BIOGRAPHIA

VOLUME THE FIFTH.

A Character of this Work, by GILBERT WEST, Esq;
 at the Conclusion of his Poem on EDUCATION, in a Note on the Words Great Lives explain.

‘ I CANNOT forbear taking occasion from these words, to make my ‘ acknowledgments to the writers of Biographia Britannica, for the ‘ pleasure and profit I have lately received, from perusing the two first ‘ volumes of that useful and entertaining work, of which the monumental ‘ structure abovementioned, decorated with the statues of great and good ‘ men, is no improper emblem. This work, which contains The Lives of ‘ the most eminent Persons who have flourished in Great Britain and Ireland, ‘ from the earliest Ages, down to the present Time, appears to me, as far as ‘ it has hitherto gone, to be executed with great spirit, accuracy, and ‘ judgment; and deserves, in my opinion, to be encouraged by all, who ‘ have at heart the honour of their country, and that of their particular ‘ families and friends; and who can any ways assist the ingenious and labo‘ rious authors, to render, as perfect as possible, a design so apparently ‘ calculated to serve the Publick, by setting in the truest and fullest light,
 ‘ the characters of persons already generally, though perhaps too indistinctly, ‘ known; and reviving from obscurity and oblivion, examples of private ‘ and retired merit; which, though less glaring and ostentatious than the ‘ former, are not, however, of a less extensive, or less beneficial influence, ‘ to those, who may happen not to have seen this repository of British ‘ glory. I cannot give a better idea of it, than in the following lines of ‘ Virgil:

‘ Hic manus ob Patriam pugnando vulnera passi;	‘ Here Patriots live, who for their Country’s good,
‘ Quique Sacerdotes casti, dum vita manebat;	‘ In fighting fields, were prodigal of blood;
‘ Quique pii Vates & Phœbo digna locuti;	‘ Priests of unblemish’d lives here make abode,
‘ Inventas aut qui vitam excoluere per artes;	‘ And Poets worthy their aspiring God:
‘ Quique sui memores alios fecere merendo.’	‘ And searching Wits of more mechanic parts,
	‘ Who grac’d their age with new invented arts;
	‘ Those who to worth their bounty did extend,
	‘ And those who knew that bounty to commend.’

LATIMER [HUGH], Bishop of Worcester, and a Martyr, in the XVIth century, was born about the year 1480 [A], at Thurcaston in Leicestershire (a); being the son of Hugh Latimer, a yeoman of that place [B]. He was brought up with his parents in his younger years; and being their only son (b), and endowed with excellent parts, they resolved to make a scholar of him. Therefore, after he had got as much learning as he could at the common schools in his own country, they sent him, at the age of fourteen (c), to Christ's-college in Cambridge (d). He duly improved himself there in all academical exercises, and then studied Divinity, in which he took the degree of Bachelor (e). But it seems he never took the degree of Doctor (f). At that time, and 'till the age of 30, he was a zealous and violent Papist, but being converted by Mr Thomas Bilney [C], he became as zealous a Protestant, and preached earnestly

[A] Was born about the year 1480.] This I collect from a passage in J. Foxt's book of Martyrs (1); where it is said, that at the accession of K. Edw. VI. Bp Latimer 'was above 67 yeares of age.' But, from a Letter of Phil. Melancthon, it may be concluded that he was born in 1475 (2).

[B] The son of . . . . . a yeoman of that place.] So he tells us himself in one of his Sermons. 'My father, 'says he, was a yeoman, and had no lands of his owne, 'onely he had a farm of three or four pound by yeare 'at the uttermost, 'and hereupon he tilled so much as 'kept halfe a dozen men. He had walke for an hundredre sheepe, and my mother milked 30 kine. He was able, and did finde the king a harnes, with himselfe and his horse, while he came to the place

'that he should receive the King's wages. I can remember, that I buckled his harnes, when he went to Blacke-heath-fielde. He kept me to schoole, or else I had not beene able to have preached before the King's Majesty now. He maryed my Sisters with five pound, or xx nobles a peece, so that he brought them up in godlinesse and feare of God. He kept hospitality for his poore neighbours. And some almes he gave to the poore, and all this did he of the said farme. Where hee that now hath it, payeth 16 pound by the yeare or more, and is not able to doe any thing for his Prince, for himselfe, nor for his children, or give a cup of drinke to the poore (3).'

nestly against the errors of Popery (g). This he could do with the more success, as he was used to the pulpit; being one of the twelve allowed, or licensed, preachers from the university of Cambridge (b). But his freedom brought him into trouble. For, by the procurement of some members of the university, who accused him of heresy, he was summoned before Cardinal Wolsey, and forced to subscribe such articles as were then proposed to him. However, he went back to Cambridge, where, by the means of Dr Butts, Physician to King Henry the Eighth, he became one of the great promoters of those two most important points, his Majesty's Supremacy and Divorce (i). Not long after, he was invited to Court, and lodged a while in Dr Butts's chamber, preaching frequently in London. And, through the interest of the said Doctor, and of Thomas Cromwell, he was presented by the King, about the year 1529, to the Rectory of Westkinton in Wiltshire (k). Whereupon being weary of the Court, the wickedness and hypocrisy of which did not suit his honest heart and free and open soul, he retired to his living, contrary to Dr Butts's approbation; and there instructed, not only his parishioners, but the whole neighbourhood, by his honest, zealous, and plain manner of preaching. But taking all opportunities of reflecting upon the errors of Popery, he was cited, the tenth of January 1531, to appear before the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London, in the Consistory Court at St Paul's, on the 29th of the same month, to answer to certain articles [D]. And, after having been greatly molested, and long detained from his cure, was fain to subscribe, the 21st of March ensuing, several propositions exhibited to him (l) [E]. The King's favour and protection not only secured him from further danger, but also his Majesty promoted him, in the year 1535, to the Bishopric of Worcester (m) [F]. He behaved in that station, as he had done before, in the most industrious and exemplary manner; and taught the world not only by his constant preaching, but also by his more private instructions. Particularly he endeavoured to root out Popish superstition [G], and to bring on a thorough reformation, as far as his abilities could serve, or the

also we learn from himself. 'Heere, saith he, I have occasion to tell you a story which happened at Cambridge. Master Bilney (or rather Saint Bilney that suffered death for God's word sake) the same Bilney was the instrument whereby God called me to knowledge, for I may thank him next to God, for that knowledge that I have in the word of God. For I was as obstinate a Papist as any was in England, in so much that when I should be made Bachelor of Divinity, my whole oration went against Phillippe Melancthon, and against his opinions. Bilney heard mee at that time, and perceived that I was zealous without knowledge, and hee came to me afterward in my study, and desired mee for God's sake to heare his confession: I did so: And to say the very truth, by his confession I learned more than before in many yeares. So from that time forward, I beganne to smell the word of God, and forsooke the schoole-doctors, and such fooleries (4).—He tells us elsewhere (5) — 'that he took orders at Lincoln.' Whilst he continued a Papist at Cambridge, he was Cross-keeper of the university, which he solemnly brought forth on procession days (6).

[D] To answer to certain articles.] Those articles were, 1. That he had preached against the Virgin Mary; saying, that she was a sinner. 2. That he should say, that Saints were not to be worshipped. 3. That Ave Maria was a salutation onely, and no prayer. 4. That there was no material fire in hell. 5. That there was no purgatory; in saying, that he had lever [rather] be in purgatory than in Lollard's tower (7). In his answer, printed in J. Foxe (8), he affirms, that most of those articles were downright falsehoods; and the rest he explains in a favourable manner.—This trouble was brought upon him by some Priests of Bristol: 'which, as he says himself, first desired me, welcomed me, made me cheare, heard what I said, allowed my saying in all things whiles I was with them: when I was gone home to my benefice, perceiving that the people favoured me so greatly, and that the Maior had appointed me to preach at Easter, privily they procured an inhibition for all them that had not the Bishop's licence, which they knewe well enough I had not, and so craftily defeated Mr Maior's appointment, pretending that they were sorry for it, procuring also certaine preachers to blatter against me, as Hubberdin and Powel, with other mo, whom when I had brought before the Maior and the wise counsell of the Town, to know what they could lay to my charge, wherefore they so declamed against me, they said they spake of information: howbeit no man could be brought forth that woulde abide by anie thing: so that they had place and time to bely me shamefully, but they had no place nor time to lay to my charge when I was present and readie to make them answer.'

[E] Was fain to subscribe . . . several propositions, &c.] J. Foxe has transcribed them out of Bp Tostall's Register: and the first are, 'I believe that there is a purgatorie to purge the soules of the dead after this life: that the soules in purgatorie are holpen with the masses, prayers, and almes of the living: that the Saints do praie as Mediatours now for us in heaven: that they are to be honoured of us in heaven, &c.' It is somewhat unaccountable, that Mr Latimer should subscribe to opinions that were so contrary to his real sentiments. But if he did, it was owing to the iniquity of the time; which was such, that he must either do so, or expose himself to the greatest dangers (9). He was troubled again afterwards for those matters, as Mr Collier relates from the Journals of Convocation: who observes, that Latimer had been delated in the Synod, in the year 1531, for maintaining erroneous doctrine in some letters written to one Greenwood of Cambridge; and that in 1532 his case was brought before the upper house of Convocation. Being requir'd to take an oath to make a true answer to interrogatories, he declined the jurisdiction of the house, and appealed to the King: but the king refusing the application, returned him to the Convocation, upon which he acknowledged himself mistaken, and was pardoned upon his submission. But now he relapsed, as they call'd it, to his former opinions. The articles he was charged with, were, his denying purgatory, &c. He had subscribed a recantation upon these heads, and promised not to preach offensively upon them for the future. Notwithstanding this engagement his conscience would not give him leave to keep his word: for in the pulpit at Bristol he declaimed against the received doctrines: and therefore to disabie him in his credit, the House, at the motion of the bishop of Winchester, ordered (March 26, 1533) a copy of his submission should be sent down into those parts (10).

[F] His Majesty promoted him, in 1535, to the bishopric of Worcester.] He was advanced thereto at the instance of Qu. Anne Boleyn, to whom he was made chaplain in the year 1534 (11), and also through Tho. Cromwell's and Dr Butts's interest (12). He was intalled the 20th of August 1535 (13), and had restitution of the temporalities the 4th of October following (14).

[G] He endeavoured to root out Popish superstition.] Among other instances; when he found, he could not hinder the distribution of holy bread and holy water in his diocese, he so ordered it, that it should be managed with as little superstition as possible, and convey the variable and dangerous times he lived in would permit (n). His great aversion to all kinds of imposture he manifested, in the great pains he took to discover the fraudulent pretensions of the Maid of Kent (o). And, in another affair, he shewed a due moderation and regard for posterity; namely, when the contest was in the House of Lords, in 1538, about giving all the abbey-lands to the King. The Popish Bishops consented, that the King should resume all those abbeys which were of royal foundation, leaving the rest to continue according to the intention of their respective founders: and the Bishops who were favourers of the Reformation, complied absolutely with the King's will; but Latimer dissented from these, earnestly urging, that two abbeys at the least in every diocese, of considerable revenues, might be preserved [H], for the maintenance of learned men (p). During his private condition, both at his country-living and the university, he had met with some enemies and opposers; but he met with great numbers, when placed in the more exalted, and then slippery, station of a Bishop [I]. However, notwithstanding all their attacks, he stood his ground, and went on zealously doing his duty through evil and good report, 'till the passing of the six bloody articles. Then, his conscience not permitting him to embrace what he knew to be false and absurd, he chose to resign his Bishopric; which he did on the first of July 1539 (q) [K]. This resignation did not procure him the quiet and ease he expected. For having, soon after, been very much bruised and almost killed by the fall of a tree, and coming to London for cure, he was accused of having spoken against the six articles, and committed to the Tower, where he remained 'till the death of King Henry the Eighth, in January 1546-7 (r). Latimer being thereupon released, did not resume his episcopal dignity [L]; but he entered again upon his ministerial function, often preaching before King Edward the Sixth, and in other places [M], with great diligence and vigour; freely rebuking wickedness and abuses of every sort [N], and, as it seems, with uncommon success [O]. vey some useful lesson to the people. For that purpose, he enjoined the priests to use the following words, in giving holy water;

Remember your promise in Baptisme,
Christ his mercy and blood-shedding,
By whose most holy sprinkling
Of all your sinnes you have free pardoning.

And these in giving holy bread.

Of Christ's body this is a token,
Which on the crosse for our sinnes was broken.

If of Christ's death ye will be partakers (15).

[H] That two Abbeys at the least in every diocese, of considerable revenues, might be preserved.] He writ to the same purpose to Tho. Lord Cromwell; when he recommended to him the Prior of Great Malverne in Worcestershire, with an earnest desire, that his House might stand, 'not in monkery, but so as to be converted to preaching, study, and prayer.'—Adding, 'Alas, my good Lord! shall we not see two or three in every thire changed to such remedy (16)?'

[I] He had met with some enemies and opposers, but he met with great numbers when made a Bishop.] He gives an instance of it, in one of his Sermons; where in he relates, That a great many persons being called before K. Henry VIII. to say their minds in certain matters; one of those persons accused him of sedition, and of having preached seditious doctrine. Whereupon he (Bp Latimer) addressed himself to that person, and asked him, 'What form of preaching he would appoint him, to preach before a King? and, whether he would have him preach nothing as concerning a King in the King's sermon?' To which the man had nothing to say. Then the Bishop turning himself to the King, submitted to his Grace, who accepted well of his sayings. But some of his friends came to him with tears in their eyes, and told him, they looked he should have been in the Tower the same night (17). Mr Foxe gives other instances of the troubles he met with in his own country and diocese, in taking the cause of right and equity against oppression and wrong (18).

[K] He chose to resign his Bishopric; which he did on the first of July, 1539.] J. Foxe relates, that when the Bishop put off his rochet, in his chamber among his friends, he gave a skip on the floor for joy; saying, 'He felt his shoulders light, now he was discharged of such an heavy burden (19).'

[L] Did not resume his Episcopal dignity.] And for that several reasons are assigned by T. Fuller (20); but whether he has hit upon the right one, let the reader judge. He says, 'It was not for any want of favour from the King:—nor was it because his down-right sermons disoblged the courtiers, who generally de-light in soft preaching as in soft cloathing: nor was it out of fullness; because another had had his bishoprick. 'Nor have we any cause to suspect Latimer of Hooper's opinion, as distasting ceremonies, and so obstructing his advancement. But we impute it, either to his conscience (oft-times sharpest in the bluntest men) because he would not be built on the ruines of another; especially knowing Heath [his successor] one of a meek and moderate nature: or to his age, who, Barzillai like, was superannuated for earthly honour: or, because he found himself not so fit for government, better for preaching, than ordering ecclesiastical affairs. Or lastly, because he prophetically foresaw, that the ingratitude of the English nation would shorten their happiness, and K. Edward's life; and he was loth to come into a place, onely to go out of thereof.'—I am sorry to find him, in 1548, one of the Commissioners for trying and condemning Joan Bocher; and with he, and our first reformers, had not given any ground for the Imputation thrown upon them; that, as soon as they were freed from persecution, they turned persecutors themselves. See Strype's Life of Cranmer, Lond. 1694, p. 181.

[M] And in other places.] As before Katherine Brandon, Duchefs of Suffolk, at Grimstorpe; at Bexterley, &c. (21): J. Foxe says, that he preached for the most part twice every Sunday. And tho' he was infirm, and very aged, he took so little care of sparing himself, and so little consulted his own ease; that, every morning usually, both winter and summer, he was up at his studies by two o' clock (22).

(22) J. Foxe, p. 1579.

[N] Freely rebuking wickedness and abuses of every sort.] Of which we shall give instances, out of his Sermons.—Thus therefore he expresses himself upon the point of OPPRESSION and Injustice, in persons of all degrees. '—God is a great grand-master of the King's house, and will take account of every one that beareth rule therein, for the executing of their offices: whether they have justly and truly served the King in their offices, or no. Yea, God looketh upon the King himselfe, if he worke well or not. Every King is subject unto God, and all other men are subject unto the King. In a King God requireth faith, not excess of horses. Horses for a King be good and necessary, if they be well used, but horses are not to be preferred above poor men.—God appointeth every King a sufficient living for his estate and degree both by landes and other customes. And it is lawful for every King to enjoy the same goods and possessions. But to extort and take away the right of the poore, is against the honour of the King. For I fully certifie you extortioners, violent oppressors, ingrossers in those discourses, and upon all other occasions, been a most zealous and declared champion against Popery (1); at the accession of bloody Queen Mary, in 1553, he was singled

'ingrossers of tenements and lands, through whose covetousnesse, villages decay and fall downe, the King's leige people for lacke of sustenance are famished and decayed. They be those which speak against the honour of the King (23).—Wel then, if God wil not allow a King too much, whether will he allow a subject too much? no, that he will not: whether have any men heere in England too much? I doubt most rich men have too much; for without too much we can get nothing. As for example, the Phytition, if the poore man be diseased, he can have no helpe without too much: and of the Lawyer the poore man can get no counsel, expedition, nor helpe in his matter, except he give him too much. At merchants hands, no kind of ware can be had, except we give for it too much. You landlords, you rent-raisers, I may say you steplords, you unnatural lords, you have for your possessions yearly too much. For that here before went for 20 or 60 pound by year (which is an honest portion to be had gratis in one lordship of another man's sweate and labour) now is let for 50 or 100 pound by year. Of this too much cometh this monstrous and portentous dearth made by man, notwithstanding God doth send us plentifully the fruits of the earth, mercifully, contrary unto our deserts.—I will tell you, my lords and masters, this is not for the King's honour.—Furthermore, if the King's honour (as some men say) standeth in the great multitude of people: then these grafsers, inclosers, and rentreaters, are hinderers of the King's honour. For whereas have bene a great many houlholders, and inhabitantes, there is now but a shepheard and his dog.—My lords and masters, I say also, that all such proceedings which are against the King's honour, doe intend plainly to make the yeomandry slavery and the Clergy slavery.—We of the Clergy had too much, but this is taken away and now we have too little.—There lyeth a great matter by these appropriations, great reformation is to be had in them. I know wher is a great market-towne with divers hamlets and inhabitants, wher doe rise yearly of their labours to the value of 50 pounce, and the Vicar that serveth, (being so great a cure) hath but 12 or 14 markes by yeare, so that of this pension he is not able to buy him bookes, nor give his neighbours drinke, and all the great gaine goeth another way (24).—He condemns LYING and CHEATING with the same earnestnes.— Consider, faith he, and examine all estates, and ye shall finde all their doings furnished with lyes: Goe first to men of occupations, consider their lives and conversations; there is in a manner nothing with them but lying. Go to men of authority, go to the Lawyers, you shall finde stufte enough. For it is seene now a-days that children learne prettily of their parents, to lye, for the parents are not ashamed to lye in the presence of their children. The craft-man, or merchant, teacheth his pretifse to lye, and to utter his wares with lying and forswearing. Finally there is almost nothing among us but lyes, and therefore parents and masters are in great danger of eternal damnation, for they care not after what manner they bring up their youth. Wherefore I earnestly exhort you in God's behalfe, to consider better of the matter: you that be parents, suffer not your children to lye, or tell false tales; when you heare one of your children to make a lye, take him up, and give him three or four good stripes, and tell him that it is naught: and when he maketh another lye, give him 6 or 7 stripes, and I am sure when you serve him so, he will leave it (25).—O what a falsehood is used in England, yea in the whole world! It were no marvel if the fire from heaven fell upon us, like as it did upon the Sodomites only for our falsehood's sake!—Those which use such deceitfulnesse shall be damned world without end, except they repent.' And then he proceeds to give instances of the cheats then practised (26).—'There be some people,' faith he 'elsewhere, that ascribe their gaines, their increase gotten by faculty, to the divell. Is there any, trow ye, in England would say so? Now if a man should come to another, and said he got his living by the divell, he would fall out with him. There is not a man in England, that so faith, yet is there

'some that thinke it. For all that get it with false buying and selling, with circumvention, with usury, impolitures, mixt wares, false weightes, deceiving their lords and masters, all those that get their goods on this fashion, what doe they thinke, but that the divell fendeth them gaires and riches? for they be his, being unlawfully gotten (27).—In another place he shews the frauds used in the public revenue.—'Whatsoever,' says he, 'is granted unto his Majesty by the Parliament, the whole realm is bound in conscience to pay it, every man as it is required of him.—But now he will say, this is a great bondage, and a heave yoke and servitude.—As when there is a subsidie, so that the King requireth one shilling of every pound; now I am worth 40 pounds, and so I pay 40 shillings, to which money the King hath as good right, as to any inheritance which his Majesty hath. And this I speake to this end, for I feare this realme be full of theeves, for he is a theefe that withdraweth any thing from any man whosoever he be. Now I put the case it is allowed by the Parliament, by common authority, that the King shall have one shilling of every pound, and there be certaine men appointed in every shiere which be valuers, when I now either corrupt the valuer, or sweare against my conscience, that I am not worth an 100 pound when I am worth 200. Here I am a theefe before God and shall be hanged in hell. Now, how many theeves thinke you are here in England, which will not be valued above 10*l*. when they be worth an 100 pound; but this is a pittifull thing, and God will punish them one day, for God's matters are not to be trifled withall (28).—O Lord, what bribery, falshood, deceiving, false getting of goods is in England? and yet for all that we heare nothing of restitution, which is a miserable thing I tell you, none of them which have taken their neighbours goods from him by any manner of falshood, none of them, I say, shall be saved, except they make restitution (29).—And he speaks in as harsh terms against BRIBERY; especially among Judges.—'I beseech your Grace, that ye will looke to these matters.—Heare them [i. e. the plaintiffs] yourselve. View your judges, and heare poore mens causes. And you proud Judges harken what God faith in his holy booke, Heare them, the small as well as the great, the poore as well as the rich. Regard no person, feare no man, why? Quia Domini judicium est: The judgment is God's. Marke this saying thou proud Judge. The devill will bring this sentence at the day of doome. Hell will be full of these Judges, if they repent not and amend. They are worse than the wicked Judge that Christ speaketh of, that neither feared God nor the world. [Luke xviii.] (30)—I will tell you, my Lord Judges, if ye consider this matter well, ye shall be more afraid of the poore widow than of a nobleman with all his friends and power that he can make.—What will ye doe in the day of great vengeance, when God shall vifite you? he faith he will heare the tears of poore women when he goeth on vifitation. For their sake he will hurt the Judge, be he never so high. Deus transfert regna. He will for widdowes sakes change realms, bring them into troubles, and plucke the Judges skins over their eares. Cambises was a great king, such another as our master is, he had many Lord Deputies, Lord Presidents, and Lieutenants under him. It chanced he had under him in one of his dominions, a Briber, a gift-taker, a gratifier of rich men, he followed gifts,—a hand-maker in his office, to make his sonne a great man; as the old saying is, Happy is the child, whose father goeth to the devill. The cry of the poore widow came to the Emperour's eare, and caused him to slay the Judge quicke, and layd his skine in his chaire of judgment, that all judges that should give judgment afterwards, should fit in the same skinne: surely it was a goodly signe, a goodly monument the signe of the Judges skinne, I pray God we may once see the signe of the Skinne in England. Ye will say peradventure, that this is cruelly and uncharitably spoken: no, no, I do it charitably for a love I bear to my country (31).—If the King and his Counsell should suffer evill Judges of this realm to take bribes, singled out as one of the first victims that were to be sacrificed to Popish revenge and cruelty. Being then in the country, a pursuivant was sent after him: of whose coming having notice, he was so far from flying, that he rather prepared for his journey. At this the pursuivant being amazed, he told him, 'He was a welcome messenger;' and declared to him, and to the whole world, that he went then as willingly to London (being called by his Prince to render an account of his doctrine), as ever he did to any place in the world. The pursuivant, after having delivered his letters, went away, telling Lati-

to defeat justice, and suffer the great to overgo the poore, and should look through his fingers, and winke at it, should not the king be partaker of their naughtines? And why, Is he not supream head of the Church? What? is the supream a dignity, and nothing else? Is it not countable? I thinke it will be a chargeable dignity when an account shall be asked of it (32).—I am sure this is scala inferni, the right way to hell, to be covetous, to take bribes, and pervert justice. If a judge should aske me the way to hell, I would shew him this way. First, let him be a covetous man, let his heart be poysoned with covetousnesse. Then let him goe a little further, and take bribes, and at last pervert judgement. Loe here is the mother and the daughter, and the daughters daughter. Avarice is the mother, she brings forth bribe-taking, and bribe taking perverting of judgement. There lacks a fourth thing to make up the messe, which God so helpe me if I were Judge, should be Hangum tuum, a Tyburne tipitt to take with him; and it were the Judg of the King's Bench, my Lord chiefe Judge of England: yea, and it were my Lord Chancellor himselfe, to Tiburne with him (33).—It is a dangerous thing to be in office, for qui attingit picem, coinquinabitur ab ea. He that medleth with pitch, is like to be spotted with it: bribes may be refembled to pitch, for even as pitch doth pollute their hands that meddle with it, so bribes will bring you to perverting of justice. Beware of pitch you Judges of the world, bribes will make you pervert justice. Why, you will say we touch none. No marry, but my mistris your wife, hath a fine finger, she toucheth it for you; or else you have a servant, à Muneribus, he will say, if you will come to my master and offer him a yoke of oxen you shall speed never the worse, but I thinke my master will take none: when he hath offered them to the master, then comes another servant and faves, If you will bring them to the Clarke of the Kitchin, you shall be remembered the better. This is a frierly fashion, that will receive no money in their hands, but will have it put upon their sleeves: a goodly ragge of Popish Religion (34).—He speaks likewise very bitterly, in many places, against Unpreaching Prelates (35).—And is particularly severe against all manner of LEWDNESS.—'One thing' (saith he in one of his Sermons before the Court) 'I must here desire you to reforme, my Lords; you have put down the Stewes. But I pray you what is the matter amended? what availeth that? ye have but changed the place, and not taken the whoredome away.—I advertise you in God's name looke to it. I heare say there is now more whoredome in London, than ever there was on the Banke (36).—There is more open whoredome, more suted whoredom than ever was before. For God's sake let it be looked upon, it is your office to see unto it (37) — 'I thinke,' saith he another time, 'I shal never come into this place againe, and therefore I wil aske a petition of your Highnes. For the love of God take an order for Marriages here in England. For here is marriage for pleasure and voluptuousnesse and for goods, and so that they may joyne land to land, and possessions to possessions, they care for no more heere in England. And that is the cause of so much idolatry, and so much breach of wedlocke in the noble men, in the gentlemen, and so much divorcing. And it is not now in the noble men only, but it is come now to the inferiour sort. Every man if he have but a small cause, will cast off his old wife, and take a new, and will marry againe at his pleasure, and there be many that have so done. I would therefore wish that there were a law provided in this behalfe for adulterers, and that adultery should be punished with death; and that might be a remedy for all this matter. There would not be then so much adultery, whoredome, and lechery in England as there is. For the love of God take heed to it, and see a remedy provided for it. I would wish that adultery should be punished with death. And that the woman being an offender, if her husband would be a futer for her, she should be pardoned for the first time, but not for the second time. And the man being an offender, should be pardoned, if his wife be a futer for him, the first time, but not for the second time, if he offend twice. If this law were made, there would not be so much adultery nor lechery used in the realme as there is. Well, I trust once yet as old as I am, to see the day that lechery shal be punished. It was never more needed, for there was never more lechery used in England than is at this day, and maintained. It is made but a laughing matter, and a trifle; but it is a sad matter, and an earnest matter. For lechery is a great sinne: Sodome and Gomorrah was destroyed for it (38).—Although we reade, that the Kings amongst the Jewes had liberty to take more wives than one, we may not therefore attempt to walke inordinately, and to thinke that we may take also many wives. For Christ hath forbidden this unto us Christians. And let us not impute sinne unto the Jewes because they had many wives, for they had a dispensation so to do. Christ limiteth unto us one wife onely. And it is a great thing for a man to rule one wife rightly and ordnately: for a woman is fraile and proclive unto all evils, a woman is a very weak vessel, and may soone deceive a man, and bring him unto evill. Many examples we have in holy scripture, &c. (39) — Lastly, he taxeth the vices of the City of London with the utmost freedom. 'What shall we say of these rich Citizens of London? What shall I say of them? Shall I call them proud men of London, malicious men of London, mercilesse men of London? No, no, I may not say so, they will be offended with me then. Yet must I speake. For is there not raining in London, as much pride, as much covetousnes, as much cruelty, as much oppression, and as much superstition, as was in Nebo? Yes, I thinke, and much more too. Therefore I say, repent, O London, repent, repent,' &c. (40).—He goes on much further in the same strain, which I omit for fear of wearying the Reader.

[O] And, as it seems, with uncommon success.] He gives us himself instances of it, in the following words:—'At my first preaching of restitution, one man tooke remorse of conscience, and acknowledged himselfe to me, that he had deceived the King, and willing he was to make restitution: and so the first Lent came to my hands 20 pounds to be refored to the King's use. I was promised 20 pound more the same Lent, but it could not bee made, so that it came not. Well, the next Lent came 320 pound more; I received it myselfe and paid it to the King's counsell. So I was asked, what he was that made this restitution; but should I have named him? Nay they should asfoone have this wefaunt of mine. Well, now this Lent came 180 Pounds, 10 Shillings, which I have paid and delivered this present day to the King's counsell: and so this man hath made a godly restitution: and so (quoth I to a certaine Nobleman that is one of the King's counsell) if every man that hath beguiled the King should make restitution after this fort, it would cough the King 20,000 pounds, I thinke (quoth I); yea that it would (quoth the other) a whole 100000 pounds. Alack, alack, make restitution for God's sake, make restitution, ye will cough in hell else, that all the devils there will laugh at your coughing. There is no remedy but restitution open or secret, or else hell. This that I have now told you of, was a secret restitution. Some examples hath been of open restitution, and glad may hee be that God was so friendly unto him, to bring him unto it in this world. I am not afraid to name him. It was Master Sherington, an honest Gentleman, and one that God loveth. He openly confessed that hee had deceived the King, and hee made open restitution (41).'

mer, that he had orders not to stay for him. By which some might imagine, the Court would have been better pleased, if he had withdrawn himself out of the kingdom. But good Latimer had the true spirit of a Martyr in him. He came up therefore to London, and, as he passed through Smithfield, said, That Smithfield had long groaned for him. September 13, he was brought before the Privy-Council, and after having been much abused by them, and made proper replies, he was committed to the Tower (t), for his seditious demeanour, as it is expressed in the Council-book (u). During his imprisonment, he suffered great hardships, which he bore with uncommon resolution and cheerfulness [P]; and had for some time the comfort of Archbishop Cranmer's and Bishop Ridley's company, that were confined in the same room with him (w). At length, to compleat the last scene of this tragedy, about the tenth of April 1554, he and those two prelates were conveyed by Sir John Williams to Oxford, in order to hold there a public disputation with several Doctors of both universities (x) [Q]; because a rumour was spread,

[P] He suffered great hardships, &c.] Among the rest he was kept without fire in the frosty winter, and almost starv'd with cold. So that the Lieutenant of the Tower's servant coming in once to him, he merrily bid him tell his master, That if he did not look to him better, perhaps he would deceive him. Upon which the Lieutenant began to watch him more narrowly, for fear he should escape; and questioning him about his words, he replied, 'Yea, master Lieutenant, so I said; for you look, I think that I should burn: but except you let me have some fire, I am like to deceive your expectation, for I am like here to starve for cold (42).'

(42) Foxe, p. 1299.

[Q] To hold there a public disputation with several Doctors of both universities.] The Oxford divines were, Dr Weston, prolocutor of the convocation, Dr Tresham, Dr Cole, Dr Oglethorpe, Dr Pic, Mr Harpsfield, Mr Feckenham. Those from Cambridge, Dr Yong, Vice-chancellor, Dr Glin, Dr Seaton, Dr Watson, Dr Sedgewicke, Dr Atkinson, &c.—The Questions they disputed upon, were these three. 1. Whether the natural body of Christ be really in the Sacrament, after the words spoken by the priest, or no? 2. Whether in the Sacrament, after the words of consecration, any other substance do remaine, than the substance of the body and blood of Christ? 3. Whether the masse be a sacrifice propitiatory for the finnes of the quicke and the dead? Their disputations, upon those points, may be seen in Foxe's Acts and Monuments (43).—The 14th day of April, was the first time Cranmer, Ridley, and Latimer were brought before the Commissioners; and asked, whether they would subscribe those three articles? At which time, Latimer appeared with a kerchief, and two or three caps on his head, his spectacles hanging by a string at his breast, and a staff in his hand. He was permitted, by reason of his age to sit down in a chair. After his denial of subscribing the articles, when he had the Wednesday following appointed for disputation, he alledged age, sickness, disuse, and want of books, saying, that he was almost as fit to dispute as to be a captain of Calais; but he would, he said, declare his mind either by writing or by word, and would stand to all that they could lay upon his back: Complaining moreover, that he was permitted to have neither pen or ink, nor yet any book, but only the New Testament, (there in his hand,) which he said he had read over seven times deliberately, and yet could not find the mass in it, neither the marrow-bones nor sinews of the same. At which words the Commissioners were not a little offended, and Dr Weston said, he would make him grant, that it had both marrow-bones and sinews in the New Testament. To whom Mr Latimer said again, 'that you will never do, Mr Doctor;' and so forthwith they put him to silence, so that when he was desirous to tell what he meant by those terms, he was not suffered (44).—The 18th of April he was brought to the schools, in order to dispute, tho' he declared himself utterly unfit for it, and therefore he delivered his protestation, or answer, in writing, which was to this effect: 'Concerning the first conclusion, [or article] meethinketh it is set fourth with certaine new-found termes, that be obscure, and doe not found according to the speech of the scripture. Howbeit, howsoever I understand it, this I doe answere plainly, though not without perill: I answere, I say, that to the right celebration of the Lord's-supper, there is no other presence of Christ required, than a spirituall presence: and this presence is sufficient for a Christian man, as a presence by which we abide in Christ, and

Christ abideth in us, to the obtaining of eternal life, if we persevere. And this same presence may be called most fitly, a real presence, that is, a presence not feigned, but a true and a faithful presence. Which thing I here rehearse, lest some sycophant or scornor should suppose mee with the Anabaptistes, to make nothing else of the sacrament but a naked and a bare signe. As for that which is fained of many concerning their corporall presence, I for my part take it but for a papistical invention, therefore thinke it utterly to be rejected. Concerning the 2d conclusion, I dare bee bolde to say, that it hath no stay or ground in God's word, but is a thing invented and found out by man: and therefore to bee taken as fond and false: and I had almost sayd, as the mother and nurse of the other errors. It were good for my lords and maisters of the transubstantiation, to take heed lest they conspire with the Nestorians, for I do not see how they can avoide it. The 3d conclusion (as I doe understand it) seemeth subtly to sowe sedition against the offering which Christ himselfe offered for us in his owne proper person, according to that pithie place of Paul, Hebr. i. 3. and ii. 17. So that the expiation or taking away of our finnes, may be thought rather to depend on this: that Christ was an offering Bishop, than that he was offered, were it not that he was offered of himselfe: and therefore it is needlesse that he should be offered of any other.—He proceeds further to explain this 1st point; saying, among other things, that 'The Supper of the Lord was intituted to provoke us to thanksgiving, for the offering which the Lord himselfe did offer for us, much rather than that our offerers should doe there as they do.'—After which he adds, 'Thus loe I have taken the more paine to wrie, because I refused to dispute, in consideration of my debilitie thereunto: that all men may know, how that I have fo done, not without great paines, having not any man to helpe mee, as I have never before been debarred to have. O Sir, you may chance to live till you come to this age and weakness that I am of. I have spoken in my time before two kings, more than once, two or three houres together without interruption: but now that I may speake the truth (by your leave) I could not be suffered to declare my minde before you, no, not by the space of a quarter of an houre, without flatches, revilings, checkes, rebukes, taunts, such as I have not felt the like, in such an audience all my life long. Surely it cannot be, but an heinous offence that I have given. But what was it? Forsooth I had spoken of the foure marrow-bones of the masse. The which kinde of speaking, I never read to be a sinne against the Holy Ghost. I could not be allowed to shew what I meant by my metaphore: but Sir, now, by your favour, I will tell your maistership what I mean. The 1st is the Popish consecration: which hath bene called a God's body-making. The 2d is Transubstantiation. The 3d is Missal-oblation. The 4th Adoration. These chiefe and principal portions, partes, and points belonging or incident to the masse, and most esteemed and had in price of the same, I call the marrow-bones of the masse, which indeede you by force, might and violence, intrude in founde of words in some of the scripture, with racking and cramping, injuring and wronging the same: but els indeede, plaine out of the Scripture, as I am thoroughly perswaded, although in disputation I could now nothing doe, to perswade the same to others, being both unapt to studie, and also to make a shew of my former studie, in such readinesse as should be requisite to the same.' &c.—However, he was drawn spread, that the Roman-Catholicks had been lately worsted in the Convocation-house (y). Therefore, this disputation was not with a view of sifting out and establishing the truth; but to triumph over those three great pillars of the Reformation, which their Popish adversaries had in their hearts already devoted to destruction, if they would not immediately subscribe to all the errors of Popery. On purpose to confound them, the disputation was tumultuously and very unfairly carried on [R]; and when it was ended, Mr Latimer absolutely refusing to turn, he and his two fellow-sufferers were, on the 20th of April, declared no members of the Church, and condemned as hereticks. At the hearing of which sentence, Latimer thanked God most heartily, that he had prolonged his life, to this end, that he might in this case glorify God by that kind of death. Then he was committed to the Bailiff's custody (z). He continued there 'till about the end of September 1555, when a commission was granted from Cardinal Pole, as the Pope's legate, to White Bishop of Lincoln, Brookes of Gloucester, and Holiman of Bristol, to examine him, and Bishop Ridley, for the opinions they had maintained in the disputations abovementioned. Accordingly Mr Latimer appeared before them, September 30 and October 1, in the divinity-school at Oxford [S]; at which time he refusing to recant, and 'to deny his master Christ, and his verity,' as he expressed it, was condemned to the flames as an obstinate heretic (a a). This most cruel sentence was executed upon him and Bishop Ridley, on the 16th of October 1555, in the town-ditch over against Balliol-college in Oxford. An account of his appearance and behaviour then, is given below in the note [T]. Bishop Latimer, as to his person, was tall and thin, and of a sanguine complexion. With regard to the qualities of his mind, he was a man of exemplary piety, regular in his life, and strict and austere in his manners; quite sincere and zealous in the profession of Religion, and earnest in the discharge of his duty, without regarding the consequences. But in some respects he seemed to want conduct and address, which exposed him now and then to some inconvenience (b b). He was more famous as a preacher [V], than into a disputation, or dialoguc, which may be seen in

(45) See Vol. II. Foxe (45). p. 1322, 1323; &c.

[R] The disputation was tumultuously and very unfairly carried on. Of this unhandsome usage Bp Ridley complained in the following words: 'I could never have thought that it had been possible to have found amongst men recounted to bee of knowledge and learning in this realme, any so brazen-faced and shamelesse, so disorderly and vainly to behave themselves, more like stage-players in enterludes, to set forth a pageant, than to grave Divines in schooles to dispute. The Sorbonicall clamours (which in Paris I have seene in time past, when Popery most prevailed) might be worthily thought (in comparison of this thrafronical ostentation) to have had much modestie. And no great marvell, seeing they which should have been moderatours and overseers of others, and which should have given good ensample in words and gravitie: they themselves above all other gave worst ensample, and did, as it were, blowe the trompe to the rest, to rave, rore, rage, and cry out. By reason whereof manifestly it may appear that they never fought for any truth or verity, but onely for the glory of the world, and their owne bragging victorie, &c. (46)' — To which may be added what Mr Collier observs upon the occasion (47). 'The three Bishops were forc'd to enter the lists at great disadvantages: they had but two days allowed them for preparation: they were kept in different and ill-accommodatd prisons, not suffer'd to converse with each other; neither had they the convenience of their own books and papers. They were likewise obliged to appear single in the contest, each of them having a distinct day assigned; so that they had no opportunity of supporting each other, if occasion had requir'd.'

(46) Foxe, as a above, p. 1330.

(47) Eccles. Hist. Vol. II. p. 367.

[S] Accordingly Mr. Latimer appeared before them. He appeared in a very mean drefs; whether through necessity, or his own choice.—'Having a kerchiefe on his head, and upon it a night-cap or two, and a great cap (such as townsmen then used) with two broad flaps to button under the chin; wearing an old thread-bare Bristol frise gown girded to his body with a penny leather-girdle, on which was hang'd by a long string of leather his Testament; and his spectacles without a case, hung about his neck;' in the manner before described (48).

(48) Foxe, p. 1559,

[T] An account of his appearance and behaviour, &c. He appeared at the stake in the same mean garb just now described; only had a new long throwd hanging over his hose, down to the feet. Bishop Ridley kiss'd and comforted him, before they were fastned to the stake: and he, on his part, spok'e these chearful words to him; 'Be of good comfort, Master Ridley,

'and play the man; we shall this day light such a candle, by God's grace, in England, as I trust shall never be put out.' Before the fire was lighted, lifting up his eyes towards heaven, he said with an amiable countenance, 'God is faithful, who will not suffer us to be tempted above our strength.' When the flames came near him, he seemed to embrace them, and cried aloud and vehemently, 'O Father of Heaven receive my Soul.' After he had stroak'd his face with his hands, and, as it were, bathed them a little in the fire, he soon died, with very little or no pain, to all appearance. The force of the fire bursting open his body, the blood ran out of his heart in such abundance, as if it had been all gathered there; to the great amazement of the spectators (49). Such was the end of Father Latimer; to his own immortal honour; and to the eternal reproach and disgrace of Popery!

(49) Foxe, as a above, p. 1579; 1607.

[V] He was more famous as a preacher. A collection of his Sermons was published in 1570, by Augustin Bernhere, an Helvetian, or Swiss, (who calls the Bishop his Master) and dedicated by him to the Lady Katherine Duches of Suffolke. They have been reprinted several times since, as in 1572 and 1635, 4to, in which last edition were inserted several, not before printed*. There is amongst them, one preached before the Convocation; seven before K. Edward VI (50); seven upon the Lord's Prayer; and others upon particular occasions: forty in all. They are in general written with great freedom; and contain several things which would be now-a-days reckoned unpolite and uncouth. Some instances may be seen under note [N]; to which we shall add a few shorter specimens here.—'He [the devil] can give us an after-clappe when we least weane; that is, suddainly returne unawares to us, and then he given us an after-clap that overthroweth us (51).—Speaking of the Protestant Religion, —'I tell you,' says he, 'it is old truth, long rusted with canker, and now new made bright and scoured (52).—God by his example shaketh us by the nostrils and pulleth us by the eares (53).—Now I would ask a strange question, who is the most diligent Bishop and prelate in all England, and passeth all the rest in doing his office? I can tell, for I know him who hee is, I know him wel. But now methinks I see you lifting and harkning, that I should name him. There is one that passeth all the other, and is the most diligent prelate and preacher in all England. And will ye know who it is? I will tell you. It is the devill. He is the most diligent preacher of all other, he is never out of his dioces, he is never from his cure (54).—What meaneth it that God hath to doe with the King's stable, but onely he would be master of his horses (55)?—Germany was visited twenty yeares with God's word, but but they did not earnestly embrace it, nor in life follow it, but made a mingle mangle and a hotch-potch of it; I cannot tell what, partly Popery, partly true Religion mingled together. They say in my country, when they call their hogges to the swine-trough; Come to thy mingle mangle, cum pur, cum pur: even fo they made a mingle mangle of it (56).—If you have another faith than this, a whoremonger's faith, you are like to go to the scalding-house, and there you shall have two dishes, weeping and gnashing of teeth, much good doe it you, you see your fare (57).—We have a common saying among us: Whosoever loveth me loveth my hound: fo, whosoever loveth God, will love his neighbour (58).—He that will be a Christian man, that intendeth to come to heaven must be a faucie fellow, he must be well powdered with the fauce of affliction and tribulation (59). And, to bring only one instance more:—In his Sermon upon Luke ii. 6, 7. he has these remarkable words: 'I warrant you, there was many a jolly damſell at that time in Bethlem, yet amongst them all there was not one found that would humble herselfe so much, as once to goe see poore Mary in the stable, and to comfort her. No, no, they were too fine to take fo much paines. I warrant you they had their bracelets and wardingalls, and were trimmed with all manner of fine and costly rayment, like as there be many row a dayes amongst us, which studie nothing else but how they may devise fine raiment, and in the meane season, they suffer poore Mary to lye in the stable, that is to say, the poore people of God they suffer to perish for lacke of necessaries. But what was her fwaddling cloathes wherein she layde the King of heaven and earth? no doubt it was poore geare, peradventure it was her kercher which she tooke from her head, or such like geare, for I thinke Mary had not much fine linen, she was not trimmed up as our women be now a-dayes. I thinke indeed Mary had never a wardingall, for she used no such superfluities as our fine damſels doe now a-dayes: for in the old time, women were content with honest and single garments. Now they have found out these roundabouts, they were not invented then, the devil was not so cunning to make such geare, he found it out afterward. Therefore Mary had it not. I will say this, and yet not judge other folkes hearts, but onely speake after daily appearance and experience, no doubt it is nothing but a token of pride to wear such wardingalls, and therefore I think that every godly woman should set them aside (60).—His notion of Preaching was, that a Preacher should never feare to declare the message of God unto all men (61); without regarding the censure of the world. 'They have called me,' says he, 'old dotting foole; but what then, we must be content to be despised with Christ here in this world, that we may be glorified with him in the world to come (62).' Upon the whole, if any thing appear in his writings awkward and rude, it was not fo much his own fault, as the fault of the times in which he lived; when preaching was but little used, and the English tongue very imperfect.

[W] Iban a writer.] Besides his Sermons, I do not find there is any thing of his published, except some letters in J. Foxe's Acts and Monuments (63); among which, there is one to K. Henry VIII. in 1530, for restoring again the free Liberty of reading the holy Scriptures.—And Injunctions given by him to the Prior and Convent of St Mary House in Worcester, during his vifitation in 1537 (64).

[X] A remarkable instance of the liberty he took with . . . . K. Henry VIII. &c.] It was then customary for the Bishops, to present New-years-gifts to the King, as gold, silver, a purse of money, &c. But Bishop Latimer's present was a New Testament, with a Napkin, having this motto round it: Fornicatores & adulteros judicabit Deus. Fornicators and adulterers God will judge (65).

LAUD [WILLIAM], successively Bishop of St David's; of Bath and Wells; of London; and Archbishop of Canterbury, in the last century. There ever hardly was any person, whose character hath been so differently represented, and of whom so much good and so much evil hath been said. For our own part, we shall, in the following article, endeavour to avoid both extremes; and, for that purpose, abide only by facts, which speak for themselves, and carry with them their own praise or reproach. The Prelate whose life we are entering upon, was son of William Laud, a Clothier of Reading in Berkshire, by Lucy his wife, widow of John Robinson of the same place, and sister to Sir William Webbe, afterwards Lord-Mayor of London (a). He was born within the parish of St Laurence in Reading, October 7, 1573 (b); and educated in the free-school of that town 'till July 1589, when he was admitted into St John's college in Oxford [A], of which he was chosen Scholar in June 1590, and Fellow in June 1593 (c). He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in June 1594, and that of Master in July 1598 [B], in which year he was Grammar Reader. And being ordained Deacon 4 January 1600, and Priest 5 April 1601, he read, the year following, a Divinity Lecture in his college [C], which was then maintained by Mrs Maye. In the year 1603, he was one of the [B] He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in June 1594, &c.] This is the Archbishop's own account, in his Diary. But Mr Wood says, he took his Bachelor's degree July 1, 1594, and that of Master, June 26, 1598 (2). And gives this character of him; that he was 'at that time esteemed by all those that knew of him (being little in person) a very forward, confident, and zealous person (3).'

[C] He read — a Divinity Lecture in his college.] It was, either in reading this lecture, or some other chapel-exercise, that he maintained the constant and perpetual Visibility of the Church of Christ, derived from the Apostles to the Church of Rome, continued in that Church (as in others of the East and South) 'till the Reformation. Dr Abbot Master of University-college, and Vice-chancellor traced it, on the contrary, from the Berengarians to the Albigenſes, from the Albigenſes to the Wiclefists, from these to the Hussites, and from the Hussites to Luther and Calvin: and he being a very rigid Puritan, and perhaps thinking it a derogation to his parts and credit to be contradicted by a person whom he looked upon as his inferior, that made him conceive a very strong prejudice against Mr Laud, which no time could either lessen or abolish (4): and to give afterwards this unfavourable character of him, 'His life in Oxford was

He took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, July 6, 1604 (e). The exercise he performed upon that occasion gave offence to the Calvinists (f) [E]; as did, not long after, a Sermon he preached before the university (g) [F]. The first preferment he had [G], was the Vicarage of Stanford in Northamptonshire, into which he was inducted November 13, 1607; and, in April 1608, he obtained the advowson of North-Kilworth in Leicestershire. On the 6th of June following, he proceeded Doctor in Divinity (h). At the recommendation of Dr Buckeridge, he was made Chaplain, August 5, 1608, to Richard Neile Bishop of Rochester. And that he might be near his patron, he exchanged North Kilworth for the Rectory of West Tilbury in Essex; into which he was inducted October 28, 1609. He made it his work to see what books were in the press, and to look over epistles dedicatory, and prefaces to the reader, to see what faults might be found (6).'

[D] An affair that caused him afterwards great uneasiness, &c. This Charles Blount, was a younger brother of William Blount Lord Mountjoy, and had, in Queen Elizabeth's reign, greatly distinguished himself by his bravery and conduct in the wars in Ireland; particularly at the battle of Kinsale, wherein he defeated the rebellious Irish, broke their whole forces, reduced that kingdom to the obedience of this Crown, and brought Tir-Oen, the arch-rebel, prisoner with him into England. Before the year 1588, he made his addresses to the Lady Penelope, daughter of Walter Devereux Earl of Essex, a lady of great wit and beauty: and he had so far complied with his desires, that some assurances passed between them of a future marriage. But her friends looking on Mr Blount as a younger brother, considerable only in his dependences at Court, chose to dispose of her in marriage to Robert Lord Rich, a man of an independent fortune, and a known estate, but otherwise of an uncourteous disposition, unfociable, austere, and of no very agreeable conversation to her. Against this marriage Mr Blount had nothing sufficient to plead; the promises that had passed between them having been made in private, without any witnesses, and therefore not amounting to a pre-contract in due form of law. The Lord Rich had by her three sons; one of whom was Robert, afterwards Earl of Warwick, and Henry Earl of Holland; and four daughters. But they had not lived many years together before the old flames of her affection to Blount began to kindle again in her breast; so that having first had their private meetings, they afterwards conversed more openly with one another, than might stand with their mutual honour; especially when by the death of his elder brother, the title of Lord Mountjoy, and the estate, had descended to him: as if the alteration of his fortune could lessen the offence, or stop peoples mouths. Finding her, at his return from the wars of Ireland, free from Lord Rich, legally freed by a divorce, and not a voluntary separation only a toto est mensa; he thought himself obliged to make her some reparation in point of honour, by taking her into his bosom as a lawful wife. Besides, he had some children by her, before she was actually separated from Lord Rich (one of which, Mountjoy Blount, afterwards attained to the title of Earl of Newport) whom he conceived he might have put into a capacity of legitimation, by his subsequent marriage, according to the rule and practice of the Civil Laws, in which it passeth for a maxim, That subsequens Matrimonium legitimat prolem. And to that end he dealt so powerfully with his Chaplain, that he disposed him to perform the rites of matrimony; which was accordingly done at Wanstead, Decemb. 26, 1605. The chief reason Mr Laud grounded himself upon, in that extraordinary proceeding, was, That in case of a Divorce, as here, both the innocent and the guilty party may lawfully marry if they please; which Maldo-

nate (7) makes to be the general opinions of the Lutheran and Calvinian Ministers, as also of some Catholic Doctors (8). But this inconsiderate action King James did for many years take so ill, that he would never hear of any great preferment of Mr Laud; inasmuch that Dr Williams, Bishop of Lincoln, who took upon himself to be the first promoter of him, many times said, That when he made mention of Laud to the King, his Majesty was so averse from it, that the Bishop was constrained oftentimes to say, He would never desire to serve that Master, which could not remit one fault unto his servant (9). However, it made so deep impression upon Mr Laud, that he ever after kept the 26th of December as a day of fasting and humiliation (10).

[E] The exercise he performed upon that occasion gave offence to the Calvinists. The questions he then disputed upon were, 1. The Necessity of Baptism. 2. That there could be no true Church without Diocesan Bishops. For which last he was shrewdly rattled by Dr Holland, the Divinity-Professor, as one that did endeavour to cast a bone of discord betwixt the Church of England, and the Reformed Churches beyond the seas. And for the first, it was objected, 'That he had taken the greatest part of his supposition out of Bellarmine's works, as if every thing contained in that Cardinal's works, tho' never so true, was false, because it was said by him (11).' A strong instance of foolish prejudice!

(11) Heylin, p. 49. Non quis, sed quid; is a most reasonable rule. But see what the Archbishop says to that in his Tryal, p. 380.

[F] As did, not long after, a Sermon he preached before the University. That Sermon was preached at St Mary's on the 21st [or 26th] of October 1606. What subject it was upon, or what the exceptionable passages in it were, is not recorded any where in print. But, however, Dr Airay, the then Vice-chancellor, a man entirely opposite to him with regard to Calvinistical notions (12), questioned him for that Sermon (13), as containing in it sundry scandalous and Popish passages: 'The good man,' as Heylin expresses it, 'taking all things to be matter of Popery, which were not held forth unto him in Calvin's Institutes; conceiving that there was as much idolatry in bowing at the name of Jesus, as in worshipping the brazen serpent, &c.' But Mr Laud so fully vindicated himself, that he was not obliged to make any recantation; as A. Wood testifies in the following account of that affair.—Nonnulla protulit quae Academicis plerisque, Calvinismo nimirum jam penitus imbutis, superstitionem Pontificiam sapere viderentur; quapropter virum ad se accersivit Doctor Airay Vicecancellarius, superque tradita pro suggesto doctrinae questione habuit. At vero durante in hebdomadas nonnullas ejusdem ventilatione, ita se demum purgavit Laudus, ut publicam dogmatum suorum retractationem evaserit (14). Mr Laud's forementioned adversary, Dr Abbot, taking advantage of this Sermon, so violently persecuted the poor man, and so openly branded him for a Papist, or at least very Popishly inclined, that it was almost made an heresie (as he himself told Mr Heylin) for any one to be seen in his company, and a misprision of heresie to give him a civil salutation as he walked the streets (15). Strange instance of Intolerance, and want of due Moderation!

stone in Kent. Whereupon resigning his Fellowship October the second following, and leaving Oxford the 8th of the same month, he went and resided at Cuckstone. But the unhealthfulness of that place having brought an ague upon him, he exchanged it soon for Norton, a benefice of less value, but in a better air (i). About the same time, viz. the 29th of December 1610, Dr Buckeridge, President of St John's college, being promoted to the bishopric of Rochester, in the place of Dr Neile, translated to the see of Lichfield and Coventry (k); Dr Abbot, newly made Archbishop of Canterbury, retaining his old grudge against Dr Laud, complained of him to the Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, Chancellor of the university [H], in order to prevent his being elected President of the foresaid college. And the Lord Chancellor carried those complaints to the King; which had like to have destroyed at once Dr Laud's credit, interest, and advancement, if his constant and immovable friend Bishop Neile had not effaced those ill impressions (l). Notwithstanding, therefore, those indirect means, he was elected President of St John's, May 10, 1611, by a majority of the Fellows, though he was then sick in London, and unable either to make interest in person, or by writing to his friends (m): and some of his competitors having appealed to King James, his Majesty not only confirmed his election, August 29, 1611, but, in further token of his favour, caused him to be sworn one of his Chaplains the third of November next ensuing; upon the recommendation of Bishop Neile. Our ambitious and aspiring Doctor having thus set foot within the Court, flattered himself with hopes of great and immediate preferment. But Archbishop Abbot standing always an obstacle in his way, no preferment came; so that after three years fruitless waiting, he was upon the point of leaving the Court, and retiring wholly to his college: had not his friend and patron Bishop Neile, newly translated to Lincoln, advised him to stay one year longer. In the mean time, to keep up his spirits, the Bishop gave him the Prebend of Bugden in the church of Lincoln, April 18, 1614; and, December 1, 1615, the Archdeaconry of Huntingdon (n). Upon the Lord Chancellor Ellesmere's decline, in 1616, Dr Laud's interest began to rise at Court; so that in November that year, the King gave him the Deanery of Gloucester [L]; a dignity indeed of no great value, but which established his reputation. He then resigned the Rectory of West-Tilbury. As a further instance of his being in favour, he was pitched upon to attend the King in his journey to Scotland; which he began March 5, 1616-17. But before he set out, by his procurement some royal directions were sent to Oxford, for the better government of that university (o) [K]. The design of King James's journey, was to bring the [H] Complained of him to the Lord Chancellor Ellesmere, &c.] The substance of his complaints, was, 'That Dr Laud was at the least a Papist in heart, and cordially addicted unto Popery; That he kept company with none but profest and suspected Papists; and, That if he were suffered to have any place of Government in the University, it would undoubtedly turn to the great Detriment of Religion, and Dishonour of his Lordship. (17)—What Archbishop Abbot meant by Dr Laud's being addicted to Popery, may be explained from these few passages, in a Sermon of his brother's preached before the University, and directly levell'd against Dr Laud.—'Some,' says he, 'are partly Romish, partly English, as occasion serves them, that a man might say unto them, nostris es, an Adversariorum? who, under pretence of truth, and preaching against the Puritan, strike at the heart and root of the Faith and Religion now established amongst us, &c.—If they do at any time speak against the Papists, they do but beat a little about the bush, and that but softly too, for fear of waking and disquieting the birds that are in it; they speak nothing but that wherein one Papist will speak against another; as against Equivocation and the Pope's temporal Authority, and the like; and perhaps some of their blasphemous speeches: but in the points of Free-will, Justification, Concupiscence being a sin after baptism, Inherent Righteousness, and Certainty of Salvation; the Papists beyond the seas can say they are wholly theirs; and the Recusants at home make their brags of them. And in all things they keep themselves so near the brink, that upon any occasion they may step over to them.—Might not Christ say, What art thou, Romish or English? Papist or Protestant? or what art thou? a mongrel, or compound of both: a Protestant by ordination, a Papist in point of Free-will, Inherent Righteousness, and the like. A Protestant in receiving the Sacrament, a Papist in the doctrine of the Sacrament (18)?' So that Dr Laud's not having the same sentiments as Calvin's or Augustin's followers, about Free-will, Inherent Righteousness, &c. were the mighty arguments of his being a Papist.

[L] The King gave him the Deanery of Gloucester.] When his Majesty gave it him, he required him at the same time to reform and set in order what was amiss in that Cathedral, which, as he said, was worse governed, and more out of order than any other in the kingdom. Dr Laud therefore making haste to Gloucester, found the church in great decay; and many things out of order, in his opinion; particularly the Communion-table standing almost in the middle of the choir, contrary to the position of it in the King's chapel, and all the cathedral churches which he had seen. Whereupon he calls a chapter of the Prebends, and having acquainted them with the King's instructions, easily obtained their consent to two chapter-acts: the one for the speedy repairing of the church where it was most necessary: the other, for transposing the communion-table to the east end of the choir, and placing it along the wall, according to the situation of it in other cathedral churches: which transposition being made, he recommended to the members of that church, the making their humble reverence to Almighty God, not only at their first entrance into the choir, but at their approaches toward the holy table. But these alterations gave great uneasiness to several persons, especially to Dr Miles Smith, then Bishop of Gloucester, who, it is said, never set foot again in the church as long as he lived (19).

[K] By his procurement some royal directions were sent to Oxford.] They were addressed to the Vice-chancellor, the heads of colleges and halls, the two professors and the two proctors of the University. And the 1st of them was, That it was his Majesty's pleasure, that he would have all that take any degree in the schools, subscribe to the three articles in the 36th canon. 2. That no preacher be allowed to preach in the town, but such as are every way conformable both by subscription and every other way. 3. That all students do resort to the sermons in St Mary's, and be restrained from going to any other church in the time of St Mary's sermons;—which are here ordered to be both before noon and after noon.—5. That there be a greater restraint of Scholars, haunting town houses, especially in the night. 6. That all Scholars both at the chapels and at the schools, keep their scholastical habits. 7. That young students in Divinity be directed to study such books as be most agreeable in doctrine and discipline to the Church of England, and incited to bestow the Church of Scotland to an Uniformity with that of England; a favourite scheme of Dr Laud, and some other Divines: but the Scots were Scots, as Dr Heylin expresses it (p), and resolved to go their own way, whatever was the consequence. So that the King (p) P. 66. gained nothing by that chargeable journey, but the neglect of his commands, and a contempt of his authority [L]. Dr Laud, on his return from Scotland, August 2, 1617, was inducted to the Rectory of Ibstock in Leicestershire; belonging to the patronage of the Bishop of Rochester, of whom he had it in exchange for Norton (q). And January 22, 1620-21, was installed into a Prebend of Westminster, of which Bishop Neile had procured him a grant ten years before (r). About the same time, there was a general expectation at Court, that the Deanery of that church would have been conferred upon him (s). But Dr John Williams, then Dean, wanting to keep it in commendam with the Bishopric of Lincoln, to which he was promoted, got Dr Laud put off with the Bishopric of St David's; which was become vacant by the translation of Dr Richard Milbourne to Carlisle (t) [M]; though Archbishop Abbot obstructed his rise as much as possible [N]. Being therefore nominated Bishop of St David's the 29th of June 1621, he was elected October 10, and consecrated the 18th of November, by the Bishops of London, Worcester, Chichester, Ely, Landaff, and Oxford; the Archbishop being then under some kind of disability, on account of the casual homicide of the keeper of Bramhill-Park. The day before his consecration, he resigned the Presidentship of St John's, by reason of the strictness of the college-statute, which he would not violate, nor his oath to it, under any colour (u). But he was permitted to keep his Prebend of Westminster in commendam, through the Lord-Keeper's interest; who, about a year after, gave him a living of 120 pounds a year in the diocese of St David's, to help his revenue (w). And, in January 1622-3, the King gave him also in commendam the Rectory of Creeke in Northamptonshire (x). The preachers of those times meddling with the abstruse doctrines of Predestination and Election, and the royal Prerogative, more than was agreeable to the Court; his Majesty published, on the 4th of August 1622, Directions concerning Preachers and Preaching, in which Bishop Laud is said to have had a hand (y), and of which the substance is given below [O]. This year also (z), Bishop Laud had flow their times in the Fathers and Councils, Schoolmen, Histories, and Controversies, and not to inflit too long upon Compendiums and Abbreviations, making them the grounds of their study in Divinity. 8. That no man, either in pulpit or schools, be suffered to maintain dogmatically any point of doctrine that is not allowed by the Church of England (20).—These Directions were visibly levelled against the Puritans, and Lecturers.

[L] And a contempt of his authority ] Thereupon the King took a better course, than to put the point to argument and disputation; which was, to withdraw those augmentations, he had formerly allowed their Ministers out of his Exchequer. This so wrought upon that indigent and obstinate people, that the next year, in an Assembly holden at Perth, they passed an Act for admitting the five Articles for which his Majesty had been courting them two years together (21). Those Five Articles were, in substance, 1. That the holy Communion should be received by the people kneeling. 2. That it might be administered to sick persons at home. 3. That, in case of necessity, Baptism might be perform'd in private houses. 4. That the days of the Birth, Passion, Resurrection and Ascension of Christ, and of the coming down of the Holy Ghost, should be publickly solemnized in the Congregation. 5. That the Minister in every parish, having catechized all children above eight years of age, should present them to their Bishops in their visitations, by them to be blessed with prayers (22). Dr Laud, not content with these articles, was always pressing the King to bring that Church to a nearer Uniformity with that of England (23).

[M] Got Dr Laud put off with the Bishopric of St David's. ] So this matter is represented by A. Wood. 'This promotion of him [viz. Dr Laud,] (says Wood,) to the see of St David was done by the endeavours of Dr John Williams, fearing if he had not the said see, he would have been Dean of Westminster, which the said Williams kept in commendam with the see of Lincoln; whereby he shewed himself more a politician than a friend (24).' The same is hinted by Dr Heylin (25).—And Dr Laud himself, in his Diary says, that the general expectation at Court, was, that he should have been made Dean of Westminster and not Bishop of St David's. The whole passage is in these words: 'The King's gracious speech unto me, June 3, 1621. concerning my long service. He was pleased to say: 'He had given me nothing but Gloucester, which he well knew was a shell without a kernel. June 29, his Majesty gave me the grant of the Bishoprick of St

David's. The general expectation in Court was, that I should then have been made Dean of Westminster and not Bishop of St David's. The King gave me leave to hold the Presidentship of St John Baptist's Colledge in Oxon. in my commendam with the Bishoprick of St. David's (26).' From this whole passage it appears, That the King expressed great affection for him; and thought, he had not given him sufficient preferment, at least of any considerable value. Moreover, that he favoured him so much, as to permit him to keep the most agreeable part of his preferments, the Presidentship of St John's college.—On the other hand, Dr Laud's enemies represent the King as utterly averse to his promotion; 'assigning for reasons, Laud's marriage of the Lady Rich, and his urging the King not to rest at the five articles of Perth, &c. But the Duke of Buckingham, and especially Lord Keeper Williams, earnestly importuning K. James, and saying, how sorry Laud was for these, the King at last said, And is there no boe, but you will carry it! then take him to you; but on my soul you will repent it; and so went away in anger, using other fierce and ominous words (27).' Some ascribe his advancement to the mediation and disinterested sollicitations of the foresaid Lord Keeper, at the Duke's motion; and thence take occasion to aggravate Laud's ingratitude, for endeavouring to supplant and ruin his benefactor (28). However, it is really more probable, that Bp Williams did it not so much out of Kindness as to serve his own ends (29). As for the scandalous story told by R. Coke (30), upon Dr Laud's advancement to the Bishopric; it is as void of probability, as it is of common decency.

[N] Though Archbishop Abbot obstructed his rise as much as possible. ] This the Archbishop did, not only on account of the old grudge between them, but also because they differed in principle. For, the Archbishop was a rigid Calvinist, whereas 'Dr Laud was looked upon, in those times, as an Arminian, and a fierce opposer of Puritans (31),' whom the Archbishop loved and protected. Therefore he was much bent against Laud, judging him to be a man of too bold and hot a spirit for those times (32). And the same opinion was entertained of him by Judge Whitelock, who would say, 'He was too full of fire, though a just and good man; and that his want of Experience in state matters, and his too much zeal for the Church, and heat if he proceeded in the way he was then in, would set this nation on fire (33).'

had a conference with Fisher the Jesuit, before the Marquis of Buckingham, and his mother; in order to confirm them both in the Protestant religion, wherein they were then wavering: which conference was printed in 1624 (a). That brought an intimate acquaintance between him and the Marquis, whose special favourite and confessor he became (b) [P]; and to whom, 'tis feared, he made himself too much subservient [Q]. So that the Marquis left him his agent at Court, when he went over with the Prince into Spain (c); and frequently corresponded with him from thence (d). About October 1623, the Lord Keeper Williams's jealousy for the Duke of Buckingham's special favour towards Bishop Laud, or misunderstandings and misrepresentations on both sides from tale-bearers and busy-bodies [R], occasioned such violent quarrels and enmity between those two prelates, as were attended with the worst consequences (e). Archbishop Abbot resolving also to keep Bishop Laud down as long as he could, left him out of the High-Commission, of which the Bishop complained to the Duke of Buckingham, November 1, 1624, and then was put in (f). In September 1624, he opposed the sacrilegious design formed by the Duke of Buckingham, of appropriating the large endowment of the Charter-house to the maintenance of an army, under pretence of its being for the King's advantage, and the ease of the subject (g). And on the 23d of December following, he presented to him a tract drawn up at his request about Doctrinal Puritanism, in ten heads (h). He corresponded also with him, during his voyage into France, about the marriage of the Princess Henrietta-Maria with King Charles the First (i). That Prince, soon after his accession to the throne, wanting to regulate the number of his chaplains, and to know the principles and qualifications of the most eminent Divines in his kingdom, our Bishop was ordered to draw a list of them, which he distinguished by the letter O. for Orthodox, and P. for Puritans (k). At that King's coronation, February 2, 1625-6, he officiated as Dean of Westminster [S], in the room of Bishop Williams, who was then in disgrace (l): and is said to have altered the Coronation-oath (m) [T]. In 1636, he was translated from no preacher under the degree of a Bishop or Dean (and that only upon festivals) do take occasion, by the expounding of any text, to fall into any set course or common place, otherwise than by opening the coherence and division of his text, which shall not be comprehended within some one of the Articles of Religion, or some of the Homilies. 2. That no parson, lecturer, &c. shall preach any sermon upon sundays and holidays in the afternoons, but upon some part of the Catechism, or some text taken out of the Creed, Commandments, or the Lord's-prayer. 3. That no preacher, under the degree of a Bishop or Dean, do presume to preach in any popular auditory, the deep points of Predestination, Election, Reprobation, or of the Universality, Efficacy, Resistibility, or Irresistibility of God's Grace; but rather leave those themes to be handled by learned men, and that modestly and moderately, by use and application, rather than by way of positive doctrine, as being fitter for schools and universities, than for simple auditories. 4. That no preacher shall presume, in any auditory, to declare, limit, or bound by way of positive doctrine, in any lecture or sermon, the Power, Prerogative, Jurisdiction, Authority, or Duty of sovereign Princes, or therein meddle with matters of State, and reference between Princes and People, than as they are instructed in the Homily of Obedience, and in the rest of the Homilies and Articles of Religion: but rather confine themselves wholly to these two heads of Faith and Good Life, which are all the subject of the ancient sermons and homilies. 5. That no preacher shall causelessly, and without any invitation from the text, fall into any bitter invectives, and undecent railing speeches against the Papists or Puritans: but when they are occasioned thereunto by the text of Scripture, free both the Doctrine and Discipline of the Church of England from the aspersions of either adversary. 6. That the Archbishops and Bishops be more wary and choice in licensing of Preachers: And that all the Lecturers throughout the kingdom (a new body severed from the ancient Clergy of England, as being neither Parson, Vicar, or Curate) be licensed henceforward in the Court of Faculties, only upon recommendation of the party from the Bishop of the Diocese under his hand and seal, with a Fiat from the Archbishop of Canterbury, and a confirmation under the great Seal of England (34). These Directions, like the former, were aimed at the Puritans, and Lecturers; and occasioned great clamours amongst them (35). But they were necessary at a time when, 'Many shallow Preachers' handled the profound points of Predestination; 'wherein (pretending to guide their flocks) they lost themselves (36)'

[P] And confessor he became.] The memorandums

he hath entered in his Diary, upon that occasion, are in these words: 'June 9. being Whitunday, my Lord Marquess Buckingham was pleased to enter upon a near respect to me. The particulars are not for paper. June 15, I became C. to my Lord of Buckingham. And June 16, being Trinity-Sunday, he received the Sacrament at Greenwich (37).' Now, whether by C. the Bishop means Confessor or Chaplain, is not certain. W. Prynne hath printed it Confessor (38); and from thence P. Heylin hath taken it, and styles him so (39).

[Q] To whom, 'tis feared, he made himself too much subservient.] This is observed by Abp Abbot in his Narrative, not without some jealousy and bitterness.—'This man,' says he, 'is the only inward Counsellor with Buckingham, sitting with him sometimes privately whole hours, and feeding his humour with malice and spite (40).'

[R] Or misunderstandings and misrepresentations on both sides from tale bearers and busy-bodies.] It is well known, how great was the nation's uneasiness, upon Prince Charles's, and the Duke's, unadvised and simple journey to Spain: The Lord-Keeper, it seems, could not conceal his discontent, among the rest. And of all those practices Bp Laud sent an account to the Duke; who resolved to be revenged on the Lord-Keeper, and to take the first opportunity of displacing him. At least Williams imputed his disgrace to that, and charged Laud, upon this account, with the deepest ingratitude (41). 'Hereupon,' as Heylin expresses it (42), 'followed an estranging of the Duke's countenance from the Lord-Keeper Williams, and of his from the Bishop of St David's, whom he looked upon as one that stood in the way betwixt him and the Duke: with which the Duke was not long after made acquainted. But these displeasures were not only shewn in offended countenances, but brake out within a little time into sharp expostulations on either side.'

[S] At that King's coronation — he officiated as Dean of Westminster.] Bp Williams had orders to absent himself, and to depute one of the Prebendaries in his place. Now he was resolved not to name Bishop Laud, because he took him for his rival and his adversary; and to substitute one of a degree inferior to a Bishop, he thought would be taken ill by the court. Therefore to avoid being laugh'd at on the one hand, and censured on the other, he very prudently sends his Majesty a list of all the Prebendaries and their several dignities, and leaves it to him to choose whom he pleases; and immediately the King pitch'd upon Laud (43).

[T] And is said to have altered the Coronation-oath.] In order to form a true judgment of this invidious accusation, from St David's to the Bishopric of Bath and Wells [V]; and in 1628, to that of London (n) [W]. October 3, 1626, the King appointed him Dean of his royal chapel: and one of his Privy-Council, the 29th of April 1627 (o). He was in the commission for exercising archiepiscopal jurisdiction during Archbishop Abbot's sequestration (p). In the third Parliament of King Charles, he was voted to be one of the favourers of the Arminians [*W*], and one justly suspected to be unfound in his opinions that way: accordingly, accusation, we shall, first, lay before the reader, what appeared to us, upon collating the oath said to have been taken by K. Charles I, with the most ancient form we could meet with: Next, just take notice of what was alledged against Bishop Laud upon that article, and by whom: and then set down what he pleads in his own defence. Upon comparing, therefore the oath taken by K. Charles I. as set down by Rushworth (44), with the most ancient in print, which is that of Edward II (45); we observe this difference. At the end of article the first, after the words your predecessor, there is added in the form used by K. Charles I. — 'according to the laws of God, the true profession of the Gospel established in this kingdom, and agreeable to the Prerogative of the Kings thereof, and the antient customs of the realm.' And after the end of the fourth article, one of the Bishops read this passage to the King. 'Our Lord and King, we beseech you to pardon and to grant, and to preferve unto us, and to the Churches committed to our charge, all canonical Privileges, and due law and justice; and that you would protect and defend us, as every good King in his kingdoms ought to be protector and defender of the Bishops, and the churches under their government.' Then the King being conducted by the nobility to the throne, this passage was read to his Majesty. 'Stand and hold fast from henceforth the place, to which you have been heir by the Succession of your forefathers, heing now delivered to you by the authority of Almighty God, and by the hands of us, and all the bishops and servants of God: and as you see the Clergy to come nearer the Altar than others, so remember that (in all places convenient) you give them greater honor, than the Mediator of God and Man may establish you in the kingly throne to be a Mediator betwixt the Clergy and the Laity; and that you may reign for ever with Jesus Christ, the king of kings, and lord of lords.' Such is the difference between the Coronation-oath of K. Charles I. and that of Edward II. But whether there was not the same difference in the Coronation-oath of K. Charles's predecessors, especially since the Reformation, remains a Quære.—However Bp Laud was charged by W. Lilly (46), with having 'altered the old Coronation-oath, and framed another new:' by an anonymous author of the Life of King Charles (47), with having 'purposely emaculated it:' by W. Prynne, his inveterate enemy (48), with having inserted in it the words, agreeable to the King's Prerogative, and omitted these other words, which the people have chosen, or shall chuse. And the same accusation was repeated in his Tryal (49). Many years after, he was likewise charged by the Lord Chief Baron Atkins (50), of striking out of the ancient Coronation-oath, 'that the King should consent to such Laws, as the People should chosse;' and, instead of that, inserting this other very unusual one, 'Saving the King's Prerogative-royal,' which his Lordship visibly horrified from W. Prynne.—Now, let us hear what the Archbishop had to say in his own defence. He says, therefore (51), that he was 'charged with two alterations in the body of the King's Oath. One added, namely these words, agreeable to the King's Prerogative: the other omitted, namely these words, quæ populus elegerit, which the people have chosen, or shall chosse. For this latter, the clause omitted, that suddenly vanished: for it was omitted in the oath of King James, as is confessed by themselves in the printed votes of this present Parliament (52). But the other highly insisted on, as taking off the total assurance which the subjects have by the oath of their Prince for the performance of his Laws. 1. I humbly conceive this clause takes off none of the peoples assurance; none at all. For the King's just and legal Prerogative, and the Subjects assurance for Liberty and Property may stand well together, and have so stood for hundreds of years. 2. That alteration, whatever it be, was not made by me; nor is there any interlining or alteration so much as of a Letter found in that book. 3. If any thing be amiss therein, my predecessor (53) gave that oath to the King, and not I. I was merely ministerial, both in the preparation, and at the Coronation itself, supplying the place of the Dean of Westminster. After this day's work [the eleventh day of his Tryal] was ended, it instantly spread all over the city, that I had altered the King's oath at his coronation, and from thence into all parts of the kingdom; as if all must be true which was said at the bar against me, what answer forever I made. The people and some of the Synod now crying out, that this one thing was enough to take away my life. And though this was all that was charged this day concerning this oath, yet seeing how this fire took, I thought fit the next day that I came to the bar, to desire that the hooks of the Coronation of former Kings, especially those of Queen Elizabeth and King James, might be seen and compared, and the copies brought into the Court, both from the Exchequer, and such as were in my study at Lambeth: and a fuller inquisition made into the business: in regard I was as innocent from this crime, as when my mother bare me into the world. A salvo was entred for me upon this. And every day that I after came to the bar, I called upon this business. But somewhat or other was still pretended by them which managed the evidence, that I could not get the books to be brought forth, nor any thing to be done, 'till almost the last day of my hearing. Then no books could be found in the Exchequer, nor in my study, but only that of King James; whereas, when the keys were taken from me, there were divers hooks there, as is confessed in the printed Votes of this parliament*: and one of them with a watchet fattin cover now missing. And whether this of King James (had not my secretary, who knew the book, seen it drop out of Mr Prynne's hag) would not have been concealed too, I cannot tell. At last the book of King James his coronation, and the other urged against me concerning King Charles, were seen and compared openly in the Lords house, and found to be the same oath in both, and no interlining or alteration in the book charged against me.'

[W] And in 1628 to that of London.] The King gave him a grant of it, June 17, 1627, (upon the intended removal of his predecessor Dr Geo. Montaigne to Durham,) but he was not translated 'till July 15, 1628 (55). (54) Diary, under those days.

[*W*] He was voted to be one of the favourers of the Arminians.] Upon that occasion he made the following entry into his Diary (57), June 14: — The house of Commons were making their Remonstrance to the King. Therein they named the Bishop of Winchester [Neile] and myself. One in the house stood up and said: Now we have named these persons, let us think of some causes why we did it. Sir Edw. Cooke answered, Have we not named my Lord of Buckingham without shewing a cause, and may we not be as bold with them? It were to be wish'd, for the honour of the English senate, that they had duly examin'd the genuine Principles and Opinions of the Arminians, before they had ventur'd to condemn them. But what wrong notions were formed of them by the then House of Commons, will appear from the following sample; being part of a speech made 26 January, 1628, by Francis Rouse, afterwards Provost of Eaton, author of Mella Patrum, and Speaker of Oliver Cromwell's Parliament. - - - 'I desire, (says he) that we may consider the increase of Arminianism, an error that makes the Grace of God lackey it after the will of man, that ingly, his name was inserted as such in the Commons Remonstrance (q). And because he was thought to be the maker of the King's Speeches, and of the Duke of Buckingham's answer to his impeachment, &c. (r), it raised a very great clamour against him; and so exposed him to popular rage, that his life was threatened (s) [X]. About the same time, he was put into an ungracious office; namely, in a commission for raising monies by impositions or otherwise; which the Commons called Excises: but it seems never to have been executed (t). Amidst all his employments, his care did not slacken towards the place of his education, the university of Oxford; for, in order to stop and rectify the factious and tumultuary manner of electing the Proctors, he fixed them to the several colleges, according to rotation. And caused to be collected and put in order, the broken, crossing, and imperfect statutes of that university, which had lain some hundreds of years in a confused heap (u). On the 12th of April 1630, he was elected Chancellor of the same university (w); which he made it his business, the rest of his life, to adorn with buildings [Z], and to enrich with the most valuable manuscripts, and other books [Z]. After the Duke of Buckingham's fatal murder, our Bishop became chief favourite to King Charles; which augmented indeed his power and interest, but increased at the same time the envy and jealousy against him, which were already too strong (x). In order to stop the too frequent disputes concerning God's Decrees, he advised his Majesty, that the 39 Articles might be reprinted, with a Royal Declaration at the head of them; which has been mostly prefixed to them ever since. But it was much exclaimed against by some of the rigid Calvinists [AA]; as were also some Instructions published soon after, relating to

' makes the Sheep to keep the Shepherd, and makes a mortal feed of an immortal God. Yea, I desire that we may look into the very belly and bowels of this Trojan horse, to see if there be not men in it ready to open the gates to Romish tyranny, and Spanish monarchy: for an Arminian is the spawn of a Papist, and if there come the warmth of favour upon him, you shall see him turn into one of those frogs that rise out of the bottomless pit; and if you mark it well, you shall see an Arminian reaching out his hand to a Papist, a Papist to a Jesuite, a Jesuite gives one hand to the Pope, another to the King of Spain, and these men having kindled a fire in our neighbour-country, now they have brought some of it over hither to set on flame this kingdom also; yea, let us further search and consider, whether these be not the men, that break in upon the Goods and Liberties of this commonwealth, for by this means they make way for the taking away of our Religion (58).—Strange it is, that any one should have the privilege of venting such notorious and palpable untruths in so august an assembly! James Van Harmin, or Arminius, was as far distant from Popery, as Gomarus, or any other of his most zealous opposers. So was the excellent Philip à Limborch, &c. And so were those eminent English Divines in the last century, who dared to make use of their reason, and, after a due examination, embraced Van Harmin's opinions about Predestination and Grace. But the true reason why they, and their doctrines, were condemned in the gross, is because they were unpopular men, and looked upon as tools to the Court. And such was the common cant of the Times. Atheism, Popery, Arminianism, and Heresy, were usually yoked together; tho' in truth Arminianism and Popery have no more connexion with one another than Calvinism and Popery. And, if the Arminians agreeing upon that point with some Papiests, is a sign of Popery; so is it, for the very same reason, a sign of Popery in the Calvinists. Since the Calvinists agree therein with the Dominicans and Janfenists, as much as the Arminians do with the Jesuits and Franciscans. And, what is a good or a bad sign, false or true reasoning, in one case, or in one set of people, is equally the same in the other. This, zealots of all parties are not aware of: but, to disguise or blind their knavery, they make it a standing custom to blacken and misrepresent those who are not of the same opinion with themselves. A most ungenerous as well as unjust proceeding! To conclude this note, we shall beg leave to ask, What right Mr J. Calvin, and his followers had, or ever can have, to give laws to the whole Christian Church? and why the other opinions ought not to be tolerated, at least, with meekness and patience?

[X] That his life was threatened. For a paper was found in the Dean of St Paul's yard to this effect; 'Laud, look to thy self; be assured thy life is sought. As thou art the fountain of all wickedness, repent thee of thy monstrous sins, before thou be taken out of the world, &c. And assure thyself,

' neither God nor the world can endure such a vile Councillor to live, or such a whisperer; or to this effect.' Upon which the Bishop makes this soliloquy. 'Lord, I am a grievous sinner; but I beseech thee, deliver my soul from them that hate me without a cause (59).'

[Y] To adorn with buildings. He began with the place of his education, St John's college; where he built the inner Quadrangle, (except part of the fourth side of it, which was the old Library) in a solid and elegant manner. The first stone was laid 23d July, 1631. He gave also several MSS. to the library, and 500*l.* by will to the college (60). Next, being resolved to free St Mary's church from the inconveniences and profanation, which the continual keeping of the Public Convocations and Congregations in it must be attended with, (for they were then held in that church,) he erected a stately and most elegant pile at the west end of the Divinity-school and Bodleian library: the lower part whereof, was for the keeping of the Convocations and other public meetings of the University: and the upper part, opening into the public Library, was for the reception of Books; in which are deposited his own MSS. Mr Selden's library, &c.—He had also projected, to clear the great square between St Mary's church and the schools; where now stands the Ratcliff library: and to have raised a fair and capacious room, upon pillars; the upper part to serve for Convocations and Congregations; the lower for a walk or place of conference, in which students of all sorts might confer together, when they resorted to the schools, the library, or upon any other public occasion. But the owners of the houses there not being willing to part with them, he was forced to drop that grand design (61).

[Z] And to enrich with the most valuable manuscripts, &c. He gave, at several times, to the University Thirteen hundred MSS. in Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, Ægyptian, Æthiopian, Armenian, Arabic, Persian, Turkish, Russian, Chinese, Japonese, Greek, Latin, Italian, French, Saxon, English, and Irish: as the inscription in the Bodleian library testifies (62). An invaluable collection, procured at a prodigious expence *

[AA] But it was much exclaimed against by some of the rigid Calvinists. Particularly they took exception at the following passage in it. — In these both curious and unhappy differences which have for many hundred years, in different times and places, exercised the Church of Christ, we will that all further curious search be laid aside, and these disputes be shut up in God's promises, as they be generally set forth unto us in holy Scriptures; and the general meaning of the Articles of the Church of England according to them. And that no man hereafter shall either Print or Preach to draw the Article aside any way, but shall submit to it in the plain and full meaning thereof: and shall not put his own sense or comment to be the meaning of the Article, but shall take it in the literal and grammatical sense.

to Bishops and Lecturers (y) [BB]. Nor was the repair of St Paul's cathedral, which he undertook, better approved of, though much wanted; nay, it was afterwards imputed to him as a crime (z). And so was likewise his consecration of St Catherine-cree church: which he performed January 16, 1630-31 (a) [CC]. About the same time, he undertook to overthrow the most useful and charitable Feoffment, which some persons had newly formed, of buying Impropriations [DD], for the maintenance of Lecturers (b). Upon the decline of Archbishop Abbot's health and favour at Court, Bishop Laud's concurrence, if not over-wardness, in the very severe prosecutions carried on in the high-commission and star-chamber, against several peevish and ill-natured scribblers, or simple preachers, &c. [EE], did him great prejudice in most peoples minds. But his prosecution

—So alarmed at it were the Calvinist Divines, that they drew up a Petition, wherein they complained of the Restraints they were laid under by his Majesty's forbidding them to preach the saving Doctrines of God's Free Grace in Election, and Predestination to Eternal Life, according to the seventeenth Article of the Church, &c. (63). And the Parliament meeting soon after, this Declaration occasioned several speeches in the House of Commons, wherein it appears to have been greatly misunderstood and misrepresented (64). After which the Commons, to be even with the King and the Declaration, entered into this uncommon Vow. 'We the Commons in Parliament assembled, do claim, protest, and avow for Truth, the sense of the Articles of Religion, which were established by Parliament in the thirteenth year of our late Queen Elizabeth, which by the publick Act of the Church of England, and by the general and current Expositions of the Writers of our Church, have been delivered unto us. And we reject the sense of the Jesuits, and Arminians, and all others wherein they differ from us (65).' A notable piece! full of Intolerance; should not the Commons, instead of confining the interpretation of the Articles to the Calvinistical sense alone, and to that which was put upon some of them by that exploded nonsense the Lambeth articles; have rather examined, or taken time to examine, whether the Interpretation which the Arminians gave of the Five Points, was not more consistent with God's Nature and Attributes, nor more agreeable to the true Design of St Paul, and other places of Scripture, than that of St Austin, and his followers the Calvinists? That would have been acting like rational Persons, and true Protestants.—But it is to be remembred, that this Vow was no Act of Parliament.

[BB] As were also some Instructions - - - relating to Bishops and Lecturers.] The 1st and 2d enjoined the Bishops residence in their several Sees. 3d. That they give charge, That the Declaration for settling all Questions in difference, be strictly observed by all parties. 5th. With regard to the Lecturers, That in all Parishes the afternoon Sermons be turned into Catechising by question and answer: That every Lecturer do read divine service according to the Liturgy, in his surplice, and before the lecture: That where a Lecture is set up in a market-town, it may be read by a company of grave and orthodox Divines near adjoining; and that they preach in their gowns, and not in cloaks: That if a Corporation do maintain a single Lecturer, he be not suffered to preach 'till he profess his willingness to take upon him a Living with cure of souls, within that incorporation; and that he do actually take such benefice so soon as the same shall be fairly procured for him (66).

[CC] And so was likewise his consecration of St Catherine-Cree church.] Great exceptions were taken at the formality thereof, as Mr Rushworth testifies (67): and, among other things, it was made one head of accusation against him at his Tryal, 'That at the beginning he took up dust, and threw it in the air, and after used divers curses: and that Spargere cinerem is in the form of consecration used in the Pontifical.' But the Archbishop declared, in his own vindication, that 'there was no throwing up of dust, no curses used throughout the whole action: nor, (says he) did I follow the Pontifical, but a copy of learned and reverend Bishop Andrews, by which he consecrated divers churches in his time; and that this is so, I have the copy by me to witness it, and offer'd to shew it. No;' said the Counsel against him, 'but the Treason is, To seek by these ceremonies, to overthrow the Religion established.' To which the Archbishop replied, 'Nor was that ever 'fought by me: and God of his mercy preserve the true Protestant religion amongst us, 'till the consecration of churches, and reverence in the church, can overthrow it; and then I doubt not, but by God's blessing, it shall continue safe to the world's end (68).'

[DD] Of buying Impropriations.] This design was first set on foot about the year 1626, by Dr Preston and other Puritans. And their resolution was, to set up stipendiary Lectures in all or most Market towns, especially Burghs. For the maintenance of which, they proposed to buy such Impropriated Tithes as remained in lay-hands, by a standing collection among well-disposed and charitable persons. To that end they erected a Feoffment, or kind of Corporation, amongst themselves, consisting of Twelve persons, viz. Four Divines, Dr William Gouge, Dr Richard Sibbs, G. Ospring, J Davenport: Four Lawyers, Ralph Eyre, S. Brown, C. Sherland, John White: Four Citizens of London, John Geering, Richard Davis, George Harwood, Francis Bridges: to whom was added afterwards Rowland Heylyn, Alderman of London, by the name of Treasurer to the Company, that they might have a casting vote among them, as occasion served. So successfully did they go on, that it was verily believed, within fifty years rather Purchases than Money would have been wanting; the Impropriations being then generally bought at or under twelve years purchase (69). But Bishop Laud looking upon that project with a jealous eye, as dangerous both to Church and State, caused it to be overthrown by an Information in the Exchequer, because it was not confirmed by letters-patent. He says, he 'was clearly of opinion, that this was a cunning way, under a glorious pretence, to overthrow the Church government by the fees getting into their power more dependency of the Clergy, than the King, and all the Peers, and all the Bishops in all the Kingdom.' He adds, that 'this way did not stand either with his judgment or conscience. 1. Because little or nothing was given by them to the present Incumbent, to whom the Tythes were due, if to any. 2. Because most of the men they put in, were persons disaffected to the Discipline, if not the Doctrine too of the Church of England. 3. Because no small part was given to school-masters, to season youth ab ovo, for their party: and to young students in the universities, to purchase them and their judgments to their side. 4. Because all this power to breed and maintain a faction, was in the hands of twelve men, who were they never never so honest, and free from thoughts of abusing this power to fill the Church with Schism, yet who should be successors, and what use should be made of this power, was out of humane reach to know (70).' But this very last reason should have induced the Archbishop not to overthrow that charity; for, if at one time it was in schismatical hands, it might at another time have devolved into quite other hands; and greatly increased the revenues of the Church, which was his Grace's favourite scheme.

[EE] Against several peevish and ill-natured scribblers, &c.] Particularly one Alexander Leighton, who had published 'An Appeal to the Parliament, or Sion's Plea against the Prelacy.' Wherein he terms the Prelates men of blood, and enemies to God and the State; and affirms, that we do not read of greater persecutions, or higher indignity done upon God's people, in any nation, than in this island; that the Prelacy is antichristian and satanical, and the Bishops ravens and pye-maggots that prey upon the State; therefore he advises to kill them all, by smiting them under the fifth rib. Kneeling at the Sacrament he calls the received spawn of the Beast. And he styles the Queen a Canaanite, the daughter of Heth, an idolatress. He

On the 13th of May 1633, he set out from London, to attend King Charles who was going to be crowned in Scotland: the 15th of June, he was sworn a Privy-Counsellor for that kingdom; and on the 26th of July came back to Fulham (d). During his stay in Scotland, he formed the resolution of bringing that Church to an exact conformity with the Church of England; and the King committed the framing of a Liturgy to a select number of Scottish Bishops [FF]. 'Having, as Fuller expresses it (e), endeavoured to supplant Archbishop Abbot, whom 'he could not be contented to succeed;' upon his death in August 1633, our Bishop was appointed his successor in the Archbishopric of Canterbury [GG]. That very morning, viz. August 4, there came one to him at Greenwich, seriously (and that avowed ability to perform it) with the offer of a Cardinal's hat: which offer was repeated again the 17th of the same month. And his answer, both times, was, 'That somewhat dwelt within 'him, which would not suffer that, 'till Rome were other than it is (f) [HH].' September 14, he was elected Chancellor of the university of Dublin (g). One of his first acts, after his advancement to the Archbishopric, was an injunction, October 18, pursuant to the King's letter, That no clergyman should be ordained Priest without a Title (b) [II]. At the same time came out his Majesty's Declaration about Lawful Sports (i) [KK]; which the Archbishop was charged with having revived and enlarged (k); and that brought a great odium upon him, among the Sabbatarians and other Puritans, though, as he observes, 'at Geneva, after evening prayer, the elder men bowl, and the 'younger commends him that killed the Duke of Buckingham, and encourages others to do the like, &c. For this libel he was fined 10,000*l.* pilloried, whipt, had his ears cut off, and his nose slit (71). Too severe a punishment, for one who rather deserved to be lodged in Bethlem hospital! — Nath. Bernard, Lecturer of St Sepulchre's, London, was also question'd in the High-commission, for delivering, in a sermon before the university of Cambridge, smart passages against the introducing of Pelagian errors and Romish superstitions into our Church. His Text was 1 Sam. iv. 21. He was fined 1000*l.* and suspended; and refusing to recant, was imprisoned (72). — Mr. Charles Chancy, Vicar of Ware, was likewise questioned in the same court, for saying in a sermon, 'That Idolatry was admitted into 'the Church; and that there is such Atheism, Popery, 'Arminianism, and Heresy crept into the Church (73). — To which may be added the prosecution of Henry Sherfield, Esq; Recorder of Salisbury, for his ignorant zeal, in breaking some painted glass in the windows of St Edmund's church in that city (74).

[FF] And the King committed the framing of a Liturgy to a select number of Scottish Bishops.] It is to be remembered, that at the first alteration of Religion in the Kirk of Scotland, the Scots petitioning Qu. Elizabeth for aid to expel the French out of their country, obliged themselves by the subscription of their hands to embrace the Liturgy, rites, and ceremonies of the Church of England †. According to which, an ordinance was made by the Scottish Reformers, that in all parishes of that realm the Common prayer should be read weekly on Sundays and other festival-days. But, during K. James's minority, the Liturgy was thrust out by the Calvinistical fashion of extemporary Prayers. That Prince, after the restoration of Episcopacy, took also proper measures for the reordering of the English service-book in Scotland. It not being done at his death, his successor K. Charles I. called upon the Scottish bishops to have it done. Accordingly they dispatched to Court, in 1629, Dr John Maxwell, one of the preachers in Edenborough, afterwards Bishop of Ross. The King referred him to Dr Laud then Bishop of London, with this message, 'That it was his Majesty's pleasure, that he [Bishop 'Laud] should receive instructions from some Bishops of Scotland concerning a Liturgy for that 'Church; and that he was employed from Dr Spotswood Archbishop of St Andrews, and other Prelates there about it. Bp Laud told him, he was clear of opinion, that if his Majesty would have a Liturgy 'settled there, it were best to take the English Liturgy without any variation, that so the same service-book might be established in all his Majesty's 'dominions: which he thought would have been a 'great happiness to the State, and a great honour and 'safety to Religion. To this Dr Maxwell replied, 'that he was of a contrary opinion, and that not he only, but the Bishops of that kingdom thought their 'countrymen would be much better satisfied, if a Liturgy were framed by their own Clergy, than to 'have the English Liturgy put upon them; yet he 'added, that it might be according to the form of our 'English Service-book (75). The King inclined to 'have the English Service-book established in Scotland: and in this condition Bp Laud held that business, for two if not three years at least. Afterwards the Scottish Bishops still pressing the King, that a Liturgy framed by themselves, and in some 'few things different from ours, would relish better 'with their countrymen; they at last prevailed with his Majesty, to have it so, and carried it against Bp 'Laud, notwithstanding all he could say or do to the 'contrary. Then his Majesty commanded him to 'give the Bishops of Scotland his best assistance in this 'work. He obeyed with no small reluctance: but 'wheresoever he had any doubt, he did not only acquaint his Majesty with it, but writ down most of 'the amendments or alterations in his Majesty's presence (76). The Scottish Bishops who framed the Liturgy, were Dr Spotswood, Archbishop of St Andrews; Dr Patrick Lyndsey, Archbishop of Glasgow; Dr James Wedderburne, Bishop of Dumblane; Dr John Guthrie, Bishop of Murray; Dr John Maxwell, Bishop of Ross; and Dr Walter Whiteford, Bishop of Brechin (77).

[GG] Our bishop was appointed his successor in the Archbishopric of Canterbury.] News came to Court, August 4, of the Archbishop's death; and the King resolved presently to give the Archbishopric to Bishop Laud: which he did Aug. 6. He was elected Aug. 19. and confirmed Septemb. 19 (78).

[HH] And his answer both times was, &c.] Mr Whitelock assigns the following reason for his refusal (79); because he was, 'as high already as England could advance him, and he would not be second to any in another kingdom.'

[II] That no clergyman should be ordained Priest without a Title.] That is, without a certainty of some immediate maintenance; and not be reduced to the necessity of becoming itinerant, and (as too often happens) indigent and scandalous, Ministers. A sufficient Title for Orders, by Canon 33, is, a Presentation to an ecclesiastical preferment actually void; some cure, or minister's place, vacant, either in a cathedral or collegiate church; a Fellowship or Chaplainship in a college; or the being a Master of Arts in either university of five years standing, and living there at his own charge. — The end of the Injunction now given, was to hinder the Lecturers which were at that time so much in fashion, from getting into orders; a Lecture not being admitted as a Canonical Title: and likewise to restrain private gentlemen, not qualified by law, from keeping trencher-chaplains in their houses, as Dr Heylin expresses it (80).

' younger train (l);' and our good Puritan neighbours the Dutch profane the Sunday with plays and interludes, and count themselves blameless. However, very blameable is certainly such a practice: and so were the vexatious prosecutions of such clergymen as refused to read the Declaration aforesaid in their churches (m). In the years 1634, 1635, &c. the Archbishop, by his Vicar-general, performed his Metropolitan Vifitation; wherein, among other things, the Churchwardens in every parish were enjoined, To remove the Communion-table from the middle, to the east end of the chancel, altar-wise [*KK*]; the ground being raised for that purpose: and to fence it with decent rails, to avoid prophaneness. Those that refused to do so, were prosecuted in the high-commission or star-chamber-courts (n). In that vifitation, the Dutch and Walloon congregations were summoned to appear; and enjoined, such as were born in England, to repair to the several parish churches where they inhabited, to hear divine service and sermons, and perform all duties and payments required in that behalf: and those of them, ministers or others, that were aliens born, to use the English Liturgy, translated into French or Dutch (o) [LL]. Many, rather than comply, chose to leave the kingdom, to the great detriment of our manufactures (p). This year, the Archbishop did the poor Irish clergy a very important service, by obtaining for them from the King, a grant of all the impropriations that were then remaining in the Crown (q). He also improved and settled the revenues of the London-clergy in a better manner than they were before (r). February 5, 1634-5, he was put into the great Committee of Trade, and the King's revenue, and, the 14th of March following, appointed one of the Commissioners of the Treasury [MM], upon the death of Richard Weston Earl of Portland: besides which, he was, two days after, called into the foreign Committee (s); and had likewise the sole disposal of whatsoever concerned the Church (t). But he fell into very warm disputes with the Lord Cottington Chancellor of the Exchequer, who took all opportunities of imposing upon him (u) [NN]. After having continued a year Commissioner of the

Treasury,

[*KK*] To remove the Communion table from the middle, to the east end of the chancel, altar-wise. At the time of our Reformation from the errors of Popery, on purpose to divert people's minds from considering the Lord's-supper as a Sacrifice; the name of Altar was turn'd into Table, and it was ordered to be removed from the east end to another part of the chancel. This appears from one of Bishop Ridley's Injunctions, in 1550; being in these words: 'Whereas in divers places, some use the Lord's Board, after the form of a Table, and some of an Altar, whereby dissention is perceived to arise among the unlearned; therefore wishing a godly unity to be observed in all our dioceses; and for that the form of a Table may more move and turn the simple from the old superstitious opinions of the Popish mass, and to the right use of the Lord's-supper, We exhort the Curats, Churchwardens, and Questmen, to erect and set up the Lord's Board, after the form of an honest Table, decently covered, in such place, of the Quire or Chancel, as shall be thought most meet by their discretion and agreement, so that the Ministers, with the Communicants, may have their place separated from the rest of the people (81).' Accordingly the Altars were thus removed in most places. But Archbishop Laud observing, that by this situation they were liable to several prophanations; as for instance, That the Churchwardens kept their accounts, and dispatched parish-business upon them; Schoolmasters taught boys to write upon them, who laid their hats, fatchels, and books thereon: many sat, and lean'd irreverently against them during sermon-time; dogs piss'd against them, and otherwise defiled them; Glafers mending windows there, knock'd them full of nail-holes, &c. (82); the Archbishop, I say, observing this, ordered the Tables to be remov'd close to the east-wall, with the ends north and south, and to be rail'd in to avoid the like prophanations. But this alteration was attended with violent and unreasonable opposition on one hand, and too severe prosecutions on the other. And all might have been easily prevented or accommodated only by this plain expedient; that is, by setting out the Communion-table, on Sacrament-days, in the middle or some convenient place of the Chancel, and keeping it at other times within rails where the Altar had stood; conformably to Qu. Elizabeth's injunctions (83). But in those miserable Times there was no Moderation on either side.

[LL] To use the English Liturgy, translated into French or Dutch. The reasons he assigns for intermeddling with those congregations, are, '1. That their living as they did, and standing so strictly to their own Discipline, wrought upon the party in England, which were addicted to them, and made them more averse, than otherwise they would have been, to the present Government of the Church of England.

2. That by this means they lived in England, as if they were a kind of God's Israel in Egypt, to the great dishonour of the Church of England, to which at first they fled for shelter against persecution. - - - But by this favour which that Church received, it grew up and incroached upon us, 'till it became a Church within a Church, and a kind of state within a state. And this (says he) I ever held dangerous, bow small beginning soever it had.— 3. That they live here, and enjoy all freedom, and yet for the most part scorn so much as to learn the language, or to converse with any, more than for advantage of bargaining. And will take no Englishman to be their apprentice, nor teach them any of their manufactures. 4. That for Religion, if after so many descents of their children born in the land, and so Native Subjects, these children of theirs should refuse to pray and communicate with the Church of England, into whose bosom their parents fled at first for succour; I thought then (says he) and do still, that no state could in safety, or would in wisdom endure it. And this concerning their Children, was all that was desired of me—(84).'

[MM] Appointed one of the Commissioners of the Treasury. Dr Heylin gives us the following account of his promotion to that post. 'About the year 1631, he first discovered how ill his Majesties Treasury had been managed between some principal officers of his Revenue, to the enriching of themselves, and the impoverishing of their Master. But the abuses being too great to be long concealed, his Majesty is made acquainted with all particulars, who thereupon did much estrange his countenance from the principal of them. For which good service to the King none was so much suspected by them as Archbishop Laud, against whom they began to practise, endeavouring all they could, to remove him from his Majesties ear, or at the least to lessen the esteem and reputation which his fidelity and upright dealing had procured him. But still he kept his ground, and prevailed at last.' - - - For, upon the death of Weston Earl of Portland, he was appointed a Commissioner of the Treasury, jointly with 'Sir Fr. Cottington Chancellor of the Exchequer, J. Cooke, Esq; and Sir Francis Windebank, Principal Secretaries of State, and certain others; who with no small envy looked upon him as if he had been set over them for a Supervisor (85).'

[NN] He fell into warm disputes with Cottington, who took all opportunities of imposing upon him. The Lord Clarendon gives a flagrant instance of it; and with such circumstances as seem almost improbable. The substance of it is thus: K. Charles I. 'who was excessively affected to hunting, and the sports of the field, had a great desire to make a great park, for red as well as fallow deer, between Richmond and

Treasury, and acquainted himself with the mysteries, and the advantages of it [O O], he procured the Lord-Treasurer's staff for Dr William Juxon (w); who had, through his interest, been successively advanced to the Presidentship of St John's college, Deanery of Worcester, Clerkship of his Majesty's closet, and Bishopric of London (x). But that sudden and unexpected promotion greatly discontented many of the Laity [P P]. Besides and Hampton-court, where he had large wastes of his own, and great parcels of wood, which made it very fit for the use he design'd it to: but as some parishes had commons in those wastes, so, many gentlemen and farmers had good houses, and good farms intermingled with those wastes, of their own inheritance, or for their lives, or years; and without taking them into the park, it would not be of the largeness, or for the use propos'd. His Majesty desir'd to purchase those lands, and was very willing to give more for them than any body else would, if they had been to be sold; and so he employ'd his own Surveyor, and other of his officers to treat with the owners. The major part were in a short time prevailed with, but many very obstinately refused; especially a gentleman who had the best estate there, with a convenient house and gardens; and the King being as earnest to compass it; it made a great noise, as if the King would take away mens estates at his own pleasure. Bishop Juxon, who was Treasurer, and the Lord Cottington, Chancellor of the Exchequer, were, from the first, very averse from the design, not only for the murmur of the people, but because the purchase of the land, and the making a brick-wall about so large a parcel of ground (for it is near ten miles about) would cost a greater sum of money, than they could easily provide, or than they thought ought to be sacrificed to such an occasion: and the Lord Cottington (who was more solicited by the country people) took the business most to heart, and endeavour'd by all the ways he could, and by frequent importunities, to divert his Majesty from pursuing it, and put all delays, he could well do, in the bargains which were to be made; till the King grew very angry with him, and told him "He was resolv'd to go through with it, and had already caused Brick to be burn'd, and much of the wall to be built upon his own land:" upon which Cottington thought fit to acquiesce. The building of the wall before people consented to part with their land, or their common, look'd to them as if by degrees they should be shut out from both, and increas'd the murmur and noise of the people, who were not concern'd as well as of them who were: and it was too near London not to be the common discourse. Archbishop Laud (who desir'd exceedingly that the King should be possess'd as much of the hearts of the people as was possible, at least that they should have no just cause to complain) meeting with it, resolv'd to speak of it to the King; which he did; and receiv'd such an answer from him, that he thought his Majesty rather not inform'd enough of the inconveniences and mischiefs of the thing, than positively resolv'd not to desist from it. Whereupon one day he took the Lord Cottington aside, and, according to his natural custom, spake with great warmth against it, and told him, "He should do very well to give the King good counsel, and to withdraw him from a resolution, in which his honour and justice was so much call'd in question." Cottington answer'd him very gravely, "That the thing design'd was very lawful, and he thought the King resolv'd very well, since the place lay so conveniently for his winter exercise, and that he should by it not be compell'd to make so long journeys, as he us'd to do, in that season of the year, for his sport, and that no body ought to dissuade him from it." The Archbishop instead of finding a concurrence from him, as he expected, seeing himself reproach'd upon the matter for his opinion, grew into much passion, telling him, "Such men as he would ruin the King, and make him lose the affections of his subjects; that for his own part as he had begun, so he would go on to dissuade the King from proceeding in so ill a counsel, and that he hop'd it would appear who had been his counsellor." Cottington glad to see him so soon hot, and resolv'd to inflame him more, very calmly reply'd to him, "That he thought a man could not, with a good conscience, hinder the King from pursuing his resolutions, and that it could not but proceed from

"want of Affection to his person, and he was not sure that it might not be high-treason." The other, upon the wildness of his discourse, in great anger ask'd him, "Why? from whence he had receiv'd that doctrine?" he said with the same temper, "They who did not wish the King's health, could not love him; and they who went about to hinder his taking recreation, which preserv'd his health, might be thought, for ought he knew, guilty of the highest crimes." Upon which the Archbishop in great rage, and with many reproaches left him, and either presently, or upon the next opportunity, told the King "That he now knew who was his great counsellor for making his park, and that he did not wonder that men durst not represent any arguments to the contrary, or let his Majesty know how much he suffer'd in it, when such principles in divinity, and law, were laid down to terrify them;" and so recounted to him the conference he had with the Lord Cottington, bitterly inveighing against him and his doctrine, mentioning him with all the sharp reproaches imaginable, and beseeching his Majesty, "That his counsel might not prevail with him," taking some pains to make his conclusions appear very false and ridiculous. The King said no more, but "My Lord, you are deceiv'd, Cottington is too hard for you; upon my word, he hath not only dissuaded me more, and given more reasons against this business, than all the men in England have done, but hath really obstructed the work by not doing his duty, as I commanded him, for which I have been very much displeas'd with him: you see how unjustly your passion hath transported you." By which representation the Archbishop found he had been much abus'd, and repented it accordingly (86). As this same Park has occasioned much discourse of late; and as the account here given fully displays the Archbishop's disposition; and amply confirms what it is brought to prove; we hope the reader will not be displeas'd with this extract.

[OO] And acquainted himself with the mysteries and the advantages of it ] That great place, he found, was then honestly worth seven thousand pounds a year, without defrauding the King, or abusing the subject. And observing, that several Treasurers of late years had rais'd themselves from very mean and private fortunes to the titles and estates of Earls, which he conceived could not be done without wrong to both; therefore he resolv'd to recommend such a man to the King for next Lord Treasurer, who having no family to raise, no wife and children to provide for, might better manage the incomes of the Treasury to the King's advantage than they had been formerly. And such a man in his opinion was Dr Juxon (87).

[PP] But that sudden and unexpected promotion greatly discontented many of the Laity.] My Lord Clarendon informs us (88), "That the eyes of all men were at gaze who should have this great office; and the greatest of the Nobility, who were in the chiefest employments, look'd upon it as the prize of one of them; when on a suddain the staff was put into the hands of the Bishop of London, a man so unknown, that his name was scarce heard of in the kingdom.— This inflam'd more than were angry before, and no doubt did not only sharpen the edge of envy and malice against the Archbishop (who was the known architect of this new fabric) but most unjustly indispos'd many towards the Church itself; which they look'd upon as the gulph ready to swallow all the great offices.— In doing thereof, as Dr Heylin observes (89), 'the Archbishop was generally conceived neither to have consulted his own present peace nor his future safety. Had he studied his own present peace, he should have given Cottington leave to put in for it, who being Chancellor of the Exchequer pretended himself to be the next in that ascent. And had he studied his own safety and preservation for the times to come, he might have made use of the power by recommending the staff to the Earles of Bedford, Hertford, Essex, the Lord Say, or some such man of popular nobility, whose interest might have sides the parochial visitations, the Archbishop visited also the cathedrals, and procured new statutes for them, or reformed and improved their old ones. He insisted moreover upon visiting the universities as metropolitan; which, after some contest, was adjudged to him as his right: but the troubles coming on, he visited them not (y). In order to preserve, and collect together, all the Records in the Tower that concern the clergy; he was at the charge of having them all fairly transcribed in a large book of vellum; and it being brought to him finished June 10, 1637, he deposited it in his library at Lambeth, for the service of posterity (z). For some years, he had set his heart upon getting the English Liturgy introduced into the Church of Scotland; and some of the Scottish Bishops had, under his direction and encouragement, prepared both that book and a collection of Canons for public service [22]. The Canons were published in 1635; but the Liturgy came not in use 'till July 23, 1637. On that day, it was first read in St Giles's church in Edinburgh; when it occasioned a most violent tumult among the perverse and ignorant multitude, spirited up by the nobility, who were losers by the restitution of Episcopacy [RR], and by the ministers who lost their clerical government (a). Our Archbishop having been the great promoter of that affair, was reviled for it in the most abusive manner; and both he and the book were charged with downright Popery [SS]. The extremely severe prosecution carried on about the same time in the Star-chamber, chiefly through his instigation, against Prynne, Bastwick, and Burton (b) [TT], did him also infinite prejudice (c), and exposed him to numberless libels and reflections (d): though he endeavoured to vindicate his conduct, in a speech delivered at their censure, June 14, 1637; and which was published by the King's command. Another rigorous prosecution carried on, with his concurrence, in the Star-chamber, was against Bishop Williams [VV]; who was condemned July 11 this year, in a fine of 10,000 pounds, and have been of use to him in the change of times. But he preferred his Majesty's advantage before his particular concerns, the safety of the publick before his own.

[22] And a collection of Canons.] The reader may see the heads of these Canons in Dr Heylin's History of our Archbishop (90). Besides other exceptions made to them, it was a fatal inadvertency, as Lord Clarendon observes (91), that these Canons, neither before nor after they were sent to the King, had been ever seen by any Assembly of the Kirk, which was oblig'd to the observation of them; nor so much as communicated to the Lords of the Council of that kingdom: tho' Archbishop Laud had caution'd the Scottish bishops not to propose any thing in this business that should be contrary to the laws of the land. And it was as strange that they should be published near two years before the Liturgy; when some of them requir'd a punctual compliance with it,—before they knew what it contain'd.

[RR] Spirited up by the nobility who were losers by the restitution of Episcopacy.] In K. James the 1st's minority, the lands of all the Cathedral Churches and religious Houses, which had been settled on the Crown by act of parliament, were shared amongst the lords and great men of that kingdom (by the connivance of the Earl of Murray and some of the Regents) to make them sure unto that side: and they being thus possessed of the same lands, with the Regalities and Tythes belonging to those Ecclesiastical Corporations, lorded it with pride and insolence enough in their several territories (92). Upon the restoration of Episcopacy, the possessors of the foresaid revenues began to fear they should be taken from them for the maintenance of the Bishops; and the more as the Bishops pretended highly to the Tythes and Improvements (93); and first a Revocation, and then a Commission for taking the surrendries of them at the King's pleasure, had been newly set on foot.—Besides, some of the Bishops were put into places of the greatest Profit, and of the highest Trust and Authority.—This, especially among the Nobles and persons of the highest consequence, appears to have been the true reason of the strong opposition made to the restoration of Episcopacy in Scotland; and the Cause of the many Evils brought by the Scots upon this Kingdom.

[SS] And both he and the Book were charged with downright Popery.] He was particularly so charged, and with the highest aggravations possible, in the Charge of the Scottish Commissioners against Canterbury; printed in 1641, 4to, inserted in the Archbishop's Troubles and Trial, and answered paragraph by paragraph (94). An Abstract of it is in Rushworth (95).

—The curious Reader may see exactly, wherein this Scottish Liturgy agreed with, and wherein it any way differed, even in the least instance, from, the English

Liturgy; in a book intitled, "The Alliance of Divine Offices, &c. by Hamon Lefrange, Esq;" folio.

[TT] Against Prynne, Bastwick, and Burton.] W. Prynne Esq; was twice prosecuted in the Star-chamber. The first time was in 1633, for his book intitled 'Hystric maffix, The Players Scourge and Actors Tragedy:' for which he was fined 5000; pilloried; had his ears cut off; and was otherwise cruelly used. The second time was in 1637, for a pamphlet intitled, 'A divine Tragedy, containing a Catalogue of God's late judgements upon Sabbath-breakers;' and another pamphlet called 'Newes from Ipswich.'—John Bastwick M. D. was also prosecuted in the High-commission and Star-chamber in 1637, for these three Books, Elenchus Papiſticæ Religionis, & Flagellum Pontificis & Episcoporum Latianum: Apologeticus ad Prasules Anglicanos: and his Letany.—And Henry Burton B. D. Rector of St Matthew's Friday-street, was, the same year, prosecuted in the same court, for two sermons preached by him Novemb. 5, 1636, on Prov. xxiv. 21, 22. wherein he inveighed against the Innovations in the Church; and which he printed under this title, 'Two Sermons for God and the King:' with an 'Apologie of an Appeal' from the Archbishop to the King. They were all three fined 5000 l. a-piece, condemned to lose their ears, and to perpetual imprisonment. Tho' the Archbishop acted only as a member of that court, yet the whole blame was laid upon him (96). In a Speech delivered at their censure, he makes this Declaration, 'I can say it clearly and truly, as in the presence of God, I have done nothing as a Prelate, to the uttermost of what I am conscious, but with a single heart, and with a sincere intention for the good Government and Honour of the Church; and the maintenance of the Orthodox Truth and Religion of Christ professed, established, and maintained in this Church of England (97).'

[VV] Another rigorous prosecution carried on with his concurrence—was against Bishop Williams.] This great Prelate happening to displease the Duke of Buckingham, was not only turned out of his place of Lord-keeper, but grew, by the Favourite's means, entirely out of favour with the King; so that he was, if possible, devoted to destruction. The first step to it, was a prosecution begun against him in 1627, for 'Revealing the King's secrets, contrary to his oath as privy-counsellor:' upon the information of Sir John Lamb, and Dr Sibthorp, for words spoken at his own table in their presence. The Bishop putting a demurrer, and a strong plea against the Bill, slopt or delayed proceedings for about ten years. Whereupon, the Attorney general, fearing a defect of testimony, let fall this first bill, and preferred a second against him for tampering with the King's witness; and upon this second information it was, that and to be imprisoned in the Tower during the King's pleasure; and suspended the 24th of the same month, from all his ecclesiastical functions (d). Upon another information, he was sentenced [WW], February 14, 1638-9, to pay the King 5000 pounds more, and the Archbishop 3000 pounds. And Lambert Ofsaldeston, master of Westminster-school, styled his confederate, was fined 5000 pounds to the King; the same sum to the Archbishop; deprived of all preferments; condemned to imprisonment during the King's pleasure; to stand in the pillory, and have his ears nailed thereto (e). In order to prevent the printing and publishing of what our Archbishop thought improper books, he procured a decree to be passed in the Star-chamber, July 11, 1637, to regulate the trade of printing; whereby it was enjoined, that the master-printers should be reduced to a certain number; and, that none of them should print any books, 'till they were licensed either by the Archbishop of Canterbury or the Bishop of London, or by some of their chaplains; or by the Chancellors or Vicechancellors of the two universities (f). He fell into the Queen's displeasure, October 22 this year, by speaking with his usual warmth to the King, at the Council-table, concerning the increase of Papists, their frequent resort to Somerset house, and the unsufferable misdemeanors of some of them, in perverting his Majesty's subjects to Popery (g). January 31, 1638-9, he wrote a circular letter to his Suffragan-Bishops; wherein he exhorted them and their clergy, to contribute liberally towards the raising of the army, which the King was assembling, in order to bring the rebellious Scots to obedience (h). For this he was called an Incendiary; but he declares, on the contrary, that he laboured for peace so long, 'till he received a great check; and that, in the Council, his counsels alone prevailed for peace and forbearance (i). In 1639, he employed one Mr Petley to translate the Liturgy into Greek: and at his recommendation it was, that Dr Joseph Hall Bishop of Exeter composed his learned treatise, of Episcopacie by Divine Right, asserted (k). On the fifth of December the same year, he was one of the three Privy-Counsellors (l) that advised the King to call a Parliament in case of the Scottish rebellion: at which time a resolution was taken to assist the King in extraordinary ways, if the Parliament should prove peevish, and refuse supplies (m). A new Parliament being summoned, met April 13, 1640: and the Convocation the day following. But the Commons launching out into extravagant complaints against the Archbishop; and insisting upon having grievances redressed before they granted any supply, the Parliament was unhappily dissolved May the 5th (n). The Convocation however continued sitting, which the Archbishop was not satisfied with, 'till he was determined by the opinion of the Lord Keeper Finch and several eminent lawyers; and by a precedent in the year 1586. The reason of their continuance, was, that having agreed to give the King six subsidies, payable in six years, and amounting in the whole to a hundred and twenty thousand pounds; 'but the act not being made up at the dissolution of the Parliament, his Majesty was unwilling to lose so considerable a sum: therefore he granted them a new commission under the broad-seal, according to statute 25 Henry VIII. cap. 19, by virtue of which they sat 'till the 29th of May (o). In this Convocation seventeen Canons were made [XX]. But, both the Canons and the sitting of the Convocation, were imputed afterwards to the Archbishop as a most enormous crime (p) [YY]. And on him he was so severely treated (98). As for the other, see the following note. [WW] Upon another information he was sentenced.] This second sentence was grounded only upon three Letters found in a box in the Bishop's house at Bugden, and written to him by Mr Ofsaldeston in 1633: where-in mention was made of the great Leviathan, the little Urchin, the little meddling Hocus Pocus. By which two last names it was insisted upon, that Mr Ofsaldeston meant Archbishop Laud, tho' he protested to the contrary, and declared that he meant one Dr Spicer (99). This last sentence therefore was, if possible, much harder than the other.

[XX] In this Convocation seventeen Canons were made.] The titles of them were, 1. Concerning the regal Power. 2. For the better keeping the day of his Majesty's most happy inauguration. 3. For suppressing the growth of Popery. 4. Against Socinianism. 5. Against Sectaries. 6. An Oath injoyn'd for the preventing of all Innovations in doctrine and government. 7. A declaration concerning some Rites and Ceremonies. 8. Of preaching for Conformity. 9. One book of Articles to be used at all parochial visitations. 10. Concerning the conversation of the clergy. 11. Chancellors patents. 12. Chancellors alone not to censure any of the clergy in sundry cases. 13. Excommunication and Absolution not to be pronounced but by a Priest. 14. Concerning commutations, and the disposing of them. 15. Touching concurrent jurisdictions. 16. Concerning Licences to marry. 17. Against vexatious citations.—The oath in Canon the 6th was in these words: 'I A. B. do swear, That I do approve the Doctrine and Discipline or Government established in the Church of England, as ' containing all things necessary to salvation; and that ' I will not endeavour by myself or any other, directly ' or indirectly, to bring in any Popish Doctrine, con' trary to that which is so established; nor will I ever

' give my consent to alter the Government of this ' Church by Archbishops, Bishops, Deans and Arch-
' deacons, &c. as it stands now established, and as by ' right it ought to stand, nor yet ever to subject it to ' the usurpations and superstitions of the see of ' Rome (100).—Against these Canons, and the Oath et cætera, as it was called, many violent speeches were made in the ensuing Parliament (101); tho', really, any one that would sit down and read them calmly and impartially, could not find them All liable to the severe censure they underwent. But the true reason why they were so exclaimed against, is, Because a resolution was then taken to destroy the points they endeavoured to establish.

[YY] Were imputed afterwards to the Archbishop as a most enormous crime.] For which see the places in his Tryal referred to in the margin above. And in the next Parliament, Dec. 15, 16. the Commons resolved, 'That the clergy of England convented in any Convocation or Synod, or otherwise, have no power to make any Constitutions, Canons, or acts whatsoever in matter of Doctrine, Discipline or otherwise, to bind the Clergy or the Laity of the land, without common consent of Parliament. That the several Constitutions and Canons ecclesiastical, treated upon by the Archbishops, Bishops, and clergy of the Provinces of Canterbury and York, and agreed upon with the King's Majesty's Licence, in their several Synods begun at London and York 1640, do not bind the clergy or laity of this land, or either of them. That those Canons also many laid the blame and odium of the Parliament's dissolution. So that zealous John Lilburne, W. Prynne's servant, caused a paper to be posted, May 9, upon the Old Exchange, animating the apprentices to sack his house at Lambeth, the Monday following. On that day, above 500 of them assembled in a riotous and tumultuary manner: but the Archbishop having had previous notice, secured the house as well as he could, and retired to his chamber at Whitehall, where he remained some days. One of the ring-leaders was hanged, drawn, and quartered, the 21st of the same month, being condemned for treason, upon the statute 25 Edw. III. because so great a number were assembled, in a warlike manner, with a drum, and with unlawful intents (g). In August following, a libel was found in Covent-Garden; animating the apprentices and soldiers to fall upon him, in the King's absence, that is, during his second expedition into Scotland (r). The Parliament that met November 3, 1640, not being better disposed in his favour, but for the most part bent upon his ruin; several angry speeches were made against him in the House of Commons (s) [ZZ]. No wonder that his ruin should be sought and resolved upon, when he had so many and so powerful enemies: namely, almost the whole body of the Puritans: too many of the English nobility and others: and the bulk of the Scotch nation. The Puritans, who reputed and called him the sole author of the Innovations; of the Troubles, and over-rigorous Prosecutions against the most noisy, obstinate, and buff of them: the Nobility, who were disoblged by his warm and incautious manner, and by his grasping at the odious office of Prime-Minister; odious, because on him all faults and miscarriages are generally laid: and the Scots, driven to a pitch of fury and madness, by the restoring of Episcopal government, and the introduction amongst them of the English service-book. Therefore, he was not only examined December 4, in the Earl of Strafford's case; but December 16, when the Commons came to debate about the late Convocation and Canons, he was represented as the author of them; and a committee put upon him to enquire into all his actions, and to prepare a charge against him. The same morning, in the House of Lords, he was named as an incendiary, in an accusation put in by the Scottish commissioners. Two days after, December 18, Denzill Holles, Esq; second son to the Earl of Clare, carried up to the Lords, in the name of the Commons, the impeachment against him of high-treason; desiring he might be forthwith sequestred from Parliament, and committed; and the Commons would, within a convenient time, resort to them with particular accusations and articles. Soon after, the Scottish commissioners presented also to the Upper House the charge against him, tending to prove him an incendiary. Whereupon he was immediately committed to the custody of Mr James Maxwell, Gentleman-Usher of the Black Rod (t). After he had continued ten weeks in his custody, Sir Henry Vane, jun. brought up, February 26, from the Commons to the Lords, fourteen articles against him; which they desired time to prove in particular, and that he might in the mean while be kept safe. Accordingly Mr Maxwell conveyed him in his coach to the Tower, March 1, 1640-41, amidst the insults and reproaches of the mob (u). His enemies, of which the number was great, began then to give full vent to their passions and prejudices, and to endeavour to ruin his reputation [AAA]. In March and April 1641, the House of Commons ordered him, jointly with

Canons and Constitutions do contain in them many matters contrary to the King's prerogative, to the fundamental laws and statutes of the realm, to the right of Parliament, to the property and liberty of the subjects, and matters tending to sedition, and of dangerous consequence (102).'

[ZZ] Several angry speeches were made against him in the House of Commons. Particularly one, Decemb. 18, by Harbottle Grimston, Esq; in which are these virulent expressions: — 'We are now fallen upon the great man, the Archbishop of Canterbury, look upon him as he is in highness, and he is the stye of all pestilential filth that hath infected the state and government of this commonwealth: look upon him in his dependances, and he is the man, the only man, that hath raised and advanced all those, that together with himself have been the authors and causers of all our ruines, miseries, and calamities we now groan under. Who is it but he only that hath brought the Earl of Strafford to all his great places and employments; a fit spirit and instrument to act and execute all his wicked and bloody designs in these kingdoms? Who is it but he only that brought in Secretary Windebank into this place of service, of trust, the very broker and pander to the whore of Babylon? Who is it, Mr Speaker, but he only that hath advanced all our Popish Bishops? I shall name but some of them, Bishop Manwaring, the Bishop of Bath and Wells, the Bishop of Oxford, and Bishop Wren, the least of all these birds, but one of the most unclean ones.—' Who is it, Mr Speaker, but this great Archbishop of Canterbury, that hath sitten at the helm, to steer and to manage all the projects that have been set on foot in this kingdom this ten years last past: and rather than he would stand out, he hath most unworthily trucked and chaffered in the

'meanest of them; as for instance, that of Tobacco, wherein thousands of poor people have been stripped and turned out of their Trades, for which they have served as apprentices: we all know he was the compounder and contractor with them for the Licences, putting them to pay fines and a fee-farm-rent to use their Trade. — Mr Speaker, we all know what he hath been charged withall here in this house, crimes of a dangerous consequence, and of a transcendent nature, no less than the subversion of the Government of this kingdom, and the alteration of the Protestant Religion: and this is not upon bare information only, but much of it is come before us already upon clear and manifest proofs, and there is scarce any grievance or complaint come before us in this place, wherein we do not find him intermentioned, and as it were twitted into it, like a buse angry wasp, his sting is in the tail of every thing.— Mr Speaker, he hath been the great and common enemy of all goodness and good men, and it is not safe that such a Viper should be near his Majesties person, to distil his poyson into his sacred ears, nor is it safe for the commonwealth, that he sit in so eminent a place of government being thus accused; we know what he did in the Earl of Strafford's case: this man is the corrupt fountain that hath infected all the streams, and 'till the fountain be purged, we can never expect or hope to have clear channels, &c. (103)' — These are the rhetorical flourishes in this invective. The whole of it is aggravated and ungentle; some false; and the rest unworthy to come from the mouth of Mr Grimston, a gentleman, or a Christian. But such was the ill-humour of those violent times, when no Candour and very little Justice could be expected.

[AAA] And to endeavour to ruin his reputation. For that purpose, numberless Libels and Ballads against all those that had passed sentence in the Star-Chamber against Burton, Baſtwick, and Prynne, to make ſatisfaction and reparation to them, for the damages they had ſuſtained by their ſentence and imprifonment (w). And he was fined 20,000 pounds for his acting in the late Convocation (x). On the 21ſt of December foregoing, the Archbiſhop had alſo been condemned by the Houſe of Lords to pay 500 pounds to Sir Robert Howard, for falſe imprifonment (y) [BBB]. The 25th of June, 1641, he ſent down to Oxford, his reſignation of the Chancellorſhip of that univerſity; to be publiſhed in Convocation. In order to take from him the diſpoſal of all his benefices, the Houſe of Lords ſequeſtered, the 23d of October following, his juriſdiction, putting it into the hands of his inferior officers; and injoined, that he ſhould give no benefice that was in his diſpoſal, without firſt preſenting to the Houſe the names of ſuch perſons as he nominated to it, to be approved of by the Houſe before collation or inſtitution (z). The 20th of January 1641-2, the Lords ordered his arms at Lambeth-palace, which had coſt him above three hundred pounds, to be taken away by the Sheriffs of London. Before the concluſion of that year, in purſuance of a reſolution of Parliament, all the rents and profits of his Archbiſhoprick were ſequeſtered for the uſe of the Commonwealth; and his houſe was plundered of what money it afforded, by two members of the Houſe of Commons (a). What was very hard, when he petitioned afterwards the Parliament for a maintenance, he could not obtain any; nor even the leaſt part of above two hundred pounds worth of his own wood and coal at Lambeth, for his neceſſary uſe in the Tower (b). On the 25th of April 1643, a motion was made in the Houſe of Commons, at the inſtance of Hugh Peters and others of that ſtamp, to ſend, or transport, him to New-England; but that motion was rejected. And, on the 9th of May, his goods and books in Lambeth-houſe were ſeized; and the goods ſold ſcarce for the third part of their value. All this, before he had been brought to any tryal: which was condemning him unheard. Seven days after, there came out an Ordinance of Parliament, injoining him, to give no benefice, void, or to be void, without leave and order of both Houſes (c). The thirty-ſiſt of the ſame month, W. Prynne, by a warrant from the cloſe Committee, came and ſearched his room, and even riſed his pockets; taking away his Diary, private Devotions, and twenty-one bundles of paper which he had prepared for his own defence. Prynne promiſed a faithful reſtitution of them within three or four days, but he never returned quite three of the bundles of papers. In the mean time, the Archbiſhop not complying exactly with the ordinance abovementioned, all the temporalities of his Archbiſhoprick were ſequeſtered to the Parliament, June 10; and he was ſuſpended from his office and benefice, and from all juriſdiction whatſoever (d). After he had continued above three years a cloſe priſoner, he was at length brought to his tryal [CCC], which commenced March 12, 1643-4, and laſted twenty him ſwarmed in the cities of London and Weſtmiſter, without controul; and even were put into the hands of the members of both houſes of Parliament, without the leaſt reſtraint or diſapprobation. Ludicrous and abuſive pictures were alſo made of him; whereby he was repreſented in a cage, faſtened to a poſt by a chain at his ſhoulder; or in a cage with a Jeſuit; and the King's fool ſtanding by and laughing at them; and ſuch low ribaldry (104). One Henry Walker, a poor ſcribbler, was very buſy in that ſcandalous work; and ſome of his pamphlets againſt the Archbiſhop are now lying before me. One intitled, 'The Report of the Biſhop of Canterburie's Dream.' Another, 'Canterburie's Pilgrimage: in the teſtimony of an accused Conſcience for the blood of Mr Burton, Mr Prynne, and Doctor Baſtwick.' And another, 'A new play called Canterburie his Charge of diot.' Beſides others innumerable, wherein he is occaſionally mention'd.

[BBB] The Archbiſhop had alſo been condemned to pay 500l. to Sir Robert Howard, for falſe imprifonment.] This caſe, as related by the Archbiſhop, was thus; Sir John Villiers, eldeſt brother to George the great Duke of Buckingham, having taken to his ſecond wife, Elizabeth daughter of Sir William Slingby in Yorkſhire, Kt. ſhe baſely forſook his bed, and made herſelf a prostitute to Sir Robert Howard, fifth ſon of Thomas Earl of Suffolk (105); by whom ſhe had a child, under the name of Miſtreſs Wright. Theſe things coming to be known, ſhe was brought into the high-commiſſion; and being there found guilty of adultery, Novemb. 19, 1627, was ſentenced to do penance, but to avoid that, ſhe withdrew. Afterwards, when the ſtorm was over, Sir Robert conveyed her to his houſe in Shropſhire, where ſhe lived avowedly with him ſome years, and had by him ſeveral children. At laſt, they grew to that open boldneſs, that he brought her up to London, and lodged her in Weſtmiſter. This was ſo near the Court, and in ſo open view, that the King and the Lords took notice of it, as a thing full of impudence, that they ſhould ſo publickly venture to outface the juſtice of the realm, in ſo foul a buſineſs. And one day, as the Archbiſhop came to wait upon the King, his Majeſty told him of it, and added, that it was a great reproach to the church and nation; and that he neglected his duty, in caſe he did not take order for it. The Archbiſhop answered, ſhe was the wife of a Peer of the Realm; and that without his leave he could not attack her, but that now he knew his Majeſty's pleaſure, he would do his beſt to have her taken, and brought to penance, according to the ſentence againſt her. The next day he had the good hap to apprehend both her and Sir Robert; and by order of the high-commiſſion-court, imprifoned her in the Gate-houſe, and him in the Fleet. But Sir Robert bribing the turn-key of the priſon, conveyed the Lady away to France in man's apparel. Thereupon, in the next fitting of the High-commiſſion, the Archbiſhop ordered him to be cloſe priſoner, till he brought the Lady forth. So he continued cloſe priſoner about two or three months. For this the ſine abovementioned was impoſed upon the Archbiſhop, as being a moſt unjuſt and illegal imprifonment. Whereas the Parliament, had they had any ſenſe of juſtice and morality, ought to have approved of the Archbiſhop's proceedings, and ſeverely puniſhed the vile Adultereſs and Fornicator (106).

[CCC] He was at length brought to his tryal.] On the 26th of February 1640-1, Sir Henry Vane carried up from the Commons to the Lords Fourteen Articles of Accuſation againſt him: to which the Commons added, in October 1643, Ten other Articles. The ſubſtance of them was, 1. That he had traiterouſly endeavoured to ſubvert the fundamental Laws and Government of the Kingdom of England, and inſtead thereof to introduce an arbitrary and tyrannical Government againſt law; and to that end had adviſed his Majeſty, that he might at his own will and pleaſure levy and take money of his ſubjects, without their conſent in Parliament. 2. That he had adviſed and procured ſermons and other diſcourſes to be preached, printed and publiſhed; in which the authority of Parliaments and the force of the Laws of this kingdom were denied, and an abſolute and unlimited power over the perſons and eſtates of his Majeſty's ſubjects twenty days, ending the 29th of July 1644 (e). Every unprejudiced person, after a cool and serious perusal of the whole proceedings against him, must own that he had not committed any crime; that nothing he had either said or done was treason, by any known established law of this kingdom (f). The trial being over, it remained now that he should be left to the verdict of the House of Peers, or of a Middlesex-jury; but, to all appearance, his prosecutors durst not venture it upon that issue. Therefore they proceeded to what must be called a cruel, if not an illegal, method; that is, an ordinance for his Attainder: which was first read in the House of Commons November 13, passed the sixteenth, and immediately sent up to the Lords. There it stuck 'till the beginning of January 1644-5, when by the violence of the Earl of Pembroke, and the threatenings of the mob's coming down to force them, it was passed the fourth of that month, in a very thin house (g) [D D D].

subjects was maintained and defended, not only in the King, but also in himself and other bishops, above and against the law. And that he had, in like manner, endeavoured to advance the power of the Council-table, the Canons of the Church, and the King's prerogative, above the Laws and Statutes of the realm. 3. That he had, by letters, messages, &c. to Judges and other ministers of justice, interrupted and perverted the course of Justice in the Courts at Westminster, and elsewhere. And, to advance the canons of the Church and power ecclesiastical, had opposed and 'stopt the granting writs of Prohibition. 4. That he had sold justice to those that had causes depending before him, and had taken unlawful gifts and bribes. 5. That he had traitorously caused a book of Canons to be composed and published, and to be put in execution; in which were many matters contrary to the King's prerogative, to the fundamental laws and statutes of the realm, to the right of parliament, to the propriety and liberty of the subject, &c. And had caused a most dangerous and illegal Oath to be therein made and contrived. 6. That he had assumed to himself a papal and tyrannical power, both in ecclesiastical and temporal matters: and claimed the King's ecclesiastical jurisdiction, as incident to his Episcopal and Archiepiscopal office in this kingdom, denying the same to be derived from the Crown of England. 7. That he had endeavoured to alter and subvert God's true Religion by law established in this realm, and instead thereof to set up Popish superstition and idolatry: and to that end had declared and maintained divers Popish doctrines and opinions; and urged and enjoined divers Popish and superstitious ceremonies; and cruelly persecuted those who opposed the same, and vexed others who refused to conform thereunto. 8. That he had intruded upon the places of divers great officers, and others; whereby he procured to himself the nomination of sundry persons to ecclesiastical Dignities, and the recommendation of Chaplains to the King, who were Popishly affected, or otherwise unsound and corrupt both in doctrine and manners. 9. That his own Chaplains were such, and he having committed the licensing of Books to them, by that means, divers false and superstitious Books had been published. 10. That he had endeavoured to reconcile the Church of England with the Church of Rome: and for that purpose had consorted and confederated with divers Popish priests and Jesuits, (particularly one Sancta Clara, alias Dampart [or rather Davenport,] and one Monsieur St Giles;) and kept secret intelligence with the Pope: and had permitted and countenanced a Popish Hierarchy to be established in this kingdom. 11. That he had caused divers learned, pious, and orthodox Preachers to be silenced, suspended, deprived, &c. without any just and lawful cause; whereby he had hindered the preaching of God's word, caused divers of his Majesty's loyal subjects to forsake the kingdom, &c. And that he had caused the Feoffment for buying of Impropriations, for the maintenance of Preaching in several Churches to be overthrown. 12. That he had suppressed and abrogated the Privileges and Immunities granted to the French and Dutch Churches in this kingdom. 13. That he had plotted and endeavoured to stir up war and enmity between the Kingdoms of England and Scotland, and to that purpose had laboured to introduce into Scotland divers Innovations both in Religion and Government, all or the most part tending to Popery and Superstition: and for their [i. e. the Scots] refusing to submit to such Innovations, he advised his Majesty to subdue them by force of arms; and, by his own authority, did procure several persons, and enforced the Clergy, to contribute towards the maintenance of that war; and when his Majesty had made a Pacification betwixt the two Kingdoms, the said Archbishop did censure that Pacification as dishonourable to his Majesty, and incense his Majesty against his Subjects of Scotland, that he did thereupon by advice of the said Archbishop enter into an offensive war against them. 14. That, to preserve himself from being questioned for these and other his traitorous courses he had laboured to subvert the rights of Parliaments, and the ancient course of Parliamentary proceedings, and by false and malicious slanders to incense his Majesty against Parliaments (107). The Counsel assigned to the Archbishop, were, John Herne, Chaloner Chute, the excellent Matthew Hale, afterwards Lord Chief Justice, and Richard Gerrard, Esquires. And the managers against him, were these; John Wylde Serjeant at Law, John Maynard, Robert Nicholas, and Samuel Browne, Esquires, and William Prynne, Solicitor (108). The Archbishop, even by the confession of his enemies, 'made as full, as gallant, as pithy a defence, and spake as much for himself as was possible for the wit of man to invent: and that with so much art, vivacity, oratory, audacity, and confidence, without the least acknowledgment of guilt in any thing (109).—He complains of the bad usage he received from W. Prynne, with regard to the management of the evidence against him.—'Tis well known (says the Archbishop) he [Prynne] kept a kind of school of instruction for such of the witnesses as he durst trust, that they might be sure to speak home to the purpose he would have them. And this an utter Barrister, a man of good credit knows; who in the hearing of men beyond exception, said, The Archbishop is a stranger to me, but Mr Prynne's tampering about the witnesses, is so palpable and foul, that I cannot but pity him and cry shame of it (110). He observes also, what sort of Witnesses were in general employed against him, 'Many of the Witnesses (saith he) brought against me in this business are more than suspected sectaries and separatists from the Church, which by my place I was to punish, and that exasperated them against me, whereas by law no Schismatick ought to be received against his Bishop (111). And many of these are Witnesses in their own causes, and pre-examined before they come in court. At which pre-examination I was not present, nor any for me, to cross-interrogate (112).—A Pack of such witnesses were never produced against any man of my place and calling; messengers and pursuivants, and such as have shifted their religion to and again; pillory-men and bawds, &c. (113).—It plainly appears, that he fell a Sacrifice to the Revenge of the Scottish nation. For his Trial was hastened, or retarded, according to the motions of their army in England (114). And Mr Ludlow frankly owns, that he was 'beheaded for the encouragement of the Scots (115).'

[DDD] In a very thin House There were only six Lords that concurred in it; namely, Henry Earl of Kent, Philip Earl of Pembroke, William Earl of Salisbury, Oliver Earl of Bullingbroke, Dudley Lord North, and William Lord Grey of Warke (116). And indeed, after the exclusion of the Bishops, and the willing or forced absence of the loyal Royalists, the attending Peers were seldom twenty; and oftener did not exceed twelve or fourteen; and frequently did not come up to that small number (117). Of this hardship the Archbishop complains in the following words: 'Though my hopes under God were upon the Lords, yet when my Trial came on, it did somewhat

By that ordinance, he was to suffer death as in cases of high-treason; but, upon his repeated petition, the sentence was altered to beheading: which he suffered with great composure, January the tenth, on a scaffold erected upon Tower-hill; being aged seventy-one years, four months, and three days. He was buried in the church of All-hallows Barking, London; but his remains being afterwards taken up, were deposited in the chapel of St John's college in Oxford, July 24, 1663 (b). Such was the tragical end of William Laud Archbishop of Canterbury! As to his person, he was low of stature, but well and strongly made; and of a ruddy and cheerful countenance. In his temper, and natural disposition, he was full of fire and vivacity, which too often degenerated into choler and passion, and made him not to have so strict a guard over his words and actions as he ought to have had (i). He was a man of strict integrity, sincere and zealous; regular in his life, chaste, sober, and temperate, and humble in his private deportment. But in some respects he was indiscrete and obstinate, eagerly pursuing matters that were either very inconsiderable or mischievous (k). The rigorous prosecutions in the Star-Chamber and High-Commission-Courts are generally imputed to him; though every unprejudiced person will think they ought not to be imputed to him alone [E E E]. As he heartily hated the Puritans [F F F], so he was as heartily hated by them. He formed the airy project, of bringing all the inhabitants of Great-Britain and Ireland to an exact Uniformity in Religion and Worship (l). An impracticable project, often attempted without success. An impracticable project especially among the free people of England, whom either Confience, or Education, or Perverseness and Obstinacy, cause and induce to have different sentiments and opinions, in most points, especially in religious matters. The pressing of some ceremonies, and other like things, which he imagined to be the only means for this Uniformity, brought him under the odious imputation of Popery, and of being Popishly affected: but how just or well-grounded that imputation was, we shall examine in the note [G G G]. He was more busy in temporal affairs and matters of

‘ somewhat trouble me to see so few Lords in that great house. For at the greatest presence that was any day of my hearing, there were not above Fourteen, and usually not above Eleven or Twelve. Of these, one third part at least, each day took or had occasion to be gone, before the charge of the day was half given. I never had any one day the same Lords all present at my defence in the afternoon, that were at my charge in the morning: some leading Lords scarce present at my charge, four days of all my long Tryal, nor three at my defence: and which is most, no one Lord present at my whole Tryal, but the Lord Gray of Wark, the Speaker, without whose presence it could not be a House (118).’

[E E E] Tho' every unprejudiced person will think they ought not to be imputed to him alone. Most of these acts were not his singly, but joint-acts of the courts of Star chamber, High-commission, &c. in which he was only one. Therefore 'tis very injurious to charge him wholly with the guilt of them; as his adversaries have done. Unless all the violences and iniquities of a reign are to be charged upon the Prime Minister. And if so, we be to them that are in authority, and the unhappiest of men are they! — What has been observed here, is what the Archbishop pleaded in his own defence. ‘ I have (saith he) a long time found by sad experience, that whatsoever some men disliked, was presently my doing.’ And, ‘ I humbly conceive, that I ought not by law, nor can by usage of Parliamentary proceedings, be charged single for those things which are done in publick courts (119).’

[F F F] As he heartily hated the Puritans. Dr Heylin assigns the following reason for his hatred and aversion for the Puritans, and his endeavours to check and discountenance them. ‘ Seeing the Puritanes grown so strong, even to the endangering of our Peace, both in Church and State, by the negligence and remissness of the former Government, he thought it necessary to shew some countenance to the Papists, that the ballance being kept even between the parties; the Church and State might be preserved (as indeed they were) in the greater safety. And this appeared to be his chiefe inducement in it, in regard that when the Protestant party was grown strong enough, to stand and goe without such crutches, he then declared himselfe openly against that Faction (120).’ But, as they carried too far their hatred against him, even by bringing him to the block; so did he likewise molest and prosecute them too severely for their notions, often nonsensical and absurd, but covered with the cloke of Conscience. That sent great numbers of them abroad to New-England, and the Summer-islands; but the Government, either fancying that their flying away thinn'd his nation too much, or form'd too strong a body of Dissenters abroad; by a fatal policy restrained them, by Proclamation, from going out of the Kingdom, without a licence (121). And, by that means, Oliver Cromwell, John Hamden, Sir Arthur Haslerigg, and others equally violent and disaffected, (no less than eight ships-load,) were hindred from going to New-England, even when they were embark'd (122).

[G G G] But how just or well-grounded that imputation was, we shall examine. It was pressed upon him at his Tryal, with the greatest aggravations, on the following grounds; Because he put up colour'd glass with pictures in his chapel-windows; had a Bible with Popish pictures; and some pictures of the same kind in his gallery; used copes and bowings in churches; assumed a Papal power; and other accusations of the like nature: which may be seen at length in his Tryal, with his Answers thereto (123), being too long to transcribe here. The same Imputation was thrown upon him, with the highest acrimony, by Prynne, Bastwick, Burton, and the whole bulk of Puritans in his time; by Sir Edward Peyton (124); and even by Mr de Wicquefort. What the latter says upon that subject, is in these words: Celui qui a écrit l'histoire du temps sur de fort bons memoires, dit que l'Archevesque de Canterbury mesme y estoit fort disposé, & resolu de suivre Rosssetti à Rome, si le Cardinal Barberin eust voulu l'asseurer d'une pension de quarante huit mille livres (125); i. e. ‘ He who writ the history of those times upon very good memoires, says, that the Archbishop of Canterbury himself was much inclined thereto, [i. e. to alter the established Religion, d'y faire changer la Religion dominante,] and resolved to follow Rosssetti [the Popish agent here] to Rome, if Cardinal Barberini would have insur'd him a pension of 48000 livres.’ But as Mr Wicquefort doth not name the author of that History, nor of his Memoires; and that the compiler of them might have been W. Prynne, or as violent and prejudiced a writer; we leave therefore the candid and unprejudiced reader to judge of the Credibility of that story.—On the other hand, let us hear what persons who were at least no admirers of the Archbishop, say concerning his being a Papist, or Popishly affected. ‘ He so little thought, says Sal-

state, than his predecessors in the See of Canterbury of later times had been (m): and even thought he could manage the place and office of Prime-Minister, without the least condescension to the arts and stratagems of the Court, and without any friendship, or support, than what a pious life, and his unpolished integrity, would reconcile to him: which was an unskilful measure in a licentious age (n); and ill judged in him, who was unfit for a Court, having never learned to dissemble. The Lord Clarendon concludes his character with this candid observation (o), 'That his Learning, Piety, and Virtue, have been attained by very few, and the greatest of his infirmities are common to all, even to the best of men.' ce lien d'Unité qui les tient attachez a la chaire unique de St Pierre.—Arthur Wilson, in his own Life (127), tells us, that being at Bruges in 1637, he had a discourse with one Dr Weston, of which these are some of the particulars. — 'The little Archbishop of Canterbury he could not endure I pull'd a book out of my pocket, written by the Provincial of the English Friars, Johannes de Sancta Clara, which tended to reconcile the Church of England and the Church of Rome, if we would come up a step to them and they come down a step to us. I know the man (saith Weston) he is one of Canterbury's trencher-fles and eats perpetually at his table; a creature of his making. Then (saith I) you should better approve of my Lord of Canterbury's actions, being he tends so much to your way. No, (reply'd he) he is too subtle to be yok'd; too ambitious to have a superior He'll never submit to Rome. He means to frame a motley Religion of his own, and be lord of it himself.'—And by two Testimonials of Mr Jonathan Whilson, and John Evelyn Esq; it appears, That the Archbishop was look'd upon at Rome as the greatest enemy of the Church of Rome, in England; and the greatest champion of the Church of England.' — 'And that the English Papists there looked upon him as one that was a great enemy to them, and stood in their way; whilst (adds Mr Evelyn) one of the blackest crimes imputed to him, was his being Popishly affected (128). — The sentiments of the judicious Historian, Rapin de Thoyras, upon the present subject, are the last I shall mention. 'The Presbyterians (saith he) had taken it into their heads that a project was formed to re-establish the Roman Religion in England. . . . They imagined that the King's ministers, the Council, Bishops, and particularly the new Archbishop of Canterbury, were the Authors of this project. . . . For my part, I verily believe, neither the King, nor the Archbishop, nor the Ministers for the most part ever formed such a design. At least in all that has been said upon this subject, I have not met with any proof which to me seem'd, I will not say strong enough to convince me, but even to have the least probability. Nevertheless 'tis certain this opinion prevailed more and more among the people, and the Presbyterians used their endeavours to gain it credit. I don't know whether they believed it themselves, or whether they only thought it would be for their Advantage to throw this Reproach upon the Church of England, that they might strengthen their party, in which they succeeded at length, even beyond their expectations (129).'

[HHH] An account of his Benefactions.] Besides what he did for Oxford, as mentioned above in notes [Y] and [Z] he founded an Arabick Lecture in that University; which began to be read Aug. 10, 1636: he procured a large Charter for Oxford, to confirm their ancient privileges, and obtain for them new ones: he also procur'd a new Charter for the college near Dublin, and a body of new Statutes: he set up a Greek press in London, for printing the Library MSS. and intended to have done the like at Oxford: he undertook to have the Statutes of all the Cathedral Churches of the new foundations settled; but it was done only for Canterbury: he undertook, likewise, to have Commendams annexed to all the small Bishopricks, and those if possible Sine-cures: which was effected for Bristol, Peterborough, St Asaph, Chester, and Oxford; upon which last was settled the Impropriation of Cuddefden, and a new House built by the then Bishop Dr Bancroft: he obtained the advowson of the living of St Laurence in Reading, for St John's college in Oxford: he founded an Hospital in Reading, and endowed it with revenues to the amount of 200 l. a year: and also procured a Charter, and a mortmain, for that town.—He intended moreover, to have a fund settled for buying in Impropriations; and for increasing the Stipends of poor Vicars (130).

[III] And of what he writ or published.] What he published himself, was, 1. 'Seven Sermons,' preached on public occasions, in the years 1621, 1622, 1625, 1626, and 1628, and printed single in those respective years in 4to, reprinted together at London in 1651, 8vo 2. 'Conference between him and Fisher the Jesuite.' fol. Lond. 1624. Printed again in 1637 and 1673. It was published at first under the name of R. B. i. e. Richard Baylie of St John's college, then Chaplain to the Bishop, afterwards President of the said college. It was reckoned the exactest master-piece of Polemick Divinity of any extant at that time (131). And Sir Edw. Deering, his professed adversary, could not help owning (132), that the Bishop had in this book muzzled the Jesuit, and should strike the Papists under the fifth rib, when he was dead and gone—and that it should be his epitaph. 3. 'Answer to the Remonstrance made by the House of Commons in 1628. 4. * Since this article was sent to the press, the following observations have occurred, which may serve to illustrate the note [T], and further clear the Archbishop from having altered the Coronation-oath.

In 1642 the Parliament was endeavouring to compel the King to give his assent to such Bills as should be offered to him; and endeavoured to prove, that he was obliged by his Coronation-oath so to do . . . . which would, indeed, be divesting the King of his share in the Legislature, if he could not put his negative upon the Bills offered to him for his assent, when he saw it proper or necessary; as the two Houses . . . . Several Remonstrances passed upon that subject, between the King and Parliament (136), in one of which (137) is this passage . . . 'That it [the Coronation-oath] hath been ordinarily so taken, appears by a memorandum upon record at the Coronation of Richard II. wherein the heads of the oath being set downe (138), that clause of the oath, concerning the King's strengthening such Lawes as the people have choien or shall choose (the matter is not great whether way it be rendred, so it bee understood alwayes that the Lawes refer in that clause to the Royall assent, as a thing future and not passed) (as they doe) is rendered thus; Ac de faciendo per ipsam Dominum Regem eos esse protegendos, & ad honorem Dei, corroborandum quas vulgus iuste & rationabiliter eligerit; which expression with that qualification, which the people should justly and reasonably choose, cleerly relates to new Lawes that should be chosen by the people; and in all the alterations of the forme of the Oath, that we can find, excepting that which was taken by his Majesty, and his Father King James, (wherein the word choose is wholly left out, as well hath cho'sen as will choose) that clause is understood of new Lawes to be made, as in that oath which Henry the eighth corrected and interlined with his own hands (whereof there is a copy amongst the Memorials of the Archbishop of Canterbury at Lambeth) the clause in question, that is, [and affirm them which the folk and people have made and chosen] is interlined by him thus, instead of Folk, he put nobles and people, and after the words made and chosen, he added, with my consent. And in the oath of Edward the sixth, which is to be seen at Lambeth also; the Lord Protector and the other co-executors holding it necessary to correct the ceremonies and observances used at the Coronation of the Kings of this realme, in respect of the tedious length of the same; and also for that they conceived, that many points of the same were such, as by the laws of this realm, at that present were not allowable (as is there expressed) they altered several clauses in the oath, and the clause in question they changed into this following: [Doe you grant to make no new Lawes, but such as shall be to the honour and glory of God, and to the good of the commonwealth, and that the same shall be made by the consent of your people, as hath bin accustomed] By all which it cleerly appears, that in that clause of the Oath; Et ad honorem Dei corroborandum quas vulgus eligerit; His Majesties royal assent to new Lawes was generally understood to be meant.

From this extract it appears, That the alteration in the Coronation-oath, was made in that of K. James I. as well as in that of K. Charles I. and therefore was not made by Bishop Laud.

And from the French Oath upon record, as taken by King Edward II. and Edw. III. it is evident, that by eligerint was intended shall have chosen. It is thus, Sire grantes vous a tenir & garder les leys & les custumes droituieres lesquels la communaulte de vostre Royaume aur eslu, & les defenderer & affercer al honneur de Dieu a vostre poaire (139). LEAKE [Sir JOHN], a brave and successful Admiral, was son of Captain Richard Leake, Master-Gunner of England, and grandson of Mr Richard Leake, descended from the Leakes of Derbyshire (a). He was born in June 1656 at Rotherhithe in Surry. Being well instructed in Mathematics and Gunnery by his father [A], with a view to the Navy, he entered early into the service as a Midshipman; and, in this station, distinguished himself under his father at the memorable engagement between the English and Dutch fleets in 1673 [B], being then only 18 years of age. Upon the conclusion of that war,

[A] His father.] Was born in 1629 at Harwich, and being bred to the sea, was first engaged during the civil wars by paternal authority in the Parliament service. But this was a force upon his inclination, and he took the first opportunity to desert, and engaging some of the seamen in the same design, they went away with the boat in the night; by this means escaping the vigilance of his father, who suspecting his design, discovered them almost as soon as the boat was put off, and several guns were fired to stop or sink it; but they got safely on shoar. Had Mr Leake been taken, he would not have been spared by his father, who was very zealous, and died soon after in defence of the cause he had espoused. His son having thus escaped, went a volunteer in the King's service, and after the ruin there, went into the Dutch artillery, where he improved himself in gunnery and engineering, to which he had a particular genius. As soon as he could safely, he returned to England, and entering into the merchants service, had the command of a ship several voyages up the Mediteranean; during those, Henry and John, his two elder sons were born. At the Restoration he was made Master-gunner of the Princess, a frigate of 50 guns; and in the first Dutch war distinguished his skill and bravery, particularly in two extraordinary actions; one against 15 fail of Rotterdam men of war, and another, in 1667, against two Danes in the Baltrick (1). In both, the commanding officers of the Princess being killed or desperately wounded, the command, according to the rules of the Navy at that time, fell to the Gunner. He expected a Captain's commission for the latter service against the Danes; but that command being given to another before he came home, upon his arrival the Duke of York, then Lord High Admiral, signed a warrant, dated June 8, 1667, to the Commissioners of the Navy, to pay him 30 l. 'till an opportunity offered for his farther preferment; and the 13th of August following he was appointed one of his Majesty's Gunners within the Tower of London, in consideration (as the warrant expresses it) of his good and faithful service to his Majesty during the war with the French, Danes, and Dutch, both by sea and land; whence it seems he had served in the army as well as the navy (2).

[B] He distinguished himself in the engagement in 1673.] His father, in May 1669, was promoted from the Princess frigate to be Gunner of the Royal Prince, a first rate man of war; in which he was engaged with his two sons abovementioned in this battle, which happened August 10th, between Sir Edward Spragg and Van Trump: the Royal Prince having all her masts shot away, near 400 of her men killed and disabled, and most of her upper tier of guns dismounted. As she lay thus like a wreck for some time, a great Dutch man of war came down upon her with two fire-ships, either to burn or carry her off, and the Captain-lieutenant, Mr (afterwards Sir) George Rooke, thinking it impossible to defend her, ordered the men to save their lives, and the colours to be struck. Mr Leake hearing this forbid it, ordered the Lieutenant war, soon after, he engaged in the Merchants service, and had the command of a ship two or three voyages up the Mediterranean. But his inclination lying to the Navy, he did not stay long out of it; for, though he refused a Lieutenant's commission *, yet, upon the advancement of his father in a little time to the command of a yacht, he gladly accepted the offer of succeeding him in the post of Gunner to the Neptune [C], a second rate man of war. This was about the year 1675, and the times being peaceable, he remained in this post without any promotion (b), 'till the latter end of King James's reign in 1688, when his father procured him a commission (c) to command the Firedrake fire-ship [D]. He was continued in this command at the Revolution; and the signal service he did in it at the battle of Bantry-Bay [E] in 1689, recommended him to a commission, which he received two days after from the Admiral [Herbert, afterwards Earl of Torrington], to command the Dartmouth; and being ordered immediately (d), with some other ships, to convoy some victuallers into Londonderry in Ireland, that deperate design was carried into execution chiefly by his means [F]. The Commander of the land forces, off the Quarter deck, and took the command upon himself. The Royal Prince, says he, shall never be given up to the enemy, while I am alive to defend her; and calling his two sons, of whom Henry was his first mate, he told them his resolution, and that if they followed his example, he did not doubt of success. The undaunted spirit of the Gunner inspired the whole ship's company with resolution; they returned with alacrity to the fight, and under the direction of their valiant Gunner and his two sons, sunk both the fire ships, and obliged the man of war to sheer off. Thus, after a long and desperate defence, half-burnt, and reduced almost to a wreck, they saved the Royal Prince, and brought her to Chatham, to the admiration of all that saw her. But this good fortune of Mr Leake was much allay'd by the death of his eldest son, Henry, who, imitating his father's virtue, fell a sacrifice to his glory, being slain in the battle very near him (3).

[C] He was made Gunner of the Neptune. His father had succeeded to this place from the Royal Prince, but did not continue in it long before he was preferred to the command of a yacht, and made also Master-gunner of White-hall. Upon the father's promotion it was a natural step for the son to succeed him; besides, this was the best preferment he could hope for in that time of peace, when few commission'd-officers were employ'd, and none had then half pay but such Captains as in the late war had commanded first and second rates: whereas a Gunner was in constant whole pay, tho' he never went out of harbour; and master-gunner of a great ship was a post of much greater reputation than it has been esteemed since. Those officers wore their swords on shore, kept company with the commissioned officers, and were much respected by all. For these reasons it was, that Sir John had refused to be a Lieutenant; besides that he was well assured of a command from the post of Gunner (4).

[D] His father procured him the Firedrake fire-ship. His father having obtained, in 1677, a grant for life of the office of Master-gunner of England, and being likewise appointed Store-keeper of the ordnance at Woolwich, had by these posts full scope for his genius. Accordingly his invention was perpetually at work, and among other things, he invented the Cushee piece, so called, because intended to be placed at the fore-castle of a ship, as a piece of that name is placed in a galley; but instead of shot was to fire-shells and carcasses. This was a favourite invention, and having answered his design in theory, he only wanted to put it in practice, and when K. James II. resolved to fit out a strong fleet to prevent the invasion from Holland in 1688, the Captain took that occasion, (being in a time of peace, the first that had offered) to propose the trial of his Cushee piece, which was readily granted. And the Firedrake fire-ship being order'd for that service, his son John, for the better execution thereof, was appointed commander. In the mean time this, which was used as a means for his preferment, was unhappily attended with the death of his younger and only brother Edward, who was blown up at Woolwich as he was preparing the composition for the Cushee shells (5).

[E] He did signal service at the battle of Bantry-bay. With it he let on fire one of the French ships commanded by the Chevalier Coetlogon, whereby part of her was blown up, and the narrowly missed being wholly consumed. Father Daniel, (6) speaking of this engagement, says it was by a cannon-ball; not knowing what it was, nothing of that nature having been used before, but it wholly disabled her for farther service; and several other ships receiv'd damage by the same means (7). But notwithstanding it seems to have answered so well as to have done honour to the inventor; yet whether he thought it too desperate and destructive to be brought into use, or hating it for his brother's sake, who lost his life by it, 'tis certain he did not recommend it, and the writer of his life could not find it was ever used afterwards.

[F] Carried into execution chiefly by his means. When the fleet ordered upon this service arrived with the forces off Lough-Boyle, the Admiral, Sir George Rooke, ordered Captain Leake with the Dartmouth, Greyhound, and King's-Fisher ketch, to join the land-forces under Major-general Kirk, it being found impracticable to relieve the town but by sea, and these ships being the smallest were most proper to go up the river; and the King had before ordered the swallow upon the same service, and four sail were stationed off the harbour's mouth, to assist and secure them from any attempt of the enemy by sea. On the 16th of June Capt. Leake (8) run up the lough. The Swallow and merchant-ships following him, and came to an anchor about a mile and an half below Culmore-castle, a little above which castle, in the narrow part of the river, the Duke of Berwick had contrived a stoccado, (viz. a bomb of timber joined by iron chains, and strengthen'd by a cable twelve inches thick twisted round it) at each end whereof were redoubts with heavy cannon; several boats were likewise sunk, and stoccados with spikes drove into the river, so that the whole seemed impenetrable: besides, the Duke had lined both sides of the river with 2000 musketeers (9). The General [Kirk] therefore held a council of war on board the Swallow; and, considering how the enemy had blocked up and secured the river, it was judged impracticable for the ships to force a passage to the town, and resolved to stay 'till the land-forces were augmented, and then make a descent. But Providence brought the besieged a more speedy deliverance from their extreme miseries by Captain Leake. He was sensibly touched with their sufferings, and resolved to attempt their relief, tho' he could have no other men of war to assist him. The Swallow, which was the only one there, being too large to go up the river, he only borrowed the Swallow's long-boat to assist in cutting the bomb. He concerted the manner of the attack thus. That himself leading the van, should engage the castle and batteries, whilst they in the mean time should pass by, and run with full sail against the boom in order to break it; and the boats, being well-manned and prepared for the work, were immediately to join them, and use their best endeavours to cut the boom asunder and haul the ships through, and the evening was judged the most proper to make the attack. These dispositions were no sooner made than carried into execution, and about seven in the evening of the same day, the 28th of July, Captain Leake got under sail with the Dartmouth and made towards the river, being followed by the victuallers, the Mountjoy of Derry, and the Phoenix of Colerain; but under the great disadvantage of having but little wind to pass the batteries, or to carry them with any force against the boom; but the circumstances of the town would not admit of any delay. Whilst these measures were taking for their relief, the Reverend Mr Walker was preaching to the garrison, encouraging them by the many instances of Divine Providence in their favour since the beginning of the siege, to hope for a speedy deliverance; and, as

(i) So that, from his first command of the Fire-drake fire-ship in 1688 to this time, making upwards of nine years, he had not been one day out of commission.

Major-General Kirk, who saw the action, was so highly pleased with the conduct and bravery of it, that he gave Mr Leake a company in his own regiment, which he enjoyed many years after he was a Flag-officer (e). The importance of rescuing Londonderry by this means from the hands of King James, raised the Captain likewise in the Navy; and the Dartmouth being paid off, he had the command given him of the Oxford, a fourth rate of 54 guns; and May the fourth the following year, 1690, was promoted by the Admiral to that of the Eagle, a third rate of seventy guns. While he held this command, he was very instrumental in clearing that Admiral from the charge of misconduct, in his engagement with the French fleet off Beachy-Point [G]. In 1692, the distinguished figure Mr Leake made in the famous battle of La Hogue, procured him the particular friendship of Mr (afterwards Admiral) Churchill (f); but the Eagle being therein disabled for service, and on that account put out of commission (g), for the present he accepted of the Plymouth, a third rate of 60 guns. However, he was preferred the next year, 1693 (b), to the Offory, a second rate; in which he continued, behaving on all occasions with great reputation 'till the end of the war; which concluding with the peace of Ryfwick, his ship was paid off December 5, 1697 (i). In the interim he lost his father [H], who died in July 1696, in the 68th year of his age, at Woolwich, where he was buried. The Captain at that time was engaged with the grand fleet in the Soundings; and, in his absence, his friends, upon the view of the ensuing peace, had procured for him his father's places of Master-Gunner of England and Store-keeper at Woolwich [I]; but if it had been spoken by inspiration, about an hour after sermon, they discovered Captain Leake with the victuallers coming to their relief. The enemy made a most furious fire upon the Dartmouth from Culmore-castle and the batteries, which was received and returned with great bravery. But having passed the castle, the little wind they had failed them, and a dead calm succeeding, the victuallers were stopped by the boom, not having force to break it, and recoiled, the Mountjoy running stern foremost on the shore. The enemy seeing this, gathered in swarms to the water-side, and gave the loudest and most joyful shouts, crying out our ships were taken; at the same time firing their great and small shot, and preparing their boats to board her, and the extreme grief of the besieged, who plainly saw what passed from the walls of the town to see their last hopes disappointed, is not to be expressed. But, by great Providence, the Mountjoy firing her guns, that shock loosened her; so that, by the help of the rising tide, she got clear, tho' with the loss of Mr Brownrigg her commander, who was killed by the enemy's shot. In the mean time the cannon of the Dartmouth had done great execution against the batteries, some of their guns being dismounted and their men hardly able to stand to those that were not: and whilst the enemies were exulting with joy for the success they seemed to have over the Mountjoy, the boat's crew got upon the boom, cut it asunder, and hawled the Phoenix through, and the Mountjoy followed soon after. Captain Leake continuing the fight 'till he saw they had both got in safety to the city, to the inconceivable joy and transport of a garrison which reckoned only upon two days life, there being left for their subsistence but nine lean horses, and a pint of meal to each man, having sustained a siege of 111 days. This brave and successful undertaking, in spite of all the enemy's works to prevent it, and in fight of an army of 30000 men, was performed with inconsiderable loss, and the enemies were so discouraged thereby, that on the last of July they raised the siege in the night with great confusion; and in their retreat, for revenge of the disappointment, blew up Culmore-castle, and made a miserable havock of the country (10).

[G] He was instrumental in clearing the Earl of Torrington, &c Sir Ralph Delaval, who had been Vice-admiral in the engagement, was President at the Court-martial held on that occasion, Decemb. 10th, 1690, at Sheerness; but the writer of Sir John Leake's Life, observes, that he, who was one of the judges, influenced the sentence; for when he found the court wavering in their opinion, and it was insinuated that all the eyes of the kingdom were upon them expecting justice, [to condemn the admiral] and that even both threats and promises were likewise used to work upon the members of the court to find him guilty, Captain Leake generously undertook his cause, examined every particular of his Lordship's conduct, and so fully justified him, that he brought over the majority to acquit him, and to confirm that sentence under their hands, when the ministry returned it to be reconsidered. This therefore was fit to mention here, as a noble instance of Sir John Leake's integrity (11).

(10) Sir John's Life, p. 13 to 17.

(11) Life, p. 20 to 23. The Dutch author of Hist. de Guil. III. Roy d'Angleterre, and Bishop Burnet, blame this sentence; but Dr Kennet, in his History of England, tells us, that the conduct was commended by the French officers in England after the peace; and 'tis well known, the Court-Martial's sentence was confirmed in Parliament, which Bishop Burnet, in his zeal, seems to forget.

[H] He lost his father. We have already taken notice of his inventing the Cushee. Besides which, he contrived to fire a mortar by the blast of a piece, which has been used ever since, being done before with great hazard, by setting fire to the fusee first, and then to the mortar. He was likewise the principal contriver of what the French called Infernals (12), used at the bombardment of St Malo's in the year 1693. Mr Leake had a surprising genius in all manner of fiery productions, so as to excel all the engineers of his time, having frequent trials of skill with French and Dutch Gunners and Engineers in the Warren at Woolwich, at which King Charles and the Duke of York were often present, and he never failed to baffle all his competitors; nor was he less skilled in Pyrotechny, or the art of making all kinds of compositions of fire-works, of which also he made frequent trials with equal success (13). When he died, our Captain was his only surviving son, and had then a wife and a child by her, a boy. Yet the old man having a daughter, Elizabeth, made her whole and sole executrix of his will, leaving to his son only one moiety of his books and instruments, the other moiety to his daughter's son; by which it appears, says the above-mentioned author, that his resentment for the ill success of his Cushee-piece, continued to the last, though Captain Leake was always a dutiful and affectionate

[I] His friends procured him his father's places. To compass this they had obtained, without the Captain's knowledge, a Letter from Admiral Russell to Lord Romney, Master-general of the Ordnance, in these terms:

' I am desired by Captain Leake to recommend
' him to your Lordship's favour to succeed his father

Mr Leake observes that the Captain had only kept the first Mate's place in complaisance to his father, designing to throw it up whenever he died, as he now actually did.

but he declined that offer, rather refusing to apply to his friends (k) for a Commissioner's place in the Navy. However, upon opening his mind to Admiral Churchill, that friend prevailed with him not to think of quitting the sea, and soon brought him into action there again, procuring him a commission for the Kent, a third rate of 70 guns, which he entered upon May 5, 1699 (l). This ship being discharged the 22d of February following, he continued out of commission a year afterwards. But, on the 28th of February 1700, entered on board Commander of the Berwick, a third rate of 70 guns; whence, upon the prospect of a new war, he was removed to the Britannia (m), the finest first rate in the Navy to go to sea in. Of this ship then he was appointed, January 22, 1701, first Captain of three under the Earl of Pembroke, newly made Lord High-Admiral of England. This was the highest station he could have as a Captain, and higher than any private Captain ever obtained either before or since (n). But, upon the Earl's removal (o), soon after the accession of Queen Anne to the throne, Mr Leake's commission under him becoming void, May 27, 1702, he accepted of the Association, a second rate, 'till an opportunity offered for his farther promotion, which was not long; for, upon the declaration of war against France, he received a commission, June 24 that year, from Prince George of Denmark, appointing him Commander in Chief of the ships designed against Newfoundland [K]. He arrived there with his squadron in August, and destroying the French trade and settlements, restored the English to the possession of the whole island. Upon his return home, he was appointed Rear-Admiral of the Blue on the ninth of December, and Vice-Admiral of the same squadron March the first following (p). He rode out the great storm in November 1703, without receiving any extraordinary damage [L]. In February 1704, he received the honour of knighthood (q), and was engaged under Admiral Rook in taking Gibraltar; soon after which he particularly distinguished himself in the general engagement off Malaga [M] the same year. In 1705, he relieved Gibraltar, and destroyed some of the enemy's ships [N]. In February

[K] Commander in Chief of the Expedition to Newfoundland. He owed this Commission to his friend Mr Churchill, who being appointed one of the Council to Prince George, on his being made Lord High-Admiral May 23d, sent Captain Leake the following letter dated June 9th.

I have propos'd to the Prince your going to command a Squadron to Newfoundland; you will be a CHEF OF SQUADRON. I hope it will be agreeable to you. I desire you would keep this to yourself, and let me hear from you the next post.

I am your friend and servant,

GEORGE CHURCHILL.

This is a true friend's letter, substance without ceremony. Mr Martin Leake observes (16), that this gentleman being little of a seaman himself, was the more struck with admiration at Captain Leake's skill that way, and thought it a credit to him to have such a one to recommend, and was particularly happy that the Captain always answered his recommendation. In the present expedition 51 ships were taken and destroyed, whereof 29 were taken, amounting to 3235 tons, and 209 guns, and of them 16 were brought to England, 6 were sent to Lisbon, 5 fold at St John's in Newfoundland, one of 120 tons and 12 guns was left for the security of the harbour, and the others sent to France with the prisoners. The remainder, to the number of 22, were burnt with their cargoes, as well as great part of the cargoes that escaped, who were glad to get away half laden, or any how to avoid the fate of the rest; besides the burning and destroying Trepassi, St Mary's, Collonet, Great and Little St Laurence, and St Peter's, all very considerable settlements of the French; and Mr Churchill's kindness was so much the greater, as it gave our Commander an opportunity of putting a considerable sum of money in his pocket by the sale of the captures, and particularly of gaining the favour of the nation, by doing it a signal service, without any great danger of not succeeding; all the real fame he acquired thereby arose from his extraordinary dispatch and diligence in the execution.

