bishopricks were brought, &c. See above note [F] how the Chantries of Ardee, Don-dalk, &c. were employed to maintaine Priests and Fryers, which are now the chief maintenance of the incumbents. In all this my part was only labour and expence, but I find that losses make deeper impression than benefits. I cannot stop mens mouths, but I challenge the world for one farthing I ever got either by references or Church-preferments. I fly to your Grace as an anchor at this time, when my friends cannot help me. God knows how I have exulted at night, that day I had gained any considerable revenue to the Church, little dreaming that in future times that act should be questioned as treasonable. I never took the oath of Judge or Counsellor, yet do I not know wherein I ever in all those passages deviated from the rule of Justice, &c.'—This letter is dated April 26, 1641.

Archbishop Usher, in his answer has these words.— 'I assure you my care never slackened in solliciting your cause at Court, with as great vigilancy, as if it did touch mine own proper person. I never intermitted any occasion of mediating with his Majesty in your behalf, who still pittied your case, acknowledged the faithfulness of your services both to the Church and to him, avowed that you were no more guilty of treason than himself, and assured me that he would do for you all that lay in his power, &c (16).'

[M] And landed at Hamburg, July 8, 1644.] Shortly after the treaty of Uxbridge, the Parliaments of England and Scotland made this one of their preliminary demands, That Bishop Bramhall, together with Archbishop Laud, &c. should be excepted out of the general pardon. This was accordingly done, in an ordinance of indemnity, passed by the Rump-Parliament in 1652 (†).

[N] And after having undergone several dangers and difficulties.] All the while he was there, he had his life continually in his hand, being in perils by the Irish, in perils by his own countrymen, and in perils by false brethren. At Limerick, the Earl of Roscomon had such a fall coming down a pair of stairs, that he lived only so long to declare his faith (at Bishop Bramhall's instance) as it is professed in the Church of England: which gave such offence to the Romanists there, who would have reported he died a Papist, if he had not spoke at all, that they threatened the Bishop's death, if he did not suddenly depart the town. At Portumnagh, indeed, he and such as went with him enjoyed afterwards more freedom under the Marquis of Clanrickard's protection, and an allowance of the Church-service: but, at the revolt of Cork, he had a very narrow deliverance, which Cromwell was so troubled at, that he declared he would have given a good sum of money for that Irish Canterbury (17).

[O] Narrowly escaped thence in a little bark.] This escape of his is accounted very wonderful. For, the little bark he was in, was closely hunted by two of the Parliament-parts, providence supplied him with a considerable sum of money, of which he greatly stood in need (x). For having had seven hundred pounds long due to him, for salmon caught in the river Bann (y), and sent abroad, which debt he looked upon as lost; he was now so fortunate as to recover it; which proved a seasonable relief, both to him, and to many royalists that partook of his generosity. During this second time of his being abroad, he had many disputes about religion with the learned of all nations, sometimes occasionally, and at other times by appointment and formal challenge; and writ several things in defence of the Church of England (z). He likewise purposed to draw a parallel between the liturgy of the Church of England, and the publick forms of the Protestant Churches; and for that end designed a journey into Spain; but he met with an unexpected diversion in his first day's journey into that kingdom (a) [P]. At the same time, there was a great friendship and correspondence between him and the Marquis of Montrose, whose cause he often recommended to the favour and justice of foreign Princes (b). Upon the restoration of the Church and Monarchy, Bishop Bramhall returned to England (c); and was, from the first, designed for some higher promotion. Most people imagined it would be the archbishoprick of York; but at last he was appointed Archbishop of Armagh, Primate and Metropolitan of all Ireland (d) [Q], to which he was translated the eighteenth of January, 1660-61 (e). Not long after, he consecrated, in one day, Dr Margetson, Archbishop of Dublin; Dr Pullen, of Tuam; and the following ten Bishops, Dr Boyle, Bishop of Cork; Dr Parker, of Elfin; Dr Jeremy Taylor, of Down; Syng, of Lymerick; Preece, of Leighlin; Baker, of Waterford; Wild, of Derry; Lessly, of Drommore; Worth, of Killalow; and Hall, of Killala. The ceremony was performed in the cathedral church of St Patrick, Dublin, the Lords-Justices and Council attending (f). In this same year, he visited his diocese, where he found great disorder; some having committed horrible outrages, and many imbibed very strong prejudices, both against his person, and the doctrine and discipline of the Church: but by lenity and reproof, by argument, persuasion, and long suffering, he gained upon them even beyond his own expectation. He used to say, men must have some time to return to their wits, that had been so long out of them. Therefore, by his prudence and moderation he greatly softened the spirit of opposition, and effectually obtained the point he aimed at (g) [R]. As he was, by his place, President of the Convocation which met the eighth of May 1661, so was he also, for his merit, chosen Speaker of the House of Lords, in the Parliament which met at the same time [S]. And so great a value had both Houses for him, that they appointed Committees, to examine what was upon record in their

(16) Life, as above, p. 25.

(†) Dugdale's View, &c. p. 741.

(17) Ibid. p. 27, 28.

(x) Life, &c. p. 27, 28.

(y) Where there is a fine salmon-fishery belonging to the Bishop of London-derry.—The Bishop had also some relief from the Lord Scudamore.

See View of the Churches of Derry, &c. Lond. 1727, 4to, by Mr Gibson, p. 110.

(z) See below, note [U]; and Life, p. 29, &c.

(a) Life, &c. p. 33; and Works, p. 51.

(b) Life, p. 29.

(c) In October 1660. Publick Intelligence, 4to.

(d) Ibid. p. 34.

(e) Sir James Ware's Works, as above.

(f) Ware's Works, in the Lives of those reflective Prelates; and Life, as above, p. 35.

(g) Life, &c. as above, p. 35, 36.

Parliament-frigates, many of which were on that coast, and when they were come so near, that all hopes of being saved were taken away; on a sudden, the wind slackened into a perfect calm, and as it were flew into the sails of the little vessel, and carried her away in view (18).

[P] But he met with an unexpected diversion in his first day's journey into that kingdom. For he no sooner came into the house where he intended to refresh himself, but he was known and called by his name by the hostess. And his Lordship admiring at his being discovered, she soon revealed the secret and shewed him his own picture, and assured him there were several of them upon the road, that being known by them, he might be seized and carried to the Inquisition; and that her husband among others had power to that purpose, which he would certainly make use of, if he found him. The Bishop saw evidently he was a condemned man, being already hanged in effigy, and therefore made use of the advertisement, and escaped out of the power of that Court (19).

[Q] Archbishop of Armagh, Primate and Metropolitan of all Ireland. The author of his life observes (20), That 'no man could be more acceptable to the Clergy there, because none so fit to repair the breaches of the Church, by knowing to what part every stone and every piece of timber belonged, as this skillful Architect; who by assigning the proper place for every thing, had the satisfaction to see the building rise suddenly out of its ashes, without the noise of hammer, or any contradiction; the authority of his person and of his judgment silenced all the opposition, which one of less veneration might possibly have met with. All men's expectations were fixed on him, and many of the prime Nobility and Clergy in England, particularly the Queen of Bohemia, congratulated the Church's happiness in his promotion.

[R] And effectually obtained the point he aimed at. We have one instance of his prudence, in turning the edge of the most popular objection of that time against Conformity. When the benefices were called over at the visitation, several appeared, and exhibited only such titles as they had received from the late powers. He told them, 'they were no legal titles, but in regard he heard well of them, he was willing to make such to them by institution and induction; which they thankfully accepted of.'—But when he desired to see their letters of orders, some had no other, but their certificates of ordination by some Presbyterian classes, which, he told them, did not qualify them for any preferment in the Church. Whereupon the question arose, 'Are we not Ministers of the Gospel?' To which his Grace answered, That is not the question, at least, he desired for peace sake, that might not be the question for that time. 'I dispute not, said he, the value of your ordination, nor those acts you have exercised by virtue of it; what you are, or might be here when there was no law, or in other Churches abroad. But we are now to consider ourselves at a national Church limited by law, which among other things takes chief care to prescribe about ordination: and I do not know how you could recover the means of the Church, if any should refuse to pay you your tithes, if you are not ordained as the law of this Church requireth; and I am desirous that she may have your labours, and you such portions of her revenue, as shall be allotted you in a legal and assured way.' By this means he gained such as were learned and sober (21).

[S] Chosen Speaker of the House of Lords, in the Parliament which met at the same time. The author of his life observes (22), that it is not easy to say, which of the two places he filled best, whether the Statesman or Divine shined with greater brightness. He had a judgment so clear, and a speech so plain and persuasive, that he could readily unravel any intricacy, and divide all the parts of the controversy into their proper sides, so that the heavier scale would easily shew itself. In short, he so moderated and flated all questions that arose, that few assemblies can boast of so great an interest being disputed with so little noise (tho' there wanted not some) in those kind of arguments wherein men are not usually the most silent.

(21) Life, &c. p. 35, 36.

(22) Page 37.

books, concerning him and the Earl of Strafford, and ordered the scandalous charges against them to be torn out, which was accordingly done. In this Parliament, many advantages were procured, and more designed, for the Church, in which Archbishop Bramhall was very industrious. Several of the Bishops obtained their augmentations through his intercession; as likewise the inferior clergy the forfeited impropriate tithes; and the whole Church, all the advantageous clauses in the Acts of Settlement and Explanation. There were two bills, for the passing of which he took great pains, but was defeated in both; one was, for making the tithing-table of Ulster the rule for the whole kingdom; the other, for enabling the Bishops to make leases for sixty years (b). About this time he had a violent sickness, being the second fit of a palsy, which was very near putting an end to his life, but he recovered. Before his death, he was intent upon a royal visitation, in order to the correction of some disorders he had observed, and the better settlement of Ministers upon their cures, by a more convenient distribution or union of parishes, and the building of churches (i): but he could not put this, and some other designs he had formed in execution. A little before his death he visited his diocese, and having provided for the repair of his cathedral, and other affairs suitable to his pastoral office, he returned to Dublin about the middle of May 1663. The latter end of the month following, he was seized with the third fit of the palsy [T], which quickly put an end to his life. By his wife, mentioned above, he had four children, a son, and three daughters. The son, Sir Thomas Bramhall, Bart. married the daughter of Sir Paul Davys, Knt, Clerk of the Council, and died without issue. Of the daughters; the eldest married Sir James Graham, son to the Earl of Monteith; the second to Alderman Foxteach of Droghedah; and the third to Standish Hartstrong, Esq; Among other benefactions, the Archbishop left a legacy of five hundred pounds for the repair of the cathedral of Armagh, and St Peter's at Droghedah (k). We shall give an account of his works in the note [U]. With regard to his person and character; he was of a middle stature

(b) Ibid. p. 37, 38.

(i) Ibid. p. 39.

(k) Ibid. p. 39, 42, 43.

[T] The latter end of June, he was seized with the third fit of the palsy. He had then a trial for some part of his temporal estate, at Omagh, with Sir Audley Mervyn, depending in the Court of Claims; and there, at the time of hearing, the third fit of the palsy so smote him, that he sunk in the Court, was carried out senseless, and continued so, till death finished his work. Had the cause been unjust, as the author of his life observes (23), or adjudged against him, some censorious spirits, would not have spared to have made left-hand judgments, from the circumstances of his death; but his right so appeared on the argument, that he was a conqueror in his death, and victory and honour waited on him to the grave.

(23) Page 42.

[U] We shall give an account of his works, &c. They were most of them published at different times. But they were all reprinted at Dublin, in the year 1677, in one volume folio, under this title: 'The Works of the Most Reverend Father in God, John Bramhall, D. D. late Lord Archbishop of Armagh, Primate and Metropolitan of all Ireland. Some of which never before printed. Collected into one volume.' To which is added (for the vindication of some of his writings) an exact copy of the records, touching Archbishop Parker's consecration, taken from the original, in the registry of the See of Canterbury. As also, the copy of an old manuscript, in Corpus Christi college in Cambridge, of the same subject. This volume is divided into four tomes, or parts. Tome I. containeth the discourses against the Romanists, viz. 1. 'An Answer to M. De la Miliere his impertinent Dedication of his imaginary Triumph; [intituled The Victory of Truth] or his Epistle to the King of Great-Britain, [King Charles II.] wherein he inviteth His Majesty to forsake the Church of England, and to embrace the Roman-Catholick religion.' With the said Miliere's Epistle prefixed. This was first published at the Hague, in 1654. 12mo. but not by the author. The occasion of it was, That the Romanists endeavoured to persuade King Charles II. during his exile, to hope his restoration, by embracing their Religion: and, for that purpose, employed M. de la Miliere, Counsellor in ordinary to the King of France, to write him this epistle (24). 2. 'A just Vindication of the Church of England, from the unjust Aspersions of criminal Schism. Wherein the nature of criminal Schism, the divers sorts of Schismatics, the Liberties and Privileges of National Churches, the Rights of Sovereign Magistrates, the Tyranny, Extortion, and Schism of the Roman Court, with the Grievances, Complaints, and Opposition of all Princes and States of the Roman Communion of old, and at this very day, are manifested to the view of the World.'

(24) Life, &c. as above, p. 29, 30.

First printed at London, 1661. 8vo. In this Discourse he proves (25), That the separation from the Court of Rome was not made by Protestants, but Roman Catholics themselves. That the Britannick Churches, were ever exempted from all foreign jurisdiction for the first six hundred years; and had both sufficient authority, and sufficient grounds, to withdraw their obedience from Rome (26). 3. 'A Replique to the Bishop of Chalcedon's [Richard Smith] Survey of the Vindication of the Church of England, from criminous Schism. Clearing the English from the Aspersions of Cruelty. With an Appendix, in answer to the Exceptions of S. W.' Printed at first, with A just Vindication, &c. 4. 'Schism guarded, and beaten back upon the right Owners. Shewing, That our great Controversie about Papal Power, is not a Question of Faith, but of Interest and Profit, not with the Church of Rome, but with the Court of Rome, wherein the true Controversie doth consist, who were the first Innovators, when, and where, these Papal Innovations first began in England, with the opposition that was made against them.' This is an answer to a book intituled, Schism Dispatched, by S. W. i. e. William Serjeant. And, among other things, our author proves, That the Pope hath no legislative, nor judiciary, power in England (27). 5. 'The Consecration and Succession of Protestant Bishops justified. The Bishop of Duresme vindicated. And that infamous Fable, of the Ordination at the Nag's-head, clearly confuted.' This is an answer, to a calumny of two Jesuits, Father Talbot, and Father B——, against our author. And the Bishop of Durham here vindicated, is Bishop Morton, who was charged by the same Fathers, 'in 1640, when some Presbyterian Lords presented to the Upper House a book, proving, that the Protestant Bishops had no succession or consecration, and therefore were no Bishops—— to have made a speech against that book; and endeavoured to prove succession from the last Catholick Bishops, who, by imposition of hands, ordained the first Protestant Bishops, at the Nag's-head in Cheapside.'—In opposition to which, Bishop Morton, and such of the spiritual and temporal Lords, as were in the House in 1640, and still living in 1658, made solemn protestations (inserted in this book) 'That no such book was ever presented, nor such a speech made by Bishop Morton.'—Tome II. Against the English Sectaries; comprehends, 1. 'A Fair Warning to take heed of the Scottish Discipline, as being of all others, most injurious to the Civil Magistrate, most oppressive to the subject, most pernicious to both.' Written in the beginning of the civil wars. 2. 'The Serpent salve: or, a Remedy for the biting of an Aspe Wherein the Observator's Grounds

(25) Ch. iii.

(26) Ch. v. and vi.

(27) Sect. I. ch. 6, 7.

are

stature and active, but his mein and presence not altogether so great as his endowments of mind. His complexion highly sanguine, pretty deeply tinged with choler, which in his declining years became predominant, and would sometimes overflow, not without some tartness of expression, but it proceeded no further (l). As he was a great lover of plain-dealing, and plain-speaking (m), so his conversation was free and familiar, patient of any thing in discourse but obstinacy; his speech ready and intelligible, smooth and strong, free from affectation of phrase or phancy, saying, it was a boyish sport to hunt for words, and argued a penury of matter, which would always find expression for itself. His understanding was very good, and greatly improved by labour and study. As a scholar; his excellency lay in the rational and argumentative part of learning. He was also well acquainted with ecclesiastical and other Histories; and in the pulpit an excellent persuasive orator. He was a firm friend to the Church of England, bold in the defence of it, and patient in suffering for it. Yet he was very far from any thing like bigotry. He had a great allowance and charity for men of different persuasions, looking upon those churches as in a tottering condition that stood upon nice opinions. And accordingly, he made a distinction between articles necessary for peace and order, and those that are necessary for salvation. And he often declared, That the Church was not to be healed but by general propositions (n).

(l) Ibid. p. 43.

(m) Ibid. p. 21.

(n) Ibid. p. 43.

are discussed, &c.' written dialogue wise, and in vindication of King Charles I. wherein the author endeavours to prove, that power is not originally inherent in, and derived from, the people, &c. first printed in 1643. 3. 'Bishop Bramhall's vindication of himself, and the Episcopal Clergy, from the Presbyterian Charge of Popery, as it is managed by Mr Baxter, in his Treatise of the Grotian Religion.'—Tome III. against Mr Hobbes. 1. 'A Defence of true Liberty, from antecedent and extrinsecal Necessity. Being an answer to a late book of Mr Thomas Hobbes of Malmesbury, intitled, A Treatise of Liberty and Necessity.' First printed in 1656, 4to. 2. 'Cassifications of Mr Hobbes his last Animadversions, in the Case concerning Liberty, and universal Necessity.' First printed in 1658. 3. 'The catching of Leviathan: or, the Great Whale. Demonstrating out of Mr Hobbes his own Works, That no man who is thoroughly an Hobbit, can be a good Christian, or a good Commonwealth's man, or reconcile himself to himself. Because his Principles are not only destructive to all Religion, but to all Societies; extinguishing the relation between Prince and Subject, Parent and Child, Master and Servant, Husband and Wife; and abound with palpable contradictions'—Tome IV. contains, 1. 'The controversies about the Sabbath, and the Lord's day; with their respective obligations. Clearly, succinctly, and impartially stated, discussed, and determined.' 2. 'A Sermon preached in York-Minster, before his Excellency the Marquis of Newcastle, being then ready to meet the Scotch army, Jan. 28. 1643.' Printed first at York 1643. 3. 'A Sermon preached at Dublin, upon the twenty-third of April 1661, being the day appointed for his Majesty's coronation; with two speeches made in the House of Peers, the eleventh of May 1661, when the House of Commons presented their Speaker.' 4. 'The right way to Safety after Shipwrack: in a Sermon preached to the Honourable House of Commons, in St Patrick's Church, Dublin June 16. 1661. at their solemn receiving of the blessed Sacrament.' 5. 'A short Discourse to Sir Henry de Vic, about a passage at his table, after the christening of his daughter Anne Charlott; Of persons dying without Baptism (28).' 6. 'An Answer to two Papers brought him June the nineteenth, 1645: about the Protestants Ordination, &c.' 7. 'Protestants Ordination defended, &c. or, An Answer to the twentieth chapter of the Guide of Faith: or, The third part of the Antidote of S. N. Doctour of Divinity.'—He had likewise prepared an hundred sermons for the press, but they were torne by the rats before his death. C (28) See above, in the text of this article.

BRAY (THOMAS), Doctor of Divinity, an eminent, learned, and pious Divine of the XVIIth century, was born at Morton in Shropshire in 1656; his parents were persons of good reputation, and inhabitants of that place (a). His infancy discovering promising parts, he was early sent to the school at Oswestry in the same county. His close application to school-learning, soon qualified him for a remove, and determined his parents to dedicate him to religion and learning; accordingly, he was entered of Hart-hall in Oxford. Here he soon made a considerable proficiency in Divinity, as well as other studies necessary for the profession for which he was intended, but labouring under the common disadvantages of a narrow fortune, his circumstances not permitting a longer residence at Oxford, he left the university soon after he had commenced Bachelor of Arts (b); much about which time he entered into Holy Orders, and the first parish wherein Providence placed him to exercise his spiritual function, was near Bridgenorth in Shropshire, his native county, from which curacy he soon removed into Warwickshire, officiating as chaplain in Sir Thomas Price's family, of Park-hall, and had the donative of Lac Marfin given him by Sir Thomas, which proved a very advantageous change of situation for him, for living now in the neighbourhood of Coleshill, his exemplary behaviour, and distinguished diligence in his calling, introduced him into the acquaintance of Mr Kettlewell, Sir Charles Holt, and the Lord Simon Digby. One incident which contributed to establish his character at this juncture, was his preaching the assize sermon at Warwick, on which occasion Mr Bray, though but young, acquitted himself to the satisfaction of the whole audience, particularly the Lord Digby, who was afterwards pleased to honour him with many proofs of his friendship and esteem [A], recommending him

(a) The Life and Designs of the Rev. Mr Thomas Bray, 1746.

(b) Ibid.

[A] Recommending him to the worthy and honourable patronage of his brother the present Lord Digby.] For Mr Bray esteemed it not the least honour and happiness of his life to be preferred by such a patron as Lord Digby, who was never determined by any other consideration, in the disposal of presentations, than of chusing the most useful persons to serve in the church, and such as he was persuaded would make the discharge of their duty the ultimate end of their views; an observation not a little to Mr Bray's credit, as well as to the honour of my Lord Digby, in an age wherein most patrons are governed by party-zeal, self-interest, or the powerful solicitations of friends and relations; of this Mr Bray was so truly sensible, that he never mentioned his him to the worthy and honourable patronage of his brother the present Lord Digby, who some time after gave him the vicarage of Over-Whitacre in the same county, since augmented by his patron's uncommon generosity of endowing it with the great tythes. In the year 1690, the rectory of Sheldon being vacant by Mr Digby Bull's refusing to take the oaths at the Revolution, his Lordship presented Mr Bray to it, which preferment he held 'till about a quarter of a year before his death, when he resigned it by reason of his advanced age, and the known worth and abilities of his appointed successor (c). Dec. 12,

(c) Ibid. ut supra.

(d) A Catalogue of the Oxford Graduates in Law, Physick, Divinity, &c. in Oxford, from 1689 to 1726.

1693, he took his Master of Arts degree, in Hart-hall in the university of Oxford (d). In this parish of Sheldon he composed his Catechetical Lectures, a work which met with general approbation and encouragement [B], the publication of which, the first fruits of his piety and learning, drew him out of his rural privacy to London, and introduced him into a more conspicuous and remarkable scene of action; for the reputation Mr Bray had acquired by these Catechetical Lectures, and the other shining qualities with which he adorned his function, immediately determined Dr Compton, Bishop of London, to pitch upon him as a proper person to model the infant Church of Maryland, and establish it upon a solid foundation [C]. Accordingly, in April 1696, he proposed to Mr Bray, to go on the terms of having the judicial office of Commissary, valued, as was represented to him, at four hundred pounds per annum, conferred upon him, for his support in that service (e). Mr Bray, disregarding his own interest, and the great profit which would have arose from finishing his Course of Lectures on the plan he had formed, soon determined in his own mind, that there might be a greater field for doing good in the Plantations, than by his labours here; being always willing to be so disposed of in any station, as should appear most conducive to the service of God's Church, he no longer demurred to the proposal, than to enquire into the state of the country, and inform himself what was most wanting to excite good Ministers to embark in that design, as well as enable them most effectually to promote it. With this view he laid before the Bishops the following considerations:—That none but the poorer sort of clergy could be persuaded to leave their friends, and change their native country for one so remote.—That such persons could not be able sufficiently to supply themselves with books; that without such a competent provision of books; they could not answer the design of their mission;—that a library would be the best encouragement to studious and sober men to undertake the service; and that, as the great inducement to himself to go, would be to do the most good he could be capable of doing, he therefore proposed to their Lordships, that if they thought fit to encourage and assist him in providing parochial libraries, for the Ministers that should be sent, he would then accept of the Commissary's office in Maryland; this proposal for parochial libraries being well approved of by the Bishops, and due encouragement being promised in the prosecution of the design, both by their Lordships and others, he set himself with all possible application to provide Missionaries, and to furnish them with libraries, intending, as soon as he should have sent both, to follow after himself (f). But, upon his accepting of this employment of Commissary of Maryland, it fell to his share to solicit at home whatever other matters related to that Church, more particularly to the settlement and establishment thereof, which, with all other matters conducing to the good and welfare of the Church, he laboured to promote with unwearied diligence, and spared neither expence nor trouble. Of this the reader may find more particulars in note [D]. But, above all,

(e) The Monthly Chronicle for February, 1730.

(f) The Life of Dr Bray, &c.

his noble benefactor without the utmost gratitude for his own obligations, and profoundest veneration for all his excellent qualities. My Lord, on the other hand, shewed the great esteem he had for Mr Bray, by not only presenting him with the livings of Over-Whitacre and Sheldon, but by augmenting and endowing the first, for his sake, with the great tythes; as laudable and uncommon an example, as his disinterestedness in his presentations.

[B] His Catechetical Lectures, a work which met with general approbation and encouragement. Was so well received, and generally circulated, that three thousand proved not too great a number for the first impression. It was esteemed by many of the first distinction in the Church, as the most accurate performance extant on that subject, and was dedicated to that learned prelate William Lloyd, then Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, by whose persuasion, and even authoritative injunctions, it was published (1), and of whose favour and esteem Mr Bray had a more than ordinary share. There was soon a demand for the second impression, by both of which, at a very reasonable price, he cleared upwards of seven hundred pounds; nor had he room to doubt of a much greater advantage from the succeeding parts, so fast did the subscriptions come in for the second volume, which was in the press, but was superseded for another undertaking.

(1) His Dedication to his Catechetical Lectures, p. 1, 3. 1696.

[C] Determined the Bishop of London to pitch upon him to model, &c. In the year 1691, and 1692, the then Governor and Assembly of Maryland, divided that province into parishes, and establish'd a legal maintenance for the respective ministers. In the month of October 1695, they took into consideration, the expediency of having some one Clergyman to preside over the rest; and, in order to support some such superintendant Commissary or Suffragan, they unanimously agreed in a petitionary act to their then Majesties King William and Queen Mary, to annex for ever, the judicial office of Commissary, before in the disposal of the Governor, to that which is purely ecclesiastical, and at the appointment of the Bishop of London, to whom they wrote to desire him to send them over some unexceptionable experienced Clergyman for the intended office (2).

(2) The Life and Designs of Thomas Bray.

[D] It fell to his share to solicit, &c. It happened, that the law for the establishment of the Church of Maryland, having been sent over for the Royal Assent, was rejected on account of a clause, whereby it was enacted, that the great Charter of England should be kept and observed, in all points, within the said province; being a clause of another nature, than was set forth in the title of the said law; and the Bishop of London having obtained, at Council, that instructions should be given to have another bill formed, and passed into an act, with promise that it should be confirmed, if formed and passed according to these instructions. Mr Bray, with the advice of his Lordship, and others well skilled in plantation-affairs, got a bill drawn up according to the instructions, and transmitted it to Maryland to be re-enacted in the succeeding Assembly.

it was his greatest care, to endeavour to send over to Maryland and the other colonies, pious men of exemplary lives and conversations [E], and to furnish out those whom he had a hand in sending, with good libraries of necessary and useful books, to render them capable of answering the ends of their mission, and instructing the people in all things necessary to their salvation: and these truly found him employment enough, though, on account of the more than ordinary service such a magazine of divine knowledge might be of, he could never be brought to regret the undertaking, however chargeable as well as laborious it proved; one half of either cost or pains in which it engaged him, must have discouraged any one, less sensible to the impressions of a religious zeal, from prosecuting it. His only comfort was, that the libraries he had begun and advanced more or less in all the provinces on the Continent, and in most of the islands of America, as also in the factories in Africa, did not only serve the then Ministers with whom they were first sent, but by the care of some of the governments, and by Acts of Assembly, settling the rules he had prescribed for their use and preservation, they might be also of advantage to many succeeding generations. The sense of the clergy and inhabitants, with respect to this, was testified by the solemn letters of thanks, returned him from the Assemblies of Maryland, from the vestries of Boston and Bantrie in New-England, from Newfoundland, Rhode-Island, New-York, Philadelphia, North-Carolina, Bermudas, and by the acknowledgments of the Royal African Company, on account of those procured for their factories. About the same time it was, that the Secretary of Maryland, Sir Thomas Lawrence, with Mr Bray, waited on the then Princess of Denmark, in behalf of that province, humbly to request her gracious acceptance of the Governor's and country's dutiful respects, in having denominated the metropolis of the province, then but lately built, from her Royal Highness's name, Annapolis; and the latter being soon after favoured with a noble benefaction from the same royal hand, towards his libraries in America, he dedicated the premier library in those parts, fixed at Annapolis, and which has books of the choicest kind belonging to it, to the value of four hundred pounds, to her memory, by the title of the Annapolitan Library, which words were inscribed on the several books, as well in gratitude to her Majesty, as for the better prevention of loss or embezzlement (g). Another design was also set on foot, much about the same time, by Dr Bray, having a reference to some service at home as well as abroad, which was to raise lending libraries in every deanery [F] throughout England and Wales, out of which the neighbouring Clergy might

(g) Ibid.

In the mean time, 'till the return of the new act, from Maryland, to be confirmed by the Sovereign, he was wholly and fully employed under the Bishop of London, in enquiring out and providing Missionaries, to be sent into that Province, on a presumption, that the establishment of the Church might be, at last, obtained; and also into the other Colonies on the Continent of America, and into most of the Islands, several of which had never before enjoyed any standing ministry (3).

In the year 1696, the law for establishing and endowing the church, was re-enacted in Maryland, and came over a second time, to the Lords Commissioners of Trade, together with a most humble address to be presented to his Majesty, in behalf of the said law, requesting the royal confirmation. But it being found, that this second law also, contrary to the instructions, contained in it a clause of a different nature, by declaring all the laws in England to be in force in Maryland; it was thought advisable not to solicit the Royal Assent to it, as being sure it would be rejected, for the same reason as the former, and then the Church's maintenance would wholly drop; and, in the mean time, it being promised at Court, that the then law, such as it was, should remain unrepealed 'till another should be sent over, agreeable to the royal instructions; the Doctor (†) wrote to the Province to have it revised and re-enacted, according to the former instructions, signifying to them, that otherwise it would never pass.

[E] But above all, it was his greatest care to endeavour to send over to Maryland, and the other Colonies, pious men of exemplary lives and conversations. Of which we shall, in this note, present our reader with an instance or two. Among other Missionaries sent at this time with Libraries, Mr Bray procured, and presented to the Bishop of London, two men as pious and happy in their conduct, as could have been found; one, Mr Clayton, sent to Philadelphia in Pennsylvania; the other, Mr Marshal, sent into Charles-Town in Carolina. Neither of these worthy persons found, at their entrance, above fifty of our communion to make up their congregation, and yet both approved themselves so well to the inhabitants of their respective places, that in two years time the congregation at Philadelphia, the metropolis of the Quakers, was increased to seven hundred, and an handsome church was erected; and at Charles-Town, to near as many; where, out of respect to Mr Marshal, a new brick house for his better accommodation, a fine plantation, with a perpetual stock of two Negro-servants and two cows, with 150*l.* a year, were settled upon them, and their successors, for ever. Both these worthy persons died in about two years after their arrival, of contagious distempers, which they had taken in the execution of their duty, and in visiting the sick, leaving most amiable characters behind them. The libraries Mr Bray sent with these gentlemen, continue to their successors; and he did, at several times afterwards, procure and make considerable additions to them, as he did to most others both in America and Africa (4).

[F] To raise lending libraries in every Deanery. Dr Bray may be, perhaps, here censured for concerning himself in carrying on this affair at home, at the same time that he was engaged to promote a foreign charity. But the good man's inducement to it, as he has been heard to declare, was first, because having never, for his own part, enjoyed in the Church what would enable him to furnish himself with a sufficient stock of necessary and useful books, to qualify himself for his profession; he became, thereby, more sensible of the wants of his brethren in like circumstances. Secondly, That in his solicitation, for benefactions to libraries in the Plantations, he often met with answers to this effect: That we had poor cures, and poor parsons enough in England, and that charity began at home: Now he thought it not amiss to strike the nail that would drive, and to give such answers an opportunity of exercising their beneficence to the Church, in the way to which they were most inclined; and, therefore, without the least interruption of his endeavours for the Plantations, he set on foot this design also at home; and as those libraries were intended for the clergy to meet and confer in, rather than their private houses, which would cause expence, or public houses, which, besides the expence, might give scandal; so if the same topics were made the subject of their conversation, as had been resolved on in the first library of that kind, which was founded by a noble Lord, his neighbour and patron already mentioned, the Doctor could not imagine what could be better pursued, in order to keep the country clergy to their rule, and close to their duty, and thereby to advance their character and reputation, and to create a due veneration towards them; the resolutions they formed were these: That they will meet might borrow the books they had occasion for, and where they might consult upon matters relating to their function, and to learning. And many lending libraries were thereupon founded in several parts of the kingdom, besides above a hundred and fifty parochial ones in Great Britain and the plantations, from ten to fifty pounds value, those in South Britain being afterwards secured to posterity, by an Act of Parliament passed for that purpose in 1708 (*). Soon after, upon the repeated instances of the Governor and some of the country, Mr Bray was at the charge of taking the degree of Doctor of Divinity, which degree, though it might be of some use, with respect to his having a better respect paid to the Church as well as himself, did, however, then but ill comport with his circumstances. He took his degrees of Bachelor of Divinity, and Doctor, together, by accumulation, not of Hart-hall where he was entered, but of Magdalen-college, Dec. 17, 1696 (b), immediately following, the better to promote his main design of libraries, and to give the Missionaries directions in prosecuting their theological studies, he published two books, one intituled, Bibliotheca Parochialis [G]: or, in the library monthly, or oftener, to consider, or confer upon ways and means of augmenting the same with the best books: also to consult upon the best methods of furnishing the common people with small practical and devotional tracts; of principing the children and youth with catechetical instructions; for erecting schools for the education of poor children; of getting the laws put in execution against profaneness and immorality; and by what other means they can best discharge their pastoral care and duty, and promote public good: And, in order to their better knowledge of the duties of their function, and forming no other resolutions but what shall be agreeable to the constitution of our Church, that at every meeting they will read over some part, and that successively, 'till they shall go thro' the whole, of their ordination vows, of the articles, rubrics, and canons of the Church, of the royal injunctions and proclamations, and acts of Parliament, ordered to be read in churches, those especially against profaneness and immorality; and, lastly, the articles of enquiry exhibited at both episcopal and archidiaconal visitations, and that as well to furnish themselves with proper and suitable matter for their conversation there, instead of news and other impertinences, as the better to know their duty, and take the best measures about it.

(4) Life, &c. of Tho. Bray, D.D.

3. The Life of Desjens of Thomas Bray, D.D.

† Mr Bray had then taken his Doctor's degree.

(*) See note [F], and the Monthly Chron. for Feb. 1730, Vol. III. P. 33.

(b) A Catalogue of the Oxford Graduates, in Law, Physick, Divinity, &c. in Oxford, from 1659 to 1726, &c.

Now, had Dr Bray had nothing farther in view in his essay, to promote necessary and useful knowledge, at home as well as abroad, than to represent the miserable want of books among the parochial Clergy throughout the kingdom, the ill consequences of such want both to themselves and people, and the easiest method to supply it by means of lending libraries, one, at least, in every Deanery, which, if placed in some market-town nearest the centre, the neighbouring Clergy, and others might, without farther trouble than the sending on a market-day, by their own, or a neighbour's servant, borrow at any time, the book they wanted. This alone considered, it seems to be a most laudable design; and the success it has met with is such, that there are not many dioceses in the kingdom, where libraries of this kind are not more or less advanced.

But, in truth, he had something farther in view, than his design of having publick libraries for the parochial Clergy in every Deanery; which was to reduce into practice, and to restore more and more by degrees, the ancient use of rural Deans, and the jurisdiction pertaining to their respective Deaneries, whereby, as an excellent discipline was formerly maintained in our Church, so it might be again, in a good measure, revived.

And, indeed, whoever shall consider the antient constitution of our rural Deaneries, as represented in an extract the Doctor has made from some of our Antiquaries, and how admirably they were fitted for good discipline, and shall compare that with what is already found practicable in the Clergy's meeting at their libraries, spoke of above, he will be apt to conclude, that as her antient discipline is the Church of England's wish, and desire of all good people; so no means seem more likely to restore it, than the having libraries in our several rural Deaneries for the Clergy to meet in, where they may act to such purposes, and according to such powers, as shall be allowed them.

The Doctor observing also, that the Missionaries were often detained several weeks, and sometimes months, in our sea-ports, before they could go off; more especially in time of war, when not only the want of wind, but of convoys, occasioned such stay; and reflecting upon it, as of consequence to them, to have a library in each of the sea-ports, where they usually embark, in which they might study during their stay on shore; and this not only that they might lose no time towards their better improvement, but to prevent also the expence and scandal to which they might be exposed, by sauntering away their time in coffee-houses, or, perhaps, less sober places: But could they have a library in each of those ports, to be in all the time they could spare from their meals, and where they might recreate themselves, after hard study, with the conversation of their brethren, whether Fellow-Missionaries, Sea-Chaplains, or other ingenious passengers or persons; and were the use of those libraries strictly enjoined them at their departure, he presumed, scarcely any thing could contribute more to the advantage, and reputation of our Missions and Missionaries, the ports being generally very loose places, and dangerous for young men to abide in long, and where, without employment, and suitable retirement, they will be much exposed to such temptations as will stain their characters; upon which consideration, and presuming withal, that if the foundation of such sea-port libraries were once laid but by a few books, it would be no great difficulty to obtain such considerable additions from the benefactions of sea officers, who are usually generous enough, as well as from other gentlemen; if the Clergy in such places would be zealous and active in promoting the design, he formed proper proposals for the raising such libraries, obtained some benefactions towards making a beginning, and took with him some books to deposit for that purpose, in each port that should happen in his way; and being detained in three several places in his voyage to Maryland, experienced himself the first use of those libraries he had before projected; he accordingly put the design in execution in each of them, viz. at Gravesend, Deal, and Plymouth. He also made a beginning towards establishing parochial catechetical libraries in the Isle of Man.

And now we are upon this head of libraries, we shall consider how far he was also the instrument of establishing them in several of the meaner cures in England and Wales.

In 1703, Dr Bray published an Essay, to shew the incompetent provision in many parishes, thro' a greater part of the kingdom, to enable the Clergy to instruct the people; upon which this excellent work of founding libraries, begun by him, was countenanced, and brought to perfection, by the patronage of the Legislature; for an act of Parliament passed in the seventh year of Queen Anne, intituled, An Act for the better preservation of parochial libraries in that part of Great-Britain called England (5). Sir Peter King, afterwards Lord Chancellor, was the gentleman who brought the bill into the house, one equally distinguished by his knowledge in Christianity, and zeal for it.

[G] Bibliotheca parochialis.] This book being a judicious performance, and of great use, especially to the Clergy, has been much bought up; and notwithstanding there was a second edition of it in 1707, is at present a little hard to be met with. One of his chief designs in this work, as well as a sort of common-place book for the use of the Clergy and others, was in order, as we hinted in the text, to promote the forming and erecting of libraries of three sorts, or degrees, both at home and abroad, viz. general, decanal or lending,

(5) The Life, &c. of Dr Bray.

A Scheme of such Theological and other Heads, as seem requisite to be perused, or occasionally consulted by the Rev. Clergy, together with a Catalogue of Books, which may be profitably read on each of those Points, &c. (i). The other, Apostolick Charity, it's Nature and Excellency considered, in a Discourse upon Daniel xii. 3. preached at St Paul's, at the Ordination of some Protestant Missionaries to be sent into the Plantations. To which is prefixed, A General View of the English Colonies in America, in order to shew what provision is wanting for the Propagation of Christianity in those Parts, together with Proposals for the promoting the same, and to induce such of the Clergy of this Kingdom, as are Persons of Sobriety and Abilities, to accept of a Mission (k). During this interval, viz. in the year 1697, a bill being brought into the House of Commons to alienate lands given to superstitious uses, and to vest them in Greenwich Hospital, he preferred a petition to the House, that some share thereof might be appropriated, for the propagation of the true religion in the Plantations, and that the same should be vested in a body politick, to be erected for that purpose, which petition was received very well in the house, and a fourth part of all that should be discovered, after one moiety to the discoverer, was readily and unanimously allotted by the Committee for that use, it being thought by far more reasonable, to appropriate some part, at least, of what was given to superstitious uses, to uses truly pious, than altogether to other, though charitable, purposes: but the bill was never suffered to be reported. In the year 1698, failing of a publick and settled provision by law, for carrying on the service of the Church in Maryland, and the other plantations, he addressed his Majesty for a grant of some arrears of taxes due to the Crown, and some time after, was obliged to be at the charge and trouble of going over to the King in Holland, to have the grant completed. The recovery of these arrears of taxes, was represented as very feasible and very valuable, and also without any grievance to the subject; but as they proved troublesome to be recovered, so scarce of any value (l). All designs failing of getting a publick fund for the propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts, he thereupon formed a design, whereof he then drew the plan, of having a Protestant congregation, pro fide propaganda, by charter from the King. But things did not seem ripe enough to encourage him to proceed at that time in the attempt, and so he laid it aside 'till a more favourable opportunity. However, to prepare the way for such charter-society, he soon after made it his endeavours, to find worthy persons ready to form a voluntary society, both to carry on the service already begun for the Plantations, and to propagate Christian knowledge as well at home as abroad, hoping afterwards to get such a society incorporated (†). This he laid before the Bishop of London, in the year 1697, and a Society was constituted on this plan, and

(i) Bray's Bibliotheca Parochialis, title-page, 1707.

(k) The Life and Designs of Dr Tho. Bray, p. 16.

(l) Ibid. p. 17, 18.

(†) Monthly Chronicle for Feb, 1730, p. 33.

See more about his Libraries under note [F].

Bray's Bibliotheca Parochialis, title-page.

Bibliotheca Parochialis, Advertisement to the reader.

Bibliotheca Parochialis, chap. viii.

and parochial libraries (7). How far this design had been already advanced, and how practicable it was to bring it to perfection, was intended to have been added to it in a prefatory account (8), setting forth also the history, nature, and use of libraries; but these articles making a good many sheets, were too much to be added to the second edition of this first volume, as it was already swelled, by great additions, to a very large octavo; and as the nature and design of this book had already, in a good measure, been understood and explained, by means of the introduction prefixed to the first edition; they were therefore deferred 'till the publication, and to be prefixed to the second volume, which he tells us (9), was, in a manner, ready for the press; however, we do not find he ever published it, tho' he has given us twenty pages, in an analytical table, of all the heads, both general and particular, or a complete view of the contents of it, which are the several species, or sorts, of history, viz. Civil, Ecclesiastical, Literary, Personal or Biography; Topographical, secret, fabulous, various, and miscellaneous History appendent to each, taking in, as preparative, Geography, Voyages, Travels, and Chronology (10). Having mentioned Biography here, it cannot be thought improper, in a work of this nature, to quote a passage from him, in which he gives us his sentiments of it with respect to religion.

It will be generally agreed by all who are conversant in books, that there is no part of history more useful and entertaining than Biography; or, the lives of persons eminent in any way or profession: But it is certain, when the lives of persons of any rank or station, either in Church or State; or, indeed, those of inferior condition, who have been illustrious for their uncommon virtue, and more exalted piety; come to be drawn out by a skilful hand, wherein their conflicts with an evil world, their triumphs over the various and mighty temptations of it, and their conduct thro' all the difficulties of their station in it; when these come to be advantageously set forth, and proposed for imitation, they will unquestionably afford great light in steering the course of our own lives; they must kindle noble desires in us to a virtuous emulation, and yield us a powerful support under our sorest trials, by letting us see, that when we are oppressed with sufferings, and crossed in the worthiest undertakings, we are not yet the most forlorn and forsaken men, since others, who have gone before us, have sustained a like trial of afflictions. And, lastly, these furnish a noble apology for the Christian religion against our modern libertines; since the greatest difficulties, they upbraid it withal, do appear, from those examples, to have been surmounted; and the severest rules of piety are thereby demonstrated to be not only practicable, but pleasant. Nay, they will teach us, with St Paul, to rejoice in sufferings, thro' which our blessed Lord himself was made perfect (11).

But to return. It seems a matter of no small surprize, that this second volume was never published, as he tells us the first edition of the first volume had found so kind a Reception from the public, as to occasion the second impression to be very much desired and enquired for (12). And what he has published at the end of this analytical table, looks as if he had had still further designs than a second volume. It runs thus:

Part II.
Or, Bibliotheca Parochialis Concionatoria.
Vol. I.

will be the scheme of a library properly parochial; wherein will be exhibited, a view of such theological heads, as seem more peculiarly requisite to be well studied by every pastor of a parish: Together with a catalogue of books, which will be read upon each of those points.

Vol. II.
will be a scheme of concionatory Divinity: Or, a series of all the points in Theology both doctrinal and moral, necessary to be preached upon: And those digested withal in such order, as they do naturally lie: Together with the most considerable tracts and discourses, both ancient and modern; and the most valuable sermons which have been written upon the same (13).

(11) Bibliotheca Paroch. p. 28, 29.

(12) Ibid. The end of the Advertisement to the reader.

(13) Ibid. The last page of the Analytical Table of the second Volume.

[H] Dr

and though the design of having them incorporated by charter, could not then be brought to bear, yet they still subsisted and acted as a voluntary society; but their number and benefactions at last increasing, a different constitution, and more extensive powers, appeared necessary, for the success of the undertaking: application was therefore made by Dr Bray, to his then Majesty King William, for his royal charter. The Doctor's petition to his Majesty, with other papers relating to the corporation to be erected for the propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts, was read May 5, 1701, and his Majesty's letters patent, under the great-seal of England, for erecting a corporation, by the name of The Society for the propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts, was laid before the Society, and read the ninth of June following (m). See Dr Bray's petition, and more of this, below in note [H]. He received no advantage all this time from his Commissary's place in Maryland, neither was any allowance made him at home, or preferment given him, to support the charge of living altogether in town, to solicit the establishment and endowment of the Church of Maryland, and to provide Missionaries for that, and all the colonies on the Continent; which, except Virginia, lay upon him; all the benefactions that were received being to be laid out to raise them libraries, which also he did faster than money came in to answer the charge, which some of his friends observing, persuaded him to lay his design of going abroad aside, and take two good preferments that were then offered him at home, of as good or better value than what was proposed to him in Maryland, viz. that of Sub-Almoner, and the donative of Aldgate in the City of London. But he declined all others that were inconsistent with his going to Maryland, as soon as it should become proper for him to take that voyage. By the year 1699, having waited upwards of two years for the return of the Act of Religion from Maryland, with such amendments as would render it without exception at the Court of England (n); and it being presumed by his superiors, that it would be requisite the Doctor should now hasten over, as well to encourage the passing of that Act in their Assemblies, as to promote other matters for the service of religion there, it was signified to him from them, that they would have him take the opportunity of the first ship: and indeed, the Doctor having, by this time, tried all ways he could think of, and done all he was able to do here, to serve those parts, and according to proposal having provided Maryland, as also many other colonies, with a competent

(m) The Minutes of the Society before, and at the time of the incorporation.

(n) See note [C].

[H] Dr Bray's petition to his Majesty, and other things, relating to the Society for propagating the Gospel.

To the King's most excellent Majesty, the humble petition of THOMAS BRAY, D.D.

Humbly sheweth,

THAT the number of the inhabitants of your Majesty's Provinces in America, have, of late years, greatly increased; that in many of the Colonies thereof, more especially on the Continent, they are in much want of instruction in the Christian Religion, and in some of them, utterly destitute of the same, they not being able, of themselves, to raise a sufficient maintenance for an orthodox Clergyman to live amongst them, and to make such other provision, as shall be necessary for the propagation of the Gospel in those parts.

Your petitioner farther sheweth, that upon his late arrival in England from thence, and his making known the aforesaid matters in this city and kingdom, he hath great reason to believe, that many persons would contribute as well by legacy, as gift, if there were any BODY CORPORATE, and of perpetual succession, now in being, and established in this kingdom, proper for the lodging of the said legacies and grants therein.

Now so far as your Majesty hath already been graciously pleased, to take the state of the souls of your Majesty's subjects in those parts, so far into consideration, as to found and endow a royal college in Virginia for the religious education of their youth; your petitioner is thereby the more encouraged to hope your Majesty will also favour any like designs and ends, which shall be prosecuted by proper and effectual methods.

Your petitioner, therefore, who has lately been among your Majesty's subjects aforesaid, and has seen their wants, and knows their desires, is the more emboldened, humbly to request, that your Majesty would be graciously pleased to issue letters patent, to such persons as your Majesty shall think fit, thereby constituting them a BODY POLITICK and CORPORATE, and to grant them, and their successors, such powers, privileges, and immunities, as your Majesty, in your great wisdom, shall think meet and necessary for effecting the aforesaid ends and designs, and your petitioner shall ever pray,

THOMAS BRAY.

Whitehall, April 7th, 1701.

His Majesty having been moved upon this petition, is graciously pleased to refer the same to Mr Attorney, or Mr Solicitor General, to consider thereof, and report his opinion, what his Majesty may fitly do therein; whereupon his Majesty will declare his further pleasure.

J. A. VERNON.

The gentlemen who composed that venerable body, were so sensible how much was owing to the zeal and solicitations of the Doctor, that it was resolved, that thanks should be returned him, for his great care and pains in procuring the grant of the said letters. If this Society is now enabled, by a revenue arising from occasional benefactions, and settled endowments, to support a number of Missionaries, School-masters, and Catechists, for the propagation of Christianity in foreign parts, the zealous labours of Dr Bray must be remembered with gratitude and honour, to which it owes its establishment. One pamphlet has done him justice in the account of the origin of the incorporated Society, remarking, that it took its rise from the indefatigable endeavours of a reverend Clergyman now living (Dr Bray), to promote Christian knowledge in our foreign Plantations (14). These gentlemen have since increased to a considerable body, and no small good has been done, as they assisted him in sending libraries abroad; and as they have dispersed numbers of excellent books among our fleets and armies, raised charity-schools in and about the city, and promoted the same, by their correspondence, in several parts of the kingdom; several thousand Pfalters, ten thousand New Testaments, with great numbers of Catechisms, short histories of the Bible, and most sort of godly and religious books have been printed by it for the use of the eastern Churches; several of these have been sent over, and gratefully received, and this kingdom hath thereby had an opportunity of restoring, in some measure, the light of the Gospel, both in Syria, Arabia, and Egypt, and also in those countries from whence we first received it.

(14) A Letter from a residing Member of the Society of London for promoting Christian Knowledge, to a Corresponding Member in the country.

[I] But

competent number of Missionaries, and furnished them with good libraries, to be fixed in the places where they were sent, to remain there for ever; he was himself eager to follow, and did accordingly, even in the winter, though he had no allowance made him towards his charge of the voyage, and the service he was to do, but forced to dispose of his own small effects, and raise money on credit to support him (o). With this poor encouragement, and thus, on his own provision, he took the voyage, December 16, 1699, and set sail from the Downs the twentieth of the same month, but was drove back into Plymouth-sound on Christmas-eve, and remained in harbour almost all the holidays, where his time was not unusefully spent, in the recovery of a tolerable library there out of dust and rubbish, which was also indebted to him for a benefaction of books, and where he left a proposal for taking in subscriptions to make it a sea-port library, for the use of Missionaries and Sea-Chaplains, as well as others. After an extream tedious and dangerous passage, the Doctor arrived at Maryland the twelfth of March, where not being so much concerned at his own, as the Church's, unsettlement, he applied himself immediately and wholly, to repair the breach made in the settlement of the parochial clergy; in order to which he consulted, in the first place, the Governor, whom he found ready to concur in all proper methods for the re-establishment of their maintenance. The next Assembly, which was to be in May following, he sent to all the clergy on the western shore, who only could come together in that season, to be acquainted from them with the disposition of the people, and their sentiments on this occasion, and to advise with them what was proper to be done, in order to dispose the members of the Assembly, to re-enact their law next meeting. Soon after he had dismissed the clergy, he made his parochial visitation, as far as it was possible for him at that season, in which he met with very singular respect from persons of the best condition in the country, which the Doctor, by a happy conduct (of which he only was not sensible) turned to the advantage of that poor Church. During the sessions of the Assembly, and whilst the re-establishment of the Church was depending, he preached very proper and seasonable sermons, and all of them with a tendency to incline the country to the establishment of the Church and clergy; all which were so well received, that he had the thanks of the Assembly, by messages from the House, for them, and for the service done to that Church and province (p). The Doctor was providentially on such good terms with the Assembly, that they ordered the Attorney-General to advise with him in drawing up the bill; and that he himself might be the better advised in that case, he sent for the most experienced clergy within reach, to suggest to him, what, upon their own and their brethrens experience, they found would be of advantage to them and the Church, to be inserted in, or left out of it; by which means the constitution of that Church has much the advantage of any in America. It may not be amiss to observe in this place, that as well during the General Court or Assize, which preceded the Assembly and lasted thirteen days, as during the sessions of the Assembly itself, he was under a necessity of much civil, but chargeable, entertainment of the gentlemen of the province, who universally visited him; a charge, however, which he thought requisite as circumstances then were, that he might strengthen his interest in them, the better to promote the establishment of the clergy's maintenance. The bill being prepared, passed with a nemine contradicente, but it was on all hands declared and confessed, that it was very providential that Dr Bray came into the country at that juncture [I]. Soon after the Assembly was up, the Commissary cited the whole clergy of the province to a general Visitation at Annapolis, to be held May 22, 1700: at the close of this visitation, the clergy taking into consideration, that the violent opposition of the Quakers against the establishment of that Church, would in all probability continue, so as to get the law for it's establishment so lately re-enacted, annulled again at home; they entered into debates, whether it would not be of consequence to the preservation and final settlement of that Church, that the Doctor should be requested to go home with the law, and to solicit the Royal Assent (q). It had been before voted, at the passing the bill in the House of Burgesses, that he should be desired to request his Grace of Canterbury, and the Bishop of London, to favour that good law, by obtaining his Majesty's royal assent to it with all convenient speed, and the members who gave him an account of passing their vote, told him withal, that it was the general opinion

(o) Life of Dr Bray, p. 26.

(p) Ibid. p. 29.

(q) See the Acts of the Visitation of Maryland.

[I] But it was on all hands confessed and declared, that it was very providential that Dr BRAY came into the country at that juncture.] For it was looked upon as a difficult attempt, to have that law re-enacted, after two repulses at home; it being contrary to the instructions given with all Governors, that when a law has been reversed at home, a bill of the same nature should be again passed in any of their Assemblies; and considering also the interests of the people to be raised of the forty per poll, and the bad humour the country was brought into by insinuations of the Quakers and Papists, and the discouragement those who were well affected to the Church, met with, in having their laudable endeavours, for it's establishment and support, so often repulsed; all these things considered, it was often universally owned, that had not the Doctor come in when he did, the establishment would scarcely have been so much as attempted, much less have succeeded. It was undoubtedly designed by the Quakers, to put the greatest slur upon this new Church, and totally to discourage any farther strugglings to preserve it from falling, that they contrived not only to have the Law for it's establishment annulled, just before the Commissary's going for Maryland, but that they sent a Quaker with the order of Council in the very ship with him; which, however, rather contributed to it's establishment; for the influence of the Quakers in that contrivance, raised a great indignation in the friends to that settlement, and the Doctor's presence not a little animating them to attempt it's restoration anew.

opinion of the House, that he could be most serviceable therein by waiting personally on their Lordships, rather than by letters, in which he could not crowd all that might be necessary to be represented concerning the then state of the Church, and the necessity, at that time, of their utmost patronage; and it was in debate, Whether this should not be the desire of the Assembly? but it was thought too unreasonable a request from them, who were sensible of the great danger and fatigue he had already been at in the service of that province, as they had a few days before acknowledged by a message of thanks from that House (r). Such were the sentiments of the members of the Assembly, as to the necessity of his coming home to solicit the establishment of that Church; and the clergy meeting at their Visitation, some weeks after, as they had time to know more fully the sense of the province upon it; so they represented it to him, as the earnest desire of the more sensible persons throughout the country, as well as of the Assembly-men, that he should go over with the law for England; being aware that the Quakers would this time openly, and the Papists covertly, make the utmost efforts against the establishment of that Church, by false representations at home, of the numbers and riches of their party, and by insinuating, that to impose upon them an established maintenance for the clergy, would be prejudicial to the interest of the province, by obliging so many wealthy traders to remove from thence, the falsity of which, or any other suggestions, they thought him best able to make appear, by the information he had gained from this Visitation. There were also many other advantages to the Church in those parts, which they proposed by his coming home at that time, which were urged as reasons for it (s), upon the consideration of all which, though there was no provision could be made there to support him in that charge, and the Commissary's office would also yield him no profit, it not being tenable by the law of the country but by one residing in it, yet upon the consideration of much publick good, he determined himself, and took his voyage soon after. He was no sooner arrived in England, but he found their apprehensions in Maryland not ill grounded, for the Quakers forthwith bestirred themselves so exceedingly, that it was amazing to see what prejudices they had quickly raised in those who had then the cognizance of plantation affairs, and what false and formidable computations they gave in of the clergy's charge to the country; which false suggestions, when they were found to stick even with some that seemed well-affected to that Church, Dr Bray refuted, by a printed memorial, representing truly the state of the Church of Maryland, to the full satisfaction of all to whom it was communicated. Happy was the province of Maryland in having it's concerns managed, at this critical juncture, by such an able and indefatigable agent [K]. The Quakers opposition to the establishment now depending, was carried by united councils and contributions, but the Doctor refuted their specious objections by unanswerable reasons, and placed the affair in such an advantageous light, that his Majesty decided, without any appearance of hesitation, in the Church's favour, and gave the royal assent in these remarkable words: Have the Quakers the benefit of a toleration? let the Established Church have an established maintenance. This chargeable and laborious undertaking having swallowed up the Doctor's own small fortune. Lord Weymouth generously presented him with a bill of 300*l.* for his own private use, a large portion of which the Doctor devoted to the advancement of his farther designs. Though he was vested with the character of Commissary, yet no share of the revenue proposed was annexed to it; and this disappointment, though injurious in the highest degree, was not made by him either matter of complaint there, or of remonstrance here; nay, his generosity even induced him to throw in two sums of fifty pounds each, that were presented to himself in Maryland, towards defraying the charges of their libraries and law. But his generosity and indefatigable endeavours to promote the interest of the Church, together with the success which attended all his measures, for completing and perfecting the polity and establishment of it, would swell this account too much, for which reason we shall refer the reader to the places where he may find those heads treated of more at large (t). After the return of Dr Bray from thence in 1701, he published his circular Letters to the clergy of Maryland, a memorial, representing the present state of religion on the Continent of North America, and the Acts of his Visitation held at Annapolis; for which he had the thanks of the Society abovementioned: not only the Bishop of London approved entirely of all these transactions, but also the Archbishop of Canterbury declared, that he was well satisfied with the reasons of Dr Bray's return from the West-Indies, and added, that his mission thither will be of the greatest

(r) The Life and Designs of Dr Bray, &c. p. 34

(s) See the Acts of the Visitation.

(t) See the several Orders of Council, and Dr Bray's own Letters to the Governor, Speaker, and Attorney-General of Maryland.

[K] Happy was the province of Maryland in having it's concerns managed, at this juncture, by such an able and indefatigable agent. And, indeed, considering the opposition which was made to the law, when it came home, the Doctor's presence seemed to be as seasonable here, as it had been before thought in getting it re-enacted in Maryland; for no sooner was the occasion understood (and it did quickly spread abroad of itself, without the printed account he gave of it) but it created such censures against those, who appeared no well-wishers to that settlement, as, perhaps, were none of the least occasions that it fared not again as formerly it had done.

But tho' the law, with much sollicitation and struggling, was preserved from being totally disannulled, yet many of the exceptions, which the Quakers made against it, sticking with the Lords of Trade, all that could be obtained was, that Dr Bray might, with advice of Counsel, draw up another Bill, according to the instructions of that Board, and sending that bill to Maryland, to be passed into a law; had the promise that his Majesty, upon it's return, would confirm it here. In the drawing up of this bill, he was at great charge with Counsel; and after it had been thrice attended at the Plantation-Board, it was at last approved (15).

(15) The Life and Designs of Dr Bray, p. 35, 36.

greatest consequence imaginable to the establishment of religion in those parts. In 1706, he had the donative of St Botolph without Aldgate offered him again, which he then accepted of, worth about 150 pounds per annum by surplice fees and voluntary subscriptions (t), only eight pounds per annum being allowed by the impropiator (u). In the year 1712, the Doctor printed his Martyrology: or, Papal Usurpation, in folio; that nothing might be wanting to enrich and adorn the work, he established a correspondence with learned foreigners of the first distinction, and called in the assistance of the most eminent hands. This work consists of some choice and learned treatises of celebrated authors, which were grown very scarce, ranged and digested into as regular an History as the nature of the subject would admit. He proposed to compile a second volume, and had, at no small expence and pains, furnished himself with materials for it, but he was afterwards obliged to lay the prosecution of his design aside, and bequeathed by Will his valuable collection of Martyrological Memoirs, both printed and manuscript, to Sion-college. He was, indeed, so great a master of the History of Popery, that few authors could be presumed able, with equal accuracy and learning, to trace the origin and growth of those exorbitant claims, which are made by the See of Rome. He was happily formed by nature both for the active and for the retired life. Charity to the souls of other men, was wrought up to the highest pitch in his own; every reflection on the dark and forlorn condition of the Indians and Negroes, excited in his bosom the most generous emotions of pity and concern. He conceived nothing so desirable, as to be the instrument of recovering those lost sheep, and bringing them into the fold of their heavenly pastor. His voyage to Holland, to solicit King William's protection and encouragement to his good designs, and the proofs he gave of a publick spirit and disinterested zeal, in such a series of generous undertakings, obtained him the esteem of M. d'Allone of the Hague, a gentleman not more celebrated for his penetration and address in state-affairs, than for a pious disposition of mind. An epistolary correspondence commenced very early between him and the Doctor upon this subject, the result whereof was, that he gave in his life-time, a sum to be applied to the conversion of negroes, desiring withal, the Doctor to accept the management and disposal of it. But that a standing provision might be made for this purpose, M. d'Allone bequeathed by Will a certain sum, viz. 900 pounds, out of his English estate, to Dr Bray and his associates, towards erecting a capital fund or stock, for converting the Negroes in the British plantations: this was in the year 1723, much about which time Dr Bray had an extreme dangerous fit of illness, so that his life and recovery was despaired of. See more about this legacy, and the disposal of it in note [L]. In the year 1726, he was employed in composing and printing his Directorium Missionarium, his Primordia Bibliothecaria, and some other tracts of the like kind. About this time he also wrote a short account of Mr Rawlet, the author of the Christian Monitor; and reprinted the Life of Mr Gilpin; some of these were calculated for the use of the mission, and in one he has endeavoured to shew, that civilizing the Indians must be the first step, in any successful attempt for their conversion. In his Primordia Bibliothecaria, we have several schemes of parochial libraries, and a method laid down to proceed by a gradual progression from strength to strength, from a collection not much exceeding one pound in value, to one of a hundred. His attention to other good works, occasioned no discontinuance of this design, whose success was so much the object of his desires; and accordingly benefactions came in so fast, that he had business enough upon his hands to form the libraries desired, and to discharge himself of them. As the furnishing the parochial clergy with the means of instruction, would be an effectual method to promote Christian knowledge; so another expedient, manifestly subservient to the same end would be, he thought, to imprint on the minds of those who are designed for the Ministry, previously

(t) See Newcourt's Repertorium Ecclesiasticum Parochiale Londinens. Vol. I. p. 307, 308.

(u) Newcourt, ut supra. Monthly Chronicle for Febr. 1730, Vol. III. p. 32.

[L] M. d'Allone bequeathed by Will a certain sum, viz. 900 l. to Dr Bray and his associates, &c.] The Doctor finding, by the words of Mr d'Allone's will, as well as by his letters in his life-time, that he depended much upon him to form and model the design; that he might not be wanting to give the best assistance he could to a work so truly Christian, immediately applied himself to form a scheme for the most effectual proceeding in this affair, though the legacy could not soon be paid in, yet, in assurance of it's certainty being intrusted to a person so truly honourable as Lord Palmerston, he endeavoured, as occasion offered, to set it a-going: this he did, by founding the inclinations of some Missionaries, sent to him by the Bishop of London, whether they would engage in the measures proposed for the instruction of the Negroes, which they should find in their several cures? Those whom he observed well disposed to it, he furnished with books, as necessary helps to them and their successors, in discharging that part of their office; and as a further encouragement, he furnished them with other small pieces, more immediately proper for the instruction of the Negroes. When the legacy was paid, the early issues from it, being too inconsiderable to begin the work in such a manner as might assure himself, and his associates, the desired event, there was an apparent necessity either of breaking in upon the capital, or of furnishing books on it's credit, the Doctor being desirous, that the legacy might be handed down to his successors in the trust without any defalcation, chose to make up the deficiencies at his own expence, and charge what was expended in those provisions on the fund. He did not propose to receive any interest for his money; and at his death, obliged his Executrix to submit to the disadvantage of a gradual reimbursement. The better to prepare those young Divines that came to him, who had not read much for the work, he lent them such books as he thought proper to employ their studies whilst they should remain in London, and put them upon a catechetical exercise on Sunday evenings in his own parish of St Botolph's without Aldgate. Indeed he conceived it would be of singular use to have such Missionaries under a probation here, before sent abroad; and for this end founded a probationary Library, that, during the time of their probation, they might read over a whole course of Divinity, whereby they would be rendered more fit to teach, and give some specimens of their preaching abilities (16).

(16) Life of Dr Bray, p. 45, 46.

[M] He

previously to their admission, a just sense of it's various duties, and their great importance : with a view to this, he reprinted the Ecclesiastes of Erasmus [M], a name of great authority in the Republick of Letters, and to whom the re-establishment of polite literature was principally owing. In the year 1727, an acquaintance of Dr Bray's made a casual visit to Whitechapel-prison, and his representation of the miserable state of the prisoners, had such an effect on the Doctor, that he immediately applied himself to solicit benefactions in order to relieve them, and he had soon contributions sufficient to provide a quantity of bread, beef, and broth, on Sundays, and now and then on the intermediate days, for this prison and the Borough-counter (w). To temporal, he always subjoined spiritual, provisions; and to enure them to the most distasteful part of their office, the intended Missionaries were here employed in reading and preaching. On this occasion the fore was first opened, and that scene of inhumanity imperfectly discovered, which afterwards, some worthy patriots of the House of Commons took so much pains to enquire into and redress: that zeal and compassion which led them to carry on this inspection, and regulate many gross abuses, could not but procure them the esteem of one distinguished by such an extensive benevolence as Dr Bray. The divine guardianship apparently accompanied both his designs, of founding libraries and converting Negroes. The former, particularly, was advanced under the patronage of persons in the highest stations; but being now far advanced in years, and continually reminded of his approaching change, by the imbecility and decays of old age, he was desirous of enlarging the number of his associates, and adding such to them, in whose zeal and integrity he might repose an entire confidence. His enquiry into the state of the goals, made him acquainted with Mr (now General) Oglethorpe, who accepted the trust himself, and engaged several others, some of the first rank and distinction, to act with him and the former associates [N]. To these two designs of founding libraries, and instructing Negroes, a third was now added, which, though at first view it appears to be of different nature, has a perfect coincidence with them; the miserable condition of multitudes for want of employment, has of late excited the highest degree of compassion in the breasts of all charitable persons: the provision which the legislature has made, by a late Act, for the erecting parish work-houses, proves insufficient; and therefore, out of the same charitable regard to mankind, a design was formed of establishing a colony in America, than which, nothing can be better entitled to consideration and encouragement (x). The advantages which will accrue to the publick from such a settlement, is a subject of too large extent to be considered here. In short, most of the religious societies and good designs in London, owe grateful acknowledgment to his memory, and are, in a great measure, formed on the plans he projected; particularly the Society for the Reformation of Manners, Charity-schools, and the Society for the relief of poor profelytes, &c. The Doctor having thus happily lodged his principal designs in the hands of able managers, and being on the verge of the grave, could not but review his undertakings with complacency, and thank the good providence of God, which appeared to lay such trains for their advancement. His conscience crowned him with a secret applause, which was an inexhaustible source of comfortable reflections, and joyful prefaces, in his last minutes, which happened on the fifteenth of February, 1730, in the seventy-third year of his age (y), leaving issue (as we presume) only one daughter (z).

(w) The Life of Dr Bray, ut supra. p. 8. Monthly Chron. ut supra.

(x) Life of Dr Bray, p. 54.

(y) Monthly Chronicle for Feb. 1730, Vol. III. p. 32.

(z) See the Dedication of the Pamphlet intitled, Publick Spirit illustrated in the Life and Designs of the rev. Tho. Bray, D. D. to Mrs Marten.

[M] He reprinted the ECCLESIASTES of ERASMUS.] This treatise was written at the desire of a Bishop of the Romish Church; and it is well worthy our observation, with how much energy the learned author employs all his arguments that he could think proper to excite a conscientious regard to the weight of the ministerial office, and a becoming diligence in the discharge of it. As excellent as this performance is, it lay before mixed and undistinguished in his voluminous works, and could rarely fall into the hands of any, except those few who have access to publick libraries; so that a distinct impression of it is what the Doctor might justly intend, as a common benefit to the greater part of his order. Take his own opinion of the book, and his view in reprinting it, in his own words: 'Whenever I take into my hands this invaluable piece of Erasmus his Ecclesiastes, methinks I experience what has been often said by others, with respect to that of Thomas à Kempis de Imitatione Christi, namely, that let a man read him never so often, every time he will find something new in him, so poignant, so penetrating, are the periods and sentiments of the learned Erasmus, relating to this great concern, even to the exceeding of himself in every thing he wrote: And it were much to be wished, that among the many other tracts in Divinity, or relating to that subject, requisite to be thoroughly read in our Universities by those who are designed for the Ministry, previously to their entering into Holy Orders, this was also strictly enjoined and insisted on. For, in short, I may venture to say, that few of those many who have written upon the nature and importance of the Pastoral Care, ever exceeded the most eloquent and learned Erasmus, in his awful way of delivering his sentiments on this weighty office.

'Every period in his first book of Ecclesiastes being so pungent, and so admirably well levelled at the bold precipitancy and wretched views, with which many, too many, enter into Holy Orders; and I am persuaded, that being read over before-hand, it would deter some at least, from venturing, illatis manibus, upon an office they are so little qualified for, as a thing in itself horridly profane, and audacious in them; and the serious and frequent perusal of the same afterwards, even thro' the whole course of the ministry, would stimulate and invigorate even the best qualified and disposed amongst us, to execute the sacred trust in a proper manner (17).'

(17) Bray's Primordia Bibliothecaria, p. 13, 14, 15.

[N] Him and his former associates.] It may not, perhaps, be disagreeable to our reader to have a small list of those worthy persons that associated with the Doctor in this laudable Design.

John Lord Viscount Percival, now Earl of Egmont.—The Reverend Dr Stephen Hales.—William Belitha, Esq;—The honourable Edward Digby, Esq;—The Right Honourable George Lord Carpenter.—Major-General Oglethorpe.—Edward Harley, Esq;—The Honourable James Vernon, Esq;—Edward Hughes, Esq;—Robert Hucks, Esq;—Thomas Tower, Esq;—John Laroche, Esq;—Rogers Holland, Esq;—Major Charles Selwyn.—Robert More, Esq;—William Sloper, Esq;—Oliver St John, Esq;—Henry Hasting, Esq;—George Heathcote, Esq;—Francis Byles, Esq;—Mr Adam Anderfon.—Sir James Lowther.—Captain Thomas Coram.—The Reverend Mr Digby Cotes.—The Reverend Mr Arthur Bedford.—The Reverend Mr Samuel Smith.—The Reverend Mr Richard Bundy.—The Reverend Mr John Barton.—The Reverend Mr Daniel Somersfeld, &c.

BRENT (Sir NATHANAEL), a learned person in the XVIIth century, was born at Little Woolford in Warwickshire, in 1573 (a), being the son of Anchor Brent of that place, Gent [A]. In the year 1589, he became Portionist, commonly called Post-Master of Merton-college in Oxford; and, on the twentieth of June 1593, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b). The year following he was admitted Probationer-Fellow of the college aforesaid (c). On the thirty-first of October 1598, he took the degree of Master of Arts (d); and then entered upon the Law-line. In 1607, he was one of the Proctors of the University (e). Some years after, namely in 1613, &c. he travelled into foreign parts, and became acquainted with several of the most learned men abroad. After his return, he married Martha daughter and heir of Dr Robert Abbot Bishop of Salisbury, and niece to Dr George Abbot Archbishop of Canterbury, which was the cause of his succeeding great preferments (f). About the year 1618, he was sent to Venice by Archbishop Abbot, on purpose to get a copy of the History of the Council of Trent [B], then newly composed by the most renowned Padre Paolo Sarpi (g); in procuring of which he exposed himself to very great dangers (h). In 1621, he was elected Warden of Merton-college (i), through the Archbishop's recommendation: who also made him his Vicar-General, Commissary of the diocese of Canterbury, Master of the Faculties, and at length Judge of the Prerogative (k) [C]. On the eleventh of October 1623, he accumulated the degrees of Bachelor and Doctor of Law (l). The twenty-third of August 1629, he received the honour of knighthood from King Charles I, at Woodstock, being then supposed well-affected to the Church and Hierarchy (m). But in the great disputes that arose between Archbishop Abbot and Bishop Laud, he entirely sided with the first, and his adherents, the Puritan party; and grew so inveterate against Laud, that he was a frequent witness against him at his trial (n). He likewise deserted Oxford when King Charles I. garrisoned that place, and took the Covenant: for which reason he was deprived of his Wardenship of Merton-college, by his Majesty's command; but restored again when Oxford garrison was surrendered for the Parliament's use, in 1646 (o). In the years 1647 and 1648, he was appointed Chief-Visitor of that University; and countenanced all the violent and arbitrary proceedings there used (p). When an order was made against Pluralities, he was forced to leave Merton-college, on the twenty-seventh of November 1651; at which time he refused also the oath called the Engagement (q). Whereupon, retiring to his house in Little Britain in London (r), he died there November 6, 1652, aged seventy-nine; and was buried, the seventeenth of the same month, with great solemnity, in the church of St Bartholomew the Less (s).

[A] Being the son of Anchor Brent of that place, Gent.] Who was a younger son of Richard Brent, Gent. eldest son of John Brent, of the house of Brent of Cofington in Somersetshire (1).

[B] About the year 1618, he was sent to Venice by Archbishop Abbot, on purpose to get a copy of The History of the Council of Trent.] This appears from two letters, (published by Dr Lewis Atterbury, in the collection above-mentioned) from Archbishop Abbot to our author (2). The first of which, dated at Lambeth, June the twenty-first, 1618, is as follows. 'Salutem in Christo. I am glad that you are safely arrived whither you desired to go. I have read your letters, and the Canzoni (3) inclosed, which are twelve in number, whereof I shall make such use as is fit. I have not acquainted the greatest with any thing of your person, nor with the matter so much desired; so that you may confidently tell your two good friends (4), that they need to dread nothing. And I may say in general, that there is no man living, to whom I have made known any thing in this matter, saving to you; only in general the old man, that liveth with me, understandeth of my desire to get what I can appertaining to those songs. Perfit, I pray you, in that course, which you have begun; and so commending me unto you, and wishing you to live as privately as you can, I rest,

'Your very loving friend,

G. CANT.

As Father Paul, and Father Fulgentio, the two joint authors of that excellent history, composed it, they privately delivered a copy of the same to Mr Brent; who sent it over weekly, to the Archbishop in the original Italian; and it came to his hands, after five or six superscriptions to other persons, for the greater security (5). When Mr Brent had sent it all over, he came back himself, and translated it out of Italian into English and Latin. The original Italian was printed first at London in 1619, and dedicated to King James I. by D. Antonio de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalato, who had been instrumental in procuring that History (6). The English Translation was published in 1619, under this title, 'The History of the Council of Trent, containing eight Books. In which, besides the ordinary Acts of the Council, are declared many notable Occurrences, which happened in Christendom, during the space of forty years and more. And particularly the Practices of the Court of Rome, to hinder the Reformation of their Errors, and to maintain their Greatness.' In fol. A new edition was printed in 1640; and another in 1676, with other pieces of Father Paul, at the end.—Besides this translation, Sir Nathanael Brent reviewed Mr Fr. Mafon's 'Vindication of the Church of England, concerning the Consecration and Ordination of the Bishops, &c.' examined the quotations, compared them with the originals, and printed that book from the author's manuscript, in 1625, fol (7). Whatever else he composed, hath not been published.

[C] Judge of the Prerogative.] It is probable he was turned out of this place, by Archbishop Laud. For, thus we read in Whitelock's Memorials (8): 'The Com-mons took orders touching the Prerogative Court, and appointed Sir Nathaniel Brent, to be the Judge of that Court.'

(a) Wood, Ath. Brit. 1721, Vol. II. col. 161. He was 79 years old at the time of his death, in 1652. Ibid. col. 162.

(b) Ibid. Vol. I. Fasil, col. 145.

(c) Athenæ, ubi supra.

(d) Ibid. Fasil, col. 154.

(e) Ibid. col. 176.

(f) Athenæ, ubi supra.

(g) See Some Letters relating to the Hist. of the Council of Trent: published by Dr Lewis Atterbury, Lond. 1705, 4to.

(h) Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

(i) Idem, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. liii. p. 36.

(k) Athenæ, ubi supra.

(l) Idem, Fasil, Vol. I. col. 225, &c.

(m) Athenæ, ubi supra.

(1) Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

(2) Some Letters relating to the History of the Council of Trent, &c. Lond. 1705, 4to, as above.

(3) That feigned name [which signifies Songs in Italian] they gave to the Sheets of the Hist. of the Council of Trent.

(4) F. Paul, and F. Fulgentio.

(n) Ibid. See also Canterbury's Doome, by W. Prynne.

(o) Wood, Ath. & Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. ut supra.

(p) Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. i. p. 369, &c.

(q) Athenæ, ubi supra. Kennet's Regit. and Chron. &c. edit. 1723, fol. p. 197.

(r) R. Smith, in his Obituary, says, that it was in Alderigate street. See F. Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, Vol. II. lib. xiv. p. 25.

(s) Ibid. and Wood's Athen. ubi supra.

(5) See some Letters, &c. as above, p. 2, 3.

(6) Echar'd's Hist. edit. 1720, p. 393.

(7) Wood, Ath. Vol. I. col. 464, and Vol. II. col. 162.

(8) Edit. 1732, fol. p. 92.

BREVINT (DANIEL), a learned Divine of the XVIIth century, was born in the Isle of Jersey, in the reign of King James I (a), and probably educated in grammar-learning in that place. From thence he went and studied Logic and Philosophy in the Protestant University of Saumur [A], where he took the degree of Master of Arts, on Septemb. 12, 1634 (b). Coming to Oxford, he, in all likelihood, studied for some time in that famous University, and October 12, 1638, was incorporated there Master of Arts (c), as he stood at Saumur. About this time King Charles I, having, through Archbishop Laud's persuasion, founded three fellowships in the colleges of Pembroke, Exeter, and Jesus, for the Islands of Jersey and Guernsey, alternately; Mr Brevint was nominated or chosen, to be the first Fellow at Jesus-College upon this foundation, in 1638 (d). Here he continued 'till he was ejected from his fellowship by the Parliament-Visitors [B], for refusing to take the Solemn League and Covenant (e). Whereupon he withdrew to his native country (f). But upon the reduction of that place by the Parliament's forces, he fled into France, and became Minister of a Protestant congregation in Normandy. Not long after, he had the honour of being made Chaplain to the Viscount de Turenne, afterwards Marshal of France, whose Lady was one of the most worthy and pious women in her time (g). Whilst he was in that station, he was one of the persons 'employed about the great design then in hand, of reconciling the Protestant and Popish religions; which gave him an access into, and made him acquainted with, every corner of that Church,' as he says himself (h). At the Restoration of King Charles II, he came back to England, and was presented by that Prince (who had known him abroad) to the tenth prebend in the church of Durham, vacant by the promotion of Dr J. Cosin to that See. He was installed March 15, 1660-61 (i). By Bishop Cosin, who had been his fellow-sufferer, he was also collated to a living in the diocese of Durham (k). On the twenty-seventh of February 1661-62, he took his degree of Doctor of Divinity at Oxford (l). Having, during his exile, seen Popery in it's native deformity, and observed all the mean and dishonest arts that are used to support that weak and ill-shaped building, he took all opportunities to attack, and endeavour to pull it down. Accordingly, in 1672, he published Missale Romanum: or, The Depth and Mystery of the Roman Mass, laid open and explained, for the Use of both Reformed and Unreformed Christians [C]. And, the next year, The Christian Sacrament and Sacrifice, by way of Discourse, Meditation, and Prayer, upon the Nature, Parts, and Blessings of the Holy Communion [D]. And in 1674, Saul and Samuel at Endor, or the new Waies of Salvation and Service, which usually tempt Men to Rome, and detain them there, truly represented and refuted. At the end of which is, A brief Account of R. F. his Missale Vindicatum, or Vindication of the Roman Mass [E], being an answer to The Depth

(a) In the year 1616. He was baptized May 11, 1616. Register book of St John's in Jersey.

(b) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 927, edit. 1721, and Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. P. II. p. 322.

(c) Idem. Fasti. Vol. I. col. 277.

(d) Idem. Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 927.

(e) Walker's Sufferings of the Clergy, &c. Lond. 1714, fol. p. 120.

(f) Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

(g) From the information of a friend who knew him.

(h) In Preface to Saul and Samuel at Endor, p. 5. edit. Oxf. 1674, 8vo.

(i) Br. Will's Survey of the Cathedrals of York, Durham, &c. Lond. 1727, p. 273.

(k) From the information of a friend.

(l) Wood, Fasti. Vol. II. col. 148.

[A] From thence he went and studied Logic and Philosophy, in the Protestant University of Saumur. Before the revocation of the edict of Nantz, and 'till the encouragement, given by the foundation of the three Fellowships above-mentioned, in the University of Oxford, the young gentlemen of the islands of Jersey and Guernsey, designed for the Ministry, were sent to study among the Protestants in France, particularly at Saumur. This University was founded by the learned Philip de Mornay, Lord Pleffis Marly, who brought Professors to teach academical learning in that town, of which King Henry IV. had made him Governor (1). It was for several years in great repute, on account of it's eminent Professors of Divinity, John Cameron, Lewis Cappel, Moses Amyrauld, John de la Place, &c. The learned Tannegui le Feve, father of Madam Dacier, was also one of the Regents, or Masters, in that University. It was at length suppressed by Lewis XIV. in 1684.

[B] He was ejected from his Fellowship, by the Parliament-Visitors. He must have been dispossessed of it, or at least have quitted it, before the general visitation in 1647, &c. for he says himself, that he was 'kept by the times of rebellion, seventeen years' a-broad among the Romanists (2); that is from 1643 to 1660.

[C] The depth and mystery of the Roman Mass. It was printed at Oxford 1672, and again in 1673, 8vo. In 1674, there came out an answer to it, entitled, Missale Romanum Vindicatum; or, the Mass vindicated from Dr Dan. Brevint's calumnious and scandalous Tract. 8vo. Of this the Doctor gave an account, with some short observations upon it, at the end of his Saul and Samuel at Endor, as is mentioned in the text above.

[D] The Christian Sacrament and Sacrifice, &c. Printed at Oxford 1673, in 12mo. It passed through a second edition. And the third was published at London in 1739, upon the following recommendation given of it by Dr Waterland, in his Charge, entitled, The Christian Sacrifice explained (3). 'He [Dr Brevint]

'was well read in the Eucharistical Sacrifice: no man understood it better; — and he explained the practical uses of that doctrine, in so clear, so lively, and so affecting a way, that one can scarce meet with any thing on the subject, that can be justly thought to exceed it. So that I could heartily join my wishes with a late learned writer (4), that that excellent little book, entitled, The Christian Sacrament and Sacrifice, might be reprinted, for the honour of God and the benefit of the Church.' In the dedication of this book, the author says, 'That it is one of the many tracts, which he made at Paris, on several subjects, at the instance of those two incomparable Princesses [of Turenne, and Bouillon] who there for many years during his banishment, employed him in their service.'

[E] Saul and Samuel at Endor, &c. It was printed at Oxford 1674, 8vo. and reprinted at London 1688, in 12mo. The design of it, is, to shew the falseness and absurdity, of the new ways of salvation and service, which usually tempt men to embrace the Romish religion; namely, 1. The Romanists, pretending theirs to be the only true Catholick Church. 2. Romish miracles. 3. The protection and assistance of their imaginary Saints; particularly the Virgin Mary. Under this article, he fully shows, to what an excessive degree of superstitious idolatry, the veneration for her hath been carried by the Popists. They bestow upon her the highest titles, which are in Scripture attributed to God; and in their prayers and praises, commonly join her with the Supreme Being. They apply to her the most illustrious passages of Scripture, that belong directly to Christ. They have composed a psalter, Psalterium S. Bonaventurae; nay even a whole bible, Biblia Mariae, to her honour. 4. Another inducement to Popery, is the Beads, called the Rosary. 5. The next is, the Church's treasury. 6. Indulgences. 7. Pardon of sins, by means of holy confraternities, and friends. 8. The girdle of St Francis; the 150 beads of St Dominic, and the scapulary of St Simon Stock. 9. Relics, Agnus Dei's, &c. 10. Consecrated images.

(4) Dr Nicker, Christian Priesthood Prefat. Discourse, Vol. I. p. 39, 40.

(1) Account of Jersey by Falle, second edition, Lond. 1733, p. 316.

(2) Preface to Saul and Samuel at Endor, ubi supra.

(3) Page 31.

[F] He

and Mystery of the Roman Mass, abovementioned. The learning, and other eminent qualifications of the author, having recommended him to the esteem of the world, and to the favour of his Sovereign, he was promoted to the Deanery of Lincoln, vacant by the death of Michael Honeywood, D. D. Into this dignity he was installed, January 3, 1681-82: and, into the prebend of Welton Payns-hall annexed thereto, January 7, following (m). Besides the books already mentioned, he hath published some others in Latin, of which there is an account in the note [F]. He died May 5, 1695, and was buried in the cathedral church of Lincoln, behind the high-altar (n); where, on a grave-stone, is an inscription to his memory [G]. He was a person of great reading, especially in the controversy between the Protestants and Papists; zealous for the Church of England; and for his life and learning truly praise-worthy (o).

(m) Br. Willis's Survey of the Cathedral of Lincoln, &c. 4to. p. 81, 261.

(n) Willis, ubi supra, p. 81.

(o) Wood's Ath. ubi supra.

[F] He hath published some other books, &c. The titles of them are, I. Ecclesie primitivæ Sacramentum & Sacrificium, à pontificiis corruptis, & exinde natis controversiis liberum; written at the desire of the Princesses of Turenne and Bouillon, i. e. 'The Sacrament and Sacrifice of the primitive Church, freed from Popish Corruptions, and the disputes occasioned thereby.' II. Eucharistia Christianæ præsentia realis & pontificia s. s. a, luculentissimis non testimoniis modo, sed etiam fundamentis, quibus fere tota S. S. Patrum Theologia nititur, hæc explata, illa suffulta & aserta, i. e. 'A confutation of the Real Presence in the Eucharist, as maintained by the Papists, with an account of the manner how Christ is present in the Sacrament, according to the writings of the ancient Fathers.' III. Pro Serenissima Principe Weimariensi ad Theses Je- nenses accurata Responsio, i. e. 'An exact answer to the Theses of Jena, for the Princess of Weimar.' IV. Ducentæ plus minus Prælectiones in S. Matthæi xxv Capita & aliorum Evangelistarum locos hæcè passim parallelos, i. e. 'About two hundred Lectures, upon twenty-five chapters of St Matthew, and those passages of the other Evangelists that are parallel thereto.' He also translated into French, 'The Judgment of the University of Oxford, concerning the solemn League and Covenant (5).

(5) Wood's Ath. ubi supra; & Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. ii. p. 322.

[G] On a grave-stone is an inscription to his memory] Which is as follows. 'Here lyeth the body of Daniel Brevint, D. D. late Dean of this Cathedral Church of Lincoln, who departed this life, May 5, 1695. I have waited for thy Salvation, O Lord (6).

(6) Br. Willis, ubi supra, p. 81.

BRIGGS (HENRY) an eminent Mathematician of the XVIIth century, descended from the antient family of that name at Salle in Norfolk, was born at Warley Wood, a small hamlet in the parish of Halifax in Yorkshire (a): the time of his birth is uncertain; but, most probably, it was about the year 1556 [A]. After his education at a grammar school in the country, he was sent to St John's college in Cambridge, about the year 1577, and admitted a scholar of the house, November 5, 1579. In 1581, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, that of Master in 1585; and was chosen Fellow of his college March 29, 1588. He applied himself chiefly to the study of the Mathematicks, in which he greatly excelled; and, in 1592, was made Examiner and Lecturer in that faculty, and, soon after, Reader of the Physick-Lecture founded by Dr Linacre. Upon the settlement of Gresham-college in London, he was chosen the first Professor of Geometry there, about the beginning of March 1596; and some time after he constructed a Table, by the help of which, the Magnetical Declination being given, the height of the Pole may easily be found. This Table was suited to an instrument described by Dr Gilbert (b), and published by Mr Blondel (c). In 1609, Mr Briggs contracted an intimacy with the learned Mr James Usher, afterwards Archbishop of Armagh, which was kept up many years by letters, two of which, written by our author, are yet extant (d). In the former of them, dated in August 1610, he tells his friend, 'he was engaged in the subject of Eclipses;' and in the latter, dated March 10, 1615, he acquaints him with his being 'wholly employed about the noble invention of Logarithms, then lately discovered: in the improvement of which he was particularly concerned [B]. In the summer of the year

(c) In his Theoriques of the Seven Planets, Lond. 1602. 4to.

(d) In Archbishop Usher's Letters, No. 4. and 16. Lond. 1686. fol.

[A] About the year 1556. Dr Smith (1) places his birth about the year 1560; which, probably, he might collect from what is said by Anthony Wood (2), that he died on the twenty-sixth of January 1630, aged seventy or more; and likewise from Mr Gellibrand, who, speaking of his death, calls him, Apellem nostrum Septuagenarium (3). But, in a Letter from Mr Joseph Mede of Christ's College in Cambridge, dated the 6th of February 1630, it is said, Mr Henry Briggs of Oxford, the great Mathematician, is lately dead, at 74 years of age (4). According to this account, which is more express and determinate than either of the former, he must have been born in the year 1556.

[B] He was particularly concerned in the improvement of Logarithms. Mr Wood tells us (5), that 'one Dr Craig, a Scotchman, coming out of Denmark into his own country, called upon John Neper, Baron of Marcheston, near Edinburgh, and told him, among other discourses, of a new invention in Denmark by Longomontanus, as it is said, to save the tedious multiplication and division in astronomical calculations. Neper being sollicitous to know farther of him concerning this matter, he could give no other account of it, than that it was by proportionable numbers. Which hint Neper taking, he desired him at his return to call upon him again. Craig, after 'some weeks had passed, did so; and Neper then shewed him a rude draught of what he called Canon mirabilis Logarithmorum. Which draught, with some alterations, he printing in 1614, it came forth into the hands of our author Briggs, and into those of William Oughtred, from whom the relation of this matter came.' As this story is told, one would imagine it came from Mr Oughtred. But there is no mention of it in his writings. And it seems strange, that Longomontanus, had he any pretensions to it, should have no where laid claim to the honour of this admirable invention (6); but have left the glory of it's first discovery to be solely ascribed to the Baron of Marcheston (7). This could not be for want of attention to a thing of that importance, or an opportunity of doing himself justice in so long a course of time: for he lived, as Vossius tells us (8), to the year 1647, and was upwards of eighty years old, when he died. Gassendus indeed mentions (9) a compendious method of calculation in Trigonometry, as discovered by Tycho Brahe, in which Addition and Subtraction were used instead of Multiplication and Division; and he adds this remark: Quod ut fieri possit, docuit postmodum suo Logarithmorum Canon: Neperus. But that Neper's discovery was altogether different from the method spoken of by Gassendus, may appear by con-

(6) Vid. Smith, ubi supra, p. 5.

(7) See Mackenzie's Lives of the Scots Writers, p. 522.

(8) De Natura Artium, l. iii. c. 46.

(9) Vit. T. Brahei. p. 109, 165, edit. 1655. 4to.

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 549. & Dr T. Smith's Comment. de vit. et stud. H. Briggs, in his Vit. suorum. erudit. et illustr. Viro. um, Lond. 1707, 70. See also Mr Ward's Lives of the Professors of Gresham-college, Lond. 1740, p. 120. And the Rev. Mr Blomefield's Topographical Hist. of Norfolk, Vol. I. p. 641.

(b) In his fifth book of the load-stone.

(1) Comment. de vit. & stud. H. Briggs, p. 1.

(2) Athen. Oxon. vol. I. col. 550.

(3) Pref. ad Tri. on. Brit.

(4) Ward's Lives of the Professors of Gresham-college, Lond. 1740, p. 120.

(5) Ubi supra, p. 549.

year 1616, he took a journey into Scotland, to converse with John Neper, Baron of Mar- cheston near Edinburgh, upon his new invention of Logarithms; and the summer following made him a second visit (e). In 1617, for the sake of his friends and hearers at Gresham-College, he printed, in 8vo, his Logarithmorum Chilias Prima [C]. In 1619, he was made Savilian Professor of Geometry at Oxford [D]; but continued to hold his Professorship of Gresham-College, 'till the twenty of July 1620, and then resigned it. Upon his going to Oxford he settled himself at Merton-College, and soon after was incorporated Master of Arts in that University, where he continued 'till his death. In 1622, he published a small tract in 4to. concerning the North-west Passage to the South-Sea, through the Continent of Virginia, and Hudson's Bay (f). The reason, which led him to it, was, probably, his being then a member of the Company trading to Virginia. His next performance was his great and elaborate work, intitled, Aritmetica Logarithmica [E]; and soon

(e) See remark [B].

(f) Reprinted in Purchas's Pilgrimes, Vol. 111. p. 852.

(10) Vid. Clavi- um De Astralab. l. i. Lemna 53. Pitiscii Trigonom. l. v. init. &c.

(11) Usher's Let- ters, p. 36.

fuling the authors, in which the artifice then used for that purpose is particularly explained (10) This invention was no sooner known, than it gained the general applause of all the eminent Mathematicians of that age, who found it to answer, what the noble author had said of it in his Dedication to Prince Charles, that illius adminiculo plures quæstiones Mathematicæ unius horæ spatio, quam pristina et communiter recepta forma Sinuum, Tangentium, et Secantium, vel integro die absolvantur, i. e. 'By the help of this invention, more mathematical questions may be determined in one hour, than in a whole day, by the old, and commonly received method of Sines, Tangents, and Secants.' But no one extolled it more than Mr Briggs, who, in a letter to Mr James Usher (afterwards Archbishop of Armagh) speaks of it thus: Neper, Lord of Marquinston, hath set my head and hands at work with his new and admirable Logarithms. I hope to see him this summer, for I never saw a book which pleased me better, and made me more wonder (11). This year the Baron published his Rabdologia, in the Dedication of which to the Lord Chancellor Seton, he mentions another species of Logarithms, different from what he had published in 1614, and which he had invented since that time. His words are these: Logarithmorum speciem aliam multo præstantiorem nunc etiam invenimus, et creandi methodum una cum eorum usu, si Deus longiorem vitæ et valetudinis usuram concesserit, evulgare statuimus. Ipsam autem novi Canonis supputationem, ob infirmam corporis nostri valetudinem, viris in hoc studii genere versatis relinquimus; imprimis vero D. Henrico Briggs, Londini publico Geometriæ Professori, et amico mihi longe charissimo, i. e. 'I have lately invented another, and a much better, kind of Logarithms; and I purpose, if God grant me life and health, to publish the method of constructing them, together with their use. But, on account of the bad state of my health, I leave the computation of the new Canon to persons conversant in this kind of study; particularly to Mr Henry Briggs, publick Professor of Geometry at London, and my most dear friend.' It seems from this passage, as if the Baron, being sensible of his declining health, was desirous, by this publick notice of his new method of Logarithms, and his expectations from Mr Briggs, to engage him more firmly in the prosecution of that useful, but very laborious, work here mentioned. Soon after the publication of the Canon Mirificus Logarithmorum, it was translated into English by Mr Edward Wright, and sent to the author into Scotland for his perusal, who approved of it very well. But Mr Wright dying before the book was returned from Scotland, the care of the impression was, both by him and the Baron, committed to Mr Briggs, who published it in the year 1616, with a Preface of his own, containing some account of it's excellent uses, and a description of the instrumental Table, to find the part proportional, placed at the end. We find by the passage transcribed above, from the Baron's Dedication of his Rabdologia, that what he proposed to do himself in relation to the second species of Logarithms, was only to give an account how they were made, and explain the use of them, and to leave the labour of their calculation to others, and particularly to Mr Briggs. But he did not live to go through what he intended; and therefore, after his decease, the manuscript being sent to Mr Briggs, he made several additions to it, as will appear by looking into the Contents of the book itself, published by the Baron's son (12). In 1615, Mr Briggs, in explaining the subject of Logarithms to his hearers at Gresham-College, observed, that it would be more commodious if they were so altered, that 0 should be the Logarithm of the whole Sine, as in the Canon, and 1000000000 be made the Logarithm of a tenth part of the whole Sine, namely, 5 degrees, 44 minutes, and 21 seconds. And presently after he acquainted the author with this by a letter; and, having calculated some Logarithms in that manner, he took a journey to Edinburgh, to shew the Baron what he had done. He was very kindly received by Neper, and stay'd with him a month; and in their conversation upon that head the Baron told him, he was sensible the Logarithms might be altered for the better, before he published his Canon; but chose to have them printed, in the manner he had prepared them, 'till he had leisure and health to make others more commodious; which he thought would be best, if 0 was made the Logarithm of an Unité, and 1000000000 that of the whole Sine. Mr Briggs agreed with him in this, and, at his desire, after he came back to London, throwing by those he had calculated upon his former scheme, made others in the manner suggested by the Baron, who highly approved of them, and earnestly pressed him to proceed (13). And upon this plan was Mr Briggs's Aritmetica Logarithmica formed. See the remark [E].

(12) Edinburgi, 1619, 4to.

[C] His Logarithmorum Chilias Prima.] These Logarithms, he tells us in the Preface, are of a different kind from those published by the illustrious inventor of the art in his Canon Mirificus. Quod autem his Logarithmi diversi sint ab iis, quos clarissimus inventor, memoriæ semper colendæ, in suo edito Canone Mirifico, &c. And this Chilias Prima is what Sir Henry Bouchier refers to in the following passage of a letter written by him to Dr Usher: 'Our kind friend Mr Briggs hath lately published a Supplement to the most excellent Tables of Logarithms, which I presume he has sent you (14).' This letter is dated, Decemb. 6. 1617.

[D] He was made Savilian Professor of Geometry at Oxford.] Sir Henry Savile, the founder of that Lecture, had himself for some time discharged that province, and read thirteen lectures upon the first eight Propositions of Euclid's Elements, which were afterwards printed (15); and then he surrendered the chair to Mr Briggs, taking leave of his audience, in his last lecture, with these words: Trado lampadem successoribus meo, doctissimo viro, qui vos ad intima Geometriæ mysteria perducet. Mr Briggs entered upon this new province, January the 8th, that year, which he opened with an eloquent Oration, and the week following began his lectures with the ninth Proposition of Euclid, where Sir Henry Savile had left off (16).

[E] His Aritmetica Logarithmica.] The Title at length is: Aritmetica Logarithmica; sive, Logarithmorum Chilias triginta, pro numeris naturali serie crescentibus ab unitate ad 20,000, et à 90,000, ad 100,000. Quarum ope multa perficiuntur arithmetica Problemata et geometrica. Hos numeros primus invenit clarissimus vir Johannes Neperus, baron Merchistonii; eos autem ex ejusdem sententia mutavit eorumque usum et usum illustravit Henricus Briggsius, in celeberrima Academia Oxoniensi Geometriæ Professor Savilianus: Londini, 1624, folio. There was a second edition of this noble work published by Mr Adrian Vlacq, of Targou, in Holland, in which the intervening numbers from 20,000 to 90,000 were filled up. The title of that edition runs thus: Aritmetica Logarithmica; sive, Logarithmorum Chilias centum, pro numeris naturali serie crescentibus ab unitate ad 100,000; una cum Canone Triangulorum, seu Tabula artificialium sinuum, tangentium, et secantium, ad radium 1000000,00000, et ad singula scrupula prima quadrantis. Quibus novum traditur compendium, quo nullum nec admirabilius, nec, (13) See the Preface to Briggs' Aritmetica Logarithmica.

(14) Usher's Letters, p. 62.

(15) Oxon. 1621 4to.

(16) Wood, Hist & Antiq. Oxon. l. ii. p. 324.

soon after he engaged in another grand work, intitled Trigonometria Britannica [F]. This great Mathematician died the twenty-sixth of January 1630, in Merton-College [G], and was buried in the choir of the chapel there, under the honorary monument of Sir Henry Savile; a plain stone being laid over him, with his name only inscribed on it. Besides the pieces already mentioned, Mr Briggs wrote many others; some of which have never been published [H], and others published by other persons [I]. We shall give his character, and the opinions of writers concerning him, in the remark [K].

. B R I G G S .

nec utilius, ad solvenda pleraque problemata arithmetica et geometrica. Hos numeros, &c. Editio secunda, aucta per Adrianum Vlacq, Goudanum: Goudæ, 1628, folio. This Edition, soon after his death, was translated into English, with the following title: 'Logarithmicall Arithmetike, or, Tables of Logarithmes for absolute numbers, from an unite to 100,000; as also for sines, tangentes, and secantes, for ev'ry minute of a quadrant: With a plain description of their use in arithmetike, geometrie, geographic, astronomie, navigation, &c. These Numbers were first invented by the most excellent John Neper, Baron of Marchiston; and the same were transform'd, and the foundation and use of them illustrated, with his approbation, by Henry Briggs, Sir Henry Savile's Professor of Geometrie in the Universitie of Oxford: the uses whereof were written in Latin by the author himselfe; and since his death published in English by diverse of his friends, according to his mind, for the benefit of such as understand not the Latin tongue. London, 1631, folio.'

[F] A work intitled Trigonometria Britannica. He proposed to complete it in two books, but lived to write the first only; leaving the second to the care of his old friend Mr H. nry Gellibrand, who finished the work, and published it under the title of Trigonometria Britannica, sive, De Doctrina Triangulorum: Libri duo, &c. (17). This seems to be the work promised, in a manner, by our author in the Dissertation prefixed to his Arithmetica Logarithmica, where he says; superest adhuc logarithmorum usus nobilissimus, et maxime necessarius, in doctrina triangulorum sphericorum, quem forsitan, uti spero, peculiari libro exhibebo. i. e. 'The noblest, and the most important, use of Logarithms, namely, in the doctrine of Spherical Triangles, is still behind; which I purpose to explain in a distinct treatise.'

[G] He died ——— in Merton-College. The following account of him stands yet in the College Register. Jan. 26, 1630. Obiit apud nos communis, magister Henricus Briggs, vir quidem moribus ac vita integerrimus; quem in rebus Geometricis, quarum studiis primum Cantabrigiæ in societate Collegii S. Johannis sese a juventute sua adixerat, dein publicus prælector Londini in Collegio Greshamensi multos per annos sustinuerat, omnium sui temporis eruditissimum, D. Henricus Savilius, ut primo ex fundatione sua geometriæ professoris munere fungeretur, Oxonium evocavit: cujus exequias 29 die proxime sequente, concione habita a magistro Sellar, et oratione funebri a magistro Cressy, una cum primoribus Academicæ celebravimus. We learn from this account, that the Heads, and other chief persons, of the University, attended his funeral; and that a Sermon was preached by Mr Sellar, and a funeral Oration spoken by Mr Cressy (Fellows of Merton College) on that occasion.

[H] He wrote some pieces, which have never been published. They are: I. Commentaries on the Geometry of Peter Ramus. Mr Wood (18) tells us, that, after the author's death, this Treatise came into the hands of Mr John Greaves, from him to his brother Dr Thomas Greaves, and then to Mr Theodore Haak, a Fellow of the Royal Society. II. Dux Epistolæ ad ætærum virum, Christianum Longomontanum. One of these Letters contained some Remarks upon a Treatise of Longomontanus, about squaring the Circle; and the other a Defence of Arithmetical Geometry. Both of them were in the possession of Dr Smith, who intended to publish them, but did not live to execute his design (19). These, which follow, Mr Ward tells us (20), are in the hands of Mr Jones. III. Animadversiones Geometricæ. 4to. IV. De eodem Argumento. 4to. Both these Treatises contain great variety of Geometrical Propositions concerning the Properties of many Figures, with several Arithmetical Computations relating to the Circle, Angular Sections, &c. V. An English Treatise of Common Arithmetick, folio. In this are contained not only the Vulgar Rules, but also the manner of extracting the square and cube roots, with the Rules of Proportion, Allegation, Arithmetical and Geometrical Progression. VI. A Letter to Mr Clarke of Gravesend, dated from Gresham-College the 25th of February, 1606; with which he sends him the description of a Ruler, call'd Bedwell's Ruler, with Directions how to draw it. This Mr Bedwell was a Clergyman, who had a living at Tottenham (21), and was one of the Divines in that class at Westminster, who were appointed by King James I. to revise the English Translation of the Bible (22).

[I]—Some others, published by other persons. Namely; I. Tables for the improvement of Navigation. A Table of Declination of every minute of the Ecclyptick, in degrees, minutes, and seconds. A Table of the Sun's Postobscureses. A Table of Equations of the Sun's Ephemerides. A Table of the Sun's Declination. Tables to find the height of the Pole, in any latitude, from the height of the Polar-Star. These Tables are printed in the second edition of Mr Edward Wright's Treatise, intitled, Certain Errors in Navigation detected and corrected: London, 1610, 4to (23). II. Euclidis Elementorum VI libri priores, secundum vetera Exemplaria restituti, ex Versione Latina Frederici Commandini, aliquam multis in locis castigati: Londini, 1620, folio. This was printed without his name to it. III. Mathematica ab antiquis minus cognita. This is a summary of the most observable inventions of modern Mathematicians, communicated by Mr Briggs to Dr George Hakewill, and published by him in several editions of his Apologie: London, folio. It is likewise printed in Mr Ward's Lives of the Professors of Gresham-College. Append. No. 9.

[K] His character, and the opinions of writers concerning him. Dr Smith (24) gives him the character of a man of great probity; easy and accessible to all; free from arrogance, moroseness, envy, ambition, and avarice; a contemner of riches, and contented with his own station; preferring a studious retirement to all the splendid circumstances of life. The learned Mr Thomas Gataker, who attended his lectures, when he was Reader of Mathematicks at St John's College in Cambridge, represents him as highly esteemed by all persons skilled in the Mathematicks both at home and abroad; and says, that desiring him once to give him his judgment concerning Judicial Astrology, his answer was, that he conceived it to be a meer system of groundless conceits (25). And Mr Oughtred calls him 'the mirror of the age for excellent skill in Geometry' (26). But his successor at Gresham-College, the famous Dr Isaac Barrow, in his Oration there upon his admission (27), has given his character more fully in the following passage, wherein he celebrates his great abilities, skill, and industry, in perfecting Neper's admirable invention of Logarithms; which, but for his care and pains, might have continued an imperfect and useless design. Attestor tuum, quod nostris agmen ducit in tabulis, omni laude majus, omnique encomio celebratius nomen, doctrina, acumine, solertia, præstantissime Briggii, tu, qui Logarithmorum illud præclarissimum artificium non tua quidem (quod ad gloriam maxime fecerit) reperisti fortuna; sed (quod æque laudem meretur) consummasti industria, atque omnibus numeris absoluti: Quod inutile forsitan adhuc et imperfectum jaceret opus, fundamenti sui ruderibus involutum, nisi subtilissimi tu limam ingenii, et indefessæ diligentiam manus adhibuisses: Qui densas istas numerorum phalanges dum velut in aciem ordinatim instrueres, totique immensos nobis canones concinnares, tui temporis dispendio nostri otium redemisti, tuo labore nostrum sublevasti ædium, nostro ut somno parceres ærummosis teipsum vigiliis macerasti; dignus propterea, qui innumerabiles a nobis, neque per tuos etiam logarithmos computabilis, gratias reportares. We shall subjoin an Epigram upon Mr Briggs, written by Mr Henry Jacob (28), who was much celebrated at

(21) Usher's Lectures, p. 12.

(22) Fuller's Ch. Hist. &c. l. x. p. 45.

(23) See the end of Mr Wright's Preface.

(24) In Vit. Briggii, ubi supra.

(25) Vindictæ of the Annot. on Jerem. x. 2. p. 87.

(26) Apolog. Ep. against Rich. de Laman, p. 30.

(27) See Ward's Lives of the Professors, &c. Appendix. No. 10.

(28) See his Poëmata Græca & Latina.

(17) See the article GELLIBRAND HENRY.

(18) Ath. Oxon. l. i. col. 550.

(19) Smith, ubi supra, p. 13.

(20) Lives of the Professors, &c. p. 29.

that time for his skill in Philology. The Point or Sting, of it is, that Death had not put an end to his art, for his soul continued to astronomize, and his body to geometrize.

Κριγυρίαδης ζασηρ γαίνης, κ' σούδρομος άσρων,
Ευκλείδην φρονέων, κ' Πτολεμαίου όλος.

Ἦν ἔτι τεχνόβιος μάλα δ' πλεον' αυτοφάνης τις;
Πρόξενος ἑμμετρος, φροντίδας ἔρανιθ.
Παῦσε δ' ἔμιν τέχνης ἔδ' αὐτῆ μοῖρα, θάρονθ.
Ἀστρονομίῃ ψυχῆ, σῶμα γεομετρείει. T

BRIGGS (WILLIAM), an eminent English Physician in the latter end of the seven-teenth century, was born in the city of Norwich, and son of Augustin Briggs, Esq; [A] four times Member of Parliament for that city; descended from an ancient family at Sall (a) in Norfolk (b). He was admitted into Bennet-College, in the University of Cambridge; at thirteen years of age; and educated under the care of Dr Thomas Tennisson, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, and was chosen Fellow of that Society; in which he continued several years, and had the tuition of a good number of pupils; discharging that trust with honour to the college. He there took the degrees of Bachelor and Master of Arts; and entered on the Physick line; in which faculty he commenced Doctor in 1677. He studied with the utmost application, and was a good Linguist and Philosopher, and well versed in most parts of learning. October the twenty-sixth 1670, he was incorporated in the University of Oxford, being then Master of Arts (c). After he had improved himself by his travels into foreign countries, he settled at London, where he practised with great success, and soon became eminent in his profession, being much esteemed by persons of the highest rank, and most learned of his time. He was particularly famous for his exquisite skill in difficult cases of the eye, in which he distinguished himself to great advantage; he accurately surveyed the eye, and was a judicious Anatomist, as appears by his Ophthalmographia and Nova Visionis Theoria [B], an account of which treatises is inserted in the Philosophical Transactions

(a) See Baronetage, 823, 1741, Vol. II. p. 251.

(b) See the Pedigree of the Briggs's in Blomfield's Hist. of Norfolk, Vol. II. p. 640.

(c) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. II. col. 132, second edit. Lond. 1721.

[A] Augustin Briggs, Esq; Was son of Augustin Briggs, Esq; and was educated at Norwich; where he lived many years in great credit and esteem. He was Major of the Trained-Bands, or City Militia; being strenuous for his loyal master King Charles I. In the Rebellion, he was one of those gentlemen, who in 1643, joined the Earl of Newcastle in the siege of Lynn. In 1660, at the Restoration, he was very serviceable in composing the differences between the Dean and Chapter, and City of Norwich; and in procuring a new charter for the city. He died August 28th, 1684, in the 65d year of his age; having justly deserved the character given him by the late Reverend Mr Whitefoot, Minister of St Peter's, who composed the inscription on his monument erected in that church; for he was indeed highly loyal to his King, and yet a studious preserver of the ancient privileges of his country; was always firm and resolute in upholding the Church of England, and assiduous and punctual in all the important trusts that were committed to him, whether in the august assembly of Parliament, his honourable commands in the Militia, or his justiciary affairs upon the Bench; gaining the affections of the people by his hospitality, and repeated acts of kindness; which he continued beyond his death, leaving the charities mentioned in his will, as a more certain remembrance to posterity, than the perishing monument erected by his friends, on which is the following inscription:

Augustinus Briggs Armiger,
Urbis & Agri Icenorum bonus Genius:
Vir Famæ Integre,
Judicio Sano, Ingenio sagaci præditus:
Pietatis, Charitatis, Comitatis,
Exemplar probatissimum.
Civitatis aliquando Præfectus, diu Senator;
Cohortis Urbanæ Dux militaris:
Regni ad Concilium publicum 4ter Cooptatus
Suffragio Civium Unanimi.
Regi Servus (si quis alius) Fidissimus,
Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Filius pientissimus
Pauperum patronus munificentissimus.
Filium Cognominem,
Honoris & Amoris publici,
Hæredem reliquit;
Cujus pictate, hoc quicquid est, Monumenti
Memoriæ Sacrum,
Invidia carentis
Erectum est,
Obiit 28º August:
Anno { Ætæ Xána: 1684
Ætatis 67.
Cum Uxore Eliza Aldred ut diu jucundè vixit
Hic tandem placide quiescit (*).

(*) See Blomfield's History of Norfolk, Vol. II. p. 642.

[B] His Ophthalmographia, and Nova Visionis Theoria.] They were published at Cambridge 1676, in 12mo, under this following title: Ophthalmographia, sive oculi ejusque partium descriptio Anatomica, cui accessit nova visionis Theoria. These two treatises are highly commended by most authors, who have since written upon that subject. Dr William Derham, in his Physico-Theology (1), cites them with great commendation; and Sir Isaac Newton, then Professor of Mathematicks in the University of Cambridge, in his letter to the author, expresses his approbation of those treatises in the following terms. 'Vir clarissime, hisce tuis tractatibus duas magni nominis scientias uno opere promoves, Anatomicum dico et Opticam. Organi enim (in quo utraque versatur) artificio summo constructi diligenter perscrutaris mysteria. In hujus dissectione peritiam et dexteritatem tuam non exiguo olim mihi oblectamento fuisse recorder. Musculis motorii secundum situm suum naturalem eleganter à te expansis, cæterisque partibus coram expositis, sic ut singulorum usus et ministeria non tam intelligere liceret, quam cernere, effecerat dudum, ut ex cultro hic nihil non accuratum sperarem. Nec spem falleret eximius ille Tractatus Anatomicus, quem postmodum edidisti. Jam praxeos hujus ἀκριβέστερον pergis ingeniosissimâ Theoriâ instruere et exornare. Et quis Theoriis condensis aptior extiterit, quam qui phænomenis accuratè observandis navarit operam? &c. — i. e. By these two Treatises you promote two sciences of great importance, Anatomy and Optics. For you have accurately penetrated into the mysteries of the Organ, upon which both of them is conversant, and which is formed with the highest art imaginable. I remember, that your skill and dexterity in the dissection of that organ formerly gave me great pleasure. And as you had elegantly opened the motory muscles according to their natural situation, and explained the other parts in such a manner, that we might not only understand, but even see the secret uses of each of them, I expected every thing to be accurately performed by your dissection. Nor was I deceived in my hopes by your excellent Anatomical Treatise, which you published since. You are now going on to adorn these exact discoveries with a very ingenious Theory. And indeed who is more qualified to form theories, than he, who has taken such pains in observing the phænomena of nature with so much accuracy?' Sir Isaac concludes with encouraging the Doctor to proceed, as he had begun, in improving those sciences with his admirable discoveries; and to shew the world, that the difficulties with regard to natural causes, may be as easily surmounted by application and sagacity, as they are hard to be overcome by the ordinary efforts of the generality of mankind. 'Pergas itaque, Vir ornatissime, scientias hæcæ præclaris inventis, uti facis, excolere, doctæque difficultates causarum naturalium tam facili solertia vinci posse, quam

(1) Book iv. cap. ii.

Transactions of the Royal Society (d), of which he was Fellow, as well as of the College of Physicians. He likewise wrote two other pieces [C]. In his letter before Mr John Brown's Graphical Description of the Muscles 1697, he informs the publick, that he had thoughts of publishing a tract about the uses and distempers of the Eye; and also another against the Epicurean Sect, about the origin of man [D], but he did not finish them. He was Physician in ordinary to King William III, and Physician to St Thomas's Hospital in Southwark (e). He married Hannah, sole Daughter and heirs of Edmund Hobart, Gent. of Holt in Norfolk [E], a descendant of Sir Henry Hobart, Lord Chief Justice of the Common-

(d) No. CXXIX, and CXLVII.
(e) Wood, ubi supra.

quem solent conatibus vulgaribus difficulter cedere. 'Vale.' In this work the Doctor considers the form, parts, and motions of the eye, in an exact and curious manner; and as he thoroughly understood the œconomy of that admirable organ, he gives this character of it. 'Inter precipuas corporis animati partes, quæ magni conditoris nostri sapientiam ostenderunt, nulla sanè reperitur, quæ majori pompâ elucet, quam ipse oculus, aut quæ elegantiori formâ concinnatur. Dum enim aliarum partes vel minori satellitio stipantur, vel in tantam venustatem haud assurgunt, Ocelli peculiarem honorem et decus a supremo Numine affatum referunt, et nunquam non stupendæ suæ potentie characteres representant. Nulla sanè pars tam divino artificio et ordine, &c (2). — Among the principal parts of an animated body, which display the goodness of our great Creator, there is none which appears with greater magnificence, or is formed in a more elegant manner, than the eye. For while other parts are either less attended and guarded, or do not rise to so great a share of beauty; the eyes have a peculiar grace and honour breathed upon them by the Almighty himself, and perpetually display the marks of his amazing power. For no part indeed with such divine skill and harmony, &c.' The Theory of Vision, and the continuation of that discourse, were at first inserted in the Philosophical Transactions in English; but the author, a few years after, translated them into Latin, and annexed them to his Ophthalmographia, to which they properly belong, in a second edition printed at London 1685, in 8vo. They were published also at Leyden; and are more frequently to be met with in the booksellers shops in Holland, than in England. Dr William Wotton in his Reflections upon ancient and modern Learning (3), gives an account of the discoveries of our author with regard to the eye; and having remarked, that the Ancients found out the humours of it, the watry, crystalline, and glassy, and all it's tunicles, and gave a good description of them; but that the optic nerve, the aqueous ducts, which supply the watry humour, and the vessels, which carry tears, were not sufficiently examined; he tells us, that the first was done by Dr Briggs, who has found, that in the Tunica Retiformis, which is contiguous to the glassy humour, the filaments of the optic nerve there expanded, lie in a most exact and regular order, all parallel one to another; which, when they are united afterwards in the nerve, are not shuffled confusedly together, but still preserve the same order, until they come to the brain. The crystalline humour, continues Dr Wotton, had already been discovered to be of a double-convex figure, made of two unequal segments of spheres, and not perfectly spherical, as the Ancients thought. So that this farther discovery made by Dr Briggs, shews evidently why all the parts of the image are so distinctly carried to the brain, since every ray strikes upon a several filament of the optic nerve, and all those strings so struck are moved equally at the same time. He observes afterwards (4), that the Lympheducts, through which the moisture is conveyed from the two glands in the corner of the eyes, were not fully traced till Steno (5) and Briggs described them.

[C] Wrote two other pieces. The first is intituled, Two remarkable Cases relating to Vision: published in the Philosophical Transactions, No. CLIX. p. 562. May the 20th, 1684. The other is intituled, Solutio Philosophica casus cujusdem rarioris in Aëdis Philosophicis, No. CLIX. nuper edit. de Juvene vesperi cæcutiente, i. e. A Philosophical Solution of an uncommon Case, lately printed in the Philosophical Transactions, No. CLIX. concerning a youth, who was blind in the evening.

[D] About the origin of man. The Doctor after commending Mr Brown's industry, says — 'The peculiar frame and uses of the muscles in man (particularly of the hands) are wonderful, as they are requisite not only in the fine operations of your art, but also in Agriculture, Navigation, Writing, Manufacture, Building, and all sorts of mechanic Arts (which the brutes are not capable of) to which the exquisite fabrick of those of the legs in some of these assist: but besides, the formation of the lumbricales and perforantes in the hand (described Tab. 22, and 24.) are requisite in the fine stops of the organ, and other musical instruments in the service of the great Creator, as the muscles of the tongue and larynx are subservient to those hymns and praises we duly offer to him; whereas, the beasts (who were not designed for that harmony) have only one particular note to call to their kind, or be distinguished by. It was the consideration of this, that made Galen sensible of the admirable œconomy of the body in his tract de Usu partium; and Mr Hobbes confesses the same (Lib. de Homine, cap. 1.) where representing Epicurus's opinion, about the autothones or terrigonæ, he is ashamed of it, (as I also knew by his conversation) and, like a convert of the more learned Harvey on that subject, as to the formation of the fœtus, and it's nourishment afterwards by the breasts, ends the chapter in these words: Qui machinas omnes, tum generationis tum nutritionis satis perspexerint, nec tamen eas a mente aliqua, conditas ordinatasque ad sua quasque officia viderint, ipsi profecto sine mente esse consensidi sunt.

The make indeed of the parts of the human body, at first view, is very surprizing; and the rude dissections in the time of Galen, the inspections of the viscera, and the sacrifices of the dark ages (which obtained univerally) gave many glimpses of the great author; but the improvement of Anatomy in our times, and the help we have by Microscopes of viewing more thoroughly the curious formation of the parts, sets us in a much better light, and raises our admiration higher. The consideration hereof may afford excellent and convincing arguments against the growing atheism of our age, and may prevail more than those of a metaphysical nature on the Scepticks or half-witted Philosophers amongst us; and I doubt not, but by a Macænas that may encourage here, a set of ingenious Anatomists, the learned Mr Boyle's noble design in his Lectures might be completed. I confess, I have sometimes thought of publishing a tract, against the Epicurean sect, that has lain by me for some years, about the Origin of Man; (before I shall those I have promised about the uses and distempers of the parts of the eye) and I question not but the argument, with the fore-mentioned assistance, might be so managed as to make atheism as ridiculous as those excellent Prelates, and others of our times, have done superstition and idolatry. I could wish, in order hereunto, that Anatomical studies were encouraged and brought to the greatest perfection, and the description and uses of all the parts accurately set forth; and as you have taken a great deal of pains in this treatise, so I could wish (wherein I hope you will excuse the liberty of friendship) that there might be a further progress in the graphical description of the muscles, and that their admirable series fibrarum (as they serve to so many several motions of the body) were delineated in the Mathematical method of the learned Steno, if any Taille Douce can reach it.

[E] Of Holt in Norfolk. This Mr Hobart was an eminent Royalist in the late civil wars; he was forced from his paternal seat, upon it's being discovered that he was one of those Norfolk gentlemen that intended an insurrection in favour of the King; a party of soldiers were sent to Holt to take him, who were very industrious so to do: he was three days concealed by Anthony Riches, a Currier in Holt, in the top of an out-house where he laid his firing; and after that,

narrowly

(1) Ophthalmog. p. 1. §. 1.

(2) Cap. xvii. p. 103, & seq. third edit. Lond. 1705; 8vo.

(4) Page 205.

(5) Observat. Anatomica de Oculorum & Narium Vasis.

Common-Pleas, in the reign of King James I, and related to the honourable family of that name, at Blicking in the said county; she was a woman of excellent sense and great virtue, highly valued and loved in every relation of life. Our author died September the fourth, 1704, aged sixty-two years, at Town-Malling in Kent, where he lies interred. He left three children, Mary, Henry, and Hannah. Mary, married to Thomas Bromfield, M.D. of London; Hannah, to Denny Martin, Gent. of Looze in Kent; and Henry, now Rector of Holt, and Chaplain in ordinary to His Majesty.

narrowly escaped them as he went to London; but getting thither safely, he let himself as a servant to a Shoemaker in Turnstile, Holbourn, who was made privy to his man's circumstances. He was once near being taken up on suspicion in the way of his business, as he was fitting a wife of one of Oliver's Colonels with a pair of shoes, observing he had a very white hand, she could not forbear saying, she feared he was some cavalier rogue in disguise, being sure those hands never handled shoe-maker's wax; upon which, he confessed to her good Ladyship, that he was a very idle fellow, and not being able to settle to the working part of his trade, his master wholly employed him to carry out shoes; and so he was dismissed without further examination.—At the Restoration he carried his master with him to Holt, and maintained him as long as he lived. N

BROUNCKER, or BROUNCKER (Sir WILLIAM) Lord Viscount of Castle-Lyons, in Ireland, and the first President of the Royal Society, was the son of Sir William Brouncker, Knt. [A], and born about the year 1620 (a). What place he was educated at we cannot learn. But he applied himself with so much diligence and success, to the study of the Mathematicks, that he arrived to great perfection in that branch of useful knowledge. On the twenty-third of June 1646, he was created Doctor of Physick at Oxford (b). In April 1660, he subscribed, among many others of the Nobility and Gentry, a Declaration, wherein General Monk was acknowledged the restorer of the laws and privileges of these nations (c). Before the forming of the Royal Society, he was one of those ingenious persons, of which the assemblies that gave rise to it consisted (d). And when it was incorporated by charter, in the fourteenth of King Charles II (e), he was nominated the first President of that illustrious Society (f). In this station he continued about fifteen years [B]; and was of great service, as well as a considerable ornament, to the Society, by his learning and experience. He enjoyed at the same time the following places of honour and profit; namely, the office of Chancellor to Queen Catharine, and the keeping of her Great Seal: he was also one of the Commissioners for executing the Office of Lord High-Admiral; and Master of St Catharine's Hospital near the Tower of London. This last he obtained in 1681, after a long suit at law, between him and Sir Robert Atkins, one of the Justices of the Common-Pleas, concerning the right of the same (g). Tho' he was a learned and ingenious person, there are but these few things extant under his name, viz. 'Experiments of the recoiling of Guns (b)'. 'An Algebraical Paper upon the Squaring of the Hyperbola (i)'. 'Several Letters to Dr James Usher, Archbishop of Armagh,' printed at the end of that Primate's life, by Dr R. Parr. He died at his house in St James's-street, Westminster, April the fifth 1684, aged sixty-four years; and was buried the fourteenth of the same month, in a little vault, which he had caused to be made in the middle of the choir, belonging to the Hospital of St Catharine abovementioned (k). He was succeeded in his honour by his younger brother Henry [C].

[A] Was the son of Sir William Brouncker, Kt.] This Sir William (who was son of Sir Henry Brouncker, President of Munster in Ireland, by Anne his wife, sister of (*) Henry Lord Morley) was Commissary-General of the Munsters in the expedition against the Scots in 1639; and, afterwards, one of the Privy-chamber to King Charles I, and Vice-Chamberlain to Prince Charles. On the 1st of November, 1642, he was created Doctor of the Civil Law at Oxford; and, the 12th of September, 1645, made Viscount of Castle Lyons in Ireland. He died in Wadham-College about the middle of November following, and was buried the 20th of the same month, in the cathedral of Christ-Church in Oxford. Winefride, his widow, daughter of William Leigh, of Newnham in Warwickshire, died the 20th of July 1649, and was buried by her husband. Many years after a large marble-stone was laid over their graves, and in the wall near it was erected a splendid monument of alabaster with their statues sitting, both leaning on a table that stands between them (1).

[B] In this station he continued about fifteen years.] And, as Bishop Spratt observes (2), 'This office was annually renewed to him by election, out of the true judgment, which the Society made of his great abilities in all Natural, and especially Mathematical Knowledge.'

[C] By his younger brother Henry.] Who was created Doctor of Physick June 23, 1646; and dying about the 4th of January 1687, was buried at Richmond in Surrey, where there is a monument over his grave (3).

BROWN (ROBERT) an English Divine, of the XVIth, and beginning of the XVIIth century; and a famous Schismatick, from whom the sect of the Brownists derived it's name. He was descended of an antient and worshipful family, says Fuller (a), (one whereof founded a fair hospital in Stamford (b) and was nearly allied to the Lord-Treasurer Cecil. He was the son of Anthony Brown, of Tolthorp in Rutlandshire, Esq; (*) (tho' born at Northampton, according to (†) Mr Collier) and grandson of Francis Brown, whom King Henry VIII, in the eighteenth year of his reign, privileged by charter to wear his cap in the presence of himself, his heirs, or any of his nobles, and not to uncover but at his own pleasure; which charter was confirmed by Act of Parliament. Robert Brown studied Divinity at Cambridge, Fuller thinks in Corpus Christi College, but Mr Collier (c) says he was of Bennet, and was afterwards a schoolmaster in Southwark (ll). He was soon discovered

(a) Wood's Fasti, Vol. II. edit. 1721, col. 25, 56. That he was born in 1620, I gather from hence: because Mr Wood tells us, he was 25 years old at the time of his father's decease, in 1645; col. 25.

(b) Ibid. col. 56.

(c) Bishop Kennet's Register and Chronicle, &c. Lond. 1728, fol. p. 120, 121.

(d) Ibid. p. 863.

(e) Anno 1662, See Bp. Spratt's Hist. of the Royal Society, second edit. p. 134.

(f) Ibid. p. 134, &c.

(*) There is no such person mentioned by Sir W. Dugdale in his Baronage, Vol. II. p. 307.

(a) Fuller's Ch. Hist. B. ix. p. 166.

(b) Camd Britan. in Lincolnshire.

(*) Ant. Wood says he was the son of a Knight. Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. p. 341.

(†) Collier's Great Historical Dict. Vol. I. article Brownists. Fuller, ut supra.

(g) Wood, ubi supra, col. 56, 57.

(b) Published in Bishop Spratt's Hist. of the Royal Society, Lond. 1702, second edit. p. 233, &c.

(i) Published in the Philosophical Transactions, No. XXXIV, p. 645. and in Lowthorp's Abridgment, Vol. I. p. 10, &c.

(k) Wood, ubi supra, col. 57.

(1) Wood's Fasti, Vol. II. edit. 1721, col. 25.

(2) Ubi supra, p. 433.

(3) Wood, ubi supra, col. 57.

(c) Collier's Eccl. Hist. Vol. II. p. 581.

(ll) Collier's D. & C. ut supra. Ecclesie Primitiva Notitia, in the Index Hæreticus, p. 16.

discovered by Dr Still, Master of Trinity-College, to have somewhat extraordinary in him that would prove a great disturbance to the Church. Brown soon verified what the Doctor foretold, for he fell into Cartwright's opinions, in which however having discovered some defects, he resolved to refine upon his scheme, and to produce something more perfect of his own. Accordingly, about the year 1580, he began to inveigh openly against the discipline and ceremonies of the Church of England, and soon shewed, that he intended to go much farther than Cartwright had ever done (*). In his discourses the Church government was Antichristian, her Sacraments clogged with superstition; the Liturgy had a mixture of Popery and Paganism in it; and the Mission of the Clergy, was no better than that of Baal's Priests in the Old Testament. He first preached at Norwich, in 1581, where the Dutch having a numerous congregation, many of them inclined to Anabaptism, and therefore the more disposed to entertain any new resembling opinion, he made his first essay upon them, and having made some progress amongst them, and raised himself a character for zeal and sanctity, he then began to infect his own countrymen, for which purpose he called in the assistance of one Richard Harrison, a country schoolmaster (d), and they formed Churches out of both nations, but mostly of the English. He instructed his audience, that the Church of England was no true Church, that there was little of Christ's institution in the publick ministrations, and that all good Christians were obliged to separate from those impure assemblies; that their only way was to join him and his disciples, among whom all was pure and unexceptionable, evidently inspired by the Spirit of God, and refined from all alloy and prophanation (e). These discourses prevailed on the audience, and his disciples, now called Brownists, formed a society, and made a total defection from the Church, refusing to join any congregation in any publick office of worship. Brown being convened before Dr Freake, Bishop of Norwich, and other Ecclesiastical Commissioners; he not only maintained his schism, to justify which he had also wrote a book, but he misbehaved himself to the Court, upon which he was committed to the custody of the Sheriff of Norwich; but his relation, the Lord Treasurer Burghley, imputing his error and obstinacy, to zeal, rather than malice, interceeded to have him charitably persuaded out of his opinions, and released. To this end, he wrote the following letter to the Bishop of Norwich, which procured his enlargement [A]. After this his Lordship ordered Brown up to London, and recommended him to Archbishop Whitgift for his instruction and counsel, in order to his amendment; but Brown left the kingdom, and settled at Middleburgh in Zealand, where he and his followers, obtained leave of the States, to worship God in their own way, and form a church according to their own model, which was drawn in a book published by Brown at Middleburgh in 1582, and called a Treatise of Reformation, without staying for any Man, and of which we shall give an account hereafter. What stay Brown made at Middleburgh, is not precisely known, but that he was in England in 1585, is very certain, for in that year he was cited to appear before Archbishop Whitgift, to answer to certain matters contained in a book by him published; but what this was we are not informed. The Archbishop however, a mild and moderate Prelate, by force of reasoning, brought Brown at last to a tolerable compliance with the Church of England, and having dismissed him, the Lord Treasurer Burghley, sent him to his father in the country, with a letter to recommend him to his favour and countenance. It is from this letter, which see in note [B], that

(*) See the article CARTWRIGHT (THOMAS).

(d) Fuller and Collier, ubi supra.

(e) Heylyn's Hist. of Presbyt. l. vii.

[A] Wrote the following Letter (*) to the Bishop of Norwich, which procured his enlargement.] viz.

[B] It is from this letter, which see in note [B].

AFTER my very hearty recommendations to your Lordship; whereas, I understand that one Brown a preacher, is by your Lordship and others of the ecclesiastical commission, committed to the custody of the Sheriff of Norfolk, where he remains a prisoner, for some matter of offence uttered by him by way of preaching, wherein I perceive by sight of some Letters written by certain godly preachers in your Lordship's diocese he hath been dealt with, and by them dissuaded from that course he hath taken. Forasmuch, as he is my kinsman, if he be son to him whom I take him to be, and that his error seemeth to proceed of zeal rather than of malice, I do therefore wish he were charitably conferred with, and reformed; which course I pray your Lordship may be taken with him, either by your Lordship, or such as your Lordship shall assign for that purpose. And in case there shall not follow thereof such success, as may be to your liking, that then you would be content to permit him to repair hither to London, to be further dealt with as I shall take order for upon his coming, for which purpose I have written a Letter to the Sheriff, if your Lordship shall like thereof. And so I bid your Lordship heartily farewell. From the court at Westminster, this 21st of April, 1581.

Your Lordship's ever loving friend,

W. B.

AFTER my very hearty recommendations; understanding that your son Robert Brown had been sent for up by my Lord Bishop of Canterbury to answer to such matters as he was to be charged withal, contained in a book made by him, and published in print (as it was thought) by his means; I thought good, considering he was your son, and of my blood, to send unto my Lord of Canterbury in his behalf, that he might find what reasonable favour he could shew him; before whom I perceive he hath answered in some good sort; and altho' I think he will not deny the making of the book, yet by no means will he confesse to be acquainted with the printing of it. He hath besides yielded unto his Lordship such further contentment, as he is contented (the rather at my motion) to discharge him; and therefore for that he purposeth to repair to you, I have thought good to accompanie him with these my letters, and to pray you for this cause, or any his former dealings, not to withdraw from him your fatherly love and affection, not doubting but with time he will be fully recovered, and withdraw from the reliques of some fond opinions of his, which will be the better done, if he be dealt withal in some kind, and temperate manner. And so I bid you heartily farewell. From my house near the Savoy this eighth of October 1585.

Your loving friend and cousin,

WILLIAM BURGHLEY.

*) Extant in Fuller's Church Hist. ut supra.

that we have gathered this circumstance of his life. And from another letter of the Lord Treasurer's in note [C], we also learn, that Brown's errors had sunk so deep in him, as not to be so easily rooted out as was imagined, and that he soon relapsed into his former opinions and heterodoxies, and shewed himself so incorrigible, that his good old father resolved to own him for his son, no longer than his son owned the Church of England for his mother; and Brown choosing rather to part with his aged sire, than his new schism, he was discharged the family. When gentleness was found ineffectual, severity was next practised, and Brown, after wandering up and down, and enduring great hardships, at length went to live at Northampton, where, industriously labouring to promote his sect, Lindfell, Bishop of Peterborough, sent him a citation to come before him, which Brown refused to obey; for which contempt he was excommunicated (f). And this it was which proved the means of his reformation, for he was so deeply affected with the solemnity of this censure, that he made his submission, moved for absolution, and received it, and from that time continued in the communion of the Church, tho' it was not in his power to close the chasm, or heal the wound he had made in it [D]. It was towards the year 1590, that Brown renounced his principles of separation, and was soon after preferred to the Rectory of a church in Northamptonshire (g). Fuller does not believe that Brown ever formally recanted his opinions, either by word or writing, as to the main points of his doctrine; but that his promise of a general compliance with the Church of England, improved by the countenance of his patron and kinsman, the Earl of Exeter, prevailed upon the Archbishop, and procured this extraordinary favour for him. He adds, that Brown allowed a salary for one to discharge his cure, and tho' he opposed his parishioners in judgment, yet agreed in taking their tythes (b). Brown was a man of good parts and some learning, but was of a nature imperious and uncontrollable, so far from the Sabbatarian strictness, afterwards espoused by some of his followers, that he rather seemed a libertine therein. In a word, says our author (i), he has a wife with whom he never lived, and a church in which he never preached, tho' he received the profits thereof; and as all the scenes of his life were stormy and turbulent, so was his end; for the constable of his parish, requiring somewhat roughly, the payment of certain rates, his passion moved him to blows, of which the constable complaining to Justice St John, he rather inclined to pity, than punish him; but Brown, at fair words also disgusted, behaved with so much insolence, that he was sent to Northampton goal, on a feather bed in a cart, being very infirm, and aged about eighty years; where he soon after sickened and died, anno 1630 (k), after boasting, that he had been committed to thirty-two prisons, in some of which he could not see his hand at noon-day. This was the life and tragical end, of the famous Schismatic, Robert Brown, whose

(f) Collier's Ecl. Hist. Vol. II. p. 582.

(g) Collier, ut supra.

(b) Fuller's Ch. Hist. B. ix. p. 168.

(i) Fuller, ubi supra.

(k) Heylyn's Hist. Presbyt. Biblioth. Scriptor. Ecles. Anglic. Præfat. Fuller and Collier, ut supra.

Mr Collier places this circumstance of the Lord Treasurer's sending Brown home to his father, with his letter of recommendation, immediately after his being released from his confinement at Norwich, in the year 1581; and both he and Fuller seem to be mistaken in another circumstance also, for they say, that Brown went first to Zealand before he began preaching at Norwich; if this be true, he must have been twice abroad, for it is certain, he was there in 1582, when he published the book above-mentioned at Middleburgh; it seems however, more probable that he did not go there at all, 'till 1581, after he had been released from his confinement at Norwich.

[C] Another Letter of the Lord Treasurer's.

'AFTER my very hearty commendations; I perceive by your Letters, that you have little or no hopes of your son's conformity, as you had when you received him into your house, and therefore you seem desirous that you might have liberty to remove him further off from you, as either to Stamford or some other place, which I know no cause, but you may very well and lawfully do, where I wish he might better be persuaded to conform himself for his own good, and your's and his friends comfort. And so I very heartily bid you farewell. From the Court this 17th of February, 1585.'

Your very loving friend and cousin,

WILLIAM BURGHELEY:

[D] It was not in his power to heal the wound he had made in the Church. The revolt of Brown was far from being followed with the dissolution of the sect, on the contrary it daily increased, insomuch that in 1592, Sir Walter Raleigh, in a speech which he delivered in the House of Commons, computes no less than twenty thousand followers of it. This speech was made upon occasion of a scheme which was then on foot, for transporting all the Brownists, and which actually produced a bill in Parliament for explaining a branch in an act to retain the Queen's subjects in due obedience. But before the bill was committed, many speeches passed in the house, through the many imperfections in the preamble and body of the said bill: for it pretended a punishment only of the Brownists and other sectaries; but, alledging nothing against them in particular, contained some ensnaring clauses that might comprehend more innocent persons (1). As the speeches before Sir Walter Raleigh's, on this occasion, are not rehearsed, we can only guess at them by what is preserved of his; who said, 'in my conceit, the Brownists are worthy to be rooted out of a commonwealth, but what danger may grow to ourselves if this law pass, were fit to be considered. For it is to be feared, that men not guilty will be included in it; and that law is hard, that taketh life, and sendeth into banishment, where men's intentions shall be judged by a Jury, and they shall be judges what another means. But that law which is against a fact, is but just, and punish the fact as feverally as you will. If two or three thousand Brownists meet at sea, at whose charge shall they be transported, or whither will you send them? I am sorry for it, but I am afraid there are near twenty thousand of them in England; and when they are gone, who shall maintain their wives and children (2)?' A committee was therefore appointed to revise and correct this bill; among whom Sir Walter Raleigh was the foremost named; who, after many alterations, and debates, moved it might be read to the house for their approbation: and after many arguments and conferences, being read the third time, as were also the additions and amendments, it passed, upon the question. Accordingly the laws were executed with great severity on the Brownists, their books were prohibited by the Queen's orders, and their persons imprisoned, and many of them hanged (3). The ecclesiastical commission, and the Star-Chamber, in fine, distressed them to such a degree, that they resolved to quit their country. Accordingly many families retired to Holland and settled at Amsterdam, where they formed a Church (*).

(1) Life of Sir Walter Raleigh, by Mr Oldys, p. 68.

(2) Townshend's Histor. Collect. p. 76. Dewes's Journal, fol. 517. Life of Sir Walter Raleigh, by Mr Oldys, p. 69. Happy Future State of England, fol. 28.

(3) Fuller's Ch. Hist. B. ix. p. 167. Stow's Chronicle, p. 697.

(*) See note [F].

[F] Wife

writings, and those of other authors, both for and against Brownism, come next under our consideration [E]; as also the particular tenets of the Brownists, their progress and end, which

we

[E] Whose writings, and those of other authors, both for and against Brownism, come next under our consideration. The writings and controversies which the separation of the Brownists occasioned, are many; the chief of Brown's own works is a small thin quarto, which contains the model and seeds of Brownism, in three pieces, printed at Middleburgh in 1582. The title of the first is, A Treatise of Reformation without tarrying for any, and of the wickedness of those preachers which will not reform themselves and their charge, because they will tarry till the Magistrate command and compel them. By me, Robert Brown. The drift of this piece is to spirit up the people to separate themselves from the Church and follow him; and also to exclude the Civil Magistrate from having any authority over ecclesiastical persons or affairs.—The second piece is, A Treatise upon the 23d chapter of St Matthew, both for an order of studying and

handling the Scriptures, and also for avoiding the Popish disorders, and ungodly communion of all false Christians, and especially of wicked preachers and hirelings. In this piece he exclaims against the abuse of Tongues in preaching, that is against the use of Hebrew, Greek, or Latin, in sermons: Also against the Use of Logick and Rhetorick, Tropes, Figures, &c. Against disorderly preaching at Paul's Cross in London, or before the Queen, the Bishops, or Noblemen; and against parish Preachers and hired Lecturers.—The title of the third piece is, A Book which sheweth the life and manners of all true Christians, and how unlike they are unto Turks and Papists, and Heathen folk. Also the points and parts of all Divinity, that is, of the revealed will and word of God, are declared by their several definitions and divisions, following. Every Page is divided into Columns, thus:

| The State of Christians. | The State of Heathens. | Definitions. | Divisions. |
|---|---|---|--|
| 1. Wherefore are we called the People of God and Christians? Because that by a willing Covenant made with our God, we are under the government of God and Christ, and thereby lead a godly and Christian life. | 1. Wherefore are the Heathen forsaken of God, and be the cursed People of the world? Because they forsake or refuse the Lord's Covenant and government; and therefore they lead an ungodly and worldly life. | 1. Christians are a company or number of believers, which by a willing Covenant made with their God, are under the Government of God, and Christ, and keep his Laws in one Holy Communion: Because they are redeemed by Christ, unto holiness and happiness for ever, for which they were fallen by the sin of Adam. | Christians which should lead a godly life, by knowing God, and the duties of Godliness. |
| 2. How should we lead a godly and Christian life? By knowing God, and the duties of Godliness; and by keeping those duties. | 2. How do the Heathen lead an ungodly and worldly life? By ignorance of God, and deceiving themselves; and by sinning and faulting to their own destruction. | 2. The knowledge of God and Godliness, is a right and steadfast judgment in his Godhead and most blessed state; and of his whole will in his word, &c. | By keeping those duties. |

This is a very curious and well wrote piece; the first column, containing the state of Christians, is orthodox, and a pretty system of Divinity, shewing the several points of the Christian faith, and the several duties and offices of Religion. The Definitions, in the third column, are very clear and expressive; but the second column, containing the Heathen State, and also the Antichristian State, as it is afterwards called, is entirely levelled against the Church, as to its discipline and form of government, which it reviles in bitter terms, and, at the same time, defends the separation of the Brownists. Some part of it is also called the Jewish State; and the whole contains 185 queries, and answers.

In the year 1596, was published another piece in defence of the Brownists, under the title of, A true Confession of the Faith, and humble acknowledgement of the allegiance which we, her Majesty's subjects, falsely called Brownists, do bold towards God, and yield to her Majesty and all other that are over us in the Lord. Set down in articles or positions, for the better and more easy understanding of those that shall read it; and published for the clearing ourselves from those unchristian slanders of Heresy, Schism, Pride, Obstinacy, Disloyalty, Sedition, &c. which by our adversaries are in all places given out against us. The preface to this piece is full of complaints of the severe usage to the Brownists; and the Confession of Faith itself, is no other than that of every Protestant; but what regards the Church, agrees only with the principles of their separation, laid down from numberless texts of Scripture. In the last page of this work, which is a thin octavo pamphlet, we have an account of their opinion concerning the Lord's Prayer, in these words. 'Finally, whereas we are much slandered, as if we denied or disliked that form of prayer commonly called the Lord's Prayer, we thought it needful here also concerning it, to make known, that we believe and acknowledge it to be a ' most absolute and most excellent form of Prayer, such as no men or angels can set down the like. And that it was taught and appointed by our Lord Jesus Christ, not that we should be tied to the use of those very words, but that we should, according to that rule, make all our requests and thanksgivings unto God; forasmuch as it is a perfect form and pattern, containing in it plain and sufficient directions for prayer upon all occasions, and necessities that have been, are, or shall be, to the Church of God, or any member thereof to the end of the world.' This opinion they ground upon the following passages of the New Testament, among many others, Matth. vi. 9. After this manner therefore pray ye: Our father which, &c. Luke xi. 1, 2. One of his disciples said unto him, Lord, teach us to pray, as John also taught his disciples. And he said unto them, when ye pray, say, Our father, &c. (5). There was also a Confession of the Faith of the Brownists published in the Year 1602, by the learned Mr Ainsworth and Mr Johnson. There was likewise an Apology for the Brownists published by Mr Robinson, one of their Ministers.

(5) True Confession of the Faith of the Brownists, article 45.

In the year 1612 appeared a very severe piece against the Brownists, called The profane Schism of the Brownists, or Separatists; with the impiety, dissensions, lewd and abominable vices, of that impure sect; discovered by four of their members lately returned from the company of Mr Johnson, into the bosom of the Church of England. If this be a true picture of the Brownists, they must have been a very profligate set of people. There were some very learned men who took great pains to confute the Brownists. Dr Hall, Bishop of Exeter, wrote with great strength of reason against them, in a piece called, A common apology for the Church of England, against the unjust challenges of the over just sect, commonly called Brownists, wherein the grounds and differences of the separation are largely discussed. The famous and learned Dr John Rainolds wrote A Defence of

the

we shall take a view of in note [F].

the English Liturgy against Robert Brown's schismatical book, &c (*). Dr Fulke also wrote very learnedly against the Brownists; as did Mr Dayrel; Bredwell in his Dedication of Glover the Brownist; Giffard's Treatise of English Donatists, and his Reply to Barrow and Greenwood, &c.

[F] The particular tenets of the Brownists, their progress and end, we shall take a view of in the note. In the year 1599, there was a long controversy carried on in print, between Francis Johnson a Brownist, and H. Jacob, about some of the tenets of the Brownists. The whole of this was published together at Middleburgh, the same year, in a small quarto pamphlet, consisting of 91 pages, under the title of, A defence of the churches and ministry of England, against the reasons and objections of Maister Francis Johnson, and others of the separation commonly called Brownists. In two treatises. Published especially for the benefit of those in these parts of the Low Countries. In one of these treatises is a recapitulation of all the chief objections raised by the Brownists against the Church of England; and from which we may gather a much more complete account of the tenets and doctrines of this famous sect, than from any thing else ever published concerning it; and it is truly authentick, because wrote by a Brownist, then one of the leaders of that sect, we shall therefore give it a place here, not for the same reason for which the author published it, which was to shew the black constitution of the Church, as he terms it, and the Antichristian enormities still remaining and practised therein; but to give the reader, at one view, the whole system of Brownism, many particulars of which, but for this recapitulation, might have remained unknown, and seem indeed to have been so to all those who have hitherto wrote concerning this sect. It will therefore be the more acceptable to the reader, since it is no where extant, that we know of, but in the piece in which it was originally published, and which perhaps few, if any, of our readers, may at this time meet with. It is called, Antichristian Abominations yet retheyned in England.

1. The confusion of all sorts of people in the body of their (the English) Church; even the most polluted, and their seed being members thereof. It then enumerates all the Officers and Ministers of the Church, from the Archbishop, down even to the Sexton and Organ Blower, all of them of the Antichristian and viperous generation. 2. Their ministrations of the Word, Sacraments, and Government of the Church by virtue of the officers aforesaid. The Brownists held, that the evil life of the Minister took away the efficacy of the Sacraments. The titles of Primate, Metropolitan, Lords, Grace, Lordship, &c. ascribed to the Prelates. 3. The inferior Prelates swearing obedience to the metropolitan Sees of Canterbury and York. 4. The inferior Ministers when they enter into the ministry, promising obedience to the Prelates, and their ordinances; and when they are inducted to benefices, confirming it with their oath. 5. The Deacon's and Priest's presentation to a Lord Bishop, by an Archdeacon. 6. Their receiving of orders of the Prelates, or their suffragans. 7. Their pontifical, or book of consecrating Bishops, and of ordering Priests and Deacons, taken out of the Pope's pontifical, where their abuse of Scripture to that end, their Collects, Epistles, &c. may be seen. 8. Their making, and being made, Priests, with blasphemy; the Prelates saying to whom they make Priests, Receive ye the Holy Ghost, whose sins ye forgive, they are forgiven, &c. 9. Their confounding of Civil and Ecclesiastical Offices, and authorities in ecclesiastical persons. 10. Their retaining and using in their publick worship, the apocryphal books, which have in them divers errors, untruths, blasphemies, and contradiction to the canonical Scriptures. 11. Their stinted Prayers and Liturgy, taken out of the Pope's Mass book, with the same order of Psalms, Lessons, Collects, Pater Nosters, Epistles, Gospels, Versicles, Responses, &c. The Brownists, in general, rejected all set forms of prayer, and held, that the Lord's Prayer ought not to be used as a prayer, in it's present form of words, being only intended as a model whercon our extempore prayers are to be formed (G). 12. The Cross in Baptism. 13. The Hallowed Font, questions to the Infants at Baptism. 14. The

Godfathers and Godmothers promising that the child doth believe, forsake the Devil and all his works, &c. 15. Womens baptising of children; which maintaineth that hereby, that the children are damned, which die unbaptized. They would not allow any children to be baptized, whose parents were not members of the Church, or of such as did not take sufficient care of the education of those formerly baptized. 16. Their boweling of the Sick, and ministring the Communion to one alone. 17. The ministring it, not with the words of Christs institution, but with others taken out of the Pope's Portuis. 18. They sell that sacrament for two-pence to all comers. 19. The receiving of it kneeling, which maketh it an idol, and nourisheth that hereby of receiving their Maker, of worshipping it, &c. The reason of our kneeling at the Sacrament, is explained in the Rubrick at the end of the Communion Service, for which purpose it was inserted there in the reign of Edward VI. 20. Their ring in Marriage, making it a sacramental sign, and Marriage an ecclesiastical action: thereby nourishing the Popish heresy, that Matrimony is a Sacrament. They looked upon matrimony as a political contract, and therefore said, that the confirmation of it ought to come from the Civil Magistrate; and hence they condemned the solemn celebration of marriages in the Church. 21. Their praying over the dead, making it also a part of the Minister's duty, and nourishing the heresy of prayer for the dead. 22. Their churching or purifying of women, then also abusing that Scripture, The Sun shall not burn them by day, nor the Moon by night. 23. *Their Gang week, * and praying then over the corn and grass.* At the time of the Reformation, when processions, which made a part of the solemnities at this season, were abolished, by reason of the abuse of them, yet, for retaining the perambulation of the circuits of parishes, it was enjoined (7), 'that the people should once a year, at the accustomed time, with the Minister and substantial men of the parish, walk round the parish as usual, and at their return to church, make the common prayers: provided that the Minister, at certain convenient places, shall admonish the people to give thanks to God for the increase and abundance of the fruits of the earth, repeating the 103d Psalm; at which time also the Minister shall inculcate this and such like sentences: Cursed be he that removeth his neighbour's land-mark.' No such prayers indeed have been since appointed: But there is an Homily, divided into four parts; the three first to be used on the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday; and the fourth upon the day when the parish make their procession. 24. Their forbidding of Marriage in Gang-week, in Advent, in Lent, and on all the Ember Days; which the Apostle calleth a Doctrine of Devils, 1 Tim. iv. 1, 2, 3. 25. Their Saints, Angels, and Apostles days, with their prescript service. 26. Their Fasts, and abstaining from flesh, on their Eves, on Fridays, Saturdays, Ember-Days, and all Lent through. 27. Their dispensations from the Prelates courts of Faculties, to eat flesh at these times; which dispensations also have this wholesome clause in them, sanã conscientia, that is, with a safe conscience: plainly shewing that they make it a matter of conscience. This is another Doctrine of Devils, noted in the Scripture before alledged, 1 Tim. iv. 28. Their dispensations in like manner to marry in the times among the forbidden, which are noted before. 29. Licences from the same authority, to marry in places exempt. 30. Dispensations also from thence, for boys and ignorant fools to have benefices. 31. Dispensations also for non-residents. 32. For having two, three, four, or more benefices, even tot, quot, that is to say, as many as a man will have and can get. 33. Tolerations. 34. Patronages of, and presentations to, benefices, with buying and selling of advowsons. 35. Their institutions into benefices by the Prelates, their inductions, proxies, &c. 36. Their Suspensions, Absolutions, Degradations, Deprivations, &c. 37. The Prelate's Chancellor's, and Commissarie's Courts, having power to excommunicate alone, and to absolve. 38. Their Penance in a white sheet. 39. Their commutation of Penance, and absolving one man for another. 40. The Prelate's Confirmation, or Bishopping of children, to assure them of God's favour, by a sign of man's deaving. 41. The standing at the Gospel. 42. The putting off the cap, and making a leg when the word Jesus is read. 43. The

(6) Stoop, or Stubbs's Religion of the Hollanders. Alexander Ross's View of all Religions.

(*). Gang-Week, what we call Rogation-Week the word Ian is Saxon, and signifies a walking or going about and was particularly applied to this week, from the custom observed at the time of walking the bounds of a parish, still in use amongst us, under the name of Processioning. Hence also the Gang-flower, or Rogation-flower i. e. Flos Ambulatorius, so called, because it flowers about this time.

(7) Injunction. Q. Eliz. 18, 19.

The ring of seals at burials. They objected against bells, because they pretended they were consecrated to the service of idolatry (8). 44. Bead-men at burials, and lired mourners in mourning apparel. 45. The kneeling and mourning of churches and hearers with black, at burials. 46. Their absolving the dead, dying excommunicate, before they can have, as they say, Christian burial. 47. The Idol temples. 48. The Pops vestments, as Roccus, horned Cap, Tippet, the Surplice in Parish Churches, and Cope in Cathedral Churches. 49. The Visitations of the Lord Bishops, and Archdeacons. 50. The Prelates lordly dominion, revenues, and retinue. 51. The Priests maintenance by tythes, Christmas offerings, &c. 52. The oaths ex officio in their Ecclesiastical Courts, making men swear to accuse themselves. 53. The Church-warden's oath to present to the Prelates, all the offences, faults, and defaults, committed in their parishes, against their articles and injunctions. 54. The Prelates ruling of the Church, by the Pope's cursed Canon Law. 55. Finally, their imprisoning, and banishing, such as renounce and refuse to witness these abominations aforesaid, and the rest yet retained among them — They might well find fault with the Church for this last article, since they had smarted so severely under it.

From the same curious piece, we also learn the texts of Scripture, upon which they grounded their reasons of separation. They are these.

Gen. vi. 2 Then the sons of God saw the daughters of men. Levit. xx. 22, 26. Ye shall therefore keep all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them; that the land whither I bring you to dwell therein, spew you not out. — And ye shall be holy unto me, for I the Lord am holy, and have severed you from other people, that ye should be mine. Exra vi. 21. And the children of Israel which were come again out of captivity, and all such as had separated themselves unto them from the filthiness of the Heathen of the land, to seek the Lord God of Israel, did eat. — Isa. lii. 11. Depart ye, depart ye, go ye out from thence, touch no unclean thing, go ye out of the midst of her; be ye clean, that bear the vessels of the Lord. — Jer. 1. 8. Remove out of the midst of Babylon, and go forth out of the land of the Chaldeans, and be as clean as the he-goats before the flocks. — Jer. li. 6, 45. Flee out of the midst of Babylon, and deliver every man his soul; be ye not cut off in her iniquity; for this is the time of the Lord's vengeance; he will render unto her a recompence. — My people go ye out of the midst of her, and deliver ye every man his soul from the fierce anger of the Lord. — Hosea iv. 15. Though thou Israel play the harlot; yet let not Judah offend, &c. — Amos iv. 4, 5. Come to Bethel and transgress, at Gilgal multiply transgression; and bring your sacrifices every morning, and your tythes after three years. And offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving with a leaven, and proclaim and publish the free-offerings; for this liketh you, O ye children of Israel, saith the Lord God. — Acts ii. 40. And with many other words did he testify and exhort, saying, save yourselves from this untoward generation. — Acts xix. 9. But when diverse were hardened, and believed not, but spake evil of that before the multitude, he departed from them, and separated the disciples, &c. — 2 Cor. vi. 17. Wherefore come ye out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you. — Rev. xviii. 4. And I heard another voice from heaven, saying, Come out of her my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues.

Thus the occasion of the separation of the Brownists, was not for any fault they found with the faith, but only with the discipline or form of government of the other Churches in England. They equally condemned Episcopacy and Presbytery, as to the jurisdiction of Consistories, Classes, and Synods; and therefore they would not join with any other reformed Churches, because they were not sufficiently assured of the sanctity and probity of the members who composed it; and on account of the toleration of sinners, with whom they maintained it an impity to communicate. The form of Church Government they established, was democratical. — When a church was to be gathered, such as desired to be members, made a confession of it, and signed a covenant, by which they obliged themselves to walk together in the order of the Gospel. The whole power of admitting and excluding members, with the decision of all controversies, was lodged in the brotherhood. Their Church-officers were chosen from among themselves, for preaching the word, and taking care of the poor, and separated to their several offices by fasting, prayer, and imposition of hands of some of the brethren. But they did not allow the priesthood to be any distinct order, or to give any indelible character. As the vote of the brotherhood made a man a minister, and gave authority to preach the word and administer the Sacraments amongst them; so the same power could discharge him from his office, and reduce him to a meer Layman again. As they maintained the bounds of a church to be no greater than what would contain as many as could meet together in one place, and join in one Communion, so the power of these officers was prescribed within the same limits. The Minister or Pastor of a church could not administer the Sacrament to another, nor baptize the children of any but those of his own society. Any lay-brother was allowed the liberty of giving a word of exhortation to the people; and it was usual for some of them after sermon to ask questions, and reason upon the doctrines that had been preached. In a word, every church, on the Brownists model, is a body corporate, having full power to do every thing which the good of the community requires, without being accountable to any Classis, Synod, Convocation, or other jurisdiction whatever.

But the model of the Brownists was far from being a new one; for if we compare their principles with those of the ancient Donatists, we shall find them to be the same, as the learned Dr Fulke has proved. The Donatists were the Puritans of their age; they held that the Roman-Catholic Church was prostituted, and was no where to be found but among them who were perfect, wherefore they re-baptized all those that came over to them; for no other Baptism was valid: They held the validity of the Sacraments to depend upon the dignity of the Minister; they disowned the power of the Magistrate to punish Heretics, &c (9). But Brown was not the first that brought Donatism into England, the principles of which, as well as of Brownism, had been adopted here long before, by others, under the different appellations of Puritans, and Separatists. These latter, Hornius telle us (10), were those who, under Edward VI. Elizabeth, and James I. refused to conform to the Church of England, and were first called Puritans, then Separatists, and lastly Nonconformists. The first leader of the Separatists, was Bolton; who, upon quitting the party he had formed, and abjuring his errors, was succeeded by Robert Brown, from whom the Separatists were called Brownists: When Brown, in imitation of Bolton, deserted the sect, he was succeeded by Barrow, who unfortunately made his exit at Tyburn, at the insigation of the Bishops. Their fourth chief was Johnson (author of the piece from whence we have, above, extracted the tenets of Brownism) who, together with Mr Ainsworth, author of the learned Commentary on the Pentateuch, set up a Church at Amsterdam (11), but they differing about some points of discipline, separated, and even went so far as to excommunicate each other (*). Soon afterwards, one Smith set up a Church at Leyden; but he dying, his sect could not long survive him, and Separatism was brought very low when Robinson appeared, and raised it's head. He softened the dogma's of Brown, and set on foot a good understanding among them, but was not able to unite the whole sect. Part of it still adhered to the rigid opinions of their old master, Brown, and part of them followed Robinson, and pretended to steer a middle course between the Brownists and the Church of England, calling themselves Semi-Separatists, but at last, in reality, went further even than the Brownists themselves. The Brownists however, notwithstanding the frequent change of their masters, did, in general, still retain the name they derived from their first leader Brown, and this even after his death several years; for in the Civil Wars in 1640, &c. We read of a mob of 2000 Brownists entering St Paul's church, London (where the High-Commission Court was sitting) and making a great tumult, tearing down the benches, and crying out, no Bishops, no High Commission, &c (12). And in 642, King Charles, in a speech which he made at the head of his forces, then marching towards Shrewsbury, makes particular mention of the Brownists, and that not at all to their honour, 'You shall meet, says his Majesty, with no enemies but traitors, most of them Brownists, Anabaptists, and Atheists; such who desire to destroy both Church and State, and who have already con-

(9) Index Hæreticus, before Ecclesie Primitivæ Notitia, p. 15. Optatus de Schif. Donatistarum.

(10) Hornius. Hist. Eccles. Cent. XVI.

(11) Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, Vol. II. p. 47.

(*) See the article AINSWORTH (HENRY).

(12) Echard's Hist of England, p. 483.

(13) Hist. of the Troubles of Great Britain, by Monteth, p. 115.

(14) Hist. of the Troubles of Great Britain, p. 124.

(15) Collier's Eccles. Hist. Vol. 11. B. ix. p. 229.

(16) Apologetical Narrative, p. 3.

'demned you to ruin for being loyal to us (13).' And the next year the King made it an article in his propositions to the Parliament, 'that a good bill might be framed for the better preserving the book of Common-Prayer from the scorn and violence of Brownists, Anabaptists, and other sectaries (14).' At length, however, the Brownists degenerated into Independents, a party which adopted most of their principles, and were first called Congregationalists, then Independents, from their holding the independency of churches; but it will be necessary to give some further account of this sect, as it is the spawn of that whose author makes the subject of this article. The Independents owed their rise chiefly to Goodwin, Rye, Bridge, Sympson, and Burroughs, five Devines in the reign of King Charles I. who had transported themselves into Holland, for Liberty of Conscience (15). These had profelyted several wealthy merchants and others, who went along with them. The States of Holland gave them a friendly reception, assigned them churches to meet in, and allowed their ministers a competent maintenance. Some of these English refugees settled at Rotterdam, and some at Arnheim in Guelderland. Being thus encouraged by the Dutch government, they set about forming their Church-discipline. And here, to speak in their own language, 'they consulted the Scriptures without any prejudice: they considered the word of God as im- partially as men of flesh and blood are like to do, in any juncture of time; the place they went to, the condition they were in, and the company they went with, affording no temptation to any byas (16).' They asserted, that every church, and congregation, has sufficient power to act and do every thing, relating to religious government, within itself, and is no ways subject or accountable to other churches, or their Deputies. The principles upon which they founded their Church-Government, were, to confine themselves to what the Scriptures prescribed, without paying any regard to the opinions or practice of men; nor to tie themselves down so strictly to their present resolutions, as to leave no room for alterations, upon farther views and enquiry. They steered a middle course between Prebytery and Brownism: the first they accounted too arbitrary and decisive; the other too loose and indeterminate (17). They disallowed parochial and provincial subordination, and formed all their congregations upon a scheme of co-ordinancy; allowing, however, some sort of ceremonious preference to the elder church, but without any addition of authority. As to their Service they prayed publicly for Kings, and all in authority; they read and expounded the Scriptures, and administered the Sacraments of Baptism, and the Lord's Supper. They rejected all learning in order to preach the Gospel; all set forms of Prayer; abhorred tythes as superstitious and judaical (18). Their public officers were Pastors, Teachers, Ruling-Elders, and Deacons. Their Church-Censures lay all within the compass of admonition and excommunication (19).

These Congregationalists, or Independents, took the opportunity occasioned by the Civil War, and the ruin of Episcopacy, to quit Holland, and come over into England, where they began to put in practice their scheme, and gather churches. The Presbyterians complained of this as an encroachment, and insisted that the Independents should come under the Scotch regulation. This the latter refused to comply with, and continued a distinct sect, or faction (20); and, during the Civil Wars, became the most powerful party; and getting to the head of affairs, most of the other sects, which were averse to the Church of England, particularly the Brownists, joined with them, and all of them yielded to lose their former names, in the general one of Independents. H (17) Collier's Eccles. Hist. ut supra.

(18) Index Hæreticus, p. 37.

(19) Apologetical Narrative, p. 8. A. C. Regiminis Synodis ab episcopis porrigi, non potest. Responsio Jo. Norton. 114.

(20) Collier's Eccles. Hist. Vol. 1. p. 830.

B R O W N E (G E O R G E) the first Bishop that embraced and promoted the Reformation in Ireland, was originally an Austin Friar of London (a). He received his academical education in the house of his order, near Halywell in Oxford (b); and becoming eminent for his learning and other good qualities, was made Provincial of the Austin Monks in England. About which time he supplicated the University for the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, namely in 1523; but it doth not appear he was then admitted. He took afterwards the degree of Doctor in Divinity, in some University beyond sea, and was incorporated in the same degree at Oxford, in 1534, and soon after at Cambridge (c). Before that time having read some of Luther's writings, he took a liking to his doctrine; and, among other things, was wont to inculcate into the people, 'That they should make their applications solely to Christ, and not to the Virgin Mary, or the Saints.' King Henry VIII. being informed of this, took him into his favour, and promoted him to the Archbishoprick of Dublin (d). He had the royal assent, March the twelfth 1534-5 (e); was consecrated the nineteenth of the same month, by Thomas Cranmer, Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the Bishops of Rochester and Salisbury (f); and had restitution of the temporalities, the twenty-third following (g). A few months after his arrival into Ireland, the Lord Privy-Seal, Cromwell, signified to him, that His Majesty having renounced the Papal Supremacy in England, it was his Highness's pleasure, that his subjects of Ireland should obey his commands in that respect as in England; and nominated him one of the Commissioners for the execution thereof. The twenty-eighth of November 1535, he acquainted the Lord Cromwell with his success; telling him [A], that he had 'endeavoured, almost

(a) The site of their convent is still known by the name of Austin Friars, in Throckmorton-street.

(b) Where Wadham-college now stands. See Wood's Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. i. p. 116, &c.

(c) Wood's Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. I. col. 678. & Fasti, Vol. I. col. 56.

(d) Sir James Ware's Works, Vol. I. edit. 1739, fol. by Walter Harris, Esq; p. 342, &c.

(e) Rymer, Vol. XIV. p. 560.

(f) Memorials Archbishop Cranmer, by J. Strype Lond. 1694, p. 37.

(g) Rymer, ut supra, p. 561.

[A] He acquainted the Lord Cromwell with his success, &c. In the following letter:

'My most honoured Lord,

'YOUR humble servant receiving your mandate, as one of his Highness's Commissioners, hath endeavoured, almost to the danger and hazard of this temporal life, to procure the Nobility and Gentry of this nation to due obedience, in owing of his Highness their supreme Head as well Spiritual as Temporal, and do find much oppugning therein, especially by my brother of Armagh (1), who hath been the main oppugner, and so hath withdrawn most of his Suffragans and Clergy within his See and jurisdiction. He made a Speech to them, laying a curse on the people whosoever should own his Highness's Supremacy; saying, that isle, as it is in their Irish Chronicles, Insula sacra, belongs to none but the Bishop of Rome, and that it was the Bishop of Rome's pre-

'decessors gave it to the King's ancestors. There be two messengers by the Priests of Armagh, and by that Archbishop, now lately sent to the Bishop of Rome. Your Lordship may inform his Highness, that it is convenient to call a Parliament in this nation, to pass the Supremacy by Act; for they do not much matter his Highness's Commission which your Lordship sent us over. This island hath been for a long time held in ignorance by the Romish Orders; and as for their Secular Orders, they be in a manner as ignorant as the people, being not able to say Mass, or pronounce the words, they not knowing what they themselves say in the Roman tongue: The common people of this isle are more zealous in their blindness, than the Saints and Martyrs were in the truth at the beginning of the Gospel. I send to you, my very good Lord, these things, that your Lordship, and his Highness, may consult what is to be done. It is feared O-Neal will be ordered by the Bishop of Rome, to oppose your Lordship's order from

(1) George Crommer, then Archbishop of Armagh.

‘almost to the danger and hazard of his life, to procure the nobility and gentry of the Irish nation to due obedience, in owning the King their supream Head, as well spiritual as temporal (b).’ In the Parliament which met at Dublin, May 1, 1536, he was very instrumental in having the Act, for the King’s Supremacy over the Church of Ireland, passed [B]: But he met with great and many obstacles in the execution of it [C]. And the Court of Rome left no stone unturned, to prevent any alterations in Ireland, with regard to religious matters. For the Pope sent over a Bull of Excommunication, against all such as had owned, or should own, the King’s Supremacy within that kingdom: as also the form of an oath of obedience [D], to be taken to his Holiness, at confessions. Nay endeavours

(b) Life and Death of George Browne &c. edit. Lond. 1681, 4to, p. 1, 2.

‘from the King’s Highness; for the natives are much in numbers within his power. I do pray the Lord Christ to defend you from your enemies. Dublin 4 Kalend. Decembris 1535.’

[B] He was very instrumental in having the Act, for the King’s Supremacy over the Church of Ireland, passed.] Upon that occasion he made this speech. ‘My Lords and Gentry of this his Majesty’s realm of Ireland, Behold your obedience to your King is the observing of your God and Saviour Christ; for he, that High Priest of our souls, paid tribute to Cæsar (though no Christian). Greater honour then surely is due to your Prince, his Highness the King, and a Christian one. Rome, and her Bishops, in the Fathers days, acknowledged Emperors, Kings, and Princes to be supream over their dominions, nay, Christ’s own Vicars. And it is as much to the Bishop of Rome’s shame, to deny what their precedent Bishops owned. Therefore his Highness claims but what he can justify the Bishop Elutherius gave to St Lucius, the first Christian King of the Britains; so that I shall, without scruple, vote his Highness King Henry my Supream, over Ecclesiastick matters as well as Temporal, and Head thereof, even of both Isles England and Ireland, and that without guilt of conscience, or sin to God, and he who will not pass this Act as I do, is no true Subject to his Highness.’ The other Bishops, and other Lords, were so startled at this speech, that the Act passed, tho’ with great difficulty (2).

(2) Life of G. Browne, &c. p. 3.

[C] But he met with great and many obstacles in the execution of it.] Of which he gave the Lord Cromwell an account in the following letter.

‘Right honourable and my singular good Lord, I Acknowledge my bounden duty to your Lordship’s good will to me, next to my Saviour Christ’s, for the place I now possess; I pray God give me his grace to execute the same to his glory, and his Highness’s honour, with your Lordship’s instructions. The people of this nation be zealous, yet blind and unknowing; most of the Clergy, as your Lordship hath had from me before, being ignorant, and not able to speak right words in the Mass or Liturgy, as being not skilled in the Latin Grammar; so that a bird may be taught to speak with as much sense, as several of them do in this country. These forts, though not scholars, yet are crafty to cozen the poor common people, and to dissuade them from following his Highness’s orders: George (3), my brother of Armagh, doth underhand occasion quarrels, and is not active to execute his Highness’s orders in his diocese. I have observed your Lordship’s Letter of Commission, and do find several of my pupils leave me for so doing. I will not put others in their Livings, till I know your Lordship’s pleasure; for it is meet I acquaint you first, the Romish relics and images of both my Cathedrals in Dublin, of the Holy Trinity and of St Patrick’s, took off the common people from the true worship, but the Prior and the Dean find them so sweet for their gain, that they heed not my words: Therefore send in your Lordship’s next to me an order more full, and a chide to them and their Canons, that they might be removed. Let the order be, that the chief governors may assist me in it. The Prior and Dean have written to Rome, to be encouraged, and if it be not hindred before they have a mandate from the Bishop of Rome, the people will be bold, and then tugg long before his Highness can submit them to his Grace’s orders. The country folk here much hate your Lordship, and despitefully call you in their Irish tongue, the Blacksmith’s son. The Duke of Norfolk is by Armagh,

(3) Cromw.

‘and that Clergy, desired to assist them, not to suffer his Highness to alter church-rules here in Ireland: As a friend, I desire your Lordship to look to your noble person; for Rome hath a great kindness for that Duke (for it is so talked here) and will reward him and his children. Rome hath great favours for this nation, purposely to oppose his Highness; and so having got, since the Act passed, great Indulgences for Rebellion, therefore my hope is lost, yet my zeal is to do according to your Lordship’s orders. God keep your Lordship from your enemies here and in England. Dublin the 3d Kalends April 1538.’

[D] As also the form of an oath of obedience.] This the Archbishop sent in a letter to the Lord Cromwell, which was as follows.

‘Right Honourable,

MY duty premised, it may please your Lordship to be advertised, sithence my last there has come to Armagh and his Clergy, a private commission from the Bishop of Rome, prohibiting his gracious Highness’s people here in this nation to own his Royal Supremacy, and joining a curse to all them and theirs who shall not, within forty days, confess to their Confessors (after the publishing of it to them) that they have done amiss in so doing: the substance, as our Secretary hath translated the same into English, is thus.’

I A. B. from this present hour forward, in the presence of the holy Trinity, of the blessed Virgin Mother of God, of St Peter, of the holy Apostles, Archangels, Angels, Saints, and of all the holy Host of Heaven, shall and will be always obedient to the holy See of St Peter of Rome, and to my holy Lord the Pope of Rome and his successors, in all things as well spiritual as temporal, not consenting in the least that his Holiness shall lose the least title or dignity belonging to the Papacy of our Mother Church of Rome, or to the regality of St Peter. I do vow and swear to maintain, help and assist the just laws, liberties and rights of the Mother Church of Rome. I do likewise promise to confer, to defend, and promote, if not personally, yet willingly as far as able, either by advice, skill, estate, money, or otherwise, the Church of Rome and her laws, against all whatsoever resisting the same. I further vow to oppugn all Hereticks, either in making or setting forth Edicts or Commands contrary to the Mother Church of Rome, and in case any such be moved or composed, to resist it to the uttermost of my power, with the first convenience and opportunity I can possibly. I count and value all acts made or to be made by heretical Powers of no force or worth, or be practised or obeyed by myself, or by any other son of the Mother Church of Rome. I do further declare him or her, father or mother, brother or sister, son or daughter, husband or wife, uncle or aunt, nephew or niece, kinsman or kinswoman, master or mistress, and all others, nearest or dearest relations, friends or acquaintance whatsoever, accursed, that either do or shall hold for the time to come, any Ecclesiastical or Civil Power above the authority of the Mother Church, or that do or shall obey, for the time to come, any of her, the mother of Churches, opposers or enemies, or contrary to the same, which I have here sworn unto: So God, the blessed Virgin, St Peter, St Paul, and the holy Evangelists help me.

‘His Highness’s Vice roy of this nation (4), is of little or no power with the old natives, therefore your Lordship will expect of me no more than I am able: This nation is poor in wealth, and not sufficient endeavours were used to raise a rebellion there: for one Thady O-Birne, a Franciscan Frier, being seized by Archbishop Browne's order, letters were found about him, from the Pope and Cardinals (i) to O-Neal; wherein, after commending his own, and his father's faithfulness to the Church of Rome, he was exhorted 'for the glory of the Mother Church, the honour of St Peter, and his own security, to suppress Heresie, and his Holiness's enemies.' And the Council of Cardinals thought fit to encourage his country, as a sacred island, being certain, while Mother Church had a son of worth as himself, and those that should succour him, and join therein, she would never fall, but have more or less a holding in Britain, in spite of fate (k). In pursuance of this letter, O-Neal began to declare himself the champion of Popery; and having entered into a confederacy with others, they jointly invaded the Pale, and committed several ravages; but were soon after quelled (l).

(4) Sir Anthony St Leger, The Archbishop sent complaints against him to England; whereupon he was recalled, R. Cox, ubi supra, p. 290.

(i) These Letters were dated at Rome, April 28, 1538, and signed by the Bishop of Meath.

(k) Life of G. Browne, &c. p. 3, 4, 5, 6.

(l) Hist. of Ireland, &c. by R. Cox, p. 1. p. 259.

About the time that King Henry VIII. began to suppress the Monasteries in England and Ireland, Archbishop Browne, completed his design of removing all superstitious reliques and images out of the two cathedrals of St Patrick's and the Holy Trinity, in Dublin, and out of the rest of the churches within his diocese; and, in their room, placed the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Ten Commandments in gold letters. And, soon after, namely in 1541, the King having converted the priory of the Holy Trinity, into a cathedral church, consisting of a Dean and Chapter [E], our Archbishop founded three prebends in the same, in 1544, namely, St Michael's, St John's, and St Michan's: from which time it hath generally been known by the name of Christ-Church (m). King Edward VI. having caused the Liturgy to be compiled, and published in English, sent an order to Sir Anthony St Leger, Governor of Ireland, dated February 6, 1550-1, to notify to all the clergy of that kingdom, that they should use this book in all their churches; and the Bible in the vulgar tongue. When Sir Anthony imparted this order to the Clergy (which was on the first of March) it was vehemently opposed by the Popish party, especially by George Dowdall, Primate of Armagh: but Archbishop Browne, received it with the utmost satisfaction and pleasure (n) [F]. And, upon Easter-day following, the Liturgy was accordingly read, for the first time within Ireland, in Christ-Church Dublin, in presence of the Mayor and Bayliffs of that city, the Lord-Deputy St Leger, Archbishop Browne, &c. (o). On which occasion, the Archbishop preached a sermon against keeping the Scriptures in the Latin tongue, and the worship of images [G]. But Dowdall, by reason of his violent and unseasonable opposition to the King's order, was deprived of the title of Primate of all Ireland; which, by letters patent, bearing date the twentieth of October 1551 (p), was conferred on Archbishop Browne, and his successors in the See of Dublin for ever (q). However he did not long enjoy this dignity; for he was deprived, both of it, and his Archbishoprick, in 1554, the first of Queen Mary I, under pretence that he was married; but in truth, because he had zealously promoted the Reformation. And then Archbishop Dowdall, who had lived in exile during part of the reign of King Edward VI, recovered the title of Primate, and also the Archbishoprick of Armagh, which had been given to Hugh Goodacre. While Archbishop Browne enjoyed the See of Dublin, the cathedral of St Patrick's was suppressed, for about the space of eight years; but Queen Mary restored it to its antient dignity, towards the end of the year 1554. The exact time of Archbishop Browne's death is not recorded; only we are told, that he died about the year 1556 (r). He was a man of a chearful countenance; meek and peaceable; in his acts and deeds plain and downright; of good parts and very stirring in what he judged to be for the interest of religion, or the service of his King; merciful and compassionate to the poor and miserable; and adorned with every good and valuable qualification (s).

(m) Sir J. Ware's Works, edit. 1735, as above.

(n) Ibid. & Life of G. Browne, as above, p. 8, 9, 10.

(o) Ware's Works as above. R. Cox, as above, p. 290.

(p) Rot. Canc. de ann. 5 Edw. VI.

(q) Sir J. Ware's Works, as above.

(r) Life of G. Browne, as above, p. 11, 12.

(s) Ibid. p. 1.

'sufficient now at present to oppose them. It is observed, that ever since his Highness's ancestors had this nation in possession, the old natives have been craving foreign Powers to assist and rule them; and now both English race and Irish begin to oppose your Lordship's orders, and do lay aside their national old quarrels; which I fear will, if any thing will, cause a foreigner to invade this nation. I pray God I may be a false Prophet, yet your Lordship must pardon my opinion, for I write it to your Lordship as a warning. Dublin, May, 1538 (s).'

(5) Life of G. Browne, as above.

[E] Consisting of a Dean and Chapter.] It consisted, upon this alteration, of a Dean and Chapter, a Chanter, a Treasurer, six Vicars choral, and two Singing-Boys; who were allowed 45*l*. 6*s*. English money: This sum Queen Mary confirmed for ever. But King James I. altered what King Henry, and his daughter, had done; and upon this second alteration he constituted a Dean, a Chanter, a Chancellor, a Treasurer, three Prebends, six Vicars choral, and four Singing-

Boys: Ordering likewise, that the Archdeacon of Dublin should have a place in the choir, and a vote in the Chapter (6).

[F] Archbishop Browne received it with the utmost satisfaction and pleasure. At which time he spoke to this effect: 'This order, good brethren, is from our gracious King, and from the rest of our Brethren the Fathers and Clergy of England, who have consulted herein, and compared the Holy Scriptures with what they have done; unto whom I submit, as Jesus did to Cæsar in all things just and lawful, making no question why or wherefore, as we own him our true and lawful King.' Edward Staples Bishop of Meath, and Thomas Lancaister Bishop of Kildare, both concurred with the Archbishop; and were, for so doing, deprived of their Bishopricks in Queen Mary's reign (7).

[G] On which occasion the Archbishop preached a sermon, &c. This sermon is printed at the end of the Archbishop's life, and is the only piece of his extant; besides his Letters set down above.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ibid. p. 9, 10.

BROWNE (Sir THOMAS) an eminent English Physician, and celebrated writer, of the XVIIth century, for whose memoirs we have very ample materials, tho' hitherto they have been but inaccurately written [A]. He was the son of Mr Thomas Browne, Merchant of London, descended from an antient and genteel family of that name, seated at Upton in Cheshire. He was born October the nineteenth 1605, in the parish of St Michael, Cheapside, in the city of London (a), and had the misfortune to lose his father in his nonage, who left him however a considerable fortune, in which he was injured not a little by one of his guardians (b). He was first sent for education to Winchester-College, and thence removed to the University of Oxford, where he was entered a Fellow-Commoner of Broadgate's-Hall, soon after stiled Pembroke-College, in the beginning of the year 1623 (c), took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, January the thirty-first 1626 (d), proceeded in due time to his degree of Master of Arts, entered on the Physick line, and practised that faculty (e) for some time in Oxfordshire. His mother having married Sir Thomas Dutton, a very worthy gentleman, who enjoyed an honourable post in the government of Ireland; Mr Browne went over with him into that island, where he accompanied him in a visitation of all the fortresses of the kingdom, which heightening his natural inclination to travel, he went over to France, made some stay at Montpellier, and then making the tour of Italy, and residing some time at Padua, he returned into Holland, and took his degree of Doctor in Physick, in the University of Leyden (f). We have no certain account when he came back into England, but it must have been earlier than most of our writers have placed it, I think it might be about the year 1634 (g), but I can say nothing as to the place of his residence, unless it was in London [B]. In 1635 he wrote his Religio Medici, or at least made the sketch of it, which afterwards being handed about in manuscript, at last stole abroad (tho' very incorrectly) in print (h) [C]. In 1636 he settled himself at Norwich, by the persuasion of his old tutor Dr Thomas Luffington, who was Rector of Burnham-Westgate, not far from thence, and on the invitation of Sir Nicholas Bacon, and other principal persons of the county; and the year following was incorporated as Doctor of Physick at Oxford (i). He had impaired his fortune pretty much while abroad, though he had increased his learning and experience, and therefore he applied himself with the more diligence to his practice, which soon became very extensive, not a little furthered perhaps by his marrying a lady, whose maiden name was Mileham, of a very considerable family in Norfolk (k). This change in his condition happened in 1641, and he enjoyed the society of this lady, equally distinguished by the graces of her body and mind, one and forty years. It does not appear, that he had any inclination to be known to the world as an author, but

was

(a) Life of Sir T. Browne, prefixed to his Antiquities of Norwich.

(b) Memoirs of our author's Life by Mr John Whitefoot, prefixed to the Antiquities of Norwich.

(c) Life of Sir Thomas Browne, beforementioned, p. 2.

(d) Wood's Fassi Oxon. Vol. I. col. 233.

(e) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 713.

(f) Life of Sir Thomas Browne, p. 2.

(g) See this fact established in note [B].

(h) See Sir Thomas's complaint of this, in his Preface to that piece.

(i) Wood's Fassi Oxon. Vol. I. c. 273.

(k) See Whitefoot's Memoirs of our author, before cited.

(7) This Letter is prefixed to the Religio Medici, in our author's Works.

(8) See the Epistle to the reader prefixed to the Religio Medici.

(9) Religio Medici, P. ii. §. 11.

(10) Ibid. §. 5.

(11) Ibid. §. 8.

(12) Ibid. §. 1.

[A] Inaccurately written. The collections made by the industrious Anthony Wood, in reference to the life of Sir Thomas Browne, are remarkably full, and more regular than is common with that author (1). Dr Tension, who published part of our author's works, contents himself with saying something briefly as to his character, because it was expected that an intimate friend of Sir Thomas's would publish his life at large (2). This intimate friend was, very probably, the Rev. Mr John Whitefoot, Rector of Heigham in Norfolk, whom I find mentioned as such by Sir Thomas himself (3), and who, in all probability, preached his funeral-sermon. His minutes for that life consisting chiefly of the facts made use of in his sermon, are still preserved, and were published by the editor of our author's posthumous works (4), who has also prefixed a short life of Sir Thomas to that piece (5). Father Niceron has likewise given us, in his manner, a sketch of this gentleman's life (6), which has been canvassed by many other foreigners, as will be shewn hereafter. My reason for taking notice of these facts, is plainly this, that the reader may not be surprized at the unusual length of this article. The worth of this gentleman, and the excellency of his writings, might well justify the pains that has been taken to set his history in a true light, and to rectify the mistakes that have been made about them; but the principal motive which led us to this copious account, is, the notice taken by foreigners of our author and his works, which has been such as few Englishmen have met with, and it seems to be a reflection on his countrymen, that while his fame is so great abroad, there should be nothing of this sort worthy of his memory, performed at home. In order to wipe off this reflection, the utmost industry has been used in collecting and digesting whatever might be necessary to satisfy the curious and intelligent peruser; and if this has grown to a greater Bulk than is common, it must be ascribed to the author's extensive reputation, and to the numerous circumstances worthy of remembrance which occur in the history of his life and writings.

[B] Unless it was in London. In a letter to Sir Knelm Digby, dated from Norwich March 3d, 1642, Sir Thomas himself says (7), that the Religio Medici was written many years before. In his epistle to the reader, he limits this to about seven years. In the piece itself he observes, that his life had been hitherto but a restless pilgrimage, and that he had but very lately leisure to make reflections; from all which it is evident, that he wrote this treatise in 1635; and therefore he must have been in England that year, or the year before. Mr Wood seems to think, that he did not settle at Norwich 'till about the time of his being incorporated Doctor of Physick at Oxford; but the fact is otherwise, as appears by his monumental inscription, where it is said that he practised Physick there forty-six years. These are, it must be confessed, but trivial circumstances, and yet there is no reason that we should not be right in these, as well as in matters of greater moment, and the rather, because hitherto these mistakes have past unobserved.

