There is one remarkable circumstance of our author's history which is entirely omitted by Mr Sewell, and so slightly touched by his friend Mr Smith, that it seems to require a further explanation; I mean his love-affair with Mrs Mary Meers, daughter to the then Principal of Brazen-nose college. This lady, who had a very good share of natural sense, wanted none of those accomplishments which the advantage of a genteel education could give her; besides the ordinary embellishments of music and dancing, her father had been at the pains of instructing her in the Latin language, and she was a compleat mistress of French and Italian; in her person, she was an agreeable brunette, without any thing very striking, except a full black piercing eye*. Dr Meers, being a Herefordshire man, took occasion from thence frequently to invite his countryman, a young student universally beloved and admired, to his lodge, where our author had the ill luck to see and conceive a secret passion for the daughter, who had long practis'd all the airs which the sense of her high station in that university, and her uncommon personal accomplishments, could inspire, and did not fail to treat him with her usual disdain; thus awed, he never had courage to hint his passion to her (p); but like a true Strephon, poured forth his complaints in verse (q): And it must be owned his constitution, both of body and mind, was much too delicate for his mistress's taste [K]. It is something remarkable that there were two poets of both the names of our author who flourished in his time; one of which was nephew to Milton, and wrote several things, particularly some part of Virgil travestied (r); the other seems to have been the exact reverse of Mr St John's friend in his principles, if we may judge by his writing, which are two political farces, I. The E. of Mar marr'd, with the humors of Jocky the bigblander. II. The Pretender's flight: or, a mock Coronation, with the humors of the facetious Harry St John; both printed in 1716 (s). As to our author, the innocence and integrity of his life was beyond all exception; and there never, I believe, was any more than one single person (t) who took it into his head to censure his writings, and it is well remarked, that it is no great compliment to his judgment that he has the honour to stand alone in that reflection; it were easy to retort upon him, were it not ungenerous to blast the fruits of his latter spring (u), by comparing them with the crudities of his first; that satire upon our author has, with it's other brethren, been dead long since; and I believe the world would have quite forgot that ever it had any being, had not Mr Smith taken care to inform us of it in a work of a more durable nature (w) [L].

* From my own knowledge.

(p) What is here related of our author's passion for Mrs Meers was well known in the university then, and some time after, when I was there.

(q) See the three concluding stanzas of his Ode to Mr St John.

(r) See Jacob's Lives and Characters of the Poets, Vol. II. P. 133.

(s) Ibid. Vol. I. P. 296.

(t) Sir Richard Blackmore.

(u) Creation, a Poem.

(w) Viz. His Poem to the Memory of our author.

[K] His constitution both of body and mind was too delicate for his mistress's taste] With regard to the first, the account given above of Mr Philips's consumptive constitution, shews how little he was fitted for amorous conflicts; and, in respect to the latter, we see the purity and delicacy of his love in the following rapturous flight upon that subject:

——— O! ye Gods, might I
Elect my fate, my happiest choice should be
A fair and modest virgin, that invites
With aspect chaste, forbidding loose desires,
Tenderly smiling; in whose heav'nly eye
Sits purest love enthron'd ——— (14).

The truth is, Mrs Maria Meers was a lady that knew no pleasure with the young fellows like that of intriguing; and was generally believed, not without good reason, to be married clandestinely to one of the Fellows of Brazen-nose-college for many years. After her father's death, she lived in a house in Holywell at Oxford, where that gentleman spent the best of his time with her.

[L] Had not Mr Smith informed us of it in a work of a more durable nature.] The verses are these:

A haughty bard, to fame by volumes rais'd,
At Dick's and Batson's, and thro' Smithfield, prais'd,
Cries out aloud—Bold Oxford bard, forbear
With rugged numbers to torment my ear;
Yet not like thee the heavy critic foars,
But paints in fustian, or in turn deplores;
With Bunyan's style profanes heroic songs,
To the tenth page lean homilies prolongs;
For far-fetch'd rhymes makes puzzled angels strain,
And in low phrase dull Lucifer complain;
His envious muse by native dulness curs'd,
Damns the best poems, and contrives the worst.
Beyond his praise or blame thy works prevail,
Compleat, where Dryden and thy Milton fail;
Great Milton's wing on lower themes subsides,
And Dryden oft' in rhyme his weakness hides;
You ne'er with gingling words deceive the ear,
And yet in humble subjects great appear.
Thrice happy youth, whom noble Isis crowns,
Whom Blackmore censures, and Godolphin owns.
(15)

(15) Lord-Treasurer Godolphin made our author a present for his Poem on Blenheim.

PITCAIRNE [ARCHIBALD], an eminent Physician who first brought the mechanic principles of that art into this island: He was born at Edinburgh, on Christmas-day 1652; and descended of an ancient house Pitcairne of Pitcairne in the county of Fife (a), remarkable for their Loyalty to the House of Stuart; in defence of whose cause the whole family very narrowly escaped being intirely ruined and extinguished; every male child of it then born being slain at the battle of Fludden-field, fighting for James IV.: The estate was also seized by the opposite party; but the widow being delivered of a posthumous son, all the lands of Pitcairne were restored by James V. to the heir (b), from whom, after several generations, sprung our author, whose father was a merchant of the first rank at Edinburgh, and a magistrate of that city; his mother's name was Sydfell, of a good family in East-Lothian, descended of Rochlaw. He was put to school, first at a little village near Edinburgh, called Dalkeith; and as soon as he had made a competent progress in classical learning, was removed to the university of Edinburgh, where, after he had gone through a preparatory course of Philosophy, he was directed by his friends to apply to the study of Divinity, which, however, he did not stick to long [A]; for that profession not at all suiting the vivacity and freedom of his genius, his father permitted him, though not without some reluctance, to relinquish it and take to the Law; this being more agreeable to him, he pursued it with an attention that was natural to his ambition, of excelling in every thing he undertook. But this intenseness proving too much for his constitution, it was not long before it brought him into an ill state of health, which threatening a hectic consumption, he set out, by the advice of his Physicians, for Montpellier, in the south part of France, and in his way thither got as far as Paris; but here he found himself so much better that he concluded there was no occasion for proceeding any farther; and meeting with some agreeable companions of his own countrymen, he determined to put this end to his travels, and sit down to study the Law in that university. However, his acquaintance easily prevailed with him to change his views a second time; they were all engaged in the way of Physic, and assuring him there was then no able Professor of Law at Paris he gave it up, and went to the Como and the hospitals along with them. He had not been thus employed many months, when he was called home by his father (c). Having now laid in the first elements of all the three professions, Law, Physic, and Divinity, he remained for some time a student at large, and applied himself chiefly to the mathematics [B], which was new to him, and indeed suited his genius above any thing he had tried before. Accordingly in this science he made a great progress in a short time; and meeting with the lately invented method of infinite series, he made some improvements thereon, which were afterwards published by Dr Wallis, together with others of Dr David Gregory, Savilian Professor of Astronomy, at Oxford (d). At last, our author, observing the necessary connexion between Physic and Geometry, fixed his choice unalterably upon that profession (e); and according to the method

(b) See a charter in possession of the family.

(14) Cyder, B. 1. p. 38, edit. 1720, 8vo.

(a) In his dissertation De Morborum Divisione, our author has these words: Vomitus curatur astringentibus & excretionem minuentibus, inter quae longissime excellit aqua illa fontis perennis ad oppidum Dyfer-tum in Fife, prima illa & nobilissima Sectae provincia, sicut, in qua ager est Pitcairnis. Pitcairnis. Op. p. 326.

(c) From memoirs communicated by a friend of the author's.

(d) See Wallis's Works, Vol. II. cap. xciii.

(e) See note [E].

[A] The study of Divinity was not agreeable to his humour.] The only specimen that our author gave of his application to any part of the divine writings, is in a translation which he made of the 104th psalm into Latin verse; and this was no more than the production of a certamen poeticum with one Walter Danniston, a country schoolmaster, and no bad poet*. The schoolmaster very ingenuously allowed the superiority of his competitor's performance, and in return Pitcairne gave him leave to publish it as his own. However, he did not spare to make free with Danniston's version, when it served his purpose in exposing Sir Robert Sibbald; who, in his Prodomus Historiæ Naturalis Scotiæ, i. e. his Introduction to the Natural History of Scotland, maintained, that God, out of his infinite wisdom, had fixed all the globes of the universe in an immovable state; he might with equal truth, says our author, have asserted, that God made all the fowls of the air immovable, as also all the dogs of chase, even the greyhounds of Scotland; and all the horses, not excepting the Scotch galloways, which he himself observes are excellently adapted for travelling. How much more just and sensible were Walter Danniston's conceptions of the matter, who, in his translation of the 104th Psalm, did not put it [according to the original] that the earth should never move at any time, but so as to shew himself a good Philosopher, Thou commandest the earth to revolve in it's stated course,

* A poem of his, intitled, Gualterus Dannistonus ad Amicos, was imitated in English by Mr Pope, and both inserted in Pope's Miscellanies, Vol. I.

(1) Dissert. de Leg. Hist. Natural. inter Pitcairni Opera, p. 349, 350. Leyden, 1737, 4to.

(2) It is in print, under the title of The Assembly, a Comedy.

Tu jubes terram solita revolvi semita, &c. (1)

Impartiality requires, that we do not omit to observe, that our author in this place, and, indeed, every where throughout this treatise, as often as occasion offers, never fails to throw some sleighty expression or other upon the Theologians; and, not content with that, he composed a comedy, on purpose to ridicule the ignorance and grimace of the Chiefs of the Scotch Clergy in their General Assembly (2); which these on their side revenged, by dubbing him a Deist, or even an Atheist; in which class, however, he had the honour to be ranked with Sir Isaac Newton.

[B] He applied himself chiefly to the Mathematics.] David Gregory was then at Edinburgh, being come thither from Aberdeen; and it is not unlikely, that Pitcairne was drawn into this study, for which his genius was so well turned, by his acquaintance with that celebrated Mathematician. 'Tis certain he speaks with the highest regard of his knowledge that way. In the abovementioned satirical performance, he lashes the author for producing it, as an instance of the divine wisdom and goodness, to furnish every country with proper remedies for the diseases incident to it: This most learned divine I see, says he, thinks it agreeable to the Divine Wisdom, that Sir Robert Sibbald's ipse dixit shall constitute the essence of truth.

As for my part, the thoughts, which come into my head, spring from a quite different fountain; I first search out the truth, and then thank God, who is my helper, and adore his wisdom: Nor can I refrain from adoring it, as often as, with the most excellent David Gregory [cum clarissimo Davide Gregorio], I contemplate that force which he hath given the planets in their orbits, from which, if they be never so little removed, no power of mechanics is able to reinstate them (3). Agreeable to this, we find him in that Professor's house, apparently to observe an eclipse of the sun in 1687. The fact is incidentally mentioned by Dr Mead; and as the story contains a memorable fact relating to our author, we shall gratify the reader's curiosity with it, as follows: 'Memorabilis est tum morbi tum eventuum etiam ratione qui eum comitabantur, Pitcairni ipsius casus: is cum in Scotia haud procul Edinburgo ruri esset anno 1687, mense Februarii, cœlo solito magis sereno & rubente sole, in ipso lunæ coitu subitum habuit, sine causa manifesta, sanguinis è naribus profluvium, quod præcefferat gravis insolitæ virium imbecillitatis sensus. Postridie autem in urbe reversus, comperit in baroscopio ea ipsa hora, quæ nona fuit matutina, altius subfudisse hydrargyrum, quam alias unquam descendere, aut ipsi, aut amico suo Gregorio, cujus in ædibus observabatur, visum fuerat. Mortuum etiam eodem tempore concidisse alterum amicum Cockburnium, Philosophiæ Professore, ex repentina sanguinis è pulmone eruptione, & quinque aut sex alios familiaritate sibi conjunctos, qui opem ipsius quavis ægritudine assidui implorare solebant, diversis humoris profusionibus tentatos cum magno suo dolore intellexerat (4)'. The remarkable [to our purpose] is the case of Dr Pitcairne, who being at the house of his friend David Gregory, near Edinburgh, in February 1687, when there happened a conjunction of the sun and moon, was seized at that moment with a bleeding at the nose, preceded by a sense of faintness and loss of strength; and that, on his return to Edinburgh the next day, he found the mercury in the barometer had sunk much lower than either he or Dr Gregory had ever observed it. The case is related by Dr Mead, in his piece De Imperio Solis & Lunæ in Corpora Humana, and was communicated, with several others, by our author to his pupil, to enrich that treatise, who artfully set out in the profession with publishing this striking performance, Of the Influence of the Sun and Moon upon Human Bodies. Some of this scholar's choicest flowers, in that other remarkable piece, The Mechanical Account of Poisons, were culled from the same master's garden; who, by the by, appears to have been in good business in 1687. The conclusion of the passage here cited informs us, that besides Cockburne, the Professor of Philosophy, there were five or six others seized with the like profusion at that time, who were occasionally his patients.

(3) Dissert. de Leg. Hist. Nat. p. 356.

(4) De Imperio Solis & Lunæ, &c. p. 49, 50. edit. 1745.

[C] Solutio

method of prosecuting this science practised in Scotland, he first applied himself to Botany, Pharmacy, and the Materia Medica; after which, proceeding in the usual course of his countrymen at that time, he went to Paris (now a second time) in order to compleat himself for the practice. Having finished his design, he returned to Scotland a little before the Revolution, and set out as a Physician, by publishing his Solutio problematis de Inventoribus [C] that year, in which he shewed himself to be well versed in the works of Hippocrates, the Father of Physic; as also, that he understood perfectly the exact meaning of the circulation of the blood, as it was discovered by Dr Harvey, who thereby first laid the sure foundation for the mechanic principles of physic (f), which were first brought into vogue in Great Britain by Dr Pitcairne, which at least had this good effect, that it utterly banished all the groundless doctrine about fermentations, ebullitions, effervescences, &c. out of physic; and exposed the idle absurdity of accounting for the action of the humours in the body, and the medicines applied to correct them by a metaphor. He came presently into great reputation in Scotland, and in 1692 was invited by the Curators of the university of Leyden to be Professor of Physic there; he readily accepted the offer; and spoke his inaugural oration, April the 26th, N. S. that year; the speech was highly applauded [D], and the ordinary stipend of his Professorship augmented by

(f) It is prefixed to his Dissertations. In it he designs to shew, that the true theory of Physic is built upon geometrical principles only.

[C] Solutio problematis de inventoribus. The chief design of this treatise, is to assert Dr Harvey's right to the invention of the circulation of the blood; in order to which, he lays down rules to know, whether an author hath really discovered any truth, when we find different opinions about it. These rules (setting aside the weight, which the name of an inventor often carries in it, without any just foundation) he comprizes in the two following theorems. 1. He is to be esteemed the author of any invention, who first delivers those things, whence it may be deduced more easily, than any proposition in the first book of Euclid is proved from the axioms, definitions, and postulates, prefixed to the same book. And at the same time, that he delivers these things, is not busied in drawing such corollaries, as are of less moment and use a thousand times, than the invention in question: but if he be neither the first, who has delivered those things, from which the invention may be collected with that ease, nor has clearly explained the invention itself; but has many words with great prolixity, explained infinite other things of less moment, as flowing from the invention given; he is not to be looked on for the author of the invention in question. This proposition, he says, is demonstrated from hence, that no philosopher or physician knows all the possible truths, which can be inferred from any known truth. His second theorem is, he who is the first that has publicly mentioned the invention in question, and that in the same manner, as it has been spoken of afterwards by others, who are allowed by all sides to have known it; and at the same time has not delivered equally or more explicitly, any thing contrary to the invention proposed: This person is to be held as the author. But if, on the contrary, he hath spoken of it in no other manner than others used to do, who every body knows are unacquainted with it, and hath more frequently and more explicitly delivered other things which are inconsistent with it: such an one is not to be taken for the author of the invention. This proposition, says our author, is built upon the following assumption; that if any one has left it ten times in writing, that the number of the stars is unequal, and only wrote it once, and in the same manner, that this was an equal number, it is credible that he really believed them to be unequal. Wherefore if any physician hath spoken obscurely of the circulation, and very frequently of such things as are contrary to some certain consequences of it, that is, to some corollaries depending upon it; and manifestly inconsistent with it: that is, hath taught such things as are manifestly contradictory to the first elements of physic; it cannot be thought that he knew the circulation of the blood. He applies these rules to Hippocrates's writings, and thereby shews the fondness of that pretence, of the circulation's being known to him (5). This dissertation in it's first plan was preceded by a fiction, wherein our author, in the person of Archimedes, ridicules the methodists, both in philosophy and physic; but chiefly banter the different sects of religion. In this last article, he differed extremely, both in principles and practice, from the morose severity of his countrymen (6).

[D] The speech was applauded In it he undertakes to explain the method of improving physic, which he observes, nothing has hindered more than the curiosity of searching into the natural causes of the effects of medicines. The business of men is to know the virtues of medicines, but to enquire whence they have that power, is a superfluous amusement, since nature lies concealed: besides this knowledge, if it were possible, would be useless. A physician ought therefore to apply himself to discover the effects of medicines and diseases, and reduce his observations into maxims; and not needlessly fatigue himself, by enquiring into their causes, which are neither possible nor necessary to be known. If all physicians would act thus, we should not see physic divided into so many sects. There would be but one sentiment, since men would then found their opinions on observation and experience. Remark the astronomers: they do not trouble themselves with substantial forms, or subtle matter, or concourse of atoms: and yet they know exactly the motions of the heavens. Physicians ought to act in the same manner, they ought to examine well the effects which medicines produce, and observe the motions, in human bodies; and pass by all the rest as a curiosity, which serves only to introduce errors that are unjustly charged on physic, instead of being imputed to physicians. An art, the design of which is to preserve men's lives, ought not to be built on such weak and frivolous foundations, as systems, which any person may form. They ought to look back to the ancient times, in order to observe what was then discovered; and to add to this, all modern discoveries; and to make some themselves, and to lay a foundation independent of the caprices of opinion. The Ancients being misled, by an attachment to particular sects of philosophy, introduced into physic, the fear of a vacuum, occult qualities, &c. and the better to deceive themselves and others, they laid down this axiom, that the Physicians begin where the Naturalists end. How deformed soever the face of physic was then, our author observes, that it was no less so in his time, notwithstanding the many happy discoveries that had been made in Botany and Anatomy of late years. It is true, says he, we hear no more mention of the occult qualities, the fear of a vacuum, attractive virtues, and substantial forms; but we speak of pores differently shaped, secret fermentations, subtle matter, &c. terms which are no more instructive, than those of the Ancients. And I dare add, that it will be easy to prove, that there is no ferment in the glands of the body; that all the orifices of the vessels, and all the pores are of the same shape: consequently the different configuration of the pores, and the ferments, which the physicians have introduced, are meer chimeras. Thus far our author, and thus far he succeeded very well; however, it was much easier to remove the rubbish of the old philosophy, than to raise a new one built upon notional principles only. Hic labor, hoc opus est. And if Dr Pitcairne, in making the attempt, was frequently drawn into a transgression of his own rule (7), not to lay down uncertainties for certain truths: let it be remembered, that history furnishes one man alone, who never suffered his judgment to be imposed on by his fancy.

Upon the whole it is observable, that this weakness has proved the ruin of the mechanical theories in physic. Dr Harvey's discovery of the circulation, gave occasion to introduce mechanical knowledge into medicine,

(5) Mr Dacier, in the preface to his translation of Hippocrates, pretends that he perfectly knew the circulation.

(6) Pitcairn. Op. obi supra, p. 264, 265.

(7) Dr Boërhaave observes, that in all things except the circulation of the blood he assumes too much. Boërhaave's Method of studying Physic, B. III. C. i. §. 14. art. 4.

(g) Nicéron, Memoires pour servir a l'Histoire des Hom. Illustres, Tom. V. p. 346, & seq. See likewise Picaire's Remarks upon Dr Cockburn's treatise De Morbis Nervosis, in his Opera Medica, p. 365, printed at Leyden, 4to. 1737.

by one half; he continued there little more than a year, during which he read lectures upon the works of Bellini (g), such as were then published; while he was Professor here, he printed several dissertations which were drawn from his lectures; in these he attempts to explain the circulation of the blood [E], and some of the principal parts of the animal œconomy mechanically [F], as had been done by Bellini, whom he places next to Harvey upon medicine, upon the ruins of the chymical theories, and has been pushed to the utmost, by our author and his followers, particularly by Boërhaave. And it is confessed, that it was more likely to improve physick, than any thing relative to speculation, which has yet occurred; mathematical reasoning being the most certain guide, provided the data on which it is grounded are sufficiently ascertained. But it has happened very unfortunately for physick, that the warm imaginations of theorists and anatomists, have represented to them many things in themselves extremely precarious, as certain truths; and these have been warmly embraced, as contributing to the confirmation of some favourite system, which their authors were determined to establish at any rate, right or wrong; whence the misapplication of mechanics to medicine, has perhaps done the art of healing more prejudice, than a proper use of them has done it service. The abuse therefore of mechanical learning in physick is highly to be condemned, as the tinsel of the art which makes a noise and shew without communicating any real value. It is a very difficult thing, for people of the greatest abilities and soundest judgment, when they are once determined to explain all such phenomena relative to the animal œconomy mechanically, to forbear representing things which please their fancy as realities, upon very slender foundations. Even Dr Boërhaave, in an oration made on purpose to recommend mechanics in physick, deviates from his own rules, and boldly supposes some things as certain, which would give him a great deal of trouble to prove, if they should be denied. For instance, speaking of the ultimate fibres of the muscles, he represents them as minute tubes, inflated with spirits. Now the existence of these spirits is extremely precarious, and subject to infinite controversy; and has very lately been denied by an eminent physician of our own*. However it may be allowed, that though mechanical learning, through the abuse of it, has hitherto had but little salutary influence, in the art of healing; yet under proper restrictions, this kind of learning may be of good use, and contribute much to the advantage of medicinal knowledge.

[E] In these he attempts to explain the circulation of the blood. This dissertation is entitled; Dissertatio de circulatione sanguinis, per vasa minima. It was published at Leyden, June 6, 1693 (8). In it he observes, that though Dr Harvey demonstrated the circulation of the blood in general: yet the particular manner by which the blood passes through the arteries to circulate in the veins, is a mystery which hath never yet been well explained. Some say, that this passage is made by the glands situated at the mouth of the arteries, and the entrance of the veins, and so serves as a medium for the communication of the blood. Others hold, that the arteries and the veins enter into one another immediately. There are others likewise who maintain, that a vein and an artery, is but one and the same vessel, bended like a syphon. Our author embraces the last of these opinions, only in the place where the bending is, he supposes a gland, by the help of which the blood is filtrated, before it passes into the other branch of the vessel. He asserts, that the various filtrations in the body, do not in any manner depend on the different shape, which the pores are supposed to be of, but only on the greatness or smallness of the passages; since in effect, if bodies which would come out have less diameters than the pores they meet with, the difference of shape will not hinder their passing. The smallness or greatness of the passages is sufficient to cause some bodies to pass, and others to stay. This explication is simple and natural; and this simplicity, says he, ought to induce us to think it true, since God, that admirable Geometrician, acts always by the most simple methods*. He concludes this part in the following words, Et quandoquidem, de geometris sermo incidit, non possum non gratulari huic seculo, & arti nostræ, quod geometria in tantum vestigium sit evecta a pluribus quidem peritissimis artificibus, præcipue tamen ab Isaac Newtono; ut sperandum sit, ope principiorum, quæ a magno illo viro sunt ostensa, inventum iri certius faciliusque vires & proprietates corporum medico usui & hominum solatio infervituras: neque diffiteor, non alio magis nomine arrideri mihi artem medicam, quam quod methodo geometricæ possit morem gerere, uti et omnes artes, quæ corporum vires explorant; adeo ut eorum me misereat, qui corporum naturas ignobilis litatis acculant, quorum & infinitas & pulcherrimas proprietates methodo evidentissima demonstrant Geometræ†. That God acts always by the most simple method, is undoubtedly a very true principle, but of very little use to us mortals in our searches into the works of the Deity, since in the great chain of beings, the vast variety of relations they bear to each other, is greatly above the extent of our faculties to comprehend; nay, that principle that the Divine Artificer always makes use of, the simplest means to effect his purposes; or, which is the same, that nature in all her operations constantly takes the easiest manner of acting, is as fruitful of error, as even the abhorrence of a vacuum, or any other of the arbitrary hypotheses of former Physicians, so justly exploded by our author. Since, upon the whole sum of things, it is impossible for us to know what is the easiest or simplest means of procuring any effect. Here then we may justly turn his own maxim upon him, mentioned in the note above, where he condemns the curiosity of searching into the natural causes of the effects of medicines; for certainly, in the case now before us, the inquiry after the simplest method of acting is a superfluous amusement; since nature lies concealed, and besides, is a very dangerous employment, since fancy never cheats us with less suspicion of fraud, than when she puts on the face of simplicity. We have given an instance of an imposition of this kind in the article of Dr David Gregory, upon the subject of his Optics (9).

[F] Parts of the animal œconomy mechanically ] He published six of these disputations, for so they are intitled, in 1693, before he left Leyden. Three of these we have already taken notice of, but that where he treats concerning the causes of the different quantity of blood which is carried to the lungs of animals not yet born, and of such as are already born, is most esteemed (10). The title is, De causis diversæ molis qua fluit sanguis per pulmonem, Natis & non Natis. The argument is founded upon this solid maxim, that to explain a certain effect, we must not have recourse to uncertain causes. He illustrates the usefulness of this rule in the instance of an opinion that had been taken up for resolving the effects of mercury. I cannot bear with those, says he, who to give us a reason of the effect of mercury in diseases, make no difficulty to ascribe to this mineral a virtue like that of lixivial salts extracted from plants: so that, say they, it is not strange that mercury, having the quality of these salts, draws along with it the acid salts, which cure the diseases where it is used. This explication supposes two doubtful, not to say false, things to be true, viz. that the diseases which are cured by mercury proceed from too great an acid; and that mercury is of the nature of salts, which are extracted from vegetables by calcination. They argue no better, says our author, who, in order to shew why guaiacum is the most proper of all woods for these diseases, say that guaiacum is of the same nature with volatile salts; for this is supposing that the action of the stomach and intestines, occasions in things which enter into the body, the same changes as the action of fire by chymical operations, which is very doubtful. As for my part, says our author, I observe, that among the minerals used by Physicians against the same diseases, mercury is the most weighty, and consequently presses with most force against the obstacles which it meets with, and moves with the greatest violence. But to know whether mercury be of an analogous nature with salt of tartar, it is impossible; unless we can shew, that gold is of the nature of acids, and at the same time be able to prove several other doubtful points. But to return to guaiacum, the acid liquor which is drawn thence by distillation, cannot be a sign of the heaviness of that wood; but at the same time, it is not one of a

† He here congratulates the age upon the great improvements made, particularly by Sir Isaac Newton, in Geometry, as likely to be of great service to Physic; and confesses he was chiefly pleased with this art, on account of it's being reducible to a geometrical method.

(9) See the article GREGORY [DAVID].

(10) Dr Boërhaave says, that in this discourse of the circulation of the blood through the lungs, our author is very perfect. Boërhaave's Method of Studying Physic, Book III. chap. i. sect. 12. art. 4. See likewise Dr James Keil, in his preface to the Essays on Animal Secretion, &c.

* See A Treatise on Madness, by Dr Batty. Lond. 1758, 4to.

(8) See his Dissertation to de Leg. Hist. Naturali in Picaire's Opera. p. 367.

* The Doctor introduced the use of simple medicines, as preferable to compounded ones, in the practice of physick.

upon the bench of inventors of phycic [G], and in return Bellini dedicated his Opuscula to our author: Before he left Scotland he had engaged in a promise of marriage to a young lady, small force that ought to be used against acids; thence it follows, that mercury hath so much more virtue, the more it is purified from every light body; and that gold reduced into a form proper to mingle itself with the blood, cannot surpass other medicines in virtue, but as it exceeds them in weight. These reflections are useful to those who would explain the respiration of animals; for in this, more than in any other subject, Physicians are apt to suppose many false things to be true. In order to explain respiration, our author gives us a particular detail of the most simple phenomena, which are observed in it, and then asks, with Dr Harvey, whence it comes to pass, that the infant does not die in it's mother's belly, where it receives no air through the wind-pipe, and yet as soon as it is born and breathes it cannot live without respiration? He inquires also, why an infant, born in it's teguments and waters, or taken out so by operation, continues several hours without being suffocated; and that as soon as these teguments are broke, and air gets into the lungs, it cannot live without air. Before he resolves these questions, he relates what learned Physicians have most plausibly asserted on these subjects; and proves that they often forgot the rules which they laid down at first, viz. that we must not, in order to explain any phenomena, suppose for truth that which is doubtful. Borelli is the first whose opinion he examines; that learned writer says in his treatise on the motions of animals, that particles of air are mixed with the blood by help of respiration: George Wolfgangus (11) is almost of the same opinion: Bohnius says in his anatomy, that by respiration there enters into the blood subtle air, but that it hath no spring; though with relation to continual motion, which is proper to a spherical figure, it is in itself, says he, the cause of the elastic virtue of the air. Our author observes, that we suppose a fact not true, when we suppose that air enters into the blood by respiration. He examines the reasons that Dr Richard Lower, John Mayow (12) and some others urge to prove, that it enters into the blood, and endeavours to confute them. He then explains the several phenomena related by him, and concludes this dissertation with observing, that the reason which induced him to write, was to shew Physicians, that they ought not always to think they have solved the difficulties proposed to them, when they have called to their assistance, figures, pores, æthereal matter, salts, secret motions, and an infinite number of other terms, which, properly speaking, are but pompous terms for vain-glorious ignorance. In another of these discourses, printed while he was Professor at Leyden (13), he treats of the motion whereby food becomes fit to supply the blood, he gives this the title of Disputatio. He proposes to shew that the digestion of our aliments is not caused by an acid salt or sharp liquor, or by any other dissolvent. Van Helmont's and Veleidius's Archæus pleases him as little. He owns no other cause of digestion, than the trituration or motion of the food performed by the help of the tunicles of the stomach, assisted by the action of the abdominal and pectoral muscles upon it in vigilantibus. In the last of these dissertations he undertakes to shew, against Willis and Sylvius le Boe, that the power of opium does not lie in it's obstructing the nervous liquid: In order to this, he explains the different degrees of resistance which the blood (now taken for the whole mass of liquids) is liable to in it's circulation through the several canals of the body; whereby it appears, that it's motion is easier impeded in the arteries than in the nerves; whence it follows, that in every distemper, where the phenomena may as well arise from an obstruction in the liquid of the arteries, as of that in the veins or nerves, we ought always to conclude the fault lies in the first. But Dr Boërhaave remarks, that our author in this treatise has assumed too much (14).

[G] Bellini whom he places next to Harvey upon the bench of inventors in Phycic. It is upon the following occasion: Bellini in his Opuscula medica, &c. lays down this general theorem contained in the two following propositions, when the blood is so vitiated as to lose it's strength, it is the same thing, as if the quality of the blood remaining in it's natural state, but so lessened in it's quantity, as was requisite to produce the same loss of strength and vice versa; if the natural force is increased by a change in the quality, it is the same thing as if that continued unaltered, and the quantity was increased as much as was requisite to produce the same increase of force. Sanguine ita vitiato ut vires lædentur, perinde est ac si sanguis qualitate quidem naturaliter se haberet, sed ea imminuta quantitate foret, quæ requiritur ad datam illam læsionem producendam; & vice versa, sanguine ita vitiato ut vires augeantur, perinde est, ac si sanguis qualitate quidem naturaliter se haberet, sed ea aucta quantitate foret, quæ requiritur ad datum illud augmentum producendum. For instance, suppose there be 20 pounds of blood in the human body, and the strength naturally arising from that quantity suppose equal to 100 pounds, so that the force of every pound of blood be equal to five pounds; now let the strength be increased by any disease, as spasmodic affections, and some kinds of fevers, so that the power of contraction in the muscles shall be equal to 40 pounds, then will every single pound of blood exert a force equal to seven pounds weight. Wherefore the same effects are produced with regard to the force of the blood, if a person has 20 pounds of blood, every one of which is endued with a force equal to 7 pounds weight, as if he had twenty pounds of blood in the whole; but every single pound should be furnished with a force equal only to five pounds weight, since in both cases there would be exerted a contractile force equal to 140 pounds. But in the first case, the increase of strength proceeds from a change in the quality of the blood; and in the latter, from an increase in the quantity. Ergo, &c. Dr Pitcairne, in his Dissertatione de Leg. Nat. Hist. speaks of this theorem in the following terms. They that are not ignorant of Geometry will easily see, that the theory of Phycic is drawn out of the thickest darkness into the clearest light by the help of these theorems. Whence it appears, how much the medical art is indebted to the most learned Laurence Bellini, to whose most excellent skill and talents (besides innumerable others) this theorem is owing; an invention the most noble and useful of all that has been made in Phycic since that of the circulation by Harvey. Qui Geometriæ non sunt ignari facile percipient horum theorematum ope theoriam medicam è densissimis tenebris in clarissimam lucem emergere.— Atque hæc ostendere poterunt, quantum eruditissimo Laurentio Bellinio debeat medicina, cujus excellentissimæ virtuti & peritiæ acceptum referre debet (præter alia innumera) theorema hic positum, omnium in medicina, post Harveyanum, nobilissimum atque utilissimum inventum. We must not omit to observe, that all the use our author here makes of this most excellent theorem is, to prove from it, that all such medicines as are proper for curing any distemper in India, will have the same proper effect in Scotland, if only they be administered in a proper quantity. Dr Pitcairne himself takes notice, that to his discourse printed in 1693, he had annexed this corollary: There is no effect produced by a change in the texture of the blood, which a change in the quantity is not sufficient to effect; and therefore a change in the quantity is the measure of the vitiated state of it. The truth of this corollary, he observes here, may be deduced from the foregoing theorem of Bellini. It is an observation of Dr Boërhaave's, in his Method of studying Phycic, where he speaks of Bellini's treatise De Urinis & Pulsibus, published in 1683, that this author rarely lays down any thing which is not most exquisitely mathematical; but he deviates from that rule, of taking up nothing upon fancy and imagination only, when he says, that there rises a rarefaction in muscular motion; that as soon as the spirits are determinated into the blood, there arises an effervescency which expands itself. But this, says Boërhaave, is not demonstrated by Anatomy; had he contented himself to have laid down nothing but what might be thence clearly demonstrated, viz. that treatise where the abovementioned theorem is found) he says nothing of the cause of muscular motion; which makes me believe he afterwards laid by that system (15). The truth is, in 1695, when his Opuscula were printed, he had read Pitcairne's Dissertations, printed two years before,

(11) See his Philology reformata, p. 127.

(12) This author is well known by his ingenious treatise upon the rickets in children.

(13) See Dissert. de Leg. Hist. Nat. ubi supra, p. 384.

(14) Boërhaave's Method of studying Phycic, ubi supra.

(15) Boërhaave, ubi supra, art. 2.

VOL. V. No. 281.

lady, daughter of Sir Archibald Stevenfon, Knt. an eminent Physician at Edinburgh, and he returned thither in 1693, with a design to marry and carry his spouse with him to Leyden, to be there as soon as the college opened; but in this view he was disappointed, for the young lady's parents did not care to let their daughter go so far from them; this unforeseen difficulty very much embarrassed Dr Pitcairne, who lay under great obligations to his friends at Leyden. However, love prevailed, and, in compliance to it, he determined upon his marriage to settle at Edinburgh †; and the extensive practice he presently fell into at home, gave him neither room or leisure to regret the loss of his Professorship abroad. The doctor proved extremely adroit in practice, and notwithstanding the almost continual attendance which his business required (for besides Scotland, he was frequently consulted both from England and Holland) yet he found time to write some new dissertations; in 1701 he published the whole collection in one quarto volume, at Rotterdam, under this title, Archibaldi Pitcairni Dissertationes Medicæ; and in return to Bellini's compliment he dedicated them to that Professor (b). Being printed at a distance from the author several errors escaped the press. Faults of this kind were easily discerned by his friends, and indeed by all unprejudiced readers; and as he opposed in general all the old established favourite maxims in the theory of physic, these faults proved (as is not uncommon in such cases) a meer decoy to some of his antagonists, who turning even these against him, thereby discovered such a degree of weakness as rendered them less worthy of his notice. In the mean time, it must not be dissembled, that he treated others of a better character with such a kind of contempt as was no advantage to his own [H]. Five years before this, viz. 1696, being hindered by a fit of sickness from attending the calls of his profession, he diverted himself with writing remarks upon Sir Robert Sibbald's Prodromus Historiæ Naturalis Scotiæ. That Physician had published a treatise in the Scottish language, wherein he ridiculed the new method of applying Geometry to Physic, and in return our author made a rod for him (i), which however, he laid up in his study and communicated it to his friends alone, having prudence enough not to chastise so eminent an offender openly, and when some copies of it came abroad by accident, he disowned it; so that Sir Robert, believing it not to be his, wrote an answer to it, and dedicated it to him. Our author likewise used to divert himself sometimes with Latin poetry, for which he had no small talent, as appears from some of his compositions equal to the best performances of the Moderns; a few of these he published himself,

† His lady did not survive her marriage many years; however, she brought the doctor a daughter, who was afterwards married to the Earl of Kelly. Scotch Compendium.

(b) Bellini was Professor of Physic at Pisa in Italy.

(i) See Pitcairni Opera, p. 330, & 362. in the Dissertation de Legibus Naturalis Historiæ, &c. which is the title of these Remarks.

before, where that doctrine is exploded; and therefore, either through complaisance or by conviction, he did not chuse to mention it in a work dedicated to the author of those dissertations; and that author (besides presenting him with a dedication of these very dissertations, with the addition of two more in 1701) was not, we have seen, ungrateful in neglecting to make a suitable return. This way of napping each other is very useful in dispelling the spleen and vapours from an author's blood; and no doubt, but a proportionable increase in the quantity of strength was given to it in the subjects before us, through a glad some change wrought in it's quality by these alternate compliments.

[H] He treated others of a better character with such a kind of contempt, as was no advantage to his own.] In the preface to the last edition by himself of his Dissertations, he expresses himself in the following manner, which we chuse to give our readers in it's original dress.

Habes dissertationes meas quarum aliquot nunc primum eduntur.

Subjuncta est Epistola insignis Mathematici & amici Thomæ Boëri, Scoti in academia nobili Abredonensi Mathematicos Professoris, & Medicinæ Doctoris, in qua respondetur Astrucio Franco.

Judicium de hac re insero Jacobi Gregorii, Mathematicos in Academia Edinburgensi Professoris Optimi, quod sic accipe.

Scribit ad me Gregorius.

Videtur mihi Astrucius argumento uti quali in scholis Metaphysicorum sive Sophistarum celebrem se jamdudum fecerit. Si serio scribis, quod temere non crediderim, multa alia de contractione & compressione sentit, quam viri cordati sentiunt, nam agnoscit fibra circulari contracta, partes ejus omnes ad centrum accedere, negat fibram ullam ea premere quæ ipsam inter atque centrum sita occurrunt; nobis patet, quod si fibra circularis contrahatur in partem dimidiam suæ longitudinis, comprimere quicquid inter se centrumque occurrit, comprimere inquam in spatii quadrantem. Postquam Astrucius comprimentes vires sustulerat, contrahentes etiam debebat abigere, suoque argumento evincere, fibræ circulari contractionem nullam posse contingere. Hoc negotium sic exsequetur Astrucius. Nullum est in circulari fibræ circumferentia, quod non æquali vi attrahatur ad utrumque latus (secundum circumferentiæ directionem) sed nec à centro nec ad centrum attrahitur, quia arcus vicinissimi & infinite parvi, qui punctum illud attrahunt, attrahunt per angulos ad dictam circumferentiam rectos, quapropter nullum est punctum in circumferentiæ circularis fibræ, quod possit moveri, hoc est illam fibram non posse contrahi. Q. E. D. Assumit Astrucius circumferentiæ circularis particulam à rectula non diverfam, quamque contractam evadere jubet in rectulam minorem, neque ad centrum descendere, neque ab eo recedere conantem. At Geometriæ Polygonum ordinatum assumunt, cujus latera rectulæ sunt, quas contractas mutari oportet in polygonum simile minus, cujus latera proinde sicut centro propiora in ratione contractionum.

Hæc meus Gregorius.

Ego libellum Astrucii non vocem annales Volusi sive cacatum chartam, quia mihi videtur Astrucius nunquam cacasse, aliquin sensisset musculos abdominis & se contrahere & alia exprimere posse. Sive faveant hisce meis Robertus Graius & Johannes Arbutnotus, Scoti illi Æsculapii, atque Hequetus ille Parisiensis opifer, aliorum judicia non morabor. Bellinius enim ad Deos abest.

Nonnulla dissertationibus hisce barbara irrore vocabula, Celsoque non nota, quæ consuetudo Latiniq; sermonis egestas medicis jamdudum familiaria reddidit, atque propemodum necessaria. Dabam Edinburgi 10 Junii 1713.

We have transcribed the whole epistle, that the reader might not be precluded the opportunity of seeing that it is an unfinished draught, which our author, by a sickness which ended in his death, was in no capacity to revise, and never designed to publish it in the same form wherein it appears. This is the best apology that the case will bear; for the insinuation, that any of the materials of the additions made in this work to the former edition were taken from his Adversaria, without his knowledge and consent, though the book came out in the form we have it some months before his death, is only an ill-judged act of friendship. A weakness, proceeding from the same principle of vanity, is seen at the end of these Dissertations, which he concludes in these words. Quapropter non dubito me soluisse nobile problema, quod est, dato morbo invenire remedium.

*Jamque opus exegi*.*

* Ovidius. Metamorphoson, Lib. XV. versus finem, in peroratione.

himself, under the title of Poëmata selecta, mostly epigrams of the lyric kind; he took this way of disclosing his political opinions, where he trod closely in the steps of his ancestors, being, as is well known, no friend to the Revolution. In 1713, he published another edition of his Medical Dissertations, in which he added several new ones [I]; before he had put the last hand to these he was taken ill, and his disorder increasing hindered him from giving them to the public so well finished as he had intended; however, he consented to the publication as they are, and the book came out some months before his death, which happened October the 20th this same year, and in the 61st year of his age. Since his death the public has received a larger collection of his poems, with the addition of some more by other hands, only to swell the book into a more sizeable volume (k). His poetry has never been much read on account of its obscurity, which is principally owing to the private occurrences that are alluded to in it, and are frequently made the whole subject of a poem; an author of this unlucky turn must not think of raising in general a very long-liv'd monument of glory to himself; yet after you are acquainted with the secret, the pleasure is the more liquorishly entertaining [K]. Some years after the doctor's death the lectures which he read at Leyden were published, first in Holland and afterwards in England, under the title of Elementa Medicinæ Physico-mathematica. These were printed from a copy compiled out of the notes that had been taken by some of his pupils; together with

(k) It was printed at Edinb. 1727, 8vo.

[I] To which he added several new ones.] The first of these is that famous one concerning the cure of fevers (16) by evacuating medicines. It must be observed, that the mechanical principles of physic had received prodigious improvements, since our author published this former edition of these Dissertations in 1701, by the queries at the end of Sir Isaac Newton's Optics, where he discovered the vis attractrix in the small particles of matter. Dr Keil had likewise wrote his Theory of Animal Secretion, founded upon this new principle of attraction, published in 1708. Several hints of this attractive power were given by Sir Isaac in the Principia, published in 1687, particularly at the end of the preface. But as that great man had not then fully explained it, Dr Pitcairne, in his Discourse of the circulation of the blood, published in 1693, expressly declined making use of it to explain the several secretions in the body. Hic enim, says he, de viribus attractivis non est ferendi propositum (17). In 1701, when our author first printed this discourse upon fevers, 'tis true Sir Isaac's Optics were not come out; but it was well known he had proceeded a great way further in the discovery of the vis attractrix, but without ascertaining the laws of its action. Our author, therefore, speaking of it in this treatise, after he had transcribed Steno's hypothesis of the different figures of the pores in the glands, says, Ex iis quæ verbis Stenonianis hic descripta sunt liquet queri, quæ ratione ex eodem sanguine tam diversi liquores scernantur? Et cur in hepate bilis, in renibus urina, in aliis partibus alia succedant. Veteres negotium hoc varia attractione transigi volebant, quorum sententiam aptius illustrare, quam ipsi poterant, facile illi fuerit, qui Newtoniana intelligit. It is not improbable, that these last words might give the hint to Dr Keil's undertaking; since that author expressly tells us, that he took it up before the Optics were published (18). Dr Pitcairne, in this treatise of fevers, prefers the cure by sweat before any other evacuation; for which he gives this reason, that the evacuation made this way is much greater than that made by stool and urine; the proportion which these, viz. the stool, urine, and sweat, bear to each other, being as 3; 16, and 40; in which he follows Sanctorius (19), only he adds the discharge by spittle to that of sweat or transpiration. It must be remembered, that he does not maintain that sweating is the only, or always the best, way of curing continual fevers; all that he intends in this treatise being only to shew, as he says, their unskillfulness who had lately wrote, that these fevers were more frequently cured by purging than by sweating. Moneo autem eum absurde facturum, qui febres quandoque, nulla quamvis accidentè vi evacuantè, debellari occlamaverit. Non enim hic suscepimus de isto genere medicinæ verba facere; animus solum fuit, eorum coarguere inscitiam, qui febres continuas medicamento purgante, quam perspirationem æstate, sæpius divelli, nuper apud nos scripserunt (20).

(16) There is an account of it in the Philosophical Transactions, No. 271.

(17) Dissertatio de Circulatione Sanguinis per vasa minima, §. 6.

(18) See the article KEIL [JOHN.]

(19) Who settles these excretions in the ratio of 3, 16, and 40.

(20) Dr Sydenham was once of this opinion in the case of pestilential fevers, but changed his sentiments and practice in this particular. See his Epistola Responsoria de Morbis Epidemicis.

dicinæ are proper for any disease, in finding out which these theories are of no use, since they are not built upon sufficient observations. As I have, says he, formerly shewn of all hypotheses, which, for want of such observations, cannot be treated geometrically, I have given an example (21) of this in the diseases of the eyes, which I design to illustrate farther in my edition of the Problems of Cassius Felix, commonly called Iatrophysica (22). This author wrote about the end of the second century. Dr Pitcairne gives us one of these problems, translated by Gesner, upon the subject of vertigo's (23) relating to it, and confronts it with an account of the same disorder given by Dr Willis (24), whom he handles very severely upon every occasion. We must not omit to mention, that the book here promised by our author was never published, and the papers are now lost.

(21) See his inaugural Oration, §. 14, 15, 16, 17.

(22) Dissert. de Opera quam præstant acida vel alcalina, &c. Pitcarni Opera Omnia, edit. 1737, p. 300.

(23) Dissertatio de Circulatione Sanguinis, in Animalibus genitibus & non genitibus, §. 15.

(24) De Anima Brutorum, cap. 71.

[K] When you are acquainted with the secret, the pleasure is more liquorishly entertaining.] Our author's poem ad Robertum Lindesum is an instance of this, some parts of which are hardly intelligible, without knowing a circumstance in the doctor's life, which he often told, and never without some commotion. It is a well known story of the two Platonic Philosophers, who promised one another, that which ever died first should make a visit to his surviving companion. This story being read together by Mr Lindley and our author, they, being both then very young, entered into the same engagement. Soon after, Pitcairne, at his father's house in Fife, dreamed one morning, that Lindsey, who was then at Paris, came to him and told him he was not dead, as was commonly reported, but still alive, and lived in a very agreeable place, to which he could not as yet carry him. By the course of the post, news came of Lindsey's death, which happened very suddenly the very morning of the dream. When this is known, the poem is easily understood, and shines with no common degree of beauty.

Lyndesi, Stygiis jamdudum veste per undas,
Stagnaque Cocyti non audeant mihi;
Excute paulisper Lethæi vincula somni,
Ut feriant animum carmina nostra tuum.
Te nobis, te, redde tuis, promissa daturus
Gaudia; sed proavo sis comitante redux:
Namque novos vires mutataque regna videbis,
Passaque Teutonicas sceptrâ Britannâ manus (25).

(25) The poem was written in 1689, Arch. Pitcarni, Poëmata Selecta inter Opera ejusd. ad calcem, No. 1.

He then proceeds to exclaim against the principles and practices which produced this Teutonic violence upon the British scepter, and concludes with a wish, that Lindsey might bring Rhadamanthus with him to punish them.

Unus abest scelerum vindex Rhadamanthus; amice
Di faciant reditus sit comes ille tui.

Every one sees how much keener an edge is given to the satire upon the Revolution, by making it an additional reason for his friend's keeping his promise, to return him a visit after his death.

[A] Pitts

with some rough draughts taken from his papers, which as they were never revised by him he was always very careful to suppress during his life-time; and has left a mark to prevent any one's being imposed upon by them, and such a one as shews that he long before prefaged what would come to pass. In his tract upon the circulation of the blood, where he is relating the accounts given by authors, especially Dr Willis and Etmuller, concerning the manner of opium's acting upon the brain, 'I pass over, says he, what we have upon this subject under the name of Etmuller, since had that learned person lived longer, his works would have come out correctly finished; for the Praxis Etmulleriana, as it is entitled, it is evident was published merely for the sake of lucre; which I mention for this reason, that no credit may be given to what may at any time happen without my knowledge to be obtruded upon the world as my dictates to my scholars. Prætereo quæ hac de re sub Etmulleri nomine prodierunt; evidens enim est, virum illum doctissimum sua emendatione fuisse editum, si per fata aspera licuisset: omniaque illa, quæ titulum Praxeos Etmullerianæ nunc ferunt, in lucem esse protrusa ab hominibus in bono questui inbianantibus. Quod ideo commemoro, ne quis mea esse credat, quæ Bibliopola tanquam discipulis meis dictata, me inscio, forsitan emittant (k). It is remarkable, that the last chapter of the first book of these Elements was first printed separately, at the end of Boërhaave's Praxis Medica, and was intitled Praxis Medica Pitcairiana. P

(k) Dissertatio de Circulatione Sanguinis in Genitibus & non Genitibus, §. 16.

PITS [JOHN] [A], the noted Biographer; was son of Henry Pits, by Elizabeth his wife, sifter to Dr Nicolas Saunders, author of the English Schism, and born, in 1560, at Aulton, a market-town in Hamshire. At the age of eleven he was sent to Wykeham's school near Winchester; where having continued seven years, he was elected from thence probationer Fellow of New-college, in 1578. But, after less than two years continuance there, and before he was admitted perpetual Fellow, which would have been in 1580, he left the kingdom as a voluntary Romish exile, and went to Doway, where he was kindly received by Dr Thomas Stapleton, who gave him directions about his studies (a). He therefore passed, according to his advice, from hence to Rheims; and, after one year spent in the English college in that city, was sent to the English college at Rome, where he very assiduously studied Philosophy and Divinity for near seven years, and was made a Priest. Returning back to Rheims about 1589, he taught there Rhetoric and Greek for two years. But the civil wars in France induced him to withdraw to Loraine; and, at Pont-a-Mousson, he took the degree of Master of Arts, as also that of Bachelor of Divinity. Next going into upper Germany, he resided a year and a half at Triers; where, after performing certain exercises, he commenced Licentiate in his faculty. In the mean time he visited several of the most considerable cities in Germany, and remaining three years at Ingolstadt in Bavaria, took the degree of Doctor in Divinity. After having travelled through Italy as well as Germany, and made himself perfect master of the German and Italian languages, he came back to Loraine; where being particularly taken notice of by Charles Cardinal of Loraine, he was preferred by him to a Canonry of Verdun. Two years after his return, Antonia, daughter of the Duke of Loraine, which was married to the Duke of Cleves, invited him over to be her Confessor: that he might be the more useful to her, he learned the French tongue, in which he became so perfect, that he usually preached in that language. During the agreeable leisure he enjoyed in this station, he employed himself in compiling the Lives of the Kings, Bishops, Apostolical men, and Writers of England (b) [B]. The last only was published, and that after his decease [C]. But he appears in it to have acted a very ungrateful and disingenuous part. For he takes most of his materials out of J. Bale's Centuries, without owning it; though he perpetually rails at him, mentioning him only to find fault with him. And he pretends to follow, and

(a) Pitsei Relationum Historicarum. Tom. I. p. 817, 818. Wood Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. I. col. 405, &c.

(b) Relation. Historic. ut supra.

[A] Pits (John) He called himself in Latin Pitseus and Pitius, and by that name he is denominated in all his Works that are printed.

[B] He employed himself in compiling the Lives of the Kings, Bishops, Apostolical men, and Writers of England. They were comprized in four large Volumes; the first containing the Lives of the Kings, the second of the Bishops, the third of the Apostolical men, and the fourth of the Writers. The last was published, as I have said, after his decease: and the three first are preserved as rarities in the archives of the collegiate church of Liverdon. Mr Wood misunderstood him, when he says, that 'he desired those Books should be buried with him, in case he should not live to finish them (1).' For he only conjectured, that they would dye and be buried with him, if he did not live to publish them himself. His words are, De quorum omnium editione propter incertitudinem vitæ nihil mihi certi. Nam si prius in lucem non prodierint, quam ego ex hac luce migravero, necum quodammodo morientur, & sepelientur (2). The Book of Bishops, is chiefly a Collection from Bishop Godwin's Commentar. De Præsulibus, &c. (3).

[C] The last only was published, and that after his decease. It was published at Paris, in 1612, 4to. by Dr William Bishop, a Doctor of the Sorbonne, and afterwards titular Bishop of Chalcedon (4); under the title of, Joannis Pitsei Angli, S. Theologiæ Doctoris, Liverdani in Lotharingia, Decani, Relationum Historicarum de Rebus Anglicis Tomus primus. But the running title is, De illustribus Angliæ Scriptoribus: by which name it is oftencst quoted. 'Tis divided into four parts: The first is a kind of prolegomena to the work, and contains, a proem in praise of History; of the Antiquity of the British Church; of the British Universities, with an account of Oxford and Cambridge. The second is a list of the British and English Authors, and their writings, with their lives and characters; divided into Ages, and subdivided into Numbers. The third is an Appendix, of some writers, in Alphabetical order, and divided into four centuries; together with an Index of Books, written by English, but unknown, Authors. The last part consists of fifteen alphabetical Indexes, which are a kind of Epitome of the whole work.—The second part is chiefly stolen from J. Bale, without acknowledgment, as is observed above; as the third is taken from Dr Thomas James's Ecloga Oxonio-Cantabrigiensi; from which also he learned what Libraries many of the MSS. books he mentions are lodged in (5).

(4) Idem, col. 488.

(1) Athenæ, ut supra.

(2) Pits de Scripturis, p. 817.

(3) Wood, ubi supra, col. 408.

(5) Idem, col. 486. Vid. Relation. Histor. p. 60.

[D] What

and familiarly quotes, J. Leland's Book of the British Writers; whereas, 'the truth is, as Mr Wood observes (c), he never saw it, he being but twenty years of age, or little more, when he left the nation; neither was it in his power afterwards, if he had been in England, because Leland's Collections were kept in such private hands, that few Protestant Antiquaries, and none of those of the Church of Rome, could see or peruse them.' What therefore he pretends to have immediately from Leland, he takes at second hand from Bale [D]. That work is also full of partiality, and of mistakes in many instances [E]. The Duke of Cleves dying, after our author had continued twelve years in the Dukes's service; and troubles arising in that country, he withdrew again with the Dukes (d), into Loraine, where by the favour of John Bishop of Toul, sometimes his Scholar, he was promoted to the Deanery of Liverdun of considerable value; which, with a Canonry, and an Officialship of the said church, he enjoyed as long as he lived (e). He dyed at Liverdun October 17, 1616, N. S. and was buried in the collegiate church of that place (f) [F]. He published, himself, three Books [G], mentioned below. His style is clean, easy, and elegant. But he wants accuracy, especially in his Account of the British Writers: and, according to Bishop Stillingfleet's observation (g), it is his Vanity, as well as J. Bale's from whom he copies, to multiply Authors as well as Books: that is, to set down the different chapters or articles of the same work, for so many different Books.

(c) Athen. ut supra, col. 406.

(d) Relation. Historie. p. 67.

(e) Relat. Histor. ut supra, p. 213.

(f) Wood, Ath. ut supra, col. 407, 408.

(g) Origines Britannicæ, fol. edit. 1683, p. 209.

[D] What therefore he pretends to have immediately from Leland, he takes at second hand from Bale.] This is not only affirmed by Mr Wood (6); but also acknowledged by our author's own scholar, Edward Maihew, who is confident, that he never saw Leland's Commentaries of the British writers. — Quos prædictum Johannem Pitseum nunquam vidisse certissime mihi persuadeo; are Maihew's own words (7). The learned Mr Henry Wharton speaks in stronger terms upon that subject. Quod Pitseum imprimis attinet, says he, is intolerandæ arrogantiae indicia dedit manifesta. Se enim sua de Scriptoribus Anglicis potissima ex Lelandi Collectaneis hausisse, Balei autem Centurias vix levi inspectione dignatum esse (8), præ se fert; quamvis mihi abunde compertum sit illum Lelandi opus nunquam vidisse, sed quæ Baleus ex Lelando non ingratus compilavit, ipsum ex Baleo ingratisimum descripsisse (9). i. e. As 'to Pits, he hath given manifest tokens of intolerable arrogance. For he pretends, that he has taken the chief part of his English Writers out of Leland's Collections, and did not so much as vouchsafe to look into Bale's Centuries; whereas I am fully convinced, that he never saw Leland's work, but what Bale thankfully borrowed from Leland, he [Pits] hath most unthankfully transcribed from Bale.' To the same purpose speaks Bishop Nicolson (10). 'Tho' he quotes Leland with great familiarity and affluance, 'tis very probable he never saw any such thing as his Collectanea de Scriptoribus; but that his only true Author, for all that he pretends to bring out of that store-house, was John Bale himself.' Lastly, Mr Antony Hall calls Pits, a most impudent Plagiary; who often praises Leland extremely, tho' he never saw him. — Joannes Pitseus, plagiarus, si quis alius, confidentissimus; qui Lelandum, etiamsi eum oculis nunquam usurpaverat, sæpius importunissime laudat (11).

[E] That work is also full of partiality, and of mistakes in many instances.] For he entirely leaves out John Wiclef, and all his followers, tho' men of learning and considerable writers, together with the Scot and Irish authors, which Bale for the most part commemorates; and in their room gives an account of the Roman catholic writers, such especially as had left the kingdom, after the Reformation in Queen Elizabeth's reign. — But tho' he pretends to take notice only of Roman catholic writers, he sets down, by mistake or for want of information, some that were sincere Protestants, at least more Protestants than Papiſts; as Sir Antony Cope, and John Redman, who both dyed in the year 1551: Thomas Key or Cay, master of University-college, who dyed in 1572: John Leland, the antiquary: Robert Record, the mathematician; Dr Alb. Hill, an intimate acquaintance of John Bradford the martyr: John Cay the Antiquary of Cambridge: Peter Morwyn, of Magdalen-college: and, in the Appendix, George Coriat, rather a Puritan than a true member of the Church England: Robert (which is a mistake for Roger) Taverner: Timothy Bright, M. D. and Rector of Methley in Yorkshirc: Thomas Mouffett, M. D.: John Huntington, a zealous reformer, &c. — In most particulars he copies J. Bale's mistakes; and adds many of his own. I shall only mention two. He says (12), that Girald. Cambrensis wrote the life of Caradoc of Lancarvan; whereas it was the life of Caradoc of St David's, a noble hermit and confessor (13). He represents William Grocyn as the author of an Epigram (14), which was composed by Petronius Afranius. &c. — In his third part, or Appendix, as well as in the second part; he calls several of his Writers natives of England, who were actually foreigners. For instance, he affirms (15), that Johannes Erigena was born at St David's in Wales; whereas he was born in Ireland: that Herbert Lofinga, Bishop of Thetford, was an Englishman, and born in Suffolk, — natione Anglus, patria Suffolcenſis (16). When, on the contrary, he was a native of Normandy. — And of these others, whom he styles Englishmen; — Alacerius (17) was an Arabian: Anonymus Sacerdos, al. Peter Scaliger (18), was Bishop of Verona: John de Muriis (19), a Frenchman: John Mearus, al. Job. de Meara (20), an Irishman: &c. (21). — In the same third part, or Appendix, he places many Authors, whom he had inserted already in his second part under other names; of which A. Wood gives 23 instances. — And, as Bishop Nicolson observes (22), 'Mr Wood has taken the pains to correct a great many of his mistakes; and might have noted some hundreds more. He [Pits] must needs have been too much in haste to write accurately, since, even in the Catalogue he gives (23) of his own uncle Nicolas Sander's writings, he is guilty of so gross an error, as to reckon the treatise entitl'd Fidelis Servi Subdito infideli Responſo, among that infamous Writer's works, when on the contrary, the book was written against him, and he's the Subditus infidelis mention'd in the title-page.'

The most valuable part of Mr Pits's work, is that wherein he gives an account of the English Roman-Catholics, who left this Kingdom on account of Religion, and sheltered themselves at Rome, Douay, Lovain, &c.

[F] And was buried in the collegiate church of that place.] Soon after, the following inscription was put over his grave. Hic jacet D. Pits, quondam Decanus, Officialis, & Canonicus hujus Ecclesiæ, Doctor S.S. Theologiæ, qui decessit ex hac vitâ 17 Oct. an. 1616 (24).

[G] He published himself three Books.] Of which these are the titles. De Legibus, Traſtatus Theologicus. Trev. 1592. i. e. A theological treatise of Laws. De Beatitudine, Traſtatus Theologicus. Ingolſt. 1595. A Treatise of Happinesse. De Peregrinatione lib. 7. Duffeld. 1604. 12mo. i. e. Of Pilgrimage; Dedicated to Antonia Dukes of Cleves.

(12) De Illustribus Angl. Scriptor. p. 215.

(13) Vid. Whartoni Angl. Sacr. Vol. II. p. 442, 445.

(14) De Illustribus, &c. p. 693.

(15) Ibid. p. 168.

(16) Ibid. p. 197.

(17) Mentioned by him in Appendix, p. 821.

(18) P. 824.

(19) P. 872.

(20) P. 879.

(21) See Wood Ath. as above, p. 406, 407.

(22) Engl. Historical Library, as above, p. 156.

(23) P. 775.

(24) Wood Athæ col. 408.

(6) As above, col. 406. cited in the text of this article.

(7) Præfat. ad librum De Illustribus Anglæ Scriptorib. Ordinis S. Benedic.ii.

(8) Opus ejus cursum legi. Pits, p. 53.

(9) Præfat. ad Angl. Sacr. Par. I. p. 15.

(10) English Historical Library, edit. 1714, fol. p. 156.

(11) Præfat. ad Lelandi Comment. de Scriptorib. Britann. Vide Præfat. ad Tanneri Bibliothec. p. 13, 14.

PLOT [ROBERT], a learned Philosopher and Antiquarian in the last century, was born, of a genteel family [A], in the year 1641, at Sutton-Barn in the parish of Borden near Sittingbourn in Kent (a); and educated in the free-school at Wye in the same county. The 24th of March, 1657-8, he was entered a student of Magdalen hall in Oxford, under the tuition of Josiah Pullen (b); took the degree of Bachelor of Arts October 15, 1661 (c), that of Master June 14, 1664 (d), and accumulated the degrees in Law June 8, 1671 (e). He removed afterwards to University-college (f). Being a very ingenious man, he was made one of the Fellows of the Royal Society; and, about the 30th of November, 1682, elected one of the Secretaries of that learned body. He published their Philosophical Transactions from No. 143. to No. 166. inclusive. Natural History was his greatest delight, and he gave very agreeable specimens of it, in his Natural Histories of Oxfordshire [B], and Staffordshire [C]. In order to improve himself to the utmost in that engaging study, he formed the design of travelling through England and Wales, for the discovery of antiquities and other curiosities, and for the promotion of learning and trade [D]. In the year 1683, Elias Ashmole, Esq; appointed him the first keeper of his

Museum

(a) Short Account of him, prefixed to the second edit. of his Natural History of Oxfordshire.

(b) Wood Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. II. col. 1121.

(c) Idem, Fasil, Vol. II. col. 140.

(d) Ibid. col. 158.

(e) Ibid. col. 186, 187.

(f) Short Account, as above.

(1) Short Account, as above.

[A] Of a genteel family. His father was Robert Plot, Esq; Captain of the Militia, in the Hundred of Milton, in the County of Kent (1).

[B] The natural History of Oxfordshire. It was publish'd at Oxford in 1677, folio, and reprinted, with additions and corrections, in 1705, folio, after the author's decease, by John Burman, M. A. Fellow of University college. What the method and substance of it is, will appear from the following contents of the chapters. Ch. 1. Of the heavens and air. 2. Of the waters. 3. Of the earths. 4. Of stones. 5. Of formed stones. 6. Of plants. 7. Of brutes. 8. Of men and women. 9. Of arts. 10. Of antiquities. He gives whatever has been known or recorded, at any time, to be uncommon or remarkable under those respective heads, in that county. I should have observed, that the whole title of the book is, 'The Natural History of Oxfordshire, being an Essay toward the Natural History of England.'

[C] And Staffordshire. This was printed at Oxford, in 1686, exactly in the same method, and divided into the same number of Chapters, as the other: But has the preference above it, in that it is adorn'd with the Prospects of the seats of most of the Nobility and Gentry in that county. The title of it, is, 'The Natural History of Staffordshire, by Robert Plot. L.L.D. Keeper of the Ashmolean Museum and Professor of Chymistry in the University of Oxford.'

Our learned Author designed also to have written, in the like manner, the Natural History of his own native county of Kent; and of the county of Middlesex, and the city of London; having been at the pains of collecting large materials for that purpose (2).

[D] He formed the Design of travelling through England and Wales. His intention was, to build upon and improve, the labours of the indefatigable John Leland, and William Camden; as appears by the account he gave of his intention, in a letter to the learned Bishop Fell. 'The Design in general, says he, is a Journey through England and Wales, for the promotion of Learning and Trade, which indeed are the things chiefly aim'd at. But, beside these of Profit, there are others of Pleasure, that fall within the verge of this Design, intending in the same journey to make a strict inquiry after all curiosities both of Art and Nature, such I mean as transcend the ordinary performances of the one, and are out of the ordinary road of the other.' - - - Then he proceeds to observe, that J. Leland having with all imaginable care endeavoured to collect and preserve the ancient MSS. books of the Abbeys and Monasteries upon their dissolution; and, notwithstanding his industry, great numbers having never come to his hands; and such as did, quickly after his death being dispers'd again; great part of the MSS. in England are, as it were, lost to the world, lying secretly in corners and in private hands: Therefore it should be one of the principal ends of his Journey, to search all the publick Libraries of cathedral and collegiate churches, of the colleges in each University, and other publick Libraries wheresoever, and make distinct catalogues of them all. And as for such MSS. as should be found in private hands, 'it would not be amiss, saith he, if the University of Oxford would employ me to buy up (if they cannot be begg'd) as many as can be purchas'd for the Bodleian Library; and where they ' will by no means be parted with, to procure leave (if worth while) that an amanuensis may transcribe the whole, or at least have the perusal and liberty to make abridgments, as Leland did of many. But if neither of these will be admitted, 'twill be some satisfaction that they are added to the Catalogues of the rest.'—Next he propos'd to make strict search into all Mines, Minerals, Earths, Soils, that are of any account in this Nation: believing that there may be as many of each, and as good, unknown, as there are known. Under this head he intended an exact Account of the Mines of Wales, Cornwall, Somersetshire, and Derbyshire, &c. of the iron bullets found in the grounds at Bedminton in Gloucestershire; of Pingitis or Black-lead, what it is, and how it grows, being found only in England; of Fuller's-earth; of manganese and lapis calaminaris, the best whereof is at Mendip-hills; of the several sorts of ocre; of tobacco-pipe clays; sands for the glass-houses. The soils where either timber or fruit-trees flourish exceedingly, and so for all sorts of grain, and other vegetables.—Then he propos'd to inquire of Medicinal, and Petrifying Waters. Such are the waters of the Bath, Tunbridge, Epsom, and Astrop, the Spaw in Yorkshire; the Petrifying-waters of Wockey-hole, and of Tenterden. Together with strange Wells or Springs; as the Fountain that takes flame in Lancashire, Bone-well in Herefordshire, the springs at Lemington and Newenham. And Rivers that have any thing extraordinary attending them, such as the Loose in Kent that runs under-ground for a mile together; and the Mole in Surrey; Nailbourn rivulet near Canterbury; the Higre of the Severn. And Aqueducts ancient and modern.—Then he propos'd to enquire of Stones; first, such as seem to have been Animals petrify'd, or some parts of them; such are the snail-stones and Osteocolla; petrify'd Oysters and Cockles; umbilicus marinus; glossopetra; teeth of fish petrify'd, called Cramp-stones. Such as seem to be lusus naturæ, as the Asteria, Aproitis, Cornu Ammonis, &c. And such stones as seem to have been wood petrify'd.—In this Journey also he thought the English Herbal might receive some advance. And he instances in the Golden Rod formerly imported from abroad, and sold for 2s. 6d. a pound in London, now hardly worth 2s. 6d. a hundred, since found growing in Hempsted wood: And in the Carum, or Caraways, so call'd from its country Caria, where it spontaneously grows, discovered not many years ago to grow as spontaneously in Lincolnshire. Besides many other things we receive at a great rate from beyond the Seas. To this head he referred all Curiosities found in the gardens of eminent herbalists or florists, whether garden-knots, hedges, or arbours; all rare fruits, such as the wooden pears in Corpus-Christi Coll. Oxon. the triangular cherry in Kent; new ways of planting, with such secrets as can be procur'd in the making of wines, cider, &c. strange flowers; the ordering of saffron in Essex, and tobacco in Gloucestershire: Herbs and trees of a strange and extravagant growth; the painted oak, and fycamore; all such herbs as are of use in trade, as wold for dyeing, kali for glass-works, &c.—Next, he was to inquire of Animals, and first of strange people, as the Gubbings of Devonshire, the people of Charleton curley in Leicestershire: Of any strange accidents that attend corporations or families; Of extraordinary births, deaths, &c. persons eminent upon any account; cu-

(2) Memoirs for the Curious, April 1708, p. 117, 118. and English Topographer, p. 79. and Epitaph.

Museum or Repository, and about the same time he was nominated by the Vice-chancellor the first Professor of Chymistry in the university. All which places he kept 'till the beginning of the year 1690 [E]. In October 1687, he was made Secretary to the Earl-Marshal, or Court of Chivalry, which was then renewed after it had lain dormant ever since the year 1641 (g). In 1688 he received the title of Historiographer to King James II. On the 20th of January, 1694-5, Henry Howard, Earl-Marshal, nominated him Mowbray-Herald extraordinary; and, two days after, he was constituted Register of the Court of Honour: He dyed of the stone April 30, 1696, at his house in Borden; and was buried the fourth of May in the church there; where a monument was afterwards erected to his memory [F]. By his wife, Rebecca, widow of Henry Burman, to whom he was married August 21, 1690, he left two sons, Robert, and Ralph-Sherwood, Plot (b). Besides the pieces abovementioned, he was author of several things, chiefly inserted in the Philosophical Transactions [G].

(g) Wood, Ath. 23 above, col. 1121.

(b) Short Account, as above.

Items of towns and parishes: Of such animals as are friends or enemies to any part of land or sea. &c.— He was also to endeavour to make a full collection of British, Roman, Saxon, and ancient English money; likewise of urns, lamps, lachrymatories, and ancient inscriptions. And to observe the British, Roman, and Saxon fortifications, with the Roman ways:—Moreover all notable Mountains, Caves, and Barrows; such as Silbery-hill and Wockey-hole in Somersetsire, the Peak of Derby; &c.—Lastly, he was to be very careful in a just observation of all Thaumaturgicks, or monsters of Art, works that may properly be said to be done Arte Syracusâ. As of all sorts of engines, either for conveyance of waters or removal of vast weights. Of Buildings: either wonderful, or very unusual in proportion, or curious: And of all other parts of publick or private Buildings, down to a bolt, hasp, or latch of a door, if of rare contrivance. Also of what Improvements have been made in clock-work, painting, gravings, etching, dieing, weaving, the best ways of melting and refining metals, &c. By his researches, he was persuaded many fair Additions might be made to Camden's Britannia, and several places corrected both in the Book itself and the Maps. Sir Henry Spelman's Villare Anglium, he proposed to amend where erroneous, and to supply where defective; and to add a new column of the British, Roman, and Saxon names of every place, as far as possibly they might be recovered. And to continue Weever's Funeral Monuments, in all the other Dioceses, in the same manner as he has done the Dioceses of Canterbury, Rochester, London, and Norwich (3).

[E] All which places he kept 'till the beginning of the year 1690.] When he resigned his place of Keeper of the Museum, he made a present thereto of a very large collection of natural Curiosities, being such as he had figured and described in his Histories of Oxfordshire and Staffordshire; which the University, according to their usual constant care in the preservation and furtherance of all useful knowledge, repositied in two large Cabinets, distinguish'd in the catalogue of the Museum, by the names of Scrinium Plotianum Oxoniense, and Scrinium Plotianum Staffordiense (4).

[F] Where a monument was afterwards erected to his memory.] With this Epitaph, 'H. S. I. Vir clarissimus, Robertus Plot, L. L. D. olim in Academia Oxoniensi primus Chymie Professor, Custosque Musei Ashmoleani; Societatis Regiæ Londini Sodalis, eidemque a Secretis; Regi Jacobo Secundo Historiographus, Summoque Angliæ Marischallo in Curia militari Registrarius; Historia naturali Oxoniæ & Staffordiæ illustris; Cantij, natalis soli; Antiquitibus (si fata sivistent) illustrior existimus; Felicissimus; Vetustatis Scrutator, Naturæ indagator singularis; Pietatis in Deum, in Regem, in Ecclesiâ & Academicam, cultor integerrimus; Sibi solum imperiosus, aliis omnibus quam facillimus: Qui vesicæ doloribus, diutius tortus, mortalitarem exiit, prid. cæl. Maij, Anno Salutis MDC LXXXV V I, ætatis suæ LV. Rebecca Plot ejusdem vidua moerens posuit.'

[G] Besides the pieces abovementioned, he was author of several things.] In 1685, he published, De Origine Fontium Tentamen Philosophicum. In prælestione habitæ coram Societate Philosophicâ, nuper Oxonii institutâ ad scientiam naturalem promovendam. Oxon. 1685, 8vo. i. e. A Philosophical Essay on the Origin of Springs, &c. Which he supposes to proceed from the sea. See his History of Staffordshire, c. 2. §. 17.

And the nine following Papers of his are inserted in the Philosophical Collections and Transactions. 1. Account of Elden-hole in Derbyshire (5). In which he relates, that a curious Gentleman had founded one of the caverns of the Peak in Derbyshire, by a perpendicular Plumb-line, no less than 2800 feet in depth, without finding the bottom. 2. The formation of Salt and Sand from Brine (6). 3. Discourse concerning the Effects of the great Frost, on Trees and other Plants, in 1683, drawn from the Answers to some Queries sent into divers Countries, by himself (7). 4. A Discourse of perpetual Lamps, in imitation of the Sepulchral Lamps of the Ancients (8). 5. The History of the Weather at Oxford, in 1684, or the Observations of a full year, made by order of the Philosophical Society at Oxford (9). 6. A large and curious account of the Amiantos or Asbestine linnen (10). 7. Discourse concerning the most seasonable time of felling Timber. Written at the request of Samuel Pepys, Esq; Secretary of the Admiralty (11). He thinks, the best method, is, To bark the Timber-trees in the spring, and let them stand so 'till winter, and then fell them; especially those that are design'd for Ship-building. 8. Of an Irishman of an extraordinary size: viz. Edward Mallone, 19 years old, 7 feet 6 inches high: his finger six inches and three quarters long (12). 9. A catalogue of Electrical Bodies (13).—Finally, he published, in 1680, The Clog; or Staffordshire Almanack, engraven on a copper-plate; and inserted afterwards in his History of Staffordshire (14). Since his decease there have been published these two Letters of his. 'A Letter giving an account of some Antiquities in the County of Kent;' in Miscellanies on several curious subjects, printed for Edm. Curl, 1714, 8vo. p. 43, — 'A Letter to the Earl of Arlington concerning Thetford;' printed at the end of The History and Antiquities of Glastonbury, publish'd by Tho. Hearne, 1722, 8vo. and in Blomfield's Norfolk.

The several MSS. Dr Plot left behind him, were these following. 1. A Discourse of the termination Magus, found in many of the ancient Cities of Italy, Germany, France, and Britain; where more particularly of the old Sitomagus, now Thetford in Norfolk. Published by T. Hearne, as is said above. 2. A View of the Remains of some British Antiquities: Of the two Expeditions of Cæsar into Britain; of the Itinerary of Antoninus; of the Notitia Imperii, or Breviary of Theodosius; so far forth as they relate to the two Counties of Kent and Middlesex. 3. 'Ad Commentarium de Præfulibus Angliæ per Franciscum Godwinum Episcopum Hereford Appendix. 4. Prælectiones Chemicæ in Schola Naturalis Historiæ Oxon. habitæ.' 5. Large Collections towards an intended Natural History of the County of Kent. 6. 'A Letter to Dr William Mufgrave Fellow of New College Oxon. containing an account of divers alterations and additions that might be made to the Founder's life of that College.' i. e. William of Wickham, by Martin. 7. A Catalogue of most of the Species of Apples, Pears, Vines, Cherries, Peaches, and Nectrins, now growing in England (15).

(5) Philol. Coll. No. 2. p. 7.

(6) Philol. Transact. No. 143. p. 95.

(7) No. 165.

(8) No. 166. p. 806.

(9) No. 169. p. 930.

(10) No. 178. p. 1051.

(11) No. 192. p. 455.

(12) No. 240. p. 184.

(13) No. 245. p. 384.

(14) P. 420. See Wood Ath. as above, col. 1122.

(15) Catalog. MSS. Angliæ, &c. Vol. II. p. 73. 363.

(3) See this letter at length, at the end of Vol. II. of Leland's Itinerary, edit. 1744, p. 131.

(4) Short Account, &c. as above.

(a) See the inscription upon his monument in remark [P.P].

(b) Life of Dr Pococke, prefixed to his Theological Works, in 2 vols, fol. 1740, p. 1. by Leonard Twells, D. D. and Wood's Athet. Oxon. ubi supra.

(c) Twells, p. 2.

(d) Walker's Sufferings of the Clergy, &c. P. i. p. 98. The same author likewise observes, that he was an eminent Loyalist and Sufferer in the grand Rebellion, Part ii. p. 217.

(e) Wood's Fasti, Vol. I. col. 221.

(f) Twells, ubi supra.

(g) Wood's Fasti, Vol. I. col. 234.

POCOCKE [EDWARD], the most eminent Orientalist of his time, was born November 8th, 1604, in the city of Oxford (a) [A]. Being designed from his infancy for the Church, he was sent early to the free-school at Tame in that county, the Master whereof, Mr Richard Butcher, was then in great repute (b). Under his care our author became fit for the university at fourteen years of age; and accordingly, in 1618, was entered a Commoner of Magdalen-Hall in Oxford; whence, in about two years time, he removed to Corpus-Christi-college, where his merit had obtained him a Scholarship. He was admitted thereto December 11, 1620, and put under the tuition of Mr Gamaliel Chafe (c), a person of great piety and learning (d); by whose assistance Mr Pococke pursued the usual academical courses [B] with a commendable diligence and success, 'till he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, November 28, 1622 (e): but applying himself soon after to the Eastern languages (f), that branch of learning proved so agreeable to his taste; that it became the chief object of his studies during the rest of his life. He went to the best masters in England for instruction [C], and prosecuting it with indefatigable industry, excelled all his contemporaries therein. He commenced Master of Arts March 8, 1626 (g); and Ludovicus de Dieu publishing a Syriac version of the Apocalypse (h) at Leyden the following year, our author, after his example, began to prepare those four epistles (i), which were still wanting to a complete edition of the New Testament in that language, having met with a manuscript in the Bodleyan library proper to his purpose [D]. He was engaged in this work, when he was admitted Probationer-Fellow of his college, July 24, 1628, and finished it a few months after (k); but, as the most ingenious minds are often the most diffident, he laid it by, not having courage to resolve upon a publication, 'till the fame of it, in 1629, brought him into the knowledge of the learned Gerard John Vossius; who being then at Oxford (l), obtained his consent to carry it to Leyden, where it was printed that year (m) in 4to. under the immediate care and inspection of De Dieu [E]. The same year, December 20, he was ordained Priest, having entered into Deacon's Orders

(b) From a MS. given among many others to that university by Joseph Scaliger.

De Dieu was assisted in that work by Daniel Heinfius, Prof. in Apocal. Syriac.

(i) The 2d Epistle of St Peter, 2d and 3d of John, and that of Jude. All the other books, except these five, had been well printed by Albertus Widmanstadius at Vienna in 1555, being sent into the West for that purpose by Ignatius, the Jacobite Patriarch of Antioch in the XVth century. Id. ibid.

(k) In the Dedication dated at Corpus Christi-college, Novemb. 12, 1629, he writes thus concerning it: Per annum jam fere integrum apud me retinueram.

(l) See more of this person in the article of Primate Usher, in England; but, as the year begins on the first of January in Holland, it is set down 1630 in the title-page.

(m) i. e. Before Lady-day, when the year at that time commenced in England; but, as the year begins on the first of January in Holland, it is set down 1630 in the title-page.

(1) In our author's Life, cited above.

(2) That writer tells us, he was baptized the day above-mentioned, in the parish of St-Peter's in the East, for which he cites that parish register. Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 868.

(3) Who made large collections, with a view of writing Dr Pococke's Life, which were communicated to Mr Twells.

(4) Mr Edward Pococke, B. D. Twells's Life, &c. p. 1 and 5.

(5) Id. ibid.

(6) Son of George Pafor, author of the Lexicon to the New Testament.

(7) Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 219.

(8) Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. in A. D. 1616 and 1622, and Fasti, Vol. I. col. 173.

[A] Was born November 8th at Oxford] Mr Twells (1) has given us St Peter's in the West in that city for the place of our author's birth. His authority for dissenting herein from Mr Wood (2) is, I suppose, Mr Smith of Dartmouth in Devonshire (3); he quotes no other for it, and assures us in general, that some things in Mr Smith's manuscript, which were inserted by himself, rest wholly on his veracity, the vouchers and authority for them having died with him. However that be, Mr Pococke's having Oxford for his birth-place, seems to be owing to his father's (4) not being then settled with his family at Chicvely in Berkshire, to which living he had been lately removed from a Fellowship in Magdalen-college.

[B] Academical courses.] Besides these, he read very carefully the best writers both Greek and Roman. This appears from some papers written by him when very young; wherein were found such observations upon passages in Quintilian, Cicero, Plutarch, and Plato, and other authors, as shew a great deal of skill and judgment. In other papers were seen marks of an uncommon application and industry. It being sometimes his custom to note the time when he began the perusal of any treatise, a note of this sort shews, that the reading and considering the whole dialogue De Oratoribus, by some ascribed to Tacitus, but commonly printed with Quintilian's Works, was the business only of one day (5).

[C] He went to the best masters.] His first master was Matthias Pafor (6), who, having been Professor of the Mathematics at Heidelberg, whence he was driven by the late troubles in the Palatinate, came and settled in Oxford, where he taught that science and the oriental languages (7). Soon after Mr Pococke had taken his degree of Master of Arts, leaving Mr Pafor, he applied himself to Mr William Bedwell, Vicar of Tottenham-High-Cross near London. This gentleman had been of service to Erpenius at Oxford in 1606, and was esteemed almost, if not altogether, equal to him in oriental learning, and the only person in England, as Mr Wood observes (8), with whom the profession of the Arabic then remained.

[D] A manuscript in the Bodleyan library] In the preface he tells us, it was a very fair manuscript, containing, besides these four, all the other Catholic Epistles, and the Acts of the Apostles. Concerning his own performance he writes thus. Syra ad MS. Codicis exemplar fideliter descripti. Eadem Ebræo, annexis ubique suis vocalibus, characterè expressi. In punctatione autem vocalium genuinam Syrorum normam a doctiss. Maronitis, Georg. Mich. Amira, & Gabriele Sionaita, luculenter traditam, in alterius illius

Ebræis Canonibus magis consonæ, locum substitui: Ut fecit in accurata illa Apocalypses editione cl. vir Lud. de Dieu; cujus ad imitationem, hoc quodcumque est opellæ, compositum a me ut moneam, supervacaneum est. Quo successu Judicent eruditiores; & si alicubi contra summorum virorum præcepta peccatum fuerit, uti monere & corrigere ne graverentur, oro. Latina uti Syriacis ad verbum fere responderent, curavi. Versionem nostram cum ista, quam olim dedit Etzelius (frustra diu quaesitam, Serrarii tandem operibus infertam reperio) contuli. A qua num sine causa longius alicubi dissentiam, si notas consulere placuerit, æstimabis (9). He adds, that having met with one Dionysius's Commentaries upon another Syriac version of these epistles (together with the rest of the New Testament), he had inserted in his notes all the words transcribed into those commentaries from that version; which he observes was not the same with his, notwithstanding Dionysius, in his preface to the Second Epistle of Peter, writes, that the version of that epistle into Syriac was not made when the other books of the New Testament were anciently translated into that language, and therefore was only to be found in the Syriac translation of Thomas, a Bishop, surnamed Heracleensis, from his city Heraclea. Mr Pococke does not so much as expressly guess either at the age or author of the version transcribed by himself, but seems to insinuate, that it might possibly be done by the same hand with that printed by Widmanstadius above-mentioned, since he observes, they agree in putting the affixes before the nouns. He likewise thinks, from the resemblance in the style, that it was made at the same time with the ancient Syriac versions of the New Testament. We see in this preface, that our author had then some thoughts of publishing a Syriac version of the four Gospels, which had been communicated to him by a friend; but in this he was prevented by his journey to Aleppo shortly after. Upon the whole, these remarks are a full proof how much Mr Pococke's genius lay to these studies, being at the time when this work was finished no more than 24 years of age.

[E] He was prevailed upon to print it by Vossius, and under the care of De Dieu.] Our author's address, in making this affair the subject of a dedication of his piece to Vossius himself, furnishes a specimen both of his Latin style and oratorical talents. Having inscribed it Clariss. Doctissimoque Viri D. Ger. Joh. Vossio Eloquentiæ Chronologiæ & Linguae Græcæ apud Leiden ses Professori, Cathedralis Ecclesiæ Cantuariensis apud Anglos Prebendario (10); he begins in these terms. Quod diutius latere noluisse opusculum, en tuam, Doctissime Vir, ambit patrocinium. After which, giving a short account

(9) He has also added the original Greek.

(10) Vossius came then into England to be installed into that Prebend [of Canterbury], which had been given him by King Charles I.

(n) He received both these Orders from the hands of Dr Richard Corbet, Bishop of Oxford.

Orders some time before (n); and, being appointed Chaplain to the English factory at Aleppo [F], he arrived at that place October 17, 1630 (o). He left Oxford with great regret [G]; but, as his situation in the East furnished an opportunity of accomplishing his skill in the Arabic tongue *, he omitted no means of compassing that end. In this view, among other methods, he agreed with a Shaich, or Doctor called Phatallah, to attend him frequently, and entertained one Hamet as a servant [H] by the year, that he might

(o) He landed, after a long voyage, first at Scanderoon, October 14, and passed in three days thence to Aleppo, Twells, P. 4.

* He also improved himself in the Æthiopic and Syriac languages, of which last he made a Grammar, with a praxis for his own use. He likewise applied to one Rabbi Samuel for improvement in the Hebrew, but soon found it fruitless, both this and all the other Jews there being very illiterate. Ibid.

account of the performance, and his motives and views for undertaking it, he proceeds thus: *Huc usque jam processum erat prompto magis quam felici conatu. Neque enim tantum infedit mihi φιλανθίας, ut lucubratiunculas meas, quæ in doctorum manus perveniant, dignas iudicem Fruebantur igitur adduc quas merebantur tenebris. Cum ecce Academiæ nostram tanto superbientem hospite, imo jam filio (11), visendi gratiâ tu, clarissime, Vir, huc advenisti; rem omnem de opera hac nostrâ a doctiss. V. Mro. Rous Protobibliothecario publico auribus accipis faventibus. Coram me alloqui, & ut publici sacerdotis juris, quæ per annum jam fere integrum apud me retinueram, hortari dignaris, imo ne quid moræ subsit, ipse typographorum curæ mandanda suscipis. Quam non injuria sumpsi jam tandem animos sub talibus auspiciis? nec est quod editionum ulterius detrectem, modi ne tantus [detrectet] patrocinium. Gessit equidem animus, quod summa me lætitiâ afficit, esse. Quod magnum illud reipublicæ literariæ decus Vossium apud nos & unum jam è nobis factum, intueri liceret & aspiceret, optandum hoc certe; sed quod & plurimis contigit: at quod colloquio frui, quod hoc qualemcunque observantia tefferem in manus tradere; felicitatis hoc certe neutiquam vulgaris. Frustra essem merito, si quid ex opellæ meæ dignitate gloriolæ aucuparer: at quod tuo jussu, quod sub tua emissa fuerit tutela, nemo mihi hunc honorem denegaverit. Vossius, in pursuance of the promise here mentioned, at his return to Leyden, committed the care of the edition to Ludovicus de Dieu, who, as Mr Twells informs us (12), gladly received Mr Pococke's papers; and after a diligent perusal of them, wrote to him, highly commending every part of the performance; but proposed several emendations in the pointing of the Hebrew character, and one in that of the Syriac, together with two alterations in the Latin version, and likewise one additional note; and having obtained Mr Pococke's consent to most (13) of the amendments, put the work to the press, and when it was finished, wrote a second time to congratulate our author thereon. The Latin part of the title runs thus: Epistolæ quatuor, Petri secunda, Johannis secunda & tertia, & Judæ, fratris Jacobi, una ex celeberrime Bibliothecæ Bodleianæ Oxoniensis M. S. Exemplari nunc primum depromptæ, & charactere Hebræo, versione Latina, notisque quibusdam insignitæ, opera & studio Edwardi Pococke Angli Oxoniensis. A considerable number of copies were sent as a present to the author at Oxford, together with acknowledgments of the usefulness of the work, and of the affection and honour expressed in the dedication; and indeed, continues Mr Twells, that learned man entertained on this occasion, such a value for Mr Pococke, that tho' he was thirty years older, and a sort of dictator in the commonwealth of learning, he treated him with all the kindness and familiarity of a friend. He corresponded with him by frequent letters, some of which have been made publick (14); he presented him with the books he published, and as long as he lived made honourable mention of him on all occasions.*

(11) This dedication is dated the same day that Vossius was incorporated into the university.

(12) Ubi supra, P. 3.

(13) All except three stand in the printed work; besides, De Dieu having a commission to make such others as he thought expedient, inserted, with Vossius's advice, six more in the Latin version, of which he gives an account in his second letter to Mr Pococke, with his reasons for them; but neither one nor the other are mentioned by Mr Twells.

(14) Inter Vossii & Cl. Viror. ad Vossii Epistolæ.

(15) That prelate's 6th letter to Mr Pococke in Octob. 1631, discovers there was then no acquaintance between them. Twells, p. 4.

(16) Id. ibid.

[G] He left Oxford with great regret.] He was of a meek and humble temper, and being naturally in love with retirement and peace, had no curiosity to travel or see foreign countries: not long after his arrival at Aleppo, in a letter to Mr Thomas Greaves then scholar of Corpus-Christi college, he writes thus: 'My chief happiness is the remembrance of my friends, and my former happiness when I was among them. Happy you that enjoy those places, where I so often with myself, as I see the barbarous people of this country. I think that he that has been once out of England, if he get home, will not be easily persuaded to leave it again (17).'

(17) Id. ibid.