[L] He rode out the great storm without any extraordinary damage. This was a happiness that no other ship in the fleet could pretend to, and on that account well deserves notice, as an instance of that good fortune for which he was so much distinguished. However, at the same time, it must be observed, that his good fortune, at least in this particular, was owing, under Providence, in some measure to his prudent foresight in providing against the worst the day before, when it blowing very hard, the Admiral and his Captain made a snug ship, veering out their long service to two cables and two thirds, and doing every thing that might enable them to ride out a hard storm; by which proceeding they saved all, without cutting away a mast, or using any extraordinary means, and not only saved themselves, but the Lieutenant, Captain Cook, and 70 men of the Stirling-Castle wreck, and the Cockswain of the yawl of the Mary, the ship in which Admiral Beaumont was lost (17).

[M] Distinguished himself in the general engagement off Malaga. Sir John, who commanded the leading squadron of the van, having, with six ships only, drove that of the enemy, consisting of thirteen, out of the line of battle, so much disabled that they never returned to the fight, dispatched his Captain to Sir Cloudesley Shovel, who commanded the whole van, proposing to push that of the enemy 'till he either broke their line, or obliged the center to draw off; but the motion was not approved by Sir Cloudesley, who, on the contrary, seeing some of our ships in the center, retired out of the line [for want of shot] made use of the opportunity (given him by this defeat of the enemy's van) to close that line by supplying the places of the retired ships. This piece of seamanship made a great figure in that Admiral's character: but the writer so often here quoted, speaking of Sir John Leake's bravery and conduct in this battle observes, 'That, after having forced the enemy's van, and drawn away the battle from Sir Cloudesley, he proposed the only means to relieve our center and make the confederates victorious. But Sir Cloudesley did not comprehend it, and therefore did not approve it: so that, instead of pushing the enemy's van 'till he broke their line, or obliged their center to draw off, which was the shortest way to victory, the battle was lingered out 'till night had put an end to it. The greatest part of our van remaining spectators only. There is surely some skill, continues this author, in sea as well as land actions, and in some instances they resemble each other; but if to beat one third of the enemy's line offered no opportunity of advantage, I think there is no such thing. What could the French desire more, than to retire where they were weakest, and continue the battle where they were strongest; to retreat from a disadvantage, and press where they had the advantage, whilst we acted directly contrary? Whatever praise therefore has been attributed to Admiral Shovel, for his seamanship (as it is called) in closing the line, 'tis obvious his incapacity was the loss of a victory (18).

[N] He relieved Gibraltar. The French by sea, and the Spaniards by land, had laid siege to Gibraltar, soon after the confederates had got possession of it, who had been left in no condition to maintain it long. Sir John therefore (being left with a squadron for the

he received a commission, appointing him Vice-Admiral of the White (r), and in March relieved Gibraltar a second time; and taking and destroying the French squadron there, secured that important place from any further attempts of the enemy [O]. The same year he winter-guard of these parts) used all possible means to get from Lisbon to their assistance; and in the mean time kept up the spirits of the garrison, by a constant expectation of him, carrying on a regular correspondence, notwithstanding the utmost precaution of the enemy's ships in the Bay to prevent it. Arriving there on the 29th of October, two French men of war of 36 guns each, a frigate of 16, a fire-ship of 24, a store-ketch laden with powder and shells, two English prizes, and a tartan, besides many other smaller vessels, as barco-longoes, &c. all, at his coming into the Bay, the French immediately run ashore and burnt. There was likewise the Etoile, a French frigate of 30 guns, which got out of the Bay, but, being chased by the Swallow, was taken, and brought in soon after; so that not one of them escaped. He arrived so opportunely for the besieged, that two days' would in all probability have sunk them beyond hope. For the enemy, by the help of rope-ladders, found means to climb up the rocks, and got upon the mountain through a way that was thought inaccessible, to the number of 500 Spaniards, where they had remained several days. At the same time they had got together a great number of boats from Cadiz and other parts, to land 3000 men at the New Mole. These, by making a vigorous assault on the sea-side, were designed to draw the garrison to defend that attack, whilst the 500 concealed men rushed into the town: there being also a plot (as was discovered some days afterwards) for delivering it up; but this was prevented by Sir John's seasonable arrival. For the men upon the hill now despairing of success, tho' they had bound themselves by an oath not to fall into the enemy's hands; yet hunger drawing them out of their ambuscade, they were discovered the day after Sir John's arrival; whereupon he detached out of the fleet 500 marines and seamen to assist the garrison, whilst Colonel Barr with 500 men marched out of the town, and attacked them with such vigour, that notwithstanding their oath, 190 common soldiers with a Colonel, Lieutenant-colonel, a Major, and 30 Captains, Lieutenants, and Ensigns, were glad to take quarter, the remaining part, more desperate, to the number of 200, were killed on the spot, the rest who endeavoured to make their escape by the same way that they came fell head-long down the rock; so that it was believed few, if any, returned to the camp. The next day Sir John sent a flag of Truce to the Marquis de Villadarias and the Baron de Pointi to treat about the exchange of prisoners, and the day following he received a letter from his Highness the Prince of Hesse-Darmstadt, Governor of the garrison.

'I cannot express, says he, the satisfaction of your appearance so opportunely before this place with the Squadron of Ships under your command, having been the entire reason of saving it from the attempt of the enemy, who were to attack us at that very night of your entrance in many places at once with a great number of men, which with our small garrison we had not been able to have held it out against such a superior force (19).'

(19) Ibid. Ch. vi.

[O] He relieved Gibraltar a second time, &c.] Before his departure the first time, he had procured 2000 recruits from England, which were put into the town in the beginning of December, 1704, and on the 23d he set sail for Lisbon, where receiving advice that the siege being continued, great succours were sent to it by land from the Spaniard, and that the French had invested it with a large fleet by sea under Baron Pointi, He sent 300 soldiers in the Leopard and Roebuck, and as much powder and ordnance stores as they could take in, about the end of January, and in a few days after dispatched a transport with powder and stores thither. March the 6th he set sail for that place, and on the 10th attacked five ships of the French fleet coming out of the Bay, of whom two were taken, two more run ashore and were destroyed, and Baron Pointi died soon after of the wounds he received in the battle. The rest of the French fleet having intelligence of Sir John's coming, had left the Bay the day before his arrival there, viz. March 31, 1705. He had no sooner anchored, but he received the following letter from the Prince of Hesse.

' Sir,

'I expected with great impatience this good opportunity to express my hearty joy for your great and good success at this your second appearing off this place, which I hope hath been the final stroke towards our relief; the enemy since five days having begun to withdraw their heavy cannon, being the effects only to be ascribed to your conduct and care. 'Tis only to you the public owes and will owe for many great and happy consequences of it: and I in particular cannot enough express my hearty thanks and obligations I lie under.

' I am, with great sincerity and respect, &amp;c.

' GEORGE, Prince of Hesse.'

His Highness also presented him with a gold cup on the occasion. This blow struck a panick all along the whole coast, of which Sir John received the following account in a letter from Mr Hill, Envoy at the court of Savoy. I can tell you, says he, your late success against Monsieur Pointi, put all the French coast into great disorder and consternation, as if you were come to scour the whole Mediterranean. All the ships of war that were in the road of Toulon hauled into the harbour, and nothing durst look out for some days. The effect of Sir John's arrival at Gibraltar, March 31st, was, that the enemy in a few days entirely raised the siege and marched off, leaving only a detachment at some distance to observe the garrison. Our loss in the whole siege was only one transport and the Terror bomb. Of the enemy were destroyed and taken one ship of 86 guns, one of 74, one of 66, one of 56, and two of 36, one of 30, two of 24, and one of 16, besides merchant-ships, and smaller vessels, and above 500 men killed, and 1200 taken prisoners. This was the proportion of the losses on each side by sea; and by land it appeared, upon a moderate computation, that of the French and Spaniards could be little less than 10000, whereas the loss of the besieged did not exceed 1200 either killed or by sickness. Notwithstanding what is said by Father Daniel of the taking of Gibraltar, that the behaviour of the English seamen therein was, beyond example, brave, (which seems to be spoken chiefly with a design to cover the wretched politicks of the French, in leaving so strong frontier so much unguarded) Mr Martin Leake observes, that tho' the taking of Gibraltar was certainly a brave enterprize, yet it will bear no comparison with that of preserving it afterwards. It was an easy matter for the grand confederate fleet to surprize the place at a disadvantage with a small garrison: but to preserve the same town, with a small squadron, under all possible disadvantages, against the united force of France and Spain, by land and sea, was an act of the most consummate skill and bravery. This could not have been effected but by the mutual endeavours and harmony of the Prince of Hesse and Sir John Leake. Our Author having thus done justice to the former for his share in the action, he proceeds to that of Sir John, which he observes was much greater, as the whole care and preservation of the place depended upon him. It was from him only their relief could be expected, and his reputation depended upon it; and what fatigues and difficulties did he overcome to accomplish it? He wanted every thing necessary to further him; and all that should have assisted him, prevented and perplexed him. His own credit was the only means to procure him every thing he wanted, and his reputation at stake for the event: we have few such instances in the English history. We have hardly had an instance where the sea and land officers agreed together in any expedition; but none where an Admiral and a General have agreed like the Prince and Sir John, who sacrificed all private views and passions with a disinterested regard and stedfast perseverance for the publick good. No difficulties, no dangers, no fatigues, no advantages, no punctillios, could disunite them; but they acted as by a sympathy of nature, arising from a like generosity and bravery of mind. It was this that crowned their endeavours with a glorious success, which will be remembered was engaged in the reduction of Barcelona (s); after which, being left at the head of a squadron in the Mediterranean, he concerted an expedition to surprize the Spanish galleons in the bay of Cadiz; but this proved unsuccessful by the management of the Confederates [P]. In 1706 he relieved Barcelona, reduced to the last extremity [Q], and thereby occasioned membréd whilst Gibraltar remains a part of the British possessions: and that, it is to be hoped, will be as long as trade and navigation continue to flourish, and the power of the British navy can maintain that conquest (20).

[P] The expedition concerted against the galleons proved unsuccessful by the management of the Confederates. Among the many difficulties Sir John had to struggle with, those occasioned by the joint and separate interests of the Portuguese and Dutch were none of the least, and the opposition given by those allies to this design of surprizing the galleons, for which our Admiral had positive orders (21) from the Prince of Denmark, is a remarkable instance thereof. These galleons were outward bound, and contained more of the wealth of those two nations than of Spain. For this reason all possible obstructions were thrown by both to retard the expedition, and when nothing else proved sufficient to check his motions, and he was, actually under sail from the Bay of Wares he was stopped near the bar by several shot from St Julian's castle, on pretence of an embargo, which he had procured himself, to facilitate the attempt. This accomplished the business: for in that 24 hours, which were spent in getting off the embargo, the galleons being got out of the harbour with a fair wind, were proceeded too far at sea to be overtaken. Thus it was a hard task to perform the publick service, between the joint and separate intrigues of the Portuguese and Dutch; which must some how or other interfere upon every occasion, and consequently to act for the general benefit, was to make them both enemies. Two such allies therefore were enough to have ruined, and would have ruined, any admiral that had not been attended with such extraordinary success as Sir John was (22).

[Q] He relieved Barcelona, reduced to the last extremity, and by that means occasioned the siege to be raised. The siege being raised May 2d, 1706, N. S. was attended with a total eclipse of the sun, which did not a little increasé the enemy's consternation, as if the Heavens concurred to defeat and put to shame the designs of the French, whose monarch had assumed the sun for his device. In allusion to this, the reverse of the medal struck by Queen Anne, on this occasion, represented the sun in eclipse over the city and harbour of Barcelona. As to the action itself, King Charles, afterwards Emperor of Germany, annually commemorated this deliverance by a publick thanksgiving on the 27th day of May as long as he lived. But as some persons (23) have attributed to the Earl of Peterborough the honour of bringing this relief to the city, Mr Martin Leake has endeavoured to set this affair in its true light, in justice to our Admiral. In this design leaving Dr Freund's account as no better than a romance, and sufficiently corrected by Mr Boyer (24), he considers the Gazette of June 6th, 1706, in which a particular narrative of this relief is inserted, to do justice as it was said to Sir John Leake; and the same account has likewise been followed by Mr Lediard (25). It runs thus: The 7th instant [N. S.] the Earl of Peterborough came on board and took upon him the command of the fleet, as admiral. A letter came that day from the King of Spain, dated the 4th, in very pressing instances for relief. Within two hours after the receipt of his Majesty's letter arose a very fine and fresh gale, and brought the fleet with all the forces and recruits from England and Ireland before Barcelona, the 8th instant in the afternoon. What is said of the King of Spain's letter is manifestly false; for this letter of the 4th instant was received the day before the fleet arrived at Barcelona, and his Lordship did not come on board 'till the morning four hours before their arrival, and about three leagues from the place; and then assumed the honour only of wearing the Union flag, as Admiral; but took no command upon him, striking it again in Barcelona road as soon as they came thither. This therefore was contributing no more to the relief of the city, than if his Lordship had gone thither with his flag flying at the head of his barge. His coming to an anchor before the town in this manner did not the least facilitate the motions of the fleet. For all the measures for their relief had before been concerted, and in a manner executed. Since Sir John Leake had detached Admiral Byng and Admiral Wassenauer to make a sail before the fleet; and they had anchored in the road, and actually thrown a good body of forces into the place before one half of the fleet knew the Lord Peterborough was on board; who indeed, upon his arrival was pleased to approve of what had been done: and as to the previous orders which his Lordship took upon him to give for landing the troops, they were happily so little regarded, that there is not the least notice taken of them in any of the councils of war. Nay, it appears that Barcelona was relieved, if not directly contrary to his Lordship's method, yet not pursuant to it. For notwithstanding some troops he had got ready in small embarkations off Veneras and Matero, to take the opportunity, as himself said, of throwing them into Barcelona under the protection of the fleet. Yet, as it is evident that his Lordship knew nothing of the enemies designs upon that place three days before they had actually invested it, so five days after he knew it was besieged, his Lordship was of opinion for landing all the succours in the kingdom of Valencia, and twenty days after by no means nearer than Terragona (26); whence probably the place never had been relieved if his Lordship's orders had been obeyed. Neither can this pretended merit be derived from his being Admiral at that time, and his coming on board, as the Gazette expresses it, and taking upon him the command of the fleet, as Admiral, which can only be implied by his hoisting the Union flag, for he did no other act as such. For his Lordship was not de facto Admiral of the fleet at that time; whence the action appears to be a base affront to Sir John Leake, and a poor attempt to steal away the Laurel; not only in hoisting his flag on board of Sir John's own ship [the George], an action without any precedent, but especially as his Lordship was conscious his authority was questioned both by the King of Spain and all the officers of the fleet. Sir John indeed, tho' he resented this affront, yet very prudently passed it over at the time, being intent to promote the service he was upon; and even in his letter to acquaint his Royal Highness with the relief of Barcelona, he takes no notice of it, but let the matters subside 'till the next opportunity, which was the 15th of May, when, having occasion to give his Highness an account of his further proceedings, he writes thus: 'I forgot, says he, in my last to acquaint you, that my Lord Peterborough came on board me, when I was within three leagues off this place [Barcelona], and hoisted his flag for that day by virtue of his former commission, which I was not willing to dispute; tho' I cannot believe I shall be altogether discharged from my former orders, 'till the arrival of Sir Cloudesley Shovel (27), I shall take the best care I can as well of the fleet, as not to have any disputes with his Lordship about that matter. But his business a shore has taken up his time so much, that he has been pleased to leave every thing to me hitherto, tho' now I believe he intends to hoist his flag on board the Somerset to go by sea to Valencia.' Having given a full answer to the Gazette Mr Leake proceeds to correct a late writer (28), who gives the following account of Sir George Byng's share in this action, viz. That in hastening the Squadron he used such diligence and activity, and joined the fleet with such unexpected dispatch, that the saving the city was intirely owing to it. In reply to this Mr Leake observes, that by Captain Price, who arrived at Lisbon with a Squadron of English and Dutch the 3d of April, Sir John received a letter, dated the 24th of February from Sir Thomas Hardy. They are hurrying, says he, what they can to get Sir George Byng to come to your relief; but he artfully got a grant to go out in the Royal Anne, else I believe he had come with these ships. So that it seems the Squadron was detained 'till the Royal Anne was equipped and manned to Sir George's liking, and was the more remarkable as dispatch was necessary, and no other flag had a first-rate; this was the halting diligence and tioned the raising of that siege by King Philip; and presently after he reduced the city of Carthage. Proceeding thence to those of Alicant and Joyce, they both submitted to him, and he concluded the campaign of that year with the reduction of the city and island of Majorca. Upon his return home, Prince George of Denmark presented him with a diamond ring of 400 pounds value; and he had the honour of receiving a gratuity of 1000 pounds from the Queen, as a reward for his services (t). Upon the death of Sir Cloudesly Shovel in 1707, he was advanced to be Admiral of the White, and Commander in Chief of her Majesty's fleet (u). In this command he returned to the Mediterranean, and surprizing a convoy of the enemy's corn, sent it to Barcelona, and thereby saved that city and the confederate army from the danger of famine in 1708; soon after conveying the new Queen of Spain to her consort King Charles, he was presented by her Majesty with a diamond ring of 300 pounds value. From this service he proceeded to the island of Sardinia; which being presently reduced by him to the obedience of King Charles (w), that of Minorca was soon after surrendered to the fleet and land forces [R].

the unexpected dispatch. Had Sir John been in the same situation he would have gone in any ship of the squadron for expedition sake; and if Sir George had used the same dispatch, he had joined the fleet when Captain Price did, and probably the French fleet had been surprized in Barcelona road; and when he came to Lisbon he stay'd three days there, tho' the wind was fair for sailing all the time. The Irish convoy was what Sir John had most occasion for; had they joined sooner he had relieved Barcelona sooner; and as they joined him five days before the place was relieved, Sir John would have taken the same measures and have done just as he did, tho' Sir George with his squadron had not joined him (29).

[R] Minorca surrendered to the fleet and land forces. Mr Boyer tells us (30), that 'the conquest of Minorca was intirely owing to Major-general Stanhope, since he was the first projector, and had the principal share in the execution of the design; having proposed it to Sir John Leake, and finding him backward to engage in it, prevailed upon King Charles to exert his power, and to command three ships of war to whatever service the British General should think proper, with which the Admiral readily complied.' Mr Martin Leake looks upon this relation to be very injurious to Sir John Leake, and endeavours to vindicate him from the censure in every article thereof. First, as to the author of the project, he observes that the design was mentioned by King Charles in a letter to Sir John Leake from Barcelona, dated June 14th, 1706. I trust, says his Majesty, in your zeal and attention for my service, and that you'll soon begin the operations of the sea, remembering the islands, particularly Port-Mahon, is that which is most agreeable for my interest and the common cause. It does not appear that Lord Stanhope had proposed this design before that time; nay, that he was so far from having the first intention, or indeed any thought of himself to attempt it, that what he did therein was in pursuance of orders he received from England, in consequence of the application made by his Catholic Majesty to the Queen, for having a squadron to winter in the Mediterranean; and set about it in 1708, as a matter which (as he expresses it in a letter to Sir John Leake, of August 24, that year) The ministry laid such a stress upon. Hence it appears that this design had been projected by King Charles and Sir John in 1706, and came, as indeed it was most natural, from the fleet, which every day were made sensible of the benefit that harbour would be from the inconveniencies they suffered from the want of it; and by Sir John's letters to the Earl of Peterborough and Mr Stanhope, dated July the 28th (31), and the resolutions of the council of war taken with regard to Minorca the 19th and 21st of July, 1706 (32), it is obvious the Admiral intended the conquest of that island in that campaign, and would certainly have accomplished it, could he have procured the assistance of a few land-forces from the Earl of Peterborough.

'I will not, however, continue our author, so roundly assert of Sir John, what Mr Boyer does of General Stanhope, that he was the first projector (tho' I think he was). But I may say, that if he was not the first, he had had his eye very early upon it, and was the first who made his Catholic Majesty truly sensible of the importance of that conquest to the allies in the war; and insinuated to the Lord High Admiral the benefit it might prove to the British nation, if it was in their custody, both in war and peace.'

Secondly, That Sir John Leake was not backward to come into the design, is evident, in that when Mr Stanhope proposed it, desiring the assistance of the fleet and marines, he laid aside the expedition he was going upon against the Pope, and the transportation of the troops from Naples; and, calling a council of war the same day, resolved to give the General all possible assistance, as judging it to be more for the common benefit of the allies, than any other service that could be undertaken, and accordingly he carried it into execution. For, having sent the resolution of the council of war with this short answer to Mr Stanhope, 'That he would be at Minorca as soon as him;' he failed directly with the fleet thither, and not finding the General there, he dispatched Ships to Barcelona and Majorca, to hasten him and forward the troops. He waited seven days for Mr Stanhope, and two more before the forces joined him, which yet would not have been done so soon had he not sent ships to hasten and assist in the embarkation. In the interim he blocked up the enemy, cut off all supplies, and made some preparations for the landing of the forces, which was effected without loss, as well as their cannon and mortars, within half gun-shot of the castle by the seamen; who likewise mounted the cannon upon the batteries with little or no assistance from the soldiers, and the gunners of the fleet were employed to manage the guns upon the batteries. The marines made no small part of the land-forces, and fort Fornella was reduced by the ships without the assistance of the soldiers, as indeed all the island submitted without any previous act of the land-forces, except the castle of St Phillip, which was conducted with success by the General. But the action was not otherwise considerable than by the consequence, for the next morning after the first battery was opened, the enemy beat a parley, and capitulated with the loss on our side of only 40 men killed or wounded; whence it is evident that the General, tho' he had a principal share, yet he had not the principal share in this enterprize. He did, indeed, upon receiving his orders from England, immediately propose to the Countess of the cruising squadron, then on the coast of Catalonia, the transportation of some troops from thence for Minorca; for which having no leave from the Admiral, (who, when those ships were sent to that port, knew nothing of these late orders from England) and some danger to the navy, being justly apprehended in the attempt, they could not comply. But they sent two ships at the General's request to Majorca with troops, &c. and dispatched an express for orders to the Admiral, presuming upon his consent thereto. These are the ships that the historian by mistake says, General Stanhope prevailed upon K. Charles to exert his power over, and command to whatever service the British General should think proper; an assertion which shews the writer to be wholly ignorant of military economy, and the nature of the confederated forces: since by these the King of Spain could have no such power to exert over a single ship of the Queen's, unless such ship had previously been put under his Majesty's direction by the Admiral. But this writer has made his Catholic Majesty exert his authority, before he had proposed the matter to the Admiral, and had been refused; whereas, supposing such a power in King Charles, there was no room to exert it but upon that necessity; and as to the pretended backwardness, the contrary thereof is here made apparent. So that it seems foisted in, in order to raise the reputation of the General, as if he

(14) By Mr Martin Leake; the whole of which is inserted at the end of Sir John's Life.

Having brought the campaign to so happy a conclusion, Sir John returned home, where, during his absence, he had been appointed one of the Council to the Lord High-Admiral, and likewise elected Member of Parliament both for Harwich and Rochester (x). In December the same year, he was made a second time Admiral of the fleet. In May 1709, he was constituted Rear-Admiral of Great-Britain, and appointed one of the Lords of the Admiralty in December following (y). In 1710, he was put at the head of that commission, but declined the post [S]. The same year he was chosen a second time Member of Parliament for Rochester, and was made Admiral of the fleet the third time in 1711, and again in 1712, when he conducted the English forces to take possession of Dunkirk (z); and, before the expiration of the year, the commission of Admiral of the fleet was given to him a fifth time. He was also chosen representative for Rochester a third time (a a). Upon her Majesty's death, August 1, 1714, his post of Rear-Admiral was determined, and he was superseded as Admiral of the fleet (b b) the fifth of November following. In 1715, King George the First granted him a pension (c c) of 600 pounds a year [T]. After this he lived privately, and building a little box at Greenwich, he spent part of his time there, retreating sometimes for variety to a country house, which he had at Bedington in Surrey (d d). When a young man, he had married a daughter of Captain Richard Hill (e e) of Yarmouth. This gentlewoman brought him one son, an only child, whose misconduct [U] had given him many years a great deal of uneasiness. Except in this instance, Sir John passed his life with great tranquillity and in perfect health, only a defluxion of his eyes was sometimes troublesome. In August 1719, he was seized with an apoplectic disorder, but it went off without any visible ill consequence. Upon the death of his son, which happened in March following (f f), after a lingering incurable disorder, that had prepared the father for the event; yet he discovered a more than ordinary affliction [W]; and an issue between his shoulders, which had been cut some had made the conquest in spite of the Admiral; whereas, had he been averse to it, it could never have taken effect. But as there was no such power assumed by his Catholic Majesty, or any such backwardness in the Admiral as is pretended; so the extraordinary merit, as well as contrivance, Mr Boyer would attribute to General Stanhope, appears to be nothing else but a trophy of his own imagination, to raise the character of his hero (33). Upon the whole then it must be concluded, that the Historian has transgressed the rule of Ne quid falsi dicere audeat, in his assertion, that the taking of Minorca was entirely owing to General Stanhope. It was a joint action in which the land and sea-commanders amicably concurred, and no preference can perhaps be given to either, without doing an injury to the other: and the words, Insulas Majorcam, Minorcam, Sardiniam, Et Iovicam ad deditio-nem compulsi, are with equal truth and justice inserted in the epitaph intended to the memory of Sir John Leake (34), as those on the monument in honour of Earl Stanhope erected in Westminster-abbey.

[S] He declined the post of First Commissioner of the Admiralty. He was put into this post upon the resignation of Lord Orford, which was one instance of the change of the ministry; Sir John refusing the post continued still first in the new commission, tho' not First Commissioner. By this means he avoided the hazard of that post, being not accountable more than any of the rest for the proceedings of the Board, tho' he sat in the chair and represented the First Commissioner. In the beginning of August, 1713, the Earl of Strafford was appointed First Commissioner; but being abroad, all the management still lay upon Sir John, tho' after this but the second in the Commission.

[T] A pension of 600 l. a year.] In the universal change that was made in every branch of the public affairs, upon the accession of King George I. Admiral Leake could not expect to be excepted. He continued to preserve his honour and gratitude for the memory of his royal mistress after her decease, and spared not to testify it, and never went to Court. This behaviour was easily construed into a disinclination to serve the present Sovereign: and tho' his historian assures us, this was a groundless asperson, and that he desired still to continue in the service; yet the pretence of the contrary was made a handle for getting him off with this short pension, which was no more than had been given to Sir Stafford Fairbourne, who had been only Vice-admiral; whereas, by the constant usage, pensions are always equivalent, at least to the half-pay which of Admiral of the fleet is the clear 50 shillings per day. The partiality was the more obvious, because Mr Aylmer, who succeeded Sir John as Admiral, (being junior to him in that post) only once before commanding in that station, in 1710, at home; having before that been a Vice-admiral, and never done any service worthy memory, was immediately put upon half-pay as Admiral, and paid arrears as such from the year 1710, tho' Sir John was actually Admiral all that time. Mr Martin Leake imputes this, which he calls an ungenerous act, to the then Lords Commissioners; for, says he, Sir John's actions were well known to his Majesty; and he would as readily have consented to a suitable as to an unsuitable pension, had their Lordships proposed it. Sir John resented this proceeding as what he had not deserved, and was hardly prevailed with to accept the pension, which, being full-taxed and ill paid, did not amount to 500 l. a year (35).

[W] A more than ordinary affliction.] This extraordinary degree of grief was more surprizing, as Sir John, upon consideration of his son's hopeless temper, made his Will in February, 1717-18, whereby devising his estate to trustees for the use of his son, during life; he had settled it after his death, without issue, upon Captain Martyn and his heirs. This gentleman was first recommended to Sir John by both the fathers, between whom a friendship had subsisted for many years (38); and from being early Sir John's pupil, entered into the sea-service, where he chose to be with his friend, tho' in an inferior post, rejecting all other means of preferment. Being a midshipman at the battle of Bantry-Bay, in 1689, he had his thigh broke by a cannon-ball. Upon which his Captain, [afterwards Sir] Cloudefley Shovel, promised to provide for him; yet, immediately on his recovery, he went on board the Dartmouth, Captain Leake, whereby he lost several years in his promotion to a command: he was his Lieutenant almost all the while Sir John was a Captain, and became still more closely united to him by marrying his wife's sister. The only separation afterwards was in 1697, when Captain Martin commanded a bomb to Newfoundland; and in 1702 by the like command at Cadiz and Vigo; having in the former signalized his seamanship, and in the latter his bravery, he obtained the Launceston frigate, in which he time, and relieved his eyes, dried up soon after that loss. This symptom was not regarded, no ill effect appearing from it immediately. But, in the beginning of August, he found his back troublesome, occasioned by a pimple in that place; this growing worse in a few days, proved to be a mortification; and when cutting was proposed as the only remedy, he was very averse to the use of that method, being persuaded he should not long survive it, and declared he was content to die rather by the distemper than the operation. Notwithstanding, for the satisfaction of his friends, he submitted cheerfully, and went through it with the utmost resolution; but all means proving ineffectual, he died in his house at Greenwich on the morning of August the first, 1720, in the 65th year of his age; and, on the 30th of that month, his body was conducted thence in a manner suitable to a Rear-Admiral of England, to the parish-church of Stepney, and there deposited in a family-vault, under a monument which he had erected some years before upon the death of his wife (gg). We shall give his character in remark [X].

[X] His character. This is drawn at length by his historian (39); the substance of which is, that as to his person he was of a middle stature, well-set and strong, a little inclining to corpulency, but not incommodiously so. His complexion was florid, his countenance open, his eyes sharp and piercing, and his address both graceful and manly. He had a good constitution, hardly knowing what it was to be sick. Though he drank his bottle freely, yet he was never disguised, or impaired his health by it. His disposition was naturally cheerful and good-humoured, free and open, unless before strangers a little reserved at first, but it soon disappeared. Tho' he had no classical learning, yet, having very good natural parts, few men expressed themselves more properly either in writing or speaking. His passions, tho' strong, yet never betrayed him into any indecency, his heat was soon pacified and ready to forgive; no man being more humane. In his dress he was neat and plain, never very fine; being as free from vanity as from pride, which knew him not. He was certainly one of the best seamen this island has produced, being a perfect master both in theory and practice. He likewise understood ship-building, gunnery, fortification, and the discipline of the land-service, wanting only practice to have made him a good land-officer and engineer. His courage was of the keener sort, without being rash. He would endure the fatigue of any difficulties, and had great presence of mind in any danger, being of opinion that the bravest man would always carry it. In councils of war, where it was too often insinuated, that an undertaking was impracticable if we had not a great superiority, or there was nothing but honour to be gained by it, Sir John usually replied, Let us make it practicable; and before he proposed any enterprize, was well prepared to answer all objections, and even to carry it immediately into execution. This prudent forecast, on which he laid all his undertakings, drew a great deference to his opinion, and made him fortunate in all his designs; which being executed with great vigour, were attended with that glorious success that justly gained him the characteristic epithets of the brave and fortunate Admiral. As he never was proud of his own fortune, so he never envied that of others, nor attempted to supplant them: he set himself wholly to perform the business he was engaged in, and in every station acquitted himself with fidelity and the greatest modesty, being rather too backward to serve his own friends. He hated every thing that was mean or mercenary, and in his whole life never pursued an enterprize with any by-end to himself. He disregarded both riches and grandeur. He shunned the honour of knighthood for some time, and refused the post of First Commissioner of the Admiralty: he refused to be a peer. As to his politic principles, he was for the establishment both in Church and State. No man was more sensible of the benefits to this kingdom, by the Protestant succession, in the house of Hanover; at the same time he retained a dutiful and most grateful regard to the memory of Queen Anne, as the best of Women, the best of Queens, and the best of Mistresses. In private life no man was a better husband, a better father, or a more sincere friend, never happier than in his family; and among his particular acquaintance he had a generosity which took pleasure in serving others. Few men were freer from vice of all kinds, even that of swearing, so generally practised among sea-commanders in his time, he was rarely guilty of: and, to conclude, he was not only morally but christianly virtuous. He had a just sense of religion, causing Divine worship to be duly observed, and countenanced it by his own example. He frequently communicated; and, continues his historian, I have reason to believe, he used private prayers, having found such among his papers in his own hand-writing, adapted to the different circumstances of his life. To sum up all; he was a virtuous, humane, generous, gallant, man, and one of the greatest admirals of his time, as his actions demonstrate: and one thing can be said of him, which can be said of no other Admiral, that he never betrayed one mistake, or had his conduct once censured.

LEE [NATHANIEL], a Dramatic Poet of the XVIIth century, was the son of a clergyman of the established Church [A], who placed him at Westminster-school, under the care of the famous Dr Busby, from whom he received the first rudiments of classical learning. To compleat his studies, he was removed thence to Trinity-college in Cambridge (a), and admitted a scholar upon the foundation in 1668. He commenced Bachelor of Arts the same year (b); but not succeeding to a fellowship, he quitted the university, and tried to push his fortune at Court. However, he had not been long in this pursuit, when, meeting with no substantial favours, he found it necessary to make some advantage of his wit and genius by writing for the Stage. Upon which his first tragedy,

[A] Son of a clergyman of the established Church. As we have nothing certain concerning our author's father, the following conjecture is left to the discretion of the reader. Mr Andrew Marvel, in the 2d part of his Rehearsal transpos'd (1), mentions one Mr Lee, curate to Dr Samuel Parker, (against whom that book was wrote) Minister of Ickham and Chartham in Kent, Arch-deacon of Canterbury, and by King James the second made Bishop of Oxford (2). This Divine, in a treatise on Ecclesiastical Polity, speaking of the Non-conformists of his time (3), says, 'Tis better to submit to the unreasonable impositions of Nero and Caligula, than to hazard the dissolution of the state.

This doctrine Mr Marvel very justly explodes; and having with much wit, run a parallel between the Doctor and his favourite Caligula, in many instances concludes it thus: 'Then as Caligula had his images in the synagogues, so have you your curates at Ickham and Chartham; for they having no power, you know, are no better than statues and images of authority. But Mr Lee, of Ickham, in particular, is so like you that, &c.' Whether this last-named clergyman was our author's father, or not, cannot now be determined; but from the name and the time, 1673, it is far from being impossible.

called Nero Emperor of Rome, appeared in 1675; and in the dedication he gave some strong hints, that he had then been for some time a disappointed dangler at Court. It is not known whether he commenced player before or after he began to write, but that he tried his talents that way without success is most certain [B]; as it is also, that he was soon convinced of his inabilities, and quitted the stage as an actor. He therefore had recourse to his pen, and that being his chief support, he produced a new play every year upon an average, from 1675 to 1681 (c). Many of these shew him to be often possessed with the true poetic enthusiasm, inasmuch, that he might justly have said with Ovid, Est Deus in nobis, &c. but he had the misfortune not to keep within those bounds. It is not known precisely when he first began to be transported into the excess of this divine fury [C]; but he did not lose his senses to that degree, as to be taken into Bedlam, 'till November 11, 1684 (d), having wrote his tragedy called Constantine that year. After a confinement of almost four years in the hospital [D], he was discharged thence April 23, 1688 (e), being so well recovered (f), that he produced his play, called the Princess of Cleve, the ensuing year; which was followed by the Massacre of Paris in 1690. This was his last performance, and he did not long survive it. He died, as it is said, in a frolic by night in the street, and was interred in the parish of St Clement Danes near Temple-Bar (g). He was then in very low circumstances, his chief dependence being a weekly pension of ten shillings, allowed him from the theatre royal, which Colley Cibber, Esq; then a young comedian in that company, remembers his frequently coming to the play-house to receive (h). He had, as a writer, a warm and strong imagination, the fire of which often hurried him into a too verbose and figurative style, and filled his plays with bombast expressions. But when he kept clear of the turgid and pompous, he is allowed to have a great deal of power in the pathetic style; he had a noble fire and elevation, and the tender breathings of love, beyond many of his contemporaries; a great master in the art of moving the passions, especially that universal one, Love, which none ever felt more intimately, described more gracefully, nor ever moved the breasts of his audience with stronger palpitations (i). These excellencies recommended him to persons of the first rank both in understanding and quality, as the Earls of Dorset, Mulgrave, Pembroke, and the Duchesses of Portsmouth and Richmond, who respectively patronized most of his theatrical pieces [E]; his dramatic talents drew also a very high character from the celebrated Mr Addison [F]. 'Tis true, the witty Earl of Rochester [Wilmot], in some passages

(c) Besides these, he joined with Mr Dryden in two more, viz. Oedipus and The Duke of Guise.

(h) Cibber's Apology.

(i) His Rival Queens particularly excels this way, and Theodosius also.

[B] That he tried his talents that way - - - is most certain. Colley Cibber, Esq; now (1752) Poet Laureat, in his Apology for his Life (4), on enquiring into what are the talents necessary to form an Actor, occasionally mentions our author. 'Lee (says he) - - - was so pathetic a reader of his own scenes, that I have been informed by an actor, who was present, that while Lee was reading to Major Mobun at a rehearsal, Mobun, in the warmth of his admiration, threw down his part, and said, Unless I were able to play it, as well as you read it, to what purpose should I undertake it! And yet (continues the Laureat) this very author, whose elocution raised such admiration in so capital an actor, when he attempted to be an Actor himself, soon quitted the stage, in an honest despair of ever making any profitable figure there.'

[C] It is not certain when he began first to shew the excess, &c. There is a tradition, that he first lost his senses, or, at least, the disorder in him was first discovered, on writing a particular line, or rather passage, in one of his plays; which might perhaps be that famous description of madness in his Cæsar Borgia.

To my charm'd ears no more of woman tell;
Name not a woman and I shall be well;
Like a poor Lunatic that makes his moan,
And for a while beguiles his lookers-on;
He reasons well, his eyes their wildness lose,
He vows the keepers his wrong'd sense abuse;
But if you hit the cause that hurts his brain,
Then his teeth gnash, he foams, he shake his chain,
His eye-balls roll, and he is mad again.

If we may venture to form any judgment from several expressions in our author's various dedications, indigence seems to have been the chief cause of his disorder, and that he has described his own condition in the third, fourth, and fifth, of the above lines.

[D] He was almost four years in Bedlam. His condition there was bad enough, if it be not aggravated to a caricatura in a satire on the Poets, where the author describes it thus:

There in a den removed from human eyes,
Possess'd with muse the brain-sick poet lies,
Too miserably-wretched to be nam'd
For plays, for heroes, and for passion fam'd;
Thoughtless he raves his sleepless hours away
In chains all night, in darkness all the day:
And if he gets some intervals from pain
The fit returns; he foams and bites his chain,
His eye-balls roll, and he goes mad again.

[E] His theatrical pieces. Mr Theoph. Cibber thinks the tragedy of Junius Brutus is not only the best of Lee's, but one of the most moving plays in our language. The story of which he gives as follows: 'Junius Brutus engages in the just defence of the injured rights of his country against Tarquin the Proud; he succeeds in driving him out of Rome. His son Titus falls in love, and interchanges vows, with the tyrant's daughter; his father commands him not to touch her, nor to correspond with her; he faithfully promises; but his resolutions are baffled by the insinuating and irresistible charms of Teraminta; he is won by her beauties, he joins in the attempt to restore Tarquin, the enterprize miscarries, and his own father sits in judgment upon him, and condemns him to suffer. The interview between father and son is inexpressibly moving, and is only exceeded by that between his son and Teraminta. Titus is a young hero, struggling between love and duty; Teraminta an amiable Roman lady, fond of her husband, and dutiful to her father. There are (concludes he) throughout this play, we dare be bold to affirm, as affecting scenes as ever melted the hearts of an audience (5).'

[F] From the celebrated Mr Addison. That elegant writer observes, That (6) 'among our modern English poets, there was none who was better turned for Tragedy than our author; if, instead of favouring the impetuosity of his genius, he had restrained it, and kept it within proper bounds. His thoughts are wonderfully suited to Tragedy, but frequently lost in such a cloud of words, that it is hard to see the beauty of them. There is an infinite fire in his works, but so involved in smoke, that passages of his poems, bore pretty hard upon our author [G]; yet in others he paid a just tribute of acknowledgment to Mr Lee's genius [H]. He wrote eleven plays, which were all acted as soon as finished; but his Rival Queens, and Theodosius, or the Force of Love, are the only ones that still keep possession of the stage.

' that it does not appear in half its lustre. He frequently succeeds in the passionate parts of the tragedy, but more particularly where he slackens his efforts, and eases the file of those epithets and metaphors, in which he so much abounds.'

[G] Bore pretty hard upon our author.] The passage of reproach here referred to, is Lord Rochester's allusion to the tenth satire of the first book of Horace; where, speaking of the Tragedy of Sophonisba, that nobleman says (7),

*When Lee, makes temperate Scipio fret and rave,
And Hanibal, a whining am'rous slave,
I laugh; and wish the hot-brain'd, justian fool,
In Bulby's hands, to be well lash'd at school.*

[H] Acknowledgment to Mr Lee's genius.] The acknowledgment of the said Peer to our author's merit, is in the satire wrote in imitation of Sir John Suckling's Session of the Poets; where his lordship takes notice of his Gloriana, or the Court of Augustus, as follows (8):

*Nat. Lee stepp'd in next in hopes of a prize;
Apollo remember'd he had bit once in thrice:
By the rubies in's face he cou'd not deny,
But he had as much wit as wine cou'd supply;
Confess'd, that indeed, he had a musical note,
But sometimes strain'd so hard, that it rattled
i' th' throat.*

*Yet own'd he had sense; and t' encourage him for't,
He made him his Ovid, in Augustus's Court.*

Mr Evelyn, in his imitation of Ovid's Elegy, Ad invidios, carries his regard for the Rival Queens, wrote by our author, very high; tho' perhaps, the play he has coupled it with (Otway's Don Carlos) will not perhaps add any great weight to his opinion. The lines are these:

*When the aspiring Grecian in the East,
And haughty Philip is forgot i' th' West,
Then Lee's and Otway's works shall be sup-pres'd (9).*

L E L A N D, L E I L A N D, or L E Y L A N D E [JOHN], the famous English Antiquary, was born in London [A], but in what parish, or year, doth not appear [B]. It is, however, most probable, that it was about the end of King Henry the Seventh's reign (a). Having, when very young, lost both his parents, he met with a most generous patron in Mr Thomas Miles (b); who not only took care of his maintenance, but also to have him carefully educated at St Paul's-school, under the famous William Lily (c) [C]. When fit for the university, he was sent to Christ's-college in Cambridge [D]; where having studied some years with great industry and success, he then removed to Oxford (d), and became a member of All-Souls-college; but whether he was upon the foundation doth not appear (e). After having greatly improved himself at home, he travelled to Paris, for his further improvement especially in the Greek language; and became acquainted with the learnedest men in France [E], whose conversation and instructions rendered him an accomplished scholar (f). Upon his return, entering into Holy Orders, he was presented to the Rectory of Poppeling, or Popering, in the marches of Calais (g). And King Henry VIII. who had made him one of his chaplains, admiring his learning, constituted him his Library-keeper (h), and dignified him with the title of his Antiquary; a title which no one enjoyed before or since (i). In the year 1533, a commission was granted him under the Great Seal [F], empowering him to make a search after England's antiquities, and peruse the libraries of all cathedrals, abbeys, priories, colleges, &c. as also all places wherein records, writings, and secrets of antiquity were deposited (k). In pursuance of which, obtaining a special dispensation July 12, 1536, to keep a Curate at Poppeling, and to make his residence in England, or elsewhere, at his liberty; he spent above six years in travelling about England [G], and making collections for

for the History and Antiquities of this nation (l) [H]. In the year 1545, he presented an address to King Henry VIII. under the title of 'A Newe Yeares Gifte'; wherein, after a short relation of his travels and his collections, he acquaints his Majesty, that he had 'digested into foure bookes,' an account of the illustrious writers in this Realm, 'with theire lyves and monumentes of learning:' and also lays before him a scheme of what he intended further to do. Promising a draught or map of England on a silver plate; a description of the same kingdom, within twelve months, wherein would be restored the ancient names of places in Britain; then; the Antiquities, or civil History of this nation, in as many books as there are shires in England and Wales, viz. fifty; a Survey of the British Isles in six books; and, finally, an account of the Nobility of Britain in three books. During the dissolution of the monasteries; he saw with very great regret what havock was made of manuscripts, and all ancient monuments of learning, which were in danger of utterly perishing, if no remedy was used. Therefore, he wrote a letter to Thomas Cromwell then Secretary of State; wherein he intreats him, to give him aid and assistance, in bringing to light many antient authors, and sending them to the King's library; who; as he knew well; had no little esteem for them (m) [I]. On the third of April 1542, he was presented to the Rectory of Haseley in Oxfordshire; and in 1543, the King gave him a Canonry in King's-college (now Christ-church) in Oxford; and, about the same time, the Prebend of East and West Knoll in the cathedral church of Sarum: but the canonry of Christ-church he lost in 1545, upon the surrender of that college to the King, and instead of it had no pension allowed him as other Canons had, but preferment elsewhere (n). After having made his large collections, he retired to his house in St Michael le Querne London, in order to digest them; and to compose the books he had promised the world. But either too hard study; or some other cause unknown [K], deprived him of his understanding, and threw him into a phrenzy. His distemper being made known to King Edward VI. and his Council, his Majesty did, on the 21st of March 1550, grant the custody of him to his brother John Laybold senior: empowering him, for his maintenance, to receive the profits of Haseley, Poppeling, and East and West Knoll abovementioned (o). Mr Leland never recovered the use of his reason, but died April 18, 1552, and was buried in the church of St Michael le Querne, London

[H] And making collections for the History and Antiquities of this Nation] 'He enter'd upon this journey with an unusual willingness, being very apprehensive that 'twould conduce much to the Honour of this Nation and to the common Benefit of learning. He carried on his Travels, without intermission, for several years, in which time he went over most parts of England and Wales; and he was so inquisitive in his Remarks, that being not content with what the Libraries of the respective Houses, to which he apply'd himself, afforded, nor with what was recorded in the windows and other monuments belonging to Cathedrals, Monasteries, &c. he wander'd from place to place where he thought there were any footsteps of Roman, Saxon, or Danish buildings, and took particular notice of all the Tumuli, Coyns, Inscriptions, &c. which he happen'd to light upon; though with respect to the Coyns and Inscriptions it is to be wish'd that he had not only mention'd but been also very nice and exact in describing them, and in putting down all the words and letters that were visible on them. It must be acknowledged that in some of the Inscriptions he has done this part very punctually, but for the Coyns he has fail'd in it, thinking it enough to tell us that there had been aoy dug up, without setting down any of the words or letters, or assigning the Emperors to whom they belong'd. But this will be reckon'd a small omission, if it be consider'd that this sort of knowledge had made but little advances at that time, and that what he did in the other parts of his journey was prodigious. For whereas there was then a large stock of MSS extant (however strangely diminish'd soon after, when the grand Dissolution fell out) he gave himself the trouble not only of inspecting the books, but of taking exact catalogues, and of transcribing from them whatsoever passages he judg'd might serve to give any manner of light to the History and Antiquities of this kingdom: nay so curious was he that when he could not with his own eyes find Materials by which to discover the Foundation of any House, the rise and fate of any Family, or the time when and the manner how any accidents of moment happen'd, he would ask of persons that were any ways likely to inform him, and upon their authority put down Memorandums concerning such particulars; yet with this caution, that he never fail'd to distinguish such Authorities from the others which were more certain, and less liable to suspicion and censure. Sometimes he noted the bigness and form of the Monuments; and set down the ornamental figures that were about them. 'Tis pity he had not observ'd the same method always, and drawn with a pen either by his own hands, or by the hands of one that understood that business perfectly well, all the old Statues, Altar-pieces, and other pieces of Antiquity of that kind, which 'tis certain would have been of admirable service. . . . These Travels being carry'd on with indefatigable Industry; and Mr Leland having constant Access to the Libraries and other repositories of the Religious Houses, he amass'd together an immense heap of Collections (8); which make up his Itinerary, and his Collectanea, of which an account is given below.—In his travels, he had an opportunity of preserving many good authors, that, otherwise would have perished, to the great detriment of learning: some of them he placed in the King's Library, and some remained in his custody (9).

[I] Who, as he knew well, had no little esteem for them.] He goes on, in the same letter, with the following words:—'It would be a great profit to students and honour to this realm; whereas now the Germans perceiving our desidioufness and negligence, do send daily young scholars hither, that spoil them, and cutteth them out of Libraries, returning home and putting them abroad as Monuments of their own country, &c. (10).

[K] But either too hard study, or some other cause unknown.] The cause of his madness is ascribed, by the Papiſts, to his 'having degenerated from the ancient Religion (11);' and by others, to his not being able to perform what he had promised; or, according to others, his poetical wit made him so conceited, that it was the chief reason of his phrenzy (12).

London (p) [L]. An account of what he published [M], and of what he left in manuscript [N], is given below in the notes. So valuable were his manuscript collections found, that King Edward VI. thought them worth his notice and care; and accordingly ordered his tutor, Sir John Cheke (one of the greatest lights of learning in this nation) to take them into his custody. Sir John, after having perused them, gave the four volumes of the Collectanea to Humphrey Purefoy, Esq; afterwards one of the Privy-Council to Queen Elizabeth in the north parts of England: and his son Thomas Purefoy, of Barwell in Leicestershire, made a present of them, in 1612, to the famous Antiquary William Burton of Lindley, Esq; The seven volumes of the Itinerary came also into the same Mr Burton's possession, after having passed, it seems, through Lord Paget's and Sir William Cecil's hands: and, in 1632, Mr Burton deposited them all into the Bodleian library at Oxford (with a fair transcript of some parts of them), except one volume, which having been lent out by Mr Burton, did not come to that library 'till long after, when it was given by Mr Charles King of Christ-church, a most skilful and learned Antiquary. Some others of his manuscripts came into the possession of Sir Robert Cotton, who lodged them in his excellent Library (q). Of these Works of Mr Leland, great use has been made, by J. Bale in his Catalogue of English Writers; Mr Camden in his Britannia; William Burton, Esq; in his Description of Leicestershire; Sir William Dugdale in his Antiquities of Warwickshire, and Barons of England; and by most of our other learned Antiquarians. As to Mr Leland's character; we are assured, that he 'was an extraordinary person, having (besides his being a great master in poetry and oratory) attained to a good share of knowledge in the Greek, Latin, Welsh, Saxon, Italian, French, and Spanish languages (r):' so that he was born for the service and honour of his country (s). And one of his contemporaries 'boldly affirms, that England never saw, and he believes should never see, a man to him in all things to be compared,' with regard to his skill in the Antiquities of Britain. 'For undoubtedly, says he, he was in these matters wonderful and peerless, so that as concerning them, England had yet never a greater loss (t).'

[L] And was buried in the church of St Michael le Querne, London.] That church stood at the west end of Cheapside, between the late Conduit there and Pater-noster-row. It was burnt down in the great fire, and the site of it laid out to enlarge the street. The living is united to that of St Vedast, Fosterlane (13).

[M] An account of what he published.] This is an exact list of it, according to the order of time in which the several pieces were published. 1. Nenia in mortem Thomae Viati equitis incomparabilis. [i. e. An Elegy on the death of Sir Thomas Wiat, Kt.] Lond. 1542, 4to, reprinted by Mr Hearne, at the beginning of the second volume of Leland's Itinerary. 2. Genethliacum illustrissimi Eduardi Principis Cambriae, Ducis Cornubiæ, & Comitum Palatini. Syllabus & interpretatio antiquarum Distionum quæ passim in libello seſtori occurrunt. [A Poem on the birth of Edward Prince of Wales, &c. with an explanation of the ancient names of places used in that poem.] Lond. 1543, 4to, reprinted in the 9th volume of his Itinerary. 3. Aſſertio inſublimiſſimi Arturij, regis Britannia. Elenchus antiquorum nominum, Lond. 1544, 4to, translated into English, and published under this title, 'Ancient Order, Societie and Unitie laudable of Prince Arthur and his knightly Armorie of the Round Table; with a threefold Aſſertion, Englished from Leland by R. Robinson 1582.' 4. Κυρνεον Αρμα. Cygnea Cantio. Commentarij in Cygnea Cantionem indices Britannicae Antiquitatis locupletissimi. [A Swan's song, with a Commentary on the same.] Lond. 1545, 4to, reprinted in 1658, 12mo, and in the 9th volume of the Itinerary. 5. Εγνωνιον της Ερηνης. Laudatio Pacis. [The Praise of Peace.] Lond. 1546, 4to, a Latin poem. Reprinted by Mr Hearne in the fifth volume of our author's Collectanea. 6. His 'Newe yeares Gifte to King Henry the VIII. in the 37th yeare of his Raygne,' mention'd above, was printed in his life-time, Lond. 1549, 8vo, by John Bale, with notes; who added thereto of his own, A Register of the names of English writers, whom the second part of his work, De Scriptorib. Britannia, shall comprehend. Mr Hearne has re-printed the 'Newe yeares Gifte' in the first volume of the Itinerary.

[N] And of what he left in manuscript.] What he left in manuscript consisted of, A collection of Epigrams, and small pieces, in verse; of his Itinerary through most parts of England, in 7 volumes, quarto; of four volumes of Collections, in folio; and other less pieces, the chief of which have been published at different times, in the following order. 1. His Epigrams, and other small poetical pieces, were published in 1589, by Tho. Newton of Cheshire, under this title, Principum ac illustrium aliquot & eruditorum in Anglia virorum Encomia, Trophæa, Genethliaca, & Epithalamia, Lond. 4to. 2. Mr Anthony Hall published in 1709, the fourth volume of his Collections, containing the lives and characters of most of the eminent writers of England, and intitled it, Commentarij de Scriptoribus Britannicis, auctore Joanne Lelando Londinate, Oxon. 1709, 2 volumes 8vo, commonly bound in one *. J. Bale transcribed a great part of this work, in his Scriptorum Britannicæ Catalogus, and mentions Mr Leland with due commendations. J. Pits quotes it also often, without ever having seen it: for, what he pretends to have taken from thence, he plainly took at second hand from Mr Bale (14). 3. 'The Itinerary of John Leland the Antiquary,' was published by the industrious Thomas Hearne, Oxford 1710, &c. 9 volumes 8vo. A second edition was reprinted in 1745, with improvements and additions; the original MS. having been re-examined with the most strict care, many places supplied and amended, and many passages restored to their proper places (15). 4. The same industrious person published also Mr Leland's Collections, under this title, Joannis Lelandi Antiquarii de Rebus Britannicis Collectanea. Ex autographis descripta ediditque Tho. Hearne A. M. Oxoniensis, qui & Appendicem subjecit, totumque opus (in VI volumina distributum) Notis & Indice donavit, Oxon. 1715, 8vo.—5. One of Mr Leland's smaller pieces, was, Nenia in mortem Henrici Duddleji Equitis, An Elegy on the death of Sir Henry Duddley: first printed by Mr Hearne, in his edition of John Rosse. 6. And he hath printed the following, in the sixth volume of Leland's Collectanea, viz. Bononia Gallo-massyx in laudem victorie felicissimi Henrici viii Anglici, Francisci, Scotici, &c. i. e. upon K. Henry the VIIIth's taking Boulogne in the year 1544. 7. And this in the fifth volume of the same work, Codrus, sive laus & defensio Gallofridi Arturii Monmetensis contra Polydorum Vergilium. A defence of Geoffrey of Monmouth against Polydore Vergil.—The few other pieces he finished, remain in manuscript in the Cottonian (16) and other libraries.—As for the many other books ascribed to Mr Leland by Bishop Bale, and J. Pits, most them had no existence but in those writers imagination; or else were only intended by Mr Leland, who had made no kind of progress in them.

LESLIE, or LESLEY [CHARLES], a learned writer in the XVIIth, and beginning of the XVIIIth, century, was the second son of Dr John Leslie, Bishop of Clogher in Ireland (a) [A]. After having been educated in Grammar-learning at Inniskilling in the county of Fermanagh, he was admitted, in 1664, a Fellow-commoner in Dublin-college, where he continued 'till he commenced Master of Arts. Then he came and entered himself in the Temple at London, and for some years studied the Law; but at length growing weary of the dryness and intricacy, as well as the iniquity and chicanery, of the contentious part of that profession, he relinquished it, and applied himself to Divinity. In 1680 he entered into Holy Orders, and in 1687 became Chancellor of the cathedral of Connor; about which time he rendered himself particularly obnoxious to the Popish party in Ireland, by his zealous opposition to their absurd and wicked doctrines, and their indefatigable industry in promoting them. For, Roger Boyle Bishop of Clogher dying in 1687, Patrick Tyrrel was made titular Popish Bishop, and had the revenues of the See assigned him by King James. He set up a convent of Friars in Monaghan, and fixing his habitation there, held a public visitation of his clergy with great solemnity. Some subtle Logicians attended him in this visitation, and he was so insolent as to challenge the Protestant clergy to a public disputation. Mr Leslie undertook the task, which he performed to the satisfaction of the Protestants, and the indignation and confusion of the Papists; though it happened, as it generally does at such meetings, that both sides claimed the victory. He afterwards held another public disputation with two celebrated Popish Divines, in the church of Tynan, in the diocese of Armagh, before a very numerous assembly of persons of both religions; the issue of which was, that Mr John Stewart, a Popish gentleman, solemnly renounced the errors of the Church of Rome. As the Papists had got possession of an Episcopal income, they ingrossed other offices too, and a Popish High-Sheriff was appointed for the county of Monaghan. This proceeding alarmed all the gentlemen in that county; who depending much on Mr Leslie's knowledge as a Justice of Peace, they repaired to Him, then confined by the gout to his house. He told them, 'That it would be as illegal in them to permit the Sheriff to act, as it would be in him to attempt it.' But they insisting, that Mr Leslie should appear in person on the Bench at the approaching quarter-sessions, they all promised to act as he did; so he was carried there in great pain and with much difficulty. Upon inquiry whether the pretended Sheriff was legally qualified, he answered pertly, 'That he was of the King's own religion, and it was his Majesty's will that he should be Sheriff.' Mr Leslie replied, 'That they were not inquiring into his Majesty's religion, but whether he had qualified himself according to law for acting as a proper officer. That the law was the King's will, and nothing else to be deemed such; that his subjects had no other way of knowing his will but as it is revealed to them in his laws, and it must always be thought to continue so, 'till the contrary is notified to them in the same authentick manner.' Wherefore the Bench unanimously agreed to commit the pretended Sheriff for his intrusion and arrogant contempt of the Court. Mr Leslie committed also some officers of that tumultuous army, which the Lord Tyrconnel raised for robbing the country (b). Hitherto Mr Leslie had acted consistently, as a Divine and a good Magistrate. Happy man, if his life had ended here! But having strongly imbibed the doctrines of Passive Obedience and Non-resistance, they so biased his judgment, as that at the Revolution he refused to take the oaths to King William and Queen Mary; on which account he was deprived of his preferments, being esteemed the head, or at least a man of the greatest

[A] Was the second son of Dr John Leslie, Bishop of Clogher in Ireland.] This prelate was descended from the ancient family of his name, and born at Balquhaine in the north of Scotland. His education for some time was at Aberdeen and then at Oxford. Afterwards he travelled into Spain, Italy, and Germany; but continued longest in France, where he made himself master both of the most polite and abstruse parts of learning. He spoke French, Spanish, and Italian, with the same propriety and fluency as the natives; and was so great a master of the Latin, that it was said of him, when he was in Spain, Solus Lesleius Latine loquitur, 'Leslie is the only man that can speak Latin.' He continued 22 years abroad, and during that time was at the siege of Rochelle, and the expedition of the isle of Rhé with the Duke of Buckingham. He was all along conversant in courts, where he learned that address, which gave a peculiar grace even to his preaching. These accomplishments procured him the favour of many Princes abroad, and at home he was happy in that of King Charles I. who admitted him into his Privy-council both in Scotland and Ireland; in which situations he was continued by King Charles II. after the Restoration. His chief preferment in the Church of Scotland was the bishoprick of Orkney or of the Isles, from whence he was translated to Raphoe, June 1, 1633, and was the same year admitted into the Privy-council of Ireland. He not only recovered a considerable part of the reve-nuces of his bishopric of Raphoe, which had been seized and engrossed by several gentlemen; but also built a stately palace in his diocese for himself and his successors, contriving it for strength as well as beauty; which proved to be useful afterwards in the rebellion of 1641, and preserved a good part of that country. The good bishop exerted himself as much as he could in defence of the Royal cause; and endured a siege in his castle of Raphoe, before he would surrender it to Oliver Cromwell, being the last that held out in that country. He then retired to Dublin; where he always used the Liturgy in his family; and even had frequent Confirmations and Ordinations. After King Charles's restoration, he came over to England, and hastened with so much zeal to see his Majesty, that he rode from Chester to London, which is 182 miles, in twenty-four hours. On the 17th of June, 1661, he was translated to the see of Clogher; and 'tis said, was offered a better, which he refused, being resolved to end his labours among those with whom he had suffered, and where his influence was most beneficial. He died in 1671, aged a hundred years and more, having been above 50 years a Bishop, and being then reckoned the ancientest Bishop in the world. His death happened at his seat called Castle-Lesley, alias Glaslough; and he was there buried in a church of his own building, which he procured by act of parliament to be made the parish-church. He was a very temperate man, and extremely generous (1).

greatest abilities, among the Nonjurors. In 1689, when troubles began to arise in Ireland, he withdrew with his family into England; and set about writing several political pieces, to serve the cause and party he had embraced (c). The first was, 'An Answer to a book intitled, The State of the Protestants of Ireland under the late King James's Government [B]. Of the rest an account is given below [C]. He became also a strenuous champion for the Church of England against the Quakers [D], and other dissenters

[B] An Answer to a book intitled, The State of the Protestants, &c. That book intitled, The State of the Protestants of Ireland under the late King James's government; in which their carriage towards him is justified, and the absolute Necessity of their endeavouring to be freed from his government, and of submitting to their present Majesties is demonstrated; was written by Dr William King, then Bishop of Derry, afterwards Archbishop of Dublin, and published at London in 1691, 4to, and the year following in 8vo, with additions. In the introduction, the learned author gives an explication of the doctrine of Passive Obedience; and observes, that a King, who designs to destroy a people, abdicates the government of them. And in the first chapter of the book he endeavours to shew, that it is lawful for one Prince to interpose between another Prince and his subjects, when he uses them cruelly. In the second, that King James II. designed the destruction of his subjects. In the third chapter he treats of the King's actual progress in their destruction. In the fourth chapter he asserts, that there remained no prospect of deliverance for the Protestants in Ireland but from King William, &c.—Mr Lesley's Answer, which is a very angry one, was published at London, in 1692, 4to. He begins it, with observing, that Dr King's book 'is calculated for the destruction of mankind, by setting up such principles as countenance eternal rebellions, and afford pretences for war and confusion to the end of the world; and makes settlement and peace impracticable among men (2).' Then he proceeds to examine first the Principles of Dr King's book, and next, the Matters of fact. With regard to the latter, 'I cannot (says he) say that I have examined into every single matter of fact which this author relates; I could not have the opportunity; but I am sure I have the most material; and by these you will easily judge of his sincerity in the rest, which could not all come to my knowledge. But this I can say, there is not one I have enquired into, but I have found it false, in whole, or in part, aggravated or misrepresented, so as to alter the whole face of the story, and give it perfectly another air and turn. 'Infomuch, that though many things he says were true, yet he has hardly spoke a true word, that is, truly and nakedly, without a warp (3).' He afterwards observes, that Dr King 'owes his life to the King's mercy. Was not he accused (says he) for holding correspondence, and giving intelligence to the rebels (as they were then called) both in England and Ireland: and was it not true.'—He adds that he had been 'told by Protestants in Dublin, that King James had once so good an opinion of Dr King, that he had him frequently in private, and trusted him in his affairs till at last he found him out (4).' And he affirms, that no man was or could be a higher asserter of Passive Obedience than Dr King had been all his life, even at the beginning of the Revolution; 'and that he told a person of honour, from whose mouth (says Mr Lesley) I have it, that if the Prince of Orange came over for the crown, or should accept of it, he prayed God might blast all his designs. That there was no way to preserve the honour of our religion, but by adhering unalterably to our loyalty. That it would be a glorious fight to see a cart full of clergymen going to the stake for Passive Obedience, as the primitive Christians did. That it would prove the support and glory of our religion, but that a rebellion would ruin and disgrace it. He said, if it were no more than that declaration, which he had subscribed, of its not being lawful upon any pretence whatsoever to take arms against the King, &c. he would dye a hundred deaths rather than do it (5).' Mr Harris observes, that in this piece, Mr Lesley shews himself as averse from the Principles and Practices of the Irish and other Papists, as he was from those of the author, whom he endeavours to refute (6).

[C] Of the rest of his political works, an account, &c. They all came out without his name. The best list of them is given by Walter Harris, Esq; (7) in the following words: 1. 'Cassandra, (but I hope not) telling what will come of it; wherein the new Associations are considered.' No. 1. and 2. Lond. 1703, 4to. Alluding to Cassandra's predictions during the siege of Troy (which none would believe) and the Associations entered into at the beginning of Queen Anne's reign. 2. 'Rehearsals.' A paper published at first once a week, afterwards twice, in a folio half sheet, by way of dialogue on the affairs of the times; begun in 1704, and continued for six or seven years. They plead for Non-resistance; and derive all Government wholly from God. (8). 3. 'The wolf stripped of his Shepherd's cloathing, in answer to Moderation a virtue.' Lond. 1704, 4to. The pamphlet it answers was written by James Owen *. 4. 'The Bishop of Sarum's [Burnet's] proffer defence from a speech said to be spoken by him against occasional conformity.' Lond. 1704, 4to. 5. 'The new Association of those called moderate Churchmen, with the moderate Whigs and Fanatics, to undermine and blow up the present Church and Government; occasioned by a Pamphlet intitled, 'The Danger of Priest-craft.' Lond. 1705, 4to. 6. 'The new Association. Part. II.' 1705, 4to. 7. 'The Principles of Dissenters concerning Toleration and occasional Conformity,' Lond. 1705, 4to. 8. 'A warning for the Church of England.' Lond. 1706, 4to. Some have doubted whether these two pieces were his. 9. In one of those tracts, Mr Leslie introduceth a Hotentot, disputing with Dr Higden and Mr Hoadley. Some have also ascribed to our author a 'History of the Revolution;' but Mr Harris was informed that it is none of his.—He is positively said to have written 'An Account of the Massacre of Glencoe,' in 1692 (11), being I suppose the same that is inserted in the Appendix to vol. II. of Boyer's History of King William (12).

[D] Against the Quakers. His controversy with the Quakers was occasioned by his lodging in the house of a preacher and writer of that persuasion. He converted him and his wife, who had been baptized before the birth of Quakerism in England; but he baptized their children who were married. His books in that controversy were, 1. 'The Snake in the Grass; or Satan transformed into an Angel of Light,' Lond. 1697, 8vo. 2. 'A reply to a book intitled, Anguis flagellatus, or 'a Switch for the Snake; in the Opus palmare of the Quakers; being a second Defence, or the third and last part of the Snake in the Grass. Shewing that the Quakers are plainly self-condemned in this their last Answer; and therefore it is to be hoped that this will put an end to that controversy. To which is added an Appendix of Papers relating to the foregoing Discourse,' Lond. 1702, 8vo. 7. 'Primitive Heresy revived in the Faith and Practice of the people called Quakers: wherein is shewn in seven Particulars, that the principal and most characteristical Errors of the Quakers were broached and condemned in the days of the Apostles, and the first 150 years after Christ. To which is added, a friendly Exposition with Mr Pennon account of his Primitive Christianity lately published,' Lond. 1698, 4to. 8. 'The present state of Quakerism in England. Wherein is shewed, that the greatest part of the Quakers in England are so far converted as to be convinced; upon occasion of the relaps of Samuel Crisp to Quakerism. Offered to the consideration of the general yearly meeting of the Quakers in London in Whitson-week, 1701.' 9. Under this head we may also place our author's 'Essay concerning the divine Right of Tythes,' Lond. 1700, 8vo. 'The subject of Tythes being (as he observes in the preface to that book) the great Diana of the Quakers.'

[E] And other dissenters. He observes, in the Preface just now mentioned (13), That his 'controversie with the Quakers had led him into subjects of different natures, and engag'd him among other parties. As when they began to be convinced concerning the necessity and benefit of the sacraments of Baptism and the Lord's-supper; but stuck upon the Administrator, to whom they should go for it: to satisfy them in this, for'd me (saith he) directly upon the cause of Episcopacy; this concerned other Dissenters. And received a very angry Answer from one who styles himself a Presbyterian. Wherein I could find nothing to reply to but Passion and personal reflections, therfor I let it sleep.' What he published under this head was only, 10. 'A Discourse shewing who they are that are now qualified to administer Baptism and the Lord's Supper: wherein the cause of Episcopacy is briefly treated.'—Unless we should add thereto, 11. 'The History of Sin and Heresy, attempted from the first war that they raised in heaven, through their various success and progress upon earth, to the final victory over them, and their eternal condemnation in hell: in some meditations upon the feast of St Michael and all Angels.' Lond. 1698, 4to. Upon this occasion, Mr Harris takes notice (14), that 'as Mr Leslie observed, that every one of the numerous converts he made from Quakerism were desirous of returning to Presbytery, from whence they had last sprung, he was obliged to treat the subject of Church-government, to direct them to those who alone have power to administer the sacraments; and his Essay on the divine Right of Tythes, to shew, who they are that have a just claim to live by the altar, what quantum they are intitled to, and by what tenure they ought to hold it.'

[F] Against the Deists. What he published against them, is intitled, 12. 'A short and easie Method with the Deists, wherein the Certainty of the Christian Religion is demonstrated by infallible proof from four Rules, which are incompatible to any Imposture that ever yet has been, or that can passibly be,' Lond. 1699, 8vo. 13. 'A Vindication of the short and easie Method with the Deists. In answer to a book lately published with this title, viz. A Detection of the true meaning and wicked design of a book, intitled, A plain and easie Method with the Deists; wherein it is plainly proved, that the Author's four

Marks are the marks of the Beast, and calculated only for the cause and service of Popery.'—The four Rules mentioned above, are these: 'First, That the matters of Faith be such, as that mens outward senses, their Eyes and Ears, may be judges of it. Secondly, That it be done Publickly, in the face of the world. Thirdly, That not only publick Monuments be kept up in memory of it, but some outward Actions to be performed. Fourthly, That such Monuments and such Actions or Observances be instituted, and do commence from the Time that the matter of Faith was done.'—In this book, our author 'was confined to the close way of putting the cause upon one medium or topick of Reason by a person of the first quality, who refused to enter into any discussion of the argument on other terms. And when he had established the Facts of our Saviour's Miracles by the four Marks insisted on in that treatise, he perswaded a Gentlewoman of great worth to copy it, and it wrought with her the effect proposed, as it afterwards did with the great man, for whose consideration it was originally put into that light.' The Vindication of that piece was occasioned by a blasphemous libel, and drew on a further treatise, called, 14. 'The Truth of Christianity demonstrated, in a Dialogue betwixt a Christian and a Deist. Wherein the Case of the Jews is likewise considered,' Lond. 1711. 8vo.—wherein he gives four additional Marks, 'which make such a demonstration, as no other subject but Christianity is capable of. (15).'

[G] And Jews. The treatise he published against them bears this title, 15. 'A short and easie Method with the Jews. Wherein the Certainty of the Christian Religion is demonstrated by infallible proof from the Four Rules made use of against the Deists, shewing that these Four Rules do oblige the Jews as much or more than the Deists to the Acknowledgment of Christ. With an Answer to the most material of their Objections and Prejudices against Christianity.' This is dated, at the end, Good friday, 1689, and the 4th edition of it was published in 1715.—Mr Harris informs us, that 'the application of the Four Marks above-mentioned to the Jews, proceeded from his Conferences with an eminent Jew, who confessed, that all his objections were answered, and that he intended to own his conviction; but he died soon after, during Mr Leslie's absence, and to his great regret (16).'

[H] The errors of Socinians. Against them he published, 16. 'The Socinian Controversy discussed, in six Dialogues: Wherein the chief of the Socinian Tracts published of late years are considered,' Lond. 1708. 17. 'An Answer to Remarks on the first Dialogue against the Socinians.' 18. 'A Reply to the Vindication of the Remarks upon the first Dialogue on the Socinian controversy.' 19. 'An Answer to the Examination of the last Dialogue, relating to the Satisfaction of Jesus Christ.' 20. 'A Supplement in answer to Mr Clendon's Traictatus Philosophico-Theologicus de Personâ; or, a Treatise of the word Person.' The choleric Mr Clendon had spoken, in his Preface, very contemptuously and abusively of our author, which forced him to this Reply.—But, amongst our Author's valuable pieces against Socinianism, we must not reckon one which he published against the excellent Archbishop Tillotson, with the following long title: 'The charge of Socinianism against Dr Tillotson considered, in examination of some Sermons he has lately published on purpose to clear himself from that imputation. By way of dialogue between F. a friend of Dr T's, and C. a Catholic Christian. To which is added some Reflections upon the second of Dr Burnet's Four Discourses concerning the Divinity and Death of Christ, printed in 1694. To which is likewise annex'd a Supplement upon occasion of a History of Religion lately published, supposed to be wrote by Sir R. H—D. Wherein likewise Charles Blount's great Diana is considered; and both compared with Dr Tillotson's Sermons. By a true son of the Church †.'

or published are mentioned below in the note [K]. In the mean time, Mr Leslie's writings, and his frequent visits to the Courts of St Germain's and Bar le Duc, had rendered him obnoxious to the Government. But he became more so upon the publication of 'The Hereditary Right of the Crown of England asserted;' of which he was the reputed author (d). Finding himself then under a necessity of leaving the kingdom, he repaired to the Pretender at Bar le Duc, where he was allowed to officiate in a private chapel after the rites of the Church of England (e); and took much pains to convert the Pretender to the Protestant religion [L], but in vain (f). To promote his interest, when a great stir was made about him in England, Mr Leslie wrote a letter from Bar le Duc to a Member of Parliament in London [M], dated April 23, 1714, which was printed and dispersed among his adherents (g). All their hopes being disappointed by the quelling of the rebellion in 1715, and the Pretender being obliged to withdraw into Italy, Mr Leslie attended him thither: where he continued till about the year 1721. But finding nothing but disappointments, and having undergone many difficulties, he returned to his native country, and died the 13th of April, 1722, at his own house at Glasgow in the county of Monaghan (h). As to his character; the famous Mr Bayle styles him, 'A man of great merit and learning; and tells us, that he is the first who wrote against the errors of Bourignon in Great-Britain. His books (adds he) which he published against the Quakers are much esteemed, and especially his treatise of the Snake in the Grass (i).' Mr T. Salmon observes, that his works 'must transmit him to posterity, as a man of thoroughly learned, and truly pious (k).' But a better and more disinterested judge (l) informs us, that Mr Leslie made several converts from Popery; and says, that 'notwithstanding Mr Leslie's mistaken opinions about Government, and a few other matters, he deserves the highest praise for defending the Christian religion against Deists, Jews, and Quakers, and for admirably well supporting the doctrines of the Church of England against those of Rome.'

'The true notion of the Catholic Church, in answer to the Bishop of Meaux's Letter to Mr Nelson: to which is prefixed the Letter itself.'

[K] The few other pieces he wrote or published are mentioned in the note ] They were the four following; 24. 'A Sermon preached in Chester against Marriages in different communions.' Lond. 1702, 8vo. This sermon being communicated to Mr Dodwell before it was printed, produced a Discourse from him upon the same subject. 25. 'A Dissertation concerning the Use and Authority of Ecclesiastical History. In a Letter to Mr Samuel Parker on his Abridgement of Josephus.' 26. 'The Case of the Regale and of the Pontificate stated, in a Conference concerning the Independency of the Church upon any Power on earth, in the exercise of her purely spiritual Power and Authority,' Lond. 1702, 8vo. With an Appendix of Papers relating to it.' 27. 'A Supplement in answer to a book, intitled, The Regal Supremacy in Ecclesiastical Affairs asserted, in a Discourse occasioned by the Case of the Regale and Pontificate.' These two pieces were occasioned by the controversy between Dr Wake, Dr Hody, and Dr Kennet, on one side; and Dr Atterbury, and his friends, on the other; concerning the Authority of Christian Princes over the Church. And by the Regale Mr Leslie means, the right which is in the King, to be the Civil head or governor, and to exercise the power of the Civil Sword, in all causes and over all persons, as well ecclesiastical as temporal. But he thinks it utterly inconsistent for him to be the Ecclesiastical Head or Governor, and to have any sort of Ecclesiastical Power or Authority. — Therefore, by the Pontificate, he means the Independence of the Church, not only on heathen but Christian Magistrates, as an original, inherent, and divine Right, with which Christ has invested her, and which ought always to be maintain'd (17). The 27 last-mentioned pieces were collected together by the author and published in 1721, in two volumes in folio.

[L] And took much pains to convert the Pretender to the Protestant Religion.] The late Lord Bolingbroke says, 'That the Pretender had sent for Mr Lesley over; that he allowed him to celebrate the Church of England service in his family; and that he had promised to hear what this Divine should represent on the subject of Religion to him.—But Lesley was ill-used by the Chevalier, who was far from keeping the word which he had given, and on the faith of which Mr Leslie had come over to him. He not only refused, to hear him himself, but sheltered the ignorance of his Priests, or the badness of his cause, or both, behind his authority, and absolutely forbid all discourse concerning religion *.'

[M] A Letter from Bar le Duc to a member of Parliament in London.] This piece began with a fine description of the Pretender's person and character.—'his graceful mien, magnanimity of spirit, devotion free from bigotry, application to business, ready apprehension, sound judgment, and affability; so that none conversed with him, but what were charm'd with his good sense and temper.'—Then, after mentioning the proceedings in Parliament against him, and dwelling some time upon his birth, it went on thus:—'And because the greatest hurt any King of England can do to the Church of England, is putting bad Bishops upon her; this being a corrupting the fountain; therefore, to avoid all jealousies, he was willing, during his reign, so far to wave his prerogative in the nomination of Bishops, Deans, and all other ecclesiastical preferments in the gift of the Crown: that Five Bishops should be appointed (18), of which the Archbishop of Canterbury for the time being always to be one; who, upon any vacancy, might name Three persons to him, of whom he would chuse one. And the Church of England, as by law establish'd, should be secur'd in the sole possession, not only of all the Churches, but of the Universities, and even Schools. And, as a further mark of his favour, he remitted, during his time, the Tenths and First fruits, payable by the Bishops and Clergy to the Crown.'—[But these had been granted before by Queen Anne, for the benefit of the Clergy.]—This romantic proposal was either misunderstanding or misrepresented by the Examiner of the scheme of Church-power in the Codex (19), who thus represents it.—'That Lesley had prevailed upon the Pretender, to offer a temper with regard to the Supremacy, from which great effects were expected. It was, that if the people of England would restore him to what he calls the throne of his ancestors, He, in return, would part with the Supremacy, the great stumbling-block to Papists and High-churchmen—which should be vested in a committee of the English clergy; whereof the Archbishop of Canterbury, for the time being, to be always one.' L'ESTRANGE [ROGER] (a), descended from an ancient and reputable family seated at Hunstanton Hall [A] in the county of Norfolk, was the youngest son of Sir Hamond L'Estrange, Bart. a zealous Royalist during the disputes between Charles the First and his Parliament [B]; in which he was eagerly followed by this his son, who was born at Hunstanton on the 17th of December, 1616 (b). His father took care to give him a very liberal education, which was completed probably at Cambridge. He was between two and three and twenty, before he embarked in the troubles of the times [C], his first public step being his attendance on King Charles in his expedition to Scotland in 1639 (c); and he ever after espoused the royal cause, for which he was a remarkable sufferer, and once in imminent danger of losing his life [D]. For, in the year 1644, soon after the Earl of Manchester had reduced the town of Lynn in Norfolk, to acknowledge the power of the Parliament, Mr L'Estrange, thinking he had some interest in the place, as his father had been Governor, laid a scheme for surprizing it; and received a commission from the King [E], constituting him Governor thereof in case of success: but his design being betrayed by two of his confederates, he was seized, tried, and imprisoned, as mentioned in the notes. The Judge-Advocate observing, that Mr L'Estrange's commission was not the commission of a soldier, to raise and conduct any strength or men of war, but a commission of meer bribery and corruption [F], to make a party with money and preferment

[A] Seated at Hunstanton-hall.] Hunstanton was originally only a tower, built by Edmund, King of the East-Angles, who ascended that throne in the year 855, during the time that Ethelred ruled as sole or chief Monarch over the united Heptarchy (1). The legendary and monkish writers of that period, tell us Edmund built the tower for a place of retirement whilst he studied to get by heart the whole book of Psalms (which book, the Monks of St Edmund's-Bury pretended to be in possession of many years a'terterwards) (2) Canute the Dane, when King, gave this tower, as being part of the royal demesne to Aelfric, or Alfric, Bishop of Elmham, who died in the year 1038 (3); having first given Hunstanton to the Monks of Edmund's-Bury, who continued in possession thereof 'till after the Conquest; when William the Conqueror conferred it on the Albignys, or Aubignys, from whom it came to the L'Estranges, Barons of Knocking. In the reign of Edward II. John L'Estrange, Baron of Knocking, settled Hunstanton on his younger brother Hamond L'Estrange, from whom descended Sir Thomas L'Estrange, Knt, who in 1429, the 7th of Henry VI. was made Deputy of Ireland; also Roger L'Estrange, Sheriff of Norfolk and Suffolk, 2 Henry VII. 1487; and Nicholas, who, on the 1st of June 1629, in the 5th Charles I. was created a Baronet.

[B] A zealous Royalist during the dispute between Charles the First, and his subjects in the 17th Century.] Sir Hamond's house being plundered and his estate sequestered by the Parliament's forces, under the Earl of Manchester, who drove away all his deer, sheep, and cows; he retired to Lynn, which was about 14 miles from his seat, and was Governor of that place when the above Earl first invested it by way of siege (4), having surprized it for the King a little time before.

[C] Before he embarked in the troubles of the times.] This we learn from his own works; in one part of which he expresses himself thus, 'To begin with the beginning of the War and of my Story (5):' and in another thus: 'From the first expedition of the Scots, in 1639, to this instant, I never declined any hazard, travail, or expence, within the compass of my nature or power, in reference to my duty to the royal interest (6).'

[D] In imminent danger of losing his life.] This he informs us of in the following manner: 'My judgement led me to the King's party, and that I served without any other aim or benefit than the discharge of my duty. In 1644, I was betrayed by a brace of villains (by name Leman and Haggar) upon a treaty to surprize Lynn Regis: the former of these had been at Oxford, and there solicited and obtained the promise of a command at sea; and both of them were bound up under an oath of secrecy and fidelity, as rank as words could make it. Being seized, and his Majesty's Commission found about me, I was hurried away first to Lynn, thence to London, and there transmitted to the City Court-martial for my tryal (where two prime men were, a salesman, and an otkler); in this extremity nothing was left unsaid that might infame me, and with so strong a confidence too, that the best friends I had were staggered at it. I was at last brought to the Bar, and charged first as ' a spy, then as a traytor, with all the circumstances of rudeness and severity imaginable: upon that hearing, the Court was inclining to acquit me, it was proposed, and carried, under pretence of favour to me, that judgment might be deferred, and two days longer given me for the advantage of my defence; in this interim they had packed a committee, and then condemned me as a traytor, many persons contributing to this vote that never heard one syllable of my tryal. My sentence being passed, I was then cast into Newgate; whence I dispatched a petitionary appeal to the Lords, the time appointed for my execution being the Thursday following: but, with great difficulty, I got a reprieve for fourteen days, and after that, prolonged for a farther hearing. In this condition of expectancy I lay almost four years a prisoner, with only an order betwixt me and the gallows. I am the more particular in this, because I have so many honourable witnesses to prove the truth of every syllable I say (7).'

[E] And received a commission from the King.] The Commission ran in the following words:

' CHARLES R.

' We having received from our trusty and well-beloved Roger L'Estrange, declarations of the good affection of divers of our well-affected subjects of our counties of Norfolk and Suffolk, and particularly of our town of Lynn, as also some overtures concerning the reducing of our said town of Lynn; We have thought fit forthwith to return our Royal Thanks unto our said well-affected Subjects, and particularly to give our said trusty and well-beloved Roger L'Estrange these encouragements to proceed in our service and principally in the work of reducing the said town of Lynn. First, That in case that attempt shall be gone through withal, he the said Roger L'Estrange shall have the government of the place. Secondly, That what engagement shall be made unto the inhabitants of the said place, or any other person capable of contributing effectually to that service by way of reward either in employment in his Majesty's navy or forts, or in monies not exceeding 5000 L. the service being performed, shall be punctually made good unto them. Thirdly, That they shall in this work receive what assistance may be given them from our nearest garrisons. Fourthly, That when our said town shall be reduced unto our obedience, we shall forthwith send thither such a considerable power as shall be sufficient to relieve and preserve them, We being at present (even without this) fully resolved to send a considerable power to encourage our faithful subjects in those parts, and to regain our Rights and Interests there.

Oxford, November 28th, 1644. ' By his Majesty's Command.

same light with the Judge-Advocate; for though they have all preserved many minuter incidents, not one of them make any mention of this, or any of its consequences.

[G] Means to make his escape. In a treatise of his, dedicated to the Lord's of his Majesty's most honourable Privy Council (8), we are acquainted with some farther particulars relating to this unlucky situation of his affairs as follow: ' In 1644, I was condemned to die ' for his Majesty; Dr Mills, then Judge-Advocate, and ' now [in 1661] Chancellor to the Bishop of Norwich, pronouncing my sentence: when in prison, I ' was visited by Mr Thorowgood and Arrowsmith, ' two of the synod, who very kindly offered me their ' utmost interest, if I would but make some petitionary ' acknowledgment, and submit to take the Covenant; ' which I refused. In order to my reprieve, I wrote ' several letters to the Earl of Northumberland, Earl ' of Stamford, and others of the nobility, from which ' noble persons I received all justice and favour. ' In the House of Commons I was particularly obliged ' (among others) to Sir John Corbet *, and Sir Henry ' Cholmondeley, who can bear me witness, that I used ' no unworthy means to save my life. But reprieved ' I was; in order to a further hearing in appearance, ' though effectually, during pleasure. After thirty ' months spent in vain endeavours, either to come ' to a hearing, or to put myself into an exchange- ' able condition; I printed a state of my case and de- ' dicated my charge and defence, as an appeal from ' the Court-martial to the Lords and Commons, en- ' titled L'Estrange's Appeal from the Court-martial ' to the Parliament.' And in another part of the ' same treatise he says thus: ' After I had received my ' sentence, I threw a paper amongst them (for I was not ' suffered to speak) adding withal, that it was my defence, ' which a Wiltshire gentleman burnt. I was thence ' conveyed to Newgate, where, after almost four years ' imprisonment (with my Keeper's privacy) I slipped into ' Kent, and after the dissolution of that affair, with ' much difficulty I got beyond the sea.'

The affair here mentioned, was the Kentish Insurrection on the 24th of May 1648; which was chiefly fomented by our author, who had retired to the house of Mr Hales, a young gentleman, heir to a great estate in that county, who, at the instigation of Mr L'Estrange (9), first encouraged, and afterwards, though totally unexperienced, undertook to head that insurrection; which, together with the too great precipitancy, was the ruin of their design, though their numbers were shortly after greatly increased, and abler leaders appeared at their head. A consciousness of his having been too rash, may be the reason why our author mentions this transaction only in those slight terms, After the dissolution of that affair. For this miscarriage in Kent, laid the foundation for the routing the Scotch army under the Duke of Hamilton, by Oliver; and for the destruction of so many of the King's party at Colchester; and perhaps, not a little contributed to hasten the determination of destroying the King, to prevent any future attempts of that kind in his favour.

[H] An order to attend that Board. The order was as follows:

Wednesday the 7th of September, 1653.

At the Council of State at White-hall.

Ordered,

That Roger L'Estrange be sent unto to attend the Committee of this Council for examinations.

Ex. Jo. Thurloe, Secr.

[I] Making application to Oliver Cromwell in person. The detail of this transaction is given by our author in the following manner (10). ' From that ' time matters beginning to look worse and worse, ' upon what Mr Strickland said to me, (who was one ' of the Commissioners appointed for my examination) ' that my case was not comprehended in the Act of ' Indemnity; I concluded upon it as my best course, ' to speak to Cromwell himself; as I did at last in the ' Cockpit. A while after I prevailed to be called, ' and Mr Strickland, with another gentleman, whose ' name I have forgotten, were my examiners; but the ' latter pressed nothing against me: Mr Strickland in- ' deed insisted on my condemnation, and would have ' cast me out of the compass of the act, telling me at ' last, that I had given no evidence of the change of ' my mind, without which, I was not to be trusted. ' My final answer was to this effect; that it was my ' interest to change my opinion if I could, &c. Some ' few days after this, I was discharged according to the ' tenor of the ensuing order.

Monday the 31st of October, 1653.

Ordered

That Mr Roger L'Estrange be dismissed from his further attendance upon the Council, he giving in two thousand pounds security to appear when he shall be summoned so to do, and to act nothing prejudicial to the Commonwealth.

Ex. Jo. Thurloe, Secr.

[K] They nick-named our author Oliver's Fiddler. The story as told by Sir Roger is, That in his examination before the Council, meeting with several difficulties, occasioned chiefly by Mr Strickland, from whom, as all his friends informed him, he was not to expect the least favour; though he had paid him the civility of a formal visit in order to ingratiate himself a little with him, and had begged of him in vain to be discharged, or at least to have leave to visit his father, then lying at the point of death, as it nearly concerned him, to see him, both in point of comfort and interest, not having enjoyed that satisfaction for many years: and (that gentleman refusing his request) he applied on the same head to Cromwell, who talked to him of the restlessness of his party, telling him that they would do well to give some testimony of their quiet and peaceable intentions; adding, that rigour was not at all his inclination, but that he was but one man and could do little by himself: ' During the dependency of this affair, continues he, I ' might well be seen at White-hall; but that I spake ' to Cromwell of any other business than this, that I ' ever sought or pretended any privacy with him, or ' that I ever spake to him after this time I absolutely ' disown. Concerning the story of the Fiddle, this, I ' suppose, might be the rise of it. Being in St James's park, I heard an organ touched in a little low room ' of one Mr Hinckson's; I went in, and found a private company of some five or six persons. They desired me to take up a viol and bear a part. I did so, and that a part too, not much to advance the reputation of my cunning. By and by, without the least colour of a design or expectation, in comes Cromwell. He found us playing, and, as I remember, so he left us (11).'

with having bribed some of the Protector's people, but that he utterly disclaims, averring he never spoke to Thurloe but once in his life, and that was about his discharge; and that he never gave bribe, little or great, in the family *. He was also charged with having received 600 pounds from Oliver; but this he denied, in a pamphlet called His Vindication, &c. and further in that called the Memento (b). From this time, 'till the Restoration, he seems to have lived free from any disturbance from the then governing powers; but appears to have been but little taken notice of by Charles the Second or his Ministry, on that Prince's recovering his throne; which made him expostulate loudly and warmly from the Prefs [L], in behalf of himself and other neglected Cavaliers, who had suffered on account of their attachment to the royal-family and interest during the times of usurpation and confusion. These writings seem not to have produced any great effect with regard to himself at that juncture, though some time afterwards he was made Licenser of the Prefs, which post he enjoyed 'till near the Revolution: and which appears to be all the recompence he ever received (unless being in the commission of the Peace), though he hints at greater things promised him from the Earl of Clarendon, as appears in the dedication to that nobleman cited in the last note. But this disappointment did not prevent his exerting his talents on behalf of the Crown; for, in 1661, he published a pamphlet, entitled; Interest mistaken, or the holy Cheat, &c. in answer to one written by Mr John Corbet a Presbyterian teacher, called, The Interest of England in the matter of Religion;

In 1660, our author published his Apology, and in August 1661, (though the prefs date is 1662) he printed a pamphlet entitled Truth and Loyalty vindicated from the reproaches and clamours of Mr Edward Bagshaw, together with a further discovery of the Libeller himself, and his seditious confederates. By Roger L'Estrange. In this piece are many smart strokes at the Court, declaring that he verily believed, 'The King was betrayed; that many of his favours were surreptitiously obtained, and others abused and misapplied by second hands, who were entrusted to dispose of them better.' Adding, 'He that saw Cromwell's, Bradshaw's, and St John's creatures; nay, and the meanest of them, laden with offices and honours, might give himself a second thought to understand the meaning of it; especially, considering how many thousands of loyal subjects were ready to perish for want of that which was superfluously scattered among scarce so many single persons on the other side;' desiring the King to take it for a general rule, 'That the Prince who pinches his subjects bellies will lose their hearts.' Adding, from Sir Francis Bacon, 'That the multiplying the nobility and other degrees of quality, doth speedily bring a state to necessity' (12): which becomes yet more dangerous, when it happens that the ancient Nobility is shrunk into nothing, and the new Nobility are raised out of nothing. The Court (he says) was dangerously thronged with Parasites; knaves represented to the King for honest men, and honest men for villains; a watch upon the King's ear, to keep out better information; seditious ministers protected and encouraged; libels against the King's authority and person dispersed even by his Majesty's sworn servants; and to discover treason, was, in some respects to commit it (13). With respect to these vehement clamours about the distribution of the royal favours, we may say,

In April 1662, our author published a treatise called the Memento, and dedicated it to the Earl of Clarendon; as this piece is not mentioned in any of the printed lists of his works, we insert it here as a curiosity.

'My Lord,

'He that owes more than he is worth, and pays as far as he is able, is an honest man; and that is my case more ways than one; nor is it possible for me to think of my debts, and not of your Lordship's bounties at the same time: under whose roof I have received so many benefits; in the establishment of that felicity I reckoned my self as sure as in the possession of it: I did, my Lord, and I must do so still as sure; for I am the same I was, and to suppose your Lordship's good opinion either begun or ended without reason, were to subject your wisdom or stability to a question.

'Since so it is, my Lord, that I cannot suspect your kindness without an injury to your honour, nor let 'your obligations sleep without some testimony of my thankfulness, vouchsafe to know, my Lord, that after more than twenty years spent in serving the royal interest, near six of them; in goals, and almost four under a sentence of death in Newgate; Fortune has been so kind as to leave me yet a bottle of ink and a heap of paper, out of which pitiful remains I make your Lordship, a present of a book, &c. I must now proceed to acquaint your Lordship, that beside the honour of your protection, I have great need of your interest and favour; which yet I dare not beg, for fear of offending your readines to do me all reasonable justice without it: in truth, it is not for a man of my nature or condition to thrive by begging; for he that is both poor and honest, carries a double clogg: especially in this age, (my Lord) when heaven and hell apart, 'tis a greater scandal and misfortune to be indigent than to be treacherous. But there are, my Lord, that do not stick to say I am both; and I forgive with all my soul, the worst that ever was said of me with good intention to the King. It is not long since I troubled your Lordship with a paper upon this subject; to which, with leave, I shall add a word or two.

'Some will needs have it, that I do not sufficiently deny the six hundred pounds. My Lord, I do so far deny it, that I wish that penny or penny's worth, which, to the best of my knowledge, I ever received from any creature of the rebel's party, or by any order from them, or any of them, may rise against me at the day of Judgment. There is a farther rumour, as if Captain Whitlock should have sent me word that he would justify it: whereas I never heard a syllable from him to that purpose; nor the world shew the least colour for the truth of that report. Let me be pardoned, my Lord, if I conceive this address not altogether impertinent; for if it did belong to you to condemn me, while you but thought me guilty, your Lordship is certainly obliged in honour to acquit me, when you know me innocent. In this particular, my Lord, I think you are bound to do me right; but in what follows I totally depend on your favour. There is a pitiful creature, one Bagshaw (a Chaplain to the Earl of Anglesey) the author of the Animadversions upon the Bishop of Worcester's * Letter; this fellow, when his hand was in against the Bishop, lends me a last too, for my practices with Cromwell: your Lordship would do me a peculiar honour, to procure that he might be called before the Council, to make good his charge; where, if I prove not him that villain that he pretends I am, let me suffer for it.

* Dr Morley.

In 1681, he published his answer to The Appeal from the Country to the City, written by Charles Blount, Esq; (l) [O]: and had before that printed Tyranny and Popery lording it over the Consciences, Lives,

[M] In answer to one written by Mr John Corbet . . . . London, 1660, 8vo. Mr Anthony Wood says (14), Corbet in his book justifies the Presbyterian cause of 1641, excludes the Royal party that served the late King [Charles I.] from having any hand in the restoring of this [Charles II]; revives the pretended misdemeanors of the Bishops, as occasioners of the last war; maintains the adings of the Presbyterians according to the Covenant; makes the two Houses participate the Sovereignty, and denies the lawfulness of the English ceremony, &c. A second edition of our author's Answer was printed in 1662. Corbet's book was likewise answered by a pamphlet first printed in 1676, under the title of The Presbyterians unmasked; and again in 1681, by the name of the Dissenters disarmed: both times anonymous, but supposed to be wrote by Mr Samuel Thomas, Chantor of Christ-Church, Oxon. Mr Baxter, in one of his sermons calls this last author A sramels writer, who published a bloody invective against Mr Corbet's pacificatory book called The Interest of England, as if it had been written to raise a war (15).

[N] He laid it down on the London Gazette's coming out. Mr Wood gives an account of this paper in his Athenæ Oxoniensiss, as follows: 'Mercurius Politicus; comprising the sum of foreign intelligencē, with the affairs now on foot in the three nations of England, Scotland, and Ireland. . . . These Mercuries came out weekly every Wednesday, in two sheets, 4to, commencing with the 9th of June, 1649, and ending with the 6th of June, 1650. At which time, being Thursday, he began again with number I, from Thursday June 6th, to Thursday June 13th, 1650. Beginning . . . . Why should not the Commonwealth have a Fool as well as the King had, &c. Now appeared in print (saith a certain writer (16)) as a weekly champion of the new Commonwealth, and to bespatter the King (Charles II.) with the basest of scurrilous raillery, one Marchmont Nedham, under the name of Politicus, a Jack of all sides, transcendently gifted in opprobrious and treasonable droll, and hired therefore by Bradshaw, to ad the second part of his starch'd and wore solemn treason . . . . Who began his first Diurnal, with an invective against Monarchy and the Presbyterian Scotch Kirk, and ended it with an Hofanna to Oliver Cromwell, who in the beginning of June returned by the way of Bristol from Ireland to London. These Mercurii Politici (wherein were many discourses against Monarchy, and in behalf of a free State; especially in those that were published before Oliver Cromwell gaped after the supremacy) were constantly carried on 'till about the middle of April, 1660, when then (as several times before) the author was prohibited by order of the Council of State. By virtue of which order, Henry Muddiman and Giles Dury were authorized to publish their Intelligence every Monday and Thursday, under the titles of Parliamentary Intelligencer and Mercurius Publicus, which continued (Dury soon after giving over) 'till the middle of August 1663, and then Roger L'Estrange published the Intelligence twice every week in quarto sheets, under the titles of The public Intelligencer and The News. The first of which came out the 31st of August, and the other on the 3d of September, an. 1663. These continued 'till the 29th of January, 1665, at which time L'Estrange desisted, because in November going before were other kinds of news-papers published twice every week in half a sheet in folio. These were called the Oxford Gazette, and the first commenced the 7th of November, 1665, the King and Queen with their Courts being then at Oxon. Those for a little time, were written, I think, by Mr Henry Muddiman: but when the said Courts removed to London, they were entitled and called The London Gazette; the first of which that was published there, came forth on the 5th of February following, the King being then at White-hall.' This last date, must be either a mistake in the diligent Antiquary, or an error of the press; for the 5th of February that year was Sunday, the Dominical letter being A: and as the first came out at Oxford on a Tuesday, so the first at London was published on Saturday, which have ever since been the days of publication of that paper.

[O] Written by Charles Blount, Esq; This piece was wrote and published during the height of the ferment raised by the Popish plot, and to prepare the way for the Exclusion Bill, the main drift of it being to recommend the Duke of Monmouth to the people. It is wrote with great acrimony against the Court, and the then measures of the ministry, in such terms as these: 'Now, Gentlemen, (speaking to the Citizens of London) left any among you should be ignorant, either of your enemies, or their designs, both against the King and Kingdom . . . they are young beggarly officers, courtiers, over-hot churchmen, and Papists: the young officer, or soldier's interest, makes him wish for a standing army; the Courtier endeavours to advance taxes, oppressive and illegal impositions; the over-hot Churchmen wish well to Popery, in hope of a cardinal's cap, or at least the command of some abbey, priory, or other ecclesiastical preferment, whereof the Roman Church hath so great plenty. These are the men who exclaim against our Parliament's proceedings, in relation to the Plot, as too violent, calling these times by no other name but that of Forty, or Forty-one; when, to amuse his sacred Majesty, and his good people, they again threaten us with another Forty-eight: and all this is done under-hand to vindicate the Catholic party, by throwing a suspicion on the Fanatics. These are the Epicopical Tantiives, who make even the very Scriptures pimp for the Court; who out of Urim and Thummim can extort a sermon to prove the not paying of tithes and taxes to be the sin against the Holy Ghost; and had rather see the kingdom run down with blood, than part with the least hem of a consecrated frock, which they themselves made holy.' And a little after, having endeavoured to prove it was the Papists who brought King Charles the first to the block, he adds, 'Their interest does unavoidably excite them to murder his sacred Majesty: for first, they know he cannot long subsist without a considerable sum of money, which he must receive either from the party or from the Parliament: now, for them to supply him with so vast a sum, is a charge, that (you may well imagine) they would desire to get rid of it if they could, tho' by the King's death. On the other side, for the Parliament to supply him with money, that they know cannot be done but by taking off the heads of their faction, excluding their Succession, and consenting to such laws as must of necessity ruin them: besides, his Majesty has already permitted the executing so many of their party, as they never can nor will forgive it.' Speaking also of the danger arising from the execution of so black a design, he says, The greatest danger will proceed from a confusion, and want of some eminent and interested persons, whom you may trust to lead you up against a French and Popish army; for which purpose no person is fitter than his Grace the Duke of Monmouth, as well for quality, courage, and conduct, as for that his life and fortune depend upon the same bottom with yours: he will stand by you, therefore you ought to stand by him. And remember, the old rule is, He who has the worst title ever makes the best King

Lives, Liberties, and Estates, both of King and People. In the same year came out his own Appeal [P]; and after the dissolution of Charles the Second's last Parliament, he begun to (17) Appeal from the County, &c. 1679, 4to. p. 3, 4, 5, &c.

'King (17).' Which our author answers thus: 'Does he suppose this confusion upon the death of the King; or the burning of the City; or before or after? or has he consulted either the illustrious person, or the honourable City (that he makes so bold with) to know whether or not the one would accept of such a commission upon the appellants' terms, or the other offer it? The character that he is pleased to bestow upon his Grace for his quality, courage, and conduct, is not unknown to any man that ever so much as heard of his name: but the appellant never so much as considers, that all these glorious circumstances are point blank contradictions to his designs. How can he imagine that so brave a person can ever stoop to so mean a thought, and suffer himself by a prostitute libel to be enchanted out of his honour, reason, and allegiance? or that the most eminent city of Christendom for purity of religion, loyalty to their prince, power, good government, wealth and resolution, should be cajoled out of all these blessings and advantages by the jesuitical fanaticism of a dark-lantern pamphlet? But to what end is all this clutter? The appellant has a mind (it seems) to change his Master, &c. (18).'

(18) Answer to the Appeal from the County, &c. p. 38.

[P] He published his own Appeal] This came out under the following title. L'Estrange his Appeal. Humbly submitted to the King's most excellent Majesty, and the three Estates assembled in Parliament, London 1681, 4to. In this tract our author observes that, 'If the matter in question had been the single case of L'Estrange, nothing could be more ridiculous than the vanity of his appeal; but as his case stands complicated with other circumstances, that import no less than the honour, the justice, and the very security of the Government, it is no longer a private apology but a public duty.' He then proceeds to the distribution of his subjects under particular heads; 'The first point (says he) shall be the subject matter of those swarms of libels that have taken me in their way to the King and the Church. Secondly, To vindicate and discharge myself from those calumnies. Thirdly, To lay open the quality of the libellers; and the true reason of their rancour against me, in despite of all pretensions to the contrary. Fourthly, To set forth their designs and practices upon the dignity and safety of the Government, and upon the public peace. And, lastly, A modest deliberation how far in honour, justice, and policy, it may concern any prince or state whatsoever, to support, countenance, and protect the assertors of their laws, rights, privileges, against the bold and seditious attempts of the enemies of the Constitution (19).' He then gives us the charge against him, consisting of six articles: 1. That he had turned the [Popish] Plot into ridicule; and put an affront upon King, Lords, and Commons, in so doing. 2. That he had countenanced a Sham-plot; and endeavoured to turn it upon the Presbyterians. 3. That he had made it his business to lessen the credit of the King's witnesses. 4. That he had comprehended all the states, orders, and divisions of men, both Lords, Citizens, and Commons of England, under the opprobrious names of Cit and Bumkin. 5. That he had scandalously misrepresented all the late Petitions [for holding the Parliament], and the promoters of them. 6. That his writings created misunderstandings, and tended to the embroiling of the Kingdom (20). The first he answers by several quotations from his own writings on that subject, which shew that he treated it in a serious and becoming manner; and in one instance professes an implicit faith. 'As to the Popish Plot, that is sworn by the King's witnesses, I lay my faith at their feet, without any further inquiry or dispute.' He refutes the second article of the Charge, by shewing his consistency of behaviour from 1661 to 1681; and to prove that consistency, cites the following passage from the Epistle Dedicatory to his Holy Cheat, published in the former year. 'They [the Presbyterians] cast the blood and guilt of the late war upon his Majesty; make his adherents traitors; place the Supreme authority in the two Houses; subject the law to an ordinance; the Government to a faction; and animate the schismatiques to serve his Majesty in being, as they did his father (21).' In reply to the third calumny of discrediting the witnesses for the Crown, he produces the following paragraphs. 'They are wonderful things Dr [Oates] which you have done already; and I am persuaded that you are yet reserved for more wonderful things to come, when Truth shall deliver herself from the rubbish of oppression and slander; and in despite of envy, and imposture, render your name as famous to posterity, as your virtue has made it to the present generation: And this I write with little less than the genius of a Prophet (22).' And a little after, addressing himself to the same person. 'Who was it but you that so effectually laid open the intrigues of the Priests and Jesuites, with the Schismatiques in the late Rebellion? That shewed his Majesty so plainly who they were that dethroned and murdered his father; and painted the whole conspiracy so to the life, that one might wink and see through it? Who but you, Sir, to trace them down to this very instant, thro' all their disguises and cabals, fomenting a rebellion in Scotland with the Presbyterians; incendiaries in London, with the Millenaries; and up and down tampering with the crew of the sectaries? Who was it but you that first found out the conspiracy itself, and then the conspirators? Who but you, the eminent instrument in opening of the combination (23)?' And further, 'I believe the plot, and as much as every good subject ought to believe, or as man in his right wits can believe: nay, I do so also believe it, that in my conscience you yourself, Doctor, do not believe more of it than I do (24).' When it is remembered that Charles the second never believed any part of the Popish Plot; but was reduced by a powerful faction, headed by Lord Shaftesbury, to take away the lives of many, whom in his own conscience he did not believe in the least guilty: the art of our author's ironical turn in the above passages must be very conspicuous; but whether that will justify his modesty, in offering them as a justification to the other party, may admit a question: but in the succeeding reign he saw his prophecy fulfilled, with respect to Oates, and many other of those busy meddlers. He uses the same methods of quotations to clear himself from the fourth and fifth articles of the Charge; and to the sixth, which charges his writings with creating misunderstandings, &c. he gives the following answer: 'If it be so, I have been extremely out in my measures all this while, to be still creating of misunderstandings, in the very act of endeavouring either to rectify, or to prevent them; and to endanger the peace of the Kingdom in the design of preserving it. If to assert the Law and the Government against all opposers; if to lay open the malice and calumny of so many bold libels against his Majesty's person, authority, and government; if to maintain the Apostolical order and the constitutions of the Church against schism; and the powers and privileges of the State against all principles of sedition; if to inculcate reverence and obedience towards our superiors; if to commend the blessings and duties of unity in a due submission to the provisions that are made for the upholding of order both in Church and State; if the bending of all my thoughts and applications to these ends, be to create misunderstandings, and breed ill blood in the hearts of his Majesty's liege people; then am I guilty of the matter charged upon me in this article, and no otherwise (25).' He then proceeds to the third branch of his defence, the quality of the libellers, the chief of whom were Henry Care, Miles France, and Titus Oates: 'The Egyptian Locusts (he says) were nothing to this plague of our English scarabs, that devour not only the fruit but the honour of the land; and render the English nation, as much as in them lies, a laughing-stock to all our neighbours round about us. It is not that I am angry with Harry Care for the delicate back-strokes he gave me in France's last Narrative, by his invention for the setting up of a correspondence between Mrs Cellier * and myself; a person whose face I never saw in my whole life time, that I know of, 'till (before the Council) about a week or ten days after the publishing of that book: 'tis true it was as false and as shameless a contrivance as possible; but why should I expect better from him, when God Alto publish his Observators, the design of which were, to vindicate the measures of the Court, and the character of the King, from the charge of being Popishly affected: which he did with such vehemence, that it raised him many enemies, who endeavoured, notwithstanding his known loyalty, to render him obnoxious to the Government, by charging him with disaffection; in supporting and aggravating which charge, none was more busy than the noted Miles Prance [2]. But our author made shift to weather all those storms during the reign of Charles the Second, and was considerably taken notice of by his successor; who, in the first year of his reign, conferred the honour of knighthood on him [R]. From this time we know but little of him, further than that, in 1687, he mighty has written the signal of what he is in the 'very visage of the animal (26)?' He then examines the grounds of their malice against him, shews it was because he had been a violent adversary to the Presbyterians and the measures of 1641; and asserts he had never put pen to paper then, but either in his own defence, or in the vindication of the Public; enters into a detail of his writings and their design, and concludes this head thus: 'I know very well that I am charged for writing more than my share, when the true reason of it was, that others wrote less; and in effect, it was more than one man's work to attempt what I have done. But upon a sense that the thing was of absolute necessity for some body to do; and finding other people more cautious than I thought was either needful or expedient, in so public a case, I engaged myself further than my neighbours; and not without the foresight of these outrages which I knew I was to draw upon myself: neither is this the first time that I have sacrificed all other considerations to my duty (27). Some will have it (continues he) that I have been fet on by the promises and temptations of advantages and rewards; which is an imagination so far from the truth of this matter, that, all things considered (saying my veneration and humble acknowledgments to his Majesty, who hath been very gracious to me): I do positively aver, that the King has not a subject in the three kingdoms that has suffered harder measure, and more contrary to law and justice than I myself have done; and all this without the balance of any other recompence than a little court holy-water, and fair words. Besides, that in the worst of times, I did the same thing thro' all difficulties and hazards (28). He next enters into the tendency of the writings he opposed; particularly The Plea to the Duke's Answers; The Impartial Proceedings; The Appeal from the Country; The Political Catechism; The Growth of Popery (29); and The Freeholders Choice; and insists their doctrines are treasonable. Lastly, he enters into consideration, how far in Honour, Justice, and Policy, it may concern any Prince or State whatsoever to support, countenance, and protect the assertors of their laws, rights, and privileges, against the bold and seditious attempts of the enemies of the Constitution. On this head he observes, that rewards and punishments are the two main pillars of government; that neglecting them is like letting a house fall for want of repair; but inverting them, by the magistrate's rewarding where he should punish, and punishing where he should reward, is like a man's pulling down his house with his own hands, be the form of government what it will: since nothing can be more dangerous, than to show an honest man that he has nothing to hope, or a knave, that he has nothing to fear. He lays it down as a maxim, that supporting and protecting those who assert the government, is not any benignity or respect to the person asserting, but common justice to a principle of government itself; without which no government can be of long continuance. 'For (says he) all public services are accompanied with hardship and pain, as they are follow'd with envy and detraction. 'Tis nothing for a man to go down hill, especially when he sees profit, pleasures, and preferment at the bottom; and that in such a course he does but follow the byas of his own appetites and corruptions: but it is another case for flesh and blood to lie beating of it out a whole age against wind and tide; and when he has conquered that difficulty, to be cast upon the rocks, and there abandoned at last. Or, to follow my first allegory, it is but a cold comfort for a man to lie striving thirty or forty years, to gain the top of a hill, only upon a barren instinct of honour or virtue; and when he comes there, to have only the choice either of a gaol, or of a gibbet, for his last retreat. The duty of persevering is nevertheless binding for the difficulty of the attempt; but yet, according to the measures of human frailty, the French King himself, perhaps, would find it an hard matter to levy an army of fifty or threecore thousand men (out of all his dominions) of that complexion.' He adds, 'That when the honourable House of Commons shall come to know him better by his actions, open dealings and professions, than the world then did by the fiddlers and the rascals that the paltry news-papers had represented him to be; he makes no doubt but they would think him worthy some reparations from the authors of those scandals; and out of a regard to the honourable blood that runs in their own veins, would consider the case of another gentleman as their own, and not suffer men of name and family to be blamed at such a rate by the sons of the people (30).' He next enters into a detail of his persecutions, chiefly arising from Dr Oates, who first charged him before the Council with confederating with Dr Torge to impeach the validity of Oates's testimony; next with high-treason, for conspiring against the King's witness, Oates, Bedloe, Prance; and, lastly, for being Popishly affected: to prove this, Prance swore (31) that he had seen our author three or four times at mafs at Somers-et-houfe, about two years before, and doing there as other people did; but would not say he had seen him receive. 'Whereupon (says our author) I did with the most horrid solemnity of imprecation imaginable, declare myself to be of the Church of England; and that I had never entered into any Popish chapel, or been present at any mafs, since his Majesty's return; which protestation I do here again resume, intending by these words, his Majesty's return, the King's blessed Restoration in the year 1660. I cannot but note a great abatement in Prance's reckoning; for I am assured that Prance swore in the company of Care, Curtis, and some other people, that he had seen me at mafs, at least, or about, an hundred times.' He concludes the whole thus: 'This disgust could never have laid hold of me in a better time; for I am really as sick of the world as peevishness itself can be of me. And having stood all proofs, both of my fidelity to my master, and of my integrity in despite of my enemies, I'll e'en betake myself to the quietest way of making my escape out of an impious and trepanning world into a better (32).'

was obliged to lay down his Observers, now swelled to three volumes, as he could not agree with the Toleration proposed by James the Second, though in all other respects he had gone the utmost lengths, even to writing strenuously in defence of the dispensing power claimed by that infatuated prince; which, perhaps, was one reason why he was by some accused of having become a profelyte to the Church of Rome. This accusation gave him much uneasiness; and, to obviate it, he drew up a solemn declaration, directed to Sir Nicholas L'Estrange [S]; on the truth of which he received the Sacrament at the time of publishing the same, which is supposed to be some time in the year 1690 (m). By this declaration we find he was married; but who his lady was, or what issue he had by her, more than the daughter therein mentioned (unless John L'Estrange, one of the witnesses thereto, was his son), we know not; nor can say any thing further, than that he died the 11th of December 1704, wanting but five days of eighty-eight years of age, and was buried in the church of St Giles in the Fields [T], in the county of Middlesex. He was author of many political tracts, and translated several things from Greek, Latin, and Spanish; the chief of which are as follow: *Roger L'Estrange his Apology. Truth and Loyalty vindicated, &c. The Memento. The Reformed Catholic. The Free-born subject. Answer to the Appeal, &c. Seasonable Memorial. Cit and Bunkin, in two parts. Further Discovery. Case put. Notes on College *. Zekeil and Ephraim. Papist in Masquerade. Answer to the second Character of a Popish Successor. Considerations on Lord Russell's Speech. All these were printed in 4to. History of the Plot. Caveat to the Cavaliers. Plea for the Caveat and it's Author. These were in folio †. His translations were, Josephus's Works. Cicero's Offices. Seneca's Morals. Erasmus's Colloquies. AEsop's Fables. Quevedo's Visions. Bona's Guide to Eternity. And Five Love-Letters from a Nun to a Cavalier. Besides all these, he wrote several news-papers and occasional pieces. The late Mr Thomas Gordon, author of the Independent Whig, and translator of Tacitus, &c. has been very severe in his remarks on our author's writings, and particularly on his stile (n). But one of our author's contemporary writers (o) observes, that those who shall consider the number and greatness of his books, will admire he should ever write so many; and those who have read them, considering the stile and method they are writ in, will more admire he should write so well (p).*

[S] A solemn declaration directed to Sir Nicholas L'Estrange.] This declaration also was made at or just before his receiving of the communion, and is entitled, ' Sir Roger L'Estrange's Declaration of his Faith; occasioned by his daughter's changing her religion, after marrying a Papist without his consent;' and is supposed to have been made about the year 1690 (35). It is as follows:

' Sir,
' The late departure of my daughter from the Church of England to the Church of Rome wounds the very heart of me; for I do solemnly protest, as in the presence of God Almighty, that I knew nothing of it: and for your farther satisfaction, I take the liberty to assure you, upon the faith of a man of honour and conscience, that as I was born and brought up in the communion of the Church of England, so I have been true to it ever since, with a firm resolution, with God's assistance, to continue in the same to my Life's end.

' Now, in case it shall please God, in his Providence to suffer this scandal to be revived upon my memory when I am dead and gone, make use, I be-feech you, of this paper in my justification, which I deliver as a sacred truth. So help me God.

' John L'Estrange,
' Richard Sure.' ' To Sir Nicholas L'Estrange, Bart.'

[T] In the church of St Giles in the Fields.] Upon the middle pillar, on the north side of which church, is the following inscription:

' Sir Roger L'Estrange, Knt,
' Born 17th of December, 1616,
' Dyed 11th of December, 1704,
' Anno Ætatis suæ 87.'

In 1705, a gentleman of Cambridge published a copy of verses on his death; entitled Lucius Britannici. He was in the Commission of the Peace for Westminster, or Middlesex, during the reigns of King Charles the second, and his brother; but probably did not continue so after the Revolution, as Queen Mary seemed to shew great contempt of him, making the following anagram on his name:

Roger L'Estrange,
Lying strange Roger (36).

(36) From the information of a lady now living, 1752.

LEWIS [JOHN], a late learned Divine, Historian, and Antiquary, was born the 29th of August, 1675, at Bristol; his father being a wine-cooper in that city. He had his education in Grammar-learning in the free-school at Winbourn in Dorsetshire. From thence he went to Oxford, and was admitted a Scholar in Exeter-college. After having taken one degree, he was ordained, in 1698, by Henry Lord Bishop of London, and was some time Curate to the Reverend Mr Russell, Rector of St John's Wapping. In the year 1699, Lord-Chancellor Somers gave him the rectory of Acris in Kent: and in the year 1705, he was appointed Minister of Meregate, or Margate, in the isle of Thanet. He resigned Acris in 1706, upon his being collated by Archbishop Tennison to the Rectory of Saltwood in Kent, with the chapel of Hyth annexed. The same year, his Grace gave him also the Rectory of Eastbridge in the said county, of which the church is ruinous. In 1708, the same munificent patron collated him to the vicarage of Minstre in the Isle of Thanet; whereupon he resigned Saltwood and Hyth. And in 1719, Archbishop Wake constituted him Master of Eastbridge-hospital in the city of Canterbury. These are all the preferments he had. He resided at Margate from the year 1705 'till the time of his death, which happened on January 16, 1746-7. He was buried in the chancel of Minstre-church, with his wife, who was the youngest daughter of Robert Knowler, Gent. of Herne in the county of Kent. She died twenty-seven years before him, leaving no issue. They lie under a black marble stone, with an inscription [A], which he left and ordered to be inscribed (a). In the years 1706, and 1711, 1712, &c. he published a few small pieces [B]. But, in the year 1720, he put out a work that had cost him a good deal of labour and time, namely, The Life of Dr Wicliffe [C]. And in 1731, he published the Translation of the New Testament into English, by the same learned author [D]. The same year, he published a new edition of the Life and Death of Sir Thomas Moore, Knight, by William Rooper, Esq; [E]. He was also author of the following curious books, which are sufficient demonstrations of his very great industry and learning; namely, the History and Antiquities of the Isle of Thanet: the History of the Abbey and Church of Faversham: the History of the Rise and Progress of Anabaptism in England: the Life of Mr William Caxton: the Life of Dr Reginald Pecock: a Dissertation on the Antiquity and Use of Seals in this Kingdom: a Defence of the Communion-office and Catechism of the Church of England, against two Popish Missionaries [F]. Besides which; he left several pieces in manuscript [G], mentioned below in the note.

(a) From Memoirs communicated by a relation of his.

[B] In the years 1706, &c. he published a few small pieces.] Namely, I. 'Companion for the afflicted.' ed. Lond. 1706. 8v°. II. 'Apology for the Clergy of the Church of England.' Lond. 1711. 8v°. III. 'The Church Catechism explained, by way of Question and Answer; and confirmed by Scripture Proofs.' &c. Lond. 1712. 12m°. Extracted chiefly from Bishop Williams's Exposition of the Church Catechism. IV. 'Two Letters in defence of the English Liturgy and Reformation.' Lond. 1717. 8v°.

[C] The Life of Dr Wicliffe.] The whole title of that book is, V. 'The History of the Life and Sufferings of the Reverend and learned John Wicliffe D. D. Warden of Canterbury hall, and publick Professor of Divinity in Oxford; and Rector of Lutterworth, in Leicestershire, in the reigns of King Edward III. and King Richard II. Together with a Collection of Papers relating to the said History, never before printed.' ed. Lond. 1720. 8v°. To which is added, A supplement from copies of several MSS. in the Bodleian library, and the library of Trinity college near Dublin; communicated by Dr Martin fellow of Merton college in Oxford, and Dr Timothy Goodwin Bishop of Kilmore in Ireland: with corrections and additions to the foregoing part. He made further additions to it afterwards; of which we shall take notice in note [G] when we come to mention the several pieces he left behind him in manuscript.

[D] The Translation of the New Testament into English, by the same learned author.] This is intitled, VI. 'The New Testament of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, translated out of the Latin vulgæ, by John Wicliffe. S. T. P. Prebendary of Aulst, in the Collegiate Church of Westbury, and Rector of Lutterworth about 1378. To which is prefix'd, A History of the several Translations of the Holy Bible, and New Testament, &c. into English, both in manuscript and print; and of the most remarkable Editions of them, since the invention of printing.' Lond. 1731. fol. This book seems to be very accurately printed; and the initial letters were cast on purpose to resemble those in the manuscript. Some time after, he revised and enlarged the curious Preface, and printed it by itself in one volume 8v°, under the title of, VII. 'A complete History of the several Translations of the Holy Bible, and New Testament, into English, &c.' Lond. 1739.

[E] A new Edition of the Life and Death of Sir Thomas Moore, &c.] T. Hearne had printed an Edition of it in 1716. But our author having got from a neighbouring Gentleman, a MS. written in the hand commonly used in King Henry VIII. and Queen Elizabeth's reign; more complete and perfect (as he thought) than the other, as representing intelligibly what in Hearne's edition is downright nonsense; of which he gives some instances (1); VIII. He therefore gave this new edition of that Life. And added some notes at the bottom of the pages, and several Letters of Sir Thomas More, and others, at the end.

[F] He was also author of the following curious Books, &c.] They were published in the following order, and size. IX. 'The History and Antiquities of the Isle of Thanet or Tenet,' &c. first printed in 1723. A second edition came out in 1736. 4to. X. 'The History of the Abbey and Church of Faversham,' &c. Lond. 1727. 4to. XI. 'The Lyfe of Mafster Wyllyam Caxton of the Weald of Kent, the first Printer in England,' &c. Lond. 1737. 8v°. XII. 'History of the Rise and Progress of Anabaptism in England.' D. 1713. and A plain Answer to Dr Middleton's Letter from Rome, printed A. D. 1741. Addressed to the inhabitants of London and Westminster.' Lond. 1742. 8v°. a pamphlet. XV. 'The Life of Dr Reynold Pecock, Lord Bishop of St Asaph and Chichester in the Reign of King Henry the Vith. being a sequel to the Life of Wicliffe.' 1744. 8v°. XVI. 'A brief Discovery of some of the Arts of the Popish Protestant Missioners in England.' Lond. 1750. 8v°.

[G] He left several pieces in manuscript.] The following pieces, in Mr Lewis's own hand-writing, were lately in the possession of Mr Thomas Osborne, Book-seller in London. 1. Principles and Practices of certain Moderate Divines of the Church of England, formerly called by their enemies Latitudinarians, and now Low-Church-men (greatly misunderstood) truly represented and defended. Which is almost literally the same as the title of a Book, printed in 1670 by Dr Edward Fowler, afterwards Bishop of Gloucester. 2. Brief Apology for those Divines of the Church of England, who have opposed the Notion of the Bread and Wine in the Eucharist being a propitiatory Sacrifice. 3. The Doctrine of the Invalidity of Lay-Baptism no Doctrine of the ancient Christian Church: To which is added an Appendix, wherein is shewen the primitive Doctrine of the Christian Priesthood. 4. Address to those who doubt the lawfulness of Infant-Baptism. 5. Treatise on the Church service. 6. Treatise concerning Priestly habits and vestments, and proceedings against Puritans thereupon; with some Reflections upon Peirce's Vindiciæ Fratrum Dissidentium. 7. Impartial Representation of the State of Religion in England, with respect to Infidelity, Heresy, Profaneness and Immorality. 8. Treatise on the part the Papists acted in encouraging our Divisions. 9. Vindication of himself against the Quakers of his parish. 10. Additions to Dr Wicliffe's life.— All the above were in folio.— 11. Life of Wicliffe, manuscript, with a Glossary explaining the old and obscure words in Dr Wicliffe's writings. 8v°. 12. translation of the same into Latin 8vo. 13. He left also a new, and very copious, Preface to his History of the Life and Sufferings of Dr Wicliffe: 8vo. an Extract out of which, relating to one Grimwood of Hitcham, mentioned by Mr J. Foxe, and for which he hath been severely reflected upon, we shall lay here before the Reader. — In my former preface (saith Mr Lewis) — I particularly took notice of the story of Grimwood which Anthony Wood the Oxford Antiquarian has made so much use of to disparage and discredit this noble work. For this purpose I quoted from Mr Strycpe what he says to shew that what Mr Fox has said of it was not an egregious falsity, as Mr Wood has censured it to be. The whole of this matter of fact is as follows.

Mr Fox tells us, (2) that one Grimwood of Hitcham in the County of Suffolk having sworn falsely at the Lent-affizes at Bury, before Sir Clement Higham, against one John Cooper of Watfam in the same county, to prove him guilty of treasonable words spoken against Queen Mary, 'in the harvest after as he was in his labour stacking up a gosse of corne, having his health, and fearing no peril, suddenly his bowels fell out of his body, and immediately most miserably he died.'

Serjeant Rolle in his Abrégement des plusieurs cases, &c. (3) tells us, that, 'in Fox's book of Martyrs is an account of one Greenwood of Suffolk, who was reported to have perjured himself before the Bishop of Norwich in testifying against a Martyr in Queen Mary's reign, and that after he came to his house, puis il vient a son maison; by the just judgment of God his bowels rotted from his belly ses bowels rotted de son venter for an exemplary punishment of perjury. One Prit being newly made Parson of the Parish where Greenwood dwelled, and not well knowing his Parishioners, preaching against perjury cited this story, and it chanced that Greenwood was alive and at church, and afterwards brought an Action on the case against the Parson.'

us, (4) that 27 Eliz. Coke cited this case: that 'Parson (4) Reports, Prick in a sermon recited a story out of Foxe's Martyrology, that one Greenwood being a perjured person and a great persecutor had great plagues inflicted upon him, and was killed by the hand of God; whereas in truth he never was so plagued, and was himself present at that sermon: And he thereupon brought his action upon the case for calling him a perjured person.'

Anthony Wood charges Fox upon this with 'committing a most egregious falsity, in reporting that one Greenwood of Higham in Suffolk died in a miserable manner for swearing and bearing false witness against one John Cooper of Watfam in the same county, for which he lost his life.'

The reader can't but observe how these several accounts vary from Mr Fox. Rolle and Croke call him Greenwood. Fox says his name was Grimwood. Wood tells us he lived at Higham; Fox calls the name of the parish Hitcham. Rolle reports that Greenwood was perjured before the Bishop of Norwich; Fox himself tells us that it was before Sir Clement Higham at Bury at a Lent-affize. Rolle says it was against a Martyr in Queen Mary's time that this false evidence was given. Fox tells us, that Cooper suffered for pretended treason: Rolle relates that after Greenwood, as he calls him, came to his house this judgment overtook him; Fox says it was not 'till the harvest after when he was seized in the open field. Nay the accounts in the Law books differ, in that Rolle calls the parson by the name of Prit; Croke says his name was Prick.

But notwithstanding these variations, it is, I believe true, that such an Action upon the Case was brought by one Greenwood against a Parson. The Question is, how far Fox's History is affected by it. Now Mr Strycpe assures us, (5) that Mr Roger Morris a careful enquirer after such matters told him, that this relation of Greenwood's judgment was true: tho' the judgment did not fall upon that Grimwood or Greenwood who sued the minister, but on another of the same both Christian and surname as was well known afterwards. C

LHWYD, or LLHWYD [EDWARD] [A], a late learned and industrious Antiquary (but whether related to, or descended from, that other eminent Antiquary, Humphrey Lhuyd [B], we do not learn), was born in Wales [C], about the year 1670 (d). His father, according to some (b), was Edward Llhwyd of Kidwelly in Caermarthenshire; but, according to others (c), Charles Lhuyd, of Llanvorda in the county of Salop, Esq; a gentleman of the family of Gogertham in Caerdiganshire, which have had the honour of Baronets for many descents. Our author having spent his younger years in grammar and classical learning, to qualify himself for the university (d), was admitted, in the latter end of the year 1687, at the age of seventeen, into Jesus-college in Oxford (e); and was created Master of Arts July 21, 1701. And having, under the direction of the learned Dr Plot, diligently applied himself to the study of Natural History, and particularly of Fossils, he was, in 1690, upon the resignation of the said Dr Plot, appointed

[A] Lbwyd, or LLbwyd,] His name is otherwise frequently written Lloyd, or Floyd: but not by himself. See the places in the Philosophical Transactions referred to below.

[B] Humphrey Lhuyd.] This learned Antiquarian was the son of Robert Lhuyd, alias LLoyd, or Rossenhall, of Denbigh, in Denbighshire, by Joan his wife, daughter of Lewis Pigott. He was born in Denbigh, and educated at Oxford; but of what college he was a member doth not appear, 'till the year 1547, when he was a commoner of Brazen-nose college, having then taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts. He took that of Master in 1551, at which time he studied Physic. Afterwards retiring to his own country, he lived mostly within the walls of Denbigh castle, and practised as a Physician, being esteemed a well-bred gentleman. He was a person of great eloquence, an excellent Rhetorician, a sound Philosopher, a most noted Antiquary; nay, in Mr Camden's judgment, (1) one of the best Antiquaries in his time. The several pieces written by him, were, 1. An Almanack, &c. 2. Commentarioli Britannicæ Descriptionis fragmentum. Colon. Agrip. 1572. Of which a new edition was published by the learned Mr Moses Williams. Lond. 1731. 4to. And it was translated into English by Tho. Twyne, who intitled it, The Breviary of Britain. Lond. 1573. 8vo. 3. De Monâ Druidum insula, antiquitati suæ restitutâ. In a letter to Abraham Ortelius Apr. 5. 1568. 4. De Armamentario Romano. These two last are printed at the end of Historiæ Britannicæ Defensio, written by Sir John Prife. Lond. 1573. 4to. 5. Chronicon Walliæ, à Rege Cadwalladéro, usque ad Ann. Dom. 1294. MS. in the Cottonian Library (2). He also translated from Latin into English, 6. 'The Judgment of Urines.' Lond. 1551. 8vo. 7. The History of Cambria, now called Wales, from Caradoc of Lancarvan, the Registers of Conway and Stratflur; with a continuation, chiefly extracted from Mat. Paris, Nic. Trivet, &c. But he died before it was quite finished. However, Sir Henry Sidney Lord President of Wales having procured a copy of it, employed Dr David Powel to fit it for the press, who published it under this title, 'The Historie of Cambria, now called Wales: a part of the most famous yland of Brytaine; written in the Brytish language above two hundred years past: Translated into English by H. Lhoyd Gent. corrected, augmented, and continued out of Records and best approved Authors, by David Powel D. D.' Lond. 1584. 4to. Our Author translated also, 8. 'The Treasure of Health, containing many profitable medicines: written by Peter Hispanus.' Lond. 1585. To which were added, 'The causes and signs of every Disease, with the Aphorisms of Hippocrates.' He died about the year 1570, and was buried in the church of Whitechurch near Denbigh (3).

[C] Was born in Wales] He calls himself 'a native of that country,' in a letter to the learned Editor of Camden's Britannia, inserted in that book (4).

in his room Keeper of the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford (f). The chief bent of his studies, and his greatest delight, was to search into the languages, histories, and customs, of the original inhabitants of Great-Britain. In pursuance of which disposition, he travelled several times through all Wales, and into Cornwall, Scotland, Ireland, and Basse-Bretagne. Many curious observations in Natural History, Botany, &c. which he made in those travels, and communicated to some of his friends, are inserted in the Philosophical-Transactions [D]. But, the chief fruit of his travels was his Archæologia Britannica, of which an account is given in the note [E]. They also enabled him to communicate several large and valuable additions concerning Wales, to the learned editor of Camden's Britannia; which he moreover revised afterwards for the new impression (g). None was better qualified than him to give a History and Description of that Principality [F]; but he did not live to go through that good design. In March 1708-9, he was elected by the university of Oxford Esquire-Beadle of Divinity, a place of considerable profit; which however he enjoyed but a few months: for he died June 30, or July 1, 1709 (b). His intimate acquaintance, Mr Hearne, gives this character of him. He was a man of indefatigable industry, and of an enterprising and daring genius, whom no difficulties or hardships could deter or frighten from prosecuting his worthy and laudable designs; and therefore,

(5) he takes notice, That Sir William Williams had several Welsh manuscripts, but which were chiefly modern copies out of Hengwrt study in Merionysshire (6). The most valuable of them, were the works of Taliesyn, Anewryn, Gwawdydh, Myrdhyn ab Morvyrin, and Kygodio Elaeth, who lived in the 5th and 6th centuries. In N<sup>o</sup>. 335. (7) he writes, that he saw a stately mount, at a place near Drogheda, in Ireland; having a number of huge stones pitched on end round about it, and a single one on the top. Under that mount was a cave 20 feet high, supported by pillars of rude stones, as those of Abury in Wiltshire. There were found in the cave several bones, and part of a stag's or elk's head. From whence they guessed, that it was some place of sacrifice, or burial, of the ancient Irish. Near the top of the mount was found a gold coin of the Emperor Valentinian. And in No. 336. (8) he observes, that he met, in Ireland, with several of our old British monuments, called Kaer, Karn, Cromlech, &c. [i. e. Druidical temples, or altars] and that the Irish distinguished them by the same names.

[E] But the chief fruit of his travels was his Archæologia Britannica ] He published it under this title, Archæologia Britannica, giving some Account, additional to what has been hitherto published, of the Languages, Histories, and Customs of the original Inhabitants of Great Britain: From Collections and Observations in Travels through Wales, Cornwall, Bas-Bretagne, Ireland, and Scotland. By Edward Lhwyd M. A. of Jesus college, Keeper of the Ashmolean Museum in Oxford. Volume first. Glossography. Oxford 1707. fol. This Glossography is divided into ten sections. 1. The comparative Etymology, consisting wholly of parallel observations relating to the origin of Dialects, the affinity of the British with other languages, and their correspondence to one another. 2. A comparative Vocabulary of the original languages of Britain and Ireland; being a sort of a Latin British-Irish Celtic Dictionary. 3. An Armoric Grammar, by Julian Manoir, Jesuite; Englished out of French by Moses Williams, fublibrarian at the Ashmolean Museum. 4. An Armoric-English Vocabulary, Englished by the same. 5. A Collection of Welsh words omitted in Doctor Davies's Dictionary. 6. A Cornish Grammar. 7. A Catalogue of British manuscripts. 8. A British Etymologicon, or the Welsh collated with the Greek and Latin, and some other European languages. By David Parry A. B. of Jesus college. 9. A brief Introduction to the Irish or antient Scottish language. 10. An Irish-English Dictionary; with a large Preface in the Irish language. This Preface and likewise the Welsh preface to the British Etymologicon, are translated into English, and printed at the end of Bishop Nicolson's Irish Historical Library. (9) — Mr Lhwyd left also in manuscript a Scottish or Irish-English Dictionary; which Mr David Malcolme, a Minister of the Church of Scotland, undertook to print by subscription; and published proposals for it at Edinburgh, July 26. 1732. The title he gave that book was, 'Mr Lhwyd's antient Scottish or Irish-English Dictionary, with additions, as also the Elements of the said language, with necessary and useful informations: for propagating more effectually the English language, and for promoting the knowledge of the antient Scottish or Irish, and very many branches of useful and curious learning.' In the proposals, Mr Malcolme affirms, that, 'the antient Scottish or Irish is a most valuable Dialect of the Celtic; and, besides its internal beauties, is of incredible use to illustrate the antiquities, languages, laws, &c. of many other nations; more especially, those of Italy, Greece, Palestine or Canaan, besides other places of Asia, Europe, Africa, and America.' [Which is what very few will believe.] He further asserts 'that the ancestors of the Scots were the first inhabitants of South-Britain, and that Galgacus, the Caledonian general, who flourished in the reign of the Emperor Domitian about A. C. 84. was a Scottish prince, and not a Pict.' This book was to have consisted of above thirty sheets in 8vo. but it has not yet seen the light. — To return to the Archæologia; that excellent Antiquary, Mr William Baxter, gave a good account of it in a letter to Sir Hans Sloane, which was inserted in the Philosophical Transactions (10). And, in a letter to the author, he highly extols his great care, incredible diligence, and exact judgment in that work. Telling him, it was the work of an age, rather than of a few years: That it gave great light to the History and Antiquities of Britain; and was an honour and ornament to his ancient country. — Dii boni! quantâ curâ, quam incredibili diligentia, quam denique limato imo trutinato judicio vel reconditissimos vetustissimarum Linguarum thesauros ex iniis tenebris atque ultimâ oblivione eruisi! Quis non credat sæculi opus magis quam ætæula ræ? — Tu facem præstendisti clarissimam Antiquitatibus Britannicæ atque Historiæ, et quod summum est, ornâsti patriam antiquam, eamque longè insigniorem atque commendatiorem posteris tradidisti (11).

[F] None was better qualified than he to give a History and Description of that Principality.] This is rightly observed by the author of the English Topographer, supposed to be the very learned Dr R. Rawlinson. 'The most able, faith he, and learned head, from whom the world might have expected an History and Description of this his native country, is now, to the loss of the learned world, laid low in the dust. Mr Edward Lhwyd, the Reader, will easily perceive is pointed at, who had frequently traversed these parts, and whose Industry and Abilities are too well known to be here mentioned. The valuable collections he made, came afterwards into the possession of the late Sir Thomas Sebright of Beach-wood in Hertfordshire Baronet (12).' Mr Carte gives the following account of those Collections. 'Mr Lhwyd had the use of all Mr Vaughan's Collections, and having with incessant labour and great exactness employ'd a considerable part of his life in searching into the Antiquities of the Welsh, had perused or collected almost all that was ancient or valuable in their Manuscripts, transcribed all the old Charters of their Monasteries that he could meet with, examined into the Antiquities of Ireland, Armoric Bretagne, and other countries inhabited by the same people, compared them together, and made his Observations upon the whole, but dyed before he had digested them in the form of a Discourse upon the original Inhabitants of these Islands.'

therefore, as nothing uncommon and fit to be noted could escape his inquiry; so he would never rest satisfied till he came to a view of it himself (i). An account of his works, not already mentioned, is set down below [G].

(i) Account of some Antiquities between Windsor and Oxford, in Leland's Itinerary, Vol. V. p. 144.

[G] An account of his works not already mentioned.] The following pieces of his are inserted in the Philosophical Transactions, besides those already set down in note [D]. 1. Account of the Lapis Amiantus, or Linum fossilis asbestinum, (i. e. incombustible linen,) found in Llan Fairing Hornwy, in the northern parts of the isle of Anglesey (13). 2. Epistola—de Lapidibus aliquot perpetua figurâ donatis, &c. i. e. A letter concerning some regularly figured stones found in Oxfordshire, and the neighbouring parts (14). 3. A letter to Dr M. Lister, giving an account of Locusts observed 20 Oct. 1693, in Marthey parish in Pembrokehire; and about green worms on a hill in the parish of Mean Clochog, in the year 1601 (15). 4. Part of a letter to Dr Lister, containing a farther account of the fiery exhalation at Harlech in Merionethshire, dated Aug. 23. 1694 (16). 5. Account of an extraordinary shower of hail at Ponty pool in Monmouthshire 6 June 1697 (17). 6. Roman, French, and Irish inscriptions, and antiquities in Scotland and Ireland (18). 7. Some remarks on Fossils (19). 8. Some observations on Languages (20). What he says upon that point, is to this effect. 'Mr Pezron's notion of the Greek, Roman, Celtick Languages, being of one common origine, agrees exactly with my observation: But I have not advanced so far, as to discover the Celtick to be the mother Tongue; though perhaps he may not want good grounds (at least plausible arguments) for such an assertion. The Irish comes in with us, and is a dialect of the old Latin, as the British is of the Greek: But the Gotbick or Teutonic, tho' it has also much affinity with us, must needs make a band apart.'—9. Another piece of our Author's, in Latio, upon British figured stones, was published by him, under this title, Lithophylacii Britannici Ichnographia. Sive Lapidum aliorumque Fossilium Britannicorum singulari figurâ insignium, quotquot hæcenus vel ipse invenit, vel ab amicis accepit, Distributio Classica; Scrinii sui Lapidarii Repertorium cum locis singulorum natalibus exhibens, additis aliquot rariorum figuris ære incisâ; cum Epistolis ad clarissimos viros de quibusdam circa Marina, Fossilia & Stirpes minerales præsertim notandis. Lond. 1699. There were only 120 copies of this book printed, and those at the expence of the Earl of Dorset, Lord Somers, Lord Halifax, Sir Isaac Newton, Dr Lister, Dr Tancred Robinson, Sir Hans Sloane, Francis Aston, Esq; and Dr Geoffroy: so that it is now very scarce. And as it is very scarce, the following view of it will not be disagreeable to the Reader. It is disposed then under these thirteen classes. Lapidis Chrystillini, iisque af- finis. i. e. Chrystilline stones; amongst which he reckons our Bristol-diamonds; and other spars; selenitæ or Muscovy-glass, talc, petrifying incrustations, &c. Lapides corallini, corallines: Lithophyta; under which title are comprehended the mineral impressions of ferns and other plants, upon coal and slate-stones, as well as the resemblances of several parts of the trunks of trees and solid wood: Fossilia turbinata; spiral or wreath'd shells of the sea and rivers, whereof the astonishing varieties of the sailors (nautili, or cornua Ammonis) are the most considerable: Bivalvia; fossil-oysters, scallops, cockles, &c. Crustacea pumtualata; the sea urchin, and starfish, with the spikes (Dr Plot's lapides Judaici) and other parts of both: Tubulose; the vermicular kind: Malacostraca; fossil-lobsters or crabs, or parts of either; very rare: Ichthyodontes cuspidati; sharp-pointed teeth of sharks and other dog-fish: Ichthyodontes scutellati; the grinders of the same, miscalled by the Ancients bufonitæ, or toad-stones, Siliquastra, &c. Xylostea; bones of fishes, which fall not under the foregoing or following title: Ichthyospondili; single vertebrae or joyns in the back-bones of fishes, called by some of our rusticks fairy salt-fellers and hour-glasses: Effigata anomala, sive incertæ classis; into which he throws the belemnitæ or thunderbolts, crines veneris, &c. This draught he only offered as a sketch to be enlarg'd or abridg'd as future observations should direct. The book concludes with six letters in elegant Latin, on the nature and origin of these odd substances; with 21 copper-plates, representing the choicest rarities described in the several foregoing classes. But to return, 10. At the end of Mr William Baxter's Latin Glossary of the British Antiquities (21), are inserted, our Author's Observations on the Names of the Rivers, Mountains, Towns, &c. in Britain. De Fluviis, Montium, Urbium, &c. in Britannia, Nominibus, Adversaria posthuma. Lastly, several Letters written by Mr Lhwyd to the great Mr Ray, are inserted among the Philosophical Letters between the late learned Mr Ray and several of his ingenious Correspondents, published by the ingenious Dr Derham (22). Lond. 1718. 8vo. Mr Ray had published Extracts of some of them in his Three Physico-Theological Discourses; in which work he frequently mentions Mr Lhwyd with great honour. And particularly says of him (23), that he 'hath been most diligent in collecting, and curious in observing, all Fossils and figured Stones, of any man he knew, or ever heard of.' Dr Muggrave styles him, likewise the British Varro (24).

(a) Dr Henry More, who was also his pupil, tells us in the preface to his Philosophical Works, that he was a learned, vigilant, skilful, prudent, and pious tutor. He was afterwards Provost of Trinity-college in Dublin and Dean of Cassels, and at last Bishop of Cork and Ross in Ireland. Dr Birch's Life of Milton, p. 3, who was also another of his pupils.

LIGHTFOOT [JOHN], the famous commentator, was born March 19th 1602, in the rectory-house of Stoke upon Trent in Staffordshire, and put to school at Moreton-Green near Congleton in Cheshire; whence at 15 years of age he was sent to the University, and admitted of Christ's-college in Cambridge, under that eminent tutor Mr William Chappel (a) in June 1617. Here applying closely to his studies, he improved himself in classical learning, and in the opinion of his tutor, surpassed all his contemporaries in oratory [A], but did not much affect logick; the sharpness and fierceness of the scholastic disputations not suiting with his naturally meek disposition. He staid at college no longer than to take his first degree in arts; and then being only 19 years of age, he first engaged upon terms with his schoolmaster Mr Whitehead, who was now removed to a school at Repton in Derbyshire, and continued in the employ of usher to him about two years; after which, he took orders, and served the cure of Norton-under-Hales in Shropshire (b). This situation brought him into the acquaintance of Sir Rowland Cotton,

(b) An Account of our author's Life, prefixed to his Works, in 2 vols fol. 1684, by Dr Bright.

[A] Surpassed his contemporaries in oratory.] However just this opinion of his tutor may be, with regard to his college-exercises, yet if we may judge of his talents this way by his public works, his excellence here-in lay chiefly in a richness of invention only, and that, for want of judgment, runs frequently to a rank superferation of stile in English. The extract of his funeral sermon upon his dear friend and patron, Sir Rowland Cotton, is even childishly noisy. He cries aloud, and spareth not his words, which of itself demonstrates nothing so much as the vigorous health and strength of his constitution. However, this perhaps may in a great measure be put to the fault of the times, whence also it is, that we see him frequently running into the same affected quaintness and jingle with his rival and contemporary Dr Fuller. For instance, he begins his Preface to one of his pieces thus, he that would understand the story of the times, must first know the times of the story. Yet this is not always the case, for it cannot be denied that he breaks out into a noble eulogium upon his country on occasion of the Polyglott Bible, which we have given in remark [M]; and in reasoning he is concise and nervous, but his chief talent is criticism, in which respect he discovers a wit capable of penetrating the abstrusest difficulties.

(c) This feat is in the parish of Norton-under-Hales.

(d) In his dedication before the Horæ upon St John he says, he was carried to these studies ex innato oestro, and that nothing was sweeter to him, ipsis delictis nihil dulcius delicatiusque. His motto written in one of his note-books under his name is, Shacim Vebbarab, denoting his resolution to rise early and sit up late in the pursuit of these studies. See also the dedication of his Third Harmony to William Cotton of Bellaport, Esq; nephew to Sir Rowland, published in 1650, 4to.

ton, Knt. of Bellaport (c), who made him his chaplain, took him into his family, and engaged him in the study of Rabbinical learning [B]. Our author had hitherto neglected the study of the Hebrew language so much, as to have lost what little he had learned of it at school: but this loss was soon repaired: the example and conversation of his patron fell in exactly with the bent of his own genius; he conceived an inextinguishable ardor for these studies (d), and when Sir Rowland a few years after removed with his family to reside in London, Mr Lightfoot could not stay behind; he quitted his curacy, and was soon with his Hebrew master. However, he had not been long in London, before he formed a design to travel into foreign parts. In this resolution he made a visit to his father, who was now settled at Uttoxeter [C], and after a solemn leave, departing from his parents, he went to Stone. But here he was prevailed with drop his scheme of going abroad, and yielding to the importunities of some friends, he accepted the place of minister to that parish, which happened to be vacant at that time. During his residence in the family at Bellaport, he had fallen into the acquaintance of a gentlewoman who was daughter to William Crompton of Stone-park, Esq; and soon after his taking possession of the living at Stone he married her May 21st, 1628. But nothing could divert him from the eager pursuit of his studies, and not long after this settlement, having quitted his living, we find him residing with his family at Hornsey near London, for the sake of improving himself by the advantage of Sion college library, in Oriental learning; and in 1629 he gave the public a notable specimen of the advancement he had made therein [D]. In the spring of the following year he removed again into the country, and remained at Uttoxeter 'till September, when he was presented by Sir Rowland Cotton to the rectory of Ashley in Staffordshire. Fixing here, he built a study in his garden to be removed from the noise of the house, and spent twelve years in searching the Scriptures with indefatigable diligence, but yet without neglecting any of the duties of a faithful pastor. After he had satisfied himself in clearing up many, if not most, of the abstrusest passages in the Bible, he procured this rectory for his younger brother, and repaired to London [E], where he had not been long, before he was chosen minister of St Bartholomew's behind the Exchange [F], and being nominated a member of the Assembly of Divines at Westminster, he gave his attendance there, and distinguished himself remarkably in several of their

[B] The study of Rabbinical learning. He was incited to it first of all by the questions which his patron put to him, frequently upon such points as required some knowledge this way, whereat being ashamed to be puzzled, he was resolved to remove the cause. Sir Rowland finding him well disposed, was not wanting to assist him, and he made a good use of that generous kindness. The occasion was particularly lucky for Mr Lightfoot, for besides the happy discovery of his own genius thereby, he could not have found any where a more skilful master. Sir Rowland had been taught Hebrew in his infancy by the famous Hugh Broughton (1), who often occasionally lodged, and for some considerable time altogether resided at his father's house (2). By the care of this instructor he not only understood but spoke the language with ease; and there were few places in the Hebrew Bible which he was not able readily to read and render into English at seven or eight years of age.

[C] His father was now settled at Uttoxeter. He was made Vicar of this place in 1622, having been in orders since the year 1602, when he lived at Stoke above-mentioned. He was born in a small village called Shelton, in that parish, and died at Uttoxeter July 21, 1658, in the 81st year of his age (3). His wife, whose maiden-name was Elizabeth Bagnal, was descended of a very good family (4) in the same parish. She died January 24th, 1636, aged 71, having brought Mr Lightfoot four sons besides our author, who was the second. The eldest, called Thomas after his father, was bred to trade. The third, Peter, was a physician, and practised at Uttoxeter. Of the fourth, who was a clergyman, see Remark [E]; the youngest, Samuel, was likewise in orders.

[D] A specimen of his advancement in these studies. This piece he intitled Erubhim; or, Miscellanies Christian and Judaical, and others penned for recreation at vacant hours. It is dedicated (5) to Sir Rowland Cotton, who, he observes, had a right to the first fruits of those studies which had grown from his encouragement and incitation. He was now only 27 years of age, and appears to be well acquainted with the Latin and Greek Fathers as well as the heathen-writers Plutarch, Plato, and Homer. He seems to have had too, some skill in the modern languages, by several quotations in this book from the Spanish translation of the Bible and another Spanish author. Soon after receiving the present, his patron sent him a letter of acknowledgment, wherein he tells him he had read his book over, 'That there were many rarities in it; and nothing so vulgar that he needed to fear it's good reception, unless it fell into the hands of some novice or stupid dunce; and assures him that he joyed much in his proficiency (6).'

[E] And repaired to London. Mr Stype observes, that it is known upon what occasion he left his living, but supposes it was his being called to the Assembly of Divines, which is not improbable: for tho' that duty did not oblige him to quit the living, yet the non-residence which it occasioned, may well be supposed to have some weight with a conscientious parish-priest, and therefore he might be inclined to make use of it as an opportunity to provide for his younger brother (7), being himself at a great distance from all worldly-mindedness (8). This motive for resignation would also have the greater force. As his residing at London was in a manner necessary for printing his works, no doubt can be made that he had such a design at this time, since he must needs have provided the chief materials, and formed the plan of his Harmony before this removal. 'Tis true the just-mentioned author fancies he left his living unwillingly, which he collects from a passage in his epistle before his bandful of gleanings upon Exodus, where he makes his address to the parishioners of St Bartholomew's in these words, That when exiled from his own, they made him theirs; but, considering the Asiatic turn of our author's stile, the whole real force of the metaphor in the word Exile, may be deemed, without any injury to his meaning, to be fairly exhausted in the simple expression of that concern which a good and affectionate parish-priest (as he was) always feels upon quitting his flock, be the occasion what it will.

[F] Made Rector of St Bartholomew's. While he held this rectory there was a meeting of the London Divines, in which it was proposed to lay aside the celebration of Christmas-day by one of the greatest authority among them, who was very near prevailing with his brethren; when our author took this person aside, and arguing the point with him, particularly insisted on the great imprudence of such a step, as it would give a handle to charge them with idleness; and to be likely to raise great disturbances among the people, who would ill brook to see a custom of so long establishment laid aside; and he so far prevailed, that when the question was put about celebrating Christmas day following, whether they should preach that day or no, it was carried in the affirmative (9).

their debates * [G]. He was likewise appointed to preach before the House of Commons, on occasion of the publick fast March 29th 1643 (e); and was presented to the mastership of Katherine Hall in Cambridge (f), from the Parliament visitors, which he accepted the same year; as he did also the rectory of Much-Munden in Hertfordshire (g), given him before the expiration of that year by the then prevailing Powers. In 1644 he published the first part of his Harmony, together with a scheme of his whole design in that great undertaking [H]. As our author was himself learned, so was he a zealous promoter of learning in general. Upon this principle it was, that the following year, when the Enthusiasts openly set themselves to bring all human learning as well as the regular clergy into contempt, he very warmly pressed the speedy settling of the church in the Presbyterian form of government, and even preached publickly against allowing liberty of conscience

(g) Void by the death of Dr Samuel Ward, Margaret-Professor of Divinity in Cambridge, and Master of Sidney-college there. See more of him in the articles of the Bishops, MONTAGUE, and USHER.

[G] He distinguished himself in their debates. Notwithstanding his approbation of the form of church-government by classes and presbyteries, yet our author differed widely from the generality of those divines in many particulars both of doctrine and discipline; and in several of lesser moment he brought them over to his opinion. The following are instances of this: In the debates about what parts of learning candidates for orders should be examined in, he prevailed to have Scripture-chronology one article of that examination, which some were for waving. He carried it, that young men designed for the ministry, and not ministers, should read the service and chapters before sermon. In the administration of Baptism, he opposed the words which were moved to be inserted into the Directory, viz. It is lawful and sufficient to sprinkle the child; observing that it was unfit to vote that as lawful only which every one grants to be so. When they came to the vote, whether the Directory should run thus: The minister shall take water and sprinkle, or pour it with his hand upon the face or forehead of the child; so many disapproved the exclusion of dipping, that the votes were 24 to 25. Whereupon, the affair being resumed the next day, our author demanded of those who insisted on dipping, the reasons for their opinion; and challenged the whole Assembly (as he had the day before) to shew him in all the old Testament any one instance where the word Tabbilab (alleged by them in proof of dipping) usd de sacris & in actu transeunte, implied any more than sprinkling (10). Hereupon it being thus expressed, that pouring on of water, or sprinkling, in the administration of water, is lawful and sufficient, our author excepted against the words is lawful, which was the same he said, as if it should be determined to be lawful to use bread and wine in the Lord's-supper: he moved therefore for it to be expressed thus: It is not only lawful but likewise sufficient; which was agreed to. To the words, There be no fasting on the Sabbath, he prevailed to have it in this manner: That the diet on the Sabbath be so ordered, that no servants or others be unnecessarily kept from the public service. Upon the article of Christ's descent into hell, he carried it to have this clause in the explication, he continued in the state of the dead. When the Directory for praying was read over, and they came to that clause freeing us from antichristian darkness, he excepted to the expression as too low: for that antichrist imported no activeness against godliness, and darkness is but a privation; whereupon it was worded from antichristian darkness and violence. Again, whereas it was put for the merits of our High-priest. This he likewise excepted against, for that the allusion would not hold; for the Jews prayed to God by the mediation of the High-priest, but never by the merits; whereupon the mediation was put in. He also carried a point, with regard to the regulation of that assembly: for it being moved, that if any member going out while they were sitting should make his obedience, when this was even ready to pass, Mr Lightfoot desired that it might not be left upon their records to posterity; that this assembly had need to take order for common reverence and civility; upon which the motion was rejected. Thus that assembly yielded to the force of his arguments in points of lesser concern; but when he courageously shewed his dissent in others, wherein the main support of their cause depended, those Divines were deaf to all his learning; and the excellent arguments which he urged with great spirit in the most masterly manner against their darling notions of lay elders, and the people's election of their ministers, as also in vindication of the use of forms of prayer, proved unavailing (11).

his whole design. The whole scheme was divided into two parts. The body, containing the Harmony of the New Testament; the design of which was, 1. To lay the texts in that order that the nature and progress of the story requires. 2. To give his reasons for the particular disposition he fixes on. 3. To give some account of the difficulties in the language, as he should meet with them. 4. To clear and open the sense all along. The Introduction being the other general part, was to be prefixed to the body as a large preface, which should contain prolegomena of diverse particulars fit to be known, preparatory to the work. He proposed therein to treat largely and thoroughly of these five heads: 1. To fix and ascertain the year of our Saviour's birth. 2. To dispose in their proper places all the dislocations of texts and stories in the Old Testament, which are exceeding many, that such dislocations in the New Testament might be thought less strange. 3. To make a critical description of the Land of Canaan and places adjoining, which would help to the clearer understanding of much of the story of the Gospel. 4. To give a topographical description of Jerusalem, and the Temple, in order to extricate diverse passages of the Gospel from smaller obscurities. 5. To give some history of the state and customs of the Jews in those times when the Gospel began to be preached, out of their own authors. He had laid in many materials, and made a good progress in this undertaking, when finding it increase under his hands to a large bulk, he grew discouraged at the thoughts of never being able to get it printed entire (12). This put him upon epitomizing what he had already written, and determined him to publish his studies by piece-meal, as he did afterwards. But by this means his method was broken, many of his useful notions suppressed by studying brevity, and all that after saw the light, had no more than the face of a kind of confused harmony. What he published of it the year that we are now upon related both to the prolegomena, and the body of the work. Of the first he published a piece intitled The Harmony of the Old Testament; or, a Chronicle of the Times, and the order of the Texts of the Old Testament, &c. Also another tract intitled, The Harmony, and Chronicon, and order of the New Testament. These related to the second article of the prolegomena. He next printed a third piece, intitled The Harmony of the Four Evangelists among themselves, and with the Old Testament, from the Beginning of the Gospels to the Baptism of our Saviour; with an Explanation of the chief Difficulties both in language and sense, part I. 4to. This respects the body of the work; as also does the second part, from the baptism of our Saviour to the first Passover; and the third part, from the first Passover after our Saviour's baptism to the second, published in 1650, 4to. The chief thing wanting in these is the full text of the four Evangelists, which he had completed, and the MSS. fell into the hands of Mr Stuype. The Commentary upon the Acts of the Apostles to chapter xi. inclusive, which he published in 1645. The Temple-service, as it stood in the days of our Saviour, published in 1649; and the Temple, especially as it stood in the days of our Saviour, printed in 1650; and the Chorographical description before his Horæ Hebraicæ, or Commentaries on the four Evangelists, relate to the Prolegomena. The Horæ Hebraicæ, or Commentaries upon the Gospels, the Acts of the Apostles, some chapters in the Epistle to the Romans, and the entire first Epistle to the Corinthians, may be looked upon as belonging to the second article of the body of this grand work. As these were his last, so they are esteemed the best of his performances, and they employed the remainder of his life after the Restoration.

ence [I]. Whilst he was thus labouring on one hand to get a timely check put to the wild licentiousness of the saints [K], so on the other hand he continued publishing, tho' under great difficulties and discouragements, several branches of his Harmony (b), all which, were so many excellent specimens of the usefulness of learning to true religion. In 1652 he took the degree of Doctor of Divinity, having first performed the regular exercise for it [L]; and being chosen Vice-chancellor of the University in 1655, he executed that office with an exemplary diligence and fidelity, greatly pleased with the happy escape of the two learned bodies in the kingdom, from the destruction with which they had been lately threatened, by the independent faction then prevailing (i) [M]. The following year he buried his first wife, and some time after, entered into a second marriage [N]. At the Restoration he offered to resign his mastership of Katherine-Hall to Dr Spurstow, but upon his declining the acceptance, our author obtained a confirmation from the Crown both of that place and also of his living, by the particular recommendation

[I] He preached against Liberty of Conscience ] This was in a Sermon (13) before the House of Commons at St Margaret's, Westminster, Aug. 26, 1645, where, having complimented them for what they had done in platforming classes and presbyteries, quibus I verily and cordially believe, says he, is according to the pattern in the Mount: he recommends it to them to order a review of the translation of the Bible, and to hasten the settling of the Church: after which he declares his opinion, with great warmth against an unrestrained Liberty of Conscience. 'I shall not go about, says he, to determine the question, whether the conscience may be bound or not? tho' for my own satisfaction I am resolved it may, and do hold it a truer point in Divinity that errans conscientia liganda than ligat; but certainly the devil in the conscience, may be, nay he must be bound, or else you act not according to that vigour that Christ requireth at your hands. It is true indeed what is so much talk'd of, that Christ alone must reign in the conscience; but it is true also that he does so by the power that he hath put into the hands of the magistrate, as well as by his word and spirit.' It is evident, by the history of the times when this was said, that it was wholly pointed at the Anabaptists, and independent enthusiasts, who, under the pretence of Liberty of Conscience, opposed the settlement of the Presbyterian form of ecclesiastical polity now, with as much furious zeal as these joining with them had before exerted in pulling down the ancient established Hierarchy. An universal anarchy being their aim, and how well they succeeded needs not be mentioned. 'Tis with an eye to such as these that we find our author arguing frequently with much zeal against schism and separation from an established Church, and shewing in these times the necessity of keeping communion even with a national Church that had some corruptions in it. Upon the same principle we see him, in a sermon at Ely (14), censuring the Anabaptists and Socinians: 'Two heresies, especially, (says he) misconstrue this text, Anabaptism and Socinianism: for I must call that heresy which unchurches all Churches, and ungod's God.'

[K] The saints.] i. e. The Enthusiasts assuming this character, under which they pretended to justify their separation, and indeed all their wildest extravagancies. Our author, after the Restoration, speaking of this special mystery of their iniquity observes, that the Shibboleth of the Gileadites anciently founded not more dangerously than the title of Saints of late; whereas by this title in scripture is meant nothing but Christians in opposition to the heathens (15).

[L] After performing the regular exercise.] His thesis was upon this question, Post canonem scripturæ consignatum non sunt novæ revelationes expectandæ? and he determined next day upon this question, An mori Christi fuerit in redemptionem universalem? His Concio ad Clerum was upon 1 Cor. xvi. 22. he printed the substance of it afterwards in his Horæ upon that epistle. He has written much in diverse parts of his works upon the subject of his thesis; in which we find it was his opinion, that after the closing of the canon, there was neither prophecy, miracles, nor extraordinary gifts in the Church. In the third volume of his works, published in 1699, there is a treatise of the Spirit of Prophecy (16), wherein he shews that spirit to have entirely ceased both among the Jews and Christians, when the canon of their respective scriptures was completed, as it certainly was at the destruction of Jerusalem; accordingly to this piece our author has subjoined a treatise of that destruction, and of the time when it happened.

[M] Greatly pleased with the escape from the Independent faction.] The Polyglott Bible was at this time in the press, a grant having been made by Oliver Cromwell, then Protector, for importing the paper duty-free. Our author therefore, who was highly delighted with a work which tended so much to the honour of his country, in his speech at the commencement breaks out into a transport of joy on that occasion 'Sic sub proterito & proculcato Statu Cleri nuper Anglicani germinabit, & adhuc germinat, nobile illud eruditionis germen editio Bibliorum multilinguam, quæ quicquid generosum vix vidit unquam republica Literaria nec quicquam Anglia sibi honorificentius. Opus æternæ famæ monumentum memorabile in sempiterna secula futurum summæ eruditionis, zeli, & in Deo bonorum Protectoris fidei Cleri Anglicani jam tunc summe periclitantis. Machi estote viri venerandi & doctissimi, qui in opere tam magnanimo defudatis! Pergite quod facitis trophæa vobis erigere Patriæque! & perlegant ope vestra omnes gentes sacra Biblia suis linguis, atque iisdem linguis eadem ope prædicentur fama eruditionis & literarum Gentis Anglicanæ (17).' It must be observed, that Dr Lightfoot had a considerable hand himself in perfecting this work: for, besides his chorographical table prefixed to it, the Samaritan version was submitted intirely to his direction, and every sheet thereof sent to be revised by him before it was printed off (18). At the Commencement here mentioned, an Act was kept for the degree of Doctor of Divinity; and the Professor being indisposed, our Vice-chancellor supplied his place. The questions were, Whether the state of Innocency was a state of Immortality? 2. Whether eternal life is promised in the old Testament. Both which he maintained in the affirmative (19).

[N] He buried his wife and married another.] His first wife was the widow of George Copwood, Gent. of Dilverne in Staffordshire: her mother was an Aston of the family of Lord Aston of Tixal in that county. She was the youngest of nine sisters, all of whom that lived married into good families in the same county. In the church of Stone where our author, as has been observed, was some time minister, there is the portraiture of them all, with three sons, and their father and mother in brass. Mrs Joyce, of whom we now speak, by her first husband Mr Copwood had two sons and one daughter; and by Dr Lightfoot four sons and two daughters. The eldest son, John, was chaplain to Dr Bryan Walton, Bishop of Chester, and died soon after that prelate. The second, called Anastasius Cottonus Jackson (these last additions being made to his name in memory of Sir Rowland Cotton and Sir John Jackson, two of our author's dearest friends) was minister of Thundridge in Hertfordshire, and died there leaving one son. The third son who was called also Anastasius, but without the additions, was brought up to a trade in London. The fourth son, named Thomas, died young. His daughters were Joyce, married to Mr John Duckfield, Rector of Aspeden in Hertfordshire; and Sarah, married to Mr Colclough, a Staffordshire gentleman. The Doctor had no issue by his second wife, Anne, who was likewise a widow, and relict of Mr Austin Brograve, uncle of Sir Thomas Brograve, Bart of Hertfordshire, a gentleman well versed in Rabbinical learning, and a particular acquaintance of our author. This wife also died before him (20).

dation of Archbishop Sheldon [O]. He was likewise in great favour with the Lord-Keeper Bridgman, who collated him to a Prebend in the church of Ely [P]. Being of a strong and healthy constitution, which was assisted by an exact temperance, he pursued his studies with unabated vigour to the last (k); and continued publishing, notwithstanding the many difficulties he met with therein [Q]. He ordinarily resided in the country among his

[O] By the recommendation of Archbishop Sheldon.] Presently after the Restoration a grant of his living was obtained by a fellow of some college in Cambridge. The Doctor being informed of it by his neighbour in the country, Sir Henry Caeser, applied to Sir Archbishop Sheldon, who readily and heartily engaged to serve him, tho' personally unknown to him: and our author took the first opportunity of expressing his gratitude in a way which must needs be very acceptable, as it carried along with it an illustrious proof of his deservings that favour. This was done by dedicating his Horæ on St Mark to the Archbishop in 1661, where he expresses himself thus: 'With how great concern you pleaded my cause before the King's Majesty, before the Lord Chancellor, and my Diocesan, how you consulted for me, wrote letters, laid stops that my ruin might not proceed beyond the possibility of a restoration, &c. He likewise paid his debt of gratitude in the same manner to Sir William Morrice (21), Secretary of State, who, unasked and unsought to, as he acknowledges, was very serviceable in procuring the King's favour and letters-patents for him. But he took care in the first place to pay his tribute of dutiful acknowledgments to his Majesty. Before the dedication just mentioned, to the Archbishop, is prefixed another in a Rabbinical form, which, upon this occasion, if ever, is excusable. The inscription being in these words, 'Sacred to God and the King, an altar is here to be erected before the porch, and thanksgiving to be offered on it for this leisure granted to the studies of learning, for the mercies preserved to me and mine snatched from imminent ruin. To Jehovah the deliverer, and to Cæsar the preserver. To Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things which are God's.' By this piece we learn that the living of Munden was in the gift of the Crown, his two immediate predecessors being presented by King James and King Charles. 'To these,

say he, I succeeded very unequally, and more unhappy, that I was not admitted by the same right, but by that power, that then, while the wars prevailed, possessed all. The weakness of this title was presently discovered when the King's Majesty, in which we now rejoice by the happy turn of Providence returned to his own right, the Rectory was granted to me who was a suitor for it by the royal donation. I applied, an obscure person of no note, altogether unworthy, of no merit, wholly unknown to the King's Majesty, and lying especially under a kind of accusation, for it wanted not an accusation, that I was put into the place by that authority that I was. Yet twice within two weeks, by the royal favour, I obtained this grant confirmed by his hands, and the Great Seal of England; so that now I, as well as my predecessors, have this to boast of, that I have a King to my patron.' Upon his going to Katherine-hall, after this confirmation, he was met at some miles distance from Cambridge with great joy by the Fellows of that society. He was indeed a benefactor to that college. The building being old and decayed, he formed a plan of rebuilding it in a more handsome and commodious manner. He gave 20 l. towards it, and procured a liberal and generous contribution from the Fellows besides, good benefactions from others: and the work was begun in his time; but he dying soon after, it was finished by Dr Echard, his worthy successor. Besides these contributions, Dr Lightfoot had been a benefactor before, by redeeming a piece of land to the college, and therefore is always mentioned at the commemoration of their benefactors. It was an instance of the Doctor's modesty, to declare himself an obscure person of no note and merit, and utterly unknown; since the Polyglott Bible, in which he had so great a share, had then been published some years (22). Besides, he had at this time been a great encourager of Dr Castell's Heptaglott Lexicon, as appears by several letters to him from that learned author; in one of which he submits it to Dr Lightfoot, either to suppress that design or give it life. He also assisted Dr Castell with his purse, which that worthy person acknowledges as almost the only instance that he had met with of kindness to his ruined and undone condition (23). He was indeed utterly unknown to the King, who, on that account, easily granted his living to another: but to the learned world he was far from being a stranger, since several foreigners who came to England for assistance in their Rabbinical studies, made their addresses to him as one of the most eminent scholars in that way (24). As to his demerits, in respect to the Crown, it is manifest that he had rather submitted to the necessity of the times, than been active in opposition to his Majesty, and tho' a little inclined to Puritanism (25), yet he had discharged his several duties of Governor in the university, and of a good parish-priest, so as to gain the universal love and respect of all who had any dealings with him; and by this means, upon the King's return, he had many friends and no enemies at all (26).

[P] Collated to a Prebend of Ely by Sir Orlando Bridgman.] Before Sir Orlando was promoted to the Great Seal, being a Judge and going the circuit in that station, he procured our author to preach as oft as he could at the assizes at Hertford (27), being much pleased both with the learning of his discourses and his unusual notions. Several of these sermons are printed at the end of the second volume of our author's works; but Mr Strype could not learn the exact time when he was made Prebendary of Ely. He dedicated his Horæ upon St John's Gospel to this patron, wherein he acknowledges it was owing to his Lordship's counsel, assistance, friendship, and bounty, that he was able to proceed in his studies.

[Q] The difficulties he met with in publishing his works.] It was owing to this that we had not more of his commentaries, which he was urged to publish by many of his friends, particularly Dr Worthington, Master of Jesus-college in Cambridge, recommended the Epistle to the Hebrews to him as especially suited to his design; but he returned this answer, 'Exasciavi paucis abhinc annis commentariolum, &c.' 'A few years since I prepared a little commentary upon the first epistle to the Corinthians, in the same stile and manner as I had done that on Matthew, but it laid by me two years and more; nor can I now publish it but at my own charge, and to my great disadvantage, which I felt enough, and too much in the edition of my book upon St Mark.' This discouragement gave him much grief and concern, of which, together with his unquenchable ardour for these studies, he gives a remarkable instance in his Preface to the description of the Temple: 'But here by the way (says he) I can't but mention, that I think I can never forget a handsome and deserved check that mine own heart, meeting with a special occasion, did give me upon the laying down of the other task, and the undertaking of this, for my daring to enter either upon the one or the other. That very day when I first set pen to paper to draw up the description of the Temple, having but immediately before laid aside my thoughts of the description of the land, I was necessarily called out to go and see a piece of land but a mile off from my house.' He then proceeds to observe, 'that he had been owner of this piece of land many years, but had never seen it, and that however he chose to take directions of the way to it, and go alone for meditation sake; whereupon, having missed his way and lost himself, his heart took him to task, and called him fool, so studiously to search into things remote, and that so little concerned his interest, and so neglective of what was near him in place, and so particularly concerned him; and a fool again, to go about to describe to others, places and buildings that lay so many hundred miles off from hence, and under so many hundred years ruins, and yet not able to find the way to his own that lay so near. I could not (continues he) but acknowledge the reproof both seasonable, and seasoned both with truth and reason; and it so far prevailed with me, that it put me upon a resolution not only to lay by that work that I had newly his parishoners, with whom he lived in the most happy harmony and affection [R]; so that he usually spent no more time at Ely than was necessary to keep his Prebend. He was on his journey thither for that purpose, when he was seized with a cold, which growing troublesome after his arrival there, he was persuaded to eat a red herring and drink two or three glasses of wine: This small quantity of a strong liquor to which his habit was entirely estranged, gave occasion as was thought (l), to his fever's taking an ugly turn, affecting his head with a dozing heaviness. He bore it with great meekness and patience, saying little, only often repeating that he was in the hands of a good God. After he had lain thus comatose near a fortnight, the distemper put an end to his life, December the 6th 1675. His body was interred at Munden near those of both his wives. As to his person, it was comely and of full proportion, his complexion ruddy, and his constitution vigorous. As his countenance was mild, so he was easy of access, grave, but yet affable and communicative. He was of a very meek and tender spirit, often melting into tears (m). Very temperate in his diet, he abstained wholly from wine, drinking only water, or chiefly small beer, which he chose to have very new. Not long before he died some booksellers desired him to collect and methodize his works, in order to print them, which he promised to do, but was prevented by his death (n). The edition in 1684 has been already mentioned, besides which, there was another edition printed at Rotterdam in 1686 in two volumes folio, containing all his Latin writings, with a Latin translation of those which were written by him in English. At the end of both these editions there is a list of such pieces as he left unfinished. 'Tis the chief of these in Latin, which make up the third volume added to the former two in a third edition of his works in Latin, by John Leusden at Utrecht in 1699, folio. They were communicated by Mr Strype, into whose hands the Doctor's papers came (o), and that gentleman, in 1700, published in 8vo, another collection of these papers under the following title, Some genuine Remains of the late pious and learned John Lightfoot, D. D. consisting of three Tracts; 1. Rules for a Student of the Holy Scriptures. 2. Meditations upon some abstruse Points of Divinity, and Explanations of divers difficult places of Scripture. 3. An Exposition of two select Articles of the Apostles Creed. Together with a large preface concerning the author, his learned debates in the Assembly of Divines, his peculiar opinions [S], his Christian piety, and the faithful discharge of his ministry.