[C] Tho' very incorrectly, in print. This piece, which was the first essay of our author's pen, was written for his private exercise and satisfaction, then being communicated to one, it became, as he tells us, common to many; and was, by transcription, successively corrupted, until it arrived in a most depraved copy at the Press (8). It contains abundance of curious particulars relating to himself; he tells us therein, that his life was a miracle of thirty years, which to relate, were not a history but a piece of poetry, and would sound to common ears like a fable (9). He observes, that he was at that time unmarried; nay, he says plainly, I never yet cast a true affection on a woman (10). He informs us likewise, that he understood six languages (11); that he had been a great traveller (12); and many other little circumstances, which abundantly shew the truth of his assertion, that he never intended it should appear in print. The consideration, however, of these peculiarities afford us such means of entering into his character, and of forming a true idea of the nature and excellency of that little treatise, as will enable us to understand it better than any commentary could have done.

1) Fassi Oxon. Vol. I. col. 233.
73.
then. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 713.
14.
2) In his Preface to certain Miscellany Tracts by Sir Thomas Browne.
3) Antiquities of Norwich, p. 20.
4) Life of Sir Thomas Browne, prefixed to his posthumous Works, p. xxiv.
5) See the Posthumous Works, of the learned Sir Thomas Browne, 1. D. London, 712, 8vo.
6) Memoires sur servir a l'Histoire des Hommes Illust. tom. XXIII. 353.

was rather forced to it, by the unforeseen accident of the Religio Medici's being printed surreptitiously, and being so much taken notice of, as to engage the Earl of Dorset, to recommend it to the perusal of the famous Sir Kenelm Digby, who not only read it over, but also wrote notes upon it in the space of a night (l) [D]. There hardly ever was a book published in Britain, that made more noise than the Religio Medici. The novelty of the title, the brilliancy of its sentiments, and the neat turn of the language, struck the lovers of polite literature with unusual delight: But as we rarely see pieces of this nature, received with great applause, and yet remain exempt from the attacks of envy; so in this case answers quickly appeared, and we may safely affirm, that few things have been more commended on the one hand, or on the other now eagerly censured (m) [E]. The translation of it into Latin, which was the pure effects of a gentleman's value for the piece, tho' he had no knowledge of the author, spread the book throughout all Europe, first among the learned who differed widely in their opinions, some applauding, others condemning it; and then through the general mass of readers, by various translations into most of the languages of Europe (n) [F]. As this contributed to raise the author's reputation, for wit, learning,

(l) See this explained in the note [D].

(m) Remarks upon modern authors by J. D. P. 195.

(n) See the Preface to the last edition.

[D] In the space of a night. Whoever has read and considered the observations of this learned Knight, would be inclined to doubt the truth of the fact, if we had not Sir Kenelm's authority for it, in his answer to that letter from Sir Thomas Browne before-cited, wherein he gives the following distinct and particular account of the matter (13). 'I verily believe there is some mistake in the information given you, and that what is printing must be from some other pen than mine: for such reflections as I made upon your learned and ingenious discourse, are so far from meriting the Prefs, as they can tempt no body to a serious reading of them: they were notes hastily set down, as I suddenly ran over your excellent piece, which is of so weighty a subject, and so strongly penned, as requirerh much time and sharp attention but to comprehend it; whereas what I wrote, was the employment but of one sitting; and there was not twenty-four hours between my receiving my Lord of Dorset's letter, that occasioned what I said, and the finishing my answer to him; and yet part of that time was taken up in procuring your book, which he desired me to read, and give him an account of; for, till then, I was so unhappy as never to have heard of that discourse. If that letter ever comes to your view, you will see the high value I set upon your great parts; and if it should be thought I have been something too bold in differing from your sense, I hope I shall easily obtain pardon, when it shall be considered, that his Lordship assigned it me, as an exercitation to oppose in it for entertainment, such passages as I might judge capable thereof; wherein what liberty I took, is to be attributed to the security of a private letter, and to my not knowing (nor my Lord's) the person whom it concerned.' This letter is dated from Winchester-House where the author was prisoner, March 20, 1642.

(13) This Letter stands before the Religio Medici, in the last edition of our author's Works, fol. 1636.

[E] More eagerly censured. It may not be amiss to begin with a succinct and impartial character of this book, which so much alarmed the publick at it's first appearance, and which the learned have never ceased to talk of since (14). 'The Religio Medici may pass for a treatise, on which it is extremely hard to pass any judgment. It is to weak heads, perhaps, a dangerous, to proper judges a most salutary counsellor. It is the picture of the author's mind painted by himself; and who would not rejoice to see so fair a piece drawn by so fine a pencil? It is a noble representation of human nature as it is, and who can be untouched at the sight of what so nearly concerns him? It is a brave attempt to bring down those subjects, which have been supposed to be superior to man's intellects, within the view of his reason; and tho' not near enough to acquaint him with their nature, yet within such a space as to delight him with their prospect. Who then that considers this, but must own an obligation to the author? If singularities, prejudices, extravagancies, wild excursions, and sometimes gloomy reflections strike us, let us strictly examine whether the fault lies in us or in him; we ought not too readily exalt our own, at the expence of his judgment. If we meet with strange thoughts, free remarks, disagreeable discoveries, let us bring them to the touchstone of truth, and remember, that tho' anatomies of human bodies are frequent, yet we are rarely called to the dissection of a human soul. If his sentiments seem too fine spun, his conjectures brisk, his disquisitions daring, his descriptions astonishing, and his flights prodigious, let us consider that Columbus told strange tales when he returned first from his new world. In short, he has undertaken a hard task, viz. to make us, in some measure, acquainted with the Essence, as well as Attributes of God, the Nature of Angels, the Mysteries of Providence, the Divinity of the Scriptures, and which is, perhaps, most difficult of all, with ourselves. How easily he might mistake, how often he must seem obscure, how frequently digress from vulgar tracks, every candid critick will conceive, and therefore more easily excuse. To conclude, our author shares the fortune of such as are distinguished by exalted merit; such as taste his excellencies, magnify him beyond measure, while those who want the power of digesting his strong sentences, revenge themselves on his character, and intimate such suspicions, as are bred only in ignorant heads, and are published merely from malevolence of heart. With the pious and the wise, Religio Medici will always be esteemed the Gospel of Reason (15). The surreptitious edition of this book, which made the true one necessary, was printed in the winter of 1642, and the genuine edition did not come out 'till the spring following (16). By the year 1685, it had run through eight editions, and there have come out two, if not three, since (17). The first annotations that were written upon it, fell from the pen of Sir Kenelm Digby in the night of the 22d of December, 1642. They are addressed to the Earl of Dorset, tho' to say the truth, it is rather a refutation, in many respects, than an explanation; and yet, upon the whole, he confesses the Religio Medici to be a very learned and excellent piece, and speaks every where, with much veneration, of it's author's great abilities. The later editions of the book, are usually accompanied with a very complete body of notes, originally written in 1644, tho' frequently re-touched for ten years after. Who the author was of these annotations remains still a secret, but that they were not written under the direction of the author, as one might be easily tempted to think they were from their being bound up in his works, appears from hence, that now and then he mistakes the sense of his author. Soon after it was published, it was attacked by Alexander Ross, who wrote an express treatise against it, under the title of Medicus medicatus, or the Physician cured (18), but it was far from meeting with success. There never were indeed men more unequally matched, than Dr Browne and Mr Ross, the former having all the advantages of strong parts and lively wit, the latter scarce any other qualification than a confused erudition grounded on a laborious course of reading without taste, penetration, or judgment, at least in any degree of comparison with the author he censures.

(14) A Century of Short Characters of Books and Authors, MS.

(15) This appears from Dr Browne's Letter to Sir Kenelm Digby, dated March 3, 1642.

(16) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II col. 713.

(17) These Observations corrected and enlarged, are to be found in the full edition of Sir Tho. Browne's Works.

(18) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. I col. 713.

[F] Most of the languages of Europe. As to the first version of it into Latin, it was made in 1644, and published in Holland, but with some difficulty, as appears from the following letter written to Dr Browne by the author of that translation, dated from Magdalen-College in Cambridge October 1, 1649. 'It met with some demur in the first impression at Leyden, and upon this occasion, one Hays, a book-merchant there to whom I first offered it, carried it to Salmasius for his approbation, who, in state, first laid it by for very near a quarter of a year, and then at last told him, that there were indeed in it many things well learning, and a singular solidity of judgment, it subjected him at the same time to the imputation of Atheism, especially among foreigners; some having charged it upon him as a crime, the proofs of which were to be found in this book (o), and others vindicating him from that aspersions, yet with such tenderness for themselves, that they are content to leave some stain upon him as to hereby, though perhaps never any man of his abilities and learning, gave stronger proofs of sincere belief. Of these censurers we shall in the notes give some account [G], it is sufficient to observe here, that the very dispute was favourable to his character as an author, and made his subsequent writings appear with the greater lustre. He published in 1646, his Treatise on vulgar Errors, intituled by himself Pseudodoxia Epidemica; or, Enquiries into very many received Tenets, and commonly presumed Truths (p). This was a book as singular in it's way as the former, and was read with equal avidity, by such as were capable of understanding the diversity of subjects which are therein treated [H].

(o) Reimanni, Histor. Atheism. p. 446.

(p) It was printed originally in a small folio.

This

' well said, but that it contained also many exorbitant conceptions in Religion, and would probably find but a frowning entertainment, especially amongst the Ministers; which deterred him from undertaking the printing. After I shewed it to two more, De Vogel and Christian, both Printers; but they, upon advice, returned it also; from these I went to Hackius, who, upon two days deliberation, undertook it (19). It came quickly to a second edition, and in 1652 it was printed at Strasbourg, with a large body of notes written by a learned German whose name was Levinus Moltkenius. In his preface this writer observes, that he was first led to the perusal of this book by the reception it met with from the best judges, that England, France, Italy, Holland, and Germany rung with his applause, and much more to the same purpose. About 1668 it was printed in French, having been before translated into Italian, High-Dutch, and Low, and is still read with the highest satisfaction by persons of true genius, though the sense and spirit of the author have been not a little injured by translations from translations; none but the Latin being made from the original, and that too having considerable deficiencies.

[G] In the notes gives some account.] The first writer of note that we find detracting from our author's merit, is the famous Guy Patin, who, in a letter of his dated from Paris, April 7th, 1645, gives his judgment on the Religio Medici in the following words. 'The book intituled Religio Medici is in high credit here. The author has wit; there are abundance of fine things in that book; he is a humourist whose thoughts are very agreeable, but who, in my opinion, is to seek for a master in Religion as many others are, and in the end, perhaps, may find none. One may say of him, as Philip de Comines did of the Founder of the Minimes, a Hermit of Calabria, Francis de Paula, he is still alive, and may grow worse as well as better (20). I should not have cited this passage but that I find it has made some impression on the French critics, and even upon (21) Mr Bayle, which is the more wonderful, since he could not but know, that Patin scarce spoke well of any body, and was a smatterer himself: One who dipped into books and then decided upon them, which easily accounts for his notions of the Religio Medici and it's author. Yet this stroke of French censure is but gentle, in comparison of the correction given our author, and his writings, by German pens (22). One Tobias Wagner is pleased to say, that the seeds of atheistical impiety are so scattered through this book, that it can hardly be read without danger of infection. Two other learned men of the same nation, (23) Muller and (24) Reiser, agree with him in passing sentence on our author as an atheist. The very learned John Francis Buddeus is a little more moderate, for though he puts Sir Thomas Browne's name into the list of English Atheists, in conjunction with Lord Herbert of Cherbury, Thomas Hobbes, and John Toland; yet he is pleased to add, that as for Thomas Browne though he is not free from the suspicion of absolute indifference in Religion, yet from the charge of Atheism he ought certainly to be acquitted (25). But the no less learned James Frederick Reimmannus, who also wrote very largely on Atheism, and of such as have been justly or unjustly suspected thereof, has taken great pains to wipe off not only the former, but the latter aspersions from our author, and has very fairly shewn the true state of the case, that the Religio Medici has been condemned by some without reading it carefully, and by others for want of understanding what they did read (26). In a subsequent note I shall have occasion to mention a still larger defence of our author, written by an illustrious Foreigner. Here, perhaps, it may not be amiss to add, that the Religio Medici, as soon as it was published in Latin, had a place given it in the Index Expurgatorius (27), tho' the French translator wrote a long preface, to prove that the author was very favourably inclined to the Church of Rome.

[H] Which are therein treated.] This noble monument of our author's learning consists of seven books. In the first he considers the general causes of vulgar errors, wherein with equal penetration he discovers, and patience pursues, these sources of error, 'till he has fully described the course of the streams to which they swell. In the remaining books he treats of particular errors; in the second of such as relate to mineral and vegetable bodies, in the third as to animals, with respect to man in the fourth, in the fifth of things questionable in pictures, of Geographical and Philosophical errors in the sixth, and of such as are historical in the seventh. As to the author's intention in this treatise, and how much further he has profecuted his subject, than other writers handling it before him, together with the obligation he thought himself under of defending what he wrote, information may be best received from his own pen. 'We hope (says he in his epistle to the reader prefixed to the sixth edition, printed in 1673) 'it will not be unconsidered, that we find no open track or constant manuduction in this labyrinth; but are oft-times fain to wander in the America and untravelled parts of truth. For though not many years past, Dr Primrose hath made a learned discourse of vulgar errors in Physick, yet have we discussed but two or three thereof. Scipio Mercurii hath also left an excellent tract in Italian concerning popular errors, but confining himself only to those in Physick, he hath little conduced unto the generality of our doctrine. Laurentius Joubertus, by the same title led our expectations into thoughts of great relief; whereby, notwithstanding we reaped no advantage, it answering scarce at all the promise of the inscription. Nor perhaps, if it were yet extant, should we find any further assistance from that ancient piece of Andreas, pretending the same title. And therefore, we are often constrained to stand alone against the strength of opinion, and to meet Goliath and giant of authority, with contemptible pebbles, and feeble arguments drawn from the scrip and slender stock of ourselves. Nor have we indeed, scarce named any author whose name we do not honour; and if detraction could invite us, discretion surely would contain us from any derogatory intention, where highest pens and friends less eloquence must fail in commendation. And therefore, also we cannot but hope the equitable considerations and candour of reasonable minds. 'We cannot expect the frown of Theology herein; nor can they which behold the present state of things, and controversy of points so long received in Divinity, condemn our sober enquiries in the doubtful appurtenances of Arts and Receptaries of Philosophy. 'Surely Philologers and critical discouersers, who look beyond the shell and obvious exteriors of things, will not be angry with our narrower explorations. 'And we cannot doubt our brothers in Physick, whose knowledge in naturals will lead them into a nearer apprehension of many things delivered, will friendly accept if not countenance our endeavours. Nor can we conceive it may be unwelcome unto those honoured worthies who endeavour the advancement of learning, as being likely to find a clearer progression, when so many rubs are levelled, and many untruths taken off, which passing as principles with common

(27) Index Librorum Prohibit. p. 242.

(19) See the Letter at large in the life of Sir Thomas Browne, prefixed to his Antiquities of Norwich, p. vi.

(20) Lettres Choises de feu M. Guy Patin, &c. Franckfort, 1683, 12mo, p. 12.

(21) Oeuvres de M. P. Bayle, Tom. I. p. 25. a.

(22) In examine clenchitico atheismi speculativi, cap. v. p. 11.

(23) Exam. Atheismi, c. vi. §. 34.

(24) In Dissertat. de Atheismo, p. 35.

(25) Theses Theologicae de Atheismo & Superstitione, p. 136.

(26) Historia Universalis Atheismi & Authorum falso & merito suspectorum, p. 443.

This too met with answers, written with more heat than learning, and with much stronger marks of passion than concern for Truth [I]. We need not wonder therefore, that such opposition contributed rather to the fame of this performance, than any way affected its credit, especially since foreigners have unanimously declared in its favour, and bestowed the highest praises on the author's wisdom, learning, and penetration, of which abundant testimonies may be produced [K]. The profound learning discovered in this last book, induced some mercenary scribbler, of which that age, as well as this, wanted not one in every corner, to make free with our author's name, by prefixing it to a book, which he not only never wrote, but without all doubt would never have read, considering its bombast and foolish title [L]; and yet our author contented himself, with hinting this deceit to the publick, in the softest and modestest terms, and without expressing the least resentment against so impudent an impostor (q). In 1658 he published, Hydriotaphia, Urne Burial; or, a Discourse of the Sepulchral Urnes, lately found in Norfolk. Together with the Garden of Cyrus, or the quincuncial Lozenge, or Net-Work Plantations of the Antients, artificially, naturally, mystically, considered. With sundry Observations. The first of these treatises he dedicated to Thomas Le Gros, Esq; afterwards Sir Thomas Le Gros, of Croftwick; and the latter to Nicholas Bacon, of Gillingham, Esq; both are dated from Norwich, May 1, 1658, and shew that he lived in the strictest intimacy and warmest friendship, with the worst of his neighbours. These treatises are in themselves extremely curious, common beliefs, disturb the tranquillity of axioms, which otherwise might be raised. And wise men cannot but know, that Arts and Learning want this expurgation; and if the course of truth be permitted unto itself, like that of time and uncorrected computations; it cannot escape many errors, which duration still enlargeth. Lastly, we are not magisterial in opinions, nor have we, dictator like, obtruded our conceptions; but in the humility of enquiries or disquisitions, have only proposed them unto more ocular discerners. And therefore opinions are free, and open it is for any to think or declare the contrary. And we shall so far encourage contradiction, as to promise no disturbance, or re-oppose any pen that shall fallaciously or captiously refute us; that shall only lay hold of our lapses, single our digressions, corollaries, or ornamental conceptions, to evidence his own in as indifferent truths. And shall only take notice of such, whose experimental and judicious knowledge shall solemnly look upon it; not only to destroy of ours, but to establish of his own; not to traduce or extenuate but to explain and dilucidate, to add and amplify, according to the laudable custom of the Antients in their sober promotions of learning. Unto whom, notwithstanding, we shall not contentiously rejoin, or only to justify your own, but to applaud or confirm his maturer assertions; and shall confer what is in us unto his name and honour; ready to be swallowed in any worthy enlargement, as having acquired our end, if any way, or under any name, we may obtain a work so much desired, and yet desiderated of truth.

(q) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 713.

[I] Thou concern for Truth. The first of these appeared under this title, Arcana Microscopi, or the hid secrets of Man's Body discovered in an anatomical duel between Aristotle and Galen concerning the parts thereof; as also by a discovery of the strange and marvellous diseases, symptoms, and accidents of man's body. With a Refutation of Dr Browne's Vulgar Errors, the Lord Bacon's Natural History, and Dr Harvey's book de Generatione, Comenius, and others; whereunto is annexed a Letter from Dr Primrose to the author, and his answer thereto, touching Dr Harvey's Book de Generatione, By A. R. i. e. Alexander Ross, London 1652. By transcribing this whole title it appears, that the author had a great inclination to distinguish himself by combating the opinions of famous men. He was a sort of knight-errant in the learned world, whose Dulcinea was Antiquity. Much of this humour appears in the manner of printing his book, the running title of which to page 92 is, The hid Secrets of Man's Body discovered; from 92 to 207, Dr Browne's Vulgar Errors refuted and answered; from 224 to 243, a Refutation of Dr Harvey and Fernelius; from 244 to 265, a Refutation of the Lord Bacon's Natural History; and thence to the end of the book, a Refutation of Comenius. Yet on the whole it must be allowed, that this is far from being so mean a piece as many have represented it, there is in it a great deal of vanity, and more spleen, but withal there wants not truth, learning, and some sense. There was another answer published under the following title, (28) Eudoxa, seu Quæstionum quarundam Miscellanearum Examen probabile, &c. London 1656. 8vo. written by John Robinson, M. D. But this did it's author no great honour, and had not merit enough to make it much known in the world.

(28) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 713.

[K] Abundant testimonies may be produced. It is somewhat surprizing, that so very learned a treatise as this, and which it's author once thought to have published in Latin, should never have been translated into that language, which however has not hindered it from being very well known abroad. It was first translated into Low-Dutch by John Grundal, and printed at Amsterdam, in 1668, 8vo. It was afterwards published in High-Dutch by a noble author, for though in the title-page of the book, printed at Nuremberg, in 1680. 4to. the translator calls himself Christopher Peganius, yet this was only according to the mode of Germany, the true author being Christian Knorr, Baron of Rosenroth. The judicious Morhof, (29) speaks of this work of our author's twice, with all possible marks of approbation and esteem. 'No modern author, says he, has treated this subject more accurately or copiously. In his first book he learnedly enquires into the general causes of error, and in his succeeding books he not only discourses of the mistakes, which are crept into Natural Philosophy, but such also as have corrupted History, Theology, Mechanic Arts, and Physick.' The famous Reimmannus (30), delivers himself in these terms. 'As he excelled in Theoretical and Practical Divinity, so he shone no less in Philosophy, wherein he emulated Hercules, and undertaking by his Pseudodoxia Epidemica to clear the Sciences from errors, he fell nothing short of the other's labour in cleansing the Augean Stable.' Father Niceron (31) speaking of this book says, 'That it is an excellent work and contains abundance of curious things.'

(29) Polyhistor. II. 2. 1. 9. III. 5. 1. 10.

(30) Historia universalis Aethiops. P. 448.

[L] Considering it's bombast and foolish title. This book called itself, Nature's Cabinet unlock'd; wherein is discovered the natural causes of Metals, Stones, precious Earth, &c. London 1657. 12mo. Mr Wood's character of this book is, 'That it is a dull worthless thing, stole for the most part out of the Physicks of Magirus, by a very ignorant person, a Magiary, so illiterate and unskillful in his author, that not distinguishing between lævis and levis, in the said Magirus, hath told us of the Liver, that one part of it is gibbous, and the other light; and yet he had the confidence to call this scribble, Nature's Cabinet unlock'd, an arrogant and fanciful title, of which our author's true humility would no more have suffered him to have been the father, than his great learning could have permitted him to have been the author of the said book (32).' Dr Browne in an advertisement, as from the Stationer, disclaims it thus, 'I cannot omit to advertise, that a book was published not long since, intitled, Nature's Cabinet unlock'd, bearing the name of this author; if any man have been benefited thereby, this author is not so ambitious as to challenge the honour thereof, as having no hand in that work (33).'

(31) Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire des Hommes Illust. Tom. XXIII. P. 357.

(32) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 713.

(33) Printed at the end of his treatise, intitled. The Garden of Cyrus, &c.

[M] Uncommon

r) See the Life of Sir Thomas Browne, prefixed to his Antiquities of Norwich.

s) These are printed with his Antiquities of Norwich, in 8vo, 712, under the title of The Posthumous Works of Sir Thomas Browne.

t) Printed also in his Posthumous Works.

u) See this annexed to the Memoirs of our author by Mr Whitefoot.

curious, and abound with noble, uncommon, and useful observations (r) [M], so that we need not wonder they have been so often cited, and so much admired. His readiness to afford any assistance in his power, to such of the learned as were engaged in great and laborious undertakings, procured him the correspondence of abundance of great men, both at home and abroad. Sir William Dugdale applied to him for his assistance, when he was composing that work of his, which has been thought to do him most honour, and many of the letters that passed between them have been made publick (s) [N]. His foreign correspondents extended as far as Iceland, where dwelt his good friend and intimate acquaintance, Theodore Jonas, from whose information, probably, he wrote that short account of this northern isle, which one may venture to pronounce, the clearest and most authentick that is any where extant (t) [O]. His reputation in his profession, was equal to his fame for learning in all other respects, and therefore the Royal College of Physicians in London, were pleased to take him into their number, as an Honourary Fellow, as appears by a very honourable diploma under the college-seal, dated the twenty-sixth of June 1665 (u). In the Month of September 1671, King Charles II. coming to Norwich in his progress, was pleased to knight Dr Browne, with very singular marks of favour and respect (w). This circumstance is mentioned by our author, in one of his pieces, with his usual modesty, and upon such an occasion, as did not only invite, but compel him to it; and yet his gratitude

(w) Antiquities of Norwich, p. 85.

to

[M] Uncommon and useful observations. The first Treatise concerning Urn Burial was occasioned by the digging up between 40 and 50 of these monuments of antiquity in a field of Old Walsingham, in the latter end of the year 1657, or the beginning of 1658. These urns were deposited in a dry and sandy soil not a yard deep, and at no great distance from each other; they were not exactly similar nor much unlike, some contained two pounds of bones, distinguishable in skulls, ribs, jaws, thigh-bones, and teeth, with fresh impressions of combustion, besides extraneous substance, like pieces of small boxes or combs handsomely wrought, handles of small brass instruments, brazen nippers, and in one some kind of opal. Near the same plot of ground, for about six yards compass, were dugged up coals and incinerated substances, which begat conjecture that this was the Ustina, or place of burning their bodies, or some sacrificing place unto the Manes, which was properly below the surface of the ground, as the Aræ and Altars unto the gods and heroes above it. That these were the urns of Romans from the common custom and place where they were found, is no obscure conjecture, not far from a Roman garrison, and but five miles from Brancaaster, set down by ancient record under the name of Brannodunum. And where the adjoining town, containing seven parishes, in no very different found, but Saxon termination, still retains the name of Burnham, which being an early station, it is not improbable the neighbour parts were filled with habitations, either of Romans themselves, or Britons Romanised, which observed the Roman customs.

[H] Have been made publick. These letters were written partly in the autumn of the year 1658, and partly in the spring of 1659, and contain abundance of curious particulars in relation to our Antiquities. They were published among the posthumous works of Mr Browne, and I mention them here only to take notice, that one of the pieces before published by Dr Tension, under the title of Miscellanies, belongs properly to this collection. The title of it is, Of Artificial Hills, Mounts, or Burrows, in many parts of England, what they are, to what end raised, and by what nations. Before it there is a quære in answer to which it is written, said to have come from his honoured friend Mr E. D. This E. should certainly be a W. for without question the letters were intended for William Dugdale, as may be easily discerned by comparing the contents of this with those of the epistles before-mentioned; and I take it to be the only letter amongst those Miscellanies of which any certain account can be given. It is manifest from hence, that he was regarded as an oracle in these matters, even by such a man as Sir William Dugdale, whose knowledge in British Antiquities is unanimously confessed, and the answers given him by Sir Thomas Browne, are such as sufficiently demonstrate his having enquired narrowly, even into the abstrusest subjects.

[O] That is any where extant. This letter is dated Norwich, January 15th, 1663. Some particulars seem worthy of being transcribed, inasmuch as we scarce find any thing in relation to this island, elsewhere, which is not strongly mixed with fable. 'Great store of drift, or float-wood, says he, is every year cast upon their shores, brought down by the northern winds, which serveth them for fuel, and other uses, the greatest part whereof is fir. Of bears there are none in the country, but sometimes they are brought down from the north upon ice, while they follow seals, and are carried away. Two in this manner came over and landed in the north of Iceland this last year, 1662. No conies or hares, but of foxes great plenty, whose white skins are much desired, and brought over into this country. The last winter, 1662, so cold and lasting with us in England, was the mildest they have had for many years in Iceland. Two new eruptions, with slime and smoak, were observed the last year in some mountains about Mount Hecla. Some hot mineral springs they have and very effectual, but they make but rude use thereof. The rivers are large, swift, and rapid, but have many falls, which render them less commodious; they chiefly abound with Salmon. They sow no corn, but receive it from abroad. They have a kind of large lichen, which dried becometh hard and sticky, growing very plentiful in many places, whereof they make use for food, either in decoction or powder, some whereof I have by me, different from any with us. In one part of the country and not near the sea, there is a large black rock, which polished, resembleth touchstone, as I have seen in pieces thereof of various figures. — And exceeding fine russet down is sometimes brought unto us, which their great number of fowls afford, and sometimes store of feathers, consisting of the feathers of small birds. Besides shocks, and little hairy dogs, they bring another sort over, headed like a fox, which they say are bred betwixt dogs and foxes; these are desired by the shepherds of this country. Green plovers, which are plentiful here in the winter, are found to breed there in the beginning of summer. Some sheep have been brought over, but of coarse wool, and some horses of mean stature, but strong and hardy; one whereof kept in the pastures by Yarmouth, in the summer, would often take the sea, swimming a great way, a mile or two, and return the same; when it's provision failed in the ship wherein it was brought, for many days, it fed upon hoops and casks; nor at the land would for many months be brought to feed upon oats. These accounts I received from a native of Iceland, who comes yearly into England; and by reason of my long acquaintance, and directions, I send unto some of his friends against the Elephantiasis or Leprosy, constantly visits me before his return, and is ready to perform for me what I shall desire in his country: wherein, as in any other ways, I shall be very ambitious to serve the noble Society, whose most honouring Servant, I am, T. B.' — This last paragraph shews, that this letter was written at the instance of the Royal Society, and is a proof how much he was considered by that learned body of men, who at their first institution were the glory of this island and the wonder of Europe.

(x) See his Monumental Inscription.

(y) Taken from a Letter written to Lady Browne, when he proposed to write Sir Thomas's Life, by Mr White-foot.

to the King is manifested therein, rather than any satisfaction in this addition of honour [P]. He spent the remainder of his days, in the quiet practice of his profession, and the improvement of his mind, by a close and diligent pursuit of his studies, which he never intermitted, 'till having attained the age of seventy-seven, for he died on his birth day, he in 1682, left this life for a better (x). In his person he was of a moderate stature, of a brown complexion, and his hair of the same colour. His picture in the College of Physicians, shews him to have been remarkably handsome, and to have possessed in a singular degree, the blessing of a grave and yet chearful and inviting countenance. As to his temper it was perfectly even and free from passions, he had no ambition beyond that of being wise and good, and no farther concern for money than as it was necessary, for otherwise he might certainly have raised a very large fortune in the way of his profession, but his charity, generosity, and tender affection for his children, to the expence of whose education he would set no bounds, contracted the wealth he left into a very moderate compass. His virtues were many, and remarkably conspicuous; his probity such as gained him universal respect, as his beneficence rendered him generally beloved; in respect to knowledge, he was extremely communicative in his conversation, and notwithstanding his rare abilities, and established reputation, wonderfully modest. His Religion was that of the Church of England, in which he shewed himself unaffectedly humble and sincere. As to sects in learning he followed none, but thought and wrote with the utmost freedom, illustrating every subject he touched, by such new and nervous remarks, as charmed every attentive reader, and has occasioned more care to be taken of the papers he left behind him, than has usually happened to the remains of learned men, a circumstance singular in itself, and which reflects on his memory the highest honour (y) [Q]. There may be notwithstanding this, and indeed there is reason to believe there are, several little pieces of his which have not yet seen the light, which is the more to be regretted, because certainly never any thing fell from his pen which did not deserve it. His very letters were dissertations, and full of singular learning, tho' written upon the most common subjects. Of this we have a shining proof, in a letter of his to a young student, as to the method of reading physical authors [R]. His knowledge and charity made him dear to his contemporaries,

as

[P] In this addition of honour.] This passage occurs in his Antiquities of Norwich, where, speaking of the cathedral and city, he says, 'Tho' this church, for it's spire, may compare, in a manner, with any in England, yet in it's tombs and monuments it is exceeded by many. No Kings have honoured the same with their ashes, and but few with their presence. And it is not without some wonder, that Norwich having been for a long time so considerable a place, so few Kings having visited it: of which number among so many Monarchs since the Conquest, we find but four, viz. King Henry III. Edward I. Queen Elizabeth, and our gracious sovereign now reigning, King Charles II. of which I had a particular reason to take notice (34).

(34) Antiquities of Norwich, p. 35.

[Q] The highest honour.] The first who took the pains to digest and fit for the press the pieces our author left behind him, in such a degree of perfection as seem to intimate his design of printing them, was Dr Thomas Tennison, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, who published, from his manuscripts, at London 1684. 8vo. A collection of Miscellaneous Tracts, containing, 1. Observations upon several plants mentioned in Scripture. 2. Of Garlands, and Coronary or Garland Plants. 3. Of the Fishes caught by our Saviour with his Disciples after the Resurrection. 4. An answer to certain Queries relating to Fishes, Birds, and Insects. 5. Of Hawks and Falconry, ancient and modern. 6. Of Cymbals and other musical Instruments. 7. Of Ropalic or gradual Verses. 8. Of Languages, particularly the Saxon. 9. Of artificial Hills, Mounts, and Burrows, in many places of England. 10. Of Troas, what place is meant by that name. Also the Situation of Sodom, Gomorrah, and Zeboim. 11. Of the Answers of the Oracle of Apollo at Delphos to Cræsus. 12. A Prophecy concerning the future State of several Nations. 13. Museum Clausum, containing some Books, Antiquities, Pictures, and Rarities of several kinds, scarce or never seen by any man now living. These with the other Treatises published in his life-time, were printed in one folio Volume at London, 1686. His son Dr Edward Browne published in 1690, a single tract of his father's, intitled, A Letter to a Friend, upon Occasion of the Death of his intimate Friend. It contains about twenty-four pages in 8vo. and we meet therein with many curious things, and a conclusion so pious, that whoever reads it will discern with indignation the falshood of such calumnies as have been spread in relation to his indifference in Religion. The third guardian of our author's fame was his grandson by marriage, Owen Brigstock, Esq; who communicated his remains to those who afterwards published them, under the title of, Posthumous Works of the Learned Sir Thomas Browne, Knt. M. D. late of Norwich, printed from his original manuscripts, viz. I. Repertorium, or the Antiquities of the Cathedral Church of Norwich. II. An Account of some Urns, &c. found at Brampton in Norfolk, anno 1667. III. Letters between Sir William Dugdale and Sir Thomas Browne. IV. Miscellanies. Last of all, in 1716, there was published a book of his in 12mo, intitled, Christian Morals, by Sir Thomas Browne of Norwich, M. D. and author of Religio Medici, published from the original and correct manuscript of the author, by John Jeffery, D. D. Archdeacon of Norwich. It was dedicated by our author's daughter, Mrs Elizabeth Littleton, to David, Earl of Buchan. And Dr Jeffery in his preface observes, that if any one after he has read Religio Medici, and this discourse, can doubt whether the same person was the author of them both, he may be assured by the testimony of Mrs Littleton above-mentioned, who lived with her father, when it was composed by him, and who at the time read it written by his own hand, and also by the testimony of others, of whom the Doctor is one, who read the manuscript of the author immediately after his death, and who have since read the same; from which it was faithfully and exactly transcribed for the press. The reason why it was not printed before was, because it was unhappily lost by being mislaid among other manuscripts, for which search was lately made in the presence of Archbishop Tennison, of which his Grace by letter informed Mrs Littleton, when he sent the manuscript to her. Dr Jeffery likewise tells us, that there is nothing printed in the discourse, or in the short notes, but what is found in the original manuscript, except only where an oversight had made the addition or transposition of some words necessary.

[R] As to the method of reading physical authors.] This letter was communicated to the world by a very learned and ingenious gentleman (35), but to whom it was directed is not known. 'Εκ βιβλίου νοσηρῆται [i. e. Statefman from the book] is grown into a proverb; and no less ridiculous are they who think out of books to become Physicians. I shall therefore mention such as tend less to ostentation than use, for the directing a novice to observation and experience, without which you cannot expect to be other than ἐκ βιβλίου νοσηρῆται. Galen and Hippocrates must be had as Fathers and fountains of the faculty. And indeed Hippocrates's Aphorisms should be cenned for the

(35) By the learned and ingenious Richard Middlton Massey, M. D. F. R. S.

as his excellent works have transmitted the fruits of his learning, and thereby secured him a high reputation with posterity, and as this has not been built on the slight foundation of lively thoughts, delivered in a graceful manner of expression, but on the more solid basis of communicating useful truths, and suggesting the properest means for avoiding discrepancy as well as error; so by degrees his writings have triumphed over all those prejudices, which naturally rise in weak minds at the appearance of a genius of the first rank, as appears by that eagerness, which even learned foreigners have expressed in his defence, and that applause which has been bestowed on his works, by such as were equal as well as candid judges [S]. His body was interred in the church of St Peter's Mancroft, in Norwich, where, upon a mural monument, fixed to the south pillar of the altar, there are two inscriptions, one in Latin the other in English, containing several particulars relating to his life, which, as they have been mentioned in the course of this article, and as those inscriptions have been published more than once, render it unnecessary to transcribe them here (Z). This monument was erected from the tender affection of Lady Dorothy Browne, his widow, to whose memory on the opposite pillar, there is another mural monument, which informs us that she died February 4, 1685, in the sixty-third year of her age. By this Lady Sir Thomas had ten children, of whom only one son (who is taken notice of in the next article) and three daughters survived him; all of them remarkable for inheriting their parents virtues, and enjoying an uncommon share of that sprightly wit and solid sense, so conspicuous in their father's writings, as they have also been by expressing an affectionate and becoming zeal for preserving their father's memory, and securing his literary remains from oblivion.

(Z) In the Life prefixed to the Antiquities of Norwich, p. xix.

the frequent use which may be made of them. Lay your foundation in Anatomy, wherein αὐτὸ ἴα mult be your fidus achates. The help that books can afford, you may expect, besides what is delivered sparsim from Galen and Hippocrates, Vesalius, Spigelius, and Bartholinus. And be sure you make yourself master of Dr Harvey's piece De Circul. Sang. which discovery I prefer to that of Columbus. The knowledge of Plants, Animals, and Minerals (whence are fetched the Materia Medicamentorum) may be your αὐτοπροσόν; and so far as concerns Physick, is attainable in gardens, fields, Apothecaries and Druggists shops. Read Theophrastus, Dioscorides, Matthiolus, Dodonæus, and our English Herbalists: Spigelius's Itaque in rem herbariam will be of use. Wecker's Apothecariam specialem, Renodæus for composition and preparation of medicaments. See what Apothecaries do. Read Morelli's formulas medicas, Bauderoni's Pharmacopœa, Pharmacopœa Augustana. See chymical operations in hospitals, private houses. Read Fallopius, Aquapendente, Paræus, Vigo, &c. Be not a stranger to the useful part of Chymistry. See what Chymistors do in their offices. Begin with Tyrocinium Chymicum, Crollius, Hartmannus, and so by degrees march on. Materia Medicamentorum, Surgery, and Chymistry, may be your diversions and recreations; Physick is your business. Having therefore gained perfection in Anatomy, betake yourself to Sennertus's Institutiones, which read with care and diligence two or three times over, and assure yourself, that when you are a perfect master of these Institutes, you will seldom meet with any point in Physick to which you will not be able to speak like a man. This done, see how Institutes are applicable to practice, by reading upon diseases in Sennertus, Fernelius, Mercatus, Hollerius Riverius, in particular treatises, in counsels and consultations, all which are of singular benefit. But in reading upon diseases, satisfy yourself not so much with the remedies set down (altho' I would not have these altogether neglected) as with the true understanding the nature of the disease, it's causes, and proper indications for cure. For by this knowledge, and that of the instruments you are to work by, the Materia Medicamentorum, you will often conquer with ease those difficulties, through which books will not be able to bring you, secretum Medicorum est judicium. Thus have I briefly pointed out the way, which, closely pursued, will lead to the highest pitch of the art you aim at. Although I mention but a few books (which, well digested, will be instar omnium) yet it is not my intent to confine you. If at one view you would see who hath written, and upon what diseases, by way of counsel and observation, look upon Moronus's Directorium Medico-practicum. You may look upon all, but dwell upon few. I need not tell you the great use of the Greek tongue in Physick; without it nothing can be done to perfection. The words of art you may learn from Gorræus's Definitiones Medicee. This, and many good wishes, from your loving friend. T. B.

[S] Equal as well as candid judges. The celebrated Hermannus Conringius, the glory of the German nation, professed himself always a great admirer of our author, and was wont to say, he always read his Religio Medici with fresh delight; and in respect to that imputation of Atheism, or indifferency in point of Religion, which had been circulated with such industry by certain supercilious Criticks, he delivered his sentiments of it in these words: Utinam nemo Medicorum, imo Theologorum, illo homine sit minus religiosus, i. e. I wish no Physician, I will go farther and say, none of our Divines, were less religious than this man (36). If we consider the great character, and still greater merit, of Coringius, we cannot but allow his testimony to weigh down the prejudices of a multitude of minor Criticks, who have no way of raising a reputation to themselves, but by attacking such of the learned as are in possession of it. The learned and judicious Frederick Heister (37), son of the celebrated Lawrence Heister, whose system of Surgery has made him known to all the learned world, thought himself obliged, on Buddæus's publishing a large work against Atheism and Superstition, to vindicate the Physicians in general, and our author in particular, from the injurious aspersions cast upon him in that book. His defence of Dr Browne takes up the whole ninth section, in which, from a great variety of passages in our author's works, he demonstrates the cruelty of this calumny, as well as it's notorious falshood. It is true that Michael Lillenthal (38), in his dissertation on Literary Machiavelism, has a stroke at Sir Thomas Browne, as if he had been an enemy to antiquity; and the famous Peter Bayle (39) speaks but slightly of him in some parts of his works; yet when the censures and characters of these Criticks are compared and considered, they will be found to do as much honour to our author's memory, as the praises of other men. On the whole, we may safely say, that as his pen vindicated useful science by vanquishing and driving away a multitude of errors which had been long received; so his fame has triumphed over envy, and will appear in the eyes of posterity as clear and bright as the truths which he espoused; and it was with great justice this sentence was inscribed on his monument, Scriptis quibus tituli, Religio Medici & Pseudodoxia epidemica aliisque per orbem notissimas.

(36) Conringiana, p. 10.

(37) Elie Frederici Heisteri Laurentii filii Apologia pro medicis qua eorum depellitur cavillatio, qui Medicinam Atheismum alicuique in Theologia errores abducere perhibent, & qua simul precipui Medici & nominatim Hippocrates, Galenus, Cardanus, Taurellus, Vannius, & Brovianus, qui Atheismi crimine commaculati sunt, defenduntur. Amstelredami, 1736, 8vo.

(38) §. v. p. 39.

(39) See his Illustration upon the Scepticks, §. vi.

BROWNE (EDWARD) a very eminent Physician, and President of the Royal College at London, as well as Physician to his Majesty King Charles II. He was the son of Sir Thomas Browne beforementioned, and was born some time in the year 1642, notwithstanding what has been reported by some writers, who took it for granted he was in the seventieth year of his age (a) when he died. He received the first tincture of letters under the care of his father, who observing in him a great propensity to learning, resolved to spare nothing in his education (b), that might tend to the improvement of his natural genius, and gratify his strong appetite to knowledge. He spent some time at Norwich school, which was in those days very famous, and from thence, when he was about fifteen, he removed to the university of Cambridge, but in what college of that university he studied, I have not, at this distance of time, been able to discover. In all probability, the reason of his going thither was, for the sake of being near the place of his father's residence, and that he might have the opportunity of enquiring into, and facilitating his progress in learning, which exceeded even the hopes of his indulgent parent, since, while a very young man, he became a perfect master, not only of the learned languages, and more especially of Greek, but of every kind of academical knowledge, so that in 1665, he took there the degree of Bachelor of Physick (c). He removed afterwards to Oxford, and there, June 19, 1666, he was admitted to the same degree (d), and settling in Merton college the year following, viz. July 7, 1667, he proceeded Doctor in that Faculty (e), and then returned to Norwich; so that such writers as have asserted that he travelled before this time, are utterly mistaken. But after remaining about a year there, he, with the consent, and probably with the advice, of his father, resolved to make a tour through Germany, and accordingly, August 14, 1668, he embarked at Yarmouth for Holland, and having passed through the United Provinces, the Spanish Netherlands, and the Lower Germany as far as Cologne, he went from thence through Bavaria to the imperial city of Vienna, where he remained for some time, and then, passing through Moravia, and Bohemia, where he made some stay at Prague, and having examined the silver mines at Guttenberg, pursued his journey through Saxony, visiting the Electoral Residence at Dresden, the mines at Friedberg, the celebrated university of Leipsic, and the famous city of Magdeburg, from whence he travelled to Hamburg, and after a short stay there, embarked on board a vessel bound for London, and landed in Kent upon Christmas-day that year (f). In these five months he made so many curious observations, contracted acquaintance with so many persons considerable in the world by their rank or learning, and obtained such a knowledge of the advantages bestowed by travelling on persons of his profession, that he resolved to go abroad again, and to make a more extensive tour, which he accordingly did in the year following, passing through most of the dominions of the House of Austria, visiting several provinces, and taking a considerable view of the mines in Hungary; afterwards he went to Larissa in Thessaly, where the Grand Seignior then resided, and having travelled through that country and Macedonia, returned again to Vienna, from whence he went to Venice by land through the country of Friuli, which gave him an opportunity of seeing and examining the quick-silver mines. He returned from Venice to Vienna, which is three hundred and fifteen miles, alone, and upon one horse. He had, before this, made either a journey or a voyage to that city, and from thence, in company with Sir William Trumbull, who was afterwards Secretary of State, Mr Soames, Dr Palman, Dr James, and Mr Dashwood, to Genoa, from whence he returned home through France, but at what time we cannot exactly distinguish (g). In the course of his travels, besides his great improvements in all kinds of knowledge, more especially Antiquities, Natural History, and Physick, he had an opportunity of seeing the courts and persons of four of the greatest Monarchs, viz. the Emperor Leopold, at Vienna; the Grand Seignior, Mohammed IV, at Larissa; Pope Clement IX, at Rome; and Lewis XIV, at Versailles (h). Upon his return to London, he became a Member of the Royal Society, as well as of the College of Physicians (i), and being equally distinguished by his extensive learning and polite conversation, grew into high favour and esteem with the famous Earl of Dorset, and other persons of great quality and distinction (k), at whose request he published a relation of some part of his travels [A]. This book had a great character given it in the Philosophical Transactions,

and

[A] A relation of some part of his travels.] The title of this work at large runs thus: 'A brief account of some travels in Hungaria, Servia, Bulgaria, Macedonia, Thessaly, Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, Friuli, &c. By Edward Browne, M. D. of the College of London, Fellow of the Royal Society, and Physician in Ordinary to his Majesty. London in 4to.' It is to be observed, that our author, after his return from Hamburg, had communicated his design of making a tour through these countries, to some of the Members of the Royal Society; and as it was the custom of that learned body, at this time, to frame instructions for the use of travellers, that they might receive such lights as might conduce to the improvement of those sciences which fell more immediately under their inspection; so we are informed, that their Secretary delivered such to our author, which we find printed at large in the Transactions under the following title (1): 'Directions and Inquiries, as they were some time since recommended by the publisher, to the care of the ingenious and learned Dr Edward Browne (son to that deservedly famous Physician, Dr Thomas Browne, and Fellow of the Royal Society) travelling in Germany, Hungary, Turkey, &c.' To these queries, Dr Browne gave very copious answers, which were also printed at large in the Transactions; and were so full of curious, entertaining, and instructive circumstances, that he was pressed and prevailed upon to digest and put into order the whole series of his travels, in order to their being made publick. As soon as they appeared, they were taken notice of in, and recommended by, the Transactions of the

(1) See the Transactions of the Royal Society, No. LVIII. p. 1159.

(a) Hist. of Europe for 1708, p. 409.

(b) Life of Sir Thomas Browne, prefixed to his Posthumous Works.

(c) From the information of the Rev. Mr B. of St John's.

(d) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. II. col. 166.

(e) Id. ibid. col. 170.

(f) Taken from his Travels, Lond. 1685, folio.

(g) This Journey is inserted at the close of the folio edition.

(h) Sir Thomas Browne's Life by the Rev. Mr John Whitefoot, p. xxxiii.

(i) These titles are given in the Philosophical Transactions, No. XCIV. p. 6049.

(k) Hist. of Europe for 1708, p. 410.

and was received with universal applause, which, without doubt, it very well deserved; as it contained a copious and circumstantial account of several countries, with which we were very little acquainted (1); and indeed, from that time to this, there has been nothing published of the same kind that comes near it in any degree. Yet the Doctor, considering that there was some part of Germany, and more especially the baths of Aix la Chapelle, the mineral waters at Spa, and other curiosities in that neighbourhood, which he had not seen, took the advantage of the Congress held at Cologne in 1673 (m), and having accompanied thither our Plenipotentiaries, Sir Joseph Williamson, and Sir Leoline Jenkins, he went from thence, in the beginning of July, to Aix la Chapelle, and having curiously examined, not only the baths for which that city is famous, but the mines in it's neighbourhood, and particularly that of lapis calaminaris in the country of Limburgh, he proceeded to Spa, and enquired narrowly into the nature and virtue of the waters. He went next to Liege, and from thence, by Tongres, Louvain, Brussels, Antwerp, Ghent, Bruges, Ostend, Newport, and Dunkirk, to Graveline, and from thence to Calais, where he embarked for Dover, and arrived the latter end of the same year at London. He had promised, in the volume of Travels which he published, that if they were well received, he would present the world with another collection of the like nature; and it was very probably with a view of completing this second collection, that he made this last tour through Germany and the Low-Countries. Yet he did not publish his second volume 'till some years afterwards, when it met with the same reception from the learned world as the former volume had done, and with equal justice (n) [B]. About this time he settled in London, married, and began to grow into great practice, for his furtherance in which, upon the decease of Sir John Micklethwaite, a very eminent Physician, he was, upon the King's recommendation, chosen to supply his place in St Bartholomew's Hospital, some years before which, the King had made him his own Physician. He was elected at the Hospital, September 7, 1682 (o). The year following he published the Life of Themistocles, in the English translation of Plutarch undertaken by Mr Dryden, and therein gave a proof of his perfect acquaintance with the Greek language, and his great skill and accuracy in writing his own (p). On Michaelmas-day in the same year, he was, according to their charter, elected one of the Censors of the Royal College of Physicians (q). In 1684, the Life of Sertorius, as translated by him, was made publick (r); and in 1685, he augmented, as well as corrected and improved, the Collection of his Travels, which he then published all together [C]. These, as far as I have been able

(1) See the note [A].

(m) Dr Browne's Travels, p. 180.

(n) See the Philosophical Transactions, No. CXXX. p. 767.

(o) Hist. of Europe for 1708, p. 410.

(p) Plutarch's Lives, Vol. I. p. 354.

(q) As appears from the Catalogue of the Members of the College, printed that year.

(r) Plutarch's Lives, Vol. III. p. 598.

the Royal Society, in very strong terms: the publisher introducing his account of them in the following manner (3): 'This learned and inquisitive traveller gives 'fo good an account of the voyages he made through 'those parts named in the title, that thereby he excellently instructs others what great benefit may be made 'by travelling, if performed with curiosity and judgment.' After which follows a kind of extract from his travels, of several passages relating to Physical Discoveries and Natural History.

[B] The same reception from the learned world as the former volume had done, and with equal justice. The title page of this second volume of our author's travels, runs thus, 'An account of several travels through a 'great part of Germany, in four journeys. 1. From 'Norwich to Cologne. 2. From Cologne to Vienna, 'with a description of that imperial city. 3. From 'Vienna to Hamburg. 4. From Cologne to London, 'wherein the mines, baths, &c. London 1677, 4to (4). It is necessary to acquaint the reader, that the three first parts contain an account of our author's voyages to and from Germany, and his travels through a great part of that country, in 1668; so that these are prior in point of time to the travels published in the former volume. As for the fourth part, it relates to his last journey to Cologne, when the Congress was held there, of which we have given an account in the text. One may easily perceive that it was his great skill in minerals, and the curious accounts he had given upon his first return home; that, on the one hand, induced the Royal Society to lay so great a weight upon his communications, and, on the other, prompted him after two such long and fatiguing journeys, to make a third, that he might have an opportunity of viewing and examining all the remarkable mines in the Lower Germany, as he had before taken a view of those in Bohemia, Saxony, Hungary, and Friuli. It is indispensible, that the relations he has given us upon these subjects, are, beyond all comparison, clearer and more correct than any that are to be met with either in our own or perhaps in any other language. He was a man that not only understood these matters in the highest degree of perfection, but was also very far from being credulous, and took little or nothing upon trust, as appears from the accounts he gives us, in which he mentions a great variety of experiments made by himself upon the spot, in order to ascertain the facts which he delivered. It may not be amiss also to observe, that he travelled at a time when the knowledge of metals was in particular esteem, so that several Princes in Germany employed both their heads and their hands in this study, and therefore his inclination for it was sufficient to procure him in every place throughout that country a favourable reception, and even particular indulgencies. We have a very strong instance of this in the compliment made him by the learned Lambeccius, who was at that time Library-keeper to the Emperor Leopold, of not only carrying to his lodgings any Chymical manuscripts he desired, but offering to cause them to be transcribed for his use, or even to allow him to carry them with him into England (5). This second volume was also mentioned in the Philosophical Transactions with the highest marks of approbation of the book (6), and respect for its author; and this raised his reputation to such a height, that he was considered even by the most knowing men in those times, as a perfect master of Chymistry in all its branches, as well as of every part of Natural History, and of Antiquities, more especially medals, of which in this and in his former volume of travels, he delivers a great deal, and discourses of them with much sagacity and judgment, as well as on several points of Roman and Greek Literature relating to them, as he likewise does of ancient inscriptions, in the collecting which he was very diligent, and equally happy in explaining them.

[C] Corrected and improved the collection of his travels, which he then published all together. It is not necessary to give the reader the title page of this book, which comprehends only what is mentioned in those of the other two, but it is very requisite to observe, that it differs from them very much in its contents, the author having enlarged every part of it with fresh observations, so that it is in some measure a new work. Besides this, he has annexed his journey from Venice to Genoa, which is not in either of the two former volumes, and is full of great variety of curious and learned observations, in respect, more especially, to the Roman antiquities,

(3) Ibid. No. XCIV. p. 6049.

(4) In several Catalogues, this book is said to be printed A. D. 1679, but that is a mistake.

(5) Dr Browne's Travels, p. 146.

(6) Philosophical Transactions, No. CXXX. p. 707.

able to trace them, are all the works of his that are extant. Yet it is both possible and probable, that he might communicate several things to the Royal Society (s), more especially Chemical experiments, of which he made many, and of one of these we find very honourable mention, in the works of that great Philosopher, and true friend to useful knowledge, the famous Mr Boyle, of which some account will be given in the notes [D]. He attended his royal master, King Charles II, in his last illness, and to the time of his decease (t). Upon the coming of the Duke of York to the crown, he was left out of the number of his Physicians, but his practice still continued as great as ever, or rather increased. After the Revolution, he remained likewise at a distance from the Court, but his great success, in his profession, made him known and considered both at home and abroad, and that too by men of all parties and persuasions, as appears by a letter of his to the celebrated M. le Clerc, in favour of one Mr Beverland, a man of great learning, and particularly remarkable for writing a most excellent Latin stile, in which, however, he had exercised his pen on subjects that occasioned his being banished his country, on the repeal of which sentence, this letter of recommendation was written, at the request of Mr John Locke and the Earl of Carberry (u). It is, without doubt, as elegant a piece of Latin as can well be seen, and may be therefore considered as a proof of our author's excellence in that respect. In 1701, about the month of May, when King William was preparing for his last voyage to Holland, Dr Browne, in conjunction with Sir Thomas Millington, Sir Richard Blackmore, and Dr Lawrence, was called to a consultation on the state of his health, but it does not appear that he attended him in his last illness (w). In the spring of the year 1705, upon the death of Sir Thomas Millington, Dr Browne, who had risen gradually through all the honours of the Faculty, and was at that time one of the Elects, and Treasurer, succeeded him as President of the Royal College of Physicians (x), which office he filled with great abilities, and discharged it with universal approbation to the time

(s) Some pieces of his are said to be in the Philosophical Collections by Dr Hook, but these I have not seen.

(t) History of Europe for 1708, p. 410.

(u) See the General Dictionary, Vol. III. p. 302.

(w) Hist. of Europe for 1705, p. 410.

(x) Catalogue of the Members of the College for that year.

antiquities, with which he shows himself extremely well acquainted. There is one thing, however, that ought not to be passed in silence, which is his turn for Poetry, of which we will give the reader an instance, that would be no discredit even to a more modern writer. It is the following translation from Virgil, where Venus is introduced expostulating with Jupiter in the behalf of Æneas, which our author produces to prove, that Antenor was the founder of Padua, which by the way he always writes Padoa (y).

(y) Dr Browne's Travels, p. 195.

— Quem das finem, Rex magne, malorum?
Antenor potuit, mediis elapsus Achivis,
Illyricos penetrare sinus, atque intima tutus
Regna Liburnorum, et fontem superare Timavi:
Unde per ora novem vasto cum murmure montis
It mare prorupit, et pelago premit arva sonanti.
Hic tamen ille urbem Patavi sedesque locavit
Teucrorum, et genti nomen dedit, armaque fixit.

*What time, great King, shall terminate our woes?
Safe could Antenor break thro' all his foes,
Pierce to the bottom of the Illyrian bay,
View kingdoms where Liburnian princes sway;
Pass the nine mouths of fierce Timavus' waves,
Which roars upon the hills, and o'er the vallies raves,
And there could fix; and on that foreign ground,
Great Padoa's towers for after-ages found:
New name the race, and free from all alarms,
Hang up in peace his consecrated arms.*

It may not be amiss to add here, the character given of our author's performance in the large Introductory Discourse prefixed to the first volume of Churchill's Collection of Voyages, which was either written by, or at least under the direction of, the famous Mr Locke (z). 'The author, says he, a Doctor of Physick, has shewed himself excellently qualified for a traveller by this ingenious piece, in which he has omitted nothing worthy the observation of so curious a person, having spent much time in the discovery of European rarities, and that in those parts which are not the common track of travellers, who content themselves with seeing France and Italy, and the Low-Countries, whereas his relation is of Hungary, Servia, Bulgaria, Macedonia, Thessaly, Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, and Friuli; adding to these Germany, the Low-Countries, and a great part of Italy, of all which he has composed a work of great use and benefit.' To this we may subjoin, that these travels have been translated into French, and as much esteemed by the learned (g) in France, as their originals here.

(z) Churchill's Voyages, Vol. I. introduction, p. xcviij.

[D] Of which some account will be given in the note. This passage in relation to Dr Browne, occurs in Mr. Boyle's second Essay upon unsuccessful experiments, in which he proposes two things. First, To render people cautious of establishing any doctrine of consequence upon single experiments, or even on several experiments, all the circumstances of which they have not particularly observed. The other is, that practical writers should not be too hastily censured on the score of experiments by them related, failing upon repetition. After mentioning various instances in support of these positions, he proceeds thus with regard to our author (10). 'And so having been informed that the learned Dr Brown somewhere delivers, that aquafortis will quickly coagulate common oil, we poured some of those liquors together, and let them stand for a considerable space of time in an open vessel, without finding in the oil the change by him promised (though we have, more than once, with another liquor, presently thickened common oil). Whereupon, being unwilling that so faithful and candid a Naturalist should appear fit to be distrusted, we did again make the trial, with fresh oil and aquafortis, in a long-necked phial left open at the top, which we kept both in a cool place, and after in a digesting furnace; but after some weeks, we found no other alteration in the oil, than that it had acquired a high and lovely tincture; notwithstanding which, being still concerned for the reputation of a person that so well deserves a good one, the like contingencies we have formerly met with in other experiments, made us willing to try whether or no the unsuccessfulness we have related, might not proceed from some peculiar, though latent quality, either in the aquafortis, or the oil, by us formerly employed. Whereupon, changing those liquors, and repeating the experiment, we found, after some hours, the oil coagulated almost into the form of a whitish butter.' It appears clearly from hence, how great an opinion so good a judge, as Mr Boyle was, had of our author's abilities, and more especially how just a sense he had of his integrity in reporting, as well as capacity in making experiments. But at this distance of time, it has not been possible for us to recover the original experiment, as made and delivered by Dr Browne; and, therefore, this, as well as other circumstances, seems to justify what we have hinted in the text, that there may be several communications of our author's preserved in the archives of the Royal Society, exclusive of those that are to be met with in the printed Transactions, which I have very carefully examined, and find no papers bearing his name later than 1673.

(g) Lenglet du Fresnoy, Méthode pour étudier l'Histoire, Tom. IV. p. 328.

(10) Boyle's Works, Vol. I. p. 224.

time of his death, which happened on the twenty-seventh of August, 1708, in the sixty-sixth year of his age, after a very short illness; at his seat at Northfleet near Greenhithe in the county of Kent (y). He was extremely regretted by such as were best acquainted with his merit, as appears by a very large character of him, which I have been favoured with, and which was drawn up for the use of Dr Harris, in case he had lived to publish the second part of his History of Kent, in which there are several things that deserve notice, and therefore it is remitted into the notes [E]. At the time of his decease, our author had been for several years a widower, and though he had many children, yet only two survived him, a son and a daughter. Of these, the former was Dr Thomas Browne, who, at the time of his father's death, was Fellow of the Royal Society, and of the Royal College of Physicians. He was likewise a gentleman of great parts and knowledge, and made a good figure in his profession, but did not long survive his father, dying in the month of July 1710 (z), without issue. His sister married Owen Brigstock of Lechdenny in the county of Caermarthen, Esq; to whom the publick is indebted for the Posthumous Works (a) of Sir Thomas Browne; and in his family I suppose the estate of Northfleet, which was of the value of about two hundred and forty pounds a year, continues. But in case issue by his son and daughter failed, it was demised, by Dr Edward Browne, to be equally divided between the Royal College of Physicians, and St Bartholomew's Hospital (b), in regard to his having been for some time President of the former, and continuing for many years Physician to the latter.

(y) Hist. of Europe for 1708, p. 411.

(z) Le Neve's Monum. Anglic. Vol. IV. p. 164.

(a) The Preface to the Posthumous Works asserts this.

(b) Hist. of Europe for 1708, p. 411.

[E] And therefore it is remitted into the notes.] This, and various other characters of persons with whom he had been acquainted, was drawn up by an old Clegymen in Kent, out of pure zeal for the honour of that county; after whose death, they fell into the hands of the Reverend Mr Knipe, from whom I had it several years ago. 'Though this gentleman was no native of Kent, yet having settled, and lived therein many years, and seeming to have fixed his family there, in case GOD had been pleased to continue it in the male line, he may well deserve a place amongst the Kentish Worthies. He received from his father an earnest desire after useful and extensive science, which was the best inheritance he left to his son. It is wonderful, that knowing so many things as he did, he should know them all so thoroughly well. He was acquainted with Hebrew; he was a critic in Greek; and no man of his age wrote better Latin; High-Dutch, Italian, French, &c. he spoke and wrote with as much ease as his mother tongue. Physick was his business, and to the promotion thereof, all his other acquisitions were referred. Botany, Pharmacy, and Chemistry, he knew and practised.

'As to the latter, he inherited from his father the MSS of Dr A. Dee, among which too were some of John's (11); but his own lights went farther, and taught him, as some have thought, the whole Arcana of that mysterious science. In the company of the learned, his discourses were so academical, that he might be thought to have passed his days in a college. Amongst politer company, his behaviour was so easy and disengaged, you would have judged that he lived all his life in a court. With all this fund of knowledge, he was inquisitive, patient, and modest; heard with great attention, and spoke with much circumspection. In Religion, zealous without bigotry; in Politicks, inflexible but without asperity or rudeness; in private life, affable, beneficent, and cheerful. In a word, he justified what King Charles said of him on a particular occasion, he was as learned as any of the College, and as well bred as any at Court. The nobility were fond of his company; his house was the resort of strangers; and, as he acquired the prudence of age without it's grey hairs, so when they came he kept up all the cheerfulness of youth.' E

(11) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 146.

BROWN RIG, or BROUNRIG (RALPH) Bishop of Exeter in the XVIIIth century, was born at Ipswich in Suffolk, in the year 1592. His father, who was a Merchant of that place, dying when he was but a few weeks old (a), his mother took due care to have him well educated, and brought up to learning, in which he made a very considerable progress [A]. At the age of fourteen, he was sent to Pembroke-Hall in Cambridge; of which he successively became Scholar and Fellow (b) [B]; and there he distinguished himself, by his facetious and inoffensive wit, his eloquence, and his great skill and knowledge in Philosophy, History, Poetry, and all sorts of ingenuous Arts and Sciences (c). He was appointed Prævaricator when King James I. visited the University, and discharged that employment to the universal admiration of the whole audience (d). His first preferments were, the Rectory of Barley in Hertfordshire (e), and a Prebend of Ely in 1621 (f), to both which he was collated by Dr Nicholas Felton, Bishop of Ely (g). July 15, 1628, he was incorporated Doctor in Divinity at Oxford (h). On the twenty-first of September 1629, he was collated to the Prebend of Tachbrook, in the cathedral church of Lichfield (i), which he quitted September 19, 1631 (k), when he was admitted to the Archdeaconry of Coventry (l). He was likewise Master of Catherine-Hall in Cambridge (m), and proved a great benefit and ornament, both to that College and the whole University [C]. In the years 1637, 1638, 1643, and 1644, he underwent the office of Vice-

(a) Gauden, ubi supra, p. 157, 158.

(b) Word, Fasti, Vol. I. edit. 1721, col. 245.

(c) Br. Willis, as above, Vol. I. p. 465.

(d) J. Le Neve says it was the 29th, Fasti Ecl. Angl. edit. 1716, fol. p. 132.

(e) Willis, ut supra, p. 416.

(m) J. Le Neve, ibid. p. 430.

[A] In which he made a very considerable progress.] 'For he was, to a wonder, in all ages of his life, not only capable of learning, but so comprehensive, that he drank in learning not as narrow-mouthed bottles (to which young learners are compared) by drops, but as a sponge by great draughts, even in his minority. — Nay, he scarce had any minority, comparatively to others, except in growth and stature; for he was above his equals or coetaneans; superior or major in abilities, when inferior or minor in years (1).'

[B] Of which he successively became Scholar and Fellow.] 'He was made a Fellow, a little sooner than either his years or standing, according to the statutes of the college, permitted. But the college was impatient not to make sure of him, by grafting him firmly into their Society; which had been famous for many excellent men, but for none more than for him (2).'

[C] And proved a great benefit and ornament both to that College and the whole University.] So that, it was wonderful to see, how the buildings, the revenues, the students, and the studiousness of that place increased, by the care, counsel, prudence, diligence, and

(2) Ibid. p. 146.

(a) Memorials of Bishop Brounrig, by D. Gauden; at the end of his Funeral Sermon, Lond. 1660. 8vo. p. 142, 143.

(b) Ibid. p. 146.

(c) Ibid. p. 147.

(d) Ibid. p. 154, 155.

(e) See Bishop Kennet's Register and Chronicle, &c. Lond. 1728, fol. p. 618.

(f) Br. Willis's Survey of the Cathedrals, &c. Vol. II. edit. 1710, 4to. p. 385.

(1) Gauden, ubi supra, p. 143, 144.

(n) Account of the Numbers and Sufferings of the Clergy, &c. by J. Walker, Lond. 1714, vol. P. ii. p. 23.

(o) Willis, ubi supra, p. 274.

(p) Life of Bishop Morton, 4to. p. 162.

(q) J. Walker, ubi supra, and Br. Willis, as above, Vol. II. p. 385.

To the liking of 'all good men,' says Wood, Fasti, Vol. I. edit. 1721, col. 245.

(r) Gauden, ubi supra, p. 191, 192.

(s) Gauden, ibid. p. 201—206. He found, as Dr Gauden observes, the predominant genius of the times was such, that instead of letting Bishops live in a capacity to be given to hospitality, they reduced them to the necessity of getting into some hospital for their relief. p. 203.

(t) J. Walker, ubi supra.

Vice-Chancellor, which he discharged to the universal satisfaction of all people, and to his own great credit (n). In 1641, he was presented to the eleventh Stall or Prebend in the church of Durham (o), by Dr Thomas Morton, Bishop of that diocese, to whom he was chaplain (p). Upon the translation of Dr Joseph Hall to the Bishoprick of Norwich, Dr Brownrig was nominated to succeed him in the See of Exeter, in 1641. Accordingly he was elected March 31, 1642; confirmed May 14; consecrated the day following; and installed the first of June (q). But the troubles that soon after followed, did not permit him long to enjoy that dignity. Before the beginning of them, he was much esteemed, and highly commended, by his relation Mr John Pym, and others of the Presbyterian stamp (r); but they forsook him; only because he was a Bishop, and suffered him to be deprived of his revenues, so that he was almost reduced to want (s). Nay, once he was assaulted, and like to have been stoned by the rabble, his episcopal character being his only crime (t). About the year 1645, he was deprived of his mastership of Catherine-Hall, on account of a sermon preached by him before the University, on the King's inauguration; at some passages of which offence was taken by the Parliament-party; and neither his piety, gravity, or learning, were sufficient to preserve him in his station (u). Being thus robbed of all, he retired to the house of Thomas Rich, of Sunning, Esq; in Berkshire, by whom he was generously entertained [D]: and there, and sometimes at London, at Highgate, and St Edmundsbury, spent several years (w) [E]. During which time, he had the courage to advise Oliver Cromwell to restore King Charles II. to his just rights (x). But, notwithstanding, he suffered in his reputation, of not being zealous enough for the Church (y). About a year before his decease, he was invited to be a preacher at the Temple, in London, with a handsome allowance; and accordingly he went and settled there, in good lodgings furnished for him (z). But his old distemper, the stone, coming upon him with greater violence than usual, and being attended with the dropsy, and the infirmities of age, they all together put an end to his life, on the seventh of December 1659 (a): he was buried the seventeenth following in the Temple-church, where there is an epitaph over him [F]. He was once married, but never had a child (b). Though he was very elaborate and exact in his compositions, and compleatly wrote his sermons (c); yet he could not be persuaded to put any thing in print (d). But several of his sermons were published after his decease [G]. Bishop Brownrig, as to his person, was taller and bigger than ordinary, yet very comely. The majesty of his presence was so allayed with meekness, candor, and humility, that no man was further from any thing morose or supercilious (e). He had a great deal of wit, as well as wisdom (f); and was an excellent scholar, an admirable orator, an acute disputant, a pathetick preacher, and a prudent governor, full of judgment, courage, constancy, and impartiality (g). He was likewise a person of that soundness of judgment, of that conspicuity for an unspotted life, and of that unsuspected integrity, that he was a compleat pattern to all (h). In a word, Dr Gauden, who had known him above thirty years, declares (i), that he never heard of any thing said

(u) Fuller's Hist. of the University of Cambridge, edit. 1655, fol. p. 169.

(w) Gauden, as above, p. 197, 219.

(x) J. Walker, ubi supra.

(y) See Life of Dr John Barwick in English 3vo. Append. No. XXIV. p. 488.

(z) Gauden, as above, p. 220, 221. His last Sermon was on Nov. 5. 1659. ibid. p. 181.

(a) Gauden, ibid. p. 229.

(b) Ibid. p. 204, 205, &c. His wife lived but a little while, ib.

(c) Ibid. p. 209.

(d) Ibid. p. 213.

(e) Ibid. p. 232, 233.

(f) Ibid. p. 146—154.

(g) Ibid. p. 195.

(h) Ibid. p. 137.

(i) Ibid. p. 138, 139.

(3) Ibid. p. 160.

and fame of Dr Brownrig, who had such an eye to all, that he over-saw none; frequenting the studies, and examining even younger scholars, that they might be encouraged, both in learning and piety (3).

[D] By whom he was generously entertained.] Not that he wholly depended upon his bounty, and must have starved without it. For 'his wife brought him a very handsome estate in money, and being consumptive, and so likely to die without child, she desired him to give her leave to give away by will, as she pleased, to her friends some part of that estate she brought him. He most heartily granted her desire (if he would to the half, or all her estate). She having made this essay of his noble mind, told him, with thanks and tears, that she gave all she had to him as her best friend, and one that deserved much more than she could give him. Soon after she left him.—After-times shewed him, what a providence it was, by so ingenuous a way to have something of estate cast in, to defend himself against the after-injuries and pressures of life, besides learning and merit. For that estate was his best reserve; though the distress of times had firewedly wire-drawn that also before he died (4).'

[E] And sometimes at London, at Highgate, and St Edmundsbury, spent several years.] 'Willing, (as Dr Gauden observes) (5) to appear, as he thought himself, and was treated in this world, a pilgrim and stranger, never at home, nor owning any home, till he came to Heaven, which was his father's house, where he should find better natured, and more loving brethren than those, that, as Joseph's, had without cause, stripp'd him, and cast him into a pit of narrowness and obscurity to die there.'

[F] Where there is an epitaph over him.] Which was composed by Dr Gauden, his successor in the See of Exeter, and is as follows:

(4) Gauden, ubi supra, p. 206, 207.

(5) Ubi supra, p. 219.

*Sumptibus & Auspiciis Honorab. Societat.
Templi, subtus positæ sunt Reliquiæ
RADOLPHI BROWNRIG, S. T. D. Cantabr.
Reverendiss. Episcopi Exon. quem honorem
Optime meruit, & per annos xix tenuit.
Malo tamen seculi fato Bellis, Schismatibus,
Sacriligiis, & Regicidiis ferociente, nunquam
Exercuit. Tandem anno ætatis LXVII. Provinciam
Terrestrem nondum visam deserens, ad coelestem
Migravit. Æra Christi MDCLX. illucescente
Caroli II. foelicissimo reditu, L. M. P. I. G.
Epis. Exon. Electus.*

The meaning of which is, 'That the remains of Ralph Brownrig, the right reverend Bishop of Exeter, had been deposited there, at the charge of the honourable Society of the Temple. That he well deserved, and possessed for 19 years, the episcopal dignity, but never enjoyed it, by reason of the bad times he lived in; full of schisms, sacrilege, king-killing, and wars. At length leaving his earthly province which he never saw, he passed into Heaven, in the 67th year of his age. And, that this monumental stone was put down by J. Gauden, Bishop Elect of Exeter, in the year 1660, at the dawn of King Charles II's Restoration.' [G] But several of his sermons were published after his decease.] Some of his sermons were published at London in 1662, fol. under this title; 'Forty sermons preached by the Right Reverend Father in God Ralph Brownrig, late Lord Bishop of Exeter. Published by William Martyn, M. A. Preacher at the Rolls: being such sermons as have been perused and approved of by the Right Reverend Father in God, John Gauden, now Lord Bishop of Exeter, his reverend and worthy successor.' They were reprinted (with or done by him, which a wife and good man would have wished unsaid or undone. We shall give the rest of his character in the note [H].

(with the addition of twenty-five more, which make a second Volume) under this general title; 'Sixty-five Sermons by the Right Reverend Father in God, Ralph Brownrig, late Lord Bishop of Exeter. Published by William Martyn, M. A. sometimes Preacher at the Rolls. Lond. 1674. fol. in two Volumes.' The first Volume is dedicated to King Charles II. and the second to Gilbert (Sheldon) Archbishop of Canterbury. At the beginning of the first Volume, there is a letter from Bishop Gauden to the publisher, dated June 12, 1661, in which he gives, both the author, and the sermons, a very great character. — Bishop Brownrig's style is tolerably good, and his sentences generally short. But he is too full of divisions and subdivisions, and of scraps of Latin and Greek: which was the great fault of the age he lived in. He hath something particular in his manner of writing, which will be best understood by the following instances. 'The chapter, 'tis a pathetic expoliation of God with his chosen people, &c (6). — The text, 'tis a prophecy, &c. (7).

[H] We shall give the rest of his character in the note. Lr Gauden informs us (besides what hath been already cited from him) that he was 'a person of those ample and cubical dimensions, for height of learning and understanding, for depth of humility and devotion, for length of all morality and virtue, and for breadth of all humanity and charity, that it is hard to contract or epitomize him (8)' — And, 'that he had the learning of Nazianzen, Basil, or Jerom; the courage and constancy of Athanasius and St Ambrose; the eloquence of St Chryostom and Chryostogus; the mildness and gentleness of St Cyprian or St Austin; the charity and benignity of Paulinus or Martinus. And bore his troubles with great contentedness and patience (9).' Another author (10), gives him this character, that he was 'a great man for the Anti-arminian cause (for he was a rigid Calvinist) yet a mighty champion for the Liturgy and Ordination by Bishops. And his death was highly lamented by men of all parties.'

(8) Gauden, ubi supra, p. 135.

(9) Ibid. p. 201.

(10) Echard's Hist. of England, edit. 1720, fol. p. 752.

(6) Beginning of Sermon on Macab vi. 5. Vol. I. p. 63.

(7) In the same Volume, p. 76.

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon Vol. I. col. 38. edit. 1721.

(b) Life and Reign of Richard III. by G. Buc, in Complete Hist. Lond. 1706, Vol. II. p. 545.

(c) Camden's Britannia, edit. 1722. Vol. II. col. 1092.

(d) G. Buc, ibid.

(e) Hollingshed's Chron. Vol. II. p. 762. edit. 1887, and G. Buc, ubi supra.

BUC (GEORGE), a learned Antiquarian, was born in Lincolnshire (a) in the XVIth century, and flourished in the beginning of the XVIIth. He was descended from the ancient family [A] of the Bucs, [or Buckes] of West-Stanton and Herthill in Yorkshire, and Melford-hall in Suffolk (b). His great-grand-father, Sir John Buc, Knt. (c) was one of King Richard III's favourites, and attended that unfortunate Prince to the battle of Bosworth, where he lost his crown and life (d). In the first Parliament of King Henry VII, this Sir John Buc was attainted, for being one of the chief aiders and assistants, to the King just now mentioned, in the battle of Bosworth, and soon after was beheaded at Leicester (e). By this attainder, his posterity were reduced to very great streights (f); but, through the favour and interest of Thomas Duke of Norfolk, the great patron of the family, they had probably some of their estates restored to them, and, among others, that in Lincolnshire (g), where our author was born. In the reign of King James I, he was made one of the Gentlemen of his Majesty's Privy-Chamber, and knighted (h). He was also constituted Master of the Revels, whose office was then kept upon St Peter's-Hill, in London (i). What he mostly distinguished himself by, was, writing The Life and Reign of Richard III, in five books [B]; wherein, in opposition to the whole body of English historians, he endeavours to represent that Prince's person and actions, in a quite different light from what they have been by others; and takes great pains to wipe off the bloody stains that have been fixed upon his character [C]. He hath also written, The third Universitie of England; or, A Treatise of the Foundations of all the Colledges, ancient Schooles of Priviledge, and of Houses of Learning, and liberall Arts, within and about the most famous Citie of London. With a briefe report of the Sciences, Arts, and Faculties therein professed, studied, and practised [D]. And a treatise of The Art of Revels (k). Mr Camden (l) gives

(f) G. Buc, ubi supra.

(g) See G. Buc, ubi supra.

(h) Wood, Ath. Vol. I. col. 38.

(i) See Dedicator of his Third Universitie of England. Wood, ubi supra, and Camden, Brit. ubi supra.

(k) See his Third Universitie of England, cap. 47.

(l) Britannia, Vol. II. col. 1092.

[A] He was descended from the ancient family of the Bucs. This family derive their descent from Sir Walter de Buc, a younger son of the house of Flanders; who came over to England, in King John's reign (1), as one of the Commanders of those Rutarii, or adventurers, sent for by that King, to assist him against his Barons (2). Walter behaving with great prudence and bravery, was rewarded by that Monarch with lands in Yorkshire and Northamptonshire, where his posterity flourished for many generations (3).

'was of bodily shape comely enough, only of low stature.' And he concludes (6), that he was 'without disproportion and unevenness either in lineament or parts' And that he had, 'even from those bitterest times in which he lived, the esteem of a valiant, wise, noble, charitable, and religious prince.' He also labours hard, to clear him of the imputation, of having been the murderer of King Henry VI. King Edward V, and his brother Prince Richard, &c (7). It is indeed very probable, that his ancestors obligations to the house of York, and the cruel attainder under Henry VII, might bias him very much. But it is likewise certain, that great abatements ought to be in all the ill that hath been said of King Richard III. Sir Thomas More, who composed his life, writ, as Mr Rapin observes (8), when the throne was filled with the Princes of the house of Lancaster, and at a time when it was almost a crime to praise or speak well of the Princes of the house of York: and, after-writers have copied him without examination. For, hating Richard's too great eagerness, and unlawful measures taken, to obtain the Crown; he behaved well in other respects, and expressed a due regard for learning and religion, a concern for checking vice and wickedness, and a greater care for the good and welfare of his people, than many of his successors have done.

(6) Ibid. p. 577.

(7) Ibid. p. 549, 550, 551.

(8) Hist. of Engl. fol. Lond. 1733. Vol. I. p. 627.

[B] The life and reign of Richard III. It is printed in that collection of the English Historians, made by Doctor (afterward Bishop) Kennet, which was published at London, in 1706. 3 Vols fol. and again there in 1719, with notes and animadversions by the industrious Mr Strype. This book, as the ingenious Mr Hughes observes (4), 'is much too loosely writ for a History; it is pedantick and full of harangue, and may more properly be called, A Defence of King Richard than any thing else.' Besides, it is full of needless digressions, and too frequent quotations out of the Greek and Latin writers; and abounds with faults, which, in a man of his learning, is something unaccountable.

[C] He endeavours to represent that Prince's person and actions in a different light from what they have been by others. He will neither allow him to have had any deformity in mind or body: and is angry to find him deforibed by others crook-back'd, and of an ill countenance; so that he seems to be for reverfing his character throughout. Thus he says (5), 'That he

[D] The third Universitie in England, &c. This is printed at the end of the folio edition of J. Stow's Chronicle by E. Howes, Lond. 1631, and dedicated to Sir Edward Coke, Knight, the dedication bearing date, August 24. 1612. His design in that treatise, is, to present

(1) G. Buc's Life of King Richard, ubi supra.

(2) See M. Paris, ad ann. 1215.

(3) G. Buc, ubi supra. Camden's Britan. Vol. II. col. 1092.

(4) Preface to Complete Hist. at the beginning of Vol. I.

(5) In Complete Hist. Vol. II. p. 543. col. 2.

gives him the character of 'a person of excellent learning,' and thankfully acknowledges, that he 'remarked many things in his histories, and courteously communicated his observations to him.' But what character is given of him by others, the reader may see in the note [B].

(9) Epistle Decidat.
 (10) End of chap. ii, and chap. iii.

' present a view of the Academical State, and of the ' Universality of the Studies, and of the liberall Arts, and Learnings taught and professed in the citie of London (9): and to set down, first, the beginnings and foundations of all the Colledges and Schooles of Learning within and about the city of London, with a briefe mention of the Arts, Sciences, and Faculties, professed and taught in them: next the names of the founders, with the times of their erection and foundation: and, lastly, close every one of them with the blazon of the Armes belonging to every School and Colledge (10). These Schools and Colleges he divides into three parts; namely,

1. Schools of Divinity, 2. Colleges of the Common Law, 3. and those of the Civil Lawes, &c. The first are St Paul's Cathedral, Westminster-Abbey, St Peter's Cornhill, and other churches, where there are regular Lectures, and settled Sermons. The second are, The Temple, and several Inns of Court. The third, Doctors Commons: With the College of Physicians, Gresham College, Whittington College, St Catherine's, Christ-Church, St Anthony's College, and the College of Herald's. He shows, at the same time, that all sorts of liberal Arts and Sciences are taught in London. C

BULL (JOHN), a celebrated Musician, and Doctor in that faculty, was descended from a family of that name in Somersethire, and born about the year 1563 (a). Having discovered an excellent natural genius for Musick, he was educated in that science, when very young, under Mr William Blitheman, an eminent Master, and Organist of the chapel to Queen Elizabeth. On the ninth of July 1586, he was admitted Bachelor of Musick at Oxford, having exercised that art fourteen years (b); and, we are told (c), he would have proceeded in that Univerfity, 'had he not met with clowns and rigid Puritans there, that could not endure Church-Musick.' Some time after, he was created Doctor of Musick at Cambridge; but in what year, is uncertain, there being a deficiency in the register (d). In 1591, he was appointed Organist to the Queen's chapel, in the room of Mr Blitheman deceased; and on the seventh of July, the year following, he was incorporated Doctor of Musick at Oxford (e). He was greatly admired for his fine hand on the organ [A], as well as for his compositions; several of which have been long since published in musical collections [B]; besides a large number in manuscript, that make a part of the curious and valuable collection of Musick, now reposit in the library of Dr Pepusch. Upon the establishment of Gresham-College, Dr Bull was chosen the first Professor of Musick there, about the beginning of March 1596, through the recommendation of Queen Elizabeth; and not being able to speak in Latin, he was permitted to deliver his lectures altogether in English: which practice, so far as appears, has been ever since continued, though the professors of that science have been all men of learning. In 1601, his health being impaired, so that he was unable to perform the duty of his place, he went to travel, having obtained leave to substitute, as his deputy, Mr Thomas Birde, son of Mr William Birde, one of the gentlemen of her Majesty's chapel. He continued abroad above a year; during which interval, probably, happened the remarkable story related of him by Anthony Wood (f) [C].

After

[A] He was greatly admired for his fine hand on the organ. Here we shall set down the following little story, taken out of one of our Historians (1) of those times. On the 16th of July 1607, the King and Prince Henry, with many of the nobility, and other honourable persons, dined at Merchant-Taylor's Hall, it being the election-day of their Master and Wardens; when the Company's Roll being offered to his Majesty, he said, he was already free of another company, but that the Prince should grace them with the acceptance of his freedom, and that he would himself see, when the garland was put on his head; which was done accordingly. During their stay, they were entertained with a great variety of Music, both voices and instruments, and with several speeches. And while the King sat at dinner, Dr Bull, 'who was free of the company, being in a cittyzens gowne, cappe, and hood, played most excellent melodie uppon a small payre of organs, placed there for that purpose only.' To which may be added what Mr Wood affirms (2), that he was so much admired for his dextrous hand on the organ, that many thought there was more than man in him.

[B] Some of his compositions have been long since published in musical collections. As, I. Parthenia, or, The Maiden-head of the first Musick, that ever was printed for the Virginals: Composed by three famous Masters; William Byrd, Dr John Bull, and Orlando Gibbons, Gentlemen of her Majesties Chappell. This book was printed at London in folio, but without any date, and was the prime book, for many years, that was used by learners and others that exercised their hands on that instrument. It contains twenty-one lessons, taken off from copper-plates (3); of which those from nine to fifteen inclusive were made by Dr Bull (4). Mr Ward tells us (5), he has seen another edition of this book, dated 1659, with the words cum privilegio underneath, tho' the two last figures seem to have been altered; nor was that time at all suited to publish works of this kind, while the affairs of the nation were in such disorder. II. The first book of selected Church-Musick, consisting of Services and Anthems, such as are now used in the Cathedral and Collegiate Churches of this kingdom; never before printed: Collected out of divers approved authors by John Barnard, one of the Minor Canons of the Cathedral Church of St Paul, London, 1641, in folio. In this collection the Anthem. Deliver me, O God, fol. 123, is ascribed to Dr Bull. III. The divine Services and Anthems usually sung in the cathedrals, and collegiate choirs, in the Church of England; collected by James Clifford, Petty Canon of St Paul's, and sometimes Chorister of Magdalen-College in Oxford. Lond. 1663. in octavo (6). Some of Dr Bull's pieces are inserted in this collection at p. 36, 137, 187, &c.

[C] A remarkable story related of him by Anthony Wood The story, as that Biographer tells it (7), is this. 'Dr Bull took occasion to go incognito into France and Germany. At length, hearing of a famous Musician belonging to a certain cathedral (at St Omers, as I have heard) he applied himself as a novice to him, to learn something of his faculty, and to see and admire his works. This Musician, after some discourse had passed between them, conducted Bull to a vestry, or musick-school, joining to the cathedral, and shewed to him a lesson or song of forty parts, and then made a vaunting challenge to any person in the world to add one more part to them; supposing it to be so complete and full, that

(6) So says Mr Wood, ubi supra, col. 73. But Mr Ward (ubi supra) tho' he confesses he has not seen the book, says, in folio.

(7) Ubi supra.

(a) Communicated by Dr Pepusch. See Mr John Ward's Lives of the Professors of Gresham-college, Lond. 1740, p. 199.

(b) Wood, Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 131.

(c) Id. ib. col. 144.

(d) Communicated by the late Rev. Mr Th. Baker of Cambridge. See Mr Ward, ubi supra.

(e) Wood, ubi supra.

(f) Ward, ubi supra, p. 200—202.

(1) Stow's Chron. ed. 1615, p. 891.

(2) Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 144.

(3) Wood, ibid.

(4) Mr John Ward's Lives of the Professors of Gresham-college, Lond. 1740, p. 203.

After the death of Queen Elizabeth our Professor became chief Organist to King James I (g); and, December the twentieth the same year, he resigned his Professorship of Gresham-College, but for what reason is not known (b). In 1613, he again left England, induced, probably, by the declining reputation of Church-Musick [D], which at this time had not that regard paid to it, that had been formerly. He went directly into the Netherlands, where, about Michaelmas the same year, he was received into the service of the Archduke (i); and Mr Wood says (k), he died at Hamburg, or (as others, who remember him, have said) at Lubeck. His picture is yet preserved in the Musick-School at Oxford, among other famous Professors of that science, which hang round the room.

‘ it was impossible for any mortal man to correct, or add to it. Bull thereupon desiring the use of ink and ruled paper (such as we call musical paper) prayed the Musician to lock him up in the school for two or three hours, which being done, not without great disdain, by the Musician; Bull, in that time, or less, added forty more parts to the said lesson or song. The Musician thereupon being called in, he viewed, tried it, and re-tried it. At length he burst out into a great extasy, and swore by the great God, that he that added those forty parts must either be the Devil or Dr Bull. Whereupon Bull making himself known, the Musician fell down, and adored him. Afterwards continuing there, and in those parts, for a time, he became so much admired, that he was courted to accept of any place or preferment, suitable to his profession, either within the dominions of the Emperor, King of France, or Spain. But the tidings of these transactions coming to the English court, Queen Elizabeth commanded him home. That part of the story relating to the forty parts said to have been added by Dr Bull in two or three hours, has been rejected by our best artists in Musick, as a thing wholly improbable. And the account they give, as handed down to them by tradition, is this; that the lesson or song, when delivered to the Doctor, consisted of sixteen parts, to which he added four others. This, considering the fulness of the piece before, and the shortness of the time, in which he made those additions, is esteemed by them an extraordinary performance, and what might justly occasion the greatest surprize in the Musician, upon the first sight of it (8).

[D] The declining state of Church-Musick.] It is well known, that Church-Musick, for which the Doctor was so especially celebrated, had received a very great change by the Reformation, the Motettis of Saints, Aves, Salves, and the like, being all rejected, where that prevailed. In the Church of England, the matter of it was adapted to the Liturgy. And the Lutherans seem to have gone much the same length in retaining the solemn service, tho’ with more instruments and variety of harmony. But the Calvinists, at the same time, wholly excluded this service, and substituted a metrical psalmody instead of alternate and antiphonical chanting, which by degrees obtained in our English churches; so that the former was kept up only in the colleges, cathedrals, and royal chapels, from which also attempts were made by some courtiers in the time of Queen Elizabeth to get it removed, had she not prevented it by her Injunction (9). However, that our most celebrated composers of Church-Musick till that time flourished in her reign, is acknowledged by a noted author upon this subject. ‘ Since the time, says he (10), that the old Primate of England Theodore, with his assistant Adrian the Monk, first established the skilful use of Musick throughout all the Saxon-English Churches; and the good old Bishop Putta of Rochester, being driven from his diocese by the Mercians, thought it no disparagement to go about the churches, and teach them choral harmony; many, doubtless, have excelled from time to time in this faculty among us: yet none, that we know of, have committed ought to score, which would be much useful, or pleasing to the ears of our age, till Queen Elizabeth. Her reign brought forth a noble birth, as of all learned men, so of famous composers in Church Musick.’ This was very probably owing to the encouragement given by that Princess to this art in common with others, as well by her example as favour; for she was not only a lover of Musick, but likewise skilled in it herself. And therefore Richard Mulcaster, then Master of Merchant-Taylor’s school, paid her an handsome compliment on that account in the following verses:

Regia majestas, ætatis gloria nostræ,
Hanc in deliciis semper habere solet;
Nec contenta graves aliorum audire labores;
Ipsa etiam egregiè voce manue canit (11).

That is,

The Queen, the glory of our age and isle,
With royal favour bids this science smile;
Nor bears she only others labour’d lays,
But, artist-like, herself both sings and plays.

But notwithstanding there were many artists of that profession, who were then very eminent both for their skill and compositions, the esteem of that science began to sink very much in the following reign; so that several masters, in publishing their compositions, complain of the great want of court-patrons at that time, and therefore dedicate their works to one another (12).

T

BULL (GEORGE), Bishop of St David’s, was born in the parish of St Cuthbert, at Wells in Somersetshire, the twenty-fifth of March 1634 (a). He was descended from an antient and gentle family, seated at Shapwick in that county. Our Prelate’s father, Mr George Bull [A], dedicated his son to the Church from his infancy, having declared at the font, that he designed him for Holy Orders. He died when young George was but four years old, and left him under the care of guardians, with an estate of two hundred pounds per annum. When he was fit to receive the first rudiments of learning he was placed

[A] His father, Mr George Bull.] He was second son of William Bull, Esq; who had ten sons and eight daughters; so that, by reason the family was so numerous, he was bred to a trade in Wells, and became a principal member in that corporation. The settling him in the world after this manner was contrary to his own inclinations, which led him to a learned education: but the choice of his parents determined him another way, in which he succeeded much better than persons usually do who engage against the bent of their dispositions. ‘ I venture, says Mr Nelson (1), to call him a good man, because the memory that is still preserved of him representeth him, as a pson that was very ‘ conscientious in his dealing, and very pious towards God; and when he left off his trade, which he was never well pleased with, because it diverted him from Holy Orders, which he chiefly coveted, he gave considerable charities to the poor; and after having been twice Mayor of the city of Wells, became a benefactor to the corporation.’ The direct male line of this antient family being extinct, the estate devolved upon Mrs Eleanor Doddington, sole heiress of Henry Bull, Esq; of Shapwick, and wife of George Doddington, Esq; member of Parliament, in Queen Anne’s reign, for the borough of Bridgwater, and one of the Lord’s Commissioners of the Admiralty.

[B] He

(8) Ward, ubi supra, p. 200, 201.

(1) Life of Dr George Bull, &c. by Robert Nelson, Esq; Lond. 1713; 824, p. 8.

(g) Wood, ibid.

(b) Ward, ibid. p. 201.

(i) Communicated by Dr Pepusch.

(k) ibid.

(9) MS. Dr Pepusch ap. Ward; ib p. 201.

(10) In the Dedication of The first Book of selected Church Musick, &c. See the title at length in the remark [C].

(11) In a Poem prefixed to a book intitled Discantus cantiones, quæ ab argumento sacræ vocantur, quinque et sexpartium: Autoribus Thoma Talliso et Gulielmo Birro, Anglis, Sec. 1575, quarto oblongo.

(12) Ward, ib. p. 202.

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 954. and The Life of Dr George Bull, &c. by Robert Nelson, Esq; Lond. 1713; 820, p. 6.

placed in a grammar-school at Wells, from whence he was soon removed to the free-school of Tiverton in Devonshire; where he made a very quick progress in classical learning [B], and became qualified for the University at fourteen years of age (b). He was entered a Commoner of Exeter-College in Oxford, the tenth of July 1648 (c), under the tuition of Mr Baldwin Ackland. And tho' he lost much of the time he spent at the University, in the pursuit of pleasures and diversions; yet, by the help of Logic, which he mastered with little labour, and a close way of reasoning, which was natural to him, he soon gained the reputation of a smart disputant, and as such was taken notice of and encouraged by his superiors, particularly Dr Conant, Rector of the College, and Dr Prideaux, Bishop of Worcester, who at that time resided in Oxford. At the University Mr Bull began his acquaintance with Mr Clifford, afterwards Lord High-Treasurer (d) [C]. He continued in Exeter-College 'till January 1649 (e); at which time, having refused to take the oath to the Commonwealth of England [D], he retired, with his tutor Mr Ackland, who had set him the example, to North-Cadbury in Somersetshire; where he continued under the care of that good and able man, 'till he was about nineteen years of age. This retreat gave him an opportunity of frequent converse with one of his sisters, whose good sense, and pious admonitions, weaned him entirely from all youthful vanities, and influenced him to a serious prosecution of his studies (f). And now, by the advice of his friends and guardians, he put himself under the care of Mr William Thomas (g) Rector of Ubley in Somersetshire [E], in whose house he boarded, with some of his sisters, for the space of two years. It is true, he received little or no assistance, or real improvement, in the study of Divinity from that gentleman; but the acquaintance he had an opportunity of contracting with Mr Thomas's son [F], made him some amends for the loss of time under such a director. For 'till now Mr Bull had applied himself entirely to the reading little systems of Divinity, such as Wollebius's; but, his judgment being ripened, he grew more and more out of conceit with that sort of Theology, and began to study Hooker, Hammond, Taylor, Episcopius, &c. with which his friend, Mr Samuel Thomas, supplied him [G]. Two years after he had left Mr Thomas, he entertained thoughts of entering into Holy Orders, and for that purpose applied himself to Dr Skinner, the ejected Bishop of Oxford, by whom he was ordained Deacon and Priest the same day [H], being at that time but twenty-one years

(b) Nelson's Life of Dr G. Bull, ubi supra, p. 7—11.

(c) Wood, ubi supra.

(d) Life, &c. p. 11—15.

(e) Wood, ibid.

(f) ib. p. 17, 18.

(g) Anthony Wood tells us, he was put under the care of Mr Henry Jeanes, Rector of Chedzey in Somersetshire; but Mr Nelson says nothing of that gentleman.

[B] He made a very quick progress in classical learning. Mr Samuel Butler, the Master of Tiverton school, was very eminent in his profession, being an excellent Grammarian both in Latin and Greek, and very diligent in the care and observation of his scholars. It was his usual method, when he gave his boys themes for verses, to press them to exert themselves and do their best, because he judged how far each boy's capacity would carry him; but he always told George Bull, that he expected from him verses like those of Ovid, because, said he, I know you can do it; sufficiently intimating thereby, that his scholar had a capacity and genius that enabled him to excel in such exercises (2).

(2) Ibid. p. 10, 11.

[C] He became acquainted with Mr Clifford, afterwards Lord High-Treasurer. The greatness of Mr Bull's friend was attended with no advancement to his fellow collegiate; though Mr Nelson tells us (3), he was informed, that his Lordship did make some attempts to procure Mr Bull preferment, and particularly solicited the Lord-Keeper Bridgman for a prebend of Gloucester: but, probably, no vacancy happened in the Church during my Lord's short reign of favour; besides, Mr Bull living at a distance from Court, and not understanding the art of intriguing for preferment, might easily be forgot by a great man, who could not want for such as were perpetually soliciting his favour.

(3) Ibid. p. 15.

[D] He refused to take the oath to the Commonwealth of England. Mr Bull had not been admitted two years in Exeter-college, before the Engagement was imposed upon the nation by a pretended Act of Parliament, which passed in January 1649. The kingly office being abolished upon the murder of King Charles I. it was declared, that for the time to come, England should be governed as a commonwealth by Parliament; and this oath was prepared, and ordered to be taken by the subjects, That they would be true and faithful to the Commonwealth of England, as it was then established, without a King or House of Lords. Whoever refused to take this engagement, was disqualified thereby from holding any place or office in the Church or in State; and they who had no employments to lose, were to be deprived of the benefit of the Law, and to be disabled from suing in any Court. There was great zeal shewn in several places to procure this acknowledgment and submission from the people to this new government; and among others, all the members of the Universities were summoned to appear, and take the appointed oath. Our young student appeared upon this occasion, and signified himself by refusing to take it. The several Hypotheses that were then started to make men easy under a change of government, which was directly contrary to the national constitution, could not prevail upon him to comply. Neither the argument of Providence, nor present possession, nor the advantages of protection, which were all pleaded in those times, were strong enough to influence a mind that was early determined to be constant in his duty to the Church and the King (4).

(4) Ibid. p. 15, 16.

[E] Mr William Thomas, Rector of Ubley in Somersetshire. This gentleman then was in great reputation for his piety, and esteemed one of the chief Ministers of his time in the neighbourhood where he lived. He was always reckoned a Puritan, and closed with the Presbyterian measures in 1642, and was appointed an assistant to the Commissioners for ejecting such whom they called scandalous, ignorant, and insufficient Ministers and School-masters. He lived to be ejected himself for Non-conformity, and died in 1667 (5).

(5) Ibid. p. 22, 23.

[F] Mr Thomas's son. Mr Samuel Thomas was a person of a very valuable character for his piety and learning: He was afterwards Chaplain at Christ Church in Oxford, Vicar of Chard in Somersetshire, and Prebendary of Wells. The friendship contracted between this gentleman and Mr Bull was afterwards cultivated by many mutual kind offices; and when they were at a distance, it was supported by a frequent correspondence (6).

(6) Ibid.

[G] ——— With which Mr Samuel Thomas supplied him This he did at the hazard of his father's displeasure: for the old gentleman had a watchful eye over Mr Bull, and never found any of these books in his study without discovering visible marks of his anger and resentment. For being well acquainted with his son's principles, and with the intimate correspondence there was between them, he easily guessed from what quarter Mr Bull was provided with so much Heterodoxy, and would often say, My son will corrupt his Bull (7).

(7) Ibid. p. 24.

[H] He was ordained Deacon and Priest the same day. The Bishop, tho' he was willing to ordain Mr Bull, yet refused to give him, or any others, Letters of Orders under his own hand and seal, for this prudential reason, because he was apprehensive some ill use might be made of them, if they fell into the hands of those unjust powers which then prevailed, who had made years of age [I]. Soon after, he accepted the small benefice of St George's near Bristol [K]; where, by his constant preaching twice every Sunday [L], the method he took in governing his parish [M], his manner of performing Divine Service [N], his exemplary life; made it criminal for a Bishop to confer Holy Orders; but at the same time he assured him, that when the ancient Apostolical Government of the Church should be restored, which he did not question but a little time would bring about, his Letters of Orders should be sent to him, in what part soever of the nation he then lived; which was accordingly punctually complied with upon the happy restoration of King Charles II (8).

[I]—Being at that time but twenty-one years of age.] It is true, this was much short of that age, which is required by the Canons of the Church in candidates for the Priesthood. But Mr Bull, upon his examination, acquitted himself so perfectly well, that tho' the Bishop was rightly informed as to that circumstance, yet he was pleased to say, that the Church wanted persons qualified as he was, and that he could not make too much haste, when his pains and labour might be of such importance; that as to the Canons, they could not be observed strictly in such times of difficulty and distress, and that he did dispense with his want of canonical age as much as in him lay (9).

[K] He accepted the small benefice of St George's, near Bristol.] He the rather accepted it, because, the income being very inconsiderable, it was very likely he would be suffered to reside without any disturbance from the men of those times, who would not think it worth their while to persecute and dispossess him for 30*l.* a year. Before he settled at this place, he met by accident with one of his godfathers, Mr Hall a clergyman, who acquainted him with the declaration his father had made when he was baptized; which gave him no small pleasure and satisfaction, in that he had fulfilled the intention of his father from the bent of his own inclination and free choice, without having ever till that time received the least intimation concerning it (10).

[L] His constant preaching twice every Sunday.] A little accident, soon after his coming to this living, contributed very much to the establishing his reputation as a preacher. One Sunday, when he had begun his sermon, as he was turning over his Bible to explain some texts of Scripture, which he had quoted, it happened that his notes, contained in several small pieces of paper, flew out of his Bible into the middle of the church; upon which many of the congregation fell into laughter, and concluded that their young preacher would be non-plussed for want of materials: but some of the more sober and better natured sort gathered up the scattered notes, and carried them to him in the pulpit. Mr Bull took them, and perceiving that most of the audience, consisting chiefly of sea-faring persons, were rather inclined to triumph over him under that surprize, he clapped them into his book again, and shut it, and then, without referring any more to them, went on with his subject he had begun (11). It happened once, while he was preaching, that a Quaker came into the church, and in the middle of the sermon cried out, George, come down, thou art a false prophet and an hireling; whereupon the parishioners, who loved their minister exceedingly, fell upon the poor Quaker with such fury, as obliged Mr Bull to come down out of the pulpit to quiet them, and to save him from the effects of their resentment. After they were somewhat pacified, Mr Bull began to expostulate with the Quaker concerning his misbehaviour: but the people perceiving the silly enthusiast to be perfectly confounded, and not able to speak a word of sense in his own defence, fell upon him a second time with such violence, that had not Mr Bull by great entreaties prevailed upon them to spare him, and to be satisfied with turning him out of the church, he would hardly have escaped with his life: after which Mr Bull went up again into his pulpit, and finished his sermon (12).

[M] The method he took in governing his parish.] He did not content himself only with preaching to his flock on Sundays, and visiting the sick; but he went from house to house, visiting the rich and poor without distinction, not to gratify their civil invitations, or his own diversion, but to be serviceable to them in a matter of the greatest importance, the salvation of their souls. And therefore upon these occasions the time was not trifled away in empty talk; but his discourse was suited to the several exigencies of those he conversed with. By this means he became acquainted with the state of their souls, and was thereby the better enabled to adapt his publick discourses to the wants of his flock; besides, that this practice gave him an opportunity of thoroughly understanding the necessities of those that were really poor, whom he constantly relieved, either from his own charity, or the bounty of those who supplied him upon all such occasions. There was hardly a family in his parish, which was not furnished with great store of Antinomian books, such doctrines prevailing very much in those times; and therefore in these visits he took frequent occasion to warn his parishioners against the poison they were so familiar with, convincing them of the false reasoning contained in those books, and the inconsistency of their tenets with the scheme of salvation laid down in the Gospel. When Mr Bull found any persons, that either never came to the parish church, or, after having frequented it, withdrew to some other communion, his constant practice was to enquire who had seduced them, and to know their names, in order to summon them to a conference in the presence of the person, who had been prevailed upon to absent from the parish church. These challenges were frequently accepted; for Mr Bull being young, it was not imagined that he was able to maintain a cause against persons of riper age, and who had been long versed in the controversy; but by the quickness of his parts, and his close way of reasoning, he generally got the better in these conferences, and was thereby very successful in recovering his wandering sheep. As to the younger sort, his method was to address them in publick as well as private; and therefore he usually preached to them on some week-day before he administered the Eucharist, in order to instruct them in the nature of that Sacrament, and the preparation necessary to the worthy receiving it (13).

[N] His manner of performing Divine Service.] As the iniquity of the times would not admit of the constant and regular use of the Liturgy, to supply this misfortune, Mr Bull formed all the devotions he offered up in publick, while he continued Minister of this place, out of the book of Common-Prayer; in which practice he was justified by the example of the judicious Dr Sanderson, one of the brightest lights of that age. And he performed the publick service with so much seriousness and devotion, with such fervour and ardency of affection, and with so powerful an emphasis in every part, that they, who were most prejudiced against the Liturgy, did not scruple to commend Mr Bull as a person who prayed by the spirit, at the same time that they railed at the Common-Prayer as a beggarly element, and a carnal performance. A particular instance of this happened to him, upon his being sent for to baptize the child of a Dissenter in his parish. Upon this occasion he made use of the office of Baptism, as prescribed by the Church of England, which he had got entirely by heart, and which he went through with so much readiness, gravity, and devotion, that the whole company were extremely affected; and notwithstanding that he used the sign of the Cross, they were so ignorant of the offices of the Church, that they did not discover thereby that it was out of the Common-Prayer. After the ceremony, the father of the child returned him a great many thanks, intimating at the same time, with how much greater edification they prayed, who entirely depended upon the Spirit of God for his assistance in their extempore effusions, than those did who tied themselves up to premeditated forms; and that, if he had not made the sign of the cross, that badge of Popery, as he called it, no body could have formed the least objection to his excellent prayers. Upon which Mr Bull shewed him the office of Baptism in the Liturgy, wherein was contained every prayer which he had offered up to God on that occasion; which, with other arguments offered by Mr Bull in favour of the Common-Prayer, so effectually wrought upon the good man and his whole family, that from that time they became constant attendants on the publick service of the Church (14).

(8) Ibid. p. 26.

(9) Ibid. p. 27.

(10) Ib. p. 29.

(11) Ib. p. 30, 31.

(12) Ib. p. 31—

(13) Ib. p. 34—33.

(14) Ib. p. 39, 40.

life, and great charities, he entirely gained the affections of his flock, and was very instrumental in reforming his parish, which he found over-run with Quakers and other wild Sectarists (b). Whilst he remained Minister of this parish, the providence of God wonderfully interposed for the preservation of his life: for his lodgings being near a powder-mill, Mr Morgan, a gentleman of the parish, represented to him the danger of his situation, and at the same time invited him to his own house. Mr Bull, at first, modestly declined the offer, but after some importunity accepted it, and, not many days after his removal to Mr Morgan's, the mill was blown up, and his apartment with it. In this part of his life he took a journey once a year to Oxford, where he stayed about two months to enjoy the benefit of the publick libraries. In his way to and from Oxford, he always paid a visit to Sir William Masters of Cirencester; by which means he contracted an intimacy with Mr Alexander Gregory, the Minister of the place, and after some time married one of his daughters [O], on the twentieth of May 1658 (i). The same year he was presented, by the Lady Pool, to the rectory of Suddington St Mary [P], near Cirencester in Gloucestershire. The next year, 1659, he was made privy to the design of a general insurrection in favour of King Charles II, and several gentlemen of that neighbourhood, who were in the secret, made choice of his house at Suddington for one of the places of their meeting. Upon the Restoration, Mr Bull frequently preached for his father-in-law, Mr Gregory, at Cirencester, where there was a large and populous congregation; and his sermons gave such general satisfaction [Q], that, upon a vacancy, the people were very sollicitous to have procured for him the presentation; but the largeness of the parish, and the great duty attending it, deterred him from consenting to the endeavours they were making for that purpose. In 1662, he was presented by the Lord High-Chancellor, the Earl of Clarendon, to the vicarage of Suddington St Peter, which lay contiguous to Suddington St Mary [R], at the request of his Diocesan, Dr Nicholson Bishop of Gloucester (k). When Mr Bull came first to the rectory of Suddington, he began to be more open in the use of the Liturgy of the Church of England, though it was not yet restored by the return of the King; for being desired to marry a couple, he performed the ceremony, on a Sunday morning, in the face of the whole congregation, according 30.

(b) Ib. p. 18.—

(i) Ib. p. 41—
45.

(k) Mr Wood, then, is mistaken in saying, he was presented by the Bishop himself to both the Suddingtons.

[O] He married one of Mr Gregory's daughters. Her name was Mrs Bridget Gregory. The ceremony of their marriage was performed by Mr William Masters, Vicar of Preston, according to the form prescribed by the book of Common-Prayer, the use of which was at that time forbidden under a heavy penalty. Mrs Bull proved in all respects a fit concert for a clergyman, being in her own nature sufficiently provident, and yet well disposed in all manner of good works, out of a true principle of love to God and goodness. Her attire was very plain and grave: her chief diversion was the care of her family, and her main ambition to please her husband. Her piety extended itself to the whole parish wherever she lived: for, by the help of her closet, and skill in Surgery, she made herself extremely useful upon many occasions, and very much beloved, especially by those of the meaner sort. She was very instrumental in persuading the people, especially those of her own sex, to lay aside their prejudices against the Common-Prayer, to bring their children to church to receive publick Baptism, which they had not been used to do for many years before, and to return thanks to God after child-birth, which had been a long time discontinued. Mr Bull and she were man and wife above fifty years, in which time she brought him five sons and six daughters, and so proved a fruitful, as well as a provident and obedient wife, agreeably to the prayer of her wedding-ring, which was, Bene parere, parere, parere dei mihi Deus (15).

(15) Ib. p. 45,
—47.

[P] He was presented by the Lady Pool to the Rectory of Suddington St Mary. This living, being under value, was in the gift of the Keeper of the Seal, and consequently at the disposal of those, who at that time were no friends to the Church of England; notwithstanding which, Mr Bull obtained the presentation in the manner following. The Lady Pool, who at that time lived at Cirencester, claimed as a Lady of the Manour of Suddington, a right of presenting to the living, and having a respect for Mr Gregory, whose daughter Mr Bull had married, and a much greater for Mr Bull himself afterwards (as appeared by making him her executor) she offered him the presentation, which he accepted purely upon her right: but he had certainly lost it, if Mr Stone of Cirencester, a particular friend of Mr Gregory's, had not taken out the Broad Seal, without Mr Bull's knowledge or privity; which he did on this occasion: a clergyman, who knew that Mr Bull had not a good title, endeavoured to get the Broad Seal for the living; which he had certainly succeeded in, if Mr Stone had not been concerned in the presentations: for when he applied to Mr Stone for that purpose, he told him that there was a minister lately settled at Suddington, whose name was Bull; to which the clergymen replied, that, though he was in possession, he had not a legal title. Upon this Mr Stone acquainted him, that, though he did not personally know Mr Bull, yet he was not a stranger to his character; and having heard that he had married a daughter of a very good friend of his, if he had not a good title he would help him to one. Hereupon, Mr Stone took out the Broad Seal for Mr Bull, and sent it to Mr Gregory, and at the same time gave him an account of the danger his son-in-law had been in of losing his living (16).

(16) Ib. p. 47.
—49.

[Q] His sermons gave general satisfaction. The choice of the subjects, which he discoursed upon at that place, and in that conjuncture of publick affairs, was so very seasonable, that they had a visible good effect upon the congregation. His design was to convince his hearers of the necessity of a religious observation of the Lord's day, and decent behaviour in the house of God; which he explained and pressed in several sermons from Levit. xix. 30. Ye shall keep my sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary; I am the Lord. How proper such applications then were to the people, we may collect from the character of those times, in which, the numerous swarms of sectaries, which overran the nation during the great rebellion, having carried religious hypocrisy to it's highest pitch, many persons, upon the Restoration, thought they could not recede too far from the behaviour and practices of those men, and, being inclined to think every appearance of devotion puritanical, were unhappily led to the other extreme (17).

(17) Ib. p. 51.

[R] He was presented to the vicarage of Suddington St Peter, which lay contiguous to Suddington St Mary. This vicarage, tho' the yearly value of it did not amount to above 25*l.* yet was of some advantage to Mr Bull by it's lying so near the rectory of the same name, of which he was then in possession. The income of both together did not rise to above an 100*l.* a year, clear of taxes. But Mr Bull had a farther view in holding them both; for he proposed to get them united for the future; and the application he made upon this account proved successful: for the matter being fairly represented to my Lord Chrceller by Mr Bull's diocesan, the two livings were accordingly united, and were to pass under the same grant for the future (18).

(18) Ib. p. 52, 53.

according to the form prescribed by the Book of Common-Prayer [S]. He took the same method in governing these parishes, as in that of St George's, and with the same success, applying himself with great diligence to the discharge of his pastoral functions [T], and setting the people an admirable example in the government and œconomy of his own family (U). During his residence here, the providence of God gave him an opportunity of confirming two Ladies of quality in the Protestant Communion [W], who were reduced to a wavering state of mind by the arts and subtilties of the Romish Missionaries. The only dissenters he had in his parish were Quakers; whose impertinences and extravagances often gave him no small uneasiness [X]. In this part of his life, Mr Bull prosecuted his studies with great application [Y], and composed most of his works during the twenty-seven years that he was Rector of Suddington. Several tracts, indeed, which cost him much pains, are entirely lost, through his own neglect in preserving them; particularly a treatise on the posture used by the ancient Christians in receiving the Eucharist [Z], a Letter to Dr Pearson concerning the genuineness of St Ignatius's Epistles [AA], a long one to Mr Glanvil, formerly Minister of Bath, concerning the Eternity devout, that he would frequently in the day-time, as occasion offered, use short prayers and ejaculations; and when he was sitting in silence in his family, and they, as he thought, intent upon other matters, he would often, with an inexpressible air of great seriousness, lift up his hands and eyes to heaven, and sometimes drop tears. He was very frequent and earnest in his private devotions, of which singing psalms always made a part (25).

(1) Life, &c. ubi supra, p. 47-78.

[S] He married a couple — according to the form prescribed by the book of Common-Prayer.] When he came out of the church, he asked the people how they liked that manner of solemnizing matrimony, not concealing from them how much it was in their power to expose him to a malicious prosecution; whereupon they all expressed their unanimous approbation of his performance, with solemn assurances, that they would not only make no complaints of him themselves, but also endeavour to prevent them from others (19).

(25) Ib. p. 69, —73.

[T] He applied himself diligently to the discharge of his pastoral functions.] He had a most excellent talent at reading the publick prayers. His whole deportment was grave and serious, and carried withal an air of authority: his pronunciation was distinct and audible, and yet natural and unaffected; and he went through every part of the service with that particular devotion that belongs to it. He read the holy Scriptures with such deliberation, and such exactness in observing the stops and points, that they were rendered thereby the more intelligible to the people (20). Nor did he shine less in the pulpit. All subjects, which he handled there, were confirmed and strengthened by passages of holy writ, which were explained and made easy to the meanest capacity. He had a clear head, and a strong judgment, and perfectly understood the learned languages, in which the Bible was originally written. But, above all, he was thoroughly acquainted with primitive antiquity, and had read with care the works of the Fathers and ancient Doctors of the Church (21). He seldom committed his sermons to writing, which is the reason he left so few finished discourses behind him. His usual method was, after the choice of his text, to mark some words that were to be explained; after which he wrote down some observations, which flowed naturally from the subject, and under each observation hints for illustrating it, and texts of Scripture to confirm it: and then drew inferences from the whole by way of application. What Mr Bull delivered of this kind never wanted a becoming fervour; and he enlivened his discourses with proper and decent gestures, and always exerted his voice with some vehemency, to awaken the attention of his hearers (22). He was particularly careful in catechizing the youth; in which God so far blessed his endeavours, that he carried fifty persons well instructed in the principles of the Christian Religion, at one time, to the visitation at Cirencester, who were all confirmed by the Bishop, when his whole parish did not consist of above thirty families. He administered the Sacraments with great reverence and solemnity, and was always very unwilling to baptize children at home, excepting in cases of necessity. He celebrated the Eucharist seven times a year (23), and strictly observed all the feasts and fasts of the Church (24).

[W] He confirmed two Ladies of quality in the Protestant Communion.] As they lived in the neighbourhood, he had frequent conferences with them both, and answered those objections, which appeared to them to have the greatest strength, and which had very near seduced them from the Church of England. At the request of one of them he wrote a small treatise, of which no copy was to be found among the papers he left behind him. Both the Ladies always owned, with the greatest sense of gratitude, this signal service they received from the learning and capacity of Mr Bull (26).

(26) Ib. p. 79.

[X] The impertinences and extravagances of the Quakers often gave him no small uneasiness.] There goes a ridiculous story of one of them, who was a preacher among them, and would frequently accost Mr Bull; and once in particular he said to him, George, as for human learning, I set no value upon it; but if thou wilt talk Scripture, have at thee. Upon which Mr Bull, to correct his confidence, answered, Come on then, friend. So opening a Bible, he fell upon the book of Proverbs. Seest thou, friend, said he; Solomon saith in one place, answer a fool according to his folly, and in another, answer not a fool according to his folly: how dost thou reconcile these two texts of Scripture? Why, said the preacher, Solomon don't say so; to which Mr Bull replied, Ay, but he doth: and turning to the places, he soon convinced him; upon which the Quaker, being much out of countenance, said, Why then Solomon's a fool; which put an end to the controversy (27).

[Y] He then prosecuted his studies with great application.] His study was the scene of his most exquisite pleasure, and he would often declare, that he tasted the most refined satisfaction in the pursuit of knowledge, and that, when his thoughts were lively and lucky in his compositions, he found no reason to envy the enjoyment of the most voluptuous Epicure. His course of study, indeed, proved prejudicial to his health, because, for many years together, he dedicated the greatest part of the night to that purpose, and contented himself with little sleep (28).

(27) Ib. p. 80, 81.

[U] The government and œconomy of his own family.] Every morning and evening the family were called to prayers, which were either those composed by Bishop Taylor, or taken out of The Common-Prayer book the best Companion. A portion of Scripture was read at the same time, with the addition, on Sunday evenings, of a chapter out of that excellent book the Whole Duty of Man. If any of his servants could not read, he would assign one of the family to be their teacher; and no neglect of duty in them offended him so much as their absence from the family devotions (*). The constant frame and temper of his mind was so truly [Z] A treatise on the posture used by the ancient Christians in receiving the Eucharist.] It was composed by Mr Bull in answer to this question: What was the posture of communicating in the blessed Sacrament, before the doctrine of Transubstantiation was received in the Church? In his reply, he proved from antiquity, that the practice in the most ancient times was for the communicants to draw near the Bema or Chancel, and there to receive the consecrated elements at the hands of the Priest in a bowing or adoring posture. This piece was written at the request of his diocesan Bishop Frampton (29).

(28) Ib. p. 86.

[AA] A Letter to Dr Pearson concerning the genuineness of St Ignatius's Epistles.] It was written in Latin, and contained many excellent observations and solid arguments to prove that those Epistles were genuine.

(29) Ib. p. 87.

(19) Ib. p. 55.

(20) Ib. p. 54.

(21) Ib. p. 57. —59.

(22) Ib. p. 59, 60.

(23) That is, I suppose, on the three great Festivals, and once a quarter besides.

(24) Life, &c. ib. p. 60-65.

(*) Ib. p. 65 —68.

- nity of Future Punishments; and another, on the subject of Popery, to a person of very great quality (m). In 1669, he published that excellent book, his Apostolical Harmony [BB], with a view to settle the peace of the Church, upon a point of the utmost importance to all it's members; and he dedicated it to Dr William Nicholson Bishop of Gloucester (n). This performance was greatly disliked, at first, by many of the Clergy, and others, on account of the author's departing therein from the private opinions of some Doctors of the Church, and his manner of reconciling the two Apostles, St Paul and St James, as to the doctrine of Justification (o). It was particularly opposed by Dr Morley, Bishop of Winchester [CC]; Dr Barlow, Margaret-Professor of Divinity at Oxford [DD]; Mr Charles Gataker, a Presbyterian Divine [EE]; Mr Joseph Truman, a Non-Conformist Minister [FF]; Dr Tully, Principal of Dr Pearson, who was about vindicating the Epistles of that apostolical Bishop and Martyr, returned Mr Bull a large answer in the same learned language; wherein he gave him ample thanks for the pains he had taken upon that subject, and acknowledged the great usefulness of his observations, and the strength of his arguments (30).

[BB] His Apostolical Harmony.] It is intitled; Harmonia Apostolica; seu Bine Dissertationes, quarum in priore Doctrina D. Jacobi de justificatione ex operibus explanatur et defenditur, in posteriore consensus D. Pauli cum Jacobo liquido demonstratur, &c. i. e. 'The Apostolical Harmony, or Two Dissertations, in the first of which St James's doctrine of Justification by works is explained and defended; in the second, the agreement of St Paul with St James is clearly demonstrated.' Though this piece was not printed till the year above-mentioned, it appears to have been written eight or nine years before (31), during the unhappy times of the great rebellion, when a vast number of books were written and published by the hot men of the several parties, on the subject of Justification, and abundance of learned Sophistry had been used to perplex the natural and plain sense of the sacred writers (32). He wrote this work in Latin, the rather because he thought too much had been written in English upon this subject, and that most of what had been written served only to divide and distract peoples minds: he therefore chose a learned language, that it might be thoroughly considered by the men of learning and capacity, reasonably supposing, that if they were set right in this great article, it would be more easily propagated among the vulgar and unlearned. The peculiar aim and design of the first dissertation is to shew, 'That good works, which proceed from faith, and are conjoined with faith, are a necessary condition required from us by God, to the end that by the new and evangelical covenant, obtained by and sealed in the blood of Christ the Mediator of it, we may be justified according to his free and unmerited grace.' In which doctrine, and throughout the whole book, Mr Bull absolutely excludes all pretensions to merit on the part of men (33). Mr Nelson has given us a distinct plan of the Harmonia, to which the reader is referred.

[CC] It was opposed by Dr Morley, Bishop of Winchester.] That great and good prelate, whatever his own private opinion might be of the matter, seems to have been utterly against reviving a controversy of this kind at all, and not to have been so well satisfied, as some of his brethren were, with the performance of an author, who had done nothing before this to signalize himself, and whose youth was too great a prejudice for many to get over. But whatever were his motives for so doing, this learned Bishop, in a Pastoral Charge to the Clergy of his diocese, at his next visitation, thought fit to warn them against intruding too rashly into things above them, and to prohibit them the reading of this book, or preaching agreeably to it. Some heads of houses in the two Universities were also of the Bishop's mind; and there were some tutors, who thought it incumbent on them to guard their pupils against what appeared to them an innovation in the Church (34).

[DD]—Dr Barlow, Margaret-Professor of Divinity at Oxford.] This learned Divine, who was afterwards Bishop of Lincoln, read publick lectures against the Harmonia Apostolica from the Divinity-Chair, in which he treated Mr Bull very roughly, even so far as to give him opprobrious names; an account of which was sent him by his learned and pious friend Mr Thomas, at that time Chaplain of Christ-Church, who was present, and took notes of all that related to his friend in those lectures. This treatment brought Mr Bull to Oxford, who, with Mr Thomas, waited upon the Professor, and, complaining of the inhumanity with which he had been treated, offered to clear himself by a publick disputation. The Professor thought fit to decline the challenge, and endeavoured to get off as well as he could by avoiding to own the fact; till Mr Thomas positively affirmed it to his face, offering to produce the notes he had taken; to which the Professor had no more to say, and they parted (35).

[EE]—Mr Charles Gataker, a Presbyterian Divine.] He was son of that learned Critick Mr Thomas Gataker of London, author of the Dissertatio de Stylo Novi Testamenti, &c. who was a member of the Assembly of Divines that met at Westminster in 1643, and was preparing to publish an Harmony of the Apostles James and Paul, a little before he died; with whose papers the son being assisted, thought himself more than able to deal with our author, and even to overthrow his whole foundation (36). About a year after the publication of the Harmonia, a copy of it, with marginal annotations and animadversions, was sent to the author by his diocesan and patron Bishop Nicholson, who had received them from an unknown hand, after they had been communicated in the same manner to others of the Bishops, together with a letter, stirring them up to make use of their apostolical authority in thundering out their anathema's against the doctrines contained in Mr Bull's book, as pernicious and heretical, and contrary to the decrees of the Church of England, and all the other Reformed Churches. About a year after, it was discovered that these animadversions were written by Mr Charles Gataker (37); who, according to my author, 'appeareth to have been a person of great violence in his temper, but one well intentioned, and a zealous Protestant; and had he had but more coolness of thought, and had he withal read more of the Ancients, and fewer of the Moderns, would have made no inconsiderable writer (38).' The substance of Mr Gataker's animadversions, being twenty-three in number, may be seen in Mr Nelson (39).

[FF]—Mr Joseph Truman, a Non Conformist Minister.] This writer, we are told, was one of a cooler head than the younger Gataker, and one also not unacquainted with the antient Fathers. He had before written and published a short discourse concerning St Paul's meaning of Justification by Faith without Works; and finding some of the opinions therein advanced in danger of being quite overthrown by the Harmonia Apostolica, he set himself to write an answer in English to that part of it which concerned himself, and published it under the title of, An endeavour to rectify some prevailing opinions contrary to the doctrine of the Church of England. By the author of the Great Propitiation. In the preface to which, the reader is informed, 'that about half a year after that he had published some sermons entituled The Great Propitiation, whereunto was added that short discourse aforesaid concerning Justification by Faith in the sense of St Paul, there came forth a learned book called Harmonia Apostolica, written by Mr George Bull, which quite crossing the interpretation he had given of St Paul, he was occasioned, by some occurrences, which it concerned not the reader to know, to write the substance of those reflexions upon it for some private use.' For he tells us, they were written, without any design of printing them, within three months after the publication of Mr Bull's book, but were not published till about two years after, when he observed how fast some

(m) Ibid. p. 78
—89.

(n) Ibid. p. 89.

(o) Ibid. p. 97,
98.

(30) Ib. p. 88, 89.

(31) See his Apo- logia pro Har-monio, &c. Sect.
8. n. 5.

(32) Life, &c.
p. 90—93.

(33) Ib. p. 94
—97.

(34) Ib. p. 112.

(35) Ib. p. 201,
—212.

(36) Ib. p. 139.

(37) Ib. & p. 101.

(38) Ib. p. 145,
146.

(39) Page 140
—145.

of St Edmund's-Hall [GG]; Mr John Tombes, a famous Anabaptist Preacher [HH]; Dr Lewis Du Moulin, a violent Independent [II]; and by M. De Marets, a French writer, who tells us (p), 'that the author, tho' a professed Priest of the Church of England, was more addicted to the Papists, Remonstrants, and Socinians, than to the orthodox party (q).' Towards the end of the year 1675, Mr Bull published his Examen Censuræ, &c. in answer to Mr Gataker, and his Apologia pro Harmonia, &c. in reply to Dr Tully [KK]. About three years after, he was promoted opinions got ground in the Church of England, contrary to his exposition thereof, which he attributed, in a great measure to Mr Bull, and especially to the latter part of his performance (40). I refer the reader, for a full account of Mr Truman's answer, to Mr Nelson (41), who describes him to have been 'a person of a deep and searching genius, but perhaps too metaphysical; candid in fully representing the argument of his adversary without disguise, and commending whatever he thought worthy of commendation, but severe also in his animadversions, where he believed he wanted not sufficient grounds for so doing; generous very often in his manner of treating those he diffented from, but sometimes unreasonably suspicious and scrupulous; cool and moderate in the management of his cause, with very little appearance of passion or prejudice, but vigorous and zealous for the rectifying of some certain opinions, which he took to be contrary to the doctrine of the church of England, for which he still continue to profess an esteem (42)' Mr Bull wrote an answer to Mr Truman, which was never published (43), and took some notice of his objections in his Examen Censuræ (44).

(p) In his Systema Theologiae, printed at Groningen, in 1720.

(q) Wood, ubi supra, col. 955.

[GG] — Dr Tully, Principal of St Edmund's-Hall.] This eloquent and learned writer had some time before printed a short System of Divinity (45), for the use of young students, which had met with a favourable reception, and passed thro' several editions. But his notions being partly different from those of Mr Bull in his Harmonia, the Doctor was prevailed upon to write an answer to that book in Latin; and the rather, because as yet it had received no direct reply from the side of the Church of England. While Dr Tully's treatise was yet, according to his own expression, sickening in the birth, a conference was proposed, and agreed to, between him and Mr Bull; at which meeting, Mr Bull earnestly besought the Doctor, 'above all things to consider the peace of God's Church, and to take diligent heed, lest, by a publick diffension between two Divines of the same communion, the enemies of our Church might take occasion of upbraiding and reproaching her.' He therefore entreated him, 'that he would, for preventing this evil, be pleased, as a friend to communicate to him his papers, upon condition, that if by these he could make it appear, that he had written any thing against sound doctrine, he would not refuse publicly to retract his error.' This proposal seemed so reasonable, that Dr Tully replied, 'he might, perhaps in a very little while, send him a copy of his papers.' But after this Mr Bull never once heard from him, nor had any reason given him for the alteration of his mind. At length, about the beginning of the year 1674, after much expectation, there was published at Oxford (cum Permissu Superiorum, as the title-page expresses it) a Treatise in Latin intitled; Justificatio Paulina sine operibus, ex mente Ecclesie Anglicanae, omniumque reliquarum quae Reformatæ audiunt, asserta et illustrata contra nuperos novatores: Authore Tho. Tullio, S. T. P. &c. i. e. 'St Paul's doctrine of Justification without Works asserted and explained, according to the sense of the Church of England, and all the rest of the Reformed Churches, against some late innovators; by Thomas Tully, S. T. P. &c.' In quarto. There was added at the end of this book a small tract, in answer more particularly to the ninth chapter of the second dissertation of the Harmonia, under the title of Dissertationum de sententia Paulina, Rom. 7. à com. 14. in qua ostenditur Paulum de se loqui regenito, non autem in persona hominis nondum regeniti. i. e. 'A short dissertation concerning St Paul's meaning in Rom. vii. from ver. 14. in which 'is shewn, that St Paul speaks of himself as regenerate, and not in the person of an unregenerate man (46).' For a distinct account of Dr Tully's performance, consult Mr Nelson (47), who tells us, the Doctor 'had merited the reputation of a very pious and learned man; but as some that personally knew him have observed, it was a great misfortune that he betook himself to write controversy, and especially that he engaged with so brisk a writer as Mr Bull was, even then when he was well nigh worn out (48).'

[HH] — Mr John Tombes, a famous Anabaptist Preacher.] This author had been engaged in the same controversy twenty years before, and had written against Mr Baxter's Aporisims concerning Justification. And now he resolved to draw out all his artillery against Mr Bull, as an enemy of the greatest weight, and as one who had brought together the whole strength of the cause in which he had engaged. He was threescore and twelve years of age, when he published his book, which was entitled, Animadversiones in librum Georgii Bulli, cui titulum fecit Harmonia Apostolica: i. e. Animadversiones upon a book of George Bull's, which he hath intitled, The Apostolical Harmony (49).

[II] — Lewis du Moulin, an Independent.] He was son of the famous Peter du Moulin; and in a virulent pamphlet (50), which he published in 1680 against the Church of England, he fell foul upon the principles of our most eminent Divines, among whom he did not forget Mr Bull, bestowing at the same time great commendations on the industry and zeal of Dr Tully and Dr Barlow, as the two principal persons, who kept the University of Oxford from being poisoned with Pelagianism, Socinianism, and Popery. This was despised, as it deserved, by Mr Bull (51).

[KK] His Examen Censuræ, &c. in answer to Mr Gataker; and his Apologia pro Harmonia, &c. in reply to Dr Tully.] These two peices were both published together. The title of the first is; Examen Censuræ, sive Responso ad quasdam Animadversiones, antehac ineditas, in librum cui titulus Harmonia Apostolica, &c. per Georgium Bullum, Anglicanæ Ecclesie Presbyterum, i. e. An Examination of the Censure, or, An Answer to certain Animadversions, never before published, upon a book intitled, The Apostolical Harmony, &c. by George Bull, a Presbyter of the Church of England. The other has for it's title; Apologia pro Harmonia ejusque authore contra Declamationem Thomæ Tullii S. T. P. in libro nuper typis evulgato, quem Justificatio Paulina, &c. inscripsit. i. e. 'An Apology for the Apostolical Harmony, and the author thereof, against the Declamation of Thomas Tully, D. D. in a book lately published by him, intitled Justificatio Paulina.' Dr Tully being dead, when these peices were published, Mr Bull took care to have several passages expunged out of the sheets remaining to be printed, because they contained some sharp reflections upon the Doctor, tho' they were true in fact, and by some of Mr Bull's friends thought too material to be omitted (52). There is an Appendix to our author's Examination of Mr Gataker's Seventeenth Animadversion, in answer to Mr Truman's objections (53). The Examen is not barely to be considered as a reply to Mr Bull's adversaries, but as a fuller explication of his own sentiments. For he very solemnly assures us (54), that, when he was about forty years of age, he read over again his Harmonia several times, with as much seriousness and impartiality as he possibly could, and that he earnestly prayed to God, in the first place, that he would enlighten his mind, and discover to him whatever errors he might have been guilty of; that he did his utmost to divest himself of all self-love, and partiality for his own work; and that he had bound himself by a solemn vow, upon the discovery of any errors, openly to renounce them before the Church. Upon which review of his work, so accurately and so religiously performed, he declares, that there were some things in it, which might have been explained more clearly and fully, for the sake at least of younger readers, and that therefore he had endeavoured to supply this defect as well as he could in his Examen (55). In his Apologia, he very ingenuously confesses, 'that Dr Tully had not a few Divines of the Church of Eng-

(48) Ib. p. 228.

(49) Ib. p. 245 — 248.

(50) Intituled. A short and true Account of the several Advances the Church of England hath made towards Popery, &c. 4to.

(51) Life, &c. p. 253.

(52) Ibid. p. 229, 230.

(53) Ib. p. 196.

(54) Apolog. Sect. viii. n. 5.

(55) Life, &c. p. 231, 232.

(40) Ib. p. 152, 63.

(41) Page 171 — 94.

(42) Ib. p. 204.

(43) Ib. p. 194.

(44) Ib. p. 196.

(45) The title of this was, Præcipua Theologiae Capitulum Enchiridion didacticum, Lond. 1665, 1668, &c.

(46) Ib. p. 212, — 220.

(47) Page 220, — 227.

moted by the Earl of Nottingham, then Lord Chancellor, to a Prebend in the church of Gloucester [LL], in which he was installed the ninth of October 1678 (r). In 1680, he finished his Defence of the Nicene Faith [MM], of which he had given an hint five years before in his Apology (s). This performance was received, as it deserved, with universal applause, and it's fame spread into foreign countries, where it was highly esteemed by the best judges of antiquity, tho' of different persuasions [NN]. It is true, it has been animadverted upon, and censured, by some Unitarian writers [OO]. Five years after the publication

(r) Life, &c.
p. 279.

(s) Ibid. p. 28c.

(56) Apolog.
Sect. xi. No. 7.

(*) Dr Gibe.

(57) Life, &c.
p. 35.

(58) Ath. Oxon.
Vol. II. col. 955.

(59) Life, &c.
p. 278.

(60) Ib. p. 276
—28c.

(61) Ib. p. 280
—284.

(62) Ib. p. 284
—341.

land, and those of some eminence also in it, who had led him into the error; but that these learned men lived in those times, when by the arts of certain persons, who were extremely wedded to the Geneva-Divinity, matters were come to that pass, that it was hardly safe for any one to interpret either the articles of our Church, or even the Scriptures themselves, otherwise than according to the standard of Calvin's Institutions (56). This Apology of Mr Bull's is written with such masterly strength and judgment, that a very learned foreigner * called it the Triumph of the Church of England in this cause (57).

[LL] He was made a Prebendary of Gloucester.] Anthony Wood tells us (58), Mr Bull obtained this Prebend thro' the interest of Dr John Tillotson, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. But Mr Nelson (59) ascribes this promotion only to the great reputation the author had acquired by his Harmonia; and adds, that, as a testimony of his gratitude, he designed a publick acknowledgment of the Chancellor's favour, by dedicating to him his Fidei Nicene Defensio, which was the next book he published; but before it appeared, that great man died, in whom the Church lost a faithful and zealous friend, and learning a generous and constant patron (60).

[MM] His Defence of the Nicene Faith.] It is intitled; Defensio Fidei Nicene ex Scriptis, quae extant, Catholicorum Doctorum, qui intra tria prima Ecclesiae Christianae Saecula floruerunt. i. e. 'A Defence of the Nicene Faith, from the writings, which are extant, of the Catholic Doctors, who flourished within the three first centuries of the Christian Church.' After Mr Bull had finished this work, he offered the copy to three or four booksellers successively, who all refused it, being unwilling to venture the expences of the impression; so that he brought it home, and entirely laid aside all thoughts of printing it: for being in low circumstances, and having a large family to support, he could not possibly be at the charge of printing it himself, as he was inclinable enough to have done, if he had been able. And so this excellent book might have been buried for ever, had not a certain worthy friend of the author's, some few years after, advised him to put his neglected copy into the hands of Dr Jane, then Regius Professor of Divinity in the University of Oxford, and submit the same to his censure and disposal. Accordingly Mr Bull committed his papers to the Professor, who, highly approving them, recommended this work to the pious and learned Bishop Fell. That prelate was presently for encouraging so useful and excellent a performance, and wanted no sollicitation to undertake the whole expence of printing it; which was accordingly done at the Theatre in Oxford in the year 1685 (61). This book is written against the Arians and Socinians on the one hand, and the Tritheists and Sabellians on the other. The author of Bishop Bull's Life has given us an history of the controversy, which occasioned the writing this book, together with a plan of the work, and an account of the uses made of it by some later writers, particularly Dr Samuel Clarke in his Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, and Dr Edwards of Cambridge in his Animadversions on Dr Clarke's book (62).

[NN] It was received with universal applause, and highly esteemed by the best judges of antiquity, tho' of different persuasions.] An Unitarian author, who calls himself a disinterested person, tho' he has given his judgment against the Defensio Fidei Nicene, with all the strength and learning that he was master of, yet was obliged by the irresistible force of truth, to give the following character both of the book and author. 'After Dr Cudworth, came Dr Bull, author of the Defence of the Nicene Faith, a book that has rendered the writer of it very famous not in England only or chiefly, but beyond the water. 'Tis composed in a style most truly Latin, with much vivacity of expression, with great vigour and subtilty of thought: in short 'tis worthy of the noble argument, of which he treats. This author having studied the Fathers with an application, diligence and observation, almost peculiar to him, perceived that the schools have departed from that notion of the Trinity, believed and professed by some of the principal Fathers (63). The answerer of this Socinian pamphlet, who is supposed to be Dr Sherlock himself, in a discourse intitled, The difference between real and nominal Trinitarians examined (64), assures us, this was not said out of any good will to our author, or disinterestedness between the two contending parties, but that All that this Socinian intended by bringing Dr Bull into the fray, was to follow the blow the animadverter (Dr South) and the Oxford decree had given to a Trinity of distinct, proper, subsisting, living, intelligent persons (which is all that Dr Bull, or the Dean assert) by their charge of Tritheism; which, he hoped, would be a sufficient answer to that otherwise unanswerable book, and, together with Dr Bull, would confute all the Fathers at once, on whose authority he so much relies, and to whom he perpetually appeals.

Among the foreign authors, who have made honourable mention of Dr Bull, I shall cite here the testimony of M. Bossuet Bishop of Meaux; whose History of the Variations, &c. having been attacked by M. Jurieu, in defence of the Protestants, with too little deference to the primitive Fathers of the Church, the Bishop published a reply, in which he frequently sends his adversary and his readers, for satisfaction, to the collection of testimonies made by our author out of the Fathers. In one place he says; 'That I may have no occasion, my brethren, to defend, against you, the doctrine of the first ages concerning the eternal generation of the Son, if your Minister hath any doubt hereof, and is not willing to read the learned treatises of Father Thomassin *, who so profoundly explains the ancient traditions, or the learned preface of Father Petau †, which is the elucidation and key of his whole doctrine concerning this matter, I send him to BULL, that learned English Protestant, in the treatise, where he hath so well defended the Fathers, who lived before the Council of Nice. You must either renounce the faith of the Holy Trinity, which God forbid, or pre-possess with me, that this author hath reason (65).' And here it is very remarkable, that our author's book was in such esteem abroad, both with Romanists and Protestants, that even M. Jurieu himself contended, no less than the Bishop his adversary, to have him on his side, saying, that Bull's observations and his were as like as an egg to an egg, concerning the generation of the Son of God. But the Bishop of Meaux replied to M. Jurieu, that, without entering into all the particulars, it was enough to let him know, that he, the Bishop, had taken from him in one word all the Antients, by sending him to Bull, as from whom he might learn the true explication of all their passages (66).

[OO] It has been animadverted upon, and censured by some Unitarian writers.] The author of a pamphlet intitled, The Judgment of the Fathers concerning the Doctrine of the Trinity, opposed to Dr G. Bull's Defence of the Nicene Faith (67), undertakes to discover Dr Bull's frauds and mistakes, detect his his sophistries and elusions, and confront his misrepresentation of the Fathers with the confessions and judgment of the critics, who have either published or commented on the writings of the Fathers (68). This author complains of the severe terms, in which Dr Bull treats the Unitarians, both in this work and in his Judicium Ecclesiae Catholicae. 'In short (says he) Dr Bull hath expressed such a malevolence, and hath so notoriously and infamously violated the cartel of honour and civility, that was thought to be agreed and established between persons of excellent learning and great abilities, when they happen to be engaged in contrary sides, that no respect or tenderness can be shewn to him

(63) See The Judgment of a disinterested Person, concerning the Controversy about the blessed Trinity, depending between Dr South and Dr Sherlock, 4to, Lond. 1696.

(64) Page 4.

(*) Dogmata Theolog. T. III.

(†) Pref. Theolog. Dogm. T. II.

(65) Premier Avertissement aux Protestants sur les Lettres du Ministre Jurieu contre L'Histoire des Variations, &c.

(66) Life, &c. p. 346.

(67) Printed at London in 1695, in 4to.

(68) Page 76.

publication of this book, the author was presented, by Philip Sheppard, Esq; to the Rectory of Avcning in Gloucestershire [PP], a very large parish (t), and worth two hundred pounds per annum. The people of this parish, being many of them very dissolute and immoral, and many more disaffected to the Church of England, gave him for some time great trouble and uneasiness; but, by his prudent conduct and diligent discharge of his duty [QQ], he at last got the better of their prejudices, and converted their dislike into the most cordial love and affection towards him (u). He had not been long at Avcning, before he was promoted, by Archbishop Sancroft, to the Archdeaconry of Landaff, in which he was installed the twentieth of June 1686 (w). He was invited soon after to Oxford, where the Degree of Doctor in Divinity was conferred upon him by that University [RR], in consideration of the great and eminent services he had done the Church (x). During the reign of King James II. the Doctor preached very warmly against Popery [SS], with which the nation was then threatened. Some time after the Revolution, he was put into the commission of the peace [TT], and continued in it, with some little interruption,

(t) It is eight miles in compass.

(u) Ib. p. 348—354.

(w) Ibid.

(x) Ib. p. 360. & Wood, Fasti Oxon. Vol. II. col. 229.

'till

19) Page 77.

20) See the historical Prece to his primitive Christianity restored, ond. 1713, 8vo, 57.

71) Ch. xiv. edit. Amsterd. 1714, 4 Vols, 12mo.

72) Life, &c. 349, 350.

' him by an Unitarian (69). Mr Whiston, in his letter to the Archbishops of York and Canterbury (70), tells them, he had occasion to take notice of several great mistakes in the right reverend and very learned Bishop Bull, concerning the Trinity and Incarnation; which I could not, says he, avoid without betraying the truths of God Almighty, since I think he has too often perverted them, and the testimonies in antiquity belonging to them. Nor can I forbear to wish that his Lordship's plain failure in so celebrated a work may be a warning to all the learned hereafter, how they write in the usual way of modern controversy, which has too long by much been the bane of the Church of Christ; and to the unlearned, how they trust to such writings in the determination of their faith and practice. I shall only add the judgment of Father Simon, who, in his Nouvelle Bibliothéque Choisie (71), after endeavouring to shew, that the Anti-Nicene Fathers are favourable to Arianism, and that our author has not proved the contrary, concludes with remarking, that it is not his design to run over the whole book of Dr Bull, which, notwithstanding, says he, what I have just now observed, is a good book, and may be of use to Divines. Then he adds; Perhaps it would have been better, if the author had proved the mystery of the Trinity, against the Socinians, by clear and formal passages of the New Testament, rather than have opposed against them a tradition, which does not appear altogether consistent. And again; if the learned Bishop Bull had been well skilled in the critique of the Greek copies of the New Testament, and of the ancient Latin copies, he would not have affirmed so positively, that Tertullian and Cyprian have quoted the 7th verse of the vth chapter of the 1st epistle of St John, nor would he have alleged that passage against those, who believe that it is not genuine.

[PP] He was presented by Philip Sheppard, Esq; to the Rectory of Avcning in Gloucestershire. Mr Bull owed this preferment to the following accident. At the time when that Rectory became vacant, Mr Sheppard and Mr Bull, with some other friends, were at Aitrop-wells in Oxfordshire, drinking those mineral waters for the advantage of their health; and they were even in company together with some other gentlemen, when Mr Sheppard received the news of it. Upon which he acquainted the company, that he had a very good living to dispose of, and reckoned up the qualifications he expected in the person, upon whom he should bestow it; which so exactly agreed with Mr Bull's character, that every one present plainly perceived, that Mr Sheppard designed that preferment in favour of Mr Bull. Some time after, Mr Bull withdrew with some of the company, to walk in the garden; which opportunity Mr Sheppard took to declare, that he had purposely thrown out those hints, that Mr Bull might be encouraged to apply to him for it; but finding his modesty was too great to make that step, he was resolved to offer it to him; which he accordingly did, as soon as Mr Bull returned into the room, who received it with all the acknowledgments due for so good a living to so generous a patron (72).

[QQ] His prudent conduct, and diligent discharge of his duty. As a particular account has already been given of Dr Bull's method of governing those parishes, of which he had the care, it is not necessary to add any thing farther upon that subject, than what appears to have been peculiar to his conduct at Avcning. He had a sermon at his church every Thursday, at which time the children were catechized by his Curate; and, to encourage the poor to attend the church at such seasons, he constantly upon that day distributed five shillings among them (73). One great contest he had with the disorderly people of Avcning related to the observation of a feast or wake, which was attended the day following with extravagant revels. Dr Bull preached against the disorders committed upon that occasion. But when neither his instructions nor exhortations could prevail with his parishioners to observe that decency, which becomes Christians in the celebration of those anniversaries, he procured an order of sessions to suppress it, which effectually put an end to it many years before he left that place (74).

[RR] The degree of Doctor in Divinity was conferred upon him by the University of Oxford. A motion was made, in full convocation, by Dr Jane, Regius Professor of Divinity, that, as an acknowledgment of the singular honour done that University, and of the lasting service done to the whole Church, by Mr George Bull, in his excellent Defence of the Nicene Faith, lately printed and published among them, and as a perpetual testimony of their esteem and regard for a person of his merit, he should be admitted to the degree of Doctor in Divinity, notwithstanding that he had never taken any academical degree. Which motion being unanimously agreed to, Bishop Fell wrote a Letter to Mr Bull, to thank him for the noble present he had made him in that immortal work, and to acquaint him at the same time with the honour which the University designed him. The Professor wrote also a Letter to him, acquainting him with what passed in convocation, and pressing him to come to Oxford, there to be admitted to the highest degree of honour that was in their power to confer on any person. Mr Bull received these letters at Landaff, where he had just taken possession of the Archdeaconry, and came to Oxford the beginning of July, where he was created Doctor in Divinity the tenth of the said month 1686, without the payment of the usual fees (75).

[SS] He preached very warmly against Popery. This he did, not only in his own parish, but in other publick places, where he was called to preach, as at Bath and Gloucester, and in a visitation sermon at Hampton. It is true, indeed, that Dr Bull was a frank asserter of some primitive truths, upon which are built several errors of the Church of Rome; upon which account he had been censured by many, who could not distinguish the foundation from the hay and stubble built thereupon, as too much inclining to favour that Church. But how little he deserved that reflection, appeared now by his courage and resolution in attacking those pernicious errors, which he apprehended might gain ground by the favour and authority of the Prince upon the throne, who was unhappily engaged in that communion (76).

[TT] He was put into the Commission of the Peace. The main inducement, which prevailed upon Dr Bull to act in a secular post, was, that he might have an opportunity of putting in execution the laws against immorality and prophaneness; in which he was very successful, by the help of some clergymen in his neighbourhood, who procured him informations against common swearers, drunkards, and sabbath-breakers (77).

(73) Ib. p. 360, 361.

(74) Ib. p. 362, 363.

(75) Ib. p. 359, 360.

(76) Ib. p. 364, 365.

(77) Ib. p. 366.

[UU] His

- (y) Life, &c. p. 353—366. 'till he was made a Bishop (y). In 1694, whilst he continued Rector of Avening, he published his Judicium Ecclesie Catholice, &c. [UU], in defence of the Anathema, as his former Book had been of the Faith, decreed by the first Council of Nice (z). The last treatise, which Dr Bull wrote, was his Primitive Apostolical Tradition, &c. [WW], against Daniel Zwicker, a Prussian (a). All Dr Bull's Latin works, which he had published by himself at different times, were collected together, and printed in 1703, in one volume in folio, under the care and inspection of Dr John Ernest Grabe, the author's age and infirmities disabling him from undertaking this edition. The ingenious editor adorned the work with many learned annotations, and ushered it into the world with an excellent preface (b). Dr Bull was in the seventy-first year of his age, when he was acquainted with Her Majesty's gracious intention of conferring on him the Bishoprick of St David's; which promotion he at first declined, on account of his ill state of health and advanced years; but, by the importunity of his friends, and strong solicitations from the governors of the Church, he was at last prevailed upon to accept it, and was accordingly consecrated in Lambeth-Chapel, the twenty-ninth of April 1705 (c). Two years after, he lost his eldest son, Mr George Bull [XX], who died of the small-pox the eleventh of May 1707, in the thirty-

- [UU] His Judicium Ecclesie Catholice, &c.] The whole title runs thus: Judicium Ecclesie Catholice trium priorum Seculorum de necessitate credendi, quod Dominus noster Jesus Christus sit verus Deus, assertum contra M. Simonem Episcopum aliosque, i. e. 'The judgment of the Catholick Church of the three first centuries concerning the necessity of believing, that our Lord Jesus Christ is very God, asserted against Simon Episcopus and others.' The occasion of Dr Bull's writing this treatise was, that, in reading the thirty-fourth chapter of the fourth book of Episcopus's Institutions, in which he treats concerning the necessity of believing the manner of the divine filiation of Jesus Christ, and puts this question, Whether the fifth (and highest) manner of Christ's being the Son of God, be necessary to be known and believed, and whether they, who deny the same, are to be excommunicated and anathematized; he had made some remarks thereupon for his own private use, by way of answer to the arguments of that learned writer, who held, that the primitive Catholicks did not refuse communion with those that received not the article of the divine generation or filiation of Jesus Christ, provided they acknowledged him to be the Son of God, in virtue of his miraculous Conception, his mediatorial Office, his Resurrection from the dead, and exaltation to the right-hand of God the Father (78). The anathema, pronounced by the Council of Nice, which Episcopus thought too harsh and uncharitable, and which our author undertook to vindicate, is this: 'Those who say, there was a time when he was not, or, before he was born he was not, or, he was made of things that are not, or, he is of another substance or essence; and those who maintain that the Son of God is created, or convertible, or changeable; all these doth the Catholick and Apostolical Church anathematize.' But this answer of Dr Bull to Episcopus, in defence of the said anathema, was not written so much against Episcopus himself, as against some at home, to whom Dr Bull gives the name of Mediators, for joining together two extremes (79). Mr Nelson has given us a short abstract of the contents and method of this book (80), which was designed as a supplement to the Defensio Fidei Nicenae. The same gentleman, soon after its publication, sent it as a present to M. Bossuet, Bishop of Meaux, who, upon several occasions, had expressed a great value and esteem for Dr Bull's learning and judgment (81). That Prelate not only read the Doctor's work with great care and exactness himself, but communicated it likewise to several other French Bishops; who perused it with equal pleasure and satisfaction; the result of which, was, to compliment the author in their name; and Mr Nelson was desired, in a letter from the Bishop of Meaux, not only to return Dr Bull his humble thanks, but the unfeigned congratulations also of the whole clergy of France, then assembled at St Germain's, for the great service he had done to the Catholick Church, in so well defending her determination, concerning the necessity of believing the Divinity of the Son of God (82). In that letter, the Bishop of Meaux expresses himself in the following terms: There is one thing I wonder at, which is, that so great a man, who speaks so advantageously of the Church, of Salvation which is obtained only in Unity with her, and of the infallible assistance of the Holy Ghost in the Council of Nice, which infers

the same assistance for all others assembled in the same Church, can continue a moment without acknowledging her. Or, let him tell me, Sir, what he means by the term Catholick Church? Is it the Church of Rome, and those that adhere to her? Is it the Church of England? Is it a confused heap of societies, separated the one from the other? And how can they be that Kingdom of Christ, not divided against itself, and which shall never perish? It would be a great satisfaction to me to receive some answer upon this subject, that might explain the opinion of so weighty and solid an author. Dr Bull answered the queries proposed in this letter; but just as his answer came to Mr Nelson's hands, he received the news of the Bishop's death, which prevented the progress of this controversy (83). However Dr Bull's answer was published, and a second edition printed at London, 1707, in 12mo, under the following title; The Corruptions of the Church of Rome, in relation to Ecclesiastical Government, the Rule of Faith, and Form of Divine Worship: In answer to the Bishop of Meaux's Queries.

[WW] His Primitive, Apostolical, Tradition, &c.] The whole title is; Primitiva et Apostolica Traditio Dogmatis in Ecclesia Catholica recepti de Jesu Christi Servatoris nostri Divinitate; Asserta atque evidenter demonstrata contra Danielem Zuikerum Borussiae, ejusque nuperos in Anglia Sectatores (84). i. e. 'The Primitive and Apostolical Tradition of the Doctrine received in the Catholick Church, concerning the Divinity of our Saviour Jesus Christ, asserted and evidently demonstrated against Daniel Zwicker the Prussian, and his late followers in England.' In this work, Dr Bull undertakes to prove, that Justin Martyr was not, as is pretended, an innovator of the Christian Faith in the article concerning the person of Christ; that he was not deceived herein by the frauds and artifices of the Disciples of Simon Magus; that he never learnt from the schools of Plato, what he taught concerning the Logos; and that he was the farthest in the world from any design of intermixing Polytheism with Christianity, or of accommodating the Gospel of Christ to the Gentile theology; but that, on the contrary, it was an apostolical tradition, introduced into the first Christian Churches, that our Saviour did exist before the world was made; that the doctrine of his Godhead could not proceed from the school of the sovereign, whose sentiments differed very widely from the Catholick tradition of that doctrine; and that it could not possibly be derived, either from the Platonick Philosophers, or any other, whom the Christians had a mind to gain over to their party. Here is also a particular and most accurate account given of Hegeippus, and his sentiment concerning Christ's person; as likewise of the primitive Nazarenes, and of the first Bishops of Jerusalem, challenged as theirs by Dr Zwicker's English disciples. The reader will here be entertained with a good deal of curious and useful learning, about the Sibylline Oracles, and the verses of Orpheus, which are cited by several of the primitive writers against the Heathens (85).

[XX] He lost his eldest son Mr George Bull.] This young gentleman had spent seventeen years at Christ-Church in Oxford, and was esteemed one of the ornaments of that society. He was tutor to several young gentlemen; one of whom, Sir Bourchier Wrey, became his patron, and preferred him to the rectory of Tawlock

(83) Ib. p. 338—390.

(84) London 1703.

(85) Life, &c. p. 400, 401.

thirty-seventh year of his age (d). Our Prelate took his seat in the House of Lords in that memorable session, when the bill passed for the Union of the two kingdoms, and spoke in a debate which happened upon that occasion [XX]. About July after his consecration, he went into his diocese, and was received with all imaginable demonstrations of respect by the gentry and clergy. The episcopal palace at Aberquilly being much out of repair, he chose the town of Brecknock for the place of his residence (e), but was obliged, about half a year before his death, to remove from thence to Abermarlefs, for the benefit of a freer air (f). He resided constantly in his diocese, and carefully discharged all the episcopal functions [ZZ]. Tho' Bishop Bull was a great admirer of our ecclesiastical constitution, yet he would often lament the distressed state of the Church of England, chiefly owing to the decay of ancient discipline, and the great number of lay-impropriations [AAA]. Some time before his last sickness, he entertained thoughts of addressing a circular letter to all his clergy; and, after his death, there was found among his papers one drawn up to that purpose [BBB]. He had greatly impaired his health, by too intense and unseasonable an application to his studies, and, on the twenty-seventh of September 1709, was taken with a violent fit of coughing, which brought on a spitting of blood. About the beginning of February following, he was seized with a distemper, supposed to be an ulcer, or what they call the inward piles; of which he died the seventeenth of the same month, and was buried, about a week after his death, at Brecknock [CCC], leaving

(d) Ib. p. 412.
(e) Ib. p. 415—417.
(f) Ib. p. 437.

Tawstock in Devonshire. Upon the promotion of his father to the See of St David's, he was made Archdeacon of Landaff in his room. His death was the greater loss to the Bishop, as the assistance he expected from him in the discharge of the episcopal function, was what had a great influence upon him in determining him to accept it (86).

[YY] He spoke in a debate, which happened upon that occasion. A certain noble Lord, it seems, moved in a speech, that, since the Parliament of Scotland had given a character of their Church, by extolling the parity of its worship, their Lordships should not be behind-hand in giving a character of the best constituted Church in the world. For (said he, turning himself, towards the bench of Bishops) I have always been taught by my Lords the Bishops from my youth, that the Church of England was the best constituted Church in the world, and most agreeable to apostolical institution. Whereupon Bishop Bull, who sat very near his Lordship, stood up, and said; My Lords, I second what that noble Lord hath moved, and do think it highly reasonable, that, in this bill, a character should be given of our most excellent Church. For, my Lords, whoever is skilled in primitive antiquity, must allow it for a certain and evident truth, that the Church of England is, in her doctrine, discipline, and worship, most agreeable to primitive and apostolical institution. Upon coming out of the house, Bishop Beveridge said to the Bishop of St David's; 'My Lord, if you and I had the penning of this bill, it should be in the manner your Lordship hath moved.' To which Bishop Bull made such a reply, as represented the necessity he lay under of thus discharging his duty, when so solemnly called upon in the greatest court of the nation (87).

[ZZ] He carefully discharged all the episcopal functions. His first care was to acquaint himself with the state and condition of his diocese; in order to which, he proposed to visit it in person that summer, and actually began at Brecknock, where he delivered his charge to the clergy; but a severe illness putting a stop to his projects at that time, he appointed Commissioners, the chief of whom was Mr William Powel, Rector of Langastock, to visit in his name. Three years afterwards, his Lordship appointed a triennial visitation; but not being able, thro' weakness and continued indispositions, to bear the fatigue of travelling, he constituted his son-in-law Mr Stevens, Archdeacon of Brecknock, with Mr William Powel before-mentioned, to be his Commissioners, and to visit in his stead. Mr Stevens, in this visitation, delivered a charge prepared by the Bishop himself for that purpose (88). He frequently resided in the neighbourhood of such places where he resided, particularly at Brecknock, Caermarthen, Landeilo, and Abermarlefs (89). He was very strict in examining into the qualifications of candidates for Holy Orders, and never dismissed those whom he ordained, without the most earnest and affectionate exhortations, with respect to their future conduct (90). Among other irregularities, which he found to have prevailed in his diocese, he endeavoured to reform that of administering Baptism in private houses, excepting in cases of necessity (91). His conversation with his clergy, was, upon all occasions, grave and serious, and related chiefly to the condition of their parishes, and the discharge of their own duties (92).

[AAA] He lamented the distressed state of the Church of England, owing to — the great number of lay-impropriations. Several good men (he used to say) looked upon the alienation of tythes, as the scandal of the Reformation, and esteemed it the great blemish of the Restoration, that no care was taken, at that time, of the interest of the Church of England, with respect to its revenues. When the Bishop talked upon this subject, he would often mention, with pleasure, the wisdom and goodness of Queen Anne, in her augmentation of the maintenance of the poor clergy. This design, he thought, would be more easily carried on, if some rich impropriators could be prevailed upon, to restore to the Church some part of her revenues, which they had too long enjoyed, to the great prejudice of the Church, and very often to the ruin of their families, by that secret curse, which is the usual attendant on sacrilegious possessions. He was able, he said, to give instances of this kind, in some families of his acquaintance; and in this point, he seemed to concur with the opinion of Sir Henry Spelman. Tho' he was always in his judgment against lay-impropriations, yet he was never so sensible of the great inconveniencies which attend them, as upon his coming into the diocese of St David's, where they are very numerous, and the salaries allowed the curates by the impropriators too mean and inconsiderable to furnish a tolerable maintenance. The Bishop applied himself to several of these impropriators, in hopes of prevailing with them to advance the stipends to a competent subsistence. But the little success he met with in these applications, put him upon inquiring, how far it was in his own power to remedy this grievance; and if he had lived to have seen London once more, he designed to have taken the advice and direction of his brethren, the Bishops, upon this momentous affair (93).

[BBB] There was found among his papers, a circular letter, drawn up to that purpose. It had not received his last hand, and wants that perfection which usually attended whatever he composed. It is addressed to the Reverend the Archdeacons, and the rest of the clergy of the diocese of St David's. The first thing the good Bishop recommends, for the advancement of piety and virtue, is, The establishing Family Devotion; the next is, The erecting of Charity-Schools; the third is, That they endeavour to dispose parents, to supply each of their children before they marry, or are otherwise settled in the world, with a small library (*), containing books of practical Divinity, to the value of three, four, or five pounds, fixed in a little press with shelves proper for that purpose. Fourthly, the Bishop recommends the use of the Welsh Common-Prayer-Book, lately printed in a small volume; and, in the last place, he earnestly exhorts them to use their interest with the Justices of the Peace, to put in execution the law against vice and immorality. The reader may see the letter at length in Mr Nelson (94).

[CCC] He was buried — at Brecknock. He lies (if Mr Nelson's information be true) between two of his predecessors, Bishop Manwaring and Bishop Lucy. His funeral

(92) Ib. p. 430.

(93) Ibid. p. 431, 432.

(*) There has been since printed a sheet of paper called, The Young Christian's Library; or a Collection of good and useful books proper to be given to young persons by their parents, &c. Printed by J. Downing in Bartholomew-Close.

(94) Ib. p. 442—452.

(86) Ib. p. 411, 12.

(87) Ib. p. 415, 6.

(88) Ib. p. 417, 21.

(89) Ib. p. 422.

(90) Ib. p. 423, 28.

(91) Ib. p. 429.

leaving behind him but two children [DDD] of the eleven with which God had blessed him (g). What remains to be drawn of Bishop Bull's character, and an account of his Sermons and Discourses not hitherto taken notice of, shall be given in the remarks [EEE] and [FFF]. All his works have been published together since his death, in folio, by Mr Nelson.

(g) Ib. p. 458
—475.

funeral was attended by great numbers of the gentry and clergy, both of the county of Caermarthen and of Brecknock. He had given strict charge, that the burthen of his debts should not be increased, by bestowing more expence on his interment, than what necessity and decency required. And upon this account, it is thought, when he was asked where he would be buried, he replied, Where the tree falleth, there let it lie. But he was prevailed upon, by the desire of his wife, to consent to be buried at Brecknock, it being the place where she designed to pass her widowhood; and, as Mrs Bull was desirous to be deposited with her husband after her death, his grave, by her direction, was walled on all sides, and made large enough to receive two bodies (95). His grave was covered with a plain stone, and the short inscription upon it, which follows, was framed and ordered by his pious widow, who was so satisfied with it herself, that she would not suffer it to be cast into any other form.

(95) Mrs Bull died soon after Mr Nelson undertook to write the Life of her husband, and was accordingly buried in the same grave with the Bishop.

HERE LIETH THE RIGHT REVEREND FATHER IN GOD, DR GEORGE BULL,
LATE BISHOP OF THIS DIOCESS; WHO WAS EXCELLENTLY LEARNED, PIOUS, AND CHARITABLE;
AND WHO DEPARTED THIS LIFE
FEBRUARY THE 17th, 1709. AGED 75 (95).

(95) Ib. p. 473
—475.

[DDD] He left behind him two children. Viz. his son Robert, who became Rector of Tortworth in Gloucestershire, and Prebendary of Gloucester, and who married Rachel, the daughter of Edward Stephens, of Cherington, in the county of Gloucester, Esq; and of Mary, the daughter of Sir Matthew Hale, Lord Chief Justice of the King's-Bench: and his daughter Bridget, married, after his death, to Mr Edward Adderley, son of the aforesaid Mary by a former husband (96.)

(96) Ib. p. 475.

[EEE] His character. He was tall of stature, and in his younger years thin and pale, but fuller and more sanguine in the middle and latter part of his age; his sight quick and strong, and his constitution firm and vigorous, till indefatigable reading, and nocturnal studies, to which he was very much addicted, had first impaired, and at length quite extinguished the one, and subjected the other to many infirmities; for his sight failed him entirely, and his strength to a great degree, some years before he died. But whatever other bodily indispositions he contracted, by intense thinking, and a sedentary life, his head was always free, and remained unaffected to the last. As to the temperature and complexion of his body, that of melancholy seemed to prevail, but never so far as to dispose his mind for study and conversation. The vivacity of his natural temper exposed him to sharp and sudden fits of anger, which were of but short continuance, and sufficiently atoned for by the goodness and tenderness of his nature towards all his domesticks. He had a firmness and constancy of mind, which made him not easily moved, when he had once fixed his purposes and resolutions. He had early a true sense of religion; and tho' he made a short excursion into the paths of vanity, yet he was entirely recovered a considerable time before he entered into Holy Orders. His great learning was tempered with that modest and humble opinion of it, that it thereby shone with greater lustre. His actions were no less instructive than his conversation; for his exact knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and of the writings of the primitive fathers of the Church, had so effectual an influence upon his practice, that it was indeed a fair, entire, and beautiful image of the prudence and probity, simplicity and benignity, humility and charity, purity and piety, of the primitive Christians. During his sickness, his admirable patience under exquisite pains, and his continual prayers, made it evident, that his mind was much fuller of God than of his illness; and he entertained those that attended him with such beautiful and lively descriptions of religion and another world, as if had a much clearer view than ordinary of what he believed (97).

(97) Ib. p. 476
—479.

[FFF] Some account of his sermons and discourses.]

His son, Mr Robert Bull, had not only the Bishop's leave, but his order, to print his sermons after his death; so that we may from thence conclude, they had received his last hand, and consequently that perfection, which belonged to his compositions. The subjects are reduced to no dependance upon one another, in the method of ranging them; neither was it necessary, since it does not appear, that they were framed with any such prospect (98). These sermons are of great use in two respects. In the first place, several of them are written upon the most curious points of antiquity, and may serve as a touch-stone, to distinguish primitive doctrines from modern errors which have been built upon them. Secondly, they are a very proper model, both as to style and method, for the teaching any subject of Divinity. Dr Lupton, in a letter to Mr Nelson (99), has given us the following character of Bishop Bull's sermons. 'He abhorred affectation of wit, trains of fulsome metaphors, and nice words wrought up into tuneful, pointed, sentences, without any substantial meaning at the bottom of them. He looked upon sermons, consisting of these ingredients, which should be our aversion, and not our aim, as empty and frothy, and trifling, as inconsistent with the dignity of serious and sacred subjects, and as an indication of a weak judgment.' After censuring the abuse of wit in sermons, the Bishop goes on: 'The proper use even of true wit, doth require the very best judgment. And in both did this learned Prelate excel, tho' he used the first very sparingly in his sermons; but the second was abundantly demonstrated in every one of them. For every one comprized the principal truths which belonged to the subject, and those were ranged into the most natural and easy order, illustrated with the utmost clearness, confirmed with the utmost strength of reasoning, and expressed in the most plain and significant words. And such a rich vein of piety did run thro' the whole, as would have rendered it acceptable and delightful to any man, who is sincerely religious, tho' it were not attended with those shadows of beauty and ornament, which are too often thought to be the best parts of a sermon.' Dr Lupton concludes thus: Those therefore who are censorious enough to reflect with severity upon the pious strains, which are to be found in St Chryostom, Bishop Beveridge, or Bishop Bull, may possibly be good judges of an ode or an epi-gram, but do not seem to criticize justly upon sermons, or to express a just value for spiritual things. As to those discourses, which accompany the Bishop's sermons, the first relating to The Doctrine of the Catholic Church for the first three Ages of Christianity, concerning the Blessed Trinity, in opposition to Sabellianism and Trisheism, was drawn up at the request of a person of quality (*), who, having seriously considered the controversy, then carried on between Dr Sherlock and Dr South, found himself not clear, as to the sense of the first and purest ages of the Church, in reference to that great mystery. The method his Lordship pitched upon to satisfy his doubts, was, to apply to Dr Bull, that great master of Primitive Antiquity; but having no acquaintance with the Doctor, he communicated his thoughts to his worthy friend Mr Archdeacon Parsons, Rector of Odington in Gloucestershire, who being a neighbour, and intimately known to Dr Bull, engaged him to comply with his Lordship's request, and to draw up the discourse in question, which he inclosed in a letter to the Archdeacon, in order to be communicated to his Lordship. This discourse was received with much satisfaction by the noble Lord, as appears by a letter addressed by him to Mr Parsons (100). The next Discourse, concerning which the reader may be apt to require some information, is the fourth, containing Some Animadversions on a Treatise of Mr Gilbert Clerke, intituled, Ant-Nicenisimus, so far as the said author pretends to answer Dr George Bull's Defence of the Nicene Faith. The manuscript of these Animadversions was found among Dr Grabe's papers, but appears unquestionably to have been written by Dr Bull. The book, which gave occasion to these Animadversions, was printed in 1695, under the title of Ant-Nicenisimus; or, The Testimonies of the Fathers, who wrote before the Council

(98) Ib. p. 48.

(99) See Life, p. 490.

(*) Lord Arundel.

(100) Ib. p. 49
—496.

Council of Nice, whence may be collected the Sense of the Catholic Church touching the Trinity At the same time came out an Answer in Latin to Dr Bull's Defensio Fidei, &c. both written by Mr Gilbert Clerke, who published his name with them. These two treatises were accompanied by a third, without the author's name, intitled, The true and ancient Faith, concerning the Divinity of Christ, asserted, against Dr George Bull's Judgment of the Catholic Church, &c. (101). The fifth and last Discourse, intitled, Concerning the first Covenant, and the State of Man before the Fall, according to Scripture, and the Sense of the Primitive Doctors of the Catholic Church, seems to have been drawn up by the learned author about the time that he was engaged in the controversy relating to Justification. It plainly appears, that it cost him a great deal of labour and study, and he seemed, upon some occasions, to express himself favourably concerning it. For having lent it to a certain person, whose name he had forgot, it was lost for many years, and recovered by the following accident. A neighbouring clergyman dying, Mr Stephens, the Bishop's son in-law, bought part of his books, and among his pamphlets found this treatise, which he immediately brought to the author, who could not forbear declaring his satisfaction for the recovery of that, upon which he had bestowed no small pains. It was afterwards read by some considerable clergymen in the neighbourhood, and at last communicated to his particular friend Dr Fowler, afterwards Bishop of Gloucester, in whose hands it had lain so long, that his Lordship, when Mr Nelson (publisher of the Bishop's works) applied to him upon that account, had lost all remembrance of it. However, at this editor's request, Bishop Fowler searched among his papers, and in a few days sent him the manuscript (102).

(101) lb. p. 497
—511.

(102) lb. p. 511,
ad finem.

BULLEYN (WILLIAM), a learned Physician and Botanist in the reigns of King Edward VI, Queen Mary, and Queen Elizabeth. He was born in the former part of King Henry the VIIIth's reign, and, as himself informs us, in the Isle of Ely (a). He was nearly related, as he also says, to the principal family, or chief house, at Blaxhall in Suffolk (b). Whether any ways a-kin to Sir William Bulleyn who was Sheriff of that county and Norfolk, the fifteenth of Henry VII, and grandfather to Queen Anne Bullen, we might better resolve, if we could find that his arms agreed with theirs; which were, Argent, a Chevron Gules, inter Three Bulls Heads coup'd Sable, armed Gules (c). He was bred up, it seems, at the University of Cambridge, however, he might lay some foundation of learning in arts at Oxford, as Anthony Wood says; though he knew not, through the imperfection of their records in those times, whether he took any degree in that university; but adds, that applying his mind to the study of Physick, he took his degrees in this science elsewhere, became famous therein, and was a member of the College of Physicians at London. Thus much, with the titles of his books, is all the personal history which that author has recorded of him, except, what is erroneous, that he flourished, or was alive, above ten years after his death (d). But this short and unsatisfactory account, might have been much enlarged and improved by the inspection only of our author's works. For therein it appears, that he had been a traveller over several parts of Germany, Scotland, and especially England; throughout which he was well acquainted with the natures of the people, and the products of the soil, especially vegetables; which qualified him to describe their virtues so well, and to employ them so successfully as he did, in the restoration of health. In or before Queen Mary's reign, he seems to have been much conversant about the city of Norwich, where he made some remarks upon several natural productions of that place. He appears likewise to have resided a longer time at Blaxhall in Suffolk, where he also made several of the like observations. But he removed afterwards into the North: and where he is speaking of the salt that is made in England, he mentions, among other places, the Shiles by Tinmouth-castle; where he had a property in the salt pans which were upon that Water; as, at Blith in Northumberland, also had Sir John Delaval; a patron, whom he describes to have been of great worship and hospitality there, for many years; a patron, who was far from making any ill use of his salt; who never powdered his neighbours, tenants, or others dependent upon him, with extortion, or oppression; but, on the contrary, so extensively sprinkled his generous virtues among them, that the kindly seasoning would preserve his good name fresh and sweet in remembrance, as our author promises, when his book, by which even it is preserved, or transmitted to posterity, would, as he fancied, though too humbly of it, be rotten (e). But afterwards, he appears to have been more permanently settled at Durham; and here he made also other observations, as he had done in the counties beforementioned, upon some of the products he treats of, which were either remarkable for their plenty, excellency, or other qualities; a few whereof may not be unacceptable in a note apart [A], as what may contribute to illustrate, in some particulars, the

(a) Dr Bulleyn's
Book of Simples,
fol. 2 r. b.

(b) His Government of Health,
8vo, p. 126.

(c) Fuller's Worthies, in Norfolk,
&c.

(d) Ath. Oxon.
edit. 1721, Vol. I.
col. 235.

(e) See his book of Simples, fol.
75. b.

[A] A few whereof may not be unacceptable in a note apart.] Among those natural products, whereon Dr Bulleyn made such observations in the counties aforesaid, it may not be unuseful to repeat what he has noted in his chapter of Milk; where after having distinguished, in what cases and distempers, that soft and nutritious liquor, so natural to the constitutions of man and beast, may be improperly and with evil effects used; he adds, that nevertheless we see what a goodly support milk is in a commonwealth, and the feeders thereon, to be people of a good temperament and complexion; as in Wales, Suffolk, Essex, and especially about Alfen Moor, among the mountains in the Bishoprick, where there is little tillage, and so much bringing up of cattle, that in this country, some time belonging to Sir Thomas, the Baron of Hilton, the people are all chiefly nourished with milk, and use little of any other drink (1). In the same work, our author makes an observation out of other counties, upon the preservation of their flocks, by the virtues of the herb Tormentile, where he asserts, that the sheep which feed thereon, shall never die of the rot; that he has seen it proved in sundry places in Norfolk; and at Blaxhall in Suffolk, upon a sheep walk in the said town, where they lived many years without rotting, through the virtues of this herb; and says, that the shepherds also had observed the same (2). There are likewise dispersed up and down his works, some little remarks on the plenty and perfection, of some native fruits, and other vegetable products of our country in his time, which being before planting and gardening, lent their more artful hands to the improvement of them,

(1) Dr Bulleyn's
Book of Simples,
fol. 84.

(2) Ibid. fol. 36.
b.

the Natural Histories of those places. There, in that city, he practised with great reputation, them, might contribute to illustrate the natural fertility of our soil and climate, and be very materially instanced, not only to remove some disparaging reflexions which have been made upon them, but excite our solemn gratitude for the same, and also our industry to multiply and meliorate this national blessing. 'Tis not unlikely indeed, that commerce may have increased the variety of those vegetables, which are of great convenience to us; as it has also introduced a variety of superfluities, and even things we might be contented with of our own growth. But for a late ingenious author to say, that, Without the benefit of commerce, What a barren, uncomfortable spot of earth falls to our share! looks more like the sophistry of some French merchant, or other mercenary stranger; at least as if it proceeded more from the dictates of a private domestic interest in foreign importations, than the public spirit of an ingenious countryman, who was any thing of an hortulan antiquary, and well read in our Natural Historians, Herbalists, and Writers of husbandry and gardening, or in common experience itself. The circulation of money, the profits of exchange, the consumption of our own manufactures, and indeed, the gratification of our luxury and extravagance, with our thirst after variety and novelty, and to adopt or naturalize things in fashion or request in other countries, might yield juster motives for the support of commerce, than the defects of our sun and soil (3). But this author found it also necessary to imply, that by the assistance of art and the planter, our fruits (all truly of foreign extraction) may be kept from degenerating into the trash of our country. And yet, when very little art in that planting was used among us, at least that is descended to our knowledge, we had surely better fruits of our own growth, than bips and barvs, acorns and pignuts, at all times; or Julius Cæsar would never have said of our island, apparently with regard to our vegetable varieties, and the perfection they were in, that except the beech and the fir tree; in other things, that is, in its natural furniture or productions it was like France (4). And this is again well supported by the frequent mention in William of Malmbury, and others of our most antient Historians, of the many vineyards we had in greater number and excellence, so many hundred years since, than we have now over many parts of the kingdom; in some whereof the tythe of wine was a very considerable article, as Camden has collected out of those writers; and it is affirmed, we have still upon record some treaty of peace between France and England, in which it is stipulated, that we should root up our vineyards, and be their customers for all our wine. If such extirpation of the English vineyards was not owing to this, it might be to the falling of Gascony into the hands of the English, whence wine was imported cheaper and better than we could make it. So might the improvement of our vintages be discouraged, for the employment of our navigation; and the name of vineyards remain in many places, which produce none of their fruit; yet were there very good grapes kept growing in many parts, as Dr Bulleyn has particularly noted in Suffolk (5), though indeed our great neglect of planting and gardening, at several times and places in general; and of early publishing our experiments, observations, and improvements therein, are to be censured more than any inclemencies of our climate, which is so willing to maintain what our soil produces, that it has, in some places, worn the same youthful face of fertility for ages together, without any other art than that of nature herself; and the camomile, that has flourished for two hundred years upon Brentford-Green (†), without any planter's care, may sufficiently evidence how little the vigor of vegetation degenerates, or that of our sun and soil decays. But after all, the confessed want of industry aforesaid, will appear to have, among other causes, as foreign wars, civil wars, &c. been greatly promoted, even by commerce itself; which, for its own interest, has taken the advantage to supply us, with what we needed not, for the sake of our money; and to discourage us, by such arguments, from supplying ourselves with what we wanted, only at the expence of our labour. Hence came our own vegetables to be so much neglected; hence so many ship-loads of fruits from abroad; and Billinggate our best orchard for even those fruits, which then grew in our gardens, fields, and hedges; as the case is, in some measure, to this day: and hence, that we had no Englische Herbal published, 'till near the middle of King Henry VIIIth's reign, and that but a translation, full of faults and mistakes (†). Nay, the first publisher of an original Herbal, in our tongue, Dr William Turner, informs us, that Botany, or the knowledge of simpling, was fallen into such neglect, that about the same time in that King's reign, or but few years after, he found not a Physician in the Univerity of Cambridge, who could inform him of the Greek, Latin, or English names of any plants he produced (*), as he gathered them to compile his first Latin skeleton of the said English Herbal; and yet this was not owing to the scarcity of our plants and fruits, but rather to the variety of them, and the little regard that was paid to them. Foreigners might well take advantage of such neglect, and consequently such ignorance; tho' this indolence of ours, and their seductions to it, were never so universally prevalent, but that we have had spirits, which in many parts of the kingdom for ages past, have, by their skill and expence in the enrichment of their country, demonstrated the generous fertility of their lands, in the returns they made them for their labour. It might be excusable enough in a Frenchman to dissuade our countrymen from planting of Hops, with an air of friendly concern, that our country would not produce them; but those who have read in our author, Dr Bulleyn, and others, in what perfection they flourished here before that Frenchman was born, will look upon his concern as a kind of farcical friendship; and it might have justified the title of his book (6), if he could thereby have abridged our planters and our revenue of the great benefit they receive from them. It was above fifty years since affirmed by a Staffordshire Physician, that they have advanced land to the profit of sometimes an hundred pounds an acre (7). It has also been of late publicly set forth, that but four years last past, the produce of the duty on hops, was no less than sixty-five thousand, two hundred eighteen pounds, twelve shillings and five pence: and that the last year, in which the Duke of Cumberland shone like another sun in Great Britain, our hop-countries produced no less than 120000 bags; yet we must have foreign commerce for their hops too, though the importation of the great quantities that have been damaged, rotten, dry'd to, and mingled with, dust, sand, and other soil, which made two parts in three of foreign hops formerly imported, has been long since complained of (8): and seeing also, we so often want not sufficient of our own growth; which, as Dr Bulleyn observes, was in his time as good as any in the world (9). It might be for that reason of such damaged importations, perhaps, that there was a petition presented in Parliament against them, as a wicked weed, so long ago as in the reign of King Henry VI (10); or if it was for any pernicious property conceived in them, or the injudicious use of them, they have since been so successfully propagated and used, as we have had so much better improvement of their culture from the ingenious author, who first wrote thereof among us (11), and from the Botanists, who have distinguished their virtues, that they have out-grown all their accusations, and been adjudged wholesome. That petition will shew, that the use of them came in long before the Reformation, let that comical author, Dr William King, say what he will about hops not being to be put into an Englishman's drink before heresy came in (12). Wherein he might be misled by an erroneous, or misquoted rhyme in the addition made to Stow's Chronicle by his editor, Edward Howes, where he says,

Turkies, carps, hops, pick'rel, and beer,
Came into England all in a year (13).

Every one of which particulars, even not excepting perhaps, that of hops and beer, might be confuted, if it were here expedient to enlarge upon those topics. The like conceit seems to have been too strictly entertained of our Cherries; that we had none tolerable among us, 'till Richard Haris, fruiterer to King Henry VIII. brought over from Flanders about that

(1) The Great Herbal, &c. fol. 1525.

(*) See Dr Turner's Herbal, the last edit. printed fol. at Collen, 1563, in Pref.

(6) Le Tresore Politique, &c.

(7) W. Westmancott's Scripture Herbal, 1230, 1654.

(8) See Statute primo Jacobi, cap. xviii.

(9) Government of Health, p. 210.

(10) Fuller's Worthies in Essex.

(11) Reginalde Scot's Perfect Platform of a Hoppe-Garden, and necessary Instructions for the making and Maintenance thereof, &c. Lond. 4to, 1578.

(12) The Art of Cookery, in imitation of Horace's Art of Poetry, &c. 8vo, no date, p. 17.

(13) Stow's Chron. edit. fol. 1615, p. 948.

(3) See the Spectator, edit. 8vo, 1747, No. 69.

(4) Comment. lib. v.

(5) His Government of Health, p. 162.

(†) As may be computed from Dr Turner's New Herbal, fol. 1551, where he says, this herb then also grew on Richmond Green, and in greatest plenty on Hounslow Heath.

putation, and among others of the most eminent inhabitants, was in great favour with Sir part of his Majesty's reign before-mentioned, the shoots or grafts of a better kind, and planted them here also at Tenham in Kent; from which plantation they are called Kentish cherries (14): but we may compute from our author, Dr Bulleyn, again, that there grew great plenty of good cherries at Ketreinham, near Norwich, about the same time these Flemish cherries came to such perfection in Kent. The same fruiterer brought over some different species of other fruits, as also did Mr Mascall of Plumsted, in Suffex, as we are informed by a name-fake of his (15). Whence came our first Kentish pippins, and other plantations of those pippins elsewhere, as also some pears belike; but we ought not to infer from thence, that we had no good apples and pears till that time, since we have it again from Dr Bulleyn, that we had a pear of our own growth, in and about the city of Norwich, called the Black-Friars pear, that was very delicious, pleasant, and profitable to hot stomachs; and he produces the judgment of a right worshipful Physician of the same city, Dr Mansfield, that those pears without all comparison, were the best that grew in any place of England (16). But as a proof of the great propensity there is in the most barren, stoney, and unpromising parts of our soil, to the vegetation of plants, and their bringing forth fruit in great plenty and perfection, even without care or culture, there is an extraordinary instance in the Orford pease; and Dr Bulleyn seems to have been the first author who observed and recorded it, at least who described this remarkable example of fertility, from his own sight and knowledge of it. He says, that in the year 1555, at that town in Suffolk, between the haven and the main sea, where never plough came, nor natural earth was, but stones only, infinite thousands of ship-loads; there did pease grow, whose roots were more than two fathom long; and the peascods grew in clusters, like the chats or keys of ash trees; bigger than fitches, and less than field peason; very sweet to eat of, and satisfied many of the poor dwelling thereabouts, who would otherwise have perished for hunger; the scarcity of bread being that year so great, that many were driven to make much of acorns; and they laboured under the sickness of a stranger fever besides, than was ever heard of there. Now, says the Doctor, whether these pease and providence of God, came thro' shipwreck, with much misery, or else by much miracle, I am not able to determine; but sown they were not by man's hands, nor like other pease (17). This strange event is repeated in several authors; and among the writers of our chronicles, John Stow confirms the same. He says, it happened in August that year, and that the place by the sea-side, all of hard stones and pebbles, was called a shelf, lying between Orford and Aldborough, where never grafs grew, nor any earth was seen. He computes the crop that was gathered, to have been above an hundred quarters, and yet there remained, some ripe, and some blossoming, as many more. Further, that the Bishop of Norwich, the Lord Willoughby, and great numbers beside, went to behold this fruitful harvest of the hard rocky stones, which lay for the space of three yards under their roots; which were all sweet (18), as we read before their fruit was.