[H] He agreed with a Shaich.] This old Arabian, who applied to him for that purpose, grew so fond of his scholar, that when he saw him resolved to return home, he not only offered his service, but even expressed a very earnest desire to accompany him to England. He likewise procured our author a large parcel of manuscripts, when he was afterwards at Constantinople. Nay, the kindness he retained for him was still so great, that he was even transported with joy that his beloved scholar was again in the East, and resolved immediately on a journey from Aleppo to the Porte on purpose to see him; which he performed accordingly, before Mr Pococke left that city; where, out of the like affection and respect, he staid some time longer to receive him. Nor did this Mahometan doctor ever forget his excellent scholar to the last moment of his life. In 1670, Mr Huntington, in his first letter from Aleppo to Mr Pococke, writes thus: Your old Shaich, who died several years since, was always mindful of you, and expressed your name with his last breath. He was still telling the good opinion he had of you, that you were a right honest man, and that he did not doubt but to meet you in paradise, under the banner of our Jesus. As to Hamet the doctor's servant, several letters were found among his papers, subscribed the poor Dervis and Ahmed, supposed to be the same servant, telling him, that his love for him, was it imbodied, would fill a thousand rivers; that tho' absent from his eyes, he should be still present in his heart, from which, no distance should remove him, and wishing and praying the peace of God to be with him, as long as the east wind blows. The following letter from the same Ahmet shews, that he was also serviceable in the procuring manuscripts for our author. To the presence of the eminent scholar Pococke the honoured. Very fair are the ornaments of paper enriched with the embroidery of words, and very beautiful is that, which the point of the pen draws forth from the minds of souls. Let peace spread its sweet smell like amber, and display its favour like jessamine, toward the tract of that country whither he goes. Let God give success to what he delights in and desires. Besides this, there came to us a much desired letter, fairly written after the best manner, and we were revived at it's coming, and satisfied at it's sweet aspect, beyond the spring and smell of flowers; and we know the matter it contained, and what answers you desired in it. And if you enquire concerning us, God be praised we are well and safe; and we trust in God you are in like manner: only since you left us, we have been as tho' our brother had left us, or the spirit which is in the heart. And therefore we had sincere joy, when we heard the news of your health, and of your arrival in your country, and we praise God, who brought you to your people in health and safety, for his mercy is plentiful. We also give you to understand, that we have taken to wife a camel woman, riding on a camel, that she may look after our affairs. We have also gotten Ecavans Sepba, which you saw formerly, fairly drawn for sixty garshes, we had not gotten it for that price, unless Hieronymo had gotten it for us, for how we could buy that, which I saw the day you went from Aleppo, you know.

(p) Id. ibid.(q) His Grace expresses it thus 'that he could do himself no greater honour than to name him for his first Professor.' Ibid. p. 7.

(r) Twells, p. 7.

(s) In his Thesis he made great use of that epistle of Gregory Nyssen, concerning those that travel to Jerusalem, which had been published separately in Greek and Latin by Peter du Moulin.

(t) A learned discourse written by his own hand being found among his papers, on Mal. ii. 7. is supposed to be it. Twells, p. 9.

(u) Viz. Dr Bancroft, then Bishop of London; Sir John Coke, one of the Secretaries of State; Sir Henry Martin, Judge of the Prerogative and Admiralty Courts; Sir Edward Lytton, then Solicitor-General; and Dr Thomas Ryves, King's Advocate.

(18) Ibid. p. 7.(19) See several letters of Dr Castel to him. Ibid. p. 69.

on every occasion converse familiarly in it. He likewise translated several Arabic books, and amongst others a collection of six thousand proverbs [I], containing the wisdom of the Arabians, and referring to the most remarkable occurrences in their history. October 30, 1631, he received a commission from Dr Laud, then Bishop of London, to buy for him such ancient Greek coins, and such manuscripts either in Greek or the oriental languages, as he judged most proper for an university library (p). Mr Pococke used his utmost endeavours to oblige the Bishop [K], in an employ to which he was particularly prompted by his own inclination; but neither did this, nor any thing else, hinder him from a most faithful discharge of every part of his duty to the Factory, which he ceased not to perform with the most diligent piety, at a time when it was attended with imminent danger of his life [L]. In 1636, he received a letter from Dr Laud, now Archbishop of Canterbury, informing him of his design to found an Arabic lecture at Oxford, and of naming him to the university for his first Professor (q). Upon this agreeable news he presently settled his affairs at Aleppo, and took the first opportunity of a ship to return home (r). On his arrival at Oxford this year, he prepared himself, according to the statutes of his college, to take his degree of Bachelor of Divinity; the scholastic exercises for which he performed on these two questions, 1. Whether pilgrimages to places called holy, undertaken on the account of religion, are to be approved. 2. Whether there be any such thing as purgatory. The former (for he maintained both in the negative) was levelled against the Council of Trent (s), which had declared these pilgrimages to be very pious. His Latin sermon (t) upon this occasion was attended by the King's Commissioners (u), then at Oxford on the business of confirming the present body of statutes, which had been lately compiled under the direction of Archbishop Laud, then Chancellor of that university. Mr Pococke took this degree July 8, 1636 (w); and the Archbishop's nomination of him for his Lecturer in the Arabic tongue being confirmed on the 8th of August following, he opened his lecture on the tenth with an excellent speech in Latin (x), containing an account of the nature and usefulness of the Arabic tongue, and performed it afterwards in such a manner as shewed a conscientious resolution to make the design really useful [M]. He was discharging the duties of this post with the greatest reputation, when his friend Mr John Greaves having projected his intended voyage to Egypt, resolved, if possible, to have Mr Pococke's company to Constantinople; and the means by which he compassed the point has been already related

(w) Wood's Fasti, Vol. I. col. 263.

(x) A small part of it, declaring the great esteem for poets and poetry among the ancient Arabians, was printed afterwards ad finem Notarum in Carmen Tograti, edit. Oxon. 1661.

know. And as for the history of Al Jaanabi, the Kadi, of which I saw some pieces, you told me, that we should tarry, 'till the transcribing it was finished; and when it was finished, we should buy it, if the most high God please. The Commentary on Gubstan is also finished, which we will send you; and if it please God, we will do our endeavour to send you the History of Ebn Chalezen, and any book that we shall see, if it is convenient for you, we shall send you; and you must needs send us an answer to these letters, and some little token of what your country affords. Send us also a printed Geography, and whatever business you shall have in these parts, send, and let me know, that I may enjoy the performance of it. The poor Derwische Ahmed (18).

[I] A Collection of 6000 proverbs ] To these he added some notes for explanation, with a design, as he seems to intimate to his friend Gerhard Vossius, to publish the whole after his return to England. But this he neither did then, nor ever afterwards. Before he left Oxford, in order to his second voyage to the East, he entered the following memorandum in a spare leaf of these Proverbs, where it is yet extant in the Bodleian library. In nomine S. S. & Individuæ Trinitatis cui laus in omnem æternitatem, Amen. If it please God that I return, not otherwise, to dispose of this translation of proverbs; I desire that it may be put into the archives of Corpus-Christi-College library, there, tho' very rude and imperfect, to be kept for some help of those that study the Arabic language: hoping, that Mr Thomas Greaves, or some other, may at some time perfect this work for an edition. In 1671, our author was much importuned by his friends to this publication (19); and he had no inconsiderable encouragement to proceed in it. Dr Castel promised to secure 100 copies for the university of Cambridge, and a still greater proportion might be depended on in Oxford, besides what the assiduity of his good friends in London, Mr Robert Boyle, Dr Gale, Mr Theodore Haak, might get off. But nothing was done in it, except that in March the following year, he certainly intended an edition thereof, since, in order thereto, he printed and dispersed a specimen of the work.

[K] Endeavours to oblige the Bishop ] In a letter of that prelate, then made Archbishop of Canterbury, May 31, 1634: he thanks Mr Pococke for Greek coins, but mentions no books; he even intimates, that none had been procured, by expressing at the same time his doubt, that the French and Venetians had raised the price of manuscripts more than that of coins. However, he continues to request of Mr Pococke, that he would send him word, when there was hopes of getting any good ones at a tolerable rate; and then adds, I hope you will, before you return back, make yourself able to teach the Arabic language. From these words it appears, that his Grace had then entertained thoughts of founding an Arabic lecture at Oxford, and was resolved in the choice of his first lecturer (20).

[L] When it was attended with imminent danger of his life. ] This happened in the year 1634, when the plague raged furiously at Aleppo, and many of the merchants fled two-days journey from the city, and dwelt in tents on the mountains. Mr Pococke had that holy confidence in the providence of God, and that readiness to meet his good pleasure whatever it should be, that tho' he visited them that were in the country, he for the most part continued to assist and comfort those, who had shut up themselves in the city. But it happened, that tho' the pestilence wasted beyond the example of former times, not ceasing as usual, in the entrance of the dog-days, all the English were preserved, as well those that continued in the town, as they that fled from it (21).

[M] A conscientious design to make it really useful. ] The book he first read upon, was the Proverbs of Ali, the fourth Emperor of the Saracens, and cousin-german and son-in-law to Mahomet; a man of such account with that impostor, not only for his valour, but knowledge also, that he often declared, if all the learning of the Arabians were destroyed, it might be found again in Ali, as a living library. Upon this book, observing the directions of the Archbishop in the statutes he had provided, he spent an hour every Wednesday in vacation time, and also in Lent, explaining the sense of the author, and the things relating to the grammar and propriety of the language, and also shewing the agreement it bath with the Hebrew and Syriac, as often as there was occasion. Besides, he usually tarried for some time in the publick school after the lecture, to resolve questions, and satisfy the doubts of his auditors; and always in the afternoon, gave admittance in his chamber from one o'clock 'till four, to all who would come to him, for further conference and direction (22).

(20) Ibid. p. 7.(21) Ibid. p. 8.(22) Ibid. p. 9.[N] Compassed

related [N]. As our author proceeded directly to that city (y), so his stay there being much longer than that of his fellow-traveller, he succeeded also much better, as well in his own private concerns [O], as in their joint employ of purchasing manuscripts, &c. for the Archbishop, having therein the assistance of several other persons, besides the Patriarch Cyril (z) [P], who was a common friend to both. During his abode here, he became

(z) That Patriarch gave him an account of the books at Mount Athos, which he sent to Archbishop Laud, who had a little before sent him a letter, dated in April, 1638, informing him, that, in a letter he had lately received from Dr Usher, that Primate observed, that Greece having been often gleaned, the likeliest way to procure Greek manuscripts was to strike over to Natolia and Mount Athos; but this letter did not come to Mr Pococke's hands 'till after the death of Cyril, which put an end to all his thoughts of visiting that famous mount. Life of Pococke, p. 16.

[N] Compassed his point in the manner already related. Tho' the proposition for this second voyage to the East came first from Mr Greaves (23), yet it was the Archbishop that gave life to it. For approving the design, as soon as he was acquainted with it, he overruled Mr Greaves's plan of the 'Confulship, and encouraged Mr Pococke thereto, by allowing him the stipend of his lecture during his absence. This and the like revenue from his Fellowship at Corpus-Christi, together with an estate of some value, which was lately fallen to him on the death of his father, enabled Mr Pococke to accomplish his desire, without putting his friend to an expence that was so generously and affectionately offered.

[O] He succeeded better in his own private concerns. Besides a design to perfect himself in the Arabic language, the most copious and difficult in the world, our author had other reasons for undertaking this voyage; he had lately engaged in the translation of an historical work, which he intended to dedicate to the Archbishop, as a lasting monument of his gratitude; and this he believed could not be performed by him any where with so much ease and exactness as there, where, upon every difficulty, he might have recourse to those, whom he thought most likely to give the truest account of the matters of fact, and also best understood the language they were written in; the view likewise of purchasing many other useful treatises, besides what he had already procured, was no doubt a strong incentive to his second visit into that country. On his first arrival, he made it his business to enquire out some learned Turk for his assistance both in books and the language, which he found very difficult to compass in the metropolis of that Empire; but he had the happiness here which he formerly sought for in vain at Aleppo, to wit, the society of several Jews, who were both learned and civil (24), and assisted him both in buying and transcribing books, particularly Jacobo Romano, the author of an Auctuarium to Buxtorf's Bibliotheca Rabbinica, and one of the most learned Jews in his time (25).

[P] Having the assistance of several others besides Cyril. Our author's connections with this much famed patriarch, seem to have been more intimate than those of Mr Greaves; the same profession of the two former would naturally unite them into a greater familiarity; and accordingly, the patriarch's untimely end was more felt and lamented by Mr Pococke, who, not only as his correspondence required, acquainted Archbishop Laud therewith, but was at the pains to draw up a particular account of Cyril's life: and when that paper happened to be lost, he related the contents to Dr Smith, who afterwards published what he took from our author's mouth, with the title of Collectanea de Cyrillo Lucario, Lond. 1707; from whence we learn, that this patriarch in his youth travelled into several parts of Europe; and that, besides Latin, he understood several modern languages, by which means he became acquainted with the religion both of Papists and Protestants; and approving the latter, conceived a peculiar regard for the Church of England, and when he first composed his piece of the confession of the Christian Faith, he dedicated it to King James the First, and designed to get it printed in England. Afterwards, when he ventured upon that bold attempt of ordering Nicodemus Metaxa to set about printing it at Constantinople, in the Greek press which he had brought thither from London, it had a dedication to King Charles the First (26); to whom he presented the famous Alexandrian manuscript of the Bible, printed by Dr Grabe. But Mr Pococke enjoyed him not long; for before he had been a full year at Constantinople, the good old patriarch fell a sacrifice to the malice of the Jesuits: as he never ceased boldly to assert the truth in opposition to the corruptions of the Church of Rome, so the missionaries of that order had continually persecuted him almost twenty years, from his first coming to the throne of Constantinople. They had more than once, by their interest in the Ministers of State, gotten him deposed; they had also caused him to be banished. Among other accusations, they represented the arguments he made use of to prove Christ's divinity against the Jews, and the Greek press which he had provided to print catechisms and other useful books for the instruction of the Christians under his care, as a seditious design against the government. However, hitherto, by the interest and zeal of the English and Dutch Ambassadors, these attempts upon his life had been defeated; but when he had even obtained such an interest in the Prime Vizier, as seemed a sufficient fence against all future trouble, a bargain was privately struck up with the great Bahaw, to take the opportunity of the Vizier's absence, and fill the ears of the Grand Seigneur Sultan Morad (then on the borders of Persia, in order to the siege of Bagdad) with the great danger that his empire was in from the Patriarch Cyril, a popular man of a vast interest, and kept, as this informer (27) pretended to be well assured, a close correspondence with Christian Princes. This pretence succeeded according to their wishes, and a written order was immediately dispatched for taking away his life, which was presently executed with exquisite barbarity. A crew of janizaries seizing him in his palace, carried him to sea, as it were for another banishment, where, in a boat, amidst the most devout prayers to God, with much fervour and constancy, he poured out, they reviled, buffeted, and then stripped him, and threw him into the water. His body being driven to the shore, was there secured, 'till some of his friends took care to bury it; but the rage of his enemies would not afford it such a resting place; they caused it to be dug up, and cast again into the sea. It was taken up a second time by the humanity of some fishermen, and, at the charge of his friends, buried in a Greek chapel on a little island; whence, afterwards, to satisfy the people, when the heat of things was over, it was brought to Constantinople, and there decently interred on the 27th of June 1638.

Besides the assistance of Cyril, our author had that of Dr Cerigo, a learned Physician at Galata, and also from Aleppo that of his old master and servant mentioned in remark [H], besides Mr William Corteray, and Mr Richard Hill (28), English Merchants there; the last of whom sent him the curious manuscript of the Persian Gospels, and some of the books of St Ephrem in the original Syriac, together with some account of his life. Our author was very serviceable also to his friend Mr Greaves, both in procuring him manuscripts, as may be collected from several letters of the latter from Alexandria to him, containing requests of that kind, as well as other things, particularly in one of these Mr Greaves desires him to send some marble stones with inscriptions in the general ships to England; and in another begs to be informed of the composition of ink at Constantinople, their way of writing, their manner of letting houses, and making contracts. In one of these letters he also desires his friend 'to measure the west end of the church of St Sophia very exactly with a very fine small wire of iron or brass, observing that he had done it himself with a line of pack thread, which he says, because it stretches about half a foot, he could not depend upon. You must, adds he, with many circumstances describe the place which you measure, that if any should desire to do it hereafter, they may take the very same without erring (29).' The cautious exactness here directed for measuring the west end of St Sophia with a line, are sufficient to persuade us of the accuracy Mr Greaves observed in measuring the pyramids; and particularly obviates an objection against it, in the remarks upon the Pyramidographia (30), where that ingenious author insinuates a suspicion, that it was made only by the quadrant and not by a line.

(27) This was one Berces, who succeeded him in the Patriarchate of Constantinople, and, among other things, charged him with having sent letters to the Emperor of Muscovy, by means whereof, some two years before, the Muscovite surprized a town upon the Black-Sea belonging to the Turk. See a letter of Mr Greaves from Constantinople, of August 2, 1638, in his Life prefixed to his Miscellanies by Dr Birch. Mr Pococke was threatened to be anathematized by him.

(28) Mr Hill is also mentioned as being serviceable to others in this way by Mr Selden, in his preface to Origines Alexandrinæ.

(29) Twells, p. 17.

(30) In Greaves's Miscellanies, Vol. II. where that objector is very severe upon Mr Greaves for making use of his quadrant upon that occasion, and observes, that Mathematicians never apply themselves to the way of taking measures by proportion, where they can do it by application.

[2] H2

(y) He arrived there about the middle of June, 1637, as appears from a passage in rem. [P], and fixed at Pera or Galata on the other side of the water, where the English and other merchants then usually resided, as did also the English Ambassador. Twells, p. 7.

(23) See his article.

(24) In a letter written some months after his arrival, he complains that he could find no such persons.

(25) Judæorum quos mihi nosse contigit, nemini vel doctrina vel ingenuitate secundus, says our author of him, in Nat. Miscell. ad Portam Mosis, p. 93, ed. 1655.

(26) It was printed in 1645, 8vo. with this title, Cyrolli Lucaris Confessio Christianæ Fidei.

(a a) At Genoa he overheard two Turkish slaves ridicule the ceremony of the procession of the Host, thinking themselves secure from a discovery by talking their own language; and Mr Pococke was not so much displeas'd thereat as to betray them. Id. ibid.

for some time Chaplain to Sir Peter Wych [2], then the English Ambassador to the Porte. In 1639, he received several letters from his friends, and particularly the Archbishop, pressing his return home [R]. Accordingly, in August the following year, he embarked on board the Margaret, which bringing him to Italy (a a), he pass'd thence to Paris, where meeting with the famous Hugo Grotius, he acquainted him with a design he had of translating his Treatise concerning the Truth of the Christian Religion into Arabic (b b) [S]. The proposal was received with much satisfaction by that excellent person, (b b) Grotii Epistol. Gulielmo Fratri, No. 534. p. 914.

[2] He was some time Chaplain to Sir Peter Wych. Mr Pococke had been entertained with great kindness in Sir Peter's house, being recommended, as well as Mr Greaves, by Archbishop Laud to him; and after his Lady, with his Chaplain, was gone for England, the Ambassador was obliged to stay much longer by reason of the Grand Seignor and Vizier's absence in the Persian wars, seeing, till their return, he could not obtain his credential letters, and wanting a Chaplain for that time, Mr Pococke desired the Archbishop's leave to supply that place, and easily obtained it. While he lived in this house, Sir Cyril Wych was born, and had his name Cyril given him from the Patriarch abovementioned, who was present at his baptism in the Ambassador's chapel; and Dr Pococke many years after, desired Sir Cyril to write the Patriarch's life (31).

(31) Twells, ubi supra.

[R] He received in 1639, several letters pressing his return home. Mr Greaves from Alexandria advised him not to devote himself so much to his Oriental studies as to forget his hopes and his fortunes at home. And Mr Charles Fettiplace, a Turkey merchant in London, who received his money from the college and Archbishop, and sent him bills of exchange for it to Constantinople, acquainting him with some preferments lately bestowed on his friend Mr Thomas Greaves, desired him to consider, that his great patron was mortal like other men, and that therefore he should by no means absent himself unnecessarily, and lose the opportunities of improving his favour to the best advantage. And the Archbishop himself, in many successive letters had been quickening him in this respect. In one dated March 4, 1639-40, he writes thus: 'I am now going to settle my Arabic lecture for ever upon the university, and I would have your name in the deed, which is the best honour I can do for the service (32).'

(32) Ibid.

[S] He acquainted Hugo Grotius with his design to turn his book of Veritate, &c. into Arabic. That great man was then Ambassador at the Court of France from the crown of Sweden. Mr Pococke had long resolved, as soon as he should be at leisure, to do something towards the conversion of some of the Mahometans, having, whilst he lived in the East, observed in many of them much justice, and candor, and love, and other excellent qualities which seem'd to prepare them for the kingdom of God; and therefore he could not but persuade himself, that were the doctrines of the Gospel propos'd to them, not a few might open their eyes to discern the truth. For this purpose, he could not think of any thing more likely to prove useful, than translating into Arabic the general language of the East, that excellent discourse of Grotius abovementioned (33); and in this proposal (34) he did not scruple to take notice to that great author of some things toward the end of his book, which he could not approve, as advancing opinions, which, tho' they were commonly in Europe charged upon the followers of Mahomet, yet had no foundation in any of their authentic writings, and were such, as they themselves were ready on all occasions to disclaim. With this freedom, Grotius was so far from being displeas'd, that he heartily thanked him for it, and gave him authority, in the version he intended, to expunge and alter whatever he should think fit. This work was published in 1660, at the sole expence of Mr Robert Boyle; and the alterations made from the original by our author, were chiefly these: that he left out Grotius's introduction, as being only an account, address'd upon a particular occasion to Hieron. Bignonius, of a work of the like nature, which he had formerly published in Dutch; and also containing in it some expressions relating to the Mahometans, which, lying in the entrance, might perhaps hinder those people from looking any further. Instead of this; therefore, he insert'd a new preface, wherein he propos'd the design of the work; which he observ'd, was to en-

(33) In the epistle above quoted, Grotius says the version was then made. See his words. Fuit apud me his diebus Anglus vir doctissimus, qui diu in Turcico vixit imperio, & meum librum De Veritate Christianae Religionis in Arabico vertit sermone, curabitque, si potest, typis in Anglia edi.

(34) Henry Horstinger, Professor of Hebrew at Zurich in Switzerland, being employed in translating the Chronicon Samaritanam into Latin in 1642, at the request of Primate Usher, had then seen Mr Pococke in England; and hearing now of his translation of Grotius De Veritate, &c. and the design of it, he was thereby prompted to turn the Helvetic Confession into Arabic, and desired Mr Pococke's assistance therein. Twells, p. 27.

quire concerning the true worship of God, and the arguments produced for it. He shews the vast importance of such researches, and prays for the divine illumination which is necessary to render them effectual. He likewise gives some account of the persons to whom this treatise would be especially serviceable, and of what kind the arguments made use of in it are, namely, such as, being collected from the books both of ancient and modern authors, who have written on this subject, are sure and convincing, and also easy to be understood. He likewise made several alterations in the sixth book against Mahometanism, amending some things and leaving out others, both in the fifth and tenth sections of it, and particularly the pretended miracle of the flying of the dove to the ear of Mahomet, as having no foundation either in the writings or opinions of his followers; about which, when he discours'd with Grotius, that learned man freely acknowledged, his taking the story only from our own writers, especially from Scaliger, in his notes on Manilius (35). After all, this pious design of our author did not meet with that success which it deserved, notwithstanding the endeavours of Mr Boyle, and also of Mr Baxter, to promote the distribution of the books in the eastern countries by our merchants. Dr Smith, who went to Constantinople in 1668, affirm'd; that he did not know of so much as one single copy there, except those which he carried out of England himself, and which he presented there to a Turkish Imaim, or Turk of his acquaintance, who was well skill'd in the language of his Prophet; and though a considerable number were dispos'd of at Aleppo by Dr Huntington, yet he found the thing was much discouraged by the Romanists; upon which he observ'd, that the most innocent and useful attempts will be discouraged by some persons, when made by such instruments as they do not approve of. For, notwithstanding all the kindness (as appears from his printed epistles) (36), which pass'd between him and the Fathers in those countries, and the offices of friendship they mutually performed. He complain'd to Dr Pococke, that in dispersing this treatise he had much greater apprehensions from their malice, than from the unprompted accusations of the Turks themselves. He added farther, that upon this account he was oblig'd, for his own safety, to cut the last book wherein Mahometanism is confuted, out of some copies before he distributed them. However, as the doctor, notwithstanding these difficulties, gave some hopes of doing good this way, our author proceeded, for the use of the young Christians in the East, to translate the Catechism of the English Church into Arabic (37); and sent three copies to Mr Huntington, with a letter, wherein he express'd his wishes, that the chief prayers of the English liturgy were likewise in the same language. To this Mr Huntington returns for answer as follows. 'Undoubtedly this [Catechism] is but a specimen of your further design; that thereby you would guess how it might be accepted before you accomplish the whole. Really, continues he, if you will believe the people, they wonder that a Frank should understand their tongue better than the most learned among themselves; and they rejoice to see the two tables [of the commandments] once more entire and perfect, not abused and broken, as in all the methods and systems of divinity that the Romanists have hitherto convey'd, for ought I know, into these places. And, adds he, if this be so acceptable, what would the whole service be, when the people shall read it so fully express'd in the language wherein they are born? No one is, nor ever will be, besides yourself, fit for the employment. For it will become the best liturgy in the world to be best translated; and in this case, every one that knows your name, knows where alone to rest his expectation.' These pressing instances had the desired effect, and in 1674, Mr Pococke printed

(35) Notes in Spec'm. Hist. Arabum, p. 186, 187.

(36) Edit. Lond. 1704, 8vo.

(37) It had this title in Latin: Catechismus Ecclesiae Anglicanae Lingua Arabica, 1671. At the end were added some places of Scripture, containing the general principles of religion. The Te Deum was also inserted.

person, who gave him a great deal of encouragement to pursue it. On his arrival in London, Mr Pococke had the misfortune to find his great and worthy patron committed to the Tower. However, as that was far from lessening his esteem, so he did not fail to pay his respects where it was so much his duty. In this interview he delivered a message from Hugo Grotius, to which the Archbishop returned a very remarkable answer [T]. Our Professor, on his coming to Oxford, found his lecture settled by the founder to a perpetuity; but the iniquity of the times hindered him from proceeding to any considerable purpose, either in that or the other designs in Arabic and Rabbinical learning, which he had undertaken through a willingness to answer the expectations that were now every where entertained of him, as the first person in Europe for oriental learning [U]. In 1643, he was presented by his college to the rectory of Childrey, a living of very good value in Berkshire (cc); and the military state of Oxford rendering the demands of his professorship impractical, set him more at liberty to attend particularly to the duties of this new relation, which he discharged with the religious care of a worthy Parish-Priest [W]. But neither this, nor his distinguished humility, nor yet a most modest, and at the same time pleasant and entertaining, conversation [X], by which he was remarkably engaging (cc) Wood's Athen. Oxon. V. l. II. col. 369, and Twells, p. 21.

Partes præcipuæ Liturgiæ Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ lingua Arabica. However, he did not render the whole liturgy, but the chief prayers and hymns only. The version containing the daily morning and evening prayers, and the order for administering Baptism, and the Lord's Supper; to which were added the thirty-nine articles, and the arguments of our homilies. Mr Huntington, in the letter last mentioned, intimates, that he would readily advance the whole charge of the impression, if he lived to be worth so much, in case it should happen, that no other benefactors offered their assistance; but the whole expence of printing it was defrayed by the university.

[T] He delivered a message, to which the Archbishop returned a remarkable answer. The news of the Archbishop's imprisonment in the Tower on March 1, 1640, having reached Paris, would naturally become the subject of much discourse between our author and Grotius, from whom the message was: 'That it was his humble advice and request, that his Grace would find out some way, if possible, to escape out of the hands he was now in, and pass to some place beyond the seas, there to preserve himself for better times, at least, to obtain some present security from the malice of his bitter enemies, and the rage of a deluded people †.' This Mr Pococke told him that excellent person had earnestly pressed him to move his Grace to, as soon as he should have access to him, and he hoped the thing would appear so reasonable to him, that he would neglect no means or opportunity that might be offered, to put it in execution. Tho' this was a course which had been lately taken by some other great men (38); yet the Archbishop, as soon as it was thus proposed to him, immediately declared his resolution against it.

'I am obliged, said he, to my good friend Hugo Grotius, for the care he has thus expressed of my safety; but I can by no means be persuaded to comply with the counsel he hath given me. An escape indeed is feasible enough, yea, 'tis, I believe, the very thing which my enemies desire; for every day an opportunity for it is presented to me, a passage being left free, in all likelihood for this very purpose, that I should endeavour to take the advantage of it; but they shall not be gratified by me, in what they appear to long for. I am almost 70 years old, and shall I now go about to prolong a miserable life by the trouble and shame of flying? and, were I willing to be gone, whither should I fly? should I go into France or any other Popish country, it would be to give some seeming ground to that charge of Popery, they have endeavoured with so much industry and so little reason, to fasten upon me. But if I should get into Holland, I should expose myself to the insults of those sectaries there, to whom my character is odious, and have every Anabaptist come, and pull me by the beard. No, I am resolved not to think of flight; but continuing where I am, patiently expect and bear what a good and a wise Providence hath provided for me, of what kind soever it shall be (39).'

[U] To answer the expectations, &c. Soon after his arrival he received a letter from Gerhard John Vossius (40), who expresses himself in the following terms: 'I give thanks unto God for your safe return, as upon the private score of our friendship, so upon the publick account; because I well perceive, how 'great advantage the republick of letters and the Church of God may receive from you. For, if more than 15 years ago, you could acquit yourself so well, what may we not hope from you now? that age, and the industry of some years, have much increased your knowledge and ripened your judgment. Your return, therefore, I congratulate to yourself, to Oxford, and to all England; yea, and to the whole world.' Mr Pococke, in answer (41) to this, declares himself ready to set his hand to any business concerning which he should be satisfied, that it would be of the least benefit to the commonwealth of learning.

[W] He discharged the duties of a worthy parish-priest. Among other instances of his prudent and pious care for the religious improvement of his flock, it is observable, that tho' he was led, both by genius and inclination, to spend his whole life in the most recondite literature, yet his sermons were always composed in a plain stile upon practical subjects, carefully avoiding all shew and ostentation of learning*. But from this very exemplary caution, not to amuse his hearers (contrary to the common method then in vogue) with what they could not understand; some of them took occasion to entertain very contemptible thoughts of his learning, and to speak of him accordingly. So that one of his Oxford friends, as he travelled through Childrey, enquiring, for his diversion, of some of the people, who was their Minister, and how they liked him? received this answer. Our Parson is one Mr Pococke, a plain honest man, but Master, said they; he is no Latiner (42).

[X] Remarkably amiable by his humility and pleasant conversation. Mr Locke who was bred in the same college, and knew our author, has expressed this part of his character very well (43), as follows: 'That his other virtues and excellent qualities had so strong and close a covering of modesty and unaffected humility, that though they shone the brighter to those who had the opportunities to be more intimately acquainted with him, and eyes to discern and distinguish solidity from shew, and esteem virtue that sought not reputation, yet they were the less taken notice of, and talked of, by the generality of those to whom he was not wholly unknown.' The same author, speaking of his modesty, as well as entertaining conversation, writes thus: 'That though he was not a forward, much less an assuming, talker; yet he was the farthest in the world from sullen or morose, and that he would talk very freely and very well of all parts of learning, besides that wherein he was known to excel. That he was not at all close and reserved; but, on the contrary, the readiest to communicate to any that consulted him. Indeed, continues Mr Locke, he was not forward to talk, nor ever would be the leading man in the discourse, though it were on a subject that he understood better than any in the company; and would often content himself to sit still and hear others debate in matters which he himself was more a master of. He had often the silence of a learner, where he had the knowledge of a master; and that not with a design, as is often done, that the ignorance any one betrayed, might give him the opportunity to display his own knowledge with the more lustre, and advantage to their shame, or censure there,

(41) Ibid. No. 336.

* His sermons in the university were full of critical and other learning. Twells, p. 22.

(42) Id. ibid.

(43) In a letter dated July 23, 1703, to Mr Smith of Dartmouth, who was then collecting materials for writing Dr Pococke's life. This letter was printed in the year 1714; and Mr Twells observes it to be truly done, as appears from comparing it with the original then in his hands. Pococke's Life, ubi supra, towards the conclusion.

† Grotius, in the like circumstances, had made his escape from the fortress of Louvestein in Holland, being carried out in a chest under the name of books. See the English translation of his Life by Burigny, p. 78, 79. Lond. 1754, 8vo.

(38) Particularly by Finch, the Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal, and by Windesbank, one of the Secretaries of State, the former into Holland, the latter into France. Salmon's Chronological Historian, for the year 1640.

‡ In the History of his Troubles, &c. it is said, that after being kept three years close prisoner, he was brought to his trial; which, as appears by this letter, must be understood to mean only that he was nominally such a prisoner, according to the tenour of his commitment.

(39) Twells, p. 20.

(40) Inter Vofsi & Cl. Vitor. ad Vofsum Epistolæ, No. 425.

engaging, were sufficient to secure him from sharing the common fate of the Royalists in those times. The profits of his Professorship, presently after the death of Archbishop Laud in 1644, were seized by the sequestrators [Y] as part of that unfortunate Prelate's estate. Being thus reduced to pass his time altogether in the country, he turned his thoughts to matrimony, and, in 1646, concluded a marriage with Mary, daughter to Thomas Burdet, Esq; of West-Wortham in Hampshire (dd). As his very extraordinary merit procured him friends on all sides; so, in 1647, he was restored to the salary of his lecture by the interest of Mr Selden [Z]; and, to preserve him from the outrage of the soldiery, he obtained a protection under the hand and seal of General Fairfax, by the application of Dr George Ent. In 1648, at the recommendation of Dr Sheldon and Dr Hammond, he was nominated Hebrew Professor at Oxford, with the Prebend of Christ-Church annexed thereto, by the King, then a prisoner in the Isle of Wight, and was soon after voted into the same lecture by the Committee of Parliament (ee); but a different Prebend in the same church (ff) being appointed him, thereby he was greatly concerned, and entered a protest against it [AA]. However, that trouble was, not very long after, buried in a much greater;

(dd) Ibid. p. 23.

(ee) But he had no patent, the King not having then the Seal in his possession; nor had he any ordinance of Parliament, but only a vote of the Committee.

(ff) That of Dr Payne, who had been ejected some time before by the same Committee.

' when they were gone; but these arts of triumph and ostentation frequently practised by men of skill and ability, were utterly unknown to him. It was very seldom that he contradicted any one, or if it were necessary at any time to inform any one better, who was in a mistake, it was done in so soft and gentle a manner, that it had nothing of the air of dispute or correction, and seemed to have little of opposition in it. That in company he never used himself, nor willingly heard from others, any personal reflections on other men, though set off with a sharpness that usually tickles, and by most men is mistaken for the best, if not the only seasoning of pleasant conversation; yet he would often bear his part in innocent mirth, and by some apposite and diverting story continue and heighten the good humour.' Thus has Mr Locke done justice to this part of our author's character; which, however, evidently shews, that it would have been drawn more agreeably to the original person (had he been then living) without making the comparisons which we see therein more than once.

[Y] Were seized by the sequestrators.] The stipend of the Arabic lecture was 40 pounds a year, charged upon the lands called Budd's Pastures, an estate of the Archbishop, in the parish of Bray in Buckinghamshire, which was settled upon the university for that purpose. The great meekness of Mr Pococke's temper did not overcome that steady principle of gratitude, which no apprehensions of danger to himself could make him neglect. Upon this occasion, therefore, he wrote a letter to the sequestrators, representing how useful that sort of learning was, which the income of that land was designed to promote, both to Divinity and other commendable studies; what reputation it then had in most universities beyond the seas, and what large salaries had been appointed in most of them for the encouragement of it. He also laboured to make them sensible, that besides the settlement of the founder, which was made with all the formalities that the law required, he had also an equitable right to what he claimed; for as his continuance at Aleppo, which first recommended him to the choice of the Archbishop, had been a thing of charge and difficulty to him, so to qualify himself better for this employment, he had been at the hazard of a voyage to Constantinople, the necessary expences of which amounted to a sum sufficient even for the purchase of a revenue for life of much greater value (44).

(44) Twells, p. 23, 24. who observes also, that his four years stay there had cost him between 5 and 600 pounds. p. 18.

[Z] Restored to the profits of his lecture by the interest of Mr Selden.] Besides Mr Selden, who being in Parliament, was the immediate instrument of procuring this restitution, several others were active to serve him in this matter; particularly, Dr Gerard Langbaine, Provost of Queen's college in Oxford, was at the pains of drawing a long instrument in Latin, wherein the course taken by the Archbishop effectually to settle the lands was, at large and very particularly, recited; and also a formal grant from that body of all the profits issuing out of them to Mr Pococke, during the time that he should continue to be Arabic lecturer; and the instrument being proposed by him and some others in congregation, with unanimous consent, had the seal of the university affixed to it (45).

(45) Ibid.

[AA] He was much concerned, and entered a protest against it.] Dr Morris, his predecessor, died March 27th this year, and on the 9th of April ensuing, the Committee having resolved that the matter of the answer put in by the Dean of Christ-church, Dr Samuel Fell, and others, the Prebends of that Church, who subscribed their names to the said answer, was a high contempt of the authority of Parliament; and that for an effectual remedy thereof, the said Dr Fell and Prebends so subscribing be removed from their places. The order proceeds thus. This Committee being informed that Dr Morris, one of the said Prebends, and Hebrew lecturer of the university, is lately deceased, whose hand is subscribed to the said answer, do order that Mr Pococke be Hebrew lecturer of the university in the place of the said Dr Morris deceased, and that he shall receive profits and dues belonging to the said place; and do further order, that the said Mr Pococke be, and hereby he is, constituted and established a collegiate Prebend of Christ church, in the place of Dr Payne removed from his Prebend's place by a former order of this Committee; and that the said Mr Pococke do enjoy and have all the power, rights, emoluments, rooms, and lodgings, by any statute, or custom, or right, formerly belonging to the said Dr Payne. This favour was owing to Mr Selden, as appears from a letter of thanks to him by Mr Pococke on this occasion (46). Accordingly, the Committee (46) Ibid. p. 26. issued an order June 6th following, to put him in possession of Dr Payne's lodgings. But though he acquiesced at present, through the persuasion of his friends, particularly Mr Greaves and Dr Langbaine. Yet he afterwards applied both to them and Mr Selden for his right to Dr Morris's Prebend and lodgings, which proving ineffectual, he read and entered the following protestation, August 31. 1649, before Dr Reynolds Dean of Christ church, then Vice-Chancellor; as also in the presence of Ralph Button, Prebendary of that church, and Ralph Aulken, and, lastly, of John French, Notary Publick and Register of the university. In which he set forth, that 'The late King, in the 6th year of his reign, had given and granted to John Morris, B. D. and then Hebrew Professor, a Canonry or Prebend in the Cathedral of Christ church, to be held by him, as long as he should continue to be Hebrew Professor or Lecturer of the university of Oxford, and no longer; with all the houses, mansions, profits, &c. any ways belonging, or hereafter to belong, to the said Canonry or Prebend. And, by the said letters patents, he farther granted to the said Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the university of Oxford, and their successors, that for the future, and that for a perpetuity, whenever, by the death, resignation, deprivation, &c. of the said John Morris, the said Prebend should any ways become void, that then, and so from time to time, the said Canonry, with it's aforesaid appurtenances, should come to every Hebrew Professor and Lecturer for the time being, and should not in the interim be granted to any other. And whereas, upon the natural death of the said John Morris, the Canonry was become void, he, Edward Pococke, by the appointment and decree of the honourable Committee for regulating the university of Oxford, was declared publick Professor and Lecturer of Hebrew in the said university in room of the said John Morris: and that whereas by a very late act for abrogating cathedral churches, it was among other things ordained, that the said act nor any thing in it contained, should in any wise extend to the foundation of Christ church in Oxford, or to the profits or emoluments of any publick greater; for, October 24, 1649, another Committee of Parliament, which had been appointed for regulating the universities, passed the two following resolutions: 1. That it does appear to this Committee, that Edward Pococke, Collegiate-Prebend of Christ-Church, hath not taken and subscribed the Engagement prescribed by the act. 2. That the Committee will proceed on this day fortnight to nominate another, to supply the place of Mr Edward Pococke, Collegiate-Prebend of Christ-Church. Accordingly, on the 7th of November, the Committee resolved, that Mr Peter French be Collegiate-Prebend in the place of Mr Pococke; and a special order of the said Committee for that purpose was issued, reciting, that the place of the said Mr Pococke became void for not taking and subscribing the Engagement (gg). In the midst of these persecutions, he not only continued to read his lectures (hb) with the same diligence as before; but also published this year (ii), his Specimen Historiæ Arabum [BB]; and when, some time in December 1650, another

(ii) In January the same year, special licence was granted to him by the delegates of the university, to supplicate for his degree of Doctor of Divinity; but he declined it. Wood's Fasti, Vol. II. col. 92.

(gg) Ibid. p. 32.

(hb) After the loss of his Canonry, he resided in a chamber in Balliol-college as often as he was obliged to be at Oxford. Ibid. p. 33.

lick Professor or Lecturer in either university. He, the said Edward Pococke, Hebrew Lecturer in the university of Oxford, did therefore (with due reverence) openly, and in writing, protest, that by his acceptance of any other houses and mansions in Christ-church aforesaid, he did not intend any prejudice should be done to his right, title, and interest, or to that of his successors, the Hebrew Professors at Oxford, or to the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars of the said university, to the houses and mansions in Christ-church, lately in the possession of John Morris, Hebrew Professor, or to any other profits, &c. so that (notwithstanding any acceptance of mine for the time) my right and that of my successors, and that of the Chancellor, Masters, and Scholars, of the said university of Oxford, and their successors (if any right there be) to all and singular of these may be preserved safe and unhurt, and remain so at present, and to all future times, according to the force, form, and effect, of the letters patents, resolution, and act aforesaid. Dr Langbaine observes, that this appointment of Dr Payne's lodgings and Canonry to Mr Pococke, was done without any design to prejudice him or the Hebrew lecture, since not any of the Committee, not even Mr Selden himself, knew any thing of the King's annexation.

[BB] Specimen historiæ Arabum.] It is a short discourse in Arabic with a Latin translation, and notes by him; to which is added an Elenchus Scriptorum Arabicorum. The discourse itself is taken out of the general History of Gregory Abul Ferajus, and is the introduction to that author's ninth Dynasty (47); where, being about to treat of the empire of the Saracens or Arabians, he gives a compendious account of that people before the time of Mahomet; as also of that impostor himself, and the new religion introduced by him, and of the several sects into which it was divided (48), with a kind of Creed of the orthodox faith from Gazalius. Mr Pococke's notes are a collection of a great variety of things relating to these matters, out of more than an hundred Arabic manuscripts (a catalogue of which he adds in the end of his book). Wherein, as he has given an account of the true opinions of the Mahometans, so he has taken care, upon proper occasion, to do them justice, by a vindication from such things as had been fastened on them without sufficient grounds. As, particularly, that charge of idolatry brought against them by Euthymius and some of the Greek writers; and those stories of their expecting the return of their prophet, of his body's being put into an iron chest, and suspended by a load-stone, and of the dove coming to his ear. He has also many critical remarks very useful to such as study the Arabic tongue: and he has likewise occasionally inserted many things which Abul Ferajus did not directly lead him to. Thus he gives a description of Mecca out of Sharifol Edrefi. He shews what the superstition of the ancient Sabii was, which, as Maimonides observes, had spread itself over the greatest part of the world. He gives an account of the Magi, who were very numerous, not only in Persia and India, but in Arabia too; thinking it probable, that those were of the last country, who came into Judæa to worship our Saviour. He has a short discourse out of an Arabian Physician, concerning the power of some kinds of food to change the temper and disposition of those that eat them. He also considers the state of learning among the latter Arabians, as it had been advanced by Abu Jaafor Almanfor, and afterwards by Almanon, and some following Emperors; intimating his opinion, that in ingenious studies, they hardly came behind the Greeks (49). This book he dedicated to Mr Selden, in a declaration at the end of the preface (50), that the following work was designed by him to be a token of his observance and gratitude to that friend. Upon reading the book, Mr Selden was extremely pleased therewith, and it was generally considered by the learned men of that time, as a convincing proof of Mr Pococke's assertion in the preface, that the Arab tongue contains such riches in every kind of learning, as had not then been discovered to the western parts of the world. This piece is still in the greatest esteem amongst all that are any ways conversant in the oriental learning. Besides what Dr Humphry Prideaux at home observes concerning it in his Life of Mahomet p. 190, Adrian Reland abroad writes thus of it (51). Cl. Pocockius in specimine historiæ Arabum, quo nemo carere potest cui literæ Arabicæ in deliciis sunt. Simon Ockley has also these words relating to it. Specimen historiæ Arabum opus vere aureum Cl. Pocockii studio elaboratum, dignus est hic liber, qui sæpius legatur, est enim quasi clavis ad quoscunque authores Arabicos intelligendos perquam necessaria (52).

Whoever considers the reputation of this work, together with the character of Mr Bayle, will not be surprized to find this latter author making free with the former upon a very slender acquaintance. Thus, having observed a wide difference between our author and Mr Greaves, about the time of Abulfeda's being advanced to the government of Hamah in Syria (53), he harangues thereon in the following manner: 'A circumstance which gives me pain, is, to find the learned Dr Pococke asserting that Abulfeda succeeded to the government of the province of Hamah, an. Heg. 710. Now this is inconsistent with what Mr Greaves has ascertained. However, continues he, it is more natural to depend on the latter, since Abulfeda is the chief subject on which he writes; whereas, the former mentions him only occasionally.' To this he adds the following censure. 'But is it not vexatious, that men of Dr Pococke's knowledge in oriental affairs cannot be depended on? and at the same time they publish a circumstance, one of their fellow-labourers should prove it to be false (54). But this ill timed pertness has been handsomely chastized by Mr Gagnier (55), and after him, by Mr George Sale (56); who have shewn the mistake not to belong to our author, but to Mr Greaves. Upon this, the following remark is made by Mr Twells: that Mr Bayle's critical rule is by no means applicable, in comparing Dr Pococke's authority to that of Mr Greaves in this case; since the former was incomparably superior to the latter, in the knowledge of the eastern writers, as he had greater opportunities, having spent more than twice the time in those parts. That Mr Greaves, continues he, speaking of this mistake, who otherwise was a cautious and accurate scholar, should print an error which might easily have been avoided, is the more surprizing, when we reflect that he had then this piece [Specimen Hist. Arab.] of his friend's, which was printed the year before, in his hands, and highly admired it, as indeed, every thing that came from him; and it appears, from the letters that passed between these two friends about this time, that Mr Greaves had consulted Dr Pococke, and received solutions from him of several doubts concerning Abulfeda. In some of which he proposes to him his intended version of several Arabic passages that occur in this very preface, wherein the grand mistake stands; and, which is more, the very passage from Al Sacerdan that misled him, and his designed translation of it is extant in a letter of his to Dr Pococke, though without naming that writer, or the use he intended to make of the passage from

(50) After the Arabian manner, as he informs Mr Selden in a private letter on this occasion. Twells, p. 35.

(51) De Religione Mahomedica, p. 86. Ultrajecti. 1705.

(52) Introd. ad Ling. Orient. p. 147. Cantab. 1706.

(53) The first in the notes to this specimen, p. 363. fixing it anno Hegir, 710. The other in Biographie Tabulæ Abulfedæ, &c. p. 78. placing it anno Heg. 743.

(54) See note [A] in the article Abulfeda, in Critical and Historical Dictionary; in the index to which, at the word Pococke, are these words: Il est étonnant, qu'il ne soit une guide sur un fait d'érudition orientale.

(55) In Præf. ad Abulfedæ Vitam Moham. p. 49 & seq.

(56) In General Dictionary, note [B], to the article Abulfeda; where he says, no European has hitherto excelled, if equalled, Dr Pococke, in the knowledge of the Arabic tongue and writers.

(47) The work is divided into ten dynasties.

(48) Viz. no less than 73; their disputes being about the divine attributes, God's decrees, and some other points, managed with the same heat and subtlety as among Christians.

(49) He quotes Sir Henry Savile, and seems to agree with him in this opinion.

another vote passed, both to deprive him of his lectures [CC] and turn him out of the university, he was saved from the effect thereof by the intercession of a great part of that body, almost all of whom had been placed there by the Parliament [DD]. In some of the following years he began to prepare several of his pieces for the press (kk), and, in 1652, he was one of those who were concerned in preparing the intended edition of the Polyglott Bible [EE]. In 1654, the famous Golius, Arabic Professor at Leyden, publishing from him. 'This following Arabic, says he, I think may be rendered into Latin.' Then, after giving the Arabic, comes his Latin rendering, viz. finitum est opus feria 5ta 22ndo die Almoabar rafa; and after another Arabic sentence and its version nothing to the present purpose, there appears the other part of Al Sacerdan's sentence, which he proposes to translate thus: Sedit super thronum regni post amotionem fratris ipsius (57).<sup>1</sup> How easy had it been to add one more query, viz. whether the Abulfeda of Al Sacerdan was the same with the Prince of Hamah, whose tables he was then publishing; but of this he seems not to have entertained the least suspicion, though his only authority for the affirmative was barely an agreement in names. However, Mr Twells very candidly offers an excuse for this negligence, viz. the hurry and distraction of his affairs for those many years, in which he was preparing the edition of Abulfeda. For the truth of which fact he refers to a letter of his to Dr Pococke, wrote a year after that piece came abroad, wherein he uses the following expression: 'I am so very busy, and for these five years I have been encumbered with law suits and diverted from my studies, that though I have this year found some ease (I know not how) I am unwilling to take those pains I have formerly undergone.' Having therefore, when he wrote this preface to Abulfeda, neither time nor inclination for exact researches, he too easily trusted to appearances, and as it commonly happens in such cases, was grievously deceived thereby (58).

(kk) Twells, p. 33.

(57) After which Mr Greaves, in his printed translation, inserts in hooks thus [in Hamah].

(58) Life of Pococke, p. 62.

[CC] A vote passed the Committee to deprive him of his lectures. As this might be easily foreseen, so he had fixed his resolutions upon it before it happened: what those were will be seen in the following extract of a letter written by him to George Hornius, a learned Professor of History in the university of Gueldres, dated November 30th, 1649. 'My affairs, says he, are reduced to such a crisis, that unless I meddle in things wherein I am resolved never to intermeddle [meaning the Engagement] I shall be turned out of all my Professorships in the university, or rather, am already in effect turn'd out. I have learnt, and made it the unalterable principle of my soul, to keep peace, as far as in me lies, with all men; to pay due reverence and obedience to the higher powers; and to avoid all things that are foreign to my profession or studies; but to do any thing that would ever so little molest the quiet of my conscience, would be more grievous than the loss, not only of my fortune, but my life. But, please, Sir, to be assured, that I never followed these studies, with mercenary views. Therefore, when it shall please God (as I trust in his endless bounty that it will) to vouchsafe me a safe and obscure retirement, I will, with greater alacrity than ever, apply myself to these studies, and promote them with my best endeavours.'

[DD] He was saved by the intercession, &c.] When the news of this vote came to Oxford, many there were so sensible of the damage it would bring to the university, that without his request or knowledge, they drew up a petition to the Committee in the following form:

'To the Right Honourable the Committee of Parliament for regulating the university.

'The humble petition of several, the Governours of houses, publick Officers, Masters of Arts, and other Graduates and Students, sheweth: That your petitioners knowing Mr Edward Pococke, late Prebendary of Christ-church, to be a man of a very ingenuous and peaceable conversation, excellently learned in the oriental languages; and considering that there is no power or trust going along with the Hebrew and Arabic lectures in this university, that the stipend of both is but a very small maintenance, and should they be put into several hands, no way competent for a learned man; that he is able (above any we have heard of) to discharge them both, as having travelled abroad and been trained up for many years in the midst of those tongues and nations; that he hath been very useful here, and a great ornament to this university, wherein we understand he desires still, in all peaceable manner, to continue to serve this state and his own country in this employment

'We therefore humbly pray, that out of that zeal you bear to the advancement of learning, this part especially so useful in itself, and so generally at this day promoted in these western nations, and as an act of your favour and clemency, you will be pleased to suspend the execution of the said vote, as to the Arabic lecture at least, 'till such time as you shall be provided of some other person, who in regard of his abilities shall be thought fit to succeed in that place with satisfaction to the university.' John Wilkins, Warden of Wadham, Joshua Cross, George Marshall, N. C. C. Tho. Owen, Sen. Proc. Henry Cornish, Ralph Button, John Wallis, Tho. Smith, Joshua North, Fra. Howel, Dan Greenwood, Vice Can. Oxon. Paul Hood, Rector C. L. Edmund Staunton, C. C. C. Presid. Gerard Langbaine, Presid. of Qu. Coll. Rob. Harris, Presid. Trin. Phil. Stephens, Proc. Jun. John Miiwashe, Rob Hancock, Christopher Rogers, Princ. of New-Inn-Hall. Then follows the names of 38 Masters of Arts and Bachelors of Law. All these, except two heads of colleges (59), and the two Proctors, had been put into the places of ejected loyalists, and as they pray the execution of the vote may be suspended 'till a proper person be found for the Arabic lecture, accordingly some pains were taken to procure such a one. To this purpose, Manasseh Ben Israel was desired to send over a learned Jew of his acquaintance in Holland, but that Jew being lately turned Christian, was more inclined to accept of an offer he had from some Protestants in France, and Manasseh being offended at his perversion, as he called it, would not concern himself any further with him. Christianus Ravivus (60), also, who came into England about two years before, in hopes of being preferred by the Parliament, was long encouraged by the Committee to expect their favour in succeeding his friend Mr Pococke; but neither was this intention carried into effect. So that no body being found of any tolerable abilities for the place, the petition here inserted being probably seconded strongly by Mr Selden, our author was suffered to enjoy both the lectures without any further disturbance; and he took a chamber in Balliol college for his residence, when obliged to be in Oxford.

(59) Ger. Langbaine and Paul Hood.

(60) See more of this Ravivus in the article Usher, who laboured at this time with Mr Selden to dissuade him from it, and possibly might prevail. Twells, p. 33.

[EE] He was concerned in the edition of the Polyglott Bible.] Our author had been informed early this year of that undertaking, as appears from a letter of Mr Selden to him, dated in February 1651-2; wherein he writes thus: 'It seems not yet, that there is any such naming of men for that employment, divers are in discourse talked of, and there be, I doubt, but a few fit: how to have it proceed without you, I know not, but I know too, that it must be a great diversion to your excellent studies, and a turning them to an illiterate attendance. Whatsoever you wish in it, I shall, as far as I have opportunity, second.' On the 28th of July following, Dr Walton wrote to him, desiring to know, whether his occasions would permit him to assist, if the impression went on, either by correcting the Arabic, the proofs being weekly transmitted, or by comparing of copies or otherwise. Mr Pococke declined (61) engaging any farther than collating the Arabic Pentateuch, with two copies of Sardi's translation, the one a manuscript, the other printed in the Constantinopolitan Bibles, noting the difference of each. But he drew up a preface concerning the Arabic versions of that part of the Bible, and the reasons of the various readings in them, which preface, together with the various readings, are published in the appendix to the Polyglott Bible, Tom. 6. Our author, likewise, at the repeated request of Dr Walton, sent several directions relating to this design, respecting the apparatus or prolegomenon and appendix publishing his long expected Arabic Lexicon, sent our author a copy of it with this inscription, Virtute atque doctrina eximio ac præclaro viro D<sup>no</sup>. Edv. Pococke, literaturæ orientalis peritiam nulli secundo. But notwithstanding this, and numberless other the like attestations about the same time, the Berkshire Committee of the Commissioners for ejecting scandalous, &c. ministers, entered a prosecution against him for ignorance and insufficiency, with a design to eject him from his living of Childrey; but he was sheltered from the fury of that storm by the learned Independent Dr John Owen [FF], who was himself a Commissioner under the one of which related to the antiquity and authority of the Arabic version as it stands in Michael de Jay's Heptaglott, or Paris edition of the Bible in seven languages. Dr Walton conceived, as he wrote to Mr Pococke, that the editor of this work had followed that Arabic version, which the French Ambassador brought out of the East, and which Sionita and Efonita were then translating into Latin, being in the judgment of Erpenius elegant & antiqua. But Mr Pococke convinced him, that the Arabic in Jay's edition was no other than the version of Sadius, which is printed in the Constantinopolitan Bible. Our author also communicated to Dr Walton the three following manuscripts. 1. His Persian Gospels sent him from Aleppo as above-mentioned (62). These had never been printed before they were published in the Polyglott Bible wholly from his copy, which was 300 years old, and being a translation from the Syriac, was preferred to that of Mr Abraham Wheelock (63), which was of a late date, and only a version from the Greek. 2. His Syriac manuscript of the whole Old Testament, of which, though Mr Thorndike declares Primate Usher's copy to be more correct, yet it was sometimes to be helped thereby; and in respect to that part which corresponds to the second tome of the Polyglott, Dr Walton declares they found his copy more correctly written than the Lord Primate's, and therefore more useful. 3. An Ethiopic manuscript of the Pfalter, which Dr Walton pronounces to be so exactly written, that they made it a rule, whereby to correct the faults of the two printed copies (64). The proposals for publishing the Polyglott came out March 1, 1652-3; Wherein Mr Pococke is mentioned among others in preparing of copies, correcting the press, overseeing the management of the work, &c. He had not long before wrote to Dr Walton and Mr Thorndike, upon two points of importance relating to the edition. The first was a proposal to have his own copy of the Syriac Gospels of another translation, printed together with that of the Paris edition; and the expence of this being then objected by Mr Thorndike, two years afterwards an offer was made by Dr Walton, that if Mr Pococke's Gospels should, in his own judgment, be fit to be translated and joined with the other translation, he would publish it with the rest of the New Testament; but after the above intimation our author pressed it no further. Thus it happened, that no manner of use was made in the Polyglott of these Syriac Gospels; they not having been so much as collated for various readings. The other motion of Mr Pococke concerned the Latin of the Arabic version, which, on account of it's uncorrectness, he moved to have revised and amended. To this Mr Thorndike replied, 'I conceive the like might be said of the Syriac, but I do not hear you advise that any thing be done to rectify it; that is a work that would indeed be profitable, but troublesome; and I know not how plausible in another man's work, and truly I am of advice, that the business of this work is rather to settle the originals, resting contented with giving the translation anciently printed. It were too much to undertake that for all, which were fit to be done in time.' It is true, the motion came too late, and thus it happened that this is still a considerable defect in the Polyglott, which has led some into mistakes (75). We must not conclude this note, without taking notice that Mr Pococke has been censured for some things in his preface to the Arabic various readings before-mentioned. This was done by the Abbé Renaudot (66), who having charged Abulfeda with ignorance, in not knowing that the Old Testament had been translated into Arabic in his time. This, adds he, deceived the learned Pococke, when he grounded his conjectures as to the antiquity of the Arabic version upon Abulfeda's testimony. But Mr Gagnier has shewn (67), that a double mistake is here committed by that learned Abbé For, says he, first, Abulfeda, in the place referred to by Renaudot, says nothing of the antiquity of the Arabic version, but only that the version into that language had not then been written in Arabic characters, as is shewn by Mr Pococke (68). Secondly, even in this point, Mr Pococke does not follow Abulfeda, declaring in that very preface, 'that he could not rashly affirm what the other did, that the said version was at that time first put into a Saracenic dress; since Aben Ezra asserts of Rabbi Sadius himself, that he turned the law into the Hmaelitic tongue and character.' But this was done by Sadius, above 300 years before the time of Abulfeda (69).

(61) Upon which the correcting that press was undertaken by Mr Abraham Wheelock, Professor of Arabic at Cambridge, and after his death by Mr Hyde, who had been recommended by Mr Pococke, ibid. p. 50. whom he also afterwards succeeded in the Arabic Professorship at Oxford.

[FF] He was saved from the fury of that storm by Dr John Owen ] The Berkshire Committee received a charge from some of his parishioners against him, consisting of nine articles, and summoned him to appear at Abingdon. This he complied with, and gave in his defence; upon which several depositions were made against him, together with an answer to his defence (which was there called a réproachful declaration, put into the court of godly commissioners) and a proposal of our desires to be granted by the Commissioners. To the propositions he made such a reply, that the charge of scandalous Minister was dropt. But some one of the witnesses against him having declared, that 'he believed Mr Pococke to be destitute of the spirit, tho' he preached saving truths according to the letter;' and another having also deposed, that 'he sometimes preached pretty well, but at other times not so well; and that his deadness and dullness drove people from hearing him.' These judges had thought of proceeding to deprive him for ignorance and insufficiency. But this new danger filled several learned men of much fame and eminence at that time in Oxford, with a great deal of indignation; and they resolved to go to the place, where the Commissioners were to meet, and expostulate with them about it. In the number of those that went, were Dr Seth Ward, Dr Wilkins, Dr Wallis, and Dr Owen; who all laboured with much earnestness to convince those judges of the strange absurdity of what they were undertaking. But particularly Dr Owen, who proceeded with some warmth to make them sensible of the infinite contempt and reproach which would certainly fall upon them, when it should be said, that they had turned out a man for insufficiency, whom all the learned, not of England only, but of all Europe, so justly admired for his vast knowledge and extraordinary accomplishments. And being himself one of the Commissioners appointed by that act, he added, that he was now come to deliver himself, as well as he could, from a share in such disgrace, by protesting against a proceeding so strangely foolish and unjust. The Commissioners being very much mortified at the remonstrances of so many eminent men, especially of Dr Owen, in whom they had a particular confidence, thought it best for them wholly to put an end to the matter, and so discharged Mr Pococke from any further attendance. However, this persecution, which lasted for many months, had been the most grievous to him of all that he had undergone; rendering him, as he declared some time after, utterly incapable of study, it being impossible for him, when he attempted it, duly to remember what he had to do, or to apply himself to it with any attention (70). And as he took the first opportunity of expressing his gratitude to his worthy deliverers, so he did not spare to express his indignation against his persecutors, whom he calls, genus hominum plane ἀτοπον & ἀλογον, atque bujus seculi lues — a quibus quid passus fuerim, (quanto majora, nisi apparuisset Deus μετακύριος, passurus, nec tamen alia de causa quam quod est doctus amem, & a doctis licet indignus amem) qui noverit haud mirabitur, si in præsentiarum nec pluram nec meliora præstiterim. Sed liberavit me Deus virorum insignium, quibus meliora cordi sunt, ope ultro oblata, quibus gratias quantas possum maximas refero, aliaque quibus impar sum plures adhuc debere mihi palam testatum volo. Deus, qui hanc mentem

(68) They were written in Hebrew characters, as is still the custom of the Jews, left they should be read by those of a different religion. Pococke's preface, &c.

(69) R. Sadius diéd A. C. 947. Abulfed. ibid.

(62) In remark [P].

(63) This Professor had made a good progress in preparing about this time an edition of the Persian Gospels; when, upon the lent of Mr Pococke's MSS. he declared in a letter to him, that had it not been for fear of oppressing his amanensis, he would have begun his work again.

(64) Our author contributed also three Ethiopic MSS, and ten Ethiopic MS. liturgies for Dr Castell's Lexicon. Twells, p. 76.

(65) Particularly Matthew Poole, concerning which see his article.

(66) In Histor. Patriarch. Alexand. p. 77.

(67) In Præf. ad Vitam Micham.

(70) Præf. in Annales Euty-chian. p. 6.

the same act. In 1655 he published his Porta Mosis [GG], and had some thoughts the following year of putting to the press Rabbi Tanchum's Commentaries upon the Old Testament [HH]; but that design proved abortive. In 1658, he published the Annals of Eutychius, in pursuance of a promise he had made some years before to Mr Selden (11). In the latter end of the year 1659, when the secluded members of the House of Commons were restored to their seats in Parliament, Dr Wallis (m m), who had been constantly his friend, applied unknown to him to procure his restitution [II] to the Canonry of Christ-church.

(m m) He was afterwards much obliged to Dr Pococke's MSS in his history of Algebra, and particularly inserted an account of the original of the game of chess, from a note of Dr Pococke upon the Carmen Trojæ, in his Opus Arithmeticum, chap. 31.

(11) See his article.

(71) Præf. in Portam Mosis, edit. 1655.

mentem illis indidit, bene ipsi omnia rependat, & boni omnes bene cupiant (71).

[GG] Porta Mosis. This work contains six præfatory discourses of Moses Maimonides (the best Jewish writer); giving, in a very clear method, an account of the history and nature of the Talmud, and the Jewish faith and discipline. The original was written in Arabic, but (as usual, among the Jews, for the reason abovementioned) (72) expressed in Hebrew characters. Our author added a Latin translation, and a very large appendix of miscellaneous notes. It was printed at Oxford, and was the first fruits of the Hebrew press there. The letters being founded, at the charge of the university, upon a motion of Dr Gerard Langbaine, that something of Mr Pococke's should be speedily printed with them. The book had then never been printed in the original Arabic, but only in a Hebrew translation made from imperfect copies. Whereas the MSS. he now made use of, were very good, and some of them as he thought the very originals, written by the author's own hand: in the notes, his chief design is to shew, by many instances, how much the knowledge of Arabic and Rabbinical learning will contribute towards finding out the genuine sense of many difficult texts in the Bible. In the four first chapters he largely considers and explains several texts in the New Testament, which being cited from the Old, for the most part according to the version of the Septuagint, seem to be very different from the original Hebrew; and as he gives very learned accounts of their true meaning, so he proves there is no sufficient reason from these seeming differences, that the ancient Hebrew copies made use of by the seventy interpreters had, as some learned men have thought, other readings in those places than what are still extant. And as the seeming difference, is scarce wider any where, than in these passages cited from the Septuagint in the New Testament; our author, in them, gave an excellent specimen of his abilities, in performing the like reconciliation to other parts of scripture, which he afterwards put into execution in his commentaries; especially the two latter on Hosea and Joel. By this means asserting the just authenticity of the Hebrew original, without impeaching the soundness of the Septuagint version. The principles on which he proceeded in this attempt, are; (1). That the present version of the Septuagint, is in many places corrupted. (2). That the authors of that translation, did not always design it to be literal. (3). That they often followed such acceptations of Hebrews words, as are now no longer known, and are irretrievable without the help of the Arabic and Syriac tongues, between which and the Hebrew there is a manifest affinity. As the truth of these rules are not contested, so he has applied them (as the learned writer of his life justly observes) with much learning and judgment. In the 5th chapter of these notes he shews, that the Sepulchres appearing beautiful, Matt. xxiii. 27, are the same with the Graves that appear not, Luke xi. 44. The sixth chapter contains an account of the several opinions of the Jews, concerning the resurrection, as the seventh does that of the Mahometans. In the 8th, by the help of two MS. copies of Kimchi's commentaries on the latter prophets, he restores several passages relating to the Christians, which in the printed copies of that work are now left out; and then proceeds to vindicate that prophecy concerning the Messiah at Jeremy, xxxi. 22, which was so readily given up by Mr Calvin. The 9th chapter is an exposition of Matt. vii. 11, wherein occasionally he throws much light into several obscure passages of the Bible. The index to the Porta Mosis was compiled by one Mr Henry Chapman, and probably that also for the notes (73).

[HH] Rabbi Tanchum's, Commentaries upon the Old Testament. It happened unluckily for this design of Mr Pococke, that the two great works, viz. the Polyglott Bible, and Bee's edition of the Critici Sacri, were printing about this time, so that there was less room to expect the assistance, which so large a work as this of R. Tanchum's would necessarily require. We are told, that the learned Mr John Boncle, then Fellow of Eton College (74), tho' deeply engaged in a great variety of business, generously offered to correct two books after the press, desiring that Leviticus might be one. He farther proposed to get some bookseller in London, to undertake the printing of the commentaries, but at the same time, he apprehended that the two works just mentioned, (neither of them then finished) would prove an obstruction to his wishes. The miscarriage of this design, to whatever cause it was owing, was no small damage to sacred literature, as may be inferred from the noble use which Mr Pococke made of the commentaries, not only in his miscellaneous notes to Porta Mosis, but especially in his own commentaries; for which use they seem to have been equal, if not superior to any other Rabbinical writings. Besides, for ought that appears, our author was the only person in Europe that was possessed of any MS. of Rabbi Tanchum. The learned among the Jews, were surprized to hear of this, and many other curious things of the like kind, in his hands, as Manasseh Ben Israel professed to Mr Boncle. But these lie still in MSS. only, in the archives of the Bodleian library. Mr Pococke, 'till the day of his death, had it much at heart to compass this design, and was very earnest and frequent, in his entreaties with Dr Huntington, at Aleppo, to procure him all this rabbi's commentaries; and by letter written in 1672, it appears, that our author was then possessed of those upon Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and the two books of Kings, as also of Jeremy, Ezekiel, and the twelve minor prophets. But he pressed his friend most of all for the piece called, by Tanchum, Generalia: or Metaphors, Parabolical Expressions, and words either unusual or of diverse significations, in chronology, diverse readings, and the like (75).

[II] Dr Wallis applied for his restitution. As this letter contains many facts not elsewhere found, we shall insert it at length. It was sent March 6, 1659-60, to one Major Finister, probably a member of that parliament, and runs thus: 'The disposal of the deanery and canonships of Christ-church, were heretofore reputed to belong to the King, who did accordingly from time to time dispose of them. In the time of King James, he did annex one of the canonships to the divinity professor and his successors for ever; and King Charles another of them to the Hebrew professor; and a third to the university orator; which were accordingly enjoyed. Upon the death of Dr Morris, then Hebrew professor, the committee of both houses (who did then manage the affairs of the university) (76), did put Mr Pococke into his place and canonship, who did accordingly enjoy it, for some time, 'till for refusing to subscribe to the Engagement, he was at the same time with Dr Reynolds and Dr Mills put out of his canonship, but remained (as still he does) Hebrew professor. Upon the death of Dr French, who was put into his place, the Engagement being before that time taken off, it was thought that Mr Pococke's right did again revive, and that he ought to be restored to that canonship as Hebrew professor for the time being, there being now no bar in the way. While there were motions in the university to petition for it, Dr Owen then vice chancellor, and in favour with the protector, undertook to manage that business himself, and went up to London about it. But thereupon, instead of Mr Pococke, Mr Pointer was put into the place by the protector, who was supposed to have no power to dispose of it to any other person than the Hebrew professor for the time being. And besides, by an act of parliament before the last interruption, all grants of the protector were made void, and therefore this among the rest; and before that act they were yet presumed to weak, that

(74) He was then also master of that school. See some account of him in Wood's Fasti, Vol. II. col. 100, 101.

(75) T walls, p. 68, 69.

(76) The doctor seems to have thought the matter of the lodgings too insignificant to be mentioned.

(73) T wells, p. 45.

Church. But the effect of that kindness was happily prevented by the King's return in 1660, when Mr Pococke, among other Loyalists, felt the benefit of that national deliverance [KK]. Being now reinstated at Oxford, he took his Doctor of Divinity's degree September 20th that year (nn), and continued afterwards, without interruption, to discharge the duties of both his lectures, and to give the world, to the end of his life, new proofs in the books which he published of his unrivalled skill in that learning. He was applied to as a master by all the most learned men in Europe in that way [LL]; and the ministry at home were obliged to beg his assistance (oo). But unluckily for him, that kind of learning, which had been in the highest esteem for several years immediately before the Restoration, fell into a general neglect for many years immediately after; so that he got nothing thereby but fame [MM]: and this being the unavoidable consequence of his merit, kept still increasing by several pieces, which he published with a view of restoring that learning to it's former credit [NN]. Some time afterwards, Dr John Fell, Dean that Dr Wilkins got new grants (to the places which the professor had bestowed on him) from the parliament, and the like was endeavoured for Mr Poynter, but could not be obtained. So that upon the whole matter there seems very little to be said, why Mr Pococke should not be restored. That which is to be done in order to it, is, that a motion be made to the house for this business to be referred to the same committee with that of Dr Reynolds, and that, if need be, summonses be sent to Mr Poynter to appear, if he have any thing to say, why Mr Pococke should not be restored. Whether the house would have hearkened to this remonstrance, there was no time to judge. For on Tuesday following, they dissolved themselves (77).

(oo) Sir Joseph Williamson, in April 1668, sent him an Arabic letter from the Emperor of Morocco to King Charles II. desiring him to translate it; there being nobody in town masters enough of that language to give the contents of it. Twells, p. 65.

[KK] The benefit of that national deliverance. Dr Sheldon, remembering that our author had no patent for his Hebrew professorship, given him by the King's father, being now Dean of the Chapel to his Majesty, took care to have that defect supplied with the soonest, for which purpose Letters Patents, passed the great seal, June 20th, constituting him Hebrew Professor, and Canon of Christ-Church; by virtue of which, he was solemnly installed on the 27th of the ensuing month. But still the lodgings belonging to Dr Morris, were in the possession of Dr Mills, Doctor of Law, and then Member of the House of Commons; who tho' a layman, had been put into the Canonry of Dr Morris, by the Committee of the two Houses, and being removed thence for refusing the Engagement; at the Restoration, he got possession of Dr Morris's apartments, and detained them from Dr Pococke, in right of his pretension to his Canonry, out of which he had been ejected. In order therefore to the recovery of these lodgings, the university joined with our author in a petition to the Delegates appointed by the King to visit that university for a hearing; the result of which was, that these Delegates first removed Dr Mills from the Canonry, for which he was unqualified, and put Dr Pococke into the lodgings proper to the estate that was annexed to the Hebrew Professorship, by virtue of the Letters Patents he had so lately obtained (78).

[LL] He was applied to, &c. He had been so from his last arrival out of the East. Of which we have already given an instance in Hornius, and among Dr Pococke's papers there were found, to this purpose, letters likewise from Jacobus Alting (79), Professor at Groningen, John Henry Hottinger, Professor at Groningen, Zurich, and Heidelberg, successively; and from Golius at Leyden, which last begs his judgment about the religious principles of Averroës, and about the Chater, who they were, and what their religion, learning, and customs. Mr Boyle, May 28, 1663, sent him a paper of Mr Oldenburg, secretary to the Royal Society, desiring in the behalf of a certain French gentleman, his thoughts upon an inscription found at Persepolis. In 1670, Hieronymus Harder (80), who probably succeeded Golius at Leyden, consulted our author upon several difficulties, relating to the history of Saladin, which he was then preparing for the press, with a Latin translation. Besides these and other applications from abroad, there appeared several at home, as (not to repeat those of his friend Greaves) particularly one from Thorndike, in Uher's name; thanking him for the resolution of some questions, and proposing fresh ones. From John Tombes, upon questions relating to his controversy with Dr Hammond, about infant-baptism From Dr Cudworth, upon some passages of Emir Chond; and several from Will. Seaman, while he was preparing to publish his Turkish New Testament,

(a copy of which he afterwards presented to Dr Pococke) as also his Turkish Grammar and History (81). Our author was constantly consulted by Dr Hammond, while he was writing his Annotations on the New Testament. And in June 1662, Isaac Avendane, who had taught Hebrew at Cambridge, brought him letters from Dr Casel, who therein calls him an oracle, unto whom all who travel with any public designs are wont to make resort. Dr Pococke's universal reputation likewise brought many youths of rank and quality, as well as others, from several parts of Europe to Oxford, for his assistance in the study of the Eastern languages. As two Hungarian youths upon the recommendation of Jacobus Alting, already mentioned. Two others from Germany, with a letter from Mr Theodore Haak (82), acquainting our author, that one of these students there named, was likely to succeed to the Professorship at Zurich. A Transilvanian youth of an illustrious family, after his return from the East, recommended by Golius. Charles Elestor Palatine, likewise sent young Miede, son to his Vice-Chancellor, to be taught the Eastern languages by our author. Of this gentleman Hottinger writes, that he had been in the universities of Germany, and was now gone for England, abstrusioris literaturæ sedem, as he calls it. And how he behaved upon these occasions, Mr Locke (83), an eye-witness for several years of it, informs us, who observing, that tho' he was a man of the greatest temperance in himself, and the farthest from ostentation and vanity in his way of living, yet he was of a liberal mind, and given to hospitality; which considering the smallness of his preferments, and the numerous family of children he had to provide for, might be thought to have outdone those who made more noise and shew. His name, which was in great esteem beyond sea, and that deservedly, drew on him visits from all foreigners of learning, who came to Oxford to see that university. They never failed to be highly satisfied with his great knowledge and civility, which was not always without expence.

[MM] He got nothing thereby but fame Dr Pococke's behaviour in regard to this neglect of his merit, is justly mentioned by the last mentioned writer as another part of his unexampled character. 'Tho', says he, at the restoration of King Charles, his merits were so overlooked, or forgotten; that he was barely restored to what was his before, without receiving any new preferment then, or any time after; yet I never heard him take any the least notice of it, or make any the least complaint, in a case that would have sorely grated on some men's patience, and have filled their mouths with murmuring, and their lives with discontent. But he was always unaffectedly cheerful, no marks of any thing that lay heavy at his heart, from being neglected, ever broke from him. He was so far from having any displeasure lye concealed in him there, that whenever any expressions of dissatisfaction, for what they thought hard usage, broke from others in his presence; he always diverted the discourse: and if it were any body with whom he might take that liberty, he silenced it with visible marks of dislike.

[NN] Pieces which he published, with a view of restoring that learning to it's former credit. The first of these was an Arabic Poem, intitled, Lamieto'l Ajam, or Carmen Abu Ismaelis Togræi, with a Latin translation and large notes, which are the substance of several lectures thereon. One view in printing it, being to give a specimen of the Arabic poetry; the Doctor observes in the preface, that the author, a man of

(81) In the preface to this, he makes particular mention of our author's assistance therein. See more of this Seaman in the article of John Greaves.

(82) The first proposer of those meetings which preceded the Royal Society. See Dr Wallis's letter to Dr Smith, in Hearn's Appendix, No. 1. to Peter Langtoft, Oxf. 1725, 8vo.

(83) In his letter to Mr Smith of Dartmouth, ubi supra.

(77) Wood's Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. in this year.

(77) Wood's Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. in this year.

(78) Id. ibid.

(79) He dedicated his book De Siculo Vascinio to our author and Dr Reynolds.

(80) This gentleman was also well known to Mr Greaves, as is seen in his article.

Dean of Christ-Church, having concerted a scheme for a Commentary upon the Old Testament, to be written by some learned hands in that university, engaged our author to take a share in that design. This gave occasion to his Commentaries (pp) upon Micah and Malachi, (pp) Ever since the appearance of his Specimen Hist. Atab. and Porta Moſis, the learned world had eagerly wiſhed him to employ his pen this way. Leigh on Relig. and Learn. lib. 5.

(84) Viz. in his speech inserted next after this preface, virtue, was accounted the Phoenix of his age, for eloquence and poetry; which last, says he elsewhere (84), was in such esteem among the ancient Arabs, that when any one, in any tribe, first began to be eminent therein, it was a matter of publick congratulation; and all the kindred and friends met together, to rejoice in the most solemn manner, as for the greatest happiness in the world. There is also prefixed his Latin speech, spoken at the opening his lectures upon this poem. This speech contains a very succinct and no less accurate historical and critical account of the Arabic tongue, which he recommends for it's peculiar excellence above other languages, in these four qualities. First, says he, it's perspicuity is very striking, by means of a most surprizing prompt way of expressing therein many things clearly in a few words. Secondly, it's elegance charms by sweetly adapting the found of the words to the sense, and by it's softness, in avoiding absolutely all collision of consonants. Thirdly, it's copiousness is even astonishing, there being reckoned 12350082 words, whence it abounds amazingly in synonymous terms (85). Lastly, in the most important point, that of usefulness; tho' before, and something above 100 years after the time of Mahomet, the Arabian knowledge for want of letters was very deficient; yet from the epocha of the Abbiside, when the Grecian writers were translated, and their learning cultivated, the books of the Arabic authors became for many and excellent in all sciences, that in human learning they want not other languages more than others want Arabic; and as to Divinity, neither can the religion of Mahomet be well understood, nor any accurate skill in the Hebrew tongue, (the original language of the Old Testament) be acquired without it (86). By this too, Divines will be able to peruse the greatest part of those things which are worth reading amongst the Jews (87), and also to consult the several versions of the Scriptures made into this language, both by Jews and Christians; together with many Christian books of good account that are written in it. Lastly, he concludes with another use, upon which his own were particularly engaged at this time (88), that by means of this language, the piety of those who are zealous for the promotion of divine knowledge, may make some provision against the ignorance of the Eastern Christians, who are so miserably oppressed under the Turkish bondage *.

(85) For instance, there are 200 names for a serpent, 500 for a lion, and for calamity so many, that one of their authors, busied in making a catalogue thereof, observes it is no small calamity to recite them.

(86) Aben Ezra, Maimonides, Kimchi, and others, the best Rabbinical authors, refer upon every difficulty to the Arabic language.

(87) As Maimonides, Cozari, Chobath, Lebahoth, Demunoth, Sardias, and several more, which are for the most part in Arabic.

(88) Consult remark [5].

* Wood's Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 870. from Reg. Univ. Oxon. anno 1660, p. 16.

In 1603, our author published at Oxford, Gregorii Abul Farajii Historia Dynastiarum, 4to. This both the nature of the work, and the great reputation of it's author in the East, as well as his own particular duty, in the character of the King's Hebrew Professor, seemed to require; but he had still another motive thereto, he was glad of an opportunity of placing a specimen of this learning under his Majesty's eye, being desirous by all means, if possible, to bring it into publick esteem. The delegates of the university, had desired him to print this book, and voted 140*l.* to be given towards the expence of printing it, which was confirmed by the convocation, May 16, 1660, soon after his specimen had been received with so great satisfaction. But notwithstanding that, he was so sensible of the alteration in the publick taste at this time, that had it not been Dr Langbaine's dying request to go through with it, the publication would probably have been dropt (89). In a letter to Dr Thomas Greaves, sent by our author, with a copy of the history, which at that learned friend's request, he forced, as he tells him, from the printer, before the index was wrought off, he adds the following remarkable words. 'If you find any thing in it worth the publishing, you must be fain to speak for it; for I perceive it will be much slighted, the genius of the times as for these studies is much altered, since you and I first set about them, and few will be persuaded they are worthy taking notice of. My Lord of London asked me, if there were any remarkable passages in the book? I answered him only in general, that I thought there were many. If you should fall into any discourse with him about it, I pray note some particulars; as I think you may, that of the first rise of Mahomet's religion p. 100, &c. and that of the rise and spreading of the Tartars empire, and their incurſions; which is in the Latin p. 280, or any other passages that you shall think worthy. And if you speak with any of your acquaintance concerning the book, your good word may help bear up it's credit.' In answer to this, Dr Greaves writes from Fulham thus. 'How these studies are esteemed in the universities, I know not; in these parts, for ought I observe, they are not much followed or regarded, and receive small encouragement from those, who I thought would have been factors and promoters of them.' At Cambridge also, where Dr Castell was settled in the Arabic Professorship in 1666; tho' he was heard very well at first, yet his lectures in a little time, grew to be so much neglected, that once when he was to read the next day, being then easy and in a pleasant mood, he affix'd a paper upon the door of the publick school, with these words upon it. Prælector linguæ Arabicæ cras ibit in desertum. It appears that Arabic learning, begun to decline too in Holland. In 1669, Dr Bernard complains from Leyden to our author, that Harder there could not find a bookseller to undertake his history of Saladin, [above mentioned] (90), because oriental learning decays here, and books of that nature, will turn to no advantage; neither adds he, can Mr Thevenot find a bookseller, either here or at Amsterdam, to undertake his Abulfeda (91). But to return to the history of Abul Farajius. It is a compendium of the general history of the world, from the creation to his own time, viz. about the end of the thirteenth century, and is divided into ten Dynasties. First, that of the Patriarchs from Adam. The second, of the Judges in Israel. The third of the Kings. The fourth of the Chaldeans. The fifth of the Magi or Persians. The sixth of the Greeks, idolaters. The seventh, that of the Franks or Romans. The eighth, of the Greeks, Christians. The ninth, of the Saracens, and the tenth, of the Mogul Tartars. Our editor added a supplement to the work. The author was a learned Christian of the Jacobite sect, first a Bishop, and lastly primate of that sect in the East; born at Malatia, a city of Armenia, in Syria, in which post he died; but not without the slander of having renounced Christianity before his death (92). Dr Pococke, in his preface, defended him from this charge of apostacy, observing, that if he had apostatized, the Christians would never have talked of him with much esteem, but rather have anathematized him; whereas even after his death, they call him our Holy Father, the Prince of the Christians, The purest substance of the Jacobites. Pater noster Sanctus, Christianorum Princeps Primarius, sanctæ Jacobitæ purissimæ substantiam. However, Abbé Renaudot pretends this is no convincing argument; because such epithets do not relate to a man's morals, but only to his dignity; and therefore the Christians might give him all these titles notwithstanding his apostacy. This is denied by Assemannus (93), and indeed, needs no consultation. Dr Loftus of Ireland, in a letter to our Professor, dated April 10, 1683, observes, that he had lately met with a panegyric oration upon Abul Farajii, written by Dioscorus, Bishop of Gassarto, and a contemporary of his; which clears him from this imputation (94). This Renaudot having a design to publish a collection of all the oriental Liturgies, as also a treatise, De fide, moribus, & institutis Orientalium Christianorum, wrote to Dr Pococke, in 1691, desiring to consult him on that occasion, in which he had the misfortune to be prevented, probably by the Doctor's death that year; but be that as it will, when the collection, &c. was published, the Abbé pretface proper (95) to mark an error in our author's preface to the piece now under consideration; where he says, this Abulfaragius was the same with Abulfaragius Abdalla Ebn Attiba, a learned Monk and Philosopher, who flourished above 200 years before our Abulfaragius; who in this history, plices the death of Ebn Attiba in the year 435 of Hejira. i. e. A. C. 1244 (96).

(89) Compare his own words in the preface, with what Mr Twells says of it in his Life, p. 60.

(90) In remark [LL]; the life of Saladin being an extract from Abulfeda's General History, was afterwards published at Leyden in 1732, fol. by Mr Schulzen.

(91) This was his Geography, two provinces of which had been published by Mr Greaves, and after him, (besides Thevenot) Sam. Clerk, and Will. Guise at Oxford, undertook the same province, but were all prevented by death, or some other accident, from executing their purpose. See Tho. Smith in Vita Greav. V. Renaudot's preface to the Accounts of India and China, p. 12, 13. Mr Gagner of Oxford once published proposals for printing it, but met with no good encouragement.

(92) The Syrians call Chaldea and Assyria the East, and Syria and Mesopotamia the West. Assemanni Biblioth. Orient. Tom. I. p. 252.

(93) Biblioth. Orient. Tom. II. in art. cul. Abulpharagii.

(94) Twells, p. 62.

(95) At the end of his preface, &c. to that collection.

(96) In p. 233. of it, as translated by Dr Pococke himself, which makes this mistake of his in the preface more surprizing, and which Mr Twells thinks is the only one to be found upon his writings.

Malachi, after which he finished those upon Hosea and Joel (97) [OO] in the same method. The last of these was published in 1691; and if he intended (which is not certain) to pursue this plan in other commentaries upon the Minor Prophets, he was prevented therein by his death, which happened on the 10th of September that year (77), and in the 87th year of his age. A gradual decrease of strength and bodily vigour for some time before had indicated his approaching dissolution, but his parts and his memory not much impaired continued to the very last. His only distemper being great old age, which hindered him not, even the night before he died, from praying with his family, as his custom had always been, in the forms of the publick liturgy (55). His body was interred in one of the north isles joining to the choir in the cathedral of Christ-Church, and on the north wall there is a monument with an inscription [PP] to his memory erected by his widow. As to his person, he was of a middle stature, inclined to tallness, and slender; his hair was nearly black, so were his eyes; his complexion fresh, with a lively and cheerful look, and a sound and healthy constitution. In his conversation he was free, open, and affable [QQ], retaining even to the last the briskness and facetiousness of youth. His temper was naturally modest, humble [RR], and sincere, abhorrent of every thing that had the appearance of hypocrisy or falleness, but without the least mixture of sourness or morosity. His charity brought such numbers of necessitous objects to him, that Dean Fell, himself a munificent person, used to tell him complainingly, that he drew all the poor of Oxford into the college; and his readiness to forgive injuries appears very conspicuously in his behaviour to those parishioners who laboured once to eject him, whom he treated with his accustomed humanity, did particular kindnesses to their families, and to keep them as much concealed as possible from the knowledge and resentments of his friends, would never mention any thing of the trouble they had given him; but, on the other hand, industriously secreted the papers of their depositions against him as long as he lived, (97) The two first were published in 1677, and that upon Hosea in 1685.

(77) See the inscription on his monument.

(55) Twells, p. 81.

[OO] Commentaries on Micah, Malachi, Hosea, and Joel. In the end of his preface to the first of these, he informs us, that the original proposal was to give the meaning of the the text in brief marginal notes (97); but that was laid aside, as liable to be deemed too magisterial, a reproach to which, perhaps, his modesty was too sensible. At least these performances of his have been objected to, as leaving us in several material articles altogether undetermined; of which objection he was apprehensive, but declared, he dared not do otherwise. However, this is very far from being generally the case, even in the two first; and upon Hosea (which is as long as all the rest) it has been observed, that for one instance of this kind, where after reciting the various opinions of other expositors, he avoids giving his own, there are twenty on the contrary; in which, he either absolutely declares himself, or at least manifestly inclines to some one. His general view in them is, to give the genuine literal sense of the Hebrew text, the purity of which he defends against Capellus and others, in his preface to Micah, and, together with that, the fidelity of our authorized English translation (98). The particular point which he had chiefly in view, was to rescue the predictions concerning Jesus, from the artful confusion thrown upon them by the Jews, whose writers he knew better than themselves did. In this point therefore, the service he has done to Christianity will always endear his memory. That which contributes to swell his commentary upon Hosea so much, was the then late repeated attempts (besides those made by Capellus) of Isaac Vossius (99), to depreciate the Hebrew text. Whereupon (to avoid entering into an express controversy against his temper, and especially disagreeable in his present declining age) he took this method of answering them, viz. to be large and particular in guarding the Masoretic text from the charge of various readings, which those learned men were ready and glad to suggest upon every seeming difference between it, and the ancient translations (100) and paraphrases. In doing this, he followed that noble conciliating scheme already mentioned, of which he was the first founder, and his great success in it, manifest in the notes on the Porta Mosis and these commentaries especially the two last, would make one hope, that no seeming difference between the Hebrew and the Septuagint would have been too hard for him, had he been at leisure to pursue it through (101) the whole Old Testament. It has been thought by some of Dr Pococke's greatest admirers, that he carried his veneration for the Masoretic text rather too high, in supposing it (as he does in his preface to Micah) to be utterly uncorrupt. But it ought to be observed, that tho' he seems in general not to admit any various readings in the Hebrew, at the time when that version was made; yet sometimes he grants it to be a probable tho' not a necessary supposition. This appears from his commentary on Hosea, ch. x. 12. towards the end of the verse; and on ch. xi. 7. in the latter part of the notes; also ch. xii. 1. at the beginning, and at ver. 8. of the same chapter towards the conclusion. Moreover, as to the justness of our English translation, his good opinion of it in representing the literal sense, does not always hinder him from owning, that better renditions might have been found. These commentaries, with the Porta Mosis, were published in 1740, in 2 Vols. Fol. by Leonard Twells, A. M. who prefixed a life of the author, to which these memoirs are greatly obliged.

[PP] With an inscription. In these terms. Edwardus Pocock S. T. D. cujus si nomen audias, nihil hic de sana desideres. Natus est Oxoniæ Nov. 8. Anno Dom. 1604. Socius in collegium corporis Christi cooptatus 1628, in Lecturæ Arabicæ lectionum publicè habendam primus est institutus 1636, deinde etiam in Hebraicam Professori Regio successit 1648. Desideratissimo marito Sept. 10, 1691. in cælum reverso Maria Burdet, ex qua novenam suscepit sobolem, tumulum hunc mœrens posuit.

[QQ] Free, open, and affable. Mr Locke, in the place abovementioned, having observed, that he would talk very freely and very well of all parts of learning, besides that wherein he was known to excel, continues thus. 'But that was not all, he could discourse very well of other things: he was not unacquainted with the world, tho' he made no show of it; his backwardness to meddle in other peoples matters, and to enter into debates, where names and persons were brought upon the stage, and judgments and censures were hardly avoided, concealed his abilities in matters of business from most people; but yet I can truly say, that I knew not any one in that university, whom I would more willingly consult in any affair that required consideration, nor whose opinion I thought better worth the hearing than his, if he could be drawn to enter it and give his advice.'

[RR] His temper was humble. Mr Locke gives us what he had experienced of this part of our author's character, in the following terms. 'I don't remember, that in all my conversation with him I ever saw him once angry, or to be so far provoked as to change colour, or countenance, or tone of voice; displeasing accidents and actions would sometimes occur, there is no help for that; but nothing of that kind moved him, that I saw, to any passionate words, much less to chiding or clamour. His life appeared to me one constant calm. To conclude, I can say of him what few men can say of any friend of theirs, nor I of any other of my acquaintance; that I don't remember I ever saw in him any one action, that I did, or could, in my own mind blame, or thought amiss in him.'

[SS] Mr

(97) In the manner, perhaps, of those by Dean Fell upon St Paul's Epistles.

(98) To adjust that of our last deservedly approved translation with the original, I look upon as my main business; are his words on Hosea v. 2.

(99) In his treatise De Syllis, edit. 1680.

(100) See a particular instance of this in the article of Dr Middleton.