* taken in hand that morning, but also to be wiser in my occasions for the time to come, than to neglect and sink my own estate as I had done: And yet within a little time after, I know not how, I was fallen to the same studies and design again, had got my laid-by task again into my hands before I was aware, and was come to a determination to go on in that work; because I had my notes and collections ready by me as materials for it; and when that was done, then to think of the advice that my heart had given me, and to look at mine own business.' After all, tho' he published the description, yet he could not get the map engraved, notwithstanding he had drawn it very fairly upon vellum. It was published after his death with two others, one of Jerusalem, and the other of the Holy Land, and a chorographical table (by Dr John Williams, afterwards Bishop of Chichester) of the several places contained and described in the two volumes of his works; together with the author's Life, by Dr Bright, in 1684. Dr Lightfoot in a letter to Buxtorf declares, he could scarce find any booksellers in England that would venture to print his works, and that he was obliged to print some of them at his own expence; and Frederic Miede in a letter informed him, that there was not a bookseller in Germany who would freely undertake the impression of his Commentary upon the first epistle to the Corinthians (28).

[R] He usually resided at Munden, &c.] He never left his living any longer than to perform the necessary residence at Cambridge and Ely, and during that absence would frequently say, he longed to be with his ruffet-coats; he lived very hospitably among them, and was not wanting in acts of charity. He was a constant preacher, and Munden being a large parish, and the parsonage-house a mile from the church, and as he reported there every Sunday, read prayers and preached morning and afternoon; he frequently continued all day in the church, not taking any refreshment 'till evening-service was over (29).

[S] His peculiar opinions.] Among these Mr Strype reckons that of the utter rejection of the Jews. In the third volume of his works, tract 10th, is a collection of the promises made to the Jewish Church in the books of the prophets, and which are to be fulfilled in the last times. If we explain his doctrine concerning their final rejection agreeable to the promises made to them, as they appear in that collection, he must mean thereby, only that their conversion shall not happen 'till the end of the world; an opinion which, after St Chrysostom, is held by many divines. In reality our author's opinion was no more than what has been maintained of late by the celebrated Wolfius (30), who argues strongly against any such general calling of the Jews as had been asserted by others, Viam patere Judæis, inquit, ad Evangelium non minus quam Gentilibus eam vero non notabilem sed successivam apostoli Pauli verbis optime convenire? 2. His mean opinion of the Septuagint version from the authority of Massebet Sopherim, and that it was chiefly done by the Sanhedrim, purposely to impose on the Gentiles, tho' not taken notice of by Dr Prideaux; yet that learned Dean, from the same authority, thinks it not improbable that the translation was performed by five Alexandrian (31) Jews, which Dr Lightfoot also maintains, but confines their undertaking to the Pentateuch. 3. He believed the smallest points in the Hebrew text to be of divine institution; which must be owned has carried him into many absurdities: some of these are remarked by Dr Bright in his Life above-mentioned. 4. Nor less indefensible is his opinion concerning the Keys, that they were given to Peter alone. 5. His opinion is very singular; that the power of binding and loosing related not to discipline, but to doctrine. As is also, 6thly, That peculiar interpretation of those words of God to Cain, If thou doest not well sin lieth at thy door. 'Sin (says he) that is not punishment to take hold on thee but a sin-offering lieth at thy door [to expiate thy evil].' To support which sense he observes, that this is the common acceptation of the word חַטָּאת i. e. Sin, in the book of Moses. But of these and others of the like sort, he says, Innocua, ut spero, semper proponens; and 'tis certain that, notwithstanding his mistakes, if they be such, he is the most ingenious as well as learned of our English commentators, and has furnished all his successors in that way with a great part of the substance of what we find in their remarks. His conjectures are often probable, always ingenious; so that they give almost as much pleasure to the reader as they must have done, and he declared they actually did, to the writer. P

LILBURNE [JOHN], the coryphæus of the Levellers, was descended of an ancient family [A], and born in 1618 (a) at Thickney Puncharden in the county of Durham. He gave early proofs of an excellent memory, a ready apprehension, and a strong imagination; and being a younger son (b), and also of a very forward temper, was carried by his father without any grammar learning (c) to London, and put apprentice at twelve years of age to Mr Thomas Hewson an eminent wholesale clothier near London-Stone (d). In this service he had not been a long while, before, young as he was, he complained to the City-Chamberlain of his master's ill usage; and having carried this point to his satisfaction (e), he afterwards spared not to indulge his genius freely. He was naturally of a high-mettled daring spirit, and having been trained up among the Puritans [B], he spent several days a week in reading such of their books as were proper to inflame his zeal against the established Hierarchy [C]. The event was answerable to his endeavours, he

[A] Descended of an ancient family] When our author's cause was pleaded at the bar of the House of Lords in 1640, among other aggravations of the cruelty of the sentence passed upon him by the judges of the Star-chamber in 1637, it was urged by the managers in his behalf, that he was descended from an ancient family in the north*, a town in Northumberland still bearing the name of Lilburne or rather Leisle-bourne, by reason of the water called the Bourne, that was about it; and that the arms belonging to the family, are three water budgets, which is an ancient bearing of arms (1). His father Richard Lilburne, besides the estate at Thickley Puncharden abovementioned, was possessed of lands to a considerable value in the county of Durham. In 1638 he was engaged in a suit at law, for an estate of above 200 pounds a year in that county, wherein issue was joined for a trial by battle; which, as it seems to be the last instance of that ancient custom, and happened to fall in our author's family, may deserve a place in these memoirs. This remarkable cause, after some former hearings, came on the 6th of August 1638 before judge Berkley at Durham, between Ralph Claxton demandant, and Richard Lilburne tenant. The demandant appeared at 10 o'clock in the forenoon by his attorney, and brought in his champion George Cheney in array, who cast his gantlet into the court with five small pence in it. Then the tenant appeared by his attorney, and brought in his champion William Pevelin in array, who did the like. After some examination of the proceedings in the cause, the parties and their champions were adjourned 'till three in the afternoon of the same day; when appearing as before with sand bags and battons, some discourse was held of it by the judge, who also examined the champions, and having ordered them into the custody of two bailiffs of the court, adjourned them 'till 8 the next morning; at which time appearing again, they were adjourned 'till three after dinner, and upon their appearing accordingly, were adjourned 'till 8 the following morning, when the champions put in their pledges (as at the court held on the 7th of July preceding) to appear in the court of pleas to be held on the 15th of September next. In the interim, on the 15th of August, his Majesty in council being made acquainted, that there had been several days appointed for determining by battle the question of right which had long depended between Claxton and Lilburne, for certain lands in the county of Durham, and that by the late appointment the same was to be tried by the said parties champions, December the 22d next, desired that the judges of that circuit, upon conference with their brethren, should be prayed and required to take the same case into due and serious consideration, and, if they could, to find any just way by law how the said combat might be put off, and the cause put into another way of trial; for his Majesty, out of his pious care of his subjects, would have it so, rather than to admit of a battle: but otherwise, since Lilburne had obtained a judgment upon a demurrer against Claxton, and also costs from the board for his vexation; and since that, Claxton had brought a new action, upon which Lilburne had waged battle; his Majesty would not deny the trial of laws, if it could not be legally prevented. After this, both parties bringing their champions into the court at Durham, having their sand-bags and battons, and so rendered themselves in that fighting posture, when the court upon reading the record, found an error in it by mistake of the the clerk (which some thought wilfully done) whereupon the court would not let them join battle at that time (2). Thus did the court order to avoid battle by deferring the matter, tho' the champions were ever present in court at all meetings to join battle. In further pursuance of his Majesty's earnest desire, there was a consultation of all the judges upon the following point. In a trial by battle upon a writ of right, the tenant waged battle which was accepted, and at the day to be performed. Berkley the justice there examined the champions of both parties, whether they were not hired for money? and they confessed they were, which confession he caused to be recorded, and gave farther day to be advised; and by the King's direction all the judges were required to deliver their opinion, whether this was cause sufficient to de-arraign the battle by these champions; and by Bramston, chief Justice; Davenport, chief Baron; Denham, Hutton, Jones, Cook, and other justices, it was subscribed, that this exception, coming after the battle waged, and champions allowed, and sureties given to perform it, ought not to be received (3). Notwithstanding this opinion, means being still found to defer the trial from year to year, Richard Lilburne presented a petition to the House of Commons, which was read July 24th, 1641, setting forth how often he had joined issue for trial by battle for lands in value of above 200 pounds per annum, and had brought down his champion; but that they were from time to time put off from a trial by combat by the judges, who still found some error in the record, so that the trial could not proceed. Upon which, it was ordered afterwards by the House, that a bill be brought in to take away trial by battle (4).

[B] Trained up among the Puritans] Mr Wood tells us (5) expressly, that his brother Robert was puritannically educated; and our author suggests, that his own master, Hewson, was a sectary, and that himself frequented the same meeting of those people with his master (6). He observes also upon another occasion, that both his father and uncle George Lilburne, were not only the first that ever he could hear of in the county of Durham, that opposed the King in the point of ship money, but likewise stood up against the Bishop of Durham, and the Dean and Chapter there, in the business of innovations: that afterwards adhering to the Parliament, they became Justices of the Peace, Committeemen, Surveyors of Bishops lands, and Sequestrators of Delinquents estates (7).

[C] He read puritannical books] He tells us himself, that his master keeping only a warehous, he had spare time enough several days in the week, which he spent in reading the Bible, the Book of Martyrs, Luther's, Calvin's, Beza's, Cartwright's, Perkins's Molin's, Burton's, and Rogers's works, with a multitude of other such like books which he had purchased (8). Lord Clarendon informs us, that our author confessed, that in the melancholy of his imprisonment, and by reading the Book of Martyrs, he raised in himself a marvellous inclination and appetite to suffer in the defence and for the vindication of any oppressed truth, and found himself very much confirmed in that spirit; and in that time diligently collected and read all those libels and books, which had anciently as well as lately been written against the Church, from whence, with the venom he had likewise contracted, the impudence and bitterness of their stile, and by practice, brought himself to the faculty of writing like them (9). But tho' it be allowed, that too rigorous a punishment is rather apt to harden than amend the sufferer; yet whatever fallacious

(2) Mr Rushworth observes, that this proved an omen of what the next year produced, by a greater appearance of a battle, when the King's army was at the camp of Berwick, and the Scots on the other side of Tweed; yet both armies parted also without battle.

became of such eminence among those people, as to be consulted upon the boldest of their undertakings while an apprentice, and presently after, was esteemed by them as a person inspired (f). Among others, the teacher (g) of that congregation which he attended, frequently visiting his master, took notice of the apprentice's extraordinary talents, and highly approving thereof, contracted an intimacy with him, and in 1636, brought him into the acquaintance of Dr Bastwick, then a Star-chamber prisoner in the Gate-house, whom he afterwards constantly visited. At one of these visits, the Doctor reading his Merry Liberty (b), young Lilburne was so much captivated with the anti-episcopal spirit of the piece, that with the author's consent, he carried the manuscript to Holland [D], and printing it there (i), after a stay of several months, employed in libelling and defaming the Bishops and the Prerogative, he returned home, and continued the same practices in disguise; but being in a little time betrayed by his associate, he was seized and carried before the Council-Board, and the High-Commission-Court, after some examinations (k) being referred to the Star-chamber, was, after several examinations there, also found guilty February 13, 1637. of printing and publishing libels and seditious books, particularly one intitled, News from Ipswich [E]. In all these examinations, stiffly refusing to comply with the ordinary rules of trial (l), as contrary to the liberties of a free-born Englishman, he got the nickname of Free-born John (m); and being condemned to a severe punishment which was rigorously executed [F], he went through it with such a degree of hardiness and unfeeling obstinacy, as obtained him the title of a Saint among the Enthusiasts (n). After this he was ordered to be imprisoned in the Fleet, 'till he should make his submission, where, tho' he was loaded with double irons on his arms and legs, and put into one of the basest wards, yet he found means to print and publish another libel of his own writing, under the title of The Christian Man's Trial [G], in 4to, the same year.

glosses Mr Lilburne might occasionally put upon the matter, with a design, apparently, to expose the bad policy of his Star-chamber judges, it is evident that the enthusiastic spirit, which he here suggests to be raised in him by the melancholy of a prison, had entered into and taken full possession of him long before; which truth also he was not sparing upon other occasions to declare. Thus, in one place (10) he observes, that in the year 1636, when he constantly visited Dr Bastwick in the Gate-house, his zeal was so strongly kindled for him and his cause, that he could willingly have laid down his life for the Doctor's service. And in another piece printed in 1646 (11) he cries out with the same fervent spirit, that 'he had then assuredly known God to be his God upwards of ten years, who would enable him always to carry his life in his hand, and give it up in his righteous cause at a moment's warning, having prepared a mansion of eternal glory for him in heaven.'

[D] He went to Holland Mr Lilburne frequently in his writings calls this a banishment, for which he also claims reparations, and says that it was occasioned by his true affection to Dr Bastwick, for which he was forced by the Bishops and their catchpoles to fly into the Low-Countries for refuge, just about the time of the Doctor's banishment: 'Where, continues he, I was divers months, and where Sir William Boswell the King's Ambassador laid for me, as I was informed, several designs to put me a ship-board, and send me over to England to the Bishops here for my visible activity there against them, which forced me continually to wear my sword about me (12).'

[E] News from Ipswich Mr Prynne, the writer of this libel, suffered much the same punishment for printing and publishing it, by a sentence in the Star-chamber (13), as was inflicted upon our author, who, according to Mr Wood's account was then, or had been a little before servant to the former: 'for, says that Antiquarian, about the year 1632, young Lilburne, upon the dislike of his trade, expressing an inclination to study the common law, was at his own request, as well as that of his friends, taken into Mr Prynne's service, who shortly after suffering for his Histriomastix, his servant Lilburne took his master's part, imprinted or vended a book or books against the Bishops, for which, being committed prisoner to the Fleet, he was afterwards whipt, &c.' (14) But this account which is apparently very loose, was certainly taken up from no good authority, as is evident from what is above related out of our author's own books, that he served his master Hewson faithfully six years almost. Neither do we find in these or in any of Mr Prynne's works, the least hint concerning this clerkship; a silence, which, considering the various contests that happened between these two antagonists, together with the temper of each, cannot be accounted for upon any other principle than this, that there was no manner of pretence for such a remark. It is not improbable indeed, that Mr Lilburne did not only turn his hand to the printing, but also to the binding of the libels, which were published by him at the time we are now speaking of, and some years afterwards; and this practice no doubt gave rise to Lord Clarendon's observation, that 'he was a book-binder before the wars (15)', which opinion was also further countenanced by his never following his proper trade of a clothier, as will be seen in the sequel.

[F] Rigorously executed He was probably apprehended in January, being first brought on the 24th of that month to the Star-chamber-office to take the oath abovementioned, and refusing it there again on the 9th of February, sentence was passed then to punish him for a high contempt of the Court, which was accordingly pronounced on the 13th, as follows, that he should be remanded to the Fleet 'till April 18th 1638; when he should be whipt at the cart's tail, from thence to Old-Palace-Yard Westminster, and then set upon the Pillory there for two hours, after which to be carried back to the Fleet, there to remain 'till he conformed to the rules of the Court: also, to pay a fine of 500 pounds to the King, and give security for his good behaviour (16). In the whipping he received above 500 lashes with knotted cords, yet in the execution thereof, he uttered many bold speeches against the tyranny of the Bishops, and continued so to do after his head was in the hole of the Pillory, when, his hands being free, he tossed several copies of pamphlets, said to be seditious, among the people, taking them out of his pocket; and after the Star-chamber, then sitting, had ordered him to be gagged, he stamp with his feet. Upon this refractory behaviour, the Court ordered him to be laid alone, with irons upon his hands and legs, in one of the wards of the Fleet, where the basest and meanest sort of prisoners are used to be put. And it was ordered for the future, that all persons to receive corporal punishments from that Court should be searched, and neither writings nor any other thing suffered to be about them, and their hands to be bound; and the Attorney and Solicitor-general were to examine him concerning his speeches, whether any against the Court of Star-chamber or any member thereof, as also whether any of the pamphlets were seditious (17).

[G] He found means to print another Libel After some time there happened a fire in the Fleet, which breaking out near the ward where he lay in double irons, gave a jealousy, that being enraged to desperation, he had set fire to the prison, regardless of his own death thereby. Hereupon both the neighbouring inhabitants without, and the prisoners within, crying release Lilburne, or we shall all perish, ran and made the warden remove him out of his hold; and after the fire was quenched, a place was provided for him where he had more air (18). Here we have another instance of

In consequence of which, we find him a chief ringleader in the armed mob that appeared at Westminster May 3d 1641, crying out justice, against the Earl of Strafford; and drawing his sword upon Colonel Lunsford (p), was apprehended and arraigned the next day of high-treason at the bar of the House of Lords, but dismissed [H]; and the same day, May the 4th, the following votes passed the House of Commons. That the sentence of the Star-chamber against him [Lilburne] is illegal, barbarous, bloody, and tyrannical. That reparations ought to be given him for his imprisonment, sufferings, and losses, and that the committee shall prepare this case of Mr Lilburne's to be transmitted to the Lords, with those other of Bastwick, Leighton, Burton, and Prynne (q). As soon as the Parliament voted an army, Mr Lilburne entered a volunteer therein, was a Captain of foot on that side, at the battle of Edge-hill (r), October 23d 1642; and remarkably distinguished himself in the engagement on the 12th of November following, at Brentford (s): where being taken prisoner by the King's forces, he was carried to Oxford, and brought upon his trial for high-treason, but the sentence was prevented by means of a special declaration (t) of the Parliament in his favour, December 17th 1642 [I]; after which returning to his party, he that resolute and wild fierceness which is the genuine effect of inflamed enthusiasm, and which made Lilburne the idol of his party. During his imprisonment he had many scuffles with the wardens, wherein two of his fingers were so maimed, that he lost the use of them ever afterwards, as he alleges in his petition quoted in note (12). Besides the pamphlet above-mentioned, he wrote several others during this imprisonment, as 1. Come out of her, my People. 2. The afflicted Man's Complaint. 3. A Cry for justice. 4. An Epistle to the Apprentices of London. 5. Several Epistles to the Wardens of the Fleet. 6. Nine Arguments against Episcopacy. Afterwards, when Presbytery prevailed, he printed these arguments against that polity, in a piece intitled, An Answer of nine Arguments, written by T B Lond. 1645; and they were also in the same view inserted in his Oppressed Man's Oppression declared, p. 21. the following year, as a full answer to Mr Edwards's Gangrana, written in defence of the Covenant.

[H] Arraigned of high-treason but dismissed.] Our author tells us, that after the battle at Brentford in 1642, when he was a prisoner in Oxford castle, there came to him the Lords Dunsmore, Maltravers, Newark, and Andover, who told him, among other things, that he should be arraigned for a traitor, for being the chief or general of the apprentices, that came down to Westminster and Whitehall, and forced the House of Peers, and drove away the King from his Parliament, and so began the wars. Unto which he replied, 'Alas, my Lords, you will be far mistaken there; and, continues he, I cannot but wonder, that your Lordships should so undervalue your own honours and reputations, as to be so much as once now to mention this. Why, sirrah? said one of them. Why, my Lord? because your Lordships may remember, that the 3d of May 1641, the King caused warrants to issue out to apprehend me as a traitor for this very thing, and others depending on it, and as a traitor I was apprehended by his messengers, one of which that night kept me prisoner as a traitor, and the next morning being the 4th of May 1641, as a traitor I was brought by him to Whitehall, where (as I remember) old Sir Henry Vane and Mr Nicholas were appointed by the King himself to carry my impeachment to the House of Peers, at whose bar I that day appeared, and was there that day arraigned for my life, and one Littleton, the Lord Keeper's kinsman, swore most bitterly against me; but upon further examination of witnesses, and hearing with patience my own defence for myself, I was by your whole house, who looked upon themselves as the highest judicatory in England, honourably and nobly acquitted, as a person innocent and free of the King's accusation: of which, my Lords, let me plainly tell you, if I were guilty, you were a company of unrighteous and unjust judges for freeing me from that accusation. But, my Lords, being judicially tried therefore, and acquitted by yourselves, who (if my memory fail me not, I saw all at that trial) and by your house (then extraordinary full as ever I saw it) who judge yourselves the 'highest judicature in England, I am acquitted there-by, my Lords, from any more question about that business, although it should be granted I was never so guilty of it (19).' We see here that our author on this occasion pleaded before the House of Lords; he takes notice of it himself, and says in excuse, that he did not then understand the jurisdiction of that house, when afterwards, in a similar case, he withstood that jurisdiction even to imprisonment in 1646. This submission was frequently thrown in his dish by his adversaries, to whom his constant answer was this, When I was a child I spake as a child and acted as a child, but as soon as I became a man I put away childish things. He also gave upon a particular occasion the following account how he came by that knowledge. That about a month or six weeks before the Lords committed him to prison in 1646, a member of the House of Commons, and one that he believed wished him well, gave him a hint to take care of himself, for that in his knowledge there was a design among some of the Lords (the grounds and reasons of which he then told him) to clap him up by the heels. That upon this warning, he took every opportunity of discoursing with such as he thought knew any thing of the Lords jurisdiction, and found a general concurrence that the 20th chapter of magna charta was against it: Upon that he enter'd his protest. That upon further enquiry he found Sir Edward Coke's judgment expressly against them; which book he takes notice was published after his first trial before the Lords. And that after he was put into the Tower, being informed by one of his fellow-prisoners of Sir Simon Bereford's case in Edward 3d's time, he presently got the record of it by Mr Collet's hands, deputy-keeper of the office in the Tower †.

[I] Saved by a declaration of the Parliament.] Upon the first day of his trial, the judge [Heath] at his request, not only freed him from close imprisonment, but allowed him pen, ink, and paper, and also a week's time to advise with counsel. The use he made of these favours was to write two letters (in conjunction with Vivers and Catsby his fellow-prisoners) one to the Speaker of the House of Commons, and another to young Sir Henry Vane, setting forth the proceedings against him. These being sent to his wife (20) then at London, with proper instructions, she managed the affair with so much diligence, as to bring down a letter from the Speaker containing the substance of the above-mentioned declaration, and delivered it to Judge Heath two days before they were to appear again at the bar, and upon this the farther prosecution of them was staid, and our author's wife having heard the judge at his reading the Speaker's letter, say to the company then present, that, 'as to himself, he valued not the threat, but, said he, we must be tender of the lives of the Lords and Gentlemen that served the King, and are in the custody of those at Westminster (21).' Thus the trial was suspended, and not long after, Lilburne made his escape out of the jail, by corrupting the marshal, says, Lord Clarendon, who tells us, he was liberally supplied during his imprisonment with money, by his friends

On the other hand, our author himself declares he was exchanged by the Parliament (23), and that he lost 5 or 600 pounds during this imprisonment out of his own estate (24); he also complains heavily of Smith the jailor's cruelty to him, especially at the time when he lay dangerously ill of a fever (wherein he lost the hair of his head) and for which, as his manner was, he afterwards repaid him with a stroke of his pen, calling him a mercilefs Turk (25). Lord Clarendon likewise to the same purpose observes (26), that he was not so well treated in prison as was like to reconcile him.

[K] The Earl of Effex gave him 300 pounds for his service. Besides the particulars related above, there are some others concerning his behaviour at that time, of which we have from himself the following account: That in his sufferings and arraignment at Oxford, he carried himself with a great deal of resolution and undauntedness of spirit, for which the Parliament, by special declaration (27), justified him, and exchanged him very honourably, high above his quality and condition; and at his comig home, some of them that were no mean ones, profered his wife a place of honour and profit for him, then reputed worth about 1000 pounds per annum, which he conscientiously scorned and slighted, professing to his wife, to her extraordinary grief, that he must fight (tho' it were) for eight pence a day, 'till he saw the liberties and peace of England settled, rather than set himself down in a rich place for his own advantage, in the midst of so many grand distractions of his native country, as then possessed it (28). The same facts are touched by Lord Clarendon, and set in a different light. That, 'When he was brought to his trial before the justice he behaved himself with so great impudence in extolling the power of the parliament, that it was manifest he ambitioned martyrdom for that cause.'—and upon his returning after his escape out of prison to the Parliament's quarters, 'he was received there with public joy, as a champion that had defied the King in his own court (29).

[L] He was diligent in putting that garrison into a good state of defence. An instance of this we have in his account of monies disbursed during this service, one article of which is,

A note of all the swords, belts, and holsters for pistols, and bandeliers, that Major Lilburne caused to be brought into the magazine at Boston, February the 5th, 1643.

Received from London by Major Lilburne's appointment, two hundred and ninety swords. More received immediately after, by Major Lilburne's appointment five hundred swords. Feb. 1643, received from Thomas Forman at Lynn, by Major Lilburne's appointment, one chest of swords, containing two hundred. Received in April after from Major Lilburne, that his man brought into the magazine, and delivered them to my son Shepherdson, twenty swords. So received in swords 1010.

Received of Major Lilburne 80 pair of holsters for pistols, and three hundred belts for swords. Received of Mr Wood and Mr Wind, by Major Lilburne's appointment, one thousand collars of bandeliers. All these swords, holsters for pistols, sword-belts, and bandeliers, were received into the magazine from Major Lilburne, but what money has been paid in for any of them I know not. By me Richard Coney, keeper of the magazine in Boston.

Our author speaking in this article of his accounts observes, that he furnished these stores at least, 20 pound in the hundred cheaper than the Colonel [King] then paid for the like at Boston (30).

[M] He had a narrow escape at Newark. After the articles for raising the siege were concluded between Prince Rupert and Sir John Meldrum, Colonel King commanded, and in a manner forced, Major Lilburne, contrary to the agreement, to march away his regiment in a hostile manner with their arms, &c. so that they were set upon by the enemy's horse, and forcibly disarmed, and also plundered, as violaters of the covenant and contract, to the disparagement of the whole army, yea and the Parliament itself, and to the extreme hazard and danger of abundance of their lives. 'Yet King, continues our author, was so honest and valiant, that as soon as he saw the storm fall upon us, he fairly left us, and shifted for himself, without being plundered as we were, at which bout I lost well nigh 100 pounds (31); being plundered from the crowne of my head to the sole of my foote, and forced over hedge and ditch in by-ways for the safety of my life, to march almost ten miles without a hat or pere-wig (having by cruell sickness lately lost my heire in Oxford prison) britches or doublet, bootes or shooes (32). Our Major seems to have behaved with great bravery in the attack at Newark, which, Mr Rushworth informs us, was begun by three companies of Colonel King's regiment, who marching up to the Countess of Exeter's house, after a very sharp conflict took it. There were likewise two Captain Lilburnes in the division of horse commanded by Colonel Rocester, who signalized themselves in this action (33). These two Captain Lilburnes were probably the Major's two brothers, Robert and Henry (34).

[N] He quarrelled with, and brought several accusations against his Colonel. Our author observing that his promotion in Colonel King's regiment was owing to Cromwell, tells us, that this friend gave him then some private instructions, which were, to be faithful in his place, and to complain either of Colonel King, or whomsoever he groundly knew did any actions that tended to the ruin of salus populi, the safety of the people, or the state universal; and promised upon his honour and reputation, that he would do the best he could to have justice done, 'and, continues our Major, he gave me the reason, wherefore he so earnestly tyed me to it, which was, because our General with his army was to march out of Lincolnshire, and that country being lately wonne out of the hands of the Cavaliers, there being very few of that country at that time, that desired command under the Generall, therefore, faith he, we are necessitated to make use of Col. King, and to make him Governour of Boston and Holland, looking upon him as an active popular man, who promised to do mighty things for the good of that country and the publique.

But in regard divers of the chiefe men of Boston doe mislike him, I have therefore, saith he, in his behalfe, engaged my selfe to them for him, that he shall be faithful, just, and honest towards them: and therefore, in regard I have no large experience of the man and of his temper, I principally looke upon thee Lilburne, and thy Lieutenant-Col. John Bury, whose faithfulness I can rest upon, and for both of whom I have used my interest to place on purpose with him, that so if he should break out to the dishonour of my engagement, and the detriment of the publique, I may from time to time be sure to know of it from you, that so it may be prevented, before it be past remedy.' In pursuance of this secret counsel, our Major heartily vexed at his misfortune before Newark, took especial care to acquaint both the Earl of Manchester and Cromwell, with his Colonel's behaviour (35) there, as also of some other commands given by him, without consulting any of the officers of his regiment. And upon the first opportunity, he posted away himself to Bedford, where finding both the General and Cromwell, he gave them a full narrative of all the Colonel's absolute carriage, in marching and countermarching his forces without the consent or approbation of his Field-officers; and that tho' he had received from the the committee of Lincolnshire divers thousand pounds tenant-Colonel to his own regiment of Dragoons, on the 16th of May 1644 (z). This post he sustained with signal bravery at the battle of Marston-moor (a a), in the beginning of July, which being observed by Cromwell and Fairfax, he was offered a good post also in the army, upon the new modelling thereof [O], in April 1645: but the boilings of his conscience swelling now as high against the covenanted Presbytery as they had formerly done against the Prerogative and Episcopacy, he resolved to quit the service, and accordingly, on the last day of that month, he delivered up his troop, with the regiment, to Colonel John Okely near Abingdon (bb). He had no sooner laid down his military weapons, than he took that state weapon his pen up, against the new-rising dominion: and attacked his old associate Mr Prynne, in a printed epistle to him on that subject, dated June the 7th, 1645 [P]; and being brought before a committee of the House of Commons to pay his officers and soldiers at Newark siege, yet the Major could never hear he had paid one penny to any officer there, and, as for his own part, he could not get a penny from him. So likewise, altho' the country sent in great store of provisions for his regiment gratis, yet he and his under-sutlers made the Major and other officers and soldiers to pay ready money for a great part of it, to their extraordinary discontent, provoking them thereby to mutiny. That Sir John Maldrum told him, the Colonel had raised such a fire of contention among the chief officers at Newark siege, that he durst not call a council of war to consult how to manage their business, being there continually in contest with my Lord Willoughby, Colonel Rossiter, Sir Miles Hubbard, Sir John Paragraffe, and divers of the Lincoln committee: so that the commander in chief knew not well what to do, by reason of these distractions, when Prince Rupert came upon them. That he put Bolton into great danger of being lost to the enemy, by ordering all the powder out of the magazine, and notwithstanding the loss of his own regiment's arms at Newark, yet he refused to send for a supply to the governour of Lynn, 'till that supply was ordered by another; and when it did come, he sent the men immediately to recover Crowland, which had been lost by his means. The Earl of Manchester having heard the Major's complaint, sent him post to London, to the committee of both kingdoms, about his marching to recover Lincoln, and thence to march to York to join the Scots. After his return, he renewed his complaints at Lincoln, desiring a council of war might be called thereupon. A trial by a court martial was also solicited by some of the committee of Lincoln, who drew up a very heinous charge against Colonel King, as did also the Mayor and Aldermen of Bolton; these last pressing Cromwell to use all his interest in the Earl, that they might be admitted to make their articles good in a council of war. Here a less spirited and more artful prosecutor would have rested the matter, especially as he had found the sweets of it, in being raised to the post of Lieutenant-Colonel of Dragoons, and moreover, seen the Colonel thereupon discharged the service, and put out of all his commands and offices, which were very many and profitable; being Colonel of horse, Colonel of dragoons, and Colonel of foot, Governor of Bolton and the parts of Holland, and Governor of the city and county of Lincoln, with a power to levy what money he judged necessary for the support of the same. But the Lieutenant-Colonel not being able to procure the trial by a court martial, prevailed with some of the Lincoln committee to exhibit to the House of Commons, in August 1644, a charge of high crimes and misdemeanors, consisting of 22 articles, against the Colonel, undertaking to support the greater part of them by his own testimony (36). The precipitate rashness and wrong-headed zeal of this forward step will appear presently.

[O] Proffered a good post when the army was new modelled, but resolved to quit the service. He assures us this offer was made him by no mean man, even while this new model was framing, but that visibly there was such bitter designs against the poor people of God, who were strongly endeavoured to be destroyed by them, who with all their might they had endeavoured to preserve; and, 'also, continues he, the laws and justice of the kingdom, to my understanding, in a very sad condition, I plainly told Lieutenant Cromwell, I would dig for turneps and carrots before I would fight to set up a power to make myself a slave, which expression he relished not well. Whereupon I told him, Sir, I will, if I were free to fight again, never serve a jealous master while I live. For the Parliament, by their late vote, hath declared a jealousy in all men that will not take the Covenant, which I can never do;

and therefore, seeing I have served them faithfully, and they are grown jealous of me without cause, after so much assured experience of my faithfulness, I will never, in the mind I am now in, serve them as a soldier while I breathe, let them get whom they please, and do what they please (37). Lord Clarendon gives the following account of this matter: That 'from the time of Lilburne's returning to the army, after his imprisonment at Oxford, he was entertained by Cromwell with great familiarity, and in his contents with the Parliament, was of much use to him, and privacy with him. But he began then to find him so restless and unruly a spirit, and to make those advances in religion against the Presbyterians, before he thought it seasonable, that he dispensed with his presence in the army, where he was an officer of note, and made him reside in London, where he wished that temper should be improved; and when the Parliament was so much offended with his seditious humour, and the pamphlets he published every day in religion, with reflections upon their proceedings, that they resolved to prosecute him with great rigour; towards which the Assembly of Divines*, which he had likewise provoked, contributed their desire and demand. Cromwell wrote a very passionate letter to the Parliament, that they should so much discourage their army that was fighting for them, as to censure an officer of it for his opinion in point of conscience, for the liberty whereof; and to free themselves from the shackles in which the Bishops had enslaved them, that army had been principally raised; upon which all farther prosecution of Lilburne was declined at that time; tho' he declined not their further provocation, and continued to make the proceedings of the Parliament as odious as he could (38).

The nature of this connexion between Cromwell and our author, which, agreeably to his plan, the noble historian here touches only in generals, will, in the sequel of this memoir, be seen fully and distinctly in the several particular incidents which were the effects thereof. To this purpose we must observe at present, that his Lordship is not to be understood (tho' the words seem to imply as much) to signify our author's continuance in the army long after the new model of it made by Fairfax and Cromwell, since the contrary is not only asserted by Lilburne, as appears in the text and remark thereto; but it is abundantly manifest in every step of his life after the time assigned there for his quitting the service. Moreover Lilburne expressly declares, in 1649, that after he threw up his commission, [in April 1645] he never could fight as a soldier, although Cromwell by himself, face to face, and by his agents (he was confident of it) had from time to time, and as earnestly solicited him (as was possible for a man to be solicited) to take a command in Fairfax's army (39). And we shall find hereafter, that the arch-rebel had much more difficulty in managing the restless and unruly spirit of this underling, than his Lordship's representation of it is apt to lead one into the belief of.

[P] A printed epistle to Mr Prynne in June 1645. Our author gives the following account of this piece: 'No sooner was I by the ears with Manchester [in November this year (40)], but Mr Prynne wrote his desperate invective books against us all that would not be conformable to the Covenant (that cheat), and the Scots Presbytery (that every thing and nothing); and would have had us all destroyed or banished the land of our nativity: so, in conscience to God, and safety to myself and brethren, I was inwardly compelled to deal with him that thus sought to destroy the generation of the Righteous; and accordingly I wrote him a sharp epistle now in print, dated Commons on the 13th, on account of some passages in that piece, he printed another epistle addressed to Mr Lenthal, charging the speaker with an embezzlement of 60,000 pounds of the publick money [Q]. Whereupon an accusation against him being presented to that house, by Colonel King and Dr Bastwick, on the 12th of July, he was put into the custody of the serjeant at arms on the 19th. While he was under the care of that officer, he published a third epistle to a friend, dated July the 25th, upon which he was committed to Newgate on the 9th of August, and orders were given for his trial at the Old-Bailey on a charge of seditious practices; but in the interim, printing a state of his case, addressed to the world and his jury (cc), no bill was found against him (dd), and he was discharged from the prison by an order of the House of Commons [R], October the dated 7, Jan. 1645 (41), which brought upon my back a whole sea of troubles; and a vote or votes in the House of Commons passed against me: whereupon, without any more a-do, black Corbet and the Committee of Examinations makes me a prisoner, and tosseth and tumbleth me to the purpose. So, before him, upon the 13th of June 1645; was I forced to give in my reasons (now in print); wherefore I wrote that excellent and seasonable epistle (which was the first-avowed public cannon, I know of, in England discharged against the then insulting Presbyterian for liberty of conscience (42). By Mr Prynne's invective books our author means, 1. Twelve considerable questions touching Church-government. 2. Independency examined and refuted. 3. A full Reply to certain brief Observations and Antiqueries on Mr Prynne's Twelve Questions about Church government. 4. Brief Animadversions on Mr John Goodwin's Theomachia, all printed by that author in 1644, in 4to; besides another the following year, against which Mr Lilburne's Epistle, here spoken of, is particularly levelled, as appears from the title in these words: An Answer to Will Prynne, Esq; upon the coming out of his last booke, entitled, Truth triumphing over Falshood; Antiquity over Novelty; in which are laid down five Propositions, which the author desires to discuss with the said Mr Prynne.

[Q] Charged the Speaker with embezzling 60000*l.* of the public money.] As this affair is but little known, we shall give the following representation of it, made by one of Lilburne's friends (43). One Cob, a Sea-captain (says the author) who was a prisoner in the King's-bench, and ill-used by Sir John Lenthal, the Keeper, found means to convey a letter to the Speaker, his brother; wherein he charged Sir John with seizing and detaining 60,000*l.* belonging to Sir Basil Brooke, without giving any account of it to the Parliament: whereupon Cob being sent for out of prison, was brought to the door of the House of Commons, in order, as he thought, to make good his charge; for which purpose he carried three or four witnesses with him, to prove it. But the Speaker not calling him into the house, sent him out word, that he should go back, and that himself would come shortly to his brother, Sir John's house, and speak with him there. Accordingly he did so, but would admit none to be present. However, Cob returning to the prison among his fellows, gave them a true account upon his reputation of what had passed; which was to this effect: That, as soon as he was brought into the room, the Speaker shew'd him his letter, and asked him if he would justify it? Yes, says Cob, and a great deal more, if you would do your duty in making it known to the honourable House of Commons. Upon this the Speaker turning to Sir John, said, If this be true, here is enough to hang you: to which Sir John replied, That Cob had misrepresented the matter; for, whereas, says he, he charges me with letting Violet [then a prisoner in the King's-bench] go twice to Oxford, during the time that he and Sir Basil Brooke were contriving their plot against the City, you know I never let him go but once, and then I had your warrant for it. Well, well, (said the Speaker) Captain Cob I see you are an honest man, and much injured by your adversaries; but shake hands, and be friends with Sir John, and I will get you your liberty. But Cob perceiving that the Speaker did nothing in it, sent a copy of the aforesaid Letter to Mr William Pendry of London, with Ellen Thomas's information about the 60,000*l.* and which was then in Sir John's hands; which Letter the said Pendry communicated to two Knights in Parliament, who took no more care than the Speaker to have it brought to light, nor the 60,000*l.* attached. Thus the affair stood, if we may believe this author, when our

Lieutenant-colonel wrote the above-mentioned epistle to William Lenthal, &c. wherein he lays open all this dark scene of roguery, as he calls it. On the 12th of July an information being given in to a Committee of the House of Commons by three citizens of London, Mr Pretty, Mr Rawson, and Mr Worley, that the 60,000*l.* had been sent to Oxford. Our author also appeared as an evidence against Sir John; but the Committee having cleared him of the charge in the morning, the accusation mentioned (44) in the text, was presented to the House in the afternoon by Colonel King and Dr Bastwick, the former of whom had received a fresh provocation from him in this epistle, where, among other aggravations of the Speaker's injustice and unrighteous dealings, he did not forget that of his taking no notice of the impeachment, as he calls it, against the Colonel mentioned in remark [P]. Neither is this the only instance wherein King found means to pay him in his own coin, as is there also suggested. As to Bastwick, he appears plainly, as our author observes, to be in this affair a meer tool of Mr Prynne's forming, by whom he was supported in it, as will be seen in the following remark.

[R] He wrote an epistle—was sent to Newgate, and ordered to be tried for sedition, but discharged without a trial.] If Lilburne's behaviour in this affair was insupportably impudent, yet it must be allowed that neither did his superiors, in chastising him, preserve that gravity which became senators. For after his commitment to Newgate, a warrant being made out for seizing the copies of his books, the officer, in virtue of that authority, entered with his attendants into his house, where, finding no-body but an old gentlewoman, whom they put into a great fright, they run up into the chamber, and his wife being then big with child, and near her time, they stole out of her drawers several pieces of child-bed linnen, besides other things, refusing to shew or give an account of them to the old gentlewoman who desired it (45). Our author having followed his blow upon Mr Prynne in the Epistle to a Friend, mentioned above, that antagonist, wrote an answer, intitled The Lyar confounded, &c. wherein he charged Lilburne with having joined the Separatists and Anabaptists, in a conspiracy to root out the members of that parliament by degrees, beginning with Mr Speaker, whom, if they could cut off, all the rest would easily follow; and if this succeeded not, then to suppress and cut off this parliament by force of arms, and set up a new parliament of their own choice and function. To this our author, nothing dimayed thereat, printed a reply, with the title of Innocency and Truth justified, &c. In which he still insists that Prynne had more than a finger in his prosecution, alledging as a proof thereof, this last piece of that adversary, which, says he, was framed, published cum privilegio, and dedicated to Mr Speaker, just at the time when he saw I was likely honourably to be delivered as a spotless and innocent man.' Proceeding then to the charge of a conspiracy against the Parliament, he observes, that by this heinous charge, Prynne had manifested himself a perfect knave and enemy to the kingdom 'in that he knew me, says he, guilty of such a thing, and never to this day durst question me, or prosecute me for it: and if it be but one of his false, malicious suggestions, then he proves and declares himself a lyar to fix so notorious a falsehood upon him, that in this, and all other things, bids defiance to him; yea, and in the same false, scandalous, and transcendent lying book of his, besides scores of lyes, he fathers positively thirteen or fourteen upon me in less than eight lines (46).' Our author also offered publickly to prove this charge; but no notice being taken of that challenge, he triumphs in a piece written the next year over that

(44) Col. Ireton and Mr Hawlina were included in the accusation. See our author's Letter to the Council of Agitators, at the end of the second edition of his Epistle to Judge Reeves, published in 1647, 4to. p. 25.

(45) See our author's second epistle to Sir Henry Martin, p. 2. When the copies of his book, The Oppressed Man's Oppressions, &c. were seized afterwards, he complains, that other books not in the warrant were also seized, as England's Chains discovered, but could get no redress. It appears, that by an act, Sept. 28, 1647, officers were empowered to enter any shop or house, where they shall be informed, or have good cause to suspect, any unlicensed papers or pamphlets, and these England's Chains were not licensed. the 14th, without being brought to a trial. On the 10th of November the petition for his arrears (which he had presented soon after quitting the army) was read by that house, but being referred to the Committee of Accounts, where he refused to give in the particulars upon oath, no order was made for payment [S]. While these things passed in the lower House, our author was engaged in another business before the House of Lords, upon a petition he had presented there for reparations and damages, on account of his sufferings in the Star-chamber, and on the 13th of February his cause was re-heard and a few days afterwards the former decree of 1640, annulling the proceedings of the Star-chamber was confirmed, and on the 5th of March he obtained a decree for two thousand pounds, and a bill to that effect having passed the House on the 27th of April, was sent down to the Commons for their consent (ee): but in the beginning of that month he was charged by the Committee of Accounts with a debt of 2000 l. to the State [T], and was moreover lying and pauntry fellow, 'who durst never (says he) embrace my challenge there made to him, nor never so much as in any of his late voluminous lines return one word of answer, that ever I could see, to what there I justly fixed upon him; and therefore, by his silence in that particular, though he hath printed scores of sheets since, he hath given me just cause now to proclaim him for notorious and base a liar, that he is not ashamed to tell and publish above a dozen in eight lines (47).' Dr Baftwick also felt the point of our Lieutenant-colonel's pen in this Epistle to a Friend. Mr Prynne therefore undertook his cause in a pamphlet, intitled A just Defence of John Baftwick, Doctor of Physick, against the Calumnies of John Lilburne, &c. in five sheets, 4to, by way of answer to a reproach cast upon the members of the House of Commons. In our author's epistle he allows a great part of the members of the House of Commons to be in understanding no better than minors. Dr Baftwick having expressed himself to the same purpose in these remarkable words (48): As there is no family that is never so honest, that has not a whore or a knave of their kindred; so it is impossible in such a great council as the Parliament, but they should have some ninnies and groles, and men that have no more wit than will reach from their nose to their mouth. The piece above cited, called England's Birth-right, &c. coming out in reply to that of Baftwick, the author thereof, making merry with this passage, says (49), 'Surely this Parliament will be contemptible not only to their foes, but also to their friends, and will never shake off this blot with the State unless they call him to an account, and make him name whom he means, and punish the licenfer that durst be so bold to let such a book be published cum privilegio to the dishonour of the very Parliament itself. Surely Sir John, and his brother the Speaker, have fee'd Baftwick well, and are not very found; that they put him their stalking-horse upon such desperate courses, to save up their credit; and he has as little wit as honesty in him to be earnest for Sir John Lenthal in particular, who is notoriously known to be the greatest whoremaster, adulterer, rogue, cheat, thief, and what-not. There has so many complaints been made to this present Parliament (tho' little effect they have taken, by reason of the Speaker's power and interest) against him, whose common practice it is to walk in contempt and violation of the known laws of the kingdom, and the making of them null and of none effect, as much as in him lies, to the ruin and destruction of thousands of the free denizens of England. Besides his outlawries, which have been out against him these three years; he has dozens of executions upon him, and yet walks abroad, and continues Keeper of the King's-bench prison, and Justice of Peace; and, as it is reported, is Chairman of a Committee, by means of which he is invested with a power to crush and destroy every man that but opens his mouth to speak of his baseness and injustice. The height of his injustice (continues he) and of his arbitrary and tyrannical government, is scarcely in Strafford to be paralleled, which is so insupportable to the poor oppressed prisoners in the King's-bench, that they have got a proverb among them in these words: The Lawyers rule the Committees, the Speaker rules the Lawyers, Sir John Lenthal rules the Speaker, Thomas Dufson rules Sir John Lenthal, and the Devil rules Dufson. In his letter to the council of Agitators, our author, ever mindful to make the best of every thing he did to his own advantage, ascribes his discharge from Newgate without a trial, to the influence which the state of his case, mentioned in the text, had upon the jury; but it is more probable that his escape was owing to the sharp letter which, as Lord Clarendon informs us, was wrote to the Parliament by Cromwell*; which is likewise confirmed by several passages in England's Birth-right, pregnant with the highest encomiums upon Cromwell, who is there proclaimed to be seasoned at heart, and not rotten-cored; free from partiality and self-interest; well-skilled in soldering the disjointed spirits in the army; and infinitely hating all factious par-takings and base self-gains, p. 32; and 'tis remarkable, that while Lilburne lay in Newgate, upon a petition of some of his friends, the Speaker of the House of Commons sent him 100 l. in part of his arrears (50).

[S] No order was made for payment.] Here again he met his adversary, Mr Prynne, who, as Chairman of the Committee, tendered him an oath to the following effect: That he should swear what was due to him, and what he had received, and what free quarters he had had, as also what horses and arms from the State. This oath, as he acquaints his friend, he stoutly refused, resolving rather to lose all his money, and to be hanged, before he would make himself such a slave as to deprive himself of the benefit of the good and just laws of England, by taking such a wicked and unlawful oath. He farther alledged to the Committee, that having lost several of his papers and muster-rolls, when he was plundered as above-mentioned, at the siege of Newark, it was impossible for him to comply with the oath; and moreover, that he never dreamt of any such thing, as being called to give an exact account to the Parliament, walking, as he declares, by that rule that was established in the ordinances then in being; thinking that if the Army-Committee that was set other them to look to them, and the Council of War, that was to punish them for any misdemeanour, had nothing to say nor accuse him of, that he should have had his accounts audited, and sent by those persons named in the ordinance, under whom he served, and not be brought to a Committee at London; 'That was not in being (continues he) when I engaged my life, nor had all the while that I was a soldier any power over us, nor never was in the field to know what belongs unto a soldier, and are merely in my apprehension intently erected to cheat and en-franchise honest and faithful commanders of their just due.' This was a home-thrust, but he acknowledges it was aimed only at Prynne. He afterwards told them that he had his commissions ready to justify his service, and craved so much money as was due to him thereon for his pay, desiring them to let him have a charge what moneys, &c. they could fix upon him, and he would either acknowledge or disprove it; but the Committee assuring him, nothing could be done unless he would take the oath, he was dismissed, telling them he must and would repair again to the House of Commons that sent him thither (51).

[T] Charged with a debt of 2000 l. due to the State.] Before the decree for 2000 l. in the House of Lords was transmitted to the lower House, our author was summoned before the Committee of Accounts there, with the following warrant.

By virtue of an Ordinance of Parliament of the 22d of February, 1643, for taking the general accounts of the Kingdom, these are to require you to appear before us of the Committee by the said Ordinance, at the House of Mr Freeman in Cornhill, London, moreover arrested for the like sum on the 14th at the suit of Colonel King, in an action of trespass, from the Court of Common-pleas, for calling him a traitor (ff). Our author being exceedingly provoked with this prosecution, which hindered him from bringing the affair of the Lord's decree to a good issue, having put in extraordinary bail for his appearance (gg), he first offered a petition to the House of Commons, to bring the Colonel to his trial upon the abovementioned impeachment [U]: and receiving no satisfaction there (bb), he penned an epistle by way of appeal to Judge Reeves, and printed it with the title of The just Man's Justification [W]. To Lieutenant Colonel John Lilburne.

Coming before them, Mr Prynne again in the chair spoke to him thus: 'Lieutenant-colonel, you were some months ago with us, by virtue of an order of the House of Commons, about your accounts, and we gave you time ever since to state them; but hearing nothing from you, according to our expectation, we have sent for you to clear yourself of above 2000 l. that is fixed upon you to be received of Mr Goulson the Treasurer, Mr Weaver, and Colonel King.' To this the Lieutenant-colonel replied, that the order from the House of Commons, which gave them particular cognizance of his accounts, was procured by his own seeking, and that he brought it to them of his own accord, being not compelled by any man; that because he conceived it just, he had desired that the parties concerned in his accounts might be summoned before them; that so, face to face, the charge against him might be made good, and the balance settled, which he was very confident was divers hundred pounds in his favour. That upon their refusing this, without his taking an oath, which he did then and still does hold to be unjust, notwithstanding the ordinance of Parliament authorizing them to insist upon it, he had left them to seek his right in a more legal way from the House; and that he was sure they neither commanded nor desired him to come any more before them; neither did he promise it. That the loss of time thereby was no loss to them, nor to the State, but to him, in whose debt, the State was, and not he to them; that if he had not certainly known it to be so, it was not likely he should have taken so much pains to get his accounts audited. In conclusion therefore, he desired he might have a particular charge, and have a competent time allowed to him to put in his exoneration, that so he might not be hindered from completing his business before the Lords. 'In which, (says he) Gentlemen, I hope you will not hinder me, by commanding me hither to wait upon you: but such a particular charge being again refused, unless he would take the aforesaid oath, and Mr Prynne still pressing that he should speedily come again before them, that so the State might not suffer, by reason of the moneys he had received, and stood charged with; he offered either that they should make stoppage of the money he expected to receive by the decree of the Lords, or else to put in good security to answer the charge. With this the Committee was satisfied, and gave him, at his own motion, a month, or six weeks time: for which he thanked them, and, taking his leave (52), plyed his business in the House of Lords, where to effectuate their decree of March 5th, he obtained another for the present levying of the said 2000 l. out of the lands of the Lord Cottington, Sir Francis Windebanke, and Ingram the Deputy-warden of the Fleet, who gagged him upon the pillory, at eight years purchase, as they were before the wars, with the allowance of interest at 8 per cent. per annum, in case of obstructions for all or any part of it. To this purpose an Ordinance was drawn up, which fully passed that house on the 15th, 20th, and 27th of April, 1646, and was afterwards transmitted to the House of Commons (53) for their consent.

22 articles is annexed, he confesses the charge of calling Colonel King a traitor, and declares himself ready to prove it, when the Colonel should be brought to his trial before the House: to obtain which trial, he urges that the Colonel's offences (as the articles annexed evince) are not only treasonable and capital, but such as are properly examinable and only triable in Parliament (54). Wherefore, since he could not at law give any plea in bar or justification of the words pretended to be spoken by him, until the Colonel be either convicted or acquitted upon his trial, he prays that House to give orders to stay any further proceedings upon the said action of 2000 l. against him (55), until sentence be given on the said trial.

[W] The just man's justification ] When our author found there was no likelihood of having his petition, mentioned in the last remark, read in the House of Commons, he went with Cromwell to Oxford, then besieged by the Parliament's forces, to see if, with Colonel Ireton, and other of his friends there, he could do anything to stave off his own trial at common law 'till Colonel King's trial in Parliament was over; but his journey was to no purpose, being left (as he says) in the hands by Cromwell, who first engaged him in it [by his private instructions mentioned in remark [N]], and promised to stand to him (56). Upon this disappointment he returned to London, and consulted several Counsel, who all concurred in opinion, that he must put into the Court of Common-pleas no other plea than either guilty or not guilty; and likewise, that the common law took no notice of Ordinances or Articles of War, nor of any thing called treason but what was done against the King; by which argument Colonel King, in the betraying of Grantham and Crowland to the King's party, had done that which was justifiable and not punishable; which was more (continues he) than I knew before; so that in this extraordinary transcendent strait, to save myself from being condemned by a Judge (whose power flows merely from an ordinance of Parliament) in 2000 l. for no other crime but for the faithful endeavouring to discharge my duty to the Parliament, in endeavouring the punishment of one professedly under the Parliament's jurisdiction, for violating and transgressing their ordinances, unto which he himself stooped and submitted, I was of necessity forced and constrained, when all other just and rational ways and means failed me, to pen my plea myself, and in print direct it to the Judge; and called it, The just Man's Justification; or, A Letter by way of plea in Bar; written by Lieutenant-colonel J. Lilburne to the honourable Justice Reeves, one of the Justices of the Commonwealth's court, commonly called Common-pleas (57). In the entrance, he takes notice that he had before spoken with the Judge about this cause, and found a very courteous, fair, and rational carriage from him (58), which emboldened him to write this letter: wherein, after many abuses thrown upon the Common-law proceedings therein, he denies that jurisdiction over him in the present cause, as being then depending in Parliament, and peremptorily refusing to put in any plea into the court, whose forms he did not understand himself, and would not trust the Sergeants to plead for him; he proceeds soldier-like in the following words: 'Having contended above this seven years with all sorts and kinds of persons that would destroy me, and having often been in the field among hullets and swords, to maintain the common liberties and freedoms of England, against all the declared traiterly oppugners thereof; and having, by the goodness of God, escaped many dangers and deaths, and being in my own apprehension ready to be ruined and destroyed by a weapon inferior to a tailor's bodkin, (namely) a formalitie or puntillo in law, it hath rowzed up my spirit to charge it with a soldier's

June, and having therein aspersed the proceedings in law as unjust and tyrannical, and also cast some reflections upon the Earl of Manchester [X], he was called on the 10th before the House of Lords, where that Nobleman being Speaker, and examining him upon interrogatories touching the writing of the just mentioned book; he not only refused to answer, but protested against their jurisdiction over him in the present case, whereupon he was committed to Newgate. Whence, upon the 16th, he sent an appeal to the House of Commons, which being received there (ii), he persevered in shewing the utmost contempt of the upper House [Y]; for which, having been first committed close prisoner in Newgate on the 23d, he was sent thence to the Tower as a more secure custody; on the 10th of July, a remonstrance signed by many thousand persons having been presented to the House of Commons in his favour [Z]. In the Tower he was denied the use of pen, ink,

[X] Having cast some reflections upon the Earl of Manchester.] The offensive words are introduced in that part of this pamphlet, where our author relates the several applications which had been made to bring Colonel King to his trial, before the Earl of Manchester his General and a Council of War, and particularly those made to Cromwell, to use his interest with my Lord for that purpose: and, observing that they could not all prevail, he proceeds thus: 'The reason of which I am not able to render, unless it were that his [Cromwell's] two chaplains, Lee and Garter, prevailed with the Earles two chaplains, Mr Aps and Good, to cast a Scotch-clergy mist over their Lord's eyes, that he should not be able to see any deformitie in Colonel King: but this I dare confidently say, if there we had had faire play, and justice impartially, King had as surely died as ever malefactor in England did.' In his petition also to the House of Commons, annexed to this epistle, praying that the Colonel might be brought to his trial before them, having occasionally mentioned the Earl of Manchester, he put this marginal note thereto, who was since impeached of treason by L. G. C. [Lieutenant-General Cromwell] for being false to his trust, and had undoubtedly lost his head therefore, if L. G. C. had followed it as he should (60). What was the consequence of the Earl's resentment, and the surprizing confidence of our author thereupon, will fall under the next remark. At present, the particular design of this memoir leads us to view the passages here quoted in another light; not as they relate to the quarrel between the Earl and Lilburne, but with regard to the connexion between him and Cromwell. In these passages we see a resentment plainly expressed of the latter's behaviour, in forbearing to push the prosecution of Manchester. His accusation of that general had been presented to the House of Commons, in November 1644, soon after the action at Dennington-castle in Berkshire (61). Upon which a Committee was appointed to examine into the Earl's conduct, before whom Lilburne had sworn heartily, in support of the charge against him, incited thereto as well by his own quarrel with the Earl, on the score of Colonel King, as by Cromwell's particular instigation (62). But after new modelling of the army, wherein Manchester was laid aside, the Lieutenant-general, his prosecutor, having obtained his ends (63), resolved to give himself no farther trouble about the prosecution: however, considering Lilburne's temper, it was necessary to hide that secret purpose from him, which was done so effectually, that no shadow of any suspicion he had thereof ever appeared before this epistle to Judge Reeves. On the contrary, the abovementioned encomiums in England's Birth-right (64), are bestowed upon Cromwell, purely in the view of his good will to that prosecution, and in a full persuasion of his earnest desire to push it to a final issue: insomuch, that the author makes it one of his charges against the Parliament, that Cromwell was sent by them, contrary to his own inclination, first, to the siege of Taunton, and then to Windsor and elsewhere, with a particular design to keep him out of the way, and thereby hinder him from pursuing the upright purposes of his heart, either to lay Manchester flat upon his back, or fall himself in the conflict. So warmly was Lilburne at this time attached to his then unsuspected friend: but being left by this friend in the lurch, as he expresses it upon the affair of his arrest by Colonel King abovementioned, he began to look more narrowly into his conduct; and thence were kindled those sparks of jealousy which shewed themselves first in the epistle to Judge Reeves. But we shall find him hereafter constantly speaking of Cromwell as his enemy, and treating him with the genuine virulence of his pen; and except in an instance or two, when that arch dissembler found it necessary for compleating his own ends to shew this wayward spirit some favour; which was also as often repaid with suitable acknowledgments on his part.

[Y] Persevered in shewing the utmost contempt of the upper House.] The author's account of this whole affair is worth perusing, as follows: 'Judge Reeves (says he) being wounded within at the downright truth of my formentioned Epistle or Plea, that last-eth the base and abominable corruptions of him and the rest of his brother judges; and finding something in it that brands Manchester for an unjust man in his late generalship, who then was Speaker of the House of Peers, away to him trudgeth the Judge in all post-haste with my book, to get him by his power to be revenged of me, which he was easily provoked and persuaded to; and accordingly the 10th of June, 1646, he gets an order to pass the Lords House, to summon me up to their bar, to answer to such things as I stood charged before their Lordships with, concerning the writing the aforesaid Letter or Plea; and when I came to their bar, they dealt with me like a Spanish Inquisition, in examining me against myself, which forced me then at the bar to deliver in my plea in law, to prove that by the Laws of England they had no jurisdiction over Commissioners to try them either for life, limb, liberty, or estate*, which plea and protestation (continues he) made them mad, and for which they sent me to Newgate; from whence upon the 16th of June, I sent my appeal for justice to the House of Commons against them, which made the Lords madder; whereupon they, upon the 22d of June, 1646, issued out an order to bring me to their bar again, where, in contempt of their jurisdiction, I refused to kneel; for which they committed me to the keeper of Newgate, to be kept close prisoner without pen, ink, or paper, the access of my wife, or any other friends, which was with rigour sufficiently exercised upon me till the 10th of July, 1646; which day they issued out another order to bring me again to the bar, at which, when I came, in the height of contempt of their jurisdiction, I marched in amongst them with my hat on, and not only refused to kneel at their bar, but also with my fingers stoppt both my ears when they went about to read my pretended charge; for all which they fined me 4000 l. to the King, and further sentenced me to be a prisoner seven years, or during their pleasure, in the Tower of London; to be forever disfranchised of being capable to bear any office or place in military or civil government, in Church or Commonwealth †.'

[Z] A remonstrance in his favour.] Before this Remonstrance, which threatens to break into the prison and release our prisoner by force, there is prefixed a print of our author's head, with his face behind a cross-barred prison window included in an oval frame, with this inscription thereon, Johannes Lilburne aetate sue 23, 1641. Over the frame are these words, The liberty of a free-born Englishman conferred on him by the House of Lords, 1646: to which, on the right hand, is added an escutcheon, bearing the arms of his family, three water-buckets, with a half-moon for distinction of the second son. Under the frame are the following no contemptible lines:

Gaze not upon this shadow that is vain,
But rather raise thy thoughts a higher strain;
To God I mean, who set this young man free,
And in like straight, can eke deliver thee;

ink, and paper, and no body suffered to visit him; however, he found means to write another petition [AA], renewing his appeal to the House of Commons, which being delivered by his wife, September the 23d, a committee was appointed to hear and report his complaint against the Lords. Sir Henry Martin was chairman of this committee, before whom our author made his first plea in the inner Court of Wards, on the last day of October, and was heard again by them in the Exchequer-chamber, November the 6th following (kk), but no report being made to the House, he sent a copy of his second plea before the Committee to Sir Henry Martin, and afterwards printed it under the title of The Anatomy of the Lords Tyranny. Not content with the justice done to himself in this performance, he published, not long afterwards, another book entitled, The oppressed Man's Oppression declared, &c. in which he complained of the injury done to him by the House of Commons, in their deferring to take his case into consideration, and threatening to raise the people in his defence, he proceeds to charge that House, not only with having of late years done nothing for the general good, but also, with having made many ordinances notoriously unjust and oppressive [BB]. Whereupon the whole impression was seized

This print appears plainly to be done at our author's discharge from the Fleet in 1641. The inscription over the frame, and the two last verses under it being added, and the head, which is well graved (65), probably retouched upon this occasion.

[AA] He found means to write a petition.] This was a piece of management for which our author triumphed soon after over the Lieutenant of the Tower, Colonel Francis West, in the following terms: 'On the 10th of July, 1646, I came hither, and you sent me to the lodge where I am, with extraordinary strict and severe commands upon my keeper, who, within certain days after I came to him, demanded chamber-rent of me at a great deal higher rate than I pay: I told him necessity had no law, and I therefore desired him to ask me reasonable, and he should see what I would say to him. So at last he asked me 15 s. per week. I told him I knew well the laws of all the prisons in England, and 15 s. per week was a great deal of money for bare lodging; but in regard it was with me as it was, conditionally that he for his part would use me and my friends that should come to see me with civility and humanity, I would give him 15 s. per week, and find my own linnen besides; protesting unto him, that the first time he used me or any that came to see me churlishly, I would not pay him one penny more of money: and I must ingenuously confess, I had no cause to complain of the man in point of civility, nor he of me in performing my promise: for I have paid him, tho' it has been with some straits to me, betwixt 20 and 30 l.—Now (continues he) I will deal ingenuously with you, and give you the true reason why I condescended to pay chamber-rent at first. It was because I had potent enemies to deal with in the House of Lords, who had sentenced me to pay 4000 l. illegally and unjustly, and entred crimes against me in their records: I told you at first I was refreshed at my hopes of being freed, but I thought you would have destroyed me before I could clear myself, and anatomize their cruelty, both of which my soul thirsted after; and therefore if I had been able I would have purchased an opportunity of doing it at 20 l. a week. And truly, Sir, I have done my do, and published my cause to the view of the whole kingdom. First, In my wife's petition, delivered to the House of Commons, September 23d, 1646. 2dly, In my book called London's Liberty in Chains, discovered. And, 3dly, Twice before the Committee of the honourable House of Commons; the last discourse of which I published under the title of the Anatomy of the Lords Tyranny; and some friends have helped me in Fox Plebis, and Regal Tyranny discovered; which will live when I am dead, and prove the Lords avindling-sheet (66). This is another instance of Lilburne's confidence in boasting; for notwithstanding we see him here declaring with such an air of self-satisfaction, that he had brought the keeper entirely to his bow; yet we find him inserting a postscript to his book called London's Liberty in Chains discovered, purely to apologize for any incorrectness in the reasoning, or any errors or deficiencies in the quotations of that piece, on account of his being debarred pen, and ink, and paper, and obliged to write by scraps as he could steal an opportunity; and that he had no means of perusing or correcting his papers either before or after they were put to the press. The truth is, this bragging temper was as much a part of his constitution as quarrelling, he could no more forbear that than this, nor either of them, any more than (to use an expression of his own) he could forbear eating when he was hungry. Both were continually breaking out in season and out of season. Indeed it must be owned, that the passage now under consideration was well-timed enough. He had then formed a design (67), which he afterwards carried into execution (68), of exerting all the powers of his pen to raise such a mob as should be able to attempt something effectual towards redeeming him from his captivity, in order to which it seemed necessary to possess them before-hand, with a full persuasion of his extraordinary worth and abilities. But this purpose in his present circumstances was answered undeniably well, by setting before their eyes a fresh proof of those abilities in outwitting his keeper, and in him the Lieutenant of the Tower, and thereby evacuating an express order of the House of Lords. Surely such a hero must be deserving of any enterprise in his behalf. In short, this has so much the face of a well-concerted scheme, that was not the faculty of glorying in his impudence perfectly congenial to Lilburne's nature, and ever forward to display itself without the view of serving any particular end therein, one would be apt to look upon the present instance of it as a pure piece of art.

(67) See the next remark.

[BB] Oppressive ordinances.] We have given the matter of his offence to the House of Commons in the text, but no words, except his own, can represent the peculiar aggravations of it. Thus having declared that he has tried all fair means to get his report made to the House, that so he might have a hearing before them; and that he desires nothing more than to be called out to a legal trial, he proceeds in these words; 'which, if they do not, but resolve to keep me here, I will, by God's assistance, before many months be expired, give them cause, with a witness, to call me out; for here, if I can help it, I will not be destroyed with a lingering death, tho' they cut me to pieces as small as flesh for the pot. And therefore, having now with a long deliberation committed my wife and children to the care and protection of an All-merciful God, whom, for about these ten years, I have feelingly and sensibly known for my God in Jesus Christ, who with a mighty protection and preservation hath been with me in six troubles, and in seven, and from the day of my public contests with the Bishops, hath enabled me to carry my life in my hands, and to have it always in a readiness to lay it down in a quarter of an hour's warning, knowing that he has in store for me a mansion of eternal glory. All these things considered, I am now determined, by the strength of God, if herein I have not speedily that justice, which the law of England offers me, which is all I crave or stand in awe of, no longer to wait upon the destructive seasons of prudent men, but forthwith to make a formal Appeal to all the kingdom of England and dominion of Wales, and set my credit upon the tenters to get money to print 20000 of them, and send them gratis to all the counties of England. The ingredients of which shall be filled with the Parliament's own declarations against the King, turned upon themselves' and

(11) The officer also seized above 500 copies of his London Charters, of which, when Lilburne complained to the Committee, Mr Corbet told him, the officer had gone beyond his warrant. However, he says, he never recovered them. See the authority in the next note (m m).

feized (11), and our author, by a warrant directed to the serjeant at arms, February the 8th, was fetched before the Committee for suppressing scandalous pamphlets [CC]; where, having obtained an express order from the chairman [Corbet] to set open the doors, contrary to their usual practice of keeping close Committees on such occasions, he acknowledged the writing, printing, and publishing of the book, in pursuance of the question put to him, and the affair was never prosecuted any farther (m m). But as he had herein departed from his constantly avowed principle of not answering to interrogatories against himself, and his friends appeared to be uneasy upon it, therefore, to prevent any ill consequences that might ensue from that quarter, he wrote a piece shortly after for their satisfaction, and published it on the 30th of April 1647, with the following extraordinary title, The Resolved Man's Resolution to maintain with the last drop of his heart's blood, his civil Liberties and Freedoms, granted unto him by the good, just and honest Laws of England his native Country; and never to sit still, so long as he has a Tongue to speak, or a Hand to write, 'till he hath either necessitated his Adversaries, the House of Lords, and their arbitrary Assistants in the House of Commons [DD], either to do him Justice and Right, by and their present practices; then with an account of my Star-chamber sufferings (69); and conclude with a declaration what is the end, wherefore Parliaments by law ought and should be called; which is to redress mischiefs and inconveniencies, but not to increase them. He afterwards challenges them to shew any instance of an act or ordinance since the wars begun, that is for the universal good of the Commons of England that have borne the burthen of the day; on the contrary, he charges them with having made several ordinances to establish monopolies, (as that of merchant-adventurers, who have an exclusive power of sending cloth to the Netherlands, whereby he was hindered from following his trade) and avows that in their practice they had unhinged Magna Charta and the Petition of Right (70).

[CC] Called before the Committee for scandalous pamphlets.] The issue of this affair is related above, but there happened one incident in the proceedings upon it, which sets the character of our author's wife in so striking a light that it must not be omitted in the notes. This notable help-mate to her husband, was fetched by a particular warrant before the same Committee for dispersing the pamphlets now under examination, where Mr Corbet was Chairman. And in the course of the debates there, Lilburne declaring with his usual audaciousness, that before either that Committee, or any other power in England whatever it be, should rob him of his justly expected recompence of reward for all his labours, travels, and hazards, (which recompence of reward was the enjoyment of the just privileges and benefits of the good laws of the kingdom) he would spend his heart's blood against them: 'Yea, (continues he) if I had a million of lives I would sacrifice them all against you; and therefore, seeing you have all of you solemnly lifted up your hands to the most high God, and sworn to maintain the laws of the kingdom, I desire you for your own credit's sake to deal with me so, as not to give me too just cause to avouch it to your faces you are a company of forsworn men, and so to publish and declare you to the whole kingdom.' With this Mr Weaver, burgess for Stamford said, 'Mr Corbet, I conceive such reproachful and dishonourable expressions as Mr Lilburne gives us to our faces, is not to be endured or suffered, and therefore, I beseech you, let us be sensible of the honour due to our authority, and the house whereof we are members.' To which our prisoner replied, that he was very confident he had said nothing dishonourable to the legal and just interest and power either of the House or the Committee, being no despiser of the just and legal authority of the House, nor desirous to affront or reproach the Committee; but begged them to consider that he was but a man, and a prisoner under many provocations; and to be so roughly fallen upon as he was by half a dozen of them at a time, and interrupted in making his legal defence, and not be suffered to speak his own words, was very hard: and it is possible (continues he) I may be provoked to heat, and in heat say that, that is not convenient and fitting, the which if I should doe, I hope you, Mr Corbet, have understanding enough to judge and to reprove me for it; and truly, Sir, upon your reproofe, if I can possibly apprehend and see I have done amisse, I shall presently cry you peccavie.' Hereabouts his wife, seeing Mr Weaver so furious upon him as he was, and greatly alarmed with the dreadful apprehensions that his noble spirits were thereupon sinking below their true natural standard, into the point of moderation (71) and prudence, burst out with a loud voice, and said, 'Did not I tell thee often enough long since that thou wouldst serve the Parliament, and venture thy life so long for them, 'till they would hang thee for thy paines, and give thee Tyburn for thy recompence. I told thee besides, thou shouldst in conclusion find them a company of unjust and unrighteous judges; that more sought themselves and their own ends than the publique good of the Kingdom, or any of those that faithfully ventured their lives therefore (72).' We have not been able to discover the family of this high-mettled gentlewoman, but this present instance is sufficient to convince us, that Mr Lilburne had either the good sense or the good fortune in her to pick out a very suitable match for himself. Seven years after their marriage, he declares he had been the greatest comfort he had in all his troubles, 'till that time (73); and his meaning therein is clearly and fully unfolded in this pathetic speech, which manifestly shews that she was endowed with a spirit so exactly tallying with his own, that nature seems to have designed her for his counter-part; and accordingly it appears from several passages in his writings, that they lived in perfect harmony with each other (74).

(71) This moderation was apparently the effect of Mr Corbet's behaviour to him, that gentleman's evenness of temper, as well as good sense, shewing itself conspicuously in our author's account of this matter. See also another instance of it in James Howell's article.

[DD] Their arbitrary Assistants in the House of Commons.] Our author being persuaded that old Sir Henry Vane was one of the chief of these arbitrary assistants to the Lords against him. Among other resolutions executed in this piece, exerts himself in a particular manner against that old fox, as he calls him; being determined to pay him off, cost it hanging, burning, drowning, strangling, poisoning, starving, cutting in pieces, or whatever it will or can, 'Yea, tho' it lose me, (says he) all the interest I have in the world in any or all the great ones thereof, put Lieutenant-General Cromwell into the number (75).' Thus animated, he sets out with the business of the twelve subsidies, which occasioned the sudden dissolution of the short Parliament in 1640, and declares he had been told by one who sat therein, that Sir Henry had no such commission from his Majesty, but did it purely with a design to breed a quarrel between the King and the Parliament, and thereby procure that dissolution, on set purpose to save himself from being questioned about his dangerous and desperate monopoly of gun-powder, and other of his illegal knaveries in which he was deep enough, even over both boots and shoes. From this information given him by a member in that Parliament, he proceeds, as upon his own knowledge, to give an account of that monopoly; and tells us, that Sir Henry having jostled Sir John Evelyn out of the Powder-master's place, put one Samuel Cordwell, his valet de chambre, or gentleman, into it, as his agent; who, having the sole monopoly of making all the powder in England, furnished it for seven pence halfpenny into the Tower, which was sold out commonly for eighteen pence per pound at the first hand, besides the charge of getting three warrants; first one from the Council-board to the Master of the Ordnance, then Lord Newport, which cost dear enough; and then a second from his Lordship to the officers of the Ordnance; and a third from them to the particular clerk that kept the powder; all which were attended with trouble, cost, and money, besides a fee of a mark paid to the officers of the Ordnance, for every last of powder delivered: and Cordwell constantly engaged to bring in delivering him from his cruel and illegal imprisonment, and holding out unto him legal and ample Reparation for all his unjust sufferings, or else send him to Tyburn, of which he is not afraid; and doubtless not, if they do it, but at and by his death to do them, Samson-like, more Mischief at his Death, than he did them all his Life. All which is expressed and declared in the following Epistle, written by Lieutenant-Colonel John Lilburne, prerogative prisoner in the Tower of London, to a true friend of his, a citizen thereof, April 1647.

(n n) He also declares his opinion for pulling down the present Parliament, and calling a new one, to bring them to a strict account, as the only means of saving the Laws and Liberties of England from utter destruction. p. 19.

In this piece, having intreated his friend to ply the Parliament well with petitions and remonstrances (n n), he intimates a design, if that method did not succeed, to apply himself to the army. Accordingly, as that faction soon after gave a manifest proof that they had play'd the supreme power into their own hands (o o), we find our prerogative prisoner consulting with the agitators, how to turn this new revolution to his service (p p); and being informed by these friends, that all their endeavours in his favour were defeated by the commanding officers, and chiefly by Cromwell, he sent this last a threatening letter, August the 13th, wherein he charges the Lieutenant-General with a design of usurping the sovereignty [EE]; which was seconded by another on the 29th, addressed to Fairfax the General, undertaking twenty lasts a month, there being twenty-four barrels in every last, and a hundred pound in every barrel*. That Sir Henry likewise, as the principal instrument of setting this dangerous monopoly on foot, forced the merchants and seamen to give large bribes, or use some other indirect means to obtain his warrant to furnish their ships, notwithstanding they were forced to pay double the price for it; nay, almost treble to the rate it was sold at before his monopoly. That moreover, by this means, he disunited all parts of the kingdom was notoriously known to all the deputy-lieutenants, and thereby laid it open to a foreign invasion, which created strong jealousies in the people of a design to enslave and invassalize them; and was no little occasion of the present wars, by increasing the divisions between the King and people. After this having mentioned his own sufferings in the Star-chamber, where Sir Henry was then a judge; he goes on to observe, that not being able to hinder the Long Parliament from securing themselves from a dissolution, Sir Henry took care to behave himself so as to merit preservation from the swaying party. That to this end, being the King's Secretary, and by virtue of that office acquainted with his Majesty's secrets, in regard to which, tho', as a Privy-counsellor, he was under the strictest obligation of secrecy to the King, yet out the secrets went, particularly in the Earl of Strafford's case; of which, (adds he) I have heard some great ones say, it was screwed to the highest pin, if not higher than in honesty and in justice it should; but this he did, not only to save himself, but to gain himself an esteem in the present Parliament; and so be in a possibility by the interest of his son, Sir Henry (Alto' (says he) to men that were half blind, there was, and I think still is, a seeming enmity betwixt him and his father,) in time to make himself amends for his 8000 l. a year by his places, which, by deserting the King, he was likely to lose; and indeed it is commonly reported, that as one of the Committee of the King's revenue, he hath learned to lick his own fingers well. He then proceeds to lay open Sir Henry's treachery to both sides, in his doubling carriage between them at the breaking out of the wars. As his obtaining the Place of Lord-Lieutenant of the County of Durham from the Parliament, and then sending his son, Sir George Vaine, on the King's side at the battle of Edge-hill; and also conveying his magazine of arms from his castle at Raby, by Conyers his Land-steward and Dingley his Solicitor, as a present for the King to the Earl of Newcastle (76), then and there in arms against the Parliament; which Earl, he tells us, might have been easily suppressed at his coming there, if old Sir Henry Vaine had been true to his trust to the Parliament. All this while, if the King lost the day and the Parliament prevailed, here was himself and his son, young Sir Henry Vaine, to make good his interest on this side; so that, which way soever the game went, the old fox was sure in his own thoughts to stand upon his legs. But perceiving the King likewise to go down the weather by the Scots coming in*, he whistles away his son Sir George from the King's army, and sending him to Durham, makes him Receiver of the King's sequestered revenue there, a place worth several hundreds a year; as also Chief Deputy-Lieutenant, Justice of Peace and Quorum, Committee-man, and Chairman of the Committee, having also the Posses-

Comitatus put into his hands: and that besides this son, there was a third son lately come out of Holland, where he had been a captain; and tho' he had not a foot of land in the county, yet was made a Justice of Peace, and had other gainful offices there. Mr Lilburne concludes these remarks upon old Sir Henry Vane and his family, with observing that several other members of Parliament, especially the ruling ones among them, were equally guilty of the grossest knaveries and villainies, and corruptions, in the sad and afflicting contemplation of which, he breaks into the following exclamation: O England, England, woe unto thee, when thy chosen preservers turn to be thy grand destroyers, and instead of easing thee of thy grievances, with a high hand of violence protect from justice those that commit them; and thou seest and knowest it, and yet art like a silly dove without heart, and dares not open thy mouth wide to reprove it, and endeavour, by petition or otherwise, the amending of it. Surely and undeniably that body, who or whatever it be, that is not able to evacuate its excrements, is nigh unto giving up the ghost, or of bursting out into such botches and ulcers, that it shall be an eye-fore to all that behold it, and stink in the nostrils of all men that have their senses (77). Upon the whole, we see here several remarkable particulars concerning old Sir Henry Vane, which are not mentioned by Lord Clarendon, and will therefore be of service in throwing some further light upon the character given by his Lordship of that notorious Baronet. This extract also shews us how greatly our author's attachment to Cromwell was loosened at this time, and accordingly we shall see it intirely disjointed in the next remark.

[EE] He sent Cromwell a threatening letter, &c.] This Letter was in the following terms:

S I R,

It has been my unhappiness to be undone, and of late in a manner destroyed by men of gilded outside, and among the rest, I must plainly and truly tell you, I judge you the chief, and shall, if you please to give me so much libertie as to come and speak with you, easily evince it to your face, with that moderation as becomes a man that loves honesty and goodlinesse wheresoever he finds it, but that hates knavery and dissimulation in whatsoever person he meets it. See I have used all the means in the world I could think of to unbowel my mind as a friend to you face to face, but cannot prevail with you any otherwise than to slight me and my desires. I have lately sent you a fair message by Captain John White; and by him I received a contemning answer, only he pressed me to know which way I could do you and your flattering darlings a displeasure. I have now at present sent him by Mr Billers, a copy of this inclosed paper to send speedily to you with this message, that I do verily believe, that that paper printed with such a paraphrase upon it as I could easily make, for all your present conceived greatness, would easily pull you as low, before you are three months older, as I am. I have honored you, and my good thoughts of you are not wholly gone, tho' I confesse they are very much weakened. Sir, I must earnestly beg it at your hands, that you will within a week order it so, that I may either come and speake with you, or else that you would come and speake with me, that so I may, betwixt you and me, declare that, which truly my provocations and sufferings will hardly let me to keep from public view. I have undertaking to make good that charge [FF]. And the same day he also transmitted a third letter to the Council of Agitators, with a petition to exert themselves for his deliverance from the Tower [GG]. The same day likewise, a petition in his behalf being presented to the House of Commons, in the name of many citizens, it was referred to the Committee, and to report it with all convenient speed (gg). ' Lieutenant-General Cromwell's family in the army.

' Imprimis, Himself Lieutenant-general and Colonel of Horse. 2dly, One of his own sons Captain of the General's Life-guard. 3dly, The other son Captain of a Troop of Horse in Colonel Harrison's regiment, both, young, raw, and unexercised soldiers. 4thly, His brother-in-law, Deborow, Colonel of the General's regiment of Horse. 5thly, His Son-in-law, Ireton, Commissary-general of the Horse and Colonel of Horse. 6thly, His brother, Ireton, Major-general of Horse and Captain of a Troop of Horse. 7thly, His Cousin Whaley, Colonel of Horse. 8thly, And his brother, lately made Judge-advocate. And all these are the Lieutenant's creatures at his beck and command; besides his Cabinet Junto, which are principally Colonel Robert Hammond, Colonel Nathaniel Rich, Colonel Harrison, and Scout-master general Watson; and Commissary Staines, and Mrs Cromwell, are said to be the Cabinet Junto for placing and displacing of Officers in the Tower of London, who, 'tis said, have nominated Robert Spavin, the Lieutenant-general's Man, their chief favourite, to be the Master of the Armory in the place of Mr Anthony Nichols, one of the eleven impeached members; so that it is evident and plain, that Lieutenant-general Cromwell's chief design is not the good of the kingdom, and the promoting of universal and unbiassed justice, but the advancement of himselfe and his own kindred and friends; which will undoubtedly destroy him if he speedily look not very well about him. For the principal power of the kingdom being in his hands (not in the General's nor the Agitators) all the grand oppressions, injustice, and delays in justice, will and must be laid upon his shoulders, seeing he has now power enough to help it, if he had a mind.—This Letter (says he) I caused to be delivered to Cromwell at Kingston (78).'

[FF] Another to the General, undertaking to make good that charge.] Here follows a copy of it:

' To his Excellency Sir Thomas Fairfax, Captain-general of all the forces in England, at his headquarters at Putney. This present:

' Give me leave to acquaint your Excellency, That the Lord's-day last I sent your Honour a large letter to treat you to make no address at all to the Lords for me; and this day, at the desire of some of the Agitators, I have fully stated my accounts to them (79), and acquainted them fully what I desire, the substance of which was to use their utmost interest to get the House of Commons to call for my report from Mr Henry Martin, (who, with the ' Committee where he was Chairman, did many months ago hear my cause) and upon it either to justify me or condemn me, for protesting against the Lords' jurisdiction over the Commons, my legal peers and equals, for protection, justice, and right against the Lords usurpation. But, most worthy Sir, the chief reason, why I now make bold to trouble your Excellency is, because I am continually told again and againe of many hard speeches against me at your quarters for opposing Lieutenant-general Cromwell; which makes me think sometimes that my deliverance is much retarded thereby. Vouchsafe me therefore liberty, Most Noble Sir, humbly to your most just and worthy selfe to make this proposition, that if the Lieutenant-general, or any other in the army, conceive that I have done him any wrong, that if he please to chuse two honest men, I will chuse two more, and also your Excellency to be umpire betwixt us, before whom I do humbly desire our differences may be truly debated; and what the issue of all shall be, I, for my part, will stand to, and fulfil your Excellency's award, be it what it will be, if it be within my power. So craving pardon for my continued boldness with your Excellency, I commit you as my owne soul to the protection of the most High, and shall rest,

' Sir,

' Your Excellency's most obliged, faithful Servant,

' JOHN LILBURNE.

' From my prerogative, lawless, and unjust Captivity in the Tower of London, 26th of August, 1647 (80).'

[GG] Appealed to the Agitators.] Our Lieutenant-general, from the time of his first taking a distaste to Cromwell, had made it his business to raise and foment this mutiny against him; and when he saw it work'd up into something of a body by the engagement agreed upon, and subscribed at Newmarket-heath (81), on the 5th of July this year, he presently grew big with the most sanguine hopes of his fulfilling the fondest wish of his heart thereby (82). The first step necessary to be taken for him was evidently to procure his liberty: and in order to this, he formed a scheme, in concert with the principal mutineers, to draw up a state of his case, and send it, together with his petition thereon, in a letter to their Council, who were to present it to the grand Council of the army, and to exert the utmost strength of their power to effectuate it's favourable reception there; and even to cram it, if possible, forcibly down the Lieutenant-general's throat: and lastly (as there was reason enough to apprehend) that could not be compassed, they were to apply to Fairfax, as Constable of the Tower, for his order (which would be sufficient now the Parliament's power was annihilated, and consequently the supremacy vested actually in the General) to release him as his prisoner, atleast upon giving bail (83). But every part of this plan as well as all their other measures were broken by Cromwell. That arch-rebel had kept a watchful eye upon the motions of these turbulent spirits from their first appearance in the army, and was now fully determined to crush a confederacy which was notoriously aimed to subvert all his views. The method he took to effect it, by pistolling the forwardest man among them in the foremost rank, at the head of his regiment (84), is recorded by Lord Clarendon, as one of the boldest actions in the Life of that amazing man (85); and it is no diminution to the bravery of Lilburne's spirit, that, after a conflict sustained for several years with unabated, tho' unavailing, hardiness, he was flung at last by that matchless trickster, Huic uni forsam succumbere natus.

well made him a friendly visit in the Tower [HH], but still the House, instead of discharging him as he expected, referred the case back to the Committee (rr) [II]: whereupon, our author being informed of their intention to examine him in the Tower, wrote a letter September 18th, to the Lieutenant thereof, declaring his resolution not to see them if they came with that design, and absolutely protesting against the authority of the House [KK], and on October the 2d he sent the Speaker a proposition to argue his cause against the jurisdiction of the House of Lords with any forty lawyers in the kingdom [LL].
On

[HH] Cromwell made him a friendly visit in the Tower.] The intention of this visit, wherein he complied with Lilburne's request of seeing him face to face, was to sound him upon the mutiny raised by the Agitators. In this view he told him of a report there was, that he designed, if he was discharged, to go down to the army, and make a disturbance there; intimating withal, that any clashing which might happen on his account, might at this juncture be of extraordinary prejudice to the kingdom; whereupon Lilburne assured him that, to cut off all possibility of any danger that might be apprehended from him, provided the House would do him reasonable justice, he should be so far from going down to the army in order to make a disturbance there, that he would immediately leave the kingdom, and voluntarily engage himself not to come into it again as long as the present troubles lasted; and to prevent, as much as possible, any clashing between the Houses on his account, he declared, that if the Commons would determine his cause against the usurpation of the Lords, he would leave all things concerning his private demands and sufferings 'till the next Parliament; and if that never came, he would never ask for reparation, of them. He tells us, he had many fair promises from Cromwell at this conference*, and we find him writing the same day to Sir Henry Martin as follows:

' Your late endeavours to make my poor report hath given me full satisfaction for your former neglect in that very business. I hear you are ordered by the present linsley-woolsey House of Commons to make it to them to-morrow; for my part I cannot own men (tho' otherwise never so honest) that fate in the House of Commons in the Speaker's absence, but as traitors and enemies to their country, who are already so declared by the body of the army, by whose means I had thought the House would have been purged of them: and therefore I cannot own any of them my Judges. In which regard I intreat you, that if you shall attempt the making of my report, that you acquaint the Speaker and the House with the true contents hereof. Sir, I desire farther to let you know, that I am not so in love with a prison as to refuse my liberty from the hands of any power in the kingdom, so I am meer passive, and not active in the seeking and procuring of it: but I, for my part, cannot desire it from any power, (tho' I perish in it) but from that I judge to be a just power; tho' I can take it from any power that will of themselves put it upon me. ' From my lawless captivity in the Tower of London, September the 13th, 1647.'

[II] The House referred the case back to the Committee.] If we may believe our author, Cromwell had the chief hand in this delay. 'For (says he to Mr Maynard) (87), when my wife procured a sitting of the Committee in the afternoon of that day, when my cause was referred again to you, the Lieutenant-general being there, moved, that since the cause was so knotty, and of so great concernment, it might be referred to some lawyers of their House to canvass it, who should have power to search for precedents;' however that be, which is indeed well becoming the infinite guile and subtilty of the man, 'tis certain Lilburne construed it to intend nothing else but a malicious design to keep him at least fifteen months longer in prison. In which persuasion he wrote a second letter (88) to his friend, Sir Henry

Martin, wherein he falls upon Cromwell to the purpose, charging him with hindring the General, as Constable of the Tower, from taking bail, which he had offered upon his deliverance from thence; says, he is glued in interest and counsels with those four sons of Machiavel, who never heartily loved the liberty of the Commons, Lord Say, Lord Wharton, young Sir Henry Vaine, and Solicitor St John; avers, that he brought him into all his troubles, and now unworthily and dishonourably leaves him in them; declares he should, as the cause now stands, die, if he may do it Samson-like, with as much satisfaction as ever he did eat or drink in his life; attests that he sees Cromwell's and Vane's design is to keep the people everlastingly in bondage with a rotten and putrified Parliament; accuses Cromwell of placing none but noun-adjunctives in the army, with a design to set a new England independent tyranny (89), now we have, says he, thrown down a bloody Episcopacy, and a persecuting tyranny; concludes with openly avowing his resolution to try what the private soldiers in the army, and the hob-nails and clouted-shoes will do for him. He also upon another occasion (90) confesses, that he was at this time free both with his pen and tongue in discovering Cromwell's hocus-pocus dealings with him and the kingdom, who appears, says he, to me to be one of the notablest jugglers that ever I was familiar with in the kingdom.

[KK] A Letter to the Lieutenant of the Tower.] We shall insert this letter (which is short) because it is a further evidence of the present situation of our author's mind, with regard to the House of Commons.

Truly, Sir, I desire not to affront them, which I must of necessity doe, if they send for me; being I cannot own the power of the House of Commons in their present mixture. Therefore, if they should go about to send for me, I intreat you to do your best to divert it, and I will be ready to give you my petrowle and securitie, if they and you agree upon it. [LL] A proposition to argue his cause with any forty lawyers in the kingdom.] This challenge was evidently aimed at Cromwell, being given by way of answer to his reason for deferring the determination of Lilburne's cause in the Committee, that it should be referred to some lawyers to canvass it. The paper was drawn up in these terms:

' The Proposition of Lieutenant-colonel John Lilburne, Prerogative-prisoner in the Tower of London, made unto the Lords and Commons assembled at Westminster, and to the whole Kingdom of England, Oct. 2, 1647.

' I grant the House of Lords, according to the statute of Edw. III. c. 5. to have in law a jurisdiction for redressing of grievances, either upon illegal delays or illegal judgments given in any of the Courts of Westminster-hall, provided they have the King's particular commission therefore, and other the legal powers contained in that statute, which jurisdiction, and no other, seems to me to be confirmed by the statute of the 27th of Eliz. c. 8. and 31 Eliz. c. 1.

(89) An instance of this he mentions in the act lately passed for treble tythes, i. e. for treble damages in case of refusal to pay the tythes, which he declares to be his own case. Milton's was another, and he was also plainly tainted with Quakerism, as well as Lilburne, who, among other monopolies, often complains of that of confining the preaching of the Word of God to the rough Black-coats. The like complaint was often made by Milton.

Additional Plea to Maynard, p. 17. and Rushworth informs us, that he had been before them on the 18th, and soon after gave in his speech in writing, declaring the Lords proceedings against him illegal, of which he gave many precedents, which he undertook to prove. His expressions were in law very high. Vol. VIII. p. 844.

On the 20th of that month he was fetched again before the Committee, when Serjeant Maynard being in the chair, he had a fair and full hearing upon that point (55); but the Committee declining to hear him upon some other things relating to the House of Commons (11), he sent a paper upon those matters inclosed in a letter to Mr Maynard on the 28th (uu), wherein he promised, for the satisfaction of his enemies, to leave the kingdom if he had his demands paid by an order of the House, threatening otherwise to raise his friends among the people in his defence [MM]. On the 9th of November an order passed the House that he should have liberty every day to go without his keeper to attend the Committee appointed about his business, and to return every night to the Tower (ww). And he enjoyed the benefit of it some time, but an information of seditious practices being made against him in January to the House of Lords, he was taken into custody again, and brought before the House of Commons on the 19th of that month. When in his defence, he delivered a charge of high-treason against Cromwell and Ireton; upon which he was remitted to the Tower, and ordered to be tried by the law of the land, for seditious and scandalous practices against the state [NN]. ‘ But I positively deny that the House of Lords, by ‘ the known and declared law of England, have any ‘ original jurisdiction over any Commoner whatsoever, ‘ either for life, limb, liberty, or estate, which is the ‘ only and alone thing in controversy betwixt them ‘ and me. And this position I will in a public assembly, ‘ or before both Houses, in law debate with any ‘ forty Lawyers in England, that are practitioners of ‘ the law; and I will be content the Lords shall ‘ chuse them every man; and if after I have said for ‘ myself what I can, that any three of these forty ‘ Lawyers sworn to deliver their judgments according ‘ to the known law of England give it under their ‘ hands against me, I will give over my present contest ‘ with the Lords, and surrender myself up to the punishment and sentence of the present Lords and Commons.

[MM] He promised to leave the kingdom, &c.] The insults he had offered with his tongue and pen to Cromwell, giving great distaste to some of his near friends, who said, they would not only undo himself, but all that had any relation to him, and pressed him to do something that was reasonable and moderate to get his liberty; one of them assuring him, that he knew if he would do so and so (91), he might have it. Hereupon our author considering that if he was set at liberty, he could not live in England to follow any employment, excepting oaths and tythes were abolished. ‘ For ‘ (says he) either I must follow my trade, a clothier, ‘ which here I cannot do without taking oaths, which ‘ I cannot take; or else I must live in the country, ‘ and there I neither can nor would pay tythes; in ‘ which regard, if I were at liberty, I must of necessity ‘ go beyond seas. I did therefore propose, that upon ‘ that condition if the House of Commons will pass their ‘ judgment upon my protest against the Lords, and evacuate ‘ their sentence, and immediately help me to the 2000l. ‘ the Lords adjudged me, and get me but in ready ‘ money one half of my arrears for the whole, being ‘ 6 or 7000l. audited before a Committee of their own ‘ House, I would immediately lay out my money in cloths, ‘ or other commodities; and if I can pass with them, I ‘ will forthwith leave the kingdom, to which I will ‘ promise, without licence, I will not return for the space ‘ of twelve months for the rest of the money; and so ‘ I shall leave this Parliament to the management of ‘ their own affairs among themselves. But instead of obtaining his liberty thereby, as he was confidently made believe he should, they calumniated him as a man that neither cared for England, nor the liberties thereof, but merely and only sought for his money and his own ends; ‘ whose juggling dealings ‘ with me (continues he) I shall more largely bring ‘ to notice, when I print my letter to suble Mr Allen, ‘ the Agitator, which, by God’s assistance, shall speedily follow; and then my Appeal next to that, where-

[NN] Was afterwards remitted to the Tower, and ordered to be tried for seditious practices.] Some account of this affair is printed in Rushworth’s Collections (93), which in substance is, that after a conference, January 18th, between the two Houses, their Lordships acquainted the House of Commons, that they had received information by one Mr Masterman, Minister of Shoreditch, that being desired by a friend of his to go to a private house to give his judgment on a petition to be presented to the House of Commons, he accordingly went, and found there Lieutenant-colonel John Lilburne, and many others, debating about the said petition; and that Lilburne did then speak many things tending much to the dishonour of both Houses of Parliament, and their proceedings, and expressed himself in such language against both, that it was not fitting for a man of his coat to mention them; and that this was filed a petition, and that many thousand copies thereof should be dispersed through the kingdom to the dishonour of the Parliament and their proceedings. That their Lordships had formerly committed Lilburne to the Tower of London, and having information of his going abroad, sent to the Lieutenant of the Tower to know the reason he was not detained in custody, according to the order of that House; who answered, that there was lately an order of the House of Commons directed to him, and requiring him to suffer the said Lilburne to go abroad about his occasions; and that since the said order he could give no account of him. In conclusion, their Lordships desired that no occasion might be given to hinder the union and affection between both Houses of Parliament, and that the House would speedily consider of this business. The House of Commons accordingly took this business into consideration, and had much debate thereupon; and ordered, that their former order should be repealed, and that Lieutenant-colonel John Lilburne be committed prisoner to the Tower, and that the Lieutenant of the Tower should bring him to the bar of the House of Commons tomorrow morning; and another order was made, that Mr Wildman should be taken into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms. January 19th, the House refusing the same affair, Lilburne was called in, and made a large, if not a tedious, answer to the information or charge against him, some whereof he confessed, and part denied. The proof of the information was likewise heard, and the examination of this business held till 6 at night, when the House, coming to a resolution upon it, ordered that Lilburne should be committed prisoner to the Tower of London; and that he should be tried by the law of the land for seditious and scandalous practices against the State; and that Wildman should be committed to Newgate, and tried according

(91) What this was appears from his resolution to leave the kingdom for some time at least, till the public affairs were settled, i. e. till Cromwell had purged off the Agitators, and so secured to himself the whole army, and therein the supreme power. For that doubtless was the arch-rebel’s true meaning, from whom the proposition evidently came.

(xx) In this epistle he accuses Cromwell of wilful murder, and desires Lenthal to bring the accusation into the House, for killing Arnel, at Ware in Hertfordshire, Nov. 15, 1647, in a time of peace, and declared to be by the Parliament's declaration, in answer to the Scotch Commissioners, March 4, 1647.

titled by this order to his habeas corpus, he made a regular application for it to the King's-Bench both that term and the next, and being put off by the Judges, he printed first, an epistle dated April 8th 1648, to Mr Lenthal, intitled, The Prisoner's Plea for a Habeas Corpus (xx), which was followed by another dated the 19th of that month to Mr Justice Rolle, in 1648, intitled, The Prisoner's mournful Cry against the Judges of the King's Bench (yy), and was suffered to plead his cause himself at that bar, on the 8th of May (zz). However, no rule being made there in his favour, he petitioned the House of Commons, whereby he obtained, August 1st, both his discharge from imprisonment, and an order to make him satisfaction for his sufferings [OO]. The next day after he had got his liberty, cording to law for treasonable and seditious practices also, against the State. That Mr Solicitor, and all the Lawyers of the House should take care for preparing the charge against them, and bringing of them to trial the next term; and that Mr Becke of Lincoln's-Inn should be employed in this business for the better expediting, and carrying it on. January 20th, the House was informed that Lilburne and Wildman were not carried to their several prisons, according to the orders yesterday made; and that many of their party gave out high language, that they should not be committed, unless their desires were granted before their commitment. The House hereupon ordered Lilburne and Wildman should be committed to the several prisons, according to the order of yesterday; and that the officers of the guard attending the House, should draw out a sufficient guard to assist the Serjeant at Arms, or his Deputy, in the execution of the said orders; and the guard being drawn forth, they were conveyed to their several prisons.—And the House, being informed that a meeting would be at Deptford in Kent, on Sunday next, by some discontented persons, upon this petition to the House, ordered the Committee should take care to suppress all meetings upon the said petition. And in respect many of these petitions were printed and given out to several persons to be dispersed; and also that there might be other meetings in London upon the same, the House ordered, that the Militia of London and Westminster Hamlets, &c. should take especial care for suppressing of all meetings, and preventing any inconveniences that might arise by reason of the said petition, intitled, The Petition of many thousands of the free-born people of England, &c. So much we learn of the several steps taken in this affair by the Parliament. And our author himself, speaking on another occasion of this answer to the information on the 19th of January, he declares, that upon that day he openly delivered at the bar of the House of Commons a formal charge or impeachment of high-treason (according to their own ordinances) against Mr Oliver Cromwell and his subtle Machiavilian son-in-law, Mr Henry Ireton, for their notorious doing that in reference to the King, for but the petty acting of which, in comparison to theirs, they impeached Mr Denzil Holles, Sir Philip Stapleton, &c. of high-treason (as appeareth in their own book of declarations, p. 81, 82. art. 2, 3.) and forcibly expunged them their House as traitors (94) therefore. In the same piece our author falls upon this rival friend, with the following imputation of baseness and treachery to him at this time, 'Mr Oliver (says he) by the help of the army, at their first rebellion against the Parliament, their Lords and Masters, was no sooner up, but, like a most perfidious base unworthy man, he turned my enemy and jaylor, and was as great with Manchester in particular as ever. Yea the House of Peers were his only white boyes; being more than his drudges, and more conformable to his will than the House of Commons itself; and who but Oliver (that before to me had called them both tyrants and usurpers) became their proctor wherever he came; yea, and set his son Ireton at work for them also, in so much, as at some meetings with some of my friends at the Lord Wharton's lodgings, he clapt his hand upon his breast, and to this purpose, professed as in the sight of God, upon his conscience, that the Lords had as true a right to their legislative and jurisdictional power over the Commons, as he had to the coat upon his back; and he would procure a friend, Mr Nathaniel Fiennes †, should argue and plead their said right with any friend I had in England; and not only so, but did he not oblige the General and Council of War at Windfor, about the time when the other votes of no more addresses were to pass (95) to make a declaration to the whole kingdom, declaring the legal rights of the Lords House, and their fixed resolutions to maintain and uphold it; which, as I remember, was sent to the General, &c. to the Lords by Sir Hardresse Waller. He afterwards observes, that Cromwell set his agents at work to get him to acknowledge the Lords jurisdiction, and that he and Ireton, after a little under-hand working begun to appear above-board, in rendering all the means gone about in the army for his liberty, not only ineffectual, but even a snare to him; and that their base dealing with him had put him upon writing these several pieces to discover their depth of knavery. [OO] He petitioned and obtained his discharge, and an order for satisfaction.] Besides his own, there was a petition also signed by seven or eight thousand of his friends, and delivered to the House; which was afterwards printed, together with the Speech of Sir John Maynard, to whom he attributes this final discharge (97); the order for which is mentioned in Rushworth (98). Thus, 1648, Aug. 1, a petition was read in behalf of Lieutenant-colonel John Lilburne, and upon long debate thereupon, it was ordered that he should be discharged his imprisonment, and a conference to be had with the Lords for the same. Referred also to a Committee how Lieutenant-colonel John Lilburne may have satisfaction, and allowance for his sufferings, as was formerly voted. Our author has also given us the names of the persons who were appointed of this Committee, which are Sir John Maynard, Sir Peter Wentworth, Lord Carre, who was the chairman, Colonel Boswell, Colonel Ludlow, Mr Holland, and Mr Copley (99). The Lieutenant-colonel immediately presented a petition to this Committee, praying for some considerable augmentation of the sum of 2000 l. allotted to him by the House of Lords in 1646, the rather; because his fellow sufferer, Dr Bastwick, had 4000 l. reparations allotted him, whose sufferings he conceived, were nothing so great as his in torment, pain, and shame; and in regard that the estates of Lord Cottington and Sir Francis Windebank, by subsequent orders of both Houses upon urgent occasions are much intangled and altered from the condition they were in 1646, when the Lords ordered him 2000 marks out of them (100); and for that the estate of James Ingram cannot be found, nor at present come by, he prays that all, or the greatest part of his reparations, may be fixed upon the Lord Coventry's estate (101). The Committee having made a report, an ordinance was read the first time, and passed in the House. Agreeable to this petition, Aug. 22d, for the raising of 3000 l. out of the real estate of the late Lord Coventry, sometime Keeper of the Great Seal of England, towards his reparations for the two sentences against him in the Star-chamber (102). But the late Lord Coventry's son and heir hearing thereof in France, came immediately home, and by his interest put a stop to the second reading. And our author was informed, that the House had a design of assigning him the same sum out of the public money. This change in his security he did not at all relish; and therefore in order to prevent it, he drew up a large petition, and printed it on the 4th of September; a copy of which he presented at the door of the House to every member at his entrance the day following, when the second reading was appointed (103), and the result, as we learn from Rushworth, was, That the House having considered his petition, an ordinance for settling 3000 l. upon him, to be ad-

Where he also observes, that this great number of signers to the petition was procured in 7 or 8 days time, the juncture being critically favourable to him, on account of the Parliament's apprehensions from the Cavaliers; and it is remarkable, that, the day after this petition, Prince Charles being with his fleet in the Downs; sent a declaration to London, that he was come to release his father, &c.

If we may believe himself, his reason was a concern for the public welfare, which must suffer so far by this change; but it is evident, that the consideration of some rumours and deductions, which might be insisted on by Mr Prynne to adjust the balance of his army accounts, was sufficient to put his mouth out of taste with the method of paying him out of the public money.

berty, he wrote a friendly letter to Cromwell, then warmly attacked by the Presbyterians [PP]. September the 11th, he joined with several others in a large petition to the House of Commons against a personal treaty with the King [QQ]; presently after which, he went down into the North to take possession of some effects that had been assigned to him, in pursuance of the last mentioned vote of the Commons (aaa). Returning to London in a short time, with a design to procure the settling of a new model of government before the King's execution, which was then resolved on by the leading men in the army (bbb), he had several meetings with Ireton and others upon that affair [RR], but the general vanced out of the Lord Coventry's estate, was read, and, upon the question, laid aside; but the House only disagreeing in the manner, ordered that 3000 pounds worth of delinquents lands should be sold to him in fee at twelve year's purchase, and that an ordinance of Parliament should be brought in for that purpose with all convenient speed (104).<sup>(104)</sup> In consequence of this order, he obtained a grant for some part of the sequestered estates of Sir Henry Bellingham and Mr Bowes, in the county of Durham, or Northumberland; from which he received about 1400 pounds (105); and Cromwell, soon after his return from Ireland, in the end of May 1650, procured him a grant of lands for the remainder 'for which most noble favour (says he the following year) I must and do heartily declare and acknowledge myself highly obliged to him (106).

[PP] A Letter to Cromwell, then warmly attacked by the Presbyterians.] The Letter was in these terms:

S I R,

What my comrade hath written by our trusty bearer might be sufficient for us both; but to demonstrate unto you, that I am no staggerer from my first principles that I engaged my life upon, nor from you, if you are what you ought to be, and what you are strongly reported to be; although if I persecuted, or desired revenge for a bard and almost starving imprisonment, I could have had of late the choice of twenty opportunities to have paid you to the purpose; but I scorn it, especially when you are low: and this assure yourself, that if ever my hand be upon you, it shall be when you are in your full glory, if then you shall decline from the righteous ways of Truth and Justice: which if you will fixedly and impartially prosecute,

I am Your's, to the last drop of my heart's blood,

JOHN LILBURNE.

From Westminster the 3d of August, 1648,
'being the second day of my freedom.'

To understand fully the noble spirit of this letter, we must in company with our author take a view of Cromwell's circumstances at that time. He had his hands full with the Royalists, Poyer, Young, Holland, Hamilton, and Langdale, this year; and still more so with the Parliament, there being a general odium then in both Houses against him, upon the impeachment of him by his own Major, Huntington. Lilburne, on the other hand, having obtained his liberty, was not a little up and in spirits on the occasion, and could at his pleasure, as he says, have been revenged of him if he had so pleased, either by divisions in his army, which was easily then in his power, or by joining with Major Huntington in impeaching him; which, as he observes, he had matter enough to do, and was earnestly solicited to it again and again, and might have had money enough to boot in his then low and exhausted condition [with regard to the state of his purse]; Yet, continues he, I scorned it, and rather applied my hand to help him up again, as not loving a Scotch interest*, as is very well and fully known to his present † darling Mr Cornelius Holland, and also to Colonel Ludlow, and Mr Thomas Chaloner, with other members that I could name; and which was demonstrated to himself by a letter [that inserted here] I sent him by Mr Sexby, whom on purpose I procured to go down to him. Which letter, &c. as I have been told by the bearer, was not a little welcome (107).

the King.] Our author tells us, that he was compelled, in conscience to have a hand in this, which he calls that most excellent of petitions, by reason of the several jugglings he observed in divers great ones, in reference to the personal treaty; and that there was nothing worth praising or liking thought of or presented by the Parliament, in reference to the people's liberties; especially considering the late large expences and hazards for procuring the settlement of them. But besides this, another motive for joining at least more gladly in this petition is also suggested by him, which is, that he was persuaded it would be agreeable to the Lieutenant-general, who shewed a fair face then to him and his party, he also expressly says, he was sure it was no small piece of service to Cromwell and his great associates (108): In his speech, on presenting a new model of government to the House of Commons, in 1649; our author observes this was the first petition he knew of in England against that treaty: and Mr Salmon takes notice of a Remonstrance, as he calls it, presented to the Commons, Nov. 10, this year, by the officers, against any further treaty with his Majesty, and requiring that the King and his adherents be brought to justice; and that a period be put to this Parliament, and more equal representatives chosen, in whom they would have the supreme power lodged (109). How far this was approved by Cromwell and his great associates soon after, will be seen in the next remark.

[RR] Several meetings with Ireton, &c.] While Lilburne was in the North, on the business mentioned in the text, he saw Cromwell [at that time there with the army to quell the Scots]; and observing him narrowly, found he was not so heartily inclined to the views of his party [the Levellers], as had been represented. For which reason, on his return to London shortly after, he joined with some other friends in sending a message to Cromwell, proposing to settle the government by an agreement with the people. The messenger (Hunt) returning with Cromwell's consent to the proposal, several Independents, to which party Cromwell's answer was directed, and Levellers, among whom was Lilburne, met at the Nag's-head tavern by Blackwell-Hall; where, after some warm debates, it was agreed to chuse four persons of each side, to adjust the matters in dispute (110). These delegates, which were Colonel Tichburne, Colonel White, Dr Parker, and Jo. Price, for the Independents; and for the Levellers, Lieutenant-Colonel Wotton, Mr Walwyn, Mr Wildman, and Mr Lilburne, in a second meeting at the Nag's-head, November 15, 1648, unanimously agreed in these words: 'That, in our conceptions, the only way of settlement is, (1.) That some persons be chosen by the army to represent the whole body; and that the well-affected in every county (if it may be) chuse some persons to represent them: and those to meet at the head quarters. (2.) That those persons ought not to exercise any legislative power, but only to draw up the foundations of a just government, and to propose them to the well-affected people in every county to be agreed to: which agreement ought to be above Law; and therefore the bounds, limits, and extent, of the Peoples legislative deputies in Parliament, contained in the agreement, to be drawn up into a formal contract, to be mutually signed by the well-affected people and their said deputies upon the days of their election respectively. (3.) To prevent present confusion, the Parliament (if it be possible) may not be by force immediately dissolved; but that the day of it's dissolution be inserted in that agreement, by virtue whereof it shall be dissolved. (4.) That this way of settlement (if it may be) shall be mentioned in the Army's first remonstrance. (5.) That the matter of the petition of September 11 be the matter to be settled.'

These heads for settling an agreement were immediately sent

(110) These were chiefly, that the Independents proposed first to put the King to death, and then force and thoroughly purge, if not dissolve, the Parliament; whereas it was insisted on by the Levellers, that the Parliament should be dissolved, and a new one called, before the King's execution.

general council of officers quashing all the projects of his party [SS], he published, December 15th 1648, such articles of an Agreement with the People as had then been proposed (tho' without effect) by them, and presenting at the head of several of his friends, a complaint of the army, and a kind of protest against their proceedings, to Cromwell, on the 28th, [TT] returned in a few days to Newcastle, where he continued attending the business of his reparations 'till the death of his Majesty, soon after which he went back to London [UU], where finding Duke Hamilton, Lord Capel, and some other royalists, lately brought sent to the head-quarters at St Albans. But the Army's declaration against the King coming out soon after, created so much uneasiness, and jealousy of their designs against the Levellers, that these presently repaired to Windsor to talk with Ireton about it; where, being accompanied with some of the Independents, they met him and a whole train of officers at the Garter inn, and, after several sharp disputes, they parted without coming to any agreement. However, proposing to Colonel Harrison soon after, that the army, and those whom they called their honest friends in the Parliament, as also the Independents and the Levellers, should chuse each of them four persons to draw up a final agreement; the Colonel was satisfied therewith, and engaged also for the other officers; and having actually procured Ireton's consent, the following sixteen persons were chosen for the purpose. For the Independents, Colonel Tichburn, Colonel John White, Mr Daniel Taylor, and Mr Price a Scrivener. For the Levellers, Mess. Walwyn, Maximilian Petty, Wildman, and Lilburne. For the honest men in the Parliament, Colonel Henry Martin, Colonel Alexander Rigby, Mr Thomas Challoner, and Mr Scott. And for the Army, Commissary-General Ireton, Sir William Constable, Colonel Tomlinson, and Colonel Baxter. These commissioners, after the army came to town [December 2 (111)], constantly met at Whitehall, except that the Parliament-men failed, only Mr Martin was commonly there (112).

[SS] All these projects were quashed by the general council of officers. After many fierce contests with Ireton only, sometimes whole nights together, wherein the Commissary was often very angry and lordly. The chief points of difference being about Liberty of Conscience, and the Parliament's punishing where no law provides. An expedient in the first point was settled; and whereupon, the major part of the sixteen commissioners came to an absolute and final conclusion, supposing then all further debates were at an end, and that the agreement should, without any more ado, be promoted for subscriptions, first in the council of war, and next in the regiments, and lastly all over the nation. But alas! poor fools, continues our author, we were merely cheated and cozened. It being the principal unhappiness of some of us (as to the flesh *), to have our eyes wide open, to see things long before most honest men come to have their eyes open; and this is that which turns to our smart and reproach, and that which we commissioners feared at the first, viz. that no ties, promises, nor engagements, were strong enough to the grand jugglers and leaders of the army, was now made clearly manifest; for, when it came to the Council, there came the General, Cromwell, and the whole gang of creatures, colonels and other officers, and spent many days in taking it all in pieces; and there Ireton shewed himself an absolute King, if not an Emperor, against whose will no man must dispute; and then Shittlecock Roe, their scout Okey, and Major Barton, where Sir Hardresse Walker sat President, began to quarrel, and call some of us base and unworthy names, which procured them from me a sharp retortment, and a challenge of Sir Hardresse into the field. And so I took my leave of them, for a pack of dissembling juggling knaves, and returning to those who trusted me, and, giving them an account of all these proceedings at a publick meeting appointed for the purpose, I discharged myself absolutely for meddling or making any more with so perfidious a generation of men, as the great ones of the army were, but especially the cunningest of Machiavilians, Commissary Henry Ireton (113).

[TT] He printed an agreement of the people, and presented it to Cromwell. The paper now mentioned was no more than a bare sketch of that compleat agreement drawn up by our author and his two associates in the Tower next year; and the reason of printing and publishing this, was chiefly to be beforehand with the army, where they knew (114) an instrument of the like sort, but more consonant to the views of the leading men therein, was preparing in the Council of Officers. Accordingly such a thing, intitled also An Agreement, was presented by the General and Council to the House of Commons on the 20th of January following (115).

[UU] He returned to London after the King's death. In the road, he was told by the Postmaster of Borough-brigg and others in Yorkshire, that the Cavaliers in those parts were most desperate mad at him in particular, about the beheading of the late King, although he was as far as Newcastle when it was done, and had also refused to give his consent to be one of the King's Judges, being solicited thereto before he left London. Nay more, he had accordingly declared himself at Windsor (in the debates mentioned in remark [SS]) against the manner and time of the army's intended dealings with his Majesty; arguing there very stiffly, that, upon their own principles, which led them to look upon all legal authority in England as now broken, they could be no better than murderers, in taking away the King's life, though he were never so guilty of the crimes they charged upon him: for, as justice ought to be done, especially for blood, which they then principally charged upon him: so said I, continues he, and still say, it ought to be done justly; for, in case another man murder me, and a day, a week, or a year after, my brother or friend, that is no legal magistrate, executes him therefore, yet this is murder in the eye of the Law, because it was done by a hand which had no authority to do it; and therefore I press'd again and again, seeing themselves acknowledged all legal authority in England was broke, that they would slay his trial, 'till a new and equal free representative, upon the agreement of the well-affected people, that had not fought against their liberties, rights, and freedoms, should be chosen and sit; and then either try him thereby, or else by their Judges, sitting in the court called King's-Bench. When they asked him, How by Law he could have him tried? he told them, that the Law of England expressly says, Whosoever murders or kills another shall die; it doth not say, excepting the King, Queen, or Prince, &c. but indefinitely, whosoever murders shall die; and therefore, where none is excepted, there all men are included in Law: but the King is a man: Ergo, he is included as well as I. To this they objected, that it could hardly be proved, that the King with his own hands killed a man. In answer to which he observed, that, by the Law of England, he that counsels or commissions another to kill a man, is as guilty of the fact as he that does it. And besides the advantage was considerable, of trying the King by the rules of the Law, as it would be sufficient to declare, that no man is born, or justly can be made, lawless; but that even magistrates, as well as people, are subject to the penal as well as the directive part. On the other hand, to try him in an extraordinary way, that has no real footsteps nor paths in our law, would be a thing of extraordinary ill precedent; for why not twenty, upon pretended extraordinary cases, as well as one? and why not a thousand as well as twenty? and extraordinary cases are easily made and pretended by those that are uppermost, though never so unjust in themselves. Add to which, That to try him in an extraordinary way, when the Law hath provided all the essentials of justice in an ordinary way, and merely wants nothing (if it do want (116) that) but twelve Kings as his peers or equals, will nourish and increase in men that erroneous conceit, that magistrates, by the law of God, Nature, and Reason, are not, nor ought to be, subject to the penal part of the law of men, as well as the directive part of it, which is the bane, ruin, and destruction of all the commonwealths in the world (117).

(116) Lilburne plainly suggests here with regard to the army, what Milton did soon after of the Presbyterians, that, by stripping his Majesty of the kingly office and dignity, as they had long ago done, he was reduced to the state and rank of a private man. brought to their trial before the High-Court of Justice. He appeared warmly in their favour against the jurisdiction of that Court [WW]; at the same time he was informed of some violence threatened against his person, in a council of war at Whitehall, about the 22d of February, whereupon he engaged in drawing up his piece called England's new Chains discovered (ddd), and on the 26th of that month accompanied by Walwyn, Prince, and Overton, he presented an Address to the Supreme Authority of England in the House of Commons, containing a frame of new modelling the state, in opposition to that which had been offered there by the army in January preceding (eee), and being ordered to withdraw without receiving an answer [XX], our author published the whole under the last mentioned title [YY], upon which he was committed with his associates to the Tower, March the 29th, 1649. He had not been there long before he joined with them in writing another pamphlet, intitled, The Agreement of the People, which was published on the first of May, with a licence by Gilbert Mabbot [ZZ]. This being followed with several

[WW] He appeared against the jurisdiction of the High-Court of Justice. Considering Lilburne's general temper, it is natural to expect him attending to hear these trials; but, besides his general disposition, he was particularly interested therein, as the method of proceeding against these delinquents, was a fresh instance of the Army's resolution against calling a new Parliament. Upon that account he declares, he was peculiarly pleased with stout Capel, as he calls him, and his gallant defence, in alledging several statutes to prove, that all treasons shall be tried by the common-law, and not by extraordinary ways, but by the declared laws in being, and citing the Petition of Right for the proof thereof. Then looking round about him, and saying, I am an Englishman, and the Law is my inheritance, and the benefit of the Petition of Right my birthright; if so, then, said he, looking upon the President, Where's my jury? I see none of my jury that is to pass upon me; I demand the sight of my jury legally pannelled, as my right by Law, without the verdict of whom I cannot in Law be condemned. After the Court was broke up for that day, our author had several discourses with the prisoners, and sent them divers law-books and law-pleas, with that of Sir John Maynard and the four impeached aldermen, and much pressed some of them to put their lives upon the hazard of a plea and protestation against the jurisdiction of the Court; but, he says, they seemed to him to have promises of their lives, upon conformity to that jurisdiction, and could scarce believe they should die 'till the hour of death came upon them, He further assures us, that some of them sent to desire him to be one of their counsel, to plead for them in matter of Law; to whom he answered, that he could not plead for a justification of their actions (though he confessed there were much in Law to be said for them, especially as the case stood with them), but only against the jurisdiction of the Court. 'And when Holland came to his trial, continues he, a lady, and some other of his friends, came to me to my house about him; but I was still upon the same string, yet sent him word of several particulars, in reference to my trial and arraignment at Oxford *, that was very material to his present cause; and if he would call me as a witness, he should see I would speak my mind freely and effectually, although I smarted for so doing; and he appointed to call me: whereupon, I went into the court, and conveyed word to him I was there; but whether his heart failed him or no, I know not, but he never called me (118).'

Whoever reflects upon the spirit of John Lilburne, and his particular situation at this time, will easily grant, that the slight shewn by these royalists to all his forward offers to appear in their cause, and losing thereby an opportunity of abusing the High-Court of Justice face to face, in the very instant of their exercising that jurisdiction, was none of the least vexatious disappointments and rebuffs that he met with.

[XX] He presented a frame of new modelling the State, which was thrown aside. In his speech on presenting this model, &c. we learn, that the warrants for apprehending them were out at this time. See his words.

Mr Speaker,
I must confess I am to present you with a paper in writing of a new kind; for we have had no longer time to consider of it, than from Thursday last: that day warrants, as we are informed, being out against us to take us, from those that have no power over us, we durst not well go our ordinary way to work, to get subscriptions to it, lest we should be surprized before we could present it to this honourable House, and so be frustrated in that benefit and relief that we justly expect from you; and to present it with a few hands, we judged inconsiderable in your attention, and therefore chose, being in so much haste as we were, to prevent our imminent and present ruin, in person to bring it to your bar, and avowedly to present it here. And therefore, without any further question, give me leave to tell you I own it, and I know so does all the rest of my friends present; and, if any hazard should ensue thereby, give me leave to tell you, I am sorry I have but one life to lose, in maintaining the truth, justice, and righteousness, of so gallant a piece.' The several articles of this model (too long to be inserted here) may be seen in Whitlock's Memoirs, printed not a great many years ago (119). We shall only observe, that the variations from his account in the printed copy now before us, are no ways material, unless it be in article [30], where there are no words that give the least countenance to those of Mr Whitlock, viz. 'No estate to be levelled, nor all things common.'

[YY] He published England's new Chains. This piece was loaded with an additional charge annexed to the end of it, greatly aggravating their offence, as follows:

Friends,
Thus we have adventured to publish our proposal, for the thorough information and benefit of all that adhere unto the common interest of the people, hoping that with such, upon due consideration, it will find as large acceptance as our late petition of September 11, 1648; and we thought good, in regard we were not called in [to the house] to receive an answer to the same, to acquaint you that we intend to second it with a petition, sufficiently subscribed, we doubt not with many thousands, earnestly to solicit there AN EFFECTUAL ANSWER.'

[ZZ] Licensed by Gilbert Mabbot. This licence is dated April 30, 1649 (120), and, as it very probably was a forgery, it seems to have been one of the principal, if not the last, of the kind, which occasioned Mabbot to throw up his place, as he did on the 22d of May following, for four reasons, of which these are the first and last given by him to the Council of State. 'I. Because many thousands of scandalous and malignant pamphlets had been published with his name thereunto, as if he had licensed the same (though he never saw them), on purpose (as he conceives) to prejudice him in his reputation amongst the honest party of this nation. IV. Because it is lawful, in his judgment, to print any booke, sheete, &c. without licensing, so as the authors and printers do subscribe their true names thereunto, that so they may be liable to answer the contents thereof; and if they offend therein, then to be punished by such laws as are or shall be for those cases provided (121).'

In the piece before us, though the imprimatur is dated April 30; yet both the agreement itself, and the introduction to it, called a Preparative to all sorts of people, are dated May 1, 1649, and both are subscribed with the authors names, which are also inserted in the title. There is likewise the Bookseller's name who printed it put at the end (122). We ought not to omit, that there is no such article in this agreement, as that above taken notice of from Mr Whitlock.

ral others notoriously vilifying the conservators of the liberties of England, and Cromwell in particular as their supreme head and master [AAA]; a new act of treason was passed May 14th, and Mr Lilburne's estate seized: many consultations were had from time to time, by the judges and principal lawyers, in pursuance of orders from the Council of State, to consider of the properest and most effectual method to be taken with him. At length, a special commission of Oyer and Terminer was issued to 40 persons, before whom, being brought to his trial [BBB] on the 24th of October at Guild-hall in London, upon an

This spirit of settling the government upon an agreement with the people, evidently rose out of the ashes of the supposed original contract between the King and People, which, upon the extinction of the King, and in him of kingly government, became of course extinct. The plan was not ill digested; and being universally well received by the populace, put Cromwell and the officers in the army to the exercise of their best wits, to prevent the ill consequences of it to their views; especially seeing the Agitators, or Levellers, before this last agreement was published, had carried matters even to a revolt in the army (123). Whereupon, not long after the reduction of those troops to their obedience, by the power of the sword, they set the power of their pen to work, and drew up a Declaration of the proceedings of the General, in reducing the late revolted troops, which was appointed by his Excellency and his Council of War to be printed and published, May the 22d. Wherein making several remarks upon the conduct of the Levellers, they expressed themselves in these terms.

'The grounds and manner of the proceedings of these men, that have so much pretended for the liberty of the people, have been as followeth:

'There was a paper filed the Agreement of the People, framed by certain select persons, and debated at a General Council of the officers of the army, to be tendered to the Parliament, and to be by them commended over to the People of the nation; it being hoped, that such an expedient, if assented unto at least by the honest part of the people, that had appeared for this common cause, to which God hath so witnessed, it would have tended much to the settlement and composing of our differences; at least have fixed honest men to such grounds of certainty, as might have kept them firm and entire in opposing the common enemy, and stand united to publick interest.

'The General Council of the army, and the other sorts of men, going then under the name of Levellers (124), who (by their late actions have made good the same which we then judged but an imputation) had (as now it appears) different ends and aims both in the matter and manner of their proceedings. That which was intended by those men was, to have somewhat tendered as a test and coercion upon the people, and all sorts of men and authorities in the land: that which these, to wit, the Council of the army, aimed at, was, to make an humble representation of such things, as were then likely to give satisfaction and unity, and might be remitted to mens judgments, to be owned or disowned, as men were satisfied in their consciences, and as it shall please God to let men see reason for their so doings, that so it might not be only called an agreement, but thro' the freedom of it be one indeed, and receive it's stamp of approbation from the Parliament, to whom it was humbly submitted.

'Hereupon, those other men took so much dissatisfaction, that they forthwith printed and spread abroad their paper, which was different from that of the army, using all possible means to make the same to passe, but with how little effect is very well known. And finding, by the armie's application to the Parliament, that they were likely, according to their duty, to stand by and own them as the supreme authority of the nation, they have by all means assayed to vilipend that authority, presenting them to the people in printed libels, and otherwise, as worse tyrants than any who were before them.'

To this harangue our coryphaeus replied in an Epistle to Lenthal, dated June 8 following, and printed, as the title holds forth, 'in the grand year of hypocriticall and abominable dissimulation.' (1.) That this is a false narrative of the original occasion of that agreement mentioned in remark [UU], as appears from the account there given, the truth of which he

stakes his life to make good, namely, that the little which the officers of the army did in it, they were drawn into it as a bear to the stake, and 'which, says he, as the sequel shews, they undertook merely to 'quiet and please us, like children with rattles, 'till they had done their main work; viz. either in annihilating or purging the House, to make it fit for their purpose, and in destroying the King, unto both which they never had our consent in the least; and then totally lay it aside, as they have done, as being then able to do what they pleased, whether we would or no.' He then proceeds to shew, (2.) That the Levellers paper was published before that of the Army was presented to the House, agreeably to his former account of this matter in the remark just mentioned. (3.) That the Levellers dissatisfaction was not taken at the army's presenting their paper to the Parliament, but declared above a month by himself in their open Council, and presented also in writing to the General, on the 28th of December, 1648. (4.) That 'Whereas they say, continues he, we used all possible means to make ours passe, but with how little successe is very well known. If they mean, we used all possible means to make ours pass with them, it is true; but the reason it had no better effect was, because it was too honest for them; and I am sure in the very epistle to it, it is declared, that the principal reason of printing it is, that the people might have an opportunity to consider the equitie of it, and offer their reasons against any thing therein contained. (5.) They say, We are troubled at their doing their duty, in submitting to authority, and owning the Parliament as the supreme authority of the nation, whenas, alas! it is as visible as the sun when it shines in it's glory, that Corah, Dathan, and Abiram, nor John of Leyden and Neperdullion Jack Straw, nor Watt Tyler, can never be put in the ballance, for rebellions and treasons against all sorts of magistracy, with the General and his Council (125).'

[AAA] Several pamphlets against the Government, and Cromwell in particular.] These were intitled, (1.) An Impeachment of High Treason against Oliver Cromwell, and his son-in-law Henry Ireton. (2.) The Legal and Fundamental Liberties of the People of England, revised, asserted, and vindicated, &c. (3.) A Preparative to a Hue and Cry after Sir Arthur Haslerig. (4.) An Outcry of the Young Men and Apprentices of London: or, an Inquisition after the lost fundamental Laws and Liberties of England, directed August 29, 1649, in an Epistle to the private Soldiers of the Army, especially all those that signed the solemn Engagement at Newmarket-Heath, the fifth of June, 1647; but more especially the private Soldiers of the General's Regiment of Horse, that helped to plunder and destroy the honest and true-hearted Englishmen, traitorously defeated at Burford the 15th of May, 1649. (5.) A Salva Libertate, addressed to the Lieutenant of the Tower in September. Besides these, which were all produced at his trial, he had, upon the creation of the Council of State, printed a piece intitled, The Picture of the Council of State, of which a second edition with additions was published the following year.

[BBB] Being brought to his trial he was acquitted.] Mr Lilburne made several attempts to stave off this trial after the day for it was fixed (126). The first attempt was in a paper, which he afterwards published with the title of, The Innocent Man's first Professor, directed to William Hewingham, Esq; of Hewingham in Suffolk, dated October 20; wherein he proposes to refer the matter to two judges, one to be chosen by himself, and the other by his persecutor the Attorney-General, promising to stand to their award, provided he may have two friends to take notes of all that passed. In a postscript he protests his innocence, in respect of being a confederate with Prince Charles (as he calls him), in answer to a pamphlet lately published by an indictment of high-treason, after a hearing of three days, in which the facts alledged against him, notoriously and flagrantly treasonable against that government, were clearly proved, by one Thomas May, charging him with such a confederacy. The next was in a Petition presented October 22 to the House, by his wife and his brother Robert, promising he should withdraw himself with his family into some foreign country, provided the money due to him from the State was given to him. This was followed the same day, by the Innocent Man's Second Profer, by himself; where he adds to their proposal another condition, that all such as were willing to transplant themselves with him, should be allowed that liberty, and also have all their demands of moneys in arrears from the State paid to them; and further, that such as were poor, and willing to attend him, should have some reasonable allowance of money for that end. The next in order was a Petition, October 23, of the well-affected in and about the cities of London and Westminster, and parts adjacent, presenters and approvers of the late Petition of the 11th of September, &c. This is a kind of remonstrance, declaring the Parliament's unjust proceedings in persecuting him, and averring his undoubted right to be discharged. After this, another petition was presented the same day, singly by his brother Robert, praying only a suspension of his trial, 'till he should be able to convince him of his mistakes, or, if not, prevail with him to leave the kingdom. Last of all, Mrs Lilburne, almost distracted with the fear of losing her comfort, pressed him (as did also one Mr Valentine and some other friends) to stoop as low as possibly he could to save his life, in which her's was lock'd up. Whereupon, moved by her bitter mourning and crying, and the beholding the anguish of spirit of her that had been so faithful and hazardous a yoak-fellow to him in his above seven years sorrow, wrung from him, with much ado, the following letter to Mr Lenthal the Speaker.

'Honoured Sir,

'As a man, being at present somewhat confounded in myself, through a strong confidence of my own innocency, having suffered above measure, but intentionally done injury unto none, and press'd under, with the importunity of friends, especially with the heart-breaking sighs of my dear but even half-distracted wife; as, when my late children lay in a most disconsolate condition (which ended their lives), your House did me the favour to grant me my liberty (127) to visit them, which I think was the saving of her life: so now, greater importunities lying upon me from divers, and her that is dearer unto me than many lives, I as earnestly treat you to move your House, in the most effectual manner you can, that my trial (so suddenly intended) may for some reasonable time be suspended, that so I may have time to hear and consider, what many of them say they have to offer by way of reason and argument, to persuade me to what at present my conscience is not convinced of. And I should likewise be desirous, if your House should judge convenient, that some competent number of gentlemen of your House might be permitted to debate with me those particulars, wherein I have appeared most to differ with other mens judgments; whereby, possibly, rational arguments may be so strongly urged, as, peradventure, may give such satisfaction, as may tend to the reconciling many differences: upon the knowledge of the acceptance of which, during all that time of suspension of trial, I do hereby faithfully promise not in the least to disturb those that shall grant me this favour, being not so apt to make disturbance as is conceived; and herein you will exceedingly oblige,

From the Tower of London, this 24th of Octob.

'S I R,

'Yours, to serve you,

'JOHN LILBURNE.'

When this last effort to respite the trial was found ineffectual, this faithful wife went, at his request, amongst their friends, to try their influence upon the jury.

'Tis no wonder, that all applications proved ineffectual to avoid his trial, since, as Lord Clarendon informs us, though Cromwell could bear ill language and reproaches with less disturbance and concernment than any person in authority had ever done; yet the persecutions Lilburne exercised him with, made him plainly discern, that it would be impossible to preserve his dignity, or to have any security in the government, if his licentiousness continued; and therefore he had set spies upon him, to observe his actions and likewise his words; and, upon advice with the Counsel at Law of the State, being confidently informed, that, as well by the old established laws, as by new ordinances, Lilburne was guilty of high-treason, and had forfeited his life, if he were prosecuted in any court of justice, he caused him to be sent to Newgate, and the next sessions to be indicted of high-treason; ordered all the Judges to be present, and the Counsel at Law to enforce the evidence, and all care to be taken for the return of such a jury, as might be fit for the importance of the cause. His Lordship then proceeds to give the following account of our author's behaviour at his trial. 'Lilburne appeared undaunted, and, with the confidence of a man that was to play a prize before the people for their own liberty, he pleaded 'Not guilty, and heard all the charge and evidence against him with patience enough, save that, by interrupting the Lawyers sometimes, who prosecuted him, and by sharp answers to some questions of the Judges, he shewed, that he had no reverence for their persons, nor any submission to their authority. 'The whole day was spent in his trial; and, when he came to make his defence, he mingled so much Law in his discourse*, to invalidate their authority, and to make it appear so tyrannical, that neither their lives, liberties, nor estates, were in any degree secure, whilst that usurpation was exercised; and answered all the matters objected to him with such an assurance, making them to contain nothing of high-treason, and that to be a government against which high-treason could not be committed; and telling them, that all free-born Englishmen were obliged to oppose this tyranny, as he had done heartily for their sakes, and that he had done it only for their [the Jury's] sakes, and to preserve them from slavery, contrary to his own private and worldly interest. 'He told them how much he had been in Cromwell's friendship, and that he might have received any benefit or preferment from him, if he would have fat still, and seen his country enslaved; which, because he would not, he was brought thither to have his life taken from him by their judgment, which he apprehended not. In short, he defended himself with that vigour, and charmed the Jury so powerfully, that, against all the directions and charge the Judges could give them (who assured them, that the words and actions fully proved against the prisoner were high-treason by the Law, and that they were bound by the all obligations of conscience to find him guilty), after no long consultation between themselves, they returned with their verdict that he was not guilty, nor could they be persuaded by the Judges to change or recede from their verdict, which infinitely angered and perplexed Cromwell; and, as this account concludes, though Lilburne was then acquitted in 1653, yet Cromwell would never suffer him to be set at liberty, as by the law he ought to have been, but sent him from prison to prison, and kept him inclosed there 'till he himself died.' Thus that noble historian, whose design herein was to shew the impotency of the protector in the height of his power: and we need not repeat the mistakes therein, which the reader will easily correct, by what he sees afterwards observed in this memoir.

After his acquittal (128), being conveyed back to the Tower under the additional guard of three companies of foot, he was attended with the loudest acclamations of the people, who made many bonfires in the city (129). And soon after his discharge he printed the trial, prefixing thereto, by way of triumph, a print of himself at full length, standing at the Bar with Coke's Institutes in his hand, the book which he had made use of to prove that flattering doctrine, which he applied with singular address to the Jury (130), that in them alone was inherent the judicial power of the Law as well as fact. In the same print, over his head, are proved, he was fully acquitted by the jury; the people present, with extraordinary acclamations of joy, testifying their approbation thereof; and he was discharged from the Tower by an order of the Council of State on the 8th of November (fff). Shortly after this, having recovered his estate from Sir Arthur Haslerig [CCC], he undertook the management of a dispute in law, in which his uncle George Lilburne happened then to be engaged with that Baronet (g g g). While this cause was depending, he published a pamphlet in the beginning of August, intitled, A just Reproof to Haberdashers-Hall, &c. therein charging Sir Arthur, with several base practices [DDD] in the proceedings thereon.

* 'Tis observable, that, in the point of Law, Lilburne often quotes Lord Clarendon's speech for abolishing the Court of York; which may be seen in his article, remark [H].

(130) He concludes his defence with a full reliance on his jury, as his sole judges and keepers of his life, at whose hands the Lord would require his blood, in case they left any part of his indictment to the cruel and bloody men upon the bench, above the received doctrine of those times. Ibid. p. 147.

(127) The urging of this favour, as a precedent to procure another, would, in almost any other person's life, be a distinguishing mark of confident assurance, since he made use of that favour to disperse one of the very pamphlets for which he was now indicted. See his trial, p. 79.

seen the two faces of a medal, upon one of which is inscribed the names of the Jury, and, on the other, these words: John Lilburne, saved by the power of the Lord, and the integrity of his Jury, who are Judge of Law as well as Fact, October 26, 1649. It is observable, that this practice of exalting the power and dignity of a Jury, was a fundamental part of the Levellers scheme; and therefore, a little before this trial of Lilburne, we find Colonel Martin, a principal man among them, causing the Jury at Reading, after they were sworn, to put on their hats before the Judges as their right, declaring they were the then chief Judges in the Court, and those on the Bench inferior to them.

[CCC] Having recovered his estate from Sir Arthur Haslerig.] This Baronet, soon after the new act for treason abovementioned was passed, had stopped payment of the profits arising from the sequestrated estates, out of which his reparations had been ordered by the Parliament; but he was no sooner cleared upon his trial, than he resolved to have satisfaction. To which purpose, meeting Sir Arthur's clerk in Channel-row, Westminster, he desired him before witness, as he loved his master's life and welfare, to tell him, that he [Lilburne] wore a good dagger by his right side, and a good rapier by his left; and if within eight days he did not send him all his money, or give him some rational satisfaction, let him look to himself; for, after the time mentioned, wherever he met him, he would pay him for all together, though he were cut in 1000 pieces on the spot. 'And, continues he, in case by my fair dealing with him, and telling him my intentions beforehand, he gets me committed to prison, and thereby thinks to defend me to deal with him, he will be very much mistaken; for thereby the hand would only be changed.' Hereupon, within the time limited, he received a warrant, signed by Sir Arthur and Colonel George Fenwick, to the Treasurer of Newcastle, to pay him or his assigns about 800 pounds, which he accordingly received (131).

[DDD] He charged Sir Arthur with several base practices, in his piece intitled, A just Reproof to Haberdashers-Hall] The dispute mentioned in the text, between our author's uncle George and Sir Arthur, came before the commissioners for compounding delinquents estates, of whom Sir Arthur was the chief, who sat at Haberdashers-Hall. Therefore in this piece, a state of the case is represented, together with the proceeding therein; by which it appears, that George Lilburne with others, having, in 1647, purchased of one Josiah Primate, the immediate lessee, a rich colliery (132) at Harraton near Sunderland in the bishopric of Durham, this estate was seized in 1649 by Sir Arthur Haslerig, who acted in the committee of sequestrations (133) in that county, under pretence that it belonged to one Wray, under the title of Sir John Hedworth, Knight, then proved to be a delinquent; from whom an appeal was made by Primate to the aforesaid commissioners in June 1650, and, after several delays, a petition presented to them, to bring the cause to a hearing in February following; upon which it was appointed to be heard in June 1651. In the interim, our author rode almost fourscore miles a day towards Durham, to fetch up witnesses in such weather, that the wind and hail-stones had like to have beat out both his eyes, 'one of which, says he, I could never since perfectly recover (134).' But the hearing being still deferred upon one pretence or other (135) by the commissioners, Mr Primate presented a petition to the Parliament, the 22 of July, praying them either to put him into possession of the said colliery, upon security given to be answerable for the profits, in case the said mines should hereafter appear to be duly sequestrable, or otherwise, that the commissioners for compounding may be commanded to hear and determine the matter, or else, in case of further delay, that Sir Arthur Haslerig, &c. may be compelled to give him good security for the profits, as well as his damages and expences, in case the said colliery be adjudged to be his [the petitioner's], or that they would permit him to take his remedy at-Law against Sir Arthur, without controul by the committee of Indemnity (136). And (as the petition concludes), 'That you will take care to maintain the honour and dignity of Parliament (which doth consist in doing justice and right without respect of persons), by dealing with Sir Arthur according to his demerit, in case your petitioner shall fully make it appear to your honours, or some of your committees, that Sir Arthur hath merely acted arbitrarily, and without all shadow of Law or Justice, in taking your petitioner's right and propriety from him; himself and his own private gain and interest being principally at the bottom of these his proceedings.' Our author herein mentions several instances, besides the proceedings in this cause, of Sir Arthur's injustice and oppression, committed without any order, ordinances, or act of Parliament, against his family and others also, and wishes the four northern counties would petition the Parliament to confiscate his suddenly and ill-gotten large estate (137), to make satisfaction to the persons injured by him; declaring, that, by making one of his tools High-Sheriff, he had got possession of their bodies and estates, and by another tool, Wols the Commiffary, had made himself Archbishop of their souls, and made sure of almost all the pulpits and tythes in the country. To this purpose, in 1659, there was published University Queries; one of which was, Whether Sir Arthur Haslerig might not invert this sentence, The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up, into this, my zeal hath eaten up thine house.

(136) A committee erected for such purposes, and which held out a never-failing screen in behalf of their favourites.

(137) On the other hand, it appears from this piece, that Sir Arthur did not spare to charge the Lilburnes, our author's father and uncle, with having defrauded the state of 12000l. a year of sequestrated lands, p. 52.

Some time after this just-mentioned petition, the cause was heard and judgment given by the commissioners, which occasioned Mr Primate's second petition to the Parliament, delivered by our author as abovementioned; and the consequence of that (according to his account) was, the act for his perpetual banishment. It is observed of an eminent Spanish History-Painter, that his pictures, on account of the ill-chosen cruelty of the subject, had too sanguinary and shocking a likeness. In the piece of our author now under consideration, the choice of his subject was not so free as that of the painter, being wrung from him by a sense of his own injuries, as well as those of his friends and nearest relations; but the remark is equally just, that in it he has exhibited too lively a representation of the extreme miseries brought upon the northern counties, through the distraction of these lawless times. We see here, in the person of Sir Arthur Haslerig, iniquity bearing down all opposition, till it became thoroughly established by a continued series of many formally legal processes and judgments, glorying uncontrouled, and triumphing fearlessly and shamelessly in those counties. 'Tis true, the transcendent wickedness of this Baronet is amply displayed by Lord Clarendon in many instances; but we thought it not impertinent to add another, not commonly known, wherein our author and his family were particularly concerned. There is a postscript to this piece, wherein Mr Lilburne observes truly enough, that he has not meddled therein with the Parliament, and hopes he stands now as right in their eye as any man in England, 'having, he says, of late done all such actions in respect and obedience to them, as is fitting for a wife man, or a man of conscience or honour, to do, to take off all their jealousies from him.' And 'tis evident he stood very well at this time with Cromwell, who, having absolutely crushed the Levellers faction in the army in 1649 (138), had the year following, 1650, procured a new grant of some lands, to make good the residue of our author's reparations; for which favour he took an opportunity of returning his publick thanks in this piece, p. 6. And it also will appear presently, that he had some private friendly conferences with that grand antagonist about this time.

(iii) Our author, in the last cited piece, tells us, this act was passed purely as a punishment for his petition; but it is not improbable, that he had torney-General thereon. And in the further prosecution of this affair, he delivered to several members at the door of the House of Commons the same year, a petition, setting forth, that the said Baronet had overawed a Committee appointed for trying this cause, to give a false judgment contrary to the plain evidence before them (bbb). On the 15th of January, the Parliament gave a judgment for fining him in the sum of 7000 pound to the state, and banishing him the kingdom (iii), upon which he retired from London and crossed the water to Amsterdam, where he presently saw in the news-papers the act which passed on the 30th for the execution of that judgment (kkk). During his exile he fell into conversation with several of the royal party, before whom he spoke very freely, both against the then reigning powers in England, and in favour of the King [EEE]. He wrote also a paper given some foundation for creating a jealousy, that he had favoured the King's attempt for a restoration at this time; and we find the At- observing, at Christopher Love's trial, that Lilburne had been with him in the Tower as his Counsel. See remark [EEE].

[E E E] He spoke freely of the reigning powers, and in favour of the King.] The following observations, 'tis supposed, will put this assertion beyond all reasonable doubt, and, at the same time, serve to explain the full meaning of it. In the first place, we find him frequently, in the books written by him after the King's death, declaring, it would be better for the nation to have Prince Charles seated in his father's throne, upon certain conditions to be stipulated by him, than to continue under the tyrannical proceedings of the Parliament and Army (139). Particularly in his impeachment of Cromwell and Ireton, &c. where, after the warmest exhortations to his friends to set up the Agreement of the People as their banner, and bravely to fight under it, but neither for the Prince nor Parliament, unless he or they gave good security for adhering firmly to those principles, he proceeds in the following terms. 'And upon such terms I do not see, but you may justifiably, before God and man, joyne with the Prince himself, who, if we must have a King, I, for my part, had rather have the Prince than any man in the world, because of his large pretence of right; which, if he came not in by conquest by the hands of foreigners, the bare attempting of which may apparently hazard him the loss of all at once, by glewing together the now divided people to joyne as one man against him; but by the hands of Englishmen, by contract, upon the premises aforesaid (which is easily to be done), the people will easily see, that presently thereupon they will enjoy this transcendent benefit, (he being at peace with all foreign nations, and having no regall pretended competitors) viz. the immediately disbanding of all armies and garrisons, saving the old cinqueports; and foe those three grand plagues of the people will cease, viz. free-quarter, taxations, and excise, by means of which the people may once againe really say, they can enjoy something they can in good earnest call their own; whereas, for the present army to set up the pretended false Saint Oliver, (or any other) as their elected King, there will be nothing thereby but wars, and the cutting of throats year after year (140).' Agreeably to this doctrine, in the informations given against him after his return home concerning this matter now before me, it appears, that he had frequent conferences with Lord Hopton, Colonel Titus, Duke of Buckingham, Sir Charles Lloyd, and others; wherein he undertook, as the examiners all agree, if they would procure him 10000 pounds, he would destroy the Commonwealth of England, and settle the King upon his throne in a few months, or he would have a piece of him nailed upon every post in Bruges [they mostly resided in that town during his exile], calling Cromwell and the Parliament a false company of rogues, and said, that if the King would but observe what he had set down in some papers, shewing the reason why he [Lilburne] would not be a Cavalier, and reform but them, he might easily do his business and sit in his chair. Here we see the restoring of the King is, by intimation, put upon the same condition as before, viz. that of his subscribing to some instrument like the agreement of the people; and, by comparing these two evidences, we may know how to supply Mr Wood, and how to understand Mr Winstanley, upon this subject. The first of whom says, he became at this time acquainted with the Duke of Buckingham, Colonel Titus, Lord Hopton, &c. (141) Mr Winstanley goes farther, and relates the negotiation, as he calls it, to restore the King, but, without taking notice of the condition annexed, declares his disbelief of the report: for, says he, besides his own denial, I cannot conceive he should have any thought that party would trust him, especially with such a sum of money, having before declared himself so great an enemy to the late King (142). But, as to his denial, let us see his own words, as they stand in his petition already mentioned to the House of Commons, July 12, 1653, after he was taken up and sent to Newgate, in order to his trial for returning to England. In the conclusion of which he says, 'He hopes they will not be hindered, through any suspicions of his compliance with Charles Stuart or his party; a poisonous ingredient, that his adversaries have always in readiness to cast in his dish, though they know it to be as false as hell, and believe not themselves in this their Machiavilian report. Your petitioner, continues he, professes, as in the presence of the Lord, before whom he knows he must render a strict account of the secretest and closest of his actions, that he returned into his native country with no worse a resolution, to the true and universal welfare thereof, than he engaged at first in the late Parliament's quarrel against the King, and with a ferocious resolution to live privately and still upon his own, without intermeddling in any other affairs.' He also declares, in another part of the same petition, 'That, whatever liberties forever he has taken in discourse or company with any opposite party, yet he never in the least staggered in his fidelity to the cause of liberty and freedom that he first engaged in.' Whoever has dipped the least into our author's writings, and considers the nature of the condition there annexed to his promises in favour of Charles Stuart, will need no comment to shew the mental reservation couched under this seeming denial; and he must be little acquainted with the supreme vanity of Lilburne's spirit (a), who cannot conceive he should be capable of entertaining any thoughts, that the royal party would trust him with such a sum as 10000 pounds. Lastly, as to his declaration of enmity against the late King, his writings after the King's death, and before too, are continually stuffed with declarations of much greater enmity against the reigning powers that succeeded him, particularly calling them far greater tyrants than ever he was. Upon the whole, it must be observed, the accusation charged upon him by his enemies as to this matter was, that of being confederate with Prince Charles, to restore him to the throne upon the old establishment. This he calls setting up his absolute will and prerogative in the nation; in answer to which he declares, 'That if, to oppose all interests whatsoever, that would set up a single man or more to rule and govern by will and pleasure, without bounds, limits, checks, or controul, be sufficient cause to be judged a Cavalier and for Prince Charles, then must I ingenuously confess I am such a Cavalier, and hope so to die (143).' But to set the Prince upon the throne, with a power limited by his scheme of an agreement with the people, as it was not intirely inconsistent with the ground and foundation of his former professions against kingly government in general; so, surely, it cannot be inconceivable, that the bright

(a) Among thousands of other instances, the following is a most remarkable one of this vain confidence. In his Legal and Fundamental Liberties, printed in June 1649, p. 19, complaining of some of his old friends, who were lately become Cromwell's creatures, and had published a book called Walsby's Wiles, representing our author therein, as a frothy, light, giddy headed, fellow, easily deluded and drawn aside, being of no depth in himself, he proceeds thus: I am confident there is no two men in England that know me, whose confidences are more perswaded of the falsity of that their own assertion in every particular, than Mr Rozer and Master Kiffin are, if they would speak the truth from their very hearts; the whole stream of my actions, extraordinary well known to both of them for these twelve or thirteen years together, being as a large demonstration, that I understand the things I go about.

a paper which he called an Apology for himself, and printing it sent it in a letter to Cromwell, wherein he charged the Lord General with being the principal instrument in procuring the just mentioned act [FFF]. Upon the dissolution of the long Parliament, he set all his engines at work, to obtain a pass for England [GGG], which proving ineffectual, he returned home without one in the beginning of June 1653, and was apprehended at London by the Lord-Mayor's warrant on the 15th (111), upon which he printed a plea on the 28th, asserting the nullity of the act for his banishment, for want of a legal power in the Parliament that passed it, and being committed to Newgate in July, he sent thence a petition on the 12th to the newly erected Parliament, praying a discharge from them; but that being neglected, he was brought on the 20th of August to his trial before the sessions at the Old-Bailey; where, however, upon making the same plea as before, and moreover that he was not legally shewn, by reason of a kind of misnomer in the indictment (m m m), to be the person mentioned in the act, he was a second time acquitted by the jury [HHH]. Notwithstanding this he was shortly after conducted of his animosity, at the time of his banishment, to his grand rival Cromwell, should carry him to propose such a restoration of the King to the royal party; or that the impulses of his natural vanity should raise in him a confidence of being able to effectuate the proposal, by virtue of his influence over the people. The strength of which also evidently appeared upon his trial afterwards. But we do not find by the depositions, that the proposal was embraced by the Royalists; on the contrary, they are represented therein, arguing against the project as in no wise feasible.

[FFF] A letter to Cromwell.] The letter was as follows:

My Lord,

At my discourse with you in your gallery about five or six months ago, I had thought I had given your Lordship a full satisfaction in every thing that might remove all jealousies from you, of my deserving you in any kind; that, of all men in the Parliament, I little imagined to have found your honor to be the principall man to banish me into a strange country, where, for the safety of my life, I am forced to print an apology; and, because you are named in it, I judge it but man-like to send you a copy of it; and, if I had not been travelling last post-day, I had sent it you then; and I have also, by this post, sent to a friend three sheets of paper in writing, to communicate to your Lordship; the which, if you please to read them, you will find, that you are deeply concerned in them. I have no more to say to your Honour, but to desire God for you, if it be his pleasure, to make you speedily as righteous in actions, as you were some years agoe in declarations; and to take leave to say, I am yet as much honest John Lilburne as ever I was in my life, that neither loves flattery nor fears greatness or threatnings (144).

[GGG] He set all his engines at work to procure a pass.] The following letter, printed with the above-mentioned depositions, gives some light into this affair.

To my dear and loving wife Mrs Elizabeth Lilburne, these, with haste to London.

My dear Love,

I have been, and yet am, in a lingring condition to hear from thee; but I confess by this post I have nothing to expect from thee, more than to hear that thou art safely got amongst our friends at London; where I hope your joint activity will be such (according to my full instructions to you, and my true friend that went with you) as that you will procure my expected pass so speedily, as to send it me, or a copy of it, with my friend's encouragement, to Dunkirk the next post; where, by God's assistance, I will be on Sunday next at night; and if it come, 'tis more than probable I may come to Dover that packet (or certainly send you word when, by God's gracious permission, I shall), for I long to see London; and if I come so suddenly, I shall leave all my things behind me, in the care and possession of Mr Lambert, for which I can either come over myself again or send for them. One reason that moves me to make the more haste is, because if I come over, and find things in a handsome way to my liking, I have something to say very speedily to such a great faithful man as I shall trust, and if I come I shall stay at Dover a day, or two, or three, and by the post let you know I am there, and expect you to send me a horse to Canterbury, where at the post-house I intend to lye the first night, and shall not stir from thence 'till I receive a horse from you. But if our new Council of State or Governors* will not cast a favourable eye upon me, and either deny or delay me a passe, so that the next post I hear not of it, I shall take it for granted, that Major-General Harrison being, as I hear, one of your new Council of State, is my principallest and grandest adverfarie; and accordingly I shall onely take arise (from what I have been informed he said at my banishment, and what he said publicly at Allhallowes, when from Dover I sent my letter to the people that meet there) to write him such a letter (which already in my brain I have conceived) as will no way please him, let the issue be what it will. I have writ again to Major-General Lambert (who I hear is President of your new Council), and inclosed him one of my printed epistles in Dutch and English. I have also writ to Colonel Bennet, which you may read the copy of on the other side.

Soe with my hearty and true love and affection presented to thee, and all my friends in the bulk, longing above measure to hear from thee, I commit thee and my poor babes (145), as my own soul, to the protection of the Most High, and rest thy faithful and loving husband,

J. L.

I have herewith inclosed one of my printed letters, which I hope are before now printed at London. I have already sent two copies of this two several waies for fear of miscarriage.

I am in hast and can't read this over, therefore pray mend the faults, if there be any.

[HHH] A second time acquitted by the jury.] This second acquittal was a more remarkable evidence of Lilburne's extraordinary interest in the people than the former, and must needs provoke Cromwell much more, since it was done evidently in contempt of his power, at a time when he was actually in full possession of the supremacy, and was formally invested therewith soon after (146). It is observable, that, at the end of our author's petition to the House of Commons 12 July, he printed an account of the proceedings before the Lord-Mayor at his commitment to Newgate. Having taken notice, that the marshal who apprehended him had declared, that he was over-awed to swear against his will, to the identity of his [Lilburne's] person, and that another evidence to it was a Scotch parson, who had been formerly committed to the Gate-House as a felon, for returning to England without a special licence, contrary to an ordinance making such return felony, he concludes, 'Therefore, Reader, judge seriously of the most blood-thirsty malice of the above-said conspirators [the Mayor and Recorder of London, and the Attorney-General, and their chief setters on], against poor Mr Lilburne's life, who, if he were the man meant in the act of banishment, it is but a poor English felon, who may expect in reason more favour than a Scotch traitor.' Here we see that irreconcilable animosity to the covenanters still subsisting in Lilburne, after Cromwell had perfectly to Portsmouth, in order for transportation, but giving security to behave himself quietly for the future, was suffered to return [III]: after which he settled at Eltham in Kent, and joining the Quakers, preached among that sect there, and sometimes at Woolwich and the places adjacent, till his death (nnn), which happened at Eltham, August 29th 1657, in the thirty-ninth year of his age. Two days after, his corps was conveyed to a house called the Mouth near Aldersgate in London, at that time the usual meeting place of the Quakers. Here it was warmly debated whether his coffin should be covered with a hearse cloth, which being carried in the negative, it was conveyed without one to the then new burial-place in Moor-Fields, near the place now called Old Bedlam, and interred there, four thousand persons attending the burial (ooo). The character given by Mr Wood of our author, appears from his history to be very just, That 'he was from his youth much addicted to contention, novelties, opposition of government, and to violent and bitter expressions; that growing up, he became for a time the idol of the factious people, being naturally a great trouble-world in all the variety of governments. That he grew to be a hodge-podge of religion, the chief ring-leader of the Levellers, a great proposal maker and modeller of state, and publisher of several seditious pamphlets.' But the remark upon him, attributed by this writer to Judge Jenkins, as spoken in a reproachful way, we are informed by Mr Rushworth, 'was said in Mr Lilburne's favour by his friend Sir Henry Martin: That if there were none living but him, John would be against Lilburne, and Lilburne against John (ppp). Lord Clarendon, who judged our author not unworthy of a place in a history of the civil wars, having observed that he was a person of much more considerable importance than Wildman, and that Cromwell found it absolutely necessary to his own dignity effectually to crush him, concludes his account of him in the following terms. 'This instance of a person not otherwise considerable is thought pertinent to be inserted, as an evidence of the temper of the nation, and how far the spirits at that time [1653] were from paying a submission to that power, when no body had the courage to lift up their hands against it.' We have taken notice in the course of this memoir, that our author likewise complains heavily of this cowardliness in general, and particularly of his party on that very account. Indeed one main design in enlarging upon this article, was to produce a large variety of instances, which may serve as a commentary to the History of the Rebellion, the plan of which would not admit of being so particular. Another principal end herein, has been to give a series of proofs not commonly known, of the infinite guile and subtlety of Cromwell, which, joined to an enthusiastic confidence that he should always accomplish his designs in every instance, carried that arch-dissembler at length through a sea of difficulties, into the full possession of a despotic supremacy.

perfectly subdued the force of both parties by his subtilty, in encouraging them to dash themselves against each other, till both were broken in pieces, and thereby made way for himself to enter at the breach, and take full possession of the fort.

[III] Upon security for his good behaviour he was suffered to return.] Mr Wood, from whom we have the account of this particular, does not inform us who or what was his security, his author, undoubtedly, not being able to furnish any thing certain upon that head. But, as this author appears to be Lilburne's nephew Richard, second son to his brother Robert, we have not scrupled, against the authority of Lord Clarendon (147), to insert in the text the matter of his testimony as far as it reaches. And here, in the notes, we shall venture a step further, there being sufficient grounds for raising such a conjecture concerning the particular person who gave the security mentioned, as will not, it is conceived, be obnoxious to the imputation of facility. Nay, we cannot but think that the reader, by perusing what has been already observed in the course of this memoir, is beforehand with us in pointing out the man; since he must have seen our author's brother Robert, not only concurring in general with him in his opinion of men and things, and particularly pushing his scheme of settling the government as far as he durst, and till he saw Cromwell absolutely resolved against it, but even (which is directly to the present purpose) carrying his affection and concern for his brother so far, as to offer to be his bail, in the view of obtaining thereby a suspension of his trial in 1649, and afterwards constantly standing at his side to assist him therein, in an open disregard of the displeasure of the court frequently declared thereat. Add to this, on the other hand, that he appears to have been always well esteemed in the army, held at this time a considerable rank in it (148), and bad particularly obliged Cromwell, by yielding, not only to have his name put into the list of the late King's Judges, but also actually sitting upon the Bench at his trial and condemnation. Laying then all these circumstances together, can there be any reasonable doubt who was the person that averred Cromwell's wrath against our author, and saved him from transportation, and, after going through an uncommon variety of storms, tempests, and shipwrecks, settling the weather-beaten vessel in a peaceful and still harbour; where, partly through a full conviction, that all possibility of success in any further strugglings against his grand adversary was cut off, and chiefly out of a religiously affectionate regard for his entirely beloved brother who stood responsible for him, he passed the remainder of his days in perfect tranquillity, equally undisturbed by and undisturbing his triumphant competitor (149). Mr Wood informs us, that our author's family was continued in the descendants of his brother Robert; but Robert himself being tried and attainted after the Restoration, for having been one of the King's judges, whilst his father was living, the estate at Thicketley devolved upon Robert's children by his wife Margaret, daughter of Henry Beke of Hadenham in Bucks, Gent. which were, 1. Robert, born anno 1650; Richard, born in 1652; Ephraim, born about 1662, &c. all which were living in 1688; and their father, the Major-General, being banished to the island of St Nicolas (150) near Plymouth, spending the remainder of his days in that confinement; and, dying there in August 1665, aged 52 years or thereabouts, was buried, as his son Richard believed, at Plymouth (151).

(150) At his trial he acknowledged the fact, and urged his ignorance of laws as his excuse; said he was for withdrawing the Court when the King moved it, and that on the day of the King's death he retired to his chamber and mourned for it, upon which account his life was granted. LILLY [JOHN], a writer of some fame in the XVIth century, and by many accounted one of the first reformers of the English tongue (a), was born in the Wild of Kent, about the year 1553; and at sixteen was entered of Magdalen-College Oxford, where he became either a demy or a clerk; but his genius being entirely turned to poetry, he neglected the academical studies of logic and philosophy. Yet he looked so far into them, as to qualify himself for his degrees, of which he took that of Bachelor of Arts, April 27th, 1573 (b), and that of Master, June 1st, 1575 (c); at which time, he was esteemed a noted wit in the university. How long he continued there afterwards is unknown, but he seems to complain of having received some ill treatment from that university (d), and also informs us, that he removed to Cambridge [A]. Four years after, i. e. in 1579, we find him a follower of the Court, and a favourite of the Great; by whose interest he was recommended to Queen Elizabeth, who honoured the performance of several of his comedies with her presence [B]. The first thing he offered to the publick, was a work divided into two parts, one called Euphues, the other Euphues and his England; in each of which, he describes the duties, and points out the errors, of the parent, the child, the student, the traveller, the philosopher, the divine, the courtier, and the contemplative or retired man; not forgetting the ladies, against whose follies and vices he is very severe, as he also is on the manners practised in the universities during his time, taking the more liberty in his satire, as he lays the scene of his discourse against the former in Italy, and against the latter in Athens [C]. He afterwards published nine plays:

[A] Removed to Cambridge] This is in a discourse called Euphues Glafs for Europe (1); where, giving a description of England, he expresses himself in these terms: 'There are also in this island two famous universities, the one Oxforde, the other Cambridge, both, for the profession of all sciences, for Divinity, Physic, Law, and all kind of learning, excelling all the universities in Chrillendome. I was myself, says he, in cyther of them, and lyke them both so well, that I meant not in the way of controversie to preferre any for the better in England, but both for the best in the world; saving this, that colledges in Oxenforde are much more stately for the building, and Cambridge much more sumptuous for the houses in the towne; but the learning neither lyeth in the free stones of the one, nor the fine streates of the other; for out of them both do dayly procede men of greate wisdom, to rule in the Commonwealth, of learning to instruct the common people, of all singular kind of professions to do good to all. And let this suffice, not to enquire which of them is superior, but that neither of them have their equal; neither to aske which of them is the most ancient, but whether any other be so famous.' This encomium seems to be wrote, in order to obviate the charge made against him, that in his first part he had abused the university of Oxford; which accusation he has taken some pains to clear himself from, in a prefatory epistle, prefixed to the second edition of that part, published in 1580 (2).

(1) Euphues and his England, p. 110, 111.

(2) The title at length is, Euphues. The Anatomy of Wit, very pleasant for all Gentlemen to read, and most necessary to remember. Wherein are contained, the delights that wit followeth in his youth, by the pleasantness of love, and the happiness he reapeth in age by the perfectness of wisdom.

(3) Both parts were first published in 1580, and again in 1606, 1623, 1630, and 1632.

The abuse throwa upon Oxford, to which Cambridge is joined also, is, in the following passage of his discourse on education, called Euphues and his Ephæbus. 'I have read, says he, of many universities, as of Padua in Italy, Paris in France, Wittenberge in Germany, in England Oxford and Cambridge; which, if they were half so ill as Athens, they were too too badde, and as I have heard, as they be, they be starke naught. But I can speak the less against them, for that I was never in them; yet can I not chuse but be aggrieved, that by report I am enforced rather to accuse them of vanitie, than excuse them any way. Ah! Gentlemen, what is to be looked for; nay, what is not to be feared, when the temple of Vesta, where virgins should live, is like the stewes fraught with strumpetes; when the altar, where nothing but sanctitie and holynesse should be used, is polluted with uncleanness; when the universities of Christendom, which should be the eyes, the lights, the leaven, the salt, the seasoning, of the worlde, are dimmed with blind concupiscence put out with pride, and have lost their favour with impietie.' This, and some other strokes preceding, gained him that ill will, of which he complains heartily in the second edition of this part (3). Our author compliments Queen Elizabeth highly through all his works, but gives as little quarter to the court as he does to the universities.

[B] Honoured the performance of several of his comedies with her presence.] Six of the nine he wrote were played before her Majesty at several festivals, but the years of performance are not mentioned (4).

[C] As he lays the scene of his discourse against the former in Italy, and against the latter in Athens. Euphues is feigned to be a young Athenian of great beauty, rank, wit, and fortune, with a rambling head and an amorous heart. Thus set forth, he sends him to Naples; where he makes him rival his friend Philautus, by falling in love with a coquetish jilt, who, after she has drained his purse and wasted his time, forsakes him: on which he takes occasion to inveigh very severely against the ladies, and resolves to renounce all society with them, in order to pursue his studies. But apprehending he may have given too great a scope to his anger, he closes the invective, which he calls a cooling card for Philautus, and all fond lovers, thus: 'And yet, Philautus, I would not that all women should take pepper in the nose, in that I have disclosed the legerdemains of a few; for well I know, none will wynch except she be gawled, neither any bee offended unless shee bee guiltie. Therefore I earnestly desire thee, that thou shew this cooling card unto none, except thou shew also this my defence unto them all. For although I weigh nothing the ill will of light housewives, yet would I be loth to lose the good will of honest matrons (5).' And, not satisfied with this, he addresses a deprecatory discourse to the grave matrons and honest maidens of Italy, by which he means England, as under Naples he gives a picture of London; which discourse is here offered to the reader, who may from thence form a judgment how well our author was entitled to the honour of being a reformer of our language, and what was esteemed wit by our ancestors a hundred and eighty years ago.

'Because I would neither be mistaken of purpose, neither construed of malice; least either the simple should suspect me of folly, or the subtle condemn me of blasphemie against the noble sexe of women, I thought good that this my faith should be set downe, to find favour with the one and confute the cavils of the other. Believe me, Gentlewomen, although I have bene bolde to invay against many, yet am I not so brutish to envy them all; though I seem not so gamefome as Arilitippus to play with Laïs, yet am I not so dogged as Diogenes to abhor all ladies; neither would I you should think me so foolish (although of late I have bene very fantastical), that for the light behaviour of a few, I should call in question the demeanor of all. I know, that as there hath bene an unchast Helen in Greece, so there hath bene also a chast Penelope; as there hath bene a prodigious Pasiphaë, so there hath bene a godly Theocrita; though many have desired to be loved as Jupiter loved Alcmena, yet some have wished to be embraced as Phrygius embraced Pieria; as there hath reigned a wicked Jezabel, so hath there ruled a devout Deborah; though many have bene as sicke as Lucilla, yet hath there bene many as faithful as Lucretia. Whatsoever therefore I have spoken of the splene against the flights and subtilities of women, I hope there is none will mislike it if she be plays: 1. Endimion, 2. Campaspe, played before the Queen on twelfth-night, by her Majesty's children, and the children of Paul's. It was also performed in Black-Fryers. 3. Sapho and Phao, played before the Queen on shrove-tuesday, by the same children. 4. Gallathea, played before the Queen on new-year's-day, at Greenwich, by the children of Paul's. 5. Mydas, played before the Queen on twelfth-night, by the children of Paul's, in the singing school there. 6. Motha Bombie. These were all printed together in twelves 1632, by Mr Edward Blount (e), under the following title: Six Court Comedies, often presented and acted before Queen Elizabeth, &c. written by the only rare poet of that time, the wittie, comical, facetiously-quick, and unparalleled John Lilly, Master of Arts. Decies repetita placebit. Lond. printed by William Stansby, for Edward Blount [D]. 7. Maid's Metamorphosis, a comedy, the first act entirely wrote in verse, and great part of the other four (f), Lond. 4to, 1600. 8. Love's Metamorphosis, a Pastoral, 4to, 1601. 9. Woman in the Moon. It has been said also, that he writ some of the answers to John Penry, alias Martin Marprelate's libels (g), but they are not known particularly, nor is there any account of any other works than the abovementioned left by our author, nor of any transactions of his life, further than that he seems to hint (b), that he was ten years a public reader in one of the universities; which must have been Cambridge, from the silence of Mr Wood, who says he knows not where our author spent his life, nor when he died, only he is pretty sure he was in being in 1597, when the last comedy was published (i).

' honest, neither care I if any doe if she be an barlot.
' The lower crab hath the shew of an apple, as well ' as the sweet pippin; the black raven the shape of a ' bird, as well as the white swan; the lewd wight
' the name of a woman, as well as the honest matrone.
' There is great difference betweene the standing puddle
' and the running stream, yet both water; great ' odds between the adamant and the pommice, yet
' both stones; a great distinction to be put betweene
' vitrum and the chrysell, yet both glasse; great con' trarietie betweene Lais and Lucretia, yet both wo' men. Seeing, therefore, one may love the clear
' conduit water, though he loth the muddy ditch;
' and wear the precious diamond, though he despise
' the ragged brick; I think one may also with safe
' conscience reverence the modest sexe of honest may-
' dens, though he forswear the lewd sort of unchast
' minions. Ulysses, though he detested Calypso with ' her sugred voice, yet he embraced Penelope with ' her rude distaff. Though Euphuus abhor the beau-
' tie of Lucilla, yet will he not abstain from the com-
' panie of a grave maiden. Though the tears of the
' harte be false, yet the tears of the bore be sweet;
' though the tears of some women be counterfeit to
' deceive, yet the tears of many be currant to trie
' their love. I, for my part, will honour those al' ways that be honest, and worship them in my life,
' whom I shall know to be worthy in their living;
' neither can I promise such precisenesse, that I shall ' never be caught again with the baite of beautie;
' for although the falsehood of Lucilla have caused
' me to forsake my wonted dotage, yet the faith of ' some lady may cause me once again to fall into mine
' olde disease. For, as the fire-stone in Liguria, tho'
' it be quenched with milke, yet againe is kindled ' with water; or the roote of Anchusia, though it be ' hardened with water, yet it is againe made soft with ' oyle; so the heart of Euphuus, inflamed earst with ' love, although it be cooled with the deceits of Lu' cilla, yet will it againe flame with the loyaltie of ' some honest lady; and though it be hardened with
' the water of wilnesse, yet will it be mollified with
' the oyle of wisdome. I presume, therefore, so ' much upon the discretion of you, Gentlewomen,
' that you will not think the worfe of me, in that I ' have thought so ill of some women, or love me the ' worfe, in that I loathe some so much. For this is ' my faith, that some one rose will be blasted in the ' bud, some other never fall from the stalk; that the ' oak will soon be eaten with the worm, the walnut-
' tree never; that some women will easly be enticed
' to folly, some other never allured to vanity: you ' ought therefore no more to be aggrieved with that ' which I have said, than the mint-maister to see the
' coyner banded, or the true subject the false traytour

' arraigned, or the honest man the thief condem' ned.

' And so farewell (6).'

' The editor dedicates this edition to the Right Honour' able Richard, Viscount Lumley of Waterford, in the ' following peculiar stile.

