[BBB] His genius.] The least circumstance becomes interesting when related to such a genius as Milton's. Hence we find it first observed, that there is more than one passage in his juvenile poems which gives reason to believe his poetical vein flowed fullest and easiest in the spring; and hence it is too, that Mr Philips relates what he says he was told by himself, that his vein never happily flowed but from the autumnal equinox to the vernal. Lastly, hence it comes to pass, that this seeming contrariety hath raised much matter for speculation, and many words have been spent upon it, as may be seen in the authors cited on the margin (91). In the mean time Mr Fenton's remark is, perhaps, the only one well worth preserving. 'That the inequalities found in his works shew him sometimes to have been no more than one of the people (92).'

[CCC] Used to read to him.] The second daughter lived single, and the third, Deborah, was married to Mr Abraham Clarke a weaver in Spital-fields, and died August 24th, 1727, in the 76th year of her age. A little before her death she informed Dr Ward, Professor of Rhetoric at Gresham-college, that Isaiah, Homer, and Ovid's Metamorphoses, were books which they were often called to read to their father; and at the doctor's desire she repeated a considerable number of verses from the beginning of both these poets, with great readiness. He knew her by the likeness she bore to her father's picture, and telling her so, she informed him that Mr Addison told her the same thing: for he hearing she was alive sent for her, and desired her to bring some papers of her father's as a proof of her being his daughter. But she was no sooner introduced to him than he said, 'Madam, you need no other voucher, your face is a sufficient testimonial whose daughter you are.' He made her a handsome present of a purse of guineas, with a promise of procuring her an annual provision for her life, but he dying soon after, she lost the benefit of his generous design. She appeared to be a woman of a good sense, and a genteel behaviour, and to bear the inconveniencies of a low fortune with decency and prudence. She had several children, and her youngest daughter Elizabeth, wife to Mr Thomas Foster, was visited in 1738 by Dr Ward at her house in Pelham-street Spital-fields, where she kept a chandler's shop, but removed first to Lower Holloway between Highgate and London, and from thence to Cock-Lane, not far from Shoreditch. She gave Dr Ward the following particulars which she had often heard from her mother Mrs Clarke: 'who meeting with very ill treatment from Milton's wife, left her father, and went to live with a lady whom she called Merian. This lady going over to Ireland, and resolving to take Milton's daughter with her, if he would give his consent, wrote a letter to him of her design, and assured him, that as chance had thrown his daughter under her care, she would treat her no otherwise than as his daughter, and her own companion. She lived with that lady 'till her marriage, and came over again to England during the troubles in Ireland under King James the Second.' Mrs Foster said there were three pictures of her grandfather, the first painted while he was a school-boy, then in the possession of Charles Stanhope, Esq; the second, when he was about 25 or 26 years of age, and the third when he was pretty well advanced in years. That the late Queen Caroline, consort to his present Majesty King George the Second, sent Mrs Clarke 50 l. and that she received other presents of money from several gentlemen. The mask of Comus was acted at Drury-Lane April 5th, 1750, for Mrs Foster's benefit; with a prologue by Mr Samuel Johnson, which brought her near one hundred and thirty pounds (93).

MOLESWORTH [ROBERT], Viscount Molesworth of Swords in Ireland, an eminent Statesman and polite writer, was descended of a Saxon family, anciently seated in the counties of Northampton and Bedford in England [A]. But our author's father, Robert Molesworth, who, throughout the civil wars, had served under his eldest brother in the station of a Captain, after the kingdom of Ireland was delivered up by the Marquis of Ormond to the Parliament of England (a), became an adventurer for carrying on the war, in order to reduce it to their obedience, by making three several subscriptions, two of 600 pounds each, and one of 300 pounds; for which he had allotted 2500 acres of land, Irish measure, in the baronies of Moghergallin and Lune in the county of Meath. He afterwards became a very eminent Merchant of Dublin, and in high confidence with the Government then presiding in Ireland. Making his Will on the 15th of August 1656, he devised all his lands in the baronies of Screene and Lune in the county of Meath to his loving wife (b) Judith, and the heirs of their bodies, remainder to her and her heirs for ever; and (except a few legacies) the rest of his estate, real and personal, to his loving father and mother-in-law, whom he appointed executors; out of which they were to give the child or children which his wife then went withal, or should thereafter have by him, such portion as they should think fit, and have the tutelage, guardianship, education, and disposal, of it or them, as if their own. He died September 3d that year, and was buried the 9th in St Audoen's church at Dublin, leaving his wife big with his only child, the subject of the present article, who raised himself and family to the honours they now enjoy, and was born in December after his father's death at Dublin, and bred at the college there. He engaged early in a marriage with Letitia, third daughter of Richard Coloony, sister to Richard Earl of Bellamont, who brought him a daughter, Margaret, baptized February 9, 1677 (c). When the Prince of Orange entered England in 1688, Mr Molesworth distinguished himself by an early and zealous appearance in defence of the religion and liberty of his country; which rendered him so obnoxious to the party of King James the Second, that he was attainted, and his estate sequestered, by that King's Parliament, May 7, 1689. But when King William was settled on the throne, he called this sufferer, for whom he had a particular esteem, into his Privy-Council (d), and, in 1692, sent him Envoy Extraordinary to the court of Denmark, where he resided in that honourable station above three years*; 'till some particulars in his conduct gave so much offence to his Danish Majesty, that he was forbid the Court [B]: upon which, pretending business to Flanders, he

[A] Family anciently seated in the counties of Northampton and Bedford ] The first of the family mentioned in history, was Sir Walter de Moldefworth or Molesworth (1); who attended King Edward the First in his expedition to the Holy Land against the Infidels, (to which his coat of armour alludes) and the 26th of that reign, was constituted Sheriff of the counties of Bedford and Bucks for the space of ten years (an office in those early times of great trust and authority). In 1306, when the King, on a grand Whitsontide festival, to adorn his court with greater splendor, and augment the glory of his intended expedition into Scotland, knighted Edward Earl of Carnarvon, his eldest son; the young Prince, immediately after the ceremony at the altar in Westminster-Abbey, conferred the same honour on near three hundred gentlemen, the sons of Earls, Barons, and Knights, of which number was Sir Walter de Molesworth; and that Prince succeeding to the throne 7 July 1307, directed a charter of summons to Sir Walter and his Lady to attend at his coronation (2); appointing him that year, with Gilbert de Holme, Sheriff of the aforesaid counties, and in 1317, sole Sheriff of the same.—He was returned Knight for the county of Bedford to the first Parliament of that King, which met at Westminster the 5th of his reign, and (as was then the custom) both he and Gerard de Braybroke his colleague, had writs of their expences issued for their attendance and service; three years after, he represented that county again, but not long surviving, was succeeded by his son Hugh, who, the same year, with Henry de Tilly, was Knight for the county of Huntingdon, in the Parliament held at York, having the like writ for defraying his expences. To him succeeded his son and heir Sir Walter de Molesworth, whose son Richard is mentioned in the pipe rolls of Northamptonshire, 13 Edward III. (1339), in relation to a fine of 20 l. for a pardon to him and others at the King's suit, for an infringement of the peace belonging to the royal cognizance, on the death of John de Sutton Lungeville.

He married Eleanor, daughter and heir to Sir Thomas Mortimer of the city of London (a descendant of the noble house of Mortimer) and by her was ancestor to Sir Roger Molesworth of the county of Huntingdon, Knight; whose Son John of the same county became also seated at Helpeston in Northamptonshire, served the office of Escheator for the county of Rutland, and died 14 May 1542, leaving John his heir, then twenty six years of age, who married Margaret, daughter and heir to William Westcot of Hanfare in Staffordshire, Esq; and had by her five sons, the eldest of whom Anthony (3), was ancestor to the Viscount Molesworth.—By his marriage with Cicely, daughter and heir to Thomas Hurland of Fotheringay in the county of Northampton, he became possessed of that inheritance; but being a man of great generosity and hospitality, and profusely entertaining Queen Elizabeth at that his seat, several days, at different times he so far involved himself in debt, that (to shew he was as just as he was generous) he sold the best part of his estate, and disposed of Helpeston to an ancestor of Earl Fitz. William. He left two sons, William, and Nathaniel, who accompanied Sir Walter Raleigh in his voyage to Guinea, and after his return, perished by shipwreck in his passage to Ireland; William the elder took share with the Duke of Bucks in his unfortunate expedition to the isle of Rheé, in aid of the Rochellers, and by his son-in-law, Gervas Holles, (a worthy and authentic Antiquary †) is stiled Protribunus Militum sub regimine Peregrini Bertie Militis; Lieutenant-Colonel in Colonel Peregrine Bertie's regiment. He married Mary, daughter to Sir Francis Palmes of Ashwell in the county of Rutland, and left issue a daughter, married to the said Gervas Holles, Esq; and three sons, the youngest of whom, Robert, was father to Viscount Molesworth, the subject of this article (4).

he retired thither without any audience of leave, and from thence returned home, and immediately drew up an account of that country, representing the government thereof to be arbitrary and tyrannical [C]. This piece was greatly reſented by Prince George of Denmark, conſort to the Princeſs (afterwards Queen) Anne; and Mr Scheel, the Daniſh Envoy, firſt preſented a memorial to King William, complaining of it, and then furniſhed materials for an answer, which was executed by Dr William King (e) [D]. Our author, however, met with his admirers; the Account was well received by the public, and tranſlated into ſeveral languages. The ſpirit of it was particularly approved by the Earl of Shaftesbury, the celebrated author of the Characteriſtics; who from thence conceived a great eſteem of him, and ſoon after entered into a cloſe friendſhip with him [E].

without his name to it, took occaſion thence to addreſs his animadverſions upon it to our author himſelf, in a preface; where, among other ironical reaſons given why he could not be the author of it, he has the following: "I ſhall not trouble you much longer, only tell you that a principal reaſon why we ſhould not take this book to be your's, is, a remark which may be found in authors that treat concerning ambaffadors, viz. That he ought to be no detractor, or ſpeaker ill of any King or State, but more eſpecially of him or them with whom he remains. The reaſons are plain, becauſe detractions are beneath the honour of the Prince whoſe character he ſuſtains; and then ſuch actions would make Ambaffadors from ſuch a Prince be treated for the future rather as ſpies and enemies, than as men whoſe perſons are to be held ſacred. We are of opinion that nothing could make you ſwerve from this rule, and that no provocation could force you to it. However, there are two things that happened in Denmark, which to another man might give ſome ſmall occaſion, and are as follow: It ſeems an Envoy there, who had been above three years in the Daniſh Court, where at firſt he was very welcome, became at laſt to be very diſagreeable, by boldly pretending to ſome privileges that by the cuſtom of the country are denied to every body. There is throughout all Sealand a double road, one is common to all people, the other, called the King's road, is reſerved to his Majeſty of Denmark and his attendants; this is ſhut up with ſeveral gates, and has great ditches on both ſides of it. The Envoy travelling one day to Helſingor, was reſolved to paſs this way in his chariot, and accordingly did ſo, after he had broke down the gates; which action, as it would have been a great miſdemeanour in any Dane, ſo it was reſented by the Court, as a rudeneſs in a foreigner.—At another time this ſame Envoy went to the iſle of Amack near Copenhagen, where abundance of hares are kept for the King of Denmark's game, and that with ſo much care, that any man is ſeverely puniſhable, who preſumes to kill one of them, unleſs in the King's company. However, this gentleman was reſolved to have a course; but in his way thither was accoſted by one of the King's huntſmen, who deſired him to fend his dogs back, otherwiſe he was in duty obliged to ſhoot them. Inſtead of any reply to this, one of the Envoy's footmen cut the keeper over the head with his ſword. The man, all bloody as he was, went preſently to Count Reventlaw, great Maſter of the Game, and made his complaint to him. Theſe actions being repreſented to the King, his Majeſty was extremely offended at them, and ſhewed it by the cold reception the Envoy afterwards met with at Court, who was likewiſe given to underſtand, that he was not very welcome there. Upon this, pretending buſineſs into Flanders, he retired thither without any audience of leave; and from thence (as related in the text) went home, where his maſter would have had him return, and perform that ceremony; but he rather choſe to loſe the preſents given upon thoſe occaſions, than viſit a Court again that had been ſo juſtly offended with him, and yet pretended to be angry, becauſe he had not the uſual preſent for Envoys, which his own rudeneſs and abſence deprived him of (5)."

(5) King's Animadverſions on the pretended Account of Denmark, in the preface.

[C] Represented the government of Denmark to be tyrannical. In the conclusion, having obſerved that it is a general miſtake among us, that the Popiſh religion is the only one of all the Chriſtian ſects, proper to introduce and eſtabliſh ſlavery; he maintains, that in Denmark, through the entire and ſole dependance of the clergy upon the Prince; through their principles and doctrine, which are thoſe of unlimited obedience; and through the authority they have with the common people, &c. ſlavery ſeems to be more abſolutely eſtabliſhed than it is in France; as in effect it is more practiſed. Of this he gives ſeveral inſtances, and in proceeding even goes ſo far, as to aſſert that in ſome particulars the Daniſh government is more rigorous than that of the Turks: Nor was there any hopes, in his opinion, of a change, ſince the ancient love of liberty ſeemed to be quite extinct among them. "The newneſs of the alteration of the government ſeems, continues he, to have little or no influence at preſent upon the people, the King having taken ſuch care, by reducing ancient and rich families to a low eſtate, by raiſing new ones, by making all the people poor in ſpirit as well as purſe, that thirty two years has had an effect conducing to his purpoſe as much as three hundred could have done. Inſomuch, that, I verily believe, the Danes do now love ſervitude. Thirdly, the unity of religion, and the opinions, together with the authority of the prieſts, ſeems to have cut away the root of ſedition from whence alterations might proceed. Fourthly, a ſtanding army compoſed, for the moſt part, of foreigners, who have no value for the natives, oor any concern for their welfare. The Court ſeems to have had this in it's eye, when it raiſed and maintained ſuch an army, but in proceſs of time the army is become the people; that is to ſay, the only thing worth the King's care and affection, and the people nothing, ſo that no deſigns tending to a revolution are to be feared from them.

[D] Executed by Dr King. The doctor intimates, that our author's temper was ſo ſoured by the indignity mentioned in remark [B], as to inake him beſpatter the whole country; to conceal ſeveral things that would have been for the credit of that nation; to ſet truth in ſuch a light as to appear quite different from itſelf; and to advance a great many particulars in which he may be plainly contradicted (6). And indeed it was no difficult taſk to point out a great many miſtakes in the Account, eſpecially by the aſſiſtance of ſuch informers as his antagoniſt was favoured with. And theſe miſrepreſentations alone were, by ſome perſons, thought enough to diſcredit the book and the author of it, who confidently aſſures his readers, that he had taken care to be informed of every thing upon the place, with the greateſt exactneſs poſſible, and had related them fairly and impartially, ſo as to ſave the curious the labour and expence of that voyage (7). But there is one circumſtance remarked by the doctor, which very particularly confronts this pretence of a fair and exact account. Among other articles relating to the civil government of Denmark, he has inſerted an ordonnance in French, ſettling the rank and precedence of all great officers and other perſons which was publiſhed in 1680 (8). 'It is true, ſays Dr King, his account is to repreſent Denmark, as it ſtood in 1692'. However, it is ſtrange, that ſo curious and exact a man ſhould have no correſpondence there from ninety two till ninety four, when his book was publiſhed, for then he might have known, that by a new ordonnance dated February 1693, this old ordonnance is altered in abundance of particulars, ſo that he has nine whole pages of his book, that by his negligence are entirely good for nothing (9).

[E] His account of Denmark brought him into the eſteem and friendſhip of the Earl of Shaftesbury. Our author's view in writing the account is clearly intimated in the preface, where he expreſly gives us his political as well as his religious creed: the articles of which taught him to condemn and cenſure very ſeverely the clergy in general, for defending the Revolution, upon other principles than thoſe of reſiſtance and the original contract, which he maintains, is the true and natural baſis of the conſtitution: and that all other foundations are falſe, nonſenſical, and rotten; derogatory to the then preſent government †, and abſolutely deſtructive to the legal liberties of the Engliſh nation, and as the preſervation of theſe depends ſo much upon the right education of youth in the univerſities, he urges

† As King William had no pretence to an hereditary right, the courtiers of fortune in his reign knew it was their buſineſs to repreſent that right as intirely aboliſhed, and ſwallowed up by the Parliamentary right.

He served his country in the House of Commons in both kingdoms, being chosen for the borough of Swodes in Ireland, and for those of St Michael, Bodmyn, and East-Retford (f), in England, his conduct in the Senate being always firm and steady to the principles which he embraced. He was a member of the Privy-Council to Queen Anne 'till the latter end of her reign, when, party running high, he was removed from the Board in January 1713, upon a complaint against him from the Lower House of Convocation, presented December 2d by the Prolocutor to the House of Peers, charging him with speaking these words, in the hearing of a great many persons, They that have turned the world upside down, are come hither also; and for affronting the Clergy in Convocation, when they presented their address in favour of Lord Chancellor Phipps (g). But as he constantly asserted and strenuously maintained the house of Hanover's right of succession to the Throne, King George the First, on the forming of his Privy-Council in Ireland, made him a member thereof October 9, 1714, and the next month a Commissioner of Trade and Plantations. His Majesty also advanced him to the Peerage of Ireland, by privy-seal, dated at St James's the 21st of June, and by patent '16 July 1716, by the titles of Baron of Philipstown, and Viscount Moleworth of Swodes in that kingdom, with the creation-fee of twenty marks; and, the first of July 1719, he took his seat in the House of Peers there (h). His Lordship was Fellow of the Royal Society, and continued to serve his country with indefatigable industry and uncorrupted integrity 'till the two last years of his life; when, perceiving himself worn out with constant application to publick affairs, he passed the remainder of his days in a learned retirement 'till his death, which happened May 22, 1725, in the 69th year of his age, at his seat at Breckdenstown in the county of Dublin *, six miles from the city, and his corpse was interred at Swodes (i). By his Will, dated April 30, 1725, he devised 50 pounds towards building a church at Philipstown (k). Besides his History of Denmark, he wrote an address to the House of Commons for the encouragement of Agriculture; and translated Franco Gallia, a Latin treatise, written by the civilian Hottoman, giving an account of the free state of France, and other parts of Europe, before the encroachments made on their liberties. He is likewise reputed the author of several pieces, written with great force of reason and masculine eloquence, in defence of liberty, the constitution of his country, and the common right of mankind; and certain it is, that few men of his fortune and quality were more learned, or more highly esteemed by men of learning, as is evident from the writings, not only of the Earl of Shaftesbury already mentioned, but from those of Mr Locke, Mr Molyneux [F], and others †. His Lordship had by his wife seven sons, John, Richard, William, Edward, Walter, Coote, and Byffe; and four daughters, Margaret, Mary [G], Charlotta-in the strongest terms the absolute necessity of purging and reforming those by a royal visitation †; so that the youth may not be trained up there, as he says, they were in the slavish principles of passive obedience and jus divinum, but may be instituted after the manner of the Greeks and Romans, who in their academies recommended the duty to their country, the preservation of the laws and publick liberty, subservient to which they preached up moral virtues, such as fortitude, temperance, justice, a contempt of death, &c. sometimes making use of pious cheats, as Elysian-Fields, and an assurance of future happiness, if they died in the cause of their country, and even deceived their hearers into greatness. This insinuation, that Christianity is nothing more than a pious cheat, and an useful state-engine, together with his pressing morality as the one thing necessary, without once mentioning the Christian Religion, could not but be very agreeable to the author of the Characteristics. In reality, it made a remarkably strong impression upon him, as we find him many years afterwards declaring, in a letter to our author, in these terms: 'You have long had my heart, even before I knew you personally. For the holy and truly pious man, who revealed the greatest of mysteries; he who with a truly generous love to mankind and his country, pointed out the state of Denmark to other states, and prophesied of the things highest important to the growing age: he, I say, had already gained me as his sworn friend, before he was so kind as to make friendship reciprocal by his acquaintance and expressed esteem. So that you may believe it no extraordinary transition in me, from making you in truth my oracle in publick affairs, to make you a thorough confidant in my private (10).' This private affair was a treaty of marriage with a relation of our author's, which appears by this and several other letters to have been proposed and negotiated by him in 1708; and tho' the design miscarried, and the Earl engaged with another lady, Mrs Ewer, the following year, yet the whole tenor of the letters testify the most intimate friendship between them.

[F] He was highly esteemed by Mr Locke and Mr Molyneux. In the printed correspondence between these two learned gentlemen, there is a letter from the latter to the former, wherein he expresses his esteem for our author in these terms: 'I am here [at Dublin] very happy in the friendship of an honourable person, Mr Moleworth, who is an hearty admirer and acquaintance of your's. We never meet but we remember you; he sometimes comes into my house, and tells me, 'tis not to pay a visit to me, but to pay his devotion to your image that is in my dining-room.' In answer to which, Mr Locke expresses the due sense he had of this esteem in the following words: 'I must beg you to return my acknowledgments to Mr Moleworth, in the civillest language you can find, for the great compliment you sent me from him. I have been not a little troubled, that I could not meet with the opportunities I sought, to improve the advantage I proposed to myself in an acquaintance with so ingenious and extraordinary a man as he is (11).'

[G] His daughter Mary. This lady was married to George Monck of Stephen's-Green in Dublin, Esq; and died in 1715, leaving a collection of poems which her father published, and dedicated to Queen Caroline (consort to his present Majesty King George II.) when Princess of Wales, and we are told by a good judge, that the furliest critics must allow them to be well done (12). They consist of eclogues, the Masque of the Virtues against Love, from Guarini; some translations from the French and Italians, familiar epistles, odes, and madrigals. Mr Jacob tells us, they shew the spirit and numbers of poetry, a delicacy of turn, and a justness of thought and expression. In the dedication, dated March 26, 1716, her father speaks of them and the author as follows: "Most of them are the product of the leisure hours of a young gentlewoman, lately deceased, who in a remote country retirement, without omitting the daily care due to a large family, not only perfectly acquired the several languages here made use of *, but the good morals and principles contained in those books, so as to put them in practice as well during her life and languishing sickness, as at the hour of her

I loved her more because she deserved it, than because she was mine. And I cannot do greater honour to her memory, than by consecrating her labours, or rather diversions, to your Royal Highness, as we found most of them in her escritoire after her death, written with her own hand; little expecting, and as little desiring the publick should have any opportunity either of applauding or condemning them." She died at Bath, and on her death-bed wrote some verses to her husband, then in London, which are transcribed by Mr Cibber †, as breathing a true sense of tenderness.

[H] He preserved the Duke of Marlborough's life. This signal transaction having been suppressed, or very obscurely related by others*, Mr Lodge obtained a real and genuine account of it from an uncontested authority, as follows: 'As for the particular account you so earnestly desired of me, I here send it you word for word, as related to me by Lord Moleworth himself; having carefully taken it down from a conversation that lately passed between us.

'He introduced his story by observing that this remarkable fact (however evident in all its circumstances) was very industriously hushed up in the army; which he said was the easier done, because himself was quite silent upon it.

'He then proceeded to a short description of one particular circumstance of the field of battle, as necessary to my understanding the following relation, and informed me, that from the river Mehaigne, (which covered the right flank of the French army, and the left of ours) to the village of Ramillies, which was about the center of the two lines, the ground was firm, plain, and open, in short, fit for cavalry to act upon: that from Ramillies to the enemy's left and our right, the ground, on the contrary, was low, marshy, and cut through by many ditches and streams, not easily passable by either army in the face of the other. That the enemy (who had long been acquainted with this ground, and well saw the advantage to be made of it's situation) had extremely strengthened their right wing of horse, not only with numbers, but with their choicest troops; with which having attacked our cavalry of the left, whom they greatly outnumbered, they soon obliged them to give ground in great confusion, their line following in great order. He said, that the Duke of Marlborough perceiving this, and apprehending the consequence of the disorder, if not timely remedied, commanded some battalions of foot to advance, and properly post themselves for stopping the enemy; dispatched an Aid de Camp to our right wing for a considerable reinforcement of English and other cavalry, to be sent from thence to the left; and in the mean time seeing it necessary to keep the enemy at bay;

'after he had with great trouble and fatigue rallied the disordered squadrons, he put himself at the head of them, and led them to the enemy; and here it was, that our advanced squadrons being repulsed and in great confusion, some of the run-aways quite blinded by their fear, rode against the Duke, who was leading up other squadrons to sustain them, jostled him off his horse, and rode over him; at which time, the remaining body of horse likewise fled, and left the Duke lying on the field, with none near him but Captain Moleworth, then one of his Aid de Camps; who perceiving not only the enemy's line to advance upon him, but besides, a small body that had detached itself from the line as for a pursuit, saw the Duke must inevitably fall into their hands, unless he could find the means of getting him off, in which not a moment was to be lost. The Duke's horse, when he was thrust off him, had ran away beyond the line, nothing therefore, remained for Captain Moleworth to do, but the mounting him if possible on his; which he at last effected, but with difficulty; for when the Duke was rode over, some horse had trod on his stomach, so that he lay on the ground almost senseless, and could very little help himself.

'The Captain, however, got his Grace in the saddle, put the rein in his hand, and turning his horse's head to our line, entreated his Grace to push him that way with his utmost speed, as he accordingly did; but had not cleared the ground above three minutes, before the abovementioned detachment came at full speed over the spot, so eager in pursuit of the Duke (whom they had certainly singled out) that the Captain then had the good fortune to escape their notice.

'By this time the Duke had got within some of our battalions of foot, and the pursuers pressing pretty close upon the most advanced among them, which was the regiment of Albemarle Swifs, that regiment gave them their platoons very handsomely, and soon sent them back the same way, somewhat faster than they had come on; however, they now thought fit to pay the captain a little more respect, than they had done before, and honoured him as they went by, with a few strokes of their broad swords; but so luckily, that he came off with only carrying their black marks about his shoulders for some time after.

'The regiment of Albemarle, he said, continued firing to the front, as long as they thought they might do any damage to the enemy, of whom they dropt a good number to the right and left of him; but upon the first suspension of fire and smoke, he made them all the signals he could of his being a friend, and then went into that battalion, where he was received with great friendship, and some surprize, by Colonel Constant, who said he equally rejoiced and wondered at his escape, and that he doubted not but that he should soon see him at the head of a regiment.

' He

to serve his country during the whole war in Flanders, wherein he exposed himself to the greatest dangers, and was blown up by the springing of a mine. In 1715 he was an officer of Dragoons under General Carpenter, against the rebels at the battle of Preston in Lancashire, where he behaved with great bravery, and was wounded. After which he was advanced gradually, through several military employments, to the distinguished rank of Lieutenant-General, and Commander in Chief of his Majesty's Forces in Ireland, to which he was constituted in September 1751. He was also Fellow of the Royal Society, a Trustee for the Barracks, and a Governor of the Royal Hospital near Kilmainham in 1754 (n).

‘ He then told him that the Duke had got between the lines, and was gone towards the centre, to which, while he was making his way as well as he could, on foot, he by chance met with a foreign soldier holding the Duke's horse by the bridle, who upon his claiming the horse, and giving him a pataroon, immediately resigned him, and then the Captain mounting that horse pursued his way in quest of his Grace. He found him upon a rising ground fronting the village of Ramillies, with a number of general officers and others about him, to whom he was distributing his orders, and when he saw the Captain, he said he hoped he was not hurt.

‘ The Captain soon after observing that his horse (which the Duke still mounted) was a little unquiet, shewed him his own, and said, that might probably prove less troublesome to him; upon which his Grace shifting back to his own horse, and Colonel Bringfield (his first Escuyer) holding the stirrup, the enemy, just at that time, discharged a battery from the village of Ramillies, which came among the groupe of us, and one of the balls, after grazing, rose under the horse's belly, and took Mr Bringfield in the head (13).’

MOLYNEUX [WILLIAM] was born April 17, 1656, near Ormond-Gate in the city of Dublin, where his father, a gentleman of a good family and genteel fortune, resided (a); who, observing this his eldest son to be of a very tender constitution, educated him under a private tutor in his own house (b), 'till he was near fifteen years of age, when he was put under the care of Dr William Palifer (c), then Fellow of Trinity-college in that city, where he was admitted April 10, 1671. In this university he became presently distinguished, as well by the probity of his manners as by the strength of his parts; and having made a remarkable progress in academical learning, and particularly in the New Philosophy (d), as it was then called, he proceeded at the regular time to his degree of Bachelor of Arts. After four years spent in this university he left it; and, in order to compleat his education in the genteel manner, was sent to London, and admitted into the Middle Temple (e) June 3, 1675. Here it was not designed that he should make the Law his profession; for which reason he applied himself only to the historical part of that study, in which he made a considerable progress (f). He staid at the Temple three years; but the bent of his genius, as well as inclination, lying strongly to Philosophy and Mathematicks, he spent the greatest part of his time in these enquiries, which, from the extraordinary advances newly made therein by the Royal Society, were then chiefly in vogue. Thus accomplished, he returned to Ireland in June 1678, and shortly after was married to Lucy, daughter of Sir Will. Domvile, the King's Attorney-General (g). Being master of an easy fortune, he continued to indulge himself in prosecuting such branches of Natural and Experimental Philosophy, as were most agreeable to his fancy; wherein Astronomy had the greatest share, and the construction of the telescope engaged his particular attention, being much assisted in these studies by Mr Flamsteed (h) [A]. As he was upon all occasions very zealous in advancing the reputation and interest of his native country, he formed a design, in imitation of that which he so much admired at London, of erecting a Philosophical Society at Dublin (i); and, by the countenance and encouragement of the famous Sir William Petty [B], who accepted the office of President, they began

[A] He was assisted by Mr Flamsteed.] He began to make astronomical observations in 1681, but finding the instrument he made use of not so good as he wished, he applied to Mr Flamsteed to procure one for him at London, and communicated to him some observations he had made of a lunar eclipse which happened not long before. The royal astronomer very willingly undertook the business, and sent him a telescope, of which he had been at the pains to try the glasses himself; together with a method for discovering the errors of an instrument. In return to this kindness, Mr Molyneux wrote him a letter, dated September 17, 1681; acknowledging the favour in the politest address. ‘ I hope, says he, their [the glasses] goodness will encourage me to use them to some purpose, especially, now that I have the help and advice of one of the most celebrated astronomers of Europe. And herein, continues he, worthy Sir, I cannot but admire your generous mind, that condescends to look upon, and favour a young beginner in that noble study, and that too, when there appeared no performance on his side, that could deserve so great a honour. For as to those observations of the last lunar eclipse, truly they are the first I ever made of that VOL. V. No. 261.

‘ kind.’ In proceeding, he excuses some errors therein, that had been noted by Mr Flamsteed, and desires his further information of the best way for finding a meridian line. He concludes with an account of several experiments he had lately made in the art of gunnery; upon which, in return to Flamsteed's remark of his errors in the eclipse, he takes notice of a mistake made by that Astronomer, in a table of horizontal ranges, wherein a mounture of 42 degrees was put for the utmost random, which he conceived to be demonstrably 45 degrees (1).

[B] Encouraged by Sir William Petty their first President.] Though he had the conduct of it from the beginning, yet he was not regularly elected President 'till All-Saints day, November 11, the following year, their anniversary day of election (2), and upon the 3d, he communicated the following directions for their more regular proceeding. 1. That they chiefly apply themselves to the making of experiments, and prefer the same to the best discourses, letters and books, they can make or read, even concerning experiments. 2. That they do not contemn and neglect common trivial and cheap experiments and observations; nor contenting themselves without such as may surprize and astonish

(4) In January 1684, the Society consisted of 33 members, among whom were Mr St George Ahe, Narcissus Marsh, Bishop of Ferns; Robert Huotington, D. D. John Maden, M. D. Will. Lord Viscount Montjoy, Sir Robert Redding, Bart. Geo. Tollet Prof. Math. Sir Cyrill Wych, Knt. Charles Willughby, M. D. John Worth, D. D. Dean of St Patrick's, besides the President, Secretary, began a weekly meeting about Michaelmas 1683, when our author was appointed their first Secretary [C]; which gave him an opportunity of setting his eminent abilities in the fullest light, before most of the greatest personages in that country (k); and, upon their President's resigning his place of Surveyor-General there, the Secretary was taken notice of by the Duke of Ormond, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and, by his Grace's influence, procured himself to be made joint patentee with Mr (afterwards Sir) William Robinson, in the post of Surveyor-General of his Majesty's Buildings and Works, and Chief-Engineer in that kingdom [D]. February 10, 1683-4, he read a discourse to the Dublin Society the vulgar. 3. That they provide themselves with rules of number, weight, and measure, not only how to measure the plus and minus of the qualities and schemes of matter, but to provide themselves with scales and tables, whereby to measure and compute such qualities and schemes in their exact proportions. 4. That they divide and analyse complicate matters into their integral parts, and compute the proportions which one part bears to another. 5. That they be ready with instruments and other apparatus, to make such observations as do rarely offer themselves, and do depend upon taking opportunities. 6. That they provide themselves with correspondents in several places, to make such observations, as do depend upon the comparison of many experiments, and not upon single and solitary remarks. 7. That they be ready to entertain strangers and persons of quality, with great and surprizing experiments of wonder and ostentation. 8. That they carefully compute their ability to defray the charge of ordinary experiments, forty times per annum, out of their weekly contributions, and to procure the assistance of benefactors for what shall be extraordinary, and not pester the society with useless or troublesome members for the lucre of their pecuniary contributions. 9. That whoever makes experiments at the publick charge, do first ask leave for the same. 10. That the Secretary do neither write nor receive any letters on the publick account of the Society, but what he communicateth to the Society. 11. That persons (tho' not of the Society) may be assisted by the Society to make experiments at their charge, upon leave granted. 12. That in want of experiments, there shall be a review and rehearsal of experiments formerly made. 13. That the President at the present meeting, shall order what experiments shall be tried at the following meeting, that accordingly a fit apparatus may be made for it (3).

The same month he also offered a Suppellex Philosophica, containing forty-five articles, as follows: 1. Scales and steelyards to weigh in the air and water. 2. Scales to shew the weight without prostapheresis. 3. Instruments whereby to measure the superficies of irregular bodies. 4. Instruments to measure irregular magnitudes. 5. To measure the fineness of gold and silver. 6. To measure the loading and unloading of a ship. 7. To measure the goodness of telescopes and microscopes. 8. To measure the heat, moisture, and weight of the air. 9. To measure sun-shine and rain, and the force of wind. 10. To measure the strength of saline liquors. 11. To measure the strength of brandy and other liquors often distilled. 12. A parallelogram. 13. An artificial eye. 14. A monochord and pipe. 15. A water level. 16. A mariner's compass, a variation and dipping needle. 17. Mr Flamstead's quadrant. 18. A clock. 19. A spherical magnet, and other magnets with dust of the same. 20. An exhausting engine. 21. An Æolipyle. 22. A digester. 23. A limbec. 24. A rondon bow. 25. A gunpowder measure. 26. A condensing pipe or wind-gun. 27. A speaking trumpet. 28. An acoustic tube. 29. Lamps. 30. A measure of refraction. 31. A wind watch. 32. Telescopes. 33. Microscopes. 34. Burning-glasses. 35. Prisms. 36. A stone-cutter's wheel and quadrants. 37. A turner's lathe for compounded figures. 38. A wind-furnace, bellows, and blast-pipe. 39. A skrew-press. 40. A touch stone. 41. A water-trough with purlies and plummets. 42. A pair of globes. 43. A fixed globe. 44. A burning metal. 45. A looking-glass (4) — On the 24th of the same month, he brought in a paper of sixty-three miscellaneous experiments, to be prosecuted by the Society, which was printed at Dublin soon after.

[C] Mr Molyneux was their first Secretary ] The minutes of this society being communicated from time to time to the Royal Society at London, it appears from thence, that after some previous meetings for the better regulation, settlement, and method of future transactions, Mr Molyneux opened the next meeting, October 15th, 1683, with his discourse de apparente magnitudine solis humilis & sublimis (5). To this discourse he afterwards made some improvement, and having completed his design, he acquainted the Royal Society with his desire to submit it to their censure, in a letter, dated February 3d, 1686 (6); which, being accepted, he sent it to Mr Halley (7), their assistant Secretary, who inserted it in their Transactions, No. 186. This phenomenon had long foiled the best philosophical wits in every country, and Mr Halley eager to procure the honour of a satisfactory solution thereof to his own, proposed it to Dr Wallis (8). But his answer, as well as our author's account *, being attended with some insuperable difficulties, it was many years afterwards attempted with something better success, by Dr Smith †, and Dr Desaguliers (9). At another meeting in February the same year, 1683, our author sent to the Oxford Society some of the Lough-Neagh stone, which was originally Holly (10) And March 10th, he read before the Dublin Society an account of the petrifying quality of that lough; which being registred, and ordered to be transmitted to the Oxford Society, was communicated thence to the Royal Society, and printed in the Philosophical Transactions No. 158. He afterwards sent to that Society a retractation of a mistake in that account, which was printed in the Philosophical Transactions No. 166: and November 24th, 1686, he read to the Dublin Society a paper of queries relating to this petrifying quality, which, being delivered to one Mr Smith, about to take a journey thither, that gentleman brought a satisfactory answer to them, and both being communicated to the Royal Society by our author, July 20th, 1685 (11), were printed in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 174, for August. May 26th, 1684, he shewed to the Dublin Society the circulation of the blood, in a dissected Water-Newt, or Salamandra Aquatica; which being registred, he sent an extract thereof to the Royal Society, October 27th, 1685, claiming his right to this discovery, which was acknowledged by them, against the pretensions of Dr Garden (12). May 11th, 1685, he presented the Dublin Society with the description of an hygroscope lately invented by him, which, by a piece of whip cord and a weight, with an index, shews the least alteration or variety in the moisture of the air. This having been sent April 17th, to Oxford, and thence to London, May 13th, was printed in the Philosophical Transactions No. 172, for June, 1685. This society continued to meet 'till 1688, when the confusion of the times dispersed them, as it did also the Royal Society; but these resumed their meetings after the Revolution, which the Dublin Society never did.

[D] He was appointed Surveyor General of his Majesty's works in Ireland ] This is collected from two passages in the series of letters already cited. The first is in a letter dated at Dublin, December 16th, 1684, where he writes thus:

'I have all this while deferred my answer to your's of Oct 4th, partly because I have been hindered by some affairs, wherein, by the favour of our chief Governour here, I have been lately engaged; and partly, because I expected that the last lunar eclipse might have afforded something acceptable to you, but now both are over, the first much to my satisfaction.' — And what this affair was, we learn from a subsequent letter, dated Dublin, March 24th, 1687 (13); where he says, 'Mr Robinson my Joint-Patentee in the office of Surveyor-General of the King's works and fortifications, is lately gone to London, and I am obliged to do the duty of the place. I hear he is now in the messenger's

October 9th the same year, he sent the R. This was printed in Phil. Transf. No. 158. He observed afterwards, that it was the elephant caterpillar of Goedartius, No. 125. An extract of this last letter was inserted in Phil. Transf. No. 167.

Society upon telescopic fights, as adapted to astronomical and other instruments, wherein he shewed their convenience and manner of performance from the principles of Dioptrics, and also demonstrated their exactness; being chiefly induced thereto, because Mr Hooke, in his Animadversions on Hevelius's Uranography, had omitted the chief objection Hevelius makes against these kinds of fights, wherein he imagines, that the line of collimation therein is no longer than between the eye and cross-hairs; whereas 'tis plain, that it is as long as between the object-glass and cross-hairs (1) [E]. December 9, 1684, he communicated to the Royal Society an account of the failure of Sir William Petty's new ship with a double bottom [F]. May 11, 1685, our Secretary intending

'messenger's hands about this employment, but this will not at all affect me (14).'

[E] As long as between the object-glass and cross-hairs. An account of the dispute between Hevelius and Hooke, has been already given in its proper place (15), wherein the extraordinary heat of the antagonists is observed. Mr Molyneux was much displeas'd with that unphilosophical diltemper, and labour'd to moderate the affair. To this end, he wrote a letter to the Royal Society, in 1685*; containing his observations upon Mr Hevelius's Annus Climactericus, that if it be true what has been asserted, not only by some celebrated astronomers, but chiefly by Mr Hooke in his Animadversions, &c. the endeavours of Hevelius will be frustrated, and his vast charges to no more purpose than Tycho's, and all his splendid apparatus but mere lumber; for upon this question as to plain fights, the astronomical labours of his whole life depend. But surely this was an event highly deplorable, not only to the party himself immediately concerned, but the whole res publica literaria. He likewise takes notice of the slightness and smallness of what Mr Hooke had published, which was only a pamphlet, wherein it was asserted, that notwithstanding all this apparatus, &c. yet surely for want of telescopic fights, and some new kind of invented divisions on Mr Hevelius's instruments, Mr Hooke went so far as to doubt, whether his observations could be true, and always the same to two or three minutes. That the whole import of it besides this, was nothing but the description of an instrument, which he never heard was put in practice. He further objects to Mr Hooke, that though Mr Hevelius had earnestly requested from him, or any one else, that had telescopic instruments, to send him some distances of fixed stars observed by them, yet he could never be so happy as to obtain any from Mr Hooke, though afterwards he did from some others. Mr Hooke wrote a respectful answer to this letter, whereupon, our author, sensible of his harshness, in calling the Animadversions a pamphlet, took occasion to apologize for it, in a letter to Dr Halley, dated at Dublin, April 8th, 1686; wherein, having highly commended Mr Hooke's contrivance for the baroscope as well as his level, he proceeds thus: 'And, whereas I understand that a chance word, in an idle scribble of mine, was something displeasing to that ingenious and learned gentleman; I desire he may be informed, that I designed no manner of slight by the word Pamphlet, but stiled his book so, merely as I thought it a name equally given to small ritch'd volumes. As to the controversy, continues he, with Monf. Hevelius, about telescopic fights, I can say no more than what I have formerly writ: only I will add two things; first, that I humbly conceive Mr Hevelius did not, nor does yet, rightly apprehend the manner of those fights in his performance; this I presume to collect from those words in his Machina Cœlestis, part. prim. p. 296; he then cites the words, and shews the error expressed in the same words, as he had before done at the Dublin Society; concluding, that Mr Hooke had sufficiently convinced him of his error in rejecting them, by explaining to him the manner of performance, and nothing more. The other thing, proceeds he, I have to add, is this, that I esteem it most disingenuously done of Hevelius, in relating the trials between you and him, to call your instrument every where, a sextant (16): I acknowledge, had I known this before I wrote my letter to Mr Aston (17), I should hardly have put pen to paper. And I have lately been desired by the Society at Oxford, to translate that letter into Latin for Monf. Hevelius's reading. I was obedient to their demand, but I have added a postscript to it, wherein I do not well approve of his calling a quadrant of less than two feet radius, a sextant; and speaking of it as of a large 'and considerable instrument (18).'

However, after Monf. Hevelius's death, he gives this character of him (19). 'I must confess ingenuously, that this renowned astronomer, by his extraordinary diligence, great care, and perpetual, long continued practice, but chiefly, by his peculiar sharpness of sight, arrived at a great exactness of observation by plain fights, as I find, by comparing his with the observations made by the most curious astronomers of that age; Flamstead, Halley, Cassini, &c. with telescopic fights; yet these we are to attribute more to the peculiar acuteness of his eyes, than to the exactness of plain fights, for to me it seems manifest, from what Mr Hooke lays down in his Animadversions, that the naked eye cannot ordinarily perceive an angle less than one minute. But then he blames this last mentioned author for his conduct in this controversy, as follows: The want of telescopic fights, says he, is what Mr Hooke chiefly insists upon as defective in Monf. Hevelius's celestial apparatus, but yet in his whole book of Animadversions he takes no notice of the objections against these: and I am persuaded that the candour of that noble astronomer was so great (whose memory must now be sacred) that upon the removal of these difficulties he would have given up the cause, and therefore the best way of reconciling him to them, would have been truly to have laid down the dioptrical reasons of their performance and exactness, upon a right understanding whereof, all the objections would be answered, and would entirely vanish. This had been the right method of proceeding amongst candid philosophers; whilst vilifying his instruments, and fighting his performances with them, as no better than those in the age before him*, did but exasperate the noble old man, and made him adhere more obstinately to his former practice.'

The letter was directed to Mr Aston, then Secretary of the Royal Society, and begins thus: 'I promised to give you an account of the performance of Sir William Petty's ship, and I am glad of an opportunity of writing to you, and serving you in any thing; but I am heartily sorry at the occasion that at present offers itself, and would therefore willingly be silent. But it is a matter so publick, and of too universal concern to be concealed, and which, was so probably and fairly offered, that human frailty need not be ashamed of miscarrying therein. Sir William Petty's ship was tried this day sevensnight, in our harbour, between Ring's-End and the Bar; but she performed so abominably, as if built on purpose to disappoint, in the highest degree, every particular that was expected from her: she had spread but a third of the sail she was to carry, the wind did but just fill her sails, and yet she flooped so, that she was in danger of being over-set every moment; a blast from a smith's bellows superadded, had overturned her: she was proposed not to want an ounce of ballast †, and yet she had in her ten ton of paving stones, and all would not do. The seamen swear they would not venture over the Bar with her for a thousand pounds a piece: even right before the wind, she does nothing; so that the whole design is blown up. What measures Sir William will take to redeem his credit, I know not, but I am sure a greater trouble could hardly have fallen upon him (20).'

The greatest expectations had been raised of this machine. Our author, in making the promise, April 22d, 1684, here mentioned, of sending this account, observes, that Sir William, ever since he last came into Ireland, had been much incumbent on that matter, and brought it (for as much may be judged by models, of which he has a vast and various apparatus) to a very great perfection; his vessels are not so much double bottomed as his former, for as you see them funk in the water, you would not know them, but by their lowness and breadth behind, from a common-built; for he now calls them sluice-bottomed, for their keel is inverted, and a large sluice or crena runs along their back. Amongst other models, he has one representing the common built Fubbs yacht (which we hear is the best failer in England) and he has another likewise, which he calls the Sluice-Fubbs, in bulk, weight, &c. agreeing with the common-built, and different only in his additional sluice. Between these two he makes comparifon in many particulars, as burden, draught of water, ballast, swift sailing, &c. in all which the sluice bottom has wonderfully the advantage. In fine, hereby he is encouraged to assert, that he will be bound to make a passage-boat between this and Chester, of about eighty or an hundred tons, that shall be, as it were, a stage-boat, and shall be as constant in her going out, and returning upon her set days, let whatever weather happen, as the stage coaches between London and any other country town. There was a motion between some persons of quality and figure in this place (amongst which I had the honour to be one) to join purfes for the building of a vessel of that burden, merely to try the experiment; but, upon second thoughts, it was reputed more advifeable to begin with a barge of the same bulk and burden with a barge that belongs to our Custom-house: for if our sluice-barge do out-fail considerably the other (which is now building and much expected from her) the advantage of Sir William Petty's contrivance will be fo manifest, that it will suddenly be put in practice in a greater model. In order to the accomplishing of this, there is a company of us to meet to-morrow at Sir William's, and to agree about the matter; the success whereof you shall certainly know (21).

[G] Mr St George St Ashe was chosen Secretary.] This gentleman came over to England, in order to travel abroad the following year, when our author gave him a letter of recommendation to Mr Flamstead, dated Dublin May 11th, 1686; which begins thus:

' My honoured friend,
' He that does me the favour to deliver this into your hands, needs no further recommendations to you, than merely to let you know his name, Mr St George Ashe, Fellow of our college here, and therein Professor of Mathematicks; a diligent promoter of mathematical and philosophical learning, and a deep proficient in both. These, together with his innate candour, modesty, and good nature, will render his acquaintance and conversation very acceptable to you, and will deserve from you all those civilities which you naturally pay to all strangers that visit you. He does not yet know but he may design to visit Paris, and I hope you will then oblige him with a letter to Monsieur Cassini, that thereby he may receive those civilities from that worthy person, of which I myself have been partaker formerly, on your account. This Mr Ashe is the gentleman that has promoted the business in the college of Dublin, to purchase some astronomical instruments, and to endeavour something in that way.—You would therefore please him very much by letting him see your way and manner of observation (22).

[H] Mr Molyneux had notice of his election into the Royal Society in a letter from Mr Halley.] Mr Halley having been chosen Assistant-Secretary a little before, in opposition to Dr (afterwards Sir Hans) Sloane, took this opportunity of acquainting our author with the manner of it, as follows:

' On St Andrew's day last, being our anniversary day of election, Mr Pepys was continued President, Mr Aston Secretary, and Dr Tancred Robinfon chosen in the room of Mr Mufgrave. Every body seemed satisfied, and no discontent appeared any where; when on a sudden, Mr Aston, willing, as I suppose, to gain better terms of reward from the Society than formerly, on December 9th, in council, declared, that he would not serve them as Secretary, and therefore desired them to provide some other to supply that office, and that after such a passionate manner, that I fear he has lost several of his friends by it. The council resolved not to be so served for the future, and thought it expedient to have only honorary Secretaries, and a clerk or amanuensis, upon whom the burden of the business should lie, and to give him a fixed salary, so as to make it worth his while; and he to be accountable to the Secretaries for the performance of his office. According to which resolutions, Sir John Hofkyns, and Dr Gale, were chosen Secretaries; and on July 27th last, they chose me for their Under-Officer, with a promise of a salary of fifty pounds per annum, at least. He then proposes a correspondence between them, and concludes (23). In answer to this Mr Molyneux wrote a letter to Mr Halley, dated at Dublin, April 8th, 1686; as follows:

' I do with much willingness and joy accept of your correspondence; I must acknowledge it had been my part to have prevented you in this particular, and to have made the request to you; but I had heard of the late disturbances in the Royal Society, and was unwilling to trouble you 'till matters were settled. But now I must needs express my satisfaction in the accommodation of affairs, and that the Society has taken the course they are in.—And now, Sir, I must congratulate you, upon your self being settled in the place you have; I know no man more fit than yourself: but then, as a friend, you must give me leave to advise you to diligence; for truly I think you have a considerable duty to discharge. I thank you for the account you give me of the affairs of the Society; I had it before, but it was from a person concerned, whom I always thought to blame in this particular, for I found thereby there was a party arising in the Society, that were for rejecting all kinds of useful knowledge, except ranking and filing of shells, insects, fishes, and birds &c. under their several species and classes; and this they termed Natural History, and investigating Nature, never attending to the uses and properties of these things for the advantage of mankind, and reckoning Chemistry, Astronomy, Mathematicks, and Mechanicks, as rubs in their course after Nature. This indeed seemed to me something strange; and I must confess I could not but laugh at it. I return my humble thanks to the Royal Society for the honour of admitting me into their company. Pray, Sir, let me know my debt to the Treasurer, and I shall take care to see it timely discharged. In proceeding, he thanks Mr Halley for his philosophical communications, and in return, sends him an account of the only remarkable particular lately communicated to the Dublin Society, several of whose meetings he observes, had been employed by a young mathematical female in that place, bred up by one Mr Toller, a teacher of Mathematicks there (24).

The child, says he, is not yet eleven, and yet she hath given us sufficient proofs, in Arithmetick, the most abstruse parts of Algebra, Geometry, Trigonometry, plain and spherical, the doctrine of the Globes, Chronology, and on the violin plays any thing almost at sight: yet she seems to have no more natural inclination or delight in these things than ordinarily amongst children (25).—The three subsequent paragraphs have been already mentioned*; after which he acquaints Mr Halley, that he had by that post sent to his brother [Mr Thomas Molyneux] a paper that relates to a problem in hydrostatics, why heavy bodies dissolved in a menstruum specifically lighter than themselves, swim therein (26); concerning which his brother had proposed his thoughts in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, but, continues he, I take the liberty of differing from him in some things. He concludes with a request, that Mr Halley would oblige him with the demonstration of a rule of his in gunnery, for shooting on ascents and descents with the mortar-piece ||; and mentioning Blondel's Art-de-jetter les Bombs

Mr Molyneux had returned home some months before from his tour abroad, where he had passed this summer to improve himself in the art of engineering; for which purpose he had procured an appointment from the Irish Government to view the most considerable fortresses in Flanders. Accordingly he travelled through that country, Holland, and some part of Germany and France; and carrying with him letters of recommendation from Mr Flamsteed to Mr Cassini (o), he was introduced to him, and others the most eminent Astronomers in the several places through which he passed, whereof he made afterwards a considerable advantage [I]. In this tour he was accompanied by the Lord Viscount Montjoy, who was a member of the Dublin Society, and afterwards succeeded Sir William Petty in the presidentship (p). Not long after his return, he sent a letter to the Royal Society, dated at Dublin October 27, 1685, containing some objections to Dr Garden's account of the trade winds, which was printed in the Philosophical Transactions (q). The following year, Mr Halley having applied to him for an account of the tides upon the coast of Ireland (r), he sent, September 21, an account of the tides at Dublin; wherein it was remarkable, that the high water upon the quarter moon falls out later by half an hour, in respect of the moon's southing, than in the new and full; whereas at London, the quarter moons make high water above an hour and a quarter sooner than the new and full; this was also printed in the Philosophical Transactions (s). At the same time he sent a paper, giving the reason why, in a telescope, two or three glasses invert objects, and that four erect them again; which was likewise published in their Transactions (t). Soon after this came out his Sciothericum Telescopium, or a new contrivance of adapting a Telescope to an Horizontal Dial, for observing the moment of time by day or night, &c. The book being printed at Dublin (u), our author sent a copy of it to his brother, Mr Thomas Molyneux, at London, who presented it to the Royal Society November 4th (w); and an account thereof, by Mr Cluverus, was printed in their Transactions (x) [K], together with some observations of a solar eclipse; as was also his

Bombs, there is nothing in it more than what was before in Galileo, except this business of shooting on ascents and descents. After he had proposed the problem to Messieurs De l'Academie Royale des Sciences, Monf. Buot; Reaumeur, De la Hire, and Cassini, employed their thoughts about it, 'but I can assure you, says he, upon rigid examination, there is not one of their rules holds true in all cases (27).' With regard to Mr Halley's election as Assistant-Secretary, the particulars of it are; That the members present were 38, of which, upon balloting, Dr (after, Sir Hans) Sloane, had ten voices, Dr Papin [who invented the digester] eight, Mr Salisbury four, and Mr Halley sixteen. But the majority of the members present being necessary to an election, the ballot was repeated, and then Dr Sloane had nine voices, Dr Papin six, and Mr Halley twenty-three. Mr Halley being thus chosen, was sworn before the Council (28). However, the quarrel did not end so. Before his election the Council had agreed upon twelve qualifications necessary for the Clerk, of which the fifth was, That he should be a single man, without children. It seems this defect was insisted on, as voiding his election; for we find the Council at a meeting June 16th, 1686, declaring their satisfaction in the Society's choice of Mr Halley, notwithstanding his want of the fifth qualification concluded on by the Council of Jan. 27th last past, which at the time of his election, the Society was pleased to dispense with (29). Notwithstanding this, he was so far from being able to obtain any enlargement of his salary, by way of gratuity or otherwise (as was intimated at his election), that even the payment of the fifty pounds met with opposition: for a Committee of the Council being appointed Jan. 5th, 1686-7, to inspect the books of the Society, to see if he had performed his duty, in relation to the entries to be made by him, according to an order of Council of Jan. 27th, 1685-6 (30), we find, at another meeting of the Council June 15th, 1687, the question being put, concerning Mr Halley's salary, the gratuity above fifty pounds a year to him, was remitted to the farther consideration of the Council; and in the mean time, it was determined by ballot, that the Treasurer should pay him fifty pounds for the last year's salary (31).

[I] Introduced to the Astronomers of those countries. We have the following proofs of this in his Dioptrics; in one place of which treatise (32), having observed that Borelli had given the world (33) a hint of his secret manner of grinding great glasses with spheres, but had not yet obliged it with a discovery; he thinks it the more extraordinary, because 'he is a person, says he, of the greatest candour and freedom, and the most communicative, as I am obliged to express with much gratitude, for his civilities shewed me in Paris, in 1685; at which time he gave me an object glass, formed by this way, for a telescope twenty-four feet long.' In his method for trying the goodness of an object-glass; 'This, says he (34), Cassini shewed me, when I visited him at the Observatory in Paris in 1685, who tried all his glasses by the large title page of a book (in which there were letters printed of different sizes) fixed inverted into the jumble of a steeple window, more than a fourth of a mile distance from the Observatory.' He also shewed him two very pretty contrivances for managing great glasses, which, because not publick, Mr Molyneux describes by his memory. In another place, speaking of Huygens's tract intitled, Astroscopia compendiariva designed only for describing his way of managing great glasses with very little trouble, and short tubes; 'This I am sure, says Mr Molyneux, is no barren speculation of the ingenious author, but successfully practised by him, as I can gratefully testify, having had the honour of seeing the whole contrivance by the excellent author himself, in his garden at the Hague, in 1685. At which time I had the honour also of seeing his planetary clock or moving ephemeris (35). The treatise here mentioned was not rightly understood by our author before, as appears by the following extract of a letter from him to Mr Flamsteed, dated August 7th, 1684, where he writes thus: 'The book of Mr Huygens I formerly mentioned to you, is called Astroscopia Compendaria tubi optici molimine liberata. It is only a contrivance for managing great glasses, without the trouble of a tube. If the book be come to your sight, be pleased to favour me with your opinion of the practicableness of the method he proposes. I have the book, and to me it seems mistrustful without some improvement (36).'

[K] Sciothericum Telescopium. The whole title runs thus: Sciothericum Telescopium, or a new Contrivance of adapting a Telescope to an horizontal Dial for observing the Moment of Time by Day or Night, useful in all Astronomical Observations, and for regulating and adjusting curious Pendulum Watches and other Time-Keepers, with proper Tables requisite thereto. It is dedicated to Henry Earl of Clarendon, Lord Lieutenant-General, and General Governor of Ireland, as the first fruits of the Dublin Society, after his Lordship's arrival to that government. 'Tis certain he was not a little fond of this invention; and as soon as he had got one of the instruments made at London, it was by his order put into the hands of his friend Mr Flamsteed, to whom he had recommended it's use, in taking horary distances of stars from the meridian, and though that Astronomer by trial upon two very distant stars, found it not to answer, our author attributing the fault, not to the contrivance, but to the inaccuracy of the workmanship, presses to have this friend's opinion his observations of a lunar eclipse in the subsequent paper (y). Upon the coming out of Sir Isaac Newton's Principia the following year, 1687, our author was struck with the same astonishment as the rest of the world in general, but declared also that he was not qualified to examine the particulars [L]. In 1689, among great numbers of other Protestants, he withdrew from the disturbances in Ireland occasioned by the Popish administration*, and after a short stay in London, fixed himself with his family at Chester (z). Being thus deprived of the use of his astronomical instruments, he employed his leisure in putting together the materials, which he had some time before prepared for his Dioptrics †, in which he was much assisted by Mr Flamsteed [M]; and in August 1690 he went to London to put it to the press (aa), where the care of revising the sheets was undertaken by nion of the theory, in such terms as plainly shew nothing would satisfy but a confirmation of his own (37). Accordingly, in the book itself, in order to evince the preference of it to all others, he gives an account of these which he reduces to four. 1. By dials. 2. By taking the sun's altitude by day, and that of the fixt stars by night. 3. By observing the altitude and azimuth of the sun. 4. By the transits of the sun or stars cross the meridian, or the coming of some of the nearer polar stars in the same vertical with the pole star. Of these, the first serve only by day; the two next, tho' not inconvenient, are yet troublesome, the instruments being large, require great charge and long practice to manage them dextrously, besides the trouble of calculating the most difficult of oblique spherical triangles (38). The fourth, he allows indeed to be plain, simple, and easy; but observes, that both ways serve rather to rectify watches and other time-keepers, than to shew the time themselves, through the whole course of an observation, as in an eclipse of the sun, or when a spot either immerses or emerges. When at that instant there is not, and perhaps will not be for many months after, a star in the meridian, or under the polar star, to tell me the moment of that time. But what I propose does as constantly (and not by fits) shew and tell the time, if duly managed, as the hand of a well going pendulum watch indicates the hour.—However, it must be confessed, that our author's instrument never came into general use, and Dr Smith having described some other instruments † for the purpose, concludes in these terms: "These are the best sort of instruments, and the best methods I know of, for determining time; however, those that are desirous of knowing a greater variety of them, and of fuller instructions in relation to them, may receive satisfaction, by consulting Mr William Molyneux's little book upon his telescopic dial (39)."

[L] He could not read Sir Isaac Newton's Principia.] Mr Halley, his constant correspondent, had sent him the several parts of this inestimable treasure as they came from the press, before the whole was finished, assuring him that he looked upon it as the utmost effort of human genius; but though this raised his curiosity, yet upon dipping into it he found it would take up too much time to peruse it thoroughly (40). Some time after it was published, Mr Flamsteed desiring his opinion of it, he sent the following answer in a letter, dated at Dublin, May 10th, 1688. "The last I had from you was of December 19th, 1687: therein you desire to know our thoughts in this place, of Mr Newton's book; and to this I answer, that I have not yet had time to settle to it seriously, for I find I must rub up all the little notion I have of conics, and the doctrine of ratio, which are half slipped out of my head, before I venture upon it; and I question, after all, whether I shall be able to master it: for I perceive it is a piece that requires great application, or else it is invincible. Neither do I know any mathematic head in this place, that has thoroughly considered the whole, unless it be the honourable Mr Roberts, the Earl of Radnor's younger son, who is at present in this town. He tells me he has run through Mr Newton's book, and finds it really admirable. One observation in the book (though not first started there) is truly to be wondered at, and that is, the sesquialtera ratio between the periods and distances of the planets, and that not only among the primary erratics, but even among the lesser sets of dancers.—'Tis in my opinion a most amazing thought to consider, how universally this great law runs thro' the whole frame of nature, and agrees to bodies at such vast distances, and that seem to have no tie or respect to each other. 'Tis to me beyond exception the strongest argument that can be drawn from the frame of this universe, for the proof of a God, to see one law so fixed and inviolable amongst those vast and distant chori, who certainly could not therefore be put into this posture and motion by chance, but by an omnipotent intelligent being (41)."

[M] He was assisted by Mr Flamsteed.] Our author seems to have made this subject the chief part of his philosophical studies, from the first entrance therein, as in some measure may be collected from a letter to Mr Flamsteed in 1681 (42). In another letter to the same person, dated December 16th, 1684, he writes thus: "The chief matter of your last was about the magnifying of telescopes. wherein I was most heartily glad, that I find we agree in the demonstration. About a twelve month ago, I wrote a sheet or two of paper concerning this matter, wherein, by proper schemes and calculations, I demonstrated the matter exactly, according to the purport of your opinion (43)." Again, in a letter dated November 13th, 1686, we find him proposing to the same friend a difficulty, with regard to such microscopes as have one object-glass, and one eye-glass; in which, the distance between the object and object-glass is very precise and determined, otherwise all appears in confusion, and yet the distance between the eye-glass and object-glass is very uncertain and undetermined; so that an inch, or two, or three, alters the appearance but little, of which he could not conceive the reason.—"You are in the right, says he, in proceeding, when you say Honoratus Faber talks nonsense in his fifth and sixth paragraph, p. 141. He does so most certainly, but this is not the only place of a hundred, where he does so most egregiously; and indeed I know no optic writer, that coming to the combination of glasses in a tube, does not err most enormously. They deal pretty well with the affections of single glasses, but when they put them together, they make sad work on't; and I could never receive any satisfaction in that particular, 'till I was put into the road by my good friend Mr Flamsteed, but now I think I have the whole theory of the usual telescopes clear enough. Indeed, Sir, I am much obliged to you for your ready communications of your dioptric problems; and I do assure you, whatever you communicate to me, is as safe as in your own breast; and I would not for the world publish any thing of another's to anticipate his fame or credit therein. This is a baseness, I hope, too mean for me: and in confidence of this protestation made to you, I shall earnestly beg of you to proceed in your communications to me, for thereby you do wonderfully oblige and pleasure me, and you in some measure secure your labours from being lost (44)." And in reality, that was the consequence. As soon as the Dioptrics was finished, he acquainted this friend with it, in a letter dated at Chester, May 7th, 1690, in these terms. "Whenever the troublesome thoughts of the miseries of my country would permit me (which indeed was but seldom) I have diverted my mind by the consideration of Dioptrics, and have put the last hand to an idle work which I now design for the press. But before I can do this, I must remember that some years ago, you communicated to me the method for calculating a ray's progress, and one or two dioptrical problems. These I make use of in this work, but with ample acknowledgments to my worthy friend, and I desire your leave to publish them. As to the problems which properly are your own (for the calculation of a ray's progress is Mr Gafcoigne's) I have, together with your solution of them (which I expressly declare so to be) inserted another method of my own for solving them, which you will find when you see the work. In several parts of this by Mr Halley, who, at our author's request, gave leave for printing in the appendix his celebrated theorem for finding the foci of optic-glasses (b b). Accordingly the book came out in 1692 in 4to. under the title of Dioptrica Nova: A Treatise of Dioptrics, in two parts; wherein the various effects and appearances of spherical glasses, both convex and concave, single and combined, in telescopes and microscopes, together with their usefulness in many concerns of human life, are explained [N]. In this piece he gives the honour of the first invention of spectacles and microscopes to Friar Roger Bacon of Oxford, as Mr Wood (c c) and Dr Plot (d d) had done before him; and this opinion generally prevailed among the English 'till of late, that the Friar's claim hath been disputed by another learned optical writer [O]. The dedication of the Dioptrics being addressed to the Royal Society, he

' work, I have occasion to mention my esteemed friend, ' which I always do with that honour and respect as is ' ever due from his

' Most affectionate humble servant,

William Molyneux (45).'

Mr Flamstead having given his consent to this request, our author returned an answer of thanks for that favour, May 17th (46). The book was put to the press soon after, and when it came out, these asistances appeared particularly in prop. 16 17, and 18; and the trigonometrical calculations to coroll. 1. of prop. 26. The Royal Astronomer's favours are every where acknowledged, and having mentioned his tables to the Satellites of Jupiter in the Philosophical Transactions, he adds, ' But the curiosities which this excellent Astronomer has, yet unpublished, in that useful part of Astronomy, viz. the parallaxes, are very great and ingenious, which I hope in time he will impart to the world, as with much freedom and generosity he now communicates them to his private friends, in the number of which, I am very proud to reckon myself (47).'

[N] Dioptrica Nova, &c. He gives it this title, because it is almost wholly new, very little being borrowed from others, but what is requisite to shew the methods of others in demonstrating their propositions, and to comprehend their conclusions and series of the propositions of their books. Besides, as he observes, it was the first that appeared in English upon this subject. The reader must not expect any of the more curious speculations therein, that being foreign to his design. But several of the most generally useful propositions for practice are demonstrated in a clear and easy manner, for which reason, it was for many years much used by the artificers; and the second part is very entertaining, especially in the history which he gives of the several optical instruments, and the discoveries made by them, which has been since carried on by Dr Robert Smith, the present Master of Trinity-college in Cambridge (48).

[O] The Friar's claim to the invention of spectacles controverted. In regard to spectacles, the proof brought by our author for this opinion, is a chapter upon reflections on Bacon's piece, intitled Opus Majus in English, thus: ' If the letters of a book, or any minute objects, be viewed through a lesser segment of a sphere of glass or crystal, whose plain base is laid upon them, they will appear far better and larger. Because, by the fifth canon, about a spherical medium, whose convexity is towards the eye, and the object is placed below it, and between the convexity and it's centre, all things concur to magnify it. For the angle under which it is seen is greater, and it's image is also greater, and nearer to the eye than the object itself, because the object is between the center and the eye. And therefore, this instrument is useful to old men, and to those that have weak eyes. For they may see the smallest letters sufficiently magnified *. But if the medium be the larger segment of a sphere, or but half of one, then by the sixth canon the apparent visual angle will be greater than the true, and the image also greater than the object, because the centre of the sphere is between the eye and the object. And therefore this instrument is not so powerful in magnifying as the lesser segment of a sphere. Also, instruments made of crystal bodies with plain surfaces, by the first and second canons about spherical surfaces, will perform the same thing: but the lesser of two segments of a sphere, magnifies more manifestly than any of them all, by reason of the concurrence of all the three

' causes, as I find before (49). Now, says Dr Smith, to find an author speaking of a small segment of a sphere of glass, of it's magnifying the letters of a book, of it's being a proper instrument for helping decayed sight, and to say he was not possessed either of the theory or the use of spectacles, may appear to be a paradox, but I hope to satisfy my reader is not a mistake. First then, our author plainly proposed to lay the flat base of his segment upon the letters: for the word superpositi [by which he expresses it] must have been a contraction in his writing of the word superpositi, or rather superimpositi, as appears by the sequel, and by the canon he quotes; besides, he says not a word of holding the segment at a distance from the letters, nor could he indeed, because he has not treated of a double refraction at both it's surfaces, without which he could conclude nothing at all about it's effects, when raised from the book; for he argues from nothing but theory throughout the whole chapter. In the next place, I observe, that he is quite mistaken in asserting twice together, that the lesser segment of a sphere magnifies the letters more than the larger. The contrary to which is true, as I shall prove presently. But it is no wonder that he concludes wrong from a wrong principle, namely, that the letters appear less in a greater segment than in the smaller, because their image is beyond them in the greater segment, and before them in the lesser. The only just consequence that can be drawn from these different distances of the image, is, that to an old man's eye the letters will appear distinct, by rays diverging somewhat less from the remoter image, and more confused by rays diverging somewhat more from the nearer, than if he viewed them with his naked eye. The effect of the lesser segment is therefore contrary to the design of spectacles, which is not to magnify the letters, but to make them appear distinct, by causing the rays to fall upon the eye less diverging, or parallel, or even somewhat converging, according to the different age or constitution of the eye, and therefore it cannot be performed but by a very nice and determinate degree of convexity. Hence it is plain, that our author tried no experiments with a greater and a lesser segment, to compare their effects together. For then he must have found out his mistake, and must rather have preferred the larger segment for magnifying more, which is all he contends for. However, let us suppose him to have followed his own doctrine, and to have tried a lesser segment only; it could not be a thin segment of a large sphere like one of spectacle-glasses. For this could not sensibly magnify the letters underneath it, as he says it did. The most convex spectacles now made, when laid upon a book, have not this effect, because they are too thin. It follows then, if he tried any segment at all, that it must have been a segment of a small sphere, sufficiently thick to magnify the letters underneath it; and therefore it must have been thicker than our deepest spectacles for the oldest mens eyes; and consequently, when applied to their eyes, it must have made the letters appear confused, by too great a quantity of the refractions. And this confusion our author could not correct by theory and reason, because he knew not the cause of it, and it is plain he made not many experiments. The discovery of this cause, together with the manner of vision by pictures upon the retina, was first made by Kepler above 300 years after our author's time, and also after spectacles were in common use. It was impossible then for any man before Kepler, even to explain the effect of spectacles, that is, how they correct the confusion in the picture upon the retina, and much more to invent them by theory and reason; and of consequence they must have been the result of some lucky accidents among a multitude of trials and attempts, begun perhaps upon this hint of our author's, takes notice, among other improvements in Philosophy made by building it upon experience, of the advances that had been made lately in Logic, by the incomparable (as he files him) Mr John Locke, who, in his Essay upon Human Understanding, he observes, had rectified more received mistakes, and delivered more profound truths established upon experience and observation, for the direction of man's mind in the prosecution of knowledge (which may be properly termed Logic), than are to be met with in all the volumes of the Ancients; and that he had clearly overthrown all those metaphysical whimsies, which affected mens brains with a species of madness, whereby they fancied a knowledge where they had none, by making a noise with sounds without clear and distinct significations. This compliment, together with a present of his book, to Mr Locke, drew a letter of thanks from that gentleman to our author (e): whence begun an acquaintance that presently grew into an intimate friendship; and from this time a constant correspondence †, in the most affectionate terms, was carried on between them as long as Mr Molyneux lived, to whom many of the improvements that were made in the second edition of the Essay on Human Understanding must be attributed (ff). Before he left Chester he lost his lady (gg) [P], who died soon after she had brought him a son, whom he was extremely fond of, and spared no cost or pains in his education, which he formed according to the plan laid down by his friend Mr Locke upon that subject (bb). As soon as the publick tranquillity was settled in his native country, he returned home; and, upon the convening of a new Parliament under Lord Sydney in 1692, he was chosen one of the representatives for the city of Dublin. In the next Parliament, under Lord Capel, in 1695, he was one of the representatives for the University there †, and continued therein during his life (ii); that learned body having, before the end of the first session of the former Parliament, conferred on him the degree of Doctor of Laws (kk). He was likewise nominated by the Lord Lieutenant one of the Commissioners for the forfeited estates; but notwithstanding the salary of 500 pounds a year annexed to that employment, he chose for some reasons to decline it [Q]. which is all the honour that can justly be paid to him (50). In much the same manner Dr Smith shews from the next chapter in the Opus Majus, concerning refracted vision †, which is cited to prove the Friar's knowledge of telescopes, that though he mentions several problems of the telescopic kind (51), yet he did not think of performing them by a single portable instrument like a telescope, but by fixing up several glasses in proper places at large intervals from one another, which would certainly prove ineffectual. That considering the false notions he had from the Ancients about distinct and confused vision; the false principle he maintains, that the apparent magnitude of an object is as the angle subtended at the eye by it's image, and reciprocally as the distance of the image too; and lastly, the false conclusions he has drawn, and must always draw from these principles, as I have shewn in his attempt upon making spectacles, it was certainly next to impossible for him to have invented by theory a much nicer and more complex instrument; I mean a telescope of any sort. That it does not appear he knew what a concave or convex glass was, nor ever considered the appearance of an object placed at a distance beyond a refracting body of any shape, but only within a spherical one. Hence he was not qualified to invent a telescope by theory, nor by experiments for want of lenses. That as to the passage produced from a manuscript (52), to shew that he actually applied telescopes to astronomical purposes, it may be replied, that the Ancients had some occasion for perspective in plain instruments, before the invention of telescopic ones; but as the passage stands alone, it is not easy to know the intent of it. That the Friar speaks only hypothetically, saying, that glasses may be figured and objects magnified so and so, but never asserts one single trial or observation upon the sun or moon (or any thing else) though he mentions them both. On the other hand, he conceives some effects of telescopes that cannot possibly be performed by them (53). To conclude, if it be asked how he came by these notions, I answer, from the common doctrine of refractions in his canons, and from common appearances by refraction and reflection, especially, from concave speculums, whose effects were well known to him, both by the accounts of them in ancient authors, and by his own experience. And this I take to be a sufficient ground for a man of good sense and fancy to produce all that he has said (54). Thus Dr Smith against the opinion of Mr Molyneux, but in justice to the latter, we must not omit a remark of Mr Hooke's, who July 26th, 1682 read before the Royal Society a passage that he had met with in Digges's Stratoticos, wherein he affirms, that his father had a method of discovering all objects pretty far distant, which lie round about in the country, and this was by the help of a book or manuscript of Roger Bacon of Oxford, who he conceived was the only man besides his father who knew it. This was the more remarkable, for that this Stratoticos was printed in 1579, which was more than thirty years before Metius or Galileo made the discovery of these glasses, and therefore it seemed evident that Roger Bacon was the first inventor of telescopes, and Leonard Digges the next reviver of them, both Englishmen (55).

[P] He lost his lady. She had lost her eye-sight above twelve years before, so that she must have been struck with this heavy calamity in a few months after her marriage in 1678, from which time she had been very sickly, and afflicted with extreme pains of the head (56). Some years after her decease Mr Molyneux writing to Mr Locke about the temper and qualities of his son, has this remark. I find by a book lately written by Mr Norris, that Mr Masham † and my son agree in one odd circumstance of life, having both their mothers blind (57). In answer to which Mr Locke writes thus: 'I read that passage in your letter to my Lady Masham which concerned her sight. She bid me tell you, that she hopes to see you here this summer, you will possibly wonder at the miracle, but that you must find in Mr Norris's book. She has 'tis true, but weak eyes, which Mr Norris for reasons he knew best, resolved to make blind ones, and having suited his epistle to that supposition, could not be hindered from publishing it so, tho' to prevent it, my Lady wrote him word, that she was not so, and hoped she never should be (58).'

[Q] He chose to decline it. In the preface to his Case of Ireland stated, in order to shew that he was prompted to that undertaking purely for the sake of his country, without any view of private interest or advantage: he expresses himself thus, 'I have no concern in the woollen trade, I am no ways interested in the forfeitures or grants, I am not at all solicitous whether the Bishop or Society of Derry recover the lands they contest about †.' Whence we may infer that he looked upon the commission for forfeited estates to be too invidious an employment for him to accept, who was plainly too not of a covetous disposition: but besides, though he was satisfied of the justice of such forfeitures in general, yet he thought in this particular statute of forfeitures, enough had not been left to the Parliament of Ireland. It had been urged that the wars in Ireland had given the English a just title to the lands and inheritances of the rebels. To this he answers, that 'if we consider the wars of Ireland, we shall observe the common case of wars between two common enemies. Ours are rather rebellions, or rather intestine commotions, interest of his country, so in Parliament he was zealous for promoting the linnen manufactory there, which was much encouraged by Queen Mary (11): but with singular ardency he espoused the cause of their woollen manufactory, when he conceived it to be oppressed by the English Government; and, as soon as that affair came to a crisis, he drew his pen boldly [R] in defence of his country's independency. The piece, produced by this noble effort, was intitled, The Case of Ireland's being bound by Acts of Parliament in England, stated [S]. It was not published 'till the beginning of the year 1698, which happened to be a little while after the case was determined against his opinion by the English Parliament (m). He had given Mr Locke a hint of his thoughts upon this subject before it was quite ready for the press, and desired his sentiments upon the fundamental principle

• commotions, that is, the Irish Papists rising against the King and Protestants of Ireland; and then 'tis plain, that if these latter, by the assistance of their brethren of England and their purse, do prove victorious, the people of England ought to be fully repaid. But then the manner of their payment, and in what way it shall be levied, ought to be left to the people of Ireland in Parliament assembled; and so it was, after the rebellion of forty-one. The adventurers then were at vast charges, and there were several acts of Parliament in England made for their reimbursement, by disposing to them the rebels lands; but after all, it was thought reasonable that the Parliament of Ireland should do this in their own way, and therefore the acts of settlement and explanation made all the former English acts of no force. In like manner we allow that England ought to be repaid all their expences in suppressing this late rebellion; all we desire is, that in preservation of our own rights and liberties, we may do it in our methods regularly in our own Parliament (59).*

[R] He drew his pen boldly ] It seems some threatenings against him were whispered about, which made him cautious of his behaviour. In a letter to Mr Locke dated at Dublin April 10th, this year, 1698, he expresses his apprehensions in these terms: 'Till I either see how the Parliament at Westminster is disposed to take it [his book], or 'till I see them risen, I don't think it adviseable for me to go on t'other side the water, tho' I am not apprehensive of any mischief from them, yet God knows what resentments cautious men may take on such occasions.*' And in the preface to the book, 'I have heard, says he, that it has been said, that perhaps I might run some hazard in attempting this argument: but I am not at all apprehensive of any such danger. We are in a miserable condition, indeed, if we might not be allowed to complain when we think we are hurt, and to give our reasons with all modesty and submission †. But were it otherwise, it would not in the least discourage me in an attempt where I think my cause good and my country concerned.'

[S] The case of Ireland, &c. ] As this piece contains all or most of what can be said on this subject, which is very interesting, we shall give a short and concise account of it, as follows: He begins with observing that, the claim of the English Parliament must be founded either on conquest, purchase, or precedents, and matters of record. Wherefore, he first shews from Gyraldas Cambrensis, Roger Hoveden, Matthew Paris, John Brumpton, that Ireland was not properly so conquered by Henry II. as to give the Parliament of England any jurisdiction over Ireland; and though it were conquered, he maintains, that even a just conquest gives no right over the liberties and estates of posterity, being only a personal right over the actual opposers; for the proof of which, he refers to Mr Locke's Treatise on Civil Government, ch. 16. 3. Granting this to be wrong, he urges that such concessions have been made by the Conquerors to the people of Ireland, as are inconsistent with the aforesaid claim; for this he produces precedents, records, and history, shewing the gradual steps by which the laws of England were introduced into Ireland. Here he cites Matthew Paris ad ann. 1172. vit. H II. and Coke's Instit. 4. ch. 1 and 76, who mentions the modus tenendi Parliamentorum, granted by H II. a copy of which original modus, he gives from the record itself. He maintains that the donation of Ireland by H. II. to his son K. John, before he came to the crown of England, proves the former to be a separate and distinct kingdom from the latter; and that after the uniting of the two kingdoms in the person of John, that King came to Dublin and granted them the same Magna Charta with that of England, ann. 1210. That his son H. III. who came to the crown 19 Oct. 1216. did grant them in Nov. following a magna charta dated at Bristol Nov. 12th, ann. regni primo, which was the same that he granted to England ann regni nono. The same H. III. ann. regni 12<sup>mo</sup>, provided that all the laws of England should be observed in Ireland, and that K. John's charter should be kept inviolably; and that from the time of these two Kings, the two kingdoms were governed under one head, the King of England, yet so as both remained separate and distinct in their several jurisdictions, as those of Scotland, and are without any subordination. He urges, that these laws of England, thus received voluntarily in Ireland, must be the law of Parliament and the common law. He then proceeds to shew, that the statutes passed in England from the reign of H. III. were not in force in Ireland 'till they were allowed and published by the Parliament there; and that the English statutes since, which are in force in Ireland, though not allowed by that Parliament, are only declaratory of the old common law, and not introductory of a new law; of all which he gives a great number of instances in particular statutes made in England, which never were in force in Ireland 'till so received and so enacted by that Parliament. In this place he takes notice of such statutes where Ireland is particularly mentioned, and of Lord Chief Justice Hufsey's opinion in H. VIII's time, that the statutes made in England shall bind those of Ireland, which he allows in some cases might be true, viz. when the Irish had their representatives in the English Parliament, which he shews they had upon some occasions, in Edw. the First's reign, and Edw. the Third, and Oliver Cromwell's Parliament. He concludes therefore, that this practice began in 1641: he gives an account how it arose, and concludes that the three acts of Charles the Second, one against planting tobacco, another for encouraging shipping and navigation, and a third prohibiting the exportation of wool from Ireland to any country except England, did effectually bind them so, as they did not transgress them; but how rightfully they do this, says he, is the matter in question. This I am sure of, that before these acts, the eldest of which is not over thirty seven years, there is not one positive full precedent to be met with in all the statute books of an English act binding the kingdom of Ireland. And on this argument we may venture to assert, that these are at least innovations on us, as not being warranted by any former precedents: and shall proceedings, continues he, only of thirty seven years standing, be urged against a nation to deprive them of their rights and liberties, which they enjoyed for five hundred years before, and which were invaded without and against their consent, and, from that day to this, have been constantly complained of. As to the act for taking the oaths to King William, he says, their compliance to it was purely voluntary, because of the benefit of it to Ireland, and not from the right they concluded to be in the legislators. He insists strongly on a record in Richard the Third's time, wherein are these words: Hibernia habet Parliamentum & faciunt leges & nostra statuta non ligant eos quia non mittunt milites ad Parliamentum. As to writs of error lying from the King's-bench in Ireland to that of England, he observes that practice arises from the King's supposed presence in the latter, while he resides in that kingdom; and if he should reside in Ireland, such writs would lie from the English King's bench to that of Ireland, and therefore the English Parliament cannot from hence claim any right of jurisdiction in Ireland, because they claim a jurisdiction of their own, and their Court is not the King's Court in that proper and strict sense that the King's-bench is (60).

† In the letter last cited he says, he had treated the subject with that caution and submission, that it could not justly give offence; so that he not only put his name to it, but dedicated it to his Majesty. But a complaint was made of it to the House of Commons May 21; whereupon they addressed his Majesty, asserting the dependency and subordination of Ireland to the kingdom of England. *Salmon's Chron. on which the argument in it was grounded: in answer to which, that gentleman intimating, that the business was of too large extent for the subject of a letter, proposed to talk the matter over with him in England. This invitation prevailed upon him [T], notwithstanding the very infirm state of health under which he laboured at that time, to cross the water once more, as he did in July this year. He staid in England 'till about the middle of September; but the pleasure of this long wished for interview, which he had intended to repeat the following spring (nn), with that dear friend, seems to have been purchased at the expence of his life [U]; for shortly after he was seized with a severe fit of his constitutional distemper, the stone, which occasioned such violent wrutchings, as burst a blood-vessel; from which the loss of blood was so great, that he was not able to struggle with it any longer than two days, expiring on the 11th of October 1698. His body being opened, there was found a large stone in his right kidney, and some small ones in his left. He was interred in St Audoen's church in Dublin, in the tomb of his great-grandfather Sir William Usher, near which there is a handsome monument erected to his memory. In person he was something like his friend Mr Locke (oo), of whom, as he had frequently done before, so, during his short sickness, he spoke several times with great respect, and in his Will wrote the following clause with his own hand: I give and bequeath to my excellent friend John Locke, Esq; author of the Essay concerning Human Understanding, the sum of five pounds to buy him a ring, in memory of the value and esteem I had for him (pp).

[T] This argument prevailed.] In a letter to Mr Locke dated March 15th, 1697, having informed his friend of the disappointment he had met with in his design of coming to Bath that spring, by being chosen, by the King's directions, one of the guardians of the young Lord Woodstock, he proceeds thus: 'Were it only in my health that I am disappointed, I could be the easier bear it; but I am delayed from embracing my dear friend, which is most grievous of all. Yet I hope it will be so but for a time; for if my Lord Chancellor (61) comes over in any convenient season, I will certainly get loose. But this I cannot hope for, 'till the Parliament in England rises. I should be glad to know from you when that is expected; for indeed they bear very hard upon us in Ireland. How justly they can bind us without our consent and representatives, I leave the author of the two treatises of government to consider. But of this I shall trouble you further another time, for you will hear more hereafter.' To this Mr Locke having answered, that he saw no likelihood of the Parliament's rising yet a good while, and begged him not to defer his journey on that or any other account, and urges the matter in these terms: 'Among other things I would be glad to talk with you before I die, is that which you suggest at the bottom of the first page of your letter. I am mightily concerned for the place meant in the question about which you say you will ask the author of the treatise you mention, and wish extremely well to it, and would be very glad to be informed by you what would be best for it, and debate with you the ways to compose it. But this can't be done by letters, the subject is of too great extent, the views too large, and the particulars too many to be so managed. Come therefore yourself, and come as well prepared in that matter as you can. But if you talk with others on that point there, mention not me to any body on that subject, only let you and I try what good we can do for those whom we wish well to. Great things have sometimes been brought about from small beginnings well laid together (62).' This, says Mr Molyneux, in his reply, is irrefutable (63); 'I had thoughts of coming into England, as I have told you, on occasion of my health, but since the receipt of your's of April 6th, which came to my hands but this morning, that consideration weighs but little with me. The desire of seeing and conversing with you has drowned all other expectations from my journey: and now I am resolved to accomplish it, let what will come on't.—I shall embrace you, God willing, as soon as ever the Parliament of England rises.' He then proceeds to mention the reason of his waiting that event, viz. his Case of Ireland's being bound, &c. which was then printed, and some copies for Mr Locke and his friends upon the road to England, after which, desiring that friend's opinion of it, he writes as follows: 'I cannot pretend this to be an accomplished performance, it was done in haste, and intended to overtake the proceedings at Westminster, but it comes too late for that: what effect it may possibly have in time to come, God and the wife Council of England only knows. But were it again under my hands, I could considerably amend and add to it (64).'

[U] He fell into his constitutional disorder.] He had been seized with a severe fit of the stone colic about three years before, and was so much subject upon any slight cold to returns of that disorder, that it drew the following expression from him in 1696. 'It is a melancholy thought to me, that since I have had the honour of your correspondence, it has hardly ever happened, that when both you and I have made an apology for our long silence, that it has not been drawn from want of health.'

(65) In a letter to Locke, dated Nov. June 6, 1695. Familiar Letters p. 147.

MOLYNEUX [SAMUEL], son to the preceding, was born at Chester about the middle of July 1689 (a); being descended from a sickly mother, his constitution was delicate, yet he was very healthful in his infancy (b). As he was an only child, his father, who was extremely fond of him, made it the chief, if not the sole, business of his life to educate him; wherein he followed the plan laid down by his friend Mr Locke, who occasionally gave him his advice; and, in return, he sent that gentleman an account of his extraordinary progress. By which it appears, that when he was but just turned of five, he could read perfectly well, and, on the globes, could trace out, and point to all the noted parts, countries, and cities, in the world, both land and sea. By five and a half he could perform many of the plainest problems on the globe, as the longitude and latitude, the antipodes, the time with them and other countries, &c. and this by way of play and diversion, seldom called to it, never chid or beaten for it. About the same age he could read any number of figures, not exceeding six places, break it as you please by cyphers. By the time he was six he could manage a compass, ruler, and pencil, very prettily, and perform many little geometrical tricks, and advanced to writing and arithmetick; and, in August 1695, had been about three months at Latin, under a proper tutor. He could then read a Gazette, and in the large maps of Sanfon could shew most of the remarkable places as he read along, and turn to the proper maps. He had been shewn some dogs dissected, and could give some little account of the grand traces of Anatomy.

to my. As to his morals, no child had ever his passions more perfectly at command. He was obedient and observant to the nicest particular, and at the same time sprightly, playful, and active (c). He continued to proceed suitably to these beginnings as long as his father lived (d), who at his death left him to the care and management of his brother Dr Thomas Molyneux, an excellent scholar and Physician at Dublin [A]. This gentleman undertook the trust in a full resolution to execute it, with all the regard possible to his brother's memory, and the benefit of his child (e); and no doubt our author had all the advantages which a genteel fortune could give him for improving his talents, and the perfection he attained shews he deserved them all; for, at the age of manhood, he was allowed to be one of the politest and most accomplished gentlemen either in that country or in England, where his present Majesty, when he was Prince of Wales, appointed him his Secretary. For the convenience of executing this office, he had a house at Kew near Richmond, where, Astronomy being his favourite study, he set himself to make such improvements in that science as his fortune enabled him to do. In this spirit, about the year 1723, he applied himself to find out a convenient method for making the specula for Sir Isaac Newton's reflecting telescope; and being assisted therein by Mr Bradley, the present Astronomer Royal (f), they finished a good instrument of twenty-six inches in May 1724, and afterwards another of eight feet. The principal design was to reduce the method of making these instruments to some degree of certainty and ease, to the intent, that the difficulty in making them, and the danger in miscarrying, might no longer discourage any workman from attempting the same for publick sale. Accordingly, as soon as they were satisfied as to most of the circumstances in this performance, they communicated the whole process of the operation (g) to Mr Scarlet, an Optician near St Anne's church Soho, and Mr Hearne, a Mathematical-Instrument-Maker in Dogwell-court White-Friars, who afterwards succeeded in making these telescopes; and Mr Molyneux presented one of his own making to his majesty John the Fifth King of Portugal (h). In the year 1725, he erected a very accurate instrument of his own contrivance, in order to determine, if possible, that grand astronomical desideratum, the annual parallax of the fixed stars. This had been attempted by Dr Hooke, Mr Flamsteed, and others (i), without success. Mr Molyneux followed the method of Dr Hooke in some respects (k); as in taking the zenith distances of the brightest star in the Dragon's head at the times of its transits over the meridian, and also in the form of his instrument, constructed almost upon the same principles with the doctor's, but executed to a degree of exactness vastly greater, and chiefly owing to the care and contrivance of Mr George Graham, the best workman in Europe. Our Astronomer was all along assisted in the prosecution of this noble design by Mr Bradley, who has obliged the publick with a very accurate history of it in a letter to Dr Halley (l), containing not only an account of several new and surprizing phenomena that attended the observations (which he carried on and repeated after Mr Molyneux's decease), but also a compleat discovery of the true cause of them; which at last enabled him to settle the point in question, and to draw from it some admirable consequences relating to the propagation of light, by which the earth's annual motion in her orbit was first ascertained; these being esteemed to be some of the finest discoveries that have been made since the invention of telescopes, we shall give the substance of them below [B]. Our ingenious and honourable

[A] Dr Thomas Molyneux. This gentleman was younger brother to Mr William Molyneux; he was bred at Leyden, where he first became known to Mr Locke about the year 1675, with whom he kept a correspondence (1) as well as his brother, from the year 1692: before he left Holland, he sent an account of Mr Leuwenhoek's microscopes to the Royal Society, of which he became a Fellow in 1686, and communicated several curiosities to that Society, which are printed in their Transactions. He had always preserved an inviolable affection, and cultivated a strict friendship, with his brother, at whose death he had been settled some time in the practice of his profession at Dublin, and was married and had two daughters (2).

[B] We shall give the substance of it below. The result of the observations upon the bright star in the dragon's head marked  $\gamma$  by Bayer (3), was this. Beginning from Decemb. 3d, 1725, it's distance from the zenith being taken several days, at the time of it's transit over the meridian, there appeared no material difference in the observations. On Decemb. 17th, it passed a little more southerly from the zenith than before, and still more on the 20th, which was matter of surprize, both because no sensible alteration of parallax could so soon be expected in this star at that time of the year; and because it was the contrary way to what it would have been, had it proceeded from an annual parallax. About the beginning of March 1726, the star was found to be  $20''$  more southerly, than at the time of the first observation, and seemed to have arrived at it's utmost limits southwards. By the middle of April, it appeared to be returning back again towards the north, and about the beginning of June it passed at the same distance from the zenith, as it had done in December, when it was first observed. From that time it continued to move northwards 'till September following, when it again became stationary, being then near  $20''$  more northerly than in June, and no less than  $39''$  more northerly than it was in March. From September it returned towards the south, 'till it arrived in December at the same situation it was in at that time twelve months, allowing for the difference of declination on account of the precession of the equinox. By the like observations made on a small star almost opposite in right ascension to  $\gamma$  draconis, and at about the same distance from the north pole of the equator, it appeared to change it's declination  $19''$ , that is about half as much as  $\gamma$  draconis did in the same time: Which plainly proved, as Mr Bradley observes, that these apparent changes were not owing to a nutation of the earth's axis, since the changes on this account would have been nearly equal in these stars, as lying near the solstitial colure. Upon comparing the observations with each other, it was discovered in both these stars, that the apparent difference of declination, reckoned from the limits abovementioned, was always nearly proportionable to the versed sine of the sun's distance from the equinoctial points: and that the whole difference of declination in these stars, was as the sine of the latitude of each respectively. After a year's observation upon many other stars in different parts of the heavens, made with a new instrument set up at Wanstead in 1727, Mr Bradley found out some other properties of their apparent motions, and after able author, out of his great regard for the improvement of Astronomy, by perfecting the methods of making telescopes both by refraction and reflection, did not only collect and consider what had been written and practised by others, but also made several new experiments of his own contriving, after he had procured a most compleat apparatus of instruments for that purpose. But in the midst of these thoughts, being appointed a Lord Commissioner of the Admiralty, he became so engaged in publick affairs, that he had not leisure to pursue these enquiries any further, and gave his papers to Dr Robert Smith, Professor of Astronomy at Cambridge, whom he invited to make use of his house and apparatus of instruments, in order to finish what he had left imperfect. But as he died soon after, the doctor lost that opportunity; whereupon, supplying what was unfinished by our honourable author from Mr Huygens and others, he published the whole in his Compleat Treatise of Optics (m). Mr Molyneux married the Lady Elizabeth, sister to the Earl of Essex, but had no issue by her (n).

examining and rejecting two or three hypotheses, by which he attempted to solve them, at last he conjectured, that all these phenomena proceeded from the progressive motion of light, and the earth's annual motion in her orbit. For he perceived, that if light was propagated not instantly but in time, the apparent place of a fixt object would not be the same when the eye is at rest, as when it is moving in any other direction than that of a line passing through the eye and object; and that when the eye is moving in different directions, the apparent place of the object would be different. Mr Bradley having applied his observations to the parallax in declination of stars in any situation whatever, to his theory further pursued, assures us, they all conspire to prove that the greatest parallax is about 40 or 41 seconds, and thinks the medium  $40\frac{1}{2}$  cannot differ so much as one second from the truth. Hence the velocity of star-light comes out 10210 times greater than the velocity of the earth's motion round the sun. From what has been said Mr Bradley infers: 1. That the lights of all those stars arrive at the earth with equal velocities. 2. That unless their distances from us are all equal (which for other reasons besides that of their different lustre, is highly improbable) their lights are propagated uniformly to all distances from them. 3. That the velocity of star-light is such as carries it through a space equal to the sun's distance from us in  $8\frac{1}{3}$  minutes, this time being to the time in which the earth might describe that distance with the velocity of her mean motion round the sun as 1 to 10210, and this latter time to half a year, as the diameter of a circle to it's circumference. 4. That the time so determined can scarce differ 5 or 10 seconds from the truth, which is such a degree of exactness, as can never be expected from the eclipses of Jupiter's satellites. 5. That as this determination of the velocity of star-light comes out a medium, among several determinations, of the velocity of the sun's light reflected from those satellites; we may reasonably conclude, that the velocities of these lights are equal. And lastly, since it is highly probable that the velocity of the sun's emitted light is also equal to that of star-light; it is equally probable, that it's velocity is not altered by reflection into the same medium. Upon this theory farther pursued, Mr Bradley proceeds synthetically, by assuming the maximum of apparent parallax as determined above, and calculating tables of the differences in declination of  $\gamma$  draconis situated near the solstitial colure, and of  $\gamma$  ursa majoris nearer to the equinoctial than the solstitial colure; and by comparing the tables with his observations, he found they agreed together throughout the year, sometimes in the very same number of seconds, and that in 50 or 60 observations of each star, they never differed so much as two seconds, allowing for the variation of declination caused by the regression of the equinoctial points: Which amounts to a physical demonstration of the truth of this theory, and does in consequence afford a very satisfactory answer to the point in question, concerning the real parallax and distance of the fixt stars. As to which he believes he may venture to say, that the real parallax in either of the stars abovementioned does not amount to  $2''$ , being of opinion that if it were  $1''$ , he should have perceived it in the great number of observations that he made, especially upon  $\gamma$  draconis; which agreeing with the theory, without allowing any thing for a real parallax nearly, as well when the sun was in conjunction with, as in opposition to, this star; it seemed to him very probable, that it's real parallax is not so great as one single second; and consequently that it is above 40000 times further from us than the sun. Thence it follows, that the light by which we now see any fixt star, must have been emitted from it above six years before, so that our seeing the fixt stars in any night whatsoever, is so far from being a proof of their real existence that night, that notwithstanding our sight of them, they may have been extinguished and destroyed above six years ago. A consequence so startling to the comprehension of ordinary readers, who are not qualified to enter into the demonstration, that they are apt to call the truth of it in question upon this very account. And as the certainty of that depends principally upon the great accuracy of the instrument made use of in the observations, Dr Smith has given a draught and description of it from a memorandum of Mr Molyneux (4).

MONK [GEORGE], Duke of Albemarle, the renowned restorer of King Charles the Second to his crown and kingdoms, was descended of a family, settled so early as the reign of Henry the Third [A], at Potheridge in Devonshire, where he was born on the sixth of December 1608. He was likewise chiefly educated there by his grandfather and godfather Sir George Smith, with whom he mostly resided. He dedicated himself to arms from his youth, no provision being expected from his father Sir Thomas Monk; whose reduced fortune, however, brought an affront upon him, which was resentful by our young warrior in such a spirited manner [B], as obliged him to enter into the service sooner than

[A] Descended of an ancient family.] When our General was really possessed of the supreme power of the nation in 1659, several of his flatterers solicited him to assume the crown (1); and in order to satisfy the people in such a case, there came out a pamphlet asserting his claim thereto (2): wherein it was observed, that Sir Thomas Monk of Potheridge married Frances, one of the daughters and co heirs of Arthur Plantagenet, which Sir Thomas, was also grandson to Humphry Monk of Potheridge, by his wife Mary, daughter and co-heir of Richard Champernoou of Cornwall, who

[B] Was resentful by our young warrior in such a spirited manner.] Sir Thomas was in danger of being taken in execution, at the time that King Charles the First made a progress into the west, and came to Plymouth to review the forces intended for the Spanish expedition; and being willing to make an appearance suitable to his rank, on that publick occasion, he sent his son George, to make a present to the Under-Sheriff of the county, and intreat him not to execute his warrant against him at that particular time: the Under-Sheriff accepted the gratuity, and promised forbearance; notwithstanding which, he afterwards publicly arrested was intended, which rendered it necessary for him, when not quite seventeen years of age, to enter as a volunteer under his kinsman Sir Richard Greenville, then lying at Plymouth, and just upon setting out under Lord Wimbleton, on the ill concerted and worse executed expedition against Spain (d). The ill success which attended our young volunteer's first essay, neither damped his courage nor changed his martial inclination; for the very next year he obtained a pair of colours under Sir John Burroughs, in the expedition to the isle of Rheé and Rochell; wherein Mr Skinner observes (e), It is not easy to say which were greater, the misfortunes of the English or their courage. From hence he returned at the end of that war in 1628, and the following year, being then just of age, he served as Ensign in the Low Countries, first under Lord Oxford, and then under Lord Goring, by whom he was promoted to the rank of Captain of his own company (f). In this station he was concerned in several sieges and battles; and having, in ten years service, by a steady and close application to the duties of his profession, made himself an absolute master of the art military, and become extremely useful to the service, he retired on a disgust given him by the Prince of Orange [C], and returned to his native country, just on the breaking out of the first war between King Charles the First and his Scottish subjects (g). The Captain's reputation, backed by the powerful recommendations of the Earl of Leicester and Lady Carlisle (b), procured him the rank of Lieutenant-Colonel in the regiment belonging to Lord Newport; in which post he served in both the King's northern expeditions: wherein what little was performed the Lieutenant-Colonel had an ample share in; and, perhaps, it was none of that prince's least misfortunes, that our hero had so small a portion of power and influence at that critical conjuncture [C 2.]. The treaty commenced at Rippon, and the summoning a Parliament, had scarce put an end to the Scotch war, when the horrid Irish rebellion broke out; to quell which, Lord Leicester was appointed to succeed the late Earl of Strafford, who went with Colonel Monk there (that Lord having raised him to that post in his own regiment), where he did such considerable service, that the Lords-Justices appointed him Governor of Dublin (i); but the Parliament intervening, that authority was vested in another: and soon after, the Colonel returned to England with his regiment, along with the rest of the forces sent by the Marquis of Ormond, on his signing a truce with the Irish rebels, pursuant to the King's orders; which was done on the 15th of September, 1643. But on the Colonel's arrival at Bristol, he was met by orders sent both from Ireland and Oxford, directing Lord Hawley, Governor of Bristol, to secure him 'till further orders (k) [D]. However, his Lordship (on being informed of the unjust suspicions entertained of the Colonel, purely for being an officer under the Earl of Leicester, who was nominated by the Parliament to command the forces raised, and paid by them for the Irish service; and from a fear that he might not willingly enter into a war against those whose pay he received; and being satisfied he had no sort of inclination to side with them), suffered him to proceed to Oxford on his bare parole; where he so fully justified himself to Lord Digby, the then Secretary of State, that he was by that nobleman arrested Sir Thomas in the face of the county. Our young gentleman was so irritated at this scandalous treatment of his father, that he went to Exeter, and first upbraided, and then caned, the Under Sheriff very severely for his double dealing. The Attorney immediately applied for legal redress, and to avoid the suit, young Mr Monk was obliged to shelter himself in the King's service (4). Whether on his so absconding his adversary dropped a fruitless prosecution, or whether it was afterwards compounded, is unknown. [C] He retired on a disgust given him by the Prince of Orange. Captain Monk having winter quarters assigned him at Dort, some of his soldiers were guilty of disorders; for which, when he would have punished them by martial law (he always maintaining a very strict discipline amongst his men) the civil magistrates interfered, and would take cognizance of the affair themselves, insisting that they could not permit any one within their districts, to exercise a distinct authority equal to their own. The Captain claimed his proper jurisdiction, as it was rather a military than a civil affair; but the burghers would not recede from their pretensions, which drew on so warm a contest, that the affair was laid before the Prince of Orange; who, although in a parallel instance, he determined in favour of the sword, in the case of Sir Richard Cave, yet now suffered himself to be so far influenced by the counsel of the Heer de Wit (5) (father of the de Wits, who made it their constant endeavours to deprive his son of every honour his high birth entitled him to) that he pronounced sentence in the behalf of the Burghers, who thereupon, obliged Captain Monk to quit Dort, and take up with much worse quarters (6). This public affront the Captain (who seldom forgot or forgave one, as the Dutch afterwards experienced to their cost) could not put up with, and therefore he threw up his commission, and returned to England (7).

and influence at that critical conjuncture.] Lord Newport being General of the Ordnance, the Scots pressed so hard on his quarters, that the artillery was in great danger of falling into their hands, and was saved chiefly by the courage and conduct of the Lieutenant-Colonel, who disposed his men to such advantage, the Scots durst not venture to attack him in his retreat to Newcastle, where the whole train was seized by the enemy (8). Dr Skinner also relates, that 'When the Earl of Strafford, General of the Army, moved the King, instead of treating further with such insolent rebels, to give him leave to charge them; Lieutenant-Colonel Monk was one of those few that earnestly urged a battle, and gave very good reasons for the security of the event; and was many times afterwards heard to discourse it with a particular indignation, that so brave a force of horse and foot, able to have reduced a better army than the Covenanters could have raised, and another kind of kingdom than Scotland, should be so basely betrayed and baffled by those, who had influence upon or betrayed the counsels of the late King (9).'

[D] Directing Lord Hawley - - - to secure him 'till further orders.] Ludlow, in his Memoirs (10), tells us the Colonel made some scruple to quit the Irish service, and engage in that against the Parliament in England; and was for that reason secured on board a ship, while those forces were embarking, lest he should have obstructed their going over. This seems to have some foundation, since Dr Skinner takes notice (11), that the Marquis sent orders, as well as Lord Digby, to Lord Hawley, to secure the Colonel as soon as he should arrive at Bristol; and there is no doubt but that it was these ill impressions which prevailed on the King to take away his commission so suddenly. Mr Campbell says, Major Warren was not easily prevailed upon to accept the regiment (12).

man introduced to his Majesty: but his regiment was given to Colonel Warren, who had been his Major. In order to make him amends for this precipitancy, the King raised him to the rank of Major-General in the Irish brigade, then commanded by Lord Byron, and employed in the siege of Nantwich in Cheshire; to which post Major-General Monk speedily repaired, but arrived only time enough to share in the unfortunate surprisal of that whole brigade by Sir Thomas Fairfax, who brought a considerable body of the Parliament's forces to the relief of that place; from whence he sent to Hull, amongst the other prisoners, the Major-General, who was in a short time conveyed from thence to the Tower of London, where he remained in close confinement 'till the 13th of November, 1646; when, at the sollicitation of his kinsman Lord Lisle (eldest son to the Earl of Leicester), who, on the Marquis of Ormond's declaring for the King, was made Deputy of that kingdom by the Parliament, he took the Covenant, engaged with the Parliament, and agreed to accept a command under them in the Irish service, as the only means to be enlarged from his tedious confinement (l) [E]. Lord Leicester and the Colonel set out on their journey to Ireland the 28th of January after; but as the Marquis of Ormond refused obedience to the orders of the Parliament, nor would deliver up the city of Dublin to their Deputy without the King's command; Lord Lisle and his forces were obliged to steer for Cork, near which they landed; but not being able to do any great matters, and his Lordship's commission expiring, on the 17th of April he embarked again for England, together with Colonel Monk (m): who was not long in a state of inactivity, having the command in chief of all the Parliament's forces in the north of Ireland conferred upon him, together with the regiment late Colonel Broket's (n); whereupon he returned for the third time to Ireland, and landed at Belfast (o). The Scots under the command of Major General Monroe refusing to join the English in the service of the Parliament, Colonel Monk was prevented from entering into action so soon as he chose; but being joined by Colonel Michael Jones, he made large amends [F], and disputed the possession of Ulster very warmly with Owen Roe O'Neal, obliging him to raise the siege of Londonderry; and by securing the corn and forage, and laying waste the country, almost famished his army (q): he likewise managed so well the tilling and improving those parts in his possession, and was so provident in disposing the booties from time to time brought in by his parties, that he made the Irish war nearly maintain itself, 'The Parliament at Westminster, says Mr Skinner (r), having too many irons in the fire, to take any care of ' money or provision for an army in the north of Ireland.' Yet, notwithstanding these small

[E] As the only means to be enlarged from his tedious confinement.] The Major General's father dying just before he was confined (13), and leaving him (as his second son) only a small annuity, which was now but very ill paid, he was reduced to great hardships in prison; and would have suffered still more, had not the King sent him an hundred pounds (a great sum for his Majesty then much distressed) from Oxford; and his brother furnished him with the like sum at two different payments, as we find by the following letter sent by him to his elder brother, Thomas Monk, Esq; ' I wrote unto you by Captain Bley, in which letter I did desire you to send me some money. I have received fifty pounds by your order long since, for which I return you many thanks. My necessities are such, that they inforce me to intreat you to furnish me with fifty pounds more, as soon as possible you may, and you shall very much oblige me in it. I shall intreat you to be mindful of me, concerning my exchange, for, I doubt, all my friends have forgotten me. I earnestly intreat you therefore, if it lies in your power, to remember me concerning my liberty; and so, in haste, I rest,

Notwithstanding the neglect and pressures mentioned in this letter, he would never listen to any terms made him by the Parliamentarians, whilst the King had any army on foot, though he wanted not many and good offers for his enlargement, upon acceptance of a commission to serve them (15); but now, the King being in the hands of his enemies, and Lord Lisle, from whom he had received many favours whilst in prison, offering him a Colonel's commission, he readily embraced it, as he had been engaged against the Irish rebels before, to oppose whom to the utmost, he thought was entirely consistent with the duty he owed, and had hitherto inviolably maintained, to the King: in which sentiment he went to take his leave of his fellow-prisoners, and particularly of Dr Matthew Wren,

Bishop of Ely, whose blessing he requested, telling him, He was now going to do the King the best service he could against the rebels in Ireland, and hoped he should one day do him further service in England (16). The writer of his life in that collection called Lives English and Foreign, gives another turn to this incident, suggesting that he was guilty of ingratitude to the King; for having mentioned the hundred pounds which he received from the royal bounty, ' Yet, (says he) not long after, when my Lord Lisle succeeded his father, the Earl of Leicester, in the government of Ireland, the Colonel hearkened to the offers that were made him by the new Deputy, who held his power of the Parliament. He proposed to Monk his enlargement and a regiment, if he would qualify himself, and November 13th, 1646, the Colonel made his application to the House of Lords, informing them, that he had taken the solemn League and Covenant, and was ready to take the negative oath. On which compliance the Lords recommended him to the Commons to grant him a commission, in consideration of his valour and his skill in military affairs. The Commons, believing they might trust him after he had given such convincing proofs of his good disposition towards them, agreed to the desire of the Lords.' This resolution was carried with only the single negative of Mr William Cawley (17). It were no difficult matter to justify Colonel Monk from this charge of ingratitude, for accepting the command now offered him; but perhaps it is not easy to vindicate his behaviour from 1648 to 1659.

[F] He made large amends.] He first carried Bella-hor Castle by storm, and then took Nabor; and then, with the assistance of Colonel Jones, drove the Irish from Port-Lester and Afoy, and carried off a great booty. He likewise defeated and took Major-General Monroe, whom he sent to England by order of the Parliament, who gave Captain Brough 200 l. for that service, and voted 500 l. to Colonel Monk, constituting him Governour of Carrickfergus and Belfast, for the same, and for the victory he had obtained the 24th of May 1648, over Macartey, killing eight hundred of his men, and taking as many prisoners, with all their arms and baggage (18).

small successes, the superiority of the Marquis of Ormond and Lord Inchequin, at the head of the Royalists, and the unconquerable distrust of the Scots, to whom most of his garrison of Dundalk revolted on their approach to that place, reduced him to the necessity of entering into a treaty with that bold Irish leader; who deceiving him, he was obliged to surrender Dundalk to Lord Inchequin, and return to England, where he was called to an account by the Parliament, for having treated with the Irish rebels: an affront he never forgave (s) [G]. He was perhaps the more offended with this treatment, as he was not employed in the reduction of Ireland under Oliver Cromwell, who, all accounts agree, received considerable advantage from this very treaty made between O'Neal and the Colonel (t). During this inactivity, his elder brother dying without issue male, the family estate by entail devolved upon him, and he repaired it from the ruinous condition in which his father and brother had left it (u). He had scarce settled his private affairs, when he was called to serve against the Scots (who had proclaimed King Charles the Second in that kingdom) under Oliver Cromwell, by whom he was made Lieutenant-General of the Artillery, and had a regiment given him, composed of six companies taken out of Fenwick's, and six out of Sir Arthur Hasterig's (w). In this post he was extremely serviceable to Cromwell, particularly at the famous battle of Dunbar; where personally charging and routing Lower's regiment, he led the way to that compleat victory there obtained by the English forces (x) [H]. After this victory, the Lieutenant-General was employed in dispersing a body of irregulars, known by the name of Mofs-troopers; and reducing Darlington, Roswell, Brothwick, and Tantallon, castles, where they used to harbour (y). He was also concerned in settling the articles for the surrender of Edinburgh-castle (z); and being left Commander in Chief in Scotland, at the head of six thousand men, by Cromwell, when he returned to England in pursuit of King Charles the Second, he besieged and took Sterling, and carried Dundee by storm; where he behaved with great cruelty (aa), putting Lunfaine, the Governor, and 800 men, to the sword. Soon after this, St Andrews and Aberdeen having also submitted to him (bb), he was seized with a violent fit of illness, which obliged him in 1652 to have recourse to the Bath for his recovery (cc): returning from whence, he set out again for Scotland, as one of the commissioners for uniting that kingdom with the new-erected English Commonwealth; which having

[G] An affront he never forgave.] There are very different accounts of this transaction; Monk, says one writer (19), landed at Chester the 24th of July, and went to London the 31st. He was summoned to appear before the House, who, after hearing him at the bar, passed this vote the 10th of August 1649. That they did disapprove of what Major-General Monk had done, in concluding a peace with the grand and bloody Irish rebel Owen Roe O'Neal, and did abhor the having any thing to do with him therein. Yet are easily persuaded, that the making the same by the said Major-General, was in his judgment for the most advantage of the English interest in that nation. And that he shall not be further questioned for the same in time to come. This vote highly offended the Major-General, though not so much as some passages in the House, reflecting on his honour and fidelity. It was the opinion of several of the members, either not to have questioned him at all, or not to have employed him afterwards; and some have thought he never forgot the printing and publishing his treaty with O'Neal, and his defence of it. Monk's friends endeavoured to clear his reputation; his reasons for agreeing with O'Neal were also printed, yet nothing could wipe off the stain of his treating with the bloody Irish rebels, 'till it was forgot in his future fortune. Ludlow, though a Member of that Parliament, takes no notice of the proceeding against the Colonel, or of the vote which the last writer mentions: but seems to think he was not guilty of any thing wrong, or at least, that they had no proof, for he says he met with a cold reception from the Parliament, upon suggestion that he had corresponded with the Irish rebels (20). That Dr Skinner passed this over slightly, is not to be wondered at; it contradicted his plan, which was to prove the Colonel always retained his loyalty: and his refusing to join the Lords Ormond, and Inchequin, and Monroe, who all repented the Parliament's putting the King to death, the two former openly declaring for Charles the Second, was too gross a defection to be palliated, therefore the doctor wisely hurried it over. Mr Campbell, the last writer who mentions this transaction, relates it in the following terms: 'In the spring of the year 1649, Colonel Monk found himself in so weak a condition by the desertion brought on his army through the detestation the soldiers had of the King's murder, that he was constrained to enter into a treaty with this Owen Roe O'Neal; which certainly saved the few troops he had under his command, and thereby preserved the Parliament's interest in that country. However, it gave such offence, that on his return, he was subjected to a strict enquiry by the House of Commons, who after a very full hearing of the matter, came to a resolution against the treaty, but in justification of Monk's intentions therein, which tho' but a partial censure, some think the General never forgot (21).' This gentleman differs widely in his account from the other three, making the treaty with O'Neal to be the effect of that revolt or desertion, which all the others say it was the cause of: it is true he owns this to be one of the darkest parts of his history (22), and supposes, on the authority of Ludlow, (who, by the way, gives no foundation for such a supposition) that Monk did nothing but under direction in that treaty. Ludlow indeed says (23), that much about the time of the Colonel's return from Dundalk, there was a private application made to the Council of State, by an agent of O'Neal's in order to obtain terms from the Parliament, but that his proposals were too extravagant, and that therefore he was not regarded. How the delivering Dundalk to the Lord Inchequin, then in arms for the King, contributed to securing the Parliament's interest in Ireland, or how the revolting of the Colonel's forces to the Scots, saved the few troops under his command, are difficulties that must, with the rest, be submitted to the reader's determination.

[H] He led the way to that compleat victory.] Mr Campbell mentioning Cromwell's distressful situation before the battle, tells us, that he called a Council of War, in which opinions were divided, 'till General Monk delivered his in these words: 'Sir, the Scots have numbers and the hills, those are their advantages; we have discipline and despair, two things that will make soldiers fight; and these are ours. My advice therefore is, to attack them immediately; which, if you follow, I am ready to command the van.' This author adds, His proposal being accepted, he began the attack, and, as Ludlow acknowledges, was the instrument of that victory which gained Cromwell so great reputation *. The acknowledgement, indeed, is made by many other writers (24), but not by Ludlow; and though he mentions the Council of War and the result of it (25), yet he takes no notice of Monk's opinion in particular.

having brought to a successful conclusion, he returned with the others again to London (dd). The Dutch war having now been carried on for some months, Lieutenant-General Monk, on the death of Colonel Popham (ee), was joined with the Admirals Blake and Dean in the command at sea; in which service he had made his first military essay, as has been before related, and on the second of June, 1653, he, by his courage and conduct, contributed greatly to the defeat then given to the Dutch fleet (ff) [I], and likewise to the next obtained on the 31st of July following [K]. While General Monk and the other Admirals were thus triumphing over the nation's enemies, and increasing the honour of the Commonwealth abroad, Cromwell was paving his way to the supremacy at home, which, on the 16th of December 1653, he obtained under the title of Protector. In this capacity he soon concluded a peace with the Dutch, who obtained much more favourable terms from him, than what the Council of State and Parliament had appeared willing to grant. General Monk, who lay with his fleet on the Dutch coast, remonstrated so warmly against this peace, and those remonstrances were so well received by Oliver's own (called the Little or Barebones) Parliament; and Monk, on his return, was treated so kindly by them, that Oliver is said to grow jealous of him to that degree, that he closted him, to find whether he was inclined to any other interest; but receiving satisfaction from the General on this head, he not only took him into favour, but on the breaking out of fresh troubles in the north of Scotland, where the Marquis of Athol, the Earl of Glencairne, Major-General Middleton, and several more of the nobility and others, had raised forces on the behalf of King Charles the Second, sent him down there Commander in Chief, for which post he set out in April 1654 (kk). Arriving at Leith, he sent Colonel Morgan with a large detachment against the Royalists; and having assisted in proclaiming the Protector at Edinburgh, on the 14th of May, followed himself with the rest of the forces. Thro' the General's prudent management this war was finished by August [L], when he returned from the Highlands, and fixed his abode at Dalkeith, a seat belonging to the Countess of Buccleugh, within four or five miles of Edinburgh, where he constantly resided during the remaining time (which was five years) that he staid in Scotland; amusing himself with the pleasures of a rural life, and beloved by the people, though his government was more absolute than any of their princes had dared to practice (ll). The war in Scotland being put an end to thus speedily and happily for the Protector, he appointed a Council of State for that part of his government, consisting of the Lord Broghill; General Monk; Colonel Howard, created Earl of Carlisle after the Restoration; Colonel William Lockhart; Colonel

[I] The defeat then given to the Dutch fleet. In May 1653, Monk and Dean (who were both on board the Resolution) sailed with the English fleet, consisting of ninety-five ships of war and five fire-ships, towards the coasts of Holland; while Van Tromp, with ninety-eight men of war and six fire-ships, came before Dover, which he canonaded all the 28th of that month; but receiving advice that Monk and Dean were approaching, he went to meet them, and prepared for battle. The fight began about eleven in the morning; and Admiral Dean was killed the first broadside, by General Monk's side; who, throwing his cloak over the body, gave orders for continuing the fight, which was maintained with great obstinacy all that day, the enemy (as no flag was struck) not knowing we had lost one of our Admirals (26). General Monk pursued the enemy all that night, and re-engaged them the next day, when he was joined by Admiral Blake, who commanded a squadron of eighteen ships, which seasonable assistance put an end to the dispute, after a very fierce engagement which lasted about four hours, when Tromp fairly fled. The Dutch had six ships sunk, two blown up, and eleven taken, with about thirteen hundred men. The English lost no ship, had about one hundred and fifty private men killed, and twenty wounded, and Dean and one Captain-killed (27). The Dutch were commanded by Van Tromp, De Ruyter, the two Evertzens, and De Witt; and the English by Monk and Dean in the beginning, by Monk alone the latter part of the first day, and by him and Blake the second.

[K] The next defeat on the 31st of July. Ludlow observes, that in this Dutch war, of which this second defeat was the finishing stroke, we took, sunk, and destroyed, between fourteen and fifteen hundred of their ships (29); and General Monk tells Cromwell in a letter dated August 2d, 1693; that out of five Dutch flags which were flying at the beginning, he himself had fortunately fetched down three during the action, which was more obstinate and bloody, from his having ordered his ships to give no quarter (which he did to prevent weakening his fleet by sending ships out of it to take care of the prizes which might be taken) notwithstanding which severe orders, near twelve hundred

Dutchmen were taken out of the sea by our ships (30). We are also informed by the authors cited in the margin, that Oliver Cromwell induced his Parliament to send gold chains to the four English Admirals, and upon General Monk's attending on the day of thanksgiving for this victory, the Protector, at a publick city entertainment, put the chain himself about the General's neck, and obliged him to wear it during the feast.

[L] This war was finished in August. Major-General Middleton's brother, and five or six more of the King's officers being taken at Musselburgh, Monk hanged two of them for spies, and burned the inn where they were found, for harbouring them (31). In the beginning of June, he surprized a party of the Royalists, and took four and twenty horses near Douglas's cattle, and on approaching the mountains, summoned and reduced the garrison of Lough Tay: in July he took Fofs and Loch-Gary, and built a fort at Lochaber; on the 20th of July Colonel Morgan routed Middleton's horse near Loch-gary, taking three hundred prisoners, and wounding their leader, whom the General pursued closely for some time, 'till his forces were diminished to not more than a hundred; then leaving them to Colonel Morgan, he went and wasted the Lord Glencairn's, and Glencameron's lands (32): he also published a proclamation, setting a price on the heads of Major-General Middleton, the Earls of Athol and Seaforth, the Lord Viscount Kenmure, and Major-General Dalziel, for killing each of whom, or bringing them prisoners to any English garrison, he offered two hundred pounds reward (33); nor would he suffer any of the nobility or gentry to wear swords, or to keep or use any horses of value, nor to exercise any jurisdiction over their inferiors or servants (34). He also harrassed the Presbyterians, taking from them the power of excommunication and forbidding them to hold their general assemblies (35). Dr Skinner mentions these transactions with applause, but wisely skips over all his acts against the royal interest during his government of Scotland, as well knowing they did not exactly agree with those sentiments of loyalty, he would fain persuade the world, the General always preserved.

Colonel Adrian Scroop; Colonel John Whetham; and Major-General Desborough (mm); who came to Scotland in September 1655, and began to exercise their authority, which was very extensive [M]. The majority of these commissioners (three of whom, Lord Broghill, Colonel Howard, and Colonel Whetham, were afterwards very instrumental in the Restoration) concurred with General Monk in almost every thing he proposed, by which means the government of Scotland still remained chiefly in his hands; which, together with his affable behaviour towards the better sort of all parties, made Cromwell begin to entertain some suspicions of him: and, in order to prevent his influence from growing too powerful, the Protector used to make frequent changes in the forces under his command; by recalling such regiments as were most trusted by the General, and sending in their rooms those who were most violent and refractory at home; who gave him much trouble to bring them into order, and make them submit to that discipline which he obliged all under him strictly to observe. Nor was this distrust entirely without some appearance of foundation; it is certain the King entertained good hopes of him, and to that purpose wrote to him from Colen on the 12th of August 1655. However, the General made no scruple of discovering every step taken by the Cavaliers which came to his knowledge; even to the sending the Protector this letter [N], and joined in promoting addresses to him from the army in Scotland, one of which was most graciously received by the Protector the 19th of March 1657, and the same year he received a summons to Oliver's House of Lords (nn). About this time George, second son of General Monk, died in his infancy, which was a great affliction to his father, who was doatingly fond of him [O]. From this period to the death of Oliver, the General maintained Scotland in absolute subjection, and lived free from all disturbance, not intermeddling further with the mad politicks of those times; than to put what orders he received from England punctually into execution; in pursuance of which plan he proclaimed Richard Cromwell Protector there after his father's death, Richard having dispatched Dr (afterwards Sir) Thomas Clarges, then Commissioner of the Scotch and Irish forces, whose sister the General had some time before owned for his wife, with letters to him; to which he returned a suitable and respectful answer, aiming only at securing his own command (oo); at the same time joining with the rest of the officers and army under his command, in an address to the new Protector, whose power he might easily foresee would have but a short date, it having been his opinion that Oliver, had he lived much longer, would scarce have been able to preserve himself in his station (pp). And indeed Cromwell began to be apprehensive of that great alteration which happened in the government, and fearful that the General was deeply engaged in those measures which procured it; if we may judge from a letter wrote by him to General Monk but a little while before his death, to which was added the following remarkable postscript: 'There be that tell me, that there is a certain cunning fellow in Scotland called George Monk, who is said to lie in wait there to introduce Charles Stuart; I pray you use your diligence to apprehend him and send him up to me (qq).' However, as Clarges had informed him by Richard's order, that his

[M] To exercise their authority, which was very extensive. 'They were (says Dr Skinner) enabled to order and dispose of the revenues in Scotland, to appoint the Officers of the Exchequer, the Commissioners of Excise and Customs, and of the Sequestrations, and all subordinate officers under them. They had also the nomination of all Justices of the Peace, of Sheriffs and Commissaries in the several counties; which Commissaries kept their courts for probate of wills and granting admittations in their respective limits. And by an additional power from Cromwell, they were afterwards authorized to approve and allow of all incumbents that were to be admitted into any ecclesiastical benefice (36). Before the issuing of this commission by the Protector, Overton, a Fifth-Monarchy-man, and Major-General of all the forces in Scotland, with others of his principles and party, had been engaged deeply in designs against Oliver and General Monk, who they intended to have assassinated by the hands of Miles Syndercombe, whom General Monk had disbanded out of Overton's corps, and who was afterwards engaged, and convicted, for a like design against Cromwell (37). But the General having information of their schemes, watched them so narrowly, that he seized and secured all the principals, particularly, Overton, Bramstone, and Holmes; and sent the first prisoner to London, where he was, by the Protector's order, confined in the Tower, and his regiment given to Major-General Morgan (38).

[O] A great affliction to his father, who was doatingly fond of him. We know very little concerning the mother of this child; Ludlow says she was originally an Exchange woman (40); Mr Archdeacon Echard (41) tells us she had another husband living, though unknown to the world; and all agree that she cohabited with the General for some time, before he publicly acknowledged her to be his wife: which was not done till about the last time of his returning from Ireland in 1649, when his elder brother died (42), though he is said to have married her in 1648 (43). Some writers stile her a low mean woman (44); others, that she was of mean circumstances and quality (45); but as they all agree her brother was a Physician, a profession that implies a birth and fortune entitled to a liberal education, perhaps they have carried their spleen too far, or implicitly followed those whose interest it was to blemish the reputation of General Monk, and all who belonged to him.

his late father had expressly charged him to do nothing without his advice (which, as Mr Campbell very justly observes (rr) is not at all likely to be true); the General recommended to him to encourage a learned, pious, and moderate Ministry in the Church, to permit no Councils of Officers, a liberty they had too often abused, to call a Parliament, and to endeavour to be master of the army (ss). It is well known a Parliament was called by Richard Cromwell, and also, that by the divisions arising in the Upper House thereof, which spread their influence over the army, he was soon obliged to dissolve it [P]. The General receiving advice of these transactions, and of the deposition of Richard, readily abandoned him he had so lately proclaimed, and his brother-in-law being again sent to him from the Rump-Parliament on their restoration, he acquiesced in all they had done (as the surest way to preserve his own command), only recommending Richard to their favour (tt), and with his officers signed the engagement against Charles Stuart, or any other single person being admitted to the government. But when their Committee, consisting of ten persons (uu), began, on the information of Peirson and Mason, two republican Colonels in his army, to make considerable alterations therein, by cashiering of those officers in whom he most confided, of which his brother-in-law, Clarges, gave him information: he wrote a letter to the House, complaining of this treatment in so warm a style, at the same time engaging for the fidelity of his officers, that they ordered their Committee not to proceed further therein 'till the General himself was consulted (ww). The Royalists were far from idle in this conjuncture; there had been a kind of secret Committee of that party, for managing affairs in behalf of the Crown, ever since the death of Charles the First (xx), among whom was Sir John Greenville, our General's kinsman, who had lately given a very good living in Cornwall to Mr Nicholas Monk, his brother; and Sir John receiving at this time two letters from King Charles the Second, then at Brussels, one directed to himself, and the other to the General, together with a private commission to treat with the latter; the success of that overture ended, as is well known, in the restoration of the King, and the particular steps taken to compleat it have been already related in the course of this work †. On the eighth of May the General assisted at the proclamation of King Charles the Second, and having received advice by Sir Thomas Clarges, that his Majesty intended to land at Dover, on the 23d the General set out for that place (being the same day the King embarked from Holland) and lying at Rochester that night, arrived the next day at Dover, where the King landed the 25th*. The interview between the King and the General, was conformable to every one's expectation, full of duty on one side, and favour and esteem on the other (yy); the King permitting the General to ride in his coach two miles out of the town, when his Majesty took horse, and with General Monk on his left hand, and his two brothers on his right, proceeded to Canterbury, where he conferred the Order of the Garter on General Monk, the Dukes of York and Gloucester investing him with the honourable badges of that dignity (zz). From Canterbury the King removed to Rochester, where he lay on Monday the 28th, and the next morning, being his birth-day, set out for Black-heath to review the army which the General had caused to be drawn up there, and from thence proceeded to his capital, into which he made his publick entry with much magnificence (aaa). General Monk was now sworn one of the Privy-Council, made Master of the Horse, and one of the Gentlemen of the Bed-chamber, and had apartments in the Cock-pit, and was in a little time made First Lord-Commissioner of the Treasury; and in about a month afterwards was created a Peer, being made Baron Monk of Potheridge, Beauchamp, and Tees, Earl of Torrington, and Duke of Albemarle, with a grant of seven thousand pounds a year, estate of inheritance, besides other pensions (bbb); and received a very peculiar acknowledgement of regard on being thus called to the Peerage, almost the whole House of Commons attending him to the very door of the House of Lords (ccc), whither, Dr Skinner observes, he carried the same temper, moderation,

[P] A Parliament was called by Richard Cromwell - - - - and he was soon obliged to dissolve it.] Ludlow tells us, that the other House were divided into three parties; the Republicans, the Wallingford-housemen, and the Cromwellians: the two first soon united together; and the latter, by endeavouring to steer a middle course, voting the removal of, and not the securing, those who were refractory in the army; were soon abandoned, and the Parliament dissolved, which in a short time threw the whole power into the hands of the Army, who restored the remains of the Long-Parliament, and after they had deposed Richard, turned them out again, and governed by themselves, 'till the Fleet, several towns in England, and General Monk in Scotland, declaring for the Parliament, they were obliged to re-admit the Rump to the administration of the government (46). It was during the first struggle between the Parliament and Army, a little after the deposition of Richard from the Protectorship, that Sir George Booth's insurrection, and the negotiation with General Monk mentioned in the text, were carrying on; and there is some reason to believe, that had the other confederates been as active as Sir George, the General would have declared himself sooner than he did, for Ludlow says (47), he had not only held a correspondence with Lord Fawconbridge and Colonel Howard, who retired into the North on deposing Richard; but also refused to send two regiments of foot and two of horse, which the Parliament demanded, upon the Cheshire insurrection: 'Under colour of the enemy's strength and inclination to revolt, tho' there were not wanting some who then thought that his engagements with the common enemy were the true reasons of that refusal. And it is certain, that a gentleman from the King had been with him, and tho' what passed between them was not made publick, yet, since he did not seize him, as it was his duty, but permitted him to return safely from whence he came, he may justly be suspected, even then, to have betrayed those whom he pretended to serve (48).' Was this more than presumptive, it would be the strongest evidence of General Monk's early endeavours to restore King Charles the Second. (47) P. 245. (48) Id. p. 265.

ration, silence, and humility, that he had shewn in the House of Commons. And a writer of his life, who does not seem over biased in his favour, after mentioning, that by the income of his grants and places, he was enabled in eight years time to amass a fortune of four hundred thousand pounds in lands and money, adds, ' Yet we must own he was not overpaid for the share he had in this glorious revolution. So great a service, that his Majesty used to call him his Political Father, and he behaved so modestly after it, that the King said of him, The Duke of Albemarle demeaned himself in such a manner to the prince he had obliged, as never to seem to overvalue the services of General Monk (ddd). And we are told, that Sir Edward Nicholas (who, as Dr Skinner observes, had been Secretary of State to two Kings) said, That the industry and service which the Duke of Albemarle had paid to the Crown since the King's restoration, without reflecting upon his service before, deserved all the favour and bounty which his Majesty had been pleased to confer upon him (eee). In October the Duke was made one of the Commissioners for trying the regicides, and acted accordingly under it, but observed great moderation. Soon after his Grace was made Lord-Lieutenant of the counties of Devonshire and Middlesex, and of the borough of Southwark (fff); and the Parliament voting the disbanding of the army, the Duke joined very heartily with Lord Chancellor Hyde in promoting that step, and took great pains by changing of officers, to bring it to be submitted to quietly; in which he succeeded, all but his own regiment of foot, and a new raised regiment of horse for the King's guard being paid off and dismissed (ggg), as some time before had been the Commissioners for Scotland, by a letter from the Duke of Albemarle, signifying to them, that it was the King's pleasure, not to have them intermeddle any more in the government of that kingdom (bbb). In January following, while the King was accompanying his mother and sister on their return to France, the Duke was employed at London in quelling an insurrection made by some Fifth-Monarchy men, under one Venner, a Wing-cooper; who were with some difficulty reduced by the Duke of Albemarle's regiment, after repulsing some detachments of the city militia, and the new raised horse. This gave rise to a proposal for keeping up some standing forces; but the Duke was averse thereto, saying, ' That his endeavouring to continue any part of the army, would be liable to so much mis-interpretation, that he would by no means appear in it (iii):' but being much sollicitated to countenance the scheme, Dr Skinner very honestly owns (kkk), that he tacitly consented not to hinder their endeavours therein, and fairly insinuates, that the keeping his regiment on foot (the first model of a standing army in time of peace in England) was owing to his want of opposition. The 22d of April, 1661, the Duke, as Master of the Horse, attended the King in his procession (leading the horse of state) from the Tower to Whitehal, and the next day carried the sceptre and dove, and was one of the supporters of the canopy during the royal unction at the coronation, after which, he and the Duke of Buckingham did homage for themselves and the rest of their degree (lll). The latter part of this year he was attacked with a dangerous illness, from which he was recovered by the King's Physician, Sir Robert Frazer (mmm); after this, every thing being in full peace, he enjoyed himself for some time in retirement; 'till, on the breaking out of the first Dutch war under King Charles the Second, in 1664, he was, by his Royal Highness the Duke of York, who commanded the fleet, intrusted with the care of the Admiralty, receiving at the same time a very obliging letter from his Royal Highness, as the reader may see below [Q]. The plague broke out in London the same year, and the King removing from thence to Oxford, the Duke of Albemarle's vigilance and activity made his Majesty regard him as the fittest nobleman to entrust with the care of his capital city in that time of imminent danger and distress; which additional burthen he cheerfully underwent, and was greatly assisted therein by the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Earl of Craven (nnn). About Michaelmas the King sent for him to Oxford, whither he went post, and, on his arrival, found his Majesty had appointed Prince Rupert and himself joint Admirals of the Fleet for the ensuing year; which dangerous post, though many of his friends dissuaded him, he readily accepted, and immediately set himself diligently about his new employment, wherein all the care of finishing those new ships which were on the stocks, repairing the old ones, which had been much damaged in an

[Q] Receiving - - - a very obliging letter from his Royal Highness, as the reader may see below.] Some of our historians having endeavoured to depreciate the Duke of Albemarle's character by representing him as one who was very little regarded by the Court after the Restoration, Mr Campbell, in his Memoirs of General Monk (49), produces the letter in question as a strong testimony to the contrary; it was wrote as follows:

' My Lord Duke of Albemarle,
' Having formerly, by the King's approbation, desired you to take the care of giving all necessary orders for the affairs of the navy during my absence, in the same manner as I ought to do if present, I should not now need to repeat it to you, were it not to acquaint you, that I have not only by word of ' mouth, but also by writing, given the principal officers and commanders of his Majesty's navy, directions to execute all your commands. I desire you, if you find any commanders, or other officers, negligent in the dispatch expected from them for his Majesty's service, not to be sparing in using your authority for their punishment: whether by displacing them, or such other ways as you shall think fit. I have commanded my Secretary to leave with you all such things, as may be necessary for your information; if any thing be wanting, upon the least intimation, it shall be supplied, so bidding you heartily farewell, action with the Dutch that summer, rigging, victualling, and manning, the whole fleet, fell chiefly to his lot, and was so effectually and expeditiously pursued by him, the seamen offering in crowds to the service, because they said they were sure honest George (as they commonly called him) would see them well fed and justly paid (000), that on the 23d of April, 1666, the Prince and he took their leaves of the King, and repaired on board the fleet; where the former hoisted his flag, having Sir George Afcough under him, as Admiral of the White, on board the Royal James, and the latter, as Admiral of the Red, on board the Royal Charles (ppp). The particulars of his bravery against the Dutch in this station are properly the subject of general history, to which therefore we refer. He returned home in the beginning of September, and lay with the fleet at anchor in the bay of St Helens, near Spithead. During that interval, broke out the terrible fire in London, which beginning on the 2d of September, 1666, burned with unparalleled fury for three days, and laid the greatest part of the city in ashes; this unexpected accident occasioned the Duke of Albemarle to be recalled from the fleet, to assist in quieting the minds of the people, who expressed their affection and esteem for him, by crying out publicly, as he passed through the ruined streets, that If his Grace had been there, the city had not been burnt (qqq): than which they could scarce give a more extravagant mark, in what high opinion they held his abilities, insignificant as a Right Reverend writer has endeavoured to represent them. The Earl of Southampton dying on the 16th of May, 1667 (rrr), his Majesty, after the peace, put the Treasury in commission, at the head of which was again placed his Grace the Duke of Albemarle (sss). This was the last testimony of the royal favour his Grace received; for being now in the sixtieth year of his age, the many hardships and fatigues he had undergone in a military life began to shake his constitution, hitherto remarkably healthy, he being about this time attacked with a dropfy, the first symptoms of which were too much neglected. In this declining condition he withdrew from publick business, as much as his post and the state of affairs would permit, and retired to his seat at Newhall in the county of Essex, where he was prevailed upon by the importunity of friends to try a pill then in vogue, being a preparation of one Dr Sermon of Bristol, who had formerly served under his Grace as a common soldier (ttt); from which he at first received such considerable relief, that towards the latter end of the year he returned to town. But soon after falling into a relapse, with the addition of an asthma-tick complaint, he set about finishing the last great temporal affair, the marriage of his only son with the Lady Elizabeth, eldest daughter to Henry Earl of Ogle, only son to Charles the then Duke of Newcastle: which being settled, the nuptial ceremony was performed in his own chamber, December 30th, 1669; and on January the third, four days after, he died sitting in his chair without a single groan (uuu). Thus, in the entrance of the 62d year of his life, died this noble and valiant commander (for whatever disputes there have been about his civil capacity, his military skill or his courage were never called in question), beloved by most, admired by many, and envied but by few. In his last year, many differences arising between the persons in power, and especially between the two Houses of Parliament, he endeavoured, almost to his latest minute, to recommend unanimity to the study of those who visited him, which were the greatest men in the nation; particularly the Earl of Bath and the Lord Arlington, as well as several of the members of both Houses; whom he conjured to preserve always a good understanding between the two Houses, and to prevent his Majesty's crown and government from suffering any inconvenience by the passions or prejudice of those who were so nearly obliged to take care of it (www). That he died in the esteem of his sovereign and his brother the Duke of York is very clear, not only from the high posts he enjoyed under, and the great trust reposed in him by, both; but also from the tender concern shewn by them, in a constant enquiry after his state during the latter part of his illness, and by the publick and princely regard paid to his memory after his decease, by honouring his funeral solemnity with all the pomp such sorrowful pageantry is capable of, and admitting his ashes to mingle with those of the ancestors of that King whom he had fixed in their throne. Extraordinary merit, whether real or imputed, must always submit to pay the tax of envy, and frequently, the greater the desert the heavier the imposition of calumny; such the Duke of Albemarle found it while living, such the treatment his name has met with since his decease. His loyalty has been termed self-interest, his valour rashness, his œconomy avarice, and his closeness and taciturnity want of capacity; and, not content with thus depreciating his worth as a man, they have brought some very heavy accusations against him as a Counsellor of State, as the reader may see below, together with a description of his person, and a sketch of his private character [R]: for we shall here close his publick military grandure and affability; his sight was rather short, but his hearing remarkably quick, and both continued good to the last (52). He was ever an early riser, and having dispatched all his domestick affairs by seven in the morning, he applied himself to the publick business of the day, giving audience to all that came; and, if possible, dispatched the requests of the poor instantaneously (53). He constantly discouraged publick one by observing, he had abilities sufficient to carry all his designs into execution, and to defeat the attempts of those who opposed him; and was fortunate enough to have it in his power, and in his only, to do more than ever any subject did, recall his sovereign from a twelve years exile in poverty and distress, to the full and peaceable possession of the dignity, wealth, and potency, of his progenitors. The means and motives which induced him to undertake, or were used by him to perfect, this great incident in his life, have been variously treated by various writers, nor have there been wanting competitors for the sole honour of the action (xxx); but upon a strict examination of the several bare facts it will appear, that if General Monk had not readily and heartily thrown his weight into the scale, Faction would have continued to outweigh Loyalty; and the great change for the worse, which happened soon after his death, is the greatest compliment that can be paid to the memory, counsels, and conduct, of the Duke of Albemarle. His corpse was carried to Somerset-house, where it lay in state (being embalmed) many weeks; and, on the fourth of April, 1670, was carried with great pomp to Westminster-abbey, and interred in Henry the Seventh's chapel, but never had any monument erected to his memory, except the effigie used at his funeral, and still preserved in a wooden case in the abbey, may be reckoned one, though he died possessed of a real estate worth 15000 pounds per annum, besides 60000 pounds personal, which he left to his only son Christopher, a minor, then sixteen years of age (yyy).

[R] A description of his person, and a sketch of his private character. His person was of the middle stature, and every way well proportioned, which, with a remarkable good constitution, rendered him both strong and active, and, by an early temperance, he made himself hardy to such a degree, that he was enabled to march at the head of his regiment every day on horse-back, under the small-pox (50); and by a constant perseverance in the same virtue, he could support fatigue longer than most men, without sleep (51): his countenance is said to carry in it much

duty, for the neglect of which, he admitted no excuse; being very strict in discipline, and a punctual observer of his word, a remarkable instance of both being told of him, at the close of the first Dutch war under Cromwell. The sailors growing very importunate for their prize-money, assembled in great numbers about the Navy-office to demand it: he spoke to them, telling them there were fifteen hundred ships to be disposed of, and as soon as those were sold, they should be paid; upon this they all dispersed: but in the afternoon, they assembled again, to the number of near five thousand, with arms, and came towards Whitehall, near which they were met by Cromwell and other officers, accompanied by General Monk; who reproaching them with distrusting his word, which he had never broke, he drew his sword, and wounding some of the foremost, the rest were so alarmed at his intrepidity, that they instantly retired, and waited patiently for his promise, which was in a short time punctually performed (54). His courage was truly great, he being as cool and sedate in the midst of the hottest service, as at any other period, as his behaviour on the death of Admiral Dean who was killed by his side, sufficiently shews: and when some about him in the action at Chatham, where he exposed himself to the thickest of the enemy's shot, advised him to retire to some safer place; he only answered,

Sir, if I had been afraid of bullets, I should have quitted this trade of a soldier long ago (55). And we are told, by no less authority than that of the Duke of Buckingham, an eye-witness, that in King Charles the First's Dutch war, in the engagement on the first of June, before he began (56), he declared, he was sure of one thing, that he would not be taken; and was seen to charge a pocket pistol with powder, which it is supposed he intended, if he had been boarded and in danger of being overpowered, to have fired into his own powder-room, and thereby have blown up his ship. To crown all, he was an excellent husband, and an indulgent father, in which last character alone he shewed himself liable to the common weaknesses of human nature, on the death of his second son, as has already been taken notice of. The things he was accused of as a Minister, were three: The first is his occasioning the death of the Marquis of Argyle, by betraying a private correspondence; the second was, his proposing the King's match with Catherine of Portugal; and the third, his not only consenting to, but advising, the sale of Dunkirk. All three have been brought against him only by Bishop Burnet (57), which is almost sufficient to overthrow them; but whoever is not of that opinion, may find him fully justified from each, in Mr Campbell's Lives of the Admirals (58).

MONK [CHRISTOPHER], only son of George Duke of Albemarle, was born in 1653 (a), and in 1654 was carried into Scotland (b), where he remained between six and seven years, 'till his father setting out on his march to England, he and his mother were sent by sea to London. At 16 years of age he was married to Lord Ogle's daughter, and by his father's death came into the possession of a prodigious fortune, his father leaving all to him by Will. On the 28th of May, 1671, he was installed Knight of the Garter at Windsor (c), which honour he chiefly owed to his great friend and kinsman John Earl of Bath [A], on whom King Charles designed to bestow the late Duke's vacant Garter; that deceased nobleman having obtained a promise under the King's sign manual, that the Earl should be made Duke of Albemarle, in case of his own son's dying without issue: but the Earl not only generously refused the offered honour, but warmly solicited it for the son of his friend; and was so successful in his sollicitation, that when the young Duke came to deliver up to the King the ensigns of the deceased's order, his Majesty with

[A] Which honour he chiefly owed to his great friend and kinsman John Earl of Bath. This we learn from the argument of the Lord Keeper Somers (1), who, in delivering his opinion preparatory to his decree, in the famous case between the Earls of Bath and Montague, on the 23d of December, 1693, takes notice that it had been alledged, and not controverted in the course of the cause, that there was a very near relation between the Duke and the Earl, and that Duke George owned he owed his first setting out in the world to the ancestors of Lord Bath: and goes on thus, 'It doth plainly appear there was a particular friendship and confidence between them, in matters of the highest nature, and chiefest concern; nay, that this proceeded so far on my Lord of Bath's side in Duke George's

'time, that he prevailed with King Charles the Second 'to promise under the sign manual, and recommended
'it to his successors, to create my Lord of Bath
'Duke of Albemarle, if there were a failure of issue
'by the Duke [Christopher].
'Then that this friendship did continue between 'Duke Christopher and my Lord of Bath, is plain be'yond all controversy; for it began upon a very good 'foundation: that is, whereas the Garter should have 'been given to the Earl of Bath, he prevailed to have
'it returned to the young Duke. - - - And all this pro'ved by a series of letters, continuing down from the 'death of Duke George, to the death of Duke Chri-

- with much kindness returned them to him again, and declared his election as one of the Knights Companions (d). In 1679, he was made Captain of the Life Guard (e), and Chancellor of the university of Cambridge *, on the disgrace of James Duke of Monmouth; against whom, when he made his descent at Lyme in Dorsetshire in June 1685, the Duke of Albemarle raised the militia of Devonshire and Cornwall, and marched with them to Axminster: but Monmouth approaching, the militia and their commander retired (f). In 1687, the Duke of Albemarle encouraged a scheme, proposed by Captain (afterwards Sir William) Phipps, for fishing on a Spanish wreck off of Hispaniola [B], by subscribing a large sum towards the undertaking; which proving successful, he received for his share, on the Captain's return, 90000 pounds (g); and introducing the Captain to King James, procured him the honour of knighthood (b). The same year the Duke was made Governor of Jamaica, which post some think he applied for, in expectation of recovering more treasure by the same means from the former, or from other wrecks on those coasts, which proved but a vain hope (i); while others looked upon it but as a more honourable exile (k), though no reasons are assigned for either of the suggestions. His Grace having addicted himself pretty much to the bottle [C], did not live long to enjoy the honours of his new post, dying at Jamaica in the year 1688; and, on the 8th of July, 1691, the great cause depending between the two Earls of Bath and Montague, touching the enjoyment of the deceased Duke's estate, was first heard before the Lords Commissioners of the Great Seal; though it did not receive determination 'till December 1693, and then only as to one particular point, which was, indeed, a most essential one, and went in favour of the Earl of Bath; to whom the Lord Keeper Somers decreed the bulk of the Duke's estate, he having no issue by his Duchefs [D]. And thus, in little more than half a century, this branch of the family of Monk, after having rose to the highest pitch of British honour, failed in the second generation, and became totally extinct. His Duchefs afterwards married Ralph Lord Montague (l), who joined with her in promoting a suit against the Earl of Bath, Mr Greenville, and Sir Walter Clarges, touching the disposition made by the Duke of his estate (m); but they lost their cause. She had no issue by this nobleman (who left several by his first lady), and having out-lived him many years, died superannuated on the 28th of August, 1734, at Newcastle-house in Clerkenwell (n).

[B] For fishing on a Spanish wreck off of Hispaniola. The Captain had made a proposal of this kind in the latter end of the reign of King Charles the Second, who had been furnished with a ship called the Alger Rose, and all other requisites for the design; but the experiment failed that voyage: however, the Captain on his return continuing still positive, that it might be advantageous, solicited assistance from the Ministers of James the Second (who, before he came back, had succeeded to the throne); but they refusing to listen to him, he then proposed to set on foot a subscription for making it a private adventure, which was to be divided amongst twenty proprietors. This project was for some time treated with much contempt, 'till Christopher Duke of Albemarle, by entering heartily into it, promoted the subscription, and equipped the Captain for a second voyage, which sufficiently answered the ends of his several subscribers, and put 20000 l. in his own pocket (3). It is said King James was advised to seize the treasure, when brought home, on a suggestion that the Captain had concealed the true value, when he applied for a licence from the Crown; but the King refused to comply, saying, He knew the Captain was a man of honour and honesty; and therefore if he had brought home twice as much, his subscribers should share it (4). The silver recovered was valued at 300000 l. according to which each share must have been worth 15000 l. but what the subscription was we know not: however, be what it would, his Grace of Albemarle subscribed at least for six shares, which proves he was a liberal encourager of merit and industry.

[C] His Grace having addicted himself pretty much to the bottle. That this was his predominant (if not his only) vice, is too true: but then it is as true, that uneasiness at home, if not the first inducement to, strongly contributed to confirm him in, so unworthy and destructive a habit. This was proved in the cause above-mentioned, as we are told by the Lord Chief-Justice Treby; who in his argument (5) says, 'But besides this they bring you in proofs that I cannot but mention that the Dutchefs conceived a displeasure, though it be not known for what reason, against the Earls of Bath; that the Duke was uneasy under her importunities to do what he had no mind to, and that was the cause of his drinking so hard to divert himself.' This is a circumstance we should not have touched upon, had not those who have mentioned this nobleman (6) taken notice of his deviating from his father's temperance in this respect; and then it was but justice to shew the cause which led him into the error: we have already taken notice that he was married very young, and he is far from being a single instance, that health and happiness, nay life itself, have been sacrificed to riches and grandeur.

[D] Decreed the bulk of the Duke's estate, he having no issue by his Duchefs. We are informed by the authority mentioned in the last note (7), that he left a natural son; whether born before or after he went to Jamaica, or what became of him, is unknown at present: but it seems to prove, the want of issue to inherit his title and estate was not wholly his fault. The Duchefs, we are told in the same place, was but sickly, and from what is said in the last note, does not appear to have been the best tempered lady in the world: what provocations she might have are not now to be come at, but the Duke's characteristic was good nature and generosity. Z

[A] Was born at Potheridge or at Marton in the county of Devon, in 1609. This date is fixed to his birth from the learned Oxford Antiquary, who says he was seventeen in 1626; though he is dubious as to the place of his birth, his father residing at Marton, when this son was sent to the university. Mr Wood (1) also gives us his descent from the Plantagenets; saying he was the 'third son of Sir Thomas Monk of Potheridge in Devonshire, Knight; son of Thomas Monk of the said place, Gent. by Frances his wife (widow of John Basset, of Umberley in the said county, Esq;) daughter of Arthur Plantagenet, natural son of King Henry the Fourth, by Elizabeth Lucy, as is supposed, his concubine.' In which account, the Antiquary has committed a palpable mistake both as to person and time, Arthur Plantagenet being the son of Edward, not Henry, the Fourth; and Edward died in 1483: consequently a daughter of his natural son, could not well the first rudiments of learning we know not, but, in 1626, at seventeen years of age, he was entered a Commoner in Wadham-college, Oxford (b); where, in 1634, he proceeded in Arts, and soon after entered into Holy Orders.(c). - From this time we know but little, or rather nothing, of him, 'till the year 1658, when we are told he had married a widow with some accession of fortune, and had lately obtained a moderate living within twelve miles of Kill, or Kelkhampton, in his own country (d); and that in that year he received the presentation of Kelkhampton, worth 300 pounds per annum, without simony (e), from Sir John Greenville (f) [B]. The following year he went to Scotland, at Sir John Greenville's request, to begin the treaty between King Charles the Second and his brother General Monk (g); and returning from thence to his living, remained quiet there 'till June 1660, when he was made Provost of Eton-college (h), and, on the first of August that year, was presented to the degree of Doctor in Divinity, and actually created such by virtue of the King's letter (i) [C]. Not long after, he was nominated to the see of Hereford, which had lain vacant for fourteen years, and was consecrated by the Archbishop of York, assisted by the Bishops of Durham, Chichester, Lincoln, and Peterborough, at Westminster-abbey, on the feast of Epiphany, January the sixth, the same year (k); and died at his lodgings in Old Palace yard, Westminster, on the 17th day of December following, in the fifty-second or fifty-third year of his age. He was buried on the 20th of the same month, in the chapel of St Edward, in the abbey, and was succeeded in his episcopal dignity by Dr. Herbert Croft (l).

MONSON or MUNSON [Sir WILLIAM], a brave English Admiral, in part of the XVIth and XVIIth centuries, was the third son of Sir John Munson of South Carlton in Lincolnshire, by Jane his wife, daughter of Robert Dighton of Little Sturton in the same county (a). For about two years he was a Student in Balliol-college in Oxford: but his mind being of an active and martial disposition, he soon grew weary of a contemplative life, and applied himself to the sea-service, wherein he arrived to great perfection (b). In the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's war with Spain, he entered on that profession, and was led to it by the wildness of his youth; as being but sixteen years of age, and entering himself without the knowledge of his father or mother. His wages, according to the frugality of that time, were no more than 10s. a month, and his condition only that of a private man. The first voyage he engaged in, was, in the year 1585, on board a small bark, or privateer, and in company only with another still smaller, commissioned to seize upon the subjects of the King of Spain. They sailed from the isle of Wight in the month of September, and being come upon the coast of Spain, about eight o'clock in the evening, they met and boarded a Spanish vessel of three hundred tons burden, well manned and armed, returning from Newfoundland; which, after a most obstinate engagement, yielded the next morning at seven o'clock [A]. This was the first Spanish prize that ever saw the English shore (c). In 1587, he went out commander of a vessel, but keeping longer at sea than he expected, he was reduced to great extremity for want of victuals; and coming back from the Canary-islands, was very near being lost in Dingle-bay, upon the coast of Ireland (d). He served, in 1588, in one of the Queen's ships, named the Charles, but had not the command of it (e). In 1589, he was Vice-Admiral to the Earl of Cumberland in his expedition to the Azores islands, and at the taking of Fayal, where he did very great service: but, in their return, endured such hardships [B] as threw him into a violent illness, which kept him at home the whole year

[A] Which, after a most obstinate engagement, yielded, &c.] He gives us these further particulars of that desperate enterprize, as it may justly be called.— 'All our men with one consent and courage entered her, and we were left fighting aboard her all night, the seas being so grown, that our barks were forced to ungrapple and fall off. The Spaniards betook themselves to their close fights, and gave two attempts by trains of powder, to blow up their decks on which we were; but we happily prevented it by fire-pikes. Thus continued the fight 'till seven in the morning, when the Spaniards found they had so many men killed and disabled, that they were forced to yield. When we came to take a view of our people, we found few left alive but could shew a wound or shot through their cloaths in that fight: we were a woful spectacle, as well as the Spaniards; and I dare say, that in the whole time of the war, there was not so rare a manner of fight, or so great a slaughter of men on both sides (1).

[B] But in their return endured such hardships.] He has left us the following account of them. 'The extremity we endured, was more terrible than befall any ship in the eighteen years war; for laying aside the continual expectation of death by shipwreck, and the daily mortality of our men, I will speak of our famine, that exceeded all men and ships I have known in the course of my life: for sixteen days together, we

' we never tasted a drop of drink, either beer, wine, or water; and though we had plenty of beef and pork of a year's salting, yet did we forbear eating it, for making us the drier. Many drunk salt water, and those that did, died suddenly, and the last word they usually spake, was, drink, drink, drink! and I dare boldly say, that of five hundred men that were in that ship seven years before, at this day there is not a man alive but myself, and one more (2).'

[C] But escaped in a very unexpected manner. He was preserved by a bullet hitting upon his sword; as he had been also at the island of St Mary's in 1589. His own account is thus.—' In that conflict [in Cadiz] I was shot with a musket bullet through my scarf and breeches; and the handle and pommel of my sword shot from my side, without any further hurt.'—And at an 'encounter,' in the island of St Mary's, 'my sword, which I placed naked, and the point upward, was shot asunder, and the bullet pass'd through the belly of my doublet, which, if it had not been for my sword, had done the like through my belly.'—'By the way, this I note, that as the sword is the death of many a ' man, so it hath been twice the preserver of my life (3).'

[D] He shewes it was of great advantage to England in many respects ] 'To say truth, saith he, the expedition which was then used in drawing together so great an army by land, and rigging so great and royal a Navy to sea, in so little a space of time, was so admirable in other countries, that they received a terror by it; and many that came from beyond sea, said, The Queen was never more dreaded abroad for any thing she ever did. Frenchmen that came aboard our ships did wonder (as a thing incredible) that her Majesty had rigged, victualled, and furnished her royal ships to sea in twelve days time: and Spain, as an enemy, had reason to fear and grieve to see this sudden preparation; but more, when they understood how the hearts of his Majesty's subjects joined with their hands, being all ready to spend their dearest blood for her, and her service. Holland might likewise see, that if they became insolent, we could be as soon provided as they; nor did they expect to find such celerity in any nation but themselves (4).'

suaded by the Lords to accompany Sir Richard as Vice-admiral in this voyage, they having a greater trust and confidence in Sir William than in the other; therefore he was ordered to command the Mere Honour, a better ship than that Sir Richard served in. All this was done out of policy; and few of the Lords, but such as were intimate friends to King James, knew of it. For their intention was, if the Queen died, and King James had found any opposition, that the Lord Thomas Howard, afterwards Earl of Suffolk, should take charge of this fleet, and come aboard Sir William, and Sir William to go into Sir Richard's ship, and supersede his authority (r). But the King's peaceable accession rendered all this precaution needless. It might have been thought, that Sir William's loyalty to that Prince, and his strong attachment to his succession, would have entitled him to particular Favour and extraordinary Rewards or Promotions. But military men were not King James's Favourites. Therefore, since the death of Queen Elizabeth, who was both gracious and bountiful to Sir William, he never tasted or received either recompence or preferment, more than his ordinary entertainment or pay, according to the services he was employed in, as he says himself (s) [E]. However, in 1604, he was appointed Admiral of the Narrow Seas, in which station he continued about twelve years [F], till 1616. And in that time, he supported the honour of the English Flag, against the sauciness of the infant Commonwealth of Holland [G]; and protected our Trade against the encroachments of France (t) [H]. The first service he was employed in, was the bringing over the Constable of Castile, who was to come and conclude a peace between the two crowns of England and Spain, that had been eighteen years at variance (u). And, in 1614, he effectually cleared the Scottish and Irish seas of Pirates, which had long infested those parts (w). Notwithstanding his long and faithful services, he had the misfortune of falling into disgrace, and through the resentment of some powerful courtiers [I], was imprisoned in the Tower in the year 1616; but, after having been examined by the Lord Chief Justice Coke, and Secretary Winwood, he was discharged, and wrote a vindication of his conduct (x) [K]. His honest zeal against the insolencies of the Dutch, and promoting an enquiry into the state of the Navy [L], contrary to the sense and [E] According to the services he was employed in. He began the wars with ten shillings per month pay; then with two shillings and six-pence per day; afterwards with five shillings, with ten shillings, with fifteen shillings, with twenty shillings, and sixteen pages allowed him for his retinue; afterwards with thirty shillings a day; and lastly, with forty shillings a day (5).

[F] In which station he continued about twelve years. And in that time he served in the following ships. In 1604, in the Vanguard; in 1605, in the Rainbow; in 1606, in the Assurance; in 1607, in the Rainbow; in 1609, in the Vanguard; in 1610, in the Assurance; in 1611, in the Rainbow; in 1612, in the Adventure; in 1613, in the Assurance; in 1614, in the Lion; in 1615, in the Nonfuch (6).

[G] Against the sauciness of the infant Commonwealth of Holland. He gives several instances of their pertness, and of his little affection for them. He observes, in particular, that such was their insolency, that they challenged a Prerogative [of not striking the Flag] where nothing was granted by us but of courtesy; —and that they were very cruel; in taking and burning our ships, and sometimes murdering our men, only for trading in the ports of Flanders (7). How ready Sir William was to vindicate the honour of the English Flag, appears from one instance given us by Sir Antony Weldon (8). 'The old Earl of Hertford, says he, being sent Embassador to the Archduke, was conveyed over by one of the King's ships, by Sir William Monfon, in whose passage a Dutch man of warre coming by that ship, would not vail, as the manner is, acknowledging by that our Sovereignty over the sea, Sir William Monfon gave him a shot to instruct him manners; but instead of hearing, he taught him, by returning another, he acknowledged no such Sovereignty, this was the very first indignity and affront ever offered to the royall ships of England, which since have been most frequent; Sir William Monfon desired my Lord of Hertford to goe into the hold, and he would instruct him by stripes, that refused to be taught by faire meancs; but the Earle charged him on his allegiance first to land him, on whom he was appointed to attend; so to his great regret, he was forced to endure that indignity, for which I have often heard him wish he had been hanged, rather than live that unfortunate commander of a King's ship, to be chronicled for the first that ever endured that affront, although it was not in his power to have helped it.'

VOL. V. No. 263.

[H] And protected our Trade against the encroachments of France. Especially the Fishery on the coast of Suffex. 'The towns of Rye and Hastings found themselves impoverished, and almost ruined, by the French incroaching upon their fishing on the English coast, contrary to the articles and agreement betwixt the two Kings. These towns upon just cause complain'd of it, and Sir William was sent down to redress it; which he carefully performed, tho' it cost the lives of some Frenchmen: for two years he was fain to use force, and brought the French to that submission, that the English enjoyed their usual privileges (9).'

[I] Through the resentment of some powerful courtiers. The account of his disgrace, he gives us in these words.—'I at last found, malice had a greater power and force against me, than by sea I found, or otherwise I deserved; for when I thought to have left my painful labours at sea, and to have enjoy'd tranquillity of peace on land, envy, unluckily, and unlooked for, seized upon my innocency: For being thought a bosom friend to a nobleman I much honour'd, who at that time began to be aimed at (10), and was afterwards borne down by a court faction, tho' I was one of the meanest in number, and unworthy to have knowledge taken of me, as a man of no eminency; yet considering how my estate then stood by my engagements, and otherwise, I found fortune more averted to me than most of the others had felt, by malicious practices (11).' Thomas Howard Earl of Arundel was one of his great enemies (12).

[K] And wrote a vindication of his conduct. It is directed to the Lord Chancellor Elmfore, and Sir Francis Bacon, Attorney and Counsellor; and intitled, Concerning the insolencies of the Dutch, and a justification of Sir William Monfon. He complains in it greatly of the ill usage he had received. 'Some, says he, have obtain'd their desires in ruining my estate, made me infamous to the world, taken from me my employment, seized by way of forfeiture upon my land, denying to account with me, which they have long practised; and, above all, cast such an asperson upon my children, as all hope of preferment is taken from them: but my comfort is in the saying of David, That my defence is in God, who saweth the upright in heart (13).'

[L] His honest zeal against the insolencies of the Dutch, and promoting an enquiry into the state of the Navy, &c. In his Vindication, he positively imputes his Troubles to these causes.—'What I have said is sufficient and inclination of the Earl of Nottingham, then Lord High-Admiral (y), seem to have been the occasion of his troubles. He had also the misfortune of bringing upon himself a general and popular odium, in retaking the Lady Arbella Stuart, after her escape out of England (a) [M], though it was acting exactly according to his orders and duty (b). However, he soon recovered his credit at Court; for in 1617, he was called before the Privy-Council, to give his opinion, how the pirates of Algiers might be suppressed, and the town attacked. At which time, he shewed the impossibility of taking Algiers, either by surprize or siege; the little use we could make of it, either to annoy the King of Spain, or any other potentate; as also the small profit it would be to England. But notwithstanding his good advice, the expedition was undertaken by George Villiers Duke of Buckingham, who was young, and infected with the disease of youth, to hearken to base flattery; and by whose ill-management it was quite unsuccessful (c). Sir William was also against two other ill undertakings, and as ill managed, in the years 1625 and 1628, namely, the expeditions to Cadiz and to the isle of Rheé; wherein, says he, our rashness appeared greater than our discretion, in bidding defiance to the two mighty and potent princes of Europe, both at one time, without help or assistance from abroad, and under the uncertainty of money; the then Parliament opposing his Majesty's demands (d). In these actions Sir William was not employed, because he found fault with the Prime Minister's measures (e). But in 1635, it being found necessary to equip a large fleet, in order to break a confederacy that was forming between the French and the Dutch, Sir William was appointed Vice-Admiral of that armament in the James, and performed his duty with great honour and bravery (f). After that he was employed no more, but spent the remainder of his days in privacy and peace, at his seat at Kinnerley in Surrey (g), where he digested and finished his Naval Tracts [N]. He dyed there in February 1642-3, being * sufficient to shew the arrogant and unmannerly carriage of the Hollanders, who ambitiously desire to in-croach upon his Majesty's jurisdiction. Had I con-nived at them, I had purchased less hate of them, and their well-wishers. And, not long before my commitment, there fell out an accident, which, per-haps, might hasten my imprisonment. Sir Howell (14) Caroone, their agent, coming over in a man of war, was shot at by a pinnace of the King's, for not striking his topsail to her, which I understood he took in ill part, and cast it upon me.—I must confess my folly and misfortune: the one made me too forward in complaining, and wishing a reformation of his Majesty's Navy, which has purchas'd me much envy: the other procured me as much hate; in taking the Lady Arabella: and then, perhaps, the cause of my imprisonment will more plainly appear (15).*

(14) It should be: Noel.

(15) Naval Tracts, p. 224, 225.

[M] In retaking the Lady Arbella Stuart, after her escape out of England.] This Lady was confined to the Tower for her marriage with William Seymour, Esq; but the true cause of her confinement, was, her being too high-allied, and having a title or claim to the Crown of England. She making her escape June 3d, 1611, Sir William Monson receiv'd orders to retake her, before she reach'd either France or Flanders, which he effectually perform'd. His own account is thus. 'Many other accidents happen'd in the narrow seas, that need no remembrance; and yet I will conclude with the escape of the Lady Arbella, twenty four hours before Sir William Monson had orders to pursue her; which he did with that celerity, that she was taken within four miles of Calais, shipped in a French bark of that town, whither she was bound. The manner is so commonly known, that no more needs be said, but that it was done; though the accident was so strange and unlook'd for, that few could be persuaded but that her escape was plotted, with an intent to take her again: And it was the rather believ'd, because Sir William was not rewarded according to the importance of that service (16).*

As the miserable, and state-prisoners in general, are the object of popular pity; therefore Sir William's uncommon diligence in retaking that unfortunate Lady, brought severe reflections upon him, and made him the object of the resentment of the vulgar.

[N] Where he digested and finished his Naval Tracts.] He divided them himself into six books. The first is chiefly a collection of every year's Actions in the wars against Spain, during Queen Elizabeth's reign, on our own and the Spanish coasts, and in the West-Indies. The Accounts are clear, and concise; for no more is said, but the force they were undertaken with, and the success of the enterprize: to which are sub-join'd the reasons why they miscarried, or why so little advantage was made where they succeeded. In some

he is more particular than in others, and, what perhaps may be still of use, he at last sets down the abuses of the fleet, and the methods for redressing them. The second book contains a justification of himself after his imprisonment in the Tower; his actions and conduct while he was Admiral of the Narrow Seas; his expedition against the pirates in 1614; and his advice and thoughts about the ill-managed design against Algiers; and against Cadiz; rates for seamen's wages in 1626; a muster of ships and mariners throughout England, taken by the Earl of Lincoln, Lord High-Admiral, in 1582. Lift of the English fleet in the days of King Edward the Third. Of the Sovereignty of the Kings of England over the Narrow Seas, with severe reflections on the Dutch: The two voyages in 1635 and 1636. How to make war upon Scotland, and to provide for the west part of that kingdom, &c. The third book treats of the Admiralty; that is, of all things relating to the royal Navy, from the Lord High-Admiral, to the meanest person employed ashore, and to the cabin-boys at sea; and from a complete fleet to the smallest vessel, and the several parts of it; with instructions for all officers, and those given by the Earl of Lindsey in 1635; the size of all forts of guns; Spanish ships, with their allowance; excellent directions for fighting at sea; the benefit and use of galleys in England; the ceremony of wearing the flag; the corrupt abuses used in his Majesty's service by sea, and the means how to reform them; of the harbours of England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales, their depths, &c. The fourth book is a collection of the Discoveries made by the Spaniards and Portuguese, and their conquests, in Africk, Asia, and America; with the voyages of Sir Francis Drake, Mr Cavendish, and other Englishmen; and also some Dutch voyages: Of the two worlds undiscovered, besides the four known; i. e. one under the North Pole, and the other fourth of Magellan's Streights; of other seas besides the ocean. A discourse concerning the North-West passage. A Comparison between our ancient and modern trades; with something relating to the Hollanders and fishing; of certain plantations of the French: Advice how to plant the isle of St Laurence. The fifth book contains divers Projects and Stratagems, for managing affairs at sea, to the benefit and advantage of this nation. The sixth and last book treats of a Fishery to be set up on the coast of England, Scotland, and Ireland, with the benefit that will accrue by it to all his Majesty's three kingdoms: With many other things concerning Fish, Fishing, and matters of that nature.—To the first and second book are prefixed Addresses to his eldest and second Sons, wherein he gives them most excellent Advice, worthy of any man's attention and perusal. The conclusion of the Address to the first is in these excellent words.—'Let me (good son) be your pattern of patience; for you can witness with me, that the dif- graces being in the 73d year of his age [O]; and left a numerous posterity (b). Such was the end of this brave man, who had served in all stations, as a Soldier, a private Captain, a Rear-Admiral, a Vice-Admiral, a Captain under the General, and lastly an absolute General (i). In which last station, as he boldly and truly said, there was never service neglected, omitted, or unperformed, that he was commanded upon; not to be paralleled by any that enjoyed his employment before (k).

‘graces I have unjustly suffered, (my estate being through my misfortunes ruined, my health by imprisonments decay’d, and my services undervalued and unrecompenc’d) have not bred the least distaste or discontent in me, or alter’d my resolution from my infancy, that is, I was never so base as to insinuate into any man’s favour, who was favour’d by the times; I was never so ambitious as to seek or crave employment, or to undertake any that was not put upon me. My great and only comfort is, that I serv’d my Princes both faithfully and fortunately (17).’——Part of these Naval Tracts was printed

[O] Being in the seventy-third year of his age. He informs us, that he was a youth of sixteen years of age, in September 1585, when he first went to sea (18). Therefore he was born in the year 1569, and was in the seventy-third year of his age, at the time of his death. C

MONTAGUE [CHARLES], Earl of Halifax, the most distinguished Statesman of his time, was born April 16th, 1661, at Horton in Northamptonshire, the seat of his father, the Honourable George Montague, Esq; younger son by a second venter to Henry Earl of Manchester. He had a numerous family (a), and though possessed of no other estate than his mother’s jointure, yet being an excellent œconomist, he bred all his children in the genteelst manner, and provided handsome fortunes for them. The subject of this article being his fourth and youngest son, gave very early tokens of an admirable genius, and after he had gone through the first rudiments of grammar learning at a school in the country, was sent to that of Westminster, at the age of fourteen; and in 1677, two years afterwards, was chosen King’s scholar. Being now under the immediate care of Dr Busby, that excellent observer of a boy’s genius improved his talent for poetry, by frequently putting him upon making extempory epigrams, in which exercise he particularly excelled. At this school he contracted a more than ordinary degree of friendship with Mr Geo. Stepney [A], who was then also in the college, but being his senior, was elected to Trinity-college in Cambridge in 1682. Our author’s election came on the next year, but the apprehension of being chosen to Christ-Church in Oxford (b), and thereby separated from his friend, so much troubled him, that he begged of his relations not to keep him waiting the issue of his election, but to forego that advantage, and let him now bear young Stepney company to Cambridge. He was tenderly indulged in this request, and admitted at Trinity-college there that year, in the station of a Fellow-Commoner; his kinsman Dr John Montague, then Master of that college, taking him under his tuition (c). Our Student quickly made an uncommon proficiency in every branch of academical learning, presently recommended himself to the notice and acquaintance of Mr [afterwards Sir] Isaac Newton; and in 1684 joined with him in endeavouring to erect a philosophical society at Cambridge like that established in the sister university (d). But the poets engaged Mr Montague’s brighter hours [B]. These were particularly endeared to him by the society of his friend Stepney, and the death of King Charles the Second furnished both a favourable, opportunity which they did not let slip, of shewing the world their merit in that way. Mr Montague’s verses on this occasion (e) drew the regard of the Earl of Dorset upon their author [C]; who was thereupon invited to London by that noble patron of the Muses (f), and brought into the acquaintance of some of the choicest wits of the age. Among these, it was not long before he procured himself a place in the first class, and his fame in this kind was completely established, by the share he had in transferring

[A] A friendship with Mr G. Stepney. This gentleman was descended of the ancient family of Pendergraft in Wales, and born in Westminster in 1663, was put to school there, being chosen King’s scholar in 1676, and went to Trinity-college in 1682. By our author’s recommendation, he was appointed a Commissioner of Trade in 1697, and was constantly employed in embassies abroad from 1691 to his death, which happened in 1707 at Chelsey; whence his corpse was conducted, by a numerous train of nobility, to it’s interment in Westminster-abbey, where there is a very handsome marble monument, with an elegant Latin eulogium, erected to his memory*.