(101) See what is said upon this subject by Mr Lee, in his prolegomena to that part of Græbe's Septuagint, which contains the historical books, chap. i.

lived, scarce any of his friends or children having seen them before his death. As to his intellectual abilities, besides other learning, he was profoundly skilled in the Hebrew, Arabic, and Syriac, tongues; was well acquainted with the Persian, Samaritan, Æthiopic, Coptic, and Turkish; he also understood Italian, and something of Spanish. In Greek and Latin his friends say he was critically conversant, and his writings and letters bear testimony to his abilities in both. His style in English was clear and expressive, but never cultivated even from his youth; whereas in Latin, he wrote not only with propriety and perspicuity, but also with a good degree of elegance (11). Though he had been father of nine children, we have only an account of his eldest son Edward Pococke [SS], who, under the doctor's direction (22), published, in 1671, 4to. with a Latin translation, an Arabic piece, intitled, Philosophus Autodidactus [TT]: Sive Epistola Abu Jaafir Ebn Topbail

(22) A preface, containing an account of the author, and the nature of the work; as also an Elenchus Scriptorum, or an account of such Arabic writers as are quoted therein, was prefixed by the doctor.

(11) Twells, towards the conclusion of the doctor's Life, ubi supra.

(102) Fashi, Vol. II. col. 1054. See also ibid. col. 158, 169.

(103) In the title to Philosophus Autodidactus, he styles himself A. M. ex æde Christi.

(104) Mr Ockley, in the dedication of his English version of this book, addresses him by that title in 1711.

[SS] Mr Edward Pococke.] Mr Wood tells us (102) he became student of Christ-church in 1661, took the degrees in Arts (103), and was beneficed in his native country of Berks: Prebendary of Winterbourn-Earles in the church of Sarum, 1675; Prebendary of Durnsford in the said church, 1677. He afterwards became Rector of Minal or Midenhal in Wiltshire (104).

[TT] Philosophus Autodidactus, &c.] The design of the author Abu Jaafir Ebn Topbail, who was a Mahometan Philosopher, is to shew by an ingenious fiction how human reason, by observation and experience, without any assistance, may arrive at the knowledge of natural things, and from thence rise to supernatural; particularly, the knowledge of God, and of a future state. In order to this, he supposes a person [Hai Ebn Yokdhan] brought up by himself, where he was altogether destitute of any instruction but what he could get by his own observations. He lays the scene in some fortunate island situate under the equinoctial; where he supposes this philosopher either to have been produced (according to Avicen's hypothesis, who conceived a possibility of a man's being formed by the influence of the planets upon matter rightly disposed) without either father or mother, or else exposed upon the sea in his infancy, and, which he rather inclines to, being thrown upon a desolate island, to be there providentially suckled by a roe; not that our author believed any such matter, (for he proposes both these ways, without saying any thing in favour of either) but only makes use of it to serve his purpose. Accordingly, supposing his hero to be of a discerning and contemplative spirit, he represents him, by several progressive reasonings with himself from what he saw, forming a system of natural philosophy, morality, and metaphysics, agreeable to the philosophy of Aristotle and his Arabian commentators. About the 50th year of his age, one Afal, a person also of a contemplative disposition, who was accidentally brought thither from a neighbouring island, which he had left for the sake of retirement, found Yokdhan, taught him his language, and got from him all the account he was able to give of his original, and the history of his gradual approaches to a knowledge of, and intimate conjunction with, God, which he then enjoyed. Afal was so much pleased with his story, and particularly struck with the notion of his happy state in an union with the supreme Being, that he prevailed with Yokdhan to accompany him to the island whence he came, in order to convert and bring the people there to the same happy state of perfection, which he had acquired solely by continually contemplating and looking steadily upon God alone. Thither they go; and by this means Yokdhan comes to the knowledge of the Alkoran, and all the ceremonies of that religion, which he does not disapprove; but upon the trial to make converts to his own way, finding himself treated with scorn and contempt, he drops the design, as being impracticable, on account of the inveterate blindness and corruption of those people; observing, however, that the institutions of Mahomet were well suited to correct their depravity; and allowing, that by a due observation of these they might be saved, and come to fit at the right hand of God: but withal, that their place would be next after him, and such as he, to whom the first place would be given. In this principle he returns with Afal to his former residence, where they continue to live in the same blessed state of union with God, till their deaths. The conclusion of this story shews, that the hero was not only persuaded of the absolute certainty of his own salvation by virtue of this union, but also that such an union could not be obtained, nor consequently the same degrees of happiness in a future state, by the practice of any external means of religion, though instituted by a person sent from God. This language concerning an extraordinary union and intimate conjunction with God, obtained by a steady looking upon him, without the help of any external means, is evidently the principle of the Quakers; and this principle induced the Quakers to translate the book into English, seeing there was something in it that favoured their enthusiastic notions: and to prevent any such mischief thereby, Simon Ockley, M. A. Vicar of Swafely in Cambridgeshire, gave a new translation in 1711, 8vo; under this title The Improvement of human Reason, exhibited in the Life of Hai Ebn Yokdhan, &c. with an appendix, in which the possibility of man's attaining the true knowledge of God, and things necessary to salvation, without instruction, is briefly considered. In this appendix Mr Ockley endeavours to refute the enthusiastic notions just mentioned. It appears from the introduction, and several passages in the original book, that the author of it, Abu Jaafir Ebn Topbail had imbibed this notion; and it was in order to describe the nature of this mystical union, as well as to recommend the means of attaining it, that he undertook the treatise (105). He also declares this was the true, though mystical, sense of the philosophy of Averroës, Avicen, Amenpace, Algazali, Alpharabius, and the best Mahometan philosophers, who were all of them what he therefore calls Mystics. But, notwithstanding, he supposes his founding Hai Ebn Yokdhan to arrive at the knowledge of these τὰ ἀβυσσώδη, without any assistance; yet he declares, as to himself, that he did not attain thereto, but by a diligent reading and studying the works of the just mentioned philosophers, and that too, expressly with a view of searching it out*. Nay, he even inculcates the necessity of education to polish the understanding. For, says he, if a man attains the state of union without that, he runs out into strange expressions, and speaks he knows not what; so that one of this sort of men, when in that state, cried out, Praise be to me (106), How wonderful am I! another said, I am truth! another, That he was God (107)! But Abu Hamed Algazali, when he had attained to it, expressed himself thus: 'Tawas what it was, 'tis not to be expressed; enquire no further but conceive the best (108). Algazali was a man that had good learning and was well versed in the sciences. It is worth seeing what he thought of these wild enthusiasts, as we have it related by Dr Pococke (109), who quotes the following passage from him. *People ran on, says he, to such a degree, as to pretend to an union with God, and a sight of him, without the interposition of any veil, and familiarly discourse with him; and a little after, which sort of speeches have occasioned great mischiefs among the common people; so that some country fellows laying aside their husbandry, have pretended to the same things: for men are naturally pleased with such discourses, as give them a liberty to neglect their business, and without promise them purity of mind, and the attainment of strange degrees and proprieties. Now the most stupid wretches in nature may pretend to this, and have in their mouths such false and deceitful expressions. And if any one denies what they say, they immediately tell you, that this unbelief of your's proceeds from learning and logick, and that learning is a veil, and logick labour of the brain; but these things which they affirm, are discovered only inwardly by the light of the truth. And this which they affirm has spread itself through a great many countries, and produced a great deal of mischief. Thus far Algazali. How justly his description fits the enthusiasts of later times, let themselves judge, and learn withal from hence, the modesty not to pretend to be the first after the Apostles,* (105) In the original it is filed a letter, as Dr Pococke observes all short tracts are by the Arabians. Pococke's Pref.

* In this particular Jaafir was followed by Mr Norris. See his article.

(106) An expression never used but when they speak of God.

(107) Viz. Al Hofain Ebn Mansur Al Halah, de quo vid. Elenchus Scriptorum, at the end of Dr Pococke's preface to this book. He flourished anno Heg. 300.

(108) In Dr Pococke's Latin it is Fuitque quod fuit, de eo cuius mentionem non feci. Puta autem bonum fuisse, nec se sentire quomodo se res habuerit. N. P. The translator has here undesignedly slid into a couplet of verses in just measure and rhyme.

(109) In Specimen. Hist. Arab. p. 267.

(w w) He was succeeded therein by Roger Altham, B. D. of Christ Church, Nov. 14, 1691. And into that of Arabic, Tho. Hyde of Queen's college, D. D. was elected Dec. 22d following. Wood's Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 370.

(110) Mr Thevenot, who was possessed of a MS. Life of him, observes in a letter to Dr Pococke, that he was an eminent Philosopher, and had like to have made a new fest among the Mahometans, being wholly of an active spirit. Twells, p. 67.

(111) See Gohius Lexic. Arab. under the word Sufi.

(2) Camden's Britaon. under Staffordshire. A better authority than Lud. Baccellus, who in the Life of the Cardinal tells us, he was born in London in the month of March; so it stands in the first edition, printed at Venice in 1563, fol. 7. b. as cited by Wood, in A. h. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 114. note (8); but in the edition of 1690, London is left out, the words being Natus est Polus anno M. D. mensis Martii, p. 7.

(1) Godwin de Presulib. Sec. edit. 1743, fol. under Pole's article.

(2) Vita Reginaldi Poli, &c. p. 7. edit. 1690, 8vo.

(3) See remark [L].

(4) Knight's Life of Erasmus, p. 109.

pbaile de Hai Ebn Yokdban. In qua ostenditur quomodo ex inferiorum contemplatione ad superiorum notitiam ratio humana ascendere possit. Mr Pococke had also prepared an Arabic history, with a Latin version, and put it to the press; but this performance not being worked off there when his father died, was withdrawn thence by him some little time after, upon a disgust at his being disappointed of succeeding his father in the Hebrew Professorship (w w). The copy, as much of it as was then printed, and the manuscript history, was, in 1740, in the hands of Mr Pococke's son, then Rector of Minal in Wiltshire (x x).

Apostles, who had endeavoured to turn men from darkness to light, since they see so many worthy persons among the Mahometans gone before them. Upon the whole, Abu Jaafir, from many passages in this book, appears to have been one of the (110) fest among the Mahometans called Sufis, or Suphians, not much unlike our Quakers, who began to spring up about the year of the Hegira 200; concerning whom it is remarkable, that the Sultan of Persia is often called the Sophy, because Ismael the first Sultan of that family now in Persia, who began to reign anno Hegir. 605, or anno Chr. 1554-5 (111), was of this fest. However, Jaafir was evidently, as Dr Pococke observes, of the soberer sort of them; being a man of virtue and good morals, as well as great learning. The doctor likewise tells, he has good reason to think the author was contemporary with Averroës (112), who died very old, anno Heg. 595, or anno Dom. 1198 (113). That he wrote some other pieces which are not come to our hands. That the book had been very well received in the East, one argument of which is, that it had been translated by R. Moses Narbonensis into Hebrew, and illustrated with a large commentary.

(112) From one or two passages in the book it appears that he lived in Spain. (113) He was Averroës's master in Philosophy. See a letter of Mr Thevenot to Dr Pococke, in Twells, p. 67.

POLE [REGINALD], Cardinal, and Archbishop of Canterbury, was descended of a royal blood, being a younger son [A] of Sir Richard Pole, Lord Montague, Knight of the Garter, and cousin-german to Henry VII. and Margaret his wife, daughter of George Duke of Clarence, younger brother to King Edward IV. He was born most probably at Stoverton-castle in Staffordshire (a), in the year 1500. After the greatest care had been taken by his mother to form his mind and manners from his cradle, he was sent at seven years of age (b) to be instructed in Grammar by the Carthusians, in the monastery at Shene near Richmond (c) in Surry; and, at about the age of twelve, became a Nobleman of Magdalen-college in Oxford, where an apartment was provided for him in the President's lodgings (d), who perhaps was his tutor. However that be, 'tis certain that the famous Linacre [B], and Will. Latimer (e), two of the greatest masters of those times in the Greek and Latin tongues, were our young nobleman's principal preceptors; and it is as certain, that he made a considerable progress in his studies under their directions and assistance. In June 1515, he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, having first kept the

[A] A younger son.] There are different accounts of the rank he stood in among his brethren: Godwin, after Archbishop Parker's Antiq. Britan. calls him the second son of his father (1), whereas the third place only is given to him by the writer of his life, who tells us, there were six children of them, four boys and two girls, who all survived their father: that both the girls married into the nobility; and that the names of the boys were Henry, who succeeded to the honour and estate; the second Arthur, the third Reginald, and the fourth Geoffrey [Gofredus] (2). And it is something remarkable, that Godwin, from the same authority as before, speaking on another occasion of the Cardinal's younger brother, calls him by the name of Alfred (3).

[B] Tho. Linacre.] A particular account of this learned doctor has been inserted in it's proper place in this work; we shall add here what is naturally suggested by his instructing the Cardinal in Greek, that he was the first person who taught that language at Oxford (4). We shall also take this opportunity of mentioning some other particulars not taken notice of under his article. The incident that gave birth to his acquaintance with Hermolaus Barbarus, whose assistance he made use of in the study of natural philosophy and physick, is pleasant enough. 'Tis said, that one day as he was studying in the Vatican library, in comes Hermolaus, and going up to him, after a courteous salute, in good faith, my studious stranger, says he, with a polite free-

The doctor's view in putting his son to translate and publish it, was (besides his son's reputation) to make another effort towards bringing the Arabic learning into vogue*; in which, a thing of this kind (being a sort of romance or novel) might, perhaps, be more likely to succeed than any other, in the fauntering pleasurable Court of King Charles the Second. 'Qui tanti pridem habitus, non dubito quin & jam aliquos non minus faventes inveniet, si non aliam ob causam, saltem ob brevitem & argumentandi subtilitatem, qua si non multum proderit aut delectabit, saltem paucarum horarum tedium non inutiliter fallat.' He proceeds to recommend it to the lovers of these studies, on account of the politeness, sweetness, and elegance of the stile, the choice of words being such, as, when understood, would enable them to read with ease all the philosophical authors in that language; which (as a further incitement to the study of it) he observes began early to flourish in England by the means of Adelard of Bath, a person of great learning, probably contemporary with this author; and was not only the first of our countrymen, but also of all the Latins, who brought the treasures of Arabia into Europe (114), and the cultivation of this treasure, particularly at Oxford, was provided for by a special decree of the council of Vienne, A. D. 1311.

(x x) Twells, p. 79.

* It was in the like view of promoting these studies, that the doctor published the Carmen Tograi, with a Latin translation and notes, in 1661; and an English translation of that poem came out in 1759, 4to. in the same Iambic measure as the original, with this title: The Traveller: an Arabic Poem, entitled Tograi, &c. By Leonard Chappelow, Arabic Professor at Cambridge.

(114) About the year 1130, in the time of Henry I. this particular was communicated by his friend Dr Langhaine to Dr Pococke.

(b) Ath. Oxon. where last cited.

(c) In a school joining to the college. Baccellus, p. 8.

(d) Ath. Oxon.

(e) To what is said of him in Linacre's article, rem. [B], may be added, that the parsonage house at Saint-bury was thought to be built by him, which is the size of a little college, and in the same fashion, Knight's Erasmus, p. 29.

(5) Jortin's Life of Erasmus, p. 20. note (6); from Paulus Jovius.

(6) Knight, p. 24.

(7) Huet de Claris Interpret. p. 234.

(8) Morice Encomium, c. 458. See Knight's Life of Colet, p. 139.

(9) Certe Linacer Cicero's dictionem nunquam probare potuit, nec sine fastidio audire, Gard. Epist. ad Chet. Baker's Reflections, p. 46.

(10) In Annal. Typogr. Vol. I. p. 233.

regular exercise for it; and the same year supplicated the congregation, for leave to wear such a habit and robes as were suitable to his birth (f), and to be admitted into the public library. Some time afterwards he entered into Deacon's Orders, and, on the 19th of March, 1517, was made Prebendary of Roscomb in the church of Salisbury, to which was added the Prebend of Yatminster Secunda in the same church, April 10, 1519 (g); the Deanery of Wimbourne monastery or Minister in Dorsetshire, and that of Exeter in Devonshire, being conferred on him about the same time. These early promotions were no more than the genuine effects of the munificent temper of King Henry the Eighth, to whom he was related, and who directed his breeding to the church, with a design to raise him to the highest dignities in it. Nor was Pole undeserving of the royal bounty. To a good share of natural parts were joined a sweet and noble temper, and a love of letters. He was now nineteen years of age, and having laid a good groundwork of learning at Oxford, it was determined, according to the custom of those times, to send him for further improvement to Italy, where the liberal arts and sciences then particularly flourished. This destination was very agreeable to him; he had himself solicited it, and a support suitable to his rank was provided by the King, who allowed him a large yearly pension (b), besides the profits of his dignities [C]. He went, therefore, accompanied with a learned attendance; and on his arrival, after visiting several other universities, he made Padua his choice, then most flourishing for eloquence. Here he hired a handsome house, and settled a proper household (i). Such a distinguished figure could not fail of drawing the eyes of all the learned men in that place upon him, and put it into his power to make the best advantage of their abilities towards perfecting the plan of his studies. To this end, for Philosophy he made use of Nich. Leonicus, a learned Philosopher and an excellent Grecian, whose lectures he heard upon several parts of the works of Plato and Aristotle. He likewise entertained in his family Christopher Longolius, a Belgian, famous for the studies of eloquence [D]. At the same time he entered into a familiarity with the celebrated Italian

[C] The profits of his dignities. Bacatellus tells us (11), that these revenues were carefully managed and returned to him by Rich. Paice. And Mr Wood observes, that Paice was at this time his most familiar friend, was appointed to do the duty of his deanry, in which Pole succeeded this friend. But here is some inconsistency with other accounts of Paice, who we are told, was probably born at or near Winchester, and was trained up at school at the charge of Thomas Langton, bishop of that diocese, to whom he was amanuensis. The bishop being much pleased with his proficiency sent him to Padua to complete his studies. There he met with Tomstall and W. Latimer, by whom he much profited. Upon his return he settled at Queen's College in Oxford; thence he was sent for to Court, his accomplishments rendering him very acceptable to Henry VIII. who made him Secretary of State, and employed him in matters of high concern. Though so much immersed in political affairs he went into Orders; in 1514 was admitted Prebendary of Bognor, in the church of York; and the same year Archdeacon of Dorset. In 1519, he became Dean of St Paul's, in the room of Dr Colet, and about that time Dean of Exeter (12). Stow, under anno 1521, says Pope Leo died this year; whereupon Dr Paice, Dean of Paul's, was sent to Rome to make friends in behalf of Cardinal Wolsey for the papacy. But Adrian the Sixth was chosen before Dr Paice's arrival. Paice, proceeds the Oxford Antiquary, was afterwards sent ambassador to Venice, and carried with him Thomas Lupset as his secretary; but during this embassy he fell into the displeasure of Wolsey, for which two reasons are assigned; first, that he had shewed a readiness to assist Charles Duke of Bourbon with money, for whom the Cardinal had no great affection. And secondly, that he had not forwarded the Cardinal's designs to succeed Pope Adrian the Sixth, who died in 1523. Upon these two reasons he was sadly distressed by that great man, who stopped his allowance, and almost starved him, and pursued him with the utmost vengeance, so that it did at length bereave him of his senses; though he had some lucid intervals, in which he remonstrated to the king against his ill usage (13). But the Cardinal was too hard for him (14), and he was confined in the Tower [of London] two years. He resigned his two Deanries of St Paul's and Exeter some time before his death*; to the first of which, if I am not mistaken, succeeded Dr Rich. Sampson, Bishop of Litchfield and Coventry; and in the other Reginald Pole (15). At last retiring for his health to Stepney he died there, and was buried in the chancel of that church in 1532, not being quite fifty years old. Soon after an epitaph, consisting of twelve verses, was put over his grave. Leland's encomium on his return from Venice, contains an elegant and just character of him.

He was excellently well versed in the Greek and Hebrew tongues, as well as the Italian, and in all polite literature. His learning procured him the esteem of Linacre, Grocyn, Sir Thomas More, and others, at home and abroad, particularly of Erasmus, who was greatly pleased with his candour and sweetness of temper, and wrote more letters (16) to him than almost to any other correspondent. He wrote several things, as may be seen in Wood, among which is a remarkable letter to king Henry VIII. written in 1527, wherein he very honestly gives his opinion of the divorce (17); and Dr Fiddes observes, that Paice always used a faithful liberty to Cardinal Wolsey, which brought him at last to confinement and distraction (18). Besides the incongruities here in respect to Pole, which the reader will readily see without the help of a fescue, it is something unaccountable, that no notice is taken of any acquaintance or visit Paice made while he was at Venice with our Cardinal: By the silence of all who make any mention either of Pole or Paice, we are to conclude, that the Cardinal took no notice of him during his residence there. This strangeness is, I say, unaccountable, even if we consider Paice merely as a person of distinguished learning; and it becomes much more so, when we find the Cardinal cultivating a particular familiarity with Paice's secretary, Lupset. Perhaps in the ticklish terms Pole stood then with Henry, he might think it too hazardous to cultivate an acquaintance with his ambassador.

[D] Christopher Longolius, famous for eloquence This learned man kept a correspondence with Erasmus, from whose letters we have the following account of him; he was born of Dutch parents, at Schoonhove in Holland, probably not many years before the Cardinal, since he was a young man in the year 1518. but a young man of very extraordinary parts and learning. Erasmus having then seen something he had written, calls him a youth perfectly made for all good learning, and especially for eloquence. This, says he, if I am not mistaken, is one of those who will shortly eclipse the name of Erasmus. However, that is a pleasure to me, as the loss of my name is the gain of the literary republic (19). He was bred at Louvain (20), and applying himself to the study of Cicero, he contracted such a implicit veneration for the Roman orator, that he stands among the chiefs of the Ciceronianists (21), on which account he had a little variance with Erasmus, between whom and Budeus he drew up a comparison, in which he gave the preference to the latter. His comparison turns chiefly upon their stile, and in that point some of his remarks are allowed by Mr Jortin to be not injudicious (22). This letter was wrote from Rome in the beginning of the year 1519; but he came not long after to Padua, and lived with our Cardinal,

(f) The words in Wood are, Panni pretiosi & Pellura pretiosa. Athen. Oxon, ubi supra.

(g) Wood. And we are told by Godwin, that he was also Vicar of Piddletown in Dorsetshire. Godwin, ubi sup.

(b) Quingenta aureae. Vita Reg. Poli, p. 8.

(i) Id. p. 8, 9.

(11) In Vita Poli, p. 8.

(12) Lord Herbert is mistaken in saying he was Dean of Salisbury in 1536. Life and Reign of Hen. VIII. p. 405; edit. 1649.

(13) The King hearing his misfortune, had sent for him home, where the Physicians restored him to his senses, so that he studied Hebrew.

(14) When the King ordered the Cardinal to purge himself, he sat in judgment with the Duke of Norfolk and others, not as a defendant, but as a Judge in his own cause.

* Knight says a little time; if so, then Pole could not succeed him in 1519.

(15) Ath. Oxon. under the article Tho. Lupset.

(16) Extracts from several of them may be seen passim in Jortin's Life of Erasmus, edit. 1758, 4to.

(17) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 29 — 31.

(18) Knight's Append. p. xxv.

(19) Epist. 347.

(20) Erasmi Epist. 799.

(21) Of these there were two sorts, one who fervently copied Cicero; and another who adopted his turn and manner more particularly, yet not disdaining any pure and classical expression. The hereby a use in the latter end of the XVth century, and lasted about a century, when it expired.

(22) Jortin's Life of Erasmus, p. 169. where this letter of Longolius is inserted as the pretiest of his writings; 'tis dated from Rome 29 Jano, 1519.

Italian Peter Bembo (k), and with Tho. Lupset an Englishman, eminent for eloquence, learning, and piety, as any person of his country [E]. These were his masters, with whom he constantly conversed; and they have told us, that he became the delight of that part of the world, for his learning, politeness, and piety. At the same time he grew not less the darling of his own country, where every one endeavoured to heap favours on him; and particularly Fox, Bishop of Winchester, entered and made him Fellow of his lately founded college of Corpus-Christi in Oxford, on the 14th of February, 1523 (l). From Padua our nobleman went to Venice, where he continued for some time, and then visited some other parts of Italy, and in the neighbourhood. Having spent five years abroad, he was recalled home; but being very desirous to see the jubilee, which was celebrated this year at Rome, he took a tour to that city; and passing by the way of Florence, he was received honourably, and had presents made to him there, as well as at other places on the road. At Rome likewise he was entertained with the same respect (m); and after he had satisfied his curiosity in visiting the court (n), the churches of the Apostles, religious houses, and rarities there, he returned to England before the expiration of 1525 (o), and was received with great affection and honour by the King and Queen, the Court, and all the Nobility, being much caressed, not only for his learning, but for the sweetness and politeness of his manners, being greatly improved in all by his travels. Thus he saw every thing at Court which could possibly create a fondness for it; but these had no charms for his taste at present. Devotion and study were his sole delight; and, in order to have a full and free enjoyment of those delights, he resolved to retire to his old habitation, among the Carthusians at Shene, having obtained a grant from the King of the apartment which Dr Colet, the worthy Dean of St Paul's, had lately built for his own use in the same exercises (p). He had passed two years with great pleasure in this retirement, when Henry VIII. began to start some scruples about the lawfulness of his marriage to Queen Katharine of Spain, in order to a divorce (q). His kinsman foreseeing the commotions which this incident must needs occasion, and that he should not escape being involved in them, if he stay'd in the kingdom, resolved to withdraw, and making use of the pretence of completing his studies, he obtained his Majesty's leave to go to Paris. Here carrying some learned persons in his train, he passed his time in that tranquillity, which is so much the desire, and is so necessary for studious persons; 'till the King prosecuting the affair of the divorce, sent to the most noted universities in Europe for their opinion on the illegitimacy of his marriage. On this occasion, Pole was sent to, and desired, or rather commanded, to concur with the King's agents for procuring the subscriptions and seal of the university of Paris, and other universities in France. This threw him into some perplexity for a while, but at length he resolved to leave the negotiation wholly to those who were joined with him in the commission, and to excuse himself to the King, as unfit for the employ, since the course of his studies had lain another way. But Henry, whose temper knew not how to brook the least in-compliance with his humour, was so much displeas'd, that when his kinsman returned home, not long after, he was advis'd by all means, for the preventing of further mischief, to clear himself of all disloyalty, and appease his Majesty's anger. Having by this means averted the storm for the present, he retired to his former habitation at Shene, where he prosecuted his studies and devotions, and undisturbed for the space of two years. In the mean time Henry perceiving the court of Rome's resolved intentions to baffle his proceedings carried on under their authority against Katharine, kindled into a resolution to shake off the yoke of that assumed authority, and to rely wholly on his own subjects. In order to effectuate this so extraordinary a change, it became adviseable to found the (k) See an account of him in Bayle's Dictionary.

(l) Ath. Oxon. ubi supra.

(m) John-Matthew Gibertus, Bishop of Verona, was his friend in procuring these favours for him. Vita Reg. Poli, p. 10, 11.

(n) Ath. Oxon. col. 115, but the writer of his life p. 11. says, he was never at the Court of Clement VII. who was then Pope, and made but a short stay at Rome.

(o) This year, probably soon after his return, he commenced an acquaintance with Erasmus, who wrote him a letter of compliments, which is printed among Erasmus's Epistles, No. 772. He had also received the like compliments from Bembo, Sadoleto, and others.

(p) See the doctor's article.

(q) Viz. in the year 1528. Salmon's Chron. Hist. under that year.

minds

(23) Epist. 799. See his life prefixed to his letters printed at Basil, 1558. 8vo.

† The writer of his life, says, he himself claimed Mechlin for his birth place, whence he was sent to Paris, at nine years old. Afterwards studied the law at Valens, and at length was made free of the city [Rome] by Pope Leo X. for his writings against Luther.

(24) Epist. 467. A little before his death he made his will, and put it into the Cardinal's hands as his executor. Life. Ubi supra.

(25) Vita Reg. Poli, p. 9, 10.

(27) Ath. Oxon. Vol. 1. col. 32.

in a letter to whom Erasmus laments his death (23), which happened, in 1522, at 34 years of age*. He had affected, in his life-time, to pass for a Frenchman, and some other places pretended a right to his birth; but Erasmus claims him for his countryman, a Dutchman, and an honour to that nation. The French cities, says he, claim Longolius from us; Mechlin also pretends to him †, but he is truly a pure Dutchman, descended from a Dutch father in a celebrated town of Holland, called, from it's beautiful gardens, Schoonhove; and to put an end to all disputes about it, be it known, that I had this account from his uncle Peter Longolius, a person of distinguished learning. I think we ought not to suffer Holland to be deprived of this honour; and it adds to the glory of Longolius, that being born in such a country he became so great a man (24). Erasmus also speaks of some commentaries of Longolius, which he supposes might be in the hands of the Cardinal, whom he solicits to publish them as a work that would be very acceptable to all the lovers of learning (25). Bacatellus tells us, that he died in the house of the Cardinal, who also wrote an account of his life, which was printed with his works (26).

[E] Tho. Lupset, &c.] This learned person deserves a place here. He was the son of Will. Lupset, citizen and goldsmith of London, and was born there, in the parish of St Mildred, Breadstreet. While a boy he was taken into the care and protection of Dr Colet, and educated in his school, under Will. Lilye (27), and thence removed to Pembroke-Hall in Cambridge (28); after some time he went to Paris, and returning about 1519, settled in Corpus-Christi-College in Oxford, and succeeded John Clement in Cardinal Wolfsey's rhetoric lecture, which he read both in Greek and Latin (29). June 19, 1521, he commenced A.M. soon after which he went secretary to Paice in his embassy to Venice. He was at Padua in 1523, with Reg. Pole, and coming back to England was soon after sent again at the earnest request of Cardinal Wolfsey to Paris, as tutor to Tho. Winter, where they were both maintained at Wolfsey's expence. He wrote several books, a list of which may be seen in Wood and Pitts; among these are some letters to Lee, Archbishop of York, in behalf of Erasmus (30), by whose advice he quitted beimes the study of the scholastick writers, and sold those prattles to buy Greek classics (31). He was in orders (32), but obtained only a Prebend in the church of Salisbury, two years before his death, which happened 27 Dec. 1532 aged thirty-six, leaving a widow, who was buried in 1545, near him in the church of St Alphage, within Cripplegate, London, afterwards translated to that now called St Alphage by Sion College. He assisted Linacre and More, in revising and correcting their works at the press; and Sir Thomas makes very honourable mention of him.

(32) This appears by his Sermones ad Clerum, printed mostly at Calais.

(28) Caius in Hist. Cantab. p. 59.

(29) The university, in a letter of thanks to Wolfsey, for having sent them Lupset, gave the Cardinal the title of Majestas. Regist. Univ. Oxon. FF. Ep. 83.

(30) They were printed at Basil, 1530, 4to. intitled, Epistolæ aliquot eruditiorum Virorum, ex quibus perspicuum quanta sit Edwardi Lei virulentia.

(31) Erasmi Epist. 112. to More.

minds of the chief persons in the nation, how they stood affected towards it. This political step brought new troubles upon Pole. He was now universally esteemed for his learning and piety, and was besides of the royal blood. It was observed therefore, that his consent would be of great service as an example to the rest. Accordingly no means were left untried to win him over. Among other arguments made use of to that purpose, his friends and near relations put him in sure hopes, that if he would clearly shew his willingness to please the King, and give his free consent in the matter of the divorce, he should have the Bishoprick of Winchester, or Archbishop of York, conferred on him, the first, if not the last, being then void. It was further also urged, that the preservation or subversion of his family depended, probably, upon his conduct at this critical juncture. Thus irresistibly pressed on every side, he yielded at length to the occasion, and repaired to the King, with a design to give him satisfaction; but his conscience checking him the moment he was about to speak, he was not able to utter a word. The extremity inspired him with courage (r), and quitting his former purpose he spoke his mind to the King, which being such as was not pleasing nor expected now from him, Henry, with a countenance brim full of anger, put his hand, sometimes to his poniard hanging at his girdle with an intention to kill him, but was overcome with the simplicity, humility, and submission of his kinsman's address, and dismissed him in tolerable temper, without urging the point any more. Pole, however, being apprehensive that further danger would inevitably accrue to him, if he continued in England, laid hold of this opportunity, of the King's pacific disposition, to apply to him, by some friends, for leave to withdraw, under pretence of a farther improvement in the universities abroad, which he obtained; and his Majesty was so far satisfied at present, that he continued his pension for some time (s) [F]. The first place he went to was Avignon, in the province of Narbon in France, which then flourished in the studies of the liberal arts and sciences. The town was under the Pope's jurisdiction, and our author continued there unmolested for the space of a year; but finding the air not to agree with his constitution, he left it and went to Padua, where he before had experienced a better air, besides good company, and the love of learned men (t) [G]. In this beloved University he fixed his residence a second time, making excursions now and then for diversion to Venice. With regard to study, Divinity had now his principal attention, yet not so as to exclude the inferior sciences. At the same time Learning and Religion went hand in hand; nature had given him a strong turn to that kind of devotion which is characteristically distinguished in the Roman Church by the name of piety. There was one Mark, a Monk, said to be a person of great learning, and greater piety, who then taught Theology; with this master Pole was exceedingly delighted, and attended his lectures assiduously. In the same disposition he admitted into an

[F] The King was satisfied for the present, &c. Bishop Burnet gives the following reason for this instance of his Majesty's good will to Pole at this time. Having related that an instrument acknowledging the King's supremacy passed the Convocation in 1531, being signed by nine bishops, and sixty-two abbots and priors, and the major part of the lower house of Convocation, he observes, that Pole was very probably of this number, for in his book to the king, he says, he was then in England; and adds, that the king would not accept of the sum offered by the clergy, unless they would acknowledge him supreme head. He being then, continues our historian, of the lower house of Convocation; and it is not likely the king would have continued the pension and church preferments, if he had refused to sign that petition and submission (31). However, in justice to Pole it must not be omitted, that the acknowledgement then made of the King's supremacy was subscribed with this reserve, in as far as it was agreeable to the law of Christ; so we find that Fisher Bishop of Rochester was one of the nine Bishops that signed it, and the King, it seems, was pleased that it passed any how.

[G] He obtained the love of many learned men. Among these are mentioned Lampridius of Cremona, and Jacobus Sadoletus. This last was a native of Modena, a most polite writer both in verse and prose (32). Erasmus speaks with rapture of his stile, and prefers it to his own in these terms. R. P. Sadoleti librum in delicis habeo: verum illius aureum dictationis flumen considerans, video quem rivus sit & turbidus & exilis. Posthac ad hoc exemplar meum quoque styllum conabor attemperare (33). He was first made Bishop of Carpentras, and afterwards raised to the Purple at the same time with Pole, and both are reckoned with Contarenius, as well disposed to some reformation, by Seckendorf*, who hath collected some things which shew the christian temper of Sadolet. For instance, being sent Legate to Avignon, in 1539, with orders to extinguish heresy, together with a power to punish the guilty, he wrote to Cardinal Farnese, that he was employed day and night to prevent their increase; but says, that he should not easily make use of this power to punish them, since the truth itself, and christian mildness, were stronger arguments to bring them to a confession of their errors, which would then also proceed as it ought from the heart, and not from the mouth only. In another letter to the same Cardinal, he blames the Pope for persecuting the Lutherans, whilst he granted new privileges daily to the Jews in the province of Avignon (34). He was a great favourer of Melancthon and Bucer (35), and speaks with more moderation and candour, than Luther does of the unfortunate death of Zuingleus and Occolampadius (36). He died at Rome in 1547, aged 70 (37); yet not without some suspicion of being poisoned (38).

Benedict Lampridius, the other friend of Pole just mentioned, was a celebrated poet, he went to Rome with John Lascaris, and there taught Greek and Latin. After the death of Pope Leo X. he went to Padua in 1521, and taught the youth of that university; but, as is said, with a greater regard to his interest than to his reputation. He was called from Padua to Mantua, by Frederick Gonzago, to be tutor to the Prince his son. It is observed of him, that he was so bashful, that he could never speak in publick. There are in print several of his epigrams and lyric poems, both in Greek and Latin, which are printed separately, and are reckoned among the delicæ of the Italian poets. His odes are grave and learned. In them he aims at imitating Pindar, but he had not force enough to reach the high flights of that poet (39).

Our Cardinal also took into his family Ludovicus Bacatelli, then a student at Padua, who lived with him 'till his death, and wrote his life in Italian, which was afterwards translated into Latin, and published under this title, Vita Reginaldi Poli, S. R. E. Cardinalis, & Cantuariensis Archiepiscopi, Italici conscripta a Ludovico Bacatello Archiepiscopo Ragusino [Ragusa] ipsius familiari. Latine reddita ab Andrea Dudithio Episcopo Finienfi*, Venet. 1563. 4to. It was reprinted at London in 1690, with the same title, to which is added, Juxta exemplar Venetis excusum, Anno MDLXIII. And an Epistle to the Reader is prefixed, where the anonymous editor says, it was written by a bigotted Papist, who hath thrown several calumnies upon our first Reformers, and besmeared his history with lies.

[H] Sampson,

(r) The writer of his Life, who represents the Cardinal on all occasions, as Heavens peculiar favourite, attributes this sudden change to the particular Providence of God. Vita Reg. Poli, p. 15.

(s) Id. p. 16.

(t) Of these we have the names of Tryphon Gabrielus; Antoninus Passerus, surnamed Genua; Bonamicus Bassianus, mentioned in Vita Poli, p. 17. otherwise, whatever merit they had seems to have been long buried in oblivion's grave. The rest, who have survived that fate, are mentioned below.

(31) Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, p. 109. 4th edit.

(32) Thuanus, lib. iii. p. 99.

(33) Some of Sadolet's letters to Longolius, are printed with those of the latter, ubi supra, Erasmus in Epist. 1170. names him with Bembo and Julius Pflug, as three of the best writers of that age. After all, a pure and elegant stile, was perhaps the smallest of his accomplishments; he was a man of piety, probity, and moderation; affable and good natured. Jortin's life of Erasmus, p. 509.

* Hist. Lutheran in Præloqu.

(34) Id. lib. iii. p. 244. See also Thuanus Hist. lib. vi. p. 189.

(35) Seckendorf lib. i. p. 43, and Supplement. lxxv.

(36) See Epist. 1220. in Sadoleti Epist. Colon. 1564. 8vo.

(37) N. B. Zuingleus was slain in the wars, it being the custom in his country for the head ministers of a parish to take arms with their countrymen.

(38) Thuanus, lib. iii. p. 99.

(39) Boissard.

(39) Paul Jovius's Elog. c. 9. Baillet Jugement des Savans sur les Pèeres Modernes, Tom. IV. P. i. p. 164, 165. n. 1269. edit. Amsterdam. 1725.

* i. e. Knin in Croatia. See his Life in Du Pin, B. E. xv. p. 193. This Andrew afterwards renounced his religion, became a Protestant and a Socinian, and dying at Wentzlaw in Silesia, in Feb. 1589, was buried there. Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 123.

an intimate familiarity Cosmo Sberius, Bishop of Fano, a city in Umbria, in whom, tho' young, he found an eminent knowledge in several branches of literature, joined to a singular honesty in manners and conversation, and an ardent desire of piety. At Venice also our Nobleman became acquainted with the famous Gaspar Contarenus, who afterwards was elected into the college of Cardinals, as likewise he did with Peter Caraffa, Bishop of Theate, who about that time had founded a new religious order at Venice, called Theatines, but became afterwards the turbulent Pope Paul IV, and an enemy to Pole. Several other persons of the first reputation in the republick of letters, are ranked among his acquaintance. But above all, there was none so familiar with him as a noble Venetian, called Aloisius Priuli. He was a person of singular worth and integrity, and friendship was now begun between them which ended not but with the death of Pole (u). Thus the days passed very agreeably in Italy, but fresh troubles were brewing in England. Henry had not only divorced Katherine, but married Anne Boleyn, and resolved to throw off the papal yoke, and assert his right to the Supremacy, with the title of Supreme Head of the Church. To this end he had procured a book to be written in defence of that title by Dr Richard Sampson, (w) Bishop of Chichester [H], and observing the high esteem in which Pole was held, both at home and abroad, he was not a little desirous to have it confirmed by his kinsman. He therefore dispatched a courier with Dr Sampson's book, and a letter, requiring his opinion upon the matter. No body was better acquainted with the King's violent temper in general than Pole; the fate of Sir Thomas More and Bishop Fisher particularly had also reached his ears; and seeing the method practised in order to bring them over to acknowledge the new title, he persuaded himself that the like means were designed to bring on the like conclusion; and that the present application was a snare laid purposely to usher him to the block. He therefore contrived some excuses for deferring his answer; and when he found no delays could prevail any longer, taking courage from the security of the Pope's protection, he not only disapproved the King's divorce, and separation from the Apostolick See, in answer for the present, but shortly after drew up his piece pro Unitate Ecclesiastica*, and sent it to King Henry. This confidence was a notorious proof of his zeal and attachment to the see of Rome. Besides using very rude and indecent language to Bishop Sampson, he not only pressed the King earnestly to return to the obedience he owed to that see (x), but excited the Emperor to revenge the injury done to his aunt, the divorced Queen, with many sharp reflections [I]. Henry was much displeas'd with this conduct, and knowing that the book could not long lie concealed in Italy, though Pole had promised not to publish it, sends for our author to come to England, that he might explain some passages of it to him. But Pole, well aware that it was made treason there to deny his Majesty's Supremacy, which was the principal scope of his book, chose not to obey the call, but desired the King, as being now freed from her who had been the occasion of all this, to take hold of the present occasion, and reintegrate himself with the Pope, and accept the council now summoned, whereby he might have the honour of being the cause of the reformation of the Church in doctrine and manners, assuring him, that otherwise he would be in great danger. This was the language of a superior. It was manifest from what fountain he now drew, and the King therefore resolved to keep measures with him no longer, accordingly his pension was withdrawn, he was stripped of all his dignities in England, and an act of attainder of high treason passed against him. But he was abundantly compensated for these losses and sufferings by the bounty of the Pope and the Emperor. He had been created a Cardinal [K] in January preceding (y), by the title of S. Nereus and Achilleus, then

(u) Ibid. p. 18. See more of this Venetian hereafter.

(w) The title of Sampson's book was, Oratio Horatoria ad Obedientiam Regis contra Papam.

* Burnet says, this piece was more esteemed for the high quality of the author, than for any found reasoning, that is in it, Hist. of the Reformat. Vol. I.

(x) He wrote also to Tonstall, Bishop of Durham, to incline the King to it. Herbert's Life of Henry VIII. sub anno 1535. Strype's Life of Archbishop Parker, B. I. ch. x.

(y) Upon the eleventh of that month, says Bacatelli, p. 23. but we are told by another writer, that he was made Cardinal-Deacon of Nereus and Achilles, December 20, 1536. Ciacon. Vit. Pontific. Tom. III. col. 637.

(40) Knight's Life of Erasmus, P. 43.

(41) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 135.

(42) Knight.

(43) Burnet's Reformation, Vol. I. p. 215. who tells us, that he was exempted out of the general pardon, only for sending some alms to one Abel, in extreme want and misery in prison, for denying the King's Supremacy.

* The temporalities were given to him 4 July this year. Pat. 28. Hen. VIII. p. 2.

(44) Knight.

[H] Sampson, Bishop of Chichester. Sampson was first of Clement's Hostel, and then of Trinity Hall, in Cambridge, where he became acquainted with Erasmus; and meeting with him afterwards at Tournay, used his utmost endeavours to procure him a prebend in that church, of which, Wolfey was then Bishop, had Sampson in his retinue (40), who became treasurer of the church of Salisbury (41), Dean of the royal chapel of St Stephen's, and chaplain to the King. Being neglected by Wolfey, he wrote him an expostulating letter for preferment, which did not succeed, the Cardinal ever bearing hard upon those that would not run the lengths he would have them (42). However, he entirely complied with all the King's proceedings (43), which he extolled in a dedication to his Majesty of a commentary published by him on the first fifty psalms; running into a severe invective against the Bishops of Rome, and the corruptions and usurpations favoured by that, see. So that in 1536, he was raised to the Bishoprick of Chichester*, and translated to Lichfield in 1543; was of the Privy Council, and sent abroad on embassies (44).

[I] With many sharp reflections He compared the King to Nebuchadnezzar; and indeed, the indecencies of his expressions against the King, not to mention the scurrilous language he bestows on Sampson, whose book he undertakes to answer, are such, that it appears how much the Italian air had changed him. Thus far Bishop Burnet, who however allows, that Sampson had reflected severely upon Pole. His old friend Tonstall, Bishop of Durham, sent him a severe letter in answer to his book; in which he reproved his bitterness, and advised him to burn it. He also in a sermon preached at St Paul's, in his grave way, set forth Pole's unnatural ingratitude (45).

[K] He was created a Cardinal. We have the following particulars, relating to Pole's conduct on this occasion, from Bacatelli, who tells us, that Contarenus, who was made a Cardinal a little before, being consulted by the Pope, [Paul III.] about the best means for restoring ecclesiastical discipline, advised his Holiness to call to his assistance, Sadolet, Caraffa, Cortesius, Abbot of St George; Gibert, Bishop of Verona; Tregofius, Archbishop of Salerno; and Pole. That these learned persons drew up a method for the purpose, which is extant in the books of the councils, being unanimously approved, but could not then be carried into execution. However, it being Christmas festival, the Pope resolved upon a creation of Cardinals, and thought of Pole* among others, who was particularly approved by Contarenus †, and the Emperor's Ministers, as being the properest person to reduce England, to the Roman pale. In short, all were pleased but Pole himself, who both begged and prayed it might not be done, at least not at present; so that the Pope, promised to defer it. But that going to the college of Cardinals, to create the others without Pole, he had no sooner taken the chair, than suddenly changing his mind,

(45) Burnet.

* He had been taken into the palace and lodged there, being highly recommended by Contarenus to the Pope, who found him to be entirely devoted to the Roman see. Vita Poli.

† Some say he was recommended by Bembo. Godwin de Præf. lib.

(2) Wood; but with regard to this last title, from what authority, does not appear; neither Burnet, nor Godwin, nor Parker, nor Baccatelli, make any mention of it. N.B. Sadolet and Caraffa received the Purple at the same time. Vita Poli, p. 23.

(a a) Viz. quinquaginta milia aureorum nummorum, fifty thousand ducats. Vita Poli, p. 25.

(b b) Ibid. from p. 25 to p. 29.

(c c) Ibid. p. 31.

(d d) See more of this hereafter.

(e e) Viz. Cardinal Monte, and St. Crucis, both afterwards raised to the Papacy, the first by the name of Julius III. and the other by his own name, Marcellus II. Sleidan & Ciacon. Vit. Pontif. Tom. III.

(f f) In this Council he asserted the German doctrine of Justification by Faith. Burnet, ubi supra. See also Pole's Treatise of Justification.

(g g) Vit. Poli, p. 33.

then of St Mary in Cosmedin, and at length of St Prisca (z), and soon after was sent by the Pope with the character of Nuncio, both to France and to Flanders, that being near England, he might hold a correspondence with the Catholics there, in order to keep them stedfast in the faith of that Church. At Paris he was received by the King very honourably, but did not stay long there; for Henry being informed of it, sent to demand him of the French monarch [L], which being notified to him by that Prince, he removed to Cambray, and put himself under the protection of that Bishop. Yet neither was this a place of safety for him, by reason of the war then between France and the Empire, in which Henry was engaged, so that the English soldiers were continually harassing those parts. The Nuncio was therefore very desirous to leave the place, and the more for this reason, that he now heard of his being proclaimed a traitor in England, and a price set upon his head (aa). During this perplexity Cardinal Erardus à Marchia, Bishop of Liege, inviting him thither, he immediately posted from Cambray, and was received as a brother, and most liberally entertained by that Cardinal. Here he continued six months, waiting 'till all things should be amended in England, according to the desire of France and the Emperor; but these expectations proving vain, our Nuncio found himself still in danger of being delivered up to Henry VIII. hereupon he left Leige, and by the Pope's command returned through Germany to Rome, where he was very graciously received; and not long after attended his Holiness to Nice, in the Province of Narbonne in France, to assist in making a peace between the Emperor and that King, which he did all that lay in his power to effect, and the former gave orders that his minister there should pay all imaginable respects to him. Afterwards he was employed by the Pontiff to these two Princes, and some others, to persuade them to enter into a league against England, in order to restore it to the ancient religion, cleanse it of heresy, and relieve the devotees to the Apostolick See, then in a lingring and groaning condition, a thing of greater necessity and merit, than to war against the Turk. To dispatch this embassy with quickness, and to avoid the toils of Henry VIII. our Cardinal went incognito, and with very few attendants, first to the Emperor, then at Toledo in Spain, and in the design to proceed from thence to France (bb). But this project being counterworked by Henry (cc), the Cardinal met with a cool reception from his Imperial Majesty; whereupon he returned by the same road to Avignon, where he acquainted the Pope with his ill success, and receiving a letter from his Holiness to continue in those parts, he took this opportunity of making a visit at Carpentras, to his acquaintance and beloved friend Cardinal Jacob Sadolet, with whom he spent six months much to his satisfaction, and in the utmost safety, this place as well as Avignon, being under the Pope's jurisdiction; and being recalled hence, and sent by the Pope to Verona, he found much friendship and hospitality from John Matthew Gibert, Bishop of that place. At length his Holiness considering how to reward his services, sent him Legate to Viterbo, an easy employ, and near the city, where he might reside entirely safe, and out of the reach of his enemies. In this post he still maintained his character for piety and learning, and particularly obtained the love of the people, by his moderation towards Protestants, for which, however, he was charged by the bigots with favouring heresy (dd). Our Legate continued at Viterbo 'till 1543, when the Pope having called the Council of Trent, appointed him, together with the Cardinal of Paris, and Cardinal John Merone, his three Legates there, but as the council could not then assemble, by reason of the wars which arose in Germany, and other Christian countries, Pole returned to Viterbo, between which place and Rome he passed his time, following his studies in great repose and tranquillity, 'till the Pontiff resolving not to have his views in calling a council defeated, issued a second citation for holding it at the same place, and appointed Pole again, but with two different Cardinals, his Legates there (ee). Accordingly he attended in that council, as long as he was able (ff), but the bad state of the air bringing a dangerous catarrh upon him, he obtained leave to go to Padua for the benefit of advice, and a better air; after a while the council also was removed to Bononia on the same account. About which time our Cardinal having recovered his health returned to Rome, and was received very graciously, as usual, by the Pope, who made him his chief counsellor in matters relating to Kings and sovereign Princes, and particularly when it was concluded to make a defence in writing Cardinal Pole was the penman (gg). Thus, for instance, when the Pope's power to remove the council was contested by the Emperor's Ambassador, Pole drew up a vindication of that proceeding, and when the Emperor set forth the Interim, the same Cardinal was employed to answer it [M]. This was in 1548, and mind, he called one of his bed-chamber, and sends him for a barber, and at the same time orders him to go to Pole, and let him know that it was his pleasure, he should not refuse the offered dignity. That Pole was much troubled at it, but at length submitted, giving his head to the razor like a lamb under the shearer's hands (46).
Pope

[L] Henry VIII. demanded him of the French King. 'Tis said that on his arrival in France, he sent letters to his friends in England to stir up a rebellion there, which being discovered to the King by his younger brother Alfred *, proved fatal to his mother, and to his eldest brother the Lord Montague (47). Pole's two other brothers, Arthur and Jeffrey, were both arraigned, in 1562, for a conspiracy against Queen Elizabeth (48).

[M] He wrote an answer to the Interim. This famous decree, contained a scheme for an accommodation, (46) Godwin de Presulib. from Sleidan, who says his mother, the Countess of Salisbury, was 70 years of age when she suffered, viz. in the 33d of Hen. VIII. having been condemned by the Parliament in the 31st, anno 1540; but Salmon has placed her execution in 1541, and says, she was thought to be near related to the House of York. The Cardinal consoled himself for this loss, with the confidence of their dying martyrs, Vita Poli p. 33.

(48) Fulman, in the Appendix to Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, Vol. II. p. 325. 4th edition.

* See remark [A].

Pope Paul III. dying the next year our Cardinal was twice elected to succeed him, but refused both the elections; one as being too hasty, and without due deliberation, and the other, because it was done in the night-time. Such an unexampled delicacy (bb) disgusted several of his friends in the conclave. They thereupon joined with the party of Cardinal John Maria de Monte, Bishop of Palestrina, who by that means being chosen Pope, took the name of Julius the third [N]. This happened March 30, 1550; and the tranquillity of Rome being soon afterwards much disturbed by the wars in France, and on the borders of Italy, Pole retired, with the Pope's leave, to a monastery of the Benedictines called Magazone, situated near the lake of Benacus in the territory of Verona. In this pleasant retirement he continued 'till the death of Edward VI. July 1553. But on the accession of Queen Mary it was determined by the court of Rome, that Pole should be sent Legate into England, as the fittest instrument, on all accounts, to effect the reduction of the kingdom to their obedience to the Pope [O]. The undertaking, however, required some consideration. The act of at-(bb) Bacatelli observes, that he had never heard or read of any one that had done the like. Ibid. p. 39.

tainer,

or a truce to be observed between Papists: but gave great offence to both sides, each thinking too much to be conceded to the other. The tenor of it was in general very favourable to the Romish doctrines, somewhat softened, disguised, and palliated. The only concessions to the Protestants, were the use of the cup in the eucharist, and of marriage to the clergy; and even these were only conditional and temporary, and to continue 'till a general council should decide about it.

[N] Pole refused the election, and De Monte was chosen Pope.] There were three parties in the conclave, the French, the Emperor, and Cardinal Farnese. This last joining with the Emperor, unanimously chose Pole. The majority of votes was undeniable, but the French objected that some of their party were not arrived by reason of the distance, and complained that the election was hurried. This party was joined by Caraffa, who hoping if Pole was set aside, to be chosen himself; not only backed their arguments but began to load Pole with calumnies, objecting that he lay under a suspicion both of heresy and incontinency. In support of which, he alleged that in Germany at the council of Trent, he was familiar with the Lutherans, and that his familiarity with Tremellius (49) confirmed the suspicion, which was further ascertained by his keeping Flaminius a suspected Lutheran among his domestics for some time, and then enriching him with some ecclesiastical dignities. That he had spared several hereticks at Viterbo (50), punishing but few in any moderate way, and none at all with death. Neither was that gravity of countenance which he wore, so far removed from the suspicion of luxury, but that many persons thought the young Nun which he maintained at his own expence, was really the fruit of his own loins.

To conclude, he wondered what they meant by running with so much hurry to chuse a foreigner, as if Italy, could not produce any who were worthy of the Pontificate, so that they were under a necessity of sending to Britain; and to what end, continues he, viz. That Cæsar, whose creature Pole was known to be, might plunder Rome a second time (51). Pole effectually defended himself against these calumnies; with regard to the first, appealing to all that he had done and suffered for the dignity of the Roman Church, and the Catholic doctrines. Secondly, as to his conduct at Viterbo, it was observable, that he had lived so as to preserve the peace, without the necessity of having much recourse to any punishment, much less to extremity. And thirdly, with respect to the young nun, he made it appear that she was the daughter of an English woman; who dying at Rome, he had placed the girl in a nunnery, to save her from falling into a wicked course of life; that for a provision, besides the small matter that was left by her mother, he had deposited a hundred aurei in Fidei Monte, as it is called. Upon the whole, his answer was so clear and satisfactory, that his party grew warmer in his behalf; and immediately proceeding to confirm their election by a second scrutiny, they went thence to Pole's apartment, and finding he was gone to bed (for it was now late at night) they spoke to Priuli, who was then in waiting as gentleman of the bed-chamber, to awake his master; and acquaint him that they were come to adore him, and so to bring the matter to a final issue; Priuli performed the request with much joy, but Pole received it in a different temper; he was very angry with his friend, and drove the Cardinals away, telling them, that he would not have a thing which was to be feared rather than desired, to be carried on tumultuously and rashly, but decently and orderly. That the night was not a proper time, God was a God of light and not of darkness, and therefore it ought to be deferred 'till day came. The Italians attributing this coldness to a stupid meanness of spirit, despised him for it, and shrinking all from him, after some intrigues chose the Cardinal De Monte (52), as above-mentioned; who, as Burnet observes, gave a strange omen of what advancements he intended to make, when he gave his own hat according to the custom of the Popes, who bestow their hats before they go out of the conclave, on a boy who was his monkey-keeper; and being asked what he saw in him to make him a Cardinal, he answered, as much as the Cardinals had seen in himself to make him Pope (53). But it is commonly said, that the secret of his advancement, was an unnatural affection to him. So says Burnet (54), whilst others ascribe it to his money (55). However that be, he certainly carried it very friendly to Pole, during his Pontificate, and on his election when Pole came among the other Cardinals to kiss his feet as usual, he rose and embraced him in a most friendly manner not without tears of joy, and frequently acknowledged, that he owed his promotion to our Cardinal's refusing it (56).

[O] It was determined to send him Legate to England.] There is some variations in the accounts of this matter. Godwin tells us, that as soon as the news of Edward's death and the succession of Queen Mary reached Pole's ears, he left his retirement and repaired to Rome, in the view of procuring a legation for England; where knowing that he was beloved by Mary, he conceived great hopes, either to obtain the kingdom by marrying her, or at least some of the highest posts in it by her favour; in support of this account, it is observed, that Mary was educated by the Cardinal's mother Margaret, while he was a young man; that this appointment was ordered by Katherine, mother to Mary, in the view of marrying her to one of Margaret's children, that so her right to the crown (Margaret being niece to Edward IV.) might be strengthened by this alliance, in case Henry should die without male issue. Nor was Pole deceived in his expectations. For Mary immediately on her accession to the crown, invited him to England (57); and the Pope made him Legate; but the Emperor suspecting the design of Mary to marry her kinsman, and resolving upon his son's marriage to her, procured Dandini, the Pope's Legate at his court, to send letters to Pole by Commendanus to put off his journey; Pole receiving the letters at the monastery of Magazone, acquainted the Pope with the affair, who being incensed at the Emperor's assuming so much power, was angry with Dandini, recalled him, and transferred his legatine power to Pole, the business of which, was to negotiate a peace between France and the Empire. Thus honoured with a double legation, our Cardinal set out in October; and arriving at Trent, dispatched letters thence to both the courts concerned, with an account of his new legation; and continued his journey. But the Emperor finding the thing could not be managed by cunning, resorted to force, and forthwith sent Mendoza with orders absolutely to forbid our legation's proceeding in his dominions, unless he would retire to Liege, and remain there 'till he received further orders from him. This express meeting him in the road not far from Dilling (58). He returned to the town, and there meeting with the Emperor's confessor (59), he set him to solicit his master not to stop his journey, at the same time acquainting the Pope also with this new affront. At length Cæsar being assured, (52) Bacatelli in Vita Poli, p. 37, 38, and Godwin, as before.

(53) Father Paul says he was his catamite; he was then only 17 years old, and turned out a great disgrace to his dignity.

(54) History of the Reformation, ubi supra.

(55) Heidegger Hist. Papatus, p. 233.

(56) Vita Poli, p. 41.

(57) The invitation was brought by Commendanus mentioned above.

(58) Dilling lies upon the Danube, not far from Trent. Burnet and Bacatelli.

(59) His name was Petrus à Soto, he was then master of a college or school at Dilling. Vita Poli, p. 48.

that

(49) This was a learned Jew, who had been baptized in the Cardinal's house, and was known to incline to Lutheranism. Burnet's History of the Reformation, Vol. I. under this year.

(50) Many who left their monasteries, and went to Germany, used to stay some time with him on their way, and were well received by him. Ibid.

(51) Godwin, ubi supra, from Parker and Ciacconius.

tainder, which had passed against him under Henry VIII. had been confirmed by Edward, and consequently stood still in force, both these princes were held in great esteem among the people. Our Legate therefore did not think it safe to venture his person in England, 'till he understood the true state of things there (ii). However, it was not long before he received full satisfaction upon all these points (kk), and accordingly set out for England by the way of Germany in the month of October this year, 1553; but he had not proceeded far in the Emperor's dominions, when a message came to him from that prince, to put a stop to his further progress at present. These letters were soon followed by an express from Queen Mary to the same purport, who, to keep him in good humour, sent him also the two acts that had passed, for the justification of her mother's marriage, and for bringing all things back to the state they were in at her father's death, desiring him likewise to send her a list of such persons as should be made Bishops (ll). The Cardinal being satisfied, that the true cause of this delay was to prevent his arrival in England before the Queen's marriage to Philip should be compleated, was not a little nettled at it, and wrote a letter to her Majesty, wherein he said, he knew this stop to his journey came chiefly from the Emperor, who was for pursuing such particular courses now, as himself had followed in the business of the Interim, being resolved to have the state settled before she meddled with religion. That he had spoke with the Emperor's confessor about it, and had convinced him of the impropriety of such courses, and set him to work on his master (mm). He also told the Queen, he was afraid carnal pleasures might govern her too much, and that she might thereby fall from her simplicity in Christ, wherein she had hitherto lived: he encouraged her therefore to put on a spirit of wisdom and courage, and trust in God, who had preserved her so long. He assured her, that he had wrote to mitigate the Pope and Cardinals who there was room enough to think would resent his being stopped, which he had told them was done only to wait 'till his attainder was taken off; and to make a shew of going forward, he had sent his household-stuff to Flanders. With regard to the two acts, he found fault that no mention was made in the first of the Pope's bulls, by the authority of which only it could be a lawful marriage; and he did not like, that in the other act, the worship of God, and the sacraments, were to be as they were in the end of her father's reign (nn), for then the people were yet in a state of schism, that the Pope's interdict still lay on the nation, and 'till that were taken off, none could, without sin, either administer or receive them. He confessed he knew none of either house fit to propose the matter of rejecting the supremacy, and therefore he thought it best for herself to go to the Parliament, having beforehand acquainted some few, both of the spirituality and temporality, with her design, and tell the house, she was touched with the schism, and desired a Legate to come over from the Apostolick See, to treat about it; and should thereupon propose the reversing of his attainder. That whereas some might apprehend thralldom from the papacy, she might give them assurance she would see all things so well secured, that there should no danger come to the nation from it; and he assured them, that he, for his part, would take as much care of that, as any of all the temporality could desire (oo). But her marriage with Philip meeting with great opposition, it was resolved our Legate should be kept at a distance. Therefore by way of diversion another Legation was contrived for him, to mediate a peace between the Empire and France (pp). In obedience to the Pope's appointment he went to Paris on this errand, the business was most agreeable to his natural disposition, and he laboured it very seriously for some time, 'till finding no prospect of success, he returned to his former residence in a monastery near Brussels, where

(ii) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 119.

(kk) He was informed of all by Commendunus, who was dispatched by Dandini from the Emperor's court to England privately, to sound Queen Mary's intentions with regard to the re-establishment of the Romish religion and the Pope's Supremacy. Burnet, B. li.

(ll) This power was given him in the Bull of his Legation; but it does not appear that he named any at this time. Burnet.

(mm) See his name, &c. in remark [O].

(nn) She had complied to that state of the religion before Henry's death, and it was all she asked on the accession of King Edward. Burnet, Vol. II. p. 241. first edition.

(oo) Id. in the appendix of which the letter is printed, and is a very long one.

(pp) Burnet says this was a scheme of the Emperor's; but the rest tell us, it was done by the Pope in revenge for the affront put upon him in the person of his Legate. See rein. [O].

(60) The Cardinal resided in a monastery near the city. And perceiving the malice of his enemies, he compared himself to a person walking in the fields, who observed by the bending of the grass, that there was a snake in it, which however, was covered by the grass's height. Id. p. 52, 52.

that the marriage articles between Philip and Mary were completed, suffered Pole to come to Brussels (60), upon condition that he should remain there 'till the nuptials were solemnized, and in the mean time desired him to enter on the business of his legation to himself. Thus far Godwin from Parker's Antiq. Brit. and it agrees in the main, with what we have from Bacatellus. But Bishop Burnet having mentioned Queen Mary's ordering Commendunus to move the Pope, that Pole might be sent over with legatine power to restore the nation to the Pope's obedience, observes that the writer of the Cardinal's life insinuates, that besides this, she had another reason; for she asked him whether the Pope might not dispense with the Cardinal to marry, since he was only in Deacons orders (61). It was granted, proceeds this historian, that Pole should go legate with a full power. But Gardiner coming to know this, sent to the Emperor to stop his journey, assuring him that things were going well on, and that Pole's coming over would spoil all. At this time the Emperor began to think of marrying his son Philip to the Queen, which was proposed in the beginning of November 1553, and entertained by the Queen easily.— It is said, continues he, and I have shewn some ground to believe, that she had some inclination for Pole, and that the Emperor fearing that might be a hindrance to his design, therefore the Cardinal's coming over was stopt 'till the Queen was married to his son. But of this, I find no certain footsteps. On the contrary, Gardiner, whose eye was chiefly upon the Archbishoprick [of Canterbury], would rather have promoted Pole's pretensions to the Queen, since her marrying a subject and not a stranger, would have made the government much easier and more acceptable; and it would have been the best thing he could do for himself, if he could have persuaded her to marry Pole, who was likely to stand between him and that dignity; the true account of it is, the Emperor forced her upon the marriage first, which he said would more easily make way for what was to follow; and this was the reason of stopping Pole at Dilling, which the Emperor at first did by his own authority, and afterwards got the Queen to send to him for the same purpose (62). And so far the Bishop has all the writers of his side, that Pole's journey was stopped on account of the Queen's marriage to Philip; but his reason for Gardiner's having no hand in that match, seems not so well grounded; since he had good reason to believe that Pole's marriage with the Queen, would have broke the neck of his views upon Canterbury. He was no stranger to the Cardinal's ill opinion of him, and could not therefore be without a just apprehension, that if he once obtained the kingdom by that marriage, tho' he could not then accept that dignity himself, yet he would never suffer his enemy to possess it (63).

(61) No such passage as this occurs in the edition of 1690. But as Burnet wrote his History of the Reformation before that time, he must cite the first edition in 1563. We have in note (a) observed another fact in a citation of Mr Wood. Yet the editor of the second edition, takes no notice of any alterations in it from the first, except only in the addition of some marginal contents.

(62) History of the Reformation, Vol. II. Part II. B. ii.

(63) Gardiner treated Pole with contempt as a weak man, and Pole detested Gardiner as a wicked man. Ibid.

where he had resided before this call to France. The truth is, the real design of this second embassy was now completed in the celebration of Queen Mary's nuptials with Philip, which was no sooner finished, than her Majesty sent the Lords Paget and Hastings to conduct her cousin into England. Accordingly he set out in September, 1554, but being detained by contrary winds at Calais 'till November, he did not cross the water 'till the twenty-first of that month; when arriving at Dover he went thence by land to Gravesend, where being met by the Bishop of Ely, and the Earl of Salisbury, who presenting him with the repeal of the act of his attainder, that had passed the day before (99), he went on board a yacht, which carrying the cross, the ensign of his Legation, at her head, conveyed him to Whitehall, where he was received with the utmost veneration by their Majesties; and after all possible honour and respect paid to him there, he was conducted to the Archbishop's palace at Lambeth, the destined place of his residence, which had been sumptuously fitted up by the Queen for the purpose †. On the 27th he went to the Parliament, and made a long and grave speech, inviting them to a reconciliation with the Apostolick See, from whence, he said, he was sent by the common Pastor of Christendom to reduce them, who had long strayed from the inclosure of the Church (rr). On the 29th the Speaker reported to the Commons the substance of this speech; and a message coming from the Lords for a conference, in order to prepare a supplication to be reconciled to the See of Rome, it was consented to, and the petition being agreed on, was reported and approved by both houses; so that being presented by them on their knees to the King and Queen, these made their intercession with the Cardinal, who thereupon delivered himself in a long speech, at the end of which he granted them absolution. This done, all went to the royal chapel, where Te Deum was sung on the occasion (ss). Thus the Pope's authority being now restored, the Cardinal two days afterwards made his publick entry into London, with all the solemnities of a Legate (tt), and presently set about the business of reforming the Church, of what they called heresy. How much soever he had formerly been suspected to favour the Reformation (uu); yet he seemed now to be much altered, knowing the court of Rome kept a jealous eye upon him in this respect. He therefore expressed great detestation of them, nor did he converse much with any that had been of that party *. He came over into England, much changed from that freedom of conversation he had formerly practised. He was in reserve to all, spoke little, and put on an Italian temper, as well as behaviour; making Priuli and Ormaneto, two Italians whom he brought with him, his only confidants (ww). In the mean time, the Queen dispatched Embassadors to Rome, to make obedience in the name of the whole kingdom to the Pope; who had already proclaimed a Jubilee on that occasion (xx). But these messengers had scarcely set foot on Italian ground, when they were informed of the death of Julius, and the election of Marcellus his successor (yy); and this Pontiff dying also soon after (zz), the Queen upon the first news of it, recommended her kinsman to the pope-dome, as every way the fittest person for it (aaa); and dispatches were accordingly sent to Rome for the purpose, but they came too late, Peter Caraffa, who took the name of Paul IV. being elected before their arrival (bbb). This Pope who had never liked our Cardinal, was better pleased with the bishop of Winchester, whose temper exactly tallied with his own. In this disposition he favoured Gardiner's views upon the see of Canterbury (ccc). Nor was Pole's nomination to that dignity confirmed by his Holiness, 'till after the death of this rival (ddd). The Queen however; confiding in Pole for the management and regulation of ecclesiastical affairs (eee), granted him a licence to hold a synod on the second of November, 1554 (fff). In this convention, the Legate proposed the next year a book he had prepared, containing such regulations as he judged might be the best means of extirpating heresy (ggg); these were passed in the form of twelve decrees, and they are so many proofs of his good temper, which disposed him not to set the Clergy upon persecuting the hereticks, but rather to reform themselves, and seek to reclaim others by a good example, as the surest method to bring back the stragglers into the fold [P].

How

(yy) Julius died March 20th, and Marcellus was elected the 9th of April. Cicon. de Vitis Pontif. col. 358, 309.

(zz) One day, as he sat musing after dinner upon the difficulties and dangers of his situation, he laid his hand upon the table, saying, I don't see how they can be saved that hold this high dignity; whereupon he fell into a languishing disorder, and died in ten days, viz. on the first of May. Claron; and Burnet, Vol. II. p. 310. (aaa) This was unknown to Pole, who was then negotiating a peace with the French King at Ardres near Calais, together with Gardiner, Arundel, and Paget, to whom Mary's letter was directed, desiring them to apply to the Cardinal of Lorraine for that monarch's interest. See the letter in Burnet's Collections; 'tis dated May 30, 1st and 2d year of our reign.

[P] To bring the stragglers into the fold ] The subject matter of these decrees we have in Burnet (64), who, after that which directs the clergy in conferring benefices not to be biased by partial affection, tells us, that 'in this Pole himself was a great example; for that he had an only brother (as, says he, I find him called, in one of the Cardinal's commissions to him, with some others, though I believe he was a bastard brother) David, and had continued all King Henry's time in his archdeaconry of Derby. He, either to punish him for his former compliance, or to shew he had no mind to raise his kindred, did not advance him, 'till after he had been two years in England, and then gave him only the bishoprick of Peterborough, one of the poorest of the bishopricks; which, considering his alliance to the crown, and high birth, was a very small preferment.' But upon this passage Mr Fulman remarks, that 'David was not the Cardinal's brother, nor yet a bastard; there being no bull of dispensation in his favour among those sent over at that time (65).' We have an account of this Bishop in Mr Wood, who apparently having seen Burnet's account with Fulman's remark upon it, expresses himself cautiously thus: 'David Pole, or Poole, says he, of noble race, as it seems, some say bastard-brother to Cardinal Pole, became Fellow of All souls college in 1520, proceeded in Law, and commenced Doctor in 1527; being then archdeacon of Salop, and esteemed for his great knowledge † Cranmer was in prison, attainted of high treason, and the Archbishoprick sequestred.

* 'Tis said Secretary Cecil, was the only person of the reformed, that our Cardinal conversed with. Burnet, Vol. II.

(bbb) He was chosen May 20. Claron. ubi supra.

(ccc) Godwin, ubi supra.

(ddd) Gardiner died Nov. 13, 1555, and the Pope's Bull of provision for Pole bears date 3 id. of Decemb. that year. Regist. Pole, fol. 1.

(eee) See Gardiner's article.

(fff) Burnet.

(ggg) This book was afterwards printed with the title of the Reformation of England, by the Decrees of Cardinal Pole, and is now inserted into the Collections of the Councils.

(99) The King and Queen went to the House before the usual time, on purpose to pass it. Vita Poli, p. 54.

(rr) This made some motion in the Queen, which she vainly thought was a child quickned in her belly. Which redoubled the joy, some not sparing to say, that, as John Baptist leaped in his mother's belly at the salutation of the Virgin; so hers the like happiness attended the salutation of Christ's Vicar.

(ss) Vita Poli, p. 55 to 61.

(tt) The cross was now first carried before him, which could not be done 'till the Pope's authority was restored by Law.

(uu) Sleidan tells us, that they who knew his manner both of talking and acting before, were greatly surprized to see him act this part, having promised themselves very different things from him. Sleidan H. B. Lib. xxv. p. 765.

(ww) Id. ibid.

(xx) Vita Poli, p. 63, 64.

(64) History of the Reformation, as before.

(65) Appendix to the History of the Reformation, p. 325. 4th edition.

* Under Gardiner's article.

(b b b) Cranmer was burnt March 21, and Pole was consecrated March the 22d. and Mr Wood tells us it had been assigned a fortnight before. Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 120.

(i i i) Wood says on the 25th, being Lady-day.

How unfuitably to the temper of these decrees, he was prevailed upon to act in many instances afterwards, has been already mentioned to his disgrace, in the course of this work*. The same thing is confessed also by Burnet, who moreover plainly suggests his belief of the report, that Cranmer's execution was of Pole's procuring. It is indeed something remarkable, that tho' the Cardinal had his conge d'eslire, as well as two bulls dispatched from Rome, for the Archbishoprick of Canterbury, some months before Cranmer's death; and deferred his consecration thereto, apparently because he thought it indecent whilst Cranmer lived; yet he chose to have it done the very next day after that Prelate's execution [Q] (b b b); when it was performed by the Bishops of London, Ely, Lincoln, Rochester, and St Asaph, in the Church of the Grey Friars at Greenwich. On the 28th (i i i); he went in state to Bow Church, where the Bishops of Worcester and Ely, after the former had said mass, put the pall upon him. Thus invested he went into the pulpit, and made a sermon about the origin, use, and matter of that vestment (k k k), and on the 31st of the same month, he was installed by his Commissary (l l l). In November, the same year, 1556, he was elected Chancellor of the University of Oxford, and soon after of Cambridge; and in the beginning of the year following, he visited both by his Commissaries, reforming them in the sense of those times, but not without committing some uncommonly inhuman prosecutions [R]. We have already observed how unacceptable he

(k k k) Burnet observes the pall was a device set up by Pope Pafchal II. in the beginning of the XIIIth century, for the engaging of all Archbishops to a more immediate dependence upon that see, they being, after taking the pall, to act as the Pope's Legates-born, Legati nati.

(l l l) Who Wood says was a Proctor, named Collins. Ibid. col. 121.

WAS

(66) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 697. from Godwin, in Episc. Petrib. and Bishop Andrews, in Tortura Torti, &c. &c. p. 146.

(67) History of the Reformation, Vol. II. where it is also observed, that he had come over a Cardinal Deacon, and was last year made a Priest, and now Archbishop.

(68) In the Appendix.

(69) Jortin's Life of Erasmus, P. 392.

knowledge in the civil and canon law. He was afterwards made Dean of the Arches, and Chancellor of the diocese of Lichfield and Coventry, and at length was consecrated to the see of Peterborough, Aug 15th 1557, but was deprived in 1559, for denying the Queen's [Elizabeth's] supremacy, and imprisoned; yet was soon set at liberty by the Queen's clemency; and being esteemed a very quiet subject, was courteously treated by all persons among whom he lived, and at last died upon one of his own farms, in a good old age, in 1568. He left his library of books then at London and Peterborough, to All-souls college (66)*.

[Q] He was consecrated to the see of Canterbury the next day after Cranmer's death] Burnet observes, that though Cranmer was legally divested of the Archbishoprick by the bill of attainder, and that the profits were sequestered into Pole's hands, yet he was not formally degraded, and was still esteemed Archbishop of Canterbury, the Queen not intending to put him to death. And upon this occasion, the words of Elijah to Ahab were applied to Pole. Thou hast killed, and also taken possession. And indeed, continues that historian, the suspicion of his having advised Cranmer's execution is the foulest blot of his life, and that which will remain a stain upon his memory (67). Yet the remarker upon Burnet (68) says, he thinks he can clear Pole from this suspicion by his own manuscript letters to Cranmer, for which purpose he quotes the following passage from one of them; wherein he professes to have Cranmer's safety so much at his heart, that if by any means he could deliver him from the condemnation both of body and soul, which, unless he repented, was impendent upon him, he should prefer it (calling God to witness) before the greatest riches or honours.

Ea est mea salutis tua cura ac studium, ut si te ab horribili illa que tibi, nisi respicias, impendet non solum corporis, sed anime etiam mortis sententia, ullo modo liberare possem, id profecto omnibus divitiis atque honoribus, qui cuiquam in hac vita contingere possunt, (Deum testor) libentissime anteponebam. But a late writer thinks that these expressions do not clear the Cardinal so much as this anonymous annotator imagines. It was easy, says he, to appear generous and charitable as far as words would go (69). Perhaps this last opinion may be thought to be countenanced by Bacatelli, who mentions the Cardinal's writing twice to Cranmer, persuading him to recant; and that when he gave some hopes of it, Pole obtained his pardon from the Queen; notwithstanding he was obnoxious to her Majesty, both on a publick and private account: but upon his retracting that recantation, he suffered the law. 'Non minore antea quoque curam & studium Polus adhibuerat, ut saluti Thomæ Cranmeri, qui ante se Archiepiscopus Cantuariensis fuerat, quique tum Oxonii—in custodia asservabatur, consulere; et eumque bis etiam scriperat, si posset, pravis ejus opinionibus contra sacramentum altaris & primum Pontificis Romani confutatis, ad fanaticam illum perduceret. Cujus rei magnam quidem spem initio illi dederat, eique veniam Polus ab ipsa Regina impetraverat, quanquam ea non publico solam sed etiam privato nomine illi meritissimo jure esse infensa. Verum postea cognita ejus simulatione ad quam natus & factus esse videbatur, & qua omnibus in rebus tota vita usus semper fuerat*, ea tandem poena est affectus, quæ ejus regi legibus in hæresim constituta erat, vivulque crematus est (70)*.

[R] Committing some inhuman prosecutions.] The Commissioners sent to Oxford, were Brooks, Bishop of Gloucester; Cole, Dean of St Paul's; and the Cardinal's trusty servant Ormanet. The purport of their commission was to restore the Pope's authority, and to enquire if there were any who neglected the Popish ceremonies, and upon the least suspicion to eject them. Under this commission they raged against a great many in the university, and burnt all the English Bibles, and such other heretical books as they found, in the publick market-place. They also made a process against Peter Martyr's wife, that lay buried in one of the churches there. And she being a foreigner that understood no English, no witnesses were to be found that had heard her utter any heretical points. Hereupon they gave notice thereof to the Cardinal, who wrote back, that her body should be taken up, because it lay near that of St Fridewide jacebat corpus sanctissimæ Fridewide hæreticæ uxoris. This was accordingly done (71), and her body buried in a dunghill. Melchior Adamus (72) gives her the character of an excellent matron, and says the Cardinal had been a particular friend to her husband before his last departure from Italy; but then he broke the friendship, and entirely threw off the mask of Lutheranism which he had wore for some time.

To Cambridge was also sent Ormanet, with Scot Bishop of Chelster, and the two Bishops elect of Lincoln and Chichester, Watson and Christopherson, who practised the like severities against heretics and heretical books, as those at Oxford. And, particularly, on their arrival, on the 11th of January, they put the churches of St Mary's and St Michael's under an interdict, because the bodies of Bucer and Fagius, two heretics, were laid in them; after which they proceeded against them in the following formal course of law: The bodies were cited to appear, or if any would come in their names; they were required to defend them; after three citations, the dead bodies not rising to speak for themselves, and none coming to plead for them (for fear of being sent after them) the visitors thought fit to proceed. And, January 26th, the Bishop of Chelster made a speech, shewing the earnestness of the university to have justice done; to which the Commissioners, though most unwillingly, were pleased to condescend. Therefore, having examined many witnesses of the heresy that Bucer and Fagius had taught, they adjudged them obstinate heretics, and appointed their bodies to be taken out of the holy ground, and to be delivered to the secular power. The writ being accordingly brought from London on the 6th of February, their bodies were taken up, and carried in coffins, and being tied to stakes, with many of their books, and other heretical writings, were all burnt together (73).

Yet, after all, impartiality obliges us to do so much justice to our Cardinal-Chancellor, that he took care to have the statutes, at least at Oxford, revised, and some

* This abuse of Cranmer is one of the calumnies upon our Reformers, with which Bacatelli is charged, as has been observed by his editor.

(70) Vita Poli, p. 71, 72.

(71) Historia de exhumatione Katharion, nupr Uxoris Petri Martyris, by James Calfhill, D. D. 1562, 8vo. who observes also, that her body was taken up again in Queen Elizabeth's time, and mixed with St Fridewide's bones, that they might run their fortunes together in all future times. See also Strype's Life of Archbishop Parker, chap. v.

(72) Melchior Adami Vita Pet. Martyris, p. 20.

(73) Burnet, who likewise observes, that in Queen Elizabeth's time publick honours were done at this university to the merits of these two learned men.

some

was to Paul IV. who now sat in the Papal chair, and the war which England was drawn into with France, this year by King Philip, furnished the haughty Pontiff with a pretence for gratifying his ill-will to the Legate. He had passionately espoused the quarrel of the French Monarch, and being inflamed to see England siding against his friend, he resolved to revenge it on Pole (mmn). In this spirit having declared openly that it might now be seen how little the Cardinal regarded the Apostolic see, when he suffered the Queen to assist their enemies against their friends. He first made a decree in May, for a general revocation of all Legates and Nuncio's in the King of Spain's dominions, Cardinal Pole being mentioned among the rest; and tho' he was diverted from carrying this project into execution for the present, by the representations of Sir Edward Carne, then the English Ambassador at Rome; yet upon the fatal blow given to the French at St Quintin (nnn), and the ill success of his own forces in Italy (ooo), his wrath burst out with fresh fury, he became utterly implacable, accused Pole as a suspected heretic, summoned him to Rome to answer the charge, and depriving him of the Legatine powers, conferred them upon Peyto, a Franciscan Friar [S]; whom he had sent for to Rome, and made a Cardinal for the purpose, designing him also to the see of Salisbury (ppp). This appointment was made in September, and the new Legate was actually on the road for England, when the bulls came to the hands of Queen Mary, who having been informed of their contents by her Ambassador, laid them up without opening them, or acquainting her cousin with them; in whose behalf she wrote to the Pope, and assuming some of her father's spirit, she wrote also to Peyto, forbidding him to proceed in his journey, and charging him at his peril not to set foot upon English ground. But notwithstanding all her caution to conceal the matter from the Cardinal, it was not possible to keep it long a secret, and he no sooner became acquainted with the holy Father's pleasure, or if you will his displeasure, than out of that implicit veneration, which he constantly and unalterably preserved for the Apostolic see, he voluntarily laid down the ensigns of his Legatine power, and forbore the exercise of it; dispatching his trusty minister Ormaneto to Rome, with letters wherein he cleared himself in such submissive terms, as 'tis said even mollified and melted the obdurate heart of Paul (qqq). The truth is, the Pontiff was brought into a better temper by some late events, which turned his regard from the French towards the Spaniard [T], and the storm against Pole blew over entirely, by a peace that was concluded this year (rrr), between his Holiness and Philip; in one of the secret articles of which, it was stipulated that our Cardinal should be restored to his Legatine powers. But he did not live to enjoy the restoration a full twelvemonth, being seized with a double quartan ague, which carried him off the stage of life early in the morning, of the 18th of November, 1558 (sss). His death is said to be hastened by that of his royal mistress and kinswoman, Queen Mary; which as if one star governed both their natures, happened about sixteen hours before (lll). His body being put into a leaden coffin, lay forty days in great state, at Lambeth; after which, it was conveyed thence with as great funeral pomp to Canterbury, and interred with solemnity on the North side of Thomas à Becket's chapel, in that cathedral (uuu). Over his grave there was erected a tomb, on which were inscribed only these three words, as sufficient to his fame, Depositum Cardinalis Poli (www). As to his character; in his person, he was of a middle stature and compact, tho' slender habit; his complexion was fair, agreeably tinged with red, and his beard yellow in his youth. He had a large open countenance, enlivened with a cheerful and pleasant eye, a true index of the temper, which (mmn) Bacatelli says, Pole always studied to promote peace, and wrote to Paul to that effect which he sent as a monition to do his duty. P. 74.

(nnn) King Philip came over from Flanders about the 20th of May, in order to persuade Mary to enter into the war against France, by which was declared June 7th by the Queen, who sent 3000 men to Philip's assistance, by which means he obtained the victory at St Quintin soon after. Burnet, Vol. II.

(ooo) Upon the defeat at St Quintin the Duke of Guise withdrew his troops from Italy, whereupon the Duke d'Alva entered and laid all waste there. Id. ibid.

(ppp) He was actually made Bishop of that see soon after, on the death of Dr John Salcot, or Capon, Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 686.

(qqq) Bacatelli, Godwin, Burnet.

(rrr) D'Alva's submission was made on the 14th of September, and the news arrived in England October 6th. Burnet, P. 354.

(lll) Id. ibid. and Bacatelli says it was ad tertiam noctis horam. Vita Poli, p. 83. During his illness he often inquired after her Majesty.

(lll) Godwin observes, that such another coincidence happened to his predecessor at Canterbury, called Deus dedit, who expired on the same day with Ercombert King of Kent.

(uuu) Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 122.

(www) Godwin, ubi supra.

some new ones added, for the better regulation of the university, which flourished more in his time, than either before, under King Edward, or after, under Queen Elizabeth; as appears by a passage in the preface to those statutes, revised and published under Archbishop Laud's Chancellorship, where, speaking of what had been done before in that way, the authors express themselves in these terms Edwardo sexto ad clavem sedente novo sudatum est molimine, &c. Prescribente Rege & lenocinante novitate, primo visum opus admitti, &c. Paulo post potentii rerum Maria sub Cardinalis Poli auspiciis idem recruduit labor. Novæ exinde datæ leges, sed pari cum prioribus angustia; interim tamen inter incerta vacillans statuta vigoit academia, colebantur illudia, enituit disciplina, & optanda temporum felicitate tabularum defectum refarcivit innatus candor, & quicquid legibus deerat, moribus suppletum est. Decurrente temporum ferie & vitiis & legibus pariter laboratum est.

It is remarkable that this passage was charged upon Archbishop Laud at his trial, as reflecting on the Reformation, by dignifying Queen Mary's, and depressing King Edward the Sixth's reign, with that of Queen Elizabeth and her successors. But his Grace answered, that the preface was none of his; and if it had been, yet the words related only to the statutes of the university of Oxford in those times, not to the church and religion (74).

(74) Canterbury's doom, p. 420 & tria. 548.

[S] Peyto, a Franciscan friar] This friar was descended from an ancient family of his name at Chesterton in Warwickshire, educated for a time, among the Grey Friars at Oxford, and afterwards became Chaplain and Confessor to Queen Katherine, in whose behalf he boldly reproved Henry the Eighth to his face, when he was about to divorce her: he also withstood the King's marriage with Anne Boleyn (75), which, at length, occasioned an attainder to be brought against him. But upon the accession of Queen Mary, she not only procured his attainder to be repealed, but recalled him from his exile, and made him her Confessor. In 1557 he was made Cardinal and Legate as abovementioned to thwart Pole; but upon the Pope's reconciliation to the Cardinal, Peyto being forbidden to enter into England, staid in France 'till his death, which happened in April 1558. He had the character of a pious and devout person, but unacquainted with business, and no ways fit for the dignity of a Cardinal (76).

(75) See Stowe's Annals, under the year 1553.

(76) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 626-637. See more, of him in Historia Minor Provincie Angliæ Fratrum Minorum, in the first tome of the Scholasticæ and Historical Works of Francis à Sancta Clara, sect. 25. P. 53.

[T] An incident turned his mind towards the Spaniard.] There is scarcely in all the History of the Popes, any instance equal to this of the superstitious veneration that was paid to the Apostolick see. The Duke d'Alva, the Spanish General, had ravaged the Pope's dominions, and reduced him to the last extremity; yet the Pontiff, conquered by extreme resolution, haughtily declaring he would suffer any death rather than yield to a surrendry. The Duke, seized with the dreadful apprehensions of spilling the blood of Christ's Vicar, yielded on his side to a surrendry, and even submitted to ask pardon of his Holiness upon his knees*.

* Burnet.

which was sweet and placid, of the inhabitant within. Tho' his constitution was not strong, yet in general he enjoyed a good state of health, which however was sometimes disordered by a catarrh, that fell upon one of his arms, and brought an inflammation into both eyes. He used a spare diet, eating only on plain dishes; tho' he always kept a table suitable to his station and quality, which even rose to a kingly magnificence, when there was occasion. Yet he was a good oeconomist, and his expences were constantly proportioned in general to his revenues. In his dress he called for little help, and often rose out of bed, and dressed himself without any attendants. In regard to the qualities of his mind and manners; he was a learned [U], eloquent, modest, humble, and good natured man; of exemplary piety and charity, as well as a generosity becoming his birth [W]. Tho' by nature he was more inclined to study and contemplation, than to an active life, yet he was prudent and dextrous in business; so that he would have been a finished character, had not his superstitious devotion to the see of Rome, carried him against his nature to commit several cruelties in persecuting the Protestants (xxx) [X]. During his last illness he

(xxx) Bacatelli, Godwin.

[U] He was learned and eloquent.] This is allowed by the greatest enemies to his fame, and indeed is evident beyond all contradiction from his writings; which, however, it cannot be denied, with regard to the stile, that as in his younger days he affected too much the Asiatic luxuriance, so, afterwards, when he saw his error, he sunk rather into the other extreme of flatness. His works in print are, 1. Pro Unitate Ecclesiastica ad Henricum octavum, Romæ 1536, fol. 2. Oration or Speech in Parliament, Nov. 27, 1554 (77). 3. Letter to Pope Julius III. touching the Restoration of the Realm of England (78). 4. Unitatis Ecclesiasticæ Defensio ad Hen. 8. lib. 4. Argentorat. 1555, fol. and again at Ingolst. 1587, 8vo. 5. Unitatis Ecclesiasticæ Defensio ad Edwardum Henrici filium. This is set by way of preface to the former book. *Tis said the Cardinal entertained hopes of restoring England to the see of Rome on the accession of Edward to the throne; and that he sent one of his domestics, Richard Hilliard, an Englishman, on this errand to that Prince (79). 6. Oratio in materia de pace, Venet. 1558, 4to. 7. Reformatio Angliæ ex decretis Reg. Poli An. 1556. Rom. 1562, 4to. and again at Louvain 1569, 8vo. 8. De Concilio, lib. 1. Rom. 1562, 4to. again at Louvain 1567, fol. again ibid, 1569, 8vo. It is likewise inserted in Canones & Decreta Concilii Tridentini, by Phil. Labbé, Paris. 1667, fol. 9. De baptismo Constantini Imperatoris, printed with the former book. 10. De summi Pontificis officio & potestate, Louv. 1569, 8vo. This was written by way of dialogue, in the conclave of Cardinals, when they were electing him Pope. He also wrote five other books on the same subject, when he was out of the conclave. 11. A Treatise of Justification, Louv. 1569; to which are added the following translations by him, viz. the sixth session of the general council of Trent, which is of Justification; with the canons of the same session. A Treatise of St Austin, of faith and works. A Sermon of St Chrysostom of praying only unto God. A Sermon of St Basil, of fasting. Certain Sermons of St Leo the Great, on the same argument. A notable Sermon of St Cyprian, on almsdeeds. Besides these he left the following manuscripts: Of Restoring the goods to the Church, lib. 1. written to King Philip and Queen Mary. De Natali Die Christi, lib. 1. Comment. in Esaiam. Comment. in Davidis hymnos, with other, of some books of the scripture, particularly on St Paul's epistles, but imperfect. Catechismus. Dialogus de passione Christi, &c. De modo concionandi, a large volume, but imperfect. Epistola ad Jacob. Sadoletum & alios. He also wrote three homilies, which were put into Latin; and had been several years collecting various readings, emendations, and castrations, &c. of Cicero's works, with intention to publish a compleat copy of them, but was prevented by his death, and the papers are now lost (80). We are told by Mr Strype, that Pole wrote a book about 1530, to persuade King Henry to continue the negotiation of his marriage with Anne Boleyn, which was perused by Cranmer (81).

[W] His generosity becoming his birth.] Bacatelli gives the following instances of his temper. That he was a very kind master to his domestics, but he never suffered any of them to take presents, as is the custom of the English: that in his second Legation, four thousand aurei * being paid to him at Trent, to support his expences, he distributed the money among his servants, according to the merit and station of each.