Dr Bulleyn in another part of the treatise aforesaid, speaks again of pease at Orford, that grow on the stones without sowing (19), as if they grew oftener than once, or every year in such manner; and indeed so it has been explained to me, by some inhabitants of that neighbourhood, that some remains of that great crop, are still produced there annually in their season; however true the tradition may be, of some rigorous Lord, who endeavoured to destroy, and thereby deprive the poor of them. In this case they might sow themselves, as many fruits do; and so the pease on the Shelf at Orford, may almost contend for antiquity, with the comonible on the Green at Brentford. But as for their last appearance there, in the year aforesaid, if we are to look no higher than reason for the cause, that which it might most probably spring from, as Dr Bulleyn has hinted, may be a shipwreck. Their being unlike other pease, strengthens this suggestion; as that they might be of some foreign kind, unseen in these parts before: but then this might have been remembered by the neighbours, and the Doctor might have told us more expressly, there lately had been such a wreck upon that shore. As for the length of the stalks, that might be owing to the distance of the owzy bottom, or other lodging and rooting places, down between the pebbles and cliffs of the ragged shelves, thro' which some sand and soil, that had been thrown up by the tides, were washed and sunk; which stones, besides other benefits, supplying the chief use of earth, supported the stems for that length, up thro' the spaces and cavities between them, into the air; to which they must aspire, as well by their own disposition to germinate and fructify, as by the attractive power of the sun, whose kindly and natural warmth, those loose stones were more aptly disposed to receive and communicate, than stowe-walls may be to forward and fertilize by their artificial heat, the more chilly and tender plants that are raised against them: as in several parts of France, and other foreign countries; the vines will grow so fruitfully out of such sloping banks of stones as shall appear more conducive to their fertility, than the shallow and hungry soil they are rooted in. Not only the more hardy and common vegetables of our own growth, have thus sometimes flourished in the most rude and uncultivated places, without any human labour of sowing or planting; but, it is certain, that in our soil, however our weather may sometimes be inconstant and unfavourable, many more profitable exoticks might, with ordinary care, be naturalized, than have been, and to better purpose; to the enrichment as well as ornament of our country, and as well in greater plenty as variety, if the spirit of importing and propagating them had been continued with the same vigour at it was begun. For when, after it's long sleep in the bed of ignorance, Botany began to revive, shoot forth it's flourishing leaves, and display it's fruitful products in the Works of the Learned; when it came to instruct us in the vegetable treasures of foreign nations as well as our own; when navigation invited our adventurous Argonauts to make discoveries in the New World, and establish a communication between it and the Old, to the enlargement of the British glory as well as it's dominions; and when our great men at home began to delight in more elegant buildings, and to adorn them around with the newest improvements of planting and gardening, which is recorded to have been in the latter part of Queen Elizabeth's reign; then were the said Discoveries of remote regions, as also our Embassadors in foreign courts, besides Physicians, Botanists, and other ingenious men skilled in this branch of Natural Philosophy, induced, for the emolument of their country, as well as merchants and others, for their own, to import such seeds, roots, fruits, and plants, as would furnish those curious persons who encouraged them thereto, with various opportunities and occasions of enlarging their experience in the fertility of this land; among whom, none of those who solicited the said importations, were more laudably assiduous, or more happily gratified, than the great Lord Burghley; tho' many others, our worthy navigators, travellers, and learned men, should also be remembered, for their own honour, and that of this kingdom, who first embellished the same with such vegetable improvements, as well as those patriots who excited them to the same, if it were proper in this place to carry this argument to it's deserved extent. By this means, and the arts of Husbandry and Gardening, our vegetable productions were multiplied, many rare plants became natives of our soil which are of sovereign virtue in Physick, many roots, greens, and pulse, increased the variety of our food, and many trees no less diversified our groves and gardens. Some, beneficial for the celerity of their growth; some, for the value of their timber; some, for the beauty of their flowers; some, for the magnificence of their shade; and others, for the excellence of their fruit; inasmuch, that we had then, in that Queen's time, of our indigenous stores and importations together, besides apricots, peaches, and others of the more elegant flavour, as we have elsewhere observed, no less than fourteen or fifteen different kinds of cherries; no less than three score different kinds of plums, as many sorts of pears, exceeding good; and apples of such various kinds, as it was then thought impossible to describe them all. So favourable was

4) The Kentish Cherry Garden or natural History of the Cherry tree, &c. 4to, 15. p. 11.

5) See a Book Fishing with Hook and Line, &c. by L. M. Leonard Mansfield, printed in 1550, p. 7.

6) His Government of Health, 156.

7) His Book of Miracles, fol. 30.

8) Stowe's Iron, fol. 627.

9) Book of Miracles, fol. 8. b.

Sir Thomas Hilton, Knight, Baron of Hilton, who was Captain of Tinmouth-castle under King Philip and Queen Mary. We gather further from his printed works, that he performed some notable cures in that family, particularly on the Baron's lady, whom he recovered of a dangerous tympany, with a bread which he directed to be made of anniseeds and some other herbs (f). He also proved the virtues of dittany in curing the same disease at Tinmouth-castle, where plenty thereof grew on the rocks (g): probably upon the same Lady, at least some other person in her family. And many other medicines he mentions, which, by his own knowledge and experience, proved successful in the relief of human maladies [B]. To that Knight aforesaid, he, in the Epistle prefixed, dedicates his book above made use of, intituled, The Government of Health, in the last year of Queen Mary's reign. In which Epistle, he ingenuously sets forth the honour of Physicians, and the praise of health; and in the book he refers to another of his writing, upon Healthfull Medicines (b), which he finished the year after the former; but

(f) His Book of Simples, fol. 2. b.

(g) Idem. fol.
62. b.

(b) The Government of Health,
12mo, edit. 1595,
P. 23.

our sin and soil in those days, how indifferently soever they have been thought of in ours, when all those, and many other fruits, with their different species, flourish in much greater variety. Mr John Gerard, the famous Botanist, whose indefatigable labour is no less to be commended, for increasing the vegetable riches of this island, by rearing and naturalizing whatever plants were wanting in it, and he could procure from abroad, that would be beneficial to his countrymen, than for describing them and their virtues so excellently as he has done in his Herbal (20), under the patronage and encouragement of the Lord Burghley aforesaid: this man, most famous in his time for the knowledge and love of plants, had a large Physick-Garden near his house in Holbourn, wherein he raised near eleven hundred different herbs, shrubs, and trees, of foreign as well as domestick growth; as may be seen in the catalogue he published of them two years after the Herbal aforesaid, which he dedicated in Latin to another of his patrons, Sir Walter Raleigh (21). Therein it may appear, that our ground would produce other fruits besides bips and barus, acorns and pignuts. Yet commerce was still so very obliging, that it descended, at that time, to carry on a traffick even of potherbs, for the supply of our ancestors tables, and would bring them home to their markets and doors, rather than give them the trouble of raising them in their gardens. For we are told, by a person of good knowledge in Husbandry, that in Queen Elizabeth's reign, we had not only our garden wares from Holland (such as cabbages, cauliflowers, &c.) but also cherries from Flanders, Apples from France, saffron and licorish from Spain, and hops from the Low-Countries; whereas now, says he, it is known, that licorish, saffron, cherries, apples, pears, hops, and cabbages of England, are the best in the world (22). And a little farther imputes it to our ill husbandry, that we have quinces from Flanders, small nuts from Spain, prunes and walnuts from France, almonds from Italy, and chestnuts from Portugal (23). Nay, we may gather from the same author, that, but twenty years before his writing these particulars, a famous town, which he names in the margin Gravesend, had not so much as a mess of pease but what they were forced to send twenty miles for, even to London; though perhaps they ought to have been at the pains, since they would use none at home in raising them, to have gone as far as Orford for them.

[B] Which, by his own knowledge and experience, proved successful in the relief of human maladies.] Besides those medicines he used to cure the Lady Hilton, and probably others, of a tympany, as before mentioned, our Doctor has ingenuously communicated several others, wherewith he no less effectually restored many patients; among which, some of the most remarkable, we shall briefly point at. And these are, his clyster to stop the bloody-flux; with which, he says, under the person or character of Health, 'Assure yourself I have helped many, and hindered none that have used it; for I myself have oftentimes proved it, even to do you.' The particulars of the herbs, and other ingredients used therein, being too long to recite here, we must refer to, as also, Dr Mansfield's clyster for the cholick, mentioned in the same leaf (24). In his discourse of eye-waters, he recommends some, which in the same character, he says also, he had proved himself to have helped many; especially one, which he transcribes from Euonimus; whom, he says, was equal to any who ever practised distillation (25). In his treatise of the French disease, he fairly discloses his own regimen, wherewith he cured many thereof by his guaiacum-drink, and the diet here prescribed; for the knowledge and management of which, he says, few men were to be compared to Thomas Glandfield, a skilful Surgeon of London (26). With this discourse should be read, what he has said in another of his books, as well upon the misusage, as the best manner of using the wood or raspings of Guaiacum, in that disease (27), which, in those days, was more common than is generally apprehended, as the antiquity of the said disease has since been found more remote, than the learned in our author's days apprehended (28); and it never was more rife among the Indians or Neapolitans, nor in France or Spain, than it was in the Doctor's time, or soon after, in England. An eminent Surgeon published a tract not long after our author's death, wherein he affirms, that in the Hospital of St Bartholomew in London, alone, there had been cured of this disease by himself, and three others, within five years, to the number at least of one thousand or more; and a little further he says, 'It seldom happened, in that single Hospital, while I served there, for the space of nine or ten years, but that among every twenty diseased persons who were taken in, ten of them had the pox (29).' But to return to our author; who, describing a tabes, or corruption of humours, which begins with a continual rheum, and aposthumates or putrifies the lungs, 'till it destroys the patient by a consumption, he prescribes an excellent pill, made of the seeds and juice of sage, with spicknard, ginger, long pepper, and old after, taking every morning and evening an ounce; drinking sage water after it: and adds, 'This is the best pill that ever I did know, and it helped me in a great sickness (of that kind) in Suffolk, where some time I dwelled (30).' In another place he says, he has often proved, that the roots calamus aromaticus foddin in wine, and drank, has cured the white morpew (31). And somewhat farther, speaking of the dazie, and it's virtues, called in Latin bellis, he more particularly informs us, how he cured R. Bellis, before spoken of, therewith, among other medicines, of a palsy and a quartan, who yet fought afterwards divers ways to murder him; most ungratefully joining with ruffians for that bloody purpose (32). In the next leaf he relates how he recovered Sir Richard Alie, a Knight famous for his skill in military architecture, and especially the impregnable walls of Berwick, and other eminent buildings; to whom the Doctor administered relief, when other purgations would not work, and eased him of that choler adult, or melancholy humour, which annoyed him, with a decoction of fena, white ginger, and flowers of bugloss, in the whey of goats milk (33). Further, where he is treating of the quality of cresses, he informs us of a Suffolk gentleman, who was an officer in the army, that was cured of a weakness in the feminal vessels, or involuntary waiking of nature, by an infusion of that herb in wine (34). Under his chapter of spurge, we have an account how the Lord Wharton was near being poisoned by quid pro quo, an ignorant servant, in the absence of the cook, procuring mercury sublimated at the Apothecary's shop, instead of the herb mercury, and put it into the broth which his Lordship eat, and would have lost his life by it, if the poison had not been speedily discharged by proper emetics (35). And in his chapter of gums, &c. he says, that with a tent of bacon dipped in tar, he had oftentimes healed the fistula (36).

(26) Idem. fol. 47.

(27) His Book of
Simples, fol. 60.
&c.

(28) Monardus,
Montanus, and Johannis de Vigo
&c. affirms, it first appeared in 1494, when the French King went to recover Naples; but a late Surgeon of our own, Mr W.
Beckett, has traced it up among us some centurie higher; and a French Physician
Monsieur Pattrin
in his Letters, a high as it could go, even to Adam and Eve.

(29) W. Clove,
De Morbo Gal-lico, 4to, 1383 and fin.

(30) His Book of
Simples, fol. 5.

(31) Idem. fol. 11.

(32) Ibid. fol.
39. b.

(33) Id. fol. 40.

(34) Ib. fol. 42.

(35) Id. fol. 44.

(36) Ibid. fol. 6.

(20) Printed in folio, 1597.

(21) Intituled, Catalogus Arborum, Fruticum, ac Plantarum,
tam Indigenarum, quam Exotica-rum, in Horto Johannis Gerardi, Civis ac Chi-rurgi Londinensis Nascentium, Fol.
Lond. Impens.
Joan. Norton.
1599.

(22) Robert Child's Letter on the Defects and Remedies of English Husbandry, edit. 1651, in Samuel Hartlib's
Legacy of Husbandry, 4to, 1655.
p. 9.

(23) Idem. p. 15.

(24) His Book of Compounds, fol.
38.

(25) Ibid. fol. 42.

but the manuscript copy of it, with many others of his books, &c. which made a good part of his library, perished unfortunately by shipwreck. The author thereupon came patiently to London, with intention to have re-compiled the said work; but was very injuriously, for a considerable time, obstructed therein: for it was not long after he arrived at that city, in the year 1560, before he found himself, to his great surprize and affliction, most falsely and wrongfully charged, by Mr William Hilton of Bidick; with having murdered his brother, our author's worthy patron, the Baron aforesaid; who really died, among his own friends, of a malignant fever. Yet the innocent Doctor was publickly arraigned for the same before the Duke of Norfolk, and the most diligent injustice was used to bring him to a shameful death, that his adversary might, with the covetous Ahab, through false witness and perjury, have obtained, by the counsel of Jezabel, a vineyard with the price of blood. But all the shame and scandal fell upon the prosecutor's own head: his malice and cruelty, were by justice exposed and rejected; and the Doctor was, though not without much vexation and expence, very honourably acquitted. Yet did not that wicked enemy of his give over his bloody persecution; but basely hired some ruffians to assassinate him, with whom also others were drawn in as accomplices, who were of genteel extraction; and particularly one R. Bellises of Yarrow, in the aforesaid Bishoprick, did most ungratefully attempt the life of this learned man, whose skill had, not long before, preserved his. But this also proving ineffectual, the said William Hilton arrested Dr Bulleyn in an action for debt, and confined him in prison for a long time (i), where he wrote a great part of those Medicinal Treatises, which are to this day extant. Herein he frequently complains, that the vigilant molestations of his implacable enemies, both hindered him from publishing more of his writings, and from completing those he had already published for the good of his country. But these indignities grieved him the less, coming from him who was a stranger to him, seeing he had persecuted the Lady Hilton, his own brother's wife, whose shame, loss, and blood, he had also sought, tho' she had redeemed much of his lands from loss, by the great sums of money she had lent him; and when this man, says the Doctor, should have thankfully re-paid that Lady her money, then he gratified her as he did me (k). Here the Doctor exclaims against the most odious and deforming vice of ingratitude, as he has elsewhere more copiously done, in other parts of his work (l); shewing how, in spite of great titles, long pedigrees, and coats of arms, it degrades, defaces, and defiles all gentility, with the blackest obloquy, scandal, and contempt. Thus, triumphant innocence having raised a monument of infamy over tyrannical guilt, he leaves his defeated and despised enemy, with the character of being profitable to few, and noisome to himself; a lover of few, and flatterer of many; a vessel of ignorance, full of ingratitude; and unnatural, even to his own children; by waisting that in law, which should be reserved for their relief: so concludes, with recommending this cataplasm to his mortified conscience. Notwithstanding those cruel interruptions, he did find means to set forth such of his compositions, as gained him the character of a learned, experienced, and able, Physician. Throughout the same he also appears a man of piety and probity; and though he lived in the times of Popery, was no way tainted with it's principles. He was very intimate with the works of the ancient Physicians and Naturalists, both Greek, Roman, and Arabian; yet is very fruitful in many modern examples of his own experience, of which we have given a little taste in the last note; and, above all, was commendable, not only for the generous disposition, very exemplary in our age, of commemorating so candidly, several persons of distinction, who had done good among their friends and neighbours, with their private or family receipts, but also for celebrating many of those contemporaries who were eminent in his own profession; of both which, for their gratification who may be curious in historical enquiries after the promoters and practitioners of medicinal science in those times, a short recital is here annexed [C]. Thus we have drawn together what

(i) Dr Bulleyn's Preface to his Bulwark of Defence, &c.

(k) His book of Simples, fol. 84. b.

(l) His Book of the use of Sick Men and Medicines, fol. 75, &c.

Dr

[C] Of both which, &c. a short recital is here annexed.] Of the first, or those gentlemen and ladies who thus humanely relieved the infirmities of their neighbours, Dr Bulleyn has these words: 'Many good men and women within this realm, have divers medicines for the cancre, and help their neighbours who are in peril, and are not only poor and needy, having no money to spend in chirurgery, but some dwell where no Chirurgeons be near at hand; In such cases, many good gentlemen and ladies have done no small pleasure to poor people; as that excellent Knight, and worthy learned man, Sir Thomas Eliot, whose works be immortal; Sir Philip Paris of Cambridge, whose cures deserve praise; Sir William Gascogne of Yorkshire, that helped many sore eyes; and the Lady Taylor of Huntingdonshire, and the Lady Dorrel of Kent, had many precious medicines to comfort the sight, and to heal wounds withal, and were well seen in herbs. The Commonwealth hath great want of them, and of their medicines; which, if they had come to my hands, they should not have been written on the backside of my book. Among all other, there was a Knight, a man of great worship, a godly, hurtless, gentleman, who is departed this life, his name was Sir Anthony Hevenyngham (37). This gentleman learned a water to kill a cancre, of his own mother, which he used all his life, to the great help of many men, women, and children. He had also a salve for sundry green wounds, but because I have not the copy thereof, I will make report but only of that water which I am sure he used; and it is not much unlike a water for the cancre which Andreas Furnerius, the Frenchman, did make of great virtue, &c (38). And of the modern Physicians, such especially who had advanced the worthy art of Chirurgery, among the worthy fraternity of Chirurgeons in London, by their lectures in Anatomy, he commends the learned Dr John Kaius his revealing to the said fraternity, the hidden jewels and precious treasures of Galen; shewing himself to be the second Linacre, whose steps he followeth. Who shall forget, adds, he the most worthy Dr William Turner? whose learned acts I leave to the witty commendations, and immortal praise, (37) Of Hevenyngham in Suffolk.

(38) His Book of Compounds, fol. 46, 47.

of

Dr Bulleyn has written of others and of himself, as far as he thought fit to acquaint us with his own personal history; his further character as an author, beyond what we have here observed, might, if it were needful, be drawn from a more deliberate examination of his Writings; which, because some account may be expected of them, we shall here remit to another note [D]; all but one tract, the last we have met with of our author's of Conrad Gefner: Yet his Book of Herbs will always grow green and never wither, as long as Dioscorides is had in mind among us mortal wights (*). In the noble state of knights among the English or British nation, Which of them did ever in race give a trip, out-run, or win the victory of Sir Thomas Eliot, Knight? Who hath planted such fruitful trees, &c. that his grafts do grow in each place in this our commonwealth; and his Castle of Health cannot decay. Thomas Faire (or Phayer), Doctor of Physick, is not dead, but is transformed and changed into a new nature, immortal. He hath left a piece of dark earth behind him, and is gone over Lethe's flood, forgetting this world; and with pleasure spendeth his time among the heavenly Muses, under the two-topped Hill of Parnassus. Full well he knew Pliny, who taught the goodness of clean creatures, and also the pestiferous venom of deadly melancholy serpents, and their present remedy by the virtue of herbs of sundry kinds. Dr Andrew Borde, wrote also well of Physick to profit the commonwealth withal. This man declared, how that he was in a great city where he had seen three hellish tragedies; the one was Nullus Ordo, the second was Stridor Dentium, the third was Horror Inhabitans; and yet this Borde was a bird of this nest or cage, called Rome, whereof he maketh this report (39). I will not forget Master Thomas Pauguinellus, or Paynel, who hath played the good servant to the commonwealth, in translating good books of Physick. Dr William Kunningham hath well travailed, like a good soldier, against the ignorant enemy; setting forth the commendation, praise, and profit, of Astronomy, Cosmography, and Geography, &c. (40). How well was he seen in tongues, learned in arts and sciences, natural and moral; a Father in Physick; whose learning gave liberty to the ignorant, with his Whetstone of Wit, and Castle of Knowledge? and, finally, giving place to sliding nature, died himself in bondage or prison; by which death he was delivered and made free, and yet liveth in the happy land, among the laureat learned: his name was Dr Record; with many others, which I must give place to time: for their virtues be not unknown in Physick and Chirurgery, although I name them not. Yet if you do further delight, without disdain, to know the names of them who have been excellent in the worthy arts of Chirurgery, Physick, &c. I will declare their names in order as I have noted and known. So he gives us a list of above an hundred and twenty ancients and moderns, foreigners as well as natives, who professed the said arts; among which, there are about thirty Englishmen; the chief of whom, not already named, are, Bartholmæus, who wrote De Proprietatibus Rerum; Dr Barclay; Dr Butts; Dr Clemens; Dr Chambers; Dr Caldwell, of Oxford; Dr Edwards, of Cambridge; Mr Edmunds, Surgeon, of York; and Mr Gale, of London; Dr Hector, of Cambridge; Dr Robert Huyck, the Queen's Physician; Dr Freer, of Cambridge; John Porter, of Norwich; Dr Langton, and Dr Larkin, both of Cambridge; Dr Masters, Robert Balthrop, Surgeon; Dr Simon Ludford, of Oxford; Thomas Colfe, Apothecary; Dr Wendy, of Cambridge; and Vicars, or Vicary, the Surgeon, of London (41).

(*) See more of Dr Turner's praise, in Bulleyn's Book of Simples, fol. 67, under the chapter of Tamerik.

(41) Dr Bulleyn's Dialogue between Soreness and Chirurgery, fol. 4.

[D] His writings — we shall here remit to another note.] Our author's book of Healthful Medicines, we have before spoken of, and observed, by what accident the publick was deprived of it: whether it was written in the form of a dialogue, as the rest of his pieces are, which we have seen, is not now to be resolved. To what has been above said of his book, intitled, The Government of Health, we may add, that it was first printed in 8vo, 1548, according to Anthony Wood, with a wooden cut of the author prefixed, representing his face in profile, with a long beard. I have by me an imperfect copy of one edition, which had been the property of the late Mr William Beckett, a Surgeon of note in London, who to qualify himself for the laudable labour he had undertaken of reviving our old Physicians, a work long neglected, and which he to the regret of the curious left unfinished, had made himself the best acquainted with their lives and writings of any person, I ever knew, or heard of. By the dates he has written at the end of this book it appears, that the said edition was printed in 1559. There was a later edition still, after the author's death, part of which is bound up with this book, to complete it; in which, the title runs thus,—The Government of Health; a Treatise written by William Bulleyn, for the especiall good and healthful Preservation of Man's Bodie from all noy-some Diseases, proceeding from the Excess of evil Diet, and other Infirmities of Nature: Full of excellent Medicines and wise Counsels, for Conservation of Health in Men, Women, and Children: both Pleasant and profitable to the industrious Reader. London: printed by Valentine Sims, in Adlingstreet, at the White Swan, near Bainard's Castle, 8vo, 1595. After the Dedication to Baron Hilton, as before observed, there are some English verses of the author's in praise of temperance and sobriety, and on the ill consequences of gluttony and drunkenness. At the end of them are two rhiming lines in Latin, to the same purpose, as follow:

Esse cupis sanus? sit tibi parca manus;
Pone gulæ metas, ut sit tibi longa ætas.

Which may be rendered thus:

If for health you are thinking, be not often drinking;
If you'd live long quiet, be sparing in diet.

The work contains an account of the nature and properties of all simples used in food, and how to prevent or destroy those distempers to which the body of man is incident. In the 43d page of the former, and the 17th leaf of the last edition, there is an anatomical figure of a man with the twelve celestial signs, and seven planets about him, directed to the several parts of the body, over which they are conceived to preside; which is copied from Jerom of Brunfwick's Anatomy, as Mr Beckett has in a note at bottom observed. The work is interspersed here and there with some other specimens of our author's poetry, and some wholesome reflections, or admonitions for the conduct of life. Among which, those that would persuade mankind to a regard of that sagacity and foresight, which are commonly most apt to neglect, and which many parts of the brute creation have more prudence to practise, cannot be too much inculcated, nor any exhortations be more seasonably enforced at all times, than those he makes to all men, while they are in the health and vigour of their younger days, to provide against the infirmities of age; where, speaking of that lusty state and flower of our lives, from the twenty-fifth to the thirty-fifth thereof, he says, 'It is the best time for mankind to travel in, with godly exercise in Science, Art, and profitable travels in his vocation; putting in practice, the virtues which he hath learned in youth; for this is the summer part of life, wherein all goodly fruits did flourish in every good occupation: this is the very harvest, to gather precious corn, and fruit of their labours, against the cold storms and cloudy days of their aged winter, wherein the body shall be weak, and the eyes sight decay, and the hands tremble; and therefore, it is not comely to see the state of age, without rest, which, in the time of youth, d'd honestly travel, for there is a grace given to many creatures, unreasonable, both beasts and fowls, to make provision beforehand, what is then to be required of men, reasonable?' as he further instances, in certain verses there added (42). But some former reader of them perceiving the good sense in those lines, and regretting the infirmities of old age in them, which they admonish us to provide author's publishing; which, to do justice to it's contents, might swell that note too much, if it were involved in the catalogue of his other writings therein: for, as it contains many remarkable particulars, which, by reason of it's great scarcity, have been long buried and forgotten, we have been persuaded to revive a particular extract of them; and as they comprehend a variety of intelligence, that may be useful or agreeable to the curious: these are the reasons this tract is reserved to appear last by itself; yet as, like an adjoining paragraph, it follows close to, it should not be thought to appear separate from that catalogue; any more than the officer can be said to be divided from his company, who marches singly at the end of it to bring up the rear [E]. All that we have met with further vide against, has endeavoured to re-invest them in a more modern dress: and these are the words as they are written in the margin of the said copy,

(42) The Government of Health, p. 39.

The bird, in spring, her artful nest will build;
The ant, with grain, in autumn, store her cell;
The squirrel's dray, with nuts, 'gainst winter's fill'd:
These, tho' irrational, their wants foretel!
Then should not man, with reason on his side,
E'er he grows old, for age infirm provide?

C. S.

No less regard has our author had to youth than old age; and as they could not be more seasonable in his days than they are in ours, so of no less general importance are his judicious enforcements of that indispensable duty in all parents, of restraining their children in time, by education, from all indirect or discreditable courses, and training them in those that will make them serviceable members of a common-wealth; to the neglect, whereof, is owing all the greatest evils of a kingdom; for, says he, very emphatically, 'Parents have no small charge committed unto them, that must give account to God how they have brought up their children; and they, who in these years do spare correction, truly be grievous enemies unto their children, and at last shall be recompensed with shame, when they shall see misfortune and wretchedness fall upon the fruits of your own seed. For men have small profit of their corn, that is choked and overcome with thistles, bryers, and brakes, which were not weeded in time; much less of their children, who have received, neither correction nor honest learning in due season. If the keepers of gardens be careful over their late sown seeds, and tender herbs, which are in danger to be destroyed of every frost; what should good fathers and mothers do for their children, whose tender and youthful years be carried away and overcome of every foolish fantasy (43)?' There is another treatise ascribed to Dr Bulleyn, in the first printed catalogue of our old books (44), and out of that, by Anthony Wood, intituled, A Regimen against the Pleurisy, 8vo. London, 1562 (45). But this, not having been seen, we cannot see any thing more of it. It is much, that it was not involved, as The Government of Health in some part is, in the collection of his works which were published the same year. This is intituled, Bulleyn's Bulwarke of Defence, against all Sicknes, Sorenes, and Woundes, that doe daily assaulte Mankinde; wchich Bulwarke is kept with Hillarius the Gardiner, Health the Physician, with their Chyrurgian, to help the wounded Soldiers. Gathered and praised from the moste worthe Learned, bothe old and nowe, to the great comforte of Mankinde. Done by Willyam Bulleyn, and ended this Marche, Anno Salutis, 1562, folio. Imprinted at London by John Kyngston. On the back of the title page are the arms of Henry Cary, Baron of Hunston, Knight of the Garter, printed from a wooden cut; to which Lord our author dedicates the volume, and calls it his Bulwarke, or little Fort, against the bodily Evils of Soreness and Sicknes; 'And tho' there may be many, says he malicious enough and carkered of mind, who with slander and disdain may lay their batteries against this fort, I shall be ever able to repulse them, through your Lordship's aid; for it neither wants strength of ordnance, provision of victuals, nor policy of the most worthy Captains and good Soldiers, as Hypocrates, Galen, Dioscorides, &c. (46).' This volume consists of,

1. The Book of Compounds, with a table of their names, and the Apothecaries rules, or terms. 2. The Book of the Use of sick Men and Medicines; before which is prefixed a wooden print of an old man, in a fur gown, and a flat bonnet, his purse or scrip by his side; supporting himself on his staff, and a death's head at his feet, with four verses at bottom. These are both composed in dialogues, between Sicknes and Health; with an Index at the end. Then follows, 3. The Book of Simples, being an herbal, in the form of a dialogue, between Marcellus and Hillarius; at the end of which are the wooden cuts of some plants, and of some limbeckes or pills; and after these, an index to this part. The last treatise in the book is, 4. A Dialogue between Soreness and Surgery; concerning Apophumations, and Wounds, with their Causes and Cures. This tract has three wooden cuts in it, one representing a man's body on the forepart, full of sores and swellings; the other, in like manner, behind: the third, is also a human figure, in which the veins are seen, directed to, and named, which are to be opened in Phlebotomy; and at the end, is an index also, as to the rest. Seventeen years after these pieces were thus published, or three years after the author's death, there was a second impression of them, with some few corrections and improvements (47), but no addition of the author's tracts before-mentioned, or that treatise of his, which is the subject of the next note, and was published, in two or three editions, between the first publication and the last, of that collection. But there is prefixed to the said last edition thereof, a copy of commendatory verses, by Thomas Newton, an eminent Physician; and author of Chester; in which, it plainly appears, that Dr Bulleyn was then dead, and therefore confirms us in what we before observed, as a mistake in Anthony Wood. In the library of a Physician lately deceased, there was a copy of this volume, in a blank leaf whereof were some other commendatory verses upon it, written with a pen; which, because they seem not to have been published, we shall here, as the greater rarity, present to our reader.

So old a writer, and withal so good!

Believe me, Bulleyn, thou had'st ne'er withstood
The teeth of Time, with such a youthful look,
Had not good medicines thus preserv'd thy book.

Here, we have cypress-wood, and cedar-oil,
To chase the worms and moths that might it spoil:
Then learning of each simple, compound makes,
To purge the Criticks, and confound the Quacks.

Thus Bulleyn's BULWARK well deserves the name;
Both for the reader's health, and writer's fame.

All we have here more to observe is, that the Doctor's brother, Richard Bulleyn the Divine, above in the text mentioned, who died on the 16th of October 1563, was also well skilled in some branches of Physick; having left behind him a treatise called The whole Regimen of the Stone, as the Doctor informs us, where he has given a specimen of his brother's practice in that disease (*), with the syrup, electuary, pills, plaister, and clyster, he prescribed in the same; and also promised to oblige the publick with the work complete; but that he did so, is not as yet come to our knowledge.

[E] Marches singly at the end of it; to bring up the rear.] This long neglected and unknown treatise, is intituled, A Dialogue betw Pleasaunte and Pietifull; wherein is a goodlie Regiment against the Fever Pestilence; with a Consolation and Comfort against Death: by William Bulleyn, printed octavo, 1564. It was again newly corrected by the author, and imprinted at London, by John Kyngston, 8vo. 1569 (48).

(47) Lond. folio, 1579.

(*) Dr Bulleyn's Dialogue between Soreness and Chirurgery, fol. 48.

(48) A. Wood mentions also an edition in 1578.

(43) Dr Bulleyn's Government of Health, p. 28.

(44) A Catalogue of English printed Book, &c. compiled by Andrew Saunfell, Book-eller, fol. 1595.

(45) Ath. Oxon. he first edit.

(46) Dr Bulleyn's 1st. Edit. 10 the Lord Hunston.

(m) John Stow's Survey of London, fol. edit. 1633, p. 314; where, in the foregoing page on the same leaf, the death of W. Bolene is dated 1575, and in the next line W. Bolene, Physician, 1587, which last must be false, for the reason given in the note [D]; however, it might be the ground of A. Wood's error, as we observed in the beginning.

(49) See Bacon's Essays, in the chip. of Riches.

(50) Nicholas Brigham, Esq; at whose expence Chaucer's Monument in Westminster Abbey was built, anno 1555.

further of Dr Bulleyn, is, that he died on the seventh day of January, 1576 (m), and that

This dialogue is dedicated by the author, to his friend Edward Barret, of Belhouse in Essex, Esq; at whose said seat part of it was written, and the Epistle Dedicatory to him is dated the twelfth of March 1564. There are twelve interlocutors in the whole discourse, which consists of much variety. Their names specified in Latin, according to their characters, which are, the Poor Beggar; the Citizen and his Wife; the Rich Man Antonio, and his Servant; the Physician and Apothecary; the Miser, Double Dealer, Lying Traveler, Death, and the Divine. From these we learn in general, the dispositions and demeanour of various conditions in life, when any adversity draws near a city, especially that of the pestilence; wherein the author has briefly described, in the person of the beggar, our needy brother's poverty, calling upon the mercilefs rich, who are wholly entrenched in the thorny embraces of their treasures, and entangled in sweet briars of the world: shewing with all, how the sickness of the wealthy, is the health of the poor; how the loss of the one, is the luck of the other; who, when they themselves become naked, are clothed against their wills; death only being able to render those possessions of the covetous beneficial by dispersion, which monopoly had made a nuisance; like the muckhills that are a burthen to the land, and offensive to the inhabitants thereof, 'till their heaps are cast abroad to the profit of many; which is a comparison, by the way, that with a little variation of words, has been admired in succeeding authors; but Dr Bulleyn never quoted for it. So much, by neglecting our old writers, we are led to the injustice of conferring that respect which is due to their sentiments, upon those who are more modern (49). As the drift of this dialogue, is to run out of one remarkable character, description, or story, into another, they cannot all be equally interesting at this distance of time, to require a coherent and proportionable epitome; therefore, we shall only point at the most capital or considerable of them, and such as are most entertaining in themselves, or most applicable, and likely to illustrate others; above all, such as will best display the knowledge and genius of the author. Among these, one of the most conspicuous objects is, that fine column, which one of the correspondents takes notice of, in the delightful garden of Antonio the rich nobleman, which was eighteen feet high, and eight square, adorned with compartments of curious masonry; in which, the Muses were represented sitting under Parnassus, and not only several of the ancient Poets, under green trees, with laurel garlands beset with roses on their heads, and golden pens in their hands; but, near them, the most famous also of our English Poets; who were, to range them here more correspondent with the order of time, than they were carved on these entablatures, first of all, 'witty CHAUCER, who sat in a chair of gold, covered with roses, writing prose and rhyme; accompanied with the spirits of many Kings, Knights, and fair Ladies, whom he pleasantly besprinkled with the sweet water of the well, consecrated to the Muses, named Aganippe. And as his heavenly spirit commended his dear Brigham (50), for the worthy intombing of his bones, in the long sleeping chamber of most famous Kings: so in tragedy, he bewailed the sudden resurrection of many a nobleman before their time, in the spoiling of epitaphs, whereby many have lost their inheritance, &c.' To which description is annexed some verses of that Poet's, lamenting the same. 'Near also sat old moral GOWER, with pleasant pen in hand, commending honest love, without lust; and pleasure, without pride; holiness in the Clergy, without hypocrisy; no tyranny in rulers, no fallshood in Lawyers, no usury in Merchants, no rebellion in the commons; and unity among kingdoms, &c. There appeared also, lamenting LIDGATE, lurking among the lillies, with his bald sponce, and a garland of willows about it. Booted he was, after St Bennet's guise, and a black stammel robe, with a monstrous hood hanging backward; his body stooping forward, bewailing every state, with the spirit of providence, for-seeing the falls of wicked men, and the slippery seats of princes; the ebbing and flowing, the rising and falling of men in authority; how virtue advances the simple, and vice overthrows the most noble of the world.

' SKELTON sat in the corner of a pillar, with a frosty bitten face, frowning; and scarcely yet cooled of the hot burning choler, kindled against the cankred Cardinal Wolley; writing many a sharp disticon, with bloody pen against him; which he sent, through the infernal rivers, Styx, Phlegeton, and Acheron, by the ferryman of Hell, called Charon, to the said Cardinal. Then BARCLAY, in a hooping rufflet long coat, with a pretty hood in his neck, and fine knots upon his girdle, after Francis's tricks. He was born beyond the cold river of Taweed. He lodged upon a sweet bed of camomile, under the cinnamon tree: about him, many shepherds and sheep, with pleasant pipes; greatly abhorring the life of courtiers, citizens, usurers, and bankrupts, &c. whose old days are miserable; and the state of shepherds and country people, he accounted most happy and sure (51). There are verses suitable to these characters, cited at the end of every one, as of the first; which for their good sense deserve to be recited; therefore are not omitted here, so much for any little roughness in their cadence, which might appear to meer modern reader, or a few antiquated words in them; as that, our account of Dr Bulleyn's work, may not be thought too much amplified with digression. But before we proceed to some few other observable passages in this book of his, we must here observe, of the last mentioned poet, Alexander Barclay, that there is an expression in this character of him, which very luckily reconciles the dispute in many Historians about his birth-place; who must no longer entitle Devonshire (52), or Somersetshire (53) to the same, seeing our author, a contemporary, who lived in, and long upon, the borders of Scotland, says, as above, he was born in that kingdom: and as much indeed might have been, in great measure, gathered, from an attentive perusal of this Poet himself; among other places, where he makes a digression in praise of James the fourth of that kingdom, and a preference of him, before all other Christian Princes, to be the leader of an holy war; not doubting of peace to Christianity, and conquest of the Turk's dominions, if the English lion would come to a firm and faithful union of his wisdom and riches, with the Scotch unicorn's might and hardiness (54). Before we leave this poet, we shall only admonish our reader, that he is not to be taken for either of the Alexander Barclays, grandfather or grandson, of Mathers in Scotland, who both lived near enough in time, to be mistaken by an unwary reader, or one superficially versed in the chronology of his story, for him; and the rather in that the former of them was a man of a poetical genius; as may appear in a scarce tract, which, commemorating that line of the Barclay's, was written by a descendant thereof, though but few copies were printed of it, for the private satisfaction of the said family, and none ever published (55). But to go on with the contents of our book, and that part more expressly promised in the title, A Regimen in the Plague; which we are here led to, by the conference of Antonius the Rich Man, and his Physician; and here we have the causes and signs thereof, with directions as to air, diet, physick, &c. in many prescriptions from the most learned authors, for about sixteen leaves; which yet, is not above a seventh part of the whole book. Throughout the same, though that regimen does not appear to have been written upon any particular occasion, in other parts of the Dialogue it does; and there is a letter at the end, written by the author to Mr Francis Barlow, who then lay expiring under this sickness, past all hopes of recovery. Therefore he prescribes to him, and to another of his acquaintance, Mr Ambrose Barnes, rather like a Divine than a Physician; recommending a contented resignation of this frail being, to that perfect and omnipotent Being, who did but lend it; who offers no wrong in resuming his own; nor any new hardship in that change of life, to which all our forefathers have before passed; and to which, in this pilgrimage, tho' our plagues may be great, they are not so great as our deserts of them; all our sorrows, and all our sufferings, not so great as our sins: concluding in these words, 'If the time had not been so much spent, and the venom so dangerous, and the parts so weak and feeble, I would have caused you to have been let blood, and given you pills contra pestem, with cordials

(51) Bulleyn's Dialogue, &c. fol. 10—12.

(52) Vide Pitts, p. 745; also The Antiquities of the English Franciscans; 4to, 1726, p. 248.

(53) Wood's Ath. Vol. I. col. 86.

(54) Alex. Barclay's Proem to his Translation of The Ship of Fools, fol. 1599.

(55) Intituled, A Genealogical Account of the Barclay's of Urie, formerly of Mathers: extracted from ancient Registers, and authentick Documents; together with Memoirs of the late Colonel David Barclay of Urie, and of his eldest son the late Robert Barclay of Urie. Collected for the information and use of their posterity. Printed, Aberdeen, by James Chalmers, 8vo, 1740.

that he was buried in the same grave, and under the same tomb, with his brother Richard the dials accordingly, by God's grace, if that would have done, you any good; but take this cordial in good part, &c. (56). Hence, being directed to the History of those times, we may conclude this instance of those patients, and indeed our author's book itself, were the effect of that great plague which was brought into this realm by the English army, who were called home from Newhaven in France, of which they had been in possession near a twelvemonth, under Ambrose Dudley, Earl of Warwick; having been more unmercifully besieged there by this disease, than by the enemy; and with this contagious pestilence, at their return in 1563, but a year before our author first published this book above, they so infected their own country, that, as our best Historians have recorded, above twenty-one thousand, five hundred persons died thereof in London only (57). And so epidemically that infection raged in this city, that there was but one street therein which escaped it; the name of which, with the reason of it's said happy exemption, having been transmitted to us by another Physician, who lived at that time, and being worthy of observation, we shall give it in his own words, as follow: 'Here a great question ariseth: Whether sweet smells correct the pestilent air, or rather be as a guide to bring it the sooner into our hearts? to determine which question, I call all the dwellers in Bucklersbury in London, to give their sentence: which only street, by reason that it is wholly replenished with Physick, drugs, and spicery; and was daily perfumed in the time of the plague, with pounding of spices, melting of gums, and making perfumes for others, escaped that great plague brought from Newhaven, whereof there died so many, that scarce any house was left unvisited (58).'

But now to pursue our Dialogue, there follows a long confabulation between the citizen and his wife; who with Roger their servant, like multitudes of others, are all flying the city upon the melancholy and dreadful prospects of that destructive visitation every where about it; and as they travel along, they entertain one another with great diversity of topics. When they come to Barnet, which was Roger's birth-place, the Heath reminds him of a story he had received from his parents, concerning his grandfather, who was a leader of a band of tall men, under the Earl of Warwick, against King Edward IV, in that bloody battle which was fought there on Palm-Sunday 1471; when many thousands were slain on that spot of ground (59), and the said Earl among them. But conscience or fear prevailing upon the grandfather of this Roger (60), the night before the battle, he stole from the Earl's camp, and hid himself in a great hollow oak; where he lived for a month, upon the acorns and nuts which had been laid up in store there by the squirrels; and in his sallet, or head-piece, preserved the rain-water for his drink, till at length he escaped without danger; in memory whereof, or his more martial achievements, his harness was worn upon St George's back, in their church, many a cold winter after: and 'tis here noted, that this piece of secret History was not to be found in the Chronicles (61). A little further, on occasion of some discourse they have, upon the ungenerous and ungrateful treatment which the open-hearted and needy fo often meet with in the world, from the crafty and more covetous part thereof, Roger relates them a fable in a very humorous and diverting manner. It is called Jack Drake's Medicine, being a cure for treacherous ingratitude. It is too long to repeat here with all it's circumstances, and would lose much of it's beauty without them. The subject of it sets forth, the peril which the water-fowls led the land-fowls into, by decoying them to a voyage, and the revenge of the land-fowls upon their aquatick deceivers (62). The title seems not to be derived so much from the name of those birds which are partly concerned in the action, as from some man, who was famous for setting the story forth in all it's agreeable colours: if so, it might be denominated from that very John Drake, the shoemaker of Norwich in the time of King Henry VIII, and in Dr Bulleyn's time, whose humour to be of the gentleman's cut in his cloaths, was well purged by Sir Phillip Calthrop; as Camden has pleasantly recorded (63). Our author, a little further, puts a story into Roger's mouth, which one would believe he must have lived in our age to have so much as dream'd of. But as it has been always a well known practice of the Papists, to raise themselves profit by forging of miracles; and they never fail of finding objects fit for their purpose; so they then procured one that answered their ends, in the person of a bold young quean, born at Harborough, the daughter of one Booker, who was a Butcher in that town; and this woman, to the great alarm or astonishment of the world, at the sudden inconsistency or inconflency of human nature, was delivered of a cat; not of a kitten, as other cats are; but without any space of time which it must need in the world to grow such, a full grown, old cat, at this it's first pretended birth, that had bacon found in the belly of it (64). Might we not here be apt to fancy, that the tutors of Mary Toft of Godalmin in Surrey, had been reading this story, and made improvements of it upon her; who, at that town, was in the year 1726, brought to bed of seventeen rabbits, with great fame and success. But the must needs keep kindling on, for the continuance of that livelihood she was thereby promised, without any other labour; and we know not what a fruitful warren the might have proved, through the careful assistance of her Surgeon, Mr Howard of Guildford, and Monf. St Andre the King's Anatomist; with the rest of the body learned in the profound art of Midwifry, Sir Richard Manningham, Dr Douglas, Dr Mowbray, Mr Limborch, &c. if he had not, by secretly purchasing a rabbit at London, when she was removed to Lacy's bagnio in Leicefer-Fields, and obstinately denying it before the Justice, procured herself such closer commitment to custody there, and more vigilant attendance, as quite smothered the project: That Justice, I say, Sir Thomas Clarges, by his reasonable severity proved the best Doctor of them all, as one of them confessed; for he delivered her, even of the imposture; drove away her unnatural births, and restored the woman to a due consistence with, or consideration of, herself: so that after her confessions, Mary Toft was a rabbit-breeder no more, but the renown of her anomalous productions will remain; as long as the Works (65) of her Historians, Poets, and Engravers, shall endure. As for the remainder of our Dialogue, there is still much variety in it; among which we shall only observe, that the entertainment which our author found for his travellers aforefaid, when they got to their inn at Barnet, while their dinner was dressing, was, in all probability, more elegant than that which was served up at their table. For there they were diverted, in the parlour with some curious and significant Mottos or Inscriptions; not such as are usually written upon the windows and walls of such publick-houses in our times, but, as the mode then was, in great mens houses, consisting of noble maxims, and instructive precepts or admonitions, for the amendment of the heart, and the prudent conduct of life; such as might be called golden sentences, as well for the lustre of their ingenuity, and weight of their sense, as that they were here written in letters of gold. Among them, the Citizen explains to his wife, for they are written in Latin, one which alludes with great propriety not only to any particular inn, but to all the passengers and pilgrims thro' this universal inn; therefore it may not be improperly here remembered: Melius est claudus in via, quam cursor proter viam (66). Which may be englished thus;

Better a cripple, halting the right way;
Than a swift courier be, that runs astray.

But the pictures wherewith, not only the panels of that room, but the very borders of them were, by our author's ingenuity adorn'd, being more numerous, attracted a greater share of their attention. And here again there is great scope to admire the delicacy and fertility of his fancy in the choice of them. For they were not such as some of our modern connoisseurs have thought the most ornamental: and in the purchase whereof, to manifest the fulness of their purses, they have exposed the emptiness of their heads, by surrounding themselves with the most boorish, butcherly, and barbarous objects, even the most vulgar and obscene; yet such as have no invention (56) Dr Bulleyn's Letter to Fran. Barlow, at the end of his Dialogue aforefaid, p. 112.

(57) Camden's Annals of Queen Elizabeth, anno 1563.

(58) Dr Thomas Muffet's Herib's Improvement, or Rules of Food, &c. 4to. 1655, p. 26. Reprinted 12mo, 1746.

(59) There was, about six years since, an Obelisk erected by Sir Jeremy Vanaecker Sambroke, Bart. near where this battle was fought; as by the inscription thereon appears. It stands in the high road, between Hadley Windmill and Kings-end; at the end of that road which turns off to Hertsfield; giving directions to each road, with the distance to each place, and is twelve miles northward from London.

(60) His surname is not here mentioned, but ten leaves further, this Roger calls James Penington the Apothecary in Wood-street, his brother.

(61) Dr Bulleyn's Dialogue, fol. 44.

(62) Idem, fol. 48.

(63) Camden's Remains, edit. 4to, 1714, p. 236.

(64) Dr Bulleyn's Dialogue, fol. 54.

(65) See Brathwait's Remarks on M. St Andre, &c. 8vo. 1726. L. Gulliver's Conduct of M. St Andre, &c. 8vo. 1726. Sir Richard Manningham's Diary of his close attendance upon Mary Toft, &c. 8vo. 1726. Mr John Howard's Narrative of the Delivery of Rabbits, &c. 8vo. 1727. Dr Ahler's Observations on the Woman of Godalmin, 8vo. 1727, &c. &c.

(66) Dr Bulleyn's Dialogue, fol. 60.

the Divine, who died thirteen years before, and wherein John Fox, the Martyrologist, was also interred eleven years after him, in the parish church of St Giles, Cripplegate. There is an inscription on the said tomb, with some Latin verses, in praise of them, wherein they are expressed to be men famous for their learning and piety; and particularly of Dr Bulleyn it is said, that he was always ready to accommodate the poor, as well as the rich, with medicines for the relief of their distempers.

invention to atone for the time and money that was mis-spent upon them; no design deeper than the designations, no meaning beyond the bare figures. His pictures improve the art, and extend the use of painting; they are rhetorical in their very silence; have some soul, as well as body, in them: They all contain some scheme, some moral or political conclusion; they are emblematical pictures, allusive to something more important than what is outwardly represented; and are paintings to direct the understanding, as well as divert the eyes, setting before them devices of perpetual precaution. Thus in his covetous Shepherd, who is sheering his sheep 'till he wounds them, and cannot be content with their fleeces, but must have their flesh and blood; he has significantly painted forth the gripping landlord, that ruins his tenants, and, in effect, himself. Thus, in his attendant upon another wounded body, from which he brushes off, with his branch of rosemary, the full-fed flies, and only thereby makes room for a swarm of fresh, hungry ones; he displays, in no less lively manner, what kind of œconomy it often is, in a government, to be shifting and changing of officers in places of profit: And thus in his figure of the fool mounted up in a tree, who is lopping off the very arm of it which supports him, is judiciously decyphered the condition of all traitors against their country, children against their parents and relations, servants against their masters, poor against the rich, tenants against their lords, and all others against those on whom they have their dependance in this world, and will yet seek their detriment, tho' at the price of their own destruction. There are but two pictures, in the whole number, mentioned, that are particularly personal: One is, the first among them, of Thomas Cromwell, Earl of Essex, whom our author compares to a Wood-cutter, who, had he not been prevented by death, would have utterly eradicated Popery in the Forest of Antichrist: And the last is, a representation of many persons walking, as it were, in one path and one pace, two by two, in portraiture, who were divided, and at variance, in life; expressing the great power that is in painting, like death itself, to level high and low, good and bad, without distinction, in that amicable contrast; being able, by it's art, to reconcile antipathies, and couple in peace together persons, as well as things, which nature had made disjunctives. For here, in this workmanly and well-handled piece, as our author calls it, of which he names even the artist, William Boswell, living in Paternoster-row, were very oppositely paired Christ and Satan; St Peter, and Simon Magus; Paul, and Alexander the Copper-smith; Becket, and Tracy; Martin Luther, and the Pope; OEcolumpadius, and Bishop Fisher; Sir Thomas More, and John Frith; Bishop Cranmer, and Gardiner; Bonner, and Bartlet Green; Galen, and Gregory Wisdom; Avicen, and George Salthouse; Solomon, and Will. Somers; the Cock, and the Lion; the Wolf, and the Lamb (67); and so he makes an end. After this entertainment, the citizen and his wife are diverted at dinner with the surprising adventures and rodomontades of a correspondent mentioned in this dialogue, named Mendax, or the Lying Traveller; satirically exposing the impositions wherewith men of that character are wont to deceive their countrymen; a vice then in fashion, when so many voyagers returned from the new discoveries in America. But his encomiums on many parts of the government, both Ecclesiastical and Civil, of this great city of London, which he disguises by the metonymy of spelling the word only backwards, as some other words must be read in this book, with his reflections on the vices and vanities, manners and fashions of the nation in general, are, from beginning to the end, totally ironical, and highly consistent with the character that displays them (68). After they parted from this companion, the citizen and his wife proceed on their journey, still further from the infection in the said metropolis, as they think, but they approached nearer to it. For, after a terrible tempest of thunder, lightning, and rain, Death appears armed with his three fatal darts, Famine, War, and Pestilence; and, after a serious parley with the citizen, who could by no means avert him with bribery, struck him mortally with the last of those weapons. Upon this, he bewails his condition with great lamentation, and makes his best way to the house of Theologus the Divine, from whom having received the best spiritual administrations, he parts with his life in peace, and the parson ends with a prayer suitable to the occasion. G

(67) Ibidem, fol. 73. b.

(68) Ibidem, from fol. 83—87, &c.

(a) See the remark [F].

BUNYAN (JOHN), the celebrated author of the Pilgrim's Progress (a), was born at Elstow, within a mile of Bedford, in the year 1628. His extraction was very mean, his father being a tinker. His parents gave him an education suitable to their condition, bringing him up to write and read; but his natural disposition led him to all manner of wickedness, particularly cursing and swearing; in which course of iniquity he continued, not without some extraordinary checks [A], 'till thro' a gradual progress in the reformation of his life [B], he arrived at an high degree of that faintship, which prevailed in those times

[A] He met with some extraordinary checks in the course of his iniquity. Particularly, one day he was at play with his companions, we are told (1), he heard a sudden voice from Heaven, saying, Wilt thou leave thy sins, and go to Heaven; or have thy sins, and go to hell? which put him into such a consternation, that he immediately left his sport; and, looking up to Heaven, he thought he saw the Lord Jesus looking down upon him, and threatening him with some grievous punishment for his ungodly practices. Another time, as he was in a vehement fit of cursing and swearing, a woman, who was herself a notorious sinner, reproved him severely, telling him, he was able to spoil all the youth in the town, if they came but into his company. This reproof, from such a person, filled him with a secret shame, and made him resolve to refrain from that abominable practice (2).

[B] A gradual progress in the reformation of his life. He was induced to set about reading the Scriptures by the accidental conversation of a poor man, with whom he discoursed about religion. But, it seems, he was yet unacquainted with the corruption and depravity of his own nature, and the necessity of the merits of Christ to save him, 'till, by chance, he met with four poor women at Bedford, who were discoursing about the things of God, particularly the New Birth. Bunyan was so mightily affected with the discourse of these good women, that he took all opportunities of conversing with them, 'till at length he became as knowing in those matters as his instructors. But the devil, not willing so easily to quit his hold, strove, by divers temptations, to extinguish the grace of God in his heart, suggesting to him particularly, that he wanted faith, and never could have any, as not being of the Elect. This put him upon considering how to make trial of this matter; and he resolved to attempt the working a miracle, as the surest test of his faith. Accordingly, as he was one day going between Elstow and Bedford, he was about to lay to some puddles that were in the horse-path, Be they: but, just as he was going to speak, some secret impulse prevailed with him not to put his faith upon that trial. After much perplexity, all his doubts were at last satisfied by that passage of St Luke, chap. xiv. ver. 22, 23. Compel them to come in, that my house may be full — AND YET THERE IS ROOM (3).

[C] He

(1) Account of the Life of Mr J. Bunyan, prefixed to his Works in folio, London, 1736, p. 9. See also Bunyan's Account of his own Life, intitled, Grace abounding to the Chief of Sinners, &c. in the second Volume of his Works, p. 5.

(2) Account, &c. ib. p. 10. And Grace abounding, &c. ib. p. 6.

(3) Account, &c. ib. p. 13, 14. And Grace abounding, &c. p. 6—10.

See an Account of the Life of Mr J. Bunyan, fixed to his works in folio, 1736, p. 11. Also Bunyan's account of his own Life, intended, Grace according to the chief of Sinners, in the second volume of his works, p. 3-10.

Account, &c. supra, p. 10. 12. And Grace abounding, ubi supra, 11, &c.

Continuation of Mr Bunyan's Life, &c. in his works, Vol. II. 44.

Account, &c. supra, p. 12. And Grace abounding, p. 40.

Account, &c. supra, p. 12.

times of enthusiasm (b). He became a foldier in the Parliament's army, and, in 1645, was present at the siege of Leicester; where being drawn out to stand centinel, and another foldier of his company desiring to take his place, he consented, and thereby probably escaped being shot through the head with a musket ball, which took off his comrade: About the year 1655, he was admitted a member of a Baptist congregation at Bedford; and being soon after convicted at the sessions of holding unlawful assemblies and conventicles, he was sentenced to perpetual banishment, and committed to prison [C]; where, though that sentence was never executed upon him, he was confined twelve years and a half (c). In the last year of his imprisonment, the Pastor of the congregation at Bedford dying, he was unanimously chosen to supply his place, the twelfth of December 1671 (d). He was indebted to the compassion and interest of Dr Barlow, Bishop of Lincoln, for his enlargement (e); after which he travelled into several parts of England, to visit and confirm the brethren, which procured him the epithet of Bishop Bunyan. In King James II's reign, when that Prince's declaration for liberty of conscience came abroad, Mr Bunyan, by the voluntary contributions of his followers, built a publick meeting-house at Bedford, and preached constantly to large congregations. He likewise frequently came to London, and visited the congregations of Nonconformists there (f). He died in London of a fever [D], the thirty-first of August 1688, aged 60 (g), and was buried in the new burying-place, near the Artillery-Ground. He had, by his wife Elizabeth, four children; one of whom, named Mary, was blind; his wife did not long survive him, but died in 1692 (h). We shall give his character in the words of the Continuator of his Life [E]. His works are collected together in two volumes in folio, London 1736, 1737:

(c) Account, &c. ibid. And Grace abounding; &c. ibid.

(f) Continuation, &c. ib. p. 44, 45.

(g) See his Print at the head of his Works.

(h) Continuation; &c. ib. p. 47.

[C] He was committed to prison] There were, besides, in the prison, above sixty dissenters, taken at a religious Meeting at Kaitoe in Bedfordshire; among whom were two eminent teachers, Mr Wheeler and Mr Dun. Mr Bunyan employed part of his time in preaching to, and praying with, his fellow-prisoners; and part in making tagged laces (a trade he had learned since his confinement) for the support of himself and his family (4).

[D] He died in London of a fever.] He was sent for, from thence, by a young gentleman, a neighbour of his in the country, to be the instrument of making up a breach between him and his father. Mr Bunyan, having happily effected that charitable work, on his return to London, was overtaken by excessive rains; and coming to his lodgings on Snow-hill, very wet, he fell sick of a fever, which put a period to his life (5).

[E] His character in the words of the Continuator of his Life. 'He appeared in countenance to be of a stern and rough temper; but in his conversation

' mild and affable; not given to loquacity, or much discourse in company, unless some urgent occasion required it; observing never to boast of himself or his parts; but rather seem low in his own eyes, and submit himself to the judgment of others; abhorring lying and swearing; being just in all that lay in his power to his word; not seeming to revenge injuries, loving to reconcile differences, and making friendship with all: he had a sharp quick eye; accomplished with an excellent discerning of persons, being of good judgment, and quick wit. As for his person, he was tall of stature; strong-boned, tho' not corpulent; somewhat of a ruddy face, with sparkling eyes; wearing his hair on his upper lip, after the old British fashion; his hair reddish, but in his latter days time had sprinkled it with grey; his nose well set, but not declining or bending, and his mouth moderate large; his forehead something high, and his habit always plain and modest (6).'

(6) Continuation of Mr Bunyan's Life, in his Works, Vol. II. p. 47.

BURNET (THOMAS) in Latin Burnetius, Doctor of Laws, an eminent Divine, and very learned writer at the latter end of the last century, was by birth a Scotchman (a), and was admitted of Clare-Hall in Cambridge in June 1651, under the tuition of Mr John Tillotson, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1654, upon the removal of the learned Dr Cudworth, from the Mastership of Clare-Hall, to that of Christ-College, Mr Burnet transplanted himself to the same college, and, in 1657, was chosen Fellow of that house. The year following, he took the degree of Master of Arts, and, in 1661, was chosen Senior Proctor of the University (b). In 1685, he was elected into the Mastership of the Charter-House in London (c), and soon after entered into Holy Orders (d). In this station he boldly withstood an attempt of King James II, to impose one Andrew Popham, a Papist, as a pensioner upon the foundation of that house. In 1680, he first published his Telluris Theoria Sacra [A]. After the Revolution, he was appointed Chaplain

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 868.

(b) The Life of Dr Thomas Burnet, prefixed to the translation of his Archeologie, Lond. 1736, 8vo.

(c) In the room of Mr Cresset, and not of William Erskyne, Esq; as Wood pretends.

(d) Wood, ubi supra.

[A] His Telluris Theoria Sacra.] The whole title is; Telluris Theoria Sacra, Orbis Nostri Originem et Mutationes Generales, Quas aut jam subiit, aut olim subiturus est, complectens. It was published in quarto, and consisted at first of but two books, viz. Lib. I. De Diluvio et Dissolutione Terræ. Lib. II. De Tellure Primitiva et De Paradiso. In 1689, the author published the two remaining books in 4to. viz. Lib. III. De Conflagratione Mundi. Lib. IV. De Novis Cælis et Nova Terra, ac De Beato Seculo, sive De Mundo Renovato, et Rerum omnium Consummatione. And at the same time, a second edition was published of the two first books. The first volume of the Theoria is dedicated to the Earl of Wiltshire, and we learn from the dedication, that a considerable part of it was written by our author, during his travels abroad, in company with that nobleman. Cum hujus Tractatus partem non exiguam peregrè agens conscripsim, tibi comes et socius itineris, Vir nobilissime, &c. (1) The two last books are dedicated to his Grace James Duke of Ormond.

In the preface to the first volume, the author briefly unfolds his design; which is, he tells us, 'To draw up a sacred theory of the earth, in which, beginning from the primæval chaos and origin of all things, he will follow nature in all her motions and changes, & to the consummation of all things.' Telluris Theoriam Sacram instruere decrevimus, in qua à primævo Chao, tenerisque rerum principii sumpto exordio, omnes Naturæ motus et renovationes ad eandem rerum supremum exitum prosequemur. 'This theory, the author adds, may be called sacred, because it does not respect the common Physiology of the earth, but the greater changes, and the revolutions of our natural world; such as are taken notice of in the Sacred Writings, and are truly the hinges, upon which the dispensations of providence, with respect to this earth, turn.' Hanc Theoriam Sacram appello, cum Telluris Physiologiam communem non respiciat; sed majores mundi nostri vicissitudines, quarum meminit Sacra Scriptura, et quæ Providentiæ Divinæ circa Terram

This circumstance is omitted in accounts of Burnet's Life.

lain in ordinary to King William, and, through the interest of Archbishop Tillotson, Clerk of sunt veluti cardines. This performance was so universally admired, that, upon its great success in Latin, and the encouragement of King Charles II, the author published an edition in English, intitled, The Sacred Theory of the Earth, containing an account of the Original of the Earth, and of all the General Changes, which it hath already undergone, or is to undergo, 'till the Consummation of all things. In two Volumes. The two first Books concerning the Deluge, and concerning Paradise: The two last Books concerning the burning of the World, and concerning the New Heavens and new Earth. With a Review of the Theory, and of its Proofs; especially in reference to Scripture. The sixth edition is of the year 1726: to which is added, The Author's Defence of the Work, from the Exceptions of Mr Warren, and the Examination of Mr Keil. Dr Burnet dedicated the first volume of the English Theory to King Charles II, and the second to Queen Mary. As to this English edition, he tells us, in the preface to the first volume, 'it is the same in substance with the Latin,' tho' he confesses, 'it is not so properly a translation, as a new composition upon the same ground, there being several additional chapters in it, and several new-moulded.' The author of The Spectator, No. 146, speaks in raptures of Dr Burnet's Theory, and quotes a very shining passage out of it. I will transcribe what he says, together with the citation, and will subjoin to it the Latin, that the reader may have at once a specimen of the sublimity of our author's genius, and of his style in both languages. 'Oh, how glorious, says Mr Spectator, is the old age of that great man, who has spent his time in such contemplations, as have made this Being, what only it should be, an education for Heaven! He has, according to the lights of reason and revelation, which seemed to him clearest, traced the steps of Omnipotence: He has, with a celestial ambition, as far as is consistent with humility and devotion, examined the ways of Providence, from the Creation to the Dissolution of the world. How pleasing must have been the speculation, to observe nature and providence move together; the physical and moral world, march the same pace; to observe Paradise and eternal spring, the seat of innocence; troubled seasons and angry skies, the portion of wickedness and vice. When this admirable author has reviewed all that is passed, or is to come, which relates to the habitable world, and run through the whole fate of it; how could a guardian angel, that had attended it through all its courses or changes, speak more emphatically at the end of his charge, than does our author, when he makes, as it were, a funeral oration over this globe, looking to the point where it stood?'

"Let us, if you please, to take leave of this subject, reflect, upon this occasion, on the vanity and transient glory of this habitable world; how, by the force of one element breaking loose upon the rest, all the varieties of nature, all the works of art, all the labours of men, are reduced to nothing; all that we admired and adored before, as great and magnificent, is obliterated and vanished; and another form and face of things, plain, simple, and every where the same, overspreads the whole earth. Where are now the great empires of the earth, and their great imperial cities? Their pillars, trophies, and monuments of glory? Shew me where they stood; read the inscription; tell me the victor's name. What remains, what impressions, what difference or distinction do you see in this mass of fire? Rome itself, eternal Rome, the great city, the empress of the world, whose domination and superstition, ancient and modern, make a great part of the history of this earth; What is become of her now? She laid her foundations deep, and her palaces were strong and sumptuous: She glorified herself, and lived deliciously, and said in her heart, I sit a Queen, and shall see no sorrow. But her hour is come; and she is wiped away from the face of the earth, and buried in perpetual oblivion. But 'tis not cities only, and the works of mens hands; but the everlasting hills, the mountains, and rocks of the earth, are melted as wax before the sun, and their place is no where to be found. Here stood the Alps, a prodigious range of stone, the load of the earth, that covered many countries, and reached their arms from the Ocean to the Black-Sea; this huge mass of stone is softened and dissolved, as a tender cloud into rain. Here stood the African mountains, and Atlas with his top above the clouds. There was frozen Caucasus and Taurus, and Imaus, and the mountains of Asia: and yonder, towards the north, stood the Rippæan hills, cloathed in ice and snow. All these are vanished, dropt away as the snow upon their heads, and swallowed up in a red sea of fire. Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are thy ways, thou King of Saints. Hallelujah. Rev. xv. 3. (2)"

The Latin.

Hic Rerum Status, cum simplicissimus sit, nulla indiget ulteriori descriptione. Omnia sibi subegit Ignis, omnia absumpsit; Saxum, Ferrum, Montes, Mare: Orbemque habitabilem non devastavit modo, sed in seipsum hausit, et ad unum omnia Elementa reduxit. Nec tantum Elementa, sed tota Naturæ Varietas, omnesque Formæ, ad indiscretam unitatem rediguntur. Quocunque respicis, eadem est ubique rerum facies. Hic non ita pridem steterunt Alpes, et porrexerunt brachia ab Oceano ad Pontum: Hic maximus Atlas, et Africani Montes: Hic denique Taurus, et Caucasus, et Rippæa juga. Sed tantorum corporum quæ vides nunc vestigia? Quas reliquias, quæ frustra monstras? Quò abierunt immania Saxa? Instar teneræ Nivis, quæ sæpe obtexit eorum cacumina, liquata sunt ante faciem Domini (*). Si Infulas quæramus, auferuntur infulæ unà cum montibus, neque alterutrus inventus est locus. Vis quæramus Urbes Terræ; Sanctas Hierosolymas, aut veterum Imperiorum capita: sed quo duce, quibus indicibus? Dic saltem, ubi steterit Roma; multis nominibus memoranda Roma: Sicubi rubere videas hoc mare ignitum, quasi cruore tinctum, aut vehementius, quam in cæteris locis, effervescere, illic sepultam quære Romam. Denique temperare mihi non possum, cum hunc rerum vultum intueor, hanc ultimam incendii faciem, quo minus credam, hoc esse illud Mare vitreum, igni mixtum, in Apocalypsi Jobannis (†); at quod steterunt Sancti, Canticum Mosis et Agni cantantes, et de Bestia et Bestianis triumphantes. Magna et mirabilia sunt Opera tua, Domine Deus Omnipotens: Iustæ et veræ sunt viæ tuæ, Rex Sanctorum. Halleluia Amen (‡).

Mr Addison addressed the following beautiful Latin Ode to Dr Burnet, on occasion of his Theory (4).

Ad Insignissimum Virum D. THO. BURNETTUM, Sacræ Theoriæ Telluris Autorem.

Non usitatum carminis alitem,
BURNETTE, pœcis, non humiles modos:
Vulgare Plectrum, languidæque
Respuit officium Camænæ.
Tu mixta rerum semina conficis,
Molemque cernis dissociabilem,
Terramque concretam, et latentem
Oceanum gremio capaci:
Dum veritatem quærere pertinax
Ignota pandis, folicitus parum
Utcunque stet commune vulgi
Arbitrium et popularis error.
Auditur ingens continuo fragor,
Illapsa Tellus lubrica deserit
Fundamina, et compage fracta
Suppositas gravis, urget undas.
Impulsus erumpit medius liquor,
Terras aquarum effusa licentia
Claudit vicissim; has inter orbis
Reliquias fluitant priores.
Nunc et recluso carcere lucidam
Balana spectat solis imaginem,
Stellasque miratur natantes,
Et tremulæ simulacra Lunæ.

(2) Burnet's Theory, edit. 1726, Vol. II. p. 159, 160.

(*) Apoc. xvi. 2.

(†) Apoc. xv. 2.

(‡) Ejusd. Telluris Theoria Sacra Vol. II. edit. 1689, 4to, p. 121, 122.

(4) See his Miscellaneous Works Lond. 1726, 12mo, Vol. II. p. 165.

of the Clofet to that Prince. In 1692, he published his Archæologia Philosophicæ [B]: which giving offence to the Clergy, it is said, he was removed from being Clerk of the Clofet upon that account (e). If a late writer is to be believed, Dr Burnet was talked of to succeed Dr Tillotson, in the See of Canterbury; but, upon a representation from some of the Bishops, that his writings were too sceptical, the design of his promotion was laid aside (f). He died September the twenty-seventh 1715, and was buried, the third of October following, in the Charter-House Chapel (g). After his death, came out two (g) Life, &c. posthumous pieces of his, intituled, De Fide et Officiis Christianorum [C], and De Statu Mortuorum

(f) Mr Oldmixon's Hist. of England during the reigns of King William and Queen Mary, Queen Anne, and King George I, p. 95.

(g) Life, &c.

Quæ pompâ vocum non imitabilis !
 Qualis calefcit Spiritus ingeni !
 Ut tollis undas ! ut fremement
 Diluvii reprimis tumultum !
 Quis tam valenti pectore ferreus,
 Ut non tremiscens et timido pede
 Incedat, orbis dum dolosi
 Detegis instabiles ruinas ?
 Quin hæc cadentim fragmina montium
 Natura vultum fumere simplicem
 Coget resurgens, in priorem
 Mox iterum reditura formam.
 Nimbis rubentem Sulphureis Jovem
 Cernas; ut udis sævit atrox hyems
 Incendiis, commune mundo
 Et populis meditata bustum !
 Nudus liquentes plorat Athos nives,
 Et mox liquecens ipse adamantinum
 Fundit cacumen, dum per imas
 Saxa fluunt resoluta valles.
 Jamque alta cæli mœnia corruunt,
 Et vestra tandem Pagina (pro nefas !)
 BURNETTE, vestra augebit ignes,
 Heu socio peritura mundo.
 Mox æqua Tellus, mox subitus viror
 Ubique ridet : En teretem Globum !
 En læta vernantis Favoni
 Flamina, perpetuosque flores !
 O pectus ingens ! O animum gravem,
 Mundi capaceum ! Si bonus auguror;
 Te, nostra quo tellus superbit,
 Accipiet renovata civem.

Coll. Magd. Oxon. 1699.

But Dr Burnet's Theory, ingenious as it is, was attacked by some writers as unphilosophical; among whom the principal were, Mr Erasmus Warren, Rector of Worlington in Suffolk; and Mr John Keil, of Baliol College in Oxford. The former of these published at London, in 1690, Geologia, or a Discourse concerning the earth before the Deluge; wherein the form and properties ascribed to it, in a book intituled, The Theory of the Earth, are excepted against, and it is made appear, that the Dissolution of the Earth was not the Cause of the Universal Flood. Also a new Explication of that Flood is attempted. Dr Burnet wrote a reply to this, intituled An Answer to the Exceptions made by Mr Erasmus Warren, against The Sacred Theory of the Earth. London, 1690, in folio, in which he follows the Excepter chapter by chapter. Mr Warren rejoined, and Dr Burnet replied, in A Short Consideration of Mr Erasmus Warren's Defence of his Exceptions against the Theory of the Earth. In a Letter to a Friend. Mr Keil published, in 1698, An Examination of Dr Burnet's Theory of the Earth, dedicated to Dr Mander, Master of Baliol College. To which Dr Burnet replied, in some Reflections upon the Theory of the Earth, occasioned by a late Examination of it. In a Letter to a Friend (5). There were some other pieces written against the Theory; particularly, Some Animadversions upon a book, intituled, The Theory of the Earth, by Herbert (Crofts) Lord Bishop of Hereford. London, 1685, 8vo. Dr Burnet reflects with great severity upon this piece, in the conclusion of his Answer to the Exceptions, &c. (6), where he says: 'Some inconsiderate minds make every departure from the Letter, let the matter or cause be what it will, to be an affront to Scripture: and there, where we have the greatest liberty,

(5) These Defences of the Theory are printed at the end of the sixth edition.

(6) Theory, &c. Vol. II. p. 480.

I mean in things that relate to the natural world; they have no more indulgence or moderation, than if it was an intrenchment upon the Articles of Faith. In this particular, I cannot excuse the present Animadverter: yet I must needs say, he is a very Saint, in comparison of another Animadverter, who hath wrote upon the same subject, but neither like a gentleman, nor like a Christian. And such writings answer themselves.' Considerations on the Theory of the Earth, by John Beaumont, jun. a pamphlet in 4th. London, 1693. A. Lovell's Summary of Heads in answer to Dr Burnet. London, 1696, in 4to. The Abyssinian Philosophy confuted; or, Telluris Theoria, neither Sacred nor agreeable to Reason, by Robert St Clair, London, 1697, in 12mo. In which the author pretends, that Dr Burnet's hypothesis is not a new one, but was formerly received among the Abyssinian Philosophers. The late Mr Flamstead, the King's Astronomer, speaking to our author with great warmth on the subject of his theory, said he would prove, and make him know, that there is not more to the making the world, than a fine turned period (7). And the same Astronomer declared, that he was able to overthrow Dr Burnet's Theory, in one sheet of paper (8).

(7) Sir Hans Sloane's Voyage to the Islands of Madeira, &c. Vol. II. Lond. 1725, in fol.

(8) New Memoirs of Literature for Febr. 1726, art. 4.

[B] His Archæologia Philosophicæ.] The title is: Archæologia Philosophicæ; sive Doctrina Antiqua de rerum Originibus. i. e. 'An enquiry into the Doctrine of the ancient Philosophers concerning the original of the World.' In two books. The second edition is in 8vo. London 1733. It is dedicated to King-William. In the Preface the author tells us, 'His design is to enquire into the opinions of the Ancients concerning the nature of things, in order to vindicate and give antiquity it's due praise, and to shew, that neither were our ancestors dunces, nor was wisdom or true Philosophy born with us.' Sententias veterum de rerum natura potissimum inquirimus: idque in laudem et vindicias Antiquitatis; ut neque fungos fuisse majores nostros, neque nobiscum natam esse sapientiam, ostendamus. At the end of the Preface, Dr Burnet acquaints us, he had designed to draw up a Theory of the visible Creation, both animate and inanimate, cælestial and terrestrial, but was diverted from his purpose by the consideration of his advanced age, and the approach of death. To the second edition are added two letters, intituled; Ad virum clarissimum, A. B. circa nuper editum de Archæologiis Philosophicis Libellum, Authoris Epistole Duæ. Mr Keil, in his Examination of Dr Burnet's Reflections upon the Theory of the Earth; and Frederic Spanheim, in his Controversiarum de religione, &c. Elenchus Historico-Theologicus, have animadverted upon the Archæologia.

[C] His De Fide et Officiis Christianorum] The second edition is in 8vo. London 1733. In the Preface, the Editor gives us a little history of this, and the other posthumous Tract (9). It seems, it was usual with Dr Burnet, before he published any thing in Latin, to have two or three copies; and no more, printed off; which he kept by him for some time, in order to revise at leisure what he had written currente calamo, and sometimes, when he thought proper, to be communicated to his particular friends for their opinions. These copies were always interleaved for the convenience of writing any observations or improvements in the opposite page. One of these proof-copies (as they may be called) of the Tract, De Fide et Officiis, &c. having been clandestinely obtained during the author's life-time, there appeared a surreptitious edition, in which the Editor had thrown the Doctor's manuscript remarks into the text, very injudiciously, and sometimes in very improper places. Which Dr Burnet hearing, he ordered his Bookseller to buy up the whole impression at any price. Much the same fate attended the Tract, De Statu Mortuorum, &c. a proof-copy of which, having privately got into other hands, was, after the author's death, publicly sold, among other books,

(9) De Statu, &c.

(b) The first in June, the other in October, 1727.

Mortuorum et Resurgentium [D]; both published (b) by his friend, and supervisor of his will, Francis Wilkinson, of Lincoln's-Inn, Esq; at an auction. The purchaser, a very learned gentleman (the Editor does not say, who) having perused it, was so highly pleased with it, that he procured a few copies of it to be printed at his own expence: but the greatest care was taken to prevent the publication of it, and those, who had the liberty of perusing the book, were obliged in honour not to suffer it to be transcribed, or committed to the press. But, notwithstanding all this caution, a surreptitious edition of this book was printed in Holland: and thus the publick being in possession of both treatises, Mr Wilkinson, in whose hand the original manuscripts were, was persuaded to publish correct editions of both. As to the Tract, De Fide et Officiis Christianorum, it is but a part of a larger design: for the whole work was by the author intitled, Traſtatus de claris et obscuris in Doctrina Christiana: then follows, Paris Prior, in qua agitur de iis quæ spectant ad vitam hodiernam, sive, De Fide et Officiis Christianorum. i. e. 'A Treatise of what is plain, and what is obscure, in the Christian Doctrine: Part the first, treating of those things, which respect this life, or, of the Faith and Practice of Christians.' There was found among our author's manuscripts a Preface, intended probably for this work, consisting of no less than twenty-nine folio pages; an extract of which the Editor has given us. There were likewise found three additional chapters, numbered thus, X^{um}, XI^{um}, and XII^{um}; with the following titles: 10. De Religione Romano Ponti- ficia; imprimis, De dogmate Transubstantiationis. i. e. 'Of the Roman Catholick Religion, and first, of the Doctrine of Transubstantiation.' 11. De Inquisitione Romana. i. e. 'Of the Romish Inquisition.' 12. De aliis dogmatis Ecclesie Romano Pontificie, et de celebrata Infallibilitate. i. e. 'Of other Doctrines of the Romish Church, and of its boasted Infallibility.' To all which are added, Duo Dialogi de rebus Judaicis. i. e. 'Two Dialogues concerning the Jewish Affairs.' But though, in the opinion of the Editor, these pieces are by no means unworthy of Dr Burnet's pen, yet, the present book having received it's FINIS from the author's own hand, he thought it best to proceed no farther.

[D] His De Statu Mortuorum et Resurgentium.] That is, Of the State and Condition of departed Souls before, at, and after the Resurrection. The history of the publication of this piece is already given. The second edition is in 8vo. London 1733. There is added to it an Appendix, De futura Judæorum Restauratione. i. e. 'Of the future Restauration of the Jews.' It had been separately printed by the author himself, and thence escaped piratical hands. But it being evident from the beginning of this little Tract, that it was designed by the author as a part of, or rather Appendix to, this book, the Editor thought fit to publish it, from the author's own manuscript, together with this book. T

BURNET (GILBERT) Bishop of Salisbury, and an eminent writer in the reigns of King William, Queen Anne, and the beginning of King George I; was born at Edinburgh, the eighteenth of September 1643 (a). He received the first rudiments of his education from his father [A]; under whose care he made so quick a progress, that, at ten years of age, he perfectly understood the Latin tongue; at which time he was sent to the college of Aberdeen; where he acquired the Greek, and went thro' the usual course of Aristotelian Logick and Philosophy, with uncommon applause. He was scarce fourteen, when he commenced Master of Arts; and then applied himself to the study of the Civil Law; but, after a year's diligent application to that science, he changed his resolution, and turned his thoughts wholly to the study of Divinity (b) [B]. At eighteen years of age, he was put upon his trial as a Probationer or Expectant Preacher [C]; and, at the same time,

(a) Life of the Author, by his son Thomas Burnet, Esq; subjoined to the Bishop's Hist. of his own Time, in two Volumes, fol. Lond. 1724 and 1734, Vol. II. p. 672.

(b) Ib. p. 673.

[A] His father.] He was the younger brother of a family, very considerable for it's antiquity as well as interest, in the Shire of Aberdeen; and was bred to the Civil Law, which he studied for seven years in France. His excessive modesty so far depressed his abilities, that he never made a shining figure at the bar, tho' he was universally esteemed to be a man of judgment and knowledge in his profession. He was remarkably generous in his practice, never taking a fee from the poor, nor from a clergyman, when he sued in the right of his church; and bestowing great part of his profits in acts of charity and friendship. In the year 1637, when the troubles in Scotland were breaking out, he was so disgusted at the conduct of the governing Bishops there, whom he censured with great freedom, and was, at the same time, so remarkable for his strict and exemplary life, that he was generally called a Puritan. But when he saw, that, instead of reforming abuses in the Episcopal Order, the order itself was struck at, he adhered to it with great zeal and constancy; as he did to the rights of the Crown, not once complying with that party, which afterwards prevailed in both nations. For tho' he agreed with Barclay and Grotius (with the latter of whom he had been intimately acquainted) as to their notions of resistance where the laws are broke through by a limited Sovereign, yet he did not think that was then the case in Scotland. He married the sister of the famous Sir Archibald Johnstoun, called Lord Warristoun; who, during the Civil Wars, was at the head of the Presbyterian party, and so zealously attached to that interest, that neither friendship nor alliance, could dispose him to shew favour to those, who refused the Solemn League and Covenant. Our author's father persisting in this refusal, was obliged, at three several times, to quit the kingdom: and when his return was afterwards connived at, as his principles would not permit him to renew the practice of the Law, much less to accept the preferments in it offered him by Oliver Cromwell, he retired to his own estate in the country; where he lived till the Restoration, when he was made one of the Lords of the Session. His wife, our author's mother, was very eminent for her piety and virtue, and a warm zealot for the Presbyterian discipline, in which way she had been very strictly educated (1).

[B] He turned his thoughts wholly to the study of Divinity.] He went through the Old and New Testament, with the best commentators on both: he read the most noted controversial writers in Divinity, particularly Bellarmine and Chamier, in opposition to each other; and he perused some of the most received systems of School Divinity; but was soon disgusted at the subtlety and jargon of those writers. In his hours of amusement, he ran through many volumes of History; and his daily application to these studies seldom fell short of fourteen hours in a day (2).

[C] He was put upon his trial, as a Probationer, or Expectant Preacher.] A Probationer, we are told (3), is one, who, after having passed examination, is at liberty to preach wheresoever he is desired, but has no particular church, to which he is attendant. This is the first step, in Scotland, towards admission into orders, and was practised both under the Presbyterian and Episcopal Government. The Probationers are first appointed to preach practically on a text assigned them; next, critically upon another, the sense of which is controverted; and then, a mixed sermon, of criticism upon the text, and practical inferences from it. After this, the examiners allot to each a head of Divinity, on which they are to make a Latin oration, and give out theses upon it, which they undertake to defend in publick. Then an Hebrew psalm, and a portion of the Greek Testament, are given them, to render into English extempore. Last of all comes the questionary trial, in which every minister

(1) Life of the Author, by his son Thomas Burnet, Esq; subjoined to the second Volume of the Bishop's Hist. of his own Times, Lond. 1734. p. 672, 673.

(2) Ib. p. 673.

(3) Ib. p. 674.

time, was offered the presentation to a very good benefice, by his cousin-german Sir Alexander Burnet; but, thinking himself too young for the cure of souls (*), he modestly declined that offer (c). His education thus happily begun, was finished by the conversation and advice of the most eminent Scotch Divines (d) [D]. In 1663, about two years after his father's death, he came into England, where he first visited the two Universities [E]; and, after a short stay of about six months, he returned to Scotland, where he declined accepting the living of Saltoun, offered him by Sir Robert Fletcher of that place, resolving to travel for some months beyond-sea (e). In 1664, our author went over into Holland; where after he had seen what was remarkable in the Seven Provinces, he resided for some time at Amsterdam; from whence passing thro' the Netherlands into France, he made some stay at Paris [F]. Towards the end of the year he returned into Scotland, taking London in the way; where he was introduced, by the President Sir Robert Murray, to be a member of the Royal Society (f). In 1665, he was ordained a Priest by the Bishop of Edinburgh, and presented by Sir Robert Fletcher to the living of Saltoun, which had been kept vacant during his absence. He soon gained the affections of his whole parish [G], not excepting the Presbyterians, tho' he was the only clergyman in Scotland, that made use of the prayers in the Liturgy of the Church of England (g). The same year, he drew up a memorial of the abuses of the Scotch Bishops [H]; which exposed him to the

(*) There is no Law in Scotland which limits the age a minister must be of.

(c) Ib. p. 674.

(d) Ib. p. 675.

(e) Ib. p. 676.

(f) Ib. & p. 677.

(g) Ib. p. 678.

repentments

of the district is at liberty to put such questions to the person under examination, as occur to him, out of the Scripture, or body of Divinity. Before any one can be admitted to this, he must produce a testimonial of his good life from the minister of the parish where he lives; and it, during his trial, which lasts three months, any scandal can be proved upon him, he is laid aside as unfit for the Church.

[D] His education was finished by the conversation and advice of the most eminent Scotch Divines. Among these was Mr Nairn, minister of the Abbey church at Edinburgh; an admired Preacher of that country, remarkable for accuracy of style, as well as strength of reasoning, and sublimity of thought. This gentleman led our author into a new course of reading, by recommending to his perusal Smith's Select Discourses, Dr More's works, and the writings of Plato and his followers; but especially Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity. Another of his intimates was Bishop Leighton, one of those, who, in 1662, had been consecrated at Westminster; by whose advice he became conversant with all the primitive writers, going through the Apologies, and other treatises of the Fathers of the three first centuries; and Binnius's Collection of Councils, down to the second Council of Nice. A third eminent Divine, with whom our author contracted an intimacy, was Mr Charteris, a man of great learning, not only in his own profession, but in History, Geography, and the Mathematical Sciences (4).

[E] He came into England, where he first visited the two Universities. At Cambridge, he had an opportunity of seeing, and conversing with, men of the greatest abilities, and particularly Dr Cudworth, Dr Pearson, Dr Burnet, author of the Sacred Theory, and Dr Henry More, one of whose sayings, in relation to rites and ceremonies, then made a great impression on him: None of these, said he, are bad enough to make men bad; and I am sure, none of them are good enough to make men good. At Oxford, our author was much cared for, on account of his ready knowledge of the Councils and Fathers, especially by Dr Fell, and Dr Pocock, that great master of Oriental Learning. He was much improved there, in his Mathematicks and Natural Philosophy, by the instructions of Dr Wallis, who likewise gave him a letter of recommendation to the learned and pious Mr Boyle at London. Upon his arrival there, he was introduced to all the most noted Divines, as Tillotson, Stillingfleet, Patrick, Lloyd, Whitchot, and Wilkins; and, among others of the laity, to Sir Robert Murray (5).

[F] He resided at Amsterdam, and afterwards at Paris. At the former of these places, by the help of a learned Rabbi, he perfected himself in the Hebrew language: he likewise became acquainted with the leading men of the different persuasions tolerated in that country; as the Arminians, the Lutherans, the Unitarians, the Brownists, the Anabaptists, and the Papists: amongst each of whom he used frequently to declare, he had met with men of such real piety and virtue, that there he became fixed in a strong principle of universal charity, and an invincible abhorrence of all severities on account of religious dissensions. At Paris, he conversed with the two famous ministers of Charenton, Daillé and Mornis, the former renowned for his learning and judgment, the other for his bright parts and eloquence. His stay in France was the longer, on account of the great freedom and kindness, with which he was treated by the Lord Holles, then Ambassador at the French Court (6).

[G] He soon gained the affections of the whole parish. During the five years he remained at Saltoun, he preached twice every Sunday, and once more on one of the week days: he catechized three times a week, so as to examine every parishioner, old or young, three times in the compass of a year: he went round the parish from house to house, instructing, reproving, or comforting them, as occasion required: the sick he visited twice a day: he administered the Sacrament four times a year, and personally instructed all such as gave notice of their intention to receive it. All that remained above his own necessary subsistence (in which he was very frugal) he gave away in charity. A particular instance of his generosity that way, a person (*) (who then lived with him, and afterwards was in his service at Salisbury) used to recount: one of his parishioners had been in execution for debt, and applied to our author for some small relief; who enquired of him, how much would again set him up in his trade: the man named the sum, and he as readily called to his servant to pay it him: 'Sir, said he, it is all we have in the house; Well, well, said our author, pay it this poor man; you do not know the pleasure there is in making a man glad (7).' This may be a proper place to mention our author's practice of preaching extempore, which he learned from the celebrated Mr Nairn, minister of the Abbey church at Edinburgh. He attained to an ease in it, chiefly by allotting many hours of the day to meditation upon all sorts of subjects, and by accustoming himself, at those times, to speak his thoughts aloud, studying always to render his expressions correct. The life-writer gives us here two remarkable instances, in relation to his preaching without book. In 1691, when the Sees, vacant by the deprivation of the Nonjuring Bishops, were filled up, Bishop Williams was appointed to preach one of the Consecration sermons at Bow Church. But being detained by some accident, the Clerk had twice set the psalm, and still the Preacher did not appear. Whereupon, the Archbishop of Canterbury desired our author, then Bishop of Sarum, to supply his place; which he readily did, to the general satisfaction of all present. In 1705, he was appointed to preach the Thanksgiving sermon before the Queen at St Paul's; and as it was the only discourse he had ever wrote before-hand, it was the only time that he was ever at a pause in preaching, which on that occasion lasted above a minute (8).

[H] He drew up a memorial of the abuses of the Scotch Bishops. We shall give the reader the history of this affair in Bishop Burnet's own words. 'I observed, says he (9), the deportment of our Bishops was in all points so different from what became their function, that I had a more than ordinary zeal kindled within me upon it. They were not only furious against all that stood out against them, but were very remiss in all the parts of their function. Some did not live within their diocese: and those who did, seemed to take no care of them. They shewed

(6) Ib. p. 678.

(*) This was a story commonly well known at Salisbury, and which the life-writer learned from one Mr Wastfield of that place.

(7) Ib. p. 678.

(8) Ib. p. 675, 676.

(9) See the Hist. of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 216.

(b) ib. & p. 679. See also the Bishop's Hist of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 217.

(i) Life, &c. ib.

(k) History, &c. ib. p. 230, 231.

(l) Life, &c. ubi supra. And History, &c. ib. p. 287.

(m) See the reference (w).

(n) History, &c. ib. p. 299.

(o) Life, &c. p. 682, 682. And History, &c. ib.

repentments of that order; whereupon, resolving to confine himself to study and the duties of his function, he fell into such a retired and abitemious course of life, as greatly impaired his health (b). About 1668, the government of Scotland being in the hands of moderate men, of whom the principal was Sir Robert Murray, our author was frequently sent for and consulted by them (i); and it was through his advice, that some of the more moderate Presbyterians were put into the vacant churches; a step, which he himself has since condemned, as indiscrete (k). In 1669, our author was made Professor of Divinity at Glasgow [I]; in which station he continued four years and a half, exposed, through his principles of moderation, to the ill-will both of the Episcopal and Presbyterian parties (l). The same year, he published his Modest and Free Conference between a Conformist and a Non-conformist [K]. About this time, he was intrusted, by the Dukes of Hamilton, with the perusal of, and putting in order, all the papers relating to her father's and uncle's ministry; which put him upon compiling Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton (m), and occasioned his being invited to London, to receive farther information, concerning the transactions of those times, by the Earl of Lauderdale; between whom and Duke Hamilton, he managed and concluded a reconciliation (n.) During his stay in London, he was offered a Scotch bishoprick, which he refused (o). Soon after his return to Glasgow, he married the Lady Margaret Kennedy [L], daughter of the Earl of Cassilis. In 1672, he published his Vindication shewed no zeal against vice: the most eminently wicked in the country were their particular confidants. They took no pains to keep their clergy strictly to rules, and to their duty. On the contrary, there was a levity, and a carnal way of living, about them, that very much scandalized me.—Upon all this, I took up a resolution of drawing up a memorial of the grievances we lay under by the ill conduct of our Bishops. I resolved, that no other person besides myself, should have a share in any trouble it might bring on me: so I communicated it to none. This made it not to be in all the parts of it so well digested, as it otherwise might have been: and I was then but three and twenty. I laid my foundation in the constitution of the Primitive Church; and shewed how they had departed from it, by their neglecting their dioceses, meddling so much in secular affairs, raising their families out of the revenues of the Church, and above all by their violent persecuting of those who differed from them. Of this, I writ out some copies, and signed them, and sent them to all the Bishops of my acquaintance. Sharp (*) was much alarmed at it, and fancied I was set on to it by some of the Lord Lauderdale's friends. I was called before the Bishops, and treated with great severity. Sharp called it a libel. I said, I had set my name to it, so it could not be a libel. He charged me with the presumption of offering to teach my superiors. I said, such things had been not only done, but justified in all ages. He charged me for reflecting on the King's putting them on his councils. I said, I found no fault with the King for calling them to his councils; but with them for going out of that which was their proper province, and for giving ill counsel. Then he charged me for reflecting on some severities, which, he said, was a reproaching publick courts, and a censuring the laws. I said, laws might be made in terrorem, not always fit to be executed: but I only complained of clergymen's pressing the rigorous execution of them, and going often beyond what the law dictated. He broke out into a great vehemence; and proposed to the Bishops, that I should be summarily deprived, and excommunicated: but none of them would agree to that. By this management of his the thing grew publick. What I had ventured on was variously censured. But the greater part approved of it. Lord Lauderdale and all his friends were delighted with it: and he gave the King an account of it, who was not ill pleased at it. Great pains was taken to make me ask pardon, but to no purpose. So Sharp let the thing fall.

[I] He was made Professor of Divinity at Glasgow. This was owing to a casual acquaintance with the Regent of that univerfity, at Hamilton, the seat of the Dukes of Hamilton, who had invited our author thither. He was, at first, in suspense what resolution to take; his friends earnestly persuaded him to accept the offer, and his parishioners at Saltoun, for whom he had a most tender regard, being no less anxious to retain him. At length the authority of Archbishop Leightoun prevailed, and he accepted the Divinity Chair. As his principal care, in this new station, was to form just and true notions in the Students of Divinity, he laid down a plan for that purpose. On Mondays, he made each of the Students, in their turn, explain a head of Divinity in Latin, and propound such theses from it, as he was to defend against the rest of the Scholars; and this exercise concluded with our Professor's decision of the point in a Latin Oration. On Tuesdays, he gave them a Predication in the same language, wherein he proposed, in the course of eight years, to have gone through a compleat System of Divinity. On Wednesdays, he read them a Lecture, for above an hour, by way of a Critical Commentary on St Matthew's Gospel; which he finished before he quitted the chair. On Thursdays, the exercise was alternate: one Thursday, he expounded a Hebrew Psalm, comparing it with the Septuagint, the Vulgar, and the English version; and the next Thursday, he explained some portion of the Ritual and Constitution of the Primitive Church, making the Apostolical Canons his text, and reducing every article of practice under the head of one or other of those Canons. On Fridays, he made each of his Scholars, in course, preach a short Sermon upon some text he assigned; and, when it was ended, he observed upon any thing that was defective or amiss in the handling of the subject. This was the labour of the mornings: in the evenings, after prayer, he every day read them some parcel of Scripture, on which he made a short discourse; and, when that was over, he examined into the progress of their several studies. All this he performed during the whole time the schools were open; and, in order to acquit himself with credit, he was obliged to study hard from four till ten in the morning; the rest of the day being of necessity allotted, either to the care of his pupils, or to hearing the complaints of the Clergy, who, finding he had an interest with men in power, were not sparing in their applications to him (10).

[K] His modest and free Conference between a Conformist and a Nonconformist. It consists of seven Dialogues; and was generally applauded by all, but the zealots of either party, who were very angry with the performance. It met with no answer in Scotland: but one from abroad was sent over, which our author's enemies received with great acclamations; though it was judiciously observed, that no more pains were needful for refuting the Answer, but the reading over the Dialogues (11).

[L] He married the Lady Margaret Kennedy. She was a lady of distinguished piety and knowledge: her own sentiments indeed inclined strongly towards the Presbyterians, with whom she was in high credit and esteem; yet was she far from entering into the rigid and narrow zeal of some of their leaders. As there was some disparity in their ages, that it might remain past dispute, that this match was wholly owing to inclination, not to avarice or ambition, the day before their marriage, our author delivered the Lady a deed, whereby he renounced all pretension to her fortune, which was very considerable, and must otherwise have fallen into his hands, she herself having no intention to secure it (12).

(10) Life, &c. p. 679, 680.

(11) See the Preface to Dr Burnet's Vindication of the Authority &c. of the Church and State of Scotland, Glasgow, 1673, 80.

(12) Life, &c. p. 681.

dication of the Authority, Constitution, and Laws of the Church and State of Scotland [M]; which was thought, at that juncture, such a publick service, that he was again courted to accept of a bishoprick, with a promise of the next vacant archbishoprick; but he persisted in his refusal of that dignity (p). In 1673, he took another journey to London [N], where, at the exprefs nomination of the King, after hearing him preach, he was sworn one of his Majesty's Chaplains in ordinary. He became likewise in high favour with His Majesty and the Duke of York (q) [O]. At his return to Edinburgh, finding the animosities between the Dukes of Hamilton and Lauderdale revived, he retired to his station at Glasgow; but was obliged the next year to return to Court, to justify himself against the accusations of Duke Lauderdale, who had represented him as the cause and instrument of all the opposition the measures of the Court had met with in the Scotch Parliament. Thus he lost the favour of the Court [P]; and, to avoid putting himself into the hands of his enemies, he resigned the Professor's chair at Glasgow, and resolved to settle in London, being now about thirty years of age (r). Soon after he was offered the living of St Giles's Cripplegate, which he declined accepting [Q]. In 1675, our author

(p) Life, &c. ib. and p. 682. See also History, &c. ib. p. 339.

(q) Life, &c. ib. and Hist. ib. p. 354, 355.

(r) Life, &c. p. 683, 684.

at

[M] His Vindication of the Authority, Constitution; and Laws of the Church and State of Scotland] This piece is a defence of the royal prerogatives of the crown of Scotland, and the establishment of Episcopacy in that kingdom, against the principles of Buchanan and his followers. It is dedicated to the Duke of Lauderdale. The author being afterwards reproached for representing the character of Duke Lauderdale very differently from what he had done in that dedication (13), replied (14), 'that the book was wrote when the Duke was the King's Commissioner in Scotland, and dedicated to him at his own request; and that if what happened a year and a half after that, had given him other thoughts of that Minister of State, it was no proof that he wrote disingenuously at that time.'

[N] He took another journey to London.] The avowed design of this journey was, in order to procure a licence for publishing his Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton: but, it seems, he had farther views; for, we are told (15), he went with a full resolution of withdrawing himself from farther meddling in matters of State. He saw that Popery was, at bottom, the prevailing interest at Court, and that the Sacramental Test, whereby the Duke of York, the Lord Clifford, and other Papists in employment, had been excluded, was a meer artifice of King Charles, to obtain money for carrying on the war that summer with Holland. He suspected, that the designs of the Court were both corrupt and desperate. He therefore used all the freedom, he decently could, with the Duke and Duchess of Lauderdale: he pointed out to them the errors of their management in Scotland, and the ill effects it would have, both upon themselves and the whole nation: but he found no disposition in them to rectify their measures.

[O] He was in high favour with the King and the Duke of York.] Duke Lauderdale introduced him to the King, and proposed the licencing his Memoirs, &c. The King read some parts of them himself, and expressed his approbation of them; and ordered they should be licensed by the Secretary Coventry. He had, afterwards, a long private audience of the King, in which he took all the freedom with him, that he thought became his profession. 'He run me into a long discourse, says he (16), about the authority of the Church, which he thought we made much of in our disputes with the Dissenters, and then took it all away when we dealt with the Papists. I saw plainly what he aimed at in this; and I quickly convinced him, that there was a great difference, between an authority of government in things indifferent, and a pretence to infallibility. He complained heavily of the Bishops, for neglecting the true concerns of the Church, and following Courts so much, and being engaged in parties. I went thro' some other things with relation to his course of life, and entered into many particulars with much freedom. He bore all very well, and thanked me for it: some things he freely condemned, such as living with another man's wife: other things he excused, and thought God would not damn a man for a little irregular pleasure. He seemed to take all I had said very kindly; and during my stay at Court, he used me in so particular a manner, that I was considered as a man growing into a high degree of favour.' Our author was introduced to the Duke of York, by the Earl of Ancrum, who had a mind to engage him to give his Highness an account of the affairs of Scotland. 'But I avoided that, says he (17), and very blundly entered into much discourse with him about matters of religion. He said some of the common things, of the necessity of having but one Church; otherwise we saw what swarms of sects did rise up on our revolt from Rome, and these had raised many rebellions, and the shedding much blood: and he named both his father's death, and his great-grandmother's, Mary Queen of Scots. He also turned to some passages in Heylyn's History of the Reformation, which he had lying by him: and the passages were marked, to shew upon what motives and principles, men were led into the changes that were then made. I enlarged upon all these particulars, and shewed him the progress, that ignorance and superstition had made in many dark ages, and how much bloodshed was occasioned by the Papal pretensions, for all which, the opinion of infallibility was a source never to be exhausted. The Duke, upon this conversation, expressed such a liking to me, that he ordered me to come often to him.' Afterwards our author says (18): 'I told him (the Duke) it was a thing he could never answer to God nor the world, that, being born and baptized in our Church, and having his father's last orders to continue steadfast in it, he had suffered himself to be seduced, and as it were stolen out of it, hearing only one side, without offering his scruples to our Divines, or hearing what they had to say in answer to them.' Our author made no other use of the high favour shewn him by the Duke, than the introducing to him Dr Stillingsfleet, and afterwards proposing a conference, to be held in his Royal Highness's presence, between them two, and the chief of the Romish Priests: to which the Duke of York would not consent (19).

[P] He lost the favour of the Court.] On his arrival at London, the King received him very coldly, and ordered his name to be struck out of the list of Chaplains: yet, at the Duke of York's entreaty, His Majesty admitted him to offer what he thought proper in his justification. He thereupon gave His Majesty such a clear and satisfactory account of his conduct, appealing for the truth of all his assertions to Duke Hamilton, that in the end the King seemed convinced of his innocence, and ordered him home to Glasgow. But the Duke of York dissuaded him from returning thither, 'till his peace should be entirely made; assuring him, that otherwise he would be clapped up in prison, and perhaps detained there as long as the same interest lasted at Court. His Royal Highness likewise used his utmost endeavours to have reconciled him with Duke Lauderdale; but found it impracticable, the latter insisting that our author should abandon his best friends, and discover all the secrets he had hitherto been in; and the other as firmly persisting in his adherence to those, who had shewn him friendship, or reposed a confidence in him (20).

[Q] He declined to accept of the living of St Giles's Cripplegate.] It was in the gift of the Dean and Chapter of St Paul's, who had expressed some inclination to bestow it upon Dr Fowler, afterwards Bishop of Gloucester; but being made acquainted with the circumstances of our author, and the hardships he had undergone, they sent him an offer of the benefice: he thanked them for the favour, but said, that, as he had been informed of their intention of conferring it upon so worthy a Divine, he did not think himself at liberty to take it (21).

[R] He

(17) Ibid.

(18) Ib. p. 355.

(19) Ibid. and Life, &c. ubi supra.

(20) Life, &c. p. 683. And History, &c. ib. p. 371, 372.

(21) Life, &c. p. 684.

(13) Dr Hickeys's Discourses upon Dr Burnet and Dr Tillotson, &c. p. 18, 19.

(14) Reflections on Some Discourses, &c. p. 66, 67.

(15) Life, &c. p. 682. And History, &c. ib. p. 354, 355, 356.

(16) History, &c. ib. p. 356, 357.

at the recommendation of Lord Hollis, and notwithstanding the interposition of the Court against him, was appointed preacher at the Rolls Chapel, by Sir Harbottle Grimstone, Master of the Rolls (s). The same year, he was examined before the House of Commons, in relation to Duke Lauderdale [R], whose conduct the Parliament was then enquiring into (t). He was soon after chosen Lecturer of St Clement's, and became a very popular preacher (u). In 1676, he published his Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton (w); and the same year, An Account of a Conference between himself, Dr Stillingfleet, and Coleman [S]. About this time, the apprehensions of Popery increasing daily, our author undertook to write The History of the Reformation of the Church of England [T]; which he executed with great

(s) Ibid.

(t) History, &c. ib. p. 379, 380.

(u) Life, &c. ubi supra.

(w) In folio.

[R] He was examined before the House of Commons, in relation to Duke Lauderdale. Let us hear his own account of this affair. 'The House of Commons, says he (22), fell upon Duke Lauderdale. And those, who knew what had passed between him and me, moved that I should be examined before a committee. I was brought before them. — I was examined concerning his design of arming the Irish Papists. I said, I, as well as others, had heard him say, he wished the Presbyterians in Scotland would rebel, that he might bring over the Irish Papists to cut their throats. I was next examined concerning the design of bringing a Scottish army into England. I desired to be excused, as to what had passed in private discourse, to which I thought I was not bound to answer, unless it were high-treason. They pressed me long; and I would give them no other answer. So they all concluded, that I knew great matters; and reported this specially to the House. Upon that, I was sent for, and brought before the House. I stood upon it, as I had done at the Committee, that I was not bound to answer; that nothing had passed that was high-treason; and, as to all other things, I did not think myself bound to discover them. I said farther, I knew Duke Lauderdale was apt to say things in a heat, which he did not intend to do. — I was brought four times to the bar. At last I was told, the House thought they had a right to examine into every thing that concerned the safety of the nation, as well as into matters of treason, and they looked on me as bound to satisfy them; otherwise they would make me feel the weight of their heavy displeasure, as one that concealed what they thought was necessary to be known.' Upon this I yielded, and gave an account of the discourse formerly mentioned, &c. 'I was much blamed, adds the Bishop (23), for what I had done. Some, to make it look the worse, added, that I had been his Chaplain, which was false; and that I had been much obliged to him, tho' I had never received any real obligation from him, but had done him great services, for which I had been very unworthily requited. Yet the thing had an ill appearance, as the disclosing of what had passed in confidence; tho' I make it a great question, how far even that ought to bind a man, when the designs are very wicked, and the person continued still in the same post, and capacity of executing them.'

(22) Hist. &c. ib. p. 379.

(23) Ib. p. 380.

(24) Hist. &c. ib. p. 368.

[S] His Account of a Conference between himself, Dr Stillingfleet, and Coleman. This Coleman had been bred among the Jesuits, was Secretary to the Dukes of York, and very active in making Profelytes to the Church of Rome (24). Sir Philip Terwhit, a Papist, had married a zealous Protestant, who, suspecting his religion, charged him with it: But he denied it before marriage, and carried the matter so far, that he received the Sacrament with her in her own church. After they were married, she found that he had deceived her; and they lived untowardly together. Some time after, she had scruples suggested to her; with which she acquainted our author, and seemed fully satisfied with the answers he gave her. She afterwards came to him, and desired he would come to her house, and talk of those matters with some persons that her husband would bring to meet him. He told her, he would not decline the thing, if desired, tho' he seldom knew any good come of such conferences. She made the same proposition to Dr Stillingfleet, and he gave the same answer. So a day was set, and they went thither, where they found Coleman, who took the whole debate upon him. Our author wrote down a particular account of all that passed, and printed it. Soon after that, the Lady, who continued firm upon the conference, was possessed with new scruples about the validity of the English ordinations. Our author got from her a paper that had been put into her hand, and answered it; and with that she seemed likewise satisfied. But afterwards, the uneasiness of her life prevailed more with her, than her scruples; and she changed her religion (25).

(25) Ib. p. 395.

[T] His History of the Reformation of the Church of England. His own account of the rise and progress of this work is as follows. 'Some time after I had printed the Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, which were favourably received, the reading of these got me the acquaintance and friendship of Sir William Jones, then Attorney General. — My way of writing History pleased him: and so he pressed me to undertake the History of England. But Sanders's book, that was then translated into French, and cried up much in France, made all my friends press me to answer it, by writing the History of the Reformation. So now all my thoughts were turned that way. I laid out for manuscripts, and searched into all offices. I got for some days into the Cotton Library. But Duke Lauderdale hearing of my design, and apprehending it might succeed in my hands, got Dolben, Bishop of Rochester, to divert Sir John Cotton from suffering me to search into his library. He told him, I was a great enemy to the Prerogative, to which Cotton was devoted, even to slavery. So he said, I would certainly make an ill use of all I had found. This wrought so much on him, that I was no more admitted, till my first volume was published. And then, when he saw how I had composed it, he gave me free access to it (26). The first volume of this work lay near a year after it was finished, for the refusal and correction of friends; so that it was not published till the year 1679, when the affair of the Popish plot was in agitation. This book procured our author an honour, never before or since paid to any writer; he had the thanks of both Houses of Parliament, with a desire, that he would prosecute the undertaking, and compleat that valuable work. Accordingly in less than two years after (*), he printed the second volume, which met with the same general approbation as the first: and such was his readiness in composing, that he wrote the historical part in the compass of six weeks, after all his materials were laid in order (27). The third volume, containing a Supplement to the two former, was published in 1715. 'The defects of Peter Heylyn's History of the Reformation, as Bishop Nicholson observes (28), are abundantly supplied in our author's more compleat history. He gives a punctual account of all the affairs of the Reformation, from its beginning in the reign of Henry VIII, to its final establishment under Queen Elizabeth, A. D. 1559. And the whole is penned in a masculine style, such as becomes an Historian, and is the property of this author in all his writings. The collection of records, which he gives at the end of each volume, are good vouchers of the truth of what he delivers in the body of the history, and are much more perfect, than could reasonably be expected, after the pains taken, in Queen Mary's days, to suppress every thing that carried the marks of the Reformation upon it.' Our Author's performance met with a very favourable reception abroad, and was translated into most of the European languages; inasmuch that the keenest of his enemies (29) allows it, to have a reputation firmly and deservedly established. Indeed some of the French writers have cavilled at it; the most eminent of whom, M. Varillas and M. Le Grand, have received due correction from the author himself (30). Nor did it entirely escape censure at home. For, first, it was attacked by Mr S. Lowth (31), who pretended only to oppose the Erasian tenets in Mr Hobbes's Leviathan; but took occasion, in the conclusion of his book, to

(26) Ib. p. 395, 396.

(*) In 1681.

(27) Life, &c. p. 685.

(28) English Historical Library, fol. Lond. 1736, p. 119.

(29) Ant. Harmer, in Prefat. ubi supra.

(30) See his Reflections on Varillas. Amst. 1686, 12mo. Defence of those Reflections. Ibid. 1687. Continuation of the same Reflections, ib. 1687. And Answer to J. Le Grand's Defence of Sanders, &c. 4to, ib. 1688.

(31) Of the Subject of Church Power, Svo, 1683.

great success and universal applause. In 1680, he published An Account of the Life and Death of the Earl of Rochester [U], with whom he became accidentally acquainted (x). During the affair of the Popish plot, Dr Burnet was often sent for by King Charles, and consulted upon the state of the nation; and about the same time, refused the vacant bishoprick of Chichester, which his Majesty offered him, provided he would entirely come into his interest (y). But tho' his free access to that Monarch did not procure him preferment, it gave him an opportunity of sending his Majesty a most remarkable letter [W], in which, with great freedom, he reprehends the vices and errors, both of his private life and his government (z). The unprejudiced part he acted during the time the nation was inflamed with the discovery of the Popish plot; his candid endeavours to save the lives of Staley and the Lord Stafford, both zealous Papists; his temperate conduct, in regard to the exclusion of the Duke of York; and the scheme of a Prince-Regent, proposed by him, in lieu of that exclusion; are sufficiently related in his History of his own Time (a). In 1682, when the administration was wholly changed in favour of the Duke of York, he continued steady in his adherence to his friends, and chose to sacrifice all his views at Court, particularly a promise of the Mastership of the Temple, rather than break off his correspondence with them (b). This year, our author published his Life of Sir Matthew Hale (c), and his History of the Rights of Princes, in disposing of Ecclesiastical Benefices and Church Lands; which being attacked by an anonymous writer, Dr Burnet published, the same year, An Answer to the Animadversions on the History of the Rights of Princes. As he was, about this time, much resorted to by persons of all ranks and parties, in order for a pretence to avoid the returning so many visits, he built a laboratory, and for above a year, went thro' a course of chemical experiments (d). Upon the execution of the Lord Russel, with whom he was familiarly acquainted, he was examined before the House of Commons, in relation to that Lord's speech upon the scaffold, in the penning of which he was suspected to have had a hand (e). Not long after, he refused the offer of a living of three hundred pounds a year, in the gift of the Earl of Halifax, who would have presented him, on condition of residing still of London (f). In 1683, he went over to Paris; where he was well received by the Court, and became acquainted with the most eminent persons, both Popish and Protestant (g). This year came out, his Translation, and Examination, of a Letter, writ by the last General Assembly of the Clergy of France, to the Protestants;

(x) Life, &c. p. 685.

(y) 1681.

(z) Ib. p. 686 & Hist. ib. p. 507.

(a) Vol. I. p. 427-496.

(b) Life, &c. p. 689.

(c) Translated into French, and published at Amsterdam in 1683.

(d) Life, &c. p. 690.

(e) Hist. ib. p. 561, 562.

(f) Life, &c. p. 691.

(g) Hist. ib. p. 564-567.

censure the account Dr Burnet had given of some of Archbishop Cranmer's singular opinions. This author had the confidence to assert, that both our Historian and Dr Stillingfleet had imposed upon the world in that particular, and had unfaithfully joined together, in their endeavours to lessen Episcopal Ordination. Our author replied to Mr Lowth, in some letters in answer to his book. The next assailant was a gentleman, who, under the name of Anthony Harmer, published A Specimen of some Errors and Defects in the History of the Reformation (32). It is a virulent and uncharitable performance; to which, however, our Historian vouchsafed a short answer, in a Letter to the Bishop of Litchfield (33). A third attack on this History was made by the author of some Discourses on Dr Burnet and Dr Tillotson (34); in which the whole charge amounts to no more than this, that In a matter of no great consequence, there was too little care had in copying or examining a letter writ in a very bad hand, and that there was some probability, that Dr Burnet was mistaken in one of his conjectures. Our author answered this piece, in a Vindication of his History (35). The two first parts were translated into French by M. de Roëmond, and into Latin by Melchior Mittelhorzer. There is likewise an High-Dutch translation of it. In 1682, our author published an Abridgment of his History of the Reformation (36), in which he tells us, he had wholly waved every thing that belonged to the records, and the proof of what he relates, or to the confutation of the falsehoods that run thro' the Popish Historians; all which is to be found in the History at large. And therefore, in this Abridgment, he says, every thing is to be taken upon trust; and those, who desire a fuller satisfaction, are referred to the volumes he had before published.

[U] His Account of the Life and Death of the Earl of Rochester.] As our author, tho' he had at this time no parochial cure, refused not his attendance to any sick person, who desired it; he was sent for, amongst others, to one, who had been engaged in a criminal amour with Wilmot Earl of Rochester. The manner he treated her in, during her illness, gave that Lord a great curiosity of being acquainted with him Whereupon, for a whole winter, in a conversation of at least one evening in a week, he went over all these topics with him, upon which Scepticks and men of loose morals are wont to attack the Christian Religion (37). The effect of these conferences, in convincing the Earl's judgment, and leading him to a sincere repentance, is the subject of this narrative.

[W] He sent King Charles II. a most remarkable letter.] The original is in the hands of the life-writer, wrote by the Bishop, with a memorandum, how it was delivered, and when; and how it was received. It is printed at length in the Life (38); to which the reader is referred. Let us hear what the Bishop himself says of it. 'Mrs Roberts, whom he (the King) had kept for some time, sent for me when she was dying: I saw her often for some weeks, and among other things, I desired her to write a letter to the King, expressing the sense she had of her past life: and at her desire, I drew such a letter as might be fit for her to write. But she never had strength enough to write it: so upon that I resolved to write a very plain letter to the King. I set before him his past life, and the effects it had upon the nation, with the judgments of God that lay on him, which was but a small part of the punishment that he might look for. I pressed him upon that earnestly to change the whole course of his life. I carried this letter to Chiffinch's, on the twenty-ninth of January; and told the King in the letter, that I hoped the reflections on what had befallen his father on the thirtieth of January, might move him to consider these things more carefully. Lord Arran happened to be then in waiting; and he came to me next day, and told me, he was sure the King had a long letter from me; for he held the candle to him while he read it; he knew at that distance that it was my hand. The King read it twice over, and then threw it into the fire: and not long after, Lord Arran took occasion to name me; and the King spoke of me with great sharpness: so he perceived he was not pleased with my letter (39).'

This part of our author's conduct may perhaps offend the delicacy of some, and be censured as too great a liberty, for any subject, especially in Burnet's then station, to take with his Sovereign. But, however that be, it conveys to the reader a much stronger idea of his character, than any description can give; and it will scarce be thought a step, which any Clergyman would have taken, who aimed more at preferment, than the strict discharge of his duty.

32) 8vo, 1693, the author Mr Henry Wharton.

33) 4to, 1694.

34) 4to, 1695, the author Dr Tickler.

35) 8vo, 1696.

36) In 8vo.

(37) Life, &c. p. 685.

(38) Ib. p. 636.

(39) Hist. ib. p. 507.

testants, inviting them to return to their Communion, &c. also his Translation of Sir Thomas More's Utopia, with a Preface concerning the Nature of Translations. The year following, the resentment of the Court against our author was so great, that he was discharged from his lecture at St Clement's, by virtue of the King's mandate to Dr Halcarr, Rector of that parish; and, in December the same year, by an order from the Lord-Keeper North, to Sir Harbottle Grimstone, he was forbid preaching any more at the Rolls Chapel (b) [X]. In 1685, came out our author's Life of Dr William Bedell, Bishop of Kilmore in Ireland (i). Upon the death of King Charles, and accession of King James, having obtained leave to go out of the Kingdom, he went first to Paris [Y]; where he lived in great retirement, to avoid being involved in the conspiracies then forming in favour of the Duke of Monmouth. But, having contracted an acquaintance with Bragadier Stoupe, a Protestant officer in the French service, he was prevailed upon to take a journey with him into Italy, and met with an agreeable reception at Rome [Z], and Geneva (k) [AA]. After a tour thro' the southern parts of France, Italy, Switzerland, and many places of Germany, of which he has given an account, with reflections on their several governments, &c. in his Travels, published in 1687; he came to Utrecht, and intended to have settled in some quiet retreat within the Seven Provinces; but, being invited to the Hague, by the Prince and Princess of Orange, he repaired thither, and had a great share in the counsels then carrying on, in relation to the affairs of England (l) [BB]. In 1687, our author published a Translation of Lactantius, concerning the death of the Persecutors. The high favour shewn him at the Hague, disgusting the English Court, King James wrote two severe letters against him to the Princess of Orange, and insisted, by his Ambassador, on his being forbid the Court; which,

(b) Life, &c. p. 62. And Hist. ib. p. 596.

(i) In 8vo.

(k) Life, &c. ib. And Hist. ib. p. 86.

(l) Life, &c. p. 633. And Hist. ib. p. 638 —692.

[X] He was forbid preaching any more at the Rolls Chapel. I continued, says the Bishop (40, at the Rolls avoiding very cautiously every thing that related to the publick: for I abhorred the making the pulpit a stage for venting of passion, or for the serving of interests. There was a parish in London vacant, where the election lay in the inhabitants: and it was probable it would have fallen on me; tho' London was in so divided a state, that every thing was managed by the strength of parties. Yet the King, apprehending the choice might have fallen on me, sent a message to them, to let them know, he would take it amiss if they chose me. Old Sir Harbottle Grimstone lived still, to the great indignation of the Court. When the fifth of November, being gunpowder-treason day, came, in which we had always sermons at the Chapel of the Rolls; I begged the Master of the Rolls to excuse me then from preaching; for that day led one to preach against Popery, and it was indecent not to do it. He said, he would end his life as he had led it all along; in an open detestation of Popery. So, since I saw this could not be avoided, tho' I had not meddled with any point of Popery for above a year together, I resolved, since I did it so seldom, to do it to purpose. I chose for my text these words: Save me from the lion's mouth; thou hast heard me from the horns of the unicorns. I made no reflection in my thoughts on the lion and unicorn, as being the two supporters of the King's scutcheon: (for I ever hated all points of that sort, as a profanation of scriptures) but I shewed, how well Popery might be compared to the lion's mouth, then open to devour us; and I compared our former deliverance from the extremities of danger, to the being on the horn of a rhinoceros. And this leading me to the subject of the day, I mentioned that with of King James I. against any of his posterity that should endeavour to bring that religion in among us. This was immediately carried to the Court. But it only raised more anger against me; for nothing could be made of it. They talked most of the choice of the text, as levelled against the King's coat of arms. That had never been once in my thoughts. Lord Keeper North diverted the King from doing any thing on the account of my sermon. And so the matter slept 'till the end of the term: and then North writ to the Master of the Rolls, that the King considered the Chapel of the Rolls as one of his own chapels; and, since he looked on me as a person disaffected to his government, and had for that reason dismissed me from his own service, he therefore required him not to suffer me to serve any longer in that chapel.

[Y] He went to Paris. Before he left England, he enquired of the French Ambassador, whether he might be safe in France: and being assured he might, he came to Paris; where there being many, whom he had reason to look on as spies, he took a little house, and lived as privately as he could (41).

(41) Hist. ib. p. 655.

[Z] He met with an agreeable reception at Rome. Pope Innocent II. hearing of our author's arrival, sent the Captain of the Swiss guards to acquaint him, he would give him a private audience in bed, to avoid the ceremony of kissing his Holiness's slipper. But our author excused himself as well as he could. He was treated with great familiarity, by the Cardinals Howard and D'Estrees; the former shewed him all his letters from England, expressing the high expectations of the Popish Party. One evening, upon visiting Cardinal Howard, he found him distributing some relics to two French gentlemen: whereupon he whispered to him in English, that it was somewhat odd, that a Priest of the Church of England should be at Rome helping them off with the ware of Babylon. The Cardinal smiled at the remark, and, repeating it in French to the gentlemen, bid them tell their countrymen, how bold the Hereticks, and how mild the Cardinals were at Rome. Some disputes, which our author had at Rome, concerning religion, beginning to be taken notice of, made it proper for him to quit that city; which he accordingly did, upon an intimation given him by Prince Borghese (42).

[AA] — and at Geneva. Here, perceiving, how strongly they insisted upon their constant doctrine (43), which they required all those to subscribe, who were admitted into orders, he employed all the eloquence he was master of, and all the credit he had acquired among them, to obtain an alteration in this practice. He represented to them the folly and ill consequence of such subscriptions; whereby the honestest and worthiest men were frequently reduced to the necessity of quitting their native country, and seeking a subsistence elsewhere; whilst others of less virtue were induced to submit and comply against their conscience, and even begin their ministry with mental equivocations. The warmth, with which he expressed himself on this head, was such, and such the opinion they had of him, that the clergy of Geneva were afterwards released from the subscriptions, and only left subject to punishment or censure, in case of writing or preaching against the established doctrine (44).

[BB] He had a great share in the counsels carrying on in relation to the affairs of England. He advised the putting the fleet of Holland immediately into such order, as might give courage to their friends in Great Britain, in case matters there should come to extremities: he prevailed upon the Prince and Princess of Orange, to write a letter to King James, in favour of the Bishop of London, who was then under suspension: he ventured to propose to the Princess, the explaining herself upon the nice but necessary point, of the share the Prince was to expect in the government, in case the British crown should devolve on her; and when it was determined, to send over Mr Dyckvelt, as Ambassador to England, our author was employed to draw his secret instructions (45).

(42) Ib. p. 678 —663.

(43) A Formula ry, commonly known by the name of the Confessus.

(44) Life, &c. p. 692, 693.

(45) Ibid. And Hist. ib. p. 697, 692.

which, at the King's importunity, was done; tho' our author continued to be employed and trusted as before. Soon after, a prosecution for high-treason was set on foot against him, both in Scotland and England: but the States refusing, at the demand of the English Court, to deliver him up [CC], designs were laid of seizing his person, and even destroying him, if he could be taken (m) [DD]. About this time, Dr Burnet married Mrs Mary Scott [EE], a Dutch Lady, of large fortune, and noble extraction (n). He had a very important share in the whole conduct of the Revolution in 1688; the project of which he gave early notice of to the Court of Hanover, intimating, that the success of this enterprise must naturally end in an entail of the British crown upon that illustrious House (o). He wrote also several pamphlets (p), in support of the Prince of Orange's designs; and, when his Highness undertook the expedition to England, our author accompanied him as his Chaplain, notwithstanding the particular circumstances of danger, to which he was thereby

(p) They were re-printed at London in 1689, in 8vo, under the title of A Collection of 18 Papers relating to the Affairs of Church and State during the Reign of King James II. &c.

[CC] A prosecution for high-treason was set on foot against him — but the States refused to deliver him up. Take an account of this affair in the Bishop's own words (46): 'After I had stayed a year in Holland, I heard from many hands, that the King seemed to forget his own greatness, when he spoke of me, which he took occasion to do very often. I had published some account of the tour I had made in several letters in which my chief design was to expose both Popery and tyranny. The book was well received, and was much read; and it raised the King's displeasure very high. My continuing at the Hague, made him conclude, that I was managing designs against him. And some papers in single sheets came out, reflecting on the proceedings of England, which seemed to have a considerable effect on those who read them. These were printed in Holland; and many copies of them were sent into all the parts of England. All which inflamed the King the more against me; for he believed they were writ by me, as indeed most of them were. But that which gave the crisis to the King's anger was, that he heard I was to be married to a considerable fortune at the Hague. So a project was formed to break this, by charging me with high treason, for corresponding with Lord Argyle, and for conversing with some that were outlawed for high treason. The King ordered a letter to be writ in his name to his Advocate in Scotland, to prosecute me for some probable thing or other; which was intended only to make a noise, not doubting but this would break the intended marriage. A ship coming from Scotland the day in which this prosecution was ordered, that had a quick passage, brought me the first news of it, long before it was sent to D'Albeville. So I petitioned the states, who were then sitting, to be naturalized, in order to my intended marriage. And this past in course, without the least difficulty; which perhaps might have been made, if this prosecution, now begun in Scotland, had been known. Now I was legally under the protection of the States of Holland. Yet I writ a full justification of myself, as to all particulars laid to my charge, in some letters that I sent to the Earl of Middleton. But in one of these I said, that, being now naturalized in Holland, my allegiance was, during my stay in these parts, transferred from his Majesty to the States. I also said in another letter, that, if, upon my non-appearance, a sentence should pass against me, I might be perhaps forced to justify myself, and to give an account of the share that I had in affairs these twenty years past: in which I might be led to mention some things, that I was afraid would displease the King: and therefore I should be sorry, if I were driven to it. Now the Court thought they had somewhat against me: for they knew they had nothing before. So the first citation was let fall, and a new one was ordered on these two accounts. It was pretended to be high-treason, to say, my allegiance was now transferred. And it was set forth as a high indignity to the King, to threaten him with writing a history of the transactions past these last twenty years. The first of these struck at a great point, which was a part of the law of nations. Every man that was naturalized took an oath of allegiance to the Prince or State that naturalized him. And since no man can serve two masters, or be under a double allegiance, it is certain, that there must be a transfer of allegiance, at least, during the stay in the country, where one is so naturalized. This matter was kept up against me for some time, the Court delaying proceeding to sentence for several months. At last a sentence of outlawry was given: and upon that Albeville said, that, if the States would not deliver me up, he would find such instruments, as should seize on me, and carry me away forcibly. The methods he named of doing this were very ridiculous; and he spoke of it to so many persons, that I believe his design was rather to frighten me, than that he could think to effect them. Many overtures were made to some of my friends in London, not only to let this prosecution fall, but to promote me, if I would make myself capable of it. I entertained none of these I had many stories brought me of the discourses among some of the brutal Irish, then in the Dutch service. But, I thank God, I was not moved with them. I resolved to go on, and to do my duty, and to do what service I could to the publick, and to my country; and resigned myself up entirely to that providence, that had watched over me at that time with an indulgent care, and had made all the designs of my enemies against me turn to my great advantage.' The Bishop goes on (47) to inform us, that A beville presented a memorial to the States, complaining of his (Dr Burnet's) conduct, and insisting upon his being banished the Provinces: whereupon he was called before Deputies of the States, who were so satisfied with his answers to the Ambassador's memorial, that they ordered a memorial to be drawn up agreeable thereto; and instructed their Ambassador in England to represent to the King, how sacred a thing naturalization was, and, if his Majesty had any thing to lay to Dr Burnet's charge, justice should be done in their Courts. This produced another memorial against our author, but with no better success than the former.

[DD] Designs were laid of seizing his person, and even destroying him, if he could be taken. Somebody, it seems, had suggested to King James, that, since a sentence had passed against Dr Burnet for non-appearance, and the States refused to deliver him up, he (the King) might order private persons to execute the sentence as they could. Our author received positive assurances, that five thousand pounds would be given to any one that should murder him: and a gentleman of an unblemished reputation, he tells us, writ him word, that he himself by accident saw an order, drawn in the Secretary's Office, but not yet signed, for three thousand pounds to a blank person, who was to seize, and destroy him (48).

[EE] He married Mrs Mary Scott. This Lady's ancestor, on the father's side, was a younger brother, of the family of Buccleugh, who, upon a quarrel in Scotland, went over to Holland: his son was a Brigadier-General at the siege of Middleburgh, in the year 1574, and afterwards Deputy for the province of Zealand in the Assembly of the States General: his grandson, Apollonius Scott, who was the Lady's grandfather, was President of the High Court of Justice at the Hague, and by marriage allied to the noblest houses in Zealand. On the mother's side, who was a de Ruyter, she was related to the principal families in Guelderland. With these advantages of birth, she had those of a fine person; was well skilled in Music, Drawing, and Painting; and spoke Dutch, English, and French, equally well. Her knowledge in matters of Divinity was such, as might rather be expected from a Student, than from a Lady. She had a fine understanding, and sweetness of temper; and excelled in all the qualifications of a dutiful wife, a prudent mistress of a family, and a tender mother of children (49).

(48) Ib. p. 730. And Life, &c. p. 694, 695.

(49) Life, &c. ib.

[FF] He

) Life, &c. p. 694. And ib. p. 726, c.

) Life, &c. p. 695.

) Hist. ib. p. 757.

[6] Hist. ib. p. 727.

- (7) Ib. p. 776. thereby exposed (q). At Exeter, after the Prince's landing, he drew up the Association for pursuing the ends of his Highness's Declaration (r). During these transactions, Dr Crew, Bishop of Durham, who had rendered himself obnoxious, by the part he had acted in the High Commission Court, having proposed to the Prince of Orange, to resign his bishopric in favour of Dr Burnet, on condition of an allowance of 1000*l.* per annum out of the revenue; our author refused to accept it on those terms (s). But King William had not been many days on the throne, before Dr Burnet found the due recompence of this self-denial, being advanced to the See of Salisbury [FF], in the room of Dr Seth Ward deceased (t); and consecrated March 31, 1689. Our Prelate had scarce taken his seat in the House of Lords, when he distinguished himself, by declaring for moderate measures, with regard to the clergy who scrupled to take the oaths, and for a toleration of the Protestant Dissenters from the Church of England (u); and, when the bill for declaring the rights and privileges of the subject, and settling the succession of the crown, was brought into Parliament, he was the person appointed by King William, to propose naming the Duchesses (afterwards Electresses) of Brunswick, next in succession after the Princesses of Denmark and her issue (w); and, when this succession afterwards (x) took place, he had the honour of being Chairman of the Committee, to whom the bill was referred (y). This made him considered by the House of Hanover, as one firmly attached to their interests, and engaged him in an epistolary correspondence with the Princess Sophia (z), which lasted to her death (a). This year, Bishop Burnet addressed a Pastoral Letter to the clergy of his diocese, concerning the the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy to King William and Queen Mary; in which having grounded their Majesties title to the crown upon the right of Conquest [GG], some Members of both Houses took such offence thereat, that they procured an order for burning the book by the hands of the common executioner (b). After the session of Parliament was over, the Bishop went down to his diocese, where, by his pious, prudent, and vigilant discharge of the episcopal functions [HH], he gained an universal love and esteem.

[FF] He was advanced to the See of Salisbury.] The writer of his life tells us (50). 'He was so little anxious after his own preferment, that, when the Bishoprick of Salisbury became void, as it did soon after King William and Queen Mary were established on the throne, he solicited for it in favour of his old friend Dr Lloyd, then Bishop of St Asaph;' and that 'the King answered him in a cold way, That he had another person in view; and the next day he himself was nominated to that See.' The Bishop himself tells us (51), the King named him to that See in terms more obliging than usually fell from him: and that, when he waited on the Queen, she said, she hoped he would now put in practice those notions, with which he had taken the liberty often to entertain her. The Bishop informs us farther, that Archbishop Sancroft refused to consecrate him, and for some days seemed determined to venture incurring a Præsumptio, rather than obey the Mandate for Consecration: but at last he granted a commission to all the Bishops of his province, or to any three of them, in conjunction with the Bishop of London, to exercise his metropolitical authority during pleasure.

[GG] He grounded their Majesties title to the crown upon the right of Conquest.] Having set forth the motives, upon which the Prince of Orange acted, in making war upon King James, and shewed them to be justifiable, he goes on: 'So then here was a war begun upon just and lawful grounds; and a war being begun, it is the uncontroverted opinion of all Lawyers, that the success of a just war gives a lawful title to that, which is acquired in the progress of it. Therefore, King James having so far sunk in the war, that he both abandoned his people, and deserted the government, all his right and title did accrue to the King, in a right of a Conquest over him; so that, if he had then assumed the crown, the opinion of all Lawyers must have been on his side. But he chose rather to leave the matter to the determination of the Peers and people of England, &c (52).' It was not 'till about three years after, that this piece of the Bishop's was publicly burnt, together with another on the same argument, written by Charles Blount, Esq; and intitled, King William and Queen Mary Conquerors (53).

[HH] His pious, prudent, and vigilant discharge of the episcopal functions.] We shall just touch upon the principal parts of his conduct as a Bishop, which are described at large by the author of his Life (54). As he had always looked upon Confirmation, as the likeliest means of reviving a spirit of Christianity, if men could be brought to entertain just notions concerning it, he wrote a short Directory, containing proper rules for preparing the youth upon such occasions; this he printed, and sent copies of it, some months beforehand, to the minister of every parish, where he intended to confirm. Every summer, he made a tour, for six weeks or two months, through some district of his bishoprick, daily preaching and confirming from church to church, so as, in the compass of three years (besides his triennial visitation) to go through all the principal livings of his diocese. In these circuits, he entertained all the clergy, that attended upon him, at his own expence, and held conferences with them upon the chief heads of Divinity (55). During his residence at Salisbury, he constantly preached a Thursday's lecture, founded at St Thomas's church: he likewise preached and confirmed, every Sunday morning, in some church of that city, or of the neighbourhood round about it; and, in the evening, he had a lecture in his own chapel, wherein he explained some portion of Scripture. Every week, during the season of Lent, he catechized the youth of the two great schools in the Cathedral Church, and instructed them in order for Confirmation. He endeavoured, as much as in him lay, to reform the abuses of the Bishop's Consistorial Court. No part of the episcopal office was more strictly attended to by him, than the examination of candidates for holy orders. He examined them himself, as to the proofs of the Christian Religion, the authority of the Scriptures, and the nature of the Gospel-Covenant; and, a day or two before Ordination, he submitted all those, whom he had accepted, to the examination of the Dean and Prebendaries. As the qualification of clergymen for the pastoral care was always uppermost in his thoughts, he instituted at Salisbury a little nursery of students in Divinity, being ten in number, to each of whom he allowed a salary of thirty pounds a year. Once every day, he examined their progress in learning, and gave them a lecture on some speculative or practical point of Divinity, or some part of the pastoral function. But this foundation being exclaimed at, as a designed affront upon the method of education at the Universities, he was prevailed upon, after some years, to lay it wholly aside. He was a warm and constant enemy to Pluralities, where non residence was the consequence of them, and in some cases hazarded a suspension, rather than give institution. In the point of residence, he was so strict, that he immediately dismissed his own Chaplains, upon their preferment to a cure of souls. He exerted the principle of Toleration, which was deeply rooted in him, in favour of a Nonjuring Meeting-house at Salisbury, which he obtained the Royal permission to connive at; and this spirit of moderation brought over several Dissenting families of his diocese to the Communion of the Church.

[II] His

(z) Above 500 that Princess's Letters to Dr Burnet, are extant in the hand of the Life-Writer; two of which he has given us.

(a) Life, &c. p. 697.

(b) Kennet's Complete Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 587, 650.

(55) See the next remark.

(52) Pastoral Letter, &c. p. 19, 20, 21.

(53) Kennet's Complete Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 587, 650.

(54) Ubi supra, p. 705—712.

(c) Life, &c. p. 70;—710. esteem (c). In 1692, he published a treatise, intituled The Pastoral Care (d), in which the duties of the Clergy are laid down with great strictness, and enforced with no less zeal and warmth. The next year, came out his Four Discourses to the Clergy of his Diocese [II]. In 1694, our author preached the Funeral Sermon of Archbishop Tillotson, with whom he had long kept up an intimate acquaintance and friendship (e), and whose memory he vindicated (f), against the virulent attacks made upon it. The death of Queen Mary, which happened the year following, drew from our author's pen that Essay on her character (g), which her uncommon talents, and shining qualities, merited at the hands of a person, who enjoyed to high a degree of her favour and confidence (h). After the decease of that Princefs, thro' whose hands the affairs and promotions of the Church had wholly passed, our Prelate was one of the Ecclesiastical Commission, appointed by the King, to recommend to all bishopricks, deaneries, and other vacant benefices in His Majesty's gift. In 1698, the Bishop lost his wife by the small-pox; but the consideration of the tender age of his children, and his own avocations, soon induced him to supply that loss by a marriage with Mrs Berkley [KK]. This year, he was appointed Preceptor to his Highness the Duke of Gloucester [LL], and employed great care in the education of that young Prince [MM]. In 1699, our author published his Exposition of the Thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England.

(d) In 4to. It was re-printed in 1713, with a Preface and an additional Chapter.

(e) Hist. lib. p. 135.

(f) In a piece intituled, A Vindication of Archbishop Tillotson, Lond. 1696.

(g) It was translated into French by D. Mezey, and published at the Hague in 1695; and into High-Dutch, by J. G. Pritius, and printed at Leipsick.

(h) Life, &c. p. 715.

[II] His four Discourses to the Clergy of his Diocese.] The first is, on The Truth of the Christian Religion; the second, on The Divinity and Death of Christ; the third, on The Infallibility and Authority of the Church; and the fourth, on The Obligation to continue in the Communion of the Church. These discourses are the substance of so many conferences, held by the Bishop with his clergy, at his annual visitations (56). The second of these discourses was animadverted upon by an anonymous Unitarian writer, in a pamphlet printed in 1694, in 4to, intituled, Considerations on the Explications of the Doctrine of the Trinity, &c. In a Letter to H. H. Our author made some remarks on this piece, in a letter to Dr John Williams, afterwards Bishop of Chichester, dated Feb. 2, 1694-5, and sub-joined to Dr Williams's Vindication of the Sermons of his Grace John Archbishop of Canterbury, concerning the Divinity and Incarnation of our blessed Saviour (57).

[KK] He married Mrs Berkley.] This Lady was the eldest daughter of Sir Richard Blake, Knight, the fifth son of Thomas Blake, of Earantoun, in the county of Southampton, Esq; of an eminent family, and of Elizabeth, the daughter of Dr Bathurst, an eminent Physician in London. She was born the 8th of November 1661. At a little more than seventeen years of age, she was married to Robert Berkley of Spetchly, in the county of Worcester, Esq; grandson of Sir Robert Berkley, who was a Judge in King Charles the first's time. Mr Berkley's mother was a Papist, but Mr Berkley himself a Protestant; which put Mrs Berkley upon studying her own religion more fully, and obliged her to a more than ordinary strictness in her whole conduct. In King James's time, when the fears of Popery began greatly to increase, she prevailed with her husband to go to Holland, and travelled with him over the seventeen provinces; after which, they settled at the Hague, till the Revolution, when they returned to England, and their country-seat at Spetchly. In 1693, she lost her husband Mr Berkley, who was buried with his ancestors at Spetchly. After his death, she perfected the Hospital at Worcester, for the erecting of which he had bequeathed a large sum of money. During her widowhood, she made the first draught of that pious treatise, which she afterwards finished and published, intituled, A Method of Devotion: or, Rules for holy and devout Living; with Prayers on several Occasions, and Advices, and Devotions, for the holy Sacrament, in octavo. This piece has been so well received, as to run through three editions. After continuing a widow near seven years, she was married to the Bishop of Salisbury, who was so sensible of her worth and goodness, that he committed the care of his children entirely to her, and left her absolute mistress of her own fortune. In 1707, she took a journey to Spaw, for her health, and, after her return, seemed to be much recovered: but, the winter following, upon the breaking of the frost in January, she was taken with a pleuritic fever, of which she died in a few days, and was buried at Spetchly, by her former husband, according to a promise she had made him, as appears by a clause in her will. She was a Lady, in every respect, of most exemplary life and conversation (58).

[LL] He was appointed Preceptor to his Highness the Duke of Gloucester.]

The Bishop was, at this time, retired to his diocese, upon the death of his Lady; and took that opportunity to waive the offer of this important charge, though he was assured, the Princefs of Denmark had testified her approbation of the King's choice. He wrote to the Earl of Sunderland, to use his interest, that he might be excused; and to his friend Archbishop Tension, desiring him to wait on the King in his name, and intreat his Majesty to allow him to decline this employment. But all his friends concurring to press him earnestly, not to refuse a station, in which he might do his country such signal service, as in the right education of the Duke of Gloucester, he thought it might be construed oblinacy not to submit. He therefore signified his compliance in a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury; and waited on the King at Windsor, where he assured his Majesty, it was no longer his intention to decline so honourable an employment, as the educating a Prince so nearly related to the crown, since his Royal Master thought him worthy of that trust; but, as the discharge of his duty in this station must confine him constantly to Court, which was inconsistent with his Episcopal Function, he desired leave to resign his Bishoprick. The King was much surprized at the proposal, to which he would by no means consent. However, he was at length prevailed on to agree, that the Duke should reside all the summer at Windsor (which is in the diocese of Salisbury) and that the Bishop should have ten weeks allowed him every year, to visit the other parts of his diocese (59). An attempt was made in Parliament, the year following, to turn the Bishop of Salisbury out from the trust of educating the Duke of Gloucester, some objecting to his being a Scotchman, and others alledging the book (*) which had been ordered to be burnt. But when an address to the King for that purpose was moved for, it was rejected by a great majority (60).

[MM] He employed great care in the education of that young Prince.] 'I took to my own province, says the Bishop (61), the reading and explaining the Scriptures to him, the instructing him in the principles of religion and the rules of virtue, and the giving him a view of History, Geography, Politiicks, and Government. I resolved also to look very exactly to all the masters, that were appointed to teach him other things.' In another place, speaking of the Duke of Gloucester's death, he says (62): 'I had been trusted with his education now for two years, and he had made an amazing progress: I had read over the Psalms, Proverbs, and the Gospels, with him, and had explained things, that fell in my way, very copiously. — I went through Geography so often with him, that he knew all the maps very particularly: I explained to him the forms of Government in every country, with the interests and trade of that country, and what was both good and bad in it: I acquainted him with all the great revolutions that had been in the world, and gave him a copious account of the Greek and Roman Histories, and of Plutarch's Lives: the last thing I explained to him was the Gothick Constitution, and the Beneficiary and Feudal Laws: I talked of these things, at different times, near three hours a day.'

(56) See the preceding remark.

(57) Lond. 1695; 4to.

(59) Life, &c. p. 715—718. And Hist. lib. p. 210, 211.

(*) His Pastors Letter. See the remark [GG].

(60) Hist. lib. p. 237.

(61) Ib. p. 211.

(62) Ib. p. 245, 246.

(58) See an Account of Mrs Bur-ett's Life and character, pre- ceded to her Me- od of Devotion, c. Lond. 1713; Dr T. Good- yn, Archdeacon of Oxford, after- wards Archbishop of Cadix.

[NN] His

England [NN]. In 1704, the scheme for the augmentation of poor livings, first projected by Bishop Burnet [OO], took place, and passed into an Act of Parliament (i). In 1706, he published a collection of Sermons and Pamphlets, in three volumes, 4to; in 1710, an Exposition of the Church Catechism; and, in 1713, Sermons on several Occasions, with an Essay towards a new Book of Homilies. We shall mention some other pieces of Bishop Burnet's in the remark [PP]. This learned and eminent Prelate died [QQ] the seventeenth of March 1714-15, in the seventy-second year of his age (k), and was interred in the parish church of St James's Clerkenwell, in London. Since his death, his History of

(i) Life, &c. p. 712-715. And Hist. ib. p. 370.

(k) Life, &c. p. 724, 725.

[NN] His Exposition of the thirty-nine Articles of the Church of England. This excellent performance was censured by the Lower House of Convocation, in 1701, first, as allowing a diversity of opinions, which the articles were framed to prevent; 2dly, as containing many passages contrary to the true meaning of the articles, and to other received Doctrines of our Church; and 3dly, as containing some things of pernicious consequence to the Church, and derogatory from the honour of the Reformation: but that House refusing to enter into particulars, unless they might, at the same time, offer some other matters to the Upper House, which the Bishops would not admit of, the affair was dropped (63). The Exposition was attacked in a piece (64), intitled, A Prefatory Discourse to an Examination of a late Book, intitled, An Exposition, &c. London, 1702, in 4to. An answer to this discourse (65) came out the year following. Dr Jonathan Edwards, likewise attacked our author in a piece, intitled, The Exposition given by my Lord Bishop of Sarum of the second Article of our Religion examined. London 1702, in 4to. In answer to which, there appeared Remarks on the Examiniſt of the Exposition, &c. London, 1702. At the same time, Mr Robert Burcough, published, A Vindication of the twenty-third Article of Religion, from a late Exposition, ascribed to my Lord Bishop of Sarum. Mr Edmund Elys, likewise published, in 1704, Reflections on a late Exposition of the thirty-nine Articles, &c. in 4to. There were two editions of the Exposition, in folio, the same year.

(63) Ib. p. 285, 286.

(64) Supposed to be written by Dr William Binckes.

(65) Supposed to be written by Dr John Hoadley, Primate of Ireland.

(66) Hist. ib. p. 369-371.

[OO] He projected the scheme for the augmentation of poor livings. The reader will be pleased to find here a particular account of this affair, as it is given us by the Bishop himself (66). On the 6th of February, 1704, Queen Anne sent a message to the House of Commons, signifying her purpose to apply that branch of the revenue, which was raised out of the first-fruits and tenths, paid by the Clergy, to the increase of all the small benefices in the nation. This branch was an imposition, begun by the Popes, in the time of the Holy Wars, and raised as a fund to support those expeditions. But when taxes are once raised by such an arbitrary power, as the Popes then assumed, and after there has been a submission, and payments have been settled into a custom, they are generally continued, even after the pretence, upon which they were at first raised, subsists no more. So this became a standing branch of the Papal revenue, till Henry VIII. seemed resolved to take it away. It was first abolished for a year, probably to draw in the Clergy to consent the more willingly to a change that delivered them from such heavy impositions. But, in the succeeding session of Parliament, this revenue was again settled as part of the income of the crown for ever. The whole amounted to between sixteen and seventeen thousand pounds a year. This was not brought into the Treasury; as the other branches of the revenue; but the Bishops, who had been the Pope's collectors, were now the King's: so persons in favour obtained assignments on it, for life, or a term of years. In Charles II's time, it went chiefly among his women and his natural children. 'When I wrote the History of the Reformation, says the Bishop, I considered this matter so particularly, that I saw here was a proper fund for providing better subsistence to the poor Clergy; we having among us some hundreds of cures, that have not of certain provision twenty pounds a year; and some thousands that have not fifty. — I had possessed the late Queen (*) with this, so that she was fully resolved, if ever she had lived to see peace and settlement, to have cleared this branch of the revenue of all the assignments that were upon it, and to have applied it to the augmentation of small benefices. I laid the matter before the late King (†), when there was a prospect of peace, as a proper expression, both of his thankfulness to Almighty God, and of his care of the Church (67) — He entertained this so well, that he ordered me to speak to his Ministers about it. They all approved it; the Lord Somers did it in a most particular manner. But the Earl of Sunderland obtained an assignation, upon two dioceses, for two thousand pounds a year, for two lives: so nothing was to be hoped for after that. I laid this matter very fully before the present Queen (†), in the King's time, and had spoken often of it to the Lord Godolphin. — Upon the Queen's message, a bill was brought in, enabling her to alienate this branch of the revenue, and to create a corporation by a charter, for applying it to the use, for which she now gave it. They added to this, a repeal of the statute of Mortmain, so far as that it might be free to all men, either by deed or by their last wills, to give what they thought fit towards the augmenting of benefices. Thus are the Clergy in a great measure indebted to Bishop Burnet, for the advantage they derive from this establishment of the first-fruits and tenths.

(*) Queen Mary.

(†) King William.

[PP] Some other pieces of Bishop Burnet's.] I. Dr Gilbert Burnet's Resolution of two important Cases of Conscience: the first; Is a Woman's Barrenness a just ground for Divorce, or for Polygamy? the second: Is Polygamy in any Case lawful under the Gospel? The author resolves both these cases in the affirmative (68). The occasion of his writing this paper, as he himself informs us (69), was this: about the year 1670 or 1671, Duke Lauderdale, having discovered to our author the secret of the Duke of York's Religion, and perceiving him struck with great apprehensions thereupon, hinted to him a project of King Charles's divorce, in order, by an heir to the crown, to set aside the Duke of York. Our author then was but seven and twenty years of age; and, being pretty full of the Civil Law, which had been his first study, he mentioned to the Earl several passages out of the Digests, Code, and Novels, upon that head. The Earl thereupon desired the Doctor to state that matter in writing; which the latter did, telling the Earl at the same time, that he spoke of the sudden, but that, when he went home among his books, he would consider the matter more severely. Accordingly, the winter following, he wrote to the Earl, retracing the whole paper, and answering all the material things in it. II. Mystery of Iniquity unveiled. London, 1673, 8vo. III. An Account given by T. K. a Jesuit, of the Truth of Religion examined. London, 1674, 8vo. IV. A Rational Method for proving the Truth of the Christian Religion, as it is professed in the Church of England, London, 1675, 8vo. V. A Modest Survey of the most considerable Things, in a Discourse lately published, intitled, The Naked Truth. London, 1676, 4to. We set down this piece on the authority of Anthony Wood, who ascribes it (70) to the Bishop, because he had seen it reckoned as his, in a catalogue of the Bishop's works, at the end of some other book. VI. A Vindication of the Ordinations of the Church of England, in Answer to a Paper, written by one of the Church of Rome, to prove the Nullity of our Orders. London, 1677, 8vo. VII. Preface to a Book, intitled, The Life of God in the Soul of Man, &c. London, 1691, 8vo.

[QQ] His Death. He was taken ill of a violent cold, which turned to a pleuritic fever: he was attended in it by his friend and relation, Dr Cheyne, who, finding the distemper grow to an height, called in the assistance of Sir Hans Sloane and Dr Mead. He bore the notice of his danger with calmness and resignation; and, as he preserved his senses to the last, he employed the short remainder of his life in continual acts of devotion, and giving the best advice to his family, of whom he took leave with the utmost tenderness and firmest constancy of mind (71).

(67) See the Bishop's two Memorials on this Subject, presented to the King in January 1696, and in December 1697. Life, &c. p. 713, 714.

(†) Queen Anne.

(68) See Dr Hickey's Discourses upon Dr Burnet and Dr Tillotson, p. 20. Bevil Higgons's Historical and Critical Remarks, &c. second edit. p. 159, &c. And Memoirs of the Secret Services of John Macky, Esq; &c. Lond. 1733. in Append.

(69) Reflections on Dr Hickey's Discourses, &c. p. 76.

(70) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 866.

(71) Life, &c. p. 714, 715.

his own Time [RR], with an Account of his Life annexed, has been published, in two volumes in folio, by his son Thomas Burnet, Esq; (1). Our author's publick character, and conduct as a Bishop, have been already set forth: it remains only to take a short view of him in his domestick life [SS]; to which we shall subjoin his general character, as drawn by

(1) One of the Judges of the Common Pleas.

[RR] His History of his own Time] The Bishop, by his last will and testament, ordered, that this History should not be printed 'till six years after his death, and then faithfully, without adding, suppressing, or altering it in any particular. Accordingly the first volume was printed at London in 1724, and the second in 1734, in folio. To the first volume is prefixed an advertisement, acquainting the reader, that 'the Editors intended, for the satisfaction of the publick, to deposit the copy, from which this History is printed (corrected, and interlined in many places with the author's own hand) in some publick library, as soon as the second volume should be published.' The first part of this History was written some time before the year 1705, but how long, is uncertain; only it appears it was then finished, because, in the beginning of the reign of King William and Queen Mary, the author dates the continuation of it on the first day of May 1705. What led him at first to look into the secret conduct of publick affairs, as he himself tells us (72), was the manner of his education, which being solely in the hands of his father, who had been engaged in great friendships with all parties; and took a pleasure in relating to him the series of publick transactions, he had, while very young, a greater knowledge of those matters, than is usual at that age. Besides which, he himself fell into great acquaintance and friendships with several persons, who either were, or had been, Ministers of State, from whom, when the secret of affairs was over, he studied to know as many particulars as he could draw from them. He saw likewise a great deal more among the papers of the Dukes of Hamilton, than was properly a part of their Memoirs, or fit to be told at that time. Add to this, his intimacy, for above thirty years, with all who had the chief conduct of affairs, and his own share in many of them, which enabled him to penetrate far into the true secret of counsels and designs. 'This, our author goes on (73), made me, twenty years ago, write down a relation of all that I had known to that time. Where I was in the dark, I passed over all, and only opened those transactions that I had particular occasions to know: My chief design in writing, was to give a true view of men and of counsels, leaving publick transactions to Gazettes, and the publick Historians of the times. I writ with a design to make both myself and my readers wiser and better, and to lay open the good and bad of all sides and parties, as clearly and impartially as I myself understood it; concealing nothing that I thought fit to be known, and representing things in their natural colours, without art or disguise, without any regard to kindred or friends, to parties or interests: for I do solemnly say this to the world, and make my humble appeal upon it to the great God of truth, that I tell the truth on all occasions, as fully and freely, as, upon my best enquiry, I have been able to find it out. Where things appear doubtful, I deliver them with the same incertainty to the world (74).'

Our author, then, apologizes for the severity, with which he has treated those of his own profession, his dwelling so long on the affairs of Scotland, and his inclination to think generally the worst, both of men and of parties. Lastly, as to the style of the History, he tells us (75), he purposely avoided all laboured periods and artificial strains, and that he writ it in as clear and plain a style as was possible, chusing rather a copious enlargement, than a dark conciseness. He concludes the Preface with a solemn Dedication of his work to God. There are two French translations of the first volume of this History; the one by M de la Pilloniere, the other by an anonymous translator: the first was printed at the Hague, in three volumes 12mo, 1725; the other, with cuts, at the same place, in the same year, in two volumes 4to. This last version was reprinted at Trevoux in four volumes 12mo. Bishop Burnet's History of his own Time has been severely attacked by several writers; particularly, I. By John Cockburn, D. D. in a piece, in 8vo, intitled, A Specimen of some free and impartial Remarks on publick Affairs and particular persons, especially relating to Scotland, occasioned by Dr Burnet's History of his own Times. A vindication of our author against this writer was published in 1724; to which a reply was made under the title of A Defence of Dr Cockburn, against the Vindication of Bishop Burnet. A 2d Antagonist was an anonymous writer, in a piece, intitled, A Review of Bishop Burnet's History of his own Times, particularly his Characters and secret Memoirs; with Critical Remarks, shewing the Partiality, Inconsistency, and Defects of that Political History, 8vo. III. In 1725, appeared a book, intitled, Bishop Burnet's late History charged with great Partiality and Misrepresentation, to make the present and future Ages believe, that Arthur, Earl of Essex, in 1683, murdered himself, &c. By Mr Braddon, 8vo. IV. The same year, Mr Bevil Higgons published, in 8vo, Historical and Critical Remarks on Bishop Burnet's History of his own Time. This author writes with a peculiar vehemence and sharpness of style. He tells us, in his Preface, 'It is very evident, that revenge has absolutely guided him, (the Bishop) through this History, and so darkened his understanding, as sometimes to make him fall into the grossest absurdities.' The second edition of this book is of the year 1727, with Additional Remarks, and a Postscript, in Answer to the London Journal of January 30th and February 6th, 1725. V. The late Lord Landdowne attacked our author's History, in a Letter to the Author (Mr Oldmixon) of the Reflections Historical and Political, &c. to which the Bishop's son Thomas Burnet, Esq; replied, in some Remarks upon that Letter, London, 1732, 4to. Bishop Burnet's History of his own Time concludes with a warm and affectionate address to all ranks and degrees of persons; the Clergy, the Commonalty, the Gentry, the Traders, the Nobility, the Houses of Parliament, and our Monarchs themselves; censuring the faults and errors of their conduct, giving them suitable advice, and earnestly exhorting them to the practice of virtue and religion.

[SS] A short view of him in his domestick life.] His time was employed in one regular and uniform manner. He was a very early riser, seldom in bed later than five, or six, o'clock in the morning. Private meditation took up the two first hours, and the last half hour, of the day. His first and last appearance to his family was at the morning and evening prayers, which he always read himself, tho' his Chaplains were present. He took the opportunity of the tea-table to instruct his children in religion, and in giving them his own comment upon some portion of Scripture. He seldom spent less than six, often eight hours a day in his study. He kept an open table, in which there was plenty without luxury: his equipage was decent and plain; and all his expences generous, but not profuse. He was a most affectionate husband to his wives; and his love to his children expressed itself, not so much in hoarding up wealth for them, as in giving them the best education. After his sons had perfected themselves in the learned languages, under private tutors, he sent them to the University, and afterwards abroad, to finish their studies at Leyden. In his friendships, he was warm, open-hearted, and constant; and though his station and principles raised him many enemies, he always endeavoured, by the kindest good offices, to repay all their injuries, and overcome them by returning good for evil. He was a kind and bountiful master to his servants, and obliging to all in employment under him. His charities were a principal article of his expence. He gave an hundred pounds at a time for the augmentation of small livings: he bestowed constant pensions on poor clergymen, and their widows, on students for their education at the Universities, and on industrious, but unfortunate families: he contributed frequent sums towards the repairs or building of churches and parsonage houses, to all publick collections, to the support of charity schools (one of which for fifty children at Salisbury was wholly maintained by him) and to the putting out apprentices to trades. Nor were his alms confined to one nation, sect, or party; but want, and merit, in the object, were the only measures of his liberality. He looked upon himself, with regard to his episcopal revenue, as a meer trustee for

(72) Preface, p. 42.

(73) Ibid.

(74) Ib. p. 2, 3.

(75) Ibid. p. 4.

by the Marquis of Halifax [77].

for the Church, bound to expend the whole in a decent maintenance of his station, and in acts of hospitality and charity; and he had so faithfully balanced this account, that, at his death, no more of the income of his bishoprick remained to his family, than was barely sufficient to pay his debts (76).

[77] His character, as drawn by the Marquis of Halifax. 'Dr Burnet is like all men, who are above the ordinary level, seldom spoke of in a mean; he must either be rail'd at, or admired. He has a swiftness of imagination, that no other comes up to; and as our nature hardly allows us to have enough of any thing, without having too much, he cannot at all times so hold in his thoughts, but that at some time they may run away with him; as it is hard for a vessel that is brimful, when in motion, not to run over; and therefore the variety of matter, that he ever carries about him, may throw out more, than an unkind Critick would allow of. His first thoughts may sometimes require more digestion, not from a defect in his judgment, but from the abundance of his fancy, which furnishes too fast for him. His friends love him too well, to see small faults; or if they do, think that his greater talents give him a privilege of straying from the strict rules of caution, and exempt him from the ordinary rules of censure. He produces so fast, that what is well in his writings calls for admiration, and what is incorrect deserves an excuse; he may, in some things, require grains of allowance, which those only can deny him, who are unknown or unjust to him. He is not quicker in discerning other men's faults, than he is in forgiving them; so ready, or rather glad, to acknowledge his own, that from blemishes they become ornaments. All the repeated provocations of his indecent adventures, have had no other effect, than the setting his good nature in so much a better light, since his anger never yet went farther than to pity them. That heat, which in most other men raises sharpness and fire, in him glows into warmth for his friends, and compassion for those in want and misery. As dull men have quick eyes, in discerning the smaller faults of those, that nature has made superior to them, they do not miss one blot he makes; and being beholden only to their barrenness for their discretion, they fall upon the errors, which arise out of his abundance; and, by a mistake, into which their malice betrays them, they think, that, by finding a mote in his eye, they hide the beams, that are in their own. His quickness makes writing so easy a thing to him, that his spirits are neither wasted nor sower'd by it: The soil is, not forced; every thing grows, and brings forth, without pangs; which distinguishes as much what he does, from that which smells of the lamp, as a good palate will discern between fruit, which comes from a rich mould, and that which tastes of the uncleanly pains, that have been bestowed upon it. He makes many enemies, by setting an ill-natured example of living, which they are not inclined to follow. His indifference for preferment, his contempt, not only of splendor, but of all unnecessary plenty; his degrading himself into the lowest and most painful duties of his calling; are such unprelatical qualities, that, let him be never so orthodox in other things, in these he must be a Dissenter. Virtues of such a stamp are so many heresies, in the opinion of those Divines, who have softened the primitive injunctions, so as to make them suit better with the present frailty of mankind. No wonder then, if they are angry, since it is in their own defence; or that, from a principle of self-preservation, they should endeavour to suppress a man, whose parts are a shame, and whose life is a scandal to them.' The copy, from which this is printed, in the Bishop's Life (77), was taken from one given to the Bishop, in the Marquis of Halifax's own hand-writing. T

(76) Life, &c.
p. 721—724.

(77) Ib. p. 725,
726.

BURTON (WILLIAM), a very skilful Topographer, and author of the Description of Leicestershire, was born August 24, 1575, being descended from a very ancient family [A], seated at Lindley in this county, and Falde in Staffordshire (a). After having been educated in grammar-learning at Sutton-Colfield in Warwickshire, he was admitted, in Michaelmas-term 1591, in Brasen-nose College in Oxford; where, by the benefit of a careful tutor, he got a tolerable stock of Logick and Philosophy. On the twentieth of May 1593, he became a member of the Inner-Temple, London (b); and on the twenty-second of June 1594, took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c). But, without compleating it, he went and settled in the Temple; and after having spent a due time in the study of the Law, was made a Barrister (d). However, 'the weak constitution of his body, not permitting him to practise in that laborious profession,' he 'retired to a private country life,' and gave himself up to the 'studie of Antiquities, to which he was drawn by a natural genius (e)'. Wanting neither leisure nor opportunities of improvement (as he had a considerable fortune) he became, with due diligence and application, one of the most eminent persons in the kingdom, for the knowledge of Heraldry, Genealogies, and Antiquities (f). Of which he gave an excellent specimen in his Description of Leicestershire [B], and other works

(a) See the Description of Leicestershire, by our author. Lond. 1622, fol. 177—179. And Wood's Athen. edit. 1721, Vol. II. col. 178.

(b) Descript. of Leicest. p. 68. And Wood, ubi supra.

(c) Wood, Fasti.

(d) Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

(e) Preface to his Description of Leicestershire, p. 1, 2.

(f) Wood, Ath. ibid. And Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. II. p. 222.

[A] Descended from a very ancient family. It appears from the pedigree, inserted by our author in his Description of Leicestershire (1). That, James de Burton was Squire of the body to King Richard I. and attended him to the Holy Land. His great-great-grandson Nicolas de Burton, who lived in the 14th of Edward II. married Agnes, sister and heir of John Curzun of Falde, by whom that estate came into the Burton-family. William Burton, Standard-bearer to King Henry VI. died in the 39th of that King. His grandson, James Burton, married, in 1511, Elizabeth, daughter and co-heir of John Hardwick of Lindley in Leicestershire; which Elizabeth had, for her portion, the third part of the manor of Lindley, with the capital seat. Our author's father, grandson of James last mentioned, was Ralph Burton of Lindley; born in 1547, who died the 17th of March 1619, and was buried at Higham. His wife was Dorothy, daughter of William Faunt of Poston in Leicestershire, born in 1550, and married in 1571.

[B] His Description of Leicestershire. This description was published in 1622 at London, in a small folio. The Author made afterwards very large Additions to it (which were formerly in the hands of Walter Chetwynd, of Ingsstre near Stafford, Esq;) as appears by the following original letter of his.

'Good Sir,

'UPON the first edition of my booke, I was challenged by your Ladye for that I had nothing to saye for Thedingworth; and nowe being almost ready for the second, having gotten some Roman, Saxon and other antiquities of good note, as will almost make the worke as bigg againe, to prevent that censure, I have made bould to intreate your helpe for the illustration of that towne, as also what other notes it shall (*) you to bestowc upon me, or what, in the wholl, you shall observe worthy to be corrected, of which I shall be readye to make performance. At my last being with you, you shewed me an old Knighton, which (as I remember) you said you had double: my desire is, that if the same be with you still, that it would please you to lett me, upon reasonable termes, to have the same, not doubting but that it will aford me something worthy the observance; I fawe not long synce a genealogy, wherein was a match of one of your lineall uncestors (a Cotton) that married the daughter of Sir Willin de Povile; which, for that I never did see in any before, I would intreate your ascertainment of the truth thereof; and if it shall please you, that your genealogy shall be inserted in my booke, it shall be performed works [C]. Having suffered much during the civil wars, he died at his seat of Falde in Staffordshire, on the sixth of April 1645, aged 70; and was buried in the parish church of Handbury (g). By his wife, Jane, daughter of Humphrey Adderly, of Weddington in Warwickshire, he had a son named Cassibilan, born 19 November 1609 (b), who translated Martial's epigrams into English verse; and, like a true poet, consumed most part of the estate left him by father. He died February 28, 1681 (i). As for our author; he was one of the most laborious and understanding Antiquarians of his time: and, as one styles him (k), was 'the diligence, and the great ornament of his country.' He gave to the Bodleian Library, at Oxford, Leland's Collections, and his Itinerary, which were come into his hands (l).

(1) Page 177, &c.

(*) The word please is omitted in the original.

(k) W. Burton, Comment. on Antoninus, edit. 1658, fol. p. 214.

(l) Wood, Ath. Vol. I. edit. 1721, col. 84.

'performed accordingly. I have moved my brother in lawe, Mr Grey, dwelling at the Black Boye upon London Bridge, neere Southwerke, to be the bearer hereof, that, by your appointment, he may attend whensoever it shall please you to send answere; in-treating at this tyme pardon for this overbouldnesse of him that resteth

'Ready'

Lindley 9: June: 1627:

'at your service,

William Burton.

[C] And other works.] He left behind him, I. Several Collections of Arms and Monuments, of Genealogies, and other matters of Antiquity, which he had gathered from Churches and Gentlemens houses. II. He left likewise, A Common place book of English Antiquities, in manuscript fol. collected chiefly from Leland's Itinerary; but it being written, not with his own hand, but by an illiterate person, there are innumerable faults in it (2). III. There is in the Cottonian Library, 'The foundation of ferveral religious houses in England,' collected by our author (3).

(2) Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

(3) Cotton. Libr. Julius C. vi. 19.

BURTON (HENRY) was born at Birdsfall in Yorkshire, in the year 1579 (a), and educated at St John's College in Cambridge, where he took the degrees in Arts (b). In 1612, July the 14th he was incorporated Master of Arts, at Oxford (c). He took afterwards his degree of Bachelor of Divinity. The first employment he had, was that of tutor to the sons of Robert Lord Carey of Lepington, created, in 1625, Earl of Monmouth; whose Lady (d) was governess to Prince Charles, in his infancy (e). Through this Lord's interest, probably, he was made Clerk of the Closet to Prince Henry; and, after his death, to Prince Charles (f). In 1623, he was appointed to attend that Prince into Spain; but, for what reason is unknown, was set aside, when part of his goods were shipped (g). Upon King Charles Ist's accession to the crown, he expected no less than to be continued Clerk of the Closet to him: but His Majesty giving that place to Dr Neile, Bishop of Durham, who had in that quality served his father King James I. Mr Burton was highly disgusted at this, and the forementioned affront, and expressed his resentment upon all occasions, particularly by railing against the Bishops (h). The twenty third of April 1625, he presented a letter to King Charles, wherein he remonstrated to him, how popishly affected were Dr Neile and Dr Laud his continual attendants (i); for which, and some other indiscretions, he was forbid the Court (k). About the year 1625, he was presented to the Rectory of St Matthew's in Friday-street, London (l). But, what rendered him most considerable, and caused him to be much taken notice of, was his severe prosecution in the Star-Chamber (m). For having on the fifth of November 1636, preached in his own church of St Matthew's, two sermons, published afterwards under the title of, For God and the King [A]; he was, in December following, summoned to appear before Dr Duck, one of the Commissioners for causes ecclesiastical, who tendered to him the oath ex officio, to answer to certain articles presented to him. But Burton refused to take that oath; and instead of answering, appealed to the King. However, notwithstanding his appeal, a Special High-Commission-Court being called soon after at Doctor's-Commons, he was suspended by them in his absence, both from his office and benefice. Upon that, he thought fit to conceal himself in his own house; and in that time published his two sermons, with an Apology to justify his appeal. But on the first of February, a Sergeant at Arms, with several Pursuivants and other armed officers, by virtue of a warrant from the Star-Chamber, broke open his doors, searched his study, and carried him to prison; whence the next day (February the second) he was, by an order from the Privy-Council, conveyed to the Fleet, and there kept several weeks close prisoner. During his confinement in this place, he wrote An Epistle to His Majesty; another to the Judges: and a Letter to the true hearted Nobility (n): For which, as well as for his two sermons above-mentioned, he was proceeded against in the Star-Chamber, on March the eleventh, as a seditious

(i) Wood, ubi supra.

(k) Clarendon, ubi supra.

(l) Wood, ubi supra. Newcourt could not find when he was instituted.

(m) See Rushworth's Histor. Collect. Vol. I. Part iii. edit. 1692, p. 78. and A new Discovery of the Prelates Tyranny, &c. Lond. 1641, 4to, by W. Prynce.

(n) Rushworth, ibid. It was printed Lond. 1636, 4to. See also New Discovery, &c. as above, p. 14, 15, 16, 29.

[A] Two sermons, published afterwards, &c.] The text they were preached upon, was, Proverbs xxiv. 21, 22. In these two sermons, and his Apology mentioned afterwards, he charged the Bishops (†) with 'dangerous plots to change the orthodox Religion established in England; and to bring in Romish superstition in the room of it.' And blamed them for introducing several innovations into divine worship. The chief he mentioned, were (1) — 'That in the Epistle the Sunday before Easter, they have put out In, and made it, At the name of Jesus, which alteration is directly against the Act of Parliament.—That two places are changed in the prayers set forth for the 5th of November; namely, Root out that Baby- lonish and Antichristian Sect, which say, &c. is thus altered, Root out that Babylonish and Antichristian Sect of them which say. Next, Cut off those workers of iniquity whose religion is rebellion, &c. was, in the book printed in 1635, thus altered, Cut off those workers of iniquity, who turne religion into rebellion.—That the Prayer for the Navy is left out of the late booke for the fast.—That the placing the communion-table altar wise, at the upper-end of the chancel, is done to advance and usher in Popery.—That the second service, as dainties, is said there.—That bowing towards the altar, is worshipping the table, or God knows what.'

Athen. ubi supra.
See The Description of Leicestershire, by our author, p. 179.
Wood, Ath. above.

a) He was 67 years of age in 1646, and consequently must have been born in 1579. See A. Wood, Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. f. 111, col. 192.

b) Wood, ibid.

c) Ibid. He was incorporated there again M. A. July 14, 1617, ibid. col. 107.

d) Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Hugh Trevanion, of Corriehigh in Cornwall, Knt. Dugdale's Baron. Vol. II. p. 398.

e) Wood, ibid. and T. Fuller's Church History, Book xi. p. 152.

f) Wood, ubi supra.

g) Fuller, ibid.

h) Lord Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, 6 Vols 8vo, Lond. 1733, Vol. I. p. 200.

(†) Page 5.

(1) Apologie, &c. p. 2, 3, 4, 5, 105.

feditious libeller. In the mean time, Mr Prynne, who was prosecuted with him, fearing they should not be permitted to make a full answer to their information, draws up a cross-bill against the Archbishop, and others; wherein he charged them, 'which usurping upon His Majesties Prerogative-Royal; with innovations in religion; licensing of Popish and Arminian books, &c.' Having signed it, they tendred it to the Lord Keeper; who refused to admit it: and accordingly it was suppressed (+). But it is to be observed, that the Court had a great desire of making their crime amount, if possible, to high-treason. For, June 6, 1637, all the Judges, and the King's Counsel, met at Serjeants-Inn (o), about seditious books written and dispersed by Mr Burton, and Dr Bastwick. But, nothing being found in Burton's books, whereon to ground an indictment for treason, he was proceeded against, as I observed above, in the Star-Chamber. The scope of the information against him, was (p), for writing and publishing seditious, schismatical, and libellous books, against the Hierarchy of the Church, and to the scandal of the government. To this information, he (and Bastwick and Prynne, who were indicted with him) prepared answers. But their counsel refused to sign them, for fear of offending the Court of Star-Chamber. Whereupon, the defendants petitioned the Court, that, according to antient precedents, they might sign their answers with their own hands; declaring, they would abide by the censure of the Court, if they did not make good what was contained therein. But this was refused by the Court, unless they brought their answers signed by counsel. Mr Burton's answer was at length signed by Mr Holt, a Bencher of Gray's-Inn; who afterwards withdrew his hand, because the other counsel out of fear, would not subscribe it. However, Mr Burton tendred it to the Court, desiring it might be accepted, or Mr Holt ordered to new sign it. Whereupon, the Court ordered, that it might be received under the hand of Mr Holt alone; which was accordingly done. After it had lain in Court near three weeks, upon the Attorney-General's suggestion to the Court, on the nineteenth of May, that it was scandalous; it was referred to the two Chief-Justices, Sir John Brampton and Sir John Finch, to consider of, and to expunge what was contained therein as unfit to be brought into Court, or otherwise impertinent and scandalous (+). They expunged sixty-four whole sheets, that is the whole answer, except six lines at the beginning, and about twenty-four at the latter end. Soon after a person came to the Fleet, to examine Mr Burton upon interrogatories grounded on his answer. But hearing how much had been expunged out of it, he refused to be examined, unless his answer might be admitted as it was put in; or he permitted to put in a new answer. Which not being allowed of, it was ordered by the Court, on the second of June, that if he would not answer to interrogatories framed upon his answer, he should be proceeded against pro confesso; his obstinacy being looked upon as a self-conviction. On the day of the sentence, which was June 14, 1637, Burton and the two other defendants standing at the bar, the Court caused the information to be read; and no legal answer being put in in time, nor filed on record, the Court began for this contempt, to proceed to sentence. But the defendants, before the Court spake, cried out for justice—that their answers might be read, and that they might not be condemned unheard. Nevertheless, because their answers were not filed on record, the Court proceed to give this sentence (q); namely, to fine Burton and the others, five thousand pounds a-piece, and to order, that He in particular, should be deprived of his ecclesiastical benefice, degraded from his ministerial function, and degrees in the University; should be set on the pillory, and both his ears cut off there; confined to perpetual close imprisonment in Lancashire-castle; debarred the access of his wife, or any other, except his keeper, and denied the use of pen, ink, and paper. All which (except the fine) was executed accordingly. For, June the twenty-seventh, he was degraded by Sir John Lamb, in St Paul's; and, the thirtieth of the same month, was set in the pillory (r) in the Palace-yard Westminster [B], where his ears were cut off in a barbarous manner. For they were pared so close, that the temporal artery was cut, which made the blood stream in great abundance upon the scaffold, and yet he never shrunk at the pain (s). After

[B] He was set in the pillory in the Palace-yard, Westminster.] Where he made a long speech, not entire and continued, but interrupted with occasional expressions. The main design of it was, to parallel his sufferings with our Saviour's. For, at the first sight of the pillory, 'Methinks, said he, I see Mount Calvary where the three crosses were pitched.' [For there were three pillories, one for himself, and a double one for Bastwick and Prynne] 'If Christ was numbered among thieves, shall a Christian think much, for his sake, to be numbered amongst rogues (+), such as we are condemned to be? Surely if I be a rogue, I am Christ's rogue, and no man's.'—Shortly after he said to his wife, 'See thou be not sad, for I would not have thee to dishonour the day, or to darken the glory of it, by shedding one tear, or fetching one sigh; for behold there, for thy comfort, my triumphant chariot, on the which I must ride for the honour of my lord and master: And never was my wedding-day so well-come, and so joyful a day, as this day is.'—When he was put in the pillory, he said,— 'Good people, I am brought hither to be a spectacle

' to the world, to angels, and to men; and howsoever I stand here to undergo the punishment of a rogue, yet except to be a faithful servant to Christ, and a loyal subject to the King, be the property of a rogue, I am no rogue. But yet, if to be Christ's faithful servant, and the King's loyal subject, deserve the punishment of a rogue, I glory in it, and, I bless God, my conscience is clear.'—Some asking him, 'If the pillory were not uneasy, for his neck and shoulders?' He answered, 'How can Christ's yoke be uneasy? This is Christ's yoke, and he bears the heavier end of it, and I the lighter; and if mine were too heavy, he would bear that too.'—One of the guards having an old rusty halberd, the iron whereof was tacked to the staff with an old crooked nail; one said, 'What an old rusty halberd is that?' To which Burton replied, 'This seems to me to be one of those halberts, which accompanied Judas when he went to betray and apprehend his master.'—A friend asking him, 'If he would have been without this particular suffering?' To whom he said, 'No, not for a world (z).'

[C] And

(+) New Discovery, &c. p. 19, 20.

(o) 13 Carol. I. See Ruthworth's Historical Collect. Vol. I. Part. ii. p. 324.

(p) Ruthworth's Collect. Vol. I. Part ii. p. 350. See the article BASTWICK (JOHN).

(+) New Discovery, &c. as above, p. 27, 28, 41.

(q) Ruthworth, ubi supra; and Part iii. Vol. I. p. 70. and Prynne's New Discovery, &c. p. 43. And The Censure, ibid. p. 25, &c.

(r) Fuller's Ch. History, Book xi. p. 153.

(s) Fuller, ubi supra, p. 154. Prynne, ubi supra, p. 57.

(+) This was no great compliment to his fellow-sufferers Prynne and Bastwick.

(z) Prynne's New Discovery and Censure, &c. p. 46—56.

After that, he was sent to Lancaster-Castle, in August, and imprisoned there in the common goal (y). But great crowds, who pitied his misfortunes, resorting to him there; and he finding means to have some of his virulent papers dispersed in London (z): he was, after a twelve weeks confinement in that place, removed, by an order of council, to Cornet-Castle in the isle of Guernsey, in October 1637, where he remained a close prisoner almost three years. But on November 7, 1640, his wife, Sarah Burton, presented a petition to the House of Commons (a), complaining, of the severe sentence of the Court of Star-Chamber, inflicted upon her husband in the pillory; and that, by a particular order, she was not to be permitted to come and visit him. Whereupon the House ordered on the tenth (x), that her husband should be forthwith sent for to the Parliament, in safe custody, by warrant of the House, directed to the Governor of the isle where he was prisoner, and to the Captain of the castle there; and that the cause of his detainer, might be certified also to the House (y). Accordingly, a warrant was signed by the Speaker, to the Governor and Captain of the castle of Guernsey; which was sent with all possible expedition (z). Mr Burton, and Mr Prynne, (who was now released from his confinement in Montorgueil-Castle in Jersey) landed at the same time at Dartmouth, on the twenty-second of November, where they were received and entertained with extraordinary demonstrations of affection and esteem; attended by a marvellous conflux of company; and their charges not only borne with great magnificence, but liberal presents given to them. And this method and ceremony, kept their company all their journey, great numbers of people meeting them at their entrance into all towns, and waiting upon them out, with wonderful acclamations of joy. When they came near London, multitudes of people of several conditions, some on horseback, others on foot, met them some miles from the town; very many having been a day's journey; and they were brought, about two of the clock in the afternoon, in at Charing-Cross, and carried into the city by above ten thousand persons, with boughs and flowers in their hands (a); the common people strewing flowers and herbs in the ways as they passed, making great noise, and expressions of joy for their deliverance and return; and in those acclamations, mingling loud and virulent exclamations against the Bishops (b). On the fifth of December, Mr Burton presented a petition to the House of Commons, wherein he set forth his sufferings (c). In consequence of which, the House resolved on the twelfth of March following (d), that the suspending of him, the breaking open his house, and arresting him without any cause shown, and his imprisonment thereupon; and the searching and seizing of his books and papers, was against law, and the liberty of the subject; and that he ought to have reparation and recompence, for the damages sustained by those proceedings [C]. The twenty-fourth of the same month, they further resolved (e), that the sentence against him was illegal, and ought to be reversed; that he be freed from the fine of five thousand pounds, and from imprisonment, and restored to his degrees in the University, orders in the Ministry, and to his ecclesiastical benefice in Friday-street London. And also have recompence for his imprisonment, and for the loss of his cars: which, on the twentieth of April, they voted should be six thousand pounds (f). But the ensuing confusions in the kingdom, prevented his receiving that sum (g). However in October 1642, he was restored to his living of St Matthew's; Mr Chestlin, the then incumbent, being worried out of it (h). Burton after this, declared himself an Independent, and complied with all the alterations that ensued. But we are told by A. Wood (i), that when he saw what strange courses the Parliament took, he grew more moderate. He was buried January 7, 1647-8 (k). And therefore A. Wood is mistaken, when he says (l), that he lived 'till after the beheading of his old master, King Charles I. Besides the books abovementioned, for which he was so severely punished, he writ many other things; of which there is an account in the note [D].

[C] And that he ought to have reparation and recompence for the damages sustained by those proceedings] It was at the same time resolved upon the question, 'That the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishop of London, the Earl of Arundell and Surrey, the Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, Sir Henry Vane, and Sir John Cooke, and Sir Francis Windebanke,' (who had signed the warrant at the council-board for his close imprisonment) 'should make reparation to Mr Burton for his damages sustained by his imprisonment (3).'

[D] He writ many other things. They are as follow: 'I. A Censure of Simony. Lond. 1624. II. A Pea to an Appeal, traversed Dialogue-wise. Lond. 1625. III. The baiting of the Pope's Bull. Lond. 1627. IV. A Tryal of private Devotions, or a Dyal for the hours of Prayer. Lond. 1628. V. Israel's Fast; or Meditations on the 7th Chp. of Joshua. Lond. 1628. VI. Seven Vials, or an Exposition on the 15th and 16th Chapters of the Revelations. Lond. 1628. VII. Babel no Bethel; i. e. The Church of Rome no true visible Church of Christ, being an answer to Hugh Cholmeley's Challenge, and Robert Butterfield's Maschil. VIII. Truth's Triumph over Trent, or the great Galph between Sion and Babylon. 1628. The irreconcilable opposition between the Apostolick Church of Christ and the apostate Synagogue of Antichrist, in the main and fundamental ' Doctrine of Justification. Lond. 1629. IX. The Law and the Gospel reconciled against the Antinomians. Lond. 1631. 4to. X. Christian's Bulwark, or the Doctrine of Justification. Lond. 1632. 4to. XI. Exceptions against a passage in Dr Jackson's Treatise of the Divine Essence and Attributes. XII. The sounding of the two last Trumpets; or Meditations on the 9th, 10th, and 11th Chapters of the Revelations. Lond. 1641. 4to. XIII. The Protestation protested, or a short Remonstrance, shewing what is principally required of all those that have, or do take the last parliamentary protestation. Lond. 1641. 4to. XIV. Relation of Mr Chillingworth. XV. A Narration of his own Life. Lond. 1643. 4to. XVI. A vindication of Independent Churches, in answer to Mr Prynne's two books of Church-Government, and of Independency. Lond. 1645. 4to. XVII. Parliament's Power for Laws in Religion. 1645. 4to. XVIII. Vindicie Veritatis: Truth vindicated against calumny. In a brief answer to Dr Bailewick's two late Books, entitled, Independency not God's Ordinance. Lond. 1645. 4to. XIX. Truth shut out of doors: or a brief Narrative of the occasion and manner of proceeding of Aldermanbury-parish, in shutting their Church-Door against him. Lond. 1645. 4to. XX. Conformity's deformity, in a Dialogue between Conformity and Conscience. Lond. 1646. 4to. (4)'

(g) Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, Vol. II. Lond. 1733, 8vo, p. 385.

(h) Mercurius Rusticus, 1645, 12mo, p. 146, &c.

(i) Fashi, Vol. I. col. 192.

(k) R. Smith's Obituary in Peck's Desiderata Curiosa, Vol. II. Book xiv. p. 22.

(l) Ibid.

1) Rushworth's Hist. Collect. at iii. Vol. I. 79.

2) Lord Clarendon, Vol. I. 800, lit. Oxford, 1733; p. 2 o.

3) Rushworth's Hist. Collect. at iii. Vol. I. 20.

4) Diurnal Occurrence of Parliament, Lond. 641, 4to, p. 2.

5) Rushworth's Hist. Collect. at iii. Vol. I. 20.

6) Lord Clarendon, Vol. I. 201.

7) There could be but very few flowers, in the latter end of November, when this happened.

8) Lord Clarendon, ubi supra. 201, 202. Fuller's Church Hist. Book xi. 172. Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, Vol. II. edit. 1733, 8vo, p. 385. And Prynne, p. 13.

9) Rushworth, ubi supra, p. 78.

10) Ibid. p. 207. And Prynne, ubi supra, p. 139.

11) Rushworth, ubi supra, p. 213.

12) Diurnal Occurrences, or Daily Proceedings of both Houses, &c. Lond. 1641, 4to, p. 83.

13) Prynne, ubi supra, p. 140.

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. edit. 1721, Vol. II. col. 923. And his epitaph in Westminster-Abbey.

(b) Wood, Ibid.

(c) Idem, Fashi, Vol. I. col. 240.

(d) Ibid. col. 252.

(e) Wood's Athen ubi supra. See Walker's Sufferrings of the Clergy, &c. edit. 1714, fol. Part ii. p. 74.

(f) From his epitaph.

(g) Wood, Ath. ubi supra. Arcana Dogmatum Anti-Remonstrantium, Lond. 1659, 12mo, by L. Womock.

(h) J. le Neve's Fashi, &c. edit. 1716, fol. p. 372.

(i) Ibid. p. 40.

(k) Wood's Fashi, Vol. II. col. 137.

(l) Bishop Kennet's Register and Chronicle, &c. Lond. 1728, fol. p. 412.

BUSBY (RICHARD) the most eminent Schoolmaster in his time, was the second son of Richard Busby, of the City of Westminster; Gent. but born at Lutton in Lincolnshire, September 22, 1606 (a). He received his education at Westminster-school, as a King's Scholar; and in 1624, was elected student of Christ-Church (b). The twenty-first of October 1628, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (c); and that of Master June 18, 1631 (d); at which time he was esteemed a great Master of the Greek and Latin tongues, and a compleat Orator [A]. On the first of July 1639, he was admitted to the Prebend and Rectory of Cudworth, with the chapel of Knowle annexed, in the church of Wells; of which he lost the profits during the civil wars; but found means to keep his Student's place, and other preferment (e). He was appointed Master of Westminster-school, December 13, 1640 (f); in which laborious station he continued above fifty-five years, and bred up the greatest number of learned scholars, that ever adorned any age or nation. But he met with great uneasiness from the second Master, Edward Bagshaw; who being a busy and pragmatial man, endeavoured to supplant him, but was himself removed out of his place for his insolence [B], in May 1658 (g). After the Restoration of King Charles II. Mr Busby's merit and reputation being taken notice of, his Majesty conferred on him a Prebend of Westminster, into which he was installed July 5, 1660 (h); and the eleventh of August following, he was made Treasurer and Canon-Residentiary of the church of Wells (i). The nineteenth of October 1660, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity (k). At the coronation of King Charles II. on the twenty-third of April 1661, he carried the Ampulla (l). In the Convocation which met June the twenty-fourth, the same year, he was Proctor for the Chapter of Bath and Wells; and one of those who approved and subscribed the Common-Prayer-Book (m). He gave two hundred and fifty pounds, towards repairing and beautifying Christ-Church College and Cathedral (n); and founded and endowed two Lectures in the same College, one for the Oriental Languages, and another for the Mathematicks; giving moreover a hundred pounds, to repair the room in which they were to be read. He contributed also to the repair of Lichfield-church (o). As for his many other benefactions, they are not upon record, because they were done in a private manner. This great man, after a long, healthy, and laborious life, died April 6, 1695, aged 89 (p); and was buried in Westminster-Abbey, where there is a curious monument erected to him [C]. He composed several books for the use of his school [D]. With regard to his character, we are told, that he was very well acquainted with all parts of learning, especially Philology; which he had chiefly acquired by his own diligence and industry. Of his singular skill in Grammar, his works in that kind are undeniable and sufficient proofs. Notwithstanding his being the greatest master of it, he was the freest man in the world from that pedantick humour and carriage, which makes most of that profession ridiculous to the more sensible

(m) Ibid. p. 480. 584.