[B] Poetry engaged his brighter hours. The first performance in this way, was An Ode on the Marriage of her Royal Highness Princess Anne and Prince George of Denmark. As the ode is the most sublime and exquisite species of poetry, our author’s genius, which lay particularly to the familiar stile, did not lead him to shine in this way, yet he has succeeded very well in this attempt. The entrance into it is excellent, that peculiar happiness which results from an union of hearts in marriage, receives the strongest relief by contrasting it with the plot, a genuine offspring of discord and the mother of distraction and misery. This ode is written in the Pindaric form, and has this distinguishing variety, that it consists of six stanzas, each of which surprizes us with a new measure entirely different from the former, yet uniform in itself.

versing the fable of the Hind and Panther into the Country Mouse and City Mouse [D], in 1687. The university had before this given their attestation to his distinguished merit, by conferring upon him the degree of Master of Arts in an extraordinary manner (g); and he had been also elected Fellow of his college (h). In 1688 he signed, among many others, the invitation of the Prince of Orange to come over to England. Upon the departure of King James the Second, he was chosen a Member of the Convention, where he voted for the declaring the Throne vacant by that King's abdication (i). Before King William was crowned, Mr Montague engaged in a marriage with the Countess dowager of Manchester *, and went to London with a design to enter into Holy Orders, but was afterwards diverted from that design, and instead thereof, purchased the place of one of the Clerks of the Council, for which he gave 1500 l. (k). Not long after, the Earl of Dorset, who had been advanced to the office of Lord Chamberlain, and had been very serviceable in bringing on the Revolution, introduced our young statesman in the most engaging manner to King William, saying, May it please your Majesty, I have brought a mouse to have the honour of kissing your hand. The King smiled, and being told the reason of that address, replied, You will do well to put me in a way of making a man of him; and immediately ordered him a pension of 500 l. a year, 'till an opportunity should offer of promoting him (l). Accordingly, in the beginning of March 1691, having in the House of Commons, of which he was a member, displayed his eminent abilities in the debates upon the bill for regulating trials in cases of high-treason (m) [E], Lord Dorset, though the bill miscarried, easily obtained for him the place of one of the Commissioners of the Treasury, then vacant by the resignation of Thomas Pelham Esq; (n). Our young courtier, who was now sworn a Privy Counsellor, distinguished himself both at the Treasury and Council Boards so well, that upon a change in the commission of the first, in the beginning of May 1694, he was made second Commissioner and Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Under-Treasurer (o). The exigence of the publick affairs called for the utmost skill of the ablest statesmen at this juncture. However, Mr Montague shewed himself equal thereto, and conducted the government safe through dangers, that were thought by many to be utterly unsurmountable. In 1695 he entred into the design of recoinage all the current money of the nation, which, notwithstanding the extreme difficulties that attended it, he undertook, and perfectly completed in the compass of two years (p) [F]. [D] The share he had in transverting the Hind and Panther, &c.] The author just mentioned tells us, this Travesty was undertaken by Mr Montague and Mr Prior, at the request of their friends. However that be, no body doubts but Mr Montague had the greatest share in it, and that the preface was intirely his. It was of singular service to the cause of liberty and the Protestant Religion, by cudgelling the laureat champion with his own weapon. The service it did Mr Montague is seen above, in his introduction to King William by the Earl of Dorset. It must be observed, that our author had before this wrote The Man of Honour, and The Epistle on his Majesty's Victory in Ireland.

[E] Speech on the bill for regulating trials in cases of high-treason.] This was the first opening of his talents as a speaker in the House. The design of the bill was, amongst other things, to allow counsel to prisoners charged with that offence, while it was depending. Our author rose up in order to speak for it, and having begun his speech, was struck suddenly with such a surprize, that for a while he was not able to go on; but recovering himself, he took occasion from this very surprize, To enforce the necessity of allowing counsel to prisoners who were to appear before their Judges, since he who was not only innocent and unaccused, but one of their own members, was so dashed when he was to speak before that wise and illustrious assembly (3): which turn of wit did no small service in facilitating the passage of that bill through the House of Commons, though it was lost afterwards, by an amendment with which it was clogged in the Upper House.

[F] He completed the recoinage in two years.] The reasons against this undertaking, urged by Mr Bromley, Sir John Packington, Heneage Finch, and Robert Harley, Esq; &c. were: That this was no fit juncture for it, while the nation was engaged in a burthenfome and doubtful war, by which the kingdom had already greatly suffered, and of which it grew every day more sensible; that therefore the people, on whose good affections so much depended, should not be provoked by fresh grievances, greater than they had yet felt, as those would certainly be, that must arise from calling in the silver coin. That if this was done, however things might be managed and accommodated at home, it were impossible to maintain either the commerce or the war abroad, for neither the merchant could be paid his bills of exchange, nor the foldier receive his subsistence. That this was to lay the axe to the root, and dig up the foundation of the government. That if this design was prosecuted, trade would unavoidably stand still for want of mutual payments, whence such disorder and confusion would certainly follow, as would discourage and dishearten the people in the highest measure, if not drive them to perfect despair, as despair would to the most terrible extremities. That therefore, recoinage the money at this time was not any way to be attempted without hazarding all. In answer to these arguments, it was alledged by Mr Montague, that the mischief would be fatal, if a present remedy was not found out and applied. That by reason of the ill state of the coin, the exchange abroad was infinitely to the nation's prejudice: That the supplies that were raised to maintain the army would never attain their end, being so much diminished and devoured by the unequal exchange, and exorbitant premiums before they reached the camp. That this was the unhappy cause, that the guineas advanced to thirty shillings and foreign gold in proportion. That therefore, to the nation's great loss, not only the Dutch, but indeed all Europe, sent that commodity to this market, and would continue to do so, 'till the nation should be impoverished and undone by plenty of gold. That we must exchange for their goods our own silver, 'till at last we should have only guineas to trade withal, which no body could think our neighbours would be so kind to receive back at the rate they were at here. That therefore, this disease would take deeper root, infect the very vitals of the nation, and, if not remedied, would soon become incurable. That our enemies would be mightily intimidated by so great an action, and would sooner be induced to agree to honourable terms of peace, in case they saw us able to surmount that difficulty, by retrieving the ill state of the coin, in which their hopes of the nation's speedy ruin so much depended; and that it would justly create a mighty esteem abroad, of the greatness and wisdom of the Parliament of England, which was able to conquer such an obstinate, and almost insuperable, evil, in such a juncture of affairs. The several prudent steps that were taken by our great projector, in the execution of this most important affair, may be seen in the Complete History of England, Vol. III. It is sufficient for us to remit the reader to the articles LOCKE [JOHN], HALLEY [EDMUND], and NEWTON [SIR ISAAC], where he will see how far those eminently learned persons were of service to Mr Montague by their assistance therein (4).

he projected the scheme for a general fund [G], and procured it's establishment. The same year he found out a method to raise the sinking credit of the Bank of England [H], and the following year he provided against the mischiefs from the scarcity of money, by raising for the service of the Government above two millions in Exchequer notes (9) [I]: and before the end of this session of Parliament, it was resolved by the House of Commons, in approbation of a grant made to him of some Crown-lands in Ireland, That Charles Montague Esq; Chancellor of the Exchequer, for his good services to the government, did deserve his Majesty's favour (r) [K]. He had the chief hand in managing the project for erecting a new East-India Company [L] in 1698, and the same year was made First

(r) This vote is mentioned expressly in the preamble to his patent for the Barony.

[G] He projected a general fund This scheme was projected by our author to retrieve the publick credit, which, partly by the deficiency of Parliamentary funds, and partly by the recoinage was sunk so low, that bank notes were now discounted at twenty, and exchequer tallies at forty, fifty, and sixty, per cent. To remedy this latter evil, by his means and interest in the House of Commons, an estimate was made and laid before them, of what sums were or would be wanting to discharge all the principal and interest due, or to become due, on the several aids, duties, or funds, over and above the arrears then standing out upon them that were determined, besides all monies to be raised by such as were unexpired. To him it was owing, that the people were given to understand that the nation was in debt 5160400 l; and to him, that having got to the bottom of the disease, resolutions were taken for a thorough cure. In order to effect this, divers duties arising, not only by the customs, but by continuing additional impositions after the day on which they would have otherwise expired, were continued; and all the monies which should arise and be brought into his Majesty's exchequer from any of those taxes or duties, from the day on which they were otherwise to expire to the 1st of August, 1716, were appointed to be a general fund, for making good all the deficient ones by the payment of principal and interest due or to become due thereupon: And to remove all doubts about the security intended to be given in case that on the 1st of August 1706, or within three months then next ensuing, the general fund, together with other grants then in being, should not be sufficient to discharge the afore-said debt of 5160400 l. that then what was deficient should be made good out of such aids or revenues as should be granted in the next session of Parliament (5). 'Tis well known that this General Fund was the first stone that was laid towards erecting the Sinking Fund, which was the great boast of Sir Robert Walpole.

[H] A scheme to support the credit of the Bank This was brought about by augmenting their capital stock, and thereupon admitting new subscriptions, which subscriptions should be made good in tallies and bank notes (6); and an interest of eight per cent. was allowed, as well for such tallies as should be brought in to enlarge their stock, as for those which the company was then possessed of; provided they did not exceed the value of those bank notes, which should be paid in upon this engagement on their new stock; and for securing the payment of their interest of eight per cent. the additional duty upon salt (7) was afterwards granted and appropriated. They likewise extended the continuance of the Bank to 1710, gave liberty to enlarge the number of it's bills; voted that no other bank should be erected in it's prejudice; and made it their chief care to prevent the abetting, counterfeit, or forging, any bank bills or notes, as likewise the defacing, rasing, or altering, any indorcement upon any such bill or note, &c. Upon these encouragements a million was subscribed and paid in tallies and bank notes, as the Parliament had directed. This expedient, says a learned historian (8), was the result of Mr Charles Montague's skill and prudence, and tho' many persons who were interested in it could not presently apprehend the reasonableness of it, yet the advantages they afterwards received, did fully convince them, that no other way could have been found to call back their sinking credit. For the value of 20000 l. being sunk by the new subscription, the rest began presently to rise in worth, and so likewise did the tallies after so many as amounted to 80000 l. were paid in to enlarge the Bank. Upon this the credit at Grocer's-Hall (9) recovered apace, 'till in a short time their notes, which bore no interest, were at a par with cash, and their bills that bore interest better than cash.

chequer notes. With this view, in order to prevent dis-appointments by settling funds which might be deficient, he made a motion in Parliament, which was followed by a resolution, that the supply for the year 1697 (10), should be raised within a year. This was effectuated by authorizing the Lords of the Treasury to issue out bills from the Exchequer to the value, first and last, of above two millions; which bills were first appointed to be brought in and sunk upon the capitation tax then on foot; and that proving deficient, upon any other of the King's duties or revenues except the land-tax; an interest of seven pound twelve shillings per ann. being allowed upon the second issuing the said bills out of the Exchequer, whereas at first they bore no interest: Hence the people were all satisfied to take these notes, at first, indeed, at a small discount, but not long after at par. A great number of these notes were only for five or ten pounds, which answered the necessities of commerce among the meaner people, for the common conveniences of life. And that those who advanced money on loans upon any part of the King's revenues, might not be obliged to receive it back in notes that were under the value of cash, to strengthen the reputation of these bills, the Lords of the Treasury were authorized to contract with any corporation, or numbers of private men, and to allow them a competent premium, provided they obliged themselves to exchange those notes for ready money, when tendered to them for that purpose. By this means the Exchequer notes daily arose nearer, and at last exceeded par. And whereas the trustees with whom the Government had contracted to exchange them, were at first allowed ten per cent. as a premium, they were afterwards content to do it for four. Thus these state counters so well supplied the want of money, 'till new coin was issued from the Mint, that trade and commerce were maintained, and mutual payments effectually made to answer both the demands of the Government and the People. This project, says my historian above-mentioned, which proved sufficient, tho' a paper-prop, to support the state when it's silver pillars, if I may so speak, were for a time removed, was likewise owing to the prudence and industry of Mr Charles Montague. We have thought proper to give a succinct account of these three remarkable services, as it was by them particularly that Mr Montague merited the peerage, as the reader will see by his patent in rem. [M].

[K] Did deserve his Majesty's favour Under a pretence of applying all the forfeited estates to the use of the publick, an enquiry was made by the House of Commons into the grants of King Charles the Second and James the Second, and a bill was ordered to be brought in to make them void (11). In this enquiry they inspected into the grants of King William in Ireland, and one being found there made to Mr Railton, which Mr Montague very readily owned to be for his benefit, a warm debate arose, wherein a motion was made that he should withdraw, which passing in the negative, it was resolved by a great majority as above: 'A vote that will render his name famous to all succeeding ages (12).' It is expressly mentioned in his patent for the Barony.

[L] The new East India Company. A proposal being given into the House of Commons by Samuel Shepherd and Gilbert Heathcote, at the head of several other eminent merchants, for raising two millions at eight per cent. on condition the trade to India might be settled on the subscribers exclusive of all others; it was preferred to one given in by the old company, for advancing 700000 l. at four per cent. upon the same condition; and by the interest of our statesman an act was passed accordingly, and the subscription filled in two days. But this bill had met with very great opposition in going through the House, which gathered strength in the several difficulties that after-

First Commissioner of the Treasury, and, July 16th, appointed one of the Lords Justices of England during his Majesty's absence (s). As he was also in 1699 (t), the same year he was made Auditor of the Exchequer (u); and on the 13th of December 1700, having resigned his post in the Treasury, he was created a Peer of England [M], by the title of Baron of Halifax in the county of York (w). But in the Parliament which met February 6th this year, he was attacked by the House of Commons, who addressed his Majesty to remove him from his presence and councils, and afterwards impeached him of high crimes and misdemeanors in six articles [N]; which were, however, dismissed by the House of Lords, and he continued in King William's favour 'till the death of that Prince: but not long after the accession of Queen Anne, his name was struck out of the Privy Council (x) [O], and in the first Parliament of that Queen in 1702, he was again attacked by the House wards arose from the interfering claims of the two companies. So that Mr Prior intimates, that his friend Charles was called up to the House of Lords at this juncture by his Majesty (13), in order to save the ill countenance of his minister's defeat in the Lower House, upon the struggle between the two East India companies.

[M] He was created a Peer of England ] The reason of his advancement was, as usual, declared in the preamble to his patent, which was drawn in very elegant Latin by his friend Mr Prior. Si ab antiquissima procerum familia splendorem derivare, &c. The English of which is: If it be accounted, honourable to be descended from a most ancient family of noblemen; if it be any glory to grow illustrious by great actions proceeding from personal and inherent merit, our right well-beloved and very faithful Counsellor, Charles Montague, Esq; on both accounts, recommends himself to our singular good opinion and esteem, who derives his splendor from a house, which at once very plentifully provides for the ornament and support of our kingdom, in three Earls and eight Members of Parliament: a gentleman adorned with those virtues to which no good citizen can envy any increase of honour, and which a just Prince cannot but freely offer. Nature has endued him with a genius to manage affairs of the highest concern, and which cultivated by learning, and by a continual practice of speaking well and acting wisely, we have found him strenuous and eloquent in Parliament; in Council, faithful and prudent; in determining causes relating to the Exchequer, upright and penetrating. We gratefully acknowledge ourselves altogether indebted to the Parliament for the supplies we have received to carry on a nine year's war in fighting for religion and liberty, and the common welfare of Europe: But we must not pass over in silence the sagacity of this excellent gentleman, who took care, that in the greatest scarcity, the publick credit should not sink, by being over-burthened with excessive interest. We must likewise reckon it a happiness, that he was at that time Chancellor of our Exchequer, when to our admiration we beheld the current money, which was adulterated and debased by the fraud and villainy of wicked men, in the space of two years (though accounted the work of an age) coined anew, and restored to it's intrinsic value. An attempt as fortunate as it was bold; and the demands of money increasing upon us, by his counsel and advice, we entered upon a new and unusual method of establishing a paper credit, whereby we made provision to advance the riches of the nation. For these good offices he gained the love and esteem of the people, and for the benefit which they received by his means, he has easily obtained ours. Wherefore, as we are always inclined to comply with the frequent wishes of our good subjects; we willingly and with all cheerfulness call him to the House of Peers, whom the Commons by a publick vote for his eminent services have pronounced deserving of our royal favour. Now know ye, &c.

(14) By virtue of an act for granting an aid to his Majesty by the sale of the forfeited estates in Ireland.

[N] He was impeached in six articles. ] These were in substance. 1. That he had procured a grant to Thomas Raiton, Esq; in trust for himself, of several debts, interests, &c. amounting to 13000 l. accruing from forfeitures in Ireland. This he acknowledged, but asserted the innocence of it, and took notice that this grant had been since resumed, and that he had not cleared from it above 400. 2. That he had put 1000 l. into his own pocket accruing from the profits of the abovenamed grant, which ought to have been repaid to the receipt of the Exchequer in Ireland (14). He answered, that in this matter he gave directions to follow the advice of counsel, who gave their opinion that this money was not within that act. 3. That he advised the making of divers grants to others, and obtained several for himself. For answer, he confessed both parts of this article, confining the grants to himself to those mentioned in this article. 4. That he had procured a grant for the sum of 14000 l. of scrubbed beech, holly, and many tons of well grown timber had been felled and sold for his benefit. In answer, he acknowledged his receiving a grant of 2000 l. a year, to be raised by the fall of scrubbed beech, birch, &c. for seven years, which was not prejudicial to any timber, and that the cutting of the wood being done by the directions of the proper officers, did not relate to him. 5. That he was in effect, at one and the same time, one of the Commissioners of the Treasury, Chancellor of the Exchequer, and Auditor of the receipts of the Exchequer, which were inconsistent, and ought to have been a check to each other. He answered, that the grant of the Auditor's place was procured upon a design of resigning those in the Treasury, which he had since done. 6. That he advised the Partition-treaty (15). This he absolutely denied, averring, that he never was consulted upon any clause or article thereof: but when the said matter was discussed at Tunbridge-Wells, he made several objections to it. The issue of this last affair may be seen in Mr Prior's article.

(15) See more of this treaty in Lord Somers's article.

[O] He was struck out of the Privy-Council. ] His Lordship being earlier than was expected with his compliments to the new sovereign; on this occasion, the author of the poem called the Golden Age, was very severe upon this step in the following couplet:

Dissembling statesmen shall before thee stand,
And Halifax be first shall kiss thy hand.

However, he had the comfort of having better times foretold to him in a poetical vision by another writer, who addressed him in the following lines.

Quintus Arbelius to Charles Lord Halifax.

Take courage, noble Charles, and cease to muse,
I come from t'other world, to bring thee news;
I'm Quint' Arbelius in black Scylla's time,
Proscribed then, and for no other crime,
Than that my lands in fair Albania's field
Were pleasant there, and did much profit yield.
Take courage, man, for that thou hast a charm;
Thy pleasant lands can never do thee harm:
And yet thy faults are worse, far worse than mine,
My lands were my faults, and thy place is thine.
Thy faults are worse, for I poor silly fool,
Had no ambition, nor a soul to rule;
But thou, great Charles, the glory of that Court,
Thy master's crown and honour did support:
Thou kept those vipers from that sacred head,
But the great patron of mankind is dead.
And now they spit their venom, shoot their sting
On thee, and all that lov'd the glorious King.
But 'tis a crime enough in any case,
To keep, when men in power want, a place.
Take courage, Ch—l for I this comfort bring,
The heav'ns that did protect, and love thy King,
After some trial, thou shalt surely find
To all his friends propitious and kind.

House of Commons, who voted him guilty of a breach of trust in the execution of his office of Auditor [P], and addressed her Majesty to give directions to the Attorney General for his prosecution (y). But this was soon afterwards dropt by order of the Queen and Council, the House of Lords having before resolved that he had performed the duty of his office, and that he had not been guilty of any neglect or breach of trust in the principal article alledged against him. He constantly opposed, and was greatly instrumental in defeating, the attempts of the House of Commons upon the Occasional Conformity bill, this and the following years (z); and in 1704, he wrote an answer to Mr Bromley's speech upon that subject [Q]. Before the rising of the Parliament on March the 14th, the same year, he made the first proposal for the union of England and Scotland (aa); and upon the return of the writs for a new Parliament which met September 10th 1705, was received into her Majesty's favour, and recalled to his seat at the Council Board. He likewise attended her Majesty from Newmarket to Cambridge, and was there created Doctor of Laws (bb). [P] Guilty of a breach of trust. viz. In not transmitting the imprest rolls half yearly to the King's Remembrancer; the whole charge was branched out into five other articles, but they were all consequent upon this the chief and leading offence. But the Lords, before whom the accounts had been laid, appointed a committee to examine into this matter, who made the following report to the House: That in their opinion Charles Lord Halifax, Auditor, &c. hath performed the duty of his office, in transmitting the ordinary imprest rolls to the Queen's Remembrancer, according to the ancient custom of the Exchequer, and the direction of the act 8th & 9th Gul. III. Regis, intituled, An act for the better observation of the course anciently used in the receipt of the Exchequer; and that he hath not been guilty of any neglect or breach of trust upon that account. This report being agreed to by the House, the Commons desired a conference with the Lords thereupon, wherein they charged the Lords with giving judgment without a trial. But the latter defending their proceedings as no ways impeding a prosecution of the Lord Halifax, a second conference was had, in which the Upper House appointed Lord Halifax one of their managers, who, in his own defence, alledged that the Lord's resolution was well founded, since they had the rolls themselves before them, and proof upon oath. That by the words of the act, the Auditor was to transmit the imprest rolls to the Remembrancer half yearly, according to the usual course of the Exchequer, within eight months and four months. That it was not his duty to transmit them immediately to the Remembrancer, because he was to send them to the Clerk of the Rolls, who was to examine and sign them. That it could not be imagined the Auditor should be tied to a certain time to transmit the rolls to the Remembrancer, because they were first to pass through another hand: and he never took it, there was any occasion to put down the time he examined them, for that would appear from the time of the delivery, and date of the roll. That there was one examined by the Clerk of the Rolls the fourth of July, and not delivered 'till the 23d of January, which he did not take to be the Auditor's fault, but to be the duty of the Pells to deliver them. That every body knew the great trouble that had been given in his as well as other offices by the Commissioners of accounts; and that no less had happened by not transmitting those rolls, no process having been issued forth for many years upon them. The answer made by the managers for the Commons was judged so unsatisfactory, that the generality of the people appeared to be against this prosecution, and the Attorney-General received orders to drop it (17).

[Q] Answer to B—'s speech. Mr Bromley, amongst other reasons for the bill, had urged, That the Sacramental Test was appointed by the wisdom of the legislature, to preserve the Established Church, which Church seems, says he, in as much danger from the Dissenters now, as it was from the Papists then. To this our author replies, That every body knew the circumstances our affairs were in at the time when this Test-Act was made. We had a Sovereign upon the throne, who was suspected to have a very strong inclination towards Popery; and who, if the proofs published after his death by authority may be believed, was then actually a Papist. His brother, who had then the greatest share in the administration, and who had the fleet and army in his own hands, was a professed one. The Lord Treasurer, who had the disposal of all the publick money was a Papist. The persons employed in publick trusts, were such as were likely to pursue the methods prescribed them by these. Secret treaties were made with the French King, great sums of money received from him, and his Ambassador was at the head of our affairs in England. In fine, there appeared upon all occasions an evident disposition at Court to introduce Popery, and destroy the liberty of the subject; and there was a potent Prince ready at all times to engage in any enterprize against the Protestant Religion, and civil rights of Europe. But is there any danger, continues he, like this, from the Dissenters at present? Has ever the most malicious enemy but once suspected her Majesty of any designs against the Church of England? Is there any man employed in any offices under her, who has ever been said to be a Dissenter? Have the Dissenters shewn any inclination to invade the Church? Are they not firmly united with her in the same common interest? Or if they were not, have they any foreign Prince either willing or able to support them in any attempt against her? The influence this opinion of the Church's danger had upon Mr Montague's fortune, appears in the next remark.

[R] An enquiry into the danger of the Church. In answer to this motion, the 6th of December following was appointed for this enquiry, when the Queen being in the House, the Earl of Rochester opened the debate, wherein, after a proper preface of regard to the Queen's presence, he observed, that the fear of the Church's danger arose from three causes: 1. The act of security of Scotland. 2. The heir of the house of Hanover not being sent for over. 3. The not passing the occasional bill. Upon the first, he said the Presbyterian Church in Scotland was established without a toleration for the Episcopalians. That to asm these people was to give them a power to invade England; where they had a powerful party for their friends, who never wanted will to destroy the Church. 2. That he thought the heir to the crown ought to be present among us, in order to be fully acquainted with us and our constitution, and thereby be enabled to prevent any evil designs upon the Church and State. And, 3. That the occasional bill was in itself so reasonable, and the Church's request in it so small, that the industry in opposing it gave the greater grounds for suspicion. When he had ended, the House sat still and was silent a quarter of an hour, expecting some body would second him, but no body else speaking on that side, the Lord Halifax stood up and said: That he having moved for that day's debate, it might be expected he should speak to it: he therefore told the House, that the act of security in Scotland was only a national thing, wholly foreign to Church affairs, that it was passed only to prevent immediate war, which the Scots seemed to have resolved on; and, That if that should happen, England, however, was well able to defend itself as it had done in former times (18); but that at present there was no reason for fearing an amicable issue of that difference. [X]. As to the house of Hanover, he said, that was a danger but of eight days standing, for he durst say, a fortnight ago, no body made the absence of the Princess Sophia a danger to the Church. And as for her absence upon the Queen's death, that was now so well provided for by drefs of both Houses to her Majesty, declaring all those enemies to the State, who suggested the Church to be then in any danger (cc). In 1706 he first moved for appointing Commissioners to treat of the union with Scotland, and was himself appointed one of the Commissioners for that treaty (dd), wherein he first projected the equivalent [S], without which, that incorporation of the two kingdoms had apparently never been accomplished; and as soon as the act for the naturalization of the House of Hanover, and the better securing the Crown in the Protestant line was passed, his Lordship was pitched upon to carry it (ee), together with the ensigns of the Order of the Garter, to the Electoral Prince [T]. In 1707, he obtained a decree in the House of Lords confirming his right to the Auditor's place against the claim of the Marquis of Caermarthen (ff). In 1709, he gave his vote for the sentence which passed upon Dr Henry Sacheverel (gg), and the following year he wrote Seasonable Questions concerning a new Parliament [U]. His Lordship now saw himself by the acts for Lords Justices, that he thought no evil could possibly happen to the Church before her arrival. That he wondered the house of Hanover should be now esteemed such a security to the Church, whereas, when the laws were made for the security of that succession, it was generally reckoned a hardship upon the Church; and a clergyman in company of a Convo- cation man, had openly called her an unbaptized Lutheran: the truth of which he could prove. As to the occasional bill, that, he said, was much the same as before, only he added, that soon after the accession of King William to the crown, the cry of the Church's danger began, and was continued all his reign, but on what grounds, he could not know. That upon her Majesty's happy accession the complaint had no vent given to it for some time; but that when she was pleased to make some alterations, it was immediately revived, grew clamorous, and had ever since continued so: he concluded, that the Church was then in no manner of danger (19). After this, the debate was continued a long time, and was closed at last by his Lordship, with a very high encomium upon the present Ministry (20). As the attempt to bring over the next heir to the crown was particularly disagreeable to her Majesty, this Lord's opposing it in her presence opened the door through which he entered into her favour: but we shall see in the sequel, that this door being afterwards opened too wide, made a passage, through which he was thrust out of favour again.

[S] He projected the equivalent. This was the 15th article of the Union, by which it was agreed, that 398085 l. should be paid to the Scots nation as an equivalent for the revenues of their country. It being observed by the Earl of Nottingham, that this article consisted of two parts, viz. a certain grant of money, and the application thereof. In reference to the said article, it was highly unreasonable that the Scotch, who were by the treaty let into all the branches of our trade, and paid so little toward the support of the Government, and of an expensive war, should moreover have an equivalent of 398085 l. given them for coming into the treaty. He insisted much upon this argument, and took notice, that as to the disposal of that equivalent, the part of it which was to be given to the Darien Company might be swallowed up by a few persons, without any particular regard to the indemnifying every private trader in that unhappy enterprise. To this Lord Halifax answered, that the equivalent could not be looked upon as a gift, but as an equal purchase of the Scotch revenue and customs, which by this union were to be applied to the payment of the debts of England, and that they were no more gainers by it, than we were here by the sale of annuities of 15 or 16 years purchase; that as to the disposal of the money, it being their own, it was but reasonable, they should have the liberty of applying the same as they thought most convenient, the English commissioners being no ways concerned therein, whose care, nevertheless, and great prudence, had been such, that they made provision it should not be disposed of, but by certain commissioners, who should be accountable to the Parliament of Great-Britain for the same (21). Notwithstanding these pretences, it is well known, nor could his Lordship be ignorant of it, that this money was distributed according to the design of giving it among the leading men of the Scottish nation, as an equivalent for the power and interest employed upon their countrymen. It cannot escape notice, that the sum is within a trifle of 400000 l. for which that nation sold formerly King Charles the First to his murderers.

[T] He carried the bill to the Elector of Hanover.]

We have the following account of his reception at that court. His Lordship being arrived in the Elector's territories, was welcomed at Diepenau, a town upon the frontiers, by the Governors of the place, and afterwards splendidly treated by his Highness's officers, who had been sent thither for that purpose. The next day his Lordship was met by Sir Rowland Gwin, Chamberlain to the Electress Dowager, with a compliment from his mistress, and found a very splendid entertainment prepared for him by the Elector's officers. His Lordship arrived late in the evening at Hanover, and was conducted to a palace magnificently fitted up for his reception, after which Baron Grote, the late Envoy to Sweden, and Mr Schutz, son to the Elector's Envoy in England, acquainted him with their appointment to attend his Lordship, and do the honours of their master's house and table during his stay at that court. On the day following he had his audience with the usual ceremonies, excepting only that the Elector had ordered six coaches instead of three (the usual number) to attend upon him, and the drum of the court to beat as his Lordship passed by. Baron Gurits, President of the Chamber and Grand Marshal, received his Lordship at the head of the stairs, and thence conducted him to the several apartments of the Princess Sophia, the Elector, the Electoral Prince, and the Electoral Princess. There was an extraordinary appearance of nobility on this occasion, and tables prepared for the ladies that were invited to the solemnity. Dinner was served in the same manner as when a Prince dined with the Elector, the trumpets and kettle drums sounding at their going to table; and after dinner his Lordship had his audience of the Princess and Duke Ernest the Elector's brother. Two of the Elector's pages and four coaches were appointed to wait on his Lordship, and a party of foot guards to attend constantly before his house. Not many days after the investiture of the Electoral Prince with the ensigns of the Order of the Garter (22). The Prince Royal of Prussia (23), who was married to the Electoral Princess during the Lord Halifax's residence at the court, set out with his Lordship for the Confederate Army. From the army he went to the Hague, and thence returned home (24).

[U] Queries concerning a new Parliament.] This paper was the last struggle of our minister and his party, to retrieve the absolute loss of their departing power; and to that end, it was calculated to raise such a general clamour among the people (the majority of whom they still believed to be on their side) as should intimidate their antagonists from attempting a dissolution of the Parliament. The queries, therefore, set forth the ability, integrity, and popularity, of the declining Ministry, contrasting those with the contrary qualities in the rising one, which not safely admitting of a direct charge, it was necessary (and at the same time, conveyed a stronger confidence in the implied truth of it) to suggest and insinuate in the form of queries. These are branched out in an even dozen, of which, the three following point out the true cause of the Junto's defeat (25). 7. Whether the permitting Dr Sacheverell to ride in triumph from place to place, being convicted by the High Court of Parliament, be not the greatest indignity that ever was, or can be, acted against the State. 8. Whether those persons that have aided and abetted the doctor in his progress, may not justly be accounted enemies to her Majesty and her government, tending only to raise commotions in the kingdom. 9. Whether it mayn't be an encouragement to the French King to throw in the Pretender upon you in the time of chusing himself again out of the royal favour; however, he found means to defeat an attempt made by the succeeding Ministry to resume all King William's grants, and therein his own, of Crown lands, &c. (bb). During the rest of this reign he strenuously opposed the terms of the peace of Utrecht †, and struggled upon all occasions to support the honour and interest of the Duke of Marlborough [W]. He appeared also warm for securing the Hanover succession, which he conceived to be in some danger [X]; and in 1714 projected a scheme, which succeeded, for procuring a writ to call the Electoral Prince of Hanover, as Duke of Cambridge, to the House of Peers [Y]. In consequence of this conduct, upon the decease of the Queen, he found himself appointed one of the Regency during her successor's absence from his kingdoms, and as soon as his Majesty King George the First had taken possession of his throne, he was created Earl of Halifax, and installed Knight of the Garter, and a second time appointed First Commissioner of the Treasury, having obtained a grant of the reversion of the Auditor's place for his nephew George Montague, Esq; (ii). But he enjoyed these accumulated honours a very short time, for while he appeared to be in a very vigorous state of health, he was taken suddenly ill on the chasing a new Parliament, and who are most likely to come to his assistance, the moderate Church men and Dissenters, who acknowledge and will stand by her Majesty's Parliamentary right, or the High-flyers and Sacheverelites, who will own no other but what is hereditary? It is observable, that there is not a word of the Church's danger in these queries, though his Lordship could not but know that cry was the great engine by which this change in the Ministry was effected. But the truth is, the extraordinary heat shewn in prosecuting Dr Sacheverell, had given the engine too much force to be meddled with. 'Tis certain Lord Halifax said little in that trial besides what related to Parliamentary forms, and seconded the motion for a much milder punishment, than had been proposed by his friend the Earl of Wharton: being one of those that presently foresaw they should roast the parson at a fire so hot as to burn their own fingers (26).

[W] Struggled to support the Duke of Marlborough's honour.] After the House of Lords had voted and returned thanks to the Earl of Peterborough (27), maugre all the opposition to it by the rest of the Duke of Marlborough's friends, as well as our fallen Minister (28). The very next day there was published by his Lordship's encouragement, in the form of an epistle to the Earl of Galway, containing a laboured panegyric upon that Earl's conduct, who had lost the battle of Almanza. It concludes with the following lines pointed against the Earl of Peterborough.

Homer, who best of poets understood,
To temper heroes, or to form a god;
Makes bold rash heat to cooler conduct yield,
And hotspur Mars to Pallas quit the field.

[X] Warm for securing the Protestant Succession.] As the Scots were known to be no friends to the Church of England, in order to mortify them, the Tory Ministry in 1713, had inserted a clause in the malt bill for laying that tax equally upon both kingdoms. This so incensed the Scots, that they moved to bring in a bill for dissolving the Union, as not having those good effects that were expected from it, one of which was securing the Protestant Succession in the House of Hanover: Lord Halifax seconded this motion. When the Earl of Peterborough urged the impossibility of dissolving the Union, and among other things said, that he had heard the Union compared to a marriage: That according to that notion, since it was made it could not be broke, being made by the greatest power upon earth: That though sometimes there happened a difference between man and wife, yet it did not presently break the marriage. So, in like manner, though England, who in this national marriage must be supposed the husband, might in some instances be unkind to the Lady, yet she ought not presently to sue for a divorce, the rather, because she had very much mended her fortune by the match. Adding, that the Union was a contract, than which nothing could be more binding. To this Lord Halifax replied, that if the Union had the same sanction as marriage, which was an ordinance of God, he should be for observing it as religiously as that, but that he thought there was a great difference; when Lord Peterborough returned for answer, that he could not tell how it could be more solemn than it was, except it was expected, that it should have come down from heaven like the ten commandments; concluding that the Scots were a people, that could never be satisfied; that would have all the advantage of being united to England, without the inconveniencies; that they would pay no taxes at all by their good will; and that some of them had more money from England, than all their estates amounted to in their own country (29). This being pointed at the Duke of Argyle because of his great places, was let go by Lord Halifax, who observed the opposition constantly made by that Duke, to the reputation of the Duke of Marlborough; and when one of the Scotch Peers urged the danger that England would be in from the Pretender, should the Union be dissolved, the Lord Halifax answered, He could not tell what England had to fear from that or any other incident; and that the Queen, Lords, and Commons, if all in one interest, need to fear no enemies in the world, but ought to despise the Pretender and all his abettors (30).

[Y] He projected a scheme for bringing the Electoral Prince of Hanover to England.] This expedient was hatched at Lord Halifax's house, in the following manner: Baron Schutz made a visit to Lord Chancellor Harcourt, and among other civilities acknowledged the affection his Lordship had shewn on several occasions to the most serene Electoral house of Brunswick. Lord Chancellor told him, he was extremely sensible of the honour and justice he did him by this visit and compliment, and desired him to assure the Elector his master, of his entire devotion to his service; hoping that his Electoral Highness gave no credit to the false reports that were industriously spread abroad, in order to give him jealousies of her Majesty's Ministers. The Baron answered, he would not fail of discharging so agreeable a commission; but added, he had a favour to ask the Lord Chancellor in the name of the Electoral Prince, viz. That his Lordship would be pleased to make out a writ for his Highness's sitting in the House of Peers, as Duke of Cambridge. To which Lord Chancellor, as is probable, in no small surprize, answered, That it was not usual to make out writs for Peers that were out of the kingdom; however, he would forthwith apply to her Majesty for directions in that case. The Baron replied, he did not doubt but his Lordship knew, and would perform the duties of his office; and that as to the difficulty of the Duke of Cambridge's being out of the kingdom, he might assure himself, that his Highness, the Electoral Prince, had resolved to come over very speedily, and perhaps might be landed before the writ was made out. After which, the Baron taking his leave, was desired by the Lord Chancellor, to remember, he did not refuse his demand, but only thought it proper to acquaint her Majesty with it; which he would do immediately. To this the Baron said, he desired his Lordship likewise to remember, that he had applied to him for the Duke of Cambridge's writ. The Lord Chancellor the same evening acquainted her Majesty with all that had passed; whereupon a Council was immediately called, which sitting from nine to eleven at night, it was resolved, that a writ should be made out for his Highness, as requested: But Baron Schutz within five days was forbid the Court. As the Queen's mind in this point was well known, this proceeding cannot be cleared from the imputation of rudeness, not to say insult, in our statesman to his Sovereign; all we can say, is, that it was almost the only instance wherein the heat of party made him forget his good nature (31).

(29) Dean Swift at this time published a pamphlet, wherein he said, he could point out some with great titles, who affected to appear very vigorous for dissolving the Union, though their whole revenues before that period would have ill maintained a Welsh Justice of the Peace, and had since gathered more money than ever any Scotchman who had not travelled could form an idea of. 15th of May, 1715; at the house of Mynheer Davenvoord, one of the Dutch Ambassadors; and his distemper increasing with great violence, put a period to his life the 19th of the same month. During his short illness he was attended by Dr Shadwell, principal Physician to the King, and Dr Seigerthal, his Majesty's German Physician, who consulting also with Sir Richard Blackmore and Dr Mead, agreed all in their opinion, that his disorder was a pleurisy †: but upon opening his body, it was found to be an inflammation of the lungs. On the 26th, his corps was conducted from the Jerusalem-Chamber, and interred in General Monk's vault in Henry VIIIth's Chapel adjoining to Westminster-Abbey, pursuant to his own request (kk), where a handsome plain monument is erected, with an inscription in Latin to his Memory (ll). As he was not only possessed of a great share of polite and useful learning himself, but likewise a general Mæcenas of it in others (mm), so we find many eulogiums of him in dedications, &c. as by Sir Richard Steel †, Mr Tickell [Z], and others; and the genius of his muse was particularly described by Mr Addison [AA]. His singular merit as a statesman; deserved a place in these memoirs, and as much justice has been done to it as the plan of them would admit. At the same time it must not be dissembled that he has not escaped censure, for playing the courtier too much to King William (nn); especially in two points: first, by his endeavours to bring the House of Commons into that King's measures for keeping on foot more standing forces after the conclusion of the peace of Ryſwick, than the stated establishment; and secondly, for the interest he made among them for the continuance of his Majesty's Dutch blue-guards. Upon the whole, the most amiable quality in his composition, I own, to me, is, that true English good-nature, which was a continual source of general benevolence and kindnesses to all that had the least claim to it, and which at the same time, led him to dislike, and generally prevailed with him to oppose*, all violent measures on each side. After the death of his Lady, which happened many years before his own, he continued single, being disappointed in his views of a second marriage to a Lady of great birth and fortune [BB]; which perhaps was less regretted, as he had some time before cast his eye upon a niece of his friend Sir Isaac Newton, to be superintendent of his domestic affairs (oo). This gentlewoman at that time was widow of one Colonel Barton, and was then a celebrated toast, being young, beautiful, and gay [CC], so that she did not escape censure, which was, however, passed upon her very undeservedly, since we are well assured she was a woman of strict honour and virtue. 'Tis certain she was very agreeable to his Lordship in every particular, in testimony of [Z] His character by Tickell. The cause of Liberty, says this gentleman, will receive no small advantage in future times, when it shall be observed, that the Earl of Halifax was one of the patriots who were at the head of it; and that most of those who were eminent in the several parts of polite and useful learning, were by his influence and example engaged in the same interest (32).

[AA] As also by Mr Addison. It is in his account of the greatest English Poets, where he makes the following remark:

How negligently graceful he unreins
His verse, and writes in loose familiar strains.

Where the client only re echoes what the patron had fung himself.

I know my compass, and my muse's size,
She loves to sport and play, but dares not rise;
Idly affects in this familiar way,
In easy numbers loosely to convey,
What mutual friendship would at distance say.

[BB] Disappointed in a second marriage. The writer of his Lordship's life tells us, that after the loss of his lady, he resolved to live single. This seemed a little unaccountable, as by that loss he was left without issue, and (notwithstanding his attachment to Widow Barton) there is reason to believe is indeed no better than a mistake, yet not unpardonable; since the defeat he met with in attempting a second match, might probably dispose him to keep the attempt a secret. And so it remained, 'till lately the affair came to be made publick in some letters of his rival the Earl of Shaftesbury. This Lord having determined to make his addressee to a certain Nobleman's daughter, upon the recommendation of Lord Moleſworth, who was a relation to the lady's family, held a correspondence upon the occasion with that Lord, to whom he opened himself freely; and, having particularly begged his kindness in promoting the treaty, proceeds thus: 'If the person talked of be really my rival, and in favour with the father, I must own my case is desperate; not only because I truly think him, as the world goes, likely enough to make a good (at least a civil) husband; but because, as my aim is not fortune, and his is, he being an old friend too, I should unwillingly stand between him and an estate; which his liberality has hitherto hindered him from gaining, as great as his advantages have been hitherto in the government. By what I have said, I believe you may guess, who my supposed rival is (33): or if you want further hint, 'tis one of the chief of the Junto, an old friend of your's and mine, whom we long sat with in the House of Commons (not often voted with) but who was afterwards taken up to a higher house; and is as much noted for wit and gallantry, and magnificence, as for his eloquence and courtier's character. But whether this be so suited to this meek good lady's happiness, I know not. Fear of partiality and self-love makes me not dare determine; but rather mistrust myself, and turn the balance against me. Pray keep this secret, for I got it by chance: and if there be any thing in it, 'tis a great secret between the two Lords themselves. But sometimes I fancy I hit a nail, which will hardly go, tho' I am pretty certain it has been aimed at, by this old acquaintance of ours, ever since a disappointment happened from a great Lord beyond sea, who was to have had the lady (34)'

And I strictly charge and command my executor, to give all aid, help, and assistance to her in possessing and enjoying what I have hereby given her; and also in doing any act or acts necessary to transfer to her an annuity of two hundred pounds per annum, purchased in Sir Isaac Newton’s name, which I hold for her in trust, as appears by a declaration of trust in that behalf. Halifax. Feb. 1. 1712 (pp).’ He also made afterwards another codicil to secure the performance of this [DD]. His Lordship’s residuary legatee and sole executor mentioned in this codicil, was his nephew George Montague of Horton, Esq; son to his eldest brother Edward, and then Member of Parliament for Northampton; who by the patent succeeded his uncle likewise in the Barony, and was afterwards created also Earl of Halifax, being father to the present Earl, who has merited so much by the signal service he has done his country in promoting the establishment of the new colony of Nova-Scotia, the present flourishing condition of which is originally owing entirely to his Lordship’s generosity and indefatigable attention to it’s welfare.

(PP) Copy of the last Will and Testament of Charles Lord Halifax, subjoined to his Life, p. v. vi.

[DD] He also made another codicil to secure the performance thereof.] Two days after the date of his will, he added the following codicil: ‘By virtue, and in pursuance of the power reserved in my last will and testament of the 10th of April, one thousand seven hundred and six, I do by this codicil to my said will, give and bequeath to Mrs Catherine Barton, all the jewels I have at the time of my death; and likewise three thousand pounds, as a small token of the great love and affection I have long had for her.—Signed and sealed by me this twelfth day of April, Anno Domini one thousand seven hundred and six.’ After the adding of that in the text above, he cancelled this in a third codicil dated August 30th, 1713; and took that opportunity of confirming the other, as follows: ‘In case there be no dispute upon the codicil of the first of February 1712, which I enjoin my executor not to make, I do by these presents revoke and make void this codicil of the 12th of April 1706. MORE [Sir THOMAS], Lord High Chancellor of England, was descended of a genteel family (a), and born in the year 1480, in Milk-street London, not without some presages both before and after his birth of the great man he afterwards proved [A]. He was the only son of Sir John More, Knt. one of the Judges of the King’s Bench (b); who put him first to school at St Anthony’s in Thread-needle-street, under the care of Nicholas Holt, an eminent schoolmaster (c). He made a very quick progress through Grammar learning, after which his father, for his further improvement, procured him a reception into the house of Cardinal Moreton [B]. Our young scholar soon drew the

[A] Some presages of the great man.] His mother (1), the next night after her marriage, had the following vision. She saw in her sleep, as it were, engraven on her wedding-ring, the number and favour of all the children she was to have; whereof, the face of one was so dark and obscure, that she could not well discern it, but the face of another she beheld shining most gloriously. Accordingly, it is observed, that she had one miscarriage, and this shining boy, the subject of our present article. Again, shortly after his birth, his nurse riding with him through a water, the horse happened to step aside into a deep place: she, in order to save the infant from drowning, in her fright, threw it over a hedge into the next field: when the came, after her own escape, to take him up, she found the babe sweetly smiling upon her, having received no manner of hurt in the fall (2). How idle soever it may justly appear to persons unconcerned, to convert such events as these into omens, yet what mother is there that is not disposed to indulge such fondnesses. ’Tis a pardonable, and I had almost said, an amiable weakness in itself, and therefore the craft of making it a handle to impose the grossest superstition is the more detestable. Hæ tibi Roma fænt artes.

[B] Taken into the house of Cardinal Moreton.] This was a favour not ordinarily granted to any but noblemens sons, or gentlemen of the best families, and is a strong testimony of Sir John More’s worth and merit. ’Tis a method of education much practised in that age, and no doubt was of excellent use: it seems to be copied from the Romans. We find Cicero, after he had gone through his school-learning, was bred in the same manner with Scævola, and he informs us of the great advantage he reaped by it. Ego a Patre ita eram deductus ad Scævolum sumpta virili toga, ut quoad passem, & liceret, a senis latere nunquam discederem. Itaque multa ab eo prudenter disputata, multa etiam breviter & commode dicta memoriæ mandabam, ferique studebam ejus prudentia doctior, quo mortuo me ad Pontificem Scævolum contuli quem unum nostræ civitatis & ingenio & justitia præstantissimum audeo discere (3). At fourteen years of age, I was introduced by my father to Scævola, with orders to attend the old man as closely as possible; so that I treasured up in my memory many of his discourses, and short and apposite remarks, studying to improve by his prudence and knowledge: and after his death, I betook myself to Scævola the Pontifex who, I am bold to pronounce the regards of this new patron upon him; his Eminency was greatly pleased in observing the youth's genius to literature, together with his ready wit and ingenuous modesty (d) [C]: therefore, with his father's concurrence, he sent him to Canterbury-college in Oxford about the year 1497 (e) [D]. There he had the advantage of hearing the lectures of Lynacre and Grocinus [E] upon the Latin and Greek languages; and it was not long before he gave some excellent specimens of a masterly skill in both, as well as in Oratory [F]. After two years spent in these, wherein he also made a great proficiency in the academical studies [G], as Rhetorick, Logick, and Philosophy, he was removed from the university to New-Inn at London, in order to study the Law, being then about the age of eighteen (f). Having passed a proper time in this nursery of the Chancery, he was placed in Lincoln's-Inn, of which society his father was a member (g). Here he prosecuted his studies 'till he became an Utter Barrister. In the mean time, when he was about twenty years of age, he began to use a monkish discipline upon himself [H]. At the age of twenty-one he was a Burgess in Parliament (b), and distinguished himself remarkably in the House of Commons in 1503, upon the motion for granting a subsidy and three fifteenths for the marriage of King Henry the Seventh's eldest daughter, Margaret, to the King of Scots (i). Mr More opposed this, as an exorbitant demand, with such strength of reasoning, that the motion was rejected. As soon as the vote had passed, Mr Tyler, one of the King's Privy-Council, went presently from the House, and told his Majesty, that a beardless boy had overthrown all his purpose. The King repented the matter so highly, that he would not be satisfied 'till he had some way revenged it; and since the son who had nothing could lose nothing, the King devised a causeless quarrel against the father, and sending him to the Tower, he kept him there 'till he had forced a fine from him of 100 pounds for his pretended offence. It happened soon after, that our author coming in a suit to Dr Richard Fox, Bishop of Winchester, one of the King's Privy-Council, the Bishop called him aside, and pretending great favour to him, promised, that if he would be ruled by him, he would not fail to restore him to the King's favour; intending, as it was afterwards conjectured, to draw him into a confession of his offence against the King, that so his Majesty might, with the better colour, have occasion to revenge his displeasure against him. But Mr More going from the Bishop, fell into discourse with Mr Whiteford (k), his familiar friend, then Chaplain to the Bishop, and afterwards a Monk of Sion; to him he related what the Bishop had proposed, desiring his advice. Mr Whiteford counselled him not to listen to the Bishop's motion; For, says he, my Lord and Master, to serve the King's turn, will not stick to consent to his own father's death. Whereupon, our author

the most ingenious and virtuous person in our city. In like manner Sir Thomas More has recorded the benefits he received from the Cardinal. Multum debui R. P. Jo. Moretono Cant. Archiep Cardinali ac tum quoque Angliæ Cancellario, viro non auctoritate magis quam prudentia & virtute incomparabili, &c. (4). I am much indebted [as to my education] to Cardinal Moreton, an incomparable person, and not more so by the height of his station and authority, than by his prudence and virtue, &c.

[C] Pleased with his modesty and wit. 'Tis said he came to the Cardinal very young, and yet in the Christmases holy days, while the players were acting there, he would sometimes suddenly step in among them, and without studying at all for the matter, make a part presently of his own, by which he gave the audience more diversion than all the players beside: Infomuch, that the Cardinal, much delighted with his wit and towardliness, would often say to the Nobles at dinner with him, This child here waiting at table, whosoever shall live to see it, will prove a marvellous man *.

[D] Admitted of Canterbury-college. A great part of this edifice was standing 'till lately, though upon the building of Christ Church by Cardinal Wolley, the old small college was taken in as a part of the royal and ample foundation (5), under the name of Canterbury Quadrangle. It seems not improbable, that notwithstanding our author's admission in this college, he resided in a chamber at St Mary Hall, as Mr Wood asserts; it being customary then, and even of late frequently practised, for the students, both of Christ-Church, and Oriel-College, to have chambers, and follow their studies at St Mary-Hall, which lies contiguous to both (6).

[E] Linacre and Grocinus. Our author improved himself greatly by these lectures, and, 'tis said, had Aristotle's works translated by the latter into Greek (7). He kept an acquaintance with them both after he left Oxford, as appears from a letter of his to Dean Colet, who was then absent from London. 'In the mean time, [during your absence] says he, I pass my time with Grocinus, Linacre, and Lilly. The first being, as you know, the director of my (8) life, in your absence; the second, the master of my studies; the third, my most deare companion (9).' Notwithstanding this declaration, he was then, as he expressly writes, actually entered upon the practice of the Law.

[F] Specimens of his skill in both languages] He wrote many of his epigrams about the age of eighteen (10): he also composed several verses upon the vanity of life, which were set up by his father, with pictures and pageants about them, in his house. It was at this time also, that he translated, by way of exercise, Lucian's Oration de tyrannicida, which he calls his first fruits of the Greek tongue, and thereto he added another oration of his own, in answer to that of Lucian, wherein he opposeth Lucian's arguments for killing a tyrant, with others of equal force against that position. This is thought by his great-grandson to be not at all inferior to that of the witty Greek's, either in point of invention or elocution (11).

[G] He made great proficiency in the academical studies.] In order to oblige him to mind his book, his father kept him at a very short allowance, not suffering him scarcely to have money enough in his own custody to pay for mending his cloaths; even no more than necessity required, and of this too, he exacted a particular account. However, this course of his father was often mentioned and commended by his son when he came to riper years, who affirmed, that by this means he was curbed from all vice, and withheld from many idle expences, either of gaming or keeping bad company †.

[H] He began to use a monkish discipline.] For instance, he used often to wear a sharp shirt of hair next to his skin, which he never after left entirely off; no not when he was Lord Chancellor, which my grandmother (12), says Mr More, spying once in the heat of summer, laughed at, not being much sensible of such spiritual exercises. Our young devotee added also to this austerly, a discipline every Friday and high fasting days, he used much fasting and watching, and lying often either upon the bare ground, or upon some bench, laying a log under his head, allowing himself but four or five hours in a night at the most for sleep; and about this time it was, that he chose Dr Colet already mentioned for his ghostly father (13).

author returned no more to the Bishop (l), and, to avoid a worse consequence, had some thoughts of going beyond-sea. In that design he studied the French tongue, sometimes refreshing himself with his viol, on which he performed very well. He also made himself master of most of the liberal sciences, as Musick, Arithmetick (m), Geometry, and Astronomy, and grew to be a perfect Historian (n). But meeting with no further disturbance in that reign, he did not leave England; and, as soon as he put on the Bar-gown, he read a publick lecture in the church of St Lawrence Old-Jewry *, upon St Austins's treatise De Civitate Dei with great applause [I]. He was then appointed Law-Reader at Furnival's-Inn, which place he held above three years (o), and afterwards he took lodgings near the Charterhouse, and went through all the spiritual exercises of that society with the most religious devotion, but without engaging in a vow (p). For though he had once a strong inclination to take the order of the Franciscans, as well as the Priesthood (q), yet he was diverted from both [K]. And though his aptness for eloquence seemed much to disagree with the serious studies of the Common-Law, so that few could suppose such a wit would have had the patience to have taken a law-book in hand; yet such was his obedience to his father, that he studied the Law diligently at his command (r): for whom he had so great a reverence, that in all his life he never offended or contradicted him in any the least word or action. Therefore, after four years spent in these austerities, by the advice of Dr Colet, Dean of St Paul's, he engaged in a marriage with Jane, the eldest daughter of John Colt of New-Hall in Essex (L); and settling his wife and family at Bucklersbury, he attended the business of his profession at his chambers in Lincoln's-Inn (s), where he continued 'till he was called to the Bench, and had read there twice [M]. In the mean time he was appointed, in 1508, Judge of the Sheriff's Court (t) in the city of London [N]: about the same time was made a Justice of the Peace [O], and became so eminent in the practice of the Law, that there was scarcely a cause of any importance tried at the Bar in which he was not retained [P]. Yet he found leisure to exercise his

[I] He read a publick lecture in the church of St Lawrence, &c. In these lectures he did not discuss any points of divinity, so much as explain the precepts of moral philosophy, and clear up some difficulties in history. This treatise of St Austin is written chiefly upon these subjects. He performed the undertaking with such an excellent grace; that whereas before all the flower of the English youth went to hear the famous Grocine, who was lately come from learning Greek in Italy to teach it at home: now almost all left his lectures, and flocked to hear Mr More (14); and Grocine himself also became one of his auditors (15).

[K] He was diverted from both. His grandson observes, that it was most agreeable to the severity of his virtue, to profess and take orders, and that in the latter of these purposes he was joined by his friend Lilly the Grammarian. The same author attributes the changing his mind with regard to a monkish life, to his observing the great degeneracy of the Religieux at that time, from their ancient strictness (16): a reason so very unsatisfactory, that it seems to be made for him; but he suggests a much better reason for his declining both these orders, viz. the difficulties he found after all the discipline (17) he used, to preserve his chastity, for which reason he followed the advice of his ghostly father in taking a wife (18).

[L] He married a daughter of Mr Colt. Mr Colt being a gentleman of a pleasant and merry disposition took great delight in our author's company, and inviting him to New-Hall, there made the profer of any of his daughters. They were all agreeable, both in temper and person. Mr More inclined to the second, which he thought the handsomest, but did not declare himself immediately, and upon second thoughts, considering that it might be a grief, and some reflection on the eldest, to see her younger sister preferred to herself, he therefore by kindness and compassion settled his affections upon the eldest, and married her soon after (20). 'Tis said, that after he determined to marry, he proposed to himself for a pattern John Picus, Earl of Mirandula, whose life he translated, and many of his letters, as also, his Twelve Precepts of a good Life. To the same end he wrote a treatise of the Four last Things, but left it imperfect, being called by his father to other studies (21).

[M] He had read twice at Lincoln's-Inn. This was a very honourable post at that time; some of these readings are quoted by Lord Coke, as uncontested authorities in the law. Dr Stapleton mentions it as a particular honour to Sir Thomas's extraordinary merit, that he read twice (22); and Mr Roper observes, that it was as often as any judge of the law did ordinarily read (23). 'Tis certain, this was reckoned, as Stapleton observes, a very honourable exercise, and performed only by seniors, and such as were the most learned in the law, others compounding for it with a handsome sum of money; the money is still paid for a dispensation, with this rule, but the custom of reading is intirely dropt.

[N] Judge of the Sheriff's Court. So Dr Stapleton (24) and Mr More (25), from the words and authority cited in the text; yet Mr More's editor scruples not to censure this as a mistake in that writer, as well as in Stapleton, from whom he supposes Mr More borrowed it (26); since Mr Roper makes Sir Thomas no more than one of the Under-Sheriffs (27). But no doubt Mr Roper's authority must give way to that of Sir Thomas himself cited above: Perhaps the Under-Sheriffs in those days, might perform the judicial, as well as the executive, part of the Sheriff's office. 'Tis worth notice, that Mr Lewis, without explicitly controverting Mr Roper's words, has given two passages, one from the Utopia (28), and another from Erasmus (29); which expressly mention his hearing and determining causes in the quality of a Judge: and these probably gave rise to a report after his death, that he was some time Recorder of the city of London, for which Mr More, however, thinks there was no good foundation (30).

[O] He was a Justice of the Peace. For this we have the authority of Mr Hodgesden, who having observed that he used to sit upon the bench at the sessions at Newgate in that station, tells us, that at one of these sessions he persuaded a cut-purse in Newgate, who was to be tried next day, to cut the purse of one of his brother justices while he was sitting on the bench; which being dextrously performed by the thief, even while upon his trial † for cutting purses. Our author thereupon rallying his brother, who had often chid the prosecutors for not being more careful of their purses, obtained the thief's pardon, according to his promise made to him, in order to encourage him to the fact (31). It may be observed, that the passage in the Utopia, cited in the precedent remark from Mr Lewis, seems more directly to point at this latter character, than to the Sheriff's Judge, as will be seen in remark [Q], where it is produced at length.

[P] There was scarce a cause of importance wherein he was not retained. Sir Thomas told his son Roper, that he earned by his business at this time, above four hundred pounds a year, with a good conscience (32), and this Mr More observes was a large gain in those days, when lawyers sped not so well as now [in Charles the First's time] they do; neither, continues he, were they then so plentiful (33). 'Tis not unlikely that the great improvement which Lord Coke had made in the study of the Law, might induce greater numbers to engage therein. But if we compare the value of money talents for polite literature, and in the height of this hurry of business he wrote his Utopia in 1516 [Q], and held a correspondence with the most learned men of that age, particularly Erasmus [R]. Before he entered into the immediate service of Henry the Eighth, he had been twice employed, with his Majesty's consent, at the suit of the English merchants, as their agent in some very considerable disputes between them and the merchants of the Steel-yard (u); and about the year 1516 he went to Flanders, in the retinue of Cuthbert Tonstal [S], Bishop of Durham, and Dr Knight, Commissioners for renewing the treaty of alliance between Henry the Eighth and Charles the Fifth, then only Archduke of Austria (w); when the King observing his address in adjusting those differences, ordered Cardinal Wolsey, then Prime Minister, to engage him in the service of the Court; in which view he was offered a pension [T]. But he excused himself at that time, and a few years after appeared in the Star-chamber, as an Advocate against the Crown [U]. The issue of this cause was a decree in favour of his client the Pope. But the abilities of the pleader displayed therein, evacuated every plea he could make against his own promotion. The King would hear of no further excuse, and, for want of a better vacan-

in Henry the Seventh's or the beginning of Henry the Eighth's reign to the present, which is six to one, Sir Thomas's gains will amount to upwards of two thousand four hundred pounds per ann. which perhaps is exceeded by very few of the profession at this day.

[Q] He wrote his Utopia amidst a hurry of business. This is happily described by himself, in his letter to his friend Peter Giles, prefixed to the Utopia, where he expresses himself as follows: Dum causas forenses assidue alias ago, alias audio, alias arbiter finio, alias judex dirimo, dum hic officii causa visitur, ille negotii, dum foris totum ferme diem aliis impartiior, reliquum meis relinquo mihi, hoc est literis, nihil, &c. In English thus: Whilst I daily either plead other men's causes, or hear them, sometimes as an arbitrator, other while as a judge: whilst this man I visit for friendship, another for business; and whilst I am employed abroad about other mens matters all the whole day, I leave no time for myself, that is for study. For when I come home, I must discourse with my wife, chat with my children, speak with my servants; and seeing this must needs be done, I number it amongst my affairs, and needful they are, unless one will be a stranger in his own house: for we must endeavour to be affable and pleasing, to whom either nature, chance, or choice, hath made our companions; but with such measure it must be done, that we don't marre them with affability, or make them of servants our masters by too much gentle entreaty and favour. Whilst these things are doing, a day, a month, a year, passeth; when then can I find any time to write? for I have not yet spoken of the time that is spent in eating and sleeping, which things alone bereave most men of half their life. As for me, I get only that spare time which I steal from my meat and sleep; which, because it is but small, I proceed slowly; yet it being somewhat, I have now at length prevailed so much, as I have finished and sent unto you, Peter, my Utopia.—Our author feigns this country to be one of those then lately discovered in America, and the account of it to be given to him by one Hythlodius a Portuguese, who failed in company with Americus Vesputius the first discoverer of that quarter of the world. Many learned men were pleased with the description of the climate and manners of the people, and having no suspicion of the truth, out of a fervent zeal, wished that some divines might be sent thither to preach Christianity, and several were very desirous to take the voyage. Soon after it's publication it was translated into French, Italian, Dutch, and into English, both by our author himself, and several others, especially Bishop Burnet (34). In this book he declares his opinion in favour of Toleration, as he did also to Erasmus about this time. Before he had finished his Utopia, he began the History of Richard the Third (35), but it was never finished, and is esteemed none of the best of his pieces; however, it is inserted in the Complete History of England: Mr Wood observes, that he has therein described that King as being deformed, in which he has been followed by all the historians (36).

[R] Particularly Erasmus ] Amongst all the foreigners, Erasmus had in the first place his affections. After they had long held a correspondence by letters, Erasmus came to England on purpose to see his friend; upon which occasion it was contrived that they should meet at my Lord Mayor's table in London, before they were introduced to each other. At dinner, happening to fall into an argument, Erasmus feeling the peculiar sharpness of his antagonist's wit, broke out into this expression, not without some choler, Aut tu es Morus aut nullus; whereto Sir Thomas readily replied, Aut tu es Erasmus aut Diabolus *. Sir Thomas had here the advantage. But Erasmus, after his return home, paid this debt; when instead of returning a horse that had been lent to him by Sir Thomas for that journey, he carried it over to Holland, and sent his friend the following epigram.

Quod mihi dixisti
De corpore Christi,
Crede quod edas, & edis:
Sic tibi scribo
De tuo Palfrido,
Crede quod habeas & habes.

[S] He went to Flanders in the retinue of Cuthbert Tonstal. He was on some of these occasions at Bruges, when an arrogant fellow set up there a challenge, that he would answer any question that could be propounded to him: Upon which Sir Thomas put up this question: An averia capta in wibernamia sint irreflegibilia † adding, that there was one of the English Ambassador's retinue who was ready to dispute with him upon it. But the fellow not understanding the Law terms, was gravelled; and deservedly laugh't at †.

[T] Offered a pension. Mr Hoddesden tells us, that the Cardinal, according to the King's request, laboured earnestly to effect this, alledging, among other things, how dear his service must needs be to his Majesty, who could not with his honour allow him less, than he should yearly lose by changing his estate; but that he would rather enlarge his fortune and recompence him fully (37). However, being loth to change his condition, he prevailed with his Majesty by the Cardinal to forbear him: Our author himself relates the matter to Erasmus as follows, 'When I returned from embassy to Flanders, the King would have given me a yearly pension, which surely, if one would respect honour and profit, was not to be little esteemed. Yet have I hitherto refused it, and I think I shall refuse it still, because I should be forced to forsake my present means, which I have already in the city, and I esteem it more than a better; or else I must keep it with some dislike to the citizens, between whom and his Highness, if there should happen any controversy (as sometimes it doth chance) about their privileges, they might suspect me as not sincere and trusty unto them, in respect I am obliged to the King with an annual stipend (38).'

[U] He pleaded against the Crown. The case was this. A ship of the Pope's putting into the port of Southampton, was seized as a forfeiture to the King; but the Pope's Legate obtained of his Majesty to have the case argued in his own [the Legate's] presence, himself being an excellent Civilian. None of the lawyers were found so fit to be Counsel for the Legate, as Mr More, who could report to him in Latin the substance of the pleadings on each side. The cause was heard in the Star-Chamber, and our counsellor performed his part so well, that the ship was restored, with the highest applause of the pleader by all the Judges (39).

(34) The Bishop tells us he did it to improve himself in the English language; but besides, he has censured some passages as not consistent with moral virtue, particularly a community of goods. And, indeed, Sir Thomas himself, in his maturer age, retracted some things advanced in the Utopia.

cy, obliged him for the present to accept the place of Master of the Requests; within a month after which he was created a Knight, and taken into the Privy-Council (x) [W]; and, upon the death of Mr Weston the following year, 1520, he found himself raised to be Treasurer of the Exchequer by the same free and gracious bounty (y). Soon after this, he bought a house upon the river-side at Chelsey*, and settled his family there [X], having married a second wife (z). With all his excellent endowments for the publick scene of action, Sir Thomas was particularly formed for the sweets of a private life; and the King having once experienced this engaging part of his new favourite's character, grew (as was the temper of that prince) too impatiently eager of his conversation. The artful address which he made use of to give a check to the frequency of his sovereign's visits, when they became troublesome, is worth notice [Y]. But the almost unparalleled civil intrepidity which he shewed when he was Speaker of the House of Commons in 1523, in opposing an oppressive subsidy demanded by the Prime Minister with an unprecedented strain of authority, is yet more interesting [Z]. Nor, perhaps, will it be thought less remarkable, that

[W] He was made a Privy-Counsellor. Sir Thomas unbosomed himself to Bishop Fisher on this occasion, as follows: 'I am come to the Court extremely against my will, as every body knows, and as the King himself often twiteth me in sport for it; and hereto do I hang so unfeemly, as a man not using to ride doth sit unhandfomely in his saddle. But our Prince, whose special and extraordinary favour towards me, I know not how I ever shall be able to deserve, is so affable and courteous to all men, that every one who has never so little hope of himself, may find somewhat, whereby he may imagine, that he loveth him, even as the citizens wives of London do, who imagine that our Lady's picture near the Tower doth smile upon them, as they pray before it. But I am not so happy, that I can perceive such fortunate signs of deserving his love, and of a more abject spirit than that I can persuade myself, that I have it already: Yet such is the virtue and learning of the King, and his daily increasing industry in both, that by how much the more I see his Highness increase in these kingly ornaments, by so much the less troublesome this courtier's life seemeth unto me (40)'

[X] He settled with his family at Chelsey. Erasmus gives us the following excellent picture of his friend's manner of living at this house. 'More, says he, hath built near London upon the Thames, such a commodious house as is neither mean, nor subject to envy, yet magnificent enough; there he converseth affably with his family, his wife, his son, and daughter-in-law, his three daughters and their husbands; with eleven grandchildren. There is not any man living so affectionate to his children as he, and he loveth his old wife as well, as if she were a young maid; and such is the excellence of his temper, that whatsoever happeneth that could not be helped, he loveth it as tho' nothing could have happened more happily: you would say there were in that place Plato's Academy. But I do the house injury, in comparing it to Plato's Academy, where there was only disputations of numbers and geometrical figures, and sometimes of moral virtues; I should rather call his house a school or university of Christian religion, for there is none therein but readeth or studieth the liberal sciences, their special care is piety and virtue, there is no quarrelling or intemperate words heard, none feign idle: which household discipline that worthy gentleman doth not govern by proud and lofty words, but with all kind and courteous benevolence; every body performeth his duty, yet is there always alacrity, neither is sober mirth any thing wanting (41)'. Again. 'His first wife, which was but young, he caused to be instructed in learning, and to be taught all kind of musick; she dying after she had brought him four children, he married a widow [Alice Middleton] not for lust, but to be a governess to his young family; who, altho' she were inclining to old age, and of a nature somewhat harsh, and very worldly besides, yet he persuaded her to play upon the lute, viol, and some other instruments, every day performing thereon her task; and so with the like gentleness he ordered his family (42)'.—We see by this account his wife was old, ugly, ill tempered, and covetous. Mr More, by way of excuse for his great grand-father, says, he had heard it reported, that he first wooed her for a friend of his, not once thinking to have her for himself, but she wisely answering that he might speed, if he would speak in his own behalf, he acquainted his friend with her speech, and with his good liking, married her: That she proved a kind and careful step-mother to his children, as he was always a most loving father, and not only to his own, but to her daughter also, who was married to Mr Alington, and mother to Sir Giles Alington (43).

[Y] Worth notice ] When the King had performed his devotions on holy-days, he used to send for Sir Thomas into his closet, and there confer with him sometimes about Astronomy, Geometry, Divinity, and other parts of learning, and at other times upon his affairs; and he would frequently in the night carry him up into his leads on the top of his house, and discourse with him about the motions of the planets: and because Sir Thomas was of a very pleasant disposition, the King and Queen, after supper, or in supper-time, used to send for him to be merry with him. Sir Thomas perceiving by this fondness, that he could not once in a month get leave to go home to his wife and children, and that he could not be absent from the Court two days together without being sent for, he began somewhat to dislike his nature, and so by little and little to disguise himself from his accustomed mirth, that he was sent for no more from that time so ordinarily at such seasons (44). There was also another motive for the King's fondness. About this time he was writing his answer to Martin Luther (45), wherein Sir Thomas assisted his Majesty, by casting that treatise into a proper method (46). And in 1523, he published, written by himself, Responso ad convitia M. Lutheri congesta in Henricum Regem Angliæ (47).

[Z] Is yet more interesting. ] This Minister was Cardinal Wolsey, who being apprehensive of the ill humour of the house, resolved to be present at the question; and giving the House notice of it, there arose a warm debate whether they should receive him with a few of his Lords, which was the general opinion, or with his whole train. Hereupon Sir Thomas More said, Masters, forasmuch as my Lord Cardinal lately, yee woote well, laid to our charge the lightness of our tongues, for things uttered out of this house; it should not in my mind be amis to receive him with all his pomp, with his maces, his pillars, his pollaxes, his crosses, his hat, and the great seal too, to the intent that if he find the like fault with us, then we may be the bolder, from our selves, to lay the blame on those, whom his Grace bringeth with him. The house agreeing to this, the Cardinal was received accordingly; where, after he had made a solemn oration to shew the necessity there was of granting the subsidies moved for, and that less would not satisfy the King's occasions, finding no body made answer, he urged them again to give a reasonable reply: but applying to some other members in particular, all remained silent, being before agreed, as the custom was, to answer only by their Speaker. Masters, said the Cardinal, unless it be the manner of your House, as of likelihood it is, to deliver your minds only by the mouth of your Speaker, whom you have chosen for trusty and wise as he is indeed, in such cases, here is without doubt a marvellous obstinate silence. He then required an answer of the Speaker: whereupon Sir Thomas first reverently upon his knees excused the silence of the House, abashed as he said, at the presence of so noble a personage; after which he shewed by many arguments, that it was neither expedient nor agreeable to the ancient liberty of that House for them to make answer, concluding with this declaration, that tho' they had all trusted him with their voices, yet except every one of them could put their several wits into his head, he alone, in so weighty a matter, was not able to make his Grace a sufficient answer. Upon this, the

that we find his patriotism rewarded in a few years with the Chancellorship of the duchy of Lancaster, which he was possessed of in 1526 (aa) [AA]. The following year he was joined, with several other officers of State, to Cardinal Wolsey, in an embassy to France (bb); and, in July 1529 (cc), he set out with Cuthbert Tonstal on another to Cambray [BB]. Before he went on this last embassy, the King founded Sir Thomas upon the subject of the divorce, and not receiving an answer agreeable to his intentions (dd), he tried him a second time after his return from Cambray, but still found him immovable (ee). Yet his Majesty's fixed resolution in that point did not hinder him, upon the disgrace of Cardinal Wolsey, from intrusting the Great Seal with Sir Thomas, which was delivered to him October 25, 1530 (ff). This favour was the more extraordinary, as he was the first layman who enjoyed it (gg): the truth is, it was apparently conferred with a view of engaging him to approve the intended divorce (bb). Accordingly he entered upon it with just apprehensions of the danger to which it would expose him on that account (ii); and, after he had executed all the duties of it for near three years, with a most exemplary diligence, a true magnanimity of spirit [CC], and an undeviating uprightness, not being the Cardinal highly displeas'd that Sir Thomas had not answered his expectation in that Parliament, rose up suddenly and departed; and afterwards, in the gallery at Whitehall, complaining of it said, Would to God you had been at Rome, Mr More, when I made you Speaker: Your Grace not offended, so would I too, answered Sir Thomas, for then should I have seen the place I long have desired to visit. The Cardinal in revenge moved the King to send him on an embassy into Spain (48) in 1526, but this also Sir Thomas found means to avoid, on account of his health; which his Majesty accepted as a sufficient plea, saying, It is not our meaning, Mr More, to do you any hurt, but to do you good; we will think of some other, and employ your service otherwise (49).

[AA] Chancellor of the Duchy in 1526.] The business of the embassy mentioned in the preceding remark, was to negotiate an alliance after the battle of Pavia in 1525; upon which the King sent Cuthbert Tonstal, then Bishop of London, and Sir Richard Wingfield, Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (50). But this last, it seems, did not long survive that business; for in August 1526, we find a treaty of reciprocal engagement between Henry the Eighth and Francis the First, negotiated and concluded by John Lord of Vaux, Ambassador from France, and Sir Thomas More, Chancellor of the Duchy (51), which post all agree with Mr Roper (52), was given him upon the death of Sir Richard Wingfield.—About this time the King coming, as he used to do, suddenly, to Sir Thomas's house at Chelsey, and dining with him, walked after dinner in the garden near an hour, with his arm about Sir Thomas's neck. Hereupon, after his Majesty's departure, Mr Roper observed to him how happy he was, since the King had treated him with so much familiarity, as he had never seen him use to any person before, except Cardinal Wolsey, whom he once saw his Majesty walk with arm in arm. I thank our Lord, Son, answered Sir Thomas, I find his Grace my very good Lord indeed, and I believe he doth as singularly favour me, as any subject within this realm; howbeit, Son Roper, I must tell thee, I have no cause to be proud thereof, for if my head would win him a castle in Frante, it would not fail to go off (53).

[BB] He went on an embassy to Cambray with Cuthbert Tonstal.] This Prelate was one of Sir Thomas's first friends: Dr Stapleton has given us several of their letters (54), by which, among other things, that the Bishop had sent our author a token of his love, which is acknowledged by the latter; as follows: 'The amber which you sent me, being a precious sepulchre of flies, was for many respects most welcome unto me; for the matter thereof may be compared in colour and brightness to any precious stone, and the form is more excellent, because it representeth the figure of a heart, as it were the hieroglyphick of our love, which, I interpret, your meaning is, that between us it will never fly away, and yet be always without corruption, because I see the fly (which has wings like Cupid the son of Venus, and is as sickle as he) so shut up here and enclosed in this gleyw matter of amber, as it cannot fly away, and so embalmed and preserved therewith, as it cannot perish.'

The King's business in this treaty was to secure the money due to him from the Emperor (55), which Sir Thomas succeeded in far beyond all the expectations either of the King or any of his Council; and Mr Hod-desden tells us, that it was for his good service in this employment, that his Majesty made him Lord Chancellor (56)

[CC] He executed his office with diligence, magnanimity, and integrity.] As he was particularly respectful of the poor man's cause, in order to dispatch them with greater expedition, he sat every afternoon in his own hall, to encourage such suitors to come to him; and his diligence was such, that before he resigned the office, having dispatched one cause, and calling for the next, he was told there was not one more depending; which he ordered to be entered on record: yet the frequency of his injunctions to the law courts was complained of by those judges. This being told to him by Mr Roper, he ordered a docket of all his injunctions and the causes for them to be made out, and then inviting all the Judges to dine with him in the Council-chamber at Westminster, after dinner he shewed them the docket, upon which, when the Judges allowed the injunctions to be reasonable, averring that they should have done the same in his place, he admonished them not to give reason for so many injunctions by pursuing the letter of the law too rigorously, observing that it was their duty in all cases to interpret the penal laws in the most favourable sense, and promising that upon such their behaviour he would grant no more injunctions. But they refusing this, he said, 'Forasmuch as yourselves, my Lords, drive me to that necessity for awarding out injunctions to relieve the people's injuries, you cannot hereafter any more justly blame me.' Talking afterwards in private to his son Roper, 'I perceive, Son, says he, why they like not so to do; for they see that they may by the verdict of a jury, cast off all quarrels from themselves, on those, which they do account their chief defence, and therefore am I compelled to abide the adventure of all such reports (57).'

After this he took order with all the Attorneys of his court, that no subpoenas should go out, whereof in general he should not have notice of the matter, with one of their hands to the bill; declaring he would cancel it, if not containing sufficient cause of complaint. And when one of his Attorneys, whose name was Tub, had brought to him the subpoena of his client's cause, requesting his hand to it, Sir Thomas upon the perusal finding it to be a frivolous matter, instead of his name, wrote under it, A Tale of a Tub (58). His integrity in this office, which indeed was never questioned before, happened to be made very conspicuous to the confusion of his adversaries || after his fall, when by their procurement one Parnel accused him of receiving a bribe for making a decree against him in favour of his antagonist Vaughan, who gave him for it a gold cup. Sir Thomas confessed he received the cup from the hands of Vaughan's wife, but immediately ordering his Butler to fill it with wine, drank to her, and when she had pledged him, says he, As freely as your husband hath given the cup to me, even so freely give I the same to you again, to give to your husband for his new year's gift: and obliged her to take it. At another time, one Gresham having a cause depending in Chancery, sent Sir Thomas for a new-year's gift, a fair gilded cup, the fashion whereof pleased him so well, that he caused one of his own, though not in his fancy of so good a fashion, yet of more value, to be delivered to the messenger for his master, nor would he receive it on any other condition. With the same upright resolution, being presented by one Mrs Goaker with able to satisfy his conscience concerning the invalidity of that divorce (kk), a confirmation of which he was sensible would soon be required of him by the nature of his office (ll), he begged leave, with a view to his own safety, to resign; which being granted, though not without some difficulty (mm), delivered the Great Seal to his royal master May 16, 1533 (nn). He was much better pleased with this favour than he had been with the former (oo); and, as the affair was not immediately known, the next morning, being a holy-day, he went to Chelsey church with his lady and family, where, during the service, he sat as usual in the choir, wearing a surplice; and because it had been a custom after mass was done, for one of his gentlemen to go to his lady's pew, and tell her that my Lord was gone before, he came now himself, and making her a low bow, said, Madam, my Lord is gone. She thinking it to be no more than his usual humour, took no notice of it; but in the way home, to her great mortification, he unriddled the jest, by acquainting her with what he had done the preceding day (pp). A little before his resignation he buried his father [DD], to whom in his last illness he behaved, as he had always done, with the highest degree of filial piety; and notwithstanding the great age to which the father's life was extended, yet the son was much affected with his loss (qq). As long as he held the Chancellor's post, he maintained a state suitable thereto, according to the magnificence of those times, the expence of which, partly by reason of his conscientious integrity, proved, though he was no bad economist, a sufficient drain for all his income (rr). Whence, by the loss of that place, his fortune sunk to a lower ebb than it ever had been at before, and became so much reduced, that he was obliged to reduce his family in proportion [EE]. Hitherto he had kept his children, with their respective families, after their marriage, and provided for them all in his own house; but not being able now any longer to support that primitive patriarchal state, he dismissed them each to their own homes, and discharged all his state-servants, and procured other suitable services for them (ss). After this he resolved never to engage again in publick business; he passed his time altogether in study and devotion [FF], not without some prefaces of the storm which was

with a pair of gloves and forty pounds in angels put into them: he said to her, Mistresse, since it were against good manners to refuse your new-year's gift, I am content to take your gloves; but as for the lining, I utterly refuse it (59).

[DD] He buried his father.] The old gentleman died, as is said, of a surfeit of grapes, being then lusty and strong, though near ninety years of age*. He had been a puisné Judge of the King's-Bench for a very great number of years, and Sir Thomas, after he was Chancellor, never passed through the hall to his seat in the Chancery, without going into the Court of King's-Bench when his father was sitting, and asking him blessing upon his knees (60). He was buried in St Laurence church in the Old-Jewry ¶. and Sir Thomas wrote an epitaph for him (61), by which it appears, that the son inherited his father's endowments; and Campden gives an instance of the pleasantness of his wit in comparing the dangers of the choice of a wife to that of putting a man's hand into a bag full of snakes, with only one eel in it; where he may indeed chance to light of the eel, but 'tis an hundred to one that he is stung by a snake (62). However, he married three wives, the last of which (63) had for her jointure his principal seat and lands at More place or Gubbins in the parish of North-Mimes in Hertfordshire. She out-lived Sir Thomas about ten years (64), so that he never enjoyed any inheritance scarcely from his father (65).

[EE] His fortune being reduced, he reduced his family.] Upon this occasion he called his children together, and asked their advice how they might (now his fortune was so impaired that he could not, as he had done, and gladly would, bear out the whole charges of them all himself) thenceforth be able to live together as he wished they should: seeing them silent on this sad occasion, then will I, says he, shew my poor mind to you. 'I have been brought up at Oxford, at an Inne of the Chancery, at Lincoln's Inn, and also in the King's Court, and so from the least degree to the highest, and yet have I in yearly revenues at this present left me a little above 100 l. by the year; so that now must we hereafter, if we like to live together, be contented to become contributors together. But by my counsel it shall not be best for us to fall to the lowest fare first: we will not therefore descend to Oxford fare, nor to the fare of New-Inn; but we will begin with Lincoln's-Inn diet, where many Right Worshipfuls, and of good years, do live full well together: which, if we find not ourselves able to maintain the first year, then will we the next year go one step down to New-Inn fare, and wherewith many an honest man is well contented. If that exceed our ability too, then will we the next year after descend to Oxford fare, where many great, learned, and ancient fathers be continually conversant: which if our power stretch not to maintain neither, then may we yet with bags and wallets go a begging together, and hoping that for pity some good folks will give us their charity, at every man's door sing Salve Regina (66); and so still keep company and be merry together (67). Upon this and some other like passages of our author's behaviour on the present occasion, Lord Herbert makes the following remark: 'These jests were thought to have in them more levity than to be taken every where for current. He might have quitted his dignity without using such sarcasms, and betaken himself to a more retired and quiet life, without making his family or himself contemptible. And certainly whatsoever he intended hereby, his family so little understood his meaning, that they needed some more serious instructions. So that I cannot, continues his Lordship, persuade myself, for all this talk, that so excellent a person would omit at fit times to give his family that sober account of his relinquishing this place [the Chancellorship] which I find he did, to the Archbishop Warham, Erasmus, and others (68). Mr Roper informs us, that all the land which Sir Thomas ever purchased (which too was before he was Lord Chancellor) did not amount to above twenty marks a year, and after his debts paid, he had not, (his gold chain excepted) in gold and silver left the value of above 100 l. (69). And Sir Thomas himself assures us, that all the lands and fees he had while his mother-in-law lived, besides those given him by the King, did not clear full fifty pounds a year (70). Whence it follows, that the manours of Duckington, Frinkford, and Barly-Park in Oxfordshire, which were grants from the Crown (71), made up one half at least of his estate.

[FF] Spent his time at Chelsey in study and devotion.] Soon after his settling at Chelsey, he built in his garden an edifice which contained a chapel, a library, and a gallery. This was called the new buildings, here he prayed every evening before bed-time with his family, and spent himself some part of the day in devotions, and on Fridays, he used to continue there from morning till evening, spending his time in prayer and other spiritual exercises (72). And to shew the prevalence of his prayers, Dr Stapleton tells us, that upon his favourite daughter's being once so ill of the sweating sickness, as to be given up by the Physicians, Sir Thomas having prayed here very earnestly for her recovery, it presently came into his mind, that a clyster was her only remedy, which being applied, the accordingly recovered (73). Besides the new buildings, he had built a chapel before he was Lord Chancellor, adjoining gathering over his head [GG]. Anne Boleyn's coronation being fixed * for the 31st of this month, May 1533, the Bishops of Durham, Bath, and Winchester, gave him an invitation to keep them company in attending that ceremony, and at the same time sent him, considering his circumstances, a present of 20 pounds to buy himself a gown for the occasion. Sir Thomas accepted the present; but never stirred from home, and at their next meeting excused his behaviour with a pleasant story (tt), which is inserted below [HH], intimating a firm adherence to his opinion concerning the unlawfulness of the King's marriage. Thus all fair means proving ineffectual to win him over, recourse was had to terror and threats. In this spirit, in the ensuing Parliament a bill was brought into the House of Lords, attainting him, as well as his friend Bishop Fisher, and some others, of misprison of treason, for countenancing and encouraging Elizabeth Barton, the famous Nun of Kent, in her treasonable practices. Upon examination, his innocence in that matter so clearly appeared, that his enemies were obliged to strike his name out of the bill (uu). Several other accusations were brought against him with the same ill success [II], 'till the Act of Supremacy was passed in 1534, when the oath enjoined by that act being tendered to him about a month after, he refused to take it. Hereupon he was first taken into the custody of the Abbot of Westminster, and upon a second refusal four days after, was committed prisoner to the Tower of London [KK]. His reputation in the kingdom was very great, and much was apprehended to depend upon his conduct in this critical juncture; so that during his confinement, all the arguments that could be devised were alledged to him by Archbishop Cranmer and others, to persuade him to a compliance; and many fair promises were made from the King to induce him thereto [LL]:

[G] Prefaces of the storm.] Considering the fickleness and violence of Henry the Eighth's temper in general, and the growing influence of Anne Boleyn, there was no need of a prophetic spirit to foretel Sir Thomas's fate. Accordingly, we find him mentioning his apprehensions of it beforehand to his family, and saying that if he might perceive his wife and children would encourage him to die in a good cause, it would make him merrily run to death (75). When the commission was issued to Archbishop Cranmer, to determine the matter of the divorce, which was followed by the King's marriage to Anne Boleyn; Sir Thomas said, God grant these matters be not within a while confirmed with oaths (76). In short, he saw his danger approaching, and did not sleep several nights for thinking of the worst that could happen to him: and to prepare his family for it, he hired a pursuivant to come suddenly to his house, when he was at dinner, and knocking hastily at the door to warn him to appear next day before the Commissioners (77).

[HH] A pleasant story.] The story was this. An Emperor made a law, that whoever committed a certain offence, except it were a virgin, should suffer death, such a reverence had he to virginity. It happened that the first breaker of this law was indeed a virgin, whereof, the Emperor hearing, was in no small perplexity, since he would fain have had the law put in execution by some example. Hereupon, the matter being long solemnly debated in Council, there arose at length one of the Counsellors, a good plain man, and said, Why make you so much ado, my Lords, about so small a matter? let her be first deflowered, and thereafter may she be devoured. And so, tho' your Lordships [the Bishops] have in the matter of the matrimony, hitherto kept yourselves pure virgins, yet take good heed, my Lords, that you keep your virginity still. For some there be, that by procuring your Lordships first at the coronation to be present, and next to preach for the setting forth of it, and finally to write books to all the world in defence thereof, are desirous to deflower ye, and then will they not fail soon after to devour ye. Now, my Lords, quoth he, it lieth not in my power but that they may devour me; but God being my good Lord, I will so provide, that they shall never deflower me (78).

(78) Roper, p. 70, 71.

[II] Several other accusations were brought with the like ill success.] In one of these attempts upon him, he was summoned before Cranmer, Audley the Chancellor, Duke of Norfolk, and Cromwell; who having first tried in vain, to move him to a compliance with the divorce, by offers of any favour he pleased to ask from the King, proceeded to threats for his disobedience and ingratitude; and among other things, charged him with procuring the King to set forth his book against

Luther, in maintenance of the Pope's authority, and thereby having caused his Majesty to put a sword into the Pope's hand to fight against himself. 'My Lords, said he, these terrors be arguments for children, not for me: but to answer that wherewith you chiefly charge me, I believe the King's highness, his honour, will never lay that to my charge: for none is there that can in that point say more in mine excuse than his Highness himself, who right well knoweth that I never was procurer nor counsellor of his Majesty thereunto: but after it was finished, by his Grace's appointment and consent of the makers of the same, I was only a forter out and placer of the principal matters therein contained: wherein, finding the Pope's authority highly advanced, and with strong arguments highly defended. I said unto his Majesty, I must put your Highness in remembrance of one thing, and that is this: The Pope, as your Grace knoweth, is a Prince as you are, and in league with all other Christian Princes: it may hereafter so fall out, that your Grace and he may vary, upon some points of the league, whereupon may grow breach of amity between you both; I think it best, that that place be amended, and his authority more slenderly touched. Nay, said his Grace, that shall not be, we are so much bounden to the see of Rome, that we cannot do too much honour unto it. Then did I put him in mind of the statute of Premunire, whereby a good part of the Pope's pastoral cure was pared away. To that answered his Highness, whatsoever impediment be to the contrary, we will set forth that authority to the uttermost, for we received from the see of Rome our crown imperial: which, 'till his Grace with his own mouth told it me, I never heard of before. So that I trust, when that his Majesty shall be truly informed of this, and call to his gracious remembrance my dealing in that behalf, his Highness will never speak of it more, but clear me thoroughly therein himself.' With which words they dismissed him and departed (79).

[KK] He was sent to the Tower] When he came to the gate, the porter, according to custom, demanded his upper garment. Mr Porter, said he, here it is, and taking off his cap, gave it to him; saying, I am sorry it is no better for thee. No, Sir, said the porter, I must have your gown: which was accordingly complied with. As soon as he was placed in his lodgings, he called one John Wood, his servant, there appointed to attend him, who could neither write nor read, and swore him before the Lieutenant, that if he should hear or see him at any time speak or write any manner of thing against the King, the Council, or the state of the realm, he should tell it to the Lieutenant, that he might presently reveal it to the Council (80).

but nothing could prevail upon him to hurt his conscience by taking the oath of Supremacy, though at the same time he was prudent enough neither positively to affirm or deny it. Thus all other means failing, after he had lain almost fifteen months in prison, he was arraigned and tried at the King's-Bench bar of high-treason, for denying the King's supremacy upon the statute lately made to that purpose †. The proof rested upon the single testimony of Rich the Solicitor-General*; and though Sir Thomas not only denied, in the solemnest manner, the words alledged against him, but sufficiently discredited the witness [MM], yet the jury brought him in guilty, and he was accordingly condemned to be hanged, drawn, and quartered, and his head to be stuck on a pole on London-Bridge (ww). But this sentence, on account of the office he had borne, was, all but the last particular, changed by the King into beheading; which was executed July 5, 1535 (xx), on Tower-hill. His body being interred in the chapel of the Tower, was afterwards begged by his daughter Margaret, and deposited on the south side of the chancel in the church of Chelsey (yy), where a monument, with an inscription written by himself, had been erected some time before (zz). The same most piously affectionate daughter found means also to procure his head, after it had remained upon London-Bridge fourteen days. This she carefully preserved for some time in a leaden box (aaa), 'till there was an opportunity of removing it to Canterbury, where she placed it in a vault belonging to the Roper's family, into which she was married, under a chapel joining to St Dunstan's church in that city. As to his character, to begin with his person, a description whereof we have from Erasmus (bbb), as follows: He was of a middle stature, exactly proportioned, his complexion fair, with a light tincture of red; the colour of his hair a dark chestnut; his beard thin, and grey eyes; his countenance the true portrait of his mind, chearful and pleasant; his aspect composed by habit to the smile, and, to speak ingenuously, more apposite to festivity and jesting than either to gravity or dignity, but very remote from the scurrilous. In walking his right shoulder appeared higher than the other (ccc); but this was the effect of habit, and not the fault of nature. Accordingly, the rest of his body was entirely faultless, only his hands were somewhat clumsy and rustick. His apparel was generally plain, yet when the dignity of his place required it, he conformed to the custom. His voice is said to be neither strong nor shrill, but clear and distinct, though not very tuneable, as much as he delighted in musick: his constitution generally healthy, only toward the latter part of his life, by much writing, he complained of a pain in his breast, and some decay (ddd) of strength, such as was enough to serve him for a pretence to re-

[MM] The Jury brought him in guilty. The indictment consisted of four articles, of which the second was the principal, 'that he had transgressed the statute in the last Parliament, in that being a prisoner, and twice examined by the Lords of the Council, he would not disclose unto them his opinion (out of a malignant, perfidious, obstinate, and traitorous mind) whether the King were supreme head of the Church or no.' He confessed the simple fact, but denied the malicious intent*; and to clear himself thereof, having observed that the statute belonged properly to the Clergy, and not to him as a Layman; he protested that he had never said or done any thing against it, and challenged the prosecutor to produce any such word or action; to strengthen this he urged the constant tenour of his behaviour, undeniably loyal, obedient, faithful, and affectionate, for the twenty years wherein he had been the King's servant. But the malice being still insisted on and buzzed all through the Court, the jury were determined to bring in the verdict mentioned above (83). The extraordinary complaisance of the Parliament, and in them of the people, to this Prince, is the constant remark of all our historians, and there is not a more signal instance of it than is to be found in this prosecution. Sir Thomas is undeniably an eminent example of the danger of having too much merit. Hence it was urged, that if he was suffered to escape, his authority might make an ill impression upon the people, and his example encourage others to fall off from their affection to the King, and hence it came to pass that he was invidiously charged with ingratitude, in the preamble to an act of Parliament, for the great favours he had received from the King, as well as for studying to sow and make sedition among the King's subjects, and refusing to take the oath of succession (84): whereas he only refused the oath as then framed, but at the same time offered to swear fealty to that succession. On this account Crammer solicited in his behalf, as appears by a letter from him to Secretary Cromwell, dated the 17th of April 1535, wherein he pressed that Sir Thomas and the Bishop of Rochester might be dispensed with in the present case, and allowed to take oath to the succession only, without swearing to the preamble, as they have both of them, says he, freely offered to do (85). In reality, the statute did not set down the form of the oath to be taken, but only enacted, that as well all the nobles of the realm spiritual and temporal, as all other the King's subjects, should make a corporal oath in the presence of his Majesty, or before such other as his Majesty will depute for the same: 'That they shall truly, firmly, and constantly, without fraud or guile, observe, fulfil, maintain, defend, and keep, to their cunning, wit, and uttermost of their powers the whole effects and contents of this present act.' But the form was much enlarged afterwards, and then offered to Sir Thomas, whereupon, speaking to his favourite daughter, he said, 'I may tell thee, Megg; they that have committed me hither, for refusing of this oath not agreeable with their statute, are not by their own law able to justify mine imprisonment (86).' The court was sensible of their error, and afterwards another statute was passed confirming this latter oath (87); which it seems was required to be taken not only by all men, but by all women throughout the realm. Mr Justice Raftall observes, that Sir Thomas's daughter Mrs Margaret Roper took it with this exception as far as would stand with the law of God. And 'tis said of Henry Patison, Sir Thomas's quondam fool, that one day meeting one of Mr Roper's servants, he asked where Sir Thomas was, and being told he was still in the Tower, he grew very angry, and said why, what aileth him that he will not swear? wherefore should he sick to swear? I have sworn the oath myself (88).

sign the Chancellorship. In his youth he drank much water, only tasting wine when he pledged others. In eating he loved salt meats, especially powdered beef, milk, cheese, eggs, and fruit (eee). It is universally agreed, that he was admirably skilled in every branch of polite learning. Bishop Burnet, who treats him severely, both as a writer and a persecutor of the Reformers [NN], declares however, that for justice, contempt of money, humility, and a true generosity of mind; he was an example to the age in which he lived (fff). And himself declaring, as he did upon the scaffold; that he died in and for the faith of the Romish Church (ggg); that Church hath not without reason placed him among her brightest martyrs [OO]. [NN] Bishop Burnet treats him severely. This author, as his manner is; observes among other things, That Sir Thomas was so superstitiously devoted to the interests and passions of the Popish Clergy, that when he was in authority, he assisted them in all their cruelties. "More, continues he, was no Divine at all, and it is plain to any one that reads his writings, that he knew nothing of antiquity beyond the quotations he found in the Canon Law and in the Master of the Sentences, (only he had read some of St Austin's Treatises). For in all points of controversy he quotes only what he had found in those collections. Nor was he at all conversant in the critical learning upon the Scriptures, but his peculiar excellence in writing was, that he had a natural easy expression, and represented all the opinions of Popery with their fair side to the reader, disguising or concealing the black side of them with great art, and was no less industrious in exposing all the ill consequences that could follow from the doctrine of the Reformers, and had upon all occasions great store of pleasant tales which he applied wittily to his purpose (89)." As to the accusation of cruelty, it was laid to his charge in his life-time: But in answer thereto he tells us himself, that it was said of him while he was Chancellor, he used to examine the Protestants with torments, causing them to be bounden to a tree in his garden, and there piteously beaten; but he solemnly declares of very great trouth, that albeit for a heinous murder, robbery, or sacrilege, he caused such things to be done by some officers of the Marshalsea or some other prisons, he never did els cause any such thing to be done except to one child, and another mad person, that disturbed the divine service (90). And Erasmus observes, that though he declared his hatred of the seditious tenets of the heretics, yet this was a sufficient argument of his clemency, that while he was Chancellor no one was put to death for his disapproved opinions (91). However, Sir Thomas declares, that he wished obstinate heretics were in time taken away, to prevent their seditious tenets from spreading (92); nor, to say the truth, can it be denied, that the principles and practices of the Reformers, particularly, the Anabaptists in Germany, at this time, were such as entitled them to a better fate. Stapleton says, that Sir Thomas laboured with his pen against these heretics more than all the whole Clergy of England put together (93); and we are assured by Roper, that the Clergy were so sensible of his merit on this account, that a sum not less than four or five thousand pounds was voted by them in convocation to be raised by a proportionable tax upon their whole body, and was actually presented to Sir Thomas as a recompence for his pains herein, though he both refused to take it himself, nor would suffer them to bestow it upon his children, declaring himself abundantly rewarded by the pleasure he had in writing those books*.

[OO] He is deservedly ranked among the martyrs of the Romish Church. To shew the justice of his claim to that honour, we need only observe that he was unjustly put to death for a principle of that religion, being innocent of that particular offence for which he suffered; since the general course of his life is universally allowed to be not only irreproachable, but that he arrived to a very high degree of perfection in all Christian graces, eminently distinguished by all those virtues and graces which particularly constitute the character of a martyr, such as piety, humility, devotion, sanctity, resignation, and fortitude. In this last virtue, with regard to the conquest of the world, he may be said even to have arrived at a state of absolute perfection, at least for above a year before his suffering. Mr Roper informs us, that Sir Thomas being seated with him, as he attended in his boat to wait upon the commissioners appointed to tender him the oath of supremacy the first time, after he had remained a while sad and serious, at last he suddenly rounded him in the ear, and said, Son Roper, I thank our Lord the field is won. What he meant thereby, continues this writer, I then wist not, yet loathe to seeme ignorant, I answered, Sir, I am therefore verie glad. But as I conjectured afterward, it was for that the love he had to God wrought in him so effectuallye, that he had conquered all his carnall affections utterly (94). Accordingly, his subsequent behaviour bespoke a particular cheerfulness under his persecution, which grew into an earnest longing to put on the martyr's crown. After he had been in the Tower a little more than a month, being visited by his beloved daughter, he told her they were mistaken in thinking they would mortify him by that imprisonment, for since he was come thither without his own desert, thank God, he found no cause to reckon himself in worse case there than at home: "For, continues he, methinketh God maketh me a wanton, and setteth me on his lap, and dandleth me †." At last, May 4th, 1535 as he saw some monks of the Charter-House going out of the Tower to execution for the same cause, he called upon the same daughter, who then stood by his side, to see how those blessed fathers were as cheerfully going to their deaths as bridegrooms to their marriage; and assuring her this was a special favour of God, who, on account of their holy lives, would not longer suffer them to remain in this vale of misery, but speedily took them hence to the fruition of his everlasting deity; he expresses his uneasiness at being left behind in the following strong terms, and applied the remark to himself in a way of contrast: "Whereas, says he, thy fillic father, Megg, that like a wicked caittiff hath passed forth the whole course of his miserable life most sinfully, God † thinking him not worthy so soon to come to that eternal felicity, leaveth him here yet still in this world † further to be plagued and turmoiled with misery (95)." When it was urged that he was not so content to die as he pretended, otherwise he would not fear to speak out plainly against the statute. To this he answered, that his life had not been so holy as to clear such a bold offering himself to death of presumption, and therefore he put not himself forward, but drew back †. Here was nothing of that enthusiastic forwardness in rushing to death, for which some of the primitive Christians have not escaped a just censure. On the contrary, this modern martyr was so far from studying to provoke his enemies to that end, that no sufferer could be more diligent than he was to avert, if possible, the storm of their anger: in this disposition we see him avoiding all occasion of giving offence, and cluding by the most prudent caution all the devices that were practised (and very many were practised) to draw him into an exceptionable behaviour. Lastly, the finely reasoned, and, in truth, unanswerable defence made by him at his trial, shews that he omitted no means whatsoever, that lay in his power to save a life, which, in a religious view, he wished and longed to lose. Thus far Sir Thomas More deserves a place in the Roman Martyrology, supposing the King's supremacy to be taken in the present sense of the words for a civil and not a spiritual power; but there is reason to believe that Sir Thomas understood, that thereby a claim was made to all the spiritual functions of the Clergy, such as administering the sacraments, ordination of Priests and Bishops, &c. which has always been condemned under the name of Erastianism; and it must be confessed, the plain obvious sense of the words in the act that established it soon after, do suggest something more than a civil jurisdiction (96), however, they were otherwise interpreted, both by that Prince and his Parliaments. Wherefore, since such a supremacy is denied to the temporal Prince in all Christian Churches, Sir Thomas may be deemed a martyr of the Christian Church in general; but he is particularly claimed by the Roman Church, because his martyrdom was brought about by such as made him an honour not only to any particular Church, but to the Christian name and cause in general. However, he is charged with some foibles [P P], the principal of which seems to have been too great an affectation of singularity: he used, we are told, to wear his gown awry upon one shoulder, which made one shoulder, as Erasmus observed, appear higher than the other (b b b). Archbishop Cranmer too seems to have been of this mind, that Sir Thomas was somewhat too conceited, and desirous of esteem; and therefore, in a point where he had once said his mind, he would not vary therefrom, that he might not for ever distain or blemish his fame and reputation [Q Q]. It is certain, his zeal against the Reformers called hereticks, transported him into some unbecoming and unjustifiable measures [R R]. By his first wife he had four children, who the persecution of the Reformers. Yet after all, his merit to that Church, in regard to this point of the Pope's supremacy, furnishes no great room for any extraordinary boasting, since in the same place that he declares he was brought to the belief of it's being the institution of God, by reading the King's book against Luther, it appears, that though he was not determined in it, yet he inclined to the opinion, that the Pope is not of the essence of the Visible Church, which might subsist without a Pope, under the government of provincial Patriarchs or Archbishops; and he clearly affirms, that a General Council is above the Pope, and that there are orders in Christ's Church, by which a Pope may be both admonished and amended, and hath been for incorrigible mind and lack of amendment finally deposed and changed (97); which is the very same conclusion that Wickliff maintained, and which was condemned by the Council of Constance.

[P P] He is charged with some foibles. The levity of his wit in jesting, was censured by Lord Herbert, as we have already observed; and herein he is backed by Erasmus, who calls him another Democritus (98). The well known story of his witticism in the last scene of his life, after his head was laid upon the block, when he put his beard aside, saying, That had committed no treason, gave birth to that celebrated irony of the Duke of Bucks,

Tho' who can chuse but pity
A dying heroe, miserably witty (99).

However, his apology was written by Mr Addison, who looks upon his mirth, which was natural to him all his life before, to be at this time the effect of his innocence. 'His death, says he, was of a piece with his life; there was nothing in it new, forced, or affected. He saw nothing in death to put him from his ordinary humour; and as he died under a fixed and settled hope of immortality, he thought any unusual degree of sorrow and concern improper on such an occasion, as had nothing in it which could deject or terrify him.' However, he concludes with the following remark, that what was philosophy in this extraordinary man, would be phrenzy in any one who did not resemble him, as well in the cheerfulness of his temper as in the sanctity of his life and manners. This author might have said, that Sir Thomas saw something in death to raise his natural cheerfulness above it's ordinary pitch (100), as we see by his behaviour on the day of his execution, of which, when notice was brought to him that morning by Sir Thomas Pope, he sent back his thanks to the King for the favour, declaring he would pray for his Majesty therefore, both here and in the next world, and with the same confident assurance of his future bliss. When Sir Thomas at parting could not refrain from tears, our martyr bid him be comforted, for that he trusted they should one day meet and be merry in heaven (101). With regard to the witticism upon his beard on the scaffold, which gave occasion to Mr Addison's Apology, we ought not to omit in justice thereto, another story, without which, the full pleasantry of the wit will not be understood. After his condemnation, he was visited by a certain courtier, whose whole discourse being nothing else but urging him to change his mind, Sir Thomas at last being wearied with his importunity, answered that he had changed it. The courtier went presently and told the King, and being by him commanded to know wherein his mind was changed, Sir Thomas rebuked him for his lightness, in that he would tell the King every word that he spoke in jest, meaning, that whereas he had intended to be staven, that he might appear to the people as before he was wont; now he was fully resolved that his beard should take such part as his head did: which made the courtier blank, and the King very angry (102).

[Q Q] Having once said his mind he would not vary. This remark is somewhat countenanced by what Sir Thomas said to his son Roper, after he had been examined by Cranmer and other Lords, while the bill was depending against the nun of Canterbury, wherein he was included. He was so very merry in the way home, that Mr Roper who was in the boat with him could not forbear saying, that he trusted all was well. It is so indeed, son Roper, I thank God, quoth he. Are you then put out of the Parliament bill, says Roper. By my troth, son Roper, quoth he, I never remembered it. Never remembered it! said Roper, a cause that toucheth yourself so near, and us all for your sake, I'm sorry to hear it; for I verily trusted when I saw you so merry, that all had been well. Then, said he, wilt thou know, son Roper, why I was so merry. That would I gladly, Sir, said Roper. In good faith I rejoiced, son, said he, that I had given the Devil a foul fall, and that with those Lords I had gone so far, as without great shame I should never go back again; meaning, in regard to the divorce, against which he had in this conference declared his opinion fully (103).

[R R] His zeal against the Reformers betrayed him into some unbecoming measures. In a letter to Erasmus he declares, he so far hated that sort of men called hereticks, that unless they repented, he would be as troublesome to them as he could; and that this he had declared in his epitaph (104), out of ambition. Accordingly, he tells us himself, it was laid to his charge, that he handled Luther, Tindal, &c. with no fayer wordes, nor in more courteous manner, and treated their persons when he had them in his power, with too much rigour and severity; and it is particularly remarked of his Latin answer to Luther, that in it 'he has forgotten himself so far, that he has there thrown out the greatest heap of nasty language, that perhaps ever was put together, and that the book throughout is nothing but downright ribaldry without a grain of reason to support it, and gave the author no other reputation but that of having the best knack of any man in Europe at calling bad names in good Latin: though his passion is sometimes so strong upon him, that he sacrifices even his beloved purity to it (105).'

And his English works deserve the like censure, where he charges Luther with incest, for marrying a nun, and lying with her nightlie in abominable byberie (106). Nay it is laid to his charge, that he is not always so careful as one would expect a person of his learning, and of so tender and scrupulous a conscience, would be, in reporting matters of fact, wherein they whom he called heretics were concerned; instances whereof may be seen in the places cited in the margin*. However, 'tis certain he did not always so far act beneath himself: on the contrary, we have upon record one very remarkable transaction, where his lenity is very conspicuous. 'The Popish Bishops, and the Bishop of London in particular, in order to suppress Tindal's translation of the Bible, advised with one Packington, a merchant of that city concerning it. The merchant could think of no way so probable as to buy up the whole impression; this being approved of by the Bishops, they furnished a round sum for the purpose, which the merchant (being more a friend to Tindal than the Bishops) sent to Tindal, and had the impression sent him, some few copies being, as we must imagine, first sold off. With this money Tindal supported himself in his exile, and was also enabled to go on with his translation of the other part of the Bible, and to prepare a complete English Bible (107). In the mean time Sir Thomas More being Lord Chancellor, and having several persons [twenty five] who all survived him; three daughters, Margaret, Elizabeth, and Cecilia, of whom some account shall be given in remark [SS]; and one son, named after his grandfather John. Sir Thomas had the three daughters first, and his wife very much desired a boy; at last, she brought him this son, who proved little better than an idiot, upon which Sir Thomas, it is said, told his lady, She had prayed so long for a boy, that she had now one who would be a boy as long as he lived (iii). However, he had all the advantages that a good and ingenuous education could give him, by which his natural parts seem to have been improved (kkk). After the death of his father, he was committed to the Tower for refusing the same oath of supremacy, and condemned, but afterwards pardoned and set at liberty, which favour he did not long survive (lll). He was married very young (mmm), as has been said, to a Yorkshire heiress, of more than a hundred pounds a year. By her he had issue five sons, of whom the eldest was named Thomas, and had thirteen children, the first of which was named Thomas, who being a most zealous Roman Catholic, gave the family estate to his younger brother, and took Orders at Rome, whence, by the Pope's command, he came a missionary into England. He afterwards lived at Rome (nnn), where, and in Spain, he negotiated the affairs of the English Clergy at his own expence, and wrote the life of his great grandfather, which, two years after his death, was printed in quarto, with a dedication to Henrietta-Maria, King Charles the First's Queen, which match, the author of the dedication tells us, he was very instrumental in making. He died April 11th, 1625, aged 59, as appears by the inscription which Mr Wood has given us (ooo) upon his monumental stone of white marble, in the church of St Lewis at Rome, where he died and was buried, and his monument also erected at the charge of the English Clergy. Sir Thomas More was survived also by his second wife, who, upon the seizure of his estate, as a forfeiture, by the Crown, was obliged to quit the house at Chelsey. But the King allowed her annuity of twenty pounds for her life (ppp).

'ven] accused before him for heresy, and ready for execution, offered to compound with any of them for his life upon the easy terms of discovering to him who they were in London that maintained Tindal beyond sea. One of them, George Constantine, after he had got as good security for his life as the honour and truth of the Chancellor could give him, told him, it was the Bishop of London that maintained Tindal, by sending him a sum of money to buy up the impression of his Bibles. The Chancellor smiled, saying he believed he said true. Thus, says my author, was the poor confessor's life saved (108).

(108) Scultetus's Annals in anno 1532, as cited in the preface to Pool's Annotations to the Bible.

[SS] Account of his three daughters.] Of these, the eldest, Margaret, was married while her father was Chancellor of the Dutchy of Lancaster, to William Roper, son and heir of John Roper, Esq; Prothonotary of the King's-Bench, of an ancient and worshipful family at St Dunstan's in the suburbs of the city of Canterbury (109). This lady had all the advantages that could arise from great natural parts and very fine learning. She was a perfect mistress of the Greek and Latin tongues, and of all sorts of musick, besides her skill in Arithmetick and other sciences. For thus we are assured by a very learned friend of Sir Thomas, that he took a great deal of care to have his children instructed in the liberal disciplines or sciences; so that the fine things said of her and to her by the greatest men of that age, and since, were more than compliments and words of course, they were what she had a right to, and very well deserved (110). She lived with her husband about sixteen years, and dying in 1544, was buried in the family burying-place of the Ropers at St Dunstan's, with her father's head in her arms, as she had desired. She brought Mr Roper two sons, Thomas and Anthony, and three daughters, Elizabeth, Margaret, and Mary, of whose education the mother took the same care, as had been taken of her own. The famous Roger Ascham, then Fellow of St John's College in Cambridge, and afterwards Latin Secretary to Queen Elizabeth, tells us, that she was very desirous of having him for their tutor, to instruct them in the learned languages; but that he would not then upon any terms be prevailed with to leave the university; that therefore the procured Dr Cole and Dr Christopherson, afterwards Bishop of Chichester, both very famous at that time for their skill in the Greek tongue. Elizabeth was married first to Mr Stephenson, and afterwards to Sir Edward Bray, Knight; Margaret married William Dawtreay; and Mary married first to Mr Stephen Clarke, and next to Mr James Basset. Ascham files her an eminent ornament to her sex, and of Queen Mary's court. She was one of the Gentlewomen (so they were then called) of that Queen's Privy-chamber, and translated into English part of her grandfather's Exposition of the Passion of our Saviour; wherein she exactly imitated Sir Thomas's stile in English (111). Mrs Roper's son Thomas married Lucy, daughter of Sir Anthony Brown, Master of the Horse, and Privy-Counsellor to King Henry the Eighth (112). Sir Thomas More's second daughter married John Dancy, son and heir to Sir John Dancy; and his third daughter Cecilia married Giles Heron of Shacklewell in Middlesex, Esq; (113). We have already observed, that Sir Thomas had all his children with their families dwelling in his house at Chelsey, and they were so drawn in several family-pieces (114) by Hans Holben for Sir Thomas, who first recommended that famous artist to King Henry the Eighth, after he had kept him two years privately to paint for him in his house at Chelsey. He was sent to Sir Thomas by Erasmus, who in compliance to this friend's request to have his picture, procured Holben to draw it, and then sent the Painter with it to England (115). P

MORE [HENRY], an eminent Divine and Platonic Philosopher, was born October 12, 1614, at Grantham in Lincolnshire, where his father, Alexander More, resided; a gentleman of a fair fortune and estate, and of distinguished probity as well as piety (a); but being puritanically inclined, and a zealous Calvinist, he took especial care to breed up his children in those principles. With this caution our author, who was his second son, was first put to school to a private master, of an established character in that persuasion, and continued under his direction 'till the fourteenth year of his age; at which time his excellent talents for learning being discerned by his uncle, he prevailed upon his father to send him to Eton. Accordingly thither he went, carrying along with him a strict and affectionate charge not to recede from those principles of religion in which he had been so carefully trained up [A]. But as, from his natural temper, he had secretly harboured a dislike

(a) Life of Dr Henry More, by Richard Ward, Rector of Inghelby in Lincolnshire, 1710, 8vo. p. 22. and dedication to Dr More's Philosophical Poems.

[A] Those principles in which he had been trained up.] He tells us himself, that he went to Eton school, not to learn any new precepts or institutes of religion. Accordingly, when his uncle came to know of the dispute dislike to the hard-heartedness, as he calls it, of the predestinarian doctrine, even from his infancy; so now he was removed from the immediate inspection of his Calvinistic instructors, he indulged his thoughts upon this subject more freely, and quickly grew into a firm and unshaken persuasion, young as he was, that those tenets were utterly inconsistent with the justice and goodness of God [B]. And he had not been long at Eton, when he disputed stoutly against this Calvinistical predestination with his elder brother, who came thither to make him a visit in company with his uncle. The account which he gives himself of this dispute, and of the state of his thoughts at that time, shews at once an amiable simplicity in his manners, and a boyish juvenility in his understanding. He was constitutionally melancholy, and unalterably inclined to religious contemplations; in so much, that from his first childhood an inward sense of the Divine Presence was so strong upon him, that he did then believe there could be no word or thought hidden from God. At the same time, with regard to Predestination, he came seriously and deliberately to this conclusion, that if he was one of those predestinated unto hell, where all things are full of cursing and blasphemy, yet he would behave himself there patiently and submissively towards God; and if there was any thing more than another that was acceptable to him, that he would set himself to do with a sincere heart, and to the utmost of his power; being certainly persuaded, that if he thus demeaned himself, God would hardly keep him long in that place (b) [C]. These reflections, however, were only occasionally indulged as they rose up in his mind, he was far from suffering them to draw him into a neglect of the main design of his parents in sending him to Eton-school. On the contrary, the extraordinary progress he made here in Greek and Latin, must needs be some satisfaction for the disappointment they met with in respect to his religious notions; for we are told, that his master would not unfrequently be in admiration at the exercises performed by him. There is something very amiable in his own modesty upon these occasions; the wonder and pleasure with which his master and others would sometimes read his exercises, was so far from elating him, that he was rather troubled and ashamed, as not knowing whether he could do so well another time. The uncle's advice having succeeded hitherto, his father left the further conduct of his education to him [D]; by whose direction having spent about three years at Eton, he went to Cambridge, where he was admitted of Christ's-college in 1631, and at his own earnest solicitations under a tutor that was no Calvinist (c). Being now arrived at the fountain of learning, he immediately abandoned every other pute, mentioned a little lower in the text, which he had with his elder brother upon Predestination, he not only chid him severely for it, but even threatened him with correction and a rod, for his immature philosophizing in such matters (1).

[B] Inconsistent with the justice and goodness of God. We are obliged to our author for an account of the true state of his mind in this first part of his life, which indeed no body but himself could so graphically have described. He assures us, that he had in his childhood a connate sense of the existence of God and his providence, in the following picturesque expressions. As to what concerns the existence of God, though in that ground belonging to Eton college where the boys used to play, walking, as my manner was, slowly, and with my head on one side, and kicking now and then the stones with my feet, I was wont, says he, sometimes, with a sort of musical and melancholy murmur, to repeat or rather hum to myself those verses of Claudian:

Sæpe mihi dubiam traxit sententia mentem
 Curarent superi terras; an nullus inesset
 Rector, & incerto fluerent mortalia casu.

Of't hath my anxious mind divided stood,
 Whether the Gods did mind this lower world;
 Or whether no such ruler wife and good
 We had, and all things here by chance are hurl'd.

yet that exceeding hail and entire sense of God, which nature herself had planted in me, very easily silenced all such slight and poetical dubitations as these (2).

[C] God would hardly keep him long in hell. The hopes of changing the state of the damned is a very natural conceit for a boy of his age and thoughtful complexion: nor does he stand in need of an apology for misconceiving the exact sense of Epictetus's ἡ ἀεπειρομένη (3), or fate, by which that author probably meant nothing else but God's sovereign power and providence in ordering the affairs of this world, not subject either to opposition or mutability. In this sense Marcus Antoninus, who was a great admirer of Epictetus (4), uses the word εἰμαρμένη (5), and in the same sense it is used by Plotinus and the Platonists, as is observed by Meric Casaubon (6), and in this sense our author himself understood it afterwards. In his Ethics B. III. Ch. 1. he speaks of some, that by a divine sort of fate, are virtuous and good to a very great and heroic degree, and the same persons are intimated by him elsewhere (7), as coming into the drudgery of the world rather for the good of others, or by a divine force, than through their own proper fault, or any necessary or immediate congruity of their nature. All which is evidently borrowed from Plato, where he says some descend hither to declare the being and nature of the Gods, and for the greater health, purity, and perfection of this lower world. And thus, by the same way of arguing, he inferred, that if he was thrust into hell, it would be done for the same providential reasons; and therefore, God would not keep him long there. This error was rather a beauty than a blemish in a boy of fourteen, in whom the fallies of a sprightly wit and fancy are both more agreeable and more hopeful than a turn to dry and laborious criticism, which indeed was never our author's talent. He studied things more than words. With regard to his skill in the languages, though in reality it was very considerable, yet he said of it himself, that in this respect, he was like the man that passed by a garrison with a horse-shoe at his girdle, when a bullet being shot at him, struck right upon it, upon which he remarked, that a little armour was sufficient, if but well placed. And he often said, in writing his books, when he came to criticism and quotations, it was like going over plowed lands*.

thought, but that of gratifying his ardent thirst after knowledge. He tells us himself, that his tutor, presently after the first salutation and discourse with him, observing his melancholy thoughtful disposition, asked him whether he had a discernment of things good and evil; to which, says he, answering in somewhat a low voice, I said, I hope I have, when at the same time I was conscious to myself, that I had from my very soul a very strong sense and savoury discrimination as to all those matters, notwithstanding the mean while, a mighty and almost immoderate thirst after knowledge possessed me throughout, especially for that which was natural, and, above all others, that which was said to dive into the deepest causes of things, and Aristotle calls the first and highest philosophy or wisdom. Some time after this, his tutor observing his mind highly inflamed, and carried with an extraordinary eagerness and vehement career to knowledge, took an opportunity to ask him, why he was so above measure intent upon his studies, meaning for what end he did it, suspecting, as our author supposed, that there was only at bottom a certain itch after vain-glory, that by this means he might become an egregious Philosopher among those of his own standing; I answered briefly, and from my heart, That I may know. But, young man, what is the reason, says he again, that you have such an earnest desire to know things. To which I instantly replied, I desire, I say, so earnestly to know, that I may know; for, even at that time, the knowledge of natural and divine things seemed to me the highest pleasure and felicity imaginable. In this temper he eagerly read over the works of Aristotle, Cardan, Julius Scaliger, and other Philosophers of the greatest note. These he made himself master of before he took his degree of Bachelor of Arts, which was in 1635. But these did not answer his expectations; he felt none of that high delight which he had promised himself in these studies; their manner of treating Philosophy did not fall in with the peculiar turn and temper of his mind. Though he met with many things here and there in them, both acutely said and solidly observed, yet the greatest part of their words seemed to him either so false or uncertain, or else so obvious and trivial, that he looked upon himself as having plainly lost his time in reading them; and, in short, all the time, which was almost four years, that he spent in these studies, as to what concerned those matters he chiefly desired to be satisfied in (for as to the being of a God and the duties of morality he never had the least doubt), ended in a manner in nothing but mere Scepticism [E]. This disappointment, therefore, threw him to search for what he wanted in the Platonic writers and mystic divines, such as Marsilius Ficinus, Plotinus, Trismegistus, &c. Here he found his much longed for treasure [F]. The pretensions which

Ὅσων ἐγὼν πόντον εἶμι δὲ δῦσμον, εἰδὲ τίς
εἶμι, &c.

Thus Englished by himself.

Nor whence nor who I am, poor wretch know I,
Nor yet, O madness! whither I must go;
But in grief's crooked claws fast held I lie,
And live, I think, by force, lugg'd to and fro;
Asleep or wake all one. O father Jove,
'Tis brave we mortals live in clouds like thee:
Lies, night dreams, empty toys, fear, fatal love,
This is my life: I nothing else do see.

[F] Here he found his much longed for treasure. He was so highly transported with delight in finding this treasure, that he declares the disappointment he met with in Aristotle was even lucky to him, since it put him upon thinking seriously whether something greater and more divine, was not that supreme felicity of man, and not the knowledge of things, as he had 'till then imagined (11). Our author was now evidently plunging into the depth of the Platonic Philosophy, according to which, not the simple knowledge of things, as they stand created in the world, but their archetypal ideas in the divine mind, is the proper food of the human mind; which food is only to be obtained by passing through the purgative and illuminative, to the unitive life; this is the doctrine of the mystic Divines. And our author himself tells, 'that among all the writings of this kind, none so much pierced and affected him as that golden little book, with which Luther was so prodigiously pleased, entituled, Theologia Germanica. That precept particularly which this author so mightily inculcates, that we should thoroughly put off, and extinguish our own proper will; that being thus dead to ourselves, we may live alone to God, and do all things whatsoever by his instinct or plenary permission, was so conatural, says our doctor, and agreeable to my most intimate reason and conscience, that I could not of any thing whatsoever be more clearly and certainly convinced, which sense yet, continues he, (that no one may use that insipid and idle expression, quales legimus, tales evadimus, such as we read, such we are) that truly golden book did not then first implant in my soul, but struck and rous'd it, as it were, out of a sleep in me; which it did verily as in a moment, or the twinkling of an eye (12). It may be proper to observe, that the Theologia Germanica was written by one John Taulerus a Dominican monk, who flourished in the fourteenth century, and being thought to be favoured with revelations from heaven, he was siled the Illuminated Divine. He preached chiefly at Cologne and Strasburg, and died in 1361 (13); he wrote several treatises in the mystical way (one intitled De decem cæcitatibus, & quatuordecim divini amoris radicibus) which are most of them comprized in this volume, intitled, Theologia Germanica, which was translated into Latin by Surius (which passed for the original 'till 1615) and then by Sebastian Castalio. The author wrote it in the German language, and it went through a great number of editions from 1518 to the year 1700, when it was printed in French at Amsterdam. What Luther says of it may be found in the first volume of his works in Latin (14), and is to this effect: I am sensible, that this doctor is unknown to the schools of Divines, and therefore, perhaps, much despised, but I have found in him, tho' his writings are all in the German language, more solid and true divinity, than is found in all the doctors of all the universities, or than can be found in their opinions. This is mere panegyrick, let us hear the character given him by one of undoubted skill in these matters; The character, says that writer, of this illuminated author, is in my opinion as follows: That the soul by the mortification of it's passions and vices, by the practice of virtue, by the denial of itself, it's will, and self love, and it's whole activity, and of all created beings, should return into it's internal fund where it seeks God, and finds him at last, who manifests himself by the birth of his divine word, and the inspiration of his holy spirit; and that afterwards, which those authors make; of arriving at extraordinary degrees of illumination by their institutes, entirely captivated Mr More's fancy; he pursued their method with great feriousness, and an uncommon intenseness of application: and in three or four years, had reduced himself into such a thin state of body, and began to talk of such particular experiences and communications, as brought him into some suspicion of being touched with enthusiasm [G]. In the beginning of 1640, he composed his Psycho Zoia, or the Life of the Soul; wherein he comprized the chief speculations and experiences he fell into by persisting in this way, and he even believed himself stirred up to write this poem by some heavenly impulse of mind. He took the degree of Master of Arts the preceding year, and being chosen Fellow of his college (d), became a tutor to several persons of very great quality *, as well as others, and, among the rest, to those two remarkable friends, Sir John Finch and Sir Thomas Baynes †. The former of these was brother to Mrs Anne Finch, by marriage Lady Conway, who may be called another of the doctor's pupils at a distance, or out of college. This lady (whose genius and temper was nearly allied to the doctor's) had the misfortune to fall into Quakerism, from which our author laboured many years to reclaim her without success. This intercourse with her Ladyship brought him into the knowledge and acquaintance of the famous Sir William Pen, and several other leaders of that sect (e), with whom he had many free conferences both personally and in writing; and he seems to have been peculiarly qualified for such engagements [H].

* Among others, Lord Radnor was one.

(d) When he stood for a Fellowship, they were afraid of him as first as a melancholy man, till some that knew him better assured them, that though he was studious and serious, yet he was a very pleasant companion, and, indeed, in his way one of the merriest Greeks they were acquainted with. Life of Dr More, p. 120.

afterwards, by a lasting and continual introversion, it should remain in this interior state, in which God may produce in it his will, his wonders, and his special direction; of which this author speaks but generally. Thus writes the author of the new edition of the Theologia Germanica (15), printed in 1700, as already mentioned.

[G] Touched with enthusiasm [As soon as he had gone through the exercises mentioned in the preceding note, he says he felt the divine seed sown in him, whence grew an indifference to all his other studies, and he became solicitous about nothing so much as a more full union with this divine and celestial principle, the inward flowing well spring of life eternal. So far all is intelligible, and within the reach of an ordinary capacity. But what follows is of a higher nature, when he professes (and no body ever doubted his sincerity) to declare the thing as it was: That there shone in upon him daily a greater assurance than ever he could have expected, even of those things which before he had the greatest desire to know; inasmuch, that within three or four years he was got into a most joyous and lucid state, and such plainly as is ineffable. This, however, according to his custom, he endeavoured to express as far as lay in his power, in another stanza of eight verses contrasted to the former in Rem. [E], under the title of Εὐπορία, i. e. fullness and perviousness as follows:

Ἐκ θεῶθεν γέγονα ἀθάνατον ὄντι ἀμύθητον ἀκρίσι, &c.

In English thus:

I come from heaven; am an immortal ray
Of God; O joy! and back to God shall go:
And here sweet love on's wings me up doth stay.
I live I'm sure, I joy this life to know,
Night, and vain dreams begone: father of lights,
We live as thou, clad with eternal day.
Faith, wisdom, love, fixed joy, free-winged might,
This is true life; all else death and decay (16).

This joy seems to have something enthusiastic in it. His character, with regard thereto, is not expressed amifs by Mr Norris, who styles him the Intellectual Epicure (17). 'Tis certain he continued to express himself with the same extatic rapturous warmth all his life afterwards, till a little before his death. It appears by his writings every where (18), but no where more freely than in the following passage, in which he breaks out thus. 'I say that a free, divine, universalized spirit is worth all; how lovely, how magnificent a state is the soul of man in, when the life of God inactuating her, shoots her along with himself thro' heaven and earth, makes her unite with, and after a sort, feel herself animate the whole world, &c. This is to become deiform, to be thus suspended, not by imagination, but by union of life; ἕνωσιν ἑσθ' ἰσθ' αὐτῶν ἀναμύθητον, joining centres with God, and by a sensible touch to be held up from the clotty, dark, personality of this compacted body. Here is love! here is freedom! here is justice and equity in the supersensual causes of them. He that is here looks upon all things as one: and on himself, if he can then mind himself, as a part of the whole. After much more, both of zeal and triumph, he goes on thus: Nor am I out of my wits, as some may fondly interpret me, in this divine freedom: but the love of God compelled me. Nor am I at all, Philalathes, enthusiastic. For God does not ride me as a horse, and guide me I know not whither myself, but converseth with me as a friend, and speaks to me in such a dialect, as I understand fully, and can make others understand, that have not made shipwreck of the faculties that God hath given them, by superstition or sensuality. For with such I cannot converse, because they don't converse with God, but only pity them or am angry with them, as I am merry and pleasant with thee. For God hath permitted to me, all these things, and I have it under the broad seal of heaven. Who doth charge me? God doth acquit me: for he hath made me full Lord of the four elements, and hath constituted me Emperor of the world. I am in the fire of choler, and am not burnt; in the water of phlegm, and am not drowned; in the airy sanguine, and yet not blown away with every blast of transient pleasure or vain doctrines of men. I descend also into the sad earthly melancholy, and yet am not buried from the sight of my God. I am, Philalathes, (tho' I dare say thou takest me for no bird of Paradise) Incola cœli in terra, an inhabitant of Paradise and heaven upon earth.— I sport with the beasts of the earth; the lion licks my hand like a spaniel, and the serpent sleeps upon my lap, and stings me not. I play with the fowls of heaven, and the birds of the air sit finging on my fist. All these things are true in a sober sense, and the dispensation I live in, is more happiness above all measure, than if thou could'st call down the moon so near thee by thy magic charms, that thou may'st kiss her, as she is said to have kissed Endymion, or cou'd'st stop the course of the sun, or, which is all one, with one stamp of thy foot stay the motion of the earth (19). He makes an apology for all such over adventurous flights as this in another place (20), and the following instance sets the prodigious sensibility of his mind, whence they sprung, in the fullest light. We are assured, that as he diverted himself sometimes with playing on the theorbo, a solemn instrument, the power of the musick added to the rapturous pleasure of his thoughts, has been so overcomingly great, that he was forced to desist †.

[H] He was peculiarly qualified to engage the Quakers. [He had by his own confession a natural touch of enthusiasm in his complexion (21), and no body better understood the extent of fancy, and nature of enthusiasm than he did. Few have wrote with that force and clearness, that he has done upon this argument; and he owns himself, that he was enabled to do it with greater life and judgment, because of the experience he had in it, he knowing, by this means, what was in the enthusiasts better than they themselves (22). And indeed from the general nature, and found, and excellent frame, and tenour, of his writings, it appears, that he had so far subdued it in himself, as to prevent

He had a great esteem for Lady Conway, a very high degree of friendship with her, and at her death she left him a legacy of 400 pounds*. This lady was afflicted with such pains in her head, as she could get no relief for, though she had travelled into several parts of Europe to visit the most eminent Physicians for that purpose. At last the famous Baron Van Helmont lived in the family, and frequented the Quakers meetings with her. There was once a design of printing some remains of this lady after her death, and the preface was actually wrote by our author under the person of Van Helmont. In which disguise he draws the character of this lady with so much address, that the most rigid Quaker would see every thing he could wish for in it, and yet the soberest Christian is entirely satisfied with it (f). Some of his treatises were drawn up at her particular request, as, among others, his Conjectura Cabalistica, and Philosophiæ Teutonice Censura [I]; and he composed several others at Ragley (g), the seat of her lord in Warwickshire, where, by intervals, he passed a considerable part of his time [K]. And, in 1675, he accepted a prebend it from carrying him into any principles that were inconsistent with sound morality, and a decent external behaviour. In the mean time, his expression, even upon this subject, was frequently very little different from those of the Quakers. As, where he says, that 'sober morality conscientiously kept to, is like the morning light reflected from the higher clouds, and a certain prodrome of the sun of righteousness itself; but when he is risen above the horizon, the same virtues then stream immediately from his visible body, and they are the very members of Christ according to the spirit, and he that is come hither is a pillar in the temple of God for ever: for he reacheth the second covenant, which he can in no more likelyhood break, than he can lay violent hands on himself to the taking away of his natural life.' Farther, 'He that is come hither, God hath taken him to be his own familiar friend, and tho' he speaks to others aloof, oft in outward religions and parables, yet he leads this man by the hand, teaching him intelligible documents, upon all the objects of his providence, speaks to him plainly in his own language, sweetly insinuates himself, and possesseth all his faculties, understanding, reason, and memory. This is the darling of God, and a Prince amongst men, far above the dispensation of either miracle or prophecy (23).'

The reason of our author's concerning himself with these people was, because, especially at the first, he pitied their inward and melancholic wandrings; believed there was much seriousness and simplicity of life in many of them, and because they professed the guidance of the spirit; which made him very desirous to bring them, if possible, into a right way, and willing to own and commend their simplicity. But this he thought only of the better sort of them: for he observes, that though he could not but allow there might be some among them good and sincere hearted men, and it may be, nearer to the purity of Christianity for the life and power of it, than many others; yet, says he, I am well assured that the generality of them are prodigiously melancholy, and some few persons possessed with the Devil (24). With regard to these, as George Fox in particular, he said, that in conversing with him, he felt himself turned, as it were, into brass (25). But he had another opinion of Sir William Pen, and expressly declares his book No Cross no Crown, to be a serious treatise, and very pious and christian in the main (26). He therefore addresses himself to this author in his own way, and after he has proved the preparatory use of baptism and the eucharist, he allows the different degrees of conviction which arise from the external evidence of the truth of Christ's doctrines, and the internal, which latter he divides (agreeably to the language of the Quakers) into two kinds. First, when we arrive to a discovery, that there is an innate worthiness, loveliness, and reasonableness, in the commands of Christ: but yet this conviction is more imaginary and rational than substantial and vital, though it be accompanied, may be, with some rudiments of real regeneration. But the third is not only internal conviction that we ought to do, or be so and so, as being the most perfect and lovely state, but that we find it to be our natural joy and pleasure, and the very life of our soul, and fullest content of our heart, to be and do as our Saviour has prescribed unto us: which is the condition of a higher advance in real regeneration, when the spirit of holiness is to us, what our natural spirit was, and we are made partakers to this degree of the divine nature. Then he goes on to attack all the peculiarities in the dress and address of this sect, in a handsome and winning manner, by making it a question, only how consistent their doctrine and practice in these points are, with that generosity, freedom, charity, and kind complacency, that one would think, says he, did naturally accompany a truly Christian spirit. I wish, concludes he, the Quakers would disencumber those excellent things they profess and give witness to, from some things as make them seem so uncouth and ridiculous; that the most excellent things of the Gospel be not slighted by men, through the oddness and indiscretion of such as seem the most zealous professors of them (27).

[I] Philosophiæ Teutonice Censura.] This was a censure upon the Torricellian experiment, and being attacked by Judge Hale in two tracts, was defended by our author, in Remarks upon the two late ingenious Treatises, which coming out in 1676, the publisher of the Philosophical Transactions put the following sleight upon it. 'Instead of giving an account of this tract, we shall desire the reader to compare with it what hath been not long since published by Mr Boyle and Dr Wallis in Hydrostatics in 1672, and to a discourse on gravity and gravitation, grounded upon experimental observations in 1675. These pieces being well laid together, and the doctrine of hydrostatics well understood and applied, will make it easy to the judicious and considerate reader what to judge of the whole controversy here treated of.' Our author's way of philosophizing was also animadverted on by a Cantabrigian in the same paper. 'I cannot understand, says this writer, why the learned Dr More, famous with us at Cambridge, should reduce so many effects to any principle distinct from the settled laws of nature and God's providence; but that he is too much devoted to the notions of the Platonists, as appears in all his writings, and others of the Ancients, that held the world animate, and this spirit of nature to be the soul or deity of it*: for never any supposed both God and this spirit. This explication of facts is no more than to say, it is produced by an universal cause, as the sun hardens clay, softens wax, &c. but methinks he might have told us how it acts, or what natural means it uses.'

[K] He passed a considerable part of his time at Ragley.] Here he once met the famous Valentine Greatrakes, who had been sent for to try his skill upon her Ladyship's head-ach. As this person made a great noise in his time, and his practice was abetted by our author, who hath occasionally discoursed concerning him ||. We shall give the following short account of him. He was the son of William Greatrakes, Esq; and born at Affane in the county of Waterford in Ireland, on St Valentine's day [Feb. 14] 1628; was bred a Protestant at the free school at Lismore, and at thirteen years of age designed to be sent to the college in Dublin, but the rebellion breaking out in that kingdom, he was forced with his mother to fly into England, where they were entertained by his uncle Edmund Harris †; after whose death, his mother committed him to the care of John Daniel Getfus, a High German, Minister of Stoke Gabriel in Devonshire, with whom he spent some years in the studies of Humanity and Divinity. After five or six years absence he returned to his native country, at that time in a most deplorable state, which made him retire to the castle of Capersquin, where he spent a year in contemplation, much afflicted, as he says, with the wickedness of the world ‡. About 1649, he became a Lieutenant in the regiment of Roger Lord Broghill, then acting in Munster against the Irish Papists and others then called rebels, and on the disbanding of a great part of the army in 1656, he prebend in the church of Gloucester, being collated to it by this lady's brother, Lord Finch, then Lord High-Chancellor of England, afterwards Earl of Nottingham, who gave him a still greater mark of his respect and esteem, in conferring that preferment at his request upon Dr Edward Fowler, afterwards Bishop of that diocese. We see with what views our author accepted of this preferment, and it was the only one he ever could be persuaded to accept, after he had devoted himself to a college life, which he did very early; for in 1642 he resigned the rectory of Ingoldsby in Lincolnshire, soon after he had been presented to it by his father, who had bought the perpetual advowson for him. He had once some thoughts of settling upon it, but these quickly gave way to his stronger propensities to a life of undisturbed study and contemplation. In this way he had made to himself a paradise (it is his own expression), and he was so apprehensive of forfeiting it by any change in his present situation, that for fear thereof we are told, he even declined the mastership of his own college; into which he might have been chosen in preference to Dr Cudworth in 1654. No wonder after this, that he withstood all the courtship that was made to him to accept of several very considerable promotions in Ireland, as the deanery of Christ-Church in Dublin, and the provostship of the college there, as well as the deanery of St Patrick's, which had no power over him, notwithstanding he was assured these were designed only to pave the way to something higher; there being two bishoprics in view offered to his choice, one of which was valued at 1500 pounds per annum at least. This open attempt of his friends in Ireland to draw him thither proving ineffectual, a further trial was made to decoy him into a bishopric in England. In this view, a very good one being procured for him, his friends got him as for as Whitehall, in order to the kissing his Majesty's hand for it; but as soon as he understood the business, which it was then necessary to acquaint him with, and 'till then had been concealed from him, he could not, by any means or upon any account, be prevailed upon to stir a step further towards it (b). As all the kind arts practised by his friends proved unable to draw him from his retirement at any other time, so in those of the general confusion, he had the good luck to escape being driven out of it by the mad zeal of his foes; and that too, notwithstanding he rendered himself obnoxious to their fury, by constantly denying the Covenant, the taking of which was made to others a condition of keeping what preferments they had before, and many of his nearest relations were active in the King's cause, and deep sufferers for it. He saw, and once particularly wept over, the miseries of his country [L]; but in the general, Archimedes liké (i), he was so busy in his chamber with his pen retired to Affane, and was made Clerk of the Peace of the county of Cork, Register for Transplantation, and Justice of the Peace. But being removed from his places after the Restoration, he grew discontented. About 1662, he had an impulse, or a strange persuasion of mind (of which he was not able to give any rational account to another) that there was bestowed on him the gift of curing the King's evil, which after some time he communicated to his wife, who shortly brought to him one William Maker of Salterbridge, in the parish of Lismore, very grievously afflicted with this distemper in his eyes, cheek, and throat; thereupon, he laid his hands on the places affected, and prayed to God for Jesus's sake to heal him: the child being brought again in three days time, was observed to be much better, and in a month's time, was perfectly recovered. After this he cured several others, not meddling with any other distemper 'till about the end of three years, when he cured some of agues; all done by stroaking with his hands. On the first Sunday after Easter, April 2, 1665, early in the morning, he had the like impulse, that he had the gift of healing in general bestowed upon him; and on the Wednesday following, he went to one Mr Dean's house at Lismore, where there came in a poor man, that with a pain in his loins and flank, went almost double, and had a most grievous ulcerous leg, at whose request Greatrakes put his hands on the loins and flank, and immediately run the pains out of him, so that he could stand upright without the least trouble. Then he put his hands on the ulcerous leg, which forthwith changed colour, from black became red, three of the five ulcers in it closed up, and the rest in a few hours after: so that he went out well, that could hardly by the help of his staff crawl in; and in two days worked at his business, being a mason. After this, Greatrakes cured many diseases of all sorts, by stroaking. But the Clergy being alarmed*, he was cited to the Bishop's Court, and prohibited to proceed in that course. Hereupon he came to England †, and in Jan. 1665, by the invitation of Edw. Lord Conway, repaired to Ragley in Warwickshire, to cure by stroaking his Lady of the head-ach, but could give her no relief; yet continuing there three weeks, he cured innumerable people in those parts, which was attested by an eye-witness, Henry Stubbe, who then practised physick at Stratford upon Avon, in a book intituled, The Miraculous Conformer, &c. Oxon. 1666, 4to (23). Afterwards, Mr Greatrakes repaired to Whitehall, by his Majesty's command, and performed several cures there and in London, but making more mistakes, as 'tis said, than he did cures, there came out Wonders no Miracles, or Mr Val. Greatrakes's Gift of Healing examined, &c. London, 1666, 4to (29). In answer to which, there was published A brief Account of Mr Val. Greatrakes, and divers of his strange cures, by him lately performed, Lond. 1666, 4to. written by himself, in a letter to the Honourable Robert Boyle, Esq; &c. (30). Dr More being persuaded that his cures were merely natural, and owing to the peculiar happy temperament of his blood, told Mr Boyle so, who once asked him what he thought of these cures, which then so much surprized and puzzled all the world. The doctor also informed him of one Coker, who brought a dead arm to life once by the same method of stroaking, about ten years before; and he said, that enquiring into Coker's temper and constitution of those who told him the story, he was persuaded the cure was natural, but that his blood and spirits were raised to that height, that they would attack his brain; which proved true, for Coker was struck mad not very long after. He thought there might be a fanative and healing contagion, as well as a morbid and venomous one (31). Upon the whole, Greatrakes seems to be touched with enthusiasm as well as Dr More. While he was in the castle of Capersquin, he says, 'he saw so much of the madness and wickedness of the world, that his life became a burthen to him, and his soul was as weary of this habitation of clay, as ever was galley-slave of the oar; which brought his life even to the threshold of death, so that his legs had hardly strength to carry his enfeebled body about (32).'

[L] He wept over the miseries of his country. In his Immortality of the Soul he thus bewails the miseries of those times, in a strain little inferior even to Milton, who, by the way, was his fellow-collegian.

Can wars, and jars, and fierce contention,
Swoln hatred, and consuming envy spring
From piety? no, 'tis opinion
And

pen and lines, as not to mind much the bustles and affairs of the world that were without. He wrote his two books of the Immortality of the soul in these times; and in the beginning of them held a correspondence with the famous Des Cartes (for whom he had an uncommon esteem) [M] upon several points of his Philosophy, especially in regard to the subject of Dioptrics*. The truth is, our author devoted his whole life to the writing of books, principally such as tended to settle the principles, and promote the practice, of religion and virtue; an employment, to which nature had not only given him a stronger bent, but had fitted him better for it than for any other (k) [N]. And thence he concluded himself marked out, by a particular providence, to be serviceable this way, not only to that generation, but even to the most distant ages of the world [O]. A good and great design; and he would have succeeded much better in it, had he not indulged his fancy too much in some opinions [P]. It is certain his piety and learning were universally

* This is esteemed the best of Des Cartes's pieces, and accordingly we find our author read it with care and attention, and not without judgment, as appears from his letters to Des Cartes upon it in his Philosophical Collections,

Full of good will and meek expectancy,
Full of true justice and pure verity

(33) Immortality of the Soul, B. II. canto 3. These lines were wrote upon the news of some fore battle,

[M] He had an uncommon esteem for Des Cartes.] This shews itself upon all occasions in his writings, but hardly any where so strongly as in the Second Lath of Ahaz, where he makes use of it as a foil to set off the ineffable worth of his favourite principle the divine fense; thus, 'Nor am I become cold to my own poems, for I say, that that divine spirit and life that lies under them, is worth not only all the magic that thou pretendest to, but all that thou art ignorant of besides, yea, and Des Cartes's philosophy to boot. Des Cartes's philosophy is indeed a fine neat subtle thing, but for the true ornament of the mind, bears a greater proportion to that principle I told you of, than the dry bones of a snake made up elegantly into a hatband, is to the royal cloathing of Solomon. But other natural philosophies in respect of Des Cartes's, are even less than a few chips of wood to a well erected fabric.' Farther than this, in his Enthusiasmus Triumphant, he says, Des Cartes, in drawing up his system of the world, was inspired, if any man ever was. Though this high opinion of Des Cartes's system may be thought to do little credit to our author's judgment at this time of day, yet it is well known that at the time when this was written, and long afterwards, that philosophy was received at Cambridge with implicit faith; and it is as well known, that the authority of that philosopher was founded and established there by the reputation of Dr More. In the mean time, as to his expression that Des Cartes was inspired, it will be readily imputed by any reader of the doctor's works, to the strength of his imagination, which never fails to rise into a degree of poetical enthusiasm: and, however great his esteem might be for that philosopher, yet, it is certain it did no restrain him from making freely such remarks and objections as occurred to him in reading his works. For instance, Des Cartes treating of the cause of colours, having asserted, that a few only of the rays of light are reflected from the surface of the sea water (34). Our doctor makes the following remark: nunquid igitur radiorum paucitas cœruleum colorem generat? videtur hoc haud ita consonum præcedentibus. Quippe quod cum supra statueris colores oriri ex varia proportione rotationis sphaerularum ad motum earundem rectum, & particulatim cœruleum ex rotatione minore quam progressu proficisci, quasi in eo ipso constaret ipsa cœrulei coloris ratio; num tamen causam referens non tam ad rotationis defectum, quam paucitatem radiorum reflectentium a superficie maris. Hic igitur quæro, num sentias nullam aliam esse colorum rationem, præter eam quam ipse tam subtiliter & ingeniose exposuisti, an & aliis modis colores oriri possint, nulla habita thing in this story, it may account for his resigning Ingo'dly so soon after ratione rotationis globulorum matuque rectilinei; præsertim cum & ipse innuis aquam marinam cœruleam, videri ob paucitatem duntaxat radiorum (35). Here our author suggests, that the sea colour might probably be owing to the paucity of the reflected rays of light, without any regard to the rotation and progressive motion of the globules assigned by Des Cartes for the cause of colours; an opinion which is very consistent with Sir Isaac Newton's Theory of Colours.

[N] He was peculiarly fitted for writing books.] His voice was somewhat inward, and so not fit for the pulpit. Upon this account he used to say among his friends, that he should not have known what to have done in the world, if he could not have preached at his fingers ends. And when some of the spiritualists pressed him upon this point, he shewed some indignation at it, and said, he thought they would have him go up upon a stall, and thence preach to the people. But, says he, I have measured myself from the height to the depth, and know what I ought to do, and I do it (36). Mr Mede his fellow-collegian intimates, that writing was particularly troublesome to himself, because he could never be well contented with what he first did, but was apt to make everlasting blots and changes in it (37). Whereas Dr More had this particular in his way, that what he first did, must go usually as he first wrote it. His first draught, he would say, must stand, and if he saw any faults, it was not easy to him to correct them; indeed he could do it, but this was against the grain, and seldom seemed so favourable to him as the rest*. The truth of this appears upon the face of his manuscripts, which being all writ fair and soul with his own hand, there was generally a very even thread, and much cleanness of writing. Though he used to say, that in writing his works, he was forced to cut his way through a crowd of thoughts as through a wood, and that he threw off in his compositions as much as would make an ordinary Philosopher (38). However, he said his thoughts were many times as clear as he could almost wish them to be (39), and that his dreams were often regular, so that he could study in them.

[O] Marked by providence to be useful this way, &c.] Dr More was not exempted from the common foible of authors, a good conceit of his own productions. A natural fondness for these brats of the brain, some limbs at least of which he saw crushed and maimed even in the cradle, kindled him into the warmest resentment and indignation. In this temper he thus expresses himself in a private letter to a friend. But assure your self that truth which you so much kick against in my publick discourses, nothing will ever get the ascendant of, but it will at long run lay flat all the hypochondraical fanaticism in Christendom †. And in the same temper he refers himself on another occasion, to wife and peaceful posterity; Perspicax & pacifica posteritas, and to a very illustrious time in those latter ages of the world both for wisdom and piety: when he says he doubts not but his pains and ardor in promoting the publick good in some great instances, will be of use and approved. Sometimes he said, that like the ostrich he had laid his eggs in the sand, which he hoped would prove vital and prolific in time (40). In another place he writes thus: I thank God, I glory in nothing, but that I feel myself an instrument in the hands of God to work the good of men (41). And he once said he had been shot as a fiery dart into the world, and he hoped he had hit the mark (42).

[P] Had indulged his fancy too much in some opinions.] There is hardly a more conspicuous instance of the greatness and littleness of man than what the doctor's example furnishes. His learning, his virtue, his divine faith, his charity, and his humility, were a perfect contrast to his groundless fancies, his monstrously absurd doctrines, and his extravagant self-conceit in both. For in the first, because his urine smelt like violets, and his body, especially in the entrance on the spring season, had a sweet odour, the ordinary fragrant of redolent youth in healthy and temperate persons, he construed it to be a perfection peculiar to himself as a favourite of heaven (43). However, this is nothing in comparison of those much greater favours which he every where talks of in his celestial converse and communications; of which not the least extraordinary is the vision (as it is called) of Theomanes, which, when some well wishers to him would have excused as only an ingenious invention to embellish his discourse, he asserted to be no fiction but a real thing, and what surprized him without the least desire or expectation of his, in the very manner and circumstances that he relates (44). His Enchiridion Metaphysicum he himself was sensible would be thought whimsical by most readers (45). But the account he gives of the state of the world in the seventh chiliad, or thousand years, has been generally thought to favour strongly of enthusiasm. I do verily conceive, says he, that there will be so great union betwixt God and man, that they shall not only partake of his spirit, but that the inhabitants of the ethereal region will openly converse with those of the terrestrial. And such frequent conversation and ordinary visits of our cordial friends of that other world, will take away all toil of life and the fear of death amongst men: they being very cheerful and pleasant here in the body, and being well assured they shall be better when they are out of it: for heaven and earth shall then shake hands together, or become as one house; and to die shall be accounted but to ascend into a higher room. And tho' this dispensation for the present be but very sparingly set on foot, yet I suppose there may some few have a glimpse of it. Concerning whom accomplished posterity may happily utter something answerable to that of our Saviour concerning Abraham, who tasted of Christianity before Christ was come in the flesh. Abraham saw my day and rejoiced at it. And without all doubt that plenitude of happiness that hath been reserved for future times, the preface and presentation of it, hath in all ages been a very great joy and triumph to all holy men and prophets

(46). The doctor not only thought himself extraordinarily gifted for explaining the prophecies, but believed that he was under the direction of a particular providence as to the time of his writing upon that subject. With regard to the first, when he was engaged in his exposition of the Apocalypse, he said his nag was but over free, and went even faster than he desired, but he thought it was the right way. And further, that all the time he was writing that piece, he seemed to be in the air (47). The other remark will be justified by his own words, when he tells us, that after he had finished his Antidote against Atheism, he thought at that time to have added a treatise concerning the divine providence. And that he was sufficiently furnished for it, but found himself very strongly hindered and entangled in his thoughts in setting about it, which made him desist: when yet, at the same time, he set about, and finished his Conjectura Cabalistica †, in all appearance a more difficult province, with wonderful celerity and success. 'Tis, he says, he knew not the meaning of them, nor what to make of it; but understood it afterwards, when upon his actual writing his divine dialogues, he perceived that before he was not sufficiently ripe for it (48). These last words seem particularly to point to prophecies, since it is here he had his vision just mentioned, which he declares to be consonant both to Scripture and Philosophy, and to be useful for digesting all those visions in the Apocalypse, that appertain to the last trumpet into their right order, according to synchronism (49). And in the same place he professeth, he understands clearly the truth of several prophecies of the mainest concernment (which yet many others pretend to be very obscure) whether he will or no. And then he immediately declares, he is so far from being enthusiastical or fanatical, that whereas enthusiasm is a false surmise of a man's self, that he is inspired when he is not. He, on the contrary, doth disclaim his being at any time inspired, though a man would think sometimes that he is. Thus, to avoid the imputation of enthusiasm, he confines the sense of the word to a belief of having communications by the immediate act of the Holy Ghost; but at the same time he confesses it of himself in the sense of supernatural communications, which we shall see presently he was persuaded were made to him according to God's appointment by his particular genius, like Socrates's demon, and the whole tenour of the Platonic Philosophy. In which view he once significantly said, That there was something about us, that knew better than ourselves what we would be at (50). And besides this he related it very seriously, that from his infancy he had this thing along imprinted on his mind: That as he lay one moonshiny night in the cradle awake, he was taken up by a matron-like person with a large Roman nose, saluted, and deposited there again (51). There is a remarkable story of this kind related by Bodinus, of a person who assured that author he was constantly directed in all his actions by one of these genii or spirits, who communicated his hints by sensible raps upon something that was near at hand, without speaking at all, which it seems he was not empowered to do: and therefore, when the person once attempted to speak to him, the spirit shut the door with that vehemence as if he had knocked upon it with a hammer, shewing thereby his dislike of the matter. Bodinus enquired whether he did ever see the shape and form of the spirit, he told him, that while he was awake, he never saw any thing, but a certain light very bright and clear, and of a round compass and figure: but that once being in great jeopardy of his life, and having heartily prayed to God, that he would be pleased to provide for his safety, about break of day, amidst his slumbering and waking, he spied on his bed, where he lay, a young boy clad in a white garment, tintured somewhat with a touch of purple, and of a visage admirably beautiful and lively (52). Dr More, in decanting upon this story, speaks of the raptures of devotion that may be caused by a good spirit, and of the consociation of these genii in general, in such a manner, and so applicable to himself, as to give room to suspect his being conscious of not a few sensations of this kind; but he seems to be of opinion, that his genius united himself to his body like another soul, in which sense it is, that he here says how far a man shall be carried beyond himself by this redoubled soul in him, none, I think, can well conceive, unless they had the experience of it (53). We would not be understood by any thing here said, to deny, that Dr More, who was undoubtedly a person of extraordinary piety might receive some extraordinary assistances. We are very sensible that the world has generally acknowledged, and seems to have experienced some extraordinary assistance and directions given to good men by the Deity (54). Our business is, and we intend nothing else, than to relate the fact how it has happened that the doctor's works did not answer his pious design in writing them, and are at present fallen into a general neglect and disesteem. It is certain his exposition of the prophecies are far from being approved by the best Divines, and if to what has been already produced be added his doctrine concerning the pre-existence of souls, the infinity of worlds, and the unmercenary love of God; we shall have the grounds of an observation made by the noble author of the Characteristics, that 'Dr More's Enchiridion Ethicum is a right good piece of sound morality, tho' the doctor himself in other English pieces would not abide by it, but made different excursions into other regions, and was perhaps himself as great an enthusiast as any of those he wrote against (55)'. Notwithstanding which, Dr Outram said (56), that he looked upon Dr More as the holiest person upon the face of the earth, and that whenever there was any more than ordinary occasion for the exercise of prudence and virtue, he never knew Dr More to fail. And Bishop Burnet tells us, that he was an open hearted and sincere Christian Philosopher, who studied to establish men in the great principles of religion against atheism, that was then beginning to gain ground, chiefly by reason of the hypocrisy of some, and the fantastical conceits of the more sincere enthusiasts (57). Our author's own judgment of his proposed as a candidate by Dr Wilkins and Dr Cudworth, June 4, 1661, and elected Fellow soon after (l). In the same view, when the design of a philosophical meeting of the like kind at Cambridge was projected in 1684, Dr More was engaged to be a member (m). His writings were in so much vogue, that Mr Chishull, an eminent Bookfeller, declared, that for twenty years together, after the return of King Charles the Second, the Mystery of Godliness and Dr More's other Works ruled all the Bookfellers in London (n). But the most distinguished testimony of their worth was given by John Cockshuit, Esq; of the Inner Temple, who by his last Will left three hundred pounds to have three of his principal pieces translated into Latin. These were his Mystery of Godliness, Mystery of Iniquity, and his Philosophical Collections (o). This legacy induced our author, together with these, to put the rest of his English works which he thought worth printing into that language; and the whole collection was published in 1679 in three large volumes in folio. In undertaking the translation himself, his design was to appropriate Mr Cockshuit's legacy to the founding of three scholarships in Christ's-college; but an unforeseen accident deprived that society of the intended benefaction [Q]. However, the doctor made up this loss to the college by other donations in his life-time, and by the rectory of Ingoldsbey above-mentioned, the perpetuity of which he left to it by his Will (p). As soon as he had completed this edition of his Works, it is very probable, that, according to his usual custom, he forbore writing for some time [R]; it is certain he never finished any considerable piece afterwards. He enjoyed in the general, though chequered with some illnesses, an excellent habit both of body and mind; but in 1686 he was seized in the summer with a slow fever, attended with an intermitting pulse; and one evening, after supper, was taken in the Combination-room very ill, and sunk into a swoon. Yet he was not under any apprehensions of danger, and as soon as he came perfectly to himself, he said pleasantly, his distemper was wind, but he hoped it would not carry him away in a storm. However, not long after, he fell into a melancholy sadness and lowness of spirits, and his fever increasing the subsequent summer, he began to lose his sleep, and was under some apprehensions of being deprived of his senses, which yet he kept to the last. His strength wore away gradually, and he went out of life in the same easy and calm way that he had passed always in it; infomuch, that his nurse was not sensible of the moment of his departure, which happened about four or five o'clock in the morning, on the first of September 1687, in the seventy-third year of his age. He continued writing to the last, and had then under his hands Medela Mundi, or a practical treatise, which he called in that title, The Cure of the World. As to his person, he was for stature of the middle size, inclining to tallness. His body was in the general well proportioned, though of a thin habit, and his countenance serene and lively. His complexion somewhat ruddy in the prime of life; and though it grew rather pale in his latter years, yet it was always clear and spirited, and his eye hazle, and vivid as an eagle's. His temper was sanguine, with a large mixture of melancholy. His picture was twice drawn, and the print of it prefixed to his writings. The first of these draughts, placed before his theological volume, was not well executed, and had not the true air or spirit of his countenance. The second, by Loggan, is more lucky and exact, and contains in a sufficient measure the real visage of the doctor. The day before he died, his nephew, Gabriel More, being sent for out of the country, came to him, and notwithstanding what had passed between them, was far from being grateful or easy; the doctor was reconciled to him, made him his sole executor, and left a very large addition of estate to him. This gentleman is since dead, and at his death left the main of his estate, as the doctor once intended to do, to charitable uses. He buried his uncle decently September 3, 1687, in the chapel of Christ's-college (q), where he lies interred, together with Mr Mede and Dr Cudworth, the three illustrious and contemporary ornaments of that foundation. The doctor was possessed of an easy fortune, and, upon that account, not long before he died, said, there were two things which he repented he had not done; one was, that he had not abstained from wine, the other, that he had not lived a Fellow-Commoner in the college: notwithstanding, as to the first of these, he had works was not much beside the mark, that he should be almost alone, but they were such as might please a few melancholy persons who loved their Creator (58).

(58) His Life, p. 69.

[Q] An unforeseen accident deprived the society of the benefaction. Notwithstanding the great vogue of our author's writings beforementioned, yet there had been so many editions of them separately, and the world was so much stocked with them, that the Bookfeller would not venture to undertake to print the two first volumes of this new edition in Latin, without having two hundred pounds advanced for it; and the remaining hundred was spent in defraying the charges of the third (59).

(59) General preface to Vol. I. of this edition.

[R] He forbore writing for some time. After finishing some of his writings, he once said pleasantly enough, Now, for these three months, I will neither think a wise thought, nor speak a wise word, nor do an ill thing. He was so greatly harassed with the toil and drudgery of writing at some times, that he resolved against all such undertakings for the future in haste, and being once deeply engaged, he said, that when he got his hands again out of the fire, he would not very suddenly thrust them in afresh; and, that as soon as he was free from his present incumbent business, his purpose was to recoil into that dispensation he was in before he wrote or published any thing to the world; in which, says he, I very sparingly so much as read any books, but sought a more near union with a certain life and sense †, which I infinitely prefer, before the dryness of mere reason, or the wantonness of the trimmest imagination. In a letter to Dr Worthington, Master of Jesus College, he writes thus: "I am infinitely pleased that I find my obligation of writing books cut in pieces in me, and myself left free to my more private meditations. I have lived the servant of the publick hitherto: it is a great ease to me to be manumitted thus, and left to the polishing of myself, and licking myself whole of the wounds I have received in these hot services (60)."

had once tried the experiment for a year, and found his constitution would not suffer it; and, as to the latter, his chamber-door was an hospital to the needy. He also bestowed several large and particular charities frequently, and he had given his nephew, whose fortune was a long while strait, not only all that time, but even to his death, the profits of a farm that he had of a good value in Lincolnshire, besides the 400 pounds left him by Lady Conway already mentioned (r). And it is certain in the main, he looked back upon his life with so much satisfaction, that he said if he was to live it over again, he would do the very same things he had done. The writer of his life, who knew him well, has given a summary, as he calls it, of his character, in the following terms: 'I do verily believe, that never any man that was not more than human, had truer and more exalted apprehensions of the divine nature than he had; deeper and more sincere passions of love and of honour towards it; or, what is consequent upon this, a more triumphant joy and satisfaction in it: that never any one had a greater and more admiring sense of the whole boundless and most astonishing creation than he had (s); more enjoyment of mind again in it, charity and benignity towards it; that never any arrived to higher degrees of wisdom, righteousness, and virtue, take it all together, than he did; lived a life of greater or of truer happiness upon this earth, or had more lively apprehensions of the nature and glories of the life to come: that served the Church of God with greater faithfulness and zeal in what he did for it (t), or wished better to that, or universal mankind, in all respects whatsoever, than he did; or hath left, in fine, greater marks of it, or better testimonies of all this, behind him in his publick writings. And when I have instanced in these, with his intire faith in, and all the high sense he had of honour and veneration for the person and œconomy of our Lord Jesus Christ, I know not what I should add more to compleat the virtues and perfections of a man (u). MORLEY [GEORGE], Bishop of Worcester, and afterwards of Winchester, in the last century, was son of Francis Morley, Esq; by Sarah his wife, sister to Sir John Denham, one of the Barons of the Exchequer, and born in Cheapside, London, the 27th of February 1597. He lost his father when six years of age, his mother at twelve, and that little patrimony which he was born to, by his father's being engaged for the payment of some people's debts. At the age of fourteen he was elected one of the King's scholars in Westminster-school, and in the beginning of the year 1615, became a Student of Christ-church in Oxford (a); where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, December 19th, 1618; and that of Master, June 14th, 1621 (b). After he had continued in that college seven years, in the degree of Master, he was invited by Robert Earl of Caernarvan and his lady to be their domestick chaplain; and there he lived 'till he was forty three years old, i. e. 'till the year 1640, without having or seeking any preferment in the Church. After that, he was presented to the Rectory of Hartfield in Suffex, which, being a sine-cure, he exchanged with Dr Richard Steuart, Clerk of the Closet to the King, for the Rectory of Mildenhall near Marlborough in Wiltshire. But before this exchange, King Charles the First, to whom he was Chaplain in Ordinary, had given him a Canonry of Christ church, Oxon. in 1641, which was the only preferment he ever desired, and of which he gave the first year's profit to his Majesty, towards the charge of the war, then begun. About that time, he preached one of the first solemn sermons before the House of Commons; but so little to their liking, that he was not commanded to print it, as all the other preachers had been. Notwithstanding which, he was nominated one of the Assembly of Divines, being then Doctor in Divinity (which degree he took November 1st, 1642.) (c) but he never appeared among them: On the contrary, he always remained with the King; and did him what service he could. When his Majesty was confined at Hampton-court, he employed the doctor to engage the University of Oxford not to submit to the Parliamentary visitation: which he managed with great success [A]. Afterwards, he was appointed by the University, with other assistants named by himself, to negotiate the execution of the articles agreed upon at the surrender of the Oxford-garrison to the Parliament-forces; wherein he behaved with great address (d) [B]. In December 1647, he was, by the Committee for reforming the University, voted out of his Canonry [C]. The second of March following, his deprivation was published and declared; and soon after he was actually dispossessed by force and violence. March 17th, 1647-8, he was threatened to be taken into custody, for not obeying the orders of the Reforming Committee;

one of the leaders in the House of Commons, that he should be permitted to keep all that he had, without being put to say or do, or subscribe any thing against his conscience, if he would then but give his word only, that he would not actually appear against them and their proceedings (3). This was at first hearing a proposal acceptable enough, but when he began to consider with himself, that Dr Fell, Dr Sanderfon, Dr Hammond, Dr Gardiner, &c. would be gone, and no one left but Dr Wall; he chose rather to suffer in such good company, than tarry with those whom the Parliament should nominate in their room (4).

Committee; and for that, or some other reason, afterwards actually imprisoned (e). Some months before, he had been permitted to attend upon the King at Newmarket, as one of his Chaplains (f); and he was also one of the Divines that assisted his Majesty at the Treaty of Newport in the isle of Wight (g). In March 1648 9, he prepared the brave Lord Capel for death, and accompanied him to the scaffold on Tower-hill (h). After which, finding no manner of satisfaction in his native country, deprived as he was of all his possessions and of liberty of conscience, he resolved to go to King Charles the Second abroad, and not return home, 'till the Constitution in Church and State were restored (i). He therefore left England in 1649, being in the 51st year of his age, and waited upon the King, at the Hague, who received him very graciously; and carried him from thence into France with him, and afterwards to Breda. But the King not being permitted to take his own Divines along with him, when he set out upon his expedition into Scotland, in June 1650; Dr Morley thereupon withdrew to the Hague, and, after a short stay there, went and lived with his friend Dr John Earle, at Antwerp, in the house of Sir Charles Coterel. After they had thus continued about a year together, Sir Charles being invited to be Steward to the Queen of Bohemia, and Dr Earle to attend upon James Duke of York, in France, Dr Morley then removed into the family of the Lady Frances Hyde, wife of Sir Edward Hyde, in the same city of Antwerp. And all the time he remained there, which was about three or four years, he read the service of the Church of England twice every day, catechized once a week, and administered the communion once a month to all the English in that city who would come to it; as he did afterwards at Breda, for four years together in the same family (k). But betwixt his going from Antwerp and his coming to Breda, he officiated at the Hague, upwards of two years, as Chaplain to the Queen of Bohemia, without expecting or receiving any reward (l). As he had been happy at home in the acquaintance and intimacy of the most valuable persons [D], so was he also abroad in that of many learned men [E]. When all things were preparing for King Charles the Second's restoration, Dr Morley was sent over, two months before, as a very trusty person, to pave the way for that great event [F]. And, upon the King's return, he was not only restored to his Canonry, but also promoted soon after to the Deanry of Christ-church, into which he was installed July 27th, 1660 (m). No sooner had he reinstated the members of that college, which had been illegally ejected in 1648, and filled up the other vacant places; but he was nominated to the Bishoprick of Worcester, into which he was elected the 9th of October 1660, confirmed the 23d, and consecrated the 28th of the same month (n) [G]. In the year 1661, he was one of the principal managers, at the Conference between the Episcopal and Presbyterian Divines [H], commissioned under the great seal to review the Liturgy (o). Some time after, he was made Dean of his Majesty's royal Chapel: And, upon the death of Dr Duppa, in 1662, translated to the Bishoprick of Winchester; being confirmed therein the 14th of May (p); to which see [D] As he had been happy at home in the acquaintance and intimacy of the most valuable persons. He had been first known to the world as a friend of the Lord Falkland's; which was then enough to raise a man's character (5). And the chief of his other acquaintance, were, Sir Francis Wenman of Oxfordshire, Sir Edward Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon; Dr Henry Hammond; Dr R. Sanderson, afterwards Bishop of Lincoln; Mr W. Chillingworth; Dr Gilbert Sheldon, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury; Dr Earle, since Bishop of Salisbury, &c. (6).

[E] So was he also abroad in that of many learned men. Especially, the most famous Samuel Bochart, Claud. Salmassius, Daniel Heinsius, Andrew Rivet, Cornel. Trigland, &c. (7).

[F] Dr Morley was sent over, - - - to pave the way for that great event. Chancellor Hyde sent him over, upon the view of things working towards a Restoration, with letters from the King and himself, to the leading Men in this nation. The doctor talked much with the Presbyterians of Moderation in general, but would enter into no particulars: Only he took care to let them know he was a Calvinist; and they had the best opinion of such of the Church of England, as were of that persuasion (8). Part of his errand, was also, to allay the too great heat which some of the Royalists fell into, at that unseasonable juncture; and which they shewed, especially, in uttering threats in their sermons, and upon other occasions, against those who had hitherto had the power of doing hurt, and were not yet so much deprived of it, that they ought to be undervalued (9). But his chief business, was, to confute the report, spread by the disaffected, That King Charles the Second was a Papist, and would bring back Popery with him. This we learn from the doctor himself. 'The King's enemies (says he) gave out, that the King, by living so long abroad in Popish countries, was so corrupted in his Religion, that if he were suffered to return, he would bring home Popery along with him. So that with this groundless fear I found many very considerable and very much interested persons to be possessed, when I was sent into England, about two months before the King's return; most of which time I spent in undeceiving all I met with, especially the heads and leaders of the Presbyterian and Independent Parties (who seem'd to be most afraid of such a change) by assuring them that those Misreports they had heard of the King and his Brothers, were nothing else but the malicious Inventions of those, that were either in fact or in consent the Murderers of their Father, and consequently irreconcilable and implacable Enemies unto his Children. For (said I) to my certain knowledge, who was almost always an eye-witness of their actions, the King and both his Brothers did not only by their Profession, but by their Practice, declare and testify themselves to be true sons of the Church of England (even in the midst of its enemies) by coming daily to our Prayers, and weekly to our Sermons, and frequently to our Communions (10).—But, the event shewed, that the doctor was mistaken in his judgment of them.

[G] And consecrated the 28th of the same month. He was inthronized the 21st of September following, with great solemnity; as the Reader, curious in such things, may see in Bishop Kennet's Register and Chronicle (11).