That a certain lady having left him by her will nine thousand aurei, he would not touch the money, but bestowed it on her niece at her marriage. That in a town, the royalty of which fell to him as Cardinal, he set up a woollen manufactory to employ the poor. These are proofs of it. The same author adds some others, which shew a true spirit of magnanimity. When his life was attempted at Viterbo, by three Italian ruffians, who were secured and sent to prison for it, he freely forgave them, and ordered them to be discharged. In the same spirit, when two Englishmen who had been sent by Henry the Eighth to murder him, were seized at Capranica, where he had retired, in order to avoid the scorching heat of the summer; he would not consent to have them put to death, and suffered them only to be sent for a few days to the galleys. It is also mentioned to his honour, that he never asked for any thing, not even though it was his right; nor could he be prevailed with by his friends to apply for the Earldom of Warwick, which, no doubt, would have been granted by Mary, since it would have devolved upon him as next heir, had not that Earl been attainted by Henry the Eighth (82).

[X] His devotion to the Church of Rome drew him to commit several cruelties in persecuting the Protestants.] Burnet also acknowledges this charge; but imputes these sanguinary proceedings to the Pope, pitying the Cardinal's weakness, in not having courage enough to contend with so haughty a Pope as Paul IV. was, who thought of no other way of bearing down heresy, but by setting up the Inquisition every where; and indeed a commission of enquiry was issued in this reign something like it, and seemed to be intended as an introduction to it (83). But it does not appear that the Cardinal had any hand in advising or consenting to that commission, or even that he consented to it, and perhaps it might be done without his privacy. *Tis more than probable, that he hindered the Jesuits from coming among us in this reign. This mungrel order had been erected about twelve years before, in the view of adding a firm support to the see of Rome; to which, besides the usual oaths of other Regulars, they swore an implicit universal obedience. Therefore, knowing how superstitiously devoted Pole was to support that see, there was reason enough to hope for his countenance and protection in England, upon which, as a good morfel, they presently fixed their eyes. To this end, they got a petition put into the Cardinal's hands, wherein they suggested to him, that whereas the Queen was restoring the goods of the Church that were in her hands, it was but to little purpose to raise up the old foundations, since the Benedictine order was become rather a clog than a help to the Church. They therefore desired that those houses might be assigned to them for maintaining schools and seminaries, which they would set on quickly; and they did not doubt, by their dealing with the consciences of those who were dying, they should soon recover the greatest part of the goods of the Church. But the Cardinal rejected this proposal (84), and indeed it seems not to be pennued with that artful address for which this order is distinguished; since Pole was known particularly devoted to the Benedictines, and was patron and protector at Rome of that order (85). Thus we owe it to Cardinal Pole, that we were preserved from the Jesuits in Queen Mary's reign; and that mischiefous brood have never had an opportunity of procuring an establishment in England since. Bishop Burnet scruples

(77) It is printed in Fox's Acts and Monuments under that year.

(78) This is also printed in Fox, and is dated the last day of Novemb. 1554.

(79) Vita Poli, p. 95, 96.

(82) Vita Poli, p. 86, 87, 88, 89, 93, 99.

(80) Ath. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 122.

(81) Memorialis of Cranmer, lib. ii. c. 2. p. 6. edit. 1694, fol. Verum sit fides penes auctorem.

* Ducato.

(83) See the Commission in Burnet. Collections, No. 32. It is dated Feb. 8. in the 3d and 4th year of Philip and Mary.

(84) Idem, Vol. 11. p. 328.

(85) Vita Poli, p. 43.

he made his will, wherein he appointed his best beloved friend, Aloysi Priuli, his sole executor, and testamentary heir. But that Italian was of a more noble temper, than to enrich himself by his friend's wealth whom he survived only twenty months, which time was wholly spent in collecting the Cardinal's effects, that lay dispersed in diverse countries; and having discharged all the legacies, he gave away the remainder in such a manner, as he knew to be most agreeable to the Cardinal's mind, reserving to himself only the breviary and diary, particularly endeared to him by his friend's frequent use of them (yyy). Indeed the Cardinal was not a man to raise a fortune, being by the greatness of his birth and his excellent virtues, carried far above such mean designs. So that the Archbishoprick was little advantaged by him, only in a grant which he obtained from Queen Mary, of the Patronage of nineteen parsonages for it; all that he did besides, was endowing it with some houses built by him, and a ground-rent on the East side of Lambeth. However, it is said that he designed, if he had lived, to have built a stately Archbishop's palace at Canterbury, to which church he gave two silver candlesticks gilt, very heavy; a silver incense pot, in the form of a ship, partly gilt; a silver mitre, adorned with jewels; a silver pastoral staff and cross, partly gilt; two pontifical rings set with jewels of great value; and a very large silver cistern for the holy water (zzz).

(yyy) Bacatelli. Baracti, who tells us also, that Priuli became acquainted with the Cardinal in 1532, and had such an entire friendship for him, that he refused a Cardinal's hat, because it would have separated him from this friend.

(zzz) Godwin.

scruples not to ascribe to our Cardinal such qualities, and such a temper, that if he could have brought the other Bishops to follow his measures, or the Pope and Queen to approve of them, he might probably have done much to have reduced this nation to Popery again. But God, continues that Historian, designed better things for it; so he gave up the Queen to the bloody counsels of Gardiner and the rest of the clergy. It was the only thing in which he was not led by the Cardinal. But she imputed his opinion in that particular, rather to the sweetness of his temper, than to his wisdom and experience; and he seeing he could do nothing of what he projected in England, fell into a languishing, first of his mind, that brought after it a decay of his health, of which he died. The Bishop proceeds to declare, that what mistakes soever his education, and heats with King Henry, and the disasters of his family, might have involved him in, it cannot be denied that he was a man of as great probity and virtue as most of the age, if not all of that Church in which he lived (86). 'Tis true, a late writer observes, that the Bishop has commended Pole in every respect, rather more than he deserves (87); and indeed he seems to be conscious of it himself, and expressly owns it in respect to the Cardinal's lenity; observing from Strype (88), that Parker calls the Cardinal Ecclesia Anglicanae carnifex & flagellum, the scourge and executioner of the Church of England. This is certainly an ardens verbum in that worthy Archbishop; and 'tis hoped the same apology will be accepted for some blackenings of the Cardinal's character, as well as some blanchings in that of Gardiner which have unluckily passed the press in this work (89). P

(86) History of the Reformation, Vol. II.

(87) Jortin's Life of Erasmus, p. 384.

(88) In his Antiquitates Britannicæ.

(89) See Gardiner's article.

POOLE. [MATTHEW], an eminent Nonconformist minister, was son of Francis Poole, Esq; [A] of York, by his wife, daughter of Alderman Toppin in that city (a), where he was born in 1624. Having laid a competent foundation of Grammar learning, he was sent to Emanuel College in Cambridge, and put under the tuition of Dr John Worthington*. He afterwards took the degree of Master of Arts there; and falling in with the Presbyterian opinions, concerning Ecclesiastical Polity, which then prevailed, he entered into the Ministry, and about the year 1648, became Rector of St Michael Le Querne in London (b). In 1654, he published a piece in 12mo, entitled, The Blasphemer slain with the sword of the Spirit: or, A Plea for the Godhead of the Holy Ghost, wherein the Deity of the Spirit is proved, against the Cavils of John Biddle (c). In 1657, in that act at Oxford, when the Protector Cromwell resigned that Chancellorship, and was succeeded therein by his son Richard (d), our author was incorporated Master of Arts of that University, and on the first of April, the following year, he projected a plan for maintaining at those places some choice students designed for the ministry [B]. In 1659, he wrote a letter, in one sheet 4to. to the Lord Charles Fleetwood, * What particular improvement he made is not here said; but the proofs of his classical genius in writing are, a poem, and two epitaphs on Jeremy Whitaker; two others upon the death of Mr Richard Vines; and another on the death of Jacob Stack.

(a) In the room of Dr Anthony Tuckney. Calamy.

(c) This author's 12 arguments against the Divinity of the Holy Ghost, had, together with his Confession of Faith touching the Three Persons, been reprinted the year before, so much altered and augmented (as the title declares) that they may justly seem new.

(d) Wood's Fasti, Vol. II. col. 114—118.

[A] Francis Poole, Esq;] This gentleman's father, who was descended from the ancient family of the Poole's of Sprinkhill in Derbyshire, being inclined to the Protestant religion at the Reformation, was obliged to leave that part of the country: after which, he lived first at a place called Sykehouse, and then settled at Drax-Abbey in Yorkshire (1).

[B] He projected a plan of education] This was published in 1658, 4to, with the following title. A model for the maintaining of students of choice abilities at the university, and principally in order to the ministry; together with a preface before it, and after it a recommendation from the university; and two serious exhortations, recommended unto all the unfeigned lovers of piety and learning, and more particularly to those rich men who desire to honour the Lord with their substance. As it was actually begun and put in execution in some instances, we shall give the main of it in the following heads.

1. That a subscription be made.

2. To prevent the mischiefs of a failure, those whose estates will bear it, are earnestly desired to subscribe for eight years, or more, or for ever.

3. That the money collected be disposed of by chosen trustees, not exceeding the number of fifty, whereof thirty to be gentlemen, or citizens of eminence, and twenty to be ministers, in or within five miles of London, of which number, seven to be a quorum, whereof, three to be ministers; and that the trustees do solemnly engage themselves to fidelity: and when any Minister who is a trustee dieth, or refuseth to act, or removeth ten miles from London, or by the rest of the trustees is judged to deserve dismissal from the trust, the rest, or any nine of them (general notice being given of the meeting, and the end of it) proceed to chuse another fit for it, by his piety, activity, publick spiritedness, and ingenuity, first taking an oath to act impartially in that choice; and the like method to be observed in filling up the vacancies of the lay trustees.

4. That

(a) Dr Calamy's Account of the Ministers silenced after the Reformation, p. 14. Vol. II. edit. 1713.

(1) Account of the Ministers silenced, &c. as above.

wood, which was delivered to him on the 13th of December, in reference to the juncture of affairs at that time. In the same view of supporting the Presbyterian power, he published

4. That a treasurer be chosen yearly, who shall be accountable to the trustees once a quarter; and that the treasurer's discharge shall be sufficient for any money that shall be paid, and not to dispose of any money without the direction of the trustees in a meeting, of which general notice is to be given in writing, which shall be registred in a book by one of the trustees appointed for that purpose.

5. That the trustees, or any five of them (whereof three to be ministers) appointed by the rest or any nine of the rest, &c. shall go about to schools, in or within twenty miles of the city of London, or thereabouts, and confer with the schoolmasters, and out of six of the most ingenious boys, being strictly examined, two of the best be chosen; and so to go from one school to another. And, in order to raise a subscription from all parts of England, which may enjoy the ministers thus bred, ingenious boys of any county to be capable of it. And therefore, if any lad of rare parts, from any place, be recommended, and found to be such, that care be taken to maintain him, and instruct him more perfectly in some eminent school where the trustees think fit, and send him to the university; or that for the present time (but no more) the students be picked out of the most ingenious scholars of the first or second year, that now are in the university, six out of twelve; and that more respect be had to their parts than to their learning, seeing learning may be added; and that for such as shall be chosen, if they have any parents, or such friends as have a power to dispose of them, both the students and their parents and friends shall promise in writing, that they will submit to the trustees for the education of such students, as to the manner and time of it, as both are expressed in the model.

6. That the boys so chosen be placed under tutors appointed by the trustees, which tutors to have four pounds yearly, for the tuition of each.

7. That the students shall have 10 l. 15 l. or 20 l. a year a-piece, allowed them at the discretion of the trustees, 'till they become A. B. and if need require, to be considered for the expence of their degree, as also for that of A. M. and after they are A. B. to be allowed 20 l. or 30 l. a year, as the trustees think fit. To be obliged to study to be eminent in the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, and other oriental languages; and in the several arts and sciences; still reserving a power to the trustees to consider the difference in the parts and dispositions of the lads, and to accommodate them accordingly, and that besides the ordinary university exercises, they be tied to others, as shall be thought fit by the trustees; as the making of speeches, verses, epistles, &c. in the languages, holding disputations, and making lectures in the Mathematics, Civil Law, &c.

8. That their allowance be continued for eight years, and that they intend and direct their studies toward the ministry. And that if the contributions shall be found sufficient to maintain more than twenty scholars for the ministry, some more eminently able be picked out from the rest, who shall be allowed to take Fellowships, and also have such allowance as the trustees shall judge meet, upon these conditions: First, that they be obliged to take no pupils but by the consent of the trustees, 'till they are A. M. and then not too many. Secondly, that as every one's genius leads him, and as he is judged fit, so he principally prosecute some one kind of study, one to be the Linguist, and principally for Greek and rabbinical learning; another the Historian and Antiquary; another the Philosopher and Mathematician; another the polemical Divine, one or more; another the practical and casuistical Divine; another the Universalist. Thirdly, that each of these employ themselves (when occasions shall require, and the trustees shall reasonably desire it) in such works as shall be useful and necessary. And if still the contributions shall more than suffice the already mentioned ends, that the rest be employed, as the trustees shall think fit, provided it be for the advancement of learning and piety. And whereas divers, after they have been four years at the university, are forced, through poverty, to go away before they commence A. B. or presently after, and to enter into the ministry while they are raw; that a special regard be had to such, as during those four years have most approved themselves, and are most eminent, both for learning and godliness, that they have an allowance for their degree, and also to support them at the university three or four years more, provided it be bestowed upon such bachelors as do truly intend to enter into the ministry.

9. That once a year the trustees, or any five of them appointed by the rest, whereof three to be ministers, go to the university, and there (with the help of some able university men) find out the proficiency of their several exhibitioners, that if any excel the rest, the trustees shall give them such encouragement as they shall see fit; and that if there be evidence of the idleness or dissoluteness of any, the trustees either then, or at any other time, after admonition or trial for a certain time longer, as they shall see fit, may withdraw the exhibition from them, and chuse others in their place.

10. That once a year there be picked out two or three of the students to come up to London, their charges being borne, to do some learned exercises in the city, for the satisfaction of the present contributors, and to excite new ones.

11. That there be an accurate method of studies prescribed for them, with some latitude for the variety of geniuses, that so no time may be lost that way.

12. That their tutors be desired to have a special eye upon them, as to their godliness; and to press a diligent attendance upon all means publick and private, conducing thereto.

13. That after eight years well spent there, the trustees and contributors do, by themselves and friends, endeavour to promote them to a place answerable to their merit.

14. That the addition or alteration of circumstances be left to the wisdom of the trustees, or any nine or more of them, whereof four to be ministers, provided that general notice be given of the meeting, and the design of it; provided also, that the substantial remain untouched, viz. the bringing up of eminent scholars at the university, in order to the ministry, and (in case of sufficient contributions) the leaving of others at the university, according to the eighth article.

15. That there be two or three chosen out of the university, who shall be intrusted to have some inspection over them.

16. That those of the trustees, who shall be chosen by the rest, for the publick work, shall have their charges borne; and that all charges incidental to the work, in the management of it, shall be allowed out of the stock.

17. Although the great aim of this business is to breed up such as may be pillars of the Church; yet, considering the deplorable condition of Ireland and Wales, and some desolate parts of England, the trustees, after provision made for the forementioned branches of the design, shall endeavour to provide for the maintenance of poor scholars (of competent abilities and good inclinations, though, it may be, not of eminent parts) at the university, allowing them as they think fit. And such lads, as also their parents and such friends as have the disposal of them before they be admitted, shall in writing engage themselves to be willing to submit to the discretion of the trustees, and be sent into Ireland or Wales, or some desolate parts of England, as the exigencies of the Church require; provided always, that they be not sent to any such places, unless there be competent encouragement for them, of which the trustees shall be judges.

18. The contributors in any counties of England are desired to take care for the payment of their monies in London quarterly.

At the end is subjoined a testimonial in favour of this model, signed by several heads of houses in Cambridge (2).

Our author appears to have been particularly fond of this scheme, and bestirred himself so diligently to compass it, that he procured a subscription of nine hundred pounds for the purpose; and some students

(2) Viz. John Worthington, John Arrow-smith, Anthony Tuckney, Benjamin Wichcot, Ralph Cudworth, and Will. Dillingham. then published also that year, in 4to. his Quo Warranto (e): A moderate Debate about the preaching of unordained Persons: Election, Ordination, and the Extent of the ministerial Relation, in vindication of the Jus Divinum Ministerii, from the Exceptions of a late piece intitled, The Preacher sent. In 1660 he took a share in the Morning Exercise [C], which was then set up by those of the London Clergy, who were thus puritanically inclined. The same year he printed a sermon upon John iv. 23, 24. preached before the Lord-Mayor of London, against re-establishing the Liturgy of the Church of England [D]; and refusing to comply with the Act of Uniformity in 1662, he incurred an ejection from his rectory; upon which occasion he printed a piece in Latin, entitled, Vox clamantis in deserto. However, he submitted to the Law with a commendable resignation. Being unmarried he was free from the charge of a family, and enjoying a paternal estate of 100 l. per annum (f), he sat down to his studies, resolving to employ his pen in the service of religion in general, without regard to the particular disputes among Protestants. In this view, meeting with suitable encouragement from all parties, he drew the design of a very laborious and useful work *, which was published by him in 1669, and the following years, under the title of Synopsis Criticorum Bibliorum [E]. In the midst of this employment he found leisure

(e) In the title-page 'tis said to be written by the appointment of the Provincial Assembly at London.

(f) Near Drax-abbey in Yorkshire.

* He also printed a specimen, which was approved particularly by Dr Lightfoot, who also offered him assistance in the work. Preface.

then at Cambridge, were, pursuant to the plan, supplied with money out of it (3). But however useful and suitable it might be for the time in which it was first offered to the publick, when the ignorance of the university was really deplorable enough; yet, at the Restoration, when those seminaries were restored to their former dignity, all such projects were superseded. Besides, the principles of our schemist, as also of his coadjutors, shew what Church he meant to support by his select pillars; which, becoming odious at the Restoration, instead of raising more choice pillars to secure it, all the old ones were taken away by the Act of Uniformity in 1662.

[C] He took a share in the Morning Exercise. Among the sermons published in the volumes of this Exercise, there is one of our author's upon the Satisfaction of Christ; another about the right method of application to the sick for their good, on the part of ministers and people: a third upon detraction; and a fourth against an external and infallible judge in the Church of God, in that against Popery.

[D] A sermon against the Liturgy. It was preached at St Paul's on the 20th of August this year, and printed with the title of Evangelical Obedience. In the preface, he declares his printing it was occasioned by several calumnies cast on him about it; one of which was, says he, that I wished their fingers might rot that played upon the organs. In answer to this he alleges, that he only expressed his dislike of organs under the head, that carnal worship is a great obstruction to edification; and the salvation of souls, he says, was by other things. 'Better all the organs in the world to be broken, than one soul lost (4). And again, in speaking to the distraction bred by this way to spiritual worship, which ought to be done without distraction, he writes thus: 'the more inveiglements there are to sense, the more disadvantage to the spirit. To instance in one thing, I appeal to the experience of any ingenuous person, whether curiosity of voice and musical sounds in churches does not tickle the fancy with a carnal delight, and engage a man's ear and most diligent attention unto those sensible motions and audible sounds, and therefore must necessarily, in great measure, recal him from spiritual communion with God; seeing the mind of man cannot attend to two things at once with all its might [to each], and when we serve God we must do it with all our might. And hence it is, that the Ancients have, some of them, given this rule; that even vocal singing [in churches] should not be too curious, sed legenti similiter quam canenti: and Paul himself gives it a wiper, Eph. v. 19. Speaking to your selves in psalms, and hymns, and spiritual songs, making melody in your hearts to the Lord.' We thought it not foreign to the design of these memoirs, to retail so much of our author's discourse, as a specimen of his abilities in the way of argument, which is part of the character of his genius as a preacher; and in the same view the following instance is produced, to shew of what kind were his persuasive talents. In recounting the signs of a carnal heart, in the spiritual worship of God, he gives this for one: 'When you come to a sermon, what is most pleasing to you? what do you like best, and hear with greatest attention? Is it some florid and elegant expression, some high and unusual notion, some historical passage, some acute sentence, and the like? or is it a spiritual discourse? a sin-discovers, and soul-affecting, and heart-breaking passage? He had just before complimented his brethren the Dissenters, upon account of these concerns, as humble, close-walking Christians (5). This sermon was reprinted in 1698, in 4to; with the title of A Reverſe to Mr Oliver's Sermon of Spiritual Worship.

[E] Synopsis Criticorum Bibliorum Our author no doubt, took the hint of this work, from the Polyglott Bible, and the Critici Sacri, then lately published. He was ten years in compiling it. It is worth while to see what Father Symon says of it; having passed his judgment, on the two just mentioned books, he proceeds to our author, whose method he commends, but thinks the talk above his abilities. 'Matthew Poole, says he, who printed this last collection, called Synopsis Criticorum, has indeed made a good collection of the authors which he has added, besides those in the Critici Sacri, which he has abridged. But he considered not that he undertook a work above him. He seems to have done well, in not following Father De la Haye's method, but he perceived not that he committed greater faults himself, by giving these same different versions of the Bible, as they are in the Latin translation of them; without considering that most of the varieties, which he sets down under the specious title of the Hebrew text, Samaritan, Chaldean, Syriac, and Arabic versions, were only invented by himself; who understood not any of those tongues.' In support of this animadversion, he observes, that our author 'censuring the confusedness of De la Haye's method, expressly declares of himself that he has begun all things anew, and consulted all things in the originals themselves. There is no one but would conclude, that a person who promises so great exactness, had read both the Jewish and Samaritan, Hebrew text; the Samaritan, Chaldee, Syriac, and other versions in their own proper tongues. But by the originals, which he had consulted, he understands nothing more than the Latin translations, both of those texts and versions; which fills his work with errors, that are impossible to be corrected, any other way than by beginning all anew. Thus, for example, with respect to various interpretations, he says, that it was otherwise in the Samaritan, than in the Hebrew, and yet it is certain, that the Hebrew and Samaritan, are in those places the same: this mistake is imputed to his not considering, how equivocal the Hebrew words are, whence he has multiplied variations without cause. In like manner he asserts the same of the Samaritan, Chaldee, Syriac, and Arabic versions, which differ not so often from the Hebrew text, as this author pretends they do. It is sufficient to take notice in general, without producing any instances, of this fault, which he very often commits.' Father Symon likewise complains, that the method of the Synopsis is a little intricate, and thinks that in giving the various expositions, he ought to have determined which was best in his opinion; but in this censure, he has not sufficiently considered our author's particular situation in England at that time, and his sentiments as a Nonconformist (6). The French critic also adds, that there are several frivolous repetitions in this work: 'in a word, says he, the method of this abridgment is intricate, and it requires a great deal of time to unravel all the different senses which have hardly any relation to each other. If any one considers but never so little, how the first word of

(5) Ibid. p. 22.

(6) Dr Pococke followed the same method, and was censured for it. See his defence in rem. [O O] of his article.

(3) Particularly Mr (afterwards Dr) Will. Sherlock, father to the present Bishop of London. See his article.

(4) P. 17. edit. 1698, 4to.

(g) The second edition was printed in Oxford, 1667, 8vo.

(b) This was reprinted several times; the last edition, corrected and amended, was printed in 1676. Besides these, he wrote a Seasonable Apology for Religion, on Matth. xi. 14. Lond. 1673, 4to.

(i) Mr Wood says, he retired for the free exercise of his religion. Ubi supra.

leisure to testify his zeal against Popery, in a treatise concerning the Infallibility of the Church [F], printed in 1666 (g), 8vo. which was followed by another the next year, in 8vo. entitled, Dialogues between a Popish Priest and an English Protestant, wherein the principal points and arguments of both Religions are truly proposed, and fully examined (b). The first of these pieces was reprinted in 1679. And the same year he observed his name in the list among those that were to be cut off, printed in the depositions of Titus Oates concerning the Popish Plot; and an incident which befel him [G] not long after, gave him so great an apprehension of his danger, that he thought proper to retire into Holland, where he died this year, about the middle of October (i), not without some suspicion of being poisoned. His body was interred in a vault which belongs to the English merchants at Amsterdam. Besides what he published, he left behind him a MS. of English Annotations on the Holy Scripture, which being carried on to the prophecy of Isaiah, the 50th and 60th chapters were afterwards added by Mr Jackson of Moulsey, and several persons, who were friends to our author's memory and religious sentiments, joined in undertaking to compleat the whole according to his plan, of the following shares, Dr Collings drew up the Notes on the rest of Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Lamentations; as also those on the four Evangelists, the two epistles to the Corinthians, and that to the Galatians, those to Timothy, Titus, Philemon, and the Revelations; Ezekiel, and the minor Prophets, were done by Mr Hurst; Daniel by Mr Cooper; the Acts by Mr Vinke; the epistle to the Romans by Mr Mayo; to the Ephesians by Mr Veale; to the Philippians and Colossians by Mr Adams; to the Hebrews by Mr Obadiah Hughes; the epistle of St James, the two

Genesis, In principio, is explained, I am persuaded he will agree to what I have said: the Padre however, does not conclude without taking notice of what is most commendable in this work, and that, he says, is the author's great pains in carefully gathering together, what was scattered up and down in several places, and putting every thing in it's proper place, abridging it for the reader's conveniency. We find for instance, continues he, many places of the Scripture explained by Bochart, both in his Phaleg, and Hierozyicon, without being at the trouble of turning over such large volumes; the difficulties also in chronology, explained by the best authors, are there abridged; so that most of the hard places of Scripture, upon which whole volumes have been composed, are well enough explained, since the author has taken the pains to read what he could find best upon difficulties of this kind, and to insert extracts thereof. It would, for example, have been fruitless to have reprinted the treatises in the two last volumes of the Critici Sacri; because most of those observations contained in them, are of no use in expounding Scripture; therefore it was very proper to extract out of those books, what was most conducing to that end. To these advantages mentioned by Father Symon, another advantage may be added, which is preserving the substance of some tracts, which would otherwise have been lost; as that of Dr Potter, upon the number of 666, of which here is an extract (7). To conclude, Father Symon's charge of ignorance upon our author, in respect to the oriental languages, can hardly be reconciled with the following passage in his preface to this work. Arabica versio quam quidem nullius esse præitii, nec textum Hebræum sed Græcum, eumque corruptum exprimere assertuit Arnoldus Bohnius in utroque certè falsus. Versionem enim illam non raro accuratam & fidam deprehendi, nec tam Græcam sed Syriacam sequi, quam ad verbum plerumque exprimit etiam in erroribus & ineptiis. To suppose our author asserting, as he does here, that he found (contrary to what Bohnius had maintained) the Arabic version accurate and faithful, and not to follow the Greek but the Syriac, and that for the most part, word for word; to suppose him, I say, entirely ignorant in both these, as well as the rest of the oriental languages, is a censure too harsh for common candour to digest.

[F] A treatise upon the Infallibility of the Church. The title runs thus. The nullity of the Romish faith: or a blow at the root of the Romish Church; being an examination of that fundamental doctrine of the Church of Rome; concerning the Church's infallibility, and of all those several methods, which their most famous and approved writers, have used for the defence thereof. Together with an appendix, tending to the demonstration of the solidity of the Protestant faith, wherein the reader will find all the material objections and cavils, of their most considerable writers, discussed and answered by way of remarks upon Capt. Robert Everard's epistle, and his late account of his submission, and pretended conversion to the Romish Church, and upon Mr Cressy's

Exomologesis, by Matthew Poole, Minister of the Gospel, Oxford 1666, 8vo. and 1667, and again, London 1679, 8vo. In this treatise, chap. v. he treats of oral tradition, and the testimony of the present Church, which he calls another shift, lately invented by some subtle Romanists, to support the declining infallibility. Who those subtle Romanists here intended were, is seen by his proceeding to quote the words of Richworth in his Dialogues; Mr White in his treatise de Fide, and Apology for tradition, and Sancta Clara's Systema Fidei. He also puts Sir Kenelm Digby and Mr Holden in the same roll (8). He then proceeds to answer this new plea, which was one main if not the only reason of his entering into the controversy; 'since it was not at all considered by Mr Chillingworth, nor by Stillingfleet; nor indeed by any except the ingenious Lord Faulkland, who yet handles it in quite another way, and so hath left room for some gleanings after his harvest.' He expressly divides what he has to say in the appendix, into two heads; whereof the first is personal reflections, 'under which he allows he has used some harshness of expression against Captain Everard; and to this he says, he was obliged in discharge of his duty, which is to rebuke such as he υποτιμωσ sharply.' And indeed, the Captain's character, as he gives it drawn by his own pen, would have authorized perhaps more sharpness than is used by Mr Poole. 'When I professed myself, says Everard, against infant-baptism, I had run thro' almost, if not altogether, all the several professions of Christianity then appearing in this kingdom;' upon which our author observes, 'that it is no new thing, that a giddy-headed man should get a fall; and it is not strange, that he that loved to wander, should anti-quum obtinere; and having passed thro' all the varieties which England affords, should gratify his temper, and follow his inclinations to see what news at Rome (9).' Upon the whole, it is evident that Mr Poole wrote his controversial pieces, baud invita Minerva. He displays no mean degree of promptness, not to say liquorish sippancy in this way; and it is observable, that in his model for breeding choice ministers and pillars of the Church, whereas he confines each one to some one thing or branch of study, in the other parts of learning; yet he allows one or more in Polemical divinity.

[G] An incident befel him. The incident was this. Having passed an evening at Alderman Ashurst's, he took one Mr Chorley to bear him company home. When they came to the narrow passage, which leads from Clerkenwell to St John's Court, there were two men standing at the entrance; one of whom, as Mr Poole came along, cried out to the other, Here he is; upon which the other replied, Let him alone, for there is somebody with him. As soon as they were passed, our author asked his friend, if he heard what those men said; and upon his answering that he had, Well, replied Mr Poole, I had been murdered to-night, had not you been with me. It is said, that before this incident, he gave not the least credit to what was said in Oates's deposition (10).

(8) See the preface.

(7) See Vol. IV. Part II.

(9) Appendix, p. 4. second edit. Oxf. 1667.

(10) Calamy's Continuation, p. 16.

[H] Hi:

of St Peter, and that of St Jude, by Mr Veale; and the three epistles of St John by Mr Howe (k). These Annotations [H] were printed at London in 1685. in two Vols. folio.

(k) Q. Who did the Theſſalonians? Mr Wood, by miſtake, gives us the names of Bates, Jucomb, Clarkſon, and Alſop; as alſo of Dr Owen, as having a hand in this Work. Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 747.

[H] His Annotations ] Thoſe gentlemen tell us in the preface, ' that they had taken out of Mr Poole's Synopſis, as much as was proper for his deſign in this work, and made uſe of a great number of other authors; ſome of which he left out, or very little conſidered in his Synopſis, upon a deſign to make uſe of them in this Engliſh work;' and to this purpoſe it is obſervable, that he expreſſly declares he had not brought Calvin into his Synopſis (11). Dr Calamy informs us, that ' while he was engaged in both theſe laborious works; his common rule was to riſe very early in the morning, about three or four o'clock; and take a raw egg about eight or nine, and another about twelve, and then continue his ſtudies 'till the afternoon was pretty far advanced, when he went abroad, and ſpent the evening at ſome friend's houſe in chearful converſation. In which he obſerves he was very facetious, as well as very true to his friend.' And to crown his character, the ſame writer adds, that he was alſo very ſtrict in his piety, and univerſal in his charity (12). As to his learning, Mr Wood tells us, he left behind him; the character of Clariffimus Criticus & Caſuiſta (13).

(12) Continuation, ubi ſupra.
(13) Ath. Oxon. ubi ſupra.

POPE (Sir THOMAS), Knt. and founder of Trinity-College, in Oxford, was born [A] at Dedington (a) in Oxfordſhire, in the year 1508 (b). His father was William Pope, of the ſame place (c), who appears to have lived in the character and circumſtances of a gentleman [B], and of whoſe ſecond wife Margaret [C], daughter of — Yate, a gentleman of Stanford, in the abovementioned county, Sir Thomas was the iſſue. He received the firſt rudiments of grammatical learning at the publick ſchool at Banbury in Oxfordſhire [D], which afterwards he completed at Eton-College. Whether he was from thence removed to the Univerſity, I have not been able to diſcover. It may, however, be conjectured with ſome probability, both from his hand-writing, of which many ſpecimens remain in his college at Oxford, and from the buſineſs in which he was employed by Henry the Eighth, that he paſſed ſome of his younger years in the Inns of Court; or, at leaſt, that he was bred to ſome branch of the Law. However that be, he appears to have been a ſcholar. The promotion of this man from an inconfiderable fortune [E], and from an obſcure, although reputable, family, to riches and honour, ſeems to have been remarkably rapid, and demonſtrates no common ſhare of vigorous and active abilities. What was his firſt ſtep to Court, and to the notice of the King, we cannot find: but Sir Thomas was not more than twenty-eight years of age, when he had ſufficient intereſt to procure (d) the treaſurership of the court of Augmentations, upon the firſt eſtabliſhment of that court in the year 1535 [F]. This was a valuable office, and appears to have (a) Wood's Hiſt. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 301.

(b) This date is collected from an inſcription on his tomb, and from another on his picture, lately preſented by Trinity-college to the picture-gallery at Oxford.

(c) Wood, ubi ſupra. See notes [B] and [C].

(d) Collin's Barometrage, Vol. IV. p. 667.

[A] Was born, &c.] Fuller is greatly miſtaken, with regard to the place of his nativity. Among the Worthies of London, he tells us: ' Thomas Pope, Knt. was born in this city; as my worthy friend Dr Seth Ward, and others of the ſociety of Trinity-college in Oxford have informed me (1). ' But Dr Ward (however the reſt might be) was but little qualified to give information on this ſubject; as all the connection he had with the college, was that of being preſented to the Preſidentſhip of it by the Presbyterian viſitors, from which office he was removed in leſs than a year (2).

[B] Of a gentleman.] This is confirmed by the following abſtract from his Will; which will likewiſe throw ſome light on the condition in which he left his ſon. ' I bequeathe to the mother church of Lincolne 3 s. 4 d. My land, my wife to have the one halfe of the rent, and th' other halfe to be kept to th' uſe of my ſonne, 'till he be of lawfull age. Item, I bequeathe to Thomas Pope [the aforeſaid ſon] an hundred more; and to every daughter fourtie poundes; and if any of them dye, their part remaine to other; and to have a prieſt ſinging one yeare; and my wife and my ſonne to occupy my holdings, the which I hold now, as long as ſhe is widowe; and after, Thomas Pope to have the occupying and th' uſe of them. And reſidue of my goods I give to Thomas Pope my ſonne, Margaret my wife, &c. . . . Item, I bequeathe to the torches, the bellis, our Lady-beame, St Thomas-beame, to every of them 3 s. 4 d. Item, to Clifton chapel 6 s. 4 d. Item, to every god-child a ſhepe.' This will (3) is dated Feb. 2, 1520; and it was proved, in the year 1523; ſo that William Pope muſt have died while his ſon Thomas was very young.

[C] Margaret.] As a further proof and illuſtration of what is ſaid in the text, I ſhall inſert her epitaph. ' Here lyeth under this ſtone buried Margaret Buſtarde widowe, ſometyme the wyf of William Pope of Dedington in the county of Oxford, Gent. and afterward married to John Buſtarde, Gent. dwelling

at Atterbury in the ſaid county; which William and Margaret were father and mother to Syr Thomas Pope, Knight; and John Pope, Eſquier. And the ſaid Margt. deſcended out of this worlde the xxv day of Auguſt, 1557; and hopeth to riſe and lye agayne with Chriſte eternally (4).'

[D] The publick ſchool of Banbury, &c.] Of this he has himſelf informed us, in the ſtatutes of his college, viz. — ' Ex ſcholis, Etonenſi, vel Banburienſi: in quibus ipſe olim in grammaticæ rudimentis educatus fui (5). ' — From the ſchools of Eton, or Banbury, in which I myſelf was formerly educated in the rudiments of grammar. With regard to Banburyſchool, it may not be improper to obſerve, that, about the age of which we are now ſpeaking, it was a ſchool of particular note and eminence. Wood, in a manuſcript hiſtory of the freeſchools of England, which was never printed, and is now repoſited among his papers in the Aſhmolean Muſæum at Oxford (6), acquaints us, that Hugh Oldham, Biſhop of Exeter, and a munificent benefactor to Corpus-Chriſti-college in Oxford, founded a ſchool adjoining to the college in Manchester, and directed the Maſter and Uſher to teach the children grammar, after the form and manner of the ſchool of Banbury in Oxfordſhire, now there taught, and called Standbridge-grammar.

[E] Inconfiderable fortune.] Fuller, in his quaint manner, has obſerved much the ſame thing concerning him. ' I behold him as fortunaæ ſux fabrum, the ſmith who, by God's bleſſing, hammered out his own fortune without any patrimonial advantage. ' Indeed he lived in an age, which one may call the harveſt of wealth, wherein any one that would work might get good wages, &c (7).'

[F] Court of Augmentations.] It was eſtabliſhed for the buſineſs of eſtimating and ſelling the lands lately belonging to the monaſteries; it was diſſolved in the year 1553. The ſalary of Sir J. Williams, who was treaſurer of it in the reign of Edward VI. was 320 l. (8). A very conſiderable income at that time.

(4) From a braſs plate in the chancel of Wroxton church, Oxfordſhire.

(5) Cap. 7.

(6) Mark'd D. II. 4to. ſub tit. SCHOOL-NOTES.

(7) Worthies of England, article London, p. 223. edit. 1662.

(8) Fuller's Church Hiſtory. B. 6. p. 347. edit. 1657.

(11) In the preface to his Synopſis.

(1) Worthies of England, p. 223. edit. 1662.

(2) Regiſt. Coll. Trin. Oxon. W. Pope's Life of S. Ward, p. 43.

(3) In Muſæo Aſhmol. Oxon. inter codd. A. Wood. D. 15. 4to. M. 55.

* See note [I].

(e) Stevens's Addit. to Dugdale's Monastic. Vol. I. p. 264.

Weaver's Funeral Monuments, p. 112. edit. 1631.

(f) Collins, ubi supra.

(g) Wood's Hist. &amp; Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 294. &amp; ex evidentiis.

(b) Rymer's Fœdera, Tom. XV. p. 20. 'Super deliberatione magni sigilli.'

(i) Herbert's Hist. Hen. VIII. p. 564. edit. 1649.

(k) Roper's Life of More, by Hearne, 4. 57.

(l) Th. Mori Vita &amp; Exitus; by J. H. Gent. Lond. 1652, p. 227.

(9) Dugdale's Baronage, Tom. II. p. 370, 394. edit. 1675.

(10) Stow's Survey, p. 234. edit. 1599.

(11) Worthies, article London, p. 223.

have been most commonly conferred upon favourites [G]. He was soon afterwards appointed a visitor * for the dissolution of religious houses, and was one of those into whose hands the seal of the magnificent and opulent abbey of St Alban's was surrendered (e), on the fifth day of December, 1539. It should be remarked, that in this employment, which afforded so many temptations to rapacity, fraud, and oppression, that he behaved [H] with singular decency, moderation, and honour. About this time he was also master of the Jewel-house in the Tower (f), was knighted by the King, and presented by his Majesty with a chain [I] of gold, as a token of affection and esteem, which he ever afterwards wore, and with which he is always painted. By these posts, but chiefly by purchases [K] which he made while he was concerned in the court of Augmentations, he became at length possessed of thirty-two extensive manors (g) in various counties, besides other large estates. In the reign of Henry VIII. his name occurs in the performance of other services about the Court. He was appointed, together with Sir Edward North, afterwards Lord North, on the twenty-first day of April, 1544, to convey the Great Seal of England, being resigned by the Lord Chancellor Audley, into the hands of the King, who delivered it into the custody of the Lord Wriothesley (b). He appears, likewise, to have been called upon, and examined by the Privy Council, 1547, concerning some treasonable expressions, which had dropped from the unfortunate Duke of Norfolk, concerning the Act of Uses (i). He was a singular and most intimate friend of Sir Thomas More; and was sent by the King, to advertise that illustrious sufferer in the cause of conscience, of the time appointed for his execution. As the interview between these two friends, on this occasion was remarkable, I shall here insert it at length. On the twenty-third day of December, 1537, Sir Thomas Pope waited on Sir Thomas More, then in the Tower, early in the morning, and acquainted him, that he was ordered by the King and council, to convey to him the melancholy message, that he must suffer death before nine of the clock that same morning, and that therefore he should immediately prepare himself for it. Upon this, More, without the least surprize or emotion, replied cheerfully, 'Mr Pope, I most heartily thank you for your good tidings: I have been much bound to the King's Highness, for the benefits of his honours, that he has most bountifully bestowed upon me; yet am I more bound to his Grace, I assure you, for putting me here, where I have had convenient time and space to have remembrance of my end. And, so help me God, most of all am I bound unto him, that it hath pleased his Majesty so shortly to rid me out of the miseries of this wicked world.' Then Sir Thomas Pope subjoined, that it was the King's pleasure, that at the place of execution he should not use many words. To this More answered, that he was ready to submit to the King's commands, and added, 'I beseech you, good Mr Pope, to get the King to suffer my daughter Margaret to be present at my burial.' Sir Thomas Pope assured him, that he would use his utmost interest with the King; and having now finished his disagreeable commission, he solemnly took leave of his dying friend, and burst into tears. More perceiving his concern, said, with his usual composure, 'Quiet yourself, good Mr Pope, and be not discomfort-ed; for I trust that we shall, one day, in heaven, see each other full merrily, where we shall be sure to live and love together in joyful bliss eternally (k).' But this method of consolation availing but little, More, to divert the melancholy of his friend, and to dismiss him in better spirits, called for a glass, and discharging his urine into it, he held it up to the light, and with the air of a Physician declared, 'This man might have lived longer, if it had pleased the King (l).' What were the services of Sir Thomas Pope, in the court of Edward VI. does not appear. When Queen Mary ascended the throne he was taken

[G] Upon favourites.] As was also the Mastership of the Jewel-house, which he afterwards obtained. Edward North, afterwards Lord North, was Treasurer of the Court of Augmentations, ann. 32 Hen. VIII.—Cromwell was Master of the Jewel-house, with a salary of 50l. ann. 23 Hen. VIII (9). Sir J. Williams, mentioned in the last note, had been likewise a Master of the Jewel-house (10).

[H] He behaved, &c.] This merit is allowed him by Fuller, who has been remarkably severe on the visitors in general, and who is seldom sparing of his invectives, wherever he finds the slightest foundation for abuse. Speaking of Sir T. Pope as one of the visitors, he subjoins, 'However, by all the printed books of that age, he appeareth one of a candid carriage; and in this respect stands sole and single by himself. That of the abbey-lands which he received, he refounded a considerable proportion, for the building and endowing Trinity-college in Oxford (11).' Fuller, in another place, mentions him with honour on the same account. 'But the most pleasant object to entertain us at this time in England, is, the beholding of two fair and fresh foundations in Oxford; the one Trinity-college, built by Sir Thomas Pope. . . I find this Mr Pope as yet knighted, principal visitor at the dissolution of abbeys. . . . Now, as none were losers employed in that service, so we find few refunding back to charitable uses; and, perchance, this man alone the thankful Samaritan (12), who made publick acknowledgment (13).'

[I] A chain, &c.] The author of the life of Chaucer informs us, that Chaucer, in a picture belonging to George Greenwood, Esq; of Chastleton in Gloucestershire, is represented with a chain of gold about his neck, which he had received as a mark of favour from Richard II (14).

[K] By purchases.] Although I have mentioned him as a visitor for the dissolution of abbeys, yet I believe he was less concerned in that business than it is generally imagined. It is remarkable, that his name never occurs, as I remember, among the names of the visitors in their letters of commission from the King. On this account I am induced to think, that he chiefly enriched himself by purchasing the abbey-lands, rather than by receiving them as a grant from the King, in reward for any particular services done by him, in dissolving the houses to which they respectively belonged. Many purchases, which he made while he was Treasurer of the Court of Augmentation, may be seen in Dugdale's Warwickshire (15). That he was occasionally employed as a visitor is manifest, from what is said in the text concerning the abbey of St Alban's.

(12) Luke xvii. 16.

(13) Church History, B. viii. p. 39.

(14) Prefixed to Urry's Chaucer.

(15) Passim.

[L] Sir

taken into high favour, and was made one of her Privy-Counsellors (m). In the year 1554, we find him appointed, together with Sir Robert Rochester, Sir Richard Southwell, Sir Thomas Cornwallis, Sir Edmond Peckham, and Sir Edward North, Knights, a commissioner, to examine the accounts of Sir Thomas Gresham [L], who was agent to the Queen at Antwerp, for taking up money of the merchants there (n). In the year 1557, he was likewise constituted a commissioner, together with Edmond Bishop of London, Thomas Bishop of Ely, the Lords Windfor and North, Sir John Bourne, and others, for the more effectual method of proceeding against hereticks (o). Some time before, that is in 1555, the Princess Elizabeth having been imprisoned, and severely treated by her keeper, Sir Henry Beningfield, had been placed under his care and inspection (p). To this unfortunate lady Sir Thomas behaved with the utmost tenderness and respect; residing with her at Hatfield in Essex, rather as an indulgent and compassionate guardian, than as a rigorous and oppressive governor. That he regarded her as a Princess, will appear from testimonies in the notes [M], and from the following anecdote. Two of the Fellows of Trinity-college, just founded by him, had violated one of the statutes of it, and were accordingly expelled. Upon which they repaired to their founder, then at Hatfield, humbly petitioning a re-admittance into the college (q). Sir Thomas, unwilling to be the first who should pardon the infringement of laws which himself had made, and, at the same time, perceiving an opportunity of paying a compliment to the Princess, referred the matter to her gracious arbitration, who was pleased to order, that they should be immediately restored to their fellowships. While he was concerned in the care of the Princess, he received a letter from the privy council, directing him to use all possible means to prevent her from being disturbed at the malicious attempts of one Clayberdo, who pretended to be the Earl of Devonshire, and who had dispersed many proclamations about the kingdom, containing false and scandalous insinuations against her honour and reputation (r). He soon afterwards received a second letter from the privy council, ordering him to found the dispositions of the Princess with regard to a treaty of marriage proposed to be executed between her and the elected king of Sweden. His answer to this letter, which is too long to be inserted in the notes, may be found in Burnet (s). But the most memorable circumstance of his life, (before, occasionally, mentioned) by which he conferred immortality upon his name, and a perpetual emolument upon his country, was the foundation of Trinity-College in Oxford. While yet in the vigour of his age, he obtained a charter for the erection of it from Philip and Mary [N], which is dated (t) the fourth day of May, 1554, and about the same time endowed it with a competent revenue for the liberal maintenance and education of one president [O], twelve Fellows, and twelve Scholars; which number continues to this day, without diminution or addition. How he had acquired [P] his great riches, the reader has before seen; and is now left to determine, whether or no he could possibly have applied them with greater propriety, or generosity, than in the establishment of a college, which, if we consider the extent of its foundation, and its age, will be found inferior to none in the production of learned and eminent men [Q]. While he meditated further donations to this his society, and projected (v) likewise the foundation and endowment of a school [R], he died at his house in Clerkenwell, London, in the fiftieth year

(m) Speed, p. 854. Hollinshed, Vol. III. p. 1159.

(n) Rymer's Fœdera, Tom. XV. p. 371. 'Pro Thoma Gresham, &c.'

(o) Fox's Acts and Monuments, edit. 1684, p. 798. Speed and Hollinshed, ubi supra.

(p) Burnet's History of the Reformation. In the Collection of Records, Part ii. B. ii. p. 311.

(q) From a letter written by himself to the college.

(r) Burnet's History of the Reformation, Part ii. B. ii. p. 314. No. 33.

(s) Ut supra, p. 325. No. 37.

(t) Ex ipsa Chart. Orig.

(v) Wood's Hist. &c. lib. ii. p. 301.

[L] Sir Thomas Gresham. He had been before concerned in the same business for Edward VI. and was afterwards employed in it by Queen Elizabeth (16).

[M] Testimonies in the notes. Thomas Heywood, in his England's Elizabeth, who likewise wrote a play called 'The Troubles of Queen Elizabeth from her Cradle to the Crown,' tells us (17), 'within seven days after, she was discharged of her keeper Sir Henry Biningfield; yett, so that Sir Thomas Pope one of her Majesties Privy counsell, and Master Gage her Gentleman-Usher, were made superintendants over her. The change was however most happy. She was now in liberâ custodiâ under the hands of her loving friends with whom she went down into the country, and there spent the remainder of her sister's reign.' — Hollinshed speaks to the same effect.

[N] Philip and Mary. Heylin observes, that Queen Mary, in rebuilding the publick schools at Oxford, 'gave encouragement to two worthy gentlemen, to add two new colleges in Oxford, to the former, viz. Trinity and St John's.' — Had it not been, 'adds he, for these foundations, there had been nothing in this reign to have made it memorable, but only the misfortunes and calamities of it (18).'

[O] One president, &c. The house being not yet ready for their reception, they were not admitted 'till the thirtieth day of May, 1556, which was the eve of Trinity-Sunday (19).

[P] How he had acquired, &c. I will here take occasion to vindicate the founder's character from a gross misrepresentation in Wood (20). We are told that the founder furnished his chapel, in a very superb manner; with vessels and crosses of gold and silver, with copes of tiffue, tapestry, &c &c (21). That he also bestowed much plate upon the college, besides what he left it by his will. But our idea of his munificence is soon suppressed by the following words. 'Ea autem omnia olim, e Cœnobii Wroxtoniensis, aliorumque spoliis, quo tempore ab Henrico Rege VIII. dissoluta sunt, ipse corraferat.' These are the words of Wood's translator, who, it is well known, often took the liberty to misrepresent his author's sense. The original words in Wood's MS. English copy (22) are these. 'These he obtained from the Priory at Wroxton, and others, which he had bought of the King at the dissolution.' Now if the founder, in reality, had illegally obtained, or pilfered, this furniture; no man, would have been more likely to have mentioned it, than Wood; who, tho' a most valuable writer, has been notoriously careful to collect and record scandal. I think therefore, that Wood's favourable representation of this matter, is alone sufficient to acquit the founder.

[Q] Learned and eminent men. Thomas Allen, Sir Edward Hoby, William Chillingworth, John Selden, James Harrington, Sir John Denham, Sir Thomas Pope-Blount, Ralph Sheldon, Ralph Bathurst, Daniel Whitby, William Derham, &c.

[R] A school. This he first designed to found at Hook-Norton, in Oxfordshire; but he afterwards resolved to place it at Dedington, his native town (23). It was to have been called the school of Jesus. Wood, but I think with little probability, conjectures, that he intended it as a seminary for his college at Oxford.

(21) They were all abolished by an order from the Queen's Commissioners, 1570

(22) In the tower of the schools at Oxford.

(23) Ex Chartis Orig.

(16) His Life, by Ward, p. 7. &c.

(17) Lond. 1631, 12mo. p. 202.

(18) Ecclesia Restaurat. Hist. of Queen Mary, p. 84.

(19) Regist. Coll. Trin. Oxon.

(20) Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. lib. ii. p. 294. The printed Latin translation is here referred to.

year of his age, on the twenty-ninth day of January, 1558, and was buried [S] in the north-isle of the choir of St Stephen's Walbrook (u). Stowe has preserved the inscription upon his tomb, which has been since destroyed with the old church, 'Hic jacet Thomas Pope primus Thefaurarius Augmentationum, & D<sup>na</sup> Margaretta, uxor ejus, quæ quidem Margaretta obiit 16 Jan. 1538.' 'Here lies Thomas Pope, first Treasurer of the Augmentations, and Dame Margaret his wife, &c.' In the latter part of his life, he seems chiefly to have resided at Clerkenwell, at Hatfield in Essex, and at Tyttenhanger in Hertfordshire; of which last mentioned county he was twice Sheriff, in the years 1552, and 1557 (w). He appears to have been married twice. His first wife was Margaret Dodmere (x), mentioned in the abovesaid epitaph. By her he had a daughter [T] named Alice. His second and last wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Walter Blount [U], Esq; of Blount's-Hall in Staffordshire: but, when married to Sir Thomas, she was the widow of William Basford, Esq; of Bentley in Derbyshire. This Lady survived Sir Thomas many years; and soon after his death was married to Sir Hugh Paulet (y), of Hinton St George in Somersetshire, father of the great Sir Amias Paulet. She died at Tyttenhanger [W], on the twenty-seventh day of October, 1593, and being brought to Oxford, her funeral ceremonies were solemnized, on the first of November following, in St Mary's church (z). Her body was then conveyed to the chapel of Trinity-College, where it was pompously interred, near the altar, under a sumptuous Gothick monument; upon which we read this inscription [X]: 'Hic jacent corpora Tho. Pope, militis, fundatoris hujus collegii Trinitatis, & D. Elizabethæ, & Margaretæ, uxoris ejus. Qui quidem Thomas obiit 29 die Januarii, 1558.' 'Here lie the bodies of Thomas Pope, Knight, Founder of this college of the Trinity; and of the lady Elizabeth, &c.' He left behind him one * brother [Y], whose name was John. He was often painted by Hans Holbein, and appears to have been a man of a majestick stature, and a comely countenance.

[S] Was buried, &c. In his will, he directs his executors to bury him in the church of that parish, in which he should chance to die. See note [X].

[T] A daughter. Wood informs us (24), that she died without issue; but the founder, in his appointments for five dirges or obits to be yearly sung in his college, directs, that one of them should be celebrated for the souls of Dame Margaret his late wife, and Alice his daughter; begotten by him of the body of the said Dame Margaret.

[U] Daughter of Walter Blount, &c. This appears from various authentic evidences. Newcourt is therefore entirely mistaken when he tells us, that a certain manor was granted to Sir Hugh Paulet, from whence it came to Sir Thomas Pope, Knt. by his intermarriage with Elizabeth, daughter, and one of the co-heirs, of the said Sir Hugh (25). In another place (26), however, he contradicts himself; where he says, that Sir Thomas Pope's widow, Elizabeth, became the wife of Sir H. Paulet. Chauncy and Salmon, in their accounts of Hertfordshire, have both adopted the above error; they have likewise both still further perplexed this matter, by asserting, that Sir Thomas and Lady Elizabeth Pope had issue a daughter, who was married to Sir Thomas Blount, Knt. of Staffordshire (27). See the next note.

[W] At Tyttenhanger. This seat Sir Thomas Pope demised by will to his lady Elizabeth; she dying, left it to Thomas Blount, Esq; her nephew, who in remembrance of Sir Thomas Pope, called himself Pope-Blount; as most of his descendants have been named ever since (28). Of this family, there have been three eminent writers, viz. Sir Henry Blount, and Sir Thomas Pope-Blount, Knights, and Charles-Blount, Esq; See the article, Sir Henry Blount, &c.

[X] This inscription. It is probable, that the founder's body, together with that of his first wife Margaret, was removed from St Stephen's Walbrook, to the chapel of his college. This we may reasonably conclude from the inscription on the monument there. Wood (29) acquaints us, that the Founder died at Clerkenwell, and was buried in his college-chapel. It is, indeed, hard to reconcile the epitaph at St Stephen's Walbrook, with this at Trinity college.

[Y] One brother. This gentleman had an only son, William, born at Wroxton in Oxfordshire, and educated at Trinity college, Oxon. Upon the arrival of James the I. in England, he was created Knight of the Bath, and a Baronet, July 24, 1603; and afterwards in the fourth of Charles I. he was made Baron of Belburbett, and Lord of Downe in Ireland (30). With this family of the Popes, many noble alliances have been made by intermarriage (31): Nor is it the least honour to it, that our illustrious poet, Mr Pope, was regularly descended from it (32).

(23) Collins's Baronetage, Vol. IV. p. 667.

(29) Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. in Appendix. p. 447.

(30) Stowe's Annals, continued and augmented by Howes. Lond. 1615, p. 827. Ex quodam Registr. in Coll. Trin.

(31) Collins, ubi supra.

(32) I have heard that he once intended to give a piece of plate to Trinity-college, in memory of his ancestor the founder.

(u) Stowe's Survey, p. 245. fol. edit. 1633.

(w) Chauncy's Hertfordshire, p. 23.

(x) From a manuscript entry in Sir T. Pope's Breviary.

(y) Collins's Baronetage, Vol. IV. p. 667.

(z) From Wood's original M.SS. History of Univ. Oxon. in English, never printed, kept in the tower of the schools.

* See note [I].

(24) Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. Lib. ii. p. 301.

(25) Repertorium Eccles. Parochial. Lond. Vol. II. p. 874.

(26) Vol. I. p. 632.

(27) Chauncy, p. 502. Salmon, p. 60.

(a) Life of A. Pope, Lond. 1745, 8vo. p. 1.

(b) He is said to be worth 20000*l.* when he left off business, at the Revolution. Warton's Essay on the Writings and Genius of Alex. Pope, p. 79. edit. 1756, 8vo.

* See remark [Y], in the preceding article.

POPE [ALEXANDER], a much admired Poet, was descended of a good family by both his parents [A], and born the 8th of June, 1688, in London (a), where his father was then a considerable merchant (b). He was taught to read very early by an aunt, and he learned to write without any assistance, by copying printed books, which he executed with great neatness and exactness. The family being of the Romish religion, he was put, at eight years of age, under the direction of one Taverner a priest, who taught him the rudiments of the Latin and Greek tongues together (c). He imbibed these elements of classical learning with the greatest facility, and the first sight of the poets discovered at once both the peculiar bent of his inclination, and the excellency of his genius [B]. About this

[A] Descended of a good family by both his parents. We are obliged for the account of Mr Pope's family to the fables that were made upon him. In answer to which he thought proper to publish the following short genealogy. That Alexander Pope, his father, was of a gentleman's family in Oxfordshire: the head of which was the Earl of Downe in Ireland*, whose sole heiress married the earl of Lindsey. His mother was Editha, the daughter of William Turner, Esq; of York: she had three brothers, one of whom was killed; another died in the service of King Charles I. and the eldest following his fortune, and becoming a general officer in Spain, left her what estate remained after the sequestrations and forfeitures of her family (1), which, as well as that of her husband, was of the Popish religion.

[B] Both his inclination and genius to poetry. Mr Pope frequently declared, that the time of his beginning to write verses, was so very early in his life, that he could scarcely re-call it to his memory. When he was yet a child, his father would frequently order him to make English verses. It seems he was difficult to be pleased, and would make the lad correct them again and again: when at last he approved them, he took

(1) Note to the Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot, at these lines: Let the two Curls of Court and Town abuse His father, mother, body, soul, and muse.

(c) See his Works, Vol II. p. 18. edit. Warburto.

this time accidentally meeting with Ogilby's translation of Homer, he was so much struck with the force of the story, that notwithstanding the deadness and insipidness of the versification, Ogilby became a favourite book. The Ovid of Sandys fell next in his way, and it is said, that the raptures these translations gave him were so strong, that he spoke of them with pleasure all his life after. From his private tutor he was sent to a Popish seminary at Twyford, near Winchester, whence he was removed to a school at Hyde-park corner. He was now about ten years of age, and being carried sometimes to the Play-house, the sight of those theatrical representations put him upon turning the chief events in Homer into a kind of play, made up of a number of speeches from Ogilby's translation, connected by verses of his own. He persuaded the upper boys to act this piece, a curiosity which one would have been glad to have seen. The master's gardener represented the character of Ajax, and the actors were dressed after the prints of his favourite Ogilby (d), which indeed make far the best part of that book, being designed and engraved by artists of note (e). In the mean time, he was so unfortunate as to lose, under his two last masters, what he had acquired under the first. In this condition, at twelve years of age, he retired with his parents to Binfield, in Windsor-Forest, where his father had provided a convenient little box, not far from Oakingham in Berkshire; and, at his first coming, 'tis said, was put under another Priest (f) for a few months, but with as little success as before; so that he resolved to become his own master. This country retreat, however, suited his melancholy and reflective temper; and it was about this time that he wrote his Ode on Solitude, which appears as the first-fruits of his poetical genius (g). It was here too that he first perused the writings of Waller, of Spencer, and of Dryden. But on the first sight of Dryden he abandoned the rest, having now found an author whose cast was extremely congenial with his own [C]. His works therefore he studied with equal pleasure and attention; he placed them before his eyes as a model: in short, he copied not only his harmonious versification, but the very turns of his periods. And hence it was that he became enabled to give to rhyme all the harmony of which it is capable (b). Binfield being near East-hamstead, where Sir William Trumbull then resided [D], our young genius was introduced into the acquaintance of that gentleman; who being struck with admiration at his extraordinary parts, and pleased with his good sense, as well as the decency and regularity of his manners, gave him great encouragement, and presently admitted him to a share of his friendship. In the mean time, master Pope was not wanting to himself, in improving his talents for poetry. At fourteen years old he had composed several elegant pieces that way (i) [E]. At fifteen he had acquired a ready habit in the two learned languages; to which he soon after added French and Italian (k). It is a common observation, that some seeds of vanity and self-conceit are necessary ingredients in the composition of a poet. Accordingly our author was not without a proper share of these qualities, and now thought himself able to undertake an epic poem. In that spirit he set about writing his Alcander this year; and the performance, as might be expected, was a glaring proof of his childish folly. However, he had either sense or modesty enough, or both, to keep it in his study; and in his riper years spoke of it with a frankness and ingenuity that does more than atone for the

(d) Pope's Works, as in the preceding note. It is a remarkable circumstance, that Ogilby should give our author his first poetick pleasures.

(e) These, no doubt, had also a share in procuring our young student's favour, and engaging his attention.

(f) Perhaps Mr Tho. Deane, of whom some account may be seen in Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 940.

(g) See a copy of it in a letter to Henry Cromwell, dated July 17, 1709; wherein he observes, it was wrote before he was twelve years of age.

(b) Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope, p. 82. See remark [G].

(i) See an advertisement prefixed to a miscellany printed by B. Lintot in 1711.

(k) See remarks [K].

took great pleasure in perusing them, and would say, these are good rhymes (2). 'These early praises, says my author, of a tender and respected parent, co-operating with the natural inclinations of the son, may possibly be the causes, that fixed our young bard in a resolution of becoming eminent in this art (3).'

[C] He abandoned the rest for Dryden, &c. After he met with that favourite's works as mentioned above, he was never easy 'till he had seen the author; and for that purpose, he procured a friend to bring him to a coffee-house where Dryden was, only that he might be blessed with the sight of that great Poet. This could not have been long before his death, which happened in 1701; so that Mr Pope never was known to him, a misfortune which he laments in the following pathetic words: Virgilium tantum vidi (4). He never mentioned him afterwards without a kind of rapturous veneration. Thus, for instance, having run over the names of his great friends and encouragers, he concludes with the person whom he esteemed above all the rest, in the following distich:

And St John's self, great Dryden's friend before,
With open arms receiv'd one Poet more (5).

[D] Sir William Trumbull resided then at Easthamstead] This statesman was bred at Oxford, where he was entered first of St John's college, and chosen thence into a Fellowship at All-Souls, he took his degree of Doctor of Laws in 1667, became an advocate in Doctor's-Commons, Chancellor of the diocese of Rochester, and one of the Clerks of the Signet. He was knighted November 1, 1684; and in the same month the following year was sent Envoy Extraordinary to France, and in the beginning of 1687, he went Ambassador to the Ottoman Porte, which journey he performed on foot. He continued there 'till 1691, when he was appointed one of the Principal Secretaries of State, his colleague being the Duke of Shrewsbury. This office he resigned in 1697, and retired to Easthamstead near the place of his nativity (6); and we see he had not been there many years when Mr Pope was first introduced to him; and the literary correspondence between them was kept up as long as Sir William lived, and upon his death Mr Pope wrote his epitaph (7).

[E] Composed several poetical pieces.] These are printed among his juvenile poems in the first and second volumes of his works; after they had made their appearance without his name, some in the sixth volume of Tonson's Miscellanies in 1709, and others in Lintot's Miscellanies in 1711. They consist of A translation of part of the first book of Statius's Thebaid; several translations from Homer, and imitations of English poets, viz. Chaucer, Spencer, Waller, Cowley, &c. The translations were performed by way of exercises at school, to improve himself in the language; and he chose rather to do them in verse, as easier to him than prose (8). The imitations were generally condemned; and 'tis no wonder so young an author should mistake his fondness for his genius. He was sensible of it afterwards, and seems to hint at the mistake, in the preface to the first volume of his poems published in 1717, where he takes particular notice of this, as one of the difficulties and dangers that attend the profession of a Poet. Mr Pope's miscarriage is said to have animated another to make a like attempt, which produced six very humorous epigrams upon a pipe of tobacco, in the manner of six distinguished Poets, each admirably performed (9).

(6) Notes to his first letter to Pope. And Wood's Fasti, Vol. II. col. 170.

(7) It is printed in Pope's Works, Vol. VI. p. 73.

(8) Advertisement prefixed to them.

(9) The author was Mr Hawkins, an ingenious gentleman still living.

(2) Pope's Works, Vol. IV. p. 18. Warburton's edition.

(1) Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope, p. 79, 80. He says of himself, I liv'd in verses, and the verses came. Epist. to Dr Arbuthnot.

(4) See one of his letters to H. Cromwell.

(5) Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot.

the forwardness of his attempt [F]. And the following year, 1704, he entered upon a task more suitable to his age. This was his Pastorals, which brought him into the acquaintance of some of the most eminent wits of that time. He communicated these first to Mr Wycherley (l), who was highly pleased with them, and sent a copy to Mr Walsh, Gentleman of the Horse to Queen Anne, and author of several ingenious pieces, both in prose and verse. This introduced him into the acquaintance of that gentleman (m), who proved a very sincere friend to him, and having immediately discerned that our Poet's chief talent lay, not so much in striking out new thoughts of his own, as in improving those which he borrowed from the Ancients, and an easy versification, told him, among other things, that there was one way left open for him to excel his predecessors, and that was correctness; observing, that though we had several great Poets, yet none of them were correct: he, therefore advised him to make that his study. The advice was not lost (n): Mr Pope received it very gratefully, and observed it very diligently, as appears by the subsequent letters in this correspondence; and no doubt the distinguishing harmony of his numbers was in a great measure owing to it [G]. This year, 1704, he wrote also the first part of his Windsor Forest, though the whole was not published 'till several years afterwards, in 1710 [H], with a dedication to Lord Lansdowne, whom he mentions as one of his earliest

(n) One remarkable instance of his gratitude to this friend is taken notice of below. We have another in that humorous letter to Swift, where he proposes a subscription for saving the souls of some of his friends. Among these he reckons Walsh who was, says he, not only a Socinian, but a Whig, and cannot be rated but at 100*l*. Orrery's Life of Swift, Letter V. See also Gay's article, rem. [E].

(l) He was probably first introduced to Wycherley by Sir Will. Trumbull. Life of Pope, ubi sup.

(m) His answer to Wycherley on this occasion stands at the head of Pope's Letters, in Vol. VII. of his Works.

(10) Pope's Works, in the preface.

(11) This letter is dated Feb. 28, 1717. See Pope's Letters.

(12) Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope, p. 82, 83.

(13) See the story in Milton's History, who seems pleased with it, as suiting the romantic turn of his mind.

(14) Pope's Works, Vol. III. Warburton's edition.

(15) It was in 1739 that this design was thought of.

[F] Which does more than atone for the forwardness of the attempt.] 'I confess, says he, there was a time when I was in love with myself, and my first productions were the children of self-love upon innocence. I had made an epic poem and panegyrics on all the princes, and I thought myself the greatest genius that ever was. I cannot but regret these delightful visions of my childhood, which, like the fine colours we see when our eyes are shut, are vanished for ever (10).' This early piece was long afterwards communicated by him to Dr Atterbury, with a declared intention to burn it, in which that friend concurred: 'though, adds he, I would have interceded for the first page, and put it, with your leave, among my curiosities.' So far seemed a little cruel, and to soften it, the Bishop concludes with this high-strained soothing panegyric. 'In truth, it is the only instance of that kind I ever met with from a person good for any thing else, nay, for every thing else to which he is pleased to turn himself (11).' After all, though the written copy might undergo this cruel execution, yet the original, it seems, was faithfully preserved in the author's memory; at least, if what a late writer tells us he had received from credible information be true, that some of the anonymous verses quoted as examples of the Art of sinking in Poetry, in the incomparable satire so called, were such as our poet remembered from his own Alcander (12). Nor was the vanity of writing an epic poem cured by this failure in the first attempt. On the contrary, the errors and imperfections he observed in it, seem to have remained upon him as so many stimulations to a second attempt, in composing which, the faults of the first would be of use, by way of a lesson to avoid them. However that be, we are assured by his editor, that he had framed a design of writing an epic poem on our old Annalists, and therefore more engaging to an Englishman; this was on the arrival of Brutus, the supposed grandson of Æneas, in our island, and the settlement of the first foundations of the British monarchy (13). In this poem he designed to treat amply of all that regarded civil regimen or the science of politics; the several forms of a republic were here to be examined and explained, together with the several modes of religious worship, as far forth as they affect society. And the whole was to be written in rhyme (14). The author of the essay just cited, thinks that the success of this attempt would have been no better than the former. And to support that censure he observes, that Pope's genius was chiefly of the didactic kind, with very little of the sublime and pathetic, which are the main nerves of the Epopœa; that he would have given us many elegant descriptions and many general characters well drawn; but would have failed to set before our eyes the reality of these objects, and the actions of these characters; that Pope's close and constant reasoning had by this time (15) impaired and crushed the faculty of imagination; that the political reflections would, in all probability, have been more numerous, than the affecting strokes of nature; that it would have more resembled the Henriade than the Iliad, or even the Jerusalem Liberata; that it would have appeared, if this scheme had been executed, how much and for what reasons the man that is skilful in painting modern life, and the most secret foibles and follies of his contemporaries, is therefore disqualified for representing the ages of heroism, and that simple life, which alone epic poetry can gracefully describe. He also adds, that the single circumstance of rhyme was sufficient of itself alone to overwhelm and extinguish all enthusiasm, and produce endless tautologies and circumlocutions. This writer concludes with imagining Dr Warburton's opinion to be the same with his, since there could not have been a more improper subject for an epic poem, than the particulars of which that editor informs us it was chiefly to consist. The same writer remarks, that the first poem that appeared in France any thing like an epic poem, was on this identical subject of Brutus's arriving in England (16). It was written by Eustache in the reign of Louis VIth, who came to the throne in 1137 and was husband of the celebrated Eleonora, afterwards divorced and married to our Henry II. (17)

[G] Pope's harmonious versification was owing, in a great measure, to Walsh. This gentleman died in 1708, which year the Pastorals were published by our author (18), who was then writing his Essay on Criticism, which concludes with his elegy.

Such late was Walsh, the Muses judge and friend, &c.

Pope however has not escaped the censure of speaking here too magnificently of this friend (19). Walsh, it is said, was in general a flimsy and frigid writer. The Rambler calls his works pages of inanity. However, in Mr Dryden's opinion, he was the best critic of our nation in his time (20): and it is allowed that his three letters to Pope are well written*. His remarks on the nature of pastoral poetry, on borrowing from the Ancients, and against florid conceits, are worthy perusal (21). To what has been said in another article (22) of these memoirs upon the Pastorals, we shall only add, that their principal merit consists in their correct and musical versification; musical to a degree of which rhyme could hardly be thought capable: and in giving the first specimen of that harmony in English verse, which is now become indispensibly necessary, and which has so forcibly influenced the publick ear, as to have rendered every moderate rhymers melodious. Thus music-charmed, the reader becomes blind to the great defect in this poem, the want of invention. 'I remember, continues the last cited author, to have been informed by an intimate friend of Pope, that he had once laid a design of writing American Eclogues. The subject would have been fruitful of the most poetical imagery, and, if properly executed, would have rescued the author from the accusation here urged, of having written eclogues without invention (23).'

[H] He published Windsor Forest in 1710.] The circumstance of our author's writing the first part of this poem so early as 1704, furnishes no bad apology for the general fault charged upon it; few images, it is said, are introduced, which are not equally applicable to any place whatsoever. It is true, descriptive poetry, of which kind is this piece, was manifestly none of the shining talents of Pope; but when it is remembered that he pitched upon a description of Windsor Forest, (then the place of his abode) at sixteen, an age for which this kind of poetry has the greatest charms, it may

(16) It was called Le Roman de Brut, according to the humour of those times, when every piece of poetry was denominated a romance.

(17) Essay on the Writings of Pope, p. 280, 281, 282.

(18) He had never left correcting them 'till that time.

(19) Essay on the Genius of Pope, p. 201.

(20) See preface to his translation of Virgil.

* In Pope's Works, Vol. VII. p. 65, & seq.

(21) Essay on the Genius of Pope, p. 201.

(22) In Gay's article.

(23) Essay on the Genius of Pope, p. 10, 11.

earliest acquaintance. Mr Wycherley was another. To these, besides Bolingbroke and Walth, he adds Congreve, Garth, Swift, Atterbury, Talbot, Somers, and Sheffield, as persons with whom he was not only conversant, but beloved, at sixteen or seventeen years of age; an early bard for such acquaintance. And the catalogue might be made yet more illustrious, had he not confined it to the time when he wrote the Pastorals and Windsor Forest *. No part of our bard's life is more interesting than that of his conduct in cultivating friendships, especially with his brother poets. At the age of eighteen he was grown so high in the esteem of Wycherley, that he thought him capable of correcting his poems (which had been damned) so as they might appear again in print. Pope complied with the request, and executed it with equal freedom and judgment (o). But the faults proved too many for the author of them to be told of; he was old, became jealous, and construed his young naster's ingenuity, and plain dealing, into want of respect. Not only the design of publishing was dropt, but all correspondence with the corrector suspended. This ungenerous return was lively resented by Pope [I]. And though Wycherley was prevailed with afterwards, by the mediation of a common friend, to resume the correspondence, yet this went no farther than bare complaisance (p). However, some time after Mr Wycherley's death, his poems being republished by some mercenary hand in 1728, our author the following year printed several letters that had passed between them, in vindication of Mr Wycherley's good name, against some misconstructions prefixed to that edition (q). Our Poet's conduct, throughout this whole trying affair, was greatly above his years [K]. But young as he was, his talents were now beginning to ripen into full maturity. This appeared conspicuously in his Essay on Criticism, which though wrote so early as 1708, yet placed him among those of the first rank in his art. It is indeed esteemed a master-piece in it's kind, and so discovered the peculiar turn of his genius. He was not yet twenty years old, so that every body stood amazed to find such a knowledge of the world, such a maturity of judgment, and such a penetration into human nature as are there displayed; infomuch that it became a subject for the criticks to display their profoundest skill in accounting for it. The greatest geniuses in painting, as well as poesy, were generally observed, not to have produced any of their master-pieces before the age of thirty, or thereabouts (r), and that Mr Pope's genius ripened earlier, was owing, 'tis said, to a happy conjuncture of concurring circumstances. He was happily secured from falling into the debaucheries of women and wine (the too frequent bane of hopeful youth) by the weakness and delicacy of his constitution, and the bad state of his health. The sensual vices were too violent for so tender a frame, he never fell into intemperance or dissipation, which is of the greatest consequence in preserving each faculty of the mind in due vigour. Even his mis-shapen figure is alledged to be of use to him as a writer. It is an observation of Lord Bacon, that whosoever hath any thing fixed in his person that induces contempt, hath also a perpetual spur within to rescue and deliver himself from it (s). Hence it has been thought not improbable, that * Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot; and Warburton's note.

(o) The brouillons of these corrections were found in Pope's Study after his death. Warburton, in a note to the Essay on Criticism.

(p) Id. ibid. The same gentleman mentions it in another place as one of Mr Pope's faults, that he was too easily provoked, and too difficult to be reconciled.

(q) Soon after the breach, Pope was informed that somebody had insinuated malicious truths of him to Wycherley. Warburton.

(r) Du Bos's Reflections upon Poetry, &c. §. 2. N. B. Milton produced his Comus earlier.

(s) Bacon's Essays, No. 44. His feeling the truth of this observation, contributed towards the fondness which he had for these Essays. Warton.

our

may as truly be said, that he could not then be sensible which way the chief force of his genius lay *; and though we should grant that he must have discovered that before the year 1710, yet he might not be willing to lose the pains he had taken, and therefore chose rather to exercise his pen, though a little against the grain, in completing the plan. It is allowed that he breaks out into a true poetical enthusiasm more than once, and particularly in the conclusion; and there was indeed a circumstance which no doubt strongly animated his muse in that part. The peace, afterwards concluded at Utrecht, was this year, 1710, projected by his particular friends Harley and St John, who were now at the head of the Ministry. Accordingly, we find the influences, and effects of peace, and it's consequence, a diffusive commerce, marked by select circumstances such as are best adapted to strike the imagination by lively pictures, the selection of which constitutes true poetry. At the close of all there appears a groupe of allegorical personages, in the rear of which stand the following figures painted in living colours with their proper insignia and attributes.

————— Envy her own snakes shall feel,
And persecution mourn her broken wheel:
There faction roar, rebellion bite her chain,
And gasping Furies thirst for blood in vain.

It is said, that Addison was inexpressibly chagrined at this noble conclusion of Windsor Forest, both as a politician, and as a poet. As a politician, because it so highly celebrated that treaty of peace, which he deemed so pernicious to the liberties of Europe; and as a poet, because he was deeply conscious, that his own Campaigne, that Gazette in rhyme, contained no strokes of such genuine and sublime poetry as the conclusion before us †.

VOL. V. No. CCLXXXV.

[I] This was resented by Pope. Mr Cromwell gave him the first hint of Wycherley's chagrin, and as he never wanted quickness of apprehension in those points, we find him expressing his resentment in these words. 'I may derive this pleasure from it, that whereas I must otherwise have been a little uneasy to know my incapacity of returning his obligations, I may now, by bearing his frailties, exercise my gratitude and friendship more, than himself either is, or perhaps ever will be sensible.'

Ille meos, primus qui me sibi junxit, amores
Abstulit; ille habeat secum, servetque sepulchro.

In the last visit which Pope made to him, the breach was openly intimated. He told me (says Pope, in a letter to Cromwell) he was going instantly out of town, and 'till his return was my humble servant. Hereupon, our young poet finding this journey into the country not so instantaneous as was pretended, did not spare to return the compliment. I beg you (says he to the same friend), to do what you may with all truth, that is, assure him [Wycherley] I have ever borne all the respect and kindness imaginable to him; I don't know to this hour what it is, that has estranged him from me; but this I know, that he may for the future be more safely my friend, since no invitation of his shall ever make me so free with him (24).

[K] His conduct with regard to Wycherley, was above what might be expected from his years. It is obvious on the sight of Pope's earliest letters to Wycherley, Walth, and Cromwell, that he was at that time not only acquainted intimately with some of the best Greek and Roman, as also the most celebrated of the French and Italian Classics, but that he judged admirably well, and acutely, both of men and books.

(24) Pope was acquainted with Cromwell in 1704, as appears by a letter dated Decemb. 26th that year, in Pope's Collection. And it is remarkable, that he afterwards lost this friend too, by taking the same freedom with his ill taste, as he had done with Wycherley's poetry. See Pope's first letter to Gay, dated at Binfield, Nov. 12, 1712. Pope's Works, Vol. IX.

* He was sensible of this afterwards; and accordingly we find him saying of this poem, While pure description held the place of sense. Epist. to Dr Arbuthnot.

† Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope. But surely the remarker forgets the much famed simile of the Angel in the Campaigne.

(t) Horat. Epist. ad Pisonem.

(v) See more of this presently.

(w) To this purpose is that celebrated saying of Charles IX. of France. Equi & Poetae alendi sunt, non saginandi. Horses and Poets are to be fed, but not fattened.

(x) Mr Caryl, author of a play called Sir Solomon Single, and several translations in Dryden's Miscellanies; and Master of the Horse to Queen Mary, wife of King James II. whose fortunes he followed into France. Notes to the Rape of the Lock.

(y) This request is intimated in the motto, Nolueram, Belinda, tuos violare capillos:
Sed juvat, hoc precibus me tribuisse tuis.

(z) Letter to Steele, dated November 26th, sent with a copy of the poem to be communicated to Mr Addison, to whom our author constantly paid his court.

(25) Essay on Man, Epist. ii. ver. 185, & fig.

(26) Mr Addison may, perhaps, be reckoned among these; 'tis certain the praises of it in the Spectator, No. 253, are bestowed with too sparing a hand, the effect, possibly, of envy, and it's adjunct insaturation.

(27) See his note, upon this Essay.

our poet might be animated by this circumstance to double his diligence, to make himself distinguished by the rectitude of his understanding, and beautiful turn of his mind, as much as he was by the deformity of his body [L]. 'Tis certain that he strictly fulfilled the precept of Horace in each particular, Multa tulit fecitque puer, sudavit & astit (t). It was another circumstance equally propitious to the studies of Pope, in this early part of his life, that he inherited a fortune that was a decent competency (u), and sufficient to supply the small expences which, both by constitution and reflection, he required. Thus he was preserved from the two most destructive enemies to a young genius, want and dependence. Nor was the circumstance of being placed beneath opulence, and an high station, less propitious, since these almost unavoidably embarrass and immerse the possessor in the cares, the pleasures, the indolence, and the dissipation, that accompany abundance (w). Thus it is conceived, that these external aids, as so many auxiliaries, assisting the active inborn strength of our poet's genius had their share in this triumphant production [M]. But how triumphant soever may be the merit of the Essay on Criticism, yet it was still surpassed in a poetical view by the Rape of the Lock. The former indeed excelled in the didactic way, for which he was peculiarly formed; a clear head and strong sense were his characteristic qualities; his chief force lay in the understanding, rather than in the imagination. But it is the creative power of the last that constitutes the proper characteristick of poetry, and therefore it is in the Rape of the Lock that Pope principally appears a Poet; since in this performance he has displayed more imagination than in all his other works put together. The poem took it's birth from an incidental quarrel that happened between two noble families, that of Lord Petre and Mrs Fermor, both of our author's acquaintance, and of the same religion. His Lordship, in a party of pleasure, carried it so far, as to cut off a favourite lock of the Lady's hair. This tho' done in the way of gallantry, was seriously resented, as being indeed a real injury. Hence there presently grew mutual animosities, which being seen with concern by a common friend to all (x); that friend requested Pope to try the power of his muse on the occasion, intimating, that a proper piece of ridicule was the likeliest means to extinguish the rising flame. Pope readily complied with the friendly proposal; and the juncture requiring dispatch, his first design was completed in less than a fortnight, which being sent to the Lady, had more than the proposed effect. Pleased to the highest degree with the delicacy of the compliment paid to her, she first communicated copies of it to her acquaintance, and then prevailed with our author to print it (y): as he did, though not without the caution of concealing his name to so hasty a sketch. But the universal applause which the sketch met with (z), put him upon enriching it with the machinery of the Sylphs; and in that new dress the two cantoes, extended to five, came out the following year, 1712, ushered by a letter to Mrs Fermor; to whom he afterwards addressed another, which is esteemed far superior to any of Voiture [N]. This year he [L] His deformity might be a spur to distinguish himself. This remark is thought to receive some countenance from our author himself, in the following lines.

What crops of wit and honesty appear,
From spleen, from obstinacy, hate or fear:
See anger, zeal, and fortitude supply;
Ev'n avarice, prudence; sloth, philosophy;
Nor virtue, male or female, can we name,
But what will grow on pride, or grow on shame (25).

[M] These outward advantages were serviceable in the production of this piece. Whatever may be thought of the abovementioned remarks, it is certain that the Essay on Criticism, besides it's intrinsic merit, was not without some adventitious and foreign aids, which helped it forward in making it's way into the world. It had the good luck to meet with a rival whose impotent attempts to blast it's beauties rendered them the more conspicuously manifest (26). This was Mr Dennis, a critic at that time of no bad repute, having a tolerable good nose at smelling out a fault, though loud and harsh in the utterance of it, but miserably misled by a false scent in the present subject. We have borrowed this observation of Mr Warburton (27) for the sake of what follows, which more immediately falls under the plan of this work, as exhibiting a very interesting part of Mr Pope's character. Mr Pope, continues his learned annotator, saw the blindness of his antagonist's fury, and felt the happy effects of it. He enjoyed these in silence. There was a dignity in that conduct, a point which he set before him very early in life, rarely lost sight of it afterwards, and pursued it with a remarkable steadiness; a felicity rarely met with in the composition of a Poet. There was still a further advantage in this conduct upon the present occasion; Mr Walsh had convinced him that correctness would infallibly lead him to fame, and the composure of his mind being entirely calm and unruffled, fitted him for making all the use he could, even of an enemy's remarks. In that view we find him freely acknowledging the justice of one or two of Dennis's, and prudently resolving to correct the faults in the next edition of his Essay. It was translated into French verse by General Anthony Hamilton in 1713, but not printed. The two printed ones are done, one by Mr Roboton (28), Amsterd. in 4to, and Lond. 1717; and the other by the Abbé Refnel, with a large preface and notes, Paris, 1730, 8vo; and Mr Pope often wished to see it in Latin verse, and such a version by Dr Kirkpatrick was published at London 1749, 4to * It is said this essay was first written in prose (29), according to the precept of Vida, whose merit he has celebrated in it.

—Immortal Vidæ, &c.

[N] With a letter to Mrs Fermor, &c The insertion of the machinery in proper places, as it is done without the least appearance of being awkwardly stitched in, so it was always esteemed by Pope himself, as an effort of his greatest skill and art, as a poet †; and I have always esteemed the letter abovementioned to Mrs Fermor, as the most engaging effort of his skill and art, as a letter writer. But let the reader judge.

* To Mrs Arabella Fermor, after her marriage.

Madam,
You are sensible by this time, how much the tenderness of one man of merit, is to be preferred to the addresses of a thousand; and by this time the gentleman you have made choice of, is sensible how great is the joy of having all those charms and good qualities, which have pleased so many, now applied to please one only. It was but just, that the same virtues which gave you reputation, should give you happiness; and I can wish you no greater, than that you may reap it in as high a degree, as so much good nature, must infallibly give it to your husband.

(28) Private Secretary to King George I.

* With some others, intitled, Poëmata quaedam A Poëta Latine reddita.

(29) Essay on the Writings of Pope, p. 110. This was the practice of Racine, who, when he had thus laid out a tragedy, used to say, My tragedy is finished.

† Warburton.

he also published his Temple of Fame, having, according to his usual caution, kept it two years in his study [O]. That object of the universal passion, was full upon his thoughts at this time. He had been from the first setting out in full stretch after it [P], and saw it now within his reach; accordingly we find him in high spirits, diverting himself with the ladies, to one of whom he sent a copy of his Temple, with an humorous gay epigram [Q], in a letter by a passage of which it appears, that he had now begun to translate Homer's Iliad, and made a good progress in it, and in 1713, he gave out proposals for publishing that translation by subscription. He had been pressed to this undertaking some years before by some of his friends (aa), and was now greatly encouraged in the design by others. His religious principles disqualified him from receiving any solid testimony of his merit, in the usual way of a place at Court. Common prudence therefore prompted him, to make the best advantage he could of the reputation he had obtained in his trade, and try to raise an independent fortune by it. And the success was such, as must needs answer, if not exceed, his most sanguine expectations (bb); he acquired a considerable fortune by a subscription so large, that it does honour to the kingdom (cc). He saw all parties and denominations join in it, notwithstanding the underhand practices of some pretended friends, who in vain opposed the stream; at the head of these, was found Mr Addison. Our author had long paid an awful veneration to that rival, the consciousness of which, served to set a keener edge upon his resentment now. But though the sense of so much treachery and falseness tingled in every vein; yet he managed it with the nicest prudence [R], and at last revenged it by a satire, which does honour to himself (dd). Thus

'It may be expected perhaps, that one who has the title of being a wit, should say something more polite on this occasion, but I am really more a well wisher to your felicity, than a celebrator of your beauty. Besides, you are now a married woman, and in a way to be a great many better things, than a fine Lady; such as an excellent wife, a faithful friend, a tender parent, and at last, as the consequence of them all, a Saint in Heaven. You ought now to hear nothing, but that which is all that you ever desired to hear, (whatever others may have spoken to you) I mean truth; and it is with the utmost that I assure you, no friend you have, can more rejoice in any good that befalls you, is more sensibly delighted with the prospect of your future happiness, or more unfeignedly desires a long continuance of it.

'I hope you will think it but just, that a man, who will certainly be spoken of as your admirer after he is dead, may have the happiness, while he is living, to be esteemed, Your, &c.'

Here Pope appears the man of gallantry, good nature, and a thorough knowledge of the world. This letter is sometimes annexed to the poem not injudiciously, as rendering the entertainment full and compleat, in the happy marriage of the Heroine. The Rape, &c. was translated into French, and printed at Paris in 1728. In Italian verse by the Abbé Conti, a noble Venetian, and by the Marquis Rongoni, Envoy Extraordinary from the Duke of Modena, to King George the Second. Moreover, as it was our author's only attempt in the heroic-comical way, so it met with a very singular fate: Besides the versions into foreign languages, there was a prose irony of it done in English. It happened to step forth upon the stage of the public, at a time when the tide of parties ran very high, and among other subjects of dispute, the famous Barrier Treaty, was much bandied as the boast of the Whigs. Hereupon Mr Pope being known, both by his birth and breeding, to be cast among the Tories, there came out a very humorous piece (30), wherein the author maintained, that the Rape of the Lock, was an allegorical poem, written purely with a malevolent design to expose and ridicule that treaty; for the proof of this position, the author only desired to have it granted, that the Treaty was meant by the Lock, and by the sole help of that reasonable postulatam, he made out his point, from the characters and machinery, beyond contradiction; all the under-parts following this principal very appositely.

[O] He kept the Temple of Fame two years in his study. Steele was not a little pleased with the compliment mentioned above*, and was encouraged by it to beg our author's assistance in the Guardian, of which he had just then formed the project. Mr Pope complied, and accordingly, we find some pieces of his in that periodical paper, but these are only a few of the first. For he left all correspondence with Sir Richard soon after, upon his giving a more political turn to these papers (31). Party violence was Mr Pope's detestation, inasmuch that he was willing to think Sir Richard had then got nothing by it; but in this he was mistaken, for Steele had obtained the patent for the play-house before. It was Sir Richard's natural good humour which chiefly pleased Pope, and to this we owe that excellent little poem called The dying Christian to his Soul: The request for it was made in the frank ingenuous way, and the performance was returned in the same spirit; 'I don't fend you word,' says Pope, I will, but I have already done it (32).

[P] He had been, from his first setting out, in full stretch after Fame.] In the hurry of this race he run his head against the old saw, the more haste the worse speed. It was apparently owing to the eager impetuosity of this passion, that he attempted his Ode upon St Cecilia's Day. Mr Dryden had obtained immortal fame by his Alexander's Feast: and the scholar, young as he was, fed himself with the hopes of hitting the same mark by shooting in the same bow. But here he met with a very sensible mortification. The Ode upon St Cecilia's Day was universally condemned for want of judgment, whatever wit there may be in the composition, which is very great in Mr Warburton's opinion. It is not improbable that it cost our author a great deal of pains, since he seems to have worked against the grain; whereas he complained that his Essay on Man was too easy, because, as his friend observed, that design was exactly suited to his genius (33); and from this instance, among some others, another author has inferred, that Pope's genius was not turned to the elevated and sublime species of poetry (34): So hazardous is the road to Fame.

[Q] A gayly humorous epigram.] He introduces it in the following words. 'Now I talk of Fame, I send you my Temple of Fame, which is just come out, but my sentiments about it you will see much better by this epigram.

'What's fame with men, by custom of the nation,
'Is call'd in women only reputation (35);
'About them both why keep we such a pother,
'Part you with one, and I'll renounce the other.'

A couplet in the same taste had slipped into the Rape of the Lock.

Oh! hadst thou, cruel, been content to seize Hairs less in fight, or any hairs but these.

Some of the fair sex taking offence, as 'tis said, to these lines, occasioned the two following, wherein that delicacy is handled very roughly, as being no better than a mere affected piece of prudery.

Who censure most, more precious hairs would lose,
To have the Rape recorded by his muse.

[R] He managed it with the exactest prudence.] The several steps of his conducting this very critical affair may be seen in his letters on the occasion, to which

(aa) Particularly Sir W. Trumbull, so long before as 1700. See his letter to our author, dated August 9th that year, in Pope's Works, Vol. VII.

(bb) Lintot the Printer gave him 1200 l. for it, besides all the copies for his subscribers. Warburton.

(cc) 'Tis said to have amounted to 6000 l. Warton.

(dd) Some have esteemed it the best that ever was wrote. Bishop Atterbury well understood the force of it, and in one of his letters to Pope says, 'Since you know where your strength lies, I hope you will not suffer that talent to lie unemployed.'

(32) Pope's Letters to and from Steele, in December 1712.

(33) Warburton's notes.

(34) Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope, passim.

(35) Letter 17. to the Ladies, in Vol. VII. of his Works.

(30) Intituled, A Key to the Lock, by Eldras Farnevelde, Apothecary.

* In note (2).

(31) Steele had now begun the Lover, and had wrote his letter to Lord Oxford the year before. See his article.

(ee) Upon the road he met with Lintot, with whom he had that conversation, of which we have so humorous an account in a letter of our author to Lord Burlington, who had lent him a mare for the journey.

(ff) Letter to Blount, dated Aug. 27, 1714.