(n) Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. I. ii. p. 254.

(o) Survey of the Cathedrals of York, &c. by Br. Willis, Esq; Vol. 1. p. 376.

(p) See his epitaph; and Wood's Athenæ, ubi sup.

[A] And a compleat Orator. As also a very good actor, as appeared from the part he acted with great applause in the comedy called The Royal Slave, written by William Cartwright: which was acted before King Charles I. and his Queen, at Christ-church, by the Students of that house, on the 30th of August 1636 (1).

[B] But was himself removed out of his place for his insolence. Bagshaw published an account of the quarrel between him and Dr Busby, under this title: 'A true and perfect Narration of the Differences between Mr Busby and Mr Bagshaw, the first and second Masters of Westminster-school.' Lond. 1659. in four sheets, 4to (2).—One Owen Price, an Independent, endeavoured, likewise, to supplant Mr Busby about the same time, and to come into his place (3).

[C] Where there is a curious monument erected to him. On which is the following inscription. En infra posita, qualis hominum oculis versabatur, Busbeii imaginem. Si eam quæ in animis altius insedit ultra desideras, Academiæ utriusque, & fori Lumina, Aulæ, fenatus, atque ecclesiæ, Principes viros contemplare: Cumque fatam ab illo ingeniorum messem Tam variam tamque uberem lustraveris, Quantum is effect qui severit cogita. Is certe erat, Qui insitam cuique a Natura indolem Et acute perpexit, Et exercuit commode, Et feliciter promovit. Is erat, qui adolescentium animos Ita docendo finxit, aluitque, Ut tam sapere discerent, quam fari; Dumque pueri instituebantur, Sensum succrescerent viri. Quotquot illius disciplina penitus imbuti In publicum prodire, Tot adeptæ est monarchia, Tot ecclesiæ Anglicanæ Propugnatores, Fidos omnes, plerosque strenuos. Quæcunq; demum sit fama Scholæ Westmonasteriensis, quicquid inde ad homines fructus redundarit, Busbeio maxime debetur, Atque in omne porro ævum debebitur. Tam utilem patriæ civem Multis annis opibusque voluit florere, Deus: Vicissim ille Pietati promovendæ Se, & sua alacris devovit: Pauperibus subvenire, Literatos fovere, Templâ inaurare, Id illi erat divitiis frui; Et hos in usus, Quicquid non crogarat vivus, Legavit moriens.

Richardus Busby, Lincolnienfis S. T. P.

Natus est Lutoniæ ——— 1606 Sept. 22.

Scholæ Westmonast. præfectus est 1640 Dec. 23.

Sedem in { Westm. Præbend. } Obtinuit. { July 5. Eccles. } Wellensî Theaur. } A. D. 1660 { Aug. 11. Obit ——— 1695. Apr. 5.

The substance of which is. 'You see below a representation of Busby's body (4), and outward appearance. If you would see his inward qualifications, behold the lights of both Universities. And of Westminster-hall, the chief men at Court, in the Parliament, and in the Church. And when you perceive, how large and how plentiful a harvest of ingenious men was sown by him, consider how great was the sower. He was a person, very sagacious in finding out every one's genius and disposition, and no less industrious in employing them to advantage, and forwarding them successively. He was a person, who so formed and trained up the minds of youth by his instructions, that they learned at the same time both to speak and to be wise; and whilst they were instructed by him as boys, they insensibly grew up to be men. As many scholars as he sent out into the world, so many faithful, and in general brave, champions, did Church and State obtain. Whatever reputation Westminster school enjoys, whatever advantage has thence accrued, is chiefly due to Busby, and will for ever be due to him. So useful a man God blessed with long life, and crowned with riches. And he, on his part, cheerfully devoted himself, and his possessions, to the promoting of piety. To relieve the poor; to support and encourage learned men; to repair churches; That, he thought, was truly enjoying his riches. And what he employed not upon those good uses in his life-time, he bequeathed to the same at his death.'—The rest contains only an account of his birth and death, and of his several promotions, already mentioned above.

[D] He composed several books for the use of his school. Namely the following, I. 'A short Institution

(4) There is, on his monument, his statue in full proportion, and very like him.

(1) Wood, Ath. ubi supra, col. 35, 923. And Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. I. p. 344, 345.

(2) Wood, Ath. Vol. II. col. 449.

(3) See Fr. Peck's Defiderata Curiosa, &c. Vol. II. edit. 1735, lib. xiii. p. 20, 21.

fenfible part of the world. No one ever trained up a greater number of eminent men, both in Church and State, than himself; which was a plain demonstration, of his uncommon skill and diligence in his profession. He extremely liked, and even applauded, and rewarded, wit in any of his scholars, though it reflected upon himself; of which many instances are still remembered. We are further told, that there was an agreeable mixture of severity and sweetness in his manners; so that if his carriage was grave, it was at the same time civil, and full of good nature, as his conversation was always modest and learned; but in his school he was extremely severe. His piety was unfeigned and without affectation, and his steadfast zeal to the Church, and loyalty to the Crown, were eminent, and not without trials in the worst of times. But his greatest virtue was charity, in the discharge whereof none ever took more care, than his right-hand should not know what his left did. As to his constitution of body; he was healthy to such a degree, that his old age proved altogether free from those diseases and infirmities, which most commonly attend other persons; and as this was the consequence and reward of his chastity, sobriety, and temperance, so he spent this bodily strength, altogether upon his indefatigable labours, in the education of youth in Westminster-school; which he never remitted till he was released of it by death, to which he submitted with the utmost constancy and patience (q).

(q) J. Crull, M. D. in his Antiquities of Westminster-Abbey, edit. 1715, 8vo, p. 241, 242.

* tution of Grammar for the use of Westminster-school.' Camb. 1647. 8vo. II. Juvenalis et Persii Satyræ. Lond. 1656. purged of all obscene passages. III. * An English Introduction to the Latin tongue, for the use of the Lower Forms in Westminster-school.' Lond. 1659 &c. 8vo. IV. Martialis Epigrammata selecta. Lond. 1661. 12mo. cleared of all obscenities. V. Græcæ Grammaticæ rudimenta in usum Scholæ Westmonasteriensis. Lond. 1663. 8vo. VI. Nomenclatura brevis reformatâ, adjectio cum Syllabâ Verborum & Adjectivorum. At the end, is printed, Duplex Centenarius Proverbiorum Anglo-Latino-Græcorum. Lond. 1667. &c. 8vo. VII. Αἰθολογία & Δευτέρια: sive Græcorum Epigrammatum Florilegium novum. Cum aliis veterum Poematis, &c. Lond. 1673. &c. 8vo. VIII. Rudimentum Anglo-Latinum, Grammaticæ literalis & numeralis, in usum Scholæ regię Westmonast. Lond. 1688. 8vo. IX. Rudimentum Grammaticæ Græco-Latinæ metricum, in usum nobilium puerorum in Schola regię Westmon. Lond. 1689. 8vo. Mr Wood supposes, that some of these pieces might be composed by his Uihers (5).

(5) Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

BUTLER or BOTELEK, the name of a noble family, which, for the great services they have done the British crown, have been raised to titles of honour in all the three kingdoms. The antiquity of this family is so great, that it appears to have surpassed the skill of our ablest Antiquaries, to fix the origin of it with any degree of exactness (a). Indeed they have been so far from doing this, that some have suggested the original surname of the family was Walter, others again have inclined to think it Becket, and there want not those who declare in favour of le Boutiller or Butler, against them all (b) [A]. But whatever obscurity there may be in regard to the state of the family in those times, there is nothing more certain, than that Theobald, who was declared Butler of Ireland in the very beginning of the XIIIth century, established in that kingdom a most honourable

(a) Monast. Ang. Vol. II. p. 1025, n. 11, 46. Dugdale's Baron. Vol. I. p. 633, 634. Thynne's alias Lancafter's Genealogical Account of the Botelers of Kent.

(b) Carte's Introduction to the Life of James Duke of Ormond, p. iii.

[A] Who declare in favour of le Boutiller or Butler against them all.] We are told, that Mr Roberts, Ulster King of Arms in Ireland, took a great deal of pains in compiling a Genealogical History of the family of Ormond, and therein he labours to prove, that the name of the family was originally Walter, or Water; and in support of this, he brings a great number of instances, from which it appears, that Theobald, after he was Butler of Ireland, inscribed Theobald Walter to charters of King John; and he likewise shews, that his descendants preserved the surname of Walter, down to the time of James the first Earl of Ormond, who styled himself, Jacobus Walter Pincerna Hiberniæ

(1). We are likewise told in support of this notion, that Walter is also a name of office, and that it signifies the ruler over any of the King's forests, and this upon the authority of Richard Verstegan (2); but as that writer is not very correct, I am apt to think he is a little mistaken here, and that the office he means, was styled, not Walter, but Waldgrave, and that Walter is a contraction or corruption of Waldtheer, i. e. the Lord or owner of a wood (3), answering to the word Sylvester or Sylvius, so that taking all this together, it is not at all improbable, that the father of Theobald might use this surname. Sir Robert Rothe, who put the last hand to another very laborious account of the descent of this noble family, which was written by his father, a Barrister at Law, and Counsel to Thomas, Earl of Ormond, in Queen Elizabeth's time, declares expressly for the surname of Becket, and will have Theobald, Butler of Ireland, to be the son of Walter Fitz Gilbert, i. e. son of Gilbert Becket, and many writers concur in deriving this family from Walter Becket, a younger brother of Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury (4). That the Earls of Ormond were descended some way or other from the family of Becket, is asserted in an Act of Parliament, but this does not prove, that the surname of the family was Becket, since they might be descended as well by marriage, which notion may be supported from two pedigrees, wherein it is so laid down; but as these pedigrees are inconsistent with each other, so the Reverend Mr Carte has clearly shewn, that they are irreconcilable to truth (5). But the Reverend of Mr John Butler, a Clergyman in Northamptonshire, being dissatisfied with all the accounts he had met with, and even with that of the famous Sir William Dugdale's (6), who, to say the truth, speaks very cautiously of this family, being sensible of the imperfections of his materials; resolved to set this whole matter in a new light, and the story he tells us, is this: That Richard I. Duke of Normandy had, besides his son Richard II. by Gunora, another son by a Lady whom he does not mention, whose name was Geoffry Count of Brionis; who had issue Gifflebert, who was guardian to William the Conqueror. He had also two sons, Richard Earl of Clare, and Baldwin. This Richard Earl of Clare, was Cup-bearer in ordinary to William I. and had five sons; Gilbert, Roger, Walter, Robert, and Richard; these two last-mentioned, often supplying their father's place, took from thence the surname of Bouteillers. Robert, after his father's death, became Cup-bearer to Henry I. and had issue Walter, and other sons. Walter succeeded him as Cup-bearer, and was Baron of Baynard-castle; and the eldest son of this Walter was Herveus, who was the father of Theobald, the first Butler of Ireland (7). This Reverend Gentleman has taken a great deal of pains to shew, that the surname of Botiller was much antienter than the grant of this office to Theobald, whence he would infer, that the surname of the family was not either Walter or Becket, but Botiller or Butler. All this very evidently demonstrates, that it is a fruitless thing to expect either exactness or certainty in matters of this nature; and, indeed, having looked into the pedigrees of several families of this name in England, I find different accounts of it's origin in almost every one of them.

(5) Id. Ibid.

(6) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 305.

(7) Carte's Introduction, p. cxi.

1) See an Account of this performance, and the arguments contained therein, in the Rev. Mr Carte's Introduction, p. xi.

2) Refutation of decay'd Intelligence, Antwerp, 606, p. 329.

3) Gottheldt, antiq. Germ. 359.

4) Carte's Introduction, p. ix, x.

honourable and potent house, which by the great services they rendered the crown; by their intermarriages with the noblest families in England and Ireland; and by being intrusted with the most honourable and profitable employments in the government; acquired to themselves vast possessions (c); so that King Edward II, in the ninth year of his reign, was pleased to create, by patent under the great-seal, dated at Lincoln Sept. 1, 1315, Edmund le Botiller, Earl of Karryke or Carrick, who was afterwards raised to be chief governor of Ireland, under the title of Guardian or Lord Justice of that kingdom (d). His son James le Botiller, who married Eleanor, daughter of Humphry de Bohun Earl of Hereford and Essex, and Constable of England, by Elizabeth daughter of Edward I, was, in consideration of that marriage, created, by Edward III, Earl of Ormond, which being a large territory, whereas Carrick was only a manor, the family bore this title; and, in succeeding times, seldom used that of their more antient honour (e). It was to the same person, and on account of the same marriage, that King Edward III. granted by patent, dated at Wallingford November 9, 1358, the regalities and liberties of Tipperary, and the rights of a palatine in that county (f). He died January 6, 1307-8, and was succeeded by his son James the second, commonly called the noble Earl, on account of his being great-grandson to King Edward I. In 1359, he was appointed Lord Justice of Ireland, and on July 24, 1376, he was again entrusted with that power, with an appointment of five hundred pounds a year, which was the usual salary (g). He died Octob. 18, 1382, and was succeeded by his son James the third Earl of Ormond, who had also the honour to be appointed Lord Justice of Ireland by King Richard II, July 25, 1392. He was afterwards made Constable of Ireland by King Henry IV, who also entrusted him with the office of Lord Justice of that kingdom, in possession of which he died, Sept. 7, 1405 (h). He left two sons, James, the fourth Earl of Ormond, and Sir Richard le Botiller. This Earl of Ormond had a very remarkable honour done him, for he was appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland before he was of age, by commission dated the eighteenth of December, in the ninth year of the reign of Henry IV. In 1420, he was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland by King Henry V, and several times after enjoyed the same honour (i). He died August 23, 1452, and left behind him three sons, James, John, and Thomas. The first of these, styled James, the fifth Earl of Ormond, was, in 1449, created, by King Henry VI, Earl of Wiltshire, two years after he was appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland, and adhering steadily to King Henry VI, he was not only appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland for ten years, but was twice made High-Treasurer of England, and honoured with the Garter. He had a large share in the battle of Wakefield, fought December 21, 1460, in which the Duke of York was killed, but being taken prisoner the year following at the bloody battle of Towton in Yorkshire, he was beheaded on the first of May 1461, at Newcastle (k). His brother John, who was with him in that battle, was attainted, but, by the kindness of Edward IV, he was restored in blood, and succeeded to the earldom of Ormond. He was looked upon as one of the finest gentlemen of that age, and was sent Ambassador to several Courts of Europe; but, in a fit of devotion, making a journey to Jerusalem, he died in the Holy Land in 1478 (l). Thomas, his younger brother, being restored in blood, succeeded him as Earl of Ormond, who was of the Privy-Council in England to King Henry VII, and summoned to Parliament there by the title of Lord Rochford. He died in 1515, and left issue two daughters, the youngest of which, Margaret, married Sir William Bullen, Knight of the Bath, by whom she had Sir Thomas Bullen (m). Sir Pierce Butler, grandson to Sir Richard Butler, second son of James the third Earl of Ormond, succeeded to that title, and to all the estates of the family in Ireland, of which he was appointed Lord Deputy in 1521, and in 1524 he was made Lord Treasurer of that kingdom. He had great disputes there with the potent family of Fitzgerald, and finding himself oppressed by their interest at Court, he came over here to solicit for redress (n). At this time, King Henry VIII being much enamoured of the Lady Anne Bullen, prevailed upon Sir Pierce Butler to resign his earldom of Ormond, that he might bestow it upon her father, with which proposition he complied, though probably very unwillingly, and because he durst not refuse it (†) [B].

He

[B] Probably very unwillingly, and because he durst not refuse it.] It is strange to see what lengths princes will go to gratify their passions. Sir Thomas Bullen was, indeed, the grandson of Thomas Earl of Ormond, and the grand-nephew of James Earl of Wiltshire and Ormond; but both his father and his uncle had been attainted for their adherence to the house of Lancaster; yet now the King was fond of seeing the former title revived, and the latter added to it, in favour of a person whose daughter he thought fit to marry; and therefore, not satisfied with raising to him the title of Viscount Rochford, and to the Order of the Garter, he, on the 8th of December, 1530, created him Earl of Wiltshire and Ormond, limiting the former honour to the heirs male of his body, and the latter to his heirs general (8); and, on the 24th of January following, he was made Lord Privy-seal, which however did not hinder him from having the dismal mortification of sitting in judgment upon his daughter, when the King thought fit to proceed against her, in order to take away her life. With that unfortunate Princess, died her brother George Viscount Rochford, who was also attainted, and left no issue; and, in 1539, Thomas Earl of Wiltshire and Ormond departed this life (9), which renders it not easy to apprehend what is said by the Historian of the Ormond family, as to Peter Earl of Ossory's being restored to the title of Ormond, February the 22d, 1537-8, because then Sir Thomas Bullen was living, or Sir William Dugdale is much mistaken as to the time of his death. The Act of Parliament mentioned in the text, was made in the 35th year of the King, and seems to be intended to secure effectually the honour of Ormond to James, the then Earl, and his heirs male, with the like precedency as the ancient Earls of Ormond had. This was a point of justice certainly due to the family, and seems to be one

(c) Laurence's State of Ireland, p. 195.

(d) See the patent in Carte's Introduction, Cox's Hist. Ireland, Vol. I. p. 95.

(e) By which the Rev. Mr. Carte suggests, the Kildare family gained precedence of that of Ormond. Selden's Titles of Honour, p. 639.

(f) Carte's Introduction, p. xxxiii.

(g) Lib. CCC. Lambeth. Historic Account of the Government of the Lordship and Kingdom of Ireland from Records, MS. Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. I. p. 125.

(h) Annal. Hibern. ad ann. 1405. Cox's History, Vol. I. p. 145.

(i) Historical Account of the Governors of Ireland.

(k) Dugdale's Baron. Vol. II. p. 235.

(l) Carte's Introduction, p. xlii.

(m) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 385.

(n) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. I. p. 220.

(†) Lib. G Lambeth, p. 121. Selden's Titles of Honour, p. 640.

(8) i. Pat. 21. Hen. VIII. p. 2, Decemb. 8.

(9) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 306.

He was thereupon created with great pomp at Windsor, Feb. 23, 1527-8, Earl of Ossory, and, besides other gratifications, he was appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland, which he held for several years, and, in process of time, on the death of Sir Thomas Bullen, he was restored to the title of Earl of Ormond, which was afterwards confirmed to his son by Act of Parliament (o). This Pierce or Peter, Earl of Ormond and Ossory, died Aug. 26, 1539, leaving two sons, James and Richard, the latter of whom was created, by King Edward VI. Viscount Mountgarret, which honour continues in his posterity. James, the eldest son, was, in his father's life-time, created Viscount Thurles, and enjoyed most of the great offices of the kingdom, succeeded his father as Earl of Ormond and Ossory, and was Lord Treasurer of Ireland the greatest part of his life. He made a very great figure in his country, and would very probably have made a much greater, if he had not been cut off by sudden death; for coming over hither at the King's command, he was poisoned at a feast at Ely-house, and died October 28, 1546 (p). He left behind him, by his wife the daughter and heiress of the Earl of Desmond; seven sons, Thomas, Edmund, John, Walter, James, Edward, and Pierce. Thomas, Earl of Ormond and Ossory, was bred up with King Edward VI. and was in great favour with him, as he appears to have been also with Queen Mary, and much more so with Queen Elizabeth, who considered him as her kinsman and near relation, and, in the first year of her reign, she not only confirmed a grant of lands made to him by her sister, and released the reserved rent, but also granted him the office of Lord Treasurer of Ireland, which high post he held during all her reign, and afterwards during his life (q). She likewise confirmed to him the grant of the regalities of Tipperary, and so great a confidence she had in his loyalty, that when two of his brothers, Edmund and Peter, took part with the rebels, she sent the Earl over to reduce them, which he did by fair means. He also managed a long war against the Earl of Desmond, and contributed greatly to his defeat and destruction (r). He was afterwards General against the famous rebel Tyrone, and without involving himself in any of the factions that disturbed the Government, contented himself with doing his duty, and this with great hazard to himself and his family; for, by the treachery of the Irish, he was taken prisoner at a conference, and very hardly treated, but at last he was set at liberty, from an apprehension that he might have died in their hands, which would not have answered their purposes (s). He was about seventy years of age when King James came to the throne, who renewed his commission of Lieutenant-General of the army, and shewed him great respect. He was the first Protestant of his family, and very sincere in his religion; he had the misfortune to be quite blind for about twelve years before his death, and had the mortification also to lose his only son, which gave him much grief (t). He died in 1614, leaving behind him an only daughter, Elizabeth, whom he married first to Theobald, the youngest son of his second brother Sir Edmund Butler, intending that young gentleman for his heir, whom he procured to be created Viscount Tulleophelim, but he dying soon after, King James prevailed upon, or rather obliged him, to give his daughter in marriage to Sir Richard Preston, a favourite of his, whom he created Baron Dingwall in the Kingdom of Scotland (u). But notwithstanding this marriage, the Earl, both by a deed and by his Will, settled all his estates, except one manor, and six thousand pounds portion which he assigned his daughter, upon his heirs at-law. Upon his death, Sir Walter Butler of Kilcashe, eldest son to Sir John Butler, who was the third son of James the sixth Earl of Ormond, succeeded to that title, and ought to be succeeded to the estate, but that the superior interest of the Lord Dingwall kept him from it, and so partial was King James in this affair, that he undertook to decide the cause himself, but making such an award as the Earl of Ormond and Ossory would not submit to, he was, for his contempt, committed to the Fleet, where he remained a prisoner eight years (w) [C]. In 1625 he recovered his liberty, and going over soon after into Ireland, died at Carrick Feb. 24, 1632. He married Ellen daughter to Edmund Viscount Mountgarret, by whom he had issue two sons and nine daughters. His eldest son, Thomas Viscount Thurles, married, against his consent, Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Poyntz of Acton (x), in the county of Gloucester. He had the misfortune to be drowned near the Skerries, as he was going to England, December 15, 1619, leaving three sons and four daughters (y). Of these sons, James, the eldest, succeeded his grandfather in his

(o) See this Act in Carte's Introduction, p. xlvii.

(p) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. I. p. 280.

(q) Carte's Introduction, p. lviii.

(r) Cox's History of Ireland, Vol. I. p. 422.

(s) Carte's Introduction, p. lxii.

(t) Short Hist. of the Ormond Family, p. 149.

(u) Ancient Peerage of Scotland, p. 133.

(w) Carte's Introduction, p. xxii.

(x) See the Short Account of the Ancient Families in Gloucestershire, viz. Poyntz, &c.

(y) Short Hist. of the Ormond Family, p. 155.

(10) See the Act of Parliament, as referred to in the text.

of the worthiest actions of that Prince's reign (10). We may, from hence, discern the reason why Queen Elizabeth had always so great a regard for Thomas Earl of Ormond, and supported him, notwithstanding he had the misfortune to be upon very bad terms with her potent favourite Robert Earl of Leicester.

[C] Where he remained a prisoner eight years.] There was something in this case excessively hard. Sir Richard Preston was a gentleman who had been bred up with the King, and therefore it is no wonder that he had an affection for him; but this was no excuse for his obliging the Earl of Ormond to marry his daughter to him, and much less could it be a reasonable cause for his making use of such violent methods, for depriving Walter Earl of Ormond of what had been settled upon him many years before by deed, and was again confirmed to him by will (11). But, notwithstanding all this, that noble Earl continued always loyal, and attributed the wrongs done him to the King's mis-informations, or mis-conceptions. His Majesty is said to have relented at last, and, when pressed by some of his Scotch-favourites to carry things farther, he answered, 'That they had been carried too far already, and that if ever he looked into this affair again, it should be to unravel what he had done.' The Earl of Ormond, however, did not recover his liberty till King James's death; and if we consider this transaction attentively, it will be found a most exorbitant, and most ungrateful stretch of prerogative against a family the most unstained in its honour, and the most affectionate to the English Interest, and the Crown, of any that had settled in Ireland, which had been remarkably his titles, and his ancestors in their estates (z), of whom, therefore, we shall speak more particularly in the ensuing article.

(11) Carte's Introduction, p. lxvii.

(x) Carte's Introduction, p. lxvii.

markably distinguished in former reigns, and for which King James pretended to have the highest esteem and regard, while he was oppressing one branch of it, and offering violence to the inclinations of the other; for the Lady Dingwall adhered closely to her father's sentiments, and was far from being in the least instrumental to the wrongs done to her cousin, thought it was pretended they were done for her sake. E

BUTLER (JAMES) Earl, Marquis, and Duke of Ormond; one of the ablest Statesmen, most accomplished Courtiers, and worthiest persons of the age in which he flourished. He was the son of Thomas Butler, Esq; eldest son and heir apparent of Sir Walter Butler of Kilcash, by Mrs Elizabeth Poyntz, and was born on the nineteenth of October 1610, in Newcastle House at Clerkenwell, which was then inhabited by his grandfather Sir John Poyntz (a). The affairs of his family were at that time in such disorder, that scarce any man would have imagined he should so soon have worked himself through them, and appeared with that lustre and dignity he did [A]. He was sent to Hatfield to a Carpenter's wife, by whom he was nursed 'till he was about three years old, and he was then sent for over to Ireland by his father and mother. He was frequently carried by them to Thomas Earl of Ormond, who lived about a year after he came over to Ireland, and having a great love to his mother's family, her grandfather having been his constant and faithful friend, as well as a respect for the nearness in blood between them, he was extremely fond of the child, and delighted much in playing with him though he was then blind (b). Upon the decease of the good old Earl, his grandfather, Sir Walter Butler of Kilcash, assumed that title, and his father was called by courtesy Viscount Thurles, who coming over to England about the law-suits of the family, was unfortunately drowned near the Skerries, December 15, 1619, leaving behind him a widow and seven children, in very disconsolate circumstances (c) [B]. James Butler, now in the ninth year of his age, was by courtesy stiled Viscount Thurles, and the next year was sent over to England by his mother, and placed under the care of Mr Conyers, a Popish Schoolmaster at Finchley near Barnet. But Sir William Parsons, having, by some artifice, entitled the Crown to the wardship of the young Lord Thurles, King James removed him from this school, and sent him to Lambeth, to be brought up under the care and inspection of Dr George Abbot Archbishop of Canterbury, that he might be well fixed in the Protestant religion; and in this, as the King's intention was good and his care visible, so it was indisputably attended with success, though some say no great regard was had to his education there, and that his circumstances were very narrow, all which may possibly be very true, though there are authorities which may be urged in proof of a contrary opinion, in respect, at least, to the Archbishop's attention (d) [C]. While Lord Thurles

was

[A] And appeared with the lustre and dignity he did. Besides the disputes that happened in this noble family from the partiality of King James, in favour of his countryman Sir Richard Preston, there were others that took rise from personal causes, particularly the high spirit of Sir Walter Butler, of Kilcash, who was extremely displeas'd that his son Thomas had married Mrs Elizabeth Poyntz. Whence this displeasure arose, does not appear, for, in point of family, there was no fort of occasion to complain, there being, as I take it, scarce a better in England; and as to the Lady's qualities, they were such as intitled her to the esteem of the most judicious persons of that age (1). Add to this, that Thomas Earl of Ormond had the greatest intimacy with Sir Nicholas Poyntz, this Lady's grandfather, as appears by his sending him with a challenge to the great Earl of Leicester (2), which he carried, though against his will. It was, probably, this friendship between the two families, that brought Mr Thomas Butler, afterward Viscount Thurles, to his first acquaintance with the young Lady he married; and it appears, that her family had a great affection for him, and his children; but this produced no alteration in Sir Walter's sentiments, who, when his son and daughter came over to Ireland after the birth of this, their eldest son, did not suffer them to live in the same house with him (3); so that few persons have been born, or bred, under more untoward circumstances, than attended the coming into the world, the infancy, and even the youth, of this great man, who, notwithstanding, gave early hopes of his becoming, in time, all that he afterwards was. So irresistible are the efforts of a great genius, and so much superior to the injuries of fortune!

[B] A widow and seven children, under very disconsolate circumstances. The affairs of the Lord Viscount Thurles were in a very perplexed situation; his father was under the King's displeasure, and a prisoner in the Fleet: he laboured himself under his father's displeasure; the family-estate was under sequestration; and the liberties of the County-palatine of Tipperary had been seized by a Quo Warranto; which misfortunes making his presence necessary in England, he was going thither when he had the misfortune to be drowned (4). His issue by his Lady, were three sons and four daughters, viz. James, who is the subject of this article; John, who died at Naples in his travels, unmarried, in 1636; and Richard Butler of Kilcash, Esq; Of his daughters; the eldest, Ellen, married the Viscount Muskerry, afterwards Earl of Clancarty; Elizabeth, his second, married, first, James Purcell, Esq; and afterwards, Colonel John Fitzpatrick; Mary, the third, espoused Sir George Hamilton, Knight, son to the then Earl of Abercorne, and ancestor to the present Earl; the fourth, Eleanor, married Sir Andrew Aylmer, Bart (5).

[C] In respect, at least, to the Archbishop's attention. We are told by Mr Carte, that whatever learning the Archbishop had himself, he shewed very little concern to encourage it in others; and that the young Lord Thurles had so little notice taken of him, that he was not taught so much as to understand Latin (6). 'He lived, however, continues he, in the Archbishop's family, and was maintained there, though but very indifferently, 'till after the death of King James. The reason of this neglect probably was, that the Archbishop considered him as a burden imposed on him by the King, and which he could not, in decency, decline, for he received no allowance for the young Lord's subsistence either from the Court, or from the Ormond family, the whole estate whereof was under sequestration by an extent from the Crown; and forty pounds a year was all that the young Lord had for his own, and his servant's, cloathing and expences.' But Sir Richard Cox gives somewhat a different account of this matter, and more especially of the Archbishop's behaviour, which is the more remarkable, because he transcribed it from a manuscript

(a) Sir Richard Cox's Epistle to the Reader before the second Volume of his Hist. of Ireland, from a M.S. containing many particulars relating to this noble person.

(b) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 4.

(c) Sir Richard Cox's Account.

(d) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 5. Sir Richard Cox's Account.

(1) The Ancient and Present State of Gloucestershire, by Sir Robert Atkins, p. 202.

(2) Leicester's Commonwealth, p. 95.

(3) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 3.

(4) Sir Richard Cox's Account.

(5) Carte's Introduction to the Life of the Duke of Ormond.

(6) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 5.

was at Lambeth, his grandfather, Walter Earl of Ormond, was in great trouble and perplexity: King James had thrown him into the Fleet for contempt, in refusing to acquiesce under his award, and sequestred his estates, and left him nothing to subsist upon. In this situation things continued during the life-time of that Prince; but upon his decease, the Earl recovered his liberty and part of his estate, and then took home his grandson, who by his time was sixteen. It does not appear, that by this change, there was any more care taken of the young Lord's education; on the contrary, his grandfather left him pretty much to himself, so that at eighteen, we find him attending the Duke of Buckingham at Portsmouth, though that favourite was the capital enemy of his family; but from the principles of loyalty, hereditary in his noble house, the young Lord never found any obstacles, when his Sovereign or his country required his service (e). On the Duke's being stabbed by Felton, Lord Thurles returned to London, and embarked in a new scene of life; for finding his cousin, the Lady Elizabeth Preston, at Court, and a very agreeable young Lady, he began to entertain desires of compromising the disputes that had been so fatal to both their families, by marrying her. He met however with many and great difficulties in this affair, which might have exhausted the patience, and been too hard for the prudence of an older man; but his constancy in his addresses, and his indefatigable attention to remove these obstacles, by degrees got the better of them all at last, so that with the King's consent, signified by his letters patents, dated September 3, 1629, he obtained leave to marry her (f) [D]. This marriage was solemnized the Christmas following, and immediately after, he went down to Acton in Gloucestershire, the seat of his uncle, Sir Robert Poyntz, and there with the assistance of his uncle's chaplain, he applied himself to, and gained a competent knowledge of, the Latin tongue. About the close of the ensuing year, he went over to Ireland, where soon after he purchased a troop of horse, but his affairs requiring his presence in England, he left his Lady behind him, and passing through the north of Ireland, crossed over to Scotland, and having visited his Lady's relations in that kingdom, came up to London, where he was at the time of his grandfather's decease, February 24, 1632, by which he became Earl of Ormond (g). He returned to Ireland, in the beginning of the month of September in the ensuing year, at a very critical juncture, when the Lord Wentworth afterwards the great Earl of Strafford, entered upon the government of Ireland, with the title of Lord Deputy. He was very early and very advantageously taken notice of by that wise Statesman, who, amongst his other shining qualities, was an excellent judge of men. He had sent a message to the Earl of Ormond, in relation to a subscription for the support of the army, which, however legal it might be, was a thing unquestionably necessary; and this induced the Earl to second the Lord Deputy's desires, in such a manner, as procured him a very handsome letter of thanks (h). His Lordship soon after came up to Dublin, to pay his compliments to the Deputy, who observing him very attentively as he crossed the Castle-yard, saw something so extraordinary in his looks and in his mien, that he could not help saying to those who stood near him, That if his skill in Physiognomy did not fail him, that young nobleman would make the greatest man of his family (i). A prediction which did equal honour to the young Earl of Ormond, and to the Lord Deputy, whose skill in this instance most certainly did not deceive him. One of the first steps taken by the new Governor, was to call a Parliament, which, though a thing absolutely necessary, he foresaw would be attended both with danger and difficulty; but, notwithstanding this, he ventured upon it, and the Houses met July 14, 1634, to whom he went in great state, the Earl of Kildare bearing the Cap of Maintenance, and the Earl of Ormond the Sword (k). In this Parliament, however, there happened a difference between the Earl and the Lord Deputy, of so extraordinary a nature, that considering the temper

(e) Narrative of the Expeditions in support of the French Protestants in the reign of Charles I. p. 193.

(f) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 9. Sir Richard Cox's Account.

(g) Memoirs of Ireland, p. 135.

(h) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 58. This Letter, dated Sept. 14, 1633, is in the Appendix to the second Volume, p. 56.

(i) Ibid. p. 58.

(k) See the manner of holding this Parliament in Strafford's Letters, Vol. I. p. 282.

manuscript for which he expresses great esteem, speaking of his mother's management of her eldest son after his father's unfortunate death, he says (7), 'the put him to a private school under a Roman Catholic, but, by order of King James, he was removed to the Archbishop of Canterbury's, Dr Abbot, and by him he was wholly maintained for five or six years without any pension from Court, or possibility of help from home, where all was sequestered and deprest. By him also he was first instructed in the Protestant Religion, and in the doctrine of the Church of England, unto which he stuck fast to his death.'

[D] He obtained leave to marry her.] The difficulties the Earl of Ormond had to struggle with in this respect, are very well worth knowing. That potent favourite the Duke of Buckingham, whose ruling passion was raising every branch of his family to titles of honour, and vast estates, cast his eyes upon the Lady Elizabeth Preston, while a very child, and engaged her father, Sir Richard, to bestow her upon his nephew George Fielding, second son to the Earl of Denbigh; and, with a view to this marriage, this young gentleman was created Lord Fielding of the Caghe in the kingdom of Ireland, and Sir Richard Preston was created Viscount Callan and Earl of Desmond, with remainder to his intended son-in-law George Lord Fielding, by which limitation those honours are now in the Denbigh family (8). To secure all things more effectually for the favourite's purpose, King James was prevailed upon to grant the wardship and marriage of James Lord Thurles to the said Earl of Desmond, which was certainly a very strange act in that Prince (9). But providence defeated all these schemes by the murder of the Duke of Bucks, and the death of the Earl of Desmond, who was drowned in his passage between Dublin and Holyhead, October the 28th, 1628; his Countess, the daughter of Thomas Earl of Ormond, died eighteen days before him, and recommended it to her daughter, upon her death-bed, to marry her cousin, if possible, to put an end to the disputes in the family (10). After the death of her parents, the Earl of Holland had the ward of this young Lady, and shewed, at first, a strong inclination to make good the contract that had been entered into with the Denbigh-family, but was, at last, content to sell his interest for fifteen thousand pounds (which was more than he could have got by the other marriage) to my Lord of Ormond, and then the King's leave was easily obtained (11).

(8) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 44.

(9) History of King James I. p. 372.

(10) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 7.

(11) Sir Richard Cox's Account.

(S) Sir Richard Cox's Account.

(l) Memoirs of the Ormond Family, p. 93.

(m) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 65. Sir Richard Cox's Account.

(12) Sir Richard Cox's Account.

(13) Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 65.

(14) Strafford's Letters, Vol. I. p. 99.

temper of the latter, it is a wonder that it was so easily made up (l) [E]. But after this they seem to have agreed perfectly well. The Deputy was indeed of a very high spirit, proceeded in his own way, and dealt roundly with people of all ranks; but the Earl of Ormond having nothing in view, but the service of his country, and the honour of the Crown, admitted no ground of offence, but, on the contrary, did such eminent services, and in a way so open and free from particular views, that the Lord Wentworth esteemed and admired him, writing over highly in his favour to England, and without any application from him, procured him to be sworn of the Privy-Council in that kingdom, and when he was but twenty-four years of age (m) [F]. The same good understanding continued after the Lord Deputy was appointed Lord Lieutenant, and created Earl of Strafford, and in the next Parliament of Ireland which sat in 1640; the Earl of Ormond was very active, and by his behaviour gave such satisfaction, that when the troubles in Scotland made it necessary to raise an army in Ireland, his Lordship was made choice of to command it under the Lord Lieutenant, when by his zeal and diligence, the forces intended to be raised were levied in a short space of time; and in the month of August, the Lord Lieutenant being then in England, [E] That it was so easily made up. We shall give the reader the story of this quarrel, from the manuscript quoted by Sir Richard Cox, and which it is not impossible, might be copied from some memoirs of this noble person, drawn up by Sir Robert Southwell; for it agrees perfectly with the account given from that gentleman's papers by Mr Carte, only it is shorter, and seems to be more plainly expressed (12). 'The Lord Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford, went over Lord Deputy in 1633. In a while after he called a Parliament, which being appointed to meet within the Castle of Dublin, a proclamation was issued, That none of the members, either Peers or Commons, should enter with their swords. All obeyed the order save this young Lord, who told the Black Rod at the door, he should have no sword of his except in his guts. So being the only Peer, who sat that day in defiance of the proclamation, it fired the Lord Deputy, who was not wont to be disobeyed. The Earl was called upon in the evening to answer for it, who thereupon shewed His Majesty's Writ, calling him to Parliament, cinctus cum gladio; which sort of answer being not expected, and finding him like to prove an unratable companion, it was in deliberation that night, between the Lord Deputy, and his two friends Sir George Radcliff and Mr Wandesford, whether to trample him quite under foot, or to oblige so daring a young man, who was now also grown very popular? But Sir George being for the more benign extreme, he was taken into favour, caressed, and made one of the Privy-Council, and no opportunities were from that time forward omitted to oblige him, or set him forth in a high character to His Majesty.' Mr Carte's remark upon this translation, is equally pertinent and proper (13); he thinks that his Lordship's defence was founded on the investiture of the earldom per cincturam gladii, which was a necessary badge of that dignity, used in all ages as such, and worn by the Earls of England in the House of Lords; a practice to which the Irish Earls were by express law obliged to conform; so that in this respect he had a statute to support him, with which no order of the Lord Deputy could dispense; and I am entirely of his opinion, that the event in this case was very extraordinary, and so unlikely to follow from a dispute with a Lord Deputy, so impatient of contradiction, that it was no encouragement to any body to engage another. It is however possible, that Lord Wentworth, who was a man of great spirit, might be secretly pleased with this similitude of temper in another man of quality; and it is farther probable, that finding it impossible to censure his Lordship's conduct, he thought it more agreeable to good policy to approve it.

[F] Procured him to be sworn of the Privy-Council, when he was but twenty-four years of age. We cannot well have better lights upon any subject, than are derived to us on this, from the letters of the great Earl of Strafford, which being of a private nature, and written in confidence, most certainly show the real sentiments of his heart; who, besides, was not a man at all inclined to dissimulation. The first mention he makes of my Lord Ormond, is in a letter dated August 3, 1633, wherein, having taken notice of the manner in which he had provided for the pay of the army on his first coming over, he has this paragraph (14). 'My Lord of Ormond, being, by the Master of the Rolls, made acquainted with this day's resolution of this Council, came the next morning to me in a very noble way, to witness his full consent thereunto, as well for himself as for all his tenants and friends (15). The only letter in that collection, directed to the Earl of Ormond, is dated from Dublin, June 2, 1634; it is as full and clear, in respect to his Lordship's conduct, and the Deputy's regard for him, as words can make it, but is too long to be inserted here. But in a dispatch, dated from Dublin Castle, December 16, 1634, directed to Mr Secretary Cook, intended as a general view of the state of Ireland at that time; and on the margin of which, his Majesty's sense of the Lord Deputy's representations, are written by the hand of the said Secretary; there is this very remarkable paragraph (16). 'In the higher House there is my Lord of Ormond, that hath as much advantage of the rest in judgment and parts, as he hath in estate and blood; and one who, upon my observation since I came hither, expresseth very good affections to the crown and government, so as I hold him a person of consequence, and fit to receive some mark of His Majesty's favour, and humbly offer it to His Majesty's Wisdom, Whether it were not seasonable to make him a Counsellor; he is young, but take it from me, a very staid head; so as I should think we had got much the better, by the exchange of the Earl of Ormond for Sir Piers Crosby. Besides, it will be impossible without his Lordship, to find a title for the crown to Ormond, so as without him no plantation neither, in which respect it were good to take him in. But as in all others of this nature, I refer it clearly to the King's wisdom, as one who will have no other interests here but the service of my master, nor upon my faith, did I ever so much as mention this, or any such thing, to my Lord of Ormond.' The answer to this part of the Lord Deputy's letter runs thus. 'All these you mention shall find themselves remembered; and for the Earl of Ormond, your Lordship shall receive herewith his Majesty's warrant to swear him Counsellor according to your advice.' In other letters of his, he speaks of him to the King, and to his ministers, with all imaginable esteem and respect. After his troubles came on, and he was prisoner in the Tower, he looked upon the Earl as his sincere friend, and writes to him with all imaginable freedom and confidence. In a letter (17) dated from the Tower, December the 17th, 1640, he informs him, that he had mentioned him to the King for Lord Deputy of Ireland, and that he was hindered from that preferment by his own countrymen, and the Earl Marshal, that is, the then Earl of Arundel. When things bore harder upon him, and his great soul felt, though it never sunk under, his misfortunes, he writ, with some degree of passion, to the Earl of Ormond. His letter is dated from the Tower, February the 3d, 1640 (18). It begins thus: 'My noble Lord, there is so little rest given me, as I have not time scarce to eat my bread. I trust to have more quietness after a while. Your Lordship's favours towards me in these afflictions are such as have, and shall, level my heart at your foot so long as I live, or else let me be infamous to all men.' There is something so generous and so great in the friendship between these noblemen, that it ought to be transmitted with just praise to posterity.

[G] Might

England, sent over a deputation to the Earl of Ormond, conveying to him all the powers granted to him by his commission, as Lieutenant-General (u). But the fair weather in Ireland did not last long, the same Parliament that had thanked the King in the most solemn manner, for sending them so good a Lieutenant as the Lord Strafford; now in his absence, and when they found he was like to be attacked in England, fell upon him first in Ireland, and the House of Commons drew up a long and vehement remonstrance, consisting of sixteen articles, and endeavours were used to procure a like remonstrance from the House of Lords, but they were defeated by the strenuous opposition of the Earl of Ormond and his friends, for which the King thanked him, by a letter dated the twenty-second of November 1640 (o). It was His Majesty's intentions at this time, to have declared the Earl, Deputy of Ireland; but this being opposed by the Committee of the Irish house of Commons, was laid aside. The Earl was no less active and diligent in the ensuing Parliament, tho' with different success; but his zeal and candour were so well known, and so thoroughly understood, that the last request the Earl of Strafford made the King, when he knew that there was no hopes of saving his life, was, that his Blue Garter might be given to his friend the Earl of Ormond, with which His Majesty would very readily have complied, but that the Earl upon the first notice of it declined it; modestly hinting, that his own loyalty stood in no need of rewards to confirm it, and that perhaps such an honour might be employed more for His Majesty's service (p) [G]. When the great rebellion broke out in that kingdom, on the twenty-third of October 1641, the Earl was at his country-seat of Carrick, the government being then in Sir William Parsons and Sir John Borlace, who had the title of Lords Justices. As soon as the King was informed of it, he thought of the Earl of Ormond for Lieutenant-General, and though the Earl of Leicester, at the desire of the Parliament, was appointed Lord Lieutenant of Ireland; yet the Lords Justices, upon notice of His Majesty's designation, signed a commission to the Earl of Ormond, to be Lieutenant-General and Commander in Chief of the army, which consisted at that time of no more than three thousand men (q). The Earl no sooner received this commission, than he proposed acting vigorously against the rebels, with the small force he had, and what additional troops could be immediately raised, that they might not have time to form or arm themselves effectually; but from some fatal distaste which the Lord Justices had to the Earl, grounded, as a certain writer tells us, on their apprehension that if he suppressed the rebellion, he would be rewarded with the government of Ireland, they opposed him in every thing; so that with the best intention in the world he was not able to do much, but what he could do he did (r). In the latter end of the month of January 1642, the rebels having advanced within seven miles of Dublin, the Earl marched out of that city, with 2000 foot, 300 horse, and five small field-pieces, and dislodged them from the Naas, and would have proceeded farther if those who had the supreme power would have permitted him. Soon after he made another excursion, by which he obliged the rebels to raise the blockade of Drogheda, and would have pursued them vigorously if he had not been recalled. In the beginning of April he made a third expedition, and having beat the rebels from their several posts, at last, on the fifteenth of that month (s), came up with and engaged them at Kiliush; the forces under his command did not exceed three thousand five hundred men, and those of the rebels were above double his number; he attacked however, and routed them entirely, with the loss only of twenty killed and forty wounded; whereas the rebels had several hundred killed upon the spot, and would have suffered more if they had not had a bog near them. This was a very glorious and important service, and tho' the enemies of the Earl of Ormond, had raised many cruel calumnies against him in England, yet they were so ill put together, and so apparently false, that the House of Commons ordered the Speaker to write him a letter of thanks for his services; and it was proposed to move the House of Lords, to join with them in beseeching His Majesty to make the Earl of Ormond Knight of the Garter; they likewise sent him a jewel of the value of six hundred and fifty pounds; and in the account of the victory, published by order of their House, celebrated his conduct and courage very highly (t). The Earl made another expedition that year with great success, and there is no doubt but the rebels had been pursued with much greater effect, if he had been more at liberty; but standing very indifferently with the Lords Justices, and disputes arising soon after with the Earl of Leicester, who was Lord Lieutenant, the service in Ireland was much impeded (u). But the King being very sensible of the Earl's entire fidelity to him, released him in some measure from the difficulties he was under, by appointing him Lieutenant-General, by an independent commission from himself under the Great Seal, and soon after of his own motive,

[G] Might be employed more to his Majesty's service. One of the last acts of the Earl of Strafford's life, was to testify his kindness and regard to the Earl of Ormond, whom he recommended, the evening before he suffered, to his Majesty, by the Lord Primate Usher; and at that time it is most likely, that he desired his Garter might be given to him; for amongst the memoranda set down in the Primate's almanack, of the answers given him, by the King, to the Earl's requests, which were to be communicated to him the morning he suffered (the 7th) is this (19): 'Earl of

'Ormond shall be Knight of the Garter in his place.' We are indebted to Mr Carte for the account given us of the Earl's declining this honour (20), and of his reason for it. That he did decline it is certain, since he did not receive the Garter during this reign; and that he did it from the motive assigned in the text is highly probable, because he could not well do it from any other; for, as things stood at that time, the Parliament would not have been displeas'd at his receiving that favour.

[H] Such

(n) Memoirs of Ireland, p. 197.

(o) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 115.

(p) See this explained in the note [C].

(q) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 81.

(r) Memoirs of Ireland, p. 236.

(s) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 106.

(t) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 312—314. Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 106. Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 21.

(u) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 319. Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 22.

(20) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 139.

(19) Strafford's Letters, Vol. II. p. 418, 432. Sir Richard Cox's Account.

(zw) Carte's Life, of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 337.
Cox's Hist. of Ireland.

motive, created him Marquis of Ormond (w), as a farther mark of his favour. All this however did not contribute much to the prosecution of the war, the Irish became daily more and more numerous, and the English weaker and weaker, and, which was still worse, they were so ill supplied, that the only method that could be found to enable the army once more to take the field, was by calling in and coining half the plate of those that were so good subjects as to send it. At length, however, the Marquis of Ormond marched with two thousand five hundred foot, and five hundred horse, on the second of March 1642-3, and after some small advantages came before the town of Ros, on the twelfth battered it in breach and made an assault, in which he was repulsed; this encouraged the Irish General Preston, to advance with six thousand foot and six hundred horse to its relief, and being an officer of experience and judgment, he not only threw a supply into the place, but also forced the Marquis of Ormond to a battle, under various disadvantages, exclusive of the superiority in numbers of two to one (x). The horse of the Marquis's army, or at least the best part of them, were weak enough to fancy that they were betrayed by him, which made them give way, and thereby endangered his life and liberty; but having got with some difficulty to his foot, he charged the Irish so briskly, that he broke them and gained a compleat victory, taking Lieutenant-General Cullen, and a great number of prisoners, with all the baggage (y). If this victory could have been improved, there is no doubt the consequences of it would have been great; but the government in Ireland was so weak, and the people either so poor, or had so little confidence in their rulers, that no sufficient supply was furnished for the use of the army, and this, together with the commands he received from Oxford, obliged the Marquis of Ormond to think seriously of a cessation which the rebels had proposed. More especially when by a resolution of the Privy-Council at Dublin, dated the twenty-second of June 1643, it was declared that the army could not be supplied with ten thousand pounds, half in provision and half in money, in which case the Marquis offered to besiege Wexford, discontinue the treaty, and prosecute the war (z). Being thus disappointed on one side and pressed on the other, he concluded, but not without the greatest caution and with the best advice, such a cessation on the fifteenth of September 1643 [H]. The news of this cessation was but very ill received in England, where the barbarities

(x) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 1, 11.
Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 21, 22.

(y) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 404.

(z) Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 21.
Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 128.
Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 437.

[H] Such a cessation on the 15th of September, 1643. There was no action of this noble person's life that has been more censured, than his making this cessation, which, it must be allowed, had a bad effect upon his Majesty's affairs in England, and must likewise be confessed, not to have done much good in Ireland (21). Yet, upon a fair and candid inquiry, it will not be found that the Earl of Ormond acted any other part than became a person of strict honour, and steady principle. It has been very truly observed, that there were, at that time, no less than five parties in Ireland; the Protestants loyal to the King, at whose head was the Earl of Ormond; the Protestants inclined to the Parliament, who were countenanced, at least, by one of the Lords Justices; the Papists that were well affected to the Constitution, whose chief was the Marquis of Clanrickard; the Papists that meant to adhere to the Pope, headed by the greatest part of their Clergy; and the Scots who meant well to themselves, who were resolved to keep what they had got, and desired to get more if they could. As all these parties had different views, so they pursued different measures; the Earl of Ormond was for prosecuting the war against such as were actually rebels, but not for driving all the Irish to despair, which he thought would strengthen the rebels (22). The Lords Justices were for the continuance of the war, though cold in the prosecution of it; but, at the same time, violent in refusing the submissions, forfeiting the estates, and executing, by law, such of the Irish Papists as fell into their hands, depending upon a force from England, sooner or later, to support their conduct. The wiser part of the Irish were for obtaining a toleration of their religion, and returning to their duty; the wilder sort who, by the way, were much the majority, aimed at throwing off, what they called, the English yoke, and setting up for themselves. The Scotch were for the continuance of the war, as that by which they were like to get most. The Earl of Ormond laboured all he could to reduce all parties to one mind, and to the obedience that was due to the laws and to the King, while he had any hopes of accomplishing this by drawing off such as had unwillingly, or upon mistaken notions, joined the rebels, and reducing those who persisted in rebellion, by the sword; he was for continuing the war, in which no man had acted more vigorously, or had more freely exposed his person. But when he saw that, by a complication of untoward accidents, this was rendered very impracticable, if not absolutely impossible, he then inclined, from the natural generosity of his temper, his desire to prevent unnecessary effusion of blood, and,

(21) Lord Clarendon's Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 28.
Sir John Temple's Hist. of the Irish Rebellion.
Borlase's History of the Earl of Castlehaven's Memoirs.
Cox's History of Ireland.

(22) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 450.

above all, out of regard to his master's service, and of preserving, at least, one kingdom in its obedience, to give way to a cessation, with a view of coming at peace (23). That he was not alone in these sentiments, but had the concurrence of the wisest and best men of all ranks and professions in that nation, will sufficiently appear to the candid reader, from the following paper signed by those with whom he advised, and containing the reasons which induced them to give him such advice (24), which may be looked upon as a full vindication of the rectitude of his intentions, and the uprightness of his conduct, from which we ought to judge of a man's character, and not from events.

(23) See Sir Philip Percival's large Vindication of the Cessation, in the Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 454-463.

(24) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 133.

‘ WHEREAS the Lord Marquis of Ormond hath demanded the opinions, as well of the members appointed from the Council board to assist his Lordship in the present treaty; as of other persons of honour and command, that have since the beginning thereof, repaired out of several parts of this kingdom to his Lordship. They therefore seriously considering how much his Majesty's army here hath already suffered through want of relief out of England, tho' the same was often pressed and importuned by his most gracious Majesty, who hath left nothing unattempted, which might conduce to their support and maintenance, and unto what common misery, not only the officers and soldiers, but others also his Majesty's good subjects within this kingdom, are reduced. And further, considering how many of his Majesty's principal forts and places of strength are, at this present, in great distress, and the imminent danger the kingdom is like to fall into; and finding no possibility of prosecuting this war without large supplies, whereof they can apprehend no hope or possibility in due time: They, for these causes, do conceive it necessary for his Majesty's honour and service, That the said Lord Marquis assent to a cessation of arms, for one whole year, on the articles and conditions this day drawn up, and to be perfected by virtue of his Majesty's commission, for the preservation of this kingdom of Ireland. Witness our hands, the 15th day of September, 1643.’

| | | |
|-------------------|------------------|------------------|
| Clanrickards and | James Ware, | John Gifford, |
| St Albans, | Michael Ernly, | Philip Percival, |
| Roscommon, | Foulk Hunks, | Richard Gibson, |
| Richd. Dungarvan, | John Poulet, | Henry Warren, |
| Edward Brabazon, | Maurice Eustace, | Alanus Cooke, |
| Inchiquin, | Edward Povey, | Advocatus Regis. |
| Thomas Lucas, | | |

[I] Which

barbarities committed by the Irish at the breaking out of the rebellion, made them justly considered as men who deserved no regard, and indeed they met with none but what they derived from their own force, and the divisions and weakness of the English, which had compelled the Marquis to act as he did (a). On the other hand, the Irish observed this cessation of theirs very indifferently, which put the Marquis under great hardships, notwithstanding which, he sent over forces to the assistance of his Royal Master, and the King was so fully satisfied of his fidelity on the one hand, and his capacity on the other, that he resolved to make him Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, in the room of the Earl of Leicester (b). The Marquis of Ormond had before declined that employment; but found himself now in such circumstances, or rather found the affairs of the King and of the nation in such a situation, that he was obliged to accept it, and accordingly was sworn into and entered upon his government in the beginning of 1644 (c). He found every day new difficulties to struggle with, from the time of his accepting that great trust. The power of the Irish was continually increasing, the Scots in Ireland were very little inclined to obey his orders, and the Parliament had their Agents and Emisaries every where, which gave him great disturbance. But what troubled him most, was the new treaty, into which he was obliged to enter with the Irish, who, on the one hand, dealt very insincerely with him, had an independent interest at Oxford, where they ought to have had none; and, on the other, pretended on the score of his tenderness for many misguided, whom he therefore considered as honest, men amongst them, and his relation to the most considerable persons in their councils, to expect more from him than they could have pretended to from another in his place (d). All these considerations taken together, induced him to desire leave to resign, which the King would not hear of, but endeavoured to dispel his apprehensions, and to remove some at least of the many difficulties he was under, by sending him fresh powers (e) and farther instructions. These, as they shewed his Majesty's kindness towards him, prevailed upon him to continue in his post; yet neither these instructions, nor his care, could prevent many inconveniencies and misfortunes that fell out the ensuing year, when several attempts were made by the friends of the Parliament, to surprize the fortresses in Ireland; and even Dublin itself, which though by his vigilance the Lord-Lieutenant prevented, yet these and other accidents gave such encouragement to the Irish, that they broke out again in several parts of the kingdom (f). But the worst of all was their insincerity and double dealing in the management of the peace, and their strange negotiations with the Earl of Glamorgan, which have been the subject of so much dispute, and which, though they remain still not a little in the dark, sufficiently demonstrate the honour and integrity of the Lord-Lieutenant, who never had any thoughts of peace (g) but upon just principles. The more prudent and moderate men however, even amongst the Irish, were equally sensible of the necessity of a peace, and of a peace concluded under the authority of the Lord-Lieutenant, which at last they brought very near taking effect, but the arrival of John Baptista Rinuncini, Archbishop and Prince of Firmo, the Pope's Nuncio, made a great change in affairs (h), and excited a new spirit of madness, among those who were beginning to return to their reason and duty. Yet notwithstanding all these distractions, and the strange behaviour of the Irish, the peace was at last concluded at Dublin; on the thirtieth of July 1646, and actually proclaimed at Kilkenny, which had been the chief seat of the rebellion (i) [I]. But the Nuncio persisting in his bad designs, called an assembly of the Clergy at Waterford, by which he defeated all that might have been expected from that treaty, and had such an influence over the Generals of the Irish rebels, as to gain them to a most perfidious attempt, for surprizing the Marquis of Ormond, who, upon the faith of the treaty, had marched with a small body of forces to Kilkenny; so that with infinite difficulty and danger he retreated back to Dublin, and the rebels immediately took measures for besieging that city (k). The King was now in the hands of his enemies, the affairs of the Protestants in Ireland in a very low condition (l), the city of Dublin in so weak a state, that to excite the diligence of the soldiers and inhabitants to fortify it, the Marchioness of Ormond, and other

(a) Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, 24. Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. 133.
 (b) Borlace's Hist. 139. Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. 137.
 (c) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 467.
 (d) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. 137.
 (e) Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, 27. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. 508.
 (f) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. I. 141, 142. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. 519-521.
 (g) Temple's Hist. of the Rebellion. Cox's History of Ireland, Vol. II. 148. Earl of Castlehaven's Memoirs, 45. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. 524.
 (h) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. I. p. 153. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. 550.
 (i) Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, 31. Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. 156.

(j) Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 32. Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 166. See also the Articles themselves, in his Appendix, p. 92.
 (k) Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 33. Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 169. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 580.
 (l) Heath's Chronicle, p. 123.

[I] Which had been the chief seat of the rebellion.] There never was any thing more base, more barbarous, or more inconsistent with any kind of principles of honour, morality, or religion, than the behaviour of the Irish Catholics to the Marquis of Ormond. He marched to Kilkenny in the latter end of August, with two hundred horse and twelve hundred foot, and was received there with all the marks of affection, respect, and triumph, that it was possible for a nation to express. But when he had heard what the Clergy were doing at Waterford, he suspected the storm that soon followed; and to prevent it, he offered, as the clearest mark of the sincerity of his intentions, to give his Lady and children as hostages. But even then, he did not suspect any design against his person, or the forces under his command; so that he marched to Carrick, and from thence to Clonmell, where he was denied entrance, notwithstanding which, he moved on to Cahell, where he was informed, that Owen O Neile, had threatened the city with destruction, if they received his Excellency; and soon after he had full information, that this blood-thirsty rebel was marching with a numerous army to intercept him; upon which he turned back to Calan, and marched from thence to Loughlinbridge, arriving there before O Neile could reach him, and so back to Dublin, where he was received with inexpressible transports of joy, friends and foes, having given him over for lost (25). But the worst part of this affair was, that General Preston and his army, who were for the most part of English extraction, should, against their own interest, so far concur in this measure, as to let O Neile march through their quarters, without giving the Marquis any notice; and afterwards he behaved still worse, and therefore the Lord Lieutenant and Council in vindicating their next measure, wrote to the King in these terms (26), That the Irish having perfidiously violated the peace had begun a new war, to wrest the kingdom from his Majesty, and transfer it to the King of Spain or the Pope, to avoid which they were forced to apply themselves to the Parliament.

(25) Clarendon's Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 37. Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 169. Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 577-582.
 (26) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 172.

other Ladies of the first quality, carried baskets of earth to the works with their own hands (m). Under these circumstances the Marquis entered into a treaty with the commissioners from the Parliament of England, but was far from being hasty therein, that the Irish might have time to consider coolly of their own interests, and the duty they owed to their Sovereign. This had in some measure its effect, some overtures were made and received, but their fickleness and insincerity put it out of the Lord Lieutenant's power to deal with them (n), and he was at last compelled to sign a treaty with the Parliament's Commissioners, which he did on the nineteenth of June 1647, on the best terms (o) that he could possibly obtain [K]. In pursuance of this treaty, on the twenty-eighth of July, he left the Regalia to be delivered to the Commissioners, and embarking on board Captain Matthew Wood's frigate, was transported to England, and landed on the second of August at Bristol (p). He went from thence to Acton in Gloucestershire, the seat of his uncle Sir Robert Poyntz, and from thence, as soon as he could obtain Sir Thomas Fairfax's pass, to London. As soon as he had permission, from those who were then in power, he went to pay his duty to His Majesty at Hampton-Court, to whom he gave in writing a clear and distinct account of his proceedings in Ireland, which when His Majesty had considered at his leisure, he fully and in every part approved, and upon the Marquis's offering to resign his commission, refused it (q), adding, that if it could be ever employed with success in that kingdom, it must be by him. He gave His Majesty his advice upon the then state of his affairs, and attended him as long as he was so permitted; but finding publick concerns running daily more and more into confusion, his private circumstances much embarrassed, and his person in danger, he judged it necessary to provide for his own safety, and accordingly December 25, 1647 (r), embarked for France. On his arrival there, he applied his thoughts more immediately to Ireland, and finding that all had happened there which he foresaw, from the violence of the Nuncio, who had rendered himself odious even to all the discreet men of his own party; he set on foot new schemes for the bringing back that kingdom to its duty, by engaging part of the army to declare for the King, and the better part of the Roman Catholics to join with him, which design he managed with such secrecy and address, that the Lord Inchiquin offered to receive him in Munster, and the Catholics, that they might be the better able to close with him, expelled the Nuncio (s). Having taken all the precautions he was able, for receiving assistance from France, he set out from Paris, went to see his family at Caen in Normandy, and from thence embarking on board a cyder-boat of Havre de Grace, very narrowly missed being drowned (t) by a ship-wreck, procured by his own impatience [L]. With much ado he got on board a Dutch man of war, attended by the Earls of Roscommon and Castlehaven, with many other persons of distinction, and arrived safely at Cork September 9, 1648. He wrote from thence to the General Assembly of the Catholics at Kilkenny, and invited them to treat with him for a peace, to which they shewed themselves very sincerely inclined, and prevailed upon him to come to his own castle of Kilkenny, allowing him guards for his security;

(m) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, p. 175. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 587.

(n) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, p. 181, 182.

Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 53. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 590.

(o) Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 68, 69, 71.

(p) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 605.

(q) Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 78. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 11-13.

(r) Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 82. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 15.

(s) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, p. 202. Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 83. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 37.

(t) Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 94. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 38.

[K] On the best terms that he could possibly obtain. The reader may find these articles at large in the Appendix to Cox's History of Ireland, and upon reading them it must be readily owned, that they were such as none but the Marquis of Ormond could have procured from those who granted them (27). As this negotiation had taken up a great deal of time, and as the preservation of Dublin was, during all that time, chiefly owing to the supplies which the Lord-Lieutenant procured on his own credit, there was, amongst other articles, a very reasonable one for his being reimbursed; which, however, gave his enemies, of whom he had always enough, some handle for aspersing him. The Earl of Clarendon has cleared up this matter in very few words (28). 'Since upon the most strict and impartial examination of those proceedings, malice itself cannot fix a colourable imputation upon the Marquis, of the want of that fidelity and discretion which was requisite to preserve his Majesty's interest, or of any absence of a singular affection and compassion towards the people, who have the honour to be of the same nation with him, they endeavoured to get it believed by dark and obscure expressions, that in the articles he made before the delivery of Dublin, he intended his own particular benefit and advantage, and objected to him, that he consented to have thirteen thousand pounds paid to his own use and behoof, and that the same was paid by them, and received by him accordingly; and so they would persuade the world, that the person which frankly exposed the greatest fortune and estate that any subject had in either of the three kingdoms, and who, while he was possessed of any part of it, made all worthy men in want owners of it with him, could betray a trust for a vile sum of money, and could be so sottish as to make that infamous bargain, and insert it into the articles which were to be viewed and perused by all men; whereas

'he might as easily have driven that traffick with such secrecy, that it could never have been discovered if he had meant it should be secret.' His Lordship then proceeds to shew, in what manner the money, raised by the Marquis of Ormond, was applied in the support of Dublin, and other garrisons; how that account was audited by Sir James Ware; and how thoroughly satisfied the Parliament Commissioners were, that not one penny of this sum could be acquired by, or come into the pocket of, the Marquis of Ormond, who disposed of it immediately for the payment of debts he had contracted for those services.

[L] By a shipwreck procured by his own impatience. When the Marquis left his family at Caen, he purposed to ride post down to the ferry opposite to Havre de Grace; but having rode the first stage to Dive, he there met the Master of an half-decked boat laden with cyder, who promised to convey him that evening to Havre; and the Marquis having with him a new book, which he was desirous of reading by the way, he and his servant, for all the rest of his company were gone before, went on board that small vessel. The wind turned, and fat so cross, that they were all night on the water. Towards morning the wind blew very high, and the Master being at a loss, asked the Marquis of Ormond what hour it was by his watch. The Marquis's impatience to be on shore, betrayed him into an error that had like to have proved fatal to him, and indeed occasioned the loss of the vessel; he told the Master, it was an hour later than, in fact, it was; this made the man so miscount his tide, that he ran upon the flats, the boat was split, and the Marquis, with some difficulty, escaped in the cock-boat, which brought him so near the shore, that men waded into the water, and carried him to land on their shoulders. This happening on a Sunday morning when all people were at church, those helps were wanting, which otherwise might have saved the cyder-boat (29).

[M] The

(29) This Account is taken from Sir Robert Southwell's Narrative.

security; and the peace being concluded, was presented to him by the hands of the Speaker of that Assembly, on the seventeenth of January following (u). There now seemed to be greater hopes than ever, of the revival and recovery of the Royal Authority in that kingdom. But that old intractable rebel, Owen O Neile, who had revived that fatal distinction amongst the Catholics, of the Old English, and the Old Irish, refused to submit to the peace, and all the creatures of the Nuncio and the bigotted Irish adhered to him (w). About this time the news of the King's murder reached Ireland, and was received with such universal abhorrence, that the Lord-Lieutenant saw plainly, the whole island might be brought to acknowledge King Charles II, whom he caused to be immediately proclaimed, if O Neile could be brought over in time (x). But his endeavours upon this head proved ineffectual, as did also another attempt of his to gain over Jones and Coot, and tho' to outward appearance the King's affairs in Ireland looked fair and promising, yet the Lord-Lieutenant quickly found that it was impossible to shake the resolution of his open and declared enemies, and at the same time, there appeared but too many good reasons to doubt, whether he might safely rely upon the assurances of many of his pretended friends (y) [M]. Under all these perplexities, amongst which this was not the least, that a fair understanding was grown up between the Parliament party, and the Old Irish under Owen O Neile; he formed the great and generous design of attacking Dublin, in order to which, he had by continual skirmishes, whereby he ruined the English horse; and by the assistance of his friends, and his own personal credit in Ireland, raised money enough to keep together a very considerable body of forces, though, as he apprehended, scarce sufficient for the execution of so great a scheme (z). He came however before that city, with an army consisting of two thousand horse and five thousand foot, exclusive of the forces under the Lord Dillon of Costillo, which were on the north side, and consisted of two thousand foot and five hundred horse. But while they were thus employed, they could not hinder the coming in of a great supply from England, consisting of two thousand foot and six hundred horse, under the command of the Colonels Reynolds and Venables (a). The Lord-Lieutenant was extremely apprehensive of Jones's making a sally from the city, in which his forces were now become very near as numerous as those that formed the siege, and therefore he was inclined to retire; but the Irish troops having been hitherto very successful, since they were under his command, apprehended that nothing could oppose them, and therefore they desired that a body of forces might be sent to secure Baggatrath, in order to prevent any new succours from entering the place (b). But while they were busy in this, Jones, as the Lord-Lieutenant apprehended, sallied out of the city with four thousand foot and twelve hundred horse, and attacked the royal army, which was not in the best order, with such fury, that notwithstanding all the Lord-Lieutenant could do, in point both of courage or conduct,

[M] The assurances of many of his pretended friends.

It is not easy to conceive or describe the situation of the Lord-Lieutenant at this juncture. He returned into the kingdom without either men or money; and though he found numbers convinced of their past mistakes, and making strong professions of obedience for the future, yet, at the same time, there were powerful enemies in different parts of the kingdom. The city of Dublin was in the hands of Colonel Michael Jones, who commanded the Parliament's forces; and besides that, and other neighbouring garrisons, Colonel Monck was in possession of Dundalk and other places, and the same party had also a strong garrison in Londonderry (30). Owen O Neile had an army of near six thousand men composed of the old Irish, which were wholly at his devotion; and though he always entertained some kind of correspondence with the Lord-Lieutenant, yet he was, at the same time, treating with Colonel Monck, and other officers of the Parliament party. In England, Oliver Cromwell had been appointed Commander in Chief for the reduction of Ireland, the very fame of which kept up the spirits of the rebels, and terrified many that were well affected. At the same time, the Lord-Lieutenant was contended by the Commissioners appointed by the Assembly at Kilkenny; the disputes about command in his own army, kept him in constant employment, and it was with great difficulty he found means to adjust them. Some also of Lord Inchiquin's officers were discontented, and this once rose so high as a mutiny at Cork, to appease which the Lord-Lieutenant was forced to go thither in person. But what is most surprizing, Prince Rupert, who with part of the fleet that had revolted from the Parliament, was all this time on the Irish coast; instead of giving the Marquis any assistance, as he might have done, created fresh uneasiness by his intrigues with all parties; attended with an apparent jealousy of, and dislike to, the Lord-Lieutenant, flowing from motives of ambition and self conceit. Against so many open and concealed enemies, it was a difficult thing to make provision; and yet, for some time, the Lord-Lieutenant did it with success. Owen O Neile, though he had a good army, wanted ammunition, and thereupon applied to Colonel Monck, who, upon his undertaking to make a diversion, by cutting off the Marquis of Ormond's subsistence, promised to supply him with powder, bullet, and match; to receive which, O Neile sent Lieutenant-General O Farrel with a detachment of five hundred horse; but Lord Inchiquin having intelligence of this, met O Farrel in his return, routed and destroyed his detachment, took the whole convoy, besieged Dundalk, and, in two days, obliged Monck to surrender, by which all the magazines in that place fell into the hands of the Royalists (31). This, tho' it put out of the power of O Neile to perform what he had promised, yet did not hinder him from making a new agreement for relieving Londonderry, for which he had two thousand pounds in money, a great quantity of ammunition, and two thousand cows, and this service he performed; so that when it was to serve their own turns, the Parliament made no scruple at all of deriving assistance from the most guilty of the Irish rebels, and the avowed enemies of the English name and nation. The jealousies in the Lord-Lieutenant's army still subsisted; Cromwell was continually sending over fresh emissaries to sow sedition and disaffection; all the parties in Ireland had their particular views, which they continued to pursue at the expence of the publick interest, which was the sole care of the Lord-Lieutenant, and it was the steadiness he shewed in adhering to it, beyond all other considerations, that raised him so many enemies, who were continually plotting and contriving to defeat all his designs, and, in order to it, scrupled not to make use of any measures. Upon this view, therefore, of the situation of his affairs, the reader will easily judge of the care and perplexity he must be in; and if he is inclined to enter into all the particulars of his conduct, and to receive full satisfaction as to the grounds of these assertions, he need only consult the Earl of Clarendon's elaborate work, in which he will find every step of the Lord-Lieutenant's management fully cleared, and effectually vindicated (32).

[N] Edmund

Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 205. Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 96, 97.

Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, Vol. II. p. 3. The Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 57.

Memoirs of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 37.

Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 58. Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 109.

(z) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. ii. p. 5. Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 113. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 73.

(a) Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 118. Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. ii. p. 6. Memoirs of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 391.

(b) Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 122, 123.

(30) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 39, 40.

(31) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. p. ii. p. 4, 5.

(32) Historical View of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 93-118.

conduct, and he gave very noble instances of both, yet they were totally routed with very great loss of men, and all their baggage, tents, and artillery, fell into the enemies hand (c). This was the fatal battle of Rathmines, the loss of which totally destroyed the hopes of the Lord-Lieutenant, and threw the affairs of Ireland into greater confusion than ever, yet such was his presence of mind, that in his retreat he took the important fortresses of Ballyshannon, making the Governor believe that Dublin had surrendered, by which he covered Kilkenny, and soon after forced Jones to raise the siege of Drogheda (d). There wanted not some malicious people, who would have thrown the scandal of this great loss upon the Lord-Lieutenant, but the honestest and best informed amongst the Irish Papists, have not only acquitted him on this head, but have fairly owned, that the chief cause of the defeat, was the army's being betrayed by Edmund Reily, afterwards the Popish Archbishop of Armagh (e) [N]. The Lord-Lieutenant, to repair in some measure this great misfortune, renewed his treaty with Owen O Neile, and have shewing him in a clear light his own danger, brought him to conclude it, and promise to join him with an army of six thousand foot and five hundred horse; but before he could execute this he was taken off by poison (f). In the mean time Oliver Cromwell landed with his army at Dublin, about the middle of August, having eight thousand foot, four thousand horse, and two hundred thousand pounds in ready money. He entered immediately after his arrival upon action, and advanced without delay to Drogheda, into which place the Lord-Lieutenant had thrown a garrison of two thousand three hundred men of his best troops, under the command of Sir Arthur Aston, while himself endeavoured to collect an army sufficient to relieve it. Cromwell came before the place on the third of September, and receiving his heavy cannon by sea, began to batter it on the ninth, and having made a breach that was practicable by the eleventh, he caused it to be attacked, carried it that day by assault, and with infinite barbarity put to death all that he found therein, which struck such a terror into the Irish as could never be worn off (g). A little before this time, King Charles II. sent him the Garter by Mr Seymour. The growth of the enemies power, and the divisions that happened among his own forces, put it entirely out of his power to raise an army sufficient to look Cromwell in the face; but notwithstanding this and the deep distress he was in for want of money, he made a shift to force him to raise the siege of Duncannon, and kept him for some time from enlarging his conquests, but what he was not able to effect by force, he knew how to bring about by other means, and having debauched part of Lord Inchiquin's forces, he thereby weakened the Lord-Lieutenant's power extremely (h). The Bishops and Clergy began now to revive their clamour, and to pretend that no good was to be expected so long as affairs were directed by Ormond; and their intrigues had such an effect, that at last it was openly insisted upon, that the Lord-Lieutenant should leave Ireland, which, except the concern he had for the interest of the King, and his subjects that were still faithful, was agreeable enough to his inclination; and therefore when he found he could no longer be useful to either, he declared the Marquis of Clanrickard Lord-Deputy, and embarked December 5, 1650, for France, carrying with him the Lord Inchiquin, Colonel Wogan, and about forty officers (i). The Marquis landed very safely in France, and went the beginning of the year following to Paris, where he attended the Queen-Mother and the Duke of York, 'till the arrival of His Majesty, after his unfortunate defeat at Worcester. His finances being now in a very disordered condition, the King in no condition to assist him, and the Parliament about to share all the lands in Ireland, belonging to persons who had fought against them, amongst those that were stiled Adventurers; it was found absolutely necessary, to send the Marchioness over to try if she could not obtain from the Parliament of England, an exemption of her own estate, that they might have something to subsist upon (k). After her departure the Marquis fell into great straits, and might have fallen into greater, if the nobility of France had not showed him great civilities, and freely invited him to spend some time at their houses, where he was treated with all possible kindness and respect. One of these invitations was attended

[N] Edmund Reily, afterwards the Popish Bishop of Armagh.] This Edmund Reily was, at this time, Vicar-General of Dublin, and had been engaged in a long series of most iniquitous negotiations between Colonel Michael Jones, the Marquis of Antrim, and Owen O Neile (33). About four years after this, he was one of the chief authors of a most vile and detestable action, which was, the burning the black castle of Wicklow, and causing the people that were in it, to be murdered during the time of a cessation, for which inhuman barbarity he would infallibly have suffered death, had he not claimed the merit of this other infamous action, of betraying the Marquis of Ormond's army at this fatal action of Rathmines, which service to the rebels he so fully made out, that he saved his life (34). Yet for all this, we have no very clear relation of the manner in which this act of treachery was committed; but from laying circumstances together, it seems to have been thus: The post of Bagginath was so situated, as to command a meadow under the walls of Dublin, in which the rebels grazed their horses, and besides lay so conveniently towards the river, that by drawing a line from thence, and fortifying it, all future supplies might have been cut off, as well as the horses starved. The Lord-Lieutenant detached fifteen hundred men for this service, and they marched on the 1st of August at the fall of night; but though the place was not quite a mile off, yet their Popish guides so managed the matter, as that the detachment did not reach the ground they were to fortify, 'till an hour before day. It is therefore very likely, that Reily's treachery consisted in corrupting these guides, and giving notice to the enemy of the march of the detachment; for before they had time to fortify themselves, they were attacked by the rebels. But notwithstanding all this, and his future behaviour at Wicklow, this very man was made choice of, by the Pope, to be afterwards Archbishop of Armagh, and Primate of all Ireland; which is an incontestible proof of Popish perfidy, and of the small concern the subjects of that religion had for the service of their Sovereign.

attended with an adventure, the circumstances of which were so entertaining, that I am persuaded the reader will be pleased to see them in the notes (l) [O]. While he was thus in needy circumstances abroad, the Marchioness struggled through very great difficulties at home; she did indeed, in the beginning of 1653, procure an order of Parliament for the settling upon her two thousand pounds a year, together with Dummore-house near Killkenny, for the subsistence of herself and family; but she found so many obstructions in the carrying this order into execution, that it was about two years before she got that matter fully settled, and then she went over and resided at Dunmore, after she had sent her two sons to Holland, and never saw her husband 'till after the King's restoration (m). It is certain, that the Marquis had as great a share in the King's confidence as any man, and hardly ever quitted his attendance on his person, during the time of his exile. When Cardinal Mazarine, to oblige Cromwell, constrained His Majesty to leave France, he went for Spaw, where meeting with his sister the Princess of Orange, they went to Aix la Chapelle, and from thence to Cologne, where the King staid for some time (n). It was here that His Majesty had an account of the ill usage his brother, the Duke of Gloucester, met with from the Queen-Mother, in order to force him to change his religion, and this engaged the King to think of bringing him to Cologne, with the care of which the Marquis of Ormond was intrusted, and he performed it with great steadiness and spirit. He went afterwards to the Hague to fetch the Princess of Orange, and on his return attended His Majesty, Her Royal Highness, and the Duke of Gloucester, to the fair of Franckfort, and on that occasion was present at Koningstein, at an interview between his Master and Queen Christiana of Sweden, who, whatever respect she might pay him, had been no friend to his family (o). The Marquis was afterwards intrusted with a negotiation, in which the King engaged with the Duke of Newburgh, by whose assistance it was hoped he might conclude an advantageous treaty with Spain. This however went on but slowly, 'till Don Juan of Austria was declared Governor of the Spanish Low-Countries, and even then His Majesty procured but indifferent terms. Such as they were, however, it was thought requisite to draw over the Irish regiments from the French service to the Spanish, and this by the industry of the Marquis was effectually performed; they were formed into six regiments, and the Marquis had one of them, and by his interest also the town of St Ghislain, in which the French had a garrison, was delivered up to the Spaniards in the beginning of the year 1657, a service of great importance, considering the vicinity of that place to Bruffels (p). But notwithstanding all the services the King's subjects rendered to the Spaniards, they were not very forward in making returns, which was chiefly owing to the accounts given by Cardenas, their Minister in England, which meeting with entire credit from Don Juan, he expressed some diffidence of the interest of the King's friends in England (q). To clear up this point, the Marquis of Ormond offered to go over and gain an exact account of the state of things in that kingdom, which he performed with infinite hazard to himself, and returned safely after running through almost incredible dangers [P].

There

[O] Will be pleased to see them in the notes

A French nobleman of great quality having invited the Marquis of Ormond to his house at St Germain en Laye (35), entertained him there for some time, in a manner perfectly suitable to his own rank, and that of his guest. At his coming away, the Marquis, in compliance with a very inconvenient English custom, left with the Maître d' Hôtel ten pistoles to be distributed among the servants. It was all the money he had, nor did he know how to get credit for more when he reached Paris. As he was upon the road, ruminating on this melancholy circumstance, and contriving how to raise a small supply for present use, he was surprized to be advertized by his servant, that the nobleman, at whose house he had been, was behind driving furiously, as if he was desirous to overtake him. The Marquis had scarce left St Germain, when the distribution of the money he had given caused a great disturbance among the servants, who exalting their own services and attendance, complained of the Maître de Hôtel's partiality. The nobleman hearing an unusual noise in his family, and upon enquiry into the matter, finding what it was, took the ten pistoles himself, and causing horses to be put to his chariot, made all the haste that was possible after the Marquis of Ormond. The Marquis, upon notice of his approach, got off his horse, as the other quitted his chariot, and advanced to embrace him with great affection and respect; but was strangely surprized to find a coldness in the nobleman which forbid all embraces, 'till he had received satisfaction in a point which had given him great offence. He asked the Marquis, if he had reason to complain of any disrespect, or other defect, which he had met with in the too mean, but friendly, entertainment which his house afforded? And being answered by the Marquis, that his treatment had been full of civility; that he had never passed so many days more agreeably in his life; and could not but wonder why the other should suspect the contrary. The nobleman then told him, that the leaving ten pistoles to be distributed among the servants, was treating his house as an inn, and was the greatest affront that could be offered to a man of quality; that he paid his own servants well, and had hired them to wait on his friends as well as himself; that he considered him a stranger that might be unacquainted with the customs of France, and err through some practice deemed less dishonourable in his own country, otherwise his resentment should have prevented any expostulation; but as the case stood, after having explained the nature of the affair, he must either redress the mistake by receiving back the ten pistoles, or give him the usual satisfaction of men of honour for an avowed affront: The Marquis acknowledged his error, took back his money, and returned to Paris with less anxiety about his subsistence.

[P] After running through almost incredible dangers.

It is but reasonable to explain the cause that induced the Marquis of Ormond to undertake this perilous journey, before we mention his narrow escapes therein. The Spaniards had promised to furnish the King with six thousand men, whenever he was master of a port in England to receive them; there were also many gentlemen in England of family and fortune, that had offered their services to his Majesty; whence it seemed to be no rash, or ill founded, scheme to hope, that an insurrection might be raised, and such a port secured (36). It was to look into the bottom of this business; and, if it was found practicable, to put things in motion, that the Marquis undertook this journey, which was covered by a pretence of his returning into Germany, to resume his negotiations with the Duke of Newburgh, that his absence from the King might be accounted for, and Cromwell's spies (37) abroad be the less capable (l) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 159.

(m) See her Letter to Oliver Cromwell, in the Collection published by Mr John Nicholl's, p. 86. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 160.

(n) See Sir Henry Bennet's Letters, p. 95. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond Vol. II. p. 162—163.

(o) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. V. p. 335. Bennet's Letters, p. 99.

(p) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. V. p. 305, 334, 349.

(q) Bennet's Letters, p. 133.

(35) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 159. From the relation of Dr Drelin-court, Dean of Armagh.

(36) Members of the Reign of Charles II. p. 133.

(37) See Thurloe's Letters, Vol. VII. p. 322.

There was about this time some favourable hopes of the Dutch, and not without reason, since it is certain that John de Witt was well affected to His Majesty, and inclined, so far as was consistent with the security of his own country (r), to do him service; so indeed the most considerable people in Holland were, and as for the populace they never dissembled their good affections. To promote these, the Marquis of Ormond entered into a treaty of marriage for his son the Earl of Offory, with a daughter of the Sieur de Beverweert, natural son to Maurice Prince of Orange (s), which soon after took effect; and though this may seem entirely a family transaction, yet it was attended with circumstances as pregnant with affection and loyalty to his master, as any transaction of his whole life (t). He was soon after engaged in several other schemes for His Majesty's service, and when it was thought requisite that a right understanding should be restored with the Queen-Mother, the Marquis of Ormond was dispatched to Paris to bring it about, and had all the success that could be desired in his negotiation (u). He afterwards attended His Majesty in his journey to Fontarabia, and had there a long conference with Cardinal Mazarine, who made it a point not to see the King, which however had no other consequence, than confirming the Marquis in his notions of the insincerity and bad principles of that Minister, whom he both disliked and despised (w). On his return things began to change their face in England, and Monk beginning his march from the North, the Marquis of Ormond was one of the first that formed a true notion of his design, and not long after, Sir George Downing, who had been Cromwell's Minister to the States of Holland, desired a conference with the Marquis, and therein gave him all the lights he could (x). When the General sent over Sir John Grenville to the King, the Marquis of Ormond was let into the secret, and had as of giving him any information. Instead of going to Germany, the Marquis went directly into Holland; and hiring a small vessel at Scheveling, passed over into England, where he landed, in the beginning of February 1657, at Westmarsh, seven miles from Colchester in Essex, from whence he travelled up to London. His first lodging was at a Popish Surgeon's in Drury-lane (38), where he had not been long, before he took the freedom of asking his Landlord, if he had not a private place in his house to hide a Priest in? He answered in the negative; adding, that his house was the worst in the world for such a person to lodge in, because it was often searched, as all the houses were in two or three streets thereabouts. He took the hint immediately, paid his landlord, and decamped without delay; and very luckily, for that very night the Surgeon's house, and several others in the neighbourhood, were very closely searched. He went next to a French Taylor's in Black-Friers, where he was once alarmed to such a degree, that he was getting out of the garret-window; but finding it was only some workmen that ran hastily up stairs late on the Saturday-night, to remove their tools before Sunday-morning, he returned to his bed, where he slept in his cloaths, that he might never be taken unprovided; and this precaution, and making himself well acquainted with all the back ways, he used all the time he continued in England. This, indeed, was no more than he found necessary; for he had not been a week in town, before Cromwell had notice of it (39), and mentioned it to the Earl of Orrery. He went next to lodge in Old Fish-street, where he was somewhat more at his ease; he took there the name of Pickering, and passed for a disbanded officer. Finding a wig troublesome, and but an indifferent disguise, his friend Colonel Leg, to whom he complained of it, furnished him with a water to turn his own hair black; but either there was too much aquafortis in the mixture, or the Marquis applied it unskilfully, for instead of having the intended effect, it changed his hair of several colours, and besides, scalded his head to such a degree, as gave him a great deal of trouble. The Marquis ventured his person very freely, during the time he stayed, and saw all sorts of persons, that had manifested any inclinations for his Majesty's service, more especially in the city, where being introduced by Sir Philip Honeywood, to a company of some low, and all but middling sort of people, as a person for whom he would answer, and who was going to the King, they absolutely refused to say any thing, unless to some person of character and consideration, upon whom they might depend, he to remove that difficulty, frankly discovered himself, but met with nothing in return, but general assurances, which might have been as well given, without his running that hazard (40). He afterwards met the sealed knot, as they were called, or Sir Richard Willis's club, once, in Colonel Russel's chambers, in Bedford-garden; and at another time, at Sir Richard Willis's chambers in Gray's-Inn, where, however, nothing passed of moment, most of those gentlemen, being persuaded, that any attempt to be made then, must be attended with insuperable difficulties, which were largely set forth by Sir Richard, who was all this while betraying them to Cromwell (41). The Marquis entered also into all the particular and private engagements of gentlemen, who were well affected, but seeing nothing that could encourage him to hope any good consequences from such a general insurrection, as had been meditated before his arrival, he advised laying all thoughts of it aside, and having stayed a month on this side the water, was conducted by Dr Quatremaire, the King's Physician, into Suffex, and embarking at Shoreham in a small shallop, passed very safely over to Lieppee (42). It is very certain, that never any man ran through more dangers in so small a space than he did, for tho' at first his departure was mistaken by Cromwell's emissaries abroad, who thought he had left the King, as they phrased it, in a pet (43), yet they very soon penetrated the true design of his journey, and gave notice of it accordingly (44). Secretary Thurloe had several notices of his arrival and of his transactions, but tho' he was indefatigable in searching for him, it was without success. On this occasion, Sir Richard Willis acted with great dexterity in his dangerous employment of a double spy, for he gave the Marquis notice to shift his lodgings in the morning, and in the evening gave Cromwell notice where those lodgings were. By this he at that time gained credit with both, for the Marquis finding his lodgings searched, gave him all the honour of his escape: and Cromwell finding the Marquis had been really there in the morning, looked upon Sir Richard's intelligence as well founded (45). Yet, by a comparison of circumstances, I cannot help thinking, that Cromwell, was neither displeased with his journey nor his escape, for it gave a large field to his spies, and afforded a colour for setting on foot a most violent persecution, and erecting a new High Court of Justice, of which Lisle was the President. Before this bloody tribunal numbers were brought, many were tried, and few escaped, Sir Henry Slingsby and Dr Hewitt were beheaded, four persons of meaner quality were hanged, drawn, and quartered, and others were imprisoned (46) as long as Cromwell lived. The Marquis was not much safer at Paris than he had been at London, for Cromwell sent notice to Cardinal Mazarine of his being there, and insisted on his causing him to be apprehended, which he would certainly have done, if he had not been deceived in his intelligence by which he was persuaded, that the Marquis was gone to Scotland (47). One may guess at the Marquis's apprehension by the road he took to join the King again in Flanders, for he went in three days post to Lyons, from thence to Geneva, then passing through the Palatinate, and down the Rhine made the Duke of Newburgh a visit at Dusseldorp, and from thence about the middle of May, 1658, came to his Majesty at Brussels (48.)

great

(41) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. II. p. 668, 669.

(42) Bates, Elements Motuum, P. 2. p. 225. Life of Lord Viscount Mordaunt, p. 71. Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. VI. p. 617.

(43) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. VI. p. 822.

(44) Ibid. Vol. VII. p. 4, 17, 27, 28, 107.

(45) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, Vol. VI. p. 668. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 179.

(46) Heath's Chronicle, p. 404, 405.

(47) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. I. p. 740.

(48) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond Vol. II. p. 180, 181. Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. I. p. 732, 733, 755, 757, 752.

(r) Hist. de Jean de Witt, p. 355.

(s) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 182. Dugdale's Barons, Vol. II. p. 478.

(t) See the article of BUTLER (THOMAS) Earl of Offory.

(u) Bennet's Letters, p. 135.

(w) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 189.

(x) See the article of DOWNING (Sir GEORGE).

(38) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 178.

(39) Memoirs of Roger Earl of Orrery, p. 24.

(40) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 176.

great a share in the transactions, which immediately preceded the King's return, as any man about him, without exception. When all things were fixed for that purpose, as he had attended His Majesty during his long exile, he accompanied him also into England, where he was immediately sworn of the Privy-Council, and made Lord Steward of the Household (y). He was soon after appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Somersetshire, and High-Steward of Westminster, Kingston, and Bristol, and restored to his office of Chancellor of the University of Dublin; neither was it long before the King gave him farther marks of affection and esteem, by restoring and augmenting the County Palatine of Tipperary, which his family had never enjoyed from the time of it's being seized by King James (z). He was also created Baron of Lanthony and Earl of Brecknock (a), and very particular regard was shewn by the Parliament also in respect to his estates; to all which the King likewise added some grants that brought him both honour and advantage [2]. A little before His Majesty's coronation, he was raised to the dignity of Duke of Ormond, and was created Lord High-Steward of England, on account of that solemnity at which he assisted in that high office (b). On the fourth of October 1662, he was declared Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, which was so satisfactory to that kingdom, that the Parliament made his Grace a present of thirty thousand pounds (c); and at the same time that his Grace sent a letter of acknowledgment to the House of Commons for this high and extraordinary favour, Secretary Nicholas acquainted the Lords Justices, that His Majesty considered that act of the Parliament as a mark of affection to himself. The King's marriage hindered the Duke's going over to Ireland so early as he intended, and did not arrive there 'till the twenty-seventh of July; yet he was so active and vigorous in the dispatch of business, that he passed the Act of Settlement, and some other necessary laws on the twenty-seventh of September, by which, order and good government in that kingdom were restored (d). His Grace had not been long in possession of his great employment, before he found himself involved in new troubles and dangers. The Exchequer was empty, the army had great arrears, the Act of Uniformity excited a very mutinous spirit among the fanatics, which soon after produced a dangerous conspiracy for surprizing the castle of Dublin and seizing the Duke, but this was disappointed by his vigilance, assisted by the informations he received from his friends, as we have already had occasion to show in another place (e). He had besides some other, and those too very considerable, discouragements. Sir Henry Bennet, lately made Secretary of State, grew upon that promotion very cool towards him; the Countess of Castlemain, the King's mistress, begged Phoenix-Park and

(y) Kennet's Register and Chronicle, p. 167.

(z) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 218.

(a) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 478.

(b) Bill. sig. de ann. 13 Car. II.

(c) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 237.

(d) See the several Letters and Addresses, together with the Lord-Lieutenant's excellent Speech, in the Appendix to Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 20—30.

(e) See the article of BLOOD (THOMAS), note [E]. State Letters of the Earl of Orery, p. 69.

[2] Added some grants that brought him both honour and advantage.] These grants were by letters patents under the great Seal, dated October 8, 1660, by which all the reserved rents of his estates and the privilege of wines which he enjoyed as Butler of Ireland, were put out of charge in the Exchequer, and all arrears which were due before April, were ordered to be paid to the Marquis, who had likewise granted to him all his debts by bills, bonds, statutes merchant, and of the staple, or otherwise due to persons, who had forfeited, all which being by such forfeiture devolved to the crown, were now ordered to be discharged (49). His Majesty likewise made him a grant of all the lands which had been formerly by the Marquis himself, or by any of his ancestors, Earls of Ormond and Oforry, mortgaged, granted, demised, leased, or to farm let, in fee, fee-farm, fee-tail, lives or years, and which were forfeited by the having an hand in the late rebellion, directing commissions to be issued for finding his Majesty's title to the premises; and upon return thereof, letters patents to be passed to the Marquis for the same (50). The King's letters were also sent for putting him in possession of the rest of his estate restored to him by the Parliament of England, with the following remarkable preamble, supposed to be drawn by Secretary Nicholas, which the reader cannot but judge worthy of his notice, as making a very material part of the personal history of this illustrious nobleman (51). 'It having pleased Almighty God, in so wonderful a manner, to restore us to our dominions and government, and thereby, into a power not only of protecting our good subjects, but of repairing by degrees the great damages and losses they have undergone in the late ill times, by their signal fidelity and zeal for our service, which we hold ourselves obliged in honour and conscience to do as soon, and by such means, as we shall be able: no body can wonder or envy, that we should, as soon as is possible, enter upon the due consideration of the very faithful, constant, and eminent service performed to our Father of blessed memory, and ourselves, upon the most abashed considerations of honour, duty, and conscience, and without the least pause or hesitation, by our right trusty and right entirely beloved cousin and counsellor, James, Marquis of Ormond, and Lord

Steward of our household, who from the very beginning of the rebellion in Ireland frankly engaged himself in the hardest and most difficult parts of our service, and laying aside all considerations or thought of his own particular fortune and convenience, as freely engaged, that as his person in the prosecution and advancement of our interest; and when the power of our enemies grew so great, that he was no longer able to contend with it, he withdrew himself from that our kingdom, and from that time attended our person in the parts beyond the sea, with the same constancy and alacrity, having been never from us, but always supporting our hopes and our spirits in our greatest distresses with his presence and counsels, in many occasions and designs of importance, having been our sole counsellor and companion. And therefore we say, all good men would wonder, if, being restored to any ease in our own fortune, we should not make haste to give him ease in his, that is so engaged and broken for us, and which his continual and most necessary attendance about us, must still keep him from attending himself with the care and diligence he might otherwise do. We knowing well, besides the arrears due to him during the time he commanded the army, and before he was Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, that from that time he was by our Royal father put into the supreme command of that kingdom; and during the whole time that he had the administration thereof, he hath never received any of the profits, emoluments, or appointments thereof, but wholly supported himself and our service upon his own fortune and inheritance, and over and above borrowed and supplied great sums of money upon the engagement or sale of his own lands, and disbursed the same upon carrying on the publick service, as well during the time of his first being there under our Royal Father, as since under us.' It must be a great satisfaction to the Marquis to be sensible, that this was not mere form or the overflowings of a venal cloquence, but bare matters of fact, plainly told by one who knew them to be such, and which, upon being either heard or read, would be so acknowledged by the most intelligent people in England and Ireland.

9) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. 218.

10) See this examined at large in the place before cited.

11) This agrees exactly in it's contents with the letter written by the same Secretary on the present made to the Marquis.

and House, but his Grace stopped the warrant, which drew upon him her displeasure; and the Queen-Mother, having taken the Marquis of Antrim under her protection, took occasion to differ with him upon that nobleman's account (f). These things however made no alteration in his conduct, and by degrees he got over most of the obstacles, to the settling the tranquillity of that island. A sum of money was remitted him which quieted the army, a small succour of five hundred well-affected men strengthened his security, which was farther augmented by making a considerable draught from the Irish army, for the service of Portugal (g). All things being now in a state of tolerable quietness, his Grace, with the King's permission, appointed his son, the Earl of Ossory, Lord-Deputy, and came over to England in May 1664 (h), and was received with great kindness by the King. He was far from being idle here, for as there were great complaints made of the Act of Settlement by different parties, the regulating these fell in a great measure to the share of the Duke, and it was chiefly through his care and indefatigable labours, that the Act of Explanation was framed and settled, and as soon as this was done he thought of returning to Ireland, where he landed on the third of September 1665 (i). The Parliament met in October following, and the great business of that session, was the passing the Act beforementioned, which was happily effected, though not without great difficulty. The discontents that prevailed among the army, which was but ill principled towards the government, were daily increased by want of pay; so that at length they shewed themselves mutinous, to a degree that broke out at last in an open insurrection at Carrickfergus, which however was suppressed by the Duke's dispatching his son, the Earl of Arran, with four companies of guards by sea the very night he received the news, and the flame hindered from extending itself by the Duke's marching thither in person (k). By the like care and activity, other designs of the Malecontents were defeated, and the kingdom kept tolerably quiet. He made use of all his interest in England, in order to prevent the passing an Act for prohibiting the importation of Irish cattle, but to no purpose, for the Duke of Buckingham's party made a point of it and carried it (l). He foresaw all the ill consequences that attended this law, and did what he could to prevent them, and to find out various methods to ballance them [R]. The close friendship between his Grace and Lord Clarendon, drew upon him the hatred of all those who studied, and brought about the misfortune of that great man; and at the same time that they contrived this, they were endeavouring to find out pretences for impeaching the Duke of Ormond, in which however they were disappointed (m). But the very rumour had bad effects, more especially in Ireland, which was at that time in such a situation, as made it but too easy for things of this nature to do mischief. In the month of May 1668, his Grace came over to England, as well in obedience to the King's commands, as to take care of his concerns both publick and private; when [R] And to find methods to ballance them. This act for the prohibiting the importation of Irish cattle into England, was a matter of very great importance to both nations; and though the subject was handled by the best heads, and the best pens, on both sides of the water, yet it does not appear, that the real consequences of this law (52) were discerned on either side. It took up the attention of both Houses, during two sessions of Parliament, was pushed with all imaginable vehemence, and supported with extraordinary clamour, on one side, and opposed with great vigour, with much show of argument, and with many laboured computations, on the other. Yet, I think it very plainly appears from the event, that neither side was in the right. The truth of the matter seems to be, that the Duke of Buckingham and the rest of the great patrons of this law were of opinion, that it would distress the Irish exceedingly, that it would increase the discontents, and augment the difficulties in administering affairs in that island which were already but too many, and consequently perplex the Duke of Ormond, and his friends (53). There were also some particular advantages aimed at, by giving this trade to Scotland, which engaged the Earl of Lauderdale and Lord Ashley to promote it, as well as private prejudices to be gratified, which drew in all the enemies to the Earl of Clarendon's administration; but the pretences used, were the preventing an immense loss to the English nation, by the purchase of Irish cattle, which it was said had sunk the rents of England, two hundred thousand pounds a year, though the highest computation of the amount of Irish cattle, annually sold in England, fell short of one hundred and fifty thousand pounds. On the other hand, those who opposed the bill, fixing their attention entirely on the present benefits, that accrued to Ireland (54) by this trade, which was almost the only one that kingdom then had, looked upon it as a measure as ruinous on one side, as it was cruel on the other. Such as had estates or interests in Ireland, looked upon themselves as deeply concerned in the event; and all the friends of the court, who knew that the King was in his judgment against this law, laboured with the utmost diligence to hinder it from passing. But after all, when this law came to take effect, its consequences showed them to be all mistaken, for the pains and diligence employed by the Duke of Ormond, and all his friends, in supporting what they took to be Irish interest, endeared both him and them to that nation; so that design of the party absolutely miscarried in that respect (55). At to the interest of the two nations, the English certainly were far enough from being hurt by this traffick; and the Irish, by the passing of this law, being obliged to look out for foreign markets, to feed sheep, and to fall into manufactures; were so far from being hurt by it, that they derived several advantages from it (56), which otherwise they could never have attained to, and of which, few or none were foreseen by their friends. The bill passed through the House of Commons in the first session in five days; and in the last session, the great question was carried by one hundred and sixty-five against one hundred sixty-four; in the House of Lords, the numbers were sixty-three against forty-seven; and it was observed, that all the Bishops were in the minority. The King had procured it to be once laid aside, and had taken a resolution never to pass it, but was so much afraid of losing his supplies, that he thought himself obliged to do it, tho' much against his will (57). As for the Duke of Ormond, he applied himself, on the one hand, to lessen, as far as he was able, the great inconveniences that immediately ensued upon this law; and, on the other hand, to the promoting the stoff-manufactures and the linnen trade, which he did with such vigour, that in less than two years time they became very considerable, which induced an excellent judge of the interest of Ireland to say (58), That posterity would own their future affluence to be a blessing they derived from his Grace's great wisdom and incomparable government.

(f) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 271—277.

(g) Kennet's Register and Chronicle, p. 725. Heath's Chron. p. 510.

(h) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. P. iii. p. 7.

(i) Hist. of the Reign of King Charles II. p. 392.

(k) Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 263.

(l) The Interest of Ireland considered, p. 73.

(m) Modest Account of the present Posture of Affairs in England, p. 23.

(52) England's Interest with respect to Ireland truly stated, p. 91. Sir William Petty's Political Anatomy of Ireland, p. 125.

(53) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 329—345.

(54) Paxton's Disc. concerning the nature, advantages, and improvement of Trade, p. 45—59. Gee's Trade and Navigation of Great Britain considered, p. 27.

(55) The Secret Causes and Intrigues of the Romish Party in Ireland, p. 13.

(56) Sir William Petty's Political Anatomy of Ireland, p. 91. Gee's Trade and Navigation of Great Britain considered, p. 28. Sir William Petty's Political Arithmetick, p. 252.

(57) Political Observations on the Reigns of Charles II. and James II. p. 75.

(58) Lawrence's Interest of Ireland, and it's Trade and Wealth stated, p. 189.

when he drew near London, he was met by abundance of persons of distinguished rank and fortune, who, from a rare principle of generosity, thought it became them to show this mark of respect for the Duke, merely on account of those rumours (n). He was well received by the King, and upon a very severe and strict enquiry into his conduct, there appeared no ground for censure. Notwithstanding this, an opinion generally prevailed that he would not long continue Lord-Lieutenant, of which he spoke to the King in very pathetic terms, making use amongst others of these, 'that though it would never trouble him to be undone for His Majesty, yet it would be an insupportable affliction to be undone by him (o).' The King gave him all the assurances in the world, and very probably meant as he spoke, but the Duke of Buckingham, who now governed all, made him so uneasy that at length he resolved to displace him, as he did in the spring of the year 1669 (p). John Lord Roberts of Truro, then Lord Privy-Seal, was appointed to succeed him, who behaved towards his Grace with all imaginable decency, as the Duke also did to him. When this news reached Ireland it was very ill received, and those who had shewn coolness enough towards the Duke's administration, appeared to be very warmly affected by his being removed, and the discontents which this occasioned increased afterward very perceptibly (q). To balance the loss of favour at Court, his Grace received a new and high office, merely from respect to his reputation. Dr Gilbert Sheldon, Archbishop of Canterbury, being very old and infirm, resigned his post of Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and that learned Body, as a mark of their esteem, unanimously elected the Duke of Ormond August 4, 1669 (r). Those who had been instrumental in removing his Grace, could not bear to see him so popular, and therefore they had recourse to all the arts that could be devised for tarnishing his administration, and to make the world believe that he had raised a prodigious fortune at the expence of the publick (s). His Grace took care to refute every thing of this kind in so full a manner, that little or no dirt stuck, and the world was particularly satisfied of the falshood of what was suggested in respect to his private fortune [S]. His successor, the Lord Roberts, was removed the year following, and having in the mean time lost his post of Privy-Seal in England, this disgusted him so much that he resolved to retire, as for some time he did, but was afterwards made Lord President of the Privy-Council (t). The Lord Berkeley of Stratton was sent over Lord-Lieutenant in his room, and under his administration it was, that very extraordinary favours were granted to the worst sort of Irish Papists, which afterwards created much trouble in that

(n) Historical Remembrancer, p. 91.

(o) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II, p. 372.

(p) History of England, Vol. II, p. 429.

(q) Impartial View of the Affairs of Ireland since the Restoration, p. 55.

(r) Hist. & Antiquitat. Univ. Oxon. p. 440.

(s) See the Sale and Settlement of Ireland, published in that year, and said to be written by Peter Talbot, the Popish Archbishop of Dublin.

(t) Peerage of England, Vol. II, p. 393.

[S] The falshood of what was suggested in respect to his private fortune. We have a very large account given us by Mr Carte, of the libels that were published about this time against his Grace, which represented him as one who had made immense advantages, under colour of past services, by dint of his great popularity in England and Ireland, and by the high favour he stood in with the King his master; we are also furnished with all the answers that were given to these; but to take notice of either, would extend this article beyond it's due bounds, and therefore we will content ourselves with giving the reader a succinct and very curious state of the account between the Duke of Ormond and the publick, which by that writer is thus represented (59).

(59) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II, p. 403, 409.

| The Duke of Ormond creditor. | |
|---|------------------------|
| To loss of nine years income of his estate in Ireland, from October 1641, to December 1650, at 20,000 l. a year | 180,000 00 00 |
| To waste of timber, buildings, &c. on it | 50,000 00 00 |
| To 2½ years income from 1650 to 1653 | 50,000 00 00 |
| To debts contracted by the service of the crown during the troubles | 130,000 00 00 |
| To seven years rents of his estate from 1653 to 1660, recoverable from the adventurers and soldiers that possessed it | 140,000 00 00 |
| To the value of estates forfeited to him by breach of conditions, the remainders whereof were vested in him, but given up by an Act of Explanation | 319,061 05 00 |
| To arrears of pay, as Lord-Lieutenant, commissioned officer, &c. | 62,736 09 08 |
| To ditto for fourteen months, from July 1647 to September 1648, at the rate of the allowance of 7893 l. a year to the Earl of Leicester, during his absence from Ireland | 9,208 10 00 |
| To ditto for nine years and four months, from December 1650, to June 1660, at ditto | 73,668 00 00 |
| Total of losses and credits | 1,014,674 04 08 |

| The Duke of Ormond debtor. | |
|---|----------------------|
| By receipts on the 30,000 l. Act in Ireland | 26,440 00 00 |
| By ditto on the grant of 71916 l. | 63,129 10 08 |
| By ditto on the 50,000 l. granted by the Explanation Act | 25,196 01 11 |
| By savings on the grant of forfeited mortgages and incumbrances | 5,655 12 10 |
| By houses, &c. on Killenny, Clonmel, &c. valued by Commissioners at 840 l. 12 s. a year, at ten years purchase | 14,012 02 04 |
| By lands allotted on account of his arrears, set at first for 110 l. but afterwards improved, and set in 1681 at 159 l. a year, but being subject to a quit rent of 449 l. a year, their improved yearly value is but 1165 l. at ten years purchase | 11,650 00 02 |
| Total of profit | 146,083 07 11 |
| Total of losses and dues to the Duke of Ormond | 1,014,674 04 08 |
| Deduct as by particular of profits | 146,083 07 11 |
| So that the Duke's losses by the troubles and settlement of Ireland, exceeded his profits | 868,590 16 9 |

(u) A full and impartial Account of all the secret Consults, Negotiations, Stratagems, and Intrigues of the Romish Party in Ireland from the Restoration to the Revolution, p. 7. Cox's History of Ireland, Vol. II. p. iii. p. 11.

(v) London Gazette, Decemb. 3, 1670. See the article of B L O O D (THOMAS) note [T]. Echard's Hist. of England, p. 869.

(x) Sir Gilbert Talbot's Narrative of Blood's stealing the Crown, preserved in Stow's Survey of London, by Strype, Vol. I. p. 92.

(y) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 462.

(z) Memoirs of the Reign of Charles II, p. 397.

(a) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 463. Cox's History of Ireland, Vol. II. p. iii. p. 14.

that kingdom. As this and other transactions created many complaints to the King, who examined them in Council; his Grace of Ormond had frequent opportunities of explaining things, and setting the affairs of Ireland in a right light. This heightened the resentments of those who were friends to Lord Berkeley, and who had sent him to Ireland (u), more especially the Duke of Bucks, by whose procurement as is generally believed, or at least not without his participation, a most outrageous and detestable attempt was made upon the person of the Duke. The Prince of Orange, afterwards King William, being at this time in England, was invited December 6, 1670, to dine in the city, whither his Grace attended him, and in his return home he was attacked in St James's street, and forced out of his coach by Colonel Blood, who, it is believed, intended to have hanged him at Tyburn, if he had not happily been rescued (v). The King expressed very high resentment on the first news of this insult, but was afterwards prevailed upon by its author, to send the Earl of Arlington to the Duke, to desire he would forgive Blood, for certain reasons which he had orders to tell him. His Grace answered, 'if the King could forgive him stealing his crown, he might easily forgive his attempt upon his life; and if such was his Majesty's pleasure, that was a sufficient reason for him, and his Lordship might spare the rest (x).' In the course of seven years, that his Grace was equally out of favour and employment, he never missed any opportunity of doing either his Sovereign or his country service, or of paying his duty at Court, which he did in such a manner, that notwithstanding the great influence his enemies had over his master, which went so far as to hinder him from speaking to the Duke for a whole year; yet they could never deceive him into a censure of any part of his Grace's management in Ireland, though they led him into several enquiries with that view, or prevail upon him to take from his Grace his White Staff as Lord Steward (y). It must be allowed that there were good reasons why the Duke stood ill with this Ministry, since he had three capital faults. In the first place he was a hearty friend, as well as a sincere son, of the Church, and therefore never courted either the Papists or the Fanatics. He depended solely upon the King's sentiments, and would never stoop so low as to make any interest with his mistresses; and, which was not his least crime, he was very cool towards France (z). At last, when His Majesty seemed to have overlooked at least, if not forgot, all his former services, and saw him at Court with the utmost indifferency; in the latter end of April 1677, he surprized the Duke, with a message that he would come and sup with him. He did so, and was entertained with all the freedom and mirth that the most dutiful and sincere affection could suggest; so that before he went away, his Majesty disclosed the business of his visit, which was the resolution he had taken to make his Grace once more Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland (a) [T].

As

[T] To make his Grace once more Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland] In the whole reign of King Charles II, there was not a more extraordinary incident than this, of restoring the Duke of Ormond to the Lieutenancy of Ireland, not only beyond his own expectations, and against even the hopes of his friends, but without any seeking of his or assistance of theirs; in short, by the issue of a court-intrigue, in which he had not the smallest concern (60), thus, then it was brought about. The Earl of Essex made Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, in 1672, was a nobleman of great integrity and honour, a true friend to the English and Protestant interest in Ireland, and yet at the time he was put into this government, and during the space he continued in it, extremely well with the Duke of York. The party at court that had ruined and driven the Earl of Clarendon out of the kingdom, removed the Duke of Ormond from the Lieutenancy of Ireland, made the second Dutch war, and themselves infamous to posterity by the title of the Cabal, were those who secretly abetted the complaints against the Earl of Essex, and who at last determined the King to remove him (61): I say, that they secretly abetted the complaints against him, because many of them professed themselves his friends, and had address enough to deceive him, both then and afterwards. The scheme they had in view was to put the government for a small time into the hands of Lords Justices, and then to procure the Lieutenancy for the Duke of Monmouth, in which, from the King's natural affection to his son (62), they judged, they should meet with very little difficulty. But this design of theirs could not be carried on with such secrecy as to escape the knowledge of the Duke of York, who, as it may be easily imagined, was not a little alarmed at it. His Royal Highness had no concern in the removal of the Earl of Essex, of whom he had then a very high opinion; but when once he had found out that the Duke of Monmouth was intended for his successor, he resolved to leave no stone unturned to prevent this scheme from taking effect; and therefore took occasion to mention to his Majesty the great services of the Duke of Ormond, and to represent to him in the strongest light the necessity he was under of putting the government of Ireland into the hands of a person in whom he could absolutely confide, and whose reputation was effectually established with all the well-meaning part of his subjects in both nations (63). It was no sooner suggested to his Majesty, than he saw it in that point of light, which tended most to his own security; there was no man he esteemed more, and hardly any he could depend upon so much as this nobleman; and therefore he immediately resolved, that he should be the person. There were various attempts made to alter the King's sentiments in this respect, but to no purpose, he very clearly perceived, that some dark and dangerous designs were brewing, and he was equally afraid of the violence of the Papists, and of the secret plots of the Republicans. He knew that both parties were strong in Ireland; and he knew likewise, that the Duke of Ormond was, of all men living, the most capable of defending him against both, and therefore he was inflexible in his determination of putting that kingdom into his hands (64). How well his Majesty judged upon this occasion appeared, not only from the loud and general approbation this measure met with, both in England and Ireland, but also from the particular conduct of the Earl of Essex. That nobleman, well knowing his Majesty's good-nature, was no sooner acquainted, that his removal was a thing fixed, than he desired and obtained leave to quit the sword, when, and to whom he thought proper. But as soon as he was informed, that the Duke of Ormond was appointed Lord-Lieutenant, he changed his resolution, for which he gave this reason in a letter (65); Since his Majesty has been pleased to pitch upon a person, who has so much experience in all affairs in this kingdom, and so eminent for his loyalty; I am resolved to lay 'till his Grace shall arrive, that I may put the sword myself into his hands.' He carried this still further, by making a special order for receiving the Duke of Ormond with all the solemnity and pomp imaginable, too long to be inserted; and to which therefore it is sufficient to refer (66).

(63) Hist. of the Reign of King Charles II, p. 391.

(64) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 465.

(65) This letter is dated from Dublin, Aug. 17, 1677.

(66) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 465.

(60) Compl. History of England, Vol. III. p. 360.

(61) A full and impartial Account of all the secret Consults, &c. p. 13.

(62) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 465, 466.

As unexpected as the King's choice was, it no sooner became publick, than it was extremely well received in England, and with very unusual marks of joy in Ireland, though the Lord-Lieutenant they then had on the removal of Lord Berkeley, viz. the Earl of Essex, had taken much pains to make himself master of their affairs, and had managed them with great integrity and honour. It is certain, that this conduct of his, did not hinder him from having, perhaps might contribute to procure him, enemies, who had even the boldness to attack his behaviour at the Council-Board, where, from a mere principle of justice, he was very warmly and very effectually defended by the Duke of Ormond, before there was any probability of his succeeding him (b). This however had such an effect upon the Earl of Essex, that when his Grace came over, in August 1677, to take the sword, he surrendered it with very unusual and even unexampled marks of esteem. Almost as soon as he entered on his government, the Duke met with things to disturb him, A Popish regiment had been raised, under pretence of being intended for foreign service, but remained in the kingdom longer than there seemed to be any necessity, under pretence of their being disciplined, and for the same reason his Grace was desired to furnish them with arms; which he positively refused, adding that they might very well learn their exercise with sticks (c). The Protestant army he put into the best condition possible, gave orders for repairing all the forts, and caused a new one to be raised for protecting Kingsale Harbour, which he called Fort Charles. The very next year the Popish plot broke out, and an account was transmitted to the Lord-Lieutenant, of discoveries which had been made, of dangers to which Ireland was exposed; intimating also, some designs against his person. Upon this he caused Peter Talbot, the Popish Archbishop of Dublin, and every way worthy of that office, as having been the greatest incendiary in the kingdom, to be apprehended; and, by proclamation, ordered all the Dignitaries of the Church of Rome, to depart the kingdom by the twentieth of November: he took this opportunity also of disarming the Papists, and making such orders with respect to the army, that it was impossible either for officers or private men of that communion to shelter themselves therein (d). All these, and other wise precautions, he daily took; which however did not protect him from various calumnies in England; but these made no sort of impression upon him, for knowing that kingdom better than any other man, he went on his own way with great firmness; and the consequences of his regulations, fully answered all his expectations. Some attempts however were made to remove him, and a report of this prevailed so strongly, that the Earl of Arlington, who was now become his Grace's warm friend, took occasion to mention it to the King, whose temper was by this time very much changed, as appeared by the short answer he gave him, which was to this effect, 'that the new Ministers he had got, were for jostling out his old friends, but they should never gain that point of him;' adding with an oath, That while the Duke of Ormond lived he should never be put out of that government (e). The Duke of York was also of the same opinion. All this however did not discourage his enemies in England from prosecuting their old designs, and even forming new ones, in order to procure his removal from the Lieutenancy [U].

(b) A full and impartial Account of all the secret Consults, &c. P. 13. Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. P. iii. p. 14. Laurence's Interest of Ireland, P. 255.

(c) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. P. iii. p. 14. Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. P. 360.

(d) A full and impartial Account of all the secret Consults, &c. P. 15, 16. Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. II. P. iii. p. 14.

(e) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. P. 492.

In

[U] In order to procure his removal from the Lieutenancy.] After the breaking out of the Popish plot, it was impossible for one of the Duke's rank, and in his station, to pass his days in peace. The very cares of his office at such a time, were more than sufficient to exercise all his diligence and attention; and there is no doubt, that they did. But how well soever he might perform what was incumbent upon him from his post; it was impossible, that he should give satisfaction to all parties, indeed, hardly possible, that he should give satisfaction to any; for whatever he did, the Papists thought too much (67), and the malecontents in England, whatever they thought, were ready enough to assert, he did too little. As his Grace wanted no information of all that passed, as well to his prejudice as his advantage; so no body knew better how to make a defence, than he did, as appears from the following extract of a letter of his to Sir Robert Southwell, which deserves a place for two reasons; first, because it fully clears the point now under our eye; and next, because it affords us a specimen of this nobleman's way of writing, which, if I mistake not, will satisfy every judicious peruser, that his Grace's character would have appeared, even in a light superior to what it now does, had he found leisure to be his own Historian (68). 'It hath been my fortune, upon several occasions, to be taken by the Papists, to be their greatest enemy, when it was thought that character would have done me hurt, and sometimes to be their greatest friend, when that would hurt me; and (which is unreasonable) the very same men have been believed, when they have made so different a description of me. A little indulgence towards one, will seem to conclude from thence, that I am in neither extreme, that is, neither transported with fury against them that are of that religion, because some of them, and perhaps too many, are traitors and murderers, not trusting too much to them, because, I believe, some of them are good subjects and honest men. It may be perhaps unseasonable to profess such a temper; yet it may be as soon excused in me as in any man, for if there be truth in the information of Oates, I am to wait upon the King in the tragedy designed, tho' I really profess, I had rather go before him, even for my own sake, because I would not live to see the calamities and confusions that would follow, if such a villany should have success. — It seems now to be the Papists turn, to endeavour to dispatch me; the other Non-conformists have had theirs, and may have again, when they shall be inspired from the same place, for different reasons, to attempt the same thing. I know the danger I am and may be in, is a perquisite belonging to the place I am in, and so much envied for being in; but I will not be frightened into a resignation, and will be found alive or dead in it, till the same hand that placed me, shall remove me. — I know well, that I am born with some disadvantages, in relation to the present conjuncture, besides my natural weaknesses and infirmities, and such as I can no more free myself from, than I can from them. My father and mother lived and died Papists, and only I, by God's merciful providence was educated in the true Protestant Religion, from which I never swerved towards either extreme, not when it was most dangerous to profess it, and most advantageous to quit it. I reflect not upon any, who have held another course, but will charitably hope, that though their changes happened to be always to the prosperous side, yet they were made by the force of present conviction. My brothers and sisters, though they were not very many, were very fruitful and very obstinate (they will call it constant) in their

(b) A full and impartial Account of all the secret Consults, &c. P. 15.

(c) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. P. 489.

In the midst of these publick difficulties, one of the greatest that could reach him in his private capacity, exercised his patience, which was the death of the Earl of Offory his eldest son, whom he loved with the tenderneſs of a father and the affection of a friend (f). He bore this loss however with great steadineſs, nor did he discover any marks of impatience, when within three weeks after ſo great a miſfortune, he found himſelf obliged to answer a new liſt of objections, which his enemies had prepared againſt his adminiſtration, with a view perhaps of picking more out of his answers than they knew how to thruſt into their charge. In this he diſappointed them, for he kept cloſe to his defence, and contented himſelf with ſhowing that what they ſuggeſted was either fooliſh or falſe (g). By this he preſerved his power, but not the exerciſe of it in ſuch an extent as he wiſhed; for though the times required, and himſelf preſſed, for a Parliament in Ireland, yet he was not permitted to call one, for both the intereſts at Court were now united againſt him, and tho' they could not prevail upon the King to part with his Lord-Lieutenant, yet they kept the Lord-Lieutenant from calling a Parliament (h). At laſt His Maſteſty conſidered the great proof the Duke had given of his abilities, in keeping all Ireland quiet during the time of the Popiſh plot, when England was in the utmoſt confuſion, reſolved to ſend for him over, which he did in the ſpring of the year 1682; and his Grace having ſettled affairs in Ireland, and left the ſword with his ſon Richard, Earl of Arran, landed at Cheſter on the ſecond of May (i). He was received by the King, with all the marks of affection and eſteem that his ſervices could deſerve, and, without doubt, his preſence and counſels were of great uſe to his Maſter in that critical juncture, which induced him to delay no longer a favour he had ſome time intended for his Grace, which was raiſing him to the title of Duke in England; and this was accordingly done by a patent, dated November the ninth, in the thirty-fourth year of His Maſteſty's reign, by the title of Ormond (k). All this however did not give him ſufficient weight to procure the King's aſſent to the meaſure which he had moſt at heart, which was the holding a parliament in Ireland; on the contrary, the earneſtneſs with which he pushed this was prejudicial to his intereſt, procured firſt an order for him to return to that kingdom, which he readily obeyed; and before he was well there, a reſolution to remove him from his government, which he received when he leaſt expected it (l). As diſagreeable as this news might be, it was followed by another piece of intelligence which gave him infinitely more diſquiet, and that was the King's death, an event which he had always apprehended, and for which in his private commerce with his friends, he expreſſed the moſt ſenſible concern. He cauſed King James II. to be proclaimed, as his duty required; but he was very ſoon made ſenſible, notwithstanding all the ſervices he had rendered that Prince, at a ſeaſon when it was moſt dangerous to render him ſervice, of a wide difference between his Maſters; for whereas King Charles would never have obliged him to ſurrender the ſword in perſon; one of the firſt orders he received from his ſucceſſor, was to give it up to the Lord Primate and the Earl of Granard, which he did on the laſt of March 1685 (m). It may indeed be ſaid in excuſe of King James, that the Duke of Ormond having a great foreſight of the changes that were like to happen, employed all the time, from his laſt arrival in Ireland, in taking the beſt meaſures he was able, for the ſecurity of the Proteſtant and Engliſh intereſt in that iſland, which was reſented to a degree of fury by the Iriſh, tho' without it's having any effect upon him, who behaved with the ſame ſteadineſs from the time he received 'till he parted with the enſigns of his authority [W].

In

' their way, their fruitfulneſs, hath ſpread into a large
' alliance, and their obſtinacy hath made it altogether
' Popiſh. It would be no ſmall comfort to me, if ' it had pleaſed God it had been otherwiſe, that I ' might have enlarged my induſtry, to do them good,
' and ſerved them more effectually to them, and more
' ſafely to myſelf. But as it is, I am taught by nature,
' and alſo by inſtruction, that difference in opinion,
' concerning matters of religion, diſſolves not the ob' ligations of nature; and in conformity to this prin' ciple, I own, not only, that I have done, but that ' I will do my relations, of that, or any other per' ſwaſion, all the good I can. But I profeſs, at the ' ſame time, that if I find any of them, who are ' neareſt to me, acting or conſpiring rebellion, or
' plotting againſt the government and the religion
' eſtabliſhed amongſt us, I will endeavour to bring ' them to puniſhment, ſooner than the remotest ſtranger
' to my blood. I know profeſſions of this nature are
' eaſily made, and therefore ſometimes little credited,
' but I claim ſome belief from my known practice,
' having been ſo unfortunate, as to have had kiſnmen
' in rebellion, and ſo fortunate, as to ſee ſome of ' them fall, when I commanded in chief. Thoſe that ' remain, have, I hope, changed their principles, as
' to rebellion; if they have not, I am ſure, they ſhall
' find, I have not changed mine.'

[W] 'Till be parted with the enſigns of his authority.] We have often quoted in this article, a treaſure intituled, 'A full and impartial Account of all the ſecret Conſults, Negotiations, and Stratagems;

' Intrigues of the Romiſh Party in Ireland, from the ' Reſtoration to the Revolution, for the Settlement of ' Popery in that Kingdom.' Printed frequently by itſelf,
' and ſince placed in the Appendix to the State-Tracts,
' in the reign of King William III. It is written with ' great ſpirit, and is one of the principal authorities which
' Mr Oldmixon conſulted in writing his Hiſtory, ſo
' that we may be ſure, that it contains nothing partial,
' in favour of the Duke of Ormond. The author of ' this piece, ſpeaking of his Grace's conduct, after
' the acceſſion of King James, deſcribes it thus, 'The ' Duke of Ormond foreſaw (69) what was now paſt
' remedy, and told a friend of his, that nothing
' could now preſerve the Engliſh, but a precipitate
' of the Iriſh. Fer, ſaid he, let my countrymen alone, ' and they will ſpoil their own buſineſs. And ſo, in' deed, they had in any time but thi, when it ' might be ſaid, according to our Saviour's prediction,
' That the time was come, when they that deſtroyed
' the Proteſtants, thought they did God ſervice. King
' James, and his former (but now more eſpecial) fa' vourites, the Iriſh, were become equally furious in ' their courſe, and ſeemed to contend, the one, in his ' commands, the other in their forward obedience, which
' ſhould exceed in their joint deſign, of entrepating
' hereſy. The Duke of Ormond was called over,
' but before his departure laboured with an indefa' tigable diligence, to eſtabliſh matters on ſuch a ' foundation, that it might not be eaſy for them to ' create a preſent change, without a manifeſt viola' tion and infringement of the laws and conſtitutions
' of

(f) Echard's Hiſt. of England, p.
1001.

(g) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II.
p. 509.

(h) A full and impartial Account of all the ſecret Conſults, &c.
p. 17.

(i) Cox's Hiſt. of Ireland, Vol. II.
p. iii. p. 15, 16.

(k) Compl. Hiſt. of England, Vol.
III. p. 406.

(l) Carte's Life, of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II.
p. 541.
Cox's Hiſt. of Ireland, Vol. II.
p. iii. p. 16.

(m) Compleat
Hiſt. of England,
Vol. III. p. 449.

(69) A Coll. of oc-of State Tracts
published during the Reign of William III.
Vol. III. p. 69.

In performing this, which could be no very agreeable act, his Grace was very much surprized by the Lord Primate's making a long speech, in which, with great plainness and perspicuity, he insisted upon the miseries which that kingdom had endured, and the deplorable condition it was in when his Grace was called to the government of it; he insisted also on the principal benefits derived from the Duke's gentle and wise administration; and concluded with observing, that as the effects of his prudence would be always felt, it was to be hoped they would produce perpetual gratitude towards the Ormond family in the whole Irish nation (n). On his arrival in England, his Grace was received with all possible marks of respect and affection, by all ranks of people, and with great civility by the King, at whose coronation he assisted, as at that of King Charles II. and had the honour to carry the crown. He wanted not however some very sensible mortifications, for his regiment of foot was without ceremony taken from him, and given to Col. Justin Mackarty, and it is thought that his troop of horse would have been likewise disposed of, but as his Grace bought it fifty years before, it was not thought proper to repay the price he gave, in the decline of life, when his great age promised a speedy vacancy (o). He still kept his post of Lord Steward, which he might have disposed of to advantage; but as it was given him freely by his late Royal Master, he scorned to sell it, yet he saw no reason to resign it; and no arguments could prevail upon King James to take it away. In August 1686, the King made a progress into the West, in which his Grace attended him as far as Bristol, and then His Majesty making longer stages than were proper for a person of his age, the Duke returned to London (p). His affection for the person of the King, as well as his steady loyalty, induced him to behave to that Monarch with all imaginable marks of duty and respect; but the violent counsels by which that unfortunate Prince was hurried to his ruin, forced the Duke of Ormond, as well as several others of his best subjects, to oppose his will in cases that were directly contrary to law, an extraordinary instance of which will be given in the notes (q) [X]. This did not hinder however King James's causing some

(n) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 543.

(o) Succinct Account of the Affairs of Ireland, p. 107.

(p) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 543.

(q) Memoirs of the Life of Dr Burnet, Master of the Charter-House.

attempts

of the Kingdom. The new hospital, a stately fabric, near Dublin, erected for poor Soldiers, would (he foresaw) be made a nest for hornets, which, to prevent, as well as possible, he sat several days with the Council and Judges, in private, in the castle, and there made all the provision, that could be for it, against the imminent storm. One remarkable passage, I must not omit to mention, which demonstrates the great spirit of that excellent person. As the aforesaid hospital, he appointed a dinner for all the officers of the hospital, and the officers of the army, then in Dublin, which being over, he took a large glass of wine in his hand, and bid them fill it up to the brim, then stood up and called to all the company, Look here, gentlemen, they say at Court, I am now become an old dotting fool; you see, my hand doth not shake, nor does my heart fail; nor doubt but I will make some of them see their mistake: and so drank the King's health. But upon his arrival at court, he found, that King James's bigotted opinion would carry him to the most violent actions; a dismal apprehension whereof, as is believed, at length, broke his heart; for tho' he was of a great age, yet he was of such health of body and cheerfulness of mind, that, in course of nature, he might have lived twenty years longer, as his mother did. It was plain, that the Irish could fasten no calumnies upon him, when the first thing they reproached him with, was cheating the army in building the hospital; and that Robinson, the Architect, had enriched himself by it; when indeed, not to lessen any thing of his due character, Robinson shewed the parts of an excellent artist in the contrivance, and of an honest man in the charge, as men of value and experience in building affirm.

[X] An extraordinary instance of which will be given in the notes.] The first instance in which the King took upon him to exercise this prerogative was, with regard to Sutton's Hospital, called the Charter-house (70): and in the case of one Andrew Popham, a Roman Catholic, whom by a letter, dated December 20th, 1686, and directed to the Governors of that hospital, he required to be admitted into the first pensioner's place, that became vacant, and in his disposal, without tendering him any oath, or requiring of him any subscription in conformity to the doctrine and discipline of the Church of England, and notwithstanding any statute, order, or constitution of the said hospital, with which he was pleased to dispense. Dr Thomas Burnet, was at this time, Master of the Charter-house, having been chosen, not long before, by the interest of the Duke of Ormond, to whose grandson, the Earl of Ossory, he had been Governor. The Bishops, who were of the number of the electors, had made exceptions to him, that though he was a clergyman, he went always in a lay habit. But the Duke being satisfied that his conversation and manners were worthy of a clergyman in all respects; and thinking these to be much more valuable than the exterior habit, insisted so strongly in his favour, that he was at last chosen. Popham coming to him with his letter, demanded admission, but was told, that the letter must be delivered to the Governors, before any thing could be done upon it; and was dismissed without admission. On January 17th, there was a full assembly of the Governors, when Popham being present, the letter was read, and the Lord Chancellor Jefferys presently moved, that they should immediately, without any debate, proceed to vote, whether Popham should be accordingly admitted; Dr Burnet, as the junior Governor was to vote first, but instead thereof, he told them, he thought it his duty to acquaint their Lordships, that to admit a pensioner into that hospital, without taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, was not only contrary to the constitutions of the house, but also to an Act of Parliament, 3 Car. called The Charter-house Act. One of the Governors thereupon, saying, 'What is this to the purpose;' the Duke of Ormond replied, 'He thought it was very much to the purpose, for an Act of Parliament was not so slight a thing, but that it deserved consideration.' After some discourse, the question was put, whether Popham should be admitted; and was carried in the negative. The Governors intended to have returned immediately an answer to the King's letter, but as soon as the vote was passed, the Chancellor and some others hurried away; so that there was not a sufficient number left to act as an assembly, or to do any more business at that time. The Archbishop of Canterbury attempted several times afterwards to have another assembly, that the letter might be written to the King; but could not get a full number together, 'till the Midsummer following. In the mean time, one Cardonnel, a French Protestant, naturalized and qualified for the place, appeared with a nomination from the King, prior to Popham's. His Majesty thereupon, sent another letter, dated March 21st, to exclude him, and to reinforce his former order for Popham, to whom was likewise granted a dispensation under the great seal. This second letter, and the letters patents, were read on Midsummer-day, in a stated assembly, where nine Governors were present. A letter was then drawn up in the name of the Governors, to one of the Secretaries of State, representing, that they could not admit Popham, nor comply with his Majesty's letters in his behalf, because the hospital was of a private foundation,

3) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 546.

attempts to be made upon the Duke's religion, by the Lord Arundel of Wardour, then Privy-Seal, and the Duke's intimate friend; and by Peter Walsh, a very honest well meaning Priest, to whom the Duke had been very kind; but both ended in such repulses, as gave no encouragement to make new trials (r). His Majesty himself solicited the Duke for his consent to abolish the Penal Laws; but met with such an answer as he did not expect; to which he made a very memorable reply, that as his Grace had distinguished himself from others, by his long and faithful service to the crown, so he would also distinguish him from others by his indulgence (s). When the Earl of Clarendon went to Ireland, he lent his country-seat at Cornbury in Oxfordshire, to the Duke of Ormond, at which place he spent some part of two summers, and the rest at other places. He intended to have followed his Majesty in his next progress, and had provided accordingly; but being seized with the gout at Badminton, he was forced to remain there for about a month, when His Majesty passing that way, in his road to and from Chester, made him a visit each time in his chamber (t). At the last of these visits, he gave him leave to reside where he pleased, without being tied to any attendance, as Lord Steward; and his Grace thereupon hired Kingston-Hall in Dorsetshire, whither he was carried from Badminton in a very ill state of health. In the summer he grew better; but a little before Midsummer was seized with a kind of ague, which held him to the last; he kept up his spirits however with great fortitude, and expressed much pleasure in seeing his great-grandson, the young Lord Thurles, then about two years old, play by his bed-side. As he had always lived, so he died, a member of the Church of England, July 21, 1688, in the seventy eighth year of his age; and his corps being removed to London, was on the fourth of August following interred in Westminster-Abbey (u). He was without doubt one of the best, as well as the greatest men of his time; had all the virtues requisite to adorn a man of his rank, and very few foibles. In respect to his personal accomplishments, he was exceeded by none, and equalled but by few; he had the look and air of a man of Quality; a very graceful and easy behaviour, which at the same time was full of dignity, and created respect in all that saw him. He spoke extremely well, both in private conversation and upon publick occasions, in regard to which, he expressed himself with much facility and freedom (w). He had a very comprehensive genius, so that there were very few subjects that he was not master of; and, yet with all his parts and all his experience, he was extremely modest. His political principles were entirely agreeable to the constitution; he was loyal to his Prince in all circumstances, and without any regard to consequences. He understood the interest of the nation, and pursued it steadily. He thought that the law was to be the guide of Sovereigns as well as subjects, and therefore judged it his duty to assert it upon all occasions (x). He was descended from a very noble and fortunate family, and was himself the most fortunate of that family [2]. He was extremely happy in domestick concerns, living with the Duchesses in the most sincere friendship, as well as the most tender affection; regarding her death, which happened about four years before his own, as the greatest misfortune of his life (y). He was no less happy in his children, and in their numerous posterity, of which it will be necessary to give some account [Z]. To sum up all; he passed through a long life and variety of fortunes, with honour

(r) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 545.

(s) Ibid.

(t) Hist. of King James II. p. 131.

(u) Complete Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 487. Echard's Hist. of England, p. 1074. Sir Richard Cox's Account of this noble Person, in his Preface to his second Volume of the History of Ireland.

(w) Burnet's Hist. of own Time, Vol. I. p. 95. 791. Life of Keeper North, p. 230.

(x) Memoirs of the Life of Dr Thomas Burnet, Master of the Charter-House.

(y) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 549.

foundation, and the Governors obliged to act according to the constitutions of the same; and because, likewise the act, 3 Car. expressly enacted, That every person elected and admitted into it, should, before he received benefit of any such place, take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. This letter was signed by Archbishop Sancroft, the Duke of Ormond, the Marquis of Halifax, the Earls of Craven, Danby, and Nottingham, the Bishop of London, and Dr Burnet. When it was read to the King, he gave it to the Lord Chancellor, with orders to find a way how he might have right done him in the case. But the persons concerned were of so great a character, so much considered by the nation, and so well able to defend their cause, that it was thought better to let the matter alone, till the prerogative claimed was established by the submission of the two Universities, who were encouraged to assert their rights and the obligation of their statutes by this example of the Governors of the Charter-House.

[Y] And was himself the most fortunate of that family.] We have already in the preceding article, sufficiently justified what is asserted in the text, as to the honours and fortune of this family; and shall only add, that from the 31st of Henry III. when Theobald Butler was made one of the Lords-Justices, to the 1st of James II. when the Duke of Ormond quitted the government of Ireland, there had been in the space of four hundred and thirty-seven years, ten of this family, who had been twenty-seven times Lords-Justices, Lords-Deputies, or Lords-Lieutenants of that Kingdom (71). His Grace had seen three generations above him, his father, Thomas, Viscount Thurles; his grandfather, Walter, Earl of Ormond; and his great uncle, Thomas, Earl of Ormond; and he likewise saw three generations below him, his son, Thomas, Earl of Osford; his grandson, James, who succeeded him as Duke of Ormond; and his great grandson, Thomas, Lord Thurles. He had been himself, at the time of his decease, fifty-seven years, in the service of the crown, under the reign of four Kings: and to three of them he had been Privy-Counsellor, and done most eminent services. He was four times Lord-Lieutenant, and in that space held the supreme government for twenty-two years, which was more than any other subject had done (72). He lived always with great magnificence, and had rather too little care of his fortune. He bred several eminent men in his family, who came afterwards to be very considerable in the state; and there were three at least of his Chaplains, that came to be distinguished highly in the Church; Dr Hough, the late excellent Bishop of Worcester, Dr Hartstonge, Bishop of Londonderry (73), and Dr Thomas Burnet, Master of the Charter-house: Indeed, he was always esteemed a great patron of the Clergy, as well as a true friend to the Church; following, therein, the maxim of his old friend, the Earl of Strafford, who was in nothing more commendable, than in his care of the ecclesiastical state of Ireland, by which he kept up the credit of the Protestant Religion, and filled the several Sees with men of such learning, virtue, and piety, as drew the esteem, even of the Papists, at least, of all such as were not bigots to such a degree, as hindered them from seeing the good qualities and exemplary behaviour of Christian Priests, that were not of their own Church.

(71) Sir Richard Cox's Account.

[Z] Of which it will be necessary to give some account.] The Duke of Ormond married but once, and that was his cousin, Lady Elizabeth Preston, the only daughter of the Earl of Desmond, by the only daughter

(72) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 557.

(73) See the English Translation of Sir James War Works, Vol. I. p. 431.

honour and reputation; was esteemed and beloved by the good men of all parties; and died as much regretted as it was possible for man to be (z); and this, without courting popular applause; or pursuing any other rule in his conduct, than doing what was, in his own judgment, right.

daughter of Thomas, Earl of Ormond. This Lady was born in 1615, and consequently, was five years younger than the Duke. She married at the age of fourteen; and after living fifty-four years in great harmony with her Lord, departed this life, July 21, 1684 (74). By this Lady the Duke had ten children, viz. eight sons and two daughters. 1. Thomas, born in 1632; and died before he was a year old (75). 2. Thomas, Earl of Ossory, of whom in the next article. 3. James, born in 1635; but died within the year. 4. James, who died a little above a year old (76). 5. Richard, born July 15, 1639; he was educated with great care, and taught every thing suitable to his birth; and the great affection that his parents had for him. As he grew up, he distinguished himself by a brave and excellent disposition, which determined him to a military life. When the Duke was first made Lord-Lieutenant, after the Restoration, his Majesty was pleased, by his letter, dated April 23, 1662, to create Lord Richard, Baron Butler of Cloghgran, Viscount of Tullogh, in the county of Catherlogh, and Earl of Arran, with remainder to his brother (77). He was sworn of the Privy-Council in that kingdom, August 26, 1663. In the month of September, 1664, he married Lady Mary Stuart, only surviving daughter of James, Duke of Richmond and Lenox, by Mary, the only daughter of the great Duke of Buckingham, who died in July, 1667, at the age of eighteen, and was interred at Kilkenny. The Earl of Arran commanding the guards in Ireland, and having, as we have shewn, distinguished himself in reducing the mutineers at Carrick-Fergus, and behaving with great courage in the famous sea fight with the Dutch, in 1673, he was on the 27th of August, the same year created Baron Butler of Weston, in the county of Huntingdon (78). He married in the month of June preceding, Dorothy, daughter of John Ferrers, of Tamworth-Castle, in Warwickshire, Esq; In May, 1682, he was constituted Lord-Deputy of Ireland, upon his father's going over to England; and held that high office, 'till August, 1684 (79), when the Duke returned. In the beginning of the year 1686, he died at London, and was interred in the vault at the east end of Henry VIIIth's chapel at Westminster; leaving an only daughter, Charlotte, who married to Charles, Lord Cornwallis (80). 6. Walter, born September 6, 1641, died at Dublin, in 1643, and was buried at Christ-Church (81). 7. John, born in 1643; he was Captain of the troop of Horse Guards in Ireland, and was created Baron of Aghrim, Viscount Clonmore, and Earl of Gowran, in that kingdom (82). He married in 1675, the Lady Anne Chichester, sole daughter and heiress of Arthur, Earl of Donnegal; and was a young nobleman of great parts and spirit, but too much given to his pleasures, by which he greatly impaired his health; and going for the recovery of it to Paris, died there, in August 1676, without issue (83). 8. James, born in 1645, who while an infant being carried to take the air in a coach, the horses running away down Phoenix-hill, near Dublin, the woman, who had the care of him, in her fright, threw him out of the window, and he was killed by the fall (84). 1. Lady Elizabeth, born June 29, 1640, who married Philip, Earl of Chesterfield, by whom she had one son, Henry, that died an infant, and a daughter, the Lady Elizabeth Stanhope, who married Patrick Lyon, Earl of Strathmore, in the kingdom of Scotland (85). 2. Lady Mary, born in 1646; married to William, Lord Cavendish, afterwards Earl and Duke of Devonshire (86), by whom she had three sons, William, afterwards Duke of Devonshire, Lord Henry, and Lord James, and a daughter, Lady Elizabeth, married to Sir John Wentworth, of Broadworth, in the county of York, Baronet (87). His Grace had also a natural son by the Lady Isabella Rich, daughter of the Earl of Holland, begotten before his marriage, and bred up at Paris, where he died a little before the Restoration. The Duke held a friendly correspondence with this Lady, during his exile, which, as we have elsewhere shewn, had like to have been fatal to his own Lady (88), who, notwithstanding had so little of jealousy in her nature, that when Lady Isabella, was on this very account obliged to fly out of England, she received her very kindly at Caen, where she lived with her two or three years (89).

(z) Compleat Hist. of Ireland, Vol. III. p. 487.
 (80) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. IV. p. 131.
 (81) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 551.
 (82) Catalogue of the Peers of Ireland, with the dates of their creation, and titles of their eldest sons, by R. L.
 (83) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 450.
 (84) Ibid. p. 551.
 (85) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. II. p. 269.
 (86) Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 85.
 (87) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 156.
 (88) See the article of BOYLE (ROGER) Earl of Orrery, note [E].
 (89) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 538.

Peerage of Ireland, Vol. I. p. 536, 537, 538.
 Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II.
 Ibid. Vol. p. 551.
 Ibid. ubi.
 Peerage of Ireland, Vol. I. p. 85.
 Dagdale's Peerage, Vol. II. p. 478.
 Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Vol. P. iii. p. 16.

BUTLER (THOMAS) Earl of Ossory, whose shining qualities, great parts, and exemplary virtue, independent of his high birth and the honours to which he attained, rendered him the delight of the age in which he lived, and deserved that his memory should be transmitted with due praise to posterity. He was born when his father was Earl of Ormond and Ossory, in the Castle of Kilkenny, July 9, 1634 (a). He was educated in his father's house, with all imaginable care, and under the best masters, that, in those troublesome times, could be procured, 'till he was near thirteen; and then his father having signed a treaty with the Commissioners of the Parliament, for surrendering up Dublin, he came with him over into England (b). His stay was not long at that time, for the Marquis of Ormond, as we have shown in the foregoing article, being obliged to quit the kingdom in February 1648, took his son with him to France; and when, in September following, the Marquis went over again to Ireland, his Lordship and his brother Richard, were left at the house of a Protestant Minister, at Caen in Normandy, for about a year, and were then sent to a famous Academy at Paris, where the Earl distinguished himself by his dexterity in his exercises, and by a steady and manly behaviour much beyond his years (c). In December 1650, he came back to Caen, where the Marchioness of Ormond then was, and remained there 'till the summer of 1652, when he attended her Ladyship into England, from whence he went with her in the beginning of the next year to Ireland (d). He returned from thence in 1654, with his mother to London, and resided with her in Wild-House; but being now a man, and much courted and caressed by persons of all ranks, who were charmed with his easy and polite behaviour, and with the singular happiness of his temper, in which a boundless bravery was united with the greatest gentleness and modesty; he soon made a great figure, and his name was almost in every body's mouth. This excited the jealousy of Cromwell to a very high degree, and therefore he thought proper to secure him, which he accordingly did (e) in a very extraordinary manner [A]. He remained in (a) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 502.

 (b) Historian's Guide, p. 31.
 (c) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 502.
 (d) Ibid.
 (e) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 629.

[A] Which he accordingly did in a very extraordinary manner. It is certain, that at this time, Oliver Cromwell found himself in a very uneasy and perplexed situation, being surrounded on all sides with dangers and difficulties, and not knowing whom to trust (1). He had been obliged to dissolve his Parliament,

(1) Bates's Elements of Motu, p. 198.

the Tower near eight months, and then falling ill of a fever which threatened his life, Cromwell, not without great difficulty, consented to his discharge. He went first with the Marchioness, his mother, to Aſton in Gloucestershire; but the Physicians having certified, that a farther change of air was requisite to restore his constitution; a pass was obtained for him, and he went over to Flanders, and took with him his brother Lord Richard, who passed for his servant (f). He durst not remain long there, for fear Cromwell should make it a pretence for seizing his mother's estate, and therefore retired into Holland, where he remained about four years, and behaved with so much prudence and discretion, that he was admired and esteemed by the greatest men in the Republick, more especially by the Lord Beverweert, a nobleman of the first rank, and whose virtues were not at all inferior to his distinguished birth. His intimacy with that nobleman, gave him an opportunity of conversing with the Lady Emilia Nassau, his daughter, a Lady of very great beauty, and endowed with all the virtues of her sex; so that his Lordship became very much in love with her, and a treaty of marriage being set on foot, the Marquis of Ormond came to Holland on purpose to conclude it, which he did, though it was attended with some difficulties (g) [B]. Upon the Restoration, he attended the King to England, and by patent, dated February 8, 1661, was appointed Colonel of foot in Ireland; on the thirteenth of June following, he was made Colonel and Captain of horse; he was soon after appointed Lieutenant-General of horse, and, in the beginning of the year 1662, he succeeded the Earl of Montrath in the command of a regiment of foot and troop of horse (h). On the twenty-second of June the same year, he was called by writ to the House of Lords in Ireland, and had very extraordinary compliments paid him on that occasion by both Houses of Parliament [C]. On the sixteenth of August, 1663, he was appointed Lieutenant-General of the army in that kingdom; but returning into England the year following, he was with his brother-in-law the Earl of Arlington at his seat at Euston in Norfolk, where, in the beginning of June, hearing the guns from sea, he, with Sir Thomas Clifford, found means, on the third of that month, to get from Harwich on-board the English fleet under the command of the Duke of Albemarle, to whom he brought the first news of Prince Rupert's coming to join him, and had his share in that, and

(f) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 502.

(g) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 478.

(h) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 503.

Parliament, when he most needed their assistance; he had discovered a design of the Royalists to rise in different parts of the kingdom, which afterwards broke out; and in this state of affairs, considering that Lord Ossory was looked upon as one of the most promising young noblemen of the age, in all respects, he judged it requisite, though he had no particular informations, to cause him to be secured (2). His Lordship then resided with his mother, the Marchioness at Wild-House, and thither an officer was sent with a guard to take him into custody. It happened that he was out at the time of their coming, but the Marchioness of Ormond told the officer who commanded, that he need not wait for his coming home since she would pawn her word, that he should wait upon the Protector the next morning (3). One Mr Stephen Ludlow, who had a respect for the family, gave his Lordship notice of what had happened, and offered to assist him in his escape; but the Marchioness was against that measure, and positively insisted, that he should comply with what she had undertaken on his behalf (4). He went therefore early the next morning to Whitehall, and desired an audience of the Protector, but in vain, for, after he had waited some time, a person came out, and told his Lordship he had orders to carry him to the Tower, which he accordingly did. The Marchioness during his confinement applied often to Cromwell, who treated her with singular respect, made her many compliments, and gave her very civil answers, yet would not grant her son's discharge, 'till his confinement brought on a fit of sickness. It may not be amiss to observe, that a little before his imprisonment, Lord Ossory had procured a pass from the Protector, allowing him to travel through Italy, and even as far as Jerusalem; and having been very courteously treated at an audience of leave upon this occasion, was the less apprehensive of the usage he afterwards met with (5).

[B] Which he did, though it was attended with some difficulties. This Dutch nobleman was the son of the famous Maurice Prince of Orange, by Madame de Beverweert; he was a man of great virtue and integrity, and not only assisted his country with his counsels, but had exposed his life also in her service, and might have succeeded Tromp in the chief command of the fleet, if, out of modesty, he had not declined it (6). He had three sons and five daughters, his eldest son, Maurice, was created Count of Nassau, by the Emperor Leopold; his second son, William Adrian, was so created likewise, but was commonly called, Lord Odike; Henry his third son, was Lord of Auverquerque, ancestor to the Earls of Grantham (7). The eldest of his daughters was this Lady Emilia, with whom he offered to give a fortune of ten thousand pounds, but insisted, that an estate of twelve hundred pounds a year should be immediately put into the possession of Lord Ossory. It was no easy matter to fix this, considering how large a part it made of what was in his mother's possession; and besides, some overtures had been made towards a more advantageous match with the daughter of the Earl of Southampton (8). But the Earl of Ossory looked upon his happiness as inconsistent with any marriage but this, so that at length he procured the settlement insisted upon to be made, and the wedding was celebrated, November 16, 1659. It was proposed, that part of the ten thousand pounds should have made the portion of his sister Lady Elizabeth, who, about this time married the Earl of Chesterfield, and that the remainder should be employed in defraying the expences of the education of Lord John; but the King's necessities being very pressing, the Marquis of Ormond made no hesitation at sacrificing this, which seemed to be his last stake, for his master's service (9).

[C] Had very extraordinary compliments paid to him on that occasion, by both houses of Parliament. His Lordship took leave of the Commons, in a short and handsome speech, on the 8th of August, 1662, upon which an order was made, that Sir Paul Davis and Sir Henry Tichburne, with the body of the house, should accompany him to the bar of the House of Lords (10). The Lords having notice of their coming, made an order, that, by the consent of the Earls bench, the Earl of Ossory should be placed above all the Earls, but it should be no precedent for the future. His place being thus fixed, the house of Commons were called in, and the Speaker, in their name, returned thanks to the Lords for the honour they had been pleased to do the honourable person, he then presented to the house; and assured them, that nothing could do them greater pleasure, and the Commons doubted not, but as he had been a great help to their house; so he would be an honour to that of the Peers, and very useful to both. The Commons being withdrawn, the Earl of Ossory was introduced into the house, and complimented by the Chancellor, in a short and handsome speech, upon that occasion.

(7) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. P. 570.

(8) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. P. 385.

(9) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 183.

(10) Ibid. p. 24.

(2) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 502.

(3) Idem, ibid.

(4) Idem, ibid.

(5) Ibid. p. 162.

(6) Histoire de Malifond'Orange, P. 395.

and the next day's glorious action (i). He was soon after sworn of the Privy-Council in England, being then Lord of the Bed-Chamber to the King by his father's resignation; on the fourteenth of September 1666, he was summoned by writ to the English House of Lords (k), by the title of Lord Butler of Moore-Park. He had not sat six weeks in the House before he called the Duke of Buckingham to an account, for saying, on the debate of the bill for prohibiting the importation of Irish cattle, that none were against it but such as had Irish estates or Irish understandings. The Duke was to have met him in Chelsea-fields the next day; but, in his stead, about three hours after the time, came an officer with a guard to secure him; and the Duke had shared the same fate, if he had not prudently kept out of the way. The next morning his Grace complained to the House of Lords of a breach of privilege, which produced a new quarrel with the Earl of Arlington. As soon as the King was informed of this complaint, he ordered the Earl of Ossory to be released, who went immediately to the House to make his defence, which did not hinder his being sent to the Tower, and the Duke was committed to the custody of the Usher of the Black-Rod; but, in two days, they were both released (l). In May 1670, he attended the King in his journey to Dover, to meet his sister the Duchess of Orleans; and in October following he was sent to Holland, to bring over the Prince of Orange (m). At the close of the same year, he thought himself obliged to resent, in a very extraordinary manner, the insult offered his father by Col. Blood, towards the Duke of Buckingham, who was thought to be the author of it [D]. In the month of February following, he attended the Prince of Orange back to the Hague, from whence he made a tour to the Court of France, returned by the way of Holland, and soon after he arrived in England, the Prince of Orange, as a mark of his high esteem and regard, sent him a basin and ewer of massy gold (n). In the summer of 1671, he went over again to Flanders and Holland, and, in the beginning of 1672, he had the command of the Resolution, a third rate man of war, having a little before received a very extraordinary mark of the King's sincere affection for him. It seems his Lordship, who loved play a little too much, had run in debt about eight thousand pounds, which made him extremely uneasy, of which his Majesty being informed, he was so kind as to pay it for him, and the worthy Sir Stephen Fox contrived that it should be done in such a way, that no body at Court knew any thing of it. The Earl was on board the Resolution the fourteenth of March with Sir Robert Holmes, when he attacked the Dutch Smyrna fleet, and gave signal marks of courage upon that occasion, with which, however, his father was highly offended, because, as that attempt was made before any declaration of war, he looked upon it as dishonourable to the English arms (o). In April he had the command of the Victory given him, which was a second rate. He was in the action off Southwold-Bay, which happened May 28, 1672, and acquired great reputation therein, as well as by relieving all the wounded seamen in St Thomas's Hospital; and on the thirtieth of September he was elected Knight of the Garter (p). In November following he was sent Envoy Extraordinary to France, with compliments of condolence on the death of the Duke of Anjou. He was received there with extraordinary honours, and extremely pressed to accept a command in the army, to induce him to which, he was offered twenty thousand pistoles for his equipage, and ten thousand pistoles a year, but he excused himself, though he could not avoid accepting, at his audience of leave, a jewel of the value of two thousand pounds (q). In May 1673, his Majesty honoured him with the command of the St Michael, a first rate, and appointed him Rear-Admiral of the Blue on the seventeenth of the same month, in which post he served in the ensuing battle against the Dutch, and covered the Prince, which was the ship wherein Sir Edward Spragge bore his Flag, as Admiral of the Squadron after his death, and the vessel's being disabled; 'till towards night, and then brought her off in tow, and joined Prince Rupert's Squadron (r). Upon this his Lordship was promoted to the rank of Rear-Admiral of the Red, and on the tenth of September he displayed the Union Flag, as Commander in Chief of the whole fleet, in the absence of Prince Rupert (s), by the King's special command. It was towards the close of this year, that the Earl formed a very important project of revenging the disgrace the nation had sustained in the former war, by the burning of our ships at Chatham, in return for which, he would have burnt all the ships that were laid up at Helvoetsluys, and why this was not put in execution remains a secret to posterity (t) [E]. His Lordship had

(i) Memoirs of the Lord Clifford, p. 79. Compleat Hist. of England, p. 263.

(k) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 478.

(l) Echard's Hist. of England, p. 834.

(m) Life of King William III. p. 14.

(n) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 504.

(o) Echard's Hist. of England, p. 830.

(p) Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 288. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 504. Historian's Guide, p. 87.

(q) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 504.

(r) Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 295. Historian's Guide, p. 91.

(s) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 504. Historian's Guide, p. 91.

(t) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 505.

equally

[D] The Duke of Buckingham, who was thought to be the author of it. This very singular incident (11) happened, when Dr Turner, afterwards Bishop of Ely, was Chaplain in waiting; and in his presence, the Earl of Ossory coming by chance, not long after Blood's attempt into the Royal Presence; and seeing the Duke of Buckingham standing by the King, his colour rose, and he addressed him in the following words. My Lord, I know well, that you are at the bottom of this late attempt of Blood's upon my father; and therefore, I give you fair warning, if my father comes to a violent end, by sword or pistol; if he dies by the hand of a ruffian, or by the more secret way of poison, I shall not be at a loss to know the first author of it; I shall consider you as the assassin; I shall treat you as such, and wherever I meet you, I shall pistol you; though you stood behind the King's chair; and I tell it you in his Majesty's presence, that you may be sure I shall keep my word. [E] Remains a secret to posterity. The Earl of Ossory, in his several voyages to Holland, had heard, and at last had taken the pains to see, that the Royal Charles, was laid up in Helvoetsluys. This is an excellent harbour on the island of Voorn, in the province of Holland, about five miles south from the Briel, at that time little talked of, though since become well known to the world, from it's being the station of our packets (12). In the latter end of the summer, his Lordship

(1) This was related to Mr. ... by Robert ... of Glasgow, in the count of Monaghan, who had it from the Bishop of ... of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. p. 425.

(12) Description of the Seven United Provinces; printed for M. ... Pitt, p. 37.

equally the confidence of the Duke of York, and of the King his master, and this both in their publick and private concerns, as is evident from his being the only nobleman trusted with the secret of the Duke's first marriage (u), and the person who actually gave Mrs Anne Hyde away. When, therefore, it was thought requisite, in the winter of 1674, to offer the Lady Mary to the Prince of Orange, though the King made choice of Lord Ossory, yet his Royal Highness confirmed it with a very signal testimony of respect, declaring he would rather trust his concerns with his Lordship than with any other person, and when he embarked on the tenth of November with the Earl of Arlington his brother-in-law, it was universally understood at Court, that he was the Duke's Minister, as the other was the King's (w). How well he was received in Holland, and how grateful his person was to the Prince of Orange, appears from his Highness's conducting him on board his ship, which, though a great honour in itself, was much increased by the manner of doing it, for the Prince perceiving that the ship made little way, followed from shore the next morning in a long-boat, and accompanied his Lordship out to sea (x). What the real issue was of this negotiation, and by whom it was conducted, has been shewn in another place (y), and need not therefore be repeated here. In 1675, he was, as a mark of their respect, chosen Master of the Brotherhood of Trinity-house, and, in August following, made one of the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty (z). In November 1676, he became Lord Chamberlain to Queen Catharine (a). When M. Bentinck came over to England in the summer of the next year, to resume the treaty for the match beforementioned, he was particularly recommended by his Highness to the Earl of Ossory, and the Duke of Ormond, and by their advice it was, that he applied himself to the Lord-Treasurer Danby, so that, by whatever means that negotiation was happily terminated, his Lordship plainly had his share in it. One advantage he drew from thence was this, that he obtained leave, which had been often refused him before, to go over, and make the rest of the campaign with his Highness in Flanders, which he did, and, upon the appearance of a battle, he had the post of honour given him, with a command of six thousand men (b). In the beginning of the year following, he went over again, in order to take upon him the command of the British subjects in the pay of the States, and, at the close of the war, was continued in his command, with extraordinary marks of honour on the part of the States-General [F]. In the progress of that campaign he distinguished himself extremely, more especially at the battle of Mons which was fought towards the close of it, and wherein he commanded the English troops, with whom he did so much, and contributed so far to the retreat which Marshal Luxemburg was obliged to make from the field of battle, that the States of Holland, the Duke of Villa Hermosa, Governor Lordship was informed, that two and twenty of the largest ships of the Dutch fleet, were to be laid up there; and this induced him to consider more seriously a scheme he formerly had of burning the vessels in this port; and what contributed still more to excite him to this undertaking, was an account, that tho' the place was of such consequence, and very capable of being defended, yet there was no better garrison in it than two companies of foot. In order to be perfectly satisfied, he sent over M. St Paul, his Master of the horse, to take a view of the place; which he did, and brought back an exact plan of it, though at the hazard of his life. He then proposed it to the King, desiring no more than eight men of war; the like number of large boats for landing men, with two thousand land troops; or if so many could not be spared, he was content to undertake it with fifteen hundred (13). The King was very well pleased with the project, but the Duke of Buckingham secretly opposed it, and raised some objections about getting ships into the port; but Sir John Narborough, who was to command under the Earl, being consulted by the King, offered to carry in the vessels, at half flood, or lose his head; to which the Earl added, that if he did not then fire the Dutch ships with a half-ponny candle, he would be content to have his fixed by Cromwell's, upon Westminster-Hall. Upon this the necessary preparations were made with great dispatch; and about the middle of the month of December, when the Earl of Ossory was ready to take his leave, and to embark at Portsmouth, he suddenly received a countermand, the very night before his intended departure. Whether this proceeded purely from the pique and jealousy of that Duke, or from the King's unwillingness to strike such a stroke, when he was on the point of concluding the peace, tho' even in that he had been justified by the conduct of the Dutch, on the like occasion, remains, and perhaps ever will remain, a secret (14). This however is certain, that his Lordship afterwards examined the place, and was thoroughly satisfied from thence, that nothing could have hindered the success of his design, if he had been allowed to have put it in execution.

[F] With extraordinary marks of honour, on the part of the States-General.] At the time the Earl went over to command the English forces in the service of the States; in February 1677, he had a commission from them to be Colonel and Captain of one of the six regiments, yet was made Major-General and commander in chief of the English brigade by the Prince of Orange's patent (15); but his waggon ordinances were appointed him in that rank and quality by the States. When the peace was made, the Earl declared, that he expected a commission from the States-General, according to the custom of that service, which the Prince of Orange sought to evade as well as he could, being very desirous, on the one hand, to keep his Lordship in the post, and very apprehensive, on the other, that the States would never be brought to create a new general officer at a time, when his service was not immediately necessary. The Earl remained firm in his sentiments, that he ought to be upon the regular and legal establishment; and therefore, in the beginning of the year 1680, he sent over an agent, with instructions to demand such commissions as he expected; or if these were refused, to deliver up the commissions that he had, of Colonel and Captain. The Prince interposed as far as he could, and gave the Earl's agent all the good words possible; but the gentleman told his Highness, it was not in his power to negotiate, or to listen to any proposals, but that he was barely charged with a message, and must return to his master with the answer of their High Mightinesses. When the Prince saw that there was nothing to be done in this way, he laid the matter before the Council of State, set forth the abilities and services of the Earl of Ossory, and showed how reasonable a thing it would be to grant him what he demanded; which the States did, and the whole affair was settled entirely to his Lordship's satisfaction, in April 1680, but in a manner so repugnant to their usual maxims, that the Prince of Orange himself was amazed at it, tho' at the same time highly satisfied and pleased (16).

(15) Life of Major Bernardi 40, 41.

(16) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. I. p. 506, 507.

(u) As appears by a Certificate under his Royal Highness's hand, produced at the Council-Table, when the marriage was enquired into.

(w) Supplement to Heath's Chronicle, p. 599. Echard's Hist. of England, p. 911.

(x) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 505.

(y) See the article of BENNETT (HENRY) Earl of Arlington, note [N].

(z) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 505.

(a) Echard's Hist. of England, p. 992.

(b) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 505, 506.

(13) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 443. Columna Rostrata, p. 249.

(14) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 505, 506.

Governor of the Spanish Low-Countries, and even his Catholick Majesty himself, thought fit, in a letter under his hand, to acknowledge the great services (c) he performed in that action. His Lordship returned, in company with Mr Hyde, who had been sent to execute a commission of importance to his Highness, September 13, 1678. His Majesty intended, soon after, to have given him the command of a squadron, destined to chastize the Algerine pirates, but the Lord-Treasurer Danby interposing, and engaging Sir John Narborough should undertake that service with a smaller force, he was thereupon preferred (d). His Lordship was in like manner disappointed the next year, when the King had thought of him to have carried his compliments, and a jewel of the value of thirteen thousand pounds, for the new Queen of Spain. But the Nobleman then at the head of the Treasury, procured that design to be laid aside, from a spirit of œconomy, notwithstanding which, we are told, this jewel was, not long after, given to the Duchess of Portsmouth (e). It was in the course of this winter, that the enemies of the Duke of Ormond attacked his conduct warmly in the House of Lords, where it was most vigorously defended by the Earl of Ossory, who thought fit to carry the war into the enemies quarters, in a famous speech in answer to one of the Lord Shaftesbury's, which, as an instance of his Lordship's talents, shall be preserved in the notes [G]. As this did him very great credit at home, so it procured him from abroad an honour he very little expected. This speech of his being transmitted to Holland, was there translated into, and printed in Dutch, upon which the Prince of Orange, as a mark of his sincere friendship, as well as a proof of his very high esteem, wrote his Lordship a letter, the contents of which render it extremely worthy of notice (f) [H]. We draw now near the close of his days, and the last period of his honours. The King was a good deal embarrass'd about the port of Tangier in Barbary, the possession of which he acquired by his marriage with the Infanta of Portugal, and in fortifying of which he had spent immense sums of money (g). The place

(c) Life of King William III. p. 94. Echard's Hist. of England, p. 943. Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 506.

(d) Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 3-6.

(e) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 566.

(f) Appendix to the second Vol. of Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 30.

(g) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. II. p. 335.

[G] Shall be preserved in the notes.] The Earl of Shaftesbury had not, very probably, any personal dislike to the Duke of Ormond, but he saw clearly, that so long as he continued Lord-Lieutenant, and in credit with the King, the progress of their party would be entirely stopped in Ireland, and much retarded in England (17). It was for this reason therefore, that he expatiated in the House of Lords, on the great danger the three kingdoms were in from Popery, and the little care that was taken to prosecute the Papists in Ireland, notwithstanding, that of the three, it was visibly the most exposed. As he was a very copious and witty speaker, he could not help throwing out some strokes as to persons allied to the Irish by blood, having a natural propensity to indulge Papists; and upon this occasion it was, that the Earl of Ossory thought proper to answer him in the following speech; the latter part of which is a succinct view of his antagonist's measures, when he acted with the Court. The Earl of Shaftesbury, instead of replying with heat, as soon as the Earl sat down, stood up again, and explained his first speech in such a manner, as that he seemed to take off those reflections, that were undoubtedly designed to fall upon the Duke of Ormond; and this concession in so great a man might well be esteemed a victory,

I am very sorry, and do much wonder, to find that noble Lord so apt to reflect upon my father, when he is pleas'd to mention the affairs of Ireland. It is very well known that he was the chief person that sustained the King's and the Protestant interest, when the Irish rebellion first broke out. His services were so acceptable to the long Parliament, that, after some successes he had against the Irish rebels, the Parliament voted him thanks, and sent him a rich jewel, as a mark of honour and their esteem. It is well known, that when he had made two peaces with the Irish, they both times perfidiously broke them, and endeavoured his murder, and sent out several excommunications against him, and those that adhered to him. When he was abroad, I believe many may remember how, when the Duke of Gloucester was taken into the hands of some that would have perverted him, the King commanded my father to bring him from Paris, which he did, notwithstanding the threatenings and animosity of that party against him. How he has been laid at, by that party, since the King's Restoration, I think is sufficiently notorious. I beg your Lordships pardon, if the nearness of my relation may have made me say any thing, which may look vain, being infinitely much concerned, that any suspicion should be raised against him, which may argue his being not sufficiently zealous in all things, wherein the Protestant Religion and the King's service are concerned. Having spoke of what he has done, I presume with the same truth to tell your Lordships, what he has not done. He never advised the breaking of the triple league, he never advised the shutting up of the Exchequer, he never advised the declaration for a Toleration, he never advised the falling out with the Dutch and joining with France. He was not the author of that most excellent position of Delenda est Carthago, that Holland, a Protestant country, should, contrary to the true interest of England, be totally destroyed: I beg your Lordships will be so just, as to judge of my father and of all men, according to their actions and counsels (18).

[H] The contents of which render it extremely worthy of notice.] There is such a mixture of freedom and spirit in this letter of his Highness's, that, at the same time, we produce it to shew his regard for the Earl of Ossory, it cannot but raise a sentiment of esteem for his Highness himself, who could in so few lines paint the warmth of his satisfaction; his aversion to false patriots, his high opinion of the Duke of Ormond, his fears for this country, his foresight of what would happen to it, and his tenderness for his friend (19).

(18) Appendix to Carte's second Vol. of the Life of the Duke of Ormond, p. 90.

(19) Idem, ibid.

J'ay esté ravi d'apprendre, que vous avez si bien sceu faire ces bourgeois d'Haranguers. Votre harangue est icy imprimée, laquelle je vous enverrai, si je la puis avoir, devant que celley part. Je n'aurois jamais crû, que l'on auroit esté si loin, d'attaquer Monsieur vostre pere, lequel je croirois estre au dessus de toutes soupçons, surtout en fait de religion. Dieu sçait ce que cecy fera la fin de toutes vos brouilleries: je la crains extremement du mauvais costé. Le temps nous apprendra en peu. Croyez moy toujours sans reserve absolument a vous.

De la Haye, ce 2de May, 1679. G. H. Prince d'Orange.

In English thus.

I Was overjoyed to learn, that you knew so well how to deal with these infamous Demagogues. Your speech is printed here, which I will send you, if I can get it before this goes away. I could never have believed, that they would have pushed things so far, in attacking your father, whom I looked on to be above all suspicions; in point of religion, more especially. God knows whether this will be the period of your disturbances: I am extremely apprehensive of the worst. Time will soon explain things. Believe me always, and without reserve, to be absolutely your's.

William Henry Prince of Orange.

[I] In

See North's men of Ken's Compleat tory, p. 83, 87.

place was certainly of great importance, as it lay very commodiously for protecting our trade, for keeping the Moors in awe, and for giving us weight in the Mediterranean, but more especially as we possessed it by an undisputed title, and were at liberty to make what acquisitions we could, without giving umbrage to any Christian Prince. The Parliament, however, had conceived a dislike to the manner in which this affair had been managed; grounded chiefly upon a rumour that the garrison was a nursery for Popish soldiery (b); to remove which fears, his Majesty made choice of the Earl of Ossory to go over thither in quality of Governor (i). He was preparing every thing for that purpose, when his Lordship was suddenly taken ill at Arlington-House, of a high and malignant fever, which disturbed his head almost from the time he was seized. The Physicians had for two days some hopes of his recovery, but he relapsed, and on July 30, 1680, expired, as universally lamented as he had been beloved (k). His Lordship died when he was just turned of the forty-sixth year of his age, leaving his disconsolate Countess and his children to the care of the Duke of Ormond his father, by whom they were educated and disposed of in the world, in a manner suitable to their high quality [l]. To venture at drawing a character of this excellent person, at such a distance of time, and from the scanty materials that we have been able to collect together, would be only amusing the reader with a rude and imperfect sketch of a picture that deserves to be drawn at full length. We shall content ourselves, therefore, barely with a few touches, and leave his portrait to be finished by the hand of some able master. The Earl of Ossory had a very graceful person, and without concerning himself much about dress, made, always as good a figure as any Nobleman at Court. He had a martial air, and that easiness in address, which is natural to those who perform their exercises well, and have been much used to them. He possessed, in a high degree, all polite accomplishments; he understood Musick well, spoke and wrote French and Italian perfectly, understood most of the modern languages, and, with all the qualities that recommend a man in a Court, had all the talents also of a man of business: His courage was truly heroick, and rose, upon all occasions, in proportion to the danger, but it was the effect of his high spirit and good sense, and not at all of a hasty disposition, for in his behaviour no man was more cautious or more modest; and tho', when he thought it necessary, he spoke with great warmth and freedom, yet he never did this unprovoked, and was very easily reconciled, provided he thought his antagonist sincere. His generosity was boundless, but at the same time was exerted to noble purposes and upon proper occasions. When he was Commander in Chief of the English Brigade, and had the naming the officers of six regiments, he shewed his disinterestedness in preferring men of merit freely, and at the same time directed his Secretary, Mr Ellis of Pall-Mall, to take nothing for their commissions; and, as he was by this means deprived of a considerable perquisite, his Lordship thought himself obliged to make it up to him out of his own pocket. In a word, his virtue was unspotted in the centre of a luxurious Court; his integrity unblemished amidst all the vices of his times; his honour untainted through the course of his whole life; his reputation general with all parties at home, and so diffused abroad, that he received the strongest marks of confidence and esteem from persons of the highest rank in every nation in Europe; and had the honour of entertaining at his own house, all foreigners of distinction that visited the Court of England in his time. Neither has this just tribute to his high virtues, and many amiable qualities, been confined only to the short period of his life, the same felicity has attended his memory. Such as have written of Irish concerns, have commended his prudence in the government of that kingdom, of which he was twice Lord-Deputy; those who have treated of marine affairs, have extolled his courage and conduct on board the fleet; and foreign Historians have recorded the great services he performed in Flanders; nor even in these times, when men are too apt to take things in wrong lights, and to impose their own conceptions on posterity for History; has there yet appeared a writer so regardless of truth, or of his own character, as to venture a stroke of censure on that of Lord Ossory.

[l] In a manner suitable to their high quality.] The Countess of Ossory was naturalized by Act of Parliament, passed September 13, 1660 (20); and she was considered throughout her whole life, as one of the best and most agreeable ladies of her rank, in the kingdom. She was certainly an excellent wife; and instead of reproaching the Earl with his single indiscretion, in point of play, she always consoled him with assurances, that she would labour by her economy to prevent or repair any inconveniences it might otherwise occasion (21). By her the Earl had eleven children, five sons and six daughters, of whom, the major part survived him. His eldest son, James, who succeeded him in his title of Ossory, was born April 29, 1665, in the castle of Dublin (22); and on the demise of his grandfather, succeeded him also, in the title of Ormond. Charles the second son, was created by King William and Queen Mary, in the year 1693, Baron of Cloghgran, Viscount Tullogh, and Earl of Arran, in the kingdom of Ireland; as also Lord Butler of Weston, in the county of Huntingdon, by which he became a Peer of England (23). His Lordship is at present, Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and Lord High-Steward of the city and liberty of Westminster. Of Lord Ossory's four surviving daughters, Lady Elizabeth, the eldest, was married to William Stanley, Earl of Derby (24); Lady Emilia Buttler lived a maid; Lady Henrietta espoused Henry Nassau d'Auverquerque, Earl of Grantham (25); and Lady Catherine Butler never married. Another James, who was elder than the deceased Duke of Ormond, and two other sons that were younger, dying in Ireland, were buried at Christ-Church, Dublin, as were also two of his Lordship's daughters.

(b) Kennet's Compleat History of England, Vol. III. p. 376, 408.

(i) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 507.

(k) Historian's Guide, p. 125. Echard's Hist. of England, p. 1001. Compleat History of England, Vol. III. p. 393.

(20) Kennet's Historical Register, p. 255.

(21) Carte's Life of the Duke of Ormond, Vol. II. p. 507.

(22) Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 60.

(23) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. IV. p. 229.

(24) Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 124.

(25) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. II. p. 572.

BUTLER (SAMUEL) a celebrated Poet of the last century, was born at Strensham in Worcestershire, and baptized there the thirteenth of February 1612 (a) [A]. His father Mr Samuel Butler, a reputable country farmer [B], perceiving in his son an early inclination to learning, sent him for education to the free-school of Worcester, under the care of Mr Henry Bright; where having laid the foundation of Grammar-learning, he was sent, for some time, to Cambridge [C], but was never matriculated in that University (b). After he had resided there six or seven years (c), he returned to his native country, and became clerk to one Mr Jefferys of Earl's-Croom, an eminent Justice of the Peace for that county, with whom he lived some years in an easy and reputable service (d); during which time, thro' the indulgence of a kind master, he had sufficient leisure to apply himself to his favourite studies, History and Poetry; to which, for his diversion, he added Musick and Painting [D]. He was afterwards recommended to that great encourager of learning, Elizabeth, Countess of Kent; under whose patronage, he had not only the opportunity of consulting all kinds of books, but of conversing likewise with that living library of learning, the great Mr Selden (e); who was very conversant in that Lady's family, and often employed our Poet to write letters beyond sea, and translate for him (f). He lived some time also with Sir Samuel Luke, a gentleman of an antient family in Bedfordshire, and a famous commander under Oliver Cromwell; about which time he wrote the celebrated HUDIBRAS [E]; under which character, it is generally supposed, he intended to ridicule that Knight [F]. After the Restoration of King Charles II. our Poet was made Secretary

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 452. And Butler's Life, prefixed to his Hudibras, edit. Lond. 1732; 2mo, p. 5.

(b) Life of Butler, ibid. p. 6.

(c) Wood, ubi supra.

(d) Anthony Wood does not mention this incident of Butler's Life.

(e) Life, &c. p. 6, 7.

(f) Wood, ibid.

[A] He was born in the year 1612. This is contradicted by Charles Longueville, Esq; a gentleman now living (1), whose father was Butler's particular friend (2); and who has declared, that our Poet was born in the year 1600. The reader must choose, which authority he will rely upon.

[B] His father — a reputable country farmer. Anthony Wood tells us, that Butler's father had a competent estate of near three hundred pounds a year, but most of it in lease-lands held of Sir Thomas Rusiel, grandfather of Sir Francis Rusiel, Baronet, Lord of the Manor of Strensham (3). The authority of the Oxford Antiquary, in what he says of our Poet, is the more to be depended upon, as he had his information from Butler's own brother, then living.

[C] He was sent for some time, to Cambridge. Some of the neighbourhood, Mr Wood informs us (4), pretended, that Butler went to Oxford; and he assures us, that one Samuel Butler was elected from Westminster-school, a student of Christ-church in 1623; but, making very little stay there, he was not matriculated, and consequently his age and place of nativity are not remaining on record in that University: otherwise, had he been a member of that body, we should have known whether he was afterwards the famed author of Hudibras. The reader should be told, that the gentleman mentioned above (5) affirms, that Mr Butler never resided at Oxford.

[D] He applied himself to — Painting. The anonymous author of his Life (6) tells us, he had seen some pictures, said to be of Mr Butler's drawing, which were preserved in Mr Jefferys's family: 'which I mention not (adds he) for the excellency of them, but to satisfy the reader of his early inclinations to that noble art; for which also he was afterwards entirely beloved by Mr Samuel Cooper, one of the most eminent Painters of his time.' The Oxford Antiquary (7) places our Poet's improvement in Musick and Painting to the time of his service under the Countess of Kent.

[E] About which time he wrote the celebrated HUDIBRAS. 'Tho' Fate, (says the author of his Life) more than choice, seems to have placed him in the service of a Knight, so notorious both in person and politicks; yet, by the rule of contraries, one may observe throughout his whole poem, that he was most orthodox both in his religion and loyalty. And I am the more induced to believe he wrote it about that time, because he had the opportunity to converse with those living characters of rebellion, nonsense and hyperisfy, which he so lively and emphatically exposes throughout the whole work (8).'

[F] It is generally supposed, he intended to ridicule Sir Samuel Luke under the character of Hudibras. The principal reason of this conjecture is founded on the following passage of the poem:

'Tis sung there is a valiant Mamaluke,
In foreign land yelep'd ———
To whom we have been oft compar'd,
For person, parts, address, and beard:

Both eqally reputed stout;
And in the same cause both have fought:
He oft, in such attempts as these,
Came off with glory and success;
Nor will we fail i' th' execution,
For want of equal resolution (9):

(9) Hudibras, Part i. Canto i. ver. 904.

The name Sir Samuel Luke exactly supplies the deficiency in the second line, if you melt the two syllables of SAMUEL into one; and the comparison Hudibras makes between himself and that Knight, seems to justify the supposition. But what tends farther to confirm it, is a ballad intitled, A Tale of the Cobler and Vicar of Bray, printed in Butler's posthumous Works (10); in which Sir Samuel Luke is thus characterized:

(10) Page 285. See the Remark [A].

In Bedfordshire there dwelt a Knight,
Sir Samuel by name,
Who by his feats in civil broils
Obtain'd a mighty fame.

Nor was he much less wise than stout,
But fit in both respects
To humble sturdy Cavaliers,
And to support the sects.

This worthy Knight was one that swore
He wou'd not cut his beard,
'Till this ungodly nation was
From Kings and Bishops clear'd.

Which holy vow he firmly kept,
And most devoutly wore
A griezly meteor on his face,
'Till they were both no more.

His worship was in short a man
Of such exceeding worth,
No pen or pencil can describe,
Or rhyming bard set forth.

Many and mighty things he did
Both sober and in liquor;
Witness the mortal fray between
The Cobler and the Vicar.

Then follows the tale, in which the Knight acts as a Justice of the Peace, and has a Clerk named Ralph:

RALPH, who was both his Squire and Clerk,
And Constable withal.

I shall not dispute whether this ballad be Butler's or not; but shall only observe from it, that as, in Hudibras, the Knight is supposed to be drawn in the character

1) In 1745.

2) See the General Dictionary, Article HUDIBRAS.

3) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 452.

4) Ibid.

5) In the Remark [A].

6) Prefixed to his Hudibras, edit. Lond. 1732, 2mo, p. 6.

7) Ubi supra.

8) Life, &c. p. 7.

Secretary to Richard Earl of Carberry, Lord President of the principality of Wales, who appointed him Steward of Ludlow-Castle, when the Court was revived there; and about this time he married one Mrs Herbert, a gentlewoman of a very good family [G]. The Oxford Antiquary pretends (g), that Butler was Secretary to George Villiers, Duke of Buckingham, when that Lord was Chancellor of the University of Cambridge; and the life-writer assures us (h), the Duke had a great kindness for our Poet, and was often a benefactor to him [H]. But no one was a more generous friend to Mr Butler, than that Mæcenas of all learned and witty men, Charles Lord Buckhurst, the late Earl of Dorset and Middlesex; who, being himself an excellent Poet, knew how to set a just value upon the ingenious performances of others (i); and we are told, he owed it to that nobleman, that the Court tasted his Hudibras (k). He had also promises of places and employments of great value and credit, from the Lord Clarendon, High-Chancellor of England (l); but they proved meer Court promises. In short, Mr Butler affords a remarkable instance of that coldness and neglect, which great geniuses often experience from the Court and age in which they live [I]. The integrity of his life, the acuteness of his wit, and easiness of his

rafter of Sir Samuel Luke, so here Sir Samuel is evidently drawn in the character of Hudibras. For, besides what been already quoted, he is armed with a Basket-bill:

Then up he took his basket-bill,
And out enrag'd he went.

In like manner as Hudibras:

His puissant sword unto his side
Near his undaunted heart was ty'd,
With Basket-bill, that wou'd hold broth,
And serve for fight and dinner both (11).

(11) Hudibras,
Part i. Canto i, ver. 351.

And whether we suppose this ballad to be written before, or after Hudibras, it will equally answer our purpose: for, in the first case, it will be evident, that Butler drew from this character; and, in the latter, it will shew, that, at that time, Sir Samuel Luke was generally understood to be meant under the character of Hudibras. The new editor of Hudibras (†) tells us, 'It has been suggested—that, notwithstanding Sir Samuel Luke of Wood-end, in the parish of Cople, in Bedfordshire, has generally been reputed the Hero of this poem, yet, from the circumstances of his being compared to Sir Samuel Luke, it is scarce probable, that he was intended, it being an uncommon thing to compare a person to himself; that the scene of action was in Western Clime; whereas Bedfordshire is north of London; and that he was credibly informed by a Benchor of Gray's-inn, who had it from an acquaintance of Mr Butler's, that the person intended, was Sir Henry Rosewell of Ford-abbey in Devonshire.—These, indeed (adds our editor) would be probable reasons, to deprive Bedfordshire of its hero, did not Mr Butler, in his Memoirs of 1649, give the same description of Sir Samuel Luke; and, in his Dunstable-Downs, expressly styled Sir Samuel Luke, Sir Hudibras. And from the sham second part, published 1663, it appears, that the Bear-beating was at Brentford, which is West of London; and this might induce him to say,

'In Western Clime there is a Town, &c.'

[G] He married Mrs Herbert, a gentlewoman of a very good family.] Anthony Wood says, she was a widow, and that Butler supported himself by her jointure: for tho', in his riper years, he had studied the Common-Law, yet he made no advantage by the practice of it (12). But the life-writer assures us, she was not a widow, and that, tho' she had a competent fortune, it was of little or no advantage to Butler, being most of it unfortunately lost by being put out on bad securities (13).

(12) Wood, ubi
supra.

(13) Life, &c.
page 8.

[H] Wood pretends, he was Secretary to the Duke of Buckingham—and the life-writer assures us, the Duke had a great kindness for him, &c.] The late ingenious Major Richardson Pack tells us a story; which, if it be true, overthrows the assertion both of the Antiquary and the Life-writer. We shall give it in his own words. Mr Wycherly had always laid hold of any opportunity, which offered, to represent to his Grace (the Duke of Buckingham) how well Mr Butler had deserved of the Royal Family by writing his inimitable Hudibras; and that it was a reproach to the Court, that a person of his loyalty and wit should suffer in obscurity, and under the wants he did. The Duke seemed always to hearken to him with attention enough, and, after some time, undertook to recommend his pretensions to his Majesty. Mr Wycherly, in hopes to keep him steady to his word, obtained of his Grace to name a day, when he might introduce that modest and unfortunate Poet to his new patron. At last an appointment was made, and the place of meeting was agreed to be the Roe-buck. Mr Butler and his friend attended accordingly; the Duke joined them. But as the D—l would have it, the door of the room where they sat was open, and his Grace, who had seated himself near it, observing a pimp of his acquaintance (the creature too was a Knight) trip by with a brace of ladies, immediately quitted his engagement, to follow another kind of business, at which he was more ready, than in doing good offices to men of desert; tho' no one was better qualified than he, both in regard to his fortune and understanding, to protect them; and from that hour, to the day of his death, poor Butler never found the least effect of his promise (14).

[I] He affords a remarkable instance of that coldness and neglect, which the greatest geniuses often experience from the court and age in which they live.] We are told indeed, by the gentleman mentioned in the remark [A], that King Charles II. once ordered him a small gratuity of three hundred pounds; which had this compliment attending it, that it passed all the offices without any fee, at the solicitation of Mr William Longueville of the Temple, Lord Danby being at that time High-Treasurer. But this seems to have been the only Court favour he ever received. A strange instance of neglect, when we consider King Charles's excessive fondness for the poem of Hudibras. This is movingly related by our Poet himself (†), who thence takes occasion to do justice to his poem, by hinting its excellencies in general, and paying a few modest compliments to himself; of which the following lines are worth transcribing.