[H] He was one of the principal managers, at the Conference between the Episcopal and Presbyterian Divines. So Mr Baxter informs us, in these words.—'Bishop Morley over-ruled the whole business; and did interest himself in it deeper than the rest, and was of a hotter spirit and a readier tongue (12).—Or, as he expresses it soon after, 'Bishop Morley was oft there, but not constantly, and with free and fluent words, with much earnestness, was the chief speaker of all the Bishops.'

he became a great benefactor [I]. As he enjoyed great affluence, he spent the remainder of his days in repeated acts of beneficence and charity. Among other instances of it, he gave a hundred pounds a year to Christ-church in Oxford, the place of his education, for the publick use of that college (q): And founded, in Pembroke-college in the same university, three scholarships for the isle of Jersey, and two scholarships for Guernsey, of ten pounds per annum each (r) [K]. Having enjoyed an honourable ease and quiet for many years; and by temperance and regular exercise arrived to a good old age of eighty-six years, eight months, and upwards, he died at Farnham-castle, October 29th, 1684, and was buried in Winchester Cathedral. He was a good and pious man (s), to which Bishop Burnet adds (t), 'of a very exemplary life, but extream passionate, and very obstinate;' however, very honest. 'Before the wars, he was thought a friend to the Puritans;' and tho' the ill usage he received from them, which forced him into exile, soured his temper in some degree, yet, 'after his promotion,' he cannot justly be said, 'to free himself from all suspicion of that kind (u):' For, in the general opinion of some (w), he was 'a moderate orthodox man.' And Dr Calamy gives several instances, of his remarkable Moderation towards Dissenters (x). But waving this; He was a man of unshaken Loyalty; and a faithful son of the Church of England, notwithstanding any discouragements or persecutions. The constitution of his body was excellent. For, in the 74th year of his age, and even after, he was without any remarkable decay, either in his limbs or senses. His usual course then was, to rise about five o'clock in the morning, winter and summer, and to go to bed about eleven at night, and in the coldest mornings never to have a fire, or warm his bed at night. He eat but once in twenty four hours, and never had either gout, stone, strangury, or head-ach, but enjoyed almost a constant health from his infancy; so that he never kept his bed but twice for any sickness (y). He was a hard student; however he published but a few things [L]. With regard to some of his notions, especially about Predestination, he was a strict Calvinist, and esteemed one of the main patrons of those of that persuasion (z).

[I] To which See he became a great benefactor. When the King granted him that Bishoprick, he said, 'He [Dr Morley] would never be the richer for it.' And that saying he fully verified. Since, besides his great expences in building and repairing the Episcopal palace at Winchester, he laid out much more than the supplies given him by Parliament, in the Act empowering him to lease out Waltham-Park, and the site of Winchester-house in Southwark. For, he spent eight thousand pounds and upwards, in repairing Farnham-castle: and above four thousand pounds, in purchasing Winchester-house, at Chelfsey, to annex to his See. At the same time he hardly purchased any thing for himself, as if he had taken more care to enrich the Poor, and others, than himself (13).

[K] Of ten pounds per annum each. He also gave, at several times, upwards of 1800 l. to the church of St Paul's in London (14): And bequeathed in his will one thousand pounds, for the purchasing of fifty pounds a year: out of which he gave twenty pounds per annum, for an augmentation to the Vicarage of Farnham in Surrey; twenty pounds per ann. for an augmentation of maintenance to the two parish churches within the town of Guilford in Surrey: and the remaining ten pounds to the Vicarage of Horfwell, in the same county.

[L] He published but a few things. The following is an exact list of them, according to the order of time in which they were published. I. 'A sermon preached at the magnificent Coronation of the most high and mighty Prince, King Charles the Second, at the collegiate Church of St Peter's Westminster, April 23d, 1661. 4to.' Published by his Majesty's special command. In the Dedication to the King, the author says, That he was now past his great climacterical, and this was the first time that ever he appeared in print. II. 'Letter to a Friend in vindication of himself from Mr Baxter's Calumny,' Lond. 1662. 4to. This was occasioned by a book of Mr Baxter's, intitled, The Mischiefs of Self-ignorance and Benefits of Self-Acquaintance; opened in divers Sermons at St Dunstan's West. In the dedication of which, to his late parishioners of Kiderminster in Worcestershire, he had given a false and partial account of the late Conference at the Savoy. III. Epistola apologetica & parnetica ad Theologum quendam Belgam scripta, written at Breda, June 7th, 1659 Lond. 1663. 4to. reprinted in 1683, under this title, Epistola ad virum clarissimum D. Cornelium Triglandium, unum ex Pastoribus Hagienfibus, & Principi Auriaco a studiis, conscripta, in qua agitur de Seren. regis Car. II. erga reformatam religionem affectu. IV. 'The sum of a short Conference betwixt Father Darcey, a Jesuit, and Dr Morley at Brussels, June 23d, 1649.' Stilo Nov. V. 'An Argument drawn from the Evidence and Certainty of Sense, against the Doctrine of Transubstantiation. VI. Vindication of the Argument drawn from Sense against Transubstantiation, from a pretended Answer to it, by the author of a pamphlet called, A Treatise of the Nature of Catholic Faith and Heresy. VII. 'Answer to Father Cresly's Letter.' Written in 1662. VIII. Sermon before the King at Whitehall, Novem. 5th, 1667. on 1 Cor. xiv. 33. IX. Answer to a Letter written by a Romish Priest, 1676. X. Letter to Anne Duchess of York, some few months before her death, written Jan. 24th, 1670. XI. Ad clarissimum virum Ianum Ullitium Epistole duæ, de invocatione Sanctorum. Written July 1st, 1659. All the aforesaid pieces, except the 1st and 2d were printed together in 1683, 4to.—XII 'Letter to the Earl of Anglesey, of the means to keep out Popery, and the only effectual expedient to hinder the growth thereof.' Lond. 1683. At the end of A true Account of the whole Proceedings betwixt James Duke of Ormond, and Arthur Earl of Anglesey. fol. XIII. 'Vindication of himself from divers false, scandalous, and injurious Reflections made upon him by Mr Richard Baxter in several of his writings.' Lond. 1683, 4to. XIV. He made also an Epitaph for King James the First, 1625; which was printed at the end of Archbishop Spotwood's History of the Church of Scotland. XV. And is likewise said, to have been the author of 'A Character of King Charles the Second.' Lond. 1660. in one sheet, 4to (15).

MORTON [THOMAS], a learned Divine in the last century [A], successively Bishop of Chester, of Lichfield and Coventry, and of Durham; was the sixth of nineteen children, of Mr Richard Morton, mercer and Alderman of York, by Elizabeth Leedale his only wife [B]. He was born in York, March 20th, 1564 (a); and educated first in that city [C], and afterwards at Halifax (b). In the year 1582, he was sent to St John's-college in Cambridge, and put under the tuition of Mr Antony Higgons, long after Dean of Rippon, and a good benefactor to the college: who, quitting the university for Church-preferments, left Mr Morton under the care of Mr Henry Nelson, afterward Rector of Hougham in Lincolnshire, that lived to see his pupil advanced to the Bishoprick of Durham, and many years after. In the beginning of November 1584, he was elected Scholar of the house, into a place of Constable's foundation, peculiar to his own native county of York; and in 1586, took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts, and that of Master in 1590; having performed all exercises requisite to each degree with great approbation and applause. He continued his studies in the college at his father's charge, above two years after he was Master of Arts: And then, March 17th, 1592, was admitted Fellow into a place of Dr Keyton's foundation, merely on account of his merit, against eight competitors for the place. About the same time he was chosen Logic-Lecturer for the university, which office he discharged with great diligence and ability, as appeared by his lectures fairly written, which were found among his papers after his decease (c). In the same year 1592, he was ordained Deacon, and the year following Priest, by Dr Howland Bishop of Peterborough. For about five years after this he continued in the college, prosecuting his private studies, and instructing his pupils. He took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity in 1598; and about the same time obtained the Rectory of Long-Marston, near York (d), which was procured him by his father (e). But his great parts and worth would not suffer him to lie hid in a country-cure. For, the Earl of Huntingdon, Lord President of the Council of the North, had made him his Chaplain, on account of his dexterity and acuteness in disputing with the Romish Recusants [D]. Upon the death of that Earl, he returned again to his privacy at Marston, where he continued not long, before the Lord Sheffield, who succeeded as Lord President, commanded him to hold a publick Conference, before his Lordship and the Council, at the Manor-house in York, with two Romish Recusants then prisoners in the castle; which he performed with great satisfaction to the numerous auditors. In 1602 the plague raging violently at York, he behaved himself with great charity and uncommon courage towards the poor sick and distressed (f) [E]: The same, or the following year (g), Ralph Lord Eure being appointed by Queen Elizabeth Ambassador extraordinary to the Emperor of Germany, and the King of Denmark, took him for his Chaplain, together with Mr Richard Crakanthorp [F]. Mr Morton, desirous of improving himself by seeing foreign

[A] A learned Divine in the last century] We are told, that his 'coat of arms and pedigree shew him to be of the same original and stock, with that eminent prelate and wise statesman John Morton, Bishop of Ely and Lord Chancellor of England, afterward Archbishop of Canterbury, and Cardinal, in the reign of King Henry the Seventh; by whose management the two Houses of York and Lancaster were united. From whence it may be concluded, his ancestors could not be obscure, at least, since this Cardinal's time; for, such persons as he seldom left their kindred without some considerable preferments.' Undoubtedly he was descended from 'Thomas and John Morton, whom the Cardinal made his Heirs, as being Sons to two of his brothers (1).' Certain it is, that Sir Thomas Morton of Dorsetshire, who reckoned his descent from one of them, sought out our Author, and acknowledged his kindred, and desired his acquaintance, presently after he appeared in print, and long before he ascended to any considerable eminency in the Church (2).

[B] By Elizabeth Leedale his only wife.] She was a Gentlewoman of a very good family, descended from the Valwafors by the mother's side: And by whom not only the Valwafors, but the Langdales also, and other Gentlemen of eminent worth in Yorkshire, acknowledged themselves to be of his kindred (3).

[C] And educated first in that city.] At this place, he had for School-fellows, among others, Sir Thomas Cheke, grandson to the learned Sir John Cheke, tutor to King Edward the Sixth, and the infamous Guy Faux, noted for his dark lanthorn, and the part he acted in the Gun-powder-plot (4).

[D] On account of his dexterity and acuteness in disputing with the Romish Recusants.] For Queen Elizabeth had given express command to that Earl, to convince the Popish Recusants by arguments rather than suppress them by force; and this he expressed (as his Lordship was wont to say) in the words of the Prophet (5): Nolo mortem peccatoris. I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked (6).

[E] In 1602, the plague raging at York, he behaved with great charity towards the poor, &c.] The poorer sort of the infected being turned out of the city, had booths erected for them on Hob-moore, near the city; for whose comfort and relief in that fatal extremity, Mr Morton often repaired to them from Marston to preach unto them, and to minister consolation to their languishing souls; having, withal, provisions of meat carried with him in sacks, to relieve the poorest sort with. But, as often as he went thither, he suffered not any servant to attend him, but himself saddled and unfaddled his horse, and had a private door made through the wall of his study (being the utmost part of the house) for prevention, lest he might bring the contagion with him, and indanger his whole family (7).

[F] Mr Richard Crakanthorp.] This learned man was born at, or near, Strickland in Westmoreland; entered in Queen's college, Oxon. in the year 1583; and elected Fellow of the same in 1598. After his return from attending the Lord Eure in Germany, he became Chaplain to Dr Thomas Ravis Bishop of London, and to King James the First. The Bishop living but a very little time, could give Mr Crakanthorp no preferment; but by his successor Bishop King, he was collated to the Rectory of Pocklesham in Essex; and by Sir John Leveson (whose three sons were educated at Queen's college) he was presented to the Rectory of Black Notley in the same county; which was all the preferment he ever had (8). He died in 1624. He published three Sermons: And composed several pieces in Logic and Philosophy; as also against the Papists. Namely, 'Justinian the Emperor defended against Cardinal Baronius. Lond. 1616, 4to. Defence of Constantine, with a Treatise of the Pope's temporal Monarchy. Lond. 1621, 4to.' Defensio Ecclesie Anglicanae contra M. Anton. de Dominis Archiep. Spalatensis injurias. Lond. 1625, 4to; published by Dr Barkham. Vigiliis domitians, Rome's See overthrown: Or, a Treatise of the first general Council held at Constantinople, An. 553, under Justinian the feign countries, readily accepted of the employment. While the Embassador stayed at Bremen, he obtained leave from him, to visit some of the chief cities and universities in Germany; which brought him to the knowledge and acquaintance of several learned men. His stay in those parts was the shorter, because the Embassador's commission determined at the death of the Queen. However, he improved his time so well, partly in furnishing his own library with books at Frankfort and elsewhere, but chiefly in his conversation with learned men, and the observations he made, that he always highly valued that opportunity. At his return, he became domestic Chaplain to Roger Earl of Rutland; which place he liked not only for the sake of the privacy, but also because it brought him so much nearer London than before (b). In 1606, he took the Degree of Doctor in Divinity; which brought him into the acquaintance and esteem of Dr John Overall, the Regius Professor at Cambridge. About the same time he was sworn Chaplain in ordinary to King James the First, and by him presented to the Deanery of Gloucester, June 22d, 1607 (i), through Archbishop Bancroft's recommendation (k). While he was Dean there, the Lord Fure, Lord President of Wales, nominated him one of his Majesty's Counsel for the Marches. In his first journey to Gloucester, he went by Oxford at the Act-time, and was incorporated there Doctor in Divinity July 12th, 1606 (l). After he had continued about three years Dean of Gloucester, he was removed to the Deanery of Winchester, into which he was installed June 3d, 1609 (m). And Dr Thomas Bilson, then Bishop of Winchester, collated him to the Rectory of Alresford (n). About the same time, Dr Sutcliffe Dean of Exeter founding a college at Chelsey, for a certain number of Divines, to be employed in answering the books dispersed by Popish emissaries, our learned Doctor was appointed one of the Fellows (o). In 1610, July 21st, Archbishop Matthews gave him a Prebend in the church of York (p). The same year, he preached a Sermon before the Convocation at St Paul's, on Matt. v. 13. and was to have been chosen Prolocutor of the Lower House, had he not modestly declined it, to make room for a friend of his. These and the like publick employments bringing him frequently to London, he lodged at the Deanery house of St Paul's, upon the invitation of Dr Overall then Dean of that church: where he became acquainted with the learned Isaac Casaubon, who was entertained and patronized by the same worthy Dean. And at Dr Morton's charge it was, that a monument was afterwards erected to Casaubon's memory, in Westminster-Abbey (q). In the beginning of the year 1616, our learned Doctor was nominated Bishop of Chester [G], and consecrated July 7th, 1616; having with that bishoprick the Rectory of Stopford in commendam (r). He went, as soon as he conveniently could, into his Diocese, where he was received with great respect; and took all proper pains to reduce and satisfy both the Nonconformists [H], and the Popish Recufants [I], with whom those the Emperor, in the time of Pope Vigilius. Lond. 1631, fol. He left also several pieces in manuscript (9).

[G] In the beginning of the year 1616, our learned Doctor was nominated Bishop of Chester. Dr Barwick says (10), the King nominated him in the year 1615. And insinuates, as if, through an obstacle that arose, and the new Prelate's indifferency, it was a long time before he was consecrated; that is, about a year and a half. But it appears from Dr Brown Willis (11), that Gerrard Maslie, who was nominated to that See, died January 16th, 1615, by which he unquestionably means 1615-16, according to our English way of computation. And therefore, there could be but a decent time, not quite half a year, between Bishop Morton's nomination and consecration.

[H] And took all proper pains to reduce and satisfy, both the Nonconformists, &c. At his first coming to his Diocese, he found in it great numbers of Nonconformists, whose Perverseness and Obstinacy were extreme. Therefore, his first care, was, to endeavour to reduce them to the Church; wherein he used no less of fatherly Mildness towards them, than strength of Argument against them. For, having cited before him such of the Clergy as were the chief of that party, (whereof the principal ring-leader was one Mr Hynd) he first enquired of them the reason of their Nonconformity; which when he understood to be, The use of the Surplice, the Cross at Baptism, and the Ring in Marriage; he was content himself to endeavour their satisfaction, in a publick and solemn Conference with them upon those three points. But their perverseness frustrating his expectation and desires, he published, for the common good, a Relation of that Conference, with some additions; intitling it, 'A Defence of the Innocency of the three Ceremonies of the Church of England, &c.' Lond. 1619, 4to (12).

[I] And the Popish Recufants. He applied himself also earnestly to curb and restrain them, particularly in one instance; which rendered them very popular, and gained them many profelytes. The case was this:

'It was no small policy in the leaders of the Popish party, to keep the people from Church by dancing and other recreations, even in the time of divine service, especially on holy-days, and the Lord's-day in the afternoon: By which means they kept the people in ignorance and luke-warmness, and so made them the more capable to be wrought upon by their emissaries. This gross abuse our Bishop endeavoured to redress in his primary visitation.' But as King James the First was returning out of Scotland through Lancashire, in 1617, this matter was represented to him as a very great grievance, by some of his courtiers, who were too favourable to the Popish party. His readiness to hear any complaint against what was called a 'publick grievance, encouraged some to so much boldness the next Lord's-day after, as even to disturb the publick worship and service of God, by their piping and dancing within the hearing of all those that were at church; whereof the King being fully informed by our Bishop, utterly disfavoured any thoughts or intention of encouraging such profaneness: and therefore left them that were guilty of it to the Bishop's censure; which he inflicted only upon one, that was the ring leader.' There wanted not some still to complain to the King of the Bishop's proceedings herein 'as rigorous and tyrannical; considering that the chief thing they desired was only some innocent recreation for servants and other inferior people on the Lord's-day and holy-days, whose laborious callings deprived them of it at all other times; and thereupon to solicit his Majesty for some favour therein, and the rather because it was the general desire of most of that country. Which the King finding to be true upon enquiry, and willing to give them satisfaction therein, he consulted with Dr Morton, Bishop of that Diocese, how he might satisfy their desires without endangering this liberty to be turned into licentiousness. The Bishop hereupon considered of six Limitations or Restrictions, by way of condition, to be imposed upon every man that should enjoy the benefit of that liberty:

those parts have generally abounded (s). On the 6th of March 1618, he was translated to the see of Lichfield and Coventry; holding with it the Rectory of Clifton-Camvil in commendam (t). About that time, he became acquainted with Antonio de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalato, who having renounced Popery was come over, and preferred in England, and used all the means he could, to dissuade that inconstant Prelate from returning back to Rome. But one of the most remarkable occurrences he was concerned in, whilst he continued in this see, was his detecting the imposture of the Boy of Bilson [K], of which ty; which he presented to the King in writing the next day: One, and it is thought to be the first, being added by another hand. 1. That all unlawful games should be prohibited on Sundays, as Bear and Bull-baiting, interludes, and bowling at all times by law prohibited to the meaner sort of people. 2. That all such known Recufants, either men or women, as abstained from coming to church, or divine service, shall be barred from this benefit and liberty; they being therefore unworthy of any lawful recreation after the said service, that will not first come to church and serve God. 3. All that were not present at church at the service of God before their going to the said recreations, though they conformed in religion, were also debarred this liberty. 4. All such as, in abuse of this liberty, should use these exercises before the end of all divine services for that day, were to be presented and sharply punished. 5. That every person should resort to his own parish church, to hear divine service. 6. That each parish by itself should use the said recreation after divine service. 7. That no offensive weapons should be carried or used in the said times of recreation. These limitations were inserted in King James's Declaration, Concerning lawful Sports to be used: dated May 24th, 16<sup>o</sup> regni.

[K] But one of the most remarkable occurrences he was concerned in, whilst he continued in this See, was his detecting the imposture of the Boy of Bilson. As this is one of the most notable impostures that ever was managed at any time, a particular account of it may not therefore be disagreeable to the reader.—The impostor's name was George Perry, or Purie, a boy of fifteen, son to a poor man, of a village named Bilson near Wolverhampton in Staffordshire; from whence he came to be known by the appellation of the Boy of Bilson. He being by nature very dull and incapable of learning, and thereupon very unwilling to go to school, was wrought upon by some Romish Priests in those parts, to free himself from that troublesome task of going to school, by counterfeiting himself to be possessed with a Devil; and he had the promise of a very good reward into the bargain, if he would suffer himself to be possessed by their Exorcisms (13). Some Jesuits accordingly visited him, prayed by him, and used charms and exorcisms to drive the Devil away. But the Boy found so much sweetness in the Ease and Profit of that kind of Life, that he would not be disenchanted by them, though they beat and pinched him, and used him extremely ill, to make him desist. The boy, in his fits, would rave against an old woman dwelling near his father, intimating by signs and ghastly behaviour, that she had sent a spirit to torment him; and in plain terms (when he was out of his fits) accused her to be a Witch, and the author of all his misery. Whereupon, the woman was first examined by the Chancellor of the Diocese; and afterwards being indicted for Witchcraft at Stafford-assizes, August 10th, 1620, was condemned to die. Bishop Morton, who, as Justice of Peace was upon the Bench, being fully persuaded in his own mind that the Boy did but counterfeit; and hearing that some Romish priests had been tampering with him with their exorcisms; finding also very little reason produced why the witch should use the child so ill; he was persuaded, this was some juggling trick in the priests, for effecting their miraculous ends. Therefore he desired the Judge to reprove the Woman till the next assizes, and he would take the boy home with him, and doubted not before that time to find out the bottom of some secret contrivance. Accordingly, the boy was carried to Eccleshall-castle, the Bishop's house, where his fits followed him with a great deal of violence: For being put out of his road (having formerly all sorts of people come to admire him, and now being more carefully looked to) he grew fullen, and would not eat sometimes in two or three days; so that his belly was almost clung to his back; and he had a new swelling about his throat, which never appeared before; lay in his bed, sometimes as it were senseless, sometimes staring with his eyes, and foaming at the mouth, sometimes striking those that stood near him; never spoke hut in his fits, and then a strange gibberish; at other times he only muttered and made signs. The Bishop visited him often, striving sometimes to soften him with gentleness; at other times he handled him roughly, with threatnings, and even blows. And some of the people about him thrust needles into his toes and fingers, betwixt the nails; clapt burning candles to his eye-lids; to divert him when he was in his fits: but he neither winched nor stirred. Thus he continued almost a quarter of a year: At last, his urine grew so black, that the Physicians thought nature had left her usual operations. This struck the Bishop very near, for fear the boy should miscarry under his hand; therefore he used all means possible, as well to preserve him, as to discover him: but he resolved, if his water continued black, to sift the matter no further. To find out which, he set a trusty servant to watch him thro' a hole that looked into the chamber upon the bed, which the boy knew not of. The Bishop going that morning with his family to a lecture, all things were very still in the house; and the boy, finding all quiet, no noise about him, he lifts himself up, stares, and listens, and at length gets out of his bed, and in the straw or mat under it, takes out an inkhorn, and makes water in the chamber-pot through a piece of the cotton in his hand; another little piece of the cotton he puts into his prepuce, covering it with the skin, and that was for a reserve, if he should be forced to make water before company. Thus, having cunningly put himself in order, he hides the inkhorn again, and returns to his bed. The man that was appointed to watch, seeing all this, discovered it to the Bishop at his coming home; who came to the boy presently, and asked him, How he did? He, according to his manner, pointed to his water, looked ghastly on it, and muttered out his old howling tone. The Bishop, that intended now to deal roundly with him, said, Sirrah, you have ink in your bed straw, which you make use of to black your water, and your knavery is found out; and calling in his man, he took out the inkhorn from the place where the boy had hid it, and the man justified, that he saw him make water through the cotton; which (with the Bishop's threatening to send him to the house of correction) struck the boy with such a sudden terror, that he rose from his bed, fell upon his knees, and humbly besought the Bishop to pardon him, and he would discover to him the whole truth. And as he put on his cloaths, the Bishop laid open the grievousness of his sin, which wrought so upon him, that he melted into tears, crying to God for mercy. Then he confessed, that a pedlar with a pack on his back met him when he was going to school, and with many enticing words persuaded him to go to Mr Gifford's house, assuring him of good entertainment; and by his allurements he went thither with him. There he found four Romish priests, who gave him money, and many fair words, promising him great matters, if he would be conformable to their instructions. They were three days teaching him how to demean himself, and after he was well tutored, and had practised his tricks there privately, then they sent him home to his father (who thought he had been lost, and was much troubled for him) to exercise them in a more publick way. He came home in a very distracted manner, to the amazement of his parents, and in a short time drew much company to visit him; and his parents being poor, got money from many charitable people, which did encourage him to persist in that way. But when the fame of his being possessed with an evil spirit was sufficiently spread abroad, the priests came to dispossess him, as is related above.—The Bishop asked him, why he accused the poor old woman of witchcraft? He which some account is given in the note (u). On the second of July 1632, our worthy Bishop was translated to the See of Durham (w); in which high and profitable station [L], he behaved not only with remarkable moderation, justice, and equity [M], but also with the most extensive beneficence and charity [N]. Among other instances of it, he augmented such small livings as were in his own gift [O]; and endeavoured to obtain a competent augmentation for all the other mean Vicarages and Curacies within his Diocese [P]: but was hindered by the iniquity of the Times, and the opposition of Impropriators; and

He answered, The Priests told him he must lay the cause of his being possessed upon some old woman, and the being known to him, and of a scolding humour, he fixed it on her. Then the Bishop asked him, How he came to fall into his fits a little before the woman appeared in the room, both at her examination and arraignment, his back being towards her? For the first, at Lichfield, he said, he heard some about him mutter, She is here; which made him cry out, She comes! she comes! And for the second, at Stafford, He heard the people remove, and her chains gingle as she came, which gave him the sign. Lastly, he was asked, How he made his throat swell? And he shewed, it was by thrusting his tongue (being very long) down his throat, which trick he found out himself; the rest were taught him by the Priests. Thus did the Bishop preserve an innocent old woman condemned by the law to dye; discover the abominable forgeries of the Jesuits and Popish Priests; and convert a wicked boy, whom afterwards he bound apprentice to a shoemaker at Bristol, and proved a good man. He was living in the parish of St Martin's in the Fields, London, in the year 1660, as Dr Barwick testifies (14). The account we have here given, is chiefly delivered in the words of Mr Arthur Wilson (15); who tells us, that he heard this story from the Bishop's own mouth, almost thirty years before he inserted it in his Life of King James the First. A full Relation of it had been published at the time by Richard Baddiley, Secretary to the Bishop (16); and it is also mentioned by Dr Francis Hutchinson, in his Historical Essay concerning Witchcraft (17).

[L] In which high and profitable station.] The fine revenues of that bishoprick justly intitle it to the name of a profitable station. And how high it is, appears sufficiently from the Palatine Rights enjoyed by the Bishop of Durham, upon prescription immemorial. For, the Teste of all writs, indictments, &c. is in the Bishop's name. He is perpetual Justice of peace within his territories, as is also his temporal Chancellor. All the officers of the Courts, even the Judges of Assize themselves have still their ancient salaries from him; and all the standing officers of the courts are constituted by his patents. When he comes in person to any of the Courts of judicature, he sits chief in them, those of assize not excepted. All dues, americiaments, forfeited recognizances in the courts of the Palatinate, deodands, forfeitures either of war or by treason, outlawry and felony, belong to the Bishop; as also Moors, wastes, custody of lunatics and idiots, &c. His jurisdiction extends to the sea-coasts, and waters adjoining to the county Palatine; wherein he has all along had a distinct Admiralty, and beld Admiralty-courts; appointing, by his patents, a Vice-Admiral, Register, Marshal, and all other proper officers; and having all the privileges and profits incident thereunto, as royal fishes, wrecks, duties, keys, &c. to the mid-stream that borders upon his county, and on the south side of Tine-bridge, &c (18).

[M] He behaved not only with remarkable moderation, justice, and equity.] Dr Barwick gives the following instances of it (19). 1. With regard to his Fines at the renewing of Leases, he never intermeddled in setting them himself, but referred the business to four gentlemen of the neighbourhood to make a moderate composition between him and his tenants. 2. In wrecks he took such a small sum of the person that had suffered them, as was not worthy of the name of a composition; having no other aim in taking any thing, than only to preserve the right to himself and his successors, and assist the distressed person in the preservation and recovery of his goods, from the neighbouring ravenous multitude. 3. In Deodands, where any man had made himself away; though by law the whole estate was confiscated in dejectionem criminis, to deter others from committing the like horrid offence; yet was he so compassionate, as not to exceed a fourth part of the estate in his composition after the most moderate valuation. 4. For Wardships (which then also belonged to the Bishop of Durham) they were managed with that tenderness of care and moderation within the liberties of this county Palatine, as none of the gentry had ever any cause of wrong done either to their persons or estates during their minority.

[N] With the most extensive beneficence and charity.] He was extremely bountiful to the Poor of all sorts, where he resided, or by the way as he travelled. At Durham, besides his daily alms to the poor at the Cattle-gate, he gave to many gowns of blue cloth to certain poor men, as he had been years Bishop of Durham; with their diet in the hall four days in the week. He maintained several poor scholars at the University. And there seldom came any scholar to him, whether English or Foreigner, whom he did not receive and entertain with free hospitality, and dismiss with a considerable sum of money, proportionable to his parts and merit. To the library at St John's college, he gave books, to the value of four or five hundred pounds; with an intention at last to bestow a hundred pounds a year upon it, while he lived. And out of an old decayed chapel at Bishop's Auckland, he built a fair Grammar-school, endowing the Master with twenty-four pounds a year for ever. Besides other instances of his beneficence and generosity: he forgave to one Mrs Place of Hurworth, whose husband unhappily made away himself, his whole estate, (being forfeited to the Bishop as Count Palatine) which was valued at two thousand pounds, and took only fifty pounds of her, for an acknowledgment of the right of the County Palatine; which he bestowed among his domestic servants. And, in his first visitation, he forgave one Mr Edward Moore three hundred pounds, in which he had been fined for a riot at the assizes before, at Durham.—He never purchased one foot of land (whatever he sold) nor other temporal possession in all his long life, notwithstanding his plentiful incomes; but as his revenues increased, so were they spent in hospitable, charitable, and other Christian uses (20).

[O] He augmented such small livings as were in his own gift.] He had begun that good work even whilst he was Bishop of Lichfield, in abating a good part of his fine to increafe the Vicarage of Pitchley in Northamptonshire. And, after he was translated to Durham, he augmented the stipend of the Minister of Bishop-Aukland from sixteen pounds per annum to fourscore; and the chapels belonging to it from about six pounds per annum to thirty; intending to do the like in some proportion over all the rest of his diocese (21).

[P] And endeavoured to obtain a competent augmentation for all the other mean vicarages and curacies within his diocese.] To lay his foundation the surer, in a work of so great difficulty as well as importance, he asked the opinion of three of the most learned and eminent counsel then in England; namely, the Lord-Keeper Coventry, William Noy, Esq; the King's Attorney-General, and Sir Henry Martin, Judge of the Prerogative Court of Canterbury; and they all unanimously concurred in these four points. 1. That all Abbots, Priors, and other religious persons, who had Rectories or Parsonages of Churches appropriated to their several Convents, were bound by law (especially since the time of K. Richard II.) upon every avoidance of the incumbent to present an able Clerk, sufficiently endowed out of the tithes belonging to the said Rectory, to the Bishop of the diocese wherein any such Rectory was, to be instituted and admitted to the cure of souls within the said parish. 2. That in case they did not present such a person so endowed within six months after any vacancy, then the Bishop of the diocese might collate to the said vicarage jure devoluto post lapsum temporis, upon any fit person, and endow it with sufficient maintenance, proportionable to the merit of the person and quantity of the tithes. 3. That at the dissolution of Abbies, Priors, and other religious houses, all such Rectories appropriate were settled upon the Crown, no otherwise than the said religious persons formerly had and enjoyed them. And therefore, 4. That the Bishops

- (x) Barwick, p. 95, &c. and dealers in law (x). When this nation came to be involved in publick miseries and troubles, our good Bishop had his share of them. For, (besides an order in 1640, for seizing his rents) once at Westminster, he was near being torn to pieces by the mob (y) [Q]. And December 30th, 1641, he was accused of high treason, and committed to the custody of the Usher of the Black-rod, for joining with eleven of his Brethren in a Protestation against all the proceedings of the Parliament since the 27th of December 1641 (z). Being released; without a tryal, after about four months confinement, he returned to his lodgings in Durham-house in the Strand, attending his devotions and studies, but being much straitened by the sequestration of his revenues (a). On the eighth of April, 1645, he was committed to the custody of the Serjeant at Arms (b); or, according to others (c), to the Tower; for being unwilling to deliver up the Seal of the county-palatine of Durham, and for having baptized a daughter of the Earl of Rutland according to the form in the Common-Prayer-Book. He continued about six months a prisoner, and, upon his release, withdrew again to Durham-house. When his revenues were wholly taken from him by Parliament, they voted him, May 18, 1646, eight hundred pounds a year during his life (d). But the ordinance for that purpose being ineffectual [R], his friends procured him at last one thousand pounds in part; with which he paid his debts, and purchased an annuity of 200 pounds for life. Being turned out of Durham-house by the soldiers, when they came to garrison it, about the end of the year 1648; the Earl and Countess of Rutland invited him to Exeter-house in the Strand, where he became a part of their care and family for some short time. But being loath to live at the charge of others, while he was able to subsist of himself, and thinking the country air might better suit with his declining years than that of the city, he went and lived with Captain Thomas Saunders at Flamstead in Hertfordshire, and afterwards with Thomas Rotherham, Esq; of Luton in Bedfordshire (e). At last going to London, with about 60 pounds (which it seems was then his all), he was overtaken on the road by Sir Christopher Yelverton; who being known to the Bishop, though the Bishop was unknown to him, fell into discourse with him, and asked him, 'Who he was?' The Bishop replied, 'I am that old man ' the Bishop of Durham, notwithstanding all your votes:' for Sir Christopher had too much complied with the times. Whereupon Sir Christopher asked, 'Whither he was ' going?' 'To London,' replied the good old Bishop, 'to live a little while, and then ' dye.' On this, Sir Christopher entered into further discourse with him, and took him home with him to his house at Easton-Mauduit in Northamptonshire; where he became tutor to that son of his, which was afterwards the very learned Sir Henry Yelverton. After some time Sir Christopher dyed, and then Sir Henry, who had the affection of a most tender child for the good Bishop, continued to support him 'till his death (f); which happened the 22d day of September, 1659, in the 95th year of his age, the 44th since his being consecrated a Bishop, and the 28th of his translation to the see of Durham. He was buried September 29, in the chancel of the church of Easton-Mauduit, where a monument was afterwards erected to his memory (g). Bishop Morton, as to his person, was of stature little, and clean limbs; of a strong body, an exquisite constitution; comely countenance, constant and seldom interrupted health (h). Even in his old age, his motion was upright, his walking sprightly, his hearing quick, his voice clear, his body firm and full of moisture; so that no Physician in the world would have judged him to be of half the age he was, if he had only considered the plumpness of his flesh and smoothness of his skin, without looking upon the whiteness of his hair (i). He was of a quick wir, solid judgment, and happy memory (k). And as he was very learned [S], so was he also extremely Bishops authority over churches appropriate was neither taken away, nor any way infringed, either by the Common or Statute Law; but that he may now as lawfully appoint a competent augmentation out of the improper tithes, where the Vicarage is not sufficiently endowed, as any Bishop might formerly have done while Abbies, Priors, and other religious houses were in being. But as Dr Barwick observes, this being such a fatal blow to the Prince of Darkness, was not like to take the wished effect in the midst of this crooked and perverse generation (22).

[Q] Once at Westminster he was near being torn to pieces by the mob. It was some of those tumultuous mobs that were called together, and spirited up, by the leaders in both houses of Parliament. They surrounding therefore the Bishop's coach, some cried, pull him out of his coach: others, may he is a good man: others, but for all that he is a Bishop. And he often declared, he believed he should not have escaped alive, if a leading man among that rabble had not cried out; let him go and bang himself (23).

[R] But the ordinance for that purpose being ineffectual. Dr Barwick observes (24), that this sum, voted to Bishop Morton, 'was a far greater proportion than to any of his suffering brethren, and yet signified very little in the conclusion. For while he was able to subsist without it, he never troubled himself with looking after it; and at last when his pressing necessities put him upon this hard choice, either to look after this, or be burdesome to his friends, making choice of the former, he procured a copy of the vote: but found it to contain no more than only that such a summe should he payed, but no mention either by whom or whence. And by that time he could procure an explanation of the order to make the pension payable out of the revenues of his own Bishoprick, all the lands and revenues of it were sold or divided among themselves. Only by the importunity of his friends he obtained an order to have 1000 l. in part, payed out of their Treasurie at Goldsmiths-hall, with which he payed his debts, and purchased to himself an annuity of 200 l. per annum during his life, upon which he subsisted ever since. This annuity was granted at first by the lady Saville in the minority of her son Sir George, and afterwards confirmed by himself when he came of age.'—Indeed, when the sale of Bishops lands was resolved upon by both Houses of Parliament, old Sir Henry Vane came immediately to the Bishop at Durham-house, and advised him to petition in due time for his livelihood to be granted him some other way than by that 800 l. per annum formerly voted unto him (25). But it is not said what was the issue.

[S] And as he was very learned. He gave sufficient specimens of his learning, in the following books which he published. 1. Apologia Catholica. Pars I. De Notis Ecclesie.

To this book an Answer was published by a nameless author, denoted by the initial letters J. S. under the title of Anti-Mortonus; and the Bishop prepared a Reply, disposed in the following order. First, he proposed to reprint the book itself: Next, after every section excepted against, the Exceptions of J. S. And then, His own Replies to those Exceptions. But the book thereby grew so voluminous, that no bookseller durst venture the charge of printing it. — However, a Romish author, under the name of an English Baron, having published some Strictures upon the Grand Imposture, &c. our learned author wrote a little book, intitled, XII. 'A Discharge of five imputations of Mis allegations charged upon the Bishop of Duresme by an English Baron.' Lond. 1633. 8vo. XIII. 4to.—In the mean time, one C. R. supposed to be R. Smith, Bishop of Chalcedon, having published a Reply to our Author's Apologia Catholica Pars I. he vindicated himself in a small tract, intitled, XV. Replica, sive Refutatio Confutations C. R. &c. Lond. 1638. 4to. XVI. His next piece was, Deciso Controversiæ in Eucharistiâ, de Non-coexistentiâ corporis Christi in diversis locis. Cantabr. 1640. 4to. Which was chiefly a latin translation of his book Of the Institution of the Sacrament, &c. but with great alterations. XVII. He published about this time three sermons; viz. One preached before the King at Newcastle, May 5, 1639. upon Romans xiii. 1. Lond. 1639. 4to. XVIII. A Sermon on the Resurrection, preached at the Spittle in London, April 26, 1641. Lond. 1641. 8vo. XIX. The presentment of a Schismatick; a Sermon preached at St Paul's London, upon 1 Cor. xi. 16. Lond. 1642. 4to. XX. His next book came forth, without his name, or knowledge; being published by Archbishop Usher, (to whom he had sent it); with some other collections of his own upon the same subject, intitled, Confessions and Proofs of Protestant Divines, &c. Oxford. 1644. 4to. being about Episcopacy. XXI. The last thing he published was styled, Ezekiel's Wheels, &c. Lond. 1653. 8vo. containing Meditations upon God's Providence.—He left behind him in manuscript A Treatise concerning Episcopacy, revised and enlarged; being the same thing as is mentioned at No. XX.—A Treatise concerning Prayer in an unknown Tongue.—A Defence of Infants Baptism, against Mr Tombes and others.—Many Sermons. And several other pieces; of which an account may be seen in his Life written by Dr Barwick (26).—Among his works we may place, A Protestation of his, occasioned by a notorious untruth, in a book printed in 1657, and intitled A Treatise of the Nature of Catholick Faith and Heresie; importing, 'That, upon the presenting of a book to the House of Lords against the Bishops; he had made a speech against that book, in his own and all the Bishops behalf, endeavouring to prove succession from the last Catholick Bishops, who by imposition of hands ordained the first Protestant Bishops at the Nags-head in Cheapside.' The Bishop therefore protested, on July 17, 1658, before a public Notary, That that assertion was a most notorious untruth, and a gross slander. And the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Clerks of both Houses, signed Attestations, certifying, that they never knew any such book presented to the House of Peers, and consequently that no such speech could be made by the Bishop (27).

[T] So was he also extremely studious and diligent. He lived a very great number of years, and very few ever husbanded their time better, for he was never idle with his good will. He was often up at his devotion and study before four a clock, even after he had lived above fourscore years; and yet very seldom went to bed 'till after ten, and then had always a servant to read some book to him, 'till such time as he fell asleep: and so had he always when he travelled in his coach, that his journey might not be too great a hindrance to his study (28). The same account is also given more at large by his Secretary R. Baddiley (29).

[U] He was a man of exemplary Piety, Temperance, Sobriety. His favorite Chaplain, Dr Barwick, informs us (30), that 'His conversation was such for piety and devotion as well became a Christian and a Bishop. He would often deny himself some part of that pleasure of Time which should have been for his sleep, to rise up out of his bed and spend in Prayer.' Then, as to his Temperance, Mortification, and Sobriety; he never could endure a soft, much less a downe bed, but either a matress, or a single quilt, which was his usual manner. He lay upon his straw-bed, even when he was above fourscore years of age; and would not be persuaded from it 'till cramps and other infirmities compelled him to it. His study gown was sometimes of a coarse black hairy rugg; and his constant diet (when not visited by strangers) was one meal a day through almost the whole course of his life; which in his middle age, and before he was Bishop, was usually a supper; in his declining age, and after he was Bishop, usually a dinner, and that but a bare and slender one to himself, though bountiful, and plentiful to his guests.

He very seldom, or never, drank strong drink; and wine most rarely, and that in a very small quantity, as perhaps might warm his mouth, but scarcely his stomach; for his health being constantly good, and his bodily infirmities few or little, his abstemiousness was very great, and this latter a great preferer of the former (31).

MOUNTAGU [RICHARD], a learned Divine and Philologist, was born about the year 1578, at Dorney in Buckinghamshire, where his father (a), Mr Lawrence Mountagu, was then minister [A]. He was sent to Eton-school, and being admitted King's scholar, was elected thence to King's-college in Cambridge in 1594, where he became a Fellow according to the ordinary rules of those two foundations. In the university he proceeded regularly to both his degrees in Arts, and entering into Orders, his first preferment was the living of Wotton-Courtney in Somersetshire in the diocese of Wells; in which church he obtained a prebend (b). His next promotion was to a fellowship of Eton-college (c), where he assisted Sir Henry Saville in preparing his celebrated edition of St Chryostom's Works (d); and, in 1610, he published there in 4to. The two Invectives of Gregory Nazianzen against Julian, with the notes of Nonnus. May 14, 1613, he was inducted into the rectory of Stamford-Rivers in Essex (e). Upon the death of Isaac Casaubon, our author having, from his first entrance into the study of Theology, applied himself particularly to Ecclesiastical Antiquity, was requested by the King to write some animadversions upon the Annals of Baronius, which he began to prepare in 1615 [B]. He was then Chaplain to his Majesty, and the following year was promoted to the deanery of Hereford (f), but resigned it soon after, upon an exchange (g) for the archdeaconry of that church; into which he was admitted September 15, 1617. July 5, 1620, he proceeded Bachelor

[A] His father was minister.] His inveterate enemies the Calvinistical puritans insult him (1) with his mean birth and parentage, and pretend that he was a carter's or a ploughman's son, near Oakingham in Berkshire; that he was supported by charity, both at Eton school and King's college. They assert likewise, that he was chaplain to Dr James Mountagu (I suppose when Bishop of Bath and Wells, in 1608) (2), who told him at that time, that he would never do good in the Church. 'Tis certain that Bishop was a warm Calvinist (3). But there seems to be little foundation for this story. This Dr James was brother to Sir Henry Mountagu, Lord Chief Justice of the King's bench. A gentleman who is particularly celebrated by our author for his good will to the clergy. 'We should be injurious, says he, unto virtue itself, and I, in my particular, most ungrateful, if I should not, upon so just occasion (4), honour his desert that in my own cause declared himself so much to commiserate the Church's wrongs by willful and corrupt jurors; and now in place of public judicatory, not once but often in the like case of my neighbours and brethren, hath publicly compassionated their sufferings.' From this beginning he proceeds to expatiate in the highest panegyric strain, upon the virtues of that noble family, several of whom he particularly records. So that it cannot well be supposed, that if he had ever had so great an obligation to Bishop Mountagu as to be his chaplain, he would have omitted all notice of his gratitude in this place.

[B] Animadversions upon the annals of Baronius.] These were printed in 1622, under the title of Analeſta Eccleſiaſticarum Exercitationum. In the dedication to King James, he takes notice that he entered upon this undertaking seven years before, upon the death of Isaac Casaubon; that directing the course of his theological studies to the Fathers and Church history, agreeable to his Majesty's injunctions to the universities in 1606, he had made collections of this kind for his own private use, which being known to the King gave occasion to his appointment to this work. As to Casaubon's Exercitations, Mr Mountagu condemns them in general, observes, that the learned author was not sufficiently versed in theology for such a task, the undertaking of which he imputes to his vanity (a common vice of the philologers) and particularly censures the blind devotion, which he every were paid to

Joseph Scaliger, as he had done to Selden. The justice of this critic upon Casaubon was approved by others, as Godeau in particular, 'Casaubon, says he (5), who 'was a learned man, ought to have treated Baronius 'with greater civility, who always calls Scaliger 'that divine man, and to have contented himself with 'censuring him in such particulars where he imagined 'him mistaken, without attempting to make him 'looked on every instant, as a man who was totally 'ignorant of all valuable learning, had he engaged in 'so long a course of studies as the other, the world had 'seen whether he would have committed no errors. 'His Exercitations gave rise to others, and just occasion has been found to censure his Censures.' Mr Bayle, from whom we have borrowed this extract, cites the Exercitations of Casaubon as a proof of this remark, that many critics make more faults than they correct (6). How much more candid is Mr Mountagu, who, after the words above cited, proceeds thus to apologize for him in the warmest and most friendly terms: Sed ea est humanarum rerum infirmitas, nihil est simul inventum exitit et perfectum; In secundis curis suis et limatiore deinceps diligentia eruditissimus vir sine dubio erat illa omnia correcturus que vel proferanti, vel agent aliud, aut minus attento ad ipsam rem, vel humanitas quid passo, magis modesta profecto excidebant. Et O si Deus optimus maximus rerum humanarum dispensator æquissimus longiorem ipsi vitæ istius usuram atque usum indulgisset, ut ea que jam proposito destinaverat, et erat fortassis in parte meditata, perducere potuisset ad umbilicum, et numeris omnibus perfecta consummare. Credo equidem nec vana fides; nihil fuisset usquam per Exercitationum Lectiones, quod vel juste reprehendere Pontificii possent, vel Protestantes in illo desiderare. Our author had just before spoken of Baronius in the civilest and politest terms, doing full justice to his merit, and who looks ever so little into his book will easily acknowledge it. So that Dr Fuller's censure must be taken in the most restrained sense, when he observes, that our author's 'great parts were attended with tartness of writing, 'very sharp the nib of his pen, and much gall mingled 'in his ink, against such as opposed him.' However, continues he, 'such the equality of the sharpness of 'his stile, he was impartial therein; be he ancient or 'modern writer, Papist or Protestant, that stood in his 'way, they should all equally taste thereof (7).'

of Divinity *. Together with his fellowship of Eton, he held by dispensation a canonry of Windfor (b). In 1621, he preached a sermon there before the King, upon Psal. l. 15. which gave occasion to his writing his treatise of the Invocation of Saints [C]. The same year he published his Diatribe upon the first part of Mr Selden's History of Tyibes [D]. This

(b) In the chapel there he preached the theological lecture for eight years successively. Wood's Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 732.

[C] A sermon which gave occasion to his treatise on the invocation of Saints. It seems there was present at the preaching of this sermon, M. Antonio de Dominis, Archbishop of Spalato, who was then Dean of Windfor, having renounced the Romish faith, and embraced that of the Church of England. But this gentleman returning afterwards with his first faith, took occasion to charge our author with averring the Romish doctrine, and practice of praying to saints and angels. 'For that he heard with great delight (these are his words) one of his then canons of Windfor preaching before the King's Majesty mayntayne, that there was no cause why every man might not turn himself unto his angel and say, Holy angel-keeper pray for me;' of this our author having information by means of Bishop Williams, Keeper of the Great Seal, thought it necessary to clear himself of the aspersions, by publishing his full sentiments upon that point, in a just treatise upon the subject of the invocation of saints; wherein he observes in answer to his defamer, who says he heard him with great delight, that he neither was nor could be a proper judge thereof, since he preached in English, which indeed he might hear but could not understand, except captim & sparsim, now and then, here and there a word, or half a sentence. He professes solemnly, he spoke not the words charged upon him (8), and that he neither did nor does hold the purport of them, certum & de fide. The most, says he, that himself [De Dominis], who must now say what they at Rome will have him, heard, is this and no more; paradventure, or it is probable, quod sic. But that which he did hear, and not attend to, was spoken in Latin; Sed de Angelo custode alibi fortassis ampliandum. But notwithstanding this asseveration, and besides, that the book was read over and both approved and warranted for the press by Bishop Williams, no favourer of Popery, yet we shall see some passages brought against him afterwards by the House of Commons as favouring Popery. However, he allows that in private discourse he might say to the Dean, talking upon this as they did upon many other particulars disputed of between Protestants and Roman Catholics, that upon the supposition of Angel-keepers which was an opinion generally received, he saw no absurdity in nature, no incongruity to the analogy of faith, no repugnancy at all unto sacred scripture, much less impiety, for any man to say Sante Angele-custos ora pro me, which under correction, says he, I say now, though I did not in my sermon. He observes that this makes nothing to the purpose of the Papists concerning invocation of either saints or angels. The Angel keeper is not to be remembered upon equal terms with Angels of commission extraordinary; nor turning unto him with pray for me, unto imploration of their aid, who have no such commission ordinary as he hath, but are all upon employments extraordinary. Invocation of saints is a point of indifference, it being uncertain at least, whether they are, and in what manner they can be, acquainted with our wants. Their condition is not to attend us, and they are removed far above the reach of our call. But if I speak unto him that is present with me, and standeth by me to help and assist me, I commit no absurdity against reason nor impiety. And thus upon supposal of Angle-keepers, which I urge not as a point of belief or piety, (the case itself of Angel-keepers is not so resolved) but only mention as of congruity, because it is most probable there are such keepers. If thus myself resolved to infer Holy Angel-keeper pray for me, I see no reason to be taxed with point of Popery or superstition, much less with absurdity or impiety (9).

[D] History of tyibes [His Majesty was much pleased with this performance, wherein the author, as Mr Wood truly observes, had vanquished the then thought matchless Selden at his own weapon, and shewed himself the greater Philologer of the two (10). This appears in discovering some egregious mistakes of his antagonist, owing to an ignorance hardly pardonable in a scholar. We shall give one instance: In return to Selden's charging the clergy with ignorance, he says, 'Would you take it well to be challenged for gross ignorance in some things that a Philologer should not be ignorant of, seeing you made greatest love unto philology, and held her as your chiefest mistress. I will be bold to put you in mind of some one thing and rubbe your memory a little. De Diis Syris, p. 269. thus you write: Etymologicum autem author Πάταρκος κατ' ἀραίρησιν τῶ ἀπάταρκος. Orus. Touching which place of the Etymologicon, first you profess your ignorance non omnino capimus quid sibi velit no Dei? That's marvail that you do not. Fie man for shame! Such an Aristarchus, and cannot in a peice of plain Greek draw Dun out of the mire. What, even Mr Selden among the ignorants? non capimus were for some of us, the unlearned clergy. But it seems you were ashamed of that non capimus, and therefore ventured to say somewhat, though that which some of the clergy will laugh at you for. Your learned animadversion marreth all, and better were your non capimus still; neque enim Orus, say you very clerk-like, magis Patacus dicendus est quam alius quivis Deus: for Orus is no more to be called Patacus than any other God; true indeed, no more than Castor and Pollux, if they were tutelares in St Paul's ship, or Apollo in Augustini Admirali, or quavis in puppe Deus. But quid ad Bercham, Orus or Patacus? Is any Philologer or Critic beside yourself ignorant, that Orus was not intended to be a Patacus by the Etymologist; but is the name of that grammarian whom he voucheth for that his goodlie doctrine, that Πάταρκος was made of ἀπάταρκος κατ' ἀραίρησιν τῶ α, by taking away the first letter α. That Orus was a grammarian, myself a poor postillating Polyanthæan * clergyman can tell, and remember to have read of him in Eustathius ad Iliad λ. 'Ἡ δὲ ἱατρὴν ἐκ ἑλληνικὴν παρὰ τὴ τοῖς τεχνικαῖς κείται καὶ ὅτι μὲν Ὀρὸς ἢ ἑλληνικὴν λέξιν ἢ ἱατρὴν εἶναι φησιν. Ἀλεξάνδρου δὲ Κορυθαίου ἀκριβοῦσαν λαλῶν, μὴ Ἀττικὴν εἶναι λέγει αὐτὴν. The word ἱατρὴν for a midwife is no Greek word, yet it is found amongst the grammarians. Orus saith it is no Greek word at all, but Alexander Cotaenensis speaketh punctually, and home, and says it is not used in the Attick dialect.' As a grammarian also, is he mentioned in this very author of the Etymologicon, who, if you think upon it advisedly, neither dreamed of Horus nor Horus Apollo, nor any Egyptian deity for his Patacus.' This is a home stroke, nor is the application less just and a propos, 'if a lazie ignorant clergyman (Mr Selden's epithet for the clergy) may sometimes be able to pull a great Philologer by the ear. I hope men may be pardoned that out of their own profession be not so skilful in all points. We study not the laws civil or municipal. These you would not that we should; lest we should be acquainted with them than we are, were we not enforced to know them, and feel them against our will (11).' However, as the greatest geni are observed sometimes to fall into such unexpected abscences as this just mentioned, our author, to use his own words, has dressed up another dish to the Philologer's palate, which he presented in the following terms. 'It is a critical apophaireton concerning ἀκροθίνιον, in the glossary expounded by ruticilia, which word is not worth the letters it is written withal, being no word of use in the Latin tongue, nor holding any analogy there. You conjecture it should be ruta caesa not much different from the writing of ruticilia, ruta & caesa, or else ruta-caesa are, you say, and rightly, things digged up, cut down, and severed from the freehold; so it appeareth from Festus and Cicero in topics; both chosen words used in bargains and sales of lands. Among the Romans there was always an exception of such things as are cut down and digged up, and so separated from the freehold; so Ulpian, whom you have placed in your margin; so ruta caesa are in a fort spolia villoe, and yet may not easily, as you suppose, be rendered in Greek by ἀκροθίνιον, which sometimes, as you also have taught us, signifieth spoils of war. It is a metaphor far fetched that ἀκροθίνια doth at all signify spoils of war, because no man that ransacketh a town, but will reserve the best and leave the worst τὰ ἀκροθίνια (12). Now to derive a metaphor from such a metaphor is no easy work in rhetoric, where no more proportion is, than between

(11) Preface addressed to Selden, P. 374

(12) He had before shewn Selden mistaken in the interpretation of the sense of this word in the Epistle to the Hebrews, ch. vii. 4.

It could not be that of Doctor; for, in the preface to his answer to the G35g, he, in 1624, expressly declares he was no Doctor of Divinity; and even in the proclamation for his confirmation to Chichester, he is stiled Bachelor of Divinity. See note [L].

(8) In the body of the book he declares, not only that he never spoke the words, as he knew, but likewise had been assured his Majesty could well remember he never did.

This work was so satisfactory to the King, that Mr Selden was ordered to forbear that dispute (i). In 1622, some Romanists having attempted to profelyte one of his parishioners at Stamford-Rivers to that faith; not being able to procure a conference, he sent them three propositions [E] in writing, by way of challenge, in defence of the doctrine of the Church of England. In return to these, about 18 months after, receiving a piece with this title, A Gagg for the New Gospel, he wrote an answer to it; which being published in 1624 (k), some tenets therein advanced [F] raised such a flame against him among the Calvinistical manuie and ruta casa. What say you rather unto rupicilia? nearer unto rutilicia than your ruta casa, ἀκροθίνια may very well be said to be the tops of any rocks by the sea-side, for τις τίνος is ἀρχαῖος you know in Homer, the antientest author and Jugi pater of all Greek language. Βῆ δέναι παρὰ θίνα πάλυφλοσβοῖο θαλάσσης. Rupes are εἰς ἀδύς, and κρηνοὶ τοιοῦτοι, such as be commonly the high cliffs and banks of the sea. Cilia are the eyelids, sic dicta, faith Isidore, quia oculos celant tegentes tota custodia, ὅπερ αἰσθητικὴν τὴν γλῶσσαν, it should be ὑποπόσιον, which word is expounded by the most learned Hefychius amongst other things to be οἱ δημοί or swellings and risings of the flesh about the eye. So that 'tis no hard metaphor, nor yet matter, these things considered, to render ἀκροθίνια rupicilia, the tops of sea cliffs, which hanging over, do shelter and shadow the harbour that is beneath, as the eye-lids do the eyes. Thus you having drawn yourself aside, as Scipio, to play at check upon the sea shore, to delight yourself a little in your so much beloved and admired philologic and critic faculty, will not take it ill, I trust, that a Polyanthæan clergyman hath traced your steps, and intervened in these your delights.

As it is the business of our author's book to answer the three first chapters of Mr Selden's history, he examines every chapter. In the first he shews that the meaning of Abraham's giving Melchizedec tythes of all, in Gen. xiv. 20. is to be understood of all his substance, and not of the spoils only which he had taken in war. 2. He proves that there is no express text that Jacob did actually perform his vow of paying tythe of all his substance Gen. xxviii. 22. though his character is sufficient to ground a belief that he did it. 3. He vindicates the Septuagint version of that noted text Gen. iv. 7. ἐν ᾧ ὁρθῶς προσέσχευκεις ὁρθῶς δὲ μὴ διελκεις ἡμαρτίας, ἡσύχαζον. If thou offer rightly, and divide not rightly, thou hast sinned, hold thy peace. By which is designed a defect in the quota pars of Cain's sacrifice, and consequently a proof of Abel's sacrifice being acceptable by the quota pars. Whence he says there was yet a respect had to the quantity. In the 2d chapter, he shews that first-fruits were not by the Jews confined to these only, wheat, barley, figs, grapes, olives, pomegranates, and dates, but extended to honey, and all other fruits in general, and that not in what quantity the owner would, but in a certain defined portion; and here he charges Selden with stealing the notion from Joseph Scaliger. In the 3d chapter he proves that the practice of paying tythes to the Gods among the Heathens was universal, that the original of this practice could never yet be discovered, and thence infers that it took its root from reason and nature. It is observable, that in this book our author quotes passages from manuscript copies in his own possession, not then extant in print, which confirms what has been said, that he was at a great expence in maintaining scholars beyond seas to procure him manuscripts; but that upon his death his chaplain Millicent turning Jesuit, carried them all away (13).

[E] Three propositions. These are, (1.) 'If any Papist living can prove unto me, that the present Roman Church is either the Catholic Church, or a sound member of the Catholic Church, I will subscribe. (2.) If any Papist living can prove unto me, that the present Church of England, is not a true member of the Catholic Church, I will subscribe. (3.) If any Papist can prove to me, that all those points, or any one of those points which the Church of Rome maintaineth against the Church of England were, or was, the perpetual doctrine of the Catholic Church, the concluded doctrine of the representative Church in any General Council, or National approved by a General, or the dogmatical resolution of any one Father for 500 years after Christ, I will subscribe.'

[F] Some tenets therein advanced. Those relating to Arminianism were what is well known by the name of the five points in the Quinquarticular Controversy. Those touching Popery were, 1. That the Church representative cannot err, p. 45. 2. That the Fathers did not any way fail, nor did darkness possess their clear understandings, chap. viii. p. 113. 3. He calleth the doctrine of the invisibility of the Church, a private opinion, no doctrinal decision of the Protestants. 4. That the Bishop of Rome personally is not Antichrist, nor yet the Bishops of Rome successively are that Antichrist magnus ille Antichristus. 5. That a sinner is justified, when he is made just, that is translated from a state of nature to a state of grace, which act is motion, as they speak, between two terms, consisting in forgiveness of sins primarily, and grace infused secondarily, in which doctrine of justification, he accordeth fully with the council of Trent, Sess. vi. Chap. 37, and contradiceth the doctrine of the Church of England in the book of Homilies, sermon of salvation, and all other reformed Churches. 6. He so extends meritum ex condigno, that he would make men believe there is no material difference betwixt us and the Papists, in this point. 7. That touching evangelical councils he saith, 'I know no doctrine of our English Church against them.' 8. That howsoever, in words he denieth limbus patrum. Yet thus he writeth, 'The Patriarchs, Prophets, and Fathers, that lived and died before Christ, the scripture resolveth they were not there, where now they are, in the highest heavens, there where the glorified body of Christ is now residing, at the right hand of God,' chap. xli. p. 277. 9. Touching images he writeth thus: 'Images have three uses assigned by your schools, stay there, go no farther, and we charge you not with idolatry. Institutionem rudium, commonesationem historie, & excitationem devotionis, you and we also give unto them, chap. xliiii. p. 300, 301. Images, in Gregory's time, were very much improved to be books for the simple and ignorant people; hold you there, and we blame you not;' and a little after, 'images are not utterly unlawful unto Christians in all manner of religious employment. The pictures of Christ, the blessed Virgin, and Saints, may be made, and had in houses, and set up in churches. The Protestants have them, they despight them not; respect and honour may be given unto them. The Protestants do it, and use them for helps of piety;' which directly contradiceth the doctrine of the Church of England in the book of Homilies 10. Of signing our children only in baptism with the sign of the cross, he speaketh very superstitiously. 'We use signing with the sign of the cross, both on the forehead, and elsewhere. Caro signatur ut anima munitur, said Tertullian, and so we. Chap. 46. he citeth and approveth the testimony of one of them, (v. Athanasius de Incarn. verbi, p. 61). By the sign of the cross of Christ all magic spells are disappointed, witchcraft and sorcery cometh to nothing; all idols are confounded and forsaken.' He professeth, that he knoweth no cause of such distraction and disaffection betwixt us and the Papists, for the reverent use of signing with the sign of the cross.' Chap. viii. p. 60. He saith, 'Joshua prevailed against Amalek through the sign of the cross, rather than by the sword.' 11. Of the sacrament of the Lord's supper, he writeth very popishly; for first he calleth the supper of the Lord, in express terms, the sacrament of the altar, and afterwards more fully. 'But that you were bred up, says he, in a faction, otherwise you would acknowledge there need be no difference betwixt the Papists and us in the point of real presence,' p. 253, and again, 'no man denieth a change, an alteration, a transmutation, a transubstantiation, as they speak.' 12. Touching confession, we require, says he, men to make special confession, if they find their consciences troubled with any matter, either when they be sick, or before receiving of the Lord's supper; his words are, in the case of perplexity, Calvinistical puritans, that two of the most zealous preachers (l) in that way at Ipswich drew up several articles, charging him with Popery and Arminianism, in order to present them to the Parliament. But our author having procured a copy of that paper (m), with an information of their design, immediately applied to the King for protection; who gave him leave to appeal to himself, and also to print his defence (n), if Dr White, Dean of Carlisle, should approve (o) his doctrine, as agreeable to that of the Church of England. Under these cautions, his famous treatise, entitled, Appello Cæsarem [G], or a Just Appeal from two unjust Informers, was published in 1625, soon after the accession of King Charles the First to the throne. But the Calvinistical principles being still warmly espoused, his book was taken under examination by the House of Commons, and several proceedings there were held against him in the two first Parliaments of that reign [H].

plexity, for the quieting of men disturbed in their consciences. 13. He taketh no exception to his adversary for calling it [ordination] the sacrament of holy orders. But denieth our Church to hold any such opinion, as that no inferior grace is given by imposition of hands in the sacrament of holy orders, chap. xxviii. p. 269. 14. Touching the power of the Priest to forgive sins, 'this is the doctrine,' saith he, 'of our communion book and the practice of our Church accordingly, not only that the Priests have power not only to pronounce but to give remission of sins, chap. xi. p. 78, 79; and it is confessed, that all priests, and none but priests have power to forgive sins.'

[G] Appello Cæsarem.] In this defence he explains himself upon each of the articles charged against him, in such a manner as is consonant to the present received doctrine of the Church of England; unless we except, that as to his private practice of signing with the cross occasionally, he uses it not only as a proper part of devotion, but as attended with extraordinary assistances which himself had experimentally found. 'What then, (are his words) if upon divers extremities I have found ease and remedy by saying that ejaculatory prayer of our Litany per crucem, &c, by thy cross—and when I said it, what, if to testify my faith, I made the sign of the cross. By thy passion good Lord deliver us.' ch. xvii. p. 280, 281. In the entrance to the second part of the book, he observes (14), That these opinions of his were not the things which offended them, or moved them to repeat their calumnies. 'Hæc autem est illa Helena: this is that Helen [the cause of all their quarrel]: whereas the Puritans were wont to be shrowded under the covert of the Church of England, and to vent, publish, and tender, their many idle dreams, fancies, and fancies, into the world, under pretext of the doctrine of our Church, and our opposites of the Romish side did accordingly charge our Church with them; Mr Mountagu, out of just indignation against that open wrong and injury done unto his mother, as he doth assuredly hope to the good service of his Majesty and the Church, hath disbanded them from their shelter, taken them off from colluding under the Church's protection, and sent them to their own home, to shrowd there if they could, and to answer for themselves, to make good their own cause by and of themselves; and likewise hath asserted the Church unto her own true tenets natural and proper, unto that doctrine which is publickly determined and authorized in her authentic records, to the high displeasure, no doubt, and distaste, of such a potent over-weening faction as they are. Hinc, says he, 'mibi sola mali labe; This is the ground of all the Popery and Arminianism with which I am charged.'

[H] Proceedings against him in the two first Parliaments of King Charles the First.] In the first, he was ordered on the 7th of July, to appear before the House that day sevennight. When being brought to the bar, the Speaker told him, it was the pleasure of the House, that the censure of his book should be postponed for some time, but that in the interim he should be committed to the custody of the Serjeant at Arms: and he was afterwards obliged to give a bond of two thousand pounds for his appearance the next session. Before their dissolution at Oxford, a bill was brought into the House against heresy and false doctrine, and to receive and establish the decrees of the Synod of Dort as part of the doctrine of the Church of England (15). Accordingly, in the ensuing Parliament in 1626, the Committee for religion having made a report on the 18th of April of several of his opinions, which they called erroneous, the following articles were drawn up against him. After a preamble containing the charge in general from his three books, An Answer to the late Gagg of the Protestants, A Treatise of the Invocation of Saints, and Appello Cæsarem, as contrary to the articles of 1562.

'It begins thus: Article 1. Whereas, in the 35th of the articles abovementioned, it is declared that the second book of Homilies doth contain a godly and wholesome doctrine, in the tenth homily of which book it is determined that the Church of Rome, as it is at present, and hath been for the space of nine hundred years and upwards, is so far gone from the nature of a true Church, that nothing can be more; he the said R. Mountagu in several places of his said book, called An Answer to the Gagger, ch. v. p. 49. and in his other book called Appello, &c. doth advisedly mayntayne and affirm, that the Church of Rome is, and ever was a true Church since it was a Church. Article 2. Whereas in the said homily it is likewise declared, that the Church of Rome is not built upon the foundation of the Prophets and Apostles; and in 28th of the said articles, that transubstantiation overthroweth the nature of a sacrament; and in the 25th of the said articles, that five other reputed sacraments of the Church of Rome are not to be accounted sacraments: yet, contrary, and repugnant hereunto, he the said Richard Mountagu doth mayntayne and affirm in his book aforesaid, called the Answer to the Gagg, p. 50. that the Church of Rome hath ever remained firm upon the same foundation of sacraments and doctrine instituted by God. Article 3. Thirdly, in the 19th of the same articles, it is further determined, that the Church of Rome hath erred not only in their use and manner of ceremonies, but also in matter of faith. He, the said Richard Mountagu, speaking of those points which belong to faith and manners, hope and charity, doth in the same book, called the Gagger, p. 14. affirm and mayntayne, that none of those are controverted inter partes, meaning the Protestants and the Papists; and that notwithstanding, in the 34th article it is resolved, that the sacrifices of Moses, in which, as is commonly said, that the Priests did offer Christ for the quick and dead, to have remission of pain and guilt too, are blasphemous follies and dangerous deceits: This being one of the points controverted between the Church of England and the Church of Rome; the said Richard Mountagu, in his book called the Gagger, p. 14. doth affirm and mayntayne, that the controverted points are of a less and inferior allay; of them a man may be ignorant without any danger of his salvation; a man may resolve, or oppose this, or that, or any, without peril of perishing for ever. Article 4. Whereas, in the third homily, intituled, Against peril of Idolatry, it is declared, that images read no good lesson neither of God nor godliness, but all error and wickedness; he, the said Richard, in the book aforesaid, called, the Answer to the late Gagger, p. 38. doth affirm and mayntayne, that images may be used for the instruction of the ignorant, and excitation of devotion. Article 5. That in the same it is plainly expressed, that the attributing the defence of some countries to Saints, is a spoiling God of his honour, and that such Saints are but as Dei Tutelares of the Gentile idolaters, the said Richard Mountagu, hath, notwithstanding, in the book aforementioned, affirmed and mayntayned, that faints have not only a memory, but a more peculiar charge of their friends, and that it may be admitted, that some faints have a peculiar patronage, custody, protection, and power, as angels also have over certain persons and countries, by especial deputation, and that it is no impietie so to believe.

(14) Chap. i. p. 114.

(15) See Register of the House of Commons. The bill did not pass by reason of the dissolution of that Parliament. And therefore in his Appeal our author says, 'Who bound me to defend the decrees of that [Dort] synod. Hath Prince, or Parliament, or Convocation, edict, statute, or canon? I know none, I have heard of none, nor ever shall I hope. Appeal, ch. xi. p. 107.'

The divines also published a great number of answers thereto [I]. However, he found means lieve. Article 6. Whereas, in the 17th of the said articles, it is resolved, that God doth constantly decree, by his counsel, secret to us, to deliver from hell and damnation, those whom he hath chosen in Christ out of mankind, and to bring them by Christ to everlasting salvation. Wherefore, they which be indued with so excellent benefit of God, be called according to God's purpose working in due season. They by grace obey the calling. They be justified freely, persevering in good works, and at length, by God's mercy, attain to everlasting felicitie. He, the said Richard Mountagu, in the book aforesaid, called the Appeal, p. 30, doth affirme and mayntayne, that men justified may fall away and depart from that state which once they had, they may rise again and become new men possibly, but not certainly nor necessarily; and the better to countenance this his opinion, he hath, in the said book, wilfully added, falsified, and changed divers words of the tenth of the articles aforementioned, and divers other words, both in the book of Homilies, and in the book of Common-Prayer; and all the same places so misrecited and changed he doth alledge in his said book, called the Appeal, p. 29, 31, 32, and 35; endeavouring thereby, to lay a most wicked and malicious slander upon the Church of England, as if it did herein differ from the reformed Church of Ireland, and those beyond the seas; and did consent to those pernicious errors, which are commonly called Arminianisme, and which the late famous Princesse Queen Elizabeth, and King James of happie memorie, did so piously and diligently labour to suppress. Item, That the said Richard Mountagu, contrary to his duty and allegiance, hath endeavoured to raise great factions and divisions in the common weale, by casting the odious and scandalous name of Puritans upon such of his Majesty's loving subjects as conform themselves to the doctrine and ceremonies of the Church of England under that name, laying upon them divers false and malicious imputations, so to bring them into dislike and displeasure with his most excellent Majesty, and into reproach and ignomie with the rest of the people, to the great danger of feditio and disturbance in the state if it be not timely prevented. Item, The scope and end of the said Richard Mountagu in the books aforementioned, is to give encouragement to Popery, and to withdraw his Majesty's subjects from the true religion established, to the Roman superstition; and consequently, to be reconciled to the see of Rome. All which, he labourereth, by subtle and cunning wayes; whereby God's true religion hath been much scandalized; and those mischiefs introduced, which the wisdom of many laws hath endeavoured to prevent, to the great peril and hazard of our sovereign Lord the King, and of all his dominions and loving subjects. Lastly, that the aforesaid Richard Mountagu hath, in the aforesaid book called the Appeal, divers passages dishonourable to the late King his Majesty's father, of famous memorie; full of bitterness, rayling, and injurious to several other persons; disgraceful and contemptuous to many worthy Divines, both of this Church of England, and other reformed Churches beyond the seas; impious and profane in scoffing at preaching, meditating, conferring, pulpits, lectures, bibles, and all shew of religion: all which do aggravate his former offences, as having proceeded from malicious and envenomed hate against the peace of this Church, and sinceritie of the reformed religion publicly professed, and by law established in this kingdom.

All which offences being to the high dishonour of Almighty God, and of most mischievous effect and consequence against the good of his Church and common weale of England, and of all his Majesty's realms and dominions. The Commons assembled in Parliament do hereby pray, that the said Richard Mountagu may be punished according to his demerits, in that exemplary manner as may deter others from attempting so presumptuously to disturb the peace of Church and State, and that the books aforesaid may be suppressed and burnt.

Wotton, Mr Rouse, Provost of Eton, and Mr William Prynne*; but especially Dr George Carleton, Bishop of Chichester. This learned author having been one of the English Divines who assisted at the Synod of Dort, thought it necessary to defend himself from some charges laid against him for his conduct therein. For instance, our author, in p. 30, of his Appeal, had said, the Synod of Dort was foreign to us, and but partial. 'I see, says he, no reason why any of the Divines of our Church should take any offence at my dissenting, who had no authority as I know of, to conclude me, more than I do at them from differing from me in their judgments, quisque abundet in sensu suo, let every man fully enjoy his own opinion.' But afterwards he observes, that 'the discipline of our Church in that and other Dutch Synods is held unlawful;' for which he cites Harm. on the Belgic Synods, cap 13, canon 8. 'What ends, continues he, men had in that Synod I know not, nor am curious to enquire; how things were carried, I as little understand or care. Whether any or all subscribed absolutely or with protestation, I cannot tell; let them look to it, and answer for it, whom it doth concern. This I am sure, John Diodati, Minister and Professor of the church of Geneva, and employed unto that Synod, but lately with me at Eton, professed there his own opinion, in some points, contrary to the conclusions at Dort.' Again, p. 42, he says, 'Those classical projects, consistorial practices, conventual desigas, and prophetic speculations of the zealous brethren in this land [viz. Holland] do γυμνῆσαι τὴν κερὰν aim at anarchy and confusion, dangerous indeed to Prince and People.' In answer to this, Dr Carleton clears himself † from being a classical Puritan, and takes occasion from our author's having called them the dangerous opinions of the Netherlands, to declare in their behalf, that touching the point of their discipline, he could witness that their Ministers were weary of it, and would gladly be freed if they could.—And somewhat I can say, proceeds the Bishop, of mine own knowledge, for I had conference with divers of the best learned in that Synod: I told them, that the cause of all their troubles was this, that they had not Bishops among them, who by their authority might repress turbulent spirits, that broached novelties. Their answer was, that they did much honour and reverence the good order and discipline of the Church of England, and with all their hearts would be glad to have it established amongst them, but that could not be hoped for in their state. Their hope was, that seeing they could not have what they desired, God would be merciful to them, if they did what they could. This was their answer, which I think is enough to excuse them, that they do not openly aim at anarchy and popular confusion. The truth is, they groan under the burden, and would be eased if they could. This is well known to the rest of my associates there, who have also conferred privately with divers of the most eminent and learned among them, p. 198 to 200.' In consequence of this, there was published the same year, 1626, a second edition of the Bishop's book, with a piece annexed, intitled, A joint Attestation, avowing, that the Discipline of the Church of England was not impeached by the Synod of Dort (16). Wherein it is acknowledged, which indeed had been insinuated by our author, that they entered no protestation against the discipline of the Dutch Church, which they endeavour to excuse; alledging, That when the Belgic confession of 1550, was recommended for their establishment, and came under examination before the Synod, a protestation was made by the President, that nothing but the doctrinal points were to be subjected to their consideration and suffrages, and all the articles concerning discipline were accordingly suppressed in the reading of the Confession to the Synod. 2. That they were sent thither to endeavour the peace of that Church, by expressing their judgments in the points there already controverted. That they had no instructions from his Majesty to meddle with the discipline, besides, there was no hope or possibility of prevailing in that part. 3. That in giving their suffrages concerning the doctrine comprized in the Confession, they added an express exception against the suppressed articles, with some touch also of argument upon them, to which exception not one word was means to defeat the attempts of all his opponents [K]; and, upon the death of one of them, Dr George Carleton, Bishop of Chichester, in 1628, he was nominated by his Majesty to that see. answered by any of the synodiques, or strangers, or Provincials. 4. That the course there taken for the manner of delivering their judgments was not (as in the five questions controverted) by subscription, but only by vocal suffrage, which gave no opportunity of putting in a written protestation; after which they proceed in these words: Peradventure some hot spirits would not have rested in a formal recorded protestation neither, but would have charged the Churches to blot those articles out of their confession, and forthwith to reform their government, otherwise not have yielded approbation to any article of doctrine as there comprized, but renounced the Synod, and shaken off from his feet the dust of Dort, saying, I have nothing to do with your conclusions, I have no part or portion in them; what ends you have, how things are carried, I cannot tell, nor care. But here the question naturally occurs, What reason was there given for so different a manner of proceeding in this part of the Belgic Confession from that of the five controverted articles? did not the reason for it appear evidently the next year, when the acts of the Synod were published in print? wherein, among other particulars, the Belgic Confession is at large set down in thirty-seven articles, i. e. with the three article concerning the discipline received in those Churches. Is not this a sufficient warrant for our author's remark, That the Synod of Dort, in some points condemneth, upon the bye, even the discipline of the Church of England (17). Does it not thereby appear that that distressed Church, in the midst of her distractions about matters of doctrine, was so wily in her interests, as to make a finiter use of her neighbour's honest assistance and dulness of apprehension. Was Mr Mountagu the only one, who, upon view of the Synodical acts, judged the presumption in law was against them? and that a purgation was necessary to clear them herein, appears from their attestation, that the manner of examining and judging of the Belgic Confession is not set down in the printed acts, so particularly as they could have wished, and would have provided for, if they had been acquainted with any intent of their publication; and why do they call upon Mr Mountagu to retract what he had written, but upon the justice of what his censure remarks. The imputation had of late been farther by the bye grated on, and they had been upbraided in the audience of divers personages of note, whose opinion they had great cause to respect. As to John Diodati, Dr Carleton says, that all the English Divines that were at Dort, believe it to be untrue, and give this reason for it, because they hold Diodati for an honest man; and to put this matter, continues he, out of doubt, Diodati himself hath written to a learned and reverend Bishop of our Church, protesting that he never spake any thing as the author of the Appeal imposed upon him, touching the Confession of the Synod (18). But Diodati's character is not so unexceptionable as these Divines judged. Cooke the Solicitor, in passing sentence against King Charles the First, declared, that Diodati of Geneva told him, he heard the King say, That Christ in the Gospel commands us to forgive our enemies, but not our friends; which yet Diodati afterwards denied (19). To conclude, our author's Appeal was translated into Latin, and sent beyond sea, where it was condemned by the reformed Churches of Geneva and France, and the ecclesiastical States of Germany and the Netherlands: and in the Church of Scotland, his books, we are told, were had in so much hatred, that they were held fit only to stop mustard pots (20).

[K] He got the better of all his enemies. The King was displeas'd with the first proceedings of the Parliament, against him, and to procure his Majesty's farther favour, he applied to the Duke of Buckingham in the following letter:

' May it please your Grace,
' Your Highness vouchsafed at Windsor to let me understand that his Majesty, my gracious master and sovereign, had taken me off from that trouble and vexation, which by some men's procurement I was ' put unto, in the House of Commons. They, as I understand, think not so. But intend to proceed against me so far as they can, as having returned his Majesty no other answer, but that I was freed from imprisonment. It is true, that besides twenty pounds, which the Serjeant had of me, by exaction for fees; they bound me unto him in a bond of 2000 l. to appear before them the next sessions. I beseech your Grace, that as you have been pleas'd to tie me unto your excellent not only self, but also most honourable siter, in that bond of obligation, as never was poor scholar to such worthies; so you would be pleas'd to let his Majesty understand the case, that by your means I may be absolutely discharged, with the deliverie of my bond from them, whom I never offended, who under correction, have nothing to do with me (21); and as his Majesty's servant be left unto himself, especially for that which was authorized by himself, and commanded by his father my late master of ever blessed memory. If his Majesty will be pleas'd to call for their accusations against me, if I don't really and thoroughly answer whatsoever is, or can be imputed to me out of my books. I will no further desire favour and protection of his Majesty, and your gracious self, but be willingly left unto my enemies. I must crave pardon for presuming thus to trouble your Grace, the rather, because thro' a grievous affliction of the colic and stone, I am not able personally to attend your Grace, whom according unto my most bounden dutie, I dailie recommend unto the Almighty, being more obliged unto your noble self than ever to any one. So remaining

' Most humbly at your Grace's service,

Petworth,

' Ri. Mountagu.'

This was seconded by another letter to the Duke from Laud, then Bishop of St Davids, and the Bishops of Oxford and Rochester; dated August 2d, 1625: wherein they declare Mountagu's doctrine to be that of the Church of England. They observe, that his Majesty had already taken the business into his own care, and referred it in a right course to Church consideration, concluding thus: 'These things considered, we have little to say for Mr Mountagu's person, only thus much we know, he is a very good scholar, and a right honest man, a man every way able to do God, his Majesty, and the Church of England good service. We fear he may receive great discouragement, and, which is far worse, we have some cause to doubt this may breed a great backwardness in able men to write in defence of the Church of England against either home or foreign adversaries, if they shall see him sink in fortune, reputation, or health, upon his book's occasion (22).'

[L] Though not without some difficulty. Having sued out his Conge d'elire, proclamation was made in August as usual, at the church of Bow, eight days before the consecration. In the mean time, one William Jones a Stationer, took counsel, and got objections drawn by an Advocate in the Arches, which objections were extracted out of the aforementioned articles, exhibited against our author in Parliament. Upon Friday, the 22d day of August, when the elect Bishop came to Bow church to be confirmed, proclamation being again read by the Beadle of the Arches three times, in these words: All manner of persons, that can, or will, object against the person of the worshipful Richard Mountagu, Bachelor of Divinity, and Parson of Petworth, elected Lord Bishop of Chichester, the form of his election, or the party elected, let them now speak and object in due forme of law, and they shall be heard, otherwise they shall be precluded. Hereupon, Jones (23) said, with an audible voice, three times, I object against him, and here are my objections in due form of law, and so presented his objections to Dr Ryves, the substituted judge for the business, who taking the paper, seemed to read it over, and then delivered it to the Bishop elect, who seemed also to read it silently, when returning the

lowing at Croydon. He was allowed to hold the rectory of Petworth, of which he had been possessed some years (q); and having obtained a special pardon from his Majesty [M], he applied himself closely to his favourite study of Church Antiquities, and first published his Originum Ecclesiasticarum Apparatus at Oxford, 1635; which was followed in 1636, by his Originum Ecclesiasticarum, tomus primus. In 1638, upon the promotion of Dr Matthew Wren to Ely, our author was translated to Norwich (s). He came to this see with the ill effects of a quartan ague, with which he had been afflicted above a year and a half; and under this disorder he still continued his studies, and, in 1640, published his Originum Ecclesiasticarum, pars posterior [N]: but the ague put an end to his life April 13th the following year. His body was interred in the choir of the cathedral of Norwich, where is this inscription on his grave-stone, Depositum Montacutii Episcopi (t). After his death was published a posthumous piece, in 1642, fol. intitled, The Acts and Monuments of the Church before Christ incarnate, with a dedication to Jesus Christ in Latin, written by himself; and, in 1651, came out another piece of his, intitled, Versus & Note in Photii Epistolae. The character of his genius is evidently seen in his Works. His admirable learning was confessed by his enemies (u), but his fondness for the Fathers led him (as might be expected) into several, and some even (as now appear) childish, mistakes (w). What he chiefly deserves to be remembered for is, the great hand which he had in rooting up the Dort doctrine upon the Quinquarticular controversy out of the Church of England; which, as Heylin observes (x), neither Laud, Howson, nor Corbet, could bring to pass, none of them being able to break through those difficulties which opposed, 'till Mountagu took the work in hand; who being well backed, and having the ice somewhat broke before him, waded with confidence and courage through the midst of those waters (y).

paper, the Judge called one Dr Sammes of the Arches, advising what to do, who told him, he would incur a præmunire, if he did not proceed. Whereupon he gave Jones the objector an answer to this effect. My friend, you have given here objections against this my Lord elect of Chichester, but your objections are not in due form of law, because they have not a Doctor of the Arches's hand to them, neither have you an Advocate to plead your objections (24): Therefore, nevertheless, by virtue of this his Majesty's commission, under the great seal (which he took in his hand and turned) I will proceed to confirm him, and so did. After which, the new confirmed Bishop said to this effect; That he himself had subscribed to the book of articles and the book of Homilies, and all other books of conformity to the Church of England, and that if any whatsoever could publicly or privately confute those his books, he would be the first man that should cause those his books to be burnt. To which the Judge answered, You have well said, my Lord; and he also said, that the objections were nothing but the blattering of a tradesman (25), who was too busy to meddle with such high mysteries of Divinity, but indeed it was the disease of the times for mechanical tradesmen to do. This account is not contradicted by the Register of Canterbury, who mentions no particulars in the exceptions, but that Dr Ryves, the substitute for the Vicar general, declined to take any notice of them, concluding Jones among the contumacious, quod nullo modo legitime comparuit, nec aliquid in hac parte juxta juris exigentiam diceret, exciperet, vel opponeret. As cases of this kind very rarely occur, we thought proper to insert so much of the process for the satisfaction of the curious in these matters (26). It is remarked by the author of Antimontacutium, 'That after his Lordship's consecration, the following Sunday, at Croydon, while he was at dinner with the Archbishop, news was brought to his Grace, that the Duke of Buckingham was stabbed at Portmouth the Saturday before, which, as he was Mountagu's potent patron, did, for the time, help to marr his writings (27).

[M] His Majesty's pardon.] The form of this pardon was like those given at a coronation, only there were inserted some particulars for the pardoning of all errors heretofore committed, either in speaking, writing, or publishing; whereby he might hereafter be questioned. This account we have from Dr Fuller, who tells us (28) also, that our new Bishop thought of addressing his Majesty for this pardon upon Jones's attempt against his confirmation.

[N] The Originis.] The late Dr Waterland writing of the sacrificial part of the Eucharist, observes, that our Bishop, in the second tome of his Originis, p. 301 and 234, understood the whole action or memorial service to be a true and real sacrifice, as he was a great admirer of antiquity, he had no regard to the new definitions, but referred his antagonists to St Austin for correction and better instruction (29). However, it must be owned that he did not always use that way of speaking of this sacrifice, for in his Appeal, lib. xxix. where he defends his expression in calling the Lord's Supper the sacrament of the altar, he declares it a spiritual one, a sacrifice, not propitiatory, not an external, visible, true, and proper sacrifice, but only representative, commemorative, and figurative sacrifice (30); and says, as to his professed regard to antiquity, I have used the phrase of altar for the communion table, according to the manner of antiquity, and am like sometimes to use it still.

MOYLE [WALTER], a polite writer in the XVIIth century, was son of Sir Walter Moyle, Knt. and born in 1672, at Bake, the seat of the family, near Loo in Cornwall. His disposition and talents for classical learning were early discovered by the great proficiency which he made at school, whence he was removed by his father first to Oxford, and afterwards to the Temple, in the usual course of a gentleman's education; and that was the use he made of the opportunities given him by it; for, whatever might be his father's intentions, he declined the drudgery, as he called it, of the Law lucrative (a). His easy fortune allowed him to pursue the natural bent of his genius; he therefore continued his application to the study of polite literature with great vigour and equal success, so that he quickly became acquainted with Mr Congreve, Wycherley, and others of the first characters in this branch of learning (b); and among these was particularly distinguished by the vivacity of his wit, and a ripeness of judgment above his years. Such a genius could not lie long without producing some proper fruits. A design being set on foot about the year 1695, to publish Lucian's Works, translated into English by several hands, Mr Moyle furnished a version of four discourses of that delicately difficult author (c), which which were both correct and finely spirited [A]. But some time before this it seems he had taken a disgust to the Clergy (d): Their zeal was not warm enough in his opinion for the exigency of the juncture after the Revolution; and, as he always spoke very freely both of things and persons, whenever he thought the interest of his country nearly concerned, so he took this early occasion of letting the whole Order feel the tartness of his satire on that account [B]. The same year he obtained a seat in Parliament for the borough of Saltaſh in Cornwall (e); and, while he sat in the House of Commons, he constantly acted an honourable and disinterested part, but he had naturally no turn to business. Reading and study were his delight; and he had already advanced so far in this course, and was so intent upon it, that he never had any relish for this new station [C]; and he seems to have avoided a second election [D]. Not long after this, Dr Charles d'Avenant being engaged in writing his piece upon the trade and revenues of England, observed, that a translation of Xenophon's Discourse upon improving the Revenues of the State of Athens, prefixed to his performance, would greatly recommend it to the publick; in this view he applied to our author (f), who readily yielded to his friend's request [E], and the whole was published in 1697. He had for some years past fallen much into the conversation of Mr Trenchard, whose sentiments upon publick affairs agreeing with his own, there grew a kind of intimacy between them, and Mr Moyle became a fellow-writer with that gentleman in the argument against a standing army [F]. In the prosecution of the same design, to excite in his countrymen a spirit of liberty, he published next year An Essay on the Lacedæmonian Government [G], which he addressed to his friend Anthony Hammond, Esq;

[A] Translation of four discourses of Lucian, &c. These translations did not appear in print till 1710, which year, the two first volumes of this undertaking were published. But Mr Moyle's performance is mentioned with a few others, in the Life of Lucian prefixed to the first volume, which we are assured was written by Mr Dryden in 1695, and the following year (1).

[B] The Clergy felt the tartness of his satire. It is introduced into the argument to Lucian on sacrifices, and is indeed a very piquant piece of raillery, in the manner and spirit of that author, as follows: 'This discourse, says he, is a general bold spirited satire upon all the heathen superstition; their gods, temples, altars, sacrifices, and the whole system of the Pagan worship. It is writ with an air and spirit peculiar to the happy genius of Lucian, and I have this only exception to it, that he seems to assign a wrong original of sacrifices, and to mistake folly and delusion in the people for design and knavery in the Priests. I am glad, for the honour of my religion, that the Pagan Priests are the reverse of ours, and that a satire upon them, is a panegyric upon the Clergy of our Church, whose unshaken firmness to their principles, zeal for the religion and liberty of their country, and a thousand other qualities, may justly secure them from all the groundless cavils of our modern sceptics, whose opinions no good man can allow, and no wise man will profess (2).'

[C] He had no relish for this station. Mr Hammond tells us, that in Parliament he attended particularly to such motions as tended to improve trade both foreign and domestic, the employment of the poor, and the manning of the navy. Upon this last article he proposed to have a competent number of seamen exempted, as well as members of Parliament, from personal arrests †, which seems to betray more zeal than knowledge for his country's service.

[D] He seems to have avoided a second election. Mr Hammond tells us indeed, that he came into Parliament some time after 1698; intimating, that he had not sat there before, both which are apparently mistakes. The truth is, he never was ambitious of this honour. While he was candidate for Saltaſh, his companions in town were entertaining themselves at the expence of a stupid Suffex Squire, who being fond of plays and poems, came up to town, as he said, to see the poets of the age, and was by some of them introduced among the Wits of Will's Coffee-house in Covent Garden, where they admitted him under the form of a poetical consecration, as a member of their society, by the nickname of John Abassus. Mr Congreve sent a humorous description of the ceremony to our author, who was so much delighted with it, that having in answer observed, that since the dubbing of Don Quixote, and the coronation of Petrarch in the Capitol, there had not been so great a solemnity as the consecration of John Abassus, &c. he expresses himself thus: 'Wycherley was in his kingdom, and for my part, I would rather have sat there, than in the House of Commons *.'

[E] He readily yielded to his friend's request. This is intimated by Dr d'Avenant, who likewise assures his readers, that Xenophon has suffered nothing in this version, and it must be allowed, that the graceful ease of the original is clearly discerned in the copy (3). But there were several other reasons, besides the desire of obliging his friend, which concurred to excite Mr Moyle to this performance. First, Xenophon is the only ancient author now extant upon this subject. In the next place, that admirable maxim, that the true wealth and greatness of a nation consists in the numbers of people well employed, is every where inculcated throughout the whole course of the treatise. Lastly, he had here an opportunity of shewing the world a genius, which could not look into a subject without improving it. Diogenes Laërtius had placed Xenophon's death in the first year of the 105th Olympiad. This Mr Moyle shews to be a mistake, from an observation upon some passages in this treatise. Where it appears, that the Athenians had then concluded a peace with the islands, after the bellum sociale, which ended in the second year of the 106th Olympiad; whence it follows, that this discourse was written in the third year of that Olympiad, and consequently Xenophon's death could not happen sooner. To confirm this observation, our author takes notice, that it agrees with several other marks of Xenophon's age, particularly, with his being a young man at the expedition into Asia (4); a fact which has been since clearly proved by Mr Forster (5).

[F] In the argument against a standing army. It is well known, that the reasoning in this piece was the established test of patriotism for several years after. Our author's pen is particularly discovered in the dedication, which is addressed to the courtiers. The reader will find the application to be very warm, but the height of the distemper at that time, in his opinion, required such: the extravagant notion of a Jus Divinum and unlimited passive obedience must unavoidably end in slavery. 'Tis true, these principles are happily now no more; but do we not derive that happiness in some measure from Mr Moyle? is it not owing to the extirpation of these tenets, that we see at present such a standing army actually kept up, as is necessary for securing our property from the invasion of a common enemy, without endangering our liberties by an invasion from ourselves.

[G] An Essay on the Lacedæmonian Government. In this piece our author observes, that the boundaries of prerogative and liberty were not then sufficiently settled with us. This he lays upon the Clergy, 'who,' says he, for a great number of years have contributed to perplex the nation, and muddle the brains of the people about our English constitution. However, I do as freely own, continues he, they did their duty very well upon the Revolution; and whatever their theories were, they did at this crisis act rightly per viam facti, as the Civilians term it (6). Thus he, with his usual ironical tartness; which would have lost it's true liquorish flavour, and have become palled and vapid by a mixture of candour, such as, That since the Clergy are allowed to act rightly, the fair inference is, that they did so in consequence of their real principles;

In reality, the cause of liberty lay much at his heart (g), and engaged him further in a close application to the study of the Roman history, which, in the year 1699, produced An Essay upon the Constitution of that Government [H]. In 1705, we find him employed in an enquiry into the age of the Philopatriis, a dialogue commonly attributed to Lucian (b). In which he convinced Mr Dodwell, that Lucian was not, as he had asserted, the author of that discourse [I]. In the pursuit of this enquiry, he has likewise adjusted the true age of that witty sophist, which before was uncertain (i). In this last enquiry, he had occasion to look into the life of the Roman Emperor, Marcus Antoninus; and this led him into the examination of the miracle of the thundering legion, which happened in that Emperor's reign. He attacks the truth of the miracle [K], and has given such arguments for his opinion, as have not been hitherto sufficiently answered [L]; and that the Emperor continued to persecute the Christians after this event, as he had done before, is generally acknowledged to be proved by him beyond all reasonable contradiction [M]. However, in the prosecution of this subject, it must not be denied, that he has advanced some opinions which are not well grounded [N]; but these are such as do not affect the main question.

[H] An Essay on the Constitution of that Government. Having sufficiently feasted his ill humour against the Clergy, on account of their state-principles, he proceeds in this essay, to attack their Church-principles. The institution of Numa furnished the opportunity, and he makes use of it to declare his opinion against multiplying articles of faith, and narrowing the bottom of religion, by clogging it with creeds and catechisms. In this temper he intimates his opinion in favour of an universal toleration of all sects and denominations of religion whatsoever; observing that this principle in the Roman Commonwealth, was that above all others, which fitted Numa's system to the chief design of the Government (7).

[I] The Philopatriis, &c. This enquiry is published under the following title, A Dissertation upon the age of Philopatriis; a Dialogue commonly attributed to Lucian: In several Letters to Mr K——. The Dialogue is of singular use in searching into the antiquities of the Christian Church. The author, a Pagan; gives an account of some doctrines and usages of the third century, with a view of exposing them. Mr Moyle looks on it as a discourse infinitely below the spirit, the wit, and the politeness of Lucian, having, he says, all the marks of a barbarous age, and not one good quality to recommend it; being made up of the two worst ingredients that can enter into the composition of any man or book, dulness and prophaneness. He calls Mr Dodwell's lectures a loose rhapsody of crude paradoxes, and precarious reasonings. It appears from these letters of our author, that he intended to publish a large discourse, or dissertation, settling the age of Lucian, distinguishing between his genuine and counterfeit works, and fixing the chronology of all of them which have any notes of time to determine them (13). But this he did not complete †, though he was employed in digesting the materials in January 1706-7, and thought of composing it in April, after which he designed to have the manuscript perused by Dr Bentley, and to dedicate it to him (14). This is an evidence of his great opinion of that critic; but we have yet a stronger than this, in the conclusion of a letter to Dr William Musgrave, to whom he writes thus, 'I have subscribed to Dr Bentley's Greek testament, as I suppose you have done; and I hope you will encourage all your friends to contribute to so noble a work (15).'

[K] He attacks the truth of the miracle, &c. In this argument Mr Moyle has undoubtedly put the issue of the cause upon a right footing, and given the true test for deciding the improbability of the miracle, viz. that the event does not exceed the powers of natural causes. There are, he observes, but two circumstances, which have the least pretence to pass for supernatural. viz. That only the Quadi suffered by the storm, and that the fire was not extinguished by the rain. The first of which he proves to be a natural event, by many parallel instances; particularly that of the defeat of Brennus's army at Delphi, and from the examples we have every day of single men struck dead with lightning, in the midst of a crowd unhurt thereby. And as to the 2d he both shews, that the authority from the relator of it deserves very little credit on this head, and granting the truth of the fact, he proves it, however, to be agreeable to the common effect of lightning. For this he cites Seneca (16), who, speaking of lightning says, when the fire is stronger than the moisture, it predominates; which he illustrates by several parallel phenomena, after which he proceeds thus: but the instance I chiefly depend on is a very extraordinary one, full to the purpose, which fell out in the compass of our own memory, attested beyond all contradiction, and first published by Dr Plot, in the Philos. Transf. (17). 'Tis the relation of a clap of thunder, which broke on an English ship in America; and brought some sulphureous matter along with it, which burnt in the stern of the ship, and could not be quenched by water, nor any thing else, 'till the matter itself was spent.

[L] His arguments have not hitherto been sufficiently answered ] An answer was attempted by Mr Woolston and Mr Whiston. The first of these gentlemen grounds the probability of the miracle upon the importance of the occasion (18), the strength of which argument has been since examined by Dr Conyers Middleton: And Mr Whiston lays great stress upon the authority of the apostolical constitutions; in which opinion he stands single (19).

[M] The Emperor continued to persecute the Christians, &c. This is proved from the authority of I heophilus ad Autolychem, and the Alexandrian chronicle; to which our author adds a passage from Marcus Antoninus himself in his own book, where that Emperor, says the Christians, ran head-long upon death, with a brutal obstinacy (20). This he shews was wrote after the pretended miracle, and evidently implies there was then a persecution on foot against the Christians.

[N] Some opinions not well grounded ] Speaking of the Christian martyrs, he says, there is good reason to infer from the acts of Ignatius, and his epistle to the Romans, that he himself, the most celebrated martyr, since the days of the apostles, was a volunteer (21). This hasty and severe charge against Ignatius is invalidated by Dr Jortin, who, however, upon the question whether there were any Christian soldiers in the Roman army when this martyr suffered, refers to these letters of Mr Moyle; whose arguments in behalf of the negative, says he, are very strong (22).

Another opinion which seems to be crudely advanced by our author, is the truth of the miracle of the fiery eruption at Jerusalem, in the time of Julian the apostate. In which case the varacity of God almighty, he says, was concerned in order to the accomplishment of the prophecies to interpose and prevent the re-establishment of the Jewish nation (23), whereas that end was fully answered by the death of Julian, presently after this attempt made by him, for the purpose of their re-establishment. Another reason, in defence of this miracle, is brought by Mr Moyle's antagonist, which indeed may be called his own, since it is adopted by him, and acknowledged to be better than his own. It is this, that the miracle was wrought to convince Julian that Christ was a true prophet, by making him the very instrument of establishing that prophecy, which he endeavoured by his projects to overturn. The prophecy here understood is this, that not one stone of the temple should be left upon another (24), but it has been since sufficiently proved, that this prophecy was fulfilled in the destruction of the temple by Titus (25).

Upon the subject of miracles in general, Mr Moyle has this remark: when the truth of our religion had been confirmed by so many signal miracles, which were never disowned by the heathens themselves, question. While our author was writing on this subject, he engaged likewise in a literary correspondence with Dr William Musgrave, Physician at Exeter; wherein he furnished that learned Antiquary with several curious particulars, on the subject of his treatise, entitled Belgium Britannicum, which are gratefully acknowledged by the doctor. This correspondence began in 1709, and continued as long as the life of Mr Moyle [O], whose letters are a conspicuous instance of his penetrating genius and active curiosity [P]: for which one single enquiry was far from being sufficient; indeed, so far from it, that no sooner did the first volume of Dr Prideaux's Connection of the Old and New Testament make it's appearance in publick, but Mr Moyle's eyes were upon it. The novelty of the subject, as well as the character of the writer, engaged his particular attention. The Dean was also his relation. He therefore took the liberty to communicate some mistakes which he had observed in the work, for which he had the thanks of that learned and ingenuous author. These letters passed in the year 1716, and it was owing to Mr Moyle, that the work appears at present with fewer faults than it would otherwise have done [Q]. Mr Moyle's talents were not confined within the bounds of these studies only; he carried his researches into the regions of Natural Philosophy, and we find him enriching Dr Tancred Robinson's cabinet with some curious birds, as well as Dr Sherard's with some rare and uncommon plants (k). He had a strong relish and inclination for these things, and would have made a greater progress in improving our knowledge of them, had not the ill state of his health obliged him to abandon these studies, and apply himself chiefly to such as he could follow within-doors, as Criticism, Philology, &c. without meddling with any part of Natural History, except the history of birds, that are either natives of England or passengers. Of these he waited for a hard winter or two to compleat his collections, after which he intended to draw up his observations upon them, and communicate them to the Royal Society [R], in the view of having them printed in their Philosophical Transactions (l); but was prevented by his death, which happened June 9, 1721, in the fiftieth year of his age (m). Dying without issue, he was succeeded in his estate by his brother Joseph Moyle of Southampton; by whose direction his Posthumous Works were printed (n).

elves, it quickly triumphed over all opposition, and spread with a wonderful progress over all parts of the Roman empire. When Christians had gained such footing in the world, the work was half done, and the rest might be safely trusted to the preaching of our ministers, and the sufferings of our martyrs: and the ends of miracles being fully accomplished, 'twas high time for miracles themselves to cease (26). This opinion has been embraced and confirmed since by Dr Middleton (27). In short, almost every thing that can be alledged either for or against ecclesiastical miracles, may be found in the course of these letters, and whoever compares what is here advanced with what Dr Warburton has urged, particularly in his Defence of the miracle of the fiery eruption at Jerusalem (28), must observe that he was greatly obliged to Mr Moyle.

[O] His correspondence with Dr Musgrave continued till his death. Though this correspondence was chiefly on the subject of Antiquities, yet the extraordinary spirit which was raised throughout the nation by Dr Sacheverell could not be passed in silence. An account of it was sent by the doctor to Mr Moyle, who returns him ' hearty thanks for his excellent description of the epidemic madness,' as he calls it, ' of the nation, which says he, is not to be matched in the history of any age or people. Lucian, I remember, begins his rules for writing history, with a pleasant story of the Abderites, who he says were so sensibly affected at the acting of Euripides's Andromeda, that in a few days they lost all their wits, and ran raving about the streets, and crying out

Σὺ δ' ὦ Οἰῶν τύραννε, καὶ ἀνδρῶπων ἕρωσ.

In English:

* The temple of the Lord, the Church, the Church *.

' It looks as if SACHEVERELL's farce by the help of H—— and S—— †, had had the same effect on us, as that tragedy had on the people of Abdera, who you know were in days of yore as famous for their politics and good sense, as the people of England are at present. However, there is this difference, the frenzy of Abdera vanished with the first frost,

' ours, it seems, is to last for two years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Parliament; and I'm afraid will never be thoroughly cured, but by opening the jugular vein of some persons where the infection began (29).' These last words shew the madness was more epidemic than our author meant by that expression.

[P] These letters are an instance of his genius and curiosity. Among these letters there is an extract of one from Mr Edward Llwyd, containing an account of a Cornish antiquity, called dance mien, as follows: ' Dance mien seems to have been so called by the common people, on no other account than that they [the stones] are placed in a circular order, and so make an area for dancing. For near Lanyke such another circle is called mien an dacons, which signifies the dancing stones, or the stones at the dance. Two such circles in Denbighshire are called kerig Drydion, or Druid stones; and in some places in the Highlands of Scotland they are called temples and chapels: whence I conjecture they were places of sacrifice, and other religious rites, in the times of Paganism, seeing the Druids were our antient heathen priests †. Q. Whether the number of boroughs about these stones be not a further proof. This supposition of Mr Llwyd, if right (as I believe, says our author), will account for Stonehenge, &c. (30).' Accordingly we find it applied and confirmed by Dr Stukeley's account of Stonehenge.

[Q] Appears with fewer faults than it would otherwise have done. For instance, in the Connection, &c. The Dean says that Octavianus's posterity never enjoyed the Empire, which mistake is corrected by Mr Moyle, as follows: Agrippina, the daughter of Julia, Augustus's daughter, was the mother of Caligula, the emperor, and of Agrippina the mother of the emperor Nero: so that Caligula was the great-grandson of Augustus, and Nero his great-great-grandson (31).

[R] He intended to present his collection of birds to the Royal Society. His design was to rectify some mistakes in Mr Ray's History of English birds, especially that gross one about the Cornish ganet; he tells Dr Sherard he had seen several of them, and had one very well prepared, which was brought him alive, and that he could assure him the ganet is the same with the Soland goose.

† Harley and St John.

MUSGRAVE [WILLIAM], a learned Physician and Antiquary, was born, about the year 1657 (a), at Charlton-Musgrave in Somersetshire, but descended from the brave family of that name in Westmoreland [A]. In 1675, he became a Probationer-Fellow of New-College in-Oxford (b); unquestionably from Wykeham's school near Winchester. He took the degree of Bachelor of Laws June 14, 1682 (c): and then entering on the Physic line, and distinguishing himself by his knowledge in his profession and in Natural History, was elected Fellow of the Royal Society; as also Secretary to that learned Society, in November 1684. In that quality, he continued and published the Philosophical Transactions, from No. 167. to No. 178. inclusive (d). And several curious observations, that occurred to him in the course of his profession, he caused to be inserted, at different times, in that valuable collection [B]. December 8, 1685, he took the degree of Bachelor of Physic; that of Doctor July 6, 1689 (e): and was admitted Fellow of the College of Physicians in London. In the year 1691, he went and settled in the city of Exeter (f); where he exercised his profession a long time with great reputation and success. Being a man of very extensive learning, he composed, at his leisure hours, several curious and valuable works [C], particularly his Belgium Britannicum [D], of which an account is given below. This learned author dyed December 23, 1721 (g).

[A] But descended from the brave family of that name in Westmoreland.] The name of Musgrave is one of those, that have been taken from offices, and civil or military honours: and is of the like original as Landgraff, Markgraff, Burggraff, &c. among the Germans. And indeed, this name and Markgraff (now turned into Marquis) are probably the same. The signification of both, is Dux Limitaneus; and antiently Musgrave, or Mosgrave, was all one as in our later language, a Lord Warden of the Marches. Of this family, Thomas Musgrave, in the time of Edward III. was summoned to Parliament among the Barons: their seat was Hearly-castle (1).—As for the Musgraves of the county of Somerset; John Musgrave, of Charlton, was, by virtue of the estate he had in Wiltshire, Sheriff of that county, in the second year of King Richard III. from whose second son John (the eldest dying without issue male) are descended all of this surname, in Somersetshire and Devonshire: the chief of whom at present is Musgrave, of Nettlecomb in the county of Somerset (2).

[B] Several curious observations — he caused to be inserted — in the Philosophical Transactions.] We meet with these several pieces of his, in that valuable collection. 1. 'An account of the cutting out of the Cæcum of a Bitch (3).' By which experiment he found, that creatures can live without that intestine. 2. A bed of Glands observed in the stomach of a Jack, August 19, 1684 (4). 3. A Letter to Dr Martyn Lyster; wherein he endeavours to prove, that the Lacteals convey Liquors that are not white (5). 4. An experiment, shewing what is the chief use of Respiration (6). This experiment proves, that Respiration promotes the passage of the blood through the lungs; and in bodies full of vigorous blood, it is, on this account, of perpetual necessity. This acceleration of the blood in that passage, seems to be the principal use of Respiration; no other is of such consequence to life. 5. Warm water injected into the thorax of a bitch, June 21, 1683 (7). 6. Account of a periodical Palsy (8). 7. Of a piece of Saxon Antiquity found at Athelney, in Somersetshire; being King Ælfred the Great's Amulet (9). 8. An Argument for the use of Laryngotomy: i. e. the cutting of a new passage in the throat for breath, when a person is in most imminent danger of suffocation (10). 9. A Polypus in a Dog, near the spleen (11). 10. Account of an extraordinary periodical Hemorrhage in the the Thumb (12). 11. Experiments concerning powdered blue passing the Lacteal Vessels: occasioned by some Reflexions in the New Theory of continual Fevers (13). See above No. 3. 12. An account of Hydatides voided by stool (14). 13. An account of a stone voided by stool; which had obstructed the Ductus communis Biliaris (15).

[C] He composed, at his leisure hours, several curious and valuable works.] The following is the most exact account of them we could get; and, as near, as possible, according to the order of time in which they were published. I. De Arthritis Symptomaticâ Dissertatio. Autore Guilielmo Musgrave, M. D. Coll. Med. Lond. & R. S. Socio. Exon. 1703, 8vo. i. e. A Dissertation concerning the regular Gout. II. De Arthritis Anomalâ sive Internâ Dissertatio, &c. Exon. 1707. 8vo. i. e. A Dissertation concerning the irregular or inward Gout. Of these two books he gave an account in the Philosophical Transactions, in two letters intitled, Epistola D. Guilielmi Musgrave, S. R. S. in qua Ratio redditur Libri nuper editi, cui titulus De Arthritis Symptomaticâ, &c. (16). Epistola, in qua Ratio redditur Libri nuper editi, cui titulus De Arthritis Anomalâ, &c. (17). III. Julij Vitalis Epitaphium; cum Notis criticis Explicationeque V. C. Hen. Dodwelli, & commentario Guil. Musgrave. Ipcæ Dunmon. 1711. 8vo. A commentary, on an Epitaph for Julius Vitalis, a Roman soldier of the XXth legion, and member of the corporation of Armourers; found A. D. 1708, near Bath: which Epitaph runs thus: 'Iulius Vitalis. Fabricienfis. Leg. xx. v. v. Stipendiorum ix. Anlof. xxix. Natione Belga. Ex Collegio Fabricæ Elatus. H. S. E.' Walter Moyle, Esq; passes the following great compliment upon our learned author's commentary upon that Epitaph.—'The Republick of Letters is highly obliged to you, for preserving and explaining so noble a monument of antiquity. As for your commentary upon the inscription, since you are pleased to ask my opinion, I must tell you, without flattery, that 'tis in all respects, a very masterly performance. The compass and application of so much reading, the force and strength of your arguments, with the purity and politeness of your style, will be for ever admired by all good judges. I have read it over several times, not only with the kindness of a friend, but the ill-nature of a critic; and after the nicest enquiry can find no room left for any thing but praise and admiration (18). IV. De Legionibus Epistola, ad virum clarissimum doctissimumque, Hans Sloane, M. D. &c. data a Guil Musgrave, A Letter to Sir Hans Sloane, concerning the Roman legions. V. De Aquilis Romanis Epistola Guil. Musgrave M. D. & utriusque Societ. Reg. Socii, ad virum clarissimum Giss. Cuperum, consulem Daventriensem, 1713, 8vo. 'A Letter to Gissbert Cuper Consul of Daventer, concerning the Roman eagles.' Cuper affirmed, that the Roman eagles were of massy gold, or silver. Dr Musgrave maintained, on the contrary, they were only plated over. Mr Moyle confirms this last opinion by several arguments (19). V. Inscriptio Tarraconensis: Cum commentario Guil. Musgrave M. D. Coll. Med. & Societ. Reg. Lond. Socii. 'A commentary upon an inscription at Tarragona.' VI. Guilielmi Musgrave Reg. Societ. utriusque Socii Geta Britannicus. Accedit Domus Severianæ Synopsis Chronologica: & de Iuvencula quondam M. Regis Ælfredi Dissertatio. 8vo. Ipcæ Dunm. 1715, i. e. 'Observations upon a fragment of an equestrian stone-statue, found near Bath; which the Doctor believes to have been set up in honour of Geta, after his arrival in Britain. Together with a chronological synopsis of the family of Severus: and a dissertation upon King Ælfred's Amulet abovementioned' Walter Moyle, Esq; thanks our learned author for a present of this book, in the following words:—'I give you my hearty thanks for your book, which did not come to my hands till some weeks after your letter. I have read it with a great deal of profit and delight, and if I was so much pleased with the rough draught (20), you may easily guess how I was charmed with the last finishings of so noble a design. Concerning a bust of Andromache found at Bath. To the whole is prefixed a Dissertation, wherein the Doctor endeavours to prove, that Britain was formerly a peninsula, and joined to France about Calais. The whole is adorned and illustrated with xiii plates, curiously ingraved. Under chap. ix. he shews, that the first inhabitants of Britain came from Gaul. And under chap. x. that their language was the Runic. Under chap. xiii. that the things they dealt in, were, Cattle, Tin, Lead, Iron, Slaves, Dogs, Pearls, Lime, Jeat, Baskets, Salt, &c. Walter Moyle, Esq; gives a very advantageous character of this book, in a letter to the learned author. — 'Your book (says he) which I long waited for, is at last come to hand. I have read it over with a world of pleasure, and dare venture to pronounce it every way worthy of the great reputation of the author. Not only your own country, but all the commonwealth of letters are obliged to your learned labours on this subject, by which you have preserved from oblivion so many valuable monuments of Antiquity (21).'

NAILER, or NAYLER [JAMES], a man notorious, in the last century, for the singularity of his opinions and his enthusiasm, and as remarkable for the severity of his punishment under the powers then prevailing. He was the son of a Husbandman of some estate, and born in the parish of Ardesley near Wakefield in Yorkshire, about the year 1616. His education went no further than English. About the age of twenty-two he married, and removed into Wakefield parish, where he continued 'till the wars broke out in 1641. Then he went into the Parliament's army, and was a soldier eight or nine years, first under the Lord Fairfax, and afterwards Quarter-Master under General Lambert; 'till, disabled by sickness in Scotland, he returned home about the year 1649 (a). Hitherto he had professed himself a Presbyterian and an Independent, but in 1651 he joined himself to the persons pretending to new lights, called afterwards Quakers; being converted at Wakefield by George Fox (b) [A]. As he was a man of good natural parts, and a strong imagination, he soon commenced Preacher; and, in the opinion of his followers, acquitted himself well both in word and writing among his friends. Towards the end of the year 1654, or beginning of 1655, he came to London, and found there a meeting, which had been gathered by Edward Burrough and Francis Howgil. He presently distinguished himself amongst them, so that many, admiring his gifts, began to esteem him much above his brethren, which occasioned differences and uneasiness in the society. And this ran so high, that some forward and inconsiderate women, followers of Nayler, assumed the boldness to dispute openly with Howgil and Burrough in their preaching, and thus to disturb their meetings. These reproving the womens indiscretion, they complained so loudly and passionately to Nayler, that we are told 'it smote him down into so much sorrow and sadness, that he was much dejected 'in spirit, or disconsolate: fear and doubting then entered into him, so that he came to 'be clouded in his understanding, bewildered and at a loss in his judgment, and estranged 'from his best friends, because they did not approve his conduct; insomuch that he 'began to give ear to the flattering praises of some whimsical people, which he ought to 'have abhorred, and reproved them for (c). In 1656, we find him in Devonshire, whither he was undoubtedly carried by a zeal for propagating his opinions. He said in his examination (d), that he was at 'Lawson (e) to see the brethren.' However, he was committed to Exeter-goal, where letters were sent to him from his female admirers and others [B], conceived in a very extravagant strain; and some women arrived to that height of

[A] Being converted at Wakefield by George Fox.] This fanciful and enthusiastic account is given of his conversion. 'In the beginning of the year 1652, 'as he was in the field at plough, meditating on 'the things of God, he heard a voice, bidding him 'go out from his kindred, and from his father's house; 'and had a promise given with it, that the Lord 'would be with him; whereupon he did exceedingly 'rejoyce that he had heard the voice of God, whom 'he had professed from a child, and endeavoured 'to serve; and when he went home he made preparation to go; but not being obedient, the wrath 'of God was upon him, so that he was made a wonder 'and 'twas thought he would have died. Afterwards 'being made willing, and going out with a friend, 'not thinking then of a journey, he was commanded 'to go into the West, not knowing what he was to do there, but when he came, he had given him what 'to declare; and so he continued, not knowing one day 'what he was to do the next; and the promise of 'God, that he would be with him, he found made 'good to him every day (1).—All of a piece with the rest of his life, equally wonderful and incredible!

[B] Where letters were sent to him from his female admirers, and others.] Those letters were found upon him, and his attendants, when they were apprehended and searched at Bristol; and being published at the time, were as follows: 'I N. In the pure feare and 'power of God, my Soule salutes thee, Thou everlasting son of righteousness and Prince of peace; 'oh how my Soule travelleth to see this day; which 'Abraham did and was glad, and so shall all that are 'of faithful Abraham: O suffer me to speake what 'the Lord hath moved There is one temptation 'neere, the like unto the first, and is like the wisdom 'of God, but it is not, and therefore it must be destroyed. Oh it defileth and hateth the innocent; 'I beseech thee wait, my Soule travelleth to see a pure 'Image brought forth, and the enemy strive to destroy it, that he may keep me alwaies following, 'and ever seeking, and never satisfied, nor never rejoycing: But he in whom I have believed will shortly 'tread Satan under our feet, and then shalt thou and 'thine return to Zion with everlasting rejoycing and 'praises. But 'till then better is the house of mourning then rejoycing, for he that was made a perfect example of folly, that, in the prison at Exeter, they kneeled before him, and kiffed his feet (f). After his release he intended to return to London; but, taking Bristol in his way, as he rode through Glastonbury and Wells, his frantick attendants strewed their garments in the way (g). And when they came, on the 24th of October, to Bedminster, about a mile from Bristol, they marched in this mock procession. One man walked before with his hat on; another young man, with his hat off, led Nailor's horse: when they came to the suburbs of Bristol, some women spread scarfs and handkerchiefs in his way; and two other women went on each side of his horse: and all knee-deep in the dirt, it being very rainy and foul weather; singing, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Sabaoth; Hofanna in the highest; Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Israel (b). In this manner they entered Bristol, to the amazement of some, and the diversion of others. But the magistrates not thinking it proper to let such a mockery, such an awkward imitation of our Saviour's entering Jerusalem, go unpunished, apprehended and committed him to prison, with six of his associates [C]; after having examined them [D]. Soon after, he and his followers were sent up to London, to be dealt with by Parliament, as should be thought proper. Having been examined by a committee of the House (i), which made their report on the example, when he had fasted the appointed time of his father, was tempted to eate, and to shew a miracle, to prove himselfe to be the Sonne of God: But man lives not by bread, said he, and now no more by that wisdom shall he live on which he hath long fed as on bread, and as his food hath been so must his fast be, and then at the end temptation, to as low a thing as a stone, that if it were possible the humility and the miracles would deceive the elect, innocent, and righteous branch of holiness. But be his wils never so many, the time comes he shall leave thee, for he is faithfull, who hath promised he will not leave the Throne of David without a man to sit upon thereon, which shall judge the poore with righteousness, and the world with equity. This shall shortly come to passe, and then shall the vision speak and not lie. O let innocency be thy beloved, and righteousness thy Spouse, that thy fathers lambs may rejoice in thy pure and cleare unspotted image of holiness and purity, which my Soul believeth I shall see, and so in the faith rest. I am in patience, wait, and the power will preserve from subtilty, though under never so zealous a pretence of innocent wisdom it be, yet shall the Lord not suffer his holy one to see corruption, nor his Soule to lie in Hell, but will cause the mountain to melt at his presence, and the little hills to bring him peace; O I am ready to fear as a servant, and to obey as a child. If I have spoken words too high, love hath constrained me, which is as strong as death, and with the same spirit cover them as they are spoken with, and then shall the spirit of David be witnessed, who refused not words though from his servants mouth; if they were in the fear, I am his servant, and he my master, whom I love and fear, and trust I shall do unto the end.

From London, 16 day

Hannah Stranger.

O thou fairest of ten thousand, thou onely begotten Son of God, how my heart panteth after thee; O stay me with flagons, and comfort we with wine. My well beloved thou art like a roe or young hart upon the mountains of spices, where thy beloved Spouse hath long been calling thee to come away, but hath been lately heard of thee. Now it lies something upon me that thou mindst to see her, for the spirit and power of God is with her; and there is given to her much of excellent and innocent wisdom arisen and arising in her, which will make all the honest-hearted to praise the Lord alone, and no more set up self. And therefore let not my Lord and Master have any jealousie again of her, for she is highly beloved of the Lord, and that shall all see who come to know the Lord. And now he doth blesse them that blesse his, and curse them that curse his: for this hath the Lord shewed me, That her portion is exceeding large in the Lord; and as her sorrow hath been much, so shall her joy be much more, which rejoiceth my heart, to see her walke so valiantly and faithfully, in the work of the Lord, in this time of so great tryals as hath been laid upon her especially. And I am

Hannah Stanger.

Postscript. Remember my dear love to thy Master. Thy name is no more to be called James but Jesus The 17th of 8th month. * John Stranger (2).

In another letter to him, from one Jane Woodcock, we find these odd expressions. 'O Thou beloved of the Lord the Prophet of the most high God, whom the Lord brought to this great city, for to judge and try the cause of his Israel, faithful and just hast thou carried thyself in it, for thou becomest weak to the weak, and tender to the broken-hearted.

And in another letter from one Richard Fairman, is this: 'Brother, In the life which is immortal dearly beloved, who are counted worthy to be made partaker of the everlasting riches, I am filled with joy and rejoicing, when I behold thee in the eternal unity, where I doe embrace thee in the everlasting arms of love: O thou dear and precious servant of the Lord, how doth my foul love. I am overcome with that love that is as strong as death. O my soul is melting within me, when I behold thy beauty and innocency, dear and precious son of Zion, whose Mother is a Virgin, and whose birth is immortal (3).

[C] With six of his associates.] Namely, Martha Simonds, wife of Thomas Simonds, of London, bookbinder, and sister of Giles Calvert; Hannah Stranger, wife of John Stranger, of London, comb-maker; Dorcas Erbury, widow of William Erbury, once a Minister; Timothy Wedlock, of Devonshire; and Dennis Hollister, and Henry Row, of Bristol (4).

[D] After having examined them.] The examination of James Nayler was as follows: 'Being asked his name, or whether he was not called James Naylor, he replied: The men of this world call me James Naylor. Q. Art not thou the man that rid on horseback into Bristol, a woman leading thy horse, and others singing before thee, Holy, holy, holy, Hofanna, &c. A. I did ride into a town, but what its name was I know not, and by the Spirit a woman was commanded to hold my horses bridle; and some there were that cast down cloathes, and sang praises to the Lord, such songs as the Lord put into their hearts; and its like it might be the song of Holy, holy, holy, &c. Q. Whether or no didst thou reprove those women? A. Nay, but I bad them take heed that they sang nothing but what they were moved to of the Lord. Q. Dost thou own this letter (shewing him a letter) which Hannah Strange sent unto thee? A. Yea, I do own that letter. Q. Art thou, according to that letter, the fairest of ten thousand? A. As to the visible I deny any such attribute to be due unto me; but if as to that which the Father has begotten in me, I shall own it. Q. Art thou the only Son of God? A. I am the Son of God, but I have many brethren. Q. Have any called thee by the name of Jesus? A. Not as unto the visible, but as Jesus, the Christ that is in me. Q. Dost thou own the name of the King of Israel? A. Not as a creature, but if they give it Christ within I own it, and have a kingdom but not of this world, my kingdome is of another world, of which thou wast not. Q. Whether or no art thou the Prophet of the most high? A. Thou hast said, I am a Prophet. Q. Dost thou own that attribute, the Judge of Israel? A. The Judge is but one, and is

5th of December; he was, the next day, sent for and heard at the bar of the House (k). On the 8th they resolved, ' That James Nayler is guilty of horrid blasphemy, and that he ' is witnessed in me, and is the Christ, there must not be any joynd with him: if they speak of the Spirit in me, I own it only as God is manifest in the flesh, according as God dwelleth in me, and judgeth there himself. Q. By whom were you sent? A. By him who hath sent the spirit of his Son in me to try, not as to carnal matters, but belonging to the kingdome of God, by the indwelling of the Father and the Son, by judge of all Spirits to be guided by none. Q. Is not the written word of God the guide? A. The written word declares of it, and what is not according to that is not true. Q. Whether art thou more sent than others, or whether others be not sent in that measure? A. As to that I have nothing at present given me of my Father to answer. Q. Was your birth mortal or immortal? A. Not according to the natural birth, but according to the spiritual birth, born of the immortal seed. Q. Wert thou ever called the Lambe of God? A. I look not hack to things behind, but there might be some such thing in the letter; I am a lamb, and have fought it long before I could witnesse it. Q. Who the mother, or whether or no is she a virgin? A. Nay, according to the natural birth. Q. Who is thy mother according to thy spiritual birth? A. No carnal creature. Q. Who then? A. — To this he refused to answer. Q. Is the hope of Israel in thee? A. The hope is in Christ, and as Christ is in me so far the hope of Israel stands; Christ is in me the hope of glory. Q. What more hope is there in thee than in others? A. None can know but them of Israel, and Israel must give an account. Q. Art thou the everlasting Son of God? A. Where God is manifest in the flesh, there is the everlasting Son, and I do witnesse God in the flesh; I am the Son of God, and the Son of God is but one. Q. Art thou the Prince of Peace? A. The Prince of everlasting Peace is begotten in me. Q. Why dost thou not reprove those that give thee these attributes? A. I have said nothing unto them but such things are written. Q. Is thy name Jesus? A. — Here he was silent. Q. For what space of time hast thou been so called? A. — And here. Q. Is there no other Jesus besides thee? A. These questions he forbore either to confirm, or to contradict them. Q. Art thou the everlasting Son of God, the King of righteousness? A. I am, and the everlasting righteousness is wrought in me, if ye were acquainted with the Father, ye would also be acquainted with me. Q. Did any kisse thy feet? A. It might be they did, but I minded them not. Q. When thou wast called the King of Israel, didst thou not answer, Thou sayest it? A. Yea. Q. How dost thou provide for a livelyhood? A. As do the lillies without care, being maintained by my father. Q. Who dost thou call thy Father? A. He whom thou callest God. Q. What businesse hadst thou at Bristol or that way? A. I was guided and directed by my father. Q. Why wast thou called a Judge to try cause of Israel? A. — Here he answered nothing. Q. Are any of these sayings blasphemy or not? A. What is received of the Lord is truth. Q. Whose letter was that which was writ to thee, signed T. S.? A. It was sent to me to Exeter gaol by one the world calls Tho. Symonds. Q. Didst thou not say, if ye had known me, ye had known the father? A. Yea, for the father is my life. Q. Where wert thou born? A. At Aoderslow in Yorkshire. Q. Where lives thy wife? A. She whom thou callest my wife, lives in Wakefield. Q. Why dost thou not live with her? A. I did till I was called to the army. Q. Under whose command didst thou serve in the army? A. First, under him they call Lord Fairfax. Q. Who then? A. Afterwards, under that man called Col. Lambert: and then I went into Scotland, where I was a Quartermaster, and returned sick to my earthly habitation, and was called into the North. Q. What wentst thou for to Exeter? A. I was to Lawton to see the brethren. Q. What estate hast thou? A. I take no care for that. Q. Doth God in an extraordinary manner sustain thee, without any corporal food? A. Man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the ' mouth of the Father: the same life is mine that is in the Father; but not in the same measure. Q. How art thou cloathed? A. I know not. Q. Dost thou live without bread? A. As long as my heavenly Father will: I have tasted of that bread, of which he that eateth shall never die. Q. How long hast thou lived without any corporal sustenance, having perfect health? A. Some fifteen or sixteen days, sustained without any other food except the word of God. Q. Was Dorcas Erbury dead two days in Exeter? and didst thou raise her? A. I can do nothing of myself: the Scripture beareth witness to the power in me which is everlasting; it is the same power we read of in the Scripture. The Lord hath made me a sign of his coming; and that honour that belongeth to Christ Jesus, in whom I am revealed, may be given to him, as when on earth at Jerusalem, according to the measure. Q. Art thou the unspotted Lamb of God, that taketh away the sins of the world? Were I not a lamb, wolves would not seek to devour me. Q. Art thou not guilty of horrid blasphemy, by thy own words? A. Who made thee a Judge over them? Q. Wherefore camest thou in such an unusual posture, as, two women leading thy horse; others singing Holy, holy, &c. with another before thee bare-headed, knee-deep in the high-way mud, when thou mightst have gone in the cause; and at such a time, that it raining, thy companions received the rain at their necks and vented it at their hose and breeches? A. It tended to my Father's praise and glory; and I ought not to slight any thing which the spirit of the Lord moves. Q. Dost thou think the spirit of the Lord moved or commanded them? A. Yea. Q. Whom meant they, by Holy, holy, holy, &c.? A. Let them answer for themselves; they are at age. Q. Did not some spread their cloathes on the ground before thee, when thou ridst thorow Glastenbury and Wells? A. I think they did. Q. Wherefore didst thou call Martha Simonds, Mother, as George Fox affirms? A. George Fox is a lyer, and a fire brand of hell: for neither I, nor any with me, called her so. Q. Thou hast a wife at this time? A. A woman I have, whom by the world is called my wife; and some children I have, which according to the flesh are mine. Q. Those books which thou hast writ, wilt thou maintain them, and affirm what is therein? A. Yea, with my dearest blood.'

Martha Simonds her Examination.

She confesseth, she knew James Nayler formerly; for he is now no more James Nayler, but refined to a more excellent substance: and so she saith she came with him from Bristol to Exeter.

Q. What made thee lead his horse into Bristol, and sing Holy, holy, holy, &c. and to spread thy garments before him? A. I was forced thereto by the power of the Lord. Q. He is stiled in Hannah Stranger's letter, the fairest of ten thousand, the hope of Israel, and the only begotten son of God; dost thou so esteem him? A. That James Nayler of whom thou speakest is buried in me, and he hath promised to come again. Q. Dost thou like of that Attribute as given to him? A. I cannot tell, I judge them not. Q. Whether didst thou kneel before him? A. What I did, was in obedience to a power above. Q. Dost thou own him to be the Prince of Peace? A. He is a perfect man; and he that is a perfect man, is the Prince of Peace. Q. Hast thou a husband? A. I have a man which thou callest my husband. Q. What made thee to leave him, and to follow James Nayler in such a manner? A. It is our life to praise the Lord, and the Lord my strength (who filled heaven and earth) is manifest in James Nayler. Q. Oughtest thou to worship James Nayler, as thou didst upon thy knees? A. Yea, I ought so to do. Q. Why oughtest thou so to do? A. He is the Son of righteousness; and the new Man within him is the everlasting Son of righteousness; and James Nayler will be Jesus, when the new life is horn in him. Q. By what name callest

‘ he is a grand impostor, and a great seducer of the people (1).’ From that time, the business being debated both forenoons and afternoons [E], not without opposition, was proposed the twelfth time, on the 16th of December. The next day, after a long debate, the Parliament came to this resolution, That James Nayler should stand in the pillory, both in the Palace-Yard, Westminster, and at the Old Exchange; be whipt from the former of those places to the latter; and at this last, his tongue should be bored through with a hot iron, and he should be stigmatized in the forehead with the letter B. for Blaphemer: That he should also be sent to Bristol, and publicly whipt there: and then be brought back to London, and committed to Bridewell (m) [F]. ‘ callest thou him? A. Lord. Q. Why dost thou call him Lord? A. Because he is Prince of Peace, and Lord of Righteousness. Q. What reason canst thou shew for calling him King of Israel? A. He is so anointed. Q. Who hath anointed him? A. A Prophet. Q. What Prophet was that? A. I will not tell thee. Q. Thou confessest that thou didst spread thy cloaths. A. Yea I did. Q. Tell me, Doth that Spirit of Jesus, which thou sayest is in Nayler, make him a sufficient Jesus to others? A. I tell thee, there is a seed born in him, which above all men I shall (and every one ought to) honour. Q. Is he King of Israel, as thy husband saith? A. If he saith so, thy testimony is double.’

Hanna Stranger her Examination.

She saith, she came from Bristol to Exeter with James Nayler; and that she sang her handkerchief before him, because commanded so of the Lord; and that she sung Holy, &c. and that the Lord is risen in him.

‘ Q. Wherefore didst thou sing before James Nayler? A. I must not be mute when I am commanded of the Lord. Q. Wherefore didst thou sing to him? A. My conscience tells me, I have not offended any law. Q. Was that letter thine? and didst thou spread thy garments before him? A. Yea, and my blood will maintain it. Q. Dost thou own him for the Prince of Peace? A. Yea, he is so. Q. What dost thou call his name? A. It hath been said already, I have told of his name. Q. Dost thou not know it to be blasphemy to give him such and such attributes? A. If I have offended any law, &c. Q. Didst thou send him that letter wherein he was called the Son of God? A. Yea, I do own the whole letter. Q. Didst thou call him Jesus? A. — She would not answer. Q. Didst thou kiss his feet? A. Yea.’

Thomas Stranger, in his Examination, owned the postscript of the letter in which he called James Nayler Jesus; and confessed, He called James Nayler Jesus, Saying; he was thereto moved of the Lord. But could not be got to answer to any more questions.

Timothy Wedlock his Examination.

‘ Q. Dost thou own James Nayler to be the only Son of God? A. I do own him to be the Son of God. Q. Wherefore didst thou and the rest sing before him, Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Israel? A. I do own the Songs of Zion. Q. Thou wilt go through a great rain bare-headed, why then wilt thou not be uncovered to a Magistrate? A. What I did, was as the Lord commanded. Q. What is your opinion concerning Religion? A. I own no opinions, nor any judgements. Q. Wherefore didst thou honour him in Towns, and not elsewhere? A. We did as well in Commons; but in both as the Spirit of the Lord directed us. Q. Wherefore didst thou kneel before him? A. The truth.’

The Examination of Dorcas Erbury, Widow of William Erbury once a Minister.

‘ Q. Where dost thou live? A. With Margaret Thomas. Q. Wherefore didst thou Sing, Holy, &c. A. I did not at that time; but those that sang did it in discharging of their duty. Q. Dost thou own him that rode on horse-back, to be the holy one of Israel? A. Yea, I do; and with my blood will seal it. Q. And dost thou own him for the Son of God. A. He is the only begotten Son of God. Q. Wherefore didst thou pull off his stockings, and lay thy cloaths beneath his feet? A. He is worthy of it; for he is the holy Lord of Israel. Q. Knowest thou no other Jesus, the only begotten Son of God. A. I know no other Saviour. Q. Dost thou believe in James Nayler? A. Yea, in him whom thou callest so, I do. Q. By what name dost thou use to call him? A. The Son of God: but I am to serve him, and to call him Lord and Master. Q. Jesus was crucified; but this man you call the Son of God, is alive. A. He hath shook off his carnal body. Q. Why, what body hath he then? A. Say not the Scriptures, Thy natural body I will change, and it shall be spiritual. Q. Hath a Spirit flesh and bones? A. His flesh and bones are new. Q. Christ raised those that had been dead: So did not he. A. He raised me. Q. In what manner? A. He laid his hand on my head, after I had been dead two days, and said, Dorcas arise: and I arose, and live as thou seest. Q. Where did he this? A. At the goal in Exceter. Q. What witness hast thou for this? A. My mother, who was present. Q. His power being so much, wherefore opened he not the prison-doors, and escaped. A. The doors shall open, when the Lord’s will is done. Q. What Apostles hath he? A. They are scattered; but some are here. Q. Jesus Christ doth sit at the right hand of the Father, where the world shall be judged by him. A. He whom thou callest Nayler, shall sit at the right hand of the Father, and shall judge the world with equity (5).

[E] From that time the business being debated both forenoons and afternoons, &c.] How much time that business took up in the House, appears from two letters of Secretary Thurlow, dated Dec. 9, and Dec. 16, 1656, wherein are these words—‘ These 4 or 5 last dayes have bene wholly taken up about James Nayler the Quaker, who hath had a charge of blasphemy exhibited against him; and upon hearinge matter of fact, he is voted guiltye of blasphemie; and the consideration now is (which I believe may be determined this eveninge) what punishment shall be inflicted. Many are of opinion, that he ought to be put to death (6).—The parliament hath done nothinge theis 10 dayes, but dispute, whether James Nayler the Quaker shall be put to death for blasphemy. They are much divided in their opinions. It’s possible that they may come to conclusion this day. It’s probable, that his life may be spared.’

In the postscript to this second letter, of the 16th, he adds, ‘ The parliament came this day to a voet in Nayler’s business, viz. that he should have his tongue bored, a brand set on his forehead, set in the pillory, and whipt, and imprisoned for life. The question for his life was lost by 14 voices (7).’

[F] And then be brought back to London, and committed to Bridewell.] The whole of his Sentence was as follows. ‘ That James Nayler be fet on the pillory, in the Palace-yard Westminster, during the Space of two hours, on Thursday next; and be whipt by the hangman through the streets from Westminster to the Old Exchange, and there likewise be fet on the pillory, with his head in the pillory, for the Space of two hours, between the hours of eleven and one on Saturday next: in each place wearing a Paper, containing an inscription of his crimes. And that, at the Old Exchange, his Tongue be bored through with a hot iron; and that he be there also stigmatized in the forehead with the letter B. And that he be afterwards sent to Bristol, and be conveyed into and through the said city on horse back, with his face backward; and there also publicly whipt the next market day after he comes thither. And that from thence he be committed to prison in Bridewell London, and there restrained from the Society of all people, and there to labour hard till he shall be released by Parliament. And, during that time, be debarred the use of pen, rent persuasions presented petitions to the Parliament in his behalf; but it was resolv'd not to read them, 'till after the passing of the sentence. The 18th of December, he suffered the first part of his punishment, which was inflicted with great rigour [G]. The other part of the sentence should have been executed two days after; namely, boring his tongue and branding his forehead; but he was brought so low by his cruel whipping, that, upon repeated applications to the Parliament, his further punishment was respited for one week. During that interval, several persons of all persuasions looking upon him rather as a mad-man, than guilty of wilful blasphemy, petitioned the Parliament, and Cromwell twice, to have the rest of his punishment quite remitted. But that, as it is said, was obstructed by some of the Protector's chaplains, who went and conferred with Naylor. The further part of his sentence was therefore executed the 27th of December (n). After which, being sent to Bristol, he was convey'd through that city on horseback, with his face backward, and publicly whipt [H]. Then being remanded to London, he was committed to Bridewell, according to the rest of his sentence. Being by his sufferings brought to his senses, and to some degree of humility, he writ a letter to the magistrates of Bristol, wherein he disapproved and repented of his former behaviour in that city. And, during the time of his confinement in Bridewell, which was about two years, he came to a true sorrow for his follies and offences. Having also, notwithstanding his sentence, got the use of pen, ink, and paper, he wrote several small books, wherein he retract'd and condemn'd his past errors (o) [I]. He compos'd likewise some other pieces, which those who are curious in such things may see in W. Sewel's History of the Quakers (p). During his extravagant flights, these people had disown'd him: but, after his repentance, they took back the lost sheep into their society (q). About the latter end of October, 1660, he set out from London towards the North, with an intention of going home to his wife and children at Wakefield in Yorkshire. Some miles beyond Huntingdon he was taken ill; being, as it is said, robbed by the way and left bound. Whether he received any personal injury, is not certainly known, but being found in a field by a countryman towards evening, he was carried to a friend's house, at Holm near King's-Ripton in Huntingdonshire, where he soon after expired in November 1660 (r). Such was the end of this deluded Enthusiast, who rendered himself as miserable as possible, without doing any real service to mankind: for, of how little use and value is any thing he pretended to teach and reveal, let every person of common sense judge and declare. From him we learn, that the most plentiful source of error and delusion, and a principle the most mischievous of any in its consequences, is a spirit of Enthusiasm, spurred on by Ambition and Pride. This blind and ungovernable guide has, at different times, led an incredible number of persons of weak judgment and a strong imagination, through a maze of such strange and unaccountable follies, as, one would imagine, could never have entered into the thoughts of a creature endowed with Reason: such follies, as have rendered the persons ink, and paper; and shall have no relief but what he earns by his daily labour (8).'

[G] The 18th of December, he suffered the first part of his punishment, which was inflicted with great rigour. After having stood full two hours with his head in the pillory, he was stript, and whipt at a Cart's tail from Palace-yard to the Old Exchange, and received three hundred and ten lashes. The Executioner would have given him one more, as he confessed to the Sheriff, (there being 311 kennels) but his foot slipping, the stroke fell upon his own hand, which hurt him much. One, who washed his wounds (9), said, 'There was not the Space of a man's nail free from stripes and blood, from his Shoulders near to his waist, his right arm forely strip'd, his hands much hurt with cords, that they bled and were swell'd: The blood and wounds of his back did very little appear at first sight, by reason of abundance of dirt that covered them, 'till it was washed off.'—Nay his punishment was so severe, that some judged his sentence would have been more mild if it had been present death (10).

[H] After which, being sent to Bristol—be was publicly whipt. Here he was whipt, from the middle of Thomas's street over the bridge, up High-street to the middle of Broad-street. Which punishment, we are told, he bore with wonderful patience, as he had done the former (11).

[I] He wrote several small Books, wherein he retract'd and condemn'd his past errors. In one of them he speaks thus—'Condemn'd for ever be all those false worshipps, with which any have idolized my person, in the night of my Temptation, when the Power of Darknes was above all; their casting of their cloaths in the way, their bowings and singings, and all the rest of those wild actions, which did any ways tend to dishonour the Lord, or draw the minds of any from the measure of Christ Jesus in themselves, to look at flesh which is as grass, or to ascribe

'That to the visible which belongs to Christ Jesus: all that I condemn, by which the pure name of the Lord hath been any ways blasphemed through me, in the time of Temptation, or the Spirits of any people grieved:—And also that Letter which was sent me to Exeter by J. Stranger when I was in prison, with these words; Thy name shall be no more James Naylor, but Jesus: This I judge to be written from the imaginations, and a fear struck me when I first saw it, and so I put it in my pocket clove, not intending any should see it; which they finding on me spread it abroad, which the simplicity of my heart never own'd. So this I deny also, that the name of Christ Jesus was received instead of James Naylor, or ascribed to him—And all those ranting wild Spirits, which then gathered about me in that time of Darknes, and all their wild Actions and wicked words against the honour of God, and his pure Spirit and people, I deny that had Spirit, the power, and the works thereof; and as far as I gave advantage, through want of judgment, for that evil Spirit in any to arise, I take shame to myself justly.—And that report, as tho' I had rais'd Dorcas Erbury from the dead carnally, this I deny also, and condemn that testimony to be out of the truth; though that Power that quickens the dead I deny not, which is the word of eternal Life (12).'

persons possessed with them extremely troublesome, a plague to the world, as well as to themselves; and their actions have been a disgrace to human nature, and a scandal to the Christian name. It behoves therefore every honest and rational person, to watch against so troublesome an enemy, and to take particular care not to give so disagreeable a guest any admittance into his bosom; not only for his own sake, but also for the benefit of the society to which he belongs. C

NELSON [ROBERT], generally distinguished by the appellation of the Pious Mr Nelson, was born June 22, 1656, in the city of London, where his father was a considerable Turkey-Merchant, but did not live long to enjoy the happiness of this son, whom at his death he left an infant of two years old, with a handsome fortune, committing him to the care of his mother Delicia (a), and her brother Sir Gabriel Roberts. This gentleman, who was also a Turkey-Merchant of eminence, soon became extremely fond of his ward and nephew, who in a few years discovered an excellent understanding, enlivened with a sprightly genius; which being set and seen in the figure of a person exceedingly beautiful, was still made more engaging by the singular sweetness of his temper. At a proper age he was put to St Paul's school; but, after some time passed there, was taken home out of fondness by his mother; who, being seated at Dryfield (b) near Cirencester in Gloucestershire, procured the learned Mr George Bull, then Rector of Suddington, with the vicarage of St Peter annexed, in that neighbourhood, to instruct him in her own house; where this part of his education being finished, he was removed to the university, and admitted a Fellow-Commoner of Trinity-college in Cambridge (c). All those endearing qualities which disclosed themselves early in his youth, ripened, by an unbroken regular opening, into the most amiable character in his manhood. From being the hopes and darling of his family, he became the delight and boast of all the thinking and sober part of the world. As business or other occasions frequently called him to London, it was not long before he came to be known to Dr Tillotson [A], with whom his guardian uncle, Sir Gabriel Roberts, was intimately acquainted. A congenial worth in Mr Nelson presently obtained him a principal place in the friendship of a Divine, so distinguished by his piety and benevolence; and the union between them was dissolved only by the death of the Archbishop. Our author was chosen Fellow of the Royal Society Apr. 1, 1680*, and having laid a proper foundation at home for making the best advantage of travelling abroad, set out for Paris [B] in Dec. following. Whilst he was there, Mr Henry Saville

[A] Known to Dr Tillotson.] This acquaintance probably commenced some time before the year 1680, when Mr Nelson was only twenty-four years of age. For in that year it was grown to a good degree of intimacy, as appears by the freedom which our author took in acquainting the Dean with the censures passed upon his sermon on Josh. xiv. 15. preached before King Charles II. and printed soon after by his Majesty's command. It seems the Dean had received from this, or some other friend, a piece intitled, Short Animadversions upon that sermon; and in his answer, dated July 27, 1680, he writes, that those animadversions did not seem to him very considerable: 'However, adds he, I am sorry any thing of mine should make so much talk and noise (1).' Soon after the former letter Mr Nelson wrote another to the Dean, on occasion of the death-bed repentance of Wilmot, Earl of Rochester; wherein he gave such an account of that remarkable event, as the Dean thought very well worth the publick view, as is seen by his answer of August 2, which begins thus, 'Could I have found any thing in myself to have justified your kind opinion of me, I might have taken the opportunity to have let a copy of your letter slip abroad, under pretence of publishing my Lord of Rochester's repentance (2).' In a few days after Mr Nelson wrote again to the Dean, recommending Mr Richard Kidder, afterwards Bishop of Bath and Wells, and the celebrated author of the Demonstration of the Messias, for the Rectory of Barnes in Surry; to which the Dean returned the following answer, August 15, 'I know not, says he, how Mr Griffith came to understand me so well, but he made a very right judgment when he pitched upon you, as of all men most likely, to command me in any thing you should desire; and no man should have been more glad to have gratified so worthy a person as Mr Kidder; but the truth is, I was preingaged for Dr Burton, and have written to Dr Stillingleet our Dean, in his behalf. I had a letter likewise from Sir Gabriel Roberts for Mr Kidder, whom I should have been glad to have been able to oblige, but I wrote to him, that I was preingaged (3).' In October we find Mr Nelson wrote again to the Dean, to acquaint him with a rumour that had spread itself to his disparagement on account of some alterations lately made in his cathedral; containing as it should seem, some insinuations of the Dean's dislike of the usual ornaments in churches. 'And now, replies he, it is time to be sensible of the kind concernment you are pleased to express for me in your letter. Your conjecture is very right, we only took down the sun over the screen behind the Communion-table, which was done with so little noise, that several days passed before it was taken notice of to be removed, and nothing done besides, not so much as the table stirred out of its place (4).' It is observable, that shortly after this letter Dr Hicke was presented for idolatry, in bowing as he went up to the Communion-table, over which there happened to be placed the figure of an angel representing the Resurrection (5). As this prosecution made a great noise when it was commenced, so no doubt much talk must have preceded it, which was probably the reason of the order to pull down this image of the sun, not only to take away thereby all occasion for the like complaint at Canterbury, but also to remove the foundation for a plea, from the example of bowing to the sun in his church, which he might be apprehensive Dr Hicke would be apt to make in his own defence.

[B] Set out for Paris.] It appears by a letter of Dr Tillotson to him after his arrival there, that in his passage cross the water he had met with a storm at sea, in which the merchants ships in the Downs were cast away; that afterwards in the road to Paris he had seen the remarkable comet which appeared at that time, and that he sent the Dean a description of it; probably assisted therein by his fellow-traveller Dr Halley (6). Mr Nelson had, according to his innate modesty and good sense, begged the Dean's advice and directions in his future travels; and the Dean answers in such a manner as shews the highest regard for him: 'If, says he, I were able, yet I need not to advise you in any thing, so well am I assured of your virtue and good conduct. I pray for you continually, that God would preserve you and return you safe, and the same to us, and give you all the advantages you expected, and will I am sure endeavour to make by your travels. I never know how to part from

Saville (d), Envoy from King Charles the Second, made a proposal to him of purchasing a place in the English Court; and promising his assistance therein, Mr Nelson entertained some thoughts of cloving with it, but presently dropped that design in obedience to his mother [C]. He left Paris in May, and having made what is usually called the grand tour (e), returned through the same city [D] home, in the beginning of August, 1682. During his travels, he had fallen into the acquaintance of Lady Theophila Lucy, widow of Sir Kingsmill Lucy of Broxburne in Hertfordshire, Bart. and second daughter of George Earl of Berkley; who discovering a strong passion for him, kindled a mutual flame in his breast, he gave way to love, and a marriage was concluded between them soon after their arrival in England (f) [E]. He had not been long married to this lady, when ‘ you, but my business calls me off (7).’ Our author continued his correspondence with the Dean in an unreferred freedom, acquainting him with every occurrence he met with abroad worthy notice; which the Dean repaid with an account of the state of affairs at home, especially with regard to the Church. The following extract is worth notice, both as it lets us see, in some measure, how much the French interested themselves in our concerns, and Tillotson's real sentiments with regard to the Comprehension. In a letter dated from London, March 7, 1680-1, having thanked Mr Nelson for his two letters, and his account of the occurrences in France: ‘ Among which, says he, nothing pleased me better than the condescension of the great Cardinal in honouring your St Bartholomew's fair with so secular a kind of presence and demeanour.’ He proceeds thus, ‘ I hope our affairs are not in so deplorable a condition as they are reported at Paris. It may yet come to our turn to talk of our neighbours with as much pity, though perhaps with less pleasure; most of our elections for the next Parliament (8) are over, and almost without any drinking or expence, which is great news; and generally the same persons are chosen again.’ He then takes notice, that there was little progress made the preceding Parliament towards a reconciliation with the Dissenters. ‘ Two bills, says he, were brought into the House of Commons for that purpose, the one called a Bill of Indulgence to mitigate the severity of the laws towards those, who could not come into the national Constitution; the other of Union, by which the New Subscriptions were to be taken away, and the Ceremonies left indifferent. I never saw the bills, but this was the substance of them; which so far as I can learn, pleased neither side; the Bishops thought this too much, and the Dissenters too little: I have no great hopes of any good issue of this matter, till the minds of men become more calm (9).’

[C] In obedience to his mother. Mr Saville was at this time in England, whence he had probably wrote on this affair to Mr Nelson, who had communicated it to his constant friend and correspondent the Dean of Canterbury; whereupon the Dean, April 23, 1681, wrote the following answer, ‘ But now to the main business to which I find your uncle [Sir Gabriel Roberts] so absolutely averse, that he did not think your mother should be acquainted with it. It is well if you escape chiding from him. As for myself, than whom no person in the world can wish you better, since you are pleased to repose that kind confidence in me, as to ask my advice, I will faithfully give it. In the present uncertainty of things, I would not have you venture so considerable a sum, as those places go at; and unless somebody grows better, which I hope God will grant, the temptations to which a man must be exposed in that station are like to be so violent, as would set the firmest virtue hard, even my friends, of whom I have so good an opinion. Your mother hath but just mastered the trouble of your absence, which I understand by your aunt Hanger was for a great while very grievous to her, and therefore you will, I am sure, be very tender of giving any new occasion. I will wait upon Mr Saville, and make the best acknowledgments I can of his great civilities and favours to you, and let him know how your friends stand affected in this matter, to whose judgment and determination you have referred it (10).’ By the Dean's letter, which is upon the same subject and directed to Mr Nelson, then at Saumur, it appears that he had yielded to the inclinations of his friends. It is dated from London, June 2, 1681, and runs thus: ‘ I wish your good opinion of my judgment were as well grounded, as that of my sincere friendship and affection for you most certainly is. Your mother is perfectly well satisfied, as I told her she had great reason, since you referred yourself to the advice and judgment of your friends, by which I assured her you would most certainly govern your resolution. I should be glad to see England so happy as that the Court may be a fit place for you to live in. I waited on the Ambassador, and made the best acknowledgments I could of his great favours and civilities to you; but I told him, your friends had no mind to it, especially as things now are, and I know you would do nothing against their inclination; with which he was well satisfied, declaring the very great kindness and esteem he had for you, and for your friend Mr Halley, in which I did not contradict him (11).’ The other contents of this letter shew, that Mr Nelson had discoursed about the affair of the Comprehension with Mr Claude, minister of the French Protestant Church at Charenton, near Paris, and one of the ablest managers of the controversy against that of Rome, which his age produced, who had communicated to him his resolution not to meddle in the disputes then on foot betwixt the Church of England and the Nonconformists*. That minister had written a letter to Mr Baxter, in which he wished the Bishops would shew the Dissenters more favour; but tells him withal, that he could not see how they could be acquitted of Schism. The Dean observes shrewdly enough, that the Dissenters would hardly print this letter (12).

[D] He returned through the same city. On his second arrival at this capital, he gave Dean Tillotson an account of Mr Arnald's book, before the Dean had seen it, intitled, Apologie pour les Catholiques, wherein that author, attempting to remove the imputation of a seditious spirit from the professors of the Romish Church, and to transfer it upon the Protestants, undertakes to demonstrate the whole Popish plot in England, to be the mere invention of Titus Oates (13); and 'tis certain a great part of it evidently appeared afterwards to be nothing else.

[E] Soon after his arrival in England Immediately after his landing he went to pay his compliments to his mother, at Dryfield, whither the Dean addressed a letter to him, expressing great solicitude to hear of his safe arrival there. This letter is dated August 18, 1682, two days after that most grievous affliction had befallen Lady Theophila Lucy, and the whole family of the Earl of Berkley, by the seduction of his Lordship's fifth daughter, Lady Henrietta, then eighteen years of age, the flower of youth and beauty; when Ford, Lord Grey of Werke, who had married Lady Mary, the Earl's fourth daughter, found means to convey her away from Durdens near Epfom in Surrey, the 20th of August, 1682; Mr Nelson must needs have had a great share in this calamity, considering his nature in general, and particular situation at this time. Though we have no evidence of it but that of his being at the pains to write out a copy of Tillotson's letter to the unfortunate young lady on this occasion (14). His Lordship, to secure the use of her to himself, linked her in a marriage with a dependant of his, one Mr Turner, who claimed her as his wife, when she was demanded by her father, after the trial of Lord Grey for seducing her, on the 23d of November following, when a verdict was given against his Lordship; whom she afterwards, with her husband, accompanied into Holland, when he fled thither in June 1683, on the detection of the Rye-house Plot (15). We have no account of the sequel when she openly professed herself a Roman-Catholick [F]. He was greatly concerned at this (which was to him an) unexpected change, and left no proper means untried, either by himself or friends, which were the ablest Divines in England (g) (though all proved ineffectual) (h) to reinstate her. In 1686, she entered the lists in the famous Popish controversy, in defence of that religion (i); and, in 1687, he engaged in the same controversy on the Protestant side, in a piece intitled, Transubstantiation contrary to Scripture: or, The Protestants Answer to the Seekers request, 4to. However, this alteration in Lady Theophila Nelson's sentiments, interesting as it was, made no alteration in the tenderness of her husband's affections towards her (k); and, as she laboured under an ill state of health, he accompanied her for the recovery of it to Aix la Chapelle (l). Having attended her there for some time, he made a trip to England in the latter end of the year 1688; but the uncertain state of the publick affairs soon determined him to return to France (m): whence, taking his lady (n) along with him, he proceeded to travel over Italy. He was much cared in these travels by several persons of the highest rank (o); and, while he resided at Florence, he kept a correspondence with the Earl of Melfort, Ambassador from King James the Second to the Pope after the Revolution, as appears from his Lordship's letters to him, from May to December, 1690, extant in his own copy-book of his letters, written during his embassy (p). From Italy Mr Nelson taking his course through Germany, passed from the Hague [G], where he resided in the house of his brother-in-law the Lord Dursley, Envoy-Extraordinary to the States-General (q), into England. He came home in the latter end of the year 1691, entirely dissatisfied with the new change in the Government, having determined not to transfer his allegiance from King James. As he resided in or near London (r), a perfect agreement in religious and political sentiments presently brought him acquainted with the Reverend Mr John Kettlewell; but this new character, and the connections attending it, had no influence to separate him from his old friends; they became such, by their distinguished learning, goodness, piety, and charity, and the same ties kept them still united. Archbishop Tillotson expired in his arms in the latter end of 1694 [H], and Mr Kettlewell left him his sole executor and trustee on his

of the history of his unhappy sister-in-law, whose disgrace drove her into an obscure retirement, while her name was prostituted by one of the most licentious writers of her own sex, in that collection of letters pretended to have passed between her and her gallant, during the course of her criminal amour (16). As to Mr Nelson, how sensibly soever this misfortune might touch him, yet he met with another not long after, which touched him much nearer, as will be seen in the following remark.

[F] Professed herself a Papist] She kept this a secret from Mr Nelson till he had married her, though she had been reconciled to that Church a considerable time before. The change being effected by Cardinal Philip Howard (17), at Rome. She was no sooner profelyted herself than her zeal (as might be expected), prompted her to draw her daughter, by her first husband, into the newly embraced religion. She likewise engaged with her pen in the Popish controversy then on foot, in defence of the grand fundamental of Popery, the Infallibility of the Roman Pontiff. We may form some idea of the extreme grief this was to her spouse, from the conclusion of a long letter which Dean Tillotson wrote to her on this occasion, to the following purport: That he did not doubt but that her Ladyship was as much wearied in reading so long a letter, as himself was in writing it, and that she might imagine his time lay heavy upon his hands; but the truth was, that every thing which related to Mr Nelson, lay so near his heart, that he could not say less upon such an occasion. However, this address did not avail any thing, nor yet the endeavours of Mr Nelson, who was well instructed in this cause, and whose influence must have been much greater, and who among other means used for his lady's sake, wrote a letter to an English Priest of the Roman Communion at Rome, printed in page 328. of several letters which passed between Dr George Hickes and a Popish Priest, which collection was published on this lady's account (18). But she continued in the communion of that Church till her death, which happened in 1705 (19). She was undoubtedly a person of fine sense and understanding; Dr Tillotson laments her case, particularly on that account, and even seems not to be absolutely free from all apprehension of the influence she might have upon her husband, in this important point. In a letter written after the Revolution to him, when he was at Florence, in his second travels abroad, touching upon the seduction of his lady and her daughter, he prays that God would preserve Mr Nelson, and her son Sir Berkley Lucy, in the truth; and so I do, continues he, for those that are fallen from it, that God would grant them repentance, to the acknowledgment of it. I pity poor Miss, who is more innocently seduced, but my lady much more, considering the degree of her understanding, and the difference of the two religions. The Archbishop afterwards seems to have taken an opportunity of talking to Miss. In a letter to Mr Nelson, still at Florence, and wrote in June 1691, he expresses himself thus: Since this calamity (so he calls the archbishopric) befel me. I have not yet had time to deliver Sir Berkley's letter to his sister, which I intended to do at the first leisure. I am loth to visit her at Mr Knox's, and it is less fit now. I think to send for her to Mr Beale's, and there to talk with her (20).

[G] From the Hague.] While he was here, being fixed in his opinion of not complying with the Revolution, he consulted his friend the Archbishop upon the practice of those Nonjurors, who frequented the churches, and yet did not join in the prayers for their Majesties; to which his Grace returned the following answer, in a letter dated December 15, 1691. 'As to the case you put, I wonder men should be divided in opinion about it. I think it plain, that no man can joy in prayers, in which there is any petition, which he is verily persuaded is sinful; I cannot endure a trick any where, much less in religion (21).' This was also Mr Kettlewell's opinion (22); and Mr Nelson was determined thereby at this time, though afterwards he changed his opinion, and differed from them both, as appears by his answer to this query, 'Whether a man may hold communion with, and joy in all parts of public worship, such a church as uses unlawful prayers, without guilt or dissimulation?' Answer, If by joying in all parts of public worship, be meant the actual joying in those prayers that are unlawful, no person can lawfully do it. For he can no more lawfully say Amen to what he desires not or detests, than he can say Amen to that which is no article of his faith, and which he looks upon as false. But if by joying in the public prayers be meant only holding communion with such a church, I think he lawfully may.' The reasons of which he assigns at large (23).

death, which happened in the beginning of the subsequent year (5). In pursuance to this trust, he published soon after the Posthumous Works of that worthy divine (1), with a preface, wherein the author's character is attempted. This friend had likewise prevailed with Mr Nelson to take up his pen in the service of piety and devotion [I], as being likely to do more good when coming from a lay-gentleman. And in that view he published his Companion for the Festivals and Fasts of the Church of England, with Collects and Prayers for each Solemnity, in 1704, 8vo. This was followed by The Great Duty of frequenting the Christian Sacrifice [K], in 1707, 8vo. and The Practice of True Devotion, in relation to the End, as well as the Means, of Religion, with an Office for the Holy Communion, in 1708, 8vo. At the same time he engaged zealously in every publick scheme for advancing the honour and interest, as well as for propagating the faith and promoting the practice, of true Christianity, not only at home [L] but abroad: as the Society for the propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts; that for reformation of manners at home; several proposals

My Lord,

I took the liberty to put Mr Chancellor of the Exchequer * in mind of that favourable answer you procured from the King in reference to Mrs Tillotson's affairs, in hopes that he would lay some proposals before his Majesty, for his royal approbation, in order to satisfy the necessity of Mrs Tillotson's circumstances, and that they might be dispatched before the King's departure; since, as I apprehend, matters of this nature suffer extremely by delay, and meet with the best success, when the sense of their fitness makes the deepest impression. The distance I live from town, and the aversion I have to be troublesome to great men, makes me ignorant of what progress Mr Chancellor has made, though I must own he expressed great zeal to the memory of the Archbishop, and professed much readiness and inclination to serve Mrs Tillotson.

Your Lordship's generous procedure emboldens me to solicit the continuance of your favour, being confident, that your Lordship will receive a great deal of pleasure from seeing that finished, which your Lordship's great goodness has given a birth to. And if Mr Montague wants any incitement besides your Lordship's example, your Lordship's constant owning Mrs Tillotson's cause will be an argument too powerful to be resisted. I have all the respect imaginable for your Lordship's post and character; but I must profess 'tis the experience of your Lordship's personal merit, which creates the profoundest respect of

My Lord,

Your Lordship's most obedient,

and most humble Servant,

Nelson (24).'

The warmth and heartiness of this address is almost inimitable; no wonder it had the desired effect, which was an augmentation of the widow's pension from 400l. to 600l. per annum.

[I] In the service of piety and devotion.] Mr Francis Lee, the compiler of Mr Kettlewell's life, assures us, that it was the zeal of that clergyman for the honour of religion, that first recommended him to Mr Nelson's friendship, and that it presently grew up into so unreserved a confidence, that each asked the other's advice in every thing of moment they set about, unboasting themselves in the most interesting passages of their lives. That, for instance, Nelson did very much encourage Kettlewell to proceed in that soft and gentle manner wherein he excelled, in managing the matters in controversy; and that from the hints given by him, of the usefulness of such a certain design (then mentioned) which was very familiar to Nelson, it is not to be doubted but that he was animated by that gentleman to begin and prosecute some things for a public good, which otherwise would not have seen the light. On the other hand, Kettlewell was, to the utmost of his power, serviceable to Mr Nelson in whatever he could propose to him: but more particularly in stirring him up to exert himself generously for God, and to write for the honour of religion, which he thought might do much more good, as coming from a lay-gentleman than it would from a professed clergyman. And it is, indeed, to Kettlewell that we chiefly owe his first setting about his Companion for the Festivals, &c. as I remember, says Mr Lee, to have heard from his own mouth, as also the putting it into that method in which it appears; and in the manner of publishing it he told me, that he followed Kettlewell's directions altogether: and, continues this writer, were it for nothing else but what this learned and religious gentleman did in the service of the Church, for the public acts and methods of charity, which he recommended to him, Mr Kettlewell's memory ought to be for ever precious to the Church of England, for the sake of Mr Nelson, had he even not left so much as one page of his own writing behind him to be known by. And the compiling of his friend's life is wholly due to Mr Nelson, from whose hands I received the materials a little before his last sickness (25).

[K] The Christian Sacrifice.] In the preface he declares, that the substance of this piece was contained in the chapter of the vigils, in his Companion for the Festivals, &c. But in great deference to the concurring judgments of some worthy divines and laymen of his acquaintance, it now appeared in another dress, with some enlargements. The acquaintance here mentioned, were apparently Dr Hickeys and his followers. That learned divine, in 1697, had declared his opinion in favour of the doctrine of a material sacrifice, in the symbols of the Eucharist (26), and published his opinion this same year 1707 (27). This doctrine was embraced and asserted by Mr Nelson, in the treatise now under consideration, where we find him expressly declaring, that he had taken particular care in it, to shew this institution was not only ordained to put us in mind of those great benefits which our Saviour procured for us by his death (for what man that reflects upon his Christianity can easily forget them), but that it was also established as a sacred rite, to supplicate God the Father, by the merits of our Saviour's passion, presenting to him the symbols of his body and blood, that thereby he may become favourable and propitious to us. This sense, continues he, is agreeable to the Scriptures, as understood by those who lived nearest to the times of the Apostles, and has been evidently proved so by the learned, judicious, and pious, Mr Mede (28). This last mentioned divine was the chief patron of the doctrine of a material sacrifice amongst the Protestants, which he started in the year 1635 (29), and it subsisted barely 'till the Restoration, and afterwards slept as it were for thirty or forty years; 'till it was revived by Dr Hickeys (30) in 1697, and further urged in 1707; and after him was warmly and strenuously laboured by Mr Johnson, of Cranbrooke, in Kent (31), another of Mr Nelson's acquaintance (32).

[L] The practice of religion at home.] When some of the members of the society for Reformation of Manners were complained of, as proceeding too strictly to put the laws in execution against profaneness and immorality, he defended the sincerity of their zeal; observing that he knew by experience the great expenses they had been at in prosecuting conitables particularly, who refused to do their duty in this respect. However, partly by the prevailing iniquity of the times, and partly by the extreme nicety that was to be observed in carrying this design into execution, it dwindled, and at length was discontinued. In his preface to the Companion to the Festivals, &c. our author has defended these societies from the aspersions that had then (in 1703) been cast upon them, where it appears, that he means only such as professed themselves of the Church of England, and frequented the public service of it.

for building, repairing, or endowing, churches; particularly to all charity-schools; and, at his death, he left his whole estate to that charity. He had hitherto adhered to the communion of the deprived Bishops; but, upon the death of Dr William Lloyd, Bishop of Norwich, in the close of the year 1709 (u), he returned to the publick service of the established Church [M]. It was not long after this, that he undertook to give an account

(u) His Lordship died Jan. 1. that year.

[M] He returned to the public service of the established Church.] It has been already observed in the course of these memoirs, that he was determined in this point by Bishop Ken (33), in the end of the year 1709, as mentioned above. And in consequence thereof having had some conferences with Dr Hickey upon the point, he wrote to that divine, on Thursday before Easter, April 17 10, that he found himself under an obligation of changing his practice, and that he thought he ought not to neglect those advantages which attended the approaching festival. However, he thought it proper to acquaint him with his resolution, that if he had any thing further to offer he [Nelson] might consider it before Easter, and though he differed from him in this point, yet no body could have a greater value and esteem for him. The Dean's answer, dated Good Friday, is in these words: 'You may remember I came to you this day sevendnight in the morning, to tell you that on Wednesday before, a friend of mine came to let me know, you had declared your resolution of going to church, and that it would be a reflection upon me, if I did not do something to prevent it, if I possibly could. Upon this, I told you, I had begun the Thursday morning following, to put something in writing for your consideration, but that I was interrupted by a long visit, and discouraged to proceed, because I had heard you had declared your resolution of leaving our communion for the other, and given a real proof by asking benediction of one of their Bishops, which you did not deny, nor ask me to go on; but, on the contrary, came to me the day following, in the evening, to pray me not to give myself any further trouble in writing upon your account, because you thought we had talked all we could say upon that subject; to which I replied, we had, I thought, talked but little, and seldom together of it, and however, that talk was at best but talk, and had not the advantages of writing. This, and what I often heard since of your declaring your resolution with all frankness in other places, made me think no more of my papers till yesterday, when I resolved, by God's assistance, to finish them, because they may be of use to me in confirming other persons, who are undetermined: but, upon reflection of what I have to write, I fear it will take up some time, with all my infirmities, to finish it, indeed more than at first I thought it would. However, when it is finished, and fit to be read, I will impart it to you, if you can prevail with yourself in the mean time to forbear going to the public; though if it should have no effect upon you, after declaring yourself so often under an obligation of changing your practice, it would occasion such insulting reflections upon me, by many as you know are usually made in such cases, upon successful endeavours to convince. Such, at all times, has been my behaviour towards you, since I had the honour of your acquaintance, and so much experience have I had of your candour, that I doubt not in the least of your continuing your esteem for me, of which I have had so many proofs. And I do assure you, that your change shall never alter or diminish that respect and honour for you, of which I have given the world public testimonies.' On the same day Mr Nelson returned an answer, and assured the Dean he had some difficulty to satisfy himself in a point which was not supported by his accurate judgment, and if he could have resigned himself implicitly to the determination of another, the great deference he had for him would quickly have influenced his choice. He tells him, the frequent conversations he had with him upon the subject, and the perusal of papers, which he knew had passed through his hands, together with several particulars discoursed over with him by Mr Cherry, made him think it not necessary to trouble him upon this occasion, and he is confident none but the person who came to the Dean, would have thought it any reflection upon him, if he had not given himself any further trouble. But when the Dean had declared, he had put pen to paper, in order to convince him the schism was not at an end, he thought the respect which will always be paid by him obliged him, notwithstanding the convictions of his mind, not to change his practice till the Dean had finished his thoughts, which he hoped he would have concluded this week. He declares he should be sorry to draw any reflections upon the Dean by his conduct, and let him determine which way soever, his much superior sense ought not to suffer, though many too frequently insult upon such occasions. 'Therefore, adds he, as you know the state of my mind at present, I desire you to judge, whether or no I should defer going to the publick. If you require it, I will wait till you have finished your papers, though I must own to you that the reasons of those who have already complied appear to me so convincing, that except you desire the contrary, I should think myself obliged to change my practice sooner.—The latter end of your letter gives me great satisfaction, for any coldness in your friendship which have been a load upon my mind, which would have oppressed me very much.—I am sure it is a great influence of your goodness, that you have given me so many public and private testimonies of your favour; and it will be still a further proof of it, that the difference between us creates no diminution in your kindness, which I shall always endeavour to cultivate to the best of my power; and I shall reckon it, as a happy circumstance of my life to be able to say of you, as some great man did of his friend: Ita dissiñi ab illo, ut in disjunctiõne sententiæ conjuncti tamen amicitia maneremus.' The next day, Easter-Eve, April 8, the Dean replied as follows:

'Honoured Sir,

'As you know I cannot in conscience advise you to go to church, or in the least approve your going thither; so considering the declarations I know you have made in several places, and I doubt not in several others of which I have not heard, to go thither, I think I should be justly censured for great imprudence by my friends, and for great confidence, and self-sufficiency by our enemies, should I take upon me, after so signal manifestations of your resolution, by which you have raised the expectations of the other communion, to require or desire you to defer the putting of it in practice, when there are so little hopes of convincing you, who are so far gone towards the other side, and even ready to enter into the church, that were there no more than the expressions of your own letters, they are enough to make me think you are too much fixed to be reduced by any thing I can write, and if you were so far gone from us to any other communion I should think the same. I believe, Sir, you would judge so of me, were you in my condition, and I in your's; and therefore prudence obliges me in this, as in my former letter, to leave you wholly to the liberty of your own judgment, especially considering, that should I desire you to forbear going to church to-morrow, where I have reason to presume, you are expected, it would occasion the expectants to enquire, why you did not come, and oblige you to tell the reason, which being known, would soon become town-talk, and raise the expectations both of friends and enemies; and at last when you went thither, extremely expose me, and our communion, and bring upon us in the condition and crisis we are, and are like to continue in, all the indignation, scorn, and derision of the world, which you, I am sure, who understand the times so well, can better imagine, than I can express: I wish, Sir, you had written the letter, which you wrote to me on Thursday in the evening, a month or six weeks ago, before you were so much determined, and had made yourself expected at the other side, then the controversy might have been managed with more privacy between us, and without those great inconveniences and mighty prejudices, to which I believe you cannot but think, it would now expose your most faithful, &c. (34).' The next day Mr Nelson of the life and writings of Bishop Bull [N]. The plan he had laid for this work (in composing which he omitted nothing that his gratitude could suggest, spared no pains to embalm his learned and pious tutor's memory) led him to take notice of some passages in Dr Samuel Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity [O]. The Life of the Bishop was published in 1713 (w), and the following year he was the editor of The Scripture Doctrine of the most Holy and Undivided Trinity, vindicated from the Misrepresentations of Dr Clarke (*). To which he prefixed A Letter written by himself to that Reverend Divine [P], with whom went to church; and for this reason it is apparent the author never designed this letter for his view, although having begun it by way of letter to him, he still continued it in the same address. These two worthy men, notwithstanding this difference of sentiments, constantly maintained the strictest friendship, which was never interrupted but by Mr Nelson's death; an evidence whereof will appear in the ensuing remark.