Thus with admirable temper and spirit he preserved his dignity, and keeping his mind attentive to every means that might render his translation more perfect, he took a journey, a little before the death of Queen Anne, to Oxford (ee); to consult some books in the Bodleian and other libraries in that university (ff), and the first part of his proposal was delivered to the subscribers the following year. This gave great satisfaction, so that his finances were now put into such a flourishing state, that he resolved to place himself nearer his friends, in the capital (gg). In that view, the small affair at Binfield being sold, he purchased a house at Twickenham, whither he removed with his father and mother before the expiration of this year, 1715 (hh). He calls this one of the grand æra's of his days*, and the taste he displayed in improving the seat, became the general vogue [S]. His father survived this removal only two years, dying suddenly; after a very healthy life, at the age of seventy-five (ii). He was buried by his son at Twickenham, who erected a handsome monument to his memory, with an inscription celebrating his innocence, probity, and piety. As he was a Papist, he could not purchase nor put his money to interest on real security, and as he adhered to the interest of King James, he made it a point of conscience, not to lend it to the new government; so that though he was worth near twenty thousand pounds, as has been observed, when he left off business, from the same principles, at the Revolution, yet afterwards living upon the stock (kk) [T]. He left our

(gg) He was now possessed of an easy fortune in his own opinion, as may be inferred from a letter to Lord Halifax; wherein he declares, that living agreeably in the town, or contentedly in the country, was all the difference he set between an easy fortune and a small fortune. His Works, Vol. VII. Letter 244 poet

(hh) Letter to Mr Blount, dated March 20, 1715, and 30th. inscription in remark [GG], as also his letter on this occasion to Mr Blount. Vol. IV. p. 13. in the preface.

* Letters to Blount, June 22, 1716.

(ii) See the (kk) Warton, from Pope's Works, which the reader who has not perused them, will thank us for referring him. We shall only observe in general, that among other contemptibly mean artifices made use of by Addison to suppress the rising merit and fame of his rival; it appears from these letters, that he discouraged Pope from inserting the machinery in the Rape of the Lock; that to hurt him with the Whigs, he industriously gave it out, that Pope was a Tory and a Jacobite, and said he had a hand in writing the Examiners. That Addison himself translated the first book of Homer's Iliad, published under Tickell's name, which he declared, after Pope's was printed, was still the best that had ever been done in any language. And last of all, he privately encouraged Gildon to abuse Pope in a virulent pamphlet, and gave him ten guineas for the performance. In short, this was the most dangerous attack that Pope ever experienced. How much then does it raise the character of his parts and prudence, that he was able absolutely to defeat it, and even to break these darts, which envy and malignity had forged against him, upon the head of the forger.

[S] He purchased a house at Twickenham } While he was employed in this delightful work, he could not forbear doubling the pleasure he took in it, by communicating it to his friends. 'The young ladies, says he, in a letter to Mr Blount, may be assured that I make nothing new in my gardens without wishing to see them print their fairy steps in every part of them. I have put the last hand to my works of this kind, in happily finishing the subterraneous way* and grotto. I there found a spring of the clearest water, which falls in a perpetual rill that echoes thro' the cavern day and night. From the river Thames you see thro' my arch up a walk of the wilderness, to a kind of open temple wholly composed of shells in the rustic manner, and from that distance under the temple you look down thro' a sloping arcade of trees, and see the sails on the river passing suddenly and vanishing as thro' a perspective glass. When you shut the door of this grotto, it becomes on the instant from a luminous room, a camera obscura: on the wall of which all the objects of the river, hills, woods, and boats, are forming a moving picture in their visible radiations; and when you have a mind to light it up, it affords you a very different scene. It is finished with shells, interspersed with pieces of looking-glass in angular forms, and in the ceiling is a star of the same materials, at which, when a lamp of an orbicular figure, of thin alabaster, is hung in the middle, a thousand pointed rays glitter and are reflected over the place. There are connected to this grotto by a narrower passage, two porches, one towards the river, of smooth stones, full of light, and open; the other towards the garden, shadowed with trees, and rough with shells, flints, and iron ores. The bottom is paved with simple pebble, as is also the adjoining walk up the wilderness to the temple, in the natural taste, agreeing not ill with the little dripping murmur and the aquatic idea of the whole place. It wants nothing to complete it but a good statue, with an inscription like that beautiful picturesque one, which you know I am so fond of.

*Hujus Nympha loci, sacri custodia fontis,
Dormio, dum blandæ sentio murmur aquæ:
Parce meum, quisquis tangis cava marmora, somnum
Rumpere; seu bibas, sive lavere, tace.*

Nymph of the grott, these sacred springs I keep,
And to the murmur of these waters sleep:
Ah! spare my slumbers, gently tread the cave,
And drink in silence, or in silence lave.

You'll think I have been very poetical in this description, but 'tis pretty near the truth. This letter was written in 1725: he afterwards wrote a poem upon it in a peculiar cast and kind. And Mr Warburton informs us, that the improving this grotto was the favourite amusement of his declining years; so that, not long before his death, by enlarging and incrusting it about with a vast number of ores and minerals of the richest and rarest kinds, he had made it one of the most elegant and romantic retirements that is any where to be seen. And, adds that writer, the beauty of his poetic genius, in the disposition and ornaments of those romantic materials, appears to as much advantage as in any of his best contrived poems (36).

[T] He lived on the stock. This rigidness of the old gentleman's Jacobite principles betrays an uncommon degree of bigotted weakness, which it was the son's care, as much as possible, to keep out of sight. This was a part of prudence as well as piety, and we find him throwing a veil over it more than once.

For right hereditary tax'd and fin'd,
He stuck to poverty with peace of mind.
———What fortune pray? their own,
And better got than Bestia's from the throne.
Born to no pride, inheriting no strife,
Nor marrying discord in a noble wife.
Stranger to civil, and religious rage;
The good man walk'd in innocuous thro' his age.
No courts he saw, no suits would ever try;
Nor dar'd an oath, nor hazarded a lye.
Unlearn'd, he knew no schoolman's subtle art,
No language but the language of the heart.
By nature honest, by experience wise;
Healthy by temperance and by exercise.
His life, tho' long, to sickness past unknown:
His death was instant, and without a groan (37).

(36) Notes to the letter and poem.

(37) Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot.

* From his house to his garden, under the high road which separated them above.

poet to the management of so narrow a fortune, that any one false step would be fatal (11). The old gentleman had sometimes recommended to him in his earliest years, the study of Physick (mm), as the best means of repairing that waste of the substance, which from his own principles was rendered unavoidable. But this must have gone no further than a simple proposal, since we are assured by the son that he broke no duty, nor disobeyed any parent, in following the trade of a Poet (nn); and his father had the satisfaction of living long enough to see him in a sure way of making a genteel fortune by it. In verity, want of a due attention to this necessary point was none of our poet's weakness; on the other hand, we find him taking all opportunities to push it to the utmost: In this spirit, not satisfied with the golden tide that was now continually flowing in from his translation, he published, in 1717, a collection of all the poetical pieces he had wrote before; in which the regard to his fortune had undeniably a considerable share (oo); he proceeded in the same spirit to give a new edition of Shakespear, which being published in 1721, discovered that he had consulted his fortune in the undertaking more than his fame (pp). The Iliad being finished, he engaged upon the like footing (qq) to undertake the Odyssy [U]. And that work being compleated in 1725; the following year was employed, in concert with his associates, Dean Swift and Dr Arbuthnot, in printing several volumes of Miscellanies [W]. About this time he narrowly escaped losing his life as he was returning home in a friend's chariot; which, on passing a bridge, happened to be overturned, and thrown with the horses into the river: The glasses were up, and he not able to break them; so that he was in immediate danger of drowning, when the postillion, who had just recovered himself, came to his relief, broke the glass which was uppermost, took him out, and carried him to the bank; but a fragment of the broken glass cut one of his hands so desperately, that he lost the use of two of his fingers *. He had now made such a fence about his fortune, as put it out of danger; and the like fence, which he had been long labouring to set about his fame being finished in the Dunciad, that satire came out in 1727, 4to. He somewhere observes, that the life of an author, is a state of warfare; and he has in this attack, or rather series of attacks, shewed himself a complete general in the art of this kind of war. Fabius cunctando, &c. Our poet bore the insults of his enemies full ten years before he hazarded a general battle; he was all that while climbing the hill of Parnassus, during which, he could not forbear some slight skirmishes, and the success of these was of use, in shewing him his

(99) It was published in the same manner, and fold on the same conditions to Lintot, except only, that instead of 1200 l. he had but 600 for the copy. Warburton.

* Note to Letter xix. in his Works, Vol. X. dated November 16, 1726.

[U] He undertook the Odyssy. While he was employed upon the Iliad, Mr Broome and Mr Fenton, who had assisted him in it, entered into a design of translating the Odyssy; and having done several books by that time Pope had finished the Iliad, they communicated them to him for his revisal; Mr Pope performed the request, but acquainted them that he was upon the same design, and had made a good progress in it, and would, if they approved of it, make use of what they had sent him for the furtherance of the work. This was easily yielded to so good a friend, and so much better a versifier (38). Mr Pope being charged several years after, with selling another man's labours printed under his own name (39), observes, it ought to have been added, that he bought them. That he gave 500 l. for them, for which he was ready to produce a receipt. Mr Broome, who wrote the notes at the conclusion of them, gives an account of his share in the performance (40). When the subscription-books were completed, Mr Pope sold the copy as abovementioned to Lintot, and obtained a patent for his sole printing of it for fourteen years, as he had done for the Iliad. The latter patent, however, was drawn up with such a variation from the former, as the difference of the two cases required (41): no objection was made at that time to the form by Mr Lintot; but when he found the sale of the book fall greatly short of what his expectations had been raised to by the success of the Iliad; he spared not to make loud complaints of this difference in the two patents, and said he had always understood there was none, nor any occasion for it, and even alleged that Mr Pope had been guilty of some management in order to deceive him into that opinion; and it is certain he was deceived (42). But this might be occasioned not unlikely, by his own fond attention to the gains arising from it, the prospect of which occupied his thoughts so entirely, as to leave no room to imagine, or enquire after, any difference. However that be, 'tis certain that in this ill humour, by way of revenge, he not only railed himself, but printed the railings of others against our author; who, in return, gave him a place in the Dunciad, where we see him matched in a race against Curll.

[W] Employed with Swift and Arbuthnot in the Miscellanies. Among other things that make up this work, there are inserted The Memoirs of Martin Scriblerus, concerning which we are obliged to Mr Warburton for the following anecdote: That Pope, Arbuthnot, and Swift, projected to write a satire in conjunction, on the abuse of human learning in every branch; and, to make it the better received, they proposed to do it in the manner of Cervantes, the original author of this species of satire, under the history of feigned adventures. But the separation of these friends, which soon after happened, with the death of one [Arbuthnot in 1734], and the infirmities of the other, put a final stop to their project, when they had only drawn out an imperfect essay towards it, under the title of The First Book of the Memoirs of Scriblerus (43). And the same gentleman tells us elsewhere, that the Travels of Gulliver, the Treatise of the Profound, of Literal Criticism on Virgil, and the Memoirs of a Parish-Clerk, are only for many detached parts and fragments of this work (44). These remarks are confirmed by Mr Pope himself; from whom we learn also, that the project was formed as early at least as the year 1714, when Dean Swift being retired into Berkshire, on the quarrel of Oxford and Bolingbroke, our author, to divert his friend on that melancholy occasion, sent a humorous letter, containing several conjectures about the cause of his retreat; and, among others, mentions the following: 'Dr Arbuthnot is, indeed, says he, singular in his opinion, and imagines your only design is to attend at full leisure to the Life and Adventures of Scriblerus. This, indeed, must be granted of greater importance than all the rest, and I wish I could promise so well of you; the top of my own ambition is to contribute to that great work, and I shall translate Homer by the bye (45).' Accordingly Mr Warburton declares, that polite letters never lost more than in the defeat of this scheme, in which each of this illustrious triumvirate would have found exercise for his own peculiar talent, besides constant employment for that they all had in common. Arbuthnot was skilled in every thing which related to science, Pope was master of the fine arts, and Swift excelled in the knowledge of the world; wit they had all in equal measure, and that so large, as no age, perhaps, ever produced three men, to whom nature had more bountifully bestowed it, or art brought it to higher perfection (46).

(11) Letter upon the death of his father to Mr Elouet.

(mm) Letter 8th to Cromwell, Jan. 17, 1709.

(nn) Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot.

(oo) See Warburton's preface.

(pp) He made amend, however, for it, by the excellent monument of Shakespear in Westminster-abbey, which was chiefly owing to him. He also wrote the inscription, in which the expression, Publicus amor posuit, has been censured as unclassical. He also published Parnell's Poems this year.

(38) Communicated by Mr Fenton.

(39) In an Epistle from a Doctor of Divinity to a Nobleman at Court, was this line: And fold Broome's labours prior'd with Pope's name. See a Letter to a Noble Lord, Dec. 1733, in Pope's Works, Vol. VIII.

(40) 'Tis said he gave Mr Broome 600, and Mr Fenton 300 l. Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope.

(41) In the former 'tis said he translated the Iliad; in the latter, that he had undertaken a translation of the Odyssy. See the two patents prefixed to the respective works.

(42) He even laid a wager of ten guineas with Pope himself, that they were drawn up in the same form. Communicated by Lintot.

(43) Note to these Memoirs.

(44) Note to letter i. in Pope's Works, Vol. IX.

(45) The last cited letter, which is dated June 28, 1714.

(46) Conclusion of the note to the Memoirs of Scriblerus, as before.

his superior strength, and thereby adding confidence to his courage; but he was now feated safely on the summit: Besides, he had obtained what in his own opinion is the happiest end of life, the love of valuable men; the next felicity he declares, was to get rid of fools and scoundrels; and to that end, after having by several affected marches and counter-marches, brought the whole army of them entirely into his power, he suddenly fell upon them with a pen as irresistible as the sword of Michael the Archangel †, and made an absolutely universal slaughter of them, suffering not a single soul to escape his fury. The poem cautiously made it's first appearance, as a masked battery, in Ireland; nor, indeed, was the triumph completed, without the assistance of our author's undoubted second, Dean Swift, who having furnished it with some exquisitely wrought artillery, in that pompous figure it made a new appearance, printed at London in 1728. This edition was presented to the King and Queen, by Sir Robert Walpole; who probably at this time, offered to procure Mr Pope a pension † [X], which he refused with the same spirit, as he had formerly done to an offer of the same kind, made to him by Lord Halifax. In 1729, our poet, in the view of setting yet another fence about his fortune, purchased an annuity of 100 l. for his own life, that of his mother being likewise included (rr). The same year, by the advice of Lord Bolingbroke, he turned his pen to subjects of morality (ss), and accordingly we find him, with the assistance of that friend, at work this year upon his Essay on Man [Z]. This subject was exactly suited to his genius; he found the performance easy to a degree that surprized himself, and he thereupon employed his leisure hours in pursuing the same design in his Ethic Epistles, which came out separately in the course of the two following years (tt). The clamour raised against one of these [Z] put him upon writing satires, in which he ventured to attack the characters of some persons of high rank. The affront was repented in such a manner, as provoked him to let loose the whole fury of his satirical rage against them [AA], which was poured forth both in prose and verse (uu). After this he continued

[X] Sir R. Walpole offered him a pension ] This seems to be hinted in a letter of our author to Dean Swift (47). 'I was once before, says he, displeas'd at you for complaining to Mr ———, of my not having a pension, I am so again, at your naming it to a certain Lord. I have given proof, in the course of my life, from the time when I was in the friendship of Lord Bolingbroke and Mr Craggs, even to this time when I am civilly treated by Sir Robert Walpole, that I never thought myself so warm in any party's cause, as to deserve their money, and therefore would never have accepted it. I desire you to take off any impressions which that dialogue may have left upon his Lordship's mind, as if I ever had any thoughts of being beholden to him, or any other, in that way*.' One of the proofs here intimated, was the refusal he had given many years before, to an offer of the same kind by Lord Halifax; as appears by a letter to that Lord as early as the year 1714, where he writes in these terms.

'My Lord,
'I am obliged to you, both for the favours you have done me (48), and for those you intend me. I distrust neither your will, nor your memory, when it is to do good: and if ever I become troublesome or solicitous, it must not be out of expectation, but out of gratitude. It is indeed a high strain of generosity in you, to think of making me easy all my life, only because I have been so happy as to divert you some few hours; but if I may have leave to add, it is because you think me no enemy to my native country, there will appear a better reason; for I must of consequence, be very much, as I sincerely am, Your's &c (49). As these offers must be understood to be made in the view of taking him off from his attachments to his friends, his refusal of them, are so many illustrious proofs of his steadiness in that point (50). Yet he declares, in a letter to Dr Swift, that he had personal obligations, which he would ever preserve, to men of different sides.

[Y] Lord Bolingbroke advised the Essay on Man.] The following extract of a letter to Dean Swift, discovers the reason of his Lordship's advice. 'Bid him [Pope] talk to you of the work he is about, I hope in good earnest, it is a fine one, and will be in his hands an original. His sole complaint is, that he finds it too easy in the execution. This flatters his laziness. It flatters my judgment; who always thought, that universal as his talents are, this is eminently and peculiarly his, above all the writers I know, living or dead; I do not except Horace.' Pope tells the Dean in the next letter, what this work was. 'The work he [Bolingbroke] speaks of with such abundant partiality, is a system of Ethics, in the Horatian way.'

In another letter written probably in the entrance of the following year, we see the general aim which at least he wished might be attributed to this work. 'I am just now writing (or rather planning) a book to bring mankind to look upon this life with comfort and pleasure, and put morality in good humour (51).'

[Z] The clamour raised against one of these.] This was the fourth epistle addressed to Lord Burlington upon Taste; the character of Timon in it gave much offence. The description 'tis said was too plain not to be known who was pointed at. And the Duke of Chandos 'tis said wrote to our author in such a manner as made him sensible, that he ought to have confin'd himself to a made character. Mr Pope, we are told, began to wish he had not carried the matter so far, but there was no receding; all he could do was to palliate the business, and this was done in a letter by Mr Cleland to Mr Gay, in December 1731 (52). But this letter did not satisfy, nor yet one that he wrote to the Duke, professing his innocence. All this while he had the pleasure to see the Epistle sell so, that it went through the press a third time very soon. Thereupon, in high spirits, he published a letter to Lord Burlington, the March following (53); wherein having taken notice of the clamour, which, he says, through malice and mistake still continued; he expresses his resentment of this usage, disavows any design against the Duke, makes him several high compliments, and then proceeds thus: 'Certainly the writer deserved more candour, even in those who know him not, than to promote a report, which in regard to that noble person was impertinent; in regard to me villainous. I have taken, continues he, an opportunity of the third edition (54), to declare his belief not only of my innocence, but of their malignity, of the former of which my heart is as conscious, as I fear some of theirs must be of the latter; his humanity feels a concern for the injury done to me, while his greatness of mind can bear with indifference the insult offered to himself.' After this, he concludes with threatening to make use of real names, not fictitious ones, in his ensuing works; and how far he went into the execution of that menace, will be seen in the next remark.

[AA] He let loose his satirical rage, against some persons of high rank ] In the first satire of the second book of Horace, he had described Lord Harvey and Lady Mary Wortley Montague, so characteristically, under the names of Lord Fanny and Sappho, that these two noble personages did not only take up the same weapon against the aggressor, but used all their interest among the nobility, and even with the King and Queen, to hurt him; this last injury was what Pope complained of most; and for that reason, the letter which

† Which, nor keen nor solid might resist. Milton's Paradise lost, B. i.

|| In the epilogue to his satires he writes thus of Sir Robert: Seen him I have, but in his happier hour Of social pleasure, ill exchanged for pow'r. Seen him, uncumber'd with the venal tribe, Smile without art, and win without a bribe.

(rr) See his letters to Dr Swift.

(47) Dated Dec. 18, 1729. Letters to and from Dr Swift, No. 44.

* Mr Craggs, in 1720, gave him a subscription for a hundred pounds in the South Sea, of which he made no manner of use.

(48) His Lordship not only subscribed himself to the translation of the Iliad, but promoted it in the Hanover club, and rallied their Secretary Phillips, for keeping the subscriptions in his hands some time, out of enmity to Pope.

(49) This letter is dated Decemb. 1, 1714. It is Letter 24th, in Pope's Works, Vol. VII.

(50) This was his frequent boast; Unplac'd, unpen-sion'd, no man's heir or slave. Epistle to Or Arbuthnot.

(51) He had joined with his Lordship in assisting the Craftsman. See some letters in the name of John Trothead, printed in the appendix to that paper in 1731.

(52) The Essay on Man came out also in the same manner, the first book being published in 1732, and the last in 1734.

(53) In prose, in a letter to Lord Harvey; and in verse, in an epistle to Dr Arbuthnot.

(51) Pope's Letters, ubi supra.

(52) 'Tis dated Decemb. 16th that year. See his Letters, ubi supra.

(53) Viz. Mar. 7, 1731.

(54) In the last edition the title is changed for this: The Use of Riches.

continued writing satires 'till the year 1739 [BB], when he entertained some thoughts of undertaking an Epic poem (ww), which, however, proved abortive*. In the interim, several of his familiar letters having stole into the publick without his privity, he published a genuine collection of them in 1737 [CC]. About this time he fell into the acquaintance which he wrote in answer to it, was shewn to her Majesty, as soon as it was finished, which concludes in these words. 'After all, your Lordship will be careful not to wrong my moral character, with those under whose protection I live; and through whose lenity alone I can live with comfort. Your Lordship, I am confident upon consideration, will think you inadvertently went a little too far, when you recommended to their prurial, and strengthened by the weight of your approbation, a libel mean in it's reflections upon my poor figure, and scandalous in those on my honour and integrity; wherein I was represented as an enemy to human race, a murderer of reputations, a monster marked by God like Cain, deserving to wander accursed through the world. — A strange picture of a man, who had the good fortune to enjoy many friends, who will be always remembered as the first ornament of his age and country, and no enemies that ever continued to be heard of, except Mr John Dennis and your Lordship. A man who never wrote a line, in which the religion or government of his country, the royal family, or their ministry, were disrespectfully mentioned; the animosity of any one party gratified at the expence of another; or any censure paid, but upon known vices, acknowledged folly, or aggressing impertinence. It is with infinite pleasure he finds, that some men who seem ashamed and afraid of nothing else, are so very sensible of this ridicule; and 'tis for that very reason, he resolves by the grace of God, and your Lordship's good leave,

* See remark [F].

' That while he breathes, no rich or noble knave
' Shall walk the world in credit to his grave.

' This he thinks is rendering the best service he can to the publick. and even to the good government of his fellow-creatures. For this, at least, he may deserve some commendations from the greatest persons in it. Your Lordship knows of whom I speak — their names I should be as sorry, and as much ashamed to place near your's on such an occasion, as I should to see you, my Lord, placed so near their persons, if you could ever make use of their ear, as to asperse or misrepresent an innocent man.'

Pope did not think proper to print this letter (55), nor yet, what is more remarkable, to communicate it to his friend Swift; to whom he excused himself in a letter, sent with his fourth Essay on Man, and his epistle to Lord Cobham. 'There is a woman's war, says he, declared against me by a certain Lord, his weapons are the fame which women and children use, a pin to scratch, and a squirt to bespatter. I writ a sort of answer, but was ashamed to enter the lists with him, and after shewing it to some people suppressed it: otherwise it was such, as was worthy of him, and worthy of me (56).' He had before given that friend an account of this affair, and of his own conduct in it, as follows. 'That I am an author, whose characters are thought of some weight, appears from the great noise and bustle, that the court and town make about me. I desire your opinion as to Lady — s and Lord — s performance. They are certainly the top wits of the court; and you may judge by that single piece, what can be done against me, for it was laboured, corrected, pre-commended, and past disapproved, so far as to be disowned by themselves, after each had highly cried it up for the other's: I have met with some complaints, and heard at a distance of some threats occasioned by my verses. I sent fair messages to acquaint them where I was to be found in town, and to offer to call at their houses to satisfy them, and so it dropped. It is very poor in any one to rail and threaten at a distance, and have nothing to say to you when they see you (57).' He knew well the nature of his friend, and that this address was ad hominem, accordingly he received a most comforting answer, which concludes thus: 'Give me a shilling, and I will insure you, that posterity shall never know one single enemy, excepting those whose memory you have preserved (58).'

Mr Warburton speaking of our author's prose letter, as well as that in verse, justly observes that they are both master-pieces in their kind. The former more lively, critical, and pointed (59); the latter more grave, moral, and sublime. However, Dr Arbuthnot, who did not long survive the epistle (60) in verse to him, some time before his death gave his friend a hint of what indeed is the greatest fault in his satires, by advising him to study in them more to reform, than chastise. This gentleman seems to have been indue'd with all the qualities requisite for the dearest friendship, and knew in what it consisted. As for you, my good friend, says he on this occasion, I think since our first acquaintance, there have not been any of those little suspicions, that often affect the sincerest friendships. I am sure, not on my side (61). The whole letter is in the same spirit, and I believe no body can read it without the tenderest emotion. His hint upon the fault in Pope's satires, of being too virulent, was undeniably just. But then indeed it must be allowed, that the fault is common to Pope with all others, who have engaged in this species of writing. They all take greater pleasure in chastizing, than reforming; though by that means, they are sure to turn the edge of their wit upon themselves, since it must be owing to the predominance of ill-nature above benevolence. In short, the true qualities of a satirist, are usually and not amiss expressed by an allusion to the operations of surgery. The three qualifications requisite to that art; are, an eagle's eye, a lion's heart, and a lady's hand. But this last, being founded on a necessary tender feeling and concern, both for the future recovery and present pain of the patient, is only seen in humane and benevolent dispositions*.

[BB] He continued writing satires 'till 1739.] He has told us in the epilogue the reason of laying down his pen †, and he gave the true one for laying down his moral essays to Dr Swift long before. 'I am, says he, almost at the end of my morals, as I have been long ago of my wit; my system is a short one, and my circle narrow. Imagination has no limits; that is a sphere in which you may move on to eternity: but where one is confined to truth, or, to speak more like a human creature, to the appearances of truth, we soon find the shortness of our tether (62).' This was not his case as a satirist; the tartness of that lash was too liquorish to be cloying. Though he was drawn out of the sphere for a while by some more immediately interesting views (63), yet we shall find him returning to it again in a little time, and continuing to move in it 'till death arrested his steps.

[CC] He published his letters in 1737.] The avowed incident which occasioned this publication is retailed in the preface, and the truth of it rests upon our author's name. The story is undeniably somewhat intricate, which caused a suspicion that some cunning had been used by him; but the cloud may possibly be blown away by Dr Warburton (64), in his promised history of this friend's life. In the mean time, we must content ourselves with another reason for publishing these letters at this time, which considers them as part of the design of his magnum opus (65), or his Essay on Man, Ethic Epistles, and Satires. 'My opinion is,' says he, that there might be collected from them the best system that ever was wrote for the conduct of human life, at least to shame all reasonable men out of their follies and vices (66); and no doubt, the manner in which Mr Curl got possession of some of them, is a flaming instance of the corruption of the age' Whatever may be thought of this reason, 'tis certain the increase of his purse had no small share in the motives for publishing them. Familiar letters betwixt persons of any reputation will always meet with readers; and the reason of it is well expressed in these very letters by Lord Bolingbroke, who, in a postscript to one of Pope's to Swift, writes thus: 'I seek no epistolary fame, but am a good deal pleased to think that it will be known hereafter, that you and I lived in the most friendly intimacy together.—Pliny continues his Lordship, writ his letters for the publick; so did Seneca; so did Balzac, Voiture, &c. Tully did not; and therefore these give us more pleasure.

(59) If we consider his Lordship's effeminate voice, the liveliest point is, perhaps, the following: Whoever beat it [the satire against Pope] your Lordship brought it forth.

(60) He died February 27, 1734-5.

(61) Letter 47, in the second volume of Pope's Letters.

* Mr Pope was charged with spreading a story, that Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, when at Constantinople, once made a visit in the absence of her husband to the seraglio; and perhaps he was not quite clear. Warburton.

† That he found he did no good by them. Satires, like laws that are too severe, never fail to eat out their own professed purpose.

(62) Letter 73, dated Decemb. 29, 1734.

(63) The surreptitious edition of his letters, mentioned in the ensuing remark.

(64) This gentleman tells us, the first volume was published at the request of Mr Allen, of Wydecombe near Bath. Note to letter 90, in Vol. IX.

(65) Pope calls it so in a letter to Dean Swift, letter 70.

(66) Letter 87, dated July 21, 1737.

(ww) This is hinted at the end of his epilogue to his Satires.

(55) It's first appearance in print was in Mr Warburton's edition of our author's Works in 1751.

(56) Letter 70, dated Jan. 6, 1734.

(57) Letter 65, dated April 2, 1733.

(58) Letter 66, dated May 1st following.

of Mr (now Dr) Warburton (Dean of Bristol); who having wrote a commentary on the Essay on Man; that poem was republished in 1740, with the Commentary [DD]. It was at the instance of this friend too, that our author added a fourth book to the Dunciad [EE]; which was first printed separately in the year 1742. But the year after, the whole poem came out together [FF], as a specimen of a more correct edition of his works, which he had ⁴ We see Cato, and Brutus, and Pompey, such as they really were, and not such as the gaping multitude of their own age took them to be, or as historians and poets have represented them to us.—That is another pleasure. I remember to have seen a procession at Aix la Chapelle, wherein an image of Charlemagne is carried on the shoulders of a man, who is hid by the long robe of the imperial saint. Follow him into the vestry, you see the bearer slip from under the robe, and the gigantic figure dwindles into an image of the ordinary size, and is set by among other lumber (67) His Lordship's remark is undeniably very just, and unavoidably turns our eyes upon his pupil, who is the person chiefly concerned in it. Accordingly we find in these letters, not only that he had given into some gayeties in his youth, as well as other poets, for of that he had made public confession long before; but what was at this time particularly interesting; these letters discover the peculiar sting, in the name of Sappho, under which he satirizes Lady Mary Wortley Montague. That pretieuse, Mrs Elizabeth Thomas*, being so called by her keeper Mr Cromwell, to whom our author sent the following rondeau to be communicated to her.

' You know where you did despise,
' T'other day, my little eyes,
' Little legs, and little thighs,
' And something else of little size,
' You know where.
' You, 'tis true, have fine black eyes,
' Taper legs, and tempting thighs;
' Yet what more than all we prize
' Is a thing of little size,
' You know where (68).'

[DD] The Commentary on the Essay on Man. The ill state of Mr Pope's health had frequently drawn him to Bath, where he could not be unknown to Mr Allen (69), who was greatly pleased with his letters, and contracted a friendship with the author. The result of this friendship was his acquaintance with Mr Warburton (70), who tells us, he had before this acquaintance wrote his commentary upon the Art of Criticism, as also another on the Essay on Man. The great complaint of that essay was its obscurity (71); our author had been told of it by his friend Dean Swift at its first appearance. 'I confess, says that friend, in some few places, I was forced to read twice. I believe I told you before what the Duke of D—— said to me on that occasion; how a judge here who knows you, told him, that, on the first reading these essays, he was much pleased, but found some lines a little dark: on the second, most of them cleared up, and his pleasure increased; on the third, he had no doubt remaining, and that he admired the whole.' But their obscurity was comparatively a small fault; the author was also charged with having laid a plan of Deism (72). It was against this objection, that Mr Warburton first entered the lists in defence of Mr Pope, in these commentaries; and Mr Pope, in a letter to him on this occasion, acknowledges the obscurity of his piece. 'You have, says he, made my system as clear as I ought to have done, and could not; you understand me as well as I do myself, but you express me better than I could express myself (73).' And, in a subsequent letter upon the same subject, he goes still further. 'You understand my work, says he, better than I do myself.' It seems as if Lord Bolingbroke, who confessedly furnished the matter of the Essay, had put more into our author's head than he was able perfectly to comprehend. This edition, with the comment, was translated into French, by a gentleman belonging to Mons. Cromby, an ambassador. Mr Pope desired his friend Warburton to procure a good translation of the Essay on Man into Latin prose, which was begun by a gentleman of Cambridge; but a specimen which was sent to our author not happening to please him, that project proved abortive (74).

[EE] The fourth book of the Dunciad. About the time that Pope acquainted his last mentioned friend with his design to add this book to the three former of the Dunciad, they went together to Oxford, where Mr Pope had the compliment made to him of an offer of a Doctor's degree in Law (75); which he chusing to wave, went further west to visit some friends, leaving his fellow traveller in the university; who staying there a day longer to visit his friend Dr John Conybeare, Dean of Christ-Church, received a message that day from the Vicechancellor, by a person of eminence in the university, with the like compliment, to know if a Doctor's degree in Divinity would be acceptable to him. The offer was entertained in a very different manner from the former to Mr Pope. But this latter proved a meer compliment, the makers of it being, as it seems, mistaken in imagining, that one friend would not chuse to be doctored without the other; so that, when the congregation met for the purpose, the grace passed in the negative. This affront was warmly repented by Mr Warburton (76); but he had sufficient amends for it made to him by Dr Tho. Herring, Archbishop of Canterbury, who conferred that degree upon him not long after; and it is needless to observe, that besides a Prebend of Worcester, he has been since promoted to the Deanery of Bristol.

[FF] The whole poem came out in 1743. In the former edition in 1742, Mr Cibber being now become Laureat, was promoted to the throne of Dullness; which indignity he was judged to have merited by a late attack upon our author, wherein, among other things, was revealed a ludicrous passage of his youthful days, to this purport: That Mr Pope was decoyed to a brothel by a certain nobleman, in company of Cibber; who there, out of pure compassion, pulled him off of one of the ladies whom he had mounted, and might have done himself a mischief (77). The story was told with humour, and, indeed, was no more than a very apposite return to a reflection cast upon Cibber some years before, in the epistle to Dr Arbuthnot.

And has not Colley still his lord, and whore?

The truth is, there had been between them an irreconcilable quarrel of a long standing, the original of which we have already related in the course of this work (78). It began, unluckily for Mr Pope, with some little blemish to his fame, in the play-house; and he continued in a state of warfare with the players ever after. In the mean time, Cibber thrived, procured many valuable friends, and at last obtained the Laureat's place. All this was apparently beheld with no pleasing eyes by his antagonist, who now resolved to take his full revenge, by making him the hero of the Dunciad. To this purpose, no art that he could devise was left untried against this hated rival. The farce began with an Act of Settlement upon the throne, which runs thus:

By virtue of the authority in us vested, by the act of subjeeling poets to the power of a licenser, we have revised this piece; where, finding the stile and place of King have been given to a certain pretended pseudo poet, or phantom, of the name of Theobald; and apprehending the same may be deemed in some sort a reflection on Majesty, or at least an encroachment on that legal authority, which has bestowed on another person the crown of Poesy: We order the said pretended pseudo-poet, or phantom, utterly to vanish and depart out of the world, and declare the said throne of Poesy from this instant to be abdicated and vacant, unless duly and lawfully supplied by the Laureat himself: and it is hereby enacted, that no other person presume to fill the same.

And, lest this should not be sufficient, there was prefixed the following advertisement: 'It was expressly confessed in the preface to the first edition, that this poem was not published by the author himself.

(67) Letter 45, in the 9th volume of Pope's Works, ubi sup.

* Several of Mr Pope's letters to Cromwell being entrusted by the latter to this lady, she sold them to Curll, who, 'tis said, made use of them as so many decoy-ducks to draw in others; and, by that means, the surreptitious edition of our author's letters was completed.

(68) See Letter 14. to H. Cromwell.

(69) An eminent Quaker, who farms all the cross posts in England, and has a good estate and a sumptuous house at Wydecomb, about a mile from Bath, in which city one of his post-offices is kept. Letter 90. Vol. IX.

(70) Mr Warburton lived then at Wyderomb.

(71) Particularly the maxim, Whatever is, is right, has been always thought oracular; and a late writer hints the use of it to the Church of Rome. Jortin's Erafmus, p. 224. edit. 1758, 4to.

(72) By Mr Croufaz, a German Professor, whose plausible objections were owing to a faulty translation of this poem into French by the Abbé Renel, printed at Paris in 1738. Warburton.

(73) Letter 72.

(74) Warburton's notes.

(75) Besides Mr Pope's distinguished personal merit, he had another in respect to this university by his birth, being lineally descended from Sir Tho. Pope, the founder of Trinity-college. Collins's Baronetage, Vol. IV.

(76) Pope's Works, Vol. X. Letters 107, 108. Dr Lee, Master of Balliol-college, was then Vice-chancellor.

(77) Cibber's Letter to Pope, edit. 1742.

(78) In Mr Gay's article, remark [I].

had then resolved to give to the publick. And he made some progress in that design, but did not live to compleat it. He had all his life been subject to an habitual head-ach, and that hereditary complaint (xx) was now greatly increased by a dropfy in his breast, under which he expired *, May 30th, 1744, in the fifty-sixth year of his age. His body was deposited, pursuant to his own request, in the same vault with those of his parents, to whose memory he had erected a monument, with an inscription written by himself [GG]. Not long before his death, he made his Will (yy); in which he constituted Miss Blount his testamentary heir during her life (zz): and, among other legacies, he bequeathed to Dr Warburton the property of all such of his works already printed, as he had written, or should write, commentaries upon, and had not been otherwise disposed of or alienated; with this condition, that they were published without future alterations [HH]. In discharge of this trust, that gentleman gave a compleat edition in 1751 of all Mr Pope's works, executed in such a manner, as he was persuaded would have been to the author's satisfaction [II]. In 1749, there was published a treatise (aaa) by Lord Bolingbroke, with a preface,

(xx) He is said to have been many years in love with Miss Blount; and it is agreeable to the constant devotion paid to her in all his writings; and by some passages in Dr Swift's letters, that friend seems to have been no stranger to it.

(aaa) Intituled, Letters of the Spirit of Patriotism, on the Idea of a Patriot King, and on the State of Parties at the Accession of King George I.

[GG] With an inscription written by himself.] It is a short inscription, in capital characters, as follows.

D. O. M.

Alexandro Pope, viro innocuo, probro, pio;

Qui vixit an. 75. ob. 1717.

Et Edithæ conjugii, inculpabili, pietissimæ;

Quæ vixit annos 93. ob. 1733.

Parentibus bene merentibus

Filius fecit.

Et sibi. Obiit an. 1744. ætatis 56.

It was printed originally in a foreign country; and what foreign country? Why one notorious for blunders; where, finding blanks only instead of proper names, those blunderers filled them up at their pleasure. The very heroë of the poem has been mistaken to this hour; so that we are obliged to open our notes with a discovery who he really was. We learn from the former editor, that this piece was presented by the hands of Sir Robert Walpole to King George the Second. Now the author directly tells us, his heroë is the man

Who brings

The Smithfield Muses to the ears of Kings.

And it is notorious to whom this prince conferred the honour of the Laureat. To these jocosè attempts to fix the intended infamy upon Cibber, there was added another in the serious way, in the edition of 1743, by Mr Warburton, who tells us, he had long had a design of giving some sort of notes on the works of this poet, before he had any acquaintance with him. He thought some were wanting of a more serious kind. I had lately, continues he, the pleasure of passing some months with the author in the country, where I prevailed upon him to do what he had long designed, and favour me with his explanation of several passages in his works. It happened, just at this juncture, that there was published a ridiculous book against him, full of personal reflections, which furnished him with a lucky opportunity of improving this poem, by giving it the only thing it wanted, a more considerable heroë (79). He was always sensible of its defect in that particular, and only let the piece pass with the heroë it had, purely for want of a better; not entertaining the least expectation, that such a one was reserved for this post as had obtained the Laureat. He could no longer deny this justice.

And yet I shall venture to say, there was another motive which had still more weight with our author; this person, who, from every folly, not to say vice, of which another would be ashamed, has constantly derived a vanity, and therefore was the man in the world who would least be hurt by it. All this while the general cry ran in favour of Colley, and this last effort on Pope's side was so far from having the desired effect, that it was turned against him, and construed to proceed from a consciousness of his newly-dubbed heroë's superiority in the skirmish; it being observable, that in these pen-wars, contrary to those of the sword, he that keeps the field, i. e. has the last word *, has generally the worst of it. The truth is, Cibber, in his pamphlet, promised to keep his temper, and did so; by which means our author was deprived of his usual weapon of advantage, and the Laureat got some reputation by his performance, which, consequently, Mr Pope must have lost. Thus it happened, that he was a little unlucky in the choice of both the heroes to the Dunciad. His edition of Shakespear proved no better than a foil, to set off the superiority of Theobald's; and Cibber bore away the palm from him in the drama. We have an account of two attempts of Pope's, one in each of the two principal branches of this species of poetry, and both unsuccessful. The fate of the comedy has been already mentioned (80) in this work; and the tragedy was saved from the like fate by one not less ignominious, being condemned, and burnt by his own hands (81).

VOL. V. No. 285.

This last line was added after his death, in pursuance to his Will; the rest was done on the death of his parents.

[HH] He bequeathed to Mr Warburton, &c.] After he had made his Will, he wrote this legateë a letter; in which, having informed him of his legacy, he says, 'I own the late encroachments upon my constitution make me willing to see the end of all further care about me or my works. I would rest for the one, in a full resignation of my being to be disposed of by the Father of all Mercies; and for the other, though, indeed, a trifle, yet a trifle may be some example, I would commit them to the candour of a sensible and reflecting judge, rather than to the malice of every short-sighted and malevolent critic, or inadvertent and censorious reader; and no head can set them in so good a light, or so well turn their best side to the day, as your own (82).'

[II] To the author's satisfaction.] The elegance of this edition is very commendable, and it is not to be doubted, but that the author's design, as to the collection, is faithfully observed, as far as it could be done (83). How far the editor's privilege in writing notes extended, is only known to himself. Several, inserted in the first edition, were left out in the second; but still several were retained, which contain severe, not to say ill-natured, reflections, upon the author's dearest friends (84). These have not escaped censure. 'Tis said, that allowing the remarks to be just, yet the inserting them in his works must either be an injury to his Will, or leave his moral character absolutely indefensible. One of these gives room to suspect this last to be the case with regard to these friends. In the 84th letter of the 9th volume, Mr Pöpe expresses himself to that old friend, Dean Swift, thus: 'You ask me if I have got any supply of new friends to make up for those that are gone; I think that impossible: but as, when the continual washing of a river takes away our flowers and plants, it throws weeds and fedges in their room; so the course of time brings us something, as it deprives us of a great deal: and, instead of leaving us what we cultivated, and expected to flourish and adorn us, gives us only what is of some little use by accident. Thus I have acquired ——— But I had my heart hardened, and blunt to new impressions. Adieu. I can say no more, I feel so much.' To the word room we see the following note: 'There are some strokes in this letter, which can no otherwise be accounted for, than by the author's extreme compassion and tenderness of heart, too much affected by the complaints of a peevish old man, labouring and impatient under his infirmities, and too intent on the friendly office of mollifying them.' The editor, we see, attributes these expressions of the author's love to an extremity of compassion, that is to weakness; but it is a very pardonable

(82) Letter 120. in Vol. IX.

(83) He observes, that it could not be done with regard to some of our author's juvenile pieces of gaiety. Preface.

(84) See, for instance, notes upon Atterbury's epitaph, and several upon the letters of Lord Bolingbroke and Dean Swift, in the edition of 1751.

(xx) It was hereditary from his mother. See note to Epistle to Arbuthnot.

* London Magazine for the year 1751.

(yy) It is dated Decemb. 12, 1743.

(79) In a letter dated July 12, 1743, Mr Pope writes thus: 'I am told the Laureat is going to publish a very abusive pamphlet; that is all I can desire; 'tis enough if it be abusive, and if it be his.' Letter 119. in Vol. IX. of his Works.

* 'Tis true, Cibber in his own life says, he was resolved to have the last word, as indeed he had; for his antagonist was thro' disabled by illness to contest any longer, and died soon after.

(80) See Mr Gay's article. But in this he had only a share with that friend and Dr Arbuthnot.

(81) It was called Clione, and formed upon the same story as a late one wrote and published by Mr Dodsley, with the same title, in 1759. See Dodsley's preface.

(bbb) In the advertisement last cited.

(ccc) Our poet used to say, he had rather be known under this character, than that of the best poet or writer in the world. And he begins Mr Fenton's epitaph, which, perhaps, is the best of his writing, thus: This modest stone, which few vain marbles can, May truly say, Here lies an honest man.

(85) In his Life of Dr Swift.

a preface, wherein Mr Pope's conduct, with regard to that piece, was represented as a most inexcusable act of treachery to his noble friend [KK]. A slur of such an odious nature, Mr Warburton, as guardian of our author's fame, thought himself obliged to take some notice of. He endeavoured to wipe off the stain from our poet's memory; but the fact was too notorious to be distinguished away. However, it may, perhaps, be overlooked, especially after the just volume of his life, which that gentleman has promised, shall have made it's appearance (bbb); since he assures us, that to have been one of the best poets in the world was but Mr Pope's second praise; he was in a higher class; he was one of the noblest works of God, he was an honest man (ccc) [LL]. And Lord Orrery observes (ddd), 'That if we may judge of him by his works, his chief aim was to be esteemed a man of virtue [MM]. His letters are written in that style; his last donable one, as long as we don't know them to be in consonant to some other warm expressions of love to any of his new friends, which may well be supposed to be the case at the time of his writing this letter, that is, before he knew Dr Warburton, or wrote those letters to him that are printed in this volume; wherein, if the expressions are sincere, it cannot be denied that our author had changed his heart a little since the time of his writing the letter here cited to Dean Swift. Be that as it will; Lord Orrery very justly disliked the continual complimenting turn of these letters (85); and those that have been since added by Mr Warburton, will give him no reason to like them better on that account. What is here observed will receive further light by the following remark.

(ddd) In his Letters, containing Memoirs of the Life and Writing of Dr Swift, N. P. His Lordship is now, 1799. Earl of Cork and Orrery.

[KK] A preface complaining of an act of treachery. It was intitled an Advertisement, and was drawn up in these terms. 'The following papers were written several years at the request and for the sake of some particular friends, without any design of ever making them public. How they came to be made so at this time, it may be proper to give an account. The original draughts were entrusted to a man on whom the author thought he might entirely depend after he had exacted from him, and taken his promise, that they should never go into any hands except those of five or six friends who were named to him. In this confidence the author rested securely for some years, and though he was not without suspicion, that they had been communicated to more persons, than he intended they should be, yet he was kept by repeated assurances even from suspecting that any copies had come into hands unknown to him. But this man was no sooner dead, than he received information, that an entire edition of 1500 copies of these papers had been printed; that this very man had corrected the press, and that he had left them in the hands of the Printer to be kept with great secrecy 'till further orders. The honest Printer kept his word with him better than he kept his with his friend; so that the whole edition came at last into the hands of the author, except some few copies which this person had taken out of the heap and carried away. By these copies it appeared, that the man who had been guilty of this breach of trust, had taken upon him further to divide the subject, and to alter and omit passages according to the suggestion of his own fancy.'

What aggravates this proceeding is, that the author had told him on several occasions, among other reasons, why he would not consent to the publication of these papers was, that they had been wrote in too much haste and hurry for the public eye, though they might be trusted to a few particular friends; he added more than once, that some things required to be softened, others perhaps to be strengthened, and the whole most certainly to be corrected, even if they were to remain, as he then imagined they would, in the hands of a few friends only.'

The main particulars of this fact were too notorious to be denied. But Mr Warburton entered heartily with great zeal into his friend's vindication, and endeavoured even to throw the greatest part of the infamy, that necessarily stuck to such a piece of treachery, upon that noble Lord, and by that means drew part of the resentment due to Mr Pope upon himself, in an answer which was published with this title: To the most impudent man alive.

A slip of the like kind with this of our author, in respect to his friend Lord B——, was made by his friend Dean Swift in regard to himself. 'They have printed, says he, in Ireland my letters to Dr Swift, and, which is the strongest circumstance, by his own consent and direction, without acquainting me 'till it was done.' Thus he writes to Mr Warburton *, to which that friend notes, that this was the strongest resentment he [Pope] ever expressed of this indiscretion of his old friend; as being persuaded that it proceeded from no ill will to him, though it exposed him to the ill will of others.

[LL] An honest man. 'In this history of his life the editor assures us, will be contained a large account of his writings, and a critique on the nature, form, and extent of his genius, exemplified from those writings, and a vindication of his moral character exemplified by his most distinguished virtues. His filial piety (86), his disinterested friendship; his reverence for the constitution of his country; his love and admiration of virtue, and what necessarily attends upon it; his hatred and contempt of vice; his extensive charity to the indigent †; his warm benevolence to mankind; his supreme veneration of the Deity; and, above all, his sincere belief of Revelation. Nor shall his faults, continues he, be concealed; it is not for the interest of his virtues that they should, nor indeed could they be concealed if we were so minded, for they shine through his virtues: no man being more a dupe to the specious pretences of virtue in others. In a word, I mean not to be his panegyrist but his historian.'

This promise, however, notwithstanding the ardent wishes and expectations of the public, lies still dormant in the breast of the giver. In the interim, another gentleman hath prudently taken the advantage of Dr Warburton's delay, the first part of whose plan he has undertaken, and made some progress in the execution (87). As to the other and more important part, Mr Pope's moral character; we see in this advertisement a list of his most distinguished virtues; and several remarkable exemplifications of them are to be met with in the course of the notes, where his greatest faults and weaknesses (88) are also noticed and exemplified: In these too the nature and force of his genius is likewise occasionally marked in the same manner; and as the circumstances of his birth, breeding, family, and fortune, together with the most material occurrences and transactions of his life are there inserted, the learned editor may, perhaps, see less occasion for republishing the whole in a continued narrative.

[MM] His chief aim was to be esteemed a man of virtue His Lordship, we see, politely throws a veil over our poet's religion, which his annotator observes was the effect of a weak head and a tender heart; intimating, that therein he followed the steps of his family and his parents. And the remark is confirmed by his answer to Bishop Atterbury (89), who made some attempts to convert him. In reality, that answer is drawn in such a latitudinarian spirit, as puts one in mind of Isaac Orobius the Jew, who being beaten out of all his holds by Limborch, had recourse at last to this shift, that every one ought to continue in his own religion, since it was much easier to refute that of another, than to defend his own: so that, says he, if I had been born of parents who worshipped the sun, I can see no reason for changing (90). But we have, perhaps, the truest account of Mr Pope's Church principles in the following letter, wrote on occasion of his Essay on Man to M. Racine, a French poet, in these terms: 'J'ai reçu enfin votre poème sur la religion; le plaisir qui me causa cette lecture eût été sans mélange, si je n'avois eu le chagrin de voir, que vous m'imputiez des principes que j'abhorre. Je puis vous assurer Monsieur, que votre entière ignorance de notre langue m'a été beaucoup moins fatale, que la connoissance imparfaite qu'en avoient mes traducteurs, qui les a empêchés de pénétrer mes véritables sentimens. Toutes les beautés de la versification de M. D. R. ont été moins honorables a mon poème que ces méprises continuelles sur mes raisonnemens & sur ma doctrine ne * Letter 104. in Vol. X. of Pope's Works.

(86) This is judiciously set at the head of his virtues, since that place is evidently given to it by Mr Pope himself, and is excellently touched by Swift in his letter to Dr Delaney, a piece which pleased our author more than any thing that friend did ever for him. Warburton.

† We have a remarkable instance of this in regard to Mr Savage. See that unfortunate poet's life.

(87) An Essay on the writings and genius of Pope, 1756, 8vo. Said to be written by Mr Warburton, author of some remarks on Spencer's Fairy-Queen.

(88) His reflection upon Dr Waterland is an exemplification of both these blemishes at once. The consigning of that divine to eternal damnation, only for a little peevishness under extreme pain from a disorder which killed him soon after, being an inexcusable fault; and the doing it out of a high strain of compliment to Mr Warburton a no less unpardonable weakness. Letter dated Bath, Feb. 4, 1740.

(89) Dated Nov. 20, 1717.

(90) Collatio Amicae De Veritate Religionis Christianae, cum Ereditio Judoæ à Phil. de Limborch.

(eee) He had all the pamphlets that were written by him, which were bound up in folio, 4to, 8vo. &c. according to their various sizes, in several volumes, and each of them superscribed with this verse from the book of Job, Obi tibi mite historiam had written a book, &c. Warburton's notes.

(91) Ramsay had wrote two letters to Racine, in vindication of our author, who he says was offered a considerable place by the late Qu. en Caroline, with a dispensation for not taking the oath, in case he would only dissemble or conceal his religion, without renouncing it.

(a) Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 941.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Rawlinson's Catalogue of all the Graduates at Oxford, edit. 1727.

(d) Communicated by Mr Whitehead, when curate of Rochdale in Lancashire, who was his pupil, and received many favours from him afterwards.

* The second edition came out in 1702, and it is reckoned the best edition of that teetobrose author.

(e) Several additions were made by him in the subsequent editions of this useful and learned work, of which the seventh edition was published in 1751.

(1) Ath. Oxon. ubi supra.

volumes are all of the moral kind; he has avoided trifles, and consequently has escaped a rock, which has proved very injurious to Dr Swift's reputation. He has given his imagination full scope, and yet has preserved a perpetual guard upon his conduct. The constitution of his body and mind might really incline him to the habits of caution and reserve. The treatment which he met with afterwards, from an innumerable tribe of adversaries (eee), confirmed this habit, and made him slower than the Dean in pronouncing his judgment upon persons and things. His prose writings are little less harmonious than his verse; and his voice, in common conversation, was so naturally musical, that I remember bonest Tom Southern used to call him the little nightingale (fff). His manners were delicate, easy, and engaging; and he treated his friends with a politeness that charmed, and a generosity that was much to his honour. Every guest was made happy within his doors, pleasure dwelt under his roof, and elegance presided at his table.

(fff) Mr. Pope was small every way in his person, being of a thin habit and low of stature, occasioned by his crooked shape, which he inherited from his father; but his eye was fine, sharp, and piercing. Notes to the Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot.

lui ont été prejudiciables. Vous verrez ces méprises, relevées & réfutées dans l'ouvrage Anglois que j'ai l'honneur de vous envoyer. Cet ouvrage est un commentaire critique & philosophique par le savant auteur de la Divine Legation de Moïse. Je me flatte que le Chevalier de Ramsay rempli comme il est d'une zèle ardent pour la vérité, voudra bien vous en expliquer le contenu (91). Alors je m'en rapporterai à votre justice: & je me flatte, que tous vos soupçons seront dissipés. En attendant ces éclaircissements, je ne saurois me refuser le plaisir de répondre nettement à ce que vous desirez savoir de moi. Je déclare donc hautement & très sincèrement que mes sentimens sont diamétralement opposés à ceux de Spinoza, & même à ceux de Leibnitz, puisqu'ils son parfaitement conformes à ceux de M. Paschale & de M. l'Archeveque de Fenelon, & que je ferai gloire d'imiter la docteur du dernier, en fouettant toujours toutes mes opinions particulieres aux décisions de l'Eglise. Je suis, &c.

A Londres, le 1 Septemb. 1742 (92). P

(92) Oeuvres de Racine, Vol. I. p. 271, & seqq. Paris, 1747. where are also the two letters of Ramsay.

POTTER [Dr JOHN], Archbishop of Canterbury, was son of Mr Thomas Potter, a Linnendraper at Wakefield in Yorkshire, where he was born about the year 1674; and being put to school at the same place, he made an uncommon progress in a short time, especially in the Greek language. At the age of fourteen he was sent to Oxford, and entered a Battler of University-college in the beginning of the year 1688; where, having taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts (a), he published in 8vo. for the use of the young students in the university, Variantes Lectiones & Notæ ad Plutarchi librum de audiendis Poëtis cum Interpretatione Latina Hugonis Grotii; item Variantes Lectiones & Notæ ad Basilii Magni Orationem ad Juvenes quomodo cum fructu legere possint Græcorum libros [A]. This piece came out of the university press in 1693, and the following year our author was chosen Fellow of Lincoln-college (b); and proceeding Master of Arts October 16th (c) the same year, he took pupils, and went into Orders (d). These new engagements were looked on as additional motives to prosecute his studies, the fruits of which appeared in 1697, when the same press produced his beautiful edition of Lycophrone's Alexandra * in folio. The same year he likewise printed the first volume of his Archæologiæ Græcæ: or, The Antiquities of Greece; which was followed by the 2d volume the subsequent year (e). These works established his fame in the literary republic both at home and abroad, and engaged him in a correspondence with some learned foreigners (f). July 8th, 1704, he commenced Bachelor of Divinity (g); and being about the same time appointed Chaplain to Archbishop Tenison, he removed from Oxford to reside with his Grace in the palace at Lambeth (h). He proceeded to the degree of Doctor of Divinity on the 18th of April, 1706 (i), and soon after became Chaplain in Ordinary to her Majesty Queen Anne (k). In 1707, he published in 8vo. A Discourse of Church Government [B]; and, in the

(f) The late Dr Mead was possessed of some letters of our author to Mr Gravivius, who had been that Physician's tutor at Leyden in Holland. See Catalogue of Dr Mead's library of books, among the manuscripts, No. 39.

(g) Rawlinson's Catalogue, as before.

(h) Communicated by Dr Tenison, L.L.D. great-nephew to the Archbishop, and husband to Dr Potter's eldest daughter, who died in childhood of the first child in 1729-30.

(i) Rawlinson.

(k) From Dr Tenison, as before.

[A] He published Variantes Lectiones, &c. This book was printed at the Theatre in Oxford, at the charge of Arthur Charlett, D. D. and master of University College, who presented copies of it, as a new-year's gift, to the young students of his house, and others of his friends (1). Our author in the preface acquaints us, that it was undertaken by him at the request of that patron of learning. His words addressed to the reader, are: Tot. in opus debes eximis Viro Arturo Charlotto cujus bonitatu susceptum est, Viro inter præcipua Oxoniæ nostræ ornamenta memorando, tam impense colit studio, studiosos amat, fovet, provebit.

[B] A Discourse of Church Government. His residence and post at Lambeth, apparently turned his thoughts upon the subject of this piece; in which he asserts the constitution, rights, and government, of the Christian Church, chiefly as described by the Fathers of the three first centuries against Erastian principles; his design being to vindicate the Church of England from the charge of those principles. In this view, among other ecclesiastical powers distinct from the state, he maintains the doctrine of our Church, concerning the distinction of the three orders of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, particularly with regard to the superiority of the episcopal order above that of presbyters, which he endeavours to prove was settled by divine institution; that this distinction was also in fact constantly kept up to the time of Constantine, and in the next age after that, the same distinction, he observes, was constantly reckoned to be of divine institution, and derived from the Apostles down to those times. In pursuing this argument he considers the objection, that had been raised against it from St Jerom's conjecture (so he calls it) about the original of Episcopacy, of which he gives us the following account from the writings of that Father (2). 'Having observed, says he, that the names of Bishop and Presbyter are used promiscuously in the scriptures, and that the Apostles call themselves presbyters (3), he concludes, that at first there was no distinction between their offices, but that Apostle, Bishop, and Presbyter, were only different names of the same thing, and that the Church was then generally governed by a college of Presbyters, equal in rank and dignity to one another. Afterwards divisions being occasioned by this parity among presbyters, when every presbyter began to claim as his own particular subjects, those whom he had baptized; and it was said by the people, I am of Paul, I of Apollos, and I of Cephas; to remedy this evil, it was decreed all the world over, that one of the presbyters in every Church should be set over the rest, and peculiarly called Bishop; and that the chief care of the Church should be committed to him. Our author thinks it strange, that such a conjecture as this should prejudice any considering man against the divine institution of Episcopacy; and observes, that in this account St Jerom sounds the right of episcopal primacy over presbyters, on the synonymous use of the names of Apostles, Bishops and Presbyters, which was observed by St Chrysostom, Theodoret,

(2) In his Epistle to Evagrius, and his Commentary on the Epistle to Titus, chap. i.

(3) See particularly 1 Pet. v. 1, 2, and 3 John, ver. 1.

beginning of the next year he succeeded Dr Jane as Regius Professor of Divinity, and Canon of Christ-Church in Oxford, which brought him back to the university. This post was obtained of the Queen for him by the particular application of the illustrious Duke of Marlborough [C]; and it was apparently the same interest that raised him to that doret, and other ancient Fathers, who drew no such inference from it, but constantly affirmed, that there was a disparity of order among them, notwithstanding their names were used promiscuously; and I hope, continues the Doctor, it has been fully made out in this and the last chapter, that this was no good foundation for that opinion. But it is not strange that having raised presbyters to a parity with the Apostles, contrary to the most plain testimony of the scriptures, he should equal them with Bishops, contrary to the sense of the ancient Fathers. Thus the premises on which the opinion is founded being inconclusive, there is no reason to regard what he says of the decree passed in all Churches for the raising of one presbyter above the rest, which he does not pretend to support by any testimony, but only conjectures that such a decree must have been passed, because he had before conjectured, that Apostles, Bishops, and Presbyters, were all equal at first: but when or by what authority was this decree enacted? If in the second century, as some would persuade us, for no better reason than that they are unwilling to derive Episcopacy from the Apostles; it is strange not only that no presbyter in the world should take it ill, that one of his fellow-presbyters should be advanced above him, or think it his duty to oppose this new and unscriptural model, but that so great a change should be introduced in all parts of the world, at a time when the Church flourished with men of great parts and learning, and yet not the least mention be made of it in any of their writings; but on the contrary, both they and the Christian writers in the next age after them, should constantly speak of the primacy of bishops over presbyters as no late invention, but of ancient right, and derived from the Apostles themselves. We may as well affirm, contrary to the accounts of all historians, that all nations in the world were first republics, and afterwards, on a certain time, upon the consideration of their being obnoxious to factions, by general consent became monarchies. But it is needless to raise more objections against this notion, since Jerom himself plainly refers the making of this decree to the Apostles. He not only assigns as the occasion of it, the adherence of some to Paul, of others to Apollos, and of others to Peter, which is reproved in St Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians; but in his before mentioned Epistle to Evagrius, he expressly calls the distinction of Bishops, Priests, and Deacons, an apostolical tradition, and taken by the Apostles from the Old Testament, where Aaron, his Sons, the Priests, and the Levites, correspond to the three orders of the Christian Church (4); and in his catalogue of ecclesiastical writers, he affirms, that presently after our Lord's Ascension, James was ordained Bishop of Jerusalem by the Apostles, that Timothy was made Bishop of Ephesus, and Titus of Crete, by St Paul, and Polycarp Bishop of Smyrna by St John, and he mentions several other bishops, who lived in the next age after the Apostles. So that even in St Jerom's opinion, the primacy of bishops over presbyters was an apostolical institution. But whatever was St Jerom's sense of this matter, since it has appeared to be ill grounded, and contrary both to the universal consent of primitive antiquity, and of the scriptures, we need not have the least concern about it: The truth is this; some deacons, who enjoyed wealthier places in the Church than many presbyters, claimed several privileges superior to them, and were unwilling to be admitted into that order; which irregularity was so highly resented by St Jerom, who was a man of passion, and only a presbyter, that to raise his own order beyond the competition of Deacons, he endeavoured to make it equal by it's original institution with Bishops and Apostles; as it is common even for the best of men, in the heat of disputation, to run into one extreme by avoiding another. Yet even at the same time he owns in the forementioned epistle to Evagrius, that none but bishops had authority to ordain ministers, and in many other places, he approves the subordination of pre-byters to bishops; and never once allows to meet presbyters the power of ordaining, or seems inclined to introduce a parity of ministers into the Church (5). At length it was thought proper to give this influence of our author's judgment in using the authority of the Fathers, because his true character as a churchman and a divine, may in a great measure be collected from it; in reality, we have therein a fair comment explaining his opinion in this point, as declared in the preface. 'That these [the Fathers] especially of the three first centuries, are the best interpreters of the scriptures, and may safely be relied on as giving us it's genuine sense. And, continues he, if any of them should be thought to speak sometimes with less caution, or to carry their expression higher than might have been wished, as the best men in the heat of disputation, or through too much zeal often do, all candid and impartial readers, will easily be persuaded to make a just allowance for it.'

[C] He obtained the Regius professorship by the interest of the Duke of Marlborough. We owe this particular to the Duchess of Marlborough, who represents it as a point of considerable importance to the nation at that time; by which, however, we are to understand no more, than that the carrying of it was made a subject of contention, in the struggle between the two parties of Whig and Tory, or rather of the Marlborough and Harley-Rochestrian faction. But it is worth while to see her Grace's own words on the occasion. Having given an account of the promotion of the Earl of Sunderland, to be Secretary of State in the room of Sir Charles Hedges (6), she proceeds thus: 'But notwithstanding this point thus carried by the Whigs, they were soon alarmed again by the choice of two High-Church Divines, to fill two vacant Bishopricks (7). Several of the Whigs were disposed to think themselves betrayed by the Ministry, whereas the truth is, that the Queen's inclinations to the Tories, being now soothed by the flatteries and insinuations of her private counsellors (8), they began to make it a crime for her to consult with her ministers upon any promotion either in the Church or State. Her Majesty, however, to quiet the dissatisfaction of the Whigs for the late promotions, ordered her ministers to assure them, that she would prefer no more Tories, and she gave the same assurances with her own mouth in the Cabinet Council: and she was afterwards by her secret counsellors suffered to observe those promises so far, as to give about the same time the Bishoprick of Norwich to Dr Trimmel (9), a particular friend of Lord Sunderland's; and she also soon after gave the Professorship of Divinity at Oxford to Dr Potter, who had Dr Smalridge for his competitor, recommended by the Tories. But, continues her Grace, this latter favour to the Whigs was not so easily obtained as the former, and upon the delays that were made in bestowing it, Lord Marlborough thought proper to try what credit he had with a Queen, whose glory he had carried to a height beyond that of her predecessors. He wrote therefore a very moving letter, complaining of the visible loss of his interest with her, and particularly of her so long deferring the promotion of the person recommended by her ministers, as a faithful friend to her government; adding, that the only way to make her reign easy, was to be true to that rule, which she had professed to lay down, of preferring none of those who appeared against her service, and the nation's interest. He wrote at the same time, and to the same effect to me, and I wrote to the Queen, and at length by much sollicitation this matter was obtained, and Dr Potter fixed in the professorship (10). Thus we see an ample declaration of that particular merit, which obtained the Divinity chair for the doctor. He was a Whig, and that was sufficient; and by the silence of any other merit the reader is led, without a solecism, to conclude, that he really had no other. But that is far from being the case; on the contrary, his qualifications both as a scholar and a divine were incontestable, being indeed such as made it needless for the Duchess to mention this part of his character.

(5) Potter's Church Government, chap. iv.

(6) That change was made Dec. 3, 1706. Salmon's Chronol. Hist. under that year.

(7) She means Dr Offspring Blackall to Exeter, and Sir Wm. Dawes to Chester, both promoted on the 7th of Jan. 1707-8. Id. ibid.

(8) Meaning chiefly Robert Harley, afterwards Earl of Oxford, then lately Secretary of State, having found it necessary to resign that post. Id. ibid.

(9) According to Salmon, all the three Bishops, Blackall, Dawes, and Trimmel, were made the same day.

(10) Conduct of the Duchess of Marlborough, p. 175, 176. edit. 1742, 2vo.

(4) Ut sciamus traditiones Apostolicas sumptas de Veteri Testamento, quod Aaron & filii ejus, atque Levitae, in Templo fuerint, Presbyteri, & Diaconi, vindicent in Ecclesia.

that see, of which he was made Bishop by King George the First, on the 27th of April, 1715 (l); and he published a curious edition of the Works of Clemens Alexandrinus [D] the same year (m). He still kept possession of the Divinity chair in the university; and, in reality, he filled both the dignities with great reputation, rarely failing to preside in person over the Divinity disputations in the schools, and regularly holding his triennial visitation at St Mary's church; upon which occasion his charges to the clergy were suited to the exigency of the times. And Dr Hoadly, then Bishop of Bangor, having advanced, in 1717, some doctrines about Sincerity, in print, which our prelate judged to be destructive of true religion, he took occasion in his first visitation the following year, to censure and warn his Clergy against them. This charge being printed at the request of the audience, was warmly resented by Dr Hoadly; and though neither his name nor the title of his book was mentioned in it, yet he took the rebuke to himself, and presently published an answer to it; to which our author replied [E]. Some time after this controversy, he grew into great favour with Queen Caroline, then Princess of Wales; and, upon the accession of his present Majesty to the throne, he preached the Coronation sermon, October 11, 1727, which was afterwards printed by his Majesty's especial command (n); and it was generally thought, that the chief direction of the publick affairs, with regard to the Church, was designed to be committed to his care; but as this trust must unavoidably involve him in State-affairs, he declined the proposal, and returned to his bishoprick; where he continued in the strict discharge of the duties of his pastoral office till the death of Dr William Wake, in January 1736-7, in whose room he was promoted to the archbishoprick of Canterbury (o). This arduous and important post he filled during the space of ten years with great reputation, wholly attentive to the devoirs of his ecclesiastical function, without engaging too busily in the secular affairs incident to that high office. Thus employed, he fell into a lingering disorder, which put a period to his life in the year 1747. He left behind him the character of a prelate of distinguished piety and learning, strictly orthodox in respect to the established doctrines of the Church of England, and a zealous and vigilant guardian thereof, against all the attempts that were made to subvert and undermine it during his presidency [F]. He was remarkably studious of regularity,

(l) Salmon's Chronol. Hist. under that year.

(m) It was published before he was made Bishop. Whiston's Memoirs of his own Life, p. 302. 2d edition, 1753.

(n) It is reprinted in his Theological Works, edit. 1753. Vol. I.

(o) Dr Gifford, Bishop of London, had for several years been, as Mr Whiston observes in his Memoirs, p. 219. deemed the heir apparent to this dignity; and how he lost his interest at Court, may be seen in his article, in the appendix to this Work, Vol. VI.

character. Yet at the same time, impartiality obliges us not to conceal that of his competitor Dr Smalridge, who was at least nothing at all inferior to him in either respect: and he had moreover this additional merit, that the office had been executed by him for several years with the greatest reputation, as deputy to Dr Jane (11). But this merit, which undeniably gave him a fair right to expect the succession, proved a sure bar to keep him from it. Dr Jane was known to be the great promoter of the famous judgment and decree of the university of Oxford, in 1683, and to have the chief hand in drawing it up*. Dr Jane had also a principal share in defeating the design of a comprehension, upon which commissioners appointed by King William met at the Jerusalem Chamber in 1689. At which time, he carried the election of the place of prolocutor to the lower house of convocation, by a majority of two to one against Dr Tillotson (12), and in that chair opposing every thing that was offered or intended by the royal commission, was the principal cause that nothing succeeded. These facts sufficiently shewed that the Regius Professor of Divinity had great influence, not only in the university, but, in consequence thereof, over the whole body of the clergy in those days; and there seemed to be room enough to suspect, that if Dr Jane's deputy succeeded him in that chair, and influence consequent thereupon, he would tread in the steps of his friend and predecessor.

[D] An edition of Clemens Alexandrinus. In the preface he tells us he has given an entire new version of the Cohortations, and intended to have done the same for the Stromata, but was prevented by other business [that of his professorship] (13). While he was printing this work, a humour fell into his eyes, which obliged him to commit the care of correcting the press to others. Hence it seems the work is generally complained of, as full of typographical errors. Hear his own words upon it. 'Quod si ea [editio] paulo quam expectaveras serius prodeat, vel si publici nunc juris facta votis tuis minus respondeat, id aliqua saltem ex parte oculorum meorum imbecillitati imputes, rogo; quæ cum in Pedagogo versantem primo invasisset, adeo tandem invaluit quinto Stromatum libro sub prælo sudante, ut alienis multo plus quam propriis deinceps fidere dura me sed prorus ineluctabilis necessitas cogerit.' However the edition is generally in good esteem, and is particularly commended by the ingenious, and in these matters especially learned, Mr William Whiston (14).

[E] He vindicated his charge against the objections of
VOL. V. No. CCLXXXVI.

Dr Hoadly.] Among other doctrines animadverted upon, in our prelate's charge, he had particularly censured that which had been lately maintained by his brother Dr Hoadly, that equal degrees of Sincerity, in title us to equal degrees of the divine favour (15). He had likewise glanced upon the subscription of Dr Samuel Clarke, and others of his opinion, to the xxxix articles made with this tacit reserve, as far as they were agreeable to the holy scriptures. And the same spirit appearing here, as had before directed the discourse of church-government, where he had carried the point of ecclesiastical power as high as any body, and had through the course of that work, enforced every article of that power in excommunicating, &c. from the like practice of civil society; this way of arguing was particularly mentioned and censured by Dr Hoadly, as inconclusive and dangerous (16). It might well therefore be thought incumbent upon Bishop Potter, to step forth in defence of what he had so frequently and strenuously advanced. Accordingly he entered into the controversy with a more fervent zeal, than was thought incident to the coolness and moderation of his temper, for which he alledged, that the very existence of the Church being struck at by the contrary doctrines, it became an indispensable duty upon the pastors thereof to defend it. To this purpose he very appositely introduced that law at Athens, which in case of any dangerous commotions and disturbances in the state, excused those who had taken the party against that which finally prevailed, as having engaged therein honestly, though with a mistaken zeal; whilst a severe penalty was inflicted upon such, as set themselves in quiet and safety under their vine at home, without engaging on either side; which was condemned as proceeding from a resolution to risk nothing for the sake of the public good. It is remarkable that Bishop Hoadly in his answer, declares he was more concerned on account of this adversary than any other; and no doubt he had more to apprehend from Dr Potter's character at that time, than that of all his other antagonists put together.

[F] Against the attempts to undermine it, &c. This zeal appeared in no one instance more conspicuously, than in his conduct with regard to Dr Conyers Middleton, suspected to be a masked Deist. The Doctor has himself furnished some strong hints of the Archbishop's care to prevent the suspected mischievous tendencies of his writings. Speaking of his life of Cicero, which was published by subscription, he writes thus to Mr Warburton, the present dean of

(15) Bishop of Bangor's Preface against Popery, edit. 1717.

(16) See his famous sermon upon that text, My kingdom is not of this world, printed likewise in 1717.

(11) See Dr Smalridge's article.

* Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col.

(12) Birch's Life of Tillotson, p. 168, 173, 174, 184. edit. 1753. This project was first laid, and afterwards carried on, by the intrigues of the Earl of Rochester. Life of H. Prideaux, p. 54. edit. 1748, 8vo.

(13) For he had begun to prepare this edition before he obtained that post.

(14) In the Memoirs of his own Life, p. 302.

regularity, order, and œconomy, and, in that spirit, not unmindful to support the mætopolitical dignity by a suitable carriage, which was sometimes censured, though without any good reason, as proceeding from a spirit of pride and haughtiness [G]. Since his death, there have been published The Theological Works of Dr John Potter, late Archbishop of Canterbury, containing his Sermons, Charges, Discourse of Church-Government, and Divinity-Lectures [H]. Oxford, 1753, in three volumes, 8vo. His Grace engaged in marriage not long after he had obtained the Divinity-chair at Oxford, and had a very numerous family of children (p), but was survived only by three daughters and two sons (q); of whom the eldest son, John Potter, taking Orders, was presented to the rectory of Wrotham and the vicarage of Lydd, both in Kent, by his father, who likewise gave him a handsome portion; but being offended with his conduct in marrying indiscreetly (r), he conferred the bulk of his fortune on his younger son Thomas Potter, having before given him the lucrative post of Register to the Province of Canterbury (s). This gentleman was bred to the Law; and, after he had made a sufficient progress in the genteel part of that study, he turned his thoughts wholly to State-affairs; and obtaining a seat in the House of Commons, soon made so distinguished a figure there (t), as drew the eyes of the Court and Ministry upon him: so that, besides his Register's place just mentioned, he is at present Recorder of Bath, Joint Vice-Treasurer of Ireland, and Member of Parliament for Oakhampton in Devonshire (u).

(p) From my own knowledge.
 (q) Communicated by the Clerk to the Register's office.
 (r) Viz. with a servant of the Archbishop. Ibid.
 (s) Ibid.
 (t) See his speeches in that House.
 (u) Court Calendar for this year, 1759.

(17) A piece written by Dr Blackwell of Aberdeen in Scotland, an author who was more than suspected of Deism.
 (18) Dr Middleton's Letters to Mr Warburton, Letter vii. dated September 4, 1739. Middleton's Works, Vol. II. p. 479. See also Letter x. p. 484. edit. 1752, 4to.

Bristol. 'I am obliged to you for my right reverend subscriber, and the more so, for the pains that it cost you to draw him in. Episcopal gold, like that from the royal hand, may help to cure the Evil, with which I am said to be infected. I have now got fifteen of that bench, one or two of whom were even my solicitors, but could not persuade some of the rest, that my work was not levelled against religion. This notion has been strongly inculcated, and when in the conversation that I mentioned, (with the Archbishop) I took occasion to urge the folly, as well as mischief of it; it was answered, that though it might prove false, yet it did not appear to be malicious, since the life of Homer (17) might justly give a handle to suspect the life of Tully (18).'

[G] His carriage was censured as the effect of haughtiness. It is worth while to see the character of our Archbishop, both in general, and in respect to the particular here mentioned, as drawn by Mr William Whiston; since, when read with those allowances, which every body knows how to make for that writer's prejudices, it seems not to be very wide of the truth. 'On this year also, 1736, says he, the late Archbishop of Canterbury Dr Potter, was removed from Oxford to Lambeth. I have some reason to speak my mind freely of him, and of the most unhappy change this great exaltation made in him; because the late Queen [Caroline] when consultation was had, who should be made Archbishop, asked me about his character, and the book he had written against the Erastians, or for the ecclesiastical authority, as distinct from the state. For his character at that time was with me, as one of great piety, learning, and moderation; and an excellent pastor of a parish, as I heard afterwards, without any marks of pride or vanity; whom I accordingly recommended to her majesty, as one proper to be Archbishop, which I then sincerely wished he might be. As to his book, I said it was a very good one; and that he proved his points very well; only that he had taken one thing for granted at last, which he could not prove; namely, that Constantine the Great did well in giving temporal power to the clergy. I then little dreamed that this Dr Potter, by going to Lambeth, would take high and pontifical state upon him; that he could bear the kneeling of even Bishops before him, when at a solemn meeting of the members of the society for propagating the gospel in foreign parts, he gave the blessing, which I myself saw:

'that he would procure half a dozen footmen, to walk bare headed by him, when he was in his coach, three of a side; besides his train-bearer, at such his appearances; that he would give up the poor remains of Christian discipline, as his predecessor had done, and sometimes ordain such ignoramus's, as the great Bishop Lloyd, of whom I know he had the greatest opinion, would, upon examination, have hardly thought worthy any holy orders at all; that he would not only bear the grossest flattery to his face, in Dr Pierce's Concio ad Clerum, but declare his approbation of it, by advancing, or confirming the advancement of, the preacher, to a place of great dignity immediately; and that in consequence of his pomp while alive, his executors caused him to lie in state when he was dead; that he would set his learned chaplain Dr Chapman, to preach against the Christians, falsely called Arians, at the Lady Moyer's lecture: that he would send abroad such mean forms of prayer and praise, upon days of humiliation and thanksgiving, to flatter the Court, such indeed as are sometimes hardly true, and frequently such as are wholly inconsistent with that profound veneration, that Kings and Princes themselves, as well as their subjects, owe to their Almighty Creator; from whom is derived all the wisdom and courage, and victory of their greatest generals. To say nothing of that horrid cursing of the Christians in the Athanasian Creed, which he still supported in his own chapel at Lambeth, and every where else. And I am sorry, very sorry, to say it, that Archbishop Potter seemed to me almost as unwilling to open his eyes to see the grievous errors of Athanasianism, which are now so fully detested, as to be sinking out of the learned world, as any of the Papists were to see the other gross errors of Popery at the Protestant Reformation (19).' In confirmation of this last remark, we may add his Latin speech at the opening of the Convocation, December 10, 1744 (20), and his recommending Dr Waterland to be prolocutor to the lower house (21).

[H] The anonymous editor assures us, that such of his Sermons and Charges as were printed before, are here re-printed with some slight alterations; and that the rest were finished and prepared for the press by himself, and are printed by his express orders and direction. That his Divinity-Lectures are printed from his manuscripts, and with his express consent and approbation, and are one continued treatise on the authority and inspiration of the Scriptures (22). P

(19) Memoirs of the Life of Mr W. Whiston, p. 300, 301.
 (20) Printed in his Works, ubi supra.
 (21) See Dr Waterland's article.
 (22) See the advertisement prefixed to this edition.

POWELL [DAVID] a learned Divine in the XVIth century, and the best skilled of any in his time in the Welsh Language and History, as well as in other parts of History and Antiquities, was born in Denbighshire in North-Wales. About the year 1566, or rather later [A], he was admitted into the University of Oxford, but in what college doth not appear. In 1571, he translated himself to Jesus college, then founded (a); and took the degree of Bachelor of Arts March 3, 1572 (b), and that of Master July 6, 1576 (c) & Entering

(a) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. I. col. 246.
 (b) Item Fasti, Vol. I. col. 106.
 (c) Ibid. col. 112.

[A] Or rather later. For he did not take his first degree till 1572. Whereas, if he had been admitted in 1566, he would have been of standing for it two years sooner, namely in 1570.

Entering into Holy Orders, he became Vicar of Ruabon or Rhiw' Abon, in his own native county of Denbigh-shire; and obtained likewise a Dignity in the cathedral church of St Afaph (d). He was now grown eminent for his very great learning; and Febr. 19. 1582. took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, as also that of Doctor in Divinity, on the 11th of April 1583 (e). * In the year 1584. he published The Historie of Cambria, now called Wales [B]; and, the year following, Annotations on Girald Barry's (f), alias Cambrensis's, Itinerary, and Description of Wales [C]. Besides other things, of which an account is given below [D]: And left some Manuscripts behind him, fit for the press: but never published. He died about the year 1590, and was buried in his church of Rhiw' Abon; being succeeded in that living by a son of his, named Samuel (g). He had another son named Gabriel, who was born in 1575, and passed for a prodigy of learning in his time [E]. On which

(d) Idem Ath. ut supra.

* Soon after, he was made Chaplain to Hen. Sidney Prefect of Wales. Tanner Bibliotheca, p. 606.

(e) Idem Fasti, Vol. I. col. 123, 125.

(f) See above, the article BARRY [GIRALD].

(g) Wood, Ath. ut supra. W. Neve says, that he dyed in 1599. Tanner, ubi supra.

account

[B] In the year 1584. he published the Historie of Cambria, now called Wales ] It was printed in Quarto; dedicated to Sir Philip Sidney; and adorned with wooden cuts of the several Princes of Wales, but taken from no better originals than the carver's Fancy. This History of Cambria was originally written in Latin, by Caradoc a monk of Lhangarfao; beginning at Cadwalader, in the seventh century, and thence continued through the reigns of the several Princes of Wales, 'till the year 1157. about which time Caradoc flourished. After his death, all things of moment that happened in Wales, were kept and recorded in the Abbies of Conwey in North-Wales, and Ystratflur in South-Wales, where the Princes and Noblemen of Wales were buried. The most remarkable occurrences being thus registered in these Abbies, were generally compared together every third year, when the Bards belonging to these two Houses went their visitations. So it was continued 'till the year 1270. a little before the death of the last Prince Lheweylyn. — Humphrey Lloyd, Gent. a most learned Antiquary, translated it into English in Queen Elizabeth's reign, with an intention of publishing it; but did not live to compleat his design (1). — It coming afterwards into Dr Powel's hands, he corrected, finished, and augmented it; and thus made it public. His Additions, or Notes, are chiefly Collections out of the English Historians, relating the same matter of fact; or tending to illustrate, improve, or explain the History of Wales. They are printed in a lesser character than the rest of the Book, and have for distinction sake a cinque-foile set at the beginning of each note. In these notes he greatly courts the Cecil-family, and derives the long Pedigree he gives of them from Robert Sitfit, an assistant to Robert Fitz Hamon in the conquest of Glamorgan-shire, Anno D. 1091. — His edition being grown scarce, W. Wynne, A. M. put out a new one in 1697. 8vo. wherein the Language is new-modelled; Dr Powel's Notes thrown out, without troubling the Reader to see the same thing by way of Annotation out of the English Historians; the body of the History is rendered intire and uniform; several Additions made, out of the Notes of that learned Antiquarian Mr Robert Vaughan of Hengwrt. And an Appendix of Records is added at the end (2). — Mr William Clarke, in his excellent Preatice to the Welsh Laws (3), observes, that there are several interpolations in Dr Powel's edition of Caradoc, and that the Chronology is often neglected and displaced: He wishes therefore, that some learned person would print Caradoc in Welsh and Latin, in the same method as the Saxon Chronicle, after having carefully collated it with the best manuscripts.

(1) See above, in the article LHWYD [EDWARD], note [B].

(2) See Mr Wynne's preface.

(3) Leges Wallicæ, &c. edit. 1730, fol. Præfat. p. 5. not. c. & p. 24. not. p.

[C] And, the year following, Annotations on Girald Barry's Itinerary, and Description of Wales ] This Book was printed at London, in 1583. 8vo. with a dedication to Sir Philip Sidney: and re-printed among the Anglica, Normannica, Hibernica, Cambrica, &c. published by Mr Camden, Francofurt. 1603. fol. Dr Powel's Annotations are at the end of each chapter. At the conclusion of the Book, there is a Letter of his to William Fleetwood Serjant at law, and Recorder of the city of London, ' concerning the right understanding of the British History, and reconciling it ' with the Roman Authors; ' De Britannicâ, Historiâ recte intelligendâ, et cum Romanis Scriptoribus reconciliandâ. In this letter, he observes, that, in the first place, you must put out of your way two sorts of men, who hinder this proposed reconciliation: Namely, those who affirm, that the whole British History is only a Heap of Fables; and that nothing is to be believed but what is delivered by the Roman Authors: And those, on the other hand, who embrace all the improbable stories, absurd miracles, and false prophecies of Merlin and others, as religious truths. — These Absurdities, says he, are not extant in some of our old British books, but were added by the Latin Translator Geoffrey of Monmouth.

The rest of the difficulty consists, either in distinguishing the Governors or Kings: or in the relation of Facts: or in understanding the names of Places. As to the Government of this Island; it was, from the time of Dunwallo Molmutius, divided into several petty Kingdoms, or Principalities, as is manifest from Julius Cæsar, Tacitus, &c. and even from the British History; which last informs us, that Loegria, Albania, Corowal, Wales, Deira, and Bernicia had always their own Kings. But, in case of any common danger, they chose a General. When therefore different authors mention different Kings of Britain, as they are treating of the same times, they must not immediately be thought to contradict one another; because there were several Kings reigning together in Britain. Besides, the same Princes had frequently two Names, or a Surname, or denomination, from some eminent quality or deformity; as Elidor War, i. e. Helidor the Pious, Uther Pendragon, Edoal Turch, Edoal the Hind, Grwalloch, William the Red, &c. — In the Relation of Facts, all Authors have a bias, or natural prejudice, in favour of their own Countrymen, so as to praise all their good actions without measure, and to conceal or extenuate their faults. Julius Cæsar himself is not free from this weakness in his Commentaries, as is plain from Lucan, Tacitus, &c. We must therefore, in that case, lay aside all prepossession; weigh every circumstance; withhold our assent in doubtful points; and adhere to what is the most probable. — For the right understanding of the Names of Places; it is necessary to enquire into the occasion of the name; whether it be derived from the British or the Latin tongue; whether the old name of the place remains. In order to judge rightly of all which circumstances, it is necessary to have a thorough knowledge of the British and Roman Customs, and their Languages. Without that, 'tis impossible to trace out the origin and meaning of the Names of places in this Island; which have been strangely altered and disfigured, both by the Roman and British Authors.

[D] Besides other things, of which an account is given below.] Among the rest, he corrected and published, Historia Britannica, or the British History, written by Ponticus Virunnius, in six Books. London, 1585. 8vo. which is an Epitome of Geoffrey of Monmouth. Reprinted among Revm Britannicarum Scriptores Vetusiores, &c. Lugduni 1587. fol

[E] And passed for a prodigy of learning in his time.] Among other things, he wrote earnestly against a Toleration, especially of the Roman Catholics; as appears by the titles of the following pieces of his upon that subject. 1. The Catholics Supplication to the King for Toleration of Catholic Religion, with Notes and Observations in the margin. A Supplicatory parallel-wise, or Counterpoise of the Protestants to the said King. Reasons on both sides for, and against Toleration of Religions. London, 1603. 4to. 2. A consideration of Papists reasons of State and religion for a Toleration of Popery in England, intimated in their Supplication to the King's Majesty, and the State of the present Parliament. Lond. 1604. 4to. 3. The Unlawfulness and Danger of Toleration of divers Religions, and connivance to contrary worship in one Monarchy or Kingdom. 4. Refutation of an Epistle Apologetical, written by a Puritan Papist, to persuade the permission of the promiscuous use and profession of all sorts of Heresies, &c. Lond. 1605. 4to (4).

(4) See Wood, Ath. Vol. I. col. 344, 345.

[A] The

(b) Wood, Ath. Vol. I. col. 344, 345.

account Dr Richard Vaughan bishop of London made him one of his chaplains (b): He was by his Successor Bishop Ravis, collated to the Prebend of Port-pool in the cathedral church of St Paul; and obtained also the Vicarage of Northall, in Middlesex, being Doctor in Divinity. He died in the year 1611 (i).

(i) Newcourt's Repertorium, Vol. I. p. 201, 703.

(a) The Life of the Rev. Humphry Prideaux, D. D. Dean of Norwich, with several tracts of his upon various subjects, never before published. Lond. 1748, 8vo. p. 11.

PRIDEAUX [Dr HUMPHRY], the very learned Dean of Norwich, was born at Padstow in the county of Cornwall, May 3, 1648, being the third son of Edmund Prideaux, Esq; by Bridgett his wife, who was daughter of John Moyle of Bake, Esq; in the same county. Both parents were descended from ancient and honourable families well known in those parts (a). The Doctor being a younger brother, was designed for the Church, in which view at a proper age he was sent to school, first at Lescard, and then to Bodmin, both in Cornwall; and thence removed to Westminster under the famous Dr Busby, where he was soon chosen King's Scholar, and after going through that College in three years, was elected to Christ-Church in Oxford, and admitted a Student in the year 1668 (b), by Dr John Fell, then Dean of that College. June 22, 1672, he commenced Bachelor of Arts (c), and was immediately after employed by Dr Fell, who had at this time the management of the public printing-press in that University, to put some notes to an edition of Lucius Florus, to be distributed among the younger members of the society (d). After this there was put into his hands out of the Bodleian Library, a manuscript copy of Johannes Antiochenus Malela, a Greek historian, in order to have it fitted for the press by his care; but on perusing it, he thought it a very fabulous and trifling book not worth the printing, whereupon the design was dropt (e) [A], and the rather because the Arundel marbles being presented about this time by Henry Howard Earl of Norwich, to the University, and set up in the court before the Theatre, as there were several very curious and valuable inscriptions upon them, it was thought proper that they should be published, with a comment to explain them; and our author, though then only Bachelor of Arts, was appointed to this work. Accordingly he undertook it, and two years afterwards, in May 1676, published his book intituled, Marmora Oxoniensia (f), in one volume folio, printed at the University press, and dedicated to the right honourable donor. This book being published when he was but twenty-six years of age, a year after he had taken his master's degree (g), gained him great reputation in the University, and was well received in the world (h), especially among foreigners in Germany, France, and Italy [B]. Mr Prideaux having been ordered at the first publication, to present one copy of it to the Lord Chancellor Finch [C], afterwards Earl of Nottingham; this introduced him into the patronage of his Lordship, who soon after sent to him at Christ-Church Mr Charles Finch, one of his Lordship's sons, to be his pupil (i). And in the

(a) His Life, as before.

(f) The whole title is Marmora Oxoniensia ex Arundelianis, Seldenianis, aliisque, conflata cum perpetuo Commentario, &c.

(g) He took that degree April 29, 1675. Wood's Fasti, Vol. II. col. 198.

(h) The demand for it was such, that it grew very scarce in a few years, and was not to be had but at an advanced price.

(i) He was elected Fellow of All-Souls college, and there commenced LL.D. March 23, 1688, but died soon after. Life of Dr Prideaux, p. 7.

(c) Wood's Fasti, Vol. II. col. 182.

(d) The notes are only references to other authors, who treated more at large of the matters which Florus has epitomized. A preface of the like kind was made every New-Year's-day by that Dean. Wood's Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 798.

beginning

[A] The design was dropt.] The very learned John Gregory of Christ-Church, who died there, Anno 1646-7, left behind him a treatise in manuscript, intituled, Observationes in loca quedam excerpta ex Johannis Malelæ Chronographia, which after his death coming into the Bodleian Library, were intended probably to be prefixed to an edition of Malela, prepared for the press, with a Latin version and annotations by Edmund Childmead of the same college, but he dying in 1653-4, this piece of Malela was published in 1691 with Childmead's version, and a preface or prolegomena by Humphry Hody, B. D. of Wadham College, and some time Greek Professor at Oxford: Gregory's observations were laid aside, as containing things little material (1). While our author was perusing Malela, he lost his brother Nicholas, for whom he had conceived a particular affection on account of his promising parts, and the great progress he had made in literature. He died of the small-pox in the eighteenth year of his age, at Corpus Christi College in Oxford, where he had been a scholar three years, and lies buried in the cloyster near the chapel, with a mural monument erected to his memory, which is still to be seen there (2).