(14) Posthumous Works of Wycherly, Ed. published by M Theobald. In the Memoirs, &c. p. 6, 7.

(†) In his Hudibras at Cou. See his Remains

Now you must know, Sir Hudibras
With such perfections gifted was,
And so peculiar in his manner,
That all that saw him did him honour.
Among the rest this Prince was one,
Admired his conversation:
This Prince, whose ready wit and parts
Conquer'd both men and women's hearts,
Was so o'ercome with Knight and Ralph,
That he could never claw it off:
He never eat, nor drank, nor slept,
But Hudibras still near him kept;
Nor would he go to church or so,
But Hudibras must with him go;
Nor yet to visit concubine,
Or at a city-feast to dine,
But Hudibras must still be there,
Or all the fat was in the fire.

Now

his conversation, rendered him highly acceptable to all men: yet he was very delicate, as well as sparing, in the choice of his acquaintance. After having lived to a good old age [K]. admired by all, tho' personally known to but few, he died [L] the twenty-fifth of September 1680, and was buried at the expence of his good friend Mr Longueville of the Temple [M], in the Church-yard of St Paul's Covent-Garden (m). He had no funeral monument for many years; 'till in 1721, Mr Barber, an Alderman of London, generously erected one to his memory, among the Poets, in Westminster-Abbey [N]. The Poem, intituled HUDIBRAS [O], by which he acquired that high reputation as a Poet, which

(m) Wood, ubi supra, col. 453. and Life &c. p. 9.

Now after all, was it not hard,
That he shou'd meet with no reward,
That fitted out this Knight and Squire,
This monarch did so much admire?
That he shou'd never reimburse
The man for th' equipage, or horse,
Is sure a strange ungrateful thing,
In any body but a King.
But this good King, it seems, was told
By some that were with him too bold,
If e're you hope to gain your ends,
Carefs your foes, and trust your friends.
Such were the doctrines that were taught,
'Till this unthinking King was brought
To leave his friends to starve and die,
A poor reward for loyalty.

Our author's fate in this respect is justly and pathetically lamented by Mr Oldham in his Satire against Poetry (15), in which he introduces the ghost of Spenser dissuading him from Poetry, upon experience and example, that poverty and contempt were it's inseparable companions. After mentioning the cases of Homer and Cowley, he goes on:

On Butler who can think without just rage,
The glory and the scandal of the age?
Fair stood his hopes, when first he came to town,
Met every where with welcomes of renown;
Court'd and lov'd by all, with wonder read,
And promises of princely favour fed.
But what reward for all had he at last,
After a life in dull expectance past?
The wretch, at summing up his mis-spent days,
Found nothing left, but poverty and praise,
Of all his gains by verse he could not save
Enough to purchase flannel and a grave.
Reduc'd to want, he in due time fell sick,
Was fain to die, and be interr'd on tick;
And well might blefs the fever that was sent
To rid him hence, and his worse fate prevent.

In like manner Mr Dryden, in his Hind and Panther (16), makes the Hind (or Church of Rome) object to the Panther (or Church of England) her hard-heartedness in neglecting a Poet, who had stood up in her defence.

Unpitied Hudibras, your champion friend,
Had shewn how far your charities extend:
This lasting verse shall on his tomb be read,
He sham'd you living, and upbraids you dead.

[K] He lived to a good old age. According to Anthony Wood and the life-writer, he was sixty-eight years of age when he died: but, according to Mr Longueville, he was about fourscore.

[L] His death. The Oxford Antiquary, and the writer of his Life, tell us, he died of a consumption. Mr Oldham says, he was carried off by a fever:

And well might blefs the fever that was sent, &c (17).

But Mr Longueville ascribes his death only to old age; which may well be, if he arrived to fourscore years. The same gentleman inform us, that Butler lived for some years in Rose-street, Covent-garden, and probably died there.

[M] He was buried at the expence of Mr Longueville of the Temple. That Gentleman (as we learn from his son Mr Charles Longueville) would fain have buried him in Westminster-Abbey, and spoke, with that view, to several persons, who had been his admirers, offering to pay his part; but none of them would contribute: whereupon Mr Longueville buried him very privately at St Paul's Covent-garden; himself, and seven or eight more, following him to the grave

[N] Mr Alderman Barber erected a monument to Butler—in Westminster-Abbey. The inscription thereon is as follows:

M. S.

Samuelis Butleri qui Stronstamiae in agro Vigorniaci
Natus 1612 obiit Londini 1680.
Vir doctus imprimis, acer, integer;
Operibus ingenii, non item praemiis felix; Satyrici apud
Nos carminis artifex egregius;
Qui simulatae religioni larvam detraxit, et perduellium
Scelera liberrime exagitavit;
Scriptorum in suo genere primus et postremus.
Ne cui vivo deerrant ferè omnia
Deesset etiam mortuo tumulus,
Hoc tandem posito marmore, curavit
JOANNES BARBER Civis Londinensis. 1721.

[O] His Poem, intituled, HUDIBRAS. This incomparable performance is so well known to all who are the least conversant in the Belles Lettres, that very little need to be said of it here. It is of the burlesque kind, being usually styled a Mock-Heroic, or Mock Epic; and is pretty much of the nature of Homer's Margites; which, according to Aristotle, bore the same relation to Comedy, that the Iliad and Odyssey do to Tragedy. The hint of this poem is taken from the inimitable Don Quixote; but, in other respects, it is perfectly an original, being intended as a general satire on those times of anarchy and confusion, during which the poet lived. The Knight's name, and something of his character, are borrowed from Spenser's Fairy Queen (18):

He that made love unto the eldest dame,
Was hight Sir Hudibras, an hardy man;
Yet not so good of deeds, as great of name,
Which he by many rash adventures wan,
Since errant arms to few he first began.
More huge in strength, than wise in works he was,
And reason with fool-hardise over-ran:
Stern melancholy did his courage pass;
And was (for terror more) all armed in shining brass.

As to the versification of this poem, I shall give the reader the sentiments of two great judges of Poetry, Mr Dryden and Mr Addison. 'The sort of verse, which is called burlesque, consisting of eight syllables, or four feet, is that which our excellent Hudibras has chosen. — The worth of his poem is too well known to need any commendation. His satire is of the Varronian kind, tho' unmix'd with prose. The choice of his numbers is suitable enough to his design, as he has managed it: but, in any other hand, the shortness of his verse, and the quick returns of rhyme, had debas'd the style. And besides, the double rhyme (a necessary companion of burlesque writing) is not so proper for many satire; for it turns earnest too much into jest, and gives us a boyish kind of pleasure. It tickles awkwardly with a kind of pain to the best sort of readers: we are pleas'd ungratefully, and, if I may so say, against (18) Book ii. Canto i. Stanza 27.

15) See Poems and Translations by J. Oldham, Lond. 1683. p. 73.

16) See Dryden's Miscellanies, Vol. V. p. 213. edit. 1707. 12mo.

17) See the Remark [J].

he continues to enjoy, was published at three different times. The first part came out in 1663, in octavo: afterwards came out the second part; and both were printed together with several additions and annotations. At length the third and last part was published, but without any annotations, as appears by the copy printed in 1678 (n). The great success of this poem occasioned several unsuccessful imitations of it [P]; and some vain attempts

(n) Wood, ib.

' our I King; we thank him not for giving us that un-
' seasonable delight, when we know he could have ' given us a better and more solid. He might have ' left that task to others, who, not being able to put
' in thought, can only make us grin with the excre' scence of a word of two or three syllables in the ' close. It is indeed below so great a matter to make ' use of such a little instrument. But his good sense
' is perpetually shining through all the writes: it affords
' us not the time of finding faults. We pass through ' the levity of the rhyme, and are immediately carried ' into some admirable useful thought. After all, he ' has chosen this kind of verse, and has written the ' best in it; and had he taken another, he would al' ways have excelled. As we say of a court favourite,
' that whatever his office be, he still makes it upper-
' most, and most beneficial to himself (19). Mr
' Addison, speaking of the several kinds of false wit,
' says: *I must subjoin the double rhymes, which are used
' in doggrel poetry, and generally applauded by ignorant
' readers. If the thought of the couplet in such composi' tions is good, the rhymes add little to it; and if bad, it ' will not be in the power of the rhyme to recommend it.
' I am afraid, that great numbers of those, who admire
' the incomparable Hudibras, do it more on account of ' those doggrel rhymes, than of the parts that really de' serve admiration. I am sure, I have heard the* (19) Dryden's

Juvenal, edit.
1735. Dedicat. p.
100, 101.

' — Pulpit, drum ecclesiastick,
' Was beat with fist instead of a stick,
And
' There was an ancient sage Philosopher,
' Who had read Alexander Ross over.

*more frequently quoted than the finest pieces of wit in the whole poem (20). But, notwithstanding these censures, the shortness of our author's verse, and the quick returns of his rhymes, have been some of the principal means of raising and perpetuating the fame of this poem: for the turns of wit and satirical sayings, being short and pithy, are therefore more tenable by the memory; and this is one reason, why Hudibras is more frequently quoted in conversation, than the finest heroic poem. King Charles II, whom the judicious part of mankind will allow to have been a sovereign judge of wit, was so great an admirer of Hudibras, (tho' he shamefully neglected it's (†) author) that he would often pleasantly quote it in conversation (21).
And more of our Poets have testified their high opinion of Butler's genius; but none in a manner so much to his advantage as Mr Prior in the following passage of his Alma:*

(20) Spectator,
Vol. I. No. lx.

(†) See the Remark [I].

(21) Life, &c.
P. 3.

But shall we take the Muse abroad,
To drop her idly on the road,
And leave her subject in the middle,
As Butler did his bear and fiddle?
Yet he, consummate Master, knew
When to recede, and where pursue:
His noble negligences teach
What others toils despair to reach.
He, perfect dancer, climbs the rope,
And balances your fear and hope:
If, after some distinguish'd leap,
He drops his pole, and seems to slip;
Strait gathering all his active strength,
He rises higher half his length.
With wonder you approve his slight,
And owe your pleasure to your fright.
But, like poor Andrew, I advance,
False mimic of my master's dance;
Around the cord awhile I sprawl,
And thence, tho' low, in earnest fall (22).

(22) Canto ii.
ibid.

Nor has Hudibras wanted encomium from foreigners;
among whom the French author of Dissertation sur la

Poëse Anglois (†), expresses himself thus: ' The ' English have a Poet, whose reputation is equal to ' that of Scarron in French: I mean the author of ' Hudibras, a comical History in verse, written in the ' time of Oliver Cromwell. It is said to be a delicate
' satire on that kind of Interregnum; and that it is le-
' velled particularly at the conduct of the Presbyterians,
' whom the author represents as a senseless sort of
' people, promoters of anarchy, and compleat hy' pocrites. Hudibras, the hero of this poem, is a ' holy Don Quixote of that sect, and a redresser of ' imaginary wrongs, that are done to his Dulcinea.
' The Knight has his Rozinante, his Burlesque Adven' tures, and his Sancho. But the Squire of the English
' Poet is of an oppo- te character to that of the Spanis
' Sancho; for, whereas the latter is a plain unaffected
' peasant, the English Squire is a Taylor by trade; a
' Tartuff, or finished hypocrite, by birth; and so deep
' a dogmatick Divine, that (†) Gen. Dict.

Vol. IV. p. 296.

He cou'd deep mysteries unriddle,
At easily as thread a needle,

' as it is said in the poem. The author of Hudibras
' is preferable to Scarron, because he has one fixed
' mark or object; and that, by a surprizing effort of ' imagination, he has found the art of leading his ' readers to it, by diverting them.' M. de Voltaire highly extols this poem, and at the same time accounts for it's never having been translated into foreign languages. ' There is one English poem — the ' title whereof is Hudibras — it is Don Quixote, it ' is our Satire Menippée, blended together. I never ' met with so much wit in one single book as in this;
' which at the same time is the most difficult to be
' translated. — Who would believe, that a work,
' which paints in such lively and natural colours the
' several foibles of mankind, and where we meet
' with more sentiments than words, should baffle
' the endeavours of the ablest translators? But the ' reason of it is this; almost every part of it alludes
' to particular incidents (†). I shall only add, that some verses in the poem of Hudibras were omitted, for reasons of State, in the first impression; such as these following,

(†) Letters concerning the English nation, p.
212, 213. Lond.
1733; 8va.

Did not the learned Glynn and Maynard,
To make good subjects traitors, strain hard?
Was not the King, by proclamation,
Declar'd a traitor thro' the nation?

[P] There have been several unsuccessful imitations of Hudibras.] Such as, The Second Part of Hudibras; the Dutch and Scotch Hudibras; Butler's Ghost; the Occasional Hypocrite; and some others. The author of the first of these pieces, we are told, is ridiculed by Butler under the character of Whachum, towards the latter-end of the Second part (23). I conjecture it (23) Life, &c. must be that part of Whachum's character, which celebrates his skill in poetry. The verses are admirable, and may serve as a specimen of our author's wit and humour.

(23) Life, &c.
P. 13.

Besides all this, he serv'd his master
In quality of Poetaaster,
And rhymes appropriate cou'd make
To ev'ry month i'th' Almanack;
When terms begin and end, cou'd tell,
With their returns, in doggrel —
He wou'd an elegy compose
On maggots squeez'd out of his nose;
In Lyrick numbers write an ode on
His mistress eating a black-pudding;
And when imprison'd air escap'd her,
It puff'd him with poetick rapture.

His

tempts have been made to translate some parts of it into Latin [Q]. The Oxford Antiquarian ascribes to our author two pamphlets, supposed falsely (he says) to be William Prynne's: the one intitled Mola Asinaria; or, The unreasonable and insupportable Burthen, pressed upon the Shoulders of this groaning Nation, Lond. 1659, in one sheet in quarto; the other, Two Letters, one from John Audland a Quaker to William Prynne, the other Prynne's Answer, in three sheets in folio 1672 (o). The Life-writer mentions a small poem, of one sheet in quarto, on Du Val a notorious highway-man, said to be written by Butler (P). These pieces, with a great many others, (most, if not all, of them falsely ascribed to our author) are published together, under the title of, The Posthumous Works of Mr Samuel Butler [R]. The Life-writer has preserved a fragment of Mr Butler's, given him by one, whom

(o) Ubi supra:

(P) Life &c. P. 14.

His sonnets charm'd th' attentive croud,
By wide-mouth'd mortal troll'd aloud,
That, circl'd with the long-ear'd guests,
Like Orpheus look'd among the beasts.
A Carman's horse cou'd not pass by,
But stood ty'd up to Poetry;
Nor Porter's burthen pass'd along,
But serv'd for burthen of his song.
Each window, like the pill'ry, appears,
With heads thrust thro' nail'd by the ears.
All trades run in, as to the sight
Of monsters, or their dear delight
The gallows-tree, when cutting purfe
Breeds bus'ness for heroic verse;
Which none does hear, but wou'd have hung,
T'have been the theme of such a song (24).

24) Hudibras,
part ii. Canto iii.
cr. 358.

25) Life, &c.
12, 13.

[Q] Some parts of it have been translated into Latin. The following families, we are told (25), were done by the learned Dr Harmer, some time Greek Professor at Oxford.

So learned Taliacotius, from
The brawny part of Porter's bum,
Cut supplemental noses, which Lasted as long as parent breech;
But when the date of Nock was out,
Off dropt the sympathetick snout (26).

26) Part i. Can-
o. i. ver. 281.

Sic adscitius nasos de clune torosi
Vectoris docta secuit Taliacotius arte,
Qui potuere parem durando æquare parentem.
At postquam fato clunis computruit, ipsum
Unâ sympathicum cœpit tabescere Rostrum.

As wind i'th' Hypochondriacs pent
Is but a blast, if downward sent;
But if it upward chance to fly,
Becomes new light and prophecy (27).

27) Part ii.
Canto iii. ver.
22.

Sic Hypochondriaci inclusa meatibus aura
Desinet in crepitum, si fertur prona per alvum;
Sed si summa petat, mentisque invaserit arcem,
Divinus furor est, et conscia flamma futuri.

So Lawyers, lest the Bear Defendant,
And Plaintiff Dog shou'd make an end on't,
Do slave and tail with Writs of Error,
Reverse of Judgment and Demurrer;
To let them breathe a while, and then
Cry whoop, and set them on again (28).

28) Part i. Can-
o. ii. ver. 161.

Sic Legum mylæ, ne forsan pax foret Ursam
Inter tutantem sese actoremque Molossum,
Faucibus injiciunt clavos, dentesque refingunt,
Lustantesque canes coxis femorique revellunt;
Errores jurisque moras obtendere certi,
Judiciumque prius revocant ut prorsus iniquum.
Tandem post aliquod breve respiramen utrinque,
Ut pugnas iterent, crebris hortatibus urgent;
Eia, agite, O Cives, iterumque in prælia trudent.

These last Latin verses, which, in Butler's Life, are so incorrectly printed, as to be rendered almost nonsense, are here (it is hoped) restored to their genuine reading.

[R] The Posthumous Works of Mr Samuel Butler. They are distributed into three volumes, in duodecimo, consisting of a great variety of pieces. The editor assures us, they are 'the remains of that great and celebrated Genius Mr Butler, author of Hudibras.' and 'that a very great expence, and almost incredible industry, had been laid out in collecting these pieces, which had been scattered thro' an infinite number of hands, and could not have been recovered but by the most intense application.' He adds, that 'they were written, as may be collected from the general arguments, partly during the rebellion, and partly at the latter end of King Charles the Second's reign, about which time the inimitable author died.' We shall take notice here only of those pieces in this collection, of which the publisher has given some account. The Fable of the Lion and the Fox, he tells us, was obtained by the interest of an eminent Clergyman in Buckinghamshire, who had been Chaplain to the old Earl of Caernarvan; who informed him, that Mr Butler used to make long and frequent visits to Asket, the name of that Lord's seat; and that, at intervals, when he was disengaged from my Lord's company, he wrote this piece and several others. The Clergyman added, he believed the Fable of the Lion and the Fox was Mr Butler's first essay in this kind of poetry, and that, after he had finished it, he disliked it, and threw it by, 'till Mr Lichfield, who was then domestick Chaplain to the family, happened to get a copy, which he shewed to the clergy, and other gentlemen, that came to visit my Lord, who generally took copies of it also, some of which are to be met with in their families at this time; and that the applause and credit Mr Butler gained by this fable, induced him soon after to begin his Hudibras. With regard to the Memoirs of the year's 49 and 50, the editor assures us, he had seen several of Mr Butler's Letters to his friends, in which was a part of them, together with the verses, as they are now interspersed and printed with them. The Earl of Pembroke's Speeches were intended as a burlesque on that nobleman's Speeches in the House of Lords; which, we are told, were the common talk and sport of the kingdom; and that many of the Wits, at that time, turned them into lampoons and ridicule; amongst whom Mr Butler was one, who put them into the dress we now see them in, and sent them inclosed in letters to his particular friends and acquaintance, from whose copies they were afterwards printed, without Mr Butler's knowledge, and very much against his inclination. The Speeches of Alderman Atkins and Hugh Peters (the editor tells us) were written by Butler, at the command of the Lord Carberry, to expose the intolerable profaneness and stupidity of the faction. The Poem intitled Hudibras at Court, was communicated by the same hand as the Fable of the Lion and the Fox. The editor says, it was doubtless intended as a Fourth Part of Hudibras, as is obvious to any person that compares it with the other three. How the author came to drop the design, and to conclude the First Canto with a severe Satire on the Court, is differently reported: but the most general and probable conjecture (he tells us) is, that, after a long and fruitless dependance on the promises of the King and the great Courtiers, full of resentment, he resolved to leave the Court, to which he could never again be reconciled to the day of his death. The pieces contained in the third volume of this collection, the publisher assures us, were most of them written in Mr Butler's own hand, as will appear by the originals in the custody of the Printer. The Poem called Dunstable-Downs, or the Incubated Cave, and The Tale of the Cobler and Vicar of Bray, were given to the editor by a gentleman, whose father was an intimate of Mr Butler's, at the time he was Clerk to Sir Samuel Luke; whom he calls the ingenious Mr Aubrey [S], who assured him he had it from the Poet himself (q). A new edition of Mr Butler's Hudibras was published in 1744, by Zachary Grey, LL.D, with large annotations, and a preface, in two volumes 8vo.

(2) Ibid.

Luke; and who assured him, the facts of both were true; and that Butler, who was then very young, wrote them whilst he was with Sir Samuel, and, when he left that service, gave his father the copies. The rest of the pieces in this volume, excepting the Coffin for the good old Cause, which is generally supposed to be Sir Samuel's own, and published just before the expiration of the Rump, were collected from the papers of Sir Roger L'Elstrange, Dr Midgley, Mr Charles Booth, Amanuensis to the late Duke of Buckingham, Lord Rochester, and Captain Julian the famous Satire-monger of that time.

[S] A fragment of Butler's, communicated by Mr Aubrey. It is as follows:

No Jesuit e're took in hand
To plant a Church in barren land;
Nor ever thought it worth the while
A Swede or Rufs to reconcile.
For where there is no store of wealth,
Souls are not worth the charge of health,
Spain in America had two designs,
To sell their gospel for their mines:
For had the Mexicaus been poor,
No Spaniard twice had landed on their shore.
'Twas gold the Catholick Religion planted,
Which, had they wanted gold, they still had wanted.

BYNG (GEORGE) Lord Viscount Torrington, and Rear-Admiral of Great Britain, was descended from an antient family in the county of Kent; an account whereof see in the note [A]. He was born in the year 1663, and in 1678, at the age of fifteen, went a volunteer at sea, with the King's warrant given him at the recommendation of the Duke of York (a). In 1681, he quitted the sea-service, upon the invitation of General Kirk, Governor of Tangier, and served as a cadet in the grenadiers of that garrison, 'till on a vacancy that quickly happened, the General, who always patronized him with great friendship, made him Ensign of his own company, and soon after a Lieutenant. In 1684, after the demolition of Tangier, the Earl of Dartmouth, General of the sea and land forces, appointed him Lieutenant of the Orford, from which time he constantly kept to the sea-service, remaining likewise an officer in the army several years after. In 1685, he went Lieutenant of his Majesty's ship the Phœnix, to the East-Indies, where engaging and boarding a Zinganian pirate, who maintained a desperate fight, most of those that entered with him were slain, himself greatly wounded, and the pirate sinking, he was taken out of the sea, with scarce any remains of life. In 1688, being First-Lieutenant to Sir John Ashby, in the fleet commanded by the Earl of Dartmouth, and fitted out to oppose the designs of the Prince of Orange, he was in a particular manner entrusted and employed in the intrigues then carrying on, amongst the most considerable officers of the fleet in favour of that Prince, and was the person confided in by them, to carry their secret assurances of obedience to His Highness, to whom he was privately introduced at Sherburn, by Admiral Russel, afterwards Earl of Orford. After his return to the fleet, the Earl of Dartmouth sent him with Capt. Aylmer and Capt. Hastings, to carry a message of submission to the Prince at Windsor, and made him Captain of the Constant Warwick, a fourth rate man of war. In 1690, he commanded the Hope, a third rate, and was second

(a) Collins's
Peerage of England, Vol. IV.
p. 96.

[A] An account whereof see in the note. It appears on record, that this family was a long time seated in Kent, and as the visitation of that country, in the office of Arms, shews, John Byng, Esq; (son and heir of Thomas Byng, who was living in the reign of King Henry VII.) in the year 1535 (1), 28th of Henry VIII. having married Agnes, daughter to ——— Spencer, of the county of Essex, had issue, two sons and three daughters, Robert, the eldest son, the direct ancestor of the present Lord Viscount Torrington, was seated at Wrotham in Kent; and Thomas, the youngest, was of St Peter's College in Cambridge, Master of Clare-hall, and Doctor of the Civil Laws: in 1572, the 14th of Elizabeth, he was Vice-Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, as also in 1578. In 18 Eliz. he was in commission with William, Lord, Burleigh, Lord High-Treasurer of England, Richard, Bishop of Ely, and others, to visit St John's College in Cambridge. In 36 Eliz. 1594, he was constituted Regius Professor of the Civil Law in the same University: he was seated at Grandchester in Cambridgeshire, and in 1571 was married to Catharine, daughter of ——— Randall, Esq; by whom he had several sons, of which, Andrew the second was Archdeacon of Norwich, the King's Hebrew Professor at Cambridge, and was particularly recommended by King James I. to be Master of Corpus-Christi College in that University, by his letter of the 26th of March, 1618, as knowing personally (he says) his great worth, and as he would be an honour and ornament to the University, if they made choice of him. Henry, the eldest son of Thomas, was Serjeant at Law, and Counsel to the University of Cambridge, as was also his son after him.

(1) Collins's
Peerage of England, Vol. IV.
p. 94.

But to return to Robert Byng, Esq; of Wrotham, ancestor of Admiral Byng; he served for the Borough of Abingdon, in the first Parliament of Queen Elizabeth, anno 1559, and in the 34th year of her reign, was sheriff of the county of Kent (2). He married to his first wife, Frances, daughter and heiress of Richard Hill, Esq; by whom he had issue three sons, George, John, and Francis, whereof the two last died without issue; and by his second wife, Mary, daughter of William Maynard, Esq; he had issue three sons, of which, William was Governor of Deal-Castle, and a daughter, Anne, married to David Polhill of Orford in Kent, Esq; The said Robert Byng, Esq; of Wrotham, died on the second of September, 1595, (as appears by Inquisition of the Court of Wards) seized of the manors of Wrotham, Charlton Rusthale, in Spelhurst by Tunbridge; Stodmer-hill and Stock hill, manors in Yalding; and Stanstead manor, with Leybone Wood in Leybone, leaving issue, George Byng, his son and heir, who was chosen Member of Parliament for Rochester in Kent, 27 Eliz. and for the port of Dover in the first year of King James I. He died in 1616, and was succeeded by George Byng his son and heir, born at Wrotham in 1594, who in 1617, married Catharine, daughter of Sir John Hewett of Headly Hall, in the county of York, by whom he had issue, a son John, and a daughter, Elizabeth, married to ——— Man, of the county of Kent, Esq; John Byng, Esq; his son and heir, conveying away Wrotham, was the last of this family there. He married Philadelphia, the daughter of ——— Johnson of Loans in Surry, by whom he had several children, of which George the Lord Viscount Torrington, was the eldest.

(2) Fuller's Worthies of England,
p. 93. in Com.
Kent.

[B] Answered

to Sir George Rooke in the battle of Beachy. In the years 1691, and 1692, he was Captain of the Royal Oak, and served under Admiral Ruffel, who commanded in chief His Majesty's fleet. In 1693, that great officer distinguished him in a particular manner, by promoting him to the rank of his first Captain, in which station he served in the years 1694 and 1695, in the Mediterranean, where the designs of the French against Barcelona were prevented; and also the next year 1696, in the channel, to oppose the intended invasion of King James, with a French army from the coast France, which upon the appearance of the fleet was laid aside. In 1702, a war breaking out, he accepted the command of the Nassau, a third rate, and was at the taking and burning the French fleet at Vigo. In the year 1703, he was made Rear-Admiral of the Red, and served in the fleet commanded by Sir Cloudesly Shovel in the Mediterranean, who detached him with a squadron of five men of war (b), to Algiers, where he renewed the peace with that government. In his return home he was in danger of being lost, in the great storm which he met with in the Channel. In 1704, he served in the grand fleet sent into the Mediterranean, under the command of Sir Cloudesly Shovel, in search of the French fleet; and it was he who commanded the squadron that attacked and cannonaded Gibraltar (c); and by landing the seamen, whose valour was very remarkably distinguished on this occasion, they capitulated the third day. He was in the battle of Malaga, which followed soon after, and for his behaviour in that action, Queen Anne conferred on him the honour of knighthood (d). Towards the latter end of this year, the French having had two strong squadrons in the Soundings, besides great numbers of privateers, which very much annoyed our trade, Sir George Byng sailed the latter end of January from Plymouth, with a squadron of twelve men of war, and a great fleet of rich outward bound merchant ships, which after he had seen in safety out of the Soundings, he directed the squadron as he judged best for (e) annoying the enemies privateers, in which he was so successful, by his well stationing his cruisers, that he took twelve of their largest privateers in about two months time, with the Thetis, a French man of war of forty-four guns, and also seven French merchant ships, most of them richly laden from the West-Indies (f). The number of men taken on board was 2070, and of guns 334. This remarkable success made a great noise at that time, and was published by particular directions from the Court. It gave such a blow to the French privateers, that they scarce ventured into the Channel all the year after. In 1705, he was made Vice-Admiral of the Blue, and upon the election of a new Parliament, was returned a Burgess for Plymouth, which place he represented in every succeeding Parliament, to the year 1721, when he was created a Peer; and one of his sons has since been constantly chosen there. During this summer he commanded in chief a squadron in the Channel, and blocked up the French fleet in Brest, with a much inferior strength (g). In 1706, the Emperor being closely besieged in Barcelona by sea and land, by the Duke of Anjou, and the place reduced to great extremity, and our fleet in the Mediterranean being too weak to relieve it, he was appointed to command a squadron of twenty ships (h) from England, to go to it's relief; in which service he used such diligence and activity, and joined our fleet with such unexpected dispatch, that the saving that important place, was entirely owing to it, the French having in three days afterwards raised the siege. He assisted at the other enterprizes of that campaign, and commanded the ships detached for the reduction of Carthage and Alicant, which he accomplished, although at this last place there were above 160 guns facing the sea, many of which our Admiral with only five ships dismounted, and drove the enemy from them (i). After this, he was appointed to command a winter squadron, of eighteen men of war and two fire-ships, to guard the coast of Portugal, according to the treaty with that Prince, and to cruize in the properest stations for annoying the enemy. In the beginning of the year 1707, Sir George was ordered with a squadron to Alicant, with necessaries for the army in Spain; and having accordingly sailed the thirtieth of March, when he arrived off Cape St Vincent, he had the melancholy news of the defeat of our army at the battle of Almanza, under the command of the Earl of Galway, who sent to the Admiral, to acquaint him with the distress he was in, and desired, that whatever he brought for the use of the army, might be carried to Tortosa in Catalonia, to which place his Lordship designed to retreat; and that if possible, he would have the sick and wounded men at Denia, Gandia, and Valencia, where it was intended every thing that could be got together, should be got on board (k). This service the Admiral performed, and having sent the sick and wounded to Tortosa, and being soon after joined by Sir Cloudesly Shovel from Lisbon, proceeded together to the coast of Italy, with a fleet of forty-three men of war and fifty transports (l), to second Prince Eugene and the Duke of Savoy in the siege of Thoulon, at which Sir George Byng served in the second post under Sir Cloudesly Shovel (m), and narrowly escaped shipwreck in his return home, when that great officer was lost; for the Royal Anne, in which Sir George Byng bore his flag, was within a ship's length of the Rocks called the Bishop and his Clerks, upon which the Admiral struck; yet he was providentially saved by his own and his officers presence of mind, who in a minute's time set the ship's top-sails, even when one of the rocks was under her main chains (n). In 1708, he was made Admiral of the Blue, and commanded the squadron that was fitted out to oppose the invasion designed against Scotland by the Pretender, with a French army from Dunkirk; this squadron consisted of twenty-four men of war, with which Sir George Byng and Lord Dursley, sailed from Deal for the French coast,

(b) Burchet's Naval Hist. p. 653.

(c) Burchet, p. 677.

(d) Peerage of England, Vol. IV. p. 98.

(e) Burchet, p. 685.

(f) London Gazette, April 22, 1705.

(g) Peerage of England, ubi sup.

(h) Burchet, p. 692.

(i) Burchet, p. 694, 695.

(k) Burchet, p. 731.

(l) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 22.

(m) Peerage of England, ut supra.

(n) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 32. Burchet, p. 733.

coast, on the twenty-seventh of February, and having anchored in Gravelin pits, Sir George went into a small frigate, and sailed within two miles of the Flemish Road, and there learnt the strength and number of the enemies ships (o). On the Admiral's anchoring before Gravelin, the French officers laid aside their embarkation, but upon express orders from Court, were obliged to resume it; and on the sixth of March actually sailed out of Dunkirk, but being taken short by contrary winds, came to an anchor 'till the eighth, and then continued their voyage. Sir George Byng, at the time the French fleet set sail, had been obliged for security, to go to an anchor under Dungeness; and in his return to Dunkirk, was informed the French were sailed, but could get no account where; tho' he was strongly inclined to believe they were designed for Scotland. Whereupon it was resolved in a Council of War, to pursue the enemy to the road of Edinburgh; and accordingly having first detached Rear-Admiral Baker, with a small squadron, to convoy the troops that were sent from Ostend; the Admiral prosecuted his expedition with the rest (p).

(o) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 68, 69. Burchet, p. 740, &c.
(p) Hist. of Europe for 1708, p. 130. Scott's Hist. of Scotland, p. 741. Oldmixon, Vol. II. p. 404.

On the thirteenth of March, the French were discovered in the Frith of Edinburgh, where they made signals, but to no purpose, and then steered a N. E. course, as if they intended to have gone to St Andrews; Sir George Byng pursued them, and took the Salisbury, an English prize then in their service, with several persons of great quality on board, many land and sea officers in the French service, of very great distinction, five companies of the regiment of Bearn, and all the ship's company, consisting of 300 men (q); after this, Sir George Byng finding it impossible to come up with the enemy, he returned with the fleet to Leith, where he continued 'till he received advice of the French getting back to Dunkirk, and then proceeded to the Downs, pursuant to the orders he received from the Ministry. Before the Admiral left Leith Road, the Lord Provost and Magistrates of Edinburgh, to shew the grateful sense they had of the important service that he had done them, by thus drawing off the enemy before they had time to land their forces, and thereby preserving not only the city of Edinburgh, but even the whole kingdom, from the fatal effects of a rebellion and invasion, resolved to present him with the freedom of their city, by sending, in their name, Sir Patrick Johnston, their late Representative in Parliament, with an instrument called a burges's ticket, inclosed in a gold box, having the arms of the city on the side, and these words engraved upon the cover; 'The Lord Provost, Baillies, and Town Council of Edinburgh, did present these letters of Burgeoise, to Sir George Byng, Admiral of the Blue, in gratitude to him for delivering this island from a foreign invasion, and defeating the designs of a French fleet, at the mouth of the Frith of Edinburgh, the thirteenth of March 1708.' This present was accompanied with a letter from the Lord Provost, wherein he desired the Admiral to accept it as a mark of their high respect to him, who had delivered them from such great fear and apprehensions of danger, for which his memory should be honoured by them (r).

(q) Lives of the Admirals, ubi supra. Hist. of Europe for 1708, p. 1, &c.
(r) Scott's Hist. of Scotland, p. 742.

When Sir George Byng was afterwards created Lord Torrington, this action of his is particularly mentioned in the preamble to his patent of creation, much to his honour, as the reader will see hereafter. Upon Sir George Byng's arrival in London, he was most graciously received by the Queen his Sovereign, and by His Royal Highness Prince George of Denmark, Lord High-Admiral; and the Queen was pleased to offer him the place of one of the Prince's Council in the Admiralty, which however he then declined (s). One would have imagined, that this surprizing success must have satisfied every body; and that after defeating so extraordinary a scheme, as at that time this was allowed to be, and restoring publick credit, as it were in an instant, there should have been an universal tribute of applause paid to the Admiral, by all ranks and degrees of people. Yet this was so far from being the case, that Sir George Byng had scarce set his foot in London, before it was whispered that the Parliament would enquire into his conduct; which took rise from a very foolish persuasion, that having once had sight of the enemy's fleet, he might if he pleased, have taken every ship of them as well as the Salisbury. The truth of the matter was, that the French having amused the Jacobites in Scotland, with a proposal about the besieging the Castle of Edinburgh; Sir George Byng was particularly intrusted, by all means to prevent that, by hindering the French from landing in the neighbourhood. This he effectually did, and by doing it, answered the end for which he was sent (t) [B]. But the

(s) Peesage of England, Vol. IV. p. 99.

(t) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 70. Hist. of Europe for 1708.

[B] Answered the end for which he was sent.] To give a more particular and circumstantial account of this important affair, we must have recourse to Sir George Byng's own account, contained in two letters wrote to the Ministry by him from on board the Medway, dated the 13th and 15th of March, and which, together with a letter wrote by the French General to the King his master, shew the real designs of the French, and the great judgment and foresight of our Admiral in disappointing them, and will make a complete journal of this famous expedition. We shall do this in as few words as possible. 'On the 13th of March, in the morning, the French fleet was discovered in the mouth of the Frith of Edinburgh, off of which place Sir George Byng anchored the night before, and sent a boat on shore to the Isle of May, from whence he had an account that they ' came to an anchor the 12th in the afternoon, and

' had sent a ship up to Leith with a flag at main top-
' mast-head, but by that time she could get before the ' town, they heard guns fired in the manner of salutes,
' which were ours, for coming to an anchor. This ' ship, judged to be about sixty guns, came down in the ' morning, and was within two leagues of our squadron;
' that the French squadron standing from Sir George
' Byng, he pursued them with all the sail he could,
' sometimes with hopes of coming up with them, but ' they were lighter ships than ours; two of our ships
' indeed, the Ludlow Castle and Lover, being cleaner
' and better sailers than the rest, came up with part ' of the enemy's squadron, passing by some of their ' smaller, to reach bigger ships, in hopes of stopping ' them 'till they could be strengthened. They engaged
' two or three of the French, one of which was the ' Salisbury,

the same malicious people, who first propagated this story, invented also another, viz. that Sir George was hindered from taking the French fleet, by his ships being foul; which actually produced an enquiry in the House of Commons, and an address to the Queen, to direct that an account might be laid before them, of the number of ships that went on the expedition with Sir George Byng, and when the same were cleaned; which at last however ended in a resolution, that the thanks of the House should be given to the Prince, as Lord-High-Admiral, for his great care in so expeditiously setting forth so great a number of ships, whereby the fleet under Sir George Byng, was enabled, so happily, to prevent the intended invasion (u). This was a very wise and well concerted measure, since it fully satisfied the Queen and her Royal Consort, the Prince of Denmark, who both conceived that his Royal Highness's character was affected, as Lord-High-Admiral. In the middle of the summer of the year 1708, a resolution was taken, to make a descent on, or at least to alarm, the coast of France, by way of retaliation for the affront so lately offered us; and Sir George Byng as Admiral, and Lord Dursley as Vice-Admiral of the blue, were appointed to command the fleet destined for that purpose [C]. The same year, Sir George Byng, had the honour

(u) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 71. Hist. of Europe for 1708.

Salisbury, of fifty guns, formerly taken from us; these they endeavoured to cut off from the rest of the fleet, but a very dark night coming on, they lost sight of all but the Salisbury, and the falling in amongst the headmost of ours, was taken. The Admiral learned from the officers of this ship, that there were twelve battalions on board their squadron, commanded by the Count de Gace, and that the Pretender, the Lord Middleton, Lord Perth, the Mac-donalds, Captain Trevannion, and several other officers and gentlemen, were on board the Mars, in which ship was Monsieur Fourbin, who commanded the squadron. The morning after this chase there were but eighteen of the enemy's ships seen, and they as far off as they could be discovered from the mast-head; so that the Admiral having no prospect of coming up with them, he lay off and on near Buchanefs, all the day, to gather his ships together. The next morning it blew hard north-easterly, which made a great sea, and he judging the French could not seize the shore to make any attempt, bore up for Leith, which was thought most reasonable, not only to secure, but to give countenance and spirit to, her Majesty's faithful subjects, and discourage those who might have a design to join the enemy. The 16th, a Council of War was held in the road of Leith, when it was considered where the French might probably attempt to land, or which way our squadron might proceed, with most probability of preventing any design they might have; it was thought, that if our squadron should go northward, and the wind come up strong westerly, it might hinder their gaining the Frith of Forth, and that since the enemy were probably driven to the southward of it (which they thought was of the greatest consequence to secure) and were at first found at anchor in the Frith, it was reasonable to believe they intended for Edinburgh, the metropolis; so it was determined to remain in Leith road, until there should be advice of their returning on the coast, or that an answer could be received to the express dispatched to the Lord High-Admiral, but that in the mean while, scouts should be kept out between the Frith and Aberdeen, and all possible means used to gain intelligence from the shore, for which purpose the Admiral desired the Earl of Leven to send some trusty persons northwards towards the Frith of Murray. The 23d of March he received orders to send five ships and the prisoners taken in the Salisbury, into the river Humber, and the Downs, and with the squadron to proceed to sea and guard the coast of Scotland; whereupon it was resolved, that as soon as the prisoners could be removed, the squadron should proceed off Buchanefs, and that there the Admiral should send on shore for intelligence of the enemy, and that if he could not get any, he should ply it up again towards the Frith of Edinburgh. Not being able to get any advice, either by sea or land, of the French squadron, and provisions growing short in his own, he received orders in the beginning of April, to return to the Downs, but to leave three ships to cruise on the coast of Scotland, to prevent correspondence between disaffected persons of that kingdom, and France. Accordingly the Admiral appointed the ships for that service, and arrived in the Downs the 16th of April with three third rates, thirteen fourths, of which the Salisbury prize was one, two fifths, a sixth, and fire-ship, having appointed some frigates to convoy recruits from Scotland to Holland (3).

The account which the French General, Monsieur de Gace, wrote the King his master, agrees pretty well with the above (4). He says, they sailed from Dunkirk the 19th of March in the evening, and cast anchor in the mouth of the Frith of Edinburgh the 23d in the afternoon, N. S. The next day as they were ready to enter the Frith, they discovered our squadron; upon which the Admiral, M. Fourbin, resolved to bear off by the favour of a land breeze, which, (says he) 'Very luckily carried us from the enemy.' That we pursued them pretty close all that day, and that four of our best sailors (we say only two) attacked some of their sternmost ships, and took the Salisbury, after a stout resistance. That their fleet being dispersed, and we near them, M. Fourbin steered false during the night, which had a good effect, for the next day they found themselves, with twenty sail, at a good distance from us, whereupon it was proposed that since they had been prevented landing in the Frith of Forth, they should try if they could reach Inverness and land there, to which the Pretender readily agreed, and they actually set sail, and steered a whole day northwards, with a favourable wind, but at night there arose a strong contrary wind, which continued all the next day, with great violence, and they having no pilots to guide them, and fearing many other inconveniencies, they resolved to return to Dunkirk, where they arrived the 7th of April, N. S. Thus ended this affair of the invasion, which made so great a noise at that time, and which has been handed down in so many different lights to posterity; and tho' happily put an end to in time, yet had begun to have very bad effects, by sinking our publick securities, occasioning a prodigious run upon the Bank, and disturbing our foreign remittances so much, that all thinking people were convinced of the great risk a nation runs, that engages in a foreign war, while loaded with debts at home.

[C] Sir George Byng was appointed to command the fleet destined for that purpose.] Our Admiral sailed on the 27th of July, from Spithead, with the fleet, and transports having the troops on board, intended for the descent, commanded by Lieutenant-General Erle, and came the next day to anchor off Deal. The 29th, they stood over to the coast of Picardy, with the fleet, and to amuse the enemy, and to be ready for further orders. The first of August the fleet sailed again, and anchored the next day in the bay of Boulogne, where they made a feint of landing their troops; the third, they stood in pretty nigh the shore, to observe the condition of the enemy. The fourth, they weighed, but anchored again about noon in the bay of Etaples. Here a detachment of troops were landed; but the project on shore, which this descent was to have seconded, being laid aside, an express brought new orders from England, upon which the troops were re-embarked. The seventh, they stood over again to the coast of England, and being joined by more transports in Dover road, arrived the eleventh in the bay of La Hogue. The twelfth, they designed to have landed; but upon viewing the coast, they found so many troops brought together, to oppose a descent,

(3) Burchet's Naval History, p. 747, 748.

(4) Appendix to Scott's Hist. of Scotland, p. 743.

honour of conducting the Queen of Portugal to Lisbon [D], where a commission was sent him, appointing him to be Admiral of the White (w); and her Portuguese Majesty presented him with her picture set in diamonds, to a very great value (x). In the Year 1709, he commanded in chief, Her Majesty's squadron in the Mediterranean, during which, he attempted the relief of the city and castle of Alicant, and, which was a greater enterprize, had a design upon Cadiz; in both which, it was very far from being his own fault, that he did not succeed, having himself done all that could be expected from him, or he had power to do, to render those important designs successful [E]. After his return home from this command, (w) Peerage of England, Vol. IV. p. 99.

(x) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 90. Hist. of Europe for 1708.

descent, and so many forts and batteries on shore, that it was deemed impracticable. The fourteenth, the fleet set sail again for the westward, but the wind coming about the next day, they altered their course, and lay before Cherbourg, but found no prospect of doing any thing there. The same day the Lord Durlley, in the Oxford, with six other men of war, and marines, failed to the westward to cruise in the Soundings. The seventeenth, the rest of the fleet returned to the bay of La Hogue, but the men growing sickly, and provisions falling short, Sir George Byng returned to Spithead, on the 28th (5).—After thus alarming the French coasts, and creating the enemy inexpressible trouble, the Duke of Marlborough desired that the troops on board this squadron, might be landed at Ostend, which was accordingly performed on the 23d of September, at so critical a juncture, that it is thought if they had not arrived, the city of Lisle could scarce have been taken (6). Many things were given out with relation to this expedition, the true design of which, was to disturb the French naval armaments on their coasts, and to oblige the French Court to march great bodies of men to protect their maritime towns, which necessarily occasioned the diminishing their army in Flanders. The French Historians however, magnify the great advantage they obtained, by repelling this invasion.

[D] Sir George Byng had the honour of conducting the Queen of Portugal to Lisbon.] Her Majesty was stiled, before her marriage, the Arch-duchess Mary-Anne of Austria, daughter of the Emperor Leopold, and sister to the Emperor Joseph. Her marriage with the King of Portugal was thought to be highly advantageous to the common cause, and was therefore very grateful to our Court, who readily offered to send her Majesty to Lisbon, on board a British squadron, after having been first espoused by proxy, at Vienna (*). In the beginning of the month of September, she set out for Holland, where Rear-Admiral Baker attended, with a small squadron, in order to bring her over; which he accordingly did, on the 25th of that Month, and landed her at Portsmouth, where she staid some days at the house of Thomas Ridge, Esq; and the Queen being then at Windsor, sent instantly the Duke of Grafton to compliment her Majesty, on her part; as his Royal Highness the Prince of Denmark did the Lord De-awar, on his. Colonel Godfrey, who had married the Duke of Marlborough's sister, was sent to Portsmouth, to defray the expences of the Queen of Portugal's household, while she continued there, and accordingly he kept eight tables all the time; and her Majesty, in testimony of her grateful sense of the honours paid her by our Court, besides her present to Admiral Byng, made one to the Duke of Grafton of a diamond ring worth twelve thousand Crowns. On the 6th of October, about three in the afternoon, the Queen of Portugal went on board the Royal Anne, where her Majesty was received by Sir George Byng, and on her going off, the Governor saluted her with all the cannon of the place; and the next morning at seven o'clock, the fleet weighed and put to sea, when all the cannon of the town were again discharged. Sir George Byng proceeded with a fair wind, and, after a very quick and easy passage, brought her Majesty safely into the river of Lisbon, on the 16th of the same month. The King of Portugal, with several magnificent barges, went on board the Royal Anne, to welcome the Queen; and returning from thence, their Majesties landed at the bridge of the palace, under a magnificent triumphal-arch, from whence they proceeded through a vast crowd of people, to the Royal-Chapel, where they received the nuptial benediction. The Queen having generously expressed her great satisfaction as to the entertainment she had received, during her stay in England, undoubtedly the King was very liberal in his magnificent presents to the Admiral, and others, who conducted her (7). Sir George Byng, the very next day after his arrival at Lisbon, had intelligence that some French ships of considerable force had been seen upon the coast, which were supposed to be waiting for some of the homeward-bound Brazil fleet, which were then missing. Upon this, he immediately failed in quest of them, though without success, except that the news of his being at sea, forced them to retire, and thereby secured the safe return of thirty-four ships, which dropped in by degrees. About the middle of November, Sir George received orders to proceed to Port-Mahon, in order to winter there, and to leave Sir John Jennings at Lisbon, with a small squadron; but before he left that place, he received the Queen's orders to wear the Union Flag in the Mediterranean, the Prince of Denmark (through whose hands it should otherwise have gone as Lord High-Admiral) being dead (8). He failed on the 27th of December with six Ships of the Line, two fire-ships, and three other attendants; and having sent five ships to Alicant, to assure the Governor of the castle there, of his assistance, he arrived himself about Cape Palos the 3d of January, when standing in for Alicant, the wind came off from the land so fresh, that he could not fetch the bay, so that he bore away to Port-Mahon; but when he had got within four leagues of that place, which was on the 5th, a storm arose, which separated most of the squadron, forcing him almost so high as Sardinia; but on the 12th he got into Port Mahon, where he found most of the squadron (9).

(5) London Gazette, No. 4458, 4459, 4460, 4461, &c. Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 86, 87.

(6) Lives of the Admirals, ut supra.

(*) Hist. of Europe for 1708, p. 243.

[E] Having done all his power to render those designs successful.] There were many accidents occurred to frustrate our Admiral's great designs, as will appear from a short view of his proceedings during his command in the Mediterranean. In our last note, we left him in the harbour of Port-Mahon, where he was extremely distressed for want of naval stores, which were on board the Arrogant, a ship that had been missing from his arrival in that harbour, in quest of which he detached ships to Majorca and Cagliari; and at the same time dispatched orders to Sir Edward Whitaker, who was on the coast of Italy, to join him with his squadron, in case the Emperor's troops, that were designed for Catalonia, were not as yet ready. All the month of February 1709, was spent in tedious expectations; but at last, about the middle of March, Sir Edward Whitaker arrived with about 3000 men (10), to the great joy of Sir George Byng and General Stanhope, who had long waited for these forces, in order to attempt something for the relief of Alicant, then besieged by an army of 12000 men; and for the safety of which, King Charles had expressed unusual concern (11). Accordingly the squadron, consisting of eleven ships of the line of battle (12), having put to sea, arrived before Alicant, on the 5th of April in the morning, and stood into the bay, anchoring against the batteries and lines which the enemy had thrown up along the coast; and while the cannon were playing against those works, General Stanhope intended to push on shore, but the wind blowing very strong, occasioned a great sea, which rendered it impracticable; and the large ships being in less than four fathom water, were obliged to weigh their anchors, and make out of cannon shot. The weather continuing very bad till the 7th, and it not being known what extremities the garrison might be under, and the enemy increasing considerably in strength, the General sent a flag of truce on shore, with proposals for surrendering the castle, to which the garrison had before retired; which being agreed to, and our men embarked, Sir George Byng proceeded with the troops towards Barcelona, having detached some ships to cruise for the Turkey fleet, others with transports for corn to Barbary, and three ships he left to clean at Port-Mahon. In his

(7) Hist. of Europe for 1708, p. 313.

(8) Burchet's Naval History, p. 737.

(9) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 91. Hist. of Europe for 1708.

(10) Burchet's Naval History, p. 754.

(11) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 115.

(12) Burchet, ut supra.

command, he was made one of the Commissioners for executing the office of Lord High-Admiral (y), in which post he continued till some time before the Queen's death; when not falling in with the measures of those times, he was removed; but on the accession of his late Majesty King George, he was restored to that employment (z). In July 1711, he was made Admiral of the White; and, in the year 1715, in the breaking out of the rebellion, he was appointed to command a squadron in the Downs; in that critical juncture, with which he kept such a watchful eye along the French coast, by examining ships; even in their ports, and obtaining orders from the Court of France, for the putting on shore at Havre de Grace, great quantities of arms and ammunition which he had detected; were shipped there for the Pretender's service (a); that in reward of his services, the King created him a Baronet November 14, 1715 (b); gave him a ring of great value; and other marks of his royal favour (c). In the year 1717, a discovery having been made, of an invasion intended against this kingdom, by Charles XII. King of Sweden [F]: orders were

(y) Peerage of England, Vol. IV. p. 99.

(z) Peerage of England, ubi sup.

(a) Peerage of England, ubi sup.

(b) Salmon's Chronol. Historian, p. 375.

(c) Peerage of England, ubi sup.

his way to Barcelona, he landed General Stanhope with the troops at Tarragona, and returned, with the garrison of the castle of Alicant, to Port-Mahon (13). The whole squadron having joined at Barcelona, in June, a Council of War was held, in which it was determined, that since the King of Spain, as the posture of affairs then were, could not come to any resolution as to the fleet's assisting in the reduction of those parts of Spain still in the possession of the enemy, to fail to a station ten leagues off Cape Thoulon, not only for intercepting their trade, but to alarm them all that might be; and it being necessary a squadron should be on the coast of Portugal, Sir John Jennings was sent with thirteen ships to Lisbon (14). Sir George Byng arrived before Thoulon the 24th of June, in which harbour he saw only eight ships rigged, and one large man of war on the career, the rest being disarmed. After thus insulting Thoulon, he returned to Barcelona road, where he found most of the ships arrived from the services upon which he had sent them; and some of them, particularly the Centurion and Dunkirk, had been so fortunate as to take a great many prizes. The Admiral, upon his arrival to Barcelona, found the Court of Spain, at the instance of Cardinal Grimani, very desirous to have the reduction of Sicily attempted, and was informed by General Stanhope, that it was her Majesty's pleasure, part of the fleet should assist in the design upon Cadiz; but the Dutch ships having been separated in bad weather, and ours being too few to answer these and other services the Court proposed, he suspended, for some time, the coming to any resolution, being every day in expectation of the ships of the States-General; but at length he formed a disposition of her Majesty's ships, and appointed Sir Edward Whitaker for the service of Sicily, while he himself designed to proceed on the other with General Stanhope. The 26th of July, the Court of Spain having notice of the enemy's penetrating into the Lampourdan, with intention, as was apprehended, to besiege Gironne; and there being a want of ships to protect the coasts of Catalonia, and hinder the enemy having supplies by sea, as also a squadron to bring over the prizes with corn from Porto Farina, which they were in great want of, and some ships to go to Italy for money to subsist the troops; the Court seemed to lay aside the design on Sicily, and Sir George Byng sent five ships for the aforesaid vessels with corn (15). Thus the warmth, impatience, and irresolution of the Court of Spain, obliged the Admiral to drop his great designs; for, without regard to what had been resolved, or even for what themselves had demanded before, they were continually desiring something new to be done for them, without considering that it was impossible our ships could perform one service, without neglecting another. Thus upon an apprehension that the enemy would attack Gironne, the English ships were desired to intercept their provisions. Soon after they were distressed for want of provisions themselves, and then the most necessary thing that could be done, was to send for the prizes, laden with corn, from Port Farina. By that time this was resolved on, money grew scarce, and then his Catholick Majesty hoped that the English ships would go and fetch it immediately from Italy. The manner in which these demands were made, and the apprehensions the officers were under, of complaints being sent home, induced them to comply with every thing, as far as was in their power; so that, of necessity, the expedition against Sicily was laid aside. Our admirals, however, still flattered themselves, that something might be done at Cadiz, where it was known the people were in want of bread, and were besides, highly discontented with the French government (16).—On the 27th of July, the Dutch squadron arrived from Leghorn, upon which Sir George Byng called a Council of War, and laid before them the Queen's orders, the desires of his Catholick Majesty, and the project formed by themselves for attempting Cadiz; but the Commander in Chief of the Dutch Ships, excused himself, declaring, that they were victualled only till the end of August, which disabled him from undertaking any service beyond the 20th of that month. It was then agreed, that Sir George Byng should proceed to Cadiz, and the Dutch be employed in other services, as the King of Spain might have for them. Sir George arriving at Gibraltar, expected to have found there Rear-Admiral Baker's squadron, and the troops designed for the attempt on Cadiz; but not gaining any intelligence of him, or of Sir John Jennings, and finding that important enterprise could not be executed, he resolved to return to England, where he safely arrived on the 25th of September, leaving Sir Edward Whitaker with a squadron of sixteen ships in the Mediterranean, to protect the coasts of Catalonia, and cruise off the coast of Roses, to prevent the carrying to the enemy, any supplies of provisions or ammunition, and to intercept their vessels of corn from the Levant, and the coast of Barbary. This wise disposition of the Admiral's had the desired effect; for in the bay of Roses, our fleet discovered the grand convoy intended for the French service in the Lampourdan, consisting of forty large vessels laden with corn and other provisions, of which we took thirty, and hindered the rest from putting to sea; by which the enemy was greatly distressed, and King Charles's army so happily supplied with provisions, as to be able to keep the field, which otherwise they could not have done (17). Some Dutch accounts say, Sir Edward Whitaker actually went into the bay of Roses, and took fifty corn vessels, and offered King Charles to assist in reducing that port, but his advice was not followed.

[F] It having been discovered that an invasion was intended against this kingdom. This design was chiefly carried on between Baron Gortz, Minister and favourite of the King of Sweden, and Count Gylleberg, the Swedish Minister in England, who had lived here some years, and married an English lady. They had for some time carried on a correspondence together, and concerted measures with the English rebels in France, and several persons in England, for raising a rebellion, in favour of the Pretender, to be supported by foreign force. It is not certainly known how this conspiracy came to be discovered; but on the 29th of January, Mr Secretary Stanhope, by the King's command, communicated to the Privy-Council, the information his Majesty had received concerning this plot; upon which several persons were secured, and amongst the rest, Count Gylleberg, with all his papers; and Baron Gortz was, at his Britanick Majesty's request, arrested in Holland, where he acted as Minister from the King of Sweden. Mr Secretary Stanhope laid before the House of Commons, copies of letters that passed between Gylleberg, Gortz, Baron Sparr, the Swedish Ambassador at Paris, and others, by which it appeared, that their intention was to transport 12,000 men, a sufficient train of artillery, arms for 10 or 12,000 men more, with requisite stores of ammunition; that there had been remitted to them, several

(16) Burchet, &c. ubi supra.

(17) Burchet, ut supra. Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 125.

(13) Burchet's Naval History, p. 758. Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 122.

(14) Burchet, ut supra. Histoire Militaire, Tom. VI. p. 255.

(15) Burchet, p. 759, 760. Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 123.

sums

(d) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 398.

(e) Chandler's Debates. Votes of the House of Commons. Political State of England. Salmon's Chronological Historian, p. 390.

(f) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 400.

(g) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 401.

were issued for forming a grand squadron, consisting of twenty-one ships of the line (d), besides frigates, for the Baltick, the command of which was given to Sir George Byng, who was to have had two Admirals under him, with an additional force; but before those ships were ready, the Ministry altered their design; and Sir George, in obedience to his fresh orders, sailed on the thirtieth of March for Copenhagen (e), and on the eleventh of April arrived in the road of that place. The next day he had an audience of the King, and assisted at several conferences which were held the succeeding week, in order to settle the operations by sea, and the command of the confederate fleet, in case the several squadrons should join (f). Sir George next detached five ships of the line to cruize in the Categat, between Gottenburgh and the Point of Shagen, to cover the trade from the Swedish privateers. The Danish cruizers being likewise employed for the same purpose, the passage was so effectually secured, that no ships could pass out of that port. Sir George himself only waited for a fair wind to sail with the rest of the British squadron into the Baltick, where the Swedes, however, had absolutely laid aside whatever design they had formed, either to our prejudice, or against the general peace of Europe. On the seventh of May, however, our Admiral sailed from Copenhagen, having under his convoy a great number of merchant ships, bound for several ports of the Baltick, and being joined by the Danish fleet, commanded by Vice-Admiral Gabel, they sailed together towards Carlscroon, but were obliged by contrary winds to return. As no enemy appeared, and the season began to advance, Sir George Byng thought of returning home with the fleet; and accordingly on the second of November he passed the Sound, with nine English men of war, three frigates, and three vessels of small burthen, leaving behind him six men of war to act in conjunction with the Danish fleet; and on the fifteenth of the same month, arrived safe at the mouth of the Thames: there leaving his squadron, he came up to London, and was graciously received by his Majesty (g). We are now to enter upon the most important scene of action, our Admiral was ever engaged in; and which he conducted with equal honour and reputation to himself, and the British Flag. This was the famous expedition of the English fleet to Sicily, in the year 1718, for the protection of the Neutrality of Italy, and the defence of the Emperor's possessions (according to the obligations England was under by treaty) against the invasion of the Spaniards, who had the year before surprized Sardinia, and had this year landed an army in Sicily. It comes not within our province to enquire into the policy of the Councils which produced these measures; it is sufficient for us to relate plain matters of fact, by which it will appear, that Sir George Byng performed, upon this occasion, all that could be expected from the wisdom and skill of an English Admiral; and that this expedition effectually answered it's end, which ought to be considered as an honour to his memory: whether that end shall be thought right or wrong, which is mere political dispute, and neither can or ought to affect the character of the Admiral, in the least. It was about the middle of March, in the year 1717-18, that Sir George Byng was appointed Admiral and Commander in Chief of the Squadron intended for the Mediterranean; in May following he received his instructions, which see in the note [G]. The ships sums of money from persons in the design; that amongst others, the Duke of Ormond was concerned, and had wrote to Gortz, that the King his master (meaning the Pretender) had ordered him to let Gortz know, that he expected shortly a supply of money, and would remit sixty thousand pounds to his Swedish Majesty, and begs him to look upon it only as a token of what was to come after, &c. The pretence for this invasion, was, to maintain the English liberties, and support the Church of England. In order to satisfy the world of the truth of this affair, the letters and papers relating thereto, were made publick; and the Parliament soon after, shewed the warmest resentment and indignation at the insolence of this attempt. It was indeed amazing, that a Prince, who was already overwhelmed by so many and so powerful enemies, should think of adding to their number, by an attempt of this kind. But whoever considers the genius and spirit of the late Charles XII. will easily conceive, that it was natural enough for him to embrace any expedient which seemed to promise the desolving that confederacy by which he was distressed. But his design was not only rendered abortive by this unexpected discovery, which put it absolutely out of his power to carry it into execution, but it likewise brought upon him new difficulties, in consequence of our King's resentment of such behaviour, which presently discovered itself, by the vigorous resolutions taken here; for a bill was brought to prohibit commerce with Sweden (18), during such time as his Majesty should think it necessary, for the safety and peace of his kingdom (19), which passed both Houses, and had the Royal Assent; and soon after a proclamation was published to the same end; and a formidable squadron sent into the Baltick under the command of Admiral Byng, which effectually removed all apprehensions the nation was under from the Swedes.

[G] He received his instructions, which see in the note.] They were dated the 26th of May, and are to the following purpose (20): 'That he should, upon his arrival in the Mediterranean, acquaint the Court of Spain, and likewise the Viceroy of Naples, and the Governor of Milan, that he was sent into that sea in order to promote all measures that might best contribute to the composing the differences arisen between the two Crowns, and for preventing any further violation of the Neutrality of Italy, which he was to see preserved. That he was to make instances with both parties, to forbear all acts of hostility, in order to the setting on foot, and concluding, the proper negotiations of peace: But, in case the Spaniards should still insist to attack the Emperor's territory in Italy, or to land in any part of Italy for that purpose, or should endeavour to make themselves masters of the island of Sicily, which must be with a design to invade the kingdom of Naples, he was then, with all his power, to hinder and obstruct the same. But if they were already landed, he was to endeavour amicably to dissuade them from persevering in such an attempt, and to offer them his assistance to withdraw their troops, and put an end to further acts of hostility. But if his friendly endeavours should prove ineffectual, he was then to defend the territories attacked, by keeping company with, or intercepting their ships or convoys, or (if necessary) by opposing them openly.' It is evident that these instructions were not of the clearest kind; but it seems, that they were explained to the Admiral before hand, by those who had then the direction of affairs, as appears by a letter wrote by Mr Secretary Craggs to Sir George Byng, immediately before his embarkation; it is preserved by the accurate Historian of this expedition, above-cited, in his appendix, of his original edition; from whence we have transcribed it, as a full proof, that

(18) Chandler's Debates. Votes of the House of Commons. Historical Register for 1717.

(19) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 398.

(20) See the Account of the Expedition of the British Fleet to Sicily, in the Appendix.

ships being got to their rendezvous at Spithead, Sir George Byng repaired down to Portsmouth, to take them under his command; and on the fifteenth of June 1718, sailed from thence with twenty ships of the line of battle, two fire-ships, two bomb-veffels, an hospital-ship, and a store-ship. Being got into the ocean, he sent the Rupert to Lisbon for intelligence; and arriving the thirtieth off Cape St Vincent, he dispatched the Superbe to Cadiz, with a gentleman who carried a letter from him to Colonel Stanhope, (the present Earl of Harrington) the King's Envoy at Madrid, wherein he desired that Minister to acquaint the King of Spain, with his arrival in those parts, in his way to the Mediterranean, and to lay before him the instructions he was to act under with his squadron; of which he gave a very ample detail in his letter [H]. The Admiral pursuing his voyage with unfavourable winds, it was the eighth of July before he made Cape Spartel, where the Superbe and Rupert rejoined him, and brought him advice of the mighty preparations the Spaniards had made at Barcelona, and of their fleet sailing from thence the eighteenth of June to the eastward. In passing by Gibraltar, Vice-Admiral Cornwall came out and joined him, with the Argyle man of war, and Charles galley. The squadron wanting water, and the wind continuing contrary, they anchored off Cape Malaga; where having completed their watering, in four days, they proceeded to Minorca, where the Admiral was to land four regiments of foot which he carried out from England, in order to relieve the soldiers there in garrison, who were to embark and serve on board the squadron (b). On the twenty-third of July, he anchored with the squadron off Port Mahon; here he received advice, that the Spanish fleet had been seen the thirtieth of June, within forty leagues of Naples, steering S. E. upon which he dispatched away expresses to the Governor of Milan, and the Viceroy of Naples, to inform them of his arrival in the Mediterranean; from whence he sailed the twenty-fifth of July, and arrived the first of August in the Bay of Naples (i), into which the fleet sailing with a gentle gale, consisting of twenty-one sail of the line of battle, most of them great ships, and three of them bearing flags, afforded such a spectacle as had never been seen in those parts before. The whole city was in a tumult of joy and exultation. The shore was crowded with multitudes of coaches and people; and such an infinite number of boats came off, some with provisions and refreshments, others out of curiosity

(b) Account of the Expedition to Sicily, p. 15, 16: Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV: p. 418. History of the Revolutions of Spain, Vol. V. P. 521.

(i) Annals of King George. Historical Register for 1718.

that Sir George acted according to the verbal explanation of his written orders by the Ministers.

Cockpit, May 27,
O. S. 1718.

S I R,

I inclose to you His Majesty's instructions, as well with relation to your conduct in the Mediterranean, as to the treaty with the Moors. After what passed yesterday between my Lord Sunderland, my Lord Stanhope, you, and me, when we were together at Lord Stanhope's lodgings, there remains nothing for me, but to wish you a good voyage, and good success in your undertakings: I do it very heartily, and am, with great truth,

S I R,

Your most obedient Humble servant,

J. CRAGGS.

[H] Of which he gave a very ample detail in his letter.] This letter of Admiral Byng's, Mr Stanhope shewed to the Cardinal Alberoni, who upon reading it told him with some warmth, 'That his master would run all hazards, and even suffer himself to be driven out of Spain, rather than re-call his troops, or consent to any suspension of arms;' adding, 'That the Spaniards were not to be frightened, and that he was so well convinced of their fleet's doing their duty, that if the Admiral should think fit to attack them, he should be in no pain for the success.' Mr Stanhope, having in his hand, a list of the British squadron, desired his Eminence to peruse it, and to compare it's strength with that of their own squadron; which the Cardinal took and threw on the ground with much passion. Mr Stanhope, with great temper, intreated him, 'To consider the sincere attention the King his master had always had to the honour and interests of his Catholick Majesty, which it was impossible for him to give greater proofs of than he had done, by his unwearied endeavours through the whole course of the present negotiation, to procure the most advantageous conditions possible for Spain, in which he had succeeded even beyond what any unprejudiced person could have hoped for; and that, tho' by the treaty of Utrecht for preserving the Neutrality of Italy, which was entered into at the request of the King of Spain himself; as also by that of Westminster, the 25th of May, 1716, His Majesty found himself obliged to defend the Emperor's dominions when attacked, he had hitherto acted only as a mediator, though even since the enterprise against Sardinia, by his treaties, he became a party in the war, and for this year last past, had been strongly called upon by the Emperor, to comply with his engagements; and that, even now, when it was impossible for him to delay any longer the sending his fleet into the Mediterranean, it plainly appeared by the Admiral's instructions, which he communicated to his Eminence, and by the orders he had himself received, that His Majesty had nothing more at heart, than that his fleet might be employed in promoting the interests of the King of Spain, and hoped his Catholick Majesty would not, by refusing to re-call his troops, or consent to a cessation of arms, put it out of his power to give all the proofs of sincere friendship he always designed to cultivate with his Catholick Majesty.' All that the Cardinal could be brought to promise, was, to lay the Admiral's letter before the King, and to let the Envoy know his resolution upon it in two days; but it was nine before he could obtain and send it away; the Cardinal probably hoping, that the Admiral would delay, in expectation of it, in some of the ports of Spain, and thereby give time for their fleet and forces to secure a good footing in Sicily. The answer was wrote under the Admiral's letter, in these words. His Catholick Majesty has done me the honour to tell me, that the Chevalier Byng may execute the orders which he has from the King his master. Escurial, July 15th, 1718. 'The Cardinal Alberoni.' Mr Stanhope seeing things tending to a rupture, gave private and early notice of his apprehensions to the English Consuls, and Merchants, settled in the Spanish sea-ports, advising them to secure their effects against the dangers that might arise from a breach between the two crowns; and set out himself for Madrid, in order to make new propositions to his Catholick Majesty, to prevent things coming to extremities; in which negotiation he actually laboured 'till very near the time that hostilities were begun; but to no purpose; for Cardinal Alberoni was so bent on executing his own scheme (21), that he rejected all proposals that were made him, with great firmness (22), and resolution.

VOL. II. No 92.

(21) Hist. of the Revolutions of Spain, Vol. V. p. 519.

(22) Merceures Historiques & Politiques. Memoires de M. L. C. Alberoni, &c. Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. P. 417.

curiosity and admiration; that the sea between the fleet at anchor and the shore, was, literally, covered. The Viceroy, Count Daun, being ill with the gout, and having sent his compliments to the Admiral, he went on shore, attended by the Flag-officers and Captains in their boats, and was saluted at his landing, by all the cannon round the city and castles, and was conducted to Court, through an infinite throng of people, with the greatest acclamations of joy, and all the honours and ceremonies paid to a Viceroy [I]. Here the Admiral entered into a conference with Count Daun, from whom he learnt that the Spanish army, consisting of about 30,000 men, commanded by the Marquis de Lede, had landed the second of July in Sicily, and had soon made themselves masters of the city and castles of Palermo, and of great part of the island; that they had taken the town of Messina, and were then carrying on the siege of the citadel, &c. After the conference, the Admiral was splendidly entertained at dinner, and then lodged at the palace of the Duke de Matalona, which had been magnificently fitted up for his reception. The next morning they had another conference, on the measures to be taken in that conjuncture of affairs; when it was agreed, that the Viceroy should send 2000 German foot, in tartans, to Messina, to relieve the citadel, and Fort St Salvador, under the protection of Sir George Byng (k), who accordingly sailed with them the sixth of August from Naples, and arrived the ninth in view of the Fare of Messina. Here the Admiral, desirous of trying every method of negotiation, before he proceeded to the extremity of his orders, dispatched his first Captain to Messina, with a letter to the Marquis de Lede, wherein, after acquainting him upon what account he was sent there, he proposed a cessation of arms in Sicily, for two months, in order to give time to the several Courts, to conclude on such resolutions as might restore a lasting peace; but added, that if he was not so happy to succeed in this offer of his service, he should then be obliged to use all his force, to prevent farther attempts to disturb the dominions his Master stood engaged to defend. The General returned for answer, that he had no Powers to treat, and consequently could not agree to a suspension of arms, but must follow his orders, which directed him to seize upon Sicily for his Master the King of Spain. According to the best accounts the Admiral could receive, he was led to conclude, that the Spanish fleet was sailed from Malta, in order to avoid him; and therefore upon receiving the Marquis's answer, he immediately weighed, with intention to come with his squadron before Messina, in order to encourage and support the garrison in the citadel; but, as he stood about the Point of the Fare towards Messina, he saw two Spanish scouts in the Fare; and being informed at the same time by a felucca, which came off from the Calabrian shore, that they saw from the hills, the Spanish fleet lying by; the Admiral altered his design, and sending away the German troops to Reggio, under the convoy of two men of War, he stood thro' the Fare with his squadron, with all the sail he could, after their scouts, imagining they would lead him to theirs, which accordingly they did; for before noon he had a fair view of their whole fleet lying by, and drawn into a line of battle, consisting of twenty-seven sail of men of war, small and great, besides two fire-ships, four bomb-vessels, seven galleys, and several ships laden with stores and provisions, commanded by the Admiral Don Antonio de Castaneta, and under him four Rear-Admirals, Chacon, Mari, Guevara, and Cammock; on the sight of the English squadron, they stood away large, but in good order of battle. The Admiral followed them all the rest of that day, and the succeeding night, with calm and fair weather; the next morning early, (the eleventh) the English being got pretty near up with them, the Marquis de Mari, Rear-Admiral, with six Spanish men of war, and all the galleys, fire-ships, bomb-vessels, and store-ships, separated from their main fleet, and stood in for the Sicilian shore; upon which the Admiral detached Capt. Walton, of the Canterbury, with five more ships after them; and the Argyle and Canterbury, getting within gun-shot of the headmost ship, about six in the morning, the Argyle fired a shot to bring her to, which she not minding, the Argyle fired another, and the Canterbury being somewhat nearer, fired another, upon which the Spanish ship fired her stern chase guns at the Canterbury, and then the engagement began. The Admiral pursuing the main body of the Spanish fleet; the Orford, Capt. Falkingham, and the Grafton, Capt. Haddock, came up first with them about ten of the clock, at whom the Spaniards fired their stern chase guns. The Admiral sent orders to those two ships not to fire, unless the Spaniards repeated their firing; which they doing, the Orford attacked the Santa Rosa, of sixty guns, and took her. The St Carlos, of sixty guns, struck next, without much opposition, to the Kent, Capt. Mathews. The Grafton attacked warmly

the

[I] He was conducted to Court through an infinite throng of people, with the greatest acclamations of joy, &c.] The imperial Viceroy of Naples, presented Sir George with a sword set with diamonds, and a very rich staff of command; and to the Admiral's son he also made a present of a very fine sword; and likewise sent refreshments to the fleet, consisting of a hundred oxen, three hundred sheep, six hundred pounds of sugar, seventy hogheads of wine, forty hogheads of brandy, and several other things (23). We need not wonder, that the German government was extremely well pleased at the Admiral's arrival, or that they paid him every honour in their power, since it is very certain, that his coming so luckily, preserved that kingdom for the house of Austria, that had otherwise, in all probability, shared the fate of Sicily, which the Marquis De Lede had conquered, almost as soon as he landed (24); or rather his landing gave the people an opportunity of declaring for that power, which, tho' it had lost it's sovereignty over them, had still preserved their affection. And at Naples, though the common people were generally in the interest of the house of Austria, there was a strong party, among the Sicilian Nobility for Spain; and the whole country was in provided for defence.

(24) Hist. of the Revolutions of Spain, Vol. V. p. 529.

(23) Lives of the Admirals, p. 418.

the Prince of Asturias, of seventy guns, formerly called the Cumberland, in which was Rear-Admiral Chacon, but the Breda and Captain coming up, Capt. Haddock left her much shattered, for them to take; and stretched a-head after another ship of sixty guns; which had kept firing on his starboard bow, during his engagement with the Prince of Asturias. About one of the clock, the Kent, and soon after the Superbe, Capt. Matter, came up with, and engaged the Spanish Admiral, of seventy-four guns, who, with two more ships, fired on them, and made a running fight, 'till about three, and then the Kent bearing down upon him, and under his stern, gave him her broadside, and fell to leeward; afterwards the Superbe putting for it to lay the Admiral aboard, fell on his weather quarter; upon which the Spanish Admiral shifting his helm, the Superbe ranged up under his lee quarter, on which he struck to her. At the same time the Barfleur, in which was the Admiral, being a-stern of the Spanish Admiral within shot, and inclining on his weather quarter, Rear Admiral Guevara and another sixty gun ship, which were to windward, bore down upon him, and gave him their broadsides, and then clapt upon a wind, standing in for the land; Admiral Byng immediately tacked and stood after them, until it was almost night, but it being little wind, and they galing away out of his reach, he left pursuing them, and stood into the fleet, which he joined two hours after night. The Effex took the Juno of thirty-six guns, the Mountague and Rupert took the Volante of forty-four guns, and Rear-Admiral Delaval in the Dorsetshire, took the Isabella of sixty guns. This action happened off Cape Passaro, at about six leagues distance from the shore. The English received but little damage. The ship that suffered most was the Grafton, which being a good sailer, her Captain engaged several ships of the enemy, always pursuing the headmost, and leaving those ships he had disabled or damaged, to be taken by those that followed him. The Admiral lay by some days at sea, to refit the rigging of his ships, and to repair the damages the prizes had sustained; and, the eighteenth received a letter from Capt. Walton, who had been sent in pursuit of the Spanish ships that escaped. The Captain was one whose natural talents were fitter for achieving a gallant action, than describing one, and his letter on this occasion, is singular enough in it's kind to deserve notice. It runs thus :

S I R,

WE have taken and destroyed all the Spanish ships and vessels which were upon the coast, the number as per margin,

I am, &c.

Canterbury, off Syracuse,
August 16, 1718.

G. WALTON.

These ships that Capt. Walton thrust into his margin, would have furnished matter for some pages, in a French relation; for, from the account they referred to, it appeared that he had taken four Spanish men of war; one of sixty guns, commanded by Rear-Admiral Mari; one of fifty-four, one of forty, and one of twenty-four guns, with a bomb-vessel, and a ship laden with arms; and burnt four men of war, one of fifty-four, two of forty, and one of thirty guns, with a fire-ship and a bomb-vessel. He was knighted for this action, and made a flag officer some time after. Such is the account of this famous action; by our Admiral (1). The Spaniards, published likewise an account on their side, which was printed in Holland, and circulated with great industry throughout all Europe, in order to make such impressions as might serve their purpose, and incline the world to believe, that their fleet had not been attacked and beaten fairly, but had been surprized and destroyed, without that kind of notice, which the laws of nature and nations require, to distinguish force of arms from pyritical violence. It is but just in any case, to hear both parties; and as the Spanish relation contains many particulars that are wanting in the Admiral's, which is indeed too general, and as the Historian of this expedition, has not taken notice of the account given by the Spaniards, it is therefore requisite to give it a place here, for by a comparison hereof with our Admiral's account, many particulars come to be explained, which otherwise might have been buried in obscurity. See therefore the notes, where it comes more properly [K]. As soon as Admiral Byng had obtained a full account of the whole

(1) This Account is taken from the several Letters written by the Admiral, or published with his authority.

[K] See therefore the notes, where it comes more properly.] The account itself being very long, we shall shorten it as much as we can, by curtailing it of some particulars which are the same with the Admiral's. The substance therefore is as follows. 'The Spanish Admirals not knowing the intentions of the English, whether they came as friends or enemies, endeavoured to penetrate into their designs, and sent two light frigates to get intelligence of them; and when the English squadron advanced into the Faro, it was saluted by all the Spanish ships and vessels which were there. That the officer sent by Admiral Byng to the Marquis de Ledé, with proposals for a cessation of arms, affirming, that his fleet was not to commit any act of hostility, but only to secure the transports under the Admiral's protection, from insults; yet, though it was believed that a courier was sent by the Marquis, to Madrid, with the Admiral's proposals, the English squadron took the opportunity of night, to surprize the Spanish squadron, which had retired towards Cape Passaro, but did not make much sail, that it might not be thought they suspected any hostilities. During this, a calm happened, by which the ships of both squadrons fell in one among another; and the Spanish Admiral perceiving this accident, caused the ships of the line to be towed, in order whole transaction, he dispatched away his eldest son to England, who arriving at Hampton-Court in fifteen days from Naples, brought thither the agreeable confirmation of what publick order to separate them from the English, and join them in one body, without permitting the gallies to begin any act of hostility, which they might have done to advantage, during the calm. The weather changed, when the Marquis de Mari was near land, and consequently separated from the rest, making the rear-guard, with several frigates and other transport vessels, which made up his division, and endeavoured, tho' in vain, to join the main body of the Spanish squadron, while the English filled their sails to gain the wind, and cut off the division of the Marquis de Mari; and having at last succeeded in it, they attacked him with six ships, and obliged him to separate from the rest of the squadron, and to make towards the coast, where they stood it against seven ships of the line, as long as the situation permitted; and being no longer able to resist, the Marquis de Mari saved his Men, by running his ships a-ground, some of which were burnt by his own order, and others taken by the enemy.—Seventeen ships of the line, the remainder of the English squadron, attacked ten Spanish ships, which continued making towards Cape Passaro; and as they retired in a line, because of the inequality of their strength, the English attacked those that composed the rear-guard, with four or five ships, and took them; this happened successively to others, which being attacked separately by five, six, or seven of the enemy's, were taken after a bloody and obstinate fight. Thus the Royal St Philip, Admiral Castaneta, was attacked by the whole division of the English Admiral, consisting of seven ships of the line, and a fire-ship; the fight began at two in the afternoon, by a ship of seven y guns, and another of sixty, which gave him two broadsides, but he defended himself so well that they retired, and two other ships, one of eighty, the other of seventy guns, renewed the attack; and the eighty gun ship retired very much shattered, without going into the line; but the others making towards the Spanish Admiral, they fired upon him, while it was impossible for him to hurt them, and shot away all his rigging, without leaving him one entire sail, while two others, one of sixty, the other of thirty guns, attacked the starboard of his ship, to oblige him to surrender, and the English Admiral carried a fire-ship, to reduce him by the flames, which, however, the Spanish Commander prevented, and maintained the fight till towards night, having lost two hundred men, and himself received a shot which pierced his left leg, and wounded his right heel: yet he continued to defend himself till a cannon bullet having cut a mast in two, the pieces of which fell upon him and left him half dead, he was forced to surrender. While the Royal Philip was engaged with the English, Rear-Admiral Guevara came up, and attacked Admiral Byng's ships, and very much damaged them. The Prince of Asturias, Rear Admiral Chacon, was attacked at the same time, by three ships of equal force, against which he defended himself valiantly, avoiding being boarded, till being wounded, and having lost most of his men, he was obliged to surrender his ship, which was all shot through and through, after having shot down the masts of an English ship that retired out of the fight. The St Rosa frigate defended herself above three hours, against five English ships, who did not take her till they had broke all her sails and masts. The Volante fought three hours and an half, against three English ships, and having lost her sails, and put up others that were in store, was just going to board one of the enemy's ships, but being shot through by six cannon-bullets, and the water coming in, the Captain was obliged to surrender, because the ship's crew forced him. The Juno was engaged also by three English ships; yet maintained the fight above three hours, not surrendering till most of her men were killed, and the ship just falling in pieces. The Pearl fought three hours against three ships, and after having shot down the masts of one of them, which immediately retired, was rescued by Rear-Admiral Guevara. The Isabella was pursued all night by several English ships, and after a defence of four hours, surrendered the next day. The Surprise frigate fought three hours against three English ships, when most of her men being killed, her Captain wounded, and all her rigging spoiled, she was forced to surrender. The other light ships and frigates retired to Malta and Sardinia, as did also Admiral Guevara. The marines in every ship, who were composed of the nobility of Spain, signalized and distinguished themselves with great valour. The seven gallies having done all that was possible to join the Spanish ships, having a fresh gale of wind, retired to Palermo. Besides the above ships which the English took out of the main body of the Spanish squadron, they also took the Royal, the St Isidore and the Eagle, two frigates. This is the account of the sea-fight between the Spanish and English squadrons, the last of which by ill faith, and the superiority of their strength, had the advantage to beat the Spanish ships singly, one by one; and it is to be believed, by the defence the Spaniards made, that if they had acted jointly, the battle would have ended more happily for them. Immediately after the fight, a Captain of the English squadron came, in the name of Admiral Byng, to make a compliment of excuse to the Marquis de Lede, giving him to understand, that the Spaniards had been the aggressors, and that this action ought not to be looked upon as a rupture, because the English did not take it as such. To which it was answered, That Spain will reckon it as a formal rupture, and that they would do the English all the damages and hostilities imaginable.

There are many things in this relation more agreeable to Spanish humour than to truth; and there is no question to be made, but that both accounts retain some tincture of the passions and prejudices of those who drew them up; and it is no less certain, that what was commonly reported at that time, of the bad behaviour of the Spaniards, and of their making but a weak defence, was but indifferently founded: For the truth is, that their fleet, though strong in appearance, was every way inferior to ours; their ships being old, their artillery none of the best, and in number of guns, one hundred and sixteen short of ours, and their seamen most of them not to be depended upon (25). Yet it is agreed on all hands, that their Admirals defended themselves very gallantly; and, indeed, their defeat may, in a great measure, be charged upon their irresolution at the beginning, and their not taking good advice when it was given them, we mean that of Rear-Admiral Cammock, who was (to speak impartially) a much better seaman than any who bore command in the Spanish fleet (26). He knew perfectly well, the strength of both parties, and saw plainly that nothing could save the Spaniards, but a wise disposition; and therefore, in the last Council of War held before the battle, he proposed that they should remain at anchor in the road of Paradise, ranging their ships in a line of battle, with their broadsides to the sea; which measure would certainly have given the Admiral infinite trouble to attack them; for the coast there is so bold, that their biggest ships could ride with a cable a shore; and farther out, the currents are so various and rapid, that it would have been hardly practicable to get up to them, but impossible to anchor, or lye by them in order of battle. Besides, they lay so near the shore, and could have received such assistance of soldiers from the army, to man and defend them; and the annoyance the Spaniards might have given them from the several batteries they could have planted along the shore, would have been such, that the only way of attacking the ships, seemed to be by boarding and grappling with them at once, to prevent being cast off by the currents, which would have been a very hazardous undertaking, wherein the Spaniards would have had many advantages, and the English Admiral have run the chance of destroying his fleet, or buying a victory, if he succeeded, very dear (27). But the Spanish Admirals were too much persuaded of their own strength, and the courage of their seamen, or else they foolishly depended upon their not being attacked by our fleet. Whatever the motive was, they slighted this salutary counsel, and were thereby undone.

(25) Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 438.

(26) Page 439.

(27) Account of the Expedition to Sicily, p. 36, 37.

publick fame had before reported, and upon which, the King had already written a letter to the Admiral with his own hand, which the reader may see in note [L]. Mr Byng met with a most gracious reception from His Majesty, who made him an handsome present, and sent him back with plenipotentiary powers to his father, to negotiate with the several Princes and States of Italy, as there should be occasion; and with his royal grant to the officers and seamen, of all prizes taken by them from the Spaniards. The Admiral, in the mean time, prosecuted his affairs with great diligence, procured the Emperor's troops free access into the fortresses that were still held out in Sicily, failed afterwards to Malta, and brought out the Sicilian galleys, under the command of the Marquis de Rivaroles, and a ship belonging to the Turkey company, which had been blocked up there by Rear-Admiral Cammock, with a few ships which he had saved after the late engagement, and then sailed back again to Naples, where he arrived on the second of November; and soon after received a gracious letter from the Emperor, written with his own hand, accompanied with a picture of His Imperial Majesty, set round with very large diamonds, as a mark of the grateful sense he had of the services rendered by his Excellency to the House of Austria. See the letter in note [M]. As for the prizes that had been taken, they were sent to Portsmouth, where, by some unlucky accident, the Royal Philip took fire, and blew up, with most of the crew on board; but the Spanish Admiral had been before set on shore in Sicily, with some other prisoners of distinction, where he soon after died of his wounds. The Spanish Court, excessively provoked at this unexpected blow, which had, in a manner, totally destroyed the naval force they had been at so much pains to raise, were not slow in expressing their resentments. On the first of September, Rear-Admiral Guevara, with some ships, entered the Port of Cadiz, and made himself master of all the English ships that were there; and at the same time, all the effects of the English Merchants were seized in Malaga, and other parts of Spain, which, as soon as it was known here, produced reprisals on our part; and in December following, a declaration of war against Spain [N]. Sir George Byng staid

[L] Which the reader may see in the note.]

* Monsieur le Chevalier BYNG.

Q UOY que je n'ay pas encore reçu de vos nouvelles en droiture, j'ay appris la victoire que la flotte a remportee sous vos ordres, & je n'ay pas voulu vous differer le contentment que mon approbation de votre conduit vous pourroit donner. Je vous en remercie, & je fouhait que vous en temoigniez dans cette occasion. Le Secretaire d'Etat Craggs a ordre de vous informer plus au long de mes intentions; mais je voulu vous assurer moy même que je suis, Monsieur le Chevalier Byng,

* A Hampton-Court, Votre bon amy, ce 23 d'Aout, 1718.

* GEORGE R.

In English thus.

* Sir GEORGE BYNG.

A lthough I have received no news from you directly, I am informed of the victory obtained by the fleet under your command; and would not therefore defer giving you that satisfaction which must result from my approbation of your conduct. I give you my thanks, and desire you will testify my satisfaction to all the brave men who have distinguished themselves on this occasion. Mr Secretary Craggs has orders to inform you more fully of my intentions; but I was willing myself to assure you, that I am,

* Hampton-Court, Your very good friend,
August 23, 1718.

* GEORGE R.

[M] See the letter in the note.]

* Monsieur Amiral & Chevalier BYNG.

J'AY reçu avec beaucoup de satisfaction & de joye, par le porteur de celle cy la votre du 18me d'Aout. Quand je sceus que vous etiez nommé de sa Majeste le Roy votre maitre pour commandez la flotte dans la Mediterranéé je conceus d'abord toutes les bonnes esperances. Le glorieux succès pourtant les a en quelque maniere surpassé. Vous avez en cette occasion donne des preuves d'une valeur, conduit, & zele pour la commune cause très singulier; la gloire que vous en resulte est bien grande, mais aussi

VOL. II. No. XCIII.

* en rien moindre ma reconnoissance, comme vous l'expliquera plus le Comte de Hamilton. Comptez toujours sur la continuation de ma reconnoissance & de mon affection envers vous, priez Dieu qu'il vous ait en sa sainte garde.

* A Vienne, ce 22me
Octobre, 1718.

* CHARLES.

In English thus.

* Admiral Sir GEORGE BYNG,

I Have received with a great deal of joy and satisfaction by the bearer of this, yours, of the 18th of August. As soon as I knew you were named by the King your master, to command a fleet in the Mediterranean, I conceived the greatest hopes imaginable from that very circumstance. The glorious success you have had, surpasses however my expectations. You have given, upon this occasion, very singular proofs of your courage, conduct, and zeal for the common cause, the glory you obtain from thence, is indeed great, and yet my gratitude falls nothing short thereof, as Count Hamilton will fully inform you. You may always depend upon the continuance of my thankfulness and affection towards you; may God have you always in his holy keeping.

* Vienna, September 22,
O. S. 1718.

* CHARLES.

The Admiral was also honoured with a letter of congratulation upon his victory, from the Queen of Denmark, wrote by her Majesty's great Master of the household, September 26, 1718.

[N] And in December following, a declaration of war against Spain.] As to the expediency of this measure, as well as of the Sicilian expedition, there were very warm debates in Parliament; and this last engrossed all conversation, from the time of the stroke given to their fleet in the Mediterranean, some looking upon that as one of the noblest exploits since the Revolution, but the generality of people considered it in quite another light; and when an address was moved for, to justify that measure, it was warmly opposed in both Houses of Parliament, but without effect. Perhaps, there never was a measure more maliciously aspersed, and misrepresented, than this of the attacking the Spanish fleet; it was confidently, and generally reported, and for many years believed, that Sir George Byng attacked and destroyed that fleet, without any staid at Naples, advising and assisting the Viceroy, in concerting the necessary measures to be taken against the enemy, 'till the third of February following, and then sailed to Port-Mahon, to refit his ships and put them in a condition to go on early with the operations of the campaign, leaving his eldest son at Naples, to manage his correspondence with the Viceroy, and to inform the Court of England of all occurrences in those parts; and left Capt. Mathews with a squadron, at Pentemelia, to observe Rear-Admiral Cammock, and hinder his escaping out of Messina to the southward [O]. The Admiral having refitted most of his squadron at Port-Mahon, sailed early in the spring from thence to Naples [P], where orders or instructions for his so doing; and without giving the least intimation to the Court of Spain; and under this heavy imputation did the Admiral lie, for several years, 'till the affair was cleared up, by publishing an authentick account of the whole, and the Admiral's orders and instructions, and the steps he took for giving notice of them to the Court of Spain; from whence it appears, that he had express orders for what he did, and that all his measures were in pursuance of those orders: as to the action itself, off Passaro, the following letter may be alone sufficient to justify the Admiral. It was wrote by the Earl Stanhope, then Secretary, to Sir George Byng, and is as follows:

Bayonne, September 2, 1718.

BEING arrived here last night, in six days from Madrid, I do, in pursuance of the commands I have from His Majesty, take this first opportunity of acquainting you, that nothing has passed at Madrid, which should divert you from pursuing the instructions you have.

If the news which I learn at Bayonne, that the Citadel of Messina is taken, be not true, or if, notwithstanding the Spaniards have that port, their fleet, by contrary winds, or any other accident, should not have got into the harbour, and that you have an opportunity of attacking them, I am persuaded you will not let such an occasion slip; and I agree perfectly in opinion with what is recommended to you by Mr Secretary Craggs, that the first blow you give, should, if possible, be decisive.

[O] To observe Rear-Admiral Cammock, and hinder his escaping out of Messina to the southward.] Captain Mathews succeeded in this command, for he had the good fortune to run one of Cammock's ships a-shore, of sixty-four guns, called the St Roselia; and another called the St Pedre of sixty guns, was cast away in Tarento Bay. Admiral Cammock himself, endeavouring to get away to Spain in a small frigate of twenty-two guns, was chased the 6th of February by a ship of Captain Mathew's squadron; and escaped with much difficulty in his boat to Catalonia, but the frigate was taken, with all his effects and papers, amongst which was a commission from the Pretender, appointing him Admiral of the white squadron.

This unhappy man, was a native of Ireland, and being bred at sea, had raised himself to the post of a Captain, and served in our navy in Queen Anne's war, with a good character: but associating himself with those who were enemies to the House of Hanover, and becoming obnoxious to the government, on the accession of that family to the crown, he abandoned his country, and entered into the service of Spain, where he was promoted to the rank of a Rear-Admiral, and served in that post in the expedition against Sicily. He was a man of a bold, enterprising genius, of which he gave a remarkable instance or two, in the course of this expedition, which, as they are not at all foreign to our purpose, we shall relate, especially as they were the actions of a native of this kingdom, tho' a degenerate one. The Germans being besieged in Melazzo, a town in Sicily, and having no provisions but what came by sea from Calabria and other parts of Naples, Admiral Byng appointed Captain Walton to cruize with a squadron, upon that station, to hinder Rear-Admiral Cammock, from coming out of the Fare, and to secure the passage of the vessels with provisions for the German camp, to which none had then arrived in a month, and Captain Walton being blown off his station, Cammock took hold of this opportunity to get out of Messina, as the weather abated, and appearing before Tropea, with English colours, sent a letter on shore to the Governor, under a fictitious name of one of the English Captains, acquainting him, that he was come there by Admiral Byng's orders, to convoy the embarkations with provisions to Melazzo, and pressed him to dispatch them away, the place being in the utmost distress. Had this stratagem succeeded, it would have entirely ruined the Emperor's affairs in Sicily; but the Governor happening to be a wary man, and observing the letter to be written on Genoa paper, from that single circumstance conceived a suspicion, which made him refuse to send the embarkations out to him. In the mean time, Admiral Byng, then at Naples, being made sensible of the extremities the Germans were reduced to, had no other way left, than to fill four men of war with provisions, directing their Captains to attempt at all hazards to get to Melazzo, which three of them did, with much difficulty and danger (the fourth being disabled by bad weather) and came providentially to the relief of the garrison, at a time they must have otherwise surrendered to the enemy, or perished by famine. A few days after, Captain Walton recovered his station, upon the sight of whom, Admiral Cammock retired into Messina.

The other project of Admiral Cammock's seemed less likely to succeed than the other; for after the destruction of the Spanish fleet, he assured Don Joseph Patinho, who had the absolute direction and management of the Spanish expedition, except the military part, that he could put most of the English fleet into his hands, in lieu of that he had lost; in confidence of which, he wrote a letter to Sir George Byng, to let him know, that he had the Pretender's commands to assure him, if he would bring over the greatest part of his fleet to Messina, or to any port in Spai, he would create him Duke of Albemarle, with a royal bounty of one hundred thousand pounds to support the honour and dignity of that rank; and that every Captain should have ten thousand pounds, and the seamen a gratuity of two months wages; that Signor Patinho would satisfy him of the King of Spain's security for the performance of this agreement, and that no body else but the Dukes of Ormond and Mar were in the secret. — Whether he wrote by direction or not, does not appear, but the letter met with the contempt it deserved. — He likewise sent another letter to Captain Walton, with the promise of a reward of ten thousand pounds, a commission of Admiral of the Blue, and to be made an English Peer, if he would bring his ships into Messina, which the honest Captain brought to the Admiral, with vehement expressions of abhorrence and indignation.

[P] The Admiral sailed early in the spring to Naples.] During the Admiral's stay at Naples, an accident happened, singular enough to deserve notice. The Viceroy of Naples, who studied every way to make the place agreeable to the Admiral, on the festival of St Januarius, had appointed him a box near his own, to behold that famous ceremony. The blood continued a long time without liquifying, at the approach of the head of that saint. The vast concourse of people began to shew signs of concern: they fell first to praying, afterwards proceeded to groans and lamentations; and at length such a confused murmuring and uneasiness was perceived among them, that the Viceroy being apprehensive of some bad consequences, sent Count Hamilton to the Admiral, to beg he would not take it ill, if he desired him to retire, not knowing what effect it might have upon the populace, if they should take it into their heads to attribute the failing of the miracle to the saints's being displeased at his presence: the Admiral had no sooner quitted his box, and was stepping into the Viceroy's coach, but he heard a prodigious shout of é salto, é salto, it is done, it is done; and such joy and exultation appeared in every countenance, as if they had been delivered from some terrible calamity.

[Q] This

where he adjusted every thing with the Viceroy; and the German General, for the reduction of Sicily, in which, he acted with such zeal, and with such success, that the imperial army was transported into the island, and so well supplied with all things necessary, from our fleet, (which at the same time attended the motions of the enemy's army so closely) that it may be truly said, the success of that expedition, was as much owing to the English Admiral, as to the German General; and that the English fleet did no less service than the army. It was entirely owing to the Admiral's advice, and to his assistance, and supplies of cannon, powder, and ball, from his own ships, that the Germans re-took the city of Messina, in the summer of the year 1719; after which the Admiral landed a body of English grenadiers, who very quickly made themselves masters of the Tower of Faro, by which, having opened a free passage for their ships, he came to an anchor in Paradise-Road; this was a step of great consequence, for the officers of the Spanish men of war, which were in the Mole, perceiving this, began to despair of getting out to sea, and unbent their sails, unrigged their ships, and resolved to wait their fate with that of the citadel; which gave the Admiral great satisfaction, who now found himself at liberty to employ his ships in other services, which had been for a long time employed in blocking up that port. But while things were in this prosperous condition, a dispute arose among the Allies, about the disposition of the Spanish ships, when, after the citadel's being taken, they should of course fall into their hands. This dispute was happily ended [Q], by the Admiral's proposing to erect a battery, and destroy them as they lay in the basin, which was done accordingly, and thereby, the ruin of the naval power of Spain completed. The Imperial Court had formed a design of conquering Sardinia, out of which they had been driven by the Spaniards; but our Admiral judged it more for the service of the House of Austria, that the army should be immediately transported into Sicily, which might expedite the conquest of both islands; and according to his advice, the expedition against Sardinia was laid aside, and the reduction of Sicily first attempted. At Messina, the Admiral received another most gracious letter from the Emperor, wherein he signified to him, 'his approbation of a project, that was the effect of his zeal and activity; the satisfaction he had in his wise conduct, and for his love and attachment to his imperial person and august house; and on all occasions he should give him marks of his affection and esteem, and of his good remembrance of the services he had done him.' The Admiral, in order to succeed in his scheme, and at the same time to procure artillery for carrying on the siege of the citadel of Messina, went over to Naples in August, and finding that the government was absolutely unable to furnish the military stores that were wanting, he very generously granted the cannon out of the British prizes, and procured, upon his own credit, and at his own risk, powder and other ammunition from Genoa; and soon after went thither himself, in order to hasten the embarkation of the troops intended for Sicily, which was made sooner than could have been expected, merely by his incredible labour and diligence, and in spite of the delays affected by the Count, now Bashaw, Bonneval, who was appointed to command them. At Genoa also, the Admiral received great honours and respect. At his arrival, the town saluted his flag with twenty-one guns, and his person with ten guns and twenty chambers, and the Republick sent off six Deputies, three of the old, and three of the new nobility, to compliment him upon his arrival. After a stay of about three weeks, he sailed with all the transports for Sicily, and arrived before Messina October the eighth, which so elevated the spirits of the army then besieging the citadel, that upon the first sight of the fleet, they made a vigorous attack upon a half-moon, and carried it. The Admiral repairing a-shore to the General's quarters, was embraced by him and all the general officers, with the most tender

[Q] This dispute was happily ended, &c. Signor Scarampi began the dispute, and first started the question, claiming the two best, of sixty and sixty-four guns, new ships, which had belonged to his master, the King of Sardinia, and were seized by the Spaniards in the port of Palermo. He grounded his right on the Convention made at Vienna, 29th of December, 1718, in which it was said, 'That as to the ships belonging to the King of Sardinia, if they had been taken in port, they shall be restored him; but that this shall be referred to Admiral Byng to answer.' To this the Admiral replied, 'That this Convention having been only a ground-work for another to be made at Naples, he could be directed by none, but that which had been made, in consequence thereof, in April 1719, between the Viceroy of Naples, the Marquis de Breille, Minister of Sardinia, and himself, in which no mention is made of those ships; and as for the reference to his opinion, he did freely declare, he could not think the King of Sardinia had any shadow of title to them; that they had been taken by the enemy, were now fitted, and armed at their expence, and under their colours; that they would put out to sea, if he did not hinder them, and attack all the English ships they met with, and, if stronger, take them; so that they could not consider them in any light than that which they were, the ships of an enemy.' Count de Mercy, next put in his claim for the Emperor, alledging, 'That as those ships would be found within the port of a town taken by his master's arms, according to the right of nations, they belonged to him.' The Admiral replied, 'That it was owing to his keeping two squadrons on purpose, and at a great hazard, to watch and observe those ships; that they were now confined within the port, which, if he was to withdraw, they would still be able to get to sea, and he should have a chance of meeting with, and taking them.' But, reflecting afterwards with himself, that possibly the garrison might capitulate for the safe return of those ships into Spain, which he was determined never to suffer: that, on the other hand, the right of possession might breed an inconvenient dispute among the Princes concerned; and if it should prove, that they did not belong to England, it were better they belonged to no body; he proposed to Count Mercy, to erect a battery, and destroy them as they lay in the basin; who urged, that he had no orders concerning those ships, and must write to Vienna for instructions about it. The Admiral replied, with some warmth, that he could not want a power to destroy every thing that belonged to the enemy, and insisted on it with so much firmness, that the General being concerned in interest, not to carry matters to a disagreement, caused a battery to be erected, notwithstanding the protestation of Signor Scarampi, which in a little time sunk and destroyed them.

tender marks of affection and gratulation, the whole army being overjoyed to see a man who always brought them relief and success, and every good that attended them. In ten days after the Admiral's arrival at Messina, the citadel surrendered to the Germans; after which, Sir George Byng re-embarked a great part of the army, and landed them upon another part of the island [R], by which means they distressed the enemy to such a degree, that the Marquis de Lede, commander of the Spanish forces, proposed to evacuate the island; to which, the Germans were very well inclined, and sent to Vienna for instructions; but the Admiral protested against it, and declared, that the Spanish troops should never be permitted to quit Sicily and return home, 'till a general peace was concluded; and sent his eldest son to Vienna, with instructions, that if the Imperial Court listened to the proposals of the Spanish General, to declare, that his father could never suffer any part of the Spanish army to depart out of the island, 'till the King of Spain had acceded to the Quadruple Alliance, or 'till he received positive instructions from England for doing so. In this Sir George Byng certainly acted as became a British Admiral; who, after having done so many services for the Imperialists, might surely insist on their doing what was just with respect to us, and holding the Spanish troops in the uneasy situation they now were, 'till they gave ample satisfaction to the Court of London, as well as to that of Vienna. The Admiral had the detention of the Spaniards in his own hands, since the Germans could do nothing in that matter without him; and our demands on the Court of Spain, were as much for the interest of the common cause as for our own, so that tho' the steadiness of Admiral Byng deserves commendation, yet there seemed to be no great praises due to the German complaisance. After this, the Spanish General laid a snare to separate the Admiral from the Germans, by proposing an agreement with him, for a separate cessation of hostilities, but without effect [S]. But soon afterwards, when the Germans, with the Assistance of the Admiral, had begun the siege of Palermo, before which the Spaniards lay encamped, and just as the two armies were upon the point of engaging, a courier arrived in that lucky instant from Spain, with full powers for the Spanish General, to treat and agree about the evacuation of Sicily and Sardinia, in consequence of the King of Spain's accession to the Quadruple Alliance; upon which the two armies were drawn off, a suspension of arms agreed on, the Germans put into the possession of Palermo, and the Spaniards embarked for Barcelona; and the Admiral, after he had settled all affairs in Sicily, sailed in August 1720, to Cagliari in Sardinia, where he assisted at the conferences, with the Ministers and Generals of the several powers concerned, wherein was regulated the manner of surrendering the island by the Spanish Viceroy to the Emperor, and the cession of the same from the Emperor

to

[R] And landed them upon another part of the island. Here the Admiral once more saved the Imperial army, by his admirable foresight, judgment, and thought, in which he shewed a great superiority over the Generals of the Allies, who, even after the reduction of Messina, finding they could not subsist their army, nor undertake any action where they were, went to the Admiral, their old deliverer, and told him in a very desponding manner, that they had resolved to transport the army to Calabria and Syracuse, for subsistence during the winter, and prayed his assistance. The Admiral replied, 'He hoped their affairs were not so desperate as they apprehended, that he had been employing his thoughts for their service, and believed he should be able to extricate them out of their present circumstances; that he was for transporting their army to Trapani, which would be turning the difficulty upon the Spaniards, by obliging the Spaniards to make uneasy marches, and to keep the field in the winter; that they should thereby be able to enlarge their quarters, the granaries of corn would fall into their hands, and they would keep the city of Palermo in awe, 'till the season would permit the attempting to reduce it, which would bring the war to a speedy issue. That as the whole army could not be transported at once, he would send his secretary to Tunis, the nearest African port to Trapani, and employ him and the English Consul there, to buy up whatever corn was necessary for subsisting one part of the army at Trapani, 'till the rest was arrived; for which service, as he knew they had no money, he would employ his own cash and credit, depending upon their honour for repayment.' Count de Mercy penetrating immediately into the facility and advantageous consequences of this scheme, rose up, and embracing the Admiral, in a kind of transport acknowledged, 'That he had hit upon the only method practicable, not only for the preservation of the army, but even for pushing on the war with success.' And the scheme was accordingly executed successfully.

[S] Proposing an agreement for a separate cessation of hostilities, but without effect. The affair was this.

The Marquis de Lede sent to the Admiral, a Spanish Gazette, wherein was published a treaty of suspension of arms at sea, concluded at the Hague, between the Ministers of Great Britain, France, and Spain; and therefore he proposed a separate cessation of arms, and protested against any violence the Admiral should commit, contrary to the plain instructions of their sovereign; but the Admiral replied, that he could pay no regard to a pretended Convention published in a foreign news-paper, and even in which there was a clause, that nothing in it should derogate from what should be agreed between him and the Marquis, for what concerns the Mediterranean sea. That as the Spanish Minister had signed the Quadruple Alliance ever since the 17th of February last, it was strange the Marquis had received no orders for treating about the evacuation of the island, which was the necessary consequence of it; and that as the time for doing this was elapsed, 'till he had security that the Marquis really intended it, he could not agree to a suspension of arms. This was an adventurous proceeding in the Admiral; for his instructions from England directed him to come to a suspension of arms with Spain, without staying for settling the terms of evacuation, which might take up time. But his penetration shewed him, that if a suspension took place at sea, the Spaniards might introduce what succours and troops they pleased into the island, which would unravel all they had been doing, and if any interruption happened in the negotiations on foot, put the Spaniards in a better state of prosecuting the war, and perhaps protracting it another year. He was jealous of their artifices, and found they took every advantage to evade the evacuation of the island; and therefore, as the convention for a cessation of arms at sea, signed at the Hague, February 29th, left him at liberty of treating as he thought proper, he determined to remain united with the Germans, which he prudently saw was the quickest way to bring the Spaniards to a compliance, and to come into real measures for evacuating the island. The event justified his precaution, and his conduct received at home the approbation it deserved.

[T] By

to the Duke of Savoy; and at the instance of this Prince, the Admiral did not depart, 'till he had seen the whole fully executed, the Spanish troops returned into Spain, and the Duke of Savoy put into quiet possession of his new kingdom of Sardinia, in exchange for Sicily, according to the Quadruple Alliance; in all which affairs the Admiral arbitrated so equally between them, that even the King of Spain expressed his great satisfaction in his conduct, to the British Court; and his behaviour was so acceptable to the Duke of Savoy, that his acknowledgments to him, were accompanied with his picture set in diamonds. Thus ended the war of Sicily, wherein the fleet of Great Britain bore so illustrious a part, that the fate of the island was wholly governed by it's operations, both competitors agreeing, that the one could not have conquered, nor the other have been subdued, without it. Never was any service conducted in all it's parts with greater zeal, activity, and judgment, nor was ever the British Flag in so high reputation and respect in those distant parts of Europe. The late King, who had named the Admiral for that expedition, and knew his abilities, used to say to his Ministers, when they applied for instructions to be sent to him for his guidance on certain important occasions, That he would send him none, for he knew how to act without any; and indeed all the measures which he took abroad, were so exact and just, as to square with the councils and plan of policy at home. In our relation of this expedition, we have entirely followed the account of it published in 1739, and have, by a bare recital of facts, without further enquiries, shewn how well Sir George Byng executed his instructions; for in this consists the merit of an Admiral, and for which alone he is answerable, and not at all for the rectitude of those instructions. If this be not granted, we must never expect to be well served at sea; since the Admiral who takes upon him to interpret his instructions, will never want excuses for his conduct be it what it will; and if this be once granted, Sir George Byng must be allowed to have done his duty as well as any Admiral ever did; for to his conduct it was entirely owing that Sicily was subdued, and his Catholick Majesty forced to accept the terms prescribed him by the Quadruple Alliance. He it was who first enabled the Germans to set foot in that island; by him they were supported in all they did; and by his counsels they were directed, or otherwise had been expelled the island, even after the taking of Messina, as we have shewn above (m). The cause of the Emperor being become the cause of his Master, he served the interest of that Prince, with a zeal and fidelity that stood a pattern to his own subjects. He lived in such harmony with the Imperial Viceroy and Generals, as has been seldom seen among fellow-subjects united in command, the want of which has proved the ruin of many important expeditions. He was incapable of performing his duty in a cold or negligent manner, and when any service was committed to his management, he devoted his whole time and application to it; nor could any fatigue or indisposition of body, ever divert or interrupt his attention from any point that required present dispatch. To this it might be in a great measure owing, that he was never unfortunate in any undertaking, nor miscarried in any service that was entrusted to his direction. For whoever will trace upwards to the springs and causes of publick or private events, shall find (except where the immediate finger of Providence is visible) that what is usually called ill-luck, is generally the effect of negligence or imprudence. He always proceeded upon solid principles, and left nothing to Fortune that could be accomplished by foresight and application. His firmness and plain-dealing were so apparent to the foreigners who treated with him upon business, that it contributed much to the dispatch and success of his transactions with them; for they could depend upon what he said, and as they saw he used no arts or chicanes himself, and had too discerning a spirit to suffer them to pass unobserved in others, they often found it their best policy to leave their interests in his hands and management, being very sure of a most impartial and punctual performance of whatever he engaged in. His reputation was so thoroughly established in this particular, that in the frequent disputes and altercations which arose between the Savoyards and Germans in the course of the war, and between the latter and the Spaniards at the conclusion of it, wherein little faith or confidence was given to the promises or asseverations of each other, he was the common umpire between them, always shunning and opposing any extravagant or unjust demands (which the over-bearing temper of the German General was very apt to suggest, where he had the superior hand) and reconciling, as much as possible, the violences of war with the rules of honour and justice (n). After the performing so many signal services, when the Admiral departed from Italy to attend his late Majesty, by his own command, at Hanover, the King, among many most gracious expressions of favour and satisfaction, told him, That he had found out the secret of obliging his enemies as well as friends, and that the Court of Spain had mentioned, with great acknowledgment, his fair and friendly behaviour, in the provision of transports and other necessaries for the embarkation of their troops, and in protecting them from many vexations and oppressions that had been attempted. No wonder that a man endowed with such talents, and such a disposition, left behind him in Italy and other foreign parts, the character of a great Soldier, an able Statesman, and an honest man. During his Majesty's stay at Hanover, he began to reward the eminent services of Sir George Byng, by making him Treasurer of the Navy, and Rear-Admiral of Great Britain; and, on his return to England, one of his Most Honourable Privy-Council (o); and soon after, in 1721, he was created a Peer of Great Britain, by the title of Viscount Torrington, and Baron

(m) See note [S]; Lives of the Admirals, Vol. IV. p. 462.

(n) Account of the Expedition to Sicily, p. 195, 196.

(o) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. IV. p. 100.

(f) Peerage of England, ut supra.

Byng of Southill in Bedfordshire (p) [T]; and, in 1725, he was made one of the Knights of the Bath, upon the revival of that Most Antient and Honourable Order. When his present Majesty came to the Crown, he was pleased to place him at the head of his naval affairs, as First Lord Commissioner of the Admiralty, in which high station he died at his house in the Admiralty, of an asthma, in January 1733, in the seventieth year of his age, and lies buried at Southill in Bedfordshire. His Lordship was but of a tender constitution, though well supplied with spirits, which did not display themselves so much in gaiety of conversation (for he was modest in his nature) as in activity in all the duties and functions of life or business, in which he was indefatigable, and by a continued habit of industry, had hardened and inured a body, not naturally strong, to patience under any fatigue. He had made no great proficiency in school learning (which the early age of going to sea seldom admits of) but his great diligence, joined with excellent natural parts, and a just sense of honour, made him capable of conducting difficult negotiations and commissions, with proper dignity and address. During the time he presided in the Admiralty, he laboured in improving the naval force of this kingdom, in procuring encouragement for sailors, who, in him, lost a true friend; and in promoting the scheme, for establishing a corporation for relief of widows and children of commission and warrant officers in the Royal Navy; and in every other service to his country that he was capable of. His Lordship married, in 1691, Margaret, daughter of James Maffer, of East Langden in the county of Kent, Esq; by whom he had eleven sons and four daughters, of which there survived him, Pattee, George, Robert, John (now an Admiral), Edward, and Sarah, married to the eldest son of Sir John Osborn of Chicksand in Bedfordshire, Bart. and mother of the present Sir Danvers Osborne. The Lord Torrington was succeeded by his eldest Son Pattee, who was abroad with his father in the expedition to Sicily, and after his death was continued Treasurer of the Navy, and one of his Majesty's Most Honourable Privy-Council; was afterwards made Vice-Treasurer of Ireland, and Captain of the Yeomen of the Guards: and dying in 1746 without issue, was succeeded by his brother the Honourable Brigadier George Byng, the present Lord Viscount Torrington.

[T] By the title of Viscount Torrington, &c. The preamble to his Lordship's patent, is as follows, greatly to the honour of his memory. 'As the grandeur and stability of the British empire depend chiefly upon knowledge and experience in maritime affairs, we esteem those worthy of the highest honours, who, acting under our influence, exert themselves in maintaining our dominion over the sea. It is for this reason that we have determined to advance to the dignity of Peerage, our trusty and well-beloved Counsellor, Sir George Byng, Knight and Baronet, who being descended from an ancient family in Kent, and educated from his youth in the sea-service, hath through several posts arrived at the highest station and command in our navy, by the strength of his own abilities, and a merit distinguished by our predecessors and ourselves in the many important services, which he has performed with remarkable fidelity, courage, and success. In the late vigorous wars, which raged so many years in Europe. Wars fruitful of naval combats and expeditions, there was scarce an action of any consequence wherein he did not bear a principal part, nor were any dangers or difficulties so great, but he surmounted them by his exquisite conduct, and a good fortune that never failed him. Particularly, when a storm was gathering in France, and it was uncertain upon what part of the coast it should fall, with the greatest sagacity and diligence, he flew to the very place of danger, rescuing our capital city of Scotland, from the threatened attack of a French Squadron, which had many rebels and numerous forces on board; and by his very appearance, defeated the vain hopes of the enemy, compelling them to relinquish their enterprise, and to seek their safety by a flight towards their own ports, not without loss. With no less vigilance he repressed not long since the like machinations of the same traitors in the ports of France, who were so disconcerted at his presence, as to abandon the schemes they had projected, for which service we conferred on him the dignity of a Baronet, the first mark of our royal favour. Moreover, lately, when new contentions were springing up in Italy, and the discord of Princes was on the point of embroiling Europe again in a war, he did, with singular facility and conduct, interpose with our Squadron, crushing at one blow the laboured efforts of Spain, to set up a power at sea, and advanced the reputation of our arms in the Mediterranean to such a pitch, that our flag gave law to the contending parties, and enabled us to settle the tranquillity that had been disturbed. It is just therefore we should distinguish with higher titles, a subject who has so eminently served us and his country, both as monuments of his own merit, and to influence others to a love and pursuit of virtue. Know ye therefore, &c. H

C.

CÆSAR (JULIUS), a learned Civilian in the end of the XVIth, and beginning of the XVIIth century, was born near Tottenham in Middlesex (a), in the year 1557 [A]. His father was Cæsar Adelmars (b), Physician to Queen Mary and Queen Elizabeth; lineally descended from Adelmars, Count of Genoa, and Admiral of France, in the year of Christ, 806, in the reign of Charles the Great. This Cæsar Adelmars's mother was daughter to the Duke de Cesarini, from whom he had the name of Cæsar (c), which name, Mary I, Queen of England, ordered to be continued to his posterity [B]: and his father was Peter Maria Dalmarius, of the city of Trevigio in Italy, Doctor of Laws, sprung from those of his name living at Cividat del Friuli (d). Julius, who is the subject of this article, had his education in the University of Oxford, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, May 17, 1575, as a Member of Magdalen-Hall (e). Afterwards he went and studied in the University of Paris; where, in the beginning of 1581, he was created Doctor of the Civil Law, and had letters testimonial for it, under the seal of that University (f), dated the 22d of April, 1581 [C]. He was admitted to the same degree at Oxford, March the fifth, 1583; and also became Doctor of the Canon-Law (g). In the reign of Queen Elizabeth, he was Master of Requests, Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, and Master of St Catharine's Hospital near the Tower (h). On the 22d of January 1595, he was present at the confirmation of Richard Vaughan Bishop of Bangor, in the church of St Mary le Bow, London (i). Upon King James's accession to the throne, having before distinguished himself by his merit and abilities, he was knighted by that Prince, at Greenwich, May 20, 1603 (k). He was also constituted Chancellor and Under-Treasurer of the Exchequer (l); and on the 5th of July, 1607, sworn of His Majesty's Privy-Council (m). January 16th, in the eighth of King James I, he obtained a reversionary grant of the office of Master of the Rolls, after Sir Edward Phillips, Knight (n); who departing this life, September 11, 1614 (o), was succeeded accordingly by Sir Julius, on the first of October following (p). And he thereupon resigning his place of Chancellor of the Exchequer, had for successor in it, Sir Fulk Greville, Knight (q). In 1613, he was one of the Commissioners, or Delegates, employed in the business of the divorce, between the Earl of Essex and his Countess (r); and gave sentence for that divorce. About the same time, he built a chapel at his house, on the north side of the Strand in London, which was consecrated, May 8, 1614 (s). As he had been Privy-Counsellor to King James I, so was he also to his son, King Charles I (t); and appears, moreover, to have been Custos Rotulorum of the county of Hertford (u). We are likewise informed by one author (w), that he was Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. After having thus passed through many honourable employments; and continued, in particular, Master of the Rolls for above twenty years; he departed this life, April 28, 1639, in the seventy-ninth year of his age (x). He lies buried in the church of Great St Helen's within Bishopsgate, London (y), under

(l) See the inscription under his picture, as above.

Chauncy calls him only Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster.

(m) Stow, ubi supra, p. 390.

(n) See Mr Newcourt's Repertorium Ecclesiasticum, &c. Vol. I. p. 341.

(o) Camden's Annals of King James I.

(p) Pat. 12 Jac. p. 5.

(q) Camden, ibid.

(r) Truth brought to light by Time, &c. Lond. 1651, 4to, p. 79, 107. and Aulicus Coquinarius, &c. Lond. 1650, 8vo, p. 115, &c.

(s) Stow's Annals, as above, p. 999.

(t) Wood, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 125.

(u) From the inscription under his picture, as above.

(w) Fuller, in his History of the Worthies of England, in Middlesex, p. 179: it should be 185, for it is wrong paged.

(x) Ibid. p. 186. and Lloyd's State Worthies, edit. 1679, p. 935. Wood says in one place, that it was April 12 (Athen. Vol. I. col. 619), and in another that it was the 16th (Fasti, as above). (y) Ibid. and Stow's Survey of London, with Strype's Addit. edit. 1720. B. ii. p. 104. In pag. 102, he says he died April 18, aged 75.

[A] Was born———in the year 1557.] As is evident from his age, at the time of his death. For we are informed (1), that he was in the seventy-ninth year of his age, in 1636, when he died.—His father died in 1569, and was buried in the Church of Great St Helen's, in Bishopsgate-street, of which Queen Elizabeth had granted him a lease, on the 27th of May, 1564, together with the Rectory, tithes, &c. for twenty one years (2).

[B] Which name, Mary I, Queen of England, ordered to be continued to his posterity.] This is attested by a memorandum, in the last page of one of Sir Julius Cæsar's manuscripts at Benington, written with his own hand; and containing the same in substance as is related above. Julius Adelmarius, filius Cæsaris Adelmarii, qui semper durante vita cognitus publice & appellatus Cæsar, per illustrissimas Reginas Mariam &

Elizabetham, transmisit eandem Appellationem, idemque nomen ad Posteritatem suam, quæ tamen Posteritas Adelmarii nomen non dereliquit; cum illud ab illustri Comite Genæ in Italia, D^{no} Admirallio Galliarum tempore Caroli M. Imperatoris Germaniarum in continua stirpe masculina ad illam descenderit; idque jure hæreditario. Jul. Adelmarius, alias Cæsar, ætatis suæ an. 77, 1634 (3).

[C] And had letters testimonial for it, under the Seal of that University.] Wherein he was styled, Julius Cæsar, alias Dalmarius, Dioc. London, in Anglia, filius excellentissimi in Art. & Med. Doctoris Cæsaris Dalmarii, in Universitate Paris, &c. i. e. ' Julius Cæsar, &c. ' of the diocese of London, in England, son of the most ' excellent Doctor Cæsar Dalmarius, &c. of the University of Paris, &c.

(3) History of Hertfordshire, by N. Salmon, &c.

(a) J. Norden, in Descript. of Middlesex: and T. Fuller's Worthies of England, in Middlesex, p. 179. edit. 1662. His father had a house near Tottenham.

(b) Or Dalmarius, Dalmare, or Athelmer.

(c) From the inscription under his picture at Benington in Hertfordshire.

History of Hertfordshire, by N. Salmon, edit. 1723, fol. p. 367.

(d) Wood, Fasti, Vol. I. edit. 1721, col. 111.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Idem, ibid. col. 125.

(g) Ibid.

(h) From an inscription under his picture at Benington. See Salmon, as above, p. 367. See also his epitaph below.

(i) Strype's Life of Archbishop Whitgift, Lond. 1718, fol. p. 487.

(k) Stow's Annals, edit. 1631, fol. p. 824. Sir Hen. Chauncy says, it was the 11th. Hist. of Hertfordshire, p. 309.

(1) Fuller's Worthies, ubi supra, p. 186.

(2) See Stow's Survey of London, with Strype's Addit. Lond. 1722, Vol. I. Book iii. p. 100, 104. and Wood, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 125.

under a fair but uncommon monument, designed by himself; being in form of a Deed, and made to resemble ruffled parchment (z), in allusion to his office, as Master of the Rolls [D]. With regard to his character; he was a man of great gravity and integrity, and remarkable for his extensive bounty and charity to all persons of worth, or that were in want (a): so that he might seem to be Almoner-General of the nation [E]. He entertained for some time in his house the most illustrious Francis, Lord Bacon, Viscount St Albans [F]. He made his grants to all persons double kindnesses by expedition, and clothed (as one expresses it) (b), his very denials in such robes of courtship, that it was not obviously discernable, whether the request or denial were most decent. He had also this peculiar to himself, That he was very cautious of promises, lest falling to an incapacity of performance, he might forfeit his reputation, and multiply his certain enemies, by his design of creating uncertain friends. Besides, he observed a sure principle of rising, namely, That great persons esteem better of such they have done great courtesies to, than those they have received great civilities from; looking upon this as their disparagement, the other as their glory. Sir Julius Cæsar's manuscripts, bound up in several volumes, are preserved at Benington in Hertfordshire, the seat of his posterity (c). The Lord Clarendon mentions a story that has a relation to him (d); which the reader may not perhaps be displeas'd to see in the note [G]. Besides Sir Julius; Cæsar Adelmare had

(z) Fuller, ubi supra.

(a) Fuller, ibid.

(b) Lloyd in State-Worthies, ubi supra, p. 937.

(c) Hist. of Hertfordshire, by N. Salmon, p. 367. He printed 'A Catalogue of the Books, Parchments, and Papers, belonging to the Court of Requests,' 4to, now very scarce.

(d) Hist. of the Rebellion, in six Volumes, 8vo, Oxford, 1732, Vol. I. p. 52, 53.

[D] He lies buried ——— under a fair but uncommon monument ——— in form of a deed, &c.] The contents of which deed, or epitaph, are as follows:

To all Christian people to whom this present writing shall come; Know ye, that I Julius Dalmare, alias Cæsar, Knight, Doctor of Laws; Judge of the High Court of Admiralty, and one of the Masters of Requests to Queen Elizabeth; Privy-Counsellor to King James, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Master of the Rolls, have confirmed or granted by this my present writing, That I will, with the Divine Assistance, willingly pay my debt to nature, whenever it shall please God. In witness whereof, I have set my hand and seal. Dated the 27th of February, 1635.

Omnibus Christi fidelibus ad quos hoc præsens scriptum pervenerit; Sciatis, me Julium Dalmare, alias Cæsarem, Militem, utriusque Legis Doctorem; Elizabethæ Reginae Supremæ Curiaë Admiralitatis Judicem, & unum è Magistris Libellorum; Jacobo Regi à Privatis Conciliis, Cancellarium Scaccarii, Scriinarum Magistrum, hac præsentis Charta mea confirmasse, Me annuente Divino Numine, naturæ debitum libenter solviturum, quam primum Deo placuerit. In cujus rei memoriam, Manum meam, & Sigillum apposui. Datum 27 Februarii, 1635.

Here his Seal, or Coat of Arms, is affixed, and beneath is written

It is enrolled in Heaven.

Irrotatur Coelo (4).

(4) Fuller's Worthies, p. 185, 186. and Lloyd's State-Worthies, p. 936.

[E] So that he might seem to be Almoner-General of the nation.] Dr Fuller gives the following instance of his uncommon charity. 'A gentleman once borrowing his coach (which was as well known to poor people as any hospital in England) was so rendezvouzed about with beggars in London, that it cost him all the money in his purse to satisfy their importunity, so that he might have hired twenty coaches on the same terms (5).'

[F] He entertained for some time in his house the Lord Francis Bacon, &c.] We are told by an ill-natured writer (6), That the Lord Bacon, 'after he was out of his place, pinned himself for very scraps on that noble gentleman, Sir Julius Cæsar's hospitality, so that at last he was forced to get the King's warrant to remove him out of his house; yet in his prosperity, the one being Chancellor, and the other Master of the Rolls, did so scorn and abuse him, as he would alter any thing the other did.' But Mr Stephens assures us (7), That the Lord Bacon was not reduced to such low circumstances, as is commonly imagined, but had something considerable even at the time of his death.

[G] The Lord Clarendon mentions a story that has a relation to him, &c.] It is as follows; 'Sir Julius Cæsar was then Master of the Rolls (in the reign of 'King Charles I.) and had inherent in his office the "indubitable right and disposition of the Six Clerks places, all which he had for many years, upon any vacancy, bestowed to such persons as he thought fit. "One of those places was become void, and designed by the old man to his son Robert Cæsar, a Lawyer of a good name, and exceedingly beloved. The Lord Treasurer * (as he was vigilant in such cases) had notice of the Clerk's expiration so soon, that he procured the King to send a message to the Master of the Rolls, expressly forbidding him to dispose of that Six Clerk's place, till his Majesty's pleasure should be further made known to him. It was the first command of that kind that had been heard of, and was felt by the old man very sensibly. He was indeed very old, and had out-lived most of his friends; so that his age was an objection against him; many persons of quality being dead, who had, for recompence of services, procured the reversion of his office. The Treasurer found it no hard matter so far to terrify him, that (for the King's service, as was pretended) he admitted for a Six Clerk a person recommended by him (Mr Fern, a dependant upon him) who paid six thousand pounds ready money; which poor man! he lived to repent in a jail. This work being done at the charge of the poor old man, who (*) Weston, Earl of Portland.

" had

(5) Worthies of England, ubi supra.

(6) Sir Anthony Weldon, Court and Character of King James, Lond. 1650. 8vo, p. 133, 134.

(7) Account of the Life of the Lord Bacon, in his Letters and Remains, Lond. 1734, 4to, p. 25, 26, 29, and Introd. p. 58.

had two sons, that were eminent in their way. His second son, Sir THOMAS CÆSAR, was one of the Barons of the Exchequer (e). And his third son, HENRY CÆSAR, educated in Baliol College, and St Edmund Hall, Oxon, became Prebendary of Westminster in the second stall, in September 1609, [which he resigned the latter end of the year 1625] (f); and Dean of Ely, in 1614. He died at Ely the 27th of June 1636, aged seventy-two, and was buried on the north side of the Presbytery of the Cathedral there. He gave to Jesus College in Cambridge two Fellowships of twelve pounds a year a-piece, and five Scholarships of five pounds a year each; upon condition, that the Fellows and Scholars should be elected from the King's Free-School at Ely (g).

(e) Wood, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 155.

(f) Newcourt, Repertor. Eccles. &c. Vol. I. p. 924.

(g) Wood, as above.

had been a Privy Counsellor from the entrance of King James, had been Chancellor of the Exchequer, and served in other offices; the depriving him of his right made a great noise: and the condition of his son (his father being not likely to live to have the disposal of another office in his power) who, as was said before, was generally beloved, and esteemed. Was argument of great compassion; and was lively, and successfully represented to the King himself; who was graciously pleased to promise, that, "If the old man chanced to die before any other of the six Clerks, that office, when it should fall, should be conferred on his son, whosoever should succeed him as Master of the Rolls; which might well be provided for." And the Lord Treasurer obliged himself (to expiate the injury) to procure some declaration to that purpose, under his Majesty's sign manual; which, however easy to be done, he long forgot, or neglected. One day, the Earl of Tullibardine, who was nearly allied to Mr Cæsar, and much his friend, being with the Treasurer, passionately asked him, Whether he had done that business? To whom he answered with a seeming trouble, "I hat he had forgotten it, for which he was heartily sorry; and if he would give him a little note in writing, for a memorial, he would put it amongst those which he would dispatch with the King that afternoon." The Earl presently writ in a little paper, Remember Cæsar; and gave it to him; and he put it into that little pocket, where, he said, he kept all his memorials which were first to be transacted. Many days passed, and Cæsar never thought of. At length; when he changed his cloaths, and he who waited on him in his chamber, according to custom, brought him all the notes and papers found in those he had left off, which he then commonly perused; when he found this little billet, in which was only written, Remember Cæsar, and which he had never read before, he was exceedingly confounded, and knew not what to make, or think of it. He sent for his bosom-friends, — and after a serious and melancholick deliberation, it was agreed, that it was the advertisement of some friend, who durst not own the discovery; that it could not signify nothing, but that there was a conspiracy against his life, by his many and mighty enemies: and they all knew Cæsar's fate, by contemning or neglecting such animadversions. Therefore they advised him to pretend to be indisposed, that he might not stir abroad all that day, and that none might be admitted to him, but persons of undoubted affection: and that at night some servants should watch with the Porter. — "Shortly after, the Earl of Tullibardine asking him, Whether he had remembered Cæsar? The Treasurer quickly recollected the ground of his perturbation, and could not forbear imparting it to his friends, and so the whole jest came to be discovered." C

CALAMY (EDMUND) an eminent Nonconformist Divine, in the XVII Century. He was the son of a Citizen of London, and born there in February 1600 July 4, 1616, he was admitted of Pembroke Hall, in the University of Cambridge (a). In 1619, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts; and in 1632, that of Bachelor of Divinity (b). He shewed himself pretty early no friend to the Arminian party, which was the reason, that he could not obtain a fellowship in that society, even when he seemed to be entitled to it from his standing, as well as from his learning and unblemished character. At last however, he so far conquered all prejudices, that he was elected Tanquam Socius of that Hall (c) [A]. Dr Felton, the pious and learned Bishop of Ely, had to great a regard to his diligence in study, and unaffected zeal for religion, that he made him his Chaplain (d), and paid him, during his residence in his family, uncommon marks of respect [B]. His Lordship gave him likewise, as a mark of his favour, the Vicarage of St Mary's in Swaffham-Prior in Cambridgeshire, in which capacity of Vicar he did much good, tho' he did not reside on his cure by reason of it's small distance from the Episcopal palace (e). But after the death of the Bishop, in 1626, Mr Calamy being

(a) Calamy's Abridgment of Baxter's Life, Vol. II. p. 47.

(b) From the University Register.

(c) Calamy's Abridgment of Baxter's Life, ubi supra.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Continuation of the Account of silenced and ejected Ministers, Vol. I. p. 8.

[A] Elected Tanquam Socius of that Hall.] This was peculiar to Pembroke Hall. The reader may see the occasion of erecting it in another place (1). Besides the Society of the Fellows, the Tanquam Socius had Pomæ, i. e. his dividend in the garden; Pupilli, i. e. Leave to take Pupils; and Pileus, i. e. the honour of the cap; together with a certain stipend, but no share in the government of the house. Yet take it altogether, tho' there was less profit, there was at least as much honour in being Tanquam Socius, as in being Fellow; for it was an evident sign, that, tho' the college conferred only this, they thought him on whom they conferred it worthy of the other, since they might otherwise have saved themselves this expence. The Tanquam Socius held his office but for three years, unless he was rechosen (2). As for our author, he was within that space better provided for.

[B] Uncommon marks of respect.] The Bishop gave directions, that Mr Calamy should not be called down to family prayers, or upon any other occasion, without half an hour's notice, that his studies might not be abruptly interrupted. That there was good reason for this, the reader must admit, when he is told, that during the whole time Mr Calamy lived with this Prelate, he studied at the rate of sixteen hours a day. He read over the controversies of Bellarmine entirely, and all the answers written by Chamier, Whitaker, Reynolds, and others, who, by parts, undertook the refuting his voluminous work. Mr Calamy likewise perused many of the School-men, particularly Thomas Aquinas, whose sums he had read with diligence and thoroughly mastered; he went through the works of St Augustine five times, besides perusing many other eminent writers, ancient and modern, and exclusive of the daily study of the Holy Scriptures and the commentators upon them. This laborious course acquired him a large fund of solid and useful learning, and enabled him to discharge with great ability, the several offices to which he was afterwards called, and yet he never affected quotations, but contented himself with a plain and familiar manner of speaking, which favoured not at all of the schools. He was always extremely grateful towards his patron while living, and spoke with the utmost reverence of his memory after his decease (3).

[C] And

(3) Calamy's Abridgment of Baxter's Life, Vol. II. p. 4.

1) See the article ANDREWS LANCELOT etc [B].

2) Extract from ampson's Hist. of the Nonconformists, MS.

being chosen one of the Lecturers of St Edmund's-Bury in Suffolk, he resigned his Vicarage and applied himself wholly to the discharge of his function at Bury (f). He continued there ten years, and, as some writers say, was during the greatest part of that time a strict Conformist (g). Others, and indeed himself, say the contrary [C]. The truth seems to be, that he was unwilling to oppose ceremonies, or to create a disturbance in the Church about them, so long as this might be avoided with a safe conscience (b); but when Bishop Wren's articles, and the reading of the book of Sports, came to be insisted on, he thought himself obliged to alter his conduct, and not only avoid conforming for the future, but also to apologize publicly for his former behaviour, which he did with equal modesty and freedom (i) [D]. He came now to be considered as an active Nonconformist, and being in great favour with the Earl of Essex, he presented him to the living of Rochford in Essex, a Rectory of considerable value, and yet it proved a fatal present to Mr Calamy, for removing from one of the best and wholesomest airs in England, that of St Edmund's-Bury, into the hundreds of Essex, he contracted such an illness as broke his constitution, and left behind it a dizziness in his head, which he complained of as long as he lived (k). Upon the death of Dr Stoughton, he was chosen minister of St Mary Aldermanbury, which brought him up to London, in 1639 (l). The controversy concerning Church-Government was then at it's greatest height, in which Mr Calamy had a very large share. In the month of July 1639, he was incorporated of the University of Oxford, which, however, did not take him off from the party in which he was engaged (m). In 1640, he was concerned in writing that famous book called, Smectymnus, which himself says, gave the first deadly blow to Episcopacy (n). It was indeed, tho' a warm, a very well written piece, and therefore we find frequent references thereto in all the defences and apologies for Nonconformity, which have been since published [E]. In 1641, he was appointed by the House of Lords a member of the (f) Wood's Fast. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 287.

(g) Idem, ibid.

(b) See his just and necessary Apology, &c. Lond. 1646, 4to.

(i) Continuation of the Account of silenced and ejected Ministers, Vol. I. p. 8.

(k) Calamy's Abridgment of Baxter's Life, Vol. II. p. 5.

(l) Newcourt's Repert. Eccles. Vol. I. p. 918.

(m) Wood's Fast. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 287.

(n) Just and necessary Apology, p. 13.

[C] And indeed himself, say the contrary. The famous Anthony Wood has taken pains to shew, that our author altered his opinion as to Church-government and ceremonies (4); and Mr Walker hints, that he was once as high in his opinions as Archbishop Laud (5): their testimonies, however, will not affect his character much, if the authorities they produce be fairly answered. The author of a quarto pamphlet, printed at Oxford, in 1643, intitled, Sober Sadness; or Historical Observations upon the Pretences, Proceedings, and Designs of a prevailing Party, in both Houses of Parliament, &c. says, 'That Mr Calamy complied with Bishop Wren, his Diocesan, preached in his surplice and hood, read prayers at the rails, bowed at the name of JESUS, and undertook to satisfy and reduce such as scrupled those ceremonies (6).' One Mr Henry Burton, in a quarto Pamphlet, printed at London, in 1646, asserts pretty nearly the same. The title of his pamphlet was, Truth still Truth, tho' shut out of doors; in answer to which, Mr Calamy published, A just and necessary Apology against an unjust Inveective, published by Mr Burton, in a late book of his intitled, &c. wherein he affirms, 'That during the time he was at St Edmund's-Bury, he never bowed to or towards the Altar, to or towards the East, never read that wicked book of Sports upon the Lord's day, never read prayers at the high altar, at the upper end of the church where the people could not hear. I have often, continued he, preached against innovations; and once I did it at a publick visitation, and was called in question for my labour; I never justified the oath ex officio, nor ever profecuted any man or woman at the high commission; I never to my best remembrance preached at any time for the justification of any innovations. In some few things, I did, I confess, conform, according to the light I then had, out of the uprightness of my heart, &c (7).' Whoever considers this, and that Mr Calamy was only Lecturer at St Edmund's-Bury, will readily incline to think, that these writers were mistaken as to his Conformity, or might perhaps be misled by representations made in his favour to Bishop Wren by some kind friends, who were willing to preserve him in his diocesan's good graces.

[D] With equal modesty and freedom. With this view he tells us himself, he made a recantation and retraction sermon at Bury, in the hearing of thousands, and afterwards speaking of the countenance he gave to the legal applications, against what was esteemed tyranny in the Bishops of those times, he says, 'My house was the retreat of godly ministers in the worst of times. Here was the Remonstrance framed against the Prelates; here were all meetings; I was the first that openly, before a Committee of Parliament, did defend, that Bishops were not only not an order distinct from Presbyters, but that in Scripture, a Bishop and Presbyter were all one (8).' In the same piece he takes abundance of pains to shew, that all this was from conscientious motives, not from any pique to particular persons, or prejudice arising from his own dis-appointments, or despair of preferment. He likewise asserts, that it was before the turn of the times, and consequently flowed not from a spirit of popularity. Others, however, have not scrupled to affirm the contrary, and that Robert, Earl of Essex, said he would be lost, if he was not taken off, and therefore gave him the Rectory of Rochford (9). Yet Mr Calamy must be allowed to know himself as well as his patron; but it is our business to report all things fairly.

[E] Which have been since published. The title of the book, at length, runs thus. An Answer to a book, entitled, AN HUMBLE REMONSTRANCE; in which the Original of Liturgy and Episcopacy is discussed, and Queries propounded concerning both: The Parity of Bishops and Presbyters in Scripture demonstrated, the Occasion of their Inparities in Antiquity discovered; the Disparity of the ancient and our modern Bishops manifested; the Antiquity of ruling Elders in the Church vindicated: The Prelatical Church bounded. Written by SMECTYMNUS. London 1641. 4to. containing with the Appendix ninety-four pages. The word Smectymnus is composed of the initial letters of it's authors names, which were Stephen Marshall, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcomen, and William Spurlow. This piece, which is certainly written with great fierceness of spirit, and much asperity in language, contains eighteen sections, in the last of which, the differences between the Prelatists and Puritans, are aggravated with great bitterness. Then follow sixteen queries, the last of which runs thus, 'Whether, having proved, that God never set such a government in his Church as our Episcopal government is, we may lawfully any longer be subject to it, be present at their courts, obey their injunctions, and especially be instruments in publishing and executing their Excommunications and Absolutions (10).' The book is shut up by an Appendix, wherein is contained an Historical Narration of those bitter fruits, Pride, Rebellion, Treason, Unthankfulness, &c. which have issued from Episcopacy, while it hath stood under the continual influences of sovereign goodness. The whole ends thus 'The inhuman butcheries, bloodsheddings, and cruelties of Gardiner, Bonner, and the rest of the Bishops in Queen Mary's days, are so fresh in every man's memory, as that we conceive it a thing altogether unnecessary to make mention of them. Only we fear lest the guilt of the blood then shed, should

(8) Page 9.

(9) Wood's Fast Oxon. Vol. I. col. 287.

(10) Smectymnus, p. 82.

the Sub-Committee for Religion (o), which consisted of very eminent Divines, whose conduct however has been differently censured [F]. He made a great figure in the Assembly of Divines, tho' he is not mentioned in Fuller's catalogue (p), and distinguished himself therein, both by his learning and moderation. He likewise preached several times before the House of Commons, for which his memory has been very severely treated (q) [G]. He was at the same time one of the Cornhill Lecturers, and no man had a greater interest

' should yet remain to be required at the hands of this nation, because it hath not publickly endeavoured to appease the wrath of God, by a solemn and general humiliation for it. What the practices of the Prelates have been ever since, from the beginning of Queen Elizabeth to this very day, would fill a volume like Ezekiel's roll, with lamentation, mourning, and woe to record. For it hath been their great design to hinder all further Reformation: to bring in doctrines of Popery, Arminianism, and Libertinism, to maintain, propagate, and much increase the burden of human ceremonies, to keep out and beat down the preaching of the word, to silence the faithful preachers of it, to oppose and persecute the most zealous professors, and to turn all religion into a pompous outside: and to tread down the power of godliness. In so much, as it is come to an ordinary proverb, that when any thing is spoiled, we use to say, The Bishop's foot is in it. And in all this, and much more which might be said, fulfilling Bishop Bonner's prophecy, who, when he saw, that in King Edward's Reformation, there was a reservation of Ceremonies and Hierarchy, is credibly reported to have used these words: Since they have begun to taste our broth, it will not be long e'er they will eat of our beef (11). Dr Joseph Hall, Bishop of Exeter, who wrote the Humble Remonstrance, published a Vindication of it in answer to this book, and to this the Smeatymneans replied. Now to shew the credit of this work, it may not be amiss to observe, that Dr Wilkins, afterwards the famous Bishop of Chester, in his Ecclesiastes, or a Discourse concerning the Gift of Preaching, sets down this as a capital work against Episcopacy (12). As such it is mentioned by Dr Calamy, in his Postscript to the Preface of his Abridgment of Baxter's Life, in which Postscript, he professes to instruct the inquisitive reader as to the books most proper to be read, in order to have a true notion of the merits of Nonconformity; and in the same light we find this work considered by Mr Neale, in his History of the Puritans (13).

[F] Has been differently censured. Dr Calamy gives this account of the matter. 'He was, says he, one of those Divines, who, anno 1641, met by order of Parliament in the Jerusalem Chamber, with several Bishops and Doctors, in order to the accommodating Ecclesiastical matters; in which meeting, by mutual concessions, things were brought into a very hopeful posture; but the whole design was spoiled by the bringing into the House the bill against Bishops (14). In this he agrees with the Church Historian, Fuller (15), and other writers of those times. What Archbishop Laud thought of this project may be gathered from this remark in his Diary. 'A Committee for Religion settled in the Upper House of Parliament. Ten Earls, ten Bishops, ten Barons. So the lay votes will be double to the Clergy. This Committee will meddle with doctrine as well as ceremonies, and will call some Divines to them to consider of the business, as appears by a letter hereto annexed, sent by the Lord Bishop of Lincoln to some Divines, to attend this service. Upon the whole matter, I believe this Committee will prove the national synod of England, to the great dishonour of the Church. And what else may follow upon it, God knows (16). Dr Heylyn gives us a further account of this matter (17).

' Though a Convocation were at that time sitting, yet to increase to the miseries of a falling Church, it is permitted, that a private meeting should be held in the Deanry of Westminster, to which some orthodox and conformable Divines were called, as a foil to the rest, which generally were of Presbyterian or Puritan principles. By them it was proposed, that many passages in the Liturgy should be expunged, and others altered for the worse. That decency and reverence in officiating God's publick service should be brought within the compass of innovations. That doctrinal Calvinism should be entertained in all parts of the Church; and all their sabbath speculations, though contrary to Calvin's judgment, superadded to it. But before any thing could be concluded in those weighty matters, the Commons set their bill on foot against root and branch, for putting down all Bishops and Cathedral Churches, which put a period to that meeting without doing any thing.'

[G] Very severely treated Mr Archdeacon Echard; in his History of England, in giving our author's character, speaks thus, That he was so much an incendiary, and promoter of the rebellion and Scots invasion, that his actions cannot be vindicated (18). This gave such offence to his grandson, Dr Edward Calamy, that he wrote and published a letter to the Archdeacon, wherein he observes, that our author was no Chaplain in the army; no enemy to a Liturgy, freed from passages liable to just objections; was rather for reforming Episcopacy, according to Archbishop Uther's platform, than eradicating it. He then objects to what Mr Echard says, as to our author's being a frequent Preacher before the House of Commons, for says, Dr Calamy, there are but three sermons of his preached before that House. 'The first is intitled, England's Looking-Glass, on Jerem. xviii. 7, 8, 9, 10. preached on a solemn fast, December 22, 1641. Printed at London, in 4to. The design of which sermon is to shew, that national repentance will divert, and national sins draw down, national judgments. The second was intitled, God's free Mercy to England, on Ezek. xxxvi. 32. at a solemn fast, February 23, 1641. Printed at London 1642, 4to. the intent of which is to represent England's mercies, as a motive and means of England's humiliation and reformation. His third was intitled, England's Antidote against the Plague of Civil War, on Acts xvii. 30. preached October 22, 1644; and printed at London 1645, in 4to.' These three sermons the Doctor further affirms to be plain practical sermons; and adds further, 'Tho' there are some complaints intermingled of several hardships, which many worthy persons met with before this Parliament, and motions made for further rectifying things that were amiss; yet there is nothing tending to inflame and widen the differences between King and Parliament: no pushing them on to rigour and severity; no inclination discovered to have the Constitution altered, or any of our foundations overthrown (19)'. After producing this defence: it is but just to observe, that in these very sermons. As for instance, 'But now mark the doctrine; when God begins to build and plant, if that nation do evil, God will unbuild what he has built, and pluck up what he has planted, and repent of the good, &c. For you must know, that God repents as well of his mercies; as of his judgments: when God made Saul King, and he proved stubborn and disobedient, he repented that he had made him King (20)'. And again in the following passage: 'If there be found any amongst you that drive on the designs of Oxford, and are found at Westminster only to betray their country, the Lord unmask such, and the Lord give them repenting hearts: this is to build up houses with the blood of three kingdoms, this is to sell your souls for preferment; and it is just with God, that such not only lose their souls, but lose their preferments also, as Judas, that sold his master, hung himself (21)'. And as to the Scots invasion, the reader may consider the following paragraph from Mr Calamy's speech at Guildhall, October 6, 1643. 'If you would have a peace with Popery, a peace with slavery, if you would have a Judas peace, or a Joab his peace, you know the story He kissed Amasa, and then killed him: If you would have a peace, that may bring a massacre with it, a French peace; if you would have such a peace, it may be had easily. But if you would have a peace that may continue the Gospel among you, such as the godly in the kingdom desire, I am confident such a peace cannot be had,

without

(q) Wood's Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 287. Echard's Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 176.

(18) Vol. III. p. 137.

(19) See his Letter to Archdeacon Echard, p. 87.

(20) Sermon before the Commons, Dec. 22, 1641, p. 34.

(21) Fast Sermon before the Commons, Oct. 22, 1644, p. 25.

(o) Fuller's Ch. Hist. cent. XVII. p. 174.

(p) Calamy's Abridgment of Baxter's Life, Vol. II. p. 5.

(11) Ibid. p. 93.

(12) Page 51.

(13) Vol. II. p. 398.

(14) Abridgment of the Life of Baxter, Vol. II. p. 5.

(15) Cent. XVII. p. 175.

(16) Page 24. Monday, March 23, 1640-1.

(17) Hist. of the Presbyterians, p. 437, 431.

(r) Calamy's Abridgment of Baxter's Life, Vol. II. p. 5.

(s) Ibid.

(t) See the Life of Cromwell, p. 133.

(u) Baxter's Narrative of the memorable Passages of his Life, P. ii. p. 217.

(w) Idem; ibid. p. 218.

(x) Kennet's Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 234.

(y) Continuation of the Account of silenced and ejected Ministers, Vol. I. p. 9.

(22) Examination of the second Vol. of Neal's Hist. of the Puritans by Dr Grey, p. 391.

(23) Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 281.

(24) See this Pamphlet printed at London in 4^{to}, 1649, p. 7.

(25) Ecclesiastical Hist. of Great Britain, Vol. II. p. 859, 860.

interest in the city of London, in consequence of his ministerial abilities, than he (r). He preached constantly in his own parish church for twenty years, not only to a numerous but most worthy audience, composed of the most eminent citizens, and even persons of great quality. He steadily and strenuously opposed the sectaries, and gave many pregnant instances of his dislike to those violences which were committed afterwards, on the King's being brought from the Isle of Wight (s). He opposed the infamous murder of his Sovereign King Charles I, with constancy and courage [H]. Under the usurpation of Cromwell, he was passive and lived as privately as he could, yet he gave no reason to suspect, that he was at all a well-wisher to that government (t) [I], when the times afforded a favourable opportunity, he neglected not the promoting the return of King Charles II, and actually preached before the House of Commons on the day they voted that great question (u), which, however, has not hindered some from suggesting their suspicions of his Loyalty [K]. After this step was taken, he together with Mr Ash and other eminent Divines, were sent over to compliment the King in Holland, by whom they were extremely well received (w). When His Majesty was restored, Mr Calamy retained still a considerable share in his favour, and in June 1660, was appointed one of his Chaplains in Ordinary, and was offered the Bishoprick of Coventry and Litchfield, which he refused (x) [L]. When the Convocation came to be chosen, he together with Mr Baxter were elected, May 2, 1661, for London, but the Bishop of that diocese having the power of choosing two out of four, or four out of six, elected within a certain circuit, Dr Sheldon who was then Bishop, was so kind as to excuse both of them, which perhaps was owing to the share they had in the Savoy Conference (y). After the miscarriage of that design, Mr Calamy made use of all his interest to procure the passing of an act agreeable to the King's declaration at Breda, but when this was frustrated and

the

'without contributing towards bringing in the Scots (22). Besides these, Anthony Wood mentions two other sermons, the first intitled, The Noblemans Pattern of true and real Thankfulness, preached at a solemn Thanksgiving, June 15, 1643, on Joshua xxiv. 15. and printed the same year at London, in 4^{to}. The second intitled, An Indictment against England, because of herself-murdering Divisions, preached before the House of Lords at their fast, December 25, (so that they fasted upon Christmas-day) 1644, on Matth. xii. 25. printed at London, in 1645, in 4^{to} (23).

[H] With constancy and courage.] There is a famous paper often referred to, in order to shew the innocency of the Presbyterians, with respect to the King's murder, which is intitled, A serious and faithful Representation of the Judgments of Ministers of the Gospel within the Province of London, contained, in a Letter from them to the General and his Council of War, delivered to his Excellency by some of the Subscribers, January 18, 1648. To this piece there are between forty and fifty subscribers, but the name of Mr Calamy is not among them; the reason of which was, that this Representation was drawn up to enforce what he and some other ministers of the same persuasion had delivered in two conferences; the first, with the General and his Council; the second, with the chief officers of the army, as the paper itself recites (24). This evidently shews, that whatever warm expressions might escape our author in his sermons, he was undoubtedly loyal, and sincerely detested that barbarous and bloody fact. Some indeed have affected to treat this paper, as a matter of no great significance; but Mr Collier in his Church History (25), after making a very faithful extract of it, says very honestly and fairly, that it was an instance of handsome plain dealing, and a bold reprimand of a victorious army.

[I] A well-wisher to that government.] The following story, which Harry Nevillc, who was one of the Council of State asserted of his own knowledge, is a full proof of this, and at the same time a very curious passage in itself. 'Cromwell having a design to set up himself, and bring the crown upon his own head, sent for some of the chief city Divines, as if he made it a matter of conscience to be determined by their advice. Among these was the leading Mr Calamy, who very boldly opposed the project of Cromwell's single government, and offered to prove it both unlawful and impracticable. Cromwell answered readily upon the first head of unlawful, and appealed to the safety of the nation being the supreme law: but, says he, pray Mr Calamy, why impracticable? He replied; Oh it is against the voice of the nation, there will be nine in ten against you. Very well, says Cromwell; but what if I should disarm the nine, and put the sword in the tenth man's hand, would not that do the business (26)?'

[K] Their suspicions of his Loyalty.] Dr Calamy in his letter to Archdeacon Echard, justified his grandfather's Loyalty very warmly; but in answer to that letter, it is asserted, that in 1659, Mr Calamy, Mr Baxter, and five or six more of the same character, made the following speech, by one of their number to General Monk. 'I hear a report, Sir, that you have some thoughts of calling back the King. But it is my sense, and the sense of these gentlemen here with me, that it is a thing you ought not to do upon any terms: for prophaneness is so inseparable from the Royal party, that if ever you bring the King back, the power of godliness will most certainly depart from this land (27). This is a little improbable in itself, and I must own, that we have no considerable authority to justify this story. On the other hand Mr Baxter tells us, that the chief men who turned the General's resolution to restore his Majesty, were Mr Clarges and Sir William Morice, the first his brother-in-law, the latter his kinsman, together with the petitions and affections of the city, principally moved by Mr Calamy and Mr Ash, two ancient, leading, able Ministers, with Dr Bates, Dr Manton, Dr Jacob, and other Ministers of London, who concurred; and these were encouraged by the Earl of Manchester, the Lord Hollis, the late Earl of Anglesey, and many of the then Council of State (28).

[L] Which he refused.] The account given us of this matter by his grandson, is to this purpose. He refused a Bishoprick, because, he could not have it upon the terms of the King's declaration; but kept his temper and moderation after he was ejected. I have been credibly informed, that Bishop Wilkins had such an opinion of his insight into the controversy about Church-Government, that he heartily wished he could have conformed; that he might have confronted the bold and confident assertors of the Jus Divinum of Episcopacy in the Convocation, in which he was not allowed to sit, tho' he was chosen one of the Clerks for the city (29). And yet the author of the Modern Pleas, &c. says, 'I have been credibly informed (not to say, that I am able to make it good) that Mr Calamy did, before his Majesty and diverse Lords of the Council, profess, that there was not any thing in the Constitution of the Church, to which he could not conform, were it not for the scandalizing of others (30). But Mr Baxter answers, we must testify, some of us that were in his company, from first to last, we heard him over and over protest, That he took several things in Conformity to be intolerable sins. And he wrote the Preface to our Reply, he may be judged of by that (31).

(26) See the Life of Cromwell, p. 133.

(27) Page 27.

(28) Narrative of the most remarkable Passages of his Life and Times, Part ii. p. 214.

(29) Calamy's Abridgment of the Life of Baxter, Vol. II. p. 6.

(30) Page 12.

(31) Apology for Nonconformity, p. 152.

[M] In the Act of Uniformity passed, he took a resolution of suffering for his conscience rather than suffer in it, and accordingly preached his farewell sermon at Aldermanbury, August 27, 1662 (z). He made however a last effort three days afterwards, by presenting a petition to His Majesty to continue in the exercise of his ministerial office; this petition was signed by many of the London Clergy, and Dr Manton and Dr Bates assisted at the presenting it, when Mr Calamy made a long and moving speech, but neither it nor the petition had any good effect, tho' the King expressed himself in favour of Toleration [M]. He remained in his parish and came constantly to church, tho' another was in the pulpit, which proved an occasion of much trouble to him, for on December 28, 1662; the expected Preacher not coming in time, some of the principal persons in the parish prevailed upon Mr Calamy to supply his place, which with some importunity he did, but delivered himself with such freedom, that he was soon after by the Lord Mayor's warrant committed to Newgate for his sermon (a). But the case itself being thought hard, and some doubt arising how far the commitment was legal, His Majesty in a few days discharged him (b). This affair however has made a great noise, and much has been said on both sides, we will give the reader an opportunity of informing himself with what degree of justice [N]. He lived to see London in ashes, the sight of which broke

(a) Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 262.

(b) Continuation of the Account of silenced and ejected Ministers, Vol. I. p. 11.

[M] In favour of Toleration. The whole of this transaction does extraordinary honour to the memory of our author. In his speech he intimated, that those of his persuasion were ready to enter the list with any for their fidelity to His Majesty, and did little expect to be dealt with as they had been; and they were now come to His Majesty's feet, as the last application they should make, &c. His Majesty promised he would consider of their business; and the very next day the matter was fully debated in Council, His Majesty himself being present, who was pleased to declare, that he intended an indulgence, if it were at all feasible. The great friends of the Silenced Ministers, who had encouraged their hopes by a variety of specious promises, were allowed, upon this occasion, freely to suggest their reasons against putting the act in execution, and they argued very strenuously. But Dr Sheldon, Bishop of London, in a warm speech, declared, That it was now too late to think of suspending that law, for that he had already, in obedience to it, ejected such of his Clergy as would not comply with it, on the Sunday before; and should they now be restored, after they were thus exasperated, he must expect to feel the effects of their resentment, and should never be able to maintain his episcopal authority among such a Clergy, who would not fail to insult him as their enemy, being countenanced by the Court; nor could the resolutions of the Council-board justify his contempt of a law, which had passed with such an unanimous consent, and upon such mature deliberation, of both Houses: Should the sacred authority of this law be now suspended, it would render the Legislature ridiculous and contemptible; and if the importunity of such disaffected people were a sufficient reason to humour them, neither the Church nor State would ever be free from distractions and convulsions. So that, upon the whole, it was carried, that no indulgence at all should be granted (32). Dr Samuel Parker, Bishop of Oxford, has given us a farther account of this matter, which cannot be disagreeable to the reader. 'By this reasonable interposition, says his Lordship, the Bishop freed the Church of England from these plagues for many years. For thus it happened luckily, happily, and prosperously, and indeed very providentially, that the Schismatics entangled themselves in their schism by covenant and agreement, entering into a new association, being deceived by the large promises of the London Teachers, that they would not obey the law, and thence imagining that they should defend themselves by their multitude. And whereas the Courtiers would have persuaded the King, that there would be Preachers wanting in the city of London, upon that Sunday, the very prudent Bishop of that diocese, who had computed the number of the faction, had ready at hand an equal number of orthodox Divines, and those eloquent and learned, who, the sign given, did, as it were, come out of ambush, and take possession of the pulpits. And though from that time the Schismatics tried all their art, that they might be received again into the bosom of the Church, yet he guarded every pass and avenue with such diligence, that when they saw their attempts so often baffled, they at length sat down, being no farther troublesome with their schism, than

VOL. II. No. XCIV.

'barely that they were Schismatics as long as he lived (33).'

[N] With what degree of justice. The account given of this matter by Dr Calamy runs thus. 'He was imprisoned in terram, for preaching occasionally after Bartholomew day; but soon released, when it was seen what a resort of persons of all qualities there was to him in Newgate, and how generally the severity was repented. Our late Historian represents his preaching, at that time, as seditions. But it was purely occasioned by a disappointment, as to the Preacher expected; and the discourse, as I have been informed by those that very well knew it to be true, was unpremeditated. That hard word, therefore, might have been spared. As circumstances then were, there might well be a concern stirring for serious Religion, which was in no small danger. And had this author waved that reflection, his work would not have lost any of its beauty (34).' This reflection of Bishop Kennet's the reader will the better judge of when he sees it in his own words. 'Had he taken a practical subject, and kept to it, no notice would have been taken of that one occasional necessity, as it were, of preaching. But it looked like a plot, or formed design, that he should chuse a subject of Eli's Concern for the Ark of God; and so applied the danger of the Church and Religion to the present times, that he could not be thought less seditions, than a disabled Preacher (35).' It appears from hence, that it was not either the occasion of his preaching, or the subject, strictly speaking, which induced the Bishop to make use of so harsh a word, but the application. Now to judge of this, recourse must be had to the sermon, which has been printed, and therein two passages have been taken notice of as sufficient to excuse Bishop Kennet's censure, the rather, because zeal in a Prelate is as laudable as in a Pastor of any other communion. The first passage is this: You have had, says Mr Calamy, three famous successors; Dr Taylor for seven years, Dr Stoughton for seven years, and myself, I have been with you almost seven and twenty years, and may not God now unchurch you, by suffering you to want a faithful Minister to go in and out before you. This is one reason, upon which account I may safely say, the Ark of God is in danger; and Aldermanbury may truly fear the loss of the Ark (36).

(32) Hist. of his own Times, p. 33.

(34) Calamy's Abridgment of the Life of Baxter, Vol. II. p. 7.

(35) Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 262.

(36) Sermon at Aldermanbury church, Dec. 28, 1662, printed at Oxford, 1663, p. 12.

(37) Ibid. p. 14.

The second passage runs thus: I read that among the Romans, when any man was accused for his life, all his relations put on mourning apparel, and they followed him to his trial in mourning, thereby to shew their love to the party in danger. Now did you love the Gospel, the Ministers of the Gospel, and the ordinances of Christ, you would all put on mourning, and lament for the Gospel, the Ark of God, that is in danger; and because you do not, it is a sign you have no love for the Gospel (37). But the thing did not end here, for as this commitment was ill taken on one side, so his discharge, by the King's express command, was as warmly repented by the other; for in the next session of Parliament, complaint thereof was made in the House of Commons; upon which it was signified to the House, that his release from imprisonment was not owing to the sole command of the King, but to a deficiency in the act of Parliament, that had not fully provided for his longer broke his heart, he was driven through the ruins in a coach to Enfield, and was so shocked at the dismal appearance that he could never wear off the impression, but kept his chamber ever after and died, October 29, 1666, within a month after this accident happened (c). He was tho' a very learned man, yet a plain and practical Preacher, and one who was not afraid to speak his sentiments freely of and to the greatest men, and of this the reader will meet with a remarkable instance in the notes [O]. His writings, tho' they were not numerous, are sufficient to support his reputation, and to make his abilities known to posterity [P]. He was twice married. By his first wife, he had a son and daughter; and by his second, seven children, some of whom we shall have occasion to mention in succeeding articles.

(c) Peck's Defderata Curiosa,
Vol. II. lib. xiv.
p. 39.

restraint. Whereupon there was this entry made in their Journal. Die Jovis, Febr. 19, 1662. Upon complaint made to this House, that Mr Calamy being committed to prison, upon breach of the act of Uniformity, was discharged upon pretence of some defect in the act:—Resolved, That it be referred to a Committee to look into the Act of Uniformity, as to the matter in question, and to see whether the same be defective, and wherein. And soon after a Committee was appointed, to bring in the reasons of the House for their advice to the King against a Toleration, with an address to His Majesty. And to an effectual door was opened to all the rigour and severity that followed (38).

(38) Continuation of the Account of ejected and silenced Ministers, Vol. I.
p. 12.

[O] A remarkable instance in the notes.] Dr Calamy tells us, that our author, at the time of the Restoration, had the greatest interest in court, city, and country, of any of the Ministers, and therefore extremely carested at first; but soon saw whither things were tending. Among other evidences of it, this is one: That having General Monk for his auditor in his own church, a little after the Restoration, on a sacrament-day, he had occasion to speak of filthy lucre: 'And why, said he, is it called filthy, but because it makes men do base and filthy things? Some men, said he, will betray three kingdoms for filthy lucre's sake.' Saying which, he threw his handkerchief, which he usually waved up and down while he was preaching, towards the General's pew (39).

(39) Calamy's Abridgment of the Life of Baxter,
Vol. II. p. 6.

[P] His abilities known to posterity.] As we have already mentioned several pieces written by him, this note shall only serve as a supplement, and take in those that we have had no opportunity to account for, viz. The great Danger of Covenant-refusing and Covenant-breaking, &c. preached before the Lord Mayor, Sheriffs, Aldermen, Ministers, &c. of London, on 2 Tim. iii. 3. printed at London 1646, in 4to. Another preached before the Lord Mayor, entitled, The Monster of Self-seeking anatomized. Sermon at St Giles's Morning Exercises on Acts xxvi. 8. Funeral Sermons upon Dr Samuel Bolton, Robert Earl of Warwick, in 1658, Mr Simeon Ashe in 1662. A Sermon to the native citizens of London, entitled, The City Remembrancer. A Farewel Sermon on 2 Sam. xxiv. 14. to his parish of St Mary Aldermanbury, Aug. 17. 1662. And five Sermons, entitled, The Godly Man's Ark, or a City of Refuge in the Day of his Distress, the 8th edition of which was printed at London, 1683, in 12mo. He had a hand in drawing up the Vindication of the Presbyterian Government and Ministry, printed at London 1650; and the Jus Divinum Ministerii Evangelicæ Anglicani, printed in 1654. Since his Death, there was a treatise of Meditation printed in a clandestine way, not by his son, nor from his manuscript, but from some imperfect notes taken by an auditor. E

CALAMY (EDMUND) eldest son to the Reverend Mr Edmund Calamy, of whom in the preceding article, was born at Sir Edmund's-Bury in Suffolk, about the year 1635. In his junior years he was carefully instructed by his father, and when he had acquired a sufficient fund of learning, he was transferred to the University of Cambridge, where he was entered of Sidney-College, March 28, 1651. He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, in 1654-5. Then he removed to Pembroke-Hall, where he took the degree of Master of Arts, in 1658 (a). He became afterwards Fellow of that College; and on April 20, 1659, was presented to the living of Moreton in Essex, which he held 'till he was removed by the Act of Uniformity, in 1662 (b) [A]. After his ejection he retired to London, and kept a Meeting privately in his house in Aldermanbury. When King Charles II, published his declaration for Indulgence, he set up a publick Meeting in Currier's Hall, near Cripplegate. But when the Dissenters were again persecuted, he had recourse to his former method; and tho' he was very assiduous in his duty, yet he escaped imprisonment, notwithstanding warrants were frequently out against him; but he had the misfortune with several other of his brethren to fall under a Crown-Office prosecution, which put him to a great deal of trouble and expence (c). As he was a person of much learning and unaffected piety, so he was very careful to avoid whatever might draw upon him the imputation of party. In the earlier part of life he declined taking the Covenant, and through the whole course of it shewed a spirit of moderation and charity agreeable to his calling. He was, tho' a Nonconformist, a man of very free notions, and one who never pretended to confine the Church of Christ within the bounds of any particular sect; he had a great contempt for the goods of this world, and was such a lover of obscurity and retirement, that tho' he was a very able as well as painful Preacher, and was known to have done much good in the space of three and twenty years that he exercised the Ministry in London, yet he would never be prevailed on to appear in print, but satisfied himself with the conscioufness of having performed his duty (d). Having thus led a private and peaceable, tho' not a quiet, life, he exchanged

(a) From the University Register.

(b) Newcourt's
Reper. Eccl. Vol.
II. p. 424.

(c) Calamy's Abridgment of Baxter's Life,
Vol. II. p. 301.

(d) Continuation of the Account of ejected and silenced Ministers,
Vol. II. p. 464.

[A] By the Act of Uniformity in 1662.] We have some very curious particulars in relation to this gentleman's acquiring, holding, and losing this living. He was admitted to it by an instrument dated at Whitehall the 20th of April, 1659, setting forth, That he had been presented to the rectory of Moreton in the county of Essex, by the Right Honourable Edward Earl of Manchester, John Lord Roberts, Sir Gilbert

Gerrard, Bart. Anthony Tuckney, Doctor in Divinity, Master of St John's College in Cambridge, Simeon Ash, Clerk, and Edmund Calamy, the elder, Clerk, Feoffees in trust of Robert Earl of Warwick, deceased, the patron thereof, and that he had a testimonial of his holy life and good conversation; wherefore he was admitted as the legal incumbent by the Commissioners for approbation of publick Preachers, which instrument

it for a better in the Month of May 1685, being taken off by a consumption. He left behind him a son and four daughters (e).

(e) From particular information.

is signed by Philip Nye, Register, and sealed with the common seal of the Board beforementioned. He afterwards gave four bonds to the Protector Richard, for the payment of the first fruits and tenths, each bond for nine pounds, the first payable October 1, 1659, and the last April 1, 1661. He shewed his loyalty to King Charles II by contributing freely to the benevolence in 1661, yet this did not hinder his being turned out, in the year following, for Nonconformity (t).

(1) Calamy's Continuation of the Account of ejected and silenced Ministers, Vol. 1. p. 451, 462, 463, 464.

CALAMY (BENJAMIN) an eminent Divine of the Church of England, in the XVIIth Century. He was the son of the famous Mr Edmund Calamy, Minister of Aldermanbury beforementioned, by a second wife, and received the first tincture of learning at St Paul's School, from whence he was sent when very young to the University of Cambridge, and there entered of Catharine-Hall. In the year 1664-5, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts; in 1668, that of Master of Arts; and became also Fellow of that Hall, and a very eminent Tutor there. April 25, 1677; he was chosen in the room of Dr Simon Ford, Minister of St Mary Aldermanbury; and soon after appointed one of His Majesty's Chaplains in ordinary. In 1680, he took his Degree of Doctor in Divinity (a). In 1683; he preached in that church his famous sermon, which he afterwards published under the title of, A Discourse about a scrupulous Conscience, of which we may truly say, that never any piece of it's kind or size, gained more credit to it's author, or was more taken notice of by the publick (b) [A]. This sermon he preached a second time at Bow Church with great effect, and this excited a zealous Nonconformist, one Mr Thomas De Laune, who had been formerly a schoolmaster, to write against it, which he did in such a manner as drew upon him a fatal imprisonment, which he endeavoured by all means to ascribe to Dr Calamy, tho' his complaints on this head had little or no foundation (c) [B]. In 1683, he was admitted to the Vicarage of St Lawrence

(a) From the University Register.

(b) The title at large ran thus: A Discourse about a doubting Conscience, preached at the parish church of St Mary Aldermanbury, London, by Benjamin Calamy, D. D. one of his Majesty's Chaplains in Ordinary, London, 1683, 46.

(c) See DeLaune's Narrative mentioned in note [B].

[A] More taken notice of by the publick.] This sermon is in every respect very extraordinary. In the title page, we have this motto from a piece of Mr Baxter's. 'Consider this, it is the judgment of some, that thousands are gone to hell, and ten thousands upon their march thither, that in all probability had never come there, if they had not been tempted from the parish churches, for the enjoyment of communion in a purer Church (1).' It was dedicated to Sir George Jefferies, Knight and Baronet, Chief Justice of Chester, afterwards Lord Jefferies and High-Chancellor of England. And in this dedication there are some very singular passages. In the first place, he acknowledges Sir George for his patron, and professes, that it was by his interest and favour he was placed in this parish. He then proceeds thus. 'Upon how many this plain, homely discourse may have good effect, I cannot guess: how many it will anger and displease; I am not at all concerned: and tho' I may be thought by some ill advised, in publishing such a sermon, yet every one will commend and justify my discretion in prefixing your name before it; for so great an awe have the enemies of our Church and government of your Loyalty and fidelity to both, of your undaunted zeal and activity for both, that they will not dare loudly to condemn what you are pleased to protect. They will be justly afraid of quarelling with me, when they know I have engaged you on my side. I am very sensible, that in the age we live, some are so extraordinary wise and wary, as to censure and discourage all men that speak roundly and act vigorously for the King and Church, as being more forward and busy than is needful; but I am also as sensible, that if some men had not shewn more courage and honesty than those prudent persons, both would have been by this time in far greater danger, than at this present, thanks be to God, they are. For my own part, no one is more favourable to a truly tender conscience than myself, let it be as nice and scrupulous as it can well, so it be about the substantial matters of piety towards God, justice between man and man, due obedience to superiors, and when it makes us more exactly careful of our undoubted duty in all instances: but when men are scrupulous only on one side, about things commanded by lawful authority, and make no scruple of disobedience, schism, faction, and division; when men set up their private humour, fancy, or opinion, in opposition to established laws; when they become peevish, pragmatical, and ungovernable; nay, when men's consciences prove so generally tender and scrupulous, as to doubt of and suspect the rights of the Crown (for that conscience that is so tender against the Church, is also usually as tender against the King) such wayward, skittish consciences ought to be well bridled and restrained, or else they will be not only intolerably troublesome, but extremely mischievous, both to Church and State.' The sermon itself is very warm in the cause of Conformity, and perhaps there never were more arguments used, or those better prosecuted, than we meet in this discourse. At the end of it, we find the following quotation, from a book of his father's, to shew, that such as were Nonconformists then, were zealous for Conformity, when themselves were in possession of the churches, the passage is this. 'Take heed of separating from the publick assemblies of the Saints. I have found by experience, that all our Church calamities have sprung from this root. He that separates from the publick worship, is like a man tumbling down a hill, and never leaving till he comes to the bottom of it. I could relate many sad stories of persons professing godliness, who out of dislike to our Church meetings, began at first to separate from them, and after many changes and alterations, are turned, some of them Anabaptists, some Quakers, some Ranters, some direct Atheists. But I forbear; you must hold communion with all those Churches with which Christ holds communion. You must separate from the sins of Christians, but not from the ordinances of Christ. Take heed of unchurching the Churches of Christ, lest you prove Schismatics instead of being true Christians (2).' Whoever peruses this discourse and considers the time in which it was published, and the nature of these arguments from their own writers, will easily discern the causes of that spirit which was raised against Dr Calamy, on account of his preaching it. A spirit perhaps, that nothing could have overcome but the innocency of his life, his readiness to converse with the worthiest men of all parties, and his willingness to do good to such as differed from him in opinion.

[B] Had little or no foundation.] The title of this book runs thus, De Laune's Plea for the Nonconformists; shewing the true State of their Case, and how far the Conformist's Separation from the Church of Rome, for their Papiſh Superſtitious, &c. introduced into the Service of God, justifies the Nonconformist's Separation from them for the same. In a Letter to Dr Benjamin Calamy, upon the Sermon called, Scrupulous Conscience, inviting hereto: To which is added, A PARALLEL SCHEME OF THE PAGAN, PAPAL, and CHRISTIAN RITES and CEREMONIES. To this there is added, another piece, intituled, A Narrative of the

(2) Godly Man's Ark in the Ep. Ded. to the parish of Aldermanbury.

(1) Ep. to separate Congregations.

Trial

Lawrence Jewry, with St Mary Magdalen Milk-street, annexed, to which he was collated by the Dean and Chapter of St Paul's, in the room of Dr Benjamin Whichcot. June 18, 1685, he was on the decease of Dr John Wells, installed into the Prebend of Harleston, in the Cathedral Church of St Paul (d). These preferments are abundant proofs of his merit and of his great interest in the city of London, which he maintained not by attaching himself to any party, but by living in great intimacy with the best men of all parties. He was particularly acquainted with Alderman Cornish, who was his parishioner, and for whom he had so great a respect, that he gave testimony in his favour when he was tried for High-Treason, October 16, 1685, which was no ordinary mark of friendship in those times (e) [C]. It is thought, that a sense of publick calamities had a great share in bringing his last illness upon our author, who fell into a declining state in the autumn of the year last mentioned, and died of a pleuritic fever in the month of January 1686. He was a man equally valuable for the abilities which he possessed, and the uses to which he applied them. He was a sincere son of the Church of England, and piously intent on gaining over Dissenters of all sorts to her Communion; but withal he had an extensive charity, and a just aversion to persecution. He was heartily loyal, but without bitterness or passion, and his loyalty occasioned his grief, when he saw those steps taken

(d) Newcourt's
Reper. Ecclief.
Vol. I. p. 383,
155.

(e) See the case of Alderman Cornish.

Trial and Sufferings of Thomas De Laune, for writing, printing, and publishing a late book called, A Plea for the Nonconformists, with some modest Reflexions thereon. Directed to Dr Calamy; in obedience to whose Call that work was undertaken. By Thomas De Laune. Printed for the Author 1683. In this warm book, the author takes it all along for granted, that Dr Calamy's printing his sermon, was a challenge to the Nonconformists in general, and to every man who thought himself able to defend Nonconformity in particular, though there is certainly nothing in the sermon which can warrant such an opinion. The book is wrote too in very fierce language, and a high charge of idolatry is brought against the Church. After the letter, follows another short treatise, bearing the title of, The Image of the Beast; showing by a parallel or Scheme, what a Conformist the Church of Rome is to the Pagan, and what a Nonconformist to the Christian Church, in it's Rites, Service, and Ceremonies, the better to exemplify the true and false Church. By T. D. For the publishing this book, he was taken into custody, on November 29, 1683, and the next day committed to Newgate by a warrant from Sir Thomas Jenner, then Recorder of London. After his commitment, he wrote a long letter to Dr Calamy, wherein, after having often told him, that he wrote in obedience to his call, and that he was imprisoned entirely on his account, he concludes thus. 'As truth seeks no corners, nor sorners, and as real beauty will not be beholden to the artificial dabbings of a pencil; so the Christian Religion (where professed in it's naked simplicity) needs no other argument to beget profelytes, than it's own lovely and illustrious features, altogether plain, honest, and every way amiable, void of all meretricious gawdery, or that majestical pomp, which pleases only the external sense. I have no malignity against any person whatsoever, much less against your Church, or any of it's members; all I desire is, that scrupulous consciences, who trouble not the peace of the nation, should be dealt withal (at least) as weak brethren, according to Rom. xiv. 1. and not ruined by penalties, for not swallowing what is imposed under the notion of decency and order, tho' excen-trick to the scheme we have of it in our only rule of faith. Sir, I entreat you to excuse this trouble from a stranger, who would fain be convinced by something more like Divinity than Newgate, where any message from you shall be welcome to your humble servant, T. D. (3).' To this epistle, Mr De Laune tells us, Dr Calamy answered, if he has been imprisoned on account of answering my book, I will do him any service that becomes me. Some other letters he sent him, to pretty near the same purpose, which did not hinder his being tried at the Old Bayly for a Libel, on the 16th of January following, and upon conviction he was fined one hundred marks, ordered to find security for a year, and his book to be burnt before Royal Exchange. By which fatal sentence, himself, his wife, and children perished in Newgate, no body caring to lay down seventy-five pounds for him, tho' he was a man of much knowledge and learning (4). His sufferings gave very great concern to Dr Calamy, who was a man of much humanity, and he did all he could to serve him; but it not appearing that his book was more an answer to Dr Calamy than to Dr Stillingfleet, or any other writer in defence of Conformity, and as the Doctor's words were strangely wreited and abused in his Narrative, Dr Calamy's charitable applications which were hearty and frequent had the less weight.

[C] No ordinary marks of friendship at that time. The case of Alderman Cornish is very well known, and the violence with which he was treated even at his trial. He thought it necessary there to prove his being a Churchman, and not an Occasional Conformist. With this view he would have called Dr Sharp then Dean of Norwich, or Dr Tillotson then Dean of Canterbury, but neither thought proper to appear; he had then recourse to Dr Calamy. The circumstances of the thing are very remarkable, and therefore we will consider the whole passage as it stands in the printed trial.

Mr Cornish. My Lord, I desire I may have the Minister of the parish, Dr Calamy, for my constancy at my parish-church, and receiving the Sacrament, according to the rites of the Church of England; that I am, to all appearance, a person that does as well affect the government as any man. L. C. J. Jones I doubt you are all appearance. Dr Calamy. My knowledge of Mr Cornish hath been since I came to be Minister of the parish, which is about two years, a little above two years; whenever he was in town he did use to come to church as constantly as any one, and come with his family to prayers, and did come to the Sacrament; and he did not only come at Easter, to save himself from a presentment, but at our monthly communion; and since I have been Minister of the place, I have often conversed with him: All that I can say, is, that I never heard him say a disrespectful word of the government. L. C. J. Jones. I hope he took you to be a man of another kidney? Dr Calamy. I marked his words, because of the character I had heard of him. Mr At Gen. Pray what was the character he had before these two years? Dr Calamy. That was what was publick (5). The (5) Trial of Hen. Cornish, Esq; &c. London, printed for Geo. Croom, 1685. Collection of State Trials, Vol. IV. p. 153. Chief Justice, in summing up this part of the evidence, observed to the Jury, that Mr Cornish laid great stress on his being a Churchman, of which he had given no evidence beyond two years, which being since the trial of the Lord Russel, it was to be presumed he took up this character as a thing necessary then to purge off suspicions. Mr Cornish objected to this, that he had been a constant Churchman for seven years, but that Dr Calamy could speak only since the time of his coming into the parish, his predecessor, Dr Whichcot, being dead. After Mr Cornish received sentence of death, Dr Calamy visited him in Newgate, but excused himself from attending him at the place of execution, by saying plainly, that, He could as well die with him, as behold his death in such circumstances. Dr Calamy forbore not using all the interest he had to save him, to the very last, and upon this occasion it is reported that Sir George Jefferies should have given him this answer: Dear Doctor, set your heart at rest, and give yourself no further trouble, for I can assure you, that if you could offer a mine of gold as deep as the Monument is high, and a bunch of pearls as big as the flames at the top of it, it would not purchase his life (6).

(3) DeLaune's
Narrative, p. 59.

(4) Observator,
Vol. II. No. 95.

(6) General D'et.
Vol. IV. p. 27.

which could end in nothing but publick confusion. His own virtues however exempted him in a great measure from envy and scandal, even in the worst of times, insomuch; that the greatest men of all sects and all parties amongst us, readily joined in paying a just tribute of praise to his memory (f.) [D]. Tho' few in his situation were either better or more frequent Preachers, yet he left behind him very little in print. Some sermons of his were after his decease published by his brother, which served only to raise a greater regret in the world for the loss of so worthy a person, and of so many of his excellent performances as were buried in oblivion. His sermons are still valued as well for the beauty of their language as the excellent sentiments contained in them [L].

(f) Appendix to the third Vol. of Echard's Hist. p. 21.

[D] A just tribute of praise to his memory. His Funeral Sermon was preached by Dr William Sherlock, afterwards Dean of St Paul's, January 7, 1685-6. In this sermon the Doctor tells us, that, 'when a prevailing faction threatened both Church and State, and the fears of Popery were thought a sufficient justification of the most illegal and irreligious methods to keep it out; when it was scandalous to speak a word either for the King or the Church; when cunning men were silent; and those, who affected popularity, swam with the stream; then this great and good man durst reform Schism and Faction; durst teach men to conform to the Church, and to obey and honour the King; durst vindicate the despised Church of England, and the hated doctrine of Passive Obedience, though one was thought to favour Popery, and the other to introduce slavery. But he was above the powerful charms of names, and liked Truth never the worse because it was misnamed. His publick sermons preached in those days, and printed by publick authority, are lasting proofs of this; and yet he was no Papist neither, but durst reprove the errors of Popery, when some others, who made the greatest noise and outcry about it, grew wise and cautious. This was like a truly honest and faithful servant, to oppose the growing distempers of the age, without any regard either to unjust censures, or apparent danger (7). And yet he did not needlessly provoke any man; he gave no hard words, but thought it severe enough to confute mens errors, without upbraiding or reproaching their persons. His conversation was courteous and affable to all men; soft and easy, as his principles were stubborn. He could yield any thing but the truth, and bear with any thing but the vices of men. He would, indeed, have been the wonder of his age, had he not lived in such an age, as, thanks be to God, can shew many such wonders; and yet, in such an age as this, he made an illustrious figure. Though he had his equals, he had not many superiors (8). Thus he lived, and thus this good man died, for thus was he found doing when his Lord came.' Dr Basil Kennet, in his Preface to the Translation of the Critical Works of M. Rapin, gives us, at once, a fine panegyrick on our author and Dean Sherlock. He is speaking there of the eloquence of the English pulpit, which leads him to this observation. 'As this age applauds the unexhausted store of things and words in Dr Barrow, the next will acknowledge that one of his learned successors began the reputation of Mr Boyle's Lecture. The refined thought, and choice manner, which we admire in the writings of the late Dean of Sarum, those who come after us will affirm to have been continued in other ornaments of the same Church. Nor will the respect which is so justly paid to the clear vein of argument, and excellent spirit of Dr Calamy, be denied to the natural persuasiveness, the easy and popular reason, of the friend who performed the good office at his funeral.' The celebrated Mr Anthony Wood styles Dr Calamy a loyal person, an excellent preacher, and a zealous man for the Church of England (9). Archdeacon Echard speaks of him thus: 'His sermons seem to have been composed for the generality of mankind, in which there is both strength and perspicuity, and discover a genius able to penetrate into the secret recesses of human nature, for which he was particularly observed by King Charles's Court, when he preached at Newmarket. Wherefore it is a pity that we have no more of them in print (10).' Bishop Burnet reckons him with Tension, Sharp, Patrick, Sherlock, Fowler, Scot, Clagget, Cudworth, Williams, and many others, of whom he says, that 'though he knew them not so particularly as to give all their characters, yet they deserved a high one, and were, indeed, an honour both to the Church, and to the age, in which they lived (11).' In the History of Passive Obedience (12), and as that book is composed chiefly from the works of our most eminent Divines, it proves him to be such in the opinion of it's compilers.

(9) Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 282.

(10) Appendix to the three Volumes of his Hist. of England, p. 21.

(11) Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 462.

(12) Said to be printed at Amsterdam, 1689, 4to. p. 122.

[E] As the excellent sentiments contained in them. The pieces printed in his life-time were these. 1. A Sermon preached at Guildhall, on Tit. iii. 8, 9. London 1673, in 4to. 2. A Sermon preached at Guildhall, on John v. 14. before the Lord Mayor and Aldermen, May 29. London 1682, in 4to. 3. A Discourse about a scrupulous Conscience, preached at St Mary Aldermanbury, on Luke xi. 41. London 1683, in 4to. 2d edit. 4. A Sermon preached before the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen at Guildhall chapel, Sept. 30. 1683, on Rom. iii. 8. London 1683, in 4to. 5. A Sermon preached at St Mary le Bow before the Artillery-Company, on Matt. xxvi. 52. London 1684, in 4to. 6. A Sermon preached at St Mary le Bow before the Lord Mayor and Court of Aldermen, Sept. 2. 1684, being the Anniversary-fast for the fire of London, on Isai. lvii. 21. 7. A Thanksgiving-sermon, on Eccles. x. 20. There was a volume of posthumous Sermons, in number thirteen, published by his brother, of whom we are to speak in the next article, with his Funeral Sermon, by Dr Sherlock, prefixed. This volume has run through a great many editions, and has at this day as many admirers as when it was first published.