[N] The life of Bishop Bull The proposal was made to him by Mr Robert Bull, the Bishop's son, and he thought himself obliged to comply with it on several accounts. He had maintained a long and intimate friendship with his Lordship, which gave him an opportunity of being acquainted with his solid and substantial worth; he had frequently sat at his feet, as he was a preacher, and as often felt the force of those distinguishing talents, which enabled him to shine in the pulpit; but, above all, he had preserved a grateful remembrance of those advantages which he had received from him in his education (35). In speaking of the fifth discourse at the end of the Bishop's posthumous sermons †, he tells us, 'that considering the extreme nicety of the subject [viz. the state of man before the Fall] he did not chuse to rely upon his own judgment, and therefore applied to Dr Hickee, whom he styles his learned and worthy friend. That great master, adds he, of Ecclesiastical Antiquity, and the most considerable reviver of Primitive Theology that hath appeared in our time, he then makes the doctor a fine compliment upon his skill in the northern languages. But, continues he, he excellet in his own profession, having built his study of Divinity upon the holy scriptures, and the Primitive Fathers of the Church, as the best expostors of those sacred writings; and hath thereby created such a regard to antiquity in the generation of young divines now rising among us, that we may hope to see the next age preserved from the infection of those Latitudinarian principles which have too much prevailed in this. His readiness to communicate his knowledge, draweth an application to him from men of the greatest figure for their talents, and renders his friendship a true and valuable blessing. But, above all, the solid and substantial piety of his conduct, maketh his example a constant instruction to those who live within the reach of it (36).' From this passage it is insinuated, that the doctor was now become so much Mr Nelson's favourite writer, as to be influenced by him into that profound silence (as 'tis called) with respect to his old friend Archbishop Tillotson in all his writings (37). 'Tis true Mr Nelson had, as we have seen, not long before professed, that if any body could influence him in matters of conscience it would be Dr Hickee; but he observes at the same time, that such an influence was what he could not be governed by, and accordingly the very instance then attempted in vain by the doctor demonstrates the truth of that assertion; why then is not conviction from reason and argument alone, allowed to have it's just effect in producing an agreement, as it had in a disagreement with Dr Hickee and other Nonjurors. In the same spirit we find it recorded, that Dr Tillotson procured a prebend of Gloucester for Mr [afterwards Bishop] Bull, upon the single authority of Mr Wood with this censure, 'Mr Nelson in his life of Bishop Bull * mentions nothing of the Dean of Canterbury's endeavours in obtaining that prebend (38). 'Tis true he attributes this promotion to Dr Sharpe, next to Mr Bull's own extraordinary merit (39). Here Mr Wood's authority in a general treatise is preferred to Mr Nelson's in a particular one upon the subject. The truth is too apparent, Mr Nelson's piety was at least not inferior to that of Dr Tillotson, and his Church principles being very different from those of that divine, was it not thought necessary to blemish them with the charge of prejudice? in order to make him a proper victim to the Archbishop's supposed superior strength of understanding.'

[O] Some passages in Dr Clarke's Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity. Dr Clarke's treatise came out this very year 1712. While Mr Nelson was engaged in this work, that learned and ingenious writer, in regard to Bishop Bull's celebrated name, had cited him in defence of his own opinion, concerning the Trinity, which being thought by Mr Nelson to be very injurious to the Bishop's memory, he animadverted upon it as follows: 'The ingenious and learned Dr Clarke hath, in his Scripture Doctrine of the Trinity, printed this year, no less than thirty citations out of this very treatise [Defensio Fidei Nicenæ, &c.] and almost all of them are represented in a very different view from that which our author certainly had in writing those passages, as are also the citations out of the Fathers themselves, which Dr Clarke here met with, and hath accommodated to his own purpose, and that frequently without so much as the least notice taken of the explanation and answers given them by our author. He then proceeds to vindicate Dr Bull's opinion, from the charge brought against it by some, of being agreeable to that of Dr Clarke, by a representation of each, and continues thus: one would indeed be almost tempted to believe that Bishop Bull had, from the many passages that this learned doctor hath picked up out of him, with much art, in order to support his own scheme, been altogether of his mind; or that at least his manner of writing must have been very perplexed without any connexion or confidence of principles, and as holding forth frequently a double meaning. But that this is no part of his character, the very passages appealed to by the very doctor himself to exemplify how naturally truth can prevail, as he will have it, by it's own native evidence, are more than sufficient to prove; for which reason I have drawn up a list of them, that the equal and impartial examiner may be fully informed of the matter*. Upon the whole, he concludes, that Bishop Bull never asserted the subordination of the Son, so as to deny that supremacy which belongs to the Son as well as his Father. That this was his own opinion there can be no doubt. For, says he, certain it is that Dr Clarke, who had so ample a collection of testimonies concerning the Trinity before him, in this treatise [of Bishop Bull's] as well as in Petavius, hath not made that use of these, as this indefatigable and judicious collector did; or which might have been expected from a person of so great a character in the Church and learned world as Dr Clarke. However, he allows that the doctor ingenuously acknowledgeth, that he does not cite places out of these authors, or them who have written since the Council of Nice, so much to shew what was the opinion of the writers themselves, as to shew how naturally truth sometimes prevails by it's own native clearness and evidence, even against the strongest and most settled prejudices. He likewise asserts, that though Dr Clarke asserts the greatest part of the Fathers before and at the Council of Nice were really of that opinion, which he endeavours to set forth in his propositions, which makes the second part of his pretended scripture doctrine; yet he owns, nevertheless, they do not always speak very clearly and consistently. By which I suppose he meaneth, that they do not always plainly support his scheme. This charge however, says he, I do not find laid by him against our author' (40).

[P] A letter to Dr Clarke. In this letter he takes notice that he had, with the Doctor, been animadverted upon by a very zealous and learned divine of our Church, for not coming up [in his life of Bishop Bull] to his measures of orthodoxy, and censured for that very part of his good Bishop's life, 'In which you, says he, are more particularly concerned; as if I there shewed myself too favourable to you, and your doctrine, and made too near approaches towards Arianism.' That the Doctor had, however, declared to him in a private conversation, with great candour and ingenuity, that he had, in his opinion, discharged the part of an historian [as was his duty] faithfully: since it was not in his province as such, to debate those scholastical and critical points, in which

whom he had had a private conference before upon the subject. From this time the distemper under which he had long laboured, an asthma and dropfy in the breast, increasing to a dangerous degree, being heightened, as is thought, by the extraordinary application he used in writing the Life of Bishop Bull, it was not long before he retired to Kensington, where it put a period to his life on the 16th of January, 1714-15, at the age of fifty-nine years. some great masters of controversy have lost themselves; and that he never thought it would have been expected by any, that in an history he should have entered into the detail of the abstrusest questions, or have discussed the various acceptations of such terms, as he had occasion to use after great men, who had taken them in the same sense before him. That notwithstanding this challenge he had no thoughts of appearing any more in this controversy, nor to adventure the losing himself in the τὰ βέλγη τῶ ἑσθ. That he had been induced to lend his name to the present treatise, merely to supply that condition which was required in this controversy by the Doctor, and which the author could not be prevailed with to do [to whose opinion however, Nelson clearly enough intimates his concurrence]. He declares his approbation of the Doctor's method in going to the fountain head, the Scriptures, for settling this important point; but observes, the sense he puts upon them is not consistent with the received doctrine and worship of the Church of England, and consequently not agreeable to Scriptures as delivered down to us by our first Reformers, that is, in the sense which the Catholic Fathers and Primitive Bishops have thence collected; and therefore he hopes the Doctor will not proceed in a method of interpreting Scripture, which threatens the overturning of foundations both sacred and civil. 'If, continues he, the Judges and others learned in the law, shall follow the same method of interpreting the laws of the land, and accommodating the civil oaths and engagements as you have taken in interpreting and accommodating the sense of the Church, in her most authentic forms and declarations before God and man, and of the venerable Fathers of the Catholic Church; there are many of this opinion, that every thing might easily be leaped over, and that no establishment could be so strong as to last long; which being considered, it is presumed, that you cannot take it amiss, if this be a little further enquired into, for the sake of what is so dear to yourself. For who knows whereabouts his religion, liberty, or property may be, if such a latitude of interpretation be defensible, as is avouched in your third part openly, and is therefore suspected in your first and second. This will deserve to be set to rights.' Conformably to this last hint, Dr Clarke, who had subscribed the Articles, &c. with this reserve, so far as agreeable to the word of God, meaning thereby (as he declares himself) his own sense of that word, being convinced this was not the sense of the Church that required that subscription as a test, declined all subscription afterwards. He wrote an answer to Mr Nelson and the anonymous author, in which he highly extols Mr Nelson's courtesy and candour, very becoming his own character and that of a person of so much real worth, as he always acknowledged to be in Mr Nelson; and this gentleman having mentioned Dr Wells's letter to Dr Clarke, in the then present controversy, as a piece thought by many not unworthy his consideration, the Doctor accordingly did write an answer to those remarks. In the last of these Dr Wells had signified the necessity there was of removing Dr Clarke out of the Church, declaring withal, that in subscribing the Articles he had managed it so, that it would be very difficult to deprive him of his preferment: To this Dr Clarke replied, that there would be no difficulty at all to turn, or keep, him out of such a Church as was governed by a spirit of persecution. Mr Nelson had suggested his dislike of this part of Dr Wells's performance, declaring, that if indeed he had, according to the weight and dignity of the subject, considered it throughout as carefully as he was able (which are Dr Clarke's words); there was no sufficient reason, in his opinion, for any learned person who might think him mistaken, to treat him angrily, and in the spirit of Popery; whereupon Dr Clarke closes this answer to Dr Wells in these words, I will conclude the whole with setting before you, as in a glass, a lively and exact picture of the different spirits of men, in the words of a person as heartily zealous for the authority and traditions of the Church as any learned Protestant in Christendom. It is the ingenious Robert Nelson, Esq; in his life of the Right Reverend Bishop Bull, who speaking upon that Bishop's explication of the Doctrine of Justification, which is now as universally received and followed, as it was then contrary to the general opinion of Divines. Now, says Mr Nelson, as the method of our author was always to seek truth at the fountain head, whatever respect he might have for our first Reformers, and some other great Divines, both foreigners and natives, he could by no means take up with their authority, though never so pompously set off, but was for going directly to the very originals, and for consulting the most ancient and unexceptionable witnesses where any difference might happen to arise concerning them. Accordingly he betook himself, in the very first place, to the Holy Scriptures, and here he prudently beginneth with that which is obvious and plain, rather than that which is ambiguous and obscure (41). Yet notwithstanding all this caution of his, in the treating of this point that had been rendered so abstruse, more by the laborious disputations of Divines, than by the nature of the thing itself, or of the revelation concerning it; there was presently no small alarm, both in the Church and out of it, from Mr Bull's performance, as if the Church of England, and the whole Protestant Religion were by it in danger. For his departure herein from the private opinion of some Doctors, though in obedience to her rule, was by several interpreted no less than a departure from the Faith by her delivered (42). Hence there arose in the Church no small contention, which is not to be wondered at (43). Some publickly triumphed over him for understanding St Paul no better, and for not attending enough to the doctrine of his own Church (44). Others, as if he were not to be held for an Heretick only, but an Herefarch too (45). That Mr Bull's explication was properly heretical in the Reformed Churches (46). Some stirred up several of the Bishops to make use of their Apostolical authority, &c. committed to them (47). Some there were more violent, &c. as if the Faith was undermined and overturned (48). Some there were more wise, &c. not to determine without the help of the clearest light (49): Some were the most zealous to oppose—by their urged antiquity (50). There could have been no difficulty concerning—had their account of what the Catholic Church taught, been proposed with the truth (51). Some not allowing themselves time in the question they undertook to defend (52), set themselves to defend it by the Body of Divinity (53). But he [Bull] affirming the consent of the Catholic Church (54); yet with much ingenuity confesses, that as matters were come, &c. this is an observation that is very just—Nay, did I know a better excuse for—good and learned men to do them right (55). The design of these extracts appeared visibly enough, without an express application. Dr Clarke evidently intended to represent Bishop Bull's case, with respect to the doctrine of Justification, as a perfect image of his own, in regard to his doctrine of the Trinity; which he often declared would one day become as clearly the doctrine of the Church of England, as Bishop Bull's doctrine of Justification then was, upon the maxim magna veritas est prevalebit. How far that prophesy may be fulfilled is an event yet hidden in the womb of time; it is certain these citations manifest the great regard he had for Mr Nelson, of which he gave still a further proof. Dr Wells returned an answer to this letter, to which Dr Clarke made no direct reply, but in respect to Mr Nelson, who seemed to espouse Dr Wells as a friend, he acquainted him with the cause of it in a piece addressed to him, and the anonymous author published by him, which he declares to be the rudeness of the stile and manner of that Doctor (56).

(a) Sir John Newton, Bart. sprung from a younger branch of this family.

NEWTON [Sir Isaac] was descended of an ancient family (a), which had it's origin at Newton in Lancashire; but removing thence, was afterwards seated at Westby in Lincolnshire, and, about the year 1370, becoming possessed of the manor of Woolstrop in the same county, fixed it's residence upon that demesne. Here this prodigy of mathematical learning was born, upon Christmas-day 1642. His father dying, left him lord of that manor while he was yet a child, and a few years after his mother engaged in a second marriage; however, being a woman of good sense and of an ancient family herself of the name of Alcough (b), she did not neglect to take a becoming care of her son's education; and, at twelve years of age, put him to the free-school at Grantham in the same county. It was her design not to breed him a scholar; therefore, after he had been at school some years, he was taken home, that (being deprived as he was of his father) he might betimes get an insight into his own affairs, and be able the sooner to manage them himself. But upon trial, the youth shewed so little disposition to turn his thoughts that way, and at the same time stuck so close to his book, that his mother concluded it best to let him pursue the bent of his own inclinations. For that purpose she sent him back to Grantham, whence, at eighteen years of age, he removed to Cambridge, where he was admitted into Trinity-college in 1660 (c). We have taken notice in another place (d), that the study of the Mathematicks had been introduced into the university in the beginning of this century. From that period the elements of Geometry and Algebra became generally one branch of a tutor's lectures to his pupils; but particularly Mr Newton, at his admission, found Mr (afterwards Dr) Barrow, the most eminent Mathematician of the time, Fellow of his college: Mr Lucas also dying shortly after, left by his Will the appointment for founding his mathematical lecture, which was settled in 1663, and Mr Barrow (e) chosen the first Professor. Our author, therefore, in turning his thoughts to the Mathematicks, seems to have done no more than fall in, as well with his own particular situation, as with the general taste of that time; but then it is universally confessed, he did it with a genius that was superior to all that ever went before him in any time, Archimedes only excepted. For a beginning he took up Euclid's Elements, he run his eye over the book, and at sight was master of every proposition in it (f). This done, the youthful vigour of his understanding would not suffer him to stay and sit down, in order to contemplate the singular excellence in that author's elegant manner of demonstrating, whereby the whole series and connection of the truths advanced is continually kept in view up to their first principles. This neglect, however, he was sensible of in his riper age; but his ingenuity in confessing an error, which otherwise no body could have surmized, and that too after he was grown equally full of years and honour, by setting out in another way, was in him only a slender instance of a most amiable simplicity of disposition. It was not 'till the latter part of his life, that Dr Pemberton (g) became known to him, and then 'He spoke

‘ even with regret of this mistake at the beginning of his mathematical studies, in applying himself to the works of Des Cartes and other Algebraic writers, before he had considered the Elements of Euclid with that attention which so excellent a writer deserves.’ After all, if this was a fault in him, it was a fault that actually gave birth to all those vast improvements which he afterwards made in these sciences. The truth is, when he came to the college, Des Cartes was all the vogue. That eminent Mathematician and Philosopher had greatly extended the bounds of Algebra, in the way of expressing geometrical lines (b) by algebraical equations, and thereby introduced a new method of treating Geometry. Our author struck into this new analytical way, and presently saw to the end of the farthest advances made by Des Cartes; but having sounded the depth of that author's understanding, without feeling the extensive power of his own, he proceeded to read those pieces of Dr Wallis [A] which were then printed, and particularly his Aritmetica Infinitorum:

[A] He proceeded to read those pieces of Dr Wallis, From some original papers, now in the hands of the Earl of Macclesfield, it appears, that our author had read Oughtred's Clavis and Des Cartes's Geometry in the beginning of the year 1663, having then likewise borrowed Dr Wallis's Works; and it is seen by an account of his expences the same year, that about Christmas, when he became twenty-one years of age, he bought Des Cartes's Geometry, together with Schooten's Miscellanies.

[B] He

Infinitorum. Here our author first found that matter which set his boundless invention to work. In this ingenious performance, the celebrated author had carried the mensuration of curve lined figures to a pitch which had not as yet been exceeded. Amongst others, he had squared, or given the areas of a series of curves expressed in the way of Des Cartes, by algebraic equations, proceeding in a certain geometrical progression, whereby it easily appeared, as he shews, that, if between each of these areas another could be found, so that the terms of the aggregate series after such interpolation should be to each other, continually in the same scale of proportion, then the first of the interpolated areas would give the quadrature of the circle. But, how to perform this interpolation, was to him an insuperable difficulty, here, therefore, he was forced to put a stop to his researches, at this period. In the winter, between the years 1664 and 1665; Mr Newton (i) took up the subject, and though scarcely twenty-two years old presently passed the bounds that nature had set to his great præcursor [B], and from this beginning, by an amazing sagacity,

[B] He passed the bounds that nature had set to his great præcursor.] At the request of Mr Leibnitz in 1676, our author gave an account of the particular manner of his finding out the interpolation of Dr Wallis's series (1). In Arithmetica Infinitorum, prop. 118, 121, the author had given a series of curves, in which the base or common axis being  $x$ , and the ordinates

$$\frac{0}{1-xx} \frac{1}{1-xx} \frac{2}{1-xx} \frac{3}{1-xx} \frac{4}{1-xx} \frac{5}{1-xx} \text{ \&c. he observed, that if}$$ the areas of the alternate curves, which are  $\frac{1}{1}x$ ,  $\frac{1}{3}x - \frac{1}{3}x^3$ ,  $\frac{1}{5}x - \frac{2}{3}x^3 + \frac{1}{5}x^5$ ,  $\frac{1}{7}x - \frac{3}{5}x^3 + \frac{3}{7}x^5 - \frac{1}{7}x^7$ , could be interpolated, we should have the areas of the intermediate curves, the first of which  $\frac{1}{1-xx}$  is the circle. Considering how to perform this, Mr Newton remarked, that in every area the first term was  $x$ , and that the second terms,  $\frac{0}{3}x^3$ ,  $\frac{1}{3}x^3$ ,  $\frac{2}{3}x^3$ ,  $\frac{3}{3}x^3$ , &c. were in an arithmetical progression, and therefore that the two first terms of the series to be interpolated must be  $x - \frac{1}{3}x^3$ ,  $x - \frac{2}{3}x^3$ ,  $x - \frac{3}{3}x^3$ , &c. Then to interpolate the rest he observed, that the denominators, 1, 3, 5, 7, &c. were in arithmetical progression; so that it only remained to investigate the numeral co-efficients of the numerators. But these, in the alternate given areas, appeared to be the figures which constitute the powers of the number 11. viz. 11<sup>0</sup>. 11<sup>1</sup>. 11<sup>2</sup>. 11<sup>3</sup>. 11<sup>4</sup>. that is, in the first 1; in the second 1, 1; in the third 1, 2, 1; in the fourth 1, 3, 3, 1; in the fifth 1, 4, 6, 4, 1; &c. He therefore considered how the rest of the figures in these series might be derived from the two first, and found, that putting  $m$  for the second figure, the rest would be produced by the continual multiplication of the terms of this series;  $\frac{m-0}{1} \times$

$\frac{m-1}{2} \times \frac{m-2}{3} \times \frac{m-3}{4} \times \frac{m-4}{5}$  &c. For instance, let (the second term)  $m = 4$ ; then,  $4 \times \frac{m-1}{2}$  or 6, will be the third term; and  $6 \times \frac{m-2}{3}$  or 4, will be the fourth term; and  $4 \times \frac{m-3}{4}$  or 1, will be the fifth term; and  $1 \times \frac{m-4}{5}$  or 0, will be the sixth term, where the series in this case terminates. This done, he applied the rule for interpolating these series; and as for the circle the second term was already found to be  $\frac{1}{3}x^3$ , he put  $m = \frac{1}{2}$ ; and the terms came out

$$\frac{1}{2} \times \frac{\frac{1}{2}-1}{2} \text{ or } -\frac{1}{8}; -\frac{1}{8} \times \frac{\frac{1}{2}-2}{3} \text{ or } +\frac{1}{16}; +\frac{1}{16} \times \frac{\frac{1}{2}-3}{4} \text{ or } -\frac{5}{128} \text{ and so on in infinitum.}$$

Whence he discovered the area of the circular segment which was sought, to be  $x - \frac{1}{3}x^3 - \frac{1}{5}x^5 - \frac{1}{7}x^7$

$-\frac{1}{9}x^9$  &c. By the like process he interpolated the areas of the other curves in the given series, as also the area of the hyperbola and the rest of the alternate curves in this series,  $\frac{0}{1+xx} \frac{1}{1+xx} \frac{2}{1+xx} \frac{3}{1+xx}$ , &c. and pursuing this method, he found that the area of the circular sector, whose sign is  $x$ , the radius being unity, might be expressed by this series,  $x - \frac{1}{6}x^3 - \frac{1}{40}x^5 - \frac{1}{112}x^7 - \frac{1}{1152}x^9$ , &c. And hence, from no other consideration, than that the arc has the same proportion to it's sector, as the whole quadrant has to an arc of 90 degrees, he readily derived the series  $x + \frac{1}{6}x^3$

$+\frac{3}{40}x^5 + \frac{5}{112}x^7 + \frac{35}{1152}x^9$  &c. for the length of the arc whose sign is  $x$ . At the same time (in the winter between 1664 and 1665) and in the same manner, he found the series  $x - \frac{1}{2}x^2 + \frac{1}{3}x^3 - \frac{1}{4}x^4 + \frac{1}{5}x^5 - \frac{1}{6}x^6$  &c. to be the hyperbolic area in the rectangular hyperbola intercepted between the curve, it's asymptote, and two ordinates whose diameter is  $x$  parallel to the other asymptote. But now having got thus far, he began to consider, that the terms

or in general  $\frac{m}{1-xx}$ , would arise from the continual multiplication of the terms of this series,  $m \times \frac{m-1}{2} \times \frac{m-2}{3} \times \frac{m-3}{4}$  &c. Thus, for instance,  $\frac{1}{1-xx}$  would be  $1 - \frac{1}{2}x^2 - \frac{1}{8}x^4 - \frac{1}{16}x^6$ , &c. And  $\frac{3}{1-xx}$  would be  $1 - \frac{3}{2}x^2 + \frac{3}{8}x^4 - \frac{1}{16}x^6$  &c. and  $\frac{1}{1-xx|3}$  would be  $1 - \frac{1}{3}xx - \frac{1}{9}x^4 - \frac{5}{81}x^6$  &c. or in general,  $\frac{m}{a+xx} = a^m + ma^{m-1}x + \frac{m a}{1} \times \frac{m-1}{2} a^{m-2} x^2 \times \frac{m-1}{1} \times \frac{m-2}{2} \times \frac{m-3}{3} a^{m-3}$

$x^3$ , &c. Where the letters are used for any quantities taken together, with the signs + or - affecting them, that is,  $\frac{m}{a+xx}$  signifies  $+\frac{1}{a+xx} + \frac{1}{a+xx}$  and the index  $m$  may also be any number whole or fracted, or fard, affirmative or negative. joined to the most intense application, carried the doctrine of infinite series in less than two years time almost to perfection. But this could be completed only by the help of the method of Fluxions, which was invented by him, in the spring of the year 1665, and took its rise from a circumstance not much unlike that which gave birth to the former. Mr Fermat had, about the year 1630, hit upon a way of determining the maxima and minima, by a method of the same kind with that of Fluxions [C]; he had likewise drawn tangents to curves, in some of the less difficult cases. An instance of this method is given by Andrew à Schooten, in his commentary on Des Cartes's Geometry, printed in 1649. Mr Newton reading that author (k), in 1663 [D], took notice of this method, and remarked that it was confined to simple rational quantities only. Therefore, having now, by pursuing the method of interpolation, found out his famous binomial theorem, and made it general, by the happy thought of using indefinite indices, or exponents of powers\*; he observed, the rule for drawing tangents, which he had seen in Schooten, thereby became universal, and might be extended by this means to quantities involved either in fractions or surds (and with the same ease too) as to rational powers or roots: after this he presently perceived the way of applying the same rule to find the degree of curvature in curves at any given point; and being now sensible, that this rule, by the help of his indefinite indices, would serve for finding the proportion of indeterminate quantities of any kind, he thought of laying a foundation suitable to the large extent of it. To this end, he considered, that mathematical quantity might, very agreeably to nature, and even daily experience, be conceived as generated by local motion, either uniform or continually accelerated, and that either in one unvarying proportion, or changing in any given rule of variation. To reduce so general a principle into a proper form for calculation, he observes,

(A) See the note [A].

* By this means the operations of multiplication, division, and extraction of roots, were reduced to one common way of considering them; whence the bounds of analysis were much extended, and a foundation laid for its becoming universal.

into a general rule, for reducing any power of a binomial into an approximating or converging series by the following theorem.  $\sqrt[P+PQ]{n} = P \frac{m}{n} + \frac{m}{n} A Q$

$$+ \frac{m-n}{2n} B Q^2 + \frac{m-3n}{4n} C Q^3 + \frac{m-3n}{6n} D Q^4 + \&c.$$

Here  $P + P Q$  expresses the quantity, whose root, or any power, or root of any power, is sought.  $P$  expresses the first term of the quantity,  $Q$  the rest of the terms divided by the first,  $\frac{m}{n}$  the numeral index of the power  $P + P Q$ , whether an integer or a fraction, affirmative or negative. For  $\sqrt{a}$ ,  $\sqrt{a^3}$ , writing  $a^{\frac{1}{2}}$ ,  $a^{\frac{3}{2}}$ ; for  $\frac{1}{a}$ ,  $\frac{1}{aa}$ , writing  $a^{-1}$ ,  $a^{-2}$ ; for

$$\frac{aa}{\sqrt{ca^3 + bbx}}$$
, writing  $aa \times \frac{1}{a^3 + bbx} = \frac{1}{3}$ . And thus the general reduction of radical quantities into infinite series, that is the binomial theorem, was found out by interpolation, before he knew the extraction of roots; but the first once known, the latter did not long remain undiscovered. For, in order to prove the truth of these operations, he multiplied  $1 - \frac{1}{2} x^2 - \frac{1}{8} x^4 - \frac{1}{16} x^6$  into itself, and the product appeared  $1 - x x$ , the rest of the terms in infinitum vanishing by the continuation of the series: and thus  $1 - \frac{1}{3} x x - \frac{1}{9} x^4 - \frac{1}{81} x^6$  drawn twice into itself, produced also  $1 - x x$ . This unavoidably led him to try, whether these series, which now appeared to be the roots of the quantity  $1 - x x$ , could not be extracted from it by the rules of common arithmetic, and the trial answered his expectation. After he saw this, he dropped the way of interpolating series, and made use of extractions as the more genuine foundation. In the mean time, the reduction by division was not unknown to him, being a matter of much less difficulty. Hence he went on, and, in the spring of the same year 1665, found the resolution of affected equations in species. By the way of interpolation, the quadrature of all curves became known, whose ordinates being given, are the powers of binomials affected with indices, whole, fracted, or surd, affirmative or negative. And, by the resolution of equations, he discovered, & converso, the length of the ordinates or segments of the axes, or any other right lines whatsoever, from the areas or arcs of curves being given. In the summer of 1665, being obliged to retire from Cambridge on account of the plague, he went to Boothby in Lincolnshire, where he computed the area of the hyperbola by the forementioned series to two and fifty figures. This appears by his original papers found after his death; for he was himself ashamed to own that he had indulged his fancy so fruitlessly. These are his words (2): Pudet dicere ad quot figurarum loca has computationes otiosus eo tempore produxi. Nam tunc sane nimis delectabar inventis hisce.

[C] Mr Fermat had hit upon a method of the same kind with that of Fluxions.] His method was first published by Herigon in his Curfus Mathematicus in 1631. It was thus: In any equation involving two unknown quantities, suppose  $x$  and  $y$ , to find when either of them, suppose  $y$ , is greatest or least, Mr Fermat puts the letter (not cypher)  $o$  for the indefinitely small difference of the two values of the other quantity  $x$ , and putting  $x + o$  for  $x$  has a new equation, and by reducing these two equations, and making the difference  $o$  decrease and vanish, finds the greatest or least quantity. Archimedes, by the proportion of the increase of lines, drew tangents to spirals; and his method was here applied by Mr Fermat, to the newly-invented way of expressing curve lines by algebraic equations.

[D] Mr Newton reading that author in 1663.] His manner of studying, as is seen by his books (3), was to make notes upon the books as he read them, and very considerable improvements are found in these notes, upon the subjects which the authors that he read at this time treat of. In the 59th proposition of the Aritmetica Infinitorum, Dr Wallis, by collecting several particulars into a table of cases, had shewn, that if the abscissa of any curvilinear figure be called  $x$ , let  $m$  and  $n$  be numbers, and the ordinates erected at right angles be  $x \frac{m}{n}$ ; then the area of the figure shall be  $\frac{n}{m+n} x \frac{m+n}{n}$ .

Mr Newton, in the summer of the year 1665, considering this proposition, luckily thought of using  $m$  and  $n$  indefinitely for any quantity*; and in this way having reduced all the cases into one, expressed by a power with an indefinite index, he saw that Mr Fermat's way of determining the maxima and minima might be applied to it. This, therefore, he presently extended into his method of Moments, and by that method demonstrated that proposition at once, which Dr Wallis had been able to prove only by Induction. This is the first rule in his Analysis of Fluxions, which with his Infinite Series, before the end of the year 1666, and when he was not yet four and twenty years old, he extended so universally, that in all mathematical enquiries whatsoever, supposing their determinations to be possible, the series either stop at a certain point, or at least their sums were given by stated rules: but if the absolute determinations were impossible, they could yet be infinitely approximated; which Monsieur de Fontenelle observes, is the happiest and most refined method of supplying the defects of human knowledge, that man's imagination could possibly invent.

(3) Some of these are in the same hands with his original papers, ubi supra; and the rest, which made the greatest part of his library, were purchased by the late Mr Huggens of St Martin's Lane, London, whose son was a little while ago possessed of them.

* Dr Wallis had introduced indefinite indices, but did not apply them to explain or demonstrate his theorem; the reason of which see in his article.

first of all, that as hereby quantities became greater or less, according to the greater or lesser velocities of the motion with which they were generated, hence the whole business consisted in determining the proportion of these velocities. But the consideration of different degrees of velocity necessarily involved that of time, and absolutely depended upon it. Therefore, he compared the motions of all other quantities with that of time, and from the flowing of time, and the moments thereof, he gave the name of flowing quantities to all quantities which increase in time, and that of Fluxions to the velocities of their increase, and that of moments to their parts generated in moments of time; observing then, that time flowed uniformly, he represented it by some other quantity, which was considered as flowing uniformly (for instance, in determining the areas of curve-lined figures, he represented it generally by equal parts of the abscissa, and it's Fluxion by an unit), and considering the moments of time, or of it's exponent, as equal to one another, such moments he commonly represented by the letter o drawn into an unit. The other flowing quantities he represented by the ordinate, in computing the quadrature of curves, or generally, by the final letters of the alphabet, x, y, z; their Fluxions by the same letters in a different form, or else distinguished by points over them,  $\dot{x}$ ,  $\dot{y}$ ,  $\dot{z}$ ; &c. and their moments he expressed by their Fluxions, drawn into a moment of time  $\times o$ : But did not confine his method to the use of these, or any particular symbols of Fluxions. Every thing being thus prepared, he reduced the whole inquiry to this general problem: From a given equation, involving any number whatever of fluents, to find the Fluxions, and vice versa. This problem he immediately applied to all the subjects which the Mathematicians of that time were busied in searching into, and pushing through every difficulty as it arose, he presently brought it to that perfection, especially in the quadrature of curves, (the subject which first set him to work) that in any proposed equation whatever, expressing the nature of a curve, he could tell whether such curve were possible to be squared or no, and then, if possible, could actually give the square, either in finite terms, that is, accurately if that could be done, or else by continual approximation in an infinite series, and this, in less than a quarter of an hour (l). In all these inquiries he knew not which it was to be repulsed, his sagacity always carrying him through every opposing difficulty, up to the end which he aimed at, rested within those limits only, which he himself judged proper to put to such kind of speculations. But, he had now laid in a sufficient stock of these materials, which he knew how to enlarge too if there should be occasion for it, and he could not think of throwing away his time upon meer abstracted speculations, how entertaining soever they might be (m). Accordingly he now turned his thoughts to a subject of more immediate use. Des Cartes in his Dioptrics (the best (n) of his performances in Philosophy) taking up with the commonly received opinion, that light was homogeneous; had upon this principle first discovered the laws of refraction, and demonstrated, that the perfecting of telescopes depended on finding out a way of making the glasses in elliptic, parabolic, or hyperbolic figures: The best mathematical wits were now at work (o) upon this subject; particularly Mr (afterwards Sir Christopher) Wren had, about this time (p), made considerable advances towards completing this so useful an invention, as it was then thought to be. Mr Newton, therefore, no sooner got back to the college, than he applied himself, in 1666, to the grinding of optic glasses of other figures than spherical, having no distrust as yet of the homogeneous nature of light; but not hitting presently upon any thing in this attempt which succeeded to his mind, he procured a glass prism, in order to try the celebrated phenomena of colours, not long before discovered by Grimaldi. He was much pleased at first with viewing the vivid brightness of the colours produced by this experiment; but after a while, applying himself to consider them in a philosophical way, with that circumspection which was natural to him, he became immediately surprized to see them in an oblong form, which, according to the received rule of refractions, ought to have been circular. Yet at first he thought the irregularity might possibly be no more than accidental; but this was a question he could not leave without further satisfaction: he therefore presently invented an infallible method of deciding it, and this produced his New Theory of Light and Colours (q). However, the theory alone, unexpected and surprising as the discovery was, did not satisfy him; he rather considered the proper use that might be made for improving telescopes, which was his first design. To this end, having now discovered light not to be homogeneal, but an heterogeneous mixture of differently refrangible rays, he computed the errors arising from this different refrangibility, and finding them to exceed some hundreds of times those occasioned by the circular figure of the glasses, he laid aside his glass-works, and took reflections into consideration. He now understood, that optical instruments might be brought to any degree of perfection imaginable, provided a reflecting substance could be found, which would polish as finely as glass, and reflect as much light as glass transmits, and the art of giving it a parabolic figure be also attained. But these seemed to him very great difficulties, nay, he almost thought them insuperable, when he farther considered, that every irregularity in a reflecting superficies, makes the rays stray five or six times more from their due course, than the like irregularities in a refracting one. Amidst these thoughts, he was forced from Cambridge by the plague; and it was more than two years before he made any farther progress therein (r). However, he was far from passing away the hours in a negligence of thought in the country: on the contrary, it was here at this time, that he first started the hint that gave rise to the system of the world, world, which is the main subject of his Principia. The consideration of accelerated motion in the method of Fluxions abovementioned, which he was still improving, unavoidably led his thoughts to the subject of Gravity, the effect of which is an instance of that motion in nature. And now (j), as he sat in a garden alone in the country, he very naturally fell into some reflections on the power of this principle; That, as this power is not found sensibly diminished at the remotest distance from the center of the earth to which we can rise, neither at the tops of the loftiest buildings, nor on the summits of the highest mountains, it appeared to him reasonable to conclude, that this power must extend much farther than was usually thought. Why not as high as the moon? said he to himself; and if so, her motion must be influenced by it; perhaps she is retained in her orbit thereby; However, though the power of gravity is not sensibly weakened in the little change of distance at which we can place ourselves from the center of the earth; yet it is very possible, that, as high as the moon, this power may differ much in strength from what it is here. To make an estimate what might be the degree of this diminution, he considered with himself, that if the moon be retained in her orbit by the force of gravity, no doubt the primary planets are carried round the sun by the like power: and, by comparing the periods of the several planets with their distances from the sun, he found, that if any power like gravity held them in their courses, it's strength must decrease in the duplicate proportion of the increase of distance. This he concluded, by supposing them to move in perfect circles concentrical to the sun, from which the orbits of the greatest part of them do not much differ. Supposing, therefore, the power of gravity, when extended to the moon, to decrease in the same manner, he computed whether that force would be sufficient to keep the moon in her orbit. In this computation, being absent from books, he took the common estimate, in use among Geographers and our seamen before Norwood had measured the earth, that 60 English miles complete one degree of latitude; but, as this is a very faulty supposition, each degree containing about  $69\frac{1}{2}$  of our English miles, his computation upon it did not make the power of gravity, decreasing in a duplicate proportion to the distance, answerable to the power which retained the moon in her orbit; whence he concluded, that some other cause (l) must at least join with the action of the power of gravity on the moon. For this reason, he laid aside for that time any farther thoughts upon the matter. An easiness so resigned, as to give up a favourite opinion, founded upon the best astronomical observations of the whole planetary system, is an illustrious proof of a temper exactly fitted for philosophical enquiries. Mr Voltaire (u) relates it as an anecdote of particular use in the history of the human mind, as it shews at once, both how great an exactness is necessary in these sciences, and likewise how disinterested Mr Newton was in his search after truth. It is, indeed, a little surprising, that he should not then be acquainted with Norwood's mensuration, which was made in 1635; and seems to be more so still, that he did not inform himself when he returned to Cambridge, which he did shortly after, and, in the following year 1667, was chosen Fellow of his college, and took the degree of Master of Arts the same year, having proceeded Bachelor of Arts three years before. But at this time he apparently thought it not possible, that the old reckoning could be so grossly wide of the truth as it really is; and he was remarkably clear of that vanity, which in other eminent inventors is useful, in making them forward to push the exercise of their inventive faculty. In reality, his thoughts were now engaged upon his newly-projected telescope by reflection; which being a very useful invention, he was most desirous to complete. And, in 1668, having considered what Mr James Gregory proposed in his Optica Promota, concerning such a telescope, with a hole in the middle of the object-metal to transmit the light to an eye-glass placed behind it, he thought the disadvantages would be so great, that he resolved, before he put any thing into practice, to alter Mr Gregory's design, and place the eye-glass at the side of the tube, rather than in the middle; he then made a small instrument, with an object-metal spherically concave: but this was only a rude essay; the chief defect lay in the want of a good polish for the metal. This, therefore, he set himself to find out, when Dr Barrow resigning the mathematical chair at Cambridge to him on the 8th of November, 1669 (w), the business of that professorship interrupted his attention to the telescope for a while. In the mean time, an unexpected occasion drew from our author a discovery of the vast improvements he had made in Geometry by the help of his new analysis. Lord Viscount Brouncker, the year before, had published a quadrature of the hyperbola in an infinite series [E], which, by the help of Dr Wallis's division, was soon after demonstrated by Mr Nicholas Mercator, in his Logarithmotechnica in 1668. This being the first appearance of a series of this sort, drawn from the particular nature of the curve expressed in an abstracted algebraical equation, and that in a manner very new, the book presently came into the hands this series  $a + ar + ar^2 + ar^3 + ar^4$ , &c. and the quadrature given of every part of the quotient. Mr Mercator only shewed how Lord Brouncker's series might be found by this division, and squared by this quadrature; and though he lived sixteen years afterwards, yet he never made any further progress in the subject of Quadratures (4).

of Dr Barrow, then at Trinity-college (*) : who having, upon another occasion (y), been informed some time before by Mr Newton, that he had a general method of drawing tangents, communicated this invention of Mercator's to that fellow-collegian : upon sight of which, our author brought him those papers of his own, that contained his Analysis per æquationes numero terminorum infinitas. The doctor perusing it, stood amazed at the prodigious performance, and immediately acquainted his friend Mr Collins with it; at whose request he afterwards obtained leave of Mr Newton to send him the papers. Mr Collins taking a copy before he returned the treasure, thence got the means of dispersing other transcripts to all the most eminent of his mathematical acquaintance (z). But, notwithstanding this, it was not 'till a great many years afterwards, that the full extent to which our author had carried the invention came to be well understood. Mr Fontenelle observes, it was natural to expect, that Mr Newton, upon seeing Mercator's book, would have been forward to open his treasure, and thereby secure to himself the glory of being the first discoverer (aa). But this was not his way of thinking. On the contrary, we know from his own mouth, that he thought Mercator had entirely discovered his secret, or that others would, before he was of a proper age for writing (bb) [to the publick]. The empty name of barely doing what nobody else could do, he looked upon as a child's bauble; his views were much higher and more noble; he thought to build his fame upon a more substantial foundation. These speculative inventions, therefore, however ingenious, were kept by him, as necessary tools and implements in his intended researches into the works of nature; there he knew they would be of use to him, and he knew too how to use them there to advantage; and in these views only it was, that he set any particular value upon them. Nay, he was now actually making this use of them, in discovering the properties and unravelling the subtle actions of light [F]. As his thoughts had been for some time chiefly employed upon Optics, he made his discoveries in that science the subject of his lectures, for the three first years after he was appointed Mathematical Professor. He had not finished these lectures, when he was chosen Fellow of the Royal Society in January 1671-2 (cc); and having now brought his Theory of Light and Colours to a great degree of perfection, he communicated it to that Society first to have their judgment upon it [G], and it was afterwards published in their Transactions of February 19, 1672. But, notwithstanding all this precaution which was taken in preparing it for publick view; yet it was so absolutely new and unsuspected, and totally subversive of all mens settled opinions in this matter; such a nice degree of accuracy and exactness was necessary in making the experiments upon which it was founded, and the reasoning also upon those experiments was so very subtle and penetrating, that it no sooner went abroad into the world, than it found opposers in all quarters wherever it appeared. Our author was thus unexpectedly drawn into various disputes about it, which being for the most part occasioned, [F] In discovering the properties and actions of light. He began to read his lectures in Optics this year. In the last section of these lectures he treats of rays as refracted by curve surfaces. Here is delivered a very elegant way of finding the principal focus of any number of spherical lenses, which is of great use in telescopes. Next is shewn how to do the same for lenses formed into other figures than spherical ones, by means of the radius of the curvature at the vertices of the curve figures. Then he shews the method of computing the errors of optical glasses, and afterwards, how to determine in spherical figures the focus that belongs to every particular ray; the same is likewise shewn for any other figure whatsoever, by the help of the radius of the curvature. For the finding of which radius at any point of a curve, he refers to his Analysis per Series, &c. He proceeds to describe the figures which shall so refract the incident rays, that they may meet in any given focus; and then sets down two propositions necessary for determining the rainbow. In the conclusion of the twelfth proposition, in the third section, he proves, that in rays of every sort refracted at the same point of a plane surface, the locus of the centers of their radiations is the vulgar cissoid.—He had, some time before the reading of these lectures, communicated some of these inventions to Dr Barrow, who inferred them in his Lectiones Opticæ; in the preface to which, he distinguished our author with a peculiar commendation. *D. [G] He communicated it to the Royal Society to have their judgment upon it.] The reason of this conduct is fully declared, in the following letter of his to Mr Oldenburg (6).

and able judges in philosophical matters encouraged me to present them with that discourse of Light and Colours, which since they have so favourably accepted of, I do earnestly desire you to return them my cordial thanks. I before thought it a great favour to be made a member of that honorable body; but I am now more sensible of the advantage. For believe me, Sir, I do not only esteem it a duty to concur with them in the promotion of real knowledge, but a great privilege that instead of exposing discourses to a prejudiced and censorious multitude (by which means many truths have been baffled and lost) I may with freedom apply my self to so judicious and impartial an assembly.

As to the printing of that letter I am satisfied in their judgment, or else I should have thought it too straight and narrow for public view. I design'd it only to those that know how to improve upon hints of things; and therefore to shun tediousness, omitted many such remarques and experiments as might be collected by considering the assigned laws of refractions; some of which I believe, with the generality of men, would yet be almost as taking as any I described. But yet since the Royal Society have thought it fit to appear publicly, I leave it to their pleasure: and perhaps to supply the aforesaid defects I may send you some more of the experiments to second it, (if it be so thought fit) in the ensuing Transactions.

I have no more but to offer my acknowledgments of your kindneses in particular, and my thanks for the pains you are pleased to undertake in printing that letter.

I. Newton.

'S I R, Stoake, July 6, 1672.

In the inquiry which in yours of June 25th, you propound in these words: whether a physcally point in a glass, may not by the diversity of the pores and angles in it, cause in the rays falling thereon, such really different, tho' seemingly equal refractions, that thence may proceed those severall distinct colours, which in my doctrine are esteemed to proceed from the aggregate of the rays of light? I know not what to understand by really different though seemingly equal refractions, for if you meane those different refractions from whence I denominate light unequally refrangible, their differences are so great that they are far from being seemingly equal. And I apprehend not what other differences you should meane (if there be any other) since there is so constant and strict an analogy between these and the several species of colours. However, since you suppose these unequal refractions to proceed from the diversity of pores and angles in the glass, they must be comprehended under the contingent irregularities which I have already disproved in my answer to Mr Hooke, and P. Pardies. And farther, if colours were originated from refractions, as is supposed in your enquiry, then all colours would be changeable by refractions, contrary to what I find by experience. From either of these two heads, your inquiry is determined negatively, which if you think requisite I shall farther explain hereafter.

In the mean time, give me leave to insinuate that I cannot think it effectual for determining truth, to examine the several ways by which phenomena may be explained, unless where there can be a perfect enumeration for all those ways. You know the proper method of enquiring after the properties of things, is to deduce them from experiments. And I told you that the theory which I propounded was evinced to me, not by inferring 'tis thus, because not otherwise, but by deriving it from experiments concluding positively and directly. The way therefore to examine it, is by considering whether the experiments, which I propound, do prove those points of the theory, to which they are applied, or by prosecuting other experiments, which the theory may suggest for it's examination. And this I would have done in a due method; the laws of refraction being thoroughly enquired into and determined, before the nature of colours be taken into consideration. It may not be amiss to proceed according to the nature of these queries, the decision of which I could wish to be stated, and the events declared by those that may have the curiosity to examine them.

1. Whether rays, that are alike incident on the same medium, have unequal refractions, and how great are the inequalities of their refractions at any incidence.

2. What is the law according to which each ray is more or less refracted? whether it be that the same ray is ever refracted according to the same ratio of the sines of incidence and refraction; and divers rays according to divers ratios? or that the refraction of each ray is greater or less without any certain rule? that is, whether each ray have a certain degree of refrangibility, according to which it's refraction is performed, or is refracted without that regularity?

3. Whether rays which are indued with particular degrees of refrangibility, when they are by any means separated, have particular colours constantly belonging to them; viz. the least refrangible, scarlet; the most refrangible, deep violet; the middle; sea-green, and others, other colours, and on the contrary.

4. Whether the colour of any sort of rays apart may be changed by refraction.

5. Whether colours coalescing do really change one another to produce a new colour, or produce it by mixing only?

6. Whether a due mixture of rays indued with all variety of colours produces light perfectly like that of the sun, and which hath all the same properties, and exhibits the same phenomena?

7. Whether there be any other colours produced by refractions, than such as ought to result from the colours belonging to the diversly refrangible rays, by their being separated or mixed by that refraction?

To determine by experiments these and such like queries, which involve the propounded theory, seems the most proper and direct way to a conclusion. And therefore I could with all objections were suspended, taken from hypotheses or any other heads than these two; of shewing the insufficiency of experiments to determine these queries, or prove any other parts of my theory, by assigning the flaws and defects in my conclusions drawn from them; or of producing other experiments which directly contradict me if any such may seem to occur. For if the experiments which I urge be defective, it cannot be difficult to shew the defects; but if valid, then by proving the theory, they must render all other objections invalid.

In the margin of my answer to Mr Hook, I noted the contents of it in twelve particulars, which when I came to number them in the copy, I found thirteen; so experiments which ascertained the truth of the fact, and now thought to oblige the world, by disclosing one of the most hidden secrets of nature; and there was room to expect the benefaction so that there is either a marginal note omitted, or else slipped over without it's number prefixt. If the last bath happened, you may prefix it's number, and alter the number of those that follow. But if the first I will supply the note, when I return to Cambridge, where my papers are, because there may possibly be occasion of referring to that discourse hereafter.

S I R,

I am

Your humble servant,

I. Newton.

all occur not, upon your intimation of the particulars which they stick at, I shall for your sake do my endeavour, as much as I can, in short, to supply what they desire.

I have not yet perused those two books you mention, but by your description of the first in the Transactions, it seems to contain a doctrine most highly probable; and in the latter I expect to meet with many things as improbable. And than that particular which you mention, I know not what can be more difficult.

I am sorry for the miscarriage of your aforesaid letter, and blame myself for my postscript, suspecting that may have occasioned in yours, what you would not have fall into other hands than those of

Your humble servant,

Newton.

' P. S. Yours, dated June the 20th, I doubt I shall not receive 'till my return to Cambridge. I desire you would suspend the impression of P. Pardies second letter. If you write to me before July the 14th, pray direct your letter to me at Mrs Arundell's house in Stoake park, in Northamptonshire, and assigne it to be left with the Postmaster of Towcester to be sent thither.'

' S I R, Stoake, July 13, 1672.

I am glad you are pleas'd to accept my answer to your inquiry, together with the following discourse about the properest method of examining the truth of my proposals; which you may print when you think fit. And so you may P. Pardies second letter with my answer thereto, since you desire it, and have intimated to him in this month of July. I intended to suspend it for a while, thinking it would be more convenient to print together what shall be said of this subject, especially since there are some other papers at Cambridge to be added to them. But if what hath pass'd be inserted in the Transactions to entertain them at present, that are in expectation of farther information about these matters, they may be hereafter reprinted by themselves, if it shall be hereafter fit.

I hope you have before this time received my thoughts upon Mr Huygens two particulars, which therefore I shall not repeat.'

N. B. The rest of this letter relates to his reflecting telescope, which we shall give, therefore, in it's proper place.

' S I R, Cambridge, Sept. 21, 1672.

The letter which you directed to Stoake in answer to mine from thence, I received not; but your last, wherein you repeated the contents of that, I received and am troubled, that I have answered it no sooner; especially, since I was oblig'd to thank you for the Transactions of July, and more particularly for your elegant translation of my letter, published in them, and for the trouble you was pleas'd to take upon you in inquiring of Mr Cock about his telescope.

To comply with your intimation about communicating experiments, proper for determining the queries, which that letter contained, I drew up a series of such experiments in design to reduce the theory of colours to propositions, and prove each proposition from one or more of these experiments, by the assistance of common notions set down in the form of definitions and axioms, in imitation of the method by which Mathematicians are wont to prove their doctrines. And that occasioned my suspension of an answer, in hopes my next should have contained the same designe. But, before it was finished, falling upon some other business, of which I have my hands full, I was oblig'd to lay it aside, and now know not when I shall take it again into consideration. However, if the answer to Mr Hook's considerations will conduce to the determination of any of those quæres (as in some particulars I think it will) you may if you think fit publish it; to which end I desire you to mitigate any expressions that seem harsh, that it's publication, as you intimated, may be done to common satisfaction. And though I intend at present nothing farther for the publick, yet if to any of your private acquaintance, that endeavour to satisfy themselves by an experimental determination of these quæres, experiments sufficient to determine them

The first part of the letter from which the following extract is taken, relates to the dispute with Mr Hook, which see in remark [M] of his article. The conclusion respects No. 121. of the Philosophical Transactions, and runs thus:

' By Mr Gascoign's letter one might suspect that Mr Linus tried the experiment some other way than I did, and therefore I shall expect, 'till his friends have tried it, according to my late directions, in which trial it may possibly be a farther guidance to them, to acquaint them that the prism call from it several images. One is that oblong one of the colours, which I mean, and this is made by two refractions only. Another there is, made by two refractions and an intervening reflexion, and this is round and colourless, if the angles of the prism be exactly equal; but if the angles at the reflecting base be not equal, it will be coloured, and that so much the more, by how much unequal the angles are, but not much unround unless the angles be very unequal. A third image there is made by one single reflexion; and this always round and colourless: The only danger is in mistaking the second for the first: But they are distinguishable not only by the length and lively colours of the first, but by it's different motion too; for whilst the prism is continually turned the same way about it's axis, the second and third move swiftly, and go always on, the same way, 'till they disappear; but the first moves slow and grows continually slower 'till it be stationary and then turns back again, and goes back faster and faster, 'till it vanish in the place where it began to appear. If without darkening their room they hold the prism at their window in the sun's open light in such a posture, that it's axis be perpendicular to the sun-beams, and then turn the prism about it's axis, they cannot miss of seeing the first image; which having found, they may double up a paper once or twice, and make a round hole in the middle about half or three-quarters of an inch broad, and hold the paper immediately before the prism, that the sun may shine on the prism through that hole; and the prism being stay'd and held steddily in that posture which makes the image stationary, if the image then fall directly on a opposite wall or on a sheet of paper placed at the wall, suppose fifteen or sixteen foot from the prism or further off, they will see that image in such an oblong figure as I have described, with the red at one end, the violet at the other, and a blueish green in the middle; and if they obscure the room as much as they can, by drawing curtains or otherwise, it will make the colours the more conspicuous.

This direction I have set down, that nobody, into whose hands a prism shall happen, may find difficulty or trouble in trying it, but when Mr Linus's friends have tried it thus, they may proceed to repeat it in a dark room with a less hole made in their window shut. And then I shall desire that they send you a full and clear description how they tried it, expressing the length, breadth, and angles of the prism, it's position to the incident rays and to the window shut, the bigness of the hole in that shut through which the sun shined on, the prism, what side of the prism the sun shined on, and at what side the light comes out of it again, the distance of the prism from the opposite paper or wall, on which the refracted light was cast perpendicularly, and the length, breadth, and figure benefaction would be received with all imaginable gratitude: but, steeped as they were in error, the discovery seems to have been construed into a reproach of their ignorance; and they suffered for it. By this specimen, the great inventor clearly saw what would be the consequence of giving the rest of his Theory, where he knew there must appear so many yet more amazingly severe truths. For this reason he laid up his optical lectures, after he had prepared them for the press with a design to publish them. And as he had referred for the demonstrations of some things therein, to his Analysis per æquationes numero terminorum infinitas, his intention was, the lectures should be accompanied with it: for which purpose he had revised and enlarged it, and cast it into a better form; he had likewise illustrated it with a great variety of examples, and set the whole method of Fluxions entirely in a new light. However, he had not completed his whole design, before the decree against publication was passed; for he had thought of adding the manner of resolving such problems as could not be reduced to quadratures, which he never completed [I]. In this conduct our author evidently acted against his own fame; but of the space there illuminated by that light, and the situation of each colour within that figure. And if they please to illustrate the description with a scheme or two, it will make the business plainer. By this means, if there be any difference in our way of experimenting, I shall be the better enabled to discern it, and give them notice where the failure is, and how to rectify it. I should be glad too, if they would favour me with a description of the experiment, as it hath been hitherto tried by Mr Linus, that I may have an opportunity to consider what there is in that, which makes against me. And because Mr Gascoign seems to suspect, that my directions sent Mr Linus differ from what I have printed, I desire also that he would signify wherein he thinks they differ so as to need reconciling: fuller they are; but not different, nor any other than I have followed above these seven years. As for my suspicion, that Mr Linus might possibly rely on old experiments, his quoting Sir Kenelm Digby for a bystander, might have made any other stranger to his way as well as me suspect it; but I wonder most at Mr Gascoign's insinuation, as if I influenced the press in what concerns Mr Linus and me. You know, Sir, I never spoke nor hinted a syllable to you concerning printing or not printing any thing of Mr Linus, nor so much as knew of the printing his first letter, 'till it was out in the Transactions. When you sent it to me, I out of a great desire to avoid controversies (which as you know I had entertained long before) wrote back to you, that I had no mind to meddle with it. But as I was ready to seal that letter, I added a postscript to this purpose; that seeing Mr Linus was designing something about light for the press, to prevent publishing his mistake, you might if you thought fit signify to him (but not from me) that the experiment was tried otherwise than he suggested, and that in such and such respects, which I there named. And the substance of this postscript was that you published at the end of his first letter, on which Mr Gascoign here animadvert, but was so far from being designed for the press by me, that the first sight of it, together with his letter in the Transactions, made me say to one, that I wished they had been suppressed, for I doubted the printing of them would make Mr Linus unquiet, and so in the end create me trouble. As for his second letter which you shewed me at London, I returned it again to you, so soon as I had read it, and never saw it since, persisting in my desire to avoid the controversy. And at my returning it, you moved me for an answer with this argument, that if I wavered it, Mr Linus was like to make the more stir; to which I replied, that the business being about matter of fact was not proper to be decided by writings, but by trying it before competent witnesses. Whereupon, at your motion, I told you what was requisite, and by your procurement preparations were accordingly made for it's trial, at the next assembly of the Royal Society, as I understood by Mr Hook. But the day proved cloudy, and before another assembly I returned to Cambridge, and from that time never enquired after, nor regarded, the matter farther 'till you sent me Mr Linus's third letter. This is the history of Mr Linus's business, so far as I know't; which I have set down, that his friends may see he has not been dealt with obliquely, as they seem to apprehend. All I think that they can object to you is, that you were at a stand, because you could not engage me in the controversy, and to me, that I had no mind to be engaged; a liberty every body has a right to, and may gladly make use of, sometimes at least, and especially if he want leisure, or meet with prejudice or groundless insinuations. But I hope to find none of this in Mr Gascoign. The handsome genius of his present letter makes me hope it for the future. In the mean time I desire, with him, that you would publish Mr Linus's letters, as soon as you can conveniently, to prevent further misapprehensions.

S I R,

I am

Your obliged humble servant.

If. Newton.

' Pray, Sir, let not my papers go out of your hands, 'till you hear from me about registering them. In printing my former letter to Mr Linus, you may leave out what I mention of Mr Hill and Mr Hook, or at least put letters for their names; for I believe they had rather not be mentioned.'

' S I R,

I received both yours and thank you for your care in disposing those things between me and Mr Linus. I suppose his friends cannot blame you at all for printing his first letter, it being written I believe for that end and they never complaining of the printing of that, but of the not printing that which followed, which I take myself to have been, per accidens, the occasion of, by refusing to answer him. And though I think I may truly say I was very little concerned about it, yet I must look upon it, as the result of your kindness to me that you was unwilling to print it without an answer.' — dated January 25, 1675-6 (10).

[I] Which he never completed. In a letter to Mr John Collins, dated Cambridge, May 25, 1672, Mr Newton writes thus. 'Your kindness to me in proposing to promote the edition of my lectures which Dr Barrow told you of, I reckon among the greatest, considering the multitude of business in which you are involved. But I have now determined otherwise of them, finding already by that little use I have made of the press, that I shall not enjoy my former serene liberty 'till I have done with it; which I hope will be so soon as I have made good what is already extant on my account. Yet I may possibly complete the discourse of resolving problems by infinite series, of which I wrote the better half the last Christmas, with intention that it should accompany my lectures; but it proves larger than I expected, and is not yet finished.'

In another letter to the same gentleman, dated Stoake, July 13, 1672, our author says, 'I think I told you that I had altered my resolution of printing my Dioptric lectures. And for the exercise about Infinite Series I am not yet resolved, not knowing when I shall proceed to finish it.'

In the following letter he writes also to the same effect to Mr Collins.

' S I R,

Cambridge, Sept. 5, 1676.

I received the packet you sent, and return you the manuscript papers with my thanks for them, and for Mr Freuill's book.

In your paper about Mr Gregory, I have presumed to race out two things, as you will perceive; the first, because, though about five years ago I wrote a discourse, in which I explained the doctrine of Infinite Equations, but that motive had little weight with him, when thrown in the ballance against the sweet enjoyment of an unruffled serenity of thought, a blessing which he valued above all the glory that Mathematics or Philosophy could heap upon him. In the account which he gave himself some years after of these proceedings, he says, 'I blamed my own imprudence, for parting with so substantial a blessing as my quiet, to run after a shadow (dd).'<sup>(11)</sup> Yet these disputes, vexatious as they were, did not hinder him from going on to finish his reflecting telescope, the most immediately useful part of his Opticks; and, observing that there was no absolute necessity for the parabolic figure of the glasses, since, if metals could be ground truly spherical, they would bear as great apertures as men would be able to give a polish to, he completed another instrument of this kind; which answering the purpose so well, as, though it was only six inches long, yet he had seen with it Jupiter distinctly round, as also his four satellites, and Venus horned, he sent it to the Royal Society at their request, together with a description of it, which was afterwards published in the Philosophical Transactions for March 28, 1672, No. 81. There are likewise, in the two immediately subsequent numbers, several further observations and particulars relating to this new invention, communicated by him in the view of seconding the design of the Society, to recommend it to some skilful artists for further improvement with respect to the two particulars which were still wanting, a proper composition of metal, and a good polish [K]. The same year, 1672, he published at Cambridge in 8vo.

Bernardi

Equations, yet I have not hitherto read it, but keep it by me; the last, because in my general method, mentioned in your fourth section, I have occasion to make use of no other way of extracting the roots of affected Equations, than that you are already acquainted with.

If you should have occasion to see Dr Pell, or (if he be not at London) to write to him at any time, pray present my service to him, and let him know, that I know not how far Mr Gregory has improved the method of Infinite Series; yet so far as I know any thing of it, I account it of no great advantage for resolving affected Equations (11) in numbers. Some use it may have sometimes this way, but I neither invented it, nor recommend it much for this end, but for extending Algebra to such sort of problems, as the common ways of computing extend not to. And therefore his method of resolving Equations interfering so little with mine, I could wish (even though they interfered much more) that he would not stay the publishing of mine, as I perceive by one of the papers you sent me he does, for I would not be an instrument of hindering the Publick so long, from enjoying a thing so valuable.

As for the paper I sent about Infinite Series, I know not whether it will be proper to print it; I leave it to your discretion. In my apprehension it may do as well to suppress it; but, if you think otherwise, I desire you would give me notice before it go to the Press, because of altering an expression or two. Mr Baker's patience, as well as his skill, I admire; his method, I see, is to find first, X, the sum of the four quantities, and then the quantities severally, which I think is the method you were suggesting to me at London. The other problem, I think, I told you required no art, but much calculation to resolve it, and therefore I have never thought of it since I saw you. There is nothing requisite to the solution but this; to find two equations expressing the nature of the two curve lines, supposing their bases coincident, and their ordinates parallel; and putting the same letter, suppose X, for the bases in both equations, and another letter, suppose Y, for the ordinates to exterminate one of those letters; for the resulting equation will give you the resulting valor of the other letter; which valors limit all the intersection points of the two curves.

I doubt I shall put you to too much trouble to transcribe Mr Leibnitz's letter (12), if it be so long; and therefore I shall desire you only to send me a general account of it, with such passages as you think may concern me, if there be any thing that concerns me.

S I R,

I am,

Your humble servant,

If. Newton.

[K] Wanting a proper composition of metal, and a good polish. The pains that our author took in this point, is a remarkable instance of that indefatigable industry, which contributed greatly in raising him so high above the common level of his fellow mortals. In two letters upon this subject, he writes to the following effect.

1. That for a fit metalline substance, he would give this caution; that whilst men seek for a white, hard, and durable composition, they resolve not upon such an one as is full of small pores, only discoverable by a microscope; for though such an one may, to appearance, take a good polish, yet the edges of those small pores will wear away faster in the polishing, than the other parts of the metal; and so, however, the metal seem polite, yet it shall not reflect with such an accurate regularity as it ought to do. Thus, tin-glass mixed with ordinary bell-metal, makes it more white, and apt to reflect a greater quantity of light; but withal it's fumes raised in the fusion, like so many aerial bubbles, fill the metal full of those microscopical pores. But white arsenic both blanches the metal, and leaves it solid, without any such pores, especially if the fusion hath not been too violent. What the stellate regulus of Mars, which I have sometimes used, or other such like substance will do, deserves particular examination. To this he adds this further intimation. That putty, or other such like powder, with which it is polished, by the sharp angles of it's particles fretteth the metal, if it be not very fine, and fills it full of such small holes as he speaks of; wherefore care must be taken of that, before judgment be given, whether the metal throughout the body of it be porous or not.

2. Not having tried, as he saith, many proportions of the arsenic and metal, he does not affirm what is absolutely best; but thinks there may conveniently be used any quantity of arsenic, equalling in weight, between the sixth and eighth part of the copper; a greater proportion making the metal brittle. The way which he used was this: He first melted the copper alone, then put in the arsenic, which being melted, he stirred them a little together, bewareing in the mean time not to draw in breath near the pernicious fumes. After this he put in tin; and again, so soon as that was melted (which was very suddenly) he stirred them well together, and immediately poured them off. He says not whether by letting them stand longer on the fire, after the tin was melted, a higher degree of fusion would leave the metal porous; but that he thought that way he proceeded to be safest. He adds, that in that metal which he sent to London, there was no arsenic, but a small proportion of silver, as he remembers, one shilling in three ounces of metal. But he thought withal, that the silver did as much harm in making the metal soft, and so less fit to be polished, as good in rendering it white and luminous. At another time, he mixed arsenic one ounce, copper six ounces, and tin two ounces; and this an acquaintance of his had, as he intimates, polished better than he did the other (13). These particulars were communicated to the Society, March 26, 1672, and on the 30th of that month, in answer to some objections that had been made by an ingenious French Philosopher,

Bernardi Varenii Geographia Generalis, in qua Affectiones Generales Telluris explicantur aucta & illustrata ab Is. Newton (e e). About this time he had likewise some thoughts of publishing Kinckhuysen's Algebra, but afterwards dropped that design [L]. In 1675, Mr Hooke laying he writes, 'That it was not improbable, but that there might be new ways of polishing found out, which would far excel those that are in use. I am very sensible, says he, that metal reflects less light than glass transmits.—But, as I have found some metalline substances to be more strongly reflective, and to polish better, and be freer from tarnishing than others, so I hope there may, in time, be found out some substance much freer from these inconveniences, than any yet known (14).'

(14) Ibid. p. 231.

After the second telescope of his making had been sent up to the Society, they gave Mr Cox, an Optic-glass-grinder, orders to make one after the same manner of contrivance, four foot long, which was executed: in the interim, being informed of it, he wrote to Mr Oldenburg, as follows, 'You will gratify me much, by acquainting me with the particular dimensions, fashion, and success of the four foot tube, which I presume Mr Cox, by this time, hath finished. And to inform myself of the advantages of the steele matter made use of; you will much oblige me if you can procure me a fragment of it. I suppose it is made by melting steel with a little antimony, perhaps, without separating the sulphureous from the metalline part of that mixture; and so, though it may be very hard and capable of a good polish, yet I suspect whether it be so strongly reflective as a mixture of other metal. I make this enquiry, because, if I should attempt any thing further in the fabric of the telescope, I would first inform myself of the most advantageous materials. On which account also, you will further oblige me, if you can enquire whether Mr Cox, or any other artificer, will undertake to prepare the metals, glass, tube, and frame, of a four foot telescope, and at what rates he will do it, so that there may remain nothing for me to do, but to polish the metals; a gross account of this will at present suffice, until I send you a particular one of the fabric of the instrument, if I resolve upon it (15).'

(15) Collection of Original Letters, ubi supra.

(16) Gregory's Catoptrics, appendix, p. 232.

But it is probable he dropt this design, as his conjecture concerning the metal of Cox's instrument proved true, so that neither Cox nor the Society were pleased with it, nor even with the polish of it; whereupon a trial was proposed to be made with the Lapis Osmundinus, a black stone that comes from mount Hecla in Iceland, and other materials, &c. (16). Yet it should seem they did not succeed, nor any other; since it is certain the invention lay dormant, 'till Mr Hadley made his Newtonian Telescope in 1723. The instrument, as constructed at present, is too well known to stand in need of a description, but this differing somewhat from that sent to the Royal Society by Sir Isaac, we shall for the satisfaction of the curious, give his own description of it. The instrument was composed of two metalline speculums; the one concave, instead of an object-glass, the other plane; and also of a small plano convex eye-glass. The structure is thus. The tube is open at the end which respects the object; the other end is close, where the said concave is laid; near the open end is a flat oval speculum, made as small as may be, the lens to obstruct the entrance of the rays of light, and inclined towards the upper part of the tube, where is a little hole, furnished with the said eye-glass; so that the rays coming from the object, do first fall on the concave placed at the bottom of the tube, and are thence reflected toward the other end of it, where they meet with the flat speculum, obliquely posited, by the reflection of which they are directed to the little plano-convex glass, and so to the spectator's eye, who looking downwards, sees the object which the telescope is turned to (17).

(17) Ibid. p. 216.

S I R,

This day fortnight I received your letter, accompanied with part of the remains of Mr Horrox's two tracts of Honorato Fabri, and four or five copies of a Synopsis of Mr Kersey's Algebra. For these, and Dr Wallis's Mechanics, together with many other civilities, I must acknowledge your obligingness and affection to me, and shall be ever ready to testify as much. Nor is your mathematical intelligence less grateful, for I am very glad that Dr Barrow's book is abroad; and that the world will enjoy the writings of the excellent Astronomers Mr Horrox and Hevelius, and those compleat Mathematicians Monsieur Huygens and Slufus.—The book here in the press is Varenus his Geography, for which I have described schemes; and I suppose it will be finished about six weeks hence. The additions to Kinckhuysen's Algebra (18), I have long since augmented with what I intended, and particularly with a discourse concerning Invention, or the way of bringing Problems to an Equation (19): and these are at your command. If you have not determined any thing about them, I may possibly hereafter review them, and print them with the discourse concerning Infinite Series.—The copies of the Synopsis of Mr Kersey's Algebra, I have communicated to our Mathematicians, but meet not with any subscriptions. However, to encourage the undertaking, I shall subscribe for one, and hope ere long to send you another or two.

(18) Ibid. No. XXII, XXIII.

(19) These were published afterwards in his Arithmetica Universalis.

For my tardiness in returning you this answer, I have no excuse, but that I staid four or five days in hopes to send you some of those subscriptions, and being intent upon the duty of this term, the time slipt on faster than I was aware of. But I promise myself by your so much testified friendship, that you will pardon it, and believe that I think myself really,

Your most obliged debtor,

I. Newton.'

In the following letter of July 13, 1672, cited also in the above note [K], Kinckhuysen's Algebra is mentioned again, among other curious particulars. 'I will enquire of some of our Bookfellers whether they will purchase Mr Pitts his copy of Kinckhuysen, and if not, I will send it you; in the mean time, I would know whether Mr Pitts thinks it would be more advantageous to print the author without alteration, or to insert those notes which you formerly saw, that I may accordingly send them with the copy, or detain them.

Mr Gregory's problem of finding the solidity of the second segment (20) of a sphere, and yours of finding the surfaces of inclined round solids, may be solved divers ways by Infinite Series, as I find by considering them in generall. But, I foresee, the calculations are intricate and unpleasant, which has made me neglect them, not thinking them worth transmitting to you.

(20) Comm. Epist. No. XXI, XXXVI.

If I ever applied Gunter's Sector to the resolving of affected Equations, it hath now slipt out of my memory. Possibly it might be Gunter's Line, which being set upon three or four several rulers, is of ready use for finding the two or three first figures of any affected Equation. But there is no difficulty in the invention. And if it be the same which you meane, you may command it.

The way of resolving Equations of five or six dimensions, by a locus linearis (21), was, I believe, by the intersection of that and a Conic Section, something after the manner that Des Cartes hath done it; but more conveniently, in my opinion, because the same locus linearis once described, will serve for the resolving of all Equations of those dimensions. And, as I remember, the calculations, to that intent, are shorter and less intricate.

I am at present in Northamptonshire, whither your letter was sent to me from Cambridge; but hope, within eight or nine days, to be at Cambridge to receive what you may send thither, if you shall have occasion to write to, laying claim to some of his inventions in his New Theory of Light and Colours, he asserted his right thereto with a becoming spirit [M]. And the year following, at the request of Mr Leibnitz, he wrote two letters to be communicated to him, wherein he explained his invention of infinite series, and took notice how far he had improved it by his method of fluxions, which, however, he still concealed; which he did at this time by a transposition of the letters into an alphabetical order, that make up the two fundamental problems of it. This was done, that he might be at liberty to alter his method in some things, in case any body else should find it out (ff). In the winter between 1676 and 1677, he found the grand proposition, that, by a centripetal force reciprocally as the square of the distance, a planet must revolve in an ellipsis about the center of force placed in the lower focus of the ellipsis, and with a radius drawn to that center describe areas proportional to the times (gg). In 1680, he made several astronomical observations upon the comet that then appeared, which, for some considerable time, he took not to be one and the same, but two different comets, against the suspicion of Mr Flamstead [N].

However,

In the third letter to Mr Collins, of Sept. 5, 1676. in note [K], above quoted, our author acquaints that gentleman, that he had now changed his mind with regard to Kinckhuysen, in these words. I have nothing in the press, only Kinckhuysen's Algebra I would have got printed here, to satisfy the expectations of some friends in London; but our press cannot do it. This, I suppose, is the book Dr Lloyd means; it is now in the hands of a Bookseller here to get it printed; but if it do come out I shall add nothing to it.

[M] He asserted his right with spirit. This spirit shews itself in the letters he wrote to Mr Oldenburg, on the occasion which may be seen in Mr Hook's article (22); but there is one passage worth taking particular notice of here, it is in the second letter, dated January 10. 1675-6, where our author observes, that he had told Mr Hook, the spring before, of the reflecting power of the æthereal superficies. This may serve to fix the time, nearly when, that most surprising discovery was first made. It is certain that he knew nothing of it in the spring of the year 1673, as appears from the letters which passed betwixt him and Mr James Gregory, about their different construction of the reflecting telescope; the latter confessing he was convinced by Sir Isaac's arguments, that oblique reflection caused more light than the direct; declared, however, he was not fully persuaded that it was more regular. 'I conceive, says he, that the rudely polished metal in an oblique position, causeth the image appear more distinct, because the oblique hideth the concavities, so that no rays come to the eyes but from the tops of the little tubercula, which are certainlie best polished; the other rays which confused the image, being kept away. But if the plate be exactly polished (I speak here as to sense), the position must be so oblique, before the insensible concavities can be hid, that the plane shall almost turn to the sight in a line.' To this our author returned the following answer. 'That a well polished plate reflects at the obliquity of 45 degrees more truly than direct ones, seems to me very certain; for the flat tubercula, or shallow vallies, such as may be the remains of scratches almost worn out, will cause the least errors, in the obliquest rays, which fall on all sides the hill, excepting on the middle of the fore-side and back-side of it; that is, where the hill inclines directly towards, or directly from the ray; for if the ray fall on that section of the hill, it's error is, in all obliquities, just double to the hill's declivity; but if it fall on any other part of the hill, it's error is less than double, if it be an oblique ray, and that so much the less, by how much the ray is oblique; but if it be a direct ray, it's error is just double to the declivity, and therefore greater in that case (23).' This letter is dated April 9. 1673. and is a plain proof that our Philosopher supposed, according to the received opinion at this time, that the reflection was caused by the rays striking immediately upon the surface of bodies.

[N] He made several astronomical observations upon the comet, which he took to be two comets, against the opinion of Mr Flamstead. In a letter for Mr Crompton to be sent to Mr Flamstead, our author writes as follows.—'I am farther suspicious, that the comets of November and December, which Mr Flamstead accounts one and the same comet, were two different ones; and I find Cassini, in a copy of a letter of his which Mr Ellis shewed me, is of my mind. If they were but one comet, it's motion was thrice accelerated and retarded. From November 18th to November 21st, it moved after the rate of almost 6 degrees a day; from November 23d to December 5th, after the rate of but 36 minutes a day; from December 6th to December 19th, after the rate of about 3 ½ degrees a day; from December 24th to December 26th, after the rate of almost 4 ½ degrees a day; from which time the motion decreased continually. This frequent increase and decrease of motion is too paradoxical to be admitted in one and the same comet, without some proof that there was but one; besides, it is very irregular, for after the 20th day of November, when the comet was in it's first position, as Mr Flamstead notes, and moved after the rate of about 6 degrees a day, that it's motion should suddenly decrease so much as that from November the 23d to December 5th, to move but 7 ½ degrees, and consequently in the middle part of that time (suppose at November 29th or 30th), to move at the rate of less than ½ a degree a day, and this while the comet is going towards the sun, and so has it's real motion continually accelerated, is very odd, and makes me question Father Gallet's observations, on which the supposition of but one comet leans. And then that the motion should as suddenly increase, so as from December 6th to December 12th, that is, in six days to move a sign and a half, and consequently in the middle of that time (suppose at December 9th), to move after the rate of 9 or 10 degrees a day at least, and this when the comet was gone much farther from us, is more odd than the former; not to mention the extravagant deviation from a great circle, and cutting the Ecliptic twice. There is one thing which increases this difficulty, Mr Flamstead, December 10th, observed the tail of the comet to point between the shoulder and tail of Aquila, draw a line from thence to the sun, and produce backwards the way, which the comet described afterwards, 'till it cut this line, and the intersection point will very nearly be the place of the comet December 10th; this point is scarce six degrees from the place of it December 12th, but about 40 degrees from the place of the comet observed by Father Gallet, December 6th, hora 18. that is, December 7th, at 6 o'clock in the morning; so that, if these comets were the same, it moved but 7 ½ degrees from November 23d to December 5th, that is, in 12 days; and then in it's recesses from the earth, advanced it's motion on a sudden, so as to move 40 degrees from December 7th in the morning, to December 10th at night, that is, in three days and an half; and again, on a sudden, in coming towards the earth, abated it's motion so as to move but 6 degrees or less, from December 10th to December 12th. The good agreement between Mr Flamstead's and the Parisian observations, proves them both sufficiently accurate; but I know not what to think of Father Gallet's. A scholar of our college, with some others, saw the comet in November; about the middle of December one of our Fellows sent for him, examined him about it, and he described to him, that it passed by Spica Virginis, towards the sun. About a month since I sent for him, and upon a strict examination he told me, that on Tuesday, November 16th, he saw the comet at 4 o'clock in the morning, two degrees above Spica, with a long tail extending to the Lyon's tail; the tail of a silver white colour, more white than the tail of the comet in December. I asked him if

However, the consequences of the theory of centripetal and centrifugal forces being the subject of much enquiry about this time, he received a letter from Mr Hook, explaining what it were directly over Spica, he said it declined a little towards one side, and but a little; and to the best of his remembrance it declined eastward. I asked him if it was not above two degrees from Spica, and if he was sure the star by it was Spica; he said the star was such a noted one, that he could not be mistaken in it; and for the distance it was hard by the star, so that he reckoned it but about two degrees from it, though he would not be positive but that it might be 4 or 5 degrees from it, a degree or two being easily mistaken in judging by the eye; but it was hard by Spica, and its tail was long, and reached to the bright star in the Lyon's tail. He said farther, that four days after, on Saturday, November 20th, he saw it again, a little before sun rise, advanced a good way from Spica towards the sun. Its tail was not now visible, except a few rays which went almost towards Spica. Nor did any stars but Spica appear, so that he could not say what fixed stars it was near, nor what its place was, only he thought it was not far from the Ecliptic; taking a little perspective out of his pocket, he viewed it, and saw it not like another star, but like a little round cloud. I was the more scrupulous in examining this scholar, because I know not what to make of these things, they not agreeing to the comet of December. And when he saw me at a puzzle, he was concerned, and added, that there were divers other scholars who saw it with him. Now how to reconcile the former part of this relation with Father Gallet, I know not, unless either he, or the scholar, have mistaken a day or two. And yet they will not agree; for by the position of the tail in the scholar's first observation one may conclude, that the comet was then on the north side of the Ecliptic, and crossed not the Ecliptic 'till after the 20th degree of Libra; whereas Father Gallet makes it cross in the 8th degree. Further, one of our fellows, Dr Babington, between the 20th and 27th of November, and to the best of his memory, about the 22d or 23d day, at five a-clock in the morning, or between five and six, saw the tail of the comet shoot over King's college chapel, from east to west; it was a frosty morning, and a very clear and starry sky; the head of the comet he saw not; the tail ran from one end of the chapel to the other, just above the chapel rising a little higher at the west end than at the east. By considering the place where he stood, the chapel there appears about 20 degrees long, and stands almost full south, declining a little to the west. So that the tail shot a good way beyond the Meridian westward, suppose 12 or 16 degrees at least, and was 20 degrees long, besides that part of the tail which ran from the east end of the chapel to the head of the comet, which seems to have been between 20 and 30 degrees more. The chapel there appears about 7 or 8 degrees high, and consequently the tail shooting just over the chapel, as he described it to me, could not be above 10 or 12 degrees high where it cut the Meridian, nor above 14 or 16, or at most 18 degrees high, at the west end; whence it may be gathered, that it shot on through the beak of Corvus, close under the cup, to some degrees beyond the cup, or thereabouts; and consequently, that the head (which was either under the Horizon, or so near it, that the Doctor could not see it for buildings), was advanced considerably farther in southern latitude than Father Gallet makes it at any time; and so probably within a few days after, this might go so far southward as to be seen by us no more. At least it may hence be suspected, that Gallet's last observations make the south latitude something too little; perhaps, if enquiry be hereafter made of those which come from beyond the Line, something further may be learned of this comet. And if Mr Flamsteed examine Cuthbeard, and others, who saw it in November, he may, perhaps, gather something from them. One circumstance there is for evincing two comets, that in November had a brighter head than the other, as the scholar aforesaid told me; and this circumstance evinces, that it was easily seen November 29th, when day-break was so far advanced, that neither the tail, nor any stars, but those of the first magnitude, could be seen. Mr Flamsteed ingeniously gives a reason why comets usually verge from south to north, but I suspect the phenomenon. Those which go southward are seldom discovered 'till they be ready to cross the Ecliptic, and then turning their tail downwards are obscured by the thick air near the Horizon, so as to be little seen afterwards; which makes them rarely noted by the vulgar, or recorded by the Ancients, who set down only the more famous ones. Since comets have been more strictly looked after, there have as many gone southward as northward. For of the nine comets which appeared in the years 1647, 1652, 1661, 1664, 1665, 1666, 1667, 1680, five, if I mistake not, went southward, namely, those of the years 1647, 1665, 1666, 1667, and the former of the year 1680; and, I think, I may add a sixth one of those two, which, anno 1652, were seen in the West-Indies, whereof but one was seen in our parts. So then more comets have of late gone southward than northward, and yet these appeared so little to us, that had they been in former ages, scarce any but that of 1665 would have been recorded. Mr Flamsteed gives an ingenious guess at the reason of the comet's atmosphere, by supposing the comet covered over with water, and consequently more vapours raised than in our planets; but our earth is half covered over with water, and so is the moon in a manner, and were they covered all over, their atmospheres therefore would not be more than doubled; whereas the comet's atmosphere is some hundreds, not to say thousands, of times greater in proportion to the body. And the atmosphere being so vast, it is most probable that near the body of the comet it is thicker and grosser than ours in the most foggy misty days we have; and consequently, that the sun never shines distinctly through it, nor we distinguish the more and less lucid parts of the body through it. For if the atmosphere was so thick that the limb of the body could not be seen through it distinctly, much less could the fainter and smaller lineaments of land and sea, which even in our planets (Jupiter, Mars, Venus, &c.), whose atmospheres are fine and thin, and limbs appear distinct, is scarce discernable. This is the sum of what I can think of, to object which, I presume Mr Flamsteed will not be displeas'd with, it being an advantage for any man to have a prospect of what objections lie against him before he divulge his thoughts, that so he may frame and propound them in the best manner; besides these things, which seem obnoxious to some objections, there are some other parts of his theory, which I easily approve, and think it will be hard to object against, as that the tail of the comet is a thin vapour; that it rises from the atmosphere about the head; that the action of the sun's light conduces to raise it; that it shines not by its own light, but only by reflexion of the sun's light; and that the atmosphere about the head shines also by the sun's light, though not altogether by it. But I am too tedious. I would gladly know, whether on December 12, when Mr Flamsteed first espied the head of the comet, he could see it so near the sun with his naked eyes, or only through glasses, and to a star of what magnitude he thinks it might then be compared. Also, whether he allowed for refraction in computing its place at that time; also, what stars the middle of the tail passed through, and was directed towards, upon the 10th, 11th, 12th, 15th, and 21st days, for I did not then mind it. I am told the tail on the 12th day, went to the bill of Cygnus; on the 15th to the Ancon Ala Austrinae Cygni, but Mr Flamsteed can inform me better. I would gladly know what day also he saw the comet with little glimpses of light sparks, and whether he saw it so any more, before or after, and what variations he observed in the body, as to its light and dark parts. Cyfalus and Hevelius describe great and perpetual variations, but I had rather rely on Mr Flamsteed's authority. I would enquire also, whether the said lucid points in the body were also over the head, or only in that hemisphere towards the sun; and whether he could perceive that hemisphere towards the sun any more lucid than the opposite hemisphere; and what he

what must be the line described by a falling body, supposed to be moved circularly by the diurnal motion of the earth, and perpendicularly by the power of gravity; wherein he shewed, thinks of Hevelius's observations of the phenomena of the head. But I fear I shall be troublesome. On Friday last I saw the comet near the western of the two stars, in the left foot of Perseus; and last night I saw it again. It passes in a line about half a degree to the north side of the two stars, and Saturday was got over against the western of them.—I noted it's position to the telescopic stars, but have not yet determined the position of the stars, one among another, and so cannot yet be accurate in describing it's place. But by this gross description Mr Flamsteed will easily find it, if he have not yet seen it since the last moon; but it is now grown so faint, that to see it well, he must give his glass a large aperture. After another clear night or two he may command the observations I have made since the last full moon, together with those I shall further make, to compare with his own if he please. In the beginning of January the whole coma of the comet seemed to me to be about 12' or 15' broad; but I could not observe the diameter of the body, or nut, in the center of the coma, if Mr Flamsteed observed it, the communication would be grateful. But chiefly, I would beg of him a description (in words) of the position of the tail to the fixt stars, December 10th, 11th, 12th, 15th, and 21st; for by a thought which came into my mind to day, I hope there may be something gathered from that. I have been too tedious, and shall add no more, but my thanks to Mr Flamsteed for the kind communication of his philosophical notions.

The following letter was likewise wrote upon the same occasion, and is a further confirmation of what is asserted in the text.

S I R, Trinity College, April 16, 1681.

It is now almost three weeks since, upon my return from a journey, I received yours. By some indisposition, and other impediments, I have deferred answering you longer than I intended. For I was desirous to return you quicker thanks for your kind communications. The compliments you are pleased, out of extreme kindness, to give me, might better have suited with yourself from me; nor do I think it suits with me to judge of an hypothesis after your thoughts upon it. I only propounded objections for you yourself (if you had not thought on them before) to judge farther of it by, which therefore being designed only for your use, I forbear to urge farther, and shall only speak to the question of two comets. The mistake about the date in Pere Gallet's observations, was in the copy I received of them. In the title it was writ stylo veteri; and accordingly the observations, all but the two last, were altered from the new style to the old one, and put November 17, 18, 21, 24, 25, December 6, 7. and the like alteration from the new to the old style had the French observations under them. I perceive that the scholar, in his observation on the transit of the comet by Spica, was mistaken in the time, he recollected it only by circumstances, and, it seems, told me November 16th for November 19th. In your argument from the elongations, if you estimate the motion of the comet not in the Ecliptic, but in the line of it's proper motion (as I think should be done), you will find some difference between November and December, but that is not material, the apparent celerity depending on the earth's distance from the comet at those times, and so whether equal or unequal being but accidental. You seem to think the way of the comet wider than in your scheme, and so do I; for I apprehend the comet in Mr Halley's and your first observations, December 8, 10, 11, and 12, to have been remoter from us than the sun, and about January 2. to have been as far from the sun as the earth was, and it's heliocentric place then to have been Gemini 9 degr. with north latitude 19 or 20 degr. or thereabouts. But you are afraid the long tail will not admit the comet's passing beyond VOL. V. No. 269.

the sun: I apprehend nothing from thence; for I am told the tail extended beyond the sphere of Mars during the whole appearance of the comet, and so was long enough to appear in the beginning of December, as long as it did. Nor was the apparent length of it, at that time, any way enormous, but consonant to the law it observed all December; for the tail all that month (and by my observation some time in January) ended at a great circle which cut the Ecliptic in Sagittarius 19 1/2 degrees, at an angle of about 52 degrees. Now if the December comet was beyond the sun in the beginning of December, the comets of November and December could hardly be the same for this reason. Let EDF represent the line of the comet moved in; S the sun; CD the axis of that line passing through the sun; D it's vertex, or perihelion of the comet; and AB the plane of the Ecliptic crofied by the axis in S. By contemplating the figure, you will perceive the vertex or perihelion D, was on the south side the Ecliptic; and consequently since the comet crost the Ecliptic about the third, or at latest the fourth of December, it was in D a little before that time, viz. above half a day before, for the angle DSB was about 6 or 8 degrees at least, but in conjunction with the sun it was December 9. So then in passing from D to conjunction, there were scarce less than six days spent. But in the hypothesis the point D was opposite to the earth about December 7, and consequently December 9, was so near to opposition, that is, to conjunction with the sun, that the comet in passing thence to conjunction could not have spent many hours. Again, drawing GSH perpendicular to CD, GS being equal to SH should have had as much latitude in H as in G. In passing from conjunction to G it must have spent much more time than in passing from D to conjunction, and consequently, could not have been in G before the 12th day, if so soon; and so in G had 8 or 9 degrees north latitude at least. But in H by the Roman observations, as they are adapted to the hypothesis, could not have above a degree south latitude. If the comet turned short of the sun, suppose in the line PQR, the difficulties are thereby something diminished, but I think not taken off. The point d, or vertex of the figure described by the comet, was in conjunction with the sun December 7, the comet in conjunction December 9; therefore the comet's conjunction happened on that side d towards b. The comet was in b (like the point where it crost the Ecliptic) December 3, or 4, therefore it spent five or six days in passing from b to a point between b and d, which space, by the hypothesis, is yet so little that the comet could not spend many hours in passing it. And I think too, the south latitude, though it could not be so great as the north, yet it ought to have been greater than the Roman observations, November 26 and 27, make it. But whatever there be in these difficulties, this sways most with me, that to make the comets of November and December one, is to make that one paradoxical. Did it go in such a bent line, other comets would do the like, and yet no such thing was ever observed in them, but rather the contrary.

shewed, that it would not be a spiral line, but an eccentrical ellipsoid, supposing no resistance in the medium; but, in case of resistance, it would be an eccentric ellipti-spiral, which, after many revolutions, would rest in the center at last; and that the fall of the body would not be directly east, but to the south-east, and more to the south than the east (b b). This letter put Mr Newton upon enquiring what was the real figure in which such a body moved; and this enquiry gave occasion to his resuming his former thoughts concerning the moon (i i). And Ricart having not long before, viz. in 1679, measured a degree of the earth, by using his measures the moon appeared to be retained in her orbit purely by the power of gravity, and consequently that this power decreases in the duplicate proportion of the distance, as he had formerly conjectured. Upon this principle he found the line described by a falling body to be an ellipsis, the center of the earth being one focus; and finding by this means, that the primary planets really moved in such orbits as Kepler had guessed, he had the satisfaction to see, that this enquiry, which he had undertaken at first out of meer curiosity, could be applied to the greatest purposes. Hereupon, he drew up near a dozen propositions relating to the motion of the primary planets about the sun, which were communicated to the Royal Society in the latter end of the year 1683 (k k). The best mathematical wits were engaged upon this subject; and, among others, Mr Halley, in 1682-4, having proved the duplicate proportion in general from Kepler's sesquialterate ratio, found himself, as well as the rest, not able to carry the demonstration through all the particulars. Thus baffled, he applied first to Sir Christopher Wren and Mr Hook; but meeting with no satisfaction from them, restless as he was to push if possible this pursuit, as well as all others, in which he heartily engaged to a degree of perfection, he took a journey in August to Cambridge, in order to consult Mr Newton. Our author presently informed him, that he had absolutely completed the much desired demonstration; and Mr Halley receiving it from him in November, made him

(b b) In a letter to Dr Halley, dated July 27, 1686, Sir Isaac acknowledges he learnt this from Mr Hook, and says it was the only thing he did learn, upon the combination of these two motions, from him. Original Letters.

(i i) Preface to Dr Pemberton's View of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy.

' The comets of 1665, 1667, and others, which moved towards the sun, or some of them at least, had they twisted about the sun, and not proceeding on forward, gone away behind him, they would have been seen again coming from him. The many which have been seen advancing from the sun, or some of them at least, would have been seen in the former part of their course advancing towards him, had that former part been performed not in the line of the latter part, shooting on backwards towards the regions beyond the sun, but twisting about him towards any hand. Those which were seen both before and after their perihelions, as the comets of 1472, 1556, 1580, and 1664, would not, as they did, have begun in one part of the heavens and ended in the opposite part, going through almost a semi-circle, with motion first slow, then swift, then slow again, as if done in a right line, had it been done in such a line as the hypothesis puts. Let but the comet of 1664 be considered, where the observations were made by accurate men. This was seen long before it's perihelion, and long after, and all the while moved (by the consent of the best Astronomers) in a line almost straight; so near was the line to a straight one, that Monsieur Azout, on supposition that it was an arch of a great circle about the Dog-star (as Cassini guessed, and Azout was willing should be believed), or rather a straight one (as (24) the obviousness of the hypothesis, easiness of the calculation, and number of observations on which it was founded, makes me suspect), did from these observations predict the motion to the end, without very considerable error. But you ask why the comet of November staid so long in the same southern latitude, if it turned not back? I am not satisfied that it did so. I fear it would be hard to warrant any of the observations of that comet to less than a degree; and why then might it not have, in the time of the Canterbury observation, between one and two degrees north latitude, and afterwards crossing the Ecliptic about the beginning of the Roman observations, as Gallet makes it, and from thence advancing continually southward, arrive to between one and two degrees of south latitude, at the end of the Roman. Your observation of December 12, by your last correction, is become much more agreeable to the phenomenon of the tail, than before, and yet I fear is not altogether right. I suspect (if you are sure there was no error committed in taking it's distance from Venus) that Venus had some minutes more longitude than in your reckoning. In your observations last sent, the comet of January 10, is put in Taurus 20 degrees, 42'; in a former copy in Taurus 20 degrees, 49'  $\frac{1}{2}$ . That of Taurus 20 degrees, 49'  $\frac{1}{2}$ , seems to correspond best with your other observations. The Parisian observations compared with your's seem to have too much longitude, namely, December 29, by about 6'; January 4 and 6, by about 3' or 4'; January 8, by 7' or 8'; January 13, by 12'. The greatest difference being in January 13, it may, perhaps, be worth your while to examine your own observations of that day before you publish it. I made an observation about that time, which, though inferior in accurateness to either of your's, yet may possibly give some light into the difference between you. Namely, January 11, I observed at  $\frac{1}{2}$  an hour past 7, that the comet, the first of the 3 stars in the mouth of the North Fish, noted  $\zeta$  by Bayerus, and the bright star in the north horn of Taurus, were in a right line; and so were the comet, and the bright stars in the shoulder and head of Andromeda. At half an hour past eight, the said star, in the mouth of the fish, was distant about 12'  $\frac{1}{2}$ , or 13' from the comet; and that distance subtended an equicrural rectangular triangle, whose equal sides comprehending the right-angle, were the line which the comet described by it's motion, and a perpendicular let fall from the said star in the Fish's mouth on that line; whence the sides of the triangle were about 9', as I also judged by observation. At 9 a-clock the comet and said star, in the Fish's mouth, had equal altitude. At half an hour past ten, a perpendicular let fall from the star on the line described by the comet, fell on the comet; whence the comet was then in it's least distance from the star, which distance by observation was about 9'. These distances I measured, only by viewing the comet and star, through a three foot perspective which magnified much, and comparing their distance to the whole space the perspective took in (for at that time I had no better way), though afterwards when the comet grew dimmer, I fitted a 7 foot tube, with a screw compass, by which I traced it 'till March the 9th. If the place of the said star in the Fish's mouth, were accurately known (as it may be a month or two hence), the place of the comet, in the time of these observations, would readily be given. And I think, in the observation, I erred not in a minute, at most not 2'; but whether it be worth the while for adjusting that little difference between you and the Frenchmen, to observe the place of the star, I know not. Sir, with my repeated thanks to you for your kind communications,

I rest,

Your most affectionate friend and servant,

him a second visit at Cambridge, where he got his consent with some difficulty to have it entered in the register books of the Royal Society [O]. After which, by Mr Halley's importunity, and the request of that Society, our author was prevailed with to finish the work. The third book being only a corollary of some propositions in the first, was then drawn up by him in the popular way, with a design to publish it in that form with the other two (ll). But the manuscript being presented with a dedication to the Royal Society, in April 1686, Mr Hooke very injuriously insisted upon his having demonstrated Kepler's problem before our author [P]; whereupon, rather than be involved again in controversy, he determined

[O] His demonstration was entered in the register books of the Royal Society.] The reason of Sir Isaac's unwillingness to have it registered seems to be, that he had not yet finished his whole design, as appears from the following passage in a letter from him to Mr Aston, then Secretary, dated at Cambridge, Feb. 23, 1684-5, where he writes thus: 'I thank you for entering in your register my notions about motion; I designed them for you before now, but the examining several things has taken a greater part of my time than I expected, and a great deal of it to no purpose: and now I am to go into Lincolnshire for a month or six weeks, afterwards I intend to finish it as soon as I can conveniently.'

In this letter our author mentions a design of erecting a philosophical society at Cambridge, which had been pushed forward by Mr Paget*, when he was last there, with whom himself had concurred, and engaged Dr [Henry] More to be of the society; and that others were spoken to partly by him, and partly by Mr Charles Montague †. 'But that, adds he, which chiefly dashed the business, was the want of persons willing to try experiments; he, whom we chiefly relied on, refusing to concern himself in that kind. And more, continues he, what to add further about this business I know not, but only this, that I should be very ready to concur with any persons for promoting such a design, so far as I can do it without engaging the loss of my own time in those things (26). It must be observed also, that part of this time was taken up in reading private lectures in Mathematics, to a select company of students, in his own chamber (27).

[P] The manuscript being sent to the Royal Society, Mr Hooke insisted on his having demonstrated Kepler's problem before our author.] We have the following particulars of this affair, at a meeting of the Royal Society, April 28, 1686, Sir John Holkyns being desired to take the chair. 'Dr Vincent presented to the Society a manuscript treatise, intitled, Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica, and dedicated to the Society by Mr Isaac Newton, wherein he gives a mathematical demonstration of the Copernican hypothesis, as proposed by Kepler, and makes out all the phenomena of the celestial motions, by the only supposition of a gravitation towards the center of the sun, decreasing as the squares of the distances therefrom reciprocally. It was ordered that a letter of thanks be written to Mr Newton, and that the printing of his book be referred to the consideration of the council; and that in the mean time the book be put into the hands of Mr Halley, to make a report thereof to the council (28). In pursuance to this order, at another meeting, May 19, Sir Joseph Williamson, Vice-President, in the chair, it was ordered that Mr Newton's Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica, be printed forthwith, in quarto, in a fair letter; and that a letter be written to him to signify the Society's resolution, and to desire his opinion as to the print, volume, cuts, &c. Accordingly Mr Halley wrote to him, on the 22d of May, the following letter:

S I R,

Your incomparable treatise, intitled, Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica, was, by Dr Vincent, presented to the Royal Society on the 28th past, and they were so very sensible of the great honour you have done them by your dedication, that they immediately ordered you their most hearty thanks, and that the council should be summoned to consider about the printing thereof. But by reason of the President's attendance upon the King ||, and the absence of our Vice-Presidents, whom the good weather has drawn out of town, there has not since been any authentic council to resolve what to do in the matter, so that on Wednesday last, the society in their meeting, judging that so excellent a work ought not to have its publication any longer delayed, resolved to print it at their own charge, in a large quarto, and a fair letter; and that this their resolution should be signified to you, and your opinion thereon be desired, that so it might be gone about with all speed. I am intrusted to look after the printing of it, and will take care that it shall be performed as well as possible ‡; only I would first have your directions in what you shall think necessary for the embellishing thereof, and particularly, whether you think it not better, that the schemes should be enlarged, which is the opinion of some here; but what you signify as your desire, shall be punctually observed.

There is one thing more that I ought to inform you of, viz. that Mr Hooke has some pretensions upon the invention of the rule of the decrease of gravity being reciprocally as the squares of the distances from the center. He says, you had the notion from him, though he owns the demonstration of the curves generated thereby, to be wholly your own. How much of this is so, you know best; as likewise what you have to do in this matter. Only Mr Hooke seems to expect you should make some mention of him in the preface, which it is possible you may see reason to prefix. I must beg your pardon, that it is I that send you this ungrateful account; but I thought it my duty to let you know it, that so you might act accordingly, being in myself fully satisfied, that nothing but the greatest candour imaginable is to be expected from a person, who has of all men the least need to borrow reputation.

'I am, &c. (29).'

(29) Ibid. p. 484.

This injury was warmly repented by Mr Newton, who, in answer to it, gave an account of what passed, in the letters between him and Mr Hooke; and having expressed his satisfaction in Mr Halley's care and proposals about printing his book, the latter in return sent him a proof of the letter and paper intended for it. To which our author, in a letter dated from Cambridge, June 20, 1686, having sufficiently exposed the vanity of Mr Hooke's pretensions (30) he concludes in these terms: 'The proof you sent me I like very well, I designed the whole to consist of three books; the second was finished last summer, being short, and only wants transcribing, and drawing the cuts fairly. Some new propositions I have since thought on, which I can as well let alone. The third wants the theory of comets. In autumn last, I spent two months in calculations to no purpose for want of a good method, which made me afterwards return to the first book, and enlarge it with diverse propositions, some relating to comets, others to other things, found out last winter. The third I now design to suppress. Philosophy is such an impertinently litigious lady, that a man had as good be engaged in law-suits, as have to do with her. I found it so formerly, and now I am no sooner come near her again, but she gives me warning. The two first books, without the third, will not bear so well the title of Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica; and, therefore, I had altered it to this, De Motu Corporum, libri duo. But, upon second thoughts, I retain the former title. 'Twill help the sale of the book, which I ought not to diminish, now 'tis yours. The articles are with the largest to be called by that name, if you please you may change the word to sections, though it be not material. In the first page, I struck out the

to suppress the third book, 'till his friends prevailed upon him to alter that resolution. However, he was now convinced, that it would be best not to let it go abroad without strict demonstration. The book was put to the press by the Society soon after Midsummer 1686, under the care of Mr Halley, then Assistant-Secretary; and it came out about Midsummer 1687, under the title of Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica. From hence it appears, that this treatise, full of such a variety of profound inventions, was composed from scarce any other materials than the few propositions beforementioned [2] in the

To this Mr Halley returned an answer, June 29, which begins thus:

' S I R,

' I am heartily sorry that in this matter, wherein all ' mankind ought to acknowledge their obligation to ' you, you should meet with any thing that should ' give you disquiet; or that any disgust should make
' you think of desisting in your pretensions to a lady,
' whose favours you have so much reason to boast of.
' 'Tis not she, but your rivals envying your happiness,
' that endeavour to disturb your quiet enjoyment;
' which when you consider, I hope, you will see ' cause to alter your resolution, of suppressing your
' third book, there being nothing which you can ' have compiled therein, which the learned world ' will not be concerned to have concealed. Those ' gentlemen of the Society, to whom I have com' municated it, are very much troubled at it, and ' that this unlucky business should have happened to ' give you trouble, having a just sentiment of the ' author thereof.' He then proceeds to give some ' convincing proofs, that Mr Honke was not before ' him in the demonstration, as he pretended, and that ' some of Mr Hooke's particular friends had even ' quarrelled with him for giving this disturbance by
' those pretensions, and that all were of opinion Mr
' Newton ought to be considered as the first inventor
' (31). 'What application he [Hooke] has made in ' private, continues Mr Halley, I know not; but ' I am sure that the Society have a very great satis' faction, in the honour you do them, by the dedica' tion of so worthy a treatise. Sir, I must now
' again beg you, not to let your resentments run so ' high, as to deprive us of your third book, wherein ' the applications of your mathematical doctrine to
' the theory of comets, and several curious experi' ments, which, as I guess by what you write, ought ' to compose it, will undoubtedly render it acceptable ' to those, who will call themselves Philosophers with' out Mathematics, which are much the greater num' ber. Now you approve of the character and paper,
' I will push on the edition vigorously. I have some' times had thoughts of having the cuts neatly done in ' wood, so as to stand in the page with the demon' strations. It will be more convenient, and not ' much more charge. If it please you to have it so, ' I will try how well it can be done; otherwise I will ' have them in somewhat a larger size, than those you ' have sent up.

' I am,

' S I R,

' Your most affectionate humble servant,

' E. Halley (32).'

Our author yielded to these earnest solicitations at length, and his second book being sent to the Society, accompanied with a letter from him, was read, March 2, 1686-7. The third book was also produced and presented to the Society, April 6, following. It contained, say these minutes, the whole system of celestial motions, as well of the secondary as primary planets, with the theory of comets; which he illustrates by the example of the great comet of 1680-1, proving that, which appeared in the morning, in the month of November preceding, to have been the same comet, that was observed in December and January in the evening (33).

[2] Was composed from scarce any other materials than the few propositions aforementioned.] We have already seen, in the preceding remark, from a letter of Mr Newton to Mr Halley, that the theory of comets was not completed 'till the beginning of the year 1686, and the following letters must needs be acceptable, as they contain several particulars relating to the investigation of that theory.

S I R,

I have been a great while indebted to you many thanks for your communications, and particularly for your last, about Saturn; but imagining I should have occasion to trouble you again, I deferred, that I might not cumber you with more letters than were necessary. I have not yet computed the orbit of a comet, but am now going about it, and taking that of 1680 into consideration, it seems very probable that those of November and December were the same comet. But I am at a loss in the observations you sent me of a Canterbury artificer made on Friday morning, November 11, the comet being then in Virgo 12, with 2 degrees north latitude. But November 11. fell on Thursday, and in Cassini's treatise of this comet the day of the month is November 13. If you have the day noted down, I beg the favour you would assure me which it is. I have a transcript of your observations, but comparing them with Cassini's edition of them, I find some difference. Thus, December 21, in my transcript, the time of the observation is 6h. 31'; in one of your letters, dated January 3, which I have by me 'tis 4h. 30'; and in Cassini's edition 5h. 0'. December 24, in my transcript, the longitude Pifces 13°. 10', the latitude 28°. 10'; in Cassini's edition the longitude Pifces 13°. 10', the latitude 28°. 12'. December 30, in my transcript, the time of it 8h. 4'. the longitude Pifces 17°. 39', the latitude 28°. 12'; in Cassini's edition the time is 8h. 30', the longitude Pifces 17°. 51', the latitude 28°. 14'. I have therefore sent you a copy of my transcript of your observations, begging the favour that you would correct it by your originals, and then return it to me again. And if you think any of them more exact than others, pray do me the favour to set a mark at those. I would also gladly know, whether the time you set down in these observations be the equated time, or only the true time by the sun's course. My calculation of the orbit will depend only on three observations; and if I can get three at convenient distances exact to a minute or less, I hope the orbit will answer exactly enough, not only to the observations of December, January, February, and March, but also, to those of November, before the comet was conjoined with the sun. I observe, that in the French observations, by neglecting to allow for the motion between the times of the two observations, from whence the comet's place is calculated, there is sometimes an error of two or three minutes created. I perceive by your tide-tables you have been curious upon that subject, which makes me hope that you can tell me how much the perpendicular rise and fall of the spring-tides, about the solstices, is greater than the like rise or fall of the neap or quarter tides, at the same time of the year; and also how much the one is greater than the other, at the equinoxes. I beg the favour also, that you would set the longitudes and latitudes to the stars in the other inclined paper, and also the distances to the stars on the other side the same paper, as many of them as you have ready by you; and note the times your longitudes are adjusted to. Pray add also the places and distances of the three stars in the mouth of Equuleus, called by Bayerus  $\gamma$  and  $\delta$ , whereof  $\gamma$  is a double one.

To Mr Isaac Newton.

S I R, The Observatory, Sept. 25, 1685.
Yours of the 19th instant came to hand on Tuesday last, I am very glad to find by it, that you have the motions of comets under consideration. Hitherto, we have only groped out the lines of their motion. If they may be reduced to a theory, it will be very welcome news to us. As for the Canterbury observation, it is a very coarse one; I discoursed with the person that made it, but found him a very ignorant well willer; yet, I believe his observations as good as those of Cellio, made at Rome, which, if I forget not, I sent you, I have here, included, given you part of a letter, I received from him concerning it, whereby you will find the time, November 12th, at 5 hours mane, which is the 11th, 17 hours p. m. which clears the business. But for the place and latitude it was got by setting of the distances on the globe. You may see by one, whether the set distances give that place: by my small globe the latitude seems something bigger, near 3 degrees north. I have a German tract of Zimmerman's, wherein he gives the place of the comet, observed November 22d, 13h. 17'. in virgo, 7 $\frac{1}{4}$  degr., of latitude south 2 $\frac{1}{2}$  degr.; and Nov. 23d, 18h. 5', in Scorpius 11 $\frac{3}{4}$  degr.; with 3 $\frac{1}{4}$  gr. latitude also south. He esteems this the same we saw in December, occidental; and these notes of his differ not more than a degree or two from Cellio's. When the comet appeared in December Mr Halley was at Paris; and to render his conversation more acceptable to our friends in their observatory, I sent my observations of it, with it's places deduced from them as I observed them. The calculations were usually made the next morning, after the observation. When I had lost the comet, in the following March, coming to examine the observations over again, I found the times had been misstated, sometimes a minute or two, but not often more, and that the effects of refraction ought to have been considered in some places where I had neglected them. I therefore repeated every calculation allowing for refractions, and thence made the following table of it's places and latitudes, with which you will not wonder to find some few minutes different from the former I sent you, or what I imparted to Mr Halley and to Mr Cassini, printed from my letters to him. I have not examined any of the French observations to compare them with my own. The radius of their instruments wherewith their distances were taken, was not half mine, and for want of convenient contrivances they are difficult to manage, as both Mr Halley and Mr Molyneux, who have seen them, inform me; so that I esteem them better than any besides published; yet I have no great opinion of them; for towards the latter end of it's appearance, the comet was very difficultly observable, in the telescopes on my sextant that are seven foot long; much more must it be in theirs, that are scarce three. I have not yet attempted to rectify the places of the fixed stars, by reason that I am not furnished with so good an instrument as I desire, for observing their true distances from the pole. I have long been kept in hopes of an allowance for one; at last, being tired with expectation, I made an arch of 135 degrees; near seven foot radius, for this purpose, at my own expence. It cost me near twenty pounds; but for want of substance and workmanship, which I could not allow, it answers not my expectation so fully, or well, as I desired; so that next spring I am resolved to make another of the same dimensions, in which my dear bought experience has shewn me how the faults of this may be amended. Nevertheless, when the comet appeared, I rectified for many stars as I had made use of in my observations, by my own measures taken with the sextant, which I am confident are much better than the Tychonic. These I give you here, if you have absolute occasion for more about a fortnight hence, I shall be at leisure to calculate them. At present, I am preparing for a journey to my parsonage, about twenty-two miles from hence, where I shall stay about ten days. I hope to be at home again by Tuesday fortnight, I find but few of the distances, you desire, in my books of observations. One of my assistants is ill, the other having been but a little time with me is not very expert: I expect my first here to morrow, or Sunday night, and then I shall measure those you want, which will be soon done, because they all lie very conveniently in the evenings. If I have clear weather you may expect them before I go into the country about Tuesday or Thursday next. I esteem the places of the comet in my catalogue all equally exact. I employed the same care in taking all the distances; and the calculations were all twice repeated. In the first observation, November 12, the comet was about 7 $\frac{1}{2}$  degrees high; in which altitude some persons may think the refractions variable; but I don't think the alteration easily sensible; for though I have had very different refractions in the horizon, yet when the sun was three degrees high, I always found the refraction fourteen minutes, not sensibly more or less; and if it be constant here, much more at twice the height. I have not minded the French observations, nor considered, whether they had allowed for the motion of the comet betwixt two observations. I took a course that always provided for that allowance. For, after I had measured it's distance from any two stars, I always repeated it from the first, and afterwards calculating it's place to the time of the middle observation, by the help of two extremes, found it's true distance from the first star at that time; not omitting such allowance for refraction as I saw reasonable. I shall give you one night's notes of it, whereby you will easily apprehend what care and circumspection I used in my process.

From these observations, I state the true distance of the comet at 5h. 54'. (the middle time betwixt the extreme observations) from the wing of Pegasus 18°. 48'. 00". allowing 20" for the contraction of that distance by refraction, and from the bright star of Aries, at that time 18°. 13'. 40". whence I find it's place, as in tablet it is given. I may add, that considering the distances observed from the star  $\Omega$  in Andromeda, and comparing their difference in 2h. 42" (interlapsed between the first and last of them) with the comet's true motion in the same time, it is evident the parallaxis was very small, if not insensible. forry I cannot give you a regular answer as concerning our tides. Though I was at the pains to attend a 100 high waters, yet I could never satisfy myself when the floods were highest, and the ebbs lowest, of all the year. Only, I am confident, it was not in the equinoctial months, but rather in October and February, in which unsettled months the great freshes caused by the rains, and the raging winds at sea, will raise the floods much above the ordinary pitch. Sometimes, we have had two floods in twelve hours, and the tides, after they have ebbed two or three feet will flow again. This commonly happens when we have violent storms, and ill weather at sea. The least floods happen when it is pinch water, a little before two o'clock; the highest spring-tides betwixt four and five. I suspect some irregularity in the tides, as they happen by night or day; but my habitation is so remote from the water, I cannot conveniently observe them. 'Tis, therefore, only a suspicion, which may be corrected when I can observe them more conveniently.

To Mr Flamstead.

I have your two letters, and return you my hearty thanks. Your observations of the comet being so exact, will save me a great deal of pains. I shall have no need to give you farther trouble at present, but after a while, I believe I may have occasion to beg your farther assistance. My question about the flux and reflux of the sea, was concerning the quantity, not the time; viz. how much the afflux or perpendicular ascent of the water is greater at the new and full moon than at the quarters, about the time of the solstices, when the spring-tides are least; and also how much the one is greater than the other, about the time of the equinoxes, when the spring-tides are greatest. But, I fear this being no part of your design, you have not observed it.

To Mr Flamstead.

I thank you heartily for your information about those things I desired. In my observations about the comet, I was only careful of the proportions of the distances, from small stars to those between the stars. Afterwards, I believe, I made some mistake in the reduction to minutes and seconds; for the observations in many cross distances filled one another well. Your information about the Satellites of Jupiter gives me very much satisfaction. The orbit of Saturn is defined by Kepler too little for the sesquialterate proportion. This planet, so often as he is in conjunction with Jupiter, ought (by reason of Jupiter's action upon him) to run beyond his orbit about one or two of the sun's femidiameters or a little more, and almost all the rest of his motion to run as much, or more within it; perhaps that might be the ground of Kepler's defining it too little. But I would gladly know, if you ever observed Saturn to err considerably from Kepler's tables about the time of his conjunction with Jupiter. The greatest error, I conceive, should be either the year before conjunction, when Saturn is 3 or 4 signs from the sun in consequentia, or the year after, when Saturn is as far from the sun in antecedentia. You seem to insinuate, as if Saturn had not yet any more Satellites than one discovered by Hugenius. I should be glad to know if it be so. And one more favour I would beg, that if you have any observation of the greatest elongations of any of the Satellites of Jupiter from his center (chiefly that of the outmost Satellite), in degrees and minutes, you would communicate it to me, with the time of the observation*. For I would gladly know the proportion of the orbits of the Satellites to that of Jupiter as exactly as I can. And if you have any such observation of the greatest elongation of the Satellite of Jupiter, I would also beg the favour of that.

S I R,

A good new year to you.

I am,

Your most obliged friend to serve you,

If. Newton.

S I R,

Whilst I was concerned that you should be so long without the sight of those papers, I received a letter from Mr Pagit, by which I understood he has been laid up sick of an ague. I am writing to him to transmit the papers to you as soon as he has a convenient opportunity. In my last I made an allowance for the distance of Jupiter and Saturn one from another, diminishing their virtue in a duplicate proportion of the distance. But yet I spake there but at random, not knowing their virtues 'till I had your numbers for Jupiter, by which I understand his virtue is less than I supposed. But, I am still at a loss for Saturn. I have not at all minded Astronomy for some years, 'till on this occasion, which makes me more to seek. I cannot meet with Hugenius's book of Saturn. Mercator, and another or two which I have consulted, leave me as wise as I was. I find Saturn's ring is, to his body, in breadth, as 9 to 4; and Hugenius makes the ring in Saturn's nearest distance 68th long at most, that is, in his mean distance from the sun about 1'. But it is the dimension of the orbit of the Satelles about him that I want. Now I am upon this subject, I would gladly know the bottom of it, before I publish my papers. I believe you can tell me what Hugenius's measures are, or, if there have been any other since assigned more equally. For by Hugenius's large measures of Jupiter, I suspect he may have assigned the apparent diameter of the ring of Saturn too large. Your information about the error of Kepler's tables for Jupiter and Saturn, has eased me of several scruples. I was apt to suspect there might be some cause or other unknown to me, which might disturb the sesquialtera proportion; for the influences of the planets seemed not great enough, though I imagined Jupiter's influence greater than your numbers determine it. It would add to my satisfaction, if you would be pleased to let me know the long diameters of the orbits of Jupiter and Saturn, assigned by yourself and Mr Halley in your new tables, that I may see how the sesquialtera proportion fills the heavens, together with another small proportion which must be allowed for. I thank you for the places of the comet from the French observations, to the days you mentioned. I do intend to determine the lines described by the comets of 1664 and 1680, according to the principles of motion observed by the Planets, and should be glad of your help as to those places of the latter, if I shall not give you too much trouble.

S I R,

Your kind salutation of me by Mr Phillips is an addition to the several testimonies you have given me of your good will, and I cannot forbear to acknowledge it with thanks. He tells me, he apprehended by some of your discourses, that you had seen two of Cassini's new planets about Saturn. Hugenius, with a especially with regard to the famed vortices of Des Cartes, which, though irrefragably refused herein, still had their abettors. The last edition, with still further improvements by the author, was published at London in 4to. under the care of Henry Pemberton, M. D. *. This book, in which our author has built a new system of Natural Philosophy upon the most sublime Geometry, did not meet at first with all the applause it deserved, and was one day to receive (nn). Two reasons concurred in producing this effect: Des Cartes had then got full possession of the world [R]; his Philosophy was, indeed, the creature of a fine imagination (ov), gaily dressed in a tempting metaphorical style (pp); he had given her likewise some of Nature's true features, and painted the rest to a seeming of Nature's likeness with a smiling countenance; besides, whatever she said was very easily understood, and thus she yielded herself up, without any great difficulty, to her votaries. Upon these accounts, people in general even took unkindly an attempt to awake them out of so pleasing a dream. On the other hand, Mr Newton had, with an unparalleled penetration, pursued Nature up to her most secret abodes, and was intent to demonstrate her residence to others, rather than anxious to point out the way by which he arrived at it himself. He finished his piece in that elegant conciseness, which had justly gained the Ancients an universal esteem. Indeed, the consequences flow with such rapidity from the principles, that the reader is often left to supply a long chain to connect them; therefore it required some time before the world could understand it: the best mathematicians were obliged to study it with care before they could be masters of it, and those of a lower rank durst not venture upon it, 'till encouraged by the testimonies of the most learned. But, at last, when it's worth came to be sufficiently known, the approbation which had been so slowly gained became universal, and nothing was to be heard from all quarters but one general shout of admiration (qq). 'Does Mr Newton eat, or drink, or sleep, like other men, says the Marquis de l'Hôpital, one of the greatest Mathematicians of the age, 'to the English who visited him; I represent him to myself as a celestial genius, entirely disengaged from matter (rr).' The general subject of the Principia is the doctrine of motion, which is the most considerable of all others for establishing the first principles of Philosophy by geometrical demonstrations. The undertaking was begun by Des Cartes; but, taking up with gross experiments (ss) without examination, he derived his conclusions too hastily: Mr Newton both saw the mistake, and at the same time how extremely difficult it would be to avoid it; but he had the resolution to make the attempt, and he alone had strength to complete the execution. To this end, by experiments made with the most accurate exactness, and observed with the nicest circumspection and sagacity, he first discovers what are the real phenomena of motion arising from the natural powers of gravity, elasticity, the resistance of fluids, and the like; whence he rises, by the help of his own sublime Geometry † [S], to investigate the true forces of these powers in nature, and

I was glad to hear two of them confirmed by your observation. There is another thing laid to be observed of Jupiter by Cassini long since, namely, that his diameter from pole to pole is shorter than from east to west. If this were certain, it would conduce much to the stating the reason of the precession of the Equinox. But, I shall trouble you no further, than to assure you that,

[R] Des Cartes had then got full possession of the world. Dr Barrow, in his Opuscula (35), observes, that Des Cartes was undoubtedly a very good and ingenious man, and a real Philosopher; and one who seems to have brought those assistances to that part of Philosophy which relates to matter and motion, which perhaps no other had done that is, a great skill in Mathematics; a mind habituated both by nature and custom to profound meditation; a judgment exempt from all prejudices and popular errors, and furnished with a considerable number of certain and select experiments; a great deal of leisure; entirely disengaged by his own choice from the reading of useless books, and the avocations of life; with an incomparable acuteness of wit; and an excellent talent of thinking clearly and distinctly, and expressing his thoughts with the utmost perspicuity.

[S] By the help of his own sublime Geometry. In the second lemma of the second book our author lays down the principles of Fluxions, which he demonstrates in the synthetical manner. And Mr Leibnitz

Calculus Differentialis, at the end of which are the following words. Et hæc quidem initia sunt Geometriæ ejusdem sublimioris ad difficillimam ac pulcherrima quæque etiam mixtæ matheseos problemata pertingentis, quæ sine calculo differentiali aut simili non temere quisquam pari facilitate tractabit. Mr Newton added to that lemma the following scholium. In literis quæ mihi cum Geometra peritissimo G. G. Leibnitio annis abhinc decem intercedebant, cum significarem me esse compositem methodi determinandi maximas & minimas, ducendi tangentes, & similia peragendi; quæ in terminis surdis æque ac in rationalibus procederet; & literis transpositis hanc sententiam involventibus [data æquatione quotcunque fluentes quantitates involvente Fluxiones invenire & vice versa], eandem celarem: rescripsit vir clarissimus se quoque in ejusmodi methodum incidisse, & methodum suam communicabat, à meâ vix abludentem præterquam in verborum & notarum formalis. Utriusque fundamentum continetur in hoc lemmate. By this passage our author lets the world understand, that in the letters which he wrote to Mr Leibnitz 10 years before (36), that is, June 13, and October 24th, 1676, he had informed him of his method, before Leibnitz had mentioned his own, which he did not do 'till eight months after, viz. June 21, 1677. Here then our author expresses clearly his right to that invention, and the modest stile in which it is drawn up makes it so much more remarkable (37). To this sublime Geometry is to be ascribed the peculiar elegance of those speculations in this book, where he treats of pendulums as moved by a gravitation acting in the law, which he shews to belong to the earth, below it's surface, performing in this kind of gravitation where the force is proportional to the distance from the center; what Mr Huygens had before done in the common supposition of it's being uniform and acting in parallel lines. Huygens, at the end of his treatise de la Pausanteur, p. 169, & seq. informs us, that he had carried his speculations on the first of these suppositions, of the resistance in fluids being proportionable to the velocities and then from those forces demonstrates the other phenomena: particularly in settling the system of the heavens, he demonstrates mathematically in the first book what are the genuine effects of central forces, in all hypotheses whatsoever that can be framed concerning the laws of attraction; then, from Kepler's rules [T], and other astronomical and geographical observations, he shews what the particular laws of attraction are in nature, and proves, that this attraction is every where the same as the terrestrial gravity, by the force of which all bodies tend to the sun, and to the several planets. Then, from other demonstrations, which are also mathematical, he deduces the motion of the planets, the comets, the moon, and the sea. In the height of all these profound philosophical researches, just before his Principia went to the press, the privileges of the university being attacked by King James the Second, our author appeared among the most hearty defenders, and was, accordingly, on that occasion, appointed one of the Delegates to the High-Commission Court (tt) [U], where the steady defence they made was so unexpected by the Court, that the King thought proper to drop the affair. After this, he was chosen one of the university representatives for the Convention-Parliament in 1688 (uu), where he attended 'till its dissolution. Mr Montague, afterwards Earl of Halifax, sat likewise for the first time in that Parliament, and, being bred at the same college (ww), was well acquainted with our author's abilities; and undertaking the great work of recoining the money when he became Chancellor of the Exchequer, he obtained of the King for Mr Newton, in 1696, the office of Warden of the Mint. This post put him in a capacity of doing signal service in that affair, which was of so great importance to the nation. And three years after he was promoted to be Master of the Mint, a place, communibus annis, worth twelve or fifteen hundred pounds a year (xx), which he held 'till his death. Upon this promotion, he appointed Mr William Whiston, then Master of Arts of Clare-Hall, his deputy in the Mathematical Professorship at Cambridge, giving him the full profits of the place, and not locities of the bodies, as far as our author; but finding by experiment that the second was more conformable to nature, he afterwards made some progress in that, 'till he was stopt by not being able to execute to his wish, what related to the perpendicular descent of bodies; not observing that the measurement of the curve line he made use of to explain it by depended on the hyperbola; which oversight may well be pardoned in that great man, considering that our author had not been pleased, at that time, to communicate to the public his discourse of the quadrature of curves, founded on the method of fluxions; for without the use of that treatise, it is, I think, no injury even to our author's unparalleled abilities, to believe it would not have been easy for himself to have succeeded so happily in this, and many other parts of his writings (38).

[T] Kepler's rules.] These rules, founded upon the observations of Tycho Brahe, were three, 1. That the same planets described about the sun equal areas in equal times. 2. That in different planets the squares of the periodic times were as the cubes of the transverse axes of their orbits. 3. That their orbits were undoubtedly oval, and probably ellipses, the sun being the common focus. From the first phenomenon our author demonstrated, that the planets were attracted towards the sun in the center. From the second, that the force of this attraction was reciprocally as the squares of the distances of the planets from his center; and then from this duplicate proportion he demonstrated the truth of Kepler's conjecture: in the third, that these orbits were actually ellipses, the sun being placed in the lower focus. We have been more particular in explaining this matter, because Monsieur Fontenelle has given a very perplexed, not to say an erroneous, account of it (39); neither is it clearly stated by his remarker, in the Republic of Letters, for the year 1738.

[U] Appointed one of their Delegates to the High-Commission Court, where they made such a defence, that the court drops the affair.] We have the following account of this matter from Bishop Burnet (40). 'The King sent his letter of Mandamus to order F. Francis, an ignorant Benedictine Monk, to be received Master of Arts, once to open a way for letting them into the degrees of the University. The truth is, the King's letter was scarce ever refused in conferring degrees; and when Ambassadors or foreign Princes came to those places they usually gave such degrees to those who belonged to them as were desired. The Morocco Ambassador's Secretary, that was a Mahometan, had that degree given him; but a great distinction was made between honorary degrees given to strangers, who intended not to live among them, and those given to such as intended to settle among them. For every

Master of Arts having a vote in the Convocation, they reckoned that if they gave this degree, they must give all that should be pretended to, on the like authority, and they knew all the King's priests would be let in upon them, which might occasion, in present, great distraction and contention among them, and in time they might grow to be a majority in Convocation, which is their Parliament. They refused the Mandamus with great unanimity, and with a firmness that the Court had not expected from them. New, and repeated orders, with severe threatenings in case of disobedience were sent to them; and this piece of railery was every where set up, that a Papist was reckoned worse than a Mahometan, and the King's letters were less considered than the Ambassador from Morocco had been. Some feeble or false men of the university tried to compound this matter, by granting this degree to Father Francis, but enacting at the same time, that it should not be a precedent for the future, for any other of the like nature; this was not given way to. For it was said, that in all such cases the obedience that was once paid, would be a much stronger argument for continuing to do it as oft as it should be desired, than any such proviso could be against it. Upon which the Vice-Chancellor was summoned before the Ecclesiastical Commission to answer this contempt.'

Thus far that Bishop, who not being educated in England, may the rather be excused in not knowing the exact difference between an honorary, and a faculty degree. The first being merely titular, conveys no civil right whatsoever, not even that of voting in the Convocation (41), or (as it is called at Cambridge) the Senate, though such Graduates should, and often do, reside in the University. For this degree, none of the ordinary conditions being required, it is absurd to suppose it given upon a Mandamus, by which the King dispenses with those ordinary conditions, and upon that account such a degree is equal in every respect to one that is conferred according to the ordinary rules, and consequently is a faculty to which there are several privileges annexed in the Law. It was understood by the King's order, that this faculty of Master of Arts should be conferred upon Father Francis, and that he should actually enjoy the full extent of it, without taking the oaths of Allegiance and Supremacy. It was this additional dispensation with the oaths, which the University thought to be an infringement of their legal rights; and the point was handomely maintained by the Delegates (42), who urged, not only, that not a single instance could be produced in favour of it, but likewise, that his Majesty's predecessor, King Charles II. upon the like representation to this, which was now made by the University, had been pleased to withdraw his Mandamus (43).

(41) Convocation; this is the name given to it in the Oxford statutes.

not long after procured him to be his succesor in that post (yy). The Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris having this year made a new regulation for admitting foreigners into their society, Mr Newton was immediately elected a member of that Academey. In 1703, he was chosen President of the Royal Society, in which chair he sat for twenty-five years, without interruption, 'till the day of his death. In 1704, he published at London in 4to, his OPTICS: or, A Treatise of the Reflections, Refractions, Infections, and Colours, of Light. He had now at times employed thirty years, in bringing the experiments to that degree of certainty and exactness, which alone could satisfy himself. In reality, this seems to have been his most favourite invention. In the speculations of infinite series and fluxions, as also in his demonstrations of the power of gravity in preserving the system of the world, there had been some though distant hints given by others before him [W]; whereas, in the dissecting a ray of light into it's first constituent particles, which then admitted of no farther separation; in the discovery of the different refrangibility of these particles thus separated, and that these constituent rays had each it's own peculiar colour inherent in it; that rays falling in the same angle of incidence have alternate fits of reflection and refraction; that bodies are rendered transparent by the minuteness of their pores, and become opaque by having them large; and that the most transparent body, by having a great thinness, will become less pervious to the light: in all these, which made up his New Theory of Light and Colours, he was absolutely and entirely the first starter; and, as the subject is of the most subtle and delicate nature, he thought it necessary to be himself the last finisher of it*. The art of making experiments to a certain degree of accuracy is far from being a common attainment. The most trifling fact that falls under our notice, is complicated with so many others which compose or modify it, that it requires the utmost sagacity even to guess at the particular ingredients of such a composition, and the nicest dexterity to distinguish them from each other. The facts to be examined must be resolved into others which are themselves compounded, and sometimes if we happen to mistake our way, we are led into endless and inextricable labyrinths. The truth is, the affair that chiefly employed his researches for so many years, was far from being confined to the subject of light alone: on the contrary, all that we know of natural bodies seemed to be comprehended in it; he had found out, that there was a mutual action at a distance between light (yy) See Memoirs of W. Whiston, p. 293. Mr Whiston was chosen Professor in 1703. Ibid. p. 346.

* Accordingly, the truth of it has not been controverted since, as has been already observed in Mr Maclaurin's article.

[W] There had been some, though vague hints given by others before him.] With respect to the first, besides what we have already observed* of Mr Fermat's method, which was seen by our author in Schooten's Commentary upon Cartes's Geometry, it is undoubtedly certain that Mr Newton's momenta, in his analytical investigations, were originally considered by him in a sense little, if at all, different from Cavalierius's Indivisibles.

• In rem. [C].

These are his words, Nec veror loqui de unitate in punctis sive lineis infinite parvis, si quidem proportionales ibi jam contemplantur Geometricum dum utitur methodis indivisibilium (44). Cavalierius himself strove to avoid the supposing magnitude to consist of indivisible parts, and to abstract from the contemplation of Infinites. Quoad continui compositionem manifestum est ex praestentis id ipsum ex indivisibilibus componendum nos minime cogi: solum enim continua sequi indivisibilium proportionem & de converso probare intentum fuit, quod quidem cum utraque positione stare potest. Tandem vero dicta indivisibilium aggregata non ita pertractavimus, ut infinitatis rationem propter infinitas lineas seu plana subire videantur. Method Indivisib lib vii. p. 167. Thus he was sensible of the difficulties, as well as advantages, that attended his method, and even speaks as if he foresaw that it would be afterwards delivered in an unexceptionable form, that might satisfy the most scrupulous Geometrician; and leaves this Gordian knot, as he expresses himself, to some Alexander †.

(44) Commentarium Esistelicum, No. XI.

† Sir Isaac was this Alexander †, for, by considering his momenta as indeterminate quantities, whose proportions (not their magnitudes) are determined, he first opened a direct road thro' Infinites into the sublime Geometry.

The nature and genesis of Logarithms, which our author was acquainted with when he first invented Infinite Series and Fluxions (45), is also proposed by the inventor Lord Neper, in a method which has an affinity to that of Fluxions. My Lord begins his treatise on this subject by defining, that a line increases equally, when the point that describes it moves over equal spaces in equal times thus, Sit punctum A, a quo ducenda sit linea fluxus alterius puncti qui sit P; sicut ergo primo momento P ab A in C, secundo momento a C in D, &c. Miris Logar. Canon. descript. defin. 1. He afterwards lays down this postulate, Quum quolibet motu & tardior & velocior dari possit, sequitur necessario cuique motui aequivocelem, quem nec tardiozem nec velociorem definiturum, dari posse. Let A, says he, be the term from which the line is to be described by the flux or motion of the point P; let it flow from A to C in the first moment, or in any small part of the time; from C to D in the second moment; from D to

E in the third; and so on for ever, describing always the equal parts, A C, C D, D E, E F, &c. in equal times this line is then said to increase equally.

By his second definition a line decreases proportionally, when the point that moves over it describes such parts in equal times, as are always in the same constant ratio to the lines from which they are subducted, or to the distances of that point at the beginning of those times from a given term in the line. Linea proportionaliter in breviora decrescere dicitur, quum punctum eam transfurans equalibus momentis segmenta abscondit ejusdem continuo rationis ad lineas a quibus absconduntur. Ibid. defin 2.

Let the ratio of Q R to Q S be any given ratio, let a c b e to a o, c d to c o, d e to d o, e f to e o, f g to g o, &c. be always in the same invariable ratio of Q R to Q S; suppose that the point sets out from a, describing a c, c d, d e, e f, and f g, &c. in equal parts of the time; and let the space described by p in any given time, be always in the same ratio; the distance of p from o at equal succeeding intervals of time, are in a continued geometrical progression. Suppose now, that the uniform motion of the point P in describing the line A B is equal to the motion with which p sets out from a in describing the line a o; and the line A B (that is described by P with this uniform motion, in the same time that o a by decreasing proportionally becomes equal to o p) is the logarithm of o p. Thus, A C, A D, A E, A F, &c. are the logarithms of o c, o d, o e, o f, &c. respectively; and o a is the quantity, whose logarithm is supposed to be equal to nothing. Logarithmus cujusque sinus, est numerus quam proxime definiens lineam q. a. equaliter crevit, interea dum sinus totius lineae proportionaliter in illum sinum decrevit, existente utroque motu synchrono atque aequivoce. Ibid.

In the next place, as to his system of the universe, besides what our author himself has said in his letters to Dr Halley ||, 'tis well known that Des Cartes made some conjectures concerning the duplicate proportion upon which that system is founded.

light and other bodies, by which both the reflections and refractions, as well as inflections, of the former were constantly produced. To ascertain the force and extent of this principle of action, was what had all along engaged his thoughts. [X], and what, after all, by it's extreme [X] Was what had for the greatest part of the time engaged his thoughts.] His hypothesis concerning the action of the æther, in explaining the properties of light and colours, was first sent to the Royal Society, Dec. 7, 1675, as has been already mentioned on another occasion*. December 14, he wrote the following letter from Cambridge to Mr Oldenburg, about the action of the same æther, observable in the phenomena of Electricity.

* Viz. In rem. [M] of Mr Hooke's article.

The notice you gave me of the Royal Society's intending to see the experiment of glass rubbed, to cause various motions in bits of paper underneath, put me upon recollecting myself a little farther about it; and then remembering that if one edge of the brass hoop was laid downward, the glass was as near again to the table as it was when the other edge was laid downward, and that the papers plaid but when the glass was nearest to the table: I began to suspect that I had set down a greater distance of the glass from the table than I should have done. For in setting down that experiment, I trusted to the idea I had of the bigness of the hoop, in which I might easily be mistaken, having not seen it of a long time. And this suspicion was increased by trying the experiment with an object-glass of a telescope, placed about the third part of an inch from the table; for I could not see the papers play any thing near so well as I had seen them formerly; whereupon I looked for the old hoop with it's glass, and at length found the hoop, the glass being gone, but by the hoop I perceived, that when one edge was turned down the glass was almost the third part of an inch from the table, and when the other edge was down, which made the papers play so well, the glass was scarce the 8th part of an inch from the table. This I thought fit to signify to you, that if the experiment succeed not well at the distance I set down, it may be tried at a less distance, and that you may alter my paper, and write in it an 8th part of an inch, instead of  $\frac{1}{2}$  or  $\frac{2}{3}$  of an inch. The bits of paper ought to be very little, and of thin paper, perhaps little bits of the wing of a fly, or other light substances may do better than paper. Some of the motions, as that of hanging by a corner and twirling about, and that of leaping from one part of the glass to another, without touching the table, happen but seldom; but it made me take more notice of them.

Pray present my humble service to Mr Boyle when you see him, and thanks for the favour of the converse I had with him at spring. My conceit of trepanning the common æther, as he was pleased to express it, makes me begin to have the better thoughts in that he was pleased to entertain it with a smile. I am apt to think, that when he has a set of experiments to try in his air-pump, he will make that one, to see how the compression, or relaxation of a muscle will shrink or swell, soften or harden, lengthen or shorten it (46).

As for registering the two discourses, you may do it; only I desire you would suspend 'till my next letter, in which I intend to set down something to be altered, and something to be added in the hypothesis, being in the mean while,

S I R,

Your humble servant,

If. Newton.

This letter was followed by another, containing among other things, a more particular direction for trying the experiment of glass rubbed to cause various motions, mentioned in his former letter of December 14, 1675.

Upon your letter, I took another glass 4 inches broad, and  $\frac{1}{4}$  of an inch thick, of such glass as telescopes are made of, and placed it  $\frac{1}{8}$  part of an inch from the table. It was set in such a piece of wood as the object-glasses of telescopes used to be set in; and the experiment succeeded well. After the rubbing was still, and all was still, the motion of the papers would continue sometimes while I counted 100; every paper leaping up about 20 times more or less, and down as often. I tried it also with two other glasses, that belonged to a telescope, and it succeeded with both; and I make no question, but any glass will do, that be excited to electric virtue, as I think any may. If you have a mind to any of these glasses you may have them, but, I suppose, if you cannot make it do in other glasses, you will fail in any I can send you. I am apt to suspect that the failure was in the manner of rubbing, for I have observed, that the rubbing variously, or with various things, alters the case. At one time I rubbed the aforesaid great glass with a napkin twice as much as I used to do with my gown, and nothing would stir, and yet presently rubbing it with something else, the motion soon began. After the glass has been much rubbed too, the motions are not so lasting, and the next day I found the motions and difficulties to excite more than the first. If the society have a mind to attempt it any more, I can give no better advice than this; to make a new glass not yet rubbed, perhaps too one of the old ones may do well enough, after it has lain still a while, and let this be rubbed not with linnen, nor soft nappy woollen, but with stuff, that the threads may rake the surface of the glass; suppose tamerine, or the like, doubled up in the hand, and this with a brisk motion, as may be, 'till 100 or 150 be counted, the glass lying all the while over the papers, then if nothing stir, rub the glass half a score times to and fro, or knock your finger ends as often upon the glass, for this rubbing or knocking with your fingers, after the former rubbing, conduces most to excite the papers; if nothing stir yet, rub again with the cloth 'till 60 or 80 may be counted, and then rub or knock again with your fingers, and repeat this 'till the electric virtue of the glass be so far excited as to take up the papers, and then a very little rubbing or knocking will excite the motions. In doing all this, let the rubbing be always done as naturally as may be, and if the motion be circular, like that of glass-grinders, it may do better. But if you cannot make it yet succeed it must be let alone, 'till I have some opportunity of trying it before you. As for the suspicion of the papers being moved by the air, I am secure from that. Yet in the other, of drawing leaf-gold to above a foot distance, which I never went about to try myself, 'till last week, I suspect the air might raise the gold, and a small attraction might determine towards the glass, for I could not make it succeed.

In the following extract of a letter, to the same gentleman, dated January 10, 1675-6, this subject is farther pursued by our author.

Concerning the experiment of the glass and papers, I should add these two to the former directions. One, that the glass be rubbed with a full handful of stuff, which may cover and rub all the glass at once; for thus it's electric virtue will be more easily and vigorously excited, than if rubbed with a little, only doubled up but once or twice. This rubbing with the stuff, I suppose, only rarefies and diffuses the electric effluvia into irregular motions. The other thing I would note is, that the papers may, perhaps, be too little, as well as too great. Too small ones will be apter to stick to the glass or table. If the experiment be tried with a glass 3 or 4 inches broad, set about  $\frac{1}{8}$  of an inch from the table, and the papers of a thin sort of paper, cut into triangular pieces, the sides of these triangles may not unly be the 20th or 25th part of an inch, more or less. It may be best tried with bits of several sizes put in at once, and if there be put in a piece or two of the wing of a fly, those I find will move more easily, though scarce so variously. These and the former directions observed, I cannot imagin how you should miss, though I cannot promise all things will appear justly to you as they did extreme subtlety, escaped even his most penetrating spirit. However, though he has not made so full a discovery of this principle, which directs the course of light, as he has in relation to me; there being unaccountable circumstances which may make a difference †.

(46) Dr Mead, in the preface to the last edition of his Mechanical Account of Poisons, has assumed that æther, which is proposed by Sir Isaac to be possibly the cause of electricity, for the cause of molecular motion. See his article.

† For the rest of this letter, which relates to our author's dispute with Mr Hooke, see his article, remark [M].

We shall in the next place produce an extract of a letter to the same Mr Oldenburg, in which our author supposes the whole frame of nature to be derived from the action of this æthereal spirit.

As to the paper of observations which you move, in the name of the Society, to have printed, I cannot but return them my hearty thanks for the kind acceptance they met with there; and know not how to deny any thing which they desire should be done. Only I think it will be best to suspend the printing of them for a while, because I have some thoughts of writing such another set of observations for determining the manner of the production of colours by the prism, which, if done at all, ought now to precede that now in your hands, and will do best to be joyned with it. But this I cannot do presently, by reason of some incumbrances lately put upon me by some friends, and some other business of my own, which at present almost take up my time and thoughts.

The additions that I intend, I think I must, after putting you to so long expectations, disappoint you in; for it puzzles me how to connect them with what I have sent you, and if I had those papers, I doubt the things I intended will not come in so freely as I thought they might have done. I could send them described, without dependances on those papers, but I fear I have already troubled your Society, and yourself too much, with my scribbling, and so suppose it may do better to defer them 'till another season. I have therefore, at present, only sent you two or three alterations, though not of so great moment, that you need have staid for them, and they are these.

Where I say, that the frame of nature may be nothing but æther condensed by a fermental principle, instead of those words write, that it may be nothing but various contextures of some certain æthereal spirits or vapours, condensed as it were by precipitation, much after the manner that vapours are condensed into water, or exhalation into grosser substances, though not so easily condensable; and after condensation wrought into various forms, at first by the immediate hand of the Creator, and ever since by the power of nature, who by virtue of the command increase and multiply, became a compleat imitator of the copies set here by the Protoplast. Thus, perhaps, may all things be ordained from æther, &c.

A little after, where I say the æthereal spirit may be condensed in fermenting or burning bodies, or otherwise inspiated in the pores of the earth to a tender matter, which may be as it were the succus nutritivus of the earth, or primary substance, out of which, things generable grow; instead of this you may write, that that spirit may be condensed in fermenting or burning bodies, or otherwise coagulated in the pores of the earth and water, into some kind of humid active matter for the continual uses of nature; adhering to the sides of those pores, after the manner that vapours condense on the sides of a vessel.

In the same paragraph there is, I think, a parenthesis, in which I mention volatile salt-peter, pray strike out that parenthesis, least it should give offence to somebody.

Also where I relate the experiment of little papers made to move variously with a glass rubbed, I would have all that struck out which follows, about trying the experiment with leaf-gold.

S I R,

I am interrupted by a visit,

and so must in haste break off,

Your's,

Jan. 25, 1675-6.

If. Newton.

The following letter was wrote to shew that any hypothesis concerning the particular mode of action, by which the æther is supposed to produce colours, in no wise affects the truth of our author's theory of light and colours.

To Mr Oldenburg.

I thank you for giving me notice of the objection which some have made. If I understand it right they meane, that colour may proceed from the different pulses or rays of light may have as they come immediately from the sun. But if this be their meaning, they propound not an objection, but an hypothesis, to explain my theory. For the better understanding of this, I shall desire you to consider, that I put not the different refrangibility of rays to be the internal or essential cause of colours, but only the means whereby rays of different colours are separated. Neither do I say, what is that cause, either of colour or of different refrangibility, but leave these to be explained by hypotheses, and only say, that rays which differ in colour, differ also in refrangibility, and that different refrangibility conduces to the production of colour no other way than by causing a different refraction, and thereby a separation of those rays which had different colours before, but could not appear in their own colours 'till they were separated. Suppose red and blue powders, as minium and bise, were equally mixed, the compound would be neither a good red, nor a good blew, but a middling dirty colour. Suppose further, this mixture was put into water, and after the water had been well stirred, the powders left to subside; if the red was much more ponderous than the blew, it would subside fastest, and leave most of the blew to subside after it, and by consequence, the heap would appear read at bottom, and blew at top, and of intermediate colours between. Here then are various colours produced, out of a dirty colour, by means of different gravity, and yet that different gravity not the internal cause of those colours, but only the cause of the separation of the particles of several colours. And so it is in the production of colours by the prism; the different refrangibility of rays is no otherwise the cause of colours in this case, than the different gravity of the powders was in the other; it only causes a divers refraction of the rays, originally qualified, to exhibit divers colours, and by that divers refraction they are separated, and when separated they must needs exhibit each their own colours, which they could not do while mixed. Had I supposed different refrangibility the internal cause of colours, it would have been strangely precarious, and scarcely intelligible, but to make it only the cause of the separation of rays endowed with different colours, is nothing but experiment, and all that I have asserted in my writings. In like manner, where I make different reflexivity the cause of colours (as in the use of thin transparent plates), I say not that it is their internal cause, but only the means of their separation; for I apprehend that all the phenomena of colours in the world result from nothing but separations, or mixtures of different rays, and that different refrangibility and reflexivity, are only the means by which these separations or mixtures are made.

This being apprehended, I presume you will easily see that you have not sent me an objection, but only an hypothesis, to explain my theory by. For to suppose different velocities of the rays the principle of colour, is only to assign a cause of the different colours, which rays are originally disposed to exhibit, and do exhibit when separated by different refractions. And though this should be the true essential cause of those different colours, yet it hinders not but that the different refrangibility of the rays may be their accidental cause, by making a separation of pulses of different swiftness. Yea, so far is this hypothesis from contradicting me, that if it be supposed, it infers all my theory. For if it be true, then is the sun's light an aggregate of heterogeneous rays, such as are originally disposed to exhibit various colours; then is the whiteness of that light a mixture of those colours, being the result of those unequal colorific motions; then is there nothing requisite for the production of colours but a separation of these rays, so that the swiftest may go to one place by themselves, and the slowest to another by themselves, or one sort be stilled, and another remain; then must all the phenomena of colours proceed from the separations of these rays of unequal swiftness; because relation to the power by which the planets are kept in their courses; yet he gave the best directions possible for such as might be inclined to carry on the work, and furnished matter abundantly enough to animate them to the pursuit. He has, indeed, hereby opened a way of passing from Optics to an entire system of Physics; and if we only look upon his queries, as containing the history of a great man's first thoughts, even in that view they must be always entertaining and curious. He was very anxious that his true meaning in them should be rightly understood, which was to furnish sufficient motives for making farther enquiries, but, in the mean time, not to determine any thing; and when Dr Freind published his Lectures in Chymistry a few years after (z z), in explaining the phenomena of chymical experiments, assumed the attraction for a principle, which in the queries was only started as a conjecture, our author complained of it as an injury done to him. Upon the same account it was, that, in the advertisement prefixed to the Optics, he expressed a desire that his book might not be translated into Latin without his consent; and when Dr Clarke, who, to prevent others, immediately undertook it with his approbation, presented the manuscript to him, finding herein his sense accurately expressed in elegant language, he was so much pleased with it, that he gave him five hundred pounds, or 100 pounds for each of his children (a a a). Dr Clarke's translation was printed at London in 1706, 4to. and our author printing a second edition of his book, with improvements, there, in 1718, 8vo. [Y], the second edition of Dr Clarke's translation was likewise published cause while they continue blended together, as in the sun's original light, they can exhibit no other colour but white; and, lastly, then must various refrangibility and reflexibility be the instrumental causes of the phenomena of colour, those two being the proper means whereby difform rays are separated.

Were I to apply this hypothesis to my notions I would say, therefore, that the slowest pulses being weakest, are more easily turned out of the way by any refracting superficies, than the swiftest, and so, cæteris paribus, are more refracted; and that the prism by refracting them more, separates them from the swiftest, and then they being freed from the alloy of one another, strike the sense distinctly, each with their own motions apart, and so beget sensations of colour, different both from one another, and from that which they begat while mixed together, suppose the swiftest the strongest colour, red; and the slowest blew.

To all this I might add concerning the different swiftness of rays, that myself have formerly applied it to my notions in mentioning other hypotheses, as you may see in my answer to Mr Hooke, section 4th; and I think also in the hypotheses I lately sent you. I say, I applied it in other hypotheses, for in this of Mr Hooke I think it is much more natural to suppose the pulses equally swift, and to differ only in bigness, because it is so in the air, and the laws of undulation are without doubt, the same in æther as they are in air.

Having thus answered, as I conceive, your objection in particular, I shall now, for a conclusion, remind you of what I have formerly said in general to the same purpose; so that I may at once cut off all objections that may be raised for the future, either from this, or any other hypothesis whatever. If you consider what I said both in answer to P. Pardies, and in my answer to Mr Hooke, sect. 4. concerning the application of all hypotheses to my theory, you may thence gather this general rule; that in any hypothesis where the rays may be supposed to have any original diversities, whether as to size or figure, or motion, or force, or quality, or any thing else imaginable, which may suffice to difference those rays in colour and refrangibility; there is no need to seek for other causes of these effects, than those original diversities. This rule being laid down, I argue thus; in any hypothesis whatever, light, as it comes from the sun, must be supposed either homogeneous, or heterogeneous; if the last, then is that hypothesis comprehended in this general rule, and so cannot be against me: if the first, then must refractions have a power to modify light so as to change it's colorific qualification and refrangibility; which is against experience.

Since the writing of this, I received your other letter. I thank you for your account of Mr Berkenshaw's scale of musick, though I have not so much skill in that science as to understand it well. If you should register the papers in your hand, before you return them, I would desire you to leave out the last paragraph of the hypothesis (47), where I mention Mr Hooke and Grimaldi together; but since you are to receive those papers again, that of the observations at least (for the hypothesis I am more inclined to suppress), I suppose it will not be necessary that you should put yourself to the trouble of registering them.

I remain,

S I R,

Your humble servant,

If. Newton.

After this we find his thoughts still engaged upon the same subject, when he wrote his Principia; in the preface to that treatise, having signified how fully he had therein demonstrated the force of gravity, in upholding the great system of the world, he has the following words, 'I wish we could derive the rest of the phenomena of nature by the same kind of reasoning. For I am induced, by many considerations, to suspect, that they may all depend upon certain forces, by which the particles of bodies, by some causes hitherto unknown, are either mutually attracted towards each other, and cohere in regular figures, or are repelled and recede from each other, which forces being unknown, Philosophers have hitherto attempted the search of nature in vain. But I hope the principles here laid down will afford some light either to that, or some other method of Philosophy.' In the same view, after the 96th proposition of this treatise, he inserted this scholium. 'Moreover, the rays of light that are in our air (as lately was discovered by Grimaldi, by the admission of light into a dark room through a small-hole, which I have also tried), in their passing near the angles of bodies, whether transparent or opaque, such (as the circular and quadrangular edges of gold, silver, and brass coins, knives, and broken pieces of stone and glass), are bent and inflected round those bodies as if they were attracted by them.'

[Y] He published a second edition of his Optics, with improvements, in 1718.] Mr Leibnitz having charged him with maintaining gravity to be impressed upon matter by the immediate act of the Deity, and with introducing the occult qualities of the schools, and making gravity a perpetual miracle. Our author added another query at the end of this edition of his Optics *, where he expresses himself thus. 'By what efficient cause these attractions (viz. gravity, magnetism, and electricity) are performed, I do not here inquire. That which I call attraction, may be effected by impulse, or some other way unknown to us. By attraction, I understand only in general some force with which bodies tend to each other, whatever may be the cause of that force. For we ought first to learn from the phenomena of nature what bodies mutually attract each other, and what are the laws and properties of that attraction, before we inquire by what efficient cause it is performed.' That he therefore considers these attractions as forces which really exist in nature, being proved to do so by the phenomena, although their causes are to us yet unknown;

The first edition of the Optics was accompanied with his Quadrature of Curves by his new analysis; to which he subjoined, An Enumeration of the Lines of the Third Order †: both contained under the following title, Traëtatus duo de Speciebus & Magnitudine Figurarum Curvilinearum. This was the first appearance in print of his Method of Fluxions. It was apparently done upon the plan of his original intention in 1671, as has been mentioned. He declined to publish it then on account of a controversy, and it unluckily proved the occasion of drawing him into another now §. In 1705, Queen Anne, in consideration of his extraordinary merit, conferred the honour of knighthood upon him. In 1707, Mr Whiston, by our author's permission, published his Algebraical Lectures under this title: Arithmetica Universalis, sive de Compositione & Resolutione Arithmetica Liber (bbb); and it was put into English by Mr Raphson from this edition. Sir Isaac printed a second edition with improvements under the care of Mr Machin, Professor of Astronomy at Gresham-college, and Secretary to the Royal-Society. This work was another specimen of the vast depth of our author's genius. Dr Pemberton tells us (ccc), that he unknown; lastly, he distinguishes these attractions from the occult qualities of Aristotle, which were asserted to arise from the specific forms of things. Notwithstanding all the caution that is here used to prevent any mistake of his meaning, that the reason why he had not taken upon him to declare the immediate cause of gravity was, that he had not then discovered that cause; though the principle was ascertained by the phenomena, and consequently would not be charged with recurring to occult qualities of Aristotle. Yet Mr Leibnitz went on as before, with the charge of Sir Isaac's having assigned the Deity for that immediate cause. This conduct, however perverse, and senseless as it was, yet is easily accounted for. That rival had set forth himself for the first inventor of the method of Fluxions, and even charged Sir Isaac with borrowing that invention from him. And as this claim and charge could not at all be supported by facts, which on the contrary were all absolutely in favour of his competitor, recourse was had to sinister means; his Philosophy was to be disparaged at any rate, and himself thereby represented as a person not endowed with judgment and sagacity enough to be capable of making such an arduous invention as is that of Fluxions. And this blackening method was not without it's effect. Mr Pope, we are told, became the dupe of so senseless a calumny, in which disposition he inserted the two following lines in his Dunciad:

 Shrinks to her hidden cause, and is no more:*

which it is said was intended as a censure of the Newtonian Philosophy. For that our Poet had been misled by the prejudices of foreigners, as if that Philosophy had recurred to the occult qualities of Aristotle. This was the idea he received of it from a man educated much abroad, who had read every thing, but every thing superficially. Had his excellent friend Dr A. [Arbuthnot] been consulted in this matter, it is very certain to unjust a reflection had never disgraced so noble a satire. When I, says this commentator, hinted to him how he had been imposed upon, he changed the lines with great pleasure into a compliment, as they now stand, on that divine genius, and a satire on the folly by which he himself had been misled. Thus,

 Shrinks to her second cause, and is no more †.*

The person who speaks here is Dr Warburton, who apparently prompted this applauded change. and therefore thought himself under an obligation to justify it, as follows. Philosophy, says he, has at length brought things to that pass, as to have it esteemed unphilosophical to rest in the first cause; as if it's ends were an endless indagation of cause after cause, without ever coming to the first. So that to avoid this unlearned disgrace, some of the propagators of the best Philosophy, have had recourse to the contrivance here hinted at. For this Philosophy which is founded upon the principle of gravitation, first considered that property in matter, as something extraneous to it, and impressed immediately by God upon it, which fairly and modestly coming up to the first cause, was pushing natural enquiries as far as they should go. But this stopping, though at the extent of our ideas, and on the maxim of the great founder of this Philosophy, Bacon †, who says, Circa ultimates rerum frustranea est inquisitio, was mistaken by foreign Philosophers as recurring to the occult qualities of the Peripatetics, whose sense is thus delivered by a great poet, whom, indeed, it more became than a Philosopher.

 Accedunt propius. Videtur mihi cernere terra
 Emergens quicquid caliginis & tenebrarum
 Pellæi juvenis doctor conjecerat olim
 In Physicæ studium*——

Anti-Lucret.

To avoid which imaginary discredit to the new theory, it was thought proper to seek for the cause of gravitation in a certain subtle matter, or elastic fluid, which pervaded all bodies. By this means, instead of really advancing in natural enquiries, we are brought back again, by this ingenious expedient, to an unsatisfactory second cause:

*Philosophy that lean'd on Heav'n before,
 Shrinks to her second cause, and is no more.*

For it might still, by the same kind of objection, be asked, What was the cause of that elasticity? The reader, who has seen what Sir Isaac had said concerning this matter, in the quere abovementioned, must needs be surprized to find this ingenious commentator asserting, that he first considered gravity as impressed immediately by God upon matter, without the intervention of a second cause; whereas, the reason he gives for his not recurring to a second cause, was, not that there was indeed no such cause existing in nature, an assertion too bold for his cautious modesty to make; but only that no such cause was as yet sufficiently proved from the phenomena, or from experiments; for which reason he forbore to assign any such, or indeed, to say any thing about the cause thereof, as purposely avoiding to feign hypotheses*, and as foreign to the plan of his Philosophy. Whether the abettors of Sir Isaac's Philosophy, as they are called, have done an injury or no to their master, in assigning a certain elastic æther for the immediate cause of gravity, is not material to determine; only thus much may be observed, that the discovery of such a substance, by whose action upon light it's rays are reflected, refracted, and inflected, without impinging upon the surfaces of gross bodies, was as contradictory to all the settled notions concerning that matter, and as much astonished the world at the time when it was first made known, as the discovery of some such æther (which is far from being impossible, notwithstanding Mr Baxter's pretended demonstration † to the contrary), for the immediate cause of gravity, if it ever should be made known, can be. In the mean time it is undoubtedly as much an hypothesis to suppose the immediate impression of the Deity to be that cause, as it is to suppose an immediately intervening cause of it.

* It avails nothing to say these declarations are only introduced afterwards into his Optics, and the second edition of his Principia; since they are manifestly inserted there not as introductory of a new opinion, but as declaratory of his meaning in the first.

† He supposes the elastic æther, like air, to act equally every way, which is a meer hypothesis. Baxter on the nature of the human soul as cited by Mr Warburton, in the remark now under consideration.

called this treatise by the name of Universal Arithmetic, in opposition to the injudicious title of Geometry, which Des Cartes had given to the treatise, wherein he shews how the Geometer may assist his invention by such kind of computations. Mr s'Gravesande observes, that the ablest Mathematicians of the last age did not disdain to write notes on the Geometry of Des Cartes; and surely, continues he, Sir Isaac Newton's Arithmetic no less deserves that honour. And to excite some skilful hands to undertake that work, as well as to shew the necessity of it, he gave a specimen in the explication of two passages, which, however, are not the most difficult in that book (ddd). Accordingly, Mr Maclaurin dying in 1745, left a treatise which was designed for a commentary upon it (eee). In 1711, our author's Analysis per Quantitatum Series, Fluxiones & Differentias cum Enumeratione Linearum Tertii Ordinis, was published at London in 4to. by William Jones, Esq; F. R. S. who met with a copy of the first of these pieces among the papers of Mr John Collins, to whom, as already mentioned, it had been communicated by Dr Barrow in 1669. But the invention of approximating per differentias, or the method of drawing a geometrical curve of the parabolic kind through any number of points, though found out by our author long before, and reckoned by himself to be one of his rarest discoveries (fff), yet had not been communicated by him 'till this time. The publication of this book was occasioned by the dispute about the invention of the method of Fluxions [Z], which likewise gave birth to the following work, that was undertaken by the consent of Sir Isaac, and printed the next year at London in 4to. containing a collection of several letters by Sir Isaac and others, in relation to that controversy, under this title: Commercium Epistolicum D. Johannis Collins & aliorum, de Análysi promotâ, jussu Societatis Regiæ in lucem editum. In 1714, Mr Humphrey Ditton and Mr William Whiston having proposed and published a new method of discovering the Longitude at sea by signals, it was laid before the House of Commons to procure their encouragement; upon which, a committee was appointed to take the matter into consideration, who sending to Sir Isaac Newton for his opinion, he immediately drew up the following paper, which was delivered to the Committee June the 2d. [Z] The dispute about the invention of the method of Fluxions. So long before, as from the year 1684, Mr Leibnitz had been artfully working the world into an opinion that he first invented this method (48); Sir Isaac saw his design from the beginning, and, upon that account, inserted the scholium recited in note [8]. To the same purpose, in the introduction to the Quadrature of Curves, which is founded upon the Method of Fluxions, Sir Isaac Newton had signified, that he invented that method in the years 1665 and 1666, as follows: Considerando igitur quod quantitates æqualibus temporibus crescentes & crescendo genitæ, pro velocitate majori vel minori qua crescunt ac generantur evadunt majores vel minores; methodum querebam determinandi quantitates ex velocitatum motuum vel incrementorum quibus generantur, & has motuum vel incrementorum velocitates nominando fluxiones, & quantitates genitas nominando fluentes, incidi paulatim annis 1665 & 1666, in Methodum Fluxionum, qua hic usus sum in Quadratura Curvarum. In the Acta Eruditorum of Leipzig, where an account is given of this book, the author (49) took occasion from it to explain the differential method of Mr Leibnitz, which they compared with Sir Isaac's method of Fluxions, in the following words: Ingeniosissimus deinde auctor antequam ad Quadraturas Curvarum, vel potius Figurarum Curvilinearum veniat, præmittit brevem ifagogen. Quæ ut melius intelligatur, sciendum est, cum magnitudo aliqua continus crescit, veluti linea (exempli gratia) crescit fluxu puncti quod eam describit, incrementa illa momentanea appellari differentias, nempe inter magnitudinem quæ antea erat, & quæ per mutationem momentaneam est producta; atque hinc natum esse calculum differentialem, eique reciprocum summatorium; cujus elementa ab inventore Doctore Godofrido, Gulielmo Leibnitio in his Actis sunt tradita, variique usus tum ab ipso, tum a Dni Fratris Bernoulli, tum & Dni Marchionis Hospitalis (cujus nuper extingui immaturam mortem omnes magnopere dolere debent qui profundioris doctrinæ profectum amant) sunt ostensi. Pro differentia igitur Leibnitianis D. Newtonus adhibet semperque adhibuit fluxiones, quæ sunt quam proxime ut fluentium augmenta æqualibus temporis particulis quam minimis genita: iisque tum in suis principii naturæ mathematicis, tum in aliis postea editis eleganter est usus; quemadmodum & Honoratus Faber in sua Synopsi Geometrica motuum progressus Cavalierianæ methodo substituit. This last comparison occasioned the dispute. For, as it is undoubted that Father Fabri is not the inventor of his method, but that he took it from Cavalieri, only changing the expressions; it was thought that the authors of the Acta Eruditorum designed thereby to intimate, that Sir Isaac Newton was not the inventor of the method of Fluxions, but that he took it from Mr Leibnitz. Mr John Keill undertook Sir Isaac's defence, and, in a piece which was published in the Philosophical Transactions, for September and October 1708 (50), asserted, not only that Sir Isaac had first invented the method of Fluxions, as appeared by his letters published by Dr Wallis, but that Mr Leibnitz had taken this method from him, only changing the name and notation. This charge was complained of by Mr Leibnitz in a letter to Sir Hans Sloane, then Secretary to the Royal Society, dated March 4, 1711; wherein he desired the Society would oblige Mr Keill publicly to disown the injurious sense which his words would bear. When this letter was communicated to the Royal Society, Mr Keill, to justify himself to Sir Isaac Newton, shewed him the extract of his book of the Quadrature of Curves in the Acta Eruditorum, where the comparison abovementioned was inserted. Hereupon, several other members, as well as Sir Isaac, finding the same sense as Mr Keill had done in that comparison, gave him leave to explain and defend what he had advanced. This he accordingly did in a letter to Sir Hans Sloane, which being read to the Royal Society May 24, 1711, they ordered a copy of it to be sent to Mr Leibnitz, who found new matter of complaint in it; and, in a second letter to Dr Sloane, dated at Hanover December 29, 1711, alleged, that Mr Keill had attacked his candour and sincerity more openly than before; that he acted without any authority from Sir Isaac Newton, who was the party concerned; and that it was in vain for him to pretend to justify his proceeding by the example of the Acta Eruditorum, since, in that journal, no injustice had been done to any one, but every one had received what was his due. He concluded with desiring the Royal Society would enjoin Mr Keill silence, not doubting but that what he had written was disapproved by Sir Isaac Newton himself, who was well acquainted with what had passed formerly, and to whose judgment he was ready to submit. Mr Keill, hereupon, appealed to the regulators of the Society, affirming, that they would find there convincing proofs of what he had advanced. Sir Isaac Newton, likewise, being displeas'd at the comparison in the Acta Eruditorum, and that Mr Leibnitz should have said, that in that journal every one had received what was due to him, left the Society to act as they should think proper; who granted therefore to Mr Keill what he desired, which produced the Commercium Epistolicum mentioned above.

there have been several projects, true in theory but difficult to execute. 1. One is by a watch to keep time exactly; but, by reason of the motion of a ship, the variation of heat and cold, wet or dry, and the difference of gravity in different latitudes, such a watch hath not yet been made (g g g). 2. Another is by the eclipses of Jupiter's satellites; but, by reason of the length of telescopes requisite to observe them, and the motion of a ship at sea, those eclipses cannot yet be there observed. 3. A third is by the place of the moon; but her theory is not yet exact enough for that purpose; it is exact enough to determine the longitude within two or three degrees, but not within a degree (h h h). 4. A fourth is Mr Ditton's project; and this is rather for keeping an account of the Longitude at sea, than for finding it if at any time it should be lost, as it may easily be in cloudy weather. How far this is practicable, and with what charge, they that are skilled in sea-affairs are best able to judge. In sailing by this method, whenever they are to pass over very deep seas, they must sail due east or west; they must first sail into the latitude of the next place to which they are going beyond it, and then keep due east or west 'till they come at that place. In the three first ways there must be a watch regulated by a spring, and rectified every visible sun-rise and sun-set, to tell the hour of the day or night. In the fourth way such a watch is not necessary. In the first way there must be two watches, this and the other abovementioned. In any of the three first ways it may be of some service to find the Longitude within a degree, and of much more service to find it within 40 minutes, or half a degree if it may, and the success may deserve rewards accordingly. In the fourth way, it is easier to enable seamen to know their distance and bearing from the shore 40, 60, or 80 miles off, than to cross the seas; and some part of the reward may be given, when the first is performed on the coast of Great-Britain, for the safety of ships coming home; and the rest, when seamen shall be enabled to sail to an assigned remote harbour without losing their Longitude, if it may be. Upon this opinion the House of Commons threw aside the petition*. In 1715, Mr Leibnitz intending to bring the world more easily into a belief, that Sir Isaac had taken the method of Fluxions from his differential method, thought to foil his mathematical skill by the famous problem (i i i) of the trajectories, which he therefore proposed to the English by way of challenge. But the solution of this, though it was the most difficult proposition his antagonist could think of after a great deal of study, and, indeed, might pass for a considerable performance in another, yet was it hardly any more than an amusement to Sir Isaac: he received the problem at four o'clock in the evening, as he was returning from the Mint; and, though he was extremely fatigued with business, yet he finished the solution of it before he went to bed. As Mr Leibnitz was Privy-Counsellor of Justice to the Elector of Hanover, when that Prince was raised to the British throne, Sir Isaac came to be taken particular notice of at Court; and it was for the immediate satisfaction of King George the First, that he was prevailed with to put the last hand to the dispute about the invention of Fluxions [A A]. [A A] It was for the immediate satisfaction of King George the First, that he was prevailed with to put the last hand to the dispute about the invention of Fluxions.] The committee of the Royal Society having, in 1712, declared it their opinion, that Mr Newton was the first inventor of this method, and given incontestable proofs in support of it, which were all published in the Commercium Epistolicum, the affair soon reached the ears of Mr Leibnitz, then at Vienna, as appears from the following postscript of a letter, which he wrote to Count Bothmarabout it (51). 'I was at Vienna, says he, when I was informed of the publication of the book, but being assured that it must contain malicious falsities, I did not think proper to send for it by the post, but wrote to Mr Bernoulli, a gentleman, who, perhaps, in all Europe, has succeeded best in the knowledge and use of this calculus, and who was absolutely neuter, to give me his sentiments. Mr Bernoulli wrote me a letter, dated at Basil June 7, 1713, in which he said, that it appeared probable that Sir Isaac Newton had formed his calculus after having seen mine; since he had frequent occasion in his works to make use of this calculus, though there appears no trace of it, and that he had even committed some errors with respect to the knowledge of that calculus. One of my friends published this letter with reflections; and, as I had enough of other affairs to employ me, I was unwilling to enter farther into this, especially as Sir Isaac Newton had not said any thing himself. I thought sufficient, therefore, to have opposed, to the clamours of his adherents, the judgment of a person of Mr Bernoulli's learning and impartiality.' These two pieces, written in Latin, were published in a loose sheet, dated July 29, 1713, in Germany; whence they were sent by a friend of Mr Leibnitz to the authors of the Journal Litteraire, to which he added remarks of his own upon the dispute between Mr Leibnitz and Sir Isaac Newton. These remarks were occasioned by a letter sent from London, and inserted in the first tome of the Journal Litteraire: to which letter the remarker objects, as not giving an exact account of that dispute; and undertaking to give a true relation of what had passed, he asserts, that when Sir Isaac Newton published his Principia in 1687, he did not understand the true differential method (52), and pretends that he took it from Mr Leibnitz. To these three Dr John Keill wrote an answer, which was inserted in the fourth tome of the Journal Litteraire. The affair stood thus, when Mr Chamberlayne stepped in, with a design to reconcile Mr Leibnitz and Sir Isaac Newton. To this purpose he addressed himself to the former, who was still at Vienna (53); Mr Leibnitz thanked him for his obliging offer, but declared he had given no occasion for the dispute. 'But Sir Isaac Newton, says he, has procured a book to be published, which was written purposely to discredit me, and sent it into Germany, France, and Italy, as in the name of the Society.' He adds, 'That learned men among the French, Italian, and other nations, extremely disapproved of this manner of proceeding, and were amazed at it, and that he hoped in the Society itself every one would not approve of it. For myself, continues he, I have always acted in the most civil manner towards Sir Isaac Newton; and though it appears now that there is great reason to doubt whether he knew my invention before he had it of me, I had spoken as if he had discovered of himself something like my method. But being abused by some ill advised flatterers, he has suffered himself to be engaged in attacking me in a very sensible manner. Judge now, Sir, from whence the steps necessary to put an end to this contest ought first to be made.' Mr Chamberlayne communicated this letter to Sir Isaac Newton, who

who answered in a few words, that he had no share in what Mr Facio (54) had written against Mr Leibnitz; that Mr Leibnitz had attacked his reputation in 1705; by intimating in the extract of the treatise of Quadratures, that he had borrowed from Mr Leibnitz the method of Fluxions; that Dr Keill had only defended him; and that the passage in the Acta Eruditorum was not known to him 'till the coming of Mr Leibnitz's first letter against Dr Keill, in which Mr Leibnitz demanded in effect, that he should retract what he had published in the introduction to the treatise of Quadratures, viz that he had invented the method of Fluxions in 1665 and 1666; and lastly, that if Mr Chamberlayne could point out to him any thing in which he had injured Mr Leibnitz, he would endeavour to give him satisfaction, but that he would not retract things which he knew to be true; and that he believed likewise, that the committee of the Royal Society had done no injustice to Mr Leibnitz in the affair of the Commercium Epistolicum. The Royal Society being informed that Mr Leibnitz complained of being condemned without being heard, though they had not taken any party in this contest, and being willing to prevent the disputes which might arise upon it, declared, on the 20th of May, 1714, that they did not pretend that the report of their committee should pass for a decision of the Society, and ordered this declaration to be inserted in their journal. Mr Chamberlayne sent a copy of it to Mr Leibnitz, with Sir Isaac Newton's letter, and Dr Keill's answer to the pieces inserted in the Journal Litteraire. Mr Leibnitz, upon the perusal of these papers, returned the following answer (55) to Mr Chamberlayne. 'As to the letter [by Sir Isaac Newton] which you sent me a copy of, and which is written with very little civility, I consider it pro non scripta, as well as the piece printed in French [by Dr Keill]. I am not of an humour to put myself in a passion against such people. Since it seems that there are still other letters relating to me, amongst those of Mr Oldenburg and Mr Collins, which have not been published, I could wish that the Royal Society would order them to be communicated to me. When I shall return to Hanover, I shall be able to publish also a Commercium Epistolicum (56), which may be of service to the history of learning. I shall be ready to publish, as well those letters which may be urged against me, as those which favour me; and I shall leave the judgment of them to the publick.' When this letter was read to the Royal Society, Sir Isaac Newton observed, that the last words here transcribed were injurious to the committee, since it was there supposed that they had not made a disinterested choice of the papers which the Society had ordered them to collect. He added, that as he had no share in the Commercium Epistolicum, but had left the committee perfectly free to collect and print what they thought proper, he did not think it right for Mr Leibnitz himself to publish a Commercium Epistolicum. Upon this he produced two letters which had been written to him, one by Mr Leibnitz in 1693, and the other by Dr Wallis in 1695; and said, that though these letters were very favourable to him, he had waved the communicating of them to the committee, that he might not seem to become himself a witness in his own cause. These two letters having been examined before the Society, by members of the Society, who knew the hands of the writers of the letters, they were read, and deposited among the archives of the Society (57). Sir Isaac Newton remarked also the danger of sending to Mr Leibnitz the originals even of the letters of Mr Oldenburg and Mr Collins, which he seemed to desire; but said, that attested copies might be sent to him. He said, that if Mr Leibnitz had letters to produce in his favour, and would send the originals to some of his friends in England, to be shewn to the Royal Society, and examined by persons who knew the hands, the originals should be returned after authentic copies were taken, and that these letters might be published in the Philosophical Transactions, or in Germany, as Mr Leibnitz should think proper. Things were in this situation, when the Abbé Conti, a noble Venetian, came to England in 1715 (58); he received a letter soon after, upon certain philosophical opinions, from Mr Leibnitz, who in the postscript writes thus: 'I am glad you are in England; there are great advantages to be made there, and it must be owned there are men of distinguished abilities in that country; but they are fond of passing for almost the only inventors in the world, and this is manifestly what they will not succeed in. It does not appear that Sir Isaac Newton had before me the infinitesimal characteristic and algorithm, as Mr Bernoulli has very rightly judged; though it would have been extremely easy to have attained to it, if he had turned his thoughts that way, as it would have been very easy for Apollonius to have attained to the analysis of Des Cartes upon curves, if he had turned his thoughts that way. Those who have written against me having made no scruple to attack my candour by forced and ill-grounded interpretations, they shall not have the pleasure of seeing me answer the slight reasons of people who act in so ill a manner, and besides that deviate from the point. The question is concerning the differential method, and they turn it upon series, in which Sir Isaac Newton preceded me without doubt; but I discovered at last a general method for series, and after this I had no longer occasion to have recourse to his extractions. They would have done better to have published letters entire, as Dr Wallis did with my consent, and he had not the least dispute with me, as these persons would persuade the world. My adversaries have published, in the Commercium Epistolicum of Mr Collins, only what they thought capable of their false interpretations. I became acquainted with Mr Collins in my second voyage to England; for in my first (which was but for a very short time, as I came with a publick minister) I had not the least knowledge of the improvements in Geometry, and had neither seen nor heard any thing of the correspondence between Mr Oldenburg and Mr Gregory, and Mr Newton, as my letters exchanged with Mr Oldenburg at that time, and for some time after, will sufficiently prove. But in my second voyage, Mr Collins shewed me part of his correspondence; and I observed, that Mr Newton owned also his ignorance in several points, and said, among other things, that he had not discovered any thing with regard to the dimension of the celebrated curve lines, except the dimension of the circle; but all this has been suppressed. I am sorry that so able a man as Sir Isaac Newton has drawn upon him the censure of intelligent persons, by having too much regard to the suggestions of some flatterers, who have been desirous of raising a contest between him and me.' Mr Leibnitz after this attacks Sir Isaac upon his Philosophy, especially his opinions about gravity, vacuum, the intervention of God for the conservation of his creatures, &c. he accuses him of reviving the occult qualities of the schools, or of supposing miracles perpetually, &c. This postscript being much talked of at Court, Sir Isaac was greatly pleased by some persons of distinction to write an answer. The Abbé Conti omitted nothing to engage him to it; but his extreme dislike to personal contels remained inflexible to all these solicitations. 'Till at last, King George the First having one day asked when Sir Isaac Newton's answer to Mr Leibnitz was to appear? Sir Isaac could not excuse himself any longer. He addressed his answer to the Abbé Conti, to be communicated to Mr Leibnitz (59), to whom he wrote at the same time, that he had read with great attention, and without the least prejudice, the Commercium Epistolicum, and the little piece that contains the extract; that he had also seen at the Royal Society the original papers of the Commercium Epistolicum, and some other original pieces relating to it. From all this, says he, I infer, that if all the digressions are cut off, the only point is, whether Sir Isaac Newton had the method of Fluxions or Infinitesimals before you, or whether you had it before him. You published it first it is true. But you have owned also, that Sir Isaac Newton had given many hints of it in his letters to Mr Oldenburg and others. This is proved very largely in the Commercium and the extract of it. What answer do you give? This is still wanting to the Publick, in order to form an exact judgment of the affair. He adds, that Mr Leibnitz's own friends waited for his answer with great impatience, and that they thought he could not dispense with

was she informed of our author's firmness to the House of Hanover, than she engaged his conversation, which presently endeared him to her. Here she found, in every difficulty, that full satisfaction which she had in vain sought for elsewhere; and her Highness was often heard to declare in publick, that she thought herself happy in coming into the world at a juncture of time which put it in her power to converse with him. Amongst other things, Sir Isaac one day acquainted her Highness with his thoughts upon some points of Chronology, and communicated to her what he had formerly wrote purely for his own amusement upon that subject. But the plan appeared to be so unexpectedly new and ingenious, that she could not be satisfied till he promised her to compleat a work she found so happily begun. Not long after, about the year 1718, the Princess begged she might have a copy of these papers; Sir Isaac represented to her Highness that they lay very confused, and, besides, what he had written therein was imperfect, but in a few days he could draw up an abstract thereof, if it might be kept secret. Some time after he had done this, and presented it, she desired that Signor Conti (kkk), a Venetian nobleman, then in England, might have a copy of it. This was a request which could not be denied, especially as the condition of secrecy was readily promised. Notwithstanding this promise, the Abbé, who during his stay in England had always affected to shew a particular friendship for Sir Isaac, no sooner got cross the water into France, but he dispersed copies of it, got an Antiquary to translate it into French, and, moreover, to write a confutation of it. This was printed at Paris in 1725; after which, a copy of the translation only, without the remarks, under this title, Abregé de Chronologie de M. Le Chevalier Newton, fait par lui même & traduit sur le manuscrit Anglois, was delivered as a present from the Bookseller that printed it to our author, in order to obtain his consent to the publication; which though expressly denied by him, yet the whole was published not long after in the same year. Upon this Sir Isaac published, in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 389. Vol. XXXIV. p. 315. Remarks upon the Observations made upon a Chronological Index of Sir Isaac Newton, translated into French by the Observer, and published at Paris [BB].

with answering, if not Dr Keill, at least Sir Isaac Newton himself, who had given him a defiance in express terms, as he would see in Sir Isaac's letter. He informed him at the same time, that the King had desired him to give him an account of the whole affair. Mr Leibnitz answered Sir Isaac Newton in a letter, which he addressed to the Abbé Conti; but at the time when the Abbé waited to receive that letter, he received a short letter (60), in which Mr Leibnitz informed him, that he had sent it to Mr Remond at Paris, who would take care that he should receive it. I have taken this way, says he, in order to have indifferent and intelligent witnesses of our disputes; and Mr Remond will communicate it to others. I have sent him at the same time a copy of your letter and of Sir Isaac Newton's. After this you will be able to judge, whether the unjust chicane of some of your new friends perplexes me very much. Sir Isaac Newton thought it wrong that Mr Leibnitz should call in for witnesses of that dispute, persons who probably had not read the Commercium Epistolicum. He thought that London, as well as Paris, might furnish indifferent and intelligent witnesses. He resolved, therefore, to carry the dispute no farther; and, when Mr Leibnitz's answer came from France, he refused it by remarks, which he communicated only to some of his friends. Mr Leibnitz died six months after that, November 14, 1716; and, as soon as Sir Isaac Newton heard of his death, he published at London the postscript and letter of Mr Leibnitz to the Abbé Conti, with his own letter to the Abbé, and the remarks. To the remarks was prefixed the following advertisement, explaining the subject and occasion. Cum D. Leibnitius adduci non posset ut vel Commercio Epistolico responderet, vel probaret quæ pro libitu affirmabat, cumque præcedentes epistolas in Galliam prius mitteret quam earum tertia in Angliam veniret, & præterderet se hoc facere ut testes haberet, & alios etiam adhiberet contumelias: Newtonus minime rescriptit, sed observationes sequentes in Epistolam illam tertiam scriptas cum amicis solummodo communicavit. To these pieces was added Mr Ralphson's History of Fluxions, as a kind of supplement. They were published in the same language in which each was written, viz. those of Mr Leibnitz in French, and those of Sir Isaac Newton in English. The two last were translated into French, and printed also at London, and Mr Des Maizeux has reprinted them in the second tome of his Recueil. In 1725, there was published a third edition of the Commercium Epistolicum with additions, relating to what had passed in this controversy, since the publishing of the first edition of that book, which put an end to this controversy (61).