' My noble Lord,

' It can be no dishonor to listen to this poet's mu-
' sike, whose tunes alighted in the eares of a great and
' ever famous Queen; his invention was so curiously
' strung, that Elizaes court held his notes in admira' tion. Light ayres are now in fashion; and these ' being not sad, fit the season, though, perchance,
' not sure so well with your more serious contempla-
' tions. The spring is at hand, and therefore I pre' sent you a lilly, growing in a grove of lawrells. For ' this poet sat at the sunnes table: Apollo gave him a ' wreath of his own bayes, without snatching. I am;
' my Lord, no executor, yet I presume to distribute ' the goods of the dead, their value being no way an' swerable to the debts of dutie and affection, in which ' I stand obliged to your Lordship. The greatest ' treasure our poet left behind him are these ingots of ' refined invention, richer than gold; were they dia' monds they are now yours. Accept them, noble
' Lord, in part, and me, Your Lpps. &c.' To this ' dedication is added an epistle to the reader; wherein
' he observes, the poet was heard, graced, and reward' ed, by Queen Elizabeth; and that those plays are ' published to prevent oblivion, from trampling on such ' a son of the Muses, as they called their darling. He ' further says, The nation is indebted to our author for a ' new English, which he taught them in his Euphuus;
' that all the ladies of that time were his scholars; she
' who spoke not Euphuism, being as little regarded at ' Court as if she could not speak French. There is a re' markable confirmation of this in Ben. Jonson's Every ' Man out of his Humour (7); where, Deliro's wife Fallace,
' a proud mincing peat, is supposed to dote upon Fal-
' tidius Brisk, a spruce affected courtier. The gallant
' being thrown into the counter, is visited there by Fal-
' lace, who closes other expressions of her love with this.
' O! Master Brisk, as 'tis in Euphuus, *hard is the choice,
' when one is compelled, either by silence to die with grief,
' or by speaking to live with shame*. Upon this passage
' Mr Whalley (8) has the following note: 'Euphuus is the ' title of a romance, wrote by one Lilly, that was in ' the highest vogue at this time; the Court-ladies had ' all the phrases by heart. The language is extremely ' affected, and, like the specimen here quoted, consists ' chiefly of antitheses in the thought and expression.'
' However, there are many excellent moral precepts and ' pertinent observations scattered thro' the work. Z of Solyman the Magnificent (a). Our author was born on the first of May, 1602, at Diseworth in Leicestershire [A], and in 1613, was sent to receive instructions under Mr John Brinsley (b), a teacher of Grammar at Ashby de la Zouch, where he continued some time; but his father being in narrow circumstances, and too much involved in debt to support the expence of a liberal education for his son, he was obliged to quit that school, and in the month of April 1620, set out for London, where he was servant for some time to a woman's taylor, or mantua-maker, in the parish of St Clement-Danes (c). In 1624, leaving that place he went to another, under Mr Gilbert Wright, Master of the Salter's company, who lived in the Strand, and not being able to write, employed our youth (amongst other domestic offices) to keep his accounts (d). He dying on the 27th of May, 1627, his servant Lilly made his addresses to, and the 8th of September following married, the widow, who brought him about 1000 pounds [B]. Being now easy in his fortune, and perfect master of his time, he frequented sermons and lectures, and joined the Puritan party, at least in inclination (e); which afterwards broke out with great animosity in all his writings. Five years after, i. e. in 1632, he began to apply to the study of [judicial] Astrology, under one Evans a clergyman; who had been forced to quit a curacy he had in Leicestershire, on account of his practising some frauds in that science, under pretence of discovering lost and stolen goods, and retire to London; where he lived in Gunpowder-Alley (f), when Mr Lilly first became his pupil; which he does not seem to have continued long, since he tells us in his own life (g), that in seven or eight weeks, he perfectly understood how to set a figure [C]. In 1633 he buried his first wife, and in November 1634, married a second, who was (as he expresses it) of the temper of Mars (h): Before he made this second match, by which he acquired an addition of 500 pounds to his fortune [D], he had purchased a moiety of an estate in the Strand, consisting of thirteen houses, and had for upwards of a year, applied himself very diligently to the study of Astrology (i) [E]. In the winter of this year (1634), Mr Lilly was applied to by David Ramsley, the King's clock-maker, to assist, together with one John Scott (who understood the use of the Mosaic or Miners rods) in the discovery of treasure supposed to be buried in the cloyster of Westminster-Abbey: to which consenting, he, Ramsley and Scott, with several gentlemen, and others, to the number of thirty or more, one night entered the cloysters [F], and applied the hazel rods, which beginning to tumble over one another on the west side of the cloysters, convinced the searchers, the treasure lay concealed under that spot. On this, they fell to digging, and at about six foot depth from the surface, found a coffin, which, on poising, they thought was not heavy enough to answer their purpose, and therefore did not open it: which (says our author) we afterwards much repented (k). From the cloysters they proceeded to the abbey on the same pursuit; but here they were alarmed by a storm, which arose suddenly, and increased to such a degree of violence, that they were afraid the west end of the abbey would have been blown down upon them; and being all heartily frightened, they quitted their design, and returned to their several lodgings, where they arrived about twelve o'clock at night, but Mr Lilly had first by his art (as he says) laid the storm [G]. From May 1636 till Sep-

[B] Brought him about 1000 pounds. Captain Wharton says, this last master was a Scrivener; adding, 'He dying, your mistress first taught you to write secretary (1).'

[C] Perfectly understood how to set a figure. Sir George Wharton, in his tract called Bellum Hybernicae, or Ireland's War, wrote in 1646, in answer to a pamphlet of Mr John Booker's, entitled, A Bloody Irish Almanack, &c. speaking to Booker, has these words. 'And are not you and Mr Lilly alike ashamed, to account yourselves masters in Astrology, when I have made it appear, that neither of you have yet attained to much skill as to set a figure of heaven exactly (2)?' And, whatever astrological knowledge our author [Lilly] might possess, he certainly greatly impeaches his own judgment, when he talks of having learned and used certain prayers, to the several angels who instruct men in the liberal sciences, whose names and pictures he met with in a book called Arv notoria, which a scholar pawned to him for forty shillings (3).

[D] An addition of 500 pounds to his fortune. But he says (speaking of her death) she and her poor relations spent him a thousand pounds (4).

[E] To the study of Astrology. In 1633 he gave the publick the first specimen of his astrologic skill, in an intimation, that the King had chosen an unlucky

horoscope for his coronation in Scotland that year, which was performed there, as Mr Lilly expresses it, on the 18th of June, ☉ in 7° 55, ☽ in 7° 4; i. e. The sun in the seventh degree of Cancer; the moon in the seventh degree of Aries; and pretends to confirm this judgment by the loss of some household-stuff or plate (where it is to be observed our prophet could not tell which) belonging to the King, and his Majesty's narrow escape from drowning in his passage from Brunt-island.

[F] One night entered the cloysters. Ramsley, having received information that there was a great treasure buried somewhere in the cloysters, applied to Dr Williams Bishop of Lincoln, and then Dean of Westminster, for leave to search for the same; which the Dean readily granted, on condition his church might come in for a share of what was found (5).

[G] As he says, laid the storm. His own words are these: 'Our rods (when in the abbey) would not move at all; the candles and torches, all but one, were extinguished, or burned very dimly; John Scot, my partner, was amazed, looked pale, knew not what to think or do, until I gave directions and command to dismiss the demons; which, when done, all was quiet again (6). This passage proves our author either very ignorant, or extremely artful: and Captain Wharton frequently stiles him and Booker, spiriti, non veri, filii artis (7); and sometimes even charges them both with imposture, as did some other contemporary tember 1641, our author lived at a place called Hershams, in the parish of Walton upon Thames, in the county of Surry; from whence he returned to London, and there pursued the study of Astrology, during the years 1642 and 1643, in which latter, he contracted his first intimacy with Bulstrode Whitelocke, Esq; who from thence forward took him under his patronage, and proved a very serviceable friend (l). In the year 1644, he commenced author, by publishing in April that year, his first Ephemeris or Almanack, under the title of, Merlinus Anglicus Junior; the first edition of which, was sold off in a week, though much mangled by the then licencer of mathematical books, John Booker (m); of whose behaviour on that occasion, our author complained to several members of Parliament, when he presented them with the book, and by that means obtained leave to print the second edition, as he himself would have it (n) [H]. Although he seems to hint, the first impression was owing merely to the accident of Mr Whitelocke's reading the manuscript copy he had presented him with, openly in the House, before the Speaker took the chair, by which means several persons saw it, and got copies; which the author being informed of, applied to Booker, for a licence to print it (o). In the year 1644, three fairs were seen at London, on the 29th of May*, Prince Charles's birth-day, of which our author pretended to give an interpretation, in his treatise called, The Starry Messenger; together with an astrological judgment concerning the effects of a solar eclipse, which was to happen on the 11th of August, 1645; in which he answered Captain Wharton's gentle reproof to him, for having meddled with the King's nativity (p), with a good deal of asperity, though he had but twelve hours to do it in. This brought on a paper war between them: Fourteen days after the above work was published (which it was on the same day the King lost the battle of Naseby) our author was taken into custody for it, by order of Mr Miles Corbet, (who was afterwards one of the King's judges) on a complaint made to the Committee of Examinations, against that, and his Merlinus Anglicus for the same year, both which, were said to contain several scandalous passages, against the then commissioners of the excise in London. Mr Corbet, on the examination, endeavoured to support the charge, from two passages in the Merlinus; but the first was agreed by all the Committee not at all to relate to the commissioners, but only to their under officers; and Mr Corbet, in the second, reading will not the eclipse, for will not the excise pay the soldiers? turned the laugh upon, and entirely silenced him. The solicitor for the excise, then, endeavoured to shew that, the excise office had been burnt, and the commissioners personally insulted, by pulling them by their cloaks upon the Exchange, since the publication of The Starry Messenger, both which, he would have made that book the cause of: but upon searching into the affair, it was found both these accidents had happened twelve days before the book was printed, whereupon Mr Lilly was discharged out of custody, without paying any fees (q). During the contests between the Independent party who governed the army, and the Presbyterians who ruled in the Parliament, in 1647, which ran high enough to draw the army so near London as Windsor; our author says, he and Booker were carried thither, and had an audience of General Fairfax (r), which ended only in a kind of mutual compliments, the General hoping, and they assuring him, their art was lawful [I]. About July or August the same year, the King,

(m) John Booker was born anno 1601, at Manchester in the county of Lancaster; where he made a very good proficiency in the Latin language, and was afterwards bound apprentice to an Haberdasher in Lawrence-Jane, London; but having in his youth imbibed a strong propensity to Astrology, he left trade to pursue that study, and for some time taught to write in Hadley-school. He was afterwards clerk to two Justices of Peace, Sir Christopher Cuthbert and Sir Hugh Hamerley, both Aldermen of London. He published many tracts, and dying at London in April 1667, was buried in the church of St James Duke's-Place, near Aldgate, and had a marble stone, with an inscription, placed over his grave by Elias Ashmole, Esq; Vid. writers, as will be seen hereafter. And that he [Lilly] affected to be thought something more than a mere Judicial Astrologer, is pretty plain from the following words in his Merlinus Anglicus for the year 1647. 'If we run a strain above Astrology, the hermetical learning will tell us, that the angels, Samael and Malchidael, are the intelligences or presiding angels of the English Commonwealth and kingdom.'

[H] As he himself would have it.] In June following, he also published his Supernatural Sight; and the same year the White King's Prophecy; and England's prophetic Merlin; of the second of these he says, there were 1800 sold in three days (8) (though then there was no commentary on it); and is very angry with the dull Stationer (as he calls him) for not having been at the expence of cutting the icon or form of that prodigious apparition, which gave birth to the treatise on supernatural sight, so exactly as he (the author) had drawn it. In his Almanack for 1645, he calculated the King's nativity, and pronounced, that, if their party fought in June, at which time his Majesty's ascendant approached the quadrature of Mars, a victory would steal upon them; which ambiguous phrase, in the event, proved very unlucky to King Charles, who, in that month and year, lost Naseby Field, being the greatest overthrow he had received, and which gave a blow to his affairs, that could never afterwards be recovered. The same year was published his Starry Messenger; and the next (1646), his Collection of Prophecies; a comment on the White King's Prophecy; and the Nativities of Archbishop Laud and Thomas Earl of Strafford. And the same year he began a work called Christian Astrology, but did not finish it 'till 1647; in which year he finished his third book of Na- tivities, and also published the World's Catastrophy; the Prophecies of Ambrose Merlin, with a key to them; and Tritheimius of the Government of the World by the presiding Angels. These were all printed together in one volume, the two first pieces being translated into English by Elias Ashmole, Esq; a great friend to our author and to Mr Booker (9). In 1648, he printed a treatise on the three Suns which were seen the winter before, together with an astrological judgment on the conjunction of Saturn and Mars that year, on June 28, in eleven degrees eight minutes of Gemini; and, that year and the following, read public lectures on his Introduction to Christian Astrology, for the improvement of young proficients in that study. In 1651, he published his work called Monarchy or no Monarchy; and, in 1652, Annus Tenebrosus, or the Black Year.

[I] Assuring him their art was lawful.] The General, after mentioning the many victories the army had lately gained, but that their work was not yet accomplished; and affirming the soldiery only laboured to procure the general welfare of the nation, and were resolved to sacrifice their lives and fortunes to obtain that end, added, 'As for the art they studied, he hoped it was lawful and agreeable to God's word; that he understood it not, but doubted not but they both feared God, and therefore had a good opinion of them both.' To which Mr Lilly (after some compliments paid to the General, replied, 'Sir, as for ourselves, we trust in God, and as Christians believe in him. We do not study any art, but what is lawful and consonant to the Scriptures, Fathers, and Antiquity, which we humbly desire you to believe (10).' From this and another passage in our author, where, speaking of printing his first English Merlin,

(who was at Hampton-Court) in hopes the division between the Parliament and Army, might produce some turn in his favour, especially as the city of London had declared against the army, and had even gone so far, as to obtain a vote that his Majesty might return to London [K], had framed some thoughts of escaping from the soldiery, and ob- scuring himself some where near that city: whereupon, one Madam Whorewood came to Mr Lilly (with the King's consent, as he says) (s), to know in what quarter of the nation his Majesty might be safely concealed, 'till he thought proper to discover himself. Our author, after erection of his figure, told her, he was certain he might continue undiscovered, if he retired into some part of Essex, about twenty miles from London, in which county, and at about that distance, the lady recollected a house fit for his Majesty's reception; but this project was rendered abortive, by the King's unexpectedly quitting Hampton-Court [L]. Our author adds, that while the King was at that place, Alderman Adams sent him 1000 pounds in gold, 500 pounds whereof, was given to Mrs Whorewood, and thinks he had twenty pieces of that very gold, to reward him for his trouble (t). He was again applied to by the same lady, in 1648, to assist the King in his escape from Carisbrook-castle; which he complied with, and procured one G. Farmer, a lock-smith, in Bow-lane, to make a saw to cut the iron bars of the King's window, and also furnished her with some aqua fortis, both which were conveyed to the King; who made such use of them, that he soon gained a passage through the bars for his body (u), but was by some accident prevented from making his escape [M]. Mrs Whorewood came again to our author still, as he says, by the King's consent (w), to know the issue of the propositions which were to be offered to his Majesty from the Parliament, and how he should behave in that conjuncture: that on consulting his figure, he named the day the commissioners would arrive in the island, and elected another day and hour, when to receive the commissioners and propositions; and advised, as soon as the propositions were read to sign them, and make haste with all speed to come up with the commissioners to London, the army being then far distant from London, and the city enraged stoutly against them; insinuating, if these directions were observed, the event would prove favourable: and this, continues he (the King) promised to do. he adds, the commissioners arrived as he had foretold (x), but the King entering into a conference with the Lord Say, neglected to pursue his instructions [N]. Whilst our author was thus serviceable to the King's designs, he was no less so to those of the opposite party; from whom he received this year a present of 50 pounds in cash, and an order for a pension of 100 pounds per annum; he obtained this from the council of state, for furnishing them with perfect knowledge of the chiefest concerns of France; which our author acquired, by means of a secular priest, with whom he had formerly been acquainted, and who now, was confessor to one of the French secretaries in France: but the pension was thrown up two years after, in disgust, because Walter Frost, secretary, and a principal minister in the Council of State, gave our author

he says, 'He delivered it (the copy) to the Printer, who being an Arch-Presbyterian, had five of their ministry to inspect it, who could make nothing of it, but said it might be printed, for in that I (the author) meddled not with their Dagon (11).' From these passages I think it is pretty plain, Mr Lilly joined with the Independents.

[K] That his Majesty might return to London. On the 26th of July, a great number of young men and apprentices, spirited up and encouraged by the leading Presbyterians in the House, the Common-Council of the city of London, and Sir William Waller, Poyntz, and Massey, formerly commanders for the Parliament, but now laid aside, came to the House, and tumultuously obliged them to come to several resolutions, and amongst them the abovementioned for the return of the King (12).

[L] By the King's unexpectedly quitting Hampton-Court. This event is thus described by our author. 'Away she (Mrs Whorewood) went, early next morning, unto Hampton Court, to acquaint his Majesty. But see the misfortune: he, either guided by his own approaching hard fate, or misguided by Ashburnham, went away in the night-time westward, and surrendered himself to Hammond in the Isle of Wight.'

[M] Prevented from making his escape ] Mr Lilly says, that, when the King had got out to his breast (heels foremost) his heart failed him: but the tradition at Carisbrook is, that his Majesty did actually get out, and walked backwards and forwards on a bank under the window some time, in expectation of those concerned in conveying him off; but they not coming, and the moon beginning to rise, he attempted to get in again, but was discovered by a centinel.

[N] But the King entering into a conference with the Lord Say, neglected to pursue his instructions. ] Mr Lilly's words are these. 'That night the commissioners came, and old Say and his Majesty had private conference 'till one in the morning. The King acquaints Say with his intention, who clearly dissuaded him from signing the propositions.—'His occasioned his Majesty to wave the advice I and some others that wished his prosperity had given, in expectation of that which afterwards could never be gained.' This treaty was held at Newport in the Isle of Wight, on the 18th of September 1648 (13). The King's attempt to escape, though mentioned by our author as immediately preceding this treaty, was in December 1647, when the Scotch had agreed to declare for him against the English army, and bring a sufficient force to take him out of the hands of the Independents; while the Royalists in Kent, Essex, Wales, and Ireland, made diversions in order to divide the English army. This project was very near being carried into execution, part of the fleet declaring for the King; and was frustrated merely by the too great precipitation of the royal party. Those who declared in Essex were soon blocked up in Colchester, to which place our author and Mr Booker were sent, to encourage the Parliament's troops employed in that service, by their predictions of success (14); which, he says, they accordingly did, and thereby quieted the soldiers, who were at that time something prone to mutiny.

As to our author's great skill in prophecy, there goes a pleasant story related by a kinsman of Dr Case his successor; viz. That a person who wanted to consult him on some important point, coming to his house one morning, Lilly himself going to the door, saw a very disagreeable object somebody had lately left there; and being much offended with the sight and smell, wished he did but know who had treated him in that manner, that he might punish them accordingly: which his customer observing, when the conjurer demanded his business, Nothing at all, replied he, for I am sure if you can't find who has laid their tail at your own door, it is impossible you should discover any thing relating to me; and so left him.

author some affront here; and because Scott, who had 800 pounds per annum for intelligence, would not contribute any occasion to gratify his friend abroad (y). In July 1651 our author published a treatise, intitled, Several Observations upon the Life and Death of Charles, late King of England; in which he speaks of that King's father, and ministers, with great acrimony, and shews himself a zealous partizan for the then republican government. This tract was reprinted in 1715, with the pompous title of Mr William Lilly's true history of King James I. and King Charles I. with sundry observations, remarkable passages, and many secret transactions not 'till now divulged, &c. The same year he laid out 1030 pounds in the purchase of fee-farm rents, amounting to 110 pounds per annum; and the year following, 950 pounds more, for a house and lands at Hertham: these last he died possessed of, but the fee-farm rents, were claimed at the Restoration, and obtained by the right owners; so that Mr Lilly, was a loser by that bargain (a). In the year 1653, he was called before the Committee of Plundered Ministers, for having in his almanack for that year, asserted, that the parliamentary government, stood but on a ticklish footing, and was in danger of an insurrection both by the people and the army. But receiving notice of this attack before the arrival of the messenger from the Committee, he made application to Mr Speaker Lenthal (always his friend) and by him; had the passages complained of by the Presbyterians pointed out to him: these he soon altered, and, by the help of Mr Warren, a staunch cavalier printer (who kindly promised our author to swear himself to the Devil for him) was able to attend them next morning with six books, printed differently from the first impression, which six alone he acknowledged to be his; and by that means came off, with only being detained thirteen days in the custody of the serjeant at arms [O], from whence he was then bailed, and and heard no more of the affair. This year and the next, he was engaged in a dispute with the reverend and learned Mr Thomas Gataker; who in his annotations on Jer. x. 2. had called our author blind buzzard, and he in his Annus Tenebrosus, by way of answer reflected again on the Divine [P]. Mr Lilly, on the 16th of February, lost his second wife, (for whose death he shed no tears) and in October 1654, married a third (b). In 1655, a bill of indictment being preferred against him, at Hickes's-Hall, for giving judgment upon stolen goods, he was tried thereon and acquitted. Four years after, in 1659, he received a present of a gold chain and medal (brought him by Captain Owen Cox) from the King of Sweden, for something mentioned to the honour of that prince, by our author, in his almanack for 1657. And in June 1660, he was apprehended by order of the Parliament, and examined by a Committee, touching the person who actually cut off the head of the late King; to whom he discovered, that he had been informed by Mr Robert Spavin, (then secretary to Lieutenant-General Cromwell) who dined with our author the Sunday sevennight after the fact, that it was performed by Lieutenant-Colonel Joyce [Q]. Soon after this examination, Mr Lilly sued out his pardon under the great seal (c); and the 27th of June 1665 removed from London (where the plague then raged) to Hertham, where he began to study physic, for the practising which, he obtained a licence from Archbishop Sheldon [R]. In the Committee appointed by Parliament, [O] In the custody of the Serjeant at Arms Our author says, 'I appeared before the committee, being thirty in number, that day; whereas it was observed at other times, it was very difficult to get five of them together. At first they shewed me the true Anglicus, and asked me if I wrote and printed it? I took the book, and inspected it very heedfully; and when I had done so said thus: This is none of my book; some malicious Presbyterian hath wrote it, who are my mortal enemies: I disown it. The committee looked upon one another like distracted men, not imagining what I presently did; for I presently pulled out of my pocket six books, and said, These I own; the others are counterfeits, published purposely to ruin me. The committee were now more vexed than before; at last many of them were of opinion to imprison me (15).'

(15) Ibid. p. 69 to 72.

[P] Reflected again on the Divine. Mr Gataker's reply was entitled, 'Thomas Gataker, B. D. his Vindication of the Annotations by him published upon these words, Thus saith the Lord, &c. Jer. x. 2. against the scurrilous aspersions of that grand impostor Mr William Lilly; as also against the various expostions of two of his advocates, Mr John Swan, and another by him cited but not named. Together with the Annotations themselves. Wherein the pretended grounds of Judiciary Astrologie, and the Scripture proofs produced for it, are discussed and refuted. London, 1653, in 4to. p. 192.' Our author making animadversions on this piece in his Engliss Merlin for 1654, produced a third piece from Mr Gataker, called, 'A Discourse Apologetical; wherein Lillie's lewd and loud lles in his Merlin or Paquil for 1654, are clearly laid open; his shameful desertion of his own cause is further discovered; his shameless slanders fully refuted; and his malicious and murderous mind, inciting to a general massacre of God's ministers, from his own pen evidently evinced. Together with an advertisement, concerning two allegations produced in the clofe of his Postscript; and a Postscript concerning an Epistle Dedicatorie of one J. Gaabury, by Th. Gataker, B. D. autor of the Annotations on Jer. x. 2. and of the Vindication of them. London, 1654, in 4to.'

[Q] It was performed by Lieutenant-Colonel Joyce. After Mr Lilly had acquainted the committee, that Spavin had invited himself to dinner as on that day with our author, and that the whole discourse at table was about who did cut off the King's head; he adds, 'Robert Spavin, fo off as dinner was done, took me by the hand, and carried me to the south window: faith he, These [meaning Anthony Peirson and some others he had brought to dine there] are all mistaken (one saying the common-hangman, another Hugh Peters did the jobb); they have not named the man that did the fact: it was Lieutenant-Colonel Joyce. I was in the room when he fitted himself for the work, stood behind him when he did it, when done went in again with him There is no man knows this but my master [Cromwell], Commissary Ireton, and myself. Doth not Mr Rusworth know it? said I. No, he doth not know it, faith Spavin. Spavin had often related unto me the same thing when we were alone.'

[R] He obtained a licence from Archbishop Sheldon. This licence was granted at the intercession of his friend Elias Ashmole, Esq; and bears date on the 11th of October 1670 (16). The late Dr Edmund Halley related frequently, that, on the Restoration, our author to examine into the cause of that dreadful fire which broke out on the 2d of September 1666, and almost consumed the city of London, some of the Committee remembering, that in our author's tract, called, Monarchy or no Monarchy, published 15 years before, there were two hieroglyphical decorations, the first consisting of coffins, pick-axes, &c. and the other, on the adverse side, representing a great city on fire, moved that he might be sent for, and examined thereon: which being agreed to, in October he attended the Committee, when Sir Robert Brooke (chairman) informed him why he was called before them, and desired to know whether he could say any thing as to the cause of the late fire, or whether there was any design in it. Mr Lilly answered, that observing the unsettled state the nation had been in, for the three years, since the King's death, and the unquiet temper of the people of all ranks and conditions thereupon, he had endeavoured to find out by means of the art he professed, what should from that time happen to the Parliament, nation, and people in general; and had marked such discoveries as he then made in hieroglyphics, &c. to the end they might be known only to the wife: and having found (amongst other things) that the city of London should be sadly afflicted with a great plague, and not long after with an exorbitant fire [S], he framed the two hieroglyphics then enquired after; but honestly owned he had not foreseen, nor indeed endeavoured to find out, the year. And as to the fire's being done by design, or whether any were employed to that purpose, though he had taken much pains in the search, since it happened, he ingenuously acknowledged, he could not give himself the least satisfaction therein: adding 'I conclude it was only the finger of God; but what instruments he used thereunto, I am ignorant.' The Committee being satisfied with this answer, very civilly dismissed him (d) [T]. After this occurrence, we know little of him, except that some small time before his death, he adopted one Henry Coley, a taylor (e), for his son, by the name of Merlin Junior; to whom he made a present of the impression of his almanack, which had then been printed six and thirty years successively. He died of a dead palsy, at Herfham, the 9th of June, 1681; and was interred at Walton upon Thames, in the chancel of the church, the next day. His friend Mr Ashmole, in July after, placed a black marble stone with an inscription over his grave [U]. He bequeathed his estate at Herfham, to one of the sons of his friend and patron Bulstrode Whitelocke, Esq; (f), and his magical utensils came all into the hands of the famous Dr Case his successor, who used frequently to expose them to his friends in great derision; particularly, the dark chamber and pictures, whereby Lilly used to impose on people under pretence of shewing them persons who were absent.

thor often applied to the ministry to employ him as a prophet for them, as those who had been in authority just before had done, but had the mortification to be refused.

[S] And not long after with an exorbitant fire. Notwithstanding our author's assertion here (to support the reputation of his predictive skill), that he foresaw those two calamities so long before they happened, it may well be doubted, whether his two terrible decorations did not rather take their rise from what was past than from what was to come: the first from the deaths and funerals of the Princess Elizabeth (on the 8th and 24th of September), and the Prince of Orange (on the 8th of October and 15th of March), together with the many executions in the publick streets of London in 1650; and the second, from a great fire which happened at Holbourne-conduit, the 22d of July the same year.

[T] Very civilly dismissed him [A] A late writer, speaking of a daring attempt made by Tho. Blood and others joined in a conspiracy to seize the Tower of London, and to kill General Monk, says, one part of their design was to fire the city of London; and that they had pitched on the third of September, 1666, for that purpose, as marked by our author in his Almanack for a lucky day; and observes, that, though the conspirators were discovered, and some of them executed in the April preceding; yet the fire began on the day by them pitched upon, which occasioned our author to be examined as above (17). It is well known that the third of September was reckoned a fortunate day by all the republican party, from Cromwell's many successes thereon, and the fire begun in the night of the second of that month.

LILYE, or LILY [WILLIAM], one of the first, and most learned English Grammarians, in the XVIIth century [A], was born at Odiham in the county of Southampton

ampton (a), on or about the year 1466 [B]. Being bred up from his youth to learning, he was admitted, at the age of eighteen, a demy in Magdalen College in Oxford. And, after having taken one degree in arts, he quitted the univerfity (b), and travelled for religion-fake to Jerufalem. At his return from thence, he studied fome time at Rhodes; where, after the taking of Constantinople, feveral learned men had taken refuge [C], under the protection of the Knights, which were then poffeffors of that ifland. Afterwards he came to Rome, where he further improved himfelf in the Latin and Greek languages, under John Sulpitius and Pomponius Sabinus (c). Upon his return to England, he fet up a fchool in London, where he taught Grammar, Rhetorick, and Poetry, with good fuccefs (d), and great reputation; being the firft Englifhman that did fo [D]: And he became fo confiderable in that profefion, that when the good and pious Dr John Colet founded St Paul's fchool, in 1510, he appointed him the firft Mafter (e); preferring him the rather for his being a married man, and the father of many children (f). He laboured twelve years (g) in that ufeul ftation, to the great fervice and benefit of the Englifh nation [E]: During which time, he compofed the Grammar that goes under his name [F], and feveral other pieces [G]. At length, being feized with the plague, which then

[B] Was born—on or about the year 1466.] This is eafily inferred from his age, at the time of his death as mentioned below. He was therefore admitted in the univerfity in 1484, and not 1486, as Wood fays.

[C] He ftudied fome time at Rhodes, where—feveral learned men had taken refuge.] If Dr T. Fuller had confidered this, he would not have expreffed fo great a wonder at our author's ftudying there, as he doth in the following words (2). 'In his return he ftayed at Rhodes and ftudied Greek, which will feem ftrange to fome, Rhodes not being Rhodes in that age (except cafually fome great Critick was there) feeing otherwife to find elegant in modern Greek (fowred with long continuance) is as impoffible, as to draw good wine out of a veflel of vine-gar.'

[D] Being the firft Englifhman that did fo.] But he was not the firft Englifh traveller that brought 'Greek out of Italy to Oxford about the year 1490,' as Dr Knight fays by miftake (3), quoting for it Polydore Vergil (4). For, in the place referred to, Vergil fays the contrary; viz. That before Lily, Cornelius Vitellius, a native of Corneto in Hetruria, had taught the learned languages [Greek and Latin] at Oxford. His own words are,—Lilius, vir, quemadmodum dicit Horatius, integer vitæ, feclerifque purus, poftquam in Italiâ aliquot per annos perfectis Literis operam dederat, domum reverfus Anglorum Primus apud fuos eas docuit: Antea enim Cornelius, Vitellius, homo natus Corneti, quod eft maritimum Hetruriæ oppidum, natus nobili profapia, vir optimus gratiofusque, omnium Primus Oxonii bonas Literas docuerat.

[E] To the great fervice and benefit of the Englifh nation.] Some of his fcholars proved in their time the greateft men in the nation; fuch as Thomas Lupfet, Sir Antony Denny, Sir William Paget, Sir Edward North, John Leland, &c. (5) And it appears from Erafmus's epiftles (6), in how great reputation Lily's fchool was.

[F] He compofed the Grammar that goes under his name.] That Grammar, as the learned Mr Tho. Baker obferves (7), was not compofed by Mr Lily alone, but was done by fome of the moft confiderable men of the age: The Englifh Rudiments by Dr Colet 'Dean of Paul's, with a preface to the firft editions, directing its ufe, by no lefs man than Cardinal Wolfey; the moft rational part, the Syntax, was writ or corrected by Erafmus (8), and the other parts by other hands: fo that tho' Mr Lily now bears the name, which while living he always modeftly refufed, yet it was carried on by the joint endeavours of feveral learned men, and he perhaps had not the largeft fhare in that work.' The real fhare he had in it, will appear from the following very exact account (9). 'The Englifh Introduction was written by Dr Colet, and dedicated by him to Mr Lily in an Epiftle dated in 1510, and prefixed to feveral antient editions. The Englifh Syntax was written by Mr Lily, as appears by the title of feveral antient editions, which runs thus: Gulielmi Lillii Angli Rudimenta. Bale afcribes it to him (10), and cites part of the firft fentence as it ftands in thofe editions. The Carmen de Moribus, and Rules for the Genders of Nouns, were written by Mr Lily, and bear his name in all editions to this day.—The Rules concerning the Preterperfect Tenfes and Supines of Verbs are Lily's, and have his name prefixed in all editions.—The Rules for Heteroclitics (or irregulars) were written, according to Bale (11), by Thomas Robertson, who was afterwards Dean of Durham; but, in fome editions, the author is named Robert Robinfon; and in later editions Thomas Robinfon; as he is called by William Haime in his epiftle to Lily's Rules conftrued, usually bound up with the Grammar. Thomas Robertson, or Robinfon, added alfo the Supplement of Defective Verbs, De Verbis Defectivis, at the end of the Rules for the Preterperfect Tenfes and Supines of Verbs. And likewise wrote Annotations on Lily's rules for the Genders of Nouns, and Preterperfect Tenfes and Supines of Verbs. But it was John Ritwyfc, who gave a Latin interpretation of the Nouns and Verbs contained in thofe Rules.—The Latin Syntax was firft drawn up by Lily, and then fent by Dean Colet to Erafmus for his review, who fo far altered it, that neither of them afterwards thought he had a right to own it; for which reafon it was at firft publifhed without any author's name, and only an epiftle of Colet prefixed to it. This Epiftle bears date in 1513, and is written to Lily, recommending to him the ufe of the book; from whence fome at that time imagined the book was written by the Dean himfelf. But this miftake was foon removed by an Epiftle of Erafmus, printed within the year 1515, in which he fays exprefly, that it was compofed by Lily at the request of Colet. The verbal figures were taken from Petrus Mofellanus, and thofe of conftruction from Ger. Liſtrius (12), a learned Phyfician, and great friend of Erafmus, whofe names are prefixed to them in fome antient editions. The Profoody was at firft very fhort, and bore the title of Regulæ verfficales. Bale (13) afcribes this alfo to Thomas Robertson.—So that in the prefent Grammar, which commonly goes under Lily's name; no parts are properly his, but the Rules for the Genders of Nouns, beginning with Propria quæ maribus; and the Rules for the Preter-perfect tenfes and Supines, which begin with As in præfenti.—This Grammar was at firft in fo high repute, that it was enjoined by the King's authority to be the only one taught in fchools (14). And Cardinal Wolfey, by a letter dated in 1528, recommended the ufe of Lily's Rules to the mafters of his Grammar-fchool, which he had newly founded at Ipfwich (15).

[G] And feveral other pieces.] I. The firft I fhall mention, are, his Latin translations of fome Greek Epigrams, joined with translations of the fame by Sir Thomas More; and printed at the head of Sir Tho. More's Epigrams, by John Froben, Baſil, 1518, 4to. under this title, Progymnaſmata Thomæ Mori, et Gulielmi Lillii Sodalium. And, upon an impartial examination, Mr Lily appears upon the whole to outdo Sir Thomas. II. He publifhed, In ænigmatica Boſſi Antiboſſicon primum, ſecundum, tertium, ad Gulielm. Hormannum. Lond. 1521, 4to. Thefe three Antiboſſicons are wittily written in an elegant ftyle, and neat verſe, not only againſt the ſaid Horman (who was Maſter of Eaton ſchool), but alfo againſt Robert Whitynton, a laureat Grammarian and Rhetorician: who had, under the feigned name of Boſſus, much provoked Lilye with his biting verſes (16). Dr Knight acquaints us with the occasion of these two pieces (17). The first was an excellent Latin poem, to celebrate the arrival and reception of Philip King of Castile and his Queen, cast upon the coasts of Cornwall, in their passage from Flanders to Spain, wherein some particular circumstances are handsomely defacated on. The second was, when in June 1522, Charles V. Emperor of Germany, was here in England, nobly entertained by King Henry VIII. At their solemn procession through the city of London, Mr Lilye caused a very elegant panegyric upon the Emperor, in verse, and an oration in prose, composed by himself, to be publicly recited before him, by one of his scholars. [I] He had two sons, George and Peter. GEORGE LILY was born in London, and educated for some time at Magdalen-college in Oxford. But leaving the university without a degree, he travelled to Rome, where he was taken into the service or patronage of Cardinal Pole, and became eminent in several parts of learning.

LINACRE, or LYNACER, [DR THOMAS] one of the most learned Physicians in England, nay in all Europe, in the XVIth Century; and one of the first restorers of polite literature, and the learning of the Ancients, in this island, (jointly with our countrymen Colet, Lily (a), Grocyn [A], and William Latimer [B]), was born in the city of Canterbury

[A] Grocyn. Otherwise written Grocyn, Grocyn, Grocen. There being no particular article in this work concerning that learned man, we shall give a short account of him here (1). William Grocyn was born in Bristol about the year 1442; educated in Grammar at Wykeham's school near Winchester; made perpetual Fellow of New-college in 1467; and presented by that college in 1479, to the Rectory of Newton-Longville in Buckinghamshire. But, notwithstanding that, residing still at Oxford, he was chosen about the year 1483, Divinity-reader in Magdalen-college. In the beginning of the year 1488, leaving that place, he went, for his further improvement, into Italy; where he perfected himself in the Greek and Latin languages under Demetrius Chalcondilas, and Politian. Returning to his own country, and at length to Oxford, he took the degree of Bachelor in Divinity; became a sojourner in Exeter-college in 1491, and read a Greek lecture in that university, where it seems he had the famous Erasmus for his pupil or bearer, whom he most generously entertained a considerable time in his own house. He read afterwards Divinity lectures in St Paul's cathedral, at the request of Dr Colet Dean of that church (2). Having resigned his rectory of Newton-Longville, he was elected on the 17th of April 1506, Master of the collegiate church of All-Saints at Maidstone in Kent; and never had any further preferment. He was so generous to his friends, that he was forced to pawn his plate to Dr Young, then Master of the Rolls. This great man was very learned, and accounted one of the best scholars and the most judicious divines in this nation, in his time.

After his return to England, he was made Canon of St Paul's cathedral, and afterwards Prebendary of Canterbury. He died in the beginning of the year 1559. And was author of the following pieces. Anglorum Regum Chronices Epitome. Lancastriæ & Eboracensis [Famil.] de Regno contentiones. Regum Angliæ genealogia. All three printed together at Venice, 1548. Francf. 1565, 4to. Basil. 1577, &c. Elogia Virorum illustrium. 1559, 8vo. Catalogus sive Series Pontificum & Cæsarum Romanorum. And the Life of Bishop Fisher (20); which is in manuscript, in the library of the Royal Society, under the title of Jo Roffensis Episcopi Vita & Mors (21). He also published the first exact map that ever was drawn of this island (22). PETER LILY, the other son, was a Dignitary in the church of Canterbury; and father of another Peter Lily, D. D. some time fellow of Jesus-college in Cambridge, afterwards a brother of the Savoy-hospital in the Strand, London, Prebendary of St Paul's and of Sarum's cathedrals, and Archdeacon of Taunton. He was author of a few sermons, and died in 1614 (23).

Richard Pace calls him (25)—Honestissimus simul & peritissimus Vir.—And speaking of his scholars, he adds—*Habent Præceptorem, cujus vita moreque sunt probatissimi. [B] William Latimer. He was once school-fellow with the excellent Sir Thomas More; and became Fellow of All-Souls-college at Oxford in the year 1489. Afterwards travelling into Italy, as the fashion then was, he settled for a time at Padua, and improved himself very much, especially in the Greek tongue. Returning to England, he was incorporated Master of Arts at Oxford, November 18, 1513 (8). And, soon after, had for his pupil Reginald Pole, afterwards Cardinal, and Archbishop of Canterbury: by whose interest, as it is said, he obtained the rectories of Saintbury and Weston-under-edge in Gloucestershire, and a Prebend of Salisbury (9). He had also the honour of being one of those who taught the learned Erasmus Greek at Oxford (as did also Dr Linacre), and assisted him in the second edition of his New Testament. He died very old about September 1545, and was buried in Canterbury [C] about the year 1460. (b); and educated in the school there adjoining to the cathedral, under the learned William Selling [D]. From him he was sent to Oxford, and chosen Fellow of All-Souls-College in the year 1484; in which station he made a great proficiency in learning (c). Afterwards being very desirous to make further improvements by travelling, he thought he could no where succeed in his designs so well as by going into Italy, which began then to be famous for reviving the knowledge of the Greek tongue, and of all polite literature (d) [E]. He was carried thither by his master William Tilly, alias Selling, Embassador from K. Henry VII. to the court of Rome (e) [F]. At Florence, he was treated with extraordinary kindness by Duke Lorenzo de Medicis, one of the politest men of his age, and a great patron of letters: who favour'd him so far in his studies, as to give him the privilege of having the same preceptors with his own sons. Linacre knew how to make all proper advantages of so lucky an opportunity: and accordingly, by the instructions of Demetrius Chalcondyles, a native of Greece, (and one of those learned men who had fled upon the taking of Constantinople by the Turks) he acquired a perfect knowledge of the Greek tongue; and so far improved himself under his Latin Master Angelo Politian, as to arrive to a greater correctness of style than even Politian himself. Indeed, if we consider him with respect to his skill in the two learned languages, he was much the most accomplished scholar of his age (f) [G]. Having thus laid in an uncommon stock of classical learning, he went to Rome, and, under Hermolaus Barbarus, applyed himself to the study of natural philosophy and physick; particularly he made it his business, and was the first Englishman who ever did so, to be well acquainted with the works of Aristotle and Galen in the original. He translated and published several tracts of the latter, of which an account is given towards the end of this article: and also, jointly with Grocyn and Latimer, undertook a translation of the former, but they left it imperfect (g) [H]. In his own faculty of Physick he distinguished himself so much, that, soon after his return, he was pitched upon by K. Henry VII. as the fittest person to be placed about his son Prince Arthur, and to take care both of his health and his education: accordingly he was commanded to Court from Oxford, where he had been created or incorporated Doctor of Physick, and made public Professor in that faculty; or rather read medicinal lectures gratis (h). He was afterwards made successively Physician in the chancel of his church of Saintbury. He was one of the greatest men of that age; a master of all sacred and profane learning; but never published any thing (10): so that there are only a few letters of his to Erasmus extant (11). That glory of his age styles Mr Latimer, an excellent Divine, conspicuous for his integrity—verè Theologus, integritate vitæ conspicuus (12); and praises his candour, and more than virgin modesty; juavissimum illum ingenii tui candorem, ac pudorem plusquam virgineum, cum Christiana prudentiâ conjunctum (13). J. Leland celebrates also his eloquence, judgment, piety, and generosity (14).

[C] Was born in the city of Canterbury.] Dr Tho. Fuller (15), upon the authority of J. Weaver (16), says, that Dr Linacre was born in the town of Derby. But A. Wood seems to be more right, when he says (17), that he was born at Canterbury, but descended from the Lynacres of Lynacre-hall in the parish of Chesterfield in Derbyshire: which (says he) may be the reason why Holinshed, and others that follow him, say, that he was born in the town of Derby.

[D] William Selling.] William Tilly, alias de Selling, was born at Selling near Faversham in Kent, and educated in All Souls college Oxon. According to the fashion of that age, he travelled into Italy, and studied the Civil Law at Bologna; and the Greek and Latin languages under Politian, and other great masters. Whilst he was there, he took the opportunity of purchasing many curious manuscripts, which he brought over with him; but they were afterwards destroyed by fire, and among them Cicero's book De Republicâ. In 1472, he was elected Prior of the Monastery of Christ Church in Canterbury, and died in 1495, after having been employed by King Henry the Seventh, in embassies to the Court of Rome (18).

[E] Italy, which began then to be famous for reviving the knowledge of the Greek tongue.] It is well known, how much that language was neglected, and in a manner forgotten in the greatest part of Europe. At length, upon the taking of Constantinople by the Turks, in the year 1453, several of the learned Greeks being forced to quit their native country, withdrew into Italy, where they were obliged to teach Greek for their own sustenance. Of this number were Theodorus Gaza, Constantinus Lascaris, Chalcondyles, Chrysoloras, Trapezuntius, &c by whose diligence, and the gracious encouragement of the Popes, Nicolas V and Pius II. all sorts of learning began to flourish again in Italy, and attracted thither ingenious persons from every nation, particularly from England.

[F] He was carried thither by his master William Selling, &c.] This we learn from Mr Leland. Henricus jam VII.—cognita Tillæi tum eruditione, tum fide, illum in rebus arduis vel Romam usque spectatum satis oratorem misit. Quo tempore Thomam Linacrum, optime spei adolescentulum, tanquam ministrum, una secum deduxit; ac Bononiam in itinere forte revolvens, Politiano veteri amico suo, illum commendatissimum reliquit erudiendum (19).

[G] He was much the most accomplished scholar of his age.] Dr Freind observes, That 'his Latin style was very elegant and accurate: so far, that his friend Erasmus thought it too elaborate: yet Sir John Cheke (chiefly perhaps out of contradiction to his antagonist Bishop Gardiner) seems to censure it as not Ciceronian enough, and represents him, as, out of some morose humour, an enemy to that great orator. However it is certain, that Linacre had a better taste of a truly classical way of writing, than either of these modern authors: the former, though a copious and clear writer, yet did not study any accuracy of style; and the latter, as the fashion was then, went a little too far in his imitation of Tullie's numbers and periods, used mostly by him in his orations, and his other rhetorical pieces. Whereas Linacre, though well acquainted with all Tullie's writings, chose rather to follow the style of his Epistles, and Philosophical works: and besides, endeavour'd to express the elegance of Terence, and what was often more apposite to the physical subjects he treated of, the neatness of Celsus.—Any one, in perusing the Preface of the fourteen books concerning the Method of Cure, without knowing at the same time that it was a translation from Galen, would, perhaps, from the exactness and propriety of the style, guess it to be written in a classical age (20).

[H] Undertook a translation of the former, viz. Aristotle.] None of his translations of any of Aristotle's pieces were ever published. But that he translated some of them, is evident from these passages in Erasmus's Epistles.—Ejusdem operâ [scil. Linacri] sic Latine legitur Aristoteles, ut licet Atticus, vix in suo sermone parem habeat gratiam—Expertam proxima fœtura libros Aristotelis Meteorologicos, non estimandis sudoribus primum emendatos, deinde felicissime versos (21).

fician to that King, as well as to his successor Henry the VIIIth, and to the Princess Mary. To give a strong proof, how much he had the good of his own profession and that of the publick at heart, he founded two lectures of Physick in Oxford, and one at Cambridge [I]. But he had still further views for the advantage of his profession. He saw in how low a condition the practice of Physick then was; that it was mostly engrossed by illiterate monks and empiricks, who in an infamous manner imposed upon the publick; the bishop of London, or the Dean of St Paul's for the time being, having the chief power in approving and admitting the practitioners in London, and the rest of the Bishops in their several dioceses. And he found that there was no way left of redressing this grievance, but by giving encouragement to men of reputation and learning, and placing this power of licensing in more proper hands. Upon these motives he projected the foundation of the College of Physicians in London; and using his interest at Court, particularly with that great patriot and munificent promoter of all learning, Cardinal Wolsey, he procured, anno 1518, letters patent from K. Henry VIIIth which were confirmed by Parliament, to establish a corporate society of Physicians in London [K]: by virtue of which authority, the College, as a Corporation, now enjoys the sole privilege of admitting all persons whatever to the practice of Physick, as well as that of supervising all prescriptions. And it is expressly declared, that no one shall be admitted to exercise Physick in any of the dioceses in England, out of London, 'till such time that he be examined by the President and three of the Elects, and have letters testimonial from them: unless he be a graduate in either university, who, as such, by his very degree, has a right to practise all over England, except within seven miles of London, without being obliged to take any licence from the Bishop. Besides this, he very prudently took care, that a power should be reserved for his successors to make such statutes and ordinances as they, from time to time, should think most expedient for the public service (i). Of this new-erected college Dr Linacre was the first President, and held that office as long as he lived. The assemblies were kept in his own house in Knight-riders-street, which he left upon his death as a legacy to the society, for a college and a library: And that learned body have done both credit and service to their country, by their practice and writings (k). In the latter part of his days he applied himself to the study of divinity, (having, by a story that is said of him, been unacquainted before with the sacred writings) [L]; and entering into holy orders, was collated Oct. 23, 1509. to the Rectory of Mersham, which he resigned within a month. December the 14th following, he was installed into the Prebend of Eston in the Church of Wells †. Moreover, he was installed Oct. 17, 1518. Prebendary of South Newbald in the church of York. The 9th of April 1519, he was admitted Precentor in the same church; but resigned it the November following: and had other dignities in the church, but where we cannot learn (l) [M]. He died of the stone, with great pain and torment, Octob. 20, 1524. aged 64 (m), and was buried in St Paul's cathedral before the rood of the north door (n). Three and thirty years after, a comely monument was erected to his memory by the learned Dr John Kaye, or Caius; with an Epitaph set down below [N]. An account of his translations, and other works,

[I] He founded two Lectures of Physick in Oxford, and one at Cambridge.] The endowment of them is the manor of Tracy's in Kent. The two lectures in Oxford (one of twelve pounds a year, the other of six) were not settled 'till December 10, 1549, by the survivor of his trustees Cuthbert Tonstall, the deprived Bishop of Durham, at the instance of Dr Rainolds Warden of Merton-college. And he fix'd them to that college, because more of that society than any other, turned their thoughts and studies to Physick. The Lecturers are obliged to explain Hippocrates and Galen to the young students in the university; and if there be none in that college capable of performing this duty, proper persons in any other society may be chosen to read either of these lectures (22).

[K] To establish a corporate society of Physicians in London.] In the letters patent he is named with great honour, as one of those six whom the King made choice of for constituting this royal foundation.

[L] Having, by a story that is said of him, been unacquainted before with the sacred writings.] The story, as told by Sir John Cheke (24), is to this effect. That Linacre, a little before his death, when he was broken by age, labour, and infirmities, began to study the holy Scriptures. And having taken the New-Testament, and read the beginning of it, particularly the 5th, 6th, and 7th, chapters of St Matthew, he threw the book away with great violence, and swore, That either this was not the Gospel, or We were not Christians.— Cum provesta admodum inclinatae aetate esset, homo studiis moribusque fractus, & morti vicinus, cum sacerdos esset, jam tum Novum Testamentum, primo in manus cepisset, & ex eo aliquot Matthaei capita perlegisset fertur. Et quum quantum, sextum, septimumque percurisset, abjecto iterum quantum potuit totis viribus libro, jurasse, Aut hoc non fuisse Evangelium, aut nos non esse Christianos. — To which speech Dr T. Fuller gives a favourable turn, by observing, That it is capable of a charitable sense, as taxing mens practice so much different from God's precepts (25).

[M] But where we cannot learn.] Some of his preferments he received from Archbishop Warham, as he gratefully acknowledges in a letter to that Prelate; which begins thus, Statueram, amplissime Praeful, pro ocio, in quo me, honorifico collato Sacerdotio, ex negotio primus vindicasti, merito primos ejus fructus tibi dedicare (26). Dr Knight informs us, that he was Prebendary of St Stephen's Westminster *. And Bishop Tanner †, that he was also Rector of Wigan in Lancashire.

[N] With an epitaph.] Which was in these words. Thomae Lynacrus, Regis Henrici VIII. Medicus, vir & Graecè & Latine, atque in re medica longè eruditissimus. Multos aetate sua languentes, & qui jam animam desponderant, vitæ restituit. Multa Galeni opera is given in the note [O]. They were highly applauded by Erasmus, and other the best judges [P]. As to Dr Linacre's character; we are assured, that for his accurate skill in the Greek and Latin tongues, in other sciences, and in his own profession, he was esteemed the ornament of his age. It is a question, whether he was a better Latinist or Grecian, a better Grammarian or Physician, a better Scholar, or Man for his moral qualifications (o). We have the concurrent testimony of the most knowing men, his contemporaries, that he was one of a great natural sagacity, and of a discerning judgment, in his own profession; of which we have an instance in the prognostick he made concerning the case of his friend Lily, where he foretold his certain death, if he submitted to the opinion of some rash persons, who advised him; and did prevail with him, to have a malignant stumous tumour in his hip cut off. [O] An account of his translations and other works, &c.] The most considerable of his translations were, I. The following pieces of Galen, which he rendered into proper and elegant Latin. 1. De temperamentis, & de inæquali temperis. Lib. 4. Venet. 1498. Cantab. 1521, 4to. per Johannem Siberch. & Paris. per Sim. Colinaeum. 1523, dedicated to Pope Leo X. 2. De tuendâ Sanitate, vel Valetudine. Libr. 6. Cantab. 1517. Paris 1530 dedicated to King Henry VIII. 3. De methodo medendi, sive De morbis curandis. Lib. 14. Paris. 1526. 8vo. revised by Budæus, and printed in 1530 by Colinaeus.—A difficult undertaking, and never well performed by any before—opus planè arduum, & quod, sive id ob subtilitatem suam, sive prolixitatem, mille jam annis nemo (atque Latine, ne dicam ex tantis operis dignitate vertere (quod sciam) est aggressus, as the Doctor owns in his preface. 4. De naturalibus, seu naturæ facultatibus. Lib. 3. 5. De pulsuum usu. Liber 1 reprinted in 1528, by S. Colinaeus, cum quibusdam Pauli Æginetæ de diebus criticis. And the latter, viz. De pulsuum usu, cum aliis de Pulsibus Galeni libris, revised by Herman Crusser, was reprinted by Colinaeus in 1532. 6. De Symptomatibus. Lib. 4. printed at Paris by Colinaeus in 1528. II. He translated from Greek into Latin Proclus of the Sphere, Procli Diadochi Sphæra. Venet. 1499 and 1500. dedicated to Pr. Arthur. Aldus Manutius, the editor, gives a great character of it, in an epistle prefixed thereto—Erasmus informs us, that Dr Linacre dedicated it to King Henry VII. But that Bernard Andreas, tutor to Prince Arthur, having insinuated to his Majesty, in an invidious manner, that the book had been translated before by another hand (though in a most wretched manner), it made the King conceive an extreme aversion to Dr Linacre, and despise his present (27). III. Dr Linacre composed, or compiled, The Rudiments of Grammar, for the use of the Princess Mary. London, printed by Pynson. But it appears to be little more than the present Accidence taught in schools. The famous George Buchanan translated it into Latin, for the use of his noble pupil Gilbert Kennedy Earl of Cassiles, and caused it to be printed under this title, 'Rudimenta Grammaticæ Thomæ Linacri, ex Anglico sermone in Latinum versa, Georgio Buchanano Scoto interprete.' Paris. apud Rob. Stephanum, 1536. & Gryphium Lugd. 1541, 8vo (28). IV. But our learned Doctor's larger work in this kind was, De emendata Structura Latini Sermonis Libri sex. Lond. printed by Ric. Pynson, 1524, 8vo. and afterwards by R. Stephens, 1527, 1532. with a dedication by Ph. Melancthon to W. Risenstein; wherein he calls this work the most perfect in it's kind. Itaque mihi quidem nullum videtur in hoc genere scriptum extare perfectius. And every learned reader cannot but admire therein, the author's perfect skill in the art of Grammar, and his various and extensive acquaintance with the best authors; as Mr Mattaire rightly observes. In quibus consummatam artis illius peritiam, & multifariam optimorum quorumque auctorum lectionem eruditus harum rerum judex non poterit non admirari (29) We are told by Dr Knight (30), that this most accurate commentary was probably printed with a respect to St Paul's school in London, Linacer being encouraged thereto by Dean Colet; who he refused after all to admit it into his school, which the Doctor highly resented. For it cost him a great deal of time and trouble; he being forming and revising it twenty years together, in the midst of his practice of physick, and his philosophical and mathematical studies. Dr Knight adds, that the book has since met with great applause, had several editions abroad, some with annotations; and has been had in the highest reputation as a classic. V. A. Wood ascribes to our author a book intitled, 'Compendious Regiment, or a Dietarie of health, used at Mount-pillour.' Lond. by Rob. Wyer, 8vo (31).

[P] They were highly applauded by Erasmus, and other the best judges.] Erasmus's high opinion of them, appears from the following passages in his letters. Tandem apud nos profare coepit Galenus a Linacro versus, qui mihi supra modum placet. Posthac & medicum fieri juvat.—Mitto dono libros Galeni, opera Linacri melius Romane loquentes, quam antea Græce loquebantur (32).—Est apud Britannos vir undequaque doctissimus Thomas Linacrus.—multis annis eliminatis lucubrations suas vicissim edit in lucem. Prodiit Galenus æpist. ad Ætievōv tanta fide, tanta luce, tanto Romani sermonis nitore redditus, ut nihil usquam desideret Lectōr Latinus: imo nihil non melius reperiat, quam apud Græcos habeatur. Successerunt libri Therapeutice, quos scis quales antebac habuerimus (33).—Apud Britannos studio Thomæ Linacri sc nuper disertus coepit esse Galenus, ut in sua lingua parum disertus videri possit Ejusdem opera sic Latine legitur Aristoteles, ut, licet Atticus, viz in suo sermone parem habeat gratiam (34).—Sunt illi permulta in scriptis, magno usui futura studio. His monumentis vir ille consuluit immortalitati sui nominis, his ornat suam Angliam, his aulam regiam illustrat, atque ipsum in primis principem, cui medicus est primarius (35).—In all these passages he affirms, that the Doctor's versions exceed the original: as, in the following, he commends the propriety, conciseness, and elegance of them. Linacrum novi virum undequaque doctissimus.—Urbanitatem usquam affectat, ab affectibus abstinet religiosus quam ullus Atticus, brevilloquentiam & elegantiam amat, ad docendum intentus. Aristotelem & Quintilianum studuit exprimer (36).—But he gently reproves him, for being over-nice, and spending too much time in them. At tu, si mihi permittis ut libere tecum agam, sine sine premis tuas omnium eruditissimas lucubrations, ut periculum sit, ne pro cauto modestoque crudelis habearis, qui studia bujus sæculi tam lenta torques expectatione tuorum laborum, ac tam diu fraudes desideratissimo fructu tuorum voluminum (37). The learned Bishop Huet passes the same judgment upon him (38).—Adeamus Thomam Linacrum, quo nemo majorem orationis nitorem, castitatem, & condescendentiam ad interpretationem contulit: quarum virtutum integritatem dum diligentius tueri sudet, fidelem verborum affectionem, raro quidem, at aliquando tamen, omisit. We shall conclude this learned man's article with the just encomium given of him by the anonymous editor of his translation of Galen de Symptomatibus.—Linacrus—vir ut utriusque linguæ doctissimus, ita reconditarum artium cum primis eruditus: qui studiosos omnes (dum vixerat) ad meliorem illam mentem non modo adhortabatur, verum etiam maximis munerebus & fovere & alere solebat, ut non immerito tanquam aliter Mæcenat doctis latinibus haberetur.

that reason among others worthy himself to be admired, in the monument he set up to the memory of this excellent man, informs us particularly, what extraordinary cures he performed in many cases, which had been thought desperate. He adds this farther character (and that a very amiable one) of him, that he had an utter detestation of every thing that was trickish or dishonourable; that he was a most faithful friend; and by the greatest part of the world, and by all ranks of men, valued and beloved. And indeed as he was perfectly skilled himself in his own art; so he always shewed a remarkable kindness for all those who bent their studies that way; and wherever he found, in young students, any ingenuity, learning, modesty, good manners, and a desire to excel, he assisted them with his advice, his interest, and his purse (p). In a word, he was in his own time reckoned, by the best judges, a man of a bright genius, and a clear understanding, as well as unusual knowledge in different parts of learning; and his works, which are now extant, will fully satisfy us, that he deserved this character. He was one, who both living and dead, by his writings and his benefactions, has done great honour, not only to his profession, but to his country (q). C

LISTER [MARTIN], an eminent Physician and Natural Philosopher, was born of Yorkshire parents, settled in the county of Buckingham about the year 1638 (a). He received the first part of his education under his great-uncle, Sir Matthew Lister, Knt (b); who having fitted him for the university, he was sent to St John's-college in Cambridge, where, prosecuting his studies with commendable diligence, he obtained his first degree in Arts, anno 1658 (c), not long after the death of his uncle, who being a hearty Loyalist [A], had taken care to imbue his nephew with the same principles; the fruits whereof he reaped at the Restoration, being appointed Fellow of his college by a royal mandate from King Charles II. in 1660. Two years afterwards he proceeded Master of Arts (d); and resolving to make Physick his profession, he applied himself more particularly to the study of that art; and, for further improvement therein, travelled into France about the year 1668 (e). On his return home he settled at York in 1670 (f), and continued in the practice of his Faculty many years in that city with high applause. At the same time employing his leisure hours upon subjects of the Natural History and Antiquities of his country, he distinguished himself so much that way, as to be chosen Fellow of the Royal Society; in which learned body he became very remarkable, by the great number of papers communicated to them [B]. About the year 1683, leaving the country in compliance to the solicitations of some friends, he removed to London; and, being created Doctor of Physick at Oxford by diploma [C] on the 11th of March that year, he was shortly after elected Fellow of the college of Physicians (g). He had already published several treatises upon the Natural History, &c. of Animals, an account whereof was constantly printed in the Philosophical Transactions [D]. In the younger part of his life he spared no pains in the search after natural and antique curiosities, travelling into several parts of England, especially in the North, for that purpose; but growing into a less confirmed state of health, after twenty-six years spent in these pursuits, together with the busyness of his profession, he found himself under a necessity of taking to a more easy and sedentary life; during which, he employed his pen in drawing up such medicinal observations, as were the fruits of an extensive practice (h). These he published in Latin, under [A] Who being a hearty Loyalist] We have the following account of this gentleman from Mr Wood: That he was born at Thornton in Craven in Yorkshire, was bred at Oxford, and became Fellow of Oriel-college there; but travelling abroad, he took his Doctor of Physick's degree at the university of Basil in Germany, and was incorporated in the same degree at Oxford, May 15, 1665. Afterwards he became a Retainer to the celebrated Countess of Pembroke, whose estate he managed to the best advantage. He was next made Physician to Queen Anne, consort to King James the First; and then Physician in Ordinary to King Charles the First, from whom he received the honour of knighthood at Oatlands, October 11, 1636. At length he became President of the College of Physicians, and one of the most eminent of the Faculty in his time. He died at Burwel near Lowth in Lincolnshire about the year 1657, aged ninety two, and was probably buried there (1).

[B] He communicated a great number of papers to the Royal Society.] There are near forty of these printed in the Philosophical Transactions, from No 25 to No. 585 inclusive; containing observations and experiments upon various subjects in Meteorology, Hydrology, Mineralogy, Botany, Zoology, Anatomy, Pharmacy, and Antiquities.

[C] He was created Doctor of Physick by diploma.] This being an honour conferred only in consideration of some extraordinary merit, the particulars of that merit are usually mentioned in the preamble, the substance whereof, in the present instance, was contained in the Chancellor's letter of recommendation, as follows: That he was lately a practitioner of Physick at York, now here in London; a person of exemplary loyalty, and of high esteem among the most eminent of his profession, for his excellent skill and success therein; and hath given farther proof of his worth and knowledge, by several learned books by him published (2); he hath entertained so great an affection for the university of Oxford, that he hath lately presented the library with diverse valuable books, both manuscript and printed, and enriched the new Museum with several altars, coins, and other antiquities, together with a great number of curiosities of nature, whereof several cannot be matched for any price, which yet he declares to be but an earnest of what he further intends, &c. (3)

[D] An account whereof was published in the Philosophical Transactions] The titles of these are, 1. Historiae Animalium Angliae, tres tractatus. Unus de Araniis. Alter de Cochleis, tum terrestribus tum fluvialibus. Tertius de Cochleis marinis. Quibus adjectus est quartus de Lapidibus ejusdem insulae ad cochlearum quendam imaginem figuratis. 1678. 2. Joh. Gaedartius of Insects, done into English, and methodized with the addition of notes. 1682, 4to. 3. The same book in Latin. 4. De Fontibus Medicatis Angliae Exercitatio nova & prior. Ebor. 1682. There is an account of several of these tracts in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 139, 143, 144, 166; and the last was reprinted at London in 1684, with the addition of a second part, intitled, De Fontibus Medicatis Angliae dissertatio altera.

(3) Wood's Fasti, Vol. II. col. 224. Our author, as appears in Phil. Transf. was particularly acquainted with Mr Lhwyd, then Keeper of the Ashmolean Museum, who had a great esteem for him, and was probably the chief instrument in procuring his diploma.

under the title of Exercitationes Medicinales, in 1697, 8vo [E]. The following year, he attended the Earl of Portland in his embassy from King William the Third to the Court of France. He staid at Paris about six months, and, on his return, published an account of this journey, containing observations on the state and curiosities of that metropolis. These being thought somewhat minute and trifling for a man of letters, were smartly ridiculed in a pleasant travesty, under the title of a Journey to London, published by the ingenious Dr William King the same year [F]. In 1709, he published his Dissertatio de Humoribus; and in November that year, upon the indisposition of Dr Edward Hannes, our author was promoted to be second Physician in Ordinary to her Majesty Queen Anne (b). But this honour he enjoyed only a few years; he laboured then under the weight of age and infirmities, which increasing, put a period to his life in February 1711-12, being succeeded as Queen's Physician by Dr Thomas Shadwell (i). Besides the books already mentioned in the course of this memoir, the Doctor published some others, the titles of which are inserted below [G].

[E] Exercitationes Medicinales, &c.] These he had published singly before; but in this edition they were corrected and enlarged. The collection consists of eight exercitations upon so many distempers. In the seventh, De Calculo Humano, of the Stone, speaking of the saline spirits of animals, as proper medicines in this calamity, among others, he takes notice of the volatile spirit of raw silk, which, says he, is very well known under the name of Goddard's drops. Vis autem salina & Jericio evaporata apud nostrates notissima est sub nomine Goddard's Drops (4). That secret, he declares elsewhere, he had from King Charles the Second; and that this spirit, rarified with the oil of cinnamon, or some other essential oil, was the true receipt of those drops.

(4) Exercit. Medicinal. p. 254.

[E] The Journey to London, published by Dr King.] Dr King fictitiously ascribes this travesty to Mr Sorbieri, who had given an account of England full of mistakes and misrepresentations, and altogether trifling and almost unintelligible; which he makes our author rival, especially for the clearness of his expression, elegance of his descriptions, and ingenious choice of his subjects. The witty irony runs through the several parts of our author's Journey, in the order as they lie in the first edition; but had the doctor waited a little, he would have been supplied with further matter of ridicule. Our author published a second edition of his Journey in 1699, wherein, upon occasion of his Synopsis Conchyliorum, printed at London in 1685, folio, he tells the following story, sufficiently replete with vanity. Monf. Clement, says he, Deputy-Librarian to the King's library, having shewed me the Synopsis, I told him, I was sorry to see it there, and wondered how he came by it; for it was, I assured him, but a very imperfect trial of the plates, which I had disposed of to some few friends only, 'till I should be able to close and finish the design, which I now had done to my power, and would redeem that book with a better copy at my return to England.—The reader, continues he, will pardon me the vanity, if I tell him, that this book was no inconsiderable present, even for so great a prince as the King of France: for that, besides the time that it took me up (ten years at least) at leisure hours, to dispose, methodize, and figure, this part of Natural History, it could not have been performed by any person else for less than 2000 pounds sterling, of which sum yet a great share it stood me in out of my private purse.

LITTLETON [THOMAS], remarkably famous for his profound skill, both theoretical and practical, in the municipal or common law of England, flourished in the XVth century. He was the eldest son of Thomas Westcote, of the county of Devon, Esq; [A] by Elizabeth, daughter and sole heir of Thomas Luttleton or Lyttleton, of Frankley in Worcestershire (a); in compliance to whom she consented, that the issue (or at least the eldest son) [B] proceeding from that marriage, should take the surname of Lyttleton, and [A] Thomas Weston of the county of Devon, Esq;] When this gentleman married into the Littleton family we know not exactly, but in all probability it was in the reign of Henry IV. or in the beginning of that of Henry V. since in 1454, the 23d of Henry VI. we find our author capable of being called to the honourable degree of a serjeant at law, which was not conferred upon very young men in those days (1).

The Lyttletons, or Littletons, are a family of very ancient extraction, their ancestors being settled in the vale of Evesham in the county of Worcester, so early as the 7th of Henry II. 1161. Deeds for conveyance of lands in that county, of that date, being witnessed by John of Littleton, clerk: from whence it has been imagined, they took their name and rise from the small town of Littletone in that vale; which origin (at least for our author's branch) Sir Edward Coke, in his first book of InRitutes, takes for granted (2).

In the beginning of Henry III's long reign, Thomas de Lyttleton married Emma, an heiress, and lady of the manor of Frankley in the said vale. The issue of this marriage was a daughter named Emma, who was married to Augerus of Tatlington, in the parish of Tredington; by whom she had a son, who used to write himself Nicholas of Frankley, son of Augerus of Tatlington, and had issue one son, who called himself Thomas of Tatlington, and died without issue. Emma, his mother, surviving her husband and son, married again to a Whetehamsted, and died, seized of Frankley 1298, as appears by an inquisition after the death of Emma de Whethy, taken at Worcester.

Thomas of Lyttleton outlived Emma of Frankley, and marrying to his second wife Ancelina Fitzwarren, by her had three sons, Thomas, Edmund, and John (3); the eldest of which, married Lucia de Bois, or Atwood, by whom he had two sons, Thomas and John; the eldest of whom, succeeded to the inheritance of Frankley, on the death of his kinsman Thomas of Tatlington (4), or rather on the death of Emma, mother of Thomas. He married Julian, daughter and heir of Robert Somery, a younger brother of Baron Dudley, and left by her a son named John, who is mentioned in a commission of array, 1 H. IV. and who was succeeded by Thomas Luttleton, or Lyttleton, one of the esquires of the body to Henry IV. and Henry V. and grandfather to our author.

[B] Consented that the issue (or at least the eldest son) &c.] There is a tradition that the three brothers of bear the arms of that family; argent, a chevron between three escalop shells sable; which our learned judge, accordingly, ever after bore, as eldest son and heir of the said Thomas Westcote, and Elizabeth his wife. He was educated at one of our universities, according to Sir Edward Coke (b), and afterwards transplanted himself to the Inner-Temple, London, and was in due time made one of the readers there; and read particularly, on the statute of Westminster 2. concerning conditional gifts (c). He was afterwards made by Henry VIth, Steward or Judge of the Court of the Palace, or Marshalsea of the King's household (d); and on the 13th of May, 1455, in the 33d year of that reign, King's Serjeant (e): in which capacity, he rode the northern circuit as judge of the assize (f). In 1462, the 2d of Edward IVth, our author received a pardon from the Crown, and was continued in his post of King's Serjeant (g), and also in that of Justice of Assize for the same circuit; and on the 26th of April, 1466, 6th Edward IVth, was appointed one of the Judges of the Court of Common-pleas (h), and rode the Northamptonshire circuit; and as a mark of favour, obtained a writ directed to the Commissioners of the customs for the ports of London, Bristol, and Kingston upon Hull, for the annual payment of 110 marks to support his dignity, with 106 shillings and eleven pence half-penny, to furnish him with a furred robe, and six shillings and six-pence more, for another robe called Linura: and in the 15th of that reign, was created, amongst others, a Knight of the honourable Order of the Bath (i) [C]. Our author married Johan, relict of Sir Philip Chetwin [D], by whom he had three sons, Sir William, his successor, Richard, an eminent lawyer under Henry VIIth, and Henry VIIIth, and Thomas: each of which (the two youngest receiving good possessions of inheritance from their father) married advantageously during his life (k) [E]. 'Thus (says Lord Chief Justice Coke, speaking of the Judge) advanced he his posterity, and his posterity, by imitation of his virtues have, honoured him (l).' Sir Thomas, during the troubles and confusions of his times, fo ordered his behaviour, as to enjoy the favour of both the contending Sovereigns: and at the same time, acquired the esteem of all, for his great skill in the laws of England, an esteem which has ever been increasing, and his memory must always challenge veneration from all the students and professors of it, for that inestimable legacy he has left them in his treatise of the English Tenures or Titles [F], by which all estates were anciently held the judge, whose names were Nicholas, Edmund, and Guy (5), wrote their paternal name, Westcote; which their mother once taking exception at, and asking them whether they thought themselves better than their eldest brother? they replied, he altered his name, to inherit a fair estate, which, if they might share with him, they could do the same. And it appears, that Nicholas the second son, who married Agnes, daughter, and one of the heirs of William Handfacre, of Handfacre in Staffordshire, did not alter his, the Westcotes of Staffordshire claiming him for their ancestor; neither did Guy, the fourth, for he marrying a Greenville of Gloucestershire, gave rise to the family of the Westcotes, now settled in Devonshire: tho' it is highly probable, Edmund (who was father of two sons Thomas and Richard) or some of his descendants did; a family bearing the name and arms of Lyttleton, being seated in Cornwall, A. [C] Knights of the honourable Order of the Bath. This creation was made on the 18th of April 1475, consisting of 26 Knights, viz. Edward Prince of Wales; the Duke of York; the eldest son of the Earl of Lincoln; the Duke of Suffolk; two of the Queen's brothers; Lord Thomas, and Lord Richard Gray; the Earl of Shrewsbury; the Earl of Wiltshire; Mr Edward Woodville; Lord Nevil; Sir William Berkley (6); Sir John Stourton, eldest son and heir of the Lord Audley; Lord St. Amand; George, son and heir of the Lord Stanley; John, son and heir of Lord Ferrers of Chartley; Richard Herbert, brother to the Earl of Pembroke (7); Vaughan Brian, Chief-Justice of England; Thomas Littleton (our author); Mr Bodringham; Mr Bryan Stapleton; Mr Knevit; Mr Pilkington; Mr Ludlow; and Mr Charleton (8).

[D] Johan, relict of Sir Philip Chetwin. She was daughter and one of the heirs of William Burley, of Broomcroft Castle in the County of Salop (9), who was son and heir to John Burley, of the same place, Esq; younger brother to Sir Simon Burley, Knight of the Garter, and who bore for arms, argent, a fess chequy or and azure, on a lyon rampant sable, armed gules (10). Her mother was daughter of John Grendon in Staffordshire.

Thomas Welch (11), or Walsh, of Waleys and of Wanlop in Leicestershire, Esq; by Mary, daughter and co-heir of Richard Byron, of Clayton in Lancashire, and widow of Thomas Fielding, Esq; one of the present Earl of Denbigh's ancestors. Sir William had by this lady only one daughter, Joan, whom he married to Sir John Aston, of Tixal, Knight (12); but by his second lady, Mary, daughter of William Whittington, of Pantley in the county of Gloucester, Esq; he left issue one son, John, his heir, and a daughter, Anne, who was married to Thomas Rouse, of Ragley, in the county of Warwick, by whom she became mother to the abbess of Ramsey*. Sir William, after living many years in great splendor (for his mother who survived the judge, left him large possessions) (13) at Frankley, died on the 8th of November, 1508, and was buried in the great church of the abbey of Hales-Owen. †

Richard Littleton, our author's second son, to whom his father addressed his book of Tenures, married Alice, daughter and sole-heiress of William Winbury (14), or Winnebury, of Pilleton-hall, in the county of Stafford, Esq; who brought him a large estate, and from whom the present Littletons of that county are descended.

The judge's third son, Thomas, settled at Speckley, and siding with Henry VII. when Lord Lincoln entered England with an army in favour of Lambert Simnel, the pretended Earl of Warwick; he was knighted by the King, two days after the battle of Stoke (15), which put an end to that imposture. This Sir Thomas married Anne, daughter and heir of John Botreaux, of Abbot Salford, in the county of Warwick, and of Botreaux Castle and barony of Cornwall, Esq; by whom he left one son, who called himself Thomas Littleton, of Speckley and Elmly in Worcestershire, and who married Alice Hunks, of Northwyke, in the same county, by whom he had no issue; but left two natural sons, William, surnamed Trevis, after his mother; and Richard, on whom, by his will, he settled some estates of his own purchasing (16). On an inquisition taken after his death in the 28th of Henry VIII. John Littleton of Mounflow, in the county of Salop, clerk (17), was found to be his heir, and from him descended several families of this name in Shropshire.

as he himself informs us (18), some chapters in the ancient book of tenures, wrote in the reign of Edward III (19). That author treated of them promiscuously, making twenty-five different tenures, viz. 1. Knights service, by which the tenant was obliged to bear arms for defence of the realm. 2. Grand serjeanty, which obliged him to attend the King by himself, or his deputy, whenever he went to war; and also consisted in doing corporal services, such as bearing the King's banner, or conducting his arms in war, and performing particular offices at the King's coronation in peace. 3. Petty serjeanty, by which he was bound to present the King with a bow, or arrows, or some other implement of war. 4. Escuage, which was a kind of knights service, and consisted in paying a certain rate charged by the Lord on all his tenants towards maintaining the wars against the Scotch and the Welch, when they invaded the borders of England. These were in the nature of royalties, and as such challenged right of ward, marriage, and relief, except petty serjeanty, which was not entitled to either. 5. Homage Ancestral, where the tenant and his ancestors had held of the Lord and his ancestors by that tenure of homage and rent certain, beyond the memory of man; whereby the Lord was bound to warrant or defend his tenant in the possession of the lands so holden against all other claimants. 6. Tenant by the courtesy of England; that is, where a man marries a wife with an estate of inheritance, and has issue by her, whether that issue be male or female, lives or dies, if the husband survives the wife, he enjoys the estate, punishable of waste during his life, but cannot alien it beyond that term; for if he does, the heir of the wife may enter and dispossess him. 7. Fee-simple, the highest estate in the law: being a free-grant to the possessor of lands or tenements, to hold to him, his heirs and assigns, for ever, and which he may charge, alien, or dispose of by sale, gift, or devise. 8. Frank tenure, which is but a fee for life of the tenant, or some other, and unalienable. 9. Dower, a man possessed of an estate of inheritance takes a wife and dies; his heir, on entering into possession, shall endow the wife (she claiming it) of the third part of such estate, which she holds for her life. There are five kinds of dower, At the common law. By the custom. At the church porch. By the assent of the father. And, of the most fair or better part. 10. For years by lease or grant; this is only a chattel real, and can never descend to the heir of the tenant, but goes to his executors. 11. Mortgage, which is a fee on condition, the performance or non-performance of which, may change it into a fee-simple, &c. 12. Burgage, is confined to the ancient boroughs, in which lands were granted by the King, and other Lords spiritual or temporal, to their tenants, who paid a certain annual rent for such lands: wherefore it is but a tenure in socage, and is governed by custom and prescription. 13. Socage, is the holding lands or tenements, by payment of a rent certain, in lieu of all manner of services, which was originally granted for the encouragement of tillage, that the husbandman might have leisure to till his grounds. There are three kinds of it: Socage in frank tenure, Socage is ancient tenure, and Socage in base tenure. 14. Fee-Farm, or freehold, which conveys a fee simple as to inheritance, but the tenant pays to the Lord a consideration of the whole, half, or third part, of the value. To this tenure fealty is incident, but not relief. 15. Frank fee, is to hold land pleadable at the common law, in fee simple. 16. Base-Fee, is to hold solely at the will of the Lord. But there are several estates held at the will of the Lord by custom, which are permanent and valuable, such as tenants by copy of court-roll, and tenants by the verge. 17. Villenage, was the basest and lowest of all tenures; the tenant holding under the title, and on condition of performing all low and mean services for the Lord, without whose leave he could never, in his own right, possess any other lands or chattels, real or personal; and was even obliged to pay a fine for liberty to marry his children, who were confined to the same degree, nor could ever by any act of their own (except entering into a religious life) free themselves from that state of servitude. N. B. Though the tenure of Villenage still remains by custom in some places, yet there are now no villains, properly such by the law in England at this time, but all are born free. 18. Fee-tail, is a conditional fee, where lands or tenements are given to one or more, to hold to them and the heirs of their body; and is divided into three sorts, viz. General. Special. After possibility of issue extinct. The first, is where lands, &c. are given to one, and the heirs or issue of his or her body begotten; the second, where the estate is granted to a man and his wife, and the heirs-male, or heirs-female, of their two bodies begotten; the third, is where a man and his wife are tenants in tail-special, and one of them dies without having issue by the other, the survivor becomes tenant in tail, after possibility of issue according to the grant, through the death of the other being extinct, and may hold the estate for life, discharged from all actions of waste; but if he aliens the heir may enter. 19. Frank-Marriage, is a tail-special in an estate given in consideration of an inter-marriage between the tenants, and requires that the wife be of the blood or consanguinity of the donor or giver. Fealty is incident to this tenure, but no other services 'till after the fourth generation. 20. Frank-Almoin, was where lands were given to the use of the Church as a free alms, i. e. quit of all manner of services. This tenure lay only in prescription in Littleton's time, the statute of 18 Edward I. having prohibited such grants: but by 1 and 2 Philip and Mary it was revived and continued in force a long time, but is now again abolished. 21. Tenant by Elegit, is where one person having recovered a debt or damages by a judgment in law against another, chuses to take half his lands and chattels (except oxen and beasts of the plough) and hold them 'till the debt is satisfied. And if he commits waste, it shall be enquired into, and valued towards the discharge of the debt; for when that is cleared, the estate shall return to the debtor or his heirs again, so that the creditor cannot alien the moiety in his possession. 22. Tenant by Statute-Merchant, is where a person having become bound in an obligation before the Mayor, Bailiff, or other chief Magistrate of a town, to pay to another at a set day any certain sum of money, and does not then make payment, the Mayor, &c. on complaint made puts the creditor into possession of the debtor's estate, which he may hold and occupy 'till the debt is paid, but must not commit waste. 23. Frank-Farm, differs from fee-farm, in that neither ward, marriage, nor relief, are incident to it. 24. Rents of inheritance; divided into Rent-service, Rent-charge, and Rent-seck: the first is where a person holds of another, by fealty and suit of Court, and the Lord accepts a certain rent in lieu of all services. The second, is where on granting any estate in land, the grantor reserves to himself and his heirs a certain rent out of the same; for the former, the Lord may distrain of common right, but not for this, unless there be a clause of distress in the deed. The third, is when any tenant holds by services and rent, if the Lord reserves the services to himself, and grants the rent to another, that is called Rent-seck, 25. Suit; and this is either Suit-real, or Suit-service. By the former, the tenant is bound to attend the Court-Leet of his Lord twice in the year; and if he makes default, he may be amerced, but not distrained; and by the latter he is bound to attend the Court Baron, or other Court of his Lord, from three weeks to three weeks, i. e. once in every three weeks; and for neglecting so to do, he may be distrained but not amerced (20).

These several tenures our author methodised and digested into order, and commented on; his work being divided into three books: in the first of which, he treats of the nature of inheritances, which he divides into 7 general heads, Fee-simple; Fee-tail; Tenant by the courtesy of England; Tenant in Dower; For term of Life; For term of Years; and at Will: with their several subdivisions and the legal requisites to constitute each. In the second he treats in the same manner of the tenures by which they are severally held; as Homage, Fealty, Escuage, Knights Service, Socage, Frank-Almoin, Homage-Ancestral, Grand-Serjeanty, Burgage, and Villenage. And in the third book he treats of their qualities and incidents, mischiefs and remedies, under the several following heads; Parceners by common-law and by custom, Joint Tenancy, Tenancy in common, Estates upon condition in deed, or implied; De-no reason assigned for that conjecture: only it is presumed, it was not long before his death, as the titles of tenant by elegit, statute-merchant, and statute-staple are not treated of in the work, tho' in two places our author expressly promises to handle them (m). Sir Edward Coke says in the preface to his first book of Institutes (which is only a comment on this work of our author's) that those titles were contained in the table of the first printed book; but the editor of the 12th edition of that work, which was published in folio, A. D. 1738, observes, that those titles are neither in the table of the Roban edition, nor in those of London, printed by Richard Pinson, and by Robert Redmayne, in the 19th of Henry VIIIth, A. D. 1528: to which may be added, they are not in that of the edition published the 4th of May, 1544, by Wylliam Myddylton [G]. The time of their original publication is equally difficult to be determined. Lord Chief-Justice Coke observes, they were not published either by our author himself, or by his son Richard, or any other, until after the decease both of our Author, and of Richard his son. 'For (says he) I find it not cited in any book or report before Sir Anthony Fitzherbert cited him in his Natura Brevium (n), published in the 26th of Henry VIII. A. D. 1535; whereas he thinks, if it had been in print, it would in respect of it's excellency have been cited in the reports of Edward V. Richard III. Henry VII. or Henry VIII. or by the author of the Doctor and Student (o), which was printed in the 23d of Henry VIIIth, A. D. 1532. He adds, that the first edition he ever saw, was that printed at Rohan, (as it was wrote in French) by William de Tailier ad instantiam Richardi Pinson, printer to Henry VIII. which was before Natura Brevium was published; and thereupon concludes, it was first printed about the 24th of Henry VIIIth, A. D. 1533 [H], which was upwards of 50 years after the author's death. For he made his will the 22d of August, 1481, in the 21st year of Edward IVth, appointing his three sons, a parson, a vicar, and one of his servants, executors, and Dr John Alcock of Cambridge, the then Bishop of Worcester, supervisor of the same; and and dying the day following in his great and good age, was honourably interred in the cathedral church of Worcester, where a marble tomb, with his statue thereon, was erected to his memory (p).

[G] Edition, May 4, 1544.] Neither have those titles been ever printed in the tables of any subsequent edition; nor does it appear they could be inserted with any propriety, if the author's address to his son, which immediately precedes the table in every edition, be duly considered; for he begins Ore j'eo ay fait a toy mon Fils trois Livres. Le premier Livre des Estates qu' Hommes ont en Terres ou Tenements: cest a sçavoir, &c. i. e. Now my son I have made for thee three books. The first book is of estates which men have in lands or tenements: that is to say, &c. and then begins the table which contains all the before-mentioned titles, as they follow each other in every book. This seems to make it plain, that he looked on the work as complete at that time, without the addition of the titles in dispute.

[H] First printed about the 24th Henry VIII. A. D. 1533.] It is very clear from the two editions printed by Pinson and Redmayne now extant, that Sir Edward Coke is totally wrong in his conjecture: and the editor of the 12th edition has in a note on this part of Sir Edward's Preface given the following reasons to believe it was printed in England even so early as 1477, or the 17th of Edward IV. Enquiring into the time of the first impression. 'The old editions (says he) are bovementioned, Pynson's and le Talleur's name, and the manner Littleton is printed in at Roban, seem to be the only means of discovering what we seek. From those editions we may collect, not only that the Roban edition is older than the year 1528; but also, by what occurs in the beginning and end of them, that there had been other impressions of our author.

'From Pynson's name at the end of the Roban edition, it may be concluded, that he would not have engaged his friend William le Talleur, to have printed Littleton at Roban, had he ever before printed any books in French; and that he printed an abridgment of the statutes, part of which is in French, in 1499, appears by one of those books now extant. Statham's abridgment has his name to it, but there is no date to it; yet, it being printed with the same types and in the same manner Littleton was printed at Roban; and as it is a larger book, it is highly probable it was printed some time after Littleton's Tenures; and that Pynson's success in the lesser undertaking, induced him to venture on the greater, which in those days was a work of two or three years. William le Talleur printed a Chronicle of the Duchy of Normandy, as appears by his name and cypher at the end thereof, and the date in the beginning, in the year 1489. The book itself [the Roban edition of Littleton] is printed without any title-page, initial letter of the chapters, number of the leaves or year, and in a character much resembling writing, and with such abbreviations as are used in M. S. All which, it is well known to those who have seen many old books, are undoubted proofs of a book's being printed when that art was in it's infancy. Upon the whole it may be concluded, that the book was printed some years before 1487; because the above-mentioned Chronicle which hath not such marks of antiquity was printed in that year: and from what has been observed concerning the manner it is printed in, it will be thought by those who are versed in ancient books to have been published ten years before that time.' (22).

[A] An immediate descendant from the Judge.] He was descended from Sir William, eldest son and heir of the Judge, who at his death (as has been observed) left by his second lady one son, John, then but eight years old, being born in 1500, who afterwards married Elizabeth, daughter and co-heir of Sir Gilbert Talbot of Grafton in Worcestershire, Knight † Banneret and Captain of Calais, by Anne, daughter and co-heir of Sir William Paston, ancestor of the late Earl of Yarmouth, by whom he left seven sons and two daughters. being a man of great sense and judgment, and equally qualified for the cabinet and camp (a). In the 27th of Elizabeth, he was returned Knight of the shire for the county of Worcester, though a Roman Catholic. He was a zealous follower of the Earl of Essex, and by that means unhappily involved in that nobleman's catastrophe, being one of the council which assembled at Drury-house, to concert measures for the carrying on the Earl's plot to seize the person of Queen Elizabeth [B], so that, after failure in the attempt made to raise an insurrection in London by the Earl, and his imprisonment in the Tower, Mr Littleton was seized amongst the rest of the confederates; and on the 20th of February (the day after Lord Essex's condemnation) he, together with Sir Robert Vernon, Sir William Constable, Sir Edward Bainham, Henry Cuffe, Captain Whitelocke, John and Christopher Wright, with an old soldier named Orell, none of which, except Mr Littleton and Cuffe, had been members of what they called the Earl's old Junto, were brought to the bar and arraigned; after which, Littleton, (then in a very ill state of health) Bainham, and Orell, were put upon their immediate trial, pursuant to a command from the Queen, signified to the Court in a letter, wherein she observed, that all but these (as Sir Fulke Greville had informed her) had been drawn in unwittingly; wherefore the others were remanded to prison (b). The chief charge against Mr Littleton was for having first of Philip and Mary he was Knight of the Shire for Worcester; and in the 5th of Philip and Mary, purchased a great estate at Hales-Owen, as he did afterwards Hagley and Prestwood for hunting-seats. He had by his above lady six sons. 1. Gilbert. 2. William. 3. George. 4. John. 5. Robert. And, 6. Francis. And four daughters. 1. Elizabeth. 2. Margaret. 3. Amphiliss. 4. Frances. The three youngest sons, and the youngest daughter, died unmarried. Amphiliss was married to William Barneby, of Bokelton in Worcestershire, Esq; Margaret to Samuel Marrow of Berkswell in the county of Warwick, Esq; and Elizabeth, to Francis Willoughby of Wollaton, in the county of Nottingham, Esq; from which marriage the present Lord Middleton is descended. William the second son married Margaret, daughter and heir of Richard Smyth, of Shireford in the county of Warwick, Esq; and dying without issue, his younger brother George married his widow, and by that means secured a large estate in the family. Gilbert, the heir, marrying Elizabeth, daughter of Humphrey Coningsby, of Hampton-Court in Herefordshire, and Neitherfolers in Shropshire, Esq; by her had John, his heir, the subject of the present article, and two other sons, who both died without issue inheritable; and one daughter Anne, whose husband was Sir Thomas Cornwall, called the great Baron of Burford in Shropshire. Gilbert, the father of the gentleman we now treat on, represented his county (Worcester) in Parliament, during the 13th and 14th years of Elizabeth, and died at his house in the White-Fryars, Fleet-Street, London, 1599, in the 59th year of his age.

[B] To seize the person of Queen Elizabeth.] This council was held about Candlemas in the year 1600 (2), and consisted of the Earl of Southampton, Sir Charles Davers, Sir Ferdinando Gorges, Governor of Plymouth, Sir John Davies, a great Mathematician and Surveyor of the Ordnance, and Mr John Littleton, who was respected by the rest for his wit and valour (3). When they were met, a list was produced of 120 Noblemen, Knights, and Gentlemen, all wrote by the Earl of Essex's own hand, in order to induce them to believe those persons favoured his designs; which were next to be considered, and for carrying these on two things were proposed; the seizing the Tower, and securing the Queen's person and the Court: they also debated on the measures to be observed with regard to the City, before and after their attempt. Much was alledged in behalf of the Tower scheme, as the facility of entrance through Sir John Davies's means, the reputation, the gaining the principal fort of the realm, with its stores and provisions, would give their undertaking, and that thereby they might bridle the City. But this was unanimously over-ruled, as an attempt that would only distract them in the more principal design, the seizing the Queen's person, and making themselves masters of the Court, since if they succeeded in that, the other must necessarily follow. This opinion (notwithstanding they knew the Earl of Essex's strong inclination to secure the City first) was in the end generally agreed to, and resolved to be carried into execution in the method following. 'That certain select persons of their number, such as were well known in Court, and might have access, without check or suspicion, into the several rooms of the Court, according to the several qualities of the persons, and the difference of the rooms, should distribute themselves into the Presence, the guard-chamber, the hall, and the utter court and gate; and some one principal man undertaking every several room, with the strength of some few to be joyned with him, should make good his charge according to the occasion. — Sir Charles Davers was then named to the Presence, and to the great chamber, where he was appointed, when time should be, to seize upon the halberds of the guard; Sir John Davies to the hall; and Sir Christopher Blunt to the utter gate; these seeming to them the three principal wards of consideration. And that things being within the Court in a readinesse, a signal should be given and sent to the Earl of Essex, to set forward from Essex house, being no great distance off. Whereupon Essex, accompanied with the noblemen of his party, and such as should be prepared and assembled at his house for that purpose, should march towards the Court; and that the former conspirators already entered, should give correspondence to them without, as well by making themselves masters of the gates to give them entrance, as by attempting to get into their hands upon the sudden the halberds of the guards, thereby hoping to prevent any great resistance from within, and by filling all full of tumult and confusion. This being the platforme of their enterprise, the second act of this tragedy was also resolved; which was, that my Lord should present himself to her Majesty, as prostrating himself at her feet, and desire of her the remove of such persons, as he called his enemies from about her. And after that my Lord had obtained possession of the Queene and state, he should call his pretended enemies to a trial upon their lives, and summon a Parliament, and alter the government, and obtaine to himselfe and his associates such conditions, as seemed to him and them good. — These were the resolutions taken at that consultation, held by these five at Drury-house, some five or six days before the rebellion, to be reported to Essex, who ever kept to himself the binding and directing; which he did to prevent all differences that might grow by dissent or contradiction. And beside he had other persons (which were Cuffe and Blunt) of more inwardnesse and confidence with him than these (Southampton only excepted) which managed that consultation. And for the day of the enterprise, which is that must rise out of the knowledge of all the opportunities and difficulties, it was referred to Essex his own choice and appointment; it being nevertheless resolved, that it should be some time before the end of Candlemas term (4). And accordingly on Sunday the 8th of February the Earl, accompanied by the Lord Southampton, and about 300 gentlemen took boat from his own garden-stairs in the Strand, and went to the Old-Swan, where they landed, and marched up toward Sir Thomas Smith's (near Fen-Church), who the Earl had been informed had promised to assist him with 1000 of the Trained-Bands, being then one of the Sheriffs; but was disappointed, Sir Thomas attending the sermon at Paul's-Cross, towards which the Earl, after shifting his shirt at the Sheriff's house, bent his march; calling on the Londoners all the way (but in vain) to take up arms to assist him (5).

assisted at the above consultation, which was proved by Sir Charles Davers, who, 'tis said, first drew him into the snare; and great weight was laid on the number of horses, and great quantity of arms found in his inn when he was apprehended. He made very little defence, as he could not deny being at Drury-house, though he came in but at the latter end of the consultation, as Sir Charles, in his evidence against him, and in his confession taken two days before, had admitted; and as to the horses and arms, he said, that his estate was able to maintain good store of horses, and he always delighted in arms and horses. Hereupon he was (with the two others) convicted, and, on receiving sentence, only said, 'We praise thee, O God, we acknowledge thee to be the Lord.' He was immediately conveyed back, with his two fellow-convicts [C], to Newgate, from which the day following he wrote an admirable letter to Sir Walter Raleigh [D], to whom, 'tis said, he paid ten thousand pounds for procuring a pardon for his life; but his estate, which amounted to near seven thousand a year, was confiscated, and he detained in custody 'till his death, which happened on the 25th of July following, in the King's-Bench prison, to which he had been removed on the 25th of April before. During his confinement, he wrote several moving epistles to his lady [E], who was Merriel, daughter of Sir Thomas Bromley,

[C] Conveyed back with his two fellow-convicts.] Bainham procured his pardon through Sir Walter Raleigh, to whom it is said he paid a sum of money for the favour, and Orell was detained a prisoner, so that neither of them for the crime.

[D] He wrote an admirable letter to Sir Walter Raleigh.] This letter being preserved, the reader may like to peruse it; it was as follows,

Sir,
 'It is not worthy the vertue and honour you professe, to persecute persons fallen into misfortune, yf heretofore you have borne me causelesse displeasure, nowe of all others is the time leste seasonable to shew it. Remember, Sir, what it is to be truly noble, and howe it agreethe not with generous hartes to delite to trample upon dejected fortunes. It is now in your power to doe me good or ill offices. Yf now you doe me ill, you shall wrong your own reputation; if you doe me good, you shall give me cause to be thankfull. There is alreadye between your son and me one tye in blood and nature. I could be contente you did now double the knotte with offices of love and friendship. To begge your favour (in the state I stand) were too much basenesse, to refuse it were arrogancye and indiscretion, but to require you to do me no harme, is but justice, and that every gentleman oweth of right to another. What construction you will make of this, or what is now meeete to be done, I must refer to your own judgment, and so I end.

JOHN LITTLETON.

[E] He wrote several moving epistles to his lady.] The following was sent to her soon after he was first apprehended. Be not discomforted with the appearance of my present misfortunes. I have done no acte that can burthen my conscience; I have committed no offence that may justly bring scandal to my reputation. I have conceived no disloyal thought towards my contrey. My fault is my follye (if it may be termed a follye) to have been over zealous and affectionate to the friends I professed to love and follow. If the sway of times, and the power of great persons will make other interpretations, and wreste private actions to the offence of the public quiet, then must I, as well as others, be subject to that fatal imputation. I carrye notwithstanding, and ever will bear about me, a cleer sincere harte, and an unspotted conscience, upon which arches I doe supporte my mynde, and with those pillars staye up myselfe against all adversitie that men or fortune can lay upon me. I find no cause to dispayre of mine own safetie, my offence being not in any nature capital, and my friends giving dayly hopes to those, that sollicit for me this busines. But I build no strong walls upon these foundations: my principal trust is in him only, that is only able to helpe me. If he find it meet I must perish, that my sins, and the sins of my house do require this sacrifice to purge it, wellcom be his will; and I hope he will make it unto me none other than as a bridge to passe over from a base, vile, contemptible world, into a kingdom replenished with all blis and happines. Whether I live or dye, I humbly beseech bim I may be his; and then it little signifyeth whether now, or at what other time I take my journey towards him. And howsoever it shall please him in his wisdom to dispose of me, I hope in his mercy and goodnes he will give me grace so to live, and with constancie so to dye, as you shall not be ashamed to term me your husband, nor your children blushe to avowe me for their father. The black box, I hope, you have received safe, wherein you may find an assurance of all my lands upon your children, and a provision for you to breed them up, in the most plentiful forte, that my estate could possibly extend to. My brothers also are therein provided for, not so well happily as they expecte, but full as amply as my wasted fortune could admitte, and more liberally than to my own younger children. My debts I ordered to be satisfied. And if there shall be cause to give farther directions in that poynte, I truste God will give me time to do it. Let me in your letters receive a particular of all the writings and notes contained in that box, and doe it with all the speed you can. Acquaint my brothers with this my letter, who, I judge, are perplexed with the present apprehension of mine, and therein with the consideration of their own fortunes. Be you all notwithstanding of good cheer, and doe you, my Wife, comforte yourselfe, and belevee, that the greatest dewtye you can now perform unto me, is to rayse up your owne mynde, and conserve yourselfe able to cherish and brede up in vertue those our poor children, who (should you by grief and sorrow overthrowe yourselfe) were in manifest danger (but by God's great mercye) to be wholly undermined. Almightye God blese you all. His mercye and blessings be with us, and remayne upon us for ever. Amen, Amen, Amen.

The two following (especially the first, as appears by the date, being the day he was tried) seem to be wrote after he had received sentence.

I have in several letters and notes, as matters of have presented themselves to my memory, recommended unto you the performance of those things, that are left by me in my tyme of liberty unprovided, and are of that small qualitee that may without much impeachment to your estate be answered. I will not impose upon you any matter of farther burthen, yet in charge and truste equal, yf not of greater force, than any of those I have alreadye enjoined; that is to say, that you call to mynde the merits and desertes of those faithfull followers and frendes of myne, that have in the times of my troubles, not only employed their honeste indeavours and careful travells for the good of me, yourselfe, and children; but in matters of my distresse have engaged themselves, theyr credites, and whole fortunes, for my private occasions. Amongst the reste, now in alliance of his wife and children more near, in the great care and paynes he hath taken of more meritte, nor in hazard of his estate any mo deeply engaged, as is Humphry Parrotte, my honest faithfull friend (6). I doe therefore charge and intreat you in love; I command you in the dewtye and respect you ought to beare unto me, that you love him, you regard and esteeme, you favour and protecte him, as one, who hath don unto mee, unto you, and our children, the offices of a trustye, carefull, discreet friend, and will I know ever remayne to that poor house of Frankley, a faithful

The reader will find a further account in the note [F] of the other children and posterity of Mr Littleton, with whose

' my love, in my truste, in my confidence of your
' good-nature to my children, and gratefull affection
' to my nearest frendes, I have in the division of my
' torne estate delt most kiodly and most bountifullly
' with you. I therefore in justice require it at your ' handes, that you laye aside all private fancies and
' humours taken upon conceyte and misprision, and
' love, cherishe and esteem of him and all that shall
' belonge unto him, as one that I have by my last will
' and requeste, commended unto you. It is true, that ' he hath performed some dewty as unto me, that
' maye (things not well measured) give some exception
' unto you. But wayinge withall, that it was my

' my frailties be remembered, but cancell the remem' brance of them, as well towards me, that have bin
' the principal offender, as towards all others that I ' have made accessories; in which number I proteste I ' never had thought to use this man in so base and vile
' an office; neither would he, I proteste, have so vil-
' lefied himself (as I verely believe) yf I wold have ' so far wronged him. Love him therefore I once
' agayne praye you, and make use of his honeste en' deavours and faythfull servise. And the same re-
' queste I make for this man, I make for Gilber Con' nishye; and wish that you have consideration, as
' you maye be able, of their losses sustayned by me,
' and following my unlucky fortunes. Almighty God
' blefs you and all my sweet babes, and fend us of his ' grace while we remayne in this transitorye pilgri' mage; and when we passe hence, a joyfull meeting
' in his heavenly Kingdome. Amen, Amen, Amen.

The next is without date, but could not differ much in time from the above

' I had a purpose when I wrote laste unto you by ' Humphry Parrotte in that letter of mine, to have
' discoursed at large both the reasons, that moved me
' to devise the conveyances contained in this box, as ' also on sundry other matters then intended; and ' touching the education of your children, and the ' guiding of yourself and the small estate left unto you,
' to have declared my mind and judgment. But such
' in truth hath bin the trouble of bringing those buis-
' nesses to perfection, and the assurance given me to
' hasten towards my journeye so suddenly followinge,
' as I am utterly disappointed; therefore I must both
' enter and conclude at once this, that would otherwise
' require at my hands, both in regarde of the subjecte
' and of my will to omitte no necessarye caution,
' a much larger disputation. But to come to the ' matter; I have in these conveyances desired to pro' vide for yourself and children, to satisfye my creditors,
' to save harmless my sureties engaged for my debts;
' and lastly, to recompense in sorte, as my state doth
' permit, my antient servants and followers. In this,
' as you are the party nearest unto me, firste and
' beste provided for, placed in most trust and confi' dence by me; so do I require at your haods, and ' charge you by the love that you owe as a wife, and
' by the dewtye that you bear as a Christian woman,
' that in all these things devised by me, you endeavour
' your uttermost to have them trewly performed.
' And because the children, God has given me, are
' and ought of all other matters in this world most
' to be respected; of them first I require, that above all ' other things you take especial care, that they be ' brought up in the feare of God, upon which depend' eth all future blessinges both in this world, and in ' the world to come. Next that they may be instruct' ed carefully in learning and good manners, without

' which there can be no expectation of any worthy-
' nesses to be in them. And lastly, that especial care
' be, that when they attayn to years of understand' ing, they may not be taynted with the fylthe of base
' companye; but seasoned even in their beginnings
' with such liquors of civil and vertuous sobriety, as ' may rellish all the rest of their lives and actions.
' These things, my deare wife, I doe most earnestly ' recommend unto you; and in the care to see this
' performed, I praye you upon your love unto me;
' for there will come a time, when you and I shall ' meette (if it please God now otherwise to dispose of ' us) I mean before the face of God, where I will de' mand it at your handes, and in whose name I once
' agayn require it of you. There are in the litte
' painted caskette certayn letters not meet to be seen
' or perused; I praye you of all loves between you ' and me, that the same may be burned, and that no
' dishonor nor disgrace come to any person whom the ' same doth concern. For as my frailtye hath bin the ' occasion thereof, the publishing of these follyes would ' leave a spotte and blemish in my reputation. My ' most dearly esteemed wife, almighty God of his ' great infinite goodnesse and mercye bleffe thee, and ' bleffe all thy children; give us all of his grace to ' serve and honour his holy name; and make us hap-' pye partakers together of his glorious kingdome in ' Heaven. Amen, Amen, Amen.'

This which follows was wrote to Mr Thomas Fortescue, his uncle, in which he seems to resent some sighting behaviour.

' The conveyance, you write of, is already placed
' in safe custodie, and in honest trustie handes. Yf
' my care taken for the good of my wife and chil' dren, make others careles of my life, and my kind
' natural respecte shall be a meanes to make me ex-
' traordinarely neglected, I must then truste to my-' selfe, and will not leave to make use of my owne, to ' myne owne best advantage. The writinge I took ' into myne owne handes from my cofin Parrot a fort' night sithence, of whose honeste carriage and fidelitie
' I muste give this testimonie, that I have, in all my ' former suites and these late troubles, found him the ' most carefull trustie frende to his poore power,
' that I have had; which the rather I here mentione,
' in regard of some odious false informations I doe take ' knowledge to be suggested againste him. To your-
' selfe, my good uncle, I have bin for many kindneses
' beholdinge, which I will, during my life, acknow' ledge, and after my death pray to God to requite
' them.

' Your loving Nephew,

JOHN LITTLETON.'

[F] The reader will find a further account in the note.] Mr Littleton, besides the Sir Thomas above-mentioned, his heir, had by his lady two sons and five daughters. The second son, John, in 1624 was adjutant to the Earl of Southampton in the Low-Countries, where he was made a captain the same year.
He died unmarried; as did his younger brother, Edward. Of the daughters, Elizabeth, the eldest, died single; Bridget, the second, was married to Sir Robert Tracey, of Toddington in Gloucestershire; Joan, the third, died unmarried; Anne, the fourth, was wife to Edward Littleton, of Heolegh in Shropshire, mentioned in the succeeding article; and Jane, the fifth, was married to Sherington Talbot of Salivarp in Worcestershire. Sir Thomas, the eldest son, married Katherine, daughter and sole heir of Thomas Crompton, of Hounslow in the county of Middlesex, Esq;
by whom he had issue twelve sons; 1. John, 2.
Horatio, 3. Henry, 4. Thomas, 5. Henry, 6. Edward, 7. Charles, 8. Constantine, 9. William, 10.
Arthur, 11. Ferdinando, 12. George. And four daughters; 1. Katherine, 2. Mary, 3. Anne, 4. Katherine. Sir Thomas resided at Frankley, and represented the county of Worcester in Parliament, in the whose character, as given by Mr Thomas Habington of Hendlip in Worcestershire (c), we shall conclude this article. ' John Littleton, a man of that undaunted spirit, as he ' trampled over all afflictions, scorning as dust his large revenues; and with that resigna- ' tion and submission to Almighty God, as he esteemed himself not a man, but a worm: ' of all which I being an eye-witness, do hope, that this heyre of the worthy Judge hath ' so acquitted himself at the tribunal of our eternal Judge, as his faults and imperfections ' being washed away with the blood of Christ, he possesseth never-ending felicity (d).'

latter end of James Ist's reign; and in the beginning of his son's (7); with whom he sided on the breaking out of the troubles in that reign; for which the Parliamentarians sequestered his estate; imprisoned him in the Tower; and burnt his house at Frankley, with the greatest part of his furniture. However, he was afterwards released from his confinement; and dying (of the stone) 22 February, 1650, at Newcastle-house in Clerkenwell, was interred in the cathedral church at Worcester, wherein a fine monument was erected to his memory. John, his eldest, and Thomas, his fourth son, were both unfortunately drowned at Oxford, and lie buried in the chapel of Magdalen College, where (they being students there) their father erected a beautiful monument over them, on which he placed the following inscription written by himself,

JOHANNES & THOMAS LITTLETON.

Here sleep JOHN and THOMAS LITTLETON, Youths of singular hope, elder sons of Sir THOMAS LITTLETON, Knight and Baronet, by Catherine his most excellent, and most afflicted wife. Harmlessly walking in the field, a slippery foot cast the younger, his piety the elder (hoping to retrieve his brother) into the river: where earnestly embracing, and each by turns exerting his utmost ability in the unhappy union; death, by a hard and too sudden fate, in one instant swallowed both.

They died the ninth of May MDCXXXV. the one XVII. and the other XIII years of age.

Watch, thou knowest not in what hour.

Cowley, then a Westminster scholar, and 17 years old, wrote an elegy on the eldest of the two, entitled, An Elegy on the death of John Littleton, Esq; son and heir to Sir Thomas Littleton, who was drowned leaping into the water to save his younger brother (8). Henry and Horatio, the second and third sons, died young; Edward, the sixth, was killed at Worcester (in a duel) and buried by his father; Constantine, the 8th, married a daughter of Judge Jones, and going to Jamaica, died there without issue; William, the 9th, was gentleman-usher to the Queen of Bohemia (James

LITTLETON [EDWARD] flourished in the XVIIth century, and distinguished himself early by his abilities, especially in the study of the Common-Law, and was crowned with the success duly attending on merit, being raised by Charles the First to the highest post in his profession (a). He was descended from the famous Judge Littleton abovementioned by a collateral branch, being grandson of John Littleton, of Mounslow in the county of Salop, Clerk [A]; who, for want of issue, succeeded Thomas Littleton

[A] John Littleton of Mounslow, in the county of Salop, Clerk.] This John married after the Reformation and had issue five sons. 1. Thomas, who settled at Stoke-Millbury in Shropshire, and married Anne, daughter of Adam Lutley of Bromcroft-Castle in that county, Esq; by whom he left issue at his death (which happened in 1621) five sons and four daughters.

Ist's daughter) and a captain of horse, and died unmarried, as did his next brother, Arthur; Ferdinando, the 11th, was groom of the Bed-chamber to the Duke of York, and colonel of a regiment of horse, at the head of which he was killed in Germany; George, the youngest, was a major in Prince George of Denmark's regiment; he married Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Thomas Brown, of Norwich, and died at Windsor, 1712 (9). Henry, the fifth son, succeeding to his father's title and estate, espoused the same principles, and suffered for his loyalty. Before the Restoration, he married Philadelphia, daughter and co-heir of Thomas Carey, of Parsons-Green, second son to Robert, Earl of Monmouth, and losing her on the 2d of August, 1663, he married again to Elizabeth, eldest daughter of Francis, Earl of Bradford, by Diana, daughter of the Earl of Bedford, who surviving him, was afterwards married to Edward Harvey, of Comb, in the county of Surry, Esq; and Sir Henry dying at Areley on the 24th of June, 1693, without issue, was succeeded by his brother Charles, Sir Thomas's seventh son. †

Sir Charles, taking to the profession of arms at sixteen, embraced the royal party, as well as his father and brother, and was at Colchester when besieged in 1648: he went afterwards with King Charles II. into France, where he had a company of horse; but returning to England in 1659, he joined Sir George Booth in the insurrection in the North, and held out Chirk-Castle for a small time, but was at last forced to surrender, and was carried prisoner to London, where he was confined in the Gate-house (10). He was not long detained in custody, and on his enlargement returned to the King, with whom he continued till the Restoration; in 1662 he went to Jamaica with Lord Windsor, and was left governor of that island: on his return from whence, he was made colonel of the Duke of York's regiment, and distinguished himself in the action at Solebay. He was, in 1673, appointed governor of Sheerness and Landguard-Fort; and was also made a commissioner of prizes, and enjoyed several other posts during the reign of King Charles II. and had the command of the Princess of Denmark's regiment under James II. by whom he was made a brigadier-general. He married first Catherine, daughter of Sir William Fairfax, of Steeton in Yorkshire, and widow of Mr Lister, second son of Sir Martin Lister, by whom he had one son, born at sea in their voyage to Jamaica, where he buried both wife and child; and secondly, Ann, daughter of Thomas Temple, of Frankton in the county of Warwick, Esq; by Rebecca, daughter of Sir Nicholas Carew, of Beddington in Surrey, and one of the maids of honour to the first Dukes of York (11), by whom he had five sons and eight daughters. On the Revolution, he threw up all his posts, and retired to Sheen near Richmond, where he continued until the death of Sir Henry his elder brother, after which he removed to Hagley, where dying on the 16th of August, 1703; he was buried at Areley, and was succeeded in honour and estate by his youngest son, now Sir Thomas Littleton (12).

(9) The daughters all died unmarried; the two first young, but the two others lived to be more than 60 years old, and then died at Lichfield.

† Sir Henry was representative for Bewdly, as in Charles II's reign was his brother Sir Charles.

(11) She died 27 August, 1718.

(12) Sir Thomas died since the writing of this, and was succeeded by his eldest son George, who was created a Baron of Great-Britain, November 20, 1746, by the title of Lord Lyttleton of Frankley in Worcestershire.

The sons were, Adam, the eldest, who marrying a daughter and co-heir of ——— Poyntz, of North Okenden, in the county of Essex, Esq; by her was ancestor to Sir Thomas Littleton, Baronet, Speaker of the House of Commons under Will. III. Richard, the second, died unmarried. Thomas, the third, entered into orders, and was made vicar of Hales-Owen John,

Littleton of Speechly, son of Thomas, the Judge's third and youngest son; and son of Sir Edward Littleton of Henley in Shropshire, Knight (c), one of the Justices of the Marches, and Judge of North-Wales, and was born in 1589. In 1606, being then in his 17th year, he became a Gentleman-Commoner of Christ-Church-college in Oxford; where, 28 April, 1609, he commenced Bachelor of Arts (d), and from whence he removed to the Inner-Temple, London, to pursue the study of the Law, in which he soon rendered himself eminent. In 1628 we find him in Parliament; for, on the 6th of May that year, he, together with Sir Edward Coke and Sir Dudley Digges, were sent to carry up the Petition of Right from the Commons to the Lords (e): he was also a manager in the accusation against the Duke of Buckingham two years before, in which his conduct was so nice, that he gained the good opinion of both prince and people (f). His first promotion in the Law was, succeeding his father as a Welsh Judge; he was also chosen Recorder of London, and was Counsellor for the university of Oxford; and, in 1632, was made Summer-Reader of the Inner-Temple (g). On the 17th of October, in the tenth of King Charles the first, 1634, he was made Solicitor-General, and knighted at Whitehall the sixth of June following; and, on the 27th of January, 1639, being the 15th of that reign, he was sworn Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas; which post he held not quite twelve months, being appointed Lord Keeper of the Great Seal of England, on the 23d of January, 1640, on the flight of Lord-Keeper Finch from the just resentment of the Parliament, which met the third of November before (b). On the 18th of February, 1640, the King was pleased to call Sir Edward up to the House of Peers, by creating him Lord Littleton, Baron of Mounslow in Shropshire (i). In this high station he for some time enjoyed the good opinion of both parties, the two Houses returning their thanks by him to the King, for passing the Triennial Bill. But two years after, many votes passing in the House of Lords, thought to be highly prejudicial to the King's interest, without any endeavours used by the Lord-Keeper to prevent such votes from passing, particularly those passed there on the 16th of March, 1641 [B], to which, it is said, his opinion greatly contributed, being much relied on by the republican party (k); he began to be much out of favour with the King, who sent an order from York to the Lord Falkland, to demand the Seal from him. This order was communicated to Mr Edward Hyde (afterwards Earl of Clarendon), by Lord Falkland, who was directed to consult him and Sir John Colepepper, whether Chief-Justice Banks or Mr Selden was the proper person to deliver the Seal to, on taking it from Lord Littleton: but Mr Hyde prevented that order from being carried into execution, by giving them an account of a private conversation he had had with the Lord-Keeper [C]; wherein he

John, the fourth, married Mary Bullock, of Middleton in Shropshire; and George, the fifth, was Vicar of Long-Stanton, in the same county. Of the daughters, the three eldest were married, viz. Alice, the eldest, to John James, of Tugford in Shropshire, clerk; Elizabeth, the second, to John Stedman, of Aston in the same county, Gentleman; and Cecily, the third, to Richard Hotchkis, of Priers-Ditton in Shropshire, Esq; the fourth daughter died unmarried. II. Edward, who married Mary the daughter of Edw. Waller, of Ludlow, Esq; chief-justice of South-Wales, by whom he had issue eight sons and five daughters; the eldest son was Edward, the gentleman of whom we now treat; the second was named William, and was made a serjeant at law, and died a bachelor; as did the third, James, who was a fellow of All-Souls-College in Oxford, where he proceeded bachelor of law, and in 1628 succeeded Dr Helme as chancellor of the diocese of Worcester (1); he was created doctor of law on the 8th of December, 1635, and died during the civil war (2). The fourth son, William, married Mary the daughter of John Webster, of Amsterdam, merchant. John, the fifth, was a fellow of All-Souls, Oxford, and chosen Master of the Temple in 1638. Nathaniel, the sixth, served under the Earl of Southampton in the Low-Countries. Timothy, the seventh, was one of the Barons of the Exchequer, and lies buried in the Temple church. The name of the eighth was Samuel, who, as well as his two next elder brothers, died unmarried. Of the daughters, Martha, the second, and Joan, the fifth, died unmarried; Anne, the eldest, was wife of Thomas Ketyby, of Steple, in the county of Salop, Mary, the third, of Gilbert Jones, counsellor at law, and Priscilla, the fourth, of Perrott Price, of Scoteborough in Pembrokehire. Their father died in 1621, and was buried at Ilanvoir in Denbighshire. III. Christopher, who was a student of Christ-Church-College, Oxford, where, after commencing master of arts, he died the 6th of August, 1578, and was interred amongst his family at Mounslow. IV. Adam, who married Margaret, daughter of Edward Jacon, of Thongland, by whom he had seven children, six boys and a girl, all of which died without issue. V. William, who settling at Stretton, in his native country, married Margaret, daughter of John Hopton, of Cheshire in Shropshire, by whom he had five sons, 1. Edward, who died unmarried; 2. William, who married, Frances, daughter of John Poynton; 3. Christopher, 4. Adam, and 5. Thomas, each of which died unmarried: and three daughters, 1. Dorothy, who was married to Robert Marshal, of Shrewsbury; 2. Frances, and, 3. Jane; neither of which were married.

[B] Particularly on the 16th of March, 1641.] The votes which gave offence were as follow, viz. 'That the kingdom hath been of late, and still is in so evident and imminent danger, both from enemies abroad, and a Popish party at home, that there is an urgent and inevitable necessity of putting his Majesty's subjects into a posture of defence, for the safeguard both of his Majesty and his people. That the Lords and Commons fully apprehending this danger, and being sensible of their own duty to provide a suitable prevention, have in several petitions addressed themselves to his Majesty for the ordering and disposing of the Militia of the kingdom, in such a way, as was agreed upon, by the wisdom of both Houses, to be most effectual and proper for the pre-exigents of the kingdom; yet could not obtain it, but his Majesty did several times refuse to give his royal assent thereto. That in this case of extreme danger, and of his Majesty's refusal, the ordinance agreed on by both Houses for the militia, doth oblige the people, and ought to be obeyed by the fundamental laws of this kingdom. That such persons as shall be nominated Deputy-Lieutenants, and approved of by both Houses, shall receive the commands of both Houses to take upon them to execute their offices (3).'

[C] A private conversation he had with Lord-Keper.] Mr Hyde was a member of the House of Commons, and devoted to the King, but had always a great regard for the Lord-Keeper; and being a good deal surprized at his seeming extraordinary behaviour one day paid him a visit at Exeter-House, where (they being together in my Lord's study) he told him with a great

he had given such reasons for his late conduct, and shewn such an attachment to the King's person, and zeal for his interest, that he proposed they should write to the King, and persuade him rather to write a kind invitation to the Lord-Keeper, to come to York, and bring the Seal with him, than think of giving it to any other person. This advice was followed and embraced by the King, who, though he still continued doubtful of the man, was moved by the reasons assigned; and Mr Hyde continuing his intimacy with him, and being convinced, that, as things then stood, the leading men in both Houses having lately held a consultation, whether it was not advisable to have the Great Seal deposited in some secure place, from whence, when wanted, it might be delivered to the Keeper (with whom they had no mind to quarrel), and by that means prevent his being sent for by the King, or the Seal's being taken from him, there was no time to lose; a day was fixed for Lord Littleton's delivering it to a messenger sent from the King, and at the same time it was agreed, that Mr Hyde should set out for York first, and the Keeper follow him thither: which was accordingly done, the Seal being sent on the 22d, and the Keeper set out for the North the 23d of May, 1642 (l); but notwithstanding this piece of service, and eminent proof of his loyalty at the risque of his life, he could never totally regain the King's confidence, or the esteem of the Court party [D]. However, he continued to enjoy his post; was created Doctor of Laws the 27th of January following, and made one of the King's Privy-Council, and Colonel of a Regiment of Foot, some time before his death, which happened the 27th of August, 1645, at Oxford: where he was buried on the north side of the choir, in the cathedral of Christ-Church, and had a funeral oration pronounced over him by Dr Henry Hammond, then university orator (m). In May 1683, his only daughter Anne, Lady Littleton, widow of Sir Thomas Littleton, Baronet, erected a sumptuous monument of black and white marble over his grave, with an inscription thereon, in which he is said to be defended from Sir Thomas Littleton, Knight of the Bath, qui sub Edwardo IV. Justiciarius, Leges Angliæ municipales (prius indigestas) in Enchiridion feliciter reduxit: opus in omne ævum jurisconsultis venerandum, &c. (n): i. e. who being a Judge under Edward the Fourth, happily reduced the municipal Laws of England (before undigested) into a manual: a work to be venerated by the professors thereof in every age. Lord Clarendon, who had a peculiar esteem for him, gives him (in the place last cited) this character. 'He was a man of great reputation in the profession of the Law, for learning, and all other advantages which attend the most eminent men. He was of a very good extraction in Shropshire, and inherited a fair fortune and inheritance from his father. He was a handsome and a proper man, of a very graceful presence, and notorious courage, which in his youth he had manifested with his sword. He had taken great pains in the hardest and most knotty part of the Law, as well as that which was more customary, and was not only ready and expert in the books, but exceedingly versed in records, in studying and examining whereof, he had kept Mr Selden company, with whom he had great friendship, and who had much assisted him; so that he was looked upon as the best Antiquary of his profession, who gave himself up to practice; and, upon the meer strength of his abilities, he had raised himself into the first rank of the practicers of the Common-Law courts, and was chosen Recorder of London before he was called to the Bench, and grew presently into the highest practice in all the other courts, as well as those of the Law.' He had two wives; the first was Anne, daughter of John Littleton mentioned in the foregoing article, by whom he had three children, a boy and two girls, who died in their infancy. The second was Lady Sidney Calverley, relict of Sir George Calverley of Cheshire, and daughter of Sir William Jones, Knight, one of the Justices of the Court of King's-Bench; by whom he had one daughter, named Anne, who was married to Sir Thomas Littleton, Baronet, being so created 24 October, 1642, by whom she had one son, Edward, who died great freedom, that the King must be highly displeas'd when he knew how little the above votes had been oppos'd by his Lordship, and that by this neglect of the King's welfare, he had forfeited the esteem of all good subjects. His Lordship, though ignorant of the great confidence reposed by the King in Mr Hyde, yet sensible his Majesty held him in great esteem, heard him very patiently; and then (having cleared an outer room of some persons attending there, and looked the door of that, and of the study) told him, he gave him many thanks for these marks of his friendship, in order to requite which, he would use the same freedom with him. He then complain'd of his own bad situation, having been taken away from the Court of Common-Pleas, where he both understood the business, and was acquainted with the people he had to deal with, and advanced to his present post, in which he had quite a different kind of people to deal with, and affairs to manage, to which he was perfectly a stranger, without a single friend amongst them all, to whom he might open his mind, or with whom he might advise, when any difficulties arose. He then enter'd on the condition of the King's affairs, and told Mr Hyde he was well satisfied they would never have done what they had already, unless they had been determin'd to do more: he added, that he foresaw it would not be long before a war would break out; and of what importance it was, that in that season the great seal should be with his Majesty, the prospect of which necessity, and the knowledge of the abovemention'd consultation had made him comply so much with that party, and vote as he did in the late debate. That he knew this compliance must necessarily give the King very ill impressions of him, but he had thereby gain'd so much credit with the other side, that he should be able to preserve the seal in his own hands 'till his Majesty should demand it; and then he would be ready to wait on the King with it (A).

[D] Regain the King's confidence, or the esteem of the Court-Party.] Whitelocke says (5), 'the Lord-Keeper, after his great adherence to the Parliament, delivered the Great Seal to Mr Elliot, whom the King sent to him for it; and shortly after Littleton followed the Seal to the King, but was not respected by him, or his courtiers; yet he was a man of courage, and of excellent parts and learning.'

LITTLETON [ABAM], an eminent scholar of the XVIIth century, was descended of the Westcot family of Mounslow in Worcestershire [A], and born at Hales-Owen in the county of Salop, the 8th of November, 1627, of which place his father was Vicar (a). He was educated at Westminster under the famous Dr Busby; and, in 1644, was elected a student of Christ-Church-college in the university of Oxford (b), from whence he was ejected by the visitors appointed by Parliament, 2d November, 1648 (c). Soon after, he became one of the ushers of Westminster-school (d); but how long he continued so is not known; he afterwards taught in other places; and, in the beginning of 1658, was made second Master of Westminster-school. On the 12th of July, 1670, being then Chaplain in Ordinary to the King, he accumulated the degrees in Divinity (e), having letters testimonial from Dr Humphrey Henchman, Bishop of London, containing a very great character of his abilities [B]. And, on the 16th of September, 1674, he was instituted and inducted into the rectory of Chelsey, where he had taught school (f) since the Restoration. The same day he was made a Prebendary of Westminster (g), and afterwards Sub-Dean (h). On the 27th of May, 1685, he was licensed to the church of St Botolph Aldersgate, London, which he held about four years, and then resigned it. He was author of many learned works: as, I. Tragico-comœdia Oxoniensis, a Latin poem, written on the strange behaviour of the Parliament visitors, 1648, printed in one sheet, 4to [C]. II. Pafor metricus, five voces omnes Novi Testamenti primogeniæ hexametris versibus comprehensæ. Lond. 1658, 4to. Greek and Latin. III. Diatriba in octo tractatus distributa, in quâ agit de flættendo, derivandi & componendi ratione. Printed with the former. IV. Elementa Religionis, five quatuor capita catechetica totidem linguis descripta, in usum scholarum. London, 1658, 8vo. V. Complicatio Radicum in primævâ Hebræorum lingua. This is printed with Elementa Religionis. VI. Solomon's Gate, or an entrance into the Church; being a familiar explanation of the grounds of Religion, contained in four heads of the Catechism, viz. the Lord's Prayer, Apostles Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Sacraments. Lond. 1662, 8vo. Dedicated to Anne Dûchefs of York. VII. Lingvæ Latinæ Liber Dictionarius, quadripartitus. A Latin Dictionary, in four parts. 1. An English-Latin. 2. A Latin-Clasfical. 3. A Latin-Propër. 4. A Latin-Barbarous, &c. First published in a thick quarto, Lond. 1678, and afterwards in 1685, with additions [D]. VIII. Sixty-one Sermons, preached mostly on public occasions, whereof five were formerly printed. Lond. 8vo. 1680. IX. A Sermon, at a solemn meeting of the natives of the city and county of Worcester, in the church of St Mary le Bow, 24 June, 1680. Lond. 1680, 4to. X. Preface to Cicero's Works. Lond. 1681, 2 vols, folio. XI. A Translation of Mr Selden's Jani Anglorum facies altera, with notes, from the Latin: this translation was published by our author, under the name of Redman Westcot, Gent. Lond. 1683, folio. With this was published three other tracts, wrote by the great Selden [E]. XII. The Life of Themistocles, from the Greek. This was printed in the first volume of Plutarch's Lives, translated by several

[A] Descended of the Mounslow family.] His father was Thomas, third son of John Littleton, of Mounslow, clerk, and vicar of Hales-Owen in Shropshire.

[C] Tragico-comœdia Oxoniensis, printed in quarto.] Though the general report was at that time that this Poem was the work of our author, yet Mr Anthony Wood (1) informs us, that Dr Thomas Barlow frequently, said it was written by Mr John Carrick, a student of Christ-Church, whom the Doctor noted as the author in a copy of the Poem in his own study.

[D] A Latin Dictionary, published 1685, with additions.] The Cambridge Dictionary, called Lingvæ Romanæ Dictionarium luculentum novum, which was printed 1693 in quarto, is a copy with some small improvement of our author's Dictionary, by some gentlemen who chose not to communicate their names to the public, and who, after acknowledging in general terms the obligations they lay under to our author, take a great deal of pains to inform the world of the great advantages their works boast over his; which a later writer, on (as he says) a careful examination (2), informs us, consisted chiefly in large and useful improvements under the letters L, M, N, O, and P; and in correcting and augmenting what had been done by Dr Littleton in the other parts; though neither so copiously or carefully as in the above Letters (3). He also observes, that the above improvements, together with the Preface, and a large part of the Title to that Cambridge Dictionary, have been incorporated and printed with all the subsequent editions of our author's, except the sixth, printed in 1735, to which there has been a new Preface, and some other alterations made (4). He likewise observes, that the chief merit of the Cambridge Dictionary, is, having cited authorities for classical words, and marked all the poetical ones (5).

[E] Three other tracts wrote by the great Selden.] These were; 1. A Treatise of the Judicature of Parliaments: wherein the Controversies and Precedents belonging to the Title are methodically handled. 2. Englands Epitomis. Of the original of ecclesiastical Jurisdiction of Testaments. 3. Of the disposition or administration of Intestates Goods.

several hands. Lond. 1683, 8vo. He also published, XIII. Dissertatio Epistolaris de Juramento Medicorum, qui ὈΡΚΟΣ ἹΠΠΟΚΡΑΤΟΥΣ dicitur. In qua ven. vir D. Baldwinus Hamey, M. D. veterem vulgarem versionem improbens aliam substituit novam. i. e. An Epistolary Dissertation on the Oath of Physicians, called the Oath of Hippocrates. In which the worshipful Dr Baldwin Hamey, disapproving the old vulgar translation, hath substituted another new one. XIV. An elaborate Latin inscription, in prose and verse, intended for the monument erected in memory of the dreadful fire, which happened in, and almost consumed, the city of London, on the second, third, and fourth days of September, 1666. This is printed at the end of his Dictionary, a little before which is also, XV. An elegant Epistle in Latin verse to the abovenamed Dr Hamey. He had likewise made large collections towards a new Lexicon of the Greek tongue, in which he was perfectly skilled; as he also was in Rabbinical learning and the Oriental languages: having for some small time before his death attempted to reduce the study of them into a narrower compass, by freeing them from the number of radices, with which that branch of literature is incumbered in the common Lexicons. And, as he had exhausted great part of his fortune in purchasing books and manuscripts, in the Hebrew, Chaldee, and Arabic, tongues, with each of which he was well acquainted, he would, if he had enjoyed a longer life, undoubtedly have executed so useful a design. He was also perfectly well versed in the abstrusest parts of the Mathematics, and wrote many tracts on Mystical Numeration, which manuscripts fell into the hands of his brother-in-law the Reverend Dr Hockin. This gentleman of universal learning departed this life, on Saturday the thirtieth day of June, 1694 (i), and was buried in his own church at Chelsey, where a monument is erected to his memory [F]. He was extremely charitable, easy of access, communicative, affable, facetious in conversation, free from passion, of a strong constitution, and a venerable countenance: a most excellent Philologist and Grammarian, and an universal scholar. We are told (k), that he received a grant from King Charles the Second to succeed Dr Busby, as head master of Westminster school; but dying before him, the King's intention was prevented.

LLOYD [WILLIAM], successively Bishop of St Asaph, of Coventry and Lichfield, and of Worcester, in the last, and part of this, century; was grandson of David Lloyd, of Henblas in the isle of Anglesey, Esq; and son of Richard Lloyd, B. D. Rector of Tilehurst, and Vicar of Sunning, in Berkshire. He was born at Tilehurst, August 18, 1627 (a), and educated by his father in school-learning; wherein he made so great a progress, that at eleven years of age, understanding Latin, Greek, and something of Hebrew, he was entered [A] a student of Oriel-college, Oxford, in Lent-term, 1638-9; and the year following, or thereabouts, became Scholar of Jesus-college (b). October 25, 1642, he was admitted Bachelor of Arts (c); which degree being compleated by determination, he left the university, then garrisoned for his Majesty's use: and after the surrender of it, namely, December 9, 1646, he took the degree of Master of Arts (d), being then Fellow of Jesus-college. In 1648, he was ordained Deacon by Dr Skinner Bishop of Oxford; and afterwards employed in the country, as tutor to the children of William Backhouse, of Swallowfield in the county of Berks, Esq; Upon the ejection of Dr Pordage by the Presbyterian committee, Mr Lloyd was presented, in December 1654, to the rectory of Bradfield in the same county, by Elias Ashmole, Esq; patron of that living in right of his wife. Accordingly he was examined by the Tryers of those times, and passed with approbation; approbation; but designs being laid against him by two Ministers of Reading, who wanted to bring in one Dr Temple, and pretended that Sir Humphrey Forster had right of presentation, he thought it better to resign his presentation to Mr Ashmole, than to undergo a contest with those busy men (e). In 1656, he was ordained Priest by Dr Brownrig, Bishop of Exeter; and, in the same year, went to Wadham-college, as governor to John Backhouse, Esq; who was Gentleman-Commoner there: with whom he continued 'till 1659 (f). On the fifth of September, 1660, he was incorporated Master of Arts at Cambridge (g); and, about the same time, made one of the Prebendaries of the collegiate church of Rippon. In July 1666, he was appointed Chaplain in Ordinary to King Charles the Second (h); July the second, 1667, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity (i); and, in December the same year, became Prebendary of Willsford and Woodford in the cathedral church of Salisbury (k). About which time, as also in 1673, he published some excellent tracts against Popery [B]. In 1668, he was presented by the Crown to the vicarage of St Mary's in Reading, and, on the thirteenth of June following, installed Archdeacon of Merioneth. May 3, 1672, he was also installed Dean of Bangor; and, in 1674, appointed Residuary of Sarum (l). The sixth of December, 1676, he was instituted to the vicarage of St Martin's in the Fields, Westminster, at the presentation of the Crown, upon the advancement of Dr Lamplugh to the see of Exeter. On this occasion Dr Lloyd resigned the Prebend of Cadington minor in the church of St Paul's, to

[B] About which time, as also in 1673, he published some excellent Tracts against Popery.] In 1667, he published, I. 'The late Apology in behalf of the Papists reprinted, and answered in behalf of the Royalists.' Lond. 4to. It was an Answer to a Pamphlet, of one sheet, intitled, 'To all the Royalists that suffered for his Majesty: and to all the rest of the good People of England, the humble Apology of the English Catholics.' Lond. 1666. Which Apology was written by Roger Palmer Earl of Castlemaine, and Robert Pugh a secular Priest. The Authors and Printer being sought after, and flying, the presses were broken by order of the House of Commons — However, they soon published a Reply to the Doctor's Answer, intitled, A Reply to the Answer of the Catholic Apology, or, a clear Vindication of the Catholics of England from all matter of fact charged against them by their enemies. Lond. 1668. This also was seized. II. Dr. Lloyd published in 1673, 'A seasonable Discourse shewing the Necessity of maintaining the established Religion, in opposition to Popery.' Lond. 4to. This Discourse was occasioned by His Majesty's Declaration of Indulgence; wherein he granted Liberty to all sorts of Dissenters from the Church of England, to exercise their Religions, and suspended the Execution of the Penal Laws in force against them (2). This also was answered by the Earl of Castlemaine, in a pamphlet intitled, A full answer and confutation of a scandalous pamphlet called A seasonable Discourse, &c. Antw. alias Lond. 4to. Whereupon Dr Lloyd came out with, III. 'A reasonable Defence of the seasonable Discourse: Shewing the Necessity of maintaining the Established Religion in opposition to Popery. Or, a Reply to a Treatise, called, A full Answer and confutation of a scandalous Pamphlet, &c.' Lond. 1674, 4to. And the Earl of Castlemaine wrote Observations on this reasonable Defence. IV. Dr Lloyd published, 'The Difference between the Church and the Court of Rome considered, in some Reflections on a Dialogue intitled, A Conference between two Protestants and a Papist.' Lond. 1673, 4to. V. To these let us add another piece of our learned Author against Popery, though not published 'till 1677, viz. 'Considerations touching the true way to suppress Popery in this Kingdom, &c. on occasion whereof is inserted An Historical Account of the Reformation here in England.' Lond. 4to. The Design of this book was very much mistaken at the time of its publication. For Sir Francis Winnington, in his Speech at the Trial of the Lord Viscount Stafford in November, 1680 (3), reflects upon it, in these words. — 'There did appear in some men too easie and favourable a disposition towards the Papists. They were grown strangely moderate towards these old enemies of our Church and State. New projects of Reconciling us were set on foot, and Books were written to distinguish the Church of Rome from the Court of Rome. One of those Books, which was printed the year before the Discovery of the Plot, pretends, That there ought to be a difference made between Papists of loyal and disloyal principles. This book, as it was written more artificially than the rest, and published in so critical and dangerous a juncture, deserves, and I doubt not in time will have, a particular consideration. 'Tis easie to believe how great encouragement This must give to the Romanists, to see how very willing men were to meet them, and how freely the pen was drawn in their favour.' — Whereupon our learned Prelate, tho' always distinguished by his Zeal against Popery, thought it necessary to vindicate himself, in the Dedication of his Sermon on November 5, 1680, to the Lords spiritual and temporal. — 'I have been tax'd (saith he) as being not Protestant enough, on account of a Book, called, Considerations touching the true way to suppress Popery in this Kingdom. How far I was concerned in that Treatise, the Preface to it sufficiently declares. The Book itself was publish'd in Michael mas term (4), 1676, just two years before the Popish Plot was discovered. The design of it was propos'd to me as the likeliest Remedy at that time against the same disease under which we are now labouring for life, or death: but it was before things were come to such a dangerous crisis. I saw it was much the same design that many of the best and most eminent Protestants, particularly Q. Elizabeth and K. James, had at several times countenanced, and put in practice with very good success: they were, next to the uniting of Protestants, for the dividing of Papists, whose chief advantage hitherto has been their Union, such as it is, and our needless Divisions. But at that time I thought it more proper and seasonable than ever, upon the best judgment that I could make of their and our circumstances. And I have some reason to think I was not mistaken in this. For now I see that at the very time when this was brought to me, and while I was forming my thoughts upon it, the Papists themselves were in a great apprehension of this very thing, as being of all other ways the most likely to blast their hopes, and to preserve us from that ruine which they were then bringing upon us. Thus Coleman (5) at that time wrote to the Pope's Internuncio (6), There is but one thing (saith he) to be feared, (whereof I have a great apprehension) that can hinder the success of our designs; which is, a Division among the Catholics themselves. How dividing them? It follows by 'Propositions to the Parliament to accord their conjunction to those that require it, — on Conditions prejudicial to the Authority of the Pope; — and so to persecute the rest of them with more appearance of Justice, and ruine the one half of them more easily than the whole body at once.' And to shew that Coleman was not singular herein, Cardinal Howard (7) delivers this as their judgment at Rome, where, if any where, they are infallible; Division of Catholics will be the easiest way for Protestants to destroy them. 'This being said for the Design from so good Authority, I have this farther to say for myself, that only the last part of that Book was my own, in which I did justify the Reformation of this Church; and what I wrote in that part, I am sure no Papist can disprove, and I think no Protestant has cause to complain of it.'

which he had been collated May 4, 1672 (m). He preached in the church of St Martin's aforesaid, October 31, 1678, a Sermon at the funeral of Sir Edmund-bury Godfrey, of which some account is given in the note [C]. In 1680, being promoted to the bishopric of St Asaph, he was consecrated the third of October at Lambeth (n). He published, in 1684, 'The History of the Government of the Church, as it was in Great-Britain and Ireland, when they first received the Christian Religion [D]. On the eighth of June, 1688,

[C] A Sermon at the Funeral of Sir Edmund-bury Godfrey. In that Sermon he gives the following account of Sir Edmund-bury. — 'Our friend could have no great estate, being the tenth son of his father, who had four sons younger than he was: and his father was a younger son of his grandfather: So that though his father had a plentiful estate, and his grandfather one of the fairest in his country, yet but a small portion of these could fall to his share. — His Education was suitable to his birth; being brought up at Westminster-School, from whence he was sent to the University, thence to travel in foreign parts; then he came to live in the Inns of Court, where wanting health, he retired for a time into the country. — He was brought back to London with an intimate friend and Relation; who having suffered much for the late King, whose Servant he was, turned what he had left into money, and to make the most of that, employed it in a wood-yard in the parish of St Martin's. — What money Sir Edmund-bury had, he laid it out as partner with his friend, and so improved it, 'till he had wherewith to live like himself.' Then he withdrew from all business, and was made a Justice of Peace: in which station he did the most good perhaps of any man in his time. So that K. Charles II. often said, 'He took Sir Edmund Godfrey to be the best justice of Peace in this kingdom.' — 'He was (as it were) born to be a Justice of Peace; his grand-father, his father, his elder brother were so before him. The two last were also members of parliament. His great-grand-father was a Captain, which was considerable in those days. — In the plague-time, he fed many poor with his own hands, distributed as well physic as food, exposing himself to be pulled and haled by them sometimes. And that which exceeds all the rest, where the officers durst not, he went himself into the pesthouse to seize on a malefactor. — I knew him (says he) to be a just and charitable man, a devout, a zealous and conscientious Christian. His Religion was more for use than shew. And yet he was constant in all the acts of God's worship. He loved the Communion of the Church, as well out of judgment as affection. And though the Compassion that he had for all men that did amiss, extended itself to all manner of Dissenters; and among them he had a kindness for the persons of many Roman Catholics: yet he always declared a particular hatred and detestation of Popery.' — Speaking of the false report spread, of Sir Edm. having killed himself, he says — 'I confess I knew not what to think myself, 'till I saw the contrary with my eyes. When I saw he was strangled as well as thrust through, I soon considered, that no man could kill himself both those ways.' (8)

[D] The History of the Government of the Church, as it was in Great Britain and Ireland, when they first received the Christian Religion. This Book was occasioned by the Disputes concerning Episcopacy, particularly David Blondel's Treatise upon that subject (9): In which Disputes, Among other Arguments used against Episcopal Government, there was none that made more noise in the world, or gave more colour to the cause of the adversaries of Episcopacy, than that which they drew from the example of the ancient Scottish Church. And the substance of it was, That in the second century, or beginning of the third, there was a Church formed in Scotland without Bishops, and that it continued so for some hundreds of years. — In opposition to which, the Bishop shews in this learned Book, chap. I. That all the part of Britain which lies South of Graham's Dike was held by the Roman Britans; and all North of it by the Picts, who were divided into North and South Picts. Ireland was peopled by the Scots, and was the onely Scotland in those times. There were no Scots in Britain before the year 300. Afterward they made incursions, but settled not here 'till after the decay of the Roman Empire.

Then the Saxons conquered all the best of Britain, and called it England. Afterwards, part of the Scots seated themselves among the Picts: First, about the year 500, they erected the kingdom of Argile. About the year 850, they conquered all that was North of Graham's-dike. After the year 900, they got the rest of that country; and then it came to be called Scotland. Chap. II. The Britans were Christians under the Roman Empire. In the year 412, the South Picts were converted by a Britan. In the year 432, the Scots in Ireland were converted by Britans; Not by Palladius, but by Patrick. In the year 560, the North Picts were converted by Scots out of Ireland. Before this last conversion the Romans had lost Britain. Chap. III. That in Britain there were such Bishops as were in all other parts of the Roman Empire. There were of the British Clergy, some of each order, at the council of Arles, in the year 314. The Nicen council was received by the British Bishops: and so was that of Sardica. There were divers British Bishops at the council of Ariminum. The continuance of the same Church-government in Britain, proved out of Gildas, and Bede. Chap. IV. The Church-government among the South-Picts was the same that was in Britain. The like was in Ireland among the Scots; whether brought in by Palladius, or rather by St Patrick. Chap. V. Of Church-government among the Scots and North Picts in Scotland; and among those whom they converted in England. That Columba, though no Bishop himself, was for proper Episcopacy. He acknowledged that Bishops were superior to Presbyters; and had a Bishop to ordain in his Monastery. There Aidan was episcopally ordained; and was properly Bishop of the North-Humbrians: so was Finan after him, and then Coleman, and Tuda, &c. Chap. VI. That all the other Bishops ordain'd by the Scots were proper Bishops. Such was Diuma, whom Finan ordain'd Bishop of Mercia; and such was his Successor Ceollah, and Tromhere, and Cedd. Chap. VII. A Confutation of that late Fable of a Church-government in Scotland by a sort of Monks called Culdees. No mention of Culdees 'till after the year 800. No author for this fable 'till long after. — In this work our learned Author reflects with great severity upon Jeffrey of Monmouth, and his copier Hector Boethius. — It was answered with great vehemence by Sir George Mackenzie of Rosehaugh, Advocate to K. James II. who intitled his Answer, 'A Defence of the Antiquity of the Royal Line of Scotland: With a true Account when the Scots were govern'd by Kings in the Isle of Britain.' Edinburgh, 1685, 8vo. In which Answer the Dispute is made quite a national point; and the Bishop, for cutting off 44 fictitious Kings in the History of Scotland, (viz. from Fergus I. to Congal) is represented as guilty of the highest crimes and misdemeanors. For thus speaks Sir George (10), with that petulance natural to Pleaders; with the spirit of a true Rabula; and with that saucy liberty which too many of that profession take at the barr — 'It seem'd, saith he, neither just nor fit, that any Episcopal Author should have magnify'd so highly the meanest Argument, that ever was used by a Presbyterian; as for it to cut off 44 Kings (all preceding Coranus, who began his reign anno 501) and to expose on a pillory as Forgers, our many and grave Historians. — It seems a great injury to our Kings to have their Line shortened, so as thereby to postpone them to many others,' — and prove that they cannot make out 'their Antiquity 'till Malcolm the Third's time: and so our Kings will be amongst the last of all Crown'd Heads. — Whoever fortens the Royal Line, lessens (though without design) the influence of our Kings, and endangers the Succession. — I admire, that any of the subjects of Great-Britain did not think it a degree of Lesse-Majesty (11), to injure and shorten the Royal Line of their Kings.' — Dr Stillingfleet having seen this Defence in M.S. (12) wrote a very handsome, and full Answer to it, by way of Preface

1688, he was one of the six Bishops, who, together with Archbishop Sancroft, were committed to the Tower, for subscribing and presenting a petition to King James the Second, wherein they shewed the great averfeness they found in themselves, to the distributing and publishing in all their churches his Majesty's Declaration for Liberty of Conscience; which the Court called to be, contriving, making, and publishing, a seditious libel against his Majesty and his government (o). They were released the fifteenth of the same month, upon their recognizances; and acquitted the thirtieth following, after a solemn tryal in the Court of King's-Bench (p). About the latter end of the year 1688, Bishop Lloyd having concurred heartily in the Revolution, was made Lord Almoner to King William the Third: and, October 20, 1692, translated to the See of Coventry and Lichfield, vacant by the death of Dr Thomas Wood (q). In 1699, he published 'A Chronological Account of the Life of Pythagoras, and of other Famous Men his Contemporaries: with an Epistle to the Reverend Dr Bentley, about Porphyry's and Iamblichus's Lives of Pythagoras [E].' The 22d of January, 1699-1700, he was translated face to his Origines Britannicæ, &c. Lond. fol. 1685; wherein he observes, that 'there is more reason to admire at the strangeness of this Accusation, unless it were intended to shew that he [Sir George] could as well prosecute as write against the Bishop by virtue of his office, for disputing their Antiquities. As though the fundamental Constitution of the British Monarchy were at all concerned in the credit of Hætor-Boethius; for upon it, the main stress of this matter doth rest.'

(13) Pref. p. 4. (13) — He had said a little before (14), that, 'It is not every one that can plead eloquently at the Bar, or quote Authors at second hand, or dispute warmly out of common places, that is presently fit to judge about such things.' — Sir George published a Reply, intitled, The Antiquity of the Royal Line of Scotland farther cleared and defended against the exceptions lately offered by Dr Stillingfleet in his Vindication of the Bishop of St Asaph. Lond. 1686, 8vo. Both the Defence and Reply were translated into Latin by P. S. and printed at Utrecht in 1689, 8vo with a dedicatory Epistle to J. G. Grævius. — 'Tis to be observ'd, that the Bishop has been guilty in his Book of some few Inaccuracies, for which he is sharply censured by M'kenzie. The first is in the Preface *, where he calls John de Fordun, the Monk of Fordon. Now John de Fordun, author of the Scoti-Chronicon, was certainly no Monk, but a priest and chaplain of the Church of Aberdeen; and there was no such monastery as Fordon in Scotland (15). Sir George M'kenzie therefore triumphs in this mistake, and says, Fordun 'is called a Monk by the Bishop (who studies still his own conveniency) to make the world believe he was inclin'd to lie, as the Monks are said to have been in that age; and to shew him interested for the independency of Monks and Culdees from Bishops (16). Dr Stillingfleet, in his Reply to Sir George (17), grants 'it was a mistake but not designed, and a very pardonable one, since Dempster, who had read him, faith (18), some thought him a Monk; and the very learned G. J. Vossius makes the author of the Scoti-Chronicon, to have been Abbot of Forda or Fordon (19): confounding him with the Abbot of Ford in Devonshire (20). — A second mistake committed by the Bishop, is in page 38, of the same Preface: where he says, 'after this succession from Fergus was published by Hætor Boethius, it seems it was not then believed by the learned men of his own nation. For Polidore Virgil tells us (21), that when Hætor's book was newly come forth; Gawen Douglas, bishop of Dunkeld, warned him of it, and earnestly prayed him not to follow that History in writing of the Scottish matters.' — But Gawen Douglas dyed in the year 1521 (22), and Hætor's History was not published till 1526. Therefore his History was not the History meant by G. Douglas; but it was that of J. Major, which was published in 1520. And indeed P. Virgil doth not so much as mention Hætor Boethius's name. His words are, — postea summe rogavit ut ne Historiam paulo ante a quodam suo Scoto divulgatam sequeretur, in rebus Scoticis explicandis (23) — Another mistake committed by the Bishop, is in the body of the Book, p. 153. where he calls Tho. Dempster a Jesuit. For he was no Jesuit, but first a School-master at Paris, and afterwards Professor honorarius at Bologna, and a married man. He called himself Baron of Muireisk, and said that he had quitted Scotland for the sake of his Religion (24).

He begins that Epistle with observing, That upon putting his collections in order, to draw out a Chronological Account of the life of Pythagoras, if it were possible; he found 'they look'd like moon-shine in rough water, all over discord and confusion; Out of which, says he, I am so far from making out that which I design'd, a perfect Account of his life, that I must confess, I can't do any thing towards it. There is not in all my collection, any one certain year in which any thing happen'd to him, or was done by him. Yet I cannot lament that great man's misfortune in this, nor ours neither: for as he was a perfect juggler, so his Life, being all fast and loose, I must needs say, is written worthy of himself: and it is not only come intire into our hands, notwithstanding those defects I have mention'd; but with many improvements by later writers, who have striven to out-do one another in stories to his honour and praise. Of those many eminent writers (25) that have employ'd their pens on this subject, there are three that have given us his History at large; Diogenes Laertius, Porphyry, and Iamblichus. These three, I believe, have cull'd out all that was remarkable in any of the rest: and the two last were his great admirers, who would not omit any thing that might make for his glory. They describe him as a very extraordinary person, for his Parts and Inventions for the good of mankind: they tell us what Discoveries he made in natural Philosophy: how much he advanced the mathematical Sciences, as well by his studies as his travels. But above all, they magnify his knowledge of the Gods, and of the things of religion. Laertius tells us (26), he was initiated in all the sacred rites, as well of the Greeks, as Barbarians. Those other writers of his life take particular notice of this in every stage of his travels. And yet Porphyry will not let his reader be ignorant, that Pythagoras was a Deist, as well as himself; and took both Apollo and Jupiter for no other than deify'd men, which he shew'd by the verses that he made in those places when he was to see their sepulchres. Indeed by those verses one cannot but think that he despis'd those made Gods in his heart: and so did probably those Philosophers that tell us these things; though, according to the latitude of their principles, they were nevertheless as zealous as he was for the propagating of Heathen idolatry. What notions men have of a Deity, one cannot better judge than by their morals. For every one that hath any sense of Religion, will endeavour to conform himself to the God whom he worships; At least he will avoid any thing that he knows to be contrary to his God. If we judge this way of Pythagoras, according to the accounts they give of him, we have reason to believe, that (as the Apostle tells us of them, whom the Heathens worship'd) his Gods were no better than Devils. It could be no otherwise, if there be any truth in the stories they tell, of his impudent diabolical fictions; and of the fraudulent ways that he took to make the people admire him: which they also that tell us these things seem to think were no lessening of his moral virtues. Particularly, they shew how he perswaded his hearers to receive that doctrine of the Transmigration of Souls. That it was originally an Aegyptian doctrine we are told by Herodotus (27): But if lying Philostratus may be believ'd (28), the Aegyptians had it from the Bramins: It is agreed, that Pythagoras was he that first brought it into Greece; and translated to the Bishopric of Worcester, upon the decease of Dr Edward Stillingfleet (r). In 1702, he and his son having too zealously interested themselves in the election of Knights of the Shire for the county of Worcester, and endeavoured to hinder Sir John Packington from being chosen; a complaint was made about it to the House of Commons [F]: whereupon they addressed the Queen, on the 21st of November, that she would and there it seems he had a mind to be thought the first author of it (29). To make the people believe this, he told them an impudent lye, that his soul was in Euphorbus at the time of the Trojan war; and in the 600 years between that and his birth, his soul had pass'd through several other bodies before it came into his. He faced them down that he knew this by a singular gift of remembering all the stages through which his soul had pass'd in its travels. First, when Euphorbus was kill'd by Menelaus (which was in the year before Christ, 1185) then his soul, as he said, came into Æthalides the son of Mercury. After his death, it came into Hermitimus: then into one Pyrrbus a Fisherman; and at last it came into Pythagoras. This is Porphyry's way of telling the story (30). But from others we have it, That Pythagoras himself used to say, That his soul was in Æthalides before it came into Euphorbus. — In order to account, How Pythagoras came to remember those several Transmigrations, — They tell us, that Mercury, whose office it was to carry souls into hades, gave the soul of his son Æthalides, in its way thither, the privilege not to drink the waters of Lethe, the drinking whereof makes souls forget all that pass'd in this world: and so it is plain, how, as Pythagoras used to say (31), Euphorbus remembered his soul had dwelt formerly in the body of Æthalides, and Hermitimus, that his soul was in both these, and the Fisherman, that his soul was in those three, and Pythagoras, that his soul was in them all.

They also tell us, how it came to pass, that in 600 years that soul of his was only in two bodies, namely, of Hermitimus and the Fisherman: for Mercury, as Pythagoras himself used also to say (32), gave the soul of his son Æthalides leave to rest sometimes in hades, and at other times to travel above ground; and so Pythagoras himself said, that after the Fisherman's death, his soul had rested 207 years in hades, before it came into that body of his. But what of all this? The doctrine of Transmigration of Souls is sufficiently proved, if the soul of Pythagoras was at any time formerly in the body of Euphorbus. And that, as Porphyry tells us (33), was positively affirm'd by Pythagoras himself, and prov'd beyond dispute; as likewise his scholar Iamblichus tells us in the very same words. But these Philosophers were wise; they took care to hide that part of their ware which would have disgrac'd all the rest. It was the Egyptian doctrine (34), that souls pass'd out of men into beasts, and fishes, and birds. This also, according to Heraclides, Pythagoras used to say of himself; that he remembered, not only what men, but what plants, and what animals his soul had pass'd through. And, tho' this was more than Mercury gave to Æthalides, Pythagoras took upon him to tell many others how their souls had lived before they came into their bodies (35). One particularly that was beating a dog, he desir'd to forbear, because in the yelping of that dog, he heard a friend's soul speak to him. — How could such fictions as these come into mens heads? There is more than idle fancy in them. They shew plainly a pernicious devilish design, to confound those two doctrines that have so great an influence into mens minds to make them do good, and eschew evil: the Doctrines of the Immortality of the Soul, and of the Resurrection of the Body. For if those fictions were true, there would be no difference between the soul of a man, and the soul of a brute, or a plant; and there would be many more bodies than there would be souls to animate them at the Resurrection. What would not the devil give to have these things believ'd by all mankind? — For the Tricks they tell us he had to make the people admire him, they are so agreeable to his character, that his historian Iamblichus, with the same design, aped him in some of them; unless he is bely'd by Eunapius the writer of his life.

They were, as one may properly call them, the artifices of an impostor. — The first thing, we read, Pythagoras did (36), to make way for the authehtical publishing of his doctrines, was to make himself look like a sort of Demi-god to the people.

For this purpose, he provided himself a cell under ground; and then, giving out he was dead, he retir'd into that hole: and there for a long time together, seven years as some tell us, he lived unknown to all mankind. Only his mother was in the secret, for she was to supply him with necessaries: but of these, he took in no more than just what would keep him alive. Then at last, he came forth like a perfect skeleton, and shewed himself as one that had been all this while in another world. He that was so greedy, of vain Glory, that he could afford to purchase it at this rate; pretended also to do things above the Power of any mortal, that is to work Miracles. Such lies they were, I do not doubt, that Porphyry and Iamblichus tell us (37), of his laying winds, tempests, and earthquakes; for of these they do not give any particular instance, nor are these things mentioned by any other writers that I remember. So likewise they tell us of his curing diseases, whether of body or mind, which they say, he did with charms: that is, as Cyril saith, he did them by the help of the devil. — Many other lying wonders they tell of him, which seem to have been made only for talk, being such as could signify nothing to the good of mankind. As namely, how to shew his company what he could do, he took up serpents that had killed other men, and handled them, so as that they neither hurt him, nor lie them. How for the same purpose, by whistling to an Eagle that happen'd to fly over his head, he brought her down to his hand, and then let her go again. — How by stroaking a Bear, and whispering a Bull in the ear, he brought them both to the Pythagorean Diet: the bear to eat nothing that had life; and the bull to crop no more bean-tops, &c. — But why should these Philosophers either be so wicked to abuse the faith of mankind in devising such stories? Or why should they take the pains to collect them, and pawn their faith to give them credit in the world? Such great Men as they were, had no doubt great Reason for this (38). — A few pages after he observes, That all the Miraculous Stories related of Pythagoras by Porphyry, and Iamblichus; and of Apollonius Tyaneus, by Philostratus; were made use of to this purpose, 'To shew, that all the great things that are told of our Saviour in the Gospel, were equall'd, if not outdone by these Heathen Philosophers (39).'

He took a good deal of pains to explain Daniel's Seventy Weeks; and drew up a very learned Dissertation upon that subject, which is inserted in the General Dictionary. In that Dissertation he treats at large of the ancient year, beginning thus. 'What sorts of Years it was, that the Angel intended in this prophecy, hath been formerly a great question among learned men; Africanus, who, of all that we know among Christians, was the first that brought skill in Chronology to the interpreting of Scripture, judged rightly, that the 69 weeks of this prophecy were to begin from the 20th year of Artaxerxes Longimanus. But to measure from thence, he made use of Lunar years of 354 days and odd hours. But it is plain that would not do. Then after him, to mend the matter, Eusebius made use of Solar years of 365 days and 6 hours; but with no better success. And no wonder that both these great men were mistaken, for they did not consider, that neither of these two sorts of years was known to the world in Daniel's time; and therefore for Daniel to have reckoned by either of these, he must have had another revelation. But no doubt the Angel meant such sort of years as Daniel knew, namely such as was used in that age, and in the country where Daniel lived. But at that time it is certain, that the Eastern nations reckoned just 30 days to a month; and of 12 such months consisted their year, which was just 360 days. It does not appear, that in Daniel's time there was any other sort of years in common use in any part of the world; and perhaps this was the only sort of year, that had then been any where in common use since the creation.' Vide Jos. Scalig. de Emend. Tempor. Genevæ 1629, iii. 188. B. iii. 194. A. ib. 195. B. — Then after shewing that, among the ancient Patriarchs immediately after the Flood; among the Egyptians, the Romans, the Babylonians, the Asiatics, &c. the year consisted only of 360 days, he goes on thus. — 'It sufficiently appears then, that the most ancient form of years, was that of 360 days; and that this ancient form, however some had begun to alter it in some other nations, yet was the only form of year that was vulgarly used in the Eastern countries, even then when this prophecy was given. And, lastly, that their manner of using it was with a leap month at the end of every year, according to the Greek way of reckoning; but the way of the Easterlings was, for so many years to reckon so many times 360 days; without any leap-month or leap day between: — In order to the better understanding of the 7 weeks and 62 weeks, they are first to be turned into days. A week of years of 360 days to the year consisting of 2520 days, this number taken 7 times will be 17640 days, which come to 48 Julian years and 108 days. These are therefore seven weeks, according to the intent of this prophecy. Sixty-two such weeks contain a number 156240 days, which turned into Julian years make 427 years and 278 days. Therefore these are sixty-two weeks of years, which being added to the seven weeks make in all 173880 days, i. e. in all 476 Julian years and 21 days; and these being so added together are equal to the whole number of sixty-nine weeks, that was the determinate time from the going forth of the command to build Jerusalem again till the Messiah the Prince, i. e. till the time when the Messiah was to be cut off.' — Sir Isaac Newton having inserted the substance of this Dissertation into his Chronology, makes this observation upon it. — 'I have perused the Paper, &c. and find it filled with excellent observations concerning the ancient year; but do not find it proves, that any ancient nation used a year of twelve months, and 360 days, without correcting it from time to time by the Luminaries, to make the month keep to the course of the Moon, and the years to the course of the Sun, and returns of the seasons and fruits of the earth, &c.' XI. Our learned Bishop printed 'An Exposition of Daniel's Prophecy of Seventy weeks;' to the same purpose as the Dissertation just now mention'd. But leaving it imperfect, it was never published *. XII. He also compiled 'A System of Chronology;' of which twenty-six sheets, reaching down to the year 3663 of the Julian period, were printed, but never published, being also left imperfect. However, out of this, his Chaplain, Benjamin Marshall, M. A. composed his Chronological Tables, printed at Oxford in 1712, and 1713, in which was inserted his Lordship's Exposition of Daniel's Weeks. — The Rev. Peter Lancafter, Vicar of Bowdon in Cheshire, not approving of Bishop Lloyd's Explanation of this prophecy published (40), 'A Chronological Essay on the ninth chapter of the Book of Daniel: Or, an Interpretation of the prophecy of the seventy weeks, whereby the Jews, in and above Four hundred and sixty years before our Saviour's time, might certainly know the very year in which the Messiah was to come. — Whereupon Mr. Marshall put out, 'A Chronological Treatise upon the Seventy Weeks of Daniel; wherein is evidently shewn the accomplishment of the predicted Events, &c. In a particular Disquisition upon the three latest Hypotheses of these weeks published among us, viz. that of the late learned Bishop Lloyd; that of the late learned Dr Prideaux; and that of the Reverend Mr Lancafter. All which hypotheses are here fully considered; and the late Bishop Lloyd's is generally supported and established (41). — Mr Lancafter replied, in a pamphlet, intitled, 'Some Remarks on the late Bishop Lloyd's Hypothesis of Daniel's prophecy of the Seventy Weeks. In a letter to the Reverend Mr Marshall, Rector of Naunton in Gloucestershire (42). — And Mr Marshall replied also, by publishing, Three Letters in farther vindication of Bishop Lloyd's Hypothesis, in answer to Mr Lancafter, Mr Whiston, and the author of The Scheme of literal Prophecy considered (43). XIII. Bishop Lloyd compiled 'An Harmony of the Gospels;' part of which was printed in quarto, but left imperfect. XIV. He added the Chronology, and many of the References, and parallel places, printed in most of our English Bibles; particularly the Quarto ones XV. He translated into Latin and English, a Greek Epistle of Jeremy, Priest of the Eastern Church, to Mr Ashmole, concerning the Life of St George, according to the Traditions of the Eastern Christians, M.S. in Musæo Ashmol. No. 1133.

year of his age, without losing the use of his understanding, he departed this life at Hartlebury-castle, Aug. 30, 1717, and was buried Sept. 10 following, in the church of Fladbury in Worcestershire, of which his son was Rector. A monument for him was soon after, affixed to the wall, on the north side the chancel, with a long inscription (t) : from which we learn, that he was an excellent pattern of virtue and learning ; of a quick invention ; firm memory ; exquisite judgment ; great candour, piety, and gravity ; a faithful Historian ; accurate Chronologer ; and skilled in the knowledge of the Holy Scriptures to a miracle ; very charitable ; and diligent and careful in the discharge of his episcopal office. A. Wood says (u), he was an eminent Divine, Critic, and Historian, a zealous enemy to Popery and Papiſts. And Dr Burnet gives the following character of him (w). That he was the most indefatigable in his industry, and the most judicious in his observations, of any he knew, and one of the greatest masters of style then living. ‘ He was ‘ (adds he) a great critic in the Greek and Latin authors, but chiefly in the Scriptures ; ‘ of the words and phrases of which he carried the most perfect concordance in his memo- ‘ ry, and had it the readiest about him of all men that ever I knew. He was an exact ‘ Historian, and the most punctual in Chronology of all our Divines. He had read the ‘ most books, and with the best judgment, and had made the most copious abstracts ‘ out of them, of any of this age. He was so exact in every thing he set about, that he ‘ never gave over any part of study, till he had quite mastered it. But when that was ‘ done, he went to another subject, and did not lay out his learning with the diligence ‘ with which he laid it in. He had many volumes of materials upon all subjects, laid ‘ together in so distinct a method, that he could with very little labour write on any of ‘ them. He had more life in his imagination, and a truer judgment, than may seem con- ‘ sistent with such a laborious course of study. Yet, as much as he was set on learning, ‘ he had never neglected his pastoral care. For several years he had the greatest cure in ‘ England, St Martin’s, which he took care of with an application and diligence beyond ‘ any about him ; to whom he was an example or rather a reproach, so few following his ‘ example. He was a holy, humble, and patient man, ever ready to do good when he ‘ saw a proper opportunity : even his love of study did not divert him from that blessed employment (x).

XVI. He left in manuscript, part of ‘ A Discourse of ‘ the three Orders in the Ministry of the Christian ‘ Church, now called Bishops, Priests, and Deacons ; ‘ shewing out of the Holy Scriptures, that they are of ‘ divine Institution.’ XVII. He took great pains in compiling a ‘ History of the Church of England ;’ but being engaged in the service of the Church, in a station that afforded him very little leisure, he set Dr Burnet upon it, and furnished him with a curious collection of his own observations. And in some sort the History of the Reformation may be accounted his, for he corrected it with a most critical exactness ; so that the first materials, and the last finishing of it, were from him (44). XVIII. He gave great assistance to Dr John Wilkins, in composing his Essay towards a real Character and a Philosophical Language. Lond. 1668, fol. as the Dr acknowledges in the Epistle to the reader, in these words. — ‘ As for the principal difficulties ‘ which I met with in any part of this work, I must ‘ acknowledge myself obliged to the continual assistance ‘ I have had of my most learned and worthy friend Dr ‘ Will. Lloyd, than whom (so far as I am able to ‘ judge) this nation could not have afforded a fitter ‘ person, either for that great industry, or accurate ‘ judgment both in Philological and Philosophical mat- ‘ ters, required to such a work. And particularly I ‘ must wholly ascribe to him, that tedious and difficult ‘ task of suiting the Tables to the Dictionary, and the ‘ drawing up the Dictionary itself, which upon tryal,

‘ I doubt not, will be found to be the most perfect ‘ that was ever yet made for the English tongue, &c.’ XIX. He is thought to have had the chief hand in the Series Chronologica Olympiadum, Isthmiadum, Nemeadum, &c. published by his son at Oxford 1700, fol. XX. He is said to have written something upon the Revelation of St John ; to which the Author of Faction display'd alludes in the following lines.

Then old Mysterio shook his silver hairs,
Loaded with Learning, Prophecy, and Years,
Whom factious Zeal to fierce unchristian Strife
Had hurry'd in the last Extream of Life.
Strange dotage ! thus to sacrifice his Ease,
When Nature whispers men to crown their days
With sweet Retirement, and religious Peace !
Fore-knowledge struggled in his heaving breast,
E'er he in these dark terms his Fears exprest.
‘ The Stars rowl adverse, and malignant shine,
‘ Some dire Portent ! some Comet I divine !
‘ I plainly in the Revelations find,
‘ That Anna to the Beast will be inclin'd.
‘ Howe'er, tho' She and all her Senate frown,
‘ I'll wage eternal War with Packington,
‘ And venture Life and Fame to pull him down. C

LOCKE [JOHN], the celebrated Philosopher, was born at Wrington in Somersetshire, on the 29th of August, 1632 (a). During his infancy, his education was conducted with a paternal care and affection, but with much strictness [A] and severity, by his father, who being bred to the Law, was Steward or Court-keeper to Colonel Alexander Popham (b); and, upon breaking out of the civil wars, became a Captain in the Parliament's army. He was a gentleman of probity and œconomy, and possessed of a compeinforms us, that Mr Locke was baptized there the same day he was born. Bibl. Choise, Tom. VI. p. 345.

[A] His education was managed in his infancy with much strictness. Mr Le Clerc tells us (1), that our author always spoke of his parents with great respect and tenderness, and took notice of the great care his father had of his education, and particularly approved one part, which he often mentioned, of his father's conduct to him, being severe, and keeping him at a great dis-stance while he was a child : but that as soon as he grew up, becoming more familiar by degrees, they lived at last together with the ease and confidence of friends, where no subjection was required ; inasmuch that his father excused himself to him for having once struck him while he was a child, rather out of passion, than because he deserved it.

tent estate, which yet happened to be greatly impaired (c), when it came into the hands of this his eldest son, whom at a proper age he put to Westminster-school, where he remained 'till he was nineteen years of age, when he was removed to Oxford; and being admitted of Christ-Church in 1651, became a student of that college (d), and distinguished himself by an ingenious epigram upon Cromwell's peace with the Dutch in 1653 [B]. Having taken at the regular times both his degrees in Arts (e), he put himself upon the Physick line (f); to which profession he applied with great diligence, and practised therein a little at Oxford [C]: but finding his constitution not able to bear the fatigue of much business, he forbore to push it; and, being highly delighted with the Philosophy of Des Cartes [D], which then began to grow into vogue, he thence took a fancy to that study.

[B] A copy of verses upon the peace with the Dutch in 1653. By the terms of this treaty, the Dutch, at the same time that they stipulated not to admit King Charles II. or any other enemy to the common-wealth of England into their territories, had likewise yielded the right of the flag to the English (2). So much of the history of this peace was necessary to let us see the full meaning of Mr Locke's compliment in these verses. They were judged worthy of a place in a collection presented by that University to the Protector upon this occasion, and being now not very commonly to be met with, may here justly be expected.

Pax regit Augusti, quem vicit Julius, orbem, Ille fago factus clarior, ille toga.
Hos sua Roma vocat magnos, & numina credit;
Hic quod sit mundi Victor, & ille quies;
Tu bellum & pacem populis das, unus utriusque
Major es, ipse orbem vincis, et ipse regis.
Non Hominem e caelo missum te credimus? unus
Sic poteras binos qui superare Deos.

Thus englished by the same hand.

A peaceful sway the great Augustus bore,
O'er what great Julius gain'd by arms before:
Julius was all with martial trophies crown'd,
Augustus for his peaceful arts renown'd.
Rome calls them great, and makes them Deities,
This for his valour, that his policies.
You, mighty Prince! than both are greater far;
You rule in peace that world, you gain'd by war.
You, Sir, from Heav'n a finish'd hero fell,
Who thus alone two Pagan God's excel.

The reader, I believe, will readily grant that neither the poetry nor the versification in these lines are by any means contemptible, when he sees them here separated from those of his fellow-students, South and Busby, in which company it must be owned they are shewn to a great disadvantage by the editor (3) of the collection now before me. But whatever poetical talents he was endued with, 'tis certain they lay greatly neglected. Some verses which were wrote by him several years afterwards, and prefixed to Dr Sydenham's Observationes Medicæ, are a convincing proof of this (4).

[C] He practised physick at Oxford. Mr Wood expresses it thus, he run thro' a course of chymistry, and got some little practice in Oxford (5); apparently intimating that he took sees as well as other young practitioners in that faculty. However, as the same author informs us, that he did not proceed to take a degree in physick 'till 1674, 'tis evident he was in no haste to push himself forward in the practice, since, without a degree therein, he must needs follow it at a great disadvantage in the parts about Oxford, and could not regularly practise at all for profit within the precincts of the University. Mr Le Clerc tells us, that he never practis'd to make any profit by it (6), meaning no doubt that he did not make it his ordinary business in the manner of other physicians; for it cannot be supposed that he had not a view to his own advantage in accepting, as we shall see presently he did, the offer made to him by Lord Ashley, of being physician to himself and his family; and as his Lordship not only permitted, but recommended him occasionally to his particular friends, he obtained thereby the most genteel way of exercising the faculty (7).

[D] Delighted with Des Cartes's philosophy. We have advanced this on the sole authority of Le Clerc, who very possibly might have it from our author's own mouth.

The truth of the case seems to be as follows. Mr Locke by having before his eyes frequent instances of the extravagant abuse that was then made of the scholastic exercise of disputing, had thence hastily taken up an irconcilable aversion to that method of disciplining youth, which he indulged so far, that it began in him something like an antipathy to that branch of Aristotle's philosophy, as consisting he thought only of obscure terms, and productive of nothing so much as useless and trifling questions. I venture to call it something like an antipathy, since it appears to have its root in the natural frame of his temper, which was peevish and choleric, too delicate (8) for logical contents: we are told by one (9) who knew him well, and is far from being suspected in that place of designing any injury to his character, that he had such an abhorrence to profess'd disputants, whose aim is to carry the victory, by puzzling their antagonists with the ambiguity of words; that whenever he had to deal with this sort of people, if he did not before-hand take a strong resolution of keeping his temper, he quickly fell into a passion. This constitutional abhorrence grew, as is usual, by degrees, into a settled and determined point of judgment. A remarkable proof of which is seen in the answer he gave to Mr Will. Molyneux, who, with a view of introducing his Essay of Human Understanding into the Universities, proposed to him to cast it into the form of the treatises of Logic and Metaphysics read there. 'That which you propose, says he (10), of turning my Essay into a body of Logic and Metaphysics, accommodated to the usual forms, though I thank you very kindly for it, and plainly see in it the care you have of the education of young scholars, which is a thing of no small moment, yet, I fear, I shall scarce find time to do it. You have cut out other work for me (11) more to my liking, and I think of more use. Besides that, if they have in this book of mine what you think the matter of these two sciences, or what you will call them; I like the method it is in, better than that of the schools, where I think it is no small prejudice to knowledge, that prædicaments, prædicables, &c. being universally, in all their systems, come to be looked on as necessary principles or unquestionable parts of knowledge, just as they are set down there. If Logic be the first thing to be taught young men after grammar, as is the usual method, I think yet it should be nothing but proposition and syllogism. But that being in order to their disputing exercises in the University, perhaps I may think those may be spared too, disputing being but an ill (not to say the worst) way to knowledge (12)'. It ought to be observed, that the spirit of censuring this part of education in the Universities had possessed others, near the time of which we are now speaking, as well as our author: Mr Joseph Glanville (13), for instance, ventured to rally the pedantry, as he calls it, and boyish humour of it, with a peculiar rankness of wit, calling it a bare formal scheme of empty airy notions, senseless terms, and insignificant words, fit only to make a noise, and furnish matter of wrangling and contention, and declaring often that his being trained up in that road was one of the greatest unhappineffes that had ever befallen him. In the room of Aristotle's Philosophy, he substituted several hypotheses from Cartesius, then called the New Philosophy. It had indeed been for some time universally taught in Holland, and at Geneva, and had captivated many others, as well as Mr Locke, with the charming variety and perspicuity of the stile in which the founder had dressed it up, and which was universally admired, even by those who did not approve all his notions (14). Neither did our author suffer himself to be misled by these; but, on the contrary, by pursuing his own ideas, became himself in one subject, as is well known, a master builder intirely upon his own stock;

(8) With this also concurred a tender habit of body, inclinable in a consumption, the latera and pulmones being as necessary to a good disputant at that time, as they were to a good orator in ancient Greece and Rome.