E

CALAMY (JAMES) son to Edmund Calamy, B. D. beforementioned, by a second wife, and younger brother to Dr Benjamin Calamy, of whom in the preceding article. He was educated at Catharine-Hall in the University of Cambridge, where, in 1672, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts; and in 1676, that of Master (a). Having received holy Orders, and being highly considered on account of his father's reputation, he was presented to the Rectory of Northill in Bedfordshire, where he continued 'till the year 1707, when he was presented by his intimate friend, Dr Blackall, Bishop of Exeter, to that of Cheriton-Bishops in Devonshire; and had at the same time a Prebend in the Church of Exeter bestowed on him. He was a man of great learning, but much greater modesty, which is the reason that he left nothing behind him in print, except his Dedication of his brother's sermons. He led a single life, and on December 14, 1714, was surprized by a sudden death (b).

E

(a) From the University Register.

(b) From particular information.

(7) Page 32, 31.

(8) Ibid. p. 31.

CALAMY (EDMUND) a very eminent Divine among the Nonconformists, grandson to Mr Edmund Calamy, Minister of Aldermanbury, by his eldest son, Mr Edmund Calamy, Minister of Moreton in Essex (a). He was born at his father's house in Aldermanbury, April 5, 1671, and after acquiring a competent portion of learning in several private schools, and at Merchant-Taylor's, under the celebrated Mr Hartcliffe, he removed to a private Academy at Wickham-Brook in Suffolk. There he was under the tuition of Mr Samuel Cradock, a very eminent and worthy person, who had been Fellow of Emanuel College in Cambridge, and by whose assistance Mr Calamy went through a course of Logick, Natural Philosophy, and Metaphysics (b). He studied with such diligence as to merit particular marks of favour from Mr Cradock, as before from Mr Hartcliffe; and by his natural sweetness of temper, and great candour in conversation, he established such friendships with his contemporaries, as were both useful and honourable to him in the succeeding part of his life (c) [A]. In March 1688, being just turned of seventeen, he went over to the University of Utrecht, where he studied Philosophy under De Vries, Civil Law under Vander Muyden, both celebrated Professors, and attended the Lectures of the most learned Grævius, upon Sophocles and Puffendorf's Introduction. Here Mr Calamy pursued his studies with still greater diligence than before, making it a rule with him to spend one whole night in a week amongst his books (d). His application and proficiency recommended him to the favour of all who knew him there, and especially to the notice and friendship of two of his countrymen, who came afterwards to fill very high stations both in Church and State [B]. By degrees his abilities gained him so great reputation, that the famous Mr William Carstairs, Principal of the College of Edinburgh, invited him to accept of a Professor's chair in that kingdom, having himself been sent over to Holland on purpose to find a person qualified for such an office. But Mr Calamy declined this offer, and soon after returned into England (e). On his arrival, he went first to Oxford, carrying with him, letters from Professor Grævius to Dr Pocock, Regius Professor of Hebrew, and to Dr Edward Bernard, Savilian Professor of Astronomy in that University. These worthy persons received him with great civility, and obtained leave for him to prosecute his studies in the Bodleian library. He made the utmost use of this and all the other advantages he enjoyed at Oxford, particularly the improving conversation of the most learned Mr Henry Dodwell, with whom he was intimately acquainted (f). Mr Calamy had by this time determined to apply himself particularly to Divinity, which he did with great steadiness and industry. After studying the Scriptures thoroughly, and acquiring considerable knowledge in Ecclesiastical History, and the works of the primitive Fathers, he began to enquire into later controversies, particularly, that between the Church of England and the Nonconformists, and after a long and sober examination of what had been written on both sides, he resolved to join himself to the latter. In consequence of this choice, he preached sometimes in Oxford, and more frequently in the adjacent villages, 'till in the year 1692, he was invited to assist Mr Matthew Sylvester at his meeting-house in Black-Friars (g). There he continued to preach two years before he received Presbyterian Ordination. At length, on June 22, 1694, he was ordained at Dr Annesley's Meeting-house in Little St Helens (h). He was soon after invited to become assistant to Mr Daniel Williams in Hand-alley. October 20, 1702, he was appointed one of the Lecturers at Salter's Hall; and in 1703, he was chosen to succeed Mr Vincent Alfop, as Pastor of a great Congregation in Westminster (i). He had recommended himself in a very particular manner to the whole Dissenting interest, first by the care he had taken in publishing Mr Baxter's History of his Life and Times, and then in making a very useful Abridgment of it, which he afterwards improved into a much larger and more valuable work [C]. This however exposed him to some attacks, in which his book was treated

[A] In the succeeding part of his life. At Merchant-Taylor's school he entered into a close friendship with Mr Dawes (1), afterwards Sir William Dawes, and Archbishop of York; as also with Mr Hugh Boulter the late Primate of Ireland, and a most worthy person. At Wickham-Brook he became acquainted with Mr Timothy Godwin, one eminent in all kinds of learning, but especially for his knowledge of the Greek-tongue, at that time he was designed for the study of Physick, but his inclinations took afterwards another turn, and he applied himself so happily to Divinity, that he rose by degrees to the Archbishoprick of Cashel. With these great men he ever after maintained his friendship as long as he, and they, lived, which is a very full proof of his merit, as the contracting such acquaintances is a high instance of his penetration and judgment. A person of less sagacity would not have discovered these seeds of worth in them; and a man of less honour or integrity would have forfeited their esteem, especially if the wide difference in their opinions be considered.

[B] Very high stations in Church and State. These were Charles Lord Spencer, afterwards the famous Earl of Sunderland, who was long Secretary of State in the reign of Queen Anne, afterwards held the same post in the reign of King George I. 'till he was made President of the Council, First Lord Commissioner of the Treasury, and Prime Minister; and Mr Charles Trinnell, then tutor to Lord Spencer, and afterwards successively Bishop of Norwich and Winchester. With these he maintained his friendship as long as they lived (2).

[C] A much larger and more valuable work. The History of this celebrated performance runs thus. In 1696, it was thought proper to put to the press his Narrative of the most memorable Passages of his Life and Times, a large folio; to render which more useful, our author drew up the Table of Contents, made some remarks on the Work itself, and added to it an Index. This led him to reflect seriously on the authority and usefulness of the book; and to see the expediency of continuing it, for Mr Baxter's History came no lower than 1684. Upon this plan Mr Calamy, with great industry and labour, composed the piece of which we are now speaking, and published it under the following title: An Abridgment of Mr Baxter's History of his Life and Times. With an Account of many others of those worthy Ministers who were ejected after the Restoration of King Charles II. Their Apology for themselves

(a) As appears by the foregoing article.

(b) Funeral Sermon upon the Death of Edmund Calamy, D. D. with some Account of his Life and Character by Daniel Mayo, M. A. p. 20.

(c) See these points more fully explained in the notes.

(d) Funeral Sermon before cited, p. 21.

(e) From the Account given by Mr Carstairs himself.

(f) See the article DODWELL (HENRY) in this Dictionary.

(g) Funeral Sermon before cited, p. 23.

(h) See his Abridgment of the Life of Baxter, Vol. IV. p. 635.

(i) Funeral Sermon before cited, p. 24.

(1) From the Funeral Sermon cited in the text, p. 20.

(2) Id. ib. p. 27.

treated with great marks of deference and respect. In his answers, Mr Calamy shewed the highest regard to decency and to the dignity of his subject, so that very few disputes of this nature have been managed with greater clearness and strength of argument, or with less offence [D]. His reputation being much increased by the skill and learning he had shewn in this dispute, he was invited into Scotland, whither he went in 1709, and was entertained wherever he came with the highest remarks of respect, and had the dignity of Doctor in Divinity conferred on him by the Universities of Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and Glasgow (k). In 1718, he wrote a Vindication of his grandfather and several other worthy persons, against the reflections thrown upon them by Mr Archdeacon Echar'd, in his History (l) [E]. In 1728, he completed his great design of preserving the History of such Ministers, Lecturers, Masters, and Fellows of Colleges, &c. as were ejected and silenced after the Restoration. A work of prodigious industry and labour, and which is alone sufficient to transmit his memory with honour to posterity, as it has supplied the learned world with a noble collection of memoirs, which otherwise, in all probability, had been dissipated and lost (m) [F]. He distinguished himself by many other learned and useful writings, as well as by a constant and painful Ministry, which made his loss greatly regretted, not only by the Dissenters, but also by the moderate members of the established Church, both Clergy and Laity, with many of whom he lived in great intimacy. He died, June 3, 1732, in the sixtieth year of his age, having been twice married, and leaving six children behind him (n). His funeral sermon was preached by Mr Daniel Mayo (o), in which he has given us a great and very deserved character of Dr Calamy, viz: that he was a person of sound judgment, extensive learning, sincere piety, of a candid

(k) Ibid. p. 26.

(l) See a farther Account of the Work in the notes.

(m) See his Prefaces to the first and third Volume of his Abridgment of the Life of Baxter.

(n) Funeral Sermon before cited, p. 28, 29.

(o) Printed at London, 1732, in 8vo.

and

selves and their Adherents; containing the Grounds of their Nonconformity and Practice, as to stated and occasional Communion with the Church of England; and a Continuation of their History till the Year 1691. By Edmund Calamy, Edm. Fil. & Nepos. London, 1702, 8vo. This work made a great noise in the world, and as it gave offence to some, so it gave great satisfaction to others; inasmuch that, as it's author tells us, he received thanks for it from several quarters, and such notices and helps towards completing his design, that he had quickly materials enough for a second edition, which he afterwards published, and in the Preface thereto, gives us the following account of alterations and additions. 'In this second edition, besides several not inconsiderable marginal additions all along by way of confirmation and elucidation; and an account of several controversial writings on both sides, inserted in their proper places, and remarks on those passages in the third volume of the Compleat History of England, in folio, which unkindly reflect on the persons, or cause, of the Nonconformists, there is a continuation of the History through King William's reign, and Queen Anne's, down to the passing the Occasional Bill the last year. These additions make up a full third part of the present volume. They contain, among other things, some account of the concessions of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in 1689; the carriage of the Dissenters after their liberty, their differences among themselves, and their treatment from their brethren of the Church of England: The whole controversy about Occasional Conformity: The differences of those of the Established Church among themselves, about the nature, power, and privileges of Convocations, &c. with a faithful representation of the substance of several treatises about Toleration, Church power, Liberty, and divers Ecclesiastical Matters, that were published from 1688 to 1711. And, in the close, I have subjoined the Reformed Liturgy, which was drawn up and presented to the Bishops in 1661; that the world may judge how fairly the ejected Ministers have been often represented as irreconcilable enemies to all Liturgies.' This edition he published in 1713, in two volumes 8vo, and dedicated it to the then Duke of Devonshire, to whom, when Marquis of Hartington, he had dedicated the first edition.

[D] Or with less offence.] 'Mr Ollyffe in 1703, published his Defence of Ministerial Conformity to the Church of England, in answer to the Misrepresentations of the Terms thereof, by Mr Calamy, in the 10th Chapter of his Abridgment of the History of Mr Baxter's Life and Times. London. 8vo. pag. 147. And the same year Mr Hoadley published his Reasonableness of Conformity to the Church of England, represented to the dissenting Ministers, in answer to the 10th Chapter of Mr Calamy's Abridgment of Mr Baxter's History of his Life and Times. London 1703. 8vo. pag. 160. And soon after appeared the Second Part of his Reasonableness of Conformity. London 1703. 8vo. pag. 232. In answer to these treatises, Mr Calamy published the same year, A Defence of moderate Nonconformity; in answer to the Reflections of Mr Ollyffe, and Mr Hoadley, on the 10th Chapter of the Abridgment of the Life of the Reverend Mr Richard Baxter, Part I. with a Postscript, containing some Remarks on a Tract of Mr Dorrington's, entitled, The Dissenting Ministry in Religion censured and condemned from the Holy Scriptures. London 1703. 8vo. pag. 261. Some passages in this book relating to Re-ordination, were inadvertently upon, in a Preservative against Separation from the Church of England, wherein the Unlawfulness of it is proved, and the chief objections of the Dissenters answered. Directed to his Parishioners. By Solomon Pagis, Rector of Farnborough in Somersetshire. London, 1704. 8vo. Soon after appeared Mr Hoadley's Serious Admonition to Mr Calamy, occasioned by the first part of his Defence of moderate Nonconformity. London 1703. 8vo. pag. 54. The year following Mr Calamy published the Second Part of his Defence of moderate Nonconformity, &c. with an Introduction about the true State of the present Controversy between the Church and Dissenters; and a Postscript, containing an Answer to Mr Hoadley's Serious Admonition, and some Remarks on a Letter of a nameless Author, said to be a congregational Minister in the country. London 1704. 8vo. pag. 414. and afterwards the third Part of his Defence; to which are added, Three Letters, one to Mr Ollyffe, in answer to his Second Defence on Ministerial Conformity: Another to Mr Hoadley, in answer to his Defence of the Reasonableness of Conformity; and a third to the author from Mr Radnick of Lynn in Norfolk, giving an account of his Nonconformity. London 1705. 8vo. In 1707 Mr Hoadley published his Defence of Episcopal Ordination, in 8vo. To this piece our author drew up a Reply, both as to the argumentative and historical part of it, but forbore printing it, as himself tells us (3), that he might not give his antagonist any disturbance in the pursuit of that political contest, in which he was so happily engaged, and so much to the satisfaction of the true lovers of his country.

[E] By Mr Archdeacon Echar'd in his history.] The title of this piece at large runs thus. A Letter to Mr Archdeacon Echar'd, upon occasion of his History of England; wherein the true Principles of the Revolution are defended; the Whigs and Dissenters vindicated; several Persons of Distinction cleared from Aspersions; and a Number of Historical Mistakes rectified. London, 1718. 8vo. To this piece there was an answer written, which, however, did not appear weighty enough to make a Reply necessary, and so the dispute dropt.

[F] Had been dissipated and lost.] The entire Title of this great work is this. A Continuation of the Account of the Ministers, Lecturers, Masters, and Fellows, and benevolent temper, and very moderate with regard to differences in point of Religion.

(3) Abridgment of Baxter's Life, Vol. I. p. 715.

of Colleges, and Schoolmasters, who were ejected and silenced after the Restoration in 1660, by, or before, the Act for Uniformity. To which is added, The Church and Dissenters compared as to Persecution, in some Remarks of Dr Walker's attempt to recover the Names and Sufferings of the Clergy that were sequestered, &c. between 1640 and 1660. And also some free Remarks on the twenty-eighth Chapter of Dr Bennet's Essay on the XXXIX Articles of Religion. In two volumes. London, 1727. E

CALDERWOOD (DAVID), a very famous Divine of the Church of Scotland, and a very eminent writer in behalf of the Presbyterians, in the beginning of the XVIIth century. It is not a little strange, considering the great figure our author made in his own time, and the high reputation his writings have been in since his death, that we find no mention made of him by such as have professed a desire of preserving the memories of eminent men of that country. All we are able to learn of him, is, that he descended from a very good family in that kingdom, and being from his youth designed for the Ministry, he applied himself with great diligence to the study of Divinity, more especially to that of the Scriptures in their original tongues, with the assistance of the best commentaries, the works of the Fathers, the Councils, and the best writers on Church-History antient and modern (a). His great learning, even when he was but a young man, rendered him highly esteemed, as his warm zeal for the established Church of Scotland, as it then stood without Bishops, made him extremely welcome to most of the Ministers; so that he was settled about the year 1604, at Crelling, not far from Jedburgh, in the South of Scotland (b), where, by a very regular and unblameable life, as well as a very pious and diligent application to the duties of his function, he became much beloved and greatly revered by all such as concurred with him in opinion. King James the VIth of that country, and First of Great Britain, being inclined to bring the Church of Scotland to a conformity with that of England, at least as near as possible, laboured earnestly to restore the episcopal authority, and to enlarge the power of the Bishops that were then in that kingdom (c). Against this many of the Ministers set themselves with great heat and vehemence, and none more earnestly than Mr David Calderwood, who at the time Mr James Law, then Bishop of Orkney, came to visit the the Presbyteries of the Merse and Tiviodale, declined his jurisdiction, by a paper under his hand, dated May 5, 1608 (d), which was the first publick mark he gave of that opposition, which he afterwards supported with so much warmth, and which was the occasion of all his subsequent troubles and misfortunes. The King, who was strongly bent on the carrying his design into execution, made use, for that purpose, of the Earl of Dunbar, then Lord High-Treasurer of Scotland, whom he sent into that kingdom, attended by Dr Abbot, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, and two other Divines, with instructions to take all imaginable pains, to persuade both the Ministry and Laity, of his Majesty's sincere desire to promote the good of the Church, and of his zeal for the Protestant religion (e). The Divines, before mentioned, discharged their duty with all the industry imaginable, and the Lord Treasurer showed his fidelity to his Master, by doing all that was possible for him to do in promoting this great work, for which he hath been transmitted in very different lights to posterity (f) [A]. It does not appear that Mr Calderwood

affitted

[A] For which he hath been transmitted in very different lights to posterity.] This great Statesman, and able Minister, George Hume Earl of Dunbar, was not only in great favour with the King his Master, but stood much better with the English nation than almost any of the King's countrymen beside. It was for this reason that the King created him, first, Baron Hume of Berwick, which was an English honour (1), and afterwards Earl of Dunbar in Scotland; and as he was Lord High-Treasurer of this kingdom, so he was, at the same time, Chancellor of the Exchequer in England (2). He was looked upon as the only man capable of managing Church affairs in Scotland, and was therefore sent down Commissioner, in 1606, to the Assembly that was held at Lithlingow; he also held a Parliament at Perth, and his conduct there is, by a Reverend Prelate (3), much commended. At this time he procured the settling constant Moderators, which was a great step to the restoring episcopal authority: but Sir James Balfour (4) tells us, that his Lordship distributed the sum of forty thousand marks amongst the most needy, and the most clamorous, of the Ministers, and thereby carried this point, as appeared afterwards in his accounts. But however he carried it, it highly recommended him to his master, who sent him down again to Scotland in 1608, where he did him further service, for which he was, on his return, made Knight of the Garter. In 1610, he went down the third time to compleat his work, and upon his coming back to Court, had many acknowledgments made him, both by the King and by the Clergy. But if we may trust Mr Calderwood, in the midst of all his prosperity, one of the great men of his party foretold his end; his account of the matters runs thus (5). 'A little after the Assembly holden at Glasgow, James Colvine, a Scottish gentleman, visiting Mr Andrew Melvine in the Tower, found him so pensive and melancholy, that he got no speech of him for a space: at length he brake forth in these words: That man (meaning Dunbar) that hath overthrown that Kirk, and the liberties of Christs kingdom there, shall never have that grace to set his foot in that kingdom again. As he foretold so it came to pass, and Dunbar ended his life the next January following at Whitehall.' The Lord Treasurer was in a very bad state of health when he came back from Scotland, and continued declining 'till the 29th of January, 1611, when he departed this life; and his body being carried down to Scotland, was buried in the collegiate church of Dunbar, where a magnificent monument was erected to his memory (6). Our author's character of him, and account of his decease, is very singular. 'The Earl of Dunbar, says he, a chief instrument employed for the overthrow of the discipline of our Kirk, departed this life at Whitehall, the penult of January. So he was pulled down from the height of his honour, when he was about to solemnize magnificently his daughter's marriage with the Lord Walden. He purposed to keep St George's day after in Berwick, where he had almost finished a sumptuous and glorious palace, which standeth yet as a monument to testify, that the curse which was pronounced against the rebuilders of Jericho was executed upon him. Of all that he conquered in Scotland, there is not left to his posterity

(5) Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 639.

(6) Crawford's Lives of the Great Officers of State in Scotland, p. 399.

(a) See the Epistle to the Reader, prefixed to Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland.

(b) Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 497, 573.

(c) Spotwood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 507. History of the Presbyterians, p. 280, 281.

(d) Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 573.

(e) Spotwood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 510.

(f) See th' point fully explained in the notes.

(1) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. 11. p. 419.

(2) Crawford's Lives of the Great Officers of State, p. 397.

(3) Spotwood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 496.

(4) Manuscript Annals of the Hist. of Scotland, preserved in the Library of the University of Glasgow, Vol. 1. p. 335.

assisted at the general assembly held at Glasgow, June 8, 1610, in which the Earl of Dunbar presided as Commissioner; but it appears plainly from his own writings, that he looked upon every thing transacted there as null and void (g). Another general assembly was held on the thirteenth of August 1616, with great solemnity at Aberdeen, where many things were done, against which exceptions were taken by Mr Calderwood and his party. In May 1617, King James went to Scotland, and on the seventeenth of June following, the Parliament met at Edinburgh, and at the same time the Clergy had their meeting in one of the churches, to hear and advise with the Bishops; which kind of assembly it seems was contrived in imitation of the Convocation in England, with which Mr David Calderwood was so little satisfied, that he declared his mind there publicly; which was, that he did not take any such meetings to resemble a Convocation; and finding himself opposed by Dr Whitford and Dr Hamilton, who were friends to the Bishops, he took his leave of them in these words, 'It is absurd to see men sitting in silks and satins, and to cry poverty in the Kirk, when purity is departing (h).' In the mean time the Parliament proceeded in dispatching several matters relating to ecclesiastical as well as civil concerns; upon which many of the Ministers resolved to form a protestation, which was ordered to be put into writing by Mr Archibald Simpson, this was accordingly done, and the paper was signed by him on the behalf of the Ministers who signed another separate roll, which was delivered to him as his justification. The protest was then put into the hands of Mr Peter Hewat, who had a seat in Parliament, and was to present it; but another copy of it remained in the hands of Mr Archibald Simpson, to be presented in case any accident happened to the former. This affair soon made a great noise, and Dr Spotswood, Archbishop of St Andrews, seeing Mr Hewat at Court, desired to look upon the protest, and upon some dispute between them it was torn. The other copy was actually presented, by Mr Simpson, to the Clerk Register, who refused to read it before the States in Parliament. Soon after, that assembly was dissolved, and Mr Simpson was summoned before the High Commission Court, where the roll of names, which he had received for his justification, was demanded from him; and upon his declaring that he had given it to Mr Harrison, who had since delivered it to Mr David Calderwood, he was sent prisoner to the Castle of Edinburgh, and Mr Calderwood summoned to appear before the High Commission Court at St Andrews, on the eighth of July following, there to exhibit the said roll, and to answer for his mutinous and seditious behaviour (i) [B]. He accordingly went thither, and on the twelfth of July the King came to that city in person, and soon after Mr Peter Hewat and Mr Archibald Simpson, were deprived and imprisoned for the share they had in this transaction. After this Mr Calderwood was called upon, to answer for the concern he had in this affair, and as we have his own account of the matter, it is probable that the reader will be better pleased to see it in his own words, than in any dress we can give it [C]. The

(g) Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 636, 638.

(h) Idem, ibid: p. 676.

(i) Spotswood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 534.

issue

1) Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 644.

3) Spotswood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 516.

'so much as a foot breadth of land (7).' We have a very different character of this nobelman from the pen of an eminent prelate (8). 'He was a man, says that learned author, of deep wit, few words, and, in his Majesty's service, no less faithful than fortunate: The most difficult affairs he compassed without any noise, and never returned, when he was employed, without the work performed he was sent to do.' The reader will judge from hence, of the difficulties that occur in writing Scotch lives.

[B] To answer for his mutinous and seditious behaviour. It is necessary to give the reader, though in as few words as possible, an account of the reason of this protest. The Ministers had an account that a bill was depending in Parliament, by which, power was given to the King, with the advice of the Archbishops, Bishops, and such a competent number of the Ministry, as his Majesty in his wisdom should think expedient, to consider and conclude, as to matters decent for the external policie of the Church not repugnant to the word of God, and that such conclusions should have the strength and power of ecclesiastical laws. Against this, the Ministers protested for four reasons, First, Because their Church was so perfect, that instead of needing reformation, it ought to be a pattern to others. Secondly, General Assemblies, as now established by law, and which ought always to continue, might, by this means, be overthrown. Thirdly, Because it might be a means of creating schism, and disturb the tranquillity of the Church. Fourthly, Because they had received assurances, that no attempts should be made to bring them to a conformity with the Church of England. They desired therefore, that for these, and other reasons, all thoughts of passing any such law may be laid aside; but in case this be not done, they protest for themselves, and their brethren who shall adhere to them, that they can yield no obedience to this law when it shall be enacted, because it is destructive of the liberty of the Church; and therefore shall submit to such penalties, and think themselves obliged to undergo such punishments, as may be inflicted for disobeying that law. This was the foundation of the prosecution against Mr Calderwood; but, however, this protestation, though not read, had it's effect; for notwithstanding the bill, or, as the Scottish phrase is, the article before-mentioned, had the consent of Parliament, yet the King thought fit to cause it to be laid aside, that there might be no foundation for receiving or reading the Ministers protestation, and soon after called a General Assembly at St Andrew's (9).

[C] In his words, than in any dress we can give it. We have this conference between our author and King James, largely and fully stated by him, and it gives a very clear view of the conduct of the Ministers in Scotland at that time, of which we have only short hints in our histories, so that we cannot well judge who is in the right, or who in the wrong; and therefore it is hoped the length of this passage will not render it tedious to the reader. 'Mr David Calderwood was called on, and the conclusion of the libels, or indictments, were read. To the first head he answered, That understanding that Mr Archibald Simpson was warded or imprisoned in the castle of Edinburgh for not presenting the roll of the names, he delivered it to him again. Neither had he time to seek any new subscriptions, nor could he, because he had not the protestation to present to the subscriber. The King demanded, what he had to answer to the other point, the assisting of that mutinous meeting? He answered, Sir, when that meeting shall be condemned as mutinous, then it is time to me to answer for my particular assistance. The Secretary said unto him, Mr David, acknowledge your own rashness. In the mean time, those that were standing about put upon him, and buzzed in his ear, saying, Do this; come in the King's will, you will find it best; his Majesty will pardon you. He answered to the Secretary, That which they had done, was done with deliberation. What moved you to protest? said the King. An article concluded among the Lords of the articles, and

(9) Spotswood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 530, 535.

(k) Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 686.

(l) Pierce's Vindication of the Dissenters, p. 175.

issue of this business, was, that the King being provoked by the inflexible temper and sharp answers of Mr Calderwood, first committed him prisoner, and then the Privy-Council, according to the power which at that time they exercised, directed him to banish himself out of the King's dominions before Michaelmas following, and not to return without licence; and upon his giving security for this purpose, he was discharged out of prison, and suffered to return to his parish, but he was forbid to preach (k). He followed the King however to Carlisle, to obtain a prorogation of the time of his banishment, which he could not do, and then he applied to the Council and to the Bishops, who promised to write in his favour; but, as he would not acknowledge his offence, or promise conformity for the future, he was obliged to quit the kingdom, which he accordingly did, and retired to Holland; but Mr Archibald Simpson made his submission and was restored. We have no account of the manner in which he passed his time in Holland, or how our author was provided for there; but, it is certain, that he adhered to his former principles steadily, and in the year 1623, he published his famous book, intituled Altare Damascenum (l) [D]. This made answered Mr David. But what fault was there in it? asked the King. It cutteth off our General Assemblies, answered Mr David. After the King had enquired how long he had been a Minister, he said to him, Hear me, Mr David, I have been an older keeper of General Assemblies than you. A General Assembly serveth to preserve doctrine in purity, from error and heresy, the Kirk from schism, to make confessions of faith, to put up petitions to the King in Parliament. But as for matters of order, rites, and things indifferent in Kirk policie, they may be concluded by the King with advice of Bishops, and a choice number of Ministers. Next, what is a General Assembly but a convened number of Ministers? He answered, as to the first point, Sir, a General Assembly should serve, and our General Assemblies have served these fifty-six years, not only for preserving doctrine from error and heresy, &c. but also to make canons and constitutions of all rites and orders belonging to the Kirk. As for the second point, as by a competent number of Ministers may be meant a General Assembly, so also may be meant a fewer number of Ministers than may make up a General Assembly. It was ordained in the General Assembly, with your Majesty's own consent, your Majesty being present, that there should be Commissioners chosen out of every Presbytery, not exceeding the number of three, to be sent to a General Assembly, and so the competent number of Ministers is already defined. What needeth farther then, said the King, but to have protested for a declarature, what was meant by a competent number? He answered, in pleading for the liberty of the General Assembly, we did that in effect. Then the King having the protestation in his hand, challengeth him for some words of the last clause. He answered, Whatsoever was the phrase of speech, they meant no other thing but to protest, that they would give passive obedience to his Majesty, but could not give active obedience to any unlawful thing which should flow from that article. Active and passive obedience! saith the King. That is, we will rather suffer than practise, said Mr David. I will tell thee what is obedience, man, said the King. The Centurion, when he said to his servants, To this man, go, and he goeth; to that man, come, and he cometh: That is obedience. He answered, To suffer, Sir, is also obedience, howbeit not of that same kind; and that obedience also was not absolute, but limited with exception of a countermand from a superior power. Mr David, let alone; confess your error, said the Secretary. He answered, My Lord, I cannot see that I have committed any fault. Then said the King, Well, Mr Calderwood, I will let you see that I am gracious and favourable. That meeting shall be condemned before ye be condemned; all that are in the roll shall be siled before ye be siled, providing ye will conform. Sir, I have answered my libel; replied Mr David, I ought to be urged with no farther. The King said, It is true, man, ye have answered to your libel; but consider I am here, I may demand of you when and what I will. He answered, Surely, Sir, I get great wrong if I be compelled to answer here in judgment to any more than my libel. Answer! Sir, said the King, ye are a refractor: The Bishop of Glasgow your Ordinary, and Bishop of Cathness the Moderator of your Presbytery, testify ye have kept no order, ye have repaired neither to Presbyteries nor Synods, and in no wise conform? He answered, Sir, I have been confined these eight or nine years; so my conformity or not conformity, in that point, could not be well known. Good faith! thou art a very knave, said the King: See these same false Puritans, they are ever playing with equivocations. Mr David had alleged his confinement to avoid a direct answer, because he was urged with other points than was contained in the libel. The Bishop of Glasgow, thinking to catch him in a snare, asked him, If ye was confined, how were ye at the meeting in the school where ye subscribed the protestation? He answered, Since I was confined I obtained liberty, which was granted with exception of Presbyteries and Synods: That meeting was neither a Presbytery nor a Synod. Then some speeches past betwixt him and Glasgow about the relaxation, which was proclaimed for the confined within the diocese of Glasgow. Then the King asked, If ye were relaxed will ye obey or not? He answered, Sir, I am wronged, in that I am forced to answer such questions which are beside the libel: Yet, seeing I must answer, I say, Sir, I shall either obey you, or give a reason wherefore I disobey; and if I disobey, your Majesty knows I am to lie under the danger as I do now. Then said the King, remembering of his answer before, That is, to obey either actively or passively. I can go no farther, said Mr David; and so he was removed (10). Upon his being called in again, he was suspended 'till October, and threatened with deprivation; but Mr Calderwood questioning the power of the Bishops to suspend him in the High Commission-Court, the King ordered him to be sent prisoner to the Tolbooth of St Andrew's, from whence he was afterwards removed to Edinburgh.

[D] Intituled, Altare Damascenum.] We have a particular detail of the subject of this treatise, and the reason and manner of it's being published by the author of the Preface prefixed to the true History of the Church of Scotland: his words are these, 'Mr David Calderwood, whose praise is in the Churches of Christ, as otherwise, so particularly upon the account of his being, but under another and borrowed name of Edwardus Didacavius, the author of that very learned and elaborate treatise, intituled, Altare Damascenum, wherein he doth by Scripture, Reason, and Fathers, irrefragably and unanswerably (and indeed for any thing we know it hath not been answered to this day, nor belike will afterward) demonstrate the iniquity of designing, and endeavouring to model and conform the divinely simple worship, discipline, and government of the Church of Scotland, to the pattern of the pompously prelatick and ceremonious Church of England: under some conviction whereof, it seems King James himself was, though implacably displeased with it, when being after the reading of it somewhat pensive, and being asked the reason by an English Prelate standing by, and observing it, told him, he had seen and read such a book; whereupon the Prelate willing His Majesty not to suffer that to trouble him, for they would answer it, he replied, not without some passion, What ——— will you answer, man? There is nothing here than Scripture, Reason, and Fathers (11). A very well-known writer, after citing the greatest part of this account, is pleased to add, That His Majesty was not in his judgment, the patron of Episcopacy having

(10) Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 682.

(11) See the Preface prefixed Calderwood's true History of the Church of Scotland.

made a great noise, and was soon brought to the hands of King James, who is said to have expressed a high opinion of it, tho' he was extremely displeas'd with it. It is certain that it made a great impression in England, and was very much admir'd by all the declar'd Puritans, and by such as were well-wishers to their opinions. It was probably the great reputation of this book, that put one Mr Patrick Scot, if Mr Calderwood himself may be believ'd, upon a very strange undertaking; our author it seems had been afflict'd in the year 1624 with a long fit of sickness, and nothing being heard of him for some time; Scot took it for granted that he was dead, and thereupon wrote a Recantation in his name, as if before his decease he had chang'd his sentiments; but this imposture being detect'd, he went over in the month of November to Holland, and stay'd three weeks at Amsterdam, where he made diligent search for our author, with a design, as Mr Calderwood believeth; to have dispatch'd him (m). This Scot had the boldness to give out, that the King furnish'd him with the matter for his pretended recantation, and that he only put it in order; but surely a man, who could have the impudence to write a death-bed recantation; for a reverend Minister, and publish it in his name, deserves no credit, when he endeavours to fasten such an aspersion upon a Sovereign Prince (n). It seems the reason that he did not meet with Mr Calderwood in Holland, was, because he privately return'd into his own country, where he remained for several years; and as a man of his temper and talents could not be idle, it is very likely that he wrote several other books against the proceedings of the Clergy in Scotland (o) [E]. But it is very certain, that he collect'd with extraordinary diligence, all the memorials relating to the ecclesiastical affairs of that kingdom, from the

(m) Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 802.

(n) Remarks on the Conduct of the Scotch Presbyterians, during the Reigns of Queen Mary, King James, and King Charles, p. 327.

(o) Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 814.

beginning

having never yet answer'd it, how much soever their cause requires it (12).

The old edition of this celebrated treatise being become extremely scarce, and being withal, from the manner in which it was printed, very imperfect and incorrect, a new one was published about forty years ago, under the following title: ALTARE DAMASCENUM: seu Ecclesie Anglicanae Politia, Ecclesie Scoticae obrusio, a Formalista quadam delineata; illustrata & examinata, sub nomine olim Edwardi Didoclavii, Studio & Opera Davidis Calderwood. Cui locis suis interfertur Confutatio Paræneseos Tileni ad Scotos Genevensis ut ait Disciplina Zelotas. Et adjecta Epistola Hieronymi Philadelphii de Regimine Ecclesie Scoticae ejusque, Vindiciae contra Calumnias Johannis Spotvodi Fani Andreae Pseudo-Archi-Episcopi per Anonymum. Editio priori longe elegantior & emendatior Lugduni Batavorum apud Cornelium Botesteyn, 1708, 4to. i. e. 'The ALTAR at DAMASCUS: or, The Policy of the Church of England, intended to be obruded on the Church of Scotland, delineated by some Lover of Ceremonies, illustrated and examined by the Study and Care of David Calderwood, heretofore published by him under the name of Edward Didoclavius. With a Confutation of the Admonition of Tilenus to the Scots, whom he styles Bigots to the Discipline of Geneva, interspersed in their proper places. To which is added, the Epistle of Jerom Philadelphus, of the Government of the Church of Scotland, with a Vindication thereof against the Calumnies of John Spotswood, pretended Archbishop of St Andrews', written by an anonymous author. More elegant and correct than the former edition.' In this large work, The Description of the Policy of the English Church, the author of which Mr Calderwood does not pretend to know, is made the text, and his own discourses are digested into the form of notes, by which means the reader has the whole controversy in one view, and in as regular a method as could well be contriv'd. This work is divided into fifteen chapters: 1. Of the King's Supremacy, and of the Jurisdiction of the Royal Commissioners in Causes Ecclesiastical. 2. Of the Ranks of Bishops. 3. Of the Dignity and Power of Archbishops in England. 4. That a Bishop and a Presbyter are one and the same Order. 5. Of the Dignity and Power of Bishops in the English Church. 6. Of Vicar-Generals, Officials, and Archdeacons. 7. Of Suffragans and Rural Deans. 8. Of Deans and Chapters. 9. Of Rites and Ceremonies. 10. Of the Calling and Function of Presbyters or Priests in the Church of England. 11. Of the Calling and Function of Deacons. 12. Of Lay-Administrators in the Church of England. 13. Of Possessions. 14. Of Constitutions. 15. Against the Injuries and Calumnies vent'd by Tilenus. Some of these chapters are entirely of Mr Calderwood's writing, particularly the fourth, and these are thrown in as supplements to the discourses of the author whom he examines, and the great thing aimed at by this way of writing, is to shew his impartiality, by bringing to the view of the reader, the representation of the policy of the Church of England, in the words of a friend to, and advocate for, that kind of ecclesiastical government. It must be admitted, that though there is something very singular in this manner of writing, yet it is not without it's conveniences, as it gives him an opportunity of bringing the whole controverfy within a reasonable compass, and discussing every part of it methodically and perspicuously. But by pursuing this plan, he has certainly made it very difficult to refute his book, for whoever attempts that; must not write by way of answer but of reply, and in that case he is under a necessity of building upon another man's foundation, that is to say, the author of the Description of the Policy of the Church of England, which Calderwood made it his business to refute, and perhaps this may be one reason, why this treatise was never answer'd in form by any of the Divines of the Established Church. But the several points which are therein handled, have been discuss'd over and over, and most of the arguments made use of by Mr Calderwood, have been employ'd for the same purpose by the most eminent among the modern English Nonconformists. One thing more it will be necessary to remark, before we part with this celebrated work, and it is this, that the Nomme de Guerre our author made use of, viz. EDWARDUS DIDOCLAIVS, is no more than a transposition of the letters of his own name, DAVIDUS CALDERWOODIUS; so that if he might be said in one sense to disguise, he might in another be affirm'd to divulge, it's falling from his pen.

[E] Wrote several other books against the proceedings of the Clergy in Scotland. I must confess, that this is no better than conjecture, grounded upon the following passage in his History, which seems to hint, that the same person who wrote the Altar of Damascus, was the author of some, if not all the treatises that are mentioned therein; but in respect to this, I leave every reader to judge for himself: 'Upon the fourth of January 1625, there was a proclamation made at the Cross of Edinburgh, making mention, that there were sundry seditious persons who had written certain pamphlets and books tending to treason and sedition against the King, which were printed in the Low-Countries, and were to be brought to Scotland. Therefore commanding all Magistrates of sea-ports, Customers, Searchers, and other officers, to suffer no ships coming forth of the Low-Countries to come within the harbours, or any Merchant or passenger to come on land 'till the ships were first searched, for these seditious writs, pamphlets and books, and that the same be presented to the Lords to be searched by such as were appointed for that effect. But by the providence of God, the books were brought out of the ship a day or two before it was searched, and were kept close 'till the approaching of Easter Communion; to wit, An Epistle to a Christian Brother, An Exhortation to the Kirk of Edinburgh, A Dispute against communicating, where there was kneeling, Confusion of Gestures and Actions. The course of

(12) Pierce's Vindication of the Dissenters, p. 175, 176.

beginning of the Reformation there down to his own time, which he digested with much accuracy, according to the order of time; and these collections of his are still in being, tho' an extract only from them has been published, under the title of The true History of the Church of Scotland (p) [F]. How long after this he survived does not appear, for his history reaches no lower than the death of King James; but, it seems probable, from his mentioning the death of Mr Robert Bruce, which happened in 1631 (q), that he lived pretty far in the reign of King Charles I; and this we find confirmed by what is said in the advertisement prefixed to the last edition of the Altare Damascenum, of his being Minister at Pencaithland near Edinburgh in 1638, but neither there or elsewhere can we find any notice of the time of his decease. He was certainly a man of quick parts and profound learning, as fully appears from his conduct in his writings, and therefore it is but just that an account should be given of him in a collection of this nature, more especially as this article will inform the English reader of the nature of those disputes in Scotland, which, tho' he had so large a share in them, are but very briefly represented by Archbishop Spotswood, and are far from being fairly or distinctly treated by the famous Dr Heylyn. It is not necessary that we should attempt to give any character of this extraordinary person, since the reader will be abundantly able to frame one for himself, from the matters of fact which we have delivered, and therefore we shall content ourselves with adding, that all the writers on the side of Nonconformity, have set a very high value upon his performances; and

(p) Printed in the year 1613, fol. without the Printer's name or the place.

(q) Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 826.

of Conformity was set forth two years before, and the Latin book, intituled, Altare Damascenum; and two other years before, The Speech of the Kirk to her beloved Children, The Altar of Damascus, in English, and The Confutation of Doctor Mitchelson's Reasons for kneeling. The Antithesis between the Pastor and the Prelate, came not to light, 'till four or five years after this (13).

(13) Calderwood's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 814.

[F] Under the title of the true History of the Church of Scotland. The entire work of Mr David Calderwood, very neatly transcribed in six fair volumes in folio, by the care of Mr William Dunlopp, Principal of the College of Glasgow, are preserved in the publick library of that University. In the first volume immediately after the title page, there is the following note, 'This work comprehended in — pages, is collected out of Mr Knox's History and his Memorials, gathered for the continuation of his History out of Mr James Melvil's Observations, Mr John Davidson's Diary, the Acts of the General Assemblies, and Acts of Parliament, and out of several Proclamations, and Scroles of diverse: and comprehendeth an History from the beginning of the reign of King James V, to the death of King James VI, but is contracted and digested in a better order, in a work of three volumes, bound in parchment, and is comprehended in 2013 pages. Out of which work contracted, is extracted another in lesser bounds, but wanting nothing in substance, and comprehended in — pages, which the author desireth only to be communicated to others, and this with the other, contracted into three volumes to serve only for the defence of the third, and preservation of the History, in case it be lost.' The first of the six volumes, gives a large introduction, wherein the author undertakes to inform us of the time when, and the persons by whom the island of Great Britain was first inhabited: and afterwards brings down the Scottish Civil History as well as the Ecclesiastical, from the first planting of Christianity to the end of James IVth's reign. After his account of the affairs of the State and the Church, we have a view of all the most considerable wars and battles (domestick and foreign) wherein the people of Scotland have been engaged before the said period, as also of the ancient honorary titles, and their institution. On this last head he quotes an old manuscript, sent from Icolmkill to Mr George Buchanan, which testifies that a Parliament was held at Forfar, in the year 1061, wherein surnames are appointed to be taken, and several Earls, Barons, Lords, and Knights, were created. After this general Preface, he begins his proper work, The History of the Scottish Reformation. And in this volume, advances as far as the marriage of Queen Mary, with the Lord Darnley, in the year 1565. In his story of Mr Patrick Hamilton, the protomartyr in this cause, he gives a copy of the sentence pronounced against him, together with a congratulatory letter from the Doctors at Louvain to the Archbishop of St Andrews, on the occasion of his death. Amongst those learned men, who upon the first persecution fled into Germany, he reckons Mr George Buchanan. In his large account of the Disputes and Sufferings of the Reformers, under the Administration of Cardinal Beaton, and the Queen-Regent, we have the particulars of the contentions at Frankfurt, which are mostly taken out of a book, intituled, A Brief Discovery of the Troubles of Mr John Knox, for opposing the English Service Book, in 1554. After which we have Knox's Appeal from the sentence of the Clergy; to the Nobility, Estates, and Community of Scotland, with a great many letters from the Nobility to the Queen-Regent and him, on the subject of Religion. All this part of the History, which in the printed book makes no more than thirteen pages, ends at pag 571; from whence (to the end of the book at pag. 902) there is a good collection of curious Letters, Remonstrances, &c. which are not in the prints, either of Knox or Calderwood. The second volume, contains the History, from 1565, to the arraignment of the Earl of Moreton for treason, in December 1580, and contains 614 pages, wherein are many valuable discoveries relating to the practices of David Rizzio, the King's murder, Bothwell's marriage and flight, &c. and a more perfect Narrative of the proceedings in the General Assemblies, than the printed History will afford us. The third volume, comprehends the entire History of both Church and State, from the beginning of January 1581 to July 1586, when Queen Mary's Letter to Babington was intercepted. Under the year 1584, there is a severe character of Mr Patrick Adamson, Archbishop of St Andrews (14); which in the conclusion refers us for a farther account of him, to a poem made by one Robert Semple, and intituled, The Legend of the Limer's Life. Here is also An Account of the State and Church of Scotland to the Church of Geneva, which was written by Andrew Melvil, in answer to the misrepresentations of the Scottish Discipline scattered in foreign Countries, by the said Archbishop Adamson. The fourth gives the like mixt history of affairs, from July 1586 to the beginning of the year 1596. Here we have a full collection of papers relating to the trial, condemnation, and execution, of the unfortunate Queen Mary, with abundance of others, touching the most remarkable transactions of this Decennium. In the year 1587, there is a large account of the coming of the Sieur du Bartas into Scotland; of his being carried by King James to the University of St Andrews; his hearing of the Lectures of Mr A. Melvil there, and the great opinion he had of the abilities of that Professor, &c. In 1590, there are some smart reflections on Dr Bancroft's Sermon at Paul's Cross, censuring the proceedings of J. Knox, and others of the Northern Reformers, with the Assembly's Letter to Queen Elizabeth about that sermon. The fifth volume reaches from the beginning of January 1596, to the same month in 1607. After the accounts of the proceedings of the Assembly in 1596, the author subjoins this pathetick Epiphonema: Here end all the sincere Assemblies General of the Kirk of Scotland, enjoying the liberty of the Gospel under the free government of Christ. The new and constant Platt of Planting all the Kirks of Scotland (written by Mr David Lindsay, one of the Ofticiaries) is here inserted at large, as it was presented to the King and States in the said year 1596. The History of the Conspiracy of the Gowries, and the manner of it's discovery is likewise here recorded

(14) See the article ADAMSON (PATRICK) Archbishop of St Andrews.

(r) See his Advertisement prefixed to the first Vol. of his Abridgement of the Life of Baxter.

and the judicious Mr Calamy (r), has particularly pointed out his Altare Damascenum, as a capital work on that side of the question.

at length, in the same order, wherein the King commanded it to be published. The new form of Nomination to Bishopsricks, the Protestation in Parliament against the Restitution of Episcopacy, and the Reasons offered against it by others, are the remaining matters of consideration in this book. The sixth concludes with the death of King Jamés VI (15).

(15) Bishop Nicholson's Scottish Historical Library, p. 70, 71.

CALFHILL or CALFILL (JAMES), a learned Divine in the XVIth Century, otherwise named Calfield, Cawfield, Chalfhill (a), or Calfed (b), was born in Shropshire [A], in the year 1530 (c). He received his education at Eaton School, and from thence was sent, in 1545, to King's College in Cambridge. But he was removed, with many other Cambridge men, in 1548, to Christ-Church in Oxford, newly founded by King Henry VIII (d). Here he shewed himself to be a person of quick wit, and great capacity; being an excellent Poet and Author of a Tragedy, with other Theatrical performances (e). In 1549, he took his degree of Bachelor of Arts (f); and that of Master, in 1552 (g), being junior of the Act celebrated in St Mary's Church, July 18 (b). He was made, in 1500, Canon of the second Canonry in Christ-Church Cathedral Oxon. And, on the 12th of December 1561, took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity (i). In 1562, he was Proctor for the Clergy of London, and the Chapter of Oxford, in the Convocation that made the XXXIX Articles (k): and on the 16th of May, the same year, was admitted to the Rectory of St Andrew Wardrobe, London (l). The 4th of October following, he was presented by the Crown to be Prebend of St Pancras, in the Cathedral Church of St. Paul (m): and May the 4th, 1565, was collated by Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, to the Rectory of Bocking in Essex (n): as he was also, July the 16th following, to the Archdeaconry of Colchester in Essex, by Edmund Grindal, Bishop of London (o). The same year, on the 17th of December, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity (p). In 1568, he preached two sermons in Bristol Cathedral, on purpose to confute some opinions of Dr Cheney [B], who held that See in commendam (q). In the year 1569, he made application to Secretary Cecil, Chancellor of the University of Cambridge, for the Provostship of King's College, but Dr Goad's interest prevailed (r). Upon the translation of Dr Edwin Sandys from the Bishoprick of Worcester to that of London, in 1570, Dr Calfhill was nominated by Queen Elizabeth to succeed him (s); but, before his consecration thereto, he died, about the beginning of August, (having a little before resigned his Canonry of Christ-Church, and Rectory of St Andrew Wardrobe) and was buried in the Chancel of Bocking Church (t). His works were as follow: I. Querela Oxoniensis Academicæ ad Cantabrigiam; i. e. 'The Complaint of the University of Oxford to Cambridge.' Lond. 1552, 4to. A Latin Poem on the death of Henry and Charles Brandon, sons of Charles, Duke of Suffolk, which died of the sweating sickness in the Bishop of Lincoln's house at Bugden, July 14, 1551. II Historia de exhumatione Catharinæ, nuper uxoris Pet. Martyris. i. e. 'The History of the digging up the body of Catharine, late wife of Peter Martyr.' Lond. 1562, 8vo. III. Answer to John Martial's Treatise of the Cross, gathered out of the Scriptures, Councils, and ancient Fathers of the primitive Church (u). Lond. 1565, 4to. IV. Progne, a Tragedy, in Latin; which probably was never printed. V. Pœmata varia; several Poems (w). As to his character, we are informed, That he was in his younger days a noted Poet and Comedian; and in his elder, an exact disputant, and had an excellent faculty in speaking and preaching (x). One who had heard him preach, gives this account of him; 'His excellent tongue, and rhetorical tale, filled with good and wholesome doctrine, so ravished the minds of the hearers, that they were all in admiration of his eloquence (y).'

(a) So it is written in the Annals of the Reformat. &c. by J. Strype, Vol. I. second edit. 1725, p. 236, 237, 562.
 (b) Newcourt, Repertorium, Vol. I. p. 196.
 (c) He was 18 years of age in 1548. See Wood, Athenæ, edit. 1721, Vol. I. col. 163.
 (d) Ibid. and Strype's Annals, ubi supra, p. 330.
 (e) Wood, ibid.
 (f) Idem, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 73.
 (g) Ibid. col. 77.
 (h) Idem, Athenæ, ubi supra.
 (i) Ibid. and Fasti, col. 90. He was also some time Sub-Dean of Christ-church. Strype, ubi supra, p. 237.
 (k) Strype's Ann. ubi supra, p. 327.
 (l) Newcourt's Repertorium, Vol. I. p. 92, 272.
 (m) Ibid. p. 92, 196.
 (n) Ibid. p. 92, and Vol. II. p. 69.
 (o) Ibid. p. 92.
 (p) Wood, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 95.
 (q) Annals, ubi supra.
 (r) Ibid. ubi supra, p. 327.
 (s) Ibid. ubi supra, p. 327.
 (t) Ibid. ubi supra, p. 327.
 (u) Ibid. ubi supra, p. 327.
 (v) Ibid. ubi supra, p. 327.
 (w) Ibid. ubi supra, p. 327.
 (x) Ibid. ubi supra, p. 327.
 (y) Ibid. ubi supra, p. 327.

(7) Strype's Ann. ubi supra, p. 559, 560, 562.
 (r) Ibid. p. 337.
 (s) Wood, Athenæ, ubi supra, and Hist. & Antiq. Univers. Oxon. lib. II. p. 263, edit. Oxon. 1674.
 (t) Ibid. and Newcourt, ubi supra, Vol. I. p. 92.
 (u) See Wood, Athen. Vol. I. col. 238.
 (w) Wood, Ath. Vol. I. col. 163.
 (x) Ibid.
 (y) Strype's Ann. Vol. I. p. 237.

[A] Was born in Shropshire.] Mr Strype affirms (1), That he was a Scotchman born; and cousin to Toby Matthews, afterwards Archbishop of York, whom he persuaded to take holy Orders, even against the inclination of his father and mother, and other friends. [B] On purpose to confute some opinions of Dr Cheney.] Dr Richard Cheney was Bishop of Gloucester, and held with it the See of Bristol in Commendam. By some persons he had been accused, of speaking irreverently of Calvin and Luther, on account of their notions of Free-will, &c. and of preferring much the ancient Fathers to them (2). Dr Calfhill, therefore, who was very orthodox, and a great admirer of all Calvin's opinions, was employed to confute him in his own Cathedral; and used in his sermons the new coined phrase of Free-willers. The Bishop desired to confer with him, but he never would wait upon him; which does not turn much to his credit (3).

(2) See Strype's Annals, Vol. I. p. 559, 565.
 (3) Ibid. p. 564.

CALVERT (GEORGE), descended from the ancient and noble house of Calvert in the Earldom of Flanders (a), and afterwards created Lord Baltimore, was born at Kipling in the North-riding of Yorkshire (b), about the year 1582 (c); being the son of Leonard Calvert, and Alice his wife, daughter of John Croftland of Croftland in the same county. In the beginning of the year 1593, he became a Commoner of Trinity-College in Oxford, being then very young (d); and on the 23d of February 1596-7, took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (e): after which leaving the college, he travelled beyond the seas for

(a) Irish Compendium, third edit. 1735, 12mo, p. 327.
 (b) Fuller's Worthies in Yorkshire, p. 201. Wood, Athenæ, edit. 1721, Vol. I. col. 565.
 (c) Mr. Wood says, he was fifteen years old when he took his degree, and therefore must have been born about the time here assigned. Athenæ, ibid. But Fuller says, he was in the fifty-third year of his age when he died; and if so, must have been born about 1580. Worthies, ubi supra.
 (d) Wood, ibid.
 (e) Idem, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 151.

- for a time. At his return, in King James Ist's reign, he was made Secretary to Robert Cecil, then one of the chief Secretaries of State, being esteemed a very knowing person in State-affairs (f). And so well satisfied was Sir Robert with his faithfulness and diligence, that when he was raised to the office of Lord High-Treasurer, he continued him in his service, and employed him in several weighty matters (g). On the 30th of August 1605, when King James I. was entertained by the University of Oxford, he was actually created Master of Arts, with several Noblemen, Knights, and Esquires (b). Afterwards, by the interest of his Patron Robert, Earl of Salisbury, he was made one of the Clerks of the Privy-Council; and in 1617, September the 29th, received the honour of Knighthood from his Majesty at Hampton-Court (i). On the 15th of February 1618-9, he was appointed one of the Principal Secretaries of State, in the room of Sir Thomas Lake; and the King made great use of him, because he was better acquainted with State-affairs, and more diligent in dispatching business, than his partner and fellow-secretary Sir Robert Naunton (k). He was sworn, the seventeenth of the same month, into this important office (l): which he discharged with great trust and industry [A]. As a reward for it, the King granted him, May 2, 1620, a yearly pension of a thousand pounds, out of the customs (m). But, after having enjoyed that place about five years, he willingly resigned it in 1624; freely owing to his Majesty, That he was become a Roman Catholick, so that he must either be wanting to his trust, or violate his conscience in discharging his office. This ingenuous confession so affected King James, that he continued him Privy-Counsellor all his reign (n); and on the sixteenth of February (o) 1624-5, created him (by the name of Sir George Calvert, of Danbywiske in Yorkshire, Knight) Baron of Baltimore in the county of Longford in Ireland. He was at that time one of the Representatives in Parliament for the University of Oxford (p). While he was Secretary, he obtained a Patent, for him and his heirs, to be absolute Lord and Proprietor (with the royalties of a Count-Palatine) of the province of Avalon in New-found-land: Which was so named by him, from Avalon in Somersethshire, wherein Glastonbury stands, the first-fruits of Christianity in Britain, as the other was in that part of America. Here he built a fine house in Ferry-land, and spent twenty-five thousand pounds in advancing this new Plantation. After the death of King James, he went twice in person to New-found-land; and when Monsieur de l'Arade, with three men of war sent from the King of France, had reduced our English fishermen to great extremity, this Lord, with two ships manned at his own expence, chased away the French, relieved the English, and took sixty of the French prisoners (q). However, finding his plantation very much exposed to the insults of the French, he was at last forced to abandon it (r). Whereupon he went over to Virginia, and, after having viewed those parts, came to England, and obtained from King Charles I. (who had as great a regard and affection for him as King James) a patent, to him and his heirs, for Maryland on the North of Virginia [B]; with the same title and royalties as had been conferred upon him
- with

[A] Which he discharged with great trust and industry. We are informed, That he thinking, the Duke of Buckingham had been highly instrumental in his preferment, made him a present of a jewel of great value: But the Duke returned it him, acknowledging, he had no hand in his advancement, but that his Majesty alone had made choice of him, on account of his great abilities (l).

[B] King Charles I. granted him a Patent, to him and his heirs, for Maryland. That country was first discovered by Sebastian Cabot in 1497, but more perfectly in 1584, by Sir Walter Raleigh, and always passed for part of Virginia, till the year 1631, when King Charles I. made a grant of it to George Calvert, Baron of Baltimore. This Lord not living to see his grant made out, his son Cecil Calvert, Lord Baltimore (who had been at Virginia, and had looked out for a proper place to fix a new plantation of his own) took it out in his own name, and the Patent bears date June 20, 1632. The bounds of that country are thus ascertained therein; namely—All that part of a peninsula lying between the ocean on the East, and the bay of Chesapeake on the West, and divided from the other part [or Accomac, belonging to Virginia] by a right line drawn from Watkin's point on the West, to the main ocean on the East; and between that bound on the South, to that part of Delaware-bay on the North, which lies under the 40th degree of northern latitude. And all that tract of land, from the foresaid bay of Delaware, in a right line, by the degree aforesaid, to the true meridian of the first fountain of the river Patowmeck, and from thence tending towards the South to the farther bank of the foresaid river, and following the west and fourth-side of it to a place called Cinquack, situate near the mouth of the said river, where it falls into the bay of Chesapeake, &c. On the West it is bounded, at present, by the Aspaltheam mountains: And is in length, from North to South, 140 miles; but the breadth of it, from East to West, is not so much. The Lord Baltimore was to hold it of the Crown of England in common socage, as of the manor of Windsor; paying yearly, on Easter-Tuesday, two Indian arrows of those parts at the castle of Windsor, and the fifth part of the gold and silver ore that shall be found there. King Charles himself was pleased to give that province the name of Maryland, in honour of his beloved Queen Henrietta Maria. Cecil Lord Baltimore intended to go thither in person; but afterwards, changing his mind, he appointed his brother, Leonard Calvert, Esq; to go Governor in his stead, with whom he joined in commission Jeremy Hawley, and Thomas Cornwallis, Esqrs. The first colony sent thither, consisted of about two hundred people, Roman Catholicks, the chief of whom were gentlemen of good families. They sailed from Cowes, in the Isle of Wight, November 22, 1633, and arrived at Point Comfort in the bay of Chesapeake, February the 24th following; and continuing their voyage, went northward as far as the river of Patowmeck. Since that time, this colony is become very considerable and flourishing, being chiefly peopled with Roman Catholicks, who have transplanted themselves thither, in order to avoid the penal laws made against them in England. At the Revolution, the Lord Baltimore was deprived of the power of appointing a Governor, and other officers; and the government of that province fell under the same regulation as other plantations, which are immediately subject to the Crown. The Baltimore-family also were in danger of losing their propriety, on account of their Religion, by the act which requires all Roman Catholicks to profess the Protestant Religion, on pain of being deprived of their estates. But that family thought fit to profess the Protestant Religion, rather than lose their inheritance; and the present Lord Baltimore is now both Proprietor and Governor of Maryland, being one of the noblest estates enjoyed by a subject of Britain; for he is still entitled to a duty on every hoghead of tobacco exported; enjoys several fair manors, which may be stiled his demesne lands; and has a rent paid him by every planter, besides other perquisites. The chief

(l) Lloyd's State Worthies, second edit. 1679, 8vo, p. 750. H. Holland, p. 39. and Fuller's Worthies, ubi supra, p. 202.

(o) See Collier's Great Historical Dictionary, in the article CALVERT (GEORGE).

with respect to Avalon aforementioned (s). He died in London, April 15, 1632, in the fifty-first year of his age, and was buried in the chancel of the church of St Dunstan's in the West, in Fleetstreet (t). Descended from him, in the fifth degree, is the present Charles Lord Baltimore, Gentleman of the Bed-chamber to the Prince of Wales, and Fellow of the Royal Society (u). As to Sir George Calvert's character: One historian (w); who hardly speaks well of any body, calls him an Hispaniolized Papist. But others (x) tell us in his praise, That though he was a Roman Catholick, yet he kept himself sincere and disengaged from all interests; and was the only statesman, that being engaged to a decried party, managed his business with that great respect for all sides, that all who knew him applauded him; and none that had any thing to do with him, complained of him. He was a man of great sense, but not obstinate in his sentiments, taking as great pleasure in hearing others opinions, as in delivering his own. Whilst he was Secretary of State, he carried every night to the King a digested and exact account of affairs, and took the pains to examine himself the letters that were of any consequence (y). Judge Popham and he agreed in the publick design of foreign plantations, but differed in the manner of managing them (z). The first was for extirpating the original heathen inhabitants, the second for converting them: the former sent the lawdest people to those places, the latter was for the soberest: the one was for present profit, the other for a reasonable expectation; liking to have but few Governors, and those not interested merchants, but unconcerned gentlemen; granting liberties with great caution; and leaving every one to provide for himself by his own industry, and not out of a common stock [C].

(s) Fuller, ubi supra; and Lloyd's State Worthies, edit. 1679, p. 751.

(t) Fuller, ubi supra.

(u) Irish Compendium, ubi supra.

(w) Arthur Wils. s. n. in Life and Reign of King James I. in Compleat Hist. of England, edit. 1706, Vol. II. p. 705.

(x) Particul. by D. Lloyd, in State Worthies, edit. as above, p. 752.

(y) Ibid.

(z) Lloyd, ibid.

(1) British Emp. in America, Vol. 1. p. 133, &c. Hist. of Virginia, p. 47. Salmon's Modern History, edit. 1739, 4to. Vol. III. p. 504, 510, 511.

chief product of the country is tobacco. And it is divided into ten counties (2).

[C] And not out of a common stock.] The Lord Baltimore was author of the following pieces. I. Carmen funebre in D. Hen. Untonum ad Gallos bis legatum, ibique nuper fato funelum: i. e. Verses on the death of Sir Henry Unton, twice Ambassador in France, who died there. Printed in 1596, 4to. II. Speeches in Parliament. III. Various Letters of State. IV. The Answer of Tom Tell-troth. The practice of Princes, and the Lamentation of the Kirk. Lond. 1642. 4to. He also writ something about Maryland, but it does not appear that it was ever printed (3).

(3) See Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

CAMDEN (WILLIAM) one of the most learned Writers, most diligent Antiquaries, and most impartial Historians, that the last age, or this country, produced. He descended from honest and reputable parents, his father, Samson Camden, was a native of Lichfield in Staffordshire, but, settling in London, became a member of the company of Painter-Stainers (a). His mother was of a very antient and worthy family, as himself hath recorded, viz. the Curwens of Wirkington in the county of Cumberland (b). He was born May 2, 1551, at his father's house in the Old Bailey (c). He received the first tincture of letters in Christ's Hospital (d), erected the year after his birth, by that learned and pious young Prince, Edward VI, but at what time he was sent thither doth not appear, the records of that Hospital being destroyed in the fire of London, 1666. In the year 1563 he was removed to Islington, being infected with the plague, and remained there some time, which retarded his progress in learning (e). He was afterwards sent to St Paul's school (f), where the pregnancy of his parts, and his assiduous application, distinguished him to such a degree, that in 1566 he was removed to the university of Oxford, where he was entered a Servitor in Magdalen-college, being then about fifteen years old (g), and perfected himself in grammar-learning in the school adjoining, of which Dr Thomas Cooper, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln, was Master (h). Upon his missing a Demy's place in his college, he removed from thence to Broadgate-Hall, now Pembroke-College, in the same university (i), where he remained two years and a half, under the tuition of Dr Thomas Thornton, Canon of Christ-church, and his great patron. He left behind him here a signal mark of the respect paid him by his contemporaries, in the short Latin Graces of his composition, which, for many years after, were used by the Scholars of this Society (k). He removed from hence to Christ-church, where he was provided for by the kindness of Dr Thornton, during the time he continued at the university (l) [A]. It was about this time, that, by the encouragement of his

(3) See Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

(f) Hist. & Antiq. Oxon. lib. II. p. 269.

(g) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 111. Memorabil. de seipso.

(h) Athen. Oxon. Vol. 1. col. 480.

(i) V. Parentationem Historicam Degorei Wheari, p. 591. Athen. Oxon. col. 480.

(k) V. Parentationem Historicam Degorei Wheari, p. 591.

(l) Athen. Oxon. Vol. 1. col. 480.

[A] By the kindness of Dr Thornton, during the time he continued at the university.] There are very few lives that have been written with greater care than that of our author by different pens, and yet there have been some mistakes committed, of which it is necessary to take notice, that things may not be censured as deficiencies in this article, which, when explained, we hope will appear corrections. Degory Wheare, who was Camden's Professor of History at Oxford, in his Oration on the death of that great man, which he pronounced very soon after his decease, places his birth in 1550, but without naming the day (1). It is in consequence of this that he brings him to Oxford in 1565, and very probably his authority might have passed, if Camden himself had not settled both these dates, in a paper of memoranda which we find published by Dr Smith, and these leading dates are of very great consequence towards settling all the rest (2). The time of his being seized by the plague is also fixed by Camden, but he says nothing of his being at the Hospital of Christ-Church, which one may presume is the reason that a judicious Prelate treats it as a story founded only on tradition (3). But this tradition must have been early, since we find the fact very positively mentioned in Wheare's Oration (4), nor do I know that it has been questioned by any author. What seems to confirm it is the lowness of his circumstances at the time he was sent to Oxford, where he depended on the kindness of Dr Cooper, and his removal to Broadgate-Hall, which was the effect of Dr Thornton's kindness for him (5). At the same time that these circumstances demonstrates his necessities, they carry along with them testimonials of unusual vigour and firmness of mind, in the pursuit of knowledge under such difficulties, and of his pregnant parts and happy disposition, that before he was twenty, he could raise himself

(3) Bishop Gibbon's Life of Camden, prefixed to his Britannia.

(4) Parentationem Historicam Degorei Wheari, p. 591.

(5) Smith, Vita Camden. p. 3, 4.

(a) Gul. Camdeni Vita, script. Thoma Smitho, Lond. 1691, 4to. p. 1.

(b) Britan. in Cambria, edit. Londinens. 1607, p. 633.

(c) Parentatio Historica: five Commemoratio Vice & Mortis V. C. Gulielmi Camdeni Ciarentii facta Oxonia in Schola Historica, per Degorem Wheare, Historiarum Praefectorem. ap. Batefili Vit. f. 162. p. 591.

(d) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 2.

(e) Memorabil. de seipso.

(1) V. Parentationem Historicam Degorei Wheari, p. 591.

(2) Memorabilia de seipso.

his friends, he became a candidate for a fellowship in the college of All-Souls, and which he lost by the intrigues of the Popish party, on account of his zeal for the Church of England as by law established (m). In 1570, he supplicated the venerable Congregation of Regents of that university, that he might be admitted Bachelor of Arts (n), but in this also he miscarried. The year following he came up to London, and prosecuted his studies under the patronage, and by the assistance, of Dr Gabriel Goodman, and Dr Godfrey Goodman his brother, who supplied him both with money and books for that purpose (o). In 1573, he returned to Oxford, where he supplicated again, in the beginning of the month of March, for the degree that had been refused him, and his request being now granted, he took, but did not compleat it by determination (p). In 1575, by the interest of his friend Dean Goodman, he was made Second Matter of Westminster-school, which office he executed with great diligence, capacity, and success (q); so that his reputation daily increased, and he became known to, and admired by, the great ornaments of the literary world both at home and abroad [B]. As much of his time as he could spare from the duties of his arduous employment, he bestowed on the study of Antiquities, to which he had addicted himself while at Oxford, to the prosecution of which he was excited by Godfrey Goodman, nephew to the Dean of Westminster (r) Dr Gabriel Goodman, and much encouraged by the famous Sir Philip Sidney (s), whose reputation for learning, and being the Patron of learned men, our author gratefully celebrated (t). He at this time meditated the great work he afterwards composed in honour of his native country, and with equal care and diligence perused all that the Ancients have left in their writings concerning Britain, with indefatigable industry searched out and examined the Historical Writers of our own country, of which very few at that time had been published, and with equal skill and labour visited the records, and other repositories of that kind of learning which suited his purpose (u). In 1581, the learned President Brisson, being employed here by the French Court, in a negociation of great importance, he entered into a strict friendship and close correspondence with Mr Camden (w), which continued to the deplorable death of that eminent Magistrate [C] In 1582, he took a journey through Suffolk into York-shire,

(m) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 5.

(n) Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 104.

(o) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 6. Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 480.

(p) Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 108.

(q) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 8.

(r) Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 480.

(s) See Brooke's Reply to Camden's Apology, p. 7.

(t) Britan. in Cantio, p. 233.

(u) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 11.

(w) Memorabil. de scipio. Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 480.

(6) Britannia in Comitatu Berchreniensi in Descriptione Wallingfordiæ, p. 204.

(7) Dugdale's Baronage, Tom. III. p. 410. Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 384.

(8) Answer to Brooke, p. 1.

(9) See his Preface to the folio edition of his Britannia, which was the last published in his lifetime.

(10) Nicéron Memoires des Hommes Illustres, Vol. XXIII. p. 37.

(11) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 480. Britan. in Middlesexia, p. 409.

(12) Review of the Court of King James, M.S. p. 19.

(13) Answer to Brooke, p. 1.

himself such powerful patrons from his personal merit. This last protector being advanced to a canony of Christ-Church, carried him along with him, and entertained him in his own lodgings (6). At this time it was, that his friendship commenced with the two Carews, Richard and George, the latter of whom was afterwards raised by King James to the title of Earl of Totness; and it has been supposed, that, as they were both Antiquaries, their conversation might give Mr Camden a turn that way (7). This is the more probable, because we learn from himself, that before he left Oxford, he had a strong inclination to these studies, and that he could never hear any thing mentioned relating to that subject (8), without more than ordinary attention. After he quitted the university, and before he was settled at Westminster, he made frequent excursions for the sake of informing himself in matters of this nature, and began very early to form those collections (9), out of which he afterwards drew his learned and laborious performance.

[B] By the great ornaments of the literary world both at home and abroad. There appears to be some confusion in the accounts that are given us of Mr Camden's patrons, the three Goodmans, and a very accurate French writer, who has written a very good account of our author, mentions it as an error in Bayle, that he took Dr Godfrey Goodman for the brother of Dr Gabriel, which, if it be an error, he certainly copied from Smith (10). Mr Camden himself acknowledges very handsomely, the favours he received from Dr Gabriel Goodman Dean of Westminster, and Anthony Wood positively asserts, that Godfrey Goodman, who was the Dean's nephew; and, as I take it, the son of Dr Godfrey Goodman, supplied our author with books and money, and defrayed the expences of his journeys (11), which account he borrowed from a MS. in the Bodleian Library (12), written by a third Godfrey Goodman, some time Bishop of Gloucester, son to the second, and grandson to the first, and who was himself scholar to Camden, so that he might be very well acquainted with the acts of friendship he received from his family. It is more probable that Mr Godfrey Goodman the Bishop of Gloucester's father, and nephew to the Dean of Westminster, was our author's great patron, because, in the space of between four and five years, which elapsed between Mr Camden's coming from Oxford to his being settled as Second Matter of Westminster-school, by the interest of Dean Goodman, he had no employment, and in this time it was, that he made most of those journeys (13). Besides these he had many other friends and patrons, such, particularly, as Mr Thomas Savile, brother to the learned Sir Henry Savile, and, as plainly appears by his letters to Camden himself, one of the learnedest men of his time, and as such, celebrated by Mr Camden and others (14). Mr Edward Stradling, who was also a man of rank and distinguished knowledge. Amongst foreigners, Abraham Ortelius, the most able Geographer of his age, coming over to England made an acquaintance with Camden, and corresponded with him constantly. He was also very intimate with the famous Hotman, who had been Secretary to the Great Earl of Leicester. Justus Lipsius, Janus Doufa the younger, Janus Gruter, and many others (15). The reader will observe, that this account of his friends relates to the time while he was composing, and before he published, his Britannia, for after that came abroad, the number of his domestick and foreign patrons became much more numerous.

[C] To the deplorable death of that eminent Magistrate. This honourable person, who was a Lawyer by profession, and esteemed one of the most learned men in France, was, in the month of August 1580, after having exercised for five years the office of Advocate General to the Parliament of Paris, promoted to the rank of President à Mortier, and was soon after declared Counsellor of State by Henry III, who sent him over to England, to negotiate a match between Queen Elizabeth and his brother the Duke of Anjou, at which time he came acquainted with Camden, and how high a value our author set upon his friendship, appears from his entering it amongst those few articles he set down relating to his own affairs (16). The President Brisson returning into France, had a large share in the transactions of the State, and remaining at Paris when that city revolted against his master, and declared for the League, he was, by that faction, on the eleventh of January 1589, declared First President of the Parliament, in the room of Achilles de Harlay, whom, for his loyalty, they had thrown into prison; but President Brisson, at the time of his accepting the office, declared, by an act under his hand, that he did it under force, that he did not receive his office as an honour (17), but as the only means he had left to save his life. Two years after this, a person being tried before the Parliament, for corresponding with the King, and being acquitted, the faction resolved to revenge themselves upon the First President, whom they condemned to be hanged, and executed their sentence on the fourth of November, (14) Britan. in Brigant. See Bishop Mountague's Preface to his Diatriba upon the first part of the History of Tythes. Reg. secund. æt. Col. Mert. p. 129.

(15) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 9.

(16) Memorab. de scipio.

(17) Nicéron Memoires des Hommes Illustres, Vol. IX. p. 300.

shire, and returned through Lancashire in the month of April (x), that he might examine with his own eyes, and upon the spot, some of those Antiquities which he meant to illustrate in his great work, for the improvement of which he had carried on, for many years, a constant correspondence with the most learned and judicious persons of our own and other nations (y). He was fully sensible of all the difficulties of the task he had undertaken, and foresaw to how great envy he should be exposed, by adventuring upon such a piece, as must naturally draw the attention of the learned throughout Europe, and therefore he omitted nothing that might render it worthy of that attention, and of the expectation of his friends. At length, in 1586, his performance appeared, and though much enlarged and improved in future editions, was even then esteemed an honour to its author, and the glory of his country (z) [D]. In the month of June 1588, he supplicated the university of Oxford for the degree of Master of Arts, which desire of his was granted conditionally, as we are told by Anthony Wood, that he should stand in the Act following; but the same writer informs us, that his admission occurs not in their Register (a). The year following he made a journey into Devonshire, and in the month of June, as himself tells us, was at Iffarcomb (b), which is a prebend of the church of Salisbury, and had been bestowed upon him on the sixth of February preceding, by Dr John Piers, then Bishop of that diocese, and our author's intimate friend (c). The principal design of this journey, was to visit the places most famous for their Antiquities in the West, and the expence of this and others for the same purpose, and in order to improve his Description of Britain, were defrayed, as we are told, by Mr Godfrey Goodman (d). In 1590, he made a journey into Wales, in company with the famous Dr Godwin, afterwards an eminent Prelate (e), and successively Bishop of Landaff and Hereford, that he might examine the Antiquities of this part of the island; for, as himself informs us, he was above all things desirous of having the best and clearest evidence of things he undertook to write about; that the nature of those things would admit. In point of Antiquities, he had recourse to the most ancient authors, which, out of the dust of libraries, he brought forth to publick light; in reference to Civil History, he searched the archives of this kingdom, both by himself and (x) Memorabil. de seipso. His Defence against York, p. 5.

(y) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 11, 12, 13.

(z) Hist. & Antiq. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 207.

(a) Fasti Oxon. Vol. I. col. 135.

(b) Memorabil. de seipso.

(c) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 17.

(d) Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 481.

(e) Memorabil. de seipso.

18) Le Journal T Henri III.

19) Memoires de sa Vie, liv. v.

20) Memorabil. de seipso.

21) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 481, 482.

22) Hist. & Antiq. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 270.

23) Nicéron Mémoires des Hommes Illustres, Vol. XXI. p. 95.

24) See his Preface to the folio edition of his Britannia.

25) Camden. E. p. 28, 29.

1594, by tying him up to one of the beams in the council-chamber at the Chatelet (18). The famous M. de Thou, though he was no friend of his, is pleased to confess, That the Republick of Letters received a sensible loss by his death (19). The king his master was wont frequently to express his esteem for him by saying, 'That he believed no Prince in Europe had so learned a subject as his Briffon.' Indeed his writings, upon a great variety of subjects, fully support this character; but in all probability, it was his consummate knowledge in ancient Geography and History, that set him so high in the opinion of our author.

[D] Esteemed an honour to its author, and the glory of his country.] This title of this work runs thus, Britannia, sive florentissimorum Regnorum Angliæ, Scotiæ, Hiberniæ, & Insularum adjacentium, ex intimâ antiquitate Chorographica descriptio. Londini, 1586. 8vo. i. e. 'Britain, or a Chorographical Description of the flourishing kingdoms of England, Scotland, and Ireland, with the adjacent islands, from the most remote antiquity.' There seems to be nothing better fixed than the date of our author's first edition, he has assigned it himself expressly in his memorials, 1586 Britanniam editi (20). He affirms the same thing in his preface to his last edition; and yet Anthony Wood sets down the first edition to have been in 1582, and makes the second impression in 1585 (21), though in another work of his, he had fixed the first edition to 1585 (22). By this means Nicéron is led into a mistake (23), as indeed might easily have happened to the most careful foreigner; but how, or whence, this error in Wood arose, is not to be guessed; for the author himself tells us, that he spent ten years in compiling it, and that he was first put upon it by Ortelius, by which it plainly appears, that he began to digest his collections the year after he came to Westminster (24). It would require more room than we have to spare, to enter even into a brief account of the mighty praises that were bestowed upon this book, even on its first and imperfect appearance; I mean, in comparison of what it became afterwards, through the continual care and application of its author; but it may not be amiss to insert a paragraph or two from a letter written to our author by Mr William Lambard (25), the famous Kentish Antiquary, to whom he communicated a part of it before it went to the press; the rather, because the date of this letter, which is July 9, 1585, plainly proves there could be no edition 'till long after that time, notwithstanding what Anthony Wood asserts in express terms. 'I thank you most heartily, good Mr Camden, for the use of these books of your's, since they deliver many things that are 'not, so far as I do know, elsewhere to be had, and the same no less learnedly picked out than delicately uttered and written. What praise you deserve in all, I can best tell by Kent, wherein (howsoever I have laboured myself) I learn many things by you that I knew not before. Your conjecture at the etymon of the word Cantium is so probable, that you make me now doubt of mine own, which before I took to be most assured; you have so truly, as I think, traced out Leneham, Chilham, and Newendene, by the old Durolcnum, Jul labor, and Anderida, as I shall for ever hereafter rest in your opinion of them. To be plain, I seem to myself not to have known Kent, 'till I knew Camden. If you have in purpose to perform the rest, go on boldly, good Mr Camden, wherein if you shall use the same dexterity that hitherto you have done (as I fear not but you will) Acesi & Heliconis opera dixerim. Howsoever you shall be minded to do more or less, defraud not your countrymen of so great a pleasure, nor the country itself of so great an honour, by forbearing to imprint the same. If I had any thing that might further your study, I would most willingly impart it; and whether I have or no, I will make yourself the judge, if it shall like you to come down into Kent; and look amongst my papers.'

This work he dedicated to his first and great patron William Cecil Lord Burleigh, Knight of the Garter, and High-Treasurer of England, and in his dedication he very fully acknowledges, not only the many kindnesses and benefits he had received from him, but his assistance also in the work, and the great helps derived to him from the use of his well-chosen library. It is observable, that this dedication is dated May 2, 1586, so that our author finished this work precisely at the age of thirty-five; and yet, as he informs us himself, he dedicated thereto only his spare hours and Holidays, the duties of his office, engrossing all the rest of his time. He speaks largely, and yet very modestly, of the many and great obstacles he met with, and of the pains he took to overcome them; he shews a just sense of the hazard he ran in publishing his labours, and his apprehension that they might provoke more than one sort of men against him; but at the same time he professes, that the encouragement of Ortelius and other friends, his own zeal for truth, and his passion for the service of his country, inspired him with a generous resolution of daring all the envy of the Critics, rather than not attempt to render that justice to Britain, which had been so long denied to it.

and by his friends; as to descents and the memoirs of great families, he obtained the best lights that he could; and the same method he took, in regard to the description of places; but finding great variations in these, he was willing to undergo any labour, requisite to come at truth, and that his reputation, which was continually rising, might not give a sanction to the mistakes of other men, reported by him (f). On the twenty-third of October 1592, he was seized with an ague, which proved a quartan, and notwithstanding all the helps he received from physick, held him long, and brought him low (g). While he was labouring under this distemper, Doctor Edward Grant, who for about twenty years had worthily executed the office of Head-Master of Westminster-school, worn out with fatigue, resigned it in February 1592-3 (h); and in the month of March following, was succeeded therein by Mr Camden (i). Some indeed, and amongst the rest, the very learned and accurate Dr Smith, have affirmed, that it was upon the death of that learned person (k) he came into his place, but the fact is otherwise, and therefore it is the more requisite to correct an error of so long standing [E]. In the succeeding year, but not 'till the middle of summer, he became perfectly free from his ague (l); and soon after published the fourth edition of his Britannia, which was now very much enlarged, and appeared in many respects quite another thing, from what it was at first, through the care and diligence of the author, in collecting and digesting fresh materials, and reforming what, from the information of his friends, he found amiss therein (m). But notwithstanding all his attention and circumspection, this edition exposed him to a very warm, and in many respects indecent, attack from Rafe Brookefmouth, York-Herald, in relation to certain mistakes, which that writer believed he had discovered, in reference to descents, and which he apprehended might be attended with consequences dishonourable to many of the most ancient and most noble families in this kingdom (n). I have placed this event here, tho' most writers report it several years after, and I do it out of respect to truth, because it is certain, that tho' York's book did not appear at this time, yet he had framed his collections for it, soon after the publication of the fourth edition of the Britannia (o). How far he might be excited by envy, jealousy, or spite, to this undertaking, I shall not pretend to determine; but shall in the notes give the reader as clear an account of the controversy, as in my power, and without any mixture of prejudice or prepossession [F]. As soon as he found his health so well established, as to enable him

(f) Answer to Brooke, p. 1.

(g) Memorabil. de f. 156. A. h. n. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 481. Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 17, 18.

(h) Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 310.

(i) Memorabil. de scipso. Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 19. Hist. & Antiq. Oxon. l. i. p. 270.

(k) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 18.

(l) Memorabil. de scipso.

(m) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 78.

(n) See Brooke's Epistle to the gentle and learned Reader, placed before his second Discovery of Errors published in the much commended Britannia.

(o) See this point largely explained in the note [E].

[E] The more requisite to correct an error of so long standing. The first author of this mistake, appears to be Degory Wheare in his oration on the death of Camden (26), and by his authority, even the best writers have been misled upon this subject (27). 'Upon the death of that most learned man Edward Grant, Doctor in Divinity, who had the government of Westminster-school, which happened in the month of March 1593, Camden succeeded in his place,' says the worthy Dr Smith (28); and in this he is followed even by that accurate writer, and excellent judge of our history, the present Bishop of London, in the life of our author prefixed to the translation of the Britannia. 'The first step he made, was the second Master-ship of Westminster-school in 1575. In this station he continued 'till the death of Dr Grant Head School-master (which happened in 1593) whom he succeeded.' Anthony Wood, in his History and Antiquities of Oxford (29), speaks doubtfully. 'He came, says he, to be Head-master either by the resignation, or death, of that eminent Divine Edward Grant.'

(26) V. Parentationem Historiam, p. 592.

(27) See his article in Bayle.

(28) Vit. Camd. p. 18.

(29) Hist. & Antiq. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 270.

(30) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 481.

(31) Id. ibid. Vol. I. col. 311.

(32) Le Neve's Fasti Ecclesiae Anglicanae, p. 372.

(33) Reges, Reginae, Nobiles, & alii in Ecclesia Collegiata B. Petri Westmonasterii Sepulti. Uique ad Annum reparatas Salutis 1606, 4to, p. 77.

(34) Life of Camden, prefixed to the Translation of his Britannia.

(35) In his Address to Maillet Camden, prefixed to his book, intitled, A Discovery of certain Errors, &c. from which Address it is evident that he was not the King at Arms

King at Arms, Sir Fulk Grevil recommended Mr Camden to the Queen as a person every way qualified for the place, and one that had highly deserved of her Majesty and her kingdoms. The Queen, without more ado, gives him a grant, and Mr Camden accordingly was created October 23, in the same year, having the day before been made Richmond-Herald, because, by the Constitution, none can be King at Arms but who has been first Herald. At that time Mr Brooke was York-Herald, who, upon Leigh's death, presently had an eye upon that preferment, and doubted not but the station he had already in the college would secure it to him. The greater his assurance was, the disappointment lay so much the heavier upon him, and (as men who lay too much stress upon their own merit, are always hurried on to revenge upon the least injury) his next business was, to find out a fair opportunity of shewing his resentments. Mr Camden, at the end of each county, has drawn down the history of the respective Earls, and he thought probably, that if a quarrel could be picked in the business of families, it would be most suitable to his present purpose. The plot was well contrived, if the charge could have been made out. As it would have shewn Mr Camden's forwardness in engaging himself on a subject he was not master of, so would it have convinced the Government of their unreasonable choice, not only in preferring a person who knew little of the matter, but (which was worse) in rejecting one that was an absolute Critick. After two years study, he published a book with this title, A Discovery of certain Errors published in print in the much commended Britannia, &c. without Licence, without name either of Printer or Bookseller. All this reads very well, and the circumstances seem to hang together; but notwithstanding this, and though it should be granted, that Ralph Brooke had a sinister design in attacking Mr Camden, yet I doubt it will be found, that this was so far from arising out of distaste to his being King at Arms, that it was originally grounded in his being no Herald (35). In short, the fact was this: Mr Camden, in his first editions touched but gently upon descents, and mentioned but a few families, whereas in his fourth edition, he enlarged so much upon them, that he has given a particular index to direct the reader on this head, under the title of Barones & illustres familiae, and has therein set

[F] Without any mixture of prejudice or prepossession. The common stream of authors represent this attack upon Mr Camden, as proceeding from the envious malice of its author, arising from Mr Camden's promotion, and his own disappointment. A very learned writer begins his account of it thus (34). 'In the year 1597, upon the death of Richard Leigh Clarenceux

King at Arms, Sir Fulk Grevil recommended Mr Camden to the Queen as a person every way qualified for the place, and one that had highly deserved of her Majesty and her kingdoms. The Queen, without more ado, gives him a grant, and Mr Camden accordingly was created October 23, in the same year, having the day before been made Richmond-Herald, because, by the Constitution, none can be King at Arms but who has been first Herald. At that time Mr Brooke was York-Herald, who, upon Leigh's death, presently had an eye upon that preferment, and doubted not but the station he had already in the college would secure it to him. The greater his assurance was, the disappointment lay so much the heavier upon him, and (as men who lay too much stress upon their own merit, are always hurried on to revenge upon the least injury) his next business was, to find out a fair opportunity of shewing his resentments. Mr Camden, at the end of each county, has drawn down the history of the respective Earls, and he thought probably, that if a quarrel could be picked in the business of families, it would be most suitable to his present purpose. The plot was well contrived, if the charge could have been made out. As it would have shewn Mr Camden's forwardness in engaging himself on a subject he was not master of, so would it have convinced the Government of their unreasonable choice, not only in preferring a person who knew little of the matter, but (which was worse) in rejecting one that was an absolute Critick. After two years study, he published a book with this title, A Discovery of certain Errors published in print in the much commended Britannia, &c. without Licence, without name either of Printer or Bookseller. All this reads very well, and the circumstances seem to hang together; but notwithstanding this, and though it should be granted, that Ralph Brooke had a sinister design in attacking Mr Camden, yet I doubt it will be found, that this was so far from arising out of distaste to his being King at Arms, that it was originally grounded in his being no Herald (35). In short, the fact was this: Mr Camden, in his first editions touched but gently upon descents, and mentioned but a few families, whereas in his fourth edition, he enlarged so much upon them, that he has given a particular index to direct the reader on this head, under the title of Barones & illustres familiae, and has therein set him to undergo the fatigue of a fresh journey, and was able to obtain leisure for another excursion, he next made a tour to Salisbury and Wales, with a view to farther improvements of his work, and returning by Oxford (p), spent there some time, in which he visited most, if not all the churches and chapels there, copying the monumental inscriptions and the arms, which he found in them, and reducing them into a book, which Anthony Wood (q) tells us, he had seen in his own hand-writing. A wonderful proof of his care and diligence! and which, therefore well deserved to be secured from oblivion. In 1597, he was again afflicted with a grievous sickness, upon which he removed to the house of one Cuthbert Line, and there, as himself tells us, recovered by the care of that person's wife (r). He published in this year his Greek Grammar (s), for the use of Westminster-school, which as it was a proof of his great attention to the functions of his employment, so if he had never obliged the learned world with any other performance, it might well have secured his reputation with posterity [G]. It is highly probable, that at this time, our author was so far from having any thoughts of quitting a post, in which he was universally respected and esteemed, that it is more probable he proposed to himself, either ending his days in it, or following the example of his predecessor and resigning it, when overwhelmed

(35) In his Address to Maillet Camden, prefixed to his book, intitled, A Discovery of certain Errors, &c. from which Address it is evident that he was not the King at Arms

(p) Memorabil. de seipso.

(q) Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 48 r.

(r) Memorabil. de seipso. Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 19.

(s) Memorabil. de seipso. Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 78.

down very near two hundred and fifty noble houses, which Ralph Brooke considered as an invasion upon the rights of the college. This put him upon enquiring, whether there might not be some mistakes in these accounts, and when he believed he had found a great many, he was desirous they should be amended (36). But he did not (if we may believe himself) think of attacking Mr Camden in print, or of publishing his discoveries, as he called them, to the world. His taking this step was owing to other causes, of which the reader may take this account in his own words, which I believe will fully clear up the matter (37). 'The most abstruse arts, I profess not, but yield the palme and victorie thereof to myne adversary that great learned Mr Camden, with whom yet a long experimented navigator may contend about his chard and compasse, about havens, creeks, and soundes, so I, an auncient Heralde, a little dispute, without imputation of audacitie, concerning the honour of armes, and the truth of honorable descents. In confidence whereof, beholding in foure of his imprinted books successively, a continued raz (race) and generation of errors, in corrupting and falsifying many noble descents and pedigrees, and perceiving that even the braines of many learned men beyond the seas had mis-conceived and miscarried in the travaile and birth of their relations, being gotten, as it were, with child (as Diomedes mares) by the blatt of his erroneous puffes: I could not, but according to my profession, and long experience in Heraldry, a little question the original father of those absurdities, being so farre blowne with the trumpet of his learning and fame into forreine lands. For what overture about the descents of English nobles, and other genealogies, hath that famous Mr Hieron Henningius, in his foure pound folio booke, byne taken tardie with all, that his credulitie hath not sucked out of that highly esteemed Britannia? And was it not from his genealogicall slippes, that Reufner in his genealogies, amongst manie grosse mistakings, hath made Richard Plantagener, Duke of Yorke, and Anne Mortimer, to be father and mother to Edward the 4th, and Richard the thyrd, both Kings of England? coupling them together as unnaturally as OEdipus and Jocasta.

'For remedie of which inconveniences, I was bould first to move others of good credite and learning, friendly to advertice this learned man, Mr Camden, of the faultie passages in his booke touching Heraldry, to whom his answere was, that he could not correct any of them for discrediting his whole worke: as though mending the fores would have maymed the bodye.

'Secondly, in private when I harde his addressment to a siff impression, I my self dealt with him for the amendment of some slippes in his Britannia of the same kynd, promising hym the use of my owne observations and collections, which, as professed wares, fastidiously he reiected, not accounting them worthy his thanks or acceptation, contrarie to the aduce of the sober learned, who are contente to heare the concept of a meane friend sometymes, and respect the offer, although but a blynde man should pointe out the way. The ratt is not so contemptible but shee may helpe the lyon at a pinch out of those nets wherein his strength is hampered: and the words of an inferior may often carry matter

'in them, to admonish his superiour of some important consideration. And surely of what account forever I might have seemed to this learaed man, yet in regarde of my profession, and courteous offer (I being an auncient officer of armes, and he then but a Schoolmaster) might well have vouchsafed the perusal of my notes.' It is most evident from hence, that his quarrel with our author began not from, but before, his promotion; and though it is very true, that his first book did not come out 'till after Camden was promoted; yet, as Brooke therein complained that he had been disturbed in writing, and much more in printing it, by the friends of Mr Camden, it is plain, that it was not a new or sudden thought, but an obstinate resolution of pursuing an old design (38). To all this, we may add, tho' our author himself, in his answer to Brooke, of which we shall speak hereafter, and which, without doubt, is sharp enough, does indeed take notice of his promotion, and the distaste that it might have given to York-Herald; yet this was after he had published his Discovery, and throughout that piece, he shews that disdain of his adversary's abilities, which Brooke complains of, never once admits him to be in the right, or his corrections worth regarding (though in his fifth edition he very wisely made use of them) but treats him with very high contempt, and as one no way worthy of his notice. To speak my own sentiment freely, I am perswaded that if, on the one hand, Mr Camden had foreseen his becoming Clarenceux King at Arms, he would not have let fall some expressions in his writings; and, on the other hand, if Brooke had suspected it before he began the quarrel, I much doubt whether he would have begun it at all; for whoever peruses his books carefully will find, that what stung him most, was, that a Schoolmaster should meddle with descents and families, and at the same time treat Heralds, to whom he thought these things belonged, with so little ceremony and respect.

[G] It might well have secured his reputation with posterity.] The title of this work, as published by the author, ran thus, Grammaticæ Græcæ institutio compendiaría in usum Regiæ Scholæ Westmonasteriensis. Londini, in 8vo. We have an excellent account both of our author's intention and performance in reference to this Grammar, which, therefore, it is but justice to insert in the words of the Right Reverend Author (39). 'He was, says he, always exciting the present age to virtue and honour, by representing to them the venerable monuments of their ancetors, or laying a foundation for the happiness of posterity, by forming youth unto religion and learning. They are two professions that seem to look quite different ways, and yet he managed them to such advantage, that if he had been continually abroad, 'tis hard to imagine how the Antiquary could have been better, or if constantly in the school, how the Master could have been more diligent. He was not content to train up those who were under his immediate care, unless (like the good old Orator) he put himself in a condition to be a guide to them, even after it should please Providence to remove him.' It is not necessary to add any thing farther to this account, except it be, that Dr Smith tells us, that at the time he printed his book, which was in 1691, this Grammar had run through very near an hundred impressions (40).

(38) See his Address to Mr Camden, before his first Discovery of Errors: and observe the motto also to that work, viz. Quam quisq; norit Artem in hac se exercet: which implies, that pedigrees were not Mr Camden's business at the time this dispute began.

(39) See Bishop Gibson's Life of Camden.

(40) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 78.

[H] By

(36) Perhaps he might have heard that Mr Camden had received such corrections very thankfully from others, of which the reader may find an instance in his Epistles published by Dr Smith, p. 36.

(37) See his Address to the gentle and learned Reader, prefixed to his second Discovery of Errors.

whelmed with infirmities, and when he had acquired wherewithal, to pass the remainder of his days with ease and decency. This I say is probable, because he refused the place of a Master of Requests (z), which it is likely might be offered him by his friend the Lord Treasurer Burleigh; and yet notwithstanding this, before the end of the year, he left it for a far more honourable employment. Richard Leigh (x), Clarenceux King of Arms, dying on the twenty-third of September, Sir Fulk Grevile, our author's intimate friend, asked of Queen Elizabeth, that office for Mr Camden, which was immediately granted; but because it was not usual in the College of Arms, for a person to rise to that dignity, without passing through the office of Herald, he was on the twenty-second of October, so created, by the title of Richmond; and on the twenty-third made Clarenceux (w). Upon this preferment, he was complimented by all his friends, except the Lord Burleigh, who took it ill, that a person he had honoured with his friendship, should decline his assistance in his promotion; but upon Mr Camden's acquainting him, that it was entirely a thought of Sir Fulk Grevile's, and that himself was as much surprized by his promotion as his Lordship, that coolness was removed (x), and his protection continued to him as long as that wise and good statesman lived, which was not long. It was both an happiness and an honour to Mr Camden to have such a man, not only for his patron but for his friend, who afforded him his countenance, when he published his performance, as he had given him great assistance while he was engaged in it, communicating to him all the stores of his well furnished library (y); and adding to these, the lights of his learned conversation, which could not but be highly useful to Mr Camden, since that noble person had made the Antiquities of England, and the personal History of the great men who had flourished in it, his peculiar and constant study, through the course of his life (z). A little before his death, he recommended to our author the preserving to posterity the History of his Royal Mistress; and at the same time, that he advised the building, contributed a large stock of materials towards the erecting it (a). How great an effect this recommendation had, will be hereafter seen; in the mean time let us observe, that as there could not be higher testimony of that great man's respect to his Sovereign, so it is impossible he should give a stronger proof of his esteem for our author's abilities, or thorough persuasion of his integrity, than by committing such a work to his care. In 1600, Mr Camden, who was now more at liberty, than while he had the charge of the school upon him, made a journey as far as Carlisle, in the company of Robert Cotton, Esquire (b), his dear and intimate friend, afterwards Sir Robert Cotton, Baronet, and after having surveyed whatever was curious in the North, returned to London in the month of December (c). This long journey into the North, did not hinder his sending abroad an account of all the monuments of the Kings, Queens, Nobles, and others in the Collegiate Church of St Peter's Westminster, with their inscriptions, which he enlarged and reprinted more than once; and tho' notwithstanding these augmentations, it is still but of very small bulk, yet the elegance and accuracy of the performance (d) renders it valuable, even at this day, notwithstanding the pretences made by some authors, who would be thought to have written more fully upon, and to have examined more strictly into, this subject. This year also came out the fifth edition of his Britannia, to which he annexed an Apology to the Reader, in answer to what had been published by Rafe Brooke to the prejudice of his work, and the reception which this edition met with very clearly showed, that the fame of Camden was not to be obscured by any flying clouds of critical envy [H].

next

[H] By any flying clouds of critical envy.] There were three editions of the Britannia in octavo, viz. the first in 1586, the second in 1587, the third in 1590, but of a larger size than the two former. It appeared the same year at Frankfort where it was printed by John Wechel. The fourth edition was printed at London in 1594, in 4to, and it was this edition that gave occasion to the remarks of Rafe Brooke. This of which we are now speaking was the fifth, printed also in 4to at London; and at the end of this, we find his answer to Brooke, under no other title than this, Ad Lectorem, i. e. To the Reader. This is also sometimes bound up with his adversary's book, intitled, A Discovery of certain errors published in print in the much-commended Britannia; but being very concise, I do not find that it has been ever printed by itself. He opens this short work with a very clear and a very modest account of his own application to the study of Antiquities, which he assures us began while he was at school, increased at the University, took up most of his time before he was settled at Westminster, and induced him to make those large collections, from whence, at the earnest desire of Abraham Ortelius, he afterwards drew out the first scheme of his Britannia, which, he informs us, he very well knew was, in many respects, imperfect, and therefore laboured, by the perusal of books, the information of friends, and by several journies, in which he personally visited the greatest part of England, to amend and improve it. After all this painstaking, he was surprized to find himself, and his work, attacked with great violence and fury by a certain person (he avoids naming him) whether moved thereby to folly or judgment, by the weakness of his mind, or by the heat of his envy, because the late Queen had been graciously pleased passing this person by, to exalt him to a certain office, he does not determine; but after acknowledging, that he is very sensible both that he might commit, and has committed, various errors, he addresses himself to his defence against the charge that had been exhibited by his enemy (41). But here it will be necessary to observe, that a distinction must be made between the original difference that Brooke had with Camden, and the publication of his treatise; the former related only to some mistakes which this man thought he had discovered in our author's work; but when he was once in, and fancied himself under a necessity of appealing to the world, and to the Earl of Essex, then Earl Marshal, he brought in other matter, which was certainly foreign to his purpose, so that the whole of his charge might be reduced under three heads (42). The first of these was as to errors committed in accounts of noble families. The second, as to the assistance derived, but not acknowledged, from Mr Glover's papers in Lord Burleigh's library. The third, as to the vast helps received from Leland's papers, out of which, he surmises that Mr Camden had gathered

(41) Answer to Brooke, p. 1, 2, 3.

(42) Brooke's book was dedicated to the Earl of Essex, who from thence appears to have been his patron; whereas Camden sided with the Cecils; he likewise added thereto Leland's New Year's Gift, which he reprinted with a libellous poem intitled, Leland's Ghost.

(z) Camd. Epist. p. 247.

(w) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 20.

(v) Memorabil. de sepis.

(x) Bishop Gibson's Life of Camden.

(y) Answer to Brooke, p. 13.

(z) See the article CECIL (WILLIAM) Lord Burleigh.

(a) See his Epistle to the reader prefixed to his first part of his Annals.

(b) Memorabil. de sepis.

(c) Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. c. 431.

(d) Published originally in a small 4to in 1600, again in 1603, and a third time in 1606.

next year after this, he was again visited by a fever, from which he recovered by the care of his friend, Mr Heather, for which he bore him ever afterwards very high respect (e). In 1603, the plague breaking out at London, he retired with his friend, Robert Cotton, Esq; to his seat at Conington, and thereby escaped it (f). It was in this year; that by his care a very noble collection of our ancient Historians, appeared at Frankfort; and these he dedicated to Sir Fulk Grevil, in acknowledgment for the good office he did him in procuring him to be made King at Arms. Part of these Historians were never before published, and such as had seen the light, he sent abroad, much more accurate and compleat, than formerly they had appeared, rendering thereby very great service to all such as were inclined to study the British, English, Irish, or Norman Histories (g) [I]. In the year following, he published his Remains of his large work, concerning Britain, which, in gratitude for past favours, and as a mark of his sincere friendship and high esteem, he dedicated to his dear friend and constant patron, Sir Robert Cotton; though from the work itself it appears, that he once intended to have inscribed it to Sir Fulk Grevil (b). There are in it, without doubt, abundance of curious, useful, and learned remarks, and tho' there may be some light and trivial things intermixed, which perhaps hindered the author from owning it in the same publick manner as he did the rest of his works, yet there is no doubt at all of it's being his, or of it's being worthy of him [K].

(e) Memorabil. de seiplo.

(f) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 431.

(g) Bishop Gibson's Life of our author.

(b) See this explained more at large in the notes.

He

(3) See the Advices at the beginning of his work to Mr Camden, and the Conclusion which is referred to him fo.

gathered a great part of his description (43). Our author, in his defence, shews largely, from various authorities both of history and records, that in many of the places objected to, himself was in the right; and his adversary, notwithstanding the many years he had spent in the office of a Herald, in the wrong. He acknowledges, however, that by following one of his predecessors, Robert Cook Clarenceux King at Arms, he had fallen into some mistakes, which he thinks were excusable on the score of the authority by which he was misled; as to the other two parts of the charge, he acquits himself intirely by declaring, that he mentioned with honour those from whom he borrowed any thing; and with respect to Leland more particularly, he acknowledges, that he had perused some of his works, and particularly his Itinerary, and where he borrowed any thing from it material, had cited him; but observes very justly, that where he says the same things of his own knowledge that Leland had mentioned from his, he did not think himself indebted to him. He farther observes, that if this worthy person spent five years in these studies, himself had spent thirty; that if he had examined many ancient authors, himself had also taken great pains in the same way, and had not only perused what was to be met with in English libraries, but had also procured great helps from abroad, from the monuments of learning preserved in the libraries of France, Italy, and Spain, by the assistance of his learned friends Franciscus Pithæus, Justus Lipsius, Abrahamus Ortelius, H. Surrita, J. Obsopeus, and others. He concludes his short discourse, with some very quick and lively strokes of learned raillery upon his opponent, charges him with utter ignorance in his own profession, and incapacity of translating, or, consequently, of understanding perfectly what he had written in his Britannia; and offers to submit the points in dispute to the Earl Marshal, to the College of Heralds, to the Society of Antiquaries, or to four persons learned in these studies. All this did not hinder Brooke from returning to the charge; he wrote a Second Discovery of Errors, in which he pursued the same method he had taken in the former, that is to say, he set down first a passage in Camden, then the objections raised against it in his first book; next Camden's answer in his own words; and last of all, his reply; but, for reasons that are not known to us, this was not published. The shrewdest part of it is the Appendix, in which he sets down, in two columns, the passages objected to in Mr Camden's edition of 1594, and the same passages as they stood in this edition of 1600, which puts it in the power of the reader to judge, at one view, of the real sentiments of our learned author as to Brooke's animadversions. This piece, about an hundred years after the death of it's author, was printed from a manuscript of the late learned and worthy John Aultis, Esq; Garter King at Arms (44), and has given us an opportunity of entering more thoroughly into the nature of this controversy, than it was possible for writers to do, who had not seen the latter, as well as the former, performance of Brooke's, in which there are (mixed with much bitterness) abundance of useful and curious passages.

[I] The British, English, Irish, or Norman Histories.

VOL. II. No. 95.

The title of this work at large runs thus, Anglica, Normannica, Hibernica, Cambrica, à Veteribus descripta: ex quibus Asser Nenevensis, Anonymus de vitâ Gulielmi Conquestoris, Thomas Walsingham, Thomas de la More, Gulielmus Gemuticensis, Giraldus Cambrensis. Plerique nunc in lucem editi ex Bibliothecâ Gulielmi Camdeni. Francofurti, folio 1603. There could not be a stronger proof of our author's candour or zeal for the honour of his country, or the advantage of the Republick of Letters, than this publication of our ancient Historians (45). It plainly shews, that he was very far from being desirous to lock up in his private study, as curiosities, such pieces as, if divulged, might prove of publick utility. He was sensible how great a loss the learned world would sustain, by his laying aside the design he once had formed of writing an English History, and therefore he thought himself obliged in justice, to add to the small stock of materials already prepared, these original and valuable authors. This is the account that himself gives in his Epistle to Sir Fulk Grevil, and it is every way sufficient to satisfy the reader as to the uprightness of his intention, and the benevolence of his disposition. His collection was received, as it deserved, with the utmost applause of the most learned abroad, and with all possible respect and gratitude at home, where it has served for a foundation for most of our modern histories (46).

[K] Or of it's being worthy of him. It will be proper, before we say any thing of this work, to give the reader it's title, in which also he will find the contents briefly inserted. In the original edition it stands thus: Remaines of a Greater Work concerning BRITAIN, the Inhabitants thereof, their Languages, Names, Surnames, Empreses, Wise speeches, Poesies, and Epitaphes, London, 1605, 4to. It is addressed to the Right Worshipful, Worthy, and Learned Sir Robert Cotton of Conington, Knight; and the author makes it the sole business of his Dedication to disparage his book, treating it as an indigested heap of fragments that he left to be played with by the wind, which he knew to be unworthy of the person to whom they were presented, and should not therefore be offended, however he thought fit to dispose of them. But the true reason of this conduct was, that he might escape any such attacks as had been made upon his Britannia, it was this made him depreciate his collection, and call it 'the out-cast rubbish of a greater and more serious work, the pitiful silliness whereof would secure it from envy, which only reaches at eminence.' It was for the same reason that he subscribed it only with the final letters of his name, and delayed so long the publication, for the Epistle Dedicatory is dated the 12th of June 1603, but the book was not published 'till 1605. Dr Smith indeed places it in 1604 (47); which is not only contrary to the title-page of the first edition which lies before me, but to the authority of Camden himself, who sets it down thus in his Memoranda, 1605 At Jara prodierunt primum, i. e. In 1605 the Remains were first published (48). By the way, this shews his real sentiments of that work; for, except the first edition of his Britannia, and his Greek Grammar, he takes no notice of the other works he published before it. It is expressly ascribed to Camden

(45) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 39.

(46) See Dr Brady's and Mr Tyrell's Introduction to their respective Histories.

(47) Vit. Camd. p. 77.

(48) Memorabil. de seiplo.

(44) The title runs thus: A second Discovery of Errors published in the much-commended Britannia, 1594, very prejudicial to the Descents and Successions of the ancient Nobility of this Realm; with a Reply to Mr Camden's Apology ad I. etlorum, in his fifth edit. 1600, by Nath. Brooke, Esq; York Herald of Armes, London, printed for James Woodman, 1723, 4to.

He wrote, besides, many short but learned and valuable essays on British Antiquities, most of them at the request, and in compliance with the practice of that learned Society of Antiquaries, we have mentioned in another place (i), and of which he was a member; some of these have been preserved and published, and, from the perusal of them, we have reason to regret that others are lost, or, at least, concealed from the view of the world, and hindered from affording those lights, which men addicted to these studies will always reap from the writings of this judicious author. Those that are still extant, we owe to the care of the industrious and laborious Thomas Hearne (k) [L]. Who in this, and other respects, has merited greatly from the publick. In 1606, began our author's correspondence with the famous President de Thou, which continued to their mutual satisfaction for eleven years, that is to the death of that worthy magistrate and faithful Historian, during which time, he received many notices, with respect to the affairs of this island, from his judicious and faithful correspondent, which, with much kindness and gratitude, he acknowledged (l). The discovery of the Powder-plot gave him a fresh occasion of employing his pen in the service of the publick. It seems, that his Royal Master King James, after providing that posterity in this kingdom should be for ever put in mind of the wonderful deliverance himself and the nation received, by an Anniversary Thanksgiving, thinking it proper to put the Reformed Churches abroad upon their guard, against those inveterate enemies of the Protestant Religion, as well as to satisfy foreign Princes of all Religions of the justice of his proceedings, made choice of Mr Camden, as best qualified to draw up the whole case in a Latin style agreeable to the subject. This, with great accuracy, elegance, and spirit, he performed, and his work, to shew by whose authority it was compiled, issued out from the press of the King's Printer (m). It was not long after (and indeed, it is no wonder) put into the list of prohibited books by the Inquisition at Rome (n), and probably will retain it's place there as long as that continues in any credit. On the 7th of September 1607, he had the misfortune to fall from his horse, by which he hurt his leg in such a manner, that he was not able to stir abroad for many months (o). It was in this year, that he put his last hand to, and published, that noble and compleat edition

(i) See the article AGARD (ARTUR) in this Dictionary.

(k) See his Collection of curious Discourses written by eminent Antiquaries upon several heads in our English Antiquities. Oxon. printed at the Theatre, 1720, 8vo.

(l) Memorabil. de seipso. Epistola Camdeni, p. 68, 73, 97, 139, 153.

(m) This was published in 1607 in 4to, by John Norton, his Majesty's Printer, in Latin, Greek, and Hebrew.

(n) Bishop Gibson's Life of our author.

(o) Memorabil. de seipso.

by his adversary Brooke, in his Second Discovery of Errors, and indeed I do not know that ever any doubt was made of it's being his; and as to the value of the work, the number of editions it has run through, and the additions made to it by John Philpot Somers-Herald, very clearly shew the reception it met with amongst such as were bell judges of it's contents. Yet there is a certain author who, with mighty professions of veneration for Mr Camden, hath treated it very freely (49). 'There are in it, says he, a deal of good collections, touching the languages, money, furs, names, and apparel of our British and Saxon Antiquities, but his list of proper names might be considerably enlarged and corrected by what Scottelius and Dr Gibbon have written on that subject. As for his allusions, rebus, and anagrams, he himself feared they would pass for foolish fopperies, and I do not care for thwarting, without good reason, any of his opinions. The conceits in impresses, apophthegms, poems, epigrams, and epitaphs are endless, and therefore hardly worth registering in a work of this nature.' The proper answer to this indirect and timid piece of criticism is plainly this. that the author had no conception of what Camden intended to publish in that work, which was to preserve to posterity an infinite number of curious things, which had been communicated to him while he was forming collections for his Britannia, and which, from his own experience, he very well knew might prove very useful, and therefore must prove very acceptable to such as were lovers of Antiquities. To say the truth, it is very difficult to determine whether our prudent and judicious author gave a higher proof of his exquisite penetration, in rejecting what this book contains, when he framed his Description of Britain, or in putting together these materials when he had so rejected them, and leaving them, as he has done, to the consideration and use of proper judges amongst posterity. If an Architect, who, upon publick notice of his design to erect some stately edifice for general use, should be so supplied with all kind of costly materials, as to be able to finish his design compleatly, and yet have much of those materials to spare, would any wise man blame him either for not crowding them all in, or for not burying the stones, breaking the bricks, or burning the beams that were left? They know little, very little, of the pleasure, and even utility, of collecting what cannot be inserted in a work so highly finished as the Britannia, who blame Mr Camden for sorting and publishing his Remains; and they enter very little into his spirit, who take literally what he says in prejudice to that work, which if he had thought such a heap of rubbish and pitiful silliness, as he styles it, he would not have kept or published, much less inscribed it to Sir Robert Cotton, that great patron of Learning, of Antiquities, and of Camden. But some men have the misfortune of mistaking a humour of finding fault, for a true critical genius; a low punning wit, for a fine vein of raillery, and a confused remembrance of many books, for universal learning. Such men as these may write folio's without leaving Remains, but the dreams of Homer will be always more esteemed, than the waking thoughts of rhymers, who are poets in no man's conception but their own.

[L] Of the industrious and laborious Thomas Hearne. This well-meaning and indefatigable man, in the Collection, which he published, of curious discourses written by eminent Antiquaries, has preserved several pieces of Mr Camden's, which otherwise had been buried in oblivion, and which notwithstanding most certainly deserved a better fate. The first of these is, A short Account of the Antiquity, Office, and Privilege of Heralds in England (50), in which he seems to think this term is of German original, and that it signifies old or ancient Master, or, as I find it explained by another writer on the same subject, a person stiled Sir, or Master, on account of his venerable age. He likewise observes, that the first mention he finds of them was about the time of King Edward I, when in a statute relating to Arms and Weapons it was directed, that the Kings of Heralds should wear no armour but their swords pointless, and that they should only have their Houfes des Armes, which he conceives to be their coats of arms. He adds, that the name and honour of them was never greater than in the time of King Edward III. when there were Kings of Arms, Heralds, and Pursuivants by patent, not only peculiar to the King, but belonging also to the principal Nobility. The second discourse of Mr Camden's is dated June 29th, 1604, upon which, probably, it was read in the Society of Antiquaries; the title is, Of the diversity of names of this Island (51); in which our author uses many things before involved either in his Britannia, or Remains, and advances some that are in neither. Upon the same subject, discourses were read at the same time, and before the same society, by those eminent Antiquaries Mr Joseph Holland, Mr Arthur Agard, and Mr Michael Oldsworth, which last gives a high character of Camden in his short treatise. The last treatise is Of the Etymologie and Original of Barons (52); transcribed from Camden's Adversaria, in possession of Lord Hatton, T. S. that is, as I understand it, Thomas Smith, from whose papers Mr Hearne published this Collection.

(49) Nicholson's English Historical Library, p. 5.

(50) A Collection of curious Discourses written by several eminent Antiquaries upon our English Antiquities, p. 85.

(51) Ibid. p. 149.

(52) Ibid. p. 205.

edition of his Britannia, which will remain a perpetual monument of his learning, the rather, as it was erected to the honour of his country. It is from this edition that several English translations have been made, and therefore it is requisite, that in the notes we should take some farther account of it (p) [M]. He had now finished and sent abroad all those pieces, to which his great design had given birth, and thereby put it much in the power of others to prosecute with certainty and ease, those works in which himself had met with so much toil and labour. He had once indeed, as himself informs us, an intention to have written a Civil History of this nation, which was before he undertook his Britannia (q), but he saw that it would cost more than one man's life to bring the very materials of it into order, and therefore he contented himself with adding the large volume of Historians beforementioned, to the collections formerly published, and thereby set an example, which has been happily followed by several learned and worthy persons. But that the remainder of his years might be filled up with something worthy of his great talents, his uncorrupted fidelity, and extensive reputation, he began, in 1608, to digest those materials which he had been for many years collecting towards the History of the reign of Queen Elizabeth (r), to which he had been first excited by his old patron, the Lord Treasurer Burleigh, the performing of which had from that time been requested of him by many other great personages, and with the expectation of which he had filled the minds of all his learned friends. But while he was meditating this great work, he was seized on his birth-day in 1609, with a dangerous illness; and the plague breaking out in his neighbourhood, he was removed to the house of his friend Mr Heather, where, by the care of Dr Giffard his Physician, he, tho' slowly, recovered his health (s). At this time it was, that he made choice of Chislehurst in Kent, for the place of his retirement; and thither he went for the first time, on the 15th of August that year; and returned from thence on the 23d of October following (t). It was in this year also, that a new preferment was intended for our learned author, Dr Sutcliffe, Dean of Westminster, had proposed erecting a College at Chelsea, for a certain number of learned men, who were to make the opposing of Popery the great business of their studies (u). King James was very well pleased with this design, and gave it all the encouragement that could be expected. He named Dr Sutcliffe, the first Provost; seventeen very eminent Divines were appointed Fellows; and to these, as Historians, were added, Mr Camden and Dr John Hayward a Civilian (w). An Act of Parliament also passed for promoting this new foundation; but notwithstanding all this, excepting the erecting the bare shell of a College, there was no progress made (x), so that it turned no other way to Mr Camden's advantage, than by showings, that when the cause of Learning, the Protestant Religion, and the Honour of this Nation, were under consideration, he was always in the thoughts of those who were the best judges. The infirmities of old age were now growing upon him daily, notwithstanding which, he kept up this extensive correspondence both at home and abroad. The History of Queen Elizabeth went on all this time but slowly, on account of the great circumspection used by the author, who neglected no opportunity of consulting State-

(p) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 78.

(q) See his Britannia under the title of Normans.

(r) Memorabil. de seip. fo.

(s) Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 482.

(t) Memorabil. de seip. fo.

(u) Bishop Gibson's Life of our author.

(w) Fuller's Ch. History.

(x) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 49.

Papers,

[M] Take some farther account of it.] It was this last edition, correctly printed in folio, much augmented, amended where it was necessary, and adorned with maps, that procured our author those magnificent titles of the Varro, the Strabo, and the Pausanias of Britain (53); magnificent indeed, and though bestowed upon him by the most judicious men of the age, were what he little affected, one title this work merited which has past deservedly into a kind of prænomens both at home and abroad, so that we find him almost universally stiled the learned Camden (54). To commend it, is needless; our business is, to give an historical account of it, and this leads us to take notice of that multitude of commendatory verses that stand before it, and which had been increasing in every edition; but because we would take notice of them but once, we deferred speaking of them 'till now. Sir George Sydley, a man distinguished both by birth and breeding, wrote a Latin Epigram on the book and it's author; Sir George Buc, who was himself an Antiquary and an Historian, published an Heptastick on the same subject; Dr Grant, his predecessor, wrote a very elegant poem, which stands before all the editions; the learned Dr George Carleton distinguished himself in a congratulatory address in the same language; the celebrated Mr Edmund Bolton, author of Nero Caesar, exercised his pen in a very elegant political Elegy, entitled, A Description of the Frontispiece; Mr John Stradling beforementioned wrote an excellent Epigram in Latin, as the famous B. Doddington did in Greek; and in the same language, the very ingenious and learned, but unfortunate, Henry Cuisse, who suffered with the Earl of Essex, complimented his fellow-student on his labours, and his verses were again prefixed to this edition, though published near seven years after his death; Caspar Dornavius, Janus Gruter, and many others, displayed their affection on the same occasion, so that it may be truly said, no performance of this kind was ever ushered into the world with stronger recommendations. It was taken into Jansson's Atlas, but altered and interpolated, printed at Amsterdam in 1659; it was epitomized by Regnerus Vitellius Zirizæus, and twice printed at Amsterdam, in 1616 and in 1639, 8vo. It was first translated into English, and published in folio, at London, in 1611, by the laborious Dr Philemon Holland, a Physician of Coventry, who is thought to have consulted our author himself, and therefore great respect has been paid to the additions and explanations that occur therein, on a supposition that they may belong to Camden. But in a later edition of the same translation, published in 1636, the Doctor has taken liberties which cannot either be defended or excused. The new translation, made with the utmost fidelity from this last edition of our author's work, was first published in 1695, by Edmund Gibson, of Queen's-college in Oxford, the present Right Reverend Bishop of London, in which besides the addition of notes, and of all that deserved to be taken notice of in Dr Holland's first edition, which, though thrown out of the text, is preserved at the bottom of the page, there are many other augmentations and improvements, all properly distinguished from the genuine work of the author, as they ought to be; and the same judicious method has been pursued in the subsequent edition of the same performance, which may be justly considered as the very best book of it's kind that has been hitherto published, and I am afraid is in no great danger of being deprived of that character by any new undertaking, notwithstanding the many helps now at hand.

[N] As

(53) Blount's Censura Celeberr. Authorum, p. 619.

(54) Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 483.

Papers, the Registers of the Privy-Council, Ambassadors instructions, the Letters of the great men of those times, Parliament Journals, the several Laws and Statutes passed within the period of which he was to write, and, in a word, whatever else was requisite to give him the best and most perfect lights; for which, besides his own numerous collections, he had recourse to the celebrated library of his sincere, constant, and communicative friend, Sir Robert Cotton (y). After all these pains taken, and when the first part; which reached from the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign to the year 1589, was completed and ready for the press, he obtained from his royal master King James, an order or warrant for the printing and publishing it [N]. In pursuance of this it was accordingly elegantly and accurately printed in 1615, and though vast expectations had been raised, both from the nature of the work itself, and the reputation of the author, yet it appears clearly from the reception it met with both at home and abroad, that those expectations were fully satisfied. It must be acknowledged that this was a felicity almost peculiar to our author, and which, without doubt, was owing no less to his great care and attention, than to his superior genius and extensive learning; so that his work may pass for a model in it's kind, being equally perfect in all it's parts (z); a design truly noble in itself! as describing a reign fruitful in great events, and one of the most glorious in our History, taking in at the same time a great part of the most remarkable transactions that happened within this period, throughout the greatest part of Europe, and in other quarters of the world also. The method clear and plain, judiciously laid down, constantly pursued with equal accuracy, skill, and attention. The style is grave, and suited to the majesty of the history, never swelling into a false sublime, or sinking even in the relation of the smallest circumstances, but even and elegant throughout, free from any mixture of affectation, and from a vain and needless ostentation of learning. No way deficient in necessary circumstances, never loaded with tedious or trifling particularities, but proceeding in so just and equal a manner, that the attention of the reader is continually retained, and never embarrassed by any ambiguity or doubtfulness of expression. His reflections short and weighty, his observations natural and instructive, his characters exactly and succinctly drawn, his dates wonderfully correct, and his narrations close, without prejudice to that clearness which is the great beauty of History. But, above all, his veracity, candour, and probity; his gratitude to his mistress, and to his patrons, without any mixture of flattery, much less of falsehood; his freedom from prejudice or prepossessions; his fidelity in reference to persons and to things, are truly admirable; so that we need not wonder at the high praises that were bestowed upon his work in his life-time, or at the great character it has justly preserved, and will ever preserve, with posterity [O].

We

[N] An order, or warrant, for the printing and publishing it. This warrant was formerly in the hands of that eminently learned, worthy, and upright person the Reverend Mr Thomas Baker of St John's, who communicated it to Mr Hearne, but it seems that Dr Smith had a copy of it before, which came likewise into the hands of Mr Hearne amongst the rest of that great man's papers. This warrant runs thus (55),

James R.

WHERE pleasure is, that you cause forthwith, according to our direction to you, so much of the History of England in Latin as we have perused, to be printed and published, that is, from the year of our Lord 1558, until the end of the year a thousand five hundred eighty eight. And this our command shall be your warrant. Given under our signet the 25th of February at our Palace of Whitehall, in the 12th year of our reign of England, France, and Ireland; and of Scotland the 48th.

To our well beloved servants Sir Robert Cotton, Kt. and Baronett; and William Camden, Clarenceux, one of our Kings of Armes.'

[O] And will ever preserve, with posterity. The title of this part of Mr Camden's work, as it was then published, runs thus, Annales rerum Anglicarum & Hibernicarum regnante Elizabethâ ad annum salutis, 1589, Londini, 1615, fol. It was again printed at Frankfort in 1616, in 8vo. In his preface he begins with informing the reader, that somewhat more than eighteen years before he published this first part, he was, without any seeking of his own, excited by the Lord Treasurer Burleigh, to compose the History of the Reign of Queen Elizabeth, in order to which he imparted to him, both from his own, and Her Majesty's Collections, papers, letters, memorials, &c. These he sorted and perused with much less profit than he expected, and the Lord Treasurer, and the Queen herself, dying soon after, he quitted for some time the thoughts of executing so laborious a design, hoping that it would be undertaken by some other pen. Perceiving, however, in process of time, that these expectations were vain, he again (in 1608) resumed his former intention, and took care to increase his stock of materials to the utmost extent of his power, as well by the assistance of his friends, particularly Sir Robert Cotton, as by reviewing his own stores; for tho', says he, I have been a studious admirer of venerable Antiquity, yet have I not been altogether an incurious spectator of modern occurrences, and have farther had the assistance of great men, who had their share in transacting of affairs, and those too with respect to religious disputes of both parties. He proceeds then to shew, from Polybius, the true ends of History, and the proper manner of writing it, and professing, that he had laid aside hope and fear, prejudice and prepossession, he goes on to give an account of what he proposed to himself in compiling this History, which, as it more immediately concerns our design of placing his life and character in their true light, we will give the reader in his own words. 'My work, I have, entitled, by the name of Annals; in regard, I have disposed every thing in it's proper year; for I have learned of Tacitus, that weighty and remarkable occurrences are to be digested, by way of Annals; and that the principal business of Annals, is to preserve virtuous actions from being buried in oblivion, and to deter men from either speaking or doing what is amiss, for fear of future shame. Besides, a coarser and shorter style (such as this of mine) is proper and peculiar to things written by way of Annals. Upon these foundations, I set myself to writing, with this intention and design, I went forward; and in composing, polishing, and perfecting my undertaking, I resolved to spend my whole pains at spare times; and to bequeath them, by my last testament, to that honourable personage, James Augustus de Thou, who has with singular commendations of his fidelity and moderation, begun an History of his own time. And this, I did, lest one so much respected by me, as indeed, all strangers are, should, as one unacquainted in a foreign

(y) See his Preface to the first Part of the Annals.

(z) See Mr Selden's Letter, prefixed to Vincent's Discovery of Errors, in the first edition of the Catalogue of Nobility.

(55) See Thomas Hearne's Preface prefixed to the first Vol. of his edition of Camden's Annals.

We must indeed allow, that some objections were made with respect to the account he has given of the unfortunate Mary Queen of Scots, as if he had been biassed therein, from a complaisance for her son who was his Sovereign; but there does not appear any just ground for these suggestions, much less for what has been asserted, that his work was altered or castrated, and that it did not appear to the world as it fell originally from his pen (a). These points have been very freely and judiciously canvassed by a very great author, who has also examined what has been thrown out, with respect to the difference between his own relations, and the memoirs communicated by him to his learned friend and constant correspondent M. de Thou, upon that subject (b). A severe, but just, picture, he has drawn of the English and Irish Papists, and his full and accurate accounts of their many secret plots and contrivances, as well as frequent rebellions against Queen Elizabeth, provoked that party extremely; and as there were at that time many fugitives abroad, who made it their business to disturb and impose upon the world by their writings, to which all foreign presses were open, they failed not to lay hold of this occasion to abuse and traduce Mr Camden, and to vent a multitude of calumnies against him, which had frequently as little of probability in them as of truth. Amongst the rest, a certain virulent writer, who pretended to give the world a History of Irish affairs, attacked our author with equal fury and falsehood, insinuating that he had been of their religion, but had been drawn from it by ambitious and secular views (c). The nature of this charge, and the confidence with which it was made, induced some of Mr Camden's best friends to think that it deserved an answer, and the Government of Ireland condescending so far as to take notice of this malicious performance, and to refute the principal facts contained therein, an account was sent to Mr Camden of their design, with an offer that his justification should be included in the same piece (d). But it seems he judged otherwise of the matter, and thought it better to treat such kind of libels with contempt. We have, however, the letters which he wrote upon this subject, particularly to that wise and great Prelate (e) the Lord Primate Usher, which fully refute these calumnies, and very clearly prove, that as he ended, so he began the world, with just notions of the Protestant religion, for which he was actually persecuted at the university, at the very time that it was suggested he showed himself of opposite principles, which, however, could not move him to enter into any controversy [P]. There is good reason to believe, that the vast resort

(a) Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 433.

(b) See the article C A M D E N (WILLIAMS) in Bayle.

(c) Analect. de reb. Catholic. in Hibern. 1616, 8vo. p. 113.

(d) Camdeni Epist. p. 236, 237.

(e) This Letter is dated from Chislehurst, July 10, 1618, Camdeni Epist. p. 246, 247, 248.

to

‘ a foreign state, be at a loss in the affairs of our country. But in this my purpose, I was, I know not by what fate, prevented, and a great part of these Annals were sent over to him some years before, when they lay yet shadowed in their first lineaments, and were scarce well begun, disfigured with blurs and dashes, and chafms and patches, here and there tacked together, as they slip from my hasty pen, and worse mangled by the transcriber. Out of these, by taking away some things, changing and adding others, he has inserted some few passages in the eleventh and twelfth tomes of his History; but indeed, by his grave and solid judgment, much rectified and refined. But whereas he, according to the proportion of his work, (for he undertakes an universal History of his time) has only selected a few passages concerning England and Ireland, and omitted a great many things that may please, and perhaps behove those of our country to be acquainted with; and having myself heard, that the knowledge of our affairs is earnestly desired by foreigners, and that not without some check and reproach of our remissness in communicating them, I again settled myself to a work I had for some time discontinued. I read it all over and considered of it again, added some things, and in some measure polished the stile of it, tho' without any affected flights of eloquence, or quaint ways of expression. For I think it sufficient, if like a picture drawn in weak and faint colours, it is placed in a good and advantageous light. Yet after all, whether I should publish it or not, I could not well determine. But the truth is, those censures and prejudices, that hatred and calumny, which I foresee, advance their ensigns, and found the charge against me, have not so much discouraged me; as my love of truth, my affection to my country, and the memory of that Prince (which among Englishmen ought to be held for ever sacred) have borne me up against those men, who have shaken off their allegiance to their prince and country, endeavour to eclipse the reputation of one, and the glory of the other, by spitting forth their venom and inveterate malice in their scandalous libels, published in foreign parts; and at this very instant (as they stick not to own) are ready to leave to posterity, in a large volume, a monument of their lewdness and dishonesty. For my part, I desire nothing more than that I may be like myself, and

VOL. II. No. XCVI.

‘ they like themselves, posterity will give every one the honour that is his due. What the loftiness of the argument requires, I confess, and am sorry I have not come up to, yet what pains I was able, I have willingly bestowed. Myself I have not in the least satisfied, either in this or my other writings, yet I shall think myself well rewarded for my labour, if by my cheerful willingness to preserve the memory of things, to relate the truth, and to train up the minds of men to honesty and wisdom, I may thereby find a place amongst the petty writers of great matters. WHATEVER IT BE, I DEDICATE AND CONSECRATE IT AT THE ALTAR OF TRUTH TO GOD, TO MY COUNTRY, AND TO POSTERITY.’ It is not easy to find out stronger words to bind a man to the most scrupulous regard of verity; and considering the character he had for probity, one cannot believe that he gave these assurances with a design to forfeit them. We may form some judgment of the great reputation it acquired him, both in his own country and abroad, by the many testimonies to that purpose, assembled by Sir Thomas Pope Blount (56).

[P] Could not move him to enter into any controversy.] We shall in this note fully clear up the boldest attack that was ever made upon our author's character, which is the more reasonable, because hitherto, we have had but very dark accounts of the matter. In the first place, it is not well agreed who was the author of that scandalous book, in which our author was attacked; but it seems very fully made out by Mr Harris, who published the last edition of Sir James Ware's works, that it was written by Dr David Roth, who was for many years titular Bishop of Ossory, and Vice-Primate of Ireland (57). Dr James Usher, afterwards Archbishop of Armagh, gave him the first notice, that an answer was preparing to this libel, by order of the State; and that Dr Thomas Ryves, a Master in Chancery, afterwards knighted, was the person upon whom this task was imposed, and who, says this learned person to Mr Camden, ‘ is very desirous to be certified from you, in what sort you would have him answer that calumination of our Irish libeller, where he intimateth, that you dissemble your religion, and write otherwise than you think, delusus spe hujus seculi, & mundani honoris lenocinio illectus (58).’ Dr Ryves himself also wrote to our author upon the same subject, and offered him all the service in his power. A short

(56) Censura Celebriorum Authorum, p. 618, 619.

(57) Sir James Ware's Works, Vol. III. p. 222.

(58) Epist. Camdeni p. 237.

to him of persons of all parties and of all religions, might give a handle to this opinion; but though our author suspected it he continued his old way of living, and would not alter it on account of these groundless aspersions. He thought himself safe from the consciousness of his own innocence, and as it was the custom of all foreigners, distinguished either by their birth or learning, to pay their respects to him when they visited England, he received them with the same kindness and civility as formerly, and would not deprive himself of the honour and satisfaction he received from thence, to stop the mouths of angry and discontented men, in which he was certainly in the right, and thereby gave a noble testimony of the firmness of his mind, and that freedom from fear which naturally attends a freedom from guilt (f). The great commendations the first part of his work had met with, were sufficient to have encouraged him to proceed, if the natural steadiness of his temper, and a desire of perfecting what he had once begun, had not been a sufficient motive to the prosecuting his glorious undertaking. Yet he was so far sensible of the inconveniencies that attend the publication of unwelcome truths, while those whom they concern, or their immediate descendants, are living, and had been made so uneasy by the consequences of this kind that attended the publication of his first volume, that he resolved the second should not come abroad during his life (g) [2]. This was certainly a very wise and prudent determination, which left him at full liberty to continue his History with the same free and impartial spirit with which it was begun. After this point was once settled, he went on with so great cheerfulness, that, notwithstanding his weak

(f) See his Diary, commonly intitled, his Annals of the Reign of James I, July 1, 1619.

(g) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 58.

paragraph from Mr Camden's Answer, in regard to the opinion he entertained of such defences, will answer our purpose sufficiently. 'As for the aspersion by your Analestis, it is common to me, with the most reverend and learned Prelates of our Church, from Papists and others: and as they, even so I, reclia conscientia clypeo tutus, smile at it, as having received excess of injuries, traduced as an heretic by Parsons, Passevinus, the Index Expurgatorius of Spain, and divers others, but transant. This kind of devil is not cast out, but with contempt. My life and my writings shall apologize for me. And so wishing you happy success in your charge imposed, I rest, &c (59). But tho' he wrote thus briefly to this gentleman as a stranger, yet in his Answer to Dr Usher, he speaks more largely, and gives us some very remarkable circumstances of his own History, for which reason it is necessary to insert part of that letter. 'I thank God, my life hath been such among men, as I am neither ashamed to live nor fear to die, being secure in Christ my Saviour, in whose true religion I was born and bred in the time of King Edward VI, and have continued firm therein. And to make you my confessor, sub sigillo confessionis, I took my oath thereunto, at my matriculation, in the University of Oxon (when Popery was predominant); and for defending the religion established, I lost a fellowship in All-Souls, as Sir Daniel Dun could testify, and often would relate, how I was opposed there by the Popish faction. At my coming to Westminster I took the like oath, where (absit jactantia) God so blessed my labours, that the now Bishops of London, Durham, and St Asaph, to say nothing of persons employed now in eminent places abroad, and many of especial note at home, of all degrees, do acknowledge themselves to have been my scholars; yea, I brought there to church divers gentlemen of Ireland, as Walthes, Nugents, O-Reily, Shees, the eldest son of the Archbishop of Casilles, Peter Lombard, a merchant's son of Waterford, a youth of admirable docility, and others bred popishly and so affected. I know not who may say, that I was ambitious, who contented my self in Westminster-school, when I writ my Britannia, and eleven years afterwards, who refused a mastership of Requests offered, and then had the place of a King of Arms, without any suit, cast upon me. I did never set sail after present preferments, or desired to soar higher by others. I never made suit to any man, no not to His Majesty, but for a matter of course incident to my place; neither, God be praised, I needed, having gathered a contented sufficiency by my long labours in the school. Why the Analestis should so censure me, I know not; but that men of all humours repair unto me, in respect of my place, and rest content to be belied by him, who is not ashamed to belie the Lords Deputies of Ireland, and others of honorable rank. Sed hæc tibi uni & soli. It is certain, that in this our author formed a very right judgment, for to contend with men, who boldly assert any thing, without thinking themselves at all obliged to produce proof, is equally endless, and to no purpose. Besides, this author had traduced the whole state of Ireland, and would have persuaded the world, that at a time, that kingdom enjoyed the greatest peace and quiet, the government was carrying on a flaming persecution, which gave him an opportunity of framing a martyrology (60), in which he sets down, a person executed for High-Treason, and another who died, at upwards of fourscore, of mere old age. How far the government might act wisely, in justifying its proceedings against those aspersions, is another question, but for a private man, like Mr Camden, to enter into a dispute, with an unknown person, who had consequently no reputation to lose, and might aver what he pleased, was a very unequal match, and therefore very prudently declined.

[2] The second should not come abroad during his life. It is certain, that notwithstanding the great care and circumspection used by our author, in writing the first part of his Annals, they exposed him to the resentment of numbers of persons, who thought themselves injured by the accounts he gave, either of them or of their ancestors; and many of these testified their resentments, in methods suitable to their dispositions. Amongst the rest, there was one Mr Maitland, the son of the famous Laird of Liddington, who made so great a figure in the troubles of Scotland, by adhering faithfully to Queen Mary. It was on the one hand, impossible for our author to pass over this gentleman's behaviour and character in writing his history; and on the other, it was hardly possible for him to treat this subject with greater mildness or caution than he did; and yet his son wrote a very long letter, which is still extant, to Mr Camden, in which, tho' in very respectful terms, he very plainly expresses his distaste at what he had published, and demands the satisfaction of seeing those authorities, which were requisite to justify what he had written (61). It is uncertain whether our author gave him that satisfaction or not, though, without doubt, it was in his power, since he carefully preserved the collections he had made with great pains, for the support of the facts by him delivered, most of which are still in being, or at least were so long after his decease; but it must certainly have been very uneasy to him, to find himself continually exposed to such enquiries and demands, and therefore, we cannot wonder that he should decline multiplying these inconveniencies, by publishing the second part of his work. Yet it is very certain, that he was not absolutely determined in this point, but from a consciousness of his own integrity and respect for truth, was willing, if it had been at all necessary, that it should have come abroad, as appears plainly in the following passages, from a letter of his written to a person of great Quality, tho' to whom is unknown. 'I submit the Supplement of the Annals of Queen Elizabeth's reign to His Majesty's judicious censure: whether it please him, they shall be suppressed, or published, for I am indifferent.' And he concludes the same letter in these terms. 'As I do not dislike, that they should be published in my life-time, so I do not desire, that they should be set forth in English, until after my death, knowing how unjust carpens the unlearned readers are (62).'

(60) Sir James Wate's Works, Vol. III. p. 222.

(59) Ibid. p. 247.

(61) Camb. Epist. p. 305.

(62) Ibid. p. 357.

weak and infirm state of health, he absolutely completed his book in the year 1617; but though he made no difficulty of owning this to his learned friends, yet he deliberated several years about the disposal of this work, that he might have a moral certainty of it's coming abroad as he left it, and not be either altered or suppressed. The method he took was equally judicious and successful; he kept the original by him, which was preserved in the Cotton Library, and he sent a very exact copy of it to his friend Mr Dupuy, who had given him the strongest assurances, that he would punctually perform what so great a trust required (b), which he did with the greatest fidelity [R]. We have placed these facts together, though they happened at some distance of time, for the sake of perspicuity, and that the thread of the narration, with respect to so material a point, might not be broken or interrupted. In the latter end of the year 1616, there happened an affair which exposed Rafe Brooke, who had given our author so much trouble, to very severe censure, and we rather mention it, because the best account of it extant fell from the pen of Mr Camden (i), though for what reason it is impossible to say, it is left out in the English translation of that work (k), in which he thought fit to record it, and is very imperfectly told by other writers. We have reason, therefore, to believe, that the reader will be very well satisfied to find it fairly and faithfully stated in the notes [S]. This affair

(b) V. Cl. Petri Puteani Vitam à Rigaltio conscriptam. Paris. 1652. 4^{to}, p. 50.

(i) See his Diary, Dec. 26, 1616.

(k) In the second Vol. of Kennet's Compleat Hist. of England.

[R] Which he did with the greatest fidelity.] The great reputation of Mr Camden, procured him very early a large correspondence abroad, which was very useful to him, while he was collecting materials for, or corrections and improvements of, his Britannia; and these lasted during his whole life. His foreign friends, therefore, interested themselves extremely in the preservation, as well as the credit of his works; and it was to their solicitations, that his resolutions of sending a copy of his manuscript abroad, was principally owing. The celebrated Mr de Peiresc, so much better known to the learned world by his Latin name of Peirescius, was one of the most pressing, in one of his letters to our author, he has the following passage

(63) 'We have advice from Germany, that they have there printed the History of the late Monsieur de Thou entire; my impatience, is great to see what it is. This puts me in mind of your's, and to desire, that it may be got out of your hands, for the publick benefit. If M. de Thou's had been in no body's hands but his own, it would run the hazard of being suppressed, for his executors, and the tutors of his children, would have committed it to the flames, for the sake of their private interest; Mr Linghelsein, to whom the late M. de Thou confided a copy, has prevented this. If Mr Grotius, would but have believed us, more than six months before his misfortune happened, there had been a copy of his History in this kingdom, and consequently out of the reach of all by whom he is either hated or envied. For the glory of God, think of your's, and if there are any difficulties that hinder your putting it to the press, during your life-time, let there be more copies than one, and let them not all be on the same side of the sea. This, by all the affection I have for you, I conjure; remaining, &c.'

This letter is dated from Paris, October 14, 1620. It appears, however, by a letter from Mr Dupuy, that he had not received the second part of his Annals some time afterwards; but at length, it was sent by a very safe hand, was carefully preserved, and faithfully published. This account differs pretty much from what a famous writer tells us, upon this subject, in a treatise, where one would have thought he should have taken care to be very exact. His own words deserves notice

(64) 'Monsieur de Thou having intended to make his History general, entered into a correspondence with the men over all Europe, that were most likely to inform him right; so he was in a great correspondence with Camden. And when Camden's first volume appeared, he writ severely to him, finding that it was so different, from what had passed between them in letters, chiefly with relation to the Queen of Scots; upon which Mr Camden told him the truth, That King James, would needs revise it himself, and afterwards put it into the Earl of Northampton's hands, who was brother to the Duke of Norfolk, that had been beheaded on that Queen's account; and that many things were struck out, and many things altered: this troubled Camden extremely, who took care that his second part should not run the same fate: and therefore he sent it out of England to that great man, that it might be printed faithfully after his death. This is well known in England, and the sending the second part

' beyond sea to a foreigner, does very easily carry a man to believe this to have been the true reason of it.' It is very justly observed, by a very learned Prelate, that nothing ought to be believed of the complaints, said to be made by M. de Thou, against our author, unless it be proved by his letters, because there are numbers extant, which clearly shew the contrary, which acknowledge Mr Camden's assistance, admit the prudence of his advice, apologize for the neglect of it, promise corrections in future editions, desire the continuance of his correspondence, and put both their cases upon the same foundation, that of being ill thought of, for intending well (65). The first notion of Camden's work being corrupted, came from an oration made at Oxford, in his praise, by Lewis Du Moulin, who affirmed the thing was out of doubt, but did not think fit to mention any authority, as he might have done without fear, considering the time at which he delivered his oration, viz. July 10, 1652 (66). It was from him, in all probability, that Mr Wood took it, but still without proof (67); and what seems totally to destroy the fact is, that in the last edition of his Annals, published by Mr Hearne, from a copy corrected and fitted for the press by Mr Camden's own hand, there is very little, and nothing material, altered, with respect to Mary Queen of Scots. As to his sending it abroad to de Thou, there are some objections that render that a little incredible; first, because it is more than probable, that he was dead before the book was finished; next, because it is certain, that the author had determined nothing about the publication of it, 'till many years after that worthy person was in his grave; and even then he submitted it to the good pleasure of the King, whether it should be published or suppressed; and if published, whether in his own life-time or not. Thirdly, after all these precautions taken, there was a copy sent abroad to Mr Dupuy, according to the advice of M. de Peiresc, but the original remained here in England; and from thence the last edition of the work has been both corrected and augmented. The second part was first printed at Leyden in 1625, 8vo. at London 1627, fol. again at Leyden 1639, 8vo. and several times since; but the most correct edition of the whole work is that published by Thomas Hearne from Dr Smith's copy, corrected by Camden's own hand, collated also with another manuscript in Mr Rawlinson's library (68). Both parts were translated into French by M. Paul de Pelligent, Advocate in the Parliament of Paris; from which language it was translated into English by one M. d'Arcy, but with many errors (69). There have been several other translations, but none at all worthy of the author's admirable performance, and therefore it is much to be wished, that even at this distance of time, the same justice might be done to his History of Queen Elizabeth, that has been already done to his Britannia; the rather because a good translation of that work, illustrated with notes, and compared with the best accounts of those times, that have been since published, could not but be acceptable at this juncture, when no branch of Literature seems to have more admirers than History, and English History is more particularly distinguished.

[S] Faithfully stated in the notes.] The plain and naked account of the matter is this, that on the 27th of December 1616, complaint was made to the King, that

(65) Camd. Epist. p. 68, 73, 97, 139, 153.

(66) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 54.

(67) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 483.

(68) In 8vo. without any Printer's name or place, A. D. 1717.

(69) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 483.

(63) Ibid. p. 309, 310.

(64) Burnet's Reply to Varillas, p. 59.

affair made so much noise in the world, that, on the third of March following, the Commissioners for executing the office of Earl Marshal of England, met at the College of Heralds in Darby-place, and proposed various regulations, such as the augmenting their salaries, removing their wives out of the college, and correcting other abuses, for recovering the credit, and maintaining the reputation, of that honourable society (l). Our author seems to have been, all this time rather a calm spectator than a busy actor, even in matters that might have fallen properly enough within his province, yet he was extremely revered by the wisest, greatest, and best men of his time, as appears very clearly from his own Diary. He spent his summers most at Chislehurst, and his winters at his house in Westminster, occupied in both places, as far as his infirm state of health would allow, in serious and useful studies, as is evident by the observations he set down relating to the weather, the appearance of comets, and other things of the like nature (m). Jan. 19, 1619, the Painters, Glaziers, and Stone-cutters, were summoned to the Herald's Office, in order to be made acquainted with certain regulations that had been thought necessary, in relation to the painting and otherwise representing of arms. On the tenth of February following, Mr Camden was seized with a dangerous distemper, vomiting blood to such a degree, that he swooned twice; but, by the care of his Physician, being twice let blood in three days, he grew better (n). In the month of June 1619, he had a warm dispute with his brethren, Garter and Norroy, Kings at Arms, who it seems took it amiss that he should appoint Mr Vincent to visit Lincolnshire, and Mr Philpot to visit Kent (o), the former of which it appeared was a misinformation; but notwithstanding he acquainted them with this, they complained to the Commissioners for executing the office of Earl Marshal against him, as if he had exceeded the powers granted him by his patent; but Mr Camden in his Answer to the Earl of Arundel, in which the powers before-mentioned are transcribed, gave such full satisfaction in this point, as, for any thing that appears, prevented any farther trouble to him on this subject (p). In the beginning of the year 1621, he was sent for to Court, and consulted by the Lord Chancellor Bacon, in reference to the ceremonies to be used in creating him Viscount St Alban's, and on the twenty-seventh of January following, in consequence of what was then agreed on with him and Norroy King at Arms, the Chancellor was, with great solemnity, created Viscount St Alban's, the Lord Carew carrying the robe of state, the Lord Wentworth the coronet, and the Marquis of Buckingham supporting the new created Peer (q). On the first of May 1621 he went to Sanderherst, to look for the camp of the Emperor Alexander Severus, but could meet with no signs of it; this Emperor being killed in Britain, at a place called Sifila, an opinion prevailed amongst many, that it must have been in that neighbourhood, but this was upon conjecture only, and without any kind of proof in the sentiment of our author (r). It appears plainly from hence, as well as from various other passages in his Diary, that he was still endeavouring to correct, improve, and augment his Britannia, a copy of which, with many such emendations and additions, was in the hands of Dr Thomas Smith (s). In the month of June in the same year, he was present at the execution of a very extraordinary sentence. On the last day of the term, about three in the afternoon, Sir Francis Mitchell, Knt. who had been deeply concerned in the monopoly, by which the innholders and keepers of publick houses were grievously oppressed, was brought by the Sheriffs of London into Westminster-Hall. Soon after came the Commissioners for executing the office of Earl Marshal, viz. the Lord Privy-Seal, the Duke of Lenox, the Marquis of Buckingham, and the Earl of Arundel, several other Lords being present as spectators. Before these the prisoner was brought, then the sentence given against him in Parliament having been read with a loud voice, his spurs were broken in pieces by the servants of the Knight Marshal and thrown away, then his sword

Sir William Segar, Garter King at Arms, had granted the Royal Arms of Arragon, with a Canton of Brabant, to George Brandon, who was the common hangman, at which his Majesty was highly offended. But upon strict enquiry, the fact came out to be, that Rafe Brooke-mouth, York Herald, had actually drawn these Arms, which were not unlike those of Arragon and Brabant, and by an emissary of his, imposing upon the credulity of Garter, for a fee of two and twenty shillings, procured the confirmation of them, and then caused them to be presented to the King (70). Thus Mr Camden plainly, clearly, and fully relates this story; but Dr Smith, who had seen a relation of this affair by another hand, gives us some farther circumstances, tho' he is so cautious, as to leave out Sir William Segar's name (71). He says that the man who came from Brooke pretended, that he was in a mighty hurry, and was to embark that very day on board a ship for Spain, by which means he the more easily drew Sir William Segar, to confirm to him, what he called the Arms of his family. On the 30th of the same month, the whole affair was heard before the Commissioners appointed to execute the office of Earl Marshal, where York Herald openly took upon him the whole affair; and upon report of it made to the King; himself, for his malicious subornation, and Garter for his weakness and credulity in confirming those Arms for the sake of a little money, were both committed to the Marshalsea. On New Year's day a petition from Garter was exhibited to the King, together with a certificate from the Herald's Office, of his integrity and upright behaviour before this unhappy accident; upon which he was released, and soon after the friends of York Herald procured his discharge likewise (72). This plainly shews the restless and turbulent temper of the man and his impious malice, as Mr Camden calls it, against his superior, and yet about two years afterwards, he dedicated a large work of his to King James, and to the Lords Commissioners for executing the office of Earl Marshal of England, who were then, Edward, Earl of Worcester, Lord Privy-Seal; Lodowick, Duke of Lenox, Lord Steward of the Household; George, Marquis of Buckingham, Master of the Horse; Charles, Earl of Nottingham, High Admiral of England; William, Earl of Pembroke, Lord Chamberlain; Thomas, Earl of Arundel, and Thomas, Earl of Suffolk, all Privy-Counsellors and Knights of the Garter (73).

(70) Appar. Annal. regn. reg. Jac. I. p. 23.

(71) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 35.

(72) Appar. Annal. regn. reg. Jac. I. p. 25. Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 37.

(73) See an Account of that work in note [U].

sword, which was of silver and ought to have been gilded, was taken from his side, broke over his head, and also thrown away; lastly, he was pronounced to be no longer a worthy Knight but an errant knave, as had been done before in the case of Andrew de Harclay, when degraded by Anthony Lucy. The three Kings at Arms, during the whole proceeding, sat at the feet of the Lords Commissioners (t). On the last of August the same year, Mr Camden was seized with his old distemper of vomiting blood in the night, but happily recovered (u). He executed, during the course of the next year, as far as his strength would permit, all the duties of his function, but finding himself gradually declining, and his infirmities growing more and more upon him, he resolved to delay no longer the performance of what he had so long ago resolved upon; the founding an History Lecture at Oxford, and accordingly, in the month of May 1622, he sent down his gift by the hands of his intimate friend Mr Heather (w). This was declared by Dr Piers, Dean of Peterborough, and then Vice-Chancellor of the University, in full Convocation, whereupon the university sent him a publick letter of thanks, and because they understood Mr Heather was a person for whom he had a singular respect, they conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Musick, and the like degree they conferred upon Mr Orlando Gibbons, another friend of his, which civility procured them a new benefactor, and a new Lecture in Musick, founded by this Dr Heather (x). Thus Mr Camden amply fulfilled a vow he seemed to have made at the close of his Britannia, and provided for the study of Antiquity in succeeding times, which, by his writings, he had so much illustrated [t]. The first History Professor was Mr Degory Wheare, so appointed by Mr Camden himself, October 16, 1622, and he began to read on the sixth of January following, and he likewise granted the survivorship in the same Lecture to Mr Brian Twine, the famous Antiquary, in case he had out-lived Mr Wheare, but as he did not, the right came to the university (y). It was some time in this year, that his old antagonist, Rafe Brooke, York-Herald, having sent abroad a book with promised mighty things with respect to accuracy and correctness, Mr Camden thought fit to make some notes upon it, in which he detected a great many gross errors, but disdaining at his time of life to enter into new controversies, he did not publish it (z); yet it is very probable, that these notes were of use to his friend Mr Vincent, who attacked Brooke's work with great vigour, and therein shewed not only his own skill, but his gratitude and friendship to Mr Camden, which led us to mention it [U]. On the eighteenth of August, as he

(t) Appar. Anal. regn. Jac. I. p. 72.

(u) Ibid. p. 74.

(w) Bishop Gibbon's Life of our author.

(x) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 483.

(y) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 64.

(z) Dr Smith tells us that he had seen Mr Camden's notes in the possession of Francis Sandford, Esq; of the Herald's Office.

was

[T] Which by his writings he had so much illustrated.] It appears plainly, as we have observed in the text, that he had this generous design in his thoughts about fifteen years before he carried it into execution, from the conclusion of the sixth edition of his Britannia, published in 1607, where he makes use of these words (74). 'Nothing remains now (having carried on this Discourse through so many shallows of the ocean and the rugged rocks, as it were of Antiquity) but that, like the Mariners of old, who use to dedicate their tattered sails or a votive plank to Neptune, I also consecrate something to the Almighty and to venerable Antiquity. A vow which I most willingly make, and which, by the blessing of God, I hope to discharge in due time.' It is also evident, that he communicated his design to, and had the advice thereupon of, his best friends, from the following extract of a letter from Sir Henry Savile, dated from Eaton, of which he was Provost, November 3, 1621 (75). 'I think not amiss to advertise you, that by plain Will, without a Deed executed in life-time, no land will pass to a College or Corporation, as I have heard by my Counsel. I am sure, Merton-College hath felt it: for Doctor Huicke, Queen Elizabeth's Physician, whom you may have heard on, or peradventure known, by will left all his land of good value to his two daughters and their heirs; and for lack of heirs (as we understood, they died without any children both) all his said lands to Merton-College, whereof he was Fellow, but Doctor Bickley laboured, as I have heard, much in it, and could recover nothing. So that you must fly to some such course as I advertised you in my last, or leave it upon Feesees, men of sincerity and judgment, that your death do not frustrate your good intention.' Agreeable to the advice given him by his worthy and judicious friend, Mr Camden, by a Deed drawn by Sir John Walter, executed in due form of law, under his hand and seal (76), the 5th of March, in the nineteenth year of the reign of King James, anno Dom. 1621-2, and acknowledged before Sir R. Rich, Knight, one of the Masters in the High Court of Chancery, on the 14th of April following, made over all his right in the manor of Bexley, in the county of Kent, with all profits, emoluments, &c. arising therefrom to the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars, of the University of Oxford, and their successors, with this proviso, that the profits of the said manor, which were computed to be of the yearly value of four hundred pounds, should be enjoyed by Mr William Heather, his heirs and executors for the space of ninety-nine years, from the death of the donor, during which time the said William Heather, was to pay to the Professor of History in Oxford, one hundred and forty pounds per annum, by half-yearly payments; and after the expiration of that term, the whole estate to be vested in that University. For which judicious and ample donation, he was by that learned body unanimously declared and received into the number of benefactors to the University (77). At the request of many of his friends, he appointed Degory Wheare, Master of Arts, Fellow of Exeter-College, his first reader, assigning him twenty pounds for the first year, forty for the second, and after the third, he was to enjoy the full stipend (78). He wrote and dedicated to his patron, a very learned treatise, which showed him to be every way fit for that office (79), which he held to to the time of his decease, when the University elected in his room, Robert Waring, Master of Arts of Christ-Church, then senior Proctor of the University, August 2, 1647 (80); and he being turned out the next year by the Parliament Commissioners, Lewis du Moulin, Doctor in Physick, was substituted in his place, September 14, 1648, which gave him an opportunity of making the oration in praise of our author, which hath been beforementioned (81). In 1660, he was expelled by the Royal Visitors; and the University elected in his place, John Lamphire, M. D. and Fellow of New-College (82).

[U] Which led us to mention it.] It has been before observed, that Robert Glover, Esq; Somerset-Herald, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, a man universally esteemed and admired for his great abilities in his profession (83), had made considerable collections, in relation to the descents of the Nobility of this kingdom, which were very injudiciously and incorrectly published by his kinsman and executor, Mr Thomas Mills, in 1610, which induced Rafe Brooke, York-Herald, to compose another work of the same nature, which he intitled, A Catalogue and Succession of the Kings, Princes, Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, and Viscounts of this Realme of England, since the Norman Conquest to this present year 1619, together with their Armes, Wives, (77) Bishop Gibbon's Life of our author. Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 484.

(78) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 60.

(79) De ratione & methodo legendi Historias Differentio, 8vo, 1623.

(80) Hist. & Antiq. Oxon. lib. iii. p. 43.

(81) Fast. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 72.

(82) Histor. & Antiq. Oxon. I. ii. p. 43.

(83) Britan. in Comitatu Berchrensi, p. 209.

(74) Camden's Britannia, p. 1116.

(75) Epist. Camd. 314, 315.

(76) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 40.

was sitting in his chair and very thoughtful, he suddenly lost the use of his hands and feet, and

and Children, the Times of their Deaths and Burials, with many of their memorable Actions, discovering and reforming many Errors, committed by Men of other Profession, and lately published in print; to the great wronging of the Nobility and prejudice of His Majesty's Officers of Armes, who are only appointed and sworn to deal faithfully in these Cases. Lond. 1619, fol. and again with corrections and emendations in the same size 1622; before this work, there is large collection of errors in Milles's book, detected with many severe remarks; and in his dedication to the Commissioners for executing the office of Earl Marshal, he complains bitterly, not only of Mr Milles, but of John Stowe, for an error committed in his Annals; and of one Mr Martin, who had written a history of the Kings of England; and the great design of his complaints was, to obtain a restraint upon the press, that nothing might be published for the future upon this subject, but by the licence of the Earl Marshal, or of the Commissioners for the executing that office; not foreseeing, that this was to attempt curing a small inconvenience by a much greater; for books thus licensed, however erroneous, would have been the only books published; and thus, instead of providing for the cure of the disease, he, like a true Quack, suggested the shortest method for rendering it incurable. It was to this book, that Mr Augustine Vincent Rouge Croix Pursuivant, wrote an answer under the title of, A Discovery of errors in the first Edition of the Catalogue of Nobility, published by Rafe Brooke, York-Herald, 1619, and printed herewith word for word according to that Edition, with a Continuance of the Successions from 1619, until this present year 1622; at the end whereof is annexed, a Review of a later Edition by him stolne into the world 1621. London, printed by William Jaggard, 1622, fol. It is dedicated to the Earl of Arundel and Surrey, who was, by this time, become Earl Marshal; and in this dedication, there is a stroke at York's prepossession in favour of the family of his old patron the Earl of Essex, and his prejudice to the Howards. But whoever has a mind to see the true tendency of this controversy, need only peruse the following paragraphs from Mr Vincent's address to Brooke, which stand at the entrance of his performance. 'It is true, when I first entred a novice into the world, I found it posselt of a strange admiration of Master Yorke, his name was grown a terror to men of his own profession, and I, a young novice, could not but be carried with the multitude into the same opinion. Hee had then but newly set forth a book against Master Camden, artificially penned, and like a scholar; I know the Doctor's name that penned it. I then began to observe him, abroad saw him, though loved of few, yet feared of all; heard him sing Magnificat of himself in Pouls, and all the walk bear the quire to him; beheld him marshal funerals solemnly, which I thought was rare. In a word, others admired him; I adored him. This opinion bred in me an infinite desire to be his disciple; but that again seemed too high an ambition. The next point then was, seeing I might not have that beatitude to enjoy his presence in specie, yet to have the fruition of him in speculo in his works. I presently got into my hands his Discoverie against Mr Camden; came to it with fear and trembling, as one that comes to pull a Locke from a Lyon's maine; read him with reverence, and began to find some pretty relife in him, only methought his style was somewhat tart, but that I gessed might proceede out of age: But entring further, and seeing him to grow from vinegar to gall, and from gall to venome, against so renowned and reverend a man, and the same mixt with pride, arrogancie, and admiration of himself; this began a little to shake my former conceite: these things (methought) did not so well sute with a man that were truly learned; but yet these were his moralles (which are not alike tempered in all mens) this toucht not his intelleQuals.

'I then grew bolder, and began to handle him neerer, labouring, by comparing their books, to satisfy myself, whether Master Camden were so blacke as hee had painted him, or not. I found for Master Camden, that if he had erred, he had erred with authority. For Yorke, I saw no proofs, but Pythago- rian proofes, instead of scriptum est, ipse dixit; no record, no antiquitie, but his own antiquity of forty years practise in that study: this I liked not. Besides, I noted in him not only animus contradicendi, a spirit of contradiction, but studium calumniandi, a wilful humour of mistaking, like Hercules in a play, that made monsters of straw for himself to subdue; maliciously perverting and misconstruing what had a true and a right understanding; and, in further process, discovered in him, by the bookes I searched, a great deal of ignorance and insufficiency. Then I clearly found mine error, Tunc ille Aeneas? Is this, Mr Yorke! Are these the fruits of forty years study? I then damned my opinion, and hated myself for it, and that many-headed beast from whom I had received it, taking a document thereby never again to build my judgment, either in good or bad part, upon the vulgar, who set up shadows for faints, and adore wooden images which, in their true worth, were fitter to be made whipping-posts, and blast with their breath, the truly vertuous and noble, of whom the world is unworthy.

'Thus, Mr Yorke, have I shrievd myself to you, what progresse you have made, through my opinion, from the highest steppe to the lowest, and in what termes you stood there, before your late-admired Catalogue came to light; so as now having thus given you a true glasse of my heart, I trust you will be satisfied, that it was not any humour of envie or emulation that drew me into this opposition; but, first, my zeal to truth, which I knew suffered in this discourse; next, your own intolerable arrogance, and pride of conceite; your vilifying, and contempte of others, as if you had stood on the toppe of Parnassus, and saw all men under you no bigger than Jack Dawes; your familiar vaine of detracting from the best and worthiest men: your tongue gilding over no man's name, but that it left a slime behind it: And, lastly, the knowledge and experience I had of your defects, and infinite distance from true sufficiency; and the just disdain which burnt within mee, to see a fellow blowne up by a popular applausse, and almost deified amongst sillie believers (as the storehouse of knowledge) whom I knew to be no better than the tombe of Semiramis, glorious without, and promising, by the inscription, great treasure within, whereas Darius opening it, found his expectation mockt with the sight of a brainlesse skull, and the reliques of dead carkasses. But admit envie had spurred mee on to this worke, doth that prove that what you writ was true? Num quia ego claudas, tu recte incedis? Cloze with me in this point: is that true, or no, which I have written in discovering of your fallhoods? If it be not, you are allowed your traverse: if it be true that I say, what difference or choice is there of the person, whether envie, or detraction, or the Devil himself speake it; truth being ever the same through what mouth, or from what minde soever it passe? In matters of charity, it is true, we looke not what, but with what minde it is given: but in a verdict of truth it is not to be regarded with what minde but what is spoken. Neither can your fifty years practise give you privilege to write untruth by authority, or to set forth things that may appear untrue without authority. But we (you say) take upon trust, and are deceived in the names, beginnings, and titles of families;

———— Mutato nomine de te Fabula narratur ———

It is plain from hence, that the whole of this affair was nothing more than a continuation of the old quarrel between Brooke and Camden, and if it were not so plain, we might add some other convincing proofs. Brooke's motto to his Catalogue is, Quem quisque norit artem, in hac se exerceat, the very same that stood before his book against our author. Mr Vincent's motto is, Pro captu Lectoris habent sua fata libelli, the very same that stood before Mr Camden's Britannia. His title too is the very copy of Brooke's book against Camden, and the method he takes in refuting him, is likewise an exact transcript of his own. But what is more singular is, the recommendations prefixed to this book, and fell down upon the floor, but without receiving any hurt, and soon recovering his strength got up again (a). The account of this misfortune was one of the last things that he committed to writing, it was followed by a severe fit of illness, which lasted to the ninth of November 1623, when he deceased at his house at Chislehurst in the county of Kent, in the seventy-third year of his age (b). By his Will, made his last birth-day, he disposed of what little he had left after founding his History Lecture, in charities to the poor, legacies to his relations, and some small memorials to his particular acquaintance, of which some account will be given at the bottom of the page (c) [W]. His body being removed to his house at London, was, on the nineteenth of the same month, carried to Westminster-abbey in great pomp, the whole college of Heralds attended in their proper habits, great numbers of the nobility and persons of the first distinction accompanied, and at their entrance into the church, the Prebends and other members received the corps in their vestments, with much solemnity, and conducted it into the nave. After the funeral sermon, which was preached by Dr Sutton, and was esteemed an excellent performance, they buried him in the south isle near the learned Casaubon, and over-against the celebrated Chaucer (d). Near the place a handsome monument of white marble was erected, with his effigies to the middle, and in his hand a book with Britannia inscribed on the leaves, under which there is an elegant inscription, but with a mistake as to his age, which is there said to be seventy-four, though he wanted almost six months of seventy-three (e). The university of Oxford also, in respect to a person whose breeding there did her so much honour, as well as out of gratitude for his noble benefaction, paid a remarkable tribute of various kinds of praise to the memory of this great man (f) [X]. His character is thus given

(a) Appar. Annal. regn. reg. Jac. I. p. 82.

(b) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 66.

(c) Bishop Gibson's Life of our author.

(d) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 77.

(e) Bishop Gibson's Life of our author.

(f) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 69.

US

book, under this title: 'The opinions and offices of sundry choice and qualified Gentlemen, friends to the author, touching this his Discoverie of Errors.' These gentlemen were Sir William Segar, Knight, Garter Principal King at Arms; Richard St George, Esq; Norroy King at Arms; Samuel Thompson, Esq; Windsor-Herald; Henry St George, Esq; Richmond-Herald; Henry Chitting, Esq; Chester-Herald; Sampson Lennard, Blewmande Pursuivant; John Philpot, Rouge Dragon; Mr Richard Brathwayte, Mr John Bradshaw, Mr Stephen Clyve, and, to close all, a long letter from John Selden, Esq; which appears to be one of the most laboured and correct things he ever wrote. All I have to add to this long note is, that from the spleenetic attack originally made by Rafe Brooke upon the Britannia, arose very great advantages to the publick, by the sifting and bringing to light as good, perhaps a better and more authentick account of our Nobility, than had been given, at that time, of those in any other country of Europe.

[W] At the bottom of the page.] He wrote his Will himself, upon his last birth-day, May 2, 1623: it having been this constant custom, as appears by his Diary, to spend that day in good works and pious meditations (84). In this his last testament, after a devout introduction, and bequeathing eight pounds to the poor of the parish in which he should happen to die, he bequeaths to Sir Fulk Grevile, Lord Brooke, who preferred him gratis to his office, a piece of plate of ten pounds; to the company of Painter Stainers of London, he gave sixteen pounds to buy them a piece of plate, upon which he directed this inscription, Gul. Camdenus Clarenceux filius Sampsonis, Pictoris Londinensis dono dedit; he bestowed the sum of twelve pounds on the company of Cordwainers or Shoemakers of London, to purchase them a piece of plate, on which the same inscription was to be engraved. To his cousin John Wyat, Painter of London, he bequeathed one hundred pounds; to Mr Camden of London, Silkman, ten pounds; and other legacies to his relations; to Mr Thomas Allen of Gloucester hall in Oxford, he gave sixteen pounds. To Janus Gruter, Library-Keeper to the Elector Palatine, five pounds; and to Mr Harvey, Vicar of Chislehurst, seven; to each of the six Heralds, four pounds; and to each of the Pursuivants, two pounds; to Sir Francis Leigh of Westminster, four pounds; to Sir Peter Manwood, four pounds; to Sir William Pitt, three pounds; to Mr St Loe Kniveton, three pounds; the like to Mr Chamberlayne and to Mr Limiter: to Mr Selden of the Temple, five pounds; to Mr Harding the Usher, for pounds. Several legacies to his servants and dependants. As to his books and papers he directs, that Sir Robert Cotton of Conington, should have the first view of them, that he might take out such as he had borrowed of him, and then he bequeaths to him all his printed book and manuscripts, except such as concern Arms and Heraldry, which, with his ancient seals, he bequeaths to his successor in the office of Clarenceux, provided, because they cost him a considerable sum of money, he gave to his cousin John Wyat, what the Kings at Arms, Garter, and Norroy for the time being, should think fit; and agreed also to leave them to his successor. Of this Will he constituted Dr Heather sole Executor, and appointed Sir Robert Cotton and Mr John Wise, Overseers, giving each of them ten pounds for mourning. It was proved on the 10th of November 1623, before Sir William Byrd, Doctor of Laws, by Doctor Heather his Executor (85). But it must be observed, that notwithstanding this disposition of his books and papers, yet Dr John Williams, then Dean of Westminster and Bishop of Lincoln, afterwards Archbishop of York, procured all the printed books for the new library erected in the Church of Westminster (86). It is understood, that his collections in support of his history, with respect to civil affairs, were before this time deposited into the Cotton library; for as to those that related to ecclesiastical matters, when asked for them by Dr Goodman, son to his great benefactor, he declared he stood engaged to Dr Bancroft, Archbishop of Canterbury, who upon his death, translated his right to them to his successor, Dr Abbot, who actually had them, and intended to have published them. They came afterwards into the hands of Archbishop Laud, and are very reasonably supposed to have been destroyed, when his papers fell into the hands of Mr Prynne, Mr Scot, and Hugh Peters; for upon a diligent search made by Dr Sancto, soon after his promotion to that See, there was not a line of them to be found (87).

[X] To the memory of this great man.] As soon as the news of his death reached Oxford, the learned Mr Degory Wheare, his learned Professor of History, resolved to celebrate the memory of so worthy a man, by an oration, which he seems to have delivered only to such as attended his Lecture. This oration of his was delivered on the 2d of December 1623, and a short account is contained therein of the life and principal actions of the person, whose memory it celebrates (88). As it was so hastily composed, and as orators are generally speaking more attentive to the roundness of their periods, the propriety of their expression, and the elegance of their method, than to matters of fact; we may from thence very easily account for several inaccuracies and errors, that are to be met with therein. One thing however deserves particular notice, Mr Wheare tells us indeed, that Mr Camden had part of his education at Christ's Hospital, but he does not say that he received it from the charity; on the contrary, he seems to insinuate, that he was sent thither by his father, who from his very cradle had designed him a learned education; it is necessary to produce his own words. Eum pater à primis incunabulis rei literariæ destinavit, cujus prima semina sub magistro nescio quo, in paedotropio illo amplissimo quod Ædis Christi, Londini appellatur, imbibit, inde Scholam Coletianam, ad Divi Pauli sitam petiit. Dr Smith gives a different

(85) A Collection of curious Discourses written by eminent Antiquaries, in the Append. No. 2.

(86) Bishop Gibson's Life of our author.

(87) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 66, 67.

(88) Printed first at Oxford in 1628 & inserted afterwards in the Latin Collection of select Lives, by Dr W. Bates.

(84) Appar. Annal. regn. reg. Jac. I. p. 57, 70, 79, 82.

us in few words by an excellent writer, to which little can be added. 'In his writings he was candid and modest, in his conversation easy and innocent, and in his whole life even and exemplary (g).' The high reputation his writings acquired him amongst foreigners, is at the same time a tribute to his merit, and to the glory of this nation, which owes to few of her worthies in the Republick of Letters, more than to him, whose fame extended throughout Europe, and yet escaped the rage of Criticks wherever it came. This was certainly owing, in a great measure, to the sweetness and candour of his temper, which so qualified his learning, that in foreign nations all were ready to commend, and none cared to dispute with, him. All this might be easily taken for fond partiality, or for downright flattery, if all who are acquainted with the writings of our author, were not fully sensible, that if we had said even more than this, it might have been supported by indisputable evidence, and also by the testimony of a cloud of witnesses, from amongst those, who, in that age, were esteemed first-rate writers (b) [2]. But notwithstanding all a different turn to this; and on the very circumstance of his having been at this school infers, that he must have lost his father early, and have been educated there on the foundation as an orphan (89). That he was educated there, seems to be a fact out of doubt; for otherwise, I cannot imagine, that Degory Wheare, would have advanced it; but that he was upon the foundation as an orphan of the city of London, is not agreeable to what Wheare says, or to many other circumstances. But to proceed; the University, out of regard to the benefaction they had received from him, directed, that a publick oration should be made to his honour, before the whole University; to which office, Zouch Townly of Christ-Church was assigned, a man remarkable for his parts and eloquence, as well as his perfect possession of the Latin tongue in it's utmost elegance and purity. There was upon this occasion, a prodigious concourse of the learned of all ranks, many drawn by the fame of the speaker, but more by their respect for the memory of that great man, of whom he was to speak. He discharged his duty upon this occasion, in a manner worthy of himself and of Camden; it is a lofty and magnificent piece of eloquence, which carries the glory of it's subject as high as human genius could raise it, and has been therefore always esteemed as lasting a monument to the praise of Camden, as that in Westminster-Abbey

(90). The University went still farther, the verses written to celebrate the praise of the deceased by the disciples of the Muses in her precincts, were collected into a book, and published in the succeeding year, together with the oration last mentioned, under the title of Insignia Camdeni (91). But even this was not all, they were desirous of honouring him to the very utmost of their power; and therefore, in a full and solemn Convocation, held on the 18th of December, it was decreed by the unanimous consent of the whole Academic Senate, that Camden, for his most noble munificence towards the University of Oxford, should be inserted into the roll of their benefactors, in order to be commemorated at the stated solemnities, with the rest of the benefactors to this ancient source of Literature, whether Kings, Queens, Prelates, or Nobles, who were in this manner remembered; and who, however unlike in other respects, and unequal in rank to each other, were in this both like and equal, that they laboured to promote piety and virtue, by encouraging learning and facilitating study (92). It is very remarkable, that, on the one hand, Mr Camden, who had not been over kindly used by the University, when he was a member of it, who does not seem to have taken much notice of the offer of a degree, when he went thither on account of Sir Thomas Bodley's funeral (93), and who seems to have declined the title of Doctor, as he did of Knight afterwards (94), should contribute in so generous a manner, and by so useful a foundation, to the splendor of that illustrious body; and, on the other hand, it deserves our notice, that the same University which had been so frugal, I had like to have said something more, of her favours to him, when a young man, who had no other claim to them than from his merit, should afterwards be so profuse of them to his friend when he waived accepting them himself, and think no honour too great for the memory of one who it is true had enriched them by his benefaction; and which was still more, had done them so much credit by his education.

[2] Were esteemed first rate writers. It may not be amiss to set down a very few only out of the almost numberless authorities, that without any difficulty might be assembled in proof of this point. The famous Justus Lipsius, upon a certain occasion, speaks thus to our author (95). 'I take thee, William Camden, for my Judge, who lately, by the clear sun of thy understanding, hath dispelled the mists which overwhelmed thy Britain.' The celebrated Joseph Scaliger, in one of his most learned works, and which will preserve his memory as long as any respect is paid to learning, speaking of a certain point in Antiquity, says (96), 'It may be proved by a stone that was lately digged up in Britain, and which is produced by the most learned Camden, in his admirable performance.' In his Epistles also, he speaks with raptures of our author, and tells his English friend to whom his Epistle is addressed, 'That he wanted time to inform that learned man himself (97), how much he thought himself obliged to him for his benevolence in sending it him.' The most celebrated Isaac Casaubon, writes to him in the following terms (98). 'It is not only the English, most learned man, who are for ever bound to you for this great work (Britannia), but all, and every one, let them reside where they will, who are friends and lovers of ancient History. Amongst which, since I have presumed to insert my name, I would have you persuaded, that no man can be more studious in the perusal of your works. All things in your writings please me extremely, the good sense, diligence, learning, but above and beyond all, the sagacity of your judgment.' Paulus Merula, speaking of the assistance he had received from the learned, expresses himself thus (99): 'Out of Germany I returned home, through France and England, where William Camden was to me of more use than all the rest.' Thuanus writing to him for the helps that he expected from him, makes use of these very strong expressions (100); 'Write, and do not deny your counsel to a friend that stands in need of it. Hints are sufficient from you, nor is it necessary that you should be at any pains in digesting them. Whatever you write will not only have the weight of advice, but the force of a command; the next part of my history, which is already printed, will shew you how much I value, as indeed I ought, your instructions.' The industrious Andrew du Chesne, speaking of the assistance he received from him, says (101), 'I received from that worthy Englishman, whose name stands so high in the list of men of letters, William Camden, several MSS. &c.' Instead of extending this note farther, we will conclude in the words of a great Prelate of our own (102); 'To be particular, says he, in his acquaintance, would be to reckon up all the learned men of his time. When he was young, learned men were his patrons; when he grew up, the learned men were his intimates; and when he came to be old, he was a patron to the learned. So that learning was his only care, and learned men the only comfort of his life. What an useful and honourable correspondence he had settled, both at home and abroad, does best appear from his letters; and with what candour and easiness he maintained it, the same letters may inform us. The work he was engaged in for the honour of his native country, gained him respect at home, and admiration abroad, so that he was looked upon as a common oracle; and for a foreigner to travel into England and return without seeing Mr Camden, was thought a very gross omission. He was visited by six German Noblemen at one time, and at their request wrote his Lemma in each of their books, as a testimony that they had seen him.'

(95) In Comment. l. xii. Annalium Taciti.

(96) In Animadversionibus in Chronologica Eusebii ad an. 1213, Amstelodami, 1658, p. 228.

(97) Epist. ad Richard. Thomponem, Lugduni Batav. p. 500.

(98) Epist. Camd. p. 60.

(99) In Praefatione ad Ennii fragmenta, Lugd. Batav. 1595.

(100) Epist. Camd. p. 68.

(101) In Praefatione ad Historiam Normannorum Scriptores Antiquos. Lutet. Paris. fol. 1619.

(102) Bishop Gibson's Life of our author.

(g) Bishop Gibson's Life of our author.

(b) Centuria Celebrum Authorum, p. 619.

(89) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 2.

(90) Ibid. p. 83.

(91) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 485.

(92) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 69.

(93) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 482.

(94) Epist. Camdeni, p. 188. Ibid. p. 329.

all his great merit, and it's being so generally, one might say universally, confessed, yet we should have known what related to him very imperfectly, and in a very superficial manner, if it had not been for the pious care, and indefatigable labour, of the worthy Dr Thomas Smith (i); who not only published a very curious and comprehensive Life of our author, but, with incredible pains and industry, collected a great number of letters written to Mr Camden, by the most judicious, as well as most learned, men, of other nations, besides our own; and who likewise drew together abundance of small pieces that fell from our author's pen, and which well deserved to be transmitted to posterity, and of which, as it is very requisite, some notice shall be taken at the bottom of the page [Z]. That we might give an article of such consequence with all the advantage possible, we have been careful in perusing what had been hitherto done in this way, and by comparing the facts with his own writings, have detected and rectified various mistakes which hitherto have passed current even with the learned world. But besides these, we have met with some other circumstances, memorials, and remarks, that may deserve the reader's attention, and yet could not well be reduced into the general representation of his

(i) He not only published our author's Life and Letters, but left his Annals, corrected by his own hand, to Mr Hearne, who published them.

[Z] At the bottom of the page.] The first of the pieces of Mr Camden, published by Doctor Smith, is in Latin, and bears the title of (103) Gulielmi Camdeni Annales, ab anno 1603, ad ann. 1623; but the running title is, Gul. Camdeni regni regis Jacobi I, annalium apparatus, i. e. A draft of William Camden's Annals of the reign of King James I. We have the following account of this work from Mr Anthony Wood (104). The Annals of King James, reach from the death of Queen Elizabeth, 24th of March 1602-3 to 18th of August 1623, and no farther, because the author being then very ill in body, remaining in that condition till his death he could not well continue them any farther: so that these memoirs want more than for a year, to the end of the reign of James I. These Annals are written with the author's own hand in fol. being only a skeleton of a history, or bare touches, to put the author in mind of greater matters that he had in his head; had he lived to have digested them in a full history, as that of Queen Elizabeth. The original came after his death into the hands of Mr John Hacket, afterwards D. D. and at length Bishop of Lichfield; who, as I have been divers times informed, did privately convey it out of the library of the author; Hacket being then a Master of Arts of some years standing. This original being communicated by the said Dr Hacket, while he was living at Lichfield, to Mr (afterwards Sir) William Dugdale, then Norroy King at Arms; he, contrary to the Doctor's knowledge, took a copy of it, which I have seen and perused at Sir William's house, called Blith-hall in Warwickshire; but therein I found many mistakes, as it afterwards more evidently appeared to me, when that transcript was put into the Ashmolean Museum; another copy I have seen in the hands of Sir Henry St George, Clarencieux King at Arms, which having been transcribed by one that understood not Latin, there are innumerable faults therein, and therefore not at all to be relied upon. After Dr Hacket's death, the original was put into the library of Trinity College in Cambridge, where it now remains. It appears plainly from hence, that Mr Wood really thought these were Mr Camden's materials for the writing the Annals for King James's reign; but whoever shall consider them attentively, will perceive, that he had no such intention, amongst many others, for these reasons. In the first place, they are very unequal; in some years there are memoranda to every month, and almost to every day of the month; in others, there are only a few months; and in the year 1609, the dates are in February, March, and June only, and there are not above ten articles in the whole year. In the next place, they are very improperly digested for such a purpose; many things of great moment are omitted; many of little importance are set down. In those years, in which he is most copious, these trivial matters abound most. As for instance, in the year 1615, he sets down, that in the month of February there was hard frost (105), and a great deal of snow; more especially on the 12th, and on the 14th; and that the frost did not break till on the 26th. March 13, the first part of his Annals went to the press; on June 8, they were published (106). The month of July was very dry throughout, to the 31st, when it rained very hard (107). One sees plainly from hence, that he did not intend this for a publick history. As he had more leisure, he enlarged his Diary; but then it appears, that he set down only those things that concerned himself, his friends, or his office, as King at Arms; as he grew infirm, he set down when he was taken ill, when he went out of town, when he returned to it: and, in a word, whatever else occurred to him, that he thought worth remembering; as for instance, 'April 8, 1618, there was a great foot-race run, at which, tho' it was a dull day, the King was present, the mob was very great, and one J. Hubbard, son to the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, who married Viscount Lisle's daughter, was very much hurt (108).' It is true, that to give these more the air of Annals, almost all the passages of this sort are thrown out in the English translation; but by this means the cheat, or at least the mistake is carried on, and unwary people are led to believe, that from such notes as these, our author intended to compose the Annals of the reign of King James, which is equally injurious to truth and to the memory of Mr Camden. What they really were, and how far they may be of use, that judicious Prelate we have so often quoted, has told us (109). 'From the end of Queen Elizabeth to his own death, he kept a Diary of all (rather, of many of) the remarkable passages in the reign of King James. Not that he could so much as dream of living to make use of them himself at that age, and under those many infirmities, which a laborious life had drawn upon him. But he was willing, however, to contribute all the assistance he could to any that should do the same honour to the reign of King James, which he had done to that of Queen Elizabeth. If this were practised by persons of learning and curiosity, who have opportunities of seeing into the publick affairs of a kingdom, what a large step would it be towards a history of the respective times? For after all, the short hints and strictures of that kind, do very often fet things in a truer light than regular histories, which are but too commonly written to serve a party, and so draw one insensibly out of the right way. Whereas, if men are left themselves to make their own inferences from simple matters of fact, as they lay before them; tho', perhaps, they may often be at a loss how to make things hang together; yet their aim shall still be true, and they shall hardly be mistaken in the main. One single matter of fact, faithfully and honestly delivered, is worth a thousand comments and flourishes.' To this piece we find annexed, a leaf of an English Diary, for the years 1603, 1604, and 1605; but it is remarkable, that they do not at all agree with the Latin Diary. There is a loose leaf also of very short hints, relating to his own life. Then follow two short discourses, upon the etymology, antiquity, and office of the Earl Marshal of England. His verses come next; and first his Latin Poem, in praise of the famous Roger Ascham, written in compliment to his friend Dr Grant. Another Latin Poem follows, intitled, Hibernia; then his excellent Epigram, in praise of Hakluyt's Voyages; and lastly, an Epigram on Sir Clement Edmund's translation of Cæsar's Commentaries; all these are in Latin, as are also the collection of Epitaphs, written by him; which are ten in number. The most remarkable, is that for Mary Queen of Scots, which probably was intended for her tomb in Westminster-Abbey; on which there is now a larger, but far less elegant inscription.

(108) Ibid. p. 37.

(109) Bishop Gibson's Life of our author.

(103) In the same Volume with Camden's Life and Letters.

(104) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 481.

(105) Apparatus Annal. regn. reg. Jac. I. p. 11.

(106) Ibid. p. 12.

(107) Ibid. p. 13.

his life and writings, and therefore, that they might not be lost, we have thrown them into a note [AA]. The great pains taken by the accurate Mr Bayle, the judicious Father Niceron, [AA] We have thrown them into a note.] There is great reason to believe, that notwithstanding our author's warm love of Antiquities, the first work he projected, was a regular History of England, from the Norman Conquest, in Latin. He tells us so himself pretty plainly; and from the specimen he has given us (110) of his abilities in that way, we have the greatest reason to regret, that he did not prosecute his design; for if he had, we should certainly have seen an English History equal in point of composition to Buchanan's boasted History of Scotland; and much superior to it, in all other respects. His turn for Latin Poetry was admirable, and the marriage of Tame and Iss, inserted in the Britannia, and which is certainly his own, does as much honour to the quickness of his fancy, the beauty of his expression, and the harmony of his numbers, as the rest of that noble work does to his judgment, industry, and learning. But it seems he was afraid of being thought to apply himself to these kind of lighter studies, which might be thought inconsistent with the gravity of his employments, and the seriousness of his temper. At least, this we may have leave to guess from what his worthy and grateful scholar, Benjamin Johnson, tells him in the Dedication of one of his Comedies (111). 'There are, no doubt, a supercilious race in the world, who will esteem all offices done you in this kind an injurie; so solemn a vice it is with them, to use the authority of their ignorance, to the crying down of poetry or the professors of it. But my gratitude must not leave to correct their error, since I am none of those that can suffer the benefits conferred upon my youth to perish with my age. I pray you accept this, such wherein, neither the confession of my manners shall make you blush, nor of my studies repent you to have been the instructor.' The reverence and gratitude of Mr Johnson, was farther expressed in other of his works; and indeed, there have been few men of learning, who met with such general respect from their contemporaries, as Camden did. The famous Spenser, in an excellent poem of his, intitled, The Ruins of Time (112), has a very fine stanza, to the honour of this learned man, which was written in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, and is therefore referred to the fame that he acquired by his Britannia; it runs thus:

Camden, the nourice of Antiquity,
And lantern unto late succeeding age
To see the light of simple verity,
Buried in ruines, through the great outrage
Of her own people led with warlike rage:
Camden, though time all monuments obscure,
Yet thy just labours ever shall endure.

Nor does it appear, that he was less respected by persons, who perhaps in some things differed from him in opinion; as for instance, the famous Mr Bolton (113), so well known to the world, by his excellent book, intitled, Nero Caesar; a good Historian himself, and a profound Antiquary, but withal a Papist, complimented him in the following manner, upon Sir William Segar's and Sir Richard St George's being knighted, who were Garter and Norroy Kings at Arms.