(1) Hody's Prolegomena, §. 43. and Ath. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 101, 169.

(2) Life of H. Prideaux, &c. p. 3, 4.

[B] Was well received abroad, &c.] The learned Huetius says of it, Plurima hujusmodi suppeditat liber inscriptionum Gruteri: at nihil in hoc genere marmora Oxoniensia æquiparare queat, quibus insigniores Præcorum Græcorum epochæ, sædus Smyrnæorum & Mag-nentium, aliæque egregia vetustatis monumenta inscripta sunt (3). The Marmora had been published before by Mr Selden, in 1629, 4to. to which our author now made several additions. But the book suffered much in passing through the press, and is full of typographical errors, which was owing to the negligence of the public corrector of the press. Our author was also obliged to furnish a sheet every week, whether sufficiently prepared or no, which was another great disadvantage to it. For these and other reasons, he never had any opinion or esteem for this work, and speaks of it in the preface, as undoubtedly containing several mistakes, on account of the difficulty of the task, which was above his years, especially considering the hard condition of untimely haste in printing it. And upon these accounts, a more correct edition was undertaken and printed by Mr Michael Mattaire in 1732, in folio.

(3) Demonstratio Evangelica, Prop. 4. cap. ii. §. 14.

[C] He presented a copy to the Lord Chancellor.] The book was dedicated to Henry Howard, then Earl of Norwich, and heir-apparent to the Duke of Norfolk, to which title he afterwards succeeded. But as the present to the University was made at the request of John Evelyn, Esq; of Say's Court near Deptford, our editor carried another copy at the same time to that gentleman, with the following letter from Bishop Fell, in the name of the University. 'Sir, we must never forget the obligations which my Lord Marshal has laid upon the University, in the donation of his marbles, and while we remember that, cannot chuse to bear in mind your great kindness in that favour. Having at last finished the account of his, and other monuments, they all are dedicated to my Lord, and should be presented to him by the mediation of the same person, who was so instrumental in the gift of them. The bearer hereof is the editor, by whose industry and care the work was done, and he is ordered by Mr Vice-Chancellor, in the name of the University, to present a copy to you, as a testimony of the sense they have of your favour to them. This is all that I have to trouble you with at present, adding my wishes of all health to you.'

'I remain,

'Sir,

'Your most faithful and humble servant (4).'

(4) Preface to Mattaire's edition of the Marbles, at the end.

JO. OXON.

[D] He

beginning of the year 1679, presented him to the Rectory of St Clements in Oxford, which then became void, and was in the gift of the Great Seal. Our author the same year published two tracts out of Maimonides in Hebrew, to which he added a Latin translation and annotations. The piece is intitled, De jure Pauperis & Peregrini apud Judaeos. He had been lately appointed Hebrew Lecturer, upon the foundation of Dr Busby, in the College of Christ-Church, and his principal view in printing these tracts, was to introduce young students in the Hebrew language, into the knowledge of the Rabbinical dialect, and to teach them to read it without points. In the latter end of the next year, 1680, the Parliament meeting at Oxford, he attended on the Lord Chancellor Finch there, as his chaplain, but this was of short continuance, the Parliament being dissolved in ten days after its first meeting (k). About Midsummer, 1681, Dr Herbert Astley Dean of Norwich, dying, Dr John Sharp, being now Rector of St Giles's in the Fields, London, (afterwards Archbishop of York) formerly chaplain to the said Lord Chancellor, and Prebendary of Norwich, was promoted to that Deanery, upon which his Prebend falling void and in the gift of the Great Seal, the Lord Chancellor wrote a very kind letter to Mr Prideaux at Oxford, to let him know that he gave it to him; and accordingly on the 15th of August he was installed therein, and kept his first residence at that church in the months of December and January following (l). He was admitted Bachelor of Divinity November 15, 1682 (m), and three days after had the misfortune to lose his patron the Lord Chancellor Nottingham, who died on the eighteenth of that month. However Mr Prideaux found another patron in his successor the Lord-Keeper North (n), whose kindness he experienced before the expiration of the year. For the Rectory of Bladen cum capella de Woodstock becoming void by the resignation of Dr Marshal, Rector of Lincoln College, and Dean of Gloucester, and in the gift of the Great Seal, Mr Prideaux was presented to it, and instituted on the 17th of February, 1683. This favour was the more acceptable as it did not exclude him his place at Christ-Church (to which he was so serviceable as a tutor), since he was empowered to hold it with his studenthip there, by virtue of his being Library-keeper of that college (o). On the 15th of October following, 1683, he lost his father, who died in the seventy-eighth year of his age. He was a gentleman of great worth, sobriety, and discretion, and well learned in most parts of literature becoming a gentleman [D]. Our author now wholly gave himself up to his studies and attending the duties of his function, going constantly to Bladen and Woodstock every Sunday from Christ-Church. And that there might be no deficiency in the ministerial duties at any time, he kept a Curate resident at Woodstock to attend them, so that both churches were constantly served both morning and afternoon every Sunday. And that they might always continue to be served, Dr Fell, who was then Bishop of Oxford, as well as Dean of Christ-Church, projected the building of a house for the Minister at Woodstock; and having accordingly purchased a piece of ground, on the left hand of the gate going into the park from the town, and formed the model for the house, he committed the care of building it to Mr Prideaux, under whose direction it was finished in 1685 [E]. From the time that our author was Master of Arts and a Tutor in the College, he was always very zealous and diligent in reforming such disorders and corruptions as had gradually crept into it, and made use of all opportunities in his power for suppressing them. This of course drew on him the ill-will of several of his fellow-collegians, as must always happen to those, who endeavour at the reformation of discipline (p). But at the same time he had the friendship and esteem of the best men, and such, whose reputation was highest in the University, particularly of Bishop Fell; Dr Pococke, the learned Hebrew and Arabic professor; Dr Marshal, already mentioned; Dr Bernard, Savilian Professor of Astronomy; Dr Mills, the editor of the Greek Testament; Dr H. Godolphin, late Dean of St Paul's; Mr Guise of All-Souls-College; and many other learned and valuable men (q). On the 6th of February, 1684-5, died King Charles II. and his brother James II. was proclaimed King the same day. The Summer following happened the invasions of the Earl of Argyle in Scotland, and the Duke of Monmouth in England, which having both miscarried, and both the conductors of them being cut off, King James now looked upon himself as thoroughly (k) On the 12th of May following, his patron the Lord Finch was created Earl of Nottingham on the decease of Charles Howard, the last Earl of Nottingham of that family; by whose death the title was now become extinct. Collins's Peerage.

(l) Life of Dr H. Prideaux, p. 9. Dr Kidder being made Prebendary soon after, our author contracted an intimate friendship with him.

(m) Wood's Fasti, Vol. II. col. 219.

(n) Sir Francis North; he was promoted from the place of Lord Chief-Justice of the Common-Pleas.

(o) The privilege of holding one living is granted on the consideration that no salary belongs to the office, except 40 s. a year paid to a deputy. See the statutes and ordinances of that college.

(p) The truth is, his temper disposed him to be a little too rigid and severe in this respect.

(q) Life of Dr H. Prideaux, p. 14, 15.

[D] He lost his father.] He studied first at Sidney college in Cambridge, where Dr Paul Micklethwait, afterwards Master of the Temple, was his tutor. From thence he removed to Exeter college in Oxford, at the invitation of Dr John Prideaux, then Rector of that college; and from thence he went to the Inns of Court, in order to make himself acquainted with the laws of the realm; and after this travelled abroad, and spent some time in foreign countries. By these means he improved his natural understanding, and acquired those accomplishments which made him honoured and respected beyond most of his time, in the country where he lived, to which he was very useful in the commission of the peace and lieutenantcy. From the Restoration, to the time of his death, he had the chief management of affairs in the county of Cornwall, which on account of his known wisdom and integrity, were mostly referred to him (s). He was descended of a family that had flourished in many places, both in Cornwall and Devonshire, at Prideaux, Orcharton, Addeston, Thuborough, Soldon, Netherton, Ford-Abbey, and Padstow, as appears from the Heralds books (t).

[E] The parsonage house was finished in 1685.] It is built in the form of a cross, upon the park wall over-against Chaucer's house. The purchase of the ground, and the building of the new house thereon, was wholly at the expence of the learned and pious Bishop Fell, and cost him above 600 l. but the converting the old house which stood there before, into out-houses and offices, and fitting up the same, was wholly at the charge of Dr Prideaux. It was afterwards settled for the use of the minister for ever, in case he shall reside thereon; otherwise for the use of the poor of the town of Woodstock (u).

(t) See also Camden, Leiland's Itinerary, Fuller's Worthies, Rishon's Survey of Devon, Carew's Survey of Cornwall, and Prince's Worthies of Devon, who all make honourable mention of this family.

(u) Life of our author, p. 13, 14.

(s) Life of Dr H. Prideaux, p. 11, 12.

thoroughly settled on the Throne, and began to take open measures for subjecting these realms to Popery (*). At the same time Bishop Fell declining very fast in his health, Mr Prideaux foresaw the confusion which afterwards followed in the college upon his decease, when the King imposed a Popish Dean to succeed him (s); and therefore determined to retire from it and settle on his Cure, and on the sixteenth of February, 1685-6, he married Mrs Bridgett Bokenham, only daughter of Anthony Bokenham, of Helmingham in the county of Suffolk, Esq; who was the son of a younger brother of Sir Henry Bokenham of Thornham in the same county; and her mother was daughter of Thomas Townsend, of Horstead in the county of Norfolk, Esq; (t). In the year 1686, at the public Act, Mr Prideaux proceeded Doctor of Divinity (u); and having exchanged his living of Bladen cum Woodstock for the Rectory of Saham (w) in Norfolk, as soon as that Act was over he left Oxford, and settled upon his Prebend at Norwich. The last thing he did at Oxford, was to attend the funeral of his friend Bishop Fell, who died on the Saturday of that Act; and was buried on the Tuesday following in the Cathedral of Christ-Church, under the Dean's stall in the Latin Chapel [F]. As soon as Dr Prideaux had seen him put in the ground, he immediately left Oxford, and as it happened never afterwards returned thither (x). On his settling at Norwich, the whole management of the affairs of the church fell into his hands: this was a natural consequence of the pains he had before taken that way, from his entrance upon his Prebend, when he found all these matters in the utmost disorder and confusion. The first audit he was at, he found, that the Chapter were always at a loss on the renewal of their leases, both as to the value of their estates, the fine last set, and other circumstances; and that they were obliged to refer themselves to the memory of their seniors for information, which was very imperfect and uncertain. To remedy this inconvenience therefore, he contrived a book called the Private Register, in which were entered the time of every renewal, the name of the tenant, the term demised, the old rent, the provision rent, with the times of payment, the reservations, covenants and conditions of the lease, the date of the former lease, the real value of the estate, what was taken for the fine, and on what consideration it was either raised or abated, with all other circumstances relating to it, which might be of use to be known at future renewals [G]. And as they had no rentals whereby to receive their rents, nor any Treasurers, whereby to pay the salaries of the officers and other out-goings, the Doctor was at the pains to examine all the ledger-books, and out of them he made an exact rental in the order of the alphabet. At the same time he made a book for the Treasurer in a due and orderly method, and by the help of these two books, he reformed the audit-book, supplying what was defective therein, and putting the whole in a proper method. He examined also, and sorted all their charters and evidences, and disposed them in drawers according to their proper order, by which means they may be easily referred to; whereas they lay before in a very confused and disorderly manner, on the floor of a room which was unpaved, and covered with dirt, and the windows broken, all which he repaired. The register-books likewise, and other books, that lay neglected and dispersed up and down, he had bound up in order, to the number of thirty volumes; so that all the evidences and muniments of the church, were settled and disposed of in perfect order and method. Moreover the tomb of Herbert Lofinga, Bishop of Norwich, and founder of the church, having been demolished in the civil wars, the Doctor caused it to be repaired, and

[F] Bishop Fell was buried, &c.] This good Bishop for his piety, learning, and wisdom, was esteemed one of the most eminent prelates of his time, and the college which long enjoyed the benefit of his wise and useful government, is so much indebted to him on that account, as well as for his buildings and other benefactions, that he may deservedly be esteemed the second founder. Some account has been given of him in the course of this work, to which we shall take this opportunity of adding, that Dr Prideaux always looked on him as the author of the book called, The reasons of the decay of Christian Piety, which came out in the name of the author of the Whole Duty of Man. His reasons for it were, that in the summer of 1676, he made a visit to Sir William Morrice, at Warrington in Devonshire, who was his uncle*, when, among other discourse that passed between them, Sir William told him, he thought Bishop Fell was the author of that book, for that while he attended at Court as Secretary of State, a little after the Restoration, he heard the Bishop preach a sermon in the King's Chapel, with which he was so much pleased, that he desired to have a copy of it, which was accordingly presented to him; and that some years after, on the publication of the decay of Christian Piety, he found the sermon in the very same words in that book, and thence concluded, that the person who preached the one, was the author of the other. Dr Prideaux was afterwards further confirmed in this opinion. For as he attended the press in the Theatre at Oxford, whilst another of the books ascribed to the same author was printing, he often found whole lines, and sometimes two or three together, blotted out, and interlineations in their read, which he knew to be of Bishop Fell's hand-writing, and was a liberty it was unlikely should be taken by any but the author. So that his opinion upon the whole, was, that the book called The Whole Duty of Man, was written by an author still unknown; but that all the other books ascribed to the same author, were written by Bishop Fell, and Dr Allestry. And that whereas the first of them that was printed, either by design or mistake of the bookseller, came forth under the name of the author of The Whole Duty of Man, they suffered all the others to come out under the same disguise, the better to conceal what they intended should be kept a secret. And as to what Bishop Fell says in a preface to a folio edition, printed at Oxford, in which all these books are comprized together, where he mentions the author as lately dead, it was generally understood to be meant of Dr Allestry, who was then lately deceased (8).

[G] The private register contained all things of use to be known at future renewals.] This book begins from the time of the Restoration, though it was twenty years after that he set about composing it. As to the preceding time, the Doctor gathered up his information as well as he could, from the ledger and audit books of the church, and from the memories of the senior members of the Chapter. This book he kept, continually making the entries with his own hand, till about two years before his death; when he directed it to be done by another (9).

[H] Ordered

(*) See the general histories of England.

(s) Dr John Massey. See Wood's Fasti, Vol. II. col. 192.

(t) Life, p. 15, 16.

(u) Viz. on the 24th of June that year. Wood's Fasti, Vol. II. col. 229.

(w) Or Saham-Tony, as Mr Wood calls it. Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1058, where 'tis said the exchange was made with John Harfent, B. D. some time Fellow of New-college, Oxon.

(x) Life, p. 16.

* He married a sister of his father.

(8) Ibid. p. 17, 18.

(9) Ibid. p. 22, 23.

and put a new inscription on it of his own composing; giving some account of the founder, and of this and his other foundations (y). The Doctor had not been long at Norwich, before he was engaged in a controversy with the Papists: King James having made open profession of their religion, they imagined, that, supported by his authority, they should carry all before them, and bring the whole nation over to their persuasion; and to this end, they sent out emissaries into all parts of the kingdom. Those, however, who were sent into the country, they would not trust with the whole controversy, for fear of over-burthening their abilities, but assigned a particular point to each, which he was to insist upon, and beyond which he was not to meddle: and the point assigned to those who came to make conversions in Norfolk and Norwich, was the invalidity of the Orders of the Church of England, which they were directed to make out by such arguments as their superiors had furnished them with; and from thence they were to infer, that having no Priesthood we could have no Sacraments, and consequently could be no Church, nor any salvation be had among us. The first that appeared there with this argument, was one Webster, who had formerly been Curate of St Margaret's in Kings-Lynn, for the Dean and Chapter of Norwich, to whom belongs the appropriation of that church; and being turned out from thence for his notorious misdemeanours, he went to London, and there kept a private school: But on King James's coming to the Crown, seeing the great encouragement that Popery met with, he early embraced that interest; and for a greater shew of zeal came into Norfolk as a missionary for Popery; with the argument abovementioned, and had the confidence to send a challenge to the Bishop of Norwich, appointing a time when he would come to him at his palace and dispute that point with him. On this the Bishop desired Dr Sharp and Dr Prideaux to be present at the time, when Webster came, bringing with him one Aston a Jesuit-Priest, who resided at Norwich, for the service of those of the Roman communion in that city. When all were seated, Webster began to read a paper, which he called a preface to the disputation; whereupon the Bishop interrupting, called him to an account for his apostacy, and reproved him for that, as well as for the present insult, in the manner he deserved. Whereupon Webster rose up in great anger, and departing abruptly, broke off the conference. Both Dr Sharp and Dr Prideaux offered to answer his arguments, if he would have proposed them, but he let them know, that he disdained to dispute with any but the Bishop himself; and so the conference ended. Not long after, Mr Aston having perverted a Brewer in Norwich, this produced a dispute on the same point, between Aston and two Protestant Divines, Earbury and Kipping, at which, a gentleman of Norwich who was present, pretending not to have received satisfaction for the validity of our Orders, addressed a letter to Dr Prideaux about it, and the Doctor returning an answer the next day, November 11, 1687, hence followed several letters on both sides upon the same subject; and the last of the Doctor's, being a very long one, containing the whole state of the controversy: But by the time he had finished it, understanding that the gentleman for whom it was intended, had gone over to the Popish communion, and was irrecoverably determined in it, the Doctor did not think it worth his while to get a copy of it wrote out for him, and therefore threw aside his papers in his study, as no further useful, to the end for which they were originally intended. But being challenged afterwards for not answering Mr Aston's letter, he published his papers the ensuing summer, under the title of The validity of the Orders of the Church of England made out, against the objections of the Papists, in several letters to a gentleman of Norwich that desired satisfaction therein. In the beginning of April following this gentleman died, owning himself a member of that communion, upon which the Papists were resolved to bury him in the cathedral, and bring him thither in a solemn procession by way of triumph: But the Doctor being then in his residence at the church, was as fully determined to obstruct this design, and gave orders that no grave there should be made for him [H], and that order was observed (z). At the same time there was another affair which exasperated the Popish party against him; for the Doctor observing, that the Clergy of Norwich were much intimidated, by the severe measures the King took for the propagating of his religion, especially after what had happened to the Bishop of London,

(y) It is placed before the high altar, with the arms of the Bishop at the upper end, the Dean's on the lower, and the six Prebendaries on the sides. This was done in 1652. Life, p. 19—21.

(z) Life, p. 23 to 26.

[H] Ordered that no grave should be made for him.] This being matter of great disappointment, they had a meeting at the Goat-Tavern in Norwich to consult about it; and from thence sent a message to the Doctor to expostulate with him, and demand his reason for such a proceeding. In answer to this, he wrote them a letter to the following purpose, that Mr N— not dying within the precincts of the Cathedral Church, they were under no obligation to bury him in it; but he recommended it to his relations to bury him as the law directed, in the church or church-yard of the parish where he died, against which there could be no exception: this answer the Doctor chose to send in writing, with his name subscribed, that it might not be in the power of the messenger to misrepresent it. On the delivery of this note, a certain Knight who lived near Norwich, and had several times turned Papist and Protestant backward and forward, as either religion was most likely to be uppermost, sitting as chairman of the consultation, declared, that there was nothing penal in it, and therefore advised the sending again, in order to provoke him to give another answer. The deceased's brother, who had also gone over to Popery, was sent on that errand, and coming to the Doctor's house, demanded, in an imperious manner, why he would not let his brother be buried in the cathedral; to which the Doctor answered, that he had sent his reasons in writing, which he supposed the other had seen. The reply was, that he had seen the writing, but the reason there given was not sufficient, and he would have another. The Doctor said he had no other for him, and so leaving him retired to his study; on which the other went off in great wrath; and the consult not being able to gain any advantage against the Doctor, followed his advice, and buried the deceased in the church of the parish where he died (10).

(10) Life, p. 27, to 29.

[I] He

(aa) They were both suspended by the Ecclesiastical Commission; the doctor for some unbecoming reflections in his sermons, and the Bishop for refusing to suspend him on that account. History General of England, under 1686.

(bb) The text to both was, Heb. ix. 24, 25, 26, 27, 28.

(cc) He was sent for by Sancroft, who, that the letter might not be stopped in London, where all suspected letters were opened, sent it to the next post-office in the country on the Norwich road; but, by the neglect of the Postmaster, it did not come 'till the post after it was intended; so that, before the Bishop could get to London, the petition of the seven Bishops was presented, and the petitioners sent to the Tower. Life, p. 40. See rem. [N].

don, and Dr Sharp, Dean of Norwich (aa); and that they wholly abstained from meddling with this controversy, at a time which there was most need to exert themselves, resolved, by his example, to encourage them to be silent no longer on so important an occasion, but speak out in defence of the holy religion they professed. In this spirit, having two turns for preaching in the cathedral, the first on Good-Friday, the other the Sun-se'en-night following; he formed both his sermons against the Mass-Sacrifice of the Church of Rome (bb), wherein he declared, that whatever were the consequence, he would not be afraid to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ [I]: These having angered the Papists, Mr Acton, the Jesuit afore-mentioned, who was chief mass-priest of a Popish conventicle then set up in Norwich, at a place formerly made use of as a grainery, sent two of his converted disciples to the Doctor, to demand an account of the said sermons; to which he answered, that he knew no obligations he had to be accountable to the Men of the Grainery, for what he had preached in the cathedral; if they had a mind to know what he delivered there, they might come and hear him, and that was all the answer he would give them. And as most of the ministers in Norwich took courage by his example, and preached against Popery, the party applied to a Popish gentleman, of considerable figure in Norfolk; who had an interest at Court, to complain of him to the King. But this had no effect; for as their design was to strike at the whole body of the Protestant Clergy, it was no longer worth their while to concern themselves with a particular person apart. This design was laid in the order, dated May 4, 1688, to all Ministers of churches in the realm, for reading the famed Declaration of Indulgence, &c. at the usual time of divine service, upon pain of ejection; and to that end, bundles of the said Declaration were sent from the King's printing-house to every Bishop in the kingdom, according to the number of churches and chapels in their respective dioceses. What followed, how the Bishops petitioned the King, were imprisoned for the cause, and brought to their trial, is the subject of general history, we must confine our selves to the share which Dr Prideaux had in the affair. It is well known that a letter was drawn up by the Earl of Halifax, and directed to all the Clergy of England, persuading them not to read the Declaration. This letter being just printed off, when Dr Lloyd then Bishop of Norwich arrived at London, to consult with the Archbishop and other diocesans, what was properest for them to do, in this critical juncture (cc), his Lordship having got two thousand copies of it, for his Diocese, sent them down to Dr Prideaux to be dispersed among the Clergy. And this was executed so successfully, that before the third of June, on which the Declaration was to be read, every Clergyman in the diocese was furnished with one of these letters against it, which had so good an effect, that out of one thousand two hundred parishes in the diocese of Norwich, there were not above four or five in which it was read, and in those, the ministers were obliged to read it out of the Gazette. The Doctor in the distribution of these letters, undertook a dangerous task: they were conveyed down to him in the stage-coach in a box, under the care of an old gentleman in the neighbourhood, whose niece he had married; and as soon as the uncle was come home, the Doctor immediately went to enquire for the box; where he found the servant opening it to give one of them to a Physician of Norwich, who was a spy for the Papists, and had gotten into the old gentleman's acquaintance. This was very fortunate,

[I] He would not be afraid to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ. As these sermons are a remarkable instance of our author's courage at this trying time, and were never printed, we shall give the following extract from the last of them. 'And now, says he, I doubt not but that there are some who will not be a little offended with me, for what I have said, both in this, and my former discourse on this text, but unto such I have these two things to say. First, that we being ministers of Jesus Christ, think our selves obliged by the law of our mission, and the vow we have entered into upon the taking this holy office upon us, to declare God's truths to all those to whom we are sent; and to warn them of those errors, which, if they fall into, will endanger their everlasting salvation. And when any party of men are so unreasonable as to take it ill at our hands, for discharging our duty and our consciences herein, we shall say unto them the same which the Apostle did unto the Jews in the like case, Whether it be right in the sight of God to hearken unto you more than unto God, judge ye. But secondly, as God and our consciences oblige us to the discharge of this duty, so do we take it, that we have full licence from the King's most excellent Majesty to authorize us so to do; and that not only by his laws, which are the most authentic expressions of his will, but also by his late Declaration, wherein, out of his abundant clemency, he hath given full liberty to all men in this realm, to own and profess each their own religion, according as their consciences shall direct.—And seeing by virtue of this liberty, so many now a-days do take upon them to oppose the doctrines of our Church, and set up their own errors against them; who can with any reason deny us the same liberty to defend our selves. For since so many make use of the privilege of this liberty now granted to them, not only to preach up their erroneous doctrines against us, but also to hunt after the souls of men from house to house, seeking whom they can devour; without permitting those whom they think they can have any advantage over, either to live in quiet, or die in quiet in our communion: If we only, amidst this liberty, were to sit still with our hands upon our mouths, and silently behold those to be daily torn from us, for whose souls we are to answer, if they perish through our neglect, our case would of all men be the hardest. It can never enter into my thoughts, that so just a Prince, as his present Majesty is owned to be, ever designed to put any such thing upon us. This Declaration is general to all his people, which is demonstration to me, that he intended the benefit of it for all, that is, as well to those who have the laws on their side, as to those who have not. And therefore by virtue of that Declaration, as well as the impulse of my own conscience, I have thus taken upon me to discharge my duty in this particular, and think nothing can be more unreasonable, than that those who have no right at all, but by this Declaration, should take any exceptions at it. But be that as it will, since God hath called me to this ministry, I am not ashamed of, neither will I be afraid to preach the gospel of Jesus Christ.'

fortunate, but still the Doctor not knowing how far the secret might have been communicated to him, by the old gentleman, was under some difficulty how to proceed any farther; for having already highly provoked the Popish party, should he be found distributing these letters, he might be very certain they would do their utmost to ruin him. However, his zeal for the Protestant religion soon got the better of these apprehensions: determining therefore not to decline any danger, where the interest of that cause was concerned, he undertook the affair, and had the good fortune to carry it through, without being discovered (dd). And this was chiefly to a contrivance he made use of in the management of it, which may be seen below [K]. In the beginning of November following, the Prince of Orange landing at Torbay, King James soon after withdrew to France. Upon his Majesty's flight, the mob rose in many places, and created great disorders all over the nation. At first they began with rifling the houses of Papists, and such as were reckoned to be Popishly affected; 'till at last any body was accounted so, in whose house plunder was to be had, and these disorders raged no where more than at Norwich. The mob having plundered several houses in the city, at last made an appointment to do the same, by some houses within the precinct of the Cathedral, which they had marked out for that purpose. But Dr Prideaux having timely notice of their design, ordered the gates of the Cloze to be shut up; and the inhabitants arming themselves, repulsed the rabble who attacked them, to the number of five hundred men, and made them desist from their enterprize (ee). The next night every body followed the Doctor's example, armed, and stood upon their defence all over the city, which soon put an end to these disorders. About this time, Dr Batteley having resigned his Archdeaconry of Suffolk, on being promoted to that of Canterbury; Dr Prideaux was on Dec. 21, 1688, collated to it by Dr William Lloyd, then Bishop of Norwich, and in May following, 1689, he made his first visitation. The new oaths, and the lawfulness of them, being then the general subject of debate, especially among the Clergy, his chief business in this visitation was, to give the best satisfaction he could to those who had any doubts about them; in which he had such success, that though they were above three-hundred parishes in that Archdeaconry, there were no more than three Ministers in the jurisdiction that refused to take them (ff). Upon the great change which was wrought in State-Affairs, by the Revolution, several alterations were also projected for the Church, in which our Archdeacon made a considerable figure. For instance, in the Convocation which met in the winter of this year, 1689, with a view of settling the much bandied affair of a Comprehension, the Doctor published a piece in favour of that design, under the title of, A Letter to a Friend, relating to the present Convocation at Westminster; which met with so great approbation, that several thousands were sold within a fortnight after. In reality, the Doctor had great expectations from this meeting, in hopes that many things would have been done for the advantage of the Church, especially in improving and amending the Liturgy, and was much grieved at their ill success [L]. At his return to Nor-

(dd) Ibid, p. 41, 42.

(ee) Some body crying out to the Bull, they all went to the Bull, a tavern kept by a Papist in the city; and having plundered and gutted that house, finished their expedition. Ibid, p. 42.

(ff) Ibid, p. 51. Though the doctor complied with the oaths himself, and acted up faithfully to them all the rest of his life, yet looking upon those that refused them as honest men, who sacrificed their interests to their consciences, he always treated them with kindness and respect.

wich,

[K] A contrivance which may be seen below.] The contrivance was thus: having made up about a dozen packets, with several of these letters inclosed in each of them, he superscribed them in feigned hands, to so many ministers in the city of Norwich, and sent a trusty person to Yarmouth, with directions to disperse them in several wherries, which came up every night from thence to Norwich; and this being faithfully executed, the letters were delivered next morning as directed. Now as they were sent from Yarmouth, it was generally believed they came from Holland, and the Doctor by this device escaped all suspicion of having any hand in the affair. As to the rest, he sent them by the carriers, who go from Norwich every week into all parts of the county, so that they were dispersed over the diocese, without it's being known from whose hand they came, 'till all the danger was over. At this time there was one of the Prebendaries of Norwich strongly inclined to Popery, who intended to publish the Declaration in his parish-church in the country. But the two days of reading it being the third and tenth of June, and that month and July happening to be the two months for keeping his residence at the Cathedral, he sent to Dr Prideaux desiring him to excuse his coming for the two first weeks in June, and that he would reside for him those two weeks. But the Doctor being apprized of the true reason for that request, sent him word, that he would by no means comply with it; that the third of June being Whit-Sunday, and the tenth Trinity Sunday that year, the service of both these solemn days would fail, unless he came to attend it, and that the consequence would be the forfeiture of the revenue of his Prebend for the whole year; and as the Doctor was Treasurer of the Church, he farther assured him that he would certainly exact it, and not pay him one penny. This message immediately brought the Prebendary to Norwich, and he afterwards complied to the Revolution (ii).

[L] He was grieved at their ill success.] Among other things, there was provided a family-book to be authorized by this Convocation; containing directions for Family Devotions, with several forms of Prayer for worship every morning and evening, suited to the different circumstances of the families in which they were to be used. 'Till the breaking out of the civil war in 1641, which proved destructive to all order in religion as well as every thing else, family devotion was kept up all over the nation. Such masters of families as were able, often composed forms of their own; others, for the most part, used those which are in the Practice of Piety, a book then in much repute. Thus it continued 'till those unhappy wars, when the Puritanical party prevailing, carried this duty to an extravagant excess, and by their long extempore prayers, which were stuffed with absurd cant, and downright nonsense, brought family devotion itself into disrepute with many, who justly disliked such a nauseous and unsuitable manner of addressing the Deity; but instead of avoiding and reforming the abuse, ran into the contrary extreme, and omitted all prayer whatever with their families. Especially after the Restoration, when many, to shew their aversion to the sectaries, carried the matter too far, and branded many things with the imputation of fanaticism, only because the people had used them in a fanatical manner. Of this kind was family prayer, which many, in compliance with the prevailing vogue, from this time omitted. There was also another cause which derived its original from the same times, and helped to produce the same ill effect; that during the reign of these sectaries, and the prevalence of Puritanism, the Common-Prayer Book being extravagantly run down, on the change of times at the Restoration, it was as extravagantly cried up by

(ii) Life, p. 43, to 45.

wich, finding the Cathedral settled under a new Dean, Dr Henry Fairfax [M], who, as he had no other avocation, constantly resided there, and the Popish controversy being brought to an end by the Revolution, he quitted Norwich, and retired to his parsonage of Saban in Norfolk, which he served constantly every Sunday morning and afternoon, during the four years that he lived there, excepting only while he was keeping his two months residence at Norwich, or visiting his Archdeaconry of Suffolk, which he did constantly twice every year, 'till disabled to bear the journey, by the unhappy disorder that afterwards came upon him. For the first three years after the Revolution, he took upon himself the office of preaching at every place, where he held his visitation, which was done to prevent such of the Clergy, as were not entirely satisfied of the justice of the Revolution, from launching out into topics, that might give offence to the government, when it should come to their turn to preach (gg). When the Bishoprick of Norwich became vacant by Dr Lloyd's deprivation, on refusing the new Oaths [N], Dr Compton Bishop of London, and Dr Lloyd, Bishop of St Asaph, being appointed by commission to govern the diocese during the vacancy, consulted and advised with Dr Prideaux in most things, which they did by virtue of that delegacy, and he served them on all occasions much to their satisfaction. So that both these Bishops earnestly recommended Dr Prideaux for the See of Norwich: but this was done without his knowledge or desire, and had he been nominated, he must have followed Dr Beveridge's example (bb), and refused it, because of his friendship with Bishop Lloyd. One of the last things that Prelate did in his diocese, was making our Doctor Archdeacon of Suffolk, and should he after this, have accepted of his Bishoprick, it would have founded ill with many, and carried somewhat like the appearance of ingratitude toward his benefactor; not but that he well knew there would have been no justice in such a censure; but he considered that it was necessary, especially for one in that station, to avoid all appearance of evil, and that a Bishop must have the good esteem of his people, in order to make his ministry efficacious among them; that those of the High-Church party, as if no other form of prayer was to be used in families, any more than in churches: and this notion growing more and more fashionable, the consequence of it was, that whereas these prayers are many of them proper only to be read by men in Orders, many families of the gentry and nobility, who had no chaplains, began to disuse them, and nothing being substituted in their room, this was in a great many families the occasion of totally neglecting this duty. Dr Prideaux, with many others, being persuaded that the decay of family devotion was chiefly owing to these two causes, and that from hence proceeded a want of true Christian Piety all over the land, was very earnest for the publication of this book. Some years after the breaking up of this Convocation, as he was walking with Archbishop Tenison, in his garden at Lambeth, he pressed his Grace very much to publish it. But the Archbishop thinking it best to be done with the concurrence of the Convocation, and the Doctor not thinking it advisable to call one, in the then temper of the Clergy, it was not printed; and hath since had the misfortune to be lost, for being put into the hands of Dr Williams, Bishop of Chichester, it was somehow mislaid, and after his death could never be retrieved. It is most likely that being carelessly put among such papers, as the good Bishop at the time of his death had ordered to be burnt, it was destroyed with them. Dr Prideaux frequently made this one article in his Archidiaconal charges, where he carried the matter so far, as to tell his Clergy that Prayer was so much their duty, that they should not only be constant in performing it morning and evening, in their own families, but in whatever other family any of them should happen to lodge at any time, he ought to offer his Prayers to the family, if they should not be otherwise provided for that duty, and exhort them to joyn with him in them; and should they refuse to hearken to him, let him look on that house as unfit for a Clergyman to make his abode in, and avoid it accordingly (12).

(gg) Life, p. 67, 68.

(bb) He refused the bishopric of Bath and Wells, on account of his friendship with Dr Ken, the deprived Bishop; whereupon it was given to Dr Kidder, Dean of Peterborough, and one of the Prebendaries of Norwich. See his article. He was a particular friend of our author. Life, p. 77.

(12) Ibid. p. 71.

[M] Dr Fairfax.] When this Convocation was first called, Dr Stillingfleet, on the death of Dr Thomas, Bishop of Worcester, being promoted to that See from the Deanery of St Paul's, was succeeded herein by Dr Tillotson, Dean of Canterbury, to which Dr Sharp, being removed from the Deanery of Norwich, made way for Dr Henry Fairfax, at this last Deanery into which he was installed, in 1689. He was now one of the Fellows of Magdalen-College in Oxford, who had signally suffered in the cause of that college. For when the Fellows were all cited to appear before King James's High Commission Court, for not obeying the King's mandate, in chusing Mr Farmer for their President, and had in obedience to that citation appeared, and put in a modest answer, giving their reasons why they could not comply therewith; Dr Fairfax being present among the rest, addressed himself to the Court, and declared his dissent from that answer; upon which they encouraged him to declare the cause of his so doing; expecting it would be on the King's side: but he took out a paper, in which was contained a protestation against the legality of their commission, drawn out in full form, and read it aloud in the face of the Court. This provoked them so much, that after a great deal of foul language from the Lord Chancellor Jefferies, who sat President of the Court, he was forthwith sentenced to be expelled the college; and accordingly continued so 'till the Revolution (13). He was descended from a noble family, being the son of a younger brother of Ferdinando, Lord Fairfax, who was the father of the famous Sir Thomas Fairfax, General of the parliament army against King Charles I. (14).

(13) See more of this in Dr Hough's article.

(14) Collins's Peerage.

[N] Dr William Lloyd deprived Bishop of Norwich.] We have already mentioned an instance of his zeal for the Protestant cause, first in the dispute with Webster, and then in sending Lord Halifax's letter to our Dean, and the confidence which the Archbishop had in his wisdom and integrity, by sending for him to London on occasion of the Royal command, concerning the famous Declaration for a General Liberty of Conscience, and how he came not among the Bishops who were sent to the Tower. Those Bishops however, had this advantage thereby, that his Lordship had the opportunity of serving them as their Solicitor, and conveying to them those advices of the nobility, lawyers, and other friends, by which they governed their conduct through the whole course of that affair; and his assiduity was so much taken notice of, that he was more than once sent to keep company with those, whose cause he so diligently solicited. By his deprivation the diocese lost a very able and worthy pastor; for he was an excellent preacher, a man of great integrity and piety, thoroughly understood all the parts and duties of his function, and had a mind fully bent to put them all in execution, for the honour of God, and the good of the Church on all occasions. He was first Bishop of Landaff, from whence he was translated to Peterborough, and last of all to Norwich †. After his deprivation he lived very retired in some of the villages near London; first at Hogfden, next at Wandsworth, and lastly at Hammermith, where he died, January 1. 1709, full twenty years after he had been deprived of his Bishoprick (15).

† In June 1685, upon the death of Dr Anthony Sparrow, in the preceding month. Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1162.

(15) Life of Dr Prideaux, p. 40, 73. Dr Trimmell, one of the Prebendaries of Norwich, and a particular friend of Dr Prideaux, succeeded to the bishoprick of Norwich.

[O] I:

that this esteem was as much diminished by actions, mistakenly reputed evil, as by those which are truly so; and, in short, that a Bishop should be as Cæsar would have his wife, not only clear of all guilt, but free from the imputation of it likewise. In the first Session of Parliament, after the new Bishops had taken their seats there, two bills were brought into the House of Lords, relating to the Church, in both of which Dr Prideaux happened to be concerned. One to take away pluralities of benefices, with cure of souls; the other, to prevent clandestine marriages. The first of these was chiefly pushed by Dr Burnet, Bishop of Salisbury, who communicated the design, with a draught of it, to our author for his advice. He did not approve of that draught, and drew up another, whereby all pluralities for the future, were to be restrained within the limits of five miles distance, measuring it by the common road, from one church to another, which was unanimously approved by the whole Bench, and agreed to be offered to the Parliament. But it was thrown out for the reason mentioned in note [O]. As to the bill to prevent clandestine marriages, which was brought into the house of Lords by one of the Peers, our author in answer to Dr Kidder, then Bishop of Bath and Wells, who applied to him on the occasion, advised that friend to prevail with the Archbishop of Canterbury, and the rest of the Bishops, to put the laws in execution which were already made, against clandestine marriages, averring, that better laws could not be contrived to reform this abuse, than those which were already to be found in our Ecclesiastical Constitutions for this purpose (ii): and it was his opinion, that if those laws were duly observed, and vigorously prosecuted against the violaters, there would be no need of making Acts of Parliament, or establishing sanguinary laws against the Clergy, for preventing this iniquity [P]. The Bishop of Bath and Wells, on his perusal of this letter, forthwith sent it to the press, without our author's knowledge or consent, and the next week after, to his great surprize, it came down to him in print. This he would have had great reason to be offended at, had not the Bishop spared him so far as not to put his name to it. In the same year, 1691, toward the end of the long vacation, died Dr Edward Pocock, the very eminent Hebrew Professor, at Oxford, and Dr Prideaux was offered that place, but declined it for several reasons, which at that time made it inconvenient to him to accept it: this refusal afterwards proved a great detriment to him. About Whitfunday, 1692, Bishop Moore, who had succeeded Dr Lloyd at Norwich, came into his diocese, and Dr Prideaux attending, for the examination of candidates for Holy Orders, he was much offended at the ignorance he found among them, in regard to divinity, so that he frequently lamented the loss of Dr Busby's benefaction, who offered to found two catechistical lectures, one in each University, with an endowment of 100 pounds per annum, each, for instructing the undergraduates in the rudiments of the Christian Religion [Q]. In the same spirit of discipline, observing that many persons construed the indulgence of the Toleration Act, which passed in 1689, into a licence for absenting themselves from all public worship, he drew up a circular letter, which he dispersed in print to the Clergy within his district, to let them know, that notwithstanding the late indulgence granted by that Act, it was still their duty to take care that the proper presentments were made to him, of all those who profanely absented themselves from the public worship in the Church, informing them, that such absenters were still liable to the penalties of former statutes [R]. This letter he published in 1701, at the end of his Directions

(ii) On this occasion he mentions the particulars of those laws, together with the neglect of putting them in execution, and the great abuse in the manner of granting licences. A remedy for which has been since provided by the late act to prevent clandestine marriages, where they are restrained to the nobility, &c. See the act.

[O] It was thrown out for the reasons mentioned in note [O.] The Lords it seems, as Dr Prideaux apprehended, were so fond of their privilege of qualifying Chaplains for Pluralities, that they would hearken to nothing which should diminish or restrain it, and therefore would not allow the bill to be once read in their house. Our author however, in hopes that the good of the Church, as he called it, might at some time prevail so far, as to have the matter considered again with better success, when this bill and treatise might be of some use for regulating it, ordered them both to be printed in 1710, and published at the end of his book, concerning the original of Tythes (16), with a preface, containing an answer to the objections made by the Peers in defence of their privilege.

[P] No need of sanguinary laws against the Clergy. The purport of the bill being, to make it felony in the Minister who should solemnize or officiate at any clandestine marriage; Dr Prideaux declared, that should it pass into an act, it would be, in his opinion, the greatest hardship that ever was put upon the Clergy in any Christian state: for it would be a continual snare of ruin and destruction to them, since it would subject them to be tried for their lives every marriage they solemnized. That it would not be a sufficient salvo, to say the licence would be their security; for who would care to have the safety of his life depend on a slip of paper, which the rats might eat up, or a hundred other accidents might happen to destroy, and then the Minister must suffer death for want of it. And further, for his part, the Doctor declared to the Bishop, that after the passing of this bill, whatever should be the consequence, he would never marry any more persons; and was of opinion that all other Ministers who had any regard for their own safety, would take the same resolution; and then the bill, instead of preventing clandestine marriages, would operate so far as to put a stop to all marriages. These considerations when offered to the house in the debate, were thought to carry such a weight with them, that those who brought in the bill were content to drop it, and pressed it no farther. We must not dismiss this remark, without taking notice of the late bill, said to be contrived by Earl Hardwick, then Lord Chancellor (17), which has effectually prevented any such marriages in England, by making them void and of none effect; and yet a way has been attempted to evade this act by withdrawing to Scotland, and having them solemnized there according to the ecclesiastical laws of that country.

[Q] Dr Busby's Catechistical Lectures. The offer was clogged with a clause, which provided that all the said undergraduates should be obliged to attend those lectures, and none of them be admitted to the degree of Bachelors of Arts, till after an examination by the Catechist, as to their knowledge in the doctrine and precepts of the Christian religion, and by him approved. This condition defeated the design, for both the Universities rejected it, and the benefaction with it*.

[R] Absenters were still liable to the penalties of former statutes. Our Archdeacon's conduct in this affair, was undeniably very pious and well becoming his station in the Church. But we must not omit, out

(17) This act was passed anno 1753, not without great difficulty, as the Protestant maxim, that the bond of marriage was indissoluble, was therein reversed; which is so inconsistent to the whole tenor of our ecclesiastical law, as it stood before, that 'tis no wonder we don't find any such method to be ever thought of by Dr Prideaux.

* Life, p. 92.

(16) The preface is dated at Norwich Octob. 10, 1709; i. e. 1710 according to the Printers.

visions to Church-Wardens, which was wrote with the like good intention, of exciting those officers to a faithful discharge of their duty [S]. At Michaelmas, 1694, he thought proper to leave Saham, and return again with his family to Norwich, after he had resided there about four years. His reasons for leaving this place were, that the country thereabouts subjecting people to agues, his family were hardly ever free from that distemper, all the time he lived there. He was himself sick of it a considerable time; and two of his children were so long ill, and contracted so bad a state of health from it, as afterwards cost them both their lives. Besides, being obliged to leave most of his books at Norwich, for want of room for them at Saham, this hindered him from carrying on his studies according to his inclinations, and in these he was further interrupted while he staid there, by the avocations he frequently met with in country-business, which made him weary of the place, and on all these considerations he determined to leave it [T]. On his quitting Saham, he gave it up altogether, without reserving any of the profits, as he might have done by putting a Curate on the parish; and resolving that as far as in him lay, the benefice and the office should go together, he resigned both into the hands of the Bishop, and wrote to the Warden and Fellows of New-College in Oxford, who were patrons of the living to present another, which they did accordingly. On his return to Norwich, the whole business of the Cathedral fell again into his hands, and he was obliged to undertake the burden of it, to prevent all from running to confusion. Dean Fairfax now resided mostly in London, and hardly ever came to Norwich, 'till toward the latter end of his time; and Dr Prideaux after he had left Saham, being constantly there, this gave him a full opportunity to make himself master of the affairs of that church; which he continued to take care of 'till the time of his death (kk). But did not hinder him from extending his care for the Church in general; to which purpose, upon the promotion of Dr Tenison to the see of Canterbury, our Archdeacon addressed a letter to his Grace, containing An Account of the English Settlements in the East Indies, together with some Proposals for the Propagation of Christianity in those parts of the World [U]. On the twelfth of February, 1696, he of impartiality, to observe, that though the former laws concerning the prophanation of the Lord's Day, by absenting from the public worship, were not expressly repealed by the act of Toleration, yet the force of them was rendered ineffectual thereby. For any ecclesiastical prosecution upon the Church-wardens presentment, was from that time easily defeated, by the offender's conforming on such occasions to some one of the tolerated sects. This mischievous effect, though evidently contrary to the intention of the Legislature, proved by construction an unavoidable consequence of that act; inasmuch, that I believe no such presentments, as the Archdeacon enjoins in his circular letter, are ever thought of at this time of day.

(kk) Ibid. p. 95 to 97.

[S] His directions to Church-Wardens, &c. In the preface to the second part of his Connection of the Old and New Testament, wrote when he was incapable of doing any further service to his generation, he says, it had always been the comfort as well as the care of his life, to make himself as serviceable as he could, in all the stations to which he had been called: and this little manual of directions is a conspicuous testimony in his behalf. Nothing could be more wanted at the time it was published, there being no book of the kind then extant, but what was very defective; and yet the matter was brought into such a small compass, that the price was within any body's reach. It has gone through several impressions, and still continues in good repute, as being generally a safe rule in the business ordinarily incident to that extensive office; especially if due regard be had to such new regulations relating thereto, as have been introduced since the author's last revival, which was in 1711 (18). However it must be remembered, that as it was first intended only for the use of his own Archdeaconry, so the design of it is to excite the officers therein, as well as the Ministers, to a faithful discharge of their plain duty in this respect, without entering into any nice and difficult cases, which did not properly belong to his function; and for the same reason it extends not to poor rates, or any part of what is more immediately the office of the overseers of the poor.

[T] He left Saham. While he lived there he contracted a friendship with several of the neighbouring gentry, particularly with Sir John Holland, and Sir Edward Atkins. The former of these was a gentleman who retained a remarkable vigour in a very advanced age, being past ninety when the Doctor first became acquainted with him; and lived to be within one of a hundred. He was a person of great understanding and wisdom, and had made a very considerable figure in the Long-Parliament, where he was always for moderate measures, and sided with those who were for composing matters with the King: 'till at last, finding that all attempts of this kind were constantly defeated by the violence of parties, sometimes on the side of the Parliament, sometimes by the King; and that there were no hopes of bringing matters to an accommodation, he began to despair of being any longer serviceable to his King or his country; and therefore retired into Holland, where he lived most part of his time, 'till the return of King Charles II. when he was appointed one of the Commissioners sent by the Parliament to bring him home. As to Sir Edward Atkins he lived much nearer the Doctor, and conversed with him more frequently, he was a man of great piety, probity, and goodness, and had in the reign of King James II. been Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer; in which post he acquitted himself with great justice and integrity, especially towards the Clergy, whom he would never suffer to be oppressed, and of whose rights he was remarkably careful while he presided in that court. At the Revolution, refusing to take the new oaths, he lost his place, and retired to Pickenham in Norfolk, where he lived quietly, in great respect and esteem, by all his neighbours, to whom he was very useful in reconciling their differences; for, being a man of great reputation and integrity, whenever any controversy arose among them, they usually referred it to his arbitration, in which he always decided with justice and equity, and generally to the satisfaction of both parties. This was his chief employment and delight in his retirement, scarce a week passing in which he had not several of these causes brought before him; for, as his fame spread all over the country, people came from considerable distances to him in such cases. As to the oaths, though he always refused them himself, yet he condemned none that did. When he was discoursed with about that matter, his usual saying was, that the Devil was busy with men on their death-beds, and therefore he would keep his mind free, that when he should come to die, he might have no doubts or fears on that account to disturb his conscience. About a year after Dr Prideaux left Saham, Sir Edward also left Pickenham, and removed with his family to London, where he died not long after of the Stone (19).

[U] He sent Archbishop Tenison a proposal for propagating Christianity in the English settlements in the East Indies. The Hon. Mr Robert Boyle, about twenty years before, being desired to take on him the trouble of the East India committee, because his directions might be useful in that branch of the company's trade which relates to drugs, soon took notice of their great neglect with regard to the conversion of the infidels under their government. And, after several applications.

(19) Life, p. 73 to 76. He died in 1698. See a monument erected to the family by Sir Edward's second son, Edward Atkins of Ketteringham in Norfolk, in the south cross aisle of Westminster-abbey.

(18) Or, according to the Printers, in 1712, when the third edition, revised, corrected, and enlarged, was printed, and is therefore the best.

he was instituted into the vicarage of Trowse, on the presentation of the Dean and Chapter of Norwich. It is a little village within a mile of Norwich, and a very small benefice; being hardly worth to him forty pounds a year: however, having no cure since he had resigned Saham, he took this small vicarage, rather for the sake of exercising the duties of applications made to the company in vain, at last attempted something in that way upon his own purse; and, in 1677, wrote to Bishop Fell about proposing to have the Malayan Gospels re-printed at Oxford, from the Dutch copy, for this purpose. The Bishop hereupon consulted with Dr Marshall, and our author, which last objected to it: that the Dutch Gospels were in the Dutch character, and not in the Malayan, which is the same with the Arabic. That the Malayan words were spelt after the Dutch pronunciation. That the version was made from the Dutch translation, which is by no means a good one (20). That the Malayan language is not spoken in the English settlements. Whatever was the success of Mr Boyle's attempt, the impression which it made upon our author had stuck in his mind ever since, and the prints which the East-India Company had published to defend themselves against the then late attacks made upon them, first, by the interlopers, and since in parliament, having informed him of the vast number of the infidels under their government, had moved him to be concerned for them so far, as to make this proposal to the Archbishop, as a work worthy of his Grace to promote, by the contributions of well-disposed Christians among us: and observing that it would be a matter of great reputation to our Church, if the Clergy alone should undertake it, he concludes thus, 'Whenever it shall be thus undertaken, though I serve the Church most fully upon my own estate; yet, my purse shall be opened as wide towards it, as any man's. I will readily subscribe an hundred pounds, at the first offer; neither shall I stop here, if the work goes on; and if others will give proportionably, I doubt not but a great deal might be done therein.'

In his account of the East-India settlements (21), he computes 500000 persons, consisting of Jews, Mahometans, Portuguese Christians, or Gentiles (22), which last, make the main bulk: only in the island of Bombay, there are also some few Perfes, who being of the remains of the old sect of the Magians, worship the fire. The Mahometans have in these places their Mosques, the Jews their Synagogues; the Gentiles their Pagodes, or Temples; and the Portuguese their Mass-houses. But there is not so much as a Chapel in any of them for Protestants, except at Fort St George. The Gentiles are an ingenious civilized people, who know letters, and are well skilled in many arts; and, for the most part, good morals, which their religion, the most refined piece of Heathenism ever yet in the world, most strongly obligeth them to; and, therefore, are thus far better prepared to hearken to what reasons may be offered to them for Christianity, and the easier disposed to embrace it. The Dutch East-India Company, maintain thirty or forty ministers for the conversion of these Infidels, and had lately erected a College or University in the Island of Ceylon, in which one place only, though not the tenth part of their dominions in the Indies, they have above 80000 converted Indians, for whose use they print Bibles, Catechisms, and many other books in the Malayan, and other Indian languages, which they annually distribute among them. That all their factories and ships in this trade, are provided with able Ministers, well encouraged. Whereas the English East-India Company are so negligent herein, that though they have in the Island of St Helena, a fort and town, in which are several hundreds of inhabitants, all English, they allow them no Minister, and consequently, they are degenerated to that degree of barbarity, as to be reckoned the vilest and most wicked of any, our shipping meet with in their whole voyage to the Indies. The English Company, do indeed maintain Chaplains for their Factories at Surat, Angola, Bombay, Fort St George, and Fort St David; but allow them so ill, and treat them so badly, that they are able to do them but little service. And as to their ships, they have no stated Chaplains at all.

Upon this state of the case, our author proposes, 1. That at Madras, Bombay, and Fort St David, be erected a school and a church, to be supplied by men of piety and prudence. And a Seminary erected in England to breed up persons to supply the mission for the future, who shall be particularly instructed in the Popish Controversy (23), and in the Indian, Malabar (24), and Sanfaret (25) languages. 2. That these persons be chosen out of the boys in the Hospitals in London, or poor boys elsewhere, 'till the proposal hath made some progress; after which, to be brought from India, and chosen from the children of such of the Malabar Christians, as are not infected with Popery. That, as soon as the thing will bear it, a Bishop be settled at Madras, or some other place of the English settlements, and the Seminary removed thither, and put under the government of the Bishop. That an extract be procured out of Holland, of all the orders, directions, and regulations, made in this matter, by the Dutch East-India Company, and that a copy be also procured of the laws and injunctions imposed by the States, on their East-India Company; whence, a like law may be passed in the English parliament, obliging our Company to do the same thing, and that some wise and good men be made choice of in London, directing and carrying on the whole design.

Our author next considers, the two difficulties in this undertaking; which are, first, that in all the places above-mentioned, the Romish Priests having free access, will do their utmost to obstruct the attempt; in which they will be greatly assisted by the garrison soldiers of the Company, which being mostly Portuguese, Spaniards, or Irish, are the greatest bigots to Popery, and are hired by the English for the sake of cheapness. The second difficulty is, that the English Gentiles are much more exact in their morals, than either the Portuguese, or English Christians, that live among them; and, on that account, have a very bad opinion of Christianity. To remove these obstructions, it is here proposed.

1. That the English East-India Company thus far follow the example of the Dutch, as to put none into their garrisons, but such as are of our own nation and religion. But as to the other part of the Dutch practice, to exclude all Papists from settling, and all Romish Priests from coming among them, although it may be heartily wished, yet it could not be proposed, because the English Company received Fort St George, and Bombay, from the Portuguese, under articles by which they are to protect those of their nation, who live in those places, in the free exercise of their religion (26). As to the second difficulty, the only way is to reform our Factories; to which end it is proposed, that chapels be built in all their Forts, Factories, and Garrisons; which, as well as the ships, be supplied with Chaplains of worth, ability, and piety; who, instead of 50*l.* per annum, certain, and 50*l.* ad libitum, which they have at present, may be allowed 100*l.* per annum, certain; and that they have places assigned them at the common table of the Factory, before the priests or ministers of any other communion. For at Madras, or Fort St George, the English East-India Company, maintain a Popish Priest, for their Popish subjects and servants, and a Dutch Minister, for their Dutch subjects and servants, both of whom take place at the said common table, before the English Minister; which is a great disparagement upon the English Church, of which he is a minister, as well as upon him; and by making him look little in the eyes of the Factory, renders his ministry of the less effect among them; and therefore it ought to be remedied by placing the English Minister first; the Dutch Minister next; and the Popish Priest after both; whereas, at present, the Popish Priest sits first; the Dutch Minister next; and the English Minister at the distance of many places below both. Lastly, that as soon as Churches, the Seminary, and Bishop are settled, Ministers be bred up and ordained there on the spot, in order to prevent long vacancies, which will be the consequence of sending for them to England; where, also few will be found willing to engage in it, but such as are of desperate fortunes, or whose worth is not such, as to put them in hopes of getting any preferment at home; who, for the most part, do more hurt than good in the places where they are sent; as is sufficiently experienced, as well in the West-Indies, as in the East (27).

(23) This is necessary on account of the Popish Priests, who swarm in the Indies.

(24) These are the modern languages of Indostan, the first spoken through all the empire of the Mogul, and the latter in the peninsula of Malabar.

(25) The old language of the ancient Indians, still retained among the Bramins or Indian Priests, and is their learned language, in which all the books of their religion, philosophy, and other learning, are written.

(26) However, there is no such obligation in respect to Fort St David, which was sold to the company by Ram Rajah an Indian King.

(27) A letter to Archbishop Tenison, by Dr H. Prideaux, subjoined to his Life p. 151 to 153.

of his function in that parish, than out of any regard to the small profits arising therefrom; for though his Prebend and Archdeaconry, which were all the preferments he had at this time, fell very much short of a sufficiency to support him, yet as he had private fortunes of his own, he needed not so small an accession for his maintenance (ll). In Easter Term 1697 he published his Life of Mahomet, which was so well received that three editions were sold the first year*. However, this life was only a part of a greater work, which he had long designed to write; and that was, A History of the Saracen Empire, and of the Mahometan religion with it (mm). He had actually begun this history and had gone some way in it before he went to Saham; but not being able to go on with it there for want of his books as beforementioned, the work stood still for some time. However, on his return to Norwich, he resumed it again, with an intention of perfecting it. But while he was thus engaged, some reasons occurred to him, that it might be unreasonable for the state of those times [W], he therefore dropt it, and resolved only to publish that part which contained the life of Mahomet, to which he annexed A Letter to the Deists, wherein he undertook to prove the truth of Christianity by contrasting it with the impostures of Mahometism. The meeting of the Convocation having been interrupted for some time, several of the clergy were much displeas'd, and some began this year, 1697, to maintain in print a right to meet in those assemblies without any summons from the Crown. This gave rise to a dispute upon that subject, which was carried on with great heat on both sides, and still subsisted when the Convocation met in December 1701; in which a new debate arose concerning the privileges of the Lower House, where a majority of the members claimed to be on the same footing as to the Upper House, as the Commons in Parliament are in regard to the House of Lords; that is, to adjourn, by their own authority, apart from the Upper House, when, and to such time as they should think fit. This, the Upper House, that is, the Bishops, would not admit of, but insisted, that the ancient usage, which had been all along continued, was, that the President adjourned both Houses together, and to the same time; and that this was signified by a schedule sent down to the Lower House; and that this practice they would abide by and allow of no other. Dr Prideaux, who attended this assembly in virtue of his Archdeaconry, concurred with the Bishops so far, as thinking them in the right. But when they required that the Lower House should break up as soon as the schedule came down, and appoint no committees to sit and act on the intermediate days, he was clearly of opinion, that in both these particulars they were wholly in the wrong (nn). Two months were taken up in arguing and debating these points, which were contested with the same heat as the former, as well without doors (where a swarm of pamphlets issued from the press) (oo) as within the House. At length the Lower House appointed a committee to consider of some method for accommodating this dispute, that so they might be able to proceed in the other business for which they were called. Dr Prideaux was one of this committee, who fat some time, but before any report could be made the Prolocutor fell ill and died; upon which there arose a new debate about appointing his successor; but this did not last long, for within a few days after, on the 8th of March 1701, King William died which put an end to the Convocation. On the 10th of May following, 1702, died Dr Henry Fairfax, Dean of Norwich; and our Prebendary being appointed to succeed him, was installed into that Deanery the 8th of June the same year. As soon as he was settled therein, he set himself to work in reforming such disorders and abuses as were crept into the cathedral, to this end he purged it of several obnoxious and scandalous persons, who were the occasion of those disorders, and filled up the vacancies with the best men he could get. By this means, and by admonishing the rest, he at length brought the whole choir into perfect good order, and so it continued while he sat at the head of it (pp). The third of December 1702, being appointed a public thanksgiving-day on account of our success in the expedition against Vigo in Spain, Dean Prideaux preached the sermon at his cathedral, and by the desire of the Mayor and Alderman had it printed (qq). This was the only sermon he ever published, and it was done against his inclination (rr). In Easter Term following, 1703, he published, The Justice of the present established Law, which gives the Successor, in any Ecclesiastical benefice, all the profits from the day of the Avoidance. As the law now stands, if a beneficed clergyman dies a little before harvest, all the profits go to his successor, by which means the family of his predecessor are often left in distress. This consideration induced some of the Bishops to think of bringing a bill into Parliament to remedy it, which was undertaken by Dr Burnet, who, according to his nature, was particularly zealous in this matter; which gave occasion to our author's tract (ss); wherein, as his sentiments happened to concur with those of the Archbishop of Canterbury's,

(ll) He served it himself till he was disabled by the stone from going into the pulpit, and then resigned it, in the resolution not to keep any cure which he could not serve himself. Ibid. p. 98.

* Some mistakes in this Life are remarked in Simon Ockley's Hist. of the Saracens, and in John Gagnier's Ismael Abulfeda.

(mm) This would have contained the History of the ruin of the Eastern Church, which being brought about through the divisions therein, would, he thought, furnish an useful lesson for the intemperate zeal that inflamed the differences between the Church of England and the Dissenters, at the time of his entering on this work. Preface to the Life of Mahomet.

(nn) Ibid. p. 103.

(oo) See a large account of them in the article of Dr Atterbury, remark [I].

(pp) Life, p. 104, 105.

(qq) It was reprinted at the end of his Ecclesiastical Tracts, Lond. 1716.

(rr) The reason was, because, according to the general turn of such, it contained little more than an harangue on the occasion of the day. p. 106.

(ss) This piece was also reprinted with his Ecclesiastical Tracts.

(28) It was occasioned by Dr Sherlock's book on that Subject. See his article.

[W] Unreasonable for the state of those times.] Viz. On account of the controversy about the Trinity (28). Our author's design in the history above mentioned, would necessarily have led him to unfold all the subtle niceties that were held, by each sect of the Eastern Church, concerning the Hypothetical Union, which being not unlike those that are incident to the Trinity, would, he feared, give fresh matter of triumph to the Deists, and Socinians, who were already rejoicing to see the Divines engaged in such kind of subtle questions; and began to publish their impieties without fear or shame (29): therefore, to contribute his mite toward putting a stop to these, he chose rather to send forth his life of Mahomet, with a letter, to the Deists. It is not improbable that the King's injunctions, ordering the Bishops to watch against, and hinder the use of new terms, or new explanations in the Trinity, and other fundamental mysteries of faith (30), might have great weight in our author's resolution, to lay aside his design.

(29) Mr Firmin, an eminent Socinian in those times, had the greatest hand in printing and spreading these books. See his life.

(30) See Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, Vol. II. p. 213. fol. edit.

Canterbury's, his Grace recommended it to the rest of the Bishops, who, on perusing it, were so far convinced, that all in general consented to drop it, and there have never since been any thoughts of reviving it. In 1705 the Dean had a very signal deliverance from great danger; Dr Hayley, late Dean of Chichester, being then in the neighbourhood of Norwich, Dean Prideaux went to make him a visit, and while he was there, the servants of the house, without the knowledge or privity of their master, made his coachman so drunk, that on his return he fell off the coach-box; and the horses taking fright run away near three miles full speed, 'till at length they were accidentally stopped by a poor labouring man returning from his work, and happily the Dean received no harm (11). This was a deliverance which he was ever after thankful to God for while he lived [X]. The maintenance of the parochial clergy of Norwich depending mostly upon voluntary contributions gathered from door to door in every parish; an attempt was made in 1706, to bring it to a certainty by an Act of Parliament; in order to which, a petition from the city being necessary, such a petition was solicited. While this was in agitation, for the furthering of the design, Dr Prideaux published An Award made by King Charles I. (uu), and passed under the Broad Seal, for settling a pound rate of two shillings upon the buildings within the city; to which he annexed, A Discourse in Vindication of the Legality, Justice, and Reasonableness of that Award; and in this he treated particularly of the nature of personal tythes, and the manner of paying them in the city of London: But this treatise had not the desired effect (ww). In 1707 the see of Norwich becoming vacant, by the translation of Dr Moore to Ely, the Dean received many letters from his friends, advising him, and encouraging him, to make interest for the Bishoprick; but to this he could by no means be persuaded, nor did he think it consistent with his interest to accept it, in case of an offer; he was then near sixty, and as the revenues of his Deanery and Archdeaconry would better support him in his present situation than those of the Bishoprick would in that character, he thought it better to continue as he was; especially as the coming into that Bishoprick, in first-fruits, fees, providing a suitable equipage, furnishing his house, and other incidental expences, could not cost him less than 2000l. (xx) [Y]; which he must save all out of the Bishoprick, or his family suffer by his promotion. In 1709 he published his tract of The original right of Tythes, which was at first intended only as a preface to a larger work; namely, The History of Appropriations; wherein he designed to shew by what means they began; how they were alienated into lay-hands at the Reformation; the right the Church still has to them, for serving the cure, repairing the chancel, and bearing all other ecclesiastical burthens; the right which the law hath now given appropriators in them; and what are usurpations made thereupon. But finding this to swell under his hands to a bulk beyond what he expected, he determined to publish the former separately [Z]. While he was engaged in this undertaking, the calamitous

(11) Life of our author, p. 107, 108.

(uu) The title is, An Award of King Charles I. &c. shewing, that personal tythes are still due by the Law of the Land; and that there is a necessity of restoring or settling something else in lieu of them, for the maintenance of the Clergy in the cities and larger towns of this kingdom.

(ww) Yet as he was in hopes it might some time or other be of use for that purpose, he had it reprinted among his Ecclesiastical Tracts, ubi supr.

(xx) It has been proposed, that, as livings not exceeding 50 l. per annum are discharged of first-fruits and tenths, so bishopricks, not exceeding 1000 l. per ann. may be excused those charges; and that, instead of the mock elections by congé d'elire, and the expences of instruments and officers fees, Bishops may be made in England by letters patent, as they are in Ireland.

[X] For this deliverance, he was ever after thankful to God.] There were two circumstances, which seemed providentially to concur in saving him: the first, was, that on his return, instead of driving the direct road through which he went, he ordered his coachman to turn to the right, into another road, which led to a further part of the city, where some business called him. Now, this road being smooth and plain, there was less danger from an accident of this sort: whereas, on the other road, which was the nearest way to his own home, there was a steep precipice, over which the horses would in all probability have fallen, beat the coach in pieces, and destroyed him. The second was, that a little while before this happened, being in company with some of his friends, the case of Bishop Grove, who lost his life by an accident of the like kind, was talked of, and it was then made apparent to him, that the safest way, in such a case, would be to sit still, and wait the event of an overthrow, or the stopping of the horses by some other means. And had he not been thus fore-warned, he had certainly endeavoured to have leap'd out of the coach; which, in all probability, mult have been fatal to him; for while the horses were running full speed, it was hardly possible for him to have been so quick in getting out, but the hinder wheel would have caught him; which was the ruin of Bishop Grove; who, while the horses were running away, endeavoured to leap out, but the hinder wheel overtook him, ran over him, and broke his leg, of which he died (31)

[Y] His coming into it, could not cost him less than 2000l.] There have been frequent instances of Bishops, who dying too soon after their promotion, have left their families in such poverty, as to want charity for their necessary subsistence. This was the case of Bishop W——k, Bishop G——ve, and would have been the case of Archbishop T——n, had not his widow been assisted after his death, by a pension, from the Crown, and what she got of the Bookfellers for his posthumous sermons. Dr Prideaux indeed was in no danger of leaving his family in such distress, as he had a temporal estate sufficient to provide for them, whenever he should happen to die; but, then, as he had got nothing by the Church, he had no reason to hazard his private fortunes (which were his own and his wife's inheritance) in the service of it (32).

[Z] He resolved to publish the original right of tythes separately.] Mr Selden in his history of Tythes, having started a notion that the Clergy's right to Tythes in England, was first created after the Conquest, by the arbitrary donations of Patrons of Churches. Our author undertakes here to refute that opinion, by shewing, that though there is no divine law for the payment of the specific portion of a tenth; yet the Christian Clergy have a divine right to a sufficient maintenance by the Gospel: And since it is above the reach of man's understanding to determine the quantum; therefore, a tenth being allotted as the fittest portion for that end by the divine command, both in the Patriarchal and Levitical dispensations, that command becomes thereby a divine directing precedent which infers an obligation to follow it, where the case is exactly the same, that is, where there is no alteration in any of the reasons of the law, upon which that precedent is grounded; but there is no reason for the payment of a tenth, either to the Patriarchal or Levitical Priesthood, which do not hold good, with much greater strength, in respect to the Christian Clergy. He then proceeds to shew particularly, that this practice was introduced into England, by the Canons of the Church, about the middle of the eighth Century, and in the year 835, received a civil establishment, by a grant of King Ethelwolf, (the first Monarch of the whole kingdom) in a parliament then held at Westminster. That this grant was confirmed by all his successors, down to the Conquest, and the practice punctually observed, where it was not prevented by the wars with the Danes. That after the Conquest, the establishment of Tythes being incorporated into the body of Edward the Confessor's laws,

(32) Ibid. p. 112, 113.

(31) Life of Dr Prideaux, p. 108, 109.

calamitous distemper of the stone first seized him, which put a stop to all further proceedings;—for, in order to compleat the work, it was necessary for him to consult the Cotton Library, the Tower of London, and other places, where ancient records are kept, which could not be done without a journey to those places, and being utterly disabled from bearing any such journey by his distemper, he was obliged to lay aside the whole design; and the same distemper disabling him from the pulpit-duty, in 1710 he resigned his vicarage of Trowse, which was given by the Chapter to one of their Minor-Canons (yy). When this distemper first came upon him, in the spring of the former year, he apprehended it was the stone in the kidney; from whence, with much pain, it passed into the bladder; and when there, as he imagined, adhered to the side of it; for upon his taking a short journey in the country, it was broke off by the shaking of the coach, which occasioned his voiding a great quantity of blood, and from that time he lived in constant pain, 'till he was cut for it two years after. His reasons for delaying that operation so long were, that, considering his age, he apprehended it would be certain death to him; and therefore to put himself into the Surgeon's hands would be little better than self-murder; and rather than be so guilty, he was determined to submit, and patiently endure his calamity however grievous and tormenting. At last the disorder grew upon him so much, that there was little probability of his living a month longer without some relief, and cutting being the only means left, which gave any prospect of it, he was convinced, that in this case he might venture to hazard it. In that resolution he sent for Mr Salter, a famous Lithotomist then in London, to perform the operation; which he did with great dexterity, drawing out the stone, nearly of the shape and size of a sheep's kidney, in less than three minutes. After the operation Mr Salter staid with him about a week, and in that time the wound healed so fast, and every thing looked so well as to promise a certain cure in a month or six weeks. Whereupon Mr Salter returned to London, leaving his patient in the hands of a young Surgeon who had been bred up under himself, then at Norwich, to finish the cure, assuring the Dean he would be as safe in his hands as in his own. But every thing fell out just contrary; for after he had been under the care of this Surgeon a whole year, he seemed to be much further from a cure than when he had first undertaken him; and during all that time the Dean had suffered as much pain and torment from him as he had before from the stone itself. While he lay in this condition, Lord Somers hearing of his case, was pleased to express himself, that he thought Dr Prideaux, a person of greater value than to be so lost; and sent to reprimand Mr Salter for having taking so little care of him. This produced a letter from that Surgeon to the Dean, earnestly advising and intreating him to come to London; accordingly the Dean resolved upon the journey, and by the contrivance of taking out all the seats of a large stage-coach, in which he laid at his full length upon his quilt and other bed-cloaths, was carried to London with as much ease and safety as if he had been in a litter. Mr Salter on examining the case found the urinary passage ripped up and destroyed, and every thing so miserably mangled and wounded, that he expressed no little wonder to find him alive, after usage which he thought would have killed any body else. Nothing now remained but to cure these wounds, which he did in about two months, when the Dean returned to Norwich; but was obliged ever after to void his urine through an orifice left in the place where the stone had been extracted, which was a great inconvenience to him (zz). On his arrival at Norwich he again applied himself to his studies, which had been greatly interrupted by his unhappy distemper. The first thing he undertook, was to review his Directions to Churchwardens upon the Bookfeller's signifying to him, that he intended to publish a third edition of that tract; and having made large additions to it, a third addition was printed in Michaelmas Term 1712 (aaa). Having finished this work he went on with his Connection of the History of the Old and New Testament, which he had begun immediately upon dropping the designed History of Appropriations; but was obliged to lay it quite a side by his disorder; and having now obtained some better health he pursued his intention [AA], and finished the first part laws, was constantly ratified by the Normans, and consequently continued in force, notwithstanding the abuse that from Anno 1000, to Anno 1200, was made in the distribution of them by Patrons; who, during that interval, having the sole power of collating the clerk without the Bishop's institution, as well as the advowson of the church, often arbitrarily disposed of them to religious and ecclesiastical corporations, which were all then by law, as capable of holding churches and tythes, as the parish priests were. Whence arose lay collations, appropriations, infedations, exemptions from tythes, portions, pensions, donatives, and such like, by which no original consecration of tythes was made, nor was a new right to them first created: On the contrary, they were arbitrary alienations of the rights of the Parochial Clergy, as is evident from hence, that all rectors of churches were allowed the plea of common right against religious houses, for any portion of tythes possessed by them in their pa-rishtes, 'till they produced a special grant for them, or proved a prescription that supposed it (33).

(yy) Life, p. 116, 117.

(zz) Ibid. p. 117 to 121.

(aaa) This is the best edition of that piece, and the subsequent ones are only copies from it.

[AA] He pursued his intention.] While he was thus engaged, Charles, Lord Viscount Townsend, one of the Principal Secretaries of State to King George the First, meditating a design to introduce a kind of Reformation in the English universities, consulted our Dean; who thereupon drew up the plan for that purpose, and sent it to his Lordship, under the title of, Articles for the Reformation of the two Universities. I. That in every college public prayers be at six in the morning and nine at night, except Sundays and holy days, at which all the members to be present. II. That the great bell at Christ church in Oxford, and the biggest bell in St Mary's church at Cambridge, toll for half an hour, 'till nine at night. III. That all college gates be locked up before prayers be ended, and then the keys delivered to the Master, and remain there 'till prayers be ended the next morning. IV. That

(33) As the Alienation office happened to be burnt in King Charles II's time, it was adjudged, since my memory, that a custom of non-payment of tythes, or of a modus in lieu of them, proved from that time, was a sufficient prescription.

in 1715, which was published in Michaelmas Term following. However, that did not hinder him from keeping a wakeful eye for the public good. In which spirit, upon the accession

IV. That whoever is locked out shall be let in if he knocks at the gate, on condition he gives an account of himself to the governor the next morning. V. That whoever lies out all night in the town, without just cause, after the third fault shall be expelled; that all absenters from the evening and next morning prayers shall be supposed to be out unless they prove the contrary. VI. That the common or combination rooms be shut at ten at night, and the keys lodged with the governor 'till next morning. VII. That coming in, or going out, of the college, at night, clandestinely, be immediate expulsion. VIII. That Stourbridge fair be abolished, or else removed to some other place. IX. That all fast nights be abolished. X. That the sitting and drinking in any tavern or alehouse after the third offence be expulsion; and the master of such tavern or alehouse be for the three successive offences fined, 5 l. 10 s. and 20 l. and for the third, disabled to keep a tavern or alehouse. XI. That women coming to settle at either university, shall produce testimonials of their good behaviour within three days after their arrival, and then take out a licence for continuing there. No housekeeper shall harbour any woman otherwise, under the penalty of 5 l. toties quoties. That all whores, upon conviction, be carted out of town, and, upon returning, unless past the age of fifty, be stripped down to the middle and whipt out of town. XII. That if any scholar under age be clandestinely married, both the woman so married, and the minister marrying, and all other wilful and knowing accessories be deemed guilty of felony without benefit of clergy. XIII. That no person shall hold a fellowship after he is full twenty years standing from his matriculation, but be superannuated, except a public professor, or lecturer, or upper or under library-keeper, or keeper of the archives, or register of the convocation, or judge of the Vice-chancellor's court, or a minister of a church in Oxford or Cambridge, or suburbs, and constantly serve the same in his own person. XIV. That such superannuated Fellows, as shall not have qualified themselves for any public service, be placed in an hospital built for the purpose, and called Drone-hall, and be allowed 20 l. per annum each, by the college where they have been Fellows. XV. That every Fellow of a college after ten years standing, be allowed to be absent for serving any Bishop or Nobleman as a chaplain, or any other suitable employment approved by the college; and that all statutes contrary thereto be annulled. XVI. That the acceptance of any ecclesiastical benefice above 80 l. per annum, secundum verum valorem, shall void a Fellowship. As shall also, XVII. The being chosen beadle of the university. XVIII. That there be no pre elections before the voidance of a Fellowship. XIX. That all Fellowships in every college be brought to the same rule, privilege, and denomination, and governed by the same statutes, and all of the same degree have equal dividends; and that no order shall exceed that immediately below it, above a fifth part, i. e. if the undergraduate fellowships be worth 25 l. then that of B. A. be 30 l. A. M. L. L. B. and M. B. 35 l. B. D. L. L. D. and M. D. 40 l. and D. D. 45 l. in like proportion to the revenues of the college. XX. That the number of Fellows in each college be stated in proportion to their revenues, so that none be allowed above 60 l. per annum; and the vacancy be filled every year. XXI. That upon conviction of bribery in any election to a fellowship, both the giver and receiver be expelled; which shall be extended, also, to the case of asking or offering any bribe though nothing be paid or taken. XXII. That all claims of founders kinsmen be annulled. XXIII. That no treats be allowed but in the college-hall, to be regulated by the orders of the college. XXIV. That no bonds for performing exercise be taken, nor none admitted to any degree without performing all the statutable exercises. XXV. That every member shall be obliged to keep those exercises as soon as he is of sufficient standing, whether he take the degree or no, on pain of having his name struck out of the buttery-books, and no longer enjoying any fellowship, &c. therein. XXVI. That no beneficed minister shall be allowed to be absent from his cure after twelve years standing. XXVII. That all college statutes be revised and reformed by authority. XXVIII. That the Eucharist, with a sermon by one of the members, be celebrated once a month at least, when all members shall communicate. XXIX. That there be a weekly meeting of the Vice chancellor, heads of colleges, and Professors, to consult upon the affairs of the university, and nothing be proposed in convocation 'till first approved at the said meeting. XXX. That in the beginning of every new parliament six members be named of each house, and six others by the King; who, with the two Archbishops, and Lord Chancellor, be appointed Curators of the Universities commissioned under the Great Seal, with visitatorial power, of whom any seven be a quorum, to meet at the summons of the Archbishop of Canterbury. XXXI. That these Commissioners shall compleat the statutes which are defective of any college. XXXII. That a visitation of enquiry may be made by any three, but no injunctions made thereon, but by a quorum. XXXIII. That in each university there be a select Senate, consisting of the Doctors in each faculty, and Bachelors of Divinity, which shall hear and determine all differences in any college; and, in case of an appeal to the Visitor, the appellant, if cast, shall pay all expences, besides twenty pounds to the aggrieved, to be ensured by a bond given to the Visitor, who is otherwise not to accept the appeal. XXXIV. That all the Livings belonging to the Universities, be disposed of by the said select Senate. XXXV. That no head of a college be absent above two months at one time, or three at different times in the year, on pain of voiding his place. XXXVI. That every headship be made up out of the college revenues, to the value of three of the best fellowships. XXXVII. That none be promoted to a Bishoprick or Deanery, or any living worth 300 l. per Annum, unless he hath taken the degree of D. D. regularly in the University; nor to an Archdeaconry, or any Residuary, in any cathedral or collegiate church, or any Living worth 200 l. per ann. unless he hath taken the degree of B. D. or L. L. D. regularly; or to any prebend, which is no residuary or living worth 100 l. per annum, except he hath taken the degree of A. M. or L. L. B. regularly. And no person be capable of being Judge of the Admiralty, Dean of the Arches, Judge of the Prerogative Court, or Vicar-General to either Archbishop, or Master of the Faculties, or Chancellor to any Bishop, who has not taken the degree of L. L. D. nor of being Commissary or Register to any Bishop, or Archdeacon, without the degree of A. M. or L. L. B. And that none be admitted to this last degree, before he is three years standing, from the time of his being admitted A. B. XXXVIII. That in all exercises of Divinity in the public schools, no text be quoted out of the Old Testament, in any other language than the Hebrew; nor than the Greek, out of the New Testament. XXXIX. That all Tutors be appointed by the Master and Seniors of each college, and approved and licensed by the Vice-Chancellor, on the following terms. XL. That they constantly read by themselves, or a licensed deputy, to their pupils, 'till the degree of A. B. without making any vacation, except for three weeks at Christmas, one at Easter, one at Whitfuntide, and one at the Act or Commencement. XLI. That the said Tutors form the morals and principles of their pupils upon the laws and doctrines of the Church of England; and, on all Sundays and Holy-Days, expound the articles of that Church, or other tracts of divine institution. XLII. That every tutor be sworn to the faithful observance of this last article, and such others, as shall be added to it, before the Vice-Chancellor; and besides, take all the oaths, make all the declarations and subscriptions, as are required of persons licensed to keep a Grammar-School; when, and not before, The Vice-Chancellor, to give him a certificate to be registered in the University, and his own college. XLIII. That Tutors, convicted of neglecting their duty, for the second offence be removed, and their licence annulled. XLIV. That, if any Tutor make his conduct in any particular of ill example to his pupils, he be removed forthwith. XLV. That every Tutor shall have proctorial authority. XLVI. That any person trusting an undergraduate, without his Tutor's consent, shall lose all right of recovering by law what he so trusts. XLVII. That every Master of a college, with such of the Seniors as he shall think fit, accession of King George the First to the Throne, a new Parliament being called in the ensuing spring, our Dean waited upon a certain gentleman of great note and influence in the House of Commons, who came to Norwich on account of the election, and took that opportunity of putting into his hands a proposal, that all estates real and personal held in trust for the use and benefit of Popish seminaries, monasteries, or mass priests, or of any depending on them, be seized and sold towards paying the public debts of the nation; observing, that these trusts, if fully discovered, (for which he likewise proposed a method) would amount to above the value of a million of money. The proposal had so good an effect, that, in the ensuing Parliament, it was enacted, that all such estates be forfeited to the public; and accordingly, several of them were seized as forfeited, and applied to the public use by commissioners appointed for that purpose (bbb). The second part of his Connection, &c. came out in two years after. Both parts were received by the public with the greatest approbation, and went through eight editions at London besides two or three at Dublin (ccc) before the end of the year 1720. This history takes in the affairs of Egypt, Assyria, and all the other Eastern nations as well as of the Jews, and likewise those of Greece and Rome, as far as was necessary for giving a distinct view of the completion of those prophecies which relate to the times comprehended in it (ddd). The author has also set in the clearest light some passages of prophane history, which before lay dispersed and buried in confusion. And there appears throughout the whole work such an amiable spirit of sincerity and candour, as sufficiently atones as well for the few mistakes which have escaped his diligence [BB], as for some weaknesses that were incident to his nature [CC]. Several of these were taken notice of presently after the publication of shall examine the undergraduates in it once a quarter, and punish the want of proficiency, according as it shall be found to be the fault of Tutor or Pupil. XLVIII. If it be the fault of the pupil, through idleness or incapacity, he be dismissed, after three times of examination, from the College and University. XLIX. That none be admitted Bachelors of Arts, 'till they be found able, upon examination, to give a good account of Christianity, as taught and professed in the Church of England. L. In order to which, a system of Divinity shall be made by the Professor, or such others as the University shall appoint, wherein all undergraduates shall be instructed by their Tutors, and examined before they commence A. B. LI. That the examiners be four Bachelors of Divinity, resident in the University, annually chosen by the Vice-Chancellor and heads of colleges. LII. That such examinations be held in the University-Schools, at the appointment of the Vice-Chancellor. LIII. That the examiners, by two at a time, in rotation, examine six undergraduates at a time, at least, for two hours, or longer if they think fit; and that the said examinations be in such order, method, and times, as the Vice-Chancellor and Heads shall appoint, by a stated rule, and that a certificate of approbation from the examiners, be necessary for taking the said degree. LIV. That the four lectures of Grammar, Rhetoric, Logic, and Metaphysics, in Oxford, be abolished, and the salaries settled upon the aforesaid examiners: and the like method to be taken in Cambridge. LV. That no person be admitted to orders under the degree of A. B. at least, except such as have studied the like time in foreign Universities. LVI. That no plays be acted in the University, by the common actors of plays or interludes. LVII. That none be suffered to put on the Civilian's Gown, 'till he has taken the degree of A. B. LVIII. That as to physic, the University of Cambridge to follow the rule and usage of Oxford, both for times and exercises (34).

(bb) Life, p. 238 to 241. where the proposal may be seen at large.

(cc) It has also been translated into French and Italian.

(ddd) In 1710, Bishop Lloyd communicated his scheme of Daniel's seventy weeks to our author; who making some objections to it, received an answer from his Lordship, to which he returned a reply, confirming the Bishop's opinion in beginning those weeks at the 20th year of Artaxerxes Longimanus. See the answer and reply in the Dean's Life, p. 237, & seqq.

No doubt can be made of the Dean's good intention in these articles; but whoever knows any thing of the state and temper of the Universities, need not be told that the scheme is absolutely impracticable: as an argument that proves too much, proves nothing; so a scheme that aims at too much, loseth every thing *.

[BB] Some errors which have escaped him.] The Dean begins his history thus. The ancient empire of the Assyrians, which had governed Asia for above thirteen hundred years, being dissolved on the death of Sardanapalus, &c. This is apparently taken from Ctesias, and was then the commonly received opinion. But it is opposed by Sir Isaac Newton, who observes, that 'Ctesias made the Assyrian empire as old as Noah's flood, within sixty or seventy years, and to continue from Belus, and Ninus his feigned son, 1360 years. Nimrod indeed founded a kingdom at Babylon, and perhaps extended it to the Assyrians, but this kingdom was of small extent, if compared with those that arose up afterwards, being only within the fruitful plains of Chaldaea, Chalonicis, and Assyria, watered by the Ti-gris and Euphrates; and if it had been greater, it was but of short continuance, it being the custom in those early ages, for every father to divide his territories among his sons: so Noah did.—After Nimrod, we hear no more of an Assyrian empire, 'till the days of Pul.—It appears from Nehemiah, c. ix. v. 32. that this empire arose, when the Kings of Assyria began to afflict the inhabitants of Palestine, which was in the days of Pul. He afflicted Israel, conquered the Medes, &c. Ctesias knew nothing of this conquest, nor so much as the names of the conquerors, or that there was an Assyrian empire then standing; and supposes the Assyrian empire was at an end two hundred and fifty years before it began (14). However it must be observed, in justice to the Dean, that this is a point; which, as it does not fall within the compass of his history, so it was none of his business to examine the foundation of it. The following mistake is of a different nature. In explaining the famous prophecy of Daniel's seventy weeks; he says, in executing the ministry of the Gospel, Christ made his appearance as the Messiah, first by his forerunner, John the Baptist, for the space of three years and a half, and after that by himself, in his own person, for three and a half more, and these two being put together, make up the last week of this prophecy, which began exactly at the ending of the aforesaid sixty-two weeks (15), and seven weeks. Now, it is fully proved by Sir Isaac Newton, that as the preaching of John first began in the summer of the fifteenth year of the reign of Tiberius, so the death of Christ fell on the Passover, which was in the twentieth year of the same reign (16); and consequently, the aforesaid ministry of the Gospel, must have been completed in the space of five years.

[CC] Some weaknesses incident to his nature.] The author of Cato's letters remarks, that 'some of the Dean's Theological Observations, seemed to him to be not only very ill grounded, but to have a tendency to create in readers wrong notions of the Deity; and to encourage them to mistake the common accidents of life, and the common events of nature, for judgments of God; and to apply them superstitiously as such (17). Instances of this kind, it must be owned, are too frequent through this work, to need our pointing any of them out. But, among these, his remark upon the destruction of Brennus's army before Delphi, having been censured as owing to this weakness: that censure has been chastized by the present Dean of Brillol*; who, notwithstanding, at the same time, seems to have charged his brother Dean, a little too hastily, with esteeming the accident miraculous. These are Dr Prideaux's words: Thus was God pleased, in a very extraordinary manner, to execute his vengeance upon those sacrilegious wretches, for the sake of religion in general, how false and idolatrous soever that particular religion was, for which that temple at Delphos was erected. Here we see the Doctor calls this event an extraordinary vengeance of God: but Dr Warburton

(14) Newton's Chronology, p. 266.

(15) Connection, P. I. B. v. p. 291. 8vo. edit.

(16) Newton on Daniel, &c. chap. ii.

(17) London Journal, No. 121. for Nov. 28, 1721.

* This was wrote in 1729.

(34) Life, p. 238 to 237.

* Such a sketch was drawn for Cambridge by Mr W. Whiston, under the title of Emendanda in Academia. Memoirs of the Life, &c. of Mr W. Whiston, p. 42, & seqq. second edition, 1753.

of each part, by Walter Moyle (eee). And the Dean's answer to that ingenious friend and kinsman sufficiently testify with what candour he treated such as differed from his opinions, and how ready he was to re-examine and correct any thing that was thought amiss [DD]. This history was the last work he finished for the public. He was now past his seventieth year, and found infirmities grew very fast upon him, which were hastened by what he had suffered in being cut for the stone, and the ill management of his case afterwards. About this time he was also seized with a paralytical shaking in his left hand, which six years after seized his right also, and at length weakened it to that degree that he could no longer hold a pen; and these weaknesses of body much impaired the vigour of his mind, which made him think it time to give over his studies, as one unfit for any further undertaking: and, therefore, though he had other works in design, and for some of them had materials in a great measure in readiness for the composition, yet he thought best to drop them all, as not expecting he should live long enough to finish whatever he should begin; and if he did finish any thing under these decays and infirmities, it would be liable to great errors; and he did not think it proper either to hazard his own character, or affront the public so far as to offer any thing of this kind. Wherefore, for the remaining part of his life, he was resolved to send nothing more to the press, but confined himself solely to the duties of the station to which he was called; and faithfully to discharge these and bear the burden of his infirmities was work enough for him during the latter part of his life. For some time after the publication of his Connection, &c. seldom a week passed without remarks upon it, which he received in letters from the learned in different parts of the kingdom; some raising difficulties, others desiring information in regard of some difficult passages in it. To all these he constantly returned answers, and gave the best satisfaction he could, 'till, by his age and other infirmities, he became incapable of bending his mind to any matter of difficulty. In the seventy-fourth year of age, finding himself no longer able to use his books as formerly, and being desirous that his collection of Oriental books should not be dispersed, but kept all together in some public library; he permitted his son, who had been educated at Clare-hall in Cambridge, to make a present of them to that society: and, accordingly, they were sent thither and placed in the college-library, to the number of three hundred volumes and upwards (fff). About a year before his death he was taken with an illness, which so far reduced him as to confine him wholly to his chamber; and at last his infirmities increased to such a degree, as rendered him incapable of helping himself in the common offices of life. All this was the effect of the ill conduct he fell under after he was cut for the stone. The long confinement and the loss of blood by that means weakened his limbs so much, that he was never free from paralytical shaking and rheumatic pains; so that he gave himself up to the thoughts of death, expecting it with that cheerfulness and resignation which naturally flow from reflecting on a life well spent. He expired on Sunday evening the 1st of November 1724, in the seventy-seventh year of his age, after an illness of about ten days, and was buried, according to his own direction, in the cathedral of Norwich, on the Wednesday following (ggg). The writer of his life has drawn a character of him, taken, as he says, from those who knew him best and conversed with him most intimately, which is as follows. 'He was tall of stature, well built, and naturally of a very strong and robust constitution, which enabled him to pursue his studies with great assiduity, and enjoyed great vigour both of body and mind, 'till he was seized with the stone. His parts were very good, rather solid than lively. His judgment excellent. As a writer he is clear, strong, and intelligent, without any pomp of language, or ostentation of eloquence. His conversation was a good deal of the same kind, learned and instructive, with a conciseness of expression on many occasions, which to those who were not well acquainted with him, had sometimes the appearance of rusticity. In his manner of life, he was very regular and temperate, being seldom out of his bed after ten at night, and generally up at his studies before five in the morning. His manners were sincere and candid. He generally spoke his mind with freedom and boldness, and was not easily diverted from pursuing what he thought right. In his friendships he was constant and invariable; to his family, was an affectionate husband, a tender and careful father, and greatly (eee) See his article; to which let it be added, that he was one of those persons who, unhappily for the learned world, had no opinion of his own writings, and therefore, not long before he died, destroyed most of his finished performances. Life of Dean Prideaux, p. 144.