(m) See remarks [L] and [M].

In 1664, he had an opportunity of going abroad, in quality of Secretary to Sir William Swan, who was appointed Envoy to the Elector of Brandenburg, and some other German princes (g). Our author returned the year following to Oxford, where he continued to improve his knowledge in Philosophy and Physick, and particularly in 1666, fell in with the scheme that had been lately set on foot by Dr Plott (b), of keeping a register of the air [E], in order to perfect the natural history of that most necessary article of what the Physicians call the non-naturals. He was thus employed, when an accident brought him acquainted with Lord Ashley, afterwards Earl of Shaftesbury. His Lordship having an abscess in his breast under his stomach, occasioned by a fall, was advised to drink the Astrop waters. In this design he wrote to a Physician (i) at Oxford, to procure some of those waters to be ready against his arrival. That Physician being called away by other business, transferred this commission to his friend Mr Locke, who found himself obliged to wait upon his Lordship the day after his arrival, to excuse the disappointment of not having the waters ready (k). Lord Ashley, as his manner was, received him with great civility, declared himself satisfied with his apology, and, being much pleased with his conversation, upon his rising to take leave, detained him to supper, and engaged him to dinner the next day, and even to drink the waters (Mr Locke having expressed some design of doing it shortly), that he might have the more of his company (l). From this beginning, that Lord became our author's patron, took him into his house, soon afterwards followed his advice in opening the abscess in his breast, would not suffer him to practise physick out of his own family and among some particular friends, introduced him to several Lords of his acquaintance, who shewed him an extraordinary respect [F], and urged him to direct his application chiefly to the subject of politics. All which was evidently calculated by that most artful statesman, exactly to hit the meridian of Mr Locke's taste and temper; and he prosecuted his newly-prescribed study with so much success, as to be very useful to his patron in his most daring designs (m). In 1668, he attended the Countess of Northumberland into France; but an unforeseen accident obliged him, after a short stay there, to return to England (n), where he continued to reside with Lord Ashley, who having, jointly with some other lords, obtained a grant of Carolina, our author was employed to draw up the fundamental constitutions of that province [G]. In 1670, and the following

(15) He frequently mentions this spirit evoc with the greatest fondness, particularly where, after a high eulogium of Mr Whiston's Theory of the Earth on that account, he writes thus to Mr Molyneux: 'Of all the motto's I ever met with, this, writ over a water-work at Cleve, best pleased me: Natura omnes fecit Judices, paucos Artifices.' Familiar Letters, ubi supra, p. 177.

stock; and if the spirit of building (15) was first of all infused into him (as seems not improbable) from the spleen; yet he afterwards raised such original works, as will immortalize his name.

[E] A register of the air. He printed this at the end of a posthumous piece of Mr Rob. Boyle, intitled, A general history of the Air, in 1692, 8vo. Our author called his paper A Register of the changes of the Air observed at Oxford, by the Barometer, Thermometer, and Hygrometer, from June 24, 1660, to March 28, 1667. As soon as the book was finished at the press, he sent a copy as a present to his friend Mr Molyneux at Dublin, with the following account of that undertaking. 'Though this piece of Mr Boyle, says he, was left very imperfect by him, yet I think the very design of it will please you; and it is cast into a method, that any one that pleases may add to it, under any of the several titles, as his reading or observation shall furnish him with matter of fact; but it is a subject too large for any one man, and requires the assistance of many heads to make it a history very short of compleat.' He also invites Mr Molyneux to throw in his mite towards completing such a history, as containing greater variety and use than almost any other branch of Natural Philosophy. Here we see how much at heart our author had the prosecution of this subject, in preference to all other parts of Natural Philosophy (16). He had indeed an instinctive cause for making this choice in the particular infirmity of his own constitution, which was asthmatic; and it is observable, that these histories have been since made excellent use of, towards discovering the qualities of the air by another gentleman (17) who laboured also under the like constitutional disorder.

[F] Who shewed him an extraordinary respect. Mr Le Clerc tells us (18), they were much pleased with Mr Locke's conversation, and the following story which the same author relates as an instance of the liberty that he took with them, whether it was as that author declares, suitable to his character or not, certainly furnishes an illustrious proof of their politeness to him. Three or four of these Lords, says Mr Le Clerc, having met at Lord Ashley's, rather for conversation than business, after some compliments, very little conversation had passed when the butler brought in the cards: Mr Locke looked on for some time while they were at play, and then taking his pocket-book, began to write with great attention. One of the company observing this, asked him what he was writing? my Lord, says he, I am endeavouring to profit, as far as I am capable, in your company; for having waited with impatience for the honour of being in an assembly of the greatest geniuses of the age, and having at length obtained this good fortune, I thought I could not do better than write down your conversation; and indeed I have set down the substance of what has been said for this hour or two. He had no occasion to read much of this dialogue, those noble persons saw the ridicule, and diverted themselves with improving the jest; and presently quitting their play, entered into a conversation more suitable to their characters, and spent the rest of the day in that manner.

[G] The fundamental constitutions of Carolina. The Latitudinarian spirit of the two following articles in these constitutions gave great offence to the Clergy at that time. Art. xcvi. 'No man will be promoted to be a freeman of Carolina, or to have any vote or habitation within it, that doth not acknowledge a God, and that God to be publicly and solemnly worshipped. xcvii. Since the natives of that place, who will be concerned in our plantation, are utterly strangers to Christianity, whose idolatry, ignorance, or mistakes, give us no right to expel, or use them ill; and those who remove from other parts to plant there, will unavoidably be of different opinions concerning matters of religion, the liberty whereof they will expect to have allowed them; and it will not be reasonable for us on this account to keep them out: that still peace may be maintained amidst the diversity of opinions, and our agreement and compact with all men may be duly and faithfully observed, the breach whereof, upon what pretence soever, cannot be without great offence to Almighty God, and great scandal to the true religion, which we profess; and also that Jews, Heathens, and other Dissenters from the purity of the Christian religion, may not be scared and kept at a distance from it; but by having an opportunity to acquaint themselves with the truth and reasonableness of its doctrines, and the peaceableness and inoffensiveness of its professors, may, by good usage and persuasion, and all those convincing methods of gentleness and meekness, suitable to the rules and design of the gospel, be won over to embrace and unfeignedly receive the truth. Therefore any seven or more persons agreeing in any religion shall constitute a church or profession, to which they shall following year, he began to form the plan of his Essay upon Human Understanding, but was hindered from making then any great progress in that work by other employments, which were found for him by his patron, who in 1672 (o), being raised to the post of Lord Chancellor (p), did not forget to let his faithful client share in the fruits of his power, by appointing him Secretary of the Presentations. This place he held as long as his master kept the Great Seal; but that being taken from him in November, the year following (q); our author, to whom the Earl had communicated his most secret affairs, fell into disgrace together with him, and afterwards contributed his mite to some pieces, which the Earl procured to be published, with a view of exciting the nation to watch the Roman-Catholics, and to oppose the designs of that party. However, his Lordship being still President at the Board of Trade (r), Mr Locke had been made, in June the same year, Secretary to a commission of that kind, an office which was worth to him 500 pounds per annum as long as it lasted; but the commission was dissolved in December 1674 (s). Our author had all this while kept possession of his student's place at Christ-Church, whither he used not unfrequently to resort, as well for the conveniency of books; as also upon account of his health, the air of London not agreeing well with his constitution: and, having taken his degree of Bachelor of Physick on the sixth of February this year (t) [H], he went the following summer to Montpellier, being apprehensive of a consumption.

' shall give some name to distinguish it from others.' Thus this famous instrument stood in the original draught by our author. But some of the chief proprietors probably seeing the great scandal that would be given by putting, as is here done, not only all denominations of christians, but the wildest sectaries and foulest hereticks, nay even Jews and Pagans, upon the same foot with true Christianity, and entitling all equally to the same privileges, without any respect had to the Church of England, of which they professed themselves members, thought proper, between these two articles, to insert the following Art. XCVI. 'As the country comes to be sufficiently planted and distributed into fit divisions, it shall belong to the Parliament to take care for the building of churches, and the publick maintenance of divines, to be employed in the exercise of religion, according to the Church of England, which being the only true and orthodox, and the national religion of all the King's dominions, is so also of Carolina, and therefore it alone shall be allowed publick maintenance by grant of Parliament.' This article being introduced against Mr Locke's judgment, as he expressly declared (19), 'tis no wonder if from thence his affection to the Church of England began much to be suspected; and as this opinion was confirmed by several of his subsequent writings, he has been generally placed among the chiefs of the Latitudinarians. Accordingly not very many years ago, we find Dr Waterland feating him next to Lord Herbert of Cherbury, at the head of Barbeyrac, Le Clerc, &c. and stretching such principles even wider than those his followers. 'But he, says that learned and orthodox divine, speaking of Mr Barbeyrac, refers us for explication of fundamentals to a noted Treatise of Le Clerc's, at the end of Grotius de veritate religionis christianæ, A. D. 1709. 'A Treatise so indefinite and loose, that one scarce knows what it aims at; except it be, that nothing should pass for a fundamental, which has been ever disputed by men calling themselves christians, and professing scripture, however interpreted to be their rule. Which is judging of important truths, not by the word of God soberly understood, nor by catholick tradition, nor by the reason of things, but by the floating humours and fancies of men, as if all christian doctrines were to be expunged out of the list of necessaries, which have had the misfortune to be disputed amongst us, and a short creed were to be made out of the remainder. But what if others, with Baron Herbert of Cherbury, or with the author of the fundamental constitutions of Carolina, building upon the same principles of latitude, and willing to compound all differences, should advise us to admit nothing for a fundamental, but what all mankind have hitherto agreed in, and for the future shall agree in, Atheists only excepted; where will then at length these presumptuous schemes end?' (20)

[H] He took the degree of M. B.] We have observed already, that he always practised physick among a few select friends. At the same time, he likewise kept up an acquaintance with several of the faculty (25), and what was his reputation therein, may be known from the testimony that is given of it by the celebrated Dr Sydenham, who in his book, intitled, Observationes Medicæ, circa morborum acutorum historiam & curationem, printed in 1676, writes thus (22), 'You know likewise how much my method has been approved of by a person who has examined it to the bottom, and who is our common friend: I mean Mr John Locke, who, if we consider his genius, and penetrating and exact judgment, or the strictness of his morals, has scarce any superior, and few equals now living. Nosſi preterea, &c.' To this book there is prefixed a copy of commendatory verses by our author (as has been already mentioned) (23) to which he subscribes himself J. Locke, Artium Magister ex æde Christi. This subscription shews the verses were written some years before their appearance here in 1676, when he had been two years Medicinæ Baccalaureus. We have many instances which shew, that in his method of practice our author formed himself intirely upon Dr Sydenham. In a letter to Mr Molyneux, having commended Sir R. Blackmore's Preface to K. Arthur, for the expressions against hypotheses, and taken notice how much the illiterate Americans in curing diseases surpassed our learned physicians that went thither; he proceeds thus: 'You cannot imagine how far a little observation, carefully made by a man not devoted to the four humours, or sal sulphur and mercury, or to acid and alkali, which has of late prevailed, will carry a man in the curing of diseases, though very stubborn and dangerous, and that with very little and common things, and almost no medicaments at all; of this I could, from my own experience, convince you, were we together but a little while.' We have also a Letter of his to Dr Molyneux, where he gives his sentiments about the use which may be made of hypotheses in physick in the following terms. — 'Upon such grounds as are the established history of diseases, hypotheses might with less danger be erected, which I think are so far useful, as they serve, as an art of memory, to direct the physician in particular cases, but not to be relied on as foundations of reasoning, or verities to be contended for; they being, I think I may say, all of them suppositions taken up gratis, and will so remain 'till we can discover how the natural functions of the body are performed, and by what alteration in the humours, or defects in the parts they are hindered or disordered. To which purpose I fear the Galenists four humours, or the chymists sal sulphur and mercury, or the late prevailing invention of acid and alkali, or whatever hereafter shall be substituted to them with new applause, will, upon examination, be found to be but so many learned empty sounds, with no precise determinate signification. What we know of the works of nature, especially in the constitution of health, and the operations of our own bodies, is only by the sensible effects, not by any certainty we can have of the tools the uses, or the ways the works by. So that there is nothing left for a physician to do, but to observe well, and so by analogy to argue to like cases, and thence make to himself rules of practice: and he that is this way most sagacious, will, I imagine, make the best physician, though he should entertain distinct hypotheses concerning distinct species of diseases subservient to this end, that were inconsistent one with another, they being made use of in those several sorts of diseases but as distinct arts of memory in those cases. And I the rather say this, that they might be relied fumption. This step was not taken without the approbation and advice of his patron, to whom he had, just before his departure, been particularly serviceable in drawing up an extraordinary pamphlet, intitled, A Letter from a Person of Quality to his Friend in the Country, &c [I]. At Montpelier, our author fell into the acquaintance of Mr Thomas Herbert, afterwards Earl of Pembroke, to whom he communicated his design of writing his Essay on Human Understanding (u), which now chiefly employed his thoughts. From Montpelier he went to Paris, where he contracted a friendship with Mr Justel (w), at whose house he saw Mr Guenelon, a celebrated Physician of Amsterdam, who held anatomical conferences there with great reputation. It was now also, that the familiarity commenced betwixt him and Mr Toignard, by whom he was favoured with a copy of his Harmony of the Gospels, when there were no more than five or six of them completé (*). From Paris, also, he wrote a letter to a friend at London in 1677, intimating, that the Physick Lecture at Gresham-college would be acceptable to him [K]. Upon the discovery of the Popish plot, the Earl of Shaftesbury was again taken into favour at Court, and made President of a new Council (y), erected by his Majesty in 1679. This new turn occasioned him to send for Mr Locke; but his Lordship happening to be laid aside again in less than half a year (z), had no opportunity of serving him in that post. Notwithstanding this, our author continued unalterably attached to his patron in all the traverses of his fortune; and, in 1682, when that nobleman escaped a prosecution for high-treason, by flying into Holland (aa), Mr Locke followed him thither [L]: neither upon the death of on only as artificial helps to a physician, and not as philosophical truths to a naturalist (24).

[I] A letter from a person of quality, &c. The whole title runs thus, A letter from a person of quality to his friend in the country, giving an account of the debates and resolutions in the House of Lords, in April and May 1675, concerning a Bill, intituled, An Act to prevent the dangers which may arise from persons disaffected to the Government. Our author, we are informed (25), drew up this letter at the desire of the Earl of Shaftesbury, and under his Lordship's inspection, only committing to writing what the Earl did in a manner dictate to him; and this indeed is evident, with regard to that part which contains remarks upon the characters and conduct of several of the nobility, since these could be known only to his Lordship. But as this reason extends not to other parts of the same letter, so neither is any doubt suggested by our author's apologist, that he did not heartily concur in the gibes, as Mr Wood calls them (26), which are unsparingly thrown therein upon the spiritual Lords; we shall mention one of these in the bill which goes by the name of the Test Act. The Ministry proposed to make an addition to the corporation-oath in these words, I will not at any time endeavour to make any alteration of the government either in church or state. The author of the Letter, speaking of this addition, the devising whereof he charges principally upon the Bishops, declares in general of the clergy of all religions, that they have trucked away the rights and liberties of the people, in this and all other countries wherever they have had opportunity, that they might be owned by the Prince to be jure divino, and maintained in their pretensions by the absolute power and force they have contributed so much to put into his hands: and that Priest and Prince may, like Castor and Pollux, be worshipp'd together as divine in the same temple by us poor lay-subjects, they actually assert that monarchy is jure divino. For a proof of the truth of this remark, the editor, in a note upon it, cites a passage from Bishop Usher's Power of the Prince, and several others also from Bishop Sanderfon's Preface to that Treatise, which seem indeed to be very agreeable to the mind of the Letter-writer, and therefore in that view not improperly introduced; and that is declared by the annotator to be his sole intention, leaving the justice of his author's censure to shift for itself, that so he might not be drawn into the controversy. Mr Wood we see calls it a gibing upon the spiritual Lords; and so far is certain, that almost all the tribe of writers who have affected to give us a cast of their wit upon Orthodoxy, have acknowledged this Letter-writer for their master, in copying not only his matter but his manner (27) and expression, not even disdainful to borrow his very words. As to the two divines quoted by Mr Des Malzeaux, not to insist in their behalf on the seasonableness and prudence of pressing the doctrine of non-resistance absolutely, at the times when the forementioned treatise was wrote by one, and published by the other; the first being apparently moved by the sad prospect of misery with which the nation was threatened, from the opposite extreme at the breaking out of the rebellion; and the second still more moved with the actual feeling of that misery from which the nation was then scarcely well recovered. To pass by, I say, these and such like topics, which candour prompts in their defence, it is observable, that if we hearken to the author of the letter in question, we shall be obliged to confess, that nothing but these could be the true motive both of writing and publishing that book *, since it follows from his own argument, compared with other parts of their writings, that they knew as well as he, that their monarch was no such divinity as he charges them with asserting. Thus far our Letter-writer we see declares, that Episcopacy was founded by the clergy upon the jure divino equally with monarchy: but it is well known, that both these Bishops expressly maintained, that Episcopacy, as established in the Church of England, was not jure divino (28); whence it necessarily follows, from this way of reasoning, that monarchy also, as established in the State of England, was equally maintained by them not to be jure divino. 'Tis not the design of this remark to take any side in a dispute which has now been long worn out, much less to defend the doctrine of absolute non-resistance from those absurdities which inseparably attend it in all ages. But our business is to represent every fact that comes in the course of these memoirs impartially as we find it, after the best inquiry which we are able to make, and in the present instance, if the fact is found to turn out in favour of the two mentioned Bishops, that disdain which appears in relating it, may be thought not improper in the view of testifying a real hearty concern for the cause of truth in general, on what side soever it stands.

[K] A desire to obtain the physick lecture at Gresham. This intimation was sent by him in a letter dated from Paris, June 22, 1677, to Dr Mapletost abovementioned, then physick professor at Gresham, where he expressed himself as follows. 'If either absence (which sometimes increases our desires) or love (which we see every day produces strange effects in the world) have softened you, or disposed you towards a liking of any of our fine new things, 'tis but saying so, and I am ready to furnish you, and should be sorry not to be employed. I mention love, for you know I have a particular interest of my own in it. When you look that way, nobody will be readier, as you may guess, to throw an old shoe after you, much for your own sake, and a little for a friend's of your's. But were I to advise, perhaps I should say to you, that the lodgings at Gresham were a quiet and comfortable habitation (29).'

[L] Mr Locke followed him thither. Mr Wood having intimated that our author (as well as his patron) found it convenient to make his escape, tells us, that when he left Oxford, he conveyed away with him several letters and writings without being searched (30): Mr Le Clerc also informs us, that Mr Locke gave his assistance in some pieces published by the Earl of Shaftesbury after his disgrace, and after the Earl's flight, did not think himself safe in England (31); and we shall see in the next remark his conduct had for some time before been strictly watched by Dean Fell.

of his patron, which happened soon after (bb), did he think proper to return home, where he knew his conduct had created him some powerful enemies (cc). And he had not been a year in Holland, when he was accused at the English Court of having written certain tracts against the Government; and though another person was afterwards discovered to be the author (dd), yet being observed to join in company with several English malecontents at the Hague (ee), this conduct was communicated by our Resident there to the Earl of Sunderland, then Secretary of State; who acquainting the King therewith, his Majesty ordered the proper methods to be taken for expelling him from the college, and application to be made for that purpose to. Bishop Fell the Dean; In obedience to this command the necessary information was given by his Lordship, who at the same time wrote to our author, to appear and answer for himself, on the first of January ensuing; but, immediately receiving an express command to turn him out, was obliged to comply therewith, and accordingly Mr Locke was removed from his student's place on the sixteenth of November 1684 (ff) [M]. Upon the accession of King James the Second to the throne, Sir William Pen, the famous Quaker, procured the promise of a pardon for our author, whom he had known at Christ-Church; but his fellow-collegian declined the acceptance of that offer, alledging, that he had no occasion for a pardon, not being guilty of any crime (gg). In May 1685, the English Envoy at the Hague demanded him to be delivered up by the States-General, upon suspicion of having been concerned in the Duke of Monmouth's invasion [N]. This obliged him to lie concealed near twelve months,

* They have been lately printed in a periodical paper called The Student, &c. collected into two volumes, 8vo. Vol. I. p. 202, & seq. edit. 1750.

[M] Mr Locke was removed, &c. As this affair has been differently represented, even by authors of repute, we shall lay before the reader the fact, as it appears from the several letters * wrote on the occasion. The first, from Sunderland to the Bishop, runs thus :

Whitehall, November 6, 1684.

'The King having been given to understand, that one Locke, who belonged to the late Earl of Shaftesbury, and has, upon several occasions, behaved himself very factiously against the Government, is a student of Christ-Church; His Majesty commands me to signify to your Lordship, that he would have him removed from being a student; and that, in order thereunto, your Lordship would let him know the method of doing it, &c.'

To this the Bishop answered in these terms November 8. 'Mr Locke being a great friend of the late Earl of Shaftesbury, and being suspected not to be well affected to the government, I have had my eye over him for several years; but he has always been so much upon his guard, that after several strict enquiries I can confidently assure you, there is no person in our college, how familiar soever he has been with him, that has heard him say any thing against the government, or that any ways concerns it. And though we have often designedly given him occasion in publick and private discourse to talk of the Earl of Shaftesbury, by speaking ill of him, his party, and designs; yet we could never see, either by his words or looks, that he thought himself at all concerned in the matter: so that we believe there is not a man in the world so much master of his tongue and passions as he is †. He has a Physick place here, which frees him from the exercise of the college, and the obligation which others have to residence in it; and he is now abroad for want of health. But, notwithstanding this, I have summoned him to return home, which is done with this prospect, that, if he comes not back, he will be liable to expulsion for contumacy; and, if he does, he will be answerable to the law for that which he shall be found to have done amiss. It being probable, that, though he may have been thus cautious here, where he knew himself suspected, he has laid himself more open at London, where a general liberty of speaking was used, and where the execrable designs against his Majesty and his government were managed and pursued. If he don't return by the first of January, which is the time limited to him, I shall be enabled of course to proceed against him to expulsion. But, if this method seems not effectual or speedy enough, and his Majesty, our founder and visitor, shall please to command his immediate remove, upon the receipt thereof, directed to the Dean and Chapter, it shall accordingly be executed by your Lordship's &c.'

To this the following was received, dated November 12, enclosed in a letter from the Secretary, and addressed to the Dean and Chapter.

'Whereas, we have received information of the factious and disloyal behaviour of Locke, one of the 'students of that our college, we have thought fit hereby to signify our will and pleasure to you, that you forthwith remove him from his student's place; and deprive him of all rights and advantages thereunto belonging; for which this shall be your warrant. And so we bid you heartily farewell.

'Given at our Court of Whitehall, the 11th of November, 1684.

'By His Majesty's command,
'SUNDERLAND.'

The Bishop answered thus November 16.

'Right Honourable,
'I hold myself bound to signify to your Lordship, that his Majesty's command for the expulsion of Mr Locke from this college is fully executed.'

Upon these letters, Le Clerc observes, that the Bishop, in what he wrote, without doubt designed to serve Mr Locke, for whom he had always a respect and kindness, as appears from his immediately, on the receipt of the first letter, sending for Mr Tyrrell, who was Mr Locke's friend, to speak with him about it. On the other hand, a late writer cites the letters, as an evident proof, that the Bishop was capable of some excesses in some cases, where the interest of party could bias him. The letters, as here seen, need no comment to clear his conduct from both these misrepresentations, and sufficiently shew the mistake of Le Clerc on one hand, who, willing to have the virtuous and learned Dean, as he styles him, for his friend's patron, tells us, he was convinced of Mr Locke's innocence; and the no less mistake, on the other hand, of Dr Birch, who calls this, his [the Dean's], expulsion of Mr Locke (32).

[N] Suspected of being concerned in the Duke of Monmouth's invasion. The Duke was in Holland in the spring of this year 1685, with several English gentlemen of his party, and was preparing for the invasion which proved fatal to him. This coming to the ears of K. James II. he ordered his Envoy at the Hague to demand that 84 persons by name should be delivered up; among these was Mr Locke, under the title of Secretary to the Earl of Shaftesbury. He was named last of all, and it was said then that his name was not in the list sent from England, but that the English Consul there procured it to be inserted. This hearsay story of a fact, not very probable in itself, must be left to the reader's judgment; what Le Clerc tells us afterwards, carries more a face of truth, we may be assured, continues he, that Mr Locke had no correspondence with the Duke of Monmouth, of whom he had no great opinion; besides, he was far from being fond of commotions, and was rather timorous than remarkable for his resolution (33). This character of our author's cowardly nature being given apparently from Le Clerc's own observation, who was well acquainted with him for several years from this time, may help us to another motive, besides what is mentioned months, 'till it became sufficiently known that he had no hand in that enterprize. During this privacy, which, by the assistance of some friends, was rendered very secure from any danger of a discovery [O], he composed his first letter upon Toleration [P]; but he spent his time chiefly in finishing his Essay upon Human Understanding, and sometimes amused himself mentioned in the last remark, of the exact caution observed by him at Christ-Church in regard to the Earl of Shaftesbury.

[O] Being secured by his friends from danger ] At the end of the year 1684, Mr Locke had been at Utrecht, and returned in the spring of 1685 to Amsterdam, with a design to go again to Utrecht, as he actually did, to avoid being charged with having any hand in the Duke of Monmouth's enterprize. Before he left Amsterdam, he had some inclination to lodge with Mr Guenelon above-mentioned, who excused himself because it was not the custom of that city to admit strangers to lodge, tho' he received Mr Locke's visits with great civility: but as soon as Mr Guenelon saw that he was in danger, he served him with great generosity, and engaged Mr Veen, his father-in-law, to receive Mr Locke into his house: this done, he wrote to Mr Locke at Utrecht, and Mr Limborch did the same on the part of Mr Veen. Upon this Mr Locke went to Amsterdam, where he lay concealed at Mr Veen's house two or three months. In the mean time Mr Limborch took care to deliver him the letters which were written to him, and had the custody of his will, Mr Locke desiring him in case of death to deliver it to some relations whom he named. For his further satisfaction, one of the principal magistrates of the city was consulted whether he might continue there in safety; to which the magistrate answered, that tho' indeed, in case he should be demanded by the King of England, they could not protect him; yet that he should not be betrayed, and that his landlord should have timely notice if there was occasion. This gave him some kind of confidence, and he continued with Mr Veen 'till September, without going abroad, except at night, for fear of being known. About this time, by the persuasion of some friend, he went to Cleves, but returned about the beginning of November, and lodged again at Mr Veen's. At the end of the year he went to live with Mr Guenelon, where he continued likewise the year following, viz. 1686, in which he began to appear again in publick. In autumn he went to Utrecht, and at the end of the year returned to Amsterdam, lodging at Mr Guenelon's as before. In 1687, he went to Rotterdam, where he lodged at Mr Farley's (34), and passed his time in one or other of these two cities 'till he returned home.

[P] His first letter upon Toleration. ] Mr Le Clerc informs us, that letter was wrote while our author lodged with Mr Veen in 1685, tho' not published 'till 1689, when being wrote in Latin, it was printed at Tergou in 12mo, with the following title, Epistola ad clarissimum virum, T. A. R. P. T. O. L. A. i. e. Theologum apud Remonstrantes Professorem Tyrannidis osorem Limburgum Amsteladonensem scripta a P. A. P. O. I. L. A. sc. Pacis amico Persecutionis osore Johanne Lockio, Argo. It was translated into Dutch and English, the latter of which being printed twice in London in 1690, was attacked the same year by Mr Jonas Proast, Chaplain of All-Souls-College, Oxford, in a piece, intitled, The argument of the letter concerning Toleration briefly considered and answered. Oxford, 1690, 4to. Upon this Mr Locke published a second letter concerning Toleration the same year. Lond. in 4to. dated May 27. And Mr Proast replying in A third letter concerning Toleration; in a defence of the argument of the letter concerning Toleration briefly considered and answered. Oxford 1691, 4to. He rejoined in a third letter for Toleration in 1692, containing 350 pages in 4to. This letter is dated June the 29th. In it he declares his opinion concerning the miracles of the primitive Church as follows: 'And so I leave you, says he to his antagonist, to dispute the credit of ecclesiastical writers as you shall think fit, and by your authority to establish and invalidate theirs as you please. But this I think is evident, that he who will build his faith or reasonings upon miracles delivered by church historians, will find cause to go no farther than the Apostles times, or else not to stop at Constantine's; since the writers after that period, whose word we take as unquestionable in other things, speak of miracles in their time with no less assurance than the fathers before the fourth century; and a great part of the miracles of the second and third centuries stand upon the credit of the writers of the fourth: So that that sort of argument, which takes and rejects the testimony of the Ancients at pleasure as it may best suit with it, will not have much force with those who are not disposed to embrace the hypothesis without any arguments at all.' We find this passage inserted in the Preface to An inquiry into the miraculous powers, &c. printed in 1648, 4to. by Dr Conyers Middleton, who there gives the following eulogium of our author. 'It was an unexpected satisfaction to me, says the Doctor, to be informed lately by a friend, that Mr Locke had many years ago declared the same opinion with mine concerning the miracles of the primitive Church, which I shall offer the reader in his own words, being persuaded that the authority of so eminent a writer, and so singularly qualified by his talents and studies to discern the exact relations and consequences of things, will add great weight and confirmation to the cause which I am here defending.' But perhaps this ingenious divine was not aware upon what sort of inquiry Mr Locke had grounded his opinion; his authority therein will hardly be thought to have much weight in a point wherein he declared his ignorance a few months before to his friend Mr Limborch; In the postscript of a letter, dated Feb. 29, 1692 (35) to that gentleman, he writes thus, 'De miraculis post Apostolorum tempora certiore fieri cupio, non ego satis sum versatus in ecclesiastica historia, ut quid de iis statuam norim. Rogo igitur obnixè, nam mea interest scire, an post Apostolorum tempora edita fuerint in Ecclesia Christiana miracula, quibus autoribus & qua fide memorie tradita, quam frequentia, & an ad Constantinum imperium, vel diutius duraverint, & quis fuit ille Thaumaturgus, & quid ab eo actum est, cujus tam speciosa appellatio ad nos pervenit. Non quero miraculorum quæ in scriptoribus ecclesiasticis memorantur catalogum, sed an constat ex fide dignis historicis fuisse vera miracula, an raro vel sæpius edita, & quamdiu donum illud Ecclesie concessum.' It appears by this postscript, that our author was then meditating about his third letter above-mentioned to Mr Proast, and it is highly probable that he took his opinion there declared concerning the miracles of the primitive Church, not so much from his own discernment of the exact relations of things, as from the authority of Mr Limborch: Mr Proast, after twelve years silence, returned an answer to this third letter of Mr Locke, who, tho' then in a very declining state of health, determined to reply in a fourth letter concerning Toleration, but he died the same year before it was finished (36). Le Clerc had once designed to translate the second and third letters into French, but forbore it, being, as he says, of opinion, that the first which he had before translated into that language, was sufficient to inform us of Mr Locke's sentiments. This is so very true, that 'tis in the first alone that his real sentiments are to be found, and not at all in the two subsequent ones, as is suggested by Mr Warburton, who speaking in defence of assuming a personal character on proper occasions, observes, that 'when the dispute is about the practical obligation of some truth to the good of a particular society, there it is fair to take up a suitable character, and argue ad hominem, for there the end is a benefit to be gained for that society; and it is not of so great moment what principles the multitude is prevailed with to make the society happy, as it is that it should speedily become so. — A famous example, continues he, will illustrate this observation. Our great British philosopher, writing for religious liberty, combats his intolerant adversary quite through the controversy with his own principles, well foreseeing, that at such a time of prejudice arguments built on received opinions would have greatest weight, and make quickest impression on the body of the people, whom it was his business to gain.' Whether Mr Locke was indeed blest with such a foresight in this case as is here ascribed to him we need not determine; but his apologist however does him the justice to acknowledge, that he observed a contrary, plain, and direct conduct in managing his dispute with Dr Stillingfleet.

himself with making extracts of books to be inserted in the Bibliothèque Universelle (b b). Towards the latter end of the year 1686, he appeared again in public, and, in the following year, he formed a weekly assembly at Amsterdam, with Messieurs Limborch and Le Clerc (i i) [Q.], who were joined by some others, in the view of holding conferences upon subjects of learning; and, about the end of that year, he finished the forementioned Essay [R], after having spent more than nine years upon it. At the same time, he also made

[Q] He settled a philosophical society with Limborch and Le Clerc. These two divines were among our author's first friends in Holland, and he held a correspondence with both of them 'till the day of his death; not long after which there came out several letters that had passed between him and the former, whereby it appears, that Mr Limborch was very serviceable to our author, as well with respect to some improvements in his Essay on human Understanding,* as to his Reasonableness of Christianity; and, on the other hand, these favours were repaid by Mr Locke in procuring him Archbishop Tillotson's assistance in his History of the Inquisition, which was afterwards dedicated by that author to his Grace. As to Mr Le Clerc, the dedication of his Ontologia to our author, shews the profound esteem he had for him; and soon after came out the causes of incredulity. This piece, the principles of which were intirely to our author's mind, falling into the hands of Mr Molyneux, that gentleman, always studious to oblige Mr Locke, proposed to procure something for Le Clerc in Ireland. The proposal being exceedingly approved and encouraged by our author, who particularly mentioned a prebend as furnishing ease, and a sure retreat to write on, which he thought might be of great use to the christian world, such a preferment was in a fair way of being obtained for him by Mr Molyneux; but this whole affair was blasted, as it seems, by Le Clerc's declining to submit to a new ordination, as also to comply with the subscriptions required in our Church (37).

[R] His Essay on human Understanding, &c. It is a little remarkable, that Sir Isaac Newton's Principia was finished about the same time with Mr Locke's Essay; both the works introduced a new and the only true way of philosophizing grounded upon experience and observation, and both effectually overthrowing the philosophy of Des Cartes, one with regard to the great system of the world, and the other in the system of man. As to the former, see his article; with regard to Mr Locke, the doctrine of no innate ideas, upon which he declares his Essay is founded, together with this, that the soul does not always think, are both directly against Des Cartes's principles. This celebrated work made its way by degrees into the publick. First of all, Mr Le Clerc translated the abridgment into French, and inserted it in the 8th vol. of the Bibliothèque Universelle for January 1688. He also ordered some copies to be printed off separately, to which Mr Locke prefixed a short dedication to the Earl of Pembroke. This abridgment pleased a great number of persons, and raised a general desire of seeing the work itself. Accordingly our author put that to the press soon after his arrival in England, and it came out at the time mentioned in the text. As the natural history of the human understanding was handled in a manner intirely new, wherein nothing was advanced but upon observation and experience, and the whole thrown into a method quite different from that of the Schools, and recommended by an easy and handsome stile, it presently gained many admirers. Among the rest, Mr William Molyneux of Ireland was particularly delighted with it to such a degree, that publishing his Dioptrics in 1692, he took occasion, in the dedication of that piece, to pass an extraordinary compliment upon Mr Locke, and at the same time made him a present of his book (38); this gave rise to a correspondence between them, where we have an account of the several improvements that were made by our author in those subsequent editions of his Essay, which were published before the death of Mr Molyneux, the second in 1694, and the third in 1695. After this, Mr Locke gave a 4th edition in 1700, which was translated into French with great accuracy, under his inspection, by Mr Peter Coste, who then lived in the same house with him. Diverse passages in the original were also corrected, in order to make them clear and easy to be translated. The version was likewise revised by Mr Locke, and published under this title, Essai philosophique concernant l'entend-

ment humain, ou l'on montre quell' est etendue de nos connoissances certaines, & la maniere dont nous y parvenons. Amstelod. 1700, 4to. This 4th edition of the Essay was also translated into Latin by Mr Burridge (39), and printed in 1701. An abridgment from the second edition of this work was published in 1695, by Mr Wynn, fellow of Jesus-College in Oxford, and afterwards Bishop of St Asaph. This abridgment was made, as near as possible, in our author's own words, and had his approbation; which probably was the occasion of it's being also translated into French, with the title of Abregé de l'Essai de M. Locke sur l'entendement humain traduit de l'Angloise, par M. Bossuet. Lond. 1720, 8vo. In 1702 was published, A defence of Mr Locke's Essay, wherein it's principles, with reverence to morality, revealed religion, and the immortality of the soul, are considered and justified: in answer to some remarks on that Essay, dedicated to Mr Locke; in the preface, the author declares, that he knew no philosopher, before Mr Locke, that had fixed morality upon so solid a foundation, as he gives many hints in that Essay, whenever the subject will permit. However, among the crowd of admirers which the Essay met with, there were found some persons who could not digest several new notions started in it. On this account it was first attacked by Mr John Norris at the end of his Christian blefsedness, or discourses upon the beatitudes, 1690. 2dly, by Mr Leibnitz, in a letter communicated to our author. These antagonists only combated some particular parts of the Essay, but afterwards there came out a piece with the following title, Anti-Scepticism, or Notes upon each chapter of Mr Locke's Essay concerning human understanding, with an explication of all the particulars of which he treats, and in the same order, in 4 books, by Henry Lee, B. D. formerly fellow of Emanuel-College, Cambridge, now rector of Timarsh in Northamptonshire, Lond. 1702, in fol. It was also animadverted on by Mr Lowde, in A Discourse concerning the nature of man, and in his moral Essays; by Mr Norris again in his Theory of the intelligible world, part 2d; by Mr Serjeant, author of Sure-footing; by Mr Broughton, in his Treatise on the nature of the soul; and last of all, by Dr William Sherlock, Master of the Temple, in a Digression concerning connate ideas, in the third session of the second chapter of his Discourse concerning the happiness of good men, and punishment of the wicked in the next world, 1704, 8vo. Of all these which arose in our author's life-time, he took no publick notice, and in the mean time did not spare to make himself merry at their expence among his intimates. As the turn of his wit and rally on these occasions makes a part of the character of his genius, we shall insert the following specimen. Mr Collins having sent him some extracts from Dr Sherlock's book, he returned this answer, 'The favours you have given me, I must acknowledge, from the abilities of the author, to be very excellent. But what shall I be the better for the most exact and best proportioned picture that ever was drawn, if I have not eyes to see the correspondence of the parts. I confess the lines are too subtle for me, and my faculties cannot perceive their connection. I am not envious, and therefore shall not be troubled, if others shall find themselves instructed in so extraordinary and sublime a way of reasoning. I am content with my own mediocrity: and, though I call the thinking faculty in me mind, yet I cannot, because of that name, call in any thing of that infinite and incomprehensible being, which, for want of right and distinct conceptions, is called God, also on the eternal mind. I endeavour to make the best use I can of every thing, and therefore, though I am in despair to be the wiser for this learned instructor, yet I hope I shall be the merrier for them, when I take the air in the calash together (40).' We may, perhaps, too, form some idea of the particular turn of Mr Locke's mirth in that airing, from what had happened some time before. Dr Sherlock, it seems, had, in the year 1696, expressed

It had been translated into this language before Mr Locke left Holland, by one of that country; but that translation being disapproved by our author, was suppressed. Ibid. p. 100. Mr Locke was very solicitous to have it well translated into this language.

(b b) Among others he made an extract of Mr Boyle's treatise on specific medicines; and, in 1686, he inserted into the second tome of the Bibliothèque, his new method

* Particularly on the subject of Liberty, which he explains very accurately in the same manner with Dr S. Clarke. Mr Locke solved it in the way of Dr Henry More, but very confusedly; and it has often been observed, that the chapter of Power in this view is the worst part of his Essay.

(38) The substance of it is, that Mr Locke had herein rectified several received mistakes, and delivered several profound truths, and had overthrown all those metaphysical whimsies, whereby men feigned a knowledge where they had none, by making a noise with words without clear and distinct significations. (43) Author of the Rights of the Christian Church, &c.

Our author had a share in the education of this nobleman, who was grandson to his patron.

expressed his sentiments of the dangerous tendency of our author's doctrine against the innate idea of God, in such a way as had provoked his talent; for giving which, he indulged them to his friend Mr Molyneux in the following terms. 'However, you are pleased, out of kindness to me, to rejoice in your's of September the 26th, that my notions have had the good luck to be vented from the pulpit, and particularly by Mr Bentley (41); yet that matter goes not so clear as you imagine. For a man of no small name, as you know Dr S—— is, has been pleased to declare against my doctrine of no innate ideas from the pulpit in the Temple, and, as I have been told, charged it with little less than atheism. Though the doctor be a great man, yet that would not much frighten me, because I am told, that he is not always obstinate against opinions, which he has condemned more publicly than in an harangue to a Sunday's auditory. But that it is possible he may be firm here, because it is also said, he never quits his aversion to any tenet he has once declared against, till change of times brings change of interest, and fashionable opinions open his eyes and his heart, and then he kindly embraces what before deserved his aversion and censure.' In return to this, Mr Molyneux, the whole series of whose letters furnishes an undeniable proof of his excellent talent at well-judged flattery, where he saw it was always kindly taken, thus echoes back his friend's bitter sarcasm with redoubled virulency. 'Both Whiston and Bentley are positive against the idea of God being innate, and I had rather rely on them (if I would rely on any man) than on Dr S——. 'Tis true, the latter has a great name; but that I am sure weighs not with you or me. Besides, you rightly observe, the doctor is no obstinate heretick, but may veer about when another opinion comes in fashion; for some men alter their notions, as they do their cloaths, in compliance to the mode. I have heard of a Master of the Temple, who, during the siege of Limerick, writ over hither to a certain prelate, to be sure to let him know, by the first opportunity, whenever it came to be surrendered: which was done accordingly; and immediately the good doctor's eyes were opened, and he plainly saw the oaths to King William and Queen Mary were not only expedient but lawful, and our duty. A good roaring train of artillery is not only the ratio ultima regum, but of other men besides (42). 'Tis certainly of great advantage to a Polemical writer, to be endued with a competent share of Socratism. We see our author was not defective in this ingredient of happiness, and no doubt he died in perfect good humour with himself, as to the design and usefulness of his Essay. But it may be doubted, whether this serenity might not have been ruffled, had he lived to see that monument of his fame attacked with much keener weapons, and by a person of much nearer concern to him than was the Dean of St Paul's. I believe the reader is before-hand with me in pointing out the man, and fixing upon the Earl of Shaftesbury. That noble author, in some directions which he gave to a young student at Oxford, designed for the Church, having observed that Dr Tindal's (43) principles, whatever they may be as to Church government, are, in respect of Philosophy and Theology, far wide from those of the author of the rhapsody, proceeds thus. 'In general, truly, it has happened, that all those they call free-writers now a-days have espoused those principles, which Mr Hobbes set on foot in the last age. Mr Locke, as much as I honour him on account of his other writings, viz. on Government, Policy, Trade, Coin, Education, Toleration, &c. and, as well as I knew him*, and can answer for his sincerity as a most zealous Christian believer, did, however, go in the self-same track, and is followed by the Tindals, and all the other ingenious free authors of our time. It was Mr Locke that struck the home blow; for Mr Hobbes's character, and base slavish principles in government, took off the point of his Philosophy. It was Mr Locke that struck at all fundamentals, threw all order out of the world, and made the very ideas of these, which are the very fame as those of God, unnatural and without foundation in our minds. Innate is a word he poorly plays upon. The right word, tho' less used, is connatural. For what has birth, or progress of the fetus out of the womb, to do in this case? The question is not about the time the ideas entered, or the moment that one body came out of the other, but whether the constitution of men be such, that, being adult and grown up, at such and such a time, sooner or later, no matter when, the idea and sense of order, administration, and a God, will not infallibly, unavoidably, necessarily, spring up in them. Then comes the credulous Mr Locke, with his Indian Barbarian stories, of wild nations that have no such idea, as travellers, learned authors, and men of truth, and great Philosophers, have informed him: not considering, that this is but a negative upon a hear-say, and so circumstantiated, that the faith of the Indian denier may be as well questioned, as the veracity or judgment of the relater, who cannot be supposed to know sufficiently the mysteries and secrets of these Barbarians, whose language they but imperfectly know, and to whom we good Christians have, by our little mercy, given sufficient reason to conceal from us, as we know particularly in respect of simples and vegetables; of which, tho' we got the Peruvian bark, and some other noble remedies, yet it is certain, that, through the cruelty of the Spaniards, as they have owned themselves, many secrets in medicinal affairs have been suppressed. But Mr Locke, who had more faith, and was more learned in modern wonder-writers than ancient Philosophy, gave up an argument for the deity, which Cicero, though a professed sceptic, would not explode, and which even the chief of the atheistic Philosophers anciently acknowledged, and solved only by their primus in orbe Deos fecit timor. Thus virtue, according to Mr Locke, has no other measure, law, or rule, than fashion and custom; morality, justice, equity, depend only on law and will; and God, indeed, is a perfect free agent in his sense, that is, free to any thing that is however ill; for, if he wills it, it will be made good, virtue may be vice and vice virtue in it's turn, if he pleases; and thus, neither virtue nor vice, right nor wrong, are any thing in themselves; nor is there any trace or idea of them naturally imprinted on human minds. Experience and our catechism teach us all. I suppose, 'tis something of like kind which teaches birds their nests, and how to fly the minute they have full feathers. Your THEOCLES, whom you commend so much, laughs at this; and, as modestly as he can, asks a Lockekist, whether the idea of woman (and what is sought after in woman) be not taught also by some catechism, and dictated to the man. Perhaps, if we had no schools of Venus, nor such horrid lewd books or lewd companions, we might have no understanding of this, 'till we were taught by our parents; and if the tradition should happen to be lost, the race of mankind might perish in a sober nation. —This is very poor Philosophy; but the gibberish of the schools for these several centuries has, in these later days of liberty, made any contrary Philosophy of good relish, and highly favourable with all men of wit, such as have been emancipated from that egregious form of intellectual bondage (44). Thus did this spirited author let fly some of his most pointed rallery against our opposer of innate ideas; nor was this the only time that he entertained himself with making Mr Locke's Essay the subject of his ridicule. 'Tis true, our author had then been many years in his grave; but his fame was still alive and flourishing, and his memory found a champion, who, many years also after his Lordship was in that place of profound silence, having observed that Mr Locke had some share in his education, was not afraid to rebuke him under the character of Mr Locke's pupil, in the following very gross terms. 'The spite he bore his master is inconceivable. He did not disdain to take up with those vulgar calumnies that Mr Locke had again and again confuted. Some even (see his Charact. Vol. I. p. 80. edit. 3d) of our most admired Philosophers had, fairly told us, that virtue and vice had, after all, no other law or measure than meer fashion and vogue. The case is this: when Mr Locke reasons against innate ideas, he brings it as an argument against the fleet which convoyed the Princess of Orange to her consort. Not long after his arrival, he put in a claim to his student's place at Christ-Church, but that society rejected his pretensions, as the proceedings in his deprivation were conformable to their statutes [S].

them, that virtue and vice in many places were not regulated by the nature of things, which they must have been, were there such innate ideas, but by meer fashion and vogue. Is this, then, fairly told of our admired modern Philosopher? But it was crime enough, that he laboured to overthrow innate ideas, things that the noble author understood to be the foundation of his moral sense (see Charact. Vol. III. p. 214.). In vain did Mr Locke incessantly repeat, that the Divine Law is the only true touchstone of moral rectitude; this did but increase his pupil's resentment, who had all his faculties possessed with the moral sense, as the only true touchstone of moral rectitude, that, like the knights errant of old, he stood up challenger against all opposers for the superior charms of his idol. But the whole Essay itself, one of the noblest, the usefullest, the most original, books the world ever saw, cannot escape his ridicule. In reality, says he (Char. Vol. I. p. 299.), how specious a study, how solemn an amusement, is raised from what we call philosophical speculation! The formation of ideas, their compositions, comparisons, agreement, and disagreement! Why do I concern myself in speculations about my ideas? What is it to me, for instance, to know what kind of idea I can form of space, divide a solid body, &c. ? And so he goes on in Mr Locke's own words; and, lest the reader should not take the story, a note at the bottom of the page informs us, that these are the words of the particular author cited.—But the invidious remark in this quotation surpasses all credit.—Thus the Atomist or Epicurean. The Free-thinkers after this can never sure upbraid us with our flippancy, in giving the titles of Deist and Atheist to those we don't like, when the very hero of their cause is taken in the fact (45).

[S] His expulsion was conformable to their statutes.] We have already observed, that he was removed by virtue of a special order from the Crown, whose power, as being visitors of that college, is indisputable; but still it is insinuated, that this was done in a reign, when the Prerogative was avowedly carried too high; and that this act in particular was such a stretch of the Prerogative, as, indeed, it must needs have been, if (as is alledged) Mr Locke had done nothing justly to incur the forfeiture (46). But the case was apparently otherwise; for, first, he had given sufficient grounds for suspicion of being obnoxious to the government, by assisting his patron in some of his seditious libels; and, though no legal proof was made in form thereof, yet his flight (for such we have seen it was) did, by the rules of the law, imply guilt, and, according to the established practice, could not be refused for a proof sufficient of itself to authorize an expulsion. But to let that pass. The bare fact alone of going out of the kingdom without leave from the college, as it is allowed he did, was, in strictness, a forfeiture of his studentship, by the statutes of that as well as other colleges. However, Le Clerc tells us, that our author had no design to return to the college, but only to make it appear by his restoration, that he had been unjustly deprived. If, indeed, that injustice could have been made appear, the Crown, and the Queen especially, with whom he was so great a favourite, would, 'tis probable, have been inclined to restore him, as might justly have been done by the visitatorial power already mentioned. Neither does it seem at all likely, that Mr Locke would have desisted from his pretensions so easily as he did, upon the bare refusal of the college, if any redress could have been had from the Court. 'Tis said, indeed, that he was satisfied with the offer of being made a supernumerary student, intimating, as if he deemed that offer to be an acknowledgment of his innocence and the injustice of his expulsion. The pretence is plausible, and might have passed very well, if his subsequent conduct had not rendered the truth of it justly suspected. Mr Des Maizeaux (48) has given us an anecdote concerning our author, which implies a resentment so strong, that he did not spare upon occasion once to tell his Majesty King William plainly, that, if those bodies [the two universities] were not reformed, and other principles taught there than had been of late inculcated, they would either destroy him or some of his successors (48). We have already taken notice of Mr Locke's early imbibed and unalterably fixed aversion, to the method observed in the universities of training youth up in the road to knowledge by disputations, which he maintained to be productive of nothing so much as a habit of vain and impertinent trifling. On the other hand, these learned bodies were not convinced, by any thing he had newly advanced against it, that their old method was not established upon a just and thorough knowledge of human nature. It is needless to enumerate the many advantages of this discipline; they are obvious enough. In the mean time, the inconveniencies incident thereto were alike obvious, and equally seen and acknowledged. But this is the case in every human institution whatsoever. These inconveniencies, then, were no sufficient reason for abolishing the old method, 'till another should be devised more, or at least equally, useful, and less liable to be abused; but no such method had been given by Mr Locke. On the contrary, his Essay, which contains a part, and the most difficult part, of the natural history of Man, was deemed very unfit to be put into the hands of a boy just come from the grammar school: the abstruse enquiries into the nature of our souls, sensations, passions, and prejudices, and the springs of wrong judgment, could not, it was thought, be entered upon to any good purpose, without some previous disciplining of the mind, to prepare and give it sufficient strength to pursue such enquiries. Another and a still more important objection lay against this treatise: several new opinions were started therein of the last consequence to religion, which required a thorough examination, and that by a masterly understanding, before it could be prudent to deliver them as certain truths or certain falsehoods, in the principles of science; and the least mistake in the author's meaning, was presently seen to be productive of the most mischievous consequences (49). No doubt, it was some such considerations as these, which occasioned that meeting of the Heads of Houses at Oxford, where we are told, it was proposed to censure and discourage the reading of this Essay; and that after various debates it was concluded, that, without making any public censure, each Head of a House should endeavour to prevent it's being read in his college (50). This passed a little before Mr Locke's death; and since that, in the same judgment, not very many years ago, a small tract was drawn up by an eminent tutor in the same university (51), in vindication of the old discipline, and recommended to the youth by the Heads of Houses. The following extract from this piece, which is now rarely to be met with, will serve to explain and illustrate what we have advanced. This author having observed, that, from the first improvements in knowledge, some system or other of Logic had been framed, proceeds to remark, that they were all generally suited to the taste of the times, and appeared in a fashionable dress. And therefore, as in many former ages, scholastic learning was most in vogue, all the treatises on this subject were wrote in abstruse scholastic language.—As the taste of the present age is very different; our most celebrated performances in this way are of a quite different kind. The contempt of harsh language, and the dry systematical method of delivering rules, and the ridicule which has been so liberally bestowed upon the pedantry of the schools, have led men into the contrary extreme, of affecting to philosophize in a new language, more copious, polite, and elegant. But, as some of the scholastic Logicians endeavoured to make their logical systems the whole magazine of science, and thus disparaged the real usefulness of this art, by raising an expectation which they could never answer; so most of the Moderns seem to have been intent, rather to give a specimen of their own improvement in knowledge, than to assist a young learner. They launch out into various disquisitions upon abstruse subjects, and often draw the illustration of their rules from the depth of other sciences; and, by this means, while they seem to enrich the mind with new discoveries, and therefore entertain the fancy, they perplex the judgment; while they promise to give the understanding more activity and freedom, they really rob it of that bal-

However, he had an offer of being admitted a supernumerary student, which he did not think proper to accept. As he was looked upon to be a sufferer for the principles of the Revolution, he might easily have obtained a very considerable post; but he contented himself with that of Commissioner of Appeals, worth about 200 pounds a year, which was procured for him by the Lord Mordaunt, afterwards Earl of Monmouth, and then of Peterborough. About the same time he was offered to go abroad in a publick character; and it was left to his choice, whether he would be Envoy at the Court of the Emperor, that of the Elector of Brandenburg, or any other, where he thought the air most suitable to him; but he waved all these, on account of the infirm state of his health (k k), which disposed him gladly to embrace another offer, that was made him by Sir Francis Masham and his lady, of an apartment in their country-seat at Oates in Essex. This situation proved in all respects so agreeable to him [T], that he spent a great part of the remainder of last, by which in prudence it should be kept steady, and be prevented from being hasty and precipitate in its determinations. He concludes, therefore, that the perusal of these treatises will be better postponed, till a competent degree of knowledge from other sciences be acquired; then, indeed, they may direct a person how to digest and how to reflect with advantage upon what he knows already, and point out the particulars wherein he is deficient. In the mean time, they who can effectually resolve to bestow their attention upon what is fallen under the censure and ridicule of some parts of the present polite world, may find their account in making the first regulation of their understandings upon the old plan. Novelty would be far from being a recommendation to any performance of this kind: for, as good sense and truth will be always the same, the received principles of reasoning must be invariable. At the same time, therefore, that we admire the ingenuity and great learning of later Philosophers, let the exact method and accuracy of the scholastic systematical Logicians be intitled to our praise and imitation. What is hitherto said by our tutor, is not aimed directly against Mr Locke, whose good sense would not suffer him to incur the ridicule here marked; he knew very well, that Logic lay in a small compass, and was to be considered as a part of education, like Grammar; both having, in respect to wisdom and eloquence, the use and office of a foundation, which is not designed to appear above-ground, though necessary to give strength and support to the finest superstructures. Mr Locke is not then concerned directly in this remark, but indirectly, no doubt, it is meant to glance at his Essay, which the young academicians was frequently seen to take up from his first entrance, as the only fundamental book, treating the ordinary manuals of Logic with singular disdain and contempt. The modern treatises of Logic too, the express objects of this censure, were observed to owe their birth entirely to the Essay, being, indeed, little else than the substance of that, extracted and modelled something nearer the scholastic form. In the further prosecution of this argument, these remarks are immediately and fully pointed upon Mr Locke, especially upon the subject of disputations, the usefulness of which our tutor defends in the following terms. 'The scholastic doctrine of syllogisms is confessedly very ingenious. It is comprized within three or four technical lines, and therefore one would think, should be without much difficulty accommodated to the apprehension, and familiarized to the understanding. But, perhaps, nothing can do this so effectually, as a little exercise in scholastic disputations. Those that are strictly logical, are intended to habituate a young beginner, both to the use of logical terms, and an acquaintance with its rules; the principles of the debate, and the precise explication of the words to be made use of, being ready drawn out to his hand by logical writers, he will have no intricacy in his subject to fatigue his invention, and may therefore more easily attend to the form of argumentation, observe its accuracy, or correct it when deficient. Although, therefore, it be confessed, that, as in Grammar, so in Logic, a man ought to be a master in the art, before he presumes to decide concerning the nature or justice of its rules; yet in this view, the exercise in a young beginner will not be preposterous; nor will a little of his time and pains be mispent in logical disputation, though it bring with it no immediate increase of knowledge.—In general, disputation is very useful, as it habituates us to bring a question to the point, as it exercises and puts the spirits upon their activity, as it disciplines our notions, and makes them ready to appear upon summons: add to this, that the keeping our understanding upon the stretch, whether upon the offensive or defensive, has a natural tendency to strengthen its powers. Our thoughts will mechanically fall into that train to which they have been accustomed, without any exerted act of memory, and, perhaps, without our being able to quote the rule of our argumentation. Moreover, since disputation is not so much intended for the discovery of truth, as for trial and exercise, there can be no harm or shame, if as the opponent argues against a plain truth, to see whether the respondent can defend it; so the respondent be allowed to deny a plain truth if not uncapable of proof, to see whether the opponent can defend it.' He then proceeds to explain the use of scholastic terms and distinctions; which done, he vindicates this method from an objection that had been made, as we have already seen by Mr Locke. 'Since the decline of scholastic learning, continues he, though science of every kind has received prodigious improvements by the labour and sagacity of exalted geniuses, yet we find the common run of reasoners as bad as ever—not more knowing, but much more conceited; not so ambitious to improve their knowledge, as to conceal their ignorance—determining magisterially upon points, without knowing or considering the first principles of what they are discoursing—taking themselves to be masters of every subject upon which they can raise an objection, and adventuring to make their first essays in the face of the world, which a more modest set of men formerly thought hazardous enough within the circle of a publick school. So that to be trifling and positive are infirmities, not so much owing to the schools, as to the warmth and inexperience of youth. The human mind is a soil naturally productive of them in all ages, and is naturally weeded by experience and meditation.' Our author having supported and recommended his reflections all along, from specimens of the sentiments of Cicero and Quintilian, concludes with giving his reason for that choice, as follows:

'Their observations upon the nature and usefulness of Logic, are particularly adapted to the purposes of Oratory, and therefore entertain us more agreeably than what others have delivered upon the same subject, with a main view to abstruser points of Philosophy; but still the substance of it appears, beyond contradiction, to be the same, however varied it may be in its application. Let, then, the authority of those celebrated authors be allowed to over-rule a popular objection, that is too favourably admitted, against this art, as if the study of it was at best a trifling amusement, and not only useless, but destructive to all taste of polite learning (52).—And, with regard to the figure which any profound Logician is likely to make upon the scene of active life, it happens to him, as, in the ordinary course of things it must, to every man that will give himself true pains, to lay a foundation of sound scholarship in any other branch of useful learning. The hermitage of his study has made him somewhat uncouth in the world, and men make him worse by staring on him. He is silly and ridiculous, and it continues on him for some quarter of a year out of the university. But practise him a little in men, and brush him over with good company, and he shall out-balance the glistener, as far as a solid substance does a feather, or gold gold-lace (53).

(52) The author here seems to have his eye upon Lord Shaftesbury, who recommends the Essay in these terms. of his life at it. In 1690, he published Two Treatises of Civil Government [U], in defence of the Revolution: and the same year came out also his Essay on Human Understanding in folio; nor was the year expired, when he sent his letter to Edward Chipley, Esq; upon the subject of Education [W]. As the ill state of the silver coin employed every body's thoughts at this time, and indeed was become a national concern of the last importance, our author appeared in this publick cause, and, in 1691, printed Some Considerations of the Consequences of the lowering of Interest, and raising the Value of the Money, in a Letter sent to a Member of Parliament [X]. This being taken notice of by the Ministry, when that affair flored him almost to a miracle in a few hours after his return at any time from the town, quite spent and unable to support himself. I say, besides this first felicity of health, the necessary foundation to all other enjoyments, he found in Lady Masham (54) a friend and companion exactly to his heart's wish; a lady of a contemplative and studious complexion, and particularly enured, from her infancy, to deep and refined speculations in Theology, Metaphysics, and Morality, and so much devoted to Mr Locke, that, to engage his residence there, she provided an apartment for him, of which he was wholly master, and took care that he should live in the family with as much ease as if the whole house had been his own (55); and he had the additional satisfaction of seeing this lady breed up her only son exactly upon the plan which he had laid down for the best method of education; and, what must needs please him still more, the success of it was such, as seemed to give a sanction to his judgment in the choice of that method. Accordingly, we find him making use of this example to encourage his friend Mr Molyneux to observe the same in one rule there recommended, to which that gentleman had particularly objected in regard to his son. The instance of young Mr Masham very luckily happened to be a case exactly in point, both the children being only sons, and both of a like tender and delicate constitution. * One * thing (says our author writing to Mr Molyneux upon * this subject) give me leave to be importunate with * you about: you say your son is not very strong: to * make him strong you must use him hardly, as I have * directed; but you must be sure to do it by very in- * sensible degrees, and begin any hardship you would * bring him to only in the spring. This is all the * caution needs be used. I have an example of it in * the house I live in, where the only son of a very ten- * der mother was almost destroyed by a too tender * keeping. He is now, by a contrary usage, come to * bear wind and weather, and wet in his feet; and * the cough, which threatened him under that warm * and cautious management, has left him, and is now * no longer his parents constant apprehension, as it * was (56).

[U] Two Treatises of Civil Government. The whole title runs thus: Two Treatises of Government. In the former, the false principles and foundation of Sir Robert Filmer and his followers are detected and overturned. The latter is an Essay concerning the true original extent and end of Civil Government. In the preface our author tells us, 'This was only the beginning * and end of a discourse concerning government; what * fate has otherwise disposed the papers that should * have filled up the middle, and were, says he, more * than all the rest, it is not worth while to tell thee. * If these papers have that evidence I flatter myself is * to be found in them, there will be no great mis of * those which are lost, and my reader may be satisfied * without them: for, I imagine, I shall have neither * time nor inclination to repeat my pains, and fill up * the wanting part of my answer, by tracing Sir Ro- * bert Filmer again through all the windings and obscu- * rities which are to be met with in the several bran- * ches of his wonderful system.' This knight had formerly published animadversions upon Milton's Defence of the People of England in 1652, of which neither Milton nor any of his friends took any notice, probably out of contempt. On the other hand, Salmasius was an author of the first reputation in the learned world; Milton, therefore, took him to task. Mr Locke had no better opinion than Milton had of Filmer's abilities, or the strength of his reasoning; but the numbers and characters of those who had imbibed his principles in prejudice to the Revolution were far from being contemptible. This last consideration induced him to take up his pen in this argument, and the first disposed him to sink the greater part of what he had wrote thereon. In the second treatise, our author advances this for an undoubted maxim, that no one can be obliged to submit to the laws of that government under which he happens to be born, but by his own consent; insomuch that, when arrived at the years of discretion, he has a right either to chuse that, or else to remove to any other. I have met with a small piece wrote by a nonjuror, not long after the accession of King George the First to the throne, wherein this principle is observed to be contrary to the following rule laid down by all the best writers upon this subject, and taken from the Civil Law; nemo potest ipseus voluntate de origine sua se eximere. And it may be seen in the article of Mr William Molyneux, what kind of reception his piece met with here, wherein he attempted, from the same fundamental principle of our author, to assert the independency of Ireland upon England; with regard to the power of making Acts of Parliament.

[W] A Letter upon Education. This piece was not printed 'till 1693, when it came out under the title of Some Thoughts concerning Education, in a Letter, &c. in 8vo. Our author wrote the substance of it many years before in Holland. Mr Molyneux, in a letter dated March 2, 1692, having mentioned his promise of publishing it, together with the particular joy that promise had given him, on account of the education of his own son, proceeds thus: 'My brother [Dr Moly- * neux] has sometimes told me, that, whilst he had * the happiness of your acquaintance at Leyden [which * was seven or eight years before], you were upon * such a work as this I desire, and that, too, at the * request of a tender father for the use of his only son.' To this Mr Locke answers: 'That which your bro- * ther tells you is not wholly besides the matter: the * main of what I now publish is but what is contained * in several letters to a friend of mine, the greatest part * whereof were writ out of Holland (57).' He printed a third edition with additions in 1695; and another in 1698. It came out likewise after our author's death, with a great many more additions. Mr Peter Coste, who had translated the piece into French, and published it with this title, De l'Education des Enfants, Amsterdam, 1695, 12mo. afterwards revised his translation, and inserting the posthumous additions, together with a considerable number of passages added by himself from Montaigne, by way of explanation of Mr Locke's sentiments, published the whole at Amsterdam in 1721, 8vo. Another edition from that of Amsterdam had been printed at Paris in 1708, and a translation of this book into Low Dutch was also printed at Rotterdam in 1698, 8vo. Our author appears to have the success of his method much at heart, and had a great opinion of it; which he expresses to his friend Mr Molyneux in the following terms (58): 'I am ex- * tremely glad to hear, that you have found any good * effects of my method on your son. I should be glad * to know the particulars; for, though I have seen * the success of it in the child of the lady in whose * house I am (whose mother has taught him Latin * without knowing it herself when she began), yet I * would be glad to have other instances; because some * men, who cannot endure any thing should be mended * in the world by a new method, object, I hear, that * my way of education is unpracticable. But this I * can assure you, that the child abovementioned, but * nine years old in June last, is now reading Quintus * Curtius with his mother, understands Geography and * Chronology very well, and the Copernican system of * our vortex; is able to multiply well, and divide a * little; and all this without ever having had one blow * for his book.' We see here, his method had been from its appearance objected to as unpracticable, nor has any subsequent experience cleared it from the same censure.

[X] Some Considerations, &c. Our author informs us, that this piece was drawn up by him 20 years before. He does not say what occasioned him to turn affair began to grow ripe for execution, in 1695, he was consulted upon the occasion; when he started an expedient for supplying the necessities of commerce, and the exigencies of the people during the recoinage, which was approved and recommended by Lord Somers; hereupon, King William observing him to be very capable of serving the publick (41), appointed him that year one of the Commissioners of Trade and Plantations. By this means he became engaged in the immediate business of the State; and, with regard to that of the Church, in order to promote the scheme which his Majesty had much at heart, of a Comprehension with the Dissenters, he published the same year his treatise, intitled, The Reasonableness of Christianity, as delivered in the Scriptures [2]. This being attacked his thoughts then upon the subject; but it is observable, that his reasoning is the same, and frequently expressed too in the same words, as are found in a treatise published in 1675, 8vo. with this title: A Treatise of Money, or a Discourse on Coin and Coinage: also Tables of the Value of all sorts of Pearls, Diamonds, Gold, Silver, and other Metals. By Rice Vaughan, Esq; In these considerations of Mr Locke, several arguments are brought to prove, that lowering the interest of money would be a great detriment to trade. These experience has since shewn to be ill grounded. However, as the book was thought in general to have merit, being reprinted in 1695, our Philosopher thereby obtained the additional reputation of understanding somewhat of business; and, in that opinion, a little before King William's return from Holland that year, when the Lords Justices took into consideration the arduous affair of recoinage the silver, they sent for our author, among others, to have his sentiments upon it. This produced his two following tracts: (1.) Some Observations upon a printed paper, intitled, A Proposal for encouraging the coining of Silver Money in England, and after for keeping it there. (2.) Further Observations concerning raising the Value of Money; wherein Mr Lowndes's Arguments for it, in his late Report concerning an Essay for the Amendment of the Silver Coin are particularly examined. In all his tracts, Mr Locke asserts the necessity of preserving the old standard in the proposed new coinage, a policy which was afterwards observed in the execution of that affair. He likewise maintains, that nothing else, without the increase of our foreign trade, and thereby bringing the ballance thereof in our favour, would be sufficient to prevent the melting down of our coin, and carrying it out of the nation, an argument which was made use of by Mr Montague (59) in the debates of the House of Commons, upon the article of settling the standard in the recoinage. Besides Mr Lowndes, our author had several other antagonists of an inferior class upon this subject, whom he thought proper to take no notice of, particularly one who subscribes himself J. H. in a pamphlet intitled, The State of England in relation to Coin and Coinage. This piece is mentioned with great contempt by Mr Molyneux, to whom Mr Locke complains much of the trouble that this business had brought upon him. 'The business of our money,' says he, in a letter dated March 30, 1696, to that gentleman, 'has so near brought us to ruin, that, till the plot broke out, it was every body's talk, every body's uneasiness; and, because I had played the fool to print about it, there was scarce a post wherein some body or other did not give me fresh trouble about it (60).'

(41) Mr Molyneux congratulates his friends on this occasion in the following terms. 'In your writings concerning money, you have given such demonstrative proofs of your reach even in the business of the world, that I should have wondered had the King overlooked you.' His Letter to Locke, dated June 6, 1696.

[2] The Reasonableness of Christianity, &c. This piece was likewise translated into French by Mr Coste, and the two Vindications also, which were printed at Amsterdam, 1703, 8vo. The whole was reprinted there in 1715, in two tomes, 12mo. In this edition a great many repetitions, which are frequent in our author's style (61), are retrenched by the translator, who has also added two dissertations by another hand; one concerning the true and only means of reuniting all Christians, notwithstanding their differences in opinion; and the other concerning the religion of a lady. What reception this piece met with at its first appearance, our author himself will inform us, in a letter to Mr Limborch (62); where he acquaints that divine, that the clergy of all parties were offended with it. Theologus nostris tam conformis quam nonconformis displicere audio. His professed design extends no farther, than to convert the Deists to Christianity, by shewing them, that, in order to become Christians, nothing more was necessary, than to believe Jesus to be the Messiah. But as he acknowledges that this design unavoidably led him to consider several other points, as particularly the doctrine of Original Sin, and the Mediatorial Office of Christ; so, in explaining these, he expressed himself in such a manner, as brought him into the suspicion of Socinianism. This occasioned the title of Mr Edwards's book against him mentioned in the text; and this censure did not only pass generally among the English clergy, but even Mr Limborch and other friends of our author in Holland, confessed, in effect, he had given too much reason for it (63). We have said, that Mr Locke's professed design was to reconcile the Deists to Christianity; however, this design was executed in such a manner, as evidently shewed, that promoting the scheme of an universal comprehension was his first and principal view; and, indeed, every species of schism in the Church must needs effectually be extirpated, by equally admitting all into it, who professed their belief that Jesus is the Messiah. To this purpose Mr Limborch, a Remonstrant, one of the tenets of which sect was this of a Comprehension, writing to our author concerning his book, gives the following opinion of it (64). Ego summa cum voluptate lectioni illius incumbo, & in præcipuo (quod toto libro de fide Christianæ objecto tractat) argumento illi propositus assentior. Hoc recto percepto gravissimas ac acerbissimas in Ecclesia Christiana disputationes feliciter componi posse puto; saltem Ecclesie non obstante opinionum diversitate, pacem facili negotio posse restitui: ea enim quæ nunc a plerisque, ut unicum ferme Christianismi fundamentum arguntur, objecto fidei non comprehendendum fiet. Quod unicum anathematismis schismatibus & odiis tollendis remedium est. How much this was to Mr Locke's mind, appears by his answer to it, as follows. De libro Anglicano in linguam Gallicam verso, cujus lectioni cum ad me scripseras incubuisi, idem tecum sentio contentionum & schismatum radices evellit, quantum id potest religionis Christianæ veritas & fundamentum, si id auctor rectè explicaverit, ut mihi videtur. Our author's doctrine had likewise its abettors in England. Among others, Mr Samuel Bold, Rector of Steeple in Dorsetshire, in 1697, published a piece in 8vo. intitled The Knowledge of Christ Jesus. To which are added, Some passages in the Reasonableness of Christianity, and its vindication; with some Animadversions on Mr Edwards's Reflections on the Reasonableness of Christianity; and on his book intitled, Socinianism unmasked. This writer having intimated our author's design to unite all Christians into one compact body, recommends it in the warmest terms, not without passing a severe censure upon all its opposers. 'In short, says he, if the Reasonableness of Christianity, as delivered in the Scriptures, doth merit no worse a character on any other account than it doth justly deserve, because it advanceth and so fully proveth this point, that Christ and his Apostles did not propound any article as necessary to be believed, to make a man a Christian, but this, that Jesus is the Christ or Messiah. I think it may with great justice be reputed one of the best books that hath been published for at least 1600 years (65).' The truth is, the author of the Constitutions of Carolina, it was thought, might be easily discerned in the Reasonableness of Christianity; and it happened in Mr Locke's case, as it had done in all others who were concerned in the controversy about a Comprehension, and, indeed, as it ordinarily does in religious disputes of all kinds, that few speak with moderation; and it would be in vain to think of exempting our author from the general censure. Notwithstanding the unusual degree of art and caution, for which he was so remarkable, yet he was not without his unguarded moments; and particularly, whenever that odious thing called orthodoxy came across him, he could not help stumbling against it. Thus, he could not mention his disappointment to his friend Limborch in the act of Toleration, without some bitterness in reflecting upon the clergy. Tolerantiam (sic scribit in attacked in 1696 by Mr Edwards, in his Socinian unmasked, Mr Locke wrote two Vindications of his doctrine against that author's charge the same year. He was scarcely disengaged from this controversy, before he entered into another on the following occasion. Some arguments in his Essay on Human Understanding having been made use of by Mr Toland (mm), in his Christianity not mysterious, and several treatises being published at the same time by the Unitarians, maintaining, that there was nothing in the Christian religion but what was clearly intelligible, Dr Stillingfleet, in 1697 (nn), published a defence of the doctrine of the Trinity; wherein he censured some passages in the just mentioned Essay, as tending to subvert the fundamental articles of Christianity. An answer to this charge was immediately wrote by our author; to which the Bishop replied, and the controversy was carried on the following year 1698, when it ended by the death of the latter [Z]. This was also the last time that our author employed the press (oo).

Epistola 6 Jan, 1689, data) apud nos jam tandem lege stabilitam, te ante hæc audisse nullus dubito. Non ea forsitan latitudine qua tu & tui similes, veri & sine ambitione vel invidia, Christiani optarent. Indeed, he continues with temper enough to express his hopes, that this might prove the earnest and fore-runner of a Comprehension, as follows. Sed aliquid est prodire tenus. His initiis jacta spero sunt libertatis & pacis fundamenta, quibus stabilienda olim erit Christi Ecclesia. But when these hopes were extinguished in the overthrow of the last efforts in this reign for such an establishment in 1692, he entirely lost his temper; and, in another letter to the same friend, dated February 2d that year, he pours forth the rancour of his heart in the following terms. Reste facis quod persecutionem religionis ergo in pontificis solum damnas. Si quam inter Christianos sectam seligas, cujus crudelitatem in secleris a reliquis, laudaberis, quanquam persecutio ubique eadem est & plane pontificia. Quælibet enim Ecclesia sibi verbis arrogat Orthodoxiam, re infallibilitatem. That a writer of Sir Richard Steele's gaiety should confound Protestant certainty with Popish infallibility, to serve a turn to his wit, is no more than one expects, and quite in character; but who would be persuaded, without seeing this instance, that a person, so justly celebrated for his extraordinary talents in discerning the exact relation of things as Mr Locke, should suffer his pen to fall into the same indistinction; and this is the more enormous, as the point had been then so lately and so clearly adjusted in the popish controversy. In reality, the fault lay in his will, not in his understanding. He knew the fobriety of the doctrine taught and maintained by the orthodox Protestants against the furious zeal of Popery. This he plainly intimates, and he must have seen it truly and impartially stated in his deservedly admired author, Chillingworth; but, because these Orthodox were persuaded, that the certainty they maintained was sufficient to convince the gain-sayers of an unreasonable dissent, and after they had opened the gates of the Church by the Toleration, could not see the policy of blowing up it's walls and fortifications (as they called it) by the scheme of a Comprehension, our Philosopher run into the vulgar cry against it, and spares not to regale his spleen with the word Orthodox, as wantonly and luxuriously as we see it done by his lately professed pupil (66); who, however, differs from his master in this point, entirely approving the orthodox practice even upon his master's very unorthodox principles. For, in order to prevent the mischiefs of perfection, and to obtain that sort of peace which he contends to be the end and design of the Gospel, he proposes the following method.

There are arguments, no doubt, says he, even of the political kind, and of irresistible force, against Atheists who reject all religion, Latitudinarians who admit all alike, and Rigidists who suffer one alone. If the first prevail, there will be no religious conscience at all; if the second, there will be as many as there are religious sects in every society; if the third, persecution for religion will be made a maxim of government. He then takes notice how shamefully this last is done in the countries where the Romish religion prevails, and proceeds thus. In other countries, though a rigid spirit prevails, yet, if inquisitions are not established, and if ecclesiastics do not govern, it is very possible, by skill and management, to allay, for the most part, the ferments which Theology is apt to raise in the State, and to blunt the fury of those who call themselves Orthodox, and every man who differs in opinion from them heretical. In countries where this rigid spirit is not that of the government, though dissent cannot be entirely prevented, the bad influence and effects of it may. To make government effectual to all the good purposes of it, there must be a religion; this religion must be national; and this national religion must be maintained in reputation and reverence; all other religions and sects must be kept too low to become the rivals of it. These are, in my apprehension, the first principles of good policy. The establishment of a religious order, subject to the civil magistrate, and subservient to the civil power, not that of a religious society, pretending to be the allies, and aiming to be the masters, of the civil, may be recouced very well to these principles: and sure I am, that they may be pursued, not only without perfection, but without the invasion of any one right, which men can justly claim under the freeest and most equitable government. The parliament of 1641 declared, that human laws cannot bind conscience; which is a declaration every sect makes out of power, and none observe willingly in it. But be it so. Human laws, however, may and ought to exclude those men from power in the State, Kings especially, who profess a private conscience repugnant to the public conscience of that state. Such men will make use of power, and the better men they are, the more to propagate their own schemes of religion, to strengthen their own party, and to recommend their particular notions about ecclesiastical government: which cannot be done without manifest danger to the publick peace. The wisdom of our constitution has therefore joined admirably well together the two most compatible things in the world, how incompatible soever they may have been represented, a Test and a Toleration; and, by rejecting alike the principles of Latitudinarians and Rigidists, has gone far to the prevention of those evils that gave occasion to the objection of Atheists (67).

[Z] The dispute ended with the death of the Bishop. This dispute (68) consists of five letters, two by the Bishop, and three by our author. In the last of which, besides other incident matters, he explains at large his sentiments concerning certainty by reason, certainty by ideas, and certainty of faith; the resurrection of the same body, and the immortality of the soul; shews the consistency of his opinion in these points with the articles of faith; and clears himself from the charge of scepticism. Mr Des Maizeaux, from whom we borrow this, observes, that Mr Locke was generally allowed to have had the better of the Bishop in the dispute, who had not considered these points so thoroughly as his antagonist (69). However that be, 'tis certain, that an abstract of this dispute being published in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, it came thereby to Mr Bayle, who soon after expressed himself of the same opinion (70), that is, as to the arguments produced by each in proof of the points in dispute; but this must be carefully distinguished from the real truth of those points, with regard to some of these, at least, for instance, the immortality of the soul. In the explanation of which, Mr Locke had asserted the possibility of matter's thinking, and at the same time allowed the incomprehensibility of it. Mr Bayle having made his own use of that concession, proceeds to observe, that the question, Whether the soul of man is distinct from matter? makes a part of the famous dispute

(68) We have the motive which particularly induced our author to undertake this controversy, in a letter to Mr Molyneux; where he writes thus: 'What sentiments I have of the usage I have received from the person you mention [the Bishop of Worcester], I shall shortly more at large acquaint you. What he says is, you observe, not of that moment much to need an answer, but the silly design of it I think necessary to oppose; for I cannot allow any one's great name a right to use me ill.' (69) Mr Limborch, in a letter dated Oct. 2, 1699, acquaints our author, that he had lately received one from a learned person in England with the following passage: Non dubito quin jam dudum aduocasti de indubitata veritate quam amicus tuus D. Locke recitavit de Episc. Vigorn. in ejus responsione usum. Episc. eam vidit nec multo post mortuus est. Mr Whiston tells us, that Dr Bentley said it had killed the Bishop. St. Louis, p. 257.

(pp) We are told, that his application to this study had given him a more noble and elevated idea of the Christian religion than he had before; and that if he had had strength enough to have begun new works, it is very probable he would have written some, in order to have inspired others with this grand and sublime idea in all its extent. See an Account of his Life and Writings prefixed to his Works in folio.

The asthma, to which he had been long subject, increasing with his years, began now to subdue his constitution, and rendered him very infirm; and, in 1700, he resigned his seat at the Board of Trade, because he could no longer bear the air of London on account of that disorder [AA]. From this time he continued altogether at Oates, in which agreeable retirement, he employed the remaining last years of his life entirely in the study of the Holy Scriptures (pp). His strength began to fail more remarkably than it had done at the entrance of the summer before his death, a season, which, in former years, had always restored him some degrees of strength. This made him so very sensible of his approaching dissolution, that, though he neglected none of those means which his skill in Physick had taught him to prolong his life, yet this was done without calling in any other assistance. At length his legs began to swell, and that symptom daily increasing, his strength diminished very visibly. He had often before this spoken of his departure, and always with great composure; and now plainly discerning how short a time he had to live, he prepared to quit the world. As he was incapable for a considerable time of going to church, he thought proper to receive the Sacrament at home; and two of his friends communicating with him, as soon as the office was finished he told the minister, that he was in the sentiments of perfect charity towards all men, and of a sincere union with the Church dispute between Dr Stillingfleet and Mr Locke. The first maintained, that matter is incapable of thought, and thereby became the defender of a fundamental article of Philosophical Orthodoxy. He made use of this argument among others, that we cannot conceive how matter can think. Mr Locke admits this principle to be true, and contents himself with denying the consequence; for he asserts, that God can do things which are incomprehensible to human understanding. He then proceeds to give our author's reasoning upon this principle, and proceeds thus. Here is a formal confession of the incomprehensibility of the thing, and a recourse to the extent of God's power with regard to effects which are beyond the limits of our understanding. It is much after the same manner, continues he, ridiculing the argument, that the schoolmen suppose there is in creatures an obediential power, by which God might raise them, if he pleased, to any state whatever: a stone might become capable of the beatific vision, and a drop of water might become capable of washing away all the pollution of original sin. Take notice, that, to refute this obediential power in matter with respect to knowledge, we may urge a proof, which it does not appear Dr Stillingfleet has made use of. It has always seemed to me very proper to shew the impossibility of joining together the three dimensions and thought in the same subject. You will find the substance of this proof in the books which I cite (71). To pursue that argument, would carry us much beyond the limits which we have set to this remark, especially as it would lead us unavoidably to examine another notion imputed to Mr Locke (72) among others, concerning the manner of God's omnipresence, by a diffusion of his substance. We shall content ourselves at present with observing, that the unphilosophicalness, as well as absurdity, of seeking recourse in God's omnipotence for the possibility of thought's being superadded to some systems of matter properly disposed, has been sufficiently evinced by Dr Clarke (73). But there is another point in this subject, which we ought not to omit. In the third letter to the Bishop now under consideration, our author particularly insults his Lordship, who asserting that it takes off very much from the evidence of immortality, if it depends wholly upon God's giving that, which, of its own nature, it is not capable of. 'This, says he, I could not have imagined to find in a book written in defence of the mystery of the Holy Trinity;' and then makes the following reply. 'Any one's not being able to demonstrate the soul to be immaterial, takes off not very much, nor at all, from the evidence of its immortality, if God has revealed that it shall be immortal, because the veracity of God is a demonstration of the truth of what he has revealed; and, in a clear demonstration, there is as much evidence as any truth can have that is not self evident.' Here the sophism is notorious, in calling scripture-proof a demonstration, which is not pretended to rise above a moral certainty, or a sufficient probability; and therefore it undoubtedly admits of degrees, and must needs be less, where there is no internal evidence from the nature of the thing. Upon this account, we see, St Paul did not think it enough barely to declare the resurrection and immortality of the body, but took pains to enforce the credibility of it, by an argument drawn from the analogy of nature; whereas, that of the soul is rather supposed than proved, where its condition of happiness or misery in that state is explained.

[AA] He resigned on account of his asthma.] Mr Locke had another reason, besides his asthma, for resigning this post, which he gave to his friend Mr Molyneux (74). 'The corruption, says he to that gentleman, of the age gives me so ill a prospect of any success in designs of this kind [for the publick good] never so well laid, that I am not sorry my ill health gives me so just a reason to desire to be eased of the employment I am in.' The King would have had him continue in it, and told him expressly, that, though he could stay at London but a few weeks, his services in that office would be yet very necessary to him. But at length his Majesty yielded to the representations of Mr Locke, who could not prevail upon himself to hold an employment of that importance, without doing the duties of it more regularly. He formed and executed this design, without communicating it to any person whatsoever, though he might easily have entered into a composition with any person, who, being befriended with his interest, would probably have carried this post from any other suitor. He was told of this, and that too by way of reproach. 'I knew it very well, replied he, but that was the very reason why I communicated my design to nobody. I received this place from the King himself, and to him I resolved to restore it, to dispose of it as he thought proper (75).' The truth is, if we may believe his own account of the matter, he was never very fond of this preferment, and seems to have accepted it purely in compliance to his Majesty. 'Though I can never think any pains or time of mine too much, says he to Mr Molyneux (76), in the service of my country, as far as I may be of any use, yet I must own to you, this [upon interest and money] and the like subjects are not those which I now relish, or that do with most pleasure employ my thoughts; and therefore I shall not be sorry, if I escape a very honourable employment with a thousand pounds a year salary annexed to it, to which the King was pleased to nominate me some time since.' When his friend had congratulated him upon the occasion, he returned this answer (77). 'Your congratulation to me I take, as you meant, kindly and seriously, and, it may be, it is what another would rejoice in; but, if you will give me leave to whisper truth without vanity in the ear of a friend, 'tis a preferment which I shall get nothing by, and I know not whether my country will, though that I shall aim at with all my endeavours. Riches may be instrumental to so many good purposes, that it is, I think, vanity, rather than religion or philosophy, to pretend to condemn them. But yet they may be purchased too dear. My age and health demand a retreat from bustle and business, and, the pursuit of some enquiries I have in my thoughts, makes it more desirable than any of those rewards which publick employments tempt people with. I think the little I have enough, and don't desire to live higher, or die richer, than I am. And therefore you have reason rather to pity the folly than congratulate the fortune that engages me in the whirlpool.'

Church of Christ, under whatever name distinguished [B B]. He lived some months after this, which time was spent in acts of piety and devotion; and, the day before his death, Lady Masham being alone with him, and sitting by his bed-side, he exhorted her to regard this world only as a state of preparation for a better; adding, that he had lived long enough, and thanked God for having passed his life so happily, but that this life appeared to him a meer vanity. He had no sleep that night, and resolved to try to rise the next morning, as he did; and, being carried into his study, he was placed in an easy chair, where he slept a considerable while at different times; and, seeming to be a little refreshed, he would be dressed as he used to be, and called for some small beer, which he seldom used to taste. He then desired Lady Masham, who was reading the Psalms low while he was dressing, to read aloud: she did so; and he appeared very attentive, 'till, the approach of death hindering him, he desired her Ladyship to break off, and in a few minutes expired (99), on the 28th of October, 1704 (rr), in the 73d year of his age. He was interred in the church of Oates, where there is a decent monument erected to his memory, with an inscription in Latin wrote by himself [CC]. In the latter end of his life,

[B B] A sincere union, &c.] This declaration is entirely agreeable to the whole tenor of Mr Locke's former conduct, which, indeed, gives room enough to think he had no particular esteem for the Church of England, above other Protestant Churches; and that at this time he retained that opinion, may be collected from two letters (78) wrote by him to his cousin Richard King. In one of which, dated August 25, 1703, in answer to the question of that kinsman, Which was the shortest and surest way for a young gentleman to attain a true knowledge of the Christian religion? To study, says he, the Holy Scriptures, especially the New Testament; therein are contained the words of eternal life: it has God for it's author; Salvation for it's end; and Truth, without any mixture of error, for it's matter. And, when that gentleman desired some farther explanation, he replied a few weeks before his death in these terms. 'The method I proposed would, I presumed, bring you the surest way to that Church, which I imagine you already think most conformable to the word of God.' This Mr Richard King was a relation of the Lord Chancellor King, to whom, while he was young, Mr Locke was very serviceable in his studies, and at his death left him by his will one moiety of the books in his library (79).

[CC] An inscription written by himself.] We shall insert this in justice to our author, as it exhibits a specimen of his excellent judgment. Siste viator. Hic situs est Joannes Locke, si qualis fuerit rogas, mediocritate sua contentum se vixisse respondet. Litteris eo usque tantum profecit, ut veritatis unice litaret; hoc ex scriptis illius discere, quod de eo reliquum est, majori fide tibi exhibebunt, quam epitaphii suspecta elogia. Virtutes, si quas habuit, minores sane quam sibi laudi, tibi in exemplum unam proponeret. Vitia una sepeliantur. Morum exemplar si quaeras, in Evangelio habes; vitiorum utinam nusquam; mortalitatis certe (quod profuit) hic est ubique. This is all that he thought proper to leave concerning his character, a more particular one was first published by Mr P. Coste (80), whom we have frequently mentioned, and republished by Mr Des Maizeaux (81). Some particulars hereof have been already taken notice of in the course of this memoir; but, as many others were afterwards contradicted by Mr Coste himself, to insert the whole would be to abuse the reader. We shall therefore lay before him only such parts, as we apprehend to have been least controverted, as follow. 'Mr Locke had great knowledge of the world, and of the business of it. He won peoples esteem by his probity; his wisdom, his experience, his gentle and obliging manners, gained him the respect of his inferiors, the esteem of his equals, the friendship and confidence of those of the highest quality. He was at first pretty much disposed to give advice, where he thought it was wanted; but experience of the little effect it had, made him grow more reserved. In conversation, he was most inclined to the useful and serious turn; but, when occasion naturally offered, he gave into the free and facetious with pleasure, and was master of a great many entertaining stories, which he always introduced properly and told naturally; nor was he any enemy to rally when delicate and innocent. He loved to talk with mechanics in their own way, and used to say, that the knowledge of the arts contained more true Philosophy than learned hypotheses. By putting questions to artificers, he would sometimes find out a secret in their art, not well understood by themselves, and by that means give them views entirely new, which they put in practice to their profit. He was so far from affecting any airs of studied gravity, that he would sometimes divert himself with imitating it, in order to ridicule it with better success; upon these occasions he always remembered this maxim of the Duke de Rochefaucault, which he admired above all others, 'That gravity is a mystery of the body, in order to conceal the defects of the mind. One thing, continues Mr Coste, which those who lived any time with Mr Locke could not help observing in him, was, that he took a delight in making use of his reason in every thing he did; and nothing that was attended with any usefulness seemed unworthy of his care; so that we may say of him what was said of Queen Elizabeth, that he was no less capable of small things than of great. He often used to say himself, that there was an art in every thing; and it was easy to be convinced of it, to see the manner in which he went about the most trifling thing he did, and always with some good reason.' The truth seems to be, and, indeed, plainly shews itself through all this studied colouring, that our author was too formal and precise in trifles, a foible which did not escape the censure of some of his adversaries (82). Such a shaft, however, was harmless enough; but that of Lord Shaftelbury beforementioned is of another kind, and wounds deeply, if it be true that Mr Locke was indeed credulous. His Lordship, as we have seen, intends it chiefly with respect to believing too hastily the stories of travellers, which he there mentions; and besides those, there is another remarkable instance of his credulous disposition in the same way, which was kindly hinted to him by his friend Limborch. The occasion of it was this. Mr Locke having, in 1694, received the present of this friend's History of the Inquisition, thought fit, by way of improving it, to insert in the margin such further accounts as he met with of the proceedings in that terrible tribunal. In this view he transcribed the following passage from a voyage to the East, published that year. 'Le St Office, ce redoutable tribunal fameux par ces injustices & ces cruautés, regne ici [a Malthe] plus tyranniquement qu'a Rome meme, & on m'a fait cent funestes recits, dont je vous epargneroi le triste, seulement vous dirai je, que les confesseurs, qui par tout ailleurs sont tenus de garder le secret sur peine de feu, sont ici dans l'obligation de les reveler toutes les fois qu'il s'agit d'un cas de l'inquisition, quoi qu'ils ne l'avouent pas, car ce seroit le moyen d'empêcher les gens de se confesser, mais c'est une chose qu'on sçait pourtant bien. Cependant pour en ôter tout soupçon, on demeure quelquefois un an ou deux sans dire mot, apres quoi l'inquisiteur envoie prendre un homme, & lui demande s'il sçait bien pourquoi il l'a fait seïst; alors c'est a lui de se ressouvenir de tout ce qu'il peut jamais avoir dit; que si malheureusement la memoire ne lui fournit pas, ou que le delit, dont il est coupable, ait este si secret, que le seul confesseur en ait eu connoissance, & que se reposant la dessus, il ne veuille pas avouer; c'est fait de cet homme la, on l'estrange dans la prison, & puis quelque tems apres on dit a ses parents, qu'il n'est pas besoin de lui porter a manger. Heureux sont ceux qui ne font point assujettis a ce joug (86).' Any one who is never so little skilled in the French language, will easily perceive, by the turn of this narrative, that our Protestant author was not so solicitous to examine into the truth life, he contracted a friendship with Anthony Collins, Esq; and left him a remarkable letter to be delivered after his death [D D]. Mr Peter Coste, who had known him long, and some few years before he died lived with him as an amanuensis (s), published a paper in 1705, entitled, the Character of Mr Locke, representing him in a very advantageous light. But the highest eulogium upon him was that of the late Queen Caroline, who, on having erected a pavilion (12) in honour of Philosophy, placed therein our author's bust, on a level with Bacon, Newton, and Clarke, as the four prime English Philosophers. In 1706, there was published in 8vo. Mr Locke's Posthumous Works, containing five tracts truth of the fact, as he was to proclaim the scandal of it. This Mr Limborch saw, and therefore in his answer declares, that he very much doubts the truth of the story, not only on account of the general objections to which such travelling tales are justly obnoxious, but also because it is contrary to all the instructions, rules, and laws, of the Roman Church, requiring confession to be kept secret. Wherefore I durst not affirm, contentious he, this for truth upon the credit of any, but an approved author of unquestionable knowledge and fidelity; and then concludes with this gentle rebuke. 'Quare loco quem mihi suggestisti ex itinerario Du Mont alio posses, si vera sit illius narratio, exinde evidenter liquere Inquisitorum praxin, sæpe adversari Inquisitionis instructionibus & legibus; Inquisitoresque unice tantum spectare, qua ratione miseris captivos per fas & nefas decipiunt, atque ita fraudibus irritos misera morte perdat (84).' In a subsequent letter, dated March 11, 1698-9, he writes thus. 'Digna mihi hæc narratio videtur, quæ historię meæ inferatur, si scriptoris alicujus pontificiis non suspecti autoritatis confirmari posses.' In short, the character of Mr Locke's mind (as that of others) shews itself under the least disguise in his familiar letters; and these present us with other instances besides this, where his fond passion for the marvellous, as well as an affectation of novelty, is seen to betray the soundness of his judgment.

[D D] A Letter to Mr Collins ] It was dated August 25, 1704, and directed for Anthony Collins, Esq; to be delivered after my decease.

'Dear Sir,

'By my Will you will see, that I had some kindness for ———; and I know no better way to take care of him, than to put him, and what I designed for him, into your hands and management. The knowledge I have of your virtue of all kinds, secures the trust which by your permission I have placed in you; and the peculiar esteem and love I have observed in the young man for you, will dispose him to be ruled and influenced by you; so that of that I need say nothing. But there is one thing which it is necessary for me to recommend to your especial care and memory.——May you live long and happy in the enjoyment of health, freedom, content, and all those blessings which Providence has bestowed on you, and your virtue intitles you to. You loved me living, and will preserve my memory now I am dead. All the use to be made of it is, that this life is a scene of vanity, that soon passes away, and affords no solid satisfaction but in the consciousness of doing well, and in the hopes of another life. This is what I can say upon experience, what you will find to be true when you come to make up the account. Adieu.

'I leave my best wishes with you,

'JOHN LOCKE.'

The latter part of this letter, viz. May you live long, &c. was printed by Mr Whiston in the postscript to his Reflections on an anonymous pamphlet, intitled, A Discourse of Free-thinking, in 1713, 8vo. and against the end of his List of Suppositions and Assertions in the late Discourse of the Grounds and Reason of the Christian Religion, which are not therein supported by any real and authentick evidence, for which some such evidence is expected to be produced. Lond. 1724, 8vo. Mr Whiston's design is to confront Mr Collins with the testimony of his friend in favour of revealed religion. In the same spirit Mr Warburton, who does nothing by halves, reproaches Mr Collins with the first part, but Lord Shaftesbury with the latter part, of this their friend's letter. 'Mr Locke,' says he in an address to the Free-thinkers, 'the glory of this age, and the blessing of futurity, shews us, in the treatment he received from his friend and his pupil, what a believer is to expect from you. It was enough to provoke their spleen, that he had shewn the reasonableness of Christianity, and had placed all his hopes of happiness in another life. The intimacy between him and Mr Collins is well known. Mr Collins appears to have idolized Mr Locke while living, and Mr Locke was convinced Mr Collins would preserve his memory when dead. But no sooner was he gone, than Mr Collins publicly insulted a notion of his concerning the possibility of conceiving how matter might first be made and begin to be; and goes affectingly out of his way to do it (85). The noble author of the Characteristicks had received part of his education from this great Philosopher; and it must be owned, that this Lord had many excellent qualities both as a man and as a writer. He was temperate, chaste, honest, and a lover of his country. In his writings he has shewn, how largely he had imbibed the deep sense, and how naturally he could copy the graceful manner, of Plato. How far Mr Locke had contributed to the cultivating of these good qualities I will not enquire; but that inveterate rancour with which he indulged Christianity, it is certain he had not from him. It was Mr Locke's love of him, that seems chiefly to expose him to his pupil's bitterest insults. One of the most precious remains of the true piety of this incomparable man are his last words to Mr Collins.' He then transcribes the latter part of the just cited letter, and proceeds in these terms. 'One would imagine, that, if ever the parting breath of pious men, or the last precepts of dying Philosophers, could claim the reverence of their survivors, this inestimable monument of friendship and religion had been secure from outrage; yet hear in how unworthy, how cruel, a manner his noble disciple apostrophizes him on this occasion. Philosopher, let me hear concerning life, what the right notion is, and what I am to stand to upon occasion, that I may not, when life seems retiring, or has run itself out to the very dregs, cry vanity! condemn the world, and at the same time complain, that life is short and passing; for why so short, indeed, if not found sweet? Why do I complain both ways? Is vanity, meer vanity, a happiness? or can misery pass away too soon. [Characteristicks, Vol. I. p. 302. 3d edit.] I will leave the strong reflections that naturally arise from hence to the reader, who, I am sure, will be beforehand with me in judging, that Mr Locke had reason to condemn a world that afforded such a pupil.' Thus far Mr Warburton (86), roughly, indeed, and confidently, as his manner is; for which he was rebuked, however, in his turn by one of his first readers, I mean his friend Dr Conyers Middleton, who having received the present of his Divine Legation, returns him the following remark upon it. 'Some take notice, that you treat the Freethinkers too roughly, and that your address to them is a defiance, rather, and declaration of war, than an invitation to a conference; not likely, therefore, to conciliate their favour or attention, which ought to be the care of one who professes to write for their conviction.' He then proceeds to give his opinion in the part of the noble author, so rudely treated. 'Lord Shaftesbury's rallery of Mr Locke does not seem strange to me; a Philosopher, who at parting with life has nothing to preach but it's vanity, certainly makes a poor figure, by shewing, that he was deceived in the end, and mistaken in the use of it; and not that life itself, but his pretensions to Philosophy, were vain (87).'

[EE] His posthumous works, containing five tracts.] These are as follow: (1.) The Conduct of the Understanding. (2.) An Examination of Malbranche's opinion of seeing all things in God. (3.) A Discourse of Miracles (88). (4.) Part of a Fourth Letter for Toleration (89). (5.) Memoirs relating to the Life of Anthony first Earl of Shaftesbury (90). Mr Le Clerc translated these pieces into French, to which he prefixed his historical elogium of Mr Locke, which he had before inserted in the 6th tome of the Bibliothèque Choïse, and which has been of so much use to us in this memoir. He published this collection at Rotterdam, in 1710, 12mo. with this title, Oeuvres Diverses de M. Jean Locke. The first and second of these tracts were originally intended by our author to make a part of his Essay; but, upon further consideration, he thought the first of too much, and the second of too little, importance for that design (91). On this occasion it ought to be remembered to his praise, that, in his Philosophy, he equally avoided the two extremes of the Idealists and the Materialists, carefully preserving in this sense that mediocrity, which he intimates to be his rule in philosophizing, and in which he frequently expressed the highest satisfaction. With regard to the conduct of the understanding, it is generally esteemed; and not undeservedly, one of his most useful attempts; and had he lived to finish it, would have pointed out to others that method, by the help of which he was able to compose his Essay, and thereby gained the high encomium of being the glory of the last age, and the instructor of the present (92).

To what we have already said of this piece, we must add in behalf of Mr Des Maizeaux, that he took extraordinary pains to give it as correct as possible. It had been printed very incorrectly in the State Tracts; Vol. I. 1689. (2.) A Letter from a Person of Quality to his Friend, &c. (93). (3.) Remarks upon some of Mr Norris's books, wherein he asserts Father Malbranche's opinion, of seeing all things in God. (4.) The Elements of Natural Philosophy. LOWER [RICHARD], an eminent Physician and Anatomist in the XVIIth century; was descended of a genteel family in Cornwall, and born at Tremere [A] near Bodmin in that county, about the year 1631. His parents resolving to give him a liberal education; sent him, at a proper age, to Westminster-school; where, being admitted King's scholar, he was elected thence, according to the connection between the two royal seminaries, a student of Christ-Church in Oxford in 1649. He had not been long at the college, before he made choice of Physick for his profession; but being obliged by the statutes of the university, to lay a suitable foundation for that study in a competent knowledge of Logick and Philosophy, he proceeded regularly through both his degrees in Arts; the first of which he took February 17, 1652 (a); and commencing Master June 28, 1655 (b), he entered upon the Physick line, and in a little time began to practise under the directions of Dr Thomas Willis, to whose favour he recommended himself, by assisting him in his anatomical dissections [B]. These were performed by our author with admirable skill and dexterity, and that celebrated Physician was so much pleased with him, that, in order to acquaint him with the practical part of his faculty, and introduce him into business; he took him as a companion and assistant in attending his country patients. It was in the road to one of these visits in April 1664, that Mr Lower discovered the medicinal spring at East-Thorp, or Astrop, near King's-Sutton in Northamptonshire; and communicating it to the doctor, proper experiments were made by them; which answering expectation, they joined in recommending the water (c); so that being collected into a well, and suitable houses of entertainment built near it, the place has been frequented greatly ever since, and is at present well known by the name of Astrop wells. Our author's reputation daily increasing with his business, he accumulated his degrees in Physick, at the Act, June 20, 1665 (d); and the same year printed a defence of Dr Willis's discourse upon Fevers [C]. That celebrated practitioner removing to London the ensuing year, Dr Lower followed

[A] Descended of a genteel family at Tremere ] Mr Wood observes (1), that Sir William Lower the Poet was of the same family, and born also at Tremere; and that our author's father and brothers were in expectation of succeeding to his estate after his death, in which, however, they happened to come in for no other share, than that of grief for the disappointment.

[B] He assisted Dr Willis in his anatomical dissections.] This was particularly in dissecting the brain, in preparing his famous piece, intitled, Cerebri Anatomie, in the preface to which are these words: Præter supplicias ob hujus manu [Doctores Lower] in dissectando peritissima allatas. Besides the help furnished by Dr Lower, a most skilful hand in dissections (2).

[C] A Defence of Dr Willis's Discourse upon Fevers.] The title of it is, Diatribæ Thomæ Willisii, Med. Doct. & Profess. Oxon. de Febribus Vindicatis, contr. Edmund de Meara. Lond. 1665, 8vo. It was reprinted followed his friend and patron to the metropolis, where his fame had prepared the way for him. One of the first of his last mentioned pieces had been taken notice of by the Royal Society, who had printed an account of it in the Philosophical Transactions (f); so that he was immediately admitted to their meetings, and communicating his new invention of a safe method for putting in practice the transfusion of blood lately started [D], he shewed several experiments to confirm it before them; whereupon, he was proposed a candidate to the society by Dr Seth Ward, afterwards Bishop of Salisbury, October 10, 1667, and elected Fellow on the 17th of the same month (g). He shewed several other anatomical experiments upon live dogs (b) about this time to the Society, which gave so great satisfaction, that, November 5, he was proposed for another Curator of Experiments to be added to Mr Hooke; but he declined that office on account of his other business (i). He was elected Fellow of the College of Physicians the same year, and two years afterwards he published his celebrated treatise upon the heart; wherein he first of any one shewed the order of the muscular fibres to be spiral, like a snail-shell, as if several skeins of thread of different lengths had been wound up into a bottom of such a shape, hollow and divided within (k). This curious piece contained so many excellent observations for the advancement of Physick [E], that his reputation became perfectly established, and his practice grew more extensive; and, as he began to be called frequently to the Court end of the town, he removed from his first residence in Hatton-garden, to Salisbury-court Fleetstreet; and afterwards changing that for one in Bow-street, he settled at last in King-street Covent-garden, where he was greatly resorted to, especially after the death of Dr Willis in 1675, being then reputed one of the ablest Physicians in London. But, on the breaking out of the Popish plot in 1678, siding, as is said, with the Whigs, who he thought would carry all before them, he became sensible of his error by the loss of a great part of his practice at and near the Court, and so consequently of his credit. This ill-judged step made way for Dr Thomas Short, a Roman Catholic, who presently came into great business, which upon his death, in the latter end of September 1685, devolved on Dr John Radcliffe: so that our author continued under the cloud 'till his death, which happened January 17, 1690-91, at his house in King-street Covent-garden. He had some years before purchased an estate in his own country, at St Tudy near Bodmin in Cornwall; where his corpse was carried, and interred in a vault under the south side of the church, according to his own request. He left two daughters, Loveday and Philippa, both unmarried at the time of his decease. Mr Wood says there was then a report, that by his last Will he bequeathed 1000 pounds to St Bartholomew's hospital in London, 500 pounds to the French Protestant refugees, 50 pounds to the poor of the parish of St Paul Covent-garden, and 40 pounds to the poor of the two parishes where he had land, &c. (l).

reprinted at Amstelod, 1666, 12mo. Dr Meara was Fellow of the College of Physicians at London, and practised at Bristol (3).

[D] A safe method of transfusing blood. There are two papers of his upon this subject, printed in the Philosophical Transactions. The first in No. 20. p. 353. intitled, An account of the success of the experiment of transfusing the blood of one animal into another. The second in No. 30. p. 557. containing An account of the experiment of transfusion, practised upon a man in London. He also proposed to the Society to try the experiment upon madmen of all kinds (4). Mr Wood, and after him the author of Dr Lower's article in the General Dictionary, tells us (5), that the Doctor, in his treatise upon the heart, assumed to himself the first discovery of the transfusion, which, in reality, was another's due; but the truth is, Dr Lower's words do not import any such presumption, he only claiming to be the first who discovered a safe method of putting the hint in practice, his right to which has never, that I know of, been disputed (6).

[E] Excellent observations for the advancement of Physick. These are particularly enumerated by Dr Charles Goodall (7), as follow: The swift motion of the blood through the heart; the commixture of the air with the blood; the difference between arterial and venal blood; the separation of the chyle; with it's sole passage through the ductus thoracicus; and it's different degrees and ways of conversion into blood; the vulgar opinion, about defluxions distilling from the brain, confuted by unanswerable experiments. This last observation relates to a piece subjoined by our author to his treatise upon the heart, with the title of, Dissertatio de origine catarrhi & venae sectione, which was reprinted by itself at London in 1672, 8vo. His treatise upon the heart bears this title: Traçtatus de Corde; item de motu & colore sanguinis & chyli in eum transitu. P

LOWTH [WILLIAM], a very learned writer, son of William Lowth, Apothecary and Citizen of London, and Mary his wife, daughter of William Short of Westminster, Esq; was born in the parish of St Martin's Ludgate in the city of London, September 11, 1661 (a). He was descended from a family originally of Lincolnshire, and afterwards settled at Sawtrey in the county of Huntingdon; whose estate, about two hundred years ago, the entail being cut off, passed away to an heiress, married to a younger son of Sir John Cornwallis [A]. His father was a great sufferer in the dreadful fire of London in 1666.

[A] Married to a younger son of Sir John Cornwallis. It appears by a letter of his grandfather, Simon Lowth (who is hereafter mentioned in the text), to Elias Ashmole, Esq; Windsor Herald at Arms, at Reading, holding there his visitation of Berkshire (which letter is dated at Tylehurst, March 25, 1665); 'That the said Simon Lowth's grandfather was second son of — Lowth of Lincolnshire, Esq; whose estate was once entailed on the heirs male, but was by a fine and recovery cut off and settled upon a daughter, an only child, and so passed away with her, married to one of the family of Cornwallis.' Agreeably to which we find in Collins's Peerage (1), that 'Richard Cornwallis, third son of Sir John Cornwallis [Steward of the Household to Edward VI. when Prince of Wales, who died April 23, 1544], married, according to the appointment of his father, Margaret Lowth, daughter and heir of Lionel Lowth, of Sawtrey in Com. 1666. At the time of this great calamity his son William was in Berkshire, under the care of his grandfather Mr Simon Lowth, Rector of Tylehurst in that county; to whom he had probably been sent the year before, on occasion of the plague then raging in the city of London. His grandfather took great care of his education, and initiated him very early in letters. He was afterwards sent to Merchant-Taylors school in London, where he made so great a progress in learning, that he was elected from thence into St John Baptist's college in Oxford in June 1675, being then not fourteen years of age. He took the degree of Master of Arts March 31, 1683, and of Bachelor in Divinity October 17, 1688. His eminent worth and learning recommended him to the favour of Dr Peter Mew Bishop of Winchester, who had been President, and ever continued to be the kind patron, of St John's college: he made him his Chaplain, and conferred upon him a Prebend in the cathedral church of Winchester in the year 1696, and the Rectory of Buriton, with the chapel of Petersfield, Hants, in the year 1699. He published 'A Vindication of the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Old and New Testament, in answer to a treatise lately translated out of French, intitled, Five Letters concerning the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures.' Oxford, 1692, 12mo. And a second edition with amendments, and a new preface; wherein the antiquity of the Pentateuch is asserted and vindicated from some late objections. Lond. 1699 [B]. 'Directions for the profitable reading of the Holy Scriptures: Together with some Observations for the confirming their Divine Authority, and illustrating the Difficulties thereof. Lond. 1708, 12mo.' and several editions since. 'Religion the distinguishing Character of Human Nature: on Job xxviii. 28. and, The Wisdom of acknowledging Divine Revelation: on Matth. xi. 19. Two sermons preached in the cathedral church of Winchester, at the assizes in the year 1714.' 'A Commentary on the Prophet Isaiah. 4to. Lond. 1714. On Jeremiah, 1718. On Ezekiel, 1723. On Daniel and the Minor Prophets, 1726.' Afterwards republished together, with additions, in one volume folio, as a continuation of Bishop Patrick's Commentary on the other parts of the Old Testament; in which form it has had several editions. 'The Characters of an Apostolical Church fulfilled in the Church of England, and our Obligations to continue in the Communion of it. A Sermon preached in the church of Petersfield in the county of Southampton, June 17, 1722.' London, two editions. This Sermon was occasioned by the erecting of a new meeting-house for the Protestant Dissenters in the town of Petersfield. The author thought it his duty to preach it, in order to confirm his parishioners in their communion with the Church of England; and, 'by the desire of several friends, was prevailed with to publish it, not thinking it proper to deny the request of those to whom he was a debtor, to promote their edification by the best means he could (b).' This produced 'Remarks on a Sermon preached at Petersfield June 17, 1722, by the Rev. Mr William Lowth, Rector of that parish, and Prebendary of Winchester, in a Letter to himself: in which his Characters of an Apostolical Church are considered; the Dissenters right to them is asserted and maintained; their Ministers call and ordination defended; their

[B.] A Vindication of the Divine Authority and Inspiration of the Old and New Testament. Mons. Le Clerc, famous for his extensive learning and numerous writings, as well as for his freedom in delivering his sentiments on the most important points, was the author of the Five Letters. They are a part selected by the translator from two works of his, both written in an epistolary form, the one intitled, 'Sentimens de quelques Theologiens de Hollande sur L'Histoire Critique du Vieux Testament composee par le P. Richard Simon de l'Oratoire.' Amsterd. 1685.' The other, 'Defense des sentimens, &c. contre la Responce du Prieur de Bolleville.' Amsterd. 1686.' They make in the French, the 11th and 12th Letters of the Sentimens; and the 9th, 10, and 11th, of the Defense. In the Letters of which the Sentimens consist, the author pretends to give his correspondent an account of several conferences, which himself and three of his friends had held together on the subject of Father Simon's book. As he indulged himself in the liberty of hazarding many conjectures and opinions, which he was sensible would not easily meet with assent in the learned world, and which, perhaps, he himself might not always think proper to maintain, he chose to publish them rather as the sentiments of his imaginary friends, than his own. In the 11th and 12th Letters of the Sentimens, he takes the further precaution of making the whole of what he delivers upon the Inspiration of the Holy Scriptures, to be an abridgment of a Memorial of one Mons. N. communicated by a friend. In the 9th and 10th of the Defense, the same Mr. N. explains more distinctly, and maintains his opinion against several objections that had been made to it. The 11th is a further defence of Mr N. in the person of the author of the Letters. Mr Le Clerc thought it not proper to set his name to either of these works.

'Il composa son Ouvrage en forme de Lettres, & comme si c'eut été le resultat de quelques conferences qu'il avoit eues avec trois de ses amis. Mais la verité est, que tout étoit de lui. Et s'il prit ce tour, ce fut à cause de certaines questions, sur lesquelles il proposoit des sentimens, qu'il prevoioit bien qui paroistroient hardies, & que cependant il ne donnoit que pour de simples Conjectures, prêt à les abandonner des qu'il seroit convaincu qu'elles n'étoient pas bien fondées. Effectivement il en detruisit lui-même depuis quelques unes, & j'en indiquerai plus bas un exemple (2).' The instance in which Le Clerc afterwards retracted and confuted his own opinion, which the author of the Eloge here refers to, was concerning the author of the Pentateuch. In one of the dissertations prefixed to his Commentary on Genesis, he proves, that Moses is the author; contrary to the hypothesis which he had advanced in the 6th Letter of the Sentimens. 'Dans une des trois Dissertations Critiques, qui traite de L'Auteur du Pentateuque, il prouve fortement, que c'est Moïse; & il refute tacitement ce qu'il avoit lui-même avancé dans les sentimens de L'Histoire Critique (3).' This is what Mr Lowth had confuted in the new preface to the second edition of his book; which he concludes with some animadversions, also on a position which the great Mr Locke had advanced in his Reasonableness of Christianity; 'That the Epistles are not of equal authority with the Gospels, nor to be appealed to, for the explaining the Fundamentals of the Christian Faith.'

‘ their publick worship vindicated; and Mr Lowth’s reflections on them and their assemblies are proved to be unjust and groundless. By John Norman of Portsmouth.’ Lond. 1723. Mr Norman had opened the new meeting-house with a sermon, which he had published under the title of, ‘ The Nature and Extent of Christ’s Church considered: a Sermon preached at Petersfield February 13, 1721-2, at the opening of a new meeting-house lately erected by the Protestant Dissenters of that town.’ Mr Lowth took no notice of this sermon of Mr Norman, ‘ because he would not furnish him with a pretence to say, that he had given him any provocation to answer his sermon (c):’ but however unwilling he was to be engaged in this controversy, he could not avoid being drawn into it. He soon published, ‘ An Answer to the Remarks of Mr John Norman of Portsmouth, on a sermon preached at Petersfield June 17, 1722: wherein the Apostolical Institution of Episcopacy is vindicated from his exceptions; and the nature of Church Communion, and our obligations to maintain it, are at large explained.’ Lond. 1723. Mr Norman rejoined with ‘ A Defence of the Remarks, &c. in which Mr Lowth’s Answer to the Remarks is fully considered; his Arguments for the Apostolical Institution of Episcopacy, and his Explication of the Nature of Church Communion, are impartially examined; and the Rights, Principles, Ministry, and Worship, of Protestant Dissenters farther vindicated.’ Lond. 1724. Mr Lowth had in the conclusion of his Answer declared, that he should ‘ here be very willing to take leave of this controversy, that he might have leisure for the prosecution of an undertaking of another nature, and more suitable to his own inclination.’ [viz. His Commentary on the Prophets.] ‘ Some of our greatest divines (adds he) have more than once managed this controversy, with all the advantages that strength of reason and calmness of temper can give to any cause; and yet after all with very little success (d).’ When Mr Norman’s Defence appeared, he did not at all repent of the resolution, in which he was already fixed, of having no more to do with one whom he thought a very unfair adversary; at least of troubling the world no further with this dispute. However, he drew up a full answer to Mr Norman’s Defence, addressed to him in form of a letter, and sent it to him in manuscript. Mr Norman returned a short answer by letter, waving all further discussion of particulars, as his antagonist did not think proper to lay them before the publick. And so the affair dropped. Thus Mr Lowth’s labours appear to have been strictly confined within the limits of his own province, and applied solely to the peculiar duties of his function; yet, in order to acquit himself the better in Theology, he had pursued his studies with a more general and extensive view. Few had dealt more largely in criticism. There is scarce any ancient author, whether Latin or Greek, profane or ecclesiastical, especially the latter, but what he had read with a critical accuracy; constantly accompanying his reading with critical and philological remarks, noted in the margin and initial and final leaves of his book, or entered into his Adversaria. Of his collections in this way, he was upon all occasions extremely communicative. Hence the notes on Clemens Alexandrinus, sent to Dr Potter (afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury), and published with the author’s name to each in his edition of that Father [C]. Hence the like remarks on Josephus, communicated to Dr Hudson for his edition, and acknowledged in the preface [D]. As also those larger and more numerous annotations on the ecclesiastical historians, inserted in Mr Reading’s edition of them at Cambridge [E]. The author of Bibliotheca Biblica was indebted to him for the same kind of assistance, as we find by the preface to the last posthumous volume [F]. The learned Dr Chandler, late Bishop of Durham, while he was engaged in his

[C] Hence the notes on Clemens Alexandrinus, sent to Dr Potter, &c.] A due mention is made of them, in the Preface, in these words. ‘ Post nullum vero mihi memorandus est W. Lowthius, Ecclesie Cathedralis Winton. Præbendarius dignissimus, qui non solum perpetuas fere in Clementem notas ultro mihi obtulit, sed etiam cohortationem ad Græcos, & octo Stromatum libros pro diversa materia, qua constant, ratione, quatenus fieri potuit in capita redegit. Hæc autem infra, propriis auctorum nominibus distincta, & suis quæque locis disposita, reperientur (4).’ i. e. I must mention in the first place, Mr William Lowth, the most worthy Prebendary of Winchester; who, not only offered me, without asking, the remarks he had made upon almost all Clement’s works, but also divided his exhortation to the Greeks, and the eight books of Stromata, into chapters, &c.

[D] Hence the like remarks on Josephus, &c.] Mr Anthony Hall mentions them with due respect, in his Preface to Josephus. ‘ Neque prætereundus est Guiljelmus Lowthius, Præbendarius Wintoniensis dignissimus, cui tantum debuit quantum familiarium nemini (5).’ i. e. Nor must I pass over in silence Mr Will. Lowth, the most worthy Prebendary of Winchester, to whom he was as much obliged as to any other of his acquaintance.

[E] Annotations on the Ecclesiastical Historians, inserted in Mr Reading’s edition of them.] He thus gratefully mentions them in his Preface. ‘ Adjectæ sunt

etiam, conjecturæ dicam? an potius certissimæ tam textû Græci quam interpretationis emendationes, & Historiæ per totum opus elucidationes, quas mecum pro singulari sua humanitate communicavit Wilhelmus Lowthius, Eccl. Wint. Canonicus. Vir impense doctus & Κριτικωτατῶς, quod, inter alia, nuperæ ejus Clementi Alexandrino passim asperse castigations, nuper in Isaiam & Jeremiam Prophetas Commentarii, amplissimè testantur (6).’ i. e. There are also added conjectures, shall I call them? or rather most certain emendations both of the Greek text, and version, and explanations of the history throughout; which were very kindly communicated to me by Mr William Lowth, Prebendary of Winchester. A man of very great learning, and a most excellent critic, as plainly appears, among other things, by his emendations of Clemens Alexandrinus, and his commentaries on Isaiam and Jeremiam.

[F] As we find by the preface to the last posthumous volume.] In which is this acknowledgment. ‘ Among his very particular favourers and friends, ought especially to be mentioned, the late reverend, learned, and pious Mr Lowth; a gentleman of a character in all respects unexceptionable. The learned Dr Hudson out of a just sense of the valuable assistance received from this gentleman, when he desired his advice upon several passages of Josephus, was pleased to declare, that he took him to be the greatest scholar in the kingdom. his Defence of Christianity from the Prophecies of the Old Testament, against The Discourse of the Grounds and Reasons of the Christian Religion; and in his Vindication of the Defence, in answer to the Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered; held a constant correspondence with Mr Lowth, and consulted him upon many difficulties that occurred in the course of that work. We should not do justice to Mr Lowth's character, if we did not add, that the most valuable part of it was what least appeared to the eyes of the world; the private and retired part, that of the good Christian and the useful Parish Priest. His unfeigned piety and most exemplary life; his diligence, assiduity, and zeal, in the duties of his function; his hospitality, and constant readiness in performing all the offices of kindness, whether of admonition, advice, or assistance, to his parishioners, gave all the recommendation and weight that could be added to his most earnest exhortations from the pulpit. He married Margaret, daughter of Robert Pitt of Blandford in the county of Dorset, Esq; by whom he had two sons [G] and three daughters, who all survived him. By his own orders, he was buried in the church-yard of his parish-church at Buriton, where he died, near the south side of the chancel; and on the inside wall was erected a plain monument, with the following inscription:

Near the outside of this wall
lyeth the Body of Mr William Lowth, late Rector of this Church :
who died May 17th, 1732.
And being dead still desires to speak to his beloved Parishioners.
And earnestly to exhort them
Constantly to attend upon the Worship of God,
Frequently to receive the Holy Sacrament,
And diligently to observe the good instructions given in this place:
To breed up their Children in the fear of God,
And to follow peace with all men and holiness,
Without which no man shall see the Lord.

God give us all a happy meeting at the resurrection of the Just.

mory of so great a man, I am well satisfied, Mr Parker, had he been living, would have looked upon as a poor return for the collection of notes which Mr Lowth has favoured him with in this last volume of the Pentateuch, and a much meaner expression of the value he set on a friendship he had so happily cultivated (7).

LUDLOW [EDMUND], a ring-leader of the republican party in the civil wars of the last century, was descended from a family of considerable rank originally seated in Shropshire; but removing thence, had been settled some time in Wiltshire (a), when our author was born at Mayden-Bradley (b) in that county, about the year 1620*. His parents resolving to give him an education suitable to his birth, sent him from school † to Trinity-college in Oxford; where, having-gone through the usual academical studies, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts November 14, 1636 †. After which he was removed to the Temple, in order to acquire a competent knowledge in the laws and constitution of his country, so as to recommend him some time to a seat in Parliament, where his ancestors had frequently represented the county**. His behaviour was answerable to the hopes and expectations of his father, Sir Henry Ludlow, Knight; who being chosen for the county in the Long Parliament, which met the third of November, 1640, and entering with great zeal into the party against the Court, his conduct and encouragement had such an influence on his son, that he not only very early declared himself on that side, but also took up arms the first opportunity that offered: for while he was a student in the Temple (c), he engaged with several others in a kind of military association, and they afterwards enlisted as volunteers in the Earl of Essex's life-guard (d) [A]. upon consideration of my age and vigorous constitution, as an Englishman, and an invitation to that purpose from my father, to enter into the service of my country, in the army commanded by the Earl of Essex, under the authority of the Parliament.

foldier was not long before he came to action, in the first pitched battle between King Charles the First and his Parliament, called the battle of Edge-Hill; which was fought on Sunday the 23d of October, 1642 (e): of which action he has given us a very particular and seemingly impartial account, so far as he was concerned therein. The following winter, Sir Edward Hungerford obtaining the command of the Parliament forces in the county of Wilts, he invited our author to raise a troop of horse in his regiment (f); which having completed in the summer campaign, he joined Sir Edward, then besieging Wardour-castle; of which, when taken, Captain Ludlow was made governor, and left with a company of foot, and his own troop, for its defence: in this service, young as he was, he shewed both in courage and conduct his great capacity in affairs of war, maintaining that post ten months, without any assistance, for the Parliament, which had held out only six days for the King (g), though all means had been tried, not omitting even treachery [B], according to Mr Ludlow's account (b), for regaining it; nor was the reduction completed, 'till, by battering and mining, it was rendered wholly untenable, and the governor, by wounds and wants, forced to listen to the clamours of his men, who insisted on his consenting to yield upon articles, which were, he says, very badly kept (i). He was carried prisoner to Oxford, where they offered him the liberty of the city on his parole; but as they would not in that case give him the freedom of visiting his friends in the castle, he chose to remain with them in confinement; from whence, in about three weeks time (k), he was released by exchange and went to London (l). Here he found the Earl of Essex very ready to exchange his subalterns and soldiers, and particularly Mr Balsum, whom the Earl made his chaplain, and was very desirous to give Captain Ludlow a command in his army: but the Parliament having appointed the Captain Sheriff of Wilts, and Sir Arthur Haslerig inviting him to accept of the post of Major in his regiment of horse (m) in Sir William Waller's army, which was ordered on the western service, he accepted that invitation, and in that post marched to form the blockade of Oxford (n). The Earl of Essex not following the King (who broke out of Oxford) pursuant to his orders, but marching into the West in the room of Sir William Waller, who spent the greatest part of the summer of 1644 in attending on the King's motions, without being able to come to any engagement, several officers, whose chief interest lay westward, obtained leave from Sir William to go into their respective countries to raise recruits for his army. Among these was our Captain, to whom that General gave also a commission to raise and command a regiment of horse, and a permission to take with him his own troop consisting of about a hundred men. With these, and another body of the like force commanded by Colonel Alexander and Colonel Edward Popham, they marched to relieve Major Wansley, besieged in Woodhouse near Warmister; but on Warmister heath were attacked by a superior body of the royal horse, and the two Pophams leaving Colonel Ludlow and his party to shift for themselves, he with much difficulty got to Southampton with about fourscore of his men (o), soon after which Woodhouse was obliged to surrender at mercy. The Colonel now began to find the ill effects of faction amongst the commanders and others of his own party, which rose so high, that the Wiltshire people not only obstructed his raising his regiment, but kept the arms which had been bought for that

Soon after my engagement in this cause, I met with Mr Richard Feines, son to the Lord Say, and Mr Charles Fleetwood, son to Sir Miles Fleetwood, then a member of the House of Commons; with whom consulting, it was resolved by us, to assemble as many young gentlemen of the Inns of Court, of which we then were, and others, as should be found disposed to this service, in order to be instructed together in the use of arms, to render ourselves fit and capable of acting, in case there should be occasion to make use of us. To this end we procured a person experienced in military affairs, to instruct us in the use of arms; and for some time we frequently met to exercise at the Artillery-ground in London. And being informed that the Parliament had resolved to raise a life-guard for the Earl of Essex, to consist of a hundred gentlemen, under the command of Sir Philip Stapylton, a member of Parliament, most of our company entered themselves therein, and made up the greatest part of the said guard; amongst whom were Mr Richard Feines, Mr Charles Fleetwood, afterwards Lieutenant-General; Major-General Harrison, Colonel Nathaniel Rich, Colonel Thomlinson, Colonel Twisleton, Colonel Boswell, Major Whitby, and myself (1). It is observable, that these young hot spirits, who were thus forward to begin, were as tenacious to support what they esteemed the cause of liberty; four of them, Harrison, Boswell, our Author, and Fleetwood, sitting in the High Court of Justice, as Judges of the King, and Thomlinson commanding the guard that attended his Majesty during the trial (2).

having found a boy at Shaftesbury fit for the purpose, gave him such instructions as he thought fit: he was not above twelve years of age, and yet, says he, as I was afterwards informed, had already attempted to poison his grandfather. This boy he sent to the castle, to desire of me to be admitted to turn the spit, or perform any other servile employment; to which I consented, his youth freeing him, as I thought, from any suspicion. About three or four days after, a party of the enemy's horse appeared before the castle; a great wall-gun called a harquebuz de croq, being fired from the top of the castle, burst in the middle. At night, as this boy was sitting with the guard by the fire, some of them conceived a jealousy of him; and strictly examining him about the cause of his coming, he affirmed it to be because the master whom he served had used him cruelly for speaking some words in favour of the Parliament. With which answer they not being satisfied, threatened, that unless he would confess the truth, they would hang him immediately; and to affright him, tied a piece of match about his neck, and began to pull him upon a halbert. Upon this he promised to confess all, if they would spare his life; and thereupon acknowledged that Captain White had hired him to number the men and arms in the castle, to poison the arms, the well, and the beer, to blow up the ammunition, and to steal away one of my best horses to carry him back to them; for which service he was to receive half a crown, confessing that he had accordingly poisoned two cannon and the harquebuz that was broken, but pretended that his conscience would not give him leave to poison the water and the beer (3).

that purpose, and detained the pay of his troop, because he would not deliver up the commission given him by Sir William Waller, and take a new one from the Earl of Essex (p). However, he continued to act with vigour for the service of the Parliament, and reduced two garrisons of the King's at Sturton and Witham, where he found cattle enough to pay his men. He afterwards joined Sir William Waller with about five hundred horse, and was engaged in the second battle fought at Newbury, in which action he lost his kinsman Gabriel Ludlow, who is much lamented by him (q). From thence he marched (by order of the committee of both kingdoms) (r) at the head of two hundred of his regiment, to assist in relieving Taunton; which service being performed, he returned to Salisbury, from whence he was soon drove out by a large party of the King's horse, under the command of Sir Marmaduke Langdale (s), and obliged again to retire to Southampton, being slightly wounded in the breast by a sword in the pursuit. Having rallied his men here, he kept about Lymington and Hurst-castle, to check the incursions of the King's troops; but sent the most serviceable of his horse to the assistance of Portsmouth. Soon after this, the disputes between the Parliamentarians began to run very high, and at last produced the famous self-denying ordinance, by means of which the Earls of Essex and Manchester (rigid Presbyterians), and Sir William Waller, were dismissed from their several commands, and with them Colonel Ludlow (t), who came not into play again in any post civil or military till 1645, when he was chosen, with James Herbert, Esq; second son to the Earl of Pembroke, Knight of the Shire to represent the county of Wilts (u), in the room of his father, who died in 1643 (w), and Sir James Thynne, who had deserted the Parliament and retired to the King at Oxford. He says, he entered the House as a Member, in company with Mr Robert (afterwards Admiral) Blake, then a land officer, and just returned to serve for the borough of Taunton, which he had long defended against the King; 'And this, says Colonel Ludlow, I chose to do, assuring myself, that he (Mr Blake) having been faithful and active in the publick service abroad, we should be as unanimous in the carrying it on within those doors (x):' and he proceeds to characterize the several parties which he found there, and their ruling interests (y) [C]. On the surrender of the King to the Scots, the Colonel, as one of the members for Wilts, was commissioned to pay off Major Maffey's brigade, which he and Alderman Allen, the other representative for that county, did at the Devizes (z). Soon after the death of the Earl of Essex, which happened the thirteenth of September, 1646 (a), Cromwell entered into a conversation with Colonel Ludlow, wherein he expressed so much dislike against the Parliament, and so extolled the Army, that the Colonel was persuaded he had already conceived the design of destroying the civil authority, and setting up for himself, and was founding whether he was a fit instrument to be employed to those ends (b): but he returned such an answer, as made Cromwell never speak to him again on that subject, though upon another occasion he used very indecent expressions to him in the House, tending to the same purpose [D]. When the King was brought from Holmby to the army, our author went down

[C] The several parties he found there, and their ruling interests] Having mentioned the surrender of Exeter, Barnstable, Dunstar, and St Michael's Mount in Cornwall, and the defeat of Sir Jacob Astley at Stow in the Wold, where that Baronet was taken prisoner. The Colonel observes, that during his imprisonment he was heard to say, That now they (the King's party) had no hopes to prevail but by our (the Parliament's) divisions. 'Which, (continues the Colonel) deserves the more reflection, because he being well acquainted with the King's secrets, was not ignorant, that many amongst us, who at the beginning appeared most forward to engage themselves, and to invite others to the war against the King, finding themselves disappointed of those preferments which they expected, or out of some particular disgusts taken, had made conditions with the King, not only for their indemnity, but for places and advancements under him; endeavouring by a treaty, or rather by treachery, to betray what had cost so much blood to obtain. These men, to strengthen their interest, applied themselves to the Presbyterian party, who jealous of the increase of sectaries, of which the army was reported chiefly to consist, readily joined with them. By which conjunction, most of the new elected members were either men of a neutral spirit, and willing to have peace upon any terms, or such, who, though they had engaged against the King, yet finding things tending to a composition with him, resolved to have the benefit of it, and his favour, though with the guilt of the blood that had been shed in the war upon their heads, in not requiring satisfaction for the same, nor endeavouring to prevent the like for the future; designing at the most, only to punish some inferior instruments, whilst the capital offender should not only go free, but his authority be still acknowledged and adored, and so the nation more enslaved than ever to a power, which, though

'it destroys the people by thousands, must be accountable to none but God for so doing; whom some persons, as it is apparent by their usage of mankind, either think not to be, or not at all superior to them. Another sort of men there was amongst us, who having acquired estates in the service of the Parliament, now adhered to the King's party for the preserving of what they had got; who, together with such as had been discharged by the reform of the army, or envied their success, combined together against the commonwealth. This party was encouraged and supported upon all occasions by the Scots and the city of London: the first of them, though they began the war, and though their assembly of Ministers had declared the King guilty of the blood of thousands of his best subjects, their covenant engaging them in the preservation of his person, so far only as might consist with the laws of the land, and liberty of the subject; yet having had many good opportunities in England, and hoping for more, supposing it to be in their power to awe the King to whatsoever they should think fit, they were contented to swallow that ocean of blood that had been shed, pressing the Parliament by their Commissioners, to conclude on such terms with the King, as shewed them rather advocates, than such as had been enemies to him. The latter having had their treasure much exhausted by the war, and their trade long interrupted, besides the influence the Scots had upon them by the means of their Ministers, the common-council being also debauched by Serjeant Glyn, and others of that party in the House of Commons; it was not to be wondered at, if they earnestly solicited for a speedy determination of the differences by a treaty (4).'

[D] Cromwell never spoke to him again on that subject, though upon another occasion he used very indecent expressions to him in the House, tending to the same purpose.] Oliver, soon after Lord Essex's death, meeting down to visit the officers, where Commissary-General Ireton apprehending the Colonel and other members, at that time friends to the army, might be jealous of their proceedings, took great pains to satisfy him; desiring him to be assured of their steadfast adherence to the publick interest, and that they intended only to dispense with such things as were not material, in order to quiet the restless spirit of the cavaliers, 'till they could put themselves into a condition to serve the people effectually: but he adds, he could not approve of their practices (c). It appears clearly from our author's Mémoires, that he looked on the Agitators and their party in the army as stanch Commonwealth's men, and therefore when Cromwell, on their growing troublesome, seized twelve of them, one of which he caused to be shot dead upon the spot, delivering the rest over to the custody of the marshal; and on reporting this transaction to the Parliament, had the thanks of the House voted him for what he had done; our author distinguished himself by giving as loud a No as he could (d). After the Parliament had passed the vote for non-address to the King, and published their declaration for bringing him to a trial, which declaration was drawn up by Colonel Nathanael Fiennes. (e); Colonel Ludlow, Mr Holland, and another member, were sent down to Windsor to release Captain Reynolds and the others (called Levellers) seized as abovementioned by Cromwell; who soon after procured a meeting of divers leading men amongst the Presbyterians and Independents, both members of Parliament and Ministers, at a dinner in Westminster, under pretence of endeavouring a reconciliation between the two parties; but he found it a work too difficult for him to compose the differences between those two ecclesiastical interests; one of which, says our author, could endure no superior, the other no equal. Wherefore finding this produced no effect, he contrived another conference to be held in King-street, between those called the grandees of the House and Army, and the Commonwealth's men; the result of which we shall give in the Colonel's own words [E], he attending amongst those of the latter denomination (f). When Sir Thomas Glenham, by order of the Scots, who were now preparing to raise forces to release the King from his confinement at Carisbrook in the Isle of Wight, had seized upon Carlisle; the Parliament resolving to reinforce the militia of each county, sent several of their members into their respective countries to give life to their preparations, and amongst them the Colonel was sent into Wiltshire, where he soon brought them to agree to the raising two regiments of foot and one of horse (g). Soon after Oliver Cromwell, finding difficulties increasing in his way, took an opportunity of making his complaints, and asking the advice of our author, which he very frankly gave him, as the reader

our author in Sir Robert Cotton's garden, said to him, 'It was a miserable thing to serve a Parliament, to whom let a man be never so faithful, if one pragmatical fellow amongst them rise up and asperse him, he shall never wipe it off; whereas, when one serves under a General, he may do as much service, and yet be free from all blame and envy.' This text, with the comment that his after-actions put upon it (5), convinced Colonel Ludlow, that Cromwell intended to introduce a military government, of which he would, and could with ease, soon make himself the head; and this was much confirmed, when in a debate which came on in the House soon after this meeting, relating to the army, Cromwell whispered the Colonel in the ear, saying, These men will never leave, 'till the army pull them out by the ears (6). Which expression (says Colonel Ludlow) I should have reflected, if the state of our affairs would have permitted (7). These last words shew plainly, that the real commonwealth party, were but few in the House at this juncture, since not considerable enough to be courted by either of the two, Presbyterian or Independent, then struggling for the supreme authority.

[E] The result of which, we shall give in the Colonel's own words. 'The grandees, of whom Lieutenant-General Cromwell was the head, kept themselves in the clouds, and would not declare their judgments either for a Monarchical, Aristocratical, or Democratical government; maintaining, that any of them might be good in themselves, or for us, according as providence should direct us. The commonwealth's men, declared that monarchy was neither good in itself, nor for us. That it was not desirable in itself, they urged from the 8th chapter and the 8th verse of the first book of Samuel, with divers more texts of Scripture to the same effect. And that it was no way conducing to the interests of this nation, was endeavoured to be proved by the infinite mischiefs and oppressions we had suffered under it, and by it: that indeed our ancestors had consented to be governed by a single person, but with this proviso, that he should govern according to the direction of the law, which he always bound himself by oath to perform: that the King had broken this oath, and thereby dissolved our allegiance; protection and obedience being reciprocal: that having appealed to the sword for the decision of things in dispute, and thereby caused the effusion of a deluge of the people's blood, it seemed to be a duty incumbent upon the representatives of the people to call him to an account for the same; more especially since the controversy was determined by the same means which he had chosen; and then to proceed to the establishment of an equal commonwealth, founded upon the consent of the people, and providing for the rights and liberties of all men, that we might have the hearts and hands of the nation to support it, as being most just, and in all respects most conducing to the happiness and prosperity thereof. Notwithstanding what was said, Lieutenant-General Cromwell, not for want of conviction, but in hopes of making a better bargain with another party, professed himself unresolved, and having learned what he could of the principles and inclinations of those present at the conference, took up a cushion and flung it at my head, and then ran down the stairs; but I overtook him with another, which made him hasten down faster than he desired. The next day, passing by me in the House, he told me he was convinced of the desirableness of what was proposed, but not of the feasibility of it; thereby, as I suppose, designing to encourage me to hope that he was willing to join with us, though unwilling to publish his opinion, lest the grandees should be informed of it, to whom I presume he professed himself to be of another judgment (8). Colonel Ludlow here seems to insinuate, that he was the head of the commonwealth party at this meeting; and plainly evidences the King's destruction was a point concluded by both these parties, the republicans, and the grandees: and that the quarrel was no longer who should obey, but who should give the law: and here Cromwell's genius exerted itself, for by uniting the sword with the church, he was an over-match for all the three, Presbyterian, Independent, and Commonwealth men, who each endeavoured to set up for themselves singly; and as they all dreaded, so they all strove to demolish the power of the sword, by which weak measure, they drove the military force to close so much stricter with Oliver.

reader will see at the bottom of the page (b) [F]. After the defeat of the Scotch and English army under the Marquis of Hamilton and Sir Marmaduke Langdale by Cromwell, Colonel Ludlow went down to Sir Thomas Fairfax, then lying before Colchester, to persuade him to make the most of the power which the army had assumed, in order, as he said, to prevent their own and the nation's ruin; to convince him of the necessity of which, he laid before him the bad consequences of entering into a treaty with the King in such strong terms (i), that the army in a very short time adopted his system, and drawing nearer London (to Colnbrook) in order to favour their friends in the House, Ireton sent a message to our author, That now he hoped they (the army) should please him. 'Which (says he) I must acknowledge they did (k).' In the same spirit, when the House, on his Majesty's answer from Newport, voted that the King's concessions were ground for a future settlement, he and his party declared their dissatisfaction, and retired to consult how to frustrate that vote (l). And several officers coming to town the next day, they held a consultation together; in which, after concluding, that the measures taken by the Parliament were contrary to the trust reposed in them, it was resolved the army should endeavour to put a stop to such proceedings: and thereupon our author, with two other members and three officers, withdrew into a private room, where they agreed, as the best means to attain the end of the above resolution, 'That the army should be drawn up the next morning, and guards placed in Westminster-hall, the Court of Requests, and the lobby, that none might be permitted to pass into the House but such as had continued faithful to the publick interest.' How they proceeded in the prosecution of this most arbitrary stretch of power may be seen in the note [G]. The King being, in consequence of the above steps, taken off (m), and the House of Peers voted both usefess and dangerous, their next consideration was, how to carry on the executive part of government; to do which the better, they resolved to constitute a Council of State (n), and empowered five members of the House of Commons, among which was our author (o), to agree upon the number and persons fit to be proposed to the House for their approbation. The number they pitched upon was thirty-five, four of whom were Lords; to which the House added the above five: so that the Council of State consisted of forty members. The same five, or any three of them, were constituted a committee, to receive satisfaction touching the affections of the publick interest of every member who had not sat since the trial of the King, and to report the same, with the reasons of his absence, to the House (p). The Scots having received and proclaimed Charles the Second for their King, and preparing to march with him into England, to compel the people of that kingdom to acknowledge him in the same capacity, Cromwell, who was recalled from Ireland, and,

[F] As the reader will see at the bottom of the page.] Whilst each party was labouring to lay the foundation of their own power in the new intended government in church and state, the people, who saw much time elapsed since they had voted no more addresses should be made to the King, or any messages received from him, and yet nothing done towards bringing him to a trial; found themselves as far from a settlement as ever, and concluded they should never have one, or any ease from their burthens and taxes without an accommodation with the King; and therefore entered into combinations in England, Scotland, and Ireland, for restoring him to his authority. To this end (says the Colonel) petitions were promoted throughout all countries, the King, by his agents, fomenting and encouraging this spirit by all means possible, as appeared by his intercepted letters: so that Lieutenant-General Cromwell, who had made it his usual practice to gratify enemies, even by the oppression of those who were by principle his friends, began again to court the commonwealth party, inviting some of them to confer with him at his chamber: with which acquainting me, the next time he came to the House of Commons, I took the freedom to tell him, that he knew how to cajole and give them good words when he had occasion to make use of them; whereat, breaking out into a rage, he said, they were a proud sort of people, and only considerable in their own conceits (9). But when on tumults attending the petitions from Surrey, Essex, and Kent, the preparations in Scotland, and the rising at Pembroke, he perceived the clouds to gather on every side; he complained to me, as we were walking in the Palace-Yard, of the unhappiness of his condition, having made the greatest part of the nation his enemies, by adhering to a just cause: but that which he pretended to be his greatest trouble was, that many who were engaged in the same cause with him, had entertained a jealousy and suspicion of him; which he assured me was a great discouragement to him, asking my advice, what method was best for him to take. I could not but acknowledge that he had many enemies for the sake of the cause in which he stood engaged, and also that many who were friends to that cause, had conceived suspicions of him: but I observed to him, that he could never oblige the former, without betraying that cause wherein he was engaged; which if he should do, upon the account of an empty title, riches, or any other advantages, how those contracts would be kept with him was uncertain; but most certain it was, that his name would be abominated by all good men, and his memory abhorred by posterity. On the other side, if he persisted in the prosecution of our just intentions, it was the most probable way to subdue his enemies, to rectify the mistakes of those who had conceived a jealousy of him, and to convince his friends of his integrity: that if he should fall in the attempt, yet his loss would be lamented by all good men, and his name be transmitted to future ages with honour (10).

(10) Id. p. 95.

[G] How they proceeded in the prosecution of this most arbitrary stretch of power is contained in the note.] The Colonel tells us, with no small exultation, that 'To this end we (himself and the other five mentioned in the text) went over the names of all the members one by one, giving the truest characters we could of their inclinations, wherein, I presume, we were not mistaken in many; for the Parliament was fallen into such factions and divisions, that any one who usually attended and observed the business of the House, could after a debate upon any question, easily number the votes that would be on each side before the question was put. Commissary-General Ireton, went to Sir Thomas Fairfax, and acquainted him with the necessity of this extraordinary way of proceeding, having taken care to have the army drawn up the next morning by seven of the clock (11). Colonel Pride commanded the guard that attended the Parliament doors, having a list of those members that were to be excluded, preventing them from entering into the House, and securing some of the most suspected under a guard provided for that end; in which he was assisted by the Lord Grey of Grooby, and others who knew the members.'

Our author owns, that in this affair he was duped by Cromwell, 'who, says he, acted his part so to the life, that I really thought him in earnest, and desired him that he would not, in compliment and humility, obstruct the service of the nation by his refusal.' Ibid. p. 122.

on Sir Thomas Fairfax's refusal to march into Scotland, was made Captain-General of all the English forces, one day in the House told Colonel Ludlow, that he observed an alteration in his looks and carriage towards him, and desired a conference with him, which was consented to by our author [H], and in which Cromwell proposed to nominate him for Lieutenant-General of horse in Ireland, and one of the commissioners for civil affairs in that kingdom*. But the Colonel having lately married, and purchased some lands [I], by which he had embarrassed his affairs too much, to think of quitting England till they were put into some tolerable order, he would not therefore seem to understand Cromwell's hints, and even opposed the motion both in the Council of State and in the House, and solicited Cromwell not to insist on his nomination (g), but in vain. Soon after this conference Oliver Cromwell marched to Scotland, from whence (after the victory at Dunbar) he sent Ludlow his commission; the Parliament also ordered a thousand pounds to be advanced to him and his brother commissioners, and directed the same sum to be paid them yearly: they also raised for him a troop of horse, consisting of a hundred men armed with back, breast, and head-pieces for defence, and pistols and musketoons for offence, and advanced them two months pay (r). The Lieutenant-General being quite ready, only waited the determination of Lord Howard's case by the House (s), to set out upon his Irish expedition; and setting sail one Thursday morning in the beginning of January 1650, arrived at the fort of Duncannon on Friday (t). Immediately after landing, he went to pay his respects to the Lord-Deputy, who ordered his troop into good quarters, both to refresh them and season them to the climate; it having been observed, that the English horse were not so fit for service, 'till they had been seasoned for some time with

[H] Cromwell desired a conference with him, which was consented to by our author.] While Cromwell was upon the road from Bristol, in his return from Ireland, a motion was made in the House of Commons, to settle 2500 l. a year upon him. This being earnestly pressed to be passed at least once or twice before his arrival at Westminster, our author, who brands the promoters of this vote with the name of sycophants, apparently, by his own account, testified his dislike of it; and loaded his assent to it with another motion, to settle 1000 l. a year upon Major-Gen. Skippon, which was accordingly ordered to be paid him out of the receipt at Goldsmith's-Hall (12). As this could not be unknown to Cromwell, he proposed the conference mentioned above, wherein, having taxed Colonel Ludlow with a coldness of behaviour, he added, that he apprehended the Colonel entertained some suspicions of him; and being persuaded the tendency of both their designs was to the advancement of the public service, he desired a meeting might be appointed, when they might freely discover the grounds of their mistakes and misapprehensions, and create a good understanding between them for the future; to which, the Colonel having first told him, that he was not conscious of any change, and that he had troubled him less of late, from a consciousness of the great weight of business he was charged with, assented, and it was agreed they should meet that afternoon, in the council of state: which they did, and withdrew into a private room. Here Cromwell (says the Colonel) endeavoured to persuade me of the necessity incumbent upon him, to do several things that appeared extraordinary in the judgment of some men, who in opposition to him took such courses as would bring ruin upon themselves, as well as him and the public cause, affirming his intentions to be directed entirely to the good of the people, and professing his readiness to sacrifice his life in their service. I freely acknowledged my former dissatisfaction with him and the rest of the army, when they were in treaty with the King, whom (continues our author) I looked upon as the only obstruction to the settlement of the nation; and with their actions at the rendezvous at Ware, where they shot a soldier to death, and imprisoned divers others upon the account of that treaty, which I conceived to have been done without authority, and for sinister ends: yet since they had manifested themselves convinced of those errors, and declared their adherence to the commonwealth; (though too partial a hand was carried both by the Parliament and themselves in distribution of preferments and gratuities, and too much severity exercised against some who had formerly been their friends, and as I hoped would be so still, with other things that I could not entirely approve) I was contented patiently to wait for the accomplishment of those good things which I expected, 'till they had overcome the difficulties they now laboured under, and suppressed their enemies that appeared both at home and abroad against them; hoping that then their principles and interest would lead them to do what was most agreeable to the constitution of a commonwealth, and the good of mankind. He owned my dissatisfaction with the army, while they were in treaty with the King, to be founded upon good reasons, and excused the execution done upon the soldier at the rendezvous, as absolutely necessary to keep things from falling into confusion, which must have ensued upon that division, if it had not been timely prevented. He professed to desire nothing more than that the government of the nation might be settled in a free and equal commonwealth, acknowledging that there was no other probable means to keep out the old family and government from returning upon us; declaring that he looked upon the design of the Lord in this day, to be the freeing of his people from every burden; and that he was now accomplishing what was prophesied in the 110th Psalm. From the consideration of which, he was often encouraged to the effecting those ends, spending at least an hour in the exposition of that Psalm; adding to this, that it was his intention to contribute the utmost of his endeavours to make a thorough reformation of the Clergy and the law: but, said he, the sons of Zeruiah are yet too strong for us, and we cannot mention the reformation of the law, but they presently cry out, we design to destroy property; whereas, the law, as it is now constituted, serves only to maintain the lawyers, and to encourage the rich to oppress the poor. Affirming that Mr Coke, then Chief Justice in Ireland, determined more causes in a week, than Westminster-Hall in a year. Adding further, that Ireland was a clean paper in that particular. And hence, he at last fell upon the military government there, and in the most artful manner pressed Ludlow to take it upon himself (13).

[I] Having lately married and purchased some lands] The lands were the manors of East-Knoel and Upton in Wiltshire, which he purchased of the commissioners appointed for the sale of dean and chapters lands; the money was raised partly by his wife's portion, and a greater sum arising from the sale of part of his patrimonial estate. His motives for making this purchase, he intimates, were to promote the sale of those lands as an advantage to the nation in general, by easing them of some part of their contributions which the publick necessities called for, and was no detriment to any of the purchasers who were heartily engaged in the publick service; since, continues he, if the tide should turn, and our enemies become prevalent, such persons were likely to have no better security for the enjoyment of their own paternal estates. To this may be added another motive, which is, that these lands, as (14) Ibid. p. 122. he tells us himself (14), were sold at ten or twelve years purchase.

the air and provisions of that country, and then entered, with the Lieutenant-General and the other commissioners from England, upon consideration of the administration of justice, pursuant to the instructions sent them from the Parliament. After this, our author went to the army, and signalized himself by his bravery in several actions, the particulars of which he has given in his Memoirs. Upon the death of Ireton, which happened November 26, 1651*, and is much lamented by our author as a real loss to the publick at that juncture † [K], the commissioners of the Parliament immediately sent letters to all the officers of the army, which consisted of upwards of two and twenty thousand foot, and between seven and eight thousand horse and dragoons, to yield obedience to our Lieutenant-General; who, on the commissioners promising to assist him, took upon himself the chief command (u), 'till it should be otherwise determined by the House. He continued still to act with the utmost vigour in the reduction of this kingdom as long as he held this command. In the mean time, he constantly expressed a jealousy of Cromwell's ambitious views [L]; and the following year, Lieutenant-General Fleetwood was appointed in his room [M], as well to prepare the way for Cromwell's intended change, as to lessen our [K] A publick loss.] The plague raging at Limerick when he lay before it, several of the inhabitants fled from the infection into the camp. Two or three of these he ordered to be hanged, and the rest whipped back into the town. Among the last was an old man, whose daughter was destined to die. The father begged to change lots with his child, but was refused. This cruel act Ludlow calls a piece of military justice; and, as a further proof of Ireton's impartiality, produces his suspension of Axtel (15). 'Though, says he, it was not clear that Axtel had promised the prisoners their lives; yet, because it appeared that some of the soldiers had thrown out expressions tending that way to the enemy, the Deputy was so great a friend to justice, even where an enemy was concerned, that though Colonel Axtel was a person extraordinarily qualified for the service of that conjuncture, he suspended him from his employment (16).<sup>1</sup> He tells us also, that the Deputy was wholly disinterested in his views, and only actuated by a true publick spirit; for when the Parliament sent him word that they had ordered an act to settle two thousand pounds a year upon him, it was so unacceptable to him, that he said, They had many just debts which he desired they would pay, before they made any such presents; that he had no need of their land, and therefore would not have it; and that he should be more contented to see them doing the service of the nation, than so liberal in disposing of the publick treasure.

And truly, says the Lieutenant-General, I believe he was in earnest; for as he was always careful to husband those things that belonged to the state to the best advantage, so was he most liberal in employing his own purse and person in the public service (17).<sup>2</sup> Our author also assures us, the Deputy was most indefatigably assiduous in his post, for mentioning his visit to the garrison of Shillalo, he tells us, 'That having passed all places of danger, he left his guard to refresh themselves, but he himself rode so hard, as to spoil many horses;' but, adds he, 'He was so diligent in the publick service, and so careless of every thing that belonged to himself, that he never regarded what cloaths or food he used, or what horse he mounted (18).<sup>3</sup> Nay, Ludlow attributes the Deputy's death to this spirit of assiduity; for having been to reconnoitre proper places to establish garrisons in, for preventing provisions being sent into Galway, then besieged by Sir Charles Coote, and the weather being very severe, 'he took, says my author, a very great cold, that discovered itself immediately upon his return; but, we could not persuade him to go to bed, 'till he had determined a cause that was before him and the court-martial, touching an officer of the army, who was accused of some violence done to the Irish; and as in all cases he carried himself with the utmost impartiality, so he did in this, 'dismissing the officer, though otherwise a useful man, from his command for the same.' Two days after, the Deputy insisted on Lieutenant-General Ludlow's going to good quarters to take care of his health for a day or two, with which he complied, and on his return to Limerick, found the Deputy in a high fever, though he had been bled; 'Yet for all this, (says he) he continued to apply himself to the pulick business, settling garrisons, and distributing winter-quarters, which was all that remained to be done of the military service for that year. I endeavoured (continues our author) to persuade him, as I had often done before, that his immoderate labours for his country, would much impair, if not utterly destroy him; but he had so totally neglected himself during the siege of Limerick, not pulling off his cloaths all that time, except to change his linen, that his body was rendered more liable to receive the contagion. I was unwilling to leave him 'till I saw the event of his distemper; but he supposing my family was by this time come to Dublin, would not permit me to stay, and I finding I could in no way be serviceable to him, submitted to his desires. Soon after my arrival, the sad news of his death was brought to us, which was universally lamented by all good good men, more especially because the publick was thereby deprived of a most faithful, able, and useful servant (19).<sup>4</sup> Archdeacon Echar, though he partly admits our author's character of the Deputy, yet justly stigmatizes him for his sanguinary temper, and his remorseless and cynical behaviour (20).

[L] He expressed a jealousy of Cromwell's ambitious views.] The Parliament in England having incorporated Scotland, Cromwell got an act of indemnity or general amnesty (except to thirty-eight persons therein named) to be passed, for which Lieutenant-General Ludlow inveighs much against him, saying, it was calculated to fortify himself by the addition of new friends, for the carrying on of his designs, and that thereby many persons escaped the punishment due to their misdemeanors; and the commonwealth was defrauded of great sums of money.<sup>5</sup>

[M] Lieutenant-General Fleetwood was appointed in his room.] Our author tells us (21), that Mr Weaver, one of the commissioners for Ireland, being over here, and in the House during this debate, was very instrumental in the opposing any person's being sent to Ireland with the title of Lord-Deputy, which Cromwell had insisted was absolutely necessary, to keep the people in due subordination, particularly the army, which he insisted would not be satisfied unless their chief went over so qualified; but Mr Weaver assured them, that, upon his knowledge, all the sober people of Ireland, and the whole army there, except a few factious persons, were not only well satisfied with the present government both civil and military of that nation, but also with the governors who managed the same; he therefore moved that they would make no alteration in either, but renew the commissions of those already there for a longer time. 'This discourse of Mr Weaver (says our author) tending to persuade the Parliament to continue me in the military command, increased the jealousy which General Cromwell had conceived of me, that I might prove an obstruction to the design he was carrying on to advance himself by the ruin of the commonwealth. And therefore, since Major-General Lambert refused to go over with any character less than that of Deputy, he resolved by any means to place Lieutenant-General Fleetwood at the head of affairs in Ireland. By which conduct he procured two great advantages to himself, thereby putting the army in Ireland into the hands of a person secured to his interest by the marriage of his daughter; and drawing Major-General Lambert into an enmity towards the Parliament, prepared him to join with him in opposition to them, when he should find it convenient to put his design in execution (22).<sup>6</sup>

- (w) Ibid. p. 159. author's power, of whose opposition to his designs the usurper was very jealous (w). But while these things were transacting in England, Ludlow was very active in suppressing those Irish, who still continued in arms; and was thus employed in the county of Fermagh, when he received advice, that Fleetwood having landed at Waterford, was gone to Kilkenny; thither he hastened to attend him with the rest of the commissioners, who for that purpose set out from Dublin (x); to which city Ludlow returned with them, after he had saluted the commander in chief, and assured him he was resolved to obey his orders, and he was soon followed by Fleetwood and his family (y). The war in Ireland being now ended, a commission was issued out by the commander in chief, for the tryals of those who had, in the first year of the rebellion, or at any time since, murdered any of the English; which being done, the commissioners next entered into methods for satisfying the arrears of the army, and settling the adventurers in the forfeited lands, in order to repopulate and improve the country, which the war had almost made desolate; the method they took did not entirely satisfy Ludlow, who censures their conduct as not sufficiently impartial. They also disbanded 5000 horse and foot, and reduced the pay of the general and other officers; which reduction, he says, fell heavier upon him than on others, as his expences were obliged to be higher, in respect of his post of Lieutenant-General of the horse, than the rest of the commissioners; so that he spent upwards of 4500 pounds in the four years of his service there, out of his own proper estate, over and above all his pay (z). His arrears, together with those of his regiment, were allotted to be satisfied out of lands in the county of Wexford, where he ordered some of his officers to act for him; and he received 100 pounds the first year, and 200 pounds for the second, and he says it was reported to be capable of further improvements; but as he never saw it, none was made whilst in his possession. These affairs were settling in Ireland, whilst Oliver was paving his way, by dissolving the Long Parliament and cajoling the Council of Officers, in order to play the supreme power into his own hands; which, considering the variety and multiplicity of obstacles, he effectuated in an exceeding short period. The news of the change reaching Ireland soon after his dissolving the Long Parliament, those who were of the republican party flattered themselves, that; whatever might be the practices, principles, or pretences, of him and his party, yet that there were too many on the other side; and that the Commonwealth's men would by their steadiness convince them, how very foolish it would be for any one to set up for himself: they therefore continued still to act in their places and respective stations as before (a). But when Cromwell had again dissolved that shadow of a representative of the nation, which, though by many stiled a Parliament, our author would never call more than a convention, and had taken upon himself the title and office of Protector, Ludlow resolved, to the utmost of his power, to oppose what he esteemed so flagrant an usurpation on the liberties of the people, or at least not to do any thing that might contribute to the strengthening of it (b); and therefore used his utmost endeavours to prevent Cromwell's being proclaimed in Ireland; but without success (c). Hereupon, he refused to act any longer in a civil capacity, as a commissioner of the Parliament; yet having received his military commission of Lieutenant-General of the Horse from the Parliament, he resolved to keep it as long as he could, and to act under it, in order to obtain those ends, the principal of which, says he, were to bring those to justice, who had been guilty of the blood of many thousands of English Protestants (d), and to restore to the remaining English the lands which the Irish had disposed them of. Henry Cromwell being soon after sent by his father to Ireland (e), Ludlow received and entertained him at his house (which was near the sea-side where he landed), and also invited him to make use of it on his going back to England. This being accepted, our author entered into a friendly conversation with him on the great revolution, which, though it so highly concerned the nation, had been clandestinely carried on, and huddled up by two or three persons (f). Not long after the return of Henry Cromwell to England, there appeared much disaffection in the army, some of whom signed a petition to the Protector; three hundred copies of which, together with another writing called the Memento, were sent in a box directed to Ludlow in Ireland, accompanied with a short unsubscribed letter. These, on perusal, appeared to him to contain proper motives to excite people to endeavour at rescuing themselves from the oppressions they laboured under; and accordingly he dispersed as many as he could, in which Captain Walcot, one of his officers, was very assisting to him; Lieutenant-Colonel Brayfield and Major Davis were also acquainted with this design, to the latter of whom, who was then at Dublin, but whose usual residence was in Connaught, he sent some of the papers, that they might be dispersed in that province by his means: but he acquainting Roberts with it, this last informed Fleetwood of the affair, who, after examining Brayfield and Davis thereupon, dispatched a messenger to Moncktown to enquire into the truth. The Deputy * sent for our author, and, after some conference about the papers, told him he had received an order from Cromwell some months ago, signifying that, as he had declared himself dissatisfied with the present government, he, the Deputy, should take care that his charge in the army might be managed some other way; adding that he had hitherto concealed it, but could not any longer, lest he should be accounted his confederate in the distribution of those papers (g). meeting, may be seen in the note [N]. After having refused all expedients proposed for an amicable conciliation of matters, the Deputy sent our author word, that he might make his option, whether he would be confined in Ireland or go to London; which, if he would give his word to appear before Cromwell, and not act any thing against him in the mean time, he should be at liberty to do; upon which he chose the latter, but was desired to defer his journey for a couple of months, under pretence, that matters not being quite easy in England, Cromwell might be reduced on his arrival to treat him with more severity than he would chuse; ordering him, at the same time, a sum of money for his support during his stay, and also to defray the expences of his voyage. But, before the expiration of the two months, Henry Cromwell arrived in Ireland to take the government upon him, and our author's departure was deferred from time to time, 'till having, by the intercession of his wife, obtained a promise from that governour, that, though he would not grant a warrant for her husband to go, yet neither would he order him to stay, though he thought this last would be best for him, he determined at all events to set off, which he accordingly did, accompanied to the shore by near two hundred people, and embarked (having left a letter for Colonel Cromwell to be delivered the next day about noon) between two and three o'clock, and the next day at noon arrived in Beaumaris harbour (b). (b) Id. p. 255.

The Governour met him at his landing the next day, and furnished horses to carry himself and family to the town; and after dinner informed him, in the civilest manner he could, that one Captain Shaw was arrived from Ireland, with an order from Colonel Cromwell, and the rest of the council there, for the detention of him 'till the Protector's pleasure was known; at the same time introducing Shaw, and producing the order signed by Colonel Cromwell, Corbet, and two others. In the evening he was conveyed to a widow's house in the town, where a guard was set over him, a centinel being placed at the stair-head. Here he remained six weeks, and had once a very narrow escape from being sent to the castle, in consequence of a fresh order from Whitehall [O]; but at last Captain Shaw brought

[N] The effects of this meeting may be seen in the note. The Deputy having made the above declaration, Lieutenant General Ludlow replied, 'That if his life as well as his employment lay at stake, he durst not have omitted what he thought to be his duty: that having no power to dispute their pleasure, he should at that present look upon it to be a law, to which he must submit.' He was however permitted to return to his house. 'Some time after, says he, Mr Benjamin Worfeley was sent to acquaint me, that Lieutenant-General Fleetwood had been in expectation of hearing from me, touching my submission to the order he shewed me, either by letter, or the surrender of my commission. I answered, that I thought neither of them necessary; and hoped, that my retirement into my own country, which I suddenly designed, might be sufficient. But it was determined I should not so easily quit the public stage. For next morning I was desired to attend the Lieutenant-General, which accordingly I did, and found eight or ten of his advisers with him. The design of their meeting was to persuade me either to deliver up my commission, or to engage under my hand, not to act by virtue of it, 'till I should first receive commission so to do from Cromwell, or from Fleetwood. To the first I answered, that I durst not deliver up my commission to any other power save that of the Parliament, who had intrusted me with it; and that it was all I had to justify me for doing many things wherein the lives of men had been concerned. To the second, I could by no means consent, because I could not tie my own hands from acting by virtue of it, when I should be justly called upon so to do. Being returned to my house, doubtful what the event of this contest might be, and desirous to have good advice before I proceeded any farther, I sent to four or five officers of whose integrity I had a good opinion, to ask their judgment in the case. The result of our conference was, that I should, in a letter to Fleetwood, state the justice of my call to the employment whereof I was possessed, and the conditions on which I received my commission, being particularly solicited to it by Cromwell himself, when he appeared in the shape of a commonwealth's man; the authority that gave me my commission; the present defection from that authority and common cause, which Cromwell, as well as I, had engaged to maintain; the duty incumbent upon me to disperse the said books, because the substance of my dissatisfactions were contained in them; withal to declare what I would be satisfied with, if it might be attained; and if that could not be, how far I thought myself obliged to submit (23).' This was done pursuant to the advice, but all the return was, that Cromwell had sent a new order for him either to deliver up his commission or to be secured. Fleetwood sent this order to our author by Miles Corbet, who laboured to induce him to comply, but received an answer in writing to carry back to the Deputy, intimating that the commission was of no more danger in his own hands, than if cancelled at the head of the army; but having received it from the Parliament, to act as their officer in the execution of justice on the murderers and oppressors of the English Protestants, he was not willing by a voluntary submission to own the justice of the present order for depriving him of it. Adding, that if he had even received it immediately from the General himself, he should not be willing to part with it for his pleasure in that conjuncture; since that could be nothing less than betraying that cause, which he, in conjunction with the army, had contended for: especially, if he, who had been honoured with an employment in a war, raised for the defence of liberty against the arbitrary power of a single person, should voluntarily submit to what was proposed. For since the whole authority in the three nations was assumed by the army, if I, says he, should acknowledge the entire disposal of all things relating to that army to reside in the General, what would this be, but to declare my consent to give up the power of the Parliament, army, and nation, into his hands (24)? However, in order to avoid extremities, he offered, that if they would call a council of the officers who were about Dublin; and they, upon a full debate of the matter, should be of opinion it was his duty, he would submit as to the higher powers, he having none to appeal to from them then, but God: but this was not approved.

[O] From being sent to the castle, in consequence of a fresh order from Whitehall The order was to this effect. That whereas Lieutenant-General Ludlow was stolen out of Ireland, the Governour of Beaumaris should take care to keep him in strict and safe custody, and not permit any to speak with him (25). On the receipt of this, 'The Governour (says our author) resolving to make his fortune by any means, proposed to imprison me in the castle, the air of which place is so unhealthy, that the soldiers dare not lodge there; and it is observed, that few prisoners who have been confined there, have ever recovered from the distempers they contracted. I told him, that being in his power, I could not resist; but the warrant requiring no such thing, a time might come to call him to account for what he now did. Whereupon he thought fit to let me remain at my lodgings, but permitted no man to come to me except my own servants, and of those, not above two (26).' On Captain Shaw's arrival with the engagement, some persons advised the signing it, either with a reserve of brought an order for his discharge, provided he signed an engagement sent ready drawn from London, never to act against the government then established. This he absolutely refused to sign, unless under certain explanations, which at last the Governor agreed to accept; and he was thereupon discharged, and set forwards for London, where he arrived the tenth of December 1655. On Wednesday the twelfth (having waited on Fleetwood the night of his arrival) (i) he received a message from Cromwell to attend him at Whitehall, whither he went about eight in the evening, and found the Protector in his chamber with Lambert, Colonel Sydenham, Mr Walter Strickland, and Colonel Montague; and soon after, Fleetwood coming in, there ensued a long discourse, which, as it clearly shews the difference between Cromwell and our author, is inserted below [P]. This of the explanations, or a protest as done in drefs; to both which our author replied, he thought it below a man to be compelled to any act against his conscience, with an intention to violate the same; and as to reserving any explanations to himself, as it was against his principles, so it was contrary to his practice: and when Colonel John Jones, and Colonel Sadler came to let him know the Governor was willing to discharge him on signing it after his own way; he desired the Governor not to do any thing out of respect to him, that might not consist with the duty of his place, or prove to be to his prejudice, his explanation being in his opinion, an absolute repeal of the engagement, as soon as he had rendered himself above. The Governor replying he had considered it, and was willing to accept it signed on his own terms, the Lieutenant-General drew up his explanation in the following words. 'I look upon this engagement now tendered to me for my subscription by the Governor of Beaumaris, by order from &c. to be no longer of any force than 'till I have rendered myself a prisoner at Whitehall, and in that sense only I subscribe it (27).' And having made two copies of it, each attested by Jones and Sadler, he delivered one signed to the Governor, with the engagement, and kept the other himself. If the arguments used on both sides during this struggle between Cromwell and our author, are examined with ever so little attention, it will be found that each party, rather impeached, than justified their past conduct, with respect to King Charles and his adherents; since both the Oliverians and Ludlow agree, it was right for any one to act under what he thought a lawful authority; and it would be too great a breach of charity to imagine all who drew their swords in behalf of the King and the Church, when the avowed design of their adversaries was the destruction of both, fought only for mercenary views, against the dictates of their conscience. That many were actuated by a thirst after power, and a desire of revenge, may readily be granted; but then it will take in nearly the same number on both sides, with Oliver Cromwell at the head of one; but this does not seem to be our author's case, either in the beginning, during the progress, or after the conclusion of the war: he appears always inflexibly the same, animated by the love, and steady in the pursuit of what he thought conducive to the liberty of mankind; fixed in his principles, and unreserved in his sentiments; and however he might be mistaken, acting with great integrity, as will be shewn very strongly in the next note.