In these remarks, the ungenerous conduct of the Venetian nobleman, and the tricking management of the French bookseller, are equally exposed; and the Observer might clearly see, without the help of a telescope, by the manner of handling him, how much he meddled above his match. Having shewn the weakness and impertinence of his arguments upon the epocha of the Argonauts, and the length of generations, Sir Isaac makes this remark. 'So then the Observer hath mistaken my meaning in the two main arguments on which the whole is founded, and hath undertaken to translate and to confute a paper which he did not understand, and been zealous to print it without my consent; though he thought it good for nothing, but to get himself a little credit by translating it to be confuted, and confuting his own translation.'—In the conclusion of this paper, Sir Isaac having remarked, that the Abbé Conti had acted in England privately as an agent for Mr Leibnitz, under the assumed character of a mediator in the dispute about Fluxions, has these words: 'And what he [Abbé Conti] has been doing in Italy, may be understood by the disputes raised there by one of his friends, who denies many of my optical experiments, though they have been all tried in France with success. But I hope that these things, and the perpetual motion, will be the last efforts of this kind.' Upon this the Remarks were published in French at Paris, 1726, 8vo. with a letter of the Abbé Conti, in answer to some reflections cast upon him in his Remarks. In the year 1726, some dissertations were published likewise at Paris by Father Souciet, against Sir Isaac's Chronological Index. In the just mentioned remarks he had said, that Hipparchus names the stars, through which the colures passed in the old sphere of Chiron, according to Eudoxus; and saith expressly, that Eudoxus drew one of these colures through the middle of Cancer and the middle of Capricorn, and the other through the middle of Chela and the back of Aries. And the colures passing thro' the back of Aries passes through the middle of Aries, and is but 8 degrees from the first star of Aries. 'I follow Eudoxus, and, by doing so, place the equinoctial colure about 7°. 36'. from the first star of Aries. But the Observer represents, that I place it 15°. from the first star of Aries; and thence deduces, that I should have made the Argonautic expedition 532 years earlier than I do. Let him rectify his mistake, and the Argonautic expedition will be where I place it.' The P. Souciet makes himself merry with this account. 'As if, says he, the middle of Aries was not the middle of the sign or dodecametorion of Aries.' Here the good Father is taken up

(61) This was published with Sir Isaac Newton's approbation, and, by his remarks in Phil. Transf. No. 389. seems to have been chiefly occasioned by the conduct of the Abbé Conti. See likewise the preface to this second edition of the Commercium Epistolicum.

Some few years before this, in the eightieth year of his age, our author was seized with an incontinence of urine, thought to proceed from the stone in the bladder, and judged to be incurable. However, by the help of a strict regimen, and other precautions, which 'till then he never had occasion for, he procured great intervals of ease during the five remaining years of his life; yet he was not free from some severe paroxysms, which even occasioned large drops of sweat to run down his face. In these circumstances he never was seen to utter the least complaint, nor expresses the least impatience; and, as soon as he had a moment's ease, he would smile and talk with his usual cheerfulness. 'Till this time he had always read and writ several hours in a day, but he was now obliged to rely upon Mr Conduit (111) for the discharge of his office in the Mint. On Saturday morning, March 18, 1726-7, he read the news-papers, and discoursed a long time with Dr Mead, his Physician, having then the perfect use of all his senses and his understanding; but that night he entirely lost them all, and not recovering them after, he died on the Monday following, which was March 20th, in the eighty-fifth year of his age. His body lay in state in the Jerusalem-Chamber, and March 28th was conveyed into Westminster-abbey, the Lord Chancellor, the Dukes of Montrose and Roxburgh, and the Earls of Pembroke, Suffolk, and Macclesfield, holding up the pall. The corpse was interred just at the entrance into the choir, on the left hand, where a rich monument is erected to his memory, with a suitable inscription upon it [CC]. As to his person, he was of a middling stature, and somewhat inclined to be fat in the latter part of his life. His countenance was pleasing and venerable at the same time, especially when he took off his peruke, and shewed his white hair, which was pretty thick. He lost but one tooth, and never made use of spectacles during his whole life, which, perhaps, might be the ground for Mr Fontenelle's saying, in a kind of panegyric, that he had a very lively and piercing eye. For Bishop Atterbury (m m m), who seems to have observed it more critically, assures us, that 'This did not belong to him, at least not for twenty years past, about which time, says the Bishop, I became acquainted with him. Indeed, in the whole air of his face and make, there was nothing of that penetrating sagacity which appears in his compositions; he had something rather languid in his look and manner, which did not raise any great expectation in those who did not know him.' In viewing the character of his genius, we must turn to the nature of his inventions, and the manner in which he opened his way to them. Of these we have given an account, at the several stages of his life when the discoveries were made by him. The mark that seems most of all to distinguish it is this, that he himself was the truest judge, and made the justest estimation of it. One day, when one of his friends had said some handsome things of his extraordinary talents, Sir Isaac, in an easy and unaffected way, assured him, that for his own part he was sensible, that whatever he had done worth by Dr Halley (62), who makes him feel the rod for not reading his lesson right out of Hipparchus, whose words are very express, that the colure of the vernal equinox, in passing through the back, according to Eudoxus passed likewise through the head of the Whale, ἐν ᾧ τῷ ἐπιέρῳ κολέρῳ ὁσι κείῳ τῷ Κήτις ᾧ κεραλίῳ κ' τῷ νεύῳ τὰ ἰάτα κατὰ πλάτῳ; whereas in passing through the middle of the dodecatemoron, it leaves the head of the Whale to the westward. Thus the Pere Souciet first blunders notoriously in undertaking to correct Sir Isaac, and then plays the droll upon the strength of his own blunder. Dr Halley observing, that Sir Isaac justly took the middle of Aries, over which the colure is supposed by Eudoxus to have passed, to be the middle of the constellation; and in so doing, says he, no doubt had reason to place this colure 7°. 36' in consequence of the first star of Aries, instead of 8°. 17' as it was when the star in the middle of the back of Aries (marked v by Bayer) was under the colure; which, reckoning 50'' per annum for the known precession of the equinoctial points, will set the Argonautic expedition 984 years before Christ, that is, exactly half a century earlier than it is placed by Sir Isaac. Does not the reason seem evidently to be this? The description of Hipparchus is not, 'tis allowed, circumstantial enough to determine the place in the back of Aries through which the colure in question passed in Chiron's sphere, to an exactness of 25''. 'Tis true, Hipparchus supposes this colure to have passed at that time through the star in the middle of the back of Aries, but this he allows to be only his own conjecture. The difficulty lay in finding out a better rule than meer conjecture. Here Sir Isaac steps in. This was a Gordian knot, which he and he alone was able to untye. The first Chronologers, he observed, had made the reigns of the ancient Kings of Greece longer than the course of nature would bear. The Ancients, had founded their technical Chronology, on the rule of reckoning the reigns of kings equal to generations, making three to amount to 100, and sometimes to 120 years. This rule he examined, by comparing it with what was found to be the true course of nature, after the times were more exactly set down in later historians. From hence it appeared, that the reigns of kings were far from being equal to generations of men, and that they did not exceed 18 or 20 years a piece one with another. Allowing, therefore, that proportion to the Kings of Greece, he found the Argonautic expedition must have happened about 44 years after the death of Solomon, that is, according to Scripture, 934 years before Christ. Let this now be applied to the words of Hipparchus, and the equinoctial colure, at the time of the Argonautic expedition, will be fixed at about 7°. 36' from the first star of Aries.

worth notice, was owing to a patience of thought, rather than any extraordinary sagacity which he was endowed with above other men *. I keep the subject constantly before me, and wait till the first dawns open slowly, by little and little, into a full and clear light. And hence we are able to give a very natural account of that unusual kind of horror which he had for all disputes upon these points; a steady unbroken attention was his peculiar felicity, he knew it, and he knew the value of it. In such a situation of mind, controversy must needs be looked upon him as his bane. However, he was at a great distance from being steeped in Philosophy: on the contrary, he could lay aside his thoughts, though engaged in the most intricate researches, when his other affairs required his attendance, and, as soon as he had leisure, resume the subject at the point where he left off. This he seems to have done, not so much by any extraordinary strength of memory, as by the force of his inventive faculty, to which every thing opened itself again with ease, if nothing intervened to ruffle him. The readiness of his invention made him not think of putting his memory much to the trial; but this was the offspring of a vigorous intenseness of thought, out of which he was but a common man. He spent, therefore, the prime of his age in these abstruse researches, when his situation in a college gave him leisure, and even while study was his proper profession. But, as soon as he was removed to the Mint, he applied himself chiefly to the business of that office, and so far quitted Mathematics and Philosophy, as not to engage in any new pursuits of either kind afterwards (nnn). Dr Pemberton tells us (ooo), that he found Sir Isaac had read fewer of the modern mathematicians than one could have expected, but his own prodigious invention readily supplied him with what he might have occasion for in any subject he undertook. He often censured the handling geometrical subjects by algebraic calculations, and frequently praised Slusius, Barrow, and Huygens, for not being influenced by the bad taste which then began to prevail. He used to commend the laudable attempt of Hugo de Omerique, to restore the ancient analysis, and very much esteemed Apollonius's book De Sectione Rationis, for giving us a clearer notion of that analysis than we had before. He particularly recommended Huygens's style and manner, as being, he thought, the most elegant of any mathematical writer of modern times, and the most just imitator of the Ancients; of whose taste and form of demonstration Sir Isaac always professed himself a great admirer. Dr Pemberton likewise observes, that his memory, indeed, was much decayed in the last years of his life; yet the common discourse, that he did not then understand his own works, was entirely groundless. This opinion might, perhaps, arise, from his not being always ready to speak on these subjects when it might be expected he should. But this the doctor imputes to an absence commonly seen in great geniuses. 'Inventors, says he, seem to treasure up in their minds what they have found out, after another manner than those do the same things, who have not this inventive faculty. The former, when they have occasion to produce their knowledge, are obliged, in some measure, immediately to investigate part of what they want; for this, as they are not equally fit at all times, so it has often happened, that such as retain things chiefly by means of a very strong memory, have appeared off-hand more expert than the discoverers themselves.' Add to this, what in regard to strict truth must not be suppressed, that the behaviour of Mr Leibnitz particularly, as well as of the Abbé Conti, not to mention some others *, had given that caution which was innate to him such a reserve, as seemed to border upon the suspicious. However, this reserve, no doubt, was at some of these times the genuine effect of his native modesty, which (in passing to contemplate the character of his mind) appears to stand foremost in his composition, and was, in truth, greater than can easily be imagined, or will be readily believed; yet it always continued so without any alteration, though the whole world (ppp), says Mr de Fontenelle, conspired against it. In his dispute with Mr Leibnitz, he even shewed a great meekness of disposition; however, he was very far from being insensible, both of the injurious presumption and mean chicanery of his envious competitor, and undoubtedly took the best method of foiling him, by refusing to feed his vanity with a verbal contest, but subduing his insolence with inflexible facts. When he was twenty-seven years of age, he wrote a letter to a young gentleman who was entering upon his travels [DD]; where, in giving rules for his

* He begins his first letter to Dr Bentley in 1692, thus, 'When I wrote my treatise about our system, I had an eye upon such principles as might work with considering men for the belief of a Deity, and nothing can rejoice me more than to find it useful for that purpose. But if I have done the public any service this way, it is due to nothing but industry and patient thought.' Four letters, &c. Edit. 1756, 8vo.

[DD] He wrote a letter to a young gentleman who was entering upon his travels.] This young gentleman was his friend, Francis Aston, Esq; and is as follows.

Trinity College, Cambridge, May 18, 1669.

S I R,

' Since in your letter you give mee so much liberty of spending my judgment about what may be to your advantage in travelling, I shall do it more freely, than perhaps otherwise would have been decent. First, then, I will lay down some general rules, most of which, I beleive, you have considered already; but if any of them be new to you they may excuse the rest; if none at all, yet is my punishment more in writing than your's in reading.
' When you come into any fresh company, 1. Observe their humours. 2. Secondly, Suit your own

' carriage thereto, by which insinuation you will make their converse more free and open. 3. Let your discourses be more in queries and doubtings, than peremptory assertions, or disputings, it being the designe of travellers to learne, not to teach. Besides, it will persuade your acquaintance that you have the greater esteem of them, and soe make them more ready to communicate what they know to you; whereas nothing sooner occasions disrespect and quarrels than peremptorinesse. You will find little or no advantage in seeming wiser, or much more ignorant than your company. 4. Seldome discommend any thing, though never so bad, or doe it but moderately, least you bee unexpectedly forced to an unhandson retraction. It is safer to commend any thing more than it deserves, than to discommend a thing so much as it deserves. For commendations meet not soe often with oppositions, or at least are not usually friend's conduct, he has in some measure described his own. He never talked either of himself or others, nor ever behaved in such a manner, as to give the most malicious censurers the least occasion even to suspect him of vanity. He was candid and affable, and always put himself upon a level with his company. He never thought either his merit or his reputation sufficient to excuse him from any of the common offices of social life. No singularities, either natural or affected, distinguished him from other men. Though he was firmly attached to the Church of England, he was averse to the persecution of the Nonconformists. He judged of men by their manners, and the true schismatics, in his opinion, were the vicious and the wicked. Not that he confined his principles to Natural Religion, for he was thoroughly persuaded of the truth of Revelation; and, amidst the great variety of books which he had constantly before him, that which he studied with the greatest application was the Bible. He did not neglect the opportunities of doing good, which the revenues of his patrimony and a profitable employment, improved by a prudent œconomy, put into his power. When decency upon any occasion required expence and shew, he was magnificent without grudging it, and with a very good grace (999). At all other times, that pomp, which seems great to low minds only, was utterly retrenched, and the expence reserved for better uses. He never married, and, perhaps, he never had leisure to think of it. Being immersed in profound studies during the prime of his age, and afterwards engaged in an employment of great importance, and even quite taken up with the company which his merit drew to him, he was not sensible of any vacancy in life, nor of the want of a companion at home. He left two and thirty thousand pounds at his death, but made no Will, which Mr de Fontenelle tells us was, because he thought a legacy was no gift. After his death, there were found among his papers several discourses upon the subjects of Antiquity, History, Divinity, Chemistry, and Mathematics. Some of these have been since published. Besides those already mentioned, in

(999) It has been observed, that he put on a suit of laced cloaths when he offered himself a candidate to represent the University in Parliament against Mr Annelley, afterwards Earl of Anglesey, and Steward of that University.

usually see ill resented by men that think otherwise, as discommendations. And you will insinuate into mens favour by nothing sooner, than seeming to approve and commend what they like; but beware of doing it by a comparison. 5. If you be affronted, it is better in a foraine country to pass it by in silence, and with a jest, though with some dishonour, than to endeavour revenge; for in the first case your credit's ne'er the worse, when you return into England, or come into other company, that have not heard of the quarrell. But in the second case, you may beare the marks of the quarrel while you live, if you outlive it at all. But if you find yourself unavoidably engaged, 'tis best, I think, if you can command your passion and language, to keep them pretty evenly, at some certain moderate pitch, not much heightning them to exasperate your adversary, or provoke his friends, nor letting them grow over much dejected to make him insult. In a word, if you can keep reason above passion, that and watchfulness will be your best defendants. To which purpose you may consider, that tho' such excuses as this, He provok't mee so much I could not forbear, may pass among friends, yet amongst strangers they are insignificant, and only argue a traveller's weakness.

To these I may add some general heads for inquiry's or observations, such as at present I can think on. As 1. To observe the policys, wealth, and state-affairs of nations, so far as a solitary traveller may conveniently doe. 2. Their impositions upon all sorts of people, trades, or commoditys, that are remarkable. 3. Their laws, and customs, how far they differ from ours. 4. Their trades, and arts, wherein they excell, or come short of us in England. 5. Such fortifications as you shall meet with, their fashion, strength, and advantages for defence, and other such military affairs as are considerable. 6. The power and respect belonging to their degrees of nobility, or magistracy. 7. It will not be time mispent to make a catalogue of the names and excellencies of those men that are most wise, learned, or esteemed in any nation. 8. Observe the mechanisme and manner of guiding ships. 9. Observe the products of nature in several places, especially in mines, with the circumstances of mining, and of extracting metals, or minerals, out of their ore, and of refining them; and if you meet with any transmutions out of their own species into another (as out of iron into copper, out of any metall into quicksilver, out of one salt into another, or into an insipid body, &c.) those, above all, will be worth your noting, being the most luciferous, and many times luciferous experiments too in Philosophy. 10. The prices of diet and other things. 11. And the staple commoditys of places.

These generals (such as at present I could think of), if they will serve for nothing else, yet they may assist you in drawing up a modell to regulate your travells by. As for particulars, these that follow are all that I can now think of, viz. Whether at Schemnitium in Hungary (where there are mines of gold, copper, iron, vitriol, antimony, &c.), they change iron into copper by dissolving it in a vitriolate water, which they find in cavities of rocks in the mines, and then melting the slimy solution in a strong fire, which in the cooling proves copper. The like is said to be done in other places, which I cannot now remember, perhaps too it may be done in Italy. For about 20 or 30 years agoe there was a certain vitrioll come from thence (called Roman Vitrioll), but of a nobler virtue than that which is now called by that name; which vitriol is not now to be gotten, because, perhaps, they make a greater gain by some such trick as turning iron into copper with it, than by selling it. 2. Whether in Hungary, Sclavonia, Bohemia, near the town Eila, or at the mountains of Bohemia near Silesia, there be rivers whose waters are impregnated with gold; perhaps, the gold being dissolved by some corrosive waters, like aqua regis, and the solution carried along with the streame, that runs thro' the mines. And whether the practise of laying Mercury in the rivers 'till it be tinged with gold, and then straining the mercury thro' leather that the gold may stay behind, be a secret yet, or openly practised. 3. There is newly contrived in Holland a mill to grind glasses plane withall, and I think polishing them too, perhaps it will be worth the while to see it. 4. There is in Holland one ——— Borry, who some years since was imprisoned by the Pope, to have extorted from him secrets (as I am told) of great worth, both as to medicine and profit, but he escaped into Holland, where they have granted him a guard. I think he usually goes clothed in green. Pray inquire what you can of him, and whether his ingenuity be any profit to the Dutch. You may inform yourself whether the Dutch have any tricks to keep their ships from being all wormeaten in their voyages to the Indies. Whether pendulum clocks do any service in finding out the longitude, &c.

I am very weary, and shall not stay to part with a long compliment, only I wish you a good journey, and God be with you,

If. Newton.

Pray let us hear from you in your travells, I have given your 2 books to Dr Arrowfmith.

[EE] And

1727, there appeared a table of the assays of foreign coins, drawn up by him, and published at the end of Dr Arbuthnot's book on that subject. And the next year came abroad his Chronology, under this title: The Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms amended: To which is prefixed a short Chronicle, from the first Memory of things in Europe, to the Conquest of Persia by Alexander the Great. By Sir Isaac Newton. Dedicated to the Queen by Mr Conduit. In the advertisement prefixed to this work we are told, that, 'Though the Chronology of Ancient Kingdoms amended was writ by the author many years since, yet he lately revised it, and was actually preparing it for the press at the time of his death. But the Short Chronicle was never intended to be made publick, and therefore was not so lately corrected by him. To this the reader must impute it, if he shall find any places where the Short Chronicle does not accurately agree with the dates assigned in the larger piece. The sixth chapter was not copied out with the other five, which makes it doubtful whether he intended to print it; but being found among his papers, and evidently appearing to be a continuation of the same work, and as such abridged in the Short Chronicle, it was thought proper to be added (rrr).' Sir Isaac speaking of this work in 1725, says, when he lived at Cambridge, he used sometimes to refresh his memory with History and Chronology for a while, when he was weary with other studies (sss). Nevertheless, there is displayed in this work the same creative genius (if we may be allowed the expression) which informed his other researches. Accustomed to unravel chaoses, he has thrown light both into the dark and fabulous ages of Antiquity, and fixed an uncertain chronology; shewing himself herein no less a master in calculating the comparative degrees of moral evidence, than he was in applying the absolute force of mathematical demonstration. The chain of his argument is unavoidably sometimes so long, that even tolerable good capacities, in attempting to follow it, have, by dropping some of the links, lost the connection, and thence erroneously concluded him mistaken [EE]. In the piece, as we have it unfinished, there are, perhaps, a very few small errors of little consequence, which, however, probably would not have escaped his last revision. But he employed his first care upon the principal part; and his two main arguments, from Astronomy and the course of Nature, will always remain unshaken monuments of his supreme abilities among the best judges. All sorts of readers must find a very agreeable entertainment from his account of the heathen Mythology, of the origin and progress of Arts and Sciences, and a variety of curious observations of several kinds, which he has interspersed throughout the whole work. The generous and good-natured mind in particular, must needs be pleased to find him losing no opportunity of instilling those principles of virtue and humanity, which, by his conduct and writings, appear to have been always uppermost in his heart. He severely condemns all oppression, and every kind of cruelty even to brute beasts; he inculcates mercy, charity, and the indispensable duty of doing good, with the greatest warmth; and shews, that an abhorrence of idolatry and persecution was one of the earliest laws of the divine legislator; that in these things consisted the morality of the first ages, the primitive religion both of Jews and Christians; and that these ought to be the standing religion of all nations, they being both for the honour of God and the good of Society. This treatise must likewise be of considerable use to the Divine, as it sets the connection of Sacred and Prophane History in a new and clearer light than before, and furnishes him with many illustrations of several texts of Scripture, not to be found in the most celebrated commentators. After this, there came out his Observations on the Prophecies of Daniel and the Apocalypse of St John, Lond. 1733, 4to. Tho' this appears to be a very unfinished piece, yet there are seen some strokes in it which discover the hand of it's great master. Among other things, he has shewn the exact duration of our Saviour's ministry upon earth, by a strict demonstration; a difficulty which had mocked the efforts of the best wits before him. In 1734, Dr Berkley, Bishop of Cloyne in Ireland, in a piece intituled The Analyst, attacked his Method of Fluxions, as being obscure and unintelligible,

(rrr) Mr Whiston tells us, that Sir Isaac wrote out 18 copies of the first and principal chapter with his own hand, but little different one from another. Memoirs of his own Life, p. 354

(sss) Phil. Transf. No. 3891 p. 320.

[EE] And thence erroneously concluded him mistaken.] Sir Isaac expressly declares, that his endeavour was to make History consistent 1. With Astronomy; 2. The course of nature; 3. The Bible; 4. Herodotus, the father of history; and 5. With itself. And by a just application of these, according to the exact degree of probability in each, it is, that he settles 4 remarkable periods, whereby he determines all the rest. 1. The return of the Heraclides into Peloponnesus. 2. The Trojan war. 3. The Argonautic expedition. 4. The return of Sesostris into Egypt. Mr Fourmond* engages the astronomical argument separately, and is very laboriously profound in exposing the absolute uncertainty of it, as well from the vague account given of the ancient sphere by Hipparchus, as from the coarse observations of the ancient Astronomers. But he did not consider, that what he so painfully proves is granted by Sir Isaac, who therefore found a way of bringing the description of this ancient sphere to a great degree of exactness, by the argument from the course of nature, as is shewn in rem. [BE] In like manner Mr Freret, of the same academy, undertakes to shew, that Sesostris returned into Egypt much earlier than our author asserts, purely upon the concurrent testimony of Sanchoniatho, and other ancient historians †, † Ibid. forgetting that it was the groundless conjectures of these very historians, which put Sir Isaac first upon looking out for a better foundation in the course of nature and Astronomy. Mr Arthur Bedford's large work is entirely owing to the like inadvertency. And Dr Shuckford's warm animadversions, together with Dr Con. Middleton's affected drollery, may not unfitly be coupled to the flaming vanity of Mr Will. Whiston, who after telling us, that Sir Isaac was of the most fearful, cautious, and suspicious temper that he ever knew: And that he would not have done any thing which might have brought that great man's grey-hairs with sorrow to the grave, goes on thus. 'And had he been alive when I wrote against his Chronology, and so thoroughly confuted it, that nobody has ever ventured to vindicate it, that I know of, since my confutation was published, I should not have thought proper to publish it during his life time; because I knew his temper so well, that I should have expected it would have killed him (63).'

telligible, since the doctrine of Moments, upon which it was founded, necessarily involved a notion of infinity, whereof we can form no comprehensible or adequate idea *, and therefore ought to be excluded from all geometrical disquisitions (ttt). This gave rise to a controversy, which occasioned the publication of our author's Method of Fluxions and Analysis by Infinite Series. The treatise being written in Latin, was translated into English, and printed in 1736, 4to. with a perpetual commentary by Mr John Colson, the present Professor of Mathematics at Cambridge; wherein, among other things, he inserted a Defence of the Method against the Objections of Dr Berkley. The task, indeed, was not difficult; Sir Isaac was too clear-sighted not to perceive such objections, and accordingly had fully obviated them before, (viz. in schol. to sect. 1. of his Principia, and lemma 2. B. 11.) so much to the satisfaction of every intelligent and unprejudiced reader, that the great dust which has been raised about the whole of his doctrine, must be owing, as has been observed (uuu), either to weakness or some worse principle. In 1737, there was printed an English translation of A Latin Dissertation upon the Sacred Cubit of the Jews [FF], written by Sir Isaac (www). It was found subjoined to a work of his not finished, intitled Lexicon Propheticum. Lastly, in 1756, there was published in 8vo. Four Letters from Sir Isaac Newton to Dr Bentley, containing some arguments in proof of a Deity. These letters were wrote in the year 1692. Dr Bentley had been appointed to preach the first course of sermons of Mr Boyle's Lecture, and being intent to make the best figure he could on that occasion, he applied to our author for the solution of a difficulty which he had met with, in an argument urged by Lucretius, to prove the eternity of the world from an hypothesis of deriving the frame of it by mechanical principles, from matter endued with an innate principle of gravity [GG], evenly spread through the heavens. The hypothesis being inconsistent with Sir Isaac's system of the world, as laid down and demonstrated in the Principia, had been very little considered by him before this application. However, he easily satisfied all the doctor's queries upon the subject with great clearness; and it may be observed, that, as Dr Bentley established his fame by these sermons at Boyle's lecture, so that happiness was entirely owing to the assistance, publick and private, which he received from Sir Isaac Newton [HH].

* Sir Isaac's matters are considered only as indefinitely small, and involve no notion of positive infinity. And therein consists the excellence of his method, whereby the ultimate ratio of quantities, or the proportion of them in their nascent or evanescent states, is determined by the velocity of their generating motions, without considering their magnitudes at all.

[FF] A Dissertation upon the Sacred Cubit of the Jews. He has shewn, that this cubit was certainly between the limits of 26 and 27 Roman unciae, and thinks it probably consisted of 27  $\frac{1}{2}$  of those unciae.

In this piece there is seen one character of his genius, which distinguishes remarkably all his undertakings; I mean a talent of drawing the most hidden and unobserved truths from the most common and vulgar observations. Thus, his Method of Fluxions is founded upon the ordinary ideas of space, time, and motion. His Theory of Light and Colours was one part raised out of the well-known experiments of a prism, and the other out of a child's play of blowing bubbles with soap suds. His System of the World took it's beginning from seeing some apples fall from a tree in an orchard. His Chronology was fetched chiefly from an obvious observation concerning the lengths of kings reigns; and, suitable to this road of thinking, he has, in his Observations on Daniel, made a very curious as well as useful remark, that our Saviour's precepts were all occasioned by some ordinary circumstance of things then particularly before him.

[GG] Dr Bentley applied to our author for the solution of a difficulty concerning gravity. These letters furnish another evidence, besides what is already produced, of the injury that is done to Sir Isaac, in ascribing to him an opinion, that gravity is the immediate act of the Deity. In the second letter he writes thus, 'You sometimes speak of gravity as essential and inherent to matter. Pray don't ascribe that notion to me; for the cause of gravity is what I don't pretend to know, and therefore would take more time to consider of it.' And in the third letter he is still more explicit, so that he cannot possibly be mistaken. 'It is inconceivable, says he, that inanimate brute matter should, without the mediation of something else which is not material, operate upon and affect other matter, without mutual contact, as it must be, if gravitation, in the sense of Epicurus, be essential and inherent in it. And this is one reason why I desired you would not ascribe innate gravity to me. That gravity should be innate, inherent, and essential to matter, so that one body may act upon another at a distance through a vacuum, without the mediation of any thing else, by and through which their action and force may be conveyed from one to another, is to me so great an absurdity, that I believe no man, who has in philosophical matters a competent faculty of thinking, can ever fall into it. Gravity must be caused by an agent acting constantly according to certain laws; but whether this agent be material or immaterial I have left to the consideration of my readers.'

Mr Whitton having observed, that these sermons of Dr Bentley are, perhaps, the most valuable of all that great critic's performances, gives the following account of that excellence: viz. That herein he demonstrated the Being and Providence of God, from Sir Isaac Newton's wonderful discoveries, to such a degree of satisfaction, as to the sceptics or infidels themselves, that he informed that Memoir writer of a club of such people, who had heard his sermons, and were asked by a friend of his, at his desire, what they had to say against them, they honestly owned they did not know what to say; but added withal, What's this to the fable of Jesus Christ? In regard to this question, Mr Whitton also further informs us, that after Dr Bentley had preached his second year's sermons, having a design to make them publick, he applied to Bishop Lloyd, for leave to insert some of his Lordship's predictions from the Scripture prophecies into the preface (64); urging, that upon their completion they might be of service to Christianity. But these sermons were never printed. The reason of which, continues my author, will appear by what follows: Upon his [Bentley's] application to the Bishop, and the Bishop's frank and open answers, he was so far from being satisfied, that he immediately began to suppose, that his disappointment arose from the sacred books of Daniel and the Revelation themselves, and not only from his own or the Bishop's misunderstanding them. He was offended that the Bishop understood a day in the prophecies to denote a year in their completion; as all expositors had done before him, and as the ancient language of prophecy plainly implied (65). Nay, continues Mr Whitton, to greatly was he offended at this interpretation, that he long afterwards bluntly asked Sir Isaac Newton himself (with whom I had brought him acquainted about A. D. 1696), who thus expounded the prophecies also, whether he could demonstrate the same. Sir Isaac Newton was so greatly offended at this, as invidiously alluding to his being a Mathematician, which science was not concerned in this matter, that he would not see him, as Dr Bentley told me himself, for a twelvemonth afterward. The correspondence mentioned in the text evidently shews Mr Whitton's mistake in the parenthesis here inserted by him, and was apparently a slip of his vanity; which, however, ought not to prejudice the credit of his narrative in relation to the fact of Sir Isaac Newton's just resentment, especially as it is entirely consonant to his general character; and, indeed, is only one instance, though an admirable one, among many others, of his excellent good sense.

(64) Part of these sermons were preached upon some of those Prophecies. Memoirs of W. Whitton, &c. p. 94. 2d edit. 1753, 8vo.

NICOLSON [WILLIAM] [A], a late learned writer, and successively Bishop of Carlisle, of Londonderry, and Archbishop of Cashell (the two last in Ireland), was the son of Joseph Nicolson, Rector of Plumland in Cumberland (a), and born [B] about the year 1655 (b). In 1670, he became a student of Queen's-college in Oxford; and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts February 23, 1675-6 (c). Soon after which; his countryman, and perhaps relation, Sir Joseph Williamson, one of the Principal Secretaries of State, sent him to travel into Germany: and that enabled him to give the fine description of that country, which is printed in Pitt's Atlas (d) [C]. We are told, that he did undergo many and great hardships in his travels: however, that did not hinder him from visiting France also (e). July 3, 1679, he took the degree of Master of Arts (f), and was chosen Fellow of his college: about which time he became Chaplain to Dr Edward Rainbow, Bishop of Carlisle (g), who gave him, November 17, 1681, a Prebend in his church; October 3, 1682, the Archdeaconry of Carlisle; and also the Vicarage of Torpenhoe (b) [D]. Being a great master of the History and Antiquities of England, he published, in 1696, the first part of his English Historical Library, of which the second and third parts were printed afterwards [E]. He published also the Scottish [F] and Irish Historical Libraries [G]. Upon the death of Dr Thomas Smith, he was promoted in his room to the Bishopric of Carlisle. His congé d'eslire bore date May 8, 1702, and he was consecrated June 14th following (i). The 23d of the same month of June, he was created by diploma Doctor in Divinity at Oxford (k). In the year 1717, he had an unhappy contest with Benjamin, then Bishop of Bangor, and afterwards of Winchester [H]; which

[A] Nicolson.] Thus he writ his name, as appears from his works; and not Nicholson, with an b. And indeed the writing of it so is an impropriety; for the word Nicolas from whence Nicolson is formed, in Greek, [from which 'tis derived,] is written Νικόλαος, and not Νιχόλαος. This observation may by some be reckoned too minute; but exactness and propriety are commendable qualifications in every writer.

[B] And born.] Walter Harris, Esq; informs us (1), that he was born at Orton in Cumberland.

[C] And that enabled him to give the fine description of that country, which is printed in Pitt's Atlas.] The share our learned Author had in that work, is as follows. In the 1st. Volume, printed at Oxford in 1680 fol. the Description of Poland, and of Denmark were drawn up by him. In the 2d. Volume, printed at the same place in 1681. fol. he composed the Description of part of the Empire of Germany, viz the Upper and Lower Saxony, the Dukedoms of Mecklenburgh, Bremen, Magdeburgh, &c. the Marquises of Brandenburg and Misnia, with the Territories adjoining, the Palatinate of the Rhine, and the Kingdom of Bohemia. The 3d. Volume, which he also compiled, contains a Description of the remaining part of the Empire, viz Schwabenn, the Palatinate of Bavaria, Archdukedome of Austria, Kingdom of Hungary, Principality of Transilvania, the Circle of Westphalia; with the neighbouring Provinces. Oxford. 1683. fol.

[D] And also the Vicarage of Torpenhoe.] Walter Harris, Esq; styles him Vicar of Blenerhaslet in the Diocese of Carlisle (2): But that is only a Hamlet, or Village, in the parish of Torpenhoe.

[E] Of which the second and third Parts were printed afterwards.] The second part was first printed in 1697. and the third part in 1699. A second Edition of all these Three Parts together, corrected and augmented, was published in 1714. in a thin folio. But the Scottish Historical Library was not reprinted with them, as is asserted in the General Dictionary (3).

[F] He published also the Scottish.] It was published in 1702. 8vo. under this title, 'The Scottish Historical Library: Containing a Short View and Character of most of the Writers, Records, Registers, Law-Books, &c. which may be serviceable to the Undertakers of a General History of Scotland, down to the Union of the two Kingdoms in King James the VI. with an Appendix.' To it is prefixed a long Preface, which is almost word for word the same as a Pamphlet published by our Author in 1702. 4to. and intitled, 'A Letter to the Reverend Dr White Kennet, D. D. in defence of the English Historical Library: Against the unmannerly and slanderous Objections of Mr Francis Atterbury, Preacher at the Rolls, in his new Theory of the Rights, Powers, and Privileges of an English Convocation.'

[G] And Irish Historical Library.] This was not published 'till 1724. at Dublin, 8vo. after our learned

Author's translation to the Bishopric of Derry. The title of it is, 'The Irish Historical Library. Pointing at most of the Authors and Records in Print or Manuscript, which may be serviceable to the Compilers of a General History of Ireland.' With an Appendix; containing, an Account of several ancient Irish Historians, Annals, &c. refer'd to by Dr Keating; a Translation of the Irish Preface, to Mr Lhuyd's Irish Dictionary; and of the Welsh Preface to his Glossography, &c.—Walter Harris, Esq; observes, that our Author 'fell into many Errors in this last work, for want of sufficient acquaintance with the Irish manuscripts and language: But, notwithstanding that, (adds he) much Thanks are due to him, for the extraordinary pains he took to inform himself about the materials, which may be had for improving Irish History (4).'

It must be confessed indeed, that not only the Irish, but also the English and Scottish Historical Libraries, abound with Mistakes: Though it is true, that a Work of that infinite Variety, and wherein such Numbers of Books are mentioned and characteriz'd without the Author's having an Opportunity of examining them All himself, cannot be suppos'd to be exempt from Faults. With regard to MSS. the mistakes are excusable. But they are not so with respect to printed, and common, Books. And yet even in these, our learned Author is frequently mistaken. We shall only instance in two very common Chronicles, Holinshed's, and Hall's. He saith (5), that 'all that is left out, or castrated, in Holinshed's Chronicle, relates to 'Royal Grants in favour of the Lord Cobham, and his Ancestors.' Whereas of 39 sheets that are castrated, or left out, there are only about seven and a half relating to the Cobham-family, and they do not appear in 1586, or 1587 *, to have been in disgrace.—Next, the Character he gives of Hall's Chronicle is injurious, and not according to truth. 'If the Reader, says he, desires to know what sort of cloaths were worn in each King's reign, and how the fashions alter'd this is an Historian for his purpose; but in other matters his information is not very valuable.' On the contrary, persons that have thoroughly examined it, have found, that it is equal in value and authority to our Records.—And the Character he gives of many other Authors is not free from prejudice.

[H] In the year 1717, he had an unhappy contest with Benjamin, then Bishop of Bangor, &c.] This Dispute was Accidentally occasioned by the Bangorian controversy, as it was then called; that is, the Controversy raised by the Bishop of Bangor's Sermon, preached before the King, March 31, 1717, on John xviii. 36. and intitled, The Nature of the Kingdom, or Church, of Christ. For, Dr Snape, in his Second Letter to the Bishop of Bangor (6), having address'd himself to him thus,—'I pray recollect yourself, and put these plain Questions home to your conscience: Whether your Absolutely's and Properly's, and such like evasive words, were not omitted in your Sermon, as it was originally compos'd? Whether you did which did not turn to the honour of one or both of them. However, that dispute was said to have been the cause of Bishop Nicolson's removal to Ireland; namely, his translation to the see of Londonderry, by letters patent dated the 2d of May, 1718. While he continued in that Bishoprick, he built an apartment near his garden at Derry for the preservation of the manuscripts and records relating to that see. On the 28th of January, 1726-7, he was translated to the Archbishoprick of Cashell, and made Primate of Munster, in the room of Dr William Palliser. But he dyed suddenly at Derry the 13th of February following, having enjoyed his last dignity but a few days (l). He was confessedly a man of very great learning; to whom the world is much indebted, not only for what he has published in Antiquity, but in universal Sciences (m) [I].

did not before it was preach'd shew it a certain Person (7) without such limitations? And whether you was not with Difficulty prevail'd upon by him, to infer them by way of caution? If you think fit to answer the world in the Negative, I engage that a person of unquestionable Veracity, of as high and sacred a Station as your Lordship (8), will charge himself with the proof of the Affirmative.—His produc'd a very angry Advertisement from the Bishop of Bangor, June 28, wherein he solemnly averr'd, 'That the words mentioned as evasive words, not only were in the Sermon originally, but were intended and designed to be so; that he did not, before it was preach'd, shew it to any person in the world, either with, or without, such limitations;' and called upon Dr Snape, either to make public reparation, or to produce immediately that worthy person of the same high and sacred station. Whereupon Dr Snape published an Advertisement, June 29, wherein he declared, that he 'First received that account from a worthy Divine (9), who assur'd him, he heard the Lord Bishop of Carlisle declare, That he had spoke with the person who advis'd my Lord of Bangor, upon reading his Sermon, to infer such words as Absolutely, &c. That some days after, the same Divine did again assure him, he had heard the same worthy Prelate, a second time declare that matter to be true, and that he would justify it to all the world, &c.' To this Advertisement Bishop Nicolson subscribed, This is true W. Carlisl. Upon that, Bishop Hoadley put out a flaming Advertisement, to which Bishop Nicolson replied in another, wherein he hath these words.—'I never did affirm, that the words Absolutely, Properly, &c. were inserted in his Sermon, by way of Caution, before it was Preach'd; but that before it was Publish'd, they were so inserted, I did (and do still) verily believe.'—And soon after, Dr White Kennett, Dean of Peterburgh, was named, as the Person to whom Bishop Hoadley had shewn his Sermon before he Preach'd it; who had advis'd him to put in some limitations; and who had told Bishop Nicolson so. But Dr Kennett declared in a letter to his Lordship, 'That he had no manner of correspondence with the Bishop of Bangor about the Preaching and Publishing his Sermon: That he never saw or heard any one paragraph in it, before it came out of the press:—And that he must ever declare, in the most solemn manner, that he never suggest'd to Bishop Nicolson, nor to any mortal man, that the Sermon was preach'd with his knowledge, or submitted to his correction.' On the contrary, Bishop Nicolson declared in the most solemn manner, That Dr Kennett had actually told him so, in his study (viz. Dr Kennett's). All this is contain'd in a pamphlet publish'd by Bishop Nicolson, under the title of, 'A Collection of Papers scatter'd lately about the Town in the Daily Courant, St James's Post, &c. with some Remarks upon them. In a Letter from the Bishop of Carlisle to the Bishop of Bangor.' Lond. 1717, 8vo.

Dated at Carlisle, Nov. 23, 1685. Published in the same No.—These two Letters are also inserted in Bishop Gibson's Edition of Camden's Britannia (11). 4. Bishop Nicolson wrote, likewise, a very learned Latin Epistle to Dr David Wilkins, concerning his new Edition of the Anglo Saxon Laws, Lond. 1721, fol. which is prefixed to that work. 5. And, a Natural History of Cumberland, in Dr Plot's method (12) But it still remains in manuscript. 6. Moreover, he is supposed to be the author of the following piece. NORRIS [JOHN], an eminent Mystic Divine, was born about the year 1657 in Wiltshire; his father, a clergyman of good repute [A], being first Minister of Collingbourne-Kingston, and thence removed to the rectory of Aubourne or Aldbourne in that county. In the design of breeding this son to his own profession, he sent him to Winchester-school, and thence, at the age of nineteen, to Oxford, where he was entered of Exeter-college in Michaelmas term, 1676 (a). Having made a good proficiency in classical learning at school, he applied with greater advantage to the academical studies; wherein, not contenting himself with the lesser systems of the sciences usually taught by tutors in the university, he went to the fountain-head, and took into his hands the ancient great masters of Philosophy, Plato, Xenophon, and Aristotle. Being particularly delighted with the first of these, he studied his works with extraordinary diligence, and drank in his notions with eagerness (b). At the regular time, in Act term, June 15, 1680 (c), he took his first degree in Arts, and was soon after elected Fellow of All-Souls-college. Having obtained so favourable a situation to his wishes, he indulged his genius in pursuing Plato through all his most abstracted speculations. But being of a melancholy and devout temper (d), he was easily led, from the principles of that Philosophy, into the likewise, in 1685, printed a piece left by his father in manuscript, intitled, A Discourse concerning the pretended Religions, assembling in private Conventicles; wherein the unlawfulness, and unreasonableness of it, are fully evidenced by several Arguments. 8vo.

the most visionary refinements of the Mystic Theology; and taking up Father Malebranche's Search after Truth, which chiefly was at that time in great vogue, he presently became a most zealous disciple of that French Philosopher, and commenced a professed Idealist. The first undertaking which brought the turn of his genius into the notice of the University was, the translation into English of a little piece, then in good esteem among the wits of that place, intitled, Effigies Amoris (e), &c. which came out in 1682, in 12mo. under the title of The Picture of Love unveiled [B]. He likewise published, A Translation from the Greek of Hierocles upon the Golden Verses of Pythagoras (f), the same year in 8vo. He discovered some tincture of his enthusiastic Divinity in his Idea of Happiness [C], which was printed the next year (g). In the mean time, he did not bury himself

[B] The Picture of Love unveiled. The whole title of the original runs thus: Effigies Amoris, sive quid sit amor efflagitanti responsum. It was writ by Robert Waryng, a student of Christ Church, and a cavalier, who bore arms in the garrison of Oxford for King Charles I. (2). It was first printed in 1649, in 12mo. from the original copy, by Mr John Birkenhead, at the request of the author, who chose to have his name concealed because of his loyalty, as the publisher informs us. The third edition came out after the Restoration, by William Griffith, who in his Præloquium observes, that this author, with Cartwright, Gregory, Digges, and J. Birkenhead, were Numina Oxonia Tutelaria, every one having, Ingenium cœlitus delapsum, quæ quasi numina dum intra mœnia retinuit sua perflitit Oxonium, nec hostili cedens fraudi, nec infestis inimicorum succumbens armis. In 1668, there was printed a fourth edition of this performance. Mr Norris, in his preface to his translation declares, that he admires the author for his sweetness of fancy, neatness of his stile, and lusciousness of hidden sense: by this last expression our translator discovers his own taste and genius. He must needs have been some time conversant with Plato's writings, and have imbibed that Philosopher's doctrine, with a strong relish, to taste the lusciousness of the hidden sense in this little tract, since the Effigies Amoris is a mere philosophical rhapsody, upon the Platonic conceit, that love is the sole principle in nature; Amor mundi, parens rerum ex discordia concentum elaboravit; dressed out in the humorous way, something after the manner of the Moriz Encomium of Erasmus.

[C] Idea of happiness. Here he first discovered a tincture of Enthusiasm. He was naturally inclined to melancholy, and indulging himself in the Platonic reveries, he grew exorbitantly fond of the rapturous and mystic theology. Scire tuum nihil est nisi te scire hoc sciat alter, says the satirist (3); and being once possessed with the happy illusion, like other enamourats, his humanity and benevolence would not suffer him to conceal the sweet secret from the world, in the view of shewing others the way to the same blissful fruition; in this spirit he wrote the letter, and intitled his Essay, An Idea of Happiness; in a Letter concerning in what the greatest Happiness attainable by Man in this Life does consist. Having laid it down, that Happiness consists only in the fruition of God, he proceeds to explain the nature of that fruition, and asserting the insufficiency of a virtuous life to that purpose, as the word Virtue is understood by the Stoicks, Peripatetics, and the generality of other moralists, he takes the word in that higher sense, which frequently occurs in the Pythagorean and Platonic writings, in contemplation and the unitive way of religion. 'This, in contradistinction to moral virtue, they call divine virtue; the former is a state of proficiency, the latter of perfection: in the former is a state of difficulty and contention, the latter of ease and security: the former is employed in mastering the passions and regulating the actions of common life, the latter in divine meditation and the extasies of seraphic love. He that has only the former, is like Moses, with much difficulty climbing up to the holy mount; but he that has the latter, is like the same person conversing with God on the serene top of it, and shining with rays of anticipated glory. This is the last stage of human perfection, the utmost round of the ladder whereby we ascend to heaven, one step higher is glory. 'Here then, continues he, will I build my tabernacle, for it is good to be here.' He then goes on to treat of contemplation, which he takes in a peculiar sense, as it signifies an habitual attentive study, application, and conversion of the spirit to God and his divine perfections. 'Of this, says he, the masters of mystic Theology commonly make fifteen degrees. The first is intuition of truth; the second is a retirement of all the vigor and strength of the faculties into the innermost parts of the soul. The third is spiritual silence. The fourth is rest. The fifth is union. The sixth is hearing the still voice of God. The seventh is spiritual slumber. The eighth is extasy. The ninth is rapture. The tenth is the corporeal appearance of Christ and the Saints. The eleventh is the imaginary appearance of the same. The twelfth is the intellectual vision of God. The thirteenth is the union of God in obscurity. The fourteenth is an admirable manifestation of God. The fifteenth is a clear and intuitive vision of him, such as St Austin and Thomas Aquinas attribute to St Paul, when he was wrapt into the third heaven. Others of them, continues he, reckon only seven degrees, viz. Taste, Desire, Satiety, Ebriety, Security, Tranquillity, but the name of the seventh, they say, is known only to God. However, he does not agree with the severe Platonists, who finding their master to define contemplation λύσις ἐξ ἁρρήσις τῆς ψυχῆς ἀπὸ σώματος, a solution and separation of the soul from the body, understood it literally and absolutely; yet he says there are exceeding great measures of abstraction in it; so great, that sometimes, whether a man be in the body or out of the body, he himself can hardly tell; and consequently the soul in these præludiums of death, these neighbourhoods of separation, must needs have higher glimpses and beatific ideas of God, than in a state void of these elevations, and consequently must love him with greater ardency. This brings him to consider this love, which he will have to be not only intellectual, but passionate; the motion of the will being accompanied with a sensible commotion of the spirits, and an effusion of the blood; and animadverting on an argument against this opinion, it is not, says he, all the sophistry of the cold logicians that shall work me out of the belief of what I feel and know, and rob me of the sweetest entertainment of my life, the passionate love of God; whatever some men may pretend, who are strangers to all the affectionate heats of religion, and therefore make their Philosophy a plea for their indevotion, and extinguish all holy ardors with a syllogism. Yea, I am firmly persuaded, that our love of God may be not only passionate, but exceeding the love of women: he endeavours to prove this from the use of church-music, and maintains, that though the beauty of God be not the same with that which we see in corporeal beings, and as it comes intellectually, cannot directly fall within the sphere of the imagination, yet it is something analogous to it, and that very analogy is enough to excite a passion; he concludes with describing the nature and force of seraphic love, which is to love God with the utmost capacity of a mortal creature in this life, when a man, after having many degrees of abstraction from the animal life, many a profound and steady meditation upon the excellencies of God, sees such a vast ocean of beauty and perfection, that he loves him to the utmost stretch of his power. When he sits under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit is sweet to his taste (4). When he consecrates and devotes himself wholly to him, and has no passion for inferior objects. When he is ravished with delights of his service, and breathes out some of his soul to him in every prayer. When he is delighted with the antems of praise and adoration more than marrow and fatness (5), and seals upon hallelujahs. When he melts into a calature of devotion, and his soul breaketh out with fervent desires. When the one thing he delights in is to converse with God in the beauty of holiness, and the one thing he desires is to see him in heaven. This is seraphic love, and this with contemplation, make up that which the mystic Divines stile the unitive way of religion. By union, he does not understand that self so entirely in these abstracted ideas, as not to observe or be affected with what passed in the world. Upon the discovery of the Rye-House plot, and several persons concerned in it, he published a piece, intitled, A Murnival of Knaves, or Whiggism plainly displayed, and burlesqued out of countenance. He likewise attacked the Calvinistic Dissenters, in another tract written in Latin, and printed this year with the following title: Tractatus adversus Reprobationis Absolutæ Decretum nova metodo & succinctissimo compendio adornatus, & in duos libros digestus, 8vo. To the end of the third chapter of the second book is inserted a declamation, spoken in the publick schools, commending the Roman Senate for banishing all Mathematicians (b) out of their dominions. This was apparently part of the academical exercise for his degree of Master of Arts, which he proceeded accordingly to take April 22, 1684, and entered into Holy Orders not long afterwards (i); and the same year he published the first edition of his Miscellanies, under the title of Poems and Discourses occasionally written. The celebrated Dr Henry More of Cambridge had been now many years at the head of the mystic divines in England; all his writings had been greedily devoured by our author, who had thereby conceived the highest opinion of his abilities; and, being puzzled in his enquiries into some abstruse points of Metaphysics and Moral Philosophy, he took the liberty of communicating his difficulties in a letter to the doctor [D] this year, 1684, which begun a correspondence between them, that ended only in the death of that ingenious divine (k). During this literary intercourse, our author having occasionally advanced some curious remarks upon the subject of human liberty, which is local, nor that of grace, nor yet that of charity; these two last being common to all men who indeed love God, but want the excellency of contemplative and mystic union; the union which these speak of, is between the faculty and the object, consisting of some habitude or operation of one towards the other. The faculties are the understanding and will, and the object God, and the operations contemplation and love; the result of which two in the mystic union, is thus admirably represented by Bishop Taylor (6). It is, says he, a prayer of quietness and silence, and a meditation extraordinary, a discourse without variety, a vision and intuition of divine excellencies, an immediate entry into an orb of light, and a resolution of all our faculties into sweetness, affections, and starings upon the divine Beauty, and is carried on to extasies, raptures, suspensions, elevations, abstractions, and apprehensions beatifical.

[D] A correspondence upon some abstruse points of Metaphysics and Moral Philosophy, 1684] Our author opened this correspondence in an eloquent Latin letter from All-Souls college, dated January 8th, 1684; wherein he applied to Dr More for a resolution of some difficulties in his Enchiridion Metaphysicum, about the nature of space, which Mr Norris, it seems, could not readily conceive to be infinitely extended, as this doctor had asserted, because it was a permanent quantity, all whose parts existed together, or were co-existent; since to exist, according to all it's parts at once, is to be inclosed within certain limits, as any number, how big soever, is contained under some certain species of number, and therewithal conceived finite, as the term [all] also implies. This is easily solved by the doctor, who observes, that his space being incorporeal, had properly no parts, and was indiscernible, and that by totum or all, was understood not the comprehensibleness, or limitableness, or exhaustibility of the number of the parts, but merely the entireness, indefectuousness, or perfection of the thing, or that there is nothing left out of it. It cannot be denied that the difficulty which so intangled him is really very shallow and slight, and by no means equal to his usual sagacity. But if we consider the time when it was made, it will perhaps appear to be no discredit to his understanding: Sir Isaac Newton had not yet published his Principia. Des Cartes was in full possession of authority, and among others, greatly admired by our author's correspondent (7). But though in the beginning of his address to Dr More, he yields to that doctor's arguments as convincing, that space is immobile, extensible, and distinct from moveable matter, he could not tell how to apprehend that there should be any incorporeal substance infinite besides God; a difficulty which has since puzzled the best wits, and has put some upon denying the reality of space. To this purpose a late author (8) expresses himself in these words, 'Some will say that we may conceive in space real distinction, but not real divisions, that we may discover in it heights, lengths, and breadths, and yet no separable parts, and therefore, though it may be partially apprehended, yet it cannot be mentally nor really divided. I answer, that this is true; because, as we shall shew, space is not a real substance; but if it were a real substance that existed by diffusion, then it would be both mentally and really divisible.' On this principle he afterwards endeavours to demonstrate, that infinite space is an abstract idea of the manner according to which bodies exist by extension, and yet it has no objective reality without us, but is a mere notion and an Ens Rationis, a work of our own thoughts. But to return to Mr Norris, who, it seems, found a particular difficulty in conceiving space to be infinite, as being quantitas permanens; aliter, inquit ille, rem se habere in quantitate successiva, cujus partes existunt alia post alias, quæ quoniam quantamcumque appositionem incrementi alterius capax est, suo modo censeri possit infinita. To this the doctor answers, 'that it is only permanent quantity, and spiritual and indiscernible, whose parts are all at once, that is, capable of absolute infinity; but as for successive quantity, it is not capable of being infinite, neither a parte ante, nor a parte post; but, continues he, your fancy seems unawares to have transferred the property of successive quantity to the permanent, and so, because, as soon as we can say of successive quantity there is all of it, it implies certainly there is an end of it, and so it is finite; so you seem unawares to have imagined, because it is true of the parts of permanent quantity, that there is all of them at once, therefore they are now exhausted as the parts of successive quantity were, and therefore are finite; this I think is the sophism you put upon yourself, but you are the best judge of your own meaning.' Whether the doctor's conjecture was right or no, our author confesses himself satisfied in the solution of this difficulty, and had sense enough to ramble no farther in space; and in so doing, I doubt not his conduct will be applauded by all those whose heads not being disturbed by the vapours, keep aloof from sinking in a pit of bottomless ideas; but what shall be said for our author's ready acquiescence in the doctor's resolution of his second difficulty, about the penetrability of spirits, where he declares himself satisfied with the notion of essential spissitude, or a fourth dimension actually existing in verum natura, besides the three allowed ones of longitude, latitude, and profundity, and by such means these substances can retain themselves into a lesser ubi than they had before. He submitted the more willingly to this conceit, from the pious use that was made of it in answering the objections, and so forbore to push the notion any further, which would have run him into absurdities equal with those of the materialists or atheistical Spinozism. I believe we may venture to lay down this for an indubitable truth, that tho' we are sure that immaterial substances do exist, yet the manner of their existence is to us at present incomprehensible, which, however, is far from proving it to be impossible. The moral point upon which these letters turn, relates to the pleasure of the venereal contact, or, as it is called by Jos. Scaliger, the 6th Sense, in which Dr More determines there is no moral turpitude, the consciousness of it not being sinful, but only in the gross indulgence.

in a sermon preached before the university of Oxford on Midlent Sunday, in 1685, published the discourse (l), with a dedication to that gentleman [E]. The same year there came out KYROΠAIΔΕΙΑ, or the Institution of Cyrus the Great, written by that famous Philosopher and General Xenophon of Athens, and from the original Greek made English; the first four books by Francis Digby, late of Queen's-college in Oxford; the four last by John Norris, Fellow of A'-Soul's-college, Oxford. And King Charles the Second dying this year, our author expressed his grief in a pastoral poem on that occasion (m). In 1688, he published The Theory and Regulation of Love [F]; wherein he advanced some notions contrary to the vulgar sentiments, being entirely new and unblown upon, by the reduction of all virtue and vice to the various modifications of love. In 1689, he was presented to the rectory of [E] During this literary intercourse our author published a sermon on the subject of Liberty, and dedicated it to the doctor. It is intitled, The Root of Liberty. In reality it was intolerably performed, upon this arduous subject he even maintains a flat contradiction. Liberty, says he, cannot lie in the will, because that necessarily follows the dictates of the understanding, and this too necessarily judges as the object appears; hence the immediate subject of freedom, is neither in the soul as volent nor as intelligent; whence the true root of liberty consists, in the advertency or attention of the understanding to the object, which appears to it differently, according to the different degrees of that attention. Here it is evident, as Dr More observes, that he inadvertently falls into the notion which was at first rejected by him, since the advertency or attention is manifestly an act of the will, or of the soul as volent. However he persists finally in his first determination, and indeed both Locke and Limborch have split upon the same rock* And being here summed up in a short compass by our author, it may not be amiss to insert it. 1. A creature void of liberty, cannot be capable of law or obligation, virtue or vice, reward or punishment, is certain. 2. Man is capable of all these, is certain. 3. Man therefore is endowed with liberty, is certain. 4. That liberty is a rational perfection belonging to an intelligent nature, is certain. 5. That therefore this liberty must be subjected either in the understanding or, will, or to speak more properly, in the soul as intelligent, or in the soul as volent, is certain. 6. That it cannot be subjected in that part which acts necessarily, is certain. 7. That the will necessarily follows the dictate of the understanding, or that the soul necessarily wills according as she understands, is certain. 8. That therefore this liberty cannot immediately be subjected in the will or in the soul as volent, is certain. 9. That therefore it must be subjected in the soul as intelligent, is certain. 10. That even the soul as intelligent, so far as it acts necessarily, cannot be the immediate subject of liberty, is also certain. 11. That the soul as intelligent, necessarily judges according as the object appears to her, is certain. 12. That therefore the soul, as judging or forming a judgment, can no more be the immediate subject of liberty than the soul as volent, is certain. 13. That since the soul necessarily wills as she judges, and necessarily judges as things appear to her, we have thus far no glimpse of liberty, is certain. 14. That therefore our liberty must be founded upon the necessity of some certain things appearing determinately thus or thus, or that we have no liberty at all, is certain. 15. That this appearing thus or thus, unless in self evident propositions, depends upon the various degrees of advertency or attention, and nothing else, is certain. 16. That therefore we have an immediate power of attending or not attending, or of attending more or less, is certain. 17. That therefore this indifferency of the soul as to attending or not attending, or attending more or less, is the prime root and immediate subject of human liberty, is no less certain: which was the point to be demonstrated. Thus we see he assumes this indifferency as a third principle in the soul, distinct from the will and understanding.

[F] The theory and regulation of love. Love was a subject upon which, it seems, Mr Norris had spent the greatest share of his thoughts, and as he had an æthereal genius, which carried him to soar far above the limits of this sublunary world, it is no wonder that we find him stretching beyond the reach of a sound wit by too much thinking; many of the notions of this tract are the same with those in the Effigies Amoris abovementioned, particularly in the passage Lupus agnam, ignis aquam depascitur, nullo odio sed sui conservandi studio, &c. (9) in which he gives us here the luscious secret of that author, viz. that there cannot be a pure and uninterested malice, though there can be a pure and uninterested charity; since in malice, says he, we necessarily consider another will, as making for our good some way or other, and so willing to it. In the same manner he explains (with that author) self-love, in such a loose sense, as is not only consistent with, but actually comprehends, a perfectly disinterested benevolence. This piece is dedicated to Lady Masham, who, as he here declares, had professed an esteem for some of his former writings; yet this ingenious and learned lady afterwards published a discourse concerning the Love of God, where she attacks an opinion, as she says, maintained by our author in his Practical Discourses, that mankind is obliged directly as his duty, to love with desire nothing but God only, every degree of desire of any creature whatsoever, being sinful, since God, not the creature, is the immediate efficient cause of our sensations: for whatsoever gives us pleasure, has a right to our love, but God only gives us pleasure, therefore he only has a right to our love. It is true, the bad consequences of such a scheme are represented in a strong light by that ingenious lady, but perhaps with too much hastiness is ascribed to Mr Norris, who, in this tract, expressly defends the lawfulness of all sensual pleasure, and our desire of it, in the following words: 'I add, that even the grossest pleasures of sense is one of the remotest participations of God; for it must be granted to be at least a natural good, and every particular good, be what it will, is a ray and emanation of the universal good, but now nothing of God can be simply and absolutely evil. And besides that, I consider in the human frame, God has prepared organs and instruments for the use of sensual pleasure, and that he has also given us natural appetites to it, whereby it appears that God has provided gratifications for the animal, as well as the vine life, and though this is chiefly to be nourished, yet the other is not to be starved: for it is a tree of God's own planting, and therefore the fruit of it may be good for food, as well as fine to the eye, for there can be nothing entirely evil in the paradise of God, as it is finally made out by the excellent Dr [Henry] More, in several places of his Conjectura Cabalistica, where the reader may find this argument copiously and very ingeniously managed.' Mr Norris, in 1690, published a piece, intitled, Reflections upon the Conduct of Human Life, with reference to the Study of Learning and Knowledge; in a Letter to the Excellent Lady, the Lady Masham, 8vo, where, in the dedication, he speaks of that lady as being then blind, which Mr Locke, who then lived at her house, made himself merry with, at our author's expense, as has been already observed (10). We must not omit, that some years before these letters cited in the margin passed, our author published his Treatise of Christian Blessedness, or a Discourse upon the Beatitudes of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ; to which he subjoined curfory Reflections upon a Book called, An Essay concerning Human Understanding, which he afterwards profecuted more largely in the Second or relative Part of his Essay of the Ideal World, wherein the intelligible World is considered, with relation to Human Understanding, whereof some Account is here attempted and proposed. Edit. 1704. 8vo. Mr Molyneux made the following censure on the Reflections, &c. in a letter to Mr Locke, dated December 22, 1692; 'Mr Norris's unfortunate attempts, says he, on your book, sufficiently testifies it's validity; and truly I think he trifles so egregiously, that I think he should forsworn all men how they criticize on your work.' However, Mr Norris, to the second edition of Christian Blessedness with the Reflections, subjoined a reply to the Remarks made upon them by the Athenian Society, which was printed in 1692 (11).

of Newton St Loe in Somersetshire (n); upon which occasion he entered into matrimony, and resigned his fellowship at All-Souls-college; and the same year he gave the publick another treatise, entituled, Reason and Religion, or the Grounds and Measures of Devotion considered, from the Nature of God and the Nature of Man, in several Contemplations; with Exercises of Devotion applied to every Contemplation, 8vo. This was followed the next year, 1690, by his Reflections upon the Conduct of Human Life, with reference to the Study of Learning and Knowledge (o), in a Letter to the excellent Lady, the Lady Masham. This address was occasioned by that lady's having expressed a good esteem for some of his writings; and he here repays the compliment with such attestations of her Ladyship's worth and learning as were justly her due. But this drawing him into a suitable condoleance of her misfortune in the supposed loss of her eye-sight, which was a mistake, furnished his antagonist Mr Locke, who then resided with her Ladyship, with a subject for some mirthful raiillery (p). In this piece our author had dropped some expressions, which, being understood by the Quakers to favour their opinions, drew him into a dispute with an eminent person of that sect [G]; in the course of which, he wrote two

[G] Drew him into a dispute with an eminent person of that sect. In speaking of the light within, as untowardly represented by the Quakers, he says, 'The thing itself rightly understood, is true, and if any shall yet call it Quakerism or Enthusiasm, that it is Quakerism as makes a good part of St John's Gospel, and St Austin's Works.' And so again, in his postscript he declares, that 'If the Quakers understood their own notion, and knew how to explain it, it would not differ from his.' Mr Vickeris an eminent Quaker, endeavoured to make an advantage of this, supposing it greatly befriending the cause of Quakerism, as implying a sort of confession to their principles; and that the difference would only be in terminis: this suggestion much nettled our author, it touched him in a tender point, What, should his darling hypothesis be brought into the scandal of Quakerism? 'Is the man, says he, in good earnest, or does he think that he writes to one that understands not what belongs to consequences? What, does the general truth of any notion rightly stated, infer the truth of this, or that particular way of explaining it? If Mr Vickeris had but been at the pains to deck himself with a little more of that corrupt wisdom, called Logic, he would never have imposed on himself, nor have offered to impose upon me such womanish consequences as these.' As our author, in this postscript, states the differences between his notion of the divine light, and the Quaker's light within, by the advantage of an immediate contrast, conveys a clearer idea of both, and that also in fewer words, than is easily met with elsewhere; we shall gratify our reader with a sight of them. They are therefore as follow.

1. 'The Quakers usually talk of this light within, as of some divine communication or manifestation only; whereas, I make it to be the very essence and substance of the Deity, which I suppose virtually to contain all things in it, and to be intimately united to our minds. 2. The Quakers represent this light within, as a sort of extraordinary inspiration, whence they have the name of Enthusiasts; whereas, I suppose it to be a man's natural and ordinary way of understanding. 3. The Quakers, if I mistake not, confine their light within to some certain objects, namely, moral, and spiritual truths, in order only to the direction of practice; and accordingly make it a supplement to Scripture, which they say is not sufficient without it, nor indeed any more than a meer dead letter; but now I don't appropriate this divine light to moral or spiritual things, but extend it as far as all truth; yea, as far as all that is intelligible, which I suppose to be perceived or understood in this divine light, as I have explained it. 4. The Quakers make their light within, a special privilege of a certain order of men, their own party; not, indeed, as to the possibility, because they suppose all men to be indifferently capable of this divine illumination, as may appear from their contending against predestination, and for universal grace: but though they don't make it a special privilege as to the possibility, yet they do as to the act, making none but those of their own way to be actually enlightened by it: whereas, according to my principles, this is no special privilege, but the common and universal benefit of all men, yea of all the intelligent creation, who all see and understand in this light of God, without which there would be neither truth nor understanding. 5. The Quakers by their light within understand some determinate formed dictate or proposition, expressly and positively directing and instructing them to do so or so; whereas my light is only the essential truth of God, which, indeed, is always present to my understanding, as being intimately united with it; but does not formally enlighten or instruct me, but when I attend to it and consult it and read what is written in those divine ideal characters. 6. And lastly, the Quakers do not offer any rational or intelligible account of their light within, neither as to the thing, nor as to the mode of it, but only cant in some loose general expressions about the light, which they confirm with the authority of St John's Gospel, though they understand neither one nor t'other; whereas I have opened a natural, distinct, and philosophical way of explaining both, namely, by the omniformity of the ideal world, or the divine Λόγος, who has in himself the essences and ideas of all things, and in whom the same are perceived by us, and by all creatures. In another tract (12) our author endeavours to shew, that the absurdity of the Quakers explanation of this light, consists chiefly in their making it created and material; and yet he quotes Mr Barclay as asserting, that though it is not the Godhead itself, yet it is a middle nature betwixt the Godhead, mankind, and angels; and tho' it is of the substance of that natural body which was conceived in Mary, yet is it celestial, and came down from heaven, and not his body of flesh and blood, and in the next place as to the materiality; though Mr Barclay holds the seed to be a measure, or portion of that celestial body of the eternally begotten Λόγος, or Christ; yet in representing the manner of this light within, he says, the seed is the same in us as in Christ; and therefore this being in us, the man Christ is in us, not according to his manhood, but according to that which is proper unto it, and yet without all division, as the natural life is in all the members, but more especially in the head and heart without division; so this spiritual light and nature is both in Christ our head, and in us by which he dwelleth in us, as the spirit of a man doth in the body (13). Now surely, as matter so constituted as to be capable of being in two or more persons at once without division, cannot be denied to be raised so far above the nature of ordinary matter, that the unknown properties of the one, are not to be determined by the known properties of the other; nor, indeed, can we judge at all, or decide any thing about the nature of the first, which is manifestly incomprehensible, from what we see and know of the nature and properties of the latter; neither ought this incomprehensibility of the notion be any just objection or prejudice to it with Mr Norris, who allows, that in his own notion, the multifarious ideas of particular beings are not of the essence of God; which, however he maintains to be absolutely clear, is, though true, yet incomprehensible to us, as the divine immensity is without extension, the truth of which he also asserts. Observe, that he also allows the possibility, and even suggests the probability, of the Quaker's doctrine concerning Christ's spiritual body; neither will his proofs of the absurdity, that the Quaker's light within should be a principle of wisdom and knowledge, be thought very conclusive from their allowing it to be a creature, and a material creature; since all the proof he brings for the impossibility of the first, is founded upon an assertion, that no creature, though never so glorious and excellent, excellent, can ever be a light to the mind of man and furnish it with ideas; because to do this it must have the full perfection of being, so as to have the ideas of all things, and be an universal representation, which no creature can possibly have; an assertion which presupposes the truth of his own hypothesis, that we see all things in God; whereas, we have already produced a very thinking author (14), who maintains that finite, or, which is the same, created beings, may have a power communicated to them of furnishing ideas to the soul of man, and that not only spiritual and immaterial, but also material creatures; which last removes the other absurdity charged upon the Quakers, from the materiality of their light: and, indeed, upon this last point our author rather declaims than argues, treating the common scholastic solution, that sensible objects, or corporeal emanations, are rendered intelligible by the intellectus agens, as a mere romance, and contents himself with observing, that this hypothesis rests upon this single bottom, the transmutability of material into immaterial ideas, which he declares is as much a mystery as the other, and doubts not but they are both absurdities. Indeed, he cannot, without destroying the bottom of his own hypothesis, infer their absurdity from their mysteriousness, or surpassing his understanding. Besides, Mr Ramsay has invented another solution of this difficulty, without the help of the intellectus agens, by making matter itself indued with an active force, so as to impress those modifications or ideas upon the soul; yet this author allows his own notion to be a mystery. Indeed, all our attempts to give an account of the manner how the soul receives ideas from impressions upon the body arising from their union, will always remain so much a mystery to us, that the best way is to sit down contented with Mr Locke, in our own ignorance. We must not conclude this remark, long as it is, without clearing Mr Norris from an imputation which may be thrown out, and is the more dangerous and hurtful, as the ground of it comes from a person celebrated no less for his modesty and candor, than his learning and ingenuity; I mean the author of Reflections upon Learning, who in the place abovecited, gives Mr Norris his due encomium, of having set off Mr Mallebranche's opinion with all the advantages of beauty of style, and perspicuity of expression, and allows that he has distinguished himself from the Quakers. 'Yet in another thing, says he, there is too great an agreement, that these men have too low a value for human learning, either as it lies in our common books, or in the book of nature, in respect of this light, which displays itself from the ideal world, by attending to which with pure and defecated minds, they suppose knowledge to be the most easily had. Experience and deductions have been formerly esteemed useful, but in this compendious way to knowledge, provided we make our approaches with our souls purged, and with due preparation of mind, there needs little more than application and attention (15).' Now, so far is Mr Norris from falling under this censure, that he makes his necessary and eternal truths not only the proper objects of contemplation, but of science. He allows science to be the most perfect intellectual habit, and professedly exalts the reputation of rational studies beyond those of histories, and any matters of fact; preferring those which procure clearness of thought and exactness of judgment (16); and that by science and the rational studies, he does not exclude the sciences as they lie in common books. In the acquiring of which, experience and deductions of reason are useful, will appear VOL. V. No. CCLXXII.

by and by. For as our author was blamed on one hand for too great an agreement with the Quakers, for having too low a value for human learning; so was he calumniated by the Quakers themselves for too greatly disagreeing from them, by setting too high a value upon human learning. 'Art thou not decking thyself with thy corrupt wisdom? (says Mr Vickeris to him) which is the forbidden fruit, and will prove folly in the end (17).' In answer to which, our author supposing Philosophy and the study of the Sciences to be meant by his antagonist, writes thus, 'Now, though I not only grant, but in a treatise purposely written upon this subject, have expressly contended, and if I mistake not, fully demonstrated, that, considering the present state of man, the study of learning and knowledge is no further allowable than is conducive to the moralizing of his life, and that all profecution of it beyond, or beside this end, is an immoderate and blameable curiosity; yet, I hope, as far as it is apt to serve the interest of a good life, there is no reason to disallow or condemn it, though it be not to be allowed any farther; yet I think it may, and must be allowed so far; and herein, I think, I state the measure of profecuting learning and knowledge in a due mean, betwixt the extreme of those over inquisitive spirits on the one hand, who set no limits to their curiosity, and those narrow and contracted ones on the other, who confine it too strictly; condemning all humane learning in gross, under the reproachful appellations of carnal reason, corrupt wisdom, vain philosophy, and the like; and under which characters, I think, it ought not to be represented, as far as it is apt to serve and minister to the interests of religion and a good life, and that it may be serviceable to that purpose I might undertake to shew; but that the excellent Mr Boyle has saved me the trouble, in a late treatise upon this very subject, called the Christian Virtuoso. He then proceeds to expose the petulance of his adversary's railing, who allows himself, that the divine light assists the natural faculty of the soul in the attainment of arts and sciences (18). And admonishes the reader, that under the words application and attention to the light that displays itself in the ideal world, he comprehends the usual methods of studying the arts and sciences as it lies in our common books, the objects of which being eternal truths, and consequently placed in the ideal world, display themselves to the mind by this method of application (that is, by experience and deduction of reasoning), as well as by that of pure contemplation.'

[H] The charge of schism continued, notwithstanding the Toleration ] As far as may be judged from his writings, our author was of the Tory party, at least in the Church, as well as his father had been. In this principle, on the discovery of the Fanatic-plot in 1683, he published a piece intituled, A Murnival of Knarves, or Whiggism displayed and burlisqued out of Countenance. But this principle flames out with the strongest ardour, in the dedication of his Miscellanies, in 1687, to Dr Leopold Finch, Warden of All-Souls-college, to whom he addresses himself in these terms: 'Sir, it is by your kind patronage and protection (next to the favourable influences of a good Prince) that our studies prosper, and our laurels thrive and flourish, and that any of us are in a capacity to throw in the least symbol into the Muses Exchequer.' And he acted steadily upon the same principles after the Revolution, as appears by the treatise above, to which this remark is set.

to a City Friend, 8vo. Soon after this, he was presented to the rectory of Bemerton near Salisbury (r), a living of between two and three hundred pounds a year. By this preference his revenues were handsomely augmented, which was the more acceptable, as his family began to grow numerous; and, the parochial duty being easy, he continued to employ the press, in printing Practical Discourses upon several subjects; the third volume of which came out in 1693 (s). And in 1695 there appeared Letters concerning the Love of God, between the author of the Proposal to the Ladies and Mr John Norris: wherein his late Discourse, shewing that it ought to be entire, and exclusive of all other loves, is further cleared and justified (t). The lady here intimated was the famous Mrs Mary Astell, author of A Serious Proposal to the Ladies, for the Advancement of their true and greatest Interest, and some other pieces (u). This opinion of Mr Norris was also attacked by Lady Masham, in A Discourse concerning the Love of God, in 1696. To which our author returned an answer, subjoined to the fourth volume of his Practical Discourses, in 1698, 8vo. He had the preceding year, by way of answer to Mr Toland's book, intitled Christianity not mysterious, published his Account of Reason and Faith, in relation to the Mysteries of Christianity [I]. [I] An account of reason and faith, &c It is well known, that in the common systems of Logic, the operations of the understanding are described to be simple apprehension, judgment, and discourse; our author in this treatise, after Des Cartes and Pere Mallebranche denies the truth of this division, and maintains that judgment is not an operation of the understanding, but of the will. Nothing, says he, belongs to the understanding but perception; judgment then cannot belong to it, because judgment is not perception; for we are said to judge as we perceive, and some are so much in haste, that they will judge before they perceive; which plainly shews them to be two different things. He then produces the following argument for a demonstration. Judgment is a fallible thing, which may either be true or false; whereas perception is always true, it being a contradiction that it should be otherwise, for what a man does not truly perceive, he does not perceive at all: I conclude, therefore, that judgment is not perception; and since perception is the only operation of the understanding, I conclude again, that judgment does not belong to the understanding; it must therefore belong to the will, which is the proper seat both of judgment and error too. And it is nothing else but the will's consenting to, and acquiescing in, the representations that are made by the understanding. No where does our author justly incur the censure of an egregious trifler more than in this reasoning. Indeed, so very childishly playing with words could not escape his own notice, after he has drawn out what he calls a new form of the several ways in which the understanding operates, and reduced these into three, exactly as the logicians do, only in other words, calling the first simple perception, the second complex perception immediate, called judicium in logic, and the third complex perception mediate, called discursus. He rests in this as a right account of the operations of the understanding, both as to matter and form, and then conscious that so much of nothing stood in need of an extraordinary puff to blow it out into the appearance of something, he makes the following eulogium of this great work of his own creative understanding. 'The knowledge of this, says he, considering how much spirit is above body, though it were only a piece of speculation or curiosity, I should think of greater worth and consideration, than that of the properties of lines and figures, nay, or any of the phenomena of nature.' However contemptible this whole matter is, both in it's utility, and in the burlesque exaltation of it's excellence, yet it is not so much above comprehension, as it is also beneath notice; but in the sequel of this discourse, we find him following the same leader, Father Mallebranche, into the intelligible world, where he immediately becomes unintelligible. The passage I mean is in his 4th chapter, where he undertakes to shew that human reason is not the measure of truth, a proposition easily proved by any ordinary capacity, which yet in that philosophy which maintains also the particular essences of created bodies to be in God, and that our reason perceives them in him, straight becomes incomprehensible and unintelligible in the explanation; thus, in order to demonstrate the proposition, it was judged absolutely necessary, to represent the infinite nature and extent of truth, this leads into the divine ideas, the region of truth, and this begets, unavoidably, a distinction of those ideas into two sorts, the absolute, and the relative; those that are of the essence of God, as in himself, and those that are of the same divine essence, as it is in relation to creatures. The first infinite and incomprehensible, the second finite and comprehensible; for an instance, he produces the divine immensity and extension. The idea of the first [immensity] is of the essence of God absolutely, being no other than the substance of God universally diffused, and filling all places, yet without any local extension. But the idea of extension, or that perfection in God, which virtually, eminently, and modo intelligibili answers to extension, and therefore is frequently called by Mr Mallebranche, Potentiè intelligibile, is of the substance of God, as it is representative of matter or body, and imitable or participable by it, according to those limitations and imperfections which belong to that kind of being, and which are represented by this it's idea. Now, though the sum total of all this metaphysical jargon, amounts to no more than that we have a clear idea of finite extension, which indeed is the object of Geometry; yet wrapt up as it is here, in a cloud of words without meaning, it is made incomprehensible and obscure. Our author himself, it seems, was aware of it, where he concludes with the following extraordinary observation. 'I know not, says he, whether I express myself to the conception of every reader, but I am sufficiently clear and intelligible to myself, and whoever is not much wanting either in metaphysics or in attention, cannot, I think, well miss my meaning.' He was certainly in the right in his apprehension of his not having expressed himself to the conception of every reader, Mr Locke (19) animadverts on this part of Mallebranche's hypothesis, as advancing that absurd inconsistency of making the vast variety of ideas or essences of particular things to be contained in the perfect simplicity of God's essence; nor indeed is the matter mended at all by the word eminently, eminenter, a term invented by the schoolmen, whose art lay in mocking their own understanding by words without meaning. After all, we must do our author the justice to observe, that as far as he keeps clear of Father Mallebranche, so far he reasons justly, and expresses his reasons with admirable perspicuity, and nobody hath better laid open the popular objection of the Deists against believing mysteries: that faith is an act of reason, and that we cannot believe beyond our reason. In doing of this he claims Des Cartes from the Socinians, and shews, that not only the expression of that philosopher in the conclusion of his system, Nihilque ab ullo credi velim nisi quod ipsi evidens & invicta ratio persuadebit, but explains the manner how it does consist very well with this other, Credenda esse omnia quæ a Deo revelata sunt, quamvis captum nostrum excedant. Ita si forte nobis Deus de seipso vel aliis aliquod revelet, quod naturalis ingenii nostri vires excedit, qualia sunt tum mysteria Incarnationis & Trinitatis, non recusabimus illa credere, quamvis non clare intelligamus, nec ullo modo mirabimur multa esse, tum in immensa ejus natura, tum etiam in rebus ab eo creatis, quæ captum nostrum excedant.

towards the Theory of the Ideal or Intelligible World [K], designed for two parts. The first considering it absolutely in itself, and the second in relation to Human Understanding. Part I. The second part, being the relative part of it, wherein the Intelligible World is considered with relation to Human Understanding, whereof some account is here attempted and proposed, came out in 1704, 8vo. It was Mr Locke's celebrated Essay on Human Understanding that gave birth to this work. The growing reputation of the principles of Philosophy maintained in that Essay, notwithstanding the censure that had been passed upon it by others, as well as our author (w), rendered him very anxious for the security of the Mallebranchian system, which he had for long and so heartily espoused. He resolved, therefore, that nothing should hinder him from executing a design which he had many years before entered upon, of drawing up a formal treatise in defence of that system [L]; and 'tis acknowledged

(w) Viz. In his Curious Reflections mentioned in note (z).

[K] Ideal world] This treatise is nothing else but an attempt to explain and defend the notion of Father Mallebranche, that we see all things in God. In the proof of which that ideal philosopher reasons, upon the source of our ideas, which, according to this philosophy, must either be, 1. Images detached from the objects; or 2. created by God in the soul from the beginning; or 3. originally contained in the mind, as archetypes of all things; or 4. produced in the soul by its own native activity; or 5. formed in the mind by God's immediate action; or 6. perceived in God as representative of all things: and then rejecting as insufficient the first five ways, the 6th is concluded on as the only true one. A celebrated author already mentioned (20), attacks this enumeration, as not only obscure, but imperfect; 'since there may be, he says, yet another way by which the soul may have some of its ideas, and that is, 7. by the impression which finite objects, whether material or immaterial, make upon us; the first three ways, continues he, are absurd, the sixth is fantastical, the fourth, fifth, and seventh, are the true sources of all our ideas.' This author raising his seventh way upon a supposition that matter may, by an immanent communicated activity, really modify the soul, which modifications are simple ideas, endeavours to prove, that matter is really endowed with activity; which is contrary to the opinion of Sir Isaac Newton, that matter is inactive. His proof as a demonstration runs thus: 'God is essentially and infinitely active, creation is a representation of God in things external, infinite activity cannot be represented by absolute inaction, therefore God may communicate to his living images and lively pictures a real activity, by which they can act mutually upon each other. And that this activity or active force is really communicated to them, he will have to be manifest from the mutual action and reaction between the soul and body in their union, and endeavours to shew that the denial of such an activity leads to pernicious and blasphemous consequences; yet he is far from thinking to explain the manner of the action, on the contrary, he held the activity of second causes to be one of the mysteries of natural religion, equally incomprehensible with immensity and creation. This activity then being established for the source of simple ideas; he derives complex ones, from comparing, combining, and dividing of these by our innate activity; and then observes, that the action of the first cause is a supernatural motion by inspiration; the action of second causes is a natural manner by sensation; which with the action of the mind upon itself by reflection, are the three sources of all our ideas. 'The French Philosopher, continues he, confounds those three sources, by attributing all to the immediate action of God, as the only efficacious cause of all our modifications and perceptions. Thus he introduces Enthusiasm into Philosophy, thanks the Logos for discovering to him that the three angles of a triangle are equal to two right ones, looks upon geometrical theory as a real contemplation of the divine essence, and so confounds the natural activity of the mind with the supernatural illumination of the eternal Word.' In further reflecting on this way of knowledge by vision, he falls in with Mr Baker, and says (21), 'the privilege of seeing all things in God, is an advantage, not of our exiled state here below, but a felicity reserved for our celestial native country; then we shall see light in its true light, God as he is, and the archetypal ideas of all things as they were at first freely formed in the divine understanding, 'ere God created substances correspondent to them; then we shall see the intimate and inmost essences of things in the eternal essence, the relation of the original to the pictures; whereas now we see only some of their attributes or modes. All the Mallebranchian Philosophy is founded upon a perpetual confusion of nature and grace, of the archetypal ideas with the consubstantial Logos, of the natural activity of the understanding with the supernatural illumination of the Word, of the natural immanent action of the will with the supernatural impression of the Holy Ghost (22), and, in fine, of the privileges of a beatified state with those of our exile. The Spinozists make use of all those obscure ideas, to confound the action of the first cause with the actions of second causes, and the substance of the Creator with that of the Creature, and this Philosophy, by a tendency to the same purpose, is exceeding dangerous; it seems the beginning of Spinozism, and Spinozism is Mallebranchianism consummated. However, it seems, that Mallebranche did not allow, nor even see these dangerous tendencies of his doctrine, and that in framing his witty romance, this pious and devout Philosopher was imposed upon by a full persuasion, that his system exalted our notions of a Divine Power, and placing the Creature in a continual dependence upon the Creator, made every thing, even the least motion of matter, and the smallest modification of spirit, a proof of God's existence.' In truth, impiety and indevotion are not of the growth of this Philosophy, so far from it, that his disciple having, in his way, shewn that the ideas of all things are in God, breaks out into a meditation of the most elevated and warm devotion, which concludes with this hymn.

(22) Dr Berkeley, upon this principle, that God only acts upon spirits, raises his notion of the non-existence of matter. See his Dialogues.

Lay down, proud heart, thy rebel arms,
 And own the conqueror divine;
 In vain thou do'st resist such charms,
 In vain the arrows of his love decline.
 There is no dealing with this potent fair,
 I must, my God, I must love thee;
 Thy charms but too victorious are,
 They leave me not my native liberty.
 A holy force spreads thro' my soul,
 And ravishes my heart away;
 The world it's motion does controul
 in vain; the happy captive will not stay.
 No more does she her wonted freedom boast,
 More proud of thy celestial chain;
 Free-will itself were better lost,
 Than ever to revolt from thee again.
 Sun of my soul! what shall I do,
 Thy beauties to resist, or bear?
 They bless, and yet they pain me too,
 I feel thy heat too strong, thy light too clear.
 I faint, I languish, I almost expire,
 My panting heart dissolving lies;
 Those must shine less, or I retire:
 Shade thou thy light, I cannot turn my eyes (23).

Our author likewise insinuates, that his greatest motive to this undertaking, was the establishment of an important and concerning truth, for the advantage and improvement of morality; as containing certain principles that laid the firmest foundation for the being of God, and for a dependance upon him in our intellectual operations, and consequently for all the duties of humility, love, and the most raised devotion, that arise from that dependance.

acknowledged he has done it with all the advantages of beauty of stile and perspicuity of expression (x). After this, he engaged in behalf of that important point of Philosophy and Religion, the natural immortality of the Soul, which he defended, in a set treatise against Mr Dodwell in 1708 [M]. Mr Norris also published two excellent practical treatises upon Humility in 1707, and the other upon Christian Prudence in 1710, besides some other pieces which are mentioned below [N]. Towards the latter end of his life he grew very infirm, and enjoyed little health 'till the day of his death, which happened in 1711, at Bemerton; and he was interred in the chancel of that church, where there is a handsome marble monument erected to his memory, with an inscription upon it [O]. He left a widow and three children, two sons and a daughter. His eldest son was Rector of Little-Langford, and Vicar of the two Chitterns, and died a few years ago without issue, at the house near Crarebridge; and his widow now resides in the high street at Salisbury. His second son, Thomas, was also a clergyman, and some time minister of Stroud in Gloucestershire, or the Stow in the Wold, has been dead several years. His daughter, Elizabeth, was married to Mr Bowyer, Vicar of Martock in Somersetshire, and has brought him several children. Mr Norris's widow resided with her son-in-law 'till her death, which happened a few years ago.

anxious for the security of the Mallebranchian Philosophy which he had ardently embraced.] That this was his incitement to that undertaking, appears from the preface to the first part, where he declares, 'The motive that induced him to espouse it, besides the moment and importance of the subject, was the frequent intimation he had occasionally dropped of this notion in his writings, which lighter touches, without a more explicit account of the thing, would have served only as to many amusements to the common sort of readers, to whom, says he, I should have been little better than a Barbarian: and as to those whose better discernment would let them into some view and apprehension of what I would have understood by those hints en passant, such a slight, broken, and transient representation of my meaning, would with them serve only to expose it as visionary and fantastical; though, continues he, whether the presentialness of an ideal world to our mind, be really such Platonic gibberish, there is a certain person [Mr Locke] that may now be concerned to consider, and whether the notion may not as little deserve his censure, as the maintainer of it does his compliments.' What we have here asserted is further manifest by the following passage towards the end of the same preface. 'I think fit, says our author, further to acquaint my reader (though it is no more than what the title and course of the work may inform him) that what is premised in these papers, is in order to a following account concerning the manner of human understanding, which is to be erected upon the principles here laid down: which, if they lead me to an account of that great abstrusity, something different from what has been some while since published to the world, I hope the very ingenious author of it will pardon me, since, though I cannot in all things think with him, yet I mean in nothing to detract from him, or from that just reputation which his celebrated and very valuable performance stands possessed of.' Mr Locke made some remarks on this Theory, which were printed among his posthumous works. Mr Norris had frequently thrown out hints en passant (to use his own phrase) of his opinion concerning some doctrines advanced in the Essay concerning Human Understanding, and in respect to one article, smartly flings back the charge of fan-

tafick upon that author. In speaking of the Quakers opinion, that their light within is the spiritual body of Christ, and therefore material, to give this fantastical conceit, as he calls it, it's full share of ridicule, he contrasts it with that other of Mr Locke, as laying the lower step to it. 'It has been thought,' says he, a strange advance in speculation to suppose, that matter, by the advantage of a finer mechanism, might be made capable of thought, and be able to reason and understand; and the truth is, I would give a great deal to see the mould in which those mens heads were cast, who could entertain such a notion; but, alas! what is this in comparison of making matter the principle of illumination.'

[M] He defended against Mr Dodwell.] The title of it is, A Philosophical Discourse concerning the natural Immortality of the Soul, wherein the great Question of the Soul's Immortality is endeavoured to be rightly stated and cleared. To this Mr Dodwell returned an answer, in the appendix to his book intitled, The natural Mortality of the Human Soul clearly demonstrated from the Holy Scriptures, and the concurrent Testimony of the primitive Writers; in which that learned writer returns our author his thanks for having kept close to the cause, without any thing reproachful to his reason. 'The rather, says he, because you are the first of my adversaries who have done so.' The other two were, Mr Chifful, and Mr S. Clarke, of whose personal abuses he makes great complaint.

[N] Some other pieces mentioned below.] We have either in the text or notes mentioned all his pieces except two, which are, 1. Spiritual Counsel, or the Father's Advice to his Children; published 1694, 8vo. at first compiled, as he observes, in the advertisement before it, for the use of his own children. 2. Letters, Philosophical, Moral, and Divine; to the Reverend Mr John Norris, with his Answers; and this contained some additional letters to those betwixt Mrs Astell and him.

[O] A monument erected to his memory, with an inscription upon it.] It is as follows: H. S. E. NORTH [Dr JOHN], a learned man, and Master of Trinity-college in Cambridge in the XVIIth century, &c. was the fourth of seven sons of Sir Dudley North [A], Knight of

[A] The fifth of seven sons of Sir Dudley North.] The North-family was seated, in the reign of King Henry V. at Walkingham in Nottinghamshire. One of his Descendants, Edward North, Esq; was, in the 32d of King Henry VIII. Treasurer, and in the 36th of the same King, Chancellor, of the Court of Augmentation; and the 17th of February 1553, the first of Queen Mary I. had summons to Parliament by the title of Baron North of Kirtling, in the County of Cambridge; and departed this life in 1564. His son and heir Roger, dyed in 1600, having buried his eldest son Sir John, in 1597. Therefore he was succeeded in his title and estates by his grandson Sir Dudley

North, who having married Frances daughter and coheir of Sir John Brocket of Brocket-hall, had by her Dudley, and three other sons, and two daughters. This last Sir Dudley was made Knight of the Bath in 1616, and marrying Anne daughter and coheir of Sir Charles Mountagu, Knt. a younger brother of Henry Earl of Manchester, had by her fourteen children, whereof six sons, and four daughters lived to maturity; viz. 1. Charles his heir. 2. Sir Francis North, Lord Keeper, created Baron of Guilford. 3. Sir Dudley, a Turkey-merchant, and Sheriff of Loudon. 4. JOHN, who is the subject of this article. 5. Mountagu, a Turkey-merchant, who dyed without issue.

of the Bath, Lord North, Baron of Kirtling (a), and Anne, one of the daughters and coheirs of Sir Charles North, a younger brother of the Boughton family (b). He was born at London September 4, 1645. In his youth he was of a nice and tender constitution; and of a temper grave, reserved, and studious; which made his parents design him early for the Church. His school-education was at St Edmundsbury in Suffolk, under the learned Dr Thomas Stephens. After leaving school he passed some time at his father's house, who gave him some notion of Logic and Metaphysics. In 1661, he was admitted a Fellow-Commoner of Jesus-college; but when his grandfather, the first Dudley Lord North, dyed, whereby the Barony descended to his father, then he assumed the post of a Nobleman. Notwithstanding which, he was exemplary in his attendance upon divine service, diligent in his studies, and duly performed such exercises as were consistent with his station [B]. Thus, by a regular course of study [C], he became eminently learned, particularly in the Greek and Hebrew languages; and collected a very valuable library [D]. Having regularly taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and being about six years standing, he was admitted Fellow of Jesus-college, September 28, 1666, by the King's mandate. He took afterwards the degree of Master of Arts (c), and was incorporated in the same at Oxford, June 15, 1669 (d). Not long after he took Orders, as the statutes of his college required; and the first Sermon he preached to a public audience, was before King Charles the Second at Newmarket (e) [E]. About the same time, he assisted the truly learned Dr Thomas Gale, in his edition of the Opuscula Mythologica, &c. [F]. In November 1672, he was elected Greek Professor of the University of Cambridge (f). The first ecclesiastical preferment he had, was the Sine-cure of Llandinon in Wales, given him by Archbishop Sheldon. Whereupon he quitted his Fellowship, and Jesus-college, of which he had been weary for some time; and procured himself to be admitted in Trinity-college, for the sake of being near the Master, the most excellent Dr Isaac Barrow, for whom he had the utmost friendship and esteem (g). About that time he was appointed Clerk of the Closet to King Charles the Second (h), who granted him a Prebend of Westminster, into which he was installed January 11, 1672-3 (i). And, upon his Majesty's coming by invitation from Newmarket to Cambridge, he was created Doctor in Divinity, out of respect to the Duke of Lauderdale, whose favourite he then was (k). His most valuable friend Dr Isaac Barrow dying May 4, 1677 (l), he was made, in his room, Master of Trinity-college: by which preferment, he became possessed, as he thought, of all the ease and content he could by any means propose to himself. However, he found himself disappointed. For this preferment took him, partly, from his studies, but almost entirely out of those advantages, which by a few friends he enjoyed: that is, from a frequent, easy, free, and pleasant, conversation, into an anxious, solitary, and pensive, course of life; which, with his austere way of ordering himself, drew upon him a most deplorable sickness; and that proved in the end the ruin of all his powers both of body and mind (m). The unreasonable opposition of the eight senior Fellows of the college, who had before managed all things without controul, gave him also infinite vexation. And his over-solicitude for maintaining good order and strict regularity [G] in his society, together with his conscientious integrity in elec-issue. And 6. Roger, who was seated at Rougham in Norfolk (1). 7. Edward dyed very young.

[B] And duly performed such exercises as were consistent with his station. ' Nothing observed of him turned more to his credit, than his due attendance at public Exercises, and Lectures in most faculties in the schools.—Though his opinion as to Lectures, was, that since Books are so frequent as now they are, public Lectures are not so necessary, or perhaps useful, as in elder times, when first instituted, because the intent of them was to supply the want of Books; and now Books are plentiful, Lectures might better be spared, and the promiscuous use of Books come in the place of them (2). ' And, indeed, considering that those Lectures generally are wall-lectures; and, in school-divinity, and the Aristotelian Philosophy, consist only of the squeezings of a barren and empty brain; it would be much better to convert them into some more useful method of Instruction.

[C] Thus by a regular course of study. In his studies he was very regular, and took his Authors one after another, and pursued effectually through them, not leaving any passage which he did not understand, or at least criticise upon as far as he could reach. He noted as he went along, but not in the common way by common place; but every Book severally, setting down whatever he found worthy to be observed in that Book. And these he kept by themselves, as Comments upon his Authors, 'till he had a considerable body of them (3).

[D] And collected a very valuable Library. He bought at once a whole set of the Greek Classics in folio, of the best Editions. He courted, as a fond lover, all best editions, fairest characters, best bound and preserved. If the subject was in his favour (as the Classics) he cared not how many of them he had, even of the same edition, if he thought it among the best, either better bound, squarer cut, neater covers, or some such qualification. He delighted particularly in the small edition of the Classics by Seb. Gryphius: And, by his care and industry, at length made himself master of a very considerable Library, wherein the choicest collection was Greek (4).

[E] The first sermon he preached—was before King Charles II. at Newmarket. It was preached October 8, 1671, on Psalm i. Ver. 1. and published the same year at Cambridge; in 4to (5).

[F] He assisted the truly learned Dr Thomas Gale, in his edition of the Opuscula Mythologica, &c. This is acknowledged by the Doctor (6), in the following words. Habes denique Pythagorica Fragmenta. Vñ dēre ea quidem jam scēpius lucem, transfusa in plures, credo formas, quam ipsus Pythagoræ anima. Ex iis alia nunc primo latine versa, alia autem notis illustrata debes Joanni North, V. C. qui generis sui claritudinem (quæ certè magna est) virtute & eruditione exæquat. These Opuscula were printed at Cambridge in 1671, 8vo.

[G] And his over-solicitude for maintaining good order and strict regularity. ' He had first laid down his own Example of Regularity and Sobriety before the Scholars; and after that, he thought it his duty to be informed, as well as might be, of what was outrageously amiss amongst them. He never connived at any thing, whereof, by the duty of his place, he was bound to take notice; but, either by admonition, or otherwise, he did his best to amend it. He endeavoured

- tions [H], exposed him to many affronts, and disagreeable importunities. But, by pre-elections [I], he found means to obviate and break the custom of Court-Mandates, which were quite common at his first coming, to the great prejudice of real merit (n). While he continued Master of that college, he finished the fine library, which was begun by his predeceffor Dr Barrow (o). He was naturally of a weak constitution: and having overstrained it by too intense thinking, and by too close and eager application to his studies, without proper remissions and due exercise, he quite ruined his health. His first infirmity, and sensible sign of decay, was a violent cold, attended with a great defluxion, and a swollen throat; which, being ill managed, was followed with an apoplectic fit, and that with a numb palsy, which deprived him in a great measure of the use of his understanding (p). Between four and five years he lived in that deplorable condition (q); and his miseries being increased by epileptic fits, one of them put an end to his life April 1683 (r) [K]. He was buried in the ante-chapel of Trinity-college [L], with no other epitaph but I. N. upon a small stone over him (s). As to his person; he was comely, had an agreeable air, a fresh and sanguine complexion, light hair, and a florid youthful countenance (t). With regard to his temper, he was always disposed to fear the worst that might possibly happen; and had a natural timidity, owing to a feeble constitution of body, inclining to the effeminate (u). In conversation, he was witty, jocose, and free, with a great fluency of speech (w). As to his morals, he was a man of great probity, temperance, sobriety, chastity, honesty, and justice; orthodox, and sincere; averse to faction; devoted to all good order, religion, and virtue: and fortified with a resolution not to run in debt, nor to help himself by any wicked compliances, whatever became of him (x). With respect to his learning, he was not only a good Philologist and Divine; but extended his enquiries into the dark recesses of learned Antiquities, Languages, and Philosophy (y) [M]. In particular, he was a great admirer of Plato [N], of some of whose pieces voured also to make the Discipline of the College as light and easy to the Scholars as he could, by using private intimations and friendly advices tempered with mild reasonings and persuasion. But, for all that, he grew unpopular amongst them. They took him to be over officiously rigid and strict, saying, it had not been so before. Youth (as our author observes) will always mistake manhood to consist wholly in disorderly living, and that order and discipline belongs only to boys. And, to shew how much Men they are, they behave themselves, as some did to him, contumaciously, and many of them contrived to affront him. Of which some instances are given. That made Dr North affirm, that no conscientious magistrate can be popular; but, in lieu of that, he must arm himself with equanimity (7).

[H] Together with his conscientious integrity in Elections. He was resolute in adhering to the statutes of the college, and to see that Elections went fairly; and, in the business of Fellowships, that created him no small trouble. For the pupil-mongers, often senior Fellows, would favour good pupils, though perhaps no good scholars, in order to get them into good Fellowships, when others had better pretensions. This bred interest-making, and, for the most part, brought importunities upon him; as if, by teasing and urging, points might be gained. All which partialities were fastidious and hateful to him that had none, and whatever impetuosity he endured, he never would consent to have a dunce preferred to a good scholar when the standing was equal; but always declared to do justice to whom, upon account of better merit, it belonged (8).

[I] But by pre-elections, &c. He often suspected that some of his senior Fellows, when they could not compass their will of him another way, were instrumental in obtaining Mandates from Courtiers. And he used to inveigh bitterly against that practice, declaring, that whoever of them was guilty of it did not consider their duty and their oaths; and that it must, in time, bring the college to nothing; for if elections are for favour and not merit, who will think of rising by any means but courtship and corruption? And then flattery, or money, must supply want of parts, learning, and sobriety; and the college, once so filled, will continue and avow the same methods: Whereby gentlemen's sons in the college, under the influence of such a regimen, will be exposed to the mischiefs of idleness, expence, and debauchery, spreading in the university, as bad as in any lewd corporation-town. Therefore the Doctor, to ease his mind a little, (for he lived in perpetual dread of Mandates) but principally for the good of the college, he found out a way by Pre-elections, to obviate an inconvenience he could not resist. That is, out of the several years, four or five one under another, he caused to be pre-elected into Fellowships scholars of the best capacities in the several years; which made it improbable another Election should come about in so many years then next ensuing; for, until all these elections were benefitted, there could be no vacancy. And that broke the course of Mandates whilst he lived. He was solicitous about nothing more than the business of Elections, which he thought the spring of good and evil to the college, and, (as he thought) in some degree, to the public (9).

[K] Put an end to his life April—1683. His brother doth not mention the exact day of his death (10). But some place it on the 8th day of April.

[L] He was buried in the ante-chapel of Trinity-college This was according to his direction; that the Fellows (as he said) might trample upon him dead, as they had done living. Alluding to the unhappy Disputes that had arisen between them; and wherein he thought himself extremely ill used (11).

[M] And Philosophy. He intended to compose a critical History of Philosophy and Philosophers, with the originations, connections, transitions, and alterations of the opinions, and also of the several Sects, how they sprung up, one under another, comparing their Tenets, and shewing wherein they agreed and disagreed, with their squabbles and altercations; and so coming down as low as his own time, to shew how the moderns had borrowed from the ancients, and what they had set up new of their own. He used to say there was little of this kind of learning to be found in print, and being once well done, it would be very useful to scholars.—He also intended a History of the Heathen Theology, which he said was almost wholly wanted.—Moreover, he had by him great heaps of Comments and Notes of his own upon the Greek and Latin Classic authors; which he intended not to publish but occasionally, as Authors might happen to be reprinted (12).

[N] In particular, he was a great admirer of Plato. He was (to use his brother's words) partial to that Philosopher. He thought Plato's way of philosophising more consonant to Christian morality than Aristotle's was. The ancient Fathers inclined that way, until a known course of corruption in the Hierarchy bred an occasion to abandon Plato, and to take up with Aristotle, whose discipline was apter for maintaining indeterminate disputes about any thing or nothing, truth or falsity, and error, almost indifferently. What else could be the meaning of their pouring out of Aristotle that empty jargon, of Mater and Form, upon the holy Eucharist; by which, and many syllogistical artifices, they maintain their gainful impositions, and particularly, that monstrous absurdity Transubstantiation. Which they fortify with chimeric notions

Legum decimus, Alcibiades secundus.* The Latin translation he subjoins to them, is that of Marcellius Ficinus, which he prefers to that of Serranus, or De Serres. For the last, says he, is obscure, intricate, and very often false; And Serranus was 'unequal to the task he undertook.' *Interpretationem Marcellii Ficini potius quam Serrani Græco comitem individuum dedimus. 'Tis hoped, that the Edition we are made to expect from Scotland, will be free from the Faults found in the former.

[P] He left a thousand pounds to charitable uses. His personal estate was about 4000 l. one fourth of which, by direction of his will, was given to poor people (14).

NOWEL, or NOWELL [ALEXANDER], a learned Divine in the XVIIth century, was the second son of John Nowell of Great Meerley in Lancashire, an ancient family, and born at Read in that county in 1511 [A]. At thirteen years of age he was admitted in Brazen-nose-college in Oxford, where making great progress in Grammar, Logic, and Philosophy (a), he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts May 29, 1536 [B], and that of Master June 10, 1540 (b). Before he took this last degree he was elected Fellow of his college, and grew very famous for piety and learning, and for his zeal in promoting the reformation of religion. In the reign of King Edward the Sixth, and perhaps before, he kept a school in Westminster, wherein he trained the youth up in Protestant principles (c). He was an allowed Preacher by Licence from that King, about the year 1550 (d); and, December 5, 1551, was installed Prebendary of Westminster (e). In the first Parliament of Queen Mary the First at Westminster, he was returned one of the Burgeesses for Portpigham, alias Westlow, in Cornwall (f); but his election was declared void [C], because, as he was Prebendary of Westminster, and, by virtue of that, had a voice in the Convocation-house, therefore he could not be a Member of the House of Commons (g). Being a noted Protestant, he was marked out, with some other eminent Divines, for a sacrifice to Popish persecution in that bloody reign; had not Mr Francis Bowyer, afterwards Sheriff of London in 1577, rescued him from the danger, and safely conveyed him beyond-sea (h). He withdrew to Francfort with the rest of the English exiles; and joyning himself to the Episcopal Church there, subscribed, among the rest, to the Discipline they established (i). He was also one of the subscribers to an excellent Letter [D], sent from Francfort to the discontented English exiles at Geneva, dated the third of January, 1559 (k). Upon the death of Queen Mary, and accession of Queen Elizabeth, he was the first of our Protestant exiles that returned to England (l): and soon after obtained many and considerable preferments. For, January 1, 1559-60, he was presented to the Archdeaconry of Middlesex, which he resigned the year following (m):

[A] And born in that county in 1511. His mother was Dowfabel, daughter of Thomas Hesketh of Rufford in the same county, Esq; (1).

[B] At thirteen years of age, he was admitted in Brazen-nose college in Oxford,—and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts May 29th, 1536. There is something inconceivable and inconsistent in these Dates, taken from Ant. Wood, which it is not in our power to adjust and reconcile. If Mr Nowell was admitted at the age of thirteen, that must have been in the year 1524; and he might regularly have taken his degrees, of Bachelor and Master of Arts, in 1528, and 1531. But why he staid twelve years, before he took the first, is no where explained, nor the proper reasons for it assigned by any one. According to his Epitaph, he studied thirteen years in that college.—Col. Ænei Nasti Oxonii, ubi ab anno ætatis 13, Annos 13 studuit.—i. e. as we may suppose, he constantly resided there 13 years.

[C] But his election was declared void. The entry in the Journals of the House of Commons upon that occasion (2), is in the following words. 'October 12. Mr Secretary Bourne, &c. to enquire for Alexander Nowell, Burgeess of Loo in Cornwall, Prebend of Westminster, if he may be of this house. October 13. It is declared by the Commissioners, that Alexander Nowell, being Prebendary in Westminster, and thereby having voice in the Convocation-house, cannot be a member of this house; and so agreed by the House; and the Queen's writ to be directed for another Burgeess in that place.'—In both places, the name is printed Norwell, which is visibly a mistake:

for it appears from Dr Willis's Notitia, &c. that it was Alexander Norwell, who was returned.

[D] He was also one of the subscribers to an excellent Letter. In that Letter are these moderate and pacific expressions.—'For ceremonies to contende (where it shall lye neither in your hands or oures to appoint what they shall be, but in suche mennes wisedomes as shall be appointed to the devising off the same, and whiche shall be receyved by common consent off the Parliament) it shal be to small purpos. But we truste that bothe true religion shall be restored, and that we shall not be burthened with unprofitable ceremonies. And therefore, as we purpos to submit oureselves to such orders as shall be established by authority, beinge not of themselves wicked, so we would wifhe yow willingly to do the same. For, whereas all the reformed churches differ amonge themselves in divers ceremonies, and yet agree in the unite of doctrine: we se no inconvenience if we use some ceremonies divers from them, so that we agree in the chief points of our religion. Notwithstandinge, if anie shal be intruded, that shal be offensive, we, upon juste conference and deliberation upon the same at oure meetinge with yow in Englande (whiche we truste by God's grace, will be shortly) wil brotherly joine with yow to be sewters for the reformation and abolishinge of the same. In the meane season, let us with one harte and minde cal to the Almightye God, that of his infinit mercie, he will finishe and establishe that worke that he hath begun in oure countrie.' . . . (3).

and, June 21, was made the first Canon of the seventh stall in the collegiate church of Westminster (n). But this he quitted again, upon his being elected Dean of St Paul's cathedral in London, November 17, 1560. The third of December ensuing, he was collated to the Prebend of Wildland in the same church (o): and December 28, 1562, to the Rectory of Hadham in Hertfordshire. Thus quietly settled again in his own country, he became a frequent and painful preacher [E], and a zealous writer against the English Catholics that had fled out of the kingdom; as will appear in the sequel. For thirty years together he preached the first and last sermons in the time of Lent before the Queen, wherein he dealt plainly and faithfully with her, without dislike [F]; only at one time speaking less reverently of the sign of the Cross, she called aloud to him from her closet window, commanding him to retire from that ungodly digression, and to return to his text (p). At the recommendation of Archbishop Parker, he was chosen Prolocutor of the Lower House of Convocation, in 1562, when the Articles of Religion were settled (q). In 1564, when the debates ran high between the Churchmen and Puritans about the use of the Garments, Dean Nowell appears to have been moderate upon that subject [G]. For he was for the general using of them, but with a protestation, that it were desirable, these differences of Garments were taken away (r). In the year 1572, he founded a free-school at Middleton, in his native county of Lancashire, for teaching the then rude inhabitants the principles of learning and true religion (s). He was one of those learned Divines, who had, in 1581, some Conferences with Edmund Campian in the Tower [H], which were published in 1583 (t). The 20th of August, 1588, he preached a Thanksgiving Sermon at Paul's-cross, for the deliverance from the Spanish Armada; when he exhorted his audience, to give praise and thanks to God for that great mercy (u). Having soon after resigned his Prebend of Wildland, he was collated, November 11, 1588, to that of Totenhall, which he kept as long as he lived (w). About the beginning of the year 1589, he resigned the Rectory of Hadham (x); and, April 28, 1594, was installed Canon of Windsor (y). September 6, 1595, he was elected Principal of Brasen-nose-college in Oxford; and, October 1st following, actually created Doctor in Divinity, with allowance of Seniority over all the Doctors then in the University, not only in regard of his age, but of his dignity in the Church (z). He resigned his place of Principal 14 December, 1595 (a). After having arrived to the long and uncommon age of ninety, and enjoyed to the last a perfect use of his senses and faculties [I], he departed this life February 13, 1601-2, and was buried in the chapel of the Virgin Mary, within the cathedral of St Paul. Soon after, a comely monument was erected over his grave, with a Latin epitaph (b). He gave an estate of 200 pounds a year to Brasen-nose-college [K]: and was also a benefactor to St Paul's school (c). Besides some controversial pieces [L], he

J. Strype gives us an instance of his wonderful success in that employment (4): Namely, that, in the year 1567, when he was in Lancashire, he did, by his continual preaching in divers places of that country, bring many obstinate and wilful people to conformity and obedience.

[F] Without dislike.] So Mr Wood affirms. But from Mr Strype's Life of Archbishop Parker, it appears, that though Mr Nowell was much favoured by the Queen for his excellent learning and education, and that she used to permit him to discourse in her presence; yet, because in a sermon before her, March 7th, 1564, he had reflected on a very lewd Popish book, dedicated to her, which was stuffed not only with Papistical doctrine, but in many places tainted with immodest language, and therefore full of irreverence and impudence towards her Majesty; some of the lewd or Popishly affected Courtiers, not only ran him down with much severe language, but also found means to prejudice the Queen against him, so that she reproved him: which gave him the utmost uneasiness. And it was a considerable time before he could entirely regain her favour (5).

[G] Dean Nowell appears to have been moderate upon that subject.] His Pacification was expressed in the following words. Ministri Ecclesie Anglicanæ, qui Dei beneficio puram Christi doctrinam, & manifestam detestationem Antichristianismi publice profitentur, Vestiumque discrimine, publica auctoritate jam præscripto, utuntur, tum in administratione sacra, tum in usu externo, eo discrimine sine impietate uti possunt, modo omnis cultus, necessitatisque opinio amoveatur. Optamus tamen hoc Vestium discrimen propter has causas tolli. 1. Propter abusum in Ecclesiis Anglicanis metuendum. 2. Propter pleniorum declarationem detestationis corruptæ & superstitiosæ religionis. 3. Propter pleniorum professionem libertatis Christi. 4. Propter tollendas inter fratres dissensiones. With this last paragraph Mr Nowell declared he could subscribe, or else not (6). — The substance of his Pacification was; 'That the Ministers of the Church of England, who, by the blessing of God, profess the pure doctrine of Christ, and an open detestation of Antichristianism, and use the Garments enjoined by public authority, both in the administration of the Sacraments, and in common wear; may use that difference of habit without sin; Provided no superstition, nor any opinion of their necessity, be annexed to them. He wished, however, they were taken away, for the following reasons. 1. For fear of the abuse they might occasion. 2. To express more strongly a detestation of the corrupt and superstitious religion of the Papists. 3. For a fuller profession of our Christian liberty. 4. To put an end to the disputes between the Brethren.'

[H] Who had, 1581, Some Conferences with Edmund Campian in the Tower.] They were published at London in 1583, in a small 4to, and black letter.

[K] He gave an estate of 200 l. a year to Brasen-nose-college.] Which he appropriated to the following uses. — Sixty-five marks, or 43 l. 6 s. 8 d. to thirteen scholars (so many as he had continued years in the college) viz to each five marks, for six years. — Thirty pounds per annum to the Master and Usher of Middleton-school. — The remainder for the use of the Principal, Fellows, &c. of the college. — The said thirteen scholars to be chosen out of Middleton-school, or out of the schools at Whalley and Burnley in Lancashire (8).

[L] Besides some controversial pieces.] His controversies were entirely with the Papists. The first piece he published, was against Thomas Dorman, B. D. sometime Fellow of New college, Oxford, who had he published a Catechism, which was very much esteemed [M]. He was, in the time he lived, a very learned man; reckoned an excellent Divine, and much esteemed by the heads of our Church. His charity to the poor was great and exemplary, especially if they had any thing of a scholar in them; and his comfort to the afflicted either in body or mind was very extensive (d). What further character is given of him, may be seen in the note [N]. He wrote a very neat and beautiful small hand, as appears from an original letter of his in our possession [O], of which the contents are given below. His next younger brother, LAURENCE NOWELL, also a very learned man, was educated partly in Brasen-nose-college in Oxford, and partly in Cambridge. About the year 1543, he became Master of the free-school at Sutton-Colfield in Warwickshire, where he continued several years. In Queen Mary's reign, he absconded for a while at Carew-castle in Pembroke-shire, the house of Sir John Perrot; and then withdrew into Germany, to his brother, and the rest of the English exiles (a). After Queen Elizabeth's happy accession, returning to England, he was installed Dean of Lichfield April 29, 1559, holding with it the Archdeaconry of Derby; he was also Prebendary of York and Chichester, and Rector of Haughton, and Drayton-Basset in the county of Stafford (b). He is justly celebrated for his singular learning, and for being the first who revived the study of the Saxon language in this kingdom (c). And he it was who instructed the most eminent William Lambarde in that tongue, and put him upon the study of Antiquities. He dyed in 1576, leaving behind him in manuscript A Saxon-English Dictionary, which is in the Bodleian Library; and some Collections out of ancient Historians, &c. which are in the Cottonian (d).

written a book against some part of Bishop Jewell's challenge, and intitled it, A Proove of certain Articles in Religion denied by Mr Jewell; [viz. the supremacy of the Pope, Transubstantiation, Communion in one kind, and the Mass.] Antwerp, 1564, Mr Nowell's Answer, therefore, was 'A Reproof of a book intitled, A Proove of certain Articles in Religion, denied by Master Jewell, set forth by Thomas Dorman Bachelor of Divinitie.' London, 1565, 4to. Dorman replying, in A Disproove of Nowell's Reprove. Mr Nowell vindicated himself, in II 'A Reproof of Mr Dorman's Proof continued, with a Defence of the chief Authority of Princes, as well in Causes Ecclesiastical as Civil, within their Dominions, by Mr Dorman maliciously impugned.' Lond. 1566. 4to, III. He published 'A Confutation as well of M. Dorman's last Booke, intitled, A Disproove, &c. as also of D. Sander his causes of Transubstantiation, by Alexander Nowell. Whereby our Countrey men (especially the simple and unlearned) may understand howe shamefully they are abused by those and like Bokes, prettended to be written for their instruction.' Lond. 1567, 4to.

[M] A Catechism.] Mr Nowell was put upon composing this Catechism, by Secretary Cecil, and other great men in the nation; on purpose to stop a clamour raised amongst the Roman Catholics, That the Protestants had no Principles. When it was finished, the Dean sent it with a Dedication to Secretary Cecil. The Convocation that met in 1562, did it so much honour, as diligently to review, and interline it in some places; and unanimously to approve and allow it as their own Booke, and their professed Doctrine. After those corrections, the Dean caused a fair copy of it to be taken, which he sent to Secretary Cecil; not in his own name as afore, but in the name of the Clergy of the Convocation, as their book: and, after it had lain in the Secretary's hands above a year, he returned it to the Author with some learned man's notes. At length, upon the joynt request of the two Archbishops, it was first printed and published in 1570, under this title, IV. Christianæ Pietatis prima Institutio; ad usum Scholarum Latine scripta. Lond. 4to. reprinted very often since, and translated into English by Tho. Norton. Lond. 1571, 4to. and into Greek by William Whitaker. Lond. 1575. Mr Strype informs us, that this Catechism seems to be nearly the same with one set forth a month or two before King Edward the VIth's death, and licensed, and recommended by that King's Letter prefixed thereto. We may conclude, that this first Catechism was also composed by Mr Nowell; for it is not to be imagined, that a man of his great reputation would have published it as his own, after it had undergone some corrections and alterations, unless it had been originally of his own composition (g). Several years after, it was in so great esteem, that Bishop Cooper, in his Admonition to the People of England (10), gives this high character of it. 'For a Catechism, I refer them to that which was made by the learned and godly man, Mr Nowell, Dean of Paul's, received and allowed by the Church of England, and very fully grounded and established upon the word of God. There may you see all the parts of true Religion received, the Difficulties expounded, the Truth declared the Corruptions of the Church of Rome rejected.' V. Dean Nowell published also a lesser Catechism, which he intitled, Catechismus parvus, Pueris primum, qui ediscatur, proponendus in Scholis; in Latin and Greek. Lond. 1574, 8vo. Translated into English Lond. 1587, 8vo. and afterwards into Hebrew. VI. A Letter of his is published in the Appendix to Archbishop Parker's Life, by J. Strype (11). And he is said in the same Life (12), to have composed a Homily on account of the Plague in 1564.

GILBY [JOHN], a person memorable for his ingenuity and industry, and for the many books he published without the benefit of a regular education; and memorable also for the several reverses of fortune he underwent. He was born, about the 17th of November 1600, in or near Edinburgh in Scotland (a). His father, who was of an ancient and genteel family [A], having wasted his estate, and being a prisoner in the King's-Bench, could give his son but little education at school.

However, the youth being very industrious, obtained some knowledge in the Latin Grammar; and, afterward, so much money, as not only to relieve his father and procure his discharge from prison, (a rare instance of filial piety!) but also to bind himself out apprentice to one Draper, a Dancing-master in Grays-Inn-lane, London. By his skill in that profession, and his agreeable and complaisant behaviour to his master's customers, he got so much money from them, as to buy out the remaining part of his time, and set up for himself. But, some time after, being employed to dance in a mask given by the great Villiers Duke of Buckingham, he happened, by a false step [B], to sprain a vein in the inside of his leg, which ever after occasioned him to go lamish. Next, we find he was Dancing-master to the sisters of Sir Ralph Hopton [C], at Witham in Somersetshire; where he learned, from that accomplished gentleman, how to handle the pike and musquet. When Thomas Wentworth, Earl of Strafford, was appointed Lord Deputy of Ireland, in 1633, he took him into his family to teach the art of dancing; and having a command of his pen, and writing a good hand, he was also employed by the Lord Deputy to transcribe several things for him. In this family it was, that he first gave proof of his inclination to Poetry, by translating some of Æsop's Fables into English verse; which, afterwards, when he came to understand Latin better, and had submitted them to the correction of several learned persons, he made publick. And being one of the troop of guard belonging to the Earl his master, he composed in English verse, The Character of a Trooper, a witty and humorous piece. About that time, his Lordship having appointed him Master of the Revels in Ireland, he built a Play-house in St Warburgh's street in Dublin, and was much esteemed there for his industry and ingenuity: but the Rebellion breaking out in that kingdom in 1641, he lost all; and his life was several times in great danger, particularly at the blowing up of Refernam-castle near Dublin, when he happily escaped. About the year 1646, he left Ireland, and having the misfortune of being shipwrecked in his passage to England, arrived at London in very poor and necessitous circumstances. After a short stay there, he walked to Cambridge, where his great industry, and his greater love to learning, being discovered, several of the scholars gave him all the encouragement and instructions in their power; by which means, he became so compleat a master of the Latin tongue, that he ventured to translate Virgil into English verse, which was published in 1649 [D], and reprinted afterwards in a pompous manner, adorned

[A] His father, who was of an ancient and genteel family. The name of Ogilby, or Ogilvie, hath been ennobled, by the titles of Earl of Airly, Earl of Finlater; and Lord Banff: all in Scotland. But, which of those families our Author had any relation to, we are not particularly informed.

[B] By a false step. It happened by his high dancing, and cutting of capers, according to the fashion then in use (1).

[C] The sisters of Sir Ralph Hopton. This Sir Ralph Hopton was made Knight of the Bath at the Coronation of King Charles I. and was General of his armies in the West, where he signalized his valour at Sherbourne castle, Launceston, Saltah, Bradock, Stratton, &c. See a full Account of him, and his exploits, in Lord Clarendon's History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars (2). He was advanced to the title of Baron

Hopton of Stratton, 4 Sept. 1643; but dying at Bruges, in Sept. 1652, without issue, his four sisters succeeded to his estate. Namely, 1. Rachel, married to ——— Morgan. 2. Mary, first to ——— Hartop, and afterwards to ——— Mackworth, Kot. 3. ——— to ——— Windham. And 4. Margaret, to ——— Throgmorton (3).

[D] He ventured to translate Virgil into English verse. He published that great Poet; or, as he intitled it, The Works of Pub. Virgil Maro, in a large 8vo. Lond. 1649-50. which he dedicated to his most noble patron William, Marquis of Hertford; and thereupon obtained a considerable sum of money in his pocket, as Mr Wood informs us (4). He reprinted this translation in a large Octavo, Lond. 1675, and 1685, with sculpture and annotations.

adorned with sculpture [E]. And, with the same sculptures, or cuts; he put out a beautiful and elegant Latin edition of that poet [F]. In 1651 he published, Fables of Æsop paraphrased in verse, and adorned with sculptures [G]. About the year 1654, through his great and unwearied diligence, accompanied with an insatiable desire of knowledge, he did learn the Greek language (b). When he had arrived to a competent knowledge of it, he undertook to translate Homer's Iliads, and afterwards his Odysses; both which he published in process of time [H], printed in a beautiful and elegant manner. Mean while, he was employed, with the assistance of Dr John Worthington and other learned men, in printing at Cambridge a finer edition of the English Bible than had been extant ever before; which he adorned with chorographical and other sculptures, and presented a sumptuous copy of it to King Charles the Second, at his first coming to the royal chapel at Whitehall (c). He also presented a copy of it to the House of Lords, for which he received a gratuity from that House [I]: and very probably from the House of Convocation then sitting (d) [K]. In the beginning of the year 1661, he received orders from the Commissioners for his Majesty's Coronation, to prepare and conduct the poetical part thereof, as speeches, emblems, mottoes, and inscriptions: whereupon he drew up for the present, The Relation of his Majesty's Entertainment, passing through the City of London to his Coronation: with a description of the Triumphal Arches and Solemnity (e), in ten sheets, folio. But afterwards, by his Majesty's command, he improved and published it in a large volume, on royal paper, with admirable sculptures, and the speeches at large [L]; and it hath been much made use of in succeeding coronations (f). In 1662, he went into Ireland, being appointed by patent Master of the Revels there, though he had Sir William Davenant for competitor. At Dublin he built a noble theatre, which cost him about 2000 pounds, the former having been destroyed during the troubles. Upon his return to England he took Æsop again in hand, of which he published a second volume in 1665 [M]. The next things that he composed, were, The Ephesian Matron, and The Roman Slave, two heroic poems, dedicated to Thomas Earl of Ossory. Afterwards he wrote Carolics, an epic poem in twelve books, in honour of King Charles the First, whom he represented as the best pattern of true prudence, valour, and christianity. But this was entirely lost in the great fire of London, when our author's house in White-Friers was burnt, and he himself ruined, having but five pounds left to begin the world (g). But 'so it was, that he had such an excellent invention and prudential wit, and 'was master of so good an address, that when he had nothing to live on, he could not 'only shift handfomely, but made such rational proposals, which were embraced by rich 'and great men, that in a short time he would obtain an estate again. He never failed in 'what he undertook, but by his great industry and prudence went through it with profit 'and honour to himself (h).' Soon after the said fire, he had his house in White-Friers rebuilt; set up a printing-house there; employed able workmen; was appointed his Majesty's Cosmographer, and Geographic Printer, and printed several books that he and his assistants had translated and collected; particularly an Atlas [N], of which an account is given

[E] And reprinted afterwards in a pompous manner. Namely, in 1654. Lond fol. with this title, The Works of Publius Virgilius Maro, translated, adorn'd with sculpture; and illustrated with Annotations. It was the fairest edition that 'till then the English press ever produced, and hath his picture before it, as most of the Books which he published have. Mr Wood tells us (5), that by the publication with Annotations, of that most noble author, Mr Ogilby obtained the reputation of a good translator, and a faithful interpreter. But he hath been much eclipsed by the subsequent and more modern translators of that great Poet.

[F] He put out a beautiful and elegant Latin edition of that poet. This was in the year 1658, in a large folio.

[G] Fables of Æsop, &c.] Lond. 1651, 4to. These were ushered into the world, with commendatory verses from Sir William Davenant, then a prisoner in the Tower, and Mr James Shirley, both eminent poets (6).

[H] Homer's Iliads, and afterwards his Odysses.] He published 'Homer his Iliads translated, adorn'd 'with sculpture, and illustrated with Annotations.' Lond. 1660. fol. Dedicated to his most gracious Majesty King Charles II.—But it was not 'till 1665, that he put out, 'Homer his Odysses translated, 'adorned with Sculpture, and illustrated with Annotations.' Lond. fol. This he dedicated to his most noble Lord, James Duke of Ormond, Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.—In these translations, he had the assistance of James Shirley, reputed an excellent Poet at that time (7).

[I] He also presented a copy of it to the House of Lords, for which he received a gratuity, &c.] This appears from the following entry. (8) 'Ordered, That

'Dr Hodges shall attend the Lords, to receive from 'them such voluntary Contributions, as their Lordships shall give to Mr Ogilby, in recompense of his 'great Pains and Charge he hath been at in printing 'a Bible, which he hath presented and delivered to 'this House.'

[K] And very probably from the House of Convocation, &c.] Which may be inferred from this minute in their Books, '1661, 31 die mensis Maii— 'lecta est Petitio ejusdem Ogleby cum literis Regis 'huic Domo directis de & super commendatione Biblii 'impensis dicti Ogleby imprimendi, &c. (9).'

[L] And published it in a large volume, —with admirable sculptures, &c.] The title he gave it, was, 'The large Treatise, formerly promised and much 'expected, of his Majesty's Entertainment, in his 'passing through London; with the whole Cavalcade, 'and the four Arches, in Sculpture. As also a Narrative and Sculptures of his Majesty's solemn Coronation. Not 'till now published, by John Ogilby, 'Gent.' Lond. 1662, fol.

[M] He took Æsop again in hand, of which he published a second Volume.] He not only paraphrased that author, but also unfolded his Mythology, and added some new Fables of his own. It was the amusement of his leisure hours, during his recess at Kingston upon Thames, at the time of the great Sickness in London. And he published it, as I have said, in 1665, fol. with beautiful cuts: afterwards, in a lesser volume, with this title, 'The Fables of Æsop, paraphrased in verse, adorned with sculptures, and 'illustrated with Annotations.' Lond. 1673, 1674, 2 vol. 8vo.

[N] Particularly an Atlas.] This great work was comprised in several folio Volumes, and published in the following order. 1. An Embassy from New Bataravia, given below. All these great works were printed on imperial paper, adorned with maps, and most curious sculptures; and were carried on and sold by way of Proposals and standing Lotteries (i). This laborious man dyed September 4, 1676, and was interred in the vault under part of the church of St Bride's in Fleet-street (k). Some have stiled him one of the prodigies of his age, for producing, from his late initiation into literature, so many large and learned volumes, as well in verse as in prose [Q]. Mr Pope hath pronounced his poetry too mean for criticism (l): he was then speaking of our author's translation of Homer; but very probably he had no better opinion of his original poems, of which I have above given an account. However, if Mr Ogilby had not a compleat poetical genius, he was notwithstanding a man of parts, and made an amazing proficiency in learning, by the force of an unwearied application. He cannot be sufficiently commended for his virtuous industry, as well as his filial piety, in procuring, in so early a time of life, his father's liberty, when he was confined in a prison. In a word, he appears in his whole conduct to have been an honest and a good man [P].

[O] Some have stiled him one of the prodigies of his age, &c. This is the character given of him by Mr Edw. Phillips (10), who adds, that 'His Paraphrase upon Æsop's Fables, for ingenuity and fancy, besides the invention of new Fables, is generally confessed to have exceeded whatever hath been done before in that kind.'

[P] He appears in his whole conduct to have been an honest and a good man. He seems to have recommended himself to the world by honest means, without having recourse to the servile arts of flattery, and the blandishments of falsehood. He is an instance of the astonishing efficacy of application; had some more modern poets been blessed with a thousandth part of his oeconomy and industry, they need not to have lived in poverty, and dyed of want. Although Mr Ogilby cannot be denominated a genius, yet he found means to make a genteel livelihood by literature, which many of the sons of Parliament, blessed with superior powers, curse as a very dry and unpleasing soil, but which proceeds more from want of culture, than native barrenness. Such is the conclusion of the character, and of the account, given of him, in the Lives of the Poets published by Mr Theoph. Cibber (11).

OLDFIELD [ANNE], a celebrated Actress, was born in the year 1683, in Pall-Mall; where her father Captain Oldfield (a), then a private gentleman in the horse-guards, was once possessed of a moderately competent estate in houses; but by a heedless extravagance, too frequently seen in his profession, having made away both that and his military appointments, he left his family at his death very much unprovided. In these unhappy circumstances, the widow gladly accepted of an invitation to live with her sister who kept a tavern in St James's Market, placing her daughter with a sempstress* in King's-Street Westminster. But it was not long before fortune chalked out another course of life for Miss Oldfield. She had, it seems, early begun to take an extraordinary delight in reading plays, and was entertaining her relations at the tavern with her talent this way (b), when her voice chanced to reach the ear of Captain George Farquar [A], who, luckily for her, happened to dine there that day. He immediately perceived something so sweet in it, as to engage his particular attention; and, after listening a while, he stepped into the room behind the barr, whence it came. Here he was equally struck with the agreeable person and carriage of the performer, as he had before been pleased with the performance, and presently pronounced our young sempstress admirably formed for the stage. This destination entirely concurring with her own most ardent wishes.

(a) 'Tis said he had a commission from King James the Second. See Memoirs of the Life of Mrs Oldfield, p. 55. in a letter to the author, by Ch. Taylor, servant to Mr Rich. If this be so, whatever the commission were, he had a just claim, by the courtesy of England, to the title of Captain.

(1) This is no other than Mr Edm. Curl; but he seems to write here from his own knowledge. (2) See his Discourse upon Comedy, p. 51. This is more probable, as it exactly suited Mrs Oldfield's case at that time.

[A] Captain Farquar. The author of the Memoirs of her Life (1), assures us that he had frequently heard her mention the agreeable hours she had passed in Mr Farquar's company, and that his apology for the stage pleased her above all others; which is not unlikely (2), as the humorous, it is well known, was her distinguished taste. 'Poetry alone, says this sprightly author, and chiefly the drama, lies open to the insults of all pretenders. She was one of nature's eldest offsprings, whence, by her birth-right, and plain simplicity, she pleads a genuine likeness to her mother. Born in the innocence of time, she provided not against the assaults of succeeding ages; and depending altogether on the generous end of her invention, neglected those secret supports, and serpentine devices used by other arts, that wind themselves into practice for more subtle and politic designs: naked she came into the world, and it is to be feared, like her professors, will go naked out.'

[B] Sir

wishes. Her mother took the first opportunity of opening the matter to Sir John Vanbrugh [B], who had always expressed a great kindness for the family. That gentleman, after some trial, finding the young votary's qualifications every way very promising, without any delay, recommended her to Mr Rich, then Patentee of the King's theatre, who took her into the play-house at fifteen shillings a week. This was in 1699, when Miss was only sixteen years of age, yet she grew, in a short time, so much into favour, as to get her salary advanced to twenty shillings (c) [C]. She first distinguished herself in the part of Leonora [D] in Sir Courtly Nice, in 1703, and established her theatrical reputation the following year, in that of Lady Betty Modish [E]. It was a little before this [F] time, that she engaged the particular regards of Arthur Maynwaring, Esq; who interested himself greatly in the figure she made upon the stage. It was in some measure owing to the pains he took in improving her natural talents, that she became (as the soon did) the delight and chief ornament of it (d). In 1708, she was ranked so high in this profession, as to be pitched on among the principal actors (e), for one of the managers of the play-house, but that design being laid aside on account of her sex, she was so far from being chagrined at the disappointment, that she even approved the change of the scheme, and a charte blanche being offered her to continue in her former station, she demanded in lieu of so great a share of profit and power, no more than two hundred pounds a year, besides a benefit. That salary, in respect to her singular merit, was raised in a few years, to three hundred guineas; and she never sought to advance it. Some time after the death of Mr Maynwaring, to whom she brought a son, she engaged in a like correspondence with Brigadier-General Charles Churchill, Esq; This gentleman took as much delight in bringing her into the company of persons of the first rank, off the stage, as the former had taken in fitting her to sustain such personages upon it (f). By him she had another son, who afterwards married the Lady Anna Maria Walpole, natural daughter to the Earl of Orford. About the year 1718, Mr Savage, natural son to Earl Rivers, being reduced to the extreme necessity, his very singular case was so much compassionated by Mrs Oldfield, that she allowed him a settled pension [G] of fifty

(f) Memoirs of Mrs Oldfield, ubi supra, p. 65.

[B] Sir John Vanbrugh.] At this interview, Sir John having learned from her own mouth, that her inclination lay chiefly to Comedy, in preference to Tragedy, revised the Pilgrim of Beaumont and Fletcher, and making some alterations in it, procured the part of Alinda for Miss Oldfield; the play being now revived for the benefit of Mr Dryden, who wrote a prologue to it, but died on the third night of its representation (3). Mr Cibber observes, that this gentle character [Alinda] was well suited to that modesty, which is inherent to young beginners, who arrive at any excellence (4).

[C] She was raised to twenty.] The last cited author tells us (5), that she remained about a year little more than a mute, nay, he will have it chiefly for want of skill in the pronunciation, which was only conquered by her good understanding (the case, as he remarks too, of Mrs Barry). That during this time she gave no tolerable hopes of her ever being an actress, and even in the part of Alinda, he thought she had little more than her person of the necessary requisites for forming a good actress. For, continues he, she set out with so extraordinary a confidence, that it kept her too despondingly down to a formal, plain, not to say flat, manner of speaking. But though the silver tone of her voice could not incline Mr Cibber to any hopes in her favour, yet, it seems, the other part of the auditory saw further into her promising merit, and procured her a better allowance. This truth is extorted from her contemporary actor, who owns he was deceived in the opinion he had entertained of her. However, this mistake could not, it is well known, be owing to any want of a discerning spirit in himself, but to the approbation of the public, which, though given her against the judgment, yet being the true warm weather of a theatrical plant, soon brought this forward to the perfection designed it by nature.

[D] The part of Leonora.] Queen Anne being at Bath that summer, was attended there by the company; who leaving Mrs Verbruggen sick in London, of all her parts, it seems, this of Leonora was the only one which fell to the share of Miss Oldfield. In this part she luckily happened to be contrasted with Mr Cibber in that of Sir Courtly Nice: and it seems the first set before his eyes the superiority of her understanding, by the misty manner of muttering her words, in return to his affected carelessness from a contemptuous neglect of her merit at the rehearsal; and then in acting the play, triumphed over his dullness, and awaked him into an almost amazement: so forward and sudden a step, says he, into nature, I had never seen; and what made her performance more valuable, was, that I knew it all proceeded from her own understanding, untaught, and unassisted by any more experienced actor (6).

[E] Part of Lady Betty Modish.] We are assured by the author himself of the Careless Husband, which had been thrown aside the summer before less than half finished, in despair of having justice done to the character of Lady Betty Modish, was taken up again by him, upon the breaking out of Miss Oldfield's theatrical powers in that of Leonora. From that time, it seems he condescended to admit her into his company, and we must admire the promptness of his wit, to make the best advantage of it. At these interviews she sat for her picture, and I need not mention what advantage the circumstance of being unknown to her gave both to the artist and the subject. Many sentiments in this character, were so far Mrs Oldfield's, as to be only dressed with a little more care, than when they negligently fell from her lively humour. She wanted only birth to be the agreeable, gay, woman of quality, a little too conscious of her natural attractions (7).

[F] It was a little before this, &c.] The author of her Memoirs informs us (8), that the summer before the Careless Husband was brought upon the stage, our actress passed the long vacation with Mr Maynwaring at Windsor (the scene of that comedy) where they lodged in the castle, at the house of Mr John Sewell, Treasurer and Chapter-Clerk to the Dean and College; a circumstance, which he suggests, furnished an opportunity of improving Mrs Oldfield's performance.

[G] She gave Savage a pension.] In the view of preventing any ill natured and unjust censure, which might deprive this act of generosity of its due praise, and that the good actions of Mrs Oldfield may not be fulfilled by her general moral character, the writer of Mr Savage's Life thinks proper to mention, that he [Savage] often declared in the strongest terms, that he never saw her alone, or in any other place than behind the scenes. In another place, the same author, speaking of Queen Caroline's stipend of 50 pounds, observes, that Mrs Oldfield had formerly given him the same allowance, with much more heroic intentions (9); that she had no other view than to enable him to prosecute his studies, and to set himself above the want of assistance; and was content with doing good without stipulating for encomiums: he takes notice also, that this favour was done him without expecting any solicitations, or exacting any servilities (10).

fifty pounds a year, which was duly and regularly paid as long as she lived. This added to several other tenderly humane and disinterestedly generous actions, together with a peculiarly distinguished taste in the elegance of dress, conversation, and manners [H], have generally been spread as a veil to cover her failings, which indeed could by no means bear the light [I]. However, with all her faults, she was the Cara of her time [K] as long as she lived, and after her death [L], which happened on Friday, October 23d, 1730. Her corps, elegantly dressed [M], was carried on the Tuesday following from her house in Grosvenor-Street to the Jerusalem-Chamber, to lie in state; whence, about eleven o'clock at night, it was conveyed to the Abbey; the pall being supported by the Lord de la Warr, Lord Hervey, the Right honourable George Bubb Dodington, Charles Hedges, Esq; Walter Carey, Esq; and Captain Elliot; her eldest son, Arthur Maynwayring, Esq; being chief mourner, and the funeral service being performed by the senior Prebendary then resident. She was interred towards the west end of the fourth aisle, near the Confistory Court between the monuments of Mr Craggs and Mr Congreve. Her will [N] is an instance both of her good sense, and her piety towards her relations.

[H] Elegance of her dress, conversation, and manners] The Tatler, taking notice of her dress (11), says, that 'whatever character she represented, she was always well dressed. The make of her mind very much contributed to the ornament of her body. This made every thing look native about her, and her cloaths were so exactly fitted, that they appeared, as it were, part of her person. Her most elegant deportment was owing to her manner, and not to her habit. Her beauty was full of attraction, but more of allure-ment. There was such a composure in her looks, and propriety in her dress, that you would think it impossible she should change the garb you one day saw her in, for any thing so becoming, 'till you next day saw her in another. There was no other mystery in this, but that however she was apparelled, herself was the same. For there is an immediate relation between our thoughts and gestures, that a woman must think well to look well.'

[I] Will not bear the light.] We are told that Sir Roger Mostyn, then an officer in the guards, was passionately in love with her, that she not only treated his addresses with coldness, but even used him ill. Notwithstanding which, upon receiving the news of his discharge from the army and banishment (12), the thoughts of a separation from her, which that must occasion, drew tears from him, and being ordered to his feat in the country next day, he proposed instant marriage to her, as the last remedy, which produced no other effect than a mortifying refusal. If we may rely upon this piece of secret history for fact, it may be made use of to confirm the testimony of those who suggest it as their opinion, that she had no love-affairs besides those with the two persons mentioned in the text (13). But enough of this subject.

[K] The Cara of her time.] The qualities which gave birth to this distinction, were partly natural, and partly acquired. The first are summed up as follows (14). In her person, she was of a stature just rising to that height, where the graceful can only begin to shew itself. Of a lively aspect, and command in her mien. Nature had given her this peculiar happiness, that she looked and maintained the agreeable at a time of life, when other fine women only raise admirers by their understanding. She had a very large portion of natural good sense, and a lively turn of conversation, which made her very easy to ladies of the highest rank. The effect of this was seen upon the stage, where she sometimes was what might have become the finest woman in real life to have supported. Mr Cibber tells us (15), 'that he had often seen her in private societies, where women of the best rank might have borrowed some part of her behaviour, without the least diminution of their sense or dignity; and assures us, that in this, he did no more than repeat the words of a woman of condition then at Bath.' The qualities she had acquired, were the genteel and the elegant; one in her air, and the other in dress. She generally provided her own dress on the stage, and in this, set the fashion, 'till she appeared in another. She was particularly fortunate in the wearing of her person, her figure always improving 'till her thirtieth year. Mr Cibber likewise mentions it as a mark of good sense rarely known in any actor of either sex besides herself, that to the last year of her life, she never undertook any part she liked, without being importunately desirous of having all the helps in it, that could be given her, and that with all her merit, she was tractable, and less presuming in her station, than several that had half her pretensions to be troublesome. At the same time, we are assured, that she lost nothing by this easy conduct, having every thing she asked, but that, it seems, was, because she was always reasonable in her requests; hating as much to be grudged as denied a civility (16).

[M] Her corps elegantly dressed.] This was done by the sole direction of Mrs Sanders (22), who saw her laid in her coffin, with a very fine Brussels laced head, a holland shift with a tucker and double ruffles of the same lace, a pair of new kid gloves, and her body wrapt up in a winding sheet.

[N] Her last will.] It was dated June 27th, anno Georgii II. quarto, & Domini 1730, and contained in substance as follows. Having first mentioned a former gift by deed, of her house in Grosvenor-Street, to her son Charles Churchill, and ordered all her estate not already disposed of to be turned into money, and placed out at interest. She leaves first the interest of 5000 l. to her son Arthur Maynwayring, 'till he attains the age of thirty years, if he lived so long, after which, the principal to be paid to him, to be at his own disposal; and in case of his dying before thirty, the money is bequeathed to her other son Charles Churchill, and at his decease, to his father the Brigadier, absolutely. She then bequeaths to her mother ten guineas, and sixty pounds a year for her life. Thirdly, she leaves ten guineas to her aunt Garlow, and an annuity of thirty pounds for her life, in case she survives her mother, and not otherwise: To this she added in a codicil ten pounds a year for her aunt's life during that of her mother. Fourthly, Ten pounds a year for life is given to Mrs Saunders. Lastly, having appointed the surplusage of the yearly product of her estate to be put out to interest, and added to the bulk by way of increase: As to the rest, she orders, after the deaths of her mother, aunt, and Mrs Saunders, annuities for life, two thirds of her whole estate to be given to her son Arthur Maynwayring,

OLDHAM [JOHN], truly styled the English Juvenal, (for none of our English writers have more happily imitated the spirit and vehemence of that ancient Satyrift,) was the son of John Oldham, a Minister in the Oliverian times, and grandson of John Oldham Rector of Nun-eaton near Tetbury in Gloucestershire. He was born the 9th of August 1653, at Shipton, where his father was then Minister, near the town, and in the county, just now mentioned. His father educated him in grammar-learning 'till he was almost fit for the university; but, in order to qualify him for it the better, he sent him to Tetbury-school; where he staid indeed longer than he needed, occasioned by the earnest request of Alderman Yeat of Bristol, who having a son at the same school, was desirous that Mr Oldham should be his companion; as that, he thought, would conduce to advance him in his learning. This for a time retarded him in the prosecution of his studies, but Mr Alderman Yeat made him afterwards ample amends. In the beginning of June, 1670, he became a Butler of Edmund-Hall in Oxford, under the tuition of William Stephens, B. D. where he was observed to be a good Latinist, and chiefly to apply himself to Poetry, and other studies of that kind, to which he was naturally carried by his genius (a). May 30, 1674, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b); but left the university without completing that degree by determination; and went and lived at home with his father, much against his humour and inclination. However, this disagreeable situation did not abate his fire, or make him forsake his poetical studies. For in 1675, he composed a fine Pindarique, to the memory of his dear friend Mr Charles Mor-went. In 1676, some Verses, upon presenting a book to Cosmelia; the Parting; complaining of Absence; and promising a Visit. In 1677, A Ditkyrambick: the Drunkard's speech in a Mask (c). Mean while, he was appointed Usher of the free-school at Cröyden, and continued there about three years: towards the expiration of which, he began to compose his four Satires against the Jesuits [A], occasioned by the discovery of the Popish Plot in [A] His four Satires against the Jesuits. In these Satires he hath very severe strokes against that Society, and paints them in the strongest colours, both as to their principles and practices. Of which we shall give a few specimens.

Be diligent in Mischiefs trade, be each Performing as a Dev'l; nor stick to reach At Crimes most dangerous; where hold despair, Mad lust, and heedless blind revenge would ne'er Ev'n look, march you without a blush, or fear, Inflamm'd by all the hazards that oppose, And firm, as hurning Martyrs to your cause. Then you're true Jesuits, then you're fit to be Disciples of great Loyola - - - (1)

In Loyola's will, or last speech, he brings him in recommending Impudence to them, as one of their chief accomplishments; as well as Irelligion.

Get that great gift, and talent, Impudence, Accomplish'd Mankind's highest excellence: 'Tis that alone prefers, alone makes great, Confers alone wealth, titles, and estate: Gains place at Court, can make a fool a peer, An ass a bishop, can vil'f' hlockheads rear To wear Red Hats, and sit in porph'ry chair. 'Tis learning, parts, and skill, and wit, and sense, Worth, merit, honour, vertue, innocence. Next for Religion, learn what's fit to take, How small a dram do's the just compound make. As much as is by th' crafty states-men worn For fashion only, or to serve a turn: To hight fools its idle practice leave, Think it enough the empty form to have: The outward show is seemly, cheap, and light, The substance cumberfom, of cost, and weight.

Let no nice, holy, conscientious ass Amongst your better company find place, Me and your foundation to disgrace. Let Truth be hanisht, ragged Vertue fly, And poor unprofitable Honesty (2).

He also shows what dangerous use they make of Confessions.

But I forget (what should be mention'd most) Confession, our chief privilege, and boast: That staple ware, which ne'er returns in vain, Ne'er balks the Trader of expected gain. 'Tis this that spies through Court-intrigues, and hrings Admission to the cabinets of Kings: By this we keep proud Monarchs at our becks, And make our footfools of their Thrones and Necks (3).

In another place he very well exposes the Romish Relicks.

Yon is the Baptist's Coat, and one of's Heads, The rest are shewn in many a place besides; And of his teeth as many sets there are, As on their helt six Operators wear. Here hlessed Mary's milk, not yet turn'd four, Renown'd (like asses) for it's healing pow'r, Ten Holland kine scarce in a year give more (4).

His representation of Transubstantiation is also very sarcastical.

But nothing with the crowd does more enhance The value of these holy Charlatans †, Than when the Wonders of the Mass they view, Where spiritual jugglers their chief mast'ry shew: Hey Jingo, Sirs! What's this? 'tis Bread you see; Presto be gone! 'tis now a Deity.

in 1678. At Croyden, he received an unexpected visit from John Earl of Rochester, Charles Earl of Dorset, Sir Charles Sedley, and other persons of wit and distinction, merely upon the reputation of some Verses of his, they had seen in manuscript. The matter of the school was not a little surprized at such a visit, and would have taken the honour to himself; but they soon convinced him, that he had neither wit nor learning enough to make a party in such company (d). Upon his quitting Croyden school, he was recommended by his friend Harman Atwood, Esq; [B] to Sir Edward Thurland, one of the Barons of the Exchequer, who had a house near Riegate in Surrey, to be tutor to his grandsons. He continued in that family 'till 1681, and then being out of all employment, he retired to London, resorting there among the wits. Shortly after, he became tutor to a son of Sir William Hicks of Ruckholt-hall in Low-Layton, near London: where, by the advice and encouragement of the very eminent Dr Richard Lower, who was acquainted in the family, he applied himself to the study of Physic. But the irresistible bent of his genius, made him quit all gainful business, for the sake of his beloved mistress Poetry, as he expresses it [C]. When he had qualified young Mr Hicks for foreign travel, not caring, though earnestly pressed, to go abroad with him, he took leave of the family; and, with a small sum of money which he had saved, hastened to London, where his company was much sought after, on account of his wit [D]. It was then [B] He was recommended by his friend Harman Atwood, Esq;] This gentleman resided at Saunderstead in Surrey, where his family had been long seated. He was a singular benefactor to the Church there, and other Churches in his patronage; by building houses for the incumbents, and restoring the impropriated tythes, which sacrilege had despoiled them of (5). In his station of a Counsellor at Law, he was a person of uncommon Uprightness and Integrity: for which he is justly celebrated by our Author (6), in the following strains.

Long time had the profession under scandal lain,
And felt a general, tho' unjust disdain,
An upright Lawyer contradiction seem'd,
And was, at least, a prodigy esteem'd.
If one, perhaps, did in an age appear,
He was recorded like some blazing Star;
And statues were erected to the wond'rous man,
As heretofore to the strange honest publican.
To thee the numerous calling all it's thanks should give,
To thee, who could'st alone, it's lost Repute retrieve.
Thou the vast wide extremes didst reconcile,
The first almost, e'er taught it was not to beguile.
To each thou didst distribute Right so equally,
Ev'n Justice might herself correct her scales by thee.

And thus he goes on with the highest encomiums on that worthy man.

[C] But the irresistible bent of his genius, made him quit all gainful business for Poetry, &c.] Of this irresistible inclination of his to Poetry, he gives the following pleasant account, in a Letter to a friend.

- - - Silly I, all thriving Arts refuse,
And all my hopes, and all my vigour lose,
In service on that worst of Jilts, a Muse.
For gainful business court ignoble ease,
And in gay Trifles waste my ill-spent days.

Oft (I remember) did wise friends dissuade,
And bid me quit the trifling barren trade.
Oft have I tried (heav'n knows) to mortifie
This vile and wicked lust of poetry :

But still unconquer'd it remains within,
Fix'd as an habit, or some darling sin.
In vain I better studies there would fow,
Often I've tried, but none will thrive, or grow :
All my best thoughts, when I'd most serious be,
Are never from its foul infection free.
Nay (God forgive me) when I say my Prayers,
I scarce can help polluting them with verse :
That fabulous wretch * of old, revers'd I seem,
Who turn whate'er I touch to dross and rhyme.

* Mides.

' What was't I rashly vow'd ? shall ever I ' Quit my beloved mistress, Poetry ?
' Thou sweet beguiler of my lonely hours,
' Which thus glide unperceiv'd with silent course :
' Thou gentle spell, which undisturb'd do'st keep
' My breast, and charm intruding care asleep :
' They say, thou'rt poor, and unendow'd, what ' tho' ?
' For thee I this vain worthless world forego :
' Let wealth and honour be for fortune's slaves,
' The alms of fools, and prize of crafty knaves :
' To me thou art, whate'er the ambitious crave,
' And all that greedy misers want, or have :
' In youth or age, in travel, or at home,
' Here, or in town, at London, or at Rome,
' Rich, or a beggar, free, or in the Fleet,
' Whate'er my fate is, 'tis my fate to write (7) '

(7) Works, p. 121, 122, 129.

[D] Where his company was much sought after, on account of his wit.] His wit was agreeable and piercing, and free from the prophaneness then too common; as is acknowledged in some of the Verses made to his memory, after his decease.

The company of beauty, wealth, and wine,
Were not so charming, not so sweet as thine ;
They quickly perish ; yours was still the fame,
An everlasting, but a lambent flame ;
Which something so resistless did impart,
It still through ev'ry ear, won ev'ry heart :
Unlike the wretch that strives to get esteem,
Nay, thinks it fine and janty to blaspheme,
And can be witty on no other theme :
Ah ! foolish men (whom thou didst still despise)
That must be wicked to be counted wise !
Thy converse from this reigning Vice was free
And yet was truly all that wit could be :
None had it, but, ev'n with a tear, does own,
The Soul of dear Society is gone (8),

then he became acquainted with the renowned Mr Dryden. But what turned to his greater advantage, was his being made known to the most generous and truly noble William Earl of Kingston, who became his patron, and entertained him with great respect at his seat at Holme-Pierpont [E]. At length, Mr Oldham being seized with that fatal distemper the small-pox, died of it Dec. 9th, 1683, in the thirtieth year of his age; and was buried in the church of Holme-Pierpont, the Earl attending as chief mourner, and soon after erected a monument to his memory [F]. He was tall of stature; the make of his body very thin; his face long, his nose prominent, his aspect unpromising, but satire was in his eye: His constitution was very tender, and inclined to a consumption; and it was not a little injured by his intense application to his studies (c). For, that he was a person of great reading, is sufficiently plain from his works, of which a list is given below [G]. The esteem

[E] And entertained him with great respect at his seat at Holme Pierpont. The Author of his Life affirms, that the Earl would fain have had Mr Oldham to be his Chaplain. But, besides that it is much to be questioned whether he ever entered into orders, 'tis certain that he had the utmost aversion for that honorable servitude. This he sufficiently manifested in his Satyr addressed to a Friend, &c. (g) wherein are these remarkable lines.

[G] His works, &c.] The particulars of them are as follow. 1. Satyrs upon the Jesuits; four in number. With a Prologue. Written in the year 1679. 2. Pindarique Ode. 3. An Apology for the foregoing Ode, by way of Epilogue.—This Ode, or Satire, had something so shocking in it at first appearance, that the Author was forced to vindicate himself, and explain his meaning, in an Advertisement prefixed to the first collection of Poems he published.—‘As for the next poem, saith he, (which is the most liable to censure) tho’ the world has given it the name of the Satyr against Virtue, he declares, ’twas never design’d to that intent, how apt soever some may be to wrest it. And this appears by what is said after it, and is discernable enough to all, that have the sense to understand it: ’Twas meant to abuse those, who valued themselves upon their Wit and Parts, in praising Vice; and to shew, that others of sober principles, if they would take the same liberty in poetry, could strain as high rants in Profaneness as they. At first he intended it not for the publick, nor to pass beyond the privacy of two or three friends; but it having had the fate to steal abroad in manuscript, and afterwards in print, he thought it a justice due to his own reputation, to have it come forth without those faults which it had suffered from transcribers and the press, and which made it a worse Satyr upon himself, than upon what it was design’d.’ 4. The Passion of Byblis in Ovid’s Metamorphosis, B. 9. F. 11. Imitated in English. 5. A Satyr upon a Woman, who by her Falshood and Scorn, was the Death of his Friend. 6. Horace his Art of Poetry, imitated in English.—He apologizes for adventuring upon a translation of this after Ben. Jonson, and the Earl of Roscommon; by letting the Reader know, that it was a task imposed upon him, and not what he voluntarily engaged in. 7. Paraphrase upon Horace. Book I. Ode 31. 8. Paraphrase upon Book II. Ode 14. of the same. 9. The Praise of Homer. An Ode. 10. Bion. A Pastoral, in imitation of the Greek of Moschus, bewailing the Death of the Earl of Rochester. 11. The Lamentation for Adonis. Imitated out of the Greek of Bion of Smyrna. A Pastoral. 12. Paraphrase upon the 137th Psalm. 13. Paraphrase upon the Hymn of S Ambrose, An Ode. 14. A Letter from the Country to a Friend in Town, giving an account of the Author’s Inclinations to Poetry. Written in July 1678. 15. Upon a Printer that exposed him by printing a Piece of his grossly mangled, and faulty. 16. The eighth Satyr of Monsieur Boileau, imitated. Written in October 1682. 17. The thirteenth Satyr of Juvenal, imitated. Written in April, 1682. 18. David’s Lamentation for the Death of Saul and Jonathan, paraphrased. Written in September 1677. 19. The Ode of Aristotle in Athenæus, paraphrased. 20. Ode upon the works of Ben. Johnson. Written in 1678. 21. The ninth Ode of the Third Book of Horace, imitated. 22. Upon a Lady, who, by overturning of a Coach, had her Coats behind slung up, and what was under shewn to the View of the Company. Out of Voiture. 23. Catullus Epigr. 7. Imitated. 24, 25, 26. Elegies out of Ovid’s Amours, Imitated. Viz. Book II. Elegy. 4.—Elegy. 5.—Elegy. 10.—27. A Fragment of Petronius, paraphrased. 28. An Ode of Anacreon, paraphrased. The Cup. 29. An Allusion to Martial. Book I. Epigr. 118. 30. The Dream. Written, March 10. 1677. 31. A Satyr touching Nobility. Out of Monsieur Boileau. 32. A Satyr addressed to a Friend that is about to leave the University, and come abroad in the world. 33. Some Verses written in September, 1676. Presenting a Book to Cosmelia. Elegy. 34. The parting, Elegy. 35. Complaining

If they light in some noble family:
Diet, an Horse, and thirty pounds a year,
Besides th’ advantage of his Lordship’s ear,
The credit of the business, and the state,
Are things that in a Youngster’s sense found great.
Little the unexperienc’d Wretch does know,
What slavery he oft must undergo:
Who tho’ in filken scarf and cassoct drest,
Wears but a gayer Livery at best:
When Dinner calls, the Implement must wait
With holy words to consecrate the Meat:
But hold it for a Favour seldom known,
If he be deign’d the Honor to sit down.
Soon as the Tarts appear, Sir Crape, withdraw!
Those Dainties are not for a spiritual Maw:

For meer Board-wages such their freedom sell,
Slaves to an Hour, and Vassals to a Bell.

And where’s the mighty Prospect after all
A Chaplainship serv’d up, and seven years Thrall?
The menial thing, perhaps, for a Reward
Is to some slender Benefice prefer’d,
With this proviso bound, that he must wed
My Ladies antiquated waiting-maid,
In dressing only skill’d, and marmalade.

Let others who such meanesses can brook,
Strike countenance to every Great Man’s look;
Let those that have a mind, turn slaves to eat,
And live contented by another’s Plate:
I rate my Freedom higher, nor will I
For Food and Rayment truck my Liberty.
But if I must to my last shifts be put,
To fill a Bladder, and twelve yards of Gut;
Rather with counterfeited wooden leg,
And my right Arm tied up, I’ll chuse to beg:
I’ll rather chuse to starve at large, than be
The gawdiest Vassal to Dependency.

esteem his contemporaries had for him, appears by the many copies of Verses they wrote to bewail his immature death [H]. He had, as Mr Collier observes (f), 'a considerable genius for Satire, but did not always keep his wit within bounds, having some licentious strokes in his writings.' What further character hath been given of him by others, is set down below in the note [I].

A Character: Or, as it is in some editions, Character of a certain ugly old Parson. 'This last, as A. Wood observes rightly (11), 'is the worst and most offensive of all the rest;' and the more so, for being made, as 'tis said, upon a very near relation of his.—These several pieces were published at four different times. For those from No. 1. to No. 5. came out in 1681, and 1682. Only the first Satire against the Jesuits, and the Satire against Virtue, stole into the world in 1679, against the Author's knowledge and consent. The pieces from No. 5. exclusive to No. 15. inclusive, came out in 1681: And from thence to the Remains, in 1683. All, in three thin Volumes 8vo. And the Remains were published in 1684. 8vo. They have since been frequently reprinted all together in one Volume 8vo. And in two Volumes 12mo. in 1722. with the Author's Life; which is chiefly taken from A. Wood.

[H] The esteem his contemporaries had for him, appears by the many copies of Verses they wrote to bewail his immature death. Several of them are prefixed to his Remains, written by Mr Dryden, Thomas Flatman, Nahum Tate, T. Dursley, Tho. Andrews, T. Wood, Robert Gould, and other anonymous Authors. Mr Dryden being the most considerable amongst them, we shall set down what he saith in praise of our Author.

Farewell, too little, and too lately known,
Whom I began to think, and call my own;

OSBORN [FRANCIS], an ingenious English writer in the XVIIth century, was the younger son of Sir John Osborn of Chicksand near Shefford in Bedfordshire, and brother to Sir Peter Osborn of the same place [A]. He was born about the year 1589 (a), and never had the benefit of a free school or university education, but was privately instructed at home [B]. When grown up, he frequented the Court, became a retainer

[A] Brother to Sir Peter Osborn of that place. Our Author's father and grandfather did both enjoy a quiet, happy, and plentiful fortune under Queen Elizabeth (1); having a place in the Remembrancer's office (2). He deduceth his pedigree, both by father and mother, from those Normans that attended William I. in his conquest of England (3); I suppose from William Fitz-Osborne. But, without having recourse to those hungry Norman adventurers, from whom a descent is not the most honorable, it is certain, That the Osborn-family hath been long seated at Chicksand, the present possessor of which is Sir Danvers Osborn Bart. one of the Knights for the county of Bedford.

[B] But was privately instructed at home. He informs us himself of this particular, in the beginning of his Advice to a Son (4). 'Though, says he, I can never pay enough to your grandfather's memory, for

For sure our souls were near ally'd; and thine
Cast in the fame poetic mould with mine.
One common Note on either Lyre did strike,
And knaves and fools we both abhorr'd alike:
To the same goal did both our studies drive,
The last fet out the soonest did arrive.
Thus Nisus (12) fell upon the slippery place, While his young friend perform'd and won the race.
O early ripe! to thy abundant store
What could advancing Age have added more?
It might (what Nature never gives the young)
Have taught the Numbers of thy native tongue.
But Satyr needs not those, and wit will shine
Through the harsh cadence of a rugged line.
A noble error, and but seldom made,
When Poets are by too much force betray'd, Thy generous fruits, though gather'd ere their prime
Still shew'd a quickness; and maturing time
But mellows what we write to the dull sweets of rhime.
Once more, hail and farewell; farewell you young,
But ah too short, Marcellus of our tongue;
Thy brows with ivy, and with laurels bound;
But Fate and gloomy Night encompass thee around.