'Right worthy Sir,
' THOU' your brother Kings have outgone you in the honour of Knighthood, they shall ever come behind you very far in the greater honour of immortal fame. Some ascribe it to ambition in you, that you are not a knight (for you know how posterously witty the wits of our time are on other men's actions and abstinencies) as thinking the neglect thereof an higher point than the acceptance. Others to pusillanimity; and we your friends to your modesty; which I am angry with, notwithstanding, because it hath deprived us of some splendour, and comfort in our friend's advancement.'

(114) Address the 4th, Sect. V. In another work of his, intitled, Hypercritica (114), in which, without question, he has advanced as many judicious observations, in reference to English History, as are any where to be met with, very justly reproves a great error of some learned men, in altering proper names, that they might make a more classical appearance in their Latin; and takes an opportunity from thence, to pay a very handsome compliment to our author, for his wise caution, in this particular; the passage is curious, and the book scarce, the reader therefore will not be displeas'd to see it. 'He who would compose a Corpus Rerum Anglicarum, a general History of England in Latin, hath no other rules to follow, but such as he who writes it in English. One thing nevertheless, is primely needful by our Latin Historiographer to be consulted of and determined, because I have observed much perplexity rising out of the right or erroneous practice thereof. The difficulty therefore is, what to do in our Latin History, with names of persons, things, or places, which are not filed down to the smoothness of Latin sounds, or rules of termination. Lucian notes a ridiculous curiosity in one Historian, who affecting Attick elegancy, would needs fashion Latin names to the Greek garb, either by translation, by allusion, or transportation of letters. By translation, as in calling Saturninus Chronius; by allusion, as in calling Fronto, Frontis; by Metabesist, or transportation of syllables or letters, in calling Titianus, Titanius. In this fine and meer schoolish folly, after that, George Buchanan is often taken, not without casting his reader into obscurity. For in his Histories, where he speaketh of one Wisehart, so little was his ear able to brook the name, as that translating the sense thereof into Greek, of Wisehart, comes forth unto us, Sophocardius; and Wisehart, whose name it was intended should live, was quite lost, or must be sought for out in Lexicons. The better care of that polite and eloquent Scot, had been of truth and loyalty. All our Historians, ad unum, (for ought I can remember) follow the plain prolation and truth of proper names; and so doth the most approved and learned Philologer and Antiquary of our nation, Mr Camden. His friends also who had given him countenance and assistance in the earlier part of his life, maintained the same warmth of affection for him, even in their own old age and hi, which might appear from Sir Henry Savile's earnest invitation of him to Eaton, that they might spend their declining years together; from the letters of the Bishop of Gloucester, and from those of Mr Thomas Allen, both his ancient and constant friends. We will however content ourselves, with transcribing only a short one, from Dr Francis Godwin, then Lord Bishop of Hereford (115), which, though written in English, is penned in the true spirit of Antiquity, and would have made no inconsiderable figure in the collections of Cicero or Pliny. 'Last Easter term I was in London, and sought you, but had not the good hap to find you. It discontented me not a little, I had no other errand but to see you. I love you, nay, I honour you. We now grow old and sickly. I am afraid we shall never meet. Fiat voluntas Domini. But what becomes of your second part of Elizabetha? How fain would I see it out? Let it not die. Live you long Faxit. You shall live the longer, if the world may see it, if perchance the world hath not already seen that of you, which shall make you immortal even in this world, except so far forth, as the world itself is mortal. Although, why do I put in that perhaps of that which is extra aleam? You see how delighting to talk with you, I had rather to talk idle, than to say nothing. Camdeno meo salutem plurimam. Vale. Whiteborne, October 9, 1620.' As to his reputation in his last profession, that of a King at Arms, he carried it so high, that such as meant to recommend their labours to the world in matters of that nature, knew no better or more successful method, than by courting his protection, as appears from the following words of Mr Milles (116), in his Dedication of Glover's, alias Somerlet's, Account of the Nobility; 'Learned William Camden, whom vertue her self for piety and probity, and honouring Græce Britannia, hath crowned a King of Arms.' But in all probability, this complement cost Mr Milles very dear, for one may reasonably suppose it put Brooke upon attacking him, so that all that followed

(110) Britan. in Norm.

(111) See the Dedication of Ben. Johnson's play, Every man in his Humour.

(112) Spenser's Works, Vol. VI. p. 1466.

(113) Epist. Camd. p. 188.

(115) Epist. Camd. p. 308.

(116) Catalogue of Nobility, Lond. 1610. fol. in his Dedication to Robert Earl of Salisbury.

Niceron, the several editors of Moreri's Dictionary, and other foreign writers, seem to lay us under a necessity of endeavouring to improve to the utmost, an article which has been, and ever will be, an ornament of every collection of this sort, at the same time that it contributes not a little to illustrate, various important points relating to our Civil History, to the memoirs of other learned persons, and other valuable purposes that naturally coincide with a design of doing justice to the memory of a man, distinguished not by the excellence only, or by the extent, but by the variety also of his knowledge.

followed was but a continuation of the old quarrel, which was kept on foot, from first to last, for very near thirty years. The industrious John Stowe, was also a client of Mr Camden's, who afforded him both countenance and assistance in the prosecution of his labours, for which reason he had a plentiful share of abuse bestowed upon him in Booke's writings (117), who charges him with making a transcript of Leland's Itinerary, for the use of Mr Camden, who, as he pretends, allowed him an annual pension for this as long as he lived. His favours to John Philpot and Augustine Vincent, have been already remembered; and indeed it must be allowed, that no man was more communicative to his friends, or more ready to do them honour upon all occasions, as appears from the frequent mention he makes of John Johnston, an excellent Poet and learned Antiquary of Scotland; many of whose verses while living, or his memory from insults after his death. A Church Historian (118), without naming him, has taken great pains to insinuate things to his prejudice; and though he lay directly in his way, has avoided mentioning his name with praise, which to a degree of fulsome-ness he has bestowed upon persons of far less merit. Dr Smith gives us a much stronger instance of an extravagant and ill grounded resentment, which induced a certain young gentleman (119) of very good family, who thought the reputation of his mother hurt by somewhat that Camden hath delivered of her in his History, could find no other way to be revenged, than by breaking off a piece from the nose of his statue in Westminster-Abbey. An action as mean and base, as it was wicked and unjust. It seems, that Anthony Wood (120) had not taken notice of this circumstance, for he seems to attribute the injury done to Camden's statue to some accident that happened at the solemnity of the pompous funeral of the last Earl of Essex, General of the army raised by the Parliament against Charles I. But posterity hath done ample justice to his merit, paying the highest credit as well as reverence to his works, and looking with a just indignation on such low attempts as these to tarnish his reputation. Whoever would see an elegant panegyric in the form of a monumental inscription, worthy of Camden's learning, prudence, and impartiality, may find it drawn by the pen of that admirable master of Latin eloquence, Thomas Farnaby (121); or if verses be more agreeable, in the poetical inscription under an original picture of our author bestowed on the University of Oxford by Degory Wheare (122), in memory of his patron, and placed in the school (123) where the History Lecture by him founded, is still publicly read; and may it be 'till all Histories fail!

(119) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 75.

(120) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 485.

(121) Prefixed to the third Vol. of Mr Hearne's edit. of Camden's Annals of Queen Elizabeth.

(122) Smith, Vit. Camd. p. 71.

(123) Hist. & Antiq. Oxon. l. ii. p. 43.

E

CAMPBELL, an ancient and noble family in the kingdom of Scotland, the present chief of which is his Grace the Duke of Argyll, and of which family are besides, the Earls of Loudon and Braidalbane; as there were anciently Earls of Athol, and Irvine, of this name, to which also the earldom of Inlay belonged, in the person of the present Chief, who by his own merit acquired it, 'till swallowed up in his superior title of Argyll. As to the antiquity of this house, the best proof of it, is the difficulty that occurs in speaking of the origin of this illustrious line. It is very well known, that the Bards and Sanachies were the ancient Heralds of that, and indeed of this country, and that they preserved the memory of families, the Chiefs of which had distinguished themselves in war, in their songs; or to give them a better title, of which they are not at all unworthy, their lyrick odes, and transmitted an account of their descents by tradition. That this kind of authority is evidence sufficient to establish historical facts, is what we dare not determine, but we may be permitted to say, without being suspected of partiality for such kind of testimony, that if it ought to be admitted in any case, this of genealogies may claim the preference, as being that, of all others, in which they were most scrupulous, and therefore best deserved to be believed. By these then it has been remembered, one dares not say recorded, that this family were Lords of Lochow in Argyleshire, in the reign of Fergus II, the restorer of the monarchy of Scotland, in the very beginning of the fifth century. It is not, however, pretended, that they were then distinguished by the same surname as now, on the contrary we are told, these old Lords of Lochow were known to the world by the name of O-Dwin, or rather O-Dwin, or Macdwine; for which last name there is some authority, since, by a charter granted to Colin Campbell of Lochow, by King David II, ratifying the alienation made by Christian, daughter and heir of Sir Dougal Campbell, his great uncle, of the lands of Craignish, it is declared, that the said Colin Campbell shall hold those lands of the King and his heirs, in as ample a manner as his ancestor Duncan Macdwine held the barony of Lochow. We are told, on the authority of the Sanachies beforementioned, that this appellation was assumed by Diarmed O-Dwin, one of their ancestors, a brave and warlike man, and in the Irish language his descendants are called to this time Scol Diarmed, that is, the posterity and offspring of Diarmed. From this Diarmed O-Dwin the Bards have recorded a long series of the Barons of Lochow, who, they tell us, were very renowned both for conduct and valour. Paul O-Dwin, Lord of Lochow, called Paul in Spuran, so denominated from his being the King's Treasurer, having no male issue, his estate went to his daughter Eva, who married Gilespick O-Dwin, a relation of her own, who changed the name first from O-Dwin to Campbell, to perpetuate the memory of a noble and heroic piece of service performed by him to the crown of France, in the reign of King Malcom Canmoir. By this Lady he left a son Duncan, who was Lord of Lochow, and was the father of Colin, and he again of Archibald, and he of Duncan Baron of Lochow. His son and successor 117) See his Second Discovery of Errors in the much-comended Britannia, p. 97.

118) Fuller's Church Hist. under the year 1535, p. 198.

successor was Archibald Campbell, Knight, Lord of Lochow, who was the father of Sir Colin Campbell, a person who distinguished himself, as well by the acquisitions he made to his estates, as by his great actions in war, from whence he obtained the surname of Moor, and from this Colin it is, that the head of this illustrious family is stiled by the Irish Mac Collan More. He was slain in a conflict with a powerful neighbour of his, the Lord of Lorn, which created a feud between the two families, that lasted 'till they were united by marriage. His son, Sir Nicol or Neil, was honoured with that dignity by King Alexander III, and was one of the great men of Scotland, summoned to Berwick by King Edward I, and submitted for a time to John de Baliol, as did also his brother Sir Donald Campbell of Redhouse, from whom the noble family of Loudon is lineally descended. But when Robert Bruce asserted his title to the Crown, Sir Neil Campbell joined him very early, and notwithstanding all the efforts of the Lord of Lorn, reduced that country to his obedience. He was amongst that handful of loyal subjects, who were present at the coronation of King Robert at Scoon in 1306, and when many deserted him, Sir Neil Campbell, to his immortal honour, entered into an association with Sir Gilbert Hay and Sir Alexander Seton, wherein, in a most solemn manner, they bound themselves to defend, 'till the last period of their lives, the liberties of their country, and the right of Robert Bruce their King, against all mortals, French, English, and Scots, to which they appended their seals at the abbey of Cambuskenneth, 9 Sept. 1308. He was appointed also one of the Commissioners on the part of Scotland, to treat of a peace in 1314 with the English, which negotiation, though it was not altogether successful, procured however a release or exchange of prisoners, and amongst the rest, of the Lady Mary Bruce, the King's sister, whom Edward I. had not only imprisoned, but caused to be carried about in a cage, for Walter Cumine. Sir Neil Campbell, Lord of Lochow, was the next year present in the parliament held at Air, in which the Crown was entailed upon Robert Bruce and his heirs, at which time Sir Neil obtained a grant of several lands for his good services, and as a still higher mark of his Sovereign's confidence and esteem, his sister, the Lady Mary Bruce before mentioned, in marriage, but he did not long survive this high honour. He left two sons, of whom the second, John Campbell, was, by King David II, honoured with the high title of Earl of Athol, but he dying without issue, the title became extinct in his family. Sir Colin Campbell of Lochow attended Edward Bruce in his expedition into Ireland in 1316, when he took the title of King of that country. He also faithfully adhered to King David Bruce during all his troubles, and re-taking for him the castle of Dunoon, which for some time was in the hands of the English, he was made hereditary governor of that fortress, which still remains in his family. He deceased in 1340, and was succeeded by his son Archibald, who was also remarkably attached to the house of Bruce. His eldest son, Colin, was in great favour with King Robert II, and was employed by him to restrain the Highlanders, who infested the western provinces of Scotland, which he did so effectually, that he obtained a grant of several lands for that service. He was succeeded by his eldest son Sir Duncan Campbell, a man equally famous for his valour and wisdom, who married the lady Margery Stewart, daughter of Robert Duke of Albany, Governor of Scotland, and by his interest with Murdoch, Duke of Albany, he prevailed upon him to ransom and restore King James I, who had been many years prisoner in England. This signal service, the dignity of the person to whom it was rendered, will not allow us to stile it an obligation, made such an impression upon the King's mind, that he considered him ever after as one of the most deserving of his subjects, received him into his Privy-Council, and made him Lord Justice and Lieutenant of the shire of Argyll. He was continued in his offices by King James II, to whom he adhered faithfully in all the troubles which disturbed the beginning of his reign, in consideration of which he was honoured with the title of Lord Campbell, Anno Domini 1445. He was the first that took the title of Argyle, though he as often used his old title of Lochow, and was a very charitable and religious person. He had by the Lady Margery Stewart beforementioned, three sons; the eldest, Cælestine, died without issue in his father's life-time; the second, Archibald, also died before him, but left issue by Elizabeth, daughter of Sir John Somerville, a son who succeeded his grandfather; his third son was Sir Colin Campbell of Glenurchie, ancestor to the Earls of Braidalbyn. He had also three sons by his second wife, Margaret Stewart, daughter of Sir John Stewart, natural son to King Robert III. This Duncan, Lord Campbell, died in 1453, and was succeeded by his grandson Colin, who, being in his minority, had for his guardian, his uncle Sir Colin Campbell of Glenurchie beforementioned. King James II. as well out of regard to the exemplary loyalty of his family, and the singular services of his father, as for the promising parts of this young Nobleman, raised him to the title of Earl of Argyle in 1457. In the succeeding reign of James III, he was sent Ambassador to Edward IV. of England in 1465, being then Master of the Household, and was afterwards honoured with the highest offices in the State, being constituted Lord Privy-Seal, and Lord High Chancellor. He was also Ambassador at the Court of France, with other persons of the first quality, and was present at the sealing and swearing to the League made with Charles VIII. at Paris, July 9, 1484. Upon his being appointed one of the Ambassadors to King Henry VII, to procure his interposition to assuage the troubles then broke out in Scotland, he resigned his office of Lord Chancellor. He had no share or concern in the Civil War, in which his Royal Master fell; but after things were in some measure settled, he was again made Lord Chancellor, and continued to the time of his death, which happened in 1493, in possession of that high office. He married the Lady Isabel Stewart, one of the daughters and co-heiresses of John, Lord Lorn, upon which he took that title and the arms of the family; and, as a confirmation of his title, procured the resignation of Walter Stewart of Innermeath; and by deed, dated the 17th of April 1470, entailed that honour on Sir Colin Campbell of Glenurchie and his heirs male in case his own failed, on account, not only of his being instrumental in procuring him that marriage, but also because the said Sir Colin had before married another of those co-heiresses. His eldest son, Archibald, Earl of Argyle, was in great favour with his sovereign King James IV, by whom he was made Lord Chamberlain and Master of the Household; and having the honour to command the van-guard of the Royal army, fell valiantly fighting with his most gracious Master, in the fatal battle of Flodden, September 9, 1513. His eldest son, Colin, Earl of Argyle, was one of the four Counsellors of the Regency to King James V, in 1525; and in 1528, he was constituted Lieutenant of the Borders and Warden of the Marches, and had also an ample confirmation of the hereditary Sheriffship of Argyleshire, Justiciary of Scotland, and Master of the Household, by which those honours became vested in his family. He deceased in 1542, and was succeeded by his son Archibald, who was one of the Lords that entered into an association to oppose the intended match, between the young Queen Mary and King Edward VI of England, dated July 4, 1543. On the breaking out of the war with England, he distinguished himself greatly in the battle of Pinky, and at the siege of Haddington. He was the first of this noble family who embraced the Protestant Religion, of which he was a most sincere and zealous professor, and recommended the promoting thereof and the suppressing Popish superstition, to his son and successor, when he was upon his death-bed. He married first, Lady Helen Hamilton, daughter of James, Earl of Arran, by whom he had his eldest son and heir, Archibald; his second wife was, Mary, daughter to William Graham, Earl of Monteith, by whom he had Sir Colin Campbell of Buchuan. Archibald, Earl of Argyle, succeeded his father in 1558, being a person of great parts and prudence, he was sent over to the Queen in France, the year after his father's death, to supplicate her in favour of the Protestant Religion. He concurred with other persons of quality and distinction, in taking such measures as were necessary for promoting the Reformation, and was very instrumental in procuring it to be settled by authority of Parliament; and by the assistance of Elizabeth, Queen of England, he was also very successful in obliging the French to quit Scotland. In the year 1561, when Queen Mary returned from France, and constituted a new Privy-Council, of which the Earl of Argyle was a member, it is very observable, that he had no concern whatever, in any of those intrigues and insurrections, which happened soon after. He did indeed, upon the Queen's marriage with the Earl of Bothwell, enter into a bond or association, for the defence of the Prince, afterwards King James VI, and was present at his coronation, when he carried the sword of State. But being afterwards informed, that the Queen's resignation was far from being voluntary, he laboured to restore her, and was General of her forces in the battle of Langside, near Glasgow, in 1568, where they were defeated; but however, his Lordship remained firm to the Queen, as long as there was any probability of doing her service. After the death of the Earl of Lenox, who was Regent, and the election of the Earl of Mar to that high office, the Earl of Argyle was constituted Lord High Chancellor, by whose great moderation, as well as through the high esteem in which he stood with men of all parties, the peace of the kingdom was restored. His Lordship died possessed of this great office, September 12, 1575, without leaving any issue, and was succeeded by his brother, Sir Colin Campbell beforementioned, who, having always distinguished himself, by a close and steady attachment to the cause of King James VI, and having been very instrumental in securing to him the full and free administration of the government, when he was of fit age to take it into his own hand, His Majesty was graciously pleased to admit him of his Privy-Council; and on the 16th of August 1579, he took the oath of office, as Lord High Chancellor, which he executed with the universal approbation of the whole kingdom, to the time of his decease, in 1584; he married first, Jane Stewart, daughter of Henry, Lord Methven, by whom he had no issue; and after her decease, the widow of James, Earl of Murray, Regent of Scotland, by whom he had two sons, Archibald and Colin. Archibald, Earl of Argyle, was distinguished by his military genius, as well as by his constant and loyal adherence to his sovereign, whose forces he commanded at the battle of Glenlivet, in 1594, against the Earls of Huntley and Errol; he afterwards suppressed the Mac-Gregors, and a more formidable insurrection of the Macdonalds in 1614, for which services he had a grant made him of the country of Kintyre, which was confirmed by an Act of Parliament. In 1618, he went over to Spain, and entered into the service of that Crown, remaining abroad many years, till at length, he obtained His Majesty's permission to return, and died at London, in 1638. This noble Earl was twice married, first, to Anne, daughter and heir of William, Earl of Morton, by whom he had his successor and four daughters. His second wife was, Anne, daughter to Sir William Cornwallis, by whom he had a son, James, who, in 1622, was created Lord Kintyre by King James VI; and afterwards by Charles I, by letters patents bearing date, March 28, 1642, created, Earl of Irvine (a); of his eldest son and successor, Archibald, Earl of Argyle, and afterwards Marquis; we shall speak in the next article.

(a) This article is extracted from several manuscript accounts in the hands of the late and present author, and has been compared with the article in Collier's Dictionary, transmitted by direction of the Duke of Argyle, father to the Duke, as also with Crauford, Nesbit, &c.

CAMPBELL (ARCHIBALD) Earl and Marquis of Argyle, was the son of Archibald Earl of Argyle, by the Lady Anne Douglas, daughter of William Earl of Morton (a). He was born some time in the year 1598, and was very carefully educated, suitable to his high birth and great interest in his country. He was, though very young, with his father in the field, when the dangerous insurrection of the Macdonalds was suppressed (b), and after his father went abroad, the care of the West Country, and more especially of the Protestant interest therein, devolved in a great measure on the Lord Lorne, the constant title of the apparent heirs of this noble family. As he came very early into the world, and had the eyes of many upon him, so he was extremely cautious in his conduct; and having been educated in the profession of the Protestant religion, according to the strictest rules of the Church of Scotland, as it was established immediately after the Reformation, he was sincerely and steadily devoted thereto, perhaps with a degree of zeal rather too fervent; but however, he neither changed, or ever pretended to change, his sentiments, but made it the great business of his life to support that Church, and the constitution of his country, as he understood it to be settled by law (c). In these principles he was strongly confirmed by the advice, concurrence, and assistance, of many persons of great quality and fortune, who afterwards changing their sentiments, were obliged to sustain their own characters at the expence of his (d). It is a clear and full proof of his great parts and wise conduct in that season of life, when men are usually famed for other qualities than discretion, that in the year 1626, his Majesty was pleased to call him to the high office of a Privy-Counsellor, his father being then living, and himself, consequently, no Lord of Parliament (e). At this time there is no doubt that he made great professions of loyalty to his Prince, by which must be understood, such attachment to his person, and submission to his will, as was consistent with the laws of the land, and might contribute to the good of the people. It is also clear, that his Lordship was not at all tainted with the predominant vice of those times, that of aggrandizing himself at the expence of his neighbours, or of the Crown, for in 1628, we find he surrendered to the King, as far as in his power lay, the office of Justice-General of Scotland, which was hereditary in his family, reserving to himself and his heirs, the office of Judiciary of Argyle, and the Western Isles, and wherever else he had lands in Scotland, which agreement was afterwards ratified and confirmed by Act of Parliament (f). It does not appear, that his Lordship took any great share in the differences and disputes that happened in Scotland from that time, till the year 1633, when His Majesty came to visit his native and hereditary kingdom, at which time, it is certain, that the Lord Lorne stood as high in His Majesty's favour, as any man of quality in his country, and higher marks of duty and submission to the Royal will, could be hardly expected, than was shewn by his father and himself, in submitting the decision of the differences unhappily raised between them to the King's pleasure; of which, a certain great Historian (g), has given a very guarded and circumspcct account, which, when fully explained, will not appear so much to this noble person's discredit, as at first sight it seems [A]. It is on all hands

(a) Crauford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 354.

(b) Spotswood's History of Scotland, p. 339.

(c) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 42.

(d) See the Instructions from his Majesty's Council to the Lord Justice Clerk, in Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 36.

(e) Crauford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 20.

(f) See the article of Argyle in Collier's Dictionary.

Collins's Peerage of England, p. 444.
Crauford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 20.

(g) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 42.

[A] As at first sight it seems.] There is no doubt, that so much of the Earl of Clarendon's History, as relates to facts, that fell immediately under his own cognizance, may be writ with great exactness, and much regard to truth; but without any imputation on his character, it may be affirmed, that where he took things upon the credit of other people, he might be imposed upon, or mistaken. He does not mention the Earl of Argyle till after the first Pacification, and then he gives us an account of things that happened several years before, when his Lordship was only Lord Lorne; and the account he gives us is such a one, as shews us he had received it in conversation from those who were of a party opposite to Argyle; but as this seems to be the foundation of all the reflections cast upon this Nobleman, we will examine it more particularly. The Earl of Clarendon then writes thus (1). 'The people of Scotland being now reduced by them to a more implicit obedience, and no body daring to oppose the most extravagant proceedings of the most violent persons in power, they lost no time, as hath been said, to make all preparations for a war they meant to pursue. Most of the King's Privy-Council, and great Ministers, who (though they had not vigorously performed their duty in support of the regal power) till now had been so reserved, that they seemed not to approve the disorderly proceedings, now as frankly wedded that interest as any of the leaders, and quickly became the chief of the leaders. As the Earl of Argyle, who had been preferred by the King's immediate kindness, and full power, and rescued from the anger and fury of his incensed father, who being provoked by the disobedience and insolence of his son, resolved so to have disposed of his fortune, that little should have accompanied the honour after his death. But by the King's interposition, and indeed imposition, the Earl, in strictness of the Law in Scotland, having need of the King's grace and protection, in regard of his being become Roman Catholick, and his Majesty granting all to the son which he could exact from the father, the old man was in the end compelled to make over all his estate to his son, reserving only such a provision for himself as supported him according to his quality, during his life, which he spent in the parts beyond the seas. The King had too much occasion afterwards to remember, that in the close, after his Majesty had determined what should be done on either part, the old man declared he would submit to the King's pleasure, though he believed he was hardly dealt with; and then with some bitterness put his son in mind of his undutiful carriage towards him, and charged him to carry in his mind how bountiful the King had been to him, which yet, he told him, he was sure he would forget; and thereupon hands agreed; that the King had then, so good an opinion of his Lordship, as to think the power and influence of his family in Scotland, could not be reposed in safer hands than his, otherwise, he would not in justice to himself and his posterity, having it so much in his power as he had, have disposed of it, as he did (b). The part his Lordship afterwards acted, was that of a good patriot, which he all his life-long understood to be that of a good subject; and if he did not give into all the projects of the King's Ministers, it must be allowed, that his conduct was both open and uniform, and that he concurred with the greatest and wisest men, in that kingdom (i). It is also very certain, that some of those Ministers acted a very double part; and while they made the King believe, that the scheme of Archbishop Laud, for introducing an absolute uniformity in religion, was a thing very practicable in Scotland; they not only knew it not to be so, but even put the King upon these measures, with a design to render it more impracticable (k). How justifiable such a conduct as this might be, is not our business to determine; but most certainly the conduct of Lord Lorne, was infinitely more agreeable to the ordinary rules of justice and morality; for he adhered constantly and steadily to the principles he professed; and openly and fairly opposed those designs, which the Ministers meant should miscarry, while they seemed to approve and promote them (l). It is very likely, that in such a situation of things, the method his Lordship took, might expose him to misrepresentations to his sovereign, and that his behaviour, however open and candid, might be liable to misconstruction; but at this distance of time, when all prejudices, either are or ought to be buried, it is not easy to conceive upon what grounds it ought to be censured or condemned. He was far from being very active or busy; on the contrary, he took no greater share in the management of publick affairs, than the post which His Majesty had assigned him, rendered absolutely necessary; and though his name be found to several Remonstrances of the Privy-Council, and other acts of a like publick nature (m); yet at a time, when he had neither power nor influence, and when his enemies were possessed of both, in the highest degree, he challenged them to show, that he had any concern in those secret consultations, or any share in the political intrigues, which created the highest disputes of those times, and which brought so many miseries and misfortunes upon his country (n). It is indeed true, that there were great feuds and jealousies in Scotland; and therefore, it cannot be wondered, that notwithstanding all his care and caution, a man of his great quality should have both open and secret enemies;

(1) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, p. 42.

(b) Echard's Hist. of England, p. 468.

(i) Crauford's Lives of the Officers of the Crown and State in Scotland, p. 180.

(k) Bishop Guthrie's Memoirs, p. 16.

(l) Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 38.

(m) See most of those acts in the book last cited.

(n) Appendix to the first Vol. of Wedrow's Hist. of the Church of Scotland, p. 24.

upon said to his Majesty, Sir, I must know this young man better than you can do; you have brought me low that you may raise him, which, I doubt, you will live to repent, for he is a man of craft, subtilty, and falsehood, and can love no man; and if ever he finds it in his power to do you mischief, he will be sure to do it. The King considered it only as the effect of his passion, and took no other care to prevent it, but by heaping every day new obligations upon him, making him a Privy-Counsellor, and giving him other offices and power to do hurt, thereby to restrain him from doing it, which would have wrought upon any generous nature the effect it ought to have done. The Earl (for his father was now dead) came not to Edinburgh during the first troubles; and though he did not dissemble his displeasure against the Bishops, because one of them had affronted him in truth very rudely, yet he renewed all imaginable professions of duty to the King, and a readines to engage in his service, if those disorders should continue, but after the Pacification, and disbanding of the King's army, and the Covenanters declaring, that they would adhere to the Acts of the Assembly at Glasgow, he made haste to Edinburgh with a great train of his family and followers, and immediately signed the Covenant, engaged for the provision of arms, and raising forces, and in all things behaved himself like a man that might very safely be confided in by that party. In the first place it is necessary to observe, that the old Earl of Argyle had been the best part of his life a very warm and zealous Protestant, had fought against the Hundey family, and afterwards against the Macdonalds, partly on account of religion (2); yet drawn aside by his English lady, who was a Papist herself, and defended of a rebellious family, he went abroad into the Spanish service commanded their troops in the Low-Countries, and was even suspected of carrying on some correspondencies with the Macdonalds, whom he had dispossessed of their lands for treason, and had received some grants of them from the Crown (3). By this means he totally lost King James's favour, who, as Archbishop Spotwood says, could not endure an apostate Papist, and was publicly denounced a rebel (4). It might very well happen, that when this old Lord returned home, which he did after an absence of ten years, he might be very angry with his son, and yet that son be in no great fault, unless adhering to the Protestant Religion, and the Constitution of his Country, were faults. It is not easy to conceive, when or where this discourse happened. If it happened at all, it is most probable in the year 1628, when Lord Lorne resigned his Post of Justice-General (5), which might be a good reason for the King's being very kind to him. Neither had the Earl his father any reason to complain of his Majesty, who, though his son, by his second marriage, was then in foreign service, honoured him with a title, and secured to the Earl himself a rent-charge, which, considering the circumstances he was then in, was all he could expect (6). Bishop Guthrie, who seldom misses an occasion of speaking ill of the Earl of Argyle, mentions the King's favours to him largely (7); but says not one word of his father's quarrel with him; which, had it been true, he was the most likely man in the world to have heard; and had he heard it, no man so likely to repeat it. On the whole therefore, there is great reason to doubt the fact, which must have been related upon hearsay, and is related without any mention of the author; and in words too that visibly belong to the person who tells the story. But supposing the fact to be true, the King made a very right judgment of it, in supposing it the effect of passion, for the Earl had not seen his son for many years; and his Majesty knew enough of Lord Lorne, before this could possibly happen, to make him a Privy-Counsellor (8), which it does not appear that he ever repented of, as we shall have occasion to shew hereafter. As to the craft and cunning charged upon this Nobleman, it must be referred to the opinion that the writer had of him, for his Lordship never acted a double part, but openly declared his principles from the beginning, and adhered to them to the scaffold. Bishop Guthrie, who knew his Lordship very well, is so far from charging him with craft, that at the close of these transactions (for Lord Clarendon's period takes in the compass of ten years), that is, when the Earl joined the Covenanters, he observes, that he declared himself more positively than could have been expected from a man of his prudence (9). This is so true, that some of his Lordship's Letters, lately come to light, very fully prove, he made no secret of his sentiments, but very plainly told the great Earl of Strafford (10), That as he meant all duty to the King, so he thought that duty best shown by maintaining the Constitution of his Country in Church and State.

(5) Crauford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 20.

(6) Supplement to Spotwood's History of the Church of Scotland.

(7) Guthrie's Memoirs of Charles I. p. 12.

(8) Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 38.

(9) Bishop Guthrie's Memoirs p. 41.

(10) Strafford's Letters, Vol. II. p. 187, 220, 290.

(2) Balfour's Annals, under the year 1614.

(3) Spotwood's Hist. of the Church of Scotland, p. 540.

(4) Hist. of the Church of Scotland, ubi supra.

(6) The Bishop of Dunkeld's Memoirs, p. 19. Supplement to Archbishop Spotswood's Church Hist. MS.

(7) See the Marquis of Argyle's Answer to the indictment against him before the Parliament of Scotland, in 1661.

(8) Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 52.

enemies; and very certain it is, that he did not want for both (6). The latter were most dangerous, for they were continually suggesting, that his Lordship was a Covenanter in his heart, which was a necessary distinction; for though it might seem strange to an English reader, yet it is undoubted true, that his Lordship never signed any Covenant, 'till the King commanded him so to do (p). When by his father's death, he became Earl of Argyle, his superior title gave him somewhat greater authority, but he employed it the same way; and that was, in keeping the country quiet, and seeing the laws put in execution. He still acted and conferred with the Council, and did there as much service to His Majesty, as any of them, notwithstanding he was represented as the very chief of the Covenanters. The Marquis of Hamilton, was then the King's Commissioner in Scotland; he was directed by, and corresponded solely with, Archbishop Laud; and in appearance, at least, he laboured to introduce that Prelate's scheme of government (q), against the voice of the whole nation; and when this could not be effected, the King was induced to enter into a war against them, which, as it was calculated to bring great distress upon the nation in general, so great care was taken by Laud's party, that the Earl of Argyle should have his share of it in particular [B]. But notwithstanding their projects were well laid, yet it

[B] Should have his share of it in particular.] It must be very evident, to any who will take the pains to enquire into the transactions of those times, that the cause of all the disputes in Scotland was Archbishop Laud's being deceived (11), as to the state of that kingdom, and resolving to force upon them forms and ceremonies in religion, to which they were averse. In order to this, the King was persuaded to make war upon that nation; and though the Earl of Argyle had conducted himself so cautiously, as to have given far less provocation than many others of the nobility of that country had done; yet the Earl of Antrim, an Irish Papist, was encouraged to raise an army of his own people to attack the Western Islands, and the countries under the influence of the Earl of Argyle; which, if he could conquer, he was to have all, or at least the best part of them, for his pains (12). One ought to have good authority to support such an assertion; and I think such a one is produced, when one names the Earl of Strafford, who, in a letter dated April 16, 1639, directed to Sir Henry Vane, speaks thus (13): 'It is

(11) Bishop Guthrie's Memoirs, p. 16.

(12) Balfour's Annals, Vol. II. in the University Library at Glasgow.

(13) Strafford's Letters, Vol. II. p. 325.

over evident his Majesty hath been wofully served by his Ministers in Scotland; and if those play'd their parts ill which surrendered the castle of Edinburgh, they did still worse who have on this side done the like for that of Dumbarton, a place, indeed, of infinite great consequence, all rightly considered. It is reported to have been taken by the wiles of the Earl of Argyle, who now is, they say, possessed of it, and I believe will thence intend all the conduct of those affairs on this side the kingdom. I will warrant you, the Earl of Antrim's tenants with themselves, with all their hearts, well secured from the ill of him, for all their own Lord's professions to invade and beat that other Earl, forth of the Isles this instant summer. It should seem to me, for I was not of this council, my Lord Marquis of Hamilton, and my Lord of Antrim, had to his Majesty undertaken the business before the Earl of Antrim's coming forth of England, consequently before Argyle was declared Covenanter. My Lord of Antrim was, for his reward, to have had a share of his estate. What other shares there were, any, or none, in truth I know not. Now, howbeit, this was carried very secretly to us on this side, yet Argyle got knowledge of it there, and certainly occasioned him to declare himself sooner for the Covenant, than otherwise, perchance, he would have done: But whether that had been better or worse for his Majesty's service, I am not able to judge. What sort of an undertaking this was, and what were the consequences likely to follow on it, we may gather from another letter of the same noble person's, in which he gives Secretary Windebank a very large detail of a conversation that passed between himself and the Earl of Antrim, upon this business (14). His Lordship, says he, mentioned certain propositions by his Lordship made, and directions and authority by his Majesty given, at his last being in England, concerning his Lordship's going upon the Isles of Scotland; that in conformity therunto he had quietly expected the signification of his Majesty's pleasure, nor stirred at all 'till the receipt of my letter, complained of the suddenness and shortness of the warning, but told me, that instantly, upon the receipt of his Majesty's letter he had sent to the O Neales, O Haras, the O Lur-

(14) Ibid.

gans (if I mistake not that name) the Mac Genniffes, the Mac Guyres, the Mac Mahons, the Mac Donnels, (as many Oe's and Mac's as would startle a whole Council-board on this side to hear of) and all his other friends, requiring them, in his Majesty's name, to meet him with their forces, so as this business is now become no secret, but the common discourse, both of his Lordship and the whole kingdom. That he had bought boards, and given order for making of long boats for the transportation of his men, and was now come to ask my advice and counsel. What the sentiments of this great Statesman were, of Antrim's undertaking, and how wise a scheme he took this of the enemies of the Earl of Argyle's to be, may be seen by another paragraph in the same letter. In sum, I must needs say, his Lordship shuffles the pack dexterously enough, if pretending to make a war at his own cost he can thus presently and totally shift off the charge upon the King, deal himself a Generalship at sea and land, a Command of the King's armies, his ordnance, his arms, his stores, his shipping; make all his own officers, new levies as like him best, and procure a good horse troop for his brother. Old Ned Coke would have here said, God is my witness, these are strange things to me. But now, all this for what? Marry, for ought I either hear, or can foresee, to enable his Lordship, to go upon the Isles there, to recover for himself those great Seigniories belonging unto his ancestors, and say all the new possessors be Covenanters, which yet appears not; and that he do conquer the country (for not a less word than conquest comes from us), what shall his Majesty, or any other man, save himself, be the better? Indeed it troubles me to imagine, how his Lordship may think of us, all his Majesty's Ministers, whilst he feeds himself with the hopes to carry out from amongst us his own ends and benefits, thus in sovereignty, and under a colour of doing a service to the Crown, apply all to his own private use. To these observations this very great and very knowing man, adds several queries, of which we will take notice only of three. What sudden outrage may be apprehended from so great a number of the native Irish, children of habituated rebels, brought together without pay or victual, armed with our own weapons, ourselves left naked the whilst? What scandal to His Majesty's service, it might be in a time thus conditioned, to employ a General; and a whole army, in a manner Roman Catholicicks? What affright or pretence this might give for the Scottish, who are at least fourscore thousand in those parts, to arm also under colour of their own defence, to set the whole kingdom into a tumult, which might be the matter of sad and desperate effects? These remarks will appear still more pertinent, when we consider, that within two years after the great Irish Rebellion broke out; which without doubt, was chiefly owing to that indulgence given the Papists, under the latter part of the Earl of Strafford's government, much against that great man's will, and to the much greater indulgence that was allowed them afterwards, by which they came to know and feel their own strength; at the same time, that they persuaded many people in the administration, that none were better friends to the government, than themselves; which, besides the dismal it was disappointed. The Earl of Argyle, wrote a large vindication of his own conduct, and sent it to Court; the only answer which the King gave it was, that he should be glad to receive his vindication from his own mouth (r). The Marquis of Hamilton, was then sent with a force by sea; but finding that it was no way capable of dealing with a nation, that were in a manner united against the measures he was to impose, he first entered into some conferences with the Earl of Argyle, and other Lords, himself, and then advised a treaty with the King, who was in the field. This brought about the first Pacification in the month of June 1639, to which, by the advice of Laud, the King consented (s). It was not long after this, that His Majesty sent for the Earl of Argyle, and ten or twelve more of the principal Nobility to London. This was thought an extraordinary thing in Scotland; and those intrusted with the government there, would not on any terms suffer all the Lords to go, but sent up the Earls of Montrose, Loudon, and Lowthian, which was very ill taken by the King, who was persuaded by some about him to think, that it was showing a great disrespect to, and want of confidence in, him (t). It is very possible, that the Lords might not wholly confide in the honour and sincerity of those who had then the King's ear; and some small reason they had for this diffidence, from the usage the Earl of Loudon met with, who very narrowly escaped losing his life, and was actually imprisoned in the Tower of London (u), notwithstanding the King's safe conduct. These violent measures brought on another war with Scotland, to which the King is said to have been principally excited by the Earl of Traquair, who was then the King's Commissioner to the Parliament; and in the spring of the year 1640, the King marched against the Scots with a great army; but the Scots were well provided, and instead of waiting 'till they were attacked, marched into England with an army, and were so successful, that a new treaty was set on foot at Rippon, in the month of September (x); and this produced a second Pacification, in which the king granted all the demands of the Covenanters, yet in all these affairs, it does not appear, that the Earl of Argyle took any great share (y). By this time, the discontents in England were risen to a great height, and His Majesty being desirous to see one of his kingdoms thoroughly settled, took a sudden resolution of going to Scotland, where, with his nephew, the Elector Palatine, he arrived on the 12th of August 1641 (z). At this time, he directed the Marquis of Hamilton, whom he greatly trusted, to enter into a close correspondence with the Earl of Argyle, in which he seems to have formed a right judgment of both their tempers; for though the Marquis always professed the highest loyalty to his Master, yet he had a great concern for his country; and the Earl, though he avowed the utmost steadiness to the Constitution, yet at the same time affirmed, he had the warmest affection for his Prince (a). This conjunction had very probably brought about an entire and effectual settlement in that kingdom, if some persons who were willing to have the entire management of it, had not formed a design against the lives of both these Noblemen, in the middle of the month of October, which obliged them to quit Edinburgh for their own safety (b). It is on all hands agreed, that the King had nothing to do with this strange action; but it is also agreed, that the matter of fact is out of dispute, and that such a design there really was [C]. This gave great interruption

(r) Supplement to Archbishop Spotwood's Ch. Hist.

(s) Warwick's Memoirs of the Reign of Charles I. p. 135.

(t) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 43.

(u) Sir John Scot's flagging State of the Scotch State-men, from 1550 to 1650. Crauford's Lives of the great Officers of State, p. 201.

(x) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 151.

(y) Appendix to Wodrow's Hist. of the Church of Scotland, p. 24.

(z) Echard's Hist. of England, p. 512.

(a) Supplement to Archbishop Spotwood's Ch. History.

(b) Clarendon's Hist. Rebellion, p. 98.

dismal consequence it had, in amusing the King and his Ministers, produced an evil still more dangerous; that of giving a reasonable jealousy, that either they secretly favoured the Papists, or were deluded and amused by them (14); so that in either case, those that meant sincerely well to the Protestant cause, saw they were under an absolute necessity of taking care of themselves; and as this was a just and reasonable, so it is the real and true apology for the Earl of Argyle, and the Covenanters in Scotland; so far as they acted according to law, and by that authority, which His Majesty himself had established, when he was last in that kingdom (15).

[C] That such a design there really was.] We have three very different accounts of this matter of fact; the first is that of Bishop Guthrie (16), who says, That the Earl of Argyle had information given him by one Colonel Stewart, that the Earl of Crawford and some other persons had framed a design against the life of the Marquis of Hamilton and his own; and upon this these two Lords retired from Edinburgh, with a view, as he would have it, to make the Parliament rise in confusion; and he adds, that this was prevented by the King's going to the House, where he made a bitter speech against the Marquis of Hamilton. The second is from Bishop Burnet (17), who says, That the two Lords had an account of such a design; but without naming the authors, and having this account only from one witness, they had it not in their power to prove it in a legal manner; and this made them retire from Edinburgh, that they might provide for their own safety, as having no other way to provide for it. He also agrees that this had very ill consequences with respect to publick affairs; but that upon enquiry the fact was justified, and it plainly appeared those two Noblemen had good reason for what they did; and if they had not, the Parliament that continued sitting in their absence, would have called them to a severe reckoning for it. The third is that of the noble Historian, who is very clear in it; and after showing, that Montrose deserted the Covenanters, because the Earl of Argyle had more interest with them than he, goes on to relate the whole story with great plainness and perspicuity (18). After His Majesty's arrival in Scotland, says he, by the introduction of Mr William Murray of the Bed-chamber, Montrose came privately to the King, and informed him of many particulars, from the beginning of the Rebellion; and that the Marquis of Hamilton, was no less faulty and false towards His Majesty, than Argyle; and offered to make proof of all in the Parliament; but rather desired to have them both made away, which he frankly undertook to do: but the King abhorring that expedient, though for his own security, advised that the proofs might be prepared for the Parliament. When suddenly, on a Sunday morning, the city of Edinburgh was in arms; and Hamilton, and Argyle, both gone out of the town to their own houses; where they stood upon their guard; declaring publicly, That they had withdrawn themselves, because they knew that there was a design to assassinate them; and chose rather to absent themselves, than by standing upon their defence in Edinburgh (which they could well have done) to hazard the publick peace, and security of the Parliament; which thundered on their behalf. The Committee at Edinburgh dispatched away an express to London, with a dark and perplexed account, in the morning that the two Lords had left the city; with many doubtful expressions, what

(18) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 98.

(14) Enquiry into the Share King Charles I. had in the conduct of the Earl of Glamorgan, p. 300, &c.

(15) Sir James Balfour's Annals, 1741.

(16) Bishop Guthrie's Memoirs, p. 86, 87.

(17) Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 136.

interruption to the King's affairs, and put a stop to the settlement between him and the nation; but as the Historian of the Hamilton family acknowledges, the designs of the two Lords were perfectly sincere; and as the Marquis meant nothing but the King's service, so, to use that Historian's own words, Argyle expressed a hearty concurrence in it

(c) Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 187.

(d) Appendix to Wedow's Ch. Hist. of Scotland, p. 14.

(e) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 101. Echard's Hist. of England, p. 513.

(f) Balfour's Memoirs, Vol. II. in which it is asserted, that this was a common saying in Scotland at that time.

(g) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 265. Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 195. Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion.

(h) Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 200.

(i) Idem, ibid. p. 201.

(k) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 387. Guthrie's Memoirs, p. 124.

(c). At this juncture, His Majesty had Presbyterian Divines about him, professed a willingness to settle the Church of Scotland according to the desires of that nation; and was so well pleased with the openness and plainness of Argyle's behaviour, that, by letters patent bearing date November 16, 1641, he created him Marquis (d). It is very true, that some of our Historians say, the King went at this time down to Scotland, to make a deed of gift of that kingdom with his own hands (e), which is an expression not easily to be understood; another has been used, which is much plainer, and I believe nearer the truth; that in the end of November, when he quitted that kingdom, he went from thence a contented King, and left behind him a contented people (f). How the scene was afterwards changed, is another affair. At this juncture, there happened a transaction, which shows, beyond all manner of doubt, that the Marquis was understood by the whole world, not only to be in the King's favour, but to be thoroughly and heartily inclined to his service. The Irish Rebellion was just broke out, upon which the Scots, as well as the English Parliament, resolved to send forces thither to suppress it; and the former determined the Marquis of Argyle should command theirs; but that first, in conjunction with the Earl of Loudon, he should go to London, to mediate between the King and the English Parliament; with both which measures His Majesty was perfectly well pleased; but the Parliament being jealous of the Marquis's attachment to the King, civilly declined it, by declaring, that they looked upon the Marquis's presence in Scotland, to be then indispensably necessary. At the beginning of the ensuing year, the Scots, as a nation, had very much in their power; for in the differences between the King and the Parliament of England, that side to which they joined themselves unanimously, was sure to prevail. This was a thing so plain, and withal so certain, that both His Majesty and the Parliament saw and knew it; and therefore both sides began to court the Scots, with all the pains imaginable (g). The Marquis of Hamilton very prudently represented to the King, that this was an affair of a very nice nature; that His Majesty's having a party in Scotland, would be the ruin of him; but if His Majesty could gain the whole nation, the Parliament must submit to reasonable terms; and when he had stated this difficulty, he offered to go and make use of his best endeavours to get over it (h). The King accepted his service, and sent a letter by the Earl of Lanerick, brother to the Marquis, to his council in that kingdom, who in the last Parliament had been declared Conservators of the peace, dated September 18, 1642. The Marquis of Hamilton, according to his promise to the King, addressed himself to the Marquis of Argyle, with whom he was then in great friendship; and by their joint labours a resolution was obtained, to send the Marquis of Hamilton to Holland, to engage the Queen to come over to Scotland, on a promise of security for her person, and the free exercise of her religion, for herself and family, offering to assist Her Majesty in mediating with both Houses; and in case they refused to make a settled and solid peace upon reasonable terms, they undertook, that the whole force of Scotland should engage for the King against them (i). The King at first, seemed not only satisfied but overjoyed with this, but soon about him soon filled his head with jealousies, that the Scots took too much upon them, upon which the King let this proposition fall; and tho' the Queen, who was extremely pleased with it, procured the Marquis of Hamilton to be created a Duke, on the merit of this service, which was the greatest he ever did, or indeed could do, yet she could not hinder his being persecuted afterwards, and sent prisoner to Pendennis-castle, as a traitor (k). After this, the what the end of it would be; not without some dark insinuations, as if the design might look farther than Scotland. And these letters were brought to London, the day before the Houses were to come together, after the recess; all that party taking pains to persuade others, that it could not but be a design to assassinate more men than those Lords at Edinburgh. And the morning the Houses were to meet, Mr Hyde being walking in Westminster-hall, with the Earl of Holland and the Earl of Essex, both the Earls seemed wonderfully concerned at it; and to believe, that other men were in like danger of the like assaults; the other, not thinking the apprehension worthy of them, told them merrily, That he knew well what opinions they both had of those two Lords, a year or two before, and he wondered how they became so altered; to which they answered smiling, That the times and the Court was much altered since. And the Houses were no sooner sat, but the report being made in the House of Commons, and the Committee's letter from Scotland being read, a motion was made, To send to the House of Peers, that the Earl of Essex, who was left by the King General on this side Trent, might be desired to appoint such a guard, as he thought competent for the security of the Parliament, constantly to attend while the Houses sat; which was done accordingly; and continued till they thought fit to have other guards. We see plainly from hence, what terrible consequences attended these over-forward and violent resolutions, which were not put in execution, merely from the justice and tenderness of the King's nature; for it is very observable, that though the Historian does not in the least dispute the fact, yet he acknowledges, that himself treated it at the time, as a very light matter; and would have persuaded the Lords, that there was a time, when they would not have been so much concerned for the safety of these Scotch Noblemen; which, not to say a harsher thing of it, is a very extraordinary expression; and very plainly shews, what strange expedients some Politicians at that time thought not altogether unjustifiable to carry their points; and if by degrees, others were either taught or forced to follow their examples, they could not, upon their own principles, judge it inexcusable. In the former note, we have shown, that there were thoughts of stripping the Earl of Argyle of his estate; in this, it has been proved, that a design was formed against his life; when he was so far from having forfeited the King's confidence, that after this he created him, in publick testimony thereof, a Marquis.

[D] With

the affairs of Scotland took the worst turn possible for the King; he had owned the Conservators by the letter beforementioned, notwithstanding which, he was prevailed upon to grant a Commission to the Earl of Montrose, which threw that kingdom into a Civil War; the King's authority being claimed on both sides (l). The share the Marquis of Argyle had in this, belongs to the General History of those times; and therefore, we shall not meddle with it here, farther than to observe, that in 1644, Antrim, who was created a Marquis for that very purpose, sent over a great body of his Irish Papists, who wasted and destroyed all Argyle's estate; and, which was worst, killed most of his people (m). In the course of this period, Argyle was constantly employed by the Parliament, and had their authority for every thing he did, particularly in respect to a journey he made to Ireland; at his return from which, he found the King in the hands of the Scots army at Newcastle, in which it is certain that he had no hand; but upon his repairing thither, he had access to (n), and was very kindly received by, His Majesty. This was in 1646, and upon that occasion it was thought necessary by the Parliament of Scotland, that he should repair to London, with instructions to their Commissioners. At this very time, he was intrusted by his Royal Master with a secret commission of the greatest importance, which he executed with much dexterity, diligence, and fidelity (o) [D]. Yet his conduct at this very time has been grievously censured by those who, it seems, were not in the secret, and were unacquainted that the measures he took, were not only most for the King's service, but had also his Majesty's approbation (p). As to what afterwards passed with respect to the terms made with the army from Scotland, and the measures taken in reference to the disposal of the person of King Charles I. we find many things said in our histories, as to the conduct of the Marquis of Argyle, but they are asserted only without any proofs (q); and this noble person himself, at a time when, if there had been any such proofs in the power of the persons who have asserted these things, or of any other, they might certainly have been produced, declared in terms the clearest and most positive that could be framed, he had no interest or concern in them whatever, but studiously avoided interfering in any manner, in matters which he foresaw it was impossible in the nature of things should ever end otherwise than they did, or be by him wrought to produce what he could wish. His Lordship's declaration under such circumstances as to his own behaviour, which he must certainly best know, will, to any reasonable man, seem as much deserving of credit, as what others have asserted from their own notions and conjectures, and without pretending to produce any kind of evidence whatever [E]. In the succeeding year, when the Duke of Hamilton undertook to lead an

(l) Hist. of the Civil War, p. 395.

(m) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 439; Guthrie's Memoirs, p. 141.

(n) Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 283.

(o) See a large account of this in note [D].

(p) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 496; Guthrie's Memoirs, p. 181, 184; Warwick's Memoirs, p. 294; 295.

(q) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 537; Echard's Hist. of England, p. 645; Guthrie's Memoirs, p. 215.

army

[D] With much dexterity, diligence, and fidelity.] The account which the Earl of Clarendon gives of what passed after the King came to Newcastle, is such a one as might be expected from a person who was not an eye-witness of the things about which he writes, who took his accounts from men of his own party, and to make his work all of a piece, represents the Scots in the blackest colours (19). As to Duke Hamilton's and the Marquis of Argyle's conferences with the King, he is silent, which is a plain indication that he was not acquainted with them. Bishop Guthrie is very particular, and the particulars he gives us are such, as show him to have been a very credulous man, and very unfit for writing history. He says, that on July 17, 1646, when Duke Hamilton arrived at Newcastle, the day was perfectly fair and pleasant, but at the very instant he kissed the King's hand, there began a terrible thunder, with lightning and rain, which continued all night. Upon the 24th came the Marquis of Argyle, and as he kissed the King's hand, just like thunder, lightning, and rain, began, and continued all the night also; these are the Prelate's own words; and a little after he tells us, that upon the 2d of August, the English Commissioners removed from Newcastle; and the next day, the Chancellor, the Marquis of Argyle, and the Earl of Dumferling, offered to go up and treat with the Parliament for a mitigation of the articles, which they had sent by their own Commissioners; and with some of which, the King had expressed himself dissatisfied; upon all which he makes this wise reflection (20), 'Whether or not His Majesty trusted them, and expected any good from them, is doubtful; but the Royalists (who well knew their ways) spared not to say, that their treating would end in a bargain.' Bishop Burnet gives us also an account of the access which these Lords had to the King, and of a commission with which the Marquis of Argyle was charged, in conjunction with the Chancellor, in which he was enjoined secrecy; at the same time he tells us, what this commission was, and assures us the secret of it, was but very ill kept (21); whereas, in truth, it was so well kept, that it clearly appears from his account, that at the time he writ his book it had not reached his knowledge. The truth of the matter then was this, the Marquis of Argyle might if he had so pleased, resided at London, as a Commissioner from the Parliament of Scotland, but he liked not of the office, and therefore very carefully declined it. That he went up now was at the King's request (22), and the Commission he was charged with, that he should consult the Duke of Richmond and the Marquis of Hertford, as to the expediency of the Scots Parliament and army declaring for him, what effects they judged this would have, and what part his friends in England would take, if such a thing happened. Argyle honestly executed the trust reposed in him, and received from these noble persons the following answer, That His Majesty well knew, his best friends at Oxford never wished to see him bring his Parliament under by an absolute conquest; and that if at this juncture the Scots should declare for him, it might prove his ruin, by turning it into a national dispute, in which all parties of the English would unite to prevent their being conquered. The King having received this answer from the Marquis of Argyle's own mouth, remained satisfied, and took other measures. When the Marquis of Argyle was sent to the Tower in 1661, he desired that Lord Hertford's deposition might be taken to this point; which was refused him, and probably kept from that nobleman's knowledge. Thus the reader sees, that while the Marquis was doing his duty with the utmost diligence, he was safely supposed to be driving a bargain. One thing more is very remarkable, that it was proposed in the English House of Commons to give thanks to the Scotch Commissioners for their great civilities and good offices, while at Newcastle; but when it came to be put to the vote, the words good offices were left out, so far were they from thinking these Commissioners did their business with the King (23). These are facts, and facts are stubborn things, so are not conjectures and characters, which every man may mould or model according to his own inclinations.

(22) State Trials, Vol. 11, p. 429.

(23) Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 399.

[E] Any kind of evidence whatever.] It would take up more room than the nature of this work will allow, to enter into a particular discussion of every important

(19) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 490, 495.

(20) Bishop Guthrie's Memoirs, p. 184.

(21) Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, p. 283, 284.

army out of Scotland into England for the relief of the King. the conduct of the Marquis of Argyle is very much censured, because himself and his friends differed in a debate, from the majority of that Parliament, and protested against the vote (r), after it was carried. But if it be considered, that the Marquis of Argyle had in his own breast the decision of the Duke of Richmond and the Marquis of Hertford, that if Scotland took part with the King, the English would rise as one man against him (s); and that Sir Philip Warwick tells us, Hamilton had no engagements with the Nobility that rose about this time in England (t); it may be easily conceived, why Argyle had so indifferent an opinion of an enterprize, at the head of which Hamilton was set, a man, of all the Scotch Nobility, more obnoxious to the English than any. It is certain that he was very right in his judgment, for the Duke very soon threw away both himself and the army (u); and the Marquis of Argyle, by seeming to have opposed his conduct, had interest enough thereby to hinder Cromwell from entering Scotland with his army, and making an absolute conquest of it, which he might have easily done (w). Upon his marching southwards, all our Historians agree that Scotland was left entirely in the hands of Argyle and his friends; and therefore, from their conduct at this time, we may form a true judgment of their real sentiments and principles (x). The first thing they did, was to declare fully and plainly against the proceedings in England, and to order the Scots Commissioners to protest against them; which they did in terms, the most clear and explicit, showing, that they looked upon the Parliament of England, as no longer subsisting after the House of Lords was taken away, and so many members of the House of Commons excluded; that they had no power over the person of the King: and that whatever they pretended to do, was arbitrary, unjust, and illegal (y). It was not at that time in the power of the Scots to do more, the Duke of Hamilton's precipitate attempt having weakened them extremely, but they took the best measures they could to put themselves again in a posture of defence; and as soon as they were informed of the King's murder, they proclaimed his son (z); and it cannot be denied, that the Marquis of Argyle employed all his interest and influence to procure his being invited into Scotland, which sufficiently refutes that groundless and scandalous aspersions, as if Cromwell had communicated to Argyle his design against the King's life, and that it had been approved of by the latter (a). It is indeed true, that the Marquis of Argyle and those who had then power in Scotland, insisted on the King's complying with their terms; which if they had not done, it would have been impossible for them to have brought the nation to adhere to him (b). As to what happened afterwards to Montrose, the Marquis of Argyle had no immediate hand in it. He had formerly made an agreement with him, which the Committee of Estates refused to ratify; and now, when he was brought to a trial for being in arms, as the Scots considered it, against his country, the Marquis declared, that he was too much a party to be a judge (c), and therefore declined any share in those proceedings. What he meant by this, and how far he was justified in this step of his conduct, the reader may learn from some Historians, not at all inclined to be partial in Argyle's favour (d) [F]. At last, with much persuasion in some measure against his own will,

(r) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 526.

(s) See the Marquis of Argyle's Answer to the Charge against him in the Parliament of Scotland, in 1661.

(t) Warwick's Memoirs, p. 316.

(u) Bates, Elenchus Motuum, p. 101.

(w) Whitlock's Memorials of English Affairs, p. 343.

(x) Bates, Elenchus Motuum, p. 102. Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton. Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion.

(y) Rushworth's Collections, Vol. II. p. iv. p. 1390. Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 577. Bates, Elenchus Motuum, p. 142.

(z) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 437.

(a) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 541. Guthrie's Memoirs, p. 249. Echard's Hist. of England.

(b) Bates, Elenchus Motuum, p. 93. 94.

(c) See the Marquis of Argyle's Answer to the Charge against him in the Scotch Parliament of 1661.

(d) Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 579.

(24) Appendix to Wodrow's Hist. of the Church of Scotland, p. 24.

portant matter of fact; and those we have already examined, are instances sufficient of what might be done in this way; at present we will content ourselves with citing a passage from the Marquis's defence, when he was charged in general terms, in a judicial way, with the crimes that are imputed to him by certain Historians. Thus then it ran (24), 'As for what was done in the years 1646 and 1647, concerning the disposal of his late Royal Majesty's person, the return of the Scottish army, and the agreement for the money to be paid for their arrears, it is well known, that instructions were sent to and again in these affairs, both from Committees and Commissioners in Scotland and England. Yet it shall never be found, that ever either my hand or presence was at any Committees, where any thing was debated or resolved, concerning the disposal of his late Royal Majesty's person, or upon any treaties or conclusions for return of the Scots army, or for the money for the satisfaction of their arrears. So that, I hope, when it is seriously considered, that I was one of the last in Scotland, who subscribed the national Covenant, and never did the same 'till commanded by His Majesty; and that I was of all those who acted in publick affairs, one of those who had least accession to those things, though I be most blamed by common report, that your Lordships will not find my carriage, during the late troubles, to have deserved to have been put in so singular a condition.' And to the same purpose, the Marquis delivered himself in his speech before the Parliament of Scotland, April 16, 1661. 'I have but only a few words to say, in remembering your Lordships of three things observable in my carriage, during the late troubles. First, my never joining in the national Covenant, 'till commanded by his late Royal Majesty. Secondly, my never receiving any pay during all the troubles, either as Committee-man, Commander in Chief, Colonel, or Captain, in all the services of England, Scotland, or Ireland, 'till in a Parliament of the year 1646, which was after all I had was destroyed by the Irish rebels and their associates: and what I got from the Parliament 1647, was after my estates and lands were ruined, and was only for my family's subsistence and paying some necessitous creditors some annual rents, as the Act of Parliament, 1647, and order to the Scots Commissioners at London the same year, can show. And for the first negative part, Sir William Thomson's hand will prove it, who was either Depute or Principal Receiver and Layer out of all publick monies all that time. Thirdly, my being free of any actions in the years 1646 and 1647, anent the disposing of His Majesty's Royal father's person, never having concurred on Committees in Scotland or England, nor as a Commissioner at London anent the same, nor in any resolutions concerning the return of the Scots army, nor the money for their arrears agreed to in these times, except that I might be present in the Parliament 1647, which I do not well know. By all which it is evident, how clearly and freely I may say, that I do not deserve to be the single sufferer in all His Majesty's dominions, for my carriage during the late troubles, His Majesty having (to his eternal praise) pardoned all but some of the murderers of his late Royal Father.'

[F] To be partial in Argyle's favour.] It is certainly a very difficult thing to come at truth, in respect to any of these transactions; and the only way to come at it is, to examine, without prejudice, what different authors have delivered, and make such allowances will, but certainly contrary to the advice of the noble Historian, and others of his most favoured Counsellors, the King determined to accept the repeated invitations of the Parliament of Scotland, and to go over thither upon their terms (e). It is allowed, that this return of His Majesty, was singly and entirely owing to the Marquis of Argyle; and the Historian of the Hamilton family tells us, that Duke William, the last heir male of that race, when he found himself excluded by the Parliament of Scotland from having any share in publick affairs, thought fit, notwithstanding, out of pure loyalty to the King, to press him to close with the propositions that were made him, and to rely upon the Marquis of Argyle (f) as the only person, who, as things then stood, could serve him effectually, which is a convincing argument, that the fact was really so; for had it been otherwise, the Duke of Hamilton would never have attempted to make His Majesty believe such great things of a man, he then held to be his enemy. Upon His Majesty's arrival, he was very dutifully received by the Marquis, and the utmost respect was paid to his person, by all such as approached him (g). It is true, that the King took the Covenant, and complied in all other respects, with the terms agreed on in Holland, which we find some writers representing as a great hardship, and ascribing it solely to the Marquis of Argyle. But granting this to be true, even these authors acknowledge, that the voice of the nation was with him (h); and if the Marquis meant to restore the King, he could not discover the sincerity of his meaning more plainly, than by urging him to make good his promises at the beginning, and to satisfy the people of that nation, that he meant to keep his word with them; neither was there any thing blameable in the Marquis's conduct, supposing it to have proceeded merely from his zeal for the Church of Scotland, since this

(e) Whitelock's Memorials, p. 439.

(f) Burnet's Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton.

(g) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 604.

(h) Bates, Eleme. Notuum, p. 95.

allowances as is necessary on the score of that partiality, in favour of their own parties, with which almost all of them are known to write. It is evident from the whole tenor of Bishop Guthrie's Memoirs, that he was strongly prepossessed against the Marquis of Argyle; yet he acknowledges, that, in 1643, this nobleman set on foot a negotiation for compromising his differences with Montrose (25); and at the same time owns, that the latter gave him a dilatory answer, with a view to gain time, having already taken a settled resolution to begin the war, as soon as those of his party about the King could procure him a commission. It is also necessary to observe, that Argyle and his friends, whom Burnet styles the Church party (26) in Scotland, had very clearly the King's authority on their side, as appears, beyond contradiction, from His Majesty owning them upon many occasions, and treating with them to the last, at the Isle of Wight, as a legal Parliament, and representatives of his subjects; and as such, after his death, they were owned by King Charles II. Yet notwithstanding this, in 1644, Montrose was employed in Scotland to raise a war on that side, and Antrim promised to send assistance from Ireland; and for their encouragement, both were created Marquisses (27). By this means the war began in Scotland, and was carried on with great violence and fury, more especially by the Irish that Antrim sent over. The Marquis of Argyle and the Earl of Lothian were employed by the Parliament to command their forces against Montrose, when they acted for some time on the defensive, and at last laid down their command; of which Bishop Guthrie gives this account (28); 'without more ado (says he) they went to Edinburgh and delivered up their commissions to the Committee of Estate, receiving from them an act of approbation of their service, which many said they deserved the better, because they had shed no blood.' It is to be hoped this Prelate himself was among the many; for surely avoiding to shed blood in such times as these, was a very heroic, as well as Christian disposition. Yet some time after, this right reverend author seems to take a pleasure in relating the calamities that befel the countries belonging to the Marquis of Argyle; observes, without any testimony of compassion, that the people were driven to hide and lurk about, so that multitudes perished by famine; and asserts, that, at last, the Marquis's great power was so far reduced, that he could scarce muster fifteen hundred of his tenants, such rivers of blood had been shed in the Civil War (29). The Earl of Clarendon (30) also acknowledges, that upon enquiring what soul offence the Marquis of Montrose had ever committed that should hinder the Lords, who now (1650) were returned to their duty from acting in conjunction with him, the Earl of Lauderdale told him, that he could not imagine or conceive the barbarities and inhumanities Montrose was guilty of, at the time he made war in Scotland, that he never gave quarter to any man, but pursued all the advantages he ever got, with the utmost outrage and cruelty; that he had in one battle killed fifteen hundred of one family of the Campbells, of the blood and name of Argyle, and that he had utterly rooted out several names and entire noble families.' It must therefore be allowed, that it was a mark of much moderation and greatness of mind in the Marquis of Argyle, to refuse having any share in the proceedings against this unfortunate Nobleman; neither is any thing said of him here, or else where, intended as the least aspersion upon his character. It was the unhappiness, the signal unhappiness, of those dismal times, that men of honour, of virtue, and of religion, were drawn by the different colours given to the causes of several parties, to shed the blood of their countrymen, to destroy and depopulate their native soil, and to pursue even their old acquaintance, nay and near relations, with unrelenting fury. The Marquis of Argyle appears to have had as little of this spirit as any, and yet when he had leisure to recollect, and to reflect upon his own actions, we find him professing with an ingenuity worthy of his noble nature, his concern for what had happened. These are his words (31). 'I confess it was my great misfortune to be too deeply engaged in these fatal times. I know the Nobility of Scotland have always bickered with their Princes; and from the insolency of that custom, not any of our Kings have been free. 'Tis also true, the perpetual family feuds among us, which by all the industry and authority of our Princes could never be so pacified, but that they revived again, and took upon themselves, as they had advantage, to revenge their quarrel; (and yet like sudden floods which violently overrun, and as peaceably return within their banks, abated to their due allegiance) did easily persuade me, that there was no such apparent danger in the first beginnings of the contest between the King and my nation of Scotland. I had laid it for a maxim, that a reformation was sooner effected, per Gladium Oris, than per Os Gladii; and certainly true religion is rather a settler than a stickler in policy, and rather confirms men in the obedience to the government established, than invites them to the erecting of new, which they neither do nor can know 'till it be discovered and declared. Wherein I did not look upon our intended reformation as any way taxable, since it had the whole stream of universal consent of the whole nation; I never thought of those dire consequences which presently followed, 'till by that confusion my thoughts became distracted, and myself encountered so many difficulties in the way, that all remedies that were applied did the quite contrary operation; whatever therefore hath been said by me and others, in this matter, you must repute and accept them as from a distracted man, of a distracted subject, in a distracted time wherein I lived; and this shall serve to let you know, how far I waded unwarily in that business.'

(31) The Marquis of Argyle's Instructions to his son, p. 4, 5, 6, 7.

(25) Memoirs of the Conspiracies and Rebellion against King Charles I. p. 110, 111.

(26) In his Memoirs of the Dukes of Hamilton, throughout.

(27) Crauford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 331.

(28) Memoirs of the Conspiracies and Rebellion against King Charles I. p. 134.

(29) Idem, ibid. p. 151, 152, 171.

(30) Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 579.

(f) See his Answer to the Charge against him before the Scotch Parliament, in 1667.

(g) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 605. Bates, Elench. Mot. P. ii. p. 95.

(h) Crauford's History of the Great Officers of State in Scotland, p. 417.

(i) Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 607, 608. Whitelock's Memorials, p. 47c. Warwick's Memoirs, p. 356. Bates, Elenchus Mot. Part ii. p. 105, 106.

(j) Wodrow's Hist. of the Church of Scotland, in the Appendix, p. 25.

(k) See Echar'd's third Vol. of the Hist. of England, in the Appendix.

this was agreeable to the whole tenor of his life, and the very principle upon which all that influence was grounded, which hitherto he had so effectually used for the King's service and support (i). It is also allowed, that the Marquis's conduct in Scotland had a very great effect upon his countrymen in Ireland, who thereupon immediately and unanimously declared for the King (k). It is very certain, that as the Marquis of Argyle had brought the Scotch nation to own and receive His Majesty upon the foundation of their constitution; so he was very solicitous, that the King should keep his promises with them, and that he should act in such a manner as might extinguish all their fears and jealousies, in which impartial people will allow, that he acted like an able Statesman and a good subject (l). Upon Cromwell's entering Scotland, it is confessed, that he met with effectual and obstinate resistance, and that he was never in so great danger of being defeated, as in that expedition. There are very different accounts of the battle of Dunbar, which was fought, September 3, 1650, in which, tho' Cromwell gained a great yet it was an unexpected victory; and, notwithstanding the Marquis of Argyle had been very instrumental in raising that powerful army, which fought there in the King's cause, yet never any blame was charged upon him, in respect to the defeat (m). He adhered to the King as steadily afterwards as he did before it; attended him at Perth, or St Johnstoun, with the same diligence and duty (n), and was so instrumental in the steps taken there for His Majesty's service, that out of a full persuasion of the uprightness of his intentions and the justice of his conduct, the King, of his own motive, was pleased to give him such a testimony under his hand, as ought to convince posterity, that what some men have written, in reference to this noble person, proceeded either from partiality or want of sufficient lights (o). This paper alone is of more weight than all the private Memoirs or General Histories of those times put together; as King Charles II. is known to have formed very right judgments of men, and as he hath given us therein his judgment of the Marquis's behaviour to this time [G]. Such of the English as were about the King, and more especially the [G] Of the Marquis's behaviour to this time. The defeat at Dunbar was a very trying circumstance, in respect to the King's affairs; and it seems, that the Committee of Estates were not extremely attentive to the concern His Majesty was under on this occasion. He was at that time at Perth, from whence he dispatched the Marquis of Argyle to the States, with a message, which was soon after followed by a most gracious letter, dated the 12th of September; the very same day the Lord Lorne was sent with another letter, in reference to recruiting the regiments of guards (32). The pains taken, both by the Marquis and his son upon this occasion, might very naturally make a strong impression upon His Majesty's mind, more especially as he could not but be sensible, that it was chiefly owing to their influence the Ministers were kept to his party; and that the advice given him by the Marquis, how little soever it might be agreeable to his age and temper, was, notwithstanding, of the utmost consequence to his affairs, and the fittest for him to follow at that juncture. Upon these motives, he was inclined to give the Marquis a signal testimony of his royal favour, which at the same time, that it expressed his sense of past and present services, might bind him to him, for the future. He drew up, therefore, the following paper with his own hand, and presented it to the Marquis, under his Sign-Manual (33).

(32) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. I. p. 163, 164.

(33) Printed by the Rev. Mr Echar'd, in the Appendix to the third Vol. of his Hist. being communicated to him by the late Duke of Argyle.

HAVING taken into my consideration the faithful endeavours of the Marquis of Argyle, for restoring me to my just rights, and the happy settling of my dominions. I am desirous to let the world see how sensible I am of his real respect to me, by some particular marks of my favour to him, by which they may see, the trust and confidence, which I repose in him: and particularly, I do promise, that I will make him Duke of Argyle and Knight of the Garter, and one of the Gentleman of my Bed-Chamber; and this to be performed, when he shall think it fit. And, I do further promise him, to hearken to his counsels _____ (worn out) _____ Whenever it shall please God to restore me to my just rights in England, I shall see him paid the forty thousand pounds sterling, which is due to him. All which, I do promise to make good, upon the word of a king.

St Johnstoun,
September 24, 1650.

CHARLES R.

There can be but two constructions put upon this paper, for, either it must have proceeded entirely from the kindness and good will of the King; and then it must be allowed, to be the clearest demonstration of his high opinion of the Marquis's abilities and fidelity, which over-turns all the conjectural accounts of those Historians, who pretend, that he looked upon himself, as under a kind of government and restraint from the Marquis; or it must have been owing to the ambition of that Nobleman himself, who was willing to have a security from the King, for the hazards he run in his service; and taken in this light, it is as clear a proof of his sincere intention to contribute all in his power to his Restoration, without which this paper was a thing of no value. If therefore, we either allow, which by the way, no-body ever denied, that the King had parts or the Marquis prudence, we cannot doubt, that they perfectly understood each other, tho' it is highly probable, from the profound secrecy with which this transaction was attended, that neither inclined the world should know how perfect an understanding there was between them. It would be no very difficult matter to show the truth of this observation from matters of fact. The King, tho' he did not follow the Marquis's advice in protracting the war in Scotland, yet testified his respect and regard for him at his departure. It appears from the Earl of Clarendon's account, that the Queen-Mother had always a very good opinion of the Marquis (34), as had such of the King's English Counsellors as wished to see him truly a Monarch, the sovereign of all his subjects, of what religious or political sentiments soever they might be, and to which in his own nature the King himself was inclined. The conference with Don John of Austria, five years after this, shews His Majesty's thorough sense of the Marquis's real attachment, notwithstanding appearances (35). On the other hand, he was the last man that capitulated in Scotland, he did it when sick and a prisoner, and then only promised to be quiet. He held several meetings with the loyal Nobility, to consider whether any thing might be attempted for His Majesty's service. His son was very often in arms, which made the father always suspected; and tho' he seems to have altered his conduct in the last years of the usurpation, yet it was, because he judged, that complying so far, as to sit in Parliament in the time of Richard, might be of more service to the King, as it really was, than acting in Scotland against Monk. At his very tryal, he appealed to his Grace, the Earl of Middleton (36), then High Commissioner, for the truth of his sending a message to him in the hills, when he was there in arms with a few followers for the King; to which he received no answer; and his resolution of going up to London after the Restoration, must have arisen from a consciousness of these past services.

(34) Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 631.

(35) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. V. p. 604.

(36) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. I. p. 47.

[H] To

the Duke of Buckingham, were very well satisfied with the Marquis's conduct, and concurred with him in his measures. They knew very well, that there was no failing against wind and tide, and thought those did the King service, that enabled him to sail with them (p). But after all, His Majesty was drawn to wish for a coalition of parties; and having intelligence, that the Highlanders were in arms, and that several Noblemen had joined with them, he secretly withdrew from Perth, intending to have cast himself upon them (q). He was however prevailed upon to return, and the Marquis of Argyle still adhering closely to him, tho' he saw His Majesty disposed to take other measures than those he thought best for his service; it was resolved, he should be solemnly crowned at Scoon with all the magnificence in the power of that distressed nation; which was accordingly done in January following, when the King, by his coronation oath, renewed all his former promises and obligations and the Crown was set upon his head by the Marquis of Argyle, who was the first Nobleman that did homage and swore allegiance (r). After this, His Majesty entered into measures for procuring the Act of Classes, by which Montrose's party were kept out of employments, to be repealed, which, tho' it might be against the judgment of the Marquis of Argyle, yet he did not hinder His Majesty from prosecuting that design. It is very clear from the Histories of those times, that how much soever these steps might increase the King's army, yet they added very little strength to it, or weight to his Councils (s). New jealousies arose, fresh struggles for power began, Cromwell pushed his successes so far, that having at last made himself master of Perth, the King found himself obliged with his army to retire to Sterling, where, however he was so strongly posted, that after several attempts to no purpose, Cromwell was obliged to lay aside his design of attacking him (t). It was in the month of July, that the King formed a resolution of marching into England, which, it is allowed, was opposed by the Marquis of Argyle, and which seems to be very fair dealing, is acknowledged by the Earl of Clarendon, that those he offered against it were no frivolous reasons, tho' they are not mentioned (u). It is highly probable, that the Marquis might think His Majesty might find it easier to deal with his enemies in a country where his authority was universally acknowledged, except in the places immediately under their power; he might also hope, by protracting the war and removing the seat of it, Cromwell's army might be lessened, separated, and perhaps drawn into the same circumstances, that they were before the fatal battle of Dunbar; neither is it all unlikely, that he might hope the English in the King's interest, would, by such a diversion, have time given them to consult and concert a general insurrection, which was like to prove infinitely more formidable than any attempts they could make to join the King upon his sudden marching into their country with several flying corps of the Parliament forces in his front, and on his flanks, and Cromwell's numerous and victorious army at his heels (w). But tho' the Marquis disapproved the measure, and gave his reasons against it, which were allowed to have weight by the best judges, even of the King's English friends, yet he would have accompanied His Majesty, if his Lady had not lain at the point of death, which induced him to ask the King's leave to remain behind; which was very graciously given, and he had the honour of kissing his sovereign's hand, when he took leave of him at Sterling (x). We are indeed told by certain Historians, that there were some about the King, who would have persuaded him to secure the Marquis's person, and to have left him, not only as he did, without trust or power, but without liberty also (y), when his Lady was in a dying condition in Scotland. But His Majesty had more wisdom, as well as justice, than to consent to any such thing; and the answer that he gave upon that occasion shews, how much better he was able to judge of things, than any of those about him. After the King's defeat at Worcester, the Marquis of Argyle retired to his own house at Inverary, where he continued to act as he thought best for his own defence, for a whole year (z); 'till falling sick, he was surprized and made prisoner by General Dean, who afterwards brought him up to Edinburgh, where he was likewise a prisoner, when Cromwell was proclaimed Protector, and having received General Monk's orders to attend the Council, he was, in consequence of that attendance, obliged to be present at the ceremony of proclaiming the Protector (a). While he was a prisoner, a paper was tendered to him to sign, containing his submission to the government, as settled, without King or House of Lords; which he refused; but afterwards, when he was in no condition to struggle, he did sign a paper (b) promising to live peaceably under that government. His Chaplain, Mr Alexander Gordon, while the English were at Inverary, prayed constantly for His Majesty; and when the Marquis himself prayed, he always mentioned those to whom he was engaged, by natural, civil, or Christian bonds (c). His country was the last that submitted; and even then, his son did not submit. The Marquis did indeed use great civility towards the persons in power, which was the more necessary, because, as Whitelocke and other writers of that party tell us, he was under continual suspicions; so far is it from being true, that he was looked upon by them as a man firm in their interest, or one in whom they might confide (d). He opposed the Act of Union, upon plausible and just motives; but in reality, with a view to hinder it from succeeding at all (e). In 1656, when King Charles II. had a conference with Don John of Austria upon the state of his affairs in Scotland; and amongst other things it was objected to him, that the Marquis and his son, the Lord Lorne, had the greatest interest there, and that it was suspected they (p) Clarendon's Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 613.

(q) Bates, Elenc. Mot. P. ii. p. 111.

(r) See the Ceremony of the King's Coronation at Scoon, Jan. 1651, prefixed to Mr Robt. Douglas's Sermon upon that Occasion.

(s) See the Preface to Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland.

(t) Bates, Elenc. Mot. p. 118, 119.

(u) Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 614.

(w) These reasons were reported often in conversation by the old Earl of Cromartie.

(x) See the Marquis's Answer to the Charge against him before the Parliament in 1661.

(y) Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 614.

(z) Append. to Wodrow's Hist. of the Church of Scotland, p. 25.

(a) Thurloe's Letters, Vol. VI. p. 405.

(b) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Append. p. 25.

(c) See his Defence against the Charge before the Parliament of Scotland in 1661.

(d) Whitelocke's Memorials, p. 506, 514, 517, 519, 524, 530, 532. Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. I. p. 514.

(e) See his Defence before mentioned.

they were against him; His Majesty answered clearly, that for the Lord Lorne, he could depend as much upon him, as upon his brother. In regard to the Marquis, he contented himself, with saying he was a very wise man; but at last confessed, that he had received more money from him, than from any person in Scotland (f). It is not to be inferred from hence, that the King had any doubts, at that time, about his fidelity; but knowing his cautious way of acting, he was unwilling to declare his sentiments plainly, even to Don John. Under Richard's Protectorate, he was chose for the shire of Aberdeen; and tho' he had refused to serve in Oliver's Parliament, yet he thought fit to go up then to London, and wrought there, as he told several after he came down again to Scotland, for His Majesty's service, as it was afterwards proved, for his service effectually by making that breach, by which His Majesty entered (g). It seems however, that during Monk's government in Scotland, he looked upon the country as absolutely conquered; and his conceiving the thing in this light, very probably induced him to take many steps, that he would not otherwise have done (b). Upon the King's Restoration, he was differently advised by his friends, some persuaded him to go immediately up to London, and congratulate His Majesty on his return; others thought it more adviseable, that he should wait 'till the government was settled; there is no doubt, that he weighed very seriously both those opinions; but at last, he determined upon the former, as the more open and honest, if not the most prudent course. He accordingly came up to London, where he arrived July 8, 1660 (i); tho' it is reported, that orders had been procured from the King to stop him on the road. Immediately after his arrival, he went to White-hall; of which, when the King was informed, he sent Sir William Fleming to carry him to the Tower, he pressed very earnestly, that he might be allowed to see the King, but his enemies prevented that; they knew his great abilities, and they knew the confidence the King had in him, they knew likewise the arts by which that confidence had been ruined, and therefore they caused him to be hurried away without ceremony, indeed without civility or decency (k). After he was committed to the Tower, he made application for liberty to have affidavits and declarations of several persons in England, particularly of the Marquis of Hertford, taken upon some matters of fact; but this piece of justice was denied him (l). At the very time he was committed to the Tower, the Marquis of Antrim was also sent thither, for affirming, that the Irish had acted by the late King's authority; and it will not certainly do any great honour to that administration with posterity, who thought it consistent with the King's reputation to dismiss the latter so easily, and to prosecute the former to destruction without mercy (m). He was continued in the Tower for about five months, and in December was sent down by sea to Scotland, very narrowly escaping shipwreck in his passage by storm (n). As soon as he arrived, he was sent prisoner to the Castle of Edinburgh, in order to be brought to a tryal before the Parliament of Scotland, to which his capital enemy, the Earl of Middleron, was sent down Lord High Commissioner; who, through the whole course of it, argued with a vehemency, that would have been highly indecent in an Advocate, and therefore I know not what to call it in a Judge (o). A long charge was exhibited against the Marquis comprehending a vast variety of facts, from the year 1638, which was done purposely to render him odious, and to raise a clamour against him, for most of them were incapable of any kind of proof; and all before the year 1651, were absolutely pardoned (p) by the Act of Indemnity, which His Majesty had passed in that very year (q). He had counsel assigned him to the number of six; and amongst these, was Mr Mackenzie, afterwards the famous Sir George Mackenzie. On the 13th of February, he was brought before the Parliament, where he desired leave to speak before his indictment was read; which was refused him, as were also some other things, that in any case but his, would have been looked upon as matters of course (r). These steps were probably taken to shorten the tryal, which however was very long; for tho' no pains were spared to search almost every shire in Scotland, to find out people to blacken his character, yet, when the matters came to be looked into, they turned to no account (s). At last, they were forced to fix upon his joining with the English, as the only species of treason, that could affect him; and, in reference to this, the Earl of Loudon, so many years Chancellor, defended him with great warmth and eloquence (t). The Marquis himself said, 'That what he had done, he was compelled to do by necessity, which being a thing above law; and which took place only where there was no law; ought, in the reason of things, to justify a man against law. That what he did, he did with a good intention, with a desire to serve His Majesty, and preserve his subjects; and, that he blessed God, he had succeeded in both. That however, he had done no more than others did, even those who were now his prosecutors and his judges. He advised them, therefore to consider, how fatal a precedent they were about to establish, with respect to themselves and to their posterity. A precedent; that making it impossible for any man to be thought innocent, who submitted to an usurpation, must necessarily take away from every man the desire of over-turning an usurpation, as that must have a tendency to his own destruction.' On the 29th of April, the Earls of Glencairne and Rothcs, and Mr James Sharp, afterwards Archbishop of St Andrews, were sent up to Court to give an account of the proceedings (u). The Marquis also sent up his son, Lord Niele Campbell, to act on his behalf; and it is said, that the King wrote to his Commissioner, the Earl of Middleton requiring him to press no acts

of (f) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. V. p. 604.

(g) State Trials, Vol. II. p. 431.

(h) This appears throughout his Defence.

(i) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. I. p. 42. Kennet's Chronicle or Register, p. 220.

(k) Kennet's Chron. p. 202.

(l) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 42.

(m) Ludlow's Memoirs, Vol. III. p. 34.

(n) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. I. p. 42.

(o) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 122.

(p) See that Charge in the State Trials, Vol. VII. p. 379.

(q) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. I. p. 45.

(r) Case of the Marquis of Argyll.

(s) Hist. of the Church of Scotland, Vol. I. p. 43.

(t) Crauford's Lives of the great Officers of State in Scotland, p. 215.

(u) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 119.

of treason, but such as happened after the year 1651, and not to proceed to sentence before His Majesty had revised the proceedings. With the former instruction the Commissioner complied, but pretended, that the latter manifested such a distrust of the Parliament (w), that he durst not mention it. The depositions of abundance of people were taken, with respect to the Marquis's acting under, and owning, the government established in Scotland in 1652. Bishop Burnet tells us, that Monk sent down his letters, that they came after the evidence was closed, but that the Lord Commissioner caused them to be read, upon which the Marquis's friends went out, perceiving there was then no room to serve him (x). I find nothing of this any where else; and tho' I very readily believe, that if Monk had any such letters, he would have sent them, and that they would have been read; yet, I think, there are good reasons to esteem this fact, doubtful, if not false [H]. At last, upon the evidence, produced on May 3d, 7th, and the 8th, they pronounced him

(w) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. I. p. 51. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 123. State Tryals, Vol. II. p. 433.

(x) Burnet's History of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 125.

[H] To esteem this fact doubtful, if not false. It is very clear, that what Bishop Burnet relates, concerning the transactions of these times, he must have received from other people, and that several years after; for at the time of the Marquis of Argyle's death, he could not be much above eighteen years old; we need not wonder, therefore, that in the circumstances relating to great events, before those times, in which he came to have a share in business, he might be misinformed, for that is all, that either is or ought to be contended for, on this occasion. After giving us an account of a very learned speech prepared by the Earl of Loudon, and which Crauford tells us, was spoken by him in justification of the Marquis, the Bishop proceeds thus (38):
 'But while it was very doubtful, how it would have gone, Monk by an inexcusable baseness had searched among his letters and found some that were writ by Argyle to himself, that were hearty and zealous on their side. These he sent down to Scotland. And after they were read in Parliament, it could not be pretended, that his compliance was feigned or extorted from him. Every body blamed Monk for sending these down, since it was betraying the confidence that they then lived in. They were sent by an express, and came to the Earl of Middleton after the Parliament was engaged in the debate. So he ordered the letters to be read. This was much blamed as contrary to the forms of justice, since probation was closed on both sides. But the reading of them silenced all farther debate. All his friends went out: and he was condemned as guilty of treason. The Marquis of Montrose only refused to vote. He owned he had too much repentment to judge in that matter. It was designed he should be hanged as the Marquis of Montrose had been: but it was carried, that he should be beheaded, and that his head should be set up where Lord Montrose's had been set.' It is evident from hence, that if our author's account of the matter be right, the Marquis of Argyle had nothing to complain of, for these letters sent down by Monk fixed the fact so fully upon him, that even his friends gave up his defence, and withdrew. But the Marquis, when he received sentence, as well as in the whole course of his defence, insisted, that he had complied no farther than other people had done who were then his judges; and the same thing he says in his speech; and hence it is, that I am apt to believe, that there is some mistake or misapprehension in this matter; and that tho' Monk might give his assistance to ruin a man whose abilities he might fear, and whose influence he very well knew (39); yet he neither sent down any such letters, nor had any such to send; and in support of this opinion, I shall offer my reasons, and draw them into the narrowest compass possible. I. This matter was very narrowly looked into at the time it happened; has been very carefully reviewed since; and accounts of it have been given by persons of opposite sentiments; yet none of these mention Monk's letters. The great Ministers of those times, and those who were deepest in the taking the Marquis's life, removed, as far as they were able, all the minutes relating to his process, which they would not have done, had he been convicted on the testimony of these letters, because, the recording them had justified their proceedings (40). All things tending to justify the bringing the Marquis to a trial; condemning and putting him to death, were carefully published in England, as Bishop Kennet shows very largely; but nothing is said of these letters (41). Sir George Mackenzie wrote a vindication of the government of King Charles II. in Scotland, in which he passes over entirely this whole transaction, which surely

(38) Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 125.

(39) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. I. p. 42.

(40) Ibid. p. 57.

(41) Register and Chronicle, Ecclesiastical and Civil, p. 334, 405, 407, 428, 451, 452.

he would not have done, if it could have been so easily vindicated, as by transcribing these letters (42). Mr Wodrow collected every thing he could meet with relating to this process, and has preserved the names of the witnesses that proved the Marquis's compliance, but he says nothing of Monk's letters, neither is there a syllable of them in the State Tryals, except the transcribing this passage from Bishop Burnet. II. It seems to be inconsistent with another part of the Bishop's own account; for he says, the King instructed his Commissioner not to proceed to sentence, or at least to execution, till he had reviewed the proceedings (43); for which there had been no occasion if the King had known any thing of these letters, since what satisfied the Marquis's friends as to his guilt, would undoubtedly have satisfied His Majesty also upon that subject. III. There are some circumstances in the account this Prelate gives us of the Marquis, which may easily induce us to believe, that he might be misled in regard to his story. As for instance, he mentions his being upon ill terms with his son Lord Lorne, and having actually had thoughts of disinheriting him (44). Under the usurpation, it was necessary for the Marquis to disclaim the conduct of Lord Lorne for his own safety and preservation; but this never deceived the people in power (45); and therefore it is strange, that it should impose upon the Bishop. In the Marquis's advice to his son and to the rest of his children, there is nothing that looks that way; and in the next article, we shall see, that Lord Lorne's zeal for his father, had like to have cost him his own life, as the Marquis's coming to London on his son's letter, actually cost him his. The Bishop speaks of an attempt made by the Marquis to make his escape out of the Castle; but he says, that fearing it might hasten his execution, his heart failed him (46). It is not easy to conceive how this can be reconciled to the story of Monk's letters. Before they came, the Bishop tells us the affair was very doubtful, and in such a situation, it is not probable the Marquis would attempt an escape. After sentence was passed he never was in the Castle, and consequently could have no opportunity of escaping from thence. It is however true, that he really intended an escape from the Castle, and was once in compleat disguise for that purpose, but laid aside his design, because he would not desert the sentiments which he had espoused (47). He chose rather to die like an honest man, than to draw an imputation of guilt upon his character by flight, but his conduct would have been absurd, if his letters to Monk had proved him already guilty, or even if he knew such letters had been in Monk's power. The Bishop says expressly, that the Marquis wrote his letter to the King the day before his execution (48); the letter itself shews, that the Marquis wrote it that very day (49). It seems therefore possible, that the Bishop having this account from some good hand, in his opinion, might set it down without considering it very carefully. IV. We have many things said by Clarendon and Echard of the Marquis's correspondence with Cromwell and Sir Henry Vane, though neither have vouchsafed us any proofs. On the other hand, White-locke and other writers on that side, give him quite another character, and represent him as a person always suspected and dreaded. We have of late years had great discoveries made of the correspondence under Cromwell's government; all which clearly proves, that the Marquis of Argyle was never considered in any other light than that of a concealed Royalist, as his son, the Lord Lorne, was a declared one (50). There is a letter of his to King Charles II, which I have seen, and is now in print, that proves he had a

(42) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 57.

(43) Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 123.

(44) Ibid. p. 106.

(45) Thurloe's Letters, Vol. I. p. 514.

(46) Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 124.

(47) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, p. 53.

(48) Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 125.

(49) See the Letter in the next note.

(50) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. III. p. 28.

him guilty, after debates, which lasted many days; and on Saturday, May 25, they pronounced the following sentence, That he should be beheaded on the Monday following, at the Cross of Edinburgh; that his head should be set up, where the Marquis of Montrose's formerly stood, and his coat of arms torn before the Parliament, and at the Cross. He behaved on that occasion, with great firmness and constancy, as well as much calmness and dignity. The sentence being pronounced, he was going to speak, but the trumpets sounding, he flopped 'till that strange ceremony was over; then lifting up his eyes, he said, 'I had the honour to set the Crown upon the King's head, and now he fastens me to a better crown than his own; then directing himself to the Commissioner and Parliament, he added, 'You have the indemnity of an earthly King in your hands, and have denied me a share in that, but you cannot hinder me from the indemnity of the King of Kings, and shortly you must come before his tribunal. I pray he mete not out such measure to you as you have done to me, when you are called to an account for all your actions, and this amongst the rest.' He was conducted from the bar to the common goal of Edinburgh, where he remained to the time of his death. He dined on Monday at Twelve o'Clock, with his friends, with great cheerfulness. He behaved on the scaffold with the intrepidity of a hero, or rather, with the constancy of a Christian. His last words, and the letter he wrote the King the morning of his execution, will sufficiently shew, that as he lived, so he died, a much better subject, than those who brought him to that death (y) [I]. His enemies took care that his process should not remain among the Parliament

(y) Kennet's
Chronicle, p. 451, 452.
Wodrow's Hist. of the Church of Scotland, Vol. I.
p. 53, 54, 55.
State Trials,
Vol. II. p. 434.
Heath's Chron.
p. 497.
Richard's Hist of England, p. 793.

great correspondence with King Charles I; and in which he tells the King, that no body could restore him but the Presbyterians; which the King afterwards found to be true (51). V. Lastly, It is to far from being a fact, that he had any close connection with Monk in the management of affairs, while he governed Scotland, that I am able to prove he was his mortal enemy, and represented him in the blackest colours to both the Protestors. He accused him to Oliver as not deserving the money that was paid him (52) as a debt for maintaining the Scots troops in Ireland upon the credit of the publick faith; and the following letter will fully shew, that he did not consider his going up to Richard's Parliament as a compliance with that government, but as an endeavour to overturn it. This letter is directed to Thurloe, and runs thus (53):

(51) Peck's Desiderata Curiosa,
Vol. II. B. ii.
p. 26, 27.

(52) Thurloe's
State Papers,
Vol. VI. p. 341.

(53) Ibid. Vol.
VII. p. 584.

'My Lord,
'MY Lord Keeper and myself have done our best to get those men chosen you have wrote for; but my Lord of Argyle and some others whom my Lord Keeper will acquaint you with, have endeavoured all they can to get all Scotchmen chosen. But, I doubt not, but there will be three chosen of those five you sent the names of; and I have taken care, that as many as come out of this country, shall be there with the first: and if the writs come in time, which I hope they will, they shall be all sent to Dr Clarges. The Marquis of Argyle himself endeavours to be chosen, notwithstanding he is Sheriff of Argyleshire; neither do I guess he will do his Highness's interest any good; but when my Lord Keeper comes up, he shall acquaint you with the business. Which is all at present from

'Your Lordship's

'Very humble Servant,

'Dalkeith December 30, 1658.

GEORGE MONCK.'

[I] Than those who brought him to that death. There are some variations in the printed copies of the Marquis's speech, which perhaps, may be owing to a desire of giving an English turn to some of the Scotch expressions (54); but whoever peruses it must confess, that it is grave and manly, and at the same time, loyal and pious. He gives a full and clear account of his actions, asserts the uprightness of his conduct and the sincerity of his affection, both to King Charles I. and King Charles II. he owns and justifies his zeal for the religion in which he was bred, and with true Christian charity forgives his enemies, and prays that God would forgive them. His last words immediately before he laid his head upon the block, were the vindication of his innocence from that horrid crime of the King's murder, in these words:

(54) Appendix to Wodrow's Hist. of the Church of Scotland, Vol. I.
p. 28.
State Trials,
Vol. II. p. 434.

'I desire you, gentlemen, and all that hear me, again to take notice and remember, That now, when I am entering on eternity, and am to appear before my Judge, and as I desire salvation, and expect eternal happiness from him, I am free from any accession, by knowledge, contriving, counsel, or any other way, to His late Majesty's death; and I pray the Lord to preserve the present King His Majesty, and to pour his best blessings upon his person and government, and the Lord give him good and faithful Counsellors.'

The Marquis's letter to the King, written by his Lordship, the morning of his execution (55).

(55) Wodrow's
History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. I.
p. 54, 55.

'Most Sacred Sovereign,

I Doubt not but your Majesty hath an account given you from others, of the issue of that strange process and indictment laid against me before this can come to your Royal hands; of which, if I had been guilty according to the charge, I should have esteemed myself unworthy to breathe upon the earth, much less would I have presumed to make any application to your Majesty. But of all those great crimes which have been charged upon me, there hath nothing been proven, except a compliance with the prevalent usurping rebels, after they had subdued all your Majesty's dominions, whereby, I was forced, with many others, to submit unto their unlawful power and government, which was an epidemick disease and fault of the time.

What measure soever I have met with, and whatever malice or calumny hath been cast upon me, yet it is inexpressible joy and comfort, under all these sufferings, that I am found free and acquit of any accession to that execrable murder committed against the life of your Royal Father, which (as I desire a comfortable appearance before the Judge, both of the quick and the dead) my soul did ever abominate; for death, with the inward peace of my innocency, is much more acceptable to me, than life itself, with the least stain of treachery.

And now I am confident, that your Majesty's displeasure will be satisfied, and you will suffer my failings to be expiate with my life, which, with all humility and submission, I have yielded up; and in this small period that remains of my life, no earthly thing shall be more cordially desired by me, than your happiness, and that your Majesty and your successors to all generations may sway the Sceptre of these nations, and that they may be a blessed people under your government.

And now, hoping that the humble supplication of your Majesty's dying subject, may find some place within the large extent of your princely goodness and clemency, I have taken the boldness to cast the desolate condition of my poor wife and family upon your Royal favour; for whatever may be your Majesty's displeasure against myself, these I hope have not done any thing to procure your Majesty's indignation.

Parliament Registers. Sir George Mackenzie, who wrote a Vindication of the Government of Scotland during this reign, does not so much as mention the Marquis's process, though, as his advocate, he had defended him with great learning and spirit; nay, those who passed the sentence upon him did not think fit to sign a dead warrant; so that in the letter of the law, as well as in the eye of reason, this could be accounted no better than a murder committed with much form (z). As the Lord High-Commissioner disobeyed his Majesty's command in precipitating the death of the Marquis, so for this, and other acts of violence, he was quickly disgraced. At his first appearance in the world he had served the Parliament of England against his Prince; he afterwards deserted that service, and was employed in Scotland in a manner which prejudiced him against the Marquis of Argyle, and induced him to act as he did, equally against the laws of the land, and the instructions of his master (a). At that time his conduct was universally condemned, and the behaviour of the Marquis generally applauded, as indeed it deserved; for in the whole course of his life he never changed his sentiments, but died with the same religious and political principles which he had always professed while he lived, and practised also from first, to last.

(z) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. I. p. 56, 57.

(a) Crauford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 335.

indignation. And since, that family have had the honour to be faithful subjects and serviceable to your Royal progenitors, I humbly beg my faults may not extinguish the lasting merit and memory of those who have given so many signal proofs of constant loyalty, for many generations. Orphans and widows, by special prerogative and command from God, are put under your protection and defence, that you suffer them not to be wronged: they will owe their preservation so entirely to your Majesty's bounty and favour, that your countenance, and nothing else that's human, can be a shield against their ruin. I shall add no more, only being addebted to several of your Majesty's good subjects, and your Royal justice being the source and fountain of all equity, whereby, all your people are preserved in their just rights and interests, I humbly beg, that none of them may suffer for my fault, but that you would allow them satisfaction and payment of what is justly owing unto them, of those sums and debts which are truly resting to my son and me. And, as it is my serious and last desire to my children and posterity, next to their duty to Almighty God, that they may be faithful and serviceable to your Majesty; so were I to enjoy this frail life any longer, I would endeavour before all the world, to evidence myself to be,

Your Majesty's

Most humble, devoted,

And obedient Subject and Servant,

From your prison, Edinburgh, May 27, 1661.

ARGYLE.

E

CAMPBELL (ARCHIBALD) Earl of Argyle, son to the former, and himself one of the worthiest Noblemen, and one of the most distinguished Patriots of the age in which he lived. He was educated under his father's eye in the true principles of loyalty and of the Christian Religion (a), and came to be very early distinguished in the world by his personal merit, as well as by his titles and the high rank he held in his country. When King Charles II. was invited home to receive the Crown of his ancient and hereditary kingdom in 1650, he was constituted Colonel of His Majesty's foot-guards, in which there happened something very particular; for whereas all commissions were then granted by the Parliament of Scotland, and they affected a kind of sovereign authority, the Lord Lorne refused to act without a commission from the King; which was accordingly granted him (b). In this command he served with great bravery at the battle of Dunbar, where his regiment suffered exceedingly (c); and he continued in this command so long as His Majesty remained in Scotland, behaving himself with such tenderness and affection, as well as fidelity and duty, to that Prince, as gained him a high place in his favour, more especially as he was always ready to obey his Master's commands, and did every thing to alleviate that constraint, which, from the rigid severity of the Clergy, His Majesty was for some time under (d). Neither was his zeal for the King's service at all abated by the fatal defeat at Worcester; on the contrary, he remained in arms, kept up a party in the Highlands, joined readily with the most inveterate enemies of his family for the King's service, even tho' he found himself very ill used by them, and more than one attempt was made to imprison him (e). But neither the hardships he went through, nor the treachery to which he was exposed, could induce him to quit the Royal cause, and the testimonies of favour he had received from His Majesty, made so strong an impression on his mind, that he continued active when the King's affairs were desperate, until he brought his own into the same condition (f). This conduct made him so obnoxious to Cromwell, that there was no person in Scotland whom he pursued with greater animosity, as appears by his excepting him out of his general pardon, in 1654 (g). Yet, even this, did not at all discourage him or prevail upon him to desist from giving that Usurper all the trouble that was in his power, till he received General Middleton's orders, by the King's authority, to capitulate, which were dated December 31, 1655 (h). He then submitted to live quietly and peaceably, but never owned either Oliver or Richard's government, but remained obnoxious to those sort of men who derived their power from them so long as it continued (i); of all which, many and incontestible proofs might be given, if the nature of this work would allow us to enlarge upon the subject [A]. Upon the King's Restoration

(a) See the Marquis of Argyle's Instructions to his son, p. 2, 3.

(b) This Commission was in the hands of Archibald the first Duke of Argyle, and is probably still preserved by the family.

(c) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. I. p. 164.

(d) Hist. of the King's Exile, p. 195.

(e) Crauford's Lives of the great Officers in Scotland, p. 214. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 58.

(f) Crauford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 21. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 57, 58.

(g) See a farther account of this in note [A].

(h) These are still preserved in the Archives of the Argyle Family; See also State Trials, Vol. III. p. 449, 450.

(i) Whitlock's Memorials, p. 609.

[A] To enlarge upon the subject. It is very much to be regretted, that a sincere desire of discovering truth does not prevail as much in the world, as that spirit of curiosity which sometimes wears the appearance of it; if such a desire could be excited, it would certainly engage lovers of English History, to prefer the knowledge of facts to the Restoration he came up to London to congratulate him, and brought with him a letter from his father containing assurances of his duty; which the King received in such a manner, as gave that unfortunate Nobleman those hopes, which proved the cause of his destruction (k). All the time of his father's prosecution Lord Lorne remained at Court, and laboured indefatigably to do him service; and tho' this instance of filial piety ought certainly to have endeared him to all ranks of men, yet such was the strange disposition of those times, that it served only to sharpen the edge of their resentments who were enemies to his family, and laboured the destruction of it, that they might raise their own (l). These men who were ready to take any advantage, and were not either afraid or ashamed to commit any act of violence necessary to serve their purposes, tho' the Royal authority was ever so much prostituted, or the constitution of their country ever so much weakened thereby, ventured upon such a step to remove this noble and innocent person, as will appear to be full as singular, as it was iniquitous and cruel. Lord Lorne had discovered that these people had by the basest intrigues and blackest calumnies hindered His Majesty from extending to him his Royal favour, as he was naturally inclined; and having by the assistance of the Earl of Berkshire convinced the Earl of Clarendon, upon the florid representation of them, as this again would engage others to labour for their satisfaction, and to make it their business to describe the real characters of great men from their actions, and not trust to such draughts of them as are given by authors, guided rather by fancy than by authority, and who at best give us only their conceptions of men for what ought to be thought of them. The noble Historian is pleased to speak of the Lord Lorne's commanding the King's guards (1), as if it had been a trust committed to him by his father, and that the King was rather delivered to his custody, than had in him a faithful officer and an obedient servant; Mr Echard follows, or rather copies, this account (2), which is entirely inconsistent with that we have given in the text, as it is with Bishop Burnet's relation, that the Lord Lorne (3) won upon His Majesty by the smoothness of his behaviour and by admitting whoever the King desired to his presence. Most certainly his Lordship behaved all the time the King was in Scotland with great zeal and duty; and he preserved the same disposition during the whole time of His Majesty's being abroad; of which it may not be amiss to add some particular instances here. He was in the Isles in 1653, where he had a difference with Glengary, which might be probably owing to the feuds between their families, but this did not however hinder him from assisting that Highland Chief in the King's quarrel (4). In the year following, notwithstanding the seeming difference between him and his father the Marquis of Argyle, he brought a body of near one thousand men into the field and joined the Earl of Glencairne (5). That noble Lord, as Bishop Burnet tells us, had a notion of becoming another Montrose (6); and he seems to have had as strong an aversion to the house of Argyle, for he first took from Lord Lorne a regiment of foot he had raised, and gave him a troop of horse; afterwards he took away that troop of horse; and lastly, out of mere partiality and private pique, would have secured his person, if he had not made his escape (7), which ruined this design for the King's service, at a time, when, as the Oliverians themselves confess, they had a great probability of assembling a very numerous army (8). Yet the King was so well satisfied of Lord Lorne's fidelity, and was so desirous to free him from these discouragements, that he sent him a commission to be Lieutenant-General (9): of which, as of most other of His Majesty's measures, Cromwell had so good an account, that it was very probably one reason for his excepting Lord Lorne out of his pardon. That pardon I have seen as it passed in his Parliament, April 12, 1654 (10), and in it is excepted the Queen-Dowager, the King, the Duke of York, the two Dukes of Hamilton, both dead, the Earl of Crawford and Lindsey, the Earl of Callander, the Earl Marthal, the Earl of Kelly, the Earl of Lauderdale, the Earl of Loudon, the Earl of Seaforth, the Earl of Athol, Viscount Kenmure, Lord Lorne, Lord Mackling, son to the Earl of Loudon, the Earl of Glencairne, and many others. Towards the end of that year, Lord Lorne was so distressed, that he retired to an island with only four or five persons about him (11); whence it appears, that he did not submit, till he was no longer in a condition of opposing. But his submission did not exempt him, either from suspicions or hardships, as appears from an information against him in September 1655, by the Lord Broghill (12); and by another letter of Monk's in November following, in which he says, that he had taken security for his peaceable behaviour, as good as could be had in Scotland, to the amount of five thousand pounds; and adds, that considering the very ill usage he had received from the King's friends, he apprehended he would not be very ready to stir again (13). But it appears by an examination taken at the close of the same year, that the King had still as great a confidence in him as in any man in that kingdom (14). In 1656, Lord Broghill gave fresh informations against him in the month of May (15); and in August, Lockhart, who was Cromwell's Minister in France, charged Lord Fairfax and Lord Lorne with being engaged in new designs for the King's service (16); of which, about the same time, Lord Broghill gave ample accounts, and adds also some very odd instances of his own watchings over Lord Lorne's conduct, and corrupting persons in his service (17). In the spring of the year 1657, General Monk thought fit to commit Lord Lorne to prison, which was a very usual thing whenever any stir was apprehended in Scotland (18). But Lord Broghill did not think even this enough, and therefore he recommended the bringing him prisoner into England (19). Thus it very plainly appears, that if suffering be a proof of loyalty, no man's loyalty had better and more frequent testimonies to support it than Lord Lorne's. But this is not all, in one of his imprisonments an accident befel him, which brought him to the very brink of the grave. It was a custom then, as indeed it still is in Scotland, more especially in cold weather, for the soldiers to play at what they call long bullets; and while the guards were thus employed, a bullet thrown with all the force a man's arm could give it, glanced from a stone and struck the Lord Lorne on the head, by which his skull was terribly fractured, so that he was forced to undergo the hazardous operation of the trepan, from which it was thought a miracle that he recovered (20). After all this, there is no great reason to wonder, that his Lordship should expect to be welcome to King Charles II. upon his Restoration, or that he might presume on his having some influence in favour of his father, if the Marquis of Argyle's conduct had stood in any need of it more than many others, who had not only submitted to the usurpers, but had laboured to establish their authority, and expressed the highest disrespect towards the King, who yet found ways and means afterwards to obtain a large share in his favour, while those who had served him from principles of conscience, in the way that their conscience would allow, were treated with relentless severity, or rather were delivered up to the fury of their enemies. For it is most certain, that the Marquis of Argyle's death was brought about, and his son's was very near being brought about, by a faction, which abused the King's authority, not only contrary to his inclination, but in express repugnance to his instructions (21); so that hardly such a scene of violence, under sanction of law, and covered by the approbation of a Parliament, ever appeared in any country, as there did in Scotland for the two years that succeeded the King's Restoration, when the Earls of Middleton and Glencairne were at the head of the administration, which they managed entirely for the service of their private interest, and the gratification of their resentments.

(k) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 106.

(l) Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland, from the Restoration to the Revolution.

(1) Hist. of the Rebellion, p. 608.

(2) Hist. of England, p. 652.

(3) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 57.

(4) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. I. p. 478.

(5) Whitelock's Memorials, p. 564. Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. II. p. 27.

(6) Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 59.

(7) Whitelock's Memorials, p. 580. Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. II. p. 4. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 58.

(8) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. II. p. 4. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 58.

(9) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. II. p. 574.

(10) It is printed in Scobell's Collections, and also by itself in a single sheet.

(11) Whitelock's Memorials, p. 609.

(12) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. IV. p. 49.

(13) Ibid. p. 160.

(14) Ibid. p. 245.

(15) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. V. p. 13.

(16) Ibid. p. 319.

(17) Ibid. p. 323.

(18) Thurloe's State Papers, Vol. VI. p. 81.

(19) Ibid. p. 436.

(20) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 106.

(21) See the Earl of Lauderdale's Charge against the Earl of Middleton in Miscellaneous Antiqua, p. 208.

upon whom they chiefly depended of the injuries and injustice that was done him, he thought fit to communicate the success that had attended his endeavours to his friend the Lord Duffus by a letter (m). This letter was intercepted and carried to the Earl of Middleton, who finding his own and his friends views entirely disconcerted, exhibited this letter to the Parliament of Scotland as a libel upon their proceedings, and projected thereupon a new method of bringing things round again, by taking his Lordship's life, as he had done his father's (n). The Parliament of Scotland at that time, wholly at his devotion, concurred in this scheme; and June 24, 1662, sent up a representation to the King, setting forth, that the eldest son of the late Marquis of Argyle, had both spoken and written against their authority, and requested that he might be sent down to stand his trial (o). The King upon reading the letter, on which this accusation was founded, acknowledged it to be indiscreet, but thought there was nothing criminal in it, which induced him to comply with their request, and to lay his commands upon Lord Lorne to go down to Edinburgh; which he did; and on the very day of his arrival, which was July 17, he appeared in Parliament, and made a handsome speech in his own justification; notwithstanding which, he was immediately committed close prisoner to the Castle, and a process commenced against him, for what in the Scotch laws is stiled leasing-making, that is, for creating dissention between the King and his subjects, by giving the former false and lying informations (p). Lord Lorne insisted in his own defence, that there was nothing in his letter of that nature, that he spoke only of his justifying himself against lies that had been told the King to his prejudice, but had accused no body, or pretended to have grounds for accusing any. But those he had to do with showed very little regard to his defence, for on the 26th of August following, they condemned him to lose his head and to forfeit all his estate; but they were so merciful, as to leave the day of his execution to the King's pleasure (q), which, yet perhaps they had not done if His Majesty by his letter to the Earl of Middleton had not positively commanded him not to proceed to any sentence whatever, for he had no conception that any set of men would have turned so slight a thing into a capital offence without his approbation and consent. When this news came to England it filled the Court with astonishment, and the Earl of Clarendon was the first person to declare, that if the King suffered such a precedent to take place, he would get out of his dominions as fast as his gout would let him (r). Yet his Lordship suffered a long and severe imprisonment, for he was not discharged out of the Castle 'till the 4th of June 1663, after the Earl of Middleton had lost his power, and his own friends were come into favour (s). Soon after he was restored to his grandfather's title and estate, and part of his father's was ordered to be sold for the payment of debts (t). The King having once taken this step, returned to his natural inclination for a person in whom he had formerly so entire a confidence; and as a farther mark of his favour, was pleased to order that he should be sworn a Privy-Counsellor (u). In this capacity he was a great support to the Earl of Lauderdale, so long as his administration was carried on with any kind of temper or discretion, but he never concurred in any of his violences; but on the contrary, studied all he could to soften, if not prevent them (w). The principles of both Earls were very near alike; the only difference was, that the Earl of Argyle acted as close to his as possible; whereas the conduct of the Earl of Lauderdale was directly opposite to his sentiments. He made it his business to carry the Prerogative high, because he had the sole power of directing it; and he maintained the Bishops in Scotland with a high hand, tho' a rigid Presbyterian in his heart, because he thought this necessary to sustain his influence at Court (x). It is inconceivable what troubles this created in Scotland, where Dr Sharp, Archbishop of St Andrews, was in a manner at the head of the domestick administration, who had much of Laud's spirit, only he had better parts, with regard to his publick character. This management drove the zealous Presbyterians in 1666 into a rebellion in the West, upon which the Earl of Argyle to show his loyalty raised fifteen hundred men, but the Archbishop took care they should not be employed; and the rebels being defeated by the King's regular troops on the 27th of November the same year, many were executed for this weak and foolish insurrection, and many more had been executed if the King had not interposed, and positively commanded that such as would promise to live quietly, should not only be spared, but be set at liberty (y). The administration proceeded afterwards with still greater violence, and Lauderdale, who was now created a Duke, began to forsake his old friends who were not inclined to go all the lengths he would have them. Amongst these was the Earl of Argyle, who, tho' he lost the confidence of the Minister for some time, yet was known to stand so well with the King, and had such an interest in his country, that it was not thought proper to remove him, either from the board as a Privy-Counsellor, or from his place as one of the Lords of the Treasury (z). In 1678, things came to a great crisis, the Western part of the kingdom was grown universally disaffected; and to root out this bad disposition, the Duke of Lauderdale contrived, or at least consented, to an odd remedy, which was bringing down the Highlanders upon them; this had such dreadful effects, that some who had been hitherto his friends, could not help complaining of it, and even suggesting, that they would carry their complaints to the throne; upon which a proclamation was published, forbidding men of quality to go out of the kingdom without licence; but, notwithstanding this, the Earls of Athol and Perth, who were both Privy-Counsellors, went up to London to set forth their grievances, where, however, they were but indifferently received, tho' the King took a resolution to put the government of that

(m) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 1. p. 148.

(n) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. 1. p. 135.

(o) Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland, p. 121.

(p) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 1. p. 151. Wodrow's Hist. of the Church of Scotland, Vol. 1. p. 135.

(q) Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland, p. 131. Wodrow's Hist. of the Church of Scotland, Vol. 1. p. 135. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 1. p. 149.

(r) Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland, p. 133. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 1. p. 149.

(s) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. 1. p. 188.

(t) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 1. p. 305.

(u) Crauford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 21. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 1. p. 205.

(w) Memoirs of Scotland from the Restoration to the Revolution, p. 215. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 1. p. 211.

(x) Crauford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 255. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 1. p. 102.

(y) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. 1. p. 259. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 1. p. 237. Echard's Hist. of England, p. 827.

(z) Crauford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 259. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, p. 292.

- kingdom into other hands (a). In the midst of all these disturbances, the Earl of Argyle maintained his wonted moderation, he sent no troops to the Highland army, nor did he join in attacking the Ministry. Publick affairs being in a great confusion in England, His Majesty thought fit to send his brother, the Duke of York, in 1681, down to Scotland; where, upon his first arrival, he behaved with such mildness and modesty, with so good a temper, and with so much moderation, that the Nobility were extremely pleased, and the greatest part of the nation perfectly satisfied (b). His Royal Highness was particularly obliging to the Earl of Argyle; he was well acquainted with the great power he had, saw the general esteem he was in, and from thence formed such a notion of his influence, that there is but too much reason to believe, he took a resolution, either to delude or to destroy him (c). In order to this, he took pains to sift him on several heads, but chiefly with respect to the government in Scotland, and the part he would take, in case the King was either inclined to or forced upon an Act of Exclusion. The Earl answered him candidly and fairly; he gave him the strongest assurances of his service, so long as the Protestant Religion was not struck at; if any such thing should happen he frankly declared he would oppose him. On the other hand, he intimated, that his duty to the King was entire, and should be so to him, when he became so; but till that happened, he would always adhere to his Royal Master (d). The Duke, upon this grew cold towards him, but was still as civil, or rather more civil than ever. Upon the opening of the Parliament, two laws were proposed; the first, for confirming those in being against Popery; the second, making it High-Treason to propose any alteration in the succession; the former, was intended to please the people; the latter, for the security of his Royal Highness (e). In the first, the Earl concurred as might well be expected; but he went into the latter, with a warmth, somewhat unusual to him; and many thought, that this would have perfectly established him with the Duke, who spoke of his conduct on that occasion, in terms of the highest gratitude and respect (f). There was a third Act passed for establishing a test, by which all who were in employment, or should be so, were obliged to take an oath, not to attempt any change in the constitution of Church or State. What the real intention and design of this law was, is very hard to say; but certain it is, that it became the occasion of much discontent and confusion; the Earl of Argyle opposed it in Parliament, where he behaved himself with the greatest steadiness and constancy, tho' he could not help seeing that very deep and dangerous designs were formed against him (g) [B]. After the law was passed, many of the Nobility expressed their scruples about the oath; others, absolutely refused it; and the Marquis of Queensbury would not take it without an explanation. The Earl of Argyle thought the same thing necessary; and being summoned to take the oath as a Privy-Counsellor, he drew up a short explanation, which he sent to the Duke of York for his approbation; and having received it, gave it as his sense of the oath, November 3d, 1681, when he took and signed it as a Privy-Counsellor (h). The Privy-Council themselves explained the oath that very day, in terms not very different from Argyle's. He took his seat at the board afterwards, and his Royal Highness seemed very well pleased with him, and spoke more kindly than he had done for some time before. The next day, the Earl was summoned to take the oath again as a Commissioner of the Treasury, where he offered the same explanation, when he was desired to sign it, which he refused to do (i). The next day, he went to wait upon the Duke, who appeared displeased, and desired him not to go out of town; the same command was repeated by the Privy-Council, and the term fixed to their next meeting, which was on the eighth. They then sent up a complaint of the Earl's explanation to the King; and the same day ordered the Earl to surrender himself prisoner to the Castle of Edinburgh; which he did (k). In the next place, without staying for His Majesty's answer, they commenced a prosecution at first, as it seems, for a high misdemeanour, but soon after, they changed their resolution and caused him to be indicted before the Justiciary for high-treason (l). At this time, some persons having represented to the Duke, that it would look strange to take away so great a man's life and fortune, upon such a pretence; he answered as in a surprize, Life and fortune! God forbid (m)! What he meant by this is very uncertain, nor is it possible to discover, whether he made others his tools to destroy this noble person, or whether those who meant to destroy the Earl made him theirs (n). However it was, the prosecution was driven on with the most indecent fury, and notwithstanding the general exclamation it occasioned, the Earl was brought to his trial on the twelfth of December, where, notwithstanding his own and Sir George Lockhart's most admirable speeches, he was found guilty, to the eternal reproach of all who had any concern in that most infamous mockery of justice (o) [C].
- (a) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. I. p. 496.
Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 413, 419.
Memoirs of Scotland, p. 395.
- (b) Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 400.
Echard's Hist. of England, p. 1015.
Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 510.
- (c) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 195.
Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, p. 512.
- (d) From the information of the first Earl of Cromarty, grandfather to the Earl condemned for the last Rebellion.
Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 520.
- (e) Echard's Hist. of England, p. 1015.
Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 513.
- (f) Memoirs of the Affairs of Scotland.
Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 513.
See also the Earl's Speech at his trial.
- (g) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 195.
- (h) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 519, 520.
Echard's Hist. of England, p. 1015.
- (i) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 206, 207.
Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 520.
The Case of the Earl of Argyle.
- (k) State Trials, Vol. III. p. 463.
- (l) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 210.
Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 520.
- (m) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 210.
- (n) This is a point, that even Bishop Burnet does not seem willing to decide, though, at that time, he was as conversant in publick affairs as most men.
- (o) State Trials, Vol. III. p. 464.

[B] Were formed against him. In the debating the Test Act, the Earl of Argyle opposed the proviso for exempting the lawful brothers and sons of the reigning King, from taking the oath prescribed thereby, which, as the Bishop of Edinburgh told him, provoked his Royal Highness extremely (22). The pretence of falling upon him was, to deprive him of his heretable offices, in which he had been twice confirmed by Parliament; and to this purpose, two attempts were made in that Session, but without effect (23). It was given out, that nothing more was intended by this capital prosecution, than to force him to surrender them; but this was probably contrived to amuse the King; and granting it to be true, is the clearest proof of the wickedness of the whole proceeding (24).

[C] In that most infamous mockery of justice. In order to have a due conception of the manner in which this affair was carried on in as narrow compass as it is possible, it is necessary to see the Earl's explanation, made before his Royal Highness the Duke of York,

(22) Wodrow's Hist. of the Ch. of Scotland, Vol. I. p. 209.

(23) Ibid. p. 205.

(24) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 521; which compare with what is said by the Prelates Sprat, Parker, and Kennet, in their accounts of this transaction.

The Privy-Council, upon this, wrote for the King's leave to proceed to sentence, of which the Earl having private intelligence, sent up a gentleman to Court, in order to procure him the best account he could of the King's disposition (p). Before he could have any return from this messenger, his Lordship received many notices from his friends in Scotland, of circumstances no way favourable; such as, that the Duke refused to hear any intercession; that few of his friends had any farther credit with his Royal Highness; and that orders were given for preparing rooms for him in the common goal, to which Noblemen were sometimes removed a few days before their execution (q). These notices induced him to think of his escape, and of contriving the means of it, but he was not absolutely fixed in his resolution till the twentieth of December, when he had letters from London, that did not give him any great hopes of the King's being unalterable in his desire of saving him, and as he was apprehensive of being removed the very next day, he resolved not to delay his escape a moment. Accordingly, about eight o'clock at night, not without some difficulty, he got out of the castle, and in a few days safely out of Scotland into the South of England, and from thence to London (r). Upon receiving the King's letter of permission, the Council thought fit to direct that sentence should be publicly proclaimed at the Cross, notwithstanding the Earl's absence, and the application of the Countess of Argyle upon that account. The sentence was accordingly published, and his arms torn at the Cross of Edinburgh, as if he had been in open rebellion and had fled from justice (s). While the Earl was at London, he was not so cautious in concealing himself as might have been expected; so that the Court had frequent accounts of him, of which no great notice was taken. It is certain that the King had a very good opinion of him, and discouraged all search after him. A person who thought he had done a mighty thing, put into his Majesty's hand a note, signifying that the Earl of Argyle might be easily found. The King tore it with some indignation, saying, Pob, pob, bunt a hunted partridge, for shame (t)! As soon as he had an opportunity, the Earl went over to Holland, where he continued during the remaining part of that reign. Upon the accession of King James, many of the gentlemen of Scotland, that had been obliged to fly their native country, by the violent proceedings of the persons entrusted with power there, began to press the Earl of Argyle to make some attempt upon that kingdom, which he might the more probably be inclined to do, because he looked upon his attainder to have dissolved entirely all the obligations he was under as a subject. Besides, he considered the government in Scotland as unsettled, the King not having as yet taken the coronation oath, and therefore he thought himself at liberty to make some attempt, for recovering the constitution by force of arms (u). He concerted his design with the Duke of Monmouth, who was at the same time to try what impression he could make in England, but he promised the Earl of Argyle, that he would not declare himself King, which however he did, and this proved very prejudicial to them both (w). The Earl carried on his preparations with great secrecy, and bought up arms in the name of a person who was an agent for the State of

(p) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 1. p. 522.

(q) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 212.

(r) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 1. p. 523. Wodrow's Hist. of the Church of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 212.

(s) State Tryals, Vol. III. p. 465, 466. Echar'd's Hist. of England, p. 1016. Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 401.

(t) From private information by a person of indubitable credit.

(u) Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 431. Echar'd's Hist. of England, p. 1058. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 1. p. 630.

(w) Echar'd's Hist. of England, p. 1060. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. 1. p. 633.

Venice,

York, and the whole Privy-Council; it was in these

'I have considered the test, and I am very desirous to give obedience as far as I can. I am confident, the Parliament never intended to impose contradictory oaths; therefore, I think no man can explain it, but for himself. Accordingly, I take it, as far as it is consistent with itself and the Protestant Religion. And I do declare, that I mean not to bind up myself in my station, and in a lawful way, to wish and endeavour any alteration, I think, to the advantage of Church and State, nor repugnant to the Protestant Religion and my loyalty. And this, I understand, as a part of my oath.'

It is very remarkable, that Queensbury, who was then Lord Justice General of Scotland, and who presided in the Judicature, before which the Earl of Argyle was tried for High-Treason, had himself scrupled the test, and had explained himself, precisely to the same purpose, before he would take it (26). It was no wonder, therefore, that he was unwilling to give his casting vote against the Earl, as to the relevancy of the libel; and therefore, two of the Judges, men of very fair characters, and firmly attached to the Court, declaring directly against the legality of the indictment, as two other Lords of very different characters were for it; it was found necessary, to call the old Lord Nairn out of his bed, who was so deaf, that he could hear little of it, and so infirm, that he could not fit the cause out, who joining the other two Lords, this difficulty was got over (27). The Assize or Jury that passed upon the Earl, were the persons following: Marquis Montrose, Earl of Middleton, Earl of Airlie, Earl of Perth, Earl of Dalhousie, Earl of Roxburgh, Earl of Dumfries, Earl of Linlithgow, Lord of Lindores, Lord Sinclair, Lord Bruntisland, Laird of Gofford, Laird of Claverhouse, Laird of Balmamon, Laird of Park-Gordon. The verdict they gave, was as follows. 'The Assize, having elected and chosen the Marquis of Montrose to be their Chancellor (equivalent to our Foreman) they all in one voice find the Earl of Argyle guilty, and culpable of the crimes of treason, leasing-making and leasing-telling; and find by plurality of votes, the said Earl innocent, and not guilty of Perjury (28). The latter part of the verdict was intended to qualify the former, and to give the world some notion of the probity and fair dealing of this Jury, who would not find the Earl guilty in the lump, of High-Treason and Perjury both. There was however, nothing due to them, for the Lords of the Judiciary had before determined, that the Earl having proposed his declaration previous to his taking the oath, could not be guilty of Perjury (29). The whole of this business was dispatched at one sitting December 12, 1681, and the verdict given in after ten o'clock at night, without so much as calling upon the Earl, or hearing him in his own defence, after the evidence produced, which he expected, and had prepared a long speech for the occasion (30). It has been pretended, that the Earl was frightened into his escape, by those who, tho' they wanted not good will, durst not have executed this sentence, if he had staid; but there is little reason to believe this, since, upon the King's letter to allow their publishing their sentence, but requiring them to stay the execution of any part of it, till his pleasure was known; they not only proclaimed the sentence at the Cross, December 23, 1681, but also caused the Earl's Coat of Arms to be torn, which was part of their sentence, and an illegal part (31) of it too; so that they executed it to the utmost of their power, and in direct disobedience to the King's command. It was upon this sentence, that by King James II's express command, the Earl afterwards suffered (32).

(28) State Tryals, Vol. III. p. 464.

(29) Idem, ibid.

(30) Wodrow's Hist. of the Ch. of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 212.

(31) State Tryals, Vol. III. p. 466. Sir G. Mackenzie's Criminals, p. 61.

(32) Wodrow's Hist. of the Ch. of Scotland, p. 539. The King's Order is dated Whitehall, Jun. 22, 1685.

[D] The

(25) State Tryals, Vol. III. p. 442.

(26) Wodrow's Hist. of the Ch. of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 196.

(27) Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 215. Wodrow's Hist. of the Church of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 211.

Venice, but his stock did not go any great way, and the number of persons he carried over, was far from being considerable. He sailed North about, and had a very prosperous voyage; but sending a boat ashore to the Orkneys, and being obliged to leave her by the winds changing, the government had very early intelligence at Edinburgh of his being at sea; upon which, orders were immediately sent for securing such gentlemen in Argyleshire, as were suspected by them (x). By this precaution, the Earl's design, was in a manner ruined; for he looked upon it, that after his landing, he should very soon be five thousand strong; whereas, he was never able to collect above half that number; and even these, were not all of them determined, for the face of things, and the temper of mens minds, were by this time very much changed, the severity of the government having frightened some, and dispirited all; so that those who joined him, were far from having the courage and alacrity that he expected. He had still hopes of increasing his body of men; and this led him into Kintyre; but his endeavours were ineffectual (y). On the 27th of May, he came with his forces, which were not above fifteen hundred men to the Tarbet; and there he published his Declaration. His own intention was, to have marched from thence to Inverary, but the principal persons about him differing from him in opinion, his measures were disconcerted, and soon after all things fell into confusion; and he endeavouring to make his escape, was taken by five country fellows, who carried him prisoner to Glasgow; from whence, on the 20th of June, an order came for carrying him up to Edinburgh; where it was very soon resolved to put him to death upon his former sentence; and he was accordingly beheaded, June 30, 1685 (z). He showed great calmness, constancy, and courage under his misfortunes; he eat his dinner, the day of his death very cheerfully; and, according to his custom, slept after it, a quarter of an hour, or more, very soundly. At the place of execution, he made a short, grave, and religious speech; and after declaring solemnly, that he forgave all his enemies, he submitted to death, with as much firmness and composure of mind, as ever man did (a). His epitaph, written by himself, not long before his death, the reader will find in the notes [D]. After the Revolution, his son, who came over with the Prince of Orange, was admitted into the Convention, as Earl of Argyle, tho' his father's attainder was not reversed; and in the Claim of Rights, the sentence against him, was declared to be, what most certainly it was, a reproach upon the nation (b). That noble person was afterwards raised by letters patents dated June 23, 1701, to the title of Duke of Argyle; and at the same time, was created Marquis of Kintyre, and Lorne, Earl of Campbell and Cowel, &c (c). He was the father of the late Field-Marshal, John, Duke of Argyle, created Baron of Chatham and Earl of Greenwich by Queen Anne in 1705 (d); and raised to the title of Duke of Greenwich, April 30, 1719, by his late Majesty King George I (e); as also of his Grace, Archibald, now Duke of Argyle.

(x) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 531, 532. Echard's Hist. of England, p. 1059. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 631.

(y) Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 433. Wodrow's Hist. of the Church of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 532, 533, 534. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 632.

(z) Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 433. Echard's Hist. of England, p. 1016. Wodrow's Hist. of the Church of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 541. State Trials, Vol. III. p. 466. Burnet's Hist. of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 463.

(a) Wodrow's History of the Church of Scotland, Vol. II. p. 441, 442; as well as from private informations of persons who were eye-witnesses.

(b) Compleat Hist. of England, Vol. III. p. 537.

(c) Crauford's Peerage of Scotland, p. 22.

(d) Pointer's Chronolog. Hist. Vol. II. p. 533.

(e) Collins's Peerage of England, Vol. I. p. 452.

[D] The reader will find in the notes. It is asserted, that this noble person wrote these lines that follow, upon the day before his execution; so that, in that light, they may be considered, as a very strong instance of the quiet of his conscience, and of the serenity of his mind. But besides this, they may be read to another end; for in them, we see plainly his sentiments of the cause in which he died, and that to his very last moment, he remained persuaded, that he had done nothing contrary to the laws of his country, or consequently to the laws of God. For it appears, as well from these verses, as from his declaration, that the Earl of Argyle did not look on himself as a rebel, or upon the person he opposed, as a King. His opinion was, that the Royal authority and the Constitution, went together; and that the violation of the latter, took away the former; so that the allegiance of the subject was no longer due to the Prince, than he continued to him that protection stipulated by the Constitution. Bishop Burnet, in his account of the Earl's expedition (33), represents the miscarriage of it, as owing to his assuming too much power. Mr Wodrow has shown, that it was really brought about by his not having power enough (34); and that this was the Earl's own sentiment, the following lines most clearly discover, which are still to be seen on his monument, in the Gray-Friers church-yard, at Edinburgh.

Thou passenger, that shalt have so much time
To view my grave, and ask what was my crime;
No stain of error, no black vice's brand
Was that which chas'd me from my native land.
Love to my country, twice sentenc'd to die,
Constrain'd my hands forgotten arms to try,
More by friends frauds my fall proceeded hath,
Than foes; tho' now they thrice decreed my death.
On my attempt, tho' Providence did frown,
His oppress'd people, God at length shall own.
Another hand, by more successful speed,
Shall raise the remnant, bruise the serpent's head.

Tho' my head fall, that is no tragick story,
Since going hence, I enter endless glory.

This epitaph was translated into the following elegant Latin verses, by the reverend Mr William Jamison, History Lecturer in the University of Glasgow. It is to be observed, that the two last are Mr Jamison's own, and contain his character of the noble person to whom they relate, and his sentiments also of the cause in which he suffered. It must be allowed, that the sense is strong, and the language smooth and classical.

Audi hospes, quicumque venis, tumulumque revisis,
Et rogitas quali crimine tinctus eram.
Non me crimen habet, non me malus abstulit error,
Et vitium nullum me pepulit patria.
Solut amor patriæ, verique immensa cupido,
Disfuetas iussit sumere tela manus.
Opprimor, en! redieas, vi sola, & fraude meorum,
Hostibus & sævis victima terna cado.
Sic licet hic noster labor irritus, haud Deus æquus
Despiciet populum secula cuncta suum.
Namque alius veniet fatis melioribus ortus,
Qui toties ruptum sine beabit opus.
Sat mihi credo datum (quamvis caput ense secetur)
Hinc petor ætherei lucida templa poli.

Hic situs est heros indigna morte peremptus,
Heu! decus hic patriæ, proditur a patria. G. J.

These two lines have been thus translated.

A hero's dust, these sacred stones contain;
Shameful his death, his live, without a stain,
He fell alas! thro' fortune's fierce assault,
His country's glory, by his country's fault.

E

CAPEL (ARTHUR) created Baron Capel of Hadham in 1641, was the son of Sir Henry Capel, Knt. [A] and Theodosia, sifter to Edward Lord Montagu of Boughton, and to Henry Earl of Manchester (a). What school and University he was educated in; is no where mentioned; but there is all the reason to think, that he had an education suitable to his quality and fortune. At his first appearance into the world, he became very eminent for his piety [B], hospitality to his neighbours, and great charity to the poor; which so endeared him to the people, that he was chosen one of the Knights for Hertfordshire (b), in the Parliament which met at Westminster April 13, 1640 (c). The sixteenth of that month, he delivered a petition from the free-holders of the county of Hertford, complaining of ship-money, projects, monopolies, Star-Chamber, High-Commission-Courts, &c. being the first of that kind which was presented to the House (d). From whence it may be inferred, that he was a true lover of his country, and an enemy to oppressions of all sorts. This Parliament being soon after (e) abruptly dissolved, Mr Capel was unanimously chosen again one of the Knights for the county of Hertford, in the Long Parliament, which began November 3, 1640 (f). When the city of London promised to advance an hundred thousand pounds, for the payment of the English and Scotch armies, and wanted security for that sum, 'till an Act was passed for the raising of it; he stood up in the House, and offered his security for one thousand pounds, and above a hundred more of the House did the like (g). He was one of those who voted for the Earl of Strafford's attainder, April 21, 1641 (h); of which he very much repented afterwards [C]. Hitherto, he had acted against the Court, but now he began to alter his inclinations, and to act in favour of it: either because he was gained by the King, or could not come into all the violent measures which the House of Commons were running into. In consequence of this change, he was, on the sixth of August 1641, advanced to the dignity of a Baron of this realm, by the title of Lord Capel of Hadham (i). On the fifteenth of June 1642, he subscribed, at York, among several other Lords, a Declaration wherein they testified, they were fully persuaded that his Majesty had no intention to make war upon his Parliament (k). Two days after, he entered into an engagement, to raise a hundred Horse [D] for his Majesty's use (l). In 1643, the King sent him to Shrewsbury, with a Commission of Lieutenant-General of Shropshire, Cheshire, and North-Wales; and his Lordship quickly brought those parts into an Association, and raised a body of horse and foot, which gave Sir William Brereton great trouble at Nantwich (m). The same year, he was named one of the Counsellors to the Prince of Wales; being designed to attend his person, with a regiment of horse, and one of foot, which the Lord Capel was to raise upon his own credit and interest, and to have the command of (n). In 1644-5 he was one of the Commissioners for the King at the treaty of Uxbridge (o). The summer following, he was employed in the King's and Prince's service in the West of England, chiefly at Bristol and Exeter, and about the siege of Taunton (p). He prevented a design that was formed of seizing the Prince (q); and was very instrumental in preserving and securing his person in Pendennis-castle, and afterwards in Scilly-island (r): where he waited upon his Highness, on the eleventh of April, 1646 (s), and the sixteenth and seventeenth of that month, sailed along with him to Jersey (t). From thence he was sent with the Lord Colepeper to Paris, to dissuade the Queen from sending for her son, the Prince of Wales, out of Jersey (u). And so bent was he against that Prince's going to France, that he offered to take a journey himself to Newcastle (where King Charles then was in the hands of the Scots) to receive the King's positive commands about that affair (w): But, notwithstanding the very material reasons he gave against his Highness's going to France [E], the Queen's

[A] Was the son of Sir Henry Capel, Knt.] The first that laid the foundation of riches, for supporting the honour of this family, was, William Capel of London, Draper, knighted in 1485, Sheriff in 1489, and Lord Mayor of London in 1503 (1); being the second son of John Capel, of Stoke-Neyland in the county of Suffolk, Esq; descended from an ancient family, who were Lords of the manor of Capel in that town for several ages. Sir William suffered, among others, from the extortions of Empson and Dudley, to whom he was forced to pay 2000 l. and refusing to pay them 1000 l. more, was committed to the Tower, but soon after released upon the death of King Henry VII. He died, immensely rich, September 6. 1515, and was buried in a chapel built by him on the south-side of St Bartholomew's church, near the Royal Exchange in London (2). His descendants, were, Sir Giles Capel, Knt. who resided at Raines hall in Essex; and was a brave warrior: Sir Henry Capel: Sir Edward, Knts. Sir Henry, Knt. who had ten children: Sir Arthur, Knt who had nineteen. The eldest of them, was Sir Henry, Knt. father of Arthur Lord Capel, who is the subject of this article. Sir Giles, Sir Edward, Sir Henry, and Sir Arthur, were successively Sheriffs of Hertfordshire (3).

[B] He became very eminent for his piety.] As a proof of which, he writ a Book of Meditations, published after his death (4); wherein much judicious piety may be discovered.

[C] He — voted for the Earl of Strafford's attainder — of which he repented afterwards.] As appears by his speech on the scaffold, in which he thus expresses himself upon that point, ' — I do here profess to you, that truly I did give my vote to that bill of the Earl of Strafford; I doubt not but God Almighty hath washed that away with more precious blood, and that is, with the blood of his own son, and my dear Saviour Jesus Christ; — truly this I may say, I had not the least part, nor the least degree of malice, in the doing of it; but I must confess again to God's glory, and the accusation of mine own frailty, and the frailty of my nature, that truly ' it was an unworthy cowardize, not to resist so great a torrent as carried that business at that time. And truly, this I think I am most guilty of, of not courage enough in it, but malice I had none — (5).'

[D] He entered into an engagement to raise an hundred horse.] He raised in all for the King about 900 horse at his own charge, and lent him twelve thousand pounds in money and plate (6).

[E] He gave material reasons against the Prince's going to France.] In the first place he thought it advisable, to take no final resolution, 'till farther notice was received of the King's pleasure. Next, he observed,

(1) See List, at the end of the King's Answer to the Petition of the Lords and Commons presented to his Majesty at York, June 17, 1642. Printed at London, 1642; 4to.

(2) Lord Clarendon, Vol. II. Part i. p. 146.

(3) Clarendon, Vol. II. Part ii. p. 560—602.

(4) Ibid. p. 575: Whitelock's Memorials, edit. 1732, p. 125. Relation of the Treaty at Uxbridge, at the end of Sir William Dugdale's Short View of the Troubles in Engl. Oxon. 1681.

(5) Clarendon, Vol. II. Part ii. p. 614, 637, 645, 703, 704, 705.

(6) Ibid. p. 732.

(7) Ibid. p. 734.

(8) Clarendon, Vol. III. Part i. p. 2.

(9) Ibid. p. 4.

(10) Ibid. p. 7.

(11) Ibid. p. 14, 15.

(12) Fuller's Worthies, in Hertfordshire, p. 29.

(13) Speeches of Duke Hamilton, Lord Capel, &c. upon the Scaffold, &c. Printed at London in 1649, 4to.

(14) Hist. of Essex, ubi supra.

(a) Peerage of England, &c. by A. Collins, Lond. 1735, 8vo, Vol. II. p. i. p. 272. Hist. of Essex by N. Tindal, in Rayne parva, No. ii. p. 82. British Compen. in Capel Earl of Essex.

(b) Collins, and Tindal, ibid.

(c) Rushworth's Historical Collections, &c. Part ii. Vol. II. edit. 1680, p. 1107.

(d) Ibid. p. 1127, 1128.

(e) Viz. May 5.

(f) Rushworth, Part iii. Vol. I.

(g) Diurnal Occurrences of Parliament, &c. Lond. 1641, 4to, p. 6.

(h) See Trial of the Earl of Strafford, by J. Rushworth. State Worthies, by D. Lloyd, second edit. 1079, p. 1022.

(i) Pat. 17 Car. I. Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 465. Peerage of England by Collins, ubi supra, p. 273.

(k) Hist. of the Rebellion, &c. by Clarendon, Vol. I. Part ii. edit. 1731, 8vo, p. 655, 656.

(1) Stow's Survey of London with Strype's Additions, edit. 1720, Book v. p. 127. Vol. II.

(2) Ibid. p. 182. and Peerage of England by A. Collins, edit. 1735, Vol. II. p. ii. p. 270, 271.

(3) Collins, ibid. and Hist. of Hertfordshire, by N. Salmon, Lond. 1728, p. 364.

- (x) Ibid. p. 27. Queen's and Lord Digby's arguments prevailed (x). After the Prince's departure to France, Lord Capel remained in Jersey, to expect the King's pleasure, and to wait for an opportunity of appearing again in his Majesty's service (y). In the mean time the House of Commons voted, that his estate should be sold to raise money for Ireland (z). In the year 1647 he left Jersey, and made a journey to Paris to the Prince, that he might receive his Highness's approbation of his going for England: which having obtained, he came to Zealand, his friends having advised him to be in those parts before they endeavoured to procure a pass for him, which they easily did as soon as he came thither (a). Whereupon he crossed over into England, and having made his composition with the usurping powers, retired to his manor of Hadham in Hertfordshire (b), where he was exceedingly beloved, and hated no where (c). Some time after, he took an opportunity to wait upon the King at Hampton-Court; and gave him a particular account of all that had passed at Jersey, before the Prince's remove from thence, and of the reasons which induced those of the Council to remain still there, and of many other particulars, of which his Majesty had never before been thoroughly informed. The King imparted to him all his hopes and all his fears; and what great overtures the Scots had made to him. That he did really believe, it could not be long before there would be a war between the two nations; in which the Scots promised themselves an universal concurrence from all the Presbyterians in England: and that, in such a conjuncture, he wished his own party would put themselves in arms, without which he could not expect great benefit by the success of the other: and therefore desired Lord Capel to watch such a conjuncture, and draw his friends together, which he promised to do effectually (d). Accordingly that Lord was, from the first, made privy to the Scots designs, of entering England with a powerful army, in order to set the King at liberty, and restore him to his throne (e); being entirely trusted by those who would not trust any of the Presbyterians, nor communicate their purposes to them (f). When he thought the project was in good forwardness, he writ, in the beginning of May 1648, to Sir Edward Hyde, to send for the Prince of Wales to Jersey, that he might be in a readiness to pass over to England (g). At the same time he was very active in Hertfordshire, in raising forces for the King's service (h), with which he joined the Earl of Norwich, and Sir Charles Lucas, in Essex (i). Those brave gentlemen having gathered together a body of about four thousand men, went and shut themselves up with them in Colchester (k), where they endured a long and close siege from the twelfth of June to the twenty-eighth of August (l). During which, the Lord Capel was one of the most resolute [F], and indefatigable in the defence of that place (m). Upon the surrender of it, he was forced to yield himself to the mercy of the Lord General [G], and afterwards was assured of quarter (n). Whereupon he was remitted to the Parliament for further publick justice and mercy, to be used as they should see cause (o). But not behaving with so much condescension as was expected from a man in his circumstances [H], he was, on that account chiefly, sacrificed to his enemies passion and revenge (p). From Colchester he was sent prisoner to Windorcastle (q); where whilst he remained (on the twenty-fifth of September, 1648) an Act of Attainder was ordered by the House of Commons to be brought in against him (r). Hearing of it, he sent and informed the House, that quarter was given him by the General, who had writ to the House to that purpose (s). Whereupon, the Lord Fairfax being
- (a) Letter from Lord Fairfax to the House of Lords, concerning the Surrender of Colchester, Aug. 29, 1648.
- (b) Ibid. Whitlock, ubi supra, p. 333.
- (c) Clarendon, Vol. III. Part i. p. 178, 179.
- (d) Ibid. p. 179.
- (e) Whitlock, ubi supra, p. 338.
- (f) Ibid. p. 347.
- (g) See Relation of the honourable and unfortunate Expedition of Kent, Essex, and Colchester, by M. Carter, 1650, Reprinted in 1740.
- (h) See Whitlock, ubi supra; p. 313, 315, 318, 321.
- (i) Clarendon, Vol. III. Part i. p. 26.
- (j) Memorials, p. 318.
- (k) Ibid. p. 321.
- (l) Relation, &c. as above, by M. Carter, edit. 1650, p. 167.

served, that if the Court of France had so great a desire, as was pretended, that the Prince of Wales should repair thither, it was a wonder, in the two months his Highness had been in Jersey, they had never sent a gentleman to see him, and invite him to come over; nor had those who came to him from the Queen, brought so much as a pass for him to come into France. That all they had hitherto proposed to themselves from France, had proved in no degree answerable to expectation; as the five thousand foot which the French had promised to send into the West of England, before the Prince's departure from thence. That they had more reason to be jealous than ever, since in had been by the advice of France, that the King had put himself into the hands of the Scots; and therefore they ought to be more watchful in disposing of the person of the Prince, by their advice, likewise (7).

[F] The Lord Capel was one of the most resolute.

Mr Whitlock informs us (8), That he, and the Lord Goring, carried things very high: And that once, General Fairfax having sent a summons to them, to surrender the town to the service of the Parliament, they returned for answer, That if any more letters of that kind were sent to them, they would hang up the messenger (9). The Lord Capel in particular, during the siege, marched himself a-foot, with a halberd on his shoulder, at the head of his company to the guard, that none might make any scruple or exception against the service (10).

[G] He was forced to yield himself to the mercy of the General.] When Lord Fairfax demanded, in one of his letters, That the persons of all the officers, above the quality of a Lieutenant, should render themselves to mercy; the Lord Capel, and the rest, unanimously resolved, not to yield to the mercy of any other, but that of God alone (11). However, a mutiny, and great discontents, arising among the besieged, as if the Officers, and the rest of the gentlemen, were resolved to break through the besiegers, and leave the private soldiers behind, exposed to the fury of their incensed enemies (12); the commanding officers were at length forced to submit to those hard terms, which they had at first so scornfully rejected. Though, as appears, by the sequel, they expected, and thought they had reason to expect, that their lives would be safe.

[H] Not behaving with so much condescension, &c. After the execution of Sir Charles Lucas and Sir George Lisle, the Lord Fairfax, with the chief Officers, went to the Moot-hall to visit the prisoners, and told them, 'That having done what the military justice required, all the lives of the rest were safe, and they should be well treated, and disposed of as the Parliament should direct.' But the Lord Capel telling them with some roughness, 'That they should do well to finish their work, and execute the same rigour to the rest;' there passed two or three such sharp and bitter replies between him and Ireton, as cost him his life in few months after (13).

[I] That

(11) Whitlock, ubi supra, p. 322.

(12) Relation, &c. as above, by M. Carter, p. 184.

(13) Clarendon, Vol. III. Part i. p. 178, 179.

being called upon by the Commons, to explain his letter of the twenty-ninth of August to them, as to that point; answered, That it did not extend to any other but the military power, and that they were, notwithstanding, liable to trial and judgment by the Civil Power (t). The tenth of November following, the House voted, That he, and some others, should be banished out of the kingdom (u). But that punishment not being thought severe enough, he was removed to the Tower of London (w); and on the first of February 1648-9, it was voted, that he, the Lord Goring, and some others, should be the next persons to be proceeded against for justice (x). That same evening he escaped out of the Tower [I]: but strict search being made after him, and a hundred pounds reward offered for re-taking him; he was discovered and apprehended, two days after, at Lambeth, and committed again to the Tower (y). The tenth day of that month, he was brought before a High Court of Justice in Westminster-Hall (z); to be tried for treason and other high crimes (a). And though he strenuously insisted, that he was a prisoner to the Lord General, that he had conditions given him, and was to have fair quarter for his life [K], so that if all the magistrates in Christendom were combined together, they could not call him in question (b); yet his plea was over-ruled. The thirteenth he was brought again before the Court [L], when the Counsel moved, that he should be hanged, drawn, and quartered (c). However, on the sixth of March being brought a fifth time before the Court [M], he was condemned only to be beheaded (d). After his condemnation his Lady petitioned the Parliament, which occasioned a long debate (e), but at length it was voted [N], That he should not be reprieved (f). Accordingly, on the

(a) Whitelock, ibid.
 (b) Ibid.
 (c) Ibid. p. 331.
 (d) Ibid. p. 336.
 (e) March 8.
 (f) Ibid. p. 336. Clarendon, ubi supra, p. 270.

[I] That same evening he escaped out of the Tower.] Having a cord, and all things necessary conveyed to him, he let himself down out of the window of his chamber in the night, over the wall of the Tower; and had been directed through what part of the ditch he might best wade. Whether he hit upon the right place, or there was none safer, he found the water and the mud so deep, that, if he had not been by the head taller than other men, he must have perished, since the water came up to his chin. The way was so long to the other side, and the fatigue of drawing himself out of the mud so intolerable, that his spirits were near spent, and he was once ready to call out for help. But he got at last to the other side, where his friends expected him, and carried him to a chamber in the Temple, where he remained two or three nights secure from any discovery. At length, a friend whom he trusted much, conceiving he might be more secure in a place to which there was less resort, and not so many harboured that were every day sought after, provided a lodging for him in a private-house in Lambeth-marsh. Calling upon him in an evening, when it was dark, to go thither, they chose rather to take any boat they found ready at the Temple-stairs, than to trust one of that people with the secret; and it was so late, that there was only one boat left. In that the Lord Capel (as well disguised as he thought necessary) and his friend, put themselves, and bid the waterman row them to Lambeth. Whether, in their passage thither, the other gentleman called him My Lord, as was confidently reported, or whether the waterman had any jealousy who he was, or knew him; when they were landed, the waterman, undiscerned, followed them till he saw into what house they went. And then he went to an officer, and demanded, 'What he would give him, to bring him to the place where the Lord Capel lay.' The officer promising to give him ten pounds, he led him presently to the house, where his Lordship was seized upon, and the next day carried to the Tower (14). Mr Whitelock says (15), that it was two watermen who discovered and apprehended him, for which they received forty pounds.

[K] Was to have fair quarter for his life.] The articles were, 'That the Lords, and all Captains, and superiour officers, should render themselves to the mercy of the Lord General.' Which was thus explained at that time, 'That they be rendered, or render themselves, to the Lord General, or whom he shall appoint, without certaine assurance of quarter, so as the Lord General may be free to put some immediately to the sword, if he see cause, although he intends chiefly, and for the generality of those under that condition, to surrender them to the mercy of the Parliament and General (16).' The Lord Capel had afterwards quarter granted him. See above.

[L] The 13th he was brought again before the Court.] And then it was made appear, by General Fairfax's Letter to the Parliament upon the surrender of Colchester, and the articles, with the explanation, of that surrender; as also by the testimony of Lord Fairfax himself, and of Ireton, Whaley, and Barksted, then present, 'That the Lord Capel was to have fair quarter for his life,' which was explained to be, 'a freedom from any execution of the sword, but not any protection from the judicial proceedings of a Civil Court;' and Mercy was explained to be only from the promiscuous execution of the sword, but that he might be tried by a Council of War.' But of this Learning, as Mr Whitelock there rightly observes, I hope none of this nation will have use hereafter. It was also proved, 'That the articles were only to free him from the present power of the sword to take away his life.' And Colonel Barksted swore, 'That he told him, the day after the articles, that he believed the Parliament would proceed against them that were taken at Colchester, as traitors (17).'

[M] Being brought a fifth time before the Court.] He was brought before it, for the third time, February 17, when he was questioned for his escape out of the Tower; and then he pleaded, 'That he did not escape as he was a prisoner of war, but as he was sent to the Tower in another condition.' The fourth time of his appearance before it, was the 21st of the same month, when he pleaded, 'That he was to be comprehended wholly in the martial law; and urged the Articles again, which excepted trial after by Parliament: That divers that were in Colchester in his condition, had compounded: That breaking prison for Treason, by Common Law, was but Felony, and benefit of Clergy might be had.' When he could not be allowed to be tried by Martial Law, then he moved, 'That he might not be barred of additional defence; and that, if he must be judged by the Common Law, he hoped he might have the full benefit of it.' He recommended to the Court Magna Charta, and the Petition of Right, &c. Moreover, he desired to see his Jury, and that they might see him, and to be tried by his Peers, and said, 'He believed, that a precedent could not be given, of a subject tried for his life, but either by bill in Parliament, or by a Jury.' But all he could say, was disregarded and rejected (18).

[N] His Lady's petition occasioned a long debate, &c.] When it was read, many gentlemen spoke on his behalf, and mentioned the great virtues which were in him; 'that he had never deceived them, or pretended to be of their party; but always resolutely declared himself for the King.' Cromwell, who had known him very well, spoke so much good of him, and professed to have so much kindness and respect for him, that all men thought he was now safe;—but then he concluded—'That his affection to the publick so much weighed down his private friendship, that he could not but tell them, that the question was now; whether they would preserve the most bitter and most implacable enemy they had: that he knew the Lord Capel very well, and knew that he would be the last man in England, that would forsake the royal interest;

(17) Whitelock, ubi supra, p. 331. See also Clarendon, Vol. III. P. i. p. 266, 267.
 (18) Whitelock, p. 333.

ibid. p. 344.
 Idem, p. 348.
 Clarendon, Vol. I. P. i. p. 269.
 Whitelock, ubi supra, p. 376.
 Ibid. p. 377.
 Clarendon, ubi supra.
 Whereof about fifty of the members were absent.
 Whitelock, ubi supra, p. 380. See also Clarendon, Vol. I. P. i. p. 266, 267.

Clarendon, Vol. III. Part I. p. 270.

Memorials, ubi supra, p. 377.

Articles for the Surrender of Colchester, Aug. 73 1648.

(†) Where he, and the two other Lords, had been confined after their condemnation. Clarendon, ubi supra, p. 268.

(g) Account of the Execution, with the several Speeches of Duke Hamilton, Lord Capel, &c. published by authority. Lond. 1649, 4to. Whitelock, p. 387, 388. Clarendon, ubi supra, p. 271, 272.

(h) Ibid. He seemed rather to fright death than to be frightened with it, as Fuller observes. Worthies in Hertfordshire, p. 29.

the ninth of March, the day appointed for his execution, he was carried from St James's (†) in a sedan, with a guard, to Sir Thomas Cotton's house at Westminster; where he continued about two hours, which he spent mostly in religious conference with Dr Morley, who attended him (g). Then being brought to the scaffold erected before Westminster-hall, he made a speech to the people [O]. After which, submitting to the block, as Duke Hamilton and the Earl of Holland had done immediately before, he suffered death with great resolution (b). His body being carried to Little-Hadham in Hertfordshire, where he had a seat and estate, was buried in the chancel of that church (i). And a black marble was soon after laid over his grave, with an inscription [P]. He married Elizabeth, daughter and heir of Sir Charles Moryson, Knt. of Caithbury in Watford, Hertfordshire, by whom he had four sons; Arthur, of whom we shall give an account in the next article; Henry created Baron of Tewksbury in 1692, and who died Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in 1696. Edward; and Charles: and four daughters (k). His character is thus given by the Earl of Clarendon (l). He was a man in whom the malice of his enemies could discover but very few faults, and whom his friends could not wish better accomplished; whom Cromwell's own character well described (m), and who indeed would never have been contented to have lived under that government. His memory all men loved and revered, though few followed his example. He had always lived in a state of great plenty and general estimation, having a very noble fortune of his own by descent, and a fair addition to it by his marriage with an excellent wife, a Lady of very worthy extraction, of great virtue and beauty, by whom he had a numerous issue of both sexes, in which he took great joy and comfort: so that no man was more happy in all his domestick affairs; and he was so much the more happy, in that he thought himself most blessed in them. And yet the King's honour was no sooner violated, and his just power invaded, than he threw all those blessings behind him; and having no other obligations to the Crown, than those which his own honour and conscience suggested to him, he frankly engaged his person and his fortune from the beginning of the troubles, in all actions and enterprizes of the greatest hazard and danger; and continued to the end, without ever making one false step. In a word, he was a man, that whoever shall, after him, deserve best of the English nation, he can never think himself undervalued, when he shall hear, that his courage, virtue, and fidelity, is laid in the ballance with, and compared to, that of the Lord Capel.

(i) The Hist. of Hertfordshire by N. Salmon, Lond. 1728, fol. p. 282.

(k) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 466. Peerage of Engl. by A. Collins, ubi supra, p. 273.

(l) Hist. Vol. III. Part i. p. 273.

(m) See note [N].

rest; that he had great courage, industry, and generosity; that he had many friends who would always adhere to him; and that as long as he lived, what condition soever he was in, he would be a thorn in their sides, and therefore, for the good of the Commonwealth, he should give his vote against the petition. Ireton's hatred was immortal: he spoke of him, and against him, as of a man of whom he was heartily afraid. And so, after a long debate, though there was not a man who had not a value for him, and very few, who had a particular malice, or prejudice against him, he was cast (19).

[O] He made a speech to the people. In which he first prays the God of all mercies, that those who were the cause of his violent death, might be partakers of his inestimable and boundless mercies in Jesus Christ, and beseeches the God of Heaven, to forgive any injury they had done to him, 'From my soul, says he, I wish it.' Then he declares, 'That he was a Protestant, and very much in love with the profession of it, after the manner as it was established in England by the XXXIX Articles; a blessed way of profession, and such a one, as truly, says he, I never knew none so good.' — Soon after he says, 'Something I shall say to you as a citizen of the whole world, and in that consideration I am here condemned to die, contrary to the law that governs all the world, that is, the Law of the Sword; I had the protection of that for my life, and the honour of it. — You that are Englishmen, behold here an Englishman now before you, and acknowledged a Peer, not condemned to die by any law of England; nay, which is strangest of all, contrary to all the laws of England that I know of. — I die, I take it, for maintaining the fifth Commandment, in-joined by God himself, which enjoins reverence and obedience to Parents, that is, to Magistracy and Order.' — Then speaking of King Charles I. — 'Truly, in my opinion, says he, there was not a more virtuous, and more sufficient Prince known in the world, than our gracious King Charles that died last.' After which, he gives a very great character of King Charles II. and beseeches God to give him much happiness, and to his subjects. He concludes, as he had begun, by praying, That God Almighty would confer of his infinite and inestimable grace and mercy, to those that were the causes of his coming thither, and give them as much mercy as their own hearts could wish. 'Truly, says he, for my part, I will not accuse any one of them of malice, truly I will not, nay I will not think there was any malice in them: what other ends there is, I know not, nor I will not examine, but let it be what it will, from my very soul I forgive them every one: And so the Lord of Heaven bless you all,' &c. And, after a little stop, he concluded, 'God Almighty bless all this people, God Almighty stretch this blood, God Almighty stretch, stretch, stretch this issue of blood; this will not do the business, God Almighty find out another way to do it.' — Dr Morley attended him from the time sentence was passed upon him; but the soldiers stopping the Doctor at the foot of the scaffold, his Lordship took his leave of him, and said he should go no farther, apprehending that he might receive some affront from the populace (20).

[P] A black marble was laid over his grave with an inscription. Which runs thus. 'Here under lieth interred the Body of Arthur Lord Capel, Baron of Hadham, who was murdered for his Loyalty to King Charles I. March 9, 1648 (21). C

(20) Clarendon Vol. III, Part p. 272.

(21) History of Hertfordshire. N. Salmon, ubi supra, p. 283.

(19) Clarendon, Vol. III, Part i. p. 270.

(a) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 466. Peerage of Engl. by A. Collins, I. 9; Vol. II. p. i. edit. 1735, 8vo p. 274.

(b) Collins, ibid.

CAPEL (ARTHUR) eldest son of Arthur Lord Capel, mentioned in the last article, succeeded his father in his honour; and, after the restoration of King Charles II, on account, both of his father's loyalty and sufferings, and his own personal merit, was advanced to the dignity of Viscount Maldon, and Earl of Essex, April 20, 1661 (a), with remainder of the same honour, for want of issue male, to Henry Capel, Esq; his brother, and the heirs male of his body; and, for want of such issue, to Edward Capel, Esq; his younger brother (b). He was also made Custos Rotulorum, and Lord Lieutenant of the county of Hertford; and, some time after, of the county of Wilts, during the minority of the Duke of of Somers (c). In his younger years, his education was neglected, by reason of the civil wars; but, when he came to man's age, he learned the Latin tongue, and made a great progress in Mathematicks, and in all the other parts of learning. He knew our law and constitution well, and was a very thoughtful man. As he appeared early against the Court, King Charles imputing it to his resentments, resolved to make use of him; and accordingly, in 1670, sent him Ambassador to Denmark (d), where his behaviour in the affair of the Flag gained him much reputation [A]. At his return, in 1672, he was sworn of the Privy-Council (e), and made Lord Lieutenant of Ireland. How he came to be raised to this post he could never understand; for he had not pretended to it; and he was a violent enemy to Popery, not so much from any fixed principle in religion, in which he was too loose, as because he looked on it as an invasion made on the freedom of human nature (f). He began his journey towards Ireland July 22, with a very noble equipage, and arriving at Dublin, had, on August 5, the Sword of State delivered to him (g). In his government of that kingdom, he exceeded all that had gone before him, and was a pattern to all that should come after. He studied to understand well the constitution and interest of the nation. He read over all their council-books, and made large abstracts out of them, to guide him, so as to advance every thing that had been at any time set on foot for the good of the kingdom. He made several volumes of tables of the state, and persons that were in every county and town; and got true characters of all that were capable to serve the publick. And he preferred men always upon merit, without any application from themselves; and watched over all about him, that there should be no bribes going among his servants (h). But notwithstanding these noble qualifications, and his great services, he was recalled in 1677 (i), for complaining that payments were not regularly made in Ireland [B], and refusing to pass the accounts of the Earl of Ranelagh, who had the management of the revenue in that kingdom (k). Upon his return to England, he became one of the leading men in the House of Lords (l); and one of those that declared against the Earl of Danby (m). That Lord being soon after displaced, the Earl of Essex was admitted into the new Privy-Council, which was formed upon Danby's disgrace, and was one of those four leading members of it, who had the direction of affairs: the treasury likewise being put in commission, he was appointed first and chief Commissioner of it [C], on the twenty-first of April 1679 (n). But he resigned that office [D] the nineteenth of November following (o), and continued however still of the Privy-Council (p). When the exclusion of the Duke of York was debated in the House of Lords, the Earl of Essex appeared against it; and he, and the Earl of Halifax, proposed such limitations of the Duke's authority, when the crown should devolve on him [E], as would disable him from doing any harm in Church

(m) Rapin's Hist. of Eng. edit. 1733, fol. Vol. II. p. 697, 704. He joined with the Duke of Monmouth and Earl of Sunderland to press the King to change his counsels; for which he was much blamed. Burnet, ubi supra, p. 454.

(n) The Historian's Guide, in 1679. Kennet, ubi supra, p. 357. Burnet, ubi supra, p. 454.

(o) Historian's Guide, in 1679.

(p) Kennet, ubi supra, p. 367. Rapin, ubi supra, p. 704.

or

[A] His behaviour in the affair of the Flag gained him great reputation. The King of Denmark had ordered the Governor of Croonenburgh to make all ships that passed strike to him. So when Lord Essex was sailing by, the Governor sent to him, either to strike to him, or to sail by in the night, or to keep out of his reach: otherwise he must shoot, first with powder, but next with ball. Lord Essex sent him a resolute answer, 'That the Kings of England made others strike to them, but their ships struck to none: He would not steal through in the dark, nor keep out of his reach; and if he shot at him he would defend himself.' The Governor did shoot at him, but on design shot over him: Or, according to some (1), tore his rigging. This was thought great bravery in his Lordship: Yet he reckoned, it was impossible the Governor would endeavour to sink a ship that brought an Ambassador. Lord Essex's first business was to justify his behaviour in refusing to strike. Now, at his going from England, Sir John Cotton had desired him to take some volumes of his library that related to Danish affairs; which he took, without apprehending that he should have great occasion to use them: But this accident made him search into them. And he found very good materials to justify his conduct; since by formal treaties it had been expressly stipulated, that the English ships of war should not strike in the Danish seas. This raised his character so high as Court, that it was writ over to him, he might expect every thing he should pretend to at his return (2). The Governor of Croonenburgh was ordered to beg his pardon upon his knees in the open street, which he did, the Earl standing in a balcony of his lodgings (3).

[B] He was recalled — for complaining that payments were not regularly made in Ireland. The Earl of Ranelagh, who then managed the revenue of that kingdom, had undertaken to furnish the King with money, for the building of Windfor, out of the revenue of Ireland. And it was believed, the Duchesse of Portsmouth had a great yearly pension out of his office. By this means, payments in Ireland were not regularly made, of which the Earl of Essex complained. The King would not own how much he had from Lord Ranelagh, but pressed Lord Essex to pass his accounts. He answered, He could not pass them as accounts: But if the King would forgive Lord Ranelagh, he would pass a discharge, but not an ill account. The King was not pleased with this, nor with his exactness in that government; it reproached his own too much. So he took a resolution about this time to displace the Earl of Essex, and to put the Duke of Ormond again, in his room (4).

[C] He was appointed First Commissioner of the Treasury. Wherein he applied himself to the regulating the King's expence, and the improvement of the revenue. His clear, though slow, sense made him very acceptable to the King (5).

[D] He resigned that office. Upon the discovery of the Meal-Tub plot, he and the Earl of Halifax pressed the King vehemently to call a Parliament immediately. But the King thought, that if a Parliament should meet while all mens spirits were sharpened by this new discovery, he would find them in worse temper than ever: When the King could not be prevailed on to do that, the Earl of Essex left the Treasury. The King was very uneasy at this. But Lord Essex was firm in his resolution, not to meddle with that post more, since a Parliament was not called: Yet, at the King's earnest desire, he continued, for some time, to go to Council (6).

[E] He proposed — limitations of the Duke of York's authority. Such as, The taking out of his hand all power in Ecclesiastical matters; the disposal of the publick money; with the power of peace and war, and the lodging these in both Houses of Parliament; and that whatever Parliament was in being, or the last that had been in being at the King's death, should meet without a new summons, upon it, and assume the administration of affairs. The Lords Essex, Sunderland, and Halifax, three of the leading members in the new Privy-Council, were for these limitations; but the Earl of Shaftsbury, the fourth of the managers, declared highly against any limitations: which occasioned a breach between those Lords; and the three

(4) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 398.

(5) Burnet, Hist. ubi supra, p. 456.

(6) Idem, p. 476.

ibid.
Burnet's Hist. his own Time, it. fol. 1724, pl. I. p. 396.
Collins, ubi supra, and Burnet.
Burnet, 397.
Compleat Hist. of England, Kennet, edit. 1703, Vol. III. 316.
Burnet, ubi supra, p. 397.
Letter, in the 2d Vol. of Cox's Hist. of England; before the Appendix, 14.
Burnet, ubi supra, p. 398.
Ibid. p. 431.
History of Hertfordshire, by V. Salmon, Lond. 1728, p. 81.
Burnet, ubi supra, p. 396, 397.
Salmon, ubi supra.

(7) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 455.

(r) Ibid. p. 468.

(s) Rapin, ubi supra, p. 711.

(t) See that Plot in Col. Mansel's Narrative, printed at London in 1680, fol. p. 19. and Burnet, p. 476. Rapin, ubi supra, p. 711.

(u) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 482.

(w) Ibid. p. 486.

(x) Kennet, ubi supra, p. 383; and Rapin, ubi supra, p. 720.

(y) Burnet, p. 537.

or State (q). He was also thus far subservient to the Court, as to be for the dissolution, rather than the prorogation, of the Parliament, in July 1679 (r). And was one of the chief persons that occasioned the Duke of Monmouth's, and the Earl of Shaftsbury's, disgrace (s). But seeing what violent measures were going on, and particularly being named as an accomplice in the meal-tub-plot (t), he resigned his place, and turned against the Court. Accordingly, when the Bill of Exclusion was brought a second time into the House of Lords, he argued vehemently for it (u): and made an extraordinary proposal (w), for securing the expedients offered in the room of that bill [F]. In February 1680-1, attended by fifteen Peers, he presented to the King a petition (x), subscribed by himself and them, wherein they requested, that the Parliament might not sit at Oxford, but at Westminster [G]. Also, he had an interview with the Earl of Shaftsbury, before he set out for Holland (y): and generally conversed with him, and the Duke of Monmouth, Lord Ruffel, Algernon Sidney, and other persons that were thought disaffected (z). All which steps rendered him so obnoxious to the Court, that he was struck out of the list of the Privy-Counsellors (a). And, in June 1683, being accused by the Lord Howard of Eficrick, of being concerned in the Rye-house-conspiracy, called otherwise the Phanatic or Protestant-plot (b), he was committed to the Tower [H]. On the thirteenth of July following, he was found in a closet in his lodgings there, about nine o'clock in the morning, with his throat miserably cut (c). The Coroner's Jury brought in their verdict, the next day, that he had voluntarily and feloniously killed and murdered himself (d); but it was then, and hath since been, thought, that he was murdered by Paul Bomeney, a French servant who attended him [I]. His body was carried into Hertfordshire, and interred in a vault belonging

(z) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 537, 538.

(a) Rapin, ubi supra, p. 720.

(b) Account of that Conspiracy, by Bishop Sprat, Kennet, ubi supra, p. 400.

(c) Fomeny's and Ruffel's Informations in the Coroner's Inquest. Lond. 1683, fol.

(d) Edward Farnham's the Coroner's Account, &c. Printed at Lond. fol. 1683.

(7) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 455, 456.

(8) Idem, p. 486.

first, joining together, were called the Triumvirate (7). [F] And made an extraordinary proposal, for securing the expedients, &c. He moved in the house of Lords, That an association should be entered into to maintain those expedients, and that some cautionary towns should be put into the hands of the Associators during the King's life, to make them good after his death. But though this was agreed to, in a thin house it came to nothing; the King looking upon it as a deposing of himself (8).

[G] He presented a petition, &c. At the presenting of it, he made a speech to the King, in the name of himself, and the Lords by whom it was subscribed; wherein he declares, That observing from history and records, how unfortunate many assemblies had been, when called at a place remote from the capital city [of which he brings instances]. And considering the present posture of affairs, the many jealousies and discontents that were among people, they had great cause to apprehend, that the consequences of a Parliament at Oxford might be as fatal to his Majesty and the nation, as those he had mentioned. ——— The grounds and reasons which they gave for their opinions in the petition itself were, That the Lords and Commons could not be in safety at Oxford, but would be daily exposed to the swords of the Papists, and their adherents, of whom too many were crept into his Majesty's guards: The liberty of speaking, according to their consciences, would be thereby destroyed; and the validity of all their acts and proceedings, concerning it, left disputable. The streightness of the place did not way admit of such a concourse of persons as now follows every Parliament. The witnesses that were necessary to give evidence against the Popish Lords, Judges, and others, whom the Commons had impeached, or had resolved to impeach, could neither bear the charge of going thither, nor trust themselves under the protection of a Parliament, that was itself evidently under the power of guards and soldiers (9).

(9) Kennet, ubi supra, p. 383, 384.

[H] Being accused ——— of being concerned in the Rye-house conspiracy ——— he was committed to the Tower. Before he was impeached, he staid for some time at his house in the country, and seemed so little apprehensive of danger, that his own lady did not imagine he had any concern on his mind. He was offered to be conveyed away very safely; but he would not stir. His tenderness for Lord Ruffel was the cause of it: For he thought his going out of the way might incline the Jury to believe the evidence the more, for his absconding. He seemed resolved, as soon as he saw how that went, to take care of himself. When a party of horse, that was sent to fetch him up, came to his house, he was at first in some disorder, yet he recovered himself. But when he came before the Council, he was in much confusion. He was sent to the Tower; and there he fell under so great a depression of spirit, that he could not sleep at all. He had fallen before that twice under great fits of the spleen, which returned now upon him with more violence. He sent by a servant, whom he had long trusted, a very melancholy message to his wife; 'That what he was charged with was true: He was sorry he had ruined her, and her children.' ——— But when he found, how she took his condition to heart, without seeming concerned for her own share in it, he was much calmer (10). As to this plot, very few now believe that the Earl of Essex, Lord Ruffel, &c. had so great a share in it, as the Court then affirmed. 'Tis very possible, that the evident violations of Liberty and Property, improved by the nearer prospects of Popery, might provoke many of the Nobility and Gentry to enter into some measures for stopping the torrent of the Court, and providing for the enjoyment of their established Laws and Religion. But still without having recourse to those violent and bloody means, which a few rash and inconsiderate desperadoes perhaps ran headlong into.

(10) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 552.

[I] It was then, and has since been, thought, that he was murdered, &c. The world was very much divided about this Lord's murder, at the time when it happened, and hath been so ever since. One side maintained, That he murdered himself; and so the Coroner's Inquest found it. The information given by Bomeney in favour of this opinion, was as follows (11): 'That when my Lord Essex came to the Tower, which was the 11th of July, he asked him (Bomeney) for a penknife to pare his nails as he was wont to do; to which Bomeney answered, Being come in haste he had not brought it, but he would send for one; and accordingly sent the footman with a note for several things for my Lord, amongst which the penknife was inserted; and the footman went, and gave the bill to my Lord's steward, who sent the provisions, but not the penknife, and told the footman he would get one next day. ——— Accordingly, on the 12th in the morning, before my Lord was up, Bomeney sent the footman home with a note to the steward, in which, amongst other things, he asked for a penknife for my Lord: When the footman was gone, about, or a little after eight o'clock, my Lord sent Mr Ruffel, his warder, to Bomeney, who came, and then he asked him, If the penknife was come? Bomeney said, "No, my Lord, but I shall have it by and by;" to which my Lord said, "That he should bring him one of his razors, it would do as well." And then Bomeney went and fetched one, and gave it my Lord; who began to pare his nails, and then Bomeney went out of the room into the passage by the door, on Friday the 13th, and began to talk with the warder, and a little while after he went down stairs; and soon after came the footman with the provisions, and brought also a penknife, which Bomeney put upon his bed, and thought my Lord had no more need of it, because he thought he had pared his nails; and then Bomeney came up to my Lord's chamber, about eight or nine in the forenoon on Friday the 13th, with longing to the family, in the parish church of Watford (e). As to his character; he was a person of an agreeable stature, slender in body, adorned with a comely countenance, mixed with gravity and sweetness, and was easy of access; his mind was sedate, but his discourses were generally free and pleasant, and his demeanour very civil; his promises were real and sincere; his reprimands smart and ingenious, having a quick apprehension, good elocution, sound judgment, great courage, and resolution unalterable; he was always wary and circumpect in Council, where he endeavoured to obstruct all arbitrary power, and the increase of the Popish interest; having a particular regard for the established religion of his country (f): tho' others affirm, that he was too loose in point of religion (g); and that he had an odd set of some strange principles (h). With regard to his political notions, he thought, the obligation between Prince and Subject was equally mutual, that upon a breach on the one side, the other was free (i). He was very temperate in his diet, strict in his justice, tender of his honour, and constant to his friend; he delighted much in his library, which enabled him to speak on all occasions with great applause, and would spend his vacant hours in viewing of Records, and learning the Mathematicks; these were his diversions together with recreating himself in his fine gardens, and pleasant groves, which were of his own plantation (k). He married Elizabeth, daughter of Algernon Earl of Northumberland, by whom he had six sons, and two daughters. But, only Algernon, the fifth son, and the youngest daughter, survived him. Her name was Anne, and she was married to Charles Earl of Carlisle.

(11) It is printed before the Coroner's Inquest, intituled, 'An Account how the Earl of Essex killed himself in the Tower of London, the 13th of July 1683.' Lond. fol. 1683.

(e) Peerage, &c. by A. Collins, p. 274.

(f) Collins, ibid.

(g) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 397.

(h) Ibid. p. 570.

(i) Ibid. p. 540.

(k) Collins, ubi supra, p. 275.

Algernon

with a little note from the steward; but not finding his Lord in the chamber, went to the close-stool closet door, and found it shut; and he thinking his Lord was busy there, went down and staid a little, and came up again, thinking his Lord had been come out of the closet; and finding him not in the chamber, he knocked at the door with his finger, thrice, and said, "My Lord?" But no body answering, he took up the hanging, and looking through the chink, he saw blood, and a part of the razor; whereupon he called the warder, Ruffel, and went down to call for help; and the said Ruffel pushed the door open, and there they saw my Lord of Essex all along the floor, without a peruke, and all full of blood, and the razor by him.'—Thomas Ruffel's information, printed at the end of this, is to the same purpose, except, that it mentions only the 13th of July. And to render this account the more probable, it is said, That Lord Essex had got into an odd set of some strange principles: And in particular he thought, a man was the master of his own life; and seemed to approve of what his wife's great-grandfather, the Earl of Northumberland, did, who shot himself in the Tower after he was arraigned. He had also very black fits of the spleen (12).

murdered, they saw a bloody razor thrown out of his chamber window: Which the boy going to take up, a short woman, in a white hood, came out of Captain Hawley's house, where the Earl lodged, and snatching up the razor, carried it in; immediately after which, murder was cried out. The boy denied this afterwards, but is said to have been terrified by one of his sisters, who told him, that he would ruin his father (who had a place in the Custom-house) and the rest of the family, if he persisted in it, and would bring both himself and his father to be hanged (16). The prevalence of Chief Justice Jefferies and Captain Hawley was very glaring upon this point (17). For they insisted, That nothing could be well thrown out of the closet-window where the Earl was found murdered; whereas the boy and girl both spoke of the chamber, not of the closet, window. 5 That the print of a bloody foot appeared upon one of my Lord's stockings. 6. That the neck, or middle of his cravat was cut in four pieces; and tied so hard, that there was reason to guess, an attempt had been made to strangle him with it (18). 6. That his Lordship's body was taken out of the closet, where it was found; stripped, and washed, and the cloaths carried away; and, also, the closet and room were washed, before the Coroner's Inquest was permitted to sit upon the body. which was not 'till the day after the murder was committed. One of the Jury desiring to see the clothes, the Coroner told him, 'They were called to sit upon my Lord's body, and not on his clothes; and that it was sufficient they had seen the body, and received an account upon oath how it was found (19).' 7. That it was impossible the Earl should cut his own throat in the manner it was found done. The two Chirurgeons, who viewed the body with the Coroner, deposed, 'That the throat was cut from one jugular to the other, and through the wind-pipe and gullet, unto the vertebres of the neck, both jugular veins being also quite divided (20).' Now, the razor wherewith he was said to have killed himself, being a small French razor, about four inches and a half long at most, without spill or tongue at the end of the blade, it could not be held with strength and steadiness sufficient to make such a wound, a wound eight inches long and four inches deep, unless the hand and fingers grasped two inches of it at least; and how the other two inches and a half of the razor, could make such a long and deep wound, as described by the Chirurgeons, is incredible (21). 8. In short, it is said, That this murder was committed by the Duke of York's contrivance and direction, and perpetrated by the Earl of Sunderland, Lord Feverham, and Paul Bomeney my Lord's valet de chambre (22). In proof of which it is observed, 9. That the King and Duke of York were that morning in the Tower, from six o'clock 'till nine, where they had not been for twelve years before. 10. That the centinels, which used to be changed every two hours, continued upon duty from four to ten o'clock in the morning (23); being, probably, persons that could best be trusted. However, that the day but one after the murder, they were called together, and strictly charged not to speak of what

(16) Ibid. p. 65. Edwards, the father, was afterwards turned out of his place, for witnessing at Mr Bradd'n's tryal what he had heard from his son. ibid. p. 28.

(17) At Mr L. Eraddon's tryal, p. 58, &c.

(18) Enquiry, &c. as above, p. 54, 55.

(19) Enquiry, &c. as above, p. 53—61.

(20) Informations of Robert Sherwood, and Rob. Andrews, Chirurgeons, printed with the Coroner's Inquest. Lond. 1683, fol.

(21) Enquiry, &c. as above, p. 44, 45.

(22) Ibid. p. 23, 35, 41.

(23) Ibid. p. 37.

(12) Burnet, ubi supra, p. 570, 553.

(13) An Enquiry into, and Detection of, the barbarous Murder of the late Earl of Essex, &c. said in my copy to be written by Hugh Speake, Gent. Lond. 1689, 4to, p. 5, 6.

(14) Ib. p. 8, 11.

(15) Ibid. p. 16, 17, 18, 19.

But, on the other hand, in order to prove, That the Earl of Essex did not murder himself, it is alleged, 1. That he was a Nobleman of most virtuous and religious principles; of the greatest sedateness of mind, least subject to the undue agitation of unruly passions, and most under the conduct of a calm, steady, strong, clear, and well poised reason, of any man: That the persons, who were reported to have heard him say what is mentioned above, concerning his great-grandfather, being asked about it, declared, They never heard any such thing from him: That his Lady in particular affirmed, That he used to speak against self-murder with an emotion beyond what was customary to him, and that he often declared, That no circumstances whatsoever could extenuate the guilt, or lessen the infamy, of so unnatural and wicked a fact (13). 2. That he could have no such premeditated design. For, the day before his murder, he had ordered his servants to bring up out of the country several vessels of silver, necessary for dressing of viuals. And had laid in a considerable quantity of the best of wines. Moreover, that he had given private directions to his steward, to place himself as conveniently as he could at the Lord Ruffel's trial, the better to take the evidence against him in short hand, and convey it to him (14). 3. That the news of the Earl of Essex's murder were publicly talked of at several distant places, before it was perpetrated; namely, two days before, at Andover in Hampshire: the day before, at Warminster in Wiltshire: and the same day it was committed, at Froom in Somersethire, ninety miles from London (15). And, therefore, that it was contrived and done by others. 4. That Jane Lodeman, a young woman about thirteen; and William Edwards, a youth between thirteen and fourteen years of age, being at the Tower that morning the Earl of Essex was found Algernon Earl of Essex, was Gentleman of the Bed-chamber to King William, Colonel of a regiment of dragoons, served under him in Flanders, distinguished himself at the battle of Landen, and attended at the great Congress in 1690. In the reign of Queen Anne, he was Constable of the Tower of London, Lieutenant-General of her armies, and Colonel of Dragoons. He was also, in both reigns, Lord Lieutenant, and Custos Rotulorum, of Hertfordshire and St Albans. He died January 10, 1709-10, leaving issue, by the Lady Mary Bentinck, eldest daughter of William Earl of Portland, William the late Earl of Essex, and two daughters, the Lady Elizabeth, and the Lady Mary (1). William, the present Earl of Essex is under age.

(1) Collins, ibid.

- (24) Ibid. p. 26. what they had seen or heard (24). But Captain Hawley, having whispered something about it, was found murdered (25): And Robert Meak, one of the centinels, not having been so silent as desired, was murdered, and thrown into the Tower-ditch (26).
- (25) Ib. p. 39, 40. 11. That a gate, at the lower-end of those apartments where my Lord Essex was confined, which used to stand open from morning 'till night, was all that morning kept shut, by a special order, 'till his Lordship was dead. 12. That the King and Duke having been at the Lieutenant's house, about the middle of the alley where the Earl was imprisoned, did soon after, with several waiting upon him, withdraw from the King, down into the alley, the gate whereof was still kept shut. 13. That the Duke having withdrawn from the King, several persons were immediately sent from his side towards the Earl of Essex's lodgings, which returned not 'till after his death (27). 14. That P.
- (27) Ib. p. 62, 63.

Bomeny was justly suspected by the rest of my Lord's servants, by the last Earl of Essex, and many other persons, to be the author of his master's death. Upon that suspicion, the Countess dismissed him out of her family. But he was, thereupon, cherished and entertained by the Court, and made one of the Life-guards (28). As an evidence of his guilt, he was extremely frightened at the enquiry that was made into his master's death. 15. But that the Court was also necessary to this murder, is strongly suspected; because they so earnestly discouraged all manner of enquiry into it (29): For one Mr Laurence Braddon, who was very active in discovering the true authors of this barbarous murder, was fined 2000*l.* in the King's-Bench; and Mr Hugh Speke 1000*l.* (30). After all, by whom it was committed, is one of those secrets, which cannot be fully revealed 'till the last great day of accounts.

(28) Ibid. p. 47, 42, 43.

(29) Ib. p. 24, &c.

(30) See the Trial of Laur. Braddon and Hugh Speke. Lond. 1684.

C A R E W. The surname of an ancient family in Devonshire and Cornwall, which hath produced several illustrious and eminent persons. Some (a) fetch the original of that family from the Dukes or Kings of Suevia, now Schwabia, in High Germany: But others (b) with more probability, derive it from France [A], and think they came into England with William the Conqueror; that name occurring in Battle-Abbey-roll (c), though that roll is of little authority. The first of this line in England, was Walter de Windfor, so called from his being Castellan or Governor of the castle of Windfor: He had two sons, William from whom the Lords Windfors are descended; and Gerald, from whom the Carews and Fitzgeralds. This Gerald was Castellan or Governor of the castle of Penbroke in Wales; and in great favour with King Henry I, who granted him the lordship of Mullesford in Berkshire (†). He married Nefta, daughter of Rees, Prince of South-Wales; whose dowry was the castle of Carew in those parts [B]. By this Lady he had three sons, William, Maurice, and David. David, the youngest, was Bishop of St David's. From Maurice Fitz-gerald, the second son, are issued the noble families of Kildare and Desmond in Ireland. William, the eldest, Lord of Carrio, had issue Raymond who died without issue, Otho, and others. Otho had issue William, the first that took the surname of de Carrio, or Carru (d). His successors, for some generations, were, William; Nicolas; William; Sir Nicolas, Knt; and Sir Nicolas, Baron of Carru and Mullesford, summoned by writ to Parliament, in the reign of King Edward I. This Sir Nicolas married the sister and heir of Sir John Peverel, of Weston-Peverel near Plymouth, by whom he had a large estate in those parts, as Weston-Peverel, Ashford-Peverel, Manhead, and other places. He had issue by this Lady four sons, Sir John, Thomas, Nicolas, and William. From Nicolas descended the family of Carew, of Beddington in Surrey. Sir John, the eldest son, married first, Eleanor, daughter and heir of Sir William Mohun of Mohun's-Ottery, Knt. by whom he had Nicolas: he married, to his second wife, Joan daughter of Gilbert Lord Talbot, by which he had Sir John, to whom his brother Nicolas, dying without issue, left his estate (e). On this Sir John I shall enlarge a little in the next article

(a) Westcot's Description of Devonshire in Birklegh. MS. cited by Mr Prince, Worthies of Devonsh. &c. Exeter, 1701, p. 148.