[P] Which, as it clearly shews the difference between them, is inserted below.] 'The first salute I received from him [Cromwell] says our author, was to tell me, that I had not dealt fairly with him, in making him to believe I had signed an engagement not to act against him, and yet reserving an explanation, whereby I made void that engagement; which if it had not been made known to him, he might have relied upon my promise, and so have been engaged in blood before he was aware. I told him, I knew not why he should look on me to be so considerable; neither could I apprehend how it could have been possible for me to deal more fairly and openly with him than I had done: for I had told his Governor at Beaumaris, that if my life as well as my liberty had been at stake, I could not sign the engagement simply, and therefore had resolved to continue there, had not the Governor himself expressed a desire to accept of my subscription with that explanation. And because I accounted it to be in effect a repeal of that engagement, I had told him so, and desired him to do nothing out of respect to me, that consisted not with his duty; notwithstanding which, the Governor told me he was free to accept my subscription, so that I knew not but that he might have received intructions so to do. No, said Cromwell, he had none from me. That was more, said I, than I knew; and if you had not notice as well of the one as the other, it was not my fault, for I had acquainted you with neither; and those who informed you of the one, I presumed had made you acquainted with the other also. He then objected to me, that I was stolen from Ireland without leave: to which I made answer, that though I knew no cause why I should be detained in Ireland, or obliged to ask leave to depart; yet to avoid all pretence of exception against me, I had taken care even to procure that too, as far as it was possible, having a passport for England from Lieutenant-General Fleetwood, the chief officer of Ireland, with the advice of Mr Corbet, one of his council, for my coming, and his son Harry's promise not to obstruct me in my journey. He next asked me, wherefore I would not engage not to act against the present government, telling me, that if Nero were in power, it would be my duty to submit. To which I replied, that I was ready to submit; and could truly say, that I knew not of any design against him. But, said I, if providence should open a way, and give an opportunity of appearing in behalf of the people, I cannot consent to tie my own hands beforehand, and oblige myself not to lay hold of it. However, said he, it is not reasonable to suffer one that I distrust to come within my house, 'till he assure me he will do me no mischief. I told him I was not accustomed to go to any house unless I expected to be welcome; neither had I come hither but upon a message from him, and that I desired nothing but a little liberty to breathe in the air, to which I conceived I had an equal right with other men. He then fell bitterly to inveigh against Major Wildman, as the author of the petition from the army—reviling him with unhandsome language, and saying he deserved to be hanged; and that he must secure me also, if I would not oblige myself never to act against him. I told him I had gone as far as I could in that engagement which I had given to Lieutenant-General Fleetwood; and if that were not thought sufficient, I resolved with God's assistance to suffer any extremities that might be imposed upon me. Yes, said he, we know your resolution well enough, and we have cause to be as stout as you; but, I pray, who spoke of your suffering? Sir, said I, if I am not deceived, you mentioned the securing my person. Yea, said he, and great reason there is why we should do so; for I am ashamed to see that engagement you have given to the Lieutenant-General, which would be more fit for a General that should be taken prisoner, and that hath yet an army of thirty thousand men in the field, than for one in your condition. I answered, that it was as much as I could consent to give, and what Lieutenant-General Fleetwood thought fit to accept. Then beginning to carry himself more calmly, he said, that he had been always ready to do me what good offices he could, and that he wished me as well as he did any one of his council, desiring me to make choice of some place to be in where I might have good air. I assured him, that my dissatisfactions were not grounded upon any animosity against his person; and that if my own father were alive, and in his place, I doubted not but that they would be altogether as great. He acknowledged, that I had always carried myself fairly and openly to him, and protested that he had never given me just cause to act otherwise. When Cromwell had finished his discourse, some of those who were present began to make their observations, and in particular Colonel Mountague thought it

This conversation being over, he was desired to withdraw into the next room, where Fleetwood soon came to him, and laboured hard to bring him to enter into an engagement though but for a week; to which he replied, he would not willingly do it for an hour: Fleetwood would then have had him engagè himself afresh to him, but this he also refused, saying, he had already gone as far as he possibly could, looking upon himself to be sufficiently obliged, by the conditions of his present engagement, and having so said, returned to his lodging. Soon after this, he endeavoured to draw Major-General Harrison, and the famous Hugh Peters over to his opinion. So that the Protector finding it necessary to call another Parliament, and being very apprehensive a majority, in spite of all his care, might be returned of those who were against him and his schemes, resolved at all events to hinder Ludlow from either standing himself, or in any way intermeddling in the election: and to that end summoned him (together with Bradshaw, Sir Henry Vane, and Colonel Rich) to appear before the Council at Whitehall. Here he was again charged with dispersing treasonable papers in Ireland, and endeavouring to corrupt the officers of the army by discoursing about a new government, and with encouraging a clandestine correspondence carrying on by his party with Spain; and requested to give security in the sum of five thousand pounds, that he would not act against Cromwell: which unless he did he was threatened to be secured. He owned and justified the dispersing of the papers, said he did not know it was criminal to debate about the several forms of government, refused to give security, and said he was very ready to submit to a legal tryal, if he had done any thing amiss, only desiring to enjoy what he and all had fought for, a free government by consent; that it was from the duty he owed the publick he refused to give the security required, conceiving it to be against the liberty of the people, and contrary to the known law of England; in proof of which he produced the act of the 16th and 17th of Charles the First, for preventing the Council-table from imprisoning any of the free-born people of England, asserting, that for his part he durst not do any act tending to the violation of it. Cromwell asked, if the Council of State and Army had not committed many; to which he replied, the Council of State had the authority of Parliament, and the Army did it only in time of war, and in both cases to secure persons that they might be brought to a legal tryal. To this Cromwell returned with some warmth, 'A Justice of Peace may commit, and shall not I?' He is a legal officer, answered our author, and authorized by the law to do so, which you could not be though you were King; because if you do wrong, there is no remedy can be had against you (k). He desired, therefore, to be referred to a Justice of the Peace, if he had offended against the law, that he might be proceeded with according to law. Upon this he was ordered to withdraw into an adjoining room, and presently after received permission to return to his lodging, whither, in less than a quarter of an hour, he was followed by Mr Strickland, one of the Council, who pressed him earnestly to comply; but he told him, 'That having contended for the liberty of others, he was not willing to give away his own, and be made a precedent to the pre-judice of his countrymen.' A messenger from the Board serving him with an order to give in the security within three days, on pain of being taken into custody, put an end to their conversation, and he not obeying the order, Serjeant Dendy, a day or two after, brought a warrant signed by Henry Lawrence, the President, to apprehend him. Some of his relations discoursed with the Serjeant *, who thereupon left him in his own lodgings; and Cromwell, the next day, meeting his brother Thomas Ludlow, proposed his engaging for the Lieutenant-General, which was agreed to very readily by the brother, but without our author's consent. However, after this he went into Essex, where he spent the remaining part of the summer, which, he says, fully answered the Protector's intention to prevent him from going down into Wiltshire during the elections in 1657; and, indeed, he had no inclination thereto, though he was nominated for Knight of the Shire by many of his friends. Our author staid in Essex 'till Oliver was seized with his last sickness, when, coming to town, Fleetwood was directed to enquire the reason of his coming at that critical season; to whom he gave satisfaction on that head, the chief motive of his journey being to fetch his mother and his father-in-law into the country, that the family might be altogether. Upon Oliver's death, which happened two days after,

'worthy his notice, that I had intimated, If Providence should offer an occasion, I was ready to act against the present Government; but the rest of the company seemed ashamed of what he said. Major-General Lambert then desired to know from me, why I could not own this as a lawful government? Because, said I, it seems to me to be in substance a re-establishment of that which we all engaged against, and had with great expence of blood and treasure abolished. What then, said he, would you account a sufficient warrant to act against the present authority? I answered, when I might rationally hope to be supported by an authority equal or superior to this, and could be persuaded that the said authority would employ it's power for the good of mankind. But who shall be judge of that, said he? for all are ready to say they do so, and we ourselves think we use the best of our endeavors to that end. I replied, that if they did so their crime was the less, because every man stands obliged to govern himself by the light of his own reason, which rule, with the assistance of God, I was determined to observe. Colonel Sydenham said, we might be mistaken in judging that to be a power giving us a just and rational call to act, which may not be so. I told him, that we ought to be very careful and circumspect in that particular, and at least be assured of very probable grounds to believe the power under which we engaged, sufficiently able able to protect us in our undertaking; otherwise, I should account myself not only guilty of my own blood, but also, in some measure, of the ruin and destruction of all those that I should induce to engage with me, though the cause were never so just (28).'

his son Richard being declared Protector, a new Parliament was called, wherein several of the republican party being returned, to prevent their doing any mischief an oath was required from every member, that he would not act or contrive any thing against the Protector, which Ludlow scrupling to take, refrained for some time from going to the House, 'till Sir Walter St John (one of those appointed to administer that oath) introducing him, he was admitted without taking it. He had sat but little above a week, when he was complained of, and a motion made and seconded, that the oath might be peremptorily required; on which a debate arose, which, after lasting two or three hours, was put a stop to by an accidental discovery of a person's sitting there who was no member, and who, upon examination, proved to be disordered in his senses (l); this put an end to all further enquiry about the oath. And now those of the republican interest exerted their utmost endeavours to obstruct the measures of the Court, but without success, 'till they joined with the party of Wallingford-house, that is the Army †; by which means the Long Parliament, called the Rump Parliament, was restored, and our author, who had been very active in obtaining this revolution, took, with the rest, possession of his seat again (m). The same day they appointed him one of the Committee of Safety, which consisted of seven members of Parliament, and one other who was not so; which committee were empowered to sit eight days, the House intending in that time to constitute a Council of State (n). Soon after they offered our author a regiment, which he accepted at the persuasion of Sir Arthur Haslerig (o); and, in a little time, they named him to be one of the Council of State, every member of which was to swear, he would be true and faithful to the Commonwealth, in opposition to Charles Stuart, or any single person (p). Notwithstanding the House had appointed Fleetwood, Lambert, Desborough, and other officers of the army, to be of the Council of State, the Wallingford-house party were far from being satisfied; wherefore, to prevent any ill consequences, and hinder the sword as far as they could from re-assuming the power, a bill was brought in for constituting Fleetwood, Sir Arthur Haslerig, Lambert, Desborough, Berry, and Ludlow, commissioners for naming and approving officers: and another, for making Fleetwood commander in chief during that session, or 'till the House should make further order therein. In which bill it was ordered, that, for the future, the Speaker, and not the Lieutenant-General, should sign the commissions of such officers as should be appointed by Parliament, and deliver them with his own hands from the chair; and, at the same time that these two bills were passed, the House passed a vote, that the Parliament should be dissolved the May following. But this vote was not sufficient to please the officers, who were so highly disgusted at the two bills, that our author and others of his party were obliged to give them a meeting at Colonel Desborough's to soften the affair: and though every thing was urged on behalf of the Parliament, that the Lieutenant-General and his friend Sir-Arthur could think of, yet the officers would not consent to receive new commissions according as the bill directed, until Colonel Hacker and our author, by leading the way with their regiments, rendered the rest more tractable. The Wallingford-house party finding by this, that Ludlow was an obstacle to their design of governing arbitrarily by the sword, recommended him to the House for the post of commander in chief of the forces in Ireland; which, with some reluctance, and after obtaining an order, that, when he had settled affairs in that kingdom, he should be at liberty to return to England, he accepted. Soon after which, Henry Cromwell, pursuant to an order of the House, returned from Ireland, and desired the Lieutenant-General to be at the Council of State when he attended them; but our author could not, being employed in preventing the sale of Hampton-court, for which he was much blamed by some of his party. The time for his departure for Ireland drawing near, he received from the Speaker four commissions; the first appointing him Commander in Chief; the second, Colonel of a Regiment of Horse; the third gave him the command of a regiment of Foot; and, by the fourth, he was again constituted Lieutenant-General of the Horse: in which last a clause was inserted, not in any of the others, that he should not only obey such orders as he might receive from the Parliament and the Council of State, but also those of the Commissioners for Ireland. This (says he) I was so far from disliking, that I procured another order to be made, that the pay of the army should be issued out by the Commissioners, and that no money, except only for contingencies, should be issued out by the Commander in Chief (q). On the road to Chester, he received information of Sir George Booth's insurrection, which he immediately dispatched advice of to the House; and embarking at Holy-head, arrived safe in Dublin in August 1659. Immediately on his arrival at Dublin, he dispatched 100 men to reinforce the garrisons about Chester, and soon after sent, pursuant to an order from Fleetwood, a thousand foot and five hundred horse, under the command of Colonel Zanche, to assist in quelling Sir George Booth and his party (r). In September 1659, he received a petition from England, drawn up and signed by the forces under Lambert at Derby, greatly complaining of the conduct of the Parliament, requesting the government to be settled by a representative and select senate, demanding that Fleetwood's commission might be unlimited as to time, and that Lambert might be appointed Major-General, Desborough Lieutenant-General of the Horse, and Monk Major-General of the Foot, insisting that no officer should be dismissed from his command but by a court-martial; copies of which petition were sent to Ireland by Zanche, who commanded the Irish brigade, with letters to communicate them to the officers there, and obtain their concurrence. This alarmed Lieutenant-General Ludlow greatly; greatly; wherefore, to prevent the ill effects it might produce, he summoned all the officers who lay near Dublin, at which assembly he managed matters so well, that he brought them unanimously to declare their dislike of the petition, and to agree to have a declaration drawn up to that effect, and to declare their resolution of adhering closely to the Parliament, of which our author gave immediate notice to Sir Arthur Haslerig. At the same time he began to think of returning home; in order to which, having nominated Colonel John Jones and Sir Hardress Waller to command during his absence, as soon as he received Fleetwood's approbation thereof, he set out for England. On his arrival at Beaumaris he received an account from the Governor, that the Army had turned the Parliament out of the House, and again resumed the power into their own hands. This astonishing news made him hesitate, whether he should return to Ireland, or pursue his journey to London; but after weighing circumstances carefully, and considering on one hand, that he had taken all the care he possibly could to settle things on a good footing there; and that, on the other hand, he might, perhaps, contribute towards a reconciliation, between the Parliament and Army, he determined for the latter, and accordingly set forwards. At Conway he was met by Colonel Barrow, who had been dispatched from the Council of Officers at London, to acquaint those in Ireland with the alteration of affairs; and having read the letters he brought, our author delivered those for the officers in Ireland to him again, and continued his journey to Chester, where he halted a day. There he received another packet from London, wherein he found the Army's scheme of government, pursuant to what they had set forth in their petition, with the addition, that all who had any military command were to receive new commissions from Fleetwood; and the messenger further acquainted him, that there was a Committee of Safety appointed, consisting of twenty-one members, of which he was one, and that he was also continued one of the Committee for nomination of officers. The day after he received this advice, he set out for London, where he arrived on Friday the 29th of October, 1659 (s), and immediately went to wait on Fleetwood, but refused to go with him to the Council of Officers, then sitting at Wallingford-house, on some letters from Monk, whom Fleetwood charged with insincerity, our author told him, that whatever Monk's designs were, his publick declarations had a better appearance than those of Wallingford-house, who were for governing by the sword. When this party prevailed both in the Council of Officers and that of State, to have a new Parliament called, our author opposed it with all his might, in defence of the Rump, and when a new Parliament was determined on, he proposed to qualify the power of the Army by a council of twenty-one, to be chosen by the Council of Officers, who should settle the differences, when any arose between the Army and the Parliament, under the denomination of the Conservators of Liberty; which being agreed to, he gave in a list of persons to be chosen, and they proceeded to ballot upon it: but here, breaking in upon the rule they had established, and putting many persons names to the ballot which were not contained in his list, our author grew impatient, and told them openly, that seeing they intended only to carry on a faction, and govern the nation by the sword, he would have no more to do with them. The city of London was in some confusion at this time, occasioned by the apprentices petitioning the Aldermen and Common-Council for a free Parliament, which had brought the military power to take possession of that capital; but the magistrates applying to the Council of Officers to be relieved, and to have the guards withdrawn, six of that council, of which number they constrained our author to be one, were appointed to meet them at Whitehall; at this meeting, Lieutenant-General Ludlow earnestly dissuaded the Londoners from joining with the Royalists; at which, he says, divers of them seemed much surprized, because they had taken other resolutions. Our author, therefore, seeing every thing going into confusion, resolved to go to his post in Ireland, and acquainted Lieutenant-General Fleetwood with his intention, and also went to take his leave of the principal officers, but found they had altered their minds about calling a new Parliament, on receiving advice, that the fleet had unanimously declared for the old one. This made him delay his journey a little while, but the officers varied again from that determination the same afternoon; whereupon, he fully resolved to set out the next day, which he accordingly did, but had the satisfaction to know before he left London, that it was at last carried to restore the old Parliament (u), which was done two or three days after [2]. While Ludlow was on the road to Chester in his way to Ireland, he received from his brother-in-law, Kempson, an account of the posture of affairs in Ireland, which made him hasten his journey; but, on his arrival in Bullock's-bay, not thinking it proper to land till he had received a full information

[2] Which was done in a day or two after.] This circumstance we learn from a letter, said by our author (29) to be sent to him, while besieged in Duncannon Fort, from the council of officers in Dublin, wherein it is made a part of their charge against him, that when he found he could do no more in opposition to the Parliament, he had refused to wait their sitting, and had departed for Ireland a day or two before their restitution; which fixes the time of his setting out for Ireland, to the 24th or 25th of December 1659, the Rump Parliament as then called, being restored to the freedom of their house the 26th of that month (30);

Lieutenant General Fleetwood, on finding himself deserted, having sent the keys to the Speaker, with notice that the guards were withdrawn, and that the members might attend the discharge of their duty (31). At the same time Lieutenant-Colonel Miller, who was in possession of the Tower, sent the Speaker word, that he and his garrison, were ready to receive his orders; and the forces in and about the town after being mustered in Lincoln's-Inn Fields, likewise declared for the Parliament, marched through Chancery-Lane, and saluted the Speaker as their General (32).

information of things, he sent a letter of notice of his arrival to Sir Hardres Waller and the other officers, acquainting them with the restitution of the Parliament (which they had declared for), and that he was come to join with them in support of their authority. Mr Kempson and other officers came on board to the Lieutenant-General, and the former informed him, that things were in a much worse state than they were when he wrote last to him, and that the Council of Officers would not receive him. And the next day our author was told by one of his servants, that those at Dublin, as soon as they heard of his arrival, had sent a party of horse to seize him at his house, who not finding him there, had concealed themselves in ambush to take him on his landing. He also received a message from Dublin by Captain Lucas, who acquainted him with the resolution of their Council of Officers concerning him. Finding the passage to Dublin barred against him, he set sail for Duncannon, where he had placed one Captain Skynner as commander, in whom he had great confidence, and who did not deceive him, but, with the whole garrison, received him with the utmost demonstrations of joy. The Lieutenant-General having been informed at Passage about a league from Duncannon, that the Governor of Waterford had promised to adhere to him on his arrival, immediately sent him notice, that he was come to Duncannon, and took all care to victual and recruit his little garrison; he also wrote to the garrisons of Ross, Wexford, Cork, and Kinsale, encouraging them to persevere in their duty to the Parliament, and revictualled his man of war with beef and other necessaries, which he procured from his own estate of Ballymagger. He had scarce finished these cautionary steps, when he was blocked up by a party of horse under the command of Colonel Edmund Temple. Whilst this siege, or rather blockade, was carrying on, our author received a long letter from the Council at Dublin, wherein they laid many things to his charge, in order to injure his reputation; the principal of which were, that, on the interruption of the Parliament by the Wallingford-house party, instead of returning to his duty in Ireland, he had continued his journey to London; that he had encouraged Colonel John Jones in his correspondence with the Army party in England; refused to wait the sitting of the Parliament on their late restitution; and posted away to Ireland, in order to serve the Army by his interest there; and that finding Dublin secured for the Parliament, by those who obeyed their orders and would obey him as Commander in Chief, if the Parliament thought fit to continue him in that post, he had not only refused to return to England till their pleasure was known in that respect, but had endeavoured, by all hostile means, to get the power into his hands, at the same time neglecting his duty in Parliament, which honour they pretended his miscarriages had rendered him incapable of. To this long and heavy charge he wrote a very full answer; but, before he had sent it away, he received an account, that the Parliament had acknowledged all that those at Dublin had done was for their service; and, in about a week after, received a letter sent from thence, signed William Lenthall, requiring him (as they had also required Jones and Corbet the two other commissioners) to attend the Parliament with an account of the Irish affairs; which request he resolved to comply with the very first opportunity, and accordingly embarked on board a Dutch vessel, having first given positive orders to Captain Skynner not to deliver up the fort of Duncannon, unless they were directed so to do by the Parliament or himself. Soon after his arrival at Milford-Comb, he found by the publick news, that Sir Charles Coote had exhibited a charge of high-treason against him (w), which made him quicken his diligence to reach London. Arriving there, he first went to consult and expostulate with Sir Arthur Haslerig, and then took his place in the House, and got a copy of his charge: he then moved to be heard upon that head, but could only prevail to have a day appointed for that purpose; but on that day was again put off, so that he never could be heard thereupon. This motion was made by Ludlow on the first of February, 1660, according to our present reformation of style; two days after which, Colonel (afterwards General) Monk marched into London, and was waited on by our author the same evening [R]. The commission for lodging the command

[R] General Monk was waited on by our author the same evening.] Lieutenant-General Ludlow, after giving an account of the mutiny at Somerset-House, on the forces being ordered to remove from London to make way for General Monk and his army, and the appeasing that tumult, goes on thus: 'The following day Monk marched to London at the head of his party, which for the most part were quartered about Whitehall, where lodgings had been provided for him: and immediately some members of Parliament were sent to congratulate his arrival. The same evening I met Vice-Admiral Lawson at Sir Henry Mildmay's lodgings at Whitehall, and knowing him to be familiarly acquainted with Monk, I desired that we might make him a visit together, which he readily consented to. We found him alone in the Prince's lodgings; where having congratulated the success of his attempt to restore the Parliament to the exercise of their authority, I took the freedom to tell him, that having an opportunity put into his hands to free these nations from the danger of being

'oppressed, as they had lately been, by the power of the sword, I hoped he would improve it to the public advantage, by giving his assistance to the Parliament in settling the government upon so just a foundation, that it might be supported for the future by the love and affections of the people. He answered, that as God had owned him in his work, so he desired that he alone might have the glory: that it was true factions had been carried on; but that he was fully resolved to promote the interest of a Commonwealth. Which resolution, when I had commended and encouraged him as well as I could to continue, he said, We must live and die for and with a Commonwealth. Then I told him, that I had met lately with one Mr Courtney, who said he was his relation, and having drunk too much at the inn where I lay in my way to London, boasted that his cousin Monk would do great things for the King; but that upon my objecting his publick declarations and protestations to the contrary, he began to doubt, and said, that his cousin being a man of honour he feared he would command of the forces in England and Scotland in seven persons being near expiration, a new act was made to vest it in five, any three of them to be a quorum, of which Colonel Monk was the first; but our author was left out, notwithstanding he obtained the command of the forces in Ireland to be inserted in the said commission. This step gave some umbrage to General Monk; whereupon our author made him a visit, in order to settle matters between them, and to efface any ill impressions the General might have received against our author or his party, and thought he had succeeded; but finding soon after, that matters were tending apace to overturn his darling scheme, a Commonwealth Government, he applied to Sir Arthur Haslerig to draw their scattered forces together, in order to oppose Monk and his confederates; but Sir Arthur would not listen to the proposal. News arriving shortly after from Ireland, that Sir Charles Coote had seized the castle of Dublin, and not only expelled Sir Hardress Waller from thence, but likewise removed him and several others from their command in the army, he advised Sir Arthur to adjourn the Parliament to the Tower, and to draw their troops together; but was again answered by him, that all would be well, and that Monk would be honest, even after he had seen the London populace, by his encouragement, burn the Rump, as they then called the remains of the Long Parliament, whose power was openly contemned, and whose very name was grown odious to the majority of the nation. The election of a new Parliament had been some time determined, as we have mentioned above; notwithstanding which, the Republicans endeavoured to evade their own dissolution, by ordering writs to be issued to fill up the vacant seats in the House; but the Speaker refused to sign the warrant for their being sealed. This occasioned much confusion; in the midst of which, Ludlow foreseeing the consequences of these disputes amongst themselves, pressed very earnestly to be heard concerning the charge of high-treason lodged against him from Ireland, Alledging (says he), for the reason of my importunity, that though my enemies in that country had, by their late actions, manifested to all the world, that their enmity to the Parliament was much greater than to me; yet being uncertain what sort of men might soon have the principal influence in that House, I could not believe they would think it convenient, that a charge of high-treason, how frivolous soever, should be transmitted to them against one of their old and faithful servants. But he was as unsuccessful in the House in his own cause, as he had been without doors, in what he esteemed that of the publick. The members who had been secluded by the Lieutenant-General, Ireton, and others, in 1648, having obtained Monk's consent for returning to the House, our author was so highly irritated thereat, that he withdrew himself from the service of the House, but frequently appeared in Westminster-hall, to shew he did not decline serving the publick, nor was, as had been thrown out, at the head of any forces; and was followed in this procedure by Mr George Mountague and others. Every thing now tending to forward the restoration of King Charles the Second, the Commonwealth's-men grew very uneasy at the dangerous situation of their affairs, and held frequent meetings to consult measures for preserving their power; at one of which the Lieutenant-General tells us, he took the liberty to make the following propositions: 'That seven of the Council of State, and three of the Generals that had been appointed by the Parliament, should sign such orders as were necessary for carrying their design into execution. That Mofs's regiment, which lay in Kent, and not far from London, and another, which lay in the borough of Southwark, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Farnley, consisting in all of more than 2000 old soldiers, of whose integrity and affection we had good assurance, should be ordered to the Tower to join Colonel Morley's regiment already there, and would be ready to receive them, having sent to me to let me know, that the Tower should be at my command whensoever I pleased to desire it*'; that the commanders of these forces should take six months provisions, giving tickets for the quantity, payable by the Parliament; that the militia of London, which had been lifted during the government of the Parliament, should be authorized to meet as there should be occasion, to assist the forces in the Tower; that four or five places of rendezvous should be appointed for the forces of the army, which lay scattered up and down in several parts of the nation; and that officers should be agreed upon to appear at the head of them; that the soldiers, both horse and foot, should have the liberty either to follow their old officers, or to appoint new; that those officers who should prevail on the major part of their men to follow them, should be continued in their respective posts; and that those who appeared heartily to promote this design, though they could not persuade the greater part of their soldiers to follow them, should have provision made for them equal to their merits; that the country militia both horse and foot should be authorized to draw together, and be empowered to seize and disarm such persons in the respective counties, as were known to be enemies to the Commonwealth; that the fleet should be ordered to declare at the same time, and to send one or two thousand seamen, to the assistance of those in the Tower. That all who acted by the Parliament's authority in this service, should would be as good as his word. Yea, said Monk, if there were nothing in it but that, I must make good my word, and will too (33). That General, 'tis well known, was at this time busy in concerting mea-

‘ be justified in so doing: that the governors of garrisons should be required to refuse ‘ obedience to any power, which was not derived from the lawful authority of the Par‘ liament; and that a Declaration should be forthwith prepared, to shew the grounds and ‘ reasons, together with the necessity of these proceedings.’ Whether these proposals, or any part of them, were received, or attempted to be carried into execution, he does not tell us; only observes, that We being ripe for the correction of Heaven, nothing could prevent it, our enemies, i. e. those who were so to a Commonwealth, succeeding in all their attempts, and all our endeavours proving abortive (x). Soon after this, Hull was taken from Major-General Overton, and the militia also was new modelled, and put under persons more in the interest of Monarchy than it was before, after which, the famous long Parliament was dissolved; whereupon our Lieutenant-General began to act with more caution, and to appear less frequently in Westminster-Hall than he had used to do, and receiving advice that Sir Arthur Haslerig was now convinced that General Monk’s design was to restore the King, and that the new Council of State had resolved to seize Mr Scot, our author began to provide in the best manner he could for his own security, seldom lying at his house in town, and soon after setting out for the country. He had not travelled far, before a Messenger overtook him with the news, that, about an hour and a half after he had left the town, the Council had sent him a summons (as they had also done to Colonel John Jones, Colonel Thomlinson, and Mr Miles Corber, the other Commissioners for Ireland) to attend them: on receiving this intelligence, he quitted his wife and chariot, and (having provided a led horse) crossed the heath between Egham and Bagshot, and avoiding the publick road, came in the evening to his cousin Mr Robert Wallop’s house at Farley, where he staid but two nights; from thence he continued his rout to Sutton, and at last took up his quarters at Salisbury, where he received advice that his fellow-Commissioners had, on attending the Council of State, been obliged to enter into an engagement not to disturb the reigning power; and this piece of information made him look on his escape in a much higher light than he had yet done, as it convinced him he had avoided being imprisoned, (since he says, he could not have consented to have signed such an engagement now, any more than he could under Oliver Cromwell) and consequently, being detained in custody ’till the return of Charles the Second, and what would have been his fate then, who reckoned it an honour to have been one of Charles the First’s Judges, is pretty easy to be determined. From Salisbury, he proceeded to his several estates in Wiltshire, in order to raise what money he could amongst his tenants against the evil day, which, with respect to him, he found approaching very fast, the Royalists having every where the superiority over the Commonwealth-men; and that to such a degree, that though nineteen votes out of twenty six, chose the Lieutenant-General for the borough of Hindon (part of his own estate), yet the cavaliers prevailed to have a double return made, in favour of Sir Thomas Thynne; but this was set aside above, and the Lieutenant-General reported duly elected (y). Having settled his affairs as well as he could in the time, he resolved to keep himself out of the reach of those in power, ’till it was seen what turn things would take; and having lain thus concealed about eight days, he ventured to pay a visit to his wife at Salisbury, with whom he staid a night, and the next day received an account that Lambert had made his escape from the Tower: this made the Lieutenant-General return to his place of secrecy in haste, and here he received several messages from Lambert; but as that officer had fixed no plan, nor cared to make any declarations of his intentions, the Lieutenant-General was cautious how he embarked either himself or his friends, in an undertaking which never promised more than it produced, viz. destruction to those who were engaged therein. However, while they were in treaty together, our author took the prudent steps he thought necessary for the support of the declining cause, and might have created some trouble to the government, had Lambert been equally cautious, equally active and steady: but the suddenness of his defeat (z) put an end to all expectations from any projects of that kind. The time for the meeting of the House being now near at hand, the Lieutenant-General repaired to London, and lodged with a friend in Holborn, where he had not resided many days, before he had the mortification to hear that, ‘ the nominal House of Commons, as he is pleased to call them †, though cal‘ led by a Commonwealth writ in the name of the Keepers of the Liberties of England, ‘ passed a vote, that the government of the nation should be by a King, Lords, and ‘ Commons, and that Charles Stuart should be proclaimed King of England, &c.’
 But the Lieutenant-General was something comforted even under this heavy misfortune, by receiving advice that he had again escaped the malice of his pursuers, who had sent orders it seems, to seize his person in the West, the very day that he arrived in London from thence; this obliged him, on receiving an order to attend his duty in the House, to apply to Mr Arthur Annesley for instructions how to behave in this critical conjuncture, who advised him to take his seat as soon as he could, which he accordingly did. He now also sent orders to collect his rents and dispose of his effects in Ireland, but was prevented from doing either by Sir Charles Coote, who seized both, the stock alone amounting to fifteen hundred pounds †; Sir Charles, having also seized Cooke the solicitor against Charles the First, but then Chief Justice in Ireland; and others thereupon, without warrant or authority, according to our author, seizing Colonel Harrison in England; the cavaliers in the House of Commons, easily obtained an order to seize all who had signed the warrant for the King's execution, and consequently the Lieutenant-General: but he received timely notice enough to keep out of their reach, and to consult with his friends the properest methods for his security, the principal one now advised and practised being to shift his abode very frequently. During his recess, the House was busy in preparing the bill of indemnity, in which he was more than once very near being inserted as one of the seven persons to be excepted from all benefit thereby, either as to life, or estate; wherein General Monk and his Lady, and Colonel Skipwith were very assiduous, and though they failed in that particular, yet they carried their point in another, which was the issuing out a proclamation soon after the King's return, for all the late King's judges to surrender themselves in fourteen day's time, on pain of being excepted out of the said Act of Indemnity. This alarmed the Lieutenant-General greatly, and occasioned a consultation to be held with his friends, where it was debated whether, as he was not one of the seven excepted in the Bill of Indemnity, he should not surrender himself according to the proclamation, as Mr William Heveningham, Mr Simon Mayne, and some other of the late King's judges had already done; but being divided in their opinions, and some, who seemed to be best versed in the then state of affairs, not encouraging him to venture his life on such a risque, there being strong expectations that the Lords would increase the number to be excepted, he chose to wait the event a little longer, before he put himself into their power: and though he was inclined to surrender, that he might have the more time to settle his private affairs, yet he first drew up a petition, setting forth, that though he had been engaged in the establishing a Commonwealth, during which he had behaved with as much tenderness as affairs would permit, yet now the former government being re-established, he thought it his duty to submit thereto, that he might be entitled to the protection thereof. This he sent by his wife to Mr Annesley for his opinion; but that gentleman (being now, says our author, sworn a Privy-Counsellor) on perusal said, he thought it would be better to say nothing, than endeavour to justify any thing that had been done. Upon this, he sent his wife to the Earl of Ormond, to ask his advice how to demean himself; who made large promises, but would enter into no particulars, unless she would discover whether her husband was still in England, as to which she begged his excuse. The Lieutenant-General then sent her to Sir Harbottle Grimston, Speaker of the House of Commons, to acquaint him with her husband's difficulties and doubts; Sir Harbottle entered very freely into the affair with her, telling her, He believed the House of Lords would be content with what was already done, but if they should not, it would be the most horrid thing in the world, if the House of Commons should join in excepting any man who had rendered himself: letting her know, at the same time, that there was no undertaking for what they would not do; but that he would consult Mr Hollis, and other leading men with whom he should dine that day, and inform himself fully in every particular, and would then give her the best advice he could. The consequence was, that they were unanimously of opinion, that the House would never be guilty of so unworthy an action; and therefore, the Lieutenant-General's best way would be to come in; and to make it both the safer and easier Sir Harbottle granted him his warrant to protect him from arrests by the way, and promised to speak to the Serjeant to be moderate in his demands, which he accordingly did, and the Lieutenant-General surrendered. As this surrender was chiefly made to get time and opportunity to settle his affairs, the bail he procured were not very substantial, and those he honestly told, that if he found his life was at all in danger, he would go off, if possible; he therefore kept the strictest guard during the sitting of the House every day, to prevent being seized by any order of theirs during the contests about the bill, which was hotly debated in the House of Lords, where the Royal Party seemed inclined to except all the Judges of Charles the First, and did add several to the bill, even of those who had come in upon the proclamation. Yet the Lieutenant-General was fortunate enough to escape being named, and well it was for him that he did so; for the House of Commons confirmed the additions made by the Lords, with very few restrictions, no less than nineteen who had surrendered themselves being inserted, and delivered over by the Serjeant at Arms to the Lieutenant of the Tower, as would the Lieutenant-General have been (though not yet inserted) had he not withdrawn himself to Richmond, on notice that the Lieutenant of the Tower (Sir John Robinfon) would move the House that all the persons in the Serjeant's custody might be delivered up to him. On notice of these proceedings, and that there was much clamour at his secreting himself, he came privately to town, and again sent his wife to Sir Harbottle Grimston for advice; who was still positive for his surrendering himself into custody: at which, she hesitating, he told her, that he would wash his hands of her husband's blood, by assuring her, that if he would surrender himself his life would be as safe as his own; but if he refused to hearken to that advice, and should happen to be seized, he was like to be the first man they would execute, and she would be left the poorest widow in England. But the advice of another friend, backed with the friendly counsel of Lord Ossory, son to the Marquis of Ormond, out weighed all that the Speaker had said, and determined the Lieutenant-General's resolution to quit England, which he instantly put in practice, and having taken leave of all his friends, he went over London-Bridge in a coach, to St George's church in the Borough of Southwark, where he took horse, and travelling all night, arrived at Lewes a sea-port on the coast of Sussex by break of day

(a) Though the Lieutenant-General does not mention the precise time of his setting out on this escape; yet, from several hints, it may be pretty certainly fixed to the beginning of September 1660, he being gone before the Parliament adjourned, and they adjourned on the 13th of that month 'till November 6.

day the next morning, without having passed through any principal town by the way (a). On the Tuesday after he left London, he went on board a small open vessel prepared for him, but the weather being very bad, he quitted that, and took shelter in a larger, which had been got ready for him (and in which but a few weeks before, Richard Cromwell had gone over to France) but struck upon the sands in going down the river, and lay then a-ground; and was hardly got on board this, when some persons came to search that he had quitted, but not suspecting any body to be in that ashore, did not examine it, by which means he escaped: and waiting a day and a night for the storm to abate, (during which the master of the vessel asked him whether he had heard that Lieutenant-General Ludlow was confined amongst the rest of the King's Judges) the next morning he put to sea, and landed at Dieppe that evening, before the gates were shut. He was recommended to the house of one Madame de Caux, who with great civility making him an offer of going to her country-house, he readily embraced it, as well to avoid the many Irish then in the town, as to enjoy the liberty of taking the air. Soon after his going off, a proclamation was published for apprehending and securing him, with a reward of 300*l.* one of these proclamations came to his hands, inclosed in a packet of letters, wherein his friends earnestly desired he would remove to some place more distant from England; and this made him resolve for Geneva: in pursuance of which resolution, he took the way of Roan for Paris, where he staid several days to view what was remarkable. From hence he travelled through Lyons to Geneva, where he arrived without meeting with any molestation by the way, and took up his quarters at one Mr Perrot's, who had served in the Parliament army during the civil war, and thereby had acquired the English language. Here he was joined by Messrs Lisle and Cowley, two of those who sat as Judges on the late King, and, together with them, made private application to one of the principal Syndics for the protection of the republick, which was secretly promised; but his two companions not being satisfied therewith, would address the council publickly (against his advice) and thereby gave offence; so that they found it necessary to withdraw to Laufanne, and seek protection from the Canton of Bern; which was readily granted, both for themselves and Ludlow, who in a few days followed them (b). Here the Lieutenant-General remained many years, in the two first of which, the Duchefs of Anjou he says, meaning Madame Henrietta Duchefs of Orleans, offered a person of quality ten thousand crowns to assassinate him, but the bribe was refused, and the offer discovered to a merchant of Laufanne, who informed the Lieutenant-General thereof. In September 1662, they were joined by seven more of their party, viz. Mr Serjeant Dendy, Mr Nicholas Love, Mr Andrew Broughton, Mr Slingby Bethel, Colonel Biscoe, Mr William Say, and Mr Cornelius Holland; these persons having passed through Bern in their way, and paid a visit to Mr Humelius the principal Minister there, were by him informed of the Lieutenant-General and his companions residing at Laufanne, in procuring the order for which, he had been very serviceable; and now, by this means, gave them notice, that it would be much better for them to remove to Vevay, than to remain any longer where they were: on which, six of them, amongst whom was the Lieutenant-General, accordingly removed thither, where they were received with great kindness, and visited in form by the chief magistrates. Here they were visited also by Mr Algernoon Sidney, as he returned from Rome; and who, when he left them, passed through Bern, where he did them some kind offices, and informed them, that it would be proper for those amongst them, who could bear travelling, to make a tour to Bern, to pay their publick acknowledgements to the Lords, for their kind protection granted to them. Hereupon, the Lieutenant-General (accompanied with Messrs Love and Broughton, who were accidentally come over from Laufanne) set out for Bern. Being arrived there, they first paid their respects to Mr Humelius, as well to thank him for the many kind offices he had done for them, as to beg he would assist them in making their address to the Council in as private a manner as they could, which he approved of, and obtained liberty for them to do it in what manner they thought proper, either by speech or writing, which latter method they chose, and presented by the hands of the Advoyer or President of the Council, an address, as the reader will find in the note [S]. Our author, on this occasion, gives us the history of the first establishment of the Republic

(b) Ibid. p. 38c.

[S] The address was presented by the president of the council. This address was drawn in the usual form and style of such papers, and presented the 3d of September 1663, as appears from the date of the answer returned by the council, which is as follows:

September the 3d, 1663.

Concerning the three English Gentlemen who have for some time resided at Vevay, and have this day presented in our assembly of council, their thanks for our protection formerly granted to them; 'tis resolved, that they shall be saluted on our part with a present of wine, and that Mr Treasurer Steiger, with Mr Kilberger, and you our Doyné, do acquaint them with our affection and good will to them, and assure them of the continuation of the same for the 'time to come.' This was brought to them the day after the date by their friend Mr Humelius, who had, in the interim, very politely entertained them with the sight of every thing curious in Bern. The next day after presenting this address, three of the Senators came to dine with them; and when dinner was over, one of them asking how it came to pass, that they who for many years had the whole power of the three nations in their hands, were removed from the government without shedding one drop of blood. To this our author made an answer, which, as it contains a summary of his memoirs, may be acceptable to the reader as follows: 'I told them, says he, with all the brevity I could, that most of those persons who at first engaged in the war, having made their own peace, had endeavoured to deliver us, and the cause itself of Bern, with which the Lieutenant-General is so transported, that he forgets while he applauds the spirit of freedom, that he is an advocate for the doctrine of assassination; against which, in his own person, he raises great exclamation; and indeed, not without reason; for soon after his return from Bern to Vevay, he received information that an Irishman called Riardo, and said to belong to the Duchés of Orleans, was come to Turin, with an intention to form some design against the lives of our author, and the other English fugitives: and it was also reported, that King Charles the Second had wrote to the magistracy at Bern, to demand the delivery of their persons. Many letters from Turin, Geneva, Lyons, and other places, confirmed the account of Riardo's being in the country of Vaux upon the design mentioned, adding, that so many, and such desperate persons were engaged with him in the same design, that it would be next to impossible for the Englishmen to escape; on this they held a consultation, the result of which was not to quit Vevay, but as there was to be a fair there soon, to apply to the magistrates to have the guards doubled for that day, and to change their lodgings for one night. These precautions were far from unnecessary, for on Saturday the 14th of November 1663, a Savoy boat, in which (as the Lieutenant-General was afterwards told) were Dupow and Cerife, two of Lyons, Dupré a Savoyard, Riardo and others, about an hour after sun-set arrived at Vevay, and took up their quarters in several inns for that night; the next morning as Monf. Dubois, the Lieutenant-General's landlord went out to go to church, he observed the boat lying with four watermen in her, and their oars all in readiness to put off at a minute's warning; near the boat were two persons cloaked, sitting under a tree, and not far from them two more in the same guise and posture. This alarmed Monf. Dubois, who immediately conjectured their design must be against his lodgers, he immediately returned home to give them the alarm, being confirmed in his suspicion from hearing there were six more who had posted themselves, two in the way between his house and the church, and four in the market-place. But their appearance and garb, every one suspecting they had arms under their cloaks, had made the town's people observe them so much, that they all retired from the town toward the lake, and left the passage free for the Lieutenant-General and his friends to go to church; on their return from whence, hearing the strangers were at dinner in one of the inns, our author went down to take a view of the boat, which he found as before described, and a great quantity of straw, under which his landlord informed him they had concealed their arms, and that they had cut all the withs (which secured the oars) of the town boats to prevent being pursued: however, finding themselves watched so narrowly, and being apprehensive from Monf. Dubois's behaviour, that he would have them seized; soon after they had dined, they took to their boat and returned to Savoy. This attempt (which was soon after acknowledged by Dupré and others concerned) (c) alarmed the magistrates of Bern, who instantly sent special orders to the bailiffs of Vevay, Lausanne, and Morges, to be especially careful of the English under their protection, to search all boats coming from Savoy, to let no strangers reside in the town without giving an exact account of themselves and their business, to double the guards at Vevay, and to give the Lieutenant-General and his companions leave to ring the alarm bell (which being situated near one of the gates, they could do from one of their own apartments) in case of any sudden attack [T]. They were attempted again by itself into the hands of our enemies; and though they had many opportunities to have ended the dispute, by destroying the King's army: they neglected all, and only endeavoured to reduce the crown to their own terms. This was visible in the conduct of the Earl of Essex on several occasions, and that of the Earl of Manchester after the battle of Newbury, who, though he had 20000 men in his army, flushed with that victory, yet suffered the King with 7000 only, to carry off the cannon he had left at a place which stood near the ground, where he had been routed a few weeks before, without once offering to attack him; giving this at a council of war for the reason of his refusing to fight; that if the King were beaten twenty times by us, he would be still King, but if he should once beat us, we should be all treated as traitors; for which, being accused in the House of Commons, though they thought not convenient to proceed against him criminally, yet upon this, and divers other considerations, they removed him together with the Earl of Essex and the rest of the nobility, from their commands in the army, making choice of commoners to fill up their places, whose interest they knew it was, to take away the monarchy itself. By this means, they soon put an end to the war, sentenced the King to die for the blood that had been shed, established a free Commonwealth, brought their enemies at home to submit to their authority, and reduced those abroad to accept such terms as they would give. In the midst of all this prosperity they were betrayed by Oliver Cromwell, whom they had intrusted with the command of their army; who having moulded the greatest part of the officers to his purpose, by calumniating the Parliament, proposing advancement to the ambitious, and deluding the simple with a shew of religion, backed by the assistance of the clergy and lawyers (who had been threatened by the Parliament with a reformation of their practices) ejected his masters, and usurped their authority; endeavouring, during the five years of his reign, to ruin all that had been faithful to the interest of the Commonwealth, and advancing those who would not scruple to sacrifice their consciences to his ambition. By these ways the army became so corrupted, that though after the Usurper's death they had been persuaded with great difficulty to depose the son, and to permit the restitution of the Parliament, yet they were soon after induced, under frivolous pretences, to offer violence to them a second time; which rendering them odious to the people, gave an opportunity to Monk by declaring for the Parliament, to divide their councils, and to render them useless. And when the Parliament had, in gratitude for their restitution, conferred many undeserved favours upon Monk; he also, who had been a creature of Cromwell, and advanced by him, betrayed his trust, and contrary to many protestations, oaths, and solemn asseverations, brought a great number of Persons to vote in Parliament, who had formerly been ejected by the House, which turned the ballance from the side of the Commonwealth, and under the influence of his forces, brought in the son of the late King.

[T] To ring the alarm bell in case of any sudden attack.] The bailiff of Morges soon after apprehended one of the watermen who had brought the assassins

some persons who came by land about eight days after, but these were also discovered, as were several others who endeavoured to surprize them, but were always disappointed, except in the case of Mr Lisle, where they succeeded but too well, as mentioned below; and which affected Mr Say and Colonel Bisco so much, that they removed first into Germany, and then to Holland: whither, upon the breaking out of the first Dutch war soon after with King Charles II. they earnestly invited the Lieutenant-General to come, in order, as they said, to head a body of Dutch troops, with which De Wit proposed to invade England; but the States having tamely suffered Corbet, Okey, and Barkstead, three of the regicides, who had taken shelter at Delft in 1661 to be trapped and sent prisoners to England, by Sir George Downing, King Charles the Second's Minister, the Lieutenant-General would never hearken to any offers from the Hague or Amsterdam, unless the States would first disclaim that action, and next promise not to make any treaty without securing all who should engage with them: but as this was never complied with, he did not stir from Vevay, though he had procured a pass [U] from the Count D'Estrades for that purpose, had he received the acknowledgment he demanded. Whether the English Court had any knowledge of these negotiations, or only guessed that something of this sort might be set on foot between the fugitives and the Dutch and French, we know not; but she renewed and redoubled her diligence, through the Duchess of Orleans and the Queen-Mother of England's means, to get the Lieutenant-General, and his friends assassinated, many attempts being made during this treaty, and even after the peace with the Dutch, who took no sort of care of any of the regicides: but it pleased Providence, says he, to frustrate not only all those bloody designs, but also to baffle all the endeavours used by Charles II. and his mercenary tools, to deprive any of the exiles of the protection granted, and more than once openly avowed, by the canton of Bern to them (d). By this means, the Lieutenant-General not only survived King Charles II. but lived to see the ruin of King James II. by the Revolution, in which he earnestly desired to have been an assistant; and left his retreat at Vevay, and came to England, in order to exert his old age in that cause; having some expectations of being employed in Ireland, against the Popish and other adherents to the (as he styles him) abdicated King*. In this design he ventured to appear so openly in London, that an address was presented to his Majesty King

(d) Id. p. 417, & seq.

* 'Tis said he was sent for as a fit person to be employed to recover Ireland from the Papists. Preface to the first edition of his Memoirs, p. v.

(who were twelve in number) to Vevay, and upon threatening him with the strapada he confessed the whole affair, but pretended he knew nothing of it 'till after the miscarriage. To those already named, he joined De la Breette, and Du Fargis two of Savoy, adding that Dupré on their return, told them, had they succeeded, they should have had money enough. Notwithstanding this disappointment and discovery, many of the Lieutenant-General's friends (it being publickly given out that he was the person principally pursued) and amongst them Mr Steiger, treasurer of Bern, proposed his removal with his friends from Vevay to some place more in the center of their territories, as Yverden or Lausanne, where their enemies would not have the advantage of coming by water to attack or surprize them; but he resolved to remain where he was: Mr Lisle, however, took the advice, and removed to Lausanne, where, on Thursday the 21st of July 1664, he was way laid by some of the same gang, but not happening to go to church that morning, and they being suspected by the townsmen, they returned to Savoy by water, as they had come, saying, loud enough to be overheard, Le bougre ne viendras pas, the scoundrel won't come, while they waited near the church: and on Thursday the 11th of August following, N. S. he was shot dead in the church-yard, by a person who had a companion on horseback, with a horse for the assassin, on which, (though knocked down with the recoil of his piece) he escaped (36). A staunch cavalier has transmitted an account of this manly exploit to posterity, in the following words. August the 21st, that notorious regicide Lisle, overtaken by divine vengeance at Lausanne, where the miserable wretch was shot dead by the gallantry of three Irish gentlemen, who attempted the surprisal of him and four more impious parricides (37). Thus party zeal extinguishes every christian and humane sentiment, and makes the all-gracious Supreme Being the author of the blackest crimes.

[U] He did not stir from Vevay, though he had procured a pass. The Lieutenant-General tells us, he was not only strongly importuned to embark in the design of restoring, by assistance of the Dutch, a Commonwealth in England, by letters written from Holland by Mr Say, of one of which he gives a long extract (38); but that two of his friends made a journey from Holland to Vevay to persuade him to consent: this was backed by a letter from some of the party in Holland, couched in the following terms.

' We cannot look upon the frequent and earnest applications of so many of our friends, for your coming into these parts to be lost. We are fully satisfied of our interest with you, and have heard with joy the report of those Gentlemen who were lately at Vevay, how much you are concerned for the publick cause. We cannot but be sensible of the difference between treating with a monarch and engaging with a free state, and are glad to find that the same principles which arm you against the one, cause you to incline to the other upon reasonable terms; which we doubt not would be offered, if you would appear among us. They have here received such an account of the condition of our friends in England, that they have inclined to give us considerable succours of all things necessary for our enterprize. This is the second time that the States have caused a body of land forces to be shipped on board their fleet purely on our account, protesting in the most solemn manner, that they have no other design than to give the good people of England a seasonable and effectual aid. If we lose this opportunity, we may probably repent our folly, but shall hardly redeem our credit. For these reasons we renew our most affectionate desires that you would hasten to us, and hope for a speedy answer, rather in person than by writing, lest this also be added to our former afflictions, that another opportunity be lost.' The passport which the French Ambassador to the States sent him ran thus (39), in English,

' The Count D'Estrades, Lieutenant-General in chief of the King's armies, Governor of Dunkirk, Perpetual Mayor of Bourdeaux, Vice-Roy of America, Knight of his Majesty's Orders, and his Ambassador Extraordinary in Holland. We require all Governors, Commanders, Captains, Lieutenants, Mayors, Sheriffs, Judges, and other Officers, as well by sea as by land, to whom it may appertain, each to let pass securely and freely, through the places of their powers and jurisdictions, Mr Edmond Ludlow and four servants, without any trouble or hinderance, but rather all favour, aid, and assistance, and they will do us a singular pleasure. Done at the Hague, the 2d day of March, 1666.

King William from the House of Commons, by the hands of Sir Edward Seymour, November 7th 1689; that he would be pleased to put out a proclamation for the apprehending of Colonel Ludlow, attainted for the murder of King Charles the First, &c. Whereupon, our author being informed of the motion, hastened to the sea side, whence, after waiting near a fortnight for a good wind, he returned † to Vevay; where he continued 'till his death, which happened in the year 1693, and in the 73d of his age*. His corps was interred in the best church there (e), in which, his lady erected a monument of her conjugal affection to his memory, whereon she placed the inscription below [W]. His character has been already drawn in the course of this work (f), to which we shall only add an observation of Mr Addison, that during his exile in Switzerland, though he was a constant frequenter of sermons and prayers, yet he would never communicate either with those of Geneva or Vevay (g). I don't find that he left any issue or any writings, except his Memoirs, which were first published about five years after his death, under this title: Memoirs of Edmond Ludlow, Esq; Lieutenant-General of the horse, Commander in chief of the forces in Ireland, one of the Council of State, and a Member of the Parliament which began the 3d of November 1640, in two volumes. Switzerland, printed at Vevay, in the canton of Bern, 1698; 8vo. And in 1699, a third volume was published, with a Collection of Original Papers. The same year a translation of the two first volumes into French, was printed at Amsterdam in the same size. In 1751, another edition was printed at London, in one volume folio; to which was added the Case of King Charles the First, as drawn up by John Cook of Grey's-Inn, appointed Solicitor to the High Court of Justice against that Prince, and intended to have been made use of, in case his Majesty had pleaded to their charge. These Memoirs were attacked soon after they came out, by some friend of Cromwell's party and principles, in a pamphlet entitled, A modest Vindication of Oliver Cromwell, &c. London 1698, 4to. The author of which published afterwards another piece in 8vo. against the third volume of the Memoirs, with the title of Regicides not Saints; and, in 1660, there had been published at London, 4to. A Sober Vindication of Lieutenant-General Ludlow, in answer to a printed Letter from Sir Hardress Waller in Ireland, &c.

Stop and behold.

Here lies Edmond Ludlow, an Englishman, of the county of Wilts; Son of Henry Ludlow, Knight and Member of Parliament, as he also was; honourable by descent, but more so by his own virtue: by religion a Protestant, and eminent for piety. In the twenty third year of his age, he was made Colonel of a regiment, and soon after Lieutenant-General of the army.

In that post, he helped to reduce Ireland; intrepid and careless of life in battle, in victory merciful and humane; a defender of his country's liberty, and a warm opposer of arbitrary power; for which cause, banished from that country 32 years, though worthy of a better fortune, he took refuge in Switzerland, and dying there in the 73d year of his age, regretted by his friends, flew to the eternal seats of joy.

‘ His most beloved, courageous, and most sorrowful consort, as well in misfortune as in matrimony, Mrs Elizabeth de Thomas (41), who moved by a greatness of mind, and the force of conjugal affection, constantly followed in his exile 'till his death, consecrated this monument in perpetual memory of her true and sincere affection to her deceased husband, in the year of our Lord 1693.’

(41) Her maiden name seems to be Oldworth, our author frequently mentions his father-in-law by that name. She went during her husband's exile occasionally to England, to settle her affairs; and it was by the income of her fortune that he was supported.

MACKENZIE [Sir George] of Rosehaugh, an eminent lawyer and a polite writer, was descended from the noble and ancient family of Seaforth in the shire of Ross in Scotland: his father Simon Mackenzie of Lochlin, being brother to George Earl of Seaforth, and marrying Elizabeth Bruce, daughter to Peter Bruce, D. D. Principal of St Leonard's college in St Andrews (a), had by her this son George, who was born at Dundee in the county of Angus, in the year 1636. He gave early proofs of an extraordinary genius, having gone through his Grammar and all the common classic authors usually taught at school, in the tenth year of his age. With this foundation, he was sent by his parents to the universities of Aberdeen and St Andrews, where he finished the course of his studies in the Greek and Philosophy at the age of sixteen (b). After which, being designed for the Law, he travelled through France to the university of Bourges, where he studied the Code and Pandects for three years; and then returning home, was called to the bar, and became an advocate in 1656, before he had completed the twentieth year of his age [A]; and young as he was, he became an eminent pleader in a few years. However, though he made the Law his principal study, being peculiarly intent to distinguish himself in that which he had chosen for his profession, yet he did not suffer his parts to be buried there, he had an excellent taste and genius for polite learning, which he found spare hours to gratify; and the fruits of this application appeared in 1660, when he published his Aretino or Serious Romance, wherein he gave a very bright specimen of a gay and exuberant fancy. And he gave a proof no less conspicuous of his eloquence and knowledge of the Law the following year, when he was employed as advocate for the Marquis of Argyle, who was beheaded at Edinburgh on the 27th of May that year, for high treason. In pleading this case he had dropt some unwary expressions in favour of his client, which he was no sooner reprimanded for, but he replied with a surprizing boldness, that it was impossible to plead for a traytor without speaking treason. His abilities were much taken notice of at this time, and he was preferred not long after to the bench of justice in the criminal court (c). In 1663, he published his Religio Stoici [B], or a short discourse upon several divine and moral subjects, which was followed two years afterwards, by his Moral Essay upon Solitude, preferring it to publick Employment and all it's Appendages, such as Fame, Command, Riches, Pleasures, Conversation, &c. And in 1667, he printed his Moral Gallantry, wherein he endeavours to prove, that the point of honour, abstracted from all other ties, oblige men to be virtuous, and that there is nothing so mean and unworthy of a gentleman as vice; to which is added A Consolation against Calumnies, written in return to a person of honour. These, with some other moral essays, besides a play and a poem (d) [C], were this great man's productions in

[A] He was admitted an advocate before he was twenty years of age.] The examination which the candidates went through before their admission, was very strict, as appears from the account of it already given in the course of this work (1); so that it is a conspicuous proof of our author's extraordinary parts and industry, at so early a time of his life, as is observed in the text from the authority there cited; but to deal fairly with our readers, we must not omit to observe, that there seems to be a doubt of that earliness from the inscription upon our author's coffin; where he is said to have been per ann. xxxi in Foro Supremo Causarum Patronus (2), i. e. a Pleader at the Bar for thirty one years: whence, reckoning from the time of his death in 1691, he could not be admitted before the year 1660; and that era seems also to be countenanced by his pleadings in some remarkable cases before the supreme courts of Scotland, which go no higher than the year 1661 (3).

[B] Religio Stoici] The writer of his life tells us (4), that he wrote this piece before he was five and twenty (that is two years before it was published) and thence justly observes, that 'Tis wonderful to find 'so young a person make choice of such grave and weighty subjects to employ his thoughts upon, and to treat them with such variety of learning and exactness of judgment. His observations upon things are far above what one would imagine him capable of, at that time.' His design in it was, to use his own words, to shew, that speculations in religion are not so necessary, and are more dangerous than sincere practice (5).

[C] A Poem.] The poem is intitled Cælia's Country-House and Closet; in describing the furniture of which, upon the article of the pictures, Sir George has the following lines upon that of the Earl of Montrose, who was beheaded in Scotland during the rebellion and civil wars; which is inserted in this place as a proper in his retirement, during the vacation between the summer and winter sessions, as long as his growing business allowed him leisure for any thoughts foreign to it [D]. But being advanced to the station of King's Advocate in the year 1674 (e), his thoughts and studies were wholly taken up afterwards in the service of his King and country; an eminent instance of which he gave a little before his advancement to that honourable station, in reconciling the senators of the college of justice and the advocates. The Lords of Session, to strengthen their own power, would not admit of any appeals for remedy of law from their decisions to the Parliament. This the faculty of advocates taking to be an incroachment upon the liberties of the subject, and an infringement of former acts of Parliament; a hot debate arose between them: but the King being informed of it wrote a letter, discharging all appeals, and ordering the advocates to submit to the Lords of Session; whereupon the greatest part of the faculty threw off their gowns and left the bar, which so incensed the Lords of Session, that they obtained an order of council for banishing them twelve miles from Edinburgh. Upon this they retired to Hadington, Linlithgow, and other adjacent places, according to the terms of the act of council. Sir George, though he was one of those that laid aside his employment on this account, yet considering the great loss that the subjects sustained by it, he made a proposal for reconciling them in a speech before the Session, in the month of November 1674; which being delivered with that warmth and concern that accompanied all his pleadings, when there was found the least tendency to the good and welfare of the King and country; the Lords took it into their serious consideration, and Sir George's proposal being accepted, the advocates returned to Edinburgh, and were admitted to plead [E]. For this and other good services, our learned a proper evidence of the nature and fervency of our author's loyalty.

Montrose, his country's glory, and it's shame,
 Cæsar (6) in all things equall'd, but his fame;
 His heart, tho' not his country, was as great
 As his, and fell yet by a nobler fate;
 Montrose did fall his country to redress,
 But Cæsar fell by them he did oppress.
 Duty on valour stamps a just renown,
 'Tis nobler to support, than wear a crown.

[D] In the vacation while he was disengaged from the proper business of his profession. Sir George was apparently enough aware, that his publishing things so foreign to the Law might be turned to his prejudice in that profession, and therefore constantly took proper care to guard against that mischief. Thus we find him concluding his Religious Stoic with this remark. 'The multitude, says he, (which albeit it hath ever been allowed many heads, yet hath never been allowed any brains) will doubtless accuse my studies of adultery, for hugging contemplations so eccentric to my employment. To these my return is, that these papers are but the parings of my other studies, and because they were put parings, I have flung them out into the streets. I wrote them in my retirements, when I wanted both books and employment; and I resolve that this shall be the last inroad I shall ever make into foreign contemplations (7).' But he was not able to keep this resolution, and therefore, upon transgressing again in his Moral Gallantry, he ushered it into the world with an apology prefixed, wherein he treats the matter with more seriousness, as follows. 'I doubt not but some will, out of mistake, (I hope few will out of malice) think that the writing upon such foreign subjects, binds this double guilt upon me, that I desert my own employment, and do invade what belongs to those of another profession. But if we number the hours that are spent in gaming, drinking, or bodily exercise (at none of which I am dextrous); if we consider what time is spent in journeys, and attending the tides and returns of business, we will find many more vacant interludes, than are sufficient for writing ten sheets of paper in two years space; especially, upon a subject which requires no reading, and wherein no man can write happily, but he who writes his own thoughts. With which, pardon me, to think him a sober wit, who cannot fill one sheet in three hours; by which calculation there needs go only thirty select hours to ten sheets: and his life is most usefully employed, who cannot spare so many out of two years in his divertisement, especially, when the materials are such daily observations as are thrust upon me, and all others by our living in the world, and are so orthodox and undeniable, that an ordinary dress cannot but make them acceptable: and so few, I may say none, have written upon the subject, that I am not put to forge somewhat that may be new. But whatever others judge of this or me, I find that it is a part of my employment as a man and a Christian, to plead for virtue against vice. And really, as a barrister, few subjects will employ more my invention, or better more my unlaboured eloquence, than this can do.' What he has here urged, might very well pass for a sufficient guard against any harm that could possibly come from this quarter to his business, but he goes still further. He was not, it seems, without some apprehensions that writing at all, though in the way of his profession, might be objected to him, and upon that account when his Pleadings before the supreme court of Scotland made their appearance in publick in 1673, he thought proper to introduce them with some necessary reflections, among which one runs thus: 'I have been often asked, says he, two contrary questions; one was, how I diverted myself during all our six vacant months? and by others, how my employment gave me leisure to write? to answer both at once, I conceive, that a man in two afternoons of each vacant week, may write twice more than ever I sent to the press; and he must be very busy who has not these to spare. When I was too young, continues he, to write in my own profession, my love to my country tempted me to write moral philosophy, and to adventure on a play and poem. But now that I find our countrymen could be happy enough in these if their inclinations were not less than their abilities, I have abandoned those employments; and the spring of my age being past, it is fit those blossoms should ripen into fruit.'

[E] His speech procured a recall of the advocates to their pleadings. This remarkable speech was conceived in the following terms. 'I am, my Lord Chancellor, come here this morning with very smooth and calm inclinations; for I am resolved that in what relates to his Majesty, my very passions shall be good subjects; and it is so much my interest as well as my duty to obey in this case, my whole comrades employments and respects falling naturally to me jure devoluto upon my very entry, that I am sure you cannot imagine I must be overated by some stronger principle than money or fame. But lest I should be thought to sell my principles, or that your Lordships should be thought to command what you cannot justify; I do beg leave, with submission to your Lordships, to ask satisfaction to two scruples which stick with me. The first is, since I am fully resolved to retire and not to plead, because of my indisposition, I conceive your Lordships cannot in justice force me to declare any thing: for by his Majesty's letter you are only commended to debar us, 'till we declare. And therefore, by the rule of conversion, you cannot debar us, 'till we desire to plead. The condition is here adjected to a quality which exists not; and if ye con-learned author was knighted by the King (f); and, as we have said, was made his Majesty's Advocate, and one of the Lords of the Privy-Council in Scotland. His merit as a lawyer had unquestionably its proper weight in procuring him these distinctions [F]; but besides this, he had another recommendation which rendered him particularly acceptable, if not to say necessary, to his Majesty at this juncture: to understand which clearly, we must take the matter a little higher. The Parliament of Scotland meeting, after the restoration of King Charles the Second, having charged the preceding rebellion upon the Solemn League and Covenant and those who adhered to it, passed an act for re-establishing Episcopacy; but though this was carried by a vote which may be termed unanimous, consider the form and even late practices of this house, ye will find, that ye have constantly so proceeded: for when the act of Parliament ordered all the advocates to take the declaration, which was stronger than the case of this letter, because there, there was positive law, and in it a positive command; and yet ye never cited advocates, but debarred such as would not take the oath. And in the regulations, though his majesty commanded you by a solemn letter, yet ye only debarred, but did not cite. And if we consider the reason of the command, or the interest of the commander, or of those in whose favours the command is conceived, ye will find, that ye ought only to debar, not cite: for his Majesty designing that notice should appeal from you, this letter is a fence to your jurisdiction: and if I be debarred 'till I declare, there can be no fear of my appealing, since I must disown those appeals before I plead. And what you have done against my comrades can be no preparative against me: for they were pleading in their gowns, when you debarred them; but I am not pleading, nor do I desire to plead: and I hope it is not his Majesty's interest to force his subjects to declare. And now I am a mere Gentleman, and no Advocate, and so your jurisdiction reacheth me not; and if ever I pretend to be an advocate, I shall obey, and conform. This declaration is to be the price of my privilege and liberty of pleading, and I hope there is no reason I should be forced to pay the price 'till I take, or at least need, your wares.

The second thing wherein I desire to be satisfied, is this: I conceive that my employment is my estate; and if any of you left your sons advocates, or were to marry your daughters to advocates, you would think you left them well provided, if their employment were good. It is my plough or my sheep, nay it is my life-vent-right; and so like these rights it cannot be taken from me, except I commit a crime: and therefore, 'till I be guilty of a crime, I cannot forfeit my employment. And I conceive I am guilty of no fault or crime: For suppose these appeals or protestations were unlawful, which is all his Majesty's letter declares; yet appealing or protesting is no crime, for many things are discharged (8) which are not criminal, and nothing is a crime but what law makes so; but so it is, there is no law that declares appealing to be a crime. Thus we see it is declared unlawful to advocate causes to you below two hundred merks; and yet to raise an advocacy for a less sum is no crime; nay not punishable. Prelates are discharged to set tacks (9) for a longer time than their life-time and 19 years, and inferior beneficed persons for longer than three years; yet the contravention irritates (10) the deeds, but subjects not the contraveners to punishment. I have pleaded, against the exchequer, who are only judges to wards; and yet none thought these a crime or punishable. 2. We were in most probable ignorance of this unlawfulness, for lawyers have, after this act, declared it lawful to appeal and protest for remeal of law; and express acts of federunt have allowed protestations for remeal of law since the act of Parliament, et posteriora derogant prioribus; or rather your predecessors, who best knew the import of these acts, have so interpreted the ambiguous words of the act of Parliament. And whereas it is alledged, that those acts and laws are very old, and so not to be founded upon. I conceive this, which is the only answer that can be made, is very frivolous; for the older they are, by so much the nearer to these times, and so were the fitter to interpret the meaning of these old laws: but however they were sufficient warrants for us to have made use of them; and the following the faith of them may breed a mistake; but must certainly defend against a fault or crime.

I conceive, my Lord, that neither the King nor you are further concerned, than to have this judica-

tory secured against all appeals; and the proper way to do this, is by an act for the future, and we are content such an act be made; but it is against the nature of law, especially of punishing [penal] law, to be drawn backward: and in law, its sanction is its fence, and needs no assent from such who are to obey. And therefore, we ought not in law be put to declare our submission to it, but if we transgress, we are to be punished: nor do even the Parliament more to their acts. And was there ever more done than this in your or your predecessors acts of federunt. But yet to shew our strong inclinations to comply with his Majesty, we are content to declare we shall not appeal for the future: so that all that is betwixt us and you, is, that ye will have us disown what we have done. And will your Lordships lose such useful gentlemen for a word? where- in neither his Majesty or you are concerned; nor is it pique or vanity in us to deny it, since no gentleman would disapprove of what he has done. Nor can I see how his Majesty loses any honour in allowing us this favour; for what is meanness when done to equals, is clemency when done to inferiors. And this great French King, was yet pleased, when all the advocates in France quit their gowns upon his imposing a tax upon them, to pass from the one half of what he demanded; which was more substantial than what we crave. And I hope his Majesty will consider how obsequious we have been; for though we and our predecessors were as free from taxes as the French advocates were, yet we were to pay willingly; and the declarations and regulations were imposed upon us; but we preferred our loyalty to our just liberty: and therefore, having obeyed them exactly, when his royal interest was concerned, and being content to secure your interest against future appeals, we conceive, that here you ought not to be nice upon a punctilio which is unnecessary.

Oblige in this your native country who mis us, as ye know: oblige in this your law, that needs such instruments, especially in its infancy, to beguile your selves, who need such informers: and remember, that to find out a right defence, is much more hard and advantageous, than to judge it rightly.

[F] His merit as a lawyer, &c. One instance of this merit was shewn by his collection of pleadings in some remarkable cases, to which the decisions of the Lords are subjoined; printed at Edinburgh 1673, 4to. In the same year he also published an answer to some reasons printed in England, against the overture of bringing into that kingdom such registers as are in Scotland: not long after which, he published his observations on the 21st act of the 23d Parliament of James VI. against dispositions made in defraud of creditors. He afterwards made a present of the first treatise to Dr Thomas Bouchier, Law-Professor in Oxford, who returned him an answer in Latin, which begins thus: Celsiss. Mackenzie. Actiones quas Advocatis seculi tui dedisti non minorem in me voluptatem excitant, quam clientibus tuis vicioribus solatium solebant afferre: at, quod clientibus variis usu venire solet, plures ego desidero, reliquas etiam vehementer peto, & quod insatiabilis animi vitium est, fidenter exspecto.

since only four or five dissented, yet it was far from being quietly submitted to, by the Presbyterians, who generally held their form of church-government to be jure divino, or of divine right; and therefore, to be maintained under the pain of eternal damnation. Hereupon, in order to prevent the old humour from fermenting into a rebellion, another act was passed, prohibiting, under some penalties, any number above five, who were not of the same family or neighbourhood, to meet in a conventicle, which was the name given to their places of worship. Inflamed by this restraint, they broke out into an open rebellion, and were defeated by the King's forces at Pentland-Hills, in November 1666. However, the Government thought proper to relax a little from the former severity, and they were allowed their own ministers, who were settled in churches, and in many places suffered to enjoy the benefices. This indulgence satisfied some of the most moderate among them, but the generality still remained inflexible, and having rallied their scattered forces, they preached up rebellious principles to them, and treated their indulged brethren with as great contempt, as they did the bishops and the Episcopal clergy, calling them council curates, and separated from them. These meetings, therefore, were declared to be rendezvous of rebellion. On the other hand, the rebels put forth a proclamation at Sanguhar, wherein they declared, That the Covenant was the original contract betwixt God, the People, and the King; and therefore, that the King having broken it, forfeited his crown: and by that means, since he was only to be considered, as a private subject and enemy to God, it was lawful for them to kill him, and all who served him, according to the noble examples of Phineas and Ebed (g). In consequence of this doctrine, the archbishop of St Andrews and several others were murdered, and to defend the murderers, an army was raised, which the King's forces defeated at Bothwell-Bridge in 1679. There was also an insurrection of the field-conventiclers the following year, led by one Cameron, who was defeated and killed by Colonel Bruce (h). After this, the malecontents had several meetings in London, in one of which it was agreed, that 20000 men should be raised in Scotland, and that the garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle, and all the officers of state should be seized; which was likewise seconded by Monmouth and Argyle's rebellions in 1685 (i). It was in the midst of all these troubles, that Sir George Mackenzie was appointed King's Advocate, a post of the same nature in Scotland, with that of the King's attorney-general in England. By virtue of this office, he was particularly charged with the management of the prosecutions of state-criminals, and his duty concurred with his political principles, which led him to embrace the court-doctrine of passive obedience, maintaining with great zeal, that the uncontroverted magistrate was, if not actively, yet passively, always to be obeyed. We need not observe, that it is not possible for the most upright heart to pass through this office in troublesome and rebellious times, without incurring the hatred of many, and the displeasure of more, who have the misfortune to see the hand of justice fall upon their friends, acquaintance, or relations: nor perhaps will it be denied, that the office has proved a rock upon which lawyers, of otherwise unblemished reputation, have been too often seen to shipwreck a good conscience. Hence, as Sir George was his Majesty's Advocate during the two last mentioned rebellions, it is no wonder that the rebels had a particular spite and malice against him, who, by his office, was obliged to prosecute them for their lives; and therefore it was, that they called him the blood-thirsty advocate and persecutor of the saints of God. But how unjustly these aspersions were thrown upon him, will appear, from the great care he took in regulating the forms used in the pursuits of treason, and the mildness and tenderness that he always shewed to the rebels. As to the first of these, it must be observed, that by the law of Scotland treason may be pursued either at the instance of a private informer, or by the King's Advocate, who is ratione officii calumniator publicus, that is, by his office, the publick informer against rebels. If a private person inform, then his name must be expressed, that neither he nor any of his relations may be used as witnesses, he must likewise find surety that he shall prove it, and that he shall insist, as being liable in panam talionis, or the same punishment which the law provided against such a criminal, in case he should fail of proving the crime. (I.) Now always, before Sir George came to this post, the King's Advocate examined the witnesses alone; but Sir George thinking he might be suspected of being too much interested, prevailed with the government to get this examination referred to the judges, who in all nations enquire into the grounds whereupon pursuits [prosecutions] are to be raised. To strengthen the security of the defendant or party accused, Sir George used to interpose with the officers of state, before the depositions were brought into the council, and to represent to them his own scruples: and if the officers of state continued still of opinion, that a process was to be made out, then he desired the learnedest advocates of the nation to be called, before whom the depositions were read; and if they concurred in judgment with the officers of state, then these advocates were ordered to concur with him in the prosecution. (II.) And many of the most learned and most popular advocates did concur with him in the most intricate cases; which it is not to be imagined they would have done, had they thought their pleading in these cases was not according to law, or that it was any guilt or fault in them. Though by the laws of some nations no witnesses are to be produced for the defendant, but such as do appear voluntarily; yet when our learned advocate was a judge in the criminal court, which answers to the King's-Bench in England, he ordered, for the good of the people, the remedy of exculpation; whereby the defendant representing that he has some defences, a warrant is given to force the witnesses whom he names, to appear under severe penalties, and such time is granted to him and them, as may be sufficient for their appearance, and they are examined upon oath, and the jury is obliged to believe any two of them (though no witnesses are allowed in England to swear against the King) and this order was afterwards turned into an act of Parliament (k). And to take off all possibility of packing juries in Edinburgh, where generally the juries are chosen, it was ordered by the judges, at Sir George's earnest desire, that the town of Edinburgh should give up a list of all their housekeepers, who were able to pass upon juries, and that all these should be named per vices, according to the situation of the place where they lived. (III.) Because the defendant did not know what witnesses were to be produced against him by the King's Advocate, and so could not have witnesses ready to prove his objections against them; therefore Sir George prevailed with the Parliament, that not only he, but all succeeding King's Advocates, should be for ever afterwards obliged to give with the indictment, a list of what witnesses and members of inquest were to be used by them, and an order to be given for citing any witnesses that the defendant pleased, with a competent time for producing them: fifteen days being still the least time allowed by that law for preparing the defendant in all such cases. (IV.) By the form of the criminal court in Scotland, when the day of trial or appearance comes, the witnesses who were present at giving the citation are obliged to depose upon oath, that they saw the citation truly given, and then the King's Advocate produced his warrant: and accordingly, Sir George did never prosecute any man, 'till he produced his warrant, as appears from the records of the council and criminal court. The advocates for the King and defendant being both called in before the court, the defendant hears the indictment or summons read, and then forty five jury-men are called, and the defendant's objections against them are discussed. And though of old, the King's Advocate had the naming of the jury, as being presumed disinterested, yet Sir George prevailed to get an act of Parliament made (l), whereby the nomination of the jury was referred to the judges, and fifteen of these forty five are only admitted as a sufficient jury; and the defendant is allowed to challenge or reject any thirty that he pleases of the forty five, without giving any reason for it, and the fifteen who remain make up the jury, and are set by the judges. (V.) In this court likewise, after the depositions were taken, the advocates for the King and defendant spoke to the jury in a full harangue: but because the publick interest was still to be preferred to that of private men, therefore the Scottish law allowed the King's Advocate to be the last speaker in all criminal cases, 'till Sir George prevailed with the Parliament (m) to give the last word to the defendant in all cases, except that of treason; because ordinarily the greatest impression is supposed to be made by the last pleading. (VI.) Lastly, in this court of old, the clerk used to be inclosed with the jury for their direction; but Sir George procured, that because the clerk had some dependance upon the Crown, he might be excluded from going in with them, and that they might chuse their own clerk, which was accordingly done, and established by act of Parliament (n). To conclude in our author's own words: 'No man who endeavoured to lessen the power of the King's Advocates by acts of parliament and regulations, can be thought to have had any inclination to stretch it. As also, he may value himself for refusing to accept the King's Advocate's place, 'till his predecessor resigned it under his hand: that he never informed against any man, nor suggested any prosecution: that when a prosecution was motioned, he pleaded as much in private for the defendant, if the case was dubious, as any of his Advocates did in the trial, except when he was suspected of friendship to the defendant, or of a desire to become popular. And no age did see so many thousands pardoned, nor so many indemnities granted, as was in his time; which as it must be principally ascribed to the extraordinary clemency of the Kings he served, so it may in some measure be ascribed to the bias which Sir George had to the merciful hand (o).' And the truth of all this evidently appears, if we consider, that during these rebellions, although twenty thousand had been publickly guilty, yet there died not two hundred by the criminal court (p), and above a hundred and fifty of these might have saved their lives by saying, God save the King: not that the refusing to say this was made a crime, but that this easy defence was allowed them to save their lives; and there died not above six in all the time that Sir George was advocate, except for being in actual rebellion, and for assassination clearly proved against them. But the most clamorous instances of our author's cruelty, is, in the deaths of some particular persons who were executed, as was pretended, by Sir George's stretching the laws too far. It must be owned, if this charge was well supported, that no excuse of his acting therein ministerially, by virtue only of his office, would be a sufficient vindication of his conduct; therefore it will be necessary to employ a note in laying before the reader, a true state of the case in each of these instances [G], in order to shew that none of these people were executed but upon

(g) See our author's treatise, entitled, The Method of proceeding against Criminals; as also some of the Fanatical Covenants.

[G] We shall give a true state of the case in the notes.] The cases are those of Mitchel, Lermouth, Baillie of Jerviswood, the Earl of Argyle, and two poor women. But as it may be thought too tedious to run through them all, we shall only speak to the most remarkable, referring the reader for the rest to our author's book itself. These two are Baillie of Jerviswood, and the Earl of Argyle. As to the first, it is beyond all dispute, that misprison of treason is by the laws of Scotland punishable as treason: and it having been proved against him, that he was accessory to and concealed a design of raising 20,000 men, and seizing the garrisons of Berwick and Carlisle, and the officers of state, he could not escape the punishment of the law. Yet Sir George had such a regard for this gentleman, that he would not bring an indictment against him, 'till Sir George Lockhart, and one of the most learned of the Judges, did declare that the point of law and most just grounds. In the mean time, it must needs raise a great idea of the activity of his genius and extensive knowledge, that, notwithstanding the prodigious throng of business, and that upon the most important affairs of the nation was dispatched by him, yet he found so much leisure, and employed it so well, that if we consider the productions of his pen, in illustrating the laws and customs of his country, in vindicating the monarchy against the contrivances, aspersions, and principles, of the Fanatics, and other enemies; together with what he wrote for advancing the honour and glory of his country, we should be apt to think most part of his time had been spent in his closet. This will appear from a view of his excellent writings upon all these subjects. For instance, to illustrate the laws and customs, besides the pieces already mentioned, he published A Discourse upon the Laws and Customs of Scotland in matters criminal: where is to be seen, how the Civil Law, and the Laws and Customs of other nations, do agree with and supply those of Scotland. Printed at Edinburgh, 1678, 4to. This was followed by his Idea Eloquentiæ forensis bodiænae [H], una cum actione forensi ex unaquaque juris parte. Edinb. 1681, 8vo. A book greatly esteemed by the learned, both for the usefulness of the matter and the purity of the language (g). To the same purpose he published The Institutions of the Laws of Scotland, Edinb. 1684, 12mo (r), a book then of so great use for the understanding of their law, that it has gone through several impressions both there and in England. Two years afterwards came out his Observations upon the Acts of Parliament. Edinb. 1686, fol. Besides these, several other treatises of Law are inserted in his Works, printed at Edinburgh, the probation were both most clear, and concurred in the process with him: and some of the witnesses were his own relations and of his own persuasion; I mean Presbyterians (12).

But the case of the Earl of Argyle has made the greatest noise of any, because it was rescinded by an act of K. William and Q. Mary's Parliament. But the undeniable matter of fact was this: The Test being enacted to be a bulwark to the Protestant religion, as upon the event it proved; the Earl would not take it but with a declaration, that he did take it as far as it was consistent with itself, or with the Protestant religion: and, faith he, I declare, that I mean not to bind up myself to wish or endeavour any alteration I think to the advantage of the Church and State. The Privy Council observing that the Test, by one part of this declaration, appeared ridiculous, and by the other became ineffectual to all the intents and purposes for which it was designed, (for by this every man's opinion became the rule of his loyalty, and therefore obliged to be no farther loyal than he thought convenient) they earnestly dealt with the Earl, to acknowledge that he was in the wrong, or else to suppress it; since by act of Parliament all such as put limitations upon their loyalty are guilty of treason, and that this act was made upon most just and necessary motives. For the foundation of the rebellion in K. Charles the First's time, was, That by the Covenant, the subjects were no further obliged to own the King's interest, than in so far as it agreed with the word of God, and the laws of the land, of which every private man made himself judge. And if this were allowed, no oath of allegiance could bind, and consequently all society must be dissolved. Yet the Earl would neither do the one nor the other. The Duke of York, then High-Commissioner to the Parliament of Scotland, being assured by one of the best lawyers in the nation, that the Earl's declaration imported treason, Sir George was obliged by his office, though much against his own inclination, on account of the personal kindness he had for the Earl, to prosecute him for high-treason, and he was found guilty, after a full debate, wherein eight or nine of the best lawyers of the nation by a positive command from the council, did assist the Earl: and whereas many have admired that he was not prosecuted, and condemned afterwards, when the Earl by an open rebellion invaded his country, it proceeds from their ignorance of the laws of England and Scotland; by which no person can be tried for the very same crime for which he stands convicted, though he may for a crime which deserves a greater punishment: for the law has exhausted its revenge by the first sentence. Yet Sir George observes, 'where a new notorious aggravation supervenes, as in this case of Argyle, which is so clear, that it can admit of no debate, nor needs no probation; it were very unjust, that the law should not here be put in execution, though the first sentence had been thought too severe to deserve it.'

[H] Idea eloquentiæ forensis bodiænae, &c.] Besides this, our author wrote an Essay upon what Eloquence is fit for the Bar, which is prefixed to his pleadings before the supreme court of Scotland; wherein, among others, he makes the following remark in honour of his country. 'It may seem, says he, a paradox to others, but to me it appears undeniable, that the Scottish idiom of the British tongue is more fit for pleading, than either the English idiom or the French tongue. For certainly a pleader must use a brisk, smart, and quick way of speaking; whereas the English, who are a grave nation, use a too slow and grave pronunciation, and the French a too soft and effeminate one. And therefore, I think, the English is fit for haranguing, the French for complimenting, but the Scots for pleading. Our pronunciation is like ourselves, fiery, abrupt, sprightly, and bold; their greatest wits being employed at Court, have indeed enriched very much their language as to conversation, but all ours, bending themselves to study the Law, the chief science in repute with us, hath much smoothed our language as to pleading. And when I compare our law with the law of England, I perceive that our law favours more pleading than theirs does; for their statutes and decisions are so full and authoritative, that scarce any case admits pleading; but, like an hare killed in the feat, 'tis immediately surprized by a decision or a statute. Nor can I enough admire, why some of the wanton English undervalue so much our idiom, since that of our gentry differs little from theirs; nor do our commons speak so rudely, as those of Yorkshire. As to the words wherein the difference lies, ours are for the most part old French words, borrowed during the old league betwixt the two nations, as canel for cinnamon, and servit for napkin, and a thousand of the like stamps; and if the French tongue be at least equal to the English, I see not why ours should be worse than it. Sometimes also, our fiery temper, has made us, for haste, express several words into one, as flour for dust in motion; sturdy for an extraordinary giddiness; &c. But generally words significant ex instituto: and therefore one word is hardly better than another. Their language is invented by courtiers and may be softer, but ours by learned men and men of business, and so must be more massy and significant. And for our pronunciation, beside what I said formerly of its being more fitted to the complexion of our people, than the English accent is; I cannot but remember them, that the Scots are thought the nation under heaven, who do with most ease, learn to pronounce best the French, Spanish, and other foreign languages, and all nations acknowledge that they speak the Latin with the most intelligible accent; for which no other reason can be given, but that our accent is natural, and has nothing, at least little in it, that is peculiar. I say not this to asperse the English, they are a nation I honour; but to reprove the petulancy and malice of some among them, who think they do their country good service, when they reproach ours.

(g) Mr Macdougald, in the preface to his Institutes of the Laws of Scotland, printed in 1753, speaking of the preceding writers on that subject, begins with this piece of our author, which he calls a Compendium of our [Scots] Laws, after the manner of Justinian's Institutes, and is, says he, a valuable performance, as it comprehends in miniature most of the principles of our Law.

burgh, 1716, in two volumes, folio. Accordingly, in vindication of Monarchy, he wrote his Fus Regium: or, The just and solid Foundations of Monarchy in general, and more especially of the Monarchy of Scotland, maintained against Buchanan, Naphtali, Doleman, Milton, &c. This piece was published at London in 1684; and, being dedicated and presented by the author to the university of Oxford, the members thereof, assembled in Convocation on the ninth of June the same year, ordered a letter of thanks to be sent to him (s). In the same spirit he published his Discovery of the Fanatick Plot, printed at Edinburgh the same year in folio; and his Vindication of the Government of Scotland during the reign of Charles II, &c. 1691, 4to. To which was added, the method of proceeding against criminals, as also some of the Fanatical Covenants, as they were printed and published by themselves in that reign. Edinb. 1683, 4to. Sir George was no less concerned and zealous in whatever contributed to the honour of his nation, of which he gave four noble instances. The first was, his Observations on the Laws and Customs of Nations as to Precedency, with the Science of Heraldry, as a part of the Law of Nations [I], &c. The second was in his Defence of the Royal Line and Antiquities of Scotland. The devastations that had happened through the long and bloody wars between the two kingdoms, and the unaccountable proceedings of the Scottish reformers in burning and destroying all their religious houses and libraries, had destroyed most of their records; so that an overture was made for taking from them what records remained. Hereupon Sir George, in 1673, published An Answer to some Reasons printed in England, against the overture of bringing into that kingdom such registers as are in Scotland (t). But the rudest attack upon the antiquity of the royal race of Scotland, and the veracity of their historians, was made in An Historical Account of Church Government, as it was in Great Britain and Ireland, when they first received the Christian Religion; by the learned Dr William Lloyd, then Bishop of St Asaph. In 1680. To this Sir George made a very warm reply, in his book intitled, A Defence of the Royal Line of Scotland, with a true account when the Scots were governed by Kings in the island of Britain. This was printed at London in the latter end of June 1685; but before the publication, it was animadverted on by the famous Dr Edward Stillingfleet (who had seen it in manuscript) in the preface to his book intitled, Origines Britannicæ, &c. To which Sir George made a reply the following year, under the title of The Antiquity of the Royal Line of Scotland further cleared and defended, against the Exceptions lately offered by Dr Stillingfleet, in his Vindication of the Bishop of St Asaph. Lond. 1686. After which there was no more heard of this controversy. But an appeal seemed to have been made some time afterwards to the learned abroad on the side of Sir George, whose books were put into Latin, and printed at Utrecht in 1689 (u), and then presented to William-Henry Prince of Orange. His Highness wrote two very obliging letters of thanks to Sir George for his performance [K]. The third instance of our author's zeal for the honour

(s) The author of the Reasons had alleged, that these registers were introduced into Scotland, on account of the poverty and feverity of that people, which Sir George endeavours to disprove.

[I] Observations on Precedency, and the science of Heraldry, &c. We have the following account of this performance by a person of unrivalled knowledge in this art: it is the subject of a letter to Sir George Mackenzie, which begins thus: 'Sir, There's no man readier than myself to give all honour and respect due to the merits of your friend the worthy Sir George Mackenzie of Rosehaugh. Their Majesties Charles II. and James II'd advocate, a faithful and loyal servant all his life; who was an ornament to his country, and gave lustre to his name and family, by his many virtues and eminent qualities scarce to be found in one but himself, which do, and will appear in all ages, by his many learned works and merit, to be perpetuated by the politest pen.

'Two of which, his Precedency, and Science of Heraldry, relate to my profession of armories: the first being somewhat extrinsic, containing observations upon precedency . . . so well done, with many noble questions of law, there learnedly discussed, to the satisfaction of all, that I shall say no more of it.

'As for the other, his Science of Heraldry, I shall with all brevity give my opinion, (it being your desire) of it's worth and parts, as it was the first work of that nature published with us; adds no less to Sir George's honour than his others do, being the best done system (considering it altogether) of it's kind yet extant, and is preferable not only to such published in England, but in other countries. Menestrier's works of that nature, in some parts, may be excepted.' The letter proceeds in describing the particulars of this performance both in the speculative and practical part of Heraldry, and mentioning a manuscript left by Sir George to supply a defect in the latter part, observes, that this manuscript has furnished ground and encouragement to others to work upon. After which the writer concludes thus: 'Having shewn the beauties and defects of Sir George's Heraldry, I cannot but in justice to him, continue to

'say of it, as I have done before in my Essay of Marks of Cadency, that our country has been happier of late than others, in his System of Heraldry being more exact, and his observations and remarks more profitable, than many other pieces of that nature to be met with, and to be preferred to any our neighbouring nation can brag of; and what could we not have expected from him, had he been less concerned in the publick business of the kingdom, when in all the throng of affairs, his different works prove him a great man, whose genius could not be confined to one subject, being a perfect master of many; and his merits are too well known to stand in need of any encomium,

From, Sir,

Your very humble servant

'Monsieur,

honour and good of his county was, the founding of the Lawyers Library at Edinburgh in 1689. This goes by the name of the Advocates Library, and was afterwards stored with variety of manuscripts, especially relating to the antiquity of the Scottish nation, and with all sorts of books in all the sciences, classed in that excellent order, and planned by him in an elegant Latin oration, which he pronounced upon that occasion (w). The last instance we shall give of his zeal for the honour of his country, is his solid and judicious reflections upon the advantages and disadvantages that would happen by an incorporating union between the two kingdoms, illustrated by an historical account of three attempts that had been made since King James the Sixth's accession to the throne of England; all of which proved ineffectual, but was completed by Queen Anne in 1707. Sir George's zeal for propagating piety and virtue was no less conspicuous, than that which he had shewn in illustrating the laws, and defending the rights, privileges, and honours, of his country. Besides those excellent moral and divine essays which he published in his youth, as already mentioned, he wrote several others, the titles whereof may be seen below [L]. But it is time to proceed to the last scene of our author's life. Upon the abrogation of the penal laws by King James the Second, our Advocate, however steady in his loyalty, thought himself under a necessity of laying down his place, being convinced, that he could not, with a good conscience, perform the duties of it in that point. He was succeeded by Sir John Dalrymple, who, however, did not long continue in it; for that unfortunate Prince being convinced of his error, restored our author to his former post, in which he continued 'till the Revolution, always firm to his master's interest and the Protestant religion. Upon this principle, in the first council that was called in Scotland after the Prince of Orange's landing, the proposal being made, that an address should be sent up to the Prince with the highest acknowledgments of gratitude, for his generous undertaking to free them from Popery, and the offers of their service to him for the future, Sir George told them, that this was against their duty and allegiance to their lawful sovereign, and therefore advised them to consider seriously what they were going to do; which put a stop to it at that time. Not long after this he gave over acting either as Advocate or Counsellor, hoping that the Prince of Orange would stand by his declaration, and return to his own country when matters were adjusted between the King and his subjects; and that he might contribute all that was in his power to so good a design, he wrote his Memorial to the Prince of Orange (x). In the mean time a proposal was made to that Prince, that Sir George and several others should be declared incapable of any publick employment; but the Prince absolutely refused it, being resolved to put no body in despair, 'till once he knew how they intended to behave for his interest. When the Convention of Estates met, in order to determine the point about the vacancy of the Throne, and accepting the Prince of Orange for their sovereign, as had been done in England, Sir George argued warmly in defence

To which is added, Characteres quorundam apud Scotos Advocatorum. A most ingenious performance, wherein the characters of some of his contemporary Advocates are drawn with that smart and brisk vivacity, which he observes in the distinguishing talent of the Scots. [L] The titles whereof may be seen below. These are, I. Moral Essays on Happiness. 1. That nothing without us can make us happy. 2. How far the Moral Philosophy of the Ancients can make us happy. 3. That the Moral Philosophy of the Heathens was not able to make us happy. 4. That the Christian religion is excellently contrived for rendering men happy both here and hereafter. II. Solitude preferred to publick Employment. III. The Moral History of Frugality. IV. A Moral Paradox, maintaining that it is easier to be virtuous than vicious. V. Reason, an Essay. Part 1. How weakly men reason in matters of greatest importance. Part 2. Whence proceeds it that man is so unreasonable, and how to improve our reason. Bishop Burnet, who, as his manner was in general, especially to those of different political principles, represents our author as a slight and superficial writer, and says his books of law are many and full of faults, yet allows him to be a man of life and wit (15). And he has given an admirable proof of it in this Essay; where he shews the true use of wit, and in doing it gives a most conspicuous example of that true use, which he concludes with this excellent remark. ‘ I design not this, says he, to lessen the esteem due to true wit, and that pleasantness of conversation which arises from it, as flowers from the root. The Almighty certainly designed to make all men happy, and there is no happiness without pleasure; and that as he rejoiced when he saw that all that he had made was good, so he was desirous that man might find out this good, both for making himself thereby happy, and for inviting him the more to magnify the Creator. And therefore, to sweeten the miseries which naturally embitter human life, God has illuminated some with a pleasantness of humour which rejoices the society into which they come, as the sun illuminates the room into which it enters. These are they who having peace of conscience at home, are thereby allowed to be glad; and who having wit, employ it in turning the right side of things to them, understanding as well to find out what is pleasant in any object, as artists do to find a piece of gold in a barren mountain. This is the true use of wit; and if at any time they use it to treat vice or extravagancy in ridicule, it is not from any malice to the person, but from a desire to reform him, and mankind by him. There is a justice in scourging, defaming, and banishing vice, and this jurisdiction is given by heaven, immediately to such as have sense; of whom, upon that account, the greatest rulers stand in awe: and so much reverence is due to them, that the rest of mankind bestow applause according to their inclinations. Bitterness then, and sullen moroseness, in wit is the tyranny of this jurisdiction. If it be insolent, it is the wrong side of this delicate picture, a flashing light, which at first dazzles, but thereafter blinds: a delicious fruit corrupted into bitterness, and a beautiful face wrinkled by fretting humours.

The Ancients termed wit a salt, and that is not fit for food, but for seasoning; it may be used plentifully in conversation, moderately in business, but never in religion.’

defence of his old master, against both these propositions (y); and soon after the vote was carried he left the Convention and retired to England, resolving to spend the rest of his days in the university of Oxford, where he arrived in the month of September, 1689, and prosecuted his studies in the Bodleian library, being admitted a student there, by a grace passed in the congregation June 2, 1690 (z). In the beginning of the next spring he went to London, where he fell into a disorder, which, proving incurable, put a period to his life, May 2, 1691. He died at his lodgings in St James's, near the royal palace, from whence his corpse was carried by land into Scotland; and, after it had lain some time in the abbey church of Holy-Rood-house at Edinburgh, was buried on the 26th of June following, with great state and solemnity, in the Franciscan or Grey-Friars church-yard, in a vault which he had directed to be made for himself, with a cupola of free-stone over it. His funeral was attended by all the Council, Nobility, College of Justice, College of Physicians, University, Clergy, and Gentry, and such a concourse of people as was never seen upon the like occasion. There was fastened on his coffin a plate of brass, whereon was engraved an inscription in Latin, containing an account of his birth, family, and preferments; to which is added, as usual, an elogium of him [M]. And the writer of his life having collected what had been said of him by several learned men in their writings, has given us his character, as follows: That he was a gentleman of a pleasant and useful conversation, but a severe opposer of vicious and loose principles in whomsoever he found them. He was a great lover of the laws and customs of his country; and from his many excellent writings upon them it appears, that no man understood the Law of Nations, the Civil Law, and the Laws of his own country, better than he did. He was regardless of riches and popularity; frugal in his expences; temperate in his diet, being a great enemy to all sorts of extravagance and debaucheries. He was a faithful friend, a loyal subject, an able statesman, a constant advocate for the clergy and university, a zealous defender of piety and religion in all companies and on all occasions, against the attacks of Atheists, Deists, and all sorts of sectaries that differed from the Church of England, of which he was a true and faithful son. His abilities in his profession were great, being a great master of eloquence, as appeared in all his pleadings at the Bar, which were constantly accompanied with all those hidden and wandring beauties, which never fail to charm and captivate the affections of mankind, and which he never exerted but with the greatest integrity, being a person of strict honour and justice in all his actions. His natural parts were extraordinary good, which he improved by indefatigable pains, and made himself thoroughly acquainted with the best writers ancient and modern. The gaiety of his fancy and fertility of his invention were corrected by so exact a judgment, that he is copious upon all his subjects, and yet very close and pertinent. All his thoughts are clear and coherent, and his most serious discourses have such variety of curious remarks and observations, as render them very pleasant and diverting. He was acquainted with most of the learned men in Britain, particularly with those of the university of Oxford and of the Royal Society; nor was he less famous among the learned men abroad, especially the Lawyers in France and Holland. He was twice honourably married; first to a daughter of Dickson of Hartry, one of the Senators of the college of Justice, by whom he had three sons and two daughters. The sons died before him unmarried. His eldest daughter, Agnes, was married to the Sheriff of Bute, whose predecessor, Sir John Stewart (commonly called the Black Stewart), was son to King Robert the Second. She brought her husband the present Earl of Bute (aa), and one daughter, married to the Viscount of Garrack. His other daughter, Elizabeth, was alive in 1716, and had been twice married, first to Cockburn of Langton, a gentleman of an ancient and honourable family; and then to Sir James Mackenzie of Royston, one of the Senators of the college of Justice, and son to the Earl of Cromarty; to both whom she has brought several children. Sir George's second lady was a daughter of the Laird of Pitcur in the county of Angus, a gentleman of an ancient family; she was a lady of great piety and virtue, and remarkably distinguished by the affectionate regard she bore to her husband's memory, which was extended to all his relations. This lady brought him two children, a son and a daughter, both of whom died unmarried. Besides what he published himself he left several manuscripts, some of which were printed in his Works [N], already mentioned.

(aa) This was written in 1716.

[M] Elogium of him. Many other epitaphs and poems were composed on him, of which first the writer of his life has preserved three, which he says had obtained an universal approbation. The first is a Latin epigram placed beneath his picture in tail douce 1686, by Thomas Gleg, D. M. and one of the best poets in his age. The second is in Latin too, by the famous Dr Archibald Pitcairne; and the third in English, by an anonymous author.

[N] Some manuscripts printed in his works. Several of these have been mentioned in the course of this memoir, to which we shall only add one more, and that is intitled, an Index of some illustrious Cases lately controverted in Europe, more especially in Britain, upon which Sir George Mackenzie designed to write; found among his manuscripts, and writ with his own hand. This contains no less than forty-four cases, upon some of the most interesting occurrences of those times, the forty-second of which is, Whether Dr Burnet might have transferred his Allegiance. P.

MACLAURIN [COLIN (a)], an eminent Mathematician, descended of an ancient family [A] in Argyleshire in Scotland, was born in February 1698, at Kilmoddan in that county. Six weeks after his birth he lost his father. However, that loss was in a good measure supplied to the orphan family by the kindness of their uncle Mr Daniel Maclaurin, Minister of Kilfinnan. Not long after her husband's death, Mrs Maclaurin left Argyleshire (where, jointly with her sisters, she was possessed of a small patrimonial estate) and settled at Dumbarton for the sake of her childrens education; but dying in 1707, that care afterwards devolved entirely to their uncle. In 1709 Colin was sent to Glasgow, and placed under the care of Mr Gersham Carmichael, an eminent Professor in that university. Here he prosecuted his studies with uncommon diligence and surprizing success [B], especially in the Mathematicks, to which learning his genius discovered itself by an accident at twelve years of age [C]. In his 15th year he took the degree of Master of Arts, and applying himself to Divinity, he spent a year in that study; after which he left the university, and lived retired for the most part at his uncle's house [D], 'till near the end of 1717, when he was appointed Professor of Mathematicks in the Marishal college of Aberdeen [E]. And two years after, he took the opportunity of the vacation to go to London; where, besides Dr Hoadley then Bishop of Bangor, Dr Samuel Clarke, and several other eminent men, he became acquainted with Sir Isaac Newton, whose friendship he ever after esteemed the greatest honour and happiness of his life. At this time he was admitted a member of the Royal Society; two papers of his were inserted in their Transactions, and his treatise, intituled Geometria Organica [F], was published with the approbation

(a) The particulars relating to this author are chiefly taken from an Account of his Life and Writings, by Patrick Murdoch, A. M. and F. R. S. prefixed to Mr Maclaurin's account of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophical Discoveries, &c. L. nd. 1748, 8vo.

[A] Descended of an ancient family] The family had been long possessed of the island of Tyrrie upon the coast of Argyleshire. His grandfather Daniel, removing to Inverara, distinguished himself in restoring that town after the ruin it suffered in the civil wars; and has left some memoirs of his own times, which shew him to have been a person of worth and superior abilities. John the son of Daniel, and father of our author, was minister of Glenderule, where he was a faithful and diligent pastor; and has left in the register of his provincial synod, lasting monuments of his talents for business, and of his publick spirit. He was likewise employed by that synod in completing the version of the Psalms into Irish, which is still used in those parts of the country where divine service is performed in that language. He married a gentlewoman of the family of Cameron, by whom he had three sons. John who is still * living, a learned and pious divine, one of the ministers of the city of Glasgow; Daniel, who died young, after having given proofs of a most extraordinary genius, and Colin, of whom we now write.

[B] With uncommon diligence and a surprizing success.] Among his oldest manuscripts were found fragments of a diary, in which he kept an account of every day, and of almost every hour of the day; of the beginning and success of almost every particular study, inquiry, or investigation: of his conversations with learned men, the subjects of them, and the arguments on either side. Here appeared the names of Professor Carmichael, the celebrated Mr Robert Simson, Dr Johnston, and several other gentlemen of learning and worth; who all vied who should most encourage our young philosopher, by opening to him their libraries, and admitting him into their most intimate society and friendship: He could not afterwards find time to keep so formal a register, but the habit, 'tis said, never left him; and that every hour was continually filled up with something which he could review with pleasure.

[C] His genius discovered itself by an accident at twelve years of age.] At this age, he met accidentally with a copy of Euclid in a friend's chamber, in a few days he made himself master of the first six books, without any assistance; thence following his natural bent, it appears, that he was very soon after engaged in the most curious and difficult problems, and in his sixteenth year, 'tis certain, he had invented many of the propositions in his book intituled Geometria Organica. The two papers inserted in the Philosophical Transactions in 1719 were probably composed about this time. The first is, Of the Construction and Measure of Curves, No. 356. The other, A new Method of describing all Kinds of Curves, No. 359.

[D] He lived retired at his uncle's house] In this retirement he continued his researches in mathematics and philosophy, and sometimes read the best classic authors, for which, 'tis said, he had an exceeding good taste. And in the intervals of his studies, climbing up the lofty mountains amidst which he lived, would sometimes break out into a hymn, or poetic rhapsody, on the beauties of nature, and the perfection of it's author. Of these some fragments still remain; which, though unfinished, yet shew a genius capable of much greater things in that way.

[E] Appointed professor of mathematicks in the marishal college of Aberdeen.] He obtained this professorship after a comparative tryal of ten days, with a very able competitor. Being fixed in the chair, he soon revived the taste of mathematical learning, and raised it higher than it had ever been in that university.

[F] His treatise intituled Geometria Organica.] In this work he treats of the description of curve lines by continued motion. The first and simplest of curves (the circle) is described by the motion of a right line upon a plane round one of it's extremities. Sir Isaac Newton had shewn, that the conic sections might all be described by assuming two centres or poles in a plane, and moving round them in two given angles, so as the intersection of two legs be always found in a straight line given in position in the same plane; for thus the intersection of the other two will trace some conic section. In a similar way he describes such lines of the third order, as have a double point, that is to say, which returning upon themselves, pass twice through the same point; but the description of the far greater number of those lines, which have no such point, Sir Isaac declares to be a problem of much more difficulty. This was reserved for Mr Maclaurin, who not only happily resolved it, but carried the same method of description much higher, by assuming more poles, or by moving the angular points along more lines given in position; or, lastly, by carrying the intersections along curves lines instead of straight, he has extended or given hints of extending the method as far as it can go. And because by the motion of rulers actually combined as the case requires, such descriptions may be effected, he calls them by the general name of Organical. When he wrote this treatise, the subjects being new and entertaining, his invention in it's prime, and the ardour of his curiosity continually urging him on to farther discoveries, he did not take time to finish every demonstration in so elegant a manner as he might have done. His page we must own is incumbered with algebraical calculations, and these have offended the delicate eyes of some critics; but in answer to this it may be said, that what offends them may be very acceptable to younger students: nor indeed should we at all have mentioned this blemish in so great a work, if himself had not somewhere hinted at it; and, in a letter to one of his friends, expressed an intention of resuming with his first leisure that whole theory, and adding to it a supplement, the greatest part of which had been printed several years ago, but whereof we have only an abstract in the Philosophical Transactions, December 18, 1732. On the Description of Curves; with an Account of farther Improvements, and a Paper dated at Nancy, November 27th, 1722; No. 439. In the same volume, he gives a new theory of the curves, which may be derived from any given curve, by conceiving perpendiculars to it's tangents, to

tion of their President. In 1721 he undertook a second journey to London, in which he became acquainted with Martin Folkes, Esq; [G], afterwards President of the same Society. And the year after, he was engaged by Lord Polwarth to go tutor and companion to his eldest son, who was then to set out upon his travels. After a short stay at Paris, and visiting some other towns in France, they fixed in Lorrain [H], where Mr Maclaurin wrote his piece on the percussion of bodies [I], which gained the prize of the Royal Academy of Sciences for 1724. Soon after this, an unhappy accident brought him back to his profession at Aberdeen [K]; but he had not been there long, before he was pre-elected to succeed be drawn continually through a given point, whose interfections with the tangents will form a new curve; from which last, another new curve may be formed in the same manner, and so on in infinitum. This furnishes many curious theorems: there are likewise some propositions concerning centripetal forces and other subjects, which, with the quotations he uses, shew the great progress he had already made in every part of mathematical learning, and how well acquainted he was with the writings of the best authors.

[G] Became acquainted with Martin Folkes, Esq; From this time he cultivated a most unreserved friendship with this gentleman, a frequent correspondence by letters was carried on between them, and Mr Maclaurin communicated all his views and improvements in the sciences to him. Two of his pieces sent to that gentleman were inserted in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 394, 408, concerning Equations with impossible roots. The subject is among the most difficult in Algebra, and our author's doctrine was attacked by Mr Campbell of the Dock-yard at Woolwich.

[H] They fixed in Lorrain. Here, besides the advantage of a good academy, they had that of the conversation of one of the most polite courts in Europe, that of Stanislaus, twice King of Poland, and father-in-law to the present King of France. Mr Maclaurin gained the esteem of both sexes in the place, and at the same time quickly improved that easy genteel behaviour which was natural to him, both from the temper of his mind, and from the advantages of a graceful person.

[I] His piece on the percussion of bodies. In 1686, Mr Leibnitz observing that a body projected perpendicularly upwards, with a double velocity, ascended to four times the height; thence inferred that the force of bodies in motion, or, which is the same thing, the force of percussion, was not truly estimated by compounding the quantity of matter in the body, with the velocity simply; for that this force was actually as the squares of the velocity. A doctrine of so much importance in mechanics, together with the name of Mr Leibnitz, quickly drew all peoples attention. The most eminent mathematicians in Europe were divided in their opinions, and engaged warmly in disputes about it. Hence, in 1724, the Royal Academy of Sciences at Paris made it their prize question, which was carried by Mr Maclaurin, who determined the controversy in favour of the old doctrine, which had been taught by Sir Isaac Newton. Upon this subject he observes, first, in answer to Mr Leibnitz, that when a body descends by it's gravity, the motion generated may be considered as the sum of the uniform and continual impulses accumulated in the body, during the time of it's falling. And when a body is projected perpendicularly upwards, it's motion may be considered as equivalent to the sum of the impulses of the same power, 'till they extinguish it. When the body is projected upwards with a double velocity, these uniform impulses must be continued for a double time, to be able to destroy the motion of the body; and hence it arises, that the body, by setting out with a double velocity, and ascending for a double time, must arise to a quadruple height before it's motion is exhausted. But this proves, that a body with a double velocity moves with a double force, since it is produced or destroyed by the same uniform power continued for a double time, and not with a quadruple force, though it arises to a quadruple height. This however, says he, was the argument upon which Mr Leibnitz first built this doctrine, and those which have been since derived from the indentings or hollows produced in soft bodies (as clay or tallow) by others (as large leaden bullets) falling into them, are much of the same kind and force.

2. Mr. Bernoulli the most learned and skilful advocate for the new doctrine, had grounded his arguments upon the third general law of motion, that action and reaction are equal; hence the sum of the absolute motions of bodies in their collisions is always preserved the same; which is so immediate a consequence of the equality of action and reaction, that to endeavour to prove it, would only render it more obscure; the augmentation or diminution of the force of the one, being a necessary consequence of the diminution or augmentation of the force of the other. Upon this principle he had advanced the following celebrated argument: A body with a velocity as two, is able to bend and overcome the resistance of four springs, one of which alone is equivalent to the force of the same body, moving with a velocity as one; from which he inferred, that in the former case the force is quadruple, though the velocity be only double of what it is in the latter case. In like manner, because a body moving with a velocity proportional to the diagonal of the rectangle, is able to ballance the resistance of two springs, proportional to the sides of the same rectangle; he thence inferred, that the force of a body moving with a velocity as the diagonal, is equal to the sum of the forces of two bodies moving with velocities proportional to the sides of the rectangle; and because the square of the diagonal is equal to the sum of the squares of the two sides; he thence inferred, that the forces of equal bodies are as the squares of their velocities.—But in all these arguments Mr Maclaurin observes, the third law of motion is greatly mistaken, though indeed these are the most plausible of any that have been offered, and the most likely to mislead their readers, yet therein it is not considered that the force which one body loses in acting upon another, is not equal to that which it produces or destroys in the other, estimated in any direction at pleasure, but in that only in which the first body acts. Hence it comes to pass, that it is not the sum of the absolute motions or forces of bodies, but this sum estimated in a given direction, that is preserved unaltered in their collisions, in consequence of the third law of motion; nor can the preservation of the sum of the absolute forces of any sort of bodies be considered as an immediate consequence of it. On the contrary, the sum of the absolute motions of even perfectly elastic bodies, is sometimes increased, and in some cases diminished by their collisions, as is evident from the composition and resolution of motions: if it be objected, that if the case were so, it would follow, that a cause would sometimes produce effects whose sum is greater than itself. In answer to this, Mr Maclaurin observes, that as this is allowed on all hands of motions and pressures, it cannot be absurd to extend it to forces, but must obtain in them for the same reasons. But farther he observes, that in consequence of the inertia of body, it not only resists any change of it's motion, but likewise any change in the direction of it's motion; and that when the action of bodies upon each other is not in a right line, both these are to be taken into the account. Upon the whole, as, in the former instances, Mr Leibnitz and his followers neglect the consideration of time in reasoning concerning the forces of bodies, so here they have not due regard to the directions of motions and forces in estimating and comparing their effects; which, however, in mechanical enquiries, are of no less importance than the motions or forces themselves (1).

We must not omit to take notice, that in 1740, the academy adjudged Mr Maclaurin a prize, which did him still more honour, for accounting for the motion of the tides from the theory of gravity; a question which had been given out the former year without receiving any solution. He happened to have only ten days time to draw up this paper, and could not find leisure to transcribe a fair copy, so that the Paris edition of it is incorrect; but he afterwards revised the whole, and inserted it in his treatise of Fluxions.

[K] An unhappy accident brought him back to his profession at Aberdeen Having quitted Lorrain, and got into the southern provinces of France, Mr Hume was seized seed Mr James Gregory in the Professorship of the Mathematicks at Edinburgh. This place was obtained for him by the particular recommendation of Sir Isaac Newton, from whom he received likewise a very kind letter on the occasion [L]; and, in November 1725, was introduced into that university [M]. In 1728, he wrote the History of the progress which Philosophy had made before Sir Isaac's time [N]. To this he afterwards added the more recent proofs and examples given by himself or others, on the subjects treated of by Sir Isaac; and the work was published after his decease, under the title of An Account of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophical Discoveries [O]. In the year 1733, Mr Maclaurin quitted the Bachelor's state, and married Anne, daughter of Mr Walter Stuart, Solicitor-General to his late Majesty for Scotland. Dr Berkeley, Bishop of Cloyne in Ireland, having, in the year 1734, published a treatise, intitled the Analyst, to explode the method of Fluxions, and at the same time to expose the Mathematicians in general as infidels in religion, our author thought himself concerned, both to vindicate his favourite study, and to repel an accusation, in which he was most unjustly involved. Accordingly he entered upon the design, but the work swelling in the prosecution, produced his treatise of Fluxions [P], which was published at Edinburgh in 1742, in two volumes, 4to.

While

seized with a fever, and died at Montpellier. Mr Maclaurin, in some letters written on that occasion, appears quite inconsolable: his own grief for his pupil, his companion, and friend; and his sympathy with a family to which he owed great obligations, and which had suffered an irreparable loss in the death of this young nobleman, rendered him altogether unhappy.

[L] This place was obtained for him by the particular recommendation of Sir Isaac Newton, from whom he received likewise a very kind letter on the occasion. The curators of the university were desirous of engaging Mr Maclaurin to supply the place of Mr Gregory, who through age and infirmities was become incapable of teaching. Several difficulties retarded this design for some time; particularly, the competition of a gentleman eminent for mathematical abilities, who had good interest with the patrons of the university; and the want of an additional fund for the new professor. Both these difficulties were got over, upon the receipt of two letters from Sir Isaac Newton. In one addressed to Mr Maclaurin, with allowance to shew it to the patrons of the university, Sir Isaac expresses himself thus: 'I am very glad to hear that you have a prospect of being joined to Mr James Gregory, in the professorship of the mathematicks at Edinburgh; not only because you are my friend, but principally because of your abilities, you being acquainted as well with the new improvements of mathematicks, as with the former state of those sciences; I heartily wish you good success, and shall be very glad of hearing of your being elected: I am with all sincerity your faithful friend and most humble servant.'

In a second letter to the then Lord Provost of Edinburgh, which Mr Maclaurin knew nothing of, 'till some years after Sir Isaac Newton's death, he writes thus, 'I am glad to understand that Mr Maclaurin is in good repute amongst you for his skill in mathematicks; for I think he deserves it very well; and to satisfy you that I do not flatter him, and also to encourage him to accept the place of assisting Mr Gregory, in order to succeed him, I am ready, (if you please to give me leave) to contribute twenty pounds per annum towards a provision for him, 'till Mr Gregory's place becomes void, if I live so long, and I will pay it to his order in London.'

[M] Was introduced into that university. Here there were generally upwards of a hundred young gentlemen attending his lectures every year. These he divided into four or five classes, in each of which he employed a full hour every day, from the first of November to the first of June: in the first or lowest class (sometimes divided into two) he taught the first six books of Euclid's Elements, plain trigonometry, practical geometry, the elements of fortification, and an introduction to algebra. The second class studied algebra, the eleventh and twelfth books of Euclid, spherical trigonometry, conic sections, and the general principles of astronomy. The third class went on in astronomy and perspective, read a part of Sir Isaac Newton's Principia, and had a course of experiments for illustrating them performed and explained to them. He afterwards read and demonstrated the elements of fluxions. Those in the fourth class read a system of fluxions, the doctrine of chances, and the rest of Newton's Principia.

[N] The history of the progress which philosophy had made before Sir Isaac's time. It was wrote at the request of Mr Conduitt, who then had a design to publish an account of Sir Isaac Newton's life, in which this history was to have been inserted. Mr Maclaurin sent it up to London, where it had the approbation of some of the best judges: Dr Rundle, in particular, afterwards bishop of Derry, was so pleased with the design, that he mentioned it to her late majesty; who did it the honour of a reading, and expressed a desire to see it published. But Mr Conduitt's death having prevented the execution of his part of the proposed work, Mr Maclaurin's manuscript was returned to him.

[O] An account of Sir Isaac Newton's philosophical discoveries. Our author's main design in this treatise seems to have been to explain only those parts of Sir Isaac's philosophy, that have been and are still controverted; for this reason, his grand discoveries concerning light and colours are but transiently touched upon, it being known, that since the experiments on which Sir Isaac's doctrine of light and colours is founded, have been repeated with due care, this doctrine has suffered no contestation: whereas his system of the world, his accounting for the celestial motions and the other great appearances of nature from gravity, is misunderstood, and even ridiculed to this day: the weak charge of occult qualities has been frequently repeated; foreign professors still amuse themselves with imaginary triumphs; even the polite and ingenious Cardinal de Polignac is seduced to lend them the harmony of his numbers. It was proper therefore that these gentlemen should once more be told (and by Mr Maclaurin) that their objections are altogether out of season; that the specdres they are combating are a creation of their own, no more related to Sir Isaac Newton's doctrines, than observation and experience are to occult qualities; that the followers of Sir Isaac Newton will for ever assert their right, to stop where they find they can get no further upon sure ground; and to make use of a principle firmly established in experience, adequate to all the purposes they apply it to, and in every application uniform and consistent with itself; although they perhaps despair of tracing the ulterior cause of that principle.

[P] His treatise of fluxions. Our author was induced to enlarge and improve his first view of the Analyst, by the performances of others who had undertaken that task, and the publick became a great gainer by this change. The treatise of fluxions is Mr Maclaurin's master-piece. His great work, on which he bestowed the greatest labour, and which will for ever do him honour. We are at a loss what most to admire in it, his solid and unexceptionable demonstrations of the grounds of the method itself, or it's application to such a variety of curious and useful problems. With respect to the first, he agreed with Dr Berkeley, that the terms infinite and infinitesimal, were become much too familiar to mathematicians, and had been abused both in arithmetick and geometry: at one time introducing and palliating real absurdities, and at others giving these sciences an affected mysterious air, which does not belong to them. In executing this part he has given so much greater a variety, and more interesting proofs of that abuse, as he had looked further into, and was much better acquainted with the mathematical science than the Bishop's inclination led him to. And
Mr Maclaurin

While he was engaged in this work, he was appointed Secretary to the Society for improving Medical Knowledge [Q] at Edinburgh, having procured their plan to be made more extensive, so as to take in all the parts of Physicks, together with the antiquities of the country. He likewise proposed the building of an astronomical observatory, and a convenient school for experiments [R], in the university; of which he drew an elegant and well contrived plan. In 1739, at the request of the Earl of Morton, he drew up a memorial of such observations as he thought necessary, for improving the natural history and settling the geography of the Orkneys and Shetland. He likewise furnished the proper instruments for this design, and recommended to his Lordship a fit operator * for managing them; after which he employed several of his scholars, who were then settled in the northern counties, to survey the coasts [S], in order to correct the erroneous geography * Viz. Mr Short the famous Optician.

Mr Maclaurin certainly deserved more from the publick than his Lordship's other antagonists, by the means which he took to remedy this growing evil; he was prevented by them in the simple character of an apologist, and he was resolved to turn it to the advantage of his own reputation, with which the publick service was inseparably connected. In order therefore to take away the handle which former methods had given for cavilling, he determined, in demonstrating the principles of fluxions, to reject whatever exceptionable terms had been made use of before, and to suppose no other than finite determinable quantities, such as Euclid treats of in his geometry; nor to use any other form of demonstration, than what the Ancients had frequently used, and which had been allowed as strictly conclusive from the first rise of the science: by which means he has secured this admirable invention from all future attacks, and at the same time, done justice to the accuracy of the admirable inventor. The work cost him infinite pains, but he did not grudge it: he thought that in proportion as they be established above all exception; and since they save us so much time and labour, we may allow the more for illustrating the methods themselves. To his demonstrations of this doctrine he has added many valuable improvements of it, and has applied it to so many curious and useful enquiries, that his work may be called a store-house of mathematical learning, rather than a treatise on one branch of it. The particulars we need not enumerate, especially as there is printed in the Philosophical Transactions (2) a clear and methodical account of them, to which we refer the reader. Throughout the whole there appears a masterly genius, and an uncommon address; though, because of the infinite extent of the matter, it is not equally perfect in all its parts. After all, in fixing the method of fluxions upon a different foundation from that of the great inventor, he disappointed the expectations of Sir Isaac Newton's friends, who, notwithstanding his incidental proofs to evince the truth of that foundation, could not help seeing a slur manifestly put upon it by this shift. Nor did he succeed in his own expectations, by making such a sacrifice to Dr Berkeley, who, notwithstanding the high compliment of sending the sheets of this treatise to him as they were printed off, for his approbation, was so far from being convinced of the legality of the method, that in his Synopsis, or treatise on transcendental mathematics, published in 1744, he renewed the charge, alleging that, 'nothing more had still been done, than that different persons had expressed the same thing in different ways.' Neither, lastly, did the account our author gave of the way which led him to his own foundation of the method prove satisfactory; he says, it was first suggested to him from a particular attention to Sir Isaac Newton's brief reasoning in that place of his principles of philosophy, where he first published the elements of this doctrine; and that it was not 'till after the greatest part of the treatise on fluxions was wrote, that he had the pleasure of observing, that geometricians of the first rank had recourse to it long ago on several occasions, as a method of the strictest kind. * Mr de Fermat, contious he, in a letter to Gassendi and Mr Huygens, in his Horolog. Oscillat. have employed it for completing the demonstration of some theorems that were proposed by Galileo, and proved by him in a less accurate manner; and Dr Barrow has demonstrated by it a theorem concerning the tangents of curves (3). Now to pass over Fermat and Huygens, the supposition that a person of Mr Maclaurin's known skill in the history as well as science of the mathematicks, should, 'till the time herein implied, be ignorant of Dr Barrow's rule for the inverse method of tangents has been thought unaccountable, and must depend wholly upon the strength of his moral character (4).

[Q] Appointed secretary to the society for improving medical knowledge] At the monthly meetings of this society, Mr Maclaurin generally read some performance or observation of his own, or communicated the contents of his letters from foreign parts; by which means the society was informed of every new discovery or improvement of the sciences. Several of these papers are printed in the fifth and sixth volumes of the Medical Essays. Some of them are likewise published in the Philosophical Transactions, and Mr Maclaurin had occasion to insert a great many more in his Treatise of Fluxions, and in his account of Sir Isaac Newton's philosophy, by which means the publication of any volume of the works of the society since his death has been retarded.

[R] He drew a plan for an observatory, and contributed to the building, &c.] An observatory being much wanted in the college, the city magistrates were frequently applied to for their assistance in so desirable a work, especially in the year 1736, when it was almost agreed to; but a stop being put by the troubles which betel Edinburgh on the unhappy murder of John Porteous, a lieutenant of the town-guard, by the populace, all proceedings in this affair were laid aside 'till the year 1741, when our author considering, that a sum of money amounting to 110 l. sterling was already raised, and by the promises of a certain gentleman, considerable benefactions were to be expected, provided the intended observatory was built in his lifetime; he revived the design, by petitioning the Town-Council for their assistance, either in their publick or private capacity, and of all others, who had a regard for the welfare of Edinburgh and advancement of learning; and to encourage them, he proposed to read a course of lectures in experimental philosophy, and the money to be applied for that use. By this means contributions were raised which increased the former sum to 300 l. sterling. The Earls of Morton and Hopton shewed their liberality, as well as their love of the sciences on this occasion; as did the honourable Baron Clerk, Vice-President of the Philosophical Society, and several noblemen and gentlemen offered to contribute what instruments of value they were possessed of, as soon as the observatory should be ready to receive them. Some time after, the plan abovementioned being finished, our professor acquainted the Town-Council that he intended forthwith to set about the work, and begged so much of the southern row of buildings in the upper court of the college as was sufficient for the purpose, and that the sum of 220 l. sterling for stone bought by the city for the use of the said observatory might be remitted; all which was not only granted, but also the materials of the houses to be taken down on this occasion, as an additional encouragement for him to proceed; and the intended edifice, for the greater conveniency, was to be erected in the middlemost part of the said southern row of buildings; but on Mr Maclaurin's death, which happened soon after, the design was again laid aside (5) and has not been resumed since. We see the design was first started in 1736, and very possibly might take its rise from the annular eclipse of the sun at Edinburgh, which happened the 18th of February that year, and was not only carefully observed there by himself, but he also invited and encouraged others every where to do the like, herein copying the example of Dr Halley (6), in regard to the like eclipse which happened in 1715.

geography of those parts, and thereby help to procure a good map of Scotland, which was much wanted. The same zeal for the publick service prompted him to undertake the drawing of another memorial, in defence of a north-east passage into the South-Seas in 1744 [T]. But the most remarkable instance of this zeal appeared on occasion of the rebellion in 1745, which taking it's rise in the north of Scotland, was not long before it spread itself southwards, and began to threaten the capital. Mr Maclaurin was among the first to rouse the friends of the government from the security they had then continued in; and though he was sensible that Edinburgh, far from being able to stand the attack of a regular army, could not even hold out a considerable time against the undisciplined and ill-armed force that was coming against it; yet, as he foresaw of how much advantage it would be to the rebels to get possession of that capital, and the King's forces under the command of Sir John Cope being daily expected, he drew plans of the walls; proposed the several trenches, barricadoes, batteries, and such other defences as he thought could be got ready before the arrival of the rebels, and by which he hoped the town might be kept 'till the King's forces should come to it's relief. The whole burden, not only of contriving, but also of overseeing, the execution of these hasty fortifications, fell to Mr Maclaurin's share; he was employed night and day in making plans, and running from place to place; and the anxiety, fatigue, and cold, to which he was thus exposed; affecting a constitution naturally of weak nerves, laid the foundation of the distemper which proved fatal to him. How this plan came to be neglected, and the rebels to get possession of the town, is not our business to relate; we must refer the reader to the history of this rebellion (b). They got possession of it; and their spirits being raised by that success, and by the supply of arms and provisions which it gave them, they soon after defeated the King's troops at Preston-Pans. Hereupon they grew more confident, and expected obedience to all their orders and proclamations. Among these, one contained a command to all who had been volunteers in defence of the town, to wait on their Secretary of State before a limited time, to subscribe a recantation of what they had done, and a promise of submission to their government, on pain of being treated as rebels. Mr Maclaurin had been too active and distinguished a volunteer, to think he could escape the severest treatment if he fell into their hands; he therefore withdrew privately into England before the last day of receiving the submissions; but, previous to his escape, found means to convey a good telescope into the castle, and concerted a method of supplying the garrison with provisions. He fled to the North of England, where he soon received a friendly invitation from Dr Thomas Herring, then Archbishop of York, afterwards of Canterbury, to reside with him during his stay in that country. Mr Maclaurin gladly accepted this kindness, the sense of which soon after drew the following expression from him in a letter to a friend. 'Here, says he, I live with his Grace as happily as a man can do, who is ignorant of the state of his family, and who sees the ruin of his country.' His Grace kept a regular correspondence with him after his return to Edinburgh, as he did on the rebels marching into England; and when it was suspected, upon their return thence, that they might once more take possession of that city, the Archbishop invited his former guest to take refuge with him again. At York he had been observed to be more meagre than ordinary, and with a sickly look, though, not being apprehensive of any danger at that time, he did not call in the assistance of a Physician; but having had a fall from his horse in his journey southward, and when the rebel army marched into England, having, in his return home, been exposed to most tempestuous cold weather, upon his arrival he complained of being much out of order. In a little time his disease was discovered to be a dropsy of the belly, to remove which, variety of medicines, prescribed by the most eminent Physicians of London as well as Edinburgh, and three tapplings, were used without making a cure. His behaviour, during this tedious and painful distemper, was such as became a Philosopher and a Christian, calm, chearful, and resigned, his senses and judgment remaining in their full vigour 'till within a few hours of his death. Then, for the first time, his amanuensis, to whom he was dictating the last chapter of his Account of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy (in which he proves the wisdom, the power, goodness, and other attributes, of the Deity), observed some hesitation or repetition; no pulse could then be felt in any part of his body, and his hands and feet were already cold. Notwithstanding this extremely weak condition, he sat in his chair, and spoke to his friend, Dr Monro, with his usual serenity and strength of reason, desiring the doctor to account for Strathnaver, with remarks on the natural history and rarities of the country, together with directions to seafaring people. This map was presented to the philosophical society at Edinburgh, and published by their order. The reverend Mr Bonnar drew likewise a map of the three most northerly islands of Shetland, which is among Mr Maclaurin's papers; and a correct map of the Orkneys from his own observations has been lately published by Mr Mackenzie.

[T] Memorial for the discovery of a north east passage, &c. After reading all the accounts he could procure of voyages both in the south and north seas, he imagined the sea was open all the way from Greenland to the South-sea by the North Pole; of which he was so much persuaded, that he had been heard to say, if his situation could admit of such adventures, he would undertake the voyage even at his own charges. But when schemes for finding out such a passage were laid before the Parliament in 1744, and he was consulted about them by several persons of high rank and influence, before he could finish the memorials which he proposed to have sent, the premium was limited to the discovery of a north west passage, and Mr Maclaurin used to regret that the word west was inserted, because he thought that passage, if at all to be found, must lie not far from the pole (7).

for a phænomenon which he then observed in himself. Flashes of fire seemed to dart from his eyes, while, in the mean time, his sight was failing, so that he could scarce distinguish one object from another. In a little time after this conversation he desired to be laid upon his bed, where, on Saturday the fourth of June, 1746, he had an easy passage out of this world. Dr Monro spoke his elogium at the first meeting of the university after his death; wherein he shewed, by a variety of instances, that acute parts and extensive learning were in Mr Maclaurin but inferior qualities; that he was still more nobly distinguished from the bulk of mankind by the qualities of the heart; his sincere love to God and men, his universal benevolence and unaffected piety, together with a warmth and constancy in his friendships, that was in a manner peculiar to himself. The Doctor professes likewise, that, after an intimacy with him for so many years, he had but half known his worth, which then only disclosed itself in it's full lustre, when it came to suffer the severe test of that distressful situation, in which every man must at last find himself, and which only minds prepared like his, armed with virtue and Christian hope, can bear with dignity. As his inclinations lay entirely to the Mathematicks, so, by his writings in that science, he has merited the character of a genius. An ordinary artist follows the first, not generally the best, road that presents itself, and arrives, perhaps, at the solution of his problem, but it will scarcely be either elegant or clear; one may see there is something still wanting, the result being little more scientific than that of an arithmetical operation, where the given numbers and their relations have all disappeared. This was not the case with Mr Maclaurin; he had a quick comprehensive view, taking in at once all the means of investigation; he could select the fittest for his purpose, and apply them with exquisite art and method. This is a faculty not to be acquired by exercise only; we ought rather to call it a species of that taste, the gift of nature, which in Mathematicks, as in other things, distinguishes excellence from mediocrity. There appears, in all our author's later works, especially in the Treatise of Fluxions, numberless instances of this address [U]. Nor is his humility a less distinguishing mark of his masterly genius. The further he advanced in the knowledge of Geometry and Nature, the greater his aversion grew to perfect systems, hypotheses, and dogmatizing; without peevishly despising the attainments we can arrive at, or the uses to which they serve, he saw there lay infinitely more beyond our reach; and used to call our highest discoveries but a dawn of knowledge, suited to our circumstances and wants in this life; which, however, we ought thankfully to acquiesce in for the present, in hopes that it will be improved in a happier and more perfect state. It may be justly esteemed another proof of his superior genius in these studies, that he saw their great importance in all the arts of civil life, in assisting, as Lord Bacon says, the powers of man, and extending his dominion in nature (c). To this view of general utility Mr Maclaurin had accommodated all his studies; and we find in many places of his Works, an application even of the most abstruse theories, to the perfecting of mechanical arts. He had resolved, for the same purpose, to compose a course of practical Mathematics, and to rescue several useful branches of the science from the bad treatment they often meet with in less skilful hands. But of all this his death deprived the world, unless we would reckon, as a part of his intended work, the translation of Dr David Gregory's Practical Geometry, which he revised and published with additions in 1745 (d). In his life-time, however, he often had the pleasure to serve his friends and country by his superior skill. Whatever difficulty occurred concerning the construction or perfecting of machines, the working of mines, the improvement of manufactures, the conveying of water, or the execution of any other publick work, Mr Maclaurin was at hand to resolve it. He was likewise employed to determine some disputes of consequence that had arisen at Glasgow concerning the gauging of vessels, and for that purpose presented to the Commissioners of Excise two elaborate memorials, containing rules by which the officers now act with their demonstrations (e). But what must have given him a higher satisfaction than any thing else of this kind, was the calculations he made relative to an office of assurance, which is now established by Law, for the children and widows of the Scotch clergy, and the Professors in the universities, entitling them to certain annuities and sums upon the voluntary annual payment of a certain sum by the incumbent. In contriving and adjusting the scheme, Mr Maclaurin had bestowed great labour, and the gentlemen who were appointed to solicit the affair at London, found the authority of his name of great use to them, for removing any doubts that were started concerning the sufficiency of the proposed fund, or the due proportion of the sums and annuities. But what most endeared his studies to him, and is another instance of his excellent genius for them, was the use they are of in demonstrating the being and attributes of God, and establishing the principles of Natural Religion on a solid foundation. Nor was he less strenuous in defence of Revealed Religion, which he would warmly undertake as often as it was attacked, either occasionally in conversation, or in those pernicious books which have brought the name of Free-thinker into disgrace (f), and have so much contributed to spoil our taste as well as our morals: and how firm his persuasion of it was, appeared from the support it afforded him in his last [U] Instances of this address in his treatise of fluxions. Among these, it will be sufficient only to mention his reducing so many solutions, which used to be managed by the higher orders of fluxions to those of an

last hours. He was survived by his wife and five children; two sons, John and Colin, and three daughters; his concern for whom appeared by his last Will, wherein he bequeathed his manuscripts in trust to Martin Folkes, Esq; then President of the Royal Society; Andrew Mitchell, Esq; Member of Parliament for the shire of Aberdeen; and the Reverend Mr John Hill, Chaplain to Dr Herring Archbishop of Canterbury (g). In consequence of this trust, these gentlemen immediately set about publishing what Mr Maclaurin had designed and prepared for the press, his Algebra [W], and the Account of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy [X]; in which they employed a person, whose regard for the author's memory was a sure pledge of his utmost diligence. They likewise set on foot and solicited a subscription for the latter of these works, which the situation of Mr Maclaurin's family made necessary. For not to mention, that the thoughts of a Philosopher are not much turned to the saving of money, nor is his curiosity to be gratified but at a considerable expence, our author's liberality was greater than his fortune could well bear. It was not advice and recommendation only that he furnished to young men, in whom he could discover a promising and virtuous disposition; he often supplied them with money, 'till his recommendations could take place. This, however, proved no loss to his family, as it was remembered and rewarded by the generous manner in which many gentlemen of worth promoted the subscription (b).

[W] His Algebra This was published in 1748, 8vo, and is allowed to be excellent in it's kind, containing in no large volume, a complete elementary treatise of that science, as far as it has hitherto been carried, all the most useful rules which lie scattered in so many authors being clearly laid down and demonstrated, and in that order which he had found to be the best in a long course of methodical teaching. He is more sparing, 'tis true, in the practical applications than most other writers, but it was done designedly, he was of opinion that many of those applications deserve to be treated of apart, and to have taken much of them into his plan would have been like disfiguring the elements of Euclid (as we see the manner is of lesser genius's) by mixing with them the rules of practical geometry. To this work is subjoined, as a proper appendix, his Latin tract De linearum geometricarum proprietatibus generalibus. It is carefully printed from a manuscript all written and corrected by the author's own hand, and as it was among the last, so it appears to have been in his own judgment one of the best of his performances (8).

[X] An account of Sir Isaac Newton's Philosophy. The plan and execution of this work has been already mentioned with due applause in general; but, as general praise, like general censure, may be thought to merit little or no regard, if utterly unsupported by any instance, we shall conclude this memoir with the following instance, as a sample whereby to form a judgment of the rest, which, at the same time, will confirm what has been said concerning the religious part of Mr Maclaurin's character. In the last chapter of this Account, explaining and defending the famous scholium which closes the Principia, having answered some lesser objections to the doctrine laid down therein concerning the Deity, he proceeds thus. 'But the greatest clamour has been raised against Sir Isaac, by those who have imagined, that he represented infinite space as an attribute of the Deity (9), and that he is present in all parts of space by diffusion. The truth is, no such expressions appear in his writings. He observes, indeed, that as the Deity exists necessarily, and by the same necessity exists every where and always, he constitutes space and duration; but it does not appear, that this expression can give any just ground of complaint; for it is saying no more, than that since he is essentially and necessarily present in all parts of space and duration, these, of consequence, must necessarily exist. This idea is so far from giving any just ground of complaint, that it accounts for the necessary existence of space in a way worthy of the Deity. Again, Sir Isaac is so far from representing the Deity as present in space by diffusion, that he expressly tells us, there are successive parts in duration, and co-existent parts in space; but that neither [of these] are found in the soul or principle of thought which is in man, and that far less can they be found in the divine substance. As man is one and the same in all the periods of his life, and through all the variety of sensations and passions to which he is subject, much more must we allow the supreme Deity to be one and the same in all time, and in all space free from change and external influence. He adds, that the Deity is present every where, not by his virtue only, but by his substance also, though in a manner wholly incorporeal, in a manner altogether unknown to us. It is plain, therefore, that he was far from meaning that the Deity was present every where by the diffusion of his substance, as a body is present in space, by having it's parts diffused in it (10).'

(9) Our author had before, viz. in E. H. chap. i. §. 9. defended Sir Isaac's doctrine of the reality of absolute space and motion in the eighth definition of the Principia, lib. i. against Joseph Clarke's Examination of Dr Edmund Law, in notes to King's Origin of Evil, and his Enquiry into the Ideas of Space, &c. and Dr Waterland's Dissertation upon the argument à priori, &c.

MARSH [NARCISsus], successively Bishop of Leighlin and Ferns, and Archbishop of Cashell, Dublin, and Armagh, in Ireland, in the end of the last and beginning of this century; was born December 20, 1638, at Hannington near Highworth in Wiltshire [A]. He received the first rudiments of learning in that his native place; and being well fitted for the university, was admitted into Magdalen-hall in Oxford the beginning of July, 1654 (a). There he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, February 12, 1657 (b); and, on the 30th of June, 1658, was elected Fellow of Exeter-college (c), as a member of which he took the degree of Master of Arts, July 13, 1660; that of Bachelor of Divinity, 12 December, 1667; and at last that of Doctor in Divinity, 23 June, 1671 (d). During these periods he was made chaplain to Seth Ward, Bishop of Exeter, and afterwards of Sarum, and then to the Lord-Chancellor Hyde Earl of Clarendon. He was also chosen one of the additional Proctors for keeping the university in better order, during King Charles the Second's abode there in 1665. On the 12th of May, 1673, he was appointed Principal of St Alban's-hall in Oxford by the Duke of Ormond, Chancellor of that university (e): and, by his good discipline and government, brought that hall into a flourishing condition. Being well skilled in the practical part of Musick, he had, in his lodgings lodgings [B], a weekly meeting or concert of instrumental, and sometimes of vocal, Music, for his own refreshment, and the diversion and entertainment of such gentlemen as delighted in that faculty *. But the most excellent Dr John Fell knowing him to be fit for higher employments, so effectually joined his own interest with that of the Duke of Ormond, then Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, that King Charles the Second nominated him to succeed Dr Michael Ward in the Provostship of Dublin-college, in December 1678; and he was sworn into that office the 24th of January following. Also, the 27th of February, he was admitted Doctor in Divinity in that university. While he enjoyed that great trust, he spent very much of his time in his studies, and yet always performed his publick duties so exactly, as to be a compleat pattern to all his successors. In this useful employment he did not, however, continue long: for, upon the death of Bishop Boyle, he was advanced to the sees of Leighlin and Ferns the 27th of February, 1682-3, and consecrated in Christ-church Dublin the sixth of May following. With these sees, he held the rectory of Kilebban in the diocese of Leighlin in commendam †. He was translated from hence to the Archbishopric of Cashell on the 26th of February, 1690; from thence to Dublin the 24th of May, 1694; and then to Armagh the 18th of February, 1702-3 (f). While he presided over the see of Dublin, he built a noble library near the palace of St Sepulchre's, which he enlarged after his translation to Armagh, and filled it with a choice collection of books; having for that purpose bought the library of Dr Edward Stillingfleet, formerly Bishop of Worcester, to which he added his own collection [C]: and, to make it the more useful to the publick, he plentifully endowed a Librarian and Sublibrarian to attend it at certain prescribed hours. This Prelate also plentifully endowed an almshouse or hospital at Droghedah, for the reception of twelve widows of decayed clergymen; to each of whom he allotted a lodging, and twenty pounds a year for a maintenance [D]. He likewise repaired many decayed churches within his diocese at his own expence; and bought in several impropriations, which he restored to the church. Nor did he confine his good actions to Ireland only, but extended his bounty to the encouragement of the propagation of the Gospel, and to other works of munificence and charity (g). Among the rest, he gave a great number of manuscripts in the oriental languages, chiefly purchased out of Golius's collection, to the Bodleian library (b). After having lived many years in great honour and reputation, and been seven times appointed one of the Lords-Justices of Ireland [E], he departed this life November 2, 1713, in the 75th year of his age [F], and was buried in a vault in the church-yard of St Patrick's, adjoining to his library: where a stately monument of white marble was erected to his memory. But this monument receiving injury from the weather, was removed into St Patrick's church, and placed on the south side of the west isle, in one of the large arches (i). His character [G], with an account of the few things he published [H], are given below in the notes.

[C] He built a noble library, &c. It is computed, that, besides the endowment, which amounted to 250l. a year, he expended more than 4000l. in the building and books; and to make every thing secure to perpetuity he obtained an act of parliament for the settling and preserving of it. But there is one thing wanting to render it more compleat: which is a supply of books from the time of its establishment. There being only the small fund of 10l. a year allotted for this purpose, which is little more than sufficient to keep the books in order (3).

[D] This Prelate also plentifully endowed an Almshouse, or Hospital, for the reception of twelve widows of decayed Clergymen, &c. And he appointed that the widows which might be intitled to such provision, should be the widows of those, whose husbands served a cure in the diocese of Armagh; if not enough of such to take up the charity, then the widows of such who served a cure in the diocese of Meath; and for want of a sufficient number of such, then to the widows of the province of Armagh at large: and he provided, that if in such places widows enough were not found to take up the fund, then the same to be applied, to put out children of clergymen apprentices, or upon their education. And he allotted, out of the general fund, forty pounds a year to the Dean and Chapter of Armagh, to be applied to the support of that church (4).

[F] In the 75th year of his age. And not in the 76th as the learned Mr Harris has it: for he wanted six weeks of being full seventy five.

[G] His character. It is elegantly described in his epitaph: of which the part, that relates thereto in particular, as translated into English by Mr Harris, runs thus:

Now take the Talents of his Mind,
Which were equal to, nay even greater Than all these Employments.
As Provost, Prelate, and Governour
He promoted, encreased, and established,
In the Universities, the study of sound Learning,
In the Church, Piety and primitive Discipline,
In the Republick, Peace and a Reverence for the Laws;
By living always a pious and unblameable Life,
By encouraging the learned,
By defending his Fellow-Citizens.
Among all these great Duties,
He dedicated his leisure hours
To the study of Mathematicks and natural Philosophy;
And above all was highly skilled
In the knowledge of Languages, especially the Oriental:
Endowed with the highest knowledge
Of the sacred Scriptures, and Ecclesiastical History,
He transferred
The truth and beauty of the Christian Religion
Into his life, and the government of the Church.
Thus he became
Dear, worthy, and useful to all.

MARSHAM [Sir JOHN], a very learned English Historian in the XVIIth century, was the second son of Thomas Marsham, Esq; [A] Alderman of London, and born in the parish of St Bartholomew's in that city, August 23, 1602. After a suitable education at Westminster-school, he was admitted, in the beginning of the year 1619, into St John's-college in Oxford (a), where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, 17 February, 1622-3 (b); and that of Master, 5 July, 1625 (c); in which last year he went into France, and spent the winter at Paris. The two following years he travelled into most parts of that kingdom, visited Italy, and some parts of Germany, and then returned to London, where he studied the Common-Law in the Middle-Temple. In 1629, he went through Holland and Gelderland to the siege of Bois-le-Duc; and thence by Flushing to Boulogne and Paris, in the retinue of Sir Thomas Edmondes, Ambassador Extraordinary, sent to take the oath of Lewis the Thirteenth, to the peace newly concluded between the courts of England and France (d). After his return home, he applied himself again to the study of the Law; and, in the beginning of the year 1637-8, was sworn one of the six Clerks in Chancery. Upon the breaking out of the civil wars, he followed King Charles the First and the Great Seal to Oxford; for which he was deprived of his place by the Parliamentarians; and they plundering his real estate, he lost to an incredible value. After the surrender of the garrison of Oxford, and the ruin of the King's affairs, he returned to London; and having compounded for his real estate (e), for the sum of 356l. 16s. 2d. (f), he betook himself wholly to his studies [B] and a retired life. In the beginning of the year 1660, he was returned one of the citizens, or representatives, for Rochester, in the Parliament which recalled King Charles the Second; about which time being restored to his place in Chancery, he had the honour of knighthood conferred upon him July 1, 1660, being then styled of Whorn-place in the parish of Cuckston in Kent, and three years after was created a Baronet. He was a well accomplished gentleman; exact in the knowledge of History, Chronology, and Languages (g). His Chronicus Canon gained him great reputation [C]: This learned person dyed at Bushy-hall in Hertfordshire, [A] The second son of Thomas Marsham, Esq; This Thomas Marsham had issue, by Magdalen, daughter of Richard Springham, merchant of London, six sons, and four daughters, and was buried, March 12, 1624, in Hlington church. We are told, that the Marsham family was so denominated from the town of Marsham in Norfolk, which is very probable (1).

[B] He betook himself wholly to his studies.] The fruit of which was, I. Diatriba Chronologica; i. e. a Chronological Dissertation; wherein he examines succinctly the principal Difficulties that occur in the Chronology of the Old Testament, Lond. 1649. 4to. Most part of it was inserted afterwards into his Canon Chronicus. II. He wrote the Preface to the first volume of the Monasticon Anglicanum, which is intitled, ΠΡΟΟΡΥΔΑΙΩΝ Johannis Marshamii: containing five sheets and a half in folio, 1655.

[C] His Chronicus Canon gained him great reputation.] What is chiefly new, and most observable in this learned work, is as follows. The Egyptians, 'tis well known, pretended to an excessive antiquity: and had framed a list of thirty successive Dynasties, amounting in the whole to 36,525 years; an immense number, vastly exceeding the age of the world! (2). Which, from the Creatinn to this time, is by the best historians allowed to be but about 5757 years. This whole chaos of Dynasties was rejected at once, by some of the ablest Chronologers, as fabulous, and of no manner of value or credit (3).—But Sir John Marsham first guessed, that these Dynasties were not successive, but collateral; and, without rejecting any, was the first who earnestly set about reducing the entire series to the Scripture Chronology. He makes Menes the first king of all Egypt (4), contemporary with Noah and Arphaxad: and supposes, that Egypt, immediately after the death of Menes, was divided into four distinct kingdoms, viz, Thebes, This, Memphis, and lower Egypt; besides some of lesser note which arose afterwards, and whose epochs are more difficult to be settled; and that it continued so divided for almost seven centuries, till the Pestors made themselves masters of all, except that of Thebes; after whose expulsion, in about seven hundred years after, Egypt became subject to one Prince, namely Sesoltris. The authors of the Universal History observe (5), That Sir John's work is full of uncommon learning, and curious observations; but they blame him for adhering to very scrupulously to the Hebrew chronology; whereby he is obliged to make Menes the same with Ham, Noah's son, and not Mizraim, the son of Ham; which last is the most received opinion; and to begin the date of his reign immediately from the Flood: that is, in effect, to make him a king before he could have any subjects. He follows Diodorus (6) in reckoning 1400 years from Menes to Sesoltris, whom therefore he asserts to be the Sesac or Sbisak of the Scriptures, though Diodorus plainly reckons a much larger interval between them. In which last particular, as he has been strenuously opposed by Pezron, Mr Whitton, Mr Bedford, &c. to he has been followed by Sir Isaac Newton, Dr Shuckford, Boffuet, Le Clerc, &c. In this work Sir John makes great use of the table of the Theban kings given us by Eratosthenes. But, as to Sesoltris being the same as Shithak; that point is fully examined in the Universal History abovementioned (7).—Sir John thinks, Menes to be the same as Jupiter Hammon, Belus, and Saturnus; Tautes, or Thoth, Mercury; Thamuz, Adonis; Toforthrus, Æsculapius; &c. (8).—The learned Dr Shuckford, after having represented the foundation of Sir John Marsham's Canon with regard to Egypt, proceeds to give this character of that useful work (9). Upon these hints and observations Sir John Marsham has opened to us a prospect of coming at an history of the succession of the kings of Egypt, and that in a method so natural and easy, that it must approve itself to any person, that enters truly into the design and conduct of it. He gives us Eratosthenes's Theban kings; he ranges with these Syncellus's twenty five kings of Mestraa or lower Egypt, and by taking Africanus's Dynasties in pieces; by separating the Thinite Dynasties from the Memphite; by collecting the kings of each title into a distinct catalogue, he offers us two other concurrent lists of the names of the kings of the other two kingdoms.—However, there is one difficulty, which I with our very learned author had considered and discussed for us, and that is, that the catalogues of the kings of three of the four kingdoms are too long to come within the intervals of time, which the true chronology of the world

'can allow for them.'—The Doctor having given afterwards a view of Sir John's scheme, from the beginning of the reigns of the Egyptian kings down to Sefostris, adds (10), that, 'if the reader will take the pains thoroughly to examine it, if he will take it in pieces into all its parts, review the materials of which it is formed, consider how they lie in the authors from whom they are taken, and what manner of collecting and disposing them is made use of, he will find, that, however in some lesser points a variation from our very learned author may be defensible, yet no tolerable scheme can be formed of the Egyptian history, that is not in the main agreeing with him. Sir John Marsham has led us to a clear and natural place for the name of every Egyptian king, and time of his reign, who is mentioned by either Eratosthenes, Africanus from Manetho, Josephus, or Syncellus, that we can reasonably think had a place in the Egyptian history.'—It is to be observed, That Sir John supposed, the Jews derived part of their ceremonies from the Egyptians (11). An opinion wherein Dr J. Spencer, and others, concurred with him. But it is confuted by Mr Menckenius, in the Preface to the Leipzig edition of our Author's Canon.—Sir John applies also the famous Prophecy of Daniel's LXX weeks to Antiochus Epiphanes (12). But he is confuted by Christoph Wagenfeil in his Mantissa de LXX Heptadibus Daniels (13); and others.—Bishop Cumberland hath written a tract, wherein he makes it his business, to prove from Scripture and from Heathen authors, that there was an Assyrian Empire before Nabonassar; in opposition to Sir John Marsham (14). Which is thus far true; that there might be an Assyrian Kingdom, or even Empire, but not an Assyrian Monarchy, before Nabonassar. III. Sir J. Marsham's learned work that we have been hitherto speaking of, was first beautifully printed at London in 1672. fol. under this title, Canon Chronicus Aegyptiacus, Ebraicus, Graecus, & Disquisitiones. In 1676 it was reprinted at Leipzig, 4to. and said, in the title page, to be, Longè emendatior recensio, adjectis indicibus locupletissimis. Notwithstanding which, it is thought not to be much more correct than the former. A third edition was printed at Francker in 1696, 4to. which is not so much valued as any of the former; though said in the title-page to be longè emendatior. IV. Sir John left behind him at his death unfinished, Canonis Chronici liber quintus: sive Imperium Persicum. De Provinciis & Legionibus Romanis. De Re nummaria, &c. (15)

[D] Sir John Marsham of Cuckston, Bart.] He was a studious and learned gentleman, and made a great progress in writing the History of England in a more exact and correct manner than any then extant: but no part of it was ever published. He likewise compiled an Historical List of all the Burroughs in England. His father left him his library, which, though diminished by the fire of London, anno 1666, yet was very considerable, and highly to be valued for the exquisite remarks in the margin of most of the books (16). He married Esther (or Hester), daughter of John Sayer, Esq; of Bouchier's-hall in Aldham, Essex, by which he had his only son and heir Sir John Marsham, Bart. who dyed without issue.

[E] And Sir Robert Marsham of Bristly-hall, Kent.] This second son of Sir John, had, by the gift of his father, his cabinet of Greek medals, more curious than any other private collection; and was also a studious and learned gentleman. He succeeded his father as one of the six clerks in Chancery, and, in July 1681, received the honour of knighthood. He was also constituted by charter in 1664, and 1685, one of the Aldermen of Hertford and St Albans. He served in three several Parliaments in the reign of King William, and in the first of Queen Anne. Upon the death of his nephew aforesaid, he succeeded in his whole estate, and the title of Baronet; and dying 15 July, 1703, was succeeded by his son and heir ROBERT, who was created, 25 June, 1716, Lord Romney in Kent. His Lordship married Elizabeth, daughter and coheir to Sir Cloudesly Shovel, Knight, Rear-Admiral of Great-Britain, and dying 28 November, 1724, left issue by her ROBERT, now Lord Romney; and two daughters, Marsham and Harriot (17). C

MARVELL [ANDREW,] a witty droll in the 17th century, was born in the year 1620 (a), at Kingston upon Hull in Yorkshire, of which place, his father, the Reverend Mr Andrew Marvell A. M. (b) a facetious gentleman was minister; having conformed to the Church of England, though puritanically inclined (c). He bore a good character, both for piety and learning (d), and being also school-master of the town (e), probably took care in that employment to instruct his son, whose quick progress must needs have given him the highest satisfaction. Finding him fit for the university at thirteen years of age, he placed him in Trinity-College Cambridge; where our author was admitted December 14, 1633 (f). But he had not been long in this station, before he fell into the hands of the Jesuits; those busy factors of the Romish Church, under the connivance of this as well as the preceding reign, spared no pains to make proselytes, for which purpose several of them were planted in and near the two universities (g). The delusion of young scholars was an easy conquest to veteran disciplined craft. Accordingly, Mr Marvell, whose distinguished parts made him a liquorish prey, was unwarily seduced by these restless emissaries, and inveigled up to London. Thus ensnared, those admirable talents which had been his father's greatest joy, became now his greatest grief. However, the mournful scene was of no very long continuance; upon the first news, he hastened to the Metropolis, and after some months, finding his son in a bookseller's shop, prevailed with him to return to Cambridge [A]. After this interruption, he plied his studies with more assiduity, and taking his first degree in arts, was chosen scholar upon the foundation the same year 1638 (b). Some time before the breaking of the civil wars, he lost his father*, who, by a cruel accident, was unfortunately drowned in crossing the Humber [B]. But

[A] Prevailed with him to return to Cambridge. Being now fully convinced of his folly, he warmly reprobated the practices that had been put upon him, and imputing all his miscarriage to the remissness of the government, in suffering the Romish priests to harbour themselves in England; he gave full scope to the virulency of his wit in lashing the reigns of the Stuarts afterwards, as will be seen in the sequel.

[B] Was drowned in crossing the Humber.] An account of that melancholy accident, as transmitted from persons intimate with both the families unhappily concerned in the sad catastrophe, is now first given to the public as a curious truth.

On that shore of the Humber opposite to Kingston, lived a lady whose virtue and good sense recommended her to the esteem of Mr Marvell (the father), as his piety and understanding obliged her to take a particular notice of him; from this mutual approbation arose as his life was a sacrifice to a point of strict honour, so such an atonement was made, as left our author in a better condition than before. A considerable addition was made to his fortune, and the plan of his education being thereupon enlarged, he travelled through most of the polite parts of Europe. While he was abroad he met with an English priest at Rome, named Richard Flecno, whose miserable poetical trash raised the indignation of our author's muse, which displayed itself in a very humorous description of that wretched poetaster (i). During his travels there happened also another occasion of exercising the drollery of his wit. In France, he found much talk about one Lancelot Joseph de Maniban, an abbot greatly famed on account of a secret which he pretended to be master of, whereby he was able to enter into the qualities of persons whom he had never seen, and even to prognosticate their good and bad fortune from an inspection of their hand writing [C]. This artist was handsomely lashed by our author, in a poem which he wrote upon the spot, and inscribed to that illustrious madman in these words: Cuidam, qui legendo scripturam, descripsit formam, sapientiam, fortemque auctoris, illustrissimo Lanceloto Josepho de Maniban grammatomanti! this is all the account we have of Mr Marvell for several years, only that he spent some time at Constantinople, where he resided in the quality of Secretary to the English Embassy at that court (k). In 1653, we find him returned to his native country, and employed by Oliver Cromwell in the business of a tutor to one Mr Dutton, as appears from an original letter to the usurper [D]. His first appearance in any publick capacity an intimate acquaintance, which was soon improved into a very strict friendship. This lady had an only daughter, whose duty, ingenuity, devotion, and general exemplary behaviour, had endeared her to all who knew her, and rendered her the darling of her mother; whose fondness for her arose to such a pitch, that she could scarce bear to let her child be ever out of her sight. Mr Marvell, desiring to increase and perpetuate the amity between the families, asked the lady to let her loved daughter come over to Kingston, to stand godmother to a child of his; which, out of her great regard for him, she consented to, though she thereby deprived herself of the pleasure of her daughter's company, for a longer space of time (as the young lady must necessarily lie at Kingston one night) than she would have agreed to on any other consideration, but that of obliging her friend, our author's father. The young lady came over to Kingston, and the ceremony was performed. The next day, when she came down to the water side, in order to return home, she found the wind very high, and the water so extremely rough (a circumstance well known frequently to happen there) as to render the passage dangerous: so dangerous at this time, that the watermen earnestly dissuaded her from all thoughts of crossing. But she, who since her birth had never wilfully given her mother a moment's uneasiness, and who knew how miserable she would be 'till she saw her daughter again, insisted on going, notwithstanding all that could be urged by the watermen, or by Mr Marvell, who earnestly intreated her to return to his house, and wait for better weather. Mr Marvell finding her thus resolutely bent to venture her life, rather than run the risque of disobliging a fond parent, told her, as she had brought herself into that dangerous situation purely upon his account, he thought himself obliged both in honour and conscience to share it with her: and accordingly, having with difficulty persuaded some watermen to attempt the passage, they both got into the boat. Just as they put off, Mr Marvell threw his gold-headed cane on shore to some friends who attended at the water side, telling them, that as he could not suffer the young lady to go alone, and as he apprehended the consequence might be fatal, if he perished, he desired them to give that cane to his son, and bid him remember his father. Thus, he armed with innocence, and his fair charge with filial duty and affection, they both cheerfully set forward, to meet their inevitable fate: the boat was overset and they were lost.

The lady, whose excessive fondness had plunged her daughter and friend into this terrible condition, went the same afternoon into her garden, and seated herself in an arbour from whence she could view the water, and while with no small anxiety she beheld the tempestuous state it was in, she saw (or rather thought she saw) a most lovely boy with flaxen hair come into the garden; who making directly up to her, said Madam, your daughter is safe now. The lady greatly surprized, said, My pretty dear, how didst thee know any thing of my daughter, or that she was in danger? then bidding him stay there, she arose, and went into the house, to look for a pretty piece of new money, to reward him for his care: but returning into the garden, the child was gone, and on examining her family about him, she found nobody but herself had seen him, nor could they recollect any child being in the neighbourhood which answered her description. This gave her some suspicion of her misfortune, which was soon after confirmed; with the additional aggravation that her friend was involved in the same mischief, and of course his family greater sufferers, she having only lost her pleasure, they their support: and thinking herself bound by every tie, to make all the retaliation in her power; she sent for our author, charged herself with the expence of his future education, and at her death left him her fortune.

[C] Could read their fortune in their hand writing. This wonderful improvement in chiromancy, whereby that wonderful art is raised above the ordinary method of reading people's inclination, and so telling their fortunes from the lines naturally drawn in the hand, into the sublimer mystery of performing the same thing, from the lines artificially drawn by the hand, is evidently a rag of the same specific madness with that of the famous Campanella, who taught and practised the power of physiognomy in the effects of resemblance. Of which the rule is, to screw your face, so as to counterfeit that of the person designed, and straight fancy your self to have his hair, eyes, nose, mouth, and all other parts like him. By that means, you will come to know what his natural inclinations, and what his thoughts are, by the same you find in yourself during the time of your making of faces (1)

[D] Wrote by our author to Cromwell ] That letter was in the following words:

' May it please your Excellence,
' It might perhaps seem fit for me to seek out
' words to give your Excellence thanks for myself, but
' indeed the onely civility proper for me to practise
' with so eminent a person, is to obey you, and to perform
' honestly the work that you have set me about.
' Therefore, I shall use the time that your Lordship is ' pleased to allow me for writing, onely to that purpose
' for which you have given me it; that is to render
' you some account of Mr Dutton. I have taken care
' to examine him several times in the presence of Mr
' Oxenbridge (2), as those who weigh and tell over
' money before some witnesses, e'er they take charge
' of it; for I thought that there might possibly be ' some lightness in the coyn, or error in the telling,
' which hereafter I should be bound to make good.
' Therefore, Mr Oxenbridge is the best to make your
' Excellence an impartial relation thereof; I shall onely
' say, that I shall strive, according to the best of ' my understanding (that is, according to those rules
' your Lordship hath given me) to increase whatsoever
' talent he may have already. Truly he is of a gentle ' and waxen disposition; and, God be praised, I ' cannot say he hath brought with him any evil
' impression; and I shall hope to set nothing upon his spirit, ' but what may be of a good sculpture. He hath in ' him two things, which make youth most easy to be ' managed, modesty, which is the bridle to vice, and capacity at home, was his being made aſſiſtant to the celebrated Mr John Milton, Latin Secretary to the Protector (l), which according to our author's own account muſt have happened in the year 1657 (m) [E]. After Cromwell's death, the many factions in in the Parliament and Army, rendering it impoſſible for either to eſtabliſh any firm government, made way for bringing back the King; in order to which, it being agreed to call a new Parliament, that convention accordingly met a little above a month before the Reſtoration, viz. on the 25th of April 1660, and therein Mr Marvell was a repreſentative for his native town of Kingſton upon Hull (n); as he alſo was in that which met on the 8th of May 1661, after the Reſtoration, and continued to ſerve them in that quality during the remainder of his life. He diſcharged this truſt with ſtrict integrity and fidelity, and was highly eſteemed by his conſtituents, to whom he conſtantly ſent a particular account of every proceeding in the Houſe, with his own opinion thereon. A conduct ſo diligently reſpectful, together with his general obliging deportment towards them, did not fail to endear him perfectly to their affection, and they were not wanting on their ſide to teſtify this grateful ſenſe of it, by allowing him an honourable penſion the whole time he repreſented them (o). He rarely ſpoke in the Houſe, but had great influence on many members of both Houſes without doors: Prince Rupert in particular had a peculiar eſteem for and intimacy with our author, to whoſe advices he paid a very great regard [F]; and frequently came diſguiſed as a private perſon to ſee him, when thoſe enemies he had raiſed through the honeſt ſharpneſs of his pen, rendered it neceſſary for him to conceal the place of his abode, to prevent his falling a ſacrifice to their treachery or malice: his life having been often threatened, and he obliged to have his letters directed in another name, to prevent diſcovery that way (p) [G]. In the year 1672, Dr Samuel Parker, a furious partiſan and virulent writer on the ſide of arbitrary government, both in Church and State, which qualifications raiſed him to be Archdeacon and Prebend of Canterbury, and in James the Second's reign, to the ſee of Oxford (q); publiſhed Biſhop Bramhall's Vindication of himſelf and the reſt of the Episcopalian Clergy, from the Presbyterian charge of Popery, as it is managed by Mr Baxter in his Treatiſe of the Grotian Religion, to which the Doctour added a preface of his own [H]. This preface our author attacked, in a piece called, The Rehearſal tranſproſed: or, Animadverſions on a late book, intitled, a Preface, ſhewing what Grounds there are of Fears and Jealouſies of Popery. The ſecond impreſſion with additions and amendments. London, printed by J. And in this both he and I owe infinitely to your Lordſhip, for having placed us in ſo godly a family as that of Mr Oxenbridge, whoſe doctrine and example, are like a book and a map, not onely inſtructing the eare, but demonſtrating to the eye, which way we ought to travel. I ſhall, upon occaſion, henceforward inform your Excellence of any particularities in our little affairs; for ſo I eſteem it to be my duty. 'Andrew Marvell.
' emulation,

'Mr Dutton preſents his moſt humble ſervice
'to your Excellence.'

[E] Which muſt have happened in the year 1657.] Our author, in the piece abovementioned, declares, 'That he never had any, not the remotest relation to publick matters, nor correſpondence with the perſons then predominant, until the year 1657; when indeed, continues he, I entered into an employment, for which I was not altogether improper, and which I conſidered to be the moſt innocent and inoffenſive to

'his Maſtey's affairs of any in that uſurped and irregular government, to which all men were then expoſed (4).' We need not obſerve, that the correſpondence here mentioned muſt be interpreted by the preceding words, which reſtrain it to publick affairs, otherwiſe this declaration would be inconſiſtent with the former remark.

[F] To whoſe advices he paid a very great regard.] This was ſo well known, that when the Prince voted according to our author's ſentiments, which he often did, it was commonly ſaid by the other ſide, he has been with his tutor (5).

[G] To prevent diſcovery that way.] The author of Mr Marvell's life above cited ſays, he has ſeen a private letter wrote by him to a friend from Highgate, wherein, after mentioning the inſuperable hatred of his foes to him, and their deſign of murdering him, are the following words; Prætereâ magis occidere metuo quam occidi; non quod vitam tanti æſtimem, ſedne imperatus moriar. i. e. Further, I fear I ſhould rather kill than be killed; not that I ſhould value life ſo much, but that I would not die unprepared (6).

[H] The Doctour added a preface of his own.] Mr Wood, whoſe talent for abuſe was pretty much like the Doctour's, obſerves there was in that preface, 'a great deal of railery againſt Dr John Owen, his doctrine and writings: and, adds our author, Dr Parker being eſteemed by the Nonconformiſts, a forward, proud, ambitious and ſcornful perſon, was taken to taſk, purpoſely to clip his wings or take him ſhorter, by their buffooning champion Andrew Marvell, ſome time one of John Milton's companions, in a book which he publiſhed entitled the Rehearſal Tranſproſed, &c. Which title, ſays Mr Wood, was taken from a comedy then lately publiſhed by George Duke of Buckingham, called the Rehearſal, wherein one Mr Bayes acteth a part (7)' This laſt ſagacious remark of Mr Wood's, aroſe from our author's frequently applying the name of Bayes to Dr Parker.

[I] The abſurdity of the Doctour's tenets.] The Doctour, in 1670, publiſhed a book called the Eccleſiaſtical Polity; and in 1671, a defence thereof: in the former of which, he lays down as maxims, theſe charitable which we shall give a specimen. The Doctor asserting, that the King ' may, if he please, ' reserve the Priesthood, and the exercise of it to himself; ' our author observes archly enough, if the King may discharge the Function of the Priesthood, he may too (and that with all the reason in the world) assume the revenue. Adding, it would be the best subsidy that ever was voluntarily given by the Clergy (s). Dr Parker answered this piece, in a book intitled A reproof to the Rehearſal transposed, in a discourse to it's author, London 1673, 8vo [K]; but did not think proper to set his name to it: in this, finding he had no share in the argument, he had recourse to abuse, and endeavoured to call the secular arm into his aid, by charging our author with having served the Usurper (t). But he cleared himself from that aspersion in a reply called, The Rehearſal transposed, the second part, occasioned by two letters: the first printed by a nameless author, intitled, a Reproof, &c. The second letter left for me at a friend's house, dated Nov. 3, 1673; subscribed J. G. and concluding with these words: If thou dares't to print or publish any lie or libell against Dr Parker, by the eternal God I will cut thy throat. Answered by Andrew Marvell London 1673, 8vo [L]. Our author, who was zealous for moderation in Church as well as in State, in 1676, attacked another Ecclesiastic (u), who had wrote a book against a discourse published in 1675, by Dr Herbert Croft, Bishop of Hereford, intitled, The naked Truth: or, the true State of the Primitive Church. By an humble moderator [M]. Dr Turner's book was called, Animadversions upon a late Pamphlet intitled, The Naked Truth, &c. and Mr Marvell's answer thereto, Mr Smirke, or the Divine in Mode (x): being certain Annotations upon the Animadversions on the Naked Truth, together with a short historical essay concerning general councils, creeds, and impositions in matters of religion; by Andreas Rivetus (y) jun. Lond. 1676, 4to. In this piece our author observes, that ' the Naked Truth is wrote with that evidence and demonstration of spirit, that all sober men cannot but give their assent and consent to it unasked. It is a book of that kind, that no Christian can peruse it without wishing himself had been the author, and almost imagining that he is so, the conceptions therein being of so eternal an idea, that every man finds it to be but a copy of the original in his own mind; ' and wonders, though he never read it before, it could be so long before he remembered it. He says, ' it appears moreover plain-charitable positions. It is better, says he, to submit to the unreasonable impositions of Nero and Caligula, than to hazard the dissolution of the state. And further, that it is absolutely necessary to the peace and happiness of kingdoms, that there be set up a more severe government over men's consciences, and religious persuasions, than over their vices and immoralities (8): and that Princes may with less hazard give liberty to men's vices and debaucheries, than to their consciences. And speaking of the different sects then subsisting, lays it down as a fixed rule for all Princes to go by, that tenderness and indulgence to such men, were to nourish vipers in our bowels, and the most sottish neglect of our own quiet and security. These slavish and persecuting principles which were too frequently inculcated by the church-men of those times, are severely inveighed against by Mr Marvell in this piece, and also in many of his poems, in one of which he makes a person thus express himself on that subject (9).

Tell me, ye forging crew, what law reveal'd
By God, to Kings, the jus divinum seal'd?
If to do good, ye jus divinum call,
It is the grand prerogative of all:
If to do ill unpunish'd be their right,
Such pow'r's not granted the great King of night.

[K] In a discourse to it's author, &c. Besides this, five other answers came out to our author's book. 1. Rosemary and Bayes, or animadversions on a treatise called the Rehearſal transposed. Lond. 1673, in 4to, containing three sheets. 2. The Transposed rehearſed, or the fifth act of Mr Bayes's Play: being a postscript to the animadversions on the preface to Bishop Bramhall's Vindication. Oxford, 1673, 8vo. This was written by Mr Richard Leigh, some time a commoner of Queen's college Oxford, and afterwards a player in the united company of comedians (10). 3. Gregory Father Grey-beard with his Vizard off: or News from the Cabal in some Reflections, &c. in a Letter to our old Friend R. L. from E. H. Lond. 1673, 8vo. subscribed VOL. V. No. 255.

Edm. Hickeriggill. 4. A Common-place-Book out of the Rehearſal transposed, digested under these several Heads, &c. London 1673, 8vo. 5. Stoo him, Bayes: or, some Animadversions on the Humour of writing Rehearſals transposed. Oxford 1673, 8vo.

[L] Answered by Mr Marvell, &c. The Doctor did not return any answer to this reply: ' judging it, ' says Mr Wood (11), more prudent to lay down the ' cudgels, than to enter the lists again with an untoward- ' ly combatant so hugely well versed and experienced in ' the then but newly refined art (though much in mode ' and fashion almost ever since) of sporting and jeering ' buffoonery.' But notwithstanding Mr Wood's dislike of this manner of writing, he could not help acknowledging, ' that it was generally thought, by ' many of those who were otherwise favourers of ' Parker's cause, that the victory lay on Marvell's ' side.' And admits ' it wrought this good effect on ' Parker, that for ever after it took down his high ' spirit.' Bishop Burnet, in the History of his own Times (12), speaking of Dr Parker, says, ' after he had ' for some years entertained the nation with several vi- ' rulent books, he was attacked by the liveliest droll ' of the age, who writ in a burlesque strain, but with ' so peculiar and so entertaining a conduct, that from ' the King down to the tradesman, his books were ' read with great pleasure. That not only humbled ' Parker, but the whole party: for the author of the ' Rehearſal transposed, had all the men of wit on his ' side.' And the ingenious Dr Swift, speaking in his apology to the Tale of a Tub, of the usual fate of common answerers to books, observes, ' there is indeed ' an exception, when any great genius thinks it worth ' his while to expose a foolish piece; so we still read ' Marvell's answer to Parker with pleasure, though the ' book it answers be sunk long ago.'

[M] By an humble moderator. As the measures at that time taken by the court with regard to church matters, are censured and condemned, the Bishop did not think proper to set his name to this treatise (13); notwithstanding, he takes care throughout, to observe that respect and deference which is due to the supreme authority. He takes notice that ' the intolerant laws had been so far from having their desired effect, that the Church was more divided than ever, that the Papists made great advantage of these divisions, and seduced numbers daily by their pretended unity. That this consideration had put him upon thinking what means might prove the most effectual, to heal the divisions and establish a perfect unity in the Church.' Which is the design of the book.

ly, that the author is judicious, learned, conscientious, a sincere Protestant, and a true son, if not a father, of the Church of England [N]. For the rest, the book cannot be free from the imperfections incident to all human endeavours, but those so small, and guarded every where with so much modesty, that it seems that there was none left for the animadverter, who might otherwise have blushed to oppose him (z) [O]. In the Essay on Councils, &c. which was a continuation of the above Defence of the Bishops, our author asserts, that 'the Christian Religion, as first instituted, was the greatest security to magistrates by the obedience which it taught; and was fitted to enjoy no less security under them by a practice conformable to that doctrine (aa).' He also points out the weakness of imposing new articles of faith; gives an ample account of the council of Nice, and of the furious debates there, about Ὁμοῖοσις, and Ὁμοῖοσις [co-essentiality, and con-substantiality] and plainly shews the terrible consequences of those debates with respect to religion. Our author, by thus opposing the advocates for conformity by compulsion, and by several very severe things wrote by him in verse against the then reigning Ministry and their measures, created himself many private enemies (as has been observed) and was also very obnoxious to the Government [P], as he frequently attacked Majesty itself in his satires [Q]; notwithstanding

[N] A true son of the Church of England.] This character was assumed as a mark of distinction by the zealous assertors of the constitution of the Church, as then established without a toleration; who branded the opposite party with the title of Latitudinarians. Among which last Dr Croft, as appears by this piece, was a first-rate champion; proposing it as the best method of effecting a real union in the Church, to yield to the Dissenters in their demands of abolishing Episcopacy, as a distinct superior order to that of Presbyters; of striking the other creeds out of the liturgy, preserving only that of the Apostles. At the same time, with regard to a set form of worship in the service of the Church, he avoids entering into the dispute, supposing that there are none but such as are either highly fanatical or highly factious, that maintain it to be unlawful, but humbly recommends it to the governors of the Church, calmly to consider, whether such a form as would satisfy most, would not be best. He complains of some abuses in the hierarchy, among which he takes notice of the power of lay-chancellors to excommunicate exclusive of the Bishop, and even against his will: however, as on one hand he charges the separation to the governors of the Church, in not condescending to the Dissenters; so neither, on the other hand, does he clear the Nonconformists from contributing thereto, by their disobedience; concluding with a charitable admonition to them, to consider whether of the two it be not safer, to err in the way of humility than in the way of pride. 'You pretend, says he, to be great zealots against Popery, and yet give me leave to say, your indiscreet disobedient zeal mainly brings it in. Your separation and many following divisions, have caused many to abhor our Church, and turn to Popery; and doubtless you are to give an account to God for the ruin of those souls. For I can never yield that you have any reasonable and true conscientious cause of separation, but mere mistaken reason and conscience, which I much pity, but no ways approve.'

[O] Might have blushed to oppose him.] That blush was artfully put on in another anonymous piece, published the same year, in answer to Dr Croft, with the title of A modest Survey of the most considerable Things in a Discourse lately published, intitled, Naked Truth, written in a Letter to a Friend. The author was known to be Dr Burnet, afterwards Bishop of Sarum. In it he observes (14), that 'the writer of the Naked Truth seems a person that is in good earnest, and does sincerely desire the peace of our Church; that so we being at one among ourselves, may both carry on the common designs of true piety, and resist the inroads, Popery is making on us. He writes gravely, and like a man that has deep impressions upon him, and so I am heartily sorry so good a man as I verily believe he is, should have been prevailed on to have done so unadvised a thing, as was first the writing, and then the publishing such a discourse.' This probably did not make it's appearance in print, 'till after the publication of our author's defence, who takes notice of another answer published before his defence, under the title of Lex Talionis, or the Author of the Naked Truth stript naked, supposed to be written by Dr Gunning, Bishop of Chichester, afterwards of Ely. 'But as to a new book, says Mr Marvell, fresh come out, entitled, The Author of the Naked Truth stript naked (to the fell or to the skin), that hieroglyphical quibble of the great gun on the title page will not excuse Bishop Gunning; for his sermon is still expected (15). Mr Wood conjectures that the word fell, in the parenthesis alludes to Philip Fell, fellow of Eton college, who was generally supposed to be the author of Lex Talionis, though some ascribed it to Dr William Lloyd Dean of Bangor, afterwards Bishop of Worcester.