[I] What further character hath been given of him by others, &c. In the Historical Dictionary, printed at London in 1694, he is styled, 'The darling of the Muses, a pithy, sententious, elegant, and smooth writer.'—And it is said, that 'his Translations exceed the original, and his invention seems matchless. His Satire on the Jesuits is of special note, and he may justly be said to have excelled all the Satirists of the age.'—W. Winstanley says of him, that his Works none can read but with wonder and admiration; so pithy his strains, so sententious his expressions, so elegant his oratory, so swimming his language, so smooth his lines; in Translating out doing the original, and in invention matchless (13).—If any thing appears coarse in his Sentiments or Expression, it was more the Fault of the age than his own: and it must be remembered, that he wrote at the same time with Willmot Earl of Rochester, and Villiers Duke of Buckingham.

to the Penbroke family, and at length, Master of the Horse to the most magnificent William, Earl of Penbroke. Having been puritanically educated, he sided with the Dissaffected upon the breaking out of the civil wars [C], and had some public employments under the Parliament, and under Oliver Cromwell (b). In the latter part of his life, he lived in Oxford, on purpose to have an eye upon his son John, whom he had procured the Parliamentary Visitors to appoint Fellow of All-Souls-college in 1648; And also to print some books of his own composition [D], particularly his Advice to a Son [E], of which a large extract is given in the note [F]. This book being much admired by the young scholars

[C] He sided with the Dissaffected upon the breaking out of the civil wars] But, that he was not violent against the Church and the order of Bishops, is evident from the following passages out of his works. . . . Read the Book of God with reverence, and in things doubtful, take fixation from the Authority of the Church, which cannot be arraigned of a damnable Error, without questioning that truth, which hath proclaim'd her proof against the gates of Hell. This makes me wish that our Samsons in success, who have stript her of her ornaments (riches, powers, and honours, which the antient piety left her to cover her nakedness withal) and given them to vain Expounders of Riddles, may not one day have cause to repent, when they find themselves annoyed, no less than the Eyes of Truth put out by the dust and rubbish the fall of so great and antique a frame is like to make (5) — The vagabond Schismatick is so fiery, as he cannot last long unconsumed, being ready upon the least advantage to melt all into sedition; not sparing to burn the fingers of Government longer than they shower down offices and preferments upon him; wobing for a sanctity here God never yet trusted out of heaven (6). — Since we are not only led by the example, but precepts of the Apostles, to yield obedience to our Governours, This in my apprehension avows it presumption in any, below the owners of a Supream power, to question the Decency, Sanctity, or Legality of what the Church hath heretofore, or may at this present avouch. For though really converted into Idolatry, which is treason against God, as the brazen Serpent was; or into heresie or sedition, which imports no less in relation to his earthly representatives, the Church and Prince (as the Mosaiical purifications &c. were in the days of Christ) yet it cannot warrant the hands of any single person, no not of the multitude in gross, to appear in their abolition, unless by way of petition: But to admit them as trials of their farther patience, till God inclines the heart of some lawful Power, the only place such a zeal can be safely kindled in, without threatening destruction to the whole frame. Men being commonly partial in their own case, else such as stile themselves the best of men would never have exploded the Calling of Bishop (and suffered so many of their persons to want, though approved of in their own hearts, for men no less exemplary in their lives than learning) under no milder an aspect than Antichristian; yet did not at the same time refuse to themselves the Imperious title of the Kingdom of Christ, under which notion the unworthiest amongst them did, only in a less volum, though in the same at a larger extent, exercise the like power over the people of God (if the Nation afford any, a blasphemy to doubt of) as was before held tyranny by them for the Hierarchy to administer within the circuit of a Diocess: not remembering the English Bishops have not only been Champions in the cause of Reformation, but have justified the convenience of their Discipline through the experience of the longest peace and greatest felicity England ever enjoy'd, and with the effusion of the least blood; which these had the fortune or will to be aspersed by (7). — He also speaks, in some places, with due respect of King Charles I. As, for instance, when he commends his excellent style. . . . This [viz. low words or phrases] may easily be declined by those who read for their imitation the incomparable lines of the late King, written in a style as free from affectation as levity (8). And he extols that Prince's Judgment, as greater than that of most of his counsellors (9).

[D] And also to print some books of his own composition. Namely. 1. A seasonable Expoistulation with the Netherlands declaring their Ingratitude to, and the Necessity of their Agreement with, the Commonwealth of England. Oxford 1652. 4to.

in 2 sheets and a half. 2. 'Persuasive to mutual Compliance under the present Government.' In 2 sheets. 3. 'Plea for a free State compared with Monarchy.' in 4 sheets. Oxford 1652. 4to. These two were printed together. 4. 'The private Christian's non ultra; or a Plea for the Layman's interpreting the Scriptures.' Oxford, 1656. 4to. in three sheets and a half. There is no name to it, but it was strongly reported to be our Author's. — 5. A volume, containing, 'The Turkish Policy, or Observations upon the Government of the Turks. A Discourse upon Nicholas Machiavel: Or an impartial Examination of the justness of the Censure, commonly laid upon him. Observations upon the King of Sweden's Descent into Germany. A Discourse upon Pifo and Vindex, who both conspired the death of Nero, though with a contrary success. A Discourse upon the Greatness and Corruption of the Court of Rome. A Discourse upon the Election of Pope Leo the XI. Political occasions of the Defection from the Church of Rome. A Discourse in vindication of Martin Luther.' Oxford, 8vo.

[E] Particularly his Advice to a Son.] This book is divided in two parts: Whereof the First was printed in 1656 8vo and so well received, that within two years after, there were six impressions of it. The second Part came out in 1658. 8vo. but was not so well liked as the first. The ninth Edition of the first part was printed in 1689. 8vo. with the rest of his works; and there was a new edition of them in 1722. in 2 Volumes 12mo.

[F] Of which a large extract is given in the note.] That work is comprised in a pithy sententious style, and chiefly delivered by way of aphorisms. A specimen of his sentiments upon some subjects, will inform the Reader of his good sense, and of his style and manner. — Thus therefore he speaks upon the point of Education, and the several branches of it. — Let not an over-passionate prosecution of Learning draw you from making an honest improvement of your Estate; as such do, who are better read in the greatness of the whole Earth, than that little spot left them by their friends, for their support. A mixed Education suits employment best. Scholars and Citizens, by a too long plodding in the same track, have their Experience seldom dilated beyond the circle of a narrow profession; of which they carry so apparent marks, as bewray in all places, by their Words and Gestures, the ped and company they were brought up in; so that all ways of preferment are stopped against them through others prejudice, or their own natural insufficiency; it being ordinary, in their practice, to mistake a wilful Insolency for a resolute confidence, and Pride for gravity (10).

— If a more profitable employment pull you not too soon from the university, make some inspection into Physick; which will add to your welcome wherever you come; it being usual, especially for Ladies, to yield no less reverence to their Physicians, than their Confessours: Neither doth the refusal of Fees abate your profit proportionably to the advancement it brings to your credit. — Yet I advise you this, under such caution, as not to imagine the diseases you read of, inherent in yourself (11). — He gives the highest encomium to the Mathematics, which he calls, — the Queen of Truth, that imposeth nothing upon her subjects, but what she proves due to belief by infallible demonstration: The only knowledge we can on earth gain, likely to attend us to heaven. As for other human Learning, (adds he) so much of it as is not hewed out of this rock, is nothing but lumber and forms. — Yet though it cannot be denied, that Number and Measure, were all the journey-men God had during his six days labour; my memory reacheth the time, when the generality of people thought her most useful branches Spells, and scholars in the university; and the godly Ministers (as Mr Wood expresses it) pretending, that it instilled into them principles of Atheism [G], the Vice-chancellor was desired to cause it publicly to be burnt. But that proposal taking no effect, an order was made, July 27th, 1658, that no Booksellers, or any other persons, should sell it; which in reality made it sell the better (e). Besides this, and the forementioned books, Mr Osborn published a few others, at London [H]. He died February 11th, 1658 9, aged about seventy, and her professors Limbs of the devil; converting the honour of Oxford, due for her proficiency in this study, to her shame: Not a few of our then foolish Gentry refusing to send their sons thither, lest they should be smutted with the black Art (12).—A few Books well studied, and thoroughly digested, nourish the understanding more, than hundreds but gargled in the mouth, as ordinary students use: And of these choice must be had answerable to the profession you intend: For a Statesman, French authors are best, as most fruitful in Negotiations and Memoirs (13).—Propose not them for patterns, who make all places rattle, where they come, with Latine and Greek; For, the more you seem to have borrowed from books, the poorer you proclaim your natural parts, which only can properly be called yours. Follow not the tedious practice of such as seek Wisdom only in Learning: Not attainable but by experience and natural Parts. Much reading, like a too great repletion, stopping up, through a concourse of diverse, sometimes contrary, opinions, the access of a nearer, newer and quicker invention of your own. And for Quotations, they resemble sugar in wine, marring the natural taste of the liquor, if it be good; if bad, that of itself (14).—The way to Elegancy of style, is to employ your pen upon every errand; and the more trivial and dry it is, the more brains must be allowed for fauce.—When business or complement calls you to write Letters, consider what is fit to be said were the party present, and set down that (15).—The final reckoning I have seen made (especially in their life-time) of excellent Wits bids me advise you, that if you find any delight in writing, to go on: But in hope to please or satisfy others, I would not black the end of a quill: For long experience hath taught me, That Builders always, and Writers for the most part, spend their money and time in the purchase of reproof and censure from envious contemporaries, or self-conceited posterity (16).—The Art of Musick is so unable to refund for the time and cost required to be perfect therein, as I cannot think it worth any serious endeavour (17).—His thoughts upon Dress, Behaviour, and many occurrences of life, are also excellent.—Wear, saith he, your Cloaths neat, exceeding rather than coming short of others of like fortune; a charge born out by Acceptance wherever you come: Therefore spare all other ways rather than prove defective in this. Never buy but with ready money: and be drawn rather to fix where you find things cheap and good, than for friendship or acquaintance, who are apt to take it unkindly, if you will not be cheated. For if you get nothing else by going from one shop to another, you shall gain experience (18).—Such as are betrayed by their easie nature, to be ordinary security for their friends, leave so little to themselves, as their liberty remains ever after arbitrary at the will of others. Experience having recorded many, whom their fathers had left elbow room enough, that by suretiship have expired in a dungeon (19).—He that lends upon publick Faith is security for his own money, and can blame none more than himself, if never paid: common debts, like common lands, lying ever most neglected. Honesty treats with the world upon such vast disadvantage, that a pen is often as useful to defend you as a sword, by making writing the witness of your contracts; for where profit appears, it doth commonly cancel the bands of friendship, religion, and the memory of any thing that can produce no other register than what is verbal (20).—When you speak to any, especially of quality, look them full in the face; other gestures bewraying want of breeding, confidence, or honesty; dejected eyes confessing to moist judgments, guilt or folly. Impudence is no virtue, yet able to beggar them all; being for the most part in good plight, when the rest starve; and capable of carrying her followers up to the highest preferments; found as useful in a Court, as armour in a camp.—Covetousness, like a candle ill made, smothers the splendor of an happy fortune in its own greafe (21).—Keep no more Servants (21) P. 17. than you have full employment for; and if you find a good one, look upon him under no severer aspect than that of an humble friend: the difference between such an one and his after residing rather in fortune than nature (22).—Drink not being (22) P. 18. hot, unless Sack &c. such drougts residing rather in the palate and throat than stomach, and so safer quenched by gargles, liquorish, a cherry, or tobacco, (23). &c.—His general Observations upon Travel (23) P. 19. will conclude this note. Some, (says he) to starch a more serious face upon wanton, impertinent, and dear-bought vanity, cry up Travel, as the best accomplisher of youth and gentry, though detected by experience in the generality, for the greatest Debaucher; adding affectation to folly, and Atheism to the curiosity of many not well principled by Education: Such wanderers imitating those factors of Solomon, that, together with gold, returned apes and peacocks. They, and only they, advantage themselves by Travel, who, well fraught with the experience of what their own country affords, carry over with them large and thriving talents, as those servants did commended by our Saviour: For he that hath nothing to venture, but poor, despicable, and solitary parts, may be so far from improvement, as he hazards quite to lose and bury them in the external Levity of France, Pride of Spain, and Treachery of Italy, &c. (24). (24) P. 44.

[G] Pretending that it instilled into them principles of Atheism] There doth not appear, in this work, any sufficient ground for fixing so odious an imputation upon the author. On the contrary, he expresses therein a proper abhorrence for all tendency to Atheism.—I hold, says he, in charity no less than commerce with all sorts of people, that do acknowledge a divine and universal Providence: But abominate those that have the impudence, no less than the indiscretion, to deny it, openly in their words, or tacitly in their actions; as such cannot but be thought to do, that deny others under a pretence of Sanctity, merely to enrich themselves; who deny God no less in his justice than the other in his power. Since, without a Creator, man must be the product of a contingency, together with all things extant, if not the maker of himself; or, which is as prodigious an absurdity, Nothing, out of its own strength, must have produced all things.—And if men cannot, by a serious reflection upon their own affairs, distinguish the operations of Providence from those of Contingency; yet since it is the most universal opinion, and, for ought ever I could hear objected to the contrary, the least obstructed from reason or consent, That every creature holds its production, no less than preservation, at the will of an Omnipotency, by us styled God; Though the way how he operates be beyond our fathom, and past finding out, why should not credulity rest at the brink of this abyss (by all acknowledged the less dangerous,) rather than hazard all hope of future beatitude, in the uncomfortable gulf of a wretchedness of Atheism (25).—But some free expressions used by him, as winning for sanctity, mentioned in note [C] and many observations he makes, under the articles Government and Religion, too long to be inserted here, were more than enough to provoke some galled persons to cry out upon him as an Atheist. What is most exceptionable, is under section 2d. of Love and Marriage, wherein many coarse and unhandsome reflexions are made upon the fair sex.

[H] Mr Osborn published a few other Books at London] Namely, 1. Some Traditionall Memorials on the reign of Queene Elizabeth; and Traditionall Memoyres on the raigne of King James. The common title to both of which is, Historical Memoyres on the reigns of Queen Elizabeth and King James. London 1658, 8vo. These Memoirs contain several anecdotes; and also bitter and severe reflexions, reflexions, particularly upon King James, and his Ministers, especially upon Robert Cecil Earl of Salisbury. Therefore they ought to be rank'd with Sir Antony Weldon's Court and Character of King James, and the French Chronicle, named La Chronique Scandaleuse. They are not also without mistakes, one of which I shall point out (26); 'Tis where he says, That after the discovery of the Powder-plot, the King of Spain ' Sent an Agent on purpose to congratulate King James ' his great preservation; a flattery so palpable, as the ' the Pope could not refrain laughing in the face of ' Cardinal D'offat when he first told it him. Nor he ' forbear to informe his King of it, as may be found ' in his printed Letters.' But Cardinal D'offat died in 1604. and consequently before the discovery of the Powder-plot. II. The other book published by Mr Osborn, was, ' A Miscellany of Sundry Essays, Paradoxes, and problematicall Discourses, Letters and Characters; Together with politieall Deductions ' from the History of the Earl of Essex, executed under ' Queen Elizabeth.' London 1659. 8vo. Some ascribed also to him, A Dialogue of Polygamy, translated from Italian: A modest plea for an equal Commonwealth against Monarchy, &c. An Apology for younger Brothers, and A list at Tythes &c. 1657, 1659 (27). But it is not certain they were his.

OVERBURY [Sir THOMAS], A polite writer in the XVIIth century, was descended of an ancient family (a), born in the year 1581 (b), among his mother's relations at Compton Scovfen (c), in the county of Warwick, where he likewise had his school learning. At the age of fourteen, he was removed to Oxford, being entered a gentleman-commoner of Queen's college in that university, in Michaelmas term, 1595. Here he applied with a diligence rarely seen in young persons of that station, to the academical studies, and having acquired a competent stock of Logic and Philosophy (d), the degree of Bachelor of Arts was conferred upon him November 15, 1598 (e) [A]. He continued at the university 'till he had completed his degree, by determining the next Lent, and then went to the Middle-Temple, where he had been admitted a student some time before (f), his father designing to breed him to the Law, which was his own profession (g). But his genius leading him more to polite literature [B], the splendor and elegance of a Court presently engaged his whole attention, and it was not long before he resolved to push his fortune in it. Accordingly, about the time of the coronation of King James the First in 1604, he commenced an acquaintance with the famous Robert Carr (h), afterwards Earl of Somers; and that gentleman finding Mr Overbury's accomplishments very serviceable to his ambitious views [C], entered into the most intimate connexion with him;

[A] He commenced Bachelor of Arts. This was a year sooner than the usual time for granting that degree. Mr Wood insinuates, that this favour was granted him partly on account of his being an Esquire's son (1). It must be remembered, that the present statutes of Archbishop Laud, which require four years ordinarily for that degree, without any privilege to the sons of Esquires, were not then in being.

(1) His words are, 'He, as a Squire's son, took the degree of A. B. &c.' Ath. Oxon. Vol. 1. col. 387.

[B] His genius lay to polite literature. His genius for poetry is seen in his pieces of that kind, and how little inclined he was to be a drudge in any profession, may be collected from the following specimen, where he gives the character of a mere scholar: who, says he, 'is an unintelligible ass, or a silly fellow in black, that speaks sentences more familiarly than sense. The antiquity of his university is his creed, and the excellency of his college, though but for a match at foot-ball, an article of his faith. He speaks Latin better than his mother tongue, and is a stranger in no part of the world but his own country. He does usually tell great stories of himself to small purpose, for they are commonly ridiculous be they true or false: his ambition is, that he either is, or shall be, a Graduate; but if ever he get a Fellowship, he has then no fellow; in spite of all logie he dares swear and maintain it, that a cuckold and a townsmen are Termines convertibiles, though his mother's husband be an Alderman. He was never begotten, it seems, without much wrangling, for his whole life is spent in pro & contra: his tongue goes always before his wit, like a Gentleman-Usher, but somewhat faster. That he is a complete gentleman in all points cap-à-pé, witness his horfemanship, and the wearing of his weapons. He is commonly long-winded, able to speak more with ease, than any man can endure to hear with patience: university jests are his universal discourse, and his news the demeanors of the Proctors: his phrase, the apparel of his mind, is made of divers threads, like a cushion, and when he goes plainest, it has a patch'd out-side, and suttian linings. The current of his speech is closed with an ergo, and whatever be the question, the truth is on his side. 'Tis a wrong to his reputation to be ignorant of any thing, and yet he knows not that he knows nothing. He gives directions for husbandry from Virgil's Georgies, for cattle, from his Bucolics; for warlike stratagems from his Æneid, or from Cæsar's Commentaries. He orders all things, and succeeds in none; skilful in all trades, and thrives in none. He is led more by his ears than his understanding, and therefore does most confidently believe, that Erra Pater was the father of heretiques, Rodolphus Agricola a substantial farmer: and will not stick to averr, that Sylvestro's logic does excell Keckerman's. His ill luck is not so much in being a fool, as in being put to so much pains to express it to the world; for what in others is natural, in him, with much ado, is artificial. His poverty is his happiness, for it makes some men believe he is no one of fortune's favourites. That learning he has, was in his non-age put in backward like a glyster, and it's now like ware mislaid in a pedlar's pack, he has it, but knows not where it is. In a word, he is the index of a man, and the title-page of a scholar, or a Puritan in morality, much in profession, nothing in practice (2).

[C] Serviceable to his ambition. Every one knows from what a low station Carr was raised, and that his ignorance in literature was one motive for King James's taking him into his favour; who proposed not only to teach him Latin, but to make him as able a Statesman as the best of his ministers. It is no wonder then, he was glad to cultivate a familiarity with our author, whose parts and learning could not but be of great use to him; but we need not here build upon probability only, for we have Sir Thomas himself asserting this in the strongest terms, in a letter written in the Tower, where our author, having mentioned several instances of this friend's ill-usage of him at that time, goes on thus: 'And all this ill nature shewed by the man that had convey'd all my service to Julius, and made himself valued by his master for it; nay, knoweth, that what he speaks and writes hourly, is mine; and yet forget him that fedded that in him, and upon whose stock he spends; nay, forget him between whom was nine years love, and such secrets of all kinds have passed. . . . He afterwards writes, that he had all that vacation, written the story between them from the first hour to this day; what I found you, says he, at first; what I found you when I came; how him; and growing in a few years into high favour with his Majesty, he made use of it in 1608, to obtain the honour of knighthood for his friend: whose father he likewise procured at the same time to be appointed one of the Judges for Wales (i). The year following, Sir Thomas made the short tour through Holland, Flanders, and France, and wrote his observations upon those travels the same year [D]. In 1612, he first assisted his friend, then become Lord Viscount Rochester, in his amour with the Countess of Essex [E]. But being afterwards displeas'd with his Lordship's design of bringing about a marriage with her, he took the same liberty of opening his mind upon this, as he had always done upon other subjects; declaring, with all the warmth that was natural to his temper, against a match, which he apprehended would unavoidably prove the ruin of his interest in the Viscount [F]. This courtier made no scruple of sacrificing his friend to his love;

[D] A tour through Holland and France ] We have already given an instance of our author's humour, and he has furnished us with a specimen of his penetration and judgment, in these observations. With regard to the Dutch, he first gives an account of their revolt from the Spanish government, and then describing the form of their new government, he shews whence arises their revenue, expences, strength, shipping, trade, discipline, army; and, lastly, gives the following character of the nation. They still retain the signs of a Commonwealth yet uncorrupted, private property, and commonweal. For no one man there is exceeding rich, and few very poor, and no state more sumptuous in the public buildings. Whether this, being a free state, will subsist in peace as well as it hitherto hath done in war, peace leaving every one to attend his particular wealth. For while the war lasts, it makes them concur for their common safety: and besides, 'tis a doubt whether the same care and sincerity would continue, if they were at their consistence, as appears yet whilst they are but in raising. How prophetically this remark is made, experience has since abundantly evinc'd. After this, the reader will no doubt desire to see his account of the temper and manners of this people, which, he says, are neither much devout, nor much wicked, given all to drink, and eminently to no other vice; hard in bargaining, but just; furly and respectless as in all Democracies; thrifty, industrious, and cleanly, dishearten'd upon the least ill success; insolent upon good; cunning in traffic; and generally, for matter of action, that natural slowness of theirs, as it is better by reason of it's advisedness and perseverance, it brings along with it, than the rashness and changeableness of the French and Florentine wits, and the equality of spirits which is among them and the Switzers renders them fit for Democracy, which kind of government nations of more sprightly wits being once come to a consistent greatness, have seldom long endured. His remarks on the French are not less curious, whose children, he observes, at first sight seem men, and their men children; but who, in dealing with them, presumes upon appearances, will be deceived: compassionate towards their own nation and country, loving to the Prince, and so they may have liberty in ceremony and free access to him, they will be the better content that he shall be absolute in matter of substance. Impatient in peace any longer than whilst they are employed in recovering the ruins of war, the presentness of danger inflames their courage, but any expectation makes it languish. For the most part they are all imagination but no judgment, but those that prove solid excel. Their gentlemen are all good outward men, good courtiers, good soldiers, and knowing enough in men and business; but merely ignorant in matters of letters, because at fifteen they quit books, and begin to live in the world, when indeed a mediocrity between their form of education and ours, would do better than either. No men stand more upon punctilios of Honour in matters of valour, and, which is strange, in nothing else; for otherwise the custom of shifting and overspeaking in conversation hath quite overcome the shame of it. In speaking of the state of the fourth part of Europe, his observations shews us the very different situation it stood in then, from what it was some years after brought to by Lewis XIV. He tells us, that this part of Europe was divided betwixt Spain, France, and England. Of these Spain was then the most formidable, and the only entire body in Christendom that makes head against the Spanish monarchy in France; and therefore they say in France, that the day of the ruin of France is the eve of the ruin of England. For the weakness of each, Spain is to be kept busied in the Low-Countries, France by the Protestants, and England in Ireland (4).

(4) Observations, &c. upon the State of the United Provinces, as they stood in 1609, 4to.

[E] Assid'd Rochester in his amour.] This is acknowledged by Sir Thomas himself, in the letters already cited (5); where setting forth his own merits, he mentions this among others, 'and then, says he, for the last part, how when you fell in love with that woman, as soon as you had won her by my letters, and after all the difficulties being pass'd, then used your own for common passages.'

(5) Viz. in remark [C].

[F] Ruin his interest with the Viscount, &c.] From the preceding remark it appears, that our author's opposition to this amour proceeded not, as has been generally intimated, from any scruple of Confidence; and we shall shew in this the true cause of it. The first circumstance that shews itself in this dark affair, to exercise the reader's curiosity, is, why the Lady Frances, resolving upon Sir Thomas's destruction, should go to consult with her uncle, the Earl of Northampton, upon it; she must needs be well acquainted with that Earl's ability to procure the favourite's friendship, and that at the same time his ambition was great enough to stick at no means of compassing it: and accordingly we find she was not mistaken. He immediately came into her utmost wishes, and was none of the least active in contriving the particular means, of destroying his competitor by poison. Some letters of this Earl were read at the trial of the Minion concerning his practices with the Lieutenant of the Tower, to keep Overbury close prisoner; in one of which he tells his Lordship, That the Lieutenant had undertaken, that either Overbury should do him good offices with the Lord Suffolk, when he came out, [of the Tower] or else he should never recover, which he thought the most sure and bappy change. Immediately after the death of his rival, he wrote to the Lieutenant of the Tower, as follows:

' Worthy Mr Lieutenant,
' My Lord of Rochester desiring to do the last honour to his deceas'd friend, requires me to desire you to deliver the body of Sir Thomas Overbury to any friend of his that desires it, to do him honour at his funeral. Herein my Lord declares the constancy of his affection to the dead, and the meaning that he had in my knowledge, to have given his strongest strain at this time of the King's being at Tilbury, for his delivery. I fear no impediment to this honourable desire of my Lord's, but the unweetness of the body, because it was reported that he had some issues; and in that case, the keeping him above ground must needs give more offence, than it can do honour. My fear is already that the body is also buried upon that cause whereof I write, which being so, it is too late to set out solemnity. Which, with my kind commendations,

' I end and reite

' Your affectionate,

' And assured friend,

H. Northampton.

' P. S. You see my Lord's earnest desire, with my concurring care, that all respect be had to him that may be for the credit of his memory; but yet I wish withal, that you do very directly inform yourself whether this grace has been afforded to close prisoners, love; and disclosing all to the lady, his idol, it was immediately resolved, that the successful issue of their intrigue, necessarily required the removal of Sir Thomas out of the way: accordingly, after some other fruitless trials to that purpose [G], the method of poisoning was pitched upon, as the least liable either to a miscarriage in the attempt, or to a discovery after the perpetration [H], if they could get him into their power (k). Upon this view, the Minion first obtained for him the offer of an embassy to Russia [I] from his Majesty, and then prevailing upon him to refuse it, easily procured his imprisonment for a contempt of the King's commands, by such refusal in one of his servants [K]. Accordingly,

'soners; or whether you may grant my request in this case, who speake out of the sense of my Lord's affection, tho' I be a counsellor without offence or prejudice. For I would be lothe to draw either you or myself into any censure. I have well thought of the matter, though it be a work of charity.'

This is cool malice; we shall see the next hot enough, and be convinced at the same time there was reason enough for any degree of heat whatever. It is in the following terms.

'Worthy Mr Lieutenant,
'Let me intreat you to call Mr Lidcote and three or four of his friends, if so many come to view the body, if they have not already done it; and so soon as it is viewed, without staying the coming of a messenger from the Court, in any case, see it interred in the body of the chapel within the Tower instantly; if they have viewed it, then bury it by and by, for it is time, considering the humours of that damned crew, that only desire means to move pity and raise scandals. Let no man's instance move you to make stay in any case; and bring me these letters when I next see you. Fail not a jot herein, as you love your friend; nor after Lidcote and his friends have viewed, stay one minute, but let the Priest be ready, and if Lidcote is not there, send for him speedily, pretending that the body will not tarry. In poste haste, after 12.

'Your's, &c. (6)'

We see here, how greatly he interested himself in the disposal of Overbury, and the safety of the Minion; and all Historians agree, that he supplid Overbury's place in the friendship of that Minion.

[G] After some fruitless trials to that purpose. Among other projects, the Countess tried to put one Sir David Wood upon assassinating him, with a promise of 1000*l*. That gentleman, it seems, having obtained the grant of a suit to the King worth 2200*l*. was opposed by Rochester and Overbury, so that he could receive no benefit from it, unless he gave the first 1200*l*. But he had determined to cane Sir Thomas, who, he said, had refused to fight him (7).

[H] Poison the safest Sir Francis Bacon, then Attorney-General, upon opening the evidence, shewed, that what rendered this crime of poisoning so detestable, was, that a man was taken off in full peace, thinking no harm, and while a man was comforting and refreshing nature with his food; and it was the more to be dreaded, because it was so easily committed, and hard to be prevented or discovered. Other murders, continues he, are committed cum sonitu, some acts that might discover or trace the offenders: but this comes upon a man while he is careless and without suspicion, and every day he is in the gates of death. Nor does it only concern the man against whom the malice is intended, but it was often proposed for one and taken by another, as in the example of 21 H. VIII. where the purpose was to poison one man, and being put into the broth, sixteen of the Bishop of Rochester's servants were poisoned; and it went into the almshouses, and the poor at the gate were poisoned (8); which occasioned a statute that year, that made poisoning high-treason: for it tended to dissolve human society, and whatever offence did so, was in the nature thereof high treason. He observes, that Sir Thomas was the first man that had been murdered in the Tower, except the two young Princes, by Richard III. concluding, that murder non est nostris generis nec sanguinis (9).

[I] To Russia. We have a letter in Winwood's Memoirs, which gives us some light into the intention and design of the embassy into that country. After speaking of our author's commitment to the Tower, the writer takes notice of a report that Sir Thomas was engaged to go to Muscovy, which drew him to a peremptory and unmannerly refusal. 'Indeed (continues the writer) we have great doings in hand and strange projects for that place, which I doubt, will all prove discourses in the air, for they be grounded upon certain speeches of some of the oobility to an English merchant about two years since; but tempora mutantur, and the scene is much altered there since that time. Yet the King apprehends the business very earnestly, and hath caused Sir Henry Neville to confer with some of the Council about it divers times, wherein they say he hath shewed great sufficiency, and discoursed at large what commodity might arise by bringing the whole trade of Russia, and the inland parts of the East-Indies up the river Hydaspes, and so with a short cut down the river Oxis into the Caspian sea, and then up the river Volga, to a freight of land that will carry all into the river Dwina, that runs down to St Nicolas and the town of Archangel, the ordinary port and station of our shipping in those parts. These are goodly specious discourses, of things not so easily done as spoken. For my part, I can never believe that people will put themselves so under the King's protection, as to be governed by a Deputy, and we can afford them no other; and if the matter should come to any pass, what a business and charge would it be to transport thither 12 or 15,000 men (which are the numbers spoken of) you may judge (10)'

[K] Prevailed upon him to refuse it, &c. We have a large account of what was thought of this commitment at first, in the following letter of Sir Henry Wotton to Sir Edmond Bacon, dated Thursday, St George's eve, who writes, 'The Court was full of discourse and expectation, that the King being now disencumbered of the care of his daughter, would reward this feast of St George, fill up either all, or some at least of those places that had lain vacant so long, and had been at this time of their emptyness, a subject of notorious opposition between our great Viscount and the house of Suffolk. Thus, I say, run the opinion, when yesterday, at six o'clock at evening, Sir Thomas Overbury was from the Council-Chamber conveyed by a Clerk of the Council and two of the guards to the Tower, and there, by warrant, consigned to the Lieutenant as close prisoner; which, both by the suddenness, like a stroke of thunder, and more, by the quality and relation of the person, breeding in the beholders (whereof, by chance, I was one) very much amazement, and being likely, in some proportion, to breed the like in the hearers, I will adventure, for the satisfying of your thoughts about it, to set down the forerunning and leading causes of this accident, as far as in so short a time I have been able to wade in so deep a water. It is conceived, that the King had a good while been much distast with the said gentleman, even in his own nature, for too stiff a carriage of his fortunes, besides that scandalous offence of the Queen at Greenwich, which was never but a palliated cure. Upon which consideration, his Majesty resolving to sever him from my Lord of Rochester, and to do it, not disgracefully nor violently, but in some honourable fashion, he commanded not long since, the Archbishop, by way of familiar discourse, to propound unto him the ambassage of France, or of the Arch-Duke's Court, whereof the one was soon to be changed, and the other at the present vacant. In which proposition, it seemeth, though shadowed under the Archbishop's good-will, that the King was also contented, some little lights should be given unto him of his Majesty's inclination unto it, grounded upon his merit. At this the fish did not bite: whereupon the King took a rounder way, commanding my Lord Chancellor and the Earl of Pembroke, to propound the same dingly, he was sent to the Tower April 21, 1613 (L), and all engines were set to work to compass the villainous design. After some time his father came to town, and petitioned the King for his discharge. He likewise applied to the Viscount [L], to whom several pressing letters were also wrote by Sir Thomas himself on this occasion [M], but all to no purpose.

unto him, (which the Archbishop had before moved) as immediately from the King; and to sweeten him the more, he had, as I hear, an offer made him of assurance before his going, of the place of Treasurer of the Chamber; which he expected after the death of Lord Stanhope, whom, be-like, the King would have drawn to some reasonable composition. Notwithstanding all which notices and impulsives, Sir T. Overbury refused to be sent abroad, with such terms, as were by the Council interpreted pregnant of contempt, in a case where the King had opened his will; which refusal of his, I should, for my part, esteem an eternal disgrace to our occupation, if withal, I did not consider how hard it is, to pull one from the bosom of a favourite. Thus you see the point upon which one hath been convicted, standing in the second degree of power in the Court, and conceiving (as himself told me but two hours before) never better than at present of his own fortune and ends. Now, in this whole matter, there is one main and principal doubt, whether this were done without the participation of my Lord of Rochester: a point necessarily infolding two different consequences; for were it done without his knowledge, we must expect of himself either a decadence or a ruin; if not, we must then expect a reparation by some other great publick satisfaction, whereof the world may take much notice. These clouds a few days will clear. In the mean time, I dare pronounce of Sir Thomas Overbury, that he shall return no more to his stage, unless Courts be governed every year by a new Philosophy, for our old principles will not bear it (11).<sup>1</sup>

Another letter was wrote the same day to Mr R. Winwood, then on an embassy in Holland, by Mr Parker, in these terms. 'Yesterday at six of the clock, my Lord Chancellor and my Lord Pembroke were employed by the King to speak to Sir Thomas Overbury, and to make him an offer of an ambassage to the Low-Countries, whereto he made answer, that he was not capable of such employment for want of language, nor able to undergo it, by reason of his weakness, being so exceedingly troubled with the spleen, that if he had a long letter to write, he was fain to give over. Therefore he should not be fit to attend any business, as, in accepting this offer, he should be forced to do. And whereas it was alledged, that his Majesty intended this for his good and preferment, he would not leave his country for any preferment in the world. Some say he added some other speech which was very ill taken; but what it should be I cannot learn. But not to trouble your Lordship with length, the report being made to the King, he sent my Lord of Pembroke for the Lords who were in Council, (my Lord Chancellor staying still with his Majesty) to whom he declared when they were come, that he could not obtain so much of a gentleman, and one of his servants, as to accept an honourable employment from him. In conclusion, he gave them orders to send for him, and to send him where he is close prisoner. Now, for my Lord of Rochester, he knew nothing 'till all was done, and he gone; which your Lordship may imagine did much perplex him (12).'<sup>2</sup>

In another letter to the same Sir Ralph Winwood, dated Aug. 6th 1613, the Earl of Southampton writes thus. 'I perceive by your last letter, that you have of late been particularly adverted of the proceedings in England, and how the business of which we desire so much to see the conclusion, is still in suspense. The difficulty alledged, is the not having as then accommodated the matter of Sir Thomas Overbury, which many times bred disturbance and hindered the performance of the resolution taken. And it is in vain to hope for any good issue of the other, until that be settled; which I think to be done long ere this, after this manner: that upon his submission, he shall have leave to travel with a private intimation not to return until his Majesty's pleasure be farther known. And much ado there hath been, to keep him from a publick censure of banishment and loss of office, such a rooted hatred lieth in the King's heart towards him (13).'<sup>3</sup> while the person chiefly concern'd was kept close prisoner, and no body suffered to see him but such as were under the direction of his persecutors. But it appeared afterwards, that after Sir Thomas had dissuaded his friend from pursuing his intrigue with Lady Essex, his Lordship coming late to his chamber in the gallery at Whitehall, met Sir Thomas, and said to him, How now! are you up yet? Nay, answered Sir Thomas, what do you here at this time of night? will you never leave the company of that base woman? and seeing you so neglect my advice, I desire, that to morrow we may part, and that you will let me have that portion which you know is due to me, and then I will leave you free to yourself, to stand on your own legs. My Lord Somerset answered, his legs were straight and strong enough to bear himself, and went away in anger. The words I will leave you free to stand on your own legs (14), allude to the great assistance Sir Thomas gave that Earl, who communicated to him the greatest matters; several packets that were sent to the King, were given by my Lord sealed to Sir Thomas, who broke them open, took short notes of them, and then sealed them up and returned them to my Lord Somerset again. It also appeared, that Sir Thomas once told Sir Dudley Digges, that he would undertake the employment beyond sea; and then sent him word by Sir Robert Mansel, that he had changed his mind, and that this last mentioned Gentleman told Sir Dudley, he saw a letter from the Lord Somerset to dissuade him from it. That presently after his commitment, Sir Gervase Ellis was preferred to the Lieutenancy of the Tower, by the Lord Somerset's means, May 6th, 1613; and Weston appointed to be his keeper, by the recommendation of Sir Thomas Monson, who did it through the intreaty of the Lady Essex (15).

So little was the truth of this matter known at first,

[L] His father petitioned the King and Viscount. After his son was committed, he came to town with his wife, and hearing that their son was sick, he first petitioned that some Physician might be allowed to attend him; and the King answering his own Physician should go, he addressed himself to Lord Somerset, then Rochester, and none else, who told him his son should speedily be delivered, but dissuaded him from preferring any more petitions to the King. However, his freedom being delayed, continues he, I preferred another; and the King said, I should have a present answer, and my Lord Somerset told me he should suddenly be relieved; but that neither my wife nor I should press to see him, because it might protract his delivery; nor deliver any more petitions to the King, because that might stir up his enemies against him. In a letter to Mr Overbury afterwards, his Lordship writes thus: 'Your stay in town can nothing avail your son's delivery, therefore, I would advise you to retire into the country, and doubt not, before your coming home, you shall hear he is a free man (16).'<sup>4</sup>

[M] He wrote several letters to the Earl of Somerset. Notwithstanding what had passed betwixt the Viscount and Sir Thomas above related (17), yet when Sir Dudley Digges was sent by a Privy-Counsellor to Sir Thomas Overbury, to bring him to that great man's levy, and coming back together by water, Sir Thomas appeared discontented, and said he was persuaded by the great man to withdraw himself from Court, for some reasons which he did not disclose. And that afterwards, Sir Dudley being sent by his Lordship, to know the resolution of Sir Thomas concerning the Earl of Suffolk, he found that he relied on the Lord Somerset; saying, My precious Chief knows the King's mind better than any, and I the mind of my precious Chief. Sir Thomas had no suspicion at first, that his imprisonment was his friend's contrivance. Upon talking to the Lieutenant of the Tower, protesting his innocence, he asked what they intended to do with him? to which the other answered, that they intended to refine him, that his purity might appear the better; and having advised him to give way to the match between Rochester and the Countess, he grew hot against Lord Northampton, and the Countess of Suffolk; saying, if he were the Countess of Suffolk's prisoner, as he thought he was, that Lieutenant purpose. That pretended friend kept him close confined by his own power, contrary to the

Lieutenant might let her know, that he cared as little to die, as she to be cruel. But it was not long before he discovered the true author, by reason of the delay of his promise to release him. This appears from the first letter of Sir Thomas to him, where he writes thus: 'Is this the fruit of my care and love to you? be those the sweets of common secrets, common danger? As a man, you cannot suffer me to lie in this prison, yet your behaviour betrays you. All I intreat of you, is, that you will free me from this place, and that we may part friends. Drive me not to extremities, least I should say something that you and I both repent, and I pray God you may not repent the omission of this my counsel in this place where I now write this letter.' And Somerset was so much afraid of the consequence of this threat, that he charged the Lieutenant to look to Overbury well, for if ever he came out, it would be his ruin, or one of the two must die. In another letter to Rochester, Sir Thomas declared, that he would do his endeavour of being a means of friendship between Rochester and some others, but as for his marriage with the Countess, he would never give his consent. And not long before his last clyster, he expresses himself with great warmth at that match. 'This, says he, comes under seal, and therefore shall be bold: you told my brother Lidcote, that un-reverend style might make you neglect me, you bid him keep my desire of liberty secret, while in the mean time you sacrifice me to your woman, still holding friendship with those that brought me hither. And all this to one who lost his fortune with Ignati, entered a quarrel with Niger, suffered five months banishment, and now fine me with miserable imprisonment; and now, to make a pretence to say you were altered towards me for the style of my letters. Alas! this shift will not serve to cover your vow; your sacrificing me to your woman; your holding a sim friendship with those that brought me hither, and keep me here, and not make it your first act of any good terms with them to set me free, and restore me to yourself again. And you bid my brother keep your intent secret, that you might steal away with your wickedness: but that shall not be, you and I will come to a public trial before all the friends I have. They shall know what words have passed betwixt us heretofore, of another nature than these, and I pray you keep my letters, that they may see how much I forgett your Lordship in my style. I shall be upon the rack, you at your ease, negligent of me, and I must speak calmly, yf Hector of the Harlow be so infamous for betraying a stranger, your storie shall be put down to betray, and so quit a friend. But now I will confess you, so soon as I perceived how little (never name love) humane affection, how little compassion, (no, not so much as the colt in Enfield-Chace) when I heard, how, notwithstanding my miserie, you visited your woman, frizled your head never more curiously, took care of your hangings, and daily were sollicitous about your cloaths, officious in waighting, could preserve your couzen and Gibbie; held day traffique of letters with my enemies without any turning it to my good, sent me nineteen projects and promises for my liberty, then at the beginning of the next week sent me some frivolous account of the miscarriage of them, and so slip out of town: and all this ill nature by the man whose conscience tells him, that trulking to him brought me hither, and by him that conveyed all my service to Julius, and made himself valued by his master for it; and my share to be a prison, upon such terms that never man suffered yet. . . . And in the noyance my father and mother languishing for me, my soul wisheth she might but lie upon the boards, to bear me company, my brother Lidcote thrown by it, his aunt discharging him from her house, which saved him 300 l. a year, and he that is the author of all, and that hath more cause to love, yea perish for me, rather than see me perish; to stand stupid, and not leese a jot of any thing that concerns himself, go on and make much of one; nay, let mine enemies play upon me, send for tickets under my hand, so that, by God, since I came in, I have not found the advantage of a strawe, no, not so much as a servant in my extrem sicknes, nor my friends free to speake my last wordes to. When I had observed this, the bitterness of my soul cannot conceal itself in letters; and that his wickedness may never die, I have all this va-

lation, wrote the story betwixt you and me from the first hower to this day: what I found you at first; what I found you when I came; how many hazards I have runn for you; how many gentlemen, for giving themselves to you a stranger, are now left to the oppression of their enemies; what secrets have passed betwixt you and me; and then for the last part, how, after that you had wonne that woman by my letters, that then you concealed all your after-proceedings from me. Upon that cause, there came many breaches at Huntingdon and Newmarket (18), and after at Whitehall. Thereupon you made your vow that I should live in the Court, was my friend, and many oaths which are now fulfilled; stayed me here, when I should have been gone, and sent for me twice that day that I was caught in the trap; persuading me it was a trap of my enemies to send me beyond sea, and urging me not to accept it, assuring me you would free me from any long trouble. And long intending in your thoughts long ago a marriage with that woman, denied since me to enquire of her; would speak ill of her yourself; and having been now two months reconciled to a league, not to have first, upon those of theirs, made sure my liberty and return; and now at last, when we may easily live the rest of our life in peace, and enjoy the remembrance of our troubles, now you leave me out, and take occasion upon unrespective language to say you will never be to me as you have been. All these particulars I have sett down in a large discourse, on Tuesday I made an end of wrighting it fair, and on Friday I have sealed it up under eight seals; and if you persist still to use me thus, assure yourself it shall be published, so that whether I live or die, your shame shall never die, nor leave to be the most odious man alive (19).'

As to the secrets that past between them, besides those before produced in remark [K], another letter wrote by a favourer of Sir Thomas shews, that as Somerset executed the office of Secretary, he communicated all the foreign dispatches, not by glympses, and now and then a reading in the ear, but in a settled manner, sometimes opened, other times unbroken, to Overbury, who perused them, copied them, registered them, nay, as he continues, made table talk of them as he thought good: so time was, when Overbury knew more of the secrets of the State than the Council-Board did; nay, they were grown to such inwardness, that they made a play of all the world besides themselves, so as they had cyphers and jargon for the King and Queen, and great men of the realm (20). We have the following account of the temper and morals of Sir Thomas Overbury from Sir Francis Bacon (21), who shews, that about a year before Overbury's imprisonment, the Earl fell into an unlawful love with the Countess of Essex, and purposed to marry her; which Overbury with all his might impugned under pretence of friendship, calling her an ill woman. But that in truth Overbury had little of solid religion or virtue, but wholly possessed with ambition and vain glory, was loth to have a Partner in my Lord of Somerset's favour, especially one of the house to whom he had always professed an aversion; and that Overbury had been so far from making a scruple of conscience of the matter, that there was a time when he boasted he had won him this Lady's love by his letters and industry. That however the tragical end of this poor gentleman might obliterate his faults, yet it was material to the true understanding this course [his murder] to know, that he was naught and corrupt. For when Overbury found himself possessed of this Lord's favour, by whose greatness he had promised himself to do wonders, and being a man of an unbanded and impudent spirit, he began not only to dissuade, but to deter him from the love of that Lady; and supposing he had my Lord's head under his girdle, in respect of communication of secrets of State, he dealt violently with him to make him desist, by menaces of a discovery; and from hence there flowed two streams of hatred against Overbury, one from the Lady who was crossed in her love and exposed in her reputation, and the other from Somerset, who was afraid of Overbury's nature, who, if he did fly out, might trouble his whole fortunes; to which might be added a third stream, proceeding from the Earl of Northampton's ambition, who desiring to be first in favour with Somerset, and knowing Overbury's malice

the common rule in such cases [N]; 'till, after many disappointments in all other ways, of conveying the poison in his victuals, the design was completed by a clyster given to him September 14, under a pretence of removing those complaints, which, unknown to him, were occasioned by the former less dead-doing means [O]. Being of a strong constitution, he struggled many hours in the agonies of death [P], which, however, at length put an end to his extreme torture about five o'clock the next morning; his corps being exceedingly noisome, was interred about three or four o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, in the chapel of the Tower. Immediately after his death, some suspicion of the true cause of it was rumoured about; but the opinion that he died of the venereal disease so far prevailed, through the industry and high station of the contrivers, as to give a confidence of safety to their under-agents [Q]: so that, when the discovery was made by an unexpected accident two years afterwards [R], they were all easily apprehended, tried, and executed [S]. The favourite also, now become Earl of Somerset, as well as his Countess to himself and his house, thought it necessary that that man should be removed and cut off, so as certainly it was resolved and decreed that Overbury must die.

[N] Kept him confined by his own power.] In the trial of the Earl of Somerset, several depositions were read, shewing that Sir Thomas was kept close prisoner by warrant of the Earl, though he was convicted only for a contempt, which was contrary to the rules in such a case. Somerset also, to conceal the design of poisoning him, assigned for the cause of his keeping him close prisoner, the danger himself should be in from a discovery, which it lay in Sir Thomas's power to make against him, with regard to several secret and unjustifiable methods he had made use of in the management of the King's affairs, which had been communicated to Sir Thomas; and whilst Sir Thomas was in the Tower, the Earl charged the Lieutenant to look to Overbury well, for if ever he came out, one of them two must die (22).

(22) See Somerset's Trial.

[O] The former ineffectual attempts.] The first poison was of a green and yellow colour, called rosagar, which was put into his broth, particularly on the ninth of May; this proving ineffectual, another poison called white arsenic was given him on the first of July; and on the nineteenth another called mercury sublimate, which was put into his tarts and jellies. The poisons were prepared by Franklin an Apothecary, who at the Countess of Essex's request, bought seven sorts which were given to Sir Thomas at several times. He was desired by Mrs Turner to provide a poison that would not kill a man presently, but lie in his body a certain time, wherewith he might languish by little and little, and she gave him four angells, with which he bought aquafortis, she tried it upon a cat which languished and cried pitifully for two days, and then died. Thus she said afterwards aquafortis was too strong, and upon his saying arsenic was too violent too, she proposed powder of diamonds, and gave him money to buy some (23).

(23) Confession of James Franklin, in his own trial, and that of Sir Gervas Elway.

[P] Strong constitution, he struggled many hours under the agonies of death.] Besides the poison already mentioned. The Viscount, June 5, wrote him a letter in which he sent him a little powder, desiring him to take it, it will make you more sick, says he, but fear not I will make this a means for your delivery and for the recovery of your health. This powder gave him 60 vomits besides several stools. That the Countess then sending to him for more poison, he besought her on his knees not to use him any more in this matter. In short, Sir Thomas hardly ever eat any thing, but there was poison mixt with it. Notwithstanding of this he suffered so little, that Sir Gervas Ellis in answer to a letter of the Countess expressing her surprize, that the jobb was not yet done, writes, 'Madam, the scab is is like the Fox, the more he is cursed, the better he fareth.' How strong the poison was, may be collected from the answer made to the Judge by Simon Mafon, who had carried a poisoned tart to Overbury. Simon, says the Judge, Thou hadst a hand in this poisoning business. No my good Lord, cried he, I had got but one finger in it, which cost me all my hairs and nails (24). After the first glyster was given him, he never ceased vomiting and purging 'till he expired. After his death there appeared twelve kernels, each as big as a sixpence upon him, and the corps stank intolerably.

[Q] Assurance of safety.] We shall produce one specimen of the industry to conceal the murder, because I don't remember it is set in that light by any of the numerous authors, who write an account of it. We have already presented some passages between the Earl of Somerset and Sir Thomas's father, before the son's death. After it, the Earl writes the following letter to him. 'Sir, your Son's love to me got him the malice of many, and they cast those knots on his fortune that have cost him his life; so in a kind, there is none guilty of his death but I; and you can have no more cause to commiserate the death of a son, than I of a friend: But tho' he be dead, you shall find me as ready as ever I was, to do all the courtesies that possibly I can to you or your wife, for your lost son, tho' I esteem my loss the greater; and for his brother that is in France, I desire he may return, that he may succeed his brother in my love (25).'

(25) True and Historical Relation of the poisoning of Sir Thomas Overbury, &c.

[R] The discovery.] Weldon tells us that Franklin, who administered the poisoned glyster to Overbury, made use, in composing it, of one Reive an Apothecary's boy, who was afterwards sent into Flanders, and partly ran away from his master, this Reive being at Flushing, where some business had brought Sir William Trumbull, his Majesty's Envoy at Brussels, and got concealed with some of the Envoy's servants, and whether unadvisedly, or with design, informed them of what he knew concerning Overbury's death; the servants telling this to their master, he examined Reive, and drawing the secret from him found means to detain him in his house, and then wrote to Winwood, desiring him to get the King's leave for him to come to England, because he had some matters to reveal, which he could not trust to paper. Leave being granted, he acquainted Winwood with what he had learned who told it the King, who commanded them both to keep it private 'till further orders (26). However that be, Sir Francis Bacon informs us, that the murder came out in a compliment, thus: My Lord of Shrewsbury having recommended Sir Gervas Ellis to a certain Counsellor of State, whom Sir Gervas had desired to be made known to, the Counsellor answered, that he took it as a favour from him, but added withal, that there lay a kind of heavy imputation on him about Overbury's death, and he wish'd he would clear himself, and give him some satisfaction in the point. This my Lord of Shrewsbury related to Ellis, who was in some astonishment at it, and made some kind of a discovery. He said that indeed some attempts had been made against Sir Thomas Overbury, but they came to no effect having been checked by him (27). The Counsellor weighing this relation of Ellis, acquainted the King with it, who perferly commanded that Ellis should set down his knowledge of this matter in writing, which he accordingly did, but took care not to insert any thing that might touch himself; then the King referred the matter to certain of the council, who sifted something out of Weldon (28); and the further enquiry into it was referred to my Lord Coke, who in this cause shewed great diligence, and took two or three hundred examinations.

(28) Sir Gervas Ellis had informed of Weston, as approved by his own trial.

[S] They were all apprehended and condemned to death.] These were first Weston, who had been a pander and procurer to the Countess of Essex, and was appointed under-keeper to Sir Gervas Ellis, at the recommendation of Sir Thomas Monson, May 6th, three days only before he administered the poison. 2. Anne Turner, a Physician's widow, who mixt the poison and proposed it to Sir Gervas Ellis. 3. Franklin the Apothecary, who bought and prepared the poison. 4. Sir Gervas Ellis, Lieutenant of the Tower, who knowingly suffered the poison to be administered. The Countess and Earl of Somerset the chief contrivers were condemned, but pardoned by the King; who likewise gave the Earl the greatest part of his estate back forfeited by his attainder (29), but confined him to two houses in Oxfordshire,

(for he had married the lady some time before), were both tried and condemned, though afterwards pardoned by his Majesty the following year, 1616 (m); which, perhaps, is none of the least blemishes of that reign, especially with regard to the Countess, who yet underwent a much more miserable fate in her death, occasioned by a gangrene that ended in a mortification of that part, in which she had almost beyond all example shamelessly offended (n). Our author's character is represented by an historian of those times, who having related the occasion and circumstances of his death, proceeds in the following terms: 'In this manner fell Sir Thomas Overbury, worthy of a longer life and a better fate; and, if I may compare private men with princes, like Germanicus Cæsar, both by poison procured by the malice of a woman, both about the thirty-third year of their age, and both celebrated for their skill and judgment in poetry, their learning, and their wisdom (o). Overbury, continues this writer, was a gentleman of an ancient family, but had some blemishes charged upon his character, either through a too great ambition, or insulence of a haughty temper. Among those of his compositions which are in verse, our author wrote a little poem concerning the choice of a wife, which I suppose was chiefly designed for the service of his lord. It was printed in his life-time, and several times after his death, with many commendatory verses upon the author and the book, of which number was Ben. Jonson [p]. This, with the manner of his death, gave occasion to one of his friends to write the following lines, which I have seen under his picture:

' A man's best fortune or his worst's a wife,
' Yet I who knew nor marriage nor strife,
' Liv'd by a good, by a bad one lost my life.

' After the return from his travels, the Viscount Rochester embraced him with so entire a friendship, that exercising by his Majesty's especial favour the office of Secretary provisionally, he not only communicated to Sir Thomas the secrets, but many times gave to him the packets and letters unopened, before they had been perused by the King himself; which, as it prevailed too much upon his early years, so as to make him in the opinion of some thought high and ambitious; yet he was so far from violating his trust and confidence, that he remains now one example among others that have suffered in their persons or their fortunes, for a freedom of advice, which none but sincere friends will give, and many are such ill friends to themselves as not to receive (p). All the pieces written by him have been lately collected and printed together, under the title of The Works of Sir Thomas Overbury: in prose and verse. Lond. 1753, 8vo. Being never married, he left no issue; so that, after the death of his father, the family estate at Burton on the Hill in Gloucestershire came to our author's younger brother, who, at the time of Sir Thomas's unfortunate exit, happened to be in France (q). This gentleman's son, Sir Thomas Overbury, wrote some pieces, the titles of which may be seen below [U]. After a competency fordshire, not to stir above three miles from them; and in 1624, about four months before his death, granted him a free pardon. Upon the stop that was put to the trial of Sir Thomas Monson, on account of Lord Coke's dropping some suspicious words about the murder of Prince Henry, which he had discovered in the Earl of Somerset's papers, all further proceeding on Overbury's murder were dropped, so that the Earl of Northampton entirely escaped all examination and trial for it. Mr Howell tells us, that Mrs Turner was the inventor of yellow starch, and that she was hanged in a cobweb lawn ruff of that colour at Tyburn. 'And with her I believe, says he, that yellow starch, which so much disfigured our nation, and rendered them so ridiculous and fantastic, will receive its funeral.' The same author informs us, that 'William Lord Pembroke did a most noble act like himself, for the King having given him all Sir Gervis Ellis's estate, which came to above 1000 l. a year, he freely bestowed it upon the widow and her children *.'

[U] Ben Jonson wrote commendatory verses to his Wife.] As these verses exhibit one part, and that the best too, of our author's character, we shall insert it as follows,

To Sir Thomas Overbury.

So Phœbus make me worthy of his bays,
As but to speak thee Overbury's praise!
So where thou liv'st, thou mak'st life understood!
Where what makes others great doth keep thee good!
I think the fate o'th' court thy coming crav'd,
That the wit there and manners might be fav'd.

For since, what ignorance, what pride is fled!
And letters and humanity in the stead!
Repent thee not of thy fair precedent,
Could make such men and such a place repent;
Nor may any fear to lose of their degree,
Who in such ambition can but follow thee (30).

These are rough lines like most of Ben's; the following, on the same occasion by Owen, are every way polite,

Uxorem culto describis carmine talem,
Qualem oratorem Tullius ore potens:
Qualem describis, quamvis tibi nuberet uxor,
Æqualis tali non foret illa viro.

Shirley D. M. in London, 1676, 4to.* This is one of the most remarkable incidents in story. Harrison was not really murdered, but conveyed away alive by a gang of Mohocks and carried to Turkey, where coming into the hands of a physician he acquired some skill in that faculty; and at length, after many years absence, found means of getting away and returned home, to the great astonishment of every body, since the sufferers for his supposed death had actually confessed the murder. OUGHTRED [WILLIAM], one of the ablest Mathematicians of his time, was born about the year 1573 (a), at Eton in the county of Bucks; and being bred a scholar upon the foundation of that school, was elected thence, in 1592, about the age of nineteen, to King's-college in Cambridge; where, after the regular time of probation, he was admitted perpetual Fellow of the Society (b). He did not neglect the opportunity which this education gave him, of improving himself both in Classical Learning and Philosophy; but his genius leading him particularly to the Mathematics, he applied himself chiefly to that study, and beginning at the fountain-head, he read all the ancient authors in the science, as Euclid, Archimedes, Apollonius Pergæus, Diophantus, and the rest; in perusing whose works, he did not content himself with barely learning their propositions, but was diligent in looking into the sagacity of their invention, and careful to comprehend the peculiar force and elegance of their demonstrations. These researches leading him to enquire into the particular means and assistances, by the help of which those ancient worthies first found out, and afterwards enlarged and adorned the science; he proceeded in their steps, and soon enriched it with some farther improvements of his own [A]. Before the statutable time for his taking a degree, he invented an easy method of geometrical dialling, which, though he did not publish 'till the year 1647, yet it was received with so much esteem, that Mr (afterwards Sir Christopher) Wren, then a Gentleman-Commoner of Wadham-college in Oxford, immediately translated it from the English into Latin [B]. In 1599, Mr Oughtred commenced Master of Arts, having proceeded regularly to take his Bachelor's degree three years before. In 1600, he projected an horizontal instrument for delineating dials upon any kind of plane, and for working most questions which could be performed by the globe: it was contrived purely for his own private use, and, though not executed without uncommon pains and subtlety, under some particular disadvantages owing to his situation in the college, yet it was so lightly esteemed by himself, that thirty years afterwards he gave it to be published for the advantage of one of his scholars [C].

However,

[A] He enriched it with some farther improvements of his own. The improvements here understood are those which he made with respect to the science, as distinct from the art. These are taken notice of by himself in the preface to the Clavis, where he gives an account of the method he took in the investigation of his new theorems. We shall give the passage from the third edition of that tract in Latin, because being wrote in a very elegant style, it furnishes an undeniable evidence of his classical accomplishments asserted in the text.

'Mihî quidem, in illis [veteribus] legendis versanti, & demonstrationes ingeniosissimas ex incogitatis & inexpectatis sed divino quodam artificio conquisitis principis adeo affabre concinnatas, animadvertenti admirantique stupor incidit, unde tanta existeret imaginationis vis, quæ tam immensam consequentiarum molem sustinere posset, facereque ut toties, tam longe distitæ animo simul observentur, & quasi ultro in argumenti unius structuram coeant atque confidant.'

'Quapropter ut ipsas res clarius intuerer, propositiones & demonstrationes verborum integumentis exutas, brevibus tantum symbolis ac notis, oculis etiam ipsis uno obtutu perspicendas designavi. Tum theorematum affectiones varias in æqualitate, proportionalitate, affinitate, atque dependentia, conferendo, nova elicere tentavi. Denique quæstiones consimiles problematicæ fingendo, easque quasi jam consecutas via analytica in sua principia resolvendo, rationes ac media, quibus construantur, investigavi.'

[B] An easy way of Geometrical Dialling — which Sir Christopher Wren translated into Latin] This treatise was added to the second edition of his Key, with this title, A most easy way for the delineation of plane Sun dials, only by geometry without any trigonometrical calculation, whereby the meridian substylar and style, are not only found out, but also inscribed in every kind of plane in their just places. All plainly demonstrated; invented by the author between the 22d and 23d years of his age. In the third edition of the Clavis, at the end of which this tract appears in Latin, he says of it: Partem autem illam quo geometricam horologiorum sciotericorum rationem tradit, ex Anglico Idiomate in latinum vertit Dn Christophorus Wren, Collegij Wadhamentis Commendalis Generosus, &c. (1).

[C] In 1600 he projected an horizontal instrument — and gave it to be published for the advantage of one of his scholars] This instrument was published, together with his circles of proportion at London, 1633, in 4to. by William Foster, who had been taught the Mathematics by Mr Oughtred, but was then himself a teacher of those sciences (2). It is dedicated to Sir Kenelm Digby, to whom Mr Foster writes thus. 'Being in the time of the long vacation 1630, in the country of the reverend and my most worthy friend Mr William Oughtred (to whose instructions I owe both my initiation and whole progress in these sciences) I, upon occasion of speech, told him of a ruler of numbers fines and tangents which one had bespoken to be made (such as is usually called Mr Gunter's ruler) six feet long, to be used with a pair of beam compasses: He answered that was a poor invention, and the performance very troublesome. But, said he, seeing you are taken with such mechanical ways of instruments, I will shew you what I have had by mee these many yeares; and first he brought to me two rulers of that sort, to be used by applying one to the other, without any compasses: And after that he shewed me those lines call into a circle or ring with another moveable circle upon it I seeing the great expeditenesse of both these ways, but especially of the latter, wherein it far excelleth any other instrument, which hath been known, told him, I wondered that he could so many yeares conceal such usefull inventions not only from the world, but from myself, to whom in other parts and mysteries of art he had been so liberall: He answered, that the true way of art is not by instruments, but by demonstrations;

(1) See more of this in the article of Sir Christopher Wren.

(2) This appears from the following note at the bottom of the book. Those that desire further instruction in the use of these instruments, or other parts of the Mathematics, may repair to W. Foster, at the Red Bull over against St Clement's Church-Yard, without Teop. c. Bar.

However, when the invention, he found, was claimed by another person, he did not neglect to repel that injury [D]. It was not the art, so much as the science, of the Mathematics, that chiefly engaged his attention; and, in eager pursuit of this, he continued during his stay at the college, where he resided about twelve years; and in that time, as well by his example as by his instructions, gave a turn in the university to those enquiries. About the year 1603, he was presented to the rectory of Aldbury near Guildford in Surry, and receiving Priest's Orders from Dr Bylson (c), then Bishop of the diocese, he left the college, and settled upon his living, where he was not wanting in a faithful discharge of all the duties of his office. But this retirement favouring his studious disposition, he could not forbear indulging his genius, though it proved a great detriment to his fortune and family [E], spending the greatest part of his time with the darling object of his life, in what he and that it is a preposterous course of vulgar teachers to begin with instruments, and not with the sciences; and so instead of artists to make their scholars only doers of tricks, and as it were jugglers, to the despite of art, losse of precious time, and betraying of willing and industrious wits upon ignorance and idleness. That the use of instruments is indeed excellent, if a man be an artist; but contemptible being set and opposed to art. And lastly, that he meant to commend to me the skill of instruments, but first he would have me well instructed in the sciences. He also shewed me many notes and rules for the use of those circles, and of his Horizontal instrument (which he had projected about 30 years before) the most part written in Latin. All which I obtained of him leave to translate into English, and make publick, for the use and benefit of such as were studious and lovers of these excellent sciences.*

[D] He did not neglect to repel the injury.] To some editions of the book mentioned in the former note, there is subjoined. To the English gentry and all other studious of the mathematics, which shall be readers hereof; the just apology of William Oughtred against the slanderous insinuations of Richard Delamain, in a pamphlet called Grammelogia; or, the Mathematical Ring; or Mirifica Logarithmorum Projectio Circularis. In this epistle, with regard to the Horizontal instrument, our author tells us, that long ago, when he was a young student of the Mathematical sciences, he tried many ways and devices to fit himself with some good dial or instrument portable for his pocket, to find the hour, and try other conclusions by; and accordingly framed for that purpose both quadrants and rings, and cylinders, and many other compositions; yet not to his full content and satisfaction; for either they performed but little, or else were patched up with a diversity of lines by an unnatural and forced contexture. And at last, considering that all manner of questions concerning the first motions were performed most properly by the globe itself, reduced to the present elevation by the help of a moveable azimuth; he projected the globe upon the plan of the horizon, and applied to it at the center, which was therein the zenith, an index with projected degrees for the moveable azimuth; in which projection he first found what he had before with much study and pains in vain sought for. And because he seldom went to London, where he might have the help of large compasses and other instruments for drawing the arches of very big circles, he was forced to betake himself to such shift as art would afford him, and invented many theorems, problems, and practices (such as no man before that ever he could find had delivered) for the finding out of the interfections, and all and every points of all those circles, by which he might draw the same, and divide them being drawn. 'About 30 years since (says he) I presented one of them drawn with my own hand, to the truly Reverend Prelate Dr Bylson, Bishop of Winchester, by whom I was made Prefbyter. About five and twenty years ago I bestowed one upon a noble Ladie, the wife of a worthy and learned Knight, then abiding near the place where I live, but since dwelling in Worcester-shire; which Lady with ingeniousnesse and solertie more than feminine, took delight in the speculation and use of the globe. And for her I writ many notes upon my instrument, the very same almost word for word, many years after I sent in a letter to Elias Allen, and are they which Delamain acknowledgeth to have seen, but slighteth. . . . In the spring, 1618, I being in London went to see my honoured friend Master Henry Briggs at Gresham College; who then brought me acquainted with Master Gunter, lately chosen astronomy reader there*, and was at that time in Dr Brooks his chamber; with whom falling into speech about his quadrant, I shewed him my horizontal instrument. He viewed it very heedfully, and questioned about the projecture and use thereof, often saying these words, it is a very good one. And not long after he delivered to Master Briggs, to be sent to me, mine own instrument printed off from one cut in brass, which afterwards I understood he presented to the right honorable the Earl of Bridgewater. And in his booke of the sector printed six years after, among other projections setteth down this; herein ingenuous that he did not challenge it to himself (as our challenger doth), but not ingenuously enough acknowledging from whom he had it. But such is the providence of God, I kept that very letter from Master Briggs, wherein he sent me that print from Master Gunter, dated from Gresham College June 2, 1618, and the postscript June 4, and which came to my hands June 10. In which letter are these words; Master Gunter doth here send you the print of a horizontal diall of his drawing after your instrument. This very letter hath been left by me in the hands of Elias Allen, above these two years, to be seen of any one that would require it. . . . About two years after I had shewed that my instrument to Master Gunter, I bestowed the very same individual one upon a young gentleman now a Baron, my very honorable and most entire friend, a man full of vertue, full of learning, full of all goodnesse and true nobility, whose only defect and fault is an unquenchable thirst after knowledge and good literature, who hath yet the very same in his custody, and is at this present in London; whose honorable word and testimony will confirme, that he himself so many years ago knew the uses of that instrument, and yet our challenger never unvayled it to him, nor doth prescribe for so long time. In Michaelmas term 1627, I came to London, and Elias Allen having been sworn his Majesty's servant, had a purpose to present his Majesty with some New-yeares gift, and requested me to devise some pretty instrument for him. I answered, that I have heard his Majesty delighted much in the great concave diall at White-hall: and what fitter instrument could he have than my horizontal, which was the very same represented in flat? And that I would upon the backside set the theories of the sun and moon, and so by help of both sides eclipses might be calculated with great facility. He liked it well. The horizontal side was begunne by my direction. I was not long at home, but Master Allen being at a stand in his worke sent to me for helpe; I writ him a large letter two sheets of paper long; wherein I taught him the uses of the instrument, especially the horizontal, and afterward the fabric or delineation of it, and how to find the semidiameters and centers of the severall circles both great and lesser, and the way to divide them: which letter Master Allen yet keepeth, and is the same I spake of before, and which Delamain confesseth he saw.

[E] Even to the detriment of his fortune and family.] In the latter part of his life, our author grew very sensible of this disadvantage, as appears by his answer to the following letter, directed

tained the perfection of the analytical art, perhaps will not appear difficult. But whether all that may be performed by algebraical equations, may likewise be wrought geometrically, according to a lineary operation, I am not able to resolve, and therefore intreat to be instructed from you, the present proposition will happily conduce to that so much desired and long sought for problem, for the finding of two mean proportionals between two extremes given, which having hitherto exercised the witte and endeavours of the most famous geometricians, I presume would not prove unworthy your pains, who by the general suffrages of all men, are deservedly reported the ablest mathematician that our age knows. Sir, I have been beholding to Mr Elias Allen for the conveyance of this letter; and if you will vouchsafe me the favour at your best leisure to return me two or three lines in answer, and cause it to be left at Mr Allen's for me, I will rest very thankfull for the courtesye and ever remaine

London, this present
20 of June, 1642,

Will. Price.

To this letter Mr Oughtred sent the following answer.

June 26, 1642.

S I R,

'It is true that I have bestowed such vacant time as I could gaine from the study of divinitie, which is my calling, upon human knowledges; and amongst other, the mathematics; wherein the little skill I have attained being compared with others of my profession, who for the most part, contenting themselves only with their own way, refuse to tread these salebrous and uneasy pathes, maye peradventure seme the more. But now being in years and mindfull of mine end, and having payed dearly for my former delights both in my health and state, besides the prejudice of such who not considering what incessant labour may produce, recon foe much wanting unto me in my proper calling, as they think I have acquired in other sciences: by which opinion not of the vulgar only I have suffered both disrespect and also hindrance in some small preferments I have aimed at. I have therefore now learned to spare my self, and am not willing to descend againe in arenam; and to serve such ungratefull muses. Yet, Sir, at your request, I have perused your problem, the effect whereof is this: Datis, &c.

Mr Oughtred's complaint is justified by the following extract of a letter written to him signed W. Robinson. . . . . 'And I protest unto you sincerely, wear I able as some, at whose hands you have merited exceedingly, (or to speak more absolutely) as able as willing, I would as freely give you 500 l. per Ann. as 500 pence. And I cannot but be astonished at this our age, wherein self and dross is made their summum bonum, and the best parte of man, while the true ornaments thereof, science and knowledge, are so slighted. I would, I say, it were in my power as efficaciously as it is in my will, and there should not passe many dayes ere it were donne. I make no question but my Lord Marshall (3) is very noble, and intended really to you; but methinks there was some neglect that so poor a favour had so bad successe. Had I interest about London (for I see, and indeed it is most convenient you should not be far from thence) I would do my best, which I will do notwithstandinge, though I can promise nothing but my good will, which shall not be wanting to the utmost.'

[F] His house was filled with such as came for his instructions] Among others we have the names of Sir William Backhouse, Mr Stokes, Dr William Lloyd, Mr Arthur Houghton (4). This last published in 1660 an edition of the circles of proportion and the horizontal instrument, &c. both invented, and the uses of both written in Latin by W. Oughtred, Etonenf. Translated into English, and set forth for the public benefit by W. F. [William Folter] and now, by the author's consent, revised, corrected, and freed from all mistakes in the former edition, and also much amplified and explained by, A. H. Gentleman: Oxford 1660, 8vo. Besides home pupils, our author's name and freedom to communicate brought him applications from other parts. To this purpose we have the following letter from the celebrated Mr John Hales of Eton, addressed to his very good friend Mr William Owtred, at his house in Aldbury.

'Since your being with us at Eton, I was but one three days absent, and then only fell out the opportunity of answering your letters, eruditus, bone Deus! & perhumanus; which by being at Oxford, I unfortunately mist. Now verilie, Sir, I must needs confesse, that such kindness, and so beneficiall upon so small acquaintance, I never received at the hands of any man, as I have at yours. Either your facility was great or your pains very much, who could in so short a space discharge yourself of so many queries. But howsoever I esteem your courtesye above all the rest. Amongst all the solutions which you sent me, none there was, which gave mee not full and sufficient satisfaction, (and so I persuade my self would have given to one of deeper skill than my self) one only excepted, and that is concerning the projectures of an oblique circle. I must confesse, I cannot well put by your demonstration, neither indeede, to speake plainly, do I thoroughly conceive of it, by reason, I doubt not, of my being unexperienced in these studies. For if I well conceive the nature of projection, which I take to be nothing else, but the representation of some shape and figure in plano accordingly as it appears to the eye, I do not see how your conclusion can be good, except it be granted, that there is no means to expresse an oblique circle according as it appears to the eye, which is against your own experience. For even in the universal astrolabe, there is one only circle fully and circularly projected into a straight line, all the rest are either ellipses, or else figures drawing near unto the nature of ellipses, composed of arches of circles, which I think indeede to be ellipses. For if so be every-meridian in the universal planisphere be to be projected as a circle, then why are they not indeede all circles; since that the astrolabe is nothing else, but the projection of all the rest of the meridians in the plaine of one? If I take upon me to dispute with you, it is but only to learne, and learne I cannot of you, except I betraye my ignorance unto you: and assure your selfe I will most shamefully confesse it unto you, that I may receive information from you. But I would not wish you to trouble yourself about this business, for I am now upon going to Oxford, not to return to saie, till about twelve or fourteen daies before Christmas, about which tyme I understand by your father you are purposed to be here. For that private matter about which you wrote, I confesse I must have thought more upon it, than ever I did in my life, but what the reasons are why I remaine irresolute, I will thoroughly acquaint you when I can speake with you. You shall receive by your manne your little Compendium of Triangles, by which I must confesse, I have found my selfe much eased. And now what is it that I can return you for all these exceeding curtesies? But I dont love to compliment; and if I mistake you not, you do not expect it. I praie let me be remembered tho' unknowne to Mrs Owtrede; and so commending my love unto you, I commit you to God.

A scholar of Mr Hales's genius and modesty, does more than recompense the trouble of informing him. In such a case it may be truly said, that it is more pleasant to give than to receive. His mistake lay in misapprehending the nature of projection, wherein the circles on the sphere are not drawn so as they appear to

to the eye, but as they appear upon a plain, intersecting at right angles the visual rays, in proceeding from the eye to the circumference of the circle on the globe, the eye being placed at the end of the diameter. But Mr Oughtred was not always so happy; on the contrary, he was sometimes made to feel the greatness of his fame by the heaviness of the tax laid upon it, as will appear by the following letter.

To the worshipfull my very lovinge friende Mr Owtreade.

Worthy Sir,

If you be at leasure from your harvest affaires, I would once moore desier your helpe in trying the conclusion of the quadrature of the circle. By deepe consideration of the 4th chapter of Ezechiel, I doe finde a manifest figure of declaring of the quadrate thereof, with all the circumstances. The prophet is willed to take a tile, or (as the word in the Hebrew beareth) album, a wight table, abacum, or paper; and to wright thereon the name of the city Hierusalem, which signifeth the doctrine or vision of concorde: and it stretch to the purpose of a circle made to accorde with a right line, betweene whom ther hath alwaies been unreconcilable warr. The name Hierusalem  $\aleph \omega \sigma \alpha \mu$  containeth accordinge to the common wrighting 1146; but I finde also a secret wrighting thereof in this manner  $\aleph \omega \sigma \alpha \mu$  that is 80 moore added, and maketh the whole number 1226. And the wordes which follow, dabis super eam obfidionem, edificabis turrim, fundes aggerem, dabis exercitus, pones arietes in circuitu, written in the Hebrew, and the whole number of consonants and vowels put together of these words maketh the same number of 1226. And according to the common sense of these wordes it signifeth manifestly, a study of attaining the knowledge of the secret thereof. He is bidden first to sleepe upon his left side 390 dayes, and to beare the iniquity of Israel; which signifeth the supposing of the quadrature to be triple of that number, which is a figure of the iniquity of Israel, as that number is unequal to the circle. Then he is willed to sleepe on his right side forty dayes, and to beare the iniquity of Juda. The wordes quadraginta dies in the Hebrew (deducting the number of the vowels from consonants) make 2479, which is the diameter given by the first operation, and is notwithstanding unequal, though lesse so than the former. He is also bidden to take an yron grate to putt betweene him and the city, that is the square of sevens made in the manner of a grate, as a mesolabium between the circle which is besieged, and the right line which is brought into it. Then he is commanded to go about the sieg, and not to stirr to the examining of the fraction, before he hath perfected and gone over the 390 partes. Also he is willed to take certaine puls, and to make a breade of them for the number of the dayes 390. By which is meant the composition of all those wordes together into one sentens, which signify in the Hebrew, the drawing of a line of syphers; and the number of the line is expressed by the weight of the water, which he is to drinke, that is one 6 part of an hin which is 12, the hin containing 72. Afterwards he is willed to cutt the haye of his head and bearde: the two wordes containe the beginning of the fraction of 653, after the 6 place  $3 \underline{L} 141592 \underline{L} 653$ . He is also to divide them into three equall parts, and to cast all of them away, save only a little part, and that is one unite, and yet of that to cast away somewhat. That little residew, which must stand in the 7 place, is signified by an inward reading to be  $\frac{20}{30}$ , for the unities are supposed to be 30 a peece. So that in the 7 place, it seemeth the stay should be of fractions to come to an ende, that the whole proportion of this diameter 390 to the circle 1226, should be  $3 \underline{L} 141592 \frac{20}{30}$ , which cutteth this place is, that it is evident, that the way of Archimedes and Ceulin can never possibly come to an ende in the operation to make a certaine stay. For their ground being the multiplication of an inscript figure, by his polygones to come to the nature of a circle, it can never be effected. For the last polygon figure which can be imagined, must be compounded of right lines which part two angles. Therefore those lines may be again divided into lesser without end, according to the rules of philosophy: therefore they must always end between plus and minus. Moreover, suppose the trew proportion of the circle wear propounded by God, it must of necessity be either lesse than Ceulin's, or equal, or moore. If it be lesse or equall it can't be [the trew one] because these proportions are defective from the periphery, as may be proved demonstratively. Againe, if it exceed an unittie, it cannot be [the trew proportion] by the same demonstration. Therefore of necessity it must exceede Ceulin's, whersoever it should chance to fall, and yet not an unite. Therefore this is my desier, that you would take so much paynes for me, as to trye, whether by Algebra it be possible to overthrow this supposition of the perfect proportion

the seven place, the unite being supposed to be a denary, this division of the unite into thirty, cutteth a middle betweene 18 which is as 6 and 21 which is as 7. And whereas mention was made of a mesolabium in the square of seavens, I find this use thereof, that the square of seavens containing  $\underline{L} 6$  latera 175 a part, and in all in the 49 places  $\underline{L} 25$ ; ther is but one unite differens from the circle 1226, which is reconciled by adding of 20 dayes to every one of the 16 sides of the squar, being supposed to consist of yeares; which fraction making 320 dayes, is in grosse taken for a year. So that altho every side, consisting of 175 yeares and 20 dayes, be heterogeneous in things from the semidiameter of 390 yeares, it is homogeneous in number. And I finde that the life of Abraham, which was 175 whole yeares, containd 20 dayes over, as I can demonstrate by a secret readinge. So that this formall reconciliation not real, of the square of seavens unto the circle of 1226, is made by adding of a 20 to the making of a just proportion to become thereby a figure of the quadrature of 390 to 1226, by adding the fraction of 20 in the 7 place. But to leave all questions which may arise about the premisses, I only desire you would try, if by Algebra you may disprove this determinate fraction of  $\frac{20}{30}$  in the seventh place, for the just proportion of the diameter 390 unto 1226. For Ceulin's operation doth not infringe it, for all his subalterne fractions added to the 6 place in the scale, doth not amount to another unite, that it should exceede  $\frac{20}{30}$ , and his operation onely proceedeth by proportion, that as  $390 \underline{L} 2479$  maketh the proportion  $3 \underline{L} 141592$ , so  $390 \underline{L} 347921$  maketh the proportion  $3 \underline{L} 14159265$ , and so proceedeth by the way of proportion continually to come to a lesser fraction.

I entreat you most earnestly, that so soone as your leisure will serve, you will take pain herein, and send me the operation, which you make. For although it seemeth to me, that ther being no mesolabium known, which may be as a logical medium to prove or disprove this proposition, saving only the method of Ceulin which cannot do it; yet I desire to be satisfied by your experiens, not by my owne guesse. And so wishing you all happines, I rest

Among all the rare mysteries of the Jewish Cabala, I do not remember that any adept therein had smelt out this of squaring the circle before Mr Alabaster. This letter is certainly a curiosity, viewed either in the light college in London; and that gentleman forming a design to perfect his Lordship's plan, consulted Mr Oughtred upon it (e), who probably wrote his treatise of Trigonometry about this time [G]; and, in prosecuting the same subject, he invented, not many years after, an instrument, which he called the Circles of Proportion. This was published at the same time and upon the same occasion with the horizontal abovementioned. All such questions in Arithmetic, Geometry, Astronomy, and Navigation, as depended upon simple and compound proportion, might be wrought by it; and it was the first sliding-light of a cabalistical or mathematical production. The unfathomable depth of the first being equally amazing, with the unmeasurable shallowness of the latter. Nothing indeed but ocular demonstration could make it credible, that any one should know Van Cenlin's number  $3 \lfloor 14159265, \&c. \rfloor$  and be acquainted with the operation or manner of it's production, and acknowledge that it continually comes to a lesser fraction, should yet be so totally lost in the profundities of cabalistical science, as not see that it did infringe his pretended demonstration, since the decimal fraction  $\lfloor 141592653, \&c. \rfloor$  in infinit. must needs be lesser than

quently  $3 \lfloor 141592 \frac{20}{30} \rfloor$ , must needs exceed the true or exact proportion of the diameter to the circumference: Accordingly we do not find that Mr Oughtred thought this address worthy his notice, notwithstanding he esteemed the subject of the quadrature not unworthy of further enquiries. As appears by his answer to the following letter inscribed thus.

' To the Reverend and much honoured friend Mr Oughtred.

' By the small yet favourable conversation you have been pleased sometimes heretofore to bestow upon mee, I am encouraged to request as much more thereof as your other occasions and studies of greater moment may (at least missively if not personally) permit; and for an entrance into such intercourse, I make my self an object to your further courtesye, intreating that your exchange of a paper may returne mee a relation of the most material uses, whereunto an exact quadrature of a circle is applicable, therewithal to refresh my late bard study and labour to attayne an ability to expose before the authoritie of your judgement an infallible demonstration thereof, when with convenience and privacy your desirable presence shall comfort and honour

Reverend servant,

Robert Keylway.'

To this Mr Oughtred wrote the following answer.

Worthy Sir,

' There was indeed left at my house a letter divers days after the date thereof, but I neither knew by whom it was brought, neither was there any direction, whither I should returne my answer. Besides I have had shewd unto me divers overtures of such as have attempted that mystery of art, that have in trial failed. And we know that Orontius, and Joseph Scaliger, and Longomontanus, great masters in that science, have rather made demonstration of their heroicall endeavour, than of the conquest they proposed. And to say the truth, I have held the disquisition is infeasible, because altho' no doubt there may be a right line equal to a circular, yet they being heterogeneous, ther cannot in art be any due comparison betwene them; for comparatio is homogeneousum. We have out of Archimedes's grounds both by Van Ceulen and his follower Willebroorde Snellius, see nere an equation of a right line to a nicetic, that if the whole universe were sand there would not be the difference of one graine, and yet we cannot say the exact quadrature is by them delivered. Neyther will it serve to those yet undiscovered uses, which the

' proper and genuine equation (such as I conceive it must be) will no doubt afforde; as namely the mensuration of segments of circles, spheres, cylinders, and cones, with the frusta thereof; the solution of the problems in the second book of Archimedes de sphaera & cylindro, which now are only soluble by cubical equations; the measuring of menisci & arbeli and other figures composed either of right lines and circles, or of different circles, all which would be most excellent discoveries, and plus ultras in art. And I should also thence expect a facile and ready way for the proportion of subtenses in a circle to their circumferences. These and many other abstruse adyta, hitherto almost despaired of, may I suppose by your magisterial invention tanquam Mercurii caduceo, be set open. Sir, this is the effect of all I am able to answer to your desire, unless I more fully knew the manner of your way. I speake this the rather, and am induced to a better confidence of your performance, by reason of a new geometric analytical art or practice found out by one Cavalieri an Italian, of which above three years since, I received information by a letter from Paris, wherein was prelibated only a small taste thereof, yet so that I divine great enlargement of the bounds of the mathematical empire will ensue. I was then very desirous to see the author's own book, while my spirits were more free and light-some, but I could not get it in France. Since being more steep into yeares, daunted and broken with the sufferings of these disastrous times †, I must content myself to keep home, and not put out to any foraine discoveries. Thus with thankful acknowledgement of your so noble favour, to deigne me worthy the communication of such a secret, I rest ready to doe you all service, which may be within the power of, the true honourer of your worth,

[G] Probably drew up his trigonometry about this time.] This is collected from the method of that treatise which is seen in the title, as follows: Trigonometria, hoc est modus computandi triangulorum latera & angulos ex Canone Mathematico traditus & demonstratus, una cum tabulis sinuum, tangentium, & secantium, &c. It is evidently formed upon the plan of Lord Neper's canon, but as Mr Oughtred could not be ignorant that his intimate friend Mr Briggs had undertaken to complete his design, and applied himself at this time wholly to it; therefore, this treatise of our author's seems to have been wrote only for his own use. Mr Briggs's scheme being, after his death, completed by Mr Gellibrand, Astronom. Prof. at Gresh. Here then we see abundant reason, why our author should not readily yield to the intreaties of several gentlemen his scholars, who (Mr Lloyd (5) tells us) did not without much ado prevail with him to have it published. It came out in the year 1657; and a translation of it was printed at London the same year, in 4to. with this title, Trigonometrie; or the manner of calculating the sides, and angles of triangles, by the mathematical canon, demonstrated by William Oughtred, Etonens. What we have here advanced, seems to be farther confirmed by a letter sent to Mr Oughtred, from which the following extract is taken. 'I have procured your Trigonometrie to be written over in a fair hand, which when finished, I will send you, to know if it be according to your mind; for I intend (since you were pleased to give your assent) to endeavour to print it with Mr Briggs his tables, and so soon as I can get the Prutenic tables, I will turn those of the sunne and moon, and send them to you — signed, Richard Stokes.'

rule that was projected for those uses, as well as that of gauging. However, Mr Oughtred modestly disclaimed any extraordinary merit in it, and next to Lord Neper and Mr Briggs expressly gives the honour of the invention to Mr Edmund Gunter [H]. In

[H] Gives the honour of it to Mr Edmund Gunter.]

In the apologetical epistle cited above (6), Mr Oughtred confesses he had not so good a claim against all men for the circles of proportion, as for his horizontal instrument, tho' against Mr Delamain, he had *, 'the honour of the invention (says he) next to the Lord of Merckifson, and our Master Briggs, belongeth (if I have not been wrongly informed) to Master Gunter, who exposed their numbers upon a straight line; which being once done, was there any such masterie to bring the same line about a circle? and what doth this new instrument (call it the circles of proportion or call it the ring, or what other name you list) ought else, but only bowe or inflect Master Gunter's line or ruler? The manner how I fell upon it was thus: I have in my study and practice of the Mathematicks, been not a little conversant in calculation. And that I might both facilitate the labour and try the work, I invented many folteries and compendiations in logiicka for the one, and framed divers kinds of instruments and mechanical practices for the other; that when I should find the performance in both ways not to disagree, I might be assured of my just diligence in numerary computation. Among other instruments I much liked the same line or ruler; only this defect I found, that it required many times too great a pair of compasses, which would be hard to open, apt to slip, and troublesome for use. I therefore first devised to have another ruler with the former, and so by setting and applying one to the other, I did not only take away the use of compasses, but also made the worke much more easy and expedite, when I should not at all need the motion of my hand, but only the glancing of my sight, and with one position of the rulers, and view of mine eye, see not one only, but the manifold proportions incident unto the question intended. But yet this facility also wanted not some difficulty, especially in the line of tangents, when one arch was in the former mediety of the quadrant, and the other in the latter; for in this case it was needfull, that either one ruler must be as long againe as the other; or else that I must use an inversion of the ruler, or regression. By this consideration I first of all saw, that if those lines upon both rulers were inflected into circles, that of the tangents being in both doubled, and that these two circles should move one upon another, they with a small thread in the center to direct the sight would be sufficient with incredible and wonderful facility to worke all questions of trigonometrie, both right lined and spherical and according to this my speculation, above twelve years agoe, I with mine own hand made me two such circles, which I have used ever since as my occasions required. In the long vacation 1630, I shewed both the rulers and the circle to William Forster somewhat prematurely then (for the desire I had to lead him on the right way of art I intended) at my personage house, as in his epistle before his translation he doth himself testify. To whom exhorting me to publish them, I said I would not appear to the world in such toys; but if hee would take the paines to translate some rules I had written, into English, we would bestow upon Elias Allen (if hee shall think they may be beneficial to him) both these circles of proportion, and also another instrument consisting of two half circles, most plainly and easily giving the prosthaphereses of the planets according to the theory of Copernicus (which I have had fairly drawne with mine owne hand above these twenty yeares) which might be set upon the other side of the plate, and would together make up the most complete instrument for all astronomic that ever yet to my knowledge came forth. And of this intire instrument, at my coming up to London in Michaelmas term following to attend my service (7), I did accordingly make a most free donation to Elias Allen by the engagement of my promise. . . . In 1636. There was printed at London, in 8vo. Our author's description, and use of the double horizontal diall. And in 1652, at the end of the English edition, of H. Van Eiten's Mathematical Recreations, printed at London, there was published a tract entitled The description of the double horizontal diall, whereby not only the hour of the day is shewn, but also the meridian line is found: and most astronomical questions, which may be done by the globe, are resolved. Invented and written by William Oughtred. In the year 1632, he received some hints for improving this instrument in a letter, the extract of which relating to this subject, is as follows. . . . Amongst other instruments (which are good helps but ill masters) why might you not be persuaded to publish the description of that mentioned by you elsewhere, for the ready supputation of the places of the planets as a backside to your double horizontal, which though particular, might in its chiefest use of finding the meridian line be made (as I think) generally by fixing it on a moveable foot, and then being elevated or depressed according to the different elevation of the pole, and turned about at the same angle, till the double shadow point out the same hour, standing thus in the meridian, be made use of for the protraction of the hour-lines, upon any plaine without respect had to its situation, by a thread passing from the center of the horizontal diall thro' the intersection of the hour spaces, continued to any plain whatsoever.—signed John Twysden.

In the treatise of the circles of proportion, Chap. ix. concerning gauging, our author (if it be his) has inserted a tart reprehension of Mr Gunter, who (says he) in his second book of the Cross-staffe, cap. iv. pretending to shew the manner of gauging wine-vessels, beginneth with these words: 'The vessels which are here measured, are supposed to be cylinders, or reduced into cylinders by taking the meane between the diameter at the head, and the diameter at the bounge after the usual manner. And according to this supposition he teacheth to find a gauge point, for a gallon of wine, in that his imagined cylindrical vessel. Because his words are cautelous, we must a little examin them; for if his way be true, my rule before set downe tho' grounded upon demonstration, cannot stand. Well then, that reduction of a wine-vessel into a cylinder, is either true or false, if it be true, what need those ambiguities of vessels, which are here measured, and are supposed to be, &c. after the usual manner? If false why is it not noted, but delivered as a rule to confirm an error, and what meaneth the meane between the diameter at the head, and the diameter at the bounge? Is it the meane arithmetically or geometrically. If it be the first. I say that the vessel cannot truly be reduced to a cylinder by such a meane diameter. For seeing it is most apparent, that such a vessel is greater in the middle, than at the ends, the boards or sides thereof, shall from the middle to the ends goe either straight, and so the vessel shall as before, I said, and is commonly taken for a truth, be a sphaeroides having the two ends equally cut off. If it be considered as two segments of cones: the measure by that meane diameter or middle section is quite false, as hath been demonstrated in the former chapter, sect. 16, 17, and will be given less than the true content, although the sides go straight: much more then, if the sides go arching; for that convexnesse must needs yield a greater capacity. And therefore in neither can that manner of gauging be true. Again, if the meane diameter be understood to be the mean proportional between the two diameters it is much more false, for between any two numbers, the meane geometrically, is lesse than the arithmetical.'—In this remark our author indirectly recommends his own improvement of the gauging-rod, concerning which Sir Charles Cavendish writes to him thus: 'I thank you for your little book, but especially for the waie of calculating the divisions of your gauging rod. I wish both for their owne sakes and yours, that the citizens were as capable of the acutenes of this invention, as they are commonly greedie of gaine, and then I doubt not but they would give a better recompense, than I doubt now they will.'—Upon the whole it appears, that the invention of the sliding-rule, was owing to Mr Oughtred.

The treatise of navigation added to his circles of proportion, was deservedly admired at that time: concerning which, Mr W. Robinson in the letter above cited, writes to him as follow. 'I am glad you have perused Snellius, who indeed pleased me exceedingly; and I thought in the readinge of him,

1631, our author published at London, in a small octavo, Arithmetica in Numeris & Speciebus Institutio: quæ tum Logistica tum Analytica atque totius Mathematicæ Clavis est [I]. Vieta having discovered the method of Specious Arithmetic, and publishing it in 1599, Mr Oughtred, in this performance, made several remarkable improvements therein; particularly he gave an easy and general rule for the solution of quadratic equations, which is so compleat, as not to admit of being farther perfected, and has been transcribed without any alteration in the elementary treatises of Algebra ever since (f). In an introductory institution, his design did not carry him to consider equations of a higher order in the same view; notwithstanding some observations which he made here concerning them, led Dr Wallis (g) to the invention of a like formula for the resolution of cubics. In general, there were found to be so many excellent theorems, several of which were entirely new, both in Algebra and Geometry, comprized in this little manual, that it was universally esteemed, both at home and abroad, as a surprizingly rich cabinet of mathematical treasures, of which the author had the pleasure to receive several testimonies in letters addressed to himself [K]. The general plan of it has been since followed by the very best authors upon the subject (h); but Mr Oughtred, it must not be denied, affected a brevity which

‘ a more exact way (if instruments and artists be both exact) could not possibly be taken, than by angles taken with a very large quadrant, and so great an artist and logistick as Snellius was. Upon your letter I borrowed your new booke, (but I intend to take your courtesye offer of one of them from Mr Allen) and find your way pag. 23, to be exceeding good (and indeed a curious good way) but why in your letter you should rather wishe the plaine table I do not see; yett I confesse my ignorance therein, being only a book speculator (such is the condition of my life) and no practitioner, because I am restrained, may well hide the reason from me, and therefore do I submit. In assignning of a degree, I find this difference betwixt you and Snellius, that he makes a degree to contain 353325  $\frac{785}{1000}$  English feete, you only 351120; the difference is 2185  $\frac{785}{1000}$ , which though not much in a whole degree, yett I marvaile how it should happen betwixt two such good artists. The way by the height of a hill and a tangent, which is Maurolycus’s way, I did not propose as to rely upon it in practice; but supposing Snellius his observations to be exact, I thought to try the earth’s diameter being already given, and the height of a hill also suppose to be 7920 feete that is a mile and  $\frac{1}{2}$  in the perpendicular (a height high enough), yett it will not hit, but eyther varyeth the angle at the center, or the diameter given by Snellius; yett I dare not distrust Snellius his way, it is so demonstrative. Your booke of navigation delighteth me exceedingly, and I doubt not but to finde in it (for my time of perusal hath yett bene but shorte) the way of the shipp exactly taught and some things extraordinary, seeinge as I perceive you have reade Snellius his Typhus Bataricus, which was the best (that I had reade) before I reade yours; and seeinge you have layde open so much of the arte alreadye, I could wishe wee might see a Typhus Aldeburienis come from the Archimedes thereof, for verily I thinke omne bonum mathematicum may come from thence, if so you please.’— In the same letter, Mr Robinson makes some remarks upon trigonometry which is the subject of the 13th chapter of the circles of proportion. ‘As you have brought a symbolicall kinde of expression (which is very neat and good) and wishe also that the decimall fraction weare common (and if the decimall integer weare brought in also, but that it would make shrewde havoc among the tables, extant to divide a whole circle into ten) it would be easye; but if the division remaininge which is now current, I would have Snellius his names of complementum and residuum brought in; the one beinge data peripheriæ ad quadrantem differentia; the other, excessus semicirculi ad datam peripheriam; small things I confesse, yett proper and distinct: whereas, complimentum and semicirculum is a circumlocution, and it is better, that distinct things, have distinct names. I am not ignorant that your selfe hath given a touch of this pag. 94. ch. xiii. of your trigonometrie, but the word excessus you seem to use in a different sence.’

[I] Published in a small Octavo, Arithmetica Institutio—quæ—clavis est.] About the year 1628, the Earl of Arundel living then at West Horsely, though he afterwards bought a house at Aldbury, sent for Mr Oughtred to instruct his son Lord William Howard in the Mathematicks (8). The Clavis was first drawn up for the use of this young nobleman. In the preface to the third edition, our author explains his own design and method, in very elegant Latin, as follows: ‘Conscripsi olim in familia illustrissima nuper Comitum Arundelice & Surriæ, cum ex filiis ejus alteri in disciplinis Mathematicis exponendis deservierim, ordinem quandam, qui mihi ad mysteria mathematica videbatur appositisimus, ut studiosorum qui ipsum secuturi sunt animi scientiis illis, non leviter & superficialiter tenentur, sed intime & radicibus imbuantur, hunc meum ordinem multorum virorum doctorum, maxime vero nobilissimi illius eruditissimiq; Dni Caroli Cavendish, hortatu in publicum sub titulo Clavis Mathematicæ primo emisi. Tractatus quidem ille, non methodo (sicut vulgo fit) synthetica per theorematum atque problematum longo verborum ambitu descriptus, sed via inventionis analytica (ita ut tota sit quasi demonstratio continua nexibus firmissimis compaginata) & non tam verbis quam rerum speciebus depictus, primo aspectu difficultatem peperit in multis, qui forma tradendi insuitata territi, chimeram aut sphynxem aliquam imaginabantur: verum si quis præjudicii hæc terribilissima adspersus, attento præsentique animo hanc viam ingreditur, rem videbit maxime facilem & conspicuam. Namque speciosus hic atque symbolicus modus nec memoriam verborum multiplicitate torquet, nec phantasia rerum multarum comparatione, atque disputatione onerat ac distrahit; sed operationis atque argumentationis totius processum conspectui repræsentans; theorema denique profert non uni tantum genti intelligendum, sed omnium quotquot sunt ubique terrarum nationum linguis (modo de notis (9), constat) efferendum.’

*Animi quidem mei sensus & votum tum in prima clavis meæ formatione, tum in secunda limitatione sive potius nova fabricatione fuit, ut matheos studiosis quasi Ariadnes filum porrigerem, quo ad intima harum scientiarum adyta deducantur, & ad optimos antiquissimosque authores Euclidem, Archimedes, Apollonium Pergæum, magnum illum geometram, Diophantum ac reliquos facilius penitusque intelligendos dirigantur; eorumque non propositiones modo addiscant, quod plerique Mathematicis scientiæ quasi culmen est & fastigium; sed etiam percipiant qua solertia, quibus æquationum, interpretationum, comparationum, reductionum, conversionum, atque disquisitionum moliminibus, præci illi heroes scientiam hanc pulcherrimam ornaverint, auxerint, invenerint.—He proceeds to (10) declare the method he took in inventing the materials from which the Clavis is compiled; and concludes thus, *Hinc tandem non nisi plurimorum annorum usu atque experientia præceptorum illa qualiscunque seges emerfit

[K] Testimonies in letters addressed to himself.] Mr William Gascoigne, in a letter to our author, dated from Middleton, near Leeds [in Yorkshire] December 2d, 1640; writes thus:

Sir,

Amongst the mathematical rarities these times have afforded, there are none of that small number I (a late intruder into these studies) have yet viewed, which so fully demonstrates their author’s great abilities as your Clavis, not richer in augmentation than valuable for contraction.*

How much it was esteemed abroad, the author was informed in the following letters. Mr Charles Cavendish concludes his letter above cited (11) thus. He [Mr Derand] writes also that your Clavis is in great estimation was always found too close for beginners [L]. The second and third editions were promoted by the first Mathematicians of that age, some of whom thought it no disparagement tion amongst the Mathematicians at Paris. dated Wellbeck, Feb. 11, 1635.

‘ Worthie Mr Oughtred,

‘ The profit I formerly received by the first edition of your Clavis Mathematica, as also from your other workes, made me not ignorant what might be expected from your pen, which, with the character he received from yours and my noble friend Sir Charles Cavendish, then at Paris, of your second edition of the same piece, made me at my return to England, speedily to get, and diligently peruse the same. Neither truly did I find my expectation deceived, having with admiration often considered how it was possible, (even in the hardest things of Geometry) to deliver so much matter in so few words; yet with such demonstrative clearnesse and perfpicity; and hath often put me in mind of learned Merfennus his judgment (since dead) of it, that there was more matter comprehended in that little book, than in Diophantus and all the Ancients. Sir, as I hold it below an ingenious spirit to flatter where worth is not, so do I think little less than robbery to keep back from you the knowledge of that estimation is put upon your person and book, in forrain parts; which I wish heartily might serve as an encouragement to set you forward in the publication of things of the like nature; of which (as I heare) you are not unfurnished: that putting together all done by you, both in the Latine and English tongue, the two most famous sciences of Geomtry and Astronomy, both for solid precepts, and instrumental practice, might receive (for the honour of our nation) from yours, more than from one hand whatsoever.’ dated Feb. 18, 1649-50.

[L] Found too close for beginners ] This remark is justified by the following letters sent to the author upon that subject.

In a letter cited above, dated June 11th, Mr Robinson writes to Mr Oughtred concerning his Clavis thus: ‘ I shall longe exceedingly till I see your Clavis turned into a picklock; and I beseech you inlarg it and explaine it what you can, for we shall not need to fear either tautology or superfluity; you are naturally concise, and your cleare judgment makes you both methodical and pithye; and your analytical way is indeed the only way.’

In another letter dated Lincolne, July 2, 1636; Mr Robinson writes to Mr Oughtred purely upon this subject as follows:

‘ Reverend Sir,

‘ I will once againe earnestly intreate you, that you bee rather diffuse in the setting forth your English Mathematicall Clavis, than concise; considering, that the wisest of men noted of olde, and said, Stultorum infinitus est numerus. Those arts cannot be made too easy; they are so abstruse of themselves, and men eyther so lazy or dull, that their fastidious wits will take a loathing at the very entrance of these studies, unlesse it be sweetned with plainesse and facilitye, brevitye maye well argue a learned author, that without any excess or redundance, either of matters or wordes, can give the very substance and effence of the thing treated of; but it seldom makes a scholler; and if one be capable, twenty are not; and if the master sum up in brife the parts of his own longe labours and travailes, it is not easy to imagine the scholers can with less labour than their maister dive into the depth thereof. I am not of their opinion that would have mysteries in the world (divine mysteries which God himself hath locked from us excepted); for if ignorance is the punishment and consequence of sinne, and it behoves us to take away from others this vaile, which sinne hath drawne between our eyes and the truth of things, so shall men imitate angells, every superior illuminating and perfecting his inferiour, which redoundeth to the honour and dignity of them both, but more of the giver than receiver. The abyffe of these sciences is inexhaustible, and much is lost that our auncestors knewe, much yett unknowne to either, and therefore all the helpe that human wit or industry can afford us, all little enough; and when all is done, there will be a terra incognita for mathematicians of after ages to faile unto. Thus, Sir, you see, I am free and bold, because loving and confident, and that you will be pleased so to take it, I will count it pardon sufficient; and whatsoever issues from you as a child of your braine, I desire it may lodge with mee, wheare it shall have the best welcome that affection can give it.

Lincolne,
July 2, 1636.

‘ William Robinson.’

Mr John Twyden concludes this letter to our author cited in note [H] in these words. . . . ‘ But to return whence I have digressed: amongst many other excellent rules in your Clavis, I cast my eye upon that example of the first rule of doubling, &c. the angle of a rectangle triangle opposite to the base, but must confesse, could never performe by it what I fought; as by the second I ever did. The result of my work according to both your rules, you will find hereto annexed, in which I am bold to begge your judgment, where my fault may be, or a farther explication of the same, being assured of your civility and goodnesse, and glad also to snatch any occasion to renew that little acquaintance I formerly have had of you by our casuall meetinge at Mr Allen’s in the Strand, by whose meanes I send this, and who will do me the favour to return your answer hereunto, if you shall please to send it him directed to Sir Roger Twyden’s hous at East-Peckam in Kent for me.’

Mr Oughtred likewise received advice to the same purpose from Mr Stokes, who also was puzzled at some things in the Clavis, through the extreme shortness of the demonstrations, as appears from the following letter, an extract of which (relating to another subject) we have already given in note [G].

‘ To my ever honoured tutor, Mr William Oughtred.

‘ Honoured Sir,

‘ Since I left you, I have recollected as much as my journeys before, and necessary exercises after my return to Cambridge would permit me, those notions I received from you. The first thing I did was to follow your counsel, in perfecting myself in the projection and Trigonometrie, which I thinke, Sir, I do now fully understand. Some other things also I have reviewed, but find more occasion to acknowledge my engagements to you for your clear instructions, than to trouble you with many doubts. Yet some things there are, Sir, which presuming upon your goodnesse, and the encouragement you gave me, I shall desire to be satisfied in, as Clavis, page 100 (12). Quare theorema primum de mensurando (12) In the third edition.

‘  $\approx$  triplo frusto. I doe not understand, Sir, why you say  $\frac{355}{452}$ , not  $\frac{355}{113}$ , when I suppose you meane

‘ the area multiplied in the height, and as before ’tis, say  $\frac{355}{113} Rq \approx$  area circuli. Pray, Sir, shew me

‘ what I have misapprehended, and wherein my error lyes. In pag. 1. Archimed. de Sph. & Cylind. §. 11.

‘  $\frac{\pi}{3} Mq$  is proved  $\approx$  coni, because it is  $\approx \frac{\pi}{3} Aq$

‘ in KO; but that the semiperipher. into the side of a cone is  $\approx$  coni, I know not how to demonstrate.

‘ Another thinge which troubles me is in pag. 37. de sol. reg. where the superficies (4) is  $4 \lfloor 618628$ ; the

‘ soliditie but  $0 \lfloor 513216$ , which seems lesse than the superficies, I must humbly crave your assistance, Sir,

‘ to bee satisfied in these; and if I trespasse not too much upon you, how in Clavis, p. 108. the duplication of an angle differs from the bisection, since

ment even to correct the press. To these editions our author added a treatise of the resolution of adfected equations in numbers. Here too it must be owned, the ground was first broke up by Vieta, but in a very different way; Mr Oughtred's method was his own invention, and if it was thought too tedious and intricate for general and ready use (i), yet it cannot be denied at the same time, that the subject is of a very perplex and abstruse nature. So much at least is confessedly due to his merit on the subject of the genesis of powers, that some observations he made upon it, furnished the great inventor of the binomial theorem with the ground-work of that unparalleled invention. So that it is no wonder that the Clavis became the standard book made use of by tutors, for instructing their pupils in the Mathematics in the universities, especially at Cambridge (k), and that some parts of it were made the subject of the geometrical lectures at Gresham-college in London (l). Notwithstanding all his mathematical merit, Mr Oughtred, about the year 1646, was in danger of a sequestration by the Committee of and for Plundered Ministers. In order to which, several articles were deposed and sworn against him, material enough, as it is said, to have sequestred him; but upon his day of hearing, William Lilye, the famous Astrologer, applied himself, as he tells us, to Sir Bullstrode Whitlocke, and all his old friends, who in such numbers appeared in his behalf, that though the chairman and many other Presbyterian members were active against him, yet he was cleared by the majority. The truth is, continues this writer, he had a considerable parsonage, and that alone was enough to sequester any moderate judgment; besides, he was also well known to affect his Majesty (m). In reality, his merit was so much neglected, and his situation made so uneasy at home, that his friends procured several invitations to him from abroad, to live either in Italy, France, or Holland; but he chose to ride out the storm at Aldbury, which, indeed, most probably blew over his head for the most part without any great hurt to him (n).

It has been already observed, that Mr Oughtred well knew the just value of the Ancients, and formed himself upon those excellent exemplars; but this is to be understood only in respect to the accuracy, conciseness, and perspicuity, of their method: for he neither thought it necessary, nor of any real advantage to Geometry, absolutely to confine the demonstrations in the sublimer parts of the science (as the Ancients, and particularly Archimedes (it is well known) did) to the principles laid down in the Elements. On the contrary, in his exposition of the theorems of Archimedes on the Sphere and Cylinder (o), he condemns the rigid strictness of that author, which obliged him to make use of arguments ex absurdo. These he rejects, as not entirely satisfactory; and assuming it for a postulatam, that a circle is a plane, and that a sphere is a solid figure of infinite sides (p), by the help of that step he gives (for the most part) affirmative and direct

Coll. Regal. Cantab.
Feb. 6, 1654.5.

* S I R,

* Your obliged honourer,

* Richard Stokes.*

Mr Oughtred sent the following answer to these queries:

\* Your first quæsite is, why (in pag. 100. de mensura \* rando frustra coni) I say not  $\frac{355}{113} Rq$ , but  $\frac{355}{452} Dq$ ?

* The reason is, because in the scheme, the lines A * and E (sides of the quadratè bases) are the diameters * of inscribed circles, which are the conic bases, and * not the radii or semidiameters. Nowe because Dq

\*  $= 4 Rq$ , the area of the circle, shall be  $\frac{355}{113} + \frac{+ Dq}{4}$

\* that is  $\frac{355}{452} Dq$ .

* Your second quæsite is, why (in pag. 1. Archimed. * de Sph. & Cylind.) semiperipheria basis coni in latus

\* æquetur superficiè conicæ; that is,  $\frac{\pi}{d} AO + KO$

\*  $= \circ$ ? The reason is evident, because the superficies \* of an equilateral cone is a sector of a circle inscribed \* round, the center being the vertex. But the area of \* the whole circle is equal to the half ambitè multi-

\* plied by the radius (nempe  $\frac{\pi}{d} Rm R$ ): wherefore \* the area of a sector shall be equal to half the arch cut \* out multiplied by the radius.

* Your third quæsite is why (in page 37 de solid. * reg.) the number of the superficial measure is still * greater than the number of the solide content? the * reason is most perspicuous, because the one is recon- * ed in uncis quadratis, the other in cubicis.

* Your fourth quæsite is, why (in anguli tum du- * plicatione tum subduplicatione, p. 100.) the æquation * whereby it is solved, is the very same in both? but * in the numerous resolution you will find a maine dif- * ference, according to that which is sought in both, * noted with a straight line over the head.

* But let this be remembered, that, whoever will * rightlie study my hooke, that it may be a Clavis to * him, he must be attentus, operans, constanterque per * ipsa vestigia insequens; non enim oscitantibus scripsit, * sed vere mathezeos candidatis. Pressa sunt magis * quam breviter.

Dr Wallis, in his History of Algebra, speaking of our author's brevity, has given an illustrious instance of his own contrary diffuseness; he says that 'though when Vieta first introduced this way of specious Arithmetick, it was then more necessary (the thing being new) to express the terms made use of in words at length; yet when the thing was once received in practice, Mr Oughtred, (who affected brevity, and to deliver what he taught as briefly as might be, and to reduce all to a short view) contented himself with single letters instead of those words.'

He afterwards proceeds to vindicate the Clavis from the charge of obscurity, alledging that the author's words are full, though not redundant; and concludes in commending it in the character of a short Synopsis, and in that view it has not wanted it's admirers. About the year 1710, Mr Jones (afterwards W. Jones, Esq;) published a Synopsis palmariorum mathezeos, in which he has even exceeded Mr Oughtred in the close package of his matter, how much soever he fell short in furnishing his cabinet with any new treasures of his own invention in the science. This gentleman used a commendable diligence in collecting and preserving all the remains of the most eminent English Mathematicians, and the letters cited in this article were had from his museum; where there was a copy of the Clavis with notes throughout, in the hand-writing of Mr John Greaves, Professor of Astronomy at Oxford.

direct demonstrations of those theorems. In this manner did Mr Oughtred break into the sublime Geometry, through a passage that had not been attempted by the Ancients. Indeed, the truth of his Postulatum tho' certain, yet is not so evident as to be free from exception. However, the tediousness of the indirect demonstrations of the Ancients set other eminent wits, about the same time, at work, to find out a method of passing from right to curve lines, in a more direct way. These openings by Cavallerio in the Method of Indivisibles, and Wallis, in his Arithmetica Infinitorum, our author saw, was exceedingly delighted with the prospect, and prayed heartily for the perfect discovery [M]; which was fully completed a few years after his death, by Sir Isaac

[M] These openings our author saw, and was exceedingly delighted with the prospect. We shall give an instance of this in these two letters, the first of which was wrote in answer to the following:

' To the Reverend, and my much honoured friend,
' Mr Ouredd.

' Sir,

' By the small, yet favourable conversation you have been pleased to bestow upon mee, I am encouraged to request as much more thereof as your other occasions and studyes of greater moment may (at least missively, if not personally) permit: And for an entrance into such intercourse, I make myselfe an object to your further courtesie, entreating that your exchange of a paper may return mee a relation of the most materiall uses, whereunto an exact quadrature of a circle is applicable; therewithall to refresh my late hard study and labour to attayne an ability to expose before the authority of your judgment an infallible demonstration thereof, when with conveniencie and privacy your desireable preference shall comfort and honour

' Your friend in assured affection,

London, Oct. 26, 1645.      ' And in submissive reverence,

' Servant,

' Robert Keylway.'

Mr Oughtred's answer.

' Worthy Sir,

' There was indeed left at my house a letter diverse dayes after the date thereof, but I neither knew by whom it was brought, neither was there any direction whether I should return my answer. Besides I have had shewd unto me diverse overtures, of such as have attempted that mystery of art, that have in tryal failed. And we know that Orontius and Joseph Scaliger, and Longomontanus, great masters in that science, have rather made demonstration of their heroicall endeavours, than of the conquest they proposed. And to say the truth, I have held the disquisition is infeasible, because although no doubt there may be a right line equal to a circle, yet they being heterogeneous, ther cannot in art be any due comparison between them; for comparatio is homogeneorum. We have out of Archimedes's grounds both by Van Ceulen, and his follower Willebrode Snellius, so nere an equation of a right line to a nicete, that if the whole universe were sand, there would not be the difference of one graine; and yet we cannot say the exact quadrature is by them delivered. Neyther will it serve to those yet undiscovered uses which the proper equation (such as I conceive it must be) will no doubt afford; as namely the mensuration of segments of circles, spheres, cylinders, and cones, with the frusta thereof; the solution of the problemes in the second book of Archimedes de sphaera & cylindra, which now are only solvable by cubical equations; the measuring of menisci and arbeli, and other figures composed eyther of right lines and circles, or of different circles; all which would be most excellent discoveries and plus ultras in art. And I should also thence expect a facill and ready way for the proportion of subtense in a circle to their circumferences. These and many other abuses adyta, hitherto almost despair'd of, may, I suppose, by your magisteriall invention, tanquam Mercurii caduceo, be set open. Sir, this is the effect of all I am able to answer to your desire, unless I more fully knew

VOL. V. No. CCLXXV.

' the manner of your way. I speake this the rather, and am induc'd to a better confidence of your performance, by reason of a new geometric-analytical art, or a practise found out by one Cavallerio an Italian, of which above three yeares since I received information by a letter from Paris, wherein was published only a small tast thereof, yet so that I divine great enlargement of the bounds of the mathematicall empire will ensue. I was then very desirous to see the author's owne booke, while my spirits were more free and lightsome, but I could not gett it in France. Since being more slept into yeares, daunted and broken with the sufferings of these disastrous times, I must content myself to keep home, and not put out to any forraign discoveries. Thus, with thankful acknowledgment of your so noble favour, to deigne me worthy the communication of such a secret, I rest ready to do you all service which may be within the power of

' Your humblest servant,

' The true honorer of your worth,

W. O.

The other letter to the same effect, was addressed to Mr [afterwards Dr] Wallis, upon occasion of his dedication to our author of his Arithmetica Infinitorum; dated July 19th, 1655.

' Most honored Sir,

' I have, with unspeakeable delight, soe farr as my necessary businesse, the infirmitie of my health, and the greatnesse of my age (approaching nowe to an end) would permit; perused your most learned papers, of several choice arguments which you sent me, wherein I do first with thankfullness acknowledge to God the Father of Lightes, the great light he hath given you, and next gratefully you even with admiration, the clearenesse and perspicuitie of your understanding and genius, who have not only gone, but also opened a way into those profoundest mysteries of art unknown, and not thought of by the Ancients. With which your mysterious affections, I am the more affected, because full twenty yeares agoe, the learned patron of learning Sir Charles Cavendish shewed me a paper written, wherein some few excellent new theoremes, wrought by the way, as I suppose, of Cavallerio; which I wrought over againe more agreeably to my way. The paper wherein I wrought it, I shewed to many, whereof some took copies; but my owne I cannot find. I mention it for this, because I sawe therein a light breaking out for the discovery of wonders, to be revealed to mankind in this last age of the world; which light I did salute as afarre off, and nowe at a nerer distance embrace in your prosperous beginnings. Sir, that you are pleased to mention my name in your never-dying papers, that is your noble favour to me, who can adde nothing to your glory, but only my applaude, and prayer that God by you will perfect these happy beginnings soe propitiously advanced to his glory; which is the hartly desire of

' Your loving friend,

' W. O.

It must be observed, that the dedication of the Arithmetica Infinitorum, was not only due to Mr Oughtred's superior merit in general, but Dr Wallis had some particular obligations to him on the subject of that treatise, as appears from the two following letters.

Isaac Newton, in the Method of Fluxions. Mr Oughtred died in 1660, about the time of the restoration of King Charles the Second [N], and was interred in the chancel of the church of Aldbury. Mr David Lloyd (q) gives us the following short character of him: That 'he was as facetious in Greek and Latin, as solid in Arithmetic, Geometry, and the Sphere of all Measures, Musick, &c. exact in his style as in his judgment; handling his tube and other instruments at eighty, as steadily as others did at thirty; owing this, as he said, to temperance and archery; principling his people with plain and solid truths, as he did the world with great and useful arts; advancing new inventions in all things but religion; which, in it's old order and decency, he maintained secure in his privacy, prudence, meekness, simplicity, resolution, patience, and contentment.' He had one son, whom he put apprentice to a watch-maker [O], and wrote a book of instructions in that art for his use; but we have not been able to learn any thing either of the name or family of his wife. He left behind him a great number of papers upon mathematical subjects, and in most of his Greek and Latin mathematical books there were found notes in his own hand-writing, with an abridgment of almost every proposition and demonstration in the margin (r). These books and manuscripts came into the hands of his friend Sir Charles Scarborough (s) the Physician, the latter were carefully looked over, and all that were found fit for the press were printed in one volume 8vo [P], at Oxford, 1676; under this title Gulielmi Oughtredi Etonensis quondam collegii Regalis in Cantabrigia Socii Opuscula Mathematica hactenus inedita. This collection contains the following pieces. I. Institutiones Mechanicæ. II. De variis corporum generibus gravitate & magnitudine comparatis. III. Automata. IV. Quæstiones Diophanti Alexandrini libri iii. V. De

To my much honoured friend Mr William Oughtred.

Sir,
I have herewith sent you a trifle of my own (an observation of a solar eclipse of last year) not worthy your acceptance; yet such as the respect which I owe you, commands me to present unto you, having nothing better to render; and to assure you, that

I am,

Sir,

Oxford, Feb. 5th, 1654-5.

Yours in all observance

John Wallis.

Sir, if your occasions may permit, I should most earnestly desire your help in the solution of the problem insuing; which, if not from yourself, I know not whence to expect. The use which I shall be able to make of it, will be worth some pains; which makes me the more bold to trouble you with it, and crave your pardon for that presumption.

Sir,
In that of mine to you, sent together with an account of an eclipse observed at Oxford last summer (which I hope is come to your hands) I made bold to propose a problem which then came newly to my mind (though that in order to which I proposed it, had been longer thought of) which, as I remember, was to this purpose. . . . Wherein if you can do mee the favour to help mee out, it will be a very great satisfaction to mee; and, if I don't delude myself, of more use, than at first view it may seem to bee. Sir, I doubt I presume too much upon your goodness in offering you this trouble, wherein I must crave your pardon. If your occasions will permit you to bestow some thoughts thereon, you will thereby very much oblige,

Sir,

Your very affectionate friend,

[N] Died in 1660, about the time of the Restoration of King Charles the Second ] Collier, in his Dictionary, tells us, that Mr Oughtred died about the beginning of May, 1660; for, that upon hearing the news of the vote at Westminster, which passed May 1. for the restoration of King Charles the Second, he expired in a sudden extasy of joy. But Mr David Lloyd in his Memoirs asserts, that our author, having a strong persuasion upon principles of art, much confirmed by the scheme, of his Majesty's return in 1660 (sent his Majesty some years before by the Bishop of Avignon), that he should see the King restored, he saw it to his incredible joy, and had his dimittis a month after, viz. June 30, 1660, and in the 86th year of his age (13). Mr Aubrey's account in his Natural History and Antiquities of Surrey, differs from both the former: He tells us that Mr Oughtred was interred in the chancel of the church of Aldbury June 15th, 1660; anno ætatis 88 and odd days.

[O] One son which he put apprentice to a watch-maker. In 1675, there was printed at London, in 8vo. a treatise intitled Horological Dialogues by Mr John Smith; to which is added an appendix, where-in is contained a method of calculating all numbers for watches, written originally by that famous mathematician, Mr William Oughtred, and now made publick by J. S. of London, Clock-maker. In the preface Mr Smith says, that 'the method following was many years since compiled by Mr Oughtred, for the use of some ingenious gentlemen his friends, who for recreation at the university, studied to find out the reason and knowledge of watch-work; which seemed also to be a thing with which Mr Oughtred himself was much affected, as may in some part appear by his putting out his son to the same trade, for whose use, as I am informed, he did compile a larger tract.'

[P] All that were fit for the press, were printed in one volume, 8vo.] In the preface to this collection, the editors write thus. 'Cum incidimus in manuscrip-ta exemplaria Cl. Oughtredi visum sumus tyronibus non inutilem operam nec in mathesti magis exercitatis ingratum præstituti, si ex iis nonnulla typis mandaremus. Quapropter cum alia essent inutilia, alia prelo haud ita idonea,

(13) Mr Lloyd's account of our author's age is plainly no more than a hear-say story, and therefore what he advances of Mr Oughtred's giving into the astrological humour of those times, is probably grounded upon no better authority than the friendship already mentioned to be shewn to him by Lilye the Astrologer.

OUTRAM, or OWTRAM [WILLIAM], a very learned Engliſh Divine in the XVIIth century, was born in Derbyſhire, in the year 1625 (a). About the year 1641, he was admitted into Trinity-college in Cambridge, where he took the Degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1645; and, by his Epitaph, ſeems to have been Fellow of that college, as he was afterwards of Chriſt's [A]. In this laſt he took the Degree of Maſter of Arts in 1649, and that of Doctör in Divinity in 1660 (b). His firſt preferment was in Lincolnſhire (c); afterwards he became Rector of St Mary Woolnoth in London, which he reſigned in 1666 (d). On the 30th of July, 1669, he was inſtalled Archdeacon of Leiceſter, having been collated thereto by Dr William Fuller, Biſhop of Lincoln (e). The 30th of July, 1670, he was alſo inſtalled Prebendary of Weſtmiſter (f); and was ſome time Rector, or Miniſter, of St Margaret's, Weſtmiſter (g). He was an accompliſhed Divine in all reſpects; a nervous and accurate writer; and a great maſter of the oriental and other learned languages, as appears by his excellent book Of Sacrifices [B]. He was a conſtant and a very good preacher (b); and twenty Sermons of his were publiſhed after his deceaſe [C]. He dyed Auguſt 23d, 1679, aged 54, and was buried in Weſtmiſter-abbey, where a Monument was erected to his memory (i) [D]. His character, as drawn up by Dr Gardiner, is given below in the note [E].

[A] And, by his Epitaph, ſeems to have been Fellow of that college, as he was afterwards of Chriſt's.] The words of the Epitaph are.—Coll. apud Cantab. S. & individ. Trinitatis & Chriſti ſocius.

[B] By his excellent book Of Sacrifices.] The title of it, is De Sacrificiis Libri duo; quorum altero explicantur omnia judeorum, nonnulla Gentium profanarum Sacrificia; altero Sacrificium Chriſti. Utroque Ecclēſiæ Catholicæ hiſ de rebus Sententia contra Faufum Socinum, eſque ſeſtatores defenditur. London, 1677. 4to. It is divided into two books: In the firſt whereof, he treats, Of the Origin of Sacrifices; of the places for ſacrificing, and of the Tabernacle and Temple of the Jews; Of the firſt Prieſts, and of the ſeveral Jewiſh Prieſts. [—Under which he obſerves, that the prieſthood among theſe was hereditary; and, that Moſes having conſecrated Aaron's ſons, their deſcendants were not conſecrated or anointed. The ſame cuſtom, he adds, prevailed among their Kings: for the heads only of the reſpective families that ſat on the Jewiſh throne, or of whoſe ſucceſſion there was any doubt, were anointed.—] Next, he treats at large of the Jewiſh Sacrifices, and of the ſeveral cuſtoms and circumſtances attending them: Then of vicarious puniſhment, and of peculiar or expiatory Sacrifices, in oppoſition to the Socinians notion of them. In the ſecond book, he treats of the Prieſthood of Chriſt; which he affirms to be according to the order of Melchizedek; and of Chriſt's conſecration thereto. Then he proves, that Chriſt is a Prieſt properly ſo called: That his ſacrifice is an expiatory ſacrifice, which takes away the ſins of mankind: That his death is a vicarious puniſhment, or, that he ſuffered for, and in the ſtead of, ſinful men. Laſtly, he treats of Chriſt's Oblation of himſelf in heaven; and of his Interceſſion there, as our Mediator.

[C] And twenty ſermons of his were publiſhed after his deceaſe.] He could never be prevailed upon, either by the Intreaty of his Friends, or the Authority of his ſuperiours, (though very much urged by both) to publiſh any of his Sermons in print. But, not many months after his deceaſe, a forward bookſeller publiſhed Six Sermons under his name; pretending, that they had been taken many years ſince from the Author's mouth in ſhort hand. In order therefore to do right to his memory, his relations cauſed Twenty Sermons of his to be publiſhed from the Author's own Copies, by the Reverend Dr James Gardiner afterwards Biſhop of Lincoln; a ſecond edition of which came out in 1697. 8vo. O W E N [JOHN], one of our most noted English Epigrammatists, was born at Armon in Caernarvanshire; and educated at Wykeham's school near Winchester, under Dr Thomas Bilson. In 1584, after two years probation, he was admitted perpetual Fellow of New-college in Oxford (a): and, May the 2d 1590, took the degree of Bachelor of Law (b). But, quitting his Fellowship the year following, he went and taught school at Trylegh near Monmouth. About the year 1594, he became Master of the free-school at Warwick, founded by King Henry the Eighth; in which station he distinguished himself by his perfect knowledge in the Latin tongue, especially by his poetical genius. But it was in that kind of poetical wit, which by the best Critics is called false wit [A], namely Points and Epigrams; though too much adopted in our largest and most famous schools. In one respect he was a true Poet, namely, he was always Poor: But he met with a kind Patron, in his countryman and relation Dr John Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, and Lord-Keeper of the great Seal, who chiefly supported him. He had great expectations from an uncle: unluckily for him, that uncle being a Papist, or at least Popishly affected, took offence at some verses of his against Popery [B], and struck him out of his will. For the same reason, his Books were put into the Romish Index Expurgatorius. His Epigrams are divided into Twelve Books, and were published at several times [C]. They were in general so well liked, that most of them have been translated more than once into English [D]. He dyed in 1622, and was buried in St Paul's Cathedral, London, at the charge of Bishop Williams abovementioned: who caused a monument to be erected to his memory, on a pillar next to the confistory-stairs, with his effigies, a shoulder-piece in brass, crowned with laurel (c); and an Epitaph as set down below (d) [E]. Several of his contemporaries bestowed the highest encomiums upon him, as appears by their verses prefixed to most editions of his Epigrams.

[A] Which by the best Critics is called false wit.]

The true nature of Wit hath been so accurately explained by the most ingenious Mr Addison, that it is sufficient to refer to his excellent Papers on that subject, in the Spectator (1). He doth not indeed mention himself the Epigram, among the species of False Wit; but he shews sufficiently his opinion of it, by quoting the following passage from Mr Dryden (2). 'Segrais has distinguished the Readers of Poetry, according to their capacity of Judging, into three classes. In the lowest form he places those whom he calls Les Petits Esprits (3), such things as are our upper-gallery-Audience in a play-house; who like nothing but the Husk and Rind of Wit, prefer a Quibble, a Conceit, an Epigram, before solid sense and elegant expression: These are Mob-readers. If Virgil and Martial stood for Parliament-men, we know already who would carry it. But though they make the greatest appearance in the field, and cry the loudest, the best on't is they are but a sort of French Huguenots, or Dutch Boors, brought over in herds but not naturalized; who have not lands of two pounds per annum in Parnassus, and therefore are not privileged to poll.' In another place, Mr Dryden doth yet more fully manifest his contempt for Epigrams, when he uses these words (4). 'from Virgil to Owen's Epigrams. . . . that is from the top to the bottom of all Poetry.' The learned Father Rapin entertains the same opinion of that kind of Poetry. 'L'Epigramme, says he, est de tous les ouvrages de Vers que l'Antiquité ait produit le moins considerable: elle ne laisse pas d'avoir sa beauté. Cette beauté consiste ou dans un tour delicat, ou dans un mot heureux. — C'est une des espèces de Vers ou l'on réussit peu: car c'est un coup de bonheur que d'y réussir. Une Epigramme vaut peu de chose: quand elle n'est pas admirable, & il est si rare d'en faire d'admirables, que c'est assez d'en avoir fait une en sa vie (5).' i. e. The Epigram is, of all the pieces of Poetry produced by the Ancients, the most inconsiderable. It hath notwithstanding its beauty. And that beauty consists either in a delicate turn, or a lucky expression. — 'Tis one of those kinds of Verse, which few succeed in: for it is a lucky hit to succeed in it. An Epigram is despicable, when it is not Excellent. And it is so uncommon a thing to make excellent ones, that it is sufficient if a man hath made One good one in his whole life.

[B] Took offence at some Verses of his against Popery.] Many of that kind are scattered about the book, the most noted of which is this.

An Petrus fuerit Romæ, sub judice lis est;
Simonem Romæ nemo fuisse negat.

i. e. Whether St Peter was ever at Rome, is a disputed point: That Simon [by which he means Simon Magus, the inventor of Simony] was there, no body denies.

[C] And were published at several times.] The three first Books were published at London, in 1606. 8vo. and the remainder at four different times (6).

[D] Most of them have been translated more than once into English.] John Vicars, Usher of the School in Christ's hospital London, having selected several of the best, translated them into English verse, and had them printed at London in 1619. 8vo. — Thomas Pecke of the Middle Temple Gent. translated also 600. of them into English verse, which were printed with Martial De Spectaculis, or of the Rarities to be seen in Rome, and with the most select Epigrams of Sir Thomas More: To which is annexed a Century of Heroick Epigrams &c. All published, under the general title of Parnassi puerperium. London 1659. 8vo. Thomas Harvey englished likewise all or most of them (7). A Spanish translation of them was printed at Madrid, in 1674, and 1682, two volumes 4to. and a French one at Paris, in 1709, 12mo.

[E] And an Epitaph.] Which Epitaph is in these words.

Parva tibi statua est, quia parva tibi statua, supellex
Parva, volat parvus magna per ora liber.
Sed non parvus honos, non parva est gloria, quippe
Ingenio haud quicquam est majus in orbe tuo.
Parva domus texit, templum sed grande; Poetæ
Tum verè vitam, quum moriuntur, agunt.

i. e. Thou hast a little statue, because thy stature was little, thy furniture little, and thy little book is in every one's mouth. But thy honor is not little, nor thy glory, for there is nothing greater in the world than thy wit. A little house covered thee, but now a great Temple; Poet. truly live, when they dye. C

OWEN [Dr JOHN], a learned Divine among the Independents (a), was of Welsh extraction [A], and second son of Mr Henry Owen, who, after an academical education at Oxford, first taught school at Stoken-church, and became at length Vicar of Hadham near Watlington in that county, where our author was born in 1616 (b). Being a boy of an extraordinary genius, his friends resolved to give him a liberal education; and in that view, putting him under the care of that celebrated schoolmaster, Mr Edward Sylvester, at Oxford (c), he made so quick a proficiency, that he was admitted into Queen's college in that university in 1628, at about twelve years of age. His father having a large family, could not afford him any considerable maintenance; but he was liberally supplied by an uncle, one of his father's brothers, a gentleman of a fair estate in Wales; who having no children of his own, designed to make him his heir. Thus supported, he pursued his studies with incredible diligence, allowing himself for several years not above four hours sleep in a night; so that, by the additional help of the directions and assistance of the famous Dr Barlow, who was his tutor, he made a considerable progress in the academical learning. At the same time he took care of his health, by using such recreations occasionally, as were proper for a robust constitution as his was; such as leaping, throwing a bar, ringing of bells, and the like hardy exercises. He did not want ambition; and the prospect of his uncle's estate raised his views even to some eminence in Church or State, to either of which he was yet indifferent (d). He took his first degree in Arts June 11, 1632, and commenced Master on the 27th of June, 1635 (e); but being soon after dissatisfied with the new regulations, enjoined the university by the statutes of Archbishop Laud their Chancellor*, he refused to comply thereto. This being observed, his friends forsook him, as infected with Puritanism (f); and, from the resentment of the Laudian party, his situation in the college became by degrees so uneasy, that he was forced to leave it in 1637. This blow, which, indeed, seems to have wanted nothing but the form of an expulsion, was esteemed a suffering for conscience sake; and in that temper he gave way to some unfavourable thoughts of the Church establishment (g). However, his uncle's supplies being discontinued, something was to be done for a support. He therefore took Priests-Orders from the Bishop of the Diocese, and was made Chaplain to Sir Robert Dormer, of Ascot in the parish of Great Milton, near the place of his nativity, being tutor also to that gentleman's eldest son. He afterwards became Chaplain to John Lord Lovelace, of Hurley in Berkshire, and was in that service at the breaking out of the civil wars, when he openly avowed the cause of the Parliament (h). This conduct was so vehemently resented by his uncle, a zealous Royalist, who had maintained him at the college, that he absolutely discarded him, settled his estate upon another, and died without leaving him any thing. Lord Lovelace, however, though siding with the King, yet continued to use his Chaplain with great civility; but going at length to the King's army, Mr Owen left his house, and coming to London, took lodgings in Charter-house-yard, where he was a perfect stranger, and shortly became a perfect convert to the principles of the Nonconformists (i). Not long after this, and while he continued at the Charter-house, he wrote his book, called A Display of Arminianism. The subject was artfully chosen, and the piece coming out in 1642, met with such an acceptance as made way for his advancement: The committee for purging the Church of scandalous ministers paid such a regard to it, that Mr White their chairman soon after sent a special messenger to our author, with a presentation to the living of Fordham in Essex; and he had not long exercised his ministry here, when he married a gentlewoman, in whom he was very happy (k), and she brought him several children (l); but the doctor outlived them all. He had been at Fordham about a year and a half, when, upon a report that the sequestered incumbent was dead, the patron, who had no kindness for Mr Owen, presented another to the living. But care was taken to provide a residence for our author in the same neighbourhood. The Earl of Warwick being patron of the church of Coggeshall, a market-town about five miles distance, very readily gave him that living. Hitherto he had followed the Presbyterian way; but he had not been long at Coggeshall, when he declared on the side of Independency (m), and he formed a church at Coggeshall upon the congregational principles, according to his own light, which continued long a flourishing church, and subsisted in a good condition so lately as the year 1721. But this change, as might be expected, was ill relished by several of the Presbyterian ministers, one of whom particularly reproached

(l) Quatuor uxoribus indolis optimæ. i. e. Four, and those very hopeful ones. Ibid.

(m) He published a Defence of this change in two 4to. volumes. See an Enquiry into Evangelical Churches, 1681. and True Nature of Gospel Churches, 1689.

[A] He was of Welsh extraction] His pedigree is derived from Lewis Owen of Kwyn near Dolgelleg, Esq; who was lineally descended from a younger son of Kewelyn ap Gwrgan, Prince of Glamorgan, Lord of Cardiffe, the last family of the five regal tribes of Wales (1). This gentleman inherited an estate of about 300 pounds per annum, was Vice chamberlain and Baron of the Exchequer in North Wales about the middle of the reign of Henry the Eighth, and continued so through the reigns of Edward the Sixth and Queen Mary, till the 8th of Queen Elizabeth. He was High-Sheriff of Merionethshire, and in his return from Montgomery-affizes, fell in among some outlaws, being several brothers, called the Gwillird Cochion, i. e. the Red-Crofs, at a place called Dugod near Mowthwy, and was shot through the head with an arrow. A plain cross was erected to his memory upon the place, of which no remains are now to be seen, only the gate which the assassins had blocked up to obstruct his passage, is to this day called Llidiart Croes y Baron, i. e. The gate of Baron's Crofs. Griffith, the fifth son of this gentleman, had a daughter Susan, who marrying Humphrey of the same family in another line, had fifteen sons, the youngest of which, Henry, was father to John, the subject of this article.

(n) Viz. Mr Dean Cawdry, Minister of Billing in Northamptonshire, with whom our author had a dispute upon schism.

(o) However, he could not forbear to use virulent expressions against the Presbyterians. In the preface he says, I desire to provoke none; more sings than combs are got of a nest of wasps, &c.

(p) These two sermons were printed under the title of Ebeneszer, &c. sermon 30. in the collection published in 1721.

(q) Thus says the writer of his Life, p. viii. but Mr Wood tells us, that it was burnt, together with the dedication, in the schools quadrangle at Oxford by order of the Convocation, July 21, 1683.

• The whole tenour of these discourses are a conspicuous proof of the truth of Mr Wood's remark, that he had a wonderful knack of making the then transactions of the three kingdoms to be an edifying comment on Daniel and the Revelations.

(r) His text was Rom. iv. 20. He staggered not at the promise of God through unbelief, &c. There are several sermons on this text, intitled, The Strength of Faith, added in the last mentioned Collection, which complete the Doctor's design upon this subject.

reproached him very rudely for it, which was answered in a much handfomer manner (n). His fame began now to spread through the city and country; and the Independent party prevailing, he was sent for to preach before the Parliament on one of their fast days, April 29, 1646. He printed this sermon under the title of A Vision of unchangeable Free Mercy, in sending the means of Grace to undeserving Sinners [B]; and having therein stirred up his audience to compleat the establishment of Independency, he annexed to it An Essay for the Praefice of Church-Government in the Country, pleading for liberty of conscience, and moderation towards persons of different persuasions (o). When Colchester was besieged in 1648, Fairfax quartering some days at Coggeshall, became acquainted with our minister; and, upon the surrendering of the town to the Parliament's forces, he preached the thanksgiving sermon there on that occasion, as he did another at Rumford, for the deliverance of the committee who had been imprisoned (p). He was again required to preach before the House of Commons, January 31, 1648-9, the next day after the death of King Charles. His text was Jer. xv. 19, 20. the conduct of which discourse deserves to be recorded as a perpetual monument of his address and skill in Court sermons. He appeared before a numerous assembly; it was a critical juncture, and he was not ignorant of the temper of his principal hearers; he was then a rising man, and to justify the late action was the infallible road to preferment; but he managed it so artfully, that neither could his friends make any just exception, nor his enemies take advantage of his words another day (q). He was ordered again to preach before them, April 19, 1649, when he gave so great satisfaction, that he was afterwards frequently called to the like service*; particularly February 28th that year, being the day of humiliation and prayer on occasion of the intended expedition to Ireland (r). Cromwell, who had never heard Mr Owen preach before, was present at this discourse, and was extremely pleased with it. Our preacher designed to go to his cure at Coggeshall within two days, but thought himself obliged to make his compliments to Fairfax. While he was waiting for admission, in comes Cromwell, who at sight of him came up directly to him, and laying his hands in a familiar way on his shoulder, said, Sir, you are the person that I must be acquainted with. Mr Owen modestly replied, That will be much more to my advantage than your's. We shall soon see that, says Cromwell; and taking him by the hand, led him into Fairfax's garden, and from that time contracted an intimate friendship with him, which lasted as long as Oliver's life. At present, acquainting him with the intended expedition into Ireland, he desired his company to reside there in the college at Dublin; and Mr Owen objecting his charge at Coggeshall, Oliver wrote to that church for their leave. Accordingly he went to Dublin, not with the army, but more privately, and on his arrival took up his lodgings in the college, preaching there, and overseeing the affairs of that eminent school of learning. Here he staid half a year, and then returned by Cromwell's leave to England, and went to Coggeshall. He had scarce time to breathe here, before he was called to preach at Whitehall; and, on the seventeenth of September, 1650, Cromwell, now become General, procured an order of Parliament for Mr Owen to go into Scotland*. He staid at Edinburgh about half a year, and then returned once more to his congregation at Coggeshall; but this was the last visit he made there, and it happened to be a very short one: for he was promoted to the Deanery of Christ-Church in Oxford, by an order of Parliament on the 18th of March this year. The first intelligence he had of it was by one of the weekly news-papers, where he read, The House taking into consideration the worth and usefulness of Mr John Owen, Student of Queen's-college, Master of Arts, has ordered that he be settled in the Deanery of Christ's-college in Oxford, in the room of &c. and soon after he received a letter from the principal students of that college, signifying their great satisfaction in the choice made of him by the Parliament, and desiring his presence among them (s). With the consent of his church he went to Oxford, and settled there in 1651. Cromwell was now their Chancellor; and, on the ninth of September the following year, 1652, he nominated our Dean his Vice-chancellor, and he was soon after appointed one of the Visitors of the University; and being not yet returned from Scotland, he likewise constituted his Vice-chancellor, together with Dr Wilkins, Warden of Wadham-college; Dr Goddard, Warden of Merton; Dr Goodwin, President of Magdalen; and Peter French,

[B] He published his sermon, entitled, A Vision of Free Mercy, &c. This was the first time of his appearance in the pulpit before that assembly, and he published it with the following dedication in elegant Latin: *Amplissimo Senatui in christifimo pop. Anglicani conventui, ob prisca Anglo-Britannorum jura strenue & fideliter asserta; libertatem patriam (nefariis quorundam molitionibus pœne pessundatam) recuperatam; justitiam fortiter restitutam, et pœnitentiam, administratam; apud in ecclesiasticis divitesque populi dissolutam, ritus pontificios, novitios, antichristianos abolitos; privilegia plebis Christianæ postliminio restituta; potissimum protectionem Dei O. Here he compliments them for asserting the rights, and recovering the liberty, of their country; for their impartial administration of justice; for abolishing the ecclesiastical hierarchy, and restoring the privileges of the Christian people; and chiefly on having obtained the divine protection in all their proceedings. Topics which were the common theme of the sectaries in those times, but by none cooked up in such a masterly elegance of Latin style.

French, Canon of Christ-Church; his Commissioners or Delegates during his absence (1). By this office he had it in his power to shew his dislike to the habits and other forms required by the Laudensian statutes in a more effectual manner, without hurting himself; and he exerted himself to the utmost of that power; but therein he was now opposed by the Presbyterians [C]. He was created Doctor of Divinity by diploma, December 3, 1653 (u), and on the tenth was presented to the Parliament, with several others, to be sent Commissioners, by three in a circuit, for ejecting and settling ministers according to some rules then prescribed; but that project not taking effect, Commissioners were appointed by Cromwell for approbation of publick preachers, whereof our Dean was one of the chiefs; and in the following year, the commission being issued for ejecting scandalous, &c. ministers and schoolmasters, he was appointed, among others, a Commissioner for the county of Oxford (w). In the Protector's Parliament, which met September 3, 1654, our Vice-chancellor offered himself a candidate for the university, and, to remove the objection of his being a Divine, 'tis said he renounced his Orders, and pleaded that he was a meer layman. Accordingly he was returned, but his election being questioned by the Committee of Elections, he sat only a short time in the House (x). He was continued in the post of Vice-chancellor for five years*; and, notwithstanding the many avocations occasioned by that as well as his other offices just mentioned, he found time to prosecute his studies; and besides preaching every other Sunday at St Mary's, and often at Stadham and other places in the country (y), he wrote some excellent books, as will be seen presently by the list of his Works. Richard Cromwell succeeding his father as Chancellor in 1657, our author was removed from the Vice-chancellorship, as he was also from Richard's favour, when he became Protector upon the death of Oliver [D] the following year. This blow came from the Presbyterians, who also procured him to be excluded from St. Mary's pulpit (z); which was resented by him with so much indignation, that he set up a lecture in another church, saying, I have built seats at Mary's, but let the Doctors find auditors, for I will preach at Peter's in the East; and so he did, and great numbers flocked to him (aa). In the mean time, he was one of the oracles of that assembly of the Independent faction, which met in October this year, 1658, at the Savoy, and had a principal share in drawing up a Confession of their Faith and Order, in opposition to the Presbyterians [E]. But all these contests beginning to vanish, at the dawn of the Restoration

[C] He was opposed by the Presbyterians. Mr Wood tells us, that he dressed himself in quipro, like a young scholar, with powdered hair, snakebone band-strings, or band-strings with very large tassels, lawn band, a large set of ribbons pointed at his knees, and Spanish leather boots, with large lawn tops, and his hat mostly cocked (2). This was apparently done in despite to the Presbyterian party. However, he would not suffer authority to be slighted when there was occasion to exert it. For instance, at an act before the Terræ Filius begun, the doctor stood up, and told him in Latin, he should have liberty to say what he pleased, provided he would avoid profaneness and obscenity, and personal reflections. The Terræ Filius began, and soon transgressed in all these particulars. Upon which the doctor having several times desired him to forbear, to no purpose, at length sent the beadles to pull him down; and when the scholars hindered them, the doctor resolved to pull him down himself. His friends dissuaded him, apprehending the scholars might do him some mischief; but he replied, I will not see authority thus trampled on, and pulling him down, sent him to bocardo*, the scholars standing at a distance, amazed to see his courage and resolution (3). Nor was he less careful of the discipline. Once attending, as is usual, the publick disputations in Lent, observing a scholar of Queen's-college to perform his part excellently well, he called him, and finding his circumstances to be mean, he gave him forty shillings to encourage him in his studies, and he afterwards made a very considerable figure in the world, frequently mentioning the doctor's kindness with gratitude. He also took some poor scholars into his family, and maintained them at his own charge; and one of these was tutor to his children, who afterwards became an excellent schoolmaster (4). In justice to our Vice-chancellor, it must be also observed, as an instance of his moderation, that though he was often urged to it, yet he never molested the meeting of the Royalists at the house of Dr Willis the Physician, where divine service was performed according to the liturgy of the Church of England ||, not far from our Vice-chancellor's lodgings at Christ-Church (5). In his office also of Commissioner for ejecting scandalous ministers, he frequently over-ruled his brethren in favour of such Royalists as eminently deserved it †.

[D] Upon Oliver's death. The doctor's behaviour on this occasion is utterly inexcusable, if we may believe Bishop Burnet, who tells us that Dr [afterwards Archbishop] Tillotson, happening to be at Whitehall on a fast day of the household, about a week after Oliver's death, he went out of curiosity into the presence-chamber, where the solemnity was kept; and saw there on one side of the table the new Protector, placed with the rest of his family, and on the other six preachers, among whom were Dr John Owen, Dean of Christ-Church in Oxford; Dr Tho. Goodwin, President of Magdalen-college; Mr Jos. Caryl, and Peter Sterry; with whose sallies of enthusiasm Tillotson was much disgusted; God being in a manner reproached with the late Protector's services, and challenged for taking him away so soon. Dr Goodwin, who had pretended to assure them in a prayer a very few minutes before he expired, that he was not to die, had now the confidence to say to God, 'Thou hast deceived us, and we are deceived.' And Mr Sterry praying for Richard, used these indecent words next to blasphemy, 'Make him the brightness of the father's glory, and the express image of his person (6)'. As no particular expression of Dr Owen's is mentioned, it is probable nothing equal to them escaped from him at this time; however, what is here asserted in general of his boldness, will not want credit, after the perusal of his sermon on the death of Ireton, whom he canonizes for a saint, and sets him upon a level with the Prophet Daniel (7).

[E] He had a hand in penning the Confession of Faith at the Savoy. Mr Baxter mentioning this Savoy confession, writes as follows: 'The Independents gathered a synod at the Savoy, and there, among their articles of faith, laid down two points expressly contrary to Scripture. 1. That is it not faith but Christ's righteousness that we are justified by, whereas it is both. 2. That Christ's righteousness imputed is our sole righteousness. I asked some yet living, why they consented to these, and they said it was Dr Owen's doing (8)'. But he is cleared from this aspersions, by a certificate signed by George Griffith, who was scribe to that assembly (9). The method of proceeding there was thus: There was a committee of such as were judged most eminent, viz. Dr Tho. Goodwin, Mr Phil. Nye, Mr Will. Bridge of Yarmouth, Dr Owen then

(bb) His Life, p. xxix. Hereupon it was reported, that he was in pension to serve the papal interest, against which he censured himself in the preface to his first part of his Enquiry into the Original of Evangelical Churches.

Restoration in 1659, he was ejected from his Deanery in the latter end of that year (bb). However, he had taken care to provide himself a comfortable retreat at Stadham, having a little before purchased a good estate with a handsome house upon it (cc). To this he retired, and held a meeting in private, where he preached, and many of his disciples went from Oxford to hear him; 'till, being several times silenced by some soldiers of the militia, and sorely threatned, that congregation was broke, and our teacher obliged to move from place to place, 'till at length he went to London (dd). All this time he was not idle, but employed his talents in preaching as he had opportunity, and he also wrote several valuable and useful books. One of these (ee) coming to the hands of Lord Chancellor Clarendon, he was so much pleased with it, that he sent for him by Sir Bulstrode Whitelocke, and acknowledging the service done to the Protestant religion by this book, assured him that he had deserved the best of any English Protestant of late years, and made him an offer to prefer him in the Church, if he would conform; but the doctor refusing that condition, persisted in the practice of holding conventicles. In which, however, he met with so much trouble, that he had some thoughts of going to New-England, having received an invitation from his brethren there; and in 1665 he made preparations for the voyage. But the plague breaking out this year, and the fire of London happening in the next, the publick attention was so wholly engaged by these dreadful calamities, that the laws against the Dissenters were suffered to sleep for some time; and not long after came out the royal indulgence, and licences were granted to all that desired them for publick assemblies, all penal laws being suspended. Whilst the liberty continued, our doctor was assiduous in preaching, and many persons of quality and eminent citizens resorted to him. But upon the proclamation for suppressing unlawful conventicles, March 10, 1667, the doctor went to visit his old friends at Oxford, and to attend some affairs of his own estate not far from thence. At the same time he did not forbear to exercise his function in preaching to some of his party, which was not managed so privately as to escape being observed; and, upon intelligence of the house where he lay, some troopers of the militia came, and knocking at the door, the mistress of the house boldly opened it, and prevented them, by asking if they sought for Dr Owen; to which being answered they did, she told them he went from her house that morning betimes: upon which they immediately rode off. In the mean time the doctor, who she thought had been gone, as he told her he intended, rose out of bed, and taking horse in a field near the house, rode straight to London. Fresh invitations were now given him to go to New-England, but he did not think proper to leave his native country (ff), where he still continued to employ the press, which produced several more valuable books of his writing both learned and practical. In 1671, when the bill to prevent and suppress seditious conventicles was depending before the Lords, our author was desired to draw up some reasons against it, and the paper was laid before the Lords by several eminent citizens and gentlemen of distinction (gg); but the act passed, all the Bishops being for it except two, viz. Wilkins of Chester, and Rainbow of Carlisle. However, the doctor's moderation and learning drew the admiration and respect of several persons of honour and quality upon him, who very much delighted in his conversation; particularly the Earls of Orrery and Anglesey, the Lords Willoughby of Parham and Berkeley, and Sir John Trevor, one of the Principal Secretaries of State; and, what is much more, even King Charles himself and the Duke of York paid a particular respect to him. When the doctor was drinking the waters at Tunbridge, the Duke of York being there, sent for him into his tent, and several discourses passed between them about conventicles and the dissenters; and, after his return to London, the King sent for him, and discoursed with him about two hours together, assuring him of his favour and respect, and telling him he might have access to him as often as he would. At the same time his Majesty was pleased to assure the doctor, how much he was for liberty of conscience, and how sensible of the wrong that had been done to Dissenters; and as a testimony thereof, gave him a thousand guineas to distribute among those who had suffered most by the late severities. The doctor could do no less than accept the royal bounty with thanks, and he faithfully applied it to that purpose (bb). The Doctor had some friends also among the Bishops, particularly Dr Wilkins of Chester, and Barlow of Lincoln*, formerly his tutor [F]. It is not to be wondered, that a life filled up with so many then of Oxford, Mr Jos. Caryl, and Mr Will. Greenhill, who drew up the heads of the Confession. The synod, which consisted of about two hundred pastors and messengers of churches, being in the interim employed in hearing and determining such causes as were laid before them. The particular heads of the confession considered and agreed upon by the committee, were every day brought into the assembly, and read by Mr G. Griffith. This Confession was soon after printed and published, and translated into Latin by Hoornbeck (10), and by others into several other languages (11).

[F] Bishop Barlow was his friend ] Yet we are told, that he failed him upon a special occasion. The case was this: John Bunyan [author of the Pilgrim's Progress] had been confined to a jail twelve years, upon an excommunication for nonconformity; now there was a law, that if any two persons will go to the Bishop of the diocese, and offer a cautionary bond, that the prisoner shall conform in half a year, the Bishop may release him. Dr Owen being desired to give his bond in Bunyan's behalf, readily consented; which being carried to the Bishop, his Lordship professed he was ready even to strain a point for the doctor, but that this being a new thing, he desired time to consider of it. Being waited on again about a fortnight after, he said, that indeed he was informed he might do it; but the law providing, in case the Bishop refused, applica-

many labours should decline under the weight of infirmities, which now began to grow upon him. Some few years before he died, he was often ill, and sometimes kept his bed and chamber; yet, whenever he was able to sit up, he would be continually writing, when not prevented by company. But his infirmities growing upon him, he went to Kensington for the benefit of the air, and lived there some time [G]. From thence he removed to Ealing, to a house of his own, where he finished his course, on the 24th of August, 1683, in the 67th year of his age. From Ealing his corpse was carried to the burying-ground in Bunhill-fields, the hearse being attended with a great number of noblemen and gentlemen's coaches, with six horses each, and many gentlemen on horseback (ii). He was interred in a new vault towards the east end of that burying-place, over which was erected an altar-monument of free-stone, with an epitaph in Latin composed by Mr Tho. Gilbert (kk) of Oxford, which with two others is annexed to the Memoirs of his Life. He left behind him a mournful widow, who had been married to him about seven years, a gentlewoman of a considerable family, being daughter (ll) of — Michell, Esq; of Kingston-Ruffell in Dorsetshire, and widow of Thomas Doyley his neighbour, younger brother of Sir John Doyley, of Chesilhampton near Stadham, Bart. She was a person of very good sense and judgment, truly religious, and very tender and affectionate to the doctor. She survived him many years, and was interred in the same vault which she had erected for him (mm). As to his person, his stature was tall, his countenance grave and majestic, and withal comely; he had the aspect and deportment of a gentleman, suitable to his birth. His character is represented very differently, according to the affections of the designer (nn). Mr Wood, after having not spared his conduct in many respects, declares as of his own knowledge, that, to speak impartially, he was a person well skilled in the tongues, Rabbinical learning, and Jewish rites and customs; that he had a great command of his English pen, and was one of the most genteel and fairest writers who have appeared against the Church of England*. That his person was proper and comely, and he had a very graceful address in the pulpit, an eloquent elocution, a winning and insinuating deportment, and could by his oratory, in conjunction with some other outward advantages, move and wind the affections of his admiring auditory almost as he pleased (oo). And the writer of his life observes, that in his manners he was very affable, and courteous, familiar and sociable, and that the meanest persons found an easy access to his converse and friendship; jesting with his acquaintance, but with sobriety and measure; a great master of his passions, especially that of anger. He was, continues this writer, of a serene and even temper; his carriage was genteel, in nothing mean. He was generous in his favours. He kept a correspondence with several learned foreigners, and particularly the famous Anna-Maria Schurman †. He was well acquainted with men and things, and would give a shrewd guess at a man's temper and designs upon the first acquaintance. He could on all occasions, without any premeditation, express himself well and pertinently on any subject. He was a faithful and loving husband, a tender father, a good master, a prudent governour, and a very dutiful peaceable subject. His character as to learning, as before by Wood, so by this writer, is apparently drawn from his writings, when we are told, that besides his mastery in the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, tongues, that he was a great Philosopher, and also well read in the Civil Law; a great Historian, especially in Church history, and thoroughly versed in all the Greek and Latin poets. An excellent Divine, well skilled in Polemical Divinity. To conclude, the course of this memoir confirms this writer's remark, that his labours both in writing and preaching, and other services peculiar to his function, as a Minister of the Gospel and Pastor of a Church, were incredible (pp); and the same memoir gives credit to Mr Wood's remark, that in doing these services to others, he did not neglect the care of his own interest (qq). We shall give a list of his Works below [H].

tion should be made to the Lord-Chancellor, who thereupon should issue an order to the Bishop, to take the cautionary bond, and release the prisoner. Now, continued he, you know what a critical time this is, and I have many enemies; I would desire you to move the Lord-Chancellor in the case, and upon his order I will do it. And when it was replied, that this method would be more expence than Bunyan could supply, yet the Bishop refused to do it upon other terms; which at last was done, and the poor man released, but little thanks to the Bishop, notwithstanding he still kept a familiarity with the doctor (12).

[G] He lived some time at Kensington. 'One day as he was coming from thence to London, two informers seized upon his coach and horses in the Strand, upon which a mob quickly gathered about him. But Sir Edmundbury Godfrey happening to come by, seeing a mob asked the matter; and being a Justice of Peace, ordered the informers and the doctor to meet him at a Justice of Peace's house near Bloomsbury-square upon a day appointed, and he would get some other of his brethren to be there to hear the cause. They met accordingly, and Sir Edmund being in the chair, upon examination they found the informers had acted illegally, and discharged the doctor not without reprimanding them; after which he was no more disturbed by them (13).'

PARKER [MATTHEW], the second Protestant Archbishop of Canterbury, in the XVIth century, a man of great merit and learning, was born August 6th, 1504, in the parish of St Stephen's, within the city of Norwich (a). He had the misfortune to lose his father [A] when he was only twelve years of age; but his mother took a very particular care of his education [B]. About the beginning of September 1520, he was admitted into Corpus-Christi, or Bennet-College in Cambridge; of which House he was chosen Scholar or Bible-Clark the 20th of March following. And applying himself closely to his studies, took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1523 (b); but, according to others, in 1524 (c). In April 1527, he was ordained Deacon, in June Priest, and in September, created Master of Arts, and chosen Fellow of his college. By this time he had rendered himself so conspicuous for learning, that he was one of those eminent scholars who were invited from Cambridge, to furnish and adorn the magnificent foundation of Cardinal Wolsey's [now Christ's-Church] college in Oxford: but by the persuasion of his friends he stayed where he was, diligently following his studies. And having, within five or six years, read over the Fathers and Councils, and rendered himself an accomplished Divine, he became a licens'd, and frequent Preacher, at Court, at St Paul's-cross, and other public places and occasions (d). In 1533, or 1534, he was made Chaplain to Queen Anne Bolein; who had so much regard and esteem for him, (he being a zealous promoter of the Reformation) that, a little before her death, she gave him a particular charge, to take care of her daughter Elizabeth, that she might not want his pious and wise counsel. July 14th, 1534 (e), he commenced Bachelor in Divinity. And being presented, on the 4th of November ensuing, by the favour of the Queen his mistress, to the Deanry of Stoke near Clare in Suffolk, he was installed the 12th of the same month. At this place he founded a Grammar-school, and made new statutes for the college. March 1st, 1537, after the Queen's death, King Henry took him into his own service, and made him one of his Chaplains: as he was afterwards to King Edward the Sixth (f). During the rebellion that broke out that year, he preached at Clare, against Popish Superstitions, for which he was articled against by some of his neighbours; but his own vindication was so satisfactory to the Lord Chancellor Audeley, that he bid him go on, and not fear such enemies (g). On the 1st of July 1538, he was created Doctor in Divinity. And, October 28th, 1541, installed Prebendary of the second stall in the cathedral of Ely, having been nominated thereto by King Henry the Eighth, in his new charter for that cathedral. In 1542, he was presented by the Chapter of Stoke to the Rectory of Ashen in Essex, conveniently situated both for Cambridge and Stoke. He held this living not full two years, but resigned it April 30, 1544, and the next day was presented to the Rectory of Birlingham All-saints in his own county of Norfolk; which he resigned October 1st, 1550 (h). December 4th, 1544, upon the King's letters commendatory to the college [C], dated November 30th, he was chosen Master of Corpus-Christi, or Bennet-college, [A] He had the misfortune to lose his father. His father, William Parker, was a citizen of Norwich, and by trade a Calender of stuffs. He lived in good reputation and plenty, and was a Gentleman, bearing for his coat of Arms, in a field gules, Three Keys erected; and being grandson of Nicholas Parker, principal Registrary of the Archbishop of Canterbury.—His mother was Alice, of the worshipful family of the Monins of Suffolk, but originally from Kent (1).

[B] His mother took a very particular care of his education. The industrious J. Strype hath been so very particular, as to preserve the names of the several Masters for his education in divers faculties. His first Masters, for Reading were, one Benis Rector of St Clement's in Norwich, and one Pope a priest; — for Writing, one Prior clerk of St Benedic's; — for Singing, Love a priest, and Manthorp clerk of St Stephen's;—and for Grammar-learning, his School-master, or rather private Tutor, was W. Neve (2).

[C] Upon the King's letters commendatory to the College. Those letters are very much to Dr Parker's honour, as appears from the following extract.—
 'We therefore, for the zeale and love we bear to the college, to which he afterwards became a special benefactor, and compiled for it a new book of statutes (i). January 25, 1544-5, he was elected Vice-Chancellor of the University, which office he discharged afterwards in the year 1549. The 22d of September 1545, he was presented by his college of Corpus-Christi, to the Rectory of Landbeach in Cambridgeshire, to which he was admitted Dec. 1. Notwithstanding all his endeavours to the contrary (k), he lost his Deanery of Stoke by the dissolution of that college, April 1, 1547; but, in consideration of his merit, he had a yearly pension of 40 l. settled on him, in lieu of it, and a promise of the Deanery of Lincoln. In the same year, on the 24th of June, he married Mrs Margaret Harlestone [D], daughter of Robert Harlestone of Mattisnal in Norfolk, Gent. (l). Happening to be in Norfolk, in 1549, during Ket's rebellion, he had the resolution to go to the rebels camp; and, preaching to them out of the Oak of Reformation, took an opportunity to exhort them to temperance, moderation, and submission to the King. In January 1550-51, he was put into a commission for correcting and punishing some Anabaptists [E], newly sprung up in the kingdom. And, the February following, preached a funeral Sermon for Dr Martin Bucer, Regius Professor of Divinity in Cambridge (m). June 1, 1552, he was presented by King Edward the Sixth to the Prebend of Coringham, or Coldingham, in the cathedral church of Lincoln; and being nominated, a few days after, by his Majesty, to the Deanery of the same church, he was elected July 30, and installed the 7th of October following (n). Thus he lived in great reputation and affluence, under King Henry the Eighth and Edward the Sixth. But, upon Queen Mary's coming to the Crown, he was reduced to low circumstances, and suffered much; though still contented and cheerful: for, in the second year of her reign, he was deprived of all his preferments [F], of which the pretence was his being married. And having so heartily espoused the Reformation, which rendered him obnoxious, he was fain to abscond, and to retire privately into Norfolk among his friends, with his wife and family. He was often and diligently sought for, yet by shifting from place to place, without, however, going out of the kingdom, he escaped those bloody times, and was reserved for better days. One time, narrow search being made in order to take him; he receiving notice of it, fled in the night in great distress, and got so dangerous a fall from his horse, that he never recovered it. During this retirement, he turned the Book of Psalms into English verse (o); and wrote a Defence of the marriage of Priests (p). Queen Elizabeth's accession, in 1559, made a great change in his condition: for, he not only became free from all fear and danger, but was exalted to the highest station in the English Church, to the Archbishopric of Canterbury. A station for which he was looked upon as the fittest man, his great prudence, courage, conduct, learning, and experience, being wanting and necessary, for the Reformation that was now to be set on foot, and carried on with the utmost vigour. He was so far from seeking that high dignity, that it seems he earnestly avoided it (q). In the mean time, he was appointed one of the Visitors of the University of Cambridge (r). And he privately addressed the Queen, to dissuade her from exchanging the temporal revenues of Bishopricks for Impropriations, as she was impowered to do by act of Parliament, upon a vacancy; which was a very unequal exchange. He likewise advised her, to remove crucifixes and lighted tapers out of churches, particularly out of her own chapel (s). Having been elected Archbishop August 1, 1559, by the Dean and Chapter of Canterbury, he was confirmed, December 9, in the church of St Mary le Bow;

[D] He married Mrs Margaret Harlestone.] He was then in the 43d year of his age, and she aged 28. Her father was a pious promoter of the Reformation; and of an ancient family, seated both in Suffolk and Essex. She and Dr Parker had entertained a great liking for one another, about the space of seven years; but were hindered from marrying by the bloody statute of King Henry VIII. which made the marriage of the clergy felony. That obstacle being removed by the accession of King Edward VI, they married; and lived very happily 23 years together: She proving an excellent wife, as well as an excellent woman, very obedient, indulgent, and observant of her husband. Frugal in his private condition, and in his public, doing whatever was for his credit and dignity (4). Bishop Ridley, who used to visit her husband at Cambridge, took so much notice of her charming behaviour, that he was heard once to ask, Whether she had a sister like her? She died August 17, 1570, in the 51st year of her age; and was buried in Lambeth-church (5). By her will, she bequeathed fifty shillings a year for ever, to the parish of Mattisnal, her native place. The Archbishop had by her four Sons. 1. John, born May 5, 1548, who married Joanna daughter of Richard Cox, bishop of Ely; and was knighted July 23, 1603. His posterity was seated at Sittingbourn. 2. Matthew, born Aug. 27, 1550; who died an infant. 3. Another Matthew, who married Frances daughter of William Barlow, bishop of Chichester; and dyed in Dec. 1574. 4. Joseph, who dyed very young (6).

[E] For correcting and punishing some Anabaptists.] Mr Stuype gives us this account of their opinions. 'They would not baptize their children; held as the Arians in the doctrine of the Godhead, and as Pelagius in the doctrine of Free-will and Predestination: All these came under the denomination of Anabaptists. Many also administered the Sacraments in other manner than was prescribed by the Book of Common-Prayer (7).'

[F] He was deprived of all his preferments.] According to his own account, 'In Decemb. 1553. he resigned his Mastership of Corpus-Christi-College to Laurence Moptye, whom in a kind of necessity he chose his successor. April 2, 1554, he was deprived of his Prebend of Ely, and Rectory of Landbeach. May 21, so he was of his Deanry and Prebend of Lincoln. — After that, adds he, I lived privately; so joyful in my conscience before God; and so neither ashamed nor dejected, that the most sweet leisure for study, to which the good providence of God recalled me, gave me much greater and more solid Pleasures, than that former busy and dangerous kind of Life ever afforded me.' Postea privatus vixi, ita coram Deo letus in Conscientiâ meâ; Adeoq; nec pudefactus nec dejectus; ut dulcissimum otium Literarium, ad quod Dei bona providentia me revocavit, multo majores & solidiores voluptates mihi pepererit; quam negotiosum illud & periculosum vivendi genus unquam placuit (8).

Bow; and consecrated, the 17th of the same month, in Lambeth-chapel, by William Barlow, late Bishop of Bath and Wells, and then elect of Chichester, John Scory, late Bishop of Chichester, and then elect of Hereford, Miles Coverdale Bishop of Exeter, and John Hodgkin suffragan Bishop of Bedford (t) [G]. The Romanists invented afterwards a tale, that he had been consecrated at the Nag's-head inn, or tavern, in Cheapside [H]; but that story hath been so thoroughly confuted by our English authors and others, and withal disproved by many Catholics [I]; that, to believe it now-a-days, requires more even than the Faith of a Papist. Archbishop Parker being thus constituted Primate and Metropolitan of the Church of England, took care to have the several sees filled with learned and worthy men, and well affected to the Reformation: and soon after performed his metropolitanical visitation of the several Dioceses (u) [K]. In 1560, he and the Bishops of London and Ely addressed the Queen, to enter into the blessed state of wedlock (w); but she chose to reign alone. He likewise, and some other Bishops, exhorted her to remove images entirely out of churches, which she was inclined to retain (x). By his encouragement it was, that a free-school was founded, in 1563, at Sandwich in Kent; and he likewise recovered the stipend of the School-master of Stoke near Clare (y). In 1564 he completed the reparation and building of his palace at Canterbury, the expence whereof amounted to above 1400 pounds (z); and, about the same time, founded a free-school at Rachdale in Lancashire (a). One of his main designs and endeavours, was to introduce into this Church an Uniformity both in habits and ceremonies; but he met therein with great opposition from that wicked great man the Earl of Leicester, and some other courtiers; and from the whole bulk of the Puritan faction, who have severely reviled him upon that account (b). June 24, 1567, he founded three Grammar-Scholarships, or Exhibitions, in Bennet-college [L]. And again, in May 1569, he founded five more Scholarships

[G] And consecrated the 17th of the same month, by William Barlow, &c.] There were two Commissions issued out for his Confirmation and Consecration. The first, dated Sept. 9, was directed to Cuthbert [Tunstall] bishop of Durham, Gilbert [Bourne] bishop of Bath and Wells, David [Pole] bishop of Peterborough, Antony [Kitchen] bishop of Landaffe, William Barlow, bishop, and John Scory bishop (without mentioning their Sees). This first Commission not taking place, whether because some of those Bishops being Papists refused to ad, or for some other reasons unknown; a second Commission, dated Decemb. 6, was directed to Antony Kitchen bishop of Landaff, William Barlow once bishop of Bath and Wells now elect of Chichester, John Scorye formerly bishop of Chichester now elect of Hereford, Miles Coverdale some time bishop of Exeter, John [Hodgkin] Suffragan bishop of Bedford, John [Salisbury] Suffragan bishop of Thetford, and John Bale bishop of Osfory in Ireland (9). The four, whose names are printed in Italic, consented to ad.

[H] The Romanists invented afterwards a tale, that he had been consecrated at the Nag's head, &c.] The first inventor, or at least original reporter, of this story, was Thomas Neale, some time Chaplain to Bishop Bonner (10). And it was retailed afterwards by Antony Champney, Thomas Hardynge, Henry Fitz-Simons; the author of the Legacy to the Protestants, and others (11). —But this notorious and improbable falsehood hath been fully confuted by the learned Francis Mason, B. D. Archdeacon of Norfolk, in his Vindication of the Church of England concerning the Consecration and Ordination of the Bishops &c (12), published afterwards in Latin by Sir Nathaniel Brent:— by Ap. Bramhall, in his Consecration of Protestant Bishops vindicated: to which is subjoined the Record of our Archbishop's consecration (13):—and of late, by the most candid Father P. F. Le Courayer, in his Defence of the Validity of the English Ordinations (14). So that the Reader will excuse us, if we do not swell this note with a Fact so well known, and so effectually proved; but refer him to those very learned Authors.

' other Records of his predecessor Matth. Parker, ' which they perused over and over, and found that the ' said Parker was consecrated in Lambeth-Chapel (and ' not at the Nags-head in Cheapside) by certain Bishops ' that had been ejected in Queen Mary's reign, &c (15). ' —This fact Bishop Godwin lays a great Stress upon (16); and adds.—Ab his igitur (Fairclotho, Lathwaito, Collitono, Leako, imò Et Kellifono, Fitzherberto, ac aliis Romano-catholicæ religionis professoribus) harum rerum a me de Parkeri referuntur consecratione, veritas, si vel pilum boni viri habeant, confirmabitur.

[K] And soon after performed his metropolitanical visitation of the several Dioceses.] He found in several Dioceses the Churches most miserably serv'd; as appears from one instance, namely the Diocese of Ely: the Bishop whereof certified, That of the whole Sum of the Cures in his dioces, which was 152 parsonages and vicarages, and other cures, there were duly serv'd but only Fifty two cures. That there were thirty four benefices vacant; thirteen that had neither Rectors nor Vicars; and fifty seven enjoyed by non-residents (17). —And how ignorant some of the Clergy were, Mr Strype has given us a fample, in a letter of one Walter Tempest, curate of Cripplegate London, to Mr Peerson the Archbishop's Chaplain, who had puzzled him with the word Function, in one of the visitations. The letter is in these words. 'To the ' beloved in the Lord Jesus, Mr Perfie. Know you, ' that whereas your Mastership said, I knew not what ' this word Function meant, I being Pauperes Spiritus ' to a quick appofing, it may please you to understand, ' that I take it for my utillie. And whereas the Prophet David saith, Impulsus overfus sum, ut caderem; ' I may say for lack of good memory, and a pregnant ' wit, I was overseen in making mine answer. And ' the Prophet saith furthermore, Et Dominus suscepit me. And I wil pray quotidie, that the Lord may ' encrease me in my Function, and great charge. For ' I am Curate over Three thousand and more of Gods ' sheep. And therefore my Function is not to sleep and ' be sluggish, but to wait on my office, to discharge as ' I am charged, in teaching and governing; and to ' exercise myself to do my duty, if I were worthy before ' the Lord. For he saith, Gratuitò accepisti, gratuitò date. So I must blow the Trumpet against ungodly, ' or els the Lord will require the Blood of the people ' at my hand, because the office and Function is mine. ' Therefore my suite to my Lords Grace and to you, ' is to have a les thing towards my Living. Scriptus te viginti quinque die Mensis Junus. Anno 1569.