(fff) Ibid. p. 147.

(ggg) P. 148.

(18) See Julian: or, A Discourse concerning the Earthquake and fiery Eruption which defeated that Emperor's attempt to rebuild the Temple of Jerusalem &c.

(19) In his letters to our author, in his Posthumous Works, Vol. II.

(20) His Letters on the Thundring Legion. Ibid.

has, himself, in the very book whence this quotation is taken, explained the difference betwixt such an extraordinary providence, and a miraculous interposition. Speaking of crosses that happened at the time of the fiery eruption at Jerusalem, when Julian attempted to rebuild the Jewish temple, he expressly maintains that the event was not miraculous, and yet that it was by the peculiar pleasure of God, given on that occasion (18). Why are then Dr Prideaux's words construed into a charge of confounding these two distinct dispensations, extraordinary and miraculous, in the conduct of God's moral government? Was not Mr Moyle sensible of the injury of such a construction; who, though he mentions several mistakes and weaknesses in the Connection (19); and has likewise, more than once elsewhere (20) ridiculed the notion of a miraculous interposition, in this very event at Delphi, yet he has no where imputed such an opinion to his cousin.

[DD] How ready to correct any thing that was thought amiss.] Besides the instance of this, mentioned in Mr Moyle's article; we have here another, with respect to the time of Zoroastres, whom he makes in his Connection contemporary with Darius Hystaspes (21), and rejects the opinion that there was more than one Zoroastres. But in regard to the difficulties which are urged by his cousin, against that assertion, who started a conjecture of two Zoroastres's; he yields to that solution. I am, says he, rather apt to think with Pliny, (Lib. xxx. c. 1.) that there were two Zoroastres's: the elder of which, was the founder of the Magian Sect; and the other the reformer; and that this latter was the Zerdusht of the Persians, and lived in the time where I have placed him (22),

(21) Dr Warburton follows Mr Moyle, in differing from our author as to the age of Zoroastres. See Divine Legation of Moses, Vol. II.

(22) Dr Prideaux's third letter to Mr Moyle, and that gentleman's fifth and sixth letter to the doctor, in Moyle's Posthumous Works, Vol. II.

greatly esteemed by his friends and relations, as he was very serviceable to them on all occasions. As a clergyman, he was strict and punctual in the performance of all the duties of his function himself, and carefully exacted the same from the inferior clergy and canons of his church. In party-matters, so far as he was concerned, he always shewed himself firmly attached to the interest of the Protestant cause, and principles of the Revolution; but without joining in the violence of parties, or promoting those factions and divisions which prevailed both in Church and State during the greater part of his life. His integrity and moderation, which should have recommended him to some of the highest stations in the Church, were manifestly the occasion of his being neglected; for busy party-zealots, and men more conversant in the arts of a court were easily preferred over him, whose highest and only ambition was carefully to perform what was incumbent on him in every station of life, and to acquit himself of his duty to his God, his friends, and his country. To this we shall add, from the same writer (hbb), that during all the time he was Dean, he never had the least difference with the Chapter or any of the members of it, which other Deans, his predecessors, were hardly ever free from. This was owing to the prudence and integrity of his conduct towards them: he always treated the Prebendaries with all the respect that was due to them, and was as careful of their rights as of his own; never taking upon him to determine any thing of the common right and interest of the church without the common consent and advice of the Chapter. In all his transactions with them, he never hid or concealed any thing from them, but constantly laid all their affairs openly and fairly before them, as having no views or ends of his own to serve: as this was a method of proceeding which that church had not always been used to, it so far gained him their confidence and esteem, that they trusted all their affairs in his hands, without any reserve, as having never found themselves deceived by his management [EE].

(hbb) P. 145;
146.

[EE] Never found themselves deceived by his management] ' His residing constantly at the cathedral, gave him an opportunity of looking after the fabric of the church, and seeing that it was kept in good repair; and this he took care of, as well before, as after he was Dean. For while he was Prebendary, he was generally Treasurer; and to repair the church, was one main part of his office. His method was, according to the direction of the local statutes, to order the church, every Lady-Day, to be carefully reviewed by able workmen; and if any decays were found, he took care to have them repaired by the Michaelmas following; unless they were so great, as to exceed what the revenues of the church could bear; and then, what could not be done in one year, was done in two. And had he not been thus careful, one year particularly, and put the spire, which is a beautiful edifice, in thorough good repair; it would, in all probability, have been blown down, by a great storm which happened very soon after; and must, in falling, have crushed and ruined a great part of the church (23).'

P (23) Life, p.
146, 147.

PRIOR [MATTHEW], an eminent Poet, particularly celebrated for the easy humour and elegant taste of his writings; was born July 21, 1664, in London, where his father, Mr George Prior, citizen and Joyner, lived in good repute (a). And at his death, leaving our author very young, committed him to the care of his brother, a Vintner at Charing-Cross, who discharged this trust with a paternal tenderness (b), and at a proper age sent him to Westminster-school under the care of Dr Busby. That excellent master no sooner furnished him with the means of displaying his genius, than he distinguished himself above his form-fellows. But before he had gone through the school, his uncle took him home with a design of breeding him to his own business, and he was accordingly initiated in that employ. However, he found time still to indulge the bent of his inclination to classical learning; in which Horace was the author that struck his fancy most. These qualities in a little time brought him to be taken notice of by some polite company that used his uncle's house, among whom was the Earl of Dorset; who being there one day with several other gentlemen of rank, the discourse happened to turn upon a passage in an ode of Horace, and the company being divided in their sentiments, one of the gentlemen said, I find we are not like to agree in our criticisms; but, if I am not mistaken, there is a young fellow in the house who is able to set us right; and naming Matt. Prior, he was immediately sent for; and being desired to give his opinion of Horace's meaning in the ode under debate, he did it with such an ingenuous modesty, and so much to the satisfaction of the company, that the Earl of Dorset, from that moment, determined to remove him from the business of a tavern, into a way of life for which he was so admirably qualified; and, accordingly, procured him to be sent to St John's college in Cambridge (c), where he very generously helped to support him in a handsome manner [A]. He was admitted in 1682; and proceeding Bachelor of Arts in

(a) Prior's History of his own Time, p. 2. 1740, 2d edition, 8vo.

(b) Our author always acknowledged this kindness with the highest gratitude. Memoirs of Mr Prior's Life, by Humphreys, prefixed to the third volume of his poems in 1733, p. 1. third edition.

(c) Ibid. p. 2, 3.

[A] Helped to support him in a handsome manner.] Hence we know how to contrive Bishop Burnet's words, upon this part of our author's life. ' Prior, says he (1), ' had been taken a boy out of a tavern, by the Earl of Dorset, who accidentally found him reading Horace; and he being very generous, gave him an education in literature.' Uncandid representation! but it deserves a much worse name than I care to give it, when we see it done with an express view to render him contemptible, as an insignificant tool of a party. It was Mr Prior's fortune to live and act in times when

Whig and Tory (as he observes himself) were continually tearing one another in pieces; and hence too, we see how that story first took its rise, which passed current, without any savings, for many years, that Prior was raised from the bar of a tavern. 'Tis to this violent party-rage, that we owe the loss of almost all Mr Prior's letters, written while he was in public employments. And amongst the few that have escaped, we find him frequently lamenting, in the most pathetic terms, the unhappy state of his country on that account. In one of these, dated April 10, 1700, he

(1) In the History of his own Time, Vol. II. p. 384.

in 1686, was shortly after chosen a Fellow of the college. During his residence there, he contracted an intimacy with Charles Montague (d), of Trinity college, in the same university; and Mr Dryden having published, this year, his poem called, The Hind and the Panther, our author joined with Mr Montague in writing that humorous piece, intitled; The Hind and the Panther transferr'd to the story of the country Mouse and the city Mouse, which was published in 1687 (e). The following year Mr Prior wrote his Ode upon the necessary existence of the Deity (f), which he performed for an exercise at the college. He was now become the admiration and delight of Cambridge; but, however, could not think of spending his life in that unactive retreat. Vanity is essential to a Poet. No wonder, therefore, that Mr Prior began apparently to think himself made for greater affairs than a college afforded. He had now some friends at Court, and was resolved to push his fortune. In this disposition he went to London in 1689, and immediately applied to his friend Fleetwood Sheppard, Esq; with an address that was drawn up in a manner peculiar to himself, and irresistibly engaging [B]. Accordingly, at the solicitation of that gentleman, he was introduced, by the Earl of Dorset, to the Court; and in 1690 their Majesties appointed him Secretary on the part of the English in the congress at the Hague (g); the Earls of Pembroke and Portland, together with Lord Dursley (afterwards Earl of Berkeley) being Ambassadors and Plenipotentiaries [C]. As this was an almost unexampled splendid assembly, in which too an affair of the last importance was under consideration (h); it gave Mr Prior an opportunity of exerting all his talents for business, and he acquitted himself therein so much to the satisfaction of

(g) It is thus expressed in his epitaph: Serenissimi Regi Gulielmi Regineque Marise in congressione Fœderatorum Hagæ 1690 celebrata— Secretarius.

(h) The grand alliance was formed in this congress, and concluded in May 1691. Hist. of his own Time, p. 54.

(d) Afterwards Earl of Halifax, See his article.
(e) Ibid. The general plan of this Travesty is taken from the Duke of Buckingham's Rehearsal.
(f) Mr Jacob says, a discerning eye might in this piece have seen the promises of a Solomon. Lives of the Poets, Vol. II. p. 154.

(2) The Earl of Manchester's son.
(3) See the History of his own Time, p. 169, 170. 2d edit. 1740, 8vo.

(4) Published in the third volume of his poems.

(5) The Earl of Dorset.

he thus addresses himself to the Earl of Manchester, then Ambassador at Paris.

My Lord,

Having written for my master, I have very little to add for myself; except that I am very glad my Lord Mandeville (2) is come to town, and hope he will stay long with us. I am glad he was born at Paris, for had he been born here, he would have liked living among us so little, that I question whether he would have thought it worth his while to have suck'd (3).—

[B] He applied to his friends with an address irresistibly engaging. For which reason alone, this piece could not be omitted here; but it has likewise another indispensable claim to a place in this work; both, as it confirms the former account of his education from his own mouth, and at the same time furnishes us with some other facts relating to him. It is an Epistle to Fleetwood Sheppard, Esq; in the following terms (4).

When crowding folks with strange ill faces,
Were making legs, and begging places,
And some with patents, some with merit,
Tir'd out my good Lord Dorset's spirit,
Sneaking, I stood amongst the crew,
Desiring much to speak with you.
I waited while the clock struck thrice,
And footman brought out fifty lies,
'Till patience vex'd, and legs grown weary,
I thought it was in vain to tarry;
But did opine it might be better,
By penny-post to send a letter.
Now if you miss of this epistle,
I'm baulk'd again, and may go whistle.

My business, Sir, you'll quickly guess,
Is to desire some little Place;
And fair pretensions I have for't,
Much need, and very small desert:
Whene'er I writ to you, I wanted,
I always begg'd, you always granted.
Now, as you took me up, when little,
Gave me my learning, and my vittle,
Ask'd for me, from my Lord (5), things fitting,
Kind as I'd been of your begetting;
Confirm what formerly you've given,
Nor leave me now at six and sevens,
As Sunderland has done Mun Stephens.

No family that takes a whelp,
When first he laps, and scarce can yelp,
Neglects, or turns him out of gate,
When he's grown up to dog's estate;
VOL. V. No. 287.

Nor parish, if they once adopt
The spurious brats of strollers dropt,
Leave 'em, when grown up lusty fellows,
To the wide world, that is, the gallows:
No, thank them for their love, that's worse,
Than if they'd throttled 'em at nurse.

My uncle, rest his soul, when living (6),
Might have contriv'd me ways of thriving;
Taught me with cyder to replenish
My vats, or ebbing tide of Rhenish:
So when for Hock I drew prickt White-wine,
Swear't had the flavour, and was right wine:
Or sent me with ten pounds to Furnival's-Inn,
To some good rogue-attorney,
Where now by forging deeds, and cheating,
I'd found some handsome ways of getting.

All this, you made me quit to follow
That sneaking whey-fac'd god Apollo;
Sent me among a fiddling crew,
Of folks I'd never seen nor knew,
Calliope, and God knows who.
To add no more investives to it,
You spoil'd the youth to make a poet.
In common justice, Sir, there's no man,
That makes the whore, but keeps the woman;
Among all honest Christian people,
Whoe'er breaks limbs, maintains the cripple.

The sum of all I have to say,
Is, that you'd put me in some way,
And your petitioner shall pray.
There's one thing more I had almost slipt,
But that may do as well in postscript;
My friend Charles Montague's preferr'd,
Nor wou'd I have it long observ'd,
That one mouse eats (7), while t'other's starv'd.

[C] Secretary to the Congress at the Hague, &c.] This was a very honourable entrance for a person of his circumstance, upon the scene of public employment: but it has been much diminished by the cunning misrepresentation of one of our historians (8); who tells us, that he was made Secretary to the Earl of Berkeley, Plenipotentiary from King William and Queen Mary, at the Congress at the Hague; which is a very different post, both as to the importance, profit, and honour of it, from being Secretary, as Mr Prior undoubtedly was, to his Sovereign (9). And in virtue of that, to his Sovereign's Ambassadors and Plenipotentiaries, the Earls of Pembroke and Portland, as well

}

}

}

}

(7) Alluding to the piece already mentioned in the text. Mr Montague had been introduced to King William by Lord Dorset. See the article MONTAGUE [CHARLES].

(8) Mr Oldmixon, in his History of England, &c. p. 150. edit. 1735 fol.

(9) A Secretary to the Person is appointed by that person, being only a private office, and to himself; Secretary to the Embassy is a public character, and constituted by a special warrant from the Crown.

(7) He bears this title in his appointment to the post of Secretary to the Embassy at the Peace of Ryfwick. Ibid. P. 26.

(8) Ibid. and the inscription on his monument.

(1) Ibid. and Oldmixon's History of England, &c. p. 178.

of his royal master, that, in the resolution to keep him near his person, he appointed him a Gentleman of his Bedchamber (i). This situation giving him leisure to indulge his genius in the company of his muse, he composed several small pieces of poetry [D]; and gladly embraced every occasion that the events of the war offered, of making his poetical talents serviceable to the honour of his country [E]. Upon the first resolution moved towards settling a peace in 1696; he was again employed in the post of Secretary to the English negotiations at the treaty of Ryfwick in 1697; having been nominated the same year Principal Secretary of State in Ireland (k). In 1698 he went Secretary to the Embassy to France, in which post he continued during the successive Embassies of the two Earls of Portland and Jersey. Our Genius had not been long in France, when one of the officers of the French king's household shewing him the royal apartments and curiosities of Versailles, pointed in a particular manner to the victories of Lewis XIV, painted by Le Brun; and asking, whether King William's actions were to be seen also in his palace; No, Sir, answered the English Secretary, the monuments of my master's actions are to be seen every where but in his own house (l). He did not leave Paris 'till some time after the arrival of the third Ambassador there from England, the Earl of Manchester, to whom he was of singular service [F]. For tho' the powers of his royal commission were now superfeded,

as Lord Dursley. Such low tricks as these, how well soever they may be calculated for the bulk of readers, cannot impose upon any intelligent person at home: and I don't know that Mr Oldmixon's history has ever suffered transportation; but, if that should have happened, I believe it will scarce fall into the hands of any reader of consequence, who is not well acquainted with the following lines, and will readily make proper application.

That tho' amongst ourselves, with too much heat,
We sometimes wrangle, when we should debate;
(A consequential ill, which freedom draws,
A bad effect, but from a noble cause)
We can with universal zeal advance,
To curb the faithless arrogance of France (10).

It is not improbable that Mr Prior's stay in Holland, after the conclusion of the Congress, might by this just-mentioned historian, be hastily laid hold of, as a proper basis for his assertion. The following letter of our author, being, though without the date of the year, it seems wrote at that time, which we shall give at length, since it is the only specimen left of his Latin epistolary style.

Carolo de Berkeley dilecto Domino suo, Matthæus Prior, Sm. Pm. Dr.

*Literas tuas, mi Charissime, sorori tuæ dilectissime scriptas accepimus, atque perlegimus, quando nihil secreti iis inesse credibile esset. Domestice nostræ res quomodo se habeant, brevi accipias. Mater tua hic est; fraterculum pulcherrimum & tui simillimum ex Anglia sibi transportavit. Soror tua natu maxima cum amita Nelson* Angliam profecta est ad recuperandam sanitatem, qua mala profecto in Hollandia usa est. Jam vero subraçci tibi debeo, nec injuria, quia epistolas nobis nec Latine nec Gallice scriptas mandare cures. Incumbas studiis oro, & fac, ut videamus progressus, quos te, octodecim jam menses audientem præceptores optimos, fecisse in utraque lingua oportet: Hoc pater tuus, hoc tuum postulat officium. Quod ad me attinet, ea solummodo conditione parentes tuos optimos exorandos conabor, quo nos revises brevi; hoc quoque sibi scriptum, frater tuus credat. Præceptores tuos amicos meos optimos meo nomine saluta. Fac me ames. Te æternum amabo. Vale.*

Hagæ comitum pridie nonas Septembris.

[D] He composed several small pieces of poetry. It was probably about this time of vacation from business, that our author became an innamorato, and made his addresses, as 'tis said, to the celebrated Mrs Elizabeth Singer (11). If so, it helps to explain the full meaning, especially in the concluding lines, of this answer, to that lady's Pastoral on Love and Friendship; which is followed by a copy of verses to the same lady, though not named.

[E] To the honour of his country ] Hardly was there a campaign in King William's wars, wherein our author did not draw his pen in this cause: 'To pass over his poem on seeing the Duke of Ormond's picture, at Sir Godfrey Kneller's, where he describes that General's glorious behaviour at the unfortunate battle of Lânden, in 1692, his Hymn to the Sun, on New-Year's day, 1694, and his ode to the King, after the Queen's death, in 1695; his muse had a much more agreeable opportunity the same year, of displaying her exquisite humour upon the re taking of Namur. The French King had taken that town in the campaign of 1692, in fight of the army of the allies, who were unable to raise the siege; this was extolled by the flatterers of that Prince, as a most inimitable action; and the celebrated Boileau, who always mixed the praises of his master with some strokes of satire on his contemporary writers, had composed an Ode on this occasion, in imitation of Pindar, wherein he asserted the character of that Ancient, against the reflections of Perreault, at the same time that he exalted his Heroe above all those of Greece. Mr Prior took this occasion of turning the Frenchman's darling ridicule, both on himself and his master, by burlesquing his boasted ode, in an English Ballad, and printing it, together with the French ode. In a word, he convinced all polite readers, who are generally of no party in matters of wit, that the English Horace was as much a more agreeable writer, than the French Pindar, as he had made Little Will the scourge of France, a more amiable Heroe than the Divine Lewis le Grand. The next year, 1696, upon his Majesty's arrival in Holland, after the discovery of the Conspiracy; Mr Prior presented him (12) with a beautiful copy of verses, addressed to the Guardian Angels of Mankind. The apostrophe to the French King, who is by many supposed to be privy to the intended assassination, contains a sentiment that is truly British.

O Lewis! from this great example know,
To be at once a Heroe and a Foe;
By sounding trumpets hear, and rattling drums,
When William in the open vengeance comes.
And see the foldier plead the monarch's right,
Heading his troops, and foremost in the fight:
Hence then close ambush, and perfidious war,
Down to your native seats of night repair.

[F] Of singular service to the Earl of Manchester.

That Lord in a letter to the Earl of Jersey, from Paris, August 8. 1699, N. S. writes thus: 'I can acquaint your Lordship that I arrived here the fifth, and the next day I sent a compliment to Mr Saintot (13), who immediately waited on me, and gave me to understand, that Monsieur de Torcy was expected in town: Mr Prior writ to him, and he appointed the afternoon to see me. Your Lordship knows the usual ceremonies on such occasions. He seemed extremely civil; and let me know, the King did not return to Versailles 'till Thursday next, and that then I should have an audience of him.—I am obliged to your Lordship for letting me have your house, which I like extremely; though my equipage not being come from Rouen, puts me under some difficulties; but, with the help of Mr Prior, all things are made easy. He has delivered your Lordship's letter to Monsieur de Torcy; and he took notice to me, how well Mr Prior has behaved himself during his stay here (14).

(10) Prior's Letter to Mr Boileau, occasioned by the victory at Blenheim, 1704, printed in the first volume of our author's Poetical Works.

* Lady Theophila Lucy, second daughter of Lord Berkeley, afterwards married to Mr Robt. Nelson, with whom she was at her father's house at the Hague in December 1691, and returned to England soon after. See Nelson's article.

(11) Afterwards the much famed Mrs Rowe. See her Life, prefixed to her Miscellaneous Works, p. 16. edit. 1719, in two vols. 8vo.

(12) He attended his Majesty as Gentleman of his Bedchamber.

(13) Master of the Ceremonies.

(m) The Earl of Manchester, in a letter to the Earl of Jersey, dated at Paris Aug. 19, 1699, writes—
‘To-morrow Mr Prior will leave this place.’
History of Prior’s own Times, p. 107.

(n) See a letter from our author to the Earl of Manchester, dated from Loo, September 11. Ibid. p. 114.

(14) The Hist. of Mr Prior’s own Time, p. 105, 106.

(15) Ibid. p. 113, 114.

(16) Ibid. p. 130.

(17) See the prologue of Paulo Porganti.

(18) Mr Macky, in his Memoirs of the English and Scotch Nobility, drawn up at the request of the Princess Sophia, and published by his son in 8vo. 1733.

feded, yet his personal qualities had rendered him so much the delight of the French Monarch, that he was still particularly powerful in that Court. About the middle of August 1699 (m) he went thence to King William at Loo in Holland; whence, after a long and very particular audience of his majesty (n), he departed with His orders by the way of the Hague for England, where he arrived about the middle of October, and immediately took possession of the Under-Secretary’s seat in the office of the Earl of Jersey [G]. But he had not been many days in this new employment before he was ordered back to Paris to assist the Ambassador, with his interest in that King, upon the affair of the Partition-Treaty [H]. He dispatched this business to the intire satisfaction of both the Sovereigns, and returned to London with the quickness of a courier (o). This same year, in Christmas holidays, he printed his celebrated poem, called, Carmen Seculare [I]. In the midst of these concerns for the public welfare, an opportunity was given him,

(o) In a letter to the Earl of Manchester, dated at the Hague, Oct. 16, he writes—
‘We expect the King here to-morrow, and Saturday following we shall be wishing the wind fair’ [for England]. Ibid. p. 117.

‘ here (14) ’ In another letter to the same Earl, dated Sept. 9. following, he lets his Lordship know, ‘ he had received his letter of the twenty fourth past, with the inclosed papers, relating to the English goods seized by Dubart, on board some Dantzick ships; and says, that he would present another memorial about that affair, if your Lordship pleased; though I cannot, says he, expect any good effect from it, because they gave a positive denial to Mr Prior (15).’ [G] Under Secretary to the Earl of Jersey. ‘Tis not improbable that he went home in company of the Earl of Jersey, who returned about this time from Holland, whither he had been sent for by the King, in order to sign the first Partition-Treaty (16). Mr Prior was always strongly attached to this Lord, of whose integrity and ability he seems to have had a very high opinion; and he has paid him a compliment upon his fine taste (17). Yet a certain author (18) declares, that ‘ the Earl of Jersey went through all the great offices of the kingdom, with a very ordinary understanding; was employed by one of the greatest Kings that ever was, in affairs of the greatest consequence; and yet was a man of a weak capacity.’ But the reader will know how to construe this, when he sees the same author asserting that Mr Prior was an entire creature of this Lord, whom he supported by his advice.

[H] Upon a particular occasion ] We have a short letter from Lord Jersey, which gives some idea of the message he was sent on, and shews the great credit he was in with the then Ministry.

To the Earl of Manchester.

Whitehall, October 23. 1699, O. S.

‘ My Lord,
‘ I have received your Lordship’s letter of the twenty-eighth of October [N. S.]. Before you receive this, Mr Prior will be with you. It is his Majesty’s desire that you discourse the business of the Partition-Treaty with Mr Prior, who has already knowledge of it; and, according to the account your Lordship gives next of it, you shall receive his Majesty’s further directions. What else your letters contain, I must beg leave to put off the answering it to another time.

‘ I am, &c.

‘ J E R S E Y.’

Mr Prior being arrived, Lord Manchester gave an account of it in a letter, dated November 6. 1699, N. S. which begins thus:

‘ My Lord,
‘ Mr Prior inform’d your Lordship by Wednesday’s post, of his arrival here. He having explained to me the subject upon which he was sent, I wrote to Monsieur de Torcy, in order to procure an audience.—In another letter, he writes thus:

To Charles Montague, Esq;

‘ S I R,
‘ Mr Prior’s coming here, and the private audience I had of the King, the day of my entry, occasion’d much discourse, and did me service with the Ministers: for now they see the King does not rely on Monsieur de Tallard.—King James, upon Mr Prior’s coming hither, believed I was to be recalled, and he

‘ to be left here; which, for some time, gave him great satisfaction.’ Mr Prior returned to London, on the eighteenth of November, 1699, with an account of this audience; and carried a letter from my Lord Manchester, dated the day before: wherein he tells his Lordship, that he did not trouble him with an account of what had been done, in obedience to his Majesty’s command, ‘ since Mr Prior, says he, is inform’d of all proceedings, and what pass’d in my private audience (19). I shall always discharge his Majesty’s orders, with all the secrecy and care imaginable. I am apt to think this occasion will make Monsieur de Tallard (20) take care how he behaves himself, for he was not very easy when he found Mr Prior was come, and that I was to have a private audience.’ Presently after Mr Prior’s return, he wrote the following letter to Lord Manchester.

London, November  $\frac{1}{3}$ , 1699.

‘ My Lord,
‘ I arrived here on Friday night, and every body confesses that only Roger (21) is fitter than I to be sent express. On Saturday morning my Lord Jersey carried me to the King. I first read to his Majesty, what your Lordship said to the King of France, and what the King answered thereupon; and then I explained to his Majesty the whole that had pass’d during my being in France. His Majesty is satisfied with every step your Excellency has made; and, in one word, we did as we ought to do. His Majesty ask’d me a great many questions about your Entry. You will easily believe I was glad, on that occasion, to do you justice. His Majesty ask’d me about the rank which Monsieur de Torcy’s coach had; and in all this affair, I can assure your Excellency, he is very well satisfied. I have seen, as well Charles, as James Erby, and Christopher Montague. I have been ask’d ten thousand questions, and gave them the news of my Lord Mandeville’s being to arrive at Paris within these six months; for which, we wish all very heartily. I contract’d a cold in the voyage, and wisely increas’d it by running about these two days, and have been blooded, and keep my chamber to day, which is the reason of my using another hand; I hope your Excellency will excuse it. The King dined to day with my Lord Rochester, at his house near Richmond; and my Lord Jersey is gone to dine with him. Whig and Tory, are, as of old, implacable. Dr D’avenant is coming out with another book, in which he attacks the Grants; and is, as I am told, very scurrilous against my Lord Chancellor, and our dear friend Charles (22). This, I think, is all the news I have known since my arrival. I have only to add my great thanks to your Excellency, for your hospitality and kindness to me in France; and with you success in every thing there, with all possible zeal and sincerity.

‘ I am, &c.

‘ M. P R I O R (23).’

(19) Which may be seen in Cole’s Memoirs.

(20) He had been sent by the French King to sign the first Partition-Treaty, which being hindered by the delay of the Dutch, Lewis suspected King William to be at the bottom of it, and complain’d to him, which brought this journey on Mr Prior.

(21) A fervant of his, usually employed on those occasions.

(22) Afterwards Lord Halifax. He had a large share in these Grants. See his article.

(23) See History of his own Time, p. 125 to 139.

[I] His Carmen Seculare.] The following letter (24), writ to the Earl of Manchester, Dec. 17. 1699, O. S. furnishes us with some of the motives which gave occasion to this poem.—‘ You see by the news what was done in both houses yesterday. In the upper house the Bishop of St David’s (25) business was thrown out; and, in the other house, proceedings in relation to Kidd’s matter, came to nothing. So that

(24) In the History of his own Time, p. 142, 143, 144.

(25) Dr Watson, who was accused of Simony, and afterwards depriv’d for it.

(p) See the Register of the University.

(q) On Midsummer-day. Ibid. p. 178.

(r) There was less pain and more gain in it than in the former.

him, in the year 1700, of testifying his dutiful regard for the reputation of the university [K], which he fulfilled with all imaginable alacrity; and that learned body, the same year, with equal gladness, executed the King's mandamus, in conferring upon him the degree of Master of Arts (p). The Earl of Jersey accepting the post of Lord-Chamberlain this year, our Under-Secretary's place became void (q); but it was not long before he obtained another the same year, which was more agreeable to his humour (r); for upon Mr Locke's resigning his seat at the Board of Trade on account of his ill state of health, Mr Prior was appointed to succeed him (s); and was elected a representative for East-Grinstead, in Suffex [L], in the new Parliament which met on the 6th of Feb. 1700-1, where

(s) Oldmixon's History, as before, p. 210. and the History of Prior's own Time, p. 178.

' that we gained two triumphs that day. Ob fsic omnia! The Commons address you will observe to be somewhat high: but the moderation and wisdom of the King's answer, is thought even by his enemies, inimitable. D'Avenant has printed his book (26) against grants; which I take to be a scandalous libel against the Government: I'll fend it you when we employ a messenger; for I think it would cost you too dear, if it came by the post. Smith (27), who was a sort of discoverer of the Plot, and printed a book last year, reflecting upon the Duke of Shrewsbury, has printed another now to the same tune. O Tempora! O mores! Every man says, and writes what he will. Next week I intend to come out myself, with a Panegyric upon the King.

' I am ever,

' my Lord,

' with all imaginable respect, &c.

' M. P R I O R.'

(26) This piece of waggery conveys a pleasant hint to Lord Manchester to send him some venison, as he had done before this time. See remark [L].

P. S. I don't write to Stanyan, for he has not a Park nor a Doe (28) in the world! I mean a Doe fit for a Pasty.—

With regard to the two authors mentioned in this letter, Mr Macky (29) has the following remarkable paragraph, in the character of Lord Peterborough. His promising Sir John Fenwick his life, if he would accuse the Duke of Shrewsbury, and the Lord Orford, to have a design to bring in King James; and his writing a book, by the assistance of Dr D'avenant, and putting one Smith's name to it, against that Duke, tost him, with all honest men; the house of Commons having voted the one, a scurrilous design to make a difference between the King and his best friends; and the house of Peers, having ordered the second to be burnt by the hands of the common hangman.

Mr Dibben, whose Latin translation of this Ode is confessed by our author to be equal to the original, was then of Trinity College in Cambridge; and afterwards Chaplain to Dr Robinson the Bishop of London, and attended his Lordship at the Treaty of Utrecht; he was likewise Rector of Fontnel, in the county of Dorset; and related to Mr Prior.

[K] His dutiful regard to the University.] In a letter (30), dated April 1. 1700, O. S. he writes to Lord Manchester thus. 'For above these two months past, I have not had an opportunity of sending over a Horace, which we printed at Cambridge; and which my Lord Duke of Somerset, our Chancellor, presents to the King of France's Library; with a letter, which his Grace writes on that subject, to the Abbé de Louvois. But I have at last sent them by a footman who quitted my service. The book and letter will be, or are already, delivered to Mr Stanyan, and the favour we beg of your Excellency, is, that you would honour this book with a word, by which the Court of France, and particularly the Archbishop of Rheims, and Abbé de Louvois, may take notice, that the University of Cambridge would establish a fair correspondence with the learned on your side. By next post, I shall write something to the Soubibliothecaire Monsieur Clermont, concerning the Greek cyphers we would buy of them: in this I must likewise desire your Lordship's good offices; since, without your appearing to be concerned in it, we shall hardly make our matters bear as we desire. Monsieur Fuebergen came on Friday; I have not yet seen him.

' I am, &c.

' M. P R I O R.'

In another letter (31) of April eighteenth, he repeats this request; and says, 'I have written to Mr Clermont what the University desires, as to the procuring us some Greek types. If your Excellency expends the money, and are pleased to draw upon me, I will answer the bills: I should be glad they could be got ready soon. I should not dare to trouble your Excellency, but that your protection to the University is absolutely necessary on this occasion.'—In answer to this, my Lord Manchester writes from Paris, May 5.

' S I R,

' The Court being at Marley, Monsieur de Torcy will not be in town 'till to-morrow: so I must make my excuse to my Lord Jersey by you, for my not writing. My wife lays all the fault on you, that we have not heard if we may give the little one the King's name; and I dare not venture, without knowing that positively. So that at present you are a little out of favour; and will be so, unless we hear by the next letters.

' I shall do all I can to serve the University, and shall take care about the Harace when I have it. Mr Stanyan will acquaint you how that matter stands, and how this book is seized at Diepe. I have not seen the Archbishop of Rheims for some time, and I believe he is gone to his diocese.

' Several of the great men here will dine with me to-morrow; and among them, the Marechal de Villeroi: he will certainly ask after you, as he often does.'

[L] Chosen Representative for East-Grinstead.] By the conclusion of the following letter; we find, that he had some thoughts of putting up for Cambridge University: Notwithstanding it's length, the reader we believe will see no part of it could be omitted.

' To the Earl of Manchester. Dec. 10. 1700. O. S.

' I am indebted to my good Lord Manchester, for two or three letters; and it would be unreasonable, if I did not take the opportunity of Mr Chetwynd's return, to tell your Lordship what I know of the state of things here. That we shall have a new Parliament, is, I think, certain; at least, as far as I can see into the matter. What sort of Parliament it may prove, I cannot any ways foresee; but sure there never was so much work as at present, in securing parties, and bribing elections. Whig and Tory are railing on both sides, so violent, that the Government may easily be overturned by the madness of either faction. We take it to be our play, to do nothing against common Sense, or common Law; and to be for those who will support the Crown, rather than oblige either Party: and, in order to this, men are preferred, who are looked upon to be honest and moderate. In this number (whether with reason or not, time must decide) we comprehend our Lord-Keeper (32), and our new Secretary (33). Lord Rochester, and Lord Godolphin, are in the Cabinet-Council: the latter, is at the head of the Treasury; the former, we take it for granted, is to go Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland; though it be yet a secret. The two companies* are to be brought to an agreement (if possible); and Mr Montague's being made a Peer (34), we take it for granted, may contribute to this union; since being in the house of Commons, he would make an ill figure, if he either declined to support the new, or should find too great an opposition in his endeavouring so to do. As to the great Affair (35), I presume the King will wholly defer it to the Parliament, and act conjointly with their consent; which I take to be the only method. All that I can say more on this head, is, that I take it to be happy for the King that the Will is preferred

(31) Ibid. p. 173, 174.

(32) Sir Nathan Wright.

(33) Sir Charles Hedges.

* The East India Companies.

(34) Earl of Halifax. See his article.

(35) The Spanish succession.

(29) In his Characters, &c. ubi supra, p. 64.

(30) In his History of his own Time, p. 163, 169.

where he voted for impeaching the several Lords, charged with advising the Partition-Treaty [M]. Upon Queen Anne's Accession to the Throne, a war breaking out again with France, our author, constantly zealous in his country's cause, exerted again his poetical talents in her honour; first, in that inimitable Letter of his to Monsieur Boileau Despreaux, occasioned by the Victory at Blenheim in 1704 [N]; and again, in his Ode, humbly inscribed to the Queen, on the glorious success of her Majesty's arms in 1706 [O]. But by the French, at a time when every body was peevish against the Court, though with reason, (God knows) about the Treaty (36). Count Tallard makes a foolish figure here: I don't know, as yet, what he says to the King on this occasion; but every body observes his Excellency, to be very melancholy and desponding; and one may judge, he has reason to be so, as to his own particular, concerning the part he has been made to act; however, his country in general may approve their Monarch's breach of Truth and Treaty.

as

This, I think, is the present figure of our affairs; which, I am glad to write to so good a friend as my Lord Manchester; though, to most of the world here, I am of opinion, that to say least, is to do best. Your friend, my Lord Jersey, grows very much a Minister; and is in a fair way of being very great. As to my own affairs, I have a great many friends who would set me up at Cambridge; I know I shall find great opposition from Mr Hammond's party there, and great trouble, in case I should throw him out from those men, who will never be satisfied, let me act as I will, or can. If your Lordship thinks it convenient, I know you will not refuse me your letter to the University. My Lord Sandwich is gone to Hinchinbrook, I hear, in order to set up Mr Charles Boyle, against Mr Wortley Montague, at Huntingdon. Vive la Guerre, whoever is chosen, or on what side soever things turn,

I am most truly, &c.

M. P R I O R.

P. S. Though I am no longer in a Secretary's-Office, Venison would not poison a Commissioner of Commerce. Does are now in season; which it may be useful to inform Mr Woollaston of, when next your Lordship writes to him (37).

[M] Voted for impeaching the several Lords, &c.] This we are informed of, in the History of his own Times (38), with this remark, by Mr Prior, upon those impeachments. 'It seems to have been agreed, says he, both by the Lords and Commons, in this dispute, that the Partition-Treaty was of pernicious consequence; and that the transacting it in private, without communicating it to the Council, was a high misdemeanour in those that advised and transacted it. But whether the Commons suspected, that the Lords, who were generally in the interest of the old Ministry, would not pass any censure on the impeached Lords, or for what other reason, is uncertain, the Commons seem to have been a little dilatory in their proceedings; and might design the Lords should have lain under an impeachment, during the recess of the Parliament. There might possibly be something of party also in the case: the impeached Lords, were the chiefs of the Whigs; and had long reign'd at Court without controul; and the Tories, who succeeded them, had a view, perhaps, of preventing their returning to their posts, as well as of bringing them to justice for negotiating the Partition-Treaty, and for the other misdemeanours, mentioned in the Articles. There are few prosecutions of this kind, but there is a great deal of private picque, interest, and resentment, mixed with views of the public good.' 'Tis evident, Mr Prior never approved * the Partition-Treaty, notwithstanding the obedience he thought himself indispensibly obliged to pay to his Sovereign's warrants, in carrying on the negotiations relating to it; and Lord Jersey observed the same rule.

[N] Letter to Boileau, on the Victory at Blenheim.] The French Poet in his eighth Epistle, which begins, had informed his Sovereign of the great difficulties he lay under, to describe his numerous and wonderful conquests. Sometimes, says he, in the ardour of my zeal, I endeavour to measure out the syllables of an Ode; at others, I boldly form the plan of a sublime Æneid. Thus, continually flattered by a pleasing madness, I perceive my genius daily to decrease; and that my verses without spirit or beauty dishonour my pen, and do no honour to You. He then humbly informs his Majesty, that it would be but reasonable to give him breath for one year, at least, that his muse might recover her vigour; and atone for the opportunities she had lost. To this flattery, Prior directs the beginning of his Epistle in these lines.

Grand Roi cesse de vaincre, ou je cesse d'ecrire.

Some Dæmon envying France, misled the fight,
And Mars mistook, though Louis order'd right.

The verses that follow, are an inimitable piece of raillery, on the Frenchman's fourth Epistle: in which he complains, that the King did not consider his Poet in his campaigns; but, unkindly, took places in fact, which could not possibly be taken in rhyme.

When thy young muse invoc'd the tuneful Nine,
To say how Louis did not pass the Rhine,
What work bad we with Wageningben, Arnheim,
Places that could not be reduc'd to rhyme?
And though the Poet made his last efforts;
Wurts, who could mention in heroicks, Wurts?

But, tell me, hast thou reason to complain,
At the rough triumphs of the last campaign?
The Danube rescu'd, and the Empire sav'd;
Say, is the majesty of verse retriev'd?
And would it prejudice thy softer vein,
To sing the Princes, Louis, and Eugene?
Is it too hard, in happy verse to place,
The Vans and Vanders, of the Rhine and Maes?
Her warriors Anna sends, from Tweed and Thames,
That France may fall by more harmonious names.
Can't thou not Hamilton, or Lumley bear?
Wou'd Ingoldsbj or Palmes, offend thine ear?
And is there not a found in Marlborough's name,
Which thou, and all thy brethren ought to claim,
Sacred to verse, and sure of endless fame?

This Epistle is executed throughout, in the same inimitable humour and spirit. The happy thought of confronting his theme with that of his adversary, on the same page, gives it a perfect figure of the battle, and victory, which it celebrates.

Nor ever shall Britannia's sons refuse,
To answer to thy Master, or thy Muse.

And it must be observed, these poetical arms, were taken up as volunteer in his country's honour; whereas Mr Addison was hired.

[O] Ode in 1706.] The editor of Mr Prior's History of his own Time, &c. thinks it may be ascribed to this piece, (which is written in Spencer's stile) that we have since had so many imitations of our ancient Poets. 'For, says he, I do not remember that any of our moderns wrote in this way, before Mr Prior; nor that he has done it in any thing anterior to this Ode. We must not omit to observe, that the speech put by our author into the mouth of the Royal Treaty-Breaker, (as he here calls the French King) upon receiving the news of his army's defeat, wherein he recapitulates the honours of the British nation, and owns (36) Of Partition.

† Anthony Hammond, Esq; represented this university in several Parliaments. He was a polite scholar; and, among other things, wrote some account of Mr Moyle, the particulars of which may be seen in that gentleman's article.

(37) History of Prior's own Time, p. 181, 182, 183, 184.

(38) P. 223.

* Matthew, who knew the whole intrigue, Ne'er much approv'd that mystic league, Conversation, a Tale, in Vol. II. of Prior's Miscellanies.

(r) See his Answer to the Report of the Secret Committee, at the end of the History of his own Time, p. 436, & seqq.

(u) See his epitaph.

(w) He set out July 2d, and returned in the beginning of August. See the Papers printed by the Secret Committee of the House of Commons in 1715.

(x) Boyer's Life of Queen Anne, p. 556, fol. edit. where it is observed, in favour of Mr Prior's designation to this post, that the French had named three plenipotentiaries, and Mr Mefnager in particular.

(19) See Salmon's Modern History, Vol. XXV, p. 340, & seq.

* The truth is, they were an easy triumph to his antagonist, being too evidently the genuine offspring of party-zeal over heated.

as soon as he thought the General was too much influenced by private views to prolong the war (t), he concurred with the inclination of his Sovereign for peace; and in 1710 he joined with some of the brightest wits in the nation in writing The Examiner [P]; where that part of the General's conduct was severely handled. In 1711, when the Queen determined to treat with France, she pitched upon Mr Prior to carry her demands toward a pacification; for which purpose, he was appointed Her Majesty's Minister Plenipotentiary to that Court, having been made one of the Commissioners of the Customs a little before (u). He made all the necessary dispatch which this affair required (w), and returned in a few weeks to London, accompanied with the French Minister, Mr Mefnager [Q], who was furnished by his Master with full powers to settle and sign preliminaries; and some of the meetings in this negotiation were held at Mr Prior's house; who, by the common request of all the committee of the Privy-Council, intrusted in this matter, was joined with them in the commission to sign the articles after the agreement on the part of her Majesty [R], who was likewise inclined to join him with the two ministers at Utrecht to take care of commercial affairs; but the high spirit of the Earl of Strafford having positively refused to be joined in commission with a person of so mean an extraction, and threatening to lay down his employment, the business of Trade was committed to the Lord Privy-Seal (x). However, he was sent again, on the first of August, 1712 (y), to France, in order to accommodate such matters as then remained unsettled in the congress at Utrecht [S]. From the end of this month he had the appointments and authority of an Ambassador; and though he did not assume the public character 'till after the Duke of Shrewsbury's departure, yet the burthen of the Embassy lay upon him during his Grace's stay, who rather gave a sanction to it, by his high quality, than contributed to the dispatch of the negotiations (z). In the latter end of October he was sent to England upon an affair of great importance, with a credential letter from the French king to the Queen, and returned with her Majesty's answer about the middle of November [T]. These letters are the superiority of the Woman Chief, has a probable foundation in fact: for that Monarch, presently after the loss of this battle, was induced to make overtures of peace, as appears from the Duke of Bavaria's letter, to the Duke of Marlborough, dated from Mons, Oct. 21. 1706, which begins thus. 'The most Christian King, Sir, finding that some overtures of peace, which he had caused to be made by private ways, &c (39).'

(y) See the State of his accounts at the end of the Hist. of his own Time, p. 461.

(z) Ibid.

[P] Writing the Examiner. His criticism upon Dr Garth's verses to Lord Godolphin, No. VI. Sept. 7. 1710, provoked Mr Addison to begin a paper, with the title of the Whig Examiner. In the first of which papers, dated Sept. 14. he takes our author's remarks* to pieces. The second and fourth of these papers, were an answer to Lord Bolingbroke's famous letter to the Examiner. He published no more than five under this title; but is said to have afterwards assisted Mr Manwaring, Steele, Hare, Oldmixon, and others, in carrying on the Medley; a paper, which, as it was intended only for an answer to the Examiner, was dropped the next week after it, in Aug. 1711. The Examiner itself, was set up under the influence of Mr Harley, and St John, then at the head of the Ministry; and conducted by Mr Prior, Dr Swift, Dr Freind, Mrs Manley, Mr Oldsworth, and some others. Mr Prior is generally thought to be the author (at least, in conjunction with Swift) of a very fatirical, not to say virulent, Fable, against the Duke of Marlborough, intituled, The Widow and her Cat; which concludes with this stanza.

XI.

So glaring is thine insolence,
So vile thy breach of trust is;
That longer with thee to dispense,
Were want of power, or want of sense:
Here Towzer! do him justice,

[Q] And returned with the French Minister, Monsieur Mefnager. There came likewise the Abbé Gualtier, along with them. They were all seized at Canterbury, in their way to London and Mr Prior's packet detained by Mr Mackey, Master of the Packet-Boats at Dover, who had got information of his journey; but the Queen immediately sent orders to discharge them (40). Upon Mr Prior's arrival in France, Monsieur de Torcy, tells Mr St John, 'he saw, with great pleasure, Mr Prior return, after an interval of so many years; that he could have wished he had had greater liberty to employ those talents, which he was persuaded he would have made good use of; but he hopes Mr Mefnager will supply what he could not do.'

[R] Her Majesty designed to join Mr Prior in the Commission, &c. This appears from a letter of Mr St John to the Queen, where he acquaints her Majesty, that the Lords of the Committee of Council met Septemb. 20. 1711. in the morning, at the Cockpit, and directed the Earl of Dartmouth, and himself, to confer with Mr Mefnager. 'We saw him, continues he, accordingly, this evening, at Mr Prior's house; where my Lord Treasurer [Harley], and my Lord Chamberlain [Shrewsbury], were likewise present—My Lord Treasurer moved, and all my Lords were of the same opinion, that Mr Prior should be added to those who are impowered to sign; the reason for which, is, because he having personally treated with Monsieur de Torcy, is the best witness we can produce, of the sense in which the general preliminary engagements are entered into: besides which, as he is the best versed in matters of trade, of all your Majesty's servants, who have been trusted in this secret, if you shall think fit to employ him in the future Treaty of Commerce, it will be of consequence that he has been a party concerned, in concluding that Convention, which must be the rule of this Treaty.'—A Warrant was signed by the Queen for this purpose, but it does not appear that Mr Prior acted in this commission; for the warrant was found indorsed, not used†.

[S] He was sent again to France. Upon matters moving slowly at Utrecht, my Lord Bolingbroke went to France, to adjust and settle the great points in dispute (42); and it is not improbable that he took Mr Prior with him. In a letter to Lord Dartmouth, he writes thus: 'As I intend to leave this place on Wednesday at farthest, it will be proper to lose no time, in dispatching a letter of Credence to Mr Prior; to whom your Lordship will likewise please, as soon as possible, to send the Queen's ratification (43).'

[T] Upon an affair of great importance. He carried the following letter, dated Versailles, Oct. 28. 1712.

'Madam, my Sister,
'You having acquainted me that you have an entire confidence in Mr Prior; I thought he would be more capable than any body to inform you of the new proofs that I am ready to give you, of the particular regard I have for you; as also, my desire to terminate, without any delay, in concert with you, the negotiations of peace. He goes into England to give you an account of the further advances that I am willing to make, to facilitate an entire conclusion of this work. I would have you therefore, regard, what I do in this decisive conjuncture, as new and certain marks of my friendship for you; and do me that pleasure to acknowledge them, by interesting

† Ibid.

(42) The Suspension was signed while he was there.

(43) Report of the Secret Committee.

(40) History of Prior's own Time, p. 348, and Burnet's History of his own Time, Vol. II. p. 584.

(41) Papers published before the Secret Committee in 1714.

are remarkable proofs of his being in the highest favour at both Courts; and he was continued in the post of Her Majesty's Ambassador and Plenipotentiary, in the former as long as she lived. He remained at Paris also in the character of a public minister (aa) some months after the Accession of King George the First. At whose appointment he was succeeded by the Earl of Stair, who, pursuant to his directions, took possession of all his predecessor's papers (bb) [U]. The great change that happened in the public management of affairs at this time occasioned Mr Prior to be detained in France without any public character; and upon his arrival in England, on the 25th of March, 1715, he was immediately taken up by an order of the House of Commons, and committed to the hands of a messenger (cc). On the first of April following, he underwent a strict examination, before a committee of the Privy-Council; and at the conclusion of it was removed from his own house, where he had continued 'till then, and laid under a stricter confinement (dd) [W] in that of the messenger. Upon the tenth of June following, Robert

Walpole,

* interesting your self with me, in favour of the * Elector of Bavaria. I do not remind you of the * ties of blood, which unite him as well to you, as * me; nor of any other reasons which ought to ren* der you sensible of his condition: it is sufficient for * me, that you are sensible of the concern that I have,
* in what regards him; and I am persuaded that this * will be the principal motive that will press you to * act in his favour. I expect, with impatience, the * return of Mr Prior, whose conduct is very agreeable
* to me: and as he will assure you of what my senti* ments are; I will only add, that he cannot suffici* ently express the perfect esteem, and sincere friend* ship, I have for you.

' I am,

' Madam, my Sister,

' your good Brother,

' L O U I S.'

About the middle of November, Mr Prior was sent back into France, with new instructions, and the following letter, from her Majesty, to the French King.

Windfor, November 14. 1712.

' Monsieur, my Brother,

' I have received, with a very sincere pleasure, the * agreeable letter which Mr Prior brought me from * you. As your consummate wisdom hath taken the * resolution that is most proper to fix the terms of * peace; you will be persuaded that I will not, on * my part, lose a moment to hasten the conclusion of * it. I assure you, that the great facility that you are * willing to lend towards it, out of a regard to me, shall * be made no other use of, than to be employed, with* out any delay, to re-establish the public tranquillity,
* according to the wishes of us both. By the orders
* that I give to my Ministers, at Utrecht; it will ap* pear, that I do all that is in my power, at the pre* sent conjuncture, in favour of a Prince, whose inter* est is supported by your generosity.

' I do not at all doubt, but he himself is fully con* vinced of it; and that all the world agrees in it: I
* again repeat, Monsieur, my Brother, that the con* sideration of your friendship will be a very prevail* ing motive, to engage me anew in his interest, and * in the interest of his family, as occasion shall offer,
* for the future. As to the rest, I send back Mr Prior
* to Verfailles; who, in continuing to conduct himself
* in the manner that shall be entirely agreeable to you,
* does no more than execute, to a tittle, the orders
* which I have given him. And amongst all the proofs
* of his duty and zeal for my service, I expect in a * very particular manner, that he should take all pos* sible occasion to repeat to you, the esteem and per* fect regard that I have for you; and my earnest de* sire to live with you, in a sincere and perpetual * friendship (44).

These two remarkable letters are lasting testimonies of the high confidence Mr Prior was in, not only with his own Sovereign, but with the King of France; whom he had, more than once, made the object of his Satire.

[U] Seized all his papers. After the Queen's death, Mr Prior met with great difficulties in obtaining his arrears. At length, Lord Halifax being appointed

First Commissioner of the Treasury, wrote thus to him, December 2. 1714. ' I read your letter to the King, and did not omit doing you all the good I could; the King has ordered you should be paid the allowance of a Plenipotentiary, from the first of August, to the first of December; together with a bill of extraordinaries, amounting in the whole to 1176 pounds: And the bills that were due in the Queen's time, will be paid in course out of the Queen's arrears (45).' October 3. 1714, Mr Prior presented to the King of France a Memorial; requiring that the canal, and new works at Mardyke, should be demolished (46). The next day, the Earl of Stair was appointed to go and succeed him: his Lordship went over, but did not take upon him the title of Ambassador, 'till some time after, on account of the works erected at Mardyke; and the Pretender's continuing still incog. at Paris (47). We find, however, from what was observed, concerning the payment of his arrears; that Mr Prior had not the character of a public Minister longer than the first of December; about which time, in all appearance, Lord Stair took possession of all his papers, that were then to be found; there being no question but he had before this, secured those that might have injured himself, or any of his friends: For the proceedings of the new Ministry, against all who had any concern in the negotiations of the peace of Utrecht, were sufficient to put him on his guard, and make him expect the storm that soon after followed.

Notwithstanding Lord Halifax's letter, just mentioned, it appears no payment had been made on the seventh of February, 1714-15, when he received a letter from Mr Secretary Stanhope, wherein were these words; I represented to his Majesty in Council, that it would be impossible for you to return home, unless you were enabled to pay your debts; upon which, his Majesty has been pleased to direct, that your demands, as stated to my Lord Halifax, be complied with: and, accordingly, I have signified his Majesty's pleasure thereupon, to Lord Halifax; who, I am persuaded, will be pleased to serve you. At the same time he received the following letter from Lord Halifax. ' It is with great pleasure that I can now let you know, that upon reading my Lord Stair's letter, giving an account of your readiness to obey his Majesty's orders: the King has directed us to pay you 2408 pounds, for the two bills of extraordinaries, which you demanded; which, together with what is due to you yet, on your ordinary allowance, shall be dispatched with all the favour and civility we can show you. It will be a great pleasure to me in particular, to hasten your return from an unhappy station to your own country and friends, in which number I desire you will rank me.

I am, &c (48).

[W] A stricter confinement. In an account of this examination, written by himself, (by which it appears, he was above ten hours before this Committee) he concludes thus. ' When I had thus signed the paper (49), the Chairman [Robert Walpole, Esq;] told me, that the Committee were not at all satisfied with my behaviour, nor could give such an account of it to the House, that might merit their favour in my behalf; that at present, they thought fit, to lay me under a stricter confinement, than that of my own house. Here Bos. (50) played the moralist, and Con. (51) the Christian; but both very awkwardly. Bos. said, that he had often heard Mr Stepney (52), who was a wife man, and our old friend, repeat this Proverb;

' Near

(dd) At first the Messenger was with him in his own house, but now he was confined in that of the Messenger. See his account at the end of his Hist. of his own Time.

(45) Ibid. p. 414.

(46) See his Journal, ubi sup. p. 412.

(47) Life of the Earl of Stair, p. 34.

(48) History of his own Time, p. 415.

(49) Containing heads of his examination.

(50) Boscawens.

(51) Coningsby.

(52) A Poet and Statesman, as well as Prior.

(aa) Namely, that of Plenipotentiary.

(bb) Answer to the Report of the Committee of Secrecy, at the end of the Hist. of his own Time, p. 437.

(cc) Ibid. p. 416.

(44) History of his own Time, p. 375 to 378.

(ee) Ibid., p. 458, 459.

(ff) Mr Dobson of New-college in Oxford has since given an excellent translation of this poem into Latin verse, which is printed in the second volume of Prior's Miscellanies, 8vo, 1740. N. B. The same gentleman afterwards gave a like translation of Milton's Paradise Lost.

(gg) Which, says Mr Jacob, I may venture to say is the best that ever was wrote in the English tongue. Lives of the Poets, Vol. II. in Prior's article.

(bb) See his epigraph.

(ii) It has been since purchased by the Earl of Hardwicke, when Lord High Chancellor of England, who is now in possession of it.

Walpole, Esq; (afterwards Earl of Orford) moved the House of Commons for an impeachment against him; and on the seventeenth he was ordered into close custody, and no person to be admitted to see him without leave from the Speaker; and in 1717, when the Act of Grace was passed, Mr Prior, who lay still at the mercy of the House of Commons, was one of the persons excepted out of it. Notwithstanding this, he was soon after discharged without any further prosecution or being called to a trial (ee). He wrote an account of the proceedings in his examination before the Committee of Council, which, together with the ill usage he thought he had met with in the secret committee of the House of Commons, occasioned him to undertake a defence of himself and the ministry in the four last years of Queen Anne's reign, in answer to the charge alledged against them in that report [X]. He spent the remainder of his days, retired from business, in the company of his muse, being settled at Down-hall, a small villa, in the county of Essex; which, by the generosity of Robert Harley, Earl of Oxford, he was possessed of for his life. Having finished his Solomon on the Vanity of the World (ff) [Y], he made a collection of all his poems, and published it by subscription in one volume in folio, with a most elegant dedication (gg) to the present Duke of Dorset, as a grateful memorial to his father's patronage of the author: Some time after this he formed a design of writing a history of his own time; which, considering the part he bore himself in many national transactions, the opportunities he had of being well informed concerning others, added to the extraordinary talents he possessed for every part of fine literature, could hardly fail of being a very valuable work; but he had made very little progress in it, when a lingering fever put a period both to his work and to his life (bb), September 18, 1721, in the fifty-eighth year of his age; he died at Wimble, a seat of the Earl of Oxford, son to the Lord-Treasurer, not far from Cambridge (ii); and his corps was interred, according to his own directions, in Westminster-abbey, where a stately monument is erected to his memory, for which last piece of human vanity he set apart five hundred pounds by his will; besides a bust of himself, done by Coriveaux, it is exquisitely performed, and stands at the top of his monument; the inscription beneath being wrote by Dr Robert Freind, then Head-Master of Westminster-school, who gladly exerted himself in doing justice to the character of one who had been so great an honour to that school [Z]. After his death, another small collection of his poems was published;

(53) Mr Hollinhead.

'Near my Shirt, but nearer my Skin; and told me, if I had remembered that saying, and acted according to it, it would have been better for me. And Con. said, he had known me a long time, and was heartily sorry for my condition; but all this proceeded from my own fault. Now this kind commiseration did not last above a minute; for the Messenger, to whose house they intended to confine me, being called, Con. asked him, if his house were secured by bolts, and bars? The Messenger (53), who is by birth a gentleman, and a very good-natured man, was astonished at the question; and, answered, that he never had any in his custody but Parliament-Prisoners, (as he expressed it) and there were neither bolts, nor bars, in his house. At which, Con. very angrily said; Sir, you must secure this Prisoner; it is for the safety of the Nation; if he escapes, you shall answer for it. And now I met with another hardship, which indeed I could not have expected; as I had all day taken notes of their examination, and my answers; and particularly, that Mr Stanhope had, by his Majesty's order, informed the Committee, that from whatever I should say in this examination, nothing should, or ought to, redound to my own prejudice: nor indeed could it be imagined I should answer upon any other foot; for without the King's consent, I doubt if I ought at all to have answered to the Committee.'

[X] A defence of himself, &c. This piece was left unfinished by him; and in what is done, he has not touched upon one great objection which was made, particularly to Lord Bolingbroke and himself; that they were frequently most unseasonably witty, in the interludes of these most important and serious negotiations; upon which the future woe or weal of their country were at stake. And in a letter to the Lord Bolingbroke, some time after the conclusion of the peace (54), Mr Prior expresses himself merrily, concerning the difficulties that had arisen, upon the articles of Commerce (which fell to his share). 'We had like, says he, to have made an Athanasian business of it at Utrecht; by that explanation of our own way, of understanding our own commerce; their letters to you, full of surmises and doubts, that all was unhinged; and their letters to us again, that explanations, however made, were only to save appearances, and signified nothing: This melange, I say, and my endeavouring to understand it, had like to make me run mad, if the Duke of Shrewsbury's extreme good sense, and Monsieur de Torcy's not only good sense but right understanding, had not redressed us.' To the same purpose, it was archly observed by somebody at that time, that Lord Oxford's Peace, was like the Peace of God, for it passed all human understanding.

[Y] Having finished his Solomon, &c. In the two following lines of this admirable poem, the Poet seems to have an eye to his own particular case; where representing the origin of Solomon's passion for his slave Abra, he makes that King say thus:

Use made her person, easy to my fight,
That ease insensibly produc'd delight.

Mrs Elizabeth Cox, our author's Doe (55), was at this time a Lady of no distinguished beauty; and she grew so humourous and imperious, before his death, that some of his friends could not forbear taking notice of it. To whom it is said, that he made the same answer with the celebrated French Comedy-writer, Moliere, who was exactly in the same circumstances, viz. 'That he was sensible of the truth of their remarks, as well as the friendliness of their advice; but he had been so long used to her humours, that they were become familiar to him, and by that means tolerable; whereas a new mistress, would bring a new temper, which would create a very sensible trouble to conform with.'

[Z] Exerted himself in doing justice to his character. For which reason, we shall insert that part of it. After an account of his birth and education, together with his several public employments, the Doctor proceeds to the distinguishing character of his poetical genius, as follows.

Ita natus, ita educatus,
A vatum choro avelli nunquam potuit,
Sed solebat sæpe rerum civilium gravitatem
Amæriorum literarum studiis condire:
Et cum omne adeo Poeticæ genus
Haud infelicitè tentarit,

(55) He shewed his value for her by his Will, wherein he left her equally residuary legatee with Mr Drift. See a copy of his Will, in the third volume of his Poems.

(54) In May 1713, Report of the Committee of Secrecy.

published; and since that there came out a piece in 1740, intituled, The History of his own Time [AA]; compiled from the Original Manuscripts of his late Excellency Matthew Prior, Esq; and some poems in a separate volume. Notwithstanding the many high posts and lucrative employments which he had enjoyed in the course of his life, he died at last Fellow of St John's college in Cambridge, which was the only preferment he was then possessed of. We have the following story concerning this part of his conduct, that after he became a Minister of State he was often told, that a Fellowship was too trifling an affair for him to keep; particularly when he was made Ambassador, some persons intimated to him, that the Fellowship was hardly consistent with that character; but he replied, That every thing he had besides was precarious, and when all failed that would be bread and cheese at last; and, therefore, he did not mean to part from it. However, he made amends for this humour in his will, where he left the college a set of books to the value of two hundred pounds to be chosen out of his study by that society; as also his own picture, and another of the Earl of Jersey (kk). In pursuance whereof, the books, which are all in very magnificent bindings, are placed in the college-library, all together in one desk which they fill, and over it is set the benefactor's picture (ll), done by La Belle, in France; it is at full length, in a sitting posture, very richly dressed, En Ambassadeur, and finely painted; and is said to have been a present to Mr Prior by Lewis XIV. who gave the Painter a hundred pistoles for it.

(kk) See his Will in the third volume of his Poems.

(ll) The Earl of Jersey's picture is placed near Mr Prior's.

Tum in fabellis concinne lepideque texendis,
Mirus Artifex,
Neminem habuit parem.
Hæc liberalis animi oblectamenta,
Quam nullo illi labore constiterint,
Facile ij perspexere, quibus usus est amici;
Apud quos urbanitatum & leporum plenus
Cum ad rem, quæcunque forte incidereit,
Apte varie copioseque alluderet,
Interca nihil quæsitum, nihil vi expressum,
Videbatur,
Sed omnia ulro effluere,
Et quasi jugi è fonte affatim exuberare.
Ita suos tandem dubios reliquit,
Essetne in scriptis Poeta elegantior,
An in convictu comes jucundior.

[AA] History of his own Time.] This is said in the title page, to be revised and signed by himself; and copied fair for the press by Mr Adrian Drift, his executor; and has this motto underneath 'I had rather be thought a good Englishman, than the best Poet, or greatest Scholar, that ever wrote. Matt. Prior.' It is printed for the editor, J. Bancks; who, in the dedication to Lord Oxford, assures his Lordship, that the chief materials are entirely Mr Prior's; and in the preface, he gives the following account of the manuscripts. First, we find in his Will, this paragraph. "All my manuscripts, negotiations, commissions, and all papers whatsoever, whether of my public employments, or private studies; I leave to my Lord Harley, and Mr Adrian Drift, my Executors, or either of them; having first burned such, as may not be proper for any future inspection." Pursuant to this clause, the originals devolved to Mr Adrian Drift who had before transcribed most of them for the press, by Mr Prior's own direction; and as corrected by himself. The same gentleman copied them for the Earl of Oxford (56). He then gave them to a most intimate friend (57), soon after the decease of Mr Prior, with a strict injunction not to publish them, 'till after the death of him, the said Mr Drift, which happened in 1738.—After the death of the late Charles Foreman, Esq; (58), who had these manuscripts in his possession, and intended to publish them with all convenient expedition, they were delivered to me; and I have endeavoured, with all faithfulness, to execute the part which that gentleman had taken on him.' Notwithstanding all this parade, upon the perusal, very little of Mr Prior's writing will be found in this piece.

(56) His co-executor, appointed with this encomium, 'as the justest and kindest man I shall leave behind me in the world.'

(57) Ch. Foreman, Esq; well known by his political writings.

(58) He died April 28, 1739, and was buried at St Dunstan's church in Fleetstreet, London.

PURCHAS [SAMUEL], a learned English Divine in the XVIIth century, and compiler of the very valuable Collection of Voyages which bears his name; was born at Thaxtstead in Essex (a), in the year 1577 (b). He had his education at Cambridge, and very probably in St John's college, where one — Purchas is recorded to have taken his Master of Arts degree in 1600 (c). On the 24th of August 1604, he was instituted to the Vicarage of East-wood in his native county of Essex, at the King's presentation (d). But leaving that cure to his brother, he went and lived in London; the better to carry on the great work he had undertaken. He published the first volume of it in 1613 [A], and the four last in 1625. On the 11th of July 1615, he was incorporated

(c) From the University Registers. See also Dedication of the Third Part of his Pilgrimes.

(d) Newcourt's Repertorium, Vol. II. p. 241.

[A] He published the first volume of it in 1613. The title of it is, 'Purchas his Pilgrimage, or Relations of the World and the Religions observed in all Ages and Places discovered, from the Creation unto this present. In four Parts. The first containeth a Theological and Geographical Historie of Asia, Africa, and America, with the Islands adjacent. Declaring the ancient Religions before the Flood, the Heathenish, Jewish, and Saracenicall in all Ages since, in those parts professed, with their severall Opinions, Idols, Oracles, Temples, Priests, Fasts, Feasts, Sacrifices, and Rites religious: Their Beginnings, Proceedings, Alterations, Sects, Orders, and Successions. With briefe descriptions of the Countries, Nations, States, Discoveries; Private and publike Customes, and the most remarkable rarities of Nature, or Humane industrie in the same.' The first edition of this first Volume, as I have said above, was published in 1613, the second in 1614 and the third (much enlarged with Additions through the whole worke) in 1617. folio.

As the fourth, and best, was in 1626: This last being adorned with the Maps of Mercator and Hondius. In the Dedication to Archbishop Abbot, he observes, that, 'Great is this burthen of a two-fold World, and requires both an Atlas and an Hercules too, to undergoe it. The newnesse also (adds he) makes it more difficult, being an enterprize never yet (to my knowledge) by any, in any Language, attempted; conjoyning thus Antiquitie and Moderne Historie, in the observations of all the rarities of the World, and especially of that Soule of the World, Religion. Yet have I adventured, and (I speake it not to boast, but to excuse my selfe, in so haughtie designes) this my first Voyage of Discoverie, besides mine owne pore stocke laide thereon, hath made mee indebted to above twelve hundred Authours, of one or other kinde, in I know not how many hundredths of their Treatises, Epistles, Relations and Histories, of divers Subjectes and Languages, borrowed by my selfe; besides what (for want of the

(a) Wood, Fasti, edit. 1721. Vol. I, col. 200.

(b) Samuel Purcase the son of George Purcase was baptiz'd Nov. 20, 1577. Thaxtstead Register, b.

(c) Wood, Fashi, as above.

(f) The time of his collation is not expressed in the Bishop's Epitaphy. But his predecessor dyed in November, 1614. See Newcourt's Repertorium, Vol. I. p.

(g) See the end of the Dedication of his Pilgrimage, or Vol. I. to that Archbishop.

(h) Wood, Fashi, as above.

(i) For he mentions, in his Preface, the daily cares of his Family.

incorporated at Oxford, Bachelor of Divinity, as he stood at Cambridge (e). And, in November before, as is very probable, had been collated by John King, Bishop of London to the Rectory of St Martin's Ludgate, in London (f) [B]. He was also Chaplain to George Abbot, Archbishop of Canterbury (g). But he doth not seem to have been further rewarded, or considered by his superiours, except by King Charles I. that gave him the promise of a Deanery; which he did not live to enjoy. By the publishing of his books [C], he brought himself into debt; however, he did not dye in prison, as some have said, but in his own house, about the year 1628; aged fifty-one (h). He was a married man (i); and it was probably a son of his that was presented to the Rectory of Sutton in Essex, in the year 1629 (k). His Pilgrimages, and the learned R. Hakluyt's Voyages, have led the way to all other collections of that kind, made since; and have been highly valued, and esteemed: of which, the great price they bear, is a certain evidence. A very good judge (l) applauds their books (among others) as 'a very commendable Design: and says, their works are like to be always useful.' But the greatest character is given of Mr Purchas by a learned foreigner (m); who styles him a man exquisitely well skilled in Languages [D], and all Arts divine and human; a very great Philosopher, Historian, and Divine; a faithful Presbyter of the Church of England; very famous especially for his vast volumes of the East and West-Indies, written in his native tongue.

(k) Newcourt, Vol. II. p. 567.

(l) The author of an Introduction to Several Voyages to the South and North, viz. Narborough's, &c. edit. 1694. 8vo. p. 5.

(m) In Bibliotheca Joh. Bosfordi.

'Authors themselves) I have taken upon trust, of other mens goods in their hands.'—In the Preface he acquaints his Reader, that 'Being, he knows not by what naturall inclination, added to the studie of historie, his heart would sometimes object a self-love, in following his private delights in that kinde. At last, says he, I resolved to turne the pleasures of my studies into studious paines, that others might againe, by delightfull studie, turne my paines into their pleasure. I heere bring Religion from Paradise to the Arke, and thence follow her round about the world, and (for her sake) observe the world it selfe, with the severall Countries and Peoples therein; the chief Empires and States: &c'—
The remaining part of the Work is divided into Four Volumes, or Parts; the general title to which, upon a copper-plate, is thus. 'Hakluytus Posthumus or Purchas his Pilgrimes. Contayning a History of the World, in Sea voyages, and lande Travells, by Englishmen and others.* Wherein God's wonders in Nature and Providence, The Actes, Arts, Varieties, and Vanities of Men, with a world of the Worlds Rarities, are by a world of eywitnesse-Authors, related to the world.* Some left written by Mr Hakluyt at his death More since added, His also perused, and perfected. All examiaced, abreviated, Illustrated with Notes, enlarged with Discourses, Adorned with Pictures, and expressed in Mapps. In fower Parts, Each containing five Bookes.' At the bottom, is his picture in a little oval, (Ætat. 48. 1625.) whereby he appears to have been a comely Man, and of a sweet countenance.

But to give a more extensive view of this great and laborious work: Part I, contains the Voyages and Peregrinations made by ancient Kings, Patriarkes, Apostles, Philosophers, and others, to and thorow the remoter parts of the knowne World: Enquiries also of Languages and Religions, especially of the moderne diversified Professions of Christianitie. A Description of all the Circum-Navigations of the Globe. Navigations and Voyages of English-men, along the coasts of Africa, to the Cape of Good Hope, and from thence to the Red Sea, &c. English Voyages beyond the East-Indies, to Japan, China, Cauchin china, the Philippine-islands, &c. The English Affairs with the Great Samorine*, in the Persian and Arabian Gulfes, and in other places of the Continent, and Islands of and beyond the Indies: the Portugall Attempts, and Dutch Disasters, &c. Part II, Navigations, Voyages, and Land-Discoveries, with other Historically Relations of Africa; and of the Sea-coasts and in-land regions of Æthiopia, by Englishmen and others. Peregrinations and Travels by land in Palestine, Natolia, Syria, Arabia, Persia, and other parts of Asia. Discoveries by land, of Assyria, Armenia, Persia, India, Arabia, and other in-land countries of Asia, by Englishmen and others. Part III, Peregrinations and Discoveries in the remotest North and East parts of Asia, called Tartaria, and China; and of Europe, as Russia, &c. by Englishmen and others. Voyages and Discoveries in the North parts of the World, by land and sea, in Asia, Europe, the Polar Regions, and in the North-west of America. Relations of Greeland, Groenland, the North-west passage, and other Arctike regions. Voyages and Travels to and in the New World, called America: Relations of their Pagan Antiquities and of the Regions and Plantations in the North and South parts thereof, and of the Seas and Islands adjacent. Near the end of this Volume, he gives the Book of the Indians with Mexican hieroglyphics, or pictures, cut in wood, which Mr Hakluyt, chaplain to the English embassador in France, bought for twenty crowns. Part IV, Voyages to the East, West, and South parts of America: Many sea and land fights, invasions and victories against the Spaniards in those parts, and the Spanish Islands; Plantations in Guiana, and adventures of English-men amongst the Americans. Voyages to and about the Southern America. Voyages to and land-travels in Florida, Virginia, and other parts of the Northerne America. French plantings, Spanish supplantings; English Virginian Voyages, and to the Islands Azores. English Plantations, Discoveries, Acts, and Occurrents, in Virginia and Summer-Islands, since the yeere 1606, till 1624. English Discoveries and Plantations in New-England, Newfoundland; with the Patent and Voyages to New Scotland: Relations also of the Fleets set forth by Queen Elizabeth against the Spaniards.—The vast charge attending this voluminous work, hath occasioned its being never reprinted. But large Extracts, or Fragments, of it, have been inserted in the Subsequent Collections of Voyages, by Dr John Harris, and others.

[B] The Rectory of St Martin's Ludgate in London. That preferment 'afforded him the opportunities of bookes, conference and manifold intelligence: And, as the Benefice was not of the worst, so was it the best seated in the world, to his Content;' as he thankfully acknowledges, in the additional Preface to the third Edition of the first Volume of his Pilgrimage.

[C] By the publishing of his Books Besides his large Work abovementioned, he published, 1. Purchas his Pilgrim. Microcosmos or the Historie of Man, &c. Meditated on the words of David, Psalm 39. 5. being a Funeral Sermon. Lond. 1619, 8vo. 3. The King's Tower, and triumphant Arch of London. Lond. 1623. 8vo. (1).

[D] A man exquisitely well skilled in Languages, &c. The words of the Original, are, 'Samuel Purchas, Anglus, Linguarum et Artium divinarum atque humanarum egregie peritus, Philosophus, Historicus, & Theologus maximus; patrie Ecclesie antiles fidelis; multis egregiis Scriptis, & in primis orientalis, occidentalisque Indiae vastis Voluminibus, patriâ linguâ conscriptis, celeberrimus.' C

(1) Wood, Fashi, ubi supra.

* Mezol.

Q.

QUARLES [FRANCIS], an English poet in the XVIIth century, whose compositions are chiefly of the pious and moral kind, was the son of James Quarles, Esq; [A] Clerk of the Green-Cloth, and Purveyor of the Navy to Queen Elizabeth. He was born at Stewards near Romford in Essex, in the year 1592, and educated at Christ's-college in Cambridge, and Lincoln's-inn, London. Afterwards he was preferred to the place of Cup bearer to Elizabeth daughter of King James I. Electress Palatine and Queen of Bohemia (a). He quitted her service, very probably upon the ruin of her husband's affairs, and went over into Ireland, where he became Secretary to the most learned Archbishop Usher. Upon the breaking out of the Rebellion in that kingdom, in 1641, he suffered greatly in his fortune, and was obliged to fly for safety to England. But here he did not meet with the Quiet he expected. For, a piece of his, styled the Loyal Convert, having given offence to the prevailing powers, they took occasion from that; and from his repairing to King Charles I. at Oxford; to hurt him as much as they could in his estates (b). But we are told, that what he took most to heart, was his being plundered of his books, and some rare Manuscripts which he intended for the press; the loss of which, as it is thought, hastened his death (c). The several things he published are mentioned below [B]. Besides his other employments he was Chronologer to the city of London. He dyed September the 8th 1644, in the 52d year

(a) Memoires, &c. by Da. Lloyd, fol. Lond. 1668, p. 621.

(b) Ibid. and Fuller's Worthies, in Essex, p. 334. and Langbain's Lives and Characters of the English Dramatick Poets, edit. 1699. p. 114.

(c) Lives of the English Poets by W. Winstanley, edit. 1687, 8vo. p. 157, 158.

[A] Was the Son of James Quarles, Esq; The Quarles family was formerly of some consideration in the County of Essex, and possessed of several estates in Romford, Hornchurch, Dagenham, &c. particularly those named Stewards, Pinchbacke's, Heathcock's, Crowland Soelling, Dovers Rydon, Shepcotts hawe in Colly row, Oldberries, Potters roses, Heards, Edwalls hatchees, &c. And in Stansford-rivers, they had lands called Stewards:—In Rawreth, some named Raymond.——They had also estates in Great and Little Hadham in Hertfordshire. As namely, Nockholls, Oldhall, Huntewood, &c.——James Quarles, Esq; dyed Sept. 21 1599. and was succeeded in his estates by his eldest Son Robert, then aged upwards of eighteen (1): who was afterwards knighted. Another of his Sons was FRANCIS, who is the Subject of this article.

[B] The several things he published, &c. They were as follows. 1. A Feast for wormes, in a poeme of the History of Jonah. Lond. 1620. 4to. 2. Pen-talogia, or the Quintessence of Meditation. 3. Haddassa, or the History of Esther. Lond. 1621. 4. Job militant, with Meditations divine and morall. Lond. 1624. 4to. 5. Argalus and Parthenia. A romance. Lond. 1631. 4to. 6. History of Sampson in verse. Lond. 1631. 4to. 7. Emblemes, with cuts. Lond. 1635. 8vo. 8. Anniversaries upon his Panarete. 9. Enchiridion of Meditations divine and morall. Lond. 1654. 10. The loyal Convert. 11. The Virgin Widow, a Comedy. Lond. 1649. 4to. Besides Sion's Songs, and Sion's Elegies, Epigrams, Shepherds Oracles, Hieroglyphicks, &c.——For a specimen of his Sentiments and his Poetry, we shall lay the following Lines of his before the Reader.

Man's Body's like a house, his greater Bones
Are the main Timber, and the lesser ones
Are smaller splints; his ribs are laths daub'd or'e,
Plaitred with flesh and blood: his mouth's the door,

His throat's the narrow entry, and his heart
Is the great Chamber, full of curious art:
His midriff is a large Partition-wall
'Twixt the great Chamber, and the spacious Hall:
His stomach is the Kitchin, where the meat
Is often but half sod for want of heat:
His spleen's a vessel Nature doth allot
To take the Skum that rises from the Pot:
His lungs are like the bellows, that respire
In every Office, quickning every fire:
His Nose the Chimney is, whereby are vended
Such fumes as with the bellows are augmented:
His bowels are the sink, whose parts do drain
All noisom filth, and keep the Kitchin clean:
His eyes are Chrystal windows, clear and bright;
Let in the object and let out the sight.
And as the Timber is, or great, or small,
Or strong, or weak, 'tis apt to stand or fall:
Yet is the likeliest Building sometimes known
To fall by obvious chances; overthrow'n
Of times by tempests by the full mouth'd blasts
Of Heaven; sometimes by fire; sometimes it waits
Through unadvis'd neglect: put case the stuff
Were ruin proof, by nature strong enough
To conquer time, and age; put case it should Ne're know an end, alas our Leases would;
What hast thou then, proud flesh and blood, to boast;
Thy daies are evil, at best; but few, at most;
But sad, at merriest; and but weak, at strongest;
Unsure, at surest; and but short, at longest.

[C] Whercof

(1) Inquis. post mort. 31 Julii, 42 Elizab.

(d) Lloyd, and Langbain, as above. See also The British Theatre, edit. 1752, 8vo. p. 60.

(e) Lloyd, ubi supra.

year of his age, and was buried in the church of St Vedast Foster-lane, London (d). By one wife he had eighteen children (e); whereof one named John was also a Poet [C]. Our author, in the judgment of Dr Fuller (f), was a most excellent poet, and had a mind byassed to devotion [D]. D. Lloyd adds (g), that his pious Books by the fancy take the heart; having taught Poetry to be witty, without profaneness, wantonness, or being satyrical, that is, without the Poet's abusing God, himself, or his neighbor. And his good master Archbishop Usher styles him, a man of some fame among the English for his sacred Poetry (h).

(f) Worthies, as above.

(g) Memoires, &c. as above.

(h) Vir ob facratorem Poësin apud Anglos suos non incelebris, Epist. G. Vossio. Letters at the end of Archbishop Usher's Life by Parr, p. 484.

[C] Whereof one named John was also a Poet. He was born in Essex in 1624; admitted into Exeter-college in 1642; bore arms for King Charles I. within the garrison at Oxford, and was afterwards a Captain in one of the royal armies: But, upon the declining of his Majesty's cause, he retired to London in a mean condition; and afterwards travelled beyond the Seas. He dyed of the plague at London, in 1665. The chief of what he published, was, Regale lectum miseris: or the English Bed of Misery. Lond. 1649. 8vo. Elegy upon that never to be forgotten Charles I. late (but too soon martyr'd) King of England. Elegy and Epitaph on Arthur Lord Capell, beheaded March 9. 1648. A Curse against the enemies of Peace. His farewell to England. All printed together.——Fons lacrymarum: or, a Fountain of Tears; from whence doth flow England's complaint. Jeremiah's Lamentations paraphrased. Elegy upon that Son of valour, Sir Charles Lucas. These three were also printed together.——Triumphant Chastity; or Joseph's Self-conflict, when by his Mistress he was enticed to adultery. Lond. 1683. 8vo. Continuation of the History of Argalus and Parthenia, Lond. 1659. 12mo. Divine Meditations, &c. Lond. 1659. 8vo. (2).

(2) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. II. col. 355.

[D] Was a most excellent poet, and had a mind byassed to devotion. Fuller says further of him, by way of Character, that 'Had he been contemporary with Plato (that great back-friend to Poets), he would not onely have allowed him to live, but advanced him to an office in his Common-wealth. Some Poets, if debarr'd profaneness, wantonness and Satyricalness, (that they may neither abuse God, themselves, nor their neighbours) have their tongues cut out in effect. Others onely trade in wit at the second hand, being all for translations, nothing for invention. Our Quarles was free from the faults of the first, as if he had drank of Jordan instead of Helicon, and slept on Mount Olivet for his Parnassus, and was happy in his own invention. His visible Poetry (I mean his Emblems) is excellent, catching therein the eye and fancy at one draught, so that he hath out-Alciated therein, in some mens judgment. His Verses on Job are done to the life, so that the reader may see his forces, and through them the anguish of his Soul. According to the advice of Saint Hierome, Verba vertebat in opera, and practiced the job he had described.' C

R.

RADCLIFFE [JOHN], an eminent Physician, and founder of the Radclivian Library at Oxford, was son of George Radcliffe, by Sarah, daughter of Mr Louder a person of a considerable fortune; he was born at Wakefield in Yorkshire in the year 1650; near which place his father was possessed of a moderate estate, and having a numerous family, did not think it prudent, on account of the expence, to breed his children to letters; but some of the neighbouring gentry and clergy perceiving a towardsly disposition in the youth, prevailed with him to send this son to school at Wakefield. The boy having a prompt wit, readily conquered this part of his education; and, at fifteen years of age, for the completion of it, was removed to Oxford, where he was entered into Univerſity-college in 1665 (a), with the hopes, in due time, of procuring a Fellowship for him in that society (b). In 1669 he took his first degree, and was chosen soon after Senior-Scholar of his college; but no Fellowship falling vacant for some time, he offered himself a candidate to the like preferment at Lincoln-college; where having succeeded, he quitted his former society, though with grateful resentments of the favours he had received there. He was now capacitated, by the increase of his stipend and the indulgence of his mother, who was become a widow, and enlarged his allowance, to pursue his inclination in the study of Physick, and run through the necessary courses of Botany, Chymistry, and Anatomy. In all which, by the help of most excellent parts, he quickly made a very great progress. The next degree he had to take, was that of Master of Arts, to which he proceeded on the fourth of June, 1672; having performed the preparatory exercises with uncommon applause. After this, in pursuance of the academical statutes, he immediately enrolled his name upon the Physic-line. We must not omit to observe, that our Academician had recommended himself to the favour of his friends, more by his ready wit and vivacity than any distinguished acquisitions in book-learning. He had no turn to a contemplative life. It was his sociable talents that made him the delight of his companions: And the most eminent scholars in the university were fond of his conversation. He had very few books of any kind [A]; and in the prosecution of Physic rarely looked farther than to the pieces of Dr Willis, who had lately left that university with a very extraordinary character; and was then practising in London with a reputation and success above any of the faculty. On the first of July, 1675, Mr Radcliffe proceeded Bachelor of Physic (c). As this degree gave him a full title to practise in the university, he did not neglect to make use of his privilege, and immediately put himself into the world. He set out in a method of practice suitable to that he had pursued in the study of this art; paying little regard to the rules then universally followed, which he even did not spare to censure with freedom and acrimony. This unusual boldness, as it was natural to expect, drew all the old practitioners upon him. Dr Lydal, who at that juncture had the greatest part of the business at Oxford, set two of the most eminent Apothecaries there to challenge his method, as running riot against both Hippocrates and Galen; who where, even by the statutes of the university, received for the Fathers and Founders of Physic. Mr Luff likewise, afterwards Doctor and Regius Professor of Physic to the university, and Mr, afterwards Dr, Gibbons, did all that lay in their power to circumvent him with his patients, and depreciate his character; the first maintaining, that the cures he performed were only guess-work; and the other, who was an accurate Grecian, observing, that it was a great pity his friends had not made a scholar of him. This last sarcasm was taken notice of by Mr Radcliffe; who, in return, set the nick-name of Nurse upon the author of it (d); which was so unluckily applied, that all the advantage of his learning was lost in it. In the

(a) See some Memoirs of the Life of John Radcliffe, printed at London, 1715, in 8vo. p. 4.

(b) Several of his name and family had been bred at this college. One Jonas Radcliffe was tutor to the famous Abraham Woodhead, who afterwards travelled into France, with Thomas, son of Sir George Radcliffe, a Gentleman-Commoner of the same college. Wood's Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 613.

(c) Ibid. Fasti, col. 198.

(d) Memoirs of his Life, ubi supra, p. 7, 8.

[A] He had few books of any kind.] So few indeed, that Dr Ralph Batemurth, then head of Trinity-college, (a gentleman greatly distinguished, both for his reading and ingenuity) who kept him company for the sake of the smartness of his conversation; asked him, in a surprize, Where was his Study? Upon which Mr Radcliffe, pointing to a few phials, a skeleton, and an herbal; answered, Sir, this is Radcliffe's library (1).

(1) See his Memoirs, &c. p. 6.

the mean time, our young Physician's prescriptions were attended with so great success, that the two Apothecaries, Foulks and Adams, thought proper to make interest to get his name upon their files in the first year of his practice. The small-pox then raging in and about Oxford, he applied the cool regimen with a very good judgment; but the remarkable cure of the Lady Spencer set him above the reach of all his competitors [B]. Her Ladyship's alliance to several noble families on her own side, and many more on the part of her husband, Sir Thomas Spencer, brought him into great esteem with the Northampton, Sunderland, Carnarvon, and Abingdon houses. In a word, his reputation increased with his experience, as his wealth grew greater and greater by the extent of his practice; and he had not been two years Bachelor of Physic, when there was scarce any family of credit, that did not think themselves beholden to him for the preservation of one or more lives in it. About this time Dr Marshal, Rector of Lincoln-college, did him an ill office, which proved a great detriment to that society; Mr Radcliffe (as his manner was) had been a little too lavish of his wit upon the Doctor's genius and skill in the Northern languages as well as his conduct; and now the Governor took a severe revenge (e), by opposing his application for a Faculty-place in the college; this would have been a dispensation from taking Holy Orders, which was insisted on he should do, as the statutes required, if he kept his Fellowship. Such a step was inconsistent with the profession to which he was already become so great an ornament, and by which he had it in his power to be one day (as he would most assuredly have been) a great benefactor to that house. And, therefore, he chose rather to fling up his Fellowship, than not to go on in that faculty, where he had made so great a progress. After his resignation, which was in the year 1677, he was desirous of keeping his old chambers, and residing in them as a Commoner; but meeting with some ungentle usage on that account also from Dr Marshal, he thought fit to leave that then inhospitable society, and to reside elsewhere in the university; there to continue, 'till he should be of standing to take his Doctor's degree, and have an opportunity of enlarging the sphere of his practice upon the demise of any of the most noted Physicians at London. On the 5th of July 1682, he went out Doctor and Grand Compounder [C]; but continued two years longer at Oxford, growing equally in wealth and fame. Notwithstanding the Doctor was very free in ridiculing a kind of literature which he judged entirely useless in regard to the method of healing diseases, and was qualified, by the vivacity of his wit, to give that peculiar sagacity in discerning the nature and degree of his patients ailments, it's whole lustre, and make it dazzle and confound his rivals; yet he was a fair and honourable practitioner, had a perfect contempt for all mean and low artifices to wriggle himself into business; and made it his constant rule to discountenance and explode all quacks and interlopers in the art. Particularly he rooted out the pernicious tribe of Urinal Casters [D], with which the nation swarmed at that time. In 1684, having, by his practice in Oxford and the neighbouring

(e) Dr Marshal was an Antiquary; and, though eminent in that way, yet we are told, upon good grounds, that the rules of civility are not to be learned from an Antiquary. Introduction to Vol. II. of Wood's Athen. Oxon. parag. ult.

[B] The remarkable cure of Lady Spencer, set him above all his competitors.] This lady was then at Yarnton, four miles off Oxford; the seat of her husband, Sir Thomas Spencer. She had been under Dr Lydal's, and Mr Mufgrave's (2) hands, for some time, without any remedy from their prescriptions; and without hopes of recovery, from a complication of distempers; 'till Mr Dormer, who had married her Ladyship's daughter, put her in mind of Mr Radcliffe's success, and obtained of her to send for him; which being done, his directions very happily set her upon her legs again, in three weeks time, after she had been in a languishing condition more than so many years; and restored a decayed constitution in such a manner, to it's wonted vigour, that she lived to a very great age; and to see her grandchildren's children (3).

(2) This gentleman had taken no degree in Physick at this time, though he did afterwards, and was Secretary to the Royal Society one year, viz. 1684. Wood's Athen. Oxon. col. 995.

(3) Radcliffe's Memoirs, p. 9.

[C] He went out Doctor, and Grand Compounder.] Mr Wood (who in his Fasti, at the end of his second volume, p. 122.) has registered this time of his taking his Doctor's Degree, takes no notice of his going out Grand Compounder; an undoubted fact, well known to many in the University, and often mentioned when I was there, in 1715. The reason of it's being more particularly the subject of conversation, at that time, presently after his death, and large benefaction to the University, was this: Since hence it appeared, beyond contradiction, that his family was not so mean and despicable, as had been represented by his adversaries; a report, that took it's rise from his father's entering him in the college a Battler, which is the lowest gown in the university. But this step was an unanswerable argument, that his paternal estate was much larger than had been asserted; for no person is required to go out Grand Compounder, that has not 40l. per annum in land: the Doctor therefore must be possessed of an estate, at least of that value, by right of inheritance; for at that time he had made no purchase, tho' he had acquired, abundantly enough to bear the expence of his composition, which amounts not to less than the sum of 100 pounds. This attack upon the meanness of the Doctor's parentage, received something like a sanction from the office of Heraldry; from which, at the time of his funeral, the Vice-Chancellor received a letter, admonishing the university not to erect over, or upon, his monument, any effigie charged with the arms of the Derwentwater family, notwithstanding he had always bore those arms, as a descendant from the Radcliffes of Dillston, viz. a Bend in a greile sable, Field Argent, upon his chariot during his life, without any animadversion from that college. And the unfortunate Earl of that name, constantly acknowledged him as a kinsman.