[P] He was obnoxious to the government.] Besides what has been observed in the pieces already mentioned, our author wrote An Account of the Growth of Popery and arbitrary Government in England: more particularly, from the long prorogation of November 1675, ending the 15th of February 1676, 'till the last meeting of Parliament the 14th of July 1677 (16). In this tract our author having imputed the Dutch war to the corruption of the Court, asserts that the Papists, and particularly the French, were the true springs of all the councils at this time. These and several other assertions upon the King and Ministry, drew the following order published in the Gazette.

Whereas there have been lately printed and published several seditious and scandalous libels against the proceedings of both Houses of Parliament, and other his Majesty's Courts of Justice, to the dishonour of his Majesty's Government, and the hazard of public peace; these are to give notice, that what Person soever shall discover unto one of the Secretaries of State, the printer, publisher, author, or hander to the press, of any of the said libels, so that full evidence may be made thereof to a jury, without mentioning the informer, especially one libel, entitled An Account of the Growth of Popery, &c. and another called A seasonable Argument to all the Grand Juries, &c. the discoverer shall be rewarded as follows: he shall have fifty pounds for such discovery as aforesaid, of the printer or publisher of it from the press, and for the hander of it to the press one hundred pounds, &c.'

[Q] Frequently attacking Majesty itself in his satires.] Of this we have conspicuous proofs in the following pieces.

Oceana and Britannia (17). In which he introduces Britannia, speaking thus of Charles the Second.

Shall I ne'er rest for this lewd ravisher?
Rapes, burnings (18), are his royal sport,
These modish monsters haunt his perjur'd court.

Britannia and Raleigh (19). Where Britannia tells Raleigh:

A colony of French possess the court,
Pimps, priests, buffoons, in privy-chamber sport.
Such slimy monsters ne'er approach'd a throne,
Since Pharaoh's days, nor so defil'd a crown.
In sacred ear tyrannic arts they croak,
Pervert his mind, and good intentions choak;
Tell him of golden Indias, Fairy-lands,
Leviathan, and absolute commands.

withstanding which, King Charles took great delight in his conversation, and tried all means to win him over to his side, but in vain: his inflexible steadiness was proof against all temptations, either of his own distresses, (for he was sometimes reduced to pretty great straits) or of the large offers made him by the Court. And how earnest they were in their endeavours to gain a man of his ability, let the following relation evince. The King having entertained him one night, sent the Lord Treasurer Danby the next morning to find out his lodgings; which were then, up two pair of stairs in one of the little courts in the Strand: where he was busily engaged in writing, when the Treasurer abruptly opened the door upon him. Surprized at seeing such an unexpected visitor, he told his Lordship, he had, he believed, mistaken his way; Not now I have found Mr Marvell, replied the Lord Danby; he then assured our author, he was expressly sent to him from the King, and his message was to know what his Majesty could do to serve him? It is not in his Majesty's power to serve me, my Lord, answered Mr Marvell jocularly; but the Lord Treasurer making a serious affair of it, our author told him, that he full well knew the nature of Courts, having been in many; and that whoever is distinguished by the favour of the Prince, is always expected to vote in his interest. Lord Danby told him, that his Majesty, from the just sense he had of his merit alone, desired to know whether there was any place at Court he could be pleased with. To which our author replied with the utmost steadiness, that he could not with honour accept the offer, since if he did, he must be either ungrateful to the King in voting against him, or false to his country, in giving in to the measures of the Court: the only favour which he begged therefore of his Majesty was, that he would esteem him as dutiful a subject as any he had, and acting more truly in his proper interest while thus he refused his offers, than he could possibly do should he accept them. The Lord Treasurer finding his solicitations on that head to be quite fruitless, and that no arguments could prevail on him to accept any post under the Government, told him the King had ordered him a thousand pounds; which my Lord hoped he would receive, 'till he could think what farther to ask of his Majesty. But our author continued equally inflexible to this temptation also, and rejected the money with the same steadfastness of mind with which he had refused the profer of a place; though he was at that instant so straitened for want of cash, that he was obliged, as soon as Lord Danby took his leave, to send to a friend to borrow a guinea: so far did the love of publick good over-rule all sense of private interest in his honest heart (bb). He died (not without strong suspicions of being poisoned) August the 16th, 1678; in the 58th year of his age, and was interred in the church of St Giles in the Fields (cc). Ten years afterwards, viz. in 1688, the town of Kingston upon Hull, to testify her grateful remembrance of his honest services to her, collected a sum of money to erect a monument to his memory, over the place of his burial in the above church, and procured an able hand to compose an epitaph [R]: but the parson of the parish would not permit either monument or inscription

tion to be placed there. He was, it is said, very reserved among those whom he did not well know, but a most delightful and improving companion among his friends (dd); and in his conversation very modest and of few words (ee). The author of his life informs us that, 'he was always very temperate, and of a healthful and strong constitution to the last; and that he left a small paternal estate (ff).' Notwithstanding we are assured he was never married, yet about two years after his death his miscellaneous poems and some other pieces were collected together and published in one volume folio, Lond. 1680; with the following advertisement to the reader prefixed. 'These are to certify every ingenious reader, that all these poems, as also the other things, in this book contained, are printed according to the exact copies of my late dear husband (gg), under his own hand writing, being found since his death among his other papers. Witness my hand, this 15th day of October, 1680. Mary Marvell.' But Mr Cooke tells us, that these were published only with a mercenary view, and indeed not at all to the honour of the deceased, by a woman with whom he lodged; who hoped, by this stratagem, to share in what he left behind him. These were reprinted in two volumes, 12mo. Lond. 1726; under the title of The Works of Andrew Marvell, Esq; to which edition the editor, Mr Cooke, has prefixed an account of the life and writings of our author: and in the preface he observes, that the former editions (bb) contained many and gross errors; and had besides inserted in them many pieces which were not genuine; all which he hath corrected, and some from original manuscripts. MASON [Sir JOHN], an eminent Statesman in the XVIth century, was born at Abbingdon in Berkshire; being the son of a cow-herd (or farmer) by his wife, the sister of a monk in the famous monastery of that place. This monk observing his nephew to be very apt to learn, gave him a proper education; and when fit for the university, procured him a fellowship in All-Souls-college in Oxford. There Mr Mason took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, July 8, 1521 (a); and becoming soon noted for the pregnancy of his parts, he was pitched upon by the university to compliment K. Henry VIII. at his coming thither in the year 1523. (b). On which occasion, our young scholar, with his comely presence, becoming carriage, flowing expression, and graceful elocution, so highly pleased the King; that his Majesty, at the motion of Sir Thomas More, ordered him to be sent over, and maintained at his own charge, in the university of Paris [A], to fit him for publick employments (c). After his return from France, he supplicated for the degree of Bachelor of Physic, (being styled Master of Arts;) but whether he was admitted doth not appear (d): However, he became a great favourite to K. Henry VIII. who employed him in several embassies [B], and appointed him one of his Privy-Council. After that King's death, he was made Privy-Counsellor to K. Edward VI, chief Clerk of the Council, Secretary for the French tongue [C], and Master of Requests. He was also sent Ambassador to France (e). According to the fashion of that reign, he was a great hunter after Church-preferments (f); and, tho' a layman and a knight, enjoyed several dignities, particularly the Deanery of Winchester. On the 18th of November 1552, he was elected Chancellor of the university of Oxford; and kept that honourable office till October 26, 1556; when he resigned it, to make room for Cardinal Pole, who was designing to visit, and do great things for that university (g). At Queen Mary's accession, he declared for her, and, among the rest of the Privy-Counsellors, subscribed the letter to the Duke of Northumberland, commanding him to lay down his arms, &c. (b). He was continued a Privy-Counsellor to Queen Mary, and much respected by her. And, among other honourable employments during her reign, he was the English Resident in the Netherlands (i). In which station, he was instrumental in preserving Katharine Duchefs dowager of Suffolk, and her husband Richard Bertie Esq; during their voluntary exile, on account of their attachment to the Protestant Religion (k). Having the art of adapting himself to all the changes in those variable times [D], he became a favourite

[B] Who employed him in several embassies.] And, the better to qualify him for them, K. Henry sent him beyond sea, (after he had spent a proper time in the university of Paris, we may suppose) with instructions to guide him, and a pension to support him. His instructions were, 1. To keep exact correspondence with the secretary at home. 2. To entertain the most eminent scholar, who might represent the church; the ripest under-secretary, who might decipher to him the state; the ablest soldier and sea-man, that might open to him the interest of both nations. 3. To take an exact account of the havens, forts, cities, avenues, passages, ways, treasure, and interest of the place he lived in. 4. To follow the respective Ambassadors directions in every court. 5. To appear in each place, upon any solemnity, civil or military, suitable to the occasion;

all charges to be defrayed from the English Exchequer. His pension was 220 l a year; his circuit France, the Netherlands, Italy, and Spain; and his commission to engage any knowing person of those respective Courts, that could transcribe their edicts or orders, give exact intelligence, make any interest, or had any influence upon their respective governments (2).

[D] Having the art of adapting himself to all the changes in those variable times] Four things, he said, kept him in, under all the revolutions, during the four Princes reigns whom he served: 1. That he thought few things would save a man. 2. That he was always intimate with the exactest Lawyer, and ablest favourite. 3. That he spake little, and writ less. 4. also to Queen Elizabeth; who not only continued him in the Privy-Council, and in the office of Secretary for the French tongue, but made him Treasurer of her Chamber. He was likewise, about the same time, Master of the Hospital in Abbingdon, the foundation of which he had newly procured from Queen Mary; with the incorporation of that Town, and the privilege of sending one Burgess to Parliament (l). On the 20th of June 1559, he was elected a second time Chancellor of the university of Oxford; but he resigned that office Decemb. 26, 1564 (m). Thus having, by his great accomplishments natural and acquired, raised himself from small beginnings to very considerable honours and riches; he departed this life April 20, 1566; and was buried in St Paul's cathedral, where a monument was erected to him, but which was destroyed by the great fire (n). Not having been married, at least leaving no issue, he bequeathed his fortune to a nephew (o). An Epitaph in prose on the learned Sir Thomas Wyatt (p), is the only thing he is recorded to have written. All that has been said of him by way of Character, is given below in the note [E].

[E] All that has been said of him by way of character, &c. Mr Camden styles him, a man of learning and gravity; vir gravis atque eruditus (5). And D. Lloyd informs us, that 'they who lived in those times say, that none understood the affairs of England and France, together with their mutual advantages or disadvantages, better than Sir John Mason.—A grave and reserved man he was, who understood the intrigues and motions of those dark and uncertain times, and his nimble and present prudence could accommodate them. His maxim was, Do, and say nothing.—Many were his pensions to Scholars at home, more to Agents abroad, that assisted either his studies or employments, whom he designed an honour to his middle, and a support to his old age. He had a peculiar way of satisfying suitors by plain dealing and dispatch. No man understood better the nature of Court places than he, and none saw further into Court persons. Two things, he said, always promoted a matter: 1. Secrecy. 2. The timing of it, with an eye to those about us (6). And three of his Letters are printed in the Collection of Records at the end of Part III. of Burnet's History of the Reformation, p. 577, 583, 595.

[A] Was grandson of Mr Richard Mather, &c. This Mr Richard Mather was born at Lowton within the parish of Winwick in Lancashire, in the year 1596; educated in grammar-learning in the school at Winwick; and, in 1612, appointed master of a publick school at Toxteth Park near Liverpool in the same county: where pretending to receive a new light within him, was converted to godliness in 1614 (1). On the 9th of May 1618, he was admitted a student in Brazeo-nose-college in Oxford, at the age of twenty-two. He became afterwards Minister of Toxteth; but, after he had continued a zealous and diligent Preacher there above fifteen years, he was suspended for Nonconformity, in 1633. By the intercession of friends, he was restored within six months. But the summer following, Richard Neile, Archbishop of York, sending visitors into the diocese of Chester, Dr Coffin one of the visitors suspended Mr Mather a second time, for not wearing the surplice. Finding no intercessions could procure him the liberty he wanted, he embarked at Bristol for New-England, and arrived at Boston August 17, 1635. He settled at Dorchester in that country, where he continued a preacher 'till his death, which happened April 22, 1669 (2).

He dyed July 26, 1697 (4). 3. Eleazar, was Pastor of a church at Northampton in New England, and dyed in July 1669. 4. INCREASE, the fourth son, was born at Dorchester in New-England, in 1639; educated in Harvard college, where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1656. He came to England in 1657, and thence went to Ireland, where he entered himself in Dublin college, and proceeded Master of Arts in 1658. The air of the country not agreeing with him, he returned to England; preached some time at Great Torrington, and Gloucester; and in 1659 and 1660, was chaplain to Col. Bingham, Governor of Guernesey At the Restoration, when he found himself under a necessity either of conforming or losing his chaplainship, he came back to England, where he was offered considerable preferment. But chusing rather to return to New-England, he sailed thither in 1661, and was made Minister of the New church in the north part of Boston (5). In 1684, he was elected President of Harvard college (6). He would not consent to the surrendering of the Charters of the colonies of New-England: But, upon King James the Second's Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, he accepted of the office, of bringing over to England, Addresses of Thanks for it from some of the Ministers of New-England and their churches: To which purpose he embarked, April 7, 1688. The Revolution happening during his stay in England, he applied, with some others, for a new Charter for the Colonies in New-England: which being obtained, he set sail for New-England March 29, 1692, and arriv'd at Boston the 14th of May following. Soon after, he was created Doctor in Divinity. He resigned his Mastership of Harvard college in 1701, and continued preaching at Boston, 'till his death; which happeod August 23, 1723. He was author of several things, of which an account may be seen in Wood and Calamy (7). Having married the daughter of Mr John Cotton, he had by her three sons, the eldest of whom was Mr COTTON MATHER, the subject of this article (8). This Mr John Cotton was once Fellow of Emmanuel-college in Cambridge, and Vicar of Boston in Lincolnshire. Being molested on account of his Nonconformity, he embarked for New England, where he arrived September 3, 1633; and was chosen assistant preacher at Boston. He dyed there December 23, 1652, in the 68th year of his age (9).

He had four sons, who were all Nonconforming Ministers. 1. Samuel, the eldest, was born in Lancashire, May 13, 1626. Being carried over by his father to New-England, he had his education in Harvard college, and was the first Fellow of that house, who took degrees there. He returned to England in 1650, and became one of the Chaplains of Magdalen-college in Oxford; where, and at Cambridge also, he took his degrees again. In 1653, he went with the English commissioners to Scotland, and continued preaching two years at Leith. He passed over to Ireland in 1655, and was made senior Fellow of the college in Dublin, and Lecturer of St Nicholas's church in that city. Soon after the Restoration, being suspended for two sermons preached against the Ceremonies, he came over to England, and preached at Burton-wood 'till the Bartholomew-act took place. Then, he returned to Dublin, where, with some interruptions, he exercised his Ministry 'till his death, which happened October 29, 1671 (3). 2. Nathanael, the second son, had his education in Harvard college; was some time Minister of Barnstable in Devonshire, then at Rotterdam in Holland, at Dublin where he succeeded his brother, and lastly pastor of a congregation in London.

which time he had made such uncommon progress in the Latin and Greek languages, and entered on the Hebrew, that it was thought proper to remove him to the university. Accordingly, he was admitted into Harvard-college, where the progress he made in his Academical studies was no way short of what he had made at school. Particularly, he drew up systems of the sciences, as he studied them; in order to imprint them the better on his mind: And wrote Remarks on the books he read; which was another excellent means of improvement. At sixteen years of age, he took his first degree; and in his nineteenth proceeded Master of Arts (b). When he was but about seventeen years old, he undertook the tuition of young gentlemen, some of them older than himself, whom he carried through the several parts of Academical learning. For their use, he composed catechetical systems of the several Sciences: and, while he thus laboured for the instruction of others, he improved himself, at the same time, in various branches of literature. His chief aim was to make his pupils not only learned, but also good, men; and, for that end, he watched very carefully over their conduct, and moreover, conversed with them upon the most important subjects, and put what he thought the best and most instructive Books into their hands. This service he continued for upwards of seven years; and he had the pleasure of reaping a comfortable harvest from these his labours; many of his pupils proving able and useful ministers (c). He had from his cradle an impediment in his speech, which afforded so unpromising an aspect of his usefulness as a preacher, that, for some time, he quite laid aside all thoughts of the Ministry, and applied himself to the study of Physick. But by habituating himself to a deliberate way of speaking, he, in time, got rid of this impediment. And then, by the advice of his friends, he returned to the study of Divinity; which he prosecuted with such successful application, that, before he was eighteen years old, he was thought to be very competently furnished for publick service, and was advised to begin to preach; which accordingly he did August 22, 1680. His eminent abilities were soon taken notice of, so that in half a year after his first beginning to preach, the North Church at Boston gave him an unanimous invitation to be his father's assistant, and made him a handsome offer for his support. This church having had near two years further trial of his ministerial qualifications, unanimously chose him to be Co-Pastor with his father, though he was not yet quite twenty years old. He modestly waved their choice for a while; at length signifying his willingness to accept of it, he was ordained their Pastor May 13, 1684 (d). In that station, he behaved with great diligence [B], and duly visited his flock; ordinarily making four or five of those visits in an afternoon (e). A further instance of his uncommon diligence, were his Writings of various sorts, of which an account is given below [C]. The most remarkable of them, was that intitled, 'The Wonders of the Invisible World [D].' That he might the

[B] In that station he behaved with great diligence.] It appears from his own memoranda, 'That he preached in one year seventy two publick Sermons, besides many private ones; that not a day had passed without some contrivance to do good; nor in which some of his revenues had not been dealt out to charitable and pious uses; and in that one year he composed and published fourteen Books, and kept sixty Fasts, and twenty two Vigils (10).'

[C] A further instance of his uncommon diligence, were his writings of various sorts.] He published in his life-time, three hundred eighty two Books. Many of them were indeed but small Volumes, as single sermons, Essays, &c. yet there are several among them of a much larger size; As his 'Magnalia Christi Americana, or an Ecclesiastical History of New-England, from its first planting in 1620 to 1698, fol.—his 'Christian Philosopher.' 8vo.—his 'Ratio Disciplina Fratrum Nov-Anglorum:' i. e. Reason of the Discipline of the Brethren in New-England:—his 'Directions to a Candidate for the Ministry:—his 'Life of his Father,'—his 'Psalterium Americanum,' or American Psalter. Besides all these, he left behind him several Books in manuscript, one of which, viz. his Biblia Americana, or Illustration of the sacred Scriptures, was proposed to be printed in three volumes, folio (11). - - - The largest of the Books published by him, were his Magnalia Dei Americana, &c. But they have been criticized upon by several writers. Mr D. Neal, for instance, gives this character of them —'The most famous Historian of New-England is the Reverend and learned Dr Cotton Mather, who with great diligence and industry has collected a variety of useful materials, for the Ecclesiastical and Civil History of his country, and published them to the world in folio, under the title of Magnalia, &c. with the attestation of the Reverend Mr Higginson, one of the oldest Ministers of the country, prefixed to it. The Doctor is certainly a Gentleman of great probity and virtue, and having been at the head of affairs in his country for a great many years, is as capable of

'knowing the truth of the Facts he relates as any man living; Had the Doctor put his materials a little closer together, and disposed them in another method, his work would have been more acceptable to this part of the world, but as it is, his great integrity and diligence deserve the publick Thanks of his country (12).'

—J. Oldmixon calls that History, 'a miserable jargon, full of puns, anagrams, miracles, prodigies, speeches, and epistles; loaded with many random learned quotations, school-boy exercises, Roman-like legends, and barbarous rhimes (13).'

—Dr Douglass also makes the following animadversions on the Map inserted in that History. 'Dr Cotton Mather's Map of New-England, New-York, Jerseys and Pennsylvania, is composed from some old rough draughts of the first discoveries, with obsolete names not known at this time, and has scarce any resemblance of the country; it may be called a very erroneous antiquated Map (14).'

'The Wonders of the invisible World: Being an Account of the Tryals of several Witches, lately executed in New-England: And of several remarkable Curiosities therein occurring. Together with, 1. Observations upon the nature, the number, and the operations of the Devils. 2. A short Narrative of a late outrage committed by a knot of Witches in Sweden, very much resembling, and so far explaining, that under which New-England has laboured. 3. Some Councils directing a due improvement of the terrible things lately done by the unusual and amazing range of evil Spirits in New-England. 4. A brief Discourse upon those Temptations which are the more ordinary Devices of Satan. By Cotton Mather. the better extend his usefulness beyond the limits of his own country and profession, he applied himself to the study of the modern languages, and learned particularly French and Spanish:

of several Witches, executed in New-England; namely, Mr George Burroughs, a Minister; Bridget Bishop, alias Oliver; Susan Martin, Elizabeth How, and Martha Carrier. They were tried at Salem in June and August 1692, and condemned and executed. Mr Burroughs had been formerly Minister at Salem, but some differences arising between him and his people, he left them and retired to Falmouth, which perhaps might be one reason of his being fixed upon by these Salemites for a Wizzard (17). And some prejudice conceived against him by his successor Mr Paris (whose daughter and niece were troubled with uncommon convulsion fits) hastened undoubtedly his ruin. However it be, Mr Burroughs was indicted for witchcraft; and, in the prosecution of the charge against him, he was accused by five or six of the Bewitched as the author of their miseries: He was accused by eight of the Confling Witches, as being an head-actor at some of their hellish rendezvous, and one who had the promise of being a King in Satan's kingdom now going to be erected: He was accused by nine persons for extraordinary lifting, and such feats of strength, as could not be done without a diabolical assistance. And for other such things he was accused, until about thirty testimonies were brought in against him; nor were these judged the half of what might have been considered for their conviction: However, they were thought enough to fix the character of a Wizzard upon him; according to the rules of reasoning by one Gaulle in that case directed.

More particularly, as in the opinion of Witch-mongers, the Testimonies of the parties bewitched add greatly to the Suspensions or Presumptions brought in against one indicted for Witchcraft; there were heard the Testimonies of several persons, who were said to be most notoriously bewitched, and every day tortured by invisible hands; and these all charged the spectres of George Burroughs to have a share in their torments. At his examination, the bewitched people pretended they were grievously harassed with preternatural mischiefs, which could not possibly be dissembled, and they still ascribed them unto the endeavours of George Burroughs to kill them. They also deposed, that a little black-hair'd man came to one of them, in her agonies, saying his name was Burroughs; pressed her to set her hand to a Book he shewed her; and, upon her refusal, inflicted cruel pains and hurts upon her.—That he used to bite them.—That, in their torments, George Burroughs tempted them to go unto a sacrament, unto which they perceived him with a sound of trumpet summoning of other witches; who, quickly after the sound, would come from all quarters unto the rendezvous. One of them falling into a kind of trance, affirmed, That Burroughs had carried her away into a very high mountain, where he shewed her mighty and glorious kingdoms, and said, 'He would give them all to her, if she would write in his Book;' but she told him, 'They were none of his to give;' and refused the motions, enduring much misery for that refusal.—And, as it is reckoned a frequent thing, for the bewitched people to be entertained with Apparitions of murdered people, at the same time as the spectres of the witches trouble them: Accordingly, several of the Bewitched gave in their testimony, that they had been troubled with the Apparitions of two Women, who said, that they were G. Burroughs's two wives, and that he had been the death of them, and that the Magistrates must be told of it.—And, at his trial, they pretended to see those apparitions.—Nay his domestic affairs, proving him an ill man, were brought against him as an evidence of his being a wizzard: And, among the rest, his great and preternatural strength; he being reported, often to have done things beyond the strength of a giant: As the taking up a whole barrel filled with malasses or cider, in very disadvantageous postures, and carrying it through the difficultest places out of a canoe to the shore. The putting his fore-finger into the muzzle of a fowling piece, of about six or seven foot barrel, lifting it up, and holding out at arm's-end (18). Mighty strong and convincing arguments of Witchcraft, undoubtedly! tho' Dr Mather seemed at that time to believe them as firmly as his Bible.—The Depositions against the rest of the Accused, were equally wonderful and incredible.

'Tis certain, as Mr Neal candidly observes (19), that these suspected wizzards and witches were convicted on very slender evidence; for the court allowed the witnesses to tell stories of twenty or thirty years standing, about over-setting of carts, the death of cattle, unkindness to relations, or unexpected accidents befalling after some quarrel: all that was alleged against them to the purpose being either from the disordered persons themselves, or from those who had been frightened into a confession of their being witches by the threatenings of the Magistrates, or encouraged to it with hopes of mercy. And there is some unfairness in the Tryals that Dr Mather has published to the world. For, when he has given the depositions of the witnesses against the prisoners at large, he passes over their defence in such general words as these, "They said nothing worth considering; their discourse was full of tergiversations and contradictions; they were confounded, and their countenances fell, &c." Whereby his reader is left in the dark, and rendered incapable of judging of the merits of the cause. But, upon such evidence as this, twenty-eight persons received sentence of death, of which nineteen were executed (20). They all went out of the world without the least acknowledgment of their guilt, laying their own blood at the door of false witnesses. But neither integrity of manners, nor the strongest protestations of innocence with their dying breath, were sufficient to move compassion, nor stop the tide of the peoples zeal against those unhappy persons at this time.— And they were far from being all that were in danger of losing their lives; for there were then a hundred and fifty in prison, and above two hundred more under accusation from the Afflicted. Indeed the whole country was in confusion, every one being jealous of his neighbour (21). Things were come to a wretched pass; no man being sure of his life or fortune for an hour. And so they continued, till the Afflicted over-acted their parts so far, as to accuse some of the nearest relations of Dr Increase Mather, and of the Governor himself. It was time then to make a stand: accordingly, the very next sessions, when fifty six bills were preferred against persons for Witchcraft, the grand Jury brought in thirty Ignoramus; and of the remaining twenty-six, the petty Jury convicted but three, whom the Governor pardoned.—All the Confessions that were made, seem to have been either the effects of a disordered brain, or extorted to save their livcs (22).—But, besides the Blood that was spilt upon this occasion, several persons and families were ruined in their estates and reputations, partly by long imprisonment, and partly by the avarice of the officers, who took possession of their houses in their absence. . . . At length, the whole country became by degrees sensible of their mistake; [returned to their senses;] and most of the actors in this Tragedy repented the share they had in it. One of the Judges at those tryals, caused (in a full assembly, at one of their Meetings, on a fast-day) a Paper to be read to all the people; wherein he acknowledged, that he had fallen into some errors in the Tryals at Salem, begging the prayers of the congregation, that the guilt of such miscarriages might not be imputed to the country in general, or to him and his family in particular. The Jury likewise, employed at these tryals, published a paper, signed with their own hands; wherein they confessed, that, for want of knowledge in themselves, and better information from others, they were prevailed with to take up such evidence against the Accused, as on further consideration and further information, they justly feared, was insufficient for the touching the lives of any. . . . And acknowledged, that they justly feared they were then under the power of a strong and general delusion, utterly unacquainted with, and not experienced in matters of that nature (23).— And even our author, Dr C. Mather, since declared it as his opinion, that things were carried too far; as appeared to him, 1. From the great number of persons accused. 2. From the quality of the persons accused, some of whom were persons of blameless and holy livcs. 3. From the number of the Afflicted, which increased to about fifty. This (says

' he) gave just ground to suspect some mistake. 4. ' From the execution of the prisoners, not one of ' which confessed their guilt at their death; though ' several of them were persons of good knowledge, of ' sober lives, and dyed in a serious, affecting man- ' ner. And as for the Confessors, no experience was ' had, whether they would abide by their confessions ' when they came to dye; they being all reprieved ' and pardoned. 5. Because when the prosecutions ' ceased, the Afflicted grew presently well; the Accu- ' sed were generally quiet, and there was no distur- ' bance since that time (24). Thus, in about fifteen ' months time ended an affair, which not only confounded the minds of the people of New-England, but struck all Europe with surprize and astonishment. It is a wonder, as Mr Neal observes (25), ' that no ' publick notice was ever taken either of the afflicted ' persons or Confessing Witches: if the agitations of ' the Afflicted were voluntary and artful, the blood of ' the Innocent certainly lay at their door; but if not, ' they should have been treated as lunatics. The con- ' fessing Witches might possibly deserve more compas- ' sion, if their confessions were extorted by violence, ' or arose from the pure necessity of saving their lives ' this way; but yet their bearing false witness against ' their neighbours, and dipping their hands in their ' innocent blood, ought not to have been passed over ' in silence.'

From these examples we learn, how extremely pernicious this absurd and wicked notion of Witchcraft is in its nature, and how dreadful in its effects and consequences. Since it not only disturbs people's imagination; gives them a quite wrong notion of the great Creator and Governor of the Universe, and of all spiritual Beings; but also furnishes them with an opportunity, either to excuse or cover their own wickedness, or to indulge their revenge and other malicious inclinations, and to be a trouble and a plague to their honest and inoffensive neighbours. All facts quite undeniable, and plain from the Tryals of the Witches in New-England, published by Dr Cotton Mather!

We cannot but be concerned, that such a work should come from the pen of a person otherwise of good and untainted reputation. But it must be owned, that he concurred too far in that foul business, not only by publishing the Tryals, but also by supporting in his writings the absurd and shocking Doctrine of Witchcraft; a Doctrine of Devils! And that he did so, is but too plain from the following extracts of some Treatises of his intermixed with those Tryals, and intituled, "Enchantments encountered: A Discourse on the "Wonders of the Invisible World; and the Devil "discovered."—"That the Devil, says he, is come ' down unto us with great wrath, we find, we feel, ' we now deplore. In many ways, for many years, ' hath the Devil been assaying to extirpate the King- ' dom of our Lord Jesus here. New-England may ' complain of the Devil as in Psalm 129. 1, 2. But ' now there is a more than ordinary affliction, with ' which the Devil is galling of us: and such an one as ' is indeed unparalleled. The things confessed by ' Witches, and the things endured by others, laid to- ' gether, amount unto this account of our affliction. ' The Devil, exhibiting himself ordinarily as a small ' black man, has decoyed a fearful knot of proud, ' froward, ignorant, envious, and malicious creatures, ' to lift themselves in this horrid service, by entering ' their names in a book by him tendered unto them. ' These Witches, whereof above a score have now ' confessed, and shewn their deeds, and some are now ' tormented by the Devils for confessing, have met in ' hellish rendezvouzes, wherein the Confessors do say, ' they have had their diabolical sacraments, imitating ' the Baptism and the Supper of our Lord. In these ' hellish meetings these monsters have associated them- ' selves, to do no less a thing than, To destroy the ' Kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, in these parts of ' the World; and in order hereunto, first, they each ' of them have their Spectres or Devils, commissioned ' by them, and representing of them, to be the en- ' gines of their malice. By these wicked spectres, ' they seize poor people about the country, with vari- ' ous and bloody torments; and of those evidently ' preternatural torments there are some have dyed.

' They have bewitched some, even so far as to make ' self-destroyers: and others are in many towns here ' and there languishing under their evil hands. The ' people thus afflicted, are miserably scratched and bit- ' ten, so that the marks are most visible to all the ' world, but the causes utterly invisible; and the ' same invisible furies do most visibly stick pins into ' the bodies of the afflicted, and scale them, and hi- ' deously distort, and disjoint all their members, be- ' sides a thousand other sorts of plagues beyond these ' of any natural diseases which they give unto them. ' Yea, they sometimes drag the poor people out of ' their chambers, and carry them over trees and hills, ' for divers miles together. A large part of the per- ' sons tortured by these diabolical spectres, are horri- ' bly tempted by them, sometimes with fair promises, ' and sometimes with hard threatenings, but always ' with felt miseries, to sign the Devil's Laws in a ' spectral book laid before them; which two or three ' of these poor sufferers, being by their tiresome suffer- ' ings overcome to do, they have immediately been ' released from all their miseries and they appeared in ' spectre then to torture those that were before their ' fellow-sufferers. The witches which by their cove- ' nant with the devil, are become owners of spectres, ' are oftentimes by their own spectres required and ' compelled to give their consent, for the molestation ' of some, which they had no mind otherwise to fall ' upon; and cruel depredations are then made upon ' the vicinage. In the prosecution of these witchcrafts, ' among a thousand other unaccountable things, the ' spectres have an odd faculty, of cloathing the most ' substantial and corporeal instruments of torture, with ' invisibility, while the wounds thereby given have ' been the most palpable things in the world; so that ' the sufferers assaulted with instruments of iron, whol- ' ly unseen to the standers by, though, to their cost, ' seen by themselves, have, upon snatching, wrested ' the instruments out of the spectres hands, and every ' one has then immediately not only beheld, but hand- ' led, an iron instrument taken by a devil from a ' neighbour. These wicked spectres have proceeded ' so far, as to steal several quantities of money from ' divers people, part of which money has, before suf- ' ficient spectators, been dropt out of the air into the ' hands of the sufferers, while the spectres have been ' urging them to subscribe their Covenant with death. ' In such extravagant ways have these wretches pro- ' ceeded, the draagooning of as many as they can, in ' their own combination, and the destroying of others, ' with lingring, spreading, deadly diseases; 'till our ' country should at last become too hot for us (26).— ' Such is the extraordinary, and indeed improbable, ac- ' count our author gives of the Witchcrafts, and of the ' Devil's proceedings in New-England: and no less ex- ' travagant are his notions about the Devil's Power and ' Mischievousness; as will appear by the following sam- ' ples. . . . ' I have set myself to countertermine the ' whole Plot of the Devil against New-England, in ' every branch of it, as far as one of my darkness, can ' comprehend such a work of darkness (27).—The ' New-Englanders are a people of God settled in those, ' which were once the Devil's territories; and it may ' easily be supposed that the Devil was exceedingly ' disturbed, when he perceived such a people here ac- ' complishing the promise of old made unto our blessed ' Jesus, That he should have the utmost parts of the ' earth for his possession. The Devil thus irritated, ' immediately tryed all sorts of methods to overturn ' this poor plantation.—He has wanted his incarnate ' Legions to persecute us, as the people of God have ' in the other hemisphere been persecuted: he has ' therefore drawn forth his more spiritual ones to make ' an attaque upon us.—An army of Devils is horribly ' broke in upon the place which is the center, and af- ' ter a fort, the first-born of our English settlements ' (28).—If the Devils now can strike the minds of ' men with any poisons of so fine a composition and ' operation, that scores of innocent people shall unite, ' in confessions of a crime, which we see actually ' committed, it is a thing prodigious, beyond the ' wonders of the former ages, and it threatens no less ' than a sort of a dissolution upon the world. Now, ' by these confessions 'tis agreed, That the Devil has ' made became so considerable in Boston, that he was several times consulted by the Magistrates upon made a dreadful knot of witches in the country, and by the help of witches has dreadfully increased that knot (29).—The witches have not only intimidated, but some of them acknowledged, That they have plotted the representations of innocent persons, to cover and shelter themselves in their witchcrafts; now, although our good God has hitherto generally preserved us from the abuse therein designed by the Devils for us, yet who of us can exactly state, How far our God may for our chastisement permit the devil to proceed in such an abuse (30).—The Devil has made us like a troubled sea, and the mire and mud begins now also to heave up apace. Even good and wife men suffer themselves to fall into their paroxysms; and the shake which the Devil is now giving us, fetches up the dirt which before lay still at the bottom of our sinful hearts. If we allow the mad dogs of hell to poison us by biting us, we shall imagine that we see nothing but such things about us, and, like such things, fly upon all that we see. Were it not for what is in us, for my part, I should not fear a thousand legions of Devils (31).—There are very worthy men, who having been called by God, when and where this Witchcraft first appeared upon the stage to encounter it, are earnestly desirous to have it sifted unto the bottom of it. And I pray, which of us all that should live under the continual impressions of the Tortures, Outcries, and Havocks which Devils confessedly commissioned by Witches make among their distressed neighbours, would not have a bias that way beyond other men (32)—? Alas! we are not aware of the devil, if we do not think, that he aims at inflaming us one against another; and shall we suffer ourselves to be devil-ridden?—I heir Majesties good subjects must not every day be torn to pieces by horrid witches, and those horrid felons, be left wholly unprofecuted (33). . . . The Devils are so many, that some thousands can, sometimes, at once apply themselves to vex one child of man.—Alas! the Devils, they swarm about us, like the frogs of Egypt, in the most retired of our chambers. Are we at our boards? There will be Devils to tempt us unto sensuality: Are we in our beds? There will be Devils to tempt us unto carnality: Are we in our shops? There will be Devils to tempt us unto dishonesty. Yea, though we get into the church of God, there will be Devils to haunt us in the very temple itself, and there tempt us to manifold misbehaviours. I am verily persuaded, that there are very few humane affairs whereinto some Devils are not insinuated; There is not so much as a journey intended, but Satan will have an hand in hindering or furthering of it. 'Tis to be supposed, That there is a sort of arbitrary, even military Government, among the Devils.—Think on vast regiments of cruel and bloody French dragoons, with an intendant over them, over-running a pillaged neighbourhood, and you will think a little, what the constitution among the Devils is.—'Tis to be supposed, that some Devils are more peculiarly commissioned, and perhaps qualified, for some countries, while others are for others . . . . It is not likely that every Devil does know every language; or that every Devil can do every mischief. 'Tis possible, that the experience, or if I may call so, the education of all Devils is not alike, and that there may be some difference in their abilities. If one might make an inference from what the Devils do, to what they are, one cannot forbear dreaming, that there are degrees of Devils.—Nor does it look agreeably, That the Dæmons, which were the familiars of such a man as the old Apollonius, differ not from those baser goblins that chule to nest in the filthy and loathsome rags of a beastly forerefs.—There is a devilish wrath against mankind, with which the Devil is for God's sake inspired.—The horrible dragon does not only with his tayl strike at the stars of God, but at the God himself who made the stars, being desirous to outshine them all (34).—The Devil often gets a liberty to make a descent upon the children of men.—He stands with all the instruments of death, aiming at us, and begging of the Lord, as that King asked of the hood winked Syrians of old, shall I smite 'em, shall I smite 'em?—The Devil, sometimes, docs make most useful havock among us. . . . There is a Court somewhere kept;

a court of Spirits, where the Devil enters all sorts of complaints against us all; he charges us with manifold sins against the Lord our God.—The Devil is a Do-evil, and wholly set upon mischief. When our Lord once was going to muzzel him, that he might not mischief others, he cried out, Art thou come to torment me (35)?—What woes indeed must we expect from such a Devil of a Moloch, as relishes no sacrifices like those of human heart-blood, and unto whom there is no musick like the bitter, dying, doleful groans, ejulated by the roaring children of men (36).—According to his notion also, it was the Devil that kept mankind so long from discovering those useful inventions, the knowledge of the Loadstone, Printing, Spectacles, &c.—' Indeed, [as he goes on] as the Devil does begrutch us all manner of Good, so he does annoy us with all manner of Woe, as often as he finds himself capable of doing it. 'Tis the destroyer, or the Devil, that scatters plagues about the world. 'Tis no uneasy thing for the Devil to impregnate the air about us, with such malignant salts, as, meeting with the salt of our microcosm, shall immediately cast us into that fermentation and putrefaction, which will utterly dissolve all the vital ties within us. And when the Devil has raised those arserifical fumes, which become venomous quivers full of terrible arrows, how easily can he shoot the deleterious miasms into those juices or bowels of mens bodies, which will soon inflame them with a mortal fire! Hence come Plagues, infectious fevers, &c.—Again, Wars are also some of those woes, with which the Devil causes our trouble; and there is in truth scarce any war, but what is of his kindling. The Devil is that Vulcan, out of whose forge come the instruments of our wars, and it is he that finds us employments for those instruments. We read concerning Dæmoniacs, or people in whom the Devil was, that they would cut, and wound themselves; and so, when the Devil is in men, he puts them upon dealing in that barbarous fashion with one another. Wars do often furnish him with some thousands of souls in one morning from one acre of ground; and so for the sake of such Thyestæan banquets, he will push us upon as many wars as he can. Once more, why may not Storms be reckoned among those woes, with which the Devil does disturb us? It is not improbable that natural storms on the world are often of the Devil's raising:—Whence perhaps it is, that Thunders are observed oftner to break upon Churches than upon any other buildings; and besides many a man, yea many a ship, yea, many a town has miscarried, when the Devil has been permitted from above to make an horrible tempest. However that the Devil has raised many metaphorical storms [troubles and persecutions] upon the Church, is a thing than which there is nothing more notorious. . . . But in reality spiritual woes are the principal woes among all those that the Devil would have us undone withal. Sins are the worst of woes, and the Devil seeks nothing so much as to plunge us into sins.—How come so many to be feared in their sins? 'Tis the Devil that with a red hot iron fetcht from his hell does cauterise them (37).—While we are sojourning in this world, we are in what may upon too many accounts be called The Devil's Country.—The Birds of prey (and indeed the Devils most literally in the shape of great Birds!) are flying about: would we find a covert from these vultures? let us then hear our Lord Jesus from heaven clobbering unto us, O that you would be gathered under my wings (38)!—But, to use our Author's words, 'Enough, if not too much, of these things (39).' Such are the absurd Notions, [Notions founded upon weakness, credulity, and false principles,] which then reigned in New-England, and have also but too much reigned in Old England. They have travelled from North to South, and from East to West, in proportion as Ignorance and Superstition have successively prevailed. Our legislature have discouraged them to the utmost (40), and it is to be hoped, they will for ever be banished amongst the Hottentots and Iroquois. Such impious doctrines do certainly tend to downright Manichæism. And, as the learned Bishop Hutchinson observes (41), 'When Religion is clogged with such bloody and silly Superstitions, it tempts men to be both Sadducees and Atheists.'

upon affairs of state; and, more than once, quelled threatening riots, merely by the force of his persuasions. For the publick good, he set on foot there, and promoted several societies: particularly, a Society for suppressing disorders, and for Reformation of manners. And a Society of Peace-makers, whose professed business it was to compose differences, and prevent law-suits. Moreover, he published a Proposal, for an Evangelical Treasury, in order to build churches where they were wanted, distribute books of piety, relieve poor Ministers &c. which his own congregation, and some others, readily came into, and encouraged (f). His fame was not confined to his own country. For, in 1710, the university of Glasgow in Scotland conferred on him the degree of Doctor in Divinity; for which they sent him his diploma, under the seal of the university. And, in 1714, the Royal Society of London chose him one of their Fellows. He was further honoured, by an epistolary correspondence with several persons of eminent character for piety and learning: As the late Lord Chancellor King, and the celebrated Dr Frank Professor of Divinity in the university of Hall in Saxony; with many more, both in England, and in other countries (g). After a laborious, and well-meant life, he dyed February the 13th, 1727-8; being the next day after he had completed his sixty-fifth year (h).

MAY [THOMAS], an eminent poet and historian in the reigns of King James and King Charles I. was descended of an ancient and worshipful family in Suffex; of which, we shall here refer to some extract, from an old pedigree in being, at the foot of the page [A]; and in this place, only observe, that Sir Thomas May of Mayfield, his father, being twice married, took to his second wife, Jane, the daughter of Sir Michael Sandys, of Throley in Kent, Knight (a); by whom, it is not mentioned what issue she bore him in the said pedigree, nor what the name of his first wife was: but in Anthony Wood, she appears to have been the daughter of ——— Rich of Hornden in Essex (b). By this first wife, he had Thomas his eldest son, the subject of our ensuing discourse. He was born at Mayfield aforesaid, as it is presumed, in the year 1595; and as it has also been, from his epitaph, in the said author computed (c). He was trained to good literature in his neighbourhood, from his early youth, and afterwards, entered a Fellow-Commoner in Sidney-Suffex-college in Cambridge (d), where he diligently applied himself to his studies; and what treasures of classick learning he there acquired, is apparent in his writings (e). We have it from the notes of an author, who is well acquainted with such particulars, that he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1612 (f), and that he never proceeded further in any academical advancement. After he arrived in London, his genius inclining him to poetry, he followed not the Court, nor resided at Westminster so early, though he might laterally perform divers things there never parallel'd by any Englishman before (g). For he was soon after an inhabitant, and a member of the society of Gray's-Inn*. Among the eminent courtiers and wits of those times, with whom his learning and ingenuity brought him into favour and friendship; were Sir Kenelm Digby, Sir Richard Fanshaw, Sir John Suckling, Sir Aston Cokaine (b), Thomas Carew, one of the gentlemen of his Majesty's privy-chamber, especially Endymion Porter, one of his bed-chamber; besides Ben. Jonson, and others of higher quality, who were as well great lovers of poetry, as poets themselves; and not only great favourers of those who deserved that title, but have some of them exhibited poetical encomiums on his works. This reputation he seems to have maintained about twenty years, even to obtaining the countenance and encouragement of King Charles I. and his Royal Consort; who had such a singular opinion of his abilities, that it was by their particular choice and recommendation, he undertook and published, several of his poetical performances. Having been witness of the great fame which Shakespeare,

Jonson,

[A] We shall refer to some extract from an old pedigree, &c. By this pedigree it appears, that Thomas May, of Pashley in Tishhurst in Suffex, had by his wife Margaret, daughter of Robert Whitfield of Wadehurst, I. Thomas May of Pashley, and II. George May of Burghurst. Which Thomas, by his wife Jane daughter of ——— Wyborne of Hawkwell in Kent, had Thomas May of Pashley, who, by Anne, daughter of Anthony Staple of Fromfield in Suffex, had Anthony May of Pashley, Esq; High Sheriff of Suffex and Surrey, in 1629 (1); and he, by Joan, his second wife, daughter of Walter Roberts of Borsell in Tishhurst aforesaid, had Edward and Adrian May. The second son of Thomas May aforesaid, named George May, of Burghurst, married Elizabeth, daughter of John Henley of Cranbroke in Kent, by whom he had Sir Tho. May of Mayfield, the father of our poet (2), as abovementioned in the text. There were several other noted persons of the name, as we find in some other papers, wherein they have been collected; of whom, because they are some of them allied to this branch, it cannot be thought very tedious, for the convenience of those who may have occasion to trace the family more extensively, here briefly to enumerate these few; I. Dr

William May, Master of Trinity-college in Cambridge, and Dean of St Paul's, who died 1561 (3). II. John May, author of a Declaration of the Present State of Cloathing in England, &c. (4). III. Sir Humphrey May, Vice Chamberlain of his Majesty's Household, and one of his Privy council, also Member of Parliament, &c. who died 10 June 1630 (5). IV. Edward May, Doctor of Philosophy and Physic, and Professor Elect of them in the college of the academy of noblemen, called, The Museum Minervæ (6), and Physician Extraordinary to the Queen of Great Britain; who published A Relation of a strange Monster, or Serpent, found in the left Ventricle of the Heart of John Pennant, Gentleman, aged 21 Years, &c. (7). V. Richard May, Esq; Recorder and Member of Parliament for Chichester in Suffex 1678; and, VI. Thomas May, Esq; Member for Chichester, 1688-90 (8). VII. Baptist May, Esq; Privy Purse, &c. to King Charles II. who dying on the 2d of March 1696, aged 69 years, was buried in St George's Chapel at Windfor (9). VIII. Sir Algeron May, who died on the 26 of May, 1704 (10); besides several others.

Jonson, Beaumont, Fletcher, and some other cotemporary dramatists had acquired, he grew emulous, in some degree, to imitate them: accordingly we find, that some of his first writings were composed for the theatre; where, being well received; we shall mention his said theatrical works together in the note annexed [B]. Besides these plays which are five in number, as appears in the said note, we have several translations of his, from some Latin authors, and other compositions of his own also in verse; among which translations are, Virgil's Georgics, in four books, with annotations (i): and Selected Epigrams of Martial; which sometimes appear bound with the former together (k). But he was for none of his translations of the Ancients more famous, than that of Lucan's Pharsalia, and his own Continuation of the said poem, both in English and Latin, to the death of Julius Cæsar [C]. He had an hand also in the translation of a famous book that was written by a celebrated

(i) In 12mo, 1622 and 1628.

(k) In 12mo, 1629.

[B] Shall mention his said theatrical works together, &c.] These plays of our author's writing, are five in number; and we shall mention them, as they appear in the copies, or titles we have met with, according to their seniority. And so we must first speak of, The Heir, a Comedy, acted by the company of Revels, 1620, printed in 4to 1633. It is much commended in a copy of verses written by the ingenious Thomas Carew, Esq; To his honoured friend Master Thomas May, on his Comedy, The Heir, and prefixed to it; which verses are also reprinted in the collection of that author's works, which were afterwards published (11). Winstanley says this play is done to the life, both for plot and language. Gerard Langbaine has observed, that among other commendations bestowed in Carew's poem, on the stile, and the natural working up of the passions, that the author has these lines on the œconomy of the play.

The whole plot doth alike itself disclose,
Through the five acts, as doth a lock that goes
With letters; for 'till ev'ry one be known,
The lock's as fast, as if you had found none.

Then he gives it as his own opinion, that, 'There are few persons of judgment, who are true lovers of innocent and inoffensive comedy, but will allow this to be an excellent play (12).' The next, according to the time it first appeared, is Cleopatra, Queen of Egypt, her Tragedy, acted 1626; and printed in 12mo 1639. It is dedicated to the accomplished Sir Kenelm Digby, and he is handsomely celebrated in the said dedication. Samuel Daniel had before wrought the story of this Queen into a dramatic poem; which, with his other works, has been twice or thrice printed (13); so that those readers, who have the curiosity, may easily compare them. The next is, Agrippina, Empress of Rome, her Tragedy, acted 1628, and printed in 12mo 1639. Here Langbaine raises a little cavil, and intimates, as if our author should have forborne the application of some lines out of Petronius Arbitr, which reflect upon Lucan's Pharsalia; Mr May having such a peculiar value for this poet, as to publish a translation of him (14): But as this critic allows those verses are pertinently applied, and as he has not duly considered, that they might have been so inserted into this play, before ever our author had any resolution to translate Lucan, his book might perhaps have better spared that criticism, than this play that illustration. The next is Antigone, the Theban Princess, her Tragedy, printed in 8vo, 1631, and dedicated to the most worthily honoured Endymion Porter, Esq; Our author is observed, in the contexture of this tragedy, to have made use of the Antigone of Sophocles, and the Thebais of Seneca; and the reader is also further referred to the Thebais of Statius, &c (15) Lastly, we have his Old Couple, a Comedy, which is here last mentioned, because last printed; though it was perhaps one of his earliest written. If there was any edition printed of it before his death, it has not been taken notice of in any account of our dramatic writers: the only edition mentioned of this comedy is in quarto, 1631, after the author's death: However, it is thought little inferior to his other comedy, first mentioned, and is said to have been formerly in repute (16); and observed to be chiefly designed as an antidote against avarice (17). There has been also ascribed to our author, by Edward Philips, a Comedy, entitled, The Old Wives Tale (18), but as we could never meet with any body who has seen it, or who do not believe it appeared too early to be of his writing, we must submit it to the determination of those who are better acquainted therewith. Winstanley also, upon his authority, has both adopted that play under our author's name, and fathered another upon him (19), entitled, Orlando Furioso, one of the Twelve Peers of France, his History; acted before the Queen's Majesty, as another writer more fully describes the title (20). It is founded on the epic poem of Ariosto; but as it was printed a year before our author, May, was born, it excludes him quite from having any hand in it.

[C] He was for none of his translations more famous than that of Lucan's Pharsalia; and his own Continuation of it, in Latin and English, &c.] This historical poem of the civil war between Pompey and Cæsar, had not met with so early a translator among us, as some other works of the famous Roman poets. The first of our countrymen we have met with, who designed to oblige the public with a version of it, was George Turberville, sometime secretary in that embassy to Russia, which was made by Thomas Randolph, Esq; in the year 1568. But he informs us, in one of his poems, that he was dissuaded from this hardy enterprize by Melpomene in a dream (21); and recommends Thomas Sackville (afterwards Earl of Dorset) as the most proper person to perform it. The next, who did make some visible progress in the work, was Christopher Marlowe, a celebrated poet and player of those times. Some years after his death, there appeared The First Book of Lucan, translated by him, line for line; but he neither lived to finish this, nor a more famous performance of his whereunto it is joined, and which did meet with the respect of a finishing hand (22). After this, about the middle of King James's reign, came forth in print, a more complete translation of Lucan's poem, performed by Sir Arthur Gorges, a learned knight, and now Gentleman of the Bedchamber, who had been a valiant sea-officer in the late Queen's reign, and distinguished himself very signally against the Spaniards, in several notable engagements, as under other renowned commanders, so also under the Earl of Essex, and Sir Walter Raleigh, whose relation he was; and as Sir Arthur has, in an ample and accurate narrative, commemorated his gallant exploits in the Island Voyage (23); so Sir Walter now, before this work, no less celebrates his valour and fortitude, as well for the blood he had shed in that and other expeditions, as his sufferings since in other respects. This translation (24) though scarce known now among our literary antiquaries, has been taken notice of by Fabricius and other foreigners. However, these attempts no way discouraged our author from reattempting this poet, notwithstanding also the supercilious censures which had been made of him by some hypercritics; whose opinions we shall shew them more favour than here to recite; we mean, Doufa, Scaliger, and such like imperious and dogmatical judges of wit, who might perhaps have moderated their judgments in relation to Lucan, by well examining themselves, how much they could have excelled, upon such an exalted theme, before they were twenty-seven years of age? and whether it is not likely, that he would have gained more reproof for greater fictions than he has used, or being less historical, on a subject than so fresh or well known, and wherewith his contemporaries were, on one side or other, so much affected, than he would reputation by their praises had he been more poetical? Dr Fuller says, that others, as judicious as they, have thought Lucan an excellent poet, and to have lost no lustre by Mr May's translation (25). The first edition of this translation is said to have been printed in octavo 1627. And in the year 1630 was published in English, His Continuation of it. This poem of his own composing he translated into Latin, and it was printed abroad the same year. A. Wood says, it is written in such lofty and happy Latin hexameters, that he attained much more reputation abroad, than he lost at home (26); he means by a work of his writing in prose, hereafter mentioned. This Latin supplement was reprinted several times after, with some noted editions of that Roman poet, by some famous foreigners, very much to our author's honour; as may be seen in Fabricius and others (27). The said Fabricius, in the first volume of the work we have here quoted in the margin, published eleven years before the said second volume, having also spoken of other editions of Lucan at Amsterdam, with the notes of Hugo Grotius, Thomas Farnaby, and others, published by Cornelius Schrevelius, in the years 1658 and 1669; adds, In quibus etiam subjicitur Lucani supplementum, Libris VII. à Thoma Maior Anglo, non infeliciter elucubratum. He has in these works, as well as most of his plays indeed, shewed himself so well acquainted with the antiquities, the history, and geography, the characters, customs, and manners of the Romans, that he was read by many as an ancient classic author; and he has been celebrated by foreigners for the same, as well as his own countrymen. Among the former, Nicholas Heinsius has a copy of verses in his praise (28). And among the latter, we may mention that eminent scholar and statesman, the learned and loyal Sir Richard Fanshawe, knight and baronet, of the honourable privy council to King Charles the Second, and his ambassador to Portugal and Spain. This ingenious gentleman has published a Latin poem upon Mr May's translation and his Continuations of Lucan, to the extent of fifty lines (29); out of which, a character might be produced, in confirmation of what others have said of them, by those who were inclined to extend this article to the limits, which the materials there are in being for it would allow. The second edition of this translation we suppose was published about the same time with the supplements aforesaid. The third edition, now before us, and perhaps the others, is addressed by the translator, in a polite dedication, to William Earl of Devonshire; besides which, it contains a short account of the life of Lucan, and two copies of verses; the one by Ben. Jonson, To his chosen friend the learned translator, &c. the other, by J. Vaughan, upon this unequalled work, and the author. At the beginning of every book there are the heads of the argument, or subject thereof, briefly recounted in verse; and, at the end, some short annotations, explaining or confirming divers parts of the poem, out of the ancient Greek and Latin historians. We have seen several copies of this edition, but no sculpture before them of Lucan bleeding to death in the bath, according to his own choice; being ordered to die by the tyrant Nero, who had, in envy of his fame and merits, suppressed his works, and thereby driven him to engage in Piso's conspiracy: however, there are some verses of May's, in the leaf before the title, designed as an interpretation of such a frontispiece, which we shall here transcribe, because they are not many, and may serve for a specimen of his verification.

Whose lofty genius, great Apollo chose,
When Roman liberty oppress'd, should die,
To sing her sad, and solemn obsequy,
In stately numbers, high, as Rome was great;
And not so much to years indebted yet,
As thou, fam'd Maro, when thy infant verse
The gnats low funeral did first rehearse.
Thy favour'd muſe did find a different fate;
Thou got'st Augustus' love, he Nero's hate:
But 'twas an act, more great, and high, to move
A prince's envy, than a prince's love.

This third edition of Lucan (30), has the second edition of May's continuation bound with it. To this part is prefixed the author's epistle dedicatory, To the most high and mighty Monarch Charles, by the Grace of God King of Great-Britain, &c. on whom he has bestowed a lofty encomium and zealous wishes for his long life and prosperity. This dedication is followed with an English poem by the author, entitled, The Complaint of Calliope against the Destinies, for the untimely death of Lucan; and another in Latin, by Johannes Sulpicius Verulanus, one of Lucan's commentators upon the same subject, entitled, Querela de interitu Lucani, opere nondum perfecto. This supplement also, has the heads or arguments in verse prefixed to every book, and short annotations at the end of each. As for the character of it, it is rather more smooth and free in the measure, or less cramped in the metre, than his translation is: yet is he generally in his stile close, clear, and grave; but as for bounding the sense in couplets, the use of surprizing contrasts, elegant tautologies, and especially the harmonious scissuræ, or pauses, retrenchment of elisions, superfluous epithets, expletives, and some other modern improvements of our poetry, they were then but in their infancy, and but little observed; when the English verification in rhyme followed so closely the Latin cadence, as to end so often the sense of one period and begin another in the same line, which, when judiciously managed, is emphatical and sublime in measured prose, or blank verse, yet it untunes our English chimes, and, especially in reading, deadens their melody. Some readers have been of opinion, that the late Mr Addison had been conversant with this supplement (31), when he was writing his Tragedy of Cato; which we shall leave those who are at leisure to confirm, by comparing them, and only observe thus much further of it, that in a collection of short characters in verse, now before us, some of them that have never been printed, others that have; there is one of four lines upon this work; the thoughts of which are partly built upon the conclusion of Ben. Jonson's poem on our author beforementioned, and a transposure of part of May's verses upon Lucan before repeated. They are as follow:

To Mr Thomas May.

Thou son of Mercury, whose fluent tongue,
Made Lucan finish his Pharsalian song;
Thy fame is equal, better is thy fate,
Thou hast got Charles his love, he Nero's bate (32).

[D] Both which deserve to be spoken of in a note apart.] The said author of these two, among other books, the learned and ingenious John Barclay, was the son of William Barclay an eminent Scots Civilian in France, where this John was born in 1582. After his father's death, in 1605, he came into England, where King James employed his pen, for the excellence of his Latin stile, and made him one of the Gentlemen of his Bed chamber. He was afterwards, in no less favour at Rome, with the Pope, and several Cardinals, where he died the 12th of August 1621, while his Argenis was printing in France. This celebrated work was translated into English by Sir Robert le Grys, an old officer of the army (who also translated afterwards, Valerius Paterculus) and our author, Thomas May (33). This book is said to have been calculated for the instruction of the Gentleman Politician, according to his own strain, in the most subtle and refined parts of philosophy, and the language it is writ in. He is characterized to walk upon the smooth carpet of political prose, with Pegasus in his hand, which he gracefully mounts, now and then, like an old Roman Knight of the Equestrian order; whereby it soon became the delight, not only of scholars, but also the greatest statesmen, particularly, Cardinal Richlieu; who is said to have studied Men and Argenis too much for the good of his neighbours, upon whom the conclusions were tried. "I was one of the chief books in his cabinet, and more in his head than his Breviary, says my author. Wherefore, and to shew his great skill in refined Latin and Politicks, as well as prophetick Arcanums, a note burnt it in his common hall, for the edification of his domestick chaplains (34). The other book, written by the same hand, and translated by our author May, is Barclay's Icon Animorum. In this book the author has shewn himself a man of discernment in the different spirit, genius, affections, and dispositions of

To which is added, in prose, The Description of Henry the Second, with a short Survey of the Changes of his Reign: also, The single and comparative Characters of Henry and Richard, his Sons (1). Not long after the publication of this historical poem, it appears, that being one of the spectators of a splendid masque, which was performed at court, he received some very harsh indignity or ill usage, from the intemperate Lord Chamberlain, who then was; for which his Lordship met with such reproof from the King, as disposed him, in his cooler consideration, to make both an apology to our poet, and a purchase of his reconciliation with him besides; as may appear in the particulars thereof, from good authorities hereunto subjoined [E]. Two years after this, he published of human kind, in various countries or parts of the world. It is divided into sixteen chapters; in the second, he has an ample encomium upon Prospect Hill at Greenwich in Kent, which he extols as the most delightful command of nature and art in the richest and grandest variety of views not only in England, but perhaps in all Europe. Where the scenes are so beautified with contrarieties by land and water, and the eyes on all sides ever diverted and refreshed with such unexpected novelties, that some objects or other will leave impressions deeper and more apt to repossess the memory, than local prospects are usually wont to do. He has neither been singular in his admiration, nor wanted those readers of him, who have taken notice of it in applause of his judgment*. In his fourth chapter, he has some observable particulars upon our people and products. Among the latter he remarks the tall bay tree we had growing in England; and that Rosemary, which is so precious in many countries, by reason of the care in planting and preserving it, is here so common, as to grow often in hedges, and as a fence to our gardens: but he seems to reflect on our negligence in the culture and propagation of saffron, which we have in such perfection, to that plenty, which a flower of such sovereign virtues and so many ways useful deserves. In his character of our people, having spoken of our courage, he also gives one remarkable instance of temerity or rashness in us. 'Tis of an English soldier, who being taken in company with twenty-three Spaniards, by Prince Maurice; it was determined that eight of them should be hanged, in requital of a like sentence that had been made by Albert the Archduke upon some Hollanders, and that it should by lot be decided on whom the punishment should fall. The Englishman happily drew his deliverance, but one Spaniard expressed great reluctance and terror of mind to put his hand into the helmet and try his fate, not so much in fear of death, as an antipathy to such an unnatural decision, in which he might make his own hand destroy himself, and be executed for the guilt of others, or acquitted for no innocence of his own. The Englishman consented to take what money he had, which was twelve crowns, and stand to the chance for him; the judges consented also to his request, as that of a fool or a madman, who deserved not the life he had so providentially cleared; yet such his fortune was, or such the favour of Providence, that he drew himself safe again. Whereupon the author pronounces him unworthy not only of that double, but even of a single preservation, who had so basely undervalued his life †. This author mentions not his name, but we have somewhere read, that it was George Haselwood; and when he was asked why he would put his life in such danger again for the safety of another, and after such a signal escape, so presumptuously hazard it a second time? he answered, because he thought he had a bargain of it, for considering he daily exposed his life for the value of six-pence, he thought he might with much more reason venture it for twelve crowns.

Besides the little copies of verses translated by our author May, in Barclay's Argenis, as before observed, there are several commendatory poems of his upon the works of other authors, that are printed before their books, and never were in any of his own. Among these is that copy of verses he composed in praise of William Bedwell and a tract of his publication ||. He has also a Latin copy of verses before one or two of Charles Alleyn's Historical Poems ‡: and among the Elegiac poems that were collected by Dr Brian Duppa in memory of Ben. Jonson, we find also one written by Thomas May §, besides others.

subjoined.] The account of this gross or ill usage of Mr May in publick, is descended to us from two credible authors, who knew the persons concerned; and they both speak of it with such respect to our author, as if he was at that time looked upon as a more considerable person than at this day he is generally accounted. The first who mentions it, though his account is the last published, was, I think, a minister of the Church, and a correspondent of the Lord Wentworth, afterwards Earl of Strafford, when he was Deputy of Ireland. He may, throughout that Nobleman's collection of letters, be looked upon, as his news-monger, or gazetteer, so full all his letters to him are of the observable occurrences about the court. This gentleman, named Mr George Garrard, gave that Lord such satisfaction in his communications, that he was afterwards preferred, by his interest, to be master of the Charter House; and his account of this accident, in one of his letters to his Lordship, dated the 27th of February 1633, is as follows:—'On Monday after Candlemas-day, the gentlemen of the Inns of Court performed their masque at court; they were sixteen in number, who rode through the streets in four chariots; and two others, to carry their pages and musicians, attended by an hundred gentlemen on great horses, as well clad as ever I saw any; they far exceeded in bravery any masque that had formerly been presented by those societies, and performed the dancing part with much applause. In their company, there was one Mr Read of Gray's-Inn, whom all the women, and some men, cry'd up for as handsome a man as the Duke of Buckingham. They were well us'd at court by the King and Queen; no disgust given them, only this one accident fell; Mr May of Gray's-Inn, a fine post, he who translated Lucan, came athwart my Lord Chamberlain in the Banqueting-House, and he broke his staff over his shoulders, not knowing who he was; the King present, who knew him, for he calls him His Poet, and told the Chamberlain of it; who sent for him the next morning, and fairly excused himself to him, and gave him fifty pounds in pieces: I believe he was the more indulgent for his name-sake (35). The other author who mentions this affair, is Mr Francis Osborne, in his well-known Works; a man who has been enviously traduced, because he was a man of extraordinary ingenuity and judgment, knowledge and penetration into the actions and characters of his time; whereby he has much exposed the corruptions of licentious power, and the plausible delusions of ambitious, covetous, and designing men. As we have seen many of his historical assertions confirmed by original letters, and other authentic testimonies, so the narrative of the event above, and his relation of it, will mutually support each other; whose words are these, where speaking of Philip Herbert, then Earl of Montgomery, he says, 'This I can attest for the man, that he was intollerably choleric and offensive, and did not refrain, while he was Chamberlain, to break many wiser heads than his own; Mr May, that translated Lucan, having felt the weight of his staff, which, had not his office and his place, being the Banqueting-house, protected, I question whether ever he would have struck again (36). He adds upon this occasion, a tart reflection on those court diversions, where he says, 'so disobliging were the most grateful pleasures of the court, whose masques, and other spectacles, though they wholly intended them for shew, and would not have been pleased without great store of company, yet did not spare to affront such as came to see them; which accuseth the King no less of folly, in being at so vast an expence for that which signified nothing,

- The Victorious Reign of Edward the Third*, an historical poem, also in seven Books; by the special command of King Charles the First (m); from both which Poems, as well as from his Continuation of Lucan, and his Plays, the reader may see several of the most choice and observable thoughts or sentiments, extracted in a late collection that has been published out of our old poets (n). There were two of his tragedies published four years after that last historical poem, which had been acted many years before, as we have in the first note observed; but after this time we meet with no more of his poetical compositions in print. Dr Fuller is, I think, the first person who offers us a reason for it, where he says, 'That some disgust at court was given to, or taken by, him, as some would have it, because his bays were not gilded richly enough, and his verses rewarded by King Charles according to expectation (o).' This disgust is thought to have partly risen from his disappointment in some hopes he had received of being made Master of the Revels, or, as it is more generally accounted for, from B. Jonson's being succeeded in the place of Poet Laureat by W. d'Avenant. We have indeed read before, that the King was wont to call May his Poet, therefore he might well hope for the laurel after Jonson's death; but there may appear some reasons to doubt whether, as soon as he died, in 1637, d'Avenant immediately succeeded to that honour, as it is said †, though it is sufficiently known he was Jonson's next successor. Edward Phillips says, that May turned malecontent, for having been frustrated in his expectation of being the Queen's Poet, for which he stood candidate with Sir William d'Avenant, who was preferred before him (p). Winstaniely also ascribes, in the same manner, his revolt or defection from the court, to the same person's being made the Queen's Poet; and we are not only informed that d'Avenant is in the same sense stiled, soon after that time, Her Majesty's Servant, before some of his own plays (q); but we have met with others, who have likewise before their works so intitled themselves (r); and indeed the Queens under whom these poets flourished, seem to have had as much business for them as their consorts. However this was, though grace and favour he received for the entertainments of his pen, yet profit or preferment, as we hear of none, 'tis pretty evident, that either May, through discontent or interest, did desert the court, or through the ingratitude thereof, or the infelicity of the times, was deserted by it; for while that was driven from place to place during the troubles of the civil war, he certainly was received into the favour, or took up his abode under the sanction, of some General, supposed to be Sir T. Fairfax, in the Republican Army; and was afterwards under the protection, and in the service of the Parliament, as we shall find he declares himself; and more particularly, that he was Secretary thereto. With the advantages of having lived formerly so much about the court, and those, he must have had, in these situations, of good intelligence, in relation to the characters of the most active persons and their most eminent transactions, it may be reasonably presumed he was now as well qualified by his knowledge and experience to explain the conduct of the living, as by his learning and ingenuity he had been, to expound the compositions of the dead. To exert such abilities in the service of the Commonwealth, it is not likely that he wanted good encouragement: and thus we may account for the publication of his last work, intitled, The History of the Parliament of England; or, as we might now explain it, a brief Narrative of the Civil Wars that broke out during the sitting thereof. He was chosen by them to be thus their historian, was influenced in his said history by their directions, and accordingly represents it as a task imposed upon him; which he undertook with great reluctance; and 'wished more than life, that for the publick-sake, his theme could rather have been, the prosperity of these nations, the honour and happiness of the King, and such a blessed condition of both, as might have reached all the ends, for which government was first ordained in the world, &c. (s).' To the various editions of this noted book, we shall hereunder refer [F], and only observe in this place, that of one so written, it is no wonder the adverse party

[F] To the various editions of this noted book, we shall hereunder refer.] As noted as it has been, this history is now grown scarce, we mean the first edition of it, the title whereof is here given in the margin (38); before which title there is this Imprimatur, — 'I have read over the First Part of this History, contained in three books; an impartial Truth; and judge it fit for the publick view, by the printing; Jo. Langley: May 7, 1647.' Prefixed to this work there is a judicious preface in two sheets which was never reprinted, followed by a table of contents, in one. In the said preface are these words, which more particularly relate to the author himself; shewing how he was, at the beginning of these civil wars, situated, and what means, share, or degree he had, of intelligence. 'That, says he, which of all other is most likely to be differently related, is, concerning the actions of war, and soldiery; and in the time of this war, it is a thing of extraordinary difficulty, I might say, of impossibility, for those of one party to be truly informed of all the councils, or very performances and actions of commanders and soldiers on the other side. How much valour the English nation on both sides have been guilty of in this unnatural war, the world must needs know in the general fame: but for particulars, how much worth, virtue, and courage, some particular Lords, Gentlemen, and others, have shewed, unless both sides do write, will never perfectly be known. My residence, continues he, hath been, during these wars, in the quarters, and under the protection of the Parliament; and whatsoever is briefly related of the soldiery, being towards the end of the book, is according to that light which I discerned there. For whatsoever I have missed concern-

party should strive so much as they have done, by all means, to bring it into disregard; but of all the means used, none has been more artful, than by scattering abroad their superlative praises of his poetry, to confine our esteem and attention in such manner to that, as we may think his history not worth the reading. He foretold that his performance would beget him envy (t), which in all likelihood, was not diminished by his preference: and because no great flaws could be found in his parts or qualifications, for the execution of this work, in his knowledge, judgment, or learning, method, or style, throughout the said history; it was easy to fix them upon his principles of morality, divinity, &c. as if, after he had forsaken the court, he grew a perfect courtier! turned debauchee, spoke slightly of the Trinity, kept beastly and atheistical company; as that of Thomas Chaloner the regicide, and endeavoured to asperse and invalidate the King and his cause (u). This is a character given of him long since his death, and when he could make no defence for himself; if any such reproaches he met with alive, it plainly appears he was too much engaged to regard them, at least for the four or five last years of his life; in which time he published three different copies of his said history; the first, larger English edition; the Latin Breviary, and Continuation; and the English version of it; as may be seen in the note last adjoined. A few months after this, without any painful or lingering indisposition, he went well to rest over night, after his chearful bottle as usual, and died in his sleep before morning, on the 13th of November 1650, aged 55 years*. It was said, this sudden death was occasioned, by tying his night-cap too close under his fat cheeks and chin, which caused a suffocation, when he turned on the other side (w). But Andrew Marvell, to give it a cast more favourable, and fruitful to his satirical vein, has written a long poem of a hundred lines (x), to make him a martyr of Bacchus, and die by the force of good wine. In this poem, though there may be some strictures of humour, yet, as sudden death has not been accounted a very natural subject of drollery, and as there seems to be more of interest or prejudice, than wit in it; and few of the verses are such good poetry as to deserve being singled out, we shall here content ourselves with extracting a few of the principal heads in prose; especially, such as may best explain some historical

ing the other party, I can make no other apology than such as Meteranus doth in the preface of his History of Belg. Tumultibus; whose words are, Quod plura de Reformatorum & Patriæ defensorum quam de partis adversis rebus gestis exposuerim; mirum haud quaquam est, quoniam plus commercii & familiaritatis mihi cum ipsis, & major indagandi, opportunitas fuit: Si Pars adversa idem tali Probitate præstiterit & ediderit; Posteritas gesta omnia legere, & liquido cognoscere magno cum fructu poterit. In like manner, I may aver, says he, to give his own translation, that if, in this discourse, more particulars are set down, concerning the actions of those men who defended the Parliament, than of them that warred against it; it was, because my conversation gave me more light on that side; to whom, as I have endeavoured to give no more than what is due, so I have cast no blemishes on the other; nor bestowed any more characters, than what the truth of story must require: if those that write on the other side, will use the same candor, there is no fear but that posterity may receive a full information concerning the unhappy distractions of these kingdoms.

The first book of this history begins with short characters of Queen Elizabeth, King James, and the beginning of King Charles the First, to the year 1641. And the last ends with a narrative of the first battle of Newberry, 1643 (39). As our author herein speaks of the most noted persons and events, he thought it not necessary in this edition to be minute in the dates of every action, or numerous in the names of those concerned therein, both being then fresh in every body's memory, and might be afterwards more acceptably displayed. He afterwards made an abstract of this History, and a continuation of it, to the death of King Charles the First, in Latin; still confined in the same number of parts, and published it in a small volume (40). This edition has escaped our sight, but we have seen one of the same book, in the same language, that was republished two years after (41), and how much oftner we know not. But between those two editions, there came out a translation of it into English by the author. The Imprimatur is signed by Sir Nathanael Brent on the tenth of June, the same year it was printed. These smaller editions both in Latin and English want as well the preface and table of chapters or contents, as the preliminary introduction of the royal characters in the folio beforementioned, besides most of the Latin verses allusive to many parts of his subject, and applied out of the ancient poets; and the whole of the first volume in folio is so contracted, that it reaches not half way in these which are indeed continued to the death of the King. This English edition seems to be the last he published himself (42). Five years after this impression, there was another published of it, as A. Wood informs us, with the author's picture before it, in a cloak and a wreath of laurel over his head. The said print is but poorly executed, and seems not to be taken from any authentic copy. Other editions there were after this, especially one towards the latter end of King Charles the Second's reign, but it is the more needless to be any further circumstantial in them, as most of the work has been incorporated in many other histories of that tumultuous time, without any acknowledgements to our author; much having been said in the reign of King Charles the Second to discredit it, by Phillips, Wintanley, and such others, whose opinions or characters have been since taken by more voluminous authors upon trust; among whom, Mr Echard, having been by some of those writings guided in some particulars, as may be seen by his recital of their sense, almost in their own language, at last calls it, One of the genteelst and handsomest Libells of those Times. But such as have pretended to no small acquaintance with the histories of those times, have, on the other side, intimated, That the facts in this history are so notorious, they are incontestible; that May flies not, like a libeller, to secret history, and undeterminable causes or motives, for the said general and deplorable rupture of the national tranquillity, but proves it amply from it's gradual foundations, in the first edition of this book, and from a series of wilful violations of the laws and rights, privileges and properties of the people, as others had also publicly asserted the same; in many of the capital points before him; and from the examples thus set forth, of this miserable period of government, have inferred, how manifestly it appears, that when a Prince will resign his most princely dispositions, to the councils of a covetous and corrupt, impetuous and ambitious ministry, and suffer himself to be led away by the deceitful and dangerous phantom of arbitrary power, under the specious and insatiating title of prerogative, whereby the people must live in subjection under many Kings, instead of one, till a division is inflamed unextinguishable, but by the blood of both, what an infallible course it is, to bring both Prince and people to destruction. But in short, our author May, has himself given the best rule for judging of his own History of these Civil Wars, or any other account of them, in the Preface beforementioned, which advises, first to read the writers on both sides, before we draw our conclusions.

historical circumstances least known, or most needful, for the confirmation of others before spoken of; which may be enough to give such readers who have not seen it, a general sense of it's contents. It seems to have been written when Marvell had some views of advantage by appearing a Royalist, upon the Restoration; therefore, after he has therein represented our poet, abruptly hurried from hence by sudden death, and amazed in Elysium, to think where he was, and from whence he came? what was become of Stepaen's Alley (in King's Street Westminster, where he lived we suppose) and where the Pope's Head or Mitre stood? signs, by which he had so often found, and lost his way; 'till at last, he met with the shade of old Ben. An allusion to the first line of his own Lucan (y), and the Pharsalian sign, where the Commonwealth's Historian sheathed the conquering Health in his own Bowels. By which time, May coming to himself, found he was translated! but, pressing among the learned throng, Ben. grew angry, shook his gray locks at the intrusion (z), and with his laurel rod, whipping him over the pate, as Pembroke did with his wand at the masque; upbraids his mercenary pen, bids him seek the company of novice statesmen, and obtrude on them his Roman comparisons; talk of liberty, 'till they all grow consuls over their cups; while he, the Dictator of the Glass, bestows the title or character of Cato upon one, and Cicero on another, how ill soever the measures of Rome and England agree: that it was not by ignorance, or seeming good, but malice, that he was misguided, because a more deserving head wore the Laurel, therefore he had prostituted the chastity of study, and apostatizing from ingenuous truth and loyalty, turned chronicler to Spartacus; but was justly taken from hence before he could relate the King's death, though it was a mortification to leave d'Avenant his survivor; who laughed to see such an emblem of Roman poverty in himself, and gratitude in the state, for paying his last reckoning so liberally; and, with so much publick gravity, after he had drank his last, leading him home, if that could be called his home, where Spenser lies and reverend Chaucer; for their dust rose, and expelled him from their sides, as the eagles feathers separate themselves in disdain from those of other birds. So that the said author, in this Poem upon May's Death, by declaring that he was not to rest, or dwell there, plainly discovers it to have been written since the Restoration. For, though after his death he was honoured by the appointment of the Parliament with a splendid funeral in Westminster abbey, where he was buried on the west side of the large south isle or transept, and had, soon after, a large monument of white marble erected in the west wall, over his grave, with a Latin inscription thereon, composed by Marchmont Needham; describing him in poetry, to be more than another Lucan, and to have dignified, or added lustre to his father's title, by being deputed the Parliament's Historian, and having so faithfully vindicated their cause, &c. (a a): yet some years after, both corpse, monument, epitaph and all, were removed. As for the epitaph, there was, not long after that above, another also in Latin, written in answer to it, as it is said, by one of the cavalier party, who had been exposed by our author; from whence, as it is above twenty lines in length, we shall only here observe, that though May is allowed at the beginning, to have been such a happy translator of Lucan, as if the soul of the Roman Poet had been translated into the English one, yet it concludes with observing, that for his performance as an historian, though written in prose, there being the fiction or liberty taken of a poet in it, the very marble that covered the reliques of so many heroick, learned, and noble personages, seemed to weep with resentment, that they should be dishonoured with such unworthy company: but it was not then to be wondered at, that he should be so preferred, by those who had turned such sacred edifices into stables for horses (b b). Soon after the Restoration, and before May had rested unmolestedly eleven years in his grave, his body, among others, which had been buried in the abbey during the civil wars, and were now thought to have usurped the place of more loyal and deserving persons, was by order digged up, and buried in a large pit belonging to St Margaret's church adjacent, at the back door of the Prebendaries lodgings, on the 12th of September 1661. His monument at the same time being taken down, was thrown aside, and, in the room of it, was afterwards erected that of Dr Thomas Trip-let, anno 1670 (c c).

G

MAYNE [JASPER,] a witty Divine of considerable note, in the XVIIth century, was born at Hatherlagh in Devonshire, in the year 1604, and being sent to Westminster school, continued there 'till he was nineteen years of age, without obtaining a King's Scholarship; when he met with a patron in Dr Bryan Duppa (a), whose kindness in great measure repaired that disadvantage. By his encouragement, entering himself a Servitor in 1623 at Christ-church in Oxford, he was afterwards chosen Canoneer Student (b) of the college. He proceeded regularly to the academical honours, and commencing Master of Arts June 18, 1631 (c), took Holy Orders, and distinguished himself in the pulpit by that quaint manner of preaching which was then the vogue [A], so that he became vicar of Calfington near Woodstock in Oxfordshire, by the presentation of his college, to which the society afterwards added also the living of Pyrton near Watlington, in the same county (e). Both these preferments lying at a small distance from the university (f), Mr Mayne still resided chiefly upon his studentship at Christ-Church, where he was much admired for his wit and humour. In that view, Lucian among the classics was his favourite author [B]; part of whose dialogues he translated from the Greek into English, in 1638 (g). About the same time he wrote a comedy called The City Match; which was well received on the stage, being first acted at Whitehall, and then again at Black-Fryars, and printed at Oxford in 1639 (h), fol. In this play our author made his court to the King and Queen, by a smart ridicule upon Puritanism in general, and the famous William Prynne in particular [C]; who had not long before lost his ears, and lay then condemned

(b) It has been lately reprinted in the Collection of Old Plays, Vol. X. 1753.

[A] He distinguished himself by his quaint manner of preaching.] The introduction of this vitious taste in the pulpit oratory, is commonly imputed to Dr Andrews, the celebrated Bishop of Winchester, whose high reputation on other accounts, gave a sanction to it (1). In order to exhibit a compendious view of the various manners of it, in the reigns of King James and King Charles I. and during the usurpation, a very ingenious imitation thereof was made by Mr Abraham Wright, Fellow of St John's college in Oxford, and afterwards Vicar of Okeham in Rutlandshire, who in 1657, published five sermons in five several styles or ways of preaching; the first in that of Bishop Andrews, the second in that of Bishop Hall of Exeter; the third in that of our author Dr Jasper Mayne, and Mr Thomas Cartwright a brother poet and dramatic writer as well as preacher; the fourth in that of the Presbyterians; and the fifth in that of the Independents.

[B] Lucian was his favourite author.] 'Tis certain, in regard to the province of wit, our student could not have pitched on a more consummate master than this monkey Lucian, who knew how to turn himself into any shape or character that he pleased to assume, so exactly, as to pass unquestionably for the thing itself. Under this artful mask, the sport of his inimitable pen, he was not unfrequently taken for a real professor of Christianity. And our author did not think it unbecoming that character, to enforce some of it's doctrines by his arguments. We shall see presently Mr Mayne engaged in a religious controversy with Mr Cheynell, about the Predestinarian doctrines. The dispute was carried on by letters; in one of which, his antagonist having censured him for introducing Lucian into treatises upon the stupendous mysteries of religion; in answer thereto our author first observes, 'that absolute reprobation is a piece of Stoicism, and never held to be Christian 'till it crept forth into the Church, from the same fancy which was the womb wherein the Presbyterian government was formed;' and then proceeds thus, 'So methinks Lucian, Sir, (how cheaply soever you think of him or me, for having closed my last letter to you with a piece of his Nigrinus) in his confutation of this heathenish error, which hath made so many hang themselves, urgeth arguments, which would become one of the fathers of the Church. I know not, continues 'he, whether you have read his Ziva ἐλεγχόμενον, but if you have, he there tells you, that if there be such a thing as the fatal decree you speak of, first, that all they who lie under the inflexibility of it, being tied by an unalterable necessity to do what they do, can in no reason be rewarded if they do well, nor with any justice be punished if they do ill. Next, that the sins which they commit, if they cannot but commit them, are not to be called their sins, but the sins of that decree which laid the necessity upon them. And therefore, thirdly, that a murderer thus predestined, if he should be arraigned, may say to any judge thus stoically persuaded: Why do you accuse me? pray call my destiny to the bar, and do not sentence me, but my fate to the rack and wheel. I was but an overpowered instrument in this murder, and such an engine to my destiny, as my sword was to me. Tho' this be spoken by a heathen only in disproof of fate, yet since St Chrysostom in more than three sermons had said the same thing in disproof of absolute reprobation, I hope, Sir, neither Calvin nor Piscator have so mistaught you to understand St Paul, as from any epistle of his (2) to conclude peremptorily, that any without their desert are given up to a reprobate mind, and finally struck and necessitated to a remediless impotence (3).'

VOL. V. No. CCLVII.

[C] He made his court in a ridicule upon Puritanism and William Prynne.] Aurelia, the lady whose marriage and intriguing with that view is the subject of this comedy, opens the second act in a dialogue with her puritanical maid, Dorcas, which is carried on with a good share of humour, as follows:

SCENE I.

Aurel. Why, we shall have you get in time the turn Up of your eyes, speak in the nose, draw sighs
Of an ell long, and rail at discipline.

Wou'd I cou'd hear from Banefwright: e'er I'll be tortured

With your preciseness thus, I'll get dry palms
With starching, and put on my smocks myself.

Dorcas. Surely you may, and air them too; there have been

Very devout and holy women, that wore no shift at all.

Aur. Such saints, you mean, as wore Their congregations, and swarm'd with christian vermin.
You'll hold clean linen here.

Dorcas. ————— Surely yes;
Clean linen in a surplice; that and powders,
Do bring dry summers, make the sickness rage,
And th' enemy prevail; it was reveal'd
To Mrs Scruple and her husband, who Do verily ascribe the German war,
And the late persecutions to curling,
False teeth, and oil of talc.

Aur. ————— Now she is in,
A lecturer will sooner hold his peace Than she.

Dor. ————— And surely as Mr Scruple says,

Aur. That was her schoolmaster; one that cools a feast
With his long grace, and sooner eats a capon
Than blesses it.

Dor. ————— And proves it very well,
Out of a book that suffered martyrdom
By fire in Cheapside (4), since amulets and bracelets,
And lovelocks were in use, the price of sprats,
Jerusalem artichokes, and Holland cheese,
Is very much increased; so that the brethren,
Botchers I mean, and such poor zealous saints,
As earn five groats a week under a stall,
By singing psalms, and drawing up of holes,
Can't live in their vocation, but are fain
To turn —————

Aur. Old breeches.

SCENE II.

To them Banefwright (5),

Aur. O! Mr Banefwright, are you come, my woman
Was in her preaching fit; she only wanted
A table's end.

demned to perpetual imprisonment in Orgueil castle in the isle of Jersey. This address drew the royal regards upon him, of which he found the good effects, when the court resided at Oxford. In 1642, being one of the Divines appointed to preach before his Majesty and the Parliament (i), our author proceeded Bachelor of Divinity on the first of November that year, and was created D. D. June the 7th, 1646 (k). The decline of the King's affairs wrought no change in Dr Mayne's loyalty; he persevered in the same zeal as before, against Presbyterian principles, and the Calvinistical theology, and in that spirit, presently after the surrender of Oxford garrison to the Parliament, preached a sermon in the university church on Ezekiel xxii. 28; which being printed at Oxford in 4to under the title of A Sermon against false Prophets, was attacked from the same pulpit by Mr Francis Cheynell, the renowned champion of the Presbyterians (l), whereupon several letters passed between them, which were published by our author in a piece intitled A late printed Sermon against false Prophets vindicated by Letter, from the causeless Aspersions of Mr Francis Cheynell, by Jasper Mayne D. D. the misunderstood Author of it, 1647 4to. In this controversy the doctor maintained his religious principles with a proper smartness and a becoming decency, against the rude and ill bred virulence of his antagonist [D]: and the same year he drew his pen in defence of his political principles. These were such as carried him to an absolute unreserved loyalty to the King [E], in whose cause he became

Poor lady had so much inbred holiness
About her person; I am never drest
Without a sermon, but am forc'd to prove
The lawfulness of curling-irons, before
She'll crisp me in a morning (6), I must shew
Text for the fashions of my gowns; she'll ask Where jewels are commanded, or what lady
I'th' primitive times wore ropes of pearl or rubies:
She'll urge Councils call'd in Northamptonshire
For her little ruff, and her whole service
Is a mere confutation of my cloaths.

————— She can't preserve
(The gift for which I took her) but as tho'
She were inspir'd from Ipswich (7), she will make
The acts and monuments in sweetmeats; quinces
Arraigned and burnt at a stake; all my banquets
Are persecutions, and Dioclesian's days

Aur. ——— Nay, Sir, she is A puritan at her needle too.

Banefw. ——— Indeed!

She'll make church histories: her needle doth
So sanctifie my cushionets! besides,
My smock sleeves have such holy embroideries,
And are so learned, that I fear in time,
All my apparel will be quoted by Some pure instructor. Yesterday I went To see a lady that has a parrot; my woman,
While I was in discourse, converted the fowl,
And now it can speak nought but Knox's works:
So there's a parrot lost.

At this character of the maid, Banefwright expresses his surprize, owns his mistake, and promises to remove Dorcas to a more suitable service; to which Aurelia signifies her satisfaction in these terms: 'From thy zeal, the frantick lady's judgment and Histrionastix, deliver me.' The play, as has been said above, met with applause, yet as some censure might be passed upon his appearing thus out of character as a Divine, he prefixed a preface, wherein he apologizes for himself, declaring, that it was both wrote and brought upon the stage merely in obedience to command; and that he was so averse from raising fame this way, that at the representation he was one of the severest spectators there, nor ever shewed other signs whereby it might be known to be his, but his liberty to despise it; and that he consented to let it pass the press purely to prevent a pyrrical edition, which he understood some were ready to print from an imperfect copy without

[D] He maintained his religious principles with temper against his rude opponent.] Mr Cheynell taking the liberty to reprehend our author, assumes the following magisterial air, 'Sir, Reprobatio est tremendum mysterium (8). How dare you jest upon such a subject, at the thought of which each Christian trembles?— see what it is for a man to come from Ben. Jonson or Lucian, to treat immediately of the high and tremendous mysteries of religion. The Lord God pardon this wicked thought of your heart, that you may not perish in the bond of iniquity and gall of bitterness. Be pleased to study the 9th chapter to the Romans (9). To this Dr Mayne replies, 'I grant, Sir, that reprobation is a mystery to be trembled at; yet, Sir, all they who maintaining it to be absolute, do receive the fiction of the three destinies, where one holds the distaff on which the thread of every man's fate is spun, and do preach a piece of Zeno's philosophy for a piece of St Paul's Epistles, can have no reason to accuse me of a jest, because I applied a spindle to the distaff on which men's fates are rolled. The 9th chapter to the Romans I have long since considered, and studied it by the most serene impartial lights, which might uncloud the great mystery to me, which lies so obscurely there wrapt up. And to deal freely with you, the best commentator I have ever met with to lead me through the darkness of it is, another place of scripture or two set in presence and scale with this, both which joined methought made perfectly the cloud, which guided the Jews through the wilderness, which was a cloud to the Egyptians, but a pillar of fire to the Israelites.' He proceeds accordingly, to interpret what is obscurely delivered in the 9th chapter to the Romans, whence his antagonist inferred, that servi should be saved; by what the same St Paul declares clearly in his first epistle to Timothy, chap. II. verse 4. that it is the will of God that all men should be saved: observing, that he had always held it safer to build his faith upon those clear places of Scripture, which have no veil before their face, than those which are mysterious and lead to a Babel, 'over which, says he, I stand amazed, but cannot from thence infer.' He then closes the whole in the following modest terms: 'I do further profess to you, that I am not so wedded to this or any other speculative opinion, but that if you will shew more convincing scripture for the contrary, I shall most readily renounce my own thoughts, and epouse myself to your's (10).

[E] His political principles carried him to an unreserved loyalty.] This piece was published in 4to, under the following title; OXAOMAXIA, or, The People's War examined according to the Principles of Scripture and Reason, in two of the most plausible Pretences of it. In Answer to a Letter sent by a Person of Quality, who desired Satisfaction By Jasper Mayne, D. D. one of the students of Christ-Church, Oxon. It is dated June 7, 1647. In it he maintains the doctrine of passive obedience and non-resistance, in the most absolute and unlimited extent; not allowing subjects to take up arms against their sovereign in defence either of their liberty or religion. Supposing, says he, became a confessor by an ejection from his student's place at Christ-church in 1648, which was followed not long after by a deprivation from both his vicarages. In the midst of these sufferings he still preserved a warm zeal for the old establishment, which he constantly asserted against the Fanatics; and September 11th, 1652, held a publick dispute with a noted anabaptist preacher, in the church of Watlington, on which occasion he preached a sermon on Heb. x. 24, 25. and printed it the same year at London, in 4to, with the title of A Sermon against Schism, or the Separation of these Times. The dispute however ended as might easily be foreseen, to no good purpose on the side of our author [F], who being now in a manner reduced to his shifts, immediately set about an English translation of Dr Donne's Epigrams, which he published the same year [G]. Soon after which the long Parliament all the while have fought, as was first pretended, for the defence of their assayed liberty, yet fighting against the King, whose subjects they are, it can never before a christian judge make their armies pass for just. But being no way necessitated to make such defence (their liberty having in no one particular been assaulted, which has not been redressed) if St Paul were now on earth again, and were the judge of this controversy between them and their lawful sovereign, I fear he would call their defence by a name, which we in our modern cases of conscience do call rebellion. We have given this reasoning in his own words, that the reader might have a specimen of that particular quaint turn and manner, which distinguished our author from his contemporary writers of the like taste in general. Having thus passed sentence against Liberty, he calls Religion to the bar, and having defined it in the words of Thomas Aquinas, virtus reddens debitum honorem Deo; a payment of that honour, love, fear, worship, and obedience, to God, which is his due, as Creator and Providential Governor of all things; he infers that the payment of this tribute is the proper care of the Deity, and the non-performance of it being a crime only against God, the vengeance belongs to him alone. In all cases whatsoever, Deorum injuria Diis curæ, as Grotius expresses it. And whereas that author, he observes, is of opinion, that if there should be found a country of atheists, or of those who deny a Providence, such a notion would be a just cause for a reforming war; not only because they are contumelious and reproachful to God himself, but because, being directly destructive of all religion, they are by necessary consequence destructive to human society too: in short, that if there should be found a nation of such impious persuasions, it would be no injustice in any other people, who are not atheists, by way of punishment to banish them out of the world (11). On the contrary, our doctor declares, that he is so far from thinking any war made for the propagation of religion, how true forever it be, is warrantable, that 'in this particular, says he, I persuade myself I have some reason to dissent from Grotius, and think it a problem very disputable.' In proceeding, he grants that 'religion (which atheism and the denial of a providence destroy) is one of the firmest bonds of society (12); yet declares he had met with no demonstrative argument to prove the dependence between them so necessary, that the absence of the one must inevitably be the destruction of the other; since it is possible, that a country of atheists may yet have so much morality among them, seconded by laws made by common agreement among themselves, as to be a people to hold the society of citizens among themselves; and as 'tis possible for them without religion, for mere utility and safety's sake, to observe the laws of nations, so far as not to wrong or injure a people different from themselves: so where no civil wrong or injury is offered, where the moral bonds of society and commerce, though not the religious of opinion and worship, are unbroken by them, for the people not injured to make war upon them for a feared imaginary consequence; and because being atheists, it is possible that their example may spread; is an act of hostility, which, continues he, I confess, I am not able to defend.' He goes on to shew, that neither is idolatry a crime of this punishable nature in one people, by another who are not guilty of that crime, since idolaters are not criminal towards others of a more rectified reason; and their idolatry being an error without the light of scripture to rectify it, hardly vincibile in themselves, is to be reformed by argument and persuasion, not violence or force; since a war made upon the errors of mens minds, is as unreasonable as a war made upon the freedom of their wills. And for this reason he maintains, that the propagation of Christianity cannot be a just cause of war upon those who refuse to embrace it. In prosecuting which subject he observes, that as there is no command of Christ to compel men to receive the gospel by temporal punishments; so all such endeavours are very unsuitable to his practice, as appears from Luke ix. 5, 54, 55, 56. Agreeable to which practice of Christ, is that canon of the council of Toledo, Præcipit sancta synodus nemini deinceps ad credendum viri inferre (13). It is ordered by this holy synod, that no man be henceforth compelled to believe the gospel. A canon, which, says he, 'I with the men of the country had worn in their ensigns, when they made war upon the Indians.'

which he had the good fortune to find a friend in the Earl of Devonshire, who took him into his family in the character of chaplain. This situation unavoidably brought him into the acquaintance of another person who had the same patron, and that was the famous Mr Hobbes, but we are told there was never any good agreement between them (m). Be that as it will, 'tis certain the doctor enjoyed a friendly shelter under that nobleman's roof (n), 'till the storm against the royalists broke away at the Restoration, which not only brought him back to his livings, but, as a compensation for his sufferings, he was made Chaplain in Ordinary to his Majesty, promoted to a Canon's stall at Christ-church, and raised to the dignity of Archdeacon of Chichester. Thus replaced to advantage in his favourite seat of the Muses, he preached the customary Latin sermon before the university, on the first day of aet term, May 27th, 1662, which was immediately printed (o). He had before been complimented as archdeacon, with the appointment of preacher at the consecration of Dr Herbert Croft Bishop of Hereford (p), who had been a fellow-sufferer in the same cause: and in 1665, he published a poem upon the naval victory of the Duke of York over the Dutch. He continued during the rest of his life happy in the full enjoyment of his promotions, heightened in the view of their being so many marks of the royal favour, and particularly endeared to him, by fixing his residence at Christ-church, in which he greatly delighted while living, and upon his death, which happened December 6, 1672, his corps was interred in the aisle joining to the north side of the choir of that church, where a monument was erected with an inscription (q) to his memory, at the charge of Dr Robert South, and Dr John Lamphire, the executors of his last will, wherein he bequeathed five hundred pounds towards the rebuilding of St Paul's Cathedral, and a hundred pounds to each of his vicarages, Pyrton and Cassington; with many other legacies [H], among which the following was not a little remarkable (r). He had a servant who had lived with him a long time, to whom he bequeathed a trunk, and in it somewhat which he said would make him drink after his death. The doctor's eyes were no sooner closed, but his servant paid a visit to the trunk, where he found only a simple, solitary red-herring (s). This miserably low and ill timed conundrum, gives us no advantageous idea of the turn of our author's wit and humour; which, though it procured him the character of a facetious and witty companion (t), yet drew on him the reflection of having somewhat of Dean Swift's turn, without any share of his genius and good sense (u). Besides the pieces already mentioned, the doctor published A Sermon concerning Unity and Agreement, preached in Carfax church in Oxford, 9 Aug. 1646, on 1 Cor. i. 10. printed in 1646, 4to. This with his Sermon against Schism &c. That against Falſe Propheſies, and it's Vindication, were all commonly bound together, with The People's War examined, &c. and sold with this general title, Certain Sermons and Letters of Defence and Resolution, &c. was apparently the peculiar turn of wit in the original; which, however, lost it's charms for want of a good versification. Mr Pope did the same friendly office for Donne's Satires, and probably upon the same motive.

[H] Besides many other legacies.] Mr Wood, whose grudge to Dean Fell prompted him to lay hold of every opportunity to throw dirt upon his memory, concludes our author's article with the following reflection, that he left 'nothing to the place of his education, because 'he (as Dr John Wall had done) had taken some dislike for affronts received from the dean of his college, and certain students encouraged by him, in their grinning and sauciness towards him (15).' However that be, it can hardly escape the reader's observation, that the legacy for rebuilding St Paul's Cathedral would have carried a better face, had it been left to the college, a part of which was then rebuilding by the Dean's care, as Mr Wood himself tells us (16): whereas, with regard to St Paul's, it may not perhaps be thought to stand clear of some degree of ostentation, and whatever became of it at last, was probably never applied to that use; since the first stone of the cathedral was laid some months before our author's death (17), and the whole expence of rebuilding it supplied, as is well known, by a duty laid upon coals spent in London or near it.

MAYNWARING [ARTHUR], a polite writer in politics and poetry, flourished in the beginning of the XVIIIth century. He was descended of a family, in ancient times one of the most honourable in England, known in the rolls of the Conqueror, by the name of Meinil Warren, which was afterwards corrupted into Maynwarding (a), and settled at Over Peover near Northwich in Cheshire [A]. Whence, in process of time, our author's

[A] Descended of an honourable family, settled at Over Peover in Cheshire.] About the year 1170, one of this family, Ralph Maynwarding, married Amicia, daughter of Hugh Kevellock or Cyvelok, the 5th Earl of Chester, a descendant from Hugh Lupus, son of the Count d'Avranches in Normandy, to whom William the Conqueror made a grant of the whole county of Cheshire (1). During our author's infancy there was a dispute about the legitimacy of this Amicia, occasioned by a piece which came out in 1673, fol. entitled, Historical Antiquities in two books. The 1st treating of Great-Britain and Ireland in general; the 2d containing particular remarks of Cheshire, and chiefly of Bucklow Hundred: in which the author, Sir Peter Leycester of Nether Tably in that county, Bart. had represented the just mentioned lady as a bastard, notwithstanding he claimed a descent from her. In answer to this was published, A Defence of Amicia, daughter of Hugh Cyvelok Earl of Chester; wherein is proved that she was not a bastard. By Sir Thomas Maynwarding of Over Peover, Bart. London, 1673, 8vo. Whereupon Sir Peter replied in An Answer to Sir Thomas Maynwarding's book, entitled A Defence of Amicia, &c. London 1673, 8vo. To which Sir Thomas rejoined in a reply to an answer to the defence of Amicia, &c. 1673, 8vo. and Sir Peter having printed Addenda, or some things to be added to the former answer to Sir Thomas Maynwarding the same year, Sir Thomas came out with An Answer to Sir Peter Leycester's Addenda; London, 1673-4. To which his antagonist published A Reply to Sir Thomas Maynwarding's Answer to Sir Peter Leycester's Addenda, Lond. 1674, 8vo. and Sir Thomas Maynwarding's law cases mistaken, and the antient law misunderstood, and the new misapplied, &c. London, 1674 8vo. There was a merry ballad handed about in manuscript, concerning these petty controversies between the two Barons; who, however, did not end the matter without a suit author's branch removed to Ightfield in Shropshire, where his grandfather Sir Arthur Maynwarding was possessed of a good estate, and was a courtier in the reign of King James I. and a favourite of Prince Henry [B]. His eldest son and heir Charles Maynwarding Esq; marrying a daughter of Charles Cholmondeley Esq; of Vale Royal in Cheshire (b), had by her this son, the subject of the present article; who was born at Ightfield, in the year 1668, and received the first part of his education at the grammar school in Shrewsbury: whence he was sent, about the age of seventeen, in the beginning of the reign of King James the Second, to Christ-church in Oxford, and committed to the care of Mr George Smalridge, afterwards the worthy Bishop of Bristol [C]. Under a tutor so remarkably distinguished for polite literature, Mr Maynwarding spent several years to great advantage, and then retiring to his uncle Mr Francis Cholmondeley in Cheshire, he continued to prosecute his studies with the same assiduity and success, but became confirmed in his prejudices against the Revolution, to which his uncle, though a very honest gentleman, had refused to comply (c). With these principles our author came to London, where his father then resided, in Essex-street near the Temple (d), and applied himself to the study of the Law: but not being able to view what passed so disagreeable to him upon the stage of the publick without a passionate emotion, he vented his zeal in some satirical pieces against the Revolutionists. One of these entitled The King of Hearts, was wrote with such an excellent spirit of poetry, that being published without his name, it was ascribed to Mr Dryden, who being charged with it by his bookseller Jacob Tonson, ingenuously disclaimed it, and named the true author, whom he called at the same time an ingenious young gentleman (e). From this time Mr Maynwarding, who was now about the age of twenty two years (f), became much taken notice of; and being introduced into the acquaintance of the Duke of Somerset, and the Earls of Dorset and Burlington, he began to see state affairs in a different light (g). The polite and friendly reception he met with from these Noblemen, no doubt had a considerable share in producing this change. He could not be insensible of the honour done therein to his abilities. At the same time he must needs know the bad state of his father's finances, the recovery of which would be much easier and more speedily effected in the political way, than could be expected from the tedious drudgery of the law. Persons of his superior talents were greatly wanted to support the new establishment then in it's infancy: he could not be ignorant of his own worth in that view, and he was not without an honest ambition. Prudence, however taught him, not immediately to quit the study and profession of the law, which, though slow, yet, if duly attended, would at length bring a sure provision: and therefore he continued to turn over those books as long as his father lived, but upon his decease, which happened about the year 1694, he took a final leave of the Bar (h), and resolved to push his fortune at Court. He was now possessed of an estate of eight hundred pounds per ann. which, though deeply laden with a heavy debt (i), yet the revenue was not entirely exhausted; some part of it came into his hands, and his credit was good: so that upon the conclusion of the peace of Ryfwick, France becoming accessible to the English, he made the tour of Paris, perhaps with a view of wearing off the rust of the law, and to compleat himself in polite accomplishments. The celebrated Boileau held the foremost seat on the French Parnassus at that time; he had been bred originally to the law, as well as our author, whose last mentioned poems, the effects of his attachment to King James the Second, could not but have reached that court. These were sufficient recom-

[B] His grandfather was a courtier, &c. Arthur Wilson tells an odd story of this gentleman, that Mrs Turner, the famous inventor of yellow starch, was a mistress of his, and being in the infamous intrigue with the Countess of Essex, to poison Sir Thomas Overbury (3), she made an experiment of the force of Foreman's love powders upon her gallant Sir Arthur, which wrought so violently with him, that through a storm of rain and thunder, he rode fifteen miles one dark night to her house, scarce knowing where he was, 'till he was there (4).

[C] Under the care of Mr Smalridge, &c. It is a little remarkable, that our author opened the execution of his plan in the Medley (5), with aspersing this worthy tutor as a Jacobite. He seems indeed to be aware of the censure that such a piece of ingratitude (to say no worse of it) would naturally bring upon him, and therefore, to conceal the true author, it is introduced in the form of a letter, to the author of the Medley, and begins thus, 'Sir, I have seen a paper that was lately published, which is signed by George Smalridge, D. D. and Thomas Croffe, called A Detection of a Falshood endeavoured to be imposed upon the publick, in a paper, intituled, A Test offered to the Consideration of the Electors of Great-Britain. I have also seen an account of the same matter printed in the Gazette of the 30th of September, and signed by Mr Jodrell.

'But having been myself in the House *, when that matter was transacted, I beg leave to acquaint you with some particulars, by which it will plainly appear to you, that the first account is equivocating, and that the second is imperfect.' The subject was the division in the House of Commons upon three amendments made by the Lords to a Bill entitled, An act for enlarging the time for taking the oath of abjuration. The author of the Test having asserted, that the House divided against the amendments: this was shewn in the detection, to be literally false, there being no division but only against the first amendment, which being carried in the affirmative, no further opposition was made, as being indeed to no purpose. That this was the reason cannot be doubted, but yet it was certainly carrying the reflection too far, to maintain, as our author does, that the detection, though a logical truth, was however a moral lie. In the same spirit he concludes with a strong intimation, that the whole proceeded from a design to set aside the Hanover succession and introduce the Pretender; which if not too severe a censure in general, yet with respect to his tutor Dr Smalridge, was no better than a calumny, and a calumny that wears a more odious face in the pupil than can be made to appear tolerable by any softening, on account of party zeal, or his design to conceal himself. However, we are very far from making this last part of his conduct an aggravation of his fault, or applying to him the observation, that it is usual for assassins to do their business masked.

mendations to the court poet, who, accordingly took particular notice of him, invited him to his country-house, gave him a very handsome entertainment; and turning the discourse upon the subject of the English poetry, expressed great surprize at the account which Mr Maynwarding gave him of it [D]. Some time after our author's return home, he was appointed one of the commissioners of the customs. This post, wherein he succeeded Sir Walter Young, was obtained for him by the interest of the Duke of Somerset and Lord Halifax (k), (then Charles Montague Esq;) and he did honour to the recommendation, both by his skill and fidelity in the discharge of the office, for which he had the satisfaction of seeing himself particularly distinguished in some lines, a copy whereof is inserted below [E]: and the following account of such a proof of his contempt of corruption, as will for ever do honour to his memory. A person who was soliciting for a tide-waiter's place, was advised by his friends, in order to succeed with more dispatch, to place a handsome sum of money properly; the man knowing Mr Maynwarding was an active leading member in that commission, very unluckily resolved to try the experiment on him, to which purpose, together with a letter intreating his favour, left a purse of fifty guineas for him, and then delivered his petition to the board. Where being read, several of the commissioners were for granting it; but Mr Maynwarding pulling out the letter and the purse, put a negative on the fellow's request, by declaring, that as long as he could help it, that man should neither have the place be petitioned for, nor any other (l). The same qualities procured his admittance into the famous Kit-Kat Club (m), of which he was a principal ornament, by the pleantry of his wit. But the generosity of Sidney Lord Godolphin, another member of the same society, was most remarkable. That great Statesman being constituted Lord Treasurer in the beginning of Queen Anne's reign, gave the Auditor of the Imprests several thousand pounds to quit that office, in order to bestow it upon our author, who was most agreeably surprized with a present which he knew nothing of, 'till he received the patent from his Lordship's hands (n). This post was reckoned worth two thousand pounds a year in a time of business; and Mr Maynwarding gave the best testimony he could do of his gratitude, by an unshaken attachment ever after to his patron, whose interest obtained him a seat in the House of Commons in 1705, for Preston in Lancashire, which borough he represented also in several ensuing Parliaments, 'till the change of the Ministry in 1710, when the Treasurer losing his staff, Mr Maynwarding set up a weekly paper called the Medley, in defence of his friends, against the attacks of the Examiner. He executed this design with admirable spirit and humour (o), treading close upon the heels of his antagonist to his last departing speech, in the beginning of August 1711. He wrote also several other pieces in support of the same cause [F], which will remain a lasting honour to it. But in the midst of this hurry of employing his

[D] Boileau expressed great surprize at Mr Maynwarding's account of the English poetry.] In this conversation Boileau acknowledged he had heard a great deal of the merit of our tragedies, but had no notion of our performances in the other kinds of poetry, imputing that excellence of ours to our sanguinary temper, as Rapin had done before, calling us Insulaires by way of contempt, a term which Boileau's good breeding, however did not suffer him to use. But notwithstanding Mr Maynwarding's account of our plays and poems, yet three or four years afterwards, he pretended never to have heard of Dryden. And to a friend of Mr Maynwarding's who visited him soon after that great poet's death, said he was wonderfully pleased to see by the publick papers, that the English nation had paid such extraordinary honours to a poet, as burying him at the publick charge, and then asked the gentleman who that poet was, with as much indifference as if he had never heard of Dryden's name; which is very unlikely he should not be as well acquainted with, as the English were with his own, since he was a frequent visitor at Lord Montague's house, when that nobleman was Embassador in France; and besides, was an intimate friend of Monf. de la Fontaine (6), who lived some time in England, and has spoken very honourably of the English genius in his Fables. This is inserted as a remarkable piece of affectation, very unworthy of Boileau; perhaps, considering Mr Oldmixon's temper, it may not be amiss to throw in some grains of allowance for aggravation, and then it may pass for a piece of vanity, that necessary foible in a poet.

From snarling tool Clarke at the other's devotion;
From republican Ben, the old clergy-teazer, Whose true Christian-name, you must know's Ebenezer;

From the flattering false Henley, who sneaks to church-party,
And for but half salary vows to be hearty;
From fearful proud Newport, who spits out his curses,
From the bully Culliford and the rogues that he nurses;
From so motly a crew, so imperious a board,
Deliver this labouring country, good Lord!
And thy staff shall like Hercules's club be ador'd.
And that no grain of merit fall by this petition,
Leave Maynwarding only to grace the commission (7).

[F] He published several other pieces.] These being mostly printed without his name, we shall give a list of them as follows: I. Remarks on a late Romance, intitled, The Memorial of the Church of England, or the History of the Ten Champions. II. A Translation of the second Ode of the first book of Horace. III. A Translation of the fifth book of Ovid's Metamorphosis and part of Tully's Offices. IV. A Character of the new Ministers, 1710. V. Several Songs, Poems, Prologues, and Epilogues: as Ovum Lupo commissi, A Fable. The Hind and Vine, Cupid's Court, The South-Sea Whim; and several other poems against the Tory Ministry in 1710. VI. Two Letters to a Friend in North Britain, on the publication of Dr Sacheverell's trial. VII. The History of Hannibal and Hanno, in the second war between Carthage and Rome; faithfully collected from the best authors. Hannibal is said to mean the Duke of Marlborough, and Hanno the Lord Treasurer Godolphin; Valerius Flaccus means Count Tallard, and Afrubal, Dr Robinson Bishop of Bristol. VIII. The Speech of Alcibiades to the Athenians, printed in the Whig Examiner, No. 3. IX. The French King's Promise to the Pretender, &c. X. A short Account and Defence of the Barrier-Treaty. XI. Remarks upon the present Negotiations of Peace begun between Great Britain and France. XII. The his pen through a warm zeal for his party, his health became greatly impaired. During the course of the Medley, he had been obliged to take in some assistance on that account [G], and his disorder increasing, made it necessary for him to retire to Hampstead, whence he removed to Paddington, and at length to St Albans (p), where he wrote the last number dated August 6th, 1711; which he did not survive much above a year, being taken off the stage of life on the 13th of November 1712. His corps was carried from St Albans to Chertsey in Surrey, and interred near the remains of his father and grandfather, in the church of that parish, where the family had formerly possessed a large estate with a handsome seat upon it (q). About eight or nine years before his death, he commenced a love-intrigue with Mrs Oldfield the celebrated actress; and his passion became so strong for her, that it could hardly have been stronger, had it been their first love on each side. It was doubtless owing to his instructions, next to her own excellent talents, that she shined so much upon the stage [H]. His friends of both sexes frequently took him to task for this amour, which was very expensive to him; and this was far from being the only instance of his errors in œconomy. But at last they gave over importuning him to leave her, as they saw she gained more and more upon him, inasmuch that he made her sole executrix of his will, wherein he divided his fortune pretty equally between her, a son that he had by her, and his sister (r). He was extremely reflected on for this will, particularly by the Examiner of February 9th, in answer to which, there came out two months after his death a defence of him, and this defence was followed in a few days by another, supposed to be written by the late Lord Orford, then Robert Walpole Esq; in a letter to a friend, drawing a veil over the slips in his conduct, he had many qualities to recommend him. His works set the character of his genius above the reach of the criticism of others, and he was himself allowed universally to be the best critic of the times (s). 'Tis observed particularly (t), that he abhorred cursing and swearing, and those who talked prophanely or irreligiously, or abused the clergy; looking upon such behaviour as a very poor pretence to wit, and never excusing it in himself or others. His son by Mrs Oldfield, was named Arthur after his father; he lived to obtain a captain's commission in the army, and married a lady of considerable fortune, by whom he left a daughter at his death which was much regretted on account of his universal good character.

Bowdly Case. XIII. The Letter from Doway, was wrote by him, or at least by some friend directed and assisted by him. XIV. He had also a considerable hand in the Letter to an High-Church Man. XV. He revised and published a treatise called, Bouchain, being a Dialogue between the Medley and the Examiner, about the Management of the War in 1711. XVI. A Letter to the Freeholders, wrote a little before the election of the new Parliament in 1710. XVII. He had a great hand in the British Academy, a pamphlet, wherein he rallies a letter from Dr Swift to the Lord Treasurer Oxford, about altering the English language. XVIII. A manuscript was given him to peruse, containing a diary of the Duke of Marlborough's famous march to Blenheim, written by one of his Grace's chaplains, with great exactness, as to the incidents, but being defective in form, he was desired to alter and improve it. This he found too difficult a task, but was so pleased with the subject, that he resolved to give it entirely a new form, by reducing it into an history. These papers fell into the hands of Sir Richard Steel (8), who dedicated the first volume of the Tatler to him.

[G] He had been obliged to take in some assistance in the Medley.] The particulars of this assistance, besides that in the second already mentioned are (9); the epigram in the third; all the fourth; the account of Faults on both Sides, written by Clements, Secretary to the Earl of Peterborough; the latter part of the eighth; all except the translation from La Fontaine in the ninth; all except the fable out of Cœlius Rhodiginus, and the remarks on the Elector of Bavaria's intercepted letter, with a reply to the Examiner's insinuation, that the Lord Treasurer Godolphin had been bribed by the Scots in the affair of the act of security and union.

What relates to Convocations in the 15th and 16th, was wrote by White Kennet, then Dean, afterwards Bishop of Peterborough; the latter part of the 17th and the whole 18th and 19th, were only corrected by our author (10). Part of the 21st and all the 22d not his, and the 23d, containing the pleasant story of the ball at Wapping, was Sir Richard Steel's, but the comparison between Abel Roper and the Examiner, is Mr Maynwarings; nothing but what relates to the Marquis of Guiscard, his in the 24th; nor any part of the 26th, 27th, 28th, and 29th; and only what relates to the city's recovery from the phrenzy he had been in, and the proper punishment for the incendiary. The letter concerning the year 1688 in the 32d, is his friend Anthony Henley's: in the 39th he wrote only what relates to the vindication of the old ministry and the Duke of Marlborough; he only revised the 41st and 42d. It was now, the season being hot, that he took lodgings first at Hampstead, and then at Paddington; nothing but what relates to Grey and Abel's Dublin News is his, in the 44th. About this time the Medley was presented by the grand jury of Oxfordshire, so that the Examiner, by this and other instances, finding his own party absolutely triumphant, and needing no longer any such support, dropt that paper, whereby the plan of the Medley became finished (11), as abovementioned.

[H] She shined so much upon the stage.] He wrote several prologues and epilogues for her, and would always hear her speak them in private, before she spoke them in public; as, particularly, the epilogue to Perolla and Izadora, that to the Wife's Relief, or the Husband's Cure; and one never spoke on the stage designed for The Amorous Widow, or the Wanton Wife (12).

MEAD [RICHARD], Archiater to King George the Second, and the most eminent Physician of his time, was descended from a considerable family in Buckinghamshire (a), and the son of Mr Matthew Mead, a celebrated Divine among the Nonconformists, and during Cromwell's usurpation, Minister of Stepney near London; but being ejected by the Bartholomew act in 1662, he removed to a house in the same parish, and having a numerous family and a handsome fortune, he took a private tutor (b) into his house for the education of his children, which were no less than thirteen in number; of whom Richard, the subject of our present article, was the eleventh, being born in the parish of Stepney August 11, 1673 (c). of some privacy thereto, thought proper, though innocent, considering the violence of the times, to consult his safety by flight; and, in 1683, withdrawing into Holland [A], placed this son (who had already made a good proficiency in the Latin tongue) in a school under the care of an excellent master, who was of the same principles with himself (d). Here the youth soon became distinguished by the vivacity of his parts, his ready talent in making verses, and an uncommon strength of memory; and having attained a sufficient skill in the Greek and Latin languages, he was sent to Utrecht in the latter end of the year 1689, to compleat this preparatory part of his education under the illustrious Grævius, to whom his eldest brother (e), who had likewise been a pupil of that Professor, recommended him as a modest young man, that had already made a progress in classical learning (f). After three years residence at Utrecht, determining to make Physic his profession, he removed to Leyden, where he attended Herman's botanical courses [B], and the lectures on the theory and practice of medicine by the famous Pitcairne. Our author was highly pleased with this master, received his instructions with implicit deference, and formed his own practice upon the rules and principles imbibed from him [C]. He spent three years also upon this part of his academical studies; and, fond as he was of Pitcairne, probably would have been retained longer by the advantage of the Professor's improving conversation, had not he been drawn away by a stronger passion. His eldest brother having concerted a design of visiting Italy, in company with David Polhill, Esq; and Dr Thomas Pellet, afterwards President of the College of Physicians, invited our student to make a fourth in that tour (g). Such an happy opportunity of crowning his education was not to be neglected; it was, indeed, the summit of his wishes: he had an exact and refined taste for every thing that was great and beautiful, and in Italy he met with every thing that could gratify it. At Florence he had the curiosity to enquire for the Tabula Ifaca; but not being able to get any information about it, he desired leave to search for it in the lumber room over the gallery. There he found this valuable piece of antiquity buried in dust and rubbish, where it had been carelessly thrown, and during many years given over for lost (h). At Padua he took his degree of Doctor of Philosophy and Physic, August 16, 1695; and spending some time afterwards at Naples and Rome, he returned home about Midsummer 1696, when settling in the place, and in the very house, where he was born, he practised his profession for some years with a success and superiority of skill, that established his reputation, and laid the ground-work of his future greatness. In July 1699 he married Ruth, daughter of Mr John Marsh, Merchant of London (i). In 1702 he published his Mechanical Account of Poisons. He had begun this treatise many years before (k), and it was not completed without a great degree of courage

[B] He attended Herman's botanical courses.] The example of a person of Dr Mead's eminence is always instructive in general, and is particularly encouraging in his case, who without the advantage of any extraordinary talents raised himself to the head of his faculty. But to make this useful in its full extent, it will be necessary to take a distinct view of every single step that gradually effectuated that success. The ground work and foundation of all was an exact diligence, nor indeed could it be otherwise: this was so conspicuous in him, that his brother, as we have seen, recommended him to Grævius for that particular quality (2). The address was admirable, an ardent laboriousness being the distinguishing character of that professor, who, on that account, would no doubt be most pleased with something of the same turn in his pupil, and consequently be more studious in improving him. Accordingly, under this master, he imbibed a taste for strict propriety in the Latin language, which without any peculiar elegance of style recommended itself to the publick, and he made use of all the opportunities of shewing his abilities this way. It was likewise to the instructions and influence of Grævius, that he acquired that ardent thirst for Greek and Roman antiquities, which by good conduct became, in due time, the most shining part of his character, and engaged all the polite part of the learned world to his interest. He carried the same vigilant disposition to Leyden; where, in attending Herman's lectures on Botany, he took care to treasure up every article that was most striking, which by a quick-sighted economy, he afterwards turned to the best account possible for his reputation. For instance, in his Treatise on Poisons, the book he set out in the world with, having observed that poisons of the same kind may differ in their force and degree of action, so as to be hurtful in various, and seemingly different ways, he infers from thence, that the surprizing stories related by authors, of the different deaths inflicted by serpents of different kinds particularly, are not at all incredible. In confirmation of this inference, he proceeds thus: 'I very well remember that the learned Paul Herman, many years ago professor of botany in the university of Leyden, who had lived a great while in India, affirmed, that there were also in several parts of that country, venomous creatures of the same kind with those described by the African historians, which killed by very different effects of their poison; and that upon due inquiry into facts, he was convinced that the beautiful descriptions in Lucan of the various species of vipers, which Cato met with in the hot Lybian deserts, were not poetical fictions, but actually taken from nature. He had in his museum preserved in spirit of wine, several of these very serpents; particularly, the Aspis called Nintipolonga Zeylanica, whose bite induced a deadly sleep; the Dipsas, or Situla Macassarica, which killed with an unquenchable thirst; and the Hæmorrhous Macassaricus, the poison of which was immediately followed by hæmorrhages from all the pores of the body (3).'

[C] He formed his method of practice upon Pitcairne's principles.] This professor was seldom very communicative out of college; however our young student found the art of recommending himself to his good graces and confidence, so that he drew from him several observations which he afterwards turned to his own use in his writings, but never without acknowledging his kind benefactor. Pitcairne first introduced into Britain the method of forming theories upon mechanical and geometrical reasonings, and a practice suitable thereto; and we need not say how much Dr Mead ambitioned to tread after him to the utmost of his abilities in those steps. His works every where shew it, and he has made it his business expressly to declare and vindicate it in the preface to his two first pieces, the subjects of which were apparently selected with that view, and how popular that method then was, is taken notice of above.

courage in trying experiments upon those noxious substances, then the more hazardous, as their properties were less known; however, Dr Mead ventured to handle vipers, to provoke them, and make them lay hold with their teeth on hard bodies, and by that means obtained their venom in all it's strength. When he had collected this poison, he examined it through a microscope, and discovered in it those hard and crystalline points, whence, probably, it derives all it's force. He then conveyed some of the venom into the veins of several living creatures, whose death decided the famous controversy between Redi and Charras, to the advantage of the former (1); he also mixed some of it with human blood, which suffered no visible alteration either in colour or consistence: and encouraged by some words of the poet Lucan, and more by the authority of Celsus [D], he ventured even to taste it, in order to establish the usefulness of the method of the Pŷylli, who were wont to suck the wounds made by the bite of serpents. At the same time he shewed no less regard for the welfare of society, by stifling the discoveries which he made of several chemical productions, which might have tended to the improvement of that art, but to the destruction of mankind [E]. These essays, however justly esteemed by the learned on their first appearance, yet did our author still more honour in the edition he published of them about forty years afterwards [F]. Here he hath set a noble example to scholars, in retracting some of his former opinions, in owning himself mistaken concerning some facts, and too hasty in some of his conclusions. In his younger days he imagined he was able to account mechanically for the effects of several poisons, by their mixture with the blood; but when he was improved by age and experience, he became fully convinced, that there was something inexplicable in their operation. Such is the progress of science; at every step we ascend the horizon widens, but grows less distinct: we begin, by thinking every thing easy to be explained; we end, by finding that in reality nothing is so. This observation was never better illustrated, than by the system which our

(1) Redi maintained, that this venom lay in the liquor of the gums; Charras placed it altogether in the enraged spirits of the animal. Account of Poisons, p. 19, 20, 21. edit. 1745.

[D] Encouraged by Lucan and Celsus.] Lucan's words are,

*Noxia serpentum est admisso sanguine pestis,
Morsu virus habent, & satum dente minantur;
Pocula morte carent* (4).—

Mixt with the blood the serpent's poison kills:
The bite conveys it; death lurks in the teeth:
Swallowed it works no harm——

Thus the Poet, who the doctor observes, 'introduces brave Cato, when marching the remains of Pompey's army thro' Africa, very wisely making the remark to the soldiers almost choaked with thirst, yet afraid to drink of a spring they came to, because full of serpents.' But the brave Cato's wisdom in this speech, was apparently not enough discerned by our doctor to risk his life upon it, 'till he found it ascertained by the comment of Celsus, whom he styles the Latin Hippocrates, and who, says he, 'has wisely observed, that these people [the Pŷylli] had no particular skill in this management, but boldness confirmed by use: for the poison of the serpent, as likewise some hunting poisons, which the Gauls particularly make use of, are not hurtful in the mouth, but in a wound. Therefore, whosoever will, after their example, suck the wound, will be in no danger himself, and will save the life of the wounded person. Neque hercule scientiam precipuam habent hi, qui Pŷylli nominantur, &c.' It is also upon the same authority that the doctor proposes to revive this method of cure. 'It may therefore, continues he, seem strange, that upon so good an authority as that of Celsus (who generally gives us the methods of the Greek physicians and surgeons) so beneficial and easy a practice as this of the Pŷylli, should not have been perpetuated by Physicians †.' The author of the memoirs of the doctor's life, speaking of his boldness of tasting the poison, tells us *, that this high pitch of heroism to which he had wrought himself, is finely represented, by an antique statue in his collection, a print from which is put as a tail-piece at the end of his book. The figure is a child in a bold and graceful attitude, holding out by the neck an enraged serpent with this motto, Labor est angues superare. If this be so, that the doctor's design by that figure was to set forth his own heroism ||, we may venture to say that self-praise was never touched with greater skill in the artist, whence it furnishes another egregious proof of the doctor's vigilance in turning all his literary acquisitions to the best account for his reputation poisonous minerals he assures us, that he had once in his possession, given him by an ingenious chemist, a clear liquor, which though ponderous, was so volatile that it would all fly away in the open air, without being heated; and so corrosive, that a glass stopple of the bottle which contained it, was in a short time so eroded, that it could never be taken out. The fume from it was so thin, that if a candle was set at some distance from the bottle upon a table, the heat would direct it's course that way, so that it might be poisonous to any one that sat near to the light, and to no body besides. 'I know, continues he, the composition of this Stygian Spirit. But it is better that the world should not be instructed in such arts of death. It is sufficient to our purpose to observe, that it was salts combined with metallic bodies (5).'

[E] He stifled some chemical productions.] The treatise consists of six essays; in the fourth, speaking of

[F] He published another edition forty years afterwards.] In this edition among other things, he took an opportunity of inserting a remedy for the bite of a mad dog ||. The method is this: Let the patient be bled in the arm nine or ten ounces: Take of the herb called in Latin Lichen cinereus terrestris, (in English, Ash coloured ground Liverwort) cleaned, dried, and powdered, half an ounce; of black pepper powdered, two drachms: mix these well together, and divide the powder into four doses, one of which must be taken every morning fasting, for four mornings successively, in half a pint of cow's milk warm. After these four doses are taken, the patient must go into the cold bath or a cold spring or river every morning fasting for a month: he must be dipped all over, but not stay in with his head above water longer than half a minute, if the water be very cold. After this he must go in three times a week for a fortnight longer. This powder was first published in the Philosophical Transactions (6), from Mr Dampier the traveller, in whose family it had been kept as a secret many years: and in the year 1721, it was, at the doctor's desire, put into the Pharmacopœia Londinensis, by the name of Pulvis antilyssus; to which he afterwards made this alteration of putting two parts of Lichen to one of the pepper instead of equal parts, because he thought it too hot: and whereas but two or three doses were formerly given, he repeated it four days. The alteration here mentioned had been published by the doctor in 1735; and the remedy called an infallible specific, in a paper intitled A certain Cure for the Bite of a Mad Dog. But as it had been treated with some disregard by the famous Boërhaave, our author still persisting in his own opinion of it, thought proper to confirm it here, by a further explication of the nature and manner of it's operation, and by adding several instances of the success of submersion in cold water, from Van Helmont to this purpose (7).

our doctor attempted to establish in his second work. The influence of the sun and moon upon human bodies, which had been admitted by all antiquity, and established on incontrovertible phenomena, appeared to him to be deducible from the principles of planetary attraction, then lately discovered by Sir Isaac Newton. This piece came out in 1704, when it was thought a very considerable thing to understand the system of that Philosopher; and they who did so were willing the world should know it. It was the taste and universal fashion of the Physicians at that time to introduce attraction into their art, as the modern ones have adopted electricity for the same purposes [G]. Some degree of popular ambition is necessary to procure an extensive practice. Dr Mead was not without a proper mixture of this quality in his temper. He was particularly attentive to it; and, as no Physician in his time pushed it with more skill and address, so none succeeded better, if so well, in it. He now began to find his growing labours rewarded with successive honours. The Analysis which he presented to the Royal Society of Dr Bonomo's discoveries, with relation to the cutaneous worms that generate the itch (m), together with his Account of Poisons, obtained him a place in a body where Sir Isaac Newton presided. Two years after,

(m) It was printed in Phil. Transf. No 283. for the first months in 1703. and in the Abridgment, Vol. VI. p. 197. The original letter of Bonomo was addressed to Redi, and was published in Italian in 1687. Dr Mead met with it in his travels through Italy. Authentic Memoirs, &c. p. 16. note (i).

[G] The modern ones have adopted electricity, &c. It was very unlucky for the doctor, that the geometrical way of handling physical subjects happened to be the vogue at his first setting out in the world, a method which he was not at all qualified to support, much less to make a figure in. His talents lay neither to mathematics nor mathematical philosophy. Of this he was very sensible, and had also good sense enough to acknowledge it as far as was decent. 'For my part, says he, I never expect to acquire reputation by algebraical calculation, thoroughly sensible of the mediocrity of my genius in that branch of learning (8).' But the resolution was taken, and what was wanting in the direct way, we find supplied by a warm zeal and indirect arguments. To this purpose he declares, 'that it was very evident that all other methods of improving medicine had been ineffectual, by the stand it was at for above two thousand years (9); and that since of late mathematicians had set themselves to the study of it, men already began to talk intelligibly and comprehensibly even about abstruse matters, that it may be hoped in a short time, if those who are designed for this profession, are early, while their minds and bodies are patient of labour and toil, initiated in the knowledge of numbers and geometry, that mathematical learning will be the distinguishing mark of a physician from a quack, and that he who wants this necessary qualification, will be as ridiculous as one without Greek or Latin (10).' Thus our doctor dealt his blows, intrepid against the foes of mechanical theories and geometrical reasoning in physic, himself entrenched therein, and secure, as he then thought, from all danger of suffering reprisals. The principle of attraction established by Sir Isaac Newton in his Principia, was deemed sufficient to solve all the phenomena of poisons upon animal bodies, without the intervention of the nervous fluid. Yet no sooner did Sir Isaac's Optics appear, but Dr Mead relinquished his intrenchment, and as he had done before, so now he ran with the same implicit conviction into the new succeeding fashion, in ascribing boldly all the phenomena of poisons, muscular motion, sensation, &c to the action of the nervous fluid; the undoubted existence whereof is asserted, and maintained to be a quantity of that universal, elastic, subtle, and invisible æther, the existence of which had been proposed, as highly probable only, by that Prince of Philosophers. Nay, as if grown wiser by the sense of his former weakness, the doctor grew more confident, and will needs have the ἄεθρ of Hippocrates to be nothing else but the different constitution of the air, acting upon, and disturbing this invisible spirit (11). The truth is, the doctor lived long enough to see the mathematical way of theorizing in physic begin to grow out of fashion (12), and he was willing to prevent it. But this was not his talent, and no wonder that he failed in it; nay, it is remarkable, that his best pieces are those which stand wholly upon his own long experience and observation, without regard to theory. However, in justice to him, we must not omit one remarkable instance of the use he made of his theory concerning the influence of the sun and moon. A lady of quality of his acquaintance happened to be struck blind with a gutta serena, during the great storm which happened on the 27th of November 1703. The doctor accounts for the misfortune upon his principles, by saying, that the moon's action vastly increased by the concurrence of the storm, was capable of obstructing the passage of the animal spirits to the optic nerves in a tender constitution, as effectually as if these nerves had been cut through, and consequently of giving rise to the gutta serena, and then proceeds thus, 'Concerning the use of this theory, I can safely say, that it has pointed out to me, the true method of treating this distemper, which before my time was generally esteemed incurable: and as the true knowledge of the causes of diseases is a sure foundation for practice, so I have succeeded in a number of trials in cases of this kind. Wherefore, when the capillary arteries are the seat of the disease (13), the proper medicines are those which most effectually attenuate the viscid humours, and remove the obstruction, and such are the chemical preparations of mercury. And those to be continued a good while, and frequently, even to raising a salivation, which is to be kept up twenty or thirty days (14).' This is really improving his art, nor is it the only instance of his merit in that respect, witness his pulvis antilyssus for the bite of a mad dog, and his new method of administering purgatives in the second fever of the confluent small-pox; this was a noble way of rising above the crowd of the Faculty, and the admiration of all others was raised by occasional histories of the most striking physical cases. Thus the rule of mixing the utile with the dulci was carefully observed. For instance, the case of the lady here recited in the November storm in 1703, is immediately followed by another, which cannot fail of entertaining readers of all sorts. It is an account of the death of Oliver Cromwell, which, as is well known, and he observes, happened during another most violent storm, September 3d, 1658. 'As we have no journals of the weather for that year that ever came to my knowledge, says the doctor, I can say nothing of the preceding state of the air. But this is remarkable, that the storm happened near the autumnal equinox, and about the full moon, which concurrence of causes is very well adapted to stir up great commotions in the atmosphere. However that be, continues he, it is to be observed, that the distemper of that great man was of that kind, which we have shewn to be particularly under the moon's influence. For it is upon record, that he died of a fever accompanied with grief, from the unhappy state of his domestic affairs; and it is very certain, that grief disposes the animal spirits to be easily affected by causes of this nature (15).' But the remark which introduced this case is still more illustriously verified by a history in the treatise of poisons, which well deserves repeating. 'Most remarkable and dismal to relate, says our author, was a case which happened some years since in Scotland: the account of it I had from an ingenious and learned gentleman, very near of kin to the unhappy patient. A young man was bit by a mad dog, and married the same morning. He spent, as usual, that whole day 'till late in the night, in mirth, dancing, and drinking: in the morning he was found in bed raving mad; his bride (horrible spectacle!) dead by him; her belly torn open with his teeth, and her entrails twisted round his bloody hands. The heat of the blood and spirits, continues the doctor, from excess of exercise and wine, but more perhaps, from the transports of passion in the first fury of conjugal embraces, had no doubt in this calamity given such advantage to the venom, that its power was raised to a greater degree in twenty-four hours, than in common accidents it acquires in as many days *.

after, viz. in 1706, he was chosen one of the Council, into which he was again elected in 1707, where he continued all his Life; and in December 17, 1717, was appointed by Sir Isaac one of the Vice-Presidents. May 5, 1703, he was chosen Physician to St Thomas's Hospital; upon which, Stepney lying at too great a distance, he took a house in Crutched Friars, where he resided seven years, and then, on the expiration of his lease, about the year 1711, he removed to one in Austin Friars, in which he succeeded Dr Howe, then deceased. And about the same time he was appointed, by the company of Surgeons, to read the Anatomical Lectures in their hall, which office he discharged for six or seven years with great applause*. In the mean time, he was honoured by the university of Oxford with the degree of Doctor of Physic, by a diploma dated the fourth of December, 1707 (n). This honour was probably procured by the recommendation of Dr Radcliffe; 'tis certain that eminent Physician, the most celebrated practitioner of his time, took a particular pleasure in patronizing a young man of Mr Mead's amiable endowments, who, on his part, was not wanting to his old protector. Whatever merit a young Physician may have in his profession, he seldom gets into any vogue, unless his own personal qualifications, and the friendly protection of some eminent brother of the faculty, assist him to force his way through the croud. Dr Mead was happy in both these advantages; his manners were naturally gentle; his heart good; his soul noble, adorned with, and susceptible of, the best impressions. As his reputation was now sufficiently established, he was called in consultation to Queen Anne two days before her death. They who are acquainted with Courts, will easily conceive the situation of Physicians in the antichamber, or near the bed of a dying sovereign: their hands hold the page of fate; from their words advantages are drawn; intrigues are formed; and, by their very looks, men and parties foretel their own rise or fall. The wise, therefore, are the most reserved; for fear of endangering their fortune or their art, they observe the mysterious ambiguity of ancient oracles, and refer the inquisitive croud to nature and to time. This was the conduct of her Majesty's Physicians. Dr Mead, either more clear-sighted, or more bold, no sooner saw the Queen, than he declared she could not hold it out long; but finding it difficult to obtain credit, he added, out of humanity or prudence, that it would be sufficient to send to Hanover an account of the present symptoms, by which the Physicians of that Court would immediately see, that before the account came to them the Queen would be no more (o). However, he opened his mind freely to Dr Radcliffe, who made use of that friendship to excuse his own attendance on the royal patient. He then, indeed, himself lay irrecoverably ill, and upon his death, which happened shortly after (p). Dr Mead did not slip the opportunity of taking his house. The distance of this new situation in Bloomsbury-square from St Thomas's hospital, induced him to resign his place in it, the profits of which he could now very well forego; he took his leave in form January 5, 1714-15, and received the unanimous thanks of the grand committee for his services, and was presented with a governor's staff (q). He had been qualified some years, by his degree already mentioned at Oxford, for a Fellowship in the College of Physicians at London, and was admitted Fellow there April 9, 1716; he executed the office of Censor for the same year, as he did also in 1719 and 1724. In the mean time, he was employed in the family of his present Majesty, then Prince of Wales; and, in 1721, his Royal Highness ordered the doctor to assist at the inoculation of some condemned criminals, intending afterwards, in case of success, to recommend the practice of it to the people, by the illustrious example of his own royal family. This was one of those lucky occasions, which, 'tis observed, are necessary to the greatest men, in making a first-rate fortune; and our ingenious Physician was too clear-sighted to be wanting to himself in the use of it. Not content with examining attentively all the effects of the Circassian operation upon six of the prisoners, he caused the Chinese method likewise to be tried on the seventh. The success of these experiments is universally known (r); and it is a pleasure to see, that the same man, who had so great a hand in introducing inoculation into this kingdom, and who afterwards so frequently assisted at it, should, after thirty years experience, find new arguments (s) to confirm him in the high idea he had at first of it's usefulness. He had been applied to before on an affair of still greater consequence. The plague, which in 1719 was so fatal at Marseilles, gave the alarm to all other cities that were exposed to the same infection, and in particular to London, where the dreadful year 1665, which in ten months time swept away an hundred thousand inhabitants, was still fresh in many mens memory. The consternation of the people was increased by their ignorance of the true causes of the evil. Was it to be imputed to the effects of a contagion communicated from abroad? This the greater number of the French Physicians denied [H]. We were then, and had been many years, in a state of peace with that nation; and

* In 1753 there was published a piece intitled, Pharmacopœia Meadiana, &c. to which it added an appendix, containing medical lectures on the Stone in the bladder, on cancers, on Struma and Scrophula, and on muscular motion, said to be printed from the originals written with the doctor's own hand, &c.

[H] This the French physicians denied ] These physicians had engaged themselves in an hypothesis, that the plague was bred at Marseilles by a long use of bad aliment, and grew so vain of their opinion as not to be moved by the most convincing evidences; infomuch, that Dr Mead in the eighth edition of his treatise published in 1722, insisted more at large upon the infection of this disease than before, and even more, as he observes, than he could ever have thought needful at that time, after experience of the distemper for so many ages, had not he been surprized by the late attempts of some physicians in France to prove the contrary, even whilst they had undeniable arguments against them before their eyes; of which he gives instances from the pieces mentioned in the margin (16).

and the interest of commerce seemed to be on the side of the negative. On the other hand, it would have been still more dangerous to give way to panic fear, and neglect all precaution, on the principle then maintained by some of the English, though of Turkish original; that the plague is a periodical disease, generated in the place where it breaks out, and not to be prevented, allayed, or cured, 'till it has taken it's course. In this extremity, therefore, the Lords of the Regency directed Mr Craggs, then Secretary of State, to apply to Dr Mead, as the man best qualified by his skill in ancient and modern physic, to find out the most effectual methods to prevent, or, in case of necessity, to stop, the plague. After a careful and diligent enquiry, he declared it as his opinion, agreeably, indeed, to his system of poisons and the small-pox, that the plague is a contagious distemper. This opinion was approved; quarantine was accordingly ordered to be performed (t): these orders were, however, recalled, not in compliance with the clamours of an opposite faction, or the chicanery of a weak antagonist (u), but on the cessation of the plague among our neighbours. Had the disease reached the capital, it is to be presumed, that the doctor's advice, with respect to lazarettoes, lines of circumvallation, and purifications of the air, would have been exactly followed [I]; and that he himself, thus honoured with the confidence of the publick, would not have violated the glorious obligation, and, like Sydenham, have fled from danger. How much his scheme was universally approved, is evident from the numerous sale of his short Discourse concerning Pestilential Contagion, and the Methods to be used to prevent it, published in 1720, and dedicated to the Secretary of State; of which no less than seven editions were printed in one year. The eighth, which appeared in 1722, was enlarged with many new observations, and a whole chapter on the method of cure (w), and was translated into Latin by Mr (since Dr) Ward, Professor of Rhetoric at Gresham-college (x). That learned Antiquarian had soon afterwards another opportunity of signaling his zeal in our author's service. Dr Mead having, in his turn, spoke the Harveyan speech at the College of Physicians on the 18th of October 1723, thought proper to publish it, together with a dissertation concerning some medals, struck at Smyrna in honour of the Faculty, which he had endeavoured to prove was in the highest esteem even in ancient Rome (y). This assertion being attacked by Dr Conyers Middleton, our author engaged the Gresham Professor to undertake his defence, and the dispute was carried on with warmth on each side for some time. There is reason, however, to believe the doctor would either have qualified or confirmed his thesis, had he been able to finish a Latin work, which was to have been intitled, Medicina Vetus Collectitia ex auctoribus antiquis non medicis; for no man was more attentive to the point of fame, nor consulted it better than he did, by appearing with a greatness of mind, that would not suffer him knowingly to persist in his errors [K]. This controversy was not ended (z), when the doctor was appointed Physician in Ordinary to his present Majesty, on his accession to the throne in 1727: nor was the favour confined to his own person; he had afterwards the pleasure to see his two sons-in-law become his associates in the same station. There always is, there always must be, a lucky train of incidents concurring to the rise of any man, in which sense Fortune has undeniably an hand in his elevation; and so far Dr Mead's elevation must not be denied to be the work of Fortune; but at the same time it is equally undeniable, that his arrival to the top of his profession was the just reward of his merit. He entered into no state parties, nor were his connections in the Faculty formed or governed by any regard to them. Garth and Arbuthnot were both his friends; and,

[I] His advice, &c. would probably have been followed. An act of Parliament passed in 1720, agreeable to the doctor's directions, but there being great divisions at court about this time, a motion was made January 15th, 1721, in the House of Commons, to bring in a bill to repeal so much of the quarantine act of the 7 George, as gives the government power to remove to a ship or pest-house, any person whatsoever infected with the plague, or healthy persons out of an infected family from their habitations; and also so much of the said act as gives power for the drawing of lines round any city, town, or place infected: it was carried in the affirmative 115 to 40, and accordingly, on February 12th ensuing, one act passed to repeal those clauses, and another confining the power of the government to the space of one year (17). In the mean time great clamours were raised against the doctor; whereupon, in the 8th edition of his piece in 1722, having declared that he continued in the same opinion as at first, in relation to the treatment of the disease, proceeds thus: 'But how far in every situation of affairs it is expedient to grant the powers requisite for putting all of them in practice, it is not my proper business as a physician to determine. No doubt, continues he, but at all times these powers ought to be so limited and restrained, that they may never endanger the rights and liberties of a people. And it may, perhaps, at some times, for reasons with which I will not pretend to meddle, be necessary to give way to popular prejudices and clamours, and reject even the best rules that can be made, more especially when the danger is at a distance. Indeed, as I have had no other view than the publick good in this my undertaking, and the satisfaction of doing somewhat towards the relief of mankind under the greatest of calamities; so I should not without the utmost concern see, that any thing of mine gave the least countenance to cruelty and oppression (18).' By way of confirmation of this method, he added an account of that which was taken by his then present Majesty, when the plague had entered his German dominions in 1712, and 1713: this the doctor received from the King's Minister, and inserted it as being entirely agreeable to his own.

[K] He would not knowingly persist in his errors. Besides the animadversions of Dr Middleton, another part of our author's attempt was attacked not many years ago. The doctor in his dissertation concerning some medals struck at Smyrna, in honour of the Faculty, had espoused the opinion of Mr Chishull, that a college of Physicians was settled in this city from the most ancient times, and distinguished by the privilege of celebrating annual games in honour of Æsculapius and of Hygea the goddess of health. This is allowed to be a very ingenious conjecture, but said to be built upon no sufficient grounds, since these medals may be accounted for with greater probability, by referring them to Homer, whose birth-place is thereby determined in favour of Smyrna (19).

and, though he was himself zealously attached to the government by principle as well as gratitude, yet, as he had lived in the strictest intimacy with Dr Freind, so when that gentleman, on a suspicion of being engaged in what is called Atterbury's plot against the Government, was sent to the Tower, Dr Mead constantly visited him, and was one of those who bailed him at the time of his enlargement [L]. Nor was the doctor's generosity restrained only to his physical brethren, he had a greatness of mind which extended itself to all parts of literature in general, and took in the whole compass of the Arts and Sciences. Mr Carte, who on account of the same suspicion with Dr Freind had fled into France, having employed himself there in collecting materials for an English translation of the History of Thuanus, our learned Physician quickly perceived, that this plan might be enlarged. He looked on his country as too disinterested to desire to possess this foreign treasure alone, and was desirous England might do for Thuanus more than France itself, by procuring for all Europe the first complete edition of that immortal history. He therefore satisfied Mr Carte for the pains he had taken, and employed Mr Buckley as an editor equal to such a task; whose three letters, written in English to the doctor, contain many curious particulars concerning the history itself, and the plan of this new edition, to the perfection and beauty of which Dr Mead so liberally contributed (aa). These letters; at the doctor's request, were translated into Latin by Mr Professor Ward already mentioned, and prefixed to the front of the work, which was published in 1733 in seven volumes folio. Without the interposition of Dr Mead, there is great reason to fear, that the invention of Mr Sutton, to clear ships, and other close and confined places, from foul and corrupted air by the means of fire, would have shared the same fate with many other useful discoveries, which ignorance, jealousy, and often private interest, have stifled in their birth; but fortunately our illustrious patron of sciences being at first sight convinced of the advantages of this method, and looking on it as the most useful discovery in Mechanics that this or the last age had produced, was determined to allow time and patience for the perfecting a scheme, which he was positive could not but succeed in the end. Accordingly, he engaged the Lords of the Admiralty to order a trial of the new machine to be made, at which he assisted with them, and several Fellows of the Royal Society, whom he had interested in the same cause; he presented a memorial to that learned body (bb), wherein he has clearly demonstrated both its simplicity and efficacy, and likewise caused a model of it to be made in copper, which he deposited in their Museum. At last, after a ten years tedious solicitation, he did obtain of the Lords of the Admiralty an order to Mr Sutton, to provide all the ships of the royal navy with this useful machine; and a draught with a description being published in 1749, the doctor enriched the book with a treatise on the scurvy, in which he drew his materials from the accurate observations on that terrible disease that occur in Lord Anson's Voyage; and founding his directions on them, has given such rules, as may be of use to prevent those fatal accidents that have so often obstructed the success of naval expeditions. Being arrived at the time of life when retirement becomes necessary, he declined the Presidentship of the College of Physicians in London, which was offered him October 1, 1744, but was elected Honorary Member of that at Edinburgh October 6 the following year. The doctor was far from suffering the last stage of life to pass over his head uselessly; he took this occasion to compose new works. His piece upon the small-pox and measles had been many years under his hands, as appears by a letter of Dr Freind, published in 1719 (cc); but the treatise itself did not appear till 1747. Our learned Physician having employed the leisure hours of this long interval in polishing and perfecting the work, in which the experience he had acquired by a long and successful practice must needs have been of infinite service to him; and accordingly it is much esteemed by the Faculty, for its simplicity, fidelity, and precision, as an elementary treatise [M]. His treatise De Morbis Biblicis, or the diseases mentioned

[L] He bailed Dr Freind] Dr Freind having employed the leisure which his confinement gave him, in drawing up a treatise on some singular species of the small-pox, and likewise his history of physick from the time of Galen, addressed them both to his generous benefactor. But what contributed most of all to cement the union of these two great men, was a common quarrel that happened some years before. Dr Mead, in the course of his practice, having had frequent opportunities to experience the efficacy of purgatives to prevent, or at least to lessen the secondary fever, which so often proves fatal in the confluent small-pox, communicated his discovery to several of his brethren, who had the greatest share of his confidence, and in particular to Radcliffe and Freind; the latter adopted it, and in his commentary on the first and third books of Hippocrates's Epidemics which he published in 1717, he inserted the letter which Mead had written to him seven years before, on that subject. These two gentlemen being now considered as associated in the same cause, a party was immediately formed both against the new practice and the favourers of it; which brought on a controversy, enough of which has been already inserted in these memoirs (20).

[M] His piece on the small-pox is much esteemed.] He published it in Latin under this title; De Variolis & morbillis dissertatio, and annexed to it a translation from the Arabic of Rhases, in order to shew the conformity of the practice of the Arabs, with that which had been so well explained and illustrated by Sydenham, Freind, and Boërhaave. It was the last of these great men, who, at his request, had sent him a copy of the only remaining Arabic manuscript of Rhases's treatise, which is preserved at Leyden. It was translated by three of the greatest masters in that language, Negri, Gagnier, and Hunt. A constant correspondence had long subsisted between Dr Mead and Boërhaave, who had been fellow-students at Leyden. They communicated to each other their observations and projects, and mutually gave and received presents; and, what is never to be found but among truly great men, they were friends though rivals, and never loved each other the less for differing in some particulars. In Mead's Treatise of Poisons, we meet with two cases of the Hydrophobia communicated by Boërhaave (21), and it was on the observations of his friend, that the Professor of Leyden declared in favour of inoculation. At the time that Boërhaave was pre-tioned in the Bible, was the product of those hours, which, among wise men, constitute the interval between old age and death; the design of it being to reconcile those persons to the Bible, who reject it under colour of its disagreement with our knowledge of Nature [N]. The doctor's last, and, perhaps, the most useful of all his works, is his Medical Precepts and Cautions (dd). Herein, with a candour and simplicity so characteristic of a great man, he freely communicates all the discoveries that his long practice and experience had opened to him with regard to different diseases, and their several cures; he concludes with many salutary precepts for preserving the organs of the body and the faculties of the mind perfect and intire to a good old age; and he who at fourscore teaches the art of longævity, gives his lessons with as good a grace, as his scholars may learn them with a great advantage. We see at one view, in this last book, how much the art hath gained by such a length of time, and so successful a practice. This is a legacy that our author hath bequeathed to his brethren; valuable, not only for the good it may do, but likewise as it shews the excellent mind of the testator. To be able to account in such a manner to posterity for the use of his time; to consecrate the last moments of his life to the advancement of science and the good of mankind: how worthy is that man to have lived who dies thus employed. After the publication of this work, he no longer found himself in a condition to finish any thing; he grew weaker every day, and expired on Saturday morning, the 16th of February, 1754, without any visible signs of pain, after a confinement to his bed from the Monday morning. On the 23d his body was deposited in the Temple church, in the same vault with that of his eldest brother abovementioned [O]. The doctor was twice married; by his first wife, already taken notice of in the course of this memoir, he had eight children; four of whom died in their infancy. And of the rest, the second daughter, now deceased, was married to the late Charles Bertie, of Uffington in Lincolnshire, Esq; the eldest to Dr Edward Wilmott, and the youngest to Dr Frank Nicholls, both Physicians in Ordinary to his Majesty [P]. His only son, Richard Mead, Esq; is married to Anne, daughter of William Gore, Esq; of Tring in Hertfordshire, and resides at Windsor. Soon after his father's decease, he erected a handsome marble monument, with a Latin inscription to his memory, in the north side of the body of Westminster abbey. The mother of these children dying in February 1719, the doctor, on the 14th of August, 1724, married Anne, daughter of Sir Rowland Allston, of Odell in Bedfordshire, Bart. who is still living; but he had no issue by her. During almost half a century he was at the head of his business, which brought him in one year upwards of seven thousand pounds, and between five and six for several years. His generous and benevolent temper was constantly exercised in acts of charity. Clergymen, and, in general, all men of learning, were welcome to his advice, and his doors paring his edition of Aretæus, he received as a present from his friend, Wigan's splendid edition of that author. Yet the English Physician did not approve of the Leyden Professor's notion of the possibility of curing the small-pox without suppuration, and the latter as little relished what to him appeared the premature use of purgatives in the same distemper. One treated as chimerical the notion of antimony and mercury as specifics against the small-pox: the other looked on the earthy ash-coloured mofs as too much cried up in the cure of the hydrophobia (22). Dr Mead differed likewise in opinion from the famous Astruc, Physician to the French King, concerning the use of mercurial unctions in the venereal disease*; he thought the safest way of raising a salivation, was by internal medicines, and that external applications were attended with much greater inconveniences. He did not however convince the learned Frenchman, who in a subsequent edition of his treatise on that disease, answered the doctor's arguments (23), for whom he retained the highest esteem, and, at the same time, the strongest attachment to his own opinion. We ought not to conclude this remark without taking notice of the picture which Dr Mead has drawn in the preface of this treatise on the small-pox, of his antagonist Dr Woodward, twenty years after his death; so strong was his resentment of the injuries he received in the controversy mentioned in the preceding remark. And perhaps he might be desirous to offer this victim as a debt due from him to the manes of his deceased associate Dr Friend.

[N] His design was to clear up the difficulties in the account of some distempers mentioned in the Bible. Our author pretended that the commentators on the scriptures were not sufficiently skilled in physic, to be able rightly to understand those expressions in the sacred writers, which relate to the economy or the disorders of the human body. And some Divines have in their turn retorted the objection upon the Physician, especially in those parts where he pretends to decide upon points about which themselves are not agreed, such as the sickness of Job, the description of old age by the author of Ecclesiastes, and above all, the famous question about the demoniacs in the Gospel; on this last subject the doctor looked upon it as an honour to have adopted the opinion of his relation the famous Joseph Mede †; which was, that these demoniacs were only lunatic and epileptic.

[O] His eldest brother abovementioned. We have already seen the first part of this gentleman's life, that he was bred, first with the rest of the family, under a private tutor in his father's house, that he went next to Gravius at Utrecht, and then made the tour of Italy: he was afterwards bred to the Law, entered a student of the Inner-Temple, and being called to the Bar, became very eminent in his profession, and was chosen a Bencher of Lincoln's-Inn some time before his death, which happened March 20th, 1732-3, in the 63d year of his age (24). A handsome monument with and inscription was erected to his memory in the round of the Temple church, by our doctor, to whose son he left an ample fortune †.

[P] His two sons-in-law are both Physicians in Ordinary to his Majesty. The doctor is no where seen to greater advantage than sitting thus, with a son on each side, in the highest seat of the Faculty. It seems indeed, to be in a great measure, if not chiefly, owing to the influence of his character, and out of respect to him, as well as to their own merit, that this honour was obtained by them. 'Tis certain the doctor took all opportunities of recommending that merit to the world, to which purpose, we find him, in one treatise (25), reciting an extraordinary case of the small pox, which passed under the care of Dr Wilmot, with that Physician's remark upon it: and in another, inserting an anatomical description, together with the draughts of those parts in a viper and a rattle-snake, which are concerned in their poison, communicated by Dr Nicholls, as also a description of their appearances in the animals put to death by swallowing a small quantity of laurel water, in order to ascertain the poisonous quality thereof (26).

were always open every morning to the most indigent, whom he frequently assisted also with his purse; so that, notwithstanding his great gains, he did not die very rich, being persuaded, that what he got from the publick, could never be bestowed more honourably, than in the advancement of science and the encouragement of the learned. In that design, his large and spacious house in Great Ormond-street was converted into a temple of Nature, and a repository of Time. He built a gallery for his favourite furniture, his pictures and his antiquities. His library, by the catalogue published the year after his death, consisted of 6592 numbers, containing upwards of 10000 volumes; in which he spared no expence for scarce and ancient editions; for copies well chosen and highly preferred; for the richest and most durable bindings; all the ornaments corresponding with the value of the authors, and the exact and refined taste of the owner. His Latin, Greek, and Oriental, manuscripts, made no inconsiderable part of his literary monuments. His collection of antiques, medals, coins, prints, and drawings, were equalled by nothing in the kingdom in the hands of a private man. Several pieces of ancient painting, and, among others, that of the court of Augustus, found at Rome in 1737, had cost him vast sums. And as for his collection of pictures by the greatest masters, they had been chosen with so much judgment, that after his death they were sold for upwards of 3400 pounds; about 6 or 700 pounds more than the money he gave for them [Q]. Nor did he make this great collection for his own use alone, but freely opened it to the inspection and use of others. Ingenious men were sure of finding at Dr Mead's the best helps in almost all their undertakings; nothing pleased him more, than to be the owner of any thing that could serve to call every hidden talent into light, to give encouragement to the greatest projects, and to see them executed under his own eyes. Scarce any thing curious has appeared in England since the beginning of this century, but under his patronage. He constantly kept in his pay a great number of scholars and artists of all kinds, who were continually at work for him, or rather for the publick. As he was a judge of whatever is excellent, so he admitted nothing else into his collection; and these he always purchased at their value, that is, at any price. The rest of his character is drawn to advantage by the author of the Authentic Memoirs of his Life, and may be seen below [R].

His books and antiquities sold also very well. Whence it happened, that notwithstanding the extraordinary port, no ways inferior to that of a nobleman, which he constantly maintained, yet I am informed, that the money raised by his assets, after the discharge of all debts, &c. did not fall much short of 20000 l. Of this he bequeathed 500 l. to each family of his grandchildren, the issue of his three daughters, and the rest came into the hands of his son, who, besides the fortune left him by his uncle already mentioned, was possessed of an estate of about 800 l. per ann. by virtue of the will of Sir Thomas Reeves, late Lord Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas (27). His Lordship's wife was the widow of — Foote Esq; merchant of London, by whom she had a son, who dying before his mother, bequeathed to her the justmentioned estate, which, she made it her request to Sir Thomas, that he would at his decease dispose of it to Dr Mead, who was a distant relation, had been successful in curing her of a dropsy, and was very much respected both by her and her brother Richard Topham, of Windsor, Esq; to whose will the doctor was made joint-executor with Sir Thomas Reeves, and concurred with him in bestowing on Eton college in 1736, that gentleman's valuable collection of books and drawings (28).

[R] The rest of his character, &c. The writer mentioned in the text proceeds thus: 'The doctor's [Mead's] reputation, not only as a Physician, but as a scholar, was so universally established, that he corresponded with all the principal Literati in Europe. Mr de Boze, whose loss the learned lament no less than the academy to which he did so much honour, kept up the strictest correspondence with the doctor. He frequently received from him some valuable piece for the cabinet of the French King, and never failed of making him a return of the same kind. The scarce, and perhaps the only copy, of Servetus's last book, passed from the shelves of our English worthy to those of his friend abroad, in exchange for a thousand presents he had received from him. A glorious emulation that ennobles human nature, and extinguisheth in great and generous minds, those sparks of envy with which mean and base ones are apt to confound it. The King of Naples sent to request of Dr Mead a complete collection of all his works; and in return, presented him with the two first volumes of Sig. Bajardi, which may be looked on as an introduction to the collection of the Antiquities of Herculaneum; and at the same time, this Prince invited him to his own palace, that he might have an opportunity of shewing him all those valuable monuments of antiquity. His years alone, as he owned to several of his friends, prevented his taking a journey so suited to his taste and inclination. Nothing did more honour to this patron of learning than the free and constant access of men of different qualifications to his table, who were each employed the rest of the day at his peculiar work or study. There no man's talents were misplaced, none was honoured with an undue preference: the Scholar took his place near the Naturalist, and the Mathematician near the Antiquarian or the Painter. Every one found himself surrounded with objects capable of instructing him, or exciting his emulation. Our Mæcenas was frequently the only man in company, who was acquainted with all their different languages, and was able to perform the office of an interpreter to them all: he constantly questioned them in a most obliging manner about their different occupations, taking great pleasure in commending their several performances and discoveries, and by this means inspired them all with emulation, and a reciprocal esteem for each other. No foreigner of any learning, taste, or even curiosity, ever came to London without being introduced to Dr Mead; it would have been a shame to return home without having seen him. On these occasions his table was always open, and united the magnificence of Princes with the pleasures of Philosophers. It was principally to him, that the several counties of England and our colonies abroad, applied for the choice of their Physicians: as he never recommended any but such whose capacity he was well assured of, so he never failed to assist them with his advice and information when they had recourse to him in difficult cases, and required nothing of them in return, but an account of their several discoveries and observations, of which they enjoyed the whole honour. The Philosophical Transactions afford us many examples of this kind of correspondence so much to the credit of both parties. The doctor was likewise consulted by foreign Physicians, from Russia, Prussia, Denmark, &c. The good of mankind and the glory of his country, was his favourite, his prevailing principle. It was this that engaged him to persuade Guy the wealthy citizen to lay out out his immense fortune in building a new hospital for the reception and maintenance of the wretched and indigent, who are discharged out of all others as incurable. It is a great pity that the intention of the founder should have been so little complied with; and it was perhaps this consideration deration alone, that prevented Dr Mead's accepting the Presidency which was offered him on the death of the first President. He was a benefactor to all the other hospitals, and was one of the first subscribers to the Foundling, that noble institution, that will for ever endear the name of Captain Coram to his country, and which could never have been attempted without the doctor's assistance. Foreigners may perhaps wonder that an hospital so long wanted in this city [London] should be yet but new; but they will be still more surprized, that a foundation of less than twenty years standing*, which owes its being only to the voluntary contributions of private persons, should have all the stability of the most ancient. He was the friend of Pope, of Halley, of Newton, and placed their portraits in his house near the busts of their great masters the ancient Greeks and Romans. He presented to the college of Physicians a marble busto of Dr Harvey, done by an excellent hand, from an original picture in his possession (20); to which it is to be wished, that his own may hereafter be added by some worthy successor, animated by the same spirit, with this inscription, which he had chosen for his motto,

M E D E [JOSEPH], one of the most learned English Divines in the last century, was born in October 1586, at Berden in Essex, of a good family [A]. His education in Grammar-learning, was first at Hoddesdon in Hertfordshire, and afterwards at Weatherfield in Essex. Whilst he was at this last school, going to London upon some occasion, he bought Bellarmin's Hebrew Grammar: And, though his master, who had no skill in that language, told him it was not a book fit for him; yet he studied it with so much eagerness, that in a little time he acquired no small skill in the Hebrew language. Encouraged by the pregnancy of his parts, his assiduous industry, and great proficiency in learning, his friends sent him in the year 1602 to Christ's college in Cambridge; where the improvements he made in a short time, by his great application joined to excellent natural parts, became so conspicuous, that they drew upon him the eyes not only of his own college, but of the whole University [B]. By that time he had taken the degree of Master of Arts, which was in 1610, he had made so uncommon a progress through all kinds of Academical studies, that he was looked upon as an accomplished scholar (a) [C]. The first specimen he gave of it, was in a Latin Address [D] to Dr Andrews, then Bishop of Ely, and afterwards of Winchester; which that great Prelate, a consummate judge and patron of learning, so well liked, that he not only stood our author's firm friend upon an occasion that offered soon after; but also desired him for his household-chaplain: which office, however, Mr Mede civilly refused, as valuing the liberty of his studies above any hopes of preferment [E], and esteeming that freedom which he enjoyed in his cell (for so he used cheerfully to term the college) as the haven of all his wishes (b). Here he was happily fixed, by being chosen Fellow, through the particular interest and application of Bishop Andrews [F], and became an eminent and faithful tutor [G]. Soon after his being [A] Of a good family.] He was related to the family of Sir John Mede (or Mead) of Lofts hall, in the parish of Wendon-loughts, alias Lofts, in the county of Essex (1).—When he was about ten years old, both he and his father fell sick at the same time of the small-pox: to the father it proved mortal, and to the son very hazardous; however he escaped. His mother married afterwards one Mr Gower, of Nasing in Essex, by whom he was sent to school (2).

[B] Not only of his own college, but of the whole university.] These improvements could not but be the more observable in him, because he wanted that facility of utterance, which useth to set off slight parts; and had so great a hesitation in his speech, as rendered his expression painful to himself, and less pleasing to others (3). Which made him decline all publick disputations and other exercises, as not to be performed by him without great difficulty: his labour in them (as he was wont to tell his familiar acquaintance) being double to that of others, in regard he was put to study, not for matter only, but for words; not to express his mind (for they naturally follow a good and clear apprehension) but for words that he could utter. But in time, and with proper care, he attained to so great a mastery over that infirmity, that he was able to deliver a whole sermon without any considerable hesitation (4).

[C] That he was looked upon as an accomplished scholar.] For he was an acute Logician, an accurate Philosopher, a skillful Mathematician, an excellent Anatomist, (being usually sent for, when they had any Anatomy in Caius college,) a great Philologer, a master of many Languages, and a good proficient in the studies of History and Chronology. The author of his life adds, that he mentions these things not only to show his indefatigable diligence, but also to declare how great perfections may be attained by an assiduous industry: and withal to manifest the unreasonableness of that complaint, Ars longa, Vita brevis (5).

(5) Ibid.

[D] The first specimen he gave of it, was in a Latin Address, &c.] The subject of it was, De sanctitate relativa, &c. of relative holiness. In his maturer years, he was wont to censure it, as favouring too much of his infancy in Divinity, and first thoughts, and affectation of style; and therefore he never published it. However, it gained the approbation and esteem of the learned Prelate, to whom it was presented (6).

[E] As valuing the liberty of his studies above any hopes of preferment.] This very strong inclination to learning he manifested very early. For, when he was a school-boy, his uncle, Mr Richard Mede, a merchant, who had then no children, sent for him, and offered to adopt him for his son, if he would live with him: but he accepted not the offer, shewing betimes, that no worldly allurements was sufficient to entice him from his studies (7).

(6) Id. p. 2. See also his Letters, p. 82.

[F] Through the particular interest and application of Bishop Andrews.] The author of the Appendix to Mr Mede's Life informs us (8), That Mr Mede had continued in the University until after he took the degree of Master of Arts, and had already received some strange preteritions at elections, Dr Cary, (afterwards bishop of Exeter,) then head of the college entertaining a very causeless jealousy of him, that he looked too much towards Geneva. Within a short time after, the college had private notice of a stranger who had got a mandamus for a fellowship, either vacant or like to be so. His news heightened them to a preventing election; and now the matter was contented to hear of Mr Mede. He is chosen, but conditionally and provisionally, that if the mandamus be not diverted, and shall be over powerfully urged, he must recede. Mr Mede therefore maturely makes his application to Bishop Andrews, by whose assistance he is now confirmed Fellow of that college to which he owed his education, and for which he had so filial a dearnef. Out of religious gratitude, he solemnly vowed to lay aside every tenth shilling he should ever receive in the college, and to dedicate it to pious uses.

[G] And became an eminent and faithful tutor] This important charge he managed with great prudence, and equal diligence. After he had by daily lectures well grounded his pupils in humanity, logic, and philosophy, and by frequent conversations under-

being chosen Fellow, he was appointed Reader of the Greek lecture of Sir Walter Mildmay's foundation, and held it the rest of his life: which rendered that tongue, as also several others, very familiar to him. He so entirely devoted himself to the study of all useful knowledge, that he made even the time which he spent in his recreations serviceable to his design. For, as he allowed himself little or no exercise but walking, when he and others were walking in the fields or in the college-garden, he would take occasion to speak of the beauty, signatures, and useful properties of the plants then in view; he being a curious florist, an accurate botanist, and thoroughly versed in the book of nature (c). The chief delight he took in company, was, to discourse with learned friends: particularly, with Mr William Chappel, afterwards Provost of Trinity-college in Dublin, and Bishop of Cork and Ross (d). In his private Studies, he employed himself principally in the most abstruse parts of learning, and such as were most remote from the vulgar track: which qualified him for his subsequent deep and much admired Commentaries on the Revelation of St John [H]. In his younger years, he spent much time and pains in the depths of Astrology; but he soon discovered the vanity and weakness of that fanciful art [I]: and applied himself, with great vigour and success, to the more useful study of History and Antiquities, both sacred and profane [K]. At the instance of the Master of his college, he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity in 1618 (e). But his Modesty and Humility restrained him from taking the degree of Doctor. And, out of the same principle, he refused, in 1627, the Provostship of Trinity-college near Dublin, into which he had been elected, upon the recommendation of Archbishop Usher: as he declined it again, when it was offered him a second time, in 1630 (f) [L]. The generous design, of bringing about an universal Pacification among Protestants, did much employ his thoughts, as appears from several letters that passed between him and John Dury and Mr Hartlib, the strenuous promoters of that glorious design (g) [M]. His Charity was diffusive, flood what particular studies they might be most profitably employed in, he gave them his advice accordingly: and when they were able to go alone, he chose rather to set every one his daily task than constantly to confine himself and them to precise hours for lectures. In the evening they all came to his chamber to satisfy him that they had performed the task he set them. The first question which he used then to propound to every one in his order was, Quid dubitas? What doubts have you met in your studies to-day? (For he supposed, that To doubt of nothing, and To understand nothing, were verifiable alike.) Their doubts being proposed, he resolved their questions, and so set them upon clear ground to proceed more distinctly. And then, having by prayer commended them and their studies to God's protection and blessing, he dismissed them to their lodgings (9).

[H] Commentaries on the Revelation of St John. They were published by himself, at Cambridge, in 1627, 4to. under this title, Clavis Apocalyptica, ex innatis & insitis Visionum characteribus eruta & demonstrata. i. e. A Key to the Apocalypse, &c. to which he added in 1632, In Sancti Ioannis Apocalypsin Commentarius, ad amussin Clavis Apocalyptica. i. e. A Commentary on the Apocalypse of St John, corresponding exactly to his Key, &c. The Clavis was reprinted afterwards at London; and in English in 1650, 4to. These learned pieces were received with great esteem and approbation, both at home and abroad (10).

[I] But he soon discovered the vanity and weakness of that fanciful art. The result of all his searches into that curious art, was only this, That the celestial luminaries having an unquestionable influence upon all sublunary bodies, in the like position of the heavens, may reasonably be thought to have a similitude in their operation, and thereby to cause a sympathy in things produced under like constellations, and an antipathy under different. But this not extending further than a natural inclination, and being in men alterable by custom, education, and infinite external impediments, he judged it not (without extreme vanity) to be presumed upon as an infallible ground of prediction of future actions; especially in such things wherein men, acting out of choice, run counter, many times, to their natural inclinations. Or, to use his own words, 'That δυσωβία Ingenii should beget δυσπαρα-ζισυ Αθλον, this is from no necessity; because it is in man's power and liberty, who is naturally ill-disposed, yet through the improvements of art, and especially by the grace of God, to become good or better, as the divine goodness shall minister opportunity (11).'

[K] And applied himself to the study of History and Antiquities, both sacred and profane. He applied himself particularly to a curious enquiry into those mysterious sciences, which made the ancient Chaldeans, Egyptians, and other nations, so famous; tracing them, as far as he could have any light to guide him, in their oriental schemes and figurative expressions, as likewise in their hieroglyphicks; not forgetting also to enquire into the oneirocriticks of the Ancients. Which he did the rather, because of that affinity which he conceived they might have with the language of the Prophets, to the understanding of whom he shewed a most ardent desire. His humanity studies and mathematical labours were but initial things, which he made subservient to a more perfect knowledge of Divinity. As a compleat Divine must be well acquainted with Histories of all sorts, those especially which concern the Church of God; our author, therefore, made his way by the knowledge of all Histories, general, national, ancient and modern, sacred and secular. He was a curious and laborious searcher of Antiquities relating to Religion, Ethnick, Jewish, Christian, and Mahometan. To which he added other attendants, necessary for the better understanding the more difficult passages of Scripture; namely an accurate knowledge of the Ichnography of the Tabernacle and Temple, the order of the service of God therein, as also of the city of Jerusalem, together with an exact topography of the Holy Land; besides other Jewish Antiquities, Scripture-chronology, and the exact calculation of times, so far especially as served for the solving or clearing of those difficulties and obscure passages that occur in the Historical part of Scripture. His great knowledge in all which branches, is sufficiently plain from his learned writings (12).