Scholarships [M]; and, the August following, two other Scholarships, and two Fellowships [N], in the same college. And, in July 1568, obtained also of the Queen, for that college, the Advowson of St Mary Ab-Church in London (c); for which he gave in exchange the Rectory of Penhurst in Kent. This last-mentioned year, came out the Great English Bible, commonly called The Bishops Bible; which was put out chiefly through the Archbishop's procurement and care (d). In 1570, he repaired the great hall at Lambeth, covering it with shingles; and made the long bridge into the Thames near the palace. He also made the Regent-walk, leading from the west of St Mary's church in Cambridge to the public Schools, paving it, and building a brick wall on each side (e). In 1571, he gave handsome presents of plate, and other benefactions, to several colleges in that university, and in particular founded one Scholarship in Trinity-hall, for the study of the Law (f). The seventh day of September, 1573, he magnificently entertained Queen Elizabeth at Canterbury (g), as he had entertained her several times before [O]. Taking umbrage at the Prophecies set up in several dioceses, particularly in that of Norwich, he endeavoured to suppress them, which exposed him to fresh censures from the Puritans: and made them use their utmost efforts to ruin him at Court (h). Towards the end of the year 1574, he gave a hundred volumes to the library of the university of Cambridge; whereof twenty-five were valuable manuscripts: and added further benefactions to his favorite college of Corpus-Christi (i) [P]. At length being arrived to the 72d year of his age, and finding himself in a declining condition; April the 5th, 1575, he signed his Will, wherein he bequeathed Legacies and Gifts to several persons and places [Q]. He dyed the 17th of May following, of the stone and strangury; and was buried with great solemnity [R], in his own private chapel, within his palace at Lambeth (k). His magnificent, as well as generous, and charitable disposition, is sufficiently manifest denture of that date, he gave 200*l.* to the city of Norwich: for which they were to grant an Annuity of 10*l.* to the said college: And the Master and Fellows thereof were to bestow 8*l.* of the said 10*l.* to these uses, and none other; that is, towards the use and Exhibition of Three Grammar-Scholars, to be found within the said college: to be from time to time nominated and appointed by the Maior and his successors, with the assent of the most part of the Aldermen, out of the Schools at, or in the city of Norwich, or Alesham in Norfolk. The remaining 40*s.* were to be laid out in four sermons, and other uses. This Annuity is paid out of the manor and farm of Hethelilde, in the county of Norfolk (19).

[M] And again, in May 1569, he founded five more Scholarships. Of these five, he ordered, by his Indenture dated May 22, that Two should be sent from the free-school in Canterbury; and procured for their Salaries yearly, six pounds thirteen shillings and four pence, payable out of the rents of East-bridge-hospital. The revenues whereof he had by his pains and diligence greatly augmented. By another Indenture dated 31. May, he obtained of the Queen, out of certain tenements in Long Ditch, within the parish of St Margaret's Westminster, an annual clear rent of Eight pounds thirteen shillings and four pence; for the maintenance of Three Scholars; Two to be taken out of the tenants sons of Canterbury cathedral, in Suffolk and Norfolk, where that church has farms and possessions: and One from the county of Lincoln, of the cathedral whereof the Archbishop was once Dean (20).

[N] And the August following, two other Scholarships, and two Fellowships. For that, and other charitable uses, he paid 320*l.* to the Mayor and Commonalty of Norwich. In consideration of which, by their Indenture dated Aug. 6, they granted to the college, an Annuity of Eight pounds, out of the messuages, lands, &c. they had, in right of their corporation: For the maintenance of two Fellows called The Norwich Fellows; and also of two Grammar Scholars, to be sent out of Norwich, Wymondham, or Alesham. He also expressed his further good will, this year, to his Native-city of Norwich, by presenting, as a new-year's gift, to the Maior, Sheriffs, and citizens, a Bason and Bwer, whole gilt, weighing 175 ounces (21).

[O] As he had entertained her several times before. Sir John Harrington relates (22), That the Queen used often to come to his house, in respect of her favour to him, that had been her Mother's Chaplain. Being once above the rest greatly feasted; at her departing from thence, the Archbishop and his Wife being together, she gave him very special thanks, with gracious and honourable terms. And then looking on his Wife. "And you (saith she) Madam I may not call you, and Mrs I am ashamed to call you; so as I know what to call you, but yet I do thank you."

Sir John adds, that the Queen 'misliked marriage in Bishops.'

[P] And added further Benefactions to his favorite college of Corpus-christi. He payed 500*l.* clear money to the Master and Fellows, for the encrease of the Commons of the Fellows and Scholars. And granted to a Registrar, or Bible Clerk, whom he founded, his whole Commons, with one Chamber among the Norwich Scholars. He gave to that college likewise 100*l.* the produce of which, viz. five-pounds per annum, was for keeping a fire in the common Hall, yearly, from Novemb. 1, to February the 2d on Sundays, and other times when there was wonted allowance by the college (23). And, finally, to crown all, he gave them, (besides many printed Books,) his choice and invaluable collection of Manuscripts, which are preserved in their little Library to this day (24).

[Q] Wherein he bequeathed his Legacies and Gifts to several Persons and Places. He gave then, (and before in the year 1571,)—To his College of Corpus-Christi, 327 ounces of Plate, and upwards—To Gonvil and Caius college, 97 ounces—To Trinity-hall, 113 ounces, and twenty six Books—And to Doctors Commons in London, 70 ounces of Plate.—To the Maior and citizens of Canterbury, 100*l.* to be lent to poor Tradesmen. To the Poor of Croidon and Lambeth 30*l.* &c (25).

[R] And was buried with great solemnity. The particulars of the ceremonial may be seen in Mr Strype's Life of our Prelate (26). His bowels being put into an urn were laid in Howard's Chapel in Lambeth church, but his body was interred June 6, in the Chapel belonging to his palace at Lambeth; under an altar-tomb erected by himself (27). There it rested quietly till 1648, when Col. Scot, one of the regicides, having got possession of part of that palace, and wanting to turn the Chapel into a hall, or dancing room, he caused the tomb to be demolished, as standing in the way. The corpse being dug up was found enclosed in fear-cloth in many doubles in a leaden coffin. Scot opened the fear-cloth to the flesh, and found the body as fresh as if lately dead, and then privately tumbled it into a hole near an out-house where poultry was kept, and fold the coffin to a plummer. After the Restoration, Sir William Dugdale having private notice given him of this inhuman proceeding, acquainted Archbishop Juxon with it, in the year 1661, who procured an order from the House of Lords, to examine one Hardy concern'd in the fact: and he discovering, after some time, where he had laid the body, it was brought into the Chapel, and buried just above the Litany-desk, near the steps ascending to the Altar, on the south side of which it formerly lay. The old Monument was again restored: a short inscription was put over his grave (28): and another on a brass plate affixed to the monument, said to have been composed by Archbishop Sanctroft (29).

nifest from what hath been said of him in this article. As to his other virtues, he was pious, sober, temperate; modest even to a fault, being upon many occasions over-bashful; unmovable in the distribution of justice; a great patron, and zealous defender, of the Church of England, against the attacks both of Puritans and Papists; in which he acted with great stoutness and resolution, it being his rule in a good cause to fear no body; notwithstanding he is for that censured by some, as having too much roughness, and want of courtship (l). Among his other valuable episcopal qualities, he was a frequent Preacher (m); and given to hospitality without profusion or offence; his family and entertainments, though large, being conducted with the utmost decency, elegance, regularity, and sobriety (n). Of his Learning, the several Books published by him are a sufficient evidence [S]. Particularly, he was a great lover and preserver of Manuscripts, and other Antiquities; and a hearty encourager, if not the first reviver, of the study of the Saxon tongue in this kingdom. He recovered many books in that language, which would otherwise have been inevitably lost; and some of them were published by himself, or his direction (o). The best Antiquarians in his time (p), had the honor of standing in the number of his most intimate friends and acquaintance.

[S] Of his Learning, the several Books published by him are a sufficient evidence.] They were as follows.

I. A Defence of Priests Marriages, Established by the Imperial Lawes of the Realm of England: Against a Civilian naming himself Thomas Martin, Dr of the Civil Lawes, going about to disprove the said Marriages, lawful by the eternal Word of God, and by the High Court of Parliament: Only forbid by foreign Lawes, and Canons of the Pope, coloured with a Visor of the Church. Which Lawes and Canons were extinguished by the Parliament, and so abrogated by the Convocation in their Synod by their Subscriptions. Printed in 1562, without his name. II. Ælfric, [Abbot of St Albans about the year 996,] his Saxon Translation of a Latin Homily, intitled, 'A Sermon of the Paschal Lamb, and of the Sacramental Bodie and Blood of Christ, written in the old Saxon Tongue before the Conquest, and appointed in the reign of the Saxons to be spoken unto the People at Easter, before they should receive the Communion. Or, A Testimony of Antiquity, shewing the Antient Faith of the Church of England, touching the Sacrament of the Body and Blood of the Lord, here publicly preached, and also received, in the Saxons time, above 700 years ago.' With Two Epistles of Ælfric (30). III. The world is also obliged to him, for the publication of four of our best English Historians; Matthew of Westminster, Matthew Paris, Affer's Life of King Ælfred, and Thomas Walsingham. — Matthew of Westminster he published in 1570. fol. under this title, Flores Historiarum per Matthæum Westmonasteriensem collecti. Præcipue de rebus Britannicis ab exordio mundi usque ad Annum Domini, 1307. With a large preface. IV. Matthew Paris was published by him in 1571. fol. and intitled, Matthæi Paris Monachi Albanensis Angli Historia major. V. And the Life of King Ælfred, by John Affer Bishop of Sherbourne, came out in 1574. intitled, Alfredi Regis res gestæ ab Afferio Sbirburnensi Episcopo conscriptæ. Printed in Saxon letters, the same as the original manuscript was written in; on purpose to bring gentlemen to the knowledge and study of the Saxon tongue. To which is subjoined, Historia Brevis Thomæ Walsingham ab Edwardo primo ad Henricum quintum; with his Ypodigma Neustriae vel Normanniæ. i. e. 'The History of Thomas Walsingham from Edward I. to Henry V. with his Account of Normandy.' VI. It was through his advice and encouragement, that the learned John Foxe published King Ælfred's Saxon Translation of the Gospels; and Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticarum, 1571. 4to (31). VII. Another considerable work of his, was, The Lives of his Predecessors Archbishops of Canterbury, intitled, De Antiquitate Britannicæ Ecclesiæ Et Privilegiis Ecclesiæ Cantuariensis, cum Archiepiscopis ejusdem LXX. London 1572. fol. Tho' London is put in the title-page, it is said to have been printed at Lambeth, where the Archbishop had workmen of all sorts. He caused only a few copies to be printed, which he occasionally distributed amongst his friends. 'Tis very remarkable, that there are hardly any two copies alike (32); and most of them want the account of his own life, he having, out of modesty, caused it to be suppress'd, whilst he lived. Mr Strype has therefore inserted it in the Appendix to our Archbishop's Life. — A wretched Edition of that book was printed again at Hanaw in 1605, full of faults and imperfections. But, a very beautiful and elegant one was at length reprinted at London, in 1729, folio. by Samuel Drake, D. D. Fellow of St John's college, Cambridge; adorn'd with the figures of the several Archbishops monuments, and other Sculptures, exquisitely performed. Some have ascribed this work to John Josceline, our Archbishop's Secretary, or Chaplain, a very learned Antiquarian. But what share Josceline had in it, was only this, That he made collections for it out of ancient Historians; and the digester and compiler of them was the Archbishop himself *. This is undeniable from two Letters of the Archbishop published by Dr Drake (33), and Mr Strype (34); wherein he calls that work, 'MY BOOK of my Canterbury predecessors.' — my small Travels — my pore collection, &c.'

PARKER [SAMUEL], Bishop of Oxford in the XVIIth century; a man of some learning, and no contemptible writer, but who lessened his own character by rendring himself too much subservient to the measures of King Charles and King James the Second's Courts; was born at Northampton in September 1640. His father was John Parker, Esq; bred up to the Law; a Sub-committee-man during Oliver's usurpation; afterwards a Serjeant at Law; and appointed in 1659 one of the Barons of the Exchequer [A]. Samuel

[A] His father was John Parker, Esq;] Of him Andrew Marvell gives the following account; which, as the reader will observe, is mixed with a great deal of satire and ill-nature. — 'He was bred toward the law, and betook himself, as his best practice, to be a Sub-committee man; or, as the stile ran, one of the Assitant-committee in Northamptonshire. In the rapine of that employment, and what he got by picking the teeth of his Masters, he sustained himself, till he had raked together some little estate. And then, being a man for the purpose, and that had begun his fortune out of the sequestration of the estates of the King's party, he, to perfect it the more, proceeded to take away their lives; not in the

'hot and military way, (which diminishes always the offence) but in the cooler blood, and sedentary execution of an high court of justice. Accordingly, he was preferred to be one of that number, that gave sentence against the three Lords, Capel, Holland, and Hamilton, who were beheaded. By this learning in the law, he became worthy of the degree of a Serjeant, and sometimes to go to the circuit, till for misdemeanor he was petitioned against. But for a taste of his abilities, and the more to re-ingratiate himself, he printed, in the year 1650, a very remarkable book, called, The Government of the People of England, precedent and present the same. Ad subscribentes confirmandam, dubitantes informan-

Samuel was educated in Grammar-learning in his own native town, Northampton; and being fit for the university, in Midsummer-term, 1656, was admitted into Wadham-college [B] in Oxford (a). He took there the degree of Bachelor of Arts, February 28, 1659-60 (b). But being then a zealous Presbyterian, or Independent, and much discountenanced upon that account by the Warden Dr Blandford, he removed to Trinity-college. Upon the Restoration, he was for a while at a stand, and caballed among the opposers of Episcopal government; 'till being converted by the arguments and prevailing advice of Dr Ralph Bathurst [C], senior Fellow of Trinity-college, he became as warm a member of the Church of England as any (c). July 9, 1663, he proceeded Master of Arts, as a member of Trinity-college, and a grand compounder (d). Entering soon after into Orders, he resorted frequently to London; became Chaplain to a Nobleman; and very free in drolleries and reflections upon his old friends the Puritans. In the year 1665 he was elected Fellow of the Royal Society: and published about the same time some Physico-Theological Essays [D], which he dedicated to Dr Sheldon Archbishop of Canterbury. He published also, in 1666, A Free and Impartial Censure of the Platonick Philosophie [E]. About Michaelmas 1667, the Archbishop, to whom he had made himself known by dum, opposites convincendum: and underneath, 'Multa videntur quæ non sunt; multa sunt quæ non videntur. Under that engraven two hands joined, with the motto, Ut uniamur, and beneath a sheaf of arrows with this device, Vis unita fortior; and to conclude, Concordiâ parvæ res crescunt, discordiâ dilabuntur (1) — A. Wood adds, that, 'By virtue of a return dated June 21st, 1655, he, by the name of John Parker of the Temple, one of the Commissioners for the removing obstructions at Worcester-house in the Strand near London, was the next day sworn Serjeant at law, Oliver being then Protector. About the 18th of January 1659, he was appointed by the Parliament one of the Barons of the court of Exchequer, but being soon after removed thence, before, or at the Restoration of King Charles the Second, we heard no more of him afterwards, only that he was again regularly made Serjeant at law, by the Lord Chancellor Hyde's recommendation, at the first call after the Restoration (2).'

[B] Was admitted into Wadham-college.] A. Marvell, in the same strain, as above, says, That 'in a short time he entered himself into the company of some young Students, who were used to fast and pray weekly together, but for their recreation fed sometimes on a broth, from whence they were commonly called Gruellers; only it was observed, that he was wont still to put more graves than all the rest in his porrage. And after that he picked acquaintance, not only with the brotherhood at Wadham-college, but with the sisterhood too at another old Elizabeth's, [one Elizabeth Hampton in Halywell, an old crooked maid, who followed the trade of a laundress, and had frequent meetings in her house for the Presbyterian party, especially for those that were her customers,] where he trained himself up in hearing their sermons and prayers, receiving also the sacrament in the house, till he had gained such proficiency, that he too began to exercise in that meeting, and was esteemed one of the prettiest young men in the university (3). Bishop Burnet observes also, to the same purpose (4), that he 'was a violent Independent at the time of the Restoration, with a high profession of piety in their way. But he soon changed, and struck into the highest form of the Church of England; and wrote many books with a strain of contempt and fury against the Dissenters, that provoked them out of measure.'

[C] By the arguments and prevailing advice of Dr Ralph Bathurst.] He makes a thankful acknowledgment of it, in a Dedication to the Doctor, in these words (5). — 'I will not be so troublesome as to remind you of the retails of your Obligations, yet there is one, whose peculiar matchlesness obliges me to as peculiar an acknowledgement. For, to your prevailing advice, Sir, do I owe my first rescue from the Chains and Fetters of an unhappy Education, than which 'twas impossible either for you to have conferred, or for me to have received a greater benefit, there being no Perfection to be valued at so high a Rate as a true Freedom and Ingenuity of mind: 'Tis this, that distinguishes Churches from herds. And those men that have laid aside the free and impartial use of their Reasons, are just as fit for Religion as sheep and oxen, for they differ only in this, that the one are brutes without Reason, and the other brutes with it. How could the Scythian have sacrificed Rational Beings, had he not first sacrificed his Reason; or the Egyptian adored irrational Creatures, had not himself been one.'

[D] And published about the same time some Physico-Theological Essays.] They were written in Latin, and published under this title, Tentamina Physico-Theologica de Deo: sive Theologia Scholastica, ad Normam Novæ & Reformatæ Philosophiæ concinnata. Lond. 1665, 4to. A great part of them was transmitted afterwards, into another book published by him in 1678, and intituled, Disputationes de Deo & Providentiâ divinâ. 1. An Philosophorum ulli, & quinam Athei fuerint. 2. A rerum finibus Deum esse demonstratur. 3. Epicuri & Cartesii Hypotheses de Universi Fabricatione evertuntur. 4. Mundum neque prorsus infectum, neque necessitate factum; sed solo Opificis consilio extructum fuisse demonstratur. 5. A generis humani Ortu, & Corporis humani structurâ, Deum esse demonstratur. 6. Contra Scepticorum & Academicorum disciplinam, potissimum Ciceronis de Quæstionibus Academicis libros, & Cartesii Meditationes Metaphysicas disputatur. Lond. 4to. — The Tentamina were attacked, or answered, by N. Fairfax, M. D. in his treatise, Of the Bulk and Selvedge of the World. But they were most depreciated by Andrew Marvell (6), who calls them 'a tedious transcript of our author's Common-place-book, wherein there is very little of his own, but the arrogance, and the unparalleled censoriousness that he exercises over all other writers; beside his undutiful inveighing even then, against the vestiges of the earth for meer bubbles.' — He also finds fault with our author's 'rough and scabbed Latin, and his faults and grammar; to omit his usual volume and circumference of periods, which though he takes always to be his chiefest strength, yet indeed like too great a line, weakens the defense, and requires too many men to make it good.'

[E] A free and impartial Censure of the Platonick Philosophie.] This was comprized in a Letter written to his friend Mr Nath. Bibbie. And, shortly after, he published a second letter to the same Gentleman, being 'An Account of the Nature and Extent of the divine Dominion and Goodness, especially as they refer to the Origenian hypothesis concerning the Pre-existence of Souls, together with a special Account of the vanity and groundlessness of the Hypothesis itself.' Oxon. 1666, 4to. The design of these two Pamphlets, as he says himself (7), is, 'To give an account of two Passages in his Tentamina Physico-Theologica; The one out of the last chapter of the first Book, in which he exclaims against the Platonick Philosophy, as an ungrounded and fanatick fancy; The other out of the last Chapter of the second Book, where disputing against those that assert the necessity of the world's Eternal Existence, He was occasionally obliged, to glance upon the two grand 'Attributes of God's Dominion and Goodness.' — In the first, he considers the Platonick Philosophie in all its parts, of Morality, Logick, Physick, and Natural Theologie. I. As to their Morality, he thinks 'it may challenge a signal preheminance upon several accounts: Namely, 1. In that the Rules and Directions it prescribes are soper and practicable; it does not flatter men with romantick degrees of happiness, upon fond and fantastick principles, but by the Dedication of his Essays, appointed him one of his own Chaplains; which put him into the road of great preferment (e). He was installed Archdeacon of Canterbury in June 1670, in the room of Dr William Sancroft (f): and, the 26th of November following, had the degree of Doctor in Divinity conferred upon him at Cambridge, when William Prince of Orange was entertained there. The 18th of November, 1672, he was installed into one of the Prebends of Canterbury; and was collated also by the Archbishop, about the same time, to the Rectories of Ickham and Chartham in Kent (g). Being a man full of satirical vivacity, and considerably learned (b), he wrote, about this time, some books, wherein he severely reflected upon the Presbyterians [F]; which engaged

'complies with the conditions of human life, and neither promises nor designs greater proportions of felicity, than our present capacities will allow of. A 2d thing for which the Platonists were valuable above all other Philosophers, is the innocent Gayety and Pleasantness of their humours. For, both in their principles and lives, there was nothing but what was calm and cheerful. The 3d good quality of the Platonists, was their valuing Good-nature at so high a rate, which, though it be a constitution no less virtuous and excellent, than 'tis charming and amiable, yet the estimate they set upon it was proportionable to its real value. Whence resulted that exceeding delight they took in the Society of ingenious and sweet-natured young gentlemen, upon which score they profess themselves as great votaries to the Celestial Venus, as common mortals are to the Earthly one, for their Amours were not kindled by lust and petulency, (they being professedly the most generous contempters of Women in the World) but were pure and cleanly enough to become Angels and separated souls, Plato's love laws forbidding to court any other objects than abstracted and intellectual beauties. A 4th preheminance of the Platonists, is their readiness and ability in the smaller morals, by which he means their skill in all the Arts of behaviour and conversation.'

II. His censure of their Logick, is, 'That as Plato's manner of arguing is more succinct than the tedious way of syllogising, so 'tis not less sure and evident; for what discourse can proceed with greater evidence and conviction, than after you have explained the terms of the question, and agreed with your adversary about the matter debated of, to propose to him some principles so clear and palpable, that they shall either presuppose or enforce his assent, and from thence to lead him by induction through a series of propositions depending upon, and orderly deduced from, your first proleptic principles; till he is fairly brought, or unawares betrayed into an unavoidable necessity of assenting to the truth you assert.' Which is the method that Plato pretends to. But he observes, That Plato's reasonings either bottom upon uncertain and inevident principles; or else are circular.

III. With regard to Plato's Natural Philosophy. It will, saith he, be sufficiently display'd and disparag'd too, by telling you, that in its main strokes it accords with the Aristotelean Philosophy; a parallel between them hath been asserted and demonstrated by several Authors, and the retail of instances may be seen in them. But 'in gross they agree in one principle, by which alone they solve all the appearances and productions of Nature. For, as Aristotle resolves all phenomena into his Forms, which he starts from the bosom of Matter; so Plato solves all by the Soul of the Universe and Ideas, which in Greek are all one with Forms.'

IV. Next, he comes to the Platonick Theologie, which he divides into Speculative and Practical. And under the Speculative, he censures, 1. Their way of resolving knowledge into 'its first and fundamental Principles; that is, their supposing, that the Truth of all Beings consists in a conformity to their Archetypal Ideas. 2. Their serious endeavouring to know and define the notions of abstracted Essences; and despising all sensible Knowledge. 3. Their affecting a mysterious obscurity and abstruseness, thereby to render their notions more solemn and venerable. 4. His next accusation is, that, instead of pure and genuine Reason, they abound so much with gaudy and extravagant Phancies, with rampant Metaphors and pompous Allegories. 5. Another Miscarriage, is, that they employ much of their contemplations in things altogether uncertain and

'unsearchable.'—But when he comes to consider the Practical Theologie of the Platonists, he represents it in the most amiable light. 'Its main design, saith he, is to perfect and dignify human Nature, 'tis consonant to our natural Reasons, complies with our natural Necessities, relieves our natural Wants. It consists in living up to our Faculties, and acting as becomes Rational Beings; in clearing the Soul from prejudices and prepossessions, and pursuing Truth with an honest and impartial Simplicity: in following the conduct of Reason, and being confident in its guidance, seeing the condition of him that does so is as secure, as 'tis certain that Infinite Goodness cannot be angry with him, that has endeavoured with all faithfulness and diligence to know and do his duty. It resides in the mind and spirit, not in Customs and bare Ceremonies.—It produces a sweet and gracious Temper of mind, that causes an universal benevolence and kindness to mankind. It makes us affable, humble, courteous, charitable, moderate, prudent, unpassionate. It consists of love, candour, ingenuity, clemency, patience, mildness, and all other instances of good nature. It detests nothing more than a peevish, froward, morose, uncivil, passionate, furious, talkative, fanatick zeal. It begets a true Liberty and Freedom of spirit. It exempts us from all effeminate fears and scruples, and begets the greatest serenity and cheerfulness of mind. It instructs us to dread no evil from God, but to look upon Him as an infinitely gracious and benigne Being, that designs nothing more than the happiness and perfection of his creatures, &c.' (8) With much more to the same excellent purpose. Towards the end, He disproves 'The supposed Agreement between Moses and Plato;' and concludes with An Account of the Platonick Trias, or Trinity.

In his annexed 'Account of the Nature and Extent of the Divine Dominion and Goodness,' &c. he hath some passages, which were soon after confuted by the excellent Author of 'Deus Justificatus;' or, 'The divine Goodness vindicated and cleared, against the Assertors of Absolute and Inconditionate Reprobation (9).' The first is, 'that the Divine Right and Dominion over the creatures, could not be founded upon the benefits of Creation, but upon the absolute unlimitedness of his Power, because God was from all eternity invested with a Power of doing any thing that was not misbecoming his divine Perfections, and therefore He acquired not any new Right from his Creation, but only made objects to exercise his eternal Right upon (10).—The second passage reflected upon, is, that 'the Idea of God consists mainly in Dominion and Sovereignty; the notion of him in Scripture never refers to his Essence, but always to his Power and Empire; and the names by which he is there expressed do not so much denote his Nature, as his supreme and almighty Prerogative (11).'

[F] He wrote about this time some books wherein he severely reflected upon the Presbyterians.] They were the following ones. I. 'A Discourse of Ecclesiastical Polity, wherein the Authority of the Civil Magistrate over the Consciences of Subjects in matters of external Religion is asserted.'

An Answer was written to it, intituled, Insolence and Impudence triumphant: Envy and Fury enthron'd: the Mirror of Malice and Madness, in a late Treatise entituled, A Discourse of Ecclesiastical Polity, &c. or the lively Portraiture of S. P. lim'd and drawn by his own hands, &c. being in short a Collection of some of his intemperate Revivings and prophane Satyrs, &c. Lond. 1669. Dr Owen published also an Answer to it, bearing this title, Truth and Innocence vindicated; in a Survey of a Discourse concerning Ecclesiastical Polity, &c. Lond. 1669, 8vo. Whereupon Dr Parker published, II. 'A Defence and Continuation of Ecclesiastical gaged him in a sharp contest with Andrew Marvell. In 1681, he published, A Demonstration of the divine Authority of the Law of Nature, and of the Christian Religion [G]: and some other pieces, in this year [H], and in the years 1683, 1684, 1685 [I]. In the

' clerical Politic (against Dr Owen) Together with a Letter from the Author of The Friendly Debate.' [Dr Patrick] Lond. 1671, 8vo. His other pieces wherein he reflected upon the Presbyterians, were, III. 'Toleration discussed, in two Dialogues.' Lond. 1670, 4to. IV. 'A Discourse in vindication of Bishop John Bramhall and the Clergy of the Church of England, from the Fanatic Charge of Popery: together with some Reflections upon the present State of Affairs, &c.' This was published by way of Preface to Archbishop Bramhall's Vindication of himself and the Episcopal Clergy from the Presbyterian Charge of Popery, as it is managed by Mr Baxter, in his Treatise of the Grotian Religion. Lond. 1672, 8vo. This Discourse, or Preface, was reprinted by itself in 1673, 8vo. There is in it a great deal of raiillery against Dr John Owen's doctrine and writings; especially against some passages of his book of Evangelical Love, Church peace, &c. and much said in defence of that sharper way, which he [Dr Parker] took in his former Answer to the Doctor, and somewhat against Baxter's Grotian Religion discovered. The Nonconformists finding themselves extremely galled, and looking upon Dr Parker as a forward, proud, ambitious, and scornful person (to use A. Wood's expressions) their buffooning champion, Andrew Marvell, took him to task, on purpose to clip his wings. He published, therefore, a book, written in imitation of the Duke of Buckingham's Rehearsal transpos'd; and intitled, The Rehearsal Transposed: or, Animadversions upon a late Book, entitled, a Preface, shewing what Grounds there are of fears and jealousies of Popery. 1672, 8vo. wherein he styles the Doctor all along Mr Bayes. V. Dr Parker published an Answer to it, which he named, 'A Reproof to the Rehearsal transpos'd, in a Discourse to its Author.' Lond. 1673, 8vo. And five more Answers were published by others (12). Mr Marvell replied in, The Rehearsal transpos'd. The Second Part. Occasioned by two Letters: The first printed by a nameless author, intitled, A Reproof, &c. The second Letter left for me at a Friend's House, dated Nov. 3, 1673, subscribed J. G. &c. Lond. 1673, 8vo. Dr Parker did not reply again.—Mr A. Wood's Remarks, upon that occasion, deserve to have a place here (13). 'The Reader,

' faith he, is to note, that this Pen-combat exercised between our Author and Marvell, was briskly managed with as much smart, cutting, and satirical wit on both sides, as any other perhaps of late hath been, they endeavouring by all the methods imaginable, and the utmost forces they could by any means rally up, to blacken each other's cause, and to set each other out in the most ugly dresses: their pieces in the mean while, wherein was represented a perfect trial of each other's skill and parts in a jerking, flirting way of writing, entertaining the Reader with a great variety of sport and mirth, in seeing two such right cocks of the game so keenly engaging with sharp and dangerous weapons. And it was generally thought, nay, even by many of those who were otherwise favourers of Parker's cause, that he (Parker) thro' a too loose and unwary handling of the Debate (tho' in a brave, flourishing and lofty stile) laid himself too open to the severe strokes of his sneering Adversary, and that the odds and victory lay on Marvell's side: Howsoever it was, it wrought this good effect upon our Author, that for ever after it took down somewhat of his high Spirit, inasmuch that tho' Marvell in a second part replied upon our Author's Reproof, yet he judged it more prudent rather to lay down the cudgels, than to enter the lists again with an untowardly combatant so hugely well vers'd and experienc'd in the then but newly, refin'd Art (tho' much in mode and fashion almost ever since) of sportive and jeering buffoonry. And moreover it put him upon a more serious, sober, and moderate way of writing in other good Treatises, which he since did set forth, and which have proved very useful and beneficial to the public.'—Bishop Burnet speaks much to the same purpose (14).—'The most virulent of all that writ against the Sects was Parker. . . . After he had for ' some years entertained the Nation with several virulent books, writ with much life, he was attacked by the liveliest droll of the age, who writ in a burlesque strain, but with so peculiar and so entertaining a conduct, that, from the King down to the tradesman, his books were read with great pleasure. That not only humbled Parker, but the whole party: For the author of the Rehearsal Transposed had all the men of wit (or, as the French phrase it, all the Laughters,) on his side.'

Burnet observes else where (15), that King Charles the Second, 'being so true judge of wit, could not but be much taken with the best satyr of the time; and saw that Bays's wit, when measured with another's, was of a piece with his virtues, and therefore judg'd in favour of the Rehearsal Transposed: this went deep, and gave occasion to the single piece of modesty, with which he [Dr Parker] can be charged, of withdrawing from the Town, and not importuning the press for some years, since even a face of brass must grow red, when it is so burnt, as his was then.' But the wit of it is now lost.—To return; VI. Another book published by our Author, about this time, against the Presbyterians, was, 'A free and impartial Enquiry into the causes of that very great Esteem and Honour the Nonconformist Ministers are in with their Followers.' Lond. 1673, 8vo.

[G] In 1681, he published, A Demonstration of the divine Authority of the Law of Nature, &c. He says, in the Preface, that 'this Treatise was written in pursuance of a former in the Latine tongue; viz. his Tentamina Physico-theologica, &c. The chief Adversary he opposes, is T. Hobbs: And, in the course of the work, he gives an account of the Platonick and Peripatetick Morality, out of Tully (16); reconciles Josephus and St Luke about the Tax of Cyrenius, and the death of Herod Agrippa; vindicates the famous testimony of Josephus concerning our Saviour, from the exceptions of Tanaquil Faber, and other Criticks; asserts the testimony of Phlegon concerning the Eclipse at the Passion; clears Pontius Pilate his Narrative concerning our Saviour to Tiberius, and Tiberius his opinion of it; and endeavours to prove the story of Agbarus genuine (17).

[H] And some other pieces in this year, &c. He published, in 1681, 'The Case of the Church of England briefly stated, in the three first and fundamental Principles of a Christian Church. 1. The Obligation of Christianity by divine Right. 2. The Jurisdiction of the Church by divine Right. 3. The Institution of Episcopal Superiority by divine Right' Lond. 8vo.

[I] And in the years 1683, 1684, 1685. In 1683, he published, 'An Account of the Government of the Christian Church in the first six hundred years. Particularly shewing, 1. The Apostolical Practice of diocesan and metropolitical Episcopacy. 2. The Usurpation of Patriarchal and Papal Authority. 3. The War of two hundred years between the Bishops of Rome and Constantinople, of universal supremacy.' Lond. 8vo.—In 1684, he published, 'Religion and Loyalty: or, a Demonstration of the Power of the Christian Church within itself. The Supremacy of Sovereign powers over it. The Duty of Passive Obedience, or Non-resistance, to all their Commands. Exemplified out of the Records of the Church and the Empire, from the Beginning of Christianity, to the end of the reign of Julian.'—And in 1685. 'Religion and Loyalty. The second Part. Or the History of the concurrence of the Imperial and Ecclesiastical Jurisdiction in the Government of the Church, from the beginning of the reign of Jovian to the end of the reign of Justinian' Lond. 8vo. The first part is dedicated to King Charles the Second, under the title of, 'An Address to his Majesty from the primitive Church;' and begins thus: 'The whole Christian World being both alarm'd and amazed at the late barbarous Conspiracy against the sacred Lives of Your Majesty, and Your Royal Brother (18): And Your Majesty having upon that occasion been overwhelmed with numberless Ad-

the beginning of the year 1685, he resigned his Prebend of Canterbury in behalf of his friend Dr John Bradford (i). To his great mortification, he had obtained no additional preferment, or promotion, since the year 1672 (k). But King James the Second, to whom he had rendered himself very acceptable, nominated him to the Bishopric of Oxford, vacant by the death of the excellent Dr Fell: and he was accordingly consecrated at Lambeth, October 17, 1686 (l); being allowed to hold with it the Archdeaconry of Canterbury in commendam (m). He had shewed himself all along too complaisant and obsequious to the Court, but this high dignity entirely gained him over, and made him ready even to sacrifice his religion to his ambition [K]. However, to reward his obsequiousness, he was not only made a Privy-Counsellor (n), but also by a royal mandamus was constituted President of the rich college of St Mary Magdalen in Oxford [L]. ‘dresses and Protestations of Loyalty from your dutiful Subjects of the Church of England: I thought it not improper or unseasonable to consult the Records of the best and purest times of our Religion for precedents of this loyal Practice, and after an accurate, diligent, and impartial Enquiry, I dare in their names declare to Your Majesty and all the Christian world, their infinite abhorrence of all Treasonable and Rebellious Attempts against all Sovereign Powers whatsoever, as the rankest contradiction to their Christian Faith, and the boldest Blaspemy against their own Sovereign Lord. So that though your Majesty were as much an Enemy as you are a Patron and Protector of the Church, whoever shall at any time, or upon any pretence, offer any Resistance to any of Your Royal commands, must forever renounce his Saviour, the four Evangelists, and the Twelve Apostles, to join with Mahomet, Hildebrand, and the Kirk, set up the pigeon against the dove, the scimiter against the cross, and turn a Judas to his Saviour, as well as a Cromwell to his Prince’—In Part the Second, there is (what one would not look for in such a work) a long and elaborate Proof of the Spuriousness of Procopius's Anecdota, or Secret History (19).—It was upon occasion of these Books that Bishop Burnet makes the following reflections (20) ‘He [Dr Parker] had exalted the King's Authority in matters of Religion in so indecent a manner, that he condemned the ordinary form of saying the King was under God and Christ, as a crude and profane expression; saying, that though the King was indeed under God, yet he was not under Christ, but above him. Yet not being preferred as he expected, he writ after that many books, on design to raise the authority of the Church to an independence on the civil power.’

[K] And made him ready even to sacrifice his religion to his ambition.] This we have attested in two Letters written about that time. In the first, sent from a Jesuit of Liege to a Jesuit of Fribourg, and dated 2 Feb. 1683, N. S. is this passage. . . . ‘The Bishop of Oxford himself seems to be a great favourer of the Catholick Faith; he proposed in council, whether it was not expedient, that one College at least in Oxford should be allowed the Catholicks, that they might not be forced to be at so much charges, in going beyond sea to study? but it is not yet known what answer was made. The same Bishop having invited two of our Noblemen, [i. e. Roman Catholicks] with others of the Nobility, to a feast, drank the King's health to a certain heretical Lord there, wishing his Majesty good success in all his undertakings. Adding also, that the Religion of the Protestants in England, did not seem to him in a better condition, than Buda was before it was taken; and that they were next to Atheists that denied that Faith.’—In the other letter, which is from the Jesuit Father Edouard Petre, a privy counsellor to King James, directed to Father La Chaise, and dated Feb 9 are these words. . . . ‘The Bishop of Oxford has not yet declar'd himself openly; the great obstacle is his wife, whom he cannot rid himself of: His design being to continue Bishop, and only change communion; as it is not doubted but the King will permit, and our Holy Father confirm: tho' I do not see how he can be farther useful to us in the Religion he is in, because he is suspected, and of no esteem among the Hereticks of the English Church; nor do I see that the Example of his Conversion is like to draw many others after him, because he declar'd himself so suddenly. If he had believed my counsel, which was to tempo-

‘rize for some longer time, he would have done better; but it is his Temper, or rather Zeal, that hurried him on’ These two Letters were first printed in ‘A Third Collection of Papers relating to the present Juncture of Affairs in England, &c.’ (21) and the first of them hath been inserted afterwards in Echard's, and in Rapin's Life of King James the Second, and other Lives of that Prince.

[L] But also by a royal mandamus was constituted President of St Mary Magdalen college in Oxford] There is an excellent account of that whole transaction, in a pamphlet printed in 1688, 4to. and intituled, ‘An impartial Relation of the whole Proceedings against St Mary Magdalen college in Oxon, in the year of our Lord 1687; containing only matters of fact as they occurred.’ The substance of which is as follows: Dr Henry Clark President of that college dying on or about the 31st of March 1687, the Vice-President called, on that day, a meeting of the Fellows in the Chapel, in order to appoint a day for the election of a new President; and the 13th of April was then unanimously agreed on, with power to prorogue the election to the 15th as they should see cause, beyond which time it was not in their power to defer the same. Accordingly, a citation, or præmonition, was fixed upon the Chapel-door of the college, signifying the day, and summoning all the absent Fellows to repair home to the ensuing election, as their statutes directed. The Court hearing of this vacancy, and wanting to make that noble college a seminary for Jesuits (22), issued, on the 15th of April, a mandate to the Fellows, requiring them forthwith to elect and admit one Anthony Farmer M. A. President of their college. The Fellows hearing of that mandate, drew up a petition to the King, April 9, wherein they represented to his Majesty, That the said Mr Farmer was a person in several respects incapable of being their President, according to their founder's statutes; and earnestly besought his Majesty, either to leave them to the discharge of their duty, and consciences, according to his late gracious Toleracion, and their founder's statutes; or to recommend such a person who might be more serviceable to him, and the college. But the King's Answer was, That he expected to be obeyed. The mandate being delivered to the Fellows, April 11, by Rob. Charnock, one of their own body (the same that was afterwards executed for being in a plot against King William) they did not comply with it; Mr Farmer being unqualified for the Presidentship, as he had never been Fellow of that college, nor of New-college, in which are the only persons capable of being chosen by their statutes; and moreover, being a man of an infamous character. Therefore, April 15, the utmost time they could defer the Election according to their statutes, they proceeded to a regular election, and chose for their President John Hough, B. D. a Fellow of their college; the same who was afterwards the most worthy Bishop of Oxford, of Lichfield and Coventry, and lastly of Worcester. The Court highly incens'd at this proceeding, cited, on the 28th of May, the Vice-President and Fellows, to appear before the Privy Council at Whitehall the 6th of June following. At which time their Answer and Reasons not being allowed, Mr Hough's election was declared void, and he was removed from the Presidentship the 22d of June. But, on the 27th of the same month, the Fellows presented to the Commissioners for Ecclesiastical Affairs, such convincing reasons why they elected not Farmer, and such strong certificates of his repeated and avowed Immoralities, that even the Court grew quite ashamed of him, and dropt him.—They set up withstanding which, he became so contemptible, and his authority in his diocese was so very insignificant, that when he assembled his Clergy, and desired them to subscribe an Address of Thanks to the King, for his Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, they all unanimously refused (o). The last effort he made to serve the Court, was, his publishing 'Reasons for abrogating the Test [M].'<sup>c</sup> But, full of shame and vexation at seeing his next Bishop Parker for the Presidentship, and sent this Mandate to the Fellows. "James Rex. Trusty and well beloved, We greet you well: Whereas the place of President of our college of St Mary Magdalen is now void, our will and pleasure is, That we do hereby authorize and require you forthwith, upon receipt hereof, to admit the Right Reverend Father in God Samuel Lord Bishop Oxon, into the said place of President, to hold and enjoy the fame, with all the rights, &c. thereunto belonging, any statute or statutes, custom or constitution to the contrary, in any wise, notwithstanding, wherewith we are graciously pleased, and do accordingly hereby Dispense in his behalf: And so, expecting your ready Obedience herein, we bid you farewell."—Dated Aug. 14th, 1687.—The Bishop thereupon wrote a Letter to the senior Fellow of the college; wherein he says, "I am indisposed, as I have been for some time, and not in a condition as yet to travel; and therefore my request to you is, That upon receipt of the King's pleasure, you would do me the favour to admit me by proxy, (i. e.) either the next senior Fellow under yourself, resident, or either of my Chaplains, Mr William Wickins, or Mr Thomas Collins, whom I depute in my stead, which is as valid in law, as if I were present myself; and is the most usual and customary practice." But the Fellows desired to be excused from obeying that mandate; as carrying in it a breach of their Founder's statutes, and a deliberate perjury of themselves.—The King being on his progress, shortly after, and coming to Oxford, sent an order to the Fellows to attend him, Septemb. 4; at Christ-church; where this very unkingly Dialogue passed between him and them. "King. What's your name, are you Dr Pudsey? Dr P. Yes, may it please your Majesty. K. Did you receive my letter? Dr P. Yes, Sir, we did. K. Then you have not dealt with me like Gentlemen, you have done very uncivilly by me and undutifully. . . Here they all kneeled, and Dr Pudsey offered a petition, which his Majesty refused to receive: And said, K. Ye have been a stubborn turbulent college, I have known you to be so these 26 years: You have affronted me in this. Is this your Church of England Loyalty? One would wonder to find so many Church-of-England-men in such a business. Go home, and shew yourselves good members of the Church of England. Get you gone; know I am your King, I will be obey'd; and I command you to be gone: Go, and admit the Bishop of Oxon Head, Principal; What d'ye call it—of the college.' (One that stood by, said President) I mean President of the college. Let them that refuse it look to it; they shall feel the weight of their Sovereign's displeasure.—The Fellows going out of the lodgings were call'd back.—K. I hear you have admitted a Fellow of the college, since you receiv'd my Inhibition, &c.—After some discourse upon that head; he went on thus.—'Get you gone home, I say again; go, get you gone, and immediately repair to your Chapel, and elect the Bishop of Oxon, or else you must expect to feel the weight of my hand.—The Fellows offered again their petition on their knees.—K. Get you gone, I will receive nothing from you, till you have obey'd me, and admitted the Bishop of Oxon.—Upon which they went immediately to their chapel, Dr Pudsey proposing whether they would obey the King, and elect the Bishop of Oxon? They answered in their turns, 'They were as ready to obey his Majesty in all things that lay in their power, as any of the rest of his subjects: But the electing the Bishop of Oxon, being directly contrary to their statutes, and the positive oaths they had taken, they could not apprehend it in their power to obey Him in this matter.'—The King, unable to get his will that way, ordered a Royal Visitation of Magdalen college; which began Octob. 21. And, in the course of it, on the 25th Mr Wickins, as proxy for Bishop Parker, was installed in the chapel. Immediately after which, the Commissioners conducted him to the President's lodgings, where knocking three times, and the door not being opened, they return'd to the common room, and commission'd one of the King's messengers, and a tiptaff, to fetch a smith to force it open, which was done in the Commissioners presence.—The issue of the whole is well known; namely, the Deprivation, or Suspension, of almost all the members of the college.

[M] Reasons for abrogating the Test] This book was licensed by the Earl of Sunderland, Secretary of State, Decemb. 10, 1687, and was published the 16th of the same month. The whole title of it, is, 'Reasons for abrogating the Test, imposed upon all Members of Parliament Anno 1678, Octob. 30, in these words: I A. B. do solemnly and sincerely, in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare, That I do believe that in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper there is not any Transubstantiation of the Elements of Bread and Wine into the Body and Blood of Christ, at, or after the Consecration thereof by any person whatsoever: And that the Invocation or Adoration of the Virgin Mary, or any other Saint, and the Sacrifice of the Mass, as they are now used in the Church of Rome, are superstitious and idolatrous. First written for the Author's own satisfaction; and now published for the benefit of all others whom it may concern.' Lond. 1688, 4to. Now the Reasons he gives why the Test ought to be repealed, are, 1. 'Because it doth not only diminish, but utterly destroy the natural Rights of Peage, and turns the Birbright of the English Nobility into a precarious Title: So that what was in all former ages only forfeited by Treason, is now at the mercy of every Faction or every Passion in Parliament. 2. Because of its dishonourable Birth and Original; it being the first-born of Oats's plot, and brought forth on purpose to give credit and reputation to the Perjury. 3. Because of the incompetent Authority by which the law was enacted: It is a law of an Ecclesiastical nature, made without the authority of the Church, contrary to the practice of the Christian world in all ages, and indeed to our Saviour's own commission, who settled all power of government, and especially the Legislative (which is the highest act of it) upon the officers of his own kingdom; so that for any other Order of Men, to assume the exercise of any such Authority to themselves, is no less than to depose him from his throne, by disowning, neglecting, and affronting his commission to his Catholick Church. 4. Because of the Uncertainty and Fallshood of the matters contained in the Declaration itself; as First, 'That there is no Transubstantiation in the Sacrament of our Saviour's Body and Blood. And secondly, 'That the Invocation of Saints and the Mother of God is Idolatry.—Now, (adds he) to oblige the whole Nobility of a Nation to swear to the Truth of such abstruse and uncertain Propositions, which they neither do, nor can, nor indeed ought, to understand; and this upon penalty of forfeiting the privileges of their Birth right, is such a monstrous and inhumane piece of Barbarity as could never have enter'd into the thoughts of any man, but the infamous Author of it, neither into his (as malicious as his nature was) but in his fierce pursuit of Princely blood; for that was the only design of all his actions after the starting of the Otesian villainy (of which this test was the first Sacrament) to pursue and hunt down the Heir of the Crown; which all the world knows, and is now satisfied, he sought by numberless Perjuries, tho' by nothing more than this Test, by which he stript his Royal Highness of the guards of his most faithful friends; and when he was left alone, it was an easy matter to come to his person, and in him to the Monarchy; so that the very next thing that followed immediately upon it, was the black Bill of Exclusion.'—The design of the rest of the Book, is to endeavour to palliate, varnish over, or represent in false colours, the most absurd, senseless and irrational doctrine of Transubstantiation; and ill-laid projects unsuccessful, and being undoubtedly self-condemned for his apostacy; he dyed, with a broken heart, at the President's lodgings in Magdalen-college, March the 20th, 1687.8, and was buried, on the 24th of the same month, in the outer chapel of the college (p). Mr Collier says (q), that our author 'was very considerable for his parts and learning, and had a very good pen.' But others do not give him so favourable a character. 'He was, says one (r), a man of no judgment, and of as little virtue, and as to religion rather impious. He was covetous and ambitious; and seemed to have no other sense of religion but as a political interest, and a subject of party and faction. He seldom came to prayers, or to any exercises of devotion; and was so lifted up with pride, that he was become insufferable to all that came near him. There was an entertaining liveliness in all his books: but it was neither grave nor correct.' Parker, says another author (s), 'has but few readers at this day, being a high-flown affected writer, entirely devoted to the Court, and scarce notable for any thing besides smart satyrical expressions. When King James the Second ascended the throne, he was one of the Romish mercenaries, and prostituted his pen in the defence of Transubstantiation, and the Worship of Saints and Images; in which cause having but ill success, and falling into contempt with all good men, trouble of mind threw him into a distemper, of which he soon died unalmented.' He left a son named Samuel, who was a learned and ingenious man, and a writer [N].

to impose upon the Reader, by boldly affirming, 'That the ancient Fathers, from age to age asserted the real and substantial presence in very high and expressive terms (23);' and, That Christian writers since, and even the Protestants, have plainly asserted and maintained the same Doctrine; which is well known to be false in general.—He likewise takes great pains to excuse, and explain away, the shameful Idolatry practised in the Church of Rome. And, in the conclusion, he gives it as his opinion, 'That Idolatry made the Plot, and that the Plot made Idolatry, and that the same Persons made both (24).—Several Answers were made to this extravagant piece; and, among the rest, these following. 1. 'An Enquiry into the Reasons for Abrogating the Test imposed on all members of Parliament, offered by Sa. Oxon.' By G. Burnet D. D. Lond. 1688, 4to. Dr Burnet gives us the reasons why he engaged in this answer (25). 'This [Bishop Parker's] book against the Tests raised such a disgust at him, even in those that had been formerly but too much influenced by him, that when he could not help seeing that, he sunk upon it. I was desir'd to answer his book with the severity that he deserved: And I did it with an acrimony of stile, that nothing but such a time, and such a man, could in any sort excuse.' 2. Reformation asserted, in answer to the Bishop of Oxon's fallacious Reasons, and precarious assertions against it.' &c. 5. Mr Goodwin, a Dissenting Teacher, answered part of it, in a treatise, wherein he proved, that 'Transubstantiation was a peculiar Article of the Roman Catholick Faith, which was never owned by the ancient Church, or any of the Reformed.' 6. Published in 1690, 4to. Part of it is inserted among Sir Leoline Jenkins's Letters (26). Likewise he left in manuscript, a History of his own Time, which was published in 1726, 8vo, with this title, Reverendi admodum in Christo Patris Samuelis Parkeri, Episcopi non ita pridem Oxoniensis de rebus sui temporis Commentariorum Libri quatuor, e Codice manuscripto ipsius Auctoris manu castigato nunc primum in lucem editi. Two English translations of it were soon after published, one of which was done by the Rev. Tho. Newlin, some time Fellow of Magdalen college Oxon.

PATRICK [SYMON], one of our late most pious and most learned English Divines, and successively Bishop of Chichester and Ely; was born at Gainsborough in the county of Lincoln, September 8, 1626 (a). His father was a Mercer of good credit in that place, who designing his son for a scholar, sent him to school to one Mr Merryweather, an excellent Latinist, as appears by his translation of Sir Thomas Browne's Religio Medici (b). He was admitted Sizar June 25th, 1644, into Queen's-college in Cambridge, of which he was elected Fellow March 1, 1648 (c): and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1647, that of Master in 1651, as likewise that of Bachelor of Divinity in 1658 (d). Having received Holy Orders about 1651 [A], from Joseph Hall Bishop of Norwich, at Higham, where he had retired after the loss of his Bishopric; he was soon after taken as Chaplain into the family of Sir Walter St John of Battersea, who gave him that living about the beginning of the year 1658 (e): upon which his Fellowship was declared void (f). In 1661, he was elected Master of Queen's-college; notwithstanding, and in opposition to, the Court's recommendation of Mr Antony Sparrow for that place; but the affair being brought before the King and Council, was soon decided in Mr Sparrow's behalf (g), and some of the Fellows, if not all, that had sided with Mr Patrick, were ejected (h). Earl of Bedford to the Rectory of St Paul's Covent-garden [B], and instituted September 23, 1662 (i). He became very useful in that then polite parish, by his excellent instructions and good example: and, what endeared him very much to his parishioners, he continued amongst them all the time of the great plague in 1665. Nay, we are told, that out of a special regard to them, he civilly refused the Archdeaconry of Huntingdon, which was offered him, lest it should take him off too much from his cure (k). Having sufficient reasons for dislike to his old college; when he wanted to proceed in Divinity, he entered himself in Christ's-church-college in Oxford. And there, June 27, 1666, was incorporated Bachelor of Divinity, as he was at Cambridge; and, the fifth of July following, admitted Doctor in Divinity (l). About that time, he was Chaplain in ordinary to his Majesty. On the 17th of July 1672, he was installed Prebendary of Westminster; and was some time Sub-dean of that church (m). His next promotion was the Deanry of Peterburgh, into which he was installed August 1, 1679 (n). Here, as in all his other stations, he did all the good in his power; and set up weekly communions (o). He also completed and published the History of the Church of Peterburgh, which had been compiled and left in MS. by Symon Gunton [C]. In 1680, he was offered the great living of St Martin's in the Fields, by the Lord Chancellor Finch [D]; but he refused it, on account of the difficulties attending that large cure, and the true love and esteem he had for his parishioners of St Paul's Covent-garden (p). During King James the Second's reign, he was one of those eminent champions, who defended the Protestant Religion against the violent attacks of Popery. The King, in order to gain over, or at least to mollify him, sent for him; and, after some very civil discourse, desired him to remove of his zeal against his Church, and quietly enjoy his own Religion. But the Doctor answered with a suitable resolution, That he could not give up a religion so well proved as that of the Protestants (q). In 1686, he and Dr Jane had a conference with two Romish Priests, in the King's presence, who was desirous of bringing over the Earl of Rochester to Popery [E]: but that conference, instead of perverting the Earl, served only to confirm him the more in the Protestant faith (r). Dr Patrick opposed also, to the utmost of his power, the reading of his Majesty's Declaration for Liberty of Conscience. And he assisted Dr Tenison, in setting up a school at St Martin's, to confront the Popish one, opened at the Savoy, for seducing the youth of the town into Popery (s). He had also a great

[B] Mr Patrick was presented by William Earl of Bedford to the Rectory of St Paul's Covent-garden.] For this unexpected favour, he makes his acknowledgments to his generous Patron; in the Dedication of his Paraphrase on the Book of Job, to his Lordship. Which begins thus. 'My Lord, though I have not pursued the design, which I have long had in my thoughts, of making some publick acknowledgment of my obligations to your Lordship, for placing me, when I thought not of it, in this station which I hold in Covent-Garden: yet I have onely deferred it, till the most proper opportunity, as it seems to me, for this small expression of my gratitude.'

[C] He also completed and published the History of the Church of Peterburgh, which had been compiled by Symon Gunton.] The author, Symon Gunton, was a native of, and Prebendary of Peterburgh, Vicar of St. John's in the same city, and also Rector of Filkerton near Lincoln. He dyed in 1676 (1). Having left in manuscript the History of the Church of Peterburgh, our learned Dean published it in 1686. fol. With a large Supplement, from page 225, to 332, containing a fuller account of the Abbots and Bishops of Peterburgh, than had been given by Mr Gunton.

[D] In 1680, he was offered the great living of St Martin's in the fields; by the Lord Chancellor Finch.] For this favour, undoubtedly, it was that he made the following handsome acknowledgment to his Lordship, in the Dedication of the second volume of The Psalms paraphras'd. '—It is so unusual in this Age, to confer Benefits unfought, especially such as your Lordship was pleased lately to think me worthy of; that I ought to have the higher esteem, not merely of your Lordship's singular kindness to me, but chiefly of that noble principle of Vertue in your mind from whence it purely flowed.'

[E] In 1686, he and Dr Jane had a Conference with two Romish Priests, &c.] The occasion of that Conference is thus related. * Great endeavours were used, to bring Laurence Hyde Earl of Rochester, Lord High-Treasurer, in King James's reign, to embrace Popery; but in vain. At length, his Lordship being prest and fatigued by the King's intreaties, told his Majesty. 'That to let him see it was not through any prejudice of education, or obliquity, that he persevered in his Religion, he would freely consent to bear some Protestant Divines dispute with some

Popish Priests, and promis'd to side with the conquerors." Thereupon the King appointed a Conference to be held at Whitehall, at which his Majesty and several persons of honour were present with the Earl of Rochester. The Protestant Champions, were, Dr Patrick, and Dr William Jane, [the two Chaplains then in waiting.] Those on the Popish side, were one Gifford, a Doctor of the Sorbonne; and Mr Tilden, who having turn'd Papist at Lisbon, went under the name of Dr Godden: And the subject of their dispute was, The Rule of Faith, and, The proper Judge in Controversies. This Conference was very long; and at last the Romish Doctors were press'd with so much strength of reason and authority against them, that they were really put to silence. Whereupon the Earl of Rochester openly declared, "That the Victory the Protestant Divines had gain'd, made no alteration in his mind, being beforehand convinc'd of the Truth of his Religion, and firmly resolv'd never to forsake it." The King going off abruptly, was heard to say, he never saw a bad cause so well, nor a good one so ill maintain'd (2).—Bishop Burnet adds the following circumstances. 'That the King desired of the Earl, he would suffer himself to be instructed in religion. He answered, he was fully satisfied about his religion. But upon the King's pressing it, that he would hear his priests, he said, he desired them to have some of the English clergy present, to which the King consented: only he excepted to Tillotson and Stillingfleet. Lord Rochester said, he would take those who should happen to be in waiting; for the forms of the Chapel were still kept up. And Doctor Patrick, and Jane were the men.—Patrick (adds Burnet) told me, that at the conference there was no occasion for them * to say much. The Priests began the attack. And when they had done, the Earl said, if they had nothing stronger to urge, he would not trouble those learned Gentlemen to say any thing: For he was sure he could answer all that he had heard. And so answered all with much heat and spirit, not without some scorn, saying, were these grounds to persuade men to change their religion? This he urged over and over again with great vehemence. The King, seeing in what temper he was, broke off the conference, charging all that were present to say nothing of it (3).'

great share in the Comprehension projected by Archbishop Sancroft (u) [F]. At the Revolution, being justly considered as one of the chief ornaments of the Church of England, he was advanced to the Bishopric of Chichester, vacant by the death of Dr John Lake; and consecrated October 13, 1689 (u). Soon after, he was appointed one of the Commissioners for reviewing the Liturgy (w) [G]: and employed, with others of the new Bishops, in settling the affairs of the Church of Ireland. On the second of July, 1691, he was translated to the Bishopric of Ely, vacant by the deprivation of Dr Francis Turner for refusing to take the oaths (x). He discharged all Episcopal functions with the utmost application, zeal, and integrity: and, at the same time, did very great service to his See; not only by procuring a fee-farm rent of one hundred pounds a year, to be settled upon himself and successors, out of Hatton-garden [H], and the messuages thereupon erected (y): but also by obtaining an act of parliament to lease the manor house and demesne lands of Downham in the Isle of Ely, and for clearing himself and others from dilapidations there (z). He likewise made great improvements at his palace at Ely. But, in the mean time, he was improving in a more lasting manner, and greatly benefitting, the whole world, by his most excellent writings; of which a general account is given below [I]. He dyed at Ely, May the 31st, 1707, in the eighty-first year of his age (a): and

[F] He had also a great share in the Comprehension projected by Archbishop Sancroft.] The best account of that Comprehension is given in a Speech of Dr Wake, then bishop of Lincoln, and afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, at the Tryal of Dr Sacheverell; of which the substance follows. . . . Archbishop Sancroft, says he, 'foreseeing some such revolution, as soon after was happily brought about, began to consider, how utterly unprepared they had been at the Restoration of King Charles II. to settle many things to the advantage of the Church, and what a happy opportunity had been lost, for want of such a previous care, as he was desirous should now be taken, for the better and more perfect establishment of it. — And he at the same time was considering, what might be done to gain the Dissenters, without doing any prejudice to the Church. The scheme was laid out, and the several parts of it were committed, not only with his approbation, but likewise direction, to such of our Divines of the Church, as were thought the most proper to be intrusted with it. His Grace took one part to himself; another part was committed to Dr Patrick. The reviewing of the daily service, and the communion book, was refer'd to a select number of divines, of whom Dr Sharp, afterwards Archbishop of York, and Dr Patrick were two. The design was, to improve and enforce the discipline of the Church, to review and enlarge the liturgy, by correcting some things, and adding others, &c (4).

[G] He was appointed one of the Commissioners for reviewing the Liturgy.] And, as he had an excellent Talent in the Devotional way, he revis'd the Collects throughout the whole course of the year; most of them being made anew and render'd more suitable to the Epistles and Gospels of the day. This he perform'd with so much Elegance and Purity of stile, with so much pious force and ardor, as nothing could tend more to excite Devotion in the minds of the hearers, and to raise up their Souls to God (5).

[H] Out of Hatton garden.] In 1579, Queen Elizabeth prevailed upon R. Cox, bishop of Ely, to grant to Sir Christopher Hatton a long lease of Ely-house in Holbourn. And though the house was recovered again, yet part of the precincts remained to the Hatton-family; and have been, to their great advantage, built upon, and several streets erected, known by the name of Hatton-garden (6).

[I] By his most excellent Writings, &c.] They were all designed for the service of piety, virtue, and true religion: But as they are many and various, I shall range them, for the reader's ease, under these four heads. I. Miscellaneous, comprehending the first published by him. II. Sermons. III. Tracts against Popery. IV. Paraphrases, and Commentaries, upon the holy Scriptures. — I. The Miscellaneous. 1. 'Mensa Mystica; or, A Discourse concerning the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper. In which the ends of its Institution are so manifested; our Addresses to it so directed; our Behaviour there, and afterward so composed; that we may not lose the Benefits which are to be received by it; with several Prayers and Thanksgivings inserted to make it of more use.' To it is added, 'Aqua Genitalis, a Discourse concerning Baptism. First delivered in a Sermon at Alballows

Lumbard-street, Octob. 4, 1658. Into which is since inserted a brief Discourse to persuade to a Confirmation of the Baptismal Vow.' London, 1658. 8vo. 2. 'The Hearts Ease: Or a Remedy against all Troubles. With a consolatory Discourse, particularly directed to those who have lost their Friends and dear Relations. By Symon Patrick, Preacher at Battersea.' London, 1659. 12mo. A second edition came out in 1660. and a fifth, enlarged, in 1682. To the eighth, are added Two Papers, written in the time of the Plague in 1665. 3. 'Jewish Hypocrisy, a Caveat to the present Generation. Wherein is shewn both the false and the true way to a Nation's or Person's compleat Happiness from the sickness and recovery of the Jewish state. Unto which is added, a Discourse upon Mic. 6. 8. [preached before the late Lord Mayor and Aldermen at Paul's] belonging to the same matter.' By Symon Patrick B. D. Minister of the word of God at Battersea. London, 1660. 4. 'The Parable of the Pilgrim: written to a Friend.' London, 1668. 4to. 5. 'An Exposition of the Ten Commandments.' London, 1668. 8vo. 6. 'A friendly Debate betwixt two Neighbours, the one a Conformist, the other a Nonconformist, about several weighty matters. Published for the benefit of this city. By a lover of it, and of pure religion.' It was licensed Nov. 7, 1668. The first and second parts were published in 1669 8vo. and the third in 1670. The publication of this work having given great offence to the Nonconformists, the Author added a Preface to the 6th Edition, in 1684. wherein he explains his design in the following words. . . . 'As it was written to take down the pride and insolence, wherewith the Nonconformists began at that time to treat us, and to persuade men to conform themselves to the established orders; so to give them withall a true notion of religion; to preserve them from being abused with phrases; to instruct them in many parts of their Christian duty; to inform them wherein Christianity doth chiefly consist, and what will make them thoroughly good; and, particularly, how necessary a part of Christian piety it is, to obey the public laws, which no way contradict the laws of God; and to live in unity with their Christian brethren. What is to be done also for the restoring of this Unity, is here declared. — But tho' (adds he) these and such like things are the whole scope of this Book, yet the Author of it hath been loaded with many hard censures and unjust reproaches, as if he had done the greatest wrong, not only to them, but to true Religion' . . . Judge Hale in particular, as Mr Baxter tells us (7), was pleased to express so great a dislike of the Debate, and the Ecclesiastical Polity (8), "as tending to the injury of Religion itself, that he wished the Authors would openly profess, that they wrote for themselves, and no more abusively pretend it was for Religion." But it must be remembered, that wise and good men are wont sometimes to overshoot themselves, when they are angry; and that they are never more apt to be so, than when those beloved schemes which they have been long in drawing, and of which they have entertained an high opinion, are rejected and torn in pieces. . . . This is all the fault, that I can think of, wherewith this Author (9) can be justly charged.

was buried in his cathedral. A monument was soon after erected to his memory, with an

- ‘ He was not then, nor is now, for that project of Comprehension in favour of which every body knows Sir M. Hale was strongly prepossessed. The Debate, as he angrily calls it, lay in the way of that, and lay cross to it. But as for his charge of the Author’s writing for himself, I can demonstrate, that as things then stood, it was impossible (unless we will suppose him to have been a fool) he should have any such respect to secular advantages, which he might thereby reap, save only the preserving himself by preserving the government; which he was bound to do as a member of this church and kingdom, which he loves unfeignedly, and whose present constitution he will always endeavour steadfastly to uphold. For they, whom he opposed, had too much power, he knew very well, at that time to obstruct him in such a design; and as they used all their interest to depress him, so they had such an influence, I can prove, upon some who are now dead and gone, that by their means they did actually keep him down a long time from rising at all in the world. Which he the more contentedly endured, because he had the testimony of his conscience, that this book was not contrived to serve any worldly interest; but, quite contrary, notwithstanding any prejudice it might do him in this world, faithfully to represent unto men the truth, as it is in the Lord Jesus. Which could not be done indeed, without exposing the follies, nay infidelity sometimes, of some persons, who would be thought the only, or the most sincere lovers of him. But in exposing them, Religion is so far from being injured, that it is rescued from the contempt, which must necessarily fall upon it, if they pass without controul for the most religious people.’—Such is the Apology the learned Author makes for himself. To which may be added, That exposing nonsense, cannot prejudice Good-sense and true Religion.—And as the Nonconformists were daily attacking the Church of England, where could be the fault in defending it? But our learned Author’s crime, was, That he defended it too well, in the opinion of his adversaries.—To return to the rest of his works: He published, 7. ‘The Christian Sacrifice. an inscription [K]. This pious Prelate was one of the learnedest men, and one of the best writers, in his time. His style is even and easy, his compositions rational, and full of sound and good sense. But his talent in the Devotional way especially, was most excellent; truly affecting and sublime; free from the unnatural flights, indecent familiarities with the Supreme Being, and that fulsome enthusiasm, which abound in the compositions of most Ascetics. His Paraphrases and Commentaries on the holy Scriptures, are also excellent in their kind; and the most useful of any ever published in the English language. Bishop Burnet ranks him among those many worthy and eminent Clergymen in this nation, who deserved a high character, and were indeed an honour to the Church, and to the age in which they lived (b).

A Paraphrase upon the Books of Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon. With Arguments to each Chapter, and Annotations thereupon. Lond. 1685. 8vo. These Paraphrases have been reprinted several times in 8vo. as also in two volumes 4to. and one volume folio. 5. A Commentary on the first Book of Moses called Genesis. Lond. 1695. 4to. The preface is dated April 10, 1694. It was afterwards, followed with Commentaries upon the rest of the Historical Books of the Old Testament, to the end of Esther: The whole being comprized in nine volumes in 4to. They were reprinted in two volumes folio, 1727.—Our learned Author undertook also a part of the new Book of Homilies, projected by Archbishop Tillotson. His share in that work, was to examine carefully the Gospels and Epistles for the whole year, to see how they agreed with this scheme, and to select such other portions of the Gospels and Epistles, as might agree better with all the parts of it, and to prepare Collects for them. In which work he made a good progress (10).—To him, likewise, the world is indebted for the publication of 'Reliquiæ Raleighianæ;' being Discourses and 'Sermons on several subjects;' by Walter Raleigh D. D. 4to. Lond. 1679 (11).

PEARSON, PIERSON, or PEIRSON [JOHN], a most learned English Divine, and Bishop of Chester, in the XVIIth century, was the son of Mr Robert Pearson, Rector of Creak and Snoring in Norfolk, by Elizabeth, one of the daughters of Dr Vaughan, successively Bishop of Bangor, Chester, and London (a). He was born at Creak (b), or at Snoring, February 28, 1612-13 (c), and sent in May 1623 to Eaton-school, from whence he was elected into King's-college, Cambridge, April, 1632 (d) [A]. In 1635 he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, and that of Master in 1639 (e), being Fellow of the college: but it seems he resigned his Fellowship soon after, and continued in the college in quality of a Fellow-commoner (f). December 30, 1639, he was collated by Bishop Davenant to the Prebend of Netherhaven in the church of Sarum (g). In 1640, he was made Chaplain to the Lord Keeper Finch (b); who gave him a Living [B] in Suffolk. Upon the breaking out of the civil war, he became Chaplain to George Lord Goring, whom he attended to Exeter, and other parts of the West. About the year 1643,

[A] From whence he was elected into King's-college in Cambridge in April, 1632.] J. Walker says it was in 1630 (1), and A. Wood in 1631 (2); which last seems the most probable, according to the time that he took his Bachelor of Arts degree.

[B] Who gave him a living in Suffolk.] The authors of the General Dictionary say, that it was the Living of Torrington in Suffolk. There is no such living as Torrington in Suffolk. There is, indeed, in Norfolk, and in the Crown's gift, the Vicarage of Torrington in the Deanry of Lynn: and this last perhaps was the living which was given to Mr Pearson. —But, after all, there is great reason to question, whether he had such a Living till the year 1661, when, by virtue of the Lady Margaret's Professorship, he became possess'd of the Rectory, or Sine-cure, of Torrington in Norfolk, which was annexed to that Professorship by King James I. Aug. 26, 3<sup>o</sup>. regni (3).

1643, he was appointed Minister of St Clement's East-cheap, London (but by whom doth not appear), vacant by the deprivation of Mr Benjamin Stone (i); and there preached those Sermons, which he framed afterwards into his most excellent Exposition of the Creed (k) [C]. In May 1657, he, and the learned Mr Peter Gunning, had a dispute with two Papiſts, on the subject of Schism; a false, adulterated, and imperfect copy of which was published at Paris in 1658 [D]. On the Restoration of King Charles the Second, his merit and great learning being his best recommendation, he was collated August 17, 1660, by William Juxon Bishop of London, to the Rectory of St Christopher's behind the Royal Exchange (l): September 5th he was created Doctor in Divinity (m); and installed, September the 22d following, into the fifth Prebend in Ely-cathedral; which he exchanged, October 17, 1661, for the first Prebend in the same church (n). The 26th of September, 1660, he was installed Archdeacon of Surrey (o): and November 30. following, made Master of Jesus-college in Cambridge; which Masterſhip he quitted in April 1662 (p). In the year 1661, he was one of the Commissioners, and chief managers, at the Savoy-Conference; wherein he acquitted himself with great applause (q) [E]. He was also one of the learned Divines, appointed for examining and reviewing the Common-Prayer (r); and for publishing a new Latin translation of it (s). The 28th of June, 1661, he was appointed Lady Margaret's Professor of Divinity at Cambridge, and proved a singular ornament to the chair (t). Upon the death of Dr Ferne, he was admitted, April 14, 1662, Master of Trinity-college in the university just now mentioned (u); whereupon, he resigned, in the August following, his Prebends of Ely and Netherhaven, and his Rectory of St Christopher's (w). Having continued about ten years Master of that college, with great reputation; he was deservedly advanced to the Bishopric of Chester, vacant by the death of the very learned Dr Wilkins, and consecrated February 9, 1672, holding with it in commendam the Archdeaconry of Surrey, and the Rectory of Wigan in Lancashire (x). Having enjoyed his Bishopric upwards of thirteen years, he dyed July 16, 1686, and was buried, without the least inscription or grave-stone, within the communion-rails of his own cathedral (y). He had, in his life-time, given 250 pounds towards the rebuilding of St Paul's cathedral, London (z). And in his Will, dated January 2, 1677, which had a codicil added to it, dated June 18, 1685, he gave some legacies to the Poor, &c. (a) [F]. He published only a few things [G], but they are excellent in their kind, and shew a great deal of learning and [C] His most excellent Exposition of the Creed.] It was first printed at London in 1659, 4to. and reprinted many times since in folio with improvements. The twelfth Edition came out in 1741. He dedicated it, 'to the right worshipfull and wel beloved the Parishioners of St Clements East Cheap;' and he tells them in that dedication. . . . . 'Some years have passed, since I preached unto you upon such Texts of Scripture as were on purpose selected in relation to the Creed, and was moved by you to make those meditations publick. But you were pleas'd then to grant what my inclinations rather led me to, that they might be turned into an Exposition of the Creed itself.'—This learned Exposition is an accomplish'd Work, for Style and Method. And the repeated Editions of it, are a sufficient indication of its value. But, as it is almost in every one's hands, we need say nothing further in its praise.

[D] Had a Dispute with two Papiſts . . . . an imperfect Copy of which was published at Paris in 1658.] It was printed under this title, 'Schisme Unmaskt: Or, A late Conference betwixt Mr Peter Gunning, and Mr John Pierſon, Ministers, on the one part, and two Disputants of the Roman profession on the other: wherein is defined both what Schisme is, and to whom it belongs. With a brief Recapitulation; wherein at one view may be seen, the whole Drift of this Conference, for such as want either Learning to reach, or Leisure to read the whole Treat. And all is concluded with a Decision of the main Question, whether Protestants, or those of the Roman Church, be Schismaticques.' One of the Roman Catholic Disputants went under the several names of Spencer, Tyrwhit, and Hatcliffe: The other was a Physician.—As for the adulterations and omissions in the Edition, Mr T. Smith gives the following account (4). 'The Romanist who put forth an edition [of it,] hath fo changed, transpos'd, added, diminished, and made of it what he list, that I believe it will be as soon owned for your [I mean not J. S. but H. D's] Conference, as Mr Pearson's, or Mr Gunning's. I must now tell you further, that that relation cannot expect to be regarded by Mr P. or any sober person, which is disclaimed and disowned by three of the four, who were disputants, viz. by both the Protestants, and half the Papiſts. But chiefly I must intreat you to consider, whether the inserting above 200 lines at a time, as a part of the conference, which never was part of it, besides all professed additions; secondly, whether the leaving out whole sheets of the Protestants, which the Papiſts thought too hard to answer; and thirdly, the scarce suffering any one argument and answer of both to come together, but casting usually parts of the same paper of Mr G. many score leaves asunder one from another, be not a scandal, that any Christian would desire might be covered with silence?'—This Conference was reprinted at Oxford, in King James the Second's reign, under this title, The Schisme of the Church of England demonstrated, in four Arguments formerly proposed by Dr Peter Gunning and Dr John Pearson, &c. But Dr William Saywell, Master of Jesus College in Cambridge, animadverted upon it, in a pamphlet intitled, The Reformation of the Church of England justified, &c. Cambridge 1688. 4to.

[E] Wherein he acquitted himself with great applause.] And this, even in the judgement of Mr Richard Baxter, who was one of the most prejudiced and stiff opponents. 'Dr Pearson (saith he) and Dr Gunning did all their work, but with great Difference in the Manner. Dr Pearson was their true Logician and Disputant, without whom, as far as I could discern, we should have had nothing from them, but Dr Gunning's passionate Invectives mix'd with some Arguments. He disputed accurately, soberly and calmly (being but once in any passion) breeding in us a great respect for him, and a persuasion that if he had been independent, he would have been for Peace, and that if all were in his power, it would have gone well: He was the Strength and Honour of that Cause which we doubted whether he heartily maintained (5).'

[F] He gave some legacies to the Poor, &c.] He gave twenty pounds to the Poor of St Oswald's in Chester city; twenty pounds to Great Snoring Poor, in his native county of Norfolk; and a hundred pounds to his nephew Dr Thane, then Archdeacon of Chester (6).

[G] He published only a few things.] Besides his Exposition of the Creed, he was author of, 1. A Preface, to the 'Golden Remains of the ever memorable Mr John Hales of Eaton college.' Wherco, as he declares, and judgment, particularly his Vindication of St Ignatius's Epistles [H]. Some pieces of his were published after his decease [I]. As to his Character; He was a very good preacher;

declares, he speaks no more, than ' his own long experience, intimate acquaintance, and high veneration grounded upon both, did freely and sincerely prompt him to.' II. ' No Necessity of Reformation of the publick Doctrine of the Church of England, with a Vindication of it in Answer to Dr Burgess his Word, by way of postscript.' Lond. 1660. 4to. III. He was one of the Editors of the Critici Sacri, or Collection of Critics and Commentators upon the Bible, nine volumes folio, as appears by the Epistle to the Reader, which is subscribed by John Pearson Archdeacon of Surrey; Ant. Scattergood Canon of Lincoln; Francis Gouldman Rector of South Okendon in Essex; and Richard Pearson Fellow of King's college. IV. He wrote the learned Preface, Præfatio Parænetica, to J Field's Edition of the Septuagint, Cambr. 1665. 12mo. which is subscribed with the two Letters J. P. V. In 1667, he made a Funeral Oration upon the death of Matthew Wren, Bishop of Ely (7). And preached, in 1658, in the Church of St Michael Royal London, a Sermon at the funeral of John Cleveland the poet (8). But we do not find, these two were ever made public. VI. He printed, ' A Sermon preached before the King upon the 19th of March 1671, on Eccles. xii. 14. Published by his Majesty's special command.' Lond. 1671. 4to. VII. He compiled the Annals of St Cyprian, Annales Cypriani, sive tredem Annorum, quibus S. Cyprianus inter Christianos versatus est, Historia Chronologica. Printed with Bishop Pell's beautiful Edition of St Cyprian's works. Oxon. 1682. folio. VIII. He left in manuscript very large Additions to Hesychius's Greek Lexicon: Which are, or lately were, in the possession of Mr Thomas Osborne, Bookfeller in Gray's-inn, London (9). IX. Some of his Verses, upon K. Charles I. having the Small-pox, in 1632; and the Death of Anne Dutchess of York in 1671; are printed in the Cambridge Collections made upon those occasions. We shall present the Reader with some of them, as the Books are very scarce, in order to shew our learned Author's talent for Poetry.

[H] Particularly his Vindication of St Ignatius's Epistles.] The title of it is, Vindiciæ Epistolarum S. Ignatii. Autore Joanne Pearson Presbytero. Accesserunt Isaaci Vossii Epistolæ duæ adversus David Blondellum. Cantabr. 1672. 4to. This Book was occasioned by the Controversy that was agitated, in the last century, concerning Episcopacy. Such as wrote in favour of it, having urged the Authority of Ignatius's Epistles; their Adversaries, unable to elude the force of them, thought fit to reject them in the gross, as All forged and spurious. So did D. Blondel, and J. Daillé in particular: The former in his Treatise, De Episcopis & Presbyteris; and the latter in his work, De Scriptis quæ sub Dionysii Areopagita, & Ignatii Antiocheni VOL. V. No. CCLXXVII.

nomibus circumferuntur Libri duo: Quibus demonstratur, illa subditiia esse, diu post Martyrum, quibus falso tribuuntur, obitum fiza. Now there having been Fifteen Epistles published under S. Ignatius's name, three in Latin, and twelve in Greek; our learned Author rejects the Latin ones as spurious; admits five of the Greek ones to be of doubtful authority; and asserts the Genuineness and Authenticity of the Seven other Greek Epistles, mentioned by Eusebius. With him concurs the learned L. E. Dupin, in his Nowvelle Bibliothéque des Auteurs Ecclesiastiques (11).

[I] Some pieces of his were published after his decease.] They were published by his nephew, Dr John Thane, Archdeacon of Chester, in 1688. 4to. under this title, V. Cl. Joannis Pearsonii, S. T. P. Cestriensis nuper Episcopi, Opera Posthuma Chronologica &c. viz. De Serie & Successione primorum Romæ Episcoporum Dissertationes duæ: Quibus præsguntur Annales Paulini, & Lectiones in Acta Apostolorum. Singula prælo tradidit, edenda curavit & Dissertationis novis Additionibus auxit H. Dodwellus, A. M. Dubliniensis: Cujus etiam accessit De eadem Successione usque ad Annales Cl. Cestriensis Cyprianicos, Dissertatio singularis. The first part is the Annals of St Paul, from his conversion to his death; i. e. from the year 34 to the 68th of Christ, according to the vulgar æra. Next follow five Lectures upon the Acts of the Apostles, being undoubtedly some of those he read as Lady Margaret's Professor. And then comes what is most curious in the book; namely, Two Dissertations concerning the Order and Succession of the first Bishops of Rome. In the first; he begins with observing, That the most antient Ecclesiastical Writers do not distinguish the Times, either by the years of Christ, or the Roman Emperors, the Consuls, or the like. Nay, that none of them happen to mention an Emperor and a Pope together, and in the same subject, as contemporaries. And, that both Popish and Protestant Chronologers acknowledge the great Obscurity of those early times (12). Two Catalogues of the Popes have been transmitted down to us; One by Eusebius in his Eccles. Hist. Lib. v. C. 12. and the other by the Latin Writers: Each of them hath the years of the several Popes annex'd; but with a wonderful diversity; and, according to our learned Author, they deserve no manner of credit in the two first centuries. The Successions of the Bishops, in the Churches founded by the Apostles, were carefully kept; as is evident from the Fathers of the second and third centuries, and even of the fourth, arguing from thence for an uninterrupted succession. But the Day of each Bishop's Death was not therein mention'd, till after the middle of the 3d century: when the Hereticks endeavouring to break the chain of Apostolical tradition, Pope Fabian appointed notaries to collect the exact dates of the Martyrdoms, or deaths of the first Bishops of Rome. In Chap. vi. he enquires, whether St Peter and St Paul founded the Church at Rome? And, after observing, That it cannot be prov'd from Scripture, whether St Peter was, or was not, at Rome; He makes it out from several passages of the antientest Christian Writers, That St Peter was actually at Rome. The remainder of this Dissertation is chiefly employed in confuting the writings of Salmasius and Blondel against Episcopacy: In the course of which, he shews, that the Babylon mentioned in St Peter's Epistle (13), was Babylon in Egypti. For it could not be Babylon in Assyria; since it lay in ruins, and had ceased for many years being the capital of the Assyrian Empire; which honour devolved first upon Seleucia, and afterwards upon Ctesiphon, as it was in St Peter's time.——In the second Dissertation, he examines particularly the Catalogue of the Bishops of Rome; and proves, that Cletus and Anacletus are one and the same person; that Linus dyed in the Apostles time; &c. He takes a good deal of pains to fix the times of Clement, Euaristus, Alexander, Xyftus, and Telephorus. And occasionally confutes the notion entertained by Salamasius and Blondel, Of several Bishops, or Presbyters, being together; and at the same time, at Rome.——These Dissertations are written with that accuracy and judgment, that they have been admired and quoted by the most curious and learned men in foreign countries (14).

preacher; a person of great judgment, and general learning; particularly, very accurate and exact in Chronology, and thoroughly acquainted with the writings of the Fathers, and Ecclesiastical History (b). To which Bishop Burnet adds (c), that he 'was in all respects the greatest Divine of the age; a man of great learning, strong reason, and of a clear judgment. He was a judicious and grave preacher, more instructive than affective; and a man of a spotless life, and of an excellent temper. His book of the Creed is among the best that our Church has produced.' But adds Burnet, 'He was not active in his Diocese, but too remiss and easy in his Episcopal function, and was a much better Divine than a Bishop. He was a speaking instance of what a great man can fall to: for his memory went from him so entirely, that he became a child (d) some years before he died.'

He had a younger brother, named RICHARD, born at Creake, and educated at Eaton-school. From whence being elected to King's-college in Cambridge in 1646, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1650, afterwards that of Master, and was also Fellow of the college. In the year 1659, he was candidate with Mr Croune for the Rhetoric Professorship in Gresham-college, which was carried by the latter. And in 1662, he was appointed Under-keeper of the royal library at St James's. October 8, 1667, he was chosen Law-professor at Gresham-college. In 1669, he went out Doctor of the Civil Law at Cambridge, when the Prince of Tuscany visited that university. He died at Cambridge August 5, 1670. He was a most excellent Scholar, a most admired Grecian, and a great Traveller; and died, as was vulgarly reported, a Roman-Catholic (e).

PELL [JOHN], an eminent Mathematician, was descended of an ancient family in Lincolnshire, whence this branch having removed some time into Sussex, our author had his birth in that county, on the first of March, 1610, at Southwyke, of which place his father, Mr John Pell, was then Minister; but he did not live to see his son above six years of age, who, after that loss, was put to a Grammar-school, then newly founded at Stanning in the same county. Being a youth of a surprizingly forward genius, he passed through the school in a few years, and was admitted of Trinity-college in Cambridge at the age of thirteen, as well skilled in the learned languages as most of those who had spent seven years in the university. In this situation he continued his studies with unabated eagerness; an excellent habit of body rendered the usual help of recreation unnecessary, and it was very rarely that he suffered any to call him off from pursuing his sole delight (a). In Mr Pell's genius two extraordinary talents were united, which rarely meet in the same person. To a wonderful facility in learning languages, was joined a peculiar turn to the Mathematics; inasmuch, that, at the age of eighteen, he drew up a Description and Use of the Quadrant, written for the use of a friend, in two books; and the same year he held a correspondence with the famous Mr Henry Briggs, upon the subject of Logarithms (b). In 1630, he wrote Modus supputandi Ephemerides Astronomicas (quantum ad motum Solis attinet) paradigmata ad ann. 1630 accommodato (c). And A Key to unlock the Meaning of Johannes Trithemius, in his Discourse of Steganography; which he imparted to Mr Samuel Hartlib and Mr Jacob Homedæ (d). Having taken his degree of Bachelor of Arts at the usual period, he proceeded to that of Master this year, when he left Cambridge; and making a visit to Oxford, was incorporated in the same degree in that university in 1631 (e). He was now twenty-one years of age, remarkably handsome in his person, and in great reputation and esteem for his literary accomplishments; being, besides Hebrew, Greek, and Latin, master of the Arabic, Italian, French, Spanish, and High and Low Dutch, languages; and was also much talked of, on account of his skill in the Mathematics. These united accomplishments of person and parts, recommended him to Miss Ithamaria (f), the second daughter of Mr Henry Reginolles of London, whom he married the following year, on the third of July, and by her became the father of four sons and as many daughters. He seems, indeed, to have been inclined early to a married state; otherwise, with such uncommon literary merit, he could not have failed of meeting with all the encouragements for continuing in his college which that Society could give him; but these he absolutely declined, never offering himself a candidate either for a Scholarship or Fellowship there (g). In the mean time, his fondness for the Mathematics grew daily stronger. On the seventh of June, the year before his marriage, he wrote A Letter to Mr Edmund Wingate on Logarithms; and, October 5th the same year, he drew up Commentaries in Cosmographiam Estedii. March 6, 1633-4, he finished his Astronomical History of Observations of Heavenly Motions and Appearances; and on the 10th of April following, his Eclipticus Prognosta, or the Eclipse Prognosticator, or Foreknower of Eclipses; teaching how by calculation to foreknow and foretell all sorts of Eclipses of the heavenly lights. In 1634, he translated the Everlasting Tables of Heavenly Motions, grounded upon the Observations of all Times, and agreeing with them all, by Philip Lansberg of Ghent in Flanders, and set forth by himself in Latin; now turned into English, and from the sexagesimal to the decimal Subdivisions, for the more ease in Calculations. On the 12th of June the same year, he committed to writing, The Manner of his deducing his Astronomical Tables out of the Tables and Axioms of Philip Lansberg. March 9, 1634-5, he wrote A Letter of Remarks on Mr Gellibrand's Discourse mathematical, on the Variation of the Magnetic Needle; and, on the third of June following, another on the same subject (b). In reality, a cultivation of mathematical learning took up all his thoughts, so that he projected an extraordinary model for their further advancement [A]. This being communicated by him in October 1639, to Mr Theodore Haak, that gentleman sent it to Merfennus in France; who passing censure upon it, our author wrote a piece in it's defence; which, though it proved not to satisfy his antagonist [B], yet he had the pleasure of having it approved by Des Cartes in 1640 (z). His eminence in mathematical knowledge was now so great, that he was thought worthy of a Professor's chair in that science; and, upon the vacancy of one at Amsterdam in 1639, by the death of Hortensius, Sir William Boswell, the English Resident with the States-General, made use of his interest for Mr Pell (k), who succeeded to it as soon as it was concluded to be filled up, which, however, happened not 'till December 1643. He executed this charge with the highest applause of the Hollanders [C]; and the following year he published a refutation, in two folio pages, of Longomontanus's pretended quadrature of the circle; upon which occasion he obtained the suffrages of the best Mathematicians in Europe [D]: and the Prince of Orange founding his Schola Illustris

[A] He projected an extraordinary model for their further advancement.] This paper being a curiosity in it's kind, we shall lay it before the reader. The general design is to promote the progress of these studies by, 1. Exciting a love for them. 2. To furnish the means for attaining them. 3. To facilitate and shorten the labour of attaining them. To obtain these ends, he proposes I. to write a Consiliarius Mathematicus, answering to these three questions. Qu. 1. What fruit or profit ariseth from the studies? 2. What helps are there for attaining it? 3. What order is to be observed in using those helps? To this purpose, it should contain, first, a plain and popular discourse of the extent of the Mathematics, with the profit that redounds first to the student himself, and then to the country, wherein there are many such grounded artists. 2. A catalogue of Mathematicians and their works in this order, first, A Synopsis of all the several kinds of mathematical writings, either extant in print or accessible manuscripts in public libraries, with several numbers set to every kind. 2. A Chronological Catalogue of all Mathematicians names of note, according to the order of time when their works first appeared. 3. A Catalogue of the writings themselves in the same order; after this manner, 1. The year. 2. The titles of the books, with the size and number of pages for references, as hereafter directed. 3. The year of the second edition. 4. The number of references to the Synopsis in the first page, by which numbers are known all the books of one sort upon any particular subject. 5. A Counsel directing to the best books in every kind, in what order, and how to be read, what to observe, what to beware, how to proceed, and keep all. 4. A Parænesis: first to all those who have means and leisure, and a wit not unapt for these studies, to set upon them on account of their profitableness; of the pleasure of hunting out hidden truths; and of the great ease of attaining them now more than formerly, by reason of the many great helps therein. Secondly, to the rich and wealthy to encourage this sort of students, setting apart the choicest of them to perfect the inventions to which their genius leads them; especially to all Princes and States, whom it concerns, to take a course, that their dominions may be better furnished with this sort of studies. That the way may be made less laborious and costly, and that the mathematical geniuses may be discovered and assisted. To this end it would be good II. To erect a publick Library containing all those books, and one instrument of every sort that hath been invented, with sufficient revenue to buy one copy of all those printed yearly in other countries. And secondly, to maintain a Librarian of judgment, whose business may be to peruse all books of such subjects to be printed within that country, and suppress what is not according to art, that learners be not abused, and to admonish the writers if they bring nothing but stale stuff. Upon his credit to approve excellent inventions, and impartially to commend the inventors to the rewarders. To receive, record, and place, one printed copy of every book so perused, sent into the library well bound, at the author's or bookseller's charge; to resolve any student that enquires about any problems, whether it has been done already or no, fearing lest he should actum agere. To receive all manuscripts brought in by way of gift, legacy, or the like. To maintain correspondence abroad, to know what is printed there. To take notice of all his countrymen that are fit to be teachers. To keep a catalogue of all such workmen as are able and fit to be employed in making mathematical instruments, and working upon wood, magnets, metals, glasses, &c. To give a testimonial after examination to all sorts of practisers, as pilots, masters, land-meters, accountants, &c. This he thinks the best course for making use of such helps as we have already, and for the obtaining better helps, it is proposed to employ fit artists. III. To write and publish these three new treatises, 1. Pandææ Mathematicæ, comprehending whatever may be gathered out of all the mathematical books and inventions already made, or that may be inferred as consecratories therefrom, citing the ancientest author in which each proposition is found, and branding all later writers if they be taken stealing or borrowing without acknowledgment, or (which is worse) expressly arrogating to themselves another man's inventions. This would bring that great library into far less room to the saving of more labour, time, and cost, to all students, than men can yet well imagine, but because this also would be too great and cumbersome to carry about us; let there be composed, 2. A Comes Mathematicus, comprehending in a pocket-book the usefulest tables, and the precepts for their use, in solving all problems, whether purely mathematical, or applied to such practices, as mens various occasions may require; and, lastly, that this kind of learning also may be no longer confined to books, let there be composed, 3. A Mathematicus ἀνταρχης, or an Instruction shewing how any Mathematician that will take the pains, may prepare himself, so as to be able, without the help of books, to resolve any mathematical problem as exactly as if he had a complete library by him (1).

[B] It was approved by Des Cartes.] Merfennus's censure was dated the first of November. To this Mr Pell wrote an answer, dated the 21st of that month, and Merfennus rejoined in a reply dated December 10th, all in the same year, 1639, and these with Des Cartes's judgment and approbation dated February 8th, 1640, are printed with a Latin copy of the model in Mr Hooke's Philosophic Collections as above cited.

[C] He read lectures with the greatest applause of the Hollanders.] His colleague Gerard John Vossius, styles him a person of various erudition, and a most acute Mathematician, and greatly applauds his lectures upon Diophantus, read at Amsterdam (2). The greatest part of that author's six books of Arithmetick were found among Mr Pell's manuscripts, and from these papers it appears, that in August 1644, he was preparing a new edition of Diophantus, in which he would have corrected the translation, and made new illustrations. He designed likewise to publish an edition of Apollonius, but laid it aside in May 1645, at the desire of Golius, who was engaged in an edition of that writer, from an Arabic manuscript given him at Aleppo eighteen years before (3).

[D] The suffrages of the best Mathematicians in Europe.] That this controversy was entered into by our author in 1644, appears from what Mr Bayle has inserted from Mollerus, who (4), among other things concerning this attempt of Longomontanus, having observed that Dr John Pell, the chief antagonist this Danish Professor had, inserted in his work whatever the most excellent Mathematicians of the age had communicated to him, proceeds thus: Quorum suffragia ac demonstrationes Theorematis; in cujus proba- at Breda in 1646, he invited Mr Pell in June to be Professor of Philosophy and Mathematics there, with the offer of a salary of a thousand guilders per annum (l). Our author accepted this proposal, and, upon removing to Breda, was eased of the philosophical lecture, but filled the mathematical chair (m), as he had before done at Amsterdam, with great success and reputation [E]; and bred up several scholars, who afterwards became eminent Algebraists. But his patron the Prince of Orange dying of the small-pox in 1650, and a war between the English and Dutch breaking out in 1652*, our author returned to England that year; and, in the beginning of 1654, was sent by Cromwell, then Lord Protector, Agent (n) to the Protestant Cantons in Switzerland. In the discharge of this post, he seated himself at Zurich, where he had afterwards the title of Resident, and was continued in that character 'till 1658, when, returning to England (o), he arrived so short a time before the death of Cromwell, that he had no opportunity of an audience from his Highness (p). Whatever were the Protector's motives for employing him, it does not appear that he negotiated any affairs of moment; and 'tis said, that while he was abroad, he did no ill service to the interests of King Charles the Second and the Church of England (q). However that be, it is certain that after the Restoration he took Holy Orders from the hands of Dr Sanderfon, Bishop of Lincoln; and, being ordained Deacon March 31, 1661, and Priest in June following, he was instituted, on the 16th of that month, to the rectory of Fobbing in Essex (r), with the chapel of Battlefden annexed, given him by the King (s). On the fifth of December following, he brought into the Upper House of Convocation the Kalendar, reformed by him, with the assistance of Mr Sancroft, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. In 1663, he was presented by Dr Sheldon, then Bishop of London, to the rectory of Laingdon in Essex, to which he was instituted the 23d of July (t). He was created Doctor of Divinity about this time (u), and his patron being promoted the next month to the see of Canterbury, made him one of his domestic chaplains (w). This is generally a step to higher preferment, and he might well flatter himself with the hopes of some dignity in the Church; but these were all cut off by his own imprudent conduct [F]. In the mean time, he made a distinguished figure in the Royal Society, of which he was declared a Fellow March 20, 1663, soon after the second charter was granted to that Body (x); and, pursuing his entirely beloved study, the Mathematics, he published in 1664, An Exercitation concerning Easter, in 4to. and the following year he assisted Mr Brancker, in preparing for sione totius Controversiæ cardo vertebatur dubii, und cum Pelliana (in Job. Pellii Controversiæ de vera Circuli mensura inter Longomontanum &c. An. 1644 exortæ, Parte 1. Amstelod. An. 1647) excusa, occurrent. That is, Whose suffrages and demonstrations of this doubtful theorem, on the proof whereof the hinge of the whole controversy turned, together with those of Pell, are to be found in part the first of the dispute between John Pell and Longomontanus, in 1644, concerning the true quadrature of the circle, printed at Amsterdam in 1647, 4to*. It must be observed, that Longomontanus published a piece in 1645, 4to; which he intitled, Controversia cum Pello de vera Circuli mensura. In this piece was contained an answer to some of his antagonist's remarks concerning his false reasoning; upon which our author perceiving that the point of the difficulty consisted in the proof of a single theorem, he first drew up a demonstration of it himself, and resolved to propose the thing to all the able Mathematicians of his acquaintance, in order to know their opinions. The persons who examined it, and sent him their demonstrations, were Messrs. de Roberval, Le Pailleur, Carcavi, Myrdorge, and Father Merfenne in France, Lord Charles Cavendish and Mr Hobbes of England, John Adolphus Fessius, a Mathematician of Hamburgh, John Lewis Wolzogen a free Baron of Austria, Gentleman of the Bedchamber to the King of Poland, Father Bonaventura Cavalieri an Italian, Professor of Mathematicks at Bologna; Golius, Professor of Mathematicks at Leyden, and one other Dutch Mathematician. Des Cartes also sent him a short demonstration upon the same subject, to join, as Baillet observes, in concert with the greatest Mathematicians in Europe, in that famous dispute between Longomontanus and Pell. His refutation was dated August 1st, 1644, and concludes thus: Abunde igitur sufficit hæc unica pagella tot chartis librisque aliquoties editis (5) refutandis; triumque horularum spatio nostra premens vestigia post pauculas multiplicationes & divisiones, tot annorum incredibiles Longomontani labores prorsus periisse videbis. Ita crescit Johannes Pellius Covitano-regnus, Anglus, Marteseos in illustri Amstelodamensium Gymnasio Professor. Calendis Sextilibus, anno 1644 (6). i. e. This single page is abundantly sufficient for refuting so many books and papers published and any one following our steps, will in three hours time see so many years incredible pains of Longomontanus entirely destroyed, only by a few multiplications and divisions. So think I, John Pell &c.

[E] He filled the chair at Breda with uncommon merit. While he held this post, besides others, he had William, Lord Brereton of Brereton in Cheshire, for his pupil, who, being sent by his grandfather George, Earl of Norwich, made an uncommon progress in Algebra under our author (7). His Lordship pursued this study as long as he lived. He was a great encourager of the Royal Society, of which he became an early member (8); and at his death, which happened in 1679, he left behind him the character of a good Algebraist, but an excellent Musician, both in practice and theory, having composed several pieces in that faculty (9). It is observable, that his son William, Lord Brereton, excelled in the same art, but died lunatic, at Brereton, about the year 1720 (10). As Mr Pell resided some years with his noble pupil at Brereton, some of his manuscripts were left there, particularly, a demonstration of the second and tenth books of Euclid's Elements, and the Ψαμμίτης of Archimedes †, which probably were the substance of some of his lectures at Breda.

[F] His imprudent conduct. It is the remark of Mr Wood, who tells us the doctor expected to be made a Dean, but that not being a person of activity, as others who mind not learning are, he could never rise higher than a Rector. In conclusion, the Antiquary gives a better reason for it, when he acknowledges that the doctor was a listless man in worldly affairs, and that his tenants and relations dealt so unkindly by him, that they cozened him of the profits of his parsonage, and kept him so indigent, that he wanted necessaries, even ink and paper, to his dying day (11); and we shall see presently that he was thrown into the King's-Bench prison for debt. It is true, his friends were unparadonable, yet, at the same time, he himself was undeniably very blame-worthy; such a conduct as is here represented, bespeaks a weakness, which, though, on account of his learning, it might render him an object of compassion, yet rendered him also a very unfit person to fill any dignity in the Church.

for the press An English edition of Rhonius's Algebra [G] (y); wherein he made several corrections, besides large additions, which were published with that treatise in 1668. After this, he drew up A Table of ten thousand Square Numbers, namely, of all the Square Numbers between 0 and a hundred million, and of their Sides, which are all the whole numbers between 0 and ten thousand, with an Appendix concerning the Endings of all Square Numbers. These tables were printed in 1672, in folio. But the incessant application which he gave to his studies; for the improvement of mathematical enquiries, taking him off of the necessary attendance to his private affairs, some debts were contracted, which occasioned him to be thrown more than once into the King's-Bench prison. Being reduced at length to the greatest indigence, Dr Whistler, in March 1682, invited him, then Censor and Registrar of the College of Physicians (z), to his house. He continued with the doctor 'till June following, when the ill state of his health requiring particular attendance, he was taken in by a grandchild he had living in St Margaret's church-yard, Westminster, whence at last, being removed to the house of Mr Cothorne, Reader of the church of St Giles in the Fields, in Dyot-street in that parish, he died there December 12, 1685; and was interred by the charity of Dr Richard Busby, head master of Westminster-school, and Dr John Sharp, Rector of St Giles's church, in the Rector's vault under that church (aa). The pieces published by our author have been mentioned in the course of this memoir; the fewness of them are esteemed a mark of his modesty, as being well able to have enlarged the number (bb), as appears in some measure from his manuscripts; a great quantity of these came after his death into the hands of Dr Busby, which Mr Hook reporting to the Royal Society, February 10, 1685-6, he was desired to use his endeavours to obtain them for the Society; but they continued buried under dust, and mixed with the papers and pamphlets of Dr Busby, in four large boxes, 'till June 1755, when Dr Birch, Secretary to the Royal Society, procured them for that body, by means of the Reverend Mr Richard Widmore, A. M. Librarian of the church of St Peter's Westminster, from the trustees of Dr Busby. The collection contains, not only Dr Pell's mathematical papers, letters to him, and copies of those from him; but likewise several manuscripts of Mr Walter Warner, the Philosopher and Mathematician, who lived in the reigns of King James the First and Charles the First (cc), and was particularly honoured in the mathematical republic, for the care and pains which he took to enrich it with the Algebra of Mr Harriot, whose just claim to several inventions and improvements in that excellent art, is clearly asserted against the pretensions of Des Cartes by Dr Wallis, with the assistance and informations of Dr Pell (dd) [H], who is also ranked among the improvers

[G] He made additions and illustrations to Rhonius's Algebra, &c. Mr Brancker having this book put into his hands in 1662, by a friend who desired it might be translated; he complied with that request, and having finished the translation, got it licensed for the press May 18th 1665, whither he sent it, under the title of, An Introduction to Algebra, with orders to reprint the six leaves of the author's incomposit numbers precisely as they stood in the original. But being informed a little while after of Dr Pell, as a person worthy to be made acquainted with the design before he proceeded further in the impression, and desirous of it, he waited upon the doctor, 'who, says he, I found not only very able to direct me, but also very willing so to do as far as his leisure would admit. He gave me diverse cautions concerning the work, he shewed me the way of making the table of incomposits, of examining and of continuing it as far as I would. He encouraged me to extend it to 100,000; telling me, that by the time I had calculated and printed that table, he hoped to be at leisure to review some of Monsieur Rhonius's problems, and to work them anew, and that he would send them to me with leave to publish them or keep them by me.' Mr Brancker had accordingly finished and printed that table, as also twelve sheets of the book, when he received the doctor's alterations which begin with problem 24th, p. 100, all from thence being his work to the end, as is also page 79, 80, 81, 82, which he sent last of all. So that instead of the first 124 pages of Rhonius, this hath just twice as many (12). The whole of Rhonius was not translated (13); being left out of the English edition for these reasons. Because the first part, handling the solution of circles, was superseded by some epistles of Des Cartes upon that subject in the third volume of his posthumous letters. The second part, treating of the geometrical composition and delineation of equations, was borrowed from Des Cartes, and the subject was also treated by Slusius in his Mesolabium in 1659, 4to. which book the author proposed to reprint and enlarge that summer, viz. 1668. The third part contains about 105 theorems, about sines, tangents, secants, &c. the doctrine whereof, together with what else is omitted in this English edition, and other considerable matters about equations was hoped from the pen of that excellent person (as Dr Pell is called) mentioned in the epistle to the reader (14). The truth is, Mr Brancker was in some doubt about the original performance, and therefore was desirous before he proceeded further to have the opinion of the publick upon it (15); and it appears that Mr John Collins, before Dr Pell's design was known, sent it to Dr Wallis, who examined the table of incomposits, made a catalogue of amendments which he proposed to have printed in a single leaf at the end of those made in page 198 (16), by Mr Brancker, to whom Mr Collis had also sent a letter while the book was in the press, wherein he writes, that though he knew none who accounted the introduction a bad one, yet others thought it might have been more plain, and ought to have been larger. As to himself, he says, he understood it fully upon reading it at Coventry in 1665, but that Dr Twisden who had studied (quodam modo) Algebra, as he believed, this twenty years, professed he could not understand it. It seems Kersey's Algebra was then ready for the press, which Collins mentions as an argument to be made use of by Mr Brancker to Dr Pell, to admit the first seven sheets of his introduction enlarged out of Kinkhuysen, to come out as Mr Brancker's translation, as soon as possible, signifying, that the doctor might then take what time he pleased to supply the defect at the beginning, and to enlarge and complete the book (17). Thus we see the true motive for Mr Brancker's breaking off as he did. And the reason of Dr Pell's engaging in the design will be found, when the reader is told that Rhonius had been his scholar at Zurich (18), and that Mr Brancker, though a Devonshire man, and bred at Exeter college in Oxford, yet at this time was particularly patronized by the Lord Brereton, who shortly after presented him to the living of Tilton in Cheshire (19). Add to this, that he first saw Dr Pell at the said nobleman's house (20).

[H] The information of Dr Pell. The discovery made by this information concerning Des Cartes's Plagiarism from Harriot's Algebra does particular honour to our country; and as the whole merit of it is entirely due to Sir Charles Cavendish, a gentleman of singular improvers of Algebra in the next place to Harriot [I], and 'tis certain he rivalled Oughtred both in diligence and in fondness for the art [K].

worth in all respects; and not only himself an excellent Mathematician, but a generous Mæcenas of the English Mathematicians in his time, especially Mr Oughtred and Dr Pell (12). Some account shall be given of him here as follows. He was younger brother to Will. Cavendish, the loyal Earl, Marquis, and Duke of Newcastle, as hath been already mentioned in this work. He was born, not improbably, about the year 1593 *, and from his youth inclined to learning and letters. He was knighted at Welbeck in Nottinghamshire on the 10th of August, 1619 (22), when King James the First did his brother the honour of lying there; and was returned for the town of Nottingham to the Parliament held in the 31st year of that King, as also to the other Parliaments in the 3d and 15th years of King Charles the First (23). When the rebellion broke out he followed his brother's fortunes, and was with him in all the considerable actions of those times, particularly in the battle of Marston-moor, wherein he very much distinguished himself. 'The Marquis of Newcastle, says my Lord Clarendon, with his brave brother Sir Charles Cavendish (who was a man of the noblest and largest mind, tho' the least and most inconvenient body that lived) charged in the head of a troop of gentlemen, who came out of York with him, with as much gallantry and courage as men could do (24).'

After this, retiring to Hamburg (25) with his brother the Marquis, he shared in his hard fortunes; and being with him at Antwerp, was with difficulty prevailed on to return to England, notwithstanding his estate had been under sequestration from the time he left the kingdom; and if he had not returned, was to have been sold. But he scorned to receive his estate from the usurpers then in power, and chose rather to have lost it, than compounded for it. His brother, the Earl of Newcastle, was obliged to get Chancellor Hyde, then at Antwerp, to persuade him to a composition, and nothing but his brother's necessities could prevail on him. His sister, the Countess of Newcastle, who set out with him on his journey to England, relates, that the money they had was hardly able to defray their expences to London, and obliged them to stay in Southwark, where Sir Charles sent for one that had been his steward, and giving him his watch to pawn, with that money paid their lodging there. From thence, they went into lodgings in Covent-Garden, and Sir Charles, by his agents, after some time agreed to pay 4500 l. for his estate; but the Parliament causing it to be surveyed again, made him pay 500 l. more, a larger sum than others had paid for much greater estates (26). During the negotiation for this agreement, he and the Countess were reduced to great straits, and it was some time before his rents could be received: but at length, with great difficulty, he borrowed 200 l. sterling to send over to his brother at Antwerp, who had wrote to him from thence, that if he was not presently relieved, he should be starved, his creditors being grown very impatient. His Lordship's estate being put up to be sold at that time, Sir Charles endeavoured to save his two chief houses, Welbeck and Bolsover, and for that purpose parted with some of his own lands, that they might not come into the enemy's hands; but before he could raise the money, Bolsover was sold, and was begun to be pulled down, which obliged him to buy it at a far greater rate, than was first offered for it.

After his stay in England for a year and a half, and the Countess his sister obtaining no relief for her Lord, they both resolved on returning to Antwerp, when he was seized with an ague which put a period to his life in the 63d year of his age (27), and was buried at Bolsover (28) the fourth of February, 1653; as he was never married, his estate fell in to his brother the Duke of Newcastle. His sister, the Duchess of Newcastle gives this account of him. 'His death, says she, was an extreme affliction to his brother the Earl, for they loved each other entirely. In truth he was a person of so great worth, such extraordinary civility, so obliging a nature, so full of generosity, justice, and charity, besides all manner of learning, especially in the Mathematicks, that not only his friends, but even his enemies, did much lament the loss (29).'

[I] He is ranked next to Harriot.] The advances made by the doctor in Algebra, are chiefly seen in his additions, &c. to Rhonius's Introduction already mentioned, in which he introduced the method, as it is called, of marginal working in that art. Thus, he first expounds in so many distinct lines all the data of given quantities of the question, and against them all the quaesita or quantities sought for on another margin, and if the quaesita exceed the data, he marks the overplus of the data with an \*, which denote the question to be so far indeterminate. Then he proceeds, by arguing from these, to make new equations, which are still severally set down in distinct lines, numbering all the equations in a middle column, that they may be more commodiously cited. He also marks by short indications in the remoter margin, from which of the precedent steps, and by what kind of argumentation, the equation which is adverse to it is inferred (30). The advantage of this method is evident, and needs no other, nor indeed can it have, a better recommendation from authority, than it received from Sir Isaac Newton, who makes use of it as the best in his Arithmetica Universalis. We must not omit likewise to observe, that besides Oughtred's marks  $\frac{1}{2}$ ,  $\frac{1}{3}$ ,  $\times :: =$ ,  $\surd$ , for addition, subtraction, multiplication, proportion, equality, and radicality, and these two of Harriot's  $>$ ,  $<$ , for majority and minority, Dr Pell introduced  $\div$ ,  $\ominus$ ,  $\omega$ , and  $\cdot$  for division, involution, evolution, and ergo.

These improvements regard the manner of an algebraical process. Next, as to the matter, the doctor, in the piece last mentioned, first gave the solutions of several problems of Diophantus, some such as Bachet, his famous commentator, either confessed he did not attain, or at least left obscure; and others, such as Des Cartes and Schooten had left doubtful, as not being by them thoroughly understood. It is observable, that our author declines the Exegesis numerosa of Vieta, which following writers use for finding the roots of equations (31). And the perplexed nature of that Exegesis was complained of both by Sir Isaac Newton and Dr Halley †.

[K] He emulated Oughtred in diligence and fondness for the art.] This will be readily allowed by the reader, when he sees the doctor's warm zeal upon this subject, in his model or idea of the Mathematicks already mentioned. 'As for the present idea, says he, I am so far from counting it merely impossible, that I see not why it might not be performed by one man without any assistants, provided he were not distracted with care for his maintenance, nor diverted by other employments. The excellency of this work, continues he, makes me with mine own nation the honour of first undertaking and perfecting this design.' Nay, he is so sanguine as to conceive he had some reason to hope it would be so; and that, from a persuasion that some might be found among the learned nobility and gentry, who would encourage it; though for his own part, he owns, he knew none such, even supposing them convinced of the possibility and likelihood of it's being effected. He likewise, in proceeding, grounds his hopes on the same fond reasoning, with regard to finding persons able to compose the three new treatises (32). 'And, says he, I the rather believe that there are many such, because, for my own part, I am come to such a confidence of my understanding the depth of that study, that were I to pen those Pandects, I should lay heavier laws upon myself, than I have mentioned; namely, first to lay down such an exact method in the process of making inventions, as from thence to deduce not only all that our ancestors have done, or even thought on, but also all the mathematical inventions, theorems, problems, and precepts, that it is possible for the working wits of our successors to light upon; and that in one certain unchanged order from the first seeds of Mathematicks to their highest and noblest applications; not setting them down at random as others have done, so that they seem to have light upon their problems, as well as the solution of them, by chance, but in such order that may shew them to have been found by one perpetual, constant, invariable process of art. For such an art men may invent, if they accustom themselves, as I have long done, to consider, not only the usefulness of mens works, and the meaning and truth of their writings; but also how it came to pass that they fell upon such thoughts, and proposed such ends, and found out such

'such means for them' He then goes on to shew the particular use of the Pandects, and observes, that it is easily seen how to contract them into a pocket-book for ordinary use, as in the Comes Mathematicus; but, continues he, so to lay them up in one's head as to need no book at all (according to my Desideratum in the Mathematicus ἀνίστασθαι) will perhaps seem utterly impossible to most, no man that ever I heard of having proposed such a scope to himself before. But perhaps they will conceive it more possible, if it please them to suspend their judgments, 'till they have considered what means may be used to fortify the imagination, to prompt the memory, to regulate our reason, and what effects may be produced by the uniting of these means, and the constant exercising them.' Hence, upon the whole, to convince his friend that this scheme was not a mere chimaera, he declares, that the consideration of the incomparable excellency, unstained pleasure, invaluable profitableness, and undaunted possibility of the whole design, had prevailed so far with him, that notwithstanding all the discouragements that he had met withal, he had done more towards it than a bare idea (33).

PENN [WILLIAM], founder of the flourishing colony of Pennsylvania in North-America; and son of Sir William Penn, Knight, Admiral of England, and one of the commanders at the taking of Jamaica [A]. He was born the 14th of October, 1644, on Tower-hill, in the parish of St Catharine's London; his mother being Margaret, daughter of John Jasper, of Rotterdam in Holland, Merchant. His first education was at Chigwell in Essex, where it is pretended he received the first impressions of his subsequent odd and enthusiastical notions [B]. Afterwards he went to a private school on Tower-hill, and had, besides, the advantage of a private tutor which his father kept in the house. In 1660 he was entered a Gentleman-Commoner of Christ's-Church in Oxford; and matriculated in October, that year, as a Knight's son. Here he continued two years, as we are told, and delighted much in manly sports at times of recreation (a). But, mean while, being influenced by the preaching of one Thomas Low, or Loc, a Quaker, he and some other students withdrew from the national form of worship, and held private meetings for the exercise of religion, where they preached and prayed among themselves. This giving great offence to the governors of the university, Mr Penn was fined

[A] Son of Sir William Penn, Knt. Admiral,—and one of the commanders at the taking of Jamaica] We have the following account of Sir William, in his epitaph, in Redcliffe-church in Bristol, where he was buried. That, 'he was born at Bristol, Anno 1621. [Out Mr Wood says, that it was at Mynety in Wiltshire (1).] son of Captain Giles Penn, several years Consul for the English in the Mediterranean; of the Penns of Penns-lodge in the county of Wilts, and those Penns of Penn in the county of Bucks, and by his mother from the Gilberts, in the county of Somerset, originally from Yorkshire: additied from his youth to maritime affairs: he was made Captain at the age of twenty one. Rear-Admiral of Ireland at twenty three, Vice-Admiral of Ireland at twenty five, Admiral to the Straits at twenty nine, Vice-Admiral of England at thirty one, and General in the first Dutch war at thirty two. Whence returning anno 1655, he was made a Parliament-man for the town of Weymouth; 1660 made Commissioner of the Admiralty and Navy, Governor of the town and fort of Kinsale, Vice-Admiral of Munster, and a Member of that Provincial Council; anno 1664, was chosen Great Captain Commander under his Royal Highness, in that signal and most evidently successful fight against the Dutch fleet.' Then he took leave of the sea, but continued still his other employments, till 1669, at what time, through bodily infirmities, he withdrew; and with a gentle and even gale in much peace arrived, and anchored in his last and best port at Wanstead in Essex, the 16th of Septemb. 1670, being then but forty nine years and four months old.'—His Proceedings in America, we may observe, are here entirely past over in silence: But, in Thurloe's State-papers (2), we have these minutes of them; which we hope will not be disagreeable to the reader.—Adm. Penn gave this account 12 Sept. 1655, to Oliver's Council.—Sailed from Portsmouth 26 Decemb. 1654.—29 Jan. arrived at Barbadoes.—30 March shipped the army at Barbadoes, and sailed the next day.—6 April arrived at St Christophers.—The 12th, saw the island of Hispaniola.—13th, came before St Domingo: they agreed that Buller and Holdip should stay with Penn before St Domingo, and to land those men to the wind-ward of the town, but they could not, and so sent them to the river Hinde: the other part went with the Vice-Admiral and rear-Admiral. Vice-Admiral landed the sea-regiment. The wind blew on the shore, that they could not look in H. bay, as they had resolved, and so went to the lee-ward.—14. Buller being sent, &c. said no landing at H. bay, but after they did land. Buller and Holdip's regiment being landed, marched over the river, and had order to go to a pass above near the town.—18. Ships plyed before St Domingo. The town shot through some of the ships, and they shot in the town.—19. Venables came on board, and said the Army was weary, and wanted water, and were retreated.—25. Army march'd up towards the town: the ships were ready to assist them, and some ships to run into the town, and also some to run into the harbour. This 25th, the enemy fell on them, the M. G. was slain, and they retreated. 29. Gen. Venables retreated, and we went to him to Hinde-bay, where discoursed with commissioners and officers, where they resolved not to attempt further, and desired to be transported to some other place. Reasons, because the soldiers betrayed them. After resolved for Hispaniola, but could get little intelligence.—May 3. army shipped.—4. the fleet met.—9. Saw Jamaica.—10. Came on shore.—15. the Army was in treaty with some of the people, and articles were made. There were not above 12 or 14 hundred men, women, and children upon the island: about 500 were men in arms.—24. called our commanders together, having before spoken with G. V. and other officers, to know what was further to be done. They said the army was fit to attempt nothing. And finding that they were in no condition to proceed, the men being sickly and the provision but little, we agreed that the station-ships go home, and the frigots stay.—25. came out of Jamaica.—Aug. 31. arrived at Portsmouth. - - - At his coming to England, he writ to Oliver Cromwell, who returned him no answer (3). And, upon his first appearing before the Council, he was committed to the Tower, for leaving his command without licence, to the hazard of the Army (4). . . . He had been Vice-Admiral in 1654, and was made Admiral of the White in 1665.

[B] Where it is pretended he received the first impressions of his subsequent odd and enthusiastical notions] At eleven years of age, being retired in a chamber alone, 'he was so suddenly surprized with an inward comfort and (as he thought) an external Glory in the room, that he has many times said, from that time he had the Seal of Divinity and Immortality, that there was also a God, and that the Soul of Man was capable of enjoying his Divine Communications.' This is A. Wood's account: which, by printing in Italics, shews to have taken either from W. Penn's books, or some of his friends.—He says himself in his Travels*, that the Lord first appeared unto him, about the 12th year of his age, Anno 1656. And, betwixt that and the 15th, the Lord visited him, and gave him divine Impressions of himself.

fin'd for non-conformity; and continuing still zealous in his religious exercises, was at length expelled his college (b). Upon his return home in 1661, he was severely treated by his father [C] on the same account, who at last turned him out of doors; but his anger abating afterwards, he sent him to travel into France in company with some persons of quality, where he continued two years or upwards, and returned well skilled in the French language, and accomplished with a polite and courtly behaviour [D]. Then he was entered into Lincoln's-Inn, to study the Laws, where he remained 'till the plague began to rage in London (c). In 1666, his father committed to his care and management a considerable estate in Ireland, which occasioned his residence in that kingdom. But instead of going into the diversions there, he took to a serious and retired way of life; and, by the preaching of Thomas Loe abovementioned at Cork, was prevailed upon to profess himself publicly a Quaker [E], and constantly to attend their meetings: in one of which, he was apprehended, with many others, in November 1667, and imprisoned, but by writing a letter to the Earl of Orrery [F], was soon after discharged. His father hearing of his having embraced Quakerism, sent for him to England; and finding him too much fixed to be brought to a general compliance with the fashions of the times, seemed inclinable to have borne with him in other respects, provided he would be uncovered in the presence of the King, the Duke of York, and himself; but, after fasting and supplication, as we are told, he refused to comply, whereupon his father turned him out of doors a second time. However, he retained so much fatherly affection for him, that when he was imprisoned for being at the Quakers meetings, he would privately use his interest to procure his discharge (d). About the year 1668, he became a publick Preacher among the Quakers; and published his first piece, intituled, Truth exalted [G]; as also, soon after, The Guide mistaken [H]; and, The Sandy Foundation shaken [I]. Being, the same year, committed to the Tower of London for his opinions, he wrote there several treatises, particularly, his No Cross no Crown [K]. After seven months imprisonment, [C] Severely treated by his father.] He says, that he was whipp'd, beaten, and turn'd out of doors by him in 1662 (5).

[D] And accomplished with a polite and courtly behaviour.] The author of his life adds, that 'a quite different Conversation had diverted his mind from the Serious Thoughts of Religion,' i. e. from Quakerism (6).

[E] Was prevailed upon to profess himself publicly a Quaker.] Other reasons were then assigned for his profession, as we learn from A. Wood (7). Namely, 'the loss of his Mistress, a delicate young Lady, that then lived in Dublin, or, as others said, because he refused to fight a duel.' But it is more probable, that he was thoroughly riveted in it, from the time of his seduction at Oxford by the said Tho. Low

[F] But by writing a Letter to the Earl of Orrery.] That letter is express'd in a very sensible manner, as may appear by the following extract from it. . . . 'To the Earl of Orrery, Lord President of Munster. . . . The occasion may seem as strange as my cause is just: but your Lordship will no less express your charity in the one, than your justice in the other. Religion, which is at once my crime and mine innocence, makes me a prisoner to a Mayor's malice, but mine own Freeman; for being in the assembly of the people called Quakers, there came several Constables backt with Soldiers, rudely and arbitrarily requiring every man's appearance before the Mayor; and amongst others violently haled me with them. Upon my coming before him, he charged me for being present at a tumultuous and riotous assembly; and, unless I would give bond for my good behaviour, who challenge the world to accuse me justly with the contrary, he would commit me. I asked for his authority, for I humbly conceive, without an Act of Parliament, or an Act of State, it might be justly termed too much officiousness. His answer was, A Proclamation in the year 1660, and new Instructions to revive that dead and antiquated order. I leave your Lordship to be judge, if that Proclamation relates to this concernment. That only was designed to suppress Fifth-monarchy killing spirits; and since the King's Lord-Lieutenant, and yourself, being fully persuaded the intention of these called Quakers, by their meetings, was really the service of God, have therefore manifested a repeal by a long continuance of freedom. I hope your Lordship will not now begin an unusual severity, by indulging so much malice in one, whose actions favour ill with his nearest neighbours; but that there may be a speedy releasement to all, for attending their honest callings, with the enjoyment of their families, and not to be

'longer separated from both. And though to dissent from a national System imposed by authority, renders men Hereticks, yet I dare believe your Lordship's better read in reason and theology, than to subscribe a maxim so vulgar and untrue; for, imagining most visible constitutions of religious government suited to the nature and genius of a civil empire, it cannot be esteemed Heresy, but to scare a multitude from such enquiries, as may create divisions fatal to a civil policy; and therefore at worst, deserves only the name of disturbers. But I presume, my Lord, the acquaintance you have had with other countries, must need have furnished you with this infallible observation, that diversities of Faith and Worship contribute not to the disturbance of any place, where Moral Uniformity is barely requisite to preserve the Peace (8).'

[G] Truth exalted.] The whole title of this piece is as follows. 'Truth exalted: in a short, but sure Testimony, against all those Religions, Faiths, and Worships, that have been formed and followed in the darkness of Apostacy; and for that glorious Light, which is now risen, and shines forth, in the Life and Doctrine of the despised Quakers, as the alone good old way of Life and Salvation. Presented to Princes, Priests, and People, that they may repent, believe, and obey. By William Penn, whom Divine Love constrains in an holy contempt to trample on Egypt's glory, not fearing the King's wrath, having beheld the Majesty of Him who is invisible.' In three sheets, 4to. Lond. 1668; reprinted, with additions in 1671.

[H] The Guide mistaken.] This was an answer to Mr Jonathan Clapham's book, intituled, 'A Guide to the true Religion.'

[I] The Sandy Foundation shaken.] The rest of the title is, 'Or, those so generally believed and applauded Doctrines, of One God, subsisting in three distinct and separate persons, the impossibility of God's pardoning sinners without a plenary satisfaction, the justification of impure persons by an imputative Righteousness; refuted from the authority of Scripture-testimonies, and right Reason. By William Penn, jun. a builder on that foundation which cannot be moved.' Six sheets, 4to. Written against Thomas Viucent a Presbyterian Minister

[K] No Cross no Crown.] The rest of the title of this, in the first edition, was, 'Or several sober Reasons against Hat-honour, titular respects, You to a single person, with the Apparel and Recreations of the times, in defence of the poor despised Quakers against the practice and objections of their Adversaries.' In 24 sheets, 4to. 1669. But, in the next edition, imprisonment, he was released; and went, in September 1669, to Ireland, where he preached among the Quakers (e). Returning to England, and the Conventicle-act prohibiting the meetings of Dissenters under severe penalties, he was committed to Newgate in August 1670, for preaching in Grace-Church-street. But being tried for that offence, with William Mead, at the Sessions at the Old-Baily, they were acquitted by the Jury (f) [L]. On the 16th of September the same year, his father dyed; and, being reconciled to him, left him an estate of 1500 pounds a year in England and Ireland (g). About this time, he held a publick dispute concerning the univerfality of the Divine Light, with Mr Jeremy Ives, an eminent Baptist preacher, at West-Wicomb in Buckinghamshire. The fifth of February, 1670-71, Mr Penn was committed again to Newgate, for preaching at a meeting in Wheeler-street London, and continued a prisoner six months. After his discharge he went into Holland and Germany (b). He married, in the beginning of the year 1672, Gulielma-Maria, daughter of Sir William Springett, formerly of Darling in Suffex; and then went and settled with his family at Rickmanfworth in Hertfordshire. The same year, he published a piece against Reeve and Muggleton [M]. In 1677, he travelled into Holland and Germany, in order to propagate Quakerism; and had frequent conversations with the Princess Elizabeth, daughter of the Queen of Bohemia [N], and sister to the Princess Sophia, grandmother to his present Majesty King George the Second (i). Upon his petition to King Charles the Second, and in regard to the memory and merits of his father in divers services, particularly in the sea-fight against the Dutch in 1665 under the Duke of York, he obtained a Patent, dated March 4, 1680 81: whereby was granted to him all that tract of land in America; bounded eastward on Delaware river from 12 miles northward of Newcastle to the 43d degree of northern latitude, and to extend five degrees in longitude from the said river; to be bounded northerly by the beginning of the 43d degree of northern latitude, and on the south by a circle drawn at twelve miles distance from Newcastle northward, and westward unto the beginning of the 40th degree of northern latitude, and then by a strait line westward to the limits of longitude abovementioned: erected into a province and feignorie, to be called Pensylvania (k). The design of it to be, to reduce the savage nations, by gentle and just manners, to the love of civil Society and the Christian religion; and to transport thither an ample colony, towards enlarging the English Empire and its Trade (l). Upon obtaining this grant, Mr Penn publish'd a Brief Account of the Province of Pensylvania, with the King's patent, and other papers [O]; describing the country, and proposing an easy purchase of lands, and good terms of settlement, for such as were inclined to remove thither. He published also, shortly after, the fundamental Constitutions of Pensylvania, in twenty-four articles [P]. And agreed, July 11, 1681, upon edition, the title was thus altered, 'No Cross no Crown. A discourse shewing the nature and discipline of the holy Cross of Christ; and that the denial of Self, &c.'

[M] He published a piece against Reeve and Muggleton. The title of it was, 'The new Witnesses proved old Hereticks: or, Information to the ignorant; in which the Doctrines of John Reeve and Lodoick Muggleton, which they stile Mysteries never before known, revealed, or heard of, from the foundation of the world, are proved to be mostly antient Whimfies, Blasphemies, and Heresies, from the evidence of Scripture, Reason, and several Historians, &c.' Lond. 1672. In this book, W. Penn confutes the following notions of Reeve and Muggleton. 1. 'That God is not an infinite spirit in every place at all times, but is in the shape of a man; and that man, in respect of his body, is the image of God. 2. That God did not create the heavens and earth out of nothing, but the substance was with God from eternity. 3. That the soul of man is generated and begot by the man and woman with the body; and that the body and soul are inseparable. 4. That the body and soul go to the dust, and rise together at the general resurrection. 5. That God descended with his body in the shape of a man, and dissolved himself into the Virgin's womb, and so brought forth himself a man, who, after he had lived to such an age, was crucified, and really died, or ceased to be either God or man, for three days and nights. 6. That God from all eternity, without any other inducement than his own pleasure, hath decreed some for salvation, and some for damnation; contrary to which, all their obedience or rebellion shall be in vain, to alter his determination.'

[N] And had frequent conversations with the Princess Elizabeth, &c.] This Princess was Abbess of Hervorden, and a great admirer of Philosophy and Poetry. She wrote several letters to Mr Penn, which he inserted in his Travels; published in 1694, 8vo. with this title, 'An Account of W. Penn's Travails in Holland and Germany. Anno MDCLXXVII. for the service of the Gospel of Christ, by way of Journal. Containing also divers Letters and Epistles writ to several great and eminent Persons whilst there.' These Travels are inserted in his Life, p. 50—116.

[O] A brief Account of the Province of Pensylvania, &c.] This was printed at London 1681, in two sheets in folio; and reprinted in 1682 in quarto.—Different from this, was another Brief Account of the Province of Pensylvania; printed in half a sheet in folio, in a small character, and set at the end of 'The Articles, Settlement, and Offices of the free Society of Traders in Pennsylvania, agreed upon by divers Merchants, &c.' Lond. 1682, in four sheets in folio, which articles were drawn up and published by Nic. More, James Claypole, and Philip Ford, Quakers. These Articles were twenty four in number, together with certain Laws to the number of forty, signed and sealed by the governor and freemen, or adventurers, in London, the 5th day of May, 1682.

[P] In twenty four articles.] The first article was in these words. 'In reverence to God, the Father of Light and Spirits, the Author as well as Object of all divine Knowledge, Faith, and Worship, I do, for me and mine, declare and establish, for the first fundamental of the Government of this country, that every person, that doth or shall reside therein, shall have and enjoy the Free Profession of his or her Faith

(n) Life, &c. as above, p. 115, &c. In order to secure them from any insults from the natives, he sent to them a Letter [Q], to conciliate their friendship; and appointed commissioners to treat with them, about settling the land, and to confirm a league of peace (n). In November 1681, he was elected member of the Royal Society (o). In 1682, he published The Frame of the Government of the Province of Pennsylvania, and a Charter of Liberties and Privileges to the people, dated 25 April, 1682 (p). The 30th of August following, he embarked at Deal for Pennsylvania, accompanied with many persons, especially Quakers (q): and, during his abode there, took all proper measures to cause his infant-colony to thrive and flourish. He planned, or laid out, his new town of Philadelphia in the most elegant manner [R]: and, the second of April, 1683, made some alterations in his first charter (r). In August following, he obtained from the Duke of York some lands [S], which were intermixed with those that had been granted him by the Crown (s). He returned to England in August 1684 (t). His friend King James the Second coming, soon after, to the Crown, he was admitted into a very great degree of favour with his Majesty: but it brought upon him the imputation of being a Papist [T]; and of promoting the bad designs of the Court,

To the same purpose, was one of the Articles, in the Settlement or Frame of Government, mention’d in the foregoing Note, viz. ‘ That all persons living in this Province, who confess and acknowledge the One almighty and eternal God to be the Creator, Upholder, and Ruler of the world, and that hold themselves obliged in conscience to live peaceably and justly in civil society, shall in no wise be molested or prejudiced for their religious persuasion, or practice in matters of Faith and Worship; nor shall they be compelled at any time to frequent or maintain any religious worship, place, or ministry whatsoever (g).’

[Q] He sent to them a Letter.— That letter was as follows.

‘ London the 18th of the 8th Month, 1681.

‘ My Friends,
‘ There is a great God and Power, that hath made the world, and all things therein; to whom you and I, and all people owe their Being and Well being, and to whom you and I must one day give an account for all that we do in the world. This great God hath written his Law in our hearts, by which we are taught and commanded to love and help, and do good to one another, and not to do harm and mischief one unto another. Now this great God hath been pleased to make me concerned in your part of the world, and the King of the country where I live, hath given me a great Province therein. But I desire to enjoy it with your love and consent, that we may always live together as neighbours and friends. Else what would the great God do to us, who hath made Us not to devour and destroy one another, but to live soberly and kindly together in the world? Now I would have you well observe, that I am very sensible of the unkindness and injustice that hath been too much exercised towards you by the people of these parts of the world, who have fought themselves, and to make great advantages by you, rather than to be examples of justice and goodness unto you, which I hear hath been matter of trouble to you, and caused great grudgings and animosities, sometimes to the shedding of blood, which hath made the great God angry. But I am not such a man, as is well known in my own country. I have great love and regard towards you; and I desire to win and gain your love and friendship by a kind, just, and peaceable life; and the people I fend are of the same mind, and shall in all things behave themselves accordingly. And if in any thing any shall offend you, or your people, you shall have a full and speedy satisfaction for the same, by an equal number of just men on both ‘ sides, that by no means you may have just occasion of being offended against them. I shall shortly come to you myself, at what time we may more largely and freely confer and discourse of these matters. In the mean time I have sent my Commissioners to treat with you about land, and a firm league of peace. Let me desire you to be kind to them and the people, and receive these presents and tokens, which I have sent you as a testimony of my good will to you, and my resolution to live justly, peaceably and friendly with you.

‘ I am

‘ W. Penn.’

By his kind and humane behaviour, Mr Penn so ingratiated himself with the native Americans, (or Indians, as they are very improperly named, for where is the river Indus in America?) that they have ever since express’d a great Veneration for his memory, and styled the Governor of Pennsylvania Onas, which in their language signifies a Pen. At the renewing of the Treaties with Sir William Keith the Governor in 1722, they call, more than once, William Penn a good man; and tell Sir William, We esteem and love you, as if you were William Penn himself (10).

[R] He laid out his new town of Philadelphia, in the most elegant manner. It consists of eight long streets of two miles, and sixteen cross streets of one mile each, in length: cutting each other at right angles, with proper spaces for publick buildings; and the whole laid out with much exactness. But, the situation of it being at the confluence of two large fresh-water-rivers, Delaware and Schuyl-kill, That renders the inhabitants obnoxious to pleuritick, peripneumonick, dysenterick, and intermitting fevers. There are in it about 2076 houses; public buildings, ware-houses, and out-houses not included (11). Mr Penn caused, ‘ An Account of the City of Philadelphia in the Province of Pennsylvania, newly laid out, with a Portraiture or Platform thereof;’ to be printed at the end of, his ‘ Letter to the Committee of the Free-society of Traders of the Province of Pennsylvania, residing in London, containing a general Description of the said Province, its Soil, Air, Water, &c.’ Lond. 1682. This Letter is dated at Philadelphia 16 Aug. 1683.

[S] In August following, he obtained from the Duke of York some lands.] James, Duke of York, sold, 24 August 1683, to William Penn the elder, his heirs and assigns, the town of Newcastle alias Delaware, and a district of twelve miles round Newcastle. And, by another deed of sale, of the same date, made over to the said William Penn, his heirs and assigns, that tract of land from twelve miles south of Newcastle, to the Whore Kills, otherwise called Cape Henlopen, divided into the two Counties of Kent and Suffex; which, with Newcastle-district, are commonly known by the name of the three lower counties upon Delaware river (12).

Court, by his frequent attendance there [U]. Upon that account being, at the Revolution, suspected of disaffection to the Government [W], and looked upon as a Papist, or a Jesuit having heard of it, and spoken of, and expressed his concern at the same, Mr Penn wrote to him the following letter.

Worthy friend,
Being often told, that Dr Tillotson should suspect me, and so report me a Papist, I think a Jesuit; and being closely pressed, I take the liberty to ask thee, if any such reflection fell from thee. If it did, I am sorry one I esteemed ever the first of his robe, should so undeservedly stain me, for so I call it; and if the story be false, I am sorry they should abuse Dr Tillotson, as well as myself, without a cause. I add no more, but that I abhor two principles in religion, and pity them who own them: the first is, Obedience upon authority without conviction; and the other, Destroying them that differ from me for God's sake. Such a religion is without judgment, though not without teeth. Union is best, if right; else charity; and, as Hooker said, The time will come, when a few words spoken with meekness, and humility, and love, shall be more acceptable than volumes of controversies, which commonly destroy charity, the very best part of the true religion; I mean not a charity that can change with all, but bear all, as I can Dr Tillotson, in what he differs from me, and in this reflection too, if said, which is not yet believed by

To which Dr Tillotson returned this Answer.

The demand of your letter is very just and reasonable, and the manner of it very kind; therefore in answer to it be pleased to take the following account. The last time you did me the favour to see me at my house, I did, according to the freedom I always use, where I profess any friendship, acquaint you with something I had heard of a correspondence you held with some at Rome, and particularly with some of the Jesuits there. At which you seemed a little surprized, and after some general discourse about it, you said, you would call on me some other time, and speak farther of it. Since that time I never saw you but by accident and in passage, where I thought you always declined me; particularly at Sir William Jones's chamber, which was the last time, I think, I saw you: upon which occasion I took notice to him of your strangeness to me, and told him what I thought might be the reason of it, and that I was sorry for it, because I had a particular esteem of your parts and temper. The same, I believe, I have said to some others, but to whom I do not so particularly remember. Since your going to Pennsylvania, I never thought more of it, till lately being in some company, one of them pressed me to declare, Whether I had not heard something of you, which had satisfied me, that you were a Papist. I answered, no, by no means. I told him what I had heard, and what I said to you, and of the strangeness that ensued upon it; but that this never went farther with me, than to make me suspect there was more in that report, which I had heard, than I was at first willing to believe; and that if any made more of it, I should look upon them as very injurious both to Mr Penn and myself. This is the truth of that matter; and whenever you will please to satisfy me, that my suspicion of the truth of that report I had heard was groundless, I will heartily beg your pardon for it. I do fully concur with you in the abhorrence of the two principles you mention, and in your approbation of that excellent saying of Mr Hooker's, for which I shall ever highly esteem him. I have endeavoured to make it one of the governing principles of my life, never to abate any thing of humanity or charity to any man for his difference from me in opinion, and particularly to those of your persuasion, as several of them have had experience. I have been ready upon all occasions to do all offices of kindness, being truly sorry to see them so hardly used; and though I thought them mistaken, yet in the main I believed them to be very honest. I thank you for your letter, and have a just esteem of the Christian temper of it, and rest

Your faithful friend,

Jo. Tillotson.

Upon the receipt of this letter, Mr Penn writ the following answer to Dr Tillotson.

Worthy Friend,
Having a much less opinion of my own memory than of Dr Tillotson's truth, I will allow the fact, though not the jealousy. For besides that I cannot look strange where I am well used, I have ever treated the name of Dr Tillotson with another regard. I might be grave, and full of my own humors. I was also then disappointed by the Doctor's; but my nature is not harsh, my education less, and my principle least of all. 'Twas the opinion I have had of the Doctor's moderation, simplicity, and integrity, rather than his parts or post, that always made me set a value upon his friendship, of which perhaps I am better judge, leaving the latter to men of deeper talents. I blame him nothing, but leave it to his better thoughts, if in my affair his jealousy was not too nimble for his charity. If he can believe me, I should hardly prevail with myself to endure the same thought of Dr Tillotson on the like occasion, and less to speak of it. For the Roman correspondence, I will freely come to confession: I have not only no such thing with any Jesuit at Rome (though Protestants may have without offence) but I hold none with any Jesuit, Priest, or Regular in the world, of that communion. And that the Doctor may see what a novice I am in that business, I know not one any where. And yet when all this is said, I am a Catholick, though not a Roman. I have bowels for mankind, and dare not deny others what I crave for myself, I mean, liberty for the exercise of my Religion; thinking faith, piety, and providence, a better security than force; and that, if truth cannot prevail with her own weapons, all others will fail her. Now though I am not obliged to this defence, and that it can be no temporizing now to make it; yet that Dr Tillotson may see how much I value his good opinion, and dare own the truth and myself at all turns, let him be confident, I am no Roman Catholick, but a Christian, whose Creed is the Scripture, of the truth of which I hold a nobler evidence, than the best Church-authority in the world; and yet I refuse not to believe the Porter, though I can't leave the sense to his discretion; and when I should, if he offends against those plain methods of understanding God hath made us to know things by, and which are inseparable from us, I must beg his pardon, as I do the Doctor's for this length, upon the assurance he has given me of his doing the like upon better information; which that he may fully have, I recommend him to my Address to Protestants from page 133 to the end, and to the four first chapters of my No Cross no Crown; to say nothing of our most inceremonious and unworldly way of worship, and their pompous cult; where, at this time I shall leave the business, with all due and sensible acknowledgments to thy friendly temper, and assurance of the sincere wishes and respects of Charing-Cross, the Thy affectionate real friend, 29th of the 11th

month, 1686. W. Penn.

W. Penn wanting a further answer from Dr Tillotson, wrote to him a third letter, being as follows.

Charing-Cross, 27th of the 2d month, 1686.
Worthy Friend,
This should have been a visit; but being of opinion, that Dr Tillotson is yet a debtor to me this way, I chose to provoke him to another letter by this, before I made him one. For though he was very a Jesuit in the disguise of a Quaker (u); he was examined before the Privy-Council December 10, 1688, and obliged to give security for his appearance the first day of the next term; which he did, and then was continued on the same security to Easter-term following, on the last day of which he was discharged. In 1690, when the French fleet threatened a descent on England, he was again examined before the Council, upon an accusation of holding correspondence with the late King James the Second, and imprisoned, or held upon bail, for some time, but released in Trinity-term. He was attacked

a third

‘ very just and obliging, when I last saw him; yet ‘ certainly no expression, however kindly spoken, will
‘ so easily and effectually purge me from the unjust ‘ imputation some people cast upon me in his name, as ‘ his letter will do. The need of this he will better ‘ see, when he has read the inclosed, which coming to ‘ hand since my last, is, I presume, enough to justify ‘ this address, if I had no former pretensions. And ‘ therefore I cannot be so wanting to myself, as not to ‘ press him to a letter in my just defence; nor so un‘ charitable to him, as to think he should not frankly ‘ write what he has said, when it is to right a man’s ‘ reputation, and disabuse the too credulous world.
‘ For to me it seems from a private friendship to be‘ come a moral duty to the public; which, with a ‘ person of so great morality, must give success to the ‘ reasonable desire of ‘ Thy very real friend,

‘ William Penn.’

As so earnest and just a Request could not well be rejected, Dr Tillotson therefore wrote this answer.

‘ S I R, April the 29th, 1686.

‘ I am very sorry, that the Suspicion, which I had ‘ entertained concerning you, of which I gave you
‘ the true account in my former letter, hath occasion‘ ed so much trouble and inconvenience to you: and ‘ I do now declare with great joy, that I am fully sa‘ tisfied, that there was no just ground for that suspi‘ cion; and therefore, I do heartily beg your pardon
‘ for it. And ever since you were pleased to give me
‘ that satisfaction, I have taken all occasions to vind‘ cate you in this matter; and shall be ready to do it ‘ to the person that sent you the inclosed, whenever he ‘ will please to come to me. I am very much in the ‘ country, but will seek the first opportunity to visit
‘ you at Charing-Cross, and renew our acquaintance,
‘ in which I took great pleasure.

‘ I rest,

(13) Life, p. 126—129.

[U] And of promoting the bad designs of the Court, by his frequent attendance there.] W. Poppel, Esq; Secretary to the Plantation-office, hearing of those bad reports, wrote a long letter, October 20, 1688, to Mr Penn; wherein he tells him, how it was suggested, that he had been bred at St Omer’s in the Jesuits college; that he had taken Orders at Rome, and there obtained a Dispensation to marry; and that he had since then frequently officiated as a Priest in the celebration of the Mass, &c.—Whereupon Mr Penn wrote him an answer, dated from Teddington October the 24th, 1688. wherein he thus vindicates himself from those accusations. — — — — —

— ‘ I say solemnly, that I am so far from having ‘ been bred at St Omer’s, and having received Orders
‘ at Rome, that I never was at either place, nor do I ‘ know any body there; nor had I ever a correspon-‘ dency with any body in those places; which is ano‘ ther story invented against me. And as for my offici‘ ating in the King’s chapel; or any other, it is so ‘ ridiculous as well as untrue, that, besides that no bo‘ dy can do it but a Priest, and that I have been mar‘ ried to a woman of some condition above 16 years,
‘ which no Priest can be, by any dispensation whate‘ ver; I have not so much as looked into any Chapel
‘ of the Roman Religion, and consequently not the ‘ King’s, though a common curiosity warrants it daily
‘ to people of all persuasions. And once for all, I do ‘ say, that I am a Protestant Dissenter, and to that de‘ gree such, that I challenge the most celebrated Protestant of the English Church, or any other, on that ‘ head, be he Layman or Clergyman, in public or in ‘ private. ————— To this let me add, the ‘ relation my father had to this King’s service, his ‘ particular favour in getting me released out of the ‘ Tower of London in 69, my father’s humble request ‘ to him upon his death bed to protect me from the ‘ inconveniences and troubles my persuasion might ex‘ pose me to, and his friendly promise to do it, and ‘ exact performance of it from the moment I addressed

‘ myself to him: I say, when all this is considered, ‘ any body, that has the least pretence to good-nature, ‘ gratitude, or generosity, must needs know how to ‘ interpret my access to the King. Perhaps, some ‘ will be ready to say, This is not all, nor is this yet
‘ a fault; but that I have been an adviser in other ‘ matters dangerous to the kingdom, and which tend ‘ to the overthrow of the Protestant Religion, and the ‘ Liberties of the People.—This is just as probable, as ‘ it is true that I died a Jesuit six years ago in Ameri‘ ca.—Is any thing more foolish as well as false, than ‘ that because I am often at Whitehall, therefore I ‘ must be the author of All that is done there, that ‘ does not please abroad? But supposing some such ‘ things to have been done, pray tell me, if I am ‘ bound to oppose any thing, that I am not called to ‘ do? I never was a member of Council, Cabinet, or ‘ Committee, where the affairs of the Kingdom are ‘ transacted. I have had no office or trust, and conse‘ quently nothing can be said to be done by me —
‘ And, unless calling at Whitehall once a day upon ‘ many occasions, or my not being turned out of no‘ thing (for that no Office is) be the evidence of my ‘ compliance in disagreeable things, I know not what ‘ else can with any truth be alleged against me.—
‘ But alas! I am not without my apprehensions of the ‘ cause of this behaviour towards me, and in this I ‘ perceive we agree; I mean, my constant zeal for an ‘ impartial Liberty of Conscience. But if that be it,
‘ the cause is too good to be in pain about. I ever ‘ understood that to be the natural right of all men;
‘ and that he that had a Religion without it, his Reli‘ gion was none of his own. For what is not the Re‘ ligion of a man’s choice, is the religion of him that ‘ imposes it; so that Liberty of Conscience is the first ‘ step to have a Religion (14).’

Notwithstanding this, ‘ Many suspected all along in ‘ this reign, that W. Penn was a concealed Papist.
‘ It is certain he was much with Father Petre, and ‘ was particularly trusted by the Earl of Sunderland.
‘ In 1686, he went over to Holland, to persuade the ‘ Prince of Orange to come into King James’s measures, ‘ and had two or three long audiences of him upon ‘ that subject. The Prince readily consented to a to‘ leration of Popery, as well as of the Dissenters, pro‘ vided it were proposed and passed in Parliament.
‘ And he promised his assistance. But for the Tests
‘ he would enter into no Treaty about them. He ‘ looked on them as such a real security, and indeed
‘ the only one, when the King was of another Reli‘ gion, that he would join in no counsels with those ‘ that intended to repeal those Laws that enacted them.
‘ So Pen’s negotiation with the Prince had no effect.
‘ He was, adds Bishop Burnet, a talking vain man, ‘ who had been long in the King’s favour. He had ‘ such an opinion of his own faculty of persuading, ‘ that he thought none could stand before it: though
‘ he was singular in that opinion: for he had a tedious ‘ luscious way, that was not apt to overcome a man’s
‘ reason, though it might tire his patience *.’

[W] Suspected of disaffection to the Government. Mr Penn, and his fellow-sufferer W. Mead, running into different Parties, at the Revolution; such as sided with W. Penn, and were Anti-courtiers, or reputed Jacobites, came to be named Pennites; and those that joined W. Mead, and were for the Court and the Revolution, were denominated Meadites.

a third time, and his name inserted in a proclamation July 18, the same year *; but was discharged the last day of Michaelmas term (w). However, he was deprived of the privilege of appointing a Governor for Pennsylvania, and Colonel Fletcher was put in by the Crown; 'till, upon Mr Penn's vindication of himself, he was restored to his right of government (x). He designed now to go over a second time to Pennsylvania, and published proposals in print for another settlement there; and had so far prepared for his voyage, that an order for a convoy was granted him by the Secretary of State, which was prevented by a fresh accusation against him, upon the oath of one William Fuller [X]. A warrant was granted for Mr Penn's apprehension, which he narrowly escaped at his return from George Fox's burial, January 16, 1690; upon which he concealed himself for two or three years (y). But A. Wood says, that, about the 13th of April, 1691, he was brought out of Suffolk by a guard of horse, and on the 30th ordered to an outlawry (z). In the latter end of the year 1693, through the interest of the Lord Ranelagh, Lord Somers, and Sir John Trenchard, he was admitted to appear before the King and Council; where he represented his innocence so effectually, that he was acquitted (a). In 1695, he presented to the House of Commons a paper, upon occasion of a bill, for causing the solemn affirmation and declaration of the Quakers to be accepted, instead of an oath in the usual form. His wife Gulielma-Maria dying in February 1693-4, he married, on the 5th of March, 1695-6, Hannah, daughter of Mr Thomas Callowhill, and grand-daughter of Mr Dennis Hollister, a Merchant of Bristol, by whom he had four sons and one daughter. In 1697, whilst a bill against Blasphemy was depending in the House of Lords, he presented to that House, 'A Caution requisite in the consideration of that bill;' in which he advised, that the word Blasphemy might be so explained, as that no ambiguous interpretation might give occasion to malicious persons, to prosecute under that name whatever they should be pleased to call so: but the bill was dropt. In April 1698 he set out from Bristol, where he then lived, for Ireland; and the next winter resided at Bristol. In August 1699, himself with his wife and family embarked for Pennsylvania. During his absence, some persons here in England endeavoured to undermine both his and other proprietary Governments, under pretence of advancing the prerogative of the Crown; and a bill for that purpose was brought into the House of Lords. But his friends, and the proprietors and adventurers here, represented the hardship of their case to the Parliament, and desired time for Mr Penn to come and answer for himself. Notice being sent over to him, he embarked in October, and arrived in England about the middle of December 1701 (b). Upon the accession of Queen Anne to the throne, he was in great favour with her, and often at Court; and for his conveniency took lodgings at Kensington, whence he removed to Knightsbridge, where he resided for some years. In 1706, he went and lived with his family in a convenient house near Brentford. But, in 1707, he had the misfortune of being involved in a law-suit with the executors of a person, who had been formerly his Steward. His cause (though many thought him aggrieved) was attended with such circumstances, that the Court of Chancery did not think proper to relieve him; upon which account he was obliged to live in the Old-Baily within the Rules of the Fleet, part of this and the following year, 'till the matter in dispute was accommodated (c). Then it was, I suppose, that he mortgaged the province of Pennsylvania to Mr Gee and others for 6600 pounds (d). The air of London not agreeing with his declining constitution, he took, in 1710, a handsome seat at Rushcomb near Twyford in Buckinghamshire, where he resided the remainder of his life. In 1712, he was seized at distant times with three several fits, supposed to be apoplectic, by the last of which his understanding and memory were so impaired, as to render him incapable of publick action for the future (e). In 1713, he agreed to make over all his rights in Pennsylvania to the Crown, in consideration of 12000 pounds; but his infirmities hindered him from executing the instrument of surrender (f). He died July 30, 1718, in the 74th year of his age, and was interred, August the 5th following, at Jordans in Buckinghamshire, where his first wife and several of his family had been buried (g). He wrote several things; the chief of which, besides those already mentioned, are set down below in the note [Y].

[X] Upon the oath of one William Fuller] About the time of the discovery of the plot against King William, this Fuller being a prisoner in the King's-Bench, had a mind to turn evidence, and impeached several persons. But not being able to produce them, the House of Commons unanimously declared, on the 24th of February, 1691, 'That William Fuller is a notorious impostor, a cheat, and a false accuser; having scandalized their Majesties and their Government, abused this House, and falsely accused several persons of honour and quality.' And they farther resolved, 'That an Address be presented to his Majesty, to command his Attorney-General to prosecute the said Impostor.' Fuller was accordingly prosecuted, and sentenced to stand in the pillory; which ignominy he underwent with no modesty or remorse (15). He attempted to impose upon the House of Commons a second time, in 1701, for which he was imprisoned.

[Y] He wrote several things, &c.] The chief of them, besides those already mentioned, were, 'The great Case of Liberty of Conscience, once more briefly debated and defended, by the Authority of Reason, Scripture, and Antiquity: which may serve the place of a general Reply to such late Discourses, as have oppos'd a Toleration.' PERROT [Sir JOHN], an eminent Statesman, and Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, was descended of an ancient family, which came from Normandy to England with William the Conqueror, and was seated in Wales in the reign of Henry the First; when Stephen Perrot, marrying Eleanor, or Ellynor, daughter and sole heir of Marchion ap Rice, and Lady of Istington in Pembroke-shire, became possessed of that manor; and from him, in the seventh descent, Peter Perrot, Esq; by a marriage with Alice, daughter and heir to Sir Richard Harold of Haroldston, Knt. in the same county, brought that estate also into the family; whence Thomas Perrot, in the sixth descent from Peter, bore the title of Esquire of Istington and Haroldston (a); and marrying Mary, daughter and heir to James Berkley, Esq; second son of Maurice Lord Berkley, had by her Sir John Perrot, Knt. the subject of the present article, who was born in Pembroke-shire about the year 1527 (b). He was trained up in a way suitable to his birth, according to the taste and fashion of those times, when literature had frequently no great share in a genteel education, martial and other exercises being chiefly attended to, and feats of activity and chivalry most esteemed. In these Mr Perrot took particular delight; and growing tall with his years, and to an extraordinary degree of strength and agility, he quickly distinguished himself therein above his contemporaries. At the age of eighteen, he was sent to the Marquis of Winchester, then Lord Treasurer of England, to compleat his education by the discourses and example of that able and experienced statesman; an excellent custom*, which had long been practised, and still continued, though dropped not very many years after. In the house of this nobleman, among others sent thither with the same view, he found the Lord Abergavenny, a youth of so fierce and hasty a temper, that the servants and gentlemen in the house were made very uneasy by him. These perceiving Mr Perrot equal at least to his Lordship both in spirit, stature, strength, and courage, easily contrived to breed a quarrel between them, which quickly came to blows. His Lordship found himself rather overmatched in strength, and had no advantage in height of stomach; and the trial having made each sensible of the other's abilities, they grew (as is not unusual in such cases) into a kind of friendship; but this did not last very long; for, having agreed to make a joint entertainment for their common acquaintance, they fell, on the day appointed, into some dispute, and broke the glasses (of which they had provided good store) about one another's ears, before the guests came. However, the same heroic spirit happened to recommend Mr Perrot to the favour of his Prince. Among other follies incident to youth, he frequently indulged his genius with loose women; and going for that purpose, shortly after this breach with Lord Abergavenny, to the Stews in Southwark, attended only with a page, he fell into a quarrel with two Yeomen of the King's guard, who both attacking him with their swords, he made a very gallant defence, and being hurt in the fray, the news reached the ears of his Majesty, then hard by at Winchester-house. Whereupon he sent for him, and enquiring his name and family (c), was much pleased with the undimmed boldness of his manner, and invited him to Court, not without intimating an intention to bestow some place or preferment upon him. Mr Perrot did not want ambition, and took care not to neglect so fair an opening. But these flattering hopes were presently cut short by the death of Henry the Eighth, upon which he returned to the Marquis of Winchester, till affairs were settled at Court: when he again repaired thither, and succeeded so well with the young Prince, that he was pitched upon for one of the Knights of the Bath at his coronation. This honour, conferred on such an occasion, was always looked on as an earnest of further favour; and our young courtier made it his whole study to deserve it, by a pliable conduct to the King's pleasure; and, as he took all opportunities of shewing his valour, activity, strength, and expertness, in acts of chivalry, in tilts and tournaments, barriers, &c. King Edward conceived a great liking for him, which was not a little heightened too by the extraordinary comeliness and dignity of his person. During these expectations, he attended the Marquis of Southampton in his embassy to France, to treat of a marriage between King Edward and the French King's daughter. The Marquis being a nobleman that took much delight in active sports and exercises, was entertained agreeably to his humour by the French Monarch with hunting the wild boar: In the chase, a gentleman charging the boar with his chacing-staff, happened to miss his aim, so that the enraged animal was ready to run in upon him; when Sir John Perrot leapt instantly to his rescue, and with a broad-sword which he then wore, gave the beast such a froak, as well nigh parted the head head from the shoulders. The French King, who stood in sight, came presently to him, and taking him by the middle, cried out Beaufoile. Sir John thinking the King came to try his strength, returned the address, by taking his Majesty in his arms, and lifting him a good height from the ground; at which the King shewed not the least displeasure, but, on the contrary, tried to draw Sir John into his service, by the offer of a good pension. To this our courtier answered very gallantly, in making proper acknowledgments for his Majesty's bounty and goodness, yet assuring him withal, that he had means of his own to support himself, and that he knew he served a gracious and a royal prince, who would not see him want any thing, and to whom alone he had vowed his service during life. It happened not to be long, before he had occasion to make a trial of his sovereign's kindness. Sir John always indulged himself in a course of jollity and pleasure, in the midst of which, his ambition led him to maintain such a degree of state and magnificence, as was above his fortune; but the consequence of that had no place then in his thoughts: and, after his return from France, he affected still more pomp, and lived at a higher rate than before; to support which, he was obliged to mortgage some of his estates; nor was that sufficient, notwithstanding these mortgages, he found himself in a little time involved in a debt of seven or eight thousand pounds. This impending ruin brought him to reflect, and he resolved upon a reformation; but how to raise such a sum as would enable him to discharge the debt, without such a retrenchment as would sink him beneath his proper dignity, and even into contempt, was the difficulty. Necessity is the mother of Invention; he did not want wit; and that prompted a stratagem, which he determined immediately to put into execution. Minding the time, he took a walk out of the court into a place where the King usually came about that hour: Here he began, as if by chance, a soliloquy, blaming his own folly, and bemoaning his condition, how unfortunate and unwise he was so to squander his fortune, having wasted a great part of that in a few years, which his ancestors had acquired and enjoyed for many. And must I, continued he, be the man that shall overthrow my house, which hath continued so long? Better I had never been borne; What shall I do then to recover my estate? Thus he went on, entering into a dispute with himself, whether he were best to follow the Court, or to leave the Court and follow the wars; since he found, that should he continue at Court, the King being young, and under government, if, upon his good deserts, his Majesty should be pleased to grant him any thing in recompence for his service, yet his governors, as the Lord Protector and the Privy-Council, might gainsay it, and so he should rather run into farther arrears, than recover his decayed fortune; but if he retired into the country, where he might live at less charge, or betake himself to the wars, where he might get some command, it would be a means to save his estate, and pay his debts. As he was thus debating the matter with himself, the King, as he had laid it, coming behind him, overheard most of what he said, and at length stepping up, How now! says his Majesty, What's the matter, that you make this great moan? Sir John, in a seeming surprize, told the King that he did not think his Highness had been so near him. Yes, said his Majesty, we heard you well enough; and have you spent your estate in our service? and is the King so young and under government, that he cannot give you any thing in recompence of your service? Find out somewhat, and you shall see whether the King has not power to bestow it upon you. Sir John humbly thanked his Majesty, and shortly after discovered a concealment (d), which, upon his petition, was readily bestowed on him; so that he paid most part of his debts with it, and from this æra commenced a better husband of his revenues (e); and lived in the society of persons of the first rank, in peace and plenty, as long as King Edward's life lasted; but, upon the accession of Queen Mary, Sir John shared the common fate of those who professed the new religion, as it was then called. One Garderne, his countryman, accused him of keeping certain Protestants, then called Heretics, at his house in Wales; particularly Alexander Nowell, afterwards Dean of Lichfield; his uncle Perrot, who had been tutor to King Edward in the Greek tongue; with some others. Upon this accusation, Sir John did not deny his religion, and was committed to the Fleet; yet having many friends, and being personally well liked by her Majesty, he obtained his discharge. There was now no room at Court for persons of his persuasion, and after some time he went to St Quintin, where he had a command under the Earl of Pembroke, being of the Council to his Lordship as President of Wales (f); and the Earl had a great value for him. But all ties of friendship, and every other relation, were consumed by the burning zeal for Popery in this reign. The President received a special charge from the Queen, to see that no Heretics [i. e. Protestants] should remain in Wales: with this order he acquainted his friend, who was then bedfellow to his son Sir Edward Herbert, desiring his assistance in putting it into execution; which Sir John refusing, as against his conscience, the Earl forbid him his house, and there ensued a quarrel, wherein from words they proceeded to blows, but were soon parted. However, this was not so privately done, or so secretly kept, but that the news presently reached the ears of the Queen, who was highly offended at it, and on his next coming to Court received him very coldly, and even looked on him with indignation (b). The business which brought him thither was a suit which he had at that time to her Majesty, for the Castle and Lordship of Carew, whereof he had already received a promise. In this exigence he was advised by some friends, and particularly his stepfather Sir Thomas Jones, to reconcile himself to the Earl of Pembroke, and by his means to pacify the Queen. But his high stomach would not suffer him to stoop to such a submission. Yet he found some other friends, who in a short time prevailed upon her Majesty to refer his suit to the Privy-Council, where the Earl of Pembroke, notwithstanding what had happened, speaking in his behalf (i), as a person of real worth, and well deserving of the boon, which might perhaps prove a means of reforming his religion, a favourable report was made to her Majesty; whereupon she confirmed her promise, and granted him the castle. Accordingly he took possession of it, and for the remainder of this reign resided in the country, much respected and particularly renowned for his expertness in arms, in the exercise of which he continued to give daily proofs of his extraordinary abilities. But as much delighted as he was in these feats, and pleased with the glory that attended them, yet his views were far from being terminated there. No sooner did Queen Elizabeth mount the throne, than our hero was seen again at Court; where, presenting himself to her Majesty, he was very graciously received, and appointed one of the four Knights who carried the Canopy of State at her coronation (k). In the first year of her reign, Sir John was also one of the Knights pitched on to play a pageant at Greenwich, for the entertainment of the French Ambassador [A]. These kind of martial exercises were much encouraged by Queen Elizabeth, after the example of her royal progenitors, in proper incitements for breeding a race of heroes, to serve their country upon occasion in the wars. Upon this account we have seen Sir John Perrot enter upon the stage of life, through the applauses of Henry the Eighth, and then act the first scenes of it under the particular favour of Edward the Sixth; afterwards made a singular exception to the general maxim of extirpating Protestants as Heretics in the succeeding reign; and we shall now find Queen Elizabeth turning his talents to their proper use in the wars. The miserable state of Ireland called for his service; and, in 1572, her Majesty sent him thither with the character of Lord President of Munster, a province which then lay almost entirely desolate, and wasted by the rebellion of the Earl of Desmond and his accomplices. The President landed the first of March at Waterford (l), and in three days after James Fitz-Morris, the Earl of Desmond's Lieutenant, burned the town of Kylmallog, hanged the chief magistrate, and others of the townsmen as many as he could take, at the high cross in the market-place, and carried away all the plate and wealth of the place. Sir John, therefore, hastened to Dublin, to take his oath of the Lord-Deputy Sir Henry Sidney, in order to present the rebels with a sharp and speedy war. At his return to Cork, about the 10th of April following, immediately assembling his troops, he went to Kylmallog; and, having provided for the return of the inhabitants, the repairing the town walls, and rebuilding the houses, he proceeded in pursuit of the rebels with so much expedition and spirit, that he brought James Fitz-Morris to swear fealty to the Queen and Crown of England, and reduced the whole province of Munster into as good a state of quiet and tranquillity as any part of Ireland, in little more than the space of a year. But in doing this, he had carried such a high hand over the Earls of Ormond, Clanryckard, Thomond, and the rest of the loyal noblemen and gentlemen of the Pale in these parts, that many complaints were sent to England of the abuse of his power by arbitrary and unwarrantable proceedings. He was no sooner certified hereof, than he determined to cross the water, in order to clear himself in person from the charge preferred against him; and accordingly, without waiting for leave, he took order for the government of Munster in his absence, and making up his accounts, he departed thence about the beginning of March, 1673; and arriving by a quick passage in England, he was admitted to an audience of the Queen; wherein having related to her the state of the country, the particulars of his service, and the cause of his coming over, with answer to such objections as had been made against him, her Majesty, contrary to the expectation of many, allowed of his proceedings, and commended

[A] He played a pageant] Upon the death of the French King, Francis II who was slain at tilt (1), Queen Elizabeth being advertised of it, before the news reached the French Ambassador at her court, resolved to entertain him with this pageant. And as it is a remarkable instance of the manner of conducting these entertainments, we shall lay it before the reader, as follows: Tents being set up, and a banquet provided in Greenwich-park, her Majesty took the Ambassador to the place, where, as she passed through the park-gate, a page presented a speech, signifying, that there were certain Knights come from a far country, who had dedicated their services to their several mistresses, ladies for beauty, virtue, and other excellencies, as they deemed incomparable; and therefore they vowed to advance their fame through the world, and to try the combat with any such, as should dare to affirm, that they had any rivals in perfection. And hearing great fame of a lady which kept her court thereabouts, renowned both for her own excellency, and for the worthiness of many redoubted Knights, which she kept; they were come thither to try whether any of her Knights would encounter them, in defence of their mistresses honour. To this the Queen: Sir Dwarf, you give me very short warning, but I hope your Knights shall be answered; and then looking about, she asked the Lord Chamberlain, shall we be outbragged by a dwarf. No, an't please your Majesty, answered he, let but a trumpet be sounded, and it shall be seen, that you keep men at arms enough to answer any proud challenges. Thereupon the trumpet sounds, and immediately there issued out of the east-lane at Greenwich, divers pensioners gallantly armed and mounted. The challengers were, the Earl of Ormond, Lord North, and Sir John Perrot: Who presently prepared themselves, to run courses in the field against all comers. Among the defendants, one Mr Cornwallis, a tall gentleman, and a good man at arms, fell to the share of Sir John Perrot, who in the encounter, chanced to run him through the hose, and scar his thigh*, at which he expressing some resentment, provoked Sir John, and as they were both choleric, they fell into a challenge, to run with sharp lances without armour, in the presence of the Queen; but her Majesty would not suffer it, and with good persuasions pacified and reconciled them, and so after some courses performed as usual, the combat ended; after which her Majesty invited the French Ambassador to the banquet, provided in a pavilion raised for the purpose, in the park. But his Excellency having in the interim, received the news of his master's unfortunate end, begged to be excused (2).

commended his endeavours, expressing a desire to have him return; but Sir John proposing several new regulations to be made, which were not approved by the Council [B], he begged leave to repair into the country for the recovery of his health; and obtaining it, returned to his own house in Wales. He had been there but a few years, when the Court receiving intelligence that James Fitz-Morris, since his submission, had been in Spain, and obtained a promise of ships and men to invade Ireland, and especially the province of Munster, Sir John was sent for, to take the command of a squadron to be sent to sea against him; and all things being got ready, he departed from London about August, and going thence by barge, attended with several of the nobility and gentry, as they lay against Greenwich, where the Queen kept her Court, Sir John, who had his

[B] He proposed some regulations, which were not approved He intitled these necessary conditions, for the quiet maintaining of the state of Munster, and containing the several particulars following I. First of all, that her Majesty would write sharp letters to the Archbishops and Bishops of that province, to deal more carefully in their several charges, than hitherto they have done, in setting forth of God's word, in their several dioceses; and to cause the decayed churches, to be re-edified, placing in them good and meek ministers, by which their good example, the people will the sooner grow to know their duty to God, and perfect obedience to their prince. II. Also that the same Bishops, be enjoined to pay from henceforth the first-fruits and twentieth part of all the spiritual livings, within each of their dioceses, which they themselves have hitherto detained in their own hands, although by the laws of the land, it ought to have come into her Majesty's use; and that they account for so much thereof, as hath come into their hands, which will amount to no small sum. III. That the said Bishops, shall minister the oath generally unto all priests, within their several dioceses, and to deprive such as do or will refuse the same, placing others of honest behaviour in their rooms. IV. That forthwith a President be sent thither, being both valiant, wise, and sound of religion, with other qualities, meet for the place. V. That likewise a principal Justice be sent, learned and just, who with the second Justice, shall be enjoined to hold sessions twice a year, as in the several shires in England. VI. That there be sent two of the most honest attorneys, out of the marches of Wales, to instruct the attorneys there, in following the course of the said court. VII. That farther allowance of wages be made to those that will serve the President. VIII. To take into her Majesty's hands all liberties within the said province, except of cities and towns corporate. IX. That Desmond be reduced into a county, adjoining to it part of Dooly; and all that is between the river of Mange, and the Earl of Clencarty's country; the same county to be called by some other name, as the Queen's county, or the like. X. That commissioners be appointed to make agreement between the Lords of Munster, and their freeholders, which myself have caused them to yield unto; and to tie those Lords to desist from their wonted exactions, and in case of non-compliance, such rents as the freeholders ought to pay to the said Lords, to fall by way of escheat into her Majesty's hands. XI. That the surveyors be commanded to make a new survey of all her Majesty's lands within the said province, that are not leased, and to rate the same reasonably; they having by a late survey of one Fitz-Williams been rated so high, that they have lain waste ever since, no man cultivating or manuring the same, to her Majesty's no small loss and detriment. XII. That commissioners be appointed to view the liberties of all cities and towns corporate, within the said province, and what customs they have a right to by their charters. For that besides those, they take many others which have been given since to the province by act of parliament, to which they have no right. XIII. That there be appointed an auditor, and a receiver, within the said province, with reasonable fee assigned to each. XIV. That customs, comptrollers, and searchers, be appointed in all cities and port-towns, where her Majesty hath not given her whole customs, to receive all such customs due to her highness. XV. That all her Majesty's lands not leased, be let to Englishmen, as near as may be. XVI. Since in effect, the like misorders which have been heretofore in Wales, were of late in Munster; the like ordinances may be established by parliament for Munster, as are in Wales; and also power may be given, to the Lord Deputy and council, to appoint commissioners for dividing shires into hundreds, and to assign the Lords in several feignories, what escheats shall belong to them, and to divide the feignories into manors; where Court Barons may be kept for the peoples ease, in determining small causes. XVII. That there be a base coin of i. d. ii. d. iii. d. coined at Limerick, and to call in the half-faced groats, with other old coins, and the residue of the coin to pass as it does. To this purpose he laid down the value of the several coins, both of silver and base money, then current in Ireland, to be reduced. The names whereof were, the old half-face groat unclipt, containing 4 old King Henry's pence, which at the rate of 4 smulkins of rose pence, being base metal, allowed in value for every old penny, makes 16 smulkins, and allowing three of the same for every English penny, amount to v. d. 1/3 d. sterling. The half old groat makes ii. d. and 1/3 d. sterling. The old penny containing 4 base smulkins, makes ii. d. 1/3 d. sterling. The old half-face groat, clipt, whereof are many in Ireland, is worth of our current money but iii. d. The old fresh groat whereof are many, and sandy stamps, viz. Three crowns, and a whole faced crown, each containing 9 of the said small smulkins makes iii. d. sterling. The pieces coined by the late King Henry, Edward, Philip and Mary, for xii. d. current money, and now called in by the name of a black-veston, at the value of current money iii. d. Another of like base money, coined in the said King's time, current in Ireland, by the name of a white groat, containing 4 base smulkins, makes i. d. 1/3 d. sterling. Another base piece coined in Henry VIIIth's time being current there, by the name of a red harp, holding in value, 3 of the said smulkins, makes ii. d. sterling. XXVIII. That the castle of Mayne, be re-edified at 200 marks charge, and the priory of Kylla be annexed to it, whereby it will maintain the captain and twelve men, and so command Kerry and the Earl of Clencarty's country. XIX. That 200 l. of the said base coin, be granted for fortifying Kylmallock, to serve as a fort and rendezvous for her Majesty's people, to assemble on occasion of any service required. XX. That 200 l. of the like coin, be allowed to build a wall about Dingle. XXI. That 1000 marks be allowed towards building the castle of Limerick, for a place of residence for the Deputy, or Lord President. XXII. That another house for the President, may be built at Cork. XXIII. That another small castle be built in Arlongh, called Balliny-Court, to clear that wood of the rebels. XXIV. That all offices of collector, comptroller of the import, with customs and searchers, within Munster, may be at the disposal of the President. XXV. That the lease of the parsonage of Dungarvan, may by some good means be reduced again into the hands of her Majesty, and the same, together with the abbeyes, and other parsonages and lands belonging to her highness, may be annexed to the state of Presidency. XXVI. That if her Majesty will lend 6000 l. of the aforesaid coin, to such persons as shall give good security to repay it, at the end of four years, in consideration thereof, she shall have the great woods of Donfynnen, Arlongh, Kylhoghy, Connelagh woods, Glanflecke, the great wood, and other woods within that province, cut down; and therewith ships may be built at Youghall. XXVII. That her highness take order to pardon the Earl of Ormond's three brothers, and James Fitz-Morris, or otherwise to determine of them; and in my opinion, it was not amiss to grant them pardon for what is past. XXVIII. That some comfortable letter be written to Sir John Desmond, and that he be put in hope of having 100 l. lease, according to her Majesty's letters to the Deputy, in order to keep him faithful, as his service is necessary (3).

his thoughts much turned to gallantry, sent one of his gentlemen ashore with a diamond, in a token to Mistress Blanch Parry, ordering him on delivering it, to tell the lady, that a diamond coming unlooked for did always bring good luck with it; which the Queen hearing, sent Sir John a fair jewel, suspended on a white cypress, signifying, that as long as he wore that for her sake, she assured herself, that by God's blessing he should come to no harm. The message and jewel were received with the greatest joy by Sir John, who returned for answer to the Queen, that he would wear it for his sovereign's sake, and doubted not, with God's favour, to return her ships in safety, and either to bring the Spaniards (if they came in his way) as prisoners, or else to sink them in the sea. As he passed by in his barge, her Majesty looking out of her window, put out her hand, and flaked her fan towards him; which he returned, by making a low obeysance, while he put the scarf and jewel about his neck. The names of the ships and pinnaces in his squadron were, the Benenge, Sir John Perrot, Admiral; the Dreadnought, William Gorge, Vice-Admiral; the Foresight, Nicholas Gorge, Rear-Admiral; the Catys, Captain York; the Swiftsure, Captain Pierce; and the Seabright, Captain Ward (m). With these ships Sir John set out from Gyllingham to the Downs, and thence passing by Fal-mouth and Plymouth, arrived in Ireland, and continued cruising upon the coast about Waterford, 'till the season was past for making any attempt upon the country; when understanding, by other intelligence, that the Spaniards had dropt their enterprize for that year, the Admiral returned with his fleet safe to England, and retired again to his seat in Wales. But in this retirement he was careful to keep up his interest at Court; to which end, on proper occasions, he gave his personal attendance there, and constantly held a correspondence with Sir Francis Walsingham, and some others in the Ministry, who frequently asked his advice upon the occurrences of the times; and, in 1582, being consulted concerning the best means for quelling the Earl of Desmond's rebellion in Ireland, and settling that kingdom in a more orderly state of government, he drew up a paper containing his opinion (o) thereon, which was so well approved, that, in 1583, he received a commission, appointing him Lord-Deputy of Ireland: and embarking with the Earl of Ormonde at Milford-haven, he arrived at Dublin in January that year. Notwithstanding the Desmond family became extinct, by the death of the fifteenth Earl of that title, the preceding year*; yet the state of Ireland was still far from being settled in any orderly course of subjection and government. On the contrary, in the greatest part of the country, especially in the North, the sword was more in use than the laws, and revenge more practised than peace; and this, notwithstanding the last war, had exhausted more treasure from the Crown of England, more English blood had been spent, and the lives of more worthy men lost in it, than all the wars in that country had consumed for two hundred years before. It had been observed, that one principal cause of these miseries grew partly from the corruption, and partly from the ignorance, of the governors. Sir John Perrot was therefore singled out as a person, whose experience of the country excluded the latter, and whose known integrity set him above any just suspicion of the former. Great consideration was also had of his active valour and undaunted spirit, which were deemed necessary to subdue the haughty refractoriness and untamed ferocity of the rebellious part of the kingdom. Agreeably to these expectations, our new Deputy, in this spirit, presently after the entrance upon his office, resolved to make a progress throughout the whole country, and visit each province in person; in order to settle the better disposed in a good course of peace and tranquillity, by hearing complaints and redressing grievances, and establishing a regular government to reduce the rebellious and seditious by force: Nor is it denied, that he brought a new face upon the nation in a short time. But while he was solely intent upon effectuating this wished-for reformation, the rules of prudence and discretion had not been always observed. The Deputy was naturally of a very choleric and haughty spirit, and had imbibed very high notions of government, and was of opinion it ought to be administered with severity. In acting upon these principles, while he conquered the rebel lords, and brought them to a composition in the North, the performance whereof was secured by proper hostages, he gave great offence to the well-disposed [C], by behaving too magisterially, and assuming a too arbitrary power. Hence complaints were carried to England, which produced several checks for the past, and restraints for the future, sent to him by the Council; and these not being sufficiently regarded, the murmurs in Ireland grew louder, and the reprehensions from England stronger. Notwithstanding all these discontents on one hand, and rebukes on the other, confiding in the integrity and uprightness of his heart, and relying on the merit of his services, he continued the same course as far as he was able, 'till the displeasure taken thereat by the Queen [D] occasioned

[C] He gave offence to the well-disposed. Among other imprudent steps taken by him, it was none of the least, that in the first session of the first parliament, he proposed a suspension of the famous law called Poyning's act; this was done by him in order to pass more speedily some acts, which he thought necessary, for the publick good of the country, but it was opposed, by the gentleman of the Pale, who either mistook or mistrusted his intent, and threw it out at the third reading. And though upon a conference, they were

[D] The displeasure taken at this by the Queen. Besides his attempt to repeal Poyning's act, the chief articles alledged against him, were, that he was severe, and forced the people to take the oath of allegiance and supremacy; that he pried into men's patents, and endeavoured to promote laws against recusants, carrying himself too magisterially in the government. This impeachment, was abetted by the occasioned his recal from the government in 1528 (p) [E]. Thus disgraced at Court, he failed from Dublin to his castle of Carew in Pembrokeshire; where he arrived, attended with as gallant a troop of gentlemen and servants, and to as great a number as ever followed any Lord-Deputy out of Ireland (s). But he did not enjoy the sweets of his retirement very long; for, a charge of high-treason being preferred against him, he was taken into custody, and after being confined some time in the Lord-Treasurer's house, was committed prisoner to the Tower of London; whence, on the 27th of April, 1592 (t); he was brought to his trial before a special commission in Westminster-hall; where, after a most severe and cruel scrutiny made into his actions, words, and even thoughts, by a law afterwards repealed (u), he was found guilty, and received sentence of death on the 16th of June following [F]; in pursuance whereof, he was carried back to the Tower in order for execution. But this was respited by the Queen, who was so well perwaded of the injustice done to him, that she received the first news of his being found guilty with extraordinary emotion, crying out, Have they indeed brought him in guilty, then, by my troth, they have found an innocent man guilty (w). In this disposition her Majesty began to relent, and to be pacified towards him, and was often heard to applaud the rescript of Theodosius: If any person speak ill of the Emperor through rashness and inadvertency, it is to be despised; if out of madness, it deserves pity; if from malice and aversion, it calls for mercy (x). But while Sir John had these promising hopes of life [G], he fell into an illness, which put an end to all his troubles by a natural death in September this year. During the time of his tryal he made his Will (y); wherein, after having called God to witness his innocence, in regard to every article of the treasons laid to his charge, he addressed himself to the Queen in the following terms. 'But I cannot deny it (being lette by ' practice to doe the service I could have done for your Highnesse, or upon some sharp ' matter received) I have far otherwise than did become me written some fond and eger ' words, for the which I sorrowe in my harte and soul. Therefore upon the knees of my ' harte I ask your Highnesse forgivenessse, which is all the amendes I can now make.'— Concluding thus—' I send my sonne and my daughter, with their two little children, ' God's blessinge and myne, and praie them to serve God and their Prince faithfullie.' Accordingly the Queen restored his estate to his son Sir Thomas Perrot, to which, perhaps, she was the more inclined in respect to his wife, who was sister to the Earl of Essex (z). As these things made a great noise in those times, so the Deputy's character has been drawn at length by several hands, the substance whereof may be seen below [H].