(b) R. Carew, Survey of Cornwall, edit. 1602, 4to, p. 103, B. ii.

(c) Stow's Annals, edit. 1631, fol. p. 105.

(†) Camden's Britannia, edit. 1722, Vol. I. col. 165.

(d) Prince, Worthies, ubi supra, p. 149.

(e) Ibid.

[A] Others, with more probability, derive it from France.] Particularly Richard Carew, Esq; in the place cited above, speaks thus:

Carew, of ancient, Carru was;

And Carru is a plow †:

Romans the trade, Frenchmen the word;

I do the name avow.

(†) Viz. in old French; for the present French word in Charuë.

[B] Whose dowry was the castle of Carew in those parts.] This castle stands in Penbrokeshire; and either gave name to, or took it's name from, the family of Carew Which of the two it was, cannot easily be determined at this distance of time Mr Camden inclines to the latter opinion (1), and affirms, that it gave both name and original to the illustrious family of Carew. So doth also Mr Wood (2), A Carew castro in agro Pembrockiensis Cognomen sortitus est. viz. Georgius Carew. i. e. He took his surname from Carew castle in Penbrokeshire.

(1) Britan. edit. 1722, fol. Vol. II. col. 754.

(2) Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 63.

C A R E W (Sir JOHN) Knt. Baron of Carew and Mullersford, was born at Mohun's-Ottery, so called from it's Lords the Mohuns (a); and which passed unto the Carews in the manner abovementioned. He was a great soldier, and valiantly served King Edward III. in his wars in France (b). Very probably, he was present at the ever-memorable battle of Cressy; in which was slain his brave son, Sir John Carew, whose courage and conduct had preferred him to the honour of Knighthood (c). In the year 1348, John, Baron of Carew, was appointed Lord-Deputy of Ireland, and after having continued in that honourable post about two years, returned to England (d). He died May the 16th, 1363 (e). Besides his son, who was slain as is above related, he had another named Leonard, who had issue Sir Thomas Carew, of whom in the next article.

(d) Campion's Hist. of Ireland, Dublin, fol. 1633, p. 90.

(e) Sir W. Pole, under the head F. Soldiers, MS. in Prince, ubi supra, p. 149, 150.

C A R E W (Sir THOMAS). This Sir Thomas was also a brave soldier. He had the charge of the navy, and three thousand English soldiers committed to him, for securing the Emperor Sigismund, during his abode in England (a). In the beginning of the reign of King Henry V. he valiantly served that heroic Prince in his wars in France, and was undoubtedly at the battle of Agincourt (b). In the year 1418, he was appointed to keep and defend the passage over the river Seine, and was made Captain of Harfleur (c). He died January 25, 1430-1, leaving issue Sir Nicolas, Baron Carew: who married Joan, daughter of Sir Hugh Courtenay of Haccombe, Knight, by Philippa his wife, daughter, and one of the heirs of Sir Warren Ercecon, or Archdeacon (d), of that place, Knight. Sir Nicolas had, by his said Lady Joan, these sons; Sir Thomas, Knight, Nicolas, Hugh, Alexander (e). Sir Thomas happening to disoblige his mother in a very high degree, she settled seventeen manors on her younger sons, which proved the foundation of three great families, that have flourished ever since. Haccombe [A], with four manors, she settled on Nicolas, her second son, to whom fell, by entail, the third brother's inheritance. To Hugh, she gave Biry, from whom is descended Carew of Stodelegb. And to Alexander she gave Anthony in Cornwall (f). Sir Thomas abovementioned, was the father of Sir Nicolas Carew; who married Margaret, eldest daughter of Sir John Dinham, Knight, sister and one of the heirs of John, Lord Dinham of Nutwel in Devonshire, Lord High-Treasurer of England; and left issue, Sir Edmund Carew, Knight (g), who was a brave soldier. Among other children, he had Thomas Carew, of whom in the next article.

(a) Rifdon, ubi supra.

(b) Prince, ubi supra, p. 150.

(c) Sir W. Pole, ubi supra, as cited by Mr Prince, p. 150.

(d) Or Lerchdeckne; as he is called elsewhere by Mr Prince, p. 178.

(e) Prince, p. 150, 178.

(f) Prince, p. 178. See also Camden's Britannia in Devonshire.

(g) Prince, p. 150.

[A] Haccombe.] Mr Prince informs us (1), That, as to number of dwellings, this parish of Haccombe is the smallest in England; consisting but of two dwellings, the Mansion or Manor-house, and the Parsonage. But it enjoys privileges beyond the greatest: for it is out of any hundred, and beyond the precincts of any officer, civil or military, to take cognizance of any proceedings therein. And, by a royal grant from the Crown, is exempted from all duties and taxes, for some noble services done by some of the ancestors of this family, towards its support. The Rector of that Church hath also great privileges; namely, a fine-cure in Cornwall of good value; and, as Rector of Haccombe, he is Archpriest; and, it is said, may claim the privilege of wearing lawn-sleeves, and of sitting next the Bishop; and is under the visitation only of the Archbishop of Canterbury.

C A R E W (THOMAS), his second son; and the first of the name of Carew, who settled at Bicklegh, in the County of Devon (a). He was born at Mohuns-Ottery, and became possessed of Bicklegh, by marrying the only daughter and heir of Humphrey Courtenay, Esquire [A]. He was, like his father, a person of a martial spirit, and got great honour and renown in the wars. In the year 1513, he attended Thomas, Earl of Surrey in his expedition against Scotland; and was at the battle of Floddenfield, fought the ninth of September the same year, wherein the Scots were defeated, and their King James IV. slain (b). Before this battle, a Scottish Knight, having made a challenge to any English gentleman to fight with him for the honour of his country, Mr Carew desired to answer the challenge (c), and conquered this bragging adversary; which brought him into great favour with his General, the Earl of Surrey. But, after the battle, he had another opportunity of gaining further his esteem and affection. For his Lordship taking Mr Carew along with him, as he rode out upon service, desired a band of Scots coming towards them. Having a very strait passage over a bridge to cross, the Earl was in great danger of being there entrapped and taken. To prevent that, Carew persuaded him to exchange armour and dress with him, that he might, if occasion were, make his escape the more easily, which the General readily consented to. The enemy coming on to this narrow pass, Mr Carew, in his rich habit, well mounted, crossed the bridge with his horse; and for a time so valiantly defended it, that no man could pass; by which means he gained time, and provided for his General's escape. However, Mr Carew himself was at last taken prisoner to the great joy of the enemy, who imagined they had taken the General himself. But finding themselves disappointed, they carried him

(a) Prince, p. 176.

(b) Buchanan in James IV. Hollingsted's Chron. ed. 1587, p. 825, &c. Prince, ubi supra, p. 177.

(c) Westc. Surv. of Devon, in Bicklegh, MS. cited by Mr Prince, ubi supra, p. 177.

[A] He became possessed of Bicklegh, by marrying the only daughter and heir of Humphrey Courtenay, Esq; Bicklegh was formerly the inheritance of the honourable family of the Courtenays of Powderham-castle (1), and used to be a portion for a younger son of that house. At length it came to be settled upon Humphrey, the youngest son of Sir Philip Courtenay; which Humphrey dying before his father, left his only daughter and heir under Sir Philip's care. Sir Philip intrusted her to Sir William Carew (eldest brother to this Thomas whom we are now about) who had married his eldest son's daughter, cousin-german to this Lady. Mr Thomas

(1) Worthies of Devon, ubi supra, p. 178.

(1) Sir W. Pole's script. of Devon, in Bicklegh.

him to the Castle of Dunbar, where he remained a prisoner for some time. At length he was redeemed, and the Earl of Surrey never forgot the noble services he had done him, but entertained him, ever after, with all courtesy and friendship; made him his Vice-Admiral, and assisted him in all his affairs (d). The time of this Mr Carew's death is unknown (e). He out-lived his first wife, the heir of Courtenay, who settled on him and his heirs for ever, all her estate (f). For his second wife, he had the daughter of ——— Smart, by whom he had issue, Humphrey Carew, Esquire. He left a son, named Peter, who, by the daughter of George Cary of Clovelly, Esq; had issue, Sir Henry Carew, the last heir male of this line. He married one of the daughters of Sir Reginald Mohun of Cornwall, Knight, by whom he had issue, two daughters and heirs; the eldest of which was married to Sir Thomas Carew of Haccombe, Baronet, and so these two houses of Bicklegb and Haccombe came to be united (g). This honourable family hath flourished in those parts ever since.

Thomas Carew living with his brother, became very familiar with this young fortune, courted her, and having obtained her good will, carried her away secretly by night, and married her. This being highly resented by Sir Philip, the young Lady's grandfather, and also by Sir William, Mr Thomas Carew's brother, Mr Carew, to avoid the effects of their indignation, and to give them time to cool, resolved to go into the wars; and so entered himself into the army, that was then preparing to march against the Scots (2).

C (2) Prince, ubi supra, p. 176, 177.

CAREW (GEORGE), afterwards Earl of Totnes, (descended from an ancient family in the West of England, originally so named from Carew-Castle (a) in Penbrokeshire) was born in 1557 (b). His mother was Anne, daughter of Sir Nicolas Harvey, Knight (c), and his father, George, Archdeacon of Totnes, and successively Dean of Bristol, of the Queen's Chapel, of Windsor, of Christ-Church Oxon, and of Exeter; besides several other preferments (d), most of which he resigned before his decease. Mr George Carew, in 1572, at the age of fifteen, was admitted Gentleman Commoner of Broadgate-Hall (now Penbroke-College) in Oxford; where he made a good proficiency in learning, particularly in the study of Antiquities (e). But being of an active temper, he left the University without a degree; and applying himself to military affairs, went and served in Ireland against the Earl of Desmond (f). In the year 1580, he was made Governor of Asketten-Castle (g). In 1589, he was created Master of Arts at Oxford, being then a Knight (h). And, some time after being constituted Lieutenant-General of the Artillery, or Master of the Ordnance in Ireland, he was one of the Commanders at the expedition to Cadiz, in 1596. And again, the next year, in the intended expedition against Spain (i). Having in 1599, been appointed President of Munster (k), he was in 1600, made Treasurer of the army, and one of the Lords Justices of Ireland (l). When he entered upon his government, he found every thing in a deplorable condition; and all the country being in open and actual rebellion, except a few of the better sort, and himself having for his defence but three thousand foot and two hundred and fifty horse. However, he behaved with so much conduct and bravery, that he reduced to the Queen's obedience the Castles and Forts of Loghguyre, Cahir, Ballitarsnie, Crome, Clyn, Carrigfoyle, Lixnaw, Rathowin, Tralee, Mayne, Ardart, Listoell, Dingle, &c. Took James Fitz Thomas, the titular Earl of Desmond, and Oconner, prisoners: and brought the Bourkes, Obriens, and many other Irish rebels, to submission (m). He did also very good service against those six thousand Spaniards, who landed at Kinsale, October 1, 1601, and had so well established the province of which he was President, by apprehending the chief of those he mistrusted, and taking pledges of the rest, that not any one person of consideration joined the Spaniards (n). In 1602, he made himself Master of the Castle of Donboy, which was a very difficult undertaking, and reckoned almost impracticable. But the taking of it was of great consequence, for it stopped the coming of an army of Spaniards, which were ready to sail for Ireland (o). He had for some time been desirous of quitting his burthensome office of President of Munster [A], but he could not obtain permission to do it 'till the beginning of the year 1603, when, leaving that province in a firm and universal peace, he arrived in England the 21st of March, three days before his mistress, Queen Elizabeth's death (p). His merit was so great, that he was taken notice of by the new King, and made by him, in the first year of his reign, Governor of the Isle of Guernsey, and Castle Cornet (q). And having married Joyce, the daughter and heir of William Clopton of Clopton, in the county of Warwick, Esq; he was, on the 4th of June 1605, advanced to the degree of a Baron, by the title of Lord Carew of Clopton (r). Afterwards he was made Vice-Chamberlain and Treasurer to King James's Queen; and in 1608, constituted Master of the Ordnance throughout England for life; and sworn of the Privy-Council to the King, as he had before been to Queen Elizabeth (s). Upon King Charles Ist's accession to the Crown, he was by him created, on February 1, 1625, Earl of Totnes. At length, being full of years

(a) Dugdale's Baron. Vol. II. p. 423, col. 1.

(b) See Wood's Athenæ Oxon. Vol. II. col. 529. He was entered in the University in 1572, aged 15.

(c) Dugdale, ibid.

(d) Wood, ubi supra, Fasti, col. 12, and Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. p. 254.

George Carew, who is the subject of this article, was his second son. Prince, Worthies of Devon. Exon. 1701, p. 204.

(e) See Life of W. Camden.

(f) Camden's Annal. Eliz. ad ann. 1579.

(g) Ibid. ad ann. 1580.

(h) Wood, ubi supra.

(i) Camden, Ann. under those years. Stow, p. 772, 783.

(k) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, Part. I. p. 425. Pacata Hibernia, p. 3.

(l) Camden, ad ann. 1600.

(m) Pacata Hibernia.

(n) Ibid. p. 197.

(o) Ibid. p. 291, 327.

(p) Ibid. p. 390. This shews A. Wood's mistake, who says that he was called home, after King James came to the crown, Vol. I. col. 529.

(q) Dugdale, ubi supra, p. 423.

(r) Ibid.

(s) Ibid. and Wood, ubi supra.

[A] He had been ——— desirous of quitting his ——— office of President. As appears from the following passages in a letter of his to the Queen, dated June 3, 1601. ——— 'I live like one lost to himself, and wither out my days in torment of mind, until it shall please your Sacred Majesty to redem me from this exile,

' which I doe humbly beseech your Majestie to com-
' miserate, and to shorten the same as speedily as may ' be, ——— for better than a banishment I cannot ' esteeme my fortune, that deprives me from behold-
' ing your Majesty's person ——— (1).'

(1) Pacata Hibern. p. 141.

years and honours, he departed this life at the Savoy in London, March 27, 1629, aged seventy-three years and ten months; and was buried at Stratford upon Avon, near Clopton abovementioned: leaving behind him the character (t) of a faithful Subject, a valiant and prudent Commander, an honest Counsellor, a genteel Scholar, a lover of Antiquities, and a great Patron of Learning [B]. A stately monument was erected to his memory, by his widow (u), with a long inscription reciting his actions abovementioned.

[B] A lover of Antiquities, &c. He writ, or caused to be writ under his direction and appointment, a book entituled, Pacata Hibernia, or The History of the Wars in Ireland, especially within the province of Mounster, in the years 1599, 1600, 1601, and 1602. Which, after his death, was printed at London, in 1631, fol. with seventeen maps; being published by his natural son, Thomas Stafford. — Sir George Carew collected also, in four large volumes, several Chronologies, Charters, Letters, Monuments, Maps, &c. relating to Ireland; which are preserved in the Bodleian library. — And made Collections, Notes, and Extracts, for writing The History of the reign of King Henry V. which were inserted in J. Speed's Chronicle (2).

(u) See the figure of it in Dugdale's Antiq. of Warwickshire, edit. 1730, Vol. II. p. 686, 687.

(2) Wood, ubi supra. Dugdale's Baron. Vol. II. p. 423.

CAREW (Sir ALEXANDER) of Anthony in Cornwall, beheaded for endeavouring to deliver Plymouth to King Charles I, was born at Anthony. He had a very good education (a); and being a gentleman of a considerable fortune, was chosen one of the Knights for the county of Cornwall, in the Parliament, which met at Westminster, November 3, 1640 (b). In this Parliament he sided with those members who opposed the Court-measures; and was one of the most violent amongst them (c): and afterwards very active in settling the militia in Cornwall (d). He voted for the Earl of Strafford's attainder, in 1641, tho' he was pressed to the contrary by Sir Bevil Greenville [A], the other Knight of the shire for Cornwall (e). When Plymouth was secured by the Parliament, Mr Carew was intrusted with the custody and government of St Nicolas's island and fort, which command the harbour, and were looked upon as the security of the town, especially as they had a sufficient garrison (f). But after the battle of Stratton, when the forces of King Charles I. prevailed so far over the West, that Bristol was taken by them, and Exeter closely besieged, Sir Alexander Carew [B] began to think, his island and fort would hardly secure his own estate in Cornwall; and understood the law so well, as to know, that the side he had chosen, would be no longer the better, than it should continue the stronger: and having originally followed no other motives, than of popularity and interest, resolved now to redeem his errors. So, he found means to correspond with some of his old friends and neighbours in Cornwall, and by them to make a direct overture to surrender that fort and island to the King, upon the assurance of his Majesty's pardon, and a full remission of his offences (g). Sir John Berkley, who then lay before Exeter, what the next supreme officer, qualified to entertain such a treaty; and he, instantly, by the same conveyance, returned him as ample assurance of his own conditions as could be; with advice, That he should not upon any defect of forms (which, upon his engagement, should be supplied with all possible expedition, to his own satisfaction) defer consummating the work, which hereafter, possibly, might not be in his power to effect. But Sir Alexander was so careful of his own security, that he would not proceed, till he was sufficiently assured, that his pardon was passed the great seal. Before which time, though all imaginable haste was made, by the treachery of a fervant whom he trusted (h), or else by his own foldiers (i), his treaty and design were discovered to the Mayor of Plymouth, and the rest of the Committee there: whereupon, he was suddenly, and without resistance, surprized in his fort, and carried prisoner to Plymouth (k); in which place the women were so enraged with him, that it was difficult to rescue him from their execution (l). From Plymouth he was sent by sea to London (m); where the House of Commons voted him disabled from being a member (n): and being tried at Guildhall, by a Court Martial (o), or Council of War (p) [C], he was beheaded on Tower-hill, the twenty-third day of December, 1644 (q); on purpose to deter others from attempts of the like nature.

[A] Tho' he was pressed to the contrary by Sir Bevil Greenville. Who sat next to him in the house; and thus spoke to him: 'Pray, Sir, let it never be said, that any member of our county should have a hand in this fatal business; and therefore, pray ye, give your vote against the bill.' But Mr Carew instantly replied, 'If I were sure to be the next man that should suffer upon the same scaffold, with the same ax, I would give my consent to the passing of it.' And it seems he was afterwards beheaded with the same ax (1). But this, tho' related as something wonderful, was really but accidental. And it shows the sincerity of Mr Carew, however mistaken he might be.

[B] Sir Alexander Carew, &c. He is named in Br. Willis (2), only Alexander Carew, Esq; and by Whitelocke (3), Mr Carew. But Sir by William Dugdale, and Sir Roger Manley (4), he is named from the first, Sir Alexander Carew, even when he voted against the Earl of Strafford. So great is the negligence and inaccuracy of Historians! His father, Richard Carew, Esq; was created a Baronet, August 9, 1641 (5), and in all likelihood was dead before 1644. For then Mr Whitelocke (6) styles the person whom we are speaking of, Sir Alexander Carew; as doth also the Earl of Clarendon.

[C] Being tried by a Court-Martial, &c. After he was condemned, his Lady petitioned the Parliament, alledging, That he was distracted and unfit to die, and prayed a reprieve for him, which was granted (7).

(h) Ibid.

(i) Dugdale, ubi supra.

(j) Ibid. Whitelocke, p. 121. Memorable Occurrences in 1644, at the end of Mercurius Rusticus.

(k) Memorials, edit. 1732, p. 72.

(l) Ubi supra.

(m) See List of Baronets in several authors.

(n) Ubi supra, p. 112, 114.

(o) Whitelocke, p. 114.

CAREW (THOMAS) a celebrated Poet of the last Century, famed, as Anthony Wood expresses it (a), for the charming sweetness of his Lyric odes and amorous sonnets, was younger brother of Sir Matthew Carew, a great Royalist in the time of the great Rebellion, of the family of the Carews in Gloucestershire, but descended from the ancient family of that name in Devonshire. The year of his birth is not known. He had his academical education at Corpus-Christi College in Oxford, but was not matriculated as a member of that house, nor took any degree. Afterwards improving his parts by travelling, and conversation with men of learning and ingenuity at London, he became reckoned among the chiefest of his time for delicacy of wit and poetic fancy. His abilities recommending him to the Court, he was made Gentleman of the privy chamber, and Sewer in ordinary to his Majesty King Charles I, who always esteemed him as one of the most celebrated wits of his Court. He was much respected, if not adored, by the Poets of his time, particularly Ben Johnson and Sir William Davenant [A]. This ingenious gentleman died in the prime of his life, about the year 1639, leaving behind him several poems, and a masque called Cælum Britannicum [B].

[A] He was much respected, if not adored, by the poets of his time, particularly Ben Johnson and Sir William Davenant.] Sir William addressed some fanzas to Mr Carew, celebrating his wit and talent in poetry, among which are these lines (1):

Not but thy verses are as smooth and high
As glory, love, and wine from wit can rise;
But now the devil take such destiny!
What shou'd commend them turns to their dis-praise.

Thy wit's chief virtue is become it's vice;
For ev'ry beauty thou hast raised so high,
That now coarse faces carry such a price,
As must undo a lover that wou'd buy.

Sir John Suckling, that gay wit, who delighted to rally the best poets, and spared not Ben Johnson himself, has thus played upon our author in his Session of the Poets (2).

Tom Carew was next, but he had a fault,
That wou'd not well stand with a Laureat:
His muse was hide-bound, and issue of's brain
Was seldom brought forth, but with labour and pain.

All that were there present did agree,
That a Laureat Muse should be easy and free;
Yet sure 'twas not that; but 'twas thought that his Grace
Consider'd he was well, he had a cup-bearer's place.

[B] Several poems, with a masque called Cælum Britannicum.] They have been several times re-printed, the fourth edition being in 8vo Lond. 1670. The masque was performed at Whitehall on Shrove-tuesday night, the 18th of February 1633, by the King's Majesty, the Duke of Lenox, the Earls of Devonshire, Holland, Newport, &c. with several other young Lords and Noblemens sons. Mr Carew was assisted in the contrivance by Mr Inigo Jones, the famous Architect; and all the songs were set to musick by the celebrated Mr Henry Lawes, Gentleman of the King's Chapel, and one of the private musick to King Charles I. As this piece was written by the King's especial command, our author put this distich in the front, when printed:

Non habet ingenium; Cæsar sed fuffit; habebō:
Cur me possē negem, possē quod ille putat?

This masque was formerly, through a mistake, ascribed to Sir William Davenant, and is therefore not mentioned, either by Mr Phillips or Mr Wintanley in their Lives of the Poets (3).

(3) Langbaine, ubi supra, p. 44.

CARLETON (GEORGE) a learned Bishop in the XVIIth Century, son of Guy, second son of Thomas Carleton, of Carleton-hall in Cumberland (a), was born at Norham in Northumberland, of whose important castle his father was then Governor (b). By the care of the most eminent Bernard Gilpin, stiled the northern Apostle, he was educated in Grammar-learning; and, when fit for the University, sent by the same generous person to Edmund-Hall in Oxford, in the beginning of the year 1576, by whose liberal hand he was encouraged and chiefly maintained in his studies (c). On the 12th of February 1579-80, he took his degree of Bachelor of Arts; at the completing of which, he exceeded all that performed their exercises, at that time (d). The same year, namely 1580, he was elected probationer Fellow of Merton-College, and remained in that Society about five years before he proceeded in his faculty, not taking the degree of Master of Arts, 'till June the 14th, 1585 (e). While he remained in that College he was esteemed a great Orator and Poet; and in process of time became a better disputant in Divinity, than he had before been in Philosophy (f). What preferments he had is not mentioned any where; nor doth it appear that he was possessed of any dignity in the Church, 'till he became a Bishop (g). After having continued many years in the University (b), and taken the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, May 16, 1594 (i), and that of Doctor, December 1, 1613 (k), he was advanced to the Bishoprick of Landaff; to which he was elected, December 23, 1617, confirmed July 11, 1618, and consecrated at Lambeth the next day (l). The same year he was sent, by King James I, with three other English Divines (m), and one from Scotland (n), to the Synod of Dort; where he stood up in favour of Episcopacy [A], and behaved so well in every respect, to the credit

[A] He stood up, at the synod of Dort, in favour of Episcopacy.] For, it being asserted in that synod (1), 'That the Ministers of the word of God, in what place soever settled, have the same advantage of character, the same jurisdiction and authority, in regard they are all equally Ministers of Christ, the only universal Bishop, and head of the Church.' In opposition to that, Bishop Carleton made the following protestation. — 'That, whereas in the Confession there was inserted a strange conceit of the parity of Ministers to be instituted by Christ, I declared our dissent utterly in that point. I shewed, that by Christ's parity was never instituted in the Church: That he ordained twelve Apostles, as also seventy Disciples: That the authority of the Twelve was above the other: That the Church preserved this order, left by our

(a) Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 630.

(1) See Langbaine's Account of the Dramatick Poets, Oxf. 1691, p. 45.

(2) See Sir John Suckling's Poems, p. 8.

(a) Wood Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. I. col. 517.

He was born in 1559, as being 17 years old in 1576. Ibid.

(b) Ibid. Camden's Britan. in Northumberland, edit. 1722. Vol. II. col. 1099. Fuller's Church History, B. xi. p. 131.

(c) Wood, ibid.

(d) Ibid. and Fasti, Vol. I. col. 118.

(e) Ibid. Athen. and Fasti, col. 128.

(f) Athen. ubi supra, col. 517.

(g) His name no where occurs in J. Le Neve's Fasti, Br. Willis's Surveys, Newcourt, nor any such authors.

(1) Sess. CXLIV. Art. 31.

(b) Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

(c) Idem Fasti, Vol. I. col. 148.

(d) Ibid. col. 195.

(e) Fasti Ecclesie Anglicane, by J. Le Neve, edit. 1716. p. 522. Stow's Annales, edit. 1631, p. 1029.

(f) Viz. Joseph Hall, afterwards Bishop of Exeter, and then of Norwich; John Davenant, afterwards Bishop of Sarum; and Samuel Ward, Master of Sidney-college, Cambr. Fuller's Church Hist. Book x. p. 77. and Collier's Eccl. Hist. Vol. II. edit. 1714, p. 716.

(g) Namely, Dr Walter Balcanquhall, afterward Dean of Durham, Ibid.

credit of our nation; that after his return, he was, upon the translation of Dr Harfnet (or Hafnoth) to Norwich, elected to succeed him in the See of Chichester, September 8, 1619, and confirmed the 20th of the same month (o). He was a man of considerable learning, and writ several books, of which we shall give an account in the note [B] Having at length arrived to the age of sixty-nine, he departed this life in May 1628; and was buried, the 27th of that month, in the choir of his Cathedral Church at Chichester, near the altar (p). He was a person of solid judgment, and of various reading; well versed in the Fathers and Schoolmen; wanting nothing that could render him a compleat Divine. But withal, he was a bitter enemy to the Papists, and in the point of Predestination a rigid Calvinist (q). 'I have loved him, says Mr Camden (r), for his excellent proficiency in Divinity, and other polite parts of learning.' A valuable character, coming from so great a man!

(o) J. Le Neve ubi supra, p. 59.
Wood, Athen. ubi supra.

(p) Wood, Ath. Vol. I. col. 519.

(q) Idem, col. 517, 518.

(r) Britannia, ubi supra.

'our Saviour. And therefore, when the extraordinary power of the Apostles ceased, yet this ordinary authority continued in Bishops, who succeeded them, who were by the Apostles left in the government of the Church, to ordain Ministers, and to see that they who were so ordained should preach no other doctrine: That in an inferior degree the Ministers, who were governed by Bishops, succeeded the seventy Disciples: That this order hath been maintained in the Church from the times of the Apostles. And herein I appeald to the judgment of Antiquity, and to the judgment of any learned man now living (2).—At this learned Bishop's return to England, the States sent a letter to King James, wherein they highly extolled him, and the rest of the Divines, for their virtue, learning, piety, and ardent desire of peace. In Theologis porro utriusque Regni vestri omnibus, & singulis, quorum agmen ducit vere Reverendissimus Dominus Georgius Landavensis Episcopus, imago, atque expressa virtutis effigies; eam eruditionem, pietatem, pacis studium, eumque zelum deprehendimus, ut, cum ipsius beneficii causa Majestati Tue multum debeamus, magna pars ipsius beneficii nobis videatur, [q. debeatur] quod ipsi ad nos missi sunt (3).

[B] He writ several books, &c.] Which are as follow: I. Heroici characteres, ad illustriss. equitem Henricum Nevillum; i. e. Heroic characters, addressed to Sir Henry Nevil. Oxon. 1603, 4to. Several of his Latin verses are also in the Univerity-book of verses made on the death of Sir Philip Sidney, in Bodleionnema, and in other books. II. 'Tithes examined, and proved to be due to the Clergy by a Divine Right.' Lond. 1606, and 1611, 4to. III. 'Jurisdiction Regal, Episcopall, Papal: Wherein is declared how the Pope hath intruded upon the jurisdiction of Temporal Princes, and of the Church, &c.' Lond. 1610, 4to. IV. Consensus Ecclesie Catholice contra Tridentinos, de Scripturis, Ecclesie, fide, & gratia, &c. i. e. The consent of the universal Church against the Council of Trent, on the Scriptures, the Church, Faith, &c. Lond. 1613, 8vo. Dedicated to the members of Merton-College. V. 'A thankfull Remembrance of God's Mercy. In an Historically Collection of the great and mercifull Deliverances of the Church and State of England, since the Gospel beganne here to flourish, from the beginning of Queene Elizabeth.' Lond. 1614; the third edition came out, in 1627; and the fourth, in 1630. It contains, a thankful enumeration of the several deliverances of this Church and State, from the cruel plots of the Papists; from the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign to the Powder-treason, in 1605. The historical part is chiefly extracted from Camden's Annals of Queen Elizabeth: and the book is adorned, at the beginning of each chapter, with figures engraved in copper, representing the most material things contained in the ensuing description. VI. 'Short Directions to know the true Chureh.' Lond 1615, &c. 12mo. VII. 'Oration made at the Hague before the Prince of Orange, and the Assembly of the High and Mighty Lords, the States General.' Lond. 1619, in one sheet and a half, 4to. VIII. Astrologimania: or, the Madnes of Astrologers: or, an Examination of Sir Christopher Heydon's Book, entitled, A Defence of judiciary Astrology. Written about the year 1604, and published at London 1624, 4to. By Thomas Vicars, B D. who had married the author's daughter. It was reprinted at London 1651 (4). IX. 'Examination of those things, wherein the Author of the late Appeal (5) holdeth the Doctrine of Pelagians and Arminians, to be the Doctrines of the Church of England.' Lond. 1626, and 1636, 4to. X. 'A joynt Attestation avowing, that the Discipline of the Church of England was not impeached by the Synod of Dort.' Lond. 1626, 4to. XI. Vita Bernardi Gilpini, viri sanctiss. famaue apud Anglos aquilonares celeberrimi Lond. 1628, 4to. inserted in Dr W. Bates's collection of Lives. Lond. 1681, 4to. It was also published in English, under this title, 'The Life of Bernard Gilpin, a man most holy and renowned among the Northern English.' Lond. 1629, 4to. and 1636, 8vo. XII. 'Testimony concerning the Presbyterian Discipline in the Low-Countries, and Episcopall government in England.' Printed several times in 4to and 8vo. and at London in particular, in 1642, in one sheet. XIII. Latin Letter to Mr Camden, containing some Notes and Observations on his Britannia. Printed by Dr T. Smith, amongst Camdeni Epistolae. No. 80. XIV. Several Sermons. XV. He had also a hand in the Dutch Annotations, and in the new translation of the Bible, undertaken by order of the Synod of Dort, but not completed and published, till 1637 (6) Dr Fuller observes, That his good affections appears in his treatise, intitled, A thankfull Remembrance of God's Mercy; solid Judgment in his Confutation of judicial Astrology; and clear Invention in other juvenile Exercises (7).

(4) See below in the article of CHAMBERBER (JOHN).

(5) Viz. Rich. Montague, author of Appello Casarem, and afterwards Bishop of Chichester.

(6) Wood, Ath. Vol. I. col. 518, 519.

(7) Worthies of England, in Northumberland, p. 305.

(2) Collier's Eccel. Hist. ubi supra, p. 717.

(3) Fuller's Ch. Hist. Book x. p. 83, 84.

(a) Hist. of the Rebellion, &c. by the Earl of Clarendon, edit. Oxford, 1732, in six Vols 8vo, Part. i. p. 64.

(b) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 453, and Wood, Athen. edit. 1721, Vol. I. col. 563.

(c) Wood, ibid. Fuller's, Worthies, in Oxfordshire, p. 334.

(d) Clarendon, ubi supra.

(e) Wood, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 349.

(f) Chrendon, ib. (g) Wood, ibid. col. 158.

(h) Memorials of Affairs of State, collected from Sir R. I. Winwood's Papers, Lond. 1725, fol. Vol. II. p. 54.

(i) Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

(1) Dated Jan. 1604, from London,

CARLETON (DUDLEY) afterwards knighted, and created Baron and Viscount, was a younger son (a) of Anthony Carleton of Baldwin-Brightwell in Oxfordshire, Esq; and born in that place the 10th of March 1573 (b). He received his education in Christ-Church College Oxon, of which he became a Student about the year 1591 (c), being a young man of parts, and towardly expectation (d). Having taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts, on the 2d of July 1595 (e), he went and travelled beyond sea for his improvement, and became Secretary to Sir Henry Neville, Embassador in France (f). At his return, on the 12th of July 1600, he was created Master of Arts (g). Soon after he came to Court, where he seems to have had a place of Gentleman-Usher quarterly-waiter [A]. He was also one of the Members of the Parliament which met at Westminster, March 19, 1603-4, wherein he made himself much known (h). We are told (i), that he was Secretary to Sir Ralph Winwood, Embassador in the Low-Countries; but [A] A place of Gentleman-Usher quarterly-waiter.] This I infer from the following passage, in a letter of his to Mr Winwood (1),— 'In Mr Chamberlain's absence, I come in quarter, and have waited so diligently at Court this Christmas, that I have matter enough, if the report of masks and mummings can please you (2).'

wood's Papers, &c. published by Edm. Sawyer, Lond. 1725, fol. [B] He

(2) Memorials of Affairs of State, &c. chiefly from Sir Ralph Winwood's Papers, Lond. 1725, fol. Vol. II. p. 43.

(k) Memorials, &c. as above, p. 54, 57.

(l) Memorials, &c. as above, Vol. III. p. 6.

(m) Dugdale and Wood, ubi supra; ex lib. certific. in Offic. Armor.

(n) Memorials, &c. as above, Vol. III. p. 200.

(o) Ibid. and p. 213.

(p) Wood, Ath. and Lord Clarendon, ubi supra.

(q) Wood, ubi supra.

(r) The Hist. of the Worthies of England, by T. Fuller, in Oxfordshire, p. 334.

(s) Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

(t) Bishop Burnet's Hist. of his own Time edit. 1724. Vol. I. p. 12.

(u) Wood, ubi supra.

but that is not so certain, as that he attended the Lord Norris into Spain (k), in the year 1605, upon very advantageous conditions. After that, he was for some time out of employment; and in 1609, came and settled in London [B], in order to set himself forward in the world, and keep himself in fight (l), that he might not slip out of the minds of those who could promote him. In 1610, June 25, he was knighted by King James I. at Windsor (m), and had an employment given him in Ireland. His journey thither was in that forwardness, that he had taken a house, and made his provisions at Dublin; but he was stopped upon a favourable consideration of the poorness of the place, and the small use there would be had of his service. Shortly after, he was appointed Embassador at Brussels, and so near his dispatch, that his Privy-Seal was drawn, and an hour appointed for his taking leave of the King (n): but a reason of State stopped that voyage [C]. Thereupon, he was nominated Embassador to Venice, for which place he set out towards the end of August 1610 (o), and resided five years there with good reputation (p). From thence, he was sent Embassador extraordinary to Emmanuel, Duke of Savoy, in which station he continued half a year: and afterwards Embassador in ordinary to Holland, where he was resident ten years (q); during which period, he was employed in giving up the Cautionary towns to the Dutch (r), and was also very active and busy with relation to the Synod of Dort [D]. Towards the latter end of King James I, he was made Vice-Chamberlain of the Household, which office he holding in the reign of King Charles I, his commission was renewed by his Majesty for the latter part of those ten years that he was resident in Holland. This term being expired, he was sent Embassador extraordinary at two several times to Lewis XIII. King of France (s), and likewise Embassador Extraordinary to the United Provinces [E]. We are told (t), that he gave King James I. an important advice for his safety [F]. He was burges for Hastings in Suffex in the Parliament, that began June 18, 1625 (u), and was also made one of the Privy-Council (w). On the 22d of May 1626, King Charles I. created him Baron Carleton of Imbercourt in Surrey (x); and the next year, being accompanied by Sir William Seagar, Knight, then King at Arms, he went into Holland, and presented the Garter to Henry, Prince of Orange, with the Ensigns belonging to that most noble order. Upon the 25th of July 1628, he was created Viscount of Dorchester [G] in Oxfordshire: and the 18th of December following, in the room of the Lord Conway, was constituted one of his Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State (y). He died at his house in Westminster, February 15, 1631-2, and was buried in the Chapel of St Paul in Westminster-Abbey (z). Over his grave was soon after erected

(w) Clarendon, ubi supra, p. 65.

(x) He, and the Lords Mandeville and Grandison, were created Peers, in order to balance the Duke of Buckingham's enclines in the house of Lords. Lloyd's State Worthies, edit. 1679, p. 910.

(y) Wood; and Dugdale's Baronsage, ubi supra.

(z) Ibid. and Stow's Survey of London, with Strype's addit. edit. 1720. B. vi. p. 19. Vol. II.

[B] He came and settled in London.] Upon which occasion, he gave the following Account of himself to Sir Ralph Winwood 'You may well think, that unless I were under the protection of some little Saint, I would not so venturously set up for myself with such an army of difficulties, as a dear year, a plaguy town, a growing wife, and a poor purse. But of hard beginnings many times ensue good effects; and of the two parts of happiness which the Philosopher required in patrifamilias, the master of a family (that is quies & abundantia, quiet and plenty) the defects of the one are supplied with the overplus of the other.' In the same letter he complains, that he was afflicted with the stone (3).

(3) Memorials, &c. as above, Vol. III. p. 6.

(4) Ibid. p. 200.

[C] But a reason of State stopped that voyage.] Because, as the Archduke of Austria had first withdrawn his Embassador from England, it was therefore resolved he should first send (4).

[D] He was employed in giving up the Cautionary towns to the Dutch, and was also very active with relation to the Synod of Dort.] The towns here meant, were, the Brill in Holland, and the town of Flushing with the castle of Ramakins in Zealand; which the States had mortgaged, or given by way of caution, to Queen Elizabeth, in 1585, till they repaid her the sums she had advanced in maintaining five thousand foot, and a thousand horse, for their defence against the Spaniards (5). They continued in the hands of the English, till the year 1616, when King James, who was always in want of money, gave them up to the States for two hundred and forty-eight thousand pounds, instead of six millions, which they owed to the Crown of England, besides eighteen years interest at ten per Cent (6).—As to the Synod of Dort; the Earl of Clarendon, says (7), That Sir Dudley was not thought to be so equal a spectator, or assessor, as he ought to have been; but by the insinuations he made into King James, and by his own activity, he did all he could to discountenance the Arminians, and to raise the credit and authority of the Calvinists. His Chaplain at this place, was the ever memorable Mr John Hales of Eaton, who sent him an account of the Synod's transactions, by letters, printed in his Golden Remains.

(5) Conventions, Acta Publ. &c. published by T. Rymer, Vol. XV. p. 793, &c. Camden's Annals of Queen Elizabeth, under the year 1585.

(6) Detection of the Court and State of England, by R. Coke, Esq; edit. 1719, Vol. I. p. 89, 90. Rapin's Hist. edit. 1733, fol. Vol. II. p. 191.

(7) Part i. ubi supra, p. 65.

[E] He was Embassador Extraordinary to the United Provinces.] And the last who was admitted to be present and vote in the general Assembly of the States, under the character of Embassador; of which great privilege the Crown had been possessed ever since the treaty made between Queen Elizabeth and the States, in 1585 (8).

(8) Clarendon, lb.

[F] He gave King James an important advice for his safety.] When he came home from Spain, he found King James at Theobald's hunting in a very careless and unguarded manner: upon that, in order to put him on a more careful looking to himself, he told the King, he must either give over that way of hunting, or stop another hunting that he was engaged in, which was Priest-hunting: for he had intelligence in Spain, that the Priests were comforting themselves with this, That if he went on against them, they would soon get rid of him.—The King sent for him in private to enquire more particularly into this: And he saw it had made a great impression on him. But instead of making him leave off hunting, it occasioned his putting a stop to the prosecution against the Papists (9). Bishop Burnet is mistaken, when he affirms (10), that Sir Dudley Carleton had been Ambassador in Spain; for he never was so.

(9) Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, ubi supra, p. 12.

(10) Ibid.

[G] The 25th of July 1628, he was created Viscount Dorchester.] And through the Duke of Buckingham's interest, as the Lord Clarendon observes in the following words (11). 'The making him Secretary of State, and a Peer of the realm, when his estate was scarce visible, was the last piece of workman-ship the Duke of Buckingham lived to finish, who seldom satisfied himself with the conferring a single obligation.' It was probably after his being created a Viscount, That he proposed in Parliament the laying an Excise upon the nation: which was taken so heinously ill, that tho' he was a Privy-Counsellor, and Principal Secretary of State, he hardly escaped being committed to the Tower. So odious, as D. Lloyd remarks (12), was that Dutch Devil in King Charles; which was raised by the Parliament in 1643, with many more than were conjured up in three or four years, but not likely to be laid in three or four score.

(11) Ubi supra, p. 65.

(12) State Worthies, p. 912, 913.

[H] He

erected against the East wall, a well composed plain monument of black and white marble, having a half canopy supported by Doric pillars, with the image of a man in his robes of estate, and Viscount's Coronet, leaning on a pedestal, made of the like black and white marble. He writ several things, most of which have been published since his decease [H]. As to his character: he was a learned and ingenious man; master of several languages; an exact Statesman, acquainted with the intrigues of Courts, and with the Laws, Constitutions, and Manners of most States in Europe (a): he understood all that related to foreign employments, and the condition of other Princes and nations very well; but was unacquainted with the Government, Laws, and Customs of his own country, and the nature of the people (b). However, he behaved himself in all employments so well, becoming a man that understood so many languages, that was so well versed in ancient and modern History, that had composed so many choice pieces of Politicks, that was so well versed in the Mathematicks; and added to these a graceful and charming look, a gentle and a sweet elocution; that, notwithstanding his rigidness in some points, he continued to his dying day in great favour and most eminent service; and failed in nothing but his French embassy, because there he had to do with women (c). Together with his great abilities and capacity, he was just in his dealings, and on that account beloved by most men, who much missed him after his death (d).

(a) Wood, ubi supra, col. 563.

(b) Clarendon, ubi supra, p. 64.

(c) D. Lloyd's State Worthies, 2d edit. 1679, 8vo, p. 911, 912.

(d) Wood, ubi supra.

[H] He writ several things.] Viz. I. Balance, pour peser en toute equité & droicure la Harangue faite nagueres en l'assemblée des illustres & puissans Seigneurs, Messieurs les Etats generaux des Provinces Unies des Pais Bas, &c. i. e. A balance, or scales, to weigh justly the speech lately made before their High Mightinesses the States of the United Provinces, &c. Harangue faite au Conseil de Messieurs les Estates generaux des Provinces Unies, touchant le discord & les troubles de l'Eglise & la Police, causés par la doctrine d'Arminius, October 6, 1617, 4to. nov. i. e. A speech made in the Assembly of the United Provinces, concerning the troubles and differences in Church and State, occasioned by the doctrine of Arminius. Printed in 1618, 4to. II. Letters in Cabala, or Scrinia Sacra. p. 183, &c. edit. Lond. 1663, fol. III. Several French and Latin Letters to the learned Ger. Jo. Vossius, printed in Ger. Jo. Vossii & clarorum Virorum ad eum Epistolæ. Lond. 1690, fol. published by Paulus Colonæsius IV. Several Letters to Sir Ralph Winwood, printed in the three volumes of Memorials above-mentioned (13). V. Several Speeches in Parliament, in 1626. One of them is printed in the first volume of Rushworth's Collections, edit. 1659, p. 558, 359. In this speech he says, In his voyage to Venice, the ship he was in, struck thrice upon a sand. VI. Memoirs for dispatches of political affairs relating to Holland and England, in 1618, with several propositions made to the States, MS. VII. Particular Observations of the military Affairs in the Palatinate and the Low-Countries, in 1621 and 1622, MS VIII. Letters relating to State-Affairs, written to the King, and Viscount Rochester, from Venice, in 1613, MS (14).

(13) London, 1725.

(14) Wood, Ath. ubi supra, col. 564.

CARPENTER (RICHARD), a Divine and Poet of the last age, had his education at Eaton-College near Windsor, and from thence was elected Scholar of King's-College in Cambridge, in the year 1622: where continuing about three years, he afterwards went out of England, and studied in Flanders, Artois, France, Spain, and Italy; and at length received holy orders at Rome from the hands of the Pope's substitute. Soon after, having taken upon him the order of St Benedict, he was sent into England to make profelytes; in which employment having continued somewhat above a year, he returned to the Protestant Religion, and thro' the Archbishop of Canterbury's interest, obtained the small vicarage of Poling by the sea-side, near Arundel Castle, in Suffex. Here he was exposed to the insults and abuses of the Romish party, particularly one Francis à S. Clara, living in that neighbourhood under the name of Hunt, who would be very free with him, and expose him to scorn before his parishioners. In the time of the Civil War, he quitted his living, and retired to Paris, where, reconciling himself to the Romish Church, he made it his business to rail against the Protestants. Afterwards returning to England, he settled at Aylesbury in Buckinghamshire, where he had some relations; and, being once more a Protestant, he would often preach there in a very fantastical manner, to the great mirth of his auditors. He was living there in 1670; but, before his death, he returned a third time to Popery, causing his pretended wife to embrace that persuasion; and in that faith he died. He published some Sermons and a Comedy, called The Pragmatical Jesuit [A]. He was generally esteemed a man of the most fantastical character, one that changed his opinions as often as his cloaths, and, for his juggles and tricks in religion, a Theological Mountebank (a).

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 515, 516.

There

[A] Some Sermons, and a Comedy called The Pragmatical Jesuit.] His sermons are these following. I. The perfect Law of God, being a Sermon and no Sermon, preached and yet not preached. Printed in 1652, in 8vo. II. Astrology proved harmless, useful, pious; on Genes. i. 14. And let them be for signs. Lond. 1657, in 4to. Dedicated to Elias Ashmole. At the end of the Epistle Dedicatory is Richard Carpenter's picture, with a face looking towards him, out of the mouth of which issues a serpent, and out of the serpent's mouth fire. Underneath are written these words: Ricardus Carpenterus porcello cuidam Gerase-norum, sicut in omnia præcipiti, fluctibusque devoto, eidem porco loquaci pariter et minaci mendacique indicit silentium, et obmutescit. III. Rome in her fruits. Preached the 1st of November 1662, near the Standard in Cheapside; in answer to a Pamphlet intitled, Reasons why the Roman Catholics should not be persecuted.

Lond. 1663. 4to. on Matth. vii. 16. There is extant by the same author, a treatise intitled, Experience, History, and Divinity, in five books. Lond. 1642, in a thick octavo. Dedicated to the Parliament then sitting; with his picture before it. This book was republished in 1648, under the title of The Downfall of Antichrist. His comedy, called The Pragmatical Jesuit, came out after the Restoration. The picture before it represents him in a very genteel lay-habit; whereas that before his Experience, &c. exhibits him in the dress of a formal clergyman, with a mortified countenance (1). Mr Langbaine (2) speaks with some commendation of this play. He says 'it is very instructive, tending chiefly to morality, shewing the difference between true religion and hypocrisy; the author having made it his business to expose all the subtleties and inventions of the Romish Clergy to gain profelytes, and promote their religion.'

(1) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 515.

(2) Account of the Dramatick Poets, Lond. 1691, 8vo, p. 50.

[B] He

There was another RICHARD CARPENTER, a Divine, of a very different character from the above, and prior in order of time: he was a Cornish man, and became a Butler in Exeter-College in Oxford, in 1592, and four years after Fellow of that house, being then Bachelor of Arts. By the advice and direction of the Rector Dr Holland, he applied himself to Theological studies, and, in few years, proved a learned Divine, and an excellent Preacher. In 1611, he was admitted to the reading of the sentences; and about that time was made Rector of Sherwill, and of Loxhore adjoining, in Devonshire; and afterwards obtained the benefice of Ham near Sherwill. He died the 18th of December 1627, aged fifty-two, and was buried in the chancel of the Church of Loxhore (b) [B]. He published some Sermons [C]. Langbaine (c) confounds these two Carpenters [D].

(b) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 514.

(c) In his Account of the Dramatic Poets, Lond. 1691, 8vo, p. 50.

[B] He was buried in the chancel of the church of Loxhore.] Over his grave is a large epitaph in prose and verse, beginning thus: Richardus Carpenter S. Theol. D. ab eruditione multiplici venerandus, pietate vitæ, integritate, morumque comitate valde clarus: hujus et ecclesiæ Sherwillensis pastor fidus, &c. i. e. 'Richard Carpenter, Doctor in Divinity, respectable for his extensive learning, famous for piety of life, integrity, and courteous manners: and a faithful Pastor of this and the Church of Sherwill, &c.'

[C] He published some Sermons.] I. The Soul's Centinel. Preached at the funeral of Sir Arthur Acland, Knt. 9. Jan. 1611. on Job xiv. 14. Lond. 1612. 8vo. II. A Pastoral Charge, faithfully given and discharged at the Triennial Visitation of W. Bishop of Exon, at Barnstaple, 7 Sept. 1616. on Acts xx. 28. London, 1616. 8vo. III. Christ's Larum-bell of Love re-founded, &c. on John xv. 12. London, 1616, 8vo. IV. The confessionable Christian, &c. Being three Affize Sermons at Taunton and Chard in Somersetshire, 1620, on Acts xxiv. 16. Lond. 1623. 4to (3).

[D] Langbaine confounds these two Carpenters.] Speaking (4) of the play called The Pragmatical Jesuit, written by the first-mentioned Richard Carpenter, he says: 'I know not whether or no it might not be writ by a Divine of that name, the author of several sermons, particularly three, of keeping a good conscience, printed in quarto, London, 1623.' These are the three Affize Sermons, mentioned in the last remark. T

(3) Wood, ubi supra, col. 514, 515.

(4) Ubi supra.

CARPENTER (GEORGE, Lord) Baron Carpenter of Killaghy, in the county of Kilkenny, in the kingdom of Ireland; one who by his military achievements greatly distinguished himself through the whole course of the late wars in Ireland, Flanders, and Spain; whose courage and prudence raised him, by gradual promotions, through the several stations and degrees of the army to almost the highest pitch of military honours (a); he was descended from an ancient family in Herefordshire [A], and born at Pitchers Ocell, in that county, on the 10th of February 1657, was the son of Warncomb Carpenter, sixth son of Thomas Carpenter, Esq; Lord of the manor of the Homme or Holme, in the parish of Dilwynne, near Weobley, in this county; which manor with a considerable estate has been in this family, and lineally descended from father to son for above four-hundred years, and is now in the possession of the present Lord Carpenter, it falling to him in the year 1733, at the death of the late possessor (who was grandson to the eldest son of the above named Thomas Carpenter) all the elder branches dying without issue (b). — Mr Warncomb Carpenter married Eleanor, daughter of William Taylor, Esq; of the same county, and widow of John Hill, Esquire [B], by whom she had only one son [C]. But by Mr Warncomb Carpenter she had seven, of whom, George (Lord Carpenter) was the youngest; he had his education at a private Grammar-school in the country, where he made much improvement in classical learning, and was upon his arrival in London, soon recommended as well by the sweetness of his disposition, his behaviour and accomplishments as by friends, to be Page to the Earl of Montague, whom he attended in his embassy to the Court of France, in 1671, at the age of fourteen. Upon his return in 1672, he rode as a private gentleman in the third troop of guards, which was then looked upon as an honourable post, none but the youngest sons of noblemen and gentlemen of fortune being admitted. He was shortly after appointed Quartermaster to the regiment of horse, commanded by the Earl of Peterborough, and passed through

(a) See his epitaph in note [H].

(b) This, and great part of this article, is taken, from Memoirs communicated by the family.

[A] Descended from an ancient family in Herefordshire.] We also find the name, and, in all probability, the same family, of great antiquity and repute, in other parts of England, particularly in the West. In 1303, the 33d of Edward I. John Carpenter was Member of Parliament for the Borough of Lefkard in the county of Cornwall; as in the 35th of that reign, was Stephen le Carpenter for the borough of Crediton in the county of Devon; and in the 19th of Edward II. 1325, Henry le Carpenter was Member for the town of Derby (1).

[B] Mr Warncomb Carpenter (Lord Carpenter's father) married Eleanor Daughter of William Taylor, and widow of John Hill, Esq;] With this Lady he had a considerable jointure, besides fifteen hundred pounds his own private fortune, given him by his father; a large patrimony at that time for a younger son, especially a sixth. This enabled him to support himself, and his large family, in a handsome and genteel manner, to give all his sons a proper education, and to pursue the bent of his own natural inclinations, in espousing the Royal Cause, to which he was most zealously attached; and by which, in all probability, he was a great sufferer, as most of those loyal gentlemen were, losing not only great part of his fortune, but even his life, in defence thereof; for being an active officer in the King's army, and a man of great spirit, he was, in the heat of the battle of Naseby, June 14. 1645, wounded by a musket-ball, which went through both his legs; this, though not the cause of his immediate death, the wound being curable, proved so however at last, for breaking again out some years afterwards, it became incurable, and so was the occasion of his death.

[C] Widow of John Hill, Esq; by whom she had only one son.] Named William, who being a favourite servant of his Royal Highness James Duke of York, then Lord High-Admiral of England (2), and afterwards King James II. he gave him the command of the ship Coventry; and not long afterwards made him Governor, and Captain-General of the Leeward Islands, which being afterwards taken by the French, he bravely re-took them, and continued Governor of them to the time of his death.

(2) The Duke of York's Naval Memoirs, 8vo, p. 125, 126.

[D] And

(1) The Irish Compendium, p. 359.

all the commissions of Cornet, Lieutenant, and Captain (c), 'till he was advanced to be the Lieutenant-Colonel of the regiment, in which he continued thirteen years, 'till 1685, though the regiment was almost constantly in service. In the year 1693, he married Alice, daughter of the Right Honourable William Baron Cawfield, afterwards created Viscount Charlemont (and always known by the memorable epithet of the good Lord Charlemont) who had a considerable jointure by her first husband, James Margetson, Esq; by the sale of part of which, he was enabled to purchase the King's own regiment of dragoons, which he commanded 'till he died. He served through the whole course of the last wars with France, in Ireland, Flanders, and Spain, with unblemished honour and reputation; and distinguished himself to great advantage, by his courage, conduct, and humanity (d). For the particulars of his military achievements we must refer the reader to the several Histories of those wars, in which, all his actions are recorded greatly to his honour. At the unfortunate battle of Almanza in 1707, by his prudent conduct in bringing up the rear in the last Squadron of the retreat, he preserved the baggage of the whole army (e). In the action at Almenara, July 27, 1710, he was wounded, and had, among the other Generals, the honour of receiving the compliments of his Majesty Charles III. King of Spain, for their judicious conduct and bravery in that engagement (f). In defending the breach at Brihuega, he was again wounded most desperately, and had his advice been followed, the town had certainly held out 'till relieved by Count Staremberg [D]; instead of which, all our forces were, after an obstinate resistance against the whole French and Spanish army, taken prisoners here. The wound which Col. Carpenter received was by a musket ball, which broke part of his jaw-bone, beat out all his teeth on one side, and lodged itself in the root of his tongue, where it remained a whole year before it was extracted; during which time he underwent the most exquisite pain, and his life was despaired of, wholly subsisting by liquids, being incapable of swallowing any other food. In 1705, he was made Brigadier-General, in 1708 Major-General, and in 1710 Lieutenant-General. In 1714 he was chosen Member of Parliament for Whitchurch in Hampshire, and the year following was appointed Envoy Extraordinary to the Court of Vienna, having acquired the personal regard and esteem of the Emperor, by serving under him in Spain; but as he had prepared all things in readiness, and was just setting out for his embassy, the rebellion in 1715 broke out, and he was sent into the North, where he not only prevented the rebels from seizing upon Newcastle, and marching into Yorkshire, but having overtaken them at Preston, where they were invested by Major-General Willes, he, by altering the disposition which that General had made, cut off entirely both their escape and receiving any fresh supplies, and obliged them to send out hostages, that they should raise no works for the defence of the town, nor endeavour to escape themselves, or suffer any of their party to do so 'till the next morning, when they were to determine whether they would surrender at discretion or not, which, however, they accordingly did in the morning (g). This was all the treaty the General made with the rebels, nor were any hopes of pardon or mercy so much as suggested to them [E]. At the beginning of February 1716, General Carpenter sent a challenge

(c) See his epitaph in note [H]. Also, The Preamble to his patent in note [G].

(d) See the Preamble to his patent, note [G].

(e) Annals of Queen Anne, Vol. IX. p. 89.

(f) Annals of Queen Anne, Vol. IX. p. 94.

(g) See an Account of his conduct in this affair, in A True Relation of the Pursuit of the Rebels in the North, and of their Surrender at Preston to Lieutenant-General Carpenter, Commandant in Chief of his Majesty's Forces there; joined to a Plan published under this title, An exact Plan of the town of Preston, with the Barricados of the Rebels, and the Dispositions of the King's Forces under the Command of Lieutenant-General Carpenter, and Major-General Willes. See likewise, The Political State of Great Britain, for Febr. 1715-16, Vol. XI. p. 179, &c.

[D] And had his advice been followed, the town had certainly held out 'till relieved by Count Staremberg.] In the Council of War, called upon the imminent danger in which they found themselves, upon being invested by the French and Spanish armies, Lieutenant-General Carpenter was of opinion, that all the horse and dragoons should march out of the town over the bridge, and that the foot, with the heavy baggage, should be left, where, by casting up entrenchments and barricados, they might hold out two or three days, 'till they could get succour from Count Staremberg. This counsel was the more to be regarded, in that they had not a sufficient quantity of powder and shot for all the troops; they who should have taken care of it, having neglected to provide them before the armies separated. But whether, upon expectation of being timely relieved, or out of fear of losing their baggage and plunder, the majority resolved, that all the troops should stay in and defend the town. Count Staremberg, upon notice of their danger, marched with all possible expedition to their rescue: but before he could come up, they had been forced to yield prisoners of war for want of ammunition (3).

[E] This was all the treaty the General made with the rebels, nor was any hope of pardon or mercy so much as suggested to them.] As is, without foundation, asserted by some favourers of those unhappy sufferers in that rebellion. Upon this account, we think it incumbent upon us to clear the General's conduct in this respect, which we cannot better do, than by giving the circumstances of these proceedings from the trial of Lord Wintoun (4).

' Sir J. Jekyll. Mr Carpenter, please to inform my Lords what passed at Preston after you came there?

VOL. II. No. C.

' Gen. Carp. After I came, the rebels sent out to know, what terms they might expect? and were answered, None, but at discretion. They soon after sent out one Captain Dalziel, to desire a cessation 'till next morning; upon which I sent in Colonel Churchill, to tell them I agreed to a cessation, provided they sent out an English Lord, and a Scotch Lord, as hostages: — and he brought out my Lord Derwentwater, and Colonel Mackintosh, as hostages, that they should make no attempt to escape, nor any works for defence in the town.

' Att. Gen. Pray, Sir, acquaint my Lords who you sent in with Colonel Churchill?

' Gen. Carp. Colonel Cotton.

' Att. Gen. When did they agree to surrender the place?

' Gen. Carpenter. Not 'till the next morning. The hostages were, That none should attempt to escape, nor any defences should be made in the town, 'till the next morning; at which time they would determine, whether they would surrender, or not.

' Att. Gen. I desire you to acquaint my Lords, whether these were all the terms offered; or whether there were any hopes of mercy given them?

' Gen. Carp. I gave them none at all myself, and it is very unlikely any body else should. I commanded in Chief his Majesty's forces there: No body ought to have done it; and if any officer took upon him so to do, without my order or leave, it was very unanswerable by the rules and discipline of war, and what he cannot answer: I hope no body did: I am sure, I gave no such directions: Colonel Churchill can acquaint your Lordships, whether I directed him to mention any other conditions to them, than at discretion.

13 T

' Sir

3) Boyer's Reign of Queen Anne, p. 495.

4) State Tryals, vol. VI. p. 38.

challenge by Col. Churchill to General Willes [F]; the motives reported for this were some words which had passed between them in Spain, and were revived again at Preston. But this duel was honourably compromised, by the generous interpositions of the Dukes of Marlborough and Montague. In 1716 he was constituted Governor of Minorca, and Commander in Chief of his Majesty's forces in Scotland; and in 1719, was created Baron Carpenter of Killaghy in the county of Kilkenny in the kingdom of Ireland [G]; in the year 1722, Lord Carpenter was chosen member of Parliament for the city of Westminster, and was now as diligent in the service of his country in the House, as he had before been in the field, on all occasions voting for what he thought the good of his country, without any regard to party, from the strictest principles of honour, justice, and integrity,

' Sir J. Fekyll. Did you hear any other officer give them any hope or expectation of mercy ?

' Gen. Carp. No, I did not.

[In relation to General Carpenter's evidence, Colonel Churchill was sworn, and asked, viz.]

' Mr Cowper. The question proposed is, Whether you was sent into Preston, and by whom ?

' Col. Churchill. I came up to Preston on Sunday morning, under General Carpenter's command, about ten o'clock; about one, they sent out to capitulate; about five, I was sent in by General Carpenter; their request being, that they might have 'till next morning to consider whether they would surrender, or not. My directions were they should have that, upon condition they sent out hostages that none should attempt to escape, and that no defence should be made in the town. The people named to me by General Carpenter, were my Lord Derwentwater, or my Lord Widdrington; and my Lord Kenmure, or Mackintosh, was mentioned for the Scotch, I directed them to send hostages to me. They could not find my Lord Derwentwater nor Widdrington, and Mackintosh was gone to bed. A little before eight I went with them, and told them the terms I was to deliver to them, that they were to throw up no works to fortify themselves; and should answer that none of them should escape. My Lord Derwentwater and Mackintosh went out with me: I carried them to the two Generals there, and at seven o'clock next morning they surrendered themselves.

' Mr Cowper. Please to give me leave to ask you, whether you had any commission from the General that sent you into the town; or whether you of yourself, without such commission, gave them any hopes of mercy ?

' Col. Churchill. I had not any power to do it; and was so far from doing it, that I don't remember a single syllable was mentioned either on our side, or theirs, about it.

' Mr Cowper. Did you at any other time hear any other officers give them such assurance ?

' Col. Churchill. I never heard a single word like it.'

Surrendering at discretion between an enemy and an enemy (said the General to a friend in the Court of Requests who asked him the question) always implies mercy, and is never refused; but, added he, the Law of Arms is the very reverse in cases of intestine commotions; thus illustrating the case: If a robber attempted my life, and missing his aim, threw himself at my feet, I would shew him mercy: but if my servant attempted my life, and missed his aim, were he ever so submissive, I would shoot him through the head (5).

[F] In the beginning of February 1715-16, he sent a challenge to General Willes.] We shall represent this affair in the words of Mr A. Boyer, the author of The Political State of Great Britain (6). ' On Monday, February 6, the town was surprized, and all the well-affected concerned, to hear that Lieutenant-General Carpenter and Lieutenant-General Willes, two officers, who on all occasions had distinguished themselves for their bravery and conduct, were like to fight a duel. The truth is, a challenge was sent for that purpose from General Carpenter to General Willes; and Colonel Churchill, who carried it, was to be second to the first, and Brigadier Honeywood to the other. But this affair having taken vent, and reached the ears of the Duke of Montague, his Grace prevented the combat, by sending a guard into the field. After which, the Duke of Marlborough interposed in, and allayed this unhappy quarrel, at which all the enemies of the government did heartily rejoice. The subject-matter of it is not yet fully known, but was then, and is still, reported to be, an old grudge upon a dispute that happened between these two great men in Spain, and which having bled a-fresh at Preston upon the competition of the command, they wisely thought fit to defer the decision of it, 'till they met in London, and in the mean time, to act with all the cheerfulness and unanimity against the rebels.'

[G] In 1719, he was created Baron Carpenter of Killaghy, in the county of Kilkenny, in the kingdom of Ireland.] The preamble to his patent is as follows, in English (7). ' Since we and our predecessors have liberally bestowed titles of honour on persons eminent for arts and qualifications proper to a peaceable reign; we judge it most reasonable, that military virtue, which seems, for many years past, to have been a principal support of the government, should be distinguished by due rewards: For this reason especially, we have thought fit to advance our faithful and well-beloved GEORGE CARPENTER, Esq; Lieutenant-General of our armies, to the peerage of this kingdom; a person who, having applied himself early to the profession of arms, has passed through all the military employments, to the rank he now bears, by slow and gradual promotions, his service always preceding his advancement. When Britain was delivered from arbitrary power, he readily embraced the interest of the Revolution, and served under King William of glorious memory, and afterwards in Flanders, behaving himself as a brave and industrious officer. After a short interval of an unsafe peace, the war breaking out again with greater violence, and spreading itself almost through all Europe, Spain was the scene of his services. Earl Stanhope, Chief Commander of the British forces in that kingdom, freely imparted to him his designs, and in the execution of them successfully experienced his courage and conduct. And when that General's preference was required in England, he intrusted him with the command of his troops, as being fully assured that the public cause would suffer no disadvantage by his management; for his diligence and circumspection in performing the duties of his employment were not less remarkable, than his constancy and presence of mind in the time of action and most imminent danger. By his integrity, prudence, and evenness of temper, he not only gained the affections of his countrymen, but the esteem and regard of the Generals of the Allies, and even of his Imperial Majesty. We having had a proof of his loyalty and abilities in an instance very beneficial to the publick; for when sedition, which was seasonably repressed in other places, had taken root in the county of Northumberland, and there broke out into an open rebellion, he, by our command, hastened thither to extinguish this flame of civil war, though with unequal numbers. He prevented the rebels seizing Newcastle, intended by them for their place of arms; hindered their march into Yorkshire; and at last having overtaken them at Preston, where they were invested by other parts of our troops, blocked them up more closely, and obliged them to surrender, by which success peace was restored to England, which greatly conduced to the subduing the rebels in Scotland. For these reasons, that a person so well deserving of Great Britain and Ireland, allied by marriage to a noble family of that kingdom, may from himself transmit an honour to posterity, we create him a Peer, as being every way worthy of that honour, &c.'

(7) The Irish Compendium, p. 359.

(5) The Life of the late Right Hon. George Lord Carpenter, a pamphlet published in 1736.

(6) The Political State of Great Britain, for Feb. 1715-16, Vol. XI. p. 168.

integrity, never giving a vote 'till upon the maturest deliberation he was fully convinced of it's equity; after seven years constant attendance in Parliament, age came upon him, and he declined apace. In October 1731, being near seventy-four years of age, he began to labour under a failure of appetite, and having had a fall, by which his teeth were loosened on that side, which had not been wounded, he was capable of receiving but little nourishment, which, together with old age, and a gradual decay of nature, ended his life on the 10th of February 1731-2, his body was interred, pursuant to his own directions in his will, at Owselbury in Hampshire, near his Lady, where a neat monument of white and blue-veined marble is erected to his memory; by his son [H] the present Lord Carpenter, which was all the issue he left.

[H] Where a neat monument of white and blue-veined marble is erected to his memory by his son. Having the following inscription. 'Here lies the Right Honourable George Lord Carpenter, Colonel of his Majesty's own regiment of Dragoons, Governor of the island of Minorca, Lieutenant-General and Commander in Chief of his Majesty's forces in North-Britain; descended from an ancient family in Herefordshire, and bred in arms; having been fifty-nine years in the army, and passed through all the military employments, from a private gentleman in the Horse-guards, to the rank in which he died, by slow and gradual promotions; his services always preceding his advancement. He served through the whole course of the last wars of England with France, in Ireland, Flanders, and Spain, with honour and reputation; was never absent from his post, when there was any action, or that action was expected; and was as remarkable for his great humanity, as for his courage and presence of mind in time of service and most imminent danger. By his prudence, integrity, and evenness of temper, during the Spanish war, he not only gained the affections of his countrymen, but the esteem and regard of the Generals of the Allies, and of the Emperor himself; to whom he was appointed Envoy-Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary in 1715. He married Alice daughter of the Lord Charlemont, by whom he left issue only one son; who erected this monument to the memory of the best of fathers. Obiit 10 die Februarii 1731 ætat. 74. R

CARTWRIGHT (WILLIAM) an eminent Divine and Poet of the XVIIth Century, was born at Northway near Teuksbury in Gloucestershire, in September 1611, and baptized the 26th of the same month. His father, Mr William Cartwright, having run out a fair estate, was obliged, for a subsistence, to keep a publick inn at Cirencester in the same county; where living in a middling condition, he caused this his son, a youth of great hopes, to be educated under Mr William Topp, Master of the Free-School in that town. From thence he was removed to Westminster-School, being chosen a King's Scholar; where completing his former learning under the care of Mr Lambert Osbaldeston (a), he was elected a Student of Christ-Church in Oxford, in 1628, under the tuition of Mr Jerumael Terrent. Having gone thro' the classes of Logic and Philosophy, with unwearied diligence, he took the degrees in Arts, that of Master being completed in 1635. Afterwards he went into holy orders, and became (as my author expresses it) a most florid and seraphical Preacher [A] in the university. In 1642, he had the place of Succentor in the Church of Salisbury conferred on him by Bishop Duppa (b), and, in 1643, was chosen junior Proctor of the university (c). He was also metaphysical Reader [B] to the university; and

(a) Wood, Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 34.

(b) Ibid. col. 35.

(c) Langhaine's Account of the English Dramatic Poets, in 8vo, Lond. 1691. p. 52.

[A] A florid and seraphical preacher. Hear how Dr Jasper Mayne celebrates Mr Cartwright's preaching (1).

But these thy looser raptures must submit
To thy rare sermons and much holier wit;
In whose rich web such eloquence is seen,
As if the Roman Orator had been Seated forth to preach the Gospel, and had stood
In our assemblies pouring out his flood.
Thou wert a Poet, but thy sermons do
Shew thee to be the best of preachers too;
Who to thy rhetoric did'st such skill impart,
As if thou heir to some Apostle wert,
Who, taking wing for Heav'n, behind him left
His fiery tongue to thee, and that tongue cleft
Into as many ways to save, as they
Who are worst sinners use to err and stray.
What holy craft did in thy pulpit move?
How was the serpent mingled with the dove?
How have I seen thee cast thy net, and then
With holy coz'nage catch the souls of men?
Preach'd sin out of their bosoms, made them see Both what they were, and what they ought to be?
Made them confess the strait way, by thee strow'd
With flow'rs, was far more pleasant than the broad,
Indeed, we scripture-wonders oft did spy,
Camels by thee drawn thro' a needle's eye.

(1) Among the Copies of Verses prefixed to Mr Cartwright's Works.

(2) Ibid.

Mr John Fell wrote these lines (2):

Or view him, when his riper thoughts did bear
His studies into a diviner sphere.
When that his voice did charm th' attentive throng,
And every ear was link'd unto his tongue,
The numerous press, closing their souls in one,
Stood all transform'd into his passion.

I shall only add, under this remark, the following lines by Mr Ralph Bathurst (3).

(3) Ibid.

But who cou'd hear without an extasy,
When, with a graceful conquering presence, He Stood forth, and, like Almighty Thunder, flung
His numerous strains among th' amazed throng?
A pleasing horror struck thro' ev'ry limb,
And ev'ry ear was close chain'd up to him:
Such masculine vigour ravish'd our assent,
What he persuad'd, was commandment:
A sweeter plenty Rhetorick ne'er knew
In Chrysofom's pulpit, nor in Tully's pew.

[B] Metaphysical Reader. His Panegyrics have not failed to celebrate his lectures in the Metaphysicks. Mr Ralph Bathurst has these lines (4):

(4) Ibid.

How may we then admire his serious time,
That wrote so well, yet drove no trade in rhyme!
If from the scene and walks such praise he share,
What must he from his Metaphysick Chair?
There he unriddled that mysterious book,
Which Aristotle made to be mistook;

And

it was generally said, those Lectures were never performed better than by Mr Cartwright and his predecessor Mr Thomas Barlow (d) of Queen's College (e). This ingenious gentleman died, the 23d of December 1643, in the thirty-third year of his age, of a malignant fever, called the Camp Disease, which then reigned in Oxford, and was fatal to many of his contemporaries; and was buried, December the 1st, towards the upper end of the fourth aisle of the Cathedral of Christ-Church. His death was generally lamented, and particularly by the King and Queen, then at Oxford, who anxiously enquired after him all the time of his sickness (f). Mr Cartwright was extremely remarkable for both external and internal endowments, his body (as Langbaine expresses it) being as handsome as his soul. He was an expert linguist, understanding, not only Greek and Latin, but French and Italian as perfectly as his mother tongue: an excellent Orator, and at the same time an admirable Poet [C]; a quality (my author observes) which Cicero with all his pains could never attain to (g). The editor of his works (h) applies to him the saying of Aristotle concerning Æschron the poet, that he could not tell what Æschron could not do. And Dr Fell, Bishop of Oxford, said of him, Cartwright is the utmost man can come to. Ben Johnson had such an opinion of his genius, that he said; my son Cartwright writes all like a man (i). There are extant of this author's Four Plays, besides other Poems [D]; all which were printed together in 1651, accompanied by above fifty copies of (d) Afterwards Bishop of Lincoln.

(e) Preface to Mr Cartwright's Plays and Poems in 8vo. Lond. 1651.

(f) Wood, ubi supra.

(g) Langbaine, ubi supra, p. 52.

(h) In the Preface.

(i) Preface to his Works.

And his deep sense did so exactly tell,
Great Alexander knew't not half so well:
So were those oracles utter'd clear and good,
Which rude interpreters make less understood.

Whose learned fancy never was at rest,
But always labouring, yet labour'd least.
His wit's immortal, and shall honour have,
While there's or slavish Lord, or Royal Slave.

(5) Ibid. Mr Thomas Vaughan gives us the following encomium (5).

When he did read, how did we flock to hear?
Sure some Professors became pupils there.
He would refine Abstractions: it was He
That gave the text all it's authority;
As if the Stagyrte resign'd his pen,
And took his censure, not his comment, then.
And tho' with some the science goes for self,
His Lectures made it to transcend itself.

(6) Ibid. Mr Francis Palmer, these lines (6):

He Aristotle has unbent,
Made musick, what he riddles meant;
Cloath'd his own reason like his Plays:
His Metaphysics claim the Bays.

(7) See the copies of Verses prefixed to his Works. [C] An admirable Poet. We shall select a few only of the numerous attestations of our author's poetical merit (7). The first shall be that of Sir Robert Stapylton.

If time be measur'd by an Hour-glass run,
He may be Johnson's grandchild, Fletcher's son,
If by desert, a Muse might be his mother,
He Homer's heir, and Hesiod's elder brother.

Dr Jasper Mayne addresses the deceased author thus:

For thou to nature had'st join'd art and skill:
In thee Ben Johnson still held Shakespear's quill;
A quill rul'd by sharp judgment, and such laws,
As a well-studied mind and reason draws.
Thy lamp was cherish'd with supplies of oil
Fetch'd from the Roman and the Grecian foil —
Hence twin perfections, in thy writings knit,
Present us with strange contraries of wit:
Strength mix'd with sweetness, vigorous with fair,
Lucan's bold heights match'd with staid Virgil's care;
Martial's quick salt join'd to Musæus' tongue;
Soft thorns of fancy, which from roses spring.

John Leigh, Esq; in a copy of verses to the Stationer Mr Mosely, on his printing Mr Cartwright's poems, after mentioning other poets, whose works he had published, has these lines:

But after all thou bring'st up in the rear
One that fills ev'ry eye, and ev'ry ear;
Cartwright, rare Cartwright, to whom all must bow,
That was best preacher and best poet too;

We shall only add here, as to Mr Cartwright's poetical character in general, what Mr Ralph Bathurst says of his style.

His Style so pleases the judicious Gown,
As that there's something too for Wits o' th' town:
Rough-handed Criticks do approve, and yet
'Tis treasure for the Ladies cabinet.

[D] Four Plays, besides other Poems. The first of his Plays is The Lady Errant. We are told, it was esteemed to be a good Comedy; but where acted, is not known (8). The second is The Royal Slave. A Tragi-Comedy. Presented to the King and Queen by the Students of Christ-Church in Oxford, Aug. 30. 1636. Presented since to both their Majesties, at Hampton-Court, by the King's servants. This Play, Mr Langbaine tells us (9), gave such content to their Majesties and the whole Court, as well for the stately scenes, the richness of the Persian habits, the excellency of the songs (which were set to musick by that admirable Composer Mr Henry Lawes) as for the noble style of the Play itself, and the ready address, and graceful carriage, of the actors (among whom Dr Busby, the famous Master of Westminster-school, approved himself a second Roscius) that they unanimously acknowledged that it did exceed all things of that nature which they had ever seen. The Queen in particular so much admired it, that in November following the sent for the habits and scenes to Hampton-Court; she being desirous to see her own servants represent the same Play (whose profession it was) that the might the better judge of the several performances, and to whom the preference was due. The sentence was universally given, by all the spectators, in favour of the Gown, though nothing was wanting on Mr Cartwright's side to inform the players as well as the scholars, in what belonged to the action and delivery of each part. This play is particularly celebrated by Dr Jasper Mayne (10), in these lines:

Witness thy Royal Captive, where we do
Read thee a poet, but sad prophet too:
A Play, where virtue so well-languag'd shines,
That Slaves are there made Princes by thy lines.

Mr Cartwright's third Play is The Ordinary. A Comedy. When, and where acted, is not said. Part of the second Scene of the First Act, between the widow Potluck, Slicer, and Hearsay, is transcribed by the author of Wit's Interpreter, in his Love-dialogues, under the title of The Old Widow (11). The fourth and last is The Siege, or Love's Convert. A Tragi-Comedy. When, and where acted, not said. It is dedicated to King Charles I. by an epistle in verse. The story of Misander and Leucasia is founded upon that of Pausania and Cleonice in Plutarch's life of Cymon. The injunction

(8) Langbaine's Account of the English Dramatic Poets, in 8vo, Lond. 1697. p. 53.

(9) Ibid. p. 54. See also Wood's Hist. Antiq Univ. Oxon. l. i. p. 344, 345.

(10) Among the commendatory Verses.

(11) Langbaine, ib. p. 53.

of commendatory verses by the most eminent Wits of the university. There are also some other pieces, mentioned by Anthony Wood [E].

injunction, which the rich widow Pyle lays upon her lovers, is borrowed from Boccace's Novels. Day 9. Nov. 1. This Play is humorously commended by Mr. Jos. Howe, in a copy of verses (12), in which are these lines:

Had this Scene-wit not met an age
That frowneth down the mourning Stage,
That all Dramatick Laws confutes,
And maketh all the actors mutes;
How had it crackt the rooms, and made
Play-seeing th' only London trade?
When if some close-lan'd citizen,
Zealous for his labouring hen,
Had panting for a midwife run,
To help into th' dark his coming son,

These Bills had made him stop, and fend
To bid her groan till th' Siege did end,
Tho' of a Boy he lost the hope,
To heir his prunes and Castile-soap.

(13) Ubi supra.

(14) See a book intituled, Ayres and Dialogues for one, two, and three Voices, Lond. 1653, fol. composed by Mr. Henry Lawes. Also another intituled, Select Ayres and Dialogues to sing to the Theorbo, Lute, and Bass Viol. Lond. 1669, fol. composed also by the said Henry Lawes.

[E] Some other pieces, mentioned by Anthony Wood. That author tells us (13), Mr Cartwright wrote also, I. Poemata Græca et Latina i. e. 'Greek and Latin Poems.' II. An Offspring of Mercy issuing out of the Womb of Cruelty. A Passion Sermon, preached at Christ Church in Oxford, on Acts ii. 23. Lond. 1652. 8vo. III. On the signal days in the month of November, in relation to the Crown and Royal Family. A Poem. Lond. 1671. in one sheet, 4to. IV. Poems and Verses, containing Airs for several voices (14), set by Mr Henry Lawes.

CARY (HENRY) afterwards created Viscount Falkland, and descended from the family of the Carys of Cockington in Devonshire [A], was the son of Sir Edward Cary of Berkhamsted and Aldenham in the county of Hertford, Knight, Master of the Jewel-office to Queen Elizabeth and King James I (a), by Catherine his wife, daughter of Sir Henry Knevet, Knight, and widow of Henry Lord Paget (b). He was born at Aldenham just now mentioned (c); and, when about sixteen years of age, was sent to Exeter-College in Oxford, where by the help of a good Tutor, and extraordinary parts, he became a most accomplished gentleman (d). It doth not appear he took any degree [B]: but, however, when he quitted the university, he left behind a celebrated name (e). Soon after, he was introduced to Court (f); and, in the year 1608, made one of the Knights of the Bath at the creation of Henry Prince of Wales (g). In 1617, he was sworn in Comptroller of his Majesty's Household [C], and one of his Privy-Council (b). And on the 10th of November 1620, was created Viscount of Falkland in the county of Fife in Scotland (i). King James I. knowing his great abilities and experience, constituted him Lord Deputy of Ireland; into which high office he was sworn, September 18, 1622 (k); and continued in it 'till the year 1629 (l). During his administration, he kept a strict hand over the Roman Catholics in that kingdom [D]; which gave them occasion to send complaints to the Court of England against him. And tho' he proceeded as honourably, justly, and nobly, as any man could do (m); tho' the Council did, on the 28th of April 1629, write a kind and true letter in vindication of his innocence (n); yet by the clamour of the Irish, and the prevailing power of his Popish enemies, he was removed in disgrace. But his innocence being afterwards vindicated, this affront was in some measure atoned for by the subsequent favour of the King (o). At his return to England, he lived in honour and esteem, 'till the year 1635; when having the misfortune to break one of his legs, on a stand in Theobald's-park, he died of that unhappy accident, in September (p); and was buried at Aldenham [E]. He

(g) Stow's Annals, edit. 1631, p. 991. The Scottish Compendium, &c. by F. Nicholls, 3d edit. 1729, p. 383. It was not at the Creation of Charles Prince of Wales; as Wood says by mistake.

(b) Wood, ubi supra.

(i) Crawford's Peerage of Scotland; and The Scottish Compend. ubi supra.

(k) Ibid. and Hist. of Ireland, by R. Cox. P. ii. fol. Lond. 1690, p. 39.

(l) Ibid. p. 53.

(m) As was attested by his successor the Earl of Strafford. See his Tryal by Rushworth, p. 160.

(n) R. Cox, as above, p. 52. (o) Idem, Preface to Part ii. of his History. N. B. It is not paged. (p) Wood, ubi supra, col. 586. Fuller, and Lloyd, ubi supra. These two last by mistake, say, that it was in 1620.

[A] Descended from the Carys of Cockington in Devonshire. Sir Philip (1) Cary of Cockington, living in the first of Henry VI, married to his first wife, Anne daughter of Sir William Poulet, Knight, from whom the family of Cockington descended (2). His second wife was Alice, daughter of Sir Baldwin Fulford of Fulford in Devonshire, Knight, by which he had issue Thomas, who married Margaret, younger daughter, and coheir, of Sir Robert Spencer of Spencercombe in the county of Devon, by Eleanor, sister and coheir to Henry Beaufort, Duke of Somerset (3). By this Lady, Thomas Cary had two sons, John-ancestor of the Lords Faulkland; and William, of the Lords Hunston. John was made a Knight of the Carpet, February 22, 1546. And by Joice his wife, daughter of — Denny, Esq; and sister to Sir Anthony Denny, had issue Sir Edward Cary, Knight, father of Sir Henry, who is the subject of this article. Sir Edward died July 16, 1618 (4).

[B] It doth not appear he took any degree. We are told (5), that during his stay in the University, his chamber was the rendezvous of all the eminent Wits, Divines, Philosophers, Lawyers, Historians, and Politicians of that time. But, says Mr Wood (6), 'How true it is, seeing he was then a young man and not graduated, I cannot in the least perceive. Had those things been spoken of Lucius Cary his son, who retired several times to, and took commons in Exeter-College, while his brother Lorenzo studied there. in 1628, and after, I should have rather believed it.'

[C] He was sworn in Comptroller of his Majesty's Household. But he was not, one of the Gentlemen of his Majesty's bed-chamber: neither was he, the first who carried into Scotland the news of Queen Elizabeth's death: as the author of the Scottish Compendium falsely asserts (7). For he that carried those news, was Robert Cary fourth son of Henry Lord Hunston, created afterwards Lord Lepington and Earl of Monmouth (8).

[D] He kept a strict hand over the Roman Catholics in Ireland. For, in his time, several Popish magistrates that had refused the oath of supremacy, contrary to the Statute of 2 Eliz. c. 1. were censured in the Star-Chamber on the 22d of November, 1622; at which time Bishop Usher made that excellent speech about the lawfulness of that oath, which is published in his answer to Malone the Jesuit: and on the 21st of January 1623, there was issued out a Proclamation against the Popish Clergy, Secular and Regular, ordering them to depart the kingdom within forty days; after which all persons were prohibited to converse with them (9).

[E] And was buried at Aldenham. Where, in the church, there is the following memorial of him, and his father. Edward Cary, Esq; Lord of the manor

(7) Page 383, edit. 1729.

(8) See Court and Character of King James, by Sir A. Weldon, p. 2. and Mr Osborne's Traditional Memoirs of King James, Lond. 1658, 12mo, p. 54.

(9) R. Cox, ubi supra, p. 39.

(12) Among the commendatory verses

(a) Wood, Ath. dit. 1721, Vol. col. 585. Peerage of England by Arth. Collins, Esq; Lond. 1735. Vol. iii. p. 170.

(b) Dugdale's Baronage, Vol. II. p. 397. Wood, ubi supra.

(c) State Worthies by David Lloyd, edit. 1679. p. 938; from Fuller's Worthies, in Hertfordshire, p. 23.

(d) Wood, ubi supra.

(e) Wood, as above.

(f) Ibid.

(1) Prince calls him Sir William Worthies, p. 153.

(2) Dugdale, ubi supra, p. 397.

(3) See Genealog. Hist. of the Kings of England, &c. by Fr. Sandford, and S. Stebbing. edit. 1707, p. 334.

(4) Collins, ubi supra; and Prince's Worthies of Devon. Exon. 1701, p. 153.

(5) Worthies of England, by T. Fuller; as quoted by Mr Wood, ubi supra.

(6) Col. 585.

He married Elizabeth sole daughter and heir of Sir Laurence Tanfield, Chief Baron of the Exchequer, with whom he had the manor of Great Tew, Burford, and other estates in Oxfordshire (q). He writ several things, which were not published [F]. With respect to his character; he was a most accomplished gentleman, and a compleat courtier (r).

(a) Wood, col. 586.

(r) Fuller, and Lloyd, ibid.

of Aldenham, and Patron of this Church, afterwards Sir Edward Cary, Knight, whose body was in vaulted in the Chancel of this Church, August 6, 1618. Father of Henry I. Viscount of Falkland in Scotland, whose body was also in vaulted in the Chancel of this Church, September 25, 1633 (10).

(10) The History of Hertfordshire, by N. Salmon, London, 1728, fol. p. 98.

(11) Ubi supra, col. 586.

[F] He writ several things which were not published. This we learn from Mr Wood (11), who further informs us, That there was found among his papers, and published as his, the following book, The History of the most unfortunate Prince, King Edward II; with choice political Observations on him and his unhappy Favourites, Gaveston and Spencer: containing several passages of those times not found in other Historians.' Lond. 1680, fol. and 8vo. Wood says, it was published, when the press was open for all books that could make any thing against the then government, with a Preface to the reader patched up from very inconsiderable authors, by Sir James Harrington. — The Lord Clarendon informs us (12), That this Lord Falkland, instead of enriching himself by his great places, wasted a full fortune at Court, in those offices and employments by which other men use to obtain a greater (12) Hist. of the Rebellion, edit. 1711, 8vo. Vol. II, P. i, p. 352.

(a) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. I. col. 586.

(b) The History of the Rebellion, &c. by Edward Earl of Clarendon, edit. 1732, 8vo, Vol. II. Part i. p. 357.

(c) Wood, ibid.

(d) Ibid.

(e) Clarendon, ubi supra.

(f) Ibid. p. 357.

(g) Wood, ubi supra.

CARY (LUCIUS) eldest son of Henry Lord Viscount of Falkland mentioned in the last Article, was born, as is supposed, at Burford in Oxfordshire (a), about the year 1610 [A]. His education for some years was in Ireland, where his father carried him, when he was appointed Lord Deputy of that kingdom in 1622 (b). He received particularly his Academical Learning in Trinity-College in Dublin (c); and in St John's-College in Cambridge [B]. At first he proved but a wild youth (c), but being sent to travel under the care of a discreet Tutor, he soon shook off all levity and extravagance, and became a wife, sober, and prudent person (d). Before he came to be twenty years of age, he was master of a noble fortune, which descended to him by the gift of a grandfather, without passing through his father or mother, who were then both alive (e). Shortly after that, and before he was of age, being in his natural inclination a great lover of a military life, he went into the Low-Countries, with a resolution of procuring a Command, and to give himself up to it; but he was diverted from it by the compleat inactivity of that summer. So he returned to England, and being a man of a fine genius, soon entered upon a very strict course of study (f). At first, he applied himself to polite Literature, and to Poetry (g), in which he made such successful attempts, that he gained the esteem and admiration of the most eminent Poets of his time [D]. But afterwards giving himself up to [A] Was born at Burford — about the year 1610.] It is not quite certain, that he was born in that town; for the register-book of that place which commences about the beginning of the reign of King James I, takes no notice of it. However, Mr Wood tells us, he was informed, That he was mostly nursed, and therefore very probably also born, at Burford (1). He was in the thirty fourth year of his age, September 20, 1643, when he was killed (2), and consequently must have been born about the year 1610.

(1) Wood, Ath. col. 586.

(2) Clarendon, History, Vol. II. Part i. p. 359.

[B] And in St John's-College in Cambridge.] This appears from a letter of his to Dr Beale, Master of St John's, which is as follows. 'I received lately a letter from yourself and others of your noble Society; wherein, as many titles were given me, to which I had none, so that, which I should most willingly have acknowledged, and might with most justice claim, you were not pleased to vouchsafe me, that is, that of a St John's man. I confess, I am both proud and ashamed of that, and the latter, in respect that the fruits are unproportionable to the Seed-plot: yet, Sir, as little learning as I brought from you, and as little as I have since increased and watered; what I did bring, I am sure, I carry about me, an indelible character of affection and duty to that Society, and an extraordinary longing for some occasion of expressing that affection and that duty. I shall desire you to express this to them, and to add this, that as I shall never forget myself to be a Member of your Body; so I shall be ready to catch at all means of declaring myself to be, not only to the Body, but every Member of it,

' A very Humble Servant,

' FALKLAND (3).'

(3) Life of Dr John Barwick, in English, Lond. 1724, 8vo, Appendix, p. 551, 552.

However, there is no account of his admittance in St John's-College-Register.

[C] At first he proved but a wild youth.] And for some error or indiscretion was thrown into the Fleet, as is evident from the following petition of his father to the King.

The Lord Faulkland's petition to the King.

MOST humbly shewing, that I had a sonne, until I lost him, in your Highness displeasure, where I cannot seek him, because I have not will to find him there. Men say, there is a wild young man now prisoner in the Fleet, for measuring his actions by his own private fence. But now that for the same your Majesties hand hath appeared in his punishment, he bows and humbles himself before, and to it: whether he be mine, or not, I can discern by no light, but that of your royal clemency; for only in your forgiveness can I own him for mine. Forgiveness is the glory of the supremest powers, and this the operation, that when it is extended in the greatest measure, it converts the greatest offenders into the greatest lovers, and so makes purchase of the heart, an especial privilege peculiar and due to Sovereign Princes. If now your Majesty will vouchsafe, out of your benignity, to become a second nature, and restore that unto me which the first gave me, and vanity deprived me of, I shall keep my reckoning of the full number of my sons with comfort, and render the tribute of my most humble thankfulness, else my weak old memory must forget one (4).

(4) Cabala, ed. 1663, fol. p. 22.

[D] He applied himself — to Poetry, — and gained the esteem of the most eminent Poets.] Particularly of Ben Johnson, who celebrates him in his Underwoods, in a Poem, To the immortal Memory and Friendship of that noble Pair, Sir Lucius Cary, and Sir H. Morison (5). Sir John Suckling pays him also a fine compliment, in his Session of the Poets, as follows.

(5) See Ben. Johnson's Works, edit. fol. 169, p. 571.

He was of late fo gone with Divinity,
That he had almost forgot his Poetry,
Though to say the truth (and Apollo did know it)
He might have been both his Priest and his Poet.

[E] He

to the more solid parts of learning, he frequently retired, for the sake of books and conversation, to Oxford, and to his seat at Great Tew, near that University (b). There he contracted a familiarity and friendship with the most polite and accurate men [E]; who found such immenseness of wit, and such a solidity of judgment in him, so infinite a fancy, bound in by most exact reasoning, such a vast knowledge, that he was not ignorant in any thing, yet such an excessive humility, as if he had known nothing; that they frequently resorted, and dwelt with him, as in a College situated in a purer air. So that his house was an University in a lesser volume, whither they came not so much for repose as study (i). Among other things, he made himself in a very short time a perfect master of the Greek tongue [F], and accurately read all the Greek Historians (k). Before he was twenty-three years of age, he had perused and read over all the Greek and Latin Fathers, and was indefatigable in looking over all books, which with great expence he caused to be transmitted to him from all parts (l). He also diligently studied the controversies; and had a memory so stupendous, that he remembered on all occasions, whatsoever he read (m). About the time of his father's death, in 1633, he was made one of the Gentlemen of his Majesty Privy-Chamber (n). Notwithstanding which, he continued frequently to retire to Great Tew, and Oxford, for the sake of the company and conversation of learned and ingenious men (o); and was a member of the most polite clubs (p). In 1639, he was in the expedition against the Scots; and though he received so repulse in the command of a troop of horse, of which he had a promise, he went a volunteer with the Earl of Essex (q). Upon his going to this expedition, he was complimented with fine copies of verses, both by Mr Waller [G], and Mr Cowley [H]. He was chosen in 1640, a member of the House of Commons for Newport in the Isle of Wight, in the Parliament which began at Westminster the 13th of April the same year (r); and, from the debates which were managed with all imaginable gravity and sobriety, he contracted such a reverence to Parliaments, that he thought it really impossible they could ever produce mischief or inconvenience to the kingdom, or that the kingdom could be tolerably happy in the intermission of them. And from the unhappy and unseasonable dissolution of that Parliament, he harboured some jealousy and prejudice to the Court, towards which he was not before immoderately inclined. He was chosen again for the same place, in the Parliament which began the 3d of November following; and in the beginning of it, declared himself very sharply and severely against those exorbitances of the Court, which had been thought most grievous to the State (s). For he was so rigid an observer of established laws and rules, that he could not endure the least breach or deviation from them: and thought no mischief so intolerable, as the presumption of Ministers of State, to break positive rules for reasons of State; or Judges to transgress known laws, upon the title of conveniency or necessity (t). This made him so severe against the Lord Finch [I], and

(b) Ibid.

(i) Clarendon, ubi supra, p. 354.

(k) Ibid.

(l) Lord Clarendon's Animadversions upon a book intitled, Fanaticism fanatickally imputed to the Catholick Church by Dr Stillingfleet, &c. by S. C. Lond. 1674, p. 185.

(m) Idem, Hist. as above, p. 352.

(n) Wood, ubi supra.

(o) Ibid.

(p) Account of the Life of Mr Edm. Waller prefixed to his Poems, p. xi. edit. 1711, 8vo.

(q) Clarendon, ubi supra, p. 357.

(r) Rushworth's Hist. Collections, Vol. III. p. 1110.

(s) Clarendon, p. 353.

(t) Ibid.

[E] He contracted a familiarity and friendship with the most polite and accurate men. Among the rest, with William Chillingworth of Trinity-college; John Earle, and Hugh Crossly, of Merton; George Aglionby, and Tho. Triplet, of Christ-church; Charles Gataker of Penhroke college, son of the learned Thomas Gataker of Redrith; George Sandys the poet, &c. (6).

[F] He made himself, in a very short time, a perfect master of the Greek tongue. When he undertook to learn it, he resolved not to see London, which he loved above all places, till he had perfectly learned it; and, accordingly going to his own house in the country, he there pursued the study of that language with such indefatigable industry, that he became master of it in a very short time (7).

[G] He was complimented with copies of verses by Mr Waller, &c. Mr Waller's begin thus: To my Lord of Falkland. In the year 1638.

Brave Holland leads, and with him Falkland goes;
Who hears this told, and does not straight suppose
We send the Graces and the Muses forth,
To civilize, and to instruct the North?

And a little after.

Ah, noble Friend with what impatience all
That know thy worth, and know how prodigal
Of thy great Soul thou art, longing to twist
Bays with that Ivy, which so early kist
Thy youthful temples, with what horror we Think on the blind events of war and thee?
To Fate exposing that all-knowing breast
Among the throng, as cheaply as the rest. &c. (8).

[H] And Mr Cowley. In his poem, To the Lord Falkland. For his safe return from the Northern Expedition against the Scots. The first lines of which run thus:

Great is thy charge, O North; he wise and just,
England commits her Falkland to thy trust;
Return him safe: Learning would rather chuse
Her Bodley, or her Vatican to lose.
All things that are hut writ or printed there,
In his unhounded breast engraven are.
There all the Sciences together meet,
And every Art does all her kindred greet.

And near the end.

He is too good for war, and ought to be
As far from danger, as from fear he is free (9).

[I] This made him so severe against the Lord Finch. John Lord Finch, Baron of Fordwich, and Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal, was on the 14th of January 1640-1. impeached by the Lord Falkland, in the name of the House of Commons, of having traiterously and wickedly endeavoured to subvert the fundamental laws and established government of the realm; on account, of his having hindered, when he was Speaker, the reading of some things in the House; of his having endeavoured to enlarge the bounds of the forest in Essex; and chiefly for being an adviser and promoter of Ship-money, &c. (10). After the reading of the articles, the Lord Falkland made a severe speech against him, in which he observes, — 'That his life appeared a perpetual warfare, by mines, and by battery, by battle, and by stratagem, against our fundamental laws.' Then, after having instanced in the particulars above-mentioned, he adds, — 'That his crimes were in the highest degree of Parliamentary Treason, — a Treason as well against the King,

(9) The Works of Mr Abraham Cowley, 7th edit. 1681, fol. p. 4, 5.

(10) Nalson's Collections, Vol. I. p. 722, 723.

(6) Wood, Ath. col. 587.

(7) Clarendon, Vol. II. Part I. p. 351.

(8) Poems, &c. by Edm. Waller, 8th edit. 1711, p. 81.

and the Earl of Strafford [K], contrary to his natural gentleness, and temper. But in both cases he was only misled by the authority of those, who he believed, understood the laws perfectly, of which he himself was utterly ignorant (u). For, though he was severe, so far was he from being violent, against those two noble Peers; that when it was moved in the House of Commons, That the Earl of Strafford might forthwith (at the time he was first accused) be impeached of High-Treason, the Lord Falkland, tho' he was very well known not to have any kindness for him, modestly desired the House to consider, 'Whether it would not suit better with the gravity of their proceedings, first to digest many of those particulars which had been mentioned, by a Committee, before they sent up to the House of Lords to accuse him? declaring himself however to be abundantly satisfied that there was enough to charge him (w).' He had contracted a prejudice against Archbishop Laud, and some others of the Bishops [L], which biased his judgment so far, as to make him concur in the first bill to take away the votes of Bishops in the House of Lords (x); tho' he refused to be one of the Committee to draw up reasons for it (y). This concurrence of his gave occasion for some to believe, and

(u) Ibid.

(w) Clarendon, Vol. I. Part i. p. 173, 174.

(x) Ibid. p. 235, and Vol. II. Part I. p. 356.(y) Ibid. Vol. I. Part ii. p. 303.

' as against the kingdom; for whatsoever is against the whole, is undoubtedly against the head; which takes from his Majesty the ground of his rule, the laws, (for if foundations be destroyed, the pinacles are most endangered) which takes from his Majesty the principal honour of his rule, the ruling over freemen, a power as much nobler than over villains, as that which is over beasts; which endeavoured to take from his Majesty the principal support of his rule, their hearts and affections over whom he rules, a better and surer strength and wall to the King, than the sea is to the Kingdom; and by begetting a mutual distrust, and by that a mutual disaffection between them, to hazard the danger even of the destruction of both (11).' He had, on the 5th of December before, made another Speech against the Lord Finch, and the Judges, wherein he observes, 'That the cause of all the miseries they [the nation] had suffered, and the cause of all the jealousies they had that they should yet suffer, was, That a most excellent Prince had been most infinitely abused, by his Judges telling him, That by policy he might do what he pleased.'—And, afterwards asserts, 'That common fame was ground enough for the House of Commons to accuse upon (12).'

(11) Ibid. p. 725, 726.(12) Ibid. p. 654—656.

[K] And the Earl of Strafford.] He hints at him, in the following passage which occurs in the last-mentioned speech.—'I will only say we have accused a great person of High-Treason, for intending to subvert our fundamental laws, and to introduce arbitrary government, which we suppose he meant to do.'—The Lord Clarendon observes (13), That they who did not know his composition to be as free from revenge as it was from pride, thought that his sharpness against the Earl of Strafford, might proceed from the memory of some unkindnesses, not without a mixture of injustice from him towards his father.

(13) Hist. Vol. II. Part i. p. 353.

[L] He had contrasted a prejudice against Archbishop Laud, &c.] Having observed the Archbishop's passion, when it may be multiplicity of business, or other indisposition had possessed him, he therefore wished him less entangled and engaged in the business of the Court, or State.—Two reasons induced his Lordship to give his consent to the first bill for displacing the Bishops. First, His not understanding then the original of their right and suffrage there. Secondly, An opinion, that the combination against the whole government of the Church by Bishops, was so violent and furious, that a less composition than the dispensing with their intermeddling in secular affairs, would not preserve the order (14). However, what reasons or inducements soever he might be acted by, he made, on the 9th of February 1640, as violent and bitter a speech against the Bishops, as any of it's most inveterate enemies. Some passages in it, are as follow.—'This kingdom hath long laboured under many and great oppressions, both in Religion and Liberty, and a man's acquaintance here is not great, or his ingenuity less, who doth not both know and acknowledge, that a great, if not a principal, cause of both these have been some Bishops, and their adherents. A little search will serve to find them to have been the destruction of unity, under pretence of uniformity; to have brought in superstition and scandal, under the titles of reverence and decency, to have defiled our Church, by adorning our churches, to have slackened the strictness of that union which was formerly between us and those of our Religion beyond the sea; an action as unpolitick as ungodly. We shall find them to have tithed mint and anise, and have left undone the weightier works of the Law; to have been less eager upon those who damn our Church, than upon those, who, upon weak conscience, and perhaps as weak reasons, (the dislike of some commanded garment, or some uncommanded posture,) only abstained from it.—We shall find them to have resembled the dog in the manger; to have neither preached themselves, nor employed those that should, nor suffer those that would: to have brought in catechising only to thrust out preaching; cried down lectures by the name of factions.—To go yet further, some of them have so industriously laboured to deduce themselves from Rome, that they have given great suspicion that in gratitude they desire to return thither, or at least to meet it half way: Some have evidently laboured to bring in an English, though not a Roman Popery; I mean not only the outside and dress of it, but equally absolute; a blind dependance of the people upon the Clergy, and of the Clergy upon themselves.—We shall find some of them to have laboured to exclude both all persons, and all causes of the Clergy, from the ordinary jurisdiction of the Temporal Magistrate, and by hindring prohibitions, to have taken away the only legal bound to their arbitrary power.—We shall find some of them to have both kindled and blown the common fire of both nations,——and to have been the almost sole abettors of my Lord of Strafford.'—All this he sums up, by laying the faults of the men upon the order of the Bishops, upon Episcopacy.—But afterwards he softens the sharpness of what he had advanced, in the following manner.—'If we consider, that if not the first planters, yet the first spreaders of Christianity, and the first and chief defenders of Christianity against Heresies within, and Paganism without, both with their ink and with their blood; and the main conducers to the resurrection of Christianity, at least here in the Reformation (and we owe the light of the Gospel we now enjoy, to the fire they then endured for it) were all Bishops: and that even now in the greatest perfection of that order, there are yet some who have conduced in nothing to our late innovations, but in their silence; some, who in an unexpected and mighty place and power, have expressed an equal moderation and humility, being neither ambitious before, nor proud after, either of the Crozier's Staff, or White Staff: Some who have been learned opposers of Popery, and zealous opposers of Arminianism; between whom and their inferior Clergy, in frequency of preaching hath been no distinction; whose lives are untouched, not only by guilt, but by malice; scarce to be equalled by those of any condition, or to be excelled by those in any Calendar.—If we consider this, this consideration will bring forth this conclusion, That Bishops may be good men (15).' By what his Lordship says of Arminianism, 'tis plain, that notwithstanding his great learning, he had never studied the Predisminarian Controversy, of which Arminianism gives a rational and consistent notion, agreeable to God's infinite Wisdom and Goodness; whereas rigid Calvinism represents God, the fountain of Goodness and Perfection, as the most cruel, arbitrary, and tyrannical Being in the world.

(14) Ib. p. 356.

(15) Nelson, ubi supra, p. 763, &c. Rushworth's Hist. Collect. Part iii. Vol. I. p. 184.

and opportunity to others to conclude, that he was no friend to the Church, or the established government of the same (z); and it caused many in the House of Commons to imagine, and hope, that he might be brought to a further compliance with their designs (a). Indeed the great opinion he had of the uprightness and integrity of those persons who appeared most active against the Court, especially of Mr Hamden, kept him for some time from suspecting any design against the peace of the kingdom; and tho' he differed from them commonly in conclusion, he believed long their purposes were honest. But when he grew better informed what was Law, and discerned in them a desire to controul that law by a vote of one, or both Houses, no man opposed more those attempts, and gave the adverse party more trouble by reason and argumentation (b). Accordingly, about six months after passing the abovementioned bill for taking away the Bishops votes, when the same argument came again into debate, he changed his opinion, and gave the House all the opposition he could; nor was he reserved in acknowledging, That Mr Hamden had assured him, if that bill might pass, there would be nothing more attempted to the prejudice of the Church (c). Tho' he thus voted against the Bishops, yet we are assured, that he had the order itself in perfect reverence, and thought too great encouragement could not possibly be given to learning, nor too great rewards to learned men (d). For some time he continued adverse to the Court, and was so jealous of the least imagination of his inclining to preferment, that he affected even a moroseness to the Court, and the Courtiers; and left nothing undone which might prevent or divert the King's or Queen's favour towards him (e). And therefore, when he heard that he was to be made a Privy-Counsellor, and Secretary of State, he resolved to decline the one, and refuse the other. But, at length, for certain reasons [M] he submitted to the King's pleasure (f); and served his Majesty in those employments, with great ability, being well versed in languages; and with the utmost integrity, being above corruption of any kind: though, at first, he was so totally unacquainted with business, and the forms of it, that he did believe he could not execute the office with any sufficiency. He was employed by the King, to demand from the Earls of Essex and Holland, the badges of their offices of Lord Chamberlain, and Groom of the Stole (g), and also to require the Seal from the Lord Keeper Littleton (h). June 15, 1642, he was one of the Lords who signed a Declaration, wherein they professed, they were fully persuaded that his Majesty had no intention to raise war upon his Parliament (i). About the same time, he subscribed to levy twenty horse for his Majesty's service (k). Upon which, and other accounts, he was excepted from the Parliament's favour, in the instructions given by the two Houses to their General, the Earl of Essex (l). He attended the King to Edgehill-fight, where, after the enemy was routed, he had like to incur great danger, by interposing to save those who had thrown away their arms (m). He was also with his Majesty at Oxford [N], and at the siege of Gloucester, where he exposed himself to danger (n). From the [M] For certain reasons.] His reasons for accepting of the Seals, were these two. First, The consideration that his refusal might bring some blemish upon the King's affairs, and that men would think he had refused to great an honour and trust, because he must with it have been obliged to do somewhat else not justifiable. The other was, Lest he might be thought to avoid it out of fear to do an ungracious thing to the House of Commons, who were very much troubled at the displacing of Sir Henry Vane. For, as he had a full desire of fame by just and generous actions, so he had an equal contempt of it by any servile expedients. — Whilst he continued in his office, there were two things he could never bring himself to. The one was, employing of spies, or giving any countenance or entertainment to them; namely, to such persons, who by communication of guilt, or dissimulation of manners, wind themselves into such trusts, and secrets, as enable them to make discoveries. The other, The liberty of opening letters, upon a suspicion, that they might contain matter of dangerous consequence. For the first, he would say, such instruments must be void of all ingenuity, and common honesty, before they could be of use; and afterwards they could never be fit to be credited: and that no single preservation could be worth for general a wound, and corruption of human society, as the cherishing such persons would carry with it. The last, he thought, such a violation of the law of nature, that no qualification by office could justify him in the trespass; and tho' he was convinced by the necessity, and iniquity of the time, that those advantages of information were not to be declined, and were necessary to be praised, he found means to put it off from himself (16).

[N] He was also with his Majesty at Oxford.] During their residence there, his Majesty went one day to see the publick library, where he was shewed among other books a Virgil nobly printed, and exquisitely bound. The Lord Falkland, to divert the King, would have his Majesty make a trial of his fortune by the Sortes Virgilianæ, an usual kind of divination in ages past, made by opening a Virgil. Whereupon, the King opening the book, the period which happened to come up, was that part of Dido's imprecation against Aeneas, Aeneid. lib. iv. ver. 615, &c. part of which is thus translated by Mr Dryden.

Oppress'd with numbers in th' unequal field,
His men discourag'd, and himself expell'd,
Let him for succour sue from place to place,
Torn from his subjects, and his son's embrace, &c.

King Charles seeming concerned at this accident, the Lord Falkland, who observed it, would likewise try his own fortune in the same manner; hoping he might fall upon some passage that could have no relation to his case, and thereby divert the King's thoughts from any impression the other might make upon him: but the place Lord Falkland stumbled upon, was yet more suited to his destiny than the other had been to the King's; being the following expressions of Evander, upon the untimely death of his son Pallas, Aeneid lib. xi. ver. 152, &c.

Non hæc, O Pallas, dederas promissa parenti, &c. thus translated by Mr Dryden.

O Pallas! thou hast fail'd thy plighted word,
To fight with caution, not to tempt the sword,
I warn'd thee, but in vain; for well I knew,
What perils youthful ardour would pursue:
That boiling blood would carry thee too far;
Young as thou wert in dangers, raw to war!
O curst essay of arms, disastrous doom,
Prelude of bloody fields, and fights to come (17)!

(b) Ibid. p. 571, 573.

(i) lb. p. 655, 656.

(k) List, at the end of the King's Answer to the Petition of the Lords and Commons presented to him at York, June 17, 1642, Lond. 4to.

(l) Id. Vol. II. Part i. p. 28.

(m) Ibid. p. 357.

(n) Ibid. p. 359.

(a) Vol. II. P. i. p. 356.

(a) Vol. I. P. i. p. 236.

(b) Idem, Vol II. Part i. p. 553.

(c) Idem, Vol. I. Part i. p. 237.

(d) Id. Vol. II. P. i. p. 37.

(e) lb. p. 353, 354.

(f) Ibid. p. 355, and Vol. I. P. ii. p. 349, 366.

(g) Ibid. Vol. I. P. ii. p. 477. This harsh office might have been more naturally and as effectually performed, by a Gentleman-Usher; and therefore the Lord Falkland was a little troubled at receiving the command, but however would make no excuse, ibid.

(16) Clarendon, Vol. II. Part i. p. 355.

(17) Memoirs, &c. by J. Wood, M.D. edit. 1718, 12mo, p. 90-92.

the beginning of the Civil War, his natural cheerfulness and vivacity grew clouded, and a kind of sadness and dejection of spirit stole upon him, which he had never been used to. After the resolution of the Two Houses not to admit any treaty for peace, those indispersions, which had before touched him, grew into a perfect habit of uncheerfulness; and he, who had been exactly easy and affable to all men, became on a sudden less communicable, and very sad, pale, and extremely affected with the spleen. In his clothes and habit, which he had before always minded with more neatness, industry, and experience, than is usual to so great a soul, he became not only incurious, but too negligent; and in his reception of suitors, so quick, sharp, and severe, that it made him be looked upon as proud and imperious. When there was any overture, or hope for peace, he would be more erect and vigorous, and exceedingly solicitous to press any thing which he thought might promote it. And sitting among his friends, often, after a deep silence, and frequent sighs, he would, with a shrill and sad accent, repeat the word peace, peace; and would passionately profess, That the very agony of the war, and the view of the calamities and desolation, the kingdom did and must endure, took his sleep from him, and would shortly break his heart (o). This extreme uneasiness seems to have hurried him on to his destruction. For, the morning before the first battle of Newbury, he called for a clean shirt, and being asked the reason of it, answered, That 'if he were slain in the battle, they should not find his body in foul linnen.' Being dissuaded by his friends to go into the fight, as having no call to it, and being no military officer, he said, 'he was weary of the times, and foresaw much misery to his own country, and did believe he should be out of it e'er night (p).' Putting himself therefore into the first rank of the Lord Byron's regiment, he was shot with a musquet, in the lower part of the belly, on the 20th of September, 1643, and in the instant falling from his horse, his body was not found till the next morning (q). Thus fell that incomparable young man (r), much lamented by all that knew him, or heard of him (s), in the thirty-fourth year of his age; having so much dispatched the true business of his life, that the eldest rarely attain to that immense knowledge, and the youngest enter not into the world with more innocency (t). His contemporaries have agreed to bestow upon him the highest commendations imaginable. They assure us, that he was a man of excellent, nay, of exceeding great, and prodigious parts, both natural and acquired (u); of a wit so sharp, and a nature so sincere, that nothing could be more lovely (w); of great ingenuity and honour (x); of the most exemplary manner, and singular good-nature, and of the most unblemished integrity (y); of that inimitable sweetness and delight in conversation, of so flowing and obliging a humanity and goodness to mankind, and of that primitive simplicity and innocency of life, as could hardly be equalled (z). His answers were quick and sudden, and tho' he had a great deal of true worth, yet he was withal very modest (a). His familiarity and friendship, for the most part, was with men of the most eminent and sublime parts, and of untouched reputation in point of integrity. He was a great cherisher of wit, and fancy, and good parts, in any man; and, if he found them clouded with poverty or want, a most liberal and bountiful patron towards them, even above his fortune (b). He was so great an enemy to that passion and uncharitableness, which he saw produced by difference of opinion in matters of Religion, that in all his disputes with Priests, and others of the Roman Communion, he affected to manifest all possible civility to their persons, and esteem of their learning or ingenuity (c). As his parts were great, so also was his knowledge and learning very considerable. Of which he hath left signal proofs in his learned writings [O], and in the assistance he gave the immortal Chillingworth, in his book of The Religion of Protestants, &c [P].

To

[O] His learned writings.] They are, first Poems. Next, besides those Speeches of his mentioned above, I. A Speech, 'Of Uniformity,' as we are informed by Mr Wood (18): but if he means the same which is in Rushworth (19), under that title, it is no more than the beginning of his Lordship's Speech against the Bishops, and Episcopacy, of which we have given an extract. II. A Speech, 'Of ill Counsellors about the King: in 1640 (20).' III. 'As for the Speech about Ship money, December 5, 1640.' And, the Speech concerning John Lord Finch, and the Judges, mentioned as two distinct ones by Mr Wood (21), they are one and the same: namely, that mentioned under the note [J]. IV. 'A Draught of a Speech, concerning Episcopacy, found amongst the Lord Falkland's papers since his death, written with his own hand.' Oxford, one sheet, 4to, 1644. V. 'A Discourse concerning Episcopacy.' Lond. 1660. 4to. VI. 'A Discourse of the Infallibility of the Church of Rome.' Oxford 1645, 4to. George Holland, a Cambridge Scholar, and afterwards a Romish Priest, having written an Answer to this Discourse of the Infallibility, &c. the Lord Falkland made a Reply to it, intitled, VII. 'A View of some Exceptions made against The Discourse of the Infallibility of the Church of Rome.' Printed at Oxford 1646, 4to.

The Discourse of the Infallibility of the Church of Rome; and the Reply to the Answer made thereto by G. Holland; were afterwards printed together, with a Preface signed J P supposed to be John Pearson (22). They were reprinted again in 1651, with this title, 'Sir Lucius Cary, late Lord Viscount of Falkland, his Discourse of Infallibility; with an Answer to it, and his Lordship's Reply, never before published; together with Mr Walter Montague's Letter concerning the changing his Religion, Answered by my Lord Falkland.' This Letter of Mr W. Montague is dated from Paris, November 21, 1635. VIII. The Lord Falkland was also author of 'A Letter to Mr F. M. anno 1636,' printed at the end of Mr Charles Gataker's Answer to Five captious Questions propounded by a Factor for the Papacy, by parallel Questions and positive Resolutions. Lond. 1673, 4to. This Factor for the Papacy was the same Fr. M. to whom the Lord Falkland's letter is addressed.

[P] He assisted Mr Chillingworth in his book of The Religion of Protestants, &c.] This particular we learn from Bishop Barlow (23), who says, That 'when Mr Chillingworth undertook the defence of Dr Potter's book against the Jesuit, he was almost continually at Tew with my Lord, examining the reasons of both parties, pro and con, and their invalidity or consequence;

(o) Ibid. p. 357, 358, 359.

(p) Whitlocke's Memorials, edit. 1732, p. 73, 74.

(q) Clarendon, ubi supra, p. 359.

(r) Ibid.

(s) Whitlocke, p. 74.

(t) Clarendon, p. 359.

(u) Idem, Vol. I. P. ii. p. 340. and Bishop Barlow's Genuine Remains, edit. 1693, p. 328.

(w) Clarendon, in the place last cited.

(x) Whitlocke, ubi supra.

(y) Clarendon's Animadversions on Fanaticism factually imputed to the Catholic Church, by S. Creffly, &c. p. 185.

(z) Clarendon, Vol. II. Part I. p. 350.

(a) Wood, Athen. ubi supra, from Dr Triplett's Preface to Lord Falkland's Discourse of Infallibility.

(b) Clarendon, ibid. p. 351.

(c) Ibid. p. 352.

(18) Ath. Vol. I. col. 587.

(19) Historical Collections, P. ii. Vol. II. p. 1342.

(20) Ibid. p. 1351.

(21) Ubi supra.

(22) Wood, ubi supra, col. 581.

(23) See his Genuine Remains, &c. Lond. 1693, 8vo, p. 329.

(d) Dr Triplett, in Wood, ubi supra, col. 587.
(e) Barlow's Genuine Remains, p. 328.
(f) See Wood, col. 587.
(g) S. Creffly in his Epistle Apologetical, printed 1674, §. 7, and Dr Triplett in his Epistle Dedicat. before the Lord Falkland's book of Infallibility.

To his honour be it spoken, he was also a sincere Christian (d), and a true son of the Church of England (e). Some indeed have charged him with being a Socinian (f), but all that knew him have cleared him from that imputation (g). And it is well known, how ready violent and passionate men are, to charge those that any way differ from them, with the damnable sin, as they think it, of heresy. Upon the whole, therefore, he was the envy and the wonder of his time, and the greatest ornament to this nation, that the last age, nay that any age hath ever produced (b). As to his person, he was little, and of no great strength; his hair was blackish and somewhat flaggy; and his eye black and lively (i). His body was buried in the Church of Great Tew (k). His usual saying, was, 'I pity unlearned Gentlemen, in a rainy day (l).'

(b) Dr Triplett, ibid. and Clarendon, in his Animadversions, ubi supra.
(i) Wood, Ath. ubi supra.
(k) Ibid.
(l) D. Lloyd's State Worthies, edit. 1679, p. 94f.

'sequence; where Mr Chillingworth had the benefit of my Lord's company, and his good library. The benefit he had by my Lord's company, and rational discourse, was very great, as Mr Chillingworth would modestly and truly confess. And so was also that which he received from his library, which was well furnished with choice books, such as Mr Chillingworth neither had, nor ever heard of many of them,

'till my Lord shewed him the books and the passages in them, which were significant and pertinent to the purpose. So that it is certain, most of those ancient authorities which Mr Chillingworth makes use of, he owes, first to my Lord of Falkland's learning, that he would give so good directions; and next to his civility and kindness, that he would direct him.'

C A R Y (ROBERT), a learned Chronologer in the XVIIth Century, and nephew of Sir George Cary, Knt. Lord Deputy of Ireland in Queen Elizabeth's reign (a), was born at Cockinton (b) in the county of Devon, about the year 1615 (c); being the second son of George Cary, Esquire [A]; and Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Edward Seymour of Berry-castle, Baronet (d). When he was well grounded in School-Learning, he went to Oxford, and was admitted Sojourner of Exeter-College, on the 4th of October 1631, aged sixteen. Having continued there about three years, he was in October 1634, chosen Scholar of Corpus-Christi-College in the same university (e). The next year, on December the 3d, he was admitted Bachelor of Arts (f); and the 23d of February 1638-9, proceeded Master of Arts (g). And it is probable, that he was also chosen Fellow of his College, tho' Mr Wood professes, he did not know (h). On November 4, 1644, he was created Doctor of Laws, by virtue of mandatory letters from the Chancellor, William Marquis of Hertford, who was his kinsman (i). Some time after, he travelled into France, the Low-Countries, and other foreign parts. At his return, he was presented by the Marquis of Hertford, to the Rectory of Portlemouth, near Kingsbridge in Devonshire, a living of a very good value (k). There he settled, and lived in very good repute: and being distinguished by his birth, degrees, and learning, the Presbyterian Ministers of those times never left him, 'till they had drawn him over to their party. For his greater encouragement, they made him Moderator of that part of the second Division of the county of Devon, which was appointed to meet at Kingsbridge (l). However, he was never zealous in their interest: for, upon the Restoration of King Charles II, he was one of the first that congratulated that King upon his return. For which he was soon after preferred to the Archdeaconry of Exeter, which he was installed into August 18, 1662 (+). But he was, in a little while, namely, in 1664, affrighted and ejected out of it, by some great men then in power: who taking advantage of some infirmities, or perhaps imprudences, of his, resolved to throw him out, in order to raise a favourite upon his ruins (m). Being thus deprived of his Archdeaconry, he retired to his Rectory at Portlemouth; where he spent the remainder of his days, in a private, cheerful, and contented condition; in good repute with his neighbours; and as much above contempt, as he was below envy. Having lived to a good old age of seventy-three years; he departed this life, at the parsonage house of Portlemouth, and was buried in his own Church there, on the 19th of September 1688, without any funeral monument (n). He was a man very perfect in curious and critical learning (o), particularly in Chronology: of which he gave a full testimony, in the excellent book he published, Palælogia Chronica. A Chronological Account of ancient Time, in three Parts, 1. Didactical. 2. Apodeictical. 3. Canonical. Lond. 1677, folio [B]. He was also, in his younger years,

(a) The Worthies of Devon. &c. by J. Prince, fol. Exeter, 1701, p. 197, 198.

(b) Wood says, it was at Berry Po meoy, Athen. Vol. II. col. 825; but we chuse to follow Mr Prince.

(c) Wood says, ibid. that he was aged 16 in 1631, and consequently must have been born in 1615.

(d) Prince, ubi supra, p. 197.

(e) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. II. col. 825.

(f) Idem, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 261.

(g) Ibid. col. 276.

(h) Athenæ; See Prince, ubi supra, p. 198.

(i) Prince, ibid. and Wood, Fasti, Vol. II. col. 42.

(k) Prince; and Wood's Athen. ubi supra.

(l) Prince, ubi supra.

(+) Kennet's Register and Chronicle, &c. edit. 1728, p. 744; and Le Neve's Fasti, p. 93.

(m) Ibid.

(n) Ibid.

(o) Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

(1) Sir W. Pole in Cock.

(2) W. Ac. Ped. quoted by Mr Prince, p. 197.

[A] Being the second son of George Cary, Esq; Sir George Cary, Knt. above-mentioned, formerly Lord-Deputy of Ireland, dying in 1615, without issue, adopted George of whom we speak here; who was the third son of his second brother Robert, according to one author (1), or, according to another (2), fifth son of his fourth brother John. This George Cary, Esq; had several sons and daughters; of whom the eldest, Sir Henry Cary, Knt. was entirely ruined by the civil wars. The second son was Dr Robert Cary, who is the subject of this article. Sir George Cary, Lord-Deputy of Ireland, was his great uncle

[B] Palælogia, A Chronological Account, &c. 'The design of that work (as the author himself says in the beginning of it) is to determine the just interval of time, between the great Epoch of the creation of the world, and another of the destruction of

'Jerusalem by Titus Vespasian, in order to the assignment of such particular time, wherein persons and affairs of old had their existence. The design of it was laid in the days of Cromwell's usurpation, and came, in process of time, to be quickened by a convenient occasion from some learned gentlemen of his acquaintance after the Restoration (3); who agreeing together in some appointed meetings, to discourse of the abstruse parts of the Holy Scriptures, having charged themselves with the several subjects, it was recommended to him, as his province, to account for the Chronology thereof.' In part I. he treats of time, as divided into hours, minutes, weeks, and years: and of the several sorts of years, the Chaldean, and Egyptian, Grecian, Roman, and Jewish; of all which he exhibits the calendars. Part II. Treats of the several epochs of time, and of the ancient monarchies pretty well skilled in Poetry, as well Latin as English: tho' he published nothing in this kind, but those Hymns of our Church, that are appointed to be read after the Lessons, together with the Creed, &c. These being translated by him into Latin verse, were printed on the flat sides of two sheets in folio. As to his person; he was of a middle stature, sanguine of complexion, and in his elder years somewhat corpulent. In his carriage and behaviour, he was as much a Gentleman, as he was in his birth and extraction: free and generous, courteous and obliging, and very critical in all the arts of complaisance and address (p).

(3) These are the author's own words, in his Preface.

(p) Prince, ubi supra.

chies and kingdoms; containing also lists, of the Kings of Sicyon, Argos, and Athens; of the Ptolemies; Syro-Macedonian, Median, Lydian, Assyrian, Chaldaean, Arabian, Ægyptian, Chinese, Lacedæmonian, Corinthian, and Latin, Kings or Monarchs: a list of the Roman Consuls; a scheme of the Athenian Magistrates, &c. Then follows a connexion of Sacred and Prophane History; a scheme of concurrent successions from Nabopolassar to the death of Alexander the Great; a scheme of the Jewish High-Priests; of the Kings of Judah and Israel; Kings of Tyre; Syria, Damascena, &c. the time of Christ's nativity; the History of the Acts of the Apostles timed; and many other curious particulars relating to the Bible Part III. Consisting of 97 pages, is entirely Canonical; being drawn up after the pattern of Helvicus. There is an account of this book in The Philosophical Transactions (4).

(4) No. 132, p. 808.

CASAUBON (ISAAC) one of the most learned Criticks, in the end of the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVII, century; was born at Geneva, Febr. 18, 1559; being the son of Arnold Casaubon and Jane Rosseau (a) [A]. He was educated at first by his father, and being a youth of excellent parts, made so quick a progress in his studies, that at the age of nine years he could speak and write Latin with great ease and correctness. But his father being obliged, for three years together, to be always absent from home, on account of business; he came thereby to be neglected, and entirely forgot what he had learned before. At twelve years of age he was forced to begin his studies again, and to learn as it were by himself; his father's frequent absence, and many avocations, hindering his teaching of him, except at vacant times. But as he could not in this method make any considerable progress, he was sent in 1578 to Geneva, to compleat his studies under the Professors there. By his indefatigable application he quickly recovered the time he had lost. He learned the Greek tongue of Francis Portus the Cretan, and soon became so great a master of that language, that this famous man thought him worthy to be his successor in the Professor's chair, in 1582, when he was but three and twenty years of age. In 1586, Febr. 1, he had the misfortune to lose his father [B]. The 28th of April following, he married Florence, daughter of Henry Stephens the celebrated Printer [C], by whom he had twenty children. For fourteen years he continued Professor of the Greek tongue at Geneva; and in that time studied Philosophy and the Civil Law under Julius Pacius. He also learned Hebrew, and some others of the Oriental Languages, but not enough to be able to make use of them afterwards [D]. In the mean time he began to be weary of Geneva; either because he could not agree with his father-in-law, Henry Stephens, a morose and peevish man; or that his salary was not sufficient for his maintenance; or because he was of a rambling and unsettled disposition. He resolved therefore, after a great deal of uncertainty, to accept the place of Professor of the Greek tongue and polite literature, which was offered him at Montpellier, with a more considerable salary than he had at Geneva. To Montpellier he removed about the end of the year 1596, and began his Lectures in the February following. About the same time, the city of Nîmes invited him to come and restore their University, but he excused himself. 'Tis also said, he had an invitation from the University of Franeker, but that is not so certain. At his first coming to Montpellier, he was much esteemed and followed, and seemed to be pleased with his station. But this pleasure did not last long; for what had been promised him was not performed; abatements were made in his salary; which also was not regularly paid: in a word, he met there with so much uneasiness, that he was just upon the point of returning to Geneva. But a journey he took to Lyons in 1598, gave him an opportunity of taking another, that proved extremely advantageous to him. Having been recommended by some gentlemen of Montpellier (b) to M. de Vicq, a considerable man at Lyons; this took him into his house, and carried him along with him to Paris, where he caused him to be introduced to the

(a) If. Casauboni Vita, inter ejus Epistolae, edit Theod. Janſon ab Almeloeven Rotter. 1-09. Niceron, Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Hommes Illust. Tom. XVIII. 800. p. 118, &c. and Bernard, Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Juillet 1710, Article 1. p. 5, 6, &c.

(b) Viz. Phillip de Canaye, Lord of Fresne, First President of the Chamber of the Edict at Castrès; and Mr Gillet.

[A] Being the son of Arnold Casaubon.] This Arnold was a native, and Minister, of Bourdeaux, a village of Diois in Dauphiné, but was obliged, on account of the persecution for Religion, to fly to Geneva. When that ceased, he was chosen Minister of Crest in Dauphiné; and here it was, that his son Isaac learned the first rudiments of Grammar. That he was born at Geneva, he informs us himself (1); and therefore Moreri confounds the father with the son, when he says, that the latter was born at Bourdeaux.

(1) In his 379th Letter, of Theod. Janſon of Almeloeven's edition.

[B] Had the misfortune to lose his father.] He died at Die, aged 63. Charles Bonarscius, and Andr. Eudæmon-Joannes, have affirmed, that he was hanged. But his son hath fully confuted that false and scandalous story (2).

(2) Niceron, ubi supra, p. 123.

[C] He married Florence, daughter of Henry Stephens, the celebrated Printer.] Who had withdrawn from Paris to Geneva. There had been a long intimacy between him and Casaubon; and that, probably, is what gave the enemies of the latter occasion to assert, that he had spent his youth in correcting the books printed by H. Stephens: which indeed is false, though no blemish to his reputation, if it had been true (3).

(3) Idem, p. 120

[D] But not enough to be able to make use of them afterwards.] About the year 1591, he fell into great trouble, of which he complains extremely in his letters, by being bound in a great sum for Mr Wotton, an Englishman, which he was obliged to pay. This straitened him, till he was reimbursed by the care of his friends, and particularly of Joseph Scaliger, about a year after (4).

(4) Bernard, as above, p. 8.

[E] At

First-President de Harlay, the President de Thou, Mr Gillot, and Nicolas le Fevre, by whom he was very civilly received. He was also presented to King Henry IV, who being informed of his merit, would have him leave Montpellier for a Professor's place at Paris. Casaubon having remained for some time in suspense which course to take, went back to Montpellier, and resumed his Lectures. Not long after, he received a letter from the King, dated January 3, 1599, by which he was invited to Paris, in order to be Professor of Polite Literature. He set out for that city the 26th of February following. When he came to Lyons, M. de Vicq advised him to stay there 'till the King's coming, who was expected in that place. Mean while, some domestick affairs obliged him to take a turn to Geneva, where he complains that justice was not done him with regard to the estate of his father-in-law. Upon his return to Lyons, having waited a long while in vain for the King's arrival, he took a second journey to Geneva, and then went to Paris; though he foresaw, as M. de Vicq and Scaliger had told him, he should not meet there with all the satisfaction he at first imagined. The King gave him indeed a gracious reception, but the jealousy of some of the other Professors, and his being a Protestant, procured him a great deal of trouble and vexation, and were the cause of his losing the professorship, of which he had the promise. Some time after, he was appointed one of the Judges on the Protestants side, at the conference between James-Davy du Perron, Bishop of Evreux, afterwards Cardinal, and Philip du Plessis-Mornay [E]. As Casaubon was not favourable to the latter, who, as we are assured, did not acquit himself well in that conference; it was reported, that he (+) would soon change his religion, but the event showed that this report was groundless. When Casaubon came back to Paris, he found it very difficult to get his pension paid, and the charges of removing from Lyons to Paris, because M. de Rosny was not his friend; so that, it was not without an express order from the King, that he obtained the payment even of three hundred crowns. The 30th of May 1600, he returned to Lyons, to hasten the impression of his Athenæus, which was printing there; but he had the misfortune of incurring the displeasure of his great friend M. de Vicq, who had all along entertained him and his whole family in his own house, when they were in that city; because he refused to accompany him into Switzerland. The reason of this refusal was, his being afraid of losing in the mean time the place of Library-keeper to the King, whereof he had a promise, and that was likely soon to become vacant, on account of the Librarian's illness. He returned to Paris with his wife and family the September following, and was well received by the King, and by many persons of distinction. There he read private lectures, published several works of the Ancients, and learned Arabic; in which he made so great a progress, that he undertook to compile a Dictionary, and translated some books of that language into Latin. In 1601 he was obliged, as he tells us himself (c), to write against his will to James VI, King of Scotland, afterwards King of England, but does not mention the occasions of it. That Prince answered him with great civility, which obliged our author to write to him a second time. In the mean time, the many affronts and uneasinesses he received from time to time at Paris, made him think of leaving that city, and retiring to some quieter place. But King Henry IV. would never permit him; and, in order to fix him, made an augmentation of two hundred crowns to his pension: and granted him the reversion of the place of his Library-keeper, after the death of John Gosselin, the then Librarian. He took a journey to Dauphiné in May 1603, and from thence to Geneva, about his private affairs; returning to Paris on the 12th of July. Towards the end of the same year, he came into possession of the place of King's Library-keeper, vacant by the death of Gosselin [F]. His friends of the Roman Catholick persuasion made now frequent attempts, to induce him to forsake the Protestant religion. Cardinal du Perron, in particular, had several disputes with him upon that point: after one of which a report was spread, that he had then promised the Cardinal he would turn Roman Catholick. So that, in order to stifle that rumour, the Ministers of Charenton, who were alarmed at it, obliged him to write a letter to the Cardinal to contradict what was so confidently reported, and took care to have it printed. About this time, the Magistrates of Nîmes gave him a second invitation to their city, offering him a house, and a salary of six hundred crowns of gold a year, but he durst not accept of it for fear of offending the King. In 1609, he had, by that Prince's order, who was desirous of gaining him over to the Catholick religion, a conference with Cardinal du Perron upon the controverted points; but it had no effect upon him, and he died a Protestant. The next year two things happened that afflicted (+) Viz. Casaubon.

(c) See Barnard, as above, p. 14.

[E] At the conference between James D. du Perron, and Philip du Plessis-Mornay.] This conference was held at Fontainebleau May 4, 1600. It was at first designed, that it should continue several days, but the indisposition of Mr du Plessis-Mornay was the cause of its lasting but one. The other judge on the Protestants side, was Mr Canaye, who convinced, as he pretended, by the arguments that were then used, became a convert to Popery. He used his utmost endeavours, to persuade Casaubon to follow his example; but not being able to prevail, he grew very cool towards him, and ceased to have the same regard and friendship for him, as he had, 'till then, expressed. As for Casaubon, he clears himself, in several of his letters, of the imputations thrown upon him, of his favouring Popery (5).

[F] He came into possession of the place of King's Library-keeper, vacant by the death of Gosselin.] His being possessed of that place, was a great advantage to him; not only on account of the salary, but because he had then free access to the books in that valuable library, which Gosselin would not permit him to have, as much as he desired, or wanted (6).

(5) See Letters, 319, 348.

(6) Nicéron, as above, p. 127.

afflicted him extremely; one was the murder of King Henry IV, which deprived him of all hopes of keeping his place; the other, his eldest son's embracing Popery [G]. The loss of the King, his patron and protector, made him resolve to come over into England, where he had often been invited by King James I. So, having obtained leave of the Queen-Regent of France, to be absent for a while out of that kingdom, he came to England in October 1610, along with Sir Henry Wotton, Embassador-Extraordinary from King James I. He was received in England with the utmost civility, by most persons of learning and distinction [H]. He waited upon the King, who took great pleasure in discoursing with him, and even did him the honour of admitting him several times to eat at his own table. His Majesty likewise made him a present of a hundred and fifty pounds, to enable him to visit the universities of Oxford and Cambridge (d). The 3d of January 1611, he was made a Denizon. And the 19th of the same month, the King granted him a pension of three hundred pounds (e): as also two Prebends, one at Canterbury (f), and the other at Westminster. He likewise wrote to the Queen-Regent of France, to desire Casaubon might stay longer in England than she had at first allowed him. But Casaubon did not long enjoy these great advantages. For a painful distemper, occasioned by his having a double bladder (g) soon laid him in his grave. He died July 1, 1614, in the 55th year of his age; and was buried in Westminster-abbey [I]. He had, as is already hinted above, twenty children [K]. We shall give an account of his writings, and of the books he published, in the note [L]. This great man received the highest encomiums from

(d) Nicéron, as above, p. 130.

(e) Conventions Fœdera, &c. published by T. Rymer, Vol. XVII. p. 707, 710.

(f) J. le Neve says, that he was made Prebendary of Canterbury in the 8th stall, in 1609, which certainly must be a mistake, Fasti, p. 17. edit. 1716.

(g) See Dr Thorius's Letter, de Iſaac Casauboni morbi moriſque cauſa, printed among Casaubon's Letters.

(7) Nicéron, as above, p. 129.

(8) In the 1056th of Almelovecn's edition.

[G] His eldest son's embracing Popery.] This last accident gave him a great deal of affliction and uneasiness; and the more, because a report was spread, that he himself had charged George Strauchan, a Scotchman, who taught his son the Mathematicks, to instruct him at the same time in the Popish Religion (7).

[H] He was received in England with the utmost civility by most persons of learning and distinction.] But it seems he did not meet with the like treatment from the inferior sort of people. For he complains in one of his letters (8), that he was more insulted at London, than he had ever been at Paris in the midst of the Papists; that stones were thrown at his windows night and day; that he received a great wound as he went to Court; that his children were affronted in the streets; and he and his family were sometimes pelted with stones. — He doth not mention, what were the grounds of those many incivilities, to himself, and family. But, if we may be allowed to guess; perhaps, his differing in some points from the Puritans of those times, might get him an ill name among the populace, and so draw upon him the uncivilities he complains of. For such was the common behaviour of those fairs!

[I] And was buried in Westminster-abbey.] Where there is a monument erected to his memory, with the following inscription.

Iſaacus Caſaubonus,
(O Doctōrum quicquid eſt, aſſurgite Huic tam colendo Nomini.)

Quem Gallia Reip. literariæ bono peperit, Henricus IV, Francorum rex invidiſſimus Luterian literis ſuis evocavit, Bibliothecæ ſuæ præfecit, charumque deinceps dum vixit habuit; eoque terris erepto Jacobus Mag. Brit. monarcha, Regum doctiſſimus, doctis indulgentiſſ. in Angliam accivit, munifice fovit, poſteritaſque ob doctrinam æternum mirabitur, H. S. E. invidia major. Obit ætern. in Chriſto vitam anbelans, Kal. Julii 1614. Ætat. 55.

Viro opt. immortalitate digniſſ. Thomas Mortonus Epif. Dunelm. jucundiſſimæ quoad frui licuit conſuetudinis memor. Pr. S. P. Cu. 163.

Qui noſſe vult Caſaubonum,
Non Saxa ſed Chartas legat
Superſuturas marmoris,
Et proſuturas poſteris.

[K] He had ——— twenty children.] John, the eldest, turned Roman Catholick, as has been mentioned above. Another, named Augustin, did the like, and became a Capuchin at Calais, where he was pensioned, with eleven others of the same order (9). Mr Du Pin relates of him the following particular, upon the authority of Mr Cotelier: Before he took the vow of Capuchin, he went to ask his father's blessing, which the father readily granted him; adding, 'My son, I 'do not condemn thee; nor do thou condemn me; we shall both appear before the tribunal of Jesus Christ (10).' What became of the rest of his children, (except Meric, mentioned in the next article) is not known. In 1612, he had a son born in England, to which the King and the Archbishop of Canterbury were godfathers, and Sir George Carp's Lady godmother (11).

[L] we shall give an account of his writings, and of the books he published.] They are as follows, I. In Diogenem Laërtium Notæ Iſaaci Hortiboni. Morgii 1583. 8vo. He was but twenty-five years old when he made these notes, and intended to have enlarged them afterwards, but was hindered. He dedicated them to his father, who commended him, but told him at the same time, 'He should like better one note of his upon the Holy Scriptures, than all the pains he could bestow upon profane authors.' These notes of Casaubon were inserted in the editions of Diogenes Laërtius, printed by H. Stephens in 1594 and 1598 in 8vo. and have been put in all other editions published since. The name of Hortibonus, which Casaubon took, is of the same import as Casaubonus, i. e. a good Garden; Casau, in the language of Dauphiné, signifying a Garden, and bon, good. II. Iſaaci Hortiboni Lectiones Theoreticæ; in Crispinus's edition of Theocritus, Genev. 1584, 12mo. reprinted several times since. III. Strabonis Geographiæ Libri XVII. Græce & Latine, ex Guil. Xylandri Interpretatione, edente cum Commentariis Iſaaco Caſaubono. Genevæ 1578, fol. Casaubon's notes were reprinted, with additions, in the Paris edition of Strabo in 1620, and have been inserted in all other editions since. IV. Novum Testamentum Græcum cum Notis Iſaaci Caſauboni in quatuor Evangelia & Actus Apoſtolorum Genevæ 1587, 16to. These notes were reprinted afterwards at the end of Whitaker's edition of the New Testament. Lond. and inserted in the Critici Sacri. V. Animadverſiones in Dionysium Halicarnassenſem, in the edition of Dionysius Halicarnassenſis, published by our author with Æmilii Portus's Latin version. Genev. 1588, fol. These were written in haste, and of no great value. VI. Polyani Strategematum, Libri VIII. Græce & Latine, edente cum Notis Iſaaco Caſaubono. Lugdun. 1589, 16to. Casaubon was the first who published the Greek text of this author. The Latin version, joined to it, was done by Justus Vultei, and first published in 1550. VII. Dicæarchi Geographica quædam, sive de Statu Græciæ; Ejusdem descriptio Græciæ versibus Græcis jambicis, ad Theophrastum; cum Iſaaci Caſauboni & Henrici Stephani notis. Genevæ 1589, 8vo. VIII. Aristotelis Opera Græce, cum variorum Interpretatione Latina, & variis Lectionibus & Castigationibus Iſaaci Caſauboni. Lugduni 1590, fol. Genevæ 1605, fol. These notes are only marginal, and were composed at leisure hours. IX. C. Plinii Cæc. Sec. Epist. Lib. IX. Ejusdem & Trajani imp. Epist. amœbæ. Ejusdem Pl. & Pacati, Mamertini, Nazarii Panegyrici. Item Claudiani Panegyrici. Adjunctæ sunt Iſaaci Caſauboni Notæ in Epist. Genevæ 1591, 12mo. Ibid. 1599, 1605, 1610, and 1611, 12mo. These notes are but very short.

(10) Nicéron, as above, p. 132.

(11) Memorials of affairs of State, &c. published by Edm. Sawyer, Esq. Vol. III. p. 407.

(9) Ogier, in his Travels.

from persons of learning in his time, and he really deserved them, not only on account of his short. X. Theophrasti Characteres Ethici Græcæ & Latine, ex versione & cum commentario Isaaci Casauboni. Lugduni 1592, 12mo. and 1612, 12mo. This latter edition is the most exact of the two, being revised by the author. Casaubon's edition of Theophrastus is still highly esteemed, and was one of those works which procured him most reputation. Joseph Scaliger highly extols it (12). XI. L. Apuleii Apologia, cum Isaaci Casauboni Casificationibus. Typis Conmelini 1594, 4to. In this edition he shewed himself as able a critic in the Latin, as he had done before in the Greek tongue. It is dedicated to Joseph Scaliger. XII. C. Suctonii Tranquilli Opera cum Isaaci Casauboni Animadversionibus. Genevæ 1595, 4to. Item editio altera emendata & aucta. Paris 1610 This second edition is enlarged. XIII. Publii Syri Mimi, sive sententiæ selectæ, Latine, Græcè versæ, & Notis illustratæ per Jos. Scaligerum; cum præfatione Isaaci Casauboni. Ludg. Batav. 1598, 8vo. XIV. Athenæi Deipnosophistarum, Libri XV. Græcæ & Latine, Interprete Jacobo Dalechampio, cum Isaaci Casauboni Animadversionem, Libris XV. Lugduni 1600, 2 vol. fol. Ibid. 1612, 2 vol. fol. Casaubon's notes take up the second volume, and are very large, and full of great learning. XV. Historiæ Augustæ Scriptores, cum commentario Isaaci Casauboni. Paris 1603, 4to. reprinted at Paris in 1620, with Salmasius's Commentaries on the same authors, fol. and at Leiden, in 1670, 2 vol 8vo. XVI. Diatriba ad Dionis Chryssostomi Orationes, published in the edition of that author by Frederick Morel at Paris 1604, fol. XVII. Perfi Satyræ ex recensione & cum Commentar. Isaac Casauboni. Paris 1605, 8vo. Lond. 1647, 8vo. These notes upon Persius, are Lectures he had formerly read at Geneva. They were enlarged in the edition of 1647. Scaliger used to say of them, 'That the fauce was better than the fish.' i.e. The commentary better than the text (13). XVIII. De Satyrica Græcorum Poesi, & Romanorum Satyra Libri duo. Paris 1605, 8vo. In this work Casaubon affirms, That the Satyr of the Latins was very different from that of the Greeks. Wherein he is contradicted by Daniel Heinsius, in his two books, De Satyra Horatiiana. Ludg. Batav. 1629, 12mo. But the learned Ezekiel Spanheim (14), after having examined the arguments of these two learned men, hath declared for Casaubon. Crenius hath inserted this tract of Casaubon, in his Museum Philologicum & Historicum. Ludg. Batav. 1699, 8vo. and also the following piece, which was published by our author, at the end of his two books, De Satyrica poesi, &c. XIX. Cyclops Euripidis Latinitate donata a Q. Septimio Florentino. XX. Gregorii Nysseni Epistola ad Eustathiam, Ambrosiam, & Basilissam, Græcæ, & Latine, cum notis Is. Casauboni. Paris 1601, 8vo. Hanoviz 1607, 8vo. This letter was first published by Casaubon. XXI. De Libertate Ecclesiastica Liber 1607, 8vo. pages 264. This book was composed by the author during the disputes between Pope Pius V. and the Republick of Venice; and contained a Vindication of the Rights of Sovereigns against the incroachments of the Court of Rome. But those differences being adjusted while the book was printing, King Henry IV. caused it to be suppressed. However, Casaubon having sent the sheets, as they came out of the press, to some of his friends, by that means some of the copies came to be preserved. Melchior Goldast inserted that fragment in his Collectanea de Monarchia S. Imperii, Tom. I. pag. 674. and Almelooven reprinted it in his edition of our author's letters. XXII. Inscriptio vetus dedicationem fundi continens, ab Herode Rege facta, cum Notis Isaaci Casauboni. This small piece, published in 1607, hath been inserted by T. Crenius in his Museum Philologicum. Casaubon's notes are short, but learned; however, he appears to have been mistaken, in ascribing the inscription on which they were made to Herod, King of Judæa, instead of Herodes the Atiænan. XXIII. Polybii Opera Græcæ & Latine ex versione Isaaci Casauboni. Accedit Æneas Taciticus de toleranda obfidione, Græcæ & Latine. Paris 1609, fol. & Hanoviz 1609, fol. The Latin version of these two authors was done by Casaubon; who intended to write a commentary upon them, but went no further than the first book of Polybius, being hindered by death. What he did of that, was published after his decease (15).

The great Thuanus, and Fronto Ducæus the Jesuit, were so pleased with that Latin version, that they believed it was not easy to determine, whether Casaubon had translated Polybius, or Polybius Casaubon — ut non facile dici posse crederunt, Polybiumne Casaubonus, an Casaubonum Polybius convertisset (16). At the head of this edition there is a Dedication to King Henry IV. which passes for a master-piece of the kind. And, indeed, Casaubon had a talent for such pieces, as well as for Prefaces. In the former, he praises without lowliness, and in a manner remote from flattery: In the latter, he lays open the design and excellencies of the books he publishes, without ostentation, and with an air of modesty. So that he may serve as a model for such performances. XXIV. He published, Jesepbi Scaligeri Opuscula varia. Paris 1610, 4to. Et Francosurtii 1612, 8vo. with a preface of his own. XXV. Ad Frontonem Ducæum Epistola, de Apologiâ, Jesuitarum nomine, Parisiis edita. Londini 1611, 4to. Casaubon, after his coming to England, was forced to alter the course of his studies, and to write against the Papists, in order to please his patron King James I. who affected to be a great Controversist. He began with this Letter, dated July 2, 1611. which is the 730th in Almelooven's collection, and for which King James made him a considerable present. It is a confutation of la Reponse Apologetique à l' Anti-coton, par François Bonald. Au Pont. 1611, 8vo. XXVI. Epistola ad Georgium Michaelæum Lingelsæm de quodam libello Sciopii, 1612, 4to. This letter is dated Aug. 9. 1612. and is the 828th of Almelooven's collection. XXVII. Epistola ad Cardinalem Perronium. Londini 1612, 4to. This letter, which is the 838th in Almelooven's collection, is dated Novemb. 9. 1612. It is not so much Casaubon's own composition, as an exact account of the sentiments of King James I, whose, and the Church of England's Secretary, he was, as he tells us, with regard to some points of Religion. Accordingly, it was inserted in the edition of that King's Works, published in 1619 by Dr Montague Bishop of Winchester. It is written with moderation. Cardinal du Perron undertook to give an Answer to it, which was left unfinished at his death. It has been likewise animadverted upon by Valentine Smalcus, the Socinian, in his, Ad Isaacum Casaubonum Parænesis. Racovizæ, 1614, 4to. publish'd under the name of Anton. Reuchlin. XXVIII. De Rebus sacris & Ecclesiasticis Exercitationis xvi. Ad Cardinalis Baronii Prolegomena in Annales, & primam eorum partem, De Domini nostri Jesu Christi Nativitate, Vita, Passione, Assumptione. Londini 1614. fol. Francosurtii 1615, 4to. Genevæ 1655 & 1663, 4to. What was the occasion of this work we learn from Mr Bernard (17): Namely, That soon after Casaubon's arrival in England, Peter du Moulin wrote to Dr James Montague, then Bishop of Bath and Wells, to inform him, that Casaubon had a great inclination to Popery; that there were only a few Articles, which kept him among the Protestants; and if he returned to France, he would change his Religion, as he had promised. Therefore, he desired him to endeavour to keep him in England, and to engage him in writing against the Annals of Baronius, since he knew that he had materials ready for that purpose. Accordingly King James employed him in that work, which was finished in eighteen months time. Nicéron thinks (18), that Casaubon was not equal to this work, because he had not sufficiently studied Divinity, Chronology, and History, and was not conversant enough in the Fathers. So that he is charged with having committed more errors than Baronius in a less compass. Besides, as he comes no lower than the year 34 after Christ, he is said to have pulled down only the pinoacles of Baronius's great building. It appears from letter 1095th of our author, that Dr Richard Montague, afterwards Bishop of Norwich, had undertaken to write against Baronius at the same time with himself; and he threatens to complain of him to the King, who had engaged him in that work. XXIX. Ad Polybii Historiarum Librum primum Commentarius. Paris 1617, 8vo. See above, No. XXIII. XXX. Isaac Casauboni Epistolæ. Hagæ Comit. 1638, 4to. publish'd by John Frederic Gronovius. A second edition — Octoginta duabus Epistolis auctior, & juxta seriem temporum digesta — was published afterwards by John George (16) Huetius de optimo interpretandi genere, ap. Blount Censura celebriorum auctiorum, p. 834. edit. Genevæ, 1694, 4to.

(17) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Juillet 1710, Artic. 1.

(18) Mémoires, &c. as above, p. 145.

(12) Speaking of the pleasure he received upon the perusal of it, he says, de potestate me continere potius, quin ea de te prædicarem, quæ & meritum tuum & amor meus postulant, quamquam quicquid de te dixerim, omne infortuitus ingenii tui fuerit.

(13) Scaligerana.

(14) In the preface to his translation of the Emperor Julian's Cæsars.

(15) See below, p. 29.

(b) Particularly Mr Colomies: See Niceron, p. 133.

his extensive knowledge, but likewise of his modesty, sincerity and probity. Some writers indeed, even of the Reformed Religion (b), have undervalued him, and called him a Half-Divine. But the reason they did not like him was, because he did not entirely agree with their sentiments in every point. For though he was a Protestant, he disapproved of some of Calvin's notions: and whoever doth so, is sure to be branded, by some zealot or other, with the odious name of Heretick, if not worse.

George Grævius: At Magdeburgh, and Helmstadt, 1656, 4to. These editions are eclipsed by the following one; intitled, If. Casauboni Epistolæ, insertis ad easdem responsonibus, quotquot hætenus reperiri potuerunt, secundum seriem temporis accurate digestæ. Accedunt huic Editioni, præter trecentas ineditas Epistolas, If. Casauboni vita, ejsdem Dedicaciones, Præfationes, Prolegomena, Poemata, Fragmentum de Libertate Ecclesiastica. Item Merici Casauboni Epistolæ, Dedicaciones, Præfationes, Prolegomena, & Tractatus quidam rariiores. Curante Theodoro Jansson ab Almeloveen. Rotterodami, 1709, fol. The letters in this volume are 1059 in number, placed according to the order of time in which they were written; and 51 without dates. A certain writer finds in them, neither elegance of Style, nor fineness of Thoughts; and censures, as very disagreeable, the mixture of Greek words and expressions that are dispersed throughout; affirming besides, that they contain no particulars tending to the advancement of Learning, or that are of any great importance (19). Another owns, that there is in them, the History of a man of probity and learning; but nothing otherwise very remarkable, except the purity of the language, and the marks of a frank and sincere mind (20). One author, on the other hand, assures (20) Sorberiana, p. 50. that they are all perfectly beautiful; and makes no scruple, to compare them to those of Grovius and Scaliger with regard to learning; and to assert, that they exceed them for the easiness and purity of the style, which is entirely epistolary, and not at all affected. XXXI. in 1710 were published, Casauboniana, sive Isaaci Casauboni varia de Scriptoribus Librisque judicicia, Observationes sacræ in utriusque Fæderis Loca, Philologica item & Ecclesiastica, ut & Animadversiones in Annals Baronii Ecclesiasticis ineditæ, ex variis Casauboni MSS. in Bibliotheca Bodliana reconditis nunc primum erutæ a Jo. Christophoro Wolfio, &c. Accedunt duæ Casauboni Epistolæ ineditæ, & Præfatio ad Librum de Libertate Ecclesiastica, cum Notis Editoris in Casauboniana, ac Præfatio, qua de hujus generis Libris differitur. Hamburgi, 1710, 8vo. There is nothing very material in this collection. C

(20) Sorberiana, p. 50.

(21) Mélanges d'Histoire & de Littérature, published under the name of Vignuel-Marville. See Bernard, ubi supra.

(19) Niceron, as above, p. 146.

(a) Niceron Mémoires pour servir à l'Histoire des Hommes Illustres dans la République des Lettres, Tom. XVIII. Paris 1732. p. 148.

A. Wood says, by mistake, that he was born in September. Athenæ Oxon. edit. 1721, Vol. II. col. 485.

(b) Niceron, ibid. See the last article.

(c) Wood, ibid.

(d) Idem, Fasti Vcl. I. col. 209.

CASAUBON (MERIC) son of Isaac, recorded in the foregoing article, and the only one of his sons whose name deserves to be transmitted to posterity, was born at Geneva, August 14, 1599 (a). He had the name of Meric given him from Meric de Vicq, a great friend and benefactor to his father (b). His first education he received at Sedan, but coming to England, with his father in the year 1610, he was instructed by a private master till 1614 (c) when he was sent to Christ-Church-College in Oxford; and being put there under a most careful Tutor, Dr Edward Meekirk (made in 1620, the King's Hebrew Professor) was soon after elected a Student of that house. He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, May 8, 1618 (d), and that of Master, June 14, 1621 (e), being even at that time eminent for his extensive learning. For, the same year, tho' he was but two and twenty, he published a book in defence of his father, against the calumnies of certain Roman Catholics [A]. This book made him known to King James I, who ever after entertained a good opinion of him; and also brought him into reputation abroad, especially in France, whither he was invited with offers of promotion, his godfather Meric de Vicq being then, or soon after, Keeper of the Great Seal of that kingdom. Three years after, he published another vindication of his father [B], (c) Ibid. col. 218. Niceron is mistaken, when he says, he was admitted at Oxford in 1616; for if so, he could not have been Master of Arts till 1623. But probably he was led into this mistake by an erratum in Wood's Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 281.

written

[A] He published a book in defence of his father, against the calumnies of certain Roman Catholics. The title of it is, Pietas contra maledicos patris nominis & religionis hostes. Londini 1621, 8vo. In this book he mentions several particulars of his father's life, and vindicates him against the calumnies of Caspar Scioppius, Julius Cæsar Boulanger, Andreas Eudæmon-Joannes, Heribert Rosved, and others, who had cast odious imputations upon his morals and religion (1).

[B] Three years after, he published another vindication of his father. It was intitled, Vindicatio patris adversus Impostores, qui librum ineptum & impium de origine Idololatriæ nuper sub Isaaci Casauboni nomine publicarunt. Londini 1624, 4to. (2). It is inserted, as well as the foregoing, in Mr Almeloveen's edition of Casaubon's letters. The occasion of this book was as follows. In 1624, there was published at London a treatise, intitled, 'The Original of Idolatries, or the Birth of Heresies. First faithfully gathered out of sundry Greek and Latin authors, as also out of divers learned Fathers, by that famous and learned Isaac Casaubon, and by him published in French for the good of God's Church, and was translated into English for the benefit of this monarchy, by Abraham Darcie.' It was dedicated to Prince Charles, and presented to King James I, and all the Lords of the Council. The end of it was to prove, 'That the Mass, a word of great extent and antiquity, which made the authors of the Augustane Confession, subscribed by Calvin, say, Falid accusantur Ecclesiæ nostræ, quod Missam aboleant, retinetur enim Missa apud nos, & summâ reverentiâ celebratur or rather indeed the whole Liturgy, antient and late, and every part of it, was delivered from ancient Heathens,

' Numa Pompilius, &c. and some part also taken out of the Alcoran; which to prove, his authors for the most part are some late collectors of Roman Antiquities, as Blondus, Alexander ab Alexandro, and the like, who say no such thing; but from what they say of the Romans, he makes his wrong inferences and applications (3). Meric Casaubon thinking his father much injured by the publication of that book, writ a letter, which he got one of the Bishops to shew to the King; his Majesty discovering thereby the fraud, ordered Nath. Butter the Bookseller, and Abraham Darcie to be committed to prison; and it was with great difficulty, that Dr Mountaine, Bishop of London made his Chaplain's peace, on account of his licensing it (4). Soon after, a French book, the original of the English translation being produced, it was found, continues our author (5), 'That an old title page had been by art and cunning transformed, the years altered, and the name of Isaac Casaubon inserted; and thus the world for mere gain and lucre (for I do not believe there was any further mystery in it at first) shamefully abused. Other editions or copies of the same book were found, and shewed to the King; yea, translations of it, that had been made, when my father was yet scarce born, &c.' Upon this, Meric Casaubon, published his Vindicatio patris, which, by the King's command, was translated in French and English. And yet, some years after, the same English translation was reprinted at Amsterdam, as is supposed, with this title. 'The Original of Popish Idolatry; or the Birth of Heresies. Published under the name of Casaubon, and called in the same year, upon misinformation. But now upon better consideration reprinted with Allowance; being

(3) This account Meric Casaubon himself gives us, in his Necessity of Reformation, in and before Luther's time, &c. Lond. 1664, 4to. p. 157, 158.

(4) Fuller's Ch. Hist. B. x. p. 112.

(5) Necessity of Reformation, &c. as above, p. 159.

(1) Niceron, as above, p. 150. and Fuller's Church Hist. B. x. p. 90.

(2) Containing eight sheets.

written by the command of King James I. About that time he was collated by Dr Lancelot Andrews, Bishop of Winchester, to the Rectory of Bledon in Somersetshire (f); and on the 14th of June 1628, took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity (g). He had now formed the design of continuing his father's Exercitations against Baronius's Annals, but was diverted by some accident. At length, when he came to maturity of years for such a work, and had acquainted Archbishop Laud his great friend and patron with his design, who was very ready to place him conveniently in Oxford or London, according to his desire, that he might be furnished with books necessary for such a purpose, the troubles and divisions began in England: so that having no fixed habitation, he was forced to sell a good part of his books, and, in the end, after about twenty years sufferings, was grown so old and infirm, that he could not expect to live many years, and thereupon was forced to give over that project (h). On the 19th of June 1628, he was made Prebendary of Canterbury, through the interest and recommendation of Bishop Laud (i). And when that Prelate was promoted to the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, he further preferred him; for on the 4th of October 1634, he collated him to the Vicarage of Minster in the Isle of Thanet, and the 25th of the same month, he was inducted into the Vicarage of Monckton in the same island (k). The 31st of August 1636, he was created Doctor in Divinity, by order of King Charles I, who was entertained at the same time, with his Queen, by the University (l). About the year 1644, during the heat of the Civil Wars, he was deprived of his preferments, abused, fined, and imprisoned (m). In 1649, one Mr. Greaves of Gray's-inn, an intimate acquaintance of his, brought him a message from Oliver Cromwell, then Lieutenant-General of the Parliament forces, desiring him to come to White-hall, on purpose to confer with him about matters of moment; but his wife being lately dead, and not, as he said, buried, he desired to be excused. Greaves came again afterwards, and Dr Casaubon being under some uneasiness, lest some evil should follow, desired him to tell him the meaning of the matter, but Greaves refusing, went away the second time. At length he returned again, and told him, that the Lieutenant-General intended his good and advancement, and his particular errand was, That he would make use of his pen to write the History of the late war, desiring withal, that nothing but matters of fact should be impartially set down. The Doctor answered, that he desired his humble service and hearty thanks should be returned for the great honour done unto him: but, that he was incapable in several respects for such an employment, and could not so impartially engage in it, but his subject would force him to make such reflections as would be ungrateful, if not injurious, to his Lordship. Notwithstanding this answer, Cromwell seemed so sensible of his worth, that tho' he could not gain him to do what he desired, yet he acknowledged a great respect for him, and, as a testimony of it, ordered, that upon the first demand there should be delivered to him three or four hundred pounds, by a Bookseller in London, whose name was Cromwell, whenever his occasions should require, without acknowledging, at the receipt of it, who was his benefactor. But this offer he rejected, tho' his condition was then mean. At the same time, it was proposed by Mr Greaves, who belonged to the Library at St James's, that if our author would gratify him in the foregoing request, Cromwell would restore to him all his father's books, which were then in the Royal Library, having been purchased by King James; and withal give him a patent for three hundred pounds a year, to be paid to the family as long as the youngest son of Dr Casaubon (n) should live; but this also was refused. Not long after, a proposal was made to him by the Embassador of Christina Queen of Sweden, whereby, he was invited by that Queen into her country, to have the government of one, or inspection of all her Universities; and for an encouragement, she proposed not only an honourable salary for himself, but offered to settle three hundred pounds a year upon his eldest son during life: but this also he waved, being fully determined to spend the remainder of his days in England (o). At the Restoration of King Charles II, he recovered his preferments; namely, his Prebend of Canterbury on the 13th of July 1660, and his Vicarages of Monckton, and Minster the same year (p). But, two years after, he exchanged this last for the Rectory of Ickham, near Canterbury, to which he was admitted, October 4, 1662 (q). He had a design, in the latter part of his days, of writing his own life; and would often confess, that he thought himself obliged to do it out of gratitude to the Divine Providence, which had preserved and delivered him from more hazardous occurrences, than ever any man (as he thought) besides himself had encountered with. Particularly, in his escape from a fire in the night-time, which happened in the house where he lived, at Geneva, while he was a boy: in his recovery from a sickness at Christ-Church in Oxford, when he was given over for dead, by a chymical preparation administered to him by a young Physician (r): in his wonderful preservation from drowning, when overset in a boat

(f) Wood, Ath. Vol. II. col. 485. Of this he takes notice in his 1st part Of Credulity and Incredulity, &c. edit. 1668. 8vo. p. 115.

(g) Wood, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 242.

(h) Wood, Ath. ubi supra.

(i) Wood, ib. and Wharton, Collectan. MS. fol. p. 77.

(k) Wharton, ib.

(l) Wood, Fasti. Vol. I. col. 270.

(m) Wharton, ib. and Attempt towards recovering the numbers and sufferings of the Clergy, &c. by J. Walker, P. ii. p. 8.

(n) Wood, by mistake, calls here Dr Casaubon, Isaac.

(o) Wood, Athen. as above, col. 485, 486.

(p) Bishop Kennet's Register and Chronicle, &c. Lond. 1728, fol. p. 204, 645, 727.

(q) Wharton, Collectan. as above, p. 77.

(r) See his treatise of Credulity and Incredulity, &c. P. i. p. 16, 17. edit. 1668.

' being a true and exact Description, &c.' Printed 1630. A Preface also was added in justification of the book and the first editors of it, where, among other things, it is said, ' That they that did suppress, were either Papists in their hearts, or such as hold with Papists, That ignorance is the mother of devotion, that the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ

' was departing from the land, &c.' Since that, a Pamphlet came out, much to the same purpose, in the very front of which Casaubon's name was placed (6); if it was that, intituled, Isaac Casauboni Corona Regia, the true author was Caspar Scioppius (7).

(6) Ibid. p. 160.

(7) Nicéron, p. 151.

(s) Wood, unten.
col. 483.

(t) Wood, Ath.
col. 483; and
Hist. & Antiq.
Univ. Oxon.
lib. ii. p. 282.

(u) Hist. & Antiq.
ibid.

boat on the Thames near London, the two Watermen being drowned, and himself buoyed up by his Priest's coat: and in his bearing several abuses, fines, imprisonments, &c. laid upon him by the fanaticks in the time of his sequestration. But deferring it from time to time, he did not live to do it (s). He died on the 14th of July 1671, in the seventy-second year of his age; and was buried in the fourth part of the first fourth cross-isle of Canterbury-Cathedral (t). Over his grave was soon after erected a handsome monument, with an inscription. He left by will a great number of manuscripts to the University of Oxford (u), and was author of several learned works [C]. His character is [C] And was author of several learned works.

They are, besides his two vindications already mentioned, these that follow. I. Optati Libri vii. de Schismate Donatistarum, cum Merici Casauboni Notis & Emendationibus. Londini 1632, 8vo. II. A translation from Greek into English of 'M. Aurelius Antoninus's Meditations concerning himself, with notes,' London 1634, and 1635, 4to. again with additions and corrections. Lond. 1664, 8vo. III. 'A Treatise of Use and Custom.' This is the whole title; but, as the author himself observes (8), there might be added, 'in things Natural, Civil, and Divine.' Lond. 1638, 8vo. The occasion of this treatise, as he tells us in the same place, was, 'His being at that time much troubled, and as he thought injured, by what in the law of this realm, goes under the name of Custom; to him before little known.' IV. 'The Use of daily publick Prayers in three Positions.' Lond. 1641, 4to. V. Merci Antonini Imperatoris de Scipio & ad Scipium Libri xii. Guil. Xylander Augustanus Græcè & Latine primus edidit: nunc verò, Xylandri versionem locis plurimis emendavit, & novam fecit: in Antonini libros Notas & Emendationes adjecit Mericus-Casaubonus, Jf. F. In eisdem Xylandri Annotationes. Lond. 1643, 8vo. There are in the beginning learned Prolegomena of our author; and at the end his notes; then those of Xylander follow. It is a neat and accurate edition. VI. 'The original of temporal Evils; The Opinions of the most ancient Heathens concerning it examined by the Sacred Scriptures, and referred unto them, as unto the source and fountain, from whence they spring.' Lond. 1645, 4to. VII. 'A Discourse concerning Christ his Incarnation and Exinanition.' With an Introduction, 'Concerning the Principles of Christianity and Divinity.' Lond. 1646, 4to. VIII. De verborum usu, & accuratæ eorum cognitionis utilitate Diatriba. Londini 1647, 8vo. IX. This same year, he published a more complete edition of his father's notes upon Perſius, than was that of 1605. The title of this second edition runs thus, Perſii Satyræ cum notis Iſaaci Casaubon, Londini 1647. 8vo. X. De quatuor Linguis Commentationis, Pars I. Quæ de Lingua Hebraica & de Lingua Saxonica. Accesserunt Gulielmi Sommeri ad verba vetera Germanica Lipsiana Notæ. Londini 1650, 8vo. He had not an opportunity of finishing the two other languages, Greek and Latin. XI. Terentius, cum notis Thomæ Farnabii in quatuor priores Comoedias, & Merici Casauboni in Phormionem & Hecyram. Londini 1651, 12mo. Farnaby dying before he had finished his notes upon Terence, the Bookseller engaged Casaubon to write notes upon the two last Comedies, the Phormio and the Hecyra, which the other had not done. XII. 'Some Annotations on the Psalms and Proverbs.' He tells us (9), that these observations were extorted from him, by the importunity of Printers, when he was not very well furnished either with books or leisure; but, worst of all, when nothing could be expected to be acceptable and welcome, but what relished of schism and rebellion. These Annotations were inserted in one of the latter editions of the Assembly's Annotations on the Bible. XIII. In Hieroclis commentarium de Providentia & Fato, Notæ & Emendationes. Lond. 1655, 8vo. and 1673, 8vo. Our author designed at first, to have corrected the Latin translation of Hierocles, which abounded with faults; but not knowing that the work was printing 'till it was almost entirely finished, he contented himself with adding a few grammatical and critical notes at the end. XIV. 'A Treatise concerning Enthusiasm, as it is an effect of Nature; but is mistaken by many for either divine Inspiration, or diabolical possession.' Lond. 1655, 8vo. In this book, which is divided into six chapters, he treats, 1. Of Enthusiasm in general. 2. Of Divinatory Enthusiasm. 3. Of contemplative and philosophical Enthusiasm. 4. Of rhetorical Enthusiasm. 5. Of poetical Enthusiasm. 6. Of precatory Enthusiasm. XV. De nupera Homeri editione Lugduno-Batavica Hackiana, cum Latina versione, & Didymi Scholii; sed & Eustathii, & locis aliquot insignioribus ad Odysseam pertinentibus. Item super loco Homericò dubiæ apud Antiquos Interpretationis, quo Dei in hominum tam mentes quam fortunæ imperium asseritur, binæ Dissertationes. Londini 1659, 8vo. reprinted in Almeloveen's edition of Casaubon's Letters. XVI. Epidæti enciridion, Græcè & Latine, cum notis Merici Casauboni; & Cebetis Tabula cum notis ejusdem. Lond. 1659, 8vo. The Latin translation in this edition is that of Jerom Wolfius. XVII. An English translation of, and notes on, 'Lucius Florius's History of the Romans.' Lond. 1659, 8vo. XVIII. He published, 'A true and faithful relation of what passed for many years between Dr John Dee and some Spirits, &c.' And put in the beginning a long Preface, to confirm the truth of what is said in that relation concerning Spirits. Lond. 1659, fol. XIX. He was author of, 'A Vindication of the Lord's Prayer as a formal Prayer, and by Christ's Institution to be used by Christians as a Prayer. Against the Antichristian practice and opinion of some men. Wherein also their private and ungrounded zeal is discovered, who are so strict for the observation of the Lord's-day, and make too light of Lord's prayer.' Lond. 1660. The first occasion of this treatise, as the author tells us in the Preface, was the relation of a strange affront done publicly unto Christ; or, if you will more punctually, to the Lord's prayer, in St Mary's Church in Oxford, by Dr John Owen, Dean of Christ-Church, who had the chief government of that University from 1652 to 1657; namely, His putting on his Hat, when the Lord's prayer was repeating by the preacher. This, Dr Owen denied afterwards (10); 'But therein, saith Mr Wood (11), he doth much err, for several now living in Oxon (i. e. in Wood's time) knew it well enough.' XX. 'A King and his Subjects unhappily fallen out, and happily reconciled, in a Sermon preached at Canterbury, on Hosea iii. ver. 4, 5.' Lond. 1660, 4to. XXI. 'The Question to whom it belonged anciently to preach? And whether all Priests might or did? Discussed out of Antiquity. Occasioned by the late Directions concerning Preachers.' Lond. 1663, 4to. These directions were set forth by the King, October 14, 1662, to restrain the abuses and extravagances of Preachers (12). XXII. Notæ & Emendationes in Diogenem Laërtium de Vita, &c. Philosophorum. These notes were added to those of his father, in the editions of Laërtius printed at London 1664, fol. and Amsterdam in 1692, 4to. XXIII. 'Of the necessity of Reformation in and before Luther's time, and what visibly hath most hindered the progress of it. Occasioned by some late virulent books written by Papists, but especially by that, intitled, Labyrinthus Cantuariensis. Here, besides some other points, the grand business of these times, Infallibility, is fully discussed.' Lond. 1664, 4to. This is chiefly an answer to Labyrinthus Cantuariensis, printed at Paris in 1658; which pretends to confute 'Archbishop Laud's Relation of a Conference with Fisher the Jesuit;' and in the 11th, 13th, and 14th Chapters of which, it is asserted, 'That Protestants are Schismatics, and no part of the Catholick Church.' XXIV. 'An Answer concerning the new way of Infallibility lately devised to uphold the Roman cause; the ancient Fathers and Councils laid aside, against J. S. (the author of Sure-footing) his Letter lately published.' Lond. 1665, 8vo. This Letter of J. S. (i. e. John Sarjeant, the author of Sure-footing, &c. so learnedly confuted by Archbishop Tillotson) was a sort of an answer to some passages in Dr Casaubon's book 'Of the Necessity of Reformation, &c.' and was printed at the end of Sarjeant's Sure-footing in Christianity. XXV. 'A Letter of Meric Casaubon, D. D. &c. to Peter

(8) Of Credulity and Incredulity, &c. p. i. p. 15.

(9) Of Credulity and Incredulity, Part i. p. 106.

(10) In a Letter to Dr Lewis du Moulin. See Dr John Durel's Vindiciæ Ecclesiæ Angl. c. iii. p. 31.

(11) Athen. Vol II. col. 487.

(12) They are extant in Bishop Kennet's Regist. and Chronicle, &c. Lond. 1728. fol. p. 794.

is thus represented. He was a general Scholar, but not extraordinary in any one sort, unless in criticisms, wherein probably he was assisted by his father's notes and papers (w). According to the ill custom of the times he lived in, he mixes too much Greek and Latin in his writings: but, however, that shows his very extensive reading. He was wont to ascribe to Descartes's philosophy; the little inclination people had in his time for polite learning (x). He was eminent for his piety, charity to the poor, and his courteous and affable disposition towards Scholars (y). He had several children, but none made any figure in the learned world: one, named John, was a Chirurgeon at Canterbury (z).

(w) Id. Athen. col. 485.

(x) Bernard, Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Tom. XXXV. Juillet 1710. Art. 1. p. 23.

(y) Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. ii. p. 282.

(z) Niceron, as above, p. 149. Wood, Athen. p. 486.

‘ Peter du Moulin, D. D. &c. concerning Natural Experimental Philosophy, and some books lately set out about it.’ Cambridge 1669, 4to. five sheets. XXVI. ‘ Of Credulity and Incredulity in things Natural, Civil, and Divine; wherein, among other things, the Sadducism of these times in denying Spirits, Witches, and Supernatural Operations, by pregnant instances and evidences is fully confuted; Epicurus his cause discussed, and the juggling and false dealing lately used to bring him and Atheism into credit, clearly discovered; the use and necessity of ancient Learning against the innovating humour of all along proved and asserted.’ Lond. 1668, 8vo. containing two parts. The third part was printed at London 1670, 8vo. under the following title, ‘ Of Credulity and Incredulity; in things Divine and Spiritual; wherein (among other things) a true and faithful account is given of the Platonick Philosophy, as it hath reference to Christianity: as also the bufferies of Witches and Witchcraft, against a late ‘ writer, fully argued and disputed.’ The late writer attacked only in the two last sheets of this book, was Mr John Wagstaff, who published, ‘ The question of Witchcraft debated; or, a discourse against their opinion, that affirm Witches.’ Lond. 1669, 8vo. But these two parts of Dr Casaubon's book lying dead on the Bookseller's hands, he printed a new title to them, running thus, ‘ A Treatise, proving Spirits, Witches, and Supernatural Operations by pregnant instances and evidences, &c.’ Lond. 1672 (13). XXVII. Notæ in Polybium, printed for the first time in the edition of that author, published by James Gronovius at Amsterdam in 1670, 8vo. XXVIII. Epistole, Dedications, Præfationes, Prolegomena, & Tractatus quidam rariiores, Curante Theodoro Janson ab Ameloveen; printed at the end of Isaac Casaubon's Letters. Roterodami 1709. XXIX. De Jure concionandi apud antiquos (14). This seems to be the same as the Treatise mentioned above No. 22. or perhaps it was a Latin translation of it (15). C

(13) Wood, Ath. col. 483.

(14) Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. ii. p. 282.

(15) This Catalogue of Casaubon's Works is taken from Niceron, as above, p. 150, &c. and from Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. ii. p. 282. and Ath. Oxon. Vol. 11. col. 486, 487, 488.

CAVE (WILLIAM) a very learned Divine in the end of the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVIIIth Century, was born at Pickwell in Leicestershire (a), of which parish his father was Rector [A]. On the 9th of May 1653, he was admitted into St John's-College in Cambridge; where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1656; and commenced Master in that faculty in 1660 (b). The 7th of August 1662, he was admitted to the Vicarage of Islington in Middlesex (c); and, some time after, became Chaplain in Ordinary to King Charles II. He took the degree of Doctor in Divinity in the year 1672 (d); and on the 16th of September 1679, was collated by the Archbishop of Canterbury to the Rectory of Alhallows the Great in Thames-street, London (e). The 12th of July 1681, he was incorporated Doctor in Divinity at Oxford (f). On the 21st of November 1684, he was installed Canon of Windsor, upon the death of Mr John Rosewell (g); about which time, as Mr Wood tells us (h), he became Rector of Hafely in Oxfordshire: but that seems to be a mistake [B]. He resigned his Rectory of Alhallows in 1689 (i), and the Vicarage of Islington in 1691 (k). But on the 19th of November before, namely, in 1690, he was admitted to the Vicarage of Ileworth in Middlesex (l), which being a quiet and retired place, probably suited best his most studious temper. He hath published the following books. I. ‘ Primitive Christianity: or the Religion of the ancient Christians in the first Ages of the Gospel.’ London 1672. reprinted several times since. II. Tabule Ecclesiasticæ, Tables of the ecclesiastical writers. Lond. 1674. reprinted at Hamburgh in 1676, without his knowledge (m). III. Antiquitates Apostolicæ: ‘ or the History of the Lives, Acts, and Martyrdoms of the holy Apostles of our Saviour, and the two Evangelists S. S. Mark and Luke.’ To which is added an introductory Discourse concerning the three great Dispensations of the Church, ‘ Patriarchal, Mosaic, and Evangelical. Being a Continuation of Antiquitates Christianæ, ‘ or the Life and Death of holy Jesus;’ written by Jeremy Taylor, afterward Bishop of Down and Connor (n). Lond. 1676, fol. IV. Apostolici: ‘ or the History of the Lives, ‘ Acts, Deaths, and Martyrdoms of those, who were contemporaries with or immediately succeeded the Apostles. As also of the most eminent of the primitive Fathers for the first three hundred years. To which is added, a Chronology of the three first Ages of the Church.’ Lond. 1677, fol. V. ‘ A Sermon preached before the Right Honourable the Lord-Mayor, Aldermen, and Citizens of London, at St Mary-Le-Bow, on the fifth of November, M.DC.LXXX.’ Lond. 1680, 4to [C]. VI. ‘ A Dissertation concerning

(d) From the Registers, as above.

(e) Newcourt, ubi supra, p. 249.

(f) Wood, Fasti, edit. 1721, Vol. 11. col. 218.

(g) J. Le Neve, Fasti Eccles. Angl. Lond. 1716. p. 387.

(h) Fasti, ubi supra.

(i) Newcourt, ubi supra, p. 249.

(k) Ibid. p. 678.

(l) Ibid. p. 676.

(m) Me plane in-fato, saith the author, in his Preface to Quartophyl. Ecclesiast. at the beginning.

(n) See Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. 11. col. 404.

[A] Of which parish his father was Rector.] His father was John Cave, M. A third son of John Cave, Esq; He was born at Pickwell, [of which he afterwards became Rector] and educated at Lincoln College in Oxford, where he was Chamber-fellow with the famous Dr Saunderson for eight years. During the unhappy Civil Wars, he was several times plundered, imprisoned, and many other ways miserably abused; and at last disposse'd of his Living, and turn'd out of doors, with a wife, and six children he then had. See a full Account of it in Mr Walker's Attempt towards recovering an Account of the Numbers and Sufferings of the Clergy, &c. (1).

[B] But that seems to be a mistake]. For the Rectory of Hafely is annex'd to the Deanry of Windsor (2).

[C] A Sermon preached before the Lord Mayor, &c. on the fifth of November, 1680.] It is dedicated by the Author to Sir Patience Ward, Lord Mayor of London, and to the Court of Aldermen. His Text is Acts xvii. 6. These that have turned the World upside down, are come hither also. Upon which he discoursed under these three heads. ‘ 1. He shews, that this has been an old charge upon Religion, and the Professors of it, to be disturbers of the publick peace. ‘ 2. That Christianity is so far from being justly obnoxious

(2) See Librorum Vidorum & Decimarum, by Mr Ecton, Lond. 1728, 8vo. p. 270.

(a) See an Attempt towards recovering an Account of the Numbers and Sufferings of the Clergy, &c. by J. Walker, M. A. Lond. 1714, fol. Part ii. p. 220.

(b) From the college-books and university-registers, communicated by the learned Dr W. Richardson.

(c) Newcourt Repertorium Eccles. &c. Lond. 1708, fol. Vol. I. p. 678.

(1) As quoted above, p. 220, 221.

cerning the Government of the Ancient Church, by Bishops, Metropolitans, and Patriarchs. More particularly, concerning the ancient Power and Jurisdiction of the Bishops of Rome, and the Encroachments of that upon other Sees, especially the See of Constantinople.' Lond. 1683, 8vo. VII. Ecclesiastici: 'or the History of the Lives, Acts, Death, Writings of the most eminent Fathers of the Church, that flourished in the fourth Century. Wherein among other things an account is given of the Rise, Growth, and Progress of Arianism, and all other Sects of that age descending from it. Together with an Introduction, containing an historical Account of the State of Paganism under the First Christian Emperor.' Lond. 1682, fol. VIII. 'A Sermon preached before the King at Whitehall on Sunday, January 18, 1684-5,' on Psalm iv. 7. Published by his Majesties Special Command.' Lond. 1685, 4to. IX. Chartophylax Ecclesiasticus [D]: Lond. 1685, 8vo, X. Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum, Historia Literaria: i. e. A Literary History of Ecclesiastical Writers [E], in Two Parts, fol. the first printed at Lond. 1688; and the second in 1698. XI. 'A Serious Exhortation, with some important Advices relating to the late Cases about Conformity, recommended to the present Dissenters from the Church of England.' It is the twenty-second in the London Cases. This very learned person, died at Windsor on the 4th of August 1713, and was buried in Ilington Church, where a monument was erected to his memory (o). He was an excellent and universal Scholar, an elegant and polite Writer, and a florid and very eloquent Preacher. He was thoroughly acquainted with the History and Constitution of the Christian Church. His works, particularly his Lives of the Apostles, Lives of the Fathers, and Primitive Christianity, as they evince his great knowledge of Antiquity, so are they justly esteemed the best books, written upon those important subjects.

(o) Annual List of the Deaths of eminent persons, at the end of Bever's History of Queen Anne, fol. Lond. 1735, p. 63.

'noxious to this charge, that of all Religions it best secures the interests of Civil Authority, and the Peace of the world. 3. He enquires, whether there be any part of the Christian Church at this day justly guilty of this charge.' And without hesitation he lays the charge at the door of the Church of Rome. It is one of the best, and most eloquent Sermons, ever preach'd upon that subject. The Author appears by it, to have been a man of prodigious reading, and an universal scholar.

[D] Chartophylax Ecclesiasticus.] This book is an improvement of the Tabula Ecclesiastica above mentioned; and a kind of abridgement of the author's Historia Literaria: It containing a short account of most of the Ecclesiastical Writers from the birth of Christ to the year 1517.

[E] Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum Historia Literaria.] This learned and useful work was reprinted at Geneva in 1705 and 1720: and a new Edition of it was lately printed at London by Subscription, with very large Additions and Emendations throughout the whole, made by the Author during the last twelve Years of his life. Together with new Prolegomena composed also by the Author. C

CAVENDISH, or CANDISH (THOMAS), a famous Navigator in the XVIth Century, and the second Englishman that sailed round the world, was the son of William Cavendish of Trimley St Martin [A], in the county of Suffolk, Esquire (a). He was born at Trimley, where he had a fine seat, and large possessions (b): but having in a few years consumed almost his whole estate, in gallantry and following the Court, he thought to recover his sinking fortune by a voyage to the South-Sea (c). At that time, the Spaniard against whom England had some time before declared war, was looked upon as a formidable enemy, whom it was necessary to distress on every side: Mr Cavendish, therefore chose to endeavour to do it on the side of America. For that purpose, he procured three ships; namely, The Desire of one hundred and twenty tons; The Content of sixty; and the Hugh Gallant, a bark of forty tons: two of them new built from the stocks. They carried in all, an hundred and twenty-three persons of all forts; and had victuals sufficient for two years, with all other necessaries, furnished by Mr Cavendish himself; who was Admiral of this little fleet. They sailed from Plymouth the 21st of July 1586; and, on the 26th of August, arrived at Sierra Leona, which was nine hundred and thirty leagues from the place of their departure (d). There they landed, and going up to one of the Negroes towns, burnt two or three houses, and took what spoil they would, all the inhabitants being fled into the woods. But, a few days after, the Negroes had their revenge, hurting many of the English, and killing one with a poisoned arrow. They departed from Sierra Leona the 6th of September, and staid till the 10th, at one of the Cape-Verd islands. The last day of October, about twenty-four leagues from Cape-Frio in Brasil, they fell in with a great mountain, which had a high round top like a town,

(a) the Peerage of England, &c. by Ar. Collins, Esq; edit. 1735, 8vo, Vol. 1. p. 121.

(b) Ibid. and Stow's Annales, edit. 1631, p. 809.

(c) The Naval Hist. of England, by T. Lediard, edit. p. 229.

(d) Voyages, Navigations, &c. published by R. Hakluyt, Vol. III. edit. 1600, p. 803.