[L] As he declined it again, when it was offered him a second time, in 1630 The height of his ambition was, only to have had some small donative sine cure made additional to his fellowship, or to have been placed in some collegiate church, or rural college: Some such place of quiet retirement from the noise and tumults of the world, with a moderate competency, was the top and utmost of his desires. And, therefore, when a report was spread, that he was made chaplain to the Archbishop of Canterbury, he thus expressed himself, in a letter to one of his friends. 'That he had lived, 'till the best of his time was spent, in tranquillitate & secessu; and now that there is but a little left, should I (saith he) be so unwise, suppose there were nothing else, as to enter now into a tumultuous life, where I should not have time to think my own thoughts, and must of necessity displease others or myself? Those who think so, know not my disposition in this kind to be as averse, as some perhaps would be ambitious (13).'

diffusive, and large, considering the smallness of his revenues [N]: for he devoted to God and set apart the tenth of his yearly incomes to charitable and pious uses. But his Frugality and Temperance always afforded him plenty (b) [O]. His prudent moderation, either in declaring or defending his private opinions, was very remarkable: as was also his freedom from partiality [P], prejudice and prepossession, pride, passion and self-love, flattery and covetous ambition (i). And he was exemplary for meekness, patience, and every other virtue: equally remote from superstition, and a prophane turn of mind (k). His works, of which a particular account is given below [Q], are a sufficient proof of his great and

That all sides should yield, and abate—of their pretensions. 'I am, faith he, so far inclinable to Peace; that I can yield to a Christian communion as great a distance of opinions as any Protestant whatsoever. For I hold, communion is not to be broken but for Fundamentals: of which kind I take none of the differences between the Calvinists and Lutherans to be—Nor do I think this Union, which every true Christian ought so much to desire, will ever be brought to pass by a full decision of the controversies; but only by abating of that vast distance which contention hath made, and approaching the differences so near, as either party may be induced to tolerate the other, and acknowledge them for brethren and members of the same body (14).—But, Lord! (saith he elsewhere) is there any hope of a Pacification, whilst each party studies to maintain their advantage against the other entire? A joyner cannot set two pieces of timber together without paring something from either (15). And he observes, how hard it is for men who have once drawn blood in these controversies, i. e. have publickly engaged and declared themselves in them, to listen to any overture of peace (16). Secondly, With regard to Fundamentals, He proposed to 'make two sorts of Fundamental articles, Fundamentals of Salvation, and Fundamentals of Ecclesiastical Communion; one of such as are necessarii cognitivi & crediti ad salutem [necessary to be known and believed in order to salvation] simply and absolutely, and therefore no Christian soul that shall be saved incapable to understand them; another, of such as are necessarii crediti ad communionem ecclesiasticam [necessary to be believed for ecclesiastical communion] in regard of the predecision of the Church. The first not to be of such truths as are merely speculative, and contained only in the understanding; but of such only as have a necessary influence upon the act and function of Christian life.—Such, namely, as without the knowledge and belief whereof we can neither invoke the Father aright, nor have that faith and reliance upon him and his Son our Mediator Jesus Christ, which is requisite to remission of sins and the hope of the life to come. How far this ratio of a Fundamental article will stretch, I know not; but believe it will fetch in most of the articles of the Apostles Creed.—Concerning the second sort of Fundamentals, viz. necessarii ad communionem ecclesiasticam; it is not fit that the Church should admit any to her communion, which shall professedly deny or refuse their assent to such catholic truths as she hath anciently declared, by universal authority, for the symbol and badge of such as should have communion with her. And this sort of Articles without doubt fetches a greater compass, and comprehends more than the other, as being ordinate and measured by another end, to wit, of Discipline; and so contains not only such truths, the knowledge whereof and assent whereto is necessary unto the being of Christian life, but also the well-being thereof; and therefore not needful to be understood of every one distinctly and explicitly as the former, but implicitly only, and as far as they shall be capable or have means to come to the knowledge thereof (17). He adds elsewhere, —'The way to determine Fundamental articles must be made very short, easie and evident; or it will breed as many controversies as are about the points themselves in question — It is not fit that a confession which concerns all that will be saved to know and remember, should be any long or tedious discourse.—' The Confession we seek for should be but Summa credendorum (18).'

[N] His Charity was diffusive and large, considering the smallness of his revenues.] For he had only what his place in the college afforded him (19), and yet out of that he spared a tenth part, as is said above. But he had a noble motive for his charity:

He considered alms under the notion of a Lord's rent and tribute of Thanksgiving, which God the Lord of all (whose is the earth and the fulness thereof) justly requires from us, that thereby we may testify our acknowledging of God as our great Landlord, and ourselves his tenants, that hold all we have of him — Therefore he looked upon Alms-giving, not as an arbitrary thing, left to mens choice or discretion to be done or omitted; but as a necessary and indispensable duty (20).

[O] But his Frugality and Temperance always afforded him plenty.] As to his Frugality; He carefully avoided the occasions of unnecessary expences; and when he saw others lavishly spending beyond their income, and not wisely proportioning their Expences to their Receipts, he used to say, They wanted the estimative faculty. Then with regard to his Temperance; what he ate and drank, was rather to suffice nature, than indulge his appetite; it consisting ordinarily of his College-commons, and the smaller sort of beer.—The observations made by the writer of his life, upon this subject, are well worth our attention. It is, faith he, a most approved and experienced truth. That for the enabling a man to a free and cheerful exercise of Christian Charity, it is absolutely necessary that he retrench and cut off all needless expences either about apparel or diet, building, or sports and recreations, &c. Otherwise frequent or excessive treatments, pride and curiosity about attire and dress, will soon make charity bare and cold, and at last quite starve it. Where much is laid out upon back or belly, there will be but little spared for beneficence.—Where too much is solemnly offered in sacrifice, as especially at great feasts, to that false god, the Belly, (and the best and fattest is offered up, and withall the sweetest, for large drink-offerings to that mortal and perishing god;) there will be but little reserved for the sacrifices of communicating and doing good, with which the eternal and only true God is well pleased (21).

[P] As was also his freedom from partiality.] This is sufficiently evident from his Works; and he declares the same in the strongest words, particularly in the following passages, extracted from his Letters, 'I thank God, says he, I never made any thing hither to the casting of my resolutions but Reason and Evidence, on what side soever the advantage or disadvantage fell (22).—' If I have hit upon any truth, it is wholly to be attributed to my indifferency in such searches, to embrace whatsoever I should find, without any regard whether it were for the advantage of one side or other, and not to any ability beyond others. Freedom from prejudice, studium partium, or desire to find for this side rather than that, (which I confess I endeavour as much as I can possibly to subdue myself unto) is sufficient with a little diligence to discover more than I have yet done (23). But, as he observes in the same place, Mundus amat decipi magis quam doceri, [the world loves rather to be deceived than taught] and will never entertain any man well that shall deal ingenuously with them.' Elsewhere, he complains to the same purpose, 'You see what an invincible mischief prejudice is, and studium partium; it leaves no place for admission of truth that brings any disadvantage to the side: that's the rule which they examine all by (24).'

[Q] His Works, &c.] He published himself, in his life time, as is said above (25), Clavis Apocalyptica, & Commentationes Apocalyptice; together with his 'Treatises concerning Churches,' and 'Of the name Altar, or Θυσιαστήριον, anciently given to the Holy Table.'—The rest were published after his decease; and, in the best edition of his works put out by Dr J. Worthington in the year 1677, the whole are disposed in the following order, being divided into Five books. I. The first book contains fifty three Discourses on several Texts of Scripture; making a course of sermons for the whole year: All which were and extensive learning. But some of his notions about the Millennium, &c. have been found liable to exception. We shall give below an extract of what he says concerning Dæmoniacks [R]. This learned man died October 1, 1638, aged 52; having spent above two thirds of his time in his college. The next day, he was buried in the inner chapel of the college, about the middle of the area on the south side. He gave in his will 100 l. to the poor of the town of Cambridge; some legacies to his kindred; and the remainder of his estate, amounting to 300 l. to his college (l). As to his person: He was of a comely proportion, and a middle stature. His eye was full, quick, and sparkling: his whole countenance sedate and grave; awful, but withal tempered with an inviting sweetness. And his behaviour was friendly and affable, intermixed with becoming cheerfulness and inoffensive pleasantry (m) [S].

were delivered in publick (either in the College-chapel, or in some great auditory) except the Discourse upon Isaiah ii. 2, 3. which was written by the author for the satisfaction of a friend, that desired his opinion concerning that prophecy. The 11th book contains such tracts and discourses on several texts of Scripture, as were of the like argument and design; viz. About churches, and the worship of God therein; Of the Christian Sacrifice, in nine chapters: Of the name of Θεωσιμότης, abovementioned; and Concio ad Clerum Book III. contains his Treatises upon Propheticall Scripture; viz. Clavis, & Commentationes Apocalyptice: Opuscula nonnulla ad rem Apocalypticam spectantia. A Paraphrase and Exposition of the Prophecy of St Peter, Ep. ii. ch. 3. concerning the day of Christ's second coming: The Apostasy of the latter times; or the Gentiles Theology of Dæmons revived in the latter times amongst Christians, in worshipping of Angels, &c. The 14th book contains his Epistles to several learned men; whose Letters are also inserted, otherwise his Answers to them had been less intelligible. The letters in this book are ninety eight in number. The 15th and last book comprehends Fragmenta Sacra, or such Miscellanies as could not well come under any of the forementioned general heads; viz. The disposition of the years of Jehoiakim, according to the several events mentioned in Scripture. The mystery of St Paul's conversion, &c. [R] We shall give an extract of what he says concerning Dæmoniacks. It is in his Treatise, intituled The Apostasy of the latter Times, that he speaks of them: And what he saith is reducible to these few heads: 'Dæmons in the Gentiles Theology were Deastri, or an inferior sort of Deified Powers, as a middle between the sovereign Gods and mortal men.—The Sovereign or highest Gods, which amongst them were properly called Θεοί, were those whom they supposed to be in the heavens, yea in the sun, moon, and stars, whence they called them Dii Superi, Dii caelestes, whom they affirmed to have neither beginning nor ending.—Now these Sovereign or Celestial Gods they supposed so sublime and pure, as might not be profaned with approach of earthly things, or with the care and managing of mortal mens businesses; and therefore they bring in that middle sort of divine Powers which they call Δαιμόνες or Δαιμόνια, Dæmons, to be as Mediators and agents between the Sovereign Gods and mortal men.—This was the occumencial philosophy of the Apostles times, and of the times before them. Thales, Pythagoras, all the Academicks, and Stoicks, and not many to be excepted, unless the Epicures, taught this Divinity (26).—As to the original of Dæmons, They were the Souls of men deified or canonized after death. Bial, or Bel, or Belus, was the first deified King: Hence Dæmons are called in Scripture Bialim. The Heathens fancied, that the souls of men took degrees after death: 1st They commended Heroes, who were as probationers to a Dæmonship; then, after a time sufficient, Dæmons; and after that, if they deserved well, to a more sublime degree. This order of Dæmons, or Soul-gods, was called by the elder Romans Penates, Lares, and Manii Dei; and when once they began to canonize their deceased Emperors (which was from the time of Augustus), they called them Divi.—But besides these Dæmons, their theologits bring in another kind of Dæmons more high and sublime, which had never been the souls of men, nor ever were linked to a mortal body, but were from the beginning, or without beginning, always the same. This sort of Dæmons doth fitly answer and parallel that sort of spiritual powers which we call Angels, as the former doth those which with us are called Saints (27).—The manner and way of worshipping the Dæmons and retaining their presence, was by consecrated images and pillars. Images were as bodies for Dæmons to animate and dwell in. The Sovereign and celestial Gods were worshipped in the sun, moon, and stars, where they were supposed to dwell: But Images and Columns were for Dæmons. Another piece of Dæmon-doctrine, was the worshipping of Dæmons in their reliques, shrines, and sepulchres. The Gentiles temples were nothing but the sepulchres of dead men (28).

In another place, he expresses himself in the following words, with respect to the Dæmoniacks mentioned in the Gospels.—'I make no question, saith he, but that now and then the same befalls other men, whereof I have experience myself, to wit, to marvel how these Dæmoniacks should so abound in and about that nation, [the Jewish] which was the people of God; (whereas in other nations and their writings we hear of no such;) and that too, as it should seem, about the time of our Saviour's being on earth only, because in the time before we find no mention of them in Scripture. The wonder is yet the greater, because, it seems, notwithstanding all this, by the story of the Gospel, not to have been accounted then by the people of the Jews any strange or extraordinary thing, but as a matter usual; nor besides is taken notice of by any foreign story. To meet with all these difficulties, (which I see not how otherwise can be easily satisfied) I am persuaded ('till I shall hear better reason to the contrary) that these Dæmoniacks were no other than such as we call Mad-men and Lunaticks:—Understand me to mean, not of delirium ex vi morbi [i. e. not delirious, or phrenetic], or of simple dotage, but Melancholici and Maniaci, [Melancholick, and raving mad;] whereunto add morbus Comitialis or falling sickness, and whatsoever is properly called Lunacy. Such as these, the Jews and Gentiles believed to be troubled and acted with evil spirits (29).—This passage seems to have given rise to the controversy between Dr A. A. Sykes, and his antagonists on the subject of Dæmoniacks.

[S] Intermixed with becoming cheerfulness and inoffensive pleasantry.] Some of his sayings are recorded by the author of his life, being as follows: That he who cannot hold his tongue can hold nothing (30). That he never found himself prone to change his hearty affections to any one, for mere difference in opinion (31). I cannot believe, said he, that Truth can be prejudiced by the discovery of Truth; but I fear that the maintenance thereof by fallacy or falsehood may not end with a blessing (32). Lastly, Such fellow-commoners, who came to the university only to see it and be seen in it, he called the University-tulips, that made a gaudy show for a while (33).

MIDDLETON [Sir HUGH], a publick-spirited man, and a very great Benefactor to the city of London by bringing the New River thither. He was a native of Denbigh in North Wales, and a Citizen and Goldsmith of London [A]. Though that great city was then furnished with water by means of sixteen common Conduits, besides the larger supply it received from the noble river Thames; yet they not being found sufficient, other methods were devised, to bring in fresh supplies. For that purpose, three acts of Parliament were obtained: one in the 10th of Queen Elizabeth, and the two others in the 3d and 4th of King James the First's reign; granting the citizens of London full power to bring a river from any part of Middlesex and Hertfordshire, to serve the city. But after several attempts, and long and deliberate consideration, the expence being looked upon as infinite, and the danger and difficulty extreme; the project was in a manner laid aside as impracticable. 'Till at length it was undertaken by the brave Hugh Middleton; in consideration of which, the city conferred upon him and his heirs, on the 1st of April 1606, the full right and power of the act of parliament, granted unto them in that behalf. Having therefore taken an exact survey of all springs and Rivers in Middlesex and Hertfordshire, he made choice of two springs; one in the parish of Amwell near Hertford, and the other called Chadwell, in or near the parish of Ware, both about twenty miles distant from London; and, having united their streams, conveyed them to that city, at a very great labour and expence (a) The work was begun February 20, 1608, and carried on through various soils [B], for a course of sixty miles [C], including all the windings. Near Enfield, it is conveyed, for the length of six hundred and sixty feet, between two hills, in an open trough, six feet wide, and two deep, supported by arches, whereof some are above four and twenty feet high: and at Highbury it is conveyed in another trough, 462 feet in length, and in height 17. The Bridges of all sorts, he was forced to erect over it, for convenient and necessary passages, are said to be no less than 800 [D]. 600 men were employed about it at once. But, notwithstanding the immense expence [E], the spite and derision of the vulgar and envious, the many causeless hinderances and complaints of persons through whose grounds the channel was to be cur, and many other difficulties and discouragements, the design was happily effected, by the brave and indefatigable Undertaker; and the water was brought into the cistern at Islington on Michaelmas-day, 1613 (b) [F]. Like all other Projectors, Mr Middleton greatly impaired his fortune

[A] And a Citizen and Goldsmith of London. He had considerably enriched himself, by a copper, or according to some, a silver mine in Cardiganshire, which he farmed of the Company of Mines Royal, at the rent of four hundred pounds per annum (1).

[B] And carried on through various soils Some was owze and mud; other extremely hard and rocky, where he was forced to cut his trench thirty feet deep; and in divers low and uncertain grounds he was compelled to add a strength by force of art. He was also obliged to make drains to carry off land-springs; and common sewers, sometimes over, and sometimes under his new river. It crosseth the great road at Ware, Stansted, Broxbourne, Chelthunt, Enfield, Hornsey, Islington, &c. where substantial Bridges were necessary. Yet he conquered all these Difficulties (2)!

[C] For a course of sixty miles It was computed to be about that distance, at the time it was made; but, by an exact mensuration of it's present course, taken by Henry Mill, (surveyor to the company) in 1723, it appeared to be only thirty-eight miles, three quarters, and sixteen poles in length; to which it was reduced by the contraction of it's sinuosities, above two miles (3)

[D] The bridges— he was forced to erect over it— are said to be no less than 800 So they might be computed at first, and undoubtedly they were more than at present. For, now, in and over it, there are only two hundred and fifteen bridges, and forty three sluices (4)

[E] But, notwithstanding the immense expence When he had brought the water into the neighbourhood of Enfield, almost his whole fortune was spent. Whereupon he applied to the Lord Mayor and Commonalty of London, to interest themselves in so great and so useful an undertaking. But they refusing, Mr Middleton applied next for assistance to King James the First. His Majesty, willing to encourage and support that great and noble work, did, by Indenture under the great seal, dated 2 May 1612, between him and Mr Middleton, covenant to pay Half the Expence of the whole work, past and to come. In consideration whereof, Mr Middleton, on the 2d of August following, conveyed to King James one Moiety of the whole undertaking. And it appears, that upwards of 6347 pounds were issued out of the Exchequer to Mr Middleton, on the King's account (5). In the Abstract of his Majesty's Revenue, printed at the end of Perfection (which is the Crowne of all Invention) swelling now high with happy welcomes to all the glad well-wishers of her admired Maturity, the Father and Maister of this Famous Worke, expressing thereby both his thankfulness to Heaven, and his zeale to the City of London, in true joy of heart to see his Time, Travailles, and Expences, so successively greeted, thus gives entertainment to that Honorable Assembly.

At their first appearing, the Warlike Musicke of Drummes and Trumpets liberally beates the Aire, sounds as proper as in Battell, for there is no Labour that Man undertakes, but hath a warre within it selfe, and Perfection makes the Conquest, and no few, or meane On-fets of Malice, Calumnies and Slanders hath this Resolved Gentleman borne off, before his labours were inveited with Victory, as in this following Speech to those Honorable Auditors then placed vpon the Mount, is more at large related.

fortune by this stupendous work; though it cannot be supposed to have been done at his sole expence, but he had very considerable help from King James the First; and to expresse his due regard for him, his Majesty knighted him, and afterwards created him a Baronet (c). What followed was a more substantial advantage; for the work being brought to so great forwardness, in order to perfect and compleat it: his Majesty, on the 21st of June 1619, granted his letters patent to Mr Hugh Middleton; Sir Henry Montague Knight, Chief-Justice of the King's-bench; Sir Thomas Middleton Knight, Alderman of London, brother, and Ralph Middleton son, of Hugh; five more of the surname of Middleton; and eighteen others; incorporating them by the name of 'The Governours and Company of the New River brought from Chadwell and Amwell to London;' empowering them to chuse a Governor, Deputy-governor, and Treasurer; to grant leases for twenty one years, or three lives, &c. (d). At which time it seems to have been divided into thirty six shares. The profit it brought in at first was indeed inconsiderable [G], and the charge very great: but, for many years it hath yielded a large Revenue; and is so valuable, that the shares in it fell for thirty years purchase. It were to be wished, that the ingenious and laborious Inventor had been able to secure a larger portion of its advantages to his family. Where, and when he dyed, we cannot learn. So bountiful and charitable was he, that he gave a share in his New River water to the Company of Goldsmiths in London, for the benefit of the poor Members of it, a very munificent and generous benefaction (e): This short account was due to the memory of Sir Hugh Middleton; whose name ought to be transmitted with Honour and Gratitude to posterity, as much as those of the builders of the famous Aquæducts. at Rome.

The second dividend amounted only to 3 l. 4 s. 2 d. and, instead of a third dividend, a call being expected; King Charles the First, who was in possession of the royal Moiety aforesaid, re-conveyed it again to Sir Hugh, by a deed under the great seal, of the 18th of November 1636; in consideration of Sir Hugh's securing to his Majesty, and his successors, a fee-farm-rent of Five hundred pounds per ann. out of the profits of the company, clear of all reprises. Sir Hugh charged that sum of 500 l. upon the holders of the King's shares (6).

(6) Maitland, as above, p. 629.

MIDDLETON [CONYERS] was born December 27, 1683, at Richmond in Yorkshire, where his father was Minister. He was possessed of a competent fortune, besides his preferment; and finding his son Conyers answer his expectations at school, he determined to give him the advantage of a liberal education. Upon this plan our author was sent to Trinity-college in Cambridge (a), where he was admitted a Pensioner January 19, 1700*, at the age of seventeen. In the second year from his admission he was chosen Scholar upon the Foundation, and proceeding at the regular time to take his degree of Bachelor of Arts, he entered, not long afterwards, into Deacon's Orders, and first exercised the clerical function at Trumpington, a celebrated village about a mile's distance from Cambridge †. Here he officiated for some time, as curate to one of the Senior Fellows of his college, and was himself elected into a Fellowship in 1705. About this time being much inclined to grow fat, he found some hinderance, from his rising corpulency, in the pursuit of those sports and exercises in which he took great delight, and in which, by a natural agility, he particularly excelled. This obstruction gave him so much uneasiness, that to remove it he changed his diet; but making too free with vinegar, threw himself by degrees into the contrary extreme, which at length brought a disorder upon him, that obliged him to a very abstemious degree of temperance †, as will appear in the sequel. In 1707 he commenced Master of Arts, and, two years afterwards, joined with several others of the Fellows of his college, in a petition to Dr John More, then Bishop of Ely, as their Visitor, against the famous Dr Bentley (b), their Master. This done, he entirely drew himself out of the reach of that master's iron rod, by entering into a marriage in a few months with Mrs Drake, a widow lady, possessed of an handsome fortune (c). However, as this gentlewoman resided in a house of her own at Cambridge, the match did not throw Mr Middleton out of the reach of his friends in the college. On the contrary, he persevered with that resolution that was natural to his temper, and which he was then persuaded the cause both required and deserved, to back the prosecution of their appeal to the Visitor. He had it now in his power to assert that cause with something more than bare impunity, and he was not wanting to add weight to his sentiments, upon Dr Bentley's mal-administration as well as his oppressive government. Hence he soon began to be distinguished by that Governor, as a main support of the complainants in his society against him, and esteemed the most dangerous enemy he had [A]. To this cause, as our author assures us, and not without great appearance of truth, it must be imputed, that we find an attempt early made by some of the Master's partizans to blast his reputation [B]. The impotence of this attack only served (as is usual in such cases) to make him

[A] Esteemed the most dangerous enemy he had.] After Dr Bentley had luckily escaped the effects of his prosecution at Ely House, by the death of Bishop More; the complaining Fellows, in 1715, presented a petition to the King (1), praying that a visitor might be assigned, in order to proceed against the Master, which was greatly promoted by Dr Middleton, who applied himself for that purpose, to all the great ones he could any way find access to. His resolution was not to be wrought upon by any means that were in the Master's power, who found some way or other to soften, or even to bring over almost all the rest of his opposers in the college. To this purpose he made one of the Fellows Senior Dean, after having accused him to the late Bishop More, of a publick and scandalous piece of immorality.—Another he took occasion to convict in a solemn manner, by the testimony of all the college, of being a common swearer and habitual drunkard; and without inflicting any punishment upon him for all this, he made him likewise, for the same end, not long after, senior Dean. In the same manner, he prevailed with the next who bore this office, whose name he had some time before covered upon the buttery books (2), for talking, as his spies informed him, against his arbitrary proceedings. He knew him to be a timorous poor spirited man, of much body, but little soul: and when, by the terror of this unheard-of punishment, he had brought him to an abject compliance to all his scandalous purposes, he then made him Senior Dean: and tho' he knew him much unqualified and incapacitated for it by the statutes, yet he was annually chosen into this place for four years successively, wherein, says our author, he played the courtier so well, as never once to be seen at morning-prayers during that whole time (3). Mr Miller, Serjeant at Law, and Fellow of the college, had been always, during his residence, a great opposer of the Master's designs, and was the chief manager of the prosecution against him at Ely House in 1714, for the carrying on of which, he was a great deal of money out of pocket, though he had received on that account above an hundred pounds from the college; he was soon afterwards ejected by the Master, or suspended from all the rights and profits of his fellowship, and had many years been labouring above, though to little purpose, to bring their quarrels to a decisive issue. But in the summer of 1718, the Master began to think it convenient to take off this old adversary, and made a proposal to him, that he should have 400 l. paid him on pretence of charges at the trial, besides most of the profits of his fellowship from the time of his suspension, if he would quit all his claim and title to it for the future, which the Serjeant consenting to, he undertook to procure him the money from the college.

[B] An impotent attempt to blast his reputation served to make him more popular.] Mr Middleton, with several other members of the university, were assembled on the third of July, 1710, at the Rose-Tavern to meet the honourable Mr Annesley, afterwards Earl of Anglesey, who, at this time, offered himself to that body for their representative in Parliament (4). This company were visited several times, and ordered to separate, without obeying the summons, by Mr [afterwards Dr.] Laughton, the celebrated Tutor of Clare-Hall, who was then Senior Proctor, a friend to Dr Bentley, and engaged with him in a contrary interest to Mr Annesley. The Proctor took minutes, and lodged a complaint for this contempt as he called it, of his office; which, being printed with a design to hurt our author's reputation, in 1719, was turned greatly to his advantage, by the following account of it which he published the same year (5).
 'But to examine this account, says he, of the Proctor's, a little more particularly. One of the persons, whom he found in this company at the Rose, appeared, he says, to have drunk to great excess, by the tone and accent of his voice, &c. His he pretends to have observed at his first coming amongst them, when yet at their parting about two hours afterwards, the whole reckoning amounted only to eighteen pence a piece, out of which, besides what was given away, some part was reserved and carried off unspent.

'Another, he tells us, was sitting indocently, without either his gown or cassock on, though he be in Priest's orders: Would not any man imagine from this description of his, that this clergyman had stripped himself to his waistcoat to drink with more ease and him more popular in the university; and he did not neglect to improve the occasion into an acquaintance and friendship with a few of the most eminent there in station and abilities (e). About this time he held a small rectory in the Isle of Ely, which was in the gift of his wife; however, he resigned it in little more than a year, on account of its unhealthy situation (f). He resided at Cambridge, when his late Majesty King George the First made a visit to the university in October 1717. Mr Middleton did not slip the opportunity of sharing in the King's bounty, though he was not then regularly of a sufficient standing, yet he easily procured himself to be named, among several others, in the royal mandate, for a degree of Doctor in Divinity, and was accordingly created to that degree shortly after by Dr Bentley, the Regius Professor. But an incident in this affair gave birth to a fresh dispute between these two antagonists, which ended first in the suspension, and then in the absolute degradation, of the Professor, by the University (g). This was a complete victory; and it cannot be denied, that the conqueror indulged his genius in the triumph, fearlessly trampling upon his adversary in three pamphlets which he published (b) on the occasion [C]. It was the first time of his coming into the press, and he was fair

‘ and coolness in a warm summer's evening? Yet there was nothing more in it than this, that having been to take the air on horseback, he came into company just as he alighted from his horse, in a riding habit, and with boots and spurs on.’

‘ When the Professor first drew up this complaint in writing, he found it proper to pass over in silence such of the company, whose names would effectually have demonstrated his rudeness; and in this printed edition of it, the names, for some special reasons, are dwindled only to two, viz. Mr Gooch of Caius college, and Mr Middleton of Trinity college. One of these is at present Vice-Chancellor of the university, whose character is too well known in the world to want any vindication; who has joined the accomplishments of a gentleman to those of a scholar; who with all the proper gravity and severity of the one, knows how to practise and allow every liberty, which becomes the other; whose magistracy has taught us, what difference there is between discipline and pedantry, reformation and ill manners.’

‘ The other, who from this representation of him might pass probably enough for a haunter of taverns, a lover of wine and debauch, has always been remarkable and exemplary in the university for the strictest temperance and regularity of life.’

‘ These are the rude and disorderly persons he complains of; these are the men, whose ill lives, according to Mr Sikes, are a reproach to us.’

‘ But these Gentlemen, however, are much obliged to him for the opportunity he has given of informing the world, that they had the honour to be found by him at this time in company with the present Earl of Angleley, who was then the shining ornament of the House of Commons, as he has since been of the House of Lords; a person much more distinguished by his great parts and abilities, than by his high birth and quality, whose friendship and conversation have always been the ambition and delight of the greatest and politest in the kingdom; and whose name and education amongst us will be remembered to all posterity, as the honour and glory of this university *.’

‘ There were besides, in this company, some others of great quality and character; the honourable Mr Windsor, Member of Parliament for the University; Sir J. Cotton, Baronet, Member of Parliament for the Town, with Doctors and Masters of Arts. This was the company (continues our author) when this zealous reformer came bolting into the room, about ten at night, with as much authority and as little ceremony, as if he had surprized a club of Sizors or Freshmen; he required them to be gone; declared he would not stir, till he had seen them pay their reckoning; brought all his young scholars in upon them, and encouraged the fauciness and rudeness, which some of them offered to the company: such treatment of persons of such distinction had never been before practised or heard of in the university. And it had been strange, if an insult so unusual had not been resented by the company with a just contempt and indignation. It was out of pure opposition to him, that they staid till the late hour he mentions of twelve o'clock, and did not break up till they had received three visits of the same kind from him.’

‘ They were not, however, provoked to shew any other incivility or disrespect to his person, than that of laughing at him pretty heartily; and though he complaints of this as an affront to his office, he must thank himself for it, it was impossible to be helped, it was but the natural and necessary effect of the great pains he took to make himself ridiculous.’

‘ We all remember a late Professor (6) in our schools, who when himself made the jest used to thunder at the scholars for rudely laughing at things so serious.’

[C] Fearlessly trampling upon his adversary in three pamphlets. The two first were occasioned partly by some letters that had been published in the St James's Evening-Post, where the proceedings of the university were censured as violent and illegal; and partly by a petition (7) against them, made by the degraded Master to the King in Council. As to the first, our author observes, that though ‘ he [Bentley] has magnificently said on this occasion, that he has rubbed through many a worse difficulty than this; yet he now seems caught in a net where his struggling will but entangle him the surer. The censure of an university, like a bearded arrow, sticks fast wherever it lights, heret lateri lethalis arundo, it galls but the more effectually for our violence in drawing it; or; to borrow a simile of his own, it is like Hercules's spear, and will stick to him till his funeral.’ As the two parties of Whig and Tory in the State ran very high about this time, and our author and his friend, happened then to be in the Tory interest, his antagonist did not neglect to push the merit of his loyalty as a Whig to the utmost. Mr Middleton rallies this part of his conduct very poignantly. ‘ In Trinity college, says he, when his [Bentley's] tyranny had raised a necessary prosecution of him by the Fellows: he threw himself upon the Whigs as a sufferer in their cause, and persecuted for his attachment to the then present Ministry (8) While the quarrel continued, the Ministry happened to change; and the same persons, who had been said in print to pursue him for being a Whig, were then cried out upon, for their malice to him as a Tory, and he had the address or good fortune to screen himself from justice by assuming that character. And his Dedication to the Earl of Oxford is hardly more awkward in it's panegyric upon his patron (9), than severe in it's satire upon the Whigs.’

‘ The controversy still out-lived the late Queen; which Fellows renewed their petition for a visitation, which has lain two years before the Council, but he now plays his old game upon them; is just come round to where he first set out, and the present Ministry is once more become the best with him. I cannot help, (continues our author) turning upon him another application of his own (10), which seems to have been suggested to him by his own conduct; his loyalty is a mere Empusa, it changes shapes as fast as Vertumnus:’

Mr Middleton proceeds to take notice of the Master's defiance of the university, and then concludes in the following manner: ‘ Even now, says he, when his [Bentley's] Mastership is precarious and at mercy, he threatens, I am told, with expulsion, those Fellows of his college, who, according to their privilege, their duty, and their conscience, gave their votes for his degradation; and when he was asked by a friend how he could justify it, I'll do it, says he, and let them get it undone if they can.’

far from losing any reputation by it. On the contrary, by these pieces he laid the first stone of that character, of a sprightly and spirited writer, which he afterwards built up to perfection. The success he had met with in these, encouraged him to venture upon a fourth, wherein, with the like intrepid keeness of stile, he exposed the conduct of his vanquished Hector [D] in his own college. His view was, to try if he could not bring such a general odium upon the late Dr (for so he was now empowered to call) Bentley, as should make it impolitic for the great ones to screen him any longer from a visitation; but, in this attempt, the warmth of his zeal transported him beyond the bounds of his knowledge, of which his watchful antagonist taking the advantage, lodged an information against him in the Court of King's-Bench [E], and shortly after put out proposals for publishing a new edition of the Greek Testament and Latin version. The work was such, as bespoke

' We may strip him of his titles, but we never can, we see, of his insolence; he has ceased to be Doctor, and may cease to be Professor, but he can never cease to be Bentley. There he will triumph over the university to the last; all its learning being unable to polish, its manners to soften, or its discipline to tame, the superior obstinacy of his genius.' And lest this should be thought the effect of disappointed malice, our author gives it all its force in the close: ' I have now, says he, given a full, and I am sure a true, account of this whole proceeding. There is not a single fact affirmed or insinuated in it, which Mr Bentley himself does not know to be true, and which, whenever he pleases, I cannot easily prove to be so: There is something so singularly rude and barbarous in his way of treating all mankind, that whoever has occasion to relate it, will, instead of aggravating, find himself obliged to qualify and soften the harshness of his story, lest it should pass for incredible (11). But if I am thought too free or severe upon a person so distinguished by his learning and preferences, it must be remembered, that it was he or his apologist, who first began the hostility, by abusing the Vice-Chancellor and University in two printed letters, which are scandalously false and malicious in every article of them: to observe a decency and complaisance towards him who has no notion of it, would be interpreted only as the cowardice or weakness of his adversary. A controversy with him must always be a fighting without quarter; for it is but necessary not to give any where you are sure of finding none *.'

[D] His vanquished Hector. In the interval, while Dr Bentley was treating the arrest that our author had obtained in the Vice-Chancellor's court with that contempt which in the end brought on his degradation, it happened that the candidates for fellowships in his college were under examination, when in the gaiety of his heart he gave them this theme for their exercise

It was part of Achilles's advice to Patroclus, to kill or fall upon the rest as he pleased, but to keep his hands off from Hector. This he designed, says Mr Middleton, as a witty insult upon the Vice-Chancellor, who might indeed controul and humble the rest of the university at discretion, but must not pretend to meddle with him †; our Hector was above his hand, and an over-match for him. But the reader is naturally drawn to throw his eye upon that Achilles, by the superior strength of whose arm this Hector, who had killed so many of his friends in the college, was at last subdued; and their loss revenged by dragging the character of the fallen hero through three triumphant pamphlets.

[E] Lodged an information against him in the Court of King's-Bench. This pamphlet is intitled, A true Account of the present State of Trinity-College in Cambridge, under the oppressive Government of their Master Richard Bentley, late D. D. There being no name to it, the information in the King's Bench was laid against the author or authors in general; but Dr Middleton, in order to save all needless charges, presently owned himself to be the author, in an advertisement (12), which he published in the news papers. Whatever truth there might be in the several articles of the charge, which is undeniably a very severe one, that he brings against the master, yet he had reason to be apprehensive of the consequences of this prosecution, from some strokes in this pamphlet. Speaking of the Master's state-principles, after having exposed his pliable temper, he proceeds thus: ' But how is it possible for a man who wants to be screened and saved from the pursuit of justice, which would ruin him, to be of any principle or party, but that which can give him immediate shelter and protection? he must necessarily throw himself upon that power, which alone can secure him. This is no more than what fact and experience will always confirm, as it has remarkably in this very instance; for ever since this prosecution of him began near twelve years ago, his principles have always run the same changes with court favours, and never yet out-last the ministry they were calculated for.'

' Every man of honour and integrity, of what denomination soever, cannot but abhor such a stuffing, selfish conduct: every honest Whig must certainly resent the affront done to his party by such scandalous pretenders to it. I know of none who can be friends to him out of principle, but such only as are professed or secret enemies to all-virtue and religion. It must be, without doubt, the utmost pleasure and satisfaction to them, to see him flourish and triumph over his adversaries; to see him abuse so successfully, to their service and interest, the great talents and opportunities that have been afforded him of doing good in the world; they will easily give him leave to write whatever he pleases, if he will but continue to live as he has done: for to see a Clergyman, Archdeacon, and Professor of Divinity, behave himself in the manner he does, is of such service, they know, to the cause of irreligion, as will out-balance twenty of his pamphlets against the free-thinkers †.'

' How far it may be for the service and credit of the government, to indulge this pleasure to such friends of his as these, I most humbly submit to the consideration of those, who preside over the great affairs of the kingdom, into whose hands, if this account should have the honour to fall, I desire them to remember, that it is not any matter of favour or grace, but justice only, we petition for: that it is not any new law (13) we want to relieve us, but the benefit and protection of the old ones: that it is not any act of power or authority we desire from them, but the common and natural right of every subject, a hearing and redress of our grievances.'—Our author was soon sensible that he had laid himself open to the lash of the law, and therefore took the first opportunity of making such a submission as he was in hopes would have some effect in softening the rigour of his sentence. This opportunity was soon given him in an answer to his remarks upon Dr Bentley's proposals for publishing a new edition of the Greek Testament. Dr Middleton made a reply to this answer, wherein he declares, that he never had writ any thing that reflected in any manner upon the Government, and then assures his antagonist, that he was provided with such affidavits as would be sufficient, though not perhaps, says ' he, to justify me to the law (which I did not at all understand, nor ever designed to offend), yet to justify me however to the world, from the least suspicion of having done him any injury (14).' At the same time his prosecutor was proceeded against in the university (15), in a way similar to that which he had taken in the court above, by Dr Colebatch, who, as our author's coadjutor, had been linked with him in Bentley's prosecution.

bestpoke the undertaker possessed of a very uncommon stock both of talents and materials. Dr Middleton, sensible that this part of his antagonist's character was the sole rock of his support, took pains to search narrowly into the merits of it; and discovering its weakness, made that conspicuously glaring even to such a degree, as both silenced and shamed the daring undertaker out of his project*. Here our author distinguished himself in a branch of literature, which was little dreamt of by his adversaries, and which even surprized his friends; who, considering him now as a sufferer for asserting the privileges, and vindicating the proceedings, of the university, first voted the erection of a new office there, that of Principal Librarian, and then conferred it upon him [F]. An occasion for taking this step offered itself, upon the prodigious enlargement of the publick library by the addition of Dr More the late Bishop of Ely's books, which had been purchased and presented by his Majesty (i) some time before to the university, and were now lately brought thither. That learned body had likewise passed a decree at the same time for building a new Senate-house, that, either by rebuilding or altering the old one, a suitable place might be provided for the reception of his Majesty's bounty (k). In the pursuit of that design, our new Librarian drew up a method of disposing the joint collection of both libraries in the projected edifice. The plan is allowed to be laid out properly, and the whole performance expressed in very elegant Latin, which were further proofs, that his late promotion was no more than what was justly due to his literary merit. But mindful of the particular cause which he knew had chiefly procured him this honour, and which he really had much at heart, he incautiously let fall, in the dedication of this piece to his steady friend Dr Snape, the Vice Chancellor, some words that were taken notice of and punished by the King's Bench [G]. Before this affair was brought to a final issue, our author formed a design of making the tour of Italy; and, as soon as he had got his liberty from that Court, he set about making the necessary preparations for putting it into execution. In this scheme there was no need of a diviner to forewarn him of the opposition he was certain to meet with from his inveterate antagonist, the Master of Trinity; and he was besides aware, that many of his friends might be startled with the talk of his going to travel abroad, so soon after they had provided such an honourable station for him to reside in at home. The truth is, the Librarian's place had been established long enough before there was any necessity for it: the foundation of the new Senate-house was scarcely laid, nor so much as the plan settled for altering the old one; consequently, with regard to the duty of his office, the Librarian was entirely at leisure, from the present state of the library (l), where the King's books, it was easy to see, must unavoidably remain in the same useless confusion they then lay, for a much longer time than would be spent upon his travels. This, in reality, furnished a sufficient excuse for his absence, but it was such an one, as it became himself, at least, to be very shy of mentioning. However, the ill state of his health supplied another, which was both unanswerable and indispenfible. He had

[F] First voted the erection of a new office—and then conferred it upon him.] He introduces his plan for disposing the books in the library in the following words: Postquam Senatui Academico novum Protobibliothecarii munus eodem decreto instituere simul & ad me deferre visum est, ne collati temere beneficii infamiam gravissimo ordini inurerem, statui illico omni studio, opera, viribusque meis eniti, ut tam honorifico vitæ meæ studiorumque testimonio aliquatenus responderem, & tanto hoc tamque insperato prorsus honore meemet haud indignum præstarem; utque omnibus præterea ostenderem, munus ipsum non mei solius, sed Bibliothecæ omnino causa, non (quod susurrari audiebam) pro gratiâ, qua in Academia florui, sed pro rei ipsius necessitate esse constitutum Here he owns it was whispered then by his enemies, that the Librarian's place had been erected purely for his sake: and afterward, when all these contents were forgotten, and his reputation was perfectly established, he does not spare to attest the truth of what those enemies had before given out. The passage I mean, is in his oration on his entrance into Dr Woodward's lecture, of which he was likewise Proto-Professor; the words are at the close of the speech, and run thus: *Me vero quod attinet Academici, ipse nonnullis fortunæ procellis jactatus, in hoc Academicæ otio, tanquam in portu, tutum semper atque honestum simul perfrugium inveni: Vos enim cum certorum hominum invidia indigne olim vexarer, novum in hoc Academia Protobibliothecarii munus eodem decreto instituis, et ad me detulistis**.

[G] Some words that were taken notice of and punished by the King's Bench.] Our author was already in this court as is above mentioned, for libelling the Master of Trinity. This was no more than a common cause not disputed to be within the ordinary jurisdiction of that court. Dr Middleton did not tax the legality of the process, but reproached his antagonist with the unscholarlike meanness of his conduct, in taking advantage of the Law. However, as it was natural for the Judges on this occasion to look, in their private capacity, into the other pieces by the same hand, it was easily observed that the author did not stand very well affected to it's prerogative. 'If, says he, the power of our courts, which we are so much envied for, were to be taken from us, or made only less absolute by the allowance of an appeal to a superior jurisdiction, our university might bid adieu to it's peace and it's discipline: the very nature and design of our institution made it necessary to every private founder of a college, strictly to prohibit all appeals from the authority of the society (16).' This might well be thought going too great a length, and must unavoidably render him suspected at least, by these magistrates: but the suspicion was unanswerably confirmed by the words in this dedication to Dr Snape, the Vice-Chancellor. Alii interea Doctores creandi jus nobis licet integrum permittant; de doctoratu tamen dejicere, de senatu nostro disturbare, suo nisi arbitrato & consensu haud patiuntur: rerumque adeo Academicarum cognitionem & judicium ad forum externum & prorsus alienum avocant: Quorum conatus ni repellere tandem ac propulsare valuerimus, lethale quoddam vulnus huic nostræ Academicæ infligatur necesse est (17). The words forum externum & prorsus alienum were laid hold of by the Court, who found in them an express, though not indeed an explicit, denial of their jurisdiction. Lord Chief Justice Pratt presided there at this time, who laid out the crime in the blackest colours. Our author was then in court, and being apprehensive of the consequences, he waited upon the Earl of — (to whom he was well known) and acquainting him with what he had heard, begged his Lordship's patronage. My Lord bid him be easy, and promised to take care of him. When the matter came next day before the court, our delinquent had the pleasure of hearing the heinousness of his offence moderated, and himself dismissed with a very easy fine.

now a good while felt the bad effects of that juvenile temerity which has been already taken notice of; he was actually grown extremely thin, and seemed to be in a dangerous marasmus from a continual spitting. In order, therefore, and to once to satisfy the most scrupulous of his friends, and silence the most clamorous among his foes, he laid his case before Dr Mead, who fully gave his opinion in writing, that it was necessary for his health that he should remove into a warmer climate. By this means, though not without a good deal of difficulty, he obtained a special grace for the purpose [H], and shortly after set out upon his much desired journey in company with Lord Coleraine (m). They went together to Paris, where his Lordship, who was known to most of the literati abroad, introduced his fellow-traveller to the celebrated Mr Montfaucon. Not many days after they parted from Paris, his Lordship stepping aside to see some curiosities that lay at a good distance from the direct road to Rome, left our author to pursue his own rout, which was to take the shortest way to that city*. He arrived there early in the year 1724, and passed about twelve months in it entirely to his satisfaction. On his first coming he met with an accident, which made him resolve to support his residence here in such a degree of dignity, as should be some credit to his station at Cambridge [I]. This, joined to his great fondness for antique curiosities, tempted him to trespass a little upon his fortune; but that damage was much more than compensated, by the prodigious improvement that he made in his travels. He returned through Paris in the latter part of the year 1725, and arrived at Cambridge before Christmas. He was scarce well fixed in his study here, when Dr Mead's Harveyan speech fell under his observation and censure. The subject of his animadversions was nothing more than some points of pure literature, and he was careful to declare the integrity of his motive to the undertaking; yet that eminent Physician, knowing what had passed between them just before our author's departure for Italy, could not be persuaded that his speech, in itself absolutely harmless and inoffensive, would have been thus culled out, as a mere block, for the animadverter to shew his scholarship upon [K], had there not been the farther pleasure of a private gratification in it. Wherefore, easily excusing himself, on account of his great business, from engaging in a controversy, he employed an advocate (n) to defend his reputation, and expose the malice of the attack, which was executed in very rude language. Our author, who had been trained up in this kind of exercise, repaid his adversary's feeble rhetoric with equal acrimony of stile; but the superior genteel spirit and elegant diction with which it was pointed, effectually convinced the by-standers, that this select champion was no match for him; for which

[H] By this means, though not without a good deal of difficulty, he obtained a special grace for the purpose. It was not only the high character that Dr Mead deservedly bore in his profession, he had here another kind of merit which helped to procure him this patient. He was well known to be a fast friend and patron and great admirer of Dr Bentley, whose humour it was now necessary to consult. In this view Dr Middleton took an opportunity, when his law-suit called him to town, of waiting upon that eminent Physician, who observed his case to be a catarrh, upon a relaxation of the salivary glands, and agreed that a warmer climate would be of service to him. This was enough to satisfy his friends: but when he began to think of drawing up his grace for leave of absence from the Body, it was observed that it would be proper for him to have the opinion in writing; otherwise, his powerful antagonist might probably find a way to defeat it. Dr Mead being applied to in a proper manner by a young Physician of good reputation (18), made no difficulty to comply with an ordinary rule of practice, in setting his hand to an opinion he had given before. No sooner did the news of this paper reach Dr Bentley's ears, but he immediately let his friend know what a disagreeable thing he had unexpectedly done to him. To this Dr Mead returned an answer, wherein he excused himself in such terms, as the Librarian thought he had just reason to resent, and it was not long before there was matter enough given him to feast his resentment upon, as the reader will find in the text.

[I] On his first coming he met with an accident, &c. He made use of this character to get himself introduced to his Brother-Librarian at the Vatican, who received him with great politeness; but upon his mentioning Cambridge, said he did not know before, that there was any university in England of that name, and at the same time took notice, that he was no stranger to that of Oxford, for which he expressed a great esteem. This touched the honour of our new Librarian, who took some pains to convince his brother not only of the real existence, but of the real dignity of his university of Cambridge. At last, the Keeper of the Vatican acknowledged, that, upon recollection, he did indeed remember to have heard of a celebrated school in England of that name, which was a kind of nursery where young were educated and prepared for their admission at Oxford: and Dr Middleton left him at present, in that sentiment. But this unexpected indignity to his post put him up on his mettle, and he agreed to give 400 l. per ann. for a bôtel with all accommodations fit for the reception of those of the first rank in Rome*.

[K] Culled out as a mere block for the animadverter to shew his scholarship upon. The following specimen of the taste and turn of this attack will be thought, we hope, a sufficient justification for the seeming harshness of our expression. * Meadius autem, ne si nihil omnino de ignobili medicorum veterum statu fateretur, obritatum nimis & pervicacem sese ostenderet; concedere tandem aliquid videtur, sed tanta verborum obscuritate involutum & quasi vi extortum, ut sensum inde vix ullum quidem nedum clarum & distinctum elicere facile valeamus: ejusque ideo verba integra huc apposui, ut solentior aliquis ea mihi expedienda suscipiat.

Hæc ille; sed ut mihi quidem videtur cum verbis tum sententiis sibi ipsi plane repugnans: ut enim alia omittam; ego sane haud intelligo, quemadmodum ii, qui e Græcia sponte quidem venissent, atque in Divitum clientelam sese contulissent, servos deinde Romæ agere, iidemque magnatum clientes & servi simul esse possent? reason, when a second piece appeared from the same hand, and notoriously woven with the same course thread as the first, Dr Middleton took the advice of his friends, not to support the reputation of the Professor by opposing him. However, some years after these antagonists were both reconciled to him, and lived even in a good degree of friendship with him [L]. For some years after his return from Rome, the doctor held a literary correspondence with his acquaintance there (o). He made use of that opportunity of getting some particulars cleared up, where he found the notes he had taken in his travels either deficient or confused. To this cause chiefly it was owing, that he deferred publishing that account of the Gentilism of the Popish religion, which he gives in his letter from Rome, 'till the year 1729. But he had no sooner dispatched this work, than he entered into another; where, in condemning Dr Waterland's method of defending the Christian cause, he first disclosed his opinion concerning the divine original of the Scriptures, which was, that the several writers of the Gospel were not only (for the most part at least) unassisted by any divine inspiration in penning their histories, but have actually related several false facts in those books [M]. This being thought a very dangerous assertion by the generality of the Clergy, drew upon him the odium of a great part of that body, with some of whom he continued in a state of warfare during the rest of his life; which proved an effectual bar to his promotion in the Church. However, this did not hinder others from discerning and encouraging his uncontested merit as a polite scholar. Soon after his arrival from Italy, he had fallen into the acquaintance of Dr Woodward, Professor of Physick at Gresham, who had then formed the design of founding his new Physiological professorship at Cambridge. Our author was not wanting to encourage so advantageous and honourable a benefaction to the university; and, in the several interviews which he had with the benefactor, as well as his executors, was very serviceable in settling the plan of that donation (p). It was with the greatest justice, therefore, that the trustees of it appointed him the first Professor in December 1731. Nor did the Latin speech (q), spoken by him on this occasion, fall short of giving that credit to their nomination which was expected from it. He held this office, and faithfully discharged the duties of it (r), 'till 1734, when he resigned upon the marriage of his second wife (s). About this time he was introduced to Lord Harvey, who shortly after engaged him to write the History of Cicero's Life. This was a favourite task, he undertook it with singular delight, and spent six years in working up the character of his darling old Roman to that perfection, which alone in this subject he could be content with. As it is the largest, so it is generally reputed the best, of his performances. He printed it by subscription, and the uncommonly great number of subscribers (t) shew how high his reputation then stood in the [L] Was reconciled and lived even in a good degree of friendship with him.] In the whole course of this controversy he had always expressed a proper regard for Dr Mead's real merit; and many years after, viz. in 1745, when he printed his book of the Greek and Egyptian antiquities, he concludes the introduction to the account of an antique painting in his own collection, with the following eulogium of that eminent Physician, and no less eminent Collector of Antiquities.

Meadius noster, artis medicæ decus qui vitæ revera nobilis, vel principibus in republica viris, exemplum præbet, pro eo, quo omnibus fere præstat artium veterum amore, alias postea quasdam imagines & splendidiore, opinor, Roma quoque deportandas curavit †. [M] His opinion that the writers of the Gospel were not only, for the most part at least, unassisted by any divine inspiration, but have actually related several false facts.] 'Tis true all that he asserts here is, that the scriptures are not of absolute and universal inspiration (20). But in another piece printed since his death, he first asserts several falsehoods in these writings, and then maintains it to be utterly incredible, that persons inspired and specially commissioned by God to propagate a particular doctrine, and supplied consequently with proofs the most authentic and demonstrative of truth, could on any account be reduced to make use of trifling or equivocal arguments; much less of such as are false and groundless. Yet, says he, if this should in any manner be thought probable, in an occasional conference or debate with private persons [the Jews] who had been trained and accustomed to that sort of reasoning, it is surely inconsistent with any notion of inspiration to publish such arguments in writing to all the world, and to all posterity, as the standing and perpetual proofs of the Christian doctrine, which they knew in reality to be no proofs at all, except to a few particular Jews at those very times; and which, instead of doing service to religion; could serve only for matter of doubt and cavil to all succeeding ages. Again, if we should ask, continues he, how it appears, that the Apostles were actually inspired in their interpretation of these prophecies? it will be answered, I suppose, because they wrought miracles: and so far indeed I agree, that in the act of working miracles, they were certainly inspired with an extraordinary power; but when that act was over, and the special purpose of those miracles served, it is reasonable to believe from the evidence of those facts, which I have elsewhere set forth, that they returned to the condition of mortal men.—Again, the hypothesis of their [the Gospels] inspiration was piously invented to reflect the greater lustre upon them, where there was not the least want of it, since nothing more is required to establish their authority, than to know, as we do in this case, that the compilers of them were perfectly informed of all the important facts, which they had undertaken to relate, and zealous to publish them for the common good: while many little omissions and inaccuracies, which are observable in their several narratives, clearly shew, that they could not be guided by a divine and infallible spirit. In another place he confirms his argument against a perpetual inspiration, by a way of reasoning which infers no inspiration at all, viz. that the Evangelists never lay any claim to it; nay, so far are they from pretending to any such privilege, that they in effect disclaim it; placing their whole credit on a foundation merely human and common to all other writers, on their knowledge of the truth of what they deliver, and on their fidelity in delivering it to the best of their knowledge; in which respect he expressly ranks them with Herodotus and Thucydides. This assertion he further confirms by the accounts which the Ancients give of these four several authors, which is utterly inconsistent, he says, with the notion of their being divinely inspired (21). Hence it is evident, that when he declares his belief that the Scriptures in general are divinely inspired (22), these words, when applied to the Evangelists, must be understood by him, (to use a phrase of his own) in a very moderate and qualified sense.

the learned world. While he was employed upon this work, he had, it seems, a sudden call to London, to look after the Mastership of the Charter-house, having been mentioned for it, as he says himself, without his application, by Sir Robert [Walpole] and some other great ones; but on his arrival in town he presently perceived, that the Duke of Newcastle had been beforehand with them, in securing it for Mr Mann, an old friend and companion of Lord Godolphin. 'So that I returned, says he, as I have been forced to

However, he sensibly felt the fruits of their friendliness to his Cicero, which enabled him to purchase a small estate at Hildersham, where he had the much loved pleasure of gratifying his own taste and temper, by improving a rude farm into a neat and genteel villa. It lay about six miles, a commodious distance, from his house at Cambridge, and he passed the summer season chiefly at it during the rest of his life. Cicero's History had scarcely seen the light, when his character, as represented therein was impeached (w), in that most interesting article of his conduct, which enabled Octavius to compleat the destruction of the Roman liberty. It was not long before our author undertook his patriot's defence; wherein he vindicated the old Roman from the suspicion of inconsistency, by such a kind of presumption in his favour, as, 'tis observed on another occasion, he did not think the Evangelical writers had a just claim to [N]. However, he gave in this work such a specimen of a translation of some contested epistles between Brutus and Cicero, as made it much to be wished he had gone through the whole collection of the uncontented epistles

(w) By Mr Tunstall, Fellow of St John's college in Cambridge.

[N] Defended Cicero by an argument which he did not think the evangelical writers had a just claim to. The argument for Cicero is in note (3), to the 15th epistle in this collection, being that of Brutus to Atticus; where Brutus particularly complains of Cicero's conduct in respect to Octavius: wherein, amongst other things, he charges Cicero with carrying his indulgence of Octavius too far, as not, says he, to abstain from opprobrious language, and such as reflects doubly upon himself, since he has taken away the life of more than one, and must first confess himself to be an assassin, before he can reproach Casca with what he objects to him; and treat Casca as Bestia once treated him. In the note Dr Middleton observes, that 'this refers to some words which had passed between Cicero and Casca, one of the conspirators who gave the first blow to Cæsar, yet was Tribune of the people at this very time, by virtue of Cæsar's nomination. The passage seems to imply, that Cicero had reproached him for killing Cæsar, and called him an assassin; but that is incredible, since Cicero, on all occasions, as well in publick speeches as private letters, never failed to extol that act as the most glorious that was ever executed; and with regard to this very Casca, had refused to enter into any measures with Octavius, but upon the express condition, that he would be a friend to the conspirators, and as a proof of it, would suffer Casca, in consequence of Cæsar's nomination, to enter into quiet possession of the tribunate [Ep. ad Att. 16. 13.]. Brutus therefore, who was now in Macedonia, had either been mis-informed, or was charging Cicero with some consequential meaning of his words, which was never intended by him. He had been admonishing Casca possibly, to carry himself with more moderation towards Octavius, left by advantage of his present power, he might take occasion to treat him as an assassin, and put the laws in execution against him, as he did quickly after against all the conspirators; for such an admonition would have been sufficient, with one of Brutus's fierce spirit, to make him consider it, as a direct condemnation of Casca's act [See Life of Cicero Vol. 2. p. 487. notes]. But if we reflect upon the miserable waste that has been made in these letters, of which, there are but twenty-three now left out of eight original books; and that there are three books likewise to Octavius, three more to Panfa, and three to Hirtius, [vid. fragm. Ciceron, apud Andr. Patric.] all relating to the same times, and all now destroyed; it cannot be thought strange, that some few facts should be touched in these fragments, which cannot readily be accounted for; when we have lost all the helps, that were the most likely to explain them, and which in all probability, had actually explained them (23).'

In this remark our Annotator allows, the words of Brutus in their plain and obvious sense imply, that Cicero had reproached Casca with having killed Cæsar; but because such an action would be inconsistent with the rest of Cicero's conduct, he thinks that ground enough to carry the words from their primary sense, by a conjecture wherein he indulged a liberty of inventing an imaginary circumstance, because the fact might possibly admit it. But if that be not allowed, he thinks it reasonable to suppose, without any authority from history, that Brutus has here omitted mentioning some circumstance in the fact, which would have cleared Cicero from this aspersion*. Now let us see how he reasons in a like case with respect to the Gospel Historians. It will be proper to give it in his own words, because the different gaiety of the colouring shews the different temper of the painter in drawing the two different subjects. 'The story, says he, of the two thieves, who were crucified together with Jesus, is related also in the several Gospels, with a very remarkable difference. Matthew and Mark tell us only in short, that, both the thieves, as they were hanging with him on the crosses, insulted and reviled Jesus: whereas Luke more particularly declares, that it was but one of them who reviled him, while the other acted a contrary part, and having rebuked his fellow-sufferer for his insolence, said unto Jesus, 'Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom (24).

'The critics again, continues he, both ancient and modern, take great pains to elude the charge of a contradiction, but none have been so hardy, as Cardinal Hugo, who, as he is cited by Erasmus, treats this passage in Matthew, as little better than a lie; or such an account as one would expect from a man in his cups (25). St Chryostom and Jerom, and all the Ancients, allow a seeming contradiction in the words, but attempt to clear the Evangelists of it, by supposing that both the thieves blasphemed Jesus at first, till one of them convinced by the prodigies, which then happened, of the sun darkened, and the earth trembling, quickly changed his note, and from a sudden conversion and repentance, implored his mercy; which solution, though embraced by many of the Moderns (26), is justly rejected by others, as a groundless and scissitious (27) comment. For what contradiction, how gross soever, might not easily be solved and eluded, if such a method of interpreting were allowed, which without any authority from history, indulged a liberty of inventing and supplying every imaginable circumstance which the fact could possibly admit (28).'

The application is easy, and the reason obvious, how it comes to pass, that Cicero's express approbation on other occasions of Casca's action in killing Cæsar, makes it reasonable to supply, from Brutus's fierceness, without any authority from history, such an imaginary circumstance as is allowed to contradict the primary and plain sense of his words on this occasion, notwithstanding the known timorousness and vanity of Cicero's composition; and yet the confessed integrity of St Matthew in all cases, is not sufficient to support the supposition of a circumstance in this, the thief's conversion, which the case itself, by the miracles that happened naturally offers; because there is no direct authority for it from history.

* Our author's partiality to Cicero is notorious, inasmuch, that Mr Melmouth stills him that orator's learned and able pansyrist, and excuses him on account of Cicero's great deservings from all men of letters. epistles of that renowned orator. But he was now determined to close his studies in profane literature. In this design he began to put together, and prepare for the press, such of his papers as related to any subject he had a mind to compleat in that way. These he published in two pieces. The first contained the figures of those antique rarities he had purchased at Rome, with a proper dissertation to each of them [O]. In the second he threw into a continual discourse, the substance of several letters he had wrote to Lord Harvey, twelve years before, upon the constitution of the Roman Senate; wherein he has undoubtedly given a more satisfactory answer to his Lordship's question about the manner of creating Senators, which he asserts always to have been in the power of the people, than had been given to Lord Stanhope by Mr Vertot, who supposes it was solely in the hands of the Senators. In 1745, at the request of the Earl of Radnor, he undertook the care of his nephew, and was preceptor to that young gentleman 'till he died, to the great loss of that noble family. As soon as the doctor had satisfied all the demands of his friends with regard to classical subjects, he immediately printed his Introduction to the Free Inquiry into the Miracles of the Primitive Church; which treatise itself was likewise, as he tells us, then ready for the press. The whole was a continuation of his former plan, to expose Dr Waterland's manner of defending Christianity, which he observed still to prevail, notwithstanding his first endeavours to bring that author into contempt, whose cause was particularly espoused against our author by the then Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr Potter *. About this time he went to Bristol wells, where he fell into company with a gentlewoman, whose good sense and genteel temper engaged him to make her the partner of his bed and fortune. She was the relict of a Bristol Merchant, Mr Wilkins (x), after whose death Mrs Trenchard had given her an invitation to her house, where the match was concluded on †. The last piece which the doctor published was, An Examination of the present Bishop of London, Dr Sherlock's, Discourses on the Use and Intent of Prophecy in the several Ages of the World. But here, though it was the same scheme of Christianity which he had before defended against Dr Waterland, that pushed him into this contest with the Bishop, yet his particular situation in the engagement was now very different [P]. Dr Sherlock had been an old friend [Q] and intimate acquaintance, his abilities

[O] With a proper dissertation to each of them.] In the xth Section of his dissertation upon Tab. xix he observes, that the word Quincunx does not signify a real single piece of money, but a fictitious one; in forming which, an ounce is either supposed to be taken away from the semissis, or else added to the triens; nor does our author think the word Quincunx ought to be taken in any other sense in the following passage in Horace.

Romani pueri longis rationibus affem
Discunt in partes centum diducere. Dicit
Filius Albinus, si de quincunce remota est
Uncia, quid superet? poteras dixisse triens, Eu!
Semis——(29)

But though we should allow there was no such piece of money as the Quincunx, yet Horace here evidently puts the case of a boy learning arithmetick, whence it seems most natural to suppose the question given in writing. The semissis then, according to the Roman way, is expressed thus, VI. whence, if the unit or uncia be moved back, which is the original sense of the word removes, the expression will be IV or triens, and restoring the unit to it's place, there appears VI or semissis (30).

[P] But his particular situation in it was very different.] He was admitted in the university the same year with Dr Waterland, and the quickness of his apprehension, as well as the sociable turn of his temper, being the counterpart of Dr Waterland's plodding diligence, which seemed to be a reproach to him, he naturally conceived first a dislike to the severity of his diligence, and then a disdain and contempt of that student's capacity, which he retained ever after: and was not only never sparing to declare it as long as his antagonist lived, but even followed him to his grave, over which he could not refrain from strewing some choice flowers. The Church, says he, to Mr Warburton, has received a great loss by the death of Dr C——d; I cannot say an irreparable one, whilst C——n lives: to whom he has left some unfinished papers on infant-communion, and wisely ordered all the rest to be burnt: he has bequeathed likewise to the college, such of his printed books, as they find scribbled by his own hand; for such, I hear, is his own description of them. By the silence of the publick papers upon the fall of so eminent a luminary, we are to expect, I imagine, in a proper time, some laboured panegyrick from a masterly hand.—But as to Waterland, whenever they think fit to oblige the publick with his life, they will not forget one story, I hope, which is truly worthy of him, and shows the real spirit of the man, and which I can venture to tell you on good authority. In his last journey from Cambridge to London, being attended by Dr P——e and C——n the surgeon; he lodged the second night at Hodsdon, where being observed to have been coisive on the road, he was advised to have a chyster, to which he consented. The Apothecary was presently sent for, to whom Dr P——e gave his orders below stairs, while Dr W——d continued above; upon which the Apothecary could not forbear expressing his great sense of the honour which he received, in being called to the assistance of so celebrated a person, whose writings he was well acquainted with; the company signified some surprize, that a country Apothecary should be so learned; but he assured them that he was no stranger to the merit and character of the doctor, but had lately read his ingenious book with much pleasure, The Divine Legation of Moses. Dr P——e and a Fellow of Magdalen college there present, took pains to convince the Apothecary of his mistake, while C——n ran up stairs with an account of his blunder to W——d, who provoked by it into a violent passion, called the poor fellow a puppy and a blockhead, who must needs be ignorant in his profession, and unfit to administer any thing to him, and might possibly poison his bowels; and notwithstanding Dr P——e's endeavours to moderate his displeasure, by representing the expediency of the operation, and the man's capacity to perform it, he would bear nothing in his favour, but ordered him to be discharged, and postponed the benefit of his chyster, 'till he reached his next stage.' With such wretched passions, says Dr Middleton, and prejudices, did this poor man march to his grave; which might deserve to be laughed at, rather than lamented, if we did not see what pernicious influence they have in the Church, to defame and depress men of sense and virtue, who have had the courage to despise them (31).

[Q] Dr Sherlock had been his old friend.] He has discovered the very unsuitable state of his mind in which this piece was wrote, in no one instance more than in his conduct to his old friend, upon some conversation that had passed formerly in confidence between them. In conversing formerly, says he, on this subject [Moses's account of the fall of Man], eminently distinguished, and his book an illustrious proof and credit to his abilities; no wonder, then, if our author did not appear in this trial so much to his advantage as formerly [R]. This piece came out in January 1749-50, and, in a few months, his constitution began to break very remarkably, by a slow hectic fever and a disorder in his liver; and his legs swelling shortly after, visibly indicated his approaching end, which he himself was very sensible of. In these circumstances he went to London, where his friend and Physician Dr Heberden had been settled a few years before. He had long experienced at Cambridge the success of that gentleman's skill, in which he had the greatest confidence (y); he staid several days with the doctor at his own house, to see if there was any hopes of relief from physic; but finding his case desperate, he retired to his villa at Hildersham, where, not long after, he died on the 28th of July 1750, in the 67th year of his age, and was interred in his own parish of St Michael in Cambridge. In 1751, there was published a Vindication of his Free Inquiry, which he persevered in writing 'till within a few days of his death, but left it unfinished. Several other posthumous pieces were collected and printed the following year, together with all his works, except the History of Cicero's Life, in four volumes, 4to. Dying without issue*, he left his widow possessed of his estate, which was really not inconsiderable, notwithstanding a disadvantageous rumour that was spread about of it presently after his death; for which there was no other ground, but that the doctor happened to die before he had put an end to a dispute he had with his Builder, on account of some small alterations he made in the first plan of his house at Hildersham, after the work was entered upon. As to his person, he was of a proper middle stature, and a thin habit; his eye very lively, but small; he was a little out-mouthed; of a manly complexion; and, to use the Painters phrase, there was a very expressive motion in every feature, though his whole deportment was composed to gravity. The early contests which he entered into in his college, being carried on with superior power, craftily employed on Dr Bentley's side, and attended with a very unsteady conduct in his own party, gave him an habitual watchfulness ever after over his nearest friends. He had pride enough to make himself tolerably easy under the disappointments which his religious principles threw in the way of his ambition, and spleen enough to preserve his stability in those principles. The character he formed for himself as the most eligible was, to make the scholar agreeable by polishing him with the gentleman, and to give weight to the man of sense by uniting him to the man of virtue; in the cause whereof, though the pious, humble, and orthodox Christian was far from being neglected, yet he was by no means principally in his view [S]. In the latter end of his life, Sir John Frederick presented

(y) In a letter to one of his friends he expresses himself thus, in respect to this gentleman. By Dr Heberden's removal to London from us, I have received a great and particular loss, which I shall ever feel. Vol. II. p. 495. of his Works, ubi supra.

• with a certain great prelate, he said that he looked upon the literal and the allegorical interpretation of the account of the Fall, to be of equal force and merit with respect to their use, or application to Christianity.—I understood him then to mean, what I still take to be the sole meaning of his words, which carries any sense in it: that though the simpler sort of Christians generally interpret this story in it's gross and literal sense, while the more knowing and liberal look upon it as a fable or allegory; yet both of them acknowledge the same end in it, draw the same doctrine from it, and consider that doctrine whether delivered allegorically or historically, as the foundation of their common religion.

• If I should name this prelate, his Lordship, I am sure, would own his authority to be justly great with all men, and greater still with himself, than with any. Yet when he comes to handle the same story, neither the letter nor the allegory can satisfy him. This reflection needs no comment, it carries it's condemnation written upon it's forehead.

[R] Did not appear so much to his advantage as formerly.] He expressly declares that he came to his Lordship's discourses, possessed with personal prejudices against him. 'I entered, says he, and found this capital work of his Lordship to be just such as I expected, exhibiting a species of reasoning peculiar to himself, very subtle and refined, yet never convincing, and proper rather to perplex, than to illustrate the notion of prophecy, and to amuse, rather than instruct, an inquisitive reader. I found much art and pains employed to dress up an imaginary scheme, of which I had not discovered the least trace in any of the four Gospels.' After this introduction, he falls upon some words in a preface, which, though dropt by his Lordship after the third edition of his book, yet this he asserts, was the only edition he had then seen, which if allowed to be true, because possible, plainly betrays such a want of patience and common prudence, in not making an ordinary enquiry into it, as is too evidently the effect of passion and anger. But he goes still farther, and assures us, in a note (32), that he had since learnt that there were two later editions in which the preface is omitted. Now though such a discovery would have determined a man of sense and a gentleman, to have suppressed any examination of the preface that he had made before that discovery; yet our author in his present circumstances so far forgets himself, as to make this a handle for guessing out several aspersions, which being confessedly grounded upon mere conjecture only, he would, in a better disposition, no doubt have seen, must naturally defeat his attempt to lessen his Lordship's established reputation by this work, which was the thing, as he expressly suggests, that gave him the highest offence, and even put him past his patience. The note referred to, is too long to be inserted here, but we shall transcribe one passage from it, since he therein discovers a kind of weakness, which never, as I remember, had escaped his caution before. 'His Lordship, says he, had some motive undeniably, for taking a step so unusual, so the reader will naturally be guessing, what it might probably be, and many will be apt to think that the passage which I have cited, carried in it so direct a condemnation of that use of single and separate prophecies which was made by the Evangelists, that it was omitted for that very reason, as tending to raise scruples in people's minds, to the disadvantage of his Lordship's scheme.' Thus the Bishop is supposed to withdraw this preface, from a sense of the force of our author's argument in his pamphlets against Dr Waterland, to shew the use which was made of independent prophecies by the Evangelists. A degree of vanity which is not to be met with any where else, as I remember, in his writings. Several other marks besides those we have taken notice of, appear in this pamphlet, of such a degree of inattention or imprudence, as shew, we presume, some decay in the natural vigour of his mind, and the breaking of his constitution presently after will 'tis conceived, be thought, by some, a further evidence of the probability of the insinuations in the text.

[S] The pious, humble, and orthodox Christian, was by no means principally in his view] In his 7th letter to Mr Warburton, he has these words (33): 'I can easily imagine that you have suffered in the opinion of that person (34), and many others of the same stamp for your charitable opinion of me.' And afterwards he concludes thus: 'No, my friend, as long as presented him to a small living in Surrey (z), which he held 'till his death, as he did likewise the post of Principal Librarian to the university; being succeeded in that office by Dr Paris, Master of Sidney-Suffex-college. The doctor, a little before his death, had formed a design of composing an exact History of his Works, with the Occasions and Circumstances of them; but this he did not live to execute (a a). There were also found among his papers some materials for a Life of Demosthenes, correspondent to that of Cicero.

' you can love a man, because he is amiable, and think him honest, who is not perhaps orthodox, or a lover of truth, who hates a pious fraud and sanctified lye, you may enjoy the comfort of a good conscience and good company, but must not expect, after a life of virtue and study, to slumber in the stalls, and refresh your old age in the sun-shine of the Church.' This is far from being the only passage in the doctor's works, where the word virtue is affectedly made use of to express his religion (35); but as we see it here in a private letter to a friend, where, if at all, we may expect to find his real sentiments undisguised, it is selected from the rest as the surest proof of this part of his character in the text. He knew very well that his brethren of the clergy in general pronounced him a Deist. This he constantly treated with contempt as a calumny, and the pure effect of their malice. 'It is certain in his writings he more than once declares himself a believer; yet to speak impartially, in pursuance to the plan of these memoirs, it cannot be denied that he gave too much reason to suspect that the extent of his faith was

The want and destitution of the least air of piety or humility in his writings, is indeed the greatest defect in them, which is rendered too conspicuous, by confronting any of his disputations with Archbishop Tillotson's answer to Mr Serjeant's Sure Footing; where untainted piety, adorned with unaffected sprightliness, takes sure hold of the heart and affections, while the strictest reasoning convinces the understanding; and the whole gains still more upon us, when, upon a second reading, the noble spirit comes to be discerned, whereby all shew of learning is kept as much as possible out of sight; of which Dr Middleton is never sparing to make a decent parade. Whence we are apt to think, that however fair the pretences are which he makes of intending nothing more than a laudable and liberal philosophical disputation, solely for the sake of searching out truth, yet this view was strongly tainted with the scholastic vain glory of carrying victory and triumph over his antagonist. P

MILDMAY [Sir WALTER], Chancellor and Under-Treasurer of the Exchequer, and Founder of Emmanuel-college, in Cambridge, in the XVIth century. He was the fourth son of Thomas Mildmay of Chelmsford, Esq; [A] by Agnes his wife, daughter of . . . Read (a). He had his Academical education in Christ's-college in Cambridge, to which he afterwards became a benefactor, and where he made a great proficiency in learning (b). In the reign of King Henry the Eighth, he was Surveyor of the Court of Augmentation [B]; and February 22, 1546-7, two days after the coronation of King Edward the Sixth, was made one of the Knights of the Carpet. He was afterwards in commission with the Earl of Warwick and Sir William Herbert, to hear and determine all accounts and reckonings of the King's mints within the realm (c). In the 7th of King Edward the Sixth, 1552, he served as Burgefs in parliament for the town of Maldon in Essex (d): and, the year after, was in commission to survey and peruse the state of all the King's courts erected or kept for the custody of the King's lands, and for the answering or payment of any manner of rents and revenues, &c. He was also Warden of the Mint, and acted in several commissions in that reign for the disposition of divers lands, and the management of the King's revenues (e). When bloody Queen Mary came to the throne, he concealed his affection to the Protestant religion, and was very little concerned in affairs in that reign (f); though he was a burgefs in her first Parliament for the city of Peterborough (g), and one of the Knights for the county of Northampton, in 1557, the 4th of Philip and Mary (h). Upon Queen Elizabeth's accession, he was again employed in state-affairs, and in the first year of her reign, 28 March 1559, was commissioned with Robert Lord Dudley Master of the horse, and others, to treat and compound with all such persons as held 40 l. a year in lands, and refused to take the order of knighthood (i). And also to examine the accounts of the farmers of the royal revenues (k). He was one of the Knights of the shire for the county of Northampton, in the several Parliaments called by Queen Elizabeth 'till the time of his death (l): and in the 9th year of her reign, 1566, on the death of Sir Richard Sackville, he succeeded him as Chancellor and Under-Treasurer of the Exchequer; having the character of a man of integrity and

[A] He was the fourth son of Thomas Mildmay Esq; N. Jekyll Esq; calls him the fourth son; but Mr Fuller styles him the fifth son (1), and Ar. Collins, the second son (2). This family was originally of Lancashire, as Mr Arthur Collins shews. They made no considerable figure, at least in the County of Essex, until Thomas (the father of Sir Walter) being one of the Commissioners for taking the surrender of the Monasteries, and Auditor of the Court of Augmentation, took an opportunity to augment greatly his fortune and estates: as appears by the Inquisitions post mortem. From him sprung eight very eminent families in the county of Essex; namely, Mildmay of Moulsham-ball in Chelmsford; Mildmay of Barnes in Springfield; Mildmay of Marks near Romford; Mildmay of Graces in Little Badow; Mildmay of Pontlands in Great Badow; Mildmay of Danbury; Mildmay of Terling; and Mildmay of Wanstead. Which were possessed of estates to the amount of Seven thousand four hundred pounds a year, in the reign of King James the First (3). Now, there remains only the family of Moulsham, viz. William Mildmay, Esq; and the family of Marks. — Branches of the same family, were the Mildmays of Apethorp, in Northamptonshire; of Creetingham in Suffolk; and of Pishbury in Sabridge-worth, Hertfordshire (4).

[B] Court of Augmentation.] This court was erected by statute 27 Henry VIIIth, for determining suits and controversies relating to Monasteries and Abbey-lands; that the King might be justly dealt with, touching the profits of such religious Houses, as were given to him by Act of Parliament. It took its name from the great Augmentation that was made to the Revenues of the Crown, by the suppression of the Religious Houses.

and of great discretion (m). Though put in that great and profitable place, he appears, not to have made himself a slave to the Court [C]; but to have paid a due regard to the liberties of the subject. And to express a suitable Gratitude for the riches bestowed upon him by Providence, he dedicated part of them to the uses of Religion and Learning, by founding a College in Cambridge, in 1584, which he named Emmanuel-college [D]. But to return to some publick affairs wherein he was concerned in the mean time: In 1582, he was employed in a Treaty with the Queen of Scots; being then a chief privy counsellor (n). Likewise, he was commissioned, with the Lord Treasurer Burghley, to examine the Lord Vaux, and Sir Thomas Tresham, guilty of treasonable practices (o). After having enjoyed three and twenty years his profitable place in the Exchequer, he departed this life May 31, 1589, and was buried in the chancel of the church of Great St Bartholomew's, near West-Smithfield, London (p) [E]. By his wife, Mary, sister of Sir Francis Walsingham, he left two sons and three daughters [F]. This character, is given of him; That he was a person of remarkable piety and singular prudence, who discharged all the duties of a good man and a good citizen (q): that he was a right godly Gentleman, though some of his back-friends suggested to the Queen, that he was a better patriot than subject, and that he was over-popular in Parliaments, inasmuch, that his life did set under a cloud of the Royal displeasure. Yet was not the Cloud so great, but that the beams of his Innocence, meeting those of the Queen's Candor, had easily dispelled it, had he survived longer, as appeared by the great grief the Queen professed for the loss of so grave a Counsellor (r). His opinion concerning the keeping of the Queen of Scots (October 26, 1569) at Windsor-Castle, is printed in Burnet's History of the Reformation (s).

[C] He appears not to have made himself a slave to the Court. Mr Fuller gives us the following instance of his honest disinterested spirit. 'Being employed, by virtue of his place, to advance the Queen's Treasure, he did it industriously, faithfully, and conscientiously, without wronging the subject; being very tender of their privileges, inasmuch, that he once complained in Parliament, That many Subsidies were granted, and no Grievances redressed: Which words being represented with disadvantage to the Queen, made her to disaffect him, setting in a Court-cloud, but in the Sun-shine of his Country and a clear Conscience (s).'

[D] By founding a college in Cambridge, in 1584, which he named Emmanuel-college. He founded it upon the remains of a late suppressed Convent of Dominicans, Black, or Preaching Friars, in the street from them called Preachers-street: which convent had been erected in the year 1280, by the Lady Alice, Countess of Oxford, daughter and sole heir of Gilbert Lord Samsford, hereditary Lord Chamberlain to the Queens of England, and wife of Robert Vere, the fifth Earl of Oxford (6). Sir Walter Mildmay having purchased the site of it of one Sherwood, placed therein a Master, three Fellows, and four scholars. But by the subsequent benefactions of Henry Earl of Huntingdon, Sir Francis Hastings his brother, Sir Robert Jermyn, Sir Francis Walsingham, Sir Wolstan Dixey, and the Lady Mary Dixey, Dr Alexander Nowel, Sir Henry Mildmay of Graces, and others; the number of it's members is augmented to fourteen Fellows, fifty Scholars, &c. Fuller tells us (7), that the founder 'coming to Court after he had founded his college, the Queen told him, Sir Walter, I hear you have erected a Puritan Foundation. No, Madam, faith he, far be it from me to countenance any thing contrary to your established laws; but I have set an Acorn, which when it becomes an Oak, God alone knows what will be the fruit thereof.'

MILL [JOHN] [A], the learned Editor of the most beautiful Greek Edition of the New Testament; was the son of Thomas Mill, of Banton, or Bampton, near the town of Shapp in Westmoreland. He was born at Shapp (a), about the year 1645 (b): and admitted, in 1661, into Queen's-college in Oxford (c); where having taken the degree Bachelor of Arts May 3, 1666, and that of Master, November 9, 1669 (d), he was elected Fellow of that College; and became an eminent tutor. Afterwards, entering into holy orders, he was admired as a florid and eloquent preacher: however, he never published but one Sermon [B]. In 1676, his countryman and fellow-collegian Dr Thomas Lamplugh

Westminster,' on Luke i. 28. and published at London in 1676, 4to. He therein makes the following judicious observations (2). 'If the worship of the blessed Virgin had been a thing in practice from the beginning, can it with any colour of reason be imagined,

Lampugh being made Bishop of Exeter, he appointed him one of his Chaplains, and gave him a Prebend in the church of Exeter. In August 1681, he was presented by his college to the Rectory of Blechingdon in Oxfordshire (e). He had taken the degree of Bachelor of Divinity July 8, 1680; and, on the 8th of December 1681, he took the degree of Doctor in Divinity (f). About which time he became Chaplain in ordinary to King Charles the Second (g). A few years before, he had begun his fine edition of the New Testament [C], through the advice and encouragement of the excellent Dr Fell, Bishop of Oxford: and about fifteen sheets were already worked off in the printing-house under the Theatre, at his Lordship's charge (b). But, after the Bishop's death, his executors not being willing to carry on the work, Dr Mill refunded the prime costs, and took the impression upon himself; in which he wholly employed the last thirty years of his life, with the utmost industry and care (i). On the 5th of May 1685, he was elected and admitted Principal of St Edmund's hall in Oxford (k); which was a very acceptable preferment, as it fixed him in that noble seat of learning, and enabled him to continue his great undertaking to the utmost advantage. Dr John Sharp Archbishop of York, obtained also for him, from Queen Anne, a Prebend of Canterbury, into which he was installed August 14, 1704 (l). His edition of the New Testament was published in 1707. But he did not live to reap the profit or the honour of it: for he was snatched away by an apoplectic fit, June 23, 1707, (a fortnight after the publication) in the 63d year of his age (m); and was buried in the chancel of Blechingdon church [D]. He was a man of great

'imagined, that our Saviour and his Apostles would have been silent in so considerable a part of Religion? The truth is, it is so far from Apostolic or Primitive, that neither the Scriptures, nor the Christian writers for the first three hundred years, give any countenance at all to this sort of devotion. To be plain, this superstitious practice began about the middle of the fourth century; and Epiphanius, who lived about that time, particularly calls it (as he might have done a great many more) the Heresy of women (3). There were in his days certain devout women of Arabia, who, as an instance of their worship of the blessed Virgin, offered up to this Queen of Heaven (as they thought her) certain cakes called Collyrides, whence they had the name of Collyridian heretics. The good father hearing of this preposterous devotion of theirs, inveighs, with all possible vehemency against that superstitious practice, accounting it damnable and diabolical, and the persons devoted to it no better than those that attend to seducing spirits and doctrines of demons *. And then he states the worship due to the Virgin Mary thus: Mary, says he, was a Virgin, it is true; nay more, τεσιμνωμένη, a very honourable Virgin; ἀλλ' ἂν εἰς προσκύνησιν ἡμῶν δεθείσα, but she is not proposed to us as an object of Religious Worship. Καὶ ἡ καλλίστη ἢ Μαρία, ἡ ἁγία, ἡ τεσιμνωμένη, ἀλλ' ἂν εἰς τὸ προσκυνεῖσθαι, says the same father, Though Mary be a most excellent, holy, and venerable woman, yet she is by no means capable of a religious adoration. And again, Ἡ Μαρία ἐν τῷ μ. ὁ κβεῖται προσκυνεῖσθαι, Let the Virgin be revered, but God only worshipped. So zealous was Epiphanius in the matter of the Virgin's invocation, a piece of superstition before his time not known in the world. He further observes (4), that 'the several periods of the rise and growth of this superstitious folly and will worship, as to all the parts of it, are too notorious to allow it the least pretensions to antiquity. The Council of Ephesus, towards the beginning of the fourth century, gave her indeed the style of Θεοτόκος, or Mother of God, in opposition to the Nestorian heresy. And I know very well that in the ages immediately succeeding, they fell to making lofty and unreasonably high harangues in her commendation. But it was about a thousand years after Christ, before any daily office was instituted to her. And a long time after that was it, ere the doctrine of her immaculate conception appeared in the world. The Canons of Lyons are the first men upon record, who inferted that doctrine into their ecclesiastical offices, and are upon that account sharply reprehended by St Bernard. About three hundred years ago Duns Scotus a school-doctor, revived the opinion, and proposed it as a thing merely probable. In favour of it Pope Sixtus the fourth afterwards published a bull, which was finally approved and ratified by the Council of Trent.—The Romanists style her in their missals and offices, The Queen of Heaven, The Empress of the World, The ladder of Paradise, The gate of Salvation, The mediatrix between God and man, The Saviour, by whom God hath sent redemption unto his people, A Goddess,

The omnipotent Lady; &c.—And Cardinal Bonaventure, who compiled the Lady's Psalter, as they call it, has taken the liberty very fairly to burlesque the Psalms of David, and roundly to apply and direct to the holy Virgin all those noble hymns and most pious ejaculations and prayers, which the royal Psalmist presented to almighty God.'

[C] A few years before he had begun his fine edition of the New Testament } This edition is founded upon, and an improvement of, two former valuable editions; namely, the most sumptuous and elegant folio one of Robert Stephens, in 1550, which had in the inner margin the collations of sixteen Manuscripts: and the neat and accurate edition of Bishop Fell at Oxford, in 1675, 8vo. To the former, therefore, our author added the various readings of sixteen other Manuscripts out of the English Polyglot Bible. Then he collated himself all the valuable Manuscripts in England; and procured collations of the most esteemed ones, at Rome, Paris, Vienna, and other places: likewise of the ancient Translations of the New Testament, especially the Italic one. The work is disposed in the following convenient order. At the top of each page is the sacred Text, in a large and most beautiful character: Next are placed the parallel places of Scripture, intermixed with scholia, or short explanatory notes, taken from the fathers and other ancientest Christian writers. And at the bottom of each page are the various Readings, in two columns; with the learned Doctor's judgment upon most of them, and Notes, nay sometimes long and very curious dissertations. To the whole are prefixed learned Prolegomena, containing 168 folio pages, close printed; and divided into these three parts. 1. Of the books of the New Testament, and of the settling of the sacred Canon. 2. Of the condition and state of the Text of the New Testament, through all the ages of the Church; with an account of the ancient Commentators upon it, Translations, and most considerable Editions. 3. Concerning this Edition in particular.—This Testament was reprinted by L. Kuster (5), who revised Dr Mill's collection, disposed it in better order, and augmented it with the collation of twelve new Manuscripts. It was also reprinted at Leipzig in 1723.

great learning, and particularly well versed in the oriental languages (n). But he needs no other character or encomium, than the bare mention of his fine and valuable edition of the New Testament, so often mentioned: though some have thought fit to censure it, particularly the late Dr Whitby [E].

[E] Particularly the late Dr Whitby.] That otherwise learned and judicious writer, causelessly alarmed at the sight of the great heap of various Readings published by Dr Mill, and imagining that they would invalidate the Authority of the New Testament; he therefore published, Examen variantium Lectionum Johannis Millii, S. T. P. &c. i. e. 'An Examination of Dr John Mill's various Readings on the New Testament. In which it is shewn, I. That the foundations of these various Readings are altogether uncertain, and unfit to subvert the present Reading of the Text. II. That those various Readings, which are of any moment, and alter the sense of the Text, are very few; and that in all these cases the reading of the Text may be defended. III. That the various Readings of lesser moment, which are considered at large, are such, that we very seldom have reason to depart from the commonly received Readings. IV. That Dr Mill, in collecting these various readings, hath often acted disingenuously; that he abounds in false citations, and frequently contradicts himself.' Lond. 1710. fol. pages 100. Added afterwards, by way of Appendix, to his Paraphrase and Commentary on the New Testament.——In the preface to this work, Dr Whitby gives his reasons why he undertook this Examination of Dr Mill's various Readings; which is to this effect. Whereas it is the firm belief of the Church of England, and all the other Reformed Churches, that the Scriptures contain a perfect and sufficiently plain rule both of faith and practice, Dr Mill greatly prejudices this rule, partly by multiplying various Readings, without any necessity, or upon no just grounds, in opposition to almost all the ancient copies, versions, Fathers, and commentators, in favour of one Vulgar, Coptic, or Æthiopic version; and partly by acknowledging that the Scriptures have been corrupted, and in many places interpolated from the earliest ages of the Church, and even from the times of the Apostles themselves.——Then Dr Whitby expresses his sorrow, at finding so many things in Dr Mill's Prolegomena, which either plainly weaken our Rule of Faith, or give others too specious a handle of questioning it's soundness, or at least seem to give some appearance of strength to the objections of the Romanists and others, against this Rule. To that purpose, he observes, that such a vast Heap of various Readings, will keep a great many in suspense, and will give them occasion to suspect, that there is little Certainty to be expected in that book, every verse, nay every sentence, of which admits of a various reading. Morinus argued such a deprivation of the Greek text, as in some measure weakens it's authority, from Robert Stephens's collection of various readings. And if so, how much more will the Romanists triumph over the same text, when they see those various Readings multiplied by Dr Mill, into four times the number produced by Stephens, and at last considerably enlarged by a copious appendix. Moreover, Dr Mill's confident assertion, That several corruptions and interpolations have crept into the holy Scriptures, even from the infancy of the Church, and almost in the Apostolical age, are a great hurt to the Protestant cause. Dr Mill, after a great deal of study and pains, professes to have found out two thousand places, in which the copies handed down to us by the Church, have been liable to corruptions, a great many of which have been added to the original text, even in the infancy of the Church; nay, he adds, that some ignorant reader or other has, with his commentaries and interpolations, above a thousand times corrupted the original text; and that, which was at first only a marginal note, hath very often crept into the text, and infected all copies successively. If this was so, Dr Whitby asks, could this in any measure be done, without the greatest negligence of the Governors of the Church? Or could these imaginary Scholia creep into all the Copies dispersed far and wide throughout the whole Christian world, and translated into different languages, without a confederacy of the whole body of Christians in this matter. For since these sacred books were read every where, and, either the originals themselves, or copies faithfully taken from them, were in the hands of all the faithful, and preserved in the archives of the first Churches; these things could no otherwise possibly be effected, but by the mutual confederacy of the parties concerned.

To come now to the Examination itself: That work is divided by Dr Whitby into three books. In the first chapter of the first book, he endeavours to shew, That it cannot fairly be collected from the writings of the Fathers, or their citations from the Scriptures, that they read otherwise than we do now in the present text. This he proves by the following arguments: Because the Fathers often alledged texts of Scripture, not as they were expressly contained in the New Testament itself, but as they occurred to their own memories: Because they often give us only the sense and substance of passages, without any regard to the words themselves: Because they often add several things to the text itself: Because they often omit several words, and sometimes whole periods: Because the same Fathers, who sometimes cite passages different from the vulgar text, at other times cite the same passages agreeing with it: Because they often heap together in their quotations several remote sections of Scripture, which occur in that sense in different places, but are no where expressly to be met with. In the 2d Chapter of the first book, Dr Whitby endeavours to shew, that a various Reading cannot be fairly collected from the Vulgar Latin, or from the Latin version of a Greek Father, or from a passage cited by the Latin Fathers: Because whatever the original text be in itself, 'tis the custom of interpreters to accommodate the words, which they make use of, to the vulgar version: Because the Latin Fathers were very indifferent judges of these matters, being but poor critics in Greek. This Dr Mill himself owns of them, as Dr Whitby shews in several particulars, &c.——At the end there is an appendix, in which Dr Whitby gives an account of several of Dr Mill's self-contradictions; a specimen of the Latin Version as it was before it received St Jerom's emendations, from the spurious readings, defects, and redundancies in the commentaries of Hilary the Deacon, upon St Paul's Epistles; and a collection of the passages of Scripture, whose various readings Dr Whitby contests in this Examination.

Ant. Collins made the most of this (6); and having observed first, that 'Dr Mills (as he calls him,) has published a Book containing all the various Readings of the New Testament he has been able to meet with; which amount, according to a late author (7), to above Thirty thousand;' he then cites part of the preface to Dr Whitby's Examination, in order to shew how 'the Text of Scripture is affected by this work of Dr Mills,' that is, as he would have it inferred, how it is rendered thereby doubtful and precarious. But Mr Whitton, in his Reflections on that Pamphlet (8), rightly answers, that 'those various Readings are so far from hurting the Text, or weakening it's Authority in general, that they give mighty light to it; shew how it has been in constant use and reputation; are a grand hedge and security about it; shew us sometimes the original writing of the Apostles in indisputable points; and are undeniable attestations to the main current and coherence of our common copies, it being evident, that out of those thirty thousand there are scarce fifty, that do considerably alter the sense of the places, and of them scarce ten that do in any point of great difficulty and importance. So that, to speak my mind plainly, whenever I find such a noise made in this case, I shrewdly suspect either gross ignorance as to those various Readings themselves, and the proper nature and use of them, or great passion, prejudice, and want of judgment; and on the contrary cannot but wish, that the various Readings of the Hebrew copies of the Old Testament had been preserved as well as those of the New; being very secure, that thence great light would often have arisen to many texts, which no Commentator can now unfold to us upon any certain foundation.'

But the best Answer to A. Collins's cavils upon this subject, was given by the famous Dr Richard Bentley (9); an extract of which will be very proper here.— 'I am forc'd (says the Doctor,) to confess with grief, That

That several well meaning Priests, of greater zeal than knowledge, have often by their own false alarms and panic both frighted others of their own side, and given advantage to their enemies. What an uproar once was there, as if all were ruined and undone, when Capellus wrote one book against the Antiquity of the Hebrew Points, and another for Various Lectiōns in the Hebrew Text itself? And yet time and experience has cured them of those imaginary fears.—The case is and will be the same with the learned Dr Mill —For what is it that Whitby so inveighs and exclaims at? The Doctor's labours, says he, make the whole Text precarious; and expose both the Reformation to the Papists, and Religion itself to the Atheists. God forbid! we'll still hope better things. For surely those Various Readings existed before in several exemplars; Dr Mill did not make and coin them, he only exhibited them to our view. If Religion therefore was true before, though such Various Readings were in being: it will be as true, and consequently as safe, still, though every body sees them. Depend on't; no truth, no matter of fact fairly laid open, can ever subvert true Religion. The 30000 various lectiōns are allow'd then and confes'd: and if more copies yet are collated, the sum will still mount higher. And what's the inference from this? why, Gregory here quoted (10), infers, That no profane Author whatever has suffer'd so much by the hand of Time, as the New Testament has done. Now if this should be found utterly false; and if the Scriptural Text has no more Variations, than what must necessarily have happen'd from the nature of things, and what are common and in equal proportion in all Classics whatever; I hope this panic will be remov'd, and the Text be thought as firm as before. If there had been but One manuscript of the Greek Testament, at the restoration of learning about two centuries ago, then we had had no Various Readings at all. And would the Text be in a better condition then, than now we have 30000? So far from that, that in the best single copy extant, we should have had hundreds of faults, and some omissions irreparable. Besides, that the suspicions of fraud and foul play would have been increas'd immensely. It is good therefore, you'll allow, to have more anchors than one; and another manuscript to join with the first would give more Authority, as well as Security. Now chuse that second where you will, there shall be a thousand variations from the first; and yet half or more of the faults still remain in them both. A third therefore, and so a fourth, and still on, are desirable; that by a joint and mutual help, all the faults may be mended; some copy preserving the true reading in one place, and some in another. And yet the more copies you call to assistance, the more do the Various Readings multiply upon you: every copy having it's peculiar slips, though in a principal passage or two it do singular service. And this is fact, not only in the New Testament, but in all antient books whatever. 'Tis a good Providence and a great blessing, That so many Manuscripts of the New Testament are still amongst us; some procur'd from Egypt, others from Asia, others found in the Western Churches. For the very distance of places, as well as numbers of the Books, demonstrate, that there could be no collusion, no altering nor interpolating one copy from another, nor all by any of them. In profane Authors, whereof one Manuscript only had the good luck to be preserv'd, as Velleius Paterculus among the Latins, and Hesychius among the Greeks; the Faults of the Scribes are found so numerous, and the Defects beyond all redress, that notwithstanding the pains of the learnedest and acutest Critics for two whole centuries, those books are still, and are like to continue, a mere heap of errors. On the contrary, where the copies of any author are numerous, though the Various Readings always increase in proportion; there the Text by an accurate collation of them made by skilful and judicious hands, is ever the more correct, and comes nearer to the true words of the author.—Terence is now in one of the best conditions of any of the classic writers; the oldest and best copy of him is now in the Vatican Library, which comes nearest to the Poet's own hand; but even

(10) Pref. to
Works.

That has hundreds of errors most of which may be mended out of other exemplars, that are otherwise more recent and of inferior value. I myself have collated several; and do affirm, that I have seen twenty thousand Various Lectiōns in that little Author, not near so big as the whole New Testament; and am morally sure, that if Half the number of Manuscripts were collated for Terence with that niceness and minuteness which has been used in twice as many for the New Testament, the number of the Variations would amount to above fifty thousand. In the Manuscripts of the New Testament the Variations have been noted with a religious, not to say superstitious, exactness. Every difference in spelling, in the smallest particle or article of speech, in the very order or collocation of words without real change, has been studiously registred. Nor has the Text only been ransack'd, but all the antient versions, the Latin Vulgate, Italic, Syriac, Æthiopic, Arabic, Coptic, Armenian, Gothic, and Saxon; nor these only, but all the dispers'd citations of the Greek and Latin Fathers in a course of 500 years. What wonder then, if with all this scrupulous search in every hole and corner, the Varieties rise to thirty thousand? when in all antient Books of the same bulk, whereof the Manuscripts are numerous, the Variations are as many or more; and yet no Versions to swell the reckoning. The editors of profane Authors do not use to trouble their Readers with an useles list of every small slip committed by a lazy or ignorant Scribe.—Hence the reader not vers'd in antient Manuscripts, is deceiv'd into an opinion, that there were no more Variations in the copies, than what the Editor has communicated. Whereas, if the like scrupulousness was observ'd in registring the smallest changes in profane Authors, as is allow'd, nay requir'd in sacred; the now formidable number of thirty thousand would appear a very trifle. 'Tis manifest, that books in verse are not near so obnoxious to Variations, as prose: the transcriber, if he is not wholly ignorant and stupid, being guided by the measures; and hindered from such alterations, as do not fall in with the laws of numbers. And yet even in Poets, the Variations are so very many, as can hardly be conceiv'd without use and experience.—For this he instances, in the edition of Tibullus, by Broukhuise, and in that of Plautus by Pareus; where the Various Lectiōns are as many as the lines: And in Manilius collated by himself, where the Variations are twice as many as all the lines of the Book.—'So that (continues he) if I may advise you; when you hear more of this scarecrow of thirty thousand, be neither astonish'd at the Sum, nor in any pain for the Text. 'Tis plain to me, that your learned Whitby, — — — under his deep concern for the Text, did not reflect at all what that word really means. The present Text was first settled almost two hundred years ago out of several Manuscripts, by Robert Stephens a printer and bookseller at Paris: whose beautiful and (generally speaking) accurate Edition, has been ever since counted the standard, and follow'd by all the rest. Now this specific Text in Dr Whitby's notion seems to be taken for the sacred Original in every word and syllable: and if the conceit is but spread and propagated, within a few years that Printer's infallibility will be as zealously maintain'd as an Evangelist's or Apostle's. Dr Mill, were he alive, would confes, That this Text fix'd by a Printer is sometimes by the Various Readings rendered uncertain, nay is prov'd certainly wrong. But then he would subjoin, That the real Text of the Sacred Writers does not now (since the Originals have been so long lost) ly in any single Manuscript or Edition; but is dispers'd in them all. 'Tis competently exact indeed even in the worst Manuscripts now extant: nor is One Article of Faith or Moral Precept either perverted or lost in them; chuse as awkwardly as you can, chuse the worst by design, out of the whole lump of Readings. But the lesser matters of diction, and among several synonymous Expressions, the Very words of the writer must be found out by the same Industry and Sagacity that is used in the other books; must not be risk'd upon the credit of any particular Manuscript or Edition, but be sought, acknowledg'd, and challeng'd, wherever they are met with.' C

MILTON [JOHN], usually stiled the English Poet, was descended of a father of both his names, who being disinherited while he was young for embracing the Protestant religion (a), quitted his parents and the family-seat at Milton in Oxfordshire (b), and applying himself to the business of a Scrivener in London, married a gentlewoman of a good family (c), and settled in a house which he purchased in Breadstreet (d). In this house our author, his eldest son (e), was born, December 9, 1608 (f). He was trained up with great care in virtue and piety from his infancy by his parents, who had a private tutor (g) at home to instruct him in the first rudiments of learning; but was put afterwards to St Paul's school, under the care of Mr Alexander Gill (h). Here he applied with so much industry to his book (i), that he hurt his constitution (k), which was none of the strongest; but he made an extraordinary progress, and gave some early specimens of an admirable genius for poetry (l). At the age of seventeen (m), he was admitted Sizar of Christ's college in Cambridge, under the tuition of Mr William Chappel (n). He neglected no part of academical learning (o); but his chief study and delight lay in exercising and improving his poetical talents [A]. In 1628 he proceeded Bachelor of Arts, having performed his exercise for it with great applause. It was his father's intention to breed him to the Church, nor had our author himself any other thoughts for some time; but when ripen years brought him to consult his own judgment, he dropped that design against the advice of his friends [B]; and growing daily more enamoured with his darling Muse, the more intimately he grew into her acquaintance, he resolved to pursue that course of study to which the bent of his nature so strongly drew him, and dedicated his future life and labours entirely to the service of poetry [C]. In 1632 he took the degree

[A] His chief study and delight lay in improving his poetical talents.] His juvenile poems might pass for a sufficient proof of this assertion (1), but it gives a further satisfaction as well as pleasure, to see him expressly declaring it. Thus: 'I had my time, says he, as others have, who have good learning bestowed upon them, to be sent to those places, where the opinion was it might be soonest attained, and as the manner is, was not unstudied in those authors which are most commended: whereof, some were grave orators and historians, whose matter methought I loved indeed; but as my age then was, I understood them. Others, were the smooth elegiac Poets, whereof the schools are not scarce, whom, both for the pleasing sound of their numerous writings, which, in imitation I found most easy, and most agreeable to nature's part in me (2); and for their matter, which what it is there be few who know not? I was so allured to read, that no recreation came to me better welcomed (3)'

[B] He dropt that design.] 'By the intentions of my parents and friends, says he, I was destined of a child, and in mine own resolutions, 'till coming to some maturity of years—I thought it better to prefer a blameless silence, before the sacred office of speaking (4)'

[C] To the service of poetry.] In answer to one of his friends who had importuned him to take Orders, he wrote as follows:

'Sir,
' Besides that, in sundry other respects, I must acknowledge me to profit by you, whenever we meet; you are often to me, and were yesterday especially, as good a watchman to admonish, that the hours of the night pass on, (for so I call my life, as yet obscure and unserviceable to mankind) and that the day with me is at hand, wherein Christ commands all to labour, while there is light. Which, because I am persuaded you do to no other purpose, than out of a true desire, that God should be honoured in every one, I therefore think myself bound, though-unaskt, to give you account, as oft as occasion is, of this my tardy moving, according to the precept of my conscience, which I firmly trust is not without God. Yet now I will not streine for any set apologic, but only referre myself to what my mind shall have at any tyme, to declare her self at her best ease. But if you thinke, as you said, that too much love of learning is in fault, and that I have given up myself to dreame away my years in the arms of a studious

tirement, like Endymion with the moone, as the tale of Latmus goes; yet consider, that if it were no more than the meer love of learning, whether it proceed from a principle bad, good, or natural, it could not have held out thus long, against so strong opposition on the other side, of every kind. For, if it be bad, why should not all the fond hopes, that forward youth and vanitie are sledged with, together with gaine, pride and ambition, call me forward more powerfully, than a poor regardlesse and unprofitable sin of curiosity should be able to hold me, whereby a man cuts himselfe off from all action, and becomes the most helpless, pusillanimous, and unweaponed creature in the world, the most unfit and unable to do that, which all mortals most aspire to, either to be usefull to his friends, or to offend his enemies. Or, if it be to be thought an naturall proneness, there is against that a much more potent inclination inbred, which about this time of a man's life sollicit most the desire of house and family of his owne, to which nothing is esteemed more helpfull, than the early entering into credible employment, and nothing more hindering then this affected solitari-ness, and tho' this were enough, yet there is to this another act, if not of pure, yet of refined nature, no lesse available to dissuade prolonged obscurity, a desire of honour, and repute, and immortal fame, seated in the breast of every true scholar, which all make haste to, by the readiest ways of publishing and divulging conceiv'd merits, as well those that shall, as those that never shall obtain it. Nature would presently work the more prevalent way, if there were nothing but this inferior bent to restraine her. Lastly, the love of learning, as it is the pursuit of something good, it would sooner follow the more excellent and supreme good known and presented, and so be quickly exempted from the emptie and fantastick chase of shadows and notions, to the solid good flowing from due and tymely obedienc to that command in the Gospel, sett out by the terrible seasing of him, that hid the talent. It is more probable therefore that, not the endless delight of speculation, but this very consideration of that great commandment, does not presse forward as soon as many doe to undergoe, but keeps off with a sacred reverence and religious advisement how best to undergoe; not taking thought of being late, so it give advantage to be more fit; for those that were latest lost nothing, when the maister of the vineyard came to give each one his hire. And here I am come to a streame-head, copious enough to disburthen itself like Nilus at seven mouths

Yet that you may see that I am something suspicious of myselfe, and do take notice of a certain belatedness in me, I am the bolder to send you some of my nightward thoughts, some while since, because they come in not altogether unfitly, made up in a Petrarchian stanza, which I told you of.

' Stolne on his wing my three and twentieth year
' My hastie days fly on with full careere,
' But my late spring no bud or blossome sheweth.
' Perhaps my semblance might deceive the truth,
' That I to manhood am arriv'd so neare,
' And inward ripeness doth much lesse appear,
' That some more timely happie spirit indueth:
' Yet be it lesse or more, or soon or slow,
' It shall be still in strictest measure even
' To that same lot, however mean or high,
' Towards which time leads me, and the will of ' Heaven:
' All is, if I have grace to use it so,
' As ever in my great task-maister's eye.

' By this I believe you may well repent of having made mention at all of this matter; for if I have not all this while won you to this, I have certainly wearied you of it. This therefore alone may be a sufficient reason for me to keep me as I am, least having thus tired you singly, I should deal worse with a whole congregation, and spoyle all the patience of a parish; for I myself do not only see my own tediousness, but now grow offended with it, that has hindered me thus long, from coming to the last and best period of my letter, and that which must now chiefly work my pardon, that I am your true and unfained friend (5).'

[D] Not to engage in any of the three professions] This humour being at length indulg'd by his father, he very appositely returned his thanks for that favour, in an elegant copy of Latin verses; wherein, having, with admirable address insinuated that his father's taste and temper agreed with his own so far, that he was not directed in the choice of that profession he had designed him for by any lucrative views, he proceeds to sing the praises of poetry; to which, as his own choice, he endeavours to reconcile his father by some arguments ad hominem; as for instance, his great fondness and skill in musick the sister art to poetry; and then concludes by praising, after the example of Horace, that he should in time be placed above the reach of malice and envy (6).

[E] Regretted by his acquaintance.] Notwithstanding the disgust which, under the guidance of his republican spirit, he took up against the universities, and their manner of educating youth; yet he found it necessary to urge his own education there, in order to clear himself of the charge of having pass'd his youth in licentiousness and debauchery. In a treatise already quoted, he thanks his antagonist for this slander, since it gave him an apt occasion to acknowledge publickly, with all grateful mind, that more than ordinary favour and respect which he found above any of his equals, at the hands of those courteous and learned men, the Fellows of that college wherein he spent some years: 'who, at my parting, continues he, after I had taken two degrees, as the manner is, signified many ways, how much better it would content them that I would stay, as by many letters full of kindness and loving respect, both before that time and long after I was assured of their singular good affection towards me. Which being likewise propense to all such as were for their studious and civil life worthy of esteem, I could not wrong their judgments and upright intentions, so much as to think I had that regard for them for other cause, than that I might be still encouraged to proceed in the honest and laudable courses, of which they apprehended I had given good proof. And to those ingenious and friendly men who were ever the countenancers of virtuous and hopeful wits, I wish the best and happiest things, that friends in absence with one to another (7).'

[F] Displeas'd with the method of breeding youth to Divinity.] He took an early dislike to this method of breeding, or rather course of life, by those that were bred to this profession. We find him soon after the taking of his first degree, giving it as a proof of the ill state of learning there at that time, that those who were design'd for the profession of Divinity were destitute of all knowledge both of Philology and Philosophy; so that the monkish ignorance of the former age, would probably once more possess the clergy (8). In the same spirit he censures the liberty indulg'd to young students to act plays, as tending to corrupt their morals; here are his words: 'What difficulty, says he, was it for me to know the loose discourse, dress, and gestures of the play-houses? when in the colleges so many of the young Divines, and those in the next aptitude to Divinity, have been so often upon the stage, writhing and unbending their clergy-limbs to all the antic and dishonest gestures of trinculoes, buffoons, and bawds; prostituting the shame of that ministry, which either they had, or were well nigh having, to the eyes of courtiers and court-ladies, with their groomes and madamoiselles. There while they acted and overacted, among other young scholars I was a spectator; they thought themselves gallant men, and I thought them fools; they made sport, and I laughed; they mispronounced, and I misliked; and to make up the anticism, they were out, and I hissed (9).'

[G] He grew out of humour with Church government.] In one of his tracts he tells us, that by the intentions of his parents and friends, he was destined of a child and his own resolutions, to the service of the Church; 'till coming to some maturity of years, and perceiving what tyranny had invaded it, that he who would take orders must subscribe slave, and take an oath withal, which unless he took with a conscience that could retch, he must strait perjure or split his faith; 'I thought it better, says he, to prefer a blameless silence before the office of speaking bought and begun with servitude and sorrowing (10).'

[H] Disliking the whole plan of university education] He tells us himself, that in the time of her better health and his own younger judgment he never greatly admired the university (11). Accordingly, he freely expresses his mind, in some verses to his friend Diodati (12).

However, that author must be stark blind with malice, that from this elegy could infer his expulsion from the university (13): for 'tis evident he had not absolutely quitted it when he wrote those verses, but, on the contrary, was resolv'd to return.

Stat quoque Juncofas Cami remeare paludes, Atque iterum raucæ murmur adire scholæ.

He owns indeed he was so much delighted with the pleasures he found in London, as to feel no regret for his banishment, as he calls it, from Cambridge.

of life, as well as in his political principles, he returned to his father, who having acquired a competency of fortune, with which he was satisfied, had quitted his business, and settled at Horton near Colnbrooke in Buckinghamshire (g). His parents received him with unabated affection, notwithstanding their views had been thwarted, by his resolution not to take Holy Orders. The pleasure they indulged him in this retirement, he employed in enriching his mind with the choicest stores of the Grecian and Roman learning, drawn from the best authors in each language (r); constantly keeping his eye upon poetry, where his heart lay, for the sake and service of which chiefly it was that these treasures were collected. And the poems, intitled Comus, l'Allegro, Il Penseroso, and Lycidas, all wrote at this time, were such as alone, had he never performed any thing else, would have transmitted his fame to the latest posterity [I]. Nor was he unconscious of his own merit, the sense whereof inspired him with a modest confidence, that he should one day acquire an immortality of that kind by his works [K]. However, he was not so wrapped up in these sublime thoughts and studies, though pursued with an ardor suitable to the uncommon vigour of his mind, as not to make frequent excursions to London, as often as business, improvement in other studies (s), or friends, invited him thither. Neither did so much excellence pass without the notice of his neighbours in the country; in the company of some of these, the most distinguished either by birth and fortune, or parts

Perhaps this exile was the consequence of some private challenge. He tells us himself he understood the use of a sword, and knew how to resent an affront from men of the most athletic constitution (14). 'Tis certain debauchery was not the cause (15). The niceness of his nature, joined to a decent pride and self-esteem, kept him above those low descents of mind beneath which he must plunge himself, who can yield to unlawful and saleable prostitutions. 'Tis true he here shews himself very susceptible of the tender passion, and for that reason was resolved to run away from the temptations he met with in London.

However, this early dislike to the university grew up afterwards to a perfect aversion, and put him upon framing devices to draw the education of youth from those fountains. This seems to have been the motive of his undertaking the business of a school-master. Besides the plan of his academy, which 'comprehends the instruction of youth in all arts and exercises, both civil and military (16),' he proposes elsewhere, 'to apply the profits of the lands forfeited by the act for superstitious uses, to the founding such academies all over the land, where languages and arts may be taught both together; so that the youth may be at once brought up to a competency of learning and an honest trade, by which means such of them as had the gift of the spirit, being enabled to support themselves (without tythes) by the latter, might by the help of the former, become worthy preachers of the Gospel (17).'

[I] Would have transmitted his fame to the latest posterity. The mask of Comus was wrote in 1634. The original manuscript is in the library of Trinity-college Cambridge, the variations of which, from the printed copy, may be seen in our author's life, by Dr Birch (18). It was first printed at the end of Mr R—'s poems, at Oxford, and afterwards separately, at London, 1637, 4to: under the following title. A Mask presented at Ludlow Castle 1634, on Michaelmasse night, before the Right Honorable John Earl of Bridgewater, Viscount Brackley, Lord President of Wales, and one of his Majesty's most honorable Privy-Council. And the dedication by Mr H. Lawes, who set the music, shews that Milton wrote it at the solicitation of the Bridgewater family; accordingly, the close of this edition informs us, that the principal persons who performed in it, were John, Lord Brackley; Mr Thomas Egerton, and the Lady Alice Egerton. Entertainments of this kind being dropt not many years after, this beautiful piece became only a closet repast, and so continued the high delight and admiration of all readers of taste for a hundred years, 'till 1738; when it was adapted to the stage by Mr Dalton, since Dr of Divinity, and Prebendary of Worcester, by dividing it into scenes and acts, with proper additions and alterations, and was exhibited at Drury-Lane on the 4th of March that year, where it was received for many nights with an applause, that did no less honour to the publick taste, than to the name of Milton, and has been among the chief supports of the stage ever since.

Mr Edward King, whose death is lamented in the Lycidas, was Fellow of Christ's-college in Cambridge, and was drowned August 10th, 1637, aged 25 years; in his passage from Chelster for Ireland, where his father was Secretary to King Charles the First. The original manuscript of this piece, and a transcript of the variations from the printed copy, are also to be met with in the same places with those of Comus.

[K] He should one day acquire immortality. About the time of writing his Lycidas, we find two letters of his to his friend Diodati, in the former of which, dated September 2d, 1737; he acknowledges himself to be slow in his epistolary correspondence from his natural disposition, by which, when he once engaged in any study, he was urged on to prosecute it with his full vigour and application, and could scarce bear the least interruption in it's pursuit. In the next dated the 23d of the same month, he declares himself a zealous follower of moral beauty and virtue, with a thorough contempt for the opinions of the mere vulgar, and with a just consciousness of his own powers, and a præ-sentiment of the important rank, which the cultivation of them would one day advance him to in his own age, and all future ones, intimating the object of his thoughts was no less than that of immortality. But we find him afterwards, declaring his prefaces of this kind in the fullest terms; after a short preface to deprecate envy for venturing to divulge unusual things of himself, he proceeds thus: 'I must say, therefore, that after I had for my first years been exercised to the tongues, and some sciences as my age would suffer, by sundry masters and teachers both at home and at the schools, it was found, that whether ought was imposed upon me by them that had the overlooking, or betaken to of my own choice, in English or other tongue, profing or versing, but chiefly this latter, the stile, by certain vital signs it had, was likely to live. But much latelier, in the private academies of Italy, whither I was favoured to resort, perceiving that some trifles which I had in memory, composed at under twenty or thereabout, (for the manner is, that every one must give some proof of his wit and reading there,) met with acceptance above what is looked for; and other things which I had shifted in scarcity of books and conveniences, to patch up among them, were received with written encomiums, (which the Italian is not forward to bestow on men of this side the Alps); I began thus far to assent both to them and diverse of my friends here at home, and not less to an inward prompting, which now grew daily upon me, that by labour and intent study, (which I take to be my portion in this life) joined with a strong propensity of nature, I might perhaps leave something so written to after-times, as they should not willingly let it die. (19).'

and learning, he sometimes gave way to a relaxation [L]. After five years spent in making these prodigious improvements at home, his mother dying (t), he obtained leave of his father to travel abroad. This was a gratification he had long wished for; and, having procured some recommendations, as well as proper advice for his conduct, from his neighbour Sir Henry Wotton, then Provost of Eton-college [M], he set out in the spring of the year 1638 for France (u), and passing a few days at Paris, where he had the pleasure of being introduced to the celebrated Hugo Grotius [N], he took the direct road to Nice, where embarking for Genoa, he passed from thence, through Leghorn and Pisa, to Florence. In that city, which he had long wished to see, he spent two months greatly to his satisfaction, and distinguishing himself in some private academies held there for the improvement of literature [O], he was received with unusual kindness and esteem by several persons of the first rank for quality as well as learning. From Florence he passed through Sienna to Rome, where he likewise staid about two months, and was honoured with the acquaintance of several learned men [P]. His next remove was to Naples, whence his design was to pass into Sicily and Greece; but hearing of the commotions then beginning to stir in England, his literary curiosity gave way to his religious zeal, which, not suffering him to observe Sir Henry Wotton's advice, had already brought him into great danger at Rome, and cut him short of several intended kindneses at Naples [Q]. No wonder, then, that he could not endure the thought of being absent from home, at this critical juncture, so long, as the compleat execution of the plan which he had at first laid for his travels required. Thus heated he returned to Rome, with a resolution openly to defend his sentiments in religion, against the repeated advice of his friends, who gave him a caution, that the Jesuits were forming designs against him on that account. However, after a stay within the verge of the Vatican for two months, he returned safe to Florence, where, being affectionately welcomed by his friends with a joy equal to the occasion, he continued with them as long as before, only making in the time a short excursion to Lucca [R]. Then crossing the Apennine, he passed by the way of Bologna and Ferrara

(t) He speaks very respectfully of her, and particularly extols her charitable disposition. Ibid. and Phillips, p. 6.

[M] Advice from Sir Henry Wotton. Milton having applied for that purpose to this friend, who had been several years ambassador at Venice, received a letter from him dated at Eton-college, April 18th, 1638: wherein, after the highest compliments paid to his excellent parts, and particularly to the mask of Comus, and some directions for this rout in his travels to Italy, he concludes with the following advice for his safety there. 'At Sienna I was tabled in the house of one Alberto Scipioni, an old Roman courtier in dangerous times, having been steward to the Duca di Pagliano, who with all his family were strangled, save this only man, that escaped by foresight of the tempest.' With him I had often much chat of those affairs, into which he took pleasure to look back from his native harbour; and at my departure towards Rome, which had been the center of his experience, I had won confidence enough to beg his advice, how I might carry myself securely there, without offence of others, or of mine own conscience. Signior Arrigo meo, says he, I penseri stretti, et il viso sciolto. That is, your thoughts close, and your countenance loose, will go safely over the whole world. Of which Delphian oracle (for so I have found it) your judgment doth need no commentary: and therefore, Sir, I will commit you with it to the best of all securities, God's dear love, remaining your friend as much at command as any of longer date.

'H. Wotton (20).'

[N] He was introduced to Hugo Grotius. Milton particularly desired this favour of Lord Scudamore then ambassador there from England. The reputation of Grotius in the learned world, was ground enough to excite a curiosity of seeing him. But our author had probably a particular motive for it relating to himself. Grotius, among other Latin poems, had wrote a tragedy upon the plan of Adam's fall (21); a subject which Milton had thought upon with the same design. The manuscript in Trinity-college library already mentioned, contains a great variety of subjects for tragedies; one of which is intitled Adam in Baniishment (22).

[O] Distinguishing himself at Florence. He calls the verses he produced there trifles, as has been already observed (23); but tells us however, they were rewarded with singular encomiums. He received also others from Rome, one of which written by Salvaggi, was this distich.

Græcia Mæonidem, jactat sibi Roma Maronem:
Anglia Miltonum jactat utrique parem.

Of which, Mr Dryden's celebrated epigram of six lines constantly prefixed to Paradise Lost, are little more than a translation.

Three poets in three distant ages born,
Greece, Italy, and England did adorn:
The first in majesty of thought surpass'd,
The next in gracefulness, in both the last.
The force of nature could no further go,
To make a third, the join'd the former two.

[P] Acquainted with several learned men at Rome. Particularly Lucas Holstenius, keeper of the Vatican library, who shewed him all the Greek authors, whether published or otherwise, which had passed through his correction, and introduced him to Cardinal Barberini, who at an entertainment of music performed at his own expence, waited for him at the door, and brought him into the assembly. To thank Holstenius for these favours, Milton wrote the ninth of his Familiar Letters.

[Q] Cut him short of intended kindneses at Naples. The famous Giovanni Baptista Manso, to whom he was recommended by a hermit that had travelled with him from Rome, having received him with great respect, and waited upon him several times at his own lodgings, told him at his departure, that he would gladly have done him more good offices, if he had been more reserved in matters of religion; and dismissed him with the following distich alluding to that indiscretion, and Pope Gregory's remark upon the beauty of the English youths.

Non Anglus, verum hercle angelus ipse fores.

[R] Making a short excursion to Lucca. His desire to visit this part of Italy was doubtless the more ardent, on account of his dear friend and school-fellow Charles Djodati, who was descended of a father originally of this country. He had probably heard by this time of that gentleman's death; he tells us himself, that he received the news while he was abroad, and it seems to have rara to Venice, where he shipped off the books he had collected in his travels through Italy; and staying only one month, he went through Verona, Milan, and along the Alps, down Lemane lake to Geneva (w). After some time spent in this city, he returned the same way that he came through France, and arrived in England about the time of the King's second expedition against the Scots (x). His father having left Horton, resided at this time with his younger son at Reading [S] in Berkshire. Our author, therefore, took lodgings for the present in St Bride's church-yard, Fleetstreet; and, observing the publick affairs just in such a train as he wished for [T], but the times not yet ripe enough for attacking the episcopal order, he determined to prosecute the course of his private studies, which he had not yet completed to his mind [U]; and the rather, as this gave him leisure have happened soon after his departure from England, as may be conjectured from some lines in the eclogue which he composed to the memory of his friend after his return. Diodati studied Physick, and was an excellent scholar. Mr Toland tells us (24), that he had in his possession two Greek letters of his to Milton, written with great elegance.

[S] His younger son] His name was Christopher: he was bred at the same school with our author, and afterwards went to study the Law in the Inner Temple, where he lived to be an ancient benchman. When the civil wars broke out, he adhered to the royal cause, and becoming obnoxious to the Parliament by acting to the utmost of his power against them at Reading, after the taking of the town, he quitted his house, where his father lived with him, and retired under the cover of the King's arms. At the conclusion of the war, his brother having accommodated matters for him by his interest in the Parliament party, he returned to his study and profession, following chamber-practice every term. In the latter part of his life, he was possessed of a small employment at Ipswich in Suffolk; in which town and neighbourhood, he resided, 'till King James the Second came to the crown, when, being recommended to his Majesty by some persons of rank for his integrity and ability in the law, he was made one of the Barons of the Exchequer, and knighted, having received the coif at a call of Serjeants the same day. Soon after he was sworn one of the Judges of the Common-Pleas. But he resigned this post in a short time, on account of his age and ill health, and retired to a studious and devout life in the country, being, says Mr Philips (25), of a modest quiet temper, preferring justice and virtue before all worldly pleasure and grandeur. Notwithstanding which, Mr Toland (26) would have it believed that he was one of those Judges made by King James, whose abilities and skill in the Law Bishop Burnet tells us, was owing to their never having had any business to call them off their studies, and their integrity, to not having been practised in the fingering of fees. However, Mr Toland does not deny that Sir Christopher withdrew before any of his master's ill designs were openly entered on. Two of Sir Christopher's daughters, Mary and Catherine, lived unmarried at Highgate, and were both dead in 1749: one of them died at their cousin Mr Foster's house at Holloway. In 1750, there was a Mrs Milton, granddaughter of Sir Christopher, and daughter of his son Thomas already mentioned, living in Grosvenor-Street †.

(27) In his Account of Milton.

[T] The publick affairs in such a train as he wished.] Mr Fenton declares (27) his surprize, that one of so daring a spirit as Milton certainly was, did not fly to the camp at this time. Milton himself was so sensible that his conduct was liable to be misconstrued, that he has thought proper to make an apology, wherein he declares, that it proceeded not for want of resolution in him to undergo the toils, and face the dangers which attended that choice, but from a consciousness of being able to do the cause better service with his pen. Besides, his ambition prompted him to engage in such a way, as the sense of his education added to the natural vigour of his mind, filled him with the hopes of excelling, rather than in the army, where not the want of spirit, or of a just esteem for military glory, but the weakness of his constitution, gave him no room to think he could ever be able to make any distinguished figure (28).

(28) Defensio secunda, towards the beginning.

(29) In remark [K].

[U] He had not yet completed his studies to his mind.] We have already seen (29), that the first persuasions of procuring immortality by some grand work, had possessed him the year before he went abroad. These hopes, by feeding, were much heightened presently after his return home. Even while he was still in

Italy, he began to look out for a subject, and had some thoughts of chusing King Arthur for his Heroe, as appears from some lines in his eclogue intitled Manusius *. He continued in the same resolution after his arrival in England, as is evident from some lines in his eclogue upon the death of Diodati. In the mean time, the hopes of making himself immortal being now fed by his Cisalpine as well as his Italian friends, began to grow into a cheerful confidence, as has been already observed (30). This was the pleasing view, when he soared into the highest region of his fancy, with his garland and singing robes about him. And he had now proceeded one step further, which was a resolution to execute his work, whatever it should be, in his native language; and had thought likewise upon several subjects but without pitching upon any, or determining the species of his intended poem. However, he proposed something in general, of highest hope and hardest attempting. But whether that epic form whereof the two poems of Homer, and those other two of Virgil and Tasso are a diffuse, and the book of Job a brief model; or whether the rules of Aristotle herein are strictly to be kept, or nature to be followed, which in them that know art and use judgment, is no transgression, but an enriching of art. And lastly what King or Knight before the Conquest might be chosen, in whom to lay the pattern of a Christian Heroe: if to the instinct of nature and emboldening of art ought may be trusted, and that there be nothing adverse in our climate, or the fate of this age, it haply would be no rashness from an equal diligence and inclination with Tasso, to present the like offer in our ancient stories, as he did for the Prince of Italy; or whether those dramatic constitutions wherein Sophocles and Euripides reign should be his choice, as more doctrinal and exemplary to a nation. The Scripture also, continues he, affords a divine pastoral drama in the Song of Solomon, consisting of two persons and a double chorus, as Origen rightly judges. And the Apocalyptic of St John is the majestic image of a high and stately tragedy, shutting up and intermingling her solemn scenes with a sevenfold chorus of hallelujas and harping symphonies. Or, as he goes on, if occasion shall lead to those magnificent odes and hymns, wherein Pindarus and Callimachus are in most things worthy, or to some others in their frame judicious, in their matter most an end faulty. But those frequent songs throughout the law and prophets beyond all these, not in their divine argument alone, but in the very critical art of composition may be easily made appear over all the kinds of lyric poetry, to be incomparable (31). We have given this citation to shew that those sketches of poems contained in his manuscript in Trinity-college library (32), were drawn not long after Milton's return from Italy; as appears especially, when we read what he says of the accomplishment of this intention; that none hath by more studious ways endeavoured it. That in 1641, he had proceeded something further in the execution, seems not an improbable conjecture, as well from an expression already quoted, as from the following. "Neither do I think it shame to covenant with any knowing reader, that for some few years yet I may go on trust with him toward the payment of what I am now indebted, as being a work not to be raised from the heat of youth or the vapours of wine; like that which flows at waste from the pen of some vulgar amourist, or the trencher-fury of a riming parasite, nor to be obtained by the invocation of Dame Memory and her firen daughters; but by devout prayer to that eternal spirit, who can enrich with all utterance and knowledge, and sends out his seraphim with the hallowed fire of his altar to touch and purify the lips of whom he pleases. Here are almost leisure to discharge to greater advantage a private trust that had been committed to him. This was the care of his nephew John Philips, who having an elder brother, Edward, the uncle undertook the care of both his nephews [W]; and, being solicited by several friends, whom he did not know how to refuse the same favour for their children, it was not long before he took a handsome garden-house in Aldersgate-street fit for the purpose

(y). Here he formed the plan of his academical institution [X], setting an example of hard study and spare diet to those under him. But neither the diligence he practised in attending his academy, nor the ardent desire he had of finishing the circle of his own studies, could hinder him from taking up his pen against the Bishops [Z] in 1641; which year he published four very warm pieces in defence of the Presbyterian party, and a fifth in the year following (z). In 1643 he entered into a marriage with Mary, daughter of Richard Powell, Esq; of Foresthill in Oxfordshire (aa), a gentleman of good estate and reputation in that county, but a firm Royalist; and his daughter had not cohabited with her husband much more than a month, when, under a pretence of visiting her friends, she deserted him. Incensed at this usage, he resolved never to receive her again, and wrote several treatises in defence of that resolution [Z]; he even proceeded to make his addresses

[W] He took care of both his nephews.] They were sons of his only sister Anne; she had a considerable fortune given her by her father in marriage with Mr Everard Philips of Shrewsbury, who coming up to London young, was entered into the Crown Office in Chancery, and at length became Secretary in that office under Mr Bembo. By him she had these two sons, besides other children who died in their infancy. She married for her second husband, Mr Thomas Agar, who upon the death of his intimate friend Mr Philips, succeeded him in his place which he held for many years, and left to Mr Thomas Milton son to Sir Christopher. He had by Mr Philips's widow two daughters, Mary, who died very young, and Anne who was living in the year 1694 (34).

[X] Plan of his academical institution.] Milton's method of teaching being designed to subvert the university education, was totally the reverse of that commonly practised in schools. He did not teach the Greek and Latin by reading the elegiac, lyric, and epic poets; these languages were to be learnt by reading Plutarch, Quintilian, Cebes, and other books upon education, and then proceed to such authors as treated of natural philosophy, geography, and astronomy, &c. thence to go on to poetry and oratory. Upon this plan, the authors scarce ever heard of in common schools, were read over in his academy, from the age of ten to fifteen. For instance, of the Latins, the four writers de re rustica, i. e. of agriculture, Cato, Varro, Columella, and Palladius; Cornelius Celsus the Physician, a great part of Pliny's Natural History, Vitruvius's Architecture, Frontinus's Stratagems, and the philosophical poets, Lucretius and Manilius. Of the Greek writers, Hesiod, Aratus's Phænomena, Dyonisius de situ orbis, Oppian, Quintus Calaber, Apollonius Rhodius, Plutarch's Placita Philosophorum & περι μαθητων ἀγογίας, Geminus's Astronomy, Xenophon's Institution of Cyrus, and Ἀράβων, Ælian's Tactics, and Polyænus's Stratagems. However, Mr Philips observes (36), that by this way of teaching he reaped this advantage to himself, that he thereby enlarged in some measure his own knowledge, which might possibly have conduced to the preserving his sight, if he had not been perpetually engaged in reading and writing. The Sunday's work for his pupils was, for the most part, to read a chapter in the Greek Testament, and hear his exposition of it; after which, the next work was to write, while he dictated, some part of a System of Divinity which he had compiled from Amæsius, Wollebius, and such like writers. Yet we are assured he had his relaxations sometimes, at least, once in three weeks or a month; when he would drop into the society of some young sparks of his acquaintance, the chief whereof were two gentlemen of Gray's-Inn, the beaux of those days. Sometimes in an evening he diverted himself in visiting Lady Margaret Legh, daughter of the Earl of Marlborough (37), Lord High Treasurer of England, and President of the Council to King James the First. This lady, a woman of admirable sense and wit, much esteemed our author (38), as did also her husband Captain Hobson.

[Z] Treatises against the Bishops.] It is a remark of Joseph Scaliger, est ars quadam analedicendi. Milton had many years travelled with this burden of wrath against the prelates: hitherto he well saw, though with sorrow, the sword of this spirit was not borne in vain. But as soon as the danger of speaking was blown away by the fury of the people, now it was, that the word became in his heart as a burning fire shut up in his bones: He was weary with forbearing, and would not stay. 'Tis true he bemoans his lot which was appointed to him, because he knew more than other men. God, by his secretary, conscience, enjoined it, and it were sad for him, if he should draw back. God commanded him, and 'when God commands, says he, to take the trumpet, and blow a dolorous and jarring blast, it is not in man's will what he shall say, or what he shall conceal (39).' No wonder that all his private studies were consumed in so devouring a fire. All his ambitious views of immortality in these, gave way to the indispensable work of extirpating prelacy first, and then monarchy: whence it came to pass that Paradise Lost saw not the light 'till after the Restoration.

[Z] Treatises in defence of that resolution.] There is not perhaps a more remarkable instance how submissive a slave reason becomes sometimes to passion, than Milton has given in these books, of the doctrine and discipline of divorce: he undertakes to prove it warranted from Scripture to divorce a wife for no other reason, but only not liking her temper, cum qua libere philosophandi potestas non esset (40). He had struck up the match in great haste. It was about Whitfontide or a little after, that he took a journey into the country, no body about him certainly knowing the reason, or that it was any more than a journey of recreation. After a month's stay from home, he returns a married man, bringing the bride and some few of her nearest relations along with him. As soon as the feasting, which held for some days, was over, the relations returned to Forest-Hill, leaving their sister behind, but probably not much to her satisfaction, as appeared by the sequel. For by that time he had for a month or thereabout led a philosophical life, after having been used at home to a great house and much company and jovialty, her friends, probably incited by her own desire, made earnest suit by letter to have her company the remaining part of the summer; which was granted, on condition of her return at the time appointed; Michaelmas, or thereabout. That time expiring without any account of her, Milton sent for her by letter. This and several others being unanswered, he dispatched a messenger with a letter to fetch her home. But that was treated with some kind of contempt. This so incensed him, that thinking it dishonourable ever to receive her again, he set himself to find out arguments to support that resolution (41). Mr Fenton well observes, that Justice Powell's principles were so very opposite to those of his son-in-law, that the marriage is more to be wondered at than the separation (42); and Milton several years after defends the principles laid down in his books of divorce, as containing a necessary doctrine for those times, particularly, when the husband and wife were often bitter enemies to each other, the man living at home with his children, while the woman, the mother of the family, took up her residence in the enemy's camp, threatening death and destruction to her consort. Eo præsertim tempore cum vir sepe & conjux hostes inter se acerrimi, hic domi cum liberis, illa in castris hostium mater-familias versaretur, viro cædem atque perniciem

to a young lady of great wit and beauty, with a design to marry her (bb): but this proceeding (which was intended to cut off all thoughts of a restoration) proved to be the very occasion of effecting it. In the mean time, he did not suffer this incident to affect his care and assiduity in the academy, and in 1644, at the request of a friend, he wrote a small tract upon the subject of Education (cc); and the usual restraint upon the liberty of the press being continued by an ordinance of Parliament passed this year, he likewise wrote boldly in defence of that liberty against the ordinance [AA]. His father being come to live with him upon the surrender of Reading to the Earl of Essex's forces in April 1643, and his academy increasing, he hired a larger house in Barbican; but before his removal thither, visiting a relation in the neighbourhood, he was surprized with the entrance of his wife, who submitting herself, implored his pardon and reconciliation on her knees. So affecting a scene, being further impressed by the suitable intercessions of friends on both sides then present, proved irresistible; he took her again to his bosom, and received her as soon as he was settled, and every thing made ready for it, at his new house in Barbican, about July 1645 [BB], the same year in which he published his juvenile poems both English and Latin (dd). Not long before the new-modelling of the Army this year, it was thought he had a prospect of being appointed Agitant-General; but his late writings having rendered him obnoxious to the Presbyterian faction, all his hopes were blasted by that change [CC]. Upon the death of his father [DD], his wife's friends, who, from the time of his re-union with her, notwithstanding the provocation she had given him, had been freely entertained under his roof, took their leave of him [EE]; and, in the spring of the minitans (43). It appeared however, that he had examined the subject thoroughly, upon which account he was consulted after the Restoration by an eminent peer in a very considerable post, while a bill was depending in 1668 in the House of Lords; where it afterwards passed for a divorce of John Lord Rofs (afterwards Earl of Rutland) from his Lady (44). The assembly of Divines sitting at Westminster, when his first book was published, caused him to be summoned for it before the House of Lords, but that House, whether approving the doctrine, or not favouring the accusers, did soon dismiss him (45). From this time Milton opposed that sect as warmly as he did the cavaliers.

[AA] Wrote in defence of the liberty of the press. This piece is intitled Areopagitica, or a speech for the liberty of unlicensed printing to the Parliament of England. It was reprinted in 1738, 8vo. with a preface by another hand; wherein the author declares it to be the best defence that had ever then appeared, of this fundamental article. However, it had no effect upon the Parliament, which at that time, were mostly Presbyterians; who, as Mr Toland observes (46), were then as tenacious of continuing the restraints on others, as they had been loud in their complaints of those which were imposed upon themselves. This practice of licensing continued 'till 1649; when one Gilbert Mabbot, who held the office, was discharged of the employment at his own request, back'd with four reasons: 1. Because his authority had been affronted, by printing several books without his licence. 2. Because, in the ends of it's first institution it was illegal, being designed to stop the press against Popery, Episcopacy, and Tyranny. 3. Because it is a monopoly. 4. Because he thought it lawful to print any book without licensing, if the author subscribed his true name, so as to be answerable for the contents if punishable by the law. A Committee of the Council of State being satisfied with these and other reasons, report it to the Council, and the Council to the House; who thereupon ordered the discharge May 22d, that year (47). Soon after, our author was appointed Latin Secretary to the Council of State.

[BB] His wife returned about July, 1645. We have the following particulars of this affair from Mr Philips, who tells us, that there dwelt in the lane of St Martin's le Grand, which was hard by, a relation of our author's, one Blackborough, whom it was known he often visited; and upon this occasion the visits were more narrowly observed, and possibly there might be a combination between both parties, the friends on both sides consenting to the same action. One time above the rest, making his usual visit, the wife was ready in another room, and on a sudden he was surprized with a sight of one whom he had thought never to have seen more, making submission, and begging pardon on her knees before him. He might probably at first make some shew of aversion and rejection, but partly his own generous nature, more inclinable to a reconciliation than to perseverance in anger and revenge, and partly the strong intercession of friends on both sides, soon brought him to an act of oblivion, and a firm league of peace for the future. And it was at length concluded that she should remain in St Clement's Church-yard, at the house of one Widow Webber, whose second daughter had been married to the other brother [Sir Christopher] many years before (48). The following transaction unavoidably brings to one's mind a passage in Paradise Lost (49), wherein, as Mr Fenton observes, Milton no doubt had his eye upon this interview. In describing Adam's reconciliation to Eve after her fall, he has these lines.

Now at his feet submissive in distress (50).

The first fruits of her return to her husband was a daughter, born July 29, 1646 within a year, though, whether by bad constitution, or want of care, she grew more and more decrepit (51).

[CC] His hopes were blasted by that change His post was to be in Sir William Waller's army. This is only a strong conjecture of Mr Philips, who builds also another upon it, that if it had taken place, his uncle would probably have put his academical institution into practice. Be that as it will, so much however is certain, that in this plan he had a particular eye to the army, and has allotted a particular time every day to those exercises; in which his design was highly commendable.

[DD] Upon the death of his father. Mr Wood tells us (52), that he died about the year 1647, and that his son buried him in the chancel of St Giles's church Cripple-gate. Several good qualities in him are recorded more than once by his son (53). We have already mentioned his skill in musick, and Mr Philips assures us (54), that he had so good a taste, and made so considerable a progress in it, as to compose, 'tis said, an In Nomine of forty parts, for which he was rewarded with a gold medal and chain, by a Polish Prince, to whom he presented it. However, continues this author, so much is certain, that there are several songs of his composition after the way of those times, three or four of which are still to be seen in old Wilby's set of airs, besides some compositions of his in Ravenscroft's Psalms, whereby he gained the reputation of a considerable master in this science. The same relish to musick descended to his son, who, as has been observed, turned a handsome compliment to this accomplishment of his father, into a plea for his own choice of poetry, the sister-art.

[EE] His wife's relations took their leave Mr Fenton says (55) they did not leave him, 'till Mr Powell's affairs were first accommodated to Milton's interest in the victorious faction. This circumstance, so much to Milton's honour, is not taken notice of by Mr Philips: yet it seems to be a consequence of Milton's receiving them into his house at the taking of Oxford, when Mr Powell's estate was no doubt seized by that faction, the year 1647, he removed to a smaller house in High-Holborne, which opened backwards into Lincoln's-Inn fields, where he kept close to his studies, pleased to observe the publick affairs daily tending to the great end of his wishes (ee), 'till it was completed in the destruction of kingly government by the death of the King. But after this blow was struck, the numbers and noise raised by the Presbyterians against it, concurring with the natural fondness of the people for ancient usages, making him apprehensive of a miscarriage in the design of settling a Commonwealth, he appeared again publicly in defence of that action as the work of the Lord, in a piece intituled, The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates: Proving that it is lawful, and hath been held so through all ages, for any who have the power, to call to account a Tyrant or wicked King, and, after due conviction, to depose and put him to death, if the ordinary Magistrate have neglected or denied to do it, &c. and the Scotch Presbyterians settled at Belfast in Ireland revolting soon after from the Parliament, and joining the Marquis of Ormond, he set his pen to work to prevent the dangers, threatening the new establishment by these proceedings (ff). This piece was no sooner dispatched, than he entered upon his History of England, a work which was planned likewise in the same republican spirit, being undertaken, as he declares himself, with a view of preserving the country from submitting to monarchical government in any future time, from the example of the past (gg). But, before he had made any great progress in the execution of his plan, the Commonwealth being formed, and the Council of State erected, he was pitched upon for their Latin Secretary; and the famous Εἰκὼν Βασιλικὴ coming out about the same time, our author, by the commands of his masters, wrote and published his Iconoclastes the same year. It was also by the same orders, backed afterwards with the reward of 1000 pounds (bb), that he published, in 1651, his celebrated piece, intituled, Pro Populo Anglicano Defensio, contra Claudii Salmasii Defensionem Regiam. A Defence of the People of England, in answer to Salmasius's Defence of the King (ii). This performance spread his fame over all Europe (kk), but the victory was obtained at the expence of his eye sight (ll). Notwithstanding which, he did not desist pursuing the advantage, 'till he had compleated the triumph over his antagonist in two subsequent pieces on the same subject [FF]. faction, against which Mr Philips supposes he had been very active (56).

[FF] He triumphed in two subsequent pieces. In the first of these intituled Defensio secunda, &c. As Milton's spirit always carried him above doing his work by halves, so, towards the conclusion of this piece, he breaks out into the most fulsome eulogies upon the army and it's leaders, as Fleetwood, Lambert, Desborough, Whalley, and Overton; as also, of his masters, Whidlock, Pickering, Strickland, Sidenham, Bradshaw, and, above all, of Cromwell, who had been installed Protector not many months before, to whom he sent a present of his book immediately after the publication in May 1654: for which purpose he made use of his friend Andrew Marvell, as appears by that gentleman's answer, which we shall insert here, as a supplement to his article which was wrote before this letter appeared in print.

' Honoured Sir,

' I did not satisfy myself in the account I gave you of presenting your book to my Lord, altho' it seemed to me, that I wrote to you all, which the messenger's speedy return the same night from Eton would permit me. And I perceive, that by reason of that haste, I did not give you satisfaction neither, concerning the delivery of your letter at the same time. Be pleased therefore to pardon me, and know that I tendered them both together. But my Lord read not the letter, while I was with him; which I attributed to our dispatch, and some other business tending thereto, which I therefore wished ill to, so far as it hindered an affair much better, and of greater importance, I mean that of reading your letter. And to tell you truly, mine own imagination, I thought that he would not open it, while I was there, because he might suspect, that I delivering it just upon my departure, might have brought in it some second proposition, like to that which you have before made to him by your letter to my advantage. However, I assure myself, that he has since read it, and you, that he did then witness all respect to your person, and as much satisfaction concerning your work as could be expected from so curfury a review, and so sudden an account as he could then have of it from me. Mr Oxenbridge*, at his return from London, will, I know, give you thanks for his book, as I do with all acknowledgment and humility, for that you have sent me. I shall now study it even to the getting it by heart,

' esteeming it according to my poor judgment, (which yet I wish it were as right in all things else) as the most compendious scale, for so much, to the height of the Roman eloquence. When I consider how equally it turns and rises with so many figures, it seems to me a Trajan's column, in whose winding ascent we see embossed the several monuments of your learned victories; and Salmasius and Morus make up as great a triumph as that of Decebalus, whom too, for ought I know, you shall have forced as Trajan the other, to make themselves away out of a just desperation.

' I have an affectionate curiosity to know what becomes of Colonel Overton's business †, and am exceedingly glad to think that Mr Skinner is got near you; the happiness which I at the same time congratulate to him, and envy, there being none, who does, if I may so say, more jealously honour you, than,

We see Morus (57) mentioned as the author of the piece intituled Regii sanguinis clamor adversus parricidas Anglicanos, against which Milton wrote this Defensio secunda, who also treats Morus as the author, but he was only the publisher; the book being actually wrote by Peter du Moulin the younger, afterwards Prebendary of Canterbury, who tells us, that Morus being uneasy at the severe attack upon his character by Milton, began to grow cool in the royal cause, and in his answer appealed to two gentlemen of great credit with the Parliament party who knew the real author of the Regii sanguinis clamor. This exposed du Moulin to great danger, being then in England. But he informs us, that Milton being unwilling to own himself guilty of a mistake, persisted in his accusation; so that the Parliament party let the true author escape with impunity, lest they should publicly contradict the patron of their cause (58).

the feat of his publick employ, to an apartment prepared for him in Scotland Yard [GG]; whence he soon removed again to a garden house in Petty France Westminster, opening into St James's Park. This was in 1652, and the same year he buried his wife; who died of a consumption not long after the delivery of her fourth child [HH]; and, about the same time, his eye-sight became totally extinct by a gutta serena, which had been growing upon him many years [II]. When Cromwell set aside the Council of State, and took the supreme power into his own hands in 1653, the change affected not Milton [KK]; who continued in his office of Secretary to the Protector, whom, as well as his son, he served with the same zeal and fidelity as he had done his first masters. In the mean time, he employed his leisure hours in prosecuting his private studies [LL], wherein he was so far from being discouraged by the loss of his sight, that he even conceived hopes this misfortune would add new vigour to his genius, and resolved to follow the example of Telephus King of the Mysians, who readily consented to be healed by the weapon [his studies] from which he received his wound (m m). Thus animated, he married a second wife about the year 1650 (n n). After the deposition of Richard, being still continued in his Secretary's post, upon [GG] He removed to Scotland-Yard.] While his apartment there was getting ready, he took lodgings at one Thomfon's, next door to the Bull-head Tavern Charing-Cross, opening into the Spring-garden (59). And while he was there, the following piece was written and published: Johannis Philippi Angli Responso ad apologiam anonymi cujusdam Tenebrionis pro rege & populo Anglicano infansissimum. By this title Milton had a mind to give the honour to his nephew and ward, who might indeed prepare the first draught, but that was so carefully examined and amended by Milton as to pass for his own.

[HH] His wife died soon after the delivery of her fourth child.] The births of all her children were registered by Milton in a family bible, as follows: Anne my daughter was born July 29th, about half an hour after six in the morning, 1646. Mary my daughter was born on Wednesday, October 25th, on the fast day in the morning about six of the clock, 1648. My son John was born on Saturday, March 16th, about half an hour past nine at night, 1650. My daughter Deborah was born the 2d of May, being Sunday, somewhat before three of the clock in the morning, 1652 (60).

[II] He entirely lost his eye-sight.] By reason of his continual studies, and the head-ach, to which he was subject from his youth, and his perpetual tampering with physick, his eyes had been decaying for several years, and the sight of one entirely lost for a long time (61). He tells us himself, that when he was enjoined by publick authority to write his Defence of the people of England against Salmasius, he was in an ill state of health, and the sight of one eye was almost lost already, the Physicians declaring that he would lose the other, if he should attempt that work (62). In a letter of his to Leonard Philaras, Envoy from the Duke of Parma to the King of France, dated at Westminster September 28th, 1654: he gives a particular account of the manner in which he lost his sight, as follows. 'Since you advised me not to fling away all hopes of recovering my sight, for that you had a friend at Paris, Thevenot the Physician, particularly famous for the eyes, whom you offer to consult in my behalf, if you receive from me an account, by which he may judge of the symptoms and cause of my disease; I will do what you advise me to, that I may not seem to refuse any assistance, that is offered, perhaps from God. I think 'tis about ten years, more or less, since I began to perceive that my eye-sight grew weak and dim, and at the same time my spleen and bowels to be troubled with stasis; and in the morning, when I began to read, according to my custom, my eyes grew painful immediately, and to refuse reading, but was refreshed after a moderate exercise of the body. A certain iris began to surround the light of the candle, if I looked at it; soon after which, on the left part of the left eye (for that was some years sooner clouded) a mist arose, which hid every thing on that side; and looking forward, if I shut my right eye, objects appeared smaller. My other eye also, for these last three years, failing by degrees, some months before all sight was abolish'd, things which I looked upon seemed to swim to the right and left. Certain inveterate vapours seem to possess my forehead and temples, which after meat especially, quite to evening, generally urge and depress my eyes with a sleepy heaviness. Nor would I omit, that whilst there was as yet some remainder of sight, I no sooner lay down on my bed, and turned on my side, but a copious light dazzled out of my shut eyes; and as my sight diminished, every day colours gradually more obscure flashed out with vehemence; but now that the lucid is in a manner wholly extinct, a direct blackness, or else spotted, and as it were woven with ash colour, is used to pour itself in. Nevertheless the constant and settled darkness that is before me, as well by night as by day, seems nearer the whitish than the blackish, and the eye rolling itself a little, seems to admit, I know not what, smallness of light, as thro' a chink (63). Milton bore this affliction with a most exemplary fortitude, both as a Philosopher and a Christian, as appears by all his writing afterwards, though he bewailed his case pathetically in his Paradise Lost.

[KK] The change affected not Milton.] This part of our author's conduct is perhaps the least defensible of any. Hitherto he had acted a consistent part, at least, in steadily opposing monarchy, but now he not only submitted, but was active in supporting a tyrant. For such 'tis universally agreed the Protector soon grew to be; complimenting him with the most fulsome flattery, abjectly crouching to wear the yoke of slavery, and even licking the hand that put it on. Here his much boasted resolution not to do a mean thing failed him; mean time he acted this part with such an ill grace, that his Lord and Master saw the spirit though chained, yet growling, and therefore employed him, but did not trust him, as is evident from Marvell's letter in particular, and in general, from hence, that neither in the vast collection of Thurloe's papers, nor any where else, is there the least appearance of it. Herein his coadjutor John Lilburne, was more steady, and acted in this respect a more consistent part. This difference in their conduct plainly was owing to the different composition of the two men: Lilburne had a natural hardness of mind that rendered him insensible to danger. Milton's mind was cast in a delicate and tender mould; whence, though he felt the yoke, yet he only fretted inwardly, but durst not speak. Besides his chief ambition was gratified, and he was happy in feeling that he had rendered his fame immortal by his defence of that tyranny.

[LL] He employed his leisure hours in his private studies.] After the publication of his Defensio pro se in 1655, the silence of his antagonist giving him leisure, he employed it upon his History of Britain, to which he added two more books. Part of his time was likewise bestowed on his Theaurus linguae Latinae upon the plan of R. Stephens. A work which he had begun long before, in making collections from his own reading, and which he still went on with at times, even very near to his dying day. After his death the papers were so discomposed and deficient, that they could not be made fit for the press (64). But they gave birth to the Cambridge Dictionary published in 1693, 4to: the editors of which observe, that they made three large folio volumes, containing a collection out of all the best and purest Roman authors. But above all, Mr Philips assures us, that his uncle had now pitched upon his grand design in Paradise Lost, and begun to work upon it (65). In 1658, he published Sir Walter Raleigh's Cabinet Council, &c from a manuscript in his own possession, written by Sir Walter (66).

upon the return of the Long-Parliament [MM], while they were suffered to sit, he appeared again in print, pleading for a further reformation of the laws relating to religion [NN]. And, in the anarchy that ensued in 1659, he drew up several methods for re-establishing the Commonwealth, exerting all his faculties to prevent the King's restoration [OO], 'till the visibly near approach of that event made him think proper to consult his safety, by withdrawing to a friend's house in Bartholomew-Close (oo). By this means, though his Iconoclastes, and his Defence of the People of England, &c. were both burnt by the hangman, yet our author escaped the particular prosecution at first intended against him [PP]; and a just esteem for his admirable parts and learning having procured him many friends among those who detested his principles (pp), he was included in the general amnesty [QQ]. As soon as this storm was quite blown over, he quitted his concealment, and took a house in Holborne near Red-Lyon-fields, but soon removed near Aldersgate-street to Jewin-street; and having employed his friend Dr Paget to chuse him a third [MM] He was continued Latin Secretary to the Long Parliament ] His letters wrote in the execution of this office, are a most illustrious proof of his absolute mastery of that language. They are composed upon the most difficult subjects, and are preserved as the best models to his successors in that post. To these are generally added the Protector's Manifesto, containing the reasons inducing him to make war with Spain in 1655, as being the undoubted production of Milton's pen, and some have not without probability given him the honour of the Latin verses (sometimes ascribed to his friend Andrew Marvell) and sent with his picture as a present to Christina Queen of Sweden.

[NN] He appeared again in print, &c.] The Protector had more than once punished people for their religious opinions: this had satisfied Milton's conscience, and kept him discreetly silent. But now that the Long Parliament was restored, he took up his pen again in the cause which was then under the consideration of that Council. To them, being still Secretary for foreign affairs, he addresses this piece, under the title of A Treatise of the Civil Power in Ecclesiastical Cases, &c. with high compliments of their integrity, not without glancing upon the mis-rule of the late government. Accordingly we find that this piece restored him to the good opinion of some of his republican friends, who, by his conduct during the Protectorship, had questioned his attachment to their principles. Dr Birch has given us a copy of some extracts from a letter of one Mr Wall of Caulham, dated May 6th 1659, who after returning thanks to Milton for his letters, adds, 'I confess I have (even in my privacy in the country) oft had thoughts of you, and that with much respect, for your friendship to truth in your early years and in bad times. But I was uncertain whether your relation to the court, (tho' I think a Commonwealth was more friendly to you than a Court) had not clouded your former light: but your last book resolved that doubt. You complain of the non-proficiency of the nation and it's retrograde motion of late in liberty and spiritual truths. It is much to be bewailed, but still let us pity human frailty. When those who made deep protestations of their zeal for our liberty both spiritual and civil, and made the fairest offers to be assertors thereof, and whom we thereupon trusted, when those being inflated in power, shall betray the good thing committed to them, and lead us back to Egypt, and by that force which we gave them to win us liberty, hold us fast in chains; what can poor people do! you know who they were that watched our Saviour's sepulchre to keep him from rising.' Mr Wall then urges him to proceed to that other subject which he had promised, that hire greatly impedes truth and liberty (67), and which Milton soon after executed in his Considerations on the likeliest Means to remove Hirelings out of the Church.

[OO] To prevent the King's restoration ] The dissolution of the Long Parliament by the Army in October 1659, put our author into unimaginable confusion. He immediately saw the King returned, and himself and all his towering hopes ruined. It was now not a time to make complaints of this step of the Army; he pumped his invention for a present remedy to save all from the threatening ruin, and proposed a model, which, though not the best, yet such as might serve the present necessity, in a letter to a friend concerning the ruptures in the Commonwealth; which was followed by another piece, Of the present means and brief delineation of a true Commonwealth to be put in practice, and without delay. About this time Mr Oldenburg, afterwards Secretary to the Royal Society, urged him to write the history of the present commotions, to which our author replied, in a letter dated December 20, in such terms as expressed his sentiments of the Army's proceeding (68). In February this year, upon a prospect of the King's return, he published his Easy way to establish a free Commonwealth, &c. This was soon after attacked in a burlesque pamphlet, intitled, The Censure of the Rota upon Mr Milton's Club, intitled, The ready and easy Way, &c. London, printed by Paul Giddy, Printer to the Rota, at the sign of the Wind-Mill in Turn-again-Lane, 1660. This came out in March (69), and upon the publication of a sermon intitled, The Fear of God and the King, preached by Matthew Griffith, D. D. at Mercer's Chapel on the 25th of that month, Milton immediately published Brief Notes upon it, which were remarked upon by Roger L'Estrange, in a piece intitled No blind Guides, printed in his apology at London, 1660, 4to.

[PP] He escaped prosecution.] June 16, 1660, the House of Commons resolved, that the King be moved to call in Milton's two books mentioned above, in order to be burnt; and that the Attorney-General do proceed against him, and Godwin, by indictment or otherwise. June 27th an order of Council reciting that vote of the 16th, and that the persons were not to be found, directs a proclamation for calling in Milton's two books, and a proclamation was issued accordingly, and another to the same purpose, August 13th; on the 27th of that Month, the books were burnt by the hangman, and on the 29th passed the act of oblivion, without excepting Milton, who then thought he had no reason to abscond any longer. But the Attorney-General not being discharged of the order to prosecute, had him taken up, and he was put into the custody of the Serjeant at Arms, as appears from the following minutes in their books Saturday December 15th, 1660: 'Ordered that Mr Milton, now in custody of the Serjeant at Arms attending this house, be forthwith released paying his fees.' And another dated Monday December 17th: 'A complaint made that the Serjeant at Arms had demanded excessive fees for the imprisonment of Mr Milton. Ordered, that it be referred to the Committee for privileges to examine this business, and to call Mr Milton and the Serjeant before them, and to determine what is fit to be given the Serjeant for his fees in this case (70).'

[QQ] He was included in the general amnesty.] Mr Richardson tells us, that his friends on this occasion were Secretary Morris and Sir Thomas Clarges, who managed matters artfully in his favour.' But his Majesty's goodness therein was so extraordinary and unexpected, that a particular cause has been sought for it, and at last we are told, that Mr Richardson the Painter was told by Mr Pope the poet, who had it from Betterton the player, who was brought upon the stage by Sir William d'Avenant, that this last gentleman had obtained Milton's pardon, in return for the same favour to himself, procured by Milton's interest in 1650, when the former was under condemnation (71). Milton himself intimates, that his pardon was not obtained without difficulty, in a letter to Mr Heimbach, Counsellor to the Elector of Brandenburg; who having made him a handsome compliment on account of his writings, received an answer containing the following expression: Earum (sc. prolium metaphorice pro librorum) una (72) non ita belle charitatem hospitii mihi reddidit, quam enim politicam tu vocas ego pietatem in patriam dictam abs te malle, ea me, pulebro nomine delinitum, prope, ut ita dicam, expatriavi (73).

(69) In May there appeared a more serious answer, intitled, The Dignity of Kingship asserted, in answer to Mr Milton's ready and easy way, &c. dedicated and presented to his most excellent Majesty Charles II. of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, true hereditary King.

comfort (qq), on his recommendation he married Elizabeth, daughter of Mr Minshull a Cheshire gentleman [RR], related to the doctor, and not long after removed to a house in the Artillery-walk leading to Bunhill-fields [SS]. Though Milton's circumstances were much reduced, by some very considerable losses at the Restoration [TT], yet his principles not suffering him to engage in any publick employ at Court [UU], he sat down to his studies * [WW], and applied himself diligently to finish his grand poem. In 1665, he retired with his family from the plague, to a small house, which had been hired for him at St Giles's Chalfont in Buckinghamshire. Before he left the country he completed his Paradise Lost; and having, from a hint given him in a visit there by a friend, begun his Paradise Regained [XX], that poem was finished not long after his return to London, which he did as soon as the sickness was over in 1666 (rr). The first of these was published in 1667, and the other in 1670 [YY]. He had published his History of Britain

(rr) His house in Blead Street, which was all then remaining of his paternal estate, and which we are told foreigners used to visit out of pure devotion, was burnt in the fire of London this year. Wood's Faſti, Vol. 1. col. 266.

[RR] His third wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Mr Minshull a Cheshire gentleman. He had no issue by this wife, who survived him, and after his death retired to her friends in Cheshire. There the writer of this life saw her at Namptwich, where she lived about the year 1724. She seemed to have no notion of her husband's great fame, and said he left no great matter at his death. She was much respected by Mr Minshull, an eminent Counsellor about this time.

[SS] A house in the Artillery-walk, &c. Mr Philips observes (74), that this was his last stage in this world, but it was of many years continuance, more perhaps, than he had had in any other place. Here we are told, that he used to sit in a grey coarse cloth coat at the door in warm summer weather, to enjoy the fresh air, and so, as well as in his own room, received the visits of people of distinguished parts, as well as quality. The same writer tells us, he had an original picture of Milton given him by Dr Wright an ancient Clergy-man in Dorsetshire, who told him, that Milton lived in a small house, but one room, as he thought, on a floor; where he found him up one pair of stairs, in a chamber hung with rusty green, sitting in an elbow-chair; black cloaths, and neat enough, pale, but not cadaverous; his hands and fingers gouty, and with chalk-stones: and that among other discourse he expressed himself to this purpose, that was he free from the pain this gave him, his blindness would be tolerable (75).

[TT] Considerable losses at the Restoration. He had saved out of his Secretary's salary 2000*l* which being lodged in the excise, and that bank failing at the Restoration, he lost (76). He was possessed also of an estate of 60*l* a year, in Westminster which was resumed at this time by the right owners, the Dean and Chapter of Westminster-Abbey. Mr Philips also tells us, that he lost a considerable sum of money by a bad security which failed (77). It is reported too, that he had lent most part of his personal estate upon the publick faith, which, when he somewhat earnestly and warmly pressed to have restored, observing how all in offices had not only feathered their own nests, but had enriched many of their relations and creatures, before the publick debts were discharged, after a long and chargeable attendance, met with very sharp rebukes: upon which, at last, despairing of any success in this affair, he was forced to return from them poor and friendless, having spent all his money, and wearied all his friends (78). This story is thought to receive additional credit from that passage in the unlicensed pages of his British History, where he observes how all in offices had enriched themselves and their creatures upon the breach of the publick faith (79). If this be granted, we have here another reason for his great joy at the termination of the protectorial power, which gave him no relief in this complaint.

[UU] Resolving not to engage in any publick employ. Concerning this matter we have the following story from Mr Richardson, upon the authority of Henry Bendish, Esq; a descendent by his mother's side from the Protector Oliver Cromwell; that their family and Milton's were in great intimacy, both before and after his death; that Mr Bendish had heard the widow or daughter of Milton, or both, say, that soon after the Restoration the King offered to employ this pardoned man as Latin Secretary, the post in which he served Cromwell with so much integrity and ability: Milton withstood the offer; his wife pressed his compliance. Thou art in the right, says he, you, as other women, would ride in your coach; for me, my aim is to live and die an honest man (80).

he had a person to read to him, who was usually the son of some gentleman of his acquaintance, and undertook that office in the view of his own improvement by Milton's conversation and instructions. Mr Thomas Ellwood, afterwards one of the most eminent writers among the Quakers, and who gives us this account, attended him for these purposes, being recommended to him by Dr Paget, and went every day in the afternoon, except Sunday, and read to him such books in the Latin tongue, as Milton thought proper, who taught him the foreign pronunciation of that language, and explained to him all the difficult passages that occurred in his reading (81).

[XX] Begun his Paradise Regained, from a hint given him by a friend in the country. This friend was Mr Ellwood, who visiting him there, had Paradise Lost then finished put into his hands by Milton to read over, and give him his judgment, which, upon returning it, he modestly and freely told him; and after some further discourse about it, says Mr Ellwood, I pleasantly said to him: Thou hast said much of Paradise Lost, but what hast thou to say of Paradise Found. He made me no answer, but sat some time in a muse, then broke off that discourse, and fell upon another subject. When Mr Ellwood afterwards waited upon him in London, Milton shewed him his Paradise Regained, and in a pleasant tone said to him. This is owing to you; for you put it into my head by the question you put to me at Chalfont, which, before, I had not thought of (82).

[YY] The first was published in 1667, and the other in 1670. That Paradise Lost was published in 1667, is evident from Milton's contract for the copy with his bookfeller Mr Simonds, which bears date April 27th that year; and the contract also shews, that he sold the copy for no more than five pounds down, and five pounds more after the sale of 1300 of the first impression, and five pounds after so many were sold of the second impression, the number of each impression not to exceed 1500 (83). Milton did not live to enjoy the benefit of the second impression, which was published in 1674. In this edition, the poem which at first contained only ten was divided into twelve books. The third edition was published in 1678, and it appears that Milton had left his remaining right in the copy to his widow, who agreed with Simonds to accept of eight pounds in full of all demands. The receipt for the money is dated December 21, 1680. A little before this, Simonds had consented to assign the whole right of copy to Brabazon Aylmer, bookfeller, for 25*l*. and this Aylmer afterwards sold one half to Jacob Tonson (84) August 17, 1683, and the other half, with a considerable advance in the price, March 24th, 1690; there having been a pompous edition in 1688, published by subscription; wherein appear the names of Dorset, Waller, Dryden, Aldrich, Aterbury, and all the men of distinguished talents in polite literature at that time. It has gone through numberless editions since, particularly one in 1727, 8vo. with an account of Milton's life, by Mr Elijah Fenton. Another in 1749, by Dr Thomas Newton, D. D. with notes of various authors, as Hume, Addison, Bentley, Pearce, Richardson, father and son, Warburton, Jortin, Upton, Heylin, and Thyer. It was translated into blank verse in low Dutch, and printed in 1728; into French prose, in 1729; into Italian verse by Rolli in 1736*; into Latin, together with Paradise Regained, and Samson Agonistes, by Mr Hog a Scotchman, in 1690; by Dr Trapp, in 1741; and his first six books in 1750, and the rest in 1753, by Dobson †. This being reputed the best, Mr Dobson received a thousand pounds which had been proposed for this undertaking in 1735, by Mr Benson auditor of the imprest.

Britain the preceding year, and in 1672 came out his Artis Logicæ plenior Institutio. Upon the indulgence granted to the Dissenters the following year, he published a Defence of Universal Toleration for Sectaries of all Denominations except Papists [Z Z]. The same year he likewise printed a new edition of his Poems on Several Occasions, with additions, which was followed the next year by his Epistolarum Familiarium, Lib. I. & Prolusiones quædam Oratoricæ in Collegio Christi habitæ. The same year there likewise appeared in publick, translated by him from the Dutch, A Declaration of the Poles, concerning the Election of their King John III. This year too, 1674, he paid the last debt to nature at his house in Bunhill-fields, in the beginning of November (s s), and was interred on the 12th of that month (t t) near his father, in the chancel of the church of St Giles's Cripplegate, attended by a great number of his friends. But no monument being found there [A A A], a decent one was erected to his memory in 1737, in Westminster-abbey, by William Benson, one of the Auditors of the Imprest (u u). Though his death was occasioned by the gout, yet was it so easy, that the persons attending in the room did not perceive the time of his expiring (v v). He left the following pieces in manuscript, The Brief History of Muscovy, and of their less known countries, lying eastward of Russia as far as Cathay, printed at London, 1682, 8vo. and an Idea Theologia, as 'tis said, in the hands of Cyriac Skinner of Mark-lane. We are told also, that he had prepared for the press an answer to some little scribbling quack in London, who had written a scurrilous libel against him; but either by the dissuasion of friends, as thinking him not worth notice, or for what other cause, is not known, this answer was never published (x x). As to his person, in his youth he was remarkably handsome, on which account, while at Cambridge, he was called the Lady of Christ's-college (y y). The colour of his hair was a light brown; the symmetry of his features exact, enlivened with an agreeable air, and a beautiful mixture of fair and ruddy, which gave occasion to the compliment paid him by John Baptista Manso before-related (z z). He tells us himself he was blue-eyed (a a a); but Mr Wood says (b b b), his eyes were none of the quickest. His stature, as we find it measured by himself, did not exceed the middle size (c c c). He was neither too lean nor too corpulent; his limbs well proportioned, nervous, and active; but his constitution was tender, and his health infirm. In his diet abstemious; not delicate in the choice of his dishes (d d d); and

As Paradise Regained was a work of much less time, so notwithstanding some pains taken lately to raise it's reputation, yet the general opinion, comparing it with Paradise Lost, is still that which was established by Mr Fenton in those pathetic words: Oh! what a falling off was there! Samson Agonistes was published with this last poem: Mr Warburton censures this piece as having a certain gloominess not seen in Paradise Lost (85); and Mr Mason observes, that Milton being angry at the reception of that poem, resolved in the plan of this to shew his resentment, by not-complying with the bad taste of the times; but that this drove him into the contrary extreme. 'The contempt, says that author, in which perhaps with justice he held the age he lived in, prevented him from condescending either to amuse or instruct it: he had before given to his unworthy countrymen the noblest poem that genius, conducted by ancient art, could produce; and he had seen them receive it with disregard, if not with dislike. Conscious therefore of his own dignity and of their demerit, he looked to posterity only for his reward *, and to posterity only directed his future labours. Hence it was, perhaps, that he formed the Samson Agonistes upon a model more simple and more severe, than even Athens herself would have demanded, and took Æschylus for his master, rather than Sophocles or Euripides; intending by this conduct to set as great a distance as possible between himself and his contemporary writers, and to make his works, as himself said, much different from what amongst them passed for the best. The success of the poem was accordingly what one would have expected; the age it appeared in treated it with total neglect, neither hath that posterity to which he appealed, and which has done justice to most of his other writings, as yet given to this excellent piece it's full measure of popular and universal fame; perhaps in your closet, and that of a few more, who can admire genuine nature and ancient simplicity, the Agonistes may hold a distinguished rank; yet surely we cannot say in Hamlet's phrase, that it pleases the multitude, it is caveare to the generality (86).'

[Z Z] A defence of universal toleration.] In this piece Milton lumps Lutherans, Calvinists, Anabaptists, Arminians, Arians, and Socinians, all into one mass, as having an equal right to a toleration, because, as he here maintains, they are not heretics. 'The Arian and Socinian, says he, are charged to dispute against ' the Trinity; they affirm to believe the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, according to Scripture and the Apostolic creed; as for terms of Trinity, Tri-unity, Co-essentiality, Tri-personality, and the like, they reject them, as scholastic notions, not to be found in scripture, which by a general Protestant maxim, is plain and perspicuous abundantly to explain it's own meaning in the properest words, belonging to so high a matter, and so necessary to be known; a mystery indeed in their sophistical subtleties, but in scripture a plain doctrine. Their other opinions are of less moment; they dispute the satisfaction of Christ, or rather the word satisfaction as not scriptural: but they acknowledge him both God, and their Saviour (87).' This passage shews, that Milton in this point had changed his opinion; for in his younger days he was orthodox, as it is called, with respect to the Arians, as appears from several passages in his book Of Reformation in England, where having observed, that 'every true Christian will be a martyr when he is called to it, it does not presently follow, that every one suffering for religion is so without exception.— Witnes the Arians and Pelagians, which were slain by the heathen for Christ's sake, yet we take both these for no true friends of Christ (88).' 'Tis observable, that our author also changed his sentiments more than once, with regard to the several sects of religion. For in his early years he was a favourer of the Puritans: in his middle age he was best pleased with the Independents and Anabaptists, as allowing more liberty than others, and coming nearest in his opinion to the primitive practice; but in the latter part of his life he was not a profest member of any particular sect among Christians; he frequented none of their assemblies, nor made use of any of their peculiar rites in his family (89).

[A A A] But no monument being found there.] Mr Fenton tells us, that he had desired a friend of his to enquire at that church about it, and the sexton shewed a small monument, which he said was supposed to be Milton's, but the inscription had never been legible since he was employed in that office, which he had possessed above forty years. This surely could never have happened, says Mr Fenton, in so short a space of time, unless the epitaph had been industriously erased, and that supposition carries with it so much inhumanity, that I think we ought to believe it was not erected to his memory (90).'

and strong liquors of all kinds were his aversion. Being sadly convinced how much his health had suffered by night studies in his younger years, he used to go early, seldom later than nine, to rest, and rose commonly in the summer at four, and in the winter at five, in the morning. But when he was not disposed to rise at his usual hours, he had always one to read to him by his bed-side (eee). At his first rising, he had usually a chapter read to him out of the Hebrew Bible, and he commonly studied all the morning 'till twelve; then he used some exercise for an hour; afterwards dined, and after dinner played on the organ, and either sung himself or made his wife sing, who he said had a good voice but no ears; and then he went up to study again 'till six, when his friends came to visit him, and sat with him 'till eight. Then he went down to supper, which was usually olives, or some light thing; and after supper he smoked his pipe, drank a glass of water, and went to bed (fff). When his blindness restrained him from other exercises, he had a machine to swing in to preserve his health. His deportment was erect, open, and affable, and his conversation easy, chearful, and instructive. His genius [BBB] and reading are seen in his works. His favourite author was Homer, whom he could almost repeat, and had been advised to translate into English; but that he thought beneath his talent (bbb). Hitherto he is admirably excellent, and in many respects without an equal; an honour to his country, and even to human nature. But we must not suffer ourselves to be dazzled by these brilliances, so as not to see and acknowledge his failings; we may wish there had been no such to lament, but they are too notorious to deny or disguise: and when we find his principles guilded with the specious name of the love of absolute liberty, and dislike of the trappings and expence of Kingly Majesty (iii), it only serves to bring to our minds his contemporary John Lilburne and his rabble, who were ever swelling their throats with the same cry. But to leave this irksome (though to an historian indispensable) task, of uttering disagreeable truths, we shall be inclined to forgive this, for the sake of the other, part of his moral and religious character; for it is agreed on all sides, that he was a zealous follower of moral beauty and virtue, with a thorough contempt for the opinion of the meer vulgar. The great view of his private studies was to be able to promote the practice of this by some grand performance. He ever expressed the profoundest reverence for the Deity, as well in deeds as in words; and would say to his friends, that the divine properties of goodness, justice, and mercy, were the adequate rules of human actions, nor less the object of imitation for private advantage, than of admiration or respect for their own excellence and perfection (kkk). Though the estate left him by his father was but small, yet his frugality made it serve both himself and his family. Towards the latter end of his life he sold the greater part of his library, because the heirs he left could not make a right use of it, and he thought he could dispose of it more to their advantage than they would be able to do themselves. He died worth 1500 pounds in money, besides his household goods. His three wives were all maidens when he married them (lll), but he had no children except by the first. His three daughters survived him, and the two youngest used to read to him (mmm) [CCC]; they read