Chancellor, who was also Archbishop of Dublin, whom the Deputy had disobliged, by endeavouring to appropriate the revenues of St Patrick's church (the leases of which, were mostly in the hands of him and his relations) to the new intended university. But that particular offence which effectuated his ruin, was some passionate words, which when some of the rebukes and affronts mentioned above, were put upon him, he spoke of the Queen; particularly having received some kind letters from her Majesty, after some ill usage that he resented, Look ye, says he, to the slanders by, now the Queen is ready to bepis herself, for fear of the Spaniard, I am become her white boy again. Several of his speeches in this kind, were told by his secretary Williams, who betrayed him (5).

[E] He was recalled in 1588. Before his departure, he put into the castle of Dublin proper pledges, for the peaceable behaviour and submission of all the chieftains of the rebels in every county and province, throughout the kingdom. The names of these ring-leaders, were, O'Neale, O'Donell, Mac Gwerc, Feagh Mac Hugh, Walter Bengeh, Mac Gnyllie, O'Cane, O'Donelan. He likewise gave the city of Dublin a standing gilt bowl (which is always in the hands of the Mayor of Dublin, for the time being) with his arms engraven, and the parrot at top, and about the beak, this motto in Latin, Relinquo in pace, signifying, that he left the city, country, and people in peace (6). We shall mention one instance, in effecting this peace, as it shews his wit, and therefore is a part of his character, and that is a stratagem contrived by him to entrap the chief rebel O'Donell, just mentioned. To this purpose he prepared a ship laden with sack, a wine which the Irish were fond of, to sail as near as possible to O'Donell's dwelling, where the Captain procuring his wines, the country people came presently aboard the ship, who, according to the instructions, had as much wine as they would for a taste, with this kind offer, that if O'Donell would come himself, he should buy the best wine at a reasonable rate. He came, and was used so courteously, that they gave him his full allowance, and finding him well freighted, and the wind serving, they stowed him under hatches, and carried him to Dublin, where he was left in the castle, at the Deputy's departure (7).

The commissioners were, Lord Chamberlain, Lord Buckhurst, Sir Robert Cecil, Secretary Woolley, Mr Fortescue, the Master of the Rolls, Anderson, Chief Justice of the common pleas, Periam, Gawde and Fenner, Judges, and Rockeby, one of the masters of the court of requests. The principal articles of his indictment, was, holding a treasonable correspondence with Lord Viscount Balinglaff and the Duke of Parma, in order to facilitate a Spanish invasion. Lord Balinglaff was an Irish Peer, against whom an act of attainder had passed, being promoted by Sir John, in the second parliament of Ireland held under him, in 1586 (8). Denis O'Roughan a Popish priest, who was admitted evidence against him, and swore that he was employed by him to carry the treasonable letters from him, had been convicted of being concerned with one Bird, in forging and dispersing warrants under the Deputy's name, importing a general pardon to all priests, for all offences, in such a stile, as if the Deputy had been King of England (9). O'Roughan was afterwards pardoned by the Deputy and Council, in consideration of his renouncing the Romish religion, taking the oaths of allegiance and supremacy to the Queen, professing a hearty repentance, and promising to promote the reduction of Ireland, to the obedience of her Majesty, to the utmost of his power (10). All which favours were repaid in such a manner, as was at this time not unfrequently practised by the emissaries of the Romish church. Tantum Religio potuit suadere malorum.

[G] Promising hopes of life. Possibly the consideration of his supposed consanguinity, might have some weight with the Queen; 'tis certain Sir John much resembled her father in his towering spirit, and claimed his descent from that prince; inso-much, that after he was condemned, he asked the Lieutenant of the Tower, Whether the Queen would sacrifice her brother, to her overbearing adventures (11).

[H] The Deputy's character is inserted below. The writers intimated above, are here cited in the margin (12). 'They represent Sir John to be a man of stature very tall and big, exceeding the ordinary stature of men by much, and almost equal to the mightiest men that lived in his time. His body was very compact and proportionable, through all the parts: as he did exceed most men in stature, so did he in strength. His hair was auburn, 'till it grew grew grey in his elder years. His countenance full of majesty, his eye marvellous piercing, and carrying a commanding aspect, which, when he was angry, became most terrible; yet was equally amiable, when he was pleased or disposed to do a kindness. In this resembling Augustus Cæsar, who is said to have had so great a majesty in his eye and countenance, piercing like the sun-beams, that a soldier beholding him, could not stand it, but retired back, saying, he was not able to endure the brightness and majesty of his eyes. The conditions and qualities of Sir John Perrot's mind, were answerable, and kept a kind of correspondence with those of his body. The greatness of his mind and body strove which should grace him most; for he was of an undaunted spirit, never regarding his adversaries, were they never so many or so great. In time of danger he always shewed himself resolute and valiant. He had a very sharp wit, and was, as may be said, naturally wise; for though he were not learned in the sciences, yet would he give as good a reason for matters of experiment as most men. And as he had in him many excellent parts, as magnanimity, valour, ripeness of judgment, understanding of the modern languages, as the French, Spanish, and Italian, judgment in the wars, in home government, in foreign states, in courtly carriage, and in most matters that a man not professing learning could comprehend, so had he some defects. He was by nature very choleric, and could not brook any crosses, or dissemble the least injuries, although offered by the greatest personages, whereby he procured to himself many and mighty adversaries, who in the end, wrought his overbrow, although even 'till then, what by the justness of his cause, the clearness of his conscience, and resolution of his mind, he supported himself against all his adversaries, being many and great. In anger he would sometimes deal roughly and severely, even with them he loved best, but that being once pacified, he would easily forget his former displeasure; and as long as any man did contend with him, he would use all opposition he could by sword or by law, but if submission were offered by his inferior, or reconciliation by his equal, he would as easily receive it as any man. In passion, he was apt to swear too much, and was addicted to vengery, being otherwise clear of any notable vice, in all the course of his life. In his youth he was profuse and prodigal, but arriving to riper age, he grew frugal, and yet not so saving, but that he regarded his honour before his profit, and measured both by the ability of his estate, which he would not exceed, nor yet live under the highest countenance of his degree and calling: for he maintained the post rather of a nobleman, than of a Knight, for the space of forty years, in retinue, housekeeping, and all other respects. Yet did he manage his estate so providently, as he would make the most of his own with reason, and without injury to any, he improved his lands to a high rate, yet so as tenants might live on it and under him. He was very firm and faithful to his friends, and if any of them had done amis or offended him, he would be sure to tell him of it in the sharpest manner; but if any other person interposed to aggravate the matter, he would hear it, and if he found cause, would shame his friend, otherwise he would answer for him as much as might be. He was very just and unspotted for bribery, which he could not abide in any man, nor ever was charged with it, by his greatest adversaries. In the administration of justice he was very upright, and void of all partiality, though his nearest kinsmen were a party. Pirates he could never endure, but prosecuted them with all his power. To conclude, his virtues were many, and his faults were not to be excused or silenced. For besides those faults which have been already touched, he was high minded, and made no account of any man, whom he thought did not affect him; neither could his heart be thoroughly humbled, until his last extreme disaster, which brought him home to himself, and unto God (13).

PERSONS or PARSONS (a) [ROBERT], alias DOLEMAN, the first English Jesuit that ever set foot in England [A], was born in 1546, at Netherstowey near Bridgewater in Somersetshire. He was the middlemost of eleven children which were brought to his father, a Blacksmith of a fair character, by Mary his wife (b), whose fidelity to the marriage-bed has been much suspected in regard to this child [B]. However that be, he proved a boy of a ready wit and good memory; and having learned to read English, was taken notice of by the Vicar [C], who being much pleased with his promising genius, instructed him in the Latin tongue; and fitting him for the university, procured him to be admitted into Baliol-college in Oxford, whither he was sent in the latter end of the year 1523 (c). Being supported chiefly by the Vicar, he stuck close to his studies; and his temper and talents suiting [D], he acquired the reputation of being a smart disputant, a character of chief remark in the university at that time. Soon after he had proceeded Bachelor of Arts, which was May 31, 1568, he obtained a Fellowship in his college; and, at the end of the year of probation, being admitted Chaplain-Fellow (d), entered,

[A] The first English Jesuit, &c. Mr Carte, indeed, tells us (1), that he was absolutely the first of the order that ever set foot in England. But we are informed by Father Ribadeneira, a Spanish Jesuit (2), that himself, together with Figueroa, came hither upon a mission in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's reign; but not having the language, found their design impracticable, and quickly took their leave without doing any thing. The Jesuit's order was founded in 1534; but though the founder Loyola himself, wrote a letter to Cardinal Pole, signifying how agreeable it would be to him to see some Englishmen in it, yet George Ware was admitted first of any of this nation, in 1562. It is true, he was followed by several others in a little time; but none were sent upon the mission to their own country before Parsons and Campion (3). William Good, a Somersetshire man, was sent to Ireland in 1562, but did not come into England.

[B] His wife was suspected. Dr Sutcliffe, Dean of Exeter, tells us (4), that this love-intrigue of her's was with the Vicar or Parson of the parish; who, it seems, was held to be well gifted this way, and who lay at her house. The secular Popish Priests assert also, that he was base born (5), but will have his natural father to be the Vicar of Stokersey in Somersetshire, and his name to be Cowbuck, or Cubbock; and the same is retained by Dr Thomas James, Keeper of the Bodleian Library at Oxford (6). This base birth is also agreeable to Camden's remark of him, That he was one of the dregs of the commonalty (7). Mr Wood, indeed, had been informed, that Parsons's Mother was a known grave matron, living divers years in flight and banishment for religion, and died therein very aged, at London, about the year 1599. But the scale is unanswerably turned against her, by the evidence of Archbishop Abbot; who observes, that before her son's removal from the college, the society had a certificate that he was a bastard (8).

[C] The Vicar. His name was John Hayward (9); who, according to Mr Wood, was a virtuous good Priest, had been a Canon Regular [i. e. a Monk] in Devonshire, and thence became Vicar of Netherstowey about this time: and that his affection for our author had no other cause but the boy's good parts and disposition to learning (10).

[D] His temper and talents suiting to disputations. As to his temper, Mr Camden, who knew him at the university, assures us he was a violent fierce natured man, of a rough behaviour (11), and the subtlety and shiftness of his genius, is more than sufficiently evident from his writings.

as is supposed, into Holy Orders. As the duties of this place obliged him to residence, he took pupils, and became the most eminent tutor there (e). But while he kept the young students under his care to an exact discipline, he privately indulged himself in the pursuit of some unwarrantable liberties (f). On St Luke's day, 1572, he succeeded to the office of Burser, and at that time testified an extraordinary zeal for the Protestant religion, changing a great many old books and manuscripts in the college library (g) for Protestant authors, and was the first that introduced those books there. December 2d this year, he proceeded Master of Arts, and completed that degree, by standing in the subsequent Act in July 1573 (h). After this, at the expiration of the Burser's office, which is annual, he defrauded the society of a considerable sum of money (i), by falsifying his accounts. However, no discovery being then made of it, he was appointed Dean for the following year 1574, but did not continue long either in that place or in the college; for, upon an enquiry into his past conduct, he thought proper to resign his Fellowship in February 1573-4 [E], and to take his leave of Oxford. Going to London, he staid there

[E] He resigned his Fellowship] Our author's character being much interested in the manner and cause of this resignation of his, many disputes were raised about it. The fullest account of it is contained in the following letter of Archbishop Abbot to Dr Hussey, a copy of which is preserved in the place cited in the margin (12). 'You write unto me to know what is in record any way against Mr Parsons: and I return you here inclosed word for word, so much as is in the register of Baliol college. In the resignation, as you may see he had written sponte & coactus, but now it is sponte non coactus, & being blotted out, and non being set over †: which, I am deceived, if it be not altered by some body else of late; in as much as I am verily persuaded, that since my coming to the college, I have seen it sponte & coactus; which, although it carry a contradiction, yet inimateth, that he resigned against his will. The particular reasons whereof, no man can tell better than Dr Turner, now dwelling in Fetter-lane, or Dr Hyde of Sarum*; for, as I take it, they were both present at his removing. The causes and manner of his giving over, as far as I could ever comprehend, were these. Bagshaw being a smart young man, and one who thought his penny good silver; after he had his grace to be Bachelor of Arts †, was with some despite swung by Parsons, being Dean of the college. Hoc manet alta mente repositum: and Bagshaw afterwards coming to be Fellow was most hot in persecution against Parsons. It was the more forwarded by Dr Squire's displeasure, who was then Master of Baliol college, and thought himself to have been much bitten by vile libels, the author whereof he conceived Parsons to be; who in truth, was a man at that time, wonderfully given to scoffing, and that with bitterness, which also was the cause that none of the company loved him. Now, Dr Squire and Bagshaw being desirous of some occasion to trim him, this fell out.' The doctor then proceeds to relate the falsifying his burser's accounts, polling the Commoners names, and the certificate of his being a bastard, contrary to the college statute, which requires that every Fellow should be legitimate; legitimo thoro natus †: that hereupon they proceeded to have him solemnly expelled. That Parsons being brought into the college chapel for that purpose, prayed it might be done with as little noise and as little disgrace to him as possible; and accordingly prevailed with the Fellows to accept of this form. Ego Robertus Parsons, Socius collegii de Balliolo, resigno omne meum jus & clameum, quem habeo vel habere potero societatis mee in dicto collegio; quod quidem facio sponte non coactus, die decimo tertio mensis Februarii Anno Dom. 1573.

per me Robertum Parsons.

Eodem tempore decretum est unanimes consensu Magistris & reliquorum Sociorum, ut Magister Robertus Parsons nuperrime Socius retineat sibi sua cubacula & scholares quosque voluerit, & communia sua de collegio habeat usque ad Festum Paschatis immediate sequentis. i. e. I Rob. Parsons, Fellow of Baliol college, resign all the right and claim which I have, or shall have, of my Fellowship in the said college; which I do voluntarily, not by compulsion, this 13th day of February, Anno Dom. 1573.

By me Rob. Parsons.

At the same time it is decreed by the unanimous consent of the Master and the rest of the Fellows, that Master Robert Parsons very lately Fellow, may keep his chamber and scholars as long as he pleaseth; and may also have his commons from the college 'till Easter-day next ensuing.

However, at coming out of the chapel, Bagshaw set the bells a ringing at Magdalen church, in which parish Baliol college stands; and the next time of making corrections in the hall, which is the Dean's business, Parsons going upon it, was sneeringly called Mr Dean, by Dr Squire, who attended, and desired him to have a strict care to the good government of the youth: at which, some of the Commoners who knew the pageant, were not afraid to giggle aloud; so that Parsons perceiving he was not concealed, resolved to leave Oxford and England also, as he did; and upon his departure sent a letter, or rather a notable libel, to Dr Squire, who, however, is acknowledged here to be such a man as wanted not faults. To the same purpose Mr Camden declares, that Parsons was expelled with disgrace for his lewd carriage (13).

On the other hand, More the Jesuit gives a very different account of this matter, and tells us (14), that Parsons had before declared himself openly in favour of the Catholic religion; that his rival Protestant tutor in his absence seduced one of his pupils to go to a play, and was encouraged not to surrender himself to his tutor, who returning, demanded him, in order to be punished for this offence; but, that having convened the Fellows on this occasion, they declared it was not fitting he should be a tutor who was a Papist, and immediately insisted upon his renouncing that first, or else to resign his Fellowship. A hard condition, says the Jesuit, but he was forced to submit, in order to avoid expulsion, which was threatened upon his noncompliance; yet in reciting the form of the resignation, he quotes the words sponte & coactus, taking no notice of any alteration. In proceeding, he tells us, Parsons held his rights thus precariously 'till the following Lent, when attempting to punish some students for not observing that fast, according to the old statutes, by abstaining from flesh, an alarm was raised, and the bells rung backward (15), as in case of fire, a cry prevailing that in Baliol college they were interdicted fire and water by a Popish incendiary. He then declares, that his motive for enlarging upon this business, was thereby to cut off the calumny that had been raised long after, that Parsons did not quit his Fellowship for the sake of his religion, and to preserve his probity, but was removed for seditious practices. The Jesuit's narrative is likewise countenanced by Mr Wood (16), who declares, he had made this collection of Parsons's life from records and impartial writers; and tells us, that Parsons resigned his Fellowship of his own accord, as the register of Baliol college witnesseth, though certain authors tell us that he resigned to prevent expulsion, being then, if not before, about to change his religion. In the notes, Mr Wood sends us to see the whole story of this expulsion, which was no other than a resignation, to Father Parsons's Brief Apology *. Notwithstanding this, it is certain, that as he came to the college a Protestant (17), so he behaved himself like a good Protestant there, conversing with Dr Squire and Dr Hyde, zealous Protestants (18); besides the instance of his own zeal mentioned in the text, while he was Burser: add to this, that after his resignation, one Mr Clerk of the Inner-Temple expressing some doubts concerning his religion, Parsons did not some months, unresolved what course to take in this exigence. At length, in June he left England, and crossing the Channel to Calais, he went first to Antwerp, and thence, after some weeks, to Louvain (1); where, finding a college of Jesuits, he spent a week in the spiritual exercises of that order, the design of their institution being very agreeable to him [F]. He then proceeded to Padua in Italy, in pursuance of his first intention to apply himself for a support to the study of Physick; yet so much unresolved was he, that, upon his coming into Italy, he inclined rather to the Law, and accordingly spent some time in that study at Bononia. However, afterwards he resumed his first resolution; but he had not been there long, before his curiosity led him to make a visit to Rome (m): where meeting with some English Jesuits, he grew impatient to be among them [G]. For this purpose returning to Padua, he settled his affairs there as soon as possible; which done he took boat, and proceeding up the Po to Ferrara, he travelled thence on foot to Rome. He arrived in that city in the latter end of May, 1575, and was elected a member of the society of Jesus the fourth of June (n), and admitted into the college on St James's day following. He had compleated the regular course of his studies, had gone through the four classes of Divinity, and was become one of the chief Penitentiaries, being Confessor in that chair, where the Pope himself confessed in 1579 (o), when he directed the establishment of the English seminary at Rome [H], and procured Father Allen to be chosen Rector of it; who, in return, recommended his friend for the mission to England in 1580 [I], with an intention to extirpate Queen Elizabeth and the Protestant religion [K]. He spared no pains to carry this desperate design, if possible, into [F] The design being very agreeable to him. At Louvain, he met with William Good already mentioned, who being his countryman, a Somersethire man, prevailed with him to go through these exercises, and used such arguments to persuade him to enter into the order, as staggered his first resolution †; and no wonder, for the design of that institution being to support the Pope's power against the growing heresy (as they called it) of Luther, which was then become the established religion in several parts of Germany, and particularly of England, must needs afford a fair prospect to one of our author's learning, wit, and disposition of distinguishing himself in it. It is certain, as says Mr Gee (20), he was by nature and inclination fitted to make a complete Jesuit; being fierce, turbulent, and bold; which are the three main qualifications for that order.

[G] Impatient to be among them. Father More tells us (21), that before he left London, he had procured bills of exchange upon the bank of Venice, to defray his expences. The same author likewise assures us, that Parsons bought a great number of books at Rome, which he brought with him to Padua, and that before his return to Rome, he drew all his money from Venice; ascribing the alteration of his first purpose to that of taking the Jesuit's habit, entirely to Good's advice, and his own affections to it from the trial he had made privately at Louvain, which was completed into a firm resolution by repeating the same publicly at Rome, added to the pleasure of being among his own countrymen (22), as related above. All this story is little agreeable to the account of Archbishop Abbot, in the letter already cited (23), according to whom, this alteration was owing to a light purse, not sufficient to support him in the study and profession of either Law or Physic.

[H] The English seminary at Rome. Before, it was nothing more than an hospital founded in Queen Mary's time, by the name of the Holy Trinity de Urbe. One Cienoch, assistant to the Jesuits college, was Rector at this time, and being a foreigner to the English, was not liked by them. Parsons being now in great credit, applies to the Pope by Benedict Palmes and Francis Tolet, afterwards Cardinal, for two grants: first, that his Holiness would send for Father Allen from Rheims, and set him at the head of this society, founding it into a college or seminary for the English, by the name of Collegium de Urbe, dedicated to the Holy Trinity, and St Thomas [à Becket]; and secondly, that he would oblige the students to take the following oaths. I, N. N. considering with how great benefits God hath blessed me, &c. do promise, by God's assistance, to enter into Holy Orders, as soon as I shall be fit for them, and to return to England to convert my countrymen there, whenever it shall please the superiour of this house to command me, N. Gregory gave 300 crowns a month out of his treasury to it, and endowed it besides with the Abbey of St Sabin apud Placentinos, worth near 300 crowns a year (24).

[I] Recommended him to the mission. More, who relates this, says also, that Allen not only mentioned such a mission to England, but named Parsons to be one, and the superior of it: he also informs us, that Oliver Manaræus, and Claudius Aquaviva †, were both extremely for Parsons: after which he proceeds thus, Mittendorum delatum haud difficilem faciebat locus. Nam Perfonius in urbe sub oculis degebat; vir consideratus. Et rerum magnarum agendarum gloriæ par. In hos omnium calculi conveniunt; cæteri enim ex Anglis qui societati nomen dederant, vel cursum studiorum nondum expleverant, vel in remotiora ad septentrionem loca concesserant (25). i. e. There was no difficulty in making choice of the persons for the mission. For Parsons lived in the city under their eyes; a man of considerable worth, and equal to the glory of great enterprizes. In these * therefore, all were agreed, especially, since the rest of the society had either not yet compleated the course of their studies, or were gone into the remoter parts of the north (26).

[K] To extirpate Queen Elizabeth and the Protestant religion. The artifice of Pius IV. to regain the Papal supremacy being seen and rejected by Queen Elizabeth, his successor, Pius V. went another way to work; and in order to terrify her into submission, published a bull, declaring her subjects absolved from their oath of allegiance, and pronouncing an anathema against all those that should obey her (27). But the consequence shewed this to be more hasty than wise. Queen Elizabeth was too well beloved by her subjects for such an anathema to have it's designed effect, and instead of raising (as was intended) all the Papists in the nation against her Majesty, it abated their affections towards the Pope, who had by this means made them obnoxious and suspected to the government, and therein brought the severity of the laws upon them; whereas they had before been suffered quietly to enjoy in private the exercise of their religion. This being represented at Rome, gave occasion to the present mission of Parsons and his colleague; by whom Pope Gregory XIII. sent what was called a mitigation of this anathema, declaring it to hold in force against the heretics, but not against the Romanists, who were pronounced free from the curse, and dispensing with them for obeying her Majesty as things then stood, 'till it should please the Pope otherwise to determine. This mitigation run in the following terms. Facultates concessæ R. Roberto Perfonio & Edmundo Campiano pro Anglia die 14 April 1580, petatur a summo Domino Nostro Explicatio bullæ declaratoriæ per Pium Quintum contra Eliz & ei adherentes, quam Catholici cupiunt intelligi hoc modo, ut obliget semper illam & hæreticos, Catholicos vero nullo modo obliget rebus sic stantibus, sed tum demum quando publica ejusdem bullæ executio fieri poterit. i. e. There were many other petitions of faculties for their further authority, all which concluded thus: Has prædictas gratias concessit summus Pontifex, &c. present Father Oliver Manaraus assistant (28). What other instructions they had, is not known; only Father More tells us, they were ordered to keep wholly to the discharge of their ministerial function, and by no means to meddle either by word or writing, in the publick affairs of the kingdom (29). With these powers, and the Pope's benediction upon them, they set out the Sunday after Easter, attended by Ralph Emerfon, in quality of Adjutor externi operis (30), in company of seven other Priests and two Lay Noblemen of the Order. To avoid being detained by the soldiers, of which the direct road was full, they took their rout through Geneva, where they had some discourse upon religious points with Beza (31); and after a stay of three days, passing through France, they arrived at Rheims about the middle of June; whence, going together to St Omers, Parsons departed first, and embarked at Calais in the habit of a soldier; concerning which Campian writes to Manaraus, Assistant-General of the Order, thus: 'Pater Robertus, Georgio Fratre Comitante, post mediam noctem, pridie quam hæc scriberem, Caleto solverat vento secundissimo, itaque sub hæsternum mane decimo sexto Junii Dorobernium, ut speramus, appulit, specie militis, tam picti, tam insani, ut valde oculatus esse debeat, qui sub illa vestitu vultu, incessu sanctimoniam & modestiam delitescere suspiciatur. i. e. Father Robert, attended by Brother George, sailed from Calais with a fair wind the day before the date I write this; we hope therefore, he arrived at Dover yesterday morning, June the 16th, in the dress and air of a soldier so well counterfeited, that he must be very sharp-sighted indeed, that can suspect any sanctity and modesty to lie concealed under that habit, countenance, and gait.' Accordingly, Parsons arriving safe at London, waited there for Campian, who likewise escaped the strict search that was made for them; their pictures, the time of their departure from Rome, and the whole rout of their journey having reached England before them (32). Not long after their arrival, several of the quieter sort of Papists who denied the Pope's power to depose princes, taking the advantage which was given them by the mitigation which they brought, were made very uneasy by the fiery zeal and rough manners of Parsons (33), who condemned their compliance to the government, as entirely contrary to the Pope's real intention and meaning. The quarrel grew so high, that some of those had thoughts of delivering him up into the magistrates hands; charging him with meddling in matters of state, and labouring to set her Majesty's crown upon another head. But this was only a small party (34); and, notwithstanding their opposition, the missionaries succeeded so well in general, that all things seemed ready for an insurrection before Christmas (35).

[L] He spared no pains to carry it into execution.] To this purpose he divided England into three parts. 1. Wales, where he observes they made great progress. 2. The midland counties, whither he went himself; particularly at Cambridge, he procured a young priest to be admitted in the university as a nobleman, and obtained a station for him not far from the town; so that he brought over seven youths in a few months, ready to be sent to the seminary at Rheims. He sent Campian into the third division in the North, in which they had least success. He chose the middle parts for himself, that he might be near London, to be ready upon all emergencies that arose. One Gardiner an inmate only at Hogden was their first fruits. They plied matters so closely, that they entirely broke the custom that had 'till then prevailed among the Papists, of going to the Protestant churches (36). A little before Christmas, Parsons, in a letter to the Fathers at Rome, making heavy outcries of the severity of the persecution, continues thus: Vincit tamen numerus diligentiam infestantium, intelligo ab uno mense in tabulas relata esse quinquaginta mille eorum qui sana hereticorum adire recusant*; so that all things seemed ready for an insurrection. Hence we see the reason of the proclamation which was published in January, laying a penalty of 20*l.* a month upon all absentees from the service of the church. This occasioned a further trouble to Parsons, a petition being presented to him in the name of all the better sort of recusants (37), to know whether they might not now comply to avoid this severe penalty. It was upon this occasion that he printed his Brief Discourse, containing the Reasons why Catholics refuse to go to Church. The dedication to Queen Elizabeth, is subscribed (38) John Howlet: in the Bodleian Library there is a copy of this book, that was seized before the title page was printed, intitled in the first page of the book itself, Reasons that Catholics ought in any wise to abstain from heretical conventicles. The running title is A Treatise of Schism, &c. It was printed by William Carter (executed for treason in 1584) who confessed, when that book was seized in his house on Tower-hill, that 1250 copies of it had been printed. At that time the searchers found the original manuscript sent from Rheims, and allowed under Dr Will. Allen's hand to be truly Catholic, and fit to be published. Mr Wood observes, that this is the same book titled by Anthony Possevinus, Nine Reasons why Catholics should abstain from heretical Conventicles, said by him to be written by our author (39). There came out an answer to this discourse the same year, intitled, A Check to Mr Howlet's Screechings to her Majesty. This book was printed the year before (40), but now he told them there was more reasons for abstaining, since a compliance now would be looked upon as done merely to save the money, and as a piece of hypocrisy. While he was in England, he printed A brief Censure upon two Books of William Charke and William Hamner, written against the Reasons and Proofs (41). As also, A Discovery of John Nichols, misreported a Jesuit (42). The Catholics were divided into three sorts or parties. 1. Those who denied the Pope's deposing power, but would not take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy. 2. Those who did both. 3. Those who did neither. As to these last, Camden (43) writing upon the proclamation against the seminary Priests in 1580, assures us, that the Queen used to complain with grief, that she was driven by necessity to publish such laws, for the preservation of herself and subjects; and Father Parsons, when he wrote his mind freely to his friend, testifieth, that the Queen was necessitated to do it for the preservation of herself and the kingdom (44); and we are assured by another Popish author, that she designed a mitigation, upon security of their allegiance by taking the oaths: but that this Toleration was both talked and written against at Rome, as very disadvantageous to the Popish cause (45), and it is certain, says Mr Gee, that abundance of people were drawn from their Popish opinions and superstitions by frequenting the Protestant churches. He likewise thinks it probable, that the remaining Roman Catholics would in time have been converted by it (46). It is observable, that the success of it with the Papists was made use of in Queen Anne's reign for introducing the Occasional Conformity Bill in favour of the Dissenters.

[M] Brought the danger so near.] When Campian was taken, he had been long parted from Parsons, who, upon leaving him, went into Kent (47); which gave him an opportunity of crossing the sea immediately, which he did so suddenly, that had not time to acquaint any one person with his design (48). He had a very narrow escape before, when one Rishton was seized at the Red-rofe [or Red-lion] on Holborn-hill; he had promised to be at that meeting, and was prevented only by losing his way thither (49).

[N] Printed several books.] Immediately after his safe arrival, he dispatched a trusty servant with the news to some of his fast friends in England (50), and then printed his consolatory letter, De persecutione Anglicana Epistola, qua explicantur afflictiones, ærumnae, & calamitates, &c. Rome and Ingolstadt, 1582, and again, in the Concertatio, &c. cited in note (44): This was followed by A Defence of the Censure given this recess, he likewise erected a new seminary at Augium upon the coast of Normandy, and obtained an endowment for it of a hundred pounds a year from the Duke of Guise. But other schemes, which he had laid for the reduction of Scotland to the Pope's obedience, being rejected [O], he returned to Rome in April 1583. (p); and, upon his arrival there, Claudius Aquaviva, General of the Order, left the management of the English mission to him. Some time after, the students in the English seminary in that city complaining to him of their governors, he procured them the power of choosing an English Rector in 1586, and was himself elected into that office the following year (q), at the instance of Father Allen, for whom he had lately obtained the Purple [P]. In 1588, Father Parsons was dispatched by Aquaviva into Spain; where, having prevented the Jesuits from falling into the hands of the Inquisition [Q], he set all engines at work to give success to that monarch's designs upon England [R]. For this purpose, among other expedients, he planted some English seminaries upon two books of Will. Clarke and Mic. Hanmer, Ministers, which they wrote against Mr Edmund Campian, &c. printed 1582, 8vo. and the next year came out his celebrated book, intitled, A Christian Directory or Exercise, guiding men to eternal Salvation; commonly called The Resolution. More speaking of this book, expresses himself in these terms: Si nihil aliud agisset in omni vita Personius hoc uno opere æternam meritum fuisset apud nos gloriam, & unus plus multis dicendus laborasse. i. e. If Parsons had done nothing else in all his life, he had by this single work merited eternal glory among our order, and may be said to have laboured in his own person more than numbers of others. He afterwards quotes one William Bath, an Irish Catholic, who writes thus of it: nunquam audivi de libro, cujus sola lectio in nostra ætate in hoc genere tot peperit fructus in Anglia & Hibernia, & ipsi etiam hæretici tantam perceperunt compunctionem cordis in lectione hujus libri, ut paucis mutatis (51), Londoni imprimi curarint. I never heard of any book, the reading of which alone, ever produced so many fruits as this hath done, both in England and Ireland. Even the heretics themselves have been struck with such a compunction of heart by it, that, with a few alterations, they have printed it at London. He means that edition of the Directory, which was printed in 1584 by Edmund Bunney of Merton college, Oxford; but altered throughout to the Protestant use, as appears from Father Parsons's edition of the same book in 1585. This book was afterwards put into modern English by Dr G. Stanhope, and has gone through several editions.

[O] His scheme for the reduction of Scotland. In the letter to his General already mentioned, he acquaints him with the principal things he had in his view upon coming to Rome; one of which was to confer with Father Allen about the seminaries. 2. To print some books which could not be done in England. 3. To concert with the Archbishop of Glasgow, then Scotch Ambassador at Paris, the means for converting Scotland. 4. To apply to the King of France for his assistance to the Catholics in England. 'In the three first of these articles, says he, I have succeeded. With regard to Scotland, I sent a Priest thither with a collection which I had made, and gave him instructions, if he could get admittance to the King, that he should persuade him to forward the conversion of the Catholics, because his succession to the Crown of England could be secured only by them. The success of this mission appears, says he, from the letters I have received on his return, from several of the Scotch Nobility, earnestly desiring one to come among them, with whom they appointed the 27th of September, to hold a conference for the conversion of that kingdom; but that can't be complied with, since it is the very day I am writing this letter.' Father More informs us, that it was at this time that he procured 24000 crowns from the King of Spain, for the King of Scotland and his mother, having obtained the like sum before (52): and Parsons, in his letter to Creighton several years after, declares he had procured 4000 crowns from Pope Gregory XIII. for the same service. That considering the hopeful state of affairs from the success of his first endeavours, and the favourableness of the juncture, now upon the death of Morton, and the King being young, and so more easily brought to listen to his mother's intrigues, he was so confident of being able to recover that kingdom to the obedience of the See of Rome, that if his General would procure him an allowance of 4000 crowns for two years, he undertook to effect it in that time; but it seems this was not complied with, and he was ordered to send thither Edmund Haye and William Creighton upon that service, which he did accordingly, and sent with them his own servant Emerson, to attend the mission. The fourth point mentioned in the letter to the General, he owns he did not succeed in; the King of France assuring the Pope's Nuncio who made the request, that he could not comply with it for some secret reasons (53). The secular Priests inform us, that Parsons consulted with the Duke of Guise how to depose Queen Elizabeth; and that for this purpose, the Queen of Scots endeavoured to make a list of Catholics, who, under the conduct of the Duke, were to change the state of England, upon pretence of supporting the title of Queen Mary of Scotland; but that her council at Paris, who understood the business better, were so sensible of his presumption, that they took from him the Queen's cypher, which he had purloined, and commanded him never to meddle with her affairs again (54).

[P] He obtained the purple for Allen. Parsons lays claim to this merit himself, and it is acknowledged by Allen in the following letter to Dr Bayley, President of the seminary at Rheims, in return to the doctor's congratulation on this occasion, in which he writes thus: Leta vobis est & jucunda mea promotio, sed ex hac quantamcumque lætitiæ causam habetis, eo magis vos omnes, quibus ego tam charus sum, novo vinculo tenemini amoris & gratitudinis erga societatem universam, nominatim vero erga antiquum nostrum & singulariter bonum patrem, & præcipuum cooperatorem; proxime enim sub cælo Pater Personius fecit me Cardinalem (55). You express your joy at my promotion, but the greater your joy is on this occasion, so much more affection and gratitude do you all owe to the whole society [of English Jesuits], and especially to our old and singularly good friend, and principal adjutor, Father Parsons; for next, under God, it is he that has made me a Cardinal.

[Q] . . . . . Inquisition.] He obtained of the King, that his Majesty should assign one, and himself another, for that Inquisition. More assigns this as the only reason of his journey to Spain at this juncture; for the Jesuits understood politicks, the crafty part of them, I mean, well enough, to give out a fair pretence in order to hide the true cause, whenever it was thought necessary, as it generally was in all the proceedings of the mission with respect to England.

[R] King of Spain's designs upon England.] Mr Gee thinks, I suppose, from his letter to Creighton, that it was revenge for the neglect shewn to him by the Queen of Scot's Ministry, that threw him wholly into the hands of the Spaniards; the letter is as follows: *Ego ab anno octagesimo, quo primum in Angliam mandato superiorum appuli, Regis Scotiæ commodis studere omni qua potui ratione, & statim quidem Guilielmum Waite, sacerdotem meis expensis in Scotiam ex Anglia misi. Patrem deinde Holt submisi, & cum hæc initia mea male succederent, scripsi ad Reverendum Patrem nostrum, ut aliquot viri sacerdotali ex gente in Scotiam mitterentur. Cum statutum esset, ut R. Vestra experienti gratia præmitteretur, facile recordabitur, qua animi alacritate Rotomagi adfui, adeo ut socium unicum quem habebam mihi ipsi detraxerim, ut R. V. in Scotiam sequeretur. feminaries at Valladolid, Seville, San Lucar, Lisbon, and St Omers, obliging the several members in each of them to subscribe to the Infanta's title to our Crown [8]. Upon the defeat of the Spanish Invasion, seeing the little hopes there was to prevail against Queen Elizabeth, he used his utmost endeavours to prevent the succession of King James the First to the throne. It was with this view that he published, in 1594, under the feigned name of Doleman †, his famous treatise, entitled, A Conference about the next Succession to the Crown of England [T]. He continued two years longer in Spain, incessantly labouring to stir tertium demum Romam usque, atque hæc omnia post Deum Regis Scotiæ matrisque suæ in gratiam. Quibus licet vota quæ cupiebantur non esset utilis opera mea, duabus tamen viribus viginti quatuor aureorum millia e Rege in eorum usum impetravi, & a summo Pontifice Gregorio decimo tertio quatuor millia cujusmodi noscite an alii præstiterint officia, horam tamen cogor facere mentionem, ut eis opponam qui Reginiæ adversarium me faciunt, ad quos refutandos nemo testis locupletior esse potest quam R. V. quæ hæc omnia novit & meminisse potest (50). By this letter it appears, that he had been charged with acting against Scotland. In answer to which, he appeals to the many services he had done to that King and his mother; first, by sending Priests and Fathers to convert the King, and then in procuring 24000 crowns twice from the King of Spain, and 4000 crowns of the Pope. However, as these services were done before his return to Rome, and consequently, before he had received the affront from the Queen of Scot's council at Paris, mentioned in remark [O], his defence does not reach the point in question alleged against him. But from a letter in Winwood's Memorials, though written a long time after (51), there is reason to believe, he continued in the interest of the Queen of Scots as long as she lived. The letter is written by Sir Henry Neville, then Ambassador in France, to Sir Robert Cecil, Secretary of State, and contains advice, that the Ambassador had discovered a disension that had grown between the Jesuits in England and those abroad. Parsons being at the head of these latter; and Charles Paget of the former, who could not be brought to consent to the invasion and conquest of England by a foreign Prince; whilst Parsons was violent in his courses, and wished the overthrow of the kingdom, either by conquest or any other means. 'Aod this disivion, continues the ' Ambassador, begun amongst them soon after the ' death of the Queen of Scots, upon whom they did ' all concur whilst she lived.' Add to this, that Parsons did not write his book against the succession, 'till a 'ter (though he did it presently after) the death of that Queen.

[8] He founded the seminaries at Valladolid, &c. and obliged the members to subscribe, &c. Father More informs us (52), that these seminaries were supported out of the duties upon woollen cloth imported *, so that the charge lay upon the English. He tells us also, that Parsons had the government of these seminaries yielded to him by Claudius Aquaviva, the Præfekt-General, but takes no notice of the oath mentioned above. We have no positive evidence of this but from his enemies, the Secular Priests. However, they relate so many particular circumstances of it, as could hardly be feigned, neither is the fact as I know of, any where denied by Parsons. One of these tells us, that the scholars were obliged by him to subscribe to blanks. Another relates, that he tampered with the students to set their hands to a paper, that they would accept the Lady Infanta for Queen of England, after the death of Queen Elizabeth; and, that finding them unwilling, he used this shift to draw them in, pretending to those of Valladolid, that the students at Seville had done it already, he got them to sign; after which, he shewed these names to the students in Seville for an example, which he required them to imitate. Another asserts, that he dismissed those who refused from the college for contumacy and disobedience (53). These testimonies are confirmed, in some measure, by Cardinal d'Osstat, in a letter to Henry IV. of France, about the designs of the Spaniards and Father Persons, against England; where he writes thus: ' For this purpose also, were the colleges and seminaries erected by the Spaniards for the English at ' Doway (54) and St Omers, wherein young gentlemen of the best families in England are entertained, ' thereby to oblige them, and in them, their parents, ' kindred, and friends. The principal care of these colleges and seminaries, is to catechise and bring up ' these young gentlemen in the faith and firm belief, ' that the late King of Spain had, and that his children now have, the true right of succession to the ' Crown of England; and that this is advantageous ' and expedient for the Catholic faith, not only in ' England, but wherever Christianity is (55). ' Moreover, this subscription is expressly asserted by Sir Henry Neville, in the letter already cited, where, having observed, that after the Queen of Scots death, the Seculars and Jesuits could never agree in any course, either of conquest or proposed title, mentions the late increase of that quarrel, since the title of the Infanta of Spain had been set on foot, according to Parsons's book under the name of Doleman. For, continues Sir Henry, the Jesuits still promote that title by all means, and take a violent course to urge all Englishmen, either in Spain or Rome, and where else they may prevail with them, to subscribe thereunto P.

[T] A conference about the succession. After the death of Mary Queen of Scots, the hopes of reconciling Scotland to the See of Rome being lost, or at least become desperate, came out this book, consisting of two parts, the first of which contains the reasons for which Kings may be deposed or set aside: the second applies that reasoning to the particular case of England, wherein he labours to shew that King James's title by blood is not without defects, and that besides, religion is a sufficient bar to proximity in blood in the succession of the Crown of England, upon which accounts King James might be lawfully excluded. And as the Infanta of Spain is of the ancient blood royal of England by diverse ways; to wit, 1st, by Constance, daughter of King William the Conqueror: 2dly, by Eleanor, daughter of Henry II. and 3dly, by Beatrix, daughter of Henry III. all which are drawn out in an arbor of genealogy. Therefore, seeing matters are so doubtful at this day about the next lawful succession, and that diverse of the pretenders are excluded, some for bastardy, some others for religion, some for unaptness to govern, and some for other causes; and seeing the Commonwealth has authority, as the case stands, to dispose in this affair, why may not, among other pretenders, consideration be had of this noble Princess also; especially, seeing she is unmarried, and may thereby accommodate many matters, and save many breaches, and satisfy many hopes, and give contentment to many desires, as the world knoweth: he concludes with shewing several reasons why she is also most likely to succeed (56). This book was usually, in those times, called the Book of Titles, ten or eleven titles to the crown being set forth from four stocks. First, from John of Ghent, Duke of Lancaster: Philip of Spain: the Dukes of Parma, Braganza, and Savoy: secondly, from the House of York: the Earl of Huntington, and the offspring of Geoffry Pole and Sir Thomas Barrington. Thirdly, from Henry VII: whence, (next to Queen Elizabeth now in possession) proceeds the King of Scotland, and Arabella his cousin, as also the Earls of Hertford and Derby. Fourthly, the Duke of Brittany, from whom proceeds the Donna Isabella, Infanta of Spain (57). In the dedication to the Earl of Essex (for whom there is also in the book a title prepared to the crown from Thomas à Woodstock, fifth son of Edward III.) (58), it is declared, that the book was wrote with much modesty, and therefore published without offence of any, and with particular affection and devotion to Queen Elizabeth, and special care of her safety, for which he promises, if occasion be, to bear his testimony. By modesty, he means without railing and giving bad language; the whole being drawn up with a very smooth-faced impudence; what is understood by the words without offence, he explains in the case of the Earl of Derby, against whom he observes there are other objections, ' but as they are personal impediments, stir up Philip the Second not to suffer his great power to be baffled [U]. In the mean time he was not wanting to push his own fortune. After the death of Cardinal Allen, having ments, and don't touch the right or substance of the title, I shall, says he, omit them. For as in the beginning I promised, so I shall observe, as much as in me lies, to utter nothing in this conference, that may justly offend or touch the honour and reputation of any one person of the blood royal of our realm (59). Yet afterwards, discoursing upon which of all the claimants is most likely to prevail, he observes, that the Earl of Derby's religion is held to be doubtful, some thinking him to be of all three religions, Papist, Puritan, and the Church of England, and others of none (60). Queen Elizabeth's safety is also consulted with the same good faith; it is true, he forbears all personal reflections upon her government, and in general, labours only for the succession after her death; yet, his argument so requiring, he asserts that the same reasons which are sufficient for setting aside the heir apparent, hold likewise for deposing the present possessor; and of these reasons, that of not being a Papist is the chief. The mischievous tendency of this egregious performance came into full light in 1648; when, preparatory to the deposing and murder of King Charles the First, there was published and printed at London, by Robert Ibbotson, a pamphlet intitled, Several Speeches delivered at a Conference concerning the power of Parliaments to proceed against their King for misgovernment (61). These are nine speeches, the same number with Doleman's chapters in the first part, and the matter and words almost in all things the same, except the transitions and some few not material passages, which are left out. King Charles, in his message for peace (62), mentions and inserts upon this book. And it is observable, that the substance of Bradshaw's long speech at the condemnation of that King, and also much of the most seditious part of Milton's Defensio pro populo Anglicano, are borrowed from it (63). In 1655, an abstract of it was printed under the title of, The broken Succession of the Crown of England, about the time that Oliver Cromwell aimed at the title of King. In truth, the whole matter for deposing Kings is exhausted in it; yet the absolutely indefeasible hereditary right of the Stuart family is sufficiently exposed, for which reason it was reprinted at London in 1681, when the Parliament were debating the subject of the exclusion of the Duke of York, afterwards King James the Second. As to the answers to it, Mr Wood says he had read somewhere of an Act of Parliament of the 35th of Elizabeth, making it treason to be found in any person's house (64). In 1603, it was answered by Sir John Hayward, Knt. in a treatise intitled, The Right of Succession asserted, &c. 2. The apostate Protestant, in a letter to a friend, occasioned by the late reprinting of Doleman, 1682. And in 1683, it was condemned by the university of Oxford, as containing several positions dangerous and destructive to the sacred persons of Kings, their state and government, particularly that which saith birthright and proximity of blood doth give no title to rule or government, and burnt in the Schools quadrangle (65). Mr Gee, after Cardinal d'Osset, will have it to be wholly wrote by Parsons, and observes justly, that Pitts ascribes it to him as the author (66). Dr Barlow likewise relates, that Parsons made the book (67), but these seem to mean no more than that he was the person signified by the feigned name of Doleman. For we are not only assured by Mr Camden, that it was done by a club, and that Cardinal Allen and Sir Francis Inglesfield had their shares in it; but Parsons himself, in a letter to a friend, acknowledges the same, as More informs us, in the following words: Non tam ad Personum, quam ad Alanam, ad Franciscum Inglesfield, & ad alios consimiles, is liber a Persono in epistola ad amicum 24 Maii 1603, & a Camdeno verissime revocatur. The same Jesuit also tells us, that the materials were furnished by the rest, and that Persons, who had a happy talent that way, put it into a proper method. However, it seems he was so fond of it, that he proposed it to be read in the English college-hall at Rome, instead of a lecture, as had been usual (68). Yet we find he occasionally rejected all this; as appears by a letter of Winwood to Cecil, dated at Paris, February 27th, 1601, O. S. giving an account, that Parsons had the week before written to the Ambassador of Scotland, excusing himself for writing against that King, and desiring by his mediation to find admittance into his Majesty's favour and good opinion, protesting that he would relinquish the service of any other, and adhere only to him, upon the smallest shews he should make of his good inclination toward the Catholics (69). It is observable, that Philip II. was at this time deceased (70), having disappointed Parsons's expectations in applying to the Pope in his favour upon the business of the Cardinalate; and the Infanta was likewise married to Duke d'Albert, and so rendered incapable of advancing her interest in England by a proper alliance. It appears also, from Winwood's letter, that the Catholics had some reasons at this time to think James something inclined to change his religion. Soon after King James's accession, we find him addressing himself to the English Catholics, in these terms: 'As to the person now advanced, I know most certainly, that there was never any doubt or difference among you, but that you ever desired his advancement above all others, as the only heir of that renowned mother, for whom your fervent zeal is known to the world, and how much you have suffered by her adventures for the same; yet do I confess, that touching the disposition of the person for the place and manner of his advancement, all zealous Catholics have both wished and prayed that he might first be a Catholic, and then our King. This being our bounden duty to wish, and the greatest good to be obtained for him. And to this end, and no other, I assure myself, hath been directed whatsoever may have been said, written, or done, by any Catholic, which with some others, might breed disgust (71).' These last words, as Mr Gee observes, are hardly consistent with what he had wrote in the conference (72), and what he had done for the King of Spain.

[U] Not to suffer his power to be baffled.] His favour with the Spanish monarch was upon the decline, which put him upon such shifts as he had no occasion for before. In this exigence, he procured a student of one of the new seminaries to make an oration before his Majesty, inciting him to a second invasion of England, and then backed the arguments himself. But all his devices failing to procure any thing that was effectual this way (73): he next endeavoured to raise a rebellion in England, and tampered with Ferdinand Earl of Derby to appear and head it (74); which he refusing, was poisoned by the procurement of Father Hesketh, who had been sent to him by Father Parsons. We find also another attempt made to assassinate the Queen at his instigation, in a letter of Winwood to Secretary Cecil (75); who writes that 'Charles Paget had acquainted him of an information he had received of the departure from Rome August 17th, of an English Jesuit, whose name he did not know, a man of thirty years of age, of a good mien and fashion, sanguine complexion, yellow beard, full and quick eye, and of a middle stature, who, furnished by the Spanish Ambassador with a sum of money, took his course towards England, on purpose to assassinate her Majesty's person. That Paget made much difficulty to name his author, but because Winwood urged Sir James Lindsay, who within two days arrived at Paris from Rome, he acknowledged him to be the man, and said Sir James had seen the Jesuit; who passing by him on a time when he was walking with Parsons, this latter willed him to eye him well, and asked him, whether, if he should meet that man in England, he should take him for a Jesuit?' This letter was followed by another, dated October 20th, wherein Mr Winwood writes, 'that the Ambassador of Scotland had procured him to speak that morning with the party from whom he received the notice which he had sent on the 29th ult. that this party averred the same to be true; adding further, that Parsons did very earnestly and often urge him to receive that man into his company, who was most remarkably distinguished by a high nose, and was to push through Scotland into England. 'I find, continues Winwood, that the Jesuits for their countenance have recourse to the Duke of Seffe; but for their affairs and practices, to one Antonio Taxis, authorized there by the King of Spain (76).'

having put in practice all those arts of which he was so consummate a master, to wriggle himself into that high dignity [W], he repaired to Rome in 1596, and did not spare personally

[W] Arts to procure the Cardinalate ] Upon Cardinal Allen's death, Holt the Jesuit, and Washington, set about in Flanders a petition to the King of Spain, in favour of Parsons, subscribed by the common soldiers, day-labourers, artizans, and pensioners; nay, by Cullions and laundresses, as well as those of better rank and quality. The year after, having received a letter (77) from Oliver Manaræas and Gibbons, complimenting him upon the assured prospect he had of succeeding, and intreating his care of the mission after his advancement; he sent it to Claude Aquaviva the General, inclosed in one of his own; wherein, taking notice of these endeavours to obtrude this honour upon him, he artfully declares that he was able to do much more good to the mission in his present station, and then proceeds thus: Quod cum verissimum sit, paternitatem vestram humillime, omnique qua possum affectu ob Dei causam precor, ut veri Patris officium hac in re præstet, ut periculum hoc (si quoad impendat, nihil enim ad huc certi habeo) avertere conetur: i. e. which being most true, I most humbly, and with all possible fervency, beseech your paternity for God's sake, to perform the part of a true father, and endeavour to avert this danger from me, if indeed there be any, for as yet I have received nothing certain concerning it (78). These last words shew that he was much perplexed about the uncertainty of his succeeding. But this uneasy situation is seen in the strongest light by another letter to his friend and confident Inglesfield, who had wrote to him upon this occasion, wishing him success. By his answer, it appears that he had applied to the King of Spain by one John Piragues, a prime confident of that monarch, but without having received any answer. He acquaints this friend likewise with his constant way of returning all the compliments made to him upon his prospect of success, viz. Non esse Deum aut opis aut consilii tam egenum, ut cum in animo esset vestem novam parare, eam sine ret ex veteri & lacernoso confici pallio; i. e. that God was not so deficient either in power or wisdom, as when he designed the making of a new garment, to suffer it to be patched up out of an old and ragged cloak; intimating the improbability of being raised from such a low station as his was, to this high dignity. After which he proceeds to open his whole mind, as follows: Nunc vero quoniam cecepi tecum clare hisce literis, & cum omni fiducia agere, progrediar aliquanto alterius, & quod ad hoc negotium spectet, totum effundam animum meum, & quicquid intus in me sentio sine ve iudicii sine propensionis aperiens in conspectu Dei, sine ulla simulatione, post multam apud me & Deum meum deliberationem, cum quanta potui indifferencia, & summo desiderio & voto cognoscendi divinam voluntatem. After this preface, wherein he professes, as in the sight of God, to lay open the true state of his heart without any disguise, after having deliberated much with himself and with his God to know his divine will, he proceeds: Primum igitur (ut tu probe nosti,) licet salus totius mundi penderet ab hac mea promotione ad dignitatem, quam tu mihi optes, (quod quam sit incertum Deus novit, & eventus ipsi mire varii nos commentent, in quibus quotidie fallimur, sine nostrat inspiciamus sine aliorum rationes;) ego tamen neque directe, neque indirecte, prætere de aut ambire hanc promotionem, quoniam voto adstringor ut ne ambiam, quod votum, ut inviolatum custodiam, det mihi Deus (obsecro) suam sanctam gratiam, atque vitam mihi auferat potius quam voluntatem illam non offendere hoc in genere.—Secundo licet ambitu deposito possit quis sibi placere in huiusmodi promotione, vel eam etiam desiderare, gratias tamen Deo meo, sentio me ab utroque, uti confido, liberum. Et si speciose multæ rationes se offerunt cogitanti, de rebus magnis quæ præstari possent ab homine in illa dignitate constituto, sincere tamen dico, quod cum cogitatione penitus ingrediar in deceptiones quas secum ferunt huiusmodi longe positarum rerum imagines, atque in eventus incertos, & in pericula molestiasque, quæ mihi in ista atque in futura vita possunt oriri, & animo deinde verso conditionem hanc vivendi securam & plenam consolationem in qua dego utiliore etiam mihi fortasse & aliis: Ista, inquam, dum mihi ante oculos statuo, & quædam præterea, quæ mihi a multis retro annis sunt proposita, per oppida sc. & vicis discurrendo tradere Christianæ personally to address the Pope himself upon a point of so much concernment to his private interest. But, instead of the Cardinal's Hat, he met with a rebuke from his Holiness [X]; who having received several complaints against him [Y], was so much incensed thereby, that he had some thoughts of stripping him of all the posts he was possessed of, and entirely laying him aside. To avoid this storm he retired to Naples, on pretence of his health, not returning to Rome 'till after the death of that Pope [Clement VIII.] in 1606 (r). Some years before his departure from Spain, he had been placed in the superintendency of the English mission (s). The power given him by this office was extremely acceptable, and he executed the trust with all the vigilance and vigour that was natural to him, as well as with the utmost fidelity and zeal for the honour of his Order [Z]. In that

' reduced in my time, I feel myself so alienated from that new kind of life, as not to endure the thoughts of it, much less to desire it. Wherefore, I hope I am free from all such desire; and which is still more, I am drawn by these arguments, and by a certain spiritual sense and affection into this sentiment, that I judge this and not that to be the will of God. These reasons, indeed, I confess, do not clearly evince the thing; for if they did, there would be no room for my deliberation, however useful or necessary it might seem to others. Yet, thirdly, hence it follows, (as you will readily grant) that since I don't certainly know it to be the will of God that I should be promoted, but rather doubt it for the reasons alledged, I am bound, and shall always be bound, not only not to desire or pretend to it, but to bear a mind always inclining the contrary way. And if any higher power, whatsoever it be, should think of imposing it upon me, I ought to withstand it, and give my reasons for so doing; and this, not only in performance of my vow, and to approve my fidelity to my religion, which might suffer a detriment from such promotion, but that I may save my soul from danger, which ought to be dearer to me than the whole universe, even if there were many: inasmuch as the entrance upon these dignities is wont to be sweet and serene, and the egress or exit full of trouble and sorrow; as was observed of our last good Cardinal by none more attentively than myself. Finally, after diligently weighing and comparing all these things as in the sight of God, and every thing, as much as lies in me, being accurately performed, in order to know the divine will about avoiding this promotion, if it should be put upon me by an authority which could not be resisted (which I hope will never be); in such a case it might be hoped that it certainly was the divine will, and consequently, that he would, for his own glory, give sufficient grace to sustain the charge; and how much more sincerely any one hath endeavoured to decline it, so much greater things will he perform in it, as we read to have happened to many great servants of God. Thus, you have all that I can either say or think upon this affair, written no otherwise than if I was at the feet of my confessor, going immediately to render up my soul to God, which, inasmuch as it is drawn from me solely by your importunity, and written for your satisfaction, I beseech you to lock it up within your own breast; unless you judge it ought to be communicated to some intimate friends, such as Fitzherbert, &c. God keep you in his custody. May the 10th, in the year 1595.'

[X] A rebuke from his Holiness. More tells us the occasion of his return to Rome was to settle some quarrels that had arisen in the college there, during his absence; which he adjusted so much to the satisfaction of the society, that they petitioned Claudius Aquaviva the Præfect-General, that he might continue among them for a considerable time; and no doubt this was the pretended reason of his departure for Rome, where he was no sooner arrived than he presented an account of the state of all the English seminaries to his Holiness. However, the Jesuit likewise observes, that upon his arrival, he was visited by several of the highest rank, and particularly by Cardinal Bellarmine, at whose instance he waited upon the Pope, and gave him an account of the reports that were spread every where in Flanders, and even at Rome, of his Holiness's design to confer the Purple upon him, and that the King of Spain had written to his Holiness upon the occasion; that Parsons represented his own unfitness for that dignity, signifying, that he thought he should be able to do much more service to the Church in his present station; that the Pope in answer told him, he had heard nothing from the Spaniard upon any such subject; that idle reports were not to be minded; that he was very well satisfied with his services, and exhorted him to continue in the same course (81). It is certain, by what has been seen in the preceding remark, that he was not without hopes of succeeding to the Hat, and no doubt the Pope's answer must needs be a mortification to him: but Mr Wood is mistaken in telling us that the grief of it killed him (82), since we find that he lived no less than fourteen years after it. Watson tells us a story of Parsons's brother George's buying the scarlet cloth for his robes, but allows it was done without his consent or even privity (83).

[Y] The Pope received several complaints against him. These came from the Secular priests, and chiefly from Paget, Morgan, Throgmorton, and others; who petitioned the Pontiff to send no more Jesuits into England, but to employ the secular priests resident in the country. The quarrel had begun from the time of the death of the Queen of Scots, as is before observed, and proceeded to such a height, that each side laboured to disgrace and supplant the other; especially, after Parsons set on foot the title of the Infanta of Spain in 1593. Paget at the head of the Seculars and Laity opposed it both by word and writing, and openly inveighed against Parsons and his adherents, as seditious and factious persons, full of treachery, and without conscience (84). Another tells us of several letters shewn by the Magistrates in England for the furtherance of the Spanish invasion: and that his trafficking for kingdoms and states, and particularly, for the crown of England, became so notorious, that that there was stuck upon Pasquin's buttock at Rome, a paper to this effect: If there be any one that will buy the kingdom of England, let him repair to a merchant in a black square cap in the city, and he shall have a very good pennyworth thereof (85). Sir Ralph Winwood also, in a letter of October 20th, 1602, already cited (86), acquaints Cecil, that he had been well informed, that the Jesuits began to decay much in reputation with regard to their practices against Queen Elizabeth, and Parsons to be detested for an impostor. Dr Abbot further declares, that Pope Clement called him a knave, Fitzherbert an Hypocrite, and the rest of the Seculars called him atheist, impostor, machiavillian, and the worst of villains. Personi inquam, quem Clemens octavus nebulonem solenniter insignivit. Fitzherbertus vester aliquando singularem hypocritam, seculares reliqui atheissimam, impostorem, factiosum, machiavelianum, libellatorem, & quid non quod homini nequissimo conveniat (87).

[Z] His zeal as Præfect of the English mission. Claudius Aquaviva had left the management of this office some years before, and he now applied to the Pope for it. One of the first things he did in it was the appointing of Thomas Worthington to be Rector of the college of Doway in the room of Barret deceased. He likewise set up a printing-press at St Omers, and made one John Wilson inspector of it, injoining him to print no books without first sending them to him for his perusal and licence. The original of the seminaries of Valladolid and Seville, was as follows: Upon the death of the Duke of Guise in 1588, the scholars at Rheims losing their support which came from that Duke, went to Doway, to Barret then Rector, who, not being able to provide for them all, spoke to Parsons to apply to the King of Spain for a benefaction: Parsons took this to be a good opportunity for founding these new seminaries at Valladolid and Seville; and in the mean time he placed twelve of those sent him from Rheims, in so many bishops and noblemen's houses. Before his death there were not less than fifty or sixty members in each of the Spanish seminaries that service his pen was continually at work [AA]; but, except in the just-mentioned retreat to Naples, he left Rome no more after his third return to that city (t). In 1608, he procured the removal of the Arch-Presbyter of England from that post, for taking the oaths to King James [BB], and obtained a Brief from Pope Paul the Fifth to deprive all such Priests as did take that oath (u). In the latter end of Lent, 1610, he was seized with a violent fever. This happened on the sixth of April, and the distemper grew to such a height in four days time, that he was judged by his Physicians to be past recovery. While he lay in that condition, he dictated three letters in the discharge of his office (w), the last of which was finished on the thirteenth; and on the fifteenth, the fever, being the ninth day after the access, put a period to his life. Pope Paul, as soon as he heard of his illness, indulged him in all the ceremonies usually granted to Cardinals at the point of death. His body being embalmed, was deposited at his own request in the chapel of his

St Omers was not begun 'till 1593, being founded upon a different plan from the rest, and intended to supply a defect in their institution. It had been found by experience, that several who entered after their education in Protestant principles, were apt to revolt. St Omers was therefore instituted, to take in children to breed up from their infancy in the Romish faith. More informs us, that Parsons had been in this office of Praefect of the English mission eighteen years when he died, so that he must have been appointed in 1592; but the nature and extent of his power was not settled perfectly before the year 1596 (88).

[AA] In this service his pen was constantly at work.] Besides the books already mentioned, he wrote the following. 1. A Temperate Wardword to the turbulent and seditious Watchword of Sir Francis Hastings, Knt. &c. Printed in 1599, 4to; under the name of N. Doleman. 2. A Copy of a Letter written by a Master of Arts of Cambridge, &c. in 1584, and printed, probably, in 1600, 8vo; and again in 1631, 8vo. This was commonly called Father Parsons's Green coat (89), from the hind and edges of the leaves being of that colour. 3. Apogetical Epistle to the Lords of her Majesty's Privy-Council, &c. 1601, 8vo. 4. Brief Apology or Defence of the Catholic Ecclesiastical Hierarchy erected by Pope Clement VIII. &c. St Omers. 1601, 8vo (90). 5. Manifestation of the Folly and bad Spirit of secular priests, 1602, 4to, (91). 6. A Decacordon of ten quodlibetical Questions, &c. 1602, 4to. 7. De Peregrinatione, lib. 1. 12mo. 8. *Answer to O. At length it was republised with an introduction and some animadversions by Edward Gee, under the title of The Jesuits Memorial for the intended Reformation of the Church of England under their first Popish Prince; published from the Copy that was presented to the late King James the Second. Lond. 1690, 8vo. 22. Controversia nostra temporis in Epitomen redusta MS. in Baliol-college library. 23. Parsons translated from the English into Spanish: A Relation of certain Martyrs in England; printed at Madrid, 1590, 8vo. He is also supposed to be the author of a piece intituled, A Declaration of the true Causes of the great Troubles presupposed to be intended against the Realm of England; wherein the indifferent Reader will manifestly perceive by whom, and by what means, the Realm is brought into those pretended troubles. Scene, and allowed. Anno MDLXXXI. An answer to which was wrote by Bacon (afterwards Lord Verulam) and printed in his Resuscitatio, under this title, Certain Observations upon a Libel published this present Year 1592; intituled, A Declaration of the true causes, &c. This declaration, containing about fifty pages in folio, was presented to the editor of Lord Bacon's Works, in four folio Volumes, by the late learned Mr T. Baker, of St John's college in Cambridge, with the following remark. 'This book is a virulent libel, and was looked upon to be so dangerous, I suppose, as to receive an answer from Bacon, &c.' The libel he thinks was printed abroad, containing too much treason to be published in England, and yet the print is English. This book, continues Mr Baker, was probably wrote by Parsons the Jesuit; the stile is his, and one thing runs thro' all his book, his affection to the Spanish monarchy (94).

[BB] Procured the Archpriest to be displaced.] This office had been erected in 1588, in the view of strengthening the Catholics by uniting them under one head; and Blackwell had the office. Upon King James's requiring the new oath of supremacy, there was a great meeting at London of the Catholics, with Blackwell at their head, who determined, that the oath, according to the plain and common understanding of the words, might, with a safe conscience, be taken by the Romanists. On the contrary, Parsons, in his Answer to King James's Apology, writes, That all learned men agree that the oath is unlawful, as opposing matter of faith; and declares, that none can take it without peril of everlasting damnation (95). The King published the oath of supremacy after the discovery of the gun-powder plot: And Parsons, we are told, solicited the Pope for his Brief against it, and obtained it; but before it was sent into England, the Jesuit wrote a letter hitber, to intimate, though falsely, that he was for a mitigation, but that the rest were for the Pope's power against the King. The letter is to this tenor: 'About some four or five months ago, it was consulted by seven or eight of the learnedest divines, who gave their judgment for the Pope's authority de jure: 'For if the questions were de facto, and not de jure, 'the reasons for waving his authority may be considered. Besides this, I have conferred about the matter with Cardinal Bellarmine, and sundry others of great learning and conscience; and all are of opinion, that the form of the oath as it lies, is heretical, and in no wise to be admitted by him that will not deny the Catholic faith. I have had occasion twice to speak with his Holiness, first, in company with Thomas Fitzherbert, when we proposed certain manners of mitigation suggested by friends, wherein his Holiness answered, that as for any actual using censures against his Majesty, he would not, but rather all courtely. But as to the authority of the see apostolic in the power of using censures, he was resolved; and would rather lose his head, than yield one jot. To the second, being informed that some priests did seem to incline to take the oath, he answered, He could not hold them for Catholics (96).

PETRE, [Sir WILLIAM] the ancestor, and first founder, of a noble family in Essex, and Secretary of State to four Kings and Queens of England; was the son of John Petre [A], of Tor-newton in the parish of Tor-brian, in Devonshire (a), and born at Exeter (b), or, according to others (c), at Tor-newton, which is said to have been long in the family (d). Being trained up to learning, very probably in his native place; he was thence sent to Exeter-college in Oxford, where, after having studied some time with good success, he was elected Fellow of All-Souls-college, in the year 1523 (e). He took the degree of Bachelor of the Civil Law, July 2, 1526; and that of Doctor in the same faculty, January 24, 1532 (f). Next, he was made Principal of Peckwater-inn, in the foresaid university, now incorporated into Christ's-church-college (g). He became soon after tutor to the son of Thomas Bolein, Earl of Wiltshire. In which station, his genteel person and behaviour being observed by Tho. Cromwell, he introduced him to court: where he was so much liked by King Henry VIII. that he was sent to travel, with the allowance of a pension (h) [B]. Returning home an accomplished gentleman, with those gayeties on the one hand that might adorn a court, and with those abilities on the other that might support it; he was taken into the Secretary of State's office, and made Latin Secretary (i). Being observed by Tho. Cromwell, the chief Secretary, to be a man of capacity, and intirely fit for the purpose, he was commissioned by him, with others, in 1535, to make a general visitation of all the Monasteries in England, and to enquire into the government and behaviour of the religious of both sexes, &c. (k) [C]. In the commission Dr Petre is stiled one of the Clerks in Chancery; and was also Master of the Requests (l). Having acquitted himself in that employment to the King's satisfaction, he not only was rewarded, in 1538 and 1539, with very large grants of Abbey-lands [D], and knighted; but also was sworn in 1543 of the Privy-Council, and constituted one of the Principal Secretaries of State (m). July 6, 1544, when King Henry VIII. was preparing for his expedition into France, and Queen Catharine Parr was constituted Regent of the Kingdom, Sir William Petre was appointed, among others, to direct her counsels (n) [E]. And in the same King's will, dated December 30, 1546, he is nominated one of the assistant Counsellors to his successor, King Edward VI. (o). Under this young Prince, he was not only continued in the Privy Council, and in his office of Secretary of State; but also was made, in the year 1549, Treasurer of the court of First-fruits for life (p); and, the year following, one of the Commissioners to treat of peace with the French at Guines (q). He was also, in that reign, commissioned, with the Archbishop of Canterbury and others, in confidence of their sound knowledge, zealous faith, innocency of life and behaviour, and readiness to dispatch affairs, to punish and correct all rectors, vicars, and other ecclesiasticks, as well as laymen, of what condition

[A] Was the son of John Petre.] Antony Wood (1) Ubi, supra. says (1), that this John Petre was a rich Tanner. But Mr Prince affirms on the contrary, that Sir William was 'not of mean and mechanick parentage, as some either ignorantly or maliciously suggest; (referring to Wood,) but of gentle and worshipful progenitors: For the name of Petre was a name of note in those parts, long before Sir William brought so much lustre and eminency to it. His grandfather was John Petre of Tor-brian, Gent. and his father John Petre of the same place, Esq; who, by Alice his wife, daughter of John Colin of Woodland near adjoining, had five Sons and three Daughters. The eldest son was Sir William, of whom we are treating; the second inherited Tor-newton; the third was Head-customer of the city of Exeter, a place of profit and repute; Richard was Chancellor of the church of Exeter and Archdeacon of Buckingham; and Robert, the youngest, was one of the officers of the Exchequer to Queen Elizabeth (2).'

(2) Worthies, as above, p. 496.

[B] That he was sent to travel, with the allowance of a pension.] The Pension allowed him was 125 l. a year: And there was a Tutor assigned him, who had been there before, and could instruct him, what he should see, where he should go, what acquaintance to entertain, what exercise or discipline to undergo. His Instructions were, 1. That he should keep a Diary of what the chiefest places, and the eminent persons, either apart or in conventions, yielded worthy of remark and observation. 2. To have before him a map or card of every place he went to. 3. Not to stay long in any one place. 4. To converse with no Englishmen but Agents, Embassadors, or such grave persons as his Majesty would direct him to. 5. To endeavour after recommendations from persons of quality in one place, to those in another; keeping still his correspondence with the most publick and eminent persons of every respective place.—Two things improved his Travel. An artificial and careles freedom, that opened others: And a natural gravity, that shut him up, and was more capable of observing their virtues, and escaping their vices (3).

[C] And to enquire into the government and behaviour of the Religious of both sexes.] They were more-over directed, to find out all the offences of the monks and nuns; and, to this purpose, give them encouragements to accuse, both their Governors, and each other. To command them to exhibit their mortmains, evidences, and conveyances of their lands; to produce their plate and money, and give an inventory thereof, &c. (4)

tion soever, who should despise or speak evil of The Book of Common-Prayer, &c. with power to imprison the guilty, and load them with irons, if necessary, or admit them to bail. He was likewise in several other commissions for ecclesiastical affairs (r) [F]. So skilful was he, in adapting himself to all changes [G], that he even gained Queen Mary's esteem and favour; to that degree, that she continued him in his post of Principal Secretary of State (s). And, moreover, made him Chancellor of the Garter, in the first year of her reign, with a salary of 100 marks per annum (t). He, unwilling to lose, by the restoration of Popery in this reign, those very large estates, which he had raised out of the ruins of the Monasteries; took a very extraordinary method to secure them to himself and his posterity. That is, he procured a special Dispensation from Pope Paul IV. to retain them; affirming, that he was ready to employ them to spiritual uses (u) [H]. Another instance of his singular favour with Queen Mary, was, his being intrusted with an affair of so much consequence, as concluding the treaty of marriage between her and Philip Archduke of Austria (w). And, in return for her favour, he was very active in searching the bottom of Sir Thomas Wyatt's insurrection. We are likewise told, that he was a kind of casuist to her, when the church-lands went against her conscience. And that when Pope Paul III. was sending another legate, instead of Cardinal Pole, whom she had desired; he advised her, to forbid his setting foot into England, as the very resolutely did (x). Notwithstanding, these deep compliances with Queen Mary's measures, he found means to ingratiate himself with Queen Elizabeth. He continued one of her Secretaries of State 'till 1560 (y), if not longer; and of her Privy Council 'till his death. In the first year of her reign, he was commissioned, with others, to take the oath of Supremacy of all persons enjoying any office, or place of trust, under her. And, in the eighth year of her reign, he was in commission with Sir Nicolas Bacon, Knt. Lord-keeper, in consideration of their prudence, dexterity, and integrity, in transacting affairs, to search into the records at the Tower of London, Exchequer, and Rolls; in order to give what light they could to the Queen's ambassadors at Bruges, then engaged in a treaty with Philip king of Spain, upon certain difficulties that had been started, touching matters relating to the Queen and her subjects (z). In the latter part of his life, he employed himself in works of charity; particularly in becoming a benefactor to the colleges of Exeter

[F] He was also in several other commissions for ecclesiastical affairs.] Namely, Feb. 10, 1550-1, in a commission to examine, correct, and set forth the Ecclesiastical Laws (8). We find him likewise in commissions for secular affairs: As, Decemb. 30, 1550, in a Commission for calling in the King's debts, &c. (9).

[G] So skilful was he in adapting himself to all changes.] A man would wonder, as D Lloyd observes (10), how this man made a shift to serve four Princes of such distant Interests as King Henry, King Edward, Queen Mary, Queen Elizabeth; until he recollects the French King, who enquired of a wife man how he might govern himself and his kingdom? the wife man took a fair large sheet of paper, and, instead of an infinite number of precepts, which others use to offer on that subject, he only writ this word, Modus, a Mean. In King Henry's time, he observed his humour; in King Edward's, he kept to the law; in Queen Mary's, he minded wholly State-affairs; and in Queen Elizabeth's, he was religious. He moved with the first movers in most transactions to his apparent danger, yet he had motions of his own for his real security. Able he was at home, and very dexterous abroad, particularly at Boulogne: Where Monsieur Chaulion said concerning him, "We had gained the last 200,000 crowns without hostages, had it not been for the man that said nothing;" meaning Secretary Petre.—Neither was he better at keeping his own counsel, than at discovering other mens; as appeared by the intelligence he had, that the Emperor had sent ships to transport the Lady Mary into Germany, in case the King [Edward VI.] would not allow her the practice of her religion (though three men knew not that design in the German court) whereupon he fetched her to Leez, in Essex; and thence, under the notion of preparing for sea-matters, he sent over five thousand pounds to relieve the Protestants.

[H] He procured a special Dispensation from Pope Paul IV. to retain them.] The estates specified in that Bull, are: In the county of Essex; The maner of Ingatstone, and advowson of the Church, of the yearly value of 46 l. which had cost him 849 l. 12 s. 6 d. and formerly belonged to Barking nunnery. The maner of Hauley Barnes, belonging to the same nunnery, which had cost him 133 l. 6 s. 8 d. The maner of Crowden, belonging to the bishopric of London, given him by King Henry the Eighth, and worth 8 l. 16 s. 8 d. per ann. The maner of Cow-bridge, of the yearly value of 20 l. for which he had paid 453 l. 10 s. The maner of Wefelands, worth 4 l. a year, for which he had paid 88 l. 4 s. The Rectory of Buttisbury, worth 10 l. per ann. which had cost him 80 l. The three last belonging to the monastery and nunnery at Stratford.—The maner of Est-Horndon, of the yearly value of 34 l. 19 s. 11 d. which had cost him 411 l. 13 s. 6 d. The maner of Matching, of the yearly value of 44 s. which cost him 44 l. The two last belonging to the monastery of Waltham.—The maner of Blunthall, worth 13 l. 7 s. 4 d. per ann. which had cost him 191 l. 19 s. 5 d. and the Rectory of Ginge-mountney, both belonging to Thoby-priory; the latter of the yearly value of 20 l. and that had cost him 400 marks.—Lands and tenements in Writtle called Salmons and Borobbes, formerly part of the possessions of St John's Abbey in Colchester, which he had got by way of exchange for the patronage of a church.—In Gloucestershire, the maners of Toddenham and Sutton, belonging to Westminster abbey, which he had obtain'd partly by exchange and partly for money: The former worth 28 l. and the latter 20 l. 6 s. 8 d.—In the county of Devon; The maner of South-Brent, late part of the revenues of the monastery of Buckfast, worth 120 l. a year; which he had obtain'd partly by way of exchange for other lands, as well as in reward of his services to King Henry the Eighth.—The maner of Churchestow, belonging to the same monastery, of the yearly of 42 l. which he had in exchange for the maner of Helden in Essex and a sum of money.—And the Rectory of Brent, appropriated to the said monastery, worth 20 l. per ann. for which he had paid 400 l.—All those possessions the Pope confirmed to him, and his heirs pro potiori cautela; --- Et singulas venditiones, concessiones, & donationes predictas; necnon receptiones, ac possessionum adeptiones, & retentiones --- auctoritate Apostolica perpetuo approbamus & confirmamus; ac illis perpetua & inviolabilis firmitatis robur adjicimus: Supplentes omnes & singulos, tam juris quam facti etiam, de necessitate exprimentos defectus, si qui forsan intervenerint, in eisdem; ac decernentes illa perpetuo absque conscientie scrupulo inviolabiliter subsistere: as the words of the Bull are. At length, after having been Secretary, and of the Privy Council to four Kings and Queens of England; and seven times Embassador in foreign parts; he dyed January 13, 1571-2, and was buried in a new isle of the church at Ingatstone (a). The estate he left was very considerable [M]. He was married twice [N]. With regard to his character; he is said to have been a man of pregnant wit; of approved wisdom, and exquisite learning (b). His capacity was contemplative, and his genius active; observing, rather than reading; with his eye more on men, than books; studying behaviour, rather than notion; to be accomplished, rather than knowing; and not to err in the main, rather than to be excellent in circumstance (c).

And bequeathed also forty pounds by will to the college. He moreover procured for it new Statutes — To All-souls college, he gave a piece of ground, adjoining thereto (11).

[K] And in founding Almshouses at Ingatstone.] He built there ten Almshouses, for twenty poor people, ten within the house, and ten without the house; having every one two pence a day, a winter-gown, and two loads of wood; and, among them, feeding for six cows winter and summer, and a Chaplain to read prayers to them daily (12).

[L] He also left in his will several legacies to the poor.] He bequeathed to the poorest Inhabitants of the several parishes where he had estates, considerable legacies, regard being had to the difference of times. And, in particular, he left 20 l. to the poor prisoners in London and Southwark, and the like sum to the poor in the hospitals there (13).

Buttesbury. And other large estates that were not maners; in Ginge-mountney, Billerica, Ingatstone; Stock, Butsbury, Ramdens, Downham, Runwell, Ginge-Margaret, Ingrave, &c. — Great acquisitions for one man; the name of Petre not occurring before in the Inquisitions post mortem, at least in the county of Essex.

[N] He was married twice.] His first Lady, was Gertrude daughter of Sir John Tirrel of Warley in Essex; by whom he had two daughters, Elizabeth, married to John Gostwick, Esq; and Dorothy married to Nicholas Wadham, of Merrifield in Somersetshire, Esq; the joint founders of Wadham-college in Oxford. She dyed May 28th, 1541. — Sir William's second Lady was Anne, daughter of Sir William Browne, Knt. and widow of John Tirrel of Heron-place in Essex, Esq; by whom he had two daughters; and his only Son IOHN, who, July 21, 1603, was created Baron Petre of Writtle in Essex; and dyed 11 Octob. 1613. His successors in that dignity have been, 1. William, his son, who dyed 5 May, 1627. 2. Robert, who dyed 23 October, 1637. 3. William, that dyed in the Tower 5 January, 1683-4. 4. John, his next brother, succeeding; dyed unmarried in 1684. And was succeeded by the next brother, 5. Thomas, who dyed 4 June 1707. 6. His only son Robert, dying of the small-pox, 22 March, 1712-13, left his lady big with child; who, the 3d of June following, was delivered of, 7. Robert, the late Lord Petre. He married, on the 2d of May, 1732, Lady Anna-Maria Ratcliffe, daughter of James late Earl of Derwentwater; and dying in July 1742, hath left issue by her, 8. an only son, named Robert-Edward, born in 1742. C

PETTY [Sir WILLIAM], a man of very great capacities, uncommon ingenuity, and a signal example of what industry, with a concurrence of happy circumstances, can accomplish; was the eldest son of Antony Petty a Clothier, and born at Romsey in Hampshire, on the 16th of May, 1623. While he was very young, he took great delight in conversing with artificers, as smiths, carpenters, and joiners, and imitating their several trades, which he performed very dexterously at twelve years of age. At that time, he went to the Grammar-school in his native place (a): and, 'at the full of age of fifteen years, had obtained the Latin, Greek, and French tongue, the whole body of common arithmetick, the practical geometry and astronomy conducing to navigation, dialing, and with the knowledge of several mechanical trades. After this he went to the university of Caen in Normandy [A]; and, upon his return to England, was prefer'd in the King's navy, where at the age of twenty years he had gotten up about threescore pounds, with as much mathematicks, as any one of his age was knowne to have had (b). With this money, upon the breaking out of the civil wars in 1643, he went, for his further improvement, into the Netherlands and France for three years; and having vigorously pursued his studies, especially that of medicine, at Utrecht, Leyden, Amsterdam, and Paris, he returned home to Romsey; and brought with him his brother Antony, whom he had bred up, with about ten pounds more than he carried out of England (c). While he was at Paris, he studied anatomy, and read Vesalius with Mr Tho. Hobbes, then residing there, who was ready upon all occasions to forward his pregnant genius (d). By what notice he takes of the improvement of his money, 'tis probable, that he maintained himself by traffic while abroad (e). Upon the sixth of March, 1647, a patent was granted him by the Parliament for 17 years, to teach his art of double writing (f) [B]. In

lib. 'There is invented an instrument of small bulke and price, easily made, and very durable, whereby any man, even at the first sight and handling, may write two resembling copies of the same thing at once, as serviceably and as fast (allowing two lines upon each page for setting the instruments) as by the ordinary way; of what nature, or in what character,

In 1648 he published, 'Advice to Mr Samuel Hartlib, for the advancement of some particular Parts of Learning [C]:' which shews the extensiveness of his mind and knowledge. Being a man resolved to push his fortune, he sided with the predominant party in the kingdom; and going to Oxford at the time the Loyalists were ejected by the parliamentary Visitors, prosecuted the study of Physic there, and taught the young scholars Anatomy

'or what matter soever, as paper, parchment, a book, &c. the said writing, &c. ought to be made upon. The use hereof will be very great to lawyers and scriveners, for making of indentures, and all kinde of counterparts; to merchants, intelligencers, registers, secretaries, clerks, &c. for copying of letters, accompts, invoices, entering of warrants, and other records; to Scholars for transcribing of rare manuscripts, and preserving originals from falsification, and other injuries of time. It lesseneth the labour of examination, serveth to discover forgeries and surreptitious copies, and to the transacting of all businesses of writing, as with ease and speed, so with privacy also.'

[C] Advice to Mr Hartlib, for the advancement of some particular parts of learning ] The design of this work, (which is comprized in four sheets, 4to.) is the Advancement of reall learning in general, but particularly the Education of Youth, Mathematics, Physic, and concerning the History of Art and Nature, with some more serious ones concerning an office of Publick Adresse.——To that end, the means he proposes are, first, to get Labourers together: Then, to see what is well and sufficiently done already; by perusing all books, and taking notice of all mechanical inventions. For which there must be appointed able Readers of all such Books; and every book must be read by two severall persons apart; to prevent mistakes. Out of all these Books, one Book or great worke may be made, though consisting of many volumes; with proper indices, or tables, for the ready finding, remembring, and well understanding all things contained in these books. Next, the ablest men in every respective faculty; two or three under one another in each faculty; must be set apart, to drive them on further with sufficient maintenance and encouragement for the same.

He then lays down the following rules. 1. That there be instituted Ergastula Literaria, literary work-houses, where children may be taught as well to do something toward their living, as to read and write. 2. That the business of education be not, as now, committed to the worst and unworthiest of men; but that it be seriously studied and practised by the best and ablest persons. 3. That all children above seven years old may be presented to this kind of education, none being to be excluded by reason of the poverty and inability of their parents; for hereby it hath come to pass, that many are now holding the plow, which might have been fit to steer the state. Wherefore let such poor children be employed on works, whereby they may earn their living, equal to their strength and understanding, and such as they may perform, as well as elder and abler persons, viz. attending engines, &c. And if they cannot get their whole living, and their parents can contribute nothing at all to make it up, let them stay somewhat the longer in the work-house. 4. That since few children have need of reading, before they know, or can be acquainted with the things they read of; or of writing, before their thoughts are worthy the recording, or they are able to put them into any form, (which we call inditing;) much less of learning languages, when there are books enough for their present use in their own mother-tongue; our opinion is, that those things being withall somewhat above their capacity, as being to be attained by judgment, which is the weakest in children, be deferred a while, and others more needful for them, such as are in the order of nature before these aforementioned, and are attainable by the help of memory, which is either most strong, or unpreoccupied in children, be studied before them. We wish therefore, that the Educands be taught to observe and remember all sensible objects and actions, whether they be natural or artificial, which the Educators must, upon all occasions, expound unto them. 5. That they use such exercises, whether in work or for recreation, as tend to the health, agility, and strength of their bodies. 6. That they be taught to read by much more compendious means than are in common use; which is a thing certainly very easy and feasible. 7. That they be not only taught to write according to our common way, but also to write swiftly, and in real characters; as likewise the dexterous use of the instrument for writing many copies of the same thing at once. 8. That the artificial memory be thought upon; and if the precepts thereof be not too far above childrens capacities, we conceive it not improper for them to learn that also. 9. That in no case the art of drawing and designing be omitted, to what course of life soever these children are to be applied; since the use thereof for expressing the conceptions of the mind, seems to be little inferiour to that of writing, and in many cases performs what by words is impossible. 10. That the elements of arithmetick and geometry be all studied, being not only of great and frequent use in all human affairs; but also sure guides and helps to reason, and especial remedies for a volatile and unsteady mind. 11. That effectual courses be taken to try the abilities of the bodies and minds of children, the strength of their memory, inclination of their affections either to vice or virtue, and to which of them in particular; and withall to alter what is bad in them, and increase, and improve what is good, applying all, whether good or bad, to the least inconvenience, and most advantage. 12. That such as shall have need to learn foreign languages, (the use whereof would be much lessened, were the real and common characters brought into practice) may be taught them by incomparably more easy ways than are now usual. 13. That no ignoble, unnecessary or condemned part of learning be taught in those houses of education; so that if any man shall vainly fall upon them, he himself only may be blamed. 14. That such as have any natural ability and fitness to music, be encouraged and instructed therein. 15. That all children, though of the highest rank, be taught some gentle manufacture in their minority, such as these, turning of curious figures, making mathematical instruments, dials, and how to use them in astronomical observations; making watches, and other trochilic motions; limning and painting on glass or in oyl-colours; graving, etching, carving, embossing and molding in fundry matters; the lapidary's art in knowing, cutting and setting jewels; grinding of glasses dioptrical and catoptrical; botanics and gardening; making musical instruments; navarchy, and making models for building and rigging of ships; architecture, and making models for houses; the confectioner's, perfumer's, or dier's art; chemistry, refining metals, and counterfeiting jewels; anatomy, making skeletons, and excarnating bowels; making mariners compasses, globes, and other magnetic devices. . . . Of which he shews the great benefit in eight instances. . . . In the next place, for the advancement of all mechanical arts and manufactures, he wishes that there were erected a Gymnasium Mechanicum, or a college of Trademen, (or, for more expedition, untill such place could be built, that the most convenient houses for such a purpose, might be either bought or hired,) wherein One at least of every trade, (but the prime, most ingenious workman, the most desirous to improve his art) might be allowed a handsome dwelling rent free; which, with the credit of being admitted into this society, and the quick sale which certainly they would have of their commodities, when all men would repair thither, as to a market of rare and exquisite pieces of workmanship, would be a sufficient motive to attract the very ablest Mechanicks. . . . Within the walls of this Gymnasium or college, should be a Nysoconium Academicum, according to the most exact and perfect idea thereof; a compleat Theatrum Botanicum; stalls and cages for all strange beasts and birds, with ponds and conservatories for all exotic fishes. . . . Lastly he recommends the compiling of a work, whose title might justly be Vellus aureum, sive Facultatum lucriferaum Descriptio magna; wherein all the practised ways of getting a subsistence, and whereby men raise their fortunes may be at large declared. . . . But all that he projected hath been since performed by our many ingenious Artists; and the latter article, in particular by Mr Chambers in his Dictionary, &c.

tomy and Chymistry, to his and their great benefit. He became also Deputy-Professor of Anatomy to Dr Thomas Clayton, who had an insurmountable aversion to the sight of a mangled corps (g). March the 7th, 1649, he was created Doctor of Physic, by virtue of a dispensation from the Delegates of the university, who had received sufficient testimony of his rare qualities and gifts from Lieutenant-colonel Kelsey, Deputy-governor of Oxford-garrison (h). The same year, or the next, he was made Fellow of Brasen-nose-college, in the room of Nath. Hoyle, B. D. (i) at which time he was one of the Society engaged in cultivating natural knowledge, and the new philosophy, who often met at his chambers. June the 25th, 1650; he was admitted a candidate of the College of Physicians in London (k): and, in December following, was one of the persons chiefly concerned in recovering Anne Greene [D], who had been executed at Oxford the 14th of that month, for the supposed murder of her bastard-child; after she had been brought into a private house, to be anatomized (l). January 1, 1650-51, he was unanimously elected Anatomy-Professor at Oxford, in the room of Dr Clayton, who had resigned in his favour (m). And, the 7th of February following, was chosen Music-Professor in Gresham-college, which place he obtained by the interest of his friend Captain John Graunt (n) [E]. By these preferments, in the year 1652, according to his own account, he had improved his stock to four hundred pounds; and having an hundred pounds more advanced him to go for Ireland, he landed at Waterford September the 10th that year. He was sent thither in the quality of Physician to the army, with an allowance of 20 shillings a day; and was likewise Physician to three Lord-Lieutenants successively, Lambert, Fleetwood, and Henry Cromwell; in which post he continued 'till June 1659, and gained by his practice about four hundred pounds a year above his pay. In the year 1654, perceiving that the admeasurements of the lands forfeited by the rebellion there in 1641, and intended for the satisfaction of the soldiers, who had suppressed it, were most insufficiently managed, he obtained a contract, dated the eleventh of December that year, for making the said admeasurements, by which he gained about nine thousand pounds, and six hundred pounds more for directing an after-survey of the adventurers lands [F]. These sums, together with what he had gotten by his other employments, (particularly 800 l. for two years salary, as clerk of the council) raised him an estate of thirteen thousand pounds, at a time when as much land was bought for ten shillings in ready money, as would yield ten shillings a year rent, above his majesty's quit-rents, in 1685, the year in which his will is dated. Part of this money he employed in soldiers debentures, and part of it in purchasing the earl of Arundel's house and gardens in Lothbury in the city of London. The debentures, for which, as he says, he gave above the market-price, were again disposed of in buying lands in Ireland (o), to the amount of ten thousand pounds a year. But he lost afterwards a considerable part of it, by the court of innocents [G], in 1663; and the buildings he had erected on the garden ground in Lothbury, called Token-house, were for the most part destroyed by the fire of London. July 14, 1655, he was admitted a Fellow of the college of Physicians. He was likewise one of the commissioners for setting out the lands in Ireland to the army, after they were surveyed; and clerk of the Council there; as also Secretary to the lord Lieutenant, Henry Cromwell, by whose interest in 1658 he was elected one of the burgeses for West-Loth in Cornwall, to serve in the parliament of Richard Cromwell, which met at Westminster the 27th of January that year. In this parliament, on the 25th of March following,

[D] Was one of the persons chiefly concerned in recovering Anne Greene, &c.] The other physicians concerned in that wonderful recovery, were, Mr Thomas Willis of Christ-church, Mr Bathurst of Trinity college, and Mr Clerke of Magdalen college. A curious account of it was published at the time, intitled, 'Newes from the Dead. Or a true and exact Narration of the miraculous deliverance of Anne Greene, who being executed at Oxford Dec. 14, 1650. afterwards revived; and by the care of certain Physicians there, is now perfectly recovered. Together with the manner of her suffering, and the particular means used for her recovery. Written by a Scholler in Oxford, for the satisfaction of a friend, who desired to be informed concerning the truth of the business. Whereunto are prefixed certain Poems, casually written upon that subject.' Oxford, 1651. 4to. in three sheets and a half. Supposed to have been written by Dr Ralph Bathurst (2). Some of the Poems were written by Joseph Williamson, George Davenant, and Henry Davenant, all three of Queen's college; Robert Sharrock of New college; Christopher Wren, Gentleman-commoner of Wadham college, &c.—Several instances there have been, of persons recovered to life after execution: but none after having hung so long, and been so misused and stamp'd upon, as this Anne Greene was.

[F] For directing an after-survey of the adventurers lands.] He was allowed twenty shillings a day for the survey; and, entering upon it in December 1654, completed it in about ten months time, with that exactness, that there was no estate to the value of sixty pounds a year, but he exactly shewed it to its true value, and made maps of all that he had done. Those that he employed for the Geometrical part, were ordinary persons, that circumambulated with their box and needle, not knowing what they did, but He knew well how to make use of their labours. This survey was but a single proof of the great elevation of his genius, which like a meteor moved above the sphere. A. Wood, from whom we have this account (3), adds, that by this employment he obtained an estate in Ireland worth about 10000 l. per ann. and that after it was reduced by the court of innocents to 5 or 6000 l. yearly, he could from Mount-Mangorton in Kerry behold 50000 acres of his own land. But Dr Ward observes (4), that instead of fifty thousand, it should perhaps have been fifteen thousand, the number he was said by his accusers to have, as he tells us himself (5).

[G] By the court of innocents.] This was a Court erected at Dublin in 1662, to determine what persons were nocent or innocent; i. e. had been engaged, or not, in the grand Irish Rebellion in 1641, and whose estates had been declared forfeited upon that account.

following, he was impeached by Sir Hierome Sankey [H], for mismanagement in the distributions and allotments of the Irish lands, with other offences relating to that affair. The charge was general, and Dr Petty being then in Ireland, many of the long robe were against receiving of it, 'till it was digested into particulars; but at last it was resolved, he should be summoned to attend the house that day a month. However he came over sooner, and appearing in the house the 19th of April, answered to the charge on the 21st, to whom Sir Hierome replied. Upon this the matter being adjourned, and that parliament suddenly dissolved the day following, it was not brought to any issue [I]. Soon after Dr Petty went back to Ireland, where measures were taken in order to prosecute him, and he was removed from his publick employments; though the Lord Lieutenant still continued his good opinion of him [K]. In the same year 1659, he was one of the Rota club, which used to meet at Miles's coffee-house in New-palace-yard, Westminster, among whom were Mr James Harrington, Henry Nevill, Charles Wolfeley, Esquires, Major John Wildman, and others [L]. This club lasted 'till the 21st of February that year. But before they broke up, Dr Petty went again into Ireland, where he continued 'till the Restoration; and then returning into England, was introduced to King Charles II. to whom such a genius could not fail of being acceptable. The 8th of March that year, he resigned his Professorship in Gresham-college (p); and on the 19th of the same month, he was made one of the Commissioners of the Court of Claims*. April the 11th, 1661, he received the honour of knighthood; and, according to some, was ambitious of being created Earl of Kilmore in Ireland; but the fear of drawing upon himself too much envy, made him decline it (q). He also obtained of his Majesty, about the time of his being knighted, a new patent, by which he was constituted Surveyor-General of Ireland (r). And the same year he was chosen member of the Irish Parliament for Eniscorchy. By the Act of Settlement in 1662, all the forfeited lands which had been set out to him, and of which he had been possessed May 7, 1659, were confirmed to him; and, in virtue thereof, he had seven, and his lady two, grants of lands by letters patent †. In 1663, he was continued a Fellow of the College of Physicians by their new charter (s): and by the charter of the Royal Society appointed one of their first Council; being then esteemed the chief person among them to advance experimental philosophy and mechanics. About that time he was much talked of for his new invention of a double-bottomed ship [M], to sail against wind and tide; which in [H] He was impeached by Sir Hierome Sankey.] The articles exhibited against him, were, 1. That he the said Dr Petty had received great bribes. 2. That he had made a trade of buying Debentures in vast numbers, against the statute. 3. That he had gotten vast sums of money, and scopes of land, by fraud. 4. That he had used many foul practices, as Surveyor and Commissioner, for setting out lands. 5. That he and his fellow-commissioners had placed some Debentures in better places than they could claim, denying right to others. 6. That he and his fellow-commissioners had totally disposed of the Army's security; the debt still remaining chargeable on the State (6).

[I] It was not brought to any issue.] Henry Cromwell Esq; then Lord Lieutenant, wrote upon that occasion, the following letter, in his favour, to John Thurloe Principal Secretarie of State. 'Sir, I have heretofore told you my thoughts of Dr Petty, and am full of the same opinion; and if Sir Hierom Sankey doe not ren him down with numbers and noise of adventurers, and such other like concerned persons, I believe the parliament will finde him, as I have represented. He has curiously deceived mee these foure yeares, if he be a knave. I am sure the jurors of them, who are most busie, are not men of the quiettest temper. I doe not expect you will have leizure, or see cause, to appeare much for him; wherefore this is onely to let you understand my present thoughts of him. The activeness of Rob. Reynolds, and others, in this busines, shews, that Petty is not the onely marke aimed at. But God's will be done in all things. Pray let not the busines of my coming over wholly die, though it slumber for a while. It would be for the conveniency of my own affairs to know, whether it be probable, I may make a step over this summer. [K] Tho' the Lord Lieutenant still continued his good opinion of him.] That appears, from a letter written by the Lord Lieutenant in his behalf, to a person, whose name is not mentioned, and brought by the Doctor himself, upon his return again shortly after into England. 'Sir, The bearer, Dr Petty, hath been my Secretary, and clerk of the councill, here in Ireland; and is one, whom I have known to be an honest and ingenious man. He is like to fall into some trouble from some, who envy him. I desire you to be acquainted with him, and to assist him, wherein he shall reasonably desire it. Great endeavours have been used to begett prejudices against him; but when you speak with him, he will appear otherwise. You cannot but take notice of my own condition. I wish you would advise this bearer concerning my own affairs. You may say any thing safely to him. I wish I had been able formerly to have merited the favour, I now desire from you. [L] Major John Wildman, and others.] Their scheme was, that all magistrates, and officers of state, should be chosen by balloting, and the time for bolding their places limited; that a certain number of the members of parliament should be annually changed by rotation, &c. See the works of James Harrington, Esq;

[M] His new invention of a double-bottomed ship.] The elegant Author of the History of the Royal Society, judiciously observes—(9); 'It was the most considerable experiment, that has been made in this age of experiments; if either we regard the great charge of the work, or the wonderful change it was likely to make in navigation, or the great success to which this first attempt was arriv'd. Though it was at first confronted with the doubts and objections of most seamen of our nation, yet it soon confuted them by experience. It appear'd very much to excel all other forms of ships, in sayling, in carriage, in security, and many other such benefits.' . . . The Doubts and Objections hinted at by Dr Sprat, are more fully explained by A. Wood, in the following words . . . In July 1663, when first the ship adventur'd from Dublin to Holy-head, she stay'd there many days before her return, and 'twas pleasant to consider how her Adversaries insulted, and having first established the conclusion, that she was cast away, did afterwards discourse the several necessities why it should

July following made one very successful voyage from Dublin to Holyhead, and back again, contrary to the expectation of most persons, who thought it an impracticable experiment. But in a second voyage it had the misfortune to be lost in a violent storm. He presented a model of this ship to the Royal Society, which is yet preserved in their repository. And about the year 1665 he communicated to them A discourse about the building of ships, contained in a quire of paper of his own writing; which the Lord Brouncker, President of the Society, took into his own possession, and kept it for many years, saying it was too great a secret of state to be commonly perused (1). He was the author of many other useful inventions, several of which were laid before the Royal Society, whose institution he very diligently promoted, and was often chosen one of their council (u) It is almost incredible, that a man of so active and busy a genius should find leisure for making of books; yet he was author of several things that required time and application, as appears by the list of them given below [N]. The most curious of them were ‘ should be so. Some said it was impossible her mast could be sufficiently planted against a strong gale, others said she was gone to land at O Brafile, &c. But her return in triumph with those visible advantages above other vessels, did check the derision of some, and becalm’d the violence of others, the first point having been clearly gain’d that she could bear the seas. She then turn’d in against wind and tide into the narrow harbour of Holyhead, amongst the rocks and ships, with such dexterity, as many ancient seamen did then confess they had never seen the like. About the same time, Thomas Earl of Ossory, and other persons of honour were embarked in her, and drove to and again within the Bar near Dublin. It then blew very hard, infomuch that a small Holland vessel, famous for being a good sailer, which set sail with her, was in appearance looked upon as over-set, while he inclined not above half a foot more to one side than another, so that it was truly then called, The Pad of the Sea. But at length, in its return home from a certain voyage (10), as Dr Sprat goes on, it was destroyed by a common fate, and by such a dreadful tempest, as overwhelm’d a great fleet the same night; so that the antient fabricks of ships have no reason to triumph over that new model, when of three-score and ten sail, that were in the same storm, there was not one escap’d to bring the news.’

Thus these two writers concur in trumpeting the praises of this extraordinary invention: but here they leave it, and by that means leave their readers under an anxious uneasiness to know what became of it afterwards, since no vessels of this new fabric are to be seen at present We shall therefore fully satisfy so reasonable a curiosity by the following account.

Notwithstanding, then, all the fine things that were said of the invention by others, yet the inventor was himself very sensible that there were still some defects in it, and that it was capable of a further improvement. Upon which account, instead of building another upon the plan of that which was lost in the abovementioned storm, he resolv’d to improve the plan. Accordingly, he spent many years upon it, and at last brought it to the desired perfection, as appears by an extract of a letter of Dr Wood to Sir Peter Pett, in these terms: ‘ Sir William Petty has discovered a new . . . . of shipping, which will as much transcend the old as guns do bows; if we consider the strength, (in every vessel) the burden, ballast, draught of water, sayling, steering, keeping to wind, and as many more properties of a good ship, his excellencies the best the world has yet produced in all these; and yet, after all, the cost and charges will be considerably less. But to give a particular instance, let us take, for example, one of the best sayling vessels of England, of the old built, viz. the Constant Warwick, or Fubb’s yacht, and another of Sir William’s new ones, of equal draught of water and strength, but double the cost; call the former Fubbs, and the last Buny, and compare them together as to further qualifications, I say Buny will carry four times the burthen that Fubbs can, ballast included, and bear sail in proportion as 3 to 2. Or thus, a common single body being given, suppose of 70 tons neat burden, with 30 tons of ballast; we offer to make a double body, which needs no ballast, viz. to carry as much sail light as the other loaden, of the same or more neat burthen; but it’s draught of water shall be as 4 to 7, and the cost as 7 to 11, and shall bear sail as 11 to 7 (11).

‘ N. B. Demonstrated by a great variety of bodies,

This extract was communicated to the Royal Society, April 16, 1684; and in another to Mr Molyneux upon the same subject already cited, the particular alteration or improvement which he had made in the invention may be seen, as also an account of the trial and failure of it. Mr Molyneux declares he did not know what measures Sir William intended to take to redeem his credit (12). But these too we have from his own pen, in a letter to Sir J. W. at Dublin, December 18th, 1684, wherein he writes thus. ‘ I have troubled you with several accounts of my naval experiments; perhaps you may think, because I expected your applause for them. But I do now with the same candour and ingenuity acquaint you, that upon the 15th and 16th days of this month, we have made an experiment by the sea; in which were so many complicated and perplexed circumstances, as to make me stagger in much of what I formerly said, but not in the least concerning the strength of our fabric. Our principal disappointment was in the bearing of sail, which all the world allows will be easily remedied by virtue of our principle. We thought to have remedied our ship’s tenderness for the present by ballast, upon the advice of good and common seamen; but found that (as our model had formerly told us) it had not the same effect to stiffen our sort of shipping as the common, so as this use of ballast did but bring new mischiefs upon us; and, as they say, did damp the ship’s motion, and disturb her working. The cause of the tenderness, was an endeavour, besides to introduce a new principle, to make a small passage-boat of twelve foot broad, yet enough to carry horses, hoping to have gotten some small matter thereby, to have defrayed the charges. But as it is thus, we are now to begin again; all men believing that the principle will be good. For my own part, I intend to spend my life in examining the greatest and noblest of all machines, a ship. And as I have always told you, I shall content myself, in that I have to this purpose used more effectual means, and with less by-ends, than the generality of other men. And I promise you, if I can find just cause for it, will write and publish a book against my self. So much do I prefer truth before vanity and imposture, &c. (13).’ Sir William survived this great disappointment but a few years, and probably never resumed the subject afterwards, any further than what we see in a paper, intitled, What a complete Treatise of Navigation should contain; drawn up in the year 1685, and printed in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 198.

[N] As appears by the list of them given &c.] Besides his Advice to Mr Samuel Hartlib, &c. mentioned above; he was author of the following pieces. 1. ‘ A Brief of proceedings between Sir Hierome Sankey and the Author, with the State of the Controversy between them.’ Lond. 1659. in three sheets fol. 2. ‘ Reflections upon some Persons and Things in Ireland, by letters to and from Dr Petty: With Sir Hierome Sankey’s speech in parliament.’ Lond. 1660. 8vo. low note [O]. 20. 'Observations upon the Cities of London and Rome.' Lond. 1687, 8vo. three leaves.—The following were published after his death. 21. Political Arithmetick, or a Discourse concerning the Extent and Value of Lands, &c.' See below note [O]. This Treatise was presented in manuscript to K. Charles II, by the Author; and published, in 1690, by his son Charles, Lord Shelborne, who dedicated it to K. William. 22. 'The Political Anatomy of Ireland, with the Establishment for that Kingdom, when the late Duke of Ormond was Lord Lieutenant, taken from the records.' Published by Nahum Tate, London, 1691, 8vo. Reprinted in 1719, under the title of 'A political Survey of Ireland.' To both editions was annexed, 23. Verbum Sapienti, or an 'Account of the Wealth and Expence of England;' and the method of raising Taxes in the most equal manner. This last was advertised upon in a pamphlet, intituled, A Letter from a Gentleman in the country to his friend in the city, &c. Lond. 1692, 4to. 24. 'A Treatise of Naval Philosophy, in three parts, viz. A physico-mathematical Discourse of ships and sailing: of naval Policy: of naval oeconomy or husbandry.' This is printed at the end of 'An Account of several new Inventions and Improvements now necessary in England: in a discourse by way of letter to the Earl of Marlborough, relating to building of our English shipping, planting of oaken timber in the forrests, &c.' Lond. 1691, 12mo. A. Wood queries, whether it was the same with 'The Discourse about the building of ships' mentioned above, which was in the hands of the Lord Brouncker; and of which, one Dr Rob. Wood of Ireland only, had a copy (12). 25. 'What a complete treatise of Navigation should contain.' Written in 1685, and published in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 198 p. 657. March 1693.—Besides these printed pieces, the two following ones of his remain in manuscript in the books of the Royal Society. 1. 'A Discourse of making cloth with sheeps wool.' Read to the Society Nov. 27, 1661 (13). This contains the history of the cloathing trade, as No. 4. above does that of dying. And he purposed to have done the like as to other trades. In which design some other members of the Society engaged themselves also at that time. 2. 'Supellex Philosophica: consisting of forty-five Instruments, requisite to carry on the Design of the Philosophical Society at Dublin.' Communicated to them December 1, 1684; and sent afterwards to the Royal Society (14).—Amongst his Works must also be placed, his three chests of original Maps, Field-books, the Copy of the Downe Survey with Barony Maps, and the chests of Distribution-books, with two chests of loose papers relating to the Survey, the two great Barony books, and the Books of the history of the Survey; which he mentions in his will, and valued all together at two thousand pounds (15).—Moreover, he assisted his friend Capt. John Graunt, in writing his Natural and Political Observations made upon the Bills of Mortality (16).—Dr Ward mentions also, an English Version of The Commentaries of George Acropolite, comprising the state of the orientall church and empire, from the year 1204 to 1260, as done by Sir William Pettie; and now in the hands of Mr Joseph Ames. But it is a question, whether it was not done by some other hand.—Such is the Account given of our learned Author's Works by A. Wood, Dr Ward, and Walter Harris, Esq; (17). But there is great reason to suppose, nay even affirm, that No. 7. was not written by our Author. For I have a copy of it, (being a 4to pamphlet of 46 pages,) printed in 1640, that is, when Mr Petty was only seventeen years old. Besides, it plainly appears to have been written by a Lawyer, or a person better versed in records, than Mr Petty ever was, or can be supposed to have been.

[O] The most curious of them were his pieces in Political Arithmetic; for which reason we shall give a more particular account of them. They were all reprinted together in 1699, 8vo. in the following order. had a genius capable of any thing which he chose to apply himself to. But his main bent seems to have been towards cultivating the common arts of life, and political interests of states. These were his favourite studies, and continued with him to the last [P]. Especially, he set up iron-works, and pilchard-fishing, and also opened lead-mines and a timber-trade in Kerry, which turned to very good account. As he was always very active and industrious himself, so he was a great enemy to sloth and indolence in others; and chose to shew his regard to the poor, rather by employing them in his life, than bequests at his death [Q]. However, he gave a house in the town of Romley, for the maintenance

‘the Value and Increase of People and colonics.’ The Essay, of which the scope is here only given, was about the Growth, Increase, and Multiplication of Mankind: but it being lost, the Editor was forced to be content with this Extract, and short heads of it, which we shall give by and by. II. ‘Of the Growth of the city of London, and of the Measures, Periods, Causes, and Consequences thereof.’ III. ‘Observations upon the Dublin Bills of Mortality, 1681. and the state of that city. Further Observations upon the Dublin bills: or Accompts of the Houses, Hearths, Baptisms, and Burials in that city.’ These two are transposed in this edition. IV. ‘Two Essays in Political Arithmetick, concerning the People, Housing, Hospitals, &c. of London and Paris. The first tending to prove, that London hath more people and housing than the cities of Paris and Rouen put together, and is also more considerable in several other respects. The second tending to prove, that in the hospital called l’Hôtel Dieu at Paris, there die above three thousand per annum, by reason of ill accommodation.’ V. ‘Observations upon the cities of London and Rome.’ VI. ‘Five Essays in Political Arithmetick, viz. 1. Objections from the city of Rey in Persia [by the author of the Republique des Lettres] and from Mons. Auzout [in his Letters from Rome] against two former Essays answered, and that London hath as many people as Paris, Rome, and Rouen, put together. 2. A comparison between London and Paris, in 14 particulars. 3. Proofs that at London, within its 134 parishes named in the Bills of Mortality, there live about six hundred and ninety-six thousand people. 4. An estimate of the people in London, Paris, Amsterdam, Venice, Rome, Dublin, Bristol, and Rouen, with several observations upon the same. 5. Concerning Holland, and the rest of the Seven United Provinces.’ In French and English. VII. ‘Political Arithmetick, or a Discourse concerning the extent and value of lands, people, buildings, husbandry, manufacture, commerce, fishery, artizans, seamen, soldiers, publick revenues, interest, taxes, superlucration, registries, banks, valuation of men, increasing of seamen, of militia’s, harbours, situation, shipping, power at sea, &c. As the same relates to every country in general, but more particularly, to the territories of his Majesty of Great Britain, and his neighbours of Holland, Zealand, and France.’ In the ten chapters, which this last Essay is divided into, he shews, ‘That a small country, and few people, may by their situation, trade, and policy, be equivalent in wealth and strength, to a far greater people, and territory. And particularly, how conveniences for shipping, and water-carriage, do most eminently, and fundamentally, conduce thereunto. That some kind of Taxes, and publick levies, may rather increase than diminish the Common-wealth. That France cannot, by reason of natural and perpetual impediments, be more powerful at sea, than the English, or Hollanders. That the people and territories of the King of England, are naturally near as considerable, for wealth, and strength, as those of France. That the impediments of England’s Greatness, are but contingent and removeable. That the power and wealth of England, hath increased above this forty years. That one tenth part, of the whole expence of the King of England’s subjects, is sufficient to maintain one hundred thousand foot, thirty thousand horse, and forty thousand men at sea, and to defray all other charges of the Government, both ordinary and extraordinary, if the same were regularly taxed, and raised. That there are spared hands enough among the King of England’s subjects, to earn two millions per annum, more than they now do, and there are employments, ready, proper, and sufficient for that purpose. That there is money sufficient to drive the Trade of the nation. That the King of England’s subjects, have stock competent, and convenient, to drive the Trade of the whole Commercial World.’

Some of his most curious Observations, in those several Tracts, are as follows. ‘That London doubles in forty years, and all England in 360 years. That, in the year 1682, there were about six hundred and seventy thousand souls in London, [but now much increased,] and about seven millions, four hundred thousand in all England and Wales; in which there are about twenty eight millions of acres of profitable land. That the periods of doubling the people, are found to be in all degrees, from between ten to twelve hundred years (18). That the Growth of London must be at its greatest height in the year 1800, and must stop before the year 1842, when it will be eight times more than it was in the year 1682; with above four millions for the service of the Country and Ports. That the Assessment of London is about an eleventh part of all England and Wales. In a table, he shews the progression of the increase of Mankind from the Flood to the birth of Christ; in which last period he supposes the eight persons that came out of the Ark were increased to an hundred and twenty eight millions. That in 1682, there were computed to be upon the face of the earth, three hundred and twenty millions of souls. That in the next two thousand years the world will be fully peopled; so as that there shall be one-head for every two acres of land in the habitable part of the earth. And then, according to the prediction of the scriptures, there must be wars and great slaughter. That, in the year 1840, the people of the city of London will be ten millions, seven hundred and eighteen thousand, eight hundred and eighty; and those of the whole country but ten millions, nine hundred and seventeen thousand, three hundred and eighty nine (19). Then he proposes how the city of London may be made (morally speaking) invincible; and how an Uniformity of Religion may be established therein (20). That ‘tis possible to increase Mankind by generation four times more than at present.’

[P] And continued with him to the last] This is fully evident, from a passage in his will, dated May 2, 1685; which is in these words . . . . ‘I being now about threescore and two years old, intend the improvement of my lands in Ireland; and so to get in the many debts owing unto me: and to promote the trade of iron, lead, marble, fish, and timber, whereof my estate is capable. And as for studies and experiments, I think now to confine the same to the anatomy of the people, and political arithmetick; as also to the improvement of shippes, land-carriages, gunns, and pumps, as of most use to mankind; not blaming the studies of other men.’

[Q] And chose to shew his regard to the poor, rather by employing them in his life, than bequests at his death] This is also evident from the following clause in his will - - ‘As for legacies for the poor, I am at a stand; as for beggars by trade and cleasion, I give them nothing; as for impotents by the hand of God, the publick ought to maintain them; as for those who can get no work, the magistrates should cause them to be employ’d, which may be well done in Ireland, where are fifteen acres of improveable land for every head; as for prisoners for crimes by the King, for debt by their prosecutors, for those who compassionate the Sufferings of any object, let them relieve themselves by relieving such sufferers, that is, give them alms, &c. I am contented that I have assisted all my poor relations, and put many into a way of getting their owne bread, and have labour’d in publick works, and by inventions, have fought out real objects of charity; and do hereby of a charity-school, the rent of which is still applied to that use (w). From the first meeting of the Philofophical Society at Dublin in 1684, the conduct thereof was under his direction, and he was regularly chosen President of it, November 1, 1684 (x). After having made as good use of his time as any man ever did, he dyed of a gangrene in his foot occasioned by the swelling of the gout, at his house in Piccadilly Westminster, December the 16th, 1687, in the 65th year of his age. His body being carried to Romfey, his native place, was buried, near the remains of his father and mother, in the south isle of the chancel there, under a flat stone, with a short inscription (y) [R]. He left behind him a very large estate [S]. In the year 1667 he married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Har-drefs Waller, Knt. and relict of Sir Maurice Fenton, Bart. by whom he had four children; John, who dyed before him, and was buried at Dublin; Charles, Henry, and Anne, that survived him. He had also a natural daughter, that was an Actress at the Duke's theatre, in London (z). His widow and relict was created Baroness of Shelborne in the county of Wexford in Ireland, December 31, 1688 (a); and of his posterity an account is given in the note [T]. He was a person of an admirable inventive head, of a prodigious working wit, and of so great worth and learning, that he was both fit for, and an honour to, the highest preferment (b). His religious character is given below, in his own words [U].

Petty.

[T] And of his posterity an account is given in the note.] Charles succeeded his mother in the Barony of Shelborne, and dying without issue, the title became extinct. But June 16, 1699, K. William revived it, in Henry the second son; and, February 11, 1718-19, K. George I. advanced him to the further titles of Viscount Dunkeron, and Earl of Shelborne. He lived to a very advanced age, and dyed April 17, 1751, immensely rich; possess'd of an estate of 18,000 l. a year, besides 200,000 l. in the funds, and 140,000 l. in mortgages and other securities. He married Arabella, sister to Charles Earl of Cork and Burlington, by whom he had five children: but none survived him. A son of his, named John, had most of his estate; and was created Baron Dunkeron and Viscount Fitz-maurice.—As for Anne, the daughter of Sir William, she was married to Thomas Fitz-maurice Baron of Kerry, created Earl of Kerry, Nov. 2, 1722. She dyed in 1737, in Ireland (21).

[U] His religious character is given below, in his own words.] ‘ As for Religion, I dye in the profession of that Faith, and in the practice of such worship, as I find establish'd by the laws of my country: not being able to believe what I myselfe please; nor to worship God better, than by doing as I would be done unto, and observing the laws of my country, and expressing my love and honour to almighty God by such signs and tokens, as are understood to be such by the people with whom I live, God knowing my heart even without any at all. And thus, begging the divine Majesty to make me what would have me to be, both as to faith and good works, I willingly resign my soul into his hands, relying only on his infinite mercy and the merits of my Saviour, for my happiness after this life, where I expect to know and see God more clearly than by the study of the scriptures and of his works. I have been hitherto able to do. Grant me, O Lord, an easy passage to thyself, that as I have lived in thy fear, I may be known to dye in thy favour. Amen (22).’

PHILIPPS [FABIAN], a Barrister of the Middle-Temple, author of several Books relating to the History and Antiquities of England, was born at Prestbury in Gloucestershire, September 28, 1601. His father was Andrew Philipps of an ancient family in Herefordshire, born to a considerable estate in and near Leominster, and his mother was of the good family of the Bagehotts, and heiress to one of her brothers. When he was very young he spent some time in one of the inns of Chancery; and thence translated himself to the Middle-Temple, where, by his diligence and continual application, joined to a happy memory, he became a proficient in some sorts of learning, and at length a great admirer of, and well versed in, Antiquities. Upon the breaking out of the civil wars he continued loyal, having been always a zealous assertor of the royal Prerogative; and was so passionate a lover of King Charles I. that, two days before his Majesty's being beheaded, he wrote a Protestation against that intended Murder, which he caused to be printed, and affixed to posts, and in all public places (a). He also published a pamphlet importing, That ‘ K. Charles I. was no Man of Blood, but a Martyr for his people [A].’ In 1653, when the Courts of Justice at Westminster, especially the Chancery, were voted down by Oliver's Parliament (b); he published, ‘ Considerations against the dissolving and taking them away [B].’ for which he received the thanks of William Lenthall, Esq; Speaker of the late Parliament, and of the Keepers of the Liberties Liberties of England. For some time, he was Filazer for London, Middlesex, Cambridgeshire, and Huntingdonshire; and spent much money in searching Records, and writing in favour of the Royal Prerogative: yet he got no advantage from it, except the place of one of the commissioners for regulating the law, worth 200 l. per annum, which lasted only two years (c). After the Restoration of King Charles II. when the Bill for taking away the Tenures was depending in Parliament, he wrote and published a Book to shew the Necessity of preserving them [C]. Afterwards, he enlarged upon the same subject, in

[C] He wrote and published a Book to shew the Necessity of preserving them. This Book is intitled, 'Tenenda non Tollenda, or The Necessity of preserving Tenures in capite, and by Knight-service, which, according to their first Institution were, and are yet, a great part of the Salus Populi, and the Safety and Defence of the King, as well as of his People Together with a Prospect of the very many Mischiefs and Inconveniencies, which, by the taking away or altering of those Tenures, will inevitably happen to the King and his Kingdoms.' Lond. 1660, 4to. — Before we proceed to give an Extract of this Book of our Author's; and the Reasons why Tenures were taken away; we shall first explain the Meaning of these Tenures, and the Ground of their Establishment. — The word Tenure, signifies the Manner how lands or tenements are holden, [tenentur]; or the service which the tenant owes to his Lord. There can be no Tenure without some service, because the service makes the Tenure (1). All the Lands and Tenements in England are originally holden, either mediately or immediately, of the King; who is the Lord paramount (2). The several Tenures in use here, before their being taken away, were; Escheage, Knight's service, Frank-almoigne, Socage, Grand and petit Serjeanty, Burgage-tenure, and Villenage. The most honorable of all, was Knight's-service, or Chivalry, whereby the Tenant, in respect of his land, or Fee, was obliged to attend the King on horse back in his wars for forty days. It was said to be in Capite, because it was holden of the King, [caput regni] immediately as of his crown (3). A Knight's fee was, by Statute of King Edward the Second (4), 20 l. a year; and, according to Sir Edward Coke (5), 480 acres of land. Knight's-service carried along with it Wardship, Marriage, and Relief (6). — As for the Ground of Tenures; It cannot be better described, than in these words of Mr Justice Wright (7). 'They were a military Policy of the Northern conquering Nations, devised as the most likely means to secure their acquisitions.' And a most effectual method it was for that purpose: since it firmly attached, all concerned in the conquest, by Interest, as they were before engaged by Duty, to defend what they had for considerable a share in, and had perhaps ventured their All to acquire. 'They were large districts or parcels of land, given or allotted by the conquering General to the superior Officers of his army, and by them dealt out in less parcels to the inferior Officers, and most deserving Soldiers (8). Thus a proper military subordination was established; and an army of Tenants in capite, or Feudatories, were, as so many stipendiaries, always on foot, ready to muster and engage in the defence of their country: So that the feudal returns of Fealty, or mutual Fidelity and Aid, were not originally ex pacto, but seem to have been politick, or rather natural, Consequences from the apparent Necessity these warlike people were under, of maintaining their ground with the same spirit, and by the same means they had got it.' These Tenures by Knight's service were most probably introduced by William the Bastard, or Conqueror (9). — They were not repined at for some centuries, because the Lands were more than an equivalent for the service. But, in time, the concomitants of them (Wardship, Marriage, Escheat, &c.) grew very heavy and troublesome. For, upon the death of the Tenants in capite, their children, if under age, became the King's Wards: who bestowed too often the custody of them upon his Favourites; and These very frequently not being the best sort of men, made a prey of those poor Orphans; cut down their woods; suffered their houses to go to decay; or bestowed them in marriage amongst their own family, tho' the match was very unsuitable.

A Redress of those Grievances was attempted in King James the First's reign. For, at a Conference between the Houses of Lords and Commons, in February 1609-10, the Committee of the Lower House proposed, 'That his Majesty might be made acquainted, by some of their Lordships, that it was the desire of the Commons, that some course might be taken concerning Wardships and Tenures.' For which they offered to treat the King an annual support. And till they were satisfied in those points, the Commons seemed to be in no humour to grant any supply (10). On the other hand, his Majesty was in no haste to consent; reserving to himself the power of affirmative or negative, to grant it, as on further deliberation he should see cause (11). However, he gave the Commons leave, March the 12th, to treat of that business; which gave them great joy. The result of their debates and deliberations, was, To desire his Majesty, 'That the following Tenures might all be taken away; viz. Tenures by grand Serjeanty; petty Serjeanty; Escheage; all Knight's service in capite; Homage ancestral and ordinary, with the Respite of them; Wardship of the body; Marriage of the Heir, and of the Widow; Respite of Fealty; Wardships and Custody of lands; Premiere Seisine; Livery, and Offre les mains; Licence of Alienation upon fines, feofments, leases for life, and other conveyances; Pardon of Alienation, Offices post mortem, Inquisition ex officio, except for Escheats; Relief upon Knight's service.' &c. — But, what was very cruel and unjust, Escheats, Heriots, suit of Court, Rent, work-days, and such services; were all to remain. — Upon the first report of this proposal to the King, in April, his Majesty answered, 'That he would upon no terms whatsoever part with any branch of his Sovereign Prerogative, whereof the Tenures in capite, from his person, which is all one as of his Crown, was no small part. But touching the Dependence upon Tenures, such as, Marriage, Wardship, Premiere Seisin, Relief, Respite [respite] of Homage, and the like, which were only the Burdens of Tenures, (the Honours and Tenures reserved) his Majesty was pleased, when he should understand what Recompence would be offered for them, to give further Answer, towards contracting for the same, with all convenient speed (12).' The Recompence for the Tenures, which the King demanded, was 200,000 l. per ann. The Commons offered 100,000 l. and alledged, 'That their purpose was to have laid the Burden upon the Landed Men, [which was indeed very reasonable as it took off a heavy burden from the Land;] But, they could not find how so huge a sum might be levied, without grieving a number of his Majesty's poorer Subjects (13).' They included afterwards Purveyance, in their Proposal; for which the King demanded an enlargement of the sum of 200,000 l. However he was pleased to abate of that (14). The Commons bargained long for 180,000 l. and at last came up to the demanded price of 200,000 l. The payment whereof was to be secured by act of Parliament, in as strong sort as could be devised; and they engaged, it should be a Revenue firm and stable, and not difficult in the levy: 'Tho' they did not proceed so far, as to settle, how and upon what it should be levied. But, after all, this Project came then to nothing (15). — Immediately after the Restoration of King Charles the Second, it was resumed with very great vigour: and, very probably, was one of the bargain'd Conditions of that Restoration (16). Accordingly, in the Parliament which began at Westminster the 25th of April, 1660, an Act passed; 'taking away and discharging the Court of Wards and Liveries, and all Wardships, Liveries, premier Seisins or Offre les mains, values and forfeitures of Marriages, and all charges incident to the same, and likewise all Fines for alienations; all Tenures by Knights-service, in capite, of the King or any other person; and by Homage, Escheage, &c.' And all those Tenures were turned into free and common socage. At the same time, Purveyance for the King's household; or any other forcing in two other Books, mentioned below [D]. He also published, 'The Antiquity, Legality, Reason, forcing of carriages or purveyance for his Majesty's use; were also taken away.—In full recompence and satisfaction for all which advantages, the Excise upon Liquors was settled upon the King, his Heirs and Successors for ever (17): Even that Excise, for the proposing of which in Parliament, about the year 1628, Sir Dudley Carleton had like to be sent to the Tower (18); [but which had been imposed and levied with great profit in the late troublesome and rebellious times (19);] was now fixed for ever upon this Nation: to the great encouragement, as some think, of Drunkenness and Debanchery. For, how can they be effectually suppressed, when the more consumption there is of Liquors, the more it is for the advancement of the Revenue?

To consider now what Mr Philipps wrote against the taking away of Tenures in capite, &c. The several points he treats of in that book, are, I. 'Of the antiquity and use of Tenures in capite, and by Knight-service, in England, and other Nations.' He affirms, that they were in use amongst the Germans, Saxons, Longobards, and even ancient Nations (20). II. 'That the holding of Lands in capite, and by Knight-service, is no slavery or bondage to the Tenant or Vassal. For his lands were a sufficient recompence for the service which he performed for them;' and the Tenure was always counted honorable. III. 'Tenures of Lands in capite and by Knight-service, are not so many in number as is supposed, or are any publick or general grievance.' For, of sixty thousand two hundred and fifteen knights Fees created by William the Conqueror, twenty-eight thousand and fifteen were granted afterwards by him or his successors to religious houses, cathedrals, churches, and chantries; given away in mortmain, or otherwise alienated; so that, at the time of our author's writing, there was not above a fourth part of them to be found (21). He observes, under this head, that the Escheators took for the finding of the values of the Lands upon Inquisitions but the tenth part of the true yearly value (22). IV. 'How the design of altering Tenures in capite, and by Knights-service, into Socage Tenures, and Dissolving the Court of Wards and Liveries, and the Incidents, and Revenue belonging thereunto, came out of the Forges of some private mens imaginations, to be afterwards agitated in Parliament.' That design, he says (23), was first formed by Sir Henry Vane, senior, and Sir John Savil. V. In chapter the fifth, he sets down 'The Benefits or Advantages which are expected by the people in the putting down of the Court of Wards and Liveries and changinge the Tenures in capite and by Knight-service, into free and common Socage.' And in the VIth, 'The great and very many Mischiefs, and Inconveniencies, which will happen to the King and Kingdom, by the taking away of Tenures in capite, and Knight-service.' VII. 'That Tenures in capite, and Knight-service, holden of the King, and the Homage and Incidents thereunto appertaining, and the right of the mesne Lords, cannot be dissolved, or taken away by any Act of Parliament.'—The VIth is the longest, and the most material; wherein he gives seventy-two instances, of 'the great and very many Mischiefs, and Inconveniencies, which will happen to the King and Kingdom, by the taking away of Tenures in capite, and Knight-service:' the chief of which are these following. 1. 'That Lands in Socage will, if the Mosters be alive, during the minority of the heirs, most commonly fall, until the age of fourteen years into their Guardianships: and they, more than nine in every ten, will marry again, too often within the first year. By which means, they do too commonly bring the childrens estate to be as sawce to the hungry appetite of a Father-in-law, who being many times as good a guardian to the children as the Wolf or Fox is to the Lambs, will be sure, if he do not spend both the Mothers and Childrens estates, and bring them to beggery, to be gnawing, and put many a lurch and trick upon them (24). 2. The King's Tenants will be enabled to alienate their lands to such as may be open enemies, or ill-affected to his person, succession, or government. 3. The education of the Heirs in minority, of Recufants, or persons disaffected to the King, or his government, or to the orthodox Religion

(25). 4. Inquisitions post mortem preserve the true extent and quantities of the Mannors and Lands; and many Deeds or Evidences, which give great light and help to titles and descents; They also convey down Genealogies and Pedigrees, which will be now neglected (26). 5. An Heir may now be disinherited by the frowardness of an aged Father, infligated by the cunning and practise of a step-mother, whereas a third part could not have before been conveyed or given from him. 6. In Socage Tenures there will be nothing for the defence and safety of his Majesties Kingdom, Person, and People, when every man shall be holding his plow, or be supposed to hold by it, but the moyety of the Excise of Ale and Beer, to the value of one hundred thousand per annum. 7. The Kingdom will, upon occasion of war or invasion, lose the ready defence, and personal service of the Nobility, who held per Baroniam, or as Tenants in capite, and of many worthy and able men, Knights, Esquires, Gentry, and other sufficient Freeholders, and men of good estate and reputation, well educated and fitted for war, and compleatly armed on horseback. So that, in case of an Invasion, the Kingdom must be half overrun by the enemy, before a sufficient Force can be raised: or else a Standing Army must be always kept up (27). 8. The King, when the Tenures in capite shall be taken away, will never be able to erect his Standard, and to call thereunto all that hold lands, fees, annuities, and offices of him, to come to his assistance, according to the duty of their Tenures, and the Acts of Parliament of 11 and 19 Henry VII; which was very useful and necessary heretofore, for the defence of the Kings of England, and their people. And, if any Rebellion or Conspiracy shall hereafter happen, must be left to hire his Souldiers or assistance, out of the rascality, debauched, and ruder sort of people, and such as know neither how to fight, or be faithful, if his Treasury, or yearly income, upon such an increased Revenue, can do it (28). When the hiring also of common Souldiers, upon a sudden, and in case of necessity, will (if he could get them) be more chargeable and difficult than when he was to be served and defended in his wars by men of worth and quality, under the ingagement of their lands and Tenures (29). 9. It will take away also the foundation of the House of Peers in Parliament, whom the laws and records of the kingdom, do prove to fit there only as Tenants in capite, and per Baroniam (30). 10. The givinge the King a Recompence, by a yearly Rate amounting to one hundred thousand pounds per annum, to be charged upon all mens Lands, holden in capite, or Socage, by Copyhold, Leases for Lives, or Tenants at will, or for yeares, will be against Right, Reason, Justice, and Equity, as well as unwarranted by any hitherto Law or Custom of England, to make Nineteen parts of Twenty (for so much, if not more, will probably be the odds) that were not liable to Wardships, or any imagined Inconveniencies which might happen thereby, not only to bear their proportionable part of the general Assessments for War, but a share also in the burden of others, where it could never be laid upon them; and wherein they, or the major part of them, by more than two in three, have no lands in Fee-simple, &c. nor are never like to be purchasers of any Lands at all:—only to free the Nobility, Gentry, and men of greatest Riches and Estates in the kingdom, which are subject to those small burdens of Tenures in capite, and by Knight-service. 11. Or if laid upon the moyety of the Excise upon Ale, Beer, Syder, and Coffee, &c. or any other native or inland commodity, will fall upon those that have no land as well as those which have, as upon Citizens, Mechanicks, Children, Servants, and the like, and heaviest upon the poorer sort of people (31). 12. That small sum of 100,000 l. per ann. may, upon any discontent of the people, by reason of the payment of that Excise, be petitioned against or taken away by Parliament, or by some insurrection or mutiny of the common people, which Naples, and France, and this Kingdom, can tell us do sometimes happen (32). 13. Such an imposed or continued Excise will, by the arts and deceits of the Brewers and Ale-men, and those that gather and pay it in the first place, be, as all excises commonly are, double charged upon the people (33). 14. And by making that part of the

(34) Near the conclusion of the Book, he observes, That the laying by of Tenures in capite, and their services, and making use of Mercenary and Mechanick Souldiers, may help us to as many miseries and follies, as we have partaked of in our late troubles; from our Servants make them to become our Masters, and by inuring them to infolencies against others, teach them how to domineer over the people which are their pay-masters; turn legislators; and ingrosse all the places and employments of the Kingdom (35).

Lond. 1663, 4to.—Præ-emption, was a privilege allowed to the King's Purveyor, præ-emere, to have the choice, or first buying, of Corn, and other Provisions for the King's house.—And Pourveyance, or Purveyance, was the providing of corn, fuel, victuals, and other necessaries for the King's house. Formerly the King's court was supplied with necessaries from the demesnes of the Crown, which were manured for that purpose; but this method being found troublesome, was by degrees disused, and afterwards the King appointed Officers to buy in Provisions for his household, who were called Purveyors, and claimed divers privileges by the prerogative of the Crown. They abusing too often their power, several statutes were made for restraining their oppressions (36), some of which were declared to be felony. At length Purveyance was abolished, by the same Act which took away the Tenures in capite.

This method being found generally very inconvenient and burdenfome, the several Counties compounded, in Queen Elizabeth's reign, for a certain sum of money in lieu of them; which was called The Composition-service of Provisions for her Majesty's Household. The sums paid by the respective Counties, were as follows. All Wales, 360 l. a year. Worcestershire, 495 l. Derbyshire, 254 l. 2s. 2d. Yorkshire, 495 l. Middlesex, 917 l. 19s. Essex, 2931 l. whereof Colchester paid at first 6 l. and afterwards 9 l. 10s. 6d. Bedfordshire, 497 l. 8s. 4d. Buckinghamshire, 2040 l. 16s. 6d. Berkshire, 1255 l. 17s. 8d. Gloucestershire, 422 l. 7s. 8d. Hertfordshire, 1259 l. 19s. 4d. Kent, 3334 l. 6s. Lincolnshire, 1175 l. 13s. 8d. Northamptonshire, 993 l. 18s. 4d. Norfolk, 1093 l. 2s. 8d. Somersetshire, 755 l. 14s. 8d. Surrey, 1079 l. 3d. Suffex, 1016 l. 2s. 6d. (38)—This Composition-Service was settled by the Justices at the County-Quarter-Sessions, and varied according to the price of Provisions (39). At length, it was stopped by the long Parliament, December 13, 1642 (40); annulled by Oliver's Parliament in 1656 (41), and finally taken away by Statute 12 Car. II.

PHILIPS [JOHN], one of those few poets whose muse and manners were equally amiable; was born the 30th of December 1676 at Bampton in Oxfordshire. His father, Dr Stephen Philips, Arch-deacon of Salop (a), was minister there, and his son, being a boy of a most promising nature, but of a tender constitution, was instructed at home in the first rudiments of Grammar, and then sent to Winchester-school (b). Here he presently discovered the delicacy of his genius, his exercises being distinguished above those of his school-fellows by a happy imitation of the Classics. He had a quick relish of the force and elegance of their sentiments as well as expressions, and did not want either skill or industry to make them his own. In the mean time, he became the darling of the whole place by the sweetness of his temper; and while the master, a rigid disciplinarian, dispensed, on account of his tenderness, with that strict observance of those rugged rules which was severely exacted from the rest; the boys themselves were so far from murmuring at it, that they were even pleased with the distinction: though whilst they were at play he seldom joined with them, but generally retired then to his chamber, where he procured a person to attend him, and comb his hair, of which he had a very handsome flow. In this very singular recreation he felt an exquisite delight: I have been informed (by one who was at school with him) that he would sit almost absolutely without motion for several hours together, enjoying the pleasure it gave him with the highest degree of sensibility. It was in these intervals chiefly that he read Milton; however, this was not before he was well acquainted with both Virgil and Homer, and the frequent imitations he found of these authors in Paradise Lost, falling in exactly with his own turn, hence he conceived an ardent passion for the English poet, and some small pieces which he composed at this time, shewed that he had imbibed a good share of Milton’s style and manner before he left Winchester (c). Thus qualified, he was removed to Oxford, in the beginning of the year 1694, and placed in Christ-church, at a time when that college was in the height of its reputation, by the excellent sense and spirit that flourished there, under the conduct of Dr Aldrich (d). Here he was received with open arms into the company and acquaintance of the most distinguished wits, and as often as the statutes of the university, or the rules of his gaiety, called him to any publick exercises, his performances were constantly the talk and admiration of all that heard them; and they were only heard, for he was not willing they should go any farther: since how much soever they might please others, yet he was not thoroughly satisfied with them himself. Nor did those who knew and loved him best chuse to distress (as they found it would distress) his modesty, by pushing him in that point. It was this modesty, and the uncommon simplicity of his manners, that more particularly endeared him to them; and they were compleatly happy in the enjoyment of his conversation, in which his undisguised sincerity was continually enlivened with a kind of cheerfulness which innocence alone can give, heightened with a mirth that was wholly raised by a genteel and delicate rallery, without ever degenerating into ridicule. After he came to Oxford, Milton’s muse became his chief delight; and the greatest part of his study for some years was laid out in tracing the steps by which that author grew to perfection (e). We are told, that there is not a single allusion in Paradise Lost, drawn from the thoughts and expressions of the Greek or Latin poet, which he could not immediately refer to (f); and the same author intimates, that this was the way whereby he came to perceive what a peculiar life and grace their sentiments added to English poetry; how much their images raised it’s spirit, and what weight and beauty their works, when translated, gave to it’s language. He was likewise led, by the example of his darling Milton, to consult the works of our old English poets Chaucer and Spenser. By these assistances he made himself absolute master of the true extent and compass of his mother-tongue, and we see afterwards, in his writings, he did not scruple to revive any words or phrases which he thought deserved it. Yet this was done with that modest liberty which Horace allows of, either in the coining of new, or restoring of ancient, expressions; and to that modesty it was owing that he succeeded so happily in this dangerous attempt. Nor was this attempt made at all, ’till long after the time we are now speaking of; for as the delight delight which Mr Philips took in reading the poets, was that alone which first drew his attention to their works, so he continued reading purely for his pleasure; in this he gratified his delicacy and improved his taste, and he aimed at nothing further. That delicacy which led him to study the best poets proved a sufficient check to his modesty, and restrained him from forming any plan of appearing in public himself [A]. Besides, he had no uneasy thirst after fame; indeed, the disposition of his mind was happily adapted to the tender frame of his body. How much soever he was struck with the majesty, fire, and force of Milton's muse, yet he had no share in the heat and passion of that author's temper. In this he seemed entirely to be formed in Virgil's mould, whom he much loved and admired; and as 'tis said of Milton, that he could repeat the best part of Homer; so Mr Philips, we are informed, could do the same of Virgil (g); like the Roman, he had no ambition to gratify, being best fitted by nature for that which he was most fond of, the quiet enjoyment of his muse, in the company of a few select friends of his own taste and temper, and his acquaintance was among the best and politest of the university. But he seems to have had the highest delight in the friendship of Edmund Smith, the author of Phædra and Hippolytus. This gentleman (who was fellow-collegian with Mr Philips) 'tis well known far as unanxiously easy as he did, even in a much humbler fortune; and the bent of their studies lying the same way, they frequently communicated their thoughts to each other. This, with Mr Sewell, we make no doubt was as pleasant as any part of Mr Philips's life, who had a soul capable of relishing all the finest enjoyments of sublime, virtuous, and elegant spirits. How much it affected Mr Smith he alone was able to express, nor perhaps could he have done it so fully, had not the occasion of writing a poem (b) to his friend's memory impressed on him a rapturous sensibility of his own loss [B]. In studying poetry Mr Philips was wholly attentive to whatever helped to preserve or raise it's dignity, and by continually conversing with Milton and the Ancients, his ear became habituated to the harmony of their numbers. Besides, as he saw the art was removed from it's proper standard, so he thought it had lost much of it's true worth in English by the gingle of rhyme; which consequently was better avoided. He was fond of history and antiquities, and the accurate knowledge he had acquired, especially in those of his own country, shews which way he spent a good part of his time; he made use of some part of this acquisition afterwards to enrich his poetry, where the extent of his reading this way, as well as his exact skill in applying it, is set to the best advantage. It was the first design of his friends to breed him to the profession of Physic, and though the very infirm state of his health would not suffer him to pursue that plan they had laid out for him, yet his inclinations were very strongly bent that way. He was passionately fond both of the history and philosophy of nature. Indeed, next to his muse, Botany was his greatest delight as well as accomplishment; and his own ill health disabling him from applying his skill in the care of another's, he determined to recommend it's usefulness to the world. This was the first motive which put him upon the thoughts of writing on that subject (i), and this thought he executed in the poem which he intitled Cyder. The general design was formed long before he left Oxford, though the particular plan was not settled then, which he tells us himself, he was directed in the choice of, from the passion he had to do some honour to his native country (k). However, the foundation of it was laid in the university, and the first book composed there; but he was called to town before he had made any considerable progress: in the second, which was perfected there, he exerted all the power of genius and art to make it compleat, and it is one, if not the only, finish'd poem of that length extant in our language (l) [C]. We must not omit to take notice, that as the custom of

[A] Restrain'd him from appearing in public himself. The ingenious author of his life speaking of him, together with his friend Mr Smith, observes, that it was their happiness to give us all their pieces perfect in their kind, the accuracy of their judgment not suffering them to publish without the greatest care and correctness. 'For hasty fruits, continues he, the common product of every injudicious fancy, seldom continue long, never come to maturity, and are, at best, food only for debauched and vitiated palates. These men thought and considered, before they sat down to write, and after they had written too, being ever the last persons who were satisfied that they had performed well; and even then, perhaps more in compliment to the opinion of others, than from the conviction of their own judgments (1).'

[B] Impressed on him a rapturous sensibility of his own loss. His pathetic complaints are poured forth in the following lines.

Whom shall I find unbiass'd in dispute,
Eager to learn, unwilling to confute?
To whom the labours of my soul disclose,
Reveal my pleasure, or discharge my woes?

Mr Sewell having quoted these verses, very justly says, 'It is to be deplored indeed, that two great geniuses, in whose power it was to have obliged the world so much, should make so short a stay in it; though, had their date been longer, we can hardly say, continues he, that time would have added any thing but number to their compositions (3).' It will not be amiss to observe, that Mr Smith being invited, soon after his friend's death, to dine with the Principal of Brasen-nose college, Dr Robert Shippen, was there decoyed into a promise of doing justice to his friend's memory, and was detained in a chamber in the Principal's lodge, with the lock turned upon him, for three days, at the end of which he produced the poem that was afterwards printed; and it was not long before he himself paid the last debt to nature (4).

[C] He was determined to recommend it's usefulness to the world, which he did in his Cyder, which is one, if not the only finished poem of that length, in the English language. It is probable he drew his own character in that description which he gives of a philosophical and retired life, at the latter end of the first book.

smoaking tobacco was highly in vogue when Mr Philips came first to college, from the example of the celebrated Dean of it [D]; so he fell in with the general taste, which recommended itself the rather to him as he felt some relief from it; he has descended to sing it's praises in more than one place, and his Splendid Shilling owes some part of it's lustre to the happy introduction of a tobacco-pipe [E]. Mr Sewell (5) observes rightly, that 'This poem is founded upon the model of Virgil's Georgics, and comes the nearest of any other to that admirable poem which the critics prefer to the Divine Æneid. Yet though it is easy to discern who was his guide in that difficult way, we may observe, that he comes after rather like a pursuer than a follower, not tracing him step after step, but chusing those paths in which he might easiest overtake him. All his imitations are far from being servile, though sometimes very close; at other times he brings in a new variety, and entertains us with scenes more unexpected and pleasing perhaps, than his master's themselves were to those who first saw that work.' In the next place, he takes notice of the conduct and management of this poem, 'Which, says he, are superior to all other copyers of that original. Rapin is much below him both in design and success; for the Frenchman either fills his gardens with the idle fables of antiquity, or new transformations of his own, and has, in contradiction to his own rules of criticism, injudiciously blended the serious and sublime style of VIRGIL, with the elegant turns of OVID in his Metamorphosis. Nor, continues he, has the great genius of Mr Cowley succeeded better in his books of plants, who, besides the same faults with the former, is continually varying his numbers from one sort of verse to another, and alluding to remote hints of medicinal writers; which, tho' allowed to be useful, are yet so numerous, that they flatten the dignity of the verse, and sink it from a Poem to a treatise of Physick. Mr Sewell declares, that it was not out of envy to the merit of these great men (and who will ever be such in spite of envy) that he took notice of these mistakes, but only to shew the judgement of him that followed them in avoiding to commit the same. Whatever scenes he presents us with appear delicate and charming; the philosophical touches surprize, the moral instruct, and the gay descriptions transport the reader.' Of this last remark the following instance will not be withheld from thrusting itself into these notes. It is in the first book where he takes occasion to mention the uses of the barrenest soil.

But if (for nature does not share alike
Her gifts) an happy soil should be with-held;
If a penurious clay should be thy lot,
Or rough unwieldy earth, nor to the plough,
Nor to the cattle kind, with fandy stones
And gravel o'er abounding, think it not Beneath thy toil; the sturdy pear-tree here
Will rise luxuriant, and with toughest root
Pierce the obstructing grit, and restive marl.
Thus, nought is usefess made; nor is there land,
But what, or of it self, or else compell'd
Affords advantage. On the barren heath
The shepherd tends his flock, that daily crop
Their verdant dinner from the mossie turf
Sufficient; after them the cackling goose
Close grazer, finds wherewith to ease her want:
What should I more? ev'n on the cliffy height
Of Penmenmaur, and that cloud-piercing hill
Plinlimmon, from afar the traveller kens

VOL. V. No. 280.

In the same delightful vein, sometimes he opens the bowels of the earth, at others he paints it's surface; sometimes he dwells upon it's lower products and fruits, at others mounts to it's higher and more stately plantations, and then beautifies it with the innocent pleasures of it's inhabitants. The sports of a rural, the retirements of a contemplative, life, the working genius of the husbandman, the industry of the mechanic, contribute as much to diversify, as the due praises of exalted patriots, heroes, and statesmen, to raise and ennoble the poetry. The change of seasons and their distinctions, introduced by the rising and setting of the stars, the effects of heat, cold, showers, and tempests, are in their several places very ornamental, and their descriptions inferior only to those of Virgil.

The same author makes another remark, which is, 'The great difficulty of making our English names of plants, soils, animals, and instruments, shine in verse: there are hardly any of those, he observes, which, in the Latin tongue, are not in themselves beautiful and expressive; and very few in our own, which do not rather debase than exalt the style; and yet, says he, I know not by what art of the poet, though in themselves mean and low (7), they seem not to sink the dignity of his style, but become their places as well as those of a better and more harmonious found.'

(7) In his Life, p. 23.

[D] Smoking tobacco was in vogue from the example of the Dean. Dr Aldrich's incessant use of the tobacco-pipe, was an entertaining topic of discourse in the university many years afterwards; concerning which, the following story, among others, passed current there in my time. A young student of the college, once finding some difficulty to bring his chum into the belief of it, laid him a wager, that the Dean was smoking at that instant, viz. about ten o'clock in the morning. Away, therefore, he hies to the Deanery, where, being admitted to the Dean in his study, he presently relates the occasion of his visit. To which, You see, replies the Dean in perfect good humour, you have lost your wager, for I'm not smoking but filling my pipe.

[E] He has descended to sing it's praises in more than one place, and his Splendid Shilling owes some part of it's lustre to the happy introduction of a tobacco-pipe. There is not a piece of his except Blenheim (which was a subject not of his own chusing) where he has not introduced tobacco. In his ode to Mr St John, he makes the gift of it the first and last subjects of his gratitude to his benefactor.

Benignus herbæ, das mihi divitem
Haurire succum & fumarvolentes
Sæpe tuis iterare fumos.*

O thou, from India's fruitful soil,
That dost that sovereign herb prepare,
In whose rich fumes I lose the toil
Of life, and every anxious care:
While from the fragrant lighted bole
I suck new life into my fowl.

And he concludes, in expressing the miserable state to which his mistress cruelly had reduced him, thus:

*Hanc ulla mentis, spe mihi mutæ,
Utcunque desit, nocte, die, vigil
Suspiro; nec jam vina somnos, Nec revocant, tua dona, Fumi.*

appeared in public, stole it's way into the world without his privity, and being printed from no very correct copy, that induced him, though not 'till some time after, to give a genuine edition of it. He was little anxious what fate it met with among the generality, the manuscript had diverted the choice circle of his friends, and his aim in it reached no farther. This happened not long before the much-famed action at Blenheim, in 1704, where the Duke of Marlborough gained that victory, which deservedly filled the world with his praises. The Earls of Godolphin and Halifax had eagerly set Mr Addison's pen to work upon this occasion, and fired his poetic faculty with the assured hopes of a very extraordinary reward. On the other side, their two competitors, Harley and St John, afterwards Earl of Oxford and Viscount Bolingbroke, pitched upon our author as perfectly capable of doing justice to his country on this subject. But whether the task was really too great, or the performers not well chosen, in respect to their particular genius for the subject, it is generally agreed that the several pieces they produced upon it, notwithstanding some exquisite strokes in each, are far from being the best in the works of either poet [F]. While Mr Philips was in town he resided in Mr St John's house, and

And fighting, hopes no kind return;
Yet, for the lov'd relentless fair,
By night I wake, by day I burn;
Nor can thy gifts * soft sleep supply,
Or foother my pains, or close my eye.

In his Cyder, Book I. we find these lines.

(8) Experience.

————— To her (8) we owe
The Indian weed, unknown to ancient times,
Nature's choice gift, whose acrimonious fume
Extracts superfluous juices, and refines
The blood distemper'd from it's noxious salts;
Friend to the spirits, which, with vapours bland,
It gently mitigates; companion fit
Of pleasantry and wine; nor to the bards
Unfriendly, when they to the vocal shell
Warble melodious their well-labour'd songs.

In the Splendid Shilling, the happiness of a full or empty pipe is exhibited by a clean or dirty pipe of good or bad tobacco. Thus of the first he sings:

Mean while he smoaks and laughs at merry tale,
Or pun ambiguous, or conundrum quaint.

The contrast of which follows thus:

————— Or from tube as black
As winter chimney, or well-polish'd jet,
Exhale mundungus, ill-perfuming scent:
Not blacker tube, nor of a shorter size,
Smooks Cambro-Briton. —————

(9) No. 250.

Many fine things have been said of this poem, the Splendid Shilling. As first, in the Tatler (9), it is styled the finest burlesque poem in the British language; and Mr Sewell has added to this commendation, 'That it was not only the finest, but handled in a manner quite different, from what had been made use of by any author of our own or other nations; the sentiments and style being in this both new, whereas in those, the jest lies more in allusions to the thoughts and fables of the Ancients, than in the pomp of the expression. The same humour is continued throughout the whole, and not unnaturally diversified, as most poems of that nature had been before. Out of that variety of circumstances, which his fruitful invention must suggest to him on such a subject, he has not chosen any but what are diverting to every reader; and some, that none but his inimitable drefs could have made diverting to any. When we read it, we are betrayed into a pleasure that we could not expect, though at the same time the sublimity of the style and gravity of the phrase, seem to chastise that laughter which they provoke (10)' These remarks are very just, observed with acuteness, and expressed with an easy delicacy, agreeably to the character of the writer; who, it is more than probable, chose to refer us to Mr Smith for a more particular account

Oh! various bard, you all our powers controul,
You now disturb, and now divert the soul;
Milton and Butler in thy muse combine,
For, as I've seen, when rival wits contend,
One gaily charge, one gravely will defend;
This on quick turns and points in vain relies,
That, with a look demure and studied eyes,
With dry rebuke and sneering praise, replies. }
So thy grave lines extort a juster smile,
Reach Butler's fancy, but surpass his style;
He speaks Scarron's low verse in humble strains,
In thee the solemn air of grave Cervantes reigns.
What founding lines his abject themes express,
What shining words the pompous Shilling drefs;
There, there, my cell immortal made, outvies
The frailer piles, which o'er it's ruin rise;
In her best light the comic muse appears,
When she with borrow'd pride the buskin wears.
So when Nurse Nokes to act young Ammon tries,
With shambling legs, long chin, and foolish eyes,
With dangling hands he strokes th' imperial robe,
And with a cuckold's air commands the globe;
The pomp and found the whole buffoon display'd,
And Ammon's son more mirth than Gomez made.

I cannot forbear thinking that Mr Smith, in the words

There, there, my cell immortal made, outvies, &c.

meant to point out the true subject of the Splendid Shilling. Mr Smith's foible was (in Dr Swift's phrase) the want of looking upon a shilling as a serious thing; and his friend knew him to be (as he really was) a little tender upon that point. The many embarrassments he met with, must needs make him sensible of his own weakness; but the best-meant advice, conveyed in any direct terms whatsoever to a man of his turn and talents, would be refted as an insult upon his good sense and understanding. The rally, then, of the Splendid Shilling, in this light becomes exquisite, and compleat as it is in all other respects, I think it's whole merit is taken in only by this view. 'Tis true, without this advantage, the humour forces a smile from the gravest face; but the sincerity of the friendship, felt under that sweet disguise, irresistibly takes full possession of the heart.

[F] Notwithstanding some exquisite touches in each, are far from being the best in the works of either poet.] As to the Campaign, see the article ADDISON [JOSEPH], in note [I]. With regard to Blenheim, the author of the Criticism in the Tatler, No 43, has displayed it's faults with no unsparing hand. We have mentioned above at whose request it was wrote, and Mr Sewell assures us, that he would willingly have de-

and has celebrated the kindness and generosity of that host in a Latin ode in Horace's manner (m), which is undoubtedly a master-piece. It is all of his that we have left in this kind, but from it we may form a judgment, that his writings in that language were not inferior to those, he has left us in our own; and as Horace was one of his darling authors, we need not question his ability to excel in his way, as well as that of his admired Virgil. Our author's poem, intitled Blenheim, was published in 1705; and the next year he finished that upon Cyder; which, after his decease, was translated into Italian, by a nobleman of Florence. His next design was that of writing a poem upon the Resurrection, and the day of Judgment, but this he did not live to execute, otherwise he would very probably have excelled upon a subject, for which he was exactly adapted. That subject indeed, as the author of his life very justly observes, was only proper to be treated of in that solemn style which he makes use of, and by one whose just notions of Religion and a true spirit of poetry, could have carried his reader without a wild Enthusiasm,

—extra flammantia mania mundi, LUCRET.

(n) See his Life, ubi supra, p. 26.

This is not obtruded upon the reader as a bare conjecture only of our own, which would be unpardonable in the design of this work. But we have the authority of Mr Smith for it, clined the undertaking, had not the powerful incitements of his friends prevailed upon him to sacrifice his modesty to their judgment. Indeed, he has told us so himself; the poem concludes with it; where he has made his own confessed unfitness for the task, a handle to display the superior abilities of the imposer, his friend and patron, for such an undertaking. Besides the charms of the poetry, there is an elegant sincerity in the address, which leaves the reader in such a pleased state of mind, that he even forgets, as well as forgives, all the precedent defects in the piece.

Thus from the noisy crowd exempt, with ease
And plenty blest, amid the mazy groves,
(Sweet solitude!) where warbling birds provoke
The silent muse, delicious rural feat
Of St John, English Memmius, I presum'd
To sing Britannic trophies, inexpert
Of war, with mean attempt; while he intent
(So Anna's will ordains) to expedite
His military charge, no leisure finds
To string his charming shell; but when return'd, Consummate peace shall rear her cheerful head;
Then shall his Churchill in sublimer verse
For ever triumph; latest times shall learn
From such a chief to fight, and bard to sing (11).

(11) This part of Lord Bolingbroke's character was never disputed; and as to the rest, it must be observed, that when these lines were wrote, his Lordship had not lived the latter part of his life.

Mr Sewell observes, that the address of the English Memmius was exactly apposite to him, to whom all the polite part of mankind agree, in applying that of the Roman.

— *Quem tu Dea tempore in omni
Omnibus ornatum voluisti excellere rebus.*

The same gentleman takes notice, that the exordium of this piece is a just allusion to the beginning of the Æneid (if that be Virgil's), and that of Spenser's Fairy Queen.

From low and abject themes the groveling muse
Now mounts, aerial, to sing of arms
Triumphant, and emblaze the martial acts
Of Britain's heroes.—

The spirit is kept on the same to the end, the whole being full of noble sentiments and majestic numbers, equal to the heroes whom it extols, and not admitting of any rival (except Mr Addison's Campaign) on the same occasion (12); to which it yields only, in giving too much fire to the sedate courage of the Duke of Marlborough. This, however, is compensated (if any thing can compensate such an oversight) by the following epifodical digression.

(12) Ibid. p. 16, 17, 18.

—The British souls

A lamentable race, that ceas'd to breathe
On Landen plains this heav'nly gladsome air,

Exult, to see the crowding ghosts descend
Unnumber'd; well aveng'd, they quit the cares
Of mortal life, and drink th' oblivious lake.
Not so the new inhabitants; they roam
Erroneous and disconsolate, themselves
Accusing and their chiefs, improvident
Of military chance; when lo! they see
Thro' the dun mist, in blooming beauty fresh,
Two lovely youths, that amicably walkt
O'er verdant meads, and, pleas'd perhaps, revolv'd
Anna's late conquests; one to empire born,
Egregious prince (13), whose manly childhood shew'd
His mingled parents, and portended joy
Unspeakeable; thou, his associate dear,
Once in this world, nor now by fate disjoin'd,
Had thy presiding star propitious shone,
Should'st Churchill be. But Heav'n severe cut short
Their springing years, nor would this isle should boast Gifts so important! Them the Gallic shades
Surveying, read in either radiant look
Marks of excessive dignity and grace,
Delighted! 'till in one their curious eye
Discerns their great subduer's awful mein,
And corresponding features fair; to them
Confusion! Straight the airy phantoms fleet
With headlong haste, and dread a new pursuit;
The image pleas'd, with joy paternal smiles.

(13) The Duke of Gloucester.

Every body sees here a beautiful imitation of Virgil's poetical Elyzium, and the happy application of the famous

Tu Marcellus eris—

to the Marquis of Blandford,

Had thy presiding star propitious shone,
Should'st Churchill be!—

But in this passage,

— Straight the airy phantoms fleet
With headlong haste, and dread a new pursuit, there is an allusion to a piece of history, which has been overlooked by all the critics. It is now long since it has been no secret, that, how well soever the officers of the French army kept up their own spirits; yet from this time it was not, as they afterwards confessed, in their power, during that war, by any means whatever, to make their common men stand before an English army, with the Duke of Marlborough at their head. How greatly this happy effect of that General's success in the battle of Blenheim, is raised by our author's poetical representation of it in this passage, needs no comment to explain it.

it, who was undeniably a competent judge of the scheme which our author had laid down, and probably had seen the first rudiments of his design; below we shall give his verses on the occasion [G]. But Mr Philips distemper increasing obliged him to drop the pursuit of this, and all other views, besides that of his health; he had been long troubled with a lingering consumption, attended with an asthma, a painful disorder, and had suffered many severe conflicts under it, without betraying any discontent or uneasiness; the integrity of his heart still preserving the cheerfulness of his spirits, and the singular goodness of his nature engaging his friends in the tenderest and most endearing offices to him on these occasions [H]. By the advice of his Physicians he went to the Bath, the summer before his death; here the ablest of the faculty (by whom he was generally beloved) readily gave him their best assistance, and some present ease they did procure him, upon which he left the place, though with small hopes of recovery. Upon his removal from Bath he went to Hereford, where his mother was still living, and where the asthma returning in the winter put a period to his life, February 15, 1708, in the entrance almost upon the thirty-third year of his age. He was interred in the cathedral-church of Hereford by his mother, who caused an inscription to be put upon his grave-stone (o), testifying how dear he was to her. But besides this, a monument was erected to his memory, in the place called Poets Corner in Westminster-Abbey, by Sir Simon afterwards Lord Harcourt, and Lord-Chancellor of England. The epitaph was wrote by Dr Friend, which has this very singular merit, that we there see a very great and at the same time a very just character expressed upon a monument without flattery [I].

(o) A copy of it is inserted in his Life, p. 31.

There

[G] Below we shall give his verses on the occasion ]
They are as follow :

Oh! had relenting Heav'n prolong'd his days,
The tow'ring bard had sung in nobler lays,
How the last trumpet wakes the lazy dead ;
How saints aloft, the crosses triumphant spread ;
How op'ning heav'ns their happy regions shew,
And yawning gulphs with flaming vengeance glow,
And saints rejoice above, and sinners howl below. }
Well might he sing the day he could not fear,
And paint the glories he was sure to wear.

Your's to preserve a friend, and mine to praise.

[I] A monument without flattery.] A copy of it may be seen, by such as are curious in the Latin language, at the conclusion of his Life by Mr Sewell, prefixed to his Works. In it, among other virtues and accomplishments, Dr Friend has set forth his happy emulation of Milton's numbers without rhyme, very particularly and no less elegantly; but yet very far short of what the following passage from the works of the disciple himself exhibits; wherein he has transmitted his own name, in company with that of his master, to the latest posterity. Having given to the two great fathers of ancient poetry, Homer and Virgil, each his just praise, he proceeds thus:

— And had that other bard,

Oh! had but he, that first ennobled song
With holy raptures, like his Abdiel been,
'Mong many faithless, strictly faithful found,
Unpity'd he should not have wail'd his orbs,
That roll'd in vain to find the piercing ray,
And found no dawn, by dim suffusion veil'd.
But he ——— However let the muse abstain,
Nor blast his fame, from whom she learnt to sing
In much inferior strains, groveling beneath
Th' Olympian hill, on plains and vales intent;
Pleas'd with the fragrant walks and cool retreat (16)

The abovementioned author of Mr Philips's Life observes, ' That Milton has given a few fine touches upon the same subject, but still there remains an inexhaustible store of materials, to be drawn from the Prophets, the Psalmists, and the other inspired writers, which in his poetical dress might, without the false boasting of old poets, have endured to the day that it described. The meanest soul, continues he, and the lowest imagination, cannot think of that time, and the descriptions we meet with of it in holy writ, without the greatest emotion and the deepest impression. What then might we not expect from the believing heart of a good man, and the regulated raptures of an excellent Christian poet?' How well the task was afterwards performed by Dr Young (14), we leave to our reader's judgment.

[H] The singular goodness of his nature, engaging his friends in the tenderest and most endearing offices to him on these occasions.] The particular kindness shewn to him by Mr Trevor, our author has himself gratefully celebrated, in such lays as may well be esteemed a just recompence for it (15). And, lest this should not be a sufficient tribute of his gratitude, his friend Mr Smith, who best knew his whole soul, has addressed his poem to the same gentleman, where he takes occasion to transmit this act of friendship to posterity in the following lines :

Your care had long bis fleeting life restrain'd,
One table fed you, and one bed contain'd ;
For his dear sake long restless nights you bore,
While rattling coughs his heaving vessels tore ;
Much was his pain, but your affliction more. }
Oh! had no summons from the noisy gown
Call'd thee, unwilling, to the nauseous town,
Thy love had o'er the dull disease prevail'd,
Thy mirth had cur'd, where baffled Physic fail'd ;
But since the will of Heav'n his fate decreed,
To thy kind care my worthless lines succeed ;

These unparalleled lines shew, in the clearest and truest light, not only the genius and turn of Mr Philips's muse, happily united to that of his master, but likewise the turn and temper of his mind happily varying from him. Without entering into the comparison, which his own example forbids, we shall only observe, and it is an observation not less true than trite, that, in writing upon any subject whatsoever, the author, be his success what it will in executing his design, yet never fails to write his own character without design; which for that reason too is certainly the true one, natural and undisguised. Accordingly, in this passage we see that modesty, candour, and simplicity of mind and manners; that natural goodness, that unaffected piety, that universal charity, and that steady adherence to his principle, which distinguished Mr Philips's life; and, from the turn and spirit of his works, we are entirely disposed to concur with Mr Sewell (17); when he tells us, that no one observed the natural and civil duties of a son, a friend, or a member of society; and that he had the happiness to fill every one of these parts, without even the suspicion either of undutifulness, insincerity, or dissimulation.