[D] He made it his business to explode the tribe of Urinal Casters.] These piss-pot prophets, had wormed the country out of many a sweet penny; and crowds of men and women went daily to them, with phials, bottles, &c. for a definitive sentence in their husbands, wives, and childrens cases. Amongst the rest, to whom should one of these credulous women come, with an urinal in her hand, but to Dr Radcliffe: the good woman dropt a curf, told him she had heard of his great fame at Stanton, (a few miles from Oxford) and that she made bold to bring him a fee; by which she hoped his worship would be prevailed with, to tell her the distemper her husband lay sick of, and to prescribe proper remedies for his relief. Where is he? cries the Doctor; Sick in bed, four miles off, replied the petitioner; and that's his water, no doubt? cries the querist; yes, an't please your worship, the answerer replies: and being asked what was his trade? says, that of a Shoe-maker: Very well, mistress, cries the examinant; and taking the urinal empties it in his chamber-pot, and then filling it with his own water, dismisses her in these terms: Take this with you home to your husband; and if he will undertake to sit me with a pair of boots, by the sight of my water; I will make no question of prescribing for his distemper, by the sight of his (4).

(4) Ibid. p. 12, 13.

[E] He

neighbouring counties, acquired great riches, he came to London, and settling in Bow-street, Covent-Garden, was extremely followed for his advice, which brought him into great request among the best quality, and at Court likewise. Dr Radcliffe had then the opportunity of coming to town, when Dr Lower's interest began to decline amongst the chief of the nobility (f), by his espousing (as they were then called) whig principles, upon which account he grew daily more and more out of repute; there was nobody but Dr Thomas Short, a Roman-Catholick, to contend with; who, indeed, carried the bell on account of his religion, which, it is well known, then most prevailed for that and some following years; but he dying in the latter end of September 1685, most of his practice devolved upon our Doctor. Dr Whittler, indeed, and some others, as Sir Edmund King, &c. came in for their share of patients in other parts of the town; yet, though one was Principal Physician to the King, and the other in great esteem with some of the wealthiest Merchants in the city, there was scarce any case worthy of a consultation but Dr Radcliffe was called to it; so that he had not been in town a year, when he got more than twenty guineas per diem, as his Apothecary Mr Dandridge, who himself died worth 50,000*l.* by his means, has often averred. His conversation at this time was held in as much repute as his advice; and what with his pleasantry of discourse, and readiness of wit in making replies to any sort of questions, he was a diverting companion to the last degree. Infomuch that he was very often sent for, and presented with fees for pretended ailments, only for the gratification to hear him talk. However, that was too delicate a point always to hit, nor was he constantly in the humour to see this kind of address to him in the most agreeable light; and wherever he conceived himself made use of only as a buffoon, he neither wanted sense nor courage to resent it [E]. In 1686 Her Royal Highness the Princess Anne of Denmark was pleased to make the Doctor her Principal Physician (g), in which station he continued 'till towards the latter end of King William's reign, as will be more particularly mentioned in the sequel. In 1687 wealth continuing to flow upon him with very plentiful streams, he began to cast an eye upon the fountain from whence it was derived. The society of University-college was at that time governed by Mr Obediah Walker, a gentleman in every other respect worthy of honour and esteem, had he not unfortunately complied with the religion of the unhappy Prince then reigning: however, this did not hinder the Doctor from testifying his gratitude to that college [F], where he had received the best part of his education. In 1688, some-time before the Bishops were sent to the Tower, and matters were carrying on towards the introduction of Popery by less violent means; Father Saunders, one of the Court-chaplains, and another Dominican, had it in command from the King to use what solicitations should be thought needful to bring him over to their communion; and these proving fruitless, his fellow-collegian Mr Walker, just mentioned, had orders from above to write to him. One of these letters, which seems to be the last that was sent him on the subject of religion, we shall insert with the Doctor's answer in the notes [G]. When Prince George of Denmark

(f) In this practice he succeeded Dr Willis. See that doctor's article.

(g) See Boyer's Life of Queen Anne, under that year.

[E] He wanted neither wit nor courage to resent it. A person of quality who had very much befriended him, in many remarkable instances; but in none more than interesting himself, in advancing the Doctor's credit, among persons of the first rank; took it into his head, to fancy himself extremely out of order, when nothing at all ailed him. Whereupon message, after message, was sent for his physician in ordinary; but no answer returned; only, that his Lordship did not know when he was well, for he was in perfect health, if he would but think himself so. At last, for fear of carrying the jest too far, and of entirely disobliging him, he came; and asked the Nobleman where his pain lay? who, after much hesitation, and various pointings to this and that part of his body; said, he had a strange singing in his head. If it be so, cried the Doctor, I can prescribe to your Lordship no other remedy, than that of wiping your a— with a ballad: which coarse jest, perfectly cured his Lordship's malady (5).

(5) Ibid. p. 14.

[F] Did not hinder him from testifying his gratitude to that [University] College. He caused the east window, over the altar, to be put up at his own proper charges. It is esteemed a beautiful piece, representing the nativity of our Saviour, painted upon glass; and appears to be his gift, by the following inscription under it. D. D. Johani Radcliffe, M. D. Hujus Collegii quondam Socius, Anno Domini, MDCLXXXVII (6). He is called Socius, not that he was really a Fellow, but being senior scholar had the same privileges, though not an equal revenue to the Fellows.

(6) I have often seen it.

[G] One of these letters, with his answer to it, we shall insert in the notes ] The letter, is as follows.

University-College, May 22. 1688.

Worthy Sir,
Were it possible for me to bring you to a true sense of your unhappy condition, in pinning your faith upon a few modern authorities of no credit; I should grudge no pains of producing more and more instances, which the inspired writers, and the Fathers of the Church, abound with. But since a man of your excellent parts, and great knowledge in things that concern the health of the body, that is only to endure for a moment, thinks it of less weight to consult the welfare of your soul, whose pains and whose pleasures must be equally everlasting; give me leave to tell you, from a heart full of grief, for your unwillingness to be convicted, that I have left nothing unattempted to absolve mine, in relation to the argument you are so willing to drop the pursuit of. You bid me read Dr Tillotson, upon the Real Presence, with his answer to Mr Serjeant's rule of faith; I have done both, with the greatest impartiality, and find no other impression from them, than what fixes me in the profession of that faith, which, I bless God, after so many years of adhering to a contrary persuasion, I have, through his great mercy, embraced. I have intreated you to do the same by authors, whose judgments have ever been had in remembrance, and whose determination must be infallible, from the holy Spirit that conducted them. And you send me word, the duties of your profession bend your studies another way; and that you have neither leisure nor inclination, to turn over pages that have no value in them, but their antiquity. This is indeed somewhat unkind, but the goodness you always receive me with, on every other occasion, and the regard you have shewn, and say you will farther shew to the foundation, which I have been thought fit, howsoever unworthy, to preside over, engages me to make you as little uneasy as possible. I shall therefore, pursuant to your desire, dismiss the matter, which I could willingly wish to hold longer in debate, on account of the reasons beforementioned: and since you seem ardently to desire a mutual correspondence, as to mark joined the Prince of Orange, and the Princess, his consort, retired to Nottingham, the Doctor was much pressed by the Bishop of London [Compton] to attend her there in the duties of his post, as Body-Physician to her Royal Highness, who was then big with child [of the Duke of Gloucester]. But the Doctor excused himself, on account of the multiplicity of his patients, whose dangerous condition required his constant attendance; not chusing (if we may believe the writer of his memoirs) (b) to declare himself in that ticklish state of public affairs. However, alterations in affairs of State made none in his practice; for though the famous Dr Bidloo came over with the new King as his Chief Physician, and it is customary for the Court to have a more than ordinary regard for one in that quality; yet patients increased upon his hands by the means of that very rival, who it was supposed would engross them. For Dr Bidloo, though otherwise an expert practitioner, yet was not so happy in his conjectures, in hitting upon the distemper as Dr Radcliffe, and often by mistaking the nature of an English constitution, subjected those that advised with him to the greatest hazards: by which, the reputation of the latter grew daily more and more prevailing, and got the start of all his competitors to such a degree, that even his Majesty's foreign attendants Mr Bentinck, afterwards Earl of Portland, and Mr Zulestein, Earl of Rochford, applied to him in cases of necessity, wherein he always displayed his skill to the greatest degree; the first being cured by him of a violent diarrhœa, that had brought that great favourite almost to the point of death; and the last, who was very corpulent, of a lethargy, which had been attempted by all other hands in vain. The restoration of two persons, so dear to the King, to their perfect health, could not but draw his Majesty's eye towards him, who, next under God, was the instrument of it; and that Prince, not only ordered him five hundred guineas out of the Privy-Purse, but made him an offer of being sworn one of his Majesty's Physicians, with a salary of 200*l.* per annum more than any other. Indeed the present was only accepted, and the post refused, because the Doctor very cautiously considered, that the settlement of the Crown was but then in it's infancy, and that accidents might intervene to disturb the security of it. Besides, as Body-Physician to other affairs, continue to oblige you in fulfilling every request you shall make to me. In the mean time be assured, that I shall be incessant in my prayers to the great God above, and to the blessed Virgin, for her intercession with the Lamb, that died for the sins of the world, that you may be enlightened, and see the things that belong to the peace of your immortal soul;

Who am,

in all respects,

worthy Sir,

your most obliged,

and most humble servant,

O. W A L K E R.

Doctor Radcliffe's answer, was in these terms.

Bow-street; Covent-garden, May 25. 1688.

Sir,

I should be in as unhappy a condition in this life, as you fear I shall be in the next, were I to be treated as a turncoat; and must tell you, that I can be serious no longer, while you endeavour to make me believe, what I am apt to think you give no credit to your self; Fathers and Councils, and antique authorities, may have their influence in their proper places; but I should any of them all, though covered with dust 1400 years ago, tell me, that the bottle I am now drinking with some of your acquaintance, is a wheelbarrow, and the glass in my hand, a salamander, I should ask leave to dissent from them.

You mistake my temper, in being of an opinion that I am otherwise biased, than the generality of mankind are. I had one of your new converts poems in my hands just now, you will know them to be Mr Dryden's, and on what account they are written, at first sight. Four of the best lines, and most à propos, run thus.

Many by education are misled,

So they believe, because they were so bred;

The priest continues, what the nurse began,

And thus the child imposes on the man.

You may be given to understand from thence, that having been bred up a Protestant at Wakefield, and sent from thence in that persuasion to Oxford; where, during my continuance, I had no relish for absurdities; I intend not to change principles, and turn Papist in London.

The advantages you propose to me, may be very great, for all that I know: God Almighty can do very much, and so can the King; but you will pardon me if I cease to speak like a physician for once, and with an air of gravity, am very apprehensive, that I may anger the one, in being too complaisant to the other. You cannot call this pinning my faith on any man's sleeve; those that know me, are too well apprized of a quite contrary tendency. As I never flattered a man myself, so it is my firm resolution, never to be wheedled out of my real sentiments; which are, that since it has been my good fortune to be educated, according to the usage of the Church of England, established by law; I shall never make myself so unhappy, as to shame my teachers and instructors, by departing from what I have imbibed from them.

Yet, though I shall never be brought over to confide in your doctrines, no one breathing, can have a greater esteem for your conversation, by letter, or word of mouth, than your most affectionate,

Sir,

and faithful servant,

JOHN RADCLIFFE (7).

(7) See his Memoirs, p. 17, & seq.

Nor did the Doctor, when the necessity of the times, in the succeeding Revolution, which followed this epistolary intercourse by the heels, prove otherwise than a constant friend and benefactor to Mr Walker (8). For though he could not be induced to adhere to his opinion in matters of religion, he would always abide by his determination in points of learning; and out of a generous sense of the difficulties Mr Walker laboured under, by his non-compliance to the government, from the time of his first coming to London, after the scene of affairs was changed in Oxford, gave him the allowance of a very handsome competency, to the day of his death; and contributed largely to his funeral expences.

(8) Mr Walker was interred in Pancras church-yard, where there is a monument with this inscription under, O. W. in a cypher, per bonam famam & per infamiam. See a large account of this person in Wood's Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 933; & seq.

Physician to the Princess of Denmark, whose service he was much more inclined to from the high esteem she had always entertained for him, he had a very competent allowance and stood in need of no addition to it, which would rather lessen the fees arising from his practice than increase them; since he was too well apprized of the good inclination the King bore him, not to imagine he would send for him upon all urgent occasions, and when he did, so reward him, that it would more than countervail a fixed salary. Nor was he out in his judgment, for his Majesty's infirm constitution had been from his childhood subject to disorders from a flux of rheum and an asthma, and the Doctor being particularly distinguished by his skill in the last distemper, was so very often called upon for his assistance, that we are assured he had been heard more than once to declare, that one year with another, for the first eleven years of that reign, he cleared more than six hundred guineas for his bare attendance on the King's person, exclusive of the great officers (i) [H]. Towards the latter end of 1689 the Doctor went to Badminton to the old Duke of Beaufort, who not closing with the Revolution, kept his residence altogether there. He staid a month with his Grace (for whom he had a particular friendship) and did not leave him 'till he had restored him, though given over by all the Physicians at Bath and elsewhere, to a perfect state of health. Upon his return to London he was again sent for to his Majesty (k), whom he found in a dangerous condition from his old distemper. Dr Bidloo, Dr Laurence, and the King's other Physicians had plyed him with aperitives to open his stomach, to give him the use of free breathing to little or no effect; so that his Majesty's cure was looked upon to be very hazardous without some other measures; when Dr Radcliffe, perceiving that the rheum dripping upon his lungs would be of fatal consequence to him if not otherwise diverted, ordered him a gentle salivation, that was repeated each morning; this, by keeping him spitting for the space of half a quarter of an hour, proved the means of preserving his life twelve years longer. In 1691 the young Prince, William, Duke of Gloucester, was taken violently ill at Sion-house (l), of fainting-fits, a distemper that had been fatal to most of their Royal Highnesses children, and his life was despaired of by all the Court-Physicians; Dr Radcliffe was at that time in attendance upon the Earl of Berkeley, at his house near Epsom, but being sent for by an express, he first desired the Queen and Princess, who would be both present, that they would rely solely upon him, without the intervention of any other prescriptions; which being granted, he restored his Highness to such a state of health, that he never had any thing like a deliquium from thence-forward to the day of his death. This unexpected cure of an infant not quite three years of age, had such an influence upon Queen Mary, who constantly visited the child, though there was some coldness between the two sisters at that time, that she ordered her Lord-Chamberlain, then Lord Villiers, afterwards Earl of Jersey, to present the happy instrument of it with a thousand guineas (m). Hitherto the Doctor, who had heaped up great wealth, seemed to have met with no unlucky disappointments, either in his practice or his other affairs; but in the year 1692 Fortune resolved to turn her back upon him, and to let him see that the most prosperous condition in life is to be chequered with some crosses. The Doctor, among other acquaintance, had contracted a familiarity with Betterton the famous tragedian; this gentleman, by the sollicitation of a friend, father to the wife of Mr Bowman another player, had deposited two thousand pounds as a venture in an interloper that was about to set sail for the East-Indies, and having a prospect of a very good return, communicated the affair to the Doctor, who, at his request, very readily laid down five thousand pounds. The ship was successful in the outward bound passage; but having, to avoid the French privateers in her return home, first put into Ireland, and then finding no convoy ready, set out for England without one, she was taken by the Marquis de Nesmond with all her rich cargo, which amounted to more than 120,000*l*. A loss that broke Mr Betterton's back (n); but tho' very considerable, did not much affect the Doctor; for when the news of this disaster was brought him, to the Bull-head tavern in Clare-market, where he was drinking with several persons of the first rank, who condoled with him on the occasion, he, with a smiling countenance and without baulking his glass, desired them

(i) Ibid. p. 25.(k) The Life of King William.(l) Memoirs of the Duchess of Marlborough, &c. p. 75.(m) Memoirs of Dr Radcliffe, p. 29.(n) The Life of Tho. Betterton, the celebrated Tragedian, p. 63.

to

[H] Exclusive of the great officers.] We must not omit, since it is part of the Doctor's history, to insert a diverting passage between Sir Godfrey Kneller and the Doctor, which, if at all, must have happened about this time. The Doctor's house, as has been observed before, was in Bow-street, Covent-Garden, whereunto belonged a very convenient garden, that was contiguous to another on the back of it, appertaining to Sir Godfrey, which was extremely curious and inviting; from the many exotic plants, and the variety of flowers and greens, with which it abounded. As the parting wall was in the Knight's tenement, the Doctor took the freedom, from his intimacy with him, to beg the favour of having a door made for an intercourse with both gardens; which might be used so, as should not be inconvenient to either family. Sir Godfrey, gentleman-like, very readily gave his consent. But the Doctor's servants, little heeding the terms of agreement, made such a havock amongst his hortulanary curiosities, that he found himself obliged to advertise their master of it, as he did, in a very handsome manner. Yet, notwithstanding this complaint, the grievance continued undressed, so that the Knight was under a necessity of letting the Doctor know, by one of his domesticks, that he should be obliged to brick up the door-way, in case of his complaints proving ineffectual. To this the Doctor, who was often in a choleric mood, and from the success of his practice, imagined every one under an obligation of bearing with him, returned for answer: that Sir Godfrey might even do what he thought fit, in relation to the door, so that he did but refrain from painting it. Hereupon the footman, after some hesitation in the delivery, and several commands from his master to give it him word for word, having told the message; Did my very good friend, Dr Radcliffe, say so? cry'd Sir Godfrey. Go you back, and after presenting my service to him, tell him, that I can take any thing from him but physic.

to go forward with the healths that were then in vogue; saying, he had no more to do but go up two hundred and fifty pair of stairs to make himself whole again. In the same year the Mastership of University-college being conferred upon Dr Arthur Charlet, then Fellow of Trinity-college. This gentleman, who was particularly known to Dr Radcliffe, and in the greatest confidence with him when at the university, omitted no opportunity of putting him in mind of the engagements he lay under, by the promises he made to his two predecessors. Nor was the Doctor backward in contributing such sums as he thought necessary to be given in his life-time; since it appears from the account of his disbursements, that he contributed more than 1100*l.* toward increasing exhibitions, &c. besides what he advanced for books and other necessaries. In 1693, the Doctor, who 'till then had shewn tokens of the greatest aversion to matrimony, by the solicitations of his friends was induced to think of altering his condition; and the daughter of a certain wealthy citizen was pitched upon for that end. The parents of the lady, who was about twenty-four years of age, and their only child, very readily accepted the offer, proposing to give fifteen thousand pounds down, and the residue of their estate after their decease. Accordingly, visits were made, and the match seemed to be as forward as he could wish; but Hymen had otherwise intended, for the father's book-keeper had forbidden the bans by a sort of illegal familiarity, which in process of time made the designed bride very sick, and discovered an amour, that could not be any longer concealed from such penetrating eyes as the Doctor's. Hereupon, though the detection of these unfair practices, which had very nigh made him father another man's child, revived in him that antipathy to woman-kind which he had laid aside for some time, yet he thought it advisable, without upbraiding his mistress with falsehood, to write a letter to the father as below [I]. Such a disappointment in his first amour rendered him unmalleable to all the influences of his friends, who were very urgent with him to enter upon another; he even grew to a degree of insensibility for the sex; and often declared, that he wished for an Act of Parliament, whereby nurses only should be entitled to prescribe to them [K]. In 1694, having consulted with Dr Charlet about

[I] To write a letter to the father, which is inserted below. Here is the letter.

Bow street; Covent-Garden, May 19. 1693.

'SIR,

'The honour of being allied to so good and wealthy a person, as Mr S——d, has pushed me upon a discovery that may be fatal to your quiet, and your daughter's reputation, if not timely prevented. Mrs Mary is a very deserving gentlewoman, but you must pardon me if I think her by no means fit to be my wife, since she is another man's already, or ought to be. In a word, she is no better, and no worse, than actually quick with child; which makes it necessary that she be disposed of to him, that has the best claim to her affections. No doubt but you have power enough over her, to bring her to confession, which is by no means the part of a Physician. As for my part, I shall wish you much joy of a new son-in-law, when known; since I am by no means qualified to be so near of kin. Hanging and marrying, I find, go by Destiny; and I might have been guilty of the first, had I not so narrowly escaped the last. My best services to your daughter, whom I can be of little use to as a Physician, and of much less in the quality of a suitor. Her best way is to advise with a midwife for her safe delivery, and the person who has conversed with her after the manner of women, for an humble servant. The daughter of so wealthy a gentleman, as Mr S——d, can never want a husband; therefore the sooner you bestow her, the better, that the young bans en-kelder may be born in wedlock, and have the right of inheritance to so large a patrimony. You will excuse me for being so very free with you; for though I cannot have the honour to be your son-in-law, I shall ever take a pride in being among the number of your friends.

'Who am,

'Sir,

'your most obedient servant,

'JOHN RADCLIFFE.'

We shall just stay to take notice, that this letter had it's due weight with the father; who, though forely against the grain, chose rather to get the amorous couple instantly married, at the Fleet-chapel, than to abandon his daughter to shame and misery. Nor did the result of these conjugal rites, otherwise than fully answer the old man's best wishes; who had the satisfaction before his decease to see the book-keeper, to whom he had made over his business, in a very thriving way; having increased 5000 pounds, which he gave him with his daughter, to more than 30000; and being father of a numerous and beautiful issue, to participate an estate valued at 100000 pounds, which he left amongst them at his decease (9).

[K] He wished for an Act of Parliament, whereby nurses only should be entitled to prescribe to them ] This aversion in him to the female sex, was far from creating the same in that sex for him, since several ladies feigned themselves ill to be visited by him. Amongst the rest, the Lady Betty ——, who had often sucked in love, at both ears, from his agreeable conversation at her father's table, conceived the highest affection for him. She therefore studied all opportunities of keeping her chamber, for the sight of him, and was week after week out of order, for that end. My Lord, her father, whose life was almost wrapped up in her's, was continually sending for him; inasmuch that the Doctor grew out of patience, at coming upon so many trifling occasions, and gave him to understand, That it was his opinion, his Lordship ought rather to send for her Confessor (for she was a Roman Catholick) to cure her distempered mind, than a Physician for her body. This answer did but inflame her Ladyship's desires; and by Mrs Graham, her woman, who was a confident in the secret, she let the Doctor know, that he must be that confessor. Hereupon he gave his attendance, to hear what she had to say; which made a discovery that struck him with amazement. How to answer her directly, he knew not, for she had made a sort of ambiguous confession, which had only pointed out her respects for a certain person, without any name. He therefore told her, That her case was somewhat difficult, but he did not doubt to ease her of all her anxieties, on that account, in a month's time. Accordingly the young lady formed an inconceivable joy to herself; but the Doctor immediately laid the whole affair before the Lord ——, her father; with a caution not to let the daughter know he was any ways apprized of it, since it was in his power to prevent her flinging herself away, upon a man much beneath her, by a speedy contract of marriage with a person of equal extraction. This advice was readily embraced, and gratefully acknowledged; and the Lady, who was living after the Doctor's death, and one of the best of wives, was married, within the time engaged for by him to a nobleman, who had made preparations to her several months before this discovery (10).

(9) Memoirs of Dr Radcliffe, p. 34.

(10) Ibid. p. 35.

[L] She

about proper expedients for the advantage and increase of the revenues of University-college, he bid money for the perpetual advowson of a living in Lincolnshire of 300*l.* per annum; but not being quick enough in the purchase was anticipated by a college in Cambridge. However, he laid a plan for his succeeding benefactions to the place of his education in this year; as appears from his answer to a friend, who upon asking him why he did not marry to provide heirs to his prodigious wealth, had this reply, that truly he had an old one to take care of, which he intended should be his executrix (o). In December, the same year, Queen Mary was seized with the small-pox, which the Court-Physicians not being able to raise, the Doctor was sent for by the Council (p); upon perusing the recipes he told them, without seeing her Majesty, that she was a dead woman; for it was impossible to do any good in her case, where remedies had been given that were so contrary to the nature of the distemper; yet he would endeavour all that lay in him to give her some ease. Accordingly, the pustules began to fill by a cordial julap he prescribed for the Queen, which gave some faint hopes of her recovery; but these soon vanished, and the Doctor did not stick to say, that great and good princeps died a sacrifice to unskilful hands, who out of one disease had produced a complication by improper medicines. Some few months after this unhappy accident, the Doctor, who 'till then had kept himself in the good graces of the Princess Anne of Denmark, made a forfeit of them after a very uncourtly manner, by his two great addiction to the bottle. Her Royal Highness being indisposed, gave orders he should be sent for; in answer to which, he made a promise of coming to St James's soon after; but not appearing, that message was backed by another, importing, that she was extremely ill, and describing after what manner she was seized. At which the Doctor swore by his Maker, that her Highness's distemper was nothing but the vapours, and that she was in as good a state of health as any woman breathing, could she but give into the belief of it. On his appearance at Court not long after, he found, to his great mortification, that his freedom with so illustrious a patient had been highly repented; for offering to go into the presence he was stopped by an officer in the anti-chamber, and told, that the Princess had no farther occasion for the services of a Physician who would not obey her orders, and that she had made choice of Dr Gibbons to succeed him in the care of her health (q) [L]. However, he continued in great esteem with the King, who had a more than ordinary occasion to shew it in the campaign of 1695, which was closed by the taking of Namur; for the Earl of Albemarle, who had a command in the army, and was one of the prime favourites to that monarch, was taken ill of a fever in the camp; whereupon the King, who interested himself very much in so dear a life, having no manner of confidence in the Physicians that attended his royal person in the field, sent for Dr Radcliffe from England; he came accordingly, and, as if diseases were not able to abide when he was present, restored his Lordship in a week's time to his former health, after he had been reduced to the last extremity by an unintermitting sickness under which he had languished near two months. Nor did his Majesty fall short of his usual bounty to the Doctor on this eminent piece of service, giving him an order upon the Treasury for twelve hundred pounds; besides which, the Lord Albemarle presented him with a diamond ring, and four hundred guineas. The King likewise made him an offer of a Baronet's patent, which he declined, as likely to be of no use to him, who had no direct descendants, and no thoughts of changing his condition (r). The same year Dr (afterwards Sir) Edward Hannes came from Oxford to settle in London, and in a little time became Principal Physician at Court, and was an eminent rival of our Doctor's [M]. About this time, likewise, happened his remarkable visit to Madam D'Ursley at Kensington [N]. In the year 1697, after the King's return from Loo, where

(o) His Life, ubi supra, p. 37.

(p) See the Life of King William.

And Burnet's History of his own Time.

(q) Life of Queen Anne, by Boyer.

(r) Life of Dr Radcliffe, ubi supra, p. 40.

[L] She had made choice of Dr Gibbons, to succeed him in the care of her health.] As nothing could be more vexatious to the Doctor than to give place to his old antagonist, who was now become his successor; so he could not forgive him for this very thing, to his dying day; and at his return to his companions, without any regard to the great name, which ought not to have been made so free with, signified to them what had happened; intimating, that Nurse Gibbons, had gotten a new nursery, which he by no means envied him the possession of, since his capacity was only equal to the ailments of a patient, which had no other existence than in the imagination, and could reach no farther, than not putting those out of a good state of health, that were already in the enjoyment of it.

[M] Sir Edward Hannes came to London, and was an eminent rival of our Doctor.] This gentleman who was an excellent scholar, and well versed in the knowledge of chymistry and anatomy, and out-did all the competitors he had left in the University; at his first arrival in town, set up a very spruce equipage. But finding his attempts fall short, in relation to his success, he bethought himself of a stratagem; and to get into repute, ordered his footman to stop most of the gentlemen's chariots, and inquire if they belonged to Dr Hannes, as if he was called to a patient. Accordingly the fellow, in pursuit of his order, ran from White-hall, to the Exchange, and entering Garraway's Coffee-house, made the projected inquiry there. At last Dr Radcliffe, who was usually at this Coffee-house about Exchange-time, and planted at a table with several Apothecaries and Surgeons, that flocked about him: cried out, Dr Hannes was not there, and desired to know who wanted him? The fellow's reply, was, such and such a Lord: but was taken up with this dry rebuke; No, no, friend, you are mistaken, the Doctor wants those Lords. However, Dr Hannes's merit procured him great business, and he became a principal Physician at Court. On which occasion, an old friend of Dr Radcliffe's, to see how he would digest the promotion of such a young practitioner, brought him the news of it. So much the better for him, cried the Doctor; for now he has a patent for killing. When the former, to try if possible he could ruffle his temper, who was always sedate and calm, when he saw designs laid to make it otherwise; said, but what is more surprising, the same Doctor has two pair of the finest horses that ever were seen: and was answered by the other with great indifference; Then they will sell for the more (11).

[N] His remarkable visit to Madam D'Ursley.] At one of the visits he made this lady, she was pleased

(11) Ibid. p. 42.

where he had ratified the Treaty of Peace at Ryſwick, his Maſteſty found himſelf very much indiſpoſed at his palace in Kenſington, and as uſual, after his Phyſicians in Ordinary had given their opinions, would have Dr Radcliffe's advice. When he was admitted the King was reading Sir Roger L' Eſtrange's new verſion of Æſop's Fables; and told him, that he had once more ſent for him to try the effects of his great ſkill, notwithstanding he had been told by his Body-Phyſicians, who were not ſenſible of his inward decay, that he might yet live many years, and would very ſpeedily recover. Upon which the Doctor, having put ſome interrogatories to him, with a quick preſence of thought very readily aſked leave of his Maſteſty to turn to a fable in the book before him, which would let the King know how he had been treated, and read it to him [O]. This done; May it pleaſe your Maſteſty, your's and the ſick-man's caſe in the fable is the very ſame, cries the Doctor; you are buoyed up with hopes that your malady will ſoon be driven away, by perſons that are not apprized of means to do it, and know not the true cauſe of your ailment. But I muſt be plain with you, and tell you, that in all probability, if your Maſteſty will adhere to my preſcriptions, it may be in my power to lengthen out your life for three or four years, but beyond that time nothing in phyſic can protract it; for the juices of your ſtomach are all vitiated; your whole maſs of blood is corrupted, and your nutriment for the moſt part turns to water. However, if your Maſteſty will forbear making long viſits to the Earl of Bradford's, (where the King was wont to drink very hard) I'll try what can be done to make you live eaſily, though I cannot venture to ſay I can make your life longer than I have told you. And he left a recipe which was ſo happy in it's effects as to enable the King, not only to make a progreſs into the weſtern parts of his kingdom, but to go out of it, and divert himſelf at his palace of Loo in Holland (s). In 1699, while the King was abroad, beyond-ſea, the Duke of Glouceſter was taken ill on his birth day at Windſor, where he had overheated himſelf with dancing; whatever was really his Highneſs's diſtemper, Sir Edward Hannes and Dr Bidloo judged it to be the ſmall-pox, and preſcribed accordingly, but without any ſucceſs. The whole Court was alarmed at this unlucky diſaſter, and the Princeſs of Denmark, notwithstanding her juſt reſentment of Dr Radcliffe's conduct to her, was prevailed upon by the Counteſs of Marlborough and Lady Fretchville to ſend for him; who, upon firſt ſight of the royal youth, gave her to underſtand, that there was no poſſibility of recovering him, ſince he would die by ſuch an hour the next day, as he did. However, with great difficulty the Doctor was perſuaded to be preſent at the conſult, where he could not refrain from bitter invectives againſt the two Phyſicians abovementioned, telling the one, that it would have been happy for this nation had he been bred up a baſket-maker, [his father's occupation] and the other continued making a harcock of nouns and pronouns in the quality of a country ſchoolmaſter, rather than have ventured out of his reach in the practice of an art to which he was an utter ſtranger, and for which he ought to have been whipped with one of his own rods (t). The death of the preſumptive heir of the Crown, after the deceaſe of his mother, was followed by the news of that of the Duke of Beaufort, Great-Grandfather to the preſent Duke. This illuſtrious perſonage, who was in an advanced age, had always been a patient of the Doctor's when within call; but upon a fever, which ſeized him ſuddenly at his ſeat near Bath, applied himſelf to the Phyſicians in that place, though at the ſame time his caſe was ſtated, and ſent to Dr Radcliffe for his advice, who in purſuance of it, ſent down a regimen which they were to go by. But Dr Barnard, who was one of the number, oppoſed Dr Radcliffe's direction, of keeping his back-door open, and moved for reſtringent medicines, which being adminiſtered, ſlung the diſorder into the patient's head, and he was brought to the laſt extremity. Hereupon a meſſenger was again diſpatched to Dr Radcliffe, with an account of the methods which had been uſed; and the deſire that he would inſtantly come down to be very free, in putting ſome queries to him, upon the ſubject of the pleaſures of Venus. The Doctor gave her full ſcope, by a reply, which occaſioned the following epigram.

(s) See the Life of King William III.

(t) See Radcliffe's Life, p. 47.

D'Urſley in a merry mood,
Enquir'd of her Phyſician;
What hour was beſt to ſtir the blood
And ſpirits, by coition?

Says Radcliffe, if my judgment's right,
Or answer worth returning;
'Tis moſt delightful, over night,
Moſt wholeſome, in the morning.

Quoth D'Urſley then, for pleaſure's ſake,
Each evening I will take it;
And in the morning, when I wake,
My only phyſic make it (12).

(12) Theſe verſes are a tranſlation of a Latin epigram, printed in the Anthologia, and written by Will. Nutley, Eſq;

To the laſt of theſe lines, when the Doctor replied, Madam, ſuch a reſolution, may make me loſe a patient; the lady replied, then, Sir, it may gain you a miſtreſs. Whether it did or no, muſt be left to thoſe who were more converſant with the tendency of his affections: but I never heard of his inclinations: that way; his morning and evening ſacrifices being rather offered up to Bacchus, than to Venus.

[O] And read it to him] It is in theſe words. Pray Sir, how do you find yourſelf? ſays the Doctor to his Patient. Why truly, ſays the Patient, I have had a moſt violent ſweat. Oh! the beſt ſign in the world, quoth the Doctor. And then, in a little while, he is at it again: pray how do you find your body? Alas, ſays the other, I have juſt now ſuch a terrible fit of horror and ſhaking upon me! Why this is all as it ſhould be, ſays the Phyſician; it ſhews a mighty ſtrength of nature: and then he comes over him with the ſame queſtion again Why I am all ſwelled, ſays the other, as if I had a dropſy. Beſt of all, quoth the Doctor, and goes his way. Soon after this comes one of the ſick man's friends to him, with the ſame queſtion; How he felt himſelf? Why, truly, ſo well, ſays he, that I am even ready to die, of I know not how many good ſigns and tokens (13).

(13) L' Eſtrange's Æſop.

down to Badminton. When the Doctor told the messenger, there was no manner of occasion for his presence, since the Duke, his master, died such an hour of the day before; which the servant on his return found to be true (u). At the close of this year, the King, in his return from Holland, found himself very much out of order, and sent for Dr Radcliffe the last time, to Kensington, for he was then to be as much out of favour with his Majesty, as he was with the Princess. After the necessary questions put by the Physician to the royal patient; the King shewing his swollen ancles, while the rest of his body was emaciated, and like a meer skeleton, said, Doctor, what think you of these? Why truly, replied he, I would not have your Majesty's two legs for your three kingdoms; which freedom was resented so much, though not taken notice of then, that all the interest of the Earl of Albemarle, the chief favourite, could not re-instate him in his Majesty's good graces; who from that hour never would suffer him to come into his presence, though he continued to make use of his diet-dinks 'till three days before his death, which happened to fall out much about the same time as the Doctor had calculated; and which the King had frequently said to the Earl just mentioned, would come to pass in verification of Radcliffe's prediction (w). Upon Queen Anne's Accession to the Throne, the late Earl of Godolphin used all his endeavours to re-instate the Doctor in his former post of her Archiater (x); but she would by no means consent to his coming to Court though she was laid up then by the gout; alledging in bar of his Lordship's recommendation, that Radcliffe would send her word again, that her ailment was nothing else but the vapours. However, in all cases of emergency and critical conjunctures, he was continually advised with, and it was owing to his prescriptions that the gout was prevented from taking its residence in her Majesty's head or stomach. For though he was not admitted in quality of the Queen's Domestic-Physician, yet he received large sums out of the secret service money for his prescriptions behind the curtain; and it was wholly through his means that her Majesty was recovered from the very brink of the grave at Windsor, the year before her death (z). In 1703, the Marquis of Blandford, only son of the Duke of Marlborough, being taken ill of the small-pox at Cambridge, the Doctor was applied to by the Duchess to attend him. But having the Lady Marchioness of Worcester (a a) then under his hands with a violent fever, with several other persons of quality, he could only oblige her Grace by a prescription; which, however, was not followed by the Cambridge doctors, and the small pox struck in; the Duchess being advertised of it, went in person to the Doctor's house to request his assistance; who, having heard the detail of their procedure as written in a letter from his tutor, said Madam, I should only put you to a great expence to no purpose, for you have nothing to do for his Lordship now but to send down an Undertaker to take care of his funeral, for I can assure your Grace that he is dead by this time of a distemper called the Doctor, and would have been recovered from the small pox, had not that unfortunate malady intervened. Nor was he out in his conjectures, for the Duchess was no sooner in her apartments in St James's house, but a messenger arrived with the news of his death (b b) [P]. In 1704, at a general collection for propagating the Gospel in foreign parts, the Doctor, unknown to any of the Society, settled 50 l. per annum, payable for ever to them, under a borrowed name; he likewise, the same year, made a present of five hundred pounds to the deprived Bishop of Norwich*, to be distributed among the poor nonjuring clergy, with his desires to have that also kept secret [Q]. In 1705, the Doctor having purchased an estate in the county of Bucks,

(u) Ibid. p. 43.

(w) See Life of King William III.

(x) Dr Arbuthnot held this post at that time.

(z) Radcliffe's Memoirs, p. 50.

(a a) She was some time after wife to the late Lord Granville.

(b b) Burnet's History of his own Time, Vol. II, p. 47. folio edit.

* Dr William Lloyd, of whom see some account in Dr Prideaux's article, remark [N].

[P] A messenger arrived with the news of his death. Some time before this, the Son of Mr John Bancroft, an eminent Surgeon in Ruffel-street, Covent-garden, was taken ill of an empyema, of which Dr Gibbons, who attended him, mistaking the case, the child grew worse. Whereupon Dr Radcliffe was brought to see him, when he was almost ready to expire: accordingly he told the father, he could do nothing for his preservation, for he was killed to all intents and purposes; but if he had any thoughts of putting a stone over him, he would help him to an inscription. And the child being found to die of the disease abovenamed, was interred in Covent-Garden church-yard; where a stone is erected, with the figure of a child laying one hand on his side, and saying, Hic dolor, here is my pain; and pointing with the other, to a Death's head, where are these words; Ibi medicus, there is my physician (14).

[Q] With his desires to have that also kept secret. The first of these charities had been concealed to this day, had not the Trustee, who made the payment, thought it worthy of being made known, for an incitement to the like goodness. The latter was discovered by the following letter, which was found among the abovementioned deprived Bishop's papers.

Bloomsbury-square, July 24. 1704.
 My Lord,
 When I was the last time with you at Hammer-smith, you did me the honour to tell me, that I had it in my power to be an assistant to the poor suffering Clergy; and that Mr Shepherd had contributed large sums for that end. No one can be more sensibly touched with other's misfortunes, than I am. And though I have not abilities equal to the gentleman's be-forenamed, I intend not to fall short of him in my will, to do them all possible kind offices. The bills that bear this company, will testify my esteem for them: but as gifts of this nature, if made public, carry a shew of ostentation with them; I must be earnest with you, my good Lord, to keep the name of the donor secret. I have nothing more to add than to intreat the favour of your making choice of the most deserving persons, and believing that I am, with all possible sincerity,

My Lord,
 your Lordship's most obedient,
 and most faithful servant;

JOHN RADCLIFFE.

Be pleased to limit the number to fifty persons, that they may have ten pounds per head.

(14) This monument is still standing.

Bucks, near Buckingham town, for which he gave 12000 l. had some thought of settling it immediately on University-college, for which he had likewise an eye upon the next presentation of a perpetual advowson; but after consulting Mr Webb, the Conveyancer, and advising with several other friends, it was judged proper to defer it, 'till it could be seen, how the indefatigable industry of Dr Charlet, the Master (cc), could prevail for joint benefactions from others. He had also another motive which induced him to keep that purchase in his own hands. The Dukes of Ormond and Buckinghamshire, the Earls of Nottingham, Abingdon, and others, with whom the Doctor had a particular friendship, being then thrown out of the administration (dd); he took up a resolution to get into the House of Commons, and oppose the new measures; to this purpose he set up for a candidate at Buckingham, which by several benefactions to the town and other diffusive charities he accomplished; though not 'till some years after, as will be seen in the sequel. Much about this time, a fellow that had robbed the Doctor's country-house, one Jonathan Savil, who was under sentence of death for another fact, took a resolution of writing to the Doctor, and acknowledging his offence, since his interest might be of advantage to him in those dismal circumstances; hereupon, when the Doctor was with several of the nobility and gentry at the Mitre-Tavern in Fleet-street, a letter was put into his hands from the condemned criminal, specifying the injury he had done the Doctor, taking shame for it, and intreating his pardon and intercession, not without strong promises of reformation, and restitution, if ever it lay in his power. The company upon hearing the letter read stood amazed at the request, and were in great expectations of some witticisms thereupon, from the person it was addressed to. But the Doctor, on the contrary, very seriously bid the messenger come to his house for an answer in two days, and then taking the Lord Granville into another room, said, he had received such satisfaction from the said letter in clearing up the innocence of a man whom he had unjustly suspected of the abovementioned robbery, that he must be a petitioner to his Lordship, to give him his interest with the Queen in the criminal's favour. This being granted and successfully applied, the messenger was dismissed at the time appointed, with a reprieve and warrant for transportation to Virginia. Where in a little time, by virtue of letters of credence from the Doctor to the Governor, the said Savil (who was living in 1715 in flourishing circumstances) made such returns to his patron and intercessor in the commodities of the country, as more than fully made amends for the damage he had formerly done him, which was computed at 150 l. (ee). In 1706, the Doctor gave fifty guineas privately to Dr James Drake [R], under prosecution for writing against the then present administration (ff); and the same year, when he was applied to by Dr Aldrich, Dean of Christ-Church in Oxford, for a sum of money towards building Allhallow's church, in the High-street there, as also to Peckwater-quadrangle in his own college; he desired to be excused, on account of his intended future donations to the University at his decease. Yet soon after he gave two hundred pounds in a certain Lord's name to be equally divided between the two edifices (gg). In 1707, on enquiring into the bulk of his estate in land and money, he found himself to be worth more than 80,000 l.; this state of his abilities inspired him with a resolution to further acts of charity (bb); in pursuance of which, upon some discourse with Dr Sprat then Bishop of Rochester, he made a handsome donation to the relief of the Episcopal clergy in Scotland, as appears from the letter to that Bishop in the notes [S]. In the same year, at a General Court

(cc) That gentleman bestowed the greatest part of his own fortune upon repairing and improving the college.

(dd) The Life of Queen Anne, ubi supra.

(ee) Radcliffe's Life, ubi supra, p. 56.

(ff) Viz. In a pamphlet, intituled, The Memorial of the Church of England. 'Tis said, that the Doctor, finding it was like to go very ill with him, applied to Mrs Oldfield, a favourite of Mr Maynwaring's; and by his interest got a favourable sentence, and that sentence never put in execution. Oldmixon's life of A. Maynwaring, Eq; p. 42.

(gg) Radcliffe's Memoirs, p. 57.

(bb) He lent four or five thousand pounds upon a mortgage of Mr Maynwaring's estate at Ightfield in Shropshire; and was so easy as to the interest, that Mr Maynwaring was tempted to continue the security. This is mentioned as an instance of the Doctor's generous disposition. Id. p. 16.

[R] The Doctor gave fifty guineas privately, to Dr James Drake.] The money was put into the hands of one Mr Porley, and was given with a design to enable Dr Drake, the better to make his defence; but with a caution, that he might by no means be told whence it came; since he knew Dr Drake to be a gentleman, who was very sensible he had very often injured Dr Radcliffe in his reputation; and would by no means brook the receipt of a benefit, from a person whom he had used all possible means to make his enemy (15).

[S] As appears from his letter to that Bishop in the notes.

Bloomsbury-square, May 26. 1707.

* My good Lord,
 * The inclosed bills will sufficiently testify the deference I pay to your Lordship's judgment, and my willingness to contribute towards the relief of persons in distress, for conscience sake. The insupportable tyranny of the Presbyterian Clergy in Scotland, over those of the Episcopal persuasion there, does, I hold with your Lordship, make it necessary, that some care should be taken of them by us, that are of the same household of faith with them; and by the late Act of Union, (which, I bless God, I had no hand in) of the same nation. But, my Lord, I need not tell you, many collections of this nature have been misapplied, and given to those persons in no manner of want, instead of men in low circumstances, that are real objects of compassion.

* I cannot be induced to love a Scripture-Janus, such as (if I am not very much deceived) is the Archbishop of Glasgow, who, I must own, talks very well, and in our old acquaintance John Dryden's words,

* Has brought the virtues of his soil along,
 * A smooth behaviour, and a fluent tongue;

* but acts very much like the prelate these verses were made upon: for I never yet heard, that amidst all his fine harangues, to incite other people to exert themselves in the support of the necessitous, this most reverend father in God, notwithstanding he is in circumstances so to do, has ever advanced one shilling to his afflicted brethren; but has always had a share, and that very large, of the sums that have been gathered for their use. My Lord of Edinburgh, Dr Scott, Mr Sheen, and others, that have been with me, are just objects of every honest man's charity: they have suffered very much, without any tokens of dependency, or pusillanimity, in the extreme difficulties. To such as these, I beg your Lordship, that the money I have drawn for, in the name of Francis Andrews, may be distributed; and in such portions as is suitable to their respective characters, and the demands of their families. Not that I would prescribe to a judgment so unerring as your Lordship's, in the exercise of an office, which you have been always famed for the discharge of, with the greatest exactness: but would remind your Lordship

(15) Memoirs of Dr Radcliffe, &c. p. 53.

Court held on the twenty-fourth of October by the President and Governors of Bridewell and Bethlem hospitals, the Doctor was nominated of their number and approved of by the committee on the twenty-first of November following; but upon their offering him the staff as usual, he thought fit to refuse the compliment; and acquainted the deputation that was sent to him on that occasion, that he was much obliged to them for the honour they designed him, but that he had previous obligations to St Bartholomew's hospital, of which he had been formerly elected one of the Governors, and that he very much distrusted his abilities in discharging both those trusts, as he should be willing to do. In 1708, the Doctor made a purchase of another estate in Northamptonshire, after he had very largely augmented his paternal estate in Yorkshire, with the manour of Linton, and bought the perpetual advowson of a living called Headborneworthy in the county of Hants, which he bestowed on Mr Bingham, then Fellow of University-college (ii). Nothing occurs this year that was uncommon to the Doctor in his ordinary course of practice, except his want of ability to recover Prince George of Denmark, to whom he was not sent for 'till almost in the last agonies of death. This prince had for some years past been troubled with an asthma and dropfy; for the cure of which, he was persuaded by her Majesty and his own Physicians, to go to the Bath, the year before he died. Accordingly the Queen and his royal Highness made a journey thither, where he was rather induced to think himself in a much fairer way of recovery than before, from the gaiety of the place, and the pains that persons of all conditions took in procuring him the most agreeable diversions, than found really to be so from the operation of those medicinal springs, to which his change of temper, from chagrin and melancholy to an unusual vivacity, was ascribed. This filled her Majesty and the whole Court with admiration at the healing virtues of those waters; and made them take resolutions of residing there also the next season, to compleat a cure, which was supposed at that time to be in great forwardness. The skill of the Physicians, who advised the aforesaid journey, was likewise highly applauded; and every one's concern for so important and valuable a life was laid aside, but that of Dr Radcliffe, who, with his wonted spirit of prediction, said; The ensuing year would let them all know their mistakes, in following such preposterous and unadvisable counsels; since the very nature of a dropfy might have lead those, whose duty it was to have prescribed proper medicines for the cure of it, into other precautions for the safety of so illustrious a patient, than the choice of means that must unavoidably feed it. In justification of these sentiments, his royal Highness fell into a relapse, and after a six-months struggle was seized in such a manner with violent shiverings and convulsions on the twenty-second of October, that his Physicians were of opinion Dr Radcliffe was the only person now to be applied to. In pursuance of this advice, her Majesty, who could set apart former resentments, out of concern for the preservation of so inestimable a life, caused him to be sent for in one of her own coaches; and was pleased to tell him, that no rewards or favours should be wanting, could be but remove the convulsions she was troubled with, in the case of those, which her dearly beloved husband bore. But the Doctor, who was unused to flatter, instantly gave the Queen to understand, that nothing but death could release his royal Highness from the pangs he was afflicted with; and said, that though it might be a rule among Surgeons to apply causticks to such as were burnt or scalded, it was very irregular among Physicians to drive and expel watery humours from the body by draughts of the same element.

(ii) The celebrated author of the Antiquities of the Christian Church. He was censured by the Convocation at Oxford for a sermon preached there, wherein he was said to be too free with the mysteries of our holy religion.

However,

' Lordship that there are men in the world, who, by ' an appearance of sanctity, very often impose upon ' such as are really possessed of it.

' The very nature of these charities, considering how ' obnoxious the gentlemen whom they are bestowed on, ' are to the present administration, requires secrecy, as ' to the names of the donors. Yet, if it be thought ' necessary, for the better satisfaction of those whom ' they are given to, to set them down in a list of their ' respective contributors, it will be an act of friend- ' ship in the good Bishop of Rochester, upon many ' considerations relating to my employ, and otherwise, ' to make use of that, which I have drawn the bills ' (16) in, rather than the name of

' My good Lord,

' your Lordship's most obedient,

' and most devoted servant;

' JOHN RADCLIFFE (17).'

The Doctor's conjectures, concerning the Arch- bishop of Glasgow, appear to be well grounded; at least, if we may credit Mr Lockhart, who makes the following remarks concerning him. ' While this was ' a doing, the Duke of Queensberry, to preserve ' the interest he had obtained with the Tories, and ' church Party, in England, had brought up to Lon- ' don those two renegadoes, the Earl of Balcarras,

' and the Archbishop of Glasgow, to avouch to them ' his inclination to serve and protect the church Party ' in Scotland. The Archbishop was a man of ex- ' traordinary parts, and great learning; but extremely ' proud and haughty to all the inferior clergy in his ' diocese; and very much destitute of those virtues, ' that should adorn the life and conversation of one ' so highly exalted in the church. He had a great ' management in the government of both Church and ' State, before the Revolution, and after the abolish- ' ing of Episcopacy he lived privately, indulging that ' avaricious worldly temper, which had sullied his ' other qualifications, in all the capacities and stations ' of his life, and which likewise moved him to em- ' bark in this design; which, when he left Scotland, ' and even after he left London, he kept as a mighty ' secret, pretending to the Cavaliers, he undertook ' that long journey in the middle of winter, so dan- ' gerous to his grey hairs, (his own expression) only to ' supplicate Queen Anne to bestow the vacant Bishops ' rents, on the poor starving Episcopal Clergy. Yet, ' when this matter was under the consideration of ' Queen Anne, and her servants, his charitable zeal ' did allow him to accept of four hundred pounds ster- ' ling, per annum, out of them; though there re- ' mained but 12000 pounds, after this 400 was de- ' ducted, (to be divided among his numerous needy ' brethren) that was not appropriated to other uses; ' and his Lordship was worth 20000 pounds of his ' own (18).

(18) See Memoirs concerning the Affairs of Scotland, &c. by George Lockhart of Carnwarth, p. 37, 38.

(16) The bills were for 300 l. and drawn upon Mr Walgrave, Goldsmith in Russel-Street, Covent-garden.

(17) From his Memoirs, ubi supra, p. 58, & seq.

However, he would leave something in writing, whereby such hydropics and anodynes should be prepared for him, as should give him an easier passage out of this world; since he had been so tampered with, that nothing in the art of physic could keep the Prince alive more than six days. Accordingly, he departed this life on the sixth day following, to the great grief of the Queen and the whole Court. Her Majesty being fixed in her resolutions from that time, never to visit the Bath more, which though advised afterwards by her Physicians, when in great danger, she could not be induced to consent to during the residue of her reign (kk). The year 1709, though remarkable for many notable cures performed by our British Æsculapius, was in particular famous for an instance of the instability of the most fixed averfion and resolutions. The Doctor, as has before been recited, was so much prepossessed against any kind thoughts of the fair-sex, that he very often slighted calls from them under the greatest necessities of his assistance, and could not be prevailed with but very seldom to attend them: But Cupid owed him another cast of his good-will; and in a visit to a young female patient of great beauty, wealth, and quality, so struck him with the irresistibility of her charms, as to make him stand in need of a Physician himself, who came under that denomination. The Doctor was however arrived at an age, wherein the bent of mankind's thoughts is turned upon other considerations than those of love; but the lady just mentioned was too attractive not to inspire the coldest heart with the warmest sentiments. Accordingly, after he had made a cure of her, he could not but imagine, as naturally he might, that her ladyship would entertain a favourable opinion of him; and to make his addresses to her altered his liveries into a more sumptuous equipage, and ordered a new coach to be made that should sparkle in the Ring, with those that belonged to other admirers of the fair sex. But the lady, however grateful she might be for the care he had taken of her health, divulged the secret of that sudden eclaireissement to some of her confidants, one of whom made it known to Mr Steele, publisher of the Tatler, who had ill-nature enough, on account of party, to write that ridicule of it which we see in the Tatler (ll). In the year 1710, the Doctor, after recovery from a violent illness, had thoughts of retiring into the country from the hurry of business, which began to grow burthensome to him; and communicated his intentions to his neighbour Dr Sharp, then Archbishop of York, but was persuaded to continue his practice by that Prelate from considerations of beneficence and good will to mankind, which proved of very great use to his Grace, he being the first patient of high rank and distinction, that owed his life soon after to his advice. This the Archbishop acknowledged in a letter, wherein he took occasion to commend the Doctor's zeal for the cause of the Church in the person of Dr Sacheverell [T], who was then impeached by the House of Commons. How much the success of his trial imported Dr Radcliffe was seen in the influence it had upon the town of Buckingham, which made him an offer to chuse him for one of their representatives in the subsequent Parliament, though he declined it at that time, as inconsistent with the business of his profession, and gave his interest to his friend Dr Chapman (mm). Nothing more distinguished the Doctor's great skill and regard to the ties of friendship in the following year, than the noble stand he made against the assaults of death in the case of the then Lord Craven; that noble peer had been his bottle-companion and inseparable acquaintance for some years, and was, through the means of excessive drinking, brought to such an ill habit of body, as to be deemed incurable by his Physicians in the country. Hereupon the Doctor, without being sent for, took a journey down to Berkshire, where he found things in the condition beforementioned, and left such prescriptions behind him, that by their help his Lordship was able to ride and hunt in a month's time. Though some months after, by returning too freely to the bottle, he sunk under a relapse. After the loss of this friend, the Doctor seemed to be less cheerful in conversation, and lost a good part of his usual mirth and festivity. But how greatly he was affected with it is best seen in the letter below, which he addressed to the Duke of Beaufort upon the occasion [U]. However,

this

[T] A letter wherein he took occasion to commend the Doctor's zeal for the Church, in the person of Dr Sacheverell.] It is in these words.

‘ Good Doctor,

‘ I must own, and I do it with great pleasure, that next to the providence of the great God, my recovery is owing to you. But the diligence and concern you have shewn, in your attendance upon me, is of far less moment than your regard for the preservation of a gentleman, through whose sides the dignity of the Sacerdotal order is wounded. The reasons you give, for others to stand by him in the day of trial, are very just, and the pains you take, in soliciting his acquittance, extremely commendable. He should not have carried things so far; however, since he has, it will be looked upon as an act of uncharitableness in us, that are his brethren, not to endeavour to extricate him out of the difficulties, he has plunged himself into. I must applaud your making interest for bail for him, and think it much better that the Doctors B—s, and L—r, should be his sureties, than the Dukes of B—t, and B—m, because they will not be so ‘ much the mark of the persons at helm. I fear we shall not have power enough to give a parliamentary sanction to the doctrines he has preached; but, in all probability, we shall be able to mitigate the punishment, some people threaten him with. The expences he must be at, in his defence, cannot but be very great, and beyond his abilities. Therefore I altogether approve your design, towards the discharge of them, as a work of the greatest charity.

‘ And am,

‘ good Doctor,

‘ your most obliged friend,

‘ and humble servant;

‘ JOHN EBOR. (19)

[U] As may be seen in a letter which he addressed to the Duke of Beaufort, on this occasion.] The letter was sent to the Duke, who was then at Badminton,

near

(19) From Dr Radcliffe's Life, p. 71.

(kk) See her Life, ubi supra.

(ll) No 44, dated July 21, 1709. See likewise the same paper for July 28.

(mm) See Radcliffe's Life, p. 72.

this melancholy wore off by his continuing to follow the business of his profession, as he did with the greatest assiduity; of which, besides the recovery of Lord Viscount Weymouth, that of Mr Betton, a Turkey Merchant, was an illustrious proof, not only of his skill, but of his generosity, to such as were worthy of it; and how he behaved to such as were unworthy, his conduct the same year to old Tyson, the rich Usurer, at Hackney, is an egregious instance [N]. In 1712, he recovered the Duke of Beaufort from the small-pox, having first predicted the success with his usual confidence (n n); and the same year

(n n) This cure impressed upon the Duchess his Lordship's grandmother, such an implicit faith in the doctor's skill, that though then in the 8th year of her age, she declared it was her opinion, she should never die while he lived, near Bath; and the following is a transcript, from a copy of it

My dear Duke,

You will doubtless be very much surprized and grieved, at the death of one of your most intimate acquaintance, which makes me wish that some other hand had eased mine of a task that renews my affliction, at the same time it gives birth to your's. But since it may be expected from me, as the physician of the deceased, to give you the circumstances of my poor Lord Craven's sickness, and untimely end, your Grace will have the goodness to be made apprized of them after this manner. His Lordship from a particular freedom of living which he took, and always indulged himself in, had contracted an obefeness of body, that through want of exercise made him entirely averse to it. This disposition bred an ill habit of body in him, from whence proceeded dropical symptoms; which I endeavoured to prevent the effects of by proper remedies. Nor could they have proved unsuccessful, had his Lordship been of a less hospitable temper, or the nobility and gentry been less taken with the sweetness of his conversation, and affability of his deportment. Alas I tremble for your Grace, when I consider that all these good qualities, that were so eminently conspicuous in my dear breathless Lord, occasioned the very loss of them for other noblemen's imitation. For by these engaging, these attractive, and alluring virtues, the best good natured companion is lost, for ever lost, to all our hopes and wishes, and had it not in his power to abstain from what was his infelicity, while it was thought to be his comfort.

Poor William, Lord Craven! How did I flatter myself, with the uninterrupted enjoyment of his inviolate and unalterable friendship, during the residue of those few years of life that are allotted for my use! How have I dwelt upon the contemplation of his future acts of affection, loyalty, and beneficence to the Church, the State, and the Commonwealth, when I should be laid low in the earth, and he devoid of means to see and admire! And yet, how have I been deceived in surviving that dear, that agreeable person, whose death I ardently desired for the sake of posterity to be long, long, preceded by my own demise!

Your Grace will pardon me this one soliloquy in remembrance of a loss that is in common to all, who had the honour of his acquaintance, or who might have received benefit by his example: and give me leave to tell you, that next to yourself, and my good Lord of Denbigh, there is no one whose welfare I had more at heart, than his Lordship's.

What is incumbent upon me is to request of your Grace, to take care of a life so important as your's is, in this dearth of great and valuable men; and to assure you, that while you consult the preservation of your health, by letting the exercises of the field share with the pleasures of the bottle; in so doing, your Grace will not only give length of days to that which is mortal in your own earthly fabric, but for some small time longer, prevent the return of that frail tenement of clay, to it's first origin; which, as yet, continues to be dragged on, by

My dear Duke,

your Grace's

most obliged,

and faithful servant,

JOHN RADCLIFFE (20.)

[N] The recovery of Mr Betton, a Turkey merchant, was a proof of his generosity; and how he behaved to such as were unworthy of it, his conduct to old Tyson, of Hackney, is an egregious instance.] The first of these persons lived then at Bow, near Stratford, where he lay so very ill, of a complication of distempers, that his life was despaired of. Sir Richard Blackmore, Dr How, and several others of the principal physicians, in and about the city of London, had been in vain consulted, and abundance of fees given to no manner of purpose; when a friend advised him to have recourse to Dr Radcliffe, notwithstanding the charge of his attendance would be very great, and nothing under a present of five guineas, would be acceptable to him, for a journey from Bloomsbury to Bow. The Doctor accordingly came, and after two attendances only, gave the sick man such content, that he very freely made him acquainted with his satisfaction in his endeavours and abilities, and desired him to omit no opportunity of visiting him; for he should, in consideration of the great benefit, be glad of giving him five guineas every day, 'till his recovery, for the favour of it. When he received for answer: Mr Betton, the generosity of your temper is so engaging, that I must, in return to it, invite you to come and drink a dish of coffee with me at Garraway's, this day fortnight; for notwithstanding you have been very ill dealt with, follow but the prescriptions, I shall leave with you, 'till that time, and you will be as sound a man as ever you was in your life, without one fee more. Accordingly he was so, and came to Garraway's at the day appointed in perfect health, in which he continued for several years after

Yet though the Doctor had an esteem for men that set a just value upon his skill, and were gratefully disposed to acknowledge it, by suitable regards; he had the greatest aversion imaginable, howsoever parsimonious in his own person, for such as were of abilities, but of niggardly dispositions: as may be seen in case of one Mr Tyson, a man of vast wealth and estate, and said, at the time of his decease, to be worth more than 300000l. It happened that this figure of a man, without any thing like a human soul, had so long dealt with quacks, for cheapness sake, that he was reduced to the lowest ebb of life; his continuance in it, being, in a manner, despaired of. His friends, and neighbours, had repeated their instances with him, to no manner of purpose, that he would look out for some able physician, for his preservation; but the cost was a greater terror, than even the apprehensions of death itself. At last, the extrem near view of the next world, seems to have frightened him into a resolution, of using some proper means to make his abode in this as long as possible. In order to which he pitched upon Dr Radcliffe, as the only person capable of giving him relief in this dangerous state: but the great difficulty was, how to keep the Doctor from discovering him, so as he might procure the Doctor's assistance without the usual expence. At last, with that view, he and his wife agreed to give the Doctor a visit, at his own house; and being carried in their own coach to the Royal-Exchange, there they hired a hack to Bloomsbury; where with two guineas in hand, and a very mean habit, Mr Tyson opened his case to the Doctor, not without alledging his poverty, as a motive for having advice upon moderate terms. But neither his sickness nor his apparel had disguised him so much, as to deceive the Doctor; who had no sooner heard what he had to say, and taken his gold, but told him: He might go home, and die and be damn'd, without a speedy repentance; for both death and the devil were ready for one Tyson of Hackney, who had raised an immense estate out of the spoils of the public, and the tears of orphans and widows; and would certainly be a dead man in ten days. Nor did the event falsify the prediction, for the old Usurer returned to his house, quite confounded with the sentence that had been passed upon him; which, whatever might be his fate afterwards, was fulfilled, as to his death, in eight days following (21).

(20) Ibid. p. 73, & 69.

(21) Memoirs, p. 76, & 69.

he entertained Prince Eugene of Savoy with a very remarkable dinner; in which, English beef and beer had their due preheminance [X]. The following year, 1713, upon the renewal of the Parliament, he stood in conjunction with Mr Chapman for the town of Buckingham, and after hearing a petition against him, was declared duly elected. Upon this avocation from business he recommended Dr Mead to many of his patients. This year he applied to the Rector and Fellows of Exeter-college, about a purchase of some ground adjoining to Selden's library, where he first intended his own should be built; but the society insisted upon such terms, as evinced their great unwillingness to lose the benefit of a good part of their garden, which must have been taken away by that purchase, upon which account the Doctor changed his purpose as to the site of it: While this affair was in agitation he recommended his kindman, Mr Richard Fiddes to the university for the degree of Bachelor of Divinity, which was very readily complied with (oo). In 1714 the Doctor had the misfortune to see that fatal accident fall out, which he always dreaded, in the death of his beloved Duke of Beaufort. This loss struck him to the heart, that to several of his friends who were then with him at the Bull-head tavern, in Clare-market, he declared, That now he had lost the only person whom he took pleasure in conversing with, it was high time for him to retire from the world; to make his Will; and set his house in order; for he had notices within, that told him, his abode in this world could not be twelve months longer. Nothing remarkable fell out in relation to the Doctor till the sickness of the Queen [Anne], who was struck with death on the twenty-eighth of July, and departed this life the first of August following. Upon her decease there was spread a report, that not only the Privy-Council but the Queen herself gave orders for Dr Radcliffe to be present at the last consultations, and that he excused himself from coming, under pretences of an indisposition. But his name was not once mentioned either by the Queen or any Lord of the Council; only Lady Massam sent to him without their knowledge two hours before her Majesty's death, after he had received the particulars of her irrecoverable case from Dr Mead. He was then down at his seat at Catehalton most sorely afflicted with the gout, that had seized his head and stomach, and rendered him altogether unfit to travel; however, he sent word by the messenger, that his duty to her Majesty would oblige him to attend her, had he proper orders for so doing; but he judged as matters at that juncture stood betwixt him and the Queen, who had taken an antipathy against him, that his presence would be of more disservice to her Majesty than use; and that since her Majesty's case was desperate, and her distemper incurable, he could not at all think it proper to give her any disturbance in her last moments which were so very near at hand; but rather an act of duty and compassion to let her Majesty die as easily as was possible. Yet some, who before would not allow him to have any tolerable skill in physic, imputed her Majesty's death to his neglect of attendance on her; nay, the prepossession in his disfavour even obtained amongst his friends; a person who had always voted on the same side with him in the House of Commons moved on the fifth of August following, that the Doctor might be summoned to attend in his place, in order to be censured for not waiting upon the Queen in her last extremities [Y]; and there is some reason to believe, that the Doctor himself was not without

(oo) See Radcliffe's Memoirs, p. 78. He was afterwards complimented by the university with his doctor's degree in the same manner, in consideration of his great abilities as a scholar, and, indeed, was reputed generally one of the politest writers of the age. As to his doctor's degree, see his volume of sermons, p. 568. folio.

[X] He entertained Prince Eugene with a dinner, where English beef and beer held their just pre-eminence.] During this Prince's stay in England, it happened that his Highness's nephew, the Chevalier Soissons, was so bruised, in a nightly encounter with the watch, that he was thrown into a violent fever, which was said to terminate in the small-pox. Dr Radcliffe, after a day being called upon for his advice, frankly told the Prince, That he was extremely concerned he could be of no service to him, in the recovery of a person so dear and so nearly related to him, as the Chevalier; since the Sieur Swartenburgh, his Highness's physician, had put it out of his power, by mistaking the nature of the distemper: but that he should hold it amongst the greatest honours he had ever received, if he might have the happiness of entertaining so great a General, to whose noble achievements England was so much indebted, at his poor habitation. In pursuance of which invitation, after the Chevalier was interred amongst the Ormond family, in Westminster-Abbey, and the Prince had dined and supped with several of the nobility, he acquainted Dr Radcliffe with his intention of making him a visit, on such a day. The Doctor made provision for his guest, and instead of the high dainties, which his Highness found at other tables, he ordered his to be covered with barons of beef, jiggets of mutton, and legs of pork, for the first course. Upon which the Prince, at taking leave, said, very gallantly in French: Doctor, I have been fed at other tables like a Courtier, but received at your's like a Soldier, for which I am highly indebted to you; since I must tell you, that I am more ambitious of being called by the latter appellation, than the former. Nor can I wonder at the bravery of the British nation, that has such food, and liquors (22), of their own growth, as you have this day given us a proof of.

[Y] Is censured for not waiting upon the Queen, in her last extremities.] This appears from the following letter, written by the Doctor, to one of his friends, at this time.

(22) This alludes to some beer seven years old, which the doctor caused to be served round to the company.

Catehalton, August 7. 1714.

Dear Sir,
 ' I could not have thought so old an acquaintance,
 ' and so good a friend, as Sir J——n always professed
 ' himself, would have made such a motion against me.
 ' God knows my will to do her Majesty any service,
 ' has ever got the start of my ability; and I have no' thing that gives me greater anxiety and trouble, than ' the death of that great and glorious Princess. I ' must do that justice to the physicians that attended
 ' her, in her illness, from a sight of the method that ' was taken for her preservation, by Dr Mead, as to ' declare, nothing was omitted for her preservation;
 ' but the people about her, (the plagues of Egypt fall
 ' on them) put it out of the power of physic to be of ' any benefit to her. I know the nature of attending ' Crowned Heads, in their last moments, too well, to ' be fond of waiting upon them, without being sent ' for by a proper authority. You have heard of par' dons being signed for physicians, before a Sovereign's
 ' demise: however, ill as I was, I would have went ' to the Queen in a horse-litter, had either her Ma' jesty, or those in commission, next to her, com' manded me so to do. You may tell Sir J——n as ' much, and assure him from me, that his zeal for her ' Majesty, will not excuse his ill usage of a friend,
 ' who without apprehensions of being assassinated on the same account [Z]. It was even furnished by some, that the terrors he was under from the suspicions he had of the populace, and added to the want of agreeable companions, which were not to be had in his retirement from town, hastened his death; which happened two months after, on the first of November 1714, being aged sixty-four years. His body lay in state, at the house where he died, 'till the twenty-seventh of that month; whence, being first removed to the house of one Mr Evans, then an Undertaker in the Strand, it was conveyed to Oxford, where it was interred on Friday the third of December following, on the fourth-east side of the organ-gallery in St Mary's church, in that university [AA]; which by his will, dated September

' who has drank many a hundred bottles with him; and cannot, even after this breach of a good understanding that ever was preserved between us, but have a very good esteem for him. I must also desire you to thank Tom Chapman, for his speech in my behalf, since I hear it is the first he ever made, which is taken more kindly; and to acquaint him, that I should be glad to see him at Cashealton; since I fear (for so the gout tells me) that we shall never more sit in the house of Commons together.

' I am,

' dear Sir,

' your's,

' with the greatest friendship,

' and obfervance,

' JOHN RADCLIFFE (27).'

[Z] The Doctor was not without apprehensions of being assassinated on this occasion ] This is evident, from the following letter, which was copied from his own hand-writing; and directed to Dr Mead, at Child's Coffee-house, in St Paul's Church-yard.

Cashealton, August 3. 1714.

' Dear Sir,

' I give you and your brother many thanks, for the favour you intend me to-morrow; and if there is any other friend, that will be agreeable to you, he shall meet with a hearty welcome from me; dinner shall be on the table by two, when you may be sure to find me ready to wait on you. Nor shall I be at any other time from home, because I have received several letters, which threaten me with being pulled in pieces; if ever I come to London. After such menaces as these, 'tis easy to imagine, that the conversation of two such very good friends, is not only extremely delectable, but the enjoyment of it, will be a great happiness, and satisfaction, to him,

' Who is,

' dear Sir,

' your most obliged,

Past 4 in the Afternoon.

' humble servant,

' JOHN RADCLIFFE (28).'

[AA] Was interred in St Mary's church in that university ] The Saturday before it's arrival, the following Programma was published by the Vice-Chancellor.

' At a general meeting of the Vice-Chancellor, Heads of Houses, and Proctors of the University of Oxford, at the Apodyterium of the Convocation-house, on Saturday, November 27, 1714.

' For the more solemn performance of the Funerals of the late worshipful Dr John Radcliffe, our most munificent Benefactor; it is agreed, and ordered, as follows:

' I. That upon ringing St Mary's great bell, on Wednesday next, at one of the clock, in the afternoon; all members of Convocation do repair to the public schools, in their common wearing gowns and caps; there, together with the Vice-Chancellor,

' and Proctors, to receive the corps at the great gate, and to attend the same to the Divinity school, where it is to be deposited, and to lie for public view, 'till eleven of the clock on Friday morning.

' II. That on Friday, at twelve of the clock, upon tolling St Mary's great bell, all members of the Convocation, aforesaid, (as also the noblemen) do meet in the Convocation-house, in such their several habits, and hoods, as are usually worn, at the holding a Convocation; there to abide in their proper seats, whilst the public Orator makes a Latin Oration over the body; which, on that occasion, is to be removed thither, and, whilst other proper ceremonies are performing.

' III. That from thence all the company to attend the body, by Brazen nose, Lincoln, Exeter, and Jesus's Colleges, to the North Gate; and so by Carfax, to St Mary's church; where all persons, being seated in their proper places, and the Burial Service being begun by Mr Vice-Chancellor: after the Lesson; a Funeral Anthem is to be sung, by the Choir; and when that is ended, and the Corps brought to the grave, the Orator is to make another short speech. After which, the remaining part of the Burial office being performed, every one is quietly to depart home.

' IV. That a Convocation be held, in which the benefactions of Dr Radcliffe, being first declared, a proposal shall be made, for a decree to enroll the Doctor's name in the Registry of the public Benefactors of the University; for conferring honorary degrees, and for giving all other possible testimonies of our grateful regard to the memory of the deceased.

' V. All Bachelors of Arts, and under Graduates, are hereby strictly commanded to behave themselves, in a manner, suitable to so solemn an occasion. And all persons, whatsoever, are enjoined, upon the severest penalties, not to tear off the escutcheons; or to make any disturbance in the church, the Divinity school, or in any part of the procession; and all magistrates are to take care, that no disorder may happen, through the whole course of the solemnity, or at least that no offender may go unpunished.

' BERNARD GARDINER, Vice-Chancellor.

' All Colleges, and Halls, are desired to toll a bell from twelve of the clock on Wednesday, and from twelve of the clock on Friday, 'till the great bell at St Mary's ceases, on each day (29).'

This order was executed in every particular, only Mr Lindsey, one of the Fellows of University College, made a speech, in honour of his memory, over the grave. The order of the procession, was in this manner. The Vicar of St Mary's, one of the Fellows of Oriel College, Mr Peter Randal, with the Sexton, led the van, followed by the Vice-Chancellor, preceded by his Beadles; after whom followed the corse; the pall of which was supported by the Bishops of Bristol, and Chester, the master of University, and Rector of Lincoln college, the Regius Professor of Divinity, and Professor of Law (30). Then came two of the Doctor's nephews, Mr Smith, and Mr —, followed by the like number of his Executors, viz. Sir George Beaumont, and Mr Bromley. Then the Regius Professor of Physic, after whom, all the faculty; then the noblemen, then the Doctors of Divinity, and Law, followed by the Bachelors of both, and the Masters of Arts; all of them being presented with gloves, and rings, before their setting out from the Convocation-house. They were met at the Carfax, in their passage to the church, by the three

(29) See the Register of the University.

(30) The names of these bearers were, the Doctors George Smalridge and Francis Gaftrell, Arthur Charlett, Will. Adams, John Potter, then Bishop of Oxford, and afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, and Dr Thomas Bouchier, Principal of Alban-hall.

(27) See his Memoirs, p. 88, 89.

(28) Ibid. p. 90.

September 13, 1714, after the payment of some legacies, he endowed with his whole estate [B B], and is enrolled as one of their greatest benefactors.

choirs of Christ church, New college, and St John's; who continued singing an Anthem before the corse, 'till it was set down before the pulpit. When the Vice-Chancellor read the service, and after a proper Anthem, set to Music by the Professor of that science, did the office of interment. After it was agreed in Convocation that Mr Digby Cotes, the public Orator, Fellow of All-Souls-college, and that Mr Lindsey who spoke the Funeral Oration over the grave, should be ordered to print their speeches, in a book of Verses, to be compos'd in honour of the deceas'd. But the Bachelors of Arts, and Under-graduates, being dissatisfied at their being pass'd over, in the order of the procession, were unwilling to write on that subject; so the design was laid aside. Mr John Smith, one of the Doctor's nephews, who was then a Student of the Common-Law, at Gray's-Inn, was created Bachelor of Law, by a diploma (31). Sir George Beaumont, likewise, (the other Executor, Mr Bromley, having that honour confer'd upon him some years before) was made Doctor of Law, in the same manner.

(31) The other, Mr James Smith, being bred up in rustical affairs, rendered him unfit for this honour.

[B B] By his Will, after the payment of a few Legacies, he endowed the University with his whole estate.] The Will is too long to transcribe, but the tenor of it is as follows. Imprimis, he gives his manor of Linton, and all his lands in Yorkshire, in trust, to pay thereout 600l. per annum, to each of two persons, to be chosen out of the University, when they are Masters of Arts, and enter'd on the Physic line; by the Archbishop of Canterbury, Lord Chancellor or Keeper, the Chancellor of the University, the Bishops of London, and Winchester, the two principal Secretaries of State, the two Chief Justices, and the Master of the Rolls, all for the time being, or the major part of them. The said two persons to continue for ten years, and no longer, the half of which time, to travel beyond sea for improvement, and the vacancies to be fill'd up in six months. The yearly overplus, of the rents, of the said Yorkshire estate, to be paid to University-college, for buying perpetual advowsons for their members. He then gives his sister, Mrs Hannah Redshaw, 1000l. per annum, for her life: and to his sister, Mrs Mellicent Radcliffe, 500l. per annum: to John Smith, his nephew, 500l. per annum; and to his brother, James Smith, 250l. per annum: to his niece, Green, 200l. per annum; all for their respective lives: and his estate in Bucks, as also his personal estate, is charg'd for the payment thereof. He next gives to St Bartholomew's Hospital, 500l. per annum, towards mending their diet; and 100l. per annum, for buying linnen; both for ever. He then gives 5000l. for building the rest of the front of University-college, down to Logic lane; answerable to that part already built, and for building the Master's lodgings therein, and chambers for his two travelling Fellows. He next wills his Executors to pay, 40000l. in ten years, at 4000l. per annum; the first payment to be made after the decease of his two sisters, for building a Library in Oxon, and purchasing the houses, between St Mary's, and the schools, in Cat street; where he intended the Library to stand: and after it is built, he gives 150l. per annum, to the Keeper of it; and 100l. per annum, to buy books. He then gives to his nephew Redshaw, (then, or late in the East-Indies) 5000l. To all his servants, that lived with him at the time of his decease, a year's wages, and mourning: and, besides which, he gives to his servant, William Singleton, 50l. per annum, for his life: to John Bond, and Benjamin Berkshire; as also, to Eliz. Stringer, and Sarah, all his servants, 20l. per annum, each, for life. Lastly, he settles all his estates in Buckinghamshire, Yorkshire, Northamptonshire, and Surrey, and elsewhere; and all his real and personal estate whatsoever, charg'd with the abovemention'd payments, to William Bromley, Esq; Sir George Beaumont, Baronet, Thomas Sclater, of Gray's Inn, Esq; and Anthony Keck, of Fleet street, Gent. &c. for ever, and appointing them his Executors, gives them 500l. each, for their trouble. He likewise leaves all the residue, and overplus, of his real and personal estates, to be applied to such charitable uses, as they think best, but not to their own use. He afterwards wills his Yorkshire estate to be convey'd and settled by his Executors, on the Society of University-college, for ever; in trust, and for the performance of the uses, and trusts, as before declared. And desires his Executors to charge and secure, in the most effectual manner, the several perpetual annuities, given out of his Buckinghamshire estate, which it was his intention not to have fold, and the overplus of the rents and profits, to be employ'd in other charitable uses, as aforesaid; and by his Executors charg'd and fix'd on the said estate, in their life-time. And he would have charg'd on the said Buckinghamshire estate, 1000l. per annum, for ever; to commence thirty years after his decease, for repairing the said Library, when built. The Library-keeper to be a Master of Arts, and chosen by the persons appointed before, to choose the physicians. And his Executors, may, if they see his estate will answer, prepare for, and begin the building of the Library sooner.

The foundation stone, of this sumptuous edifice, was laid on the sixteenth of June, 1737: on it was fix'd a copper plate, with the following inscription.

Quod felix faustumque sit Academix Oxoniensi;
Die 16 Kalendarum Junii
Anno MDCCXXXVII.
Carolo Comite de Arran, Cancellario,
Stephano Niblet, S. T. B.
Vicecancellario,
Thoma Paget & Johanne Laud, A. M.
Procuratoribus,
Plaudenti undique
Togata gente
Honorable admodum Dominus Dominus Carolus Noel-Somerfet.
Honorabilis Johannes Verney
Gualterus Wagstaff Bagot, Baronettus,
Edwardus Harley } & } Armigeri, Edwardus Smith }
Radcliffiificenti
Testamenti Curatores,
P. P.
Jacobus Gibbs Architecto.

And the whole building was completed in the year 1747; when the Duke of Beaufort, Edward, Earl of Oxford, Sir W. Wag. Bagot, Sir Watkyn Will. Wynne, and Edw. Smith, were the Trustees. In justice to whom, the Architect declares, that in all the business of the sort, in which he had been engag'd, he never observ'd a trust discharged with greater unanimity, integrity, and candour, during the whole time he had the honour of serving them, from laying the first stone, to it's finishing; and that all persons employ'd therein by them, did honour them for their punctual payments, and great diligence, in seeing every part put in execution with the nicest economy, and equity. 'And I wish, concludes he, you may be a pattern (32) to posterity, to follow your excellent example, on any occasion of the like nature.' Mr Wife, of Trinity-college, was appointed first Librarian.

The Doctor further wills, that his living of Headborne-Worthy, in Hampshire, and all other livings, that shall be purchas'd by him, to be bestow'd on a member of University-college; and if they should be deficient there, then to a Fellow of Lincoln college, and after they have preach'd two or more laudable sermons at St Mary's. The nomination of the persons to be present'd, is lodg'd in the Vice-Chancellor, the two Divinity Professors, the Master of University-college, and the Rector of Lincoln-college; or the major part of them.

(32) Bibliotheca Radcliffiana: or, A short Description of the Radcliffe-Library at Oxford, containing it's several plans, parts, sections, and ornaments, in twenty-three copper-plates, neatly engrav'd, with an explication to each plate. By James Gibbs, Architect, F. R. S. 1747, folio.

* It was wrote the first of these wars by him self, and the second way by most oobers.

(a) That is the family of this name, but the pedigrees are too general to fix any ce tainty about this branch of it, only that an ella e called Smal-ridge, in the parish of Axminster, which was in possession of the Raleghs at or before the Conquest, and continued in it till Henry VIII. time, was then sold by Sir Walter's grandfather, Wimond, to John, the father of Sir John Gilbert, of Compton.

(b) See Sir Humphry Gilbert's article.

(c) Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 435.

(d) Id. ibid.

(e) Camden's Elizabetha under that year; who tells us, the troop bore this motto in their standard, Finem det mihi Virtus; Let Valour decide the cause.

(f) Thuanus, Tom. II. col. xlvi. p. 69. edit. 1676. Mr Wood therefore is mistaken, in supposing our author staid at Oxford two or three years.

(1) History of the World. Lib. V. cap. ii. §. 8.

RALEGH, or RAWLEGH* [Sir WALTER], distinguished frequently by the title of the Noble and Valorous Knight; and the first discoverer and planter of Virginia, in North-America: was of ancient and honourable extraction, from a family seated in Devonshire, soon after, if not before, the Norman Conquest (a). Being the younger son of Walter Ralegh, Esq; of Fardel, in the parish of Cornwood, near Plymouth; by Katherine, daughter of Sir Philip Champernon, of Modbury; and relict of Otho Gilbert, of Compton (b), all in the same county. She was Mr Ralegh's third wife; and upon the marriage, he carried her to a farm, of which he had the remainder of a fourscore years lease, called Hayes; situate in the parish of Budley, in that part of Devonshire bordering, eastward, upon the sea, and near the mouth of the river Ottery. The situation being pleasant, they fixed their residence in the farm-house, which therefore happened to be the place of Sir Walter's birth (c). He was born in 1552, and after a proper foundation of school, was sent to Oriel-college, in Oxford, about the year 1568; where, being put under the care of an excellent tutor, he quickly made such a proficiency in academical learning, oratorical and philosophical, that he became the ornament of the younger part of the University (d). But his ambition prompting him to pursue the road to Fame, in an active life, he made but a short stay at Oxford. The juncture of the times concurred with the turn of his genius, and furnished those great occasions which are necessary for drawing forth great talents. Queen Elizabeth, resolving to assist the persecuted Protestants of France; not only exhorted other princes of the same persuasion, to lend their hands to the common cause; but supplied the Queen of Navarre with men and money to support it. Among other English forces, employed on this occasion, Henry Champernon, a relation by marriage of the Earl of Montgomery, carried under his command a select troop of a hundred gentlemen volunteers, well mounted and accoutred: in the list of whom, young Walter Ralegh was the most noted (e). The troop arrived in the French camp, on the fifth of October 1569 (f); and our young soldier continued in this service, five or six years: in which compass of time, as there may be enumerated, near thirty battles, sieges, overthrows, treaties, and capitulations, on one side or other; so, it is manifest, that he was hazardously engaged in some, if not several of them [A]: nor by what means he escaped perishing in the general massacre, which began at Paris, on the bloody vespers of St Bartholomew, in 1572, is it yet known (g); but we find him in London, and exercising his poetical talents, in the Middle-Temple, in 1576 [B]. However, 'tis certain that he did not reside in the Inns-of-Court, in the view of studying the Law (h): on the contrary, his mind was still bent on military glory; he only waited here, a fresh opportunity of proceeding as he had begun, to push his fortune in arms. And he did not wait long; for the Dutch groaning under the Spanish yoke, had begged Queen Elizabeth's assistance, the preceding year, and their complaints increasing by the tyranny of Don John of Austria, who was appointed Governour of the Low-Countries under the King of Spain, in 1577; who also raised the jealousy of the English, by his treachery to this nation; the Queen not only receded from that peace and neutrality with the Spaniards, then in agitation, but sent the States both men and money, to carry on the war with more vigour against them (i). Our young soldier went with these forces under the command of General Norris, and probably had a share in the honour of that memorable day, anno 1578, which buried the reputation of Don John (k). Upon Mr Ralegh's return to England soon after, his uterine brother,

(g) Perhaps with Sir Philip Sidney he might take sanctuary, in the Ambassador Walsingham's house, as Mr Oldys conjectures in his life of Sir Walter, prefixed to his History of the World, edit. 1736. folio, p. 10.

(h) He said expressly at his trial that he never studied it. But this can be no good reason why he might not reside in chambers in the Temple as is well known; and therefore the objection against that residence is frivolous, which is made by Theobald in Memoirs of Sir Walter Ralegh, p. 5. edit. 1719. 8vo.

(i) See the General Histories of England.

(k) At the battle of Rimenant. Strada de bello, Belg. who observes, that among these troops were those of Colonel Tho. Morgan, who were the first perfect Harquebusers of our nation, and the first who taught us to like the musquet,

[A] He was hazardously engaged in some of them.] We have an account from himself, of one deliverance which he had in these wars; where reasoning upon the manner and opportunities of retreats in battle, he first gives an example of it's being less dishonour to retire in the dark, than to be ruined in the light; in the sentiment of Monsieur de la Noüe, upon the retreat made just before the battle of Moncountour. For, says that Frenchman, staying upon our reputation, in shew not to dislodge by night; we loit our reputation indeed, in dislodging by day; whereby we were forced to fight upon our disadvantage, and to our ruin. 'Yct, says Ralegh, did that worthy gentleman, Count Lodowick of Nassau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retreat at Moncountour, with so great resolution, as he saved one half of the Protestant army, then broken and disbanded; of which myself was an eye-witness, and was one of them who had cause to thank him for it (1).' In another place, he speaks of a stratagem which he and his company used with success at Languedoc; where the enemy had fortified themselves in certain caves, which had but one narrow entrance cut in the mid-way of the high rocks; 'and which, says he, we knew not how to enter by any ladder, or engine; till at last, by certain bundles of lighted straw, let down by an iron chain, with a weighty stone in the midst, those that defended it were so smothered, that they surrendered themselves, with their plate, money, and other goods, therein hidden; as otherwise

'they must have died like bees that are smoaked out of their hives (2).'

[B] He exercised his poetical talents, in 1576.] We have a commendatory poem, in three hexastic stanzas, prefixed among others, to a Satire, called, The Steel Glass; published this year, by George Gascoigne, Esq; a learned and ingenious Poet of repute in those days; who having led a life somewhat like Ralegh, in foreign travel, and military services, may well be thought to have had some acquaintance with him. Add to this, that Gascoigne had a kind of familiar dependency upon the Lord Grey, of Wilton, as appears from the dedication of this, and some other of his works. He also used the very motto under this picture, prefixed to this satire; Tam Marti, quam Mercurio (3); which, after his death, is so well known to have been assumed by, or appropriated to, Ralegh himself. The middle stanza of our author's poem, is a remarkable indication of his own fortune and fate; as follows.

(2) Id. Lib. IV. cap. ii. §. 16.

(3) See some account of this Gascoigne and his works in Athco. Oxon. Vol. i. col. 190, & seq.

Though sundry minds, in sundry sort do deem;
Yet worthiest wights yield praise to every pain:
But envious brains do nought or light esteem,
Such stately steps as they cannot attain:
For who so reaps renown above the rest,
With heaps of hate shall surely be oppress'd.

(l) See a particular account of this voyage in Sir Humphry Gilbert's article.

(m) Cox's Hist. of Ireland, under this year 1580. This is the first time we meet with him in Ireland. Hooker's Supply of the Irish Chronicles, in Holingshead, Vol. II. col. 366.

(n) Arthur, Lord Grey, of Wilton, who had lately received the sword of Ireland from Sir William Pelham; he was made Deputy in July, and took the sword from Pelham in August. Cox.

(o) This cruelty, and indeed the whole conduct of the deputy in this affair, was much disliked by the Queen; but no part of it was ever charged to Raleigh more than to Mackworth, or the rest of the officers. Cox, p. 366.

brother, Sir Humphry Gilbert, having newly obtained a patent of the Queen, to plant and inhabit some northern parts of America, engaged him to embark in that adventure; but the first attempt, in which they had a desperate sea-fight with a Spanish fleet, being defeated, our adventurers returned home in 1599 (l). And now new disturbances broke out, which served Mr Raleigh with new matter of glory. The Pope, and the Spanish Monarch, having concerted on absolute conquest of the English crown and dominions, resolved to begin with the reduction of Ireland. In this design, some Spanish and Italian forces, being sent under the Pope's banner, in 1580, to assist the Desmond's in the Munster rebellion; we find Raleigh among that body of his countrymen, which effectually broke the mischievous attempt. For, among other defeats, Sir James Desmond being taken prisoner, was, by the Lord-Justice, Sir William Pelham, and the Council, delivered to the Provost-Marshal of Munster, and Captain Raleigh; and, pursuant to the commission directed to them, was tried, condemned, and executed; his head and limbs being impaled, on the city gates of Cork (m). The Captain had several successful skirmishes with parties of the rebels, shortly after [C]; and upon the surrendry of the fort, where the foreign troops had lodged themselves, Raleigh and Mackworth, having the ward of that day, the ninth of November, first entered the castle; and, with their companies, made a great slaughter. So that, except the Spanish commander, and his camp-master, with a few Spanish officers, who were sent prisoners into England and reserved for ransom, all the invaders, between four and five hundred, were, according to the Deputy's (n) positive command, put to the sword (o); and thus the country was weeded of those noxious foreigners. Raleigh was quartered this winter at Cork, where having observed the seditious practices of David, Lord Barry, and other ring-leaders of the rebellion in those parts; he took a journey, in person, to Dublin; and represented the dangerous consequences so urgently, to the Deputy and Council; that they returned him with a full commission to enter upon the castle, called Barry-Court, with all other lands of the said Barry; and to reduce him to peace and subjection, by such means as he judged most feasible; appointing him, for his farther enablement, a party of horse. In his journey back he was way-laid, by an old rebel of Barry's faction, whom he encountered, and defeated; and at last broke through the ambuscade. But in the interim, such measures were used with those in authority at Cork, that the commission proved of little effect (p). However, upon the Earl of Ormond's departure for England; in the spring of the ensuing year, 1581, his government of Munster was given, during his absence, to Captain Raleigh; in commission with Sir William Morgan, and Captain Piers. Raleigh lay, for the most part, at Lismore; and in the country, and woods about, spent all this summer in continual action against the rebels. Then he removed, with his little band of fourscore foot, and eight horse, to his old quarters at Cork; carrying with him two prisoners he had taken, in a skirmish with Barry, on the road, when many other rebels were slain. While he lay at Cork, he performed several other notable services; among which, his excellent conduct in the seizure of Lord Roch, is more particularly remembered and applauded [D]. In the month

(p) The estate of Barrimore was made over to the mother of David Barry, and only rented to the son; yet partly in fear of the commission, partly through spite and indignation, he burnt the castle himself to the ground, and wasted the country about it with greater outrage and destruction than his enemies, had they taken it, would have done. Ibid. p. 367.

[C] He had several skirmishes with the rebels shortly after.] Having observed it to be the custom of the Irish Kerns, upon any dislodgment of the English camp, to flock in parties thither, and glean away whatever they saw left behind; he lingered, and lay in ambush, to receive them. They came accordingly, with their wonted constancy and greediness; but in the midst of their pralling, Raleigh fell upon them so advantageously, that he enclosed them all with his men, and took every rebel upon the spot, who was not slain in the resistance. Among them, there was one laden with withies; who being demanded what he intended them for, boldly answered, to hang up the English churls; well, said Raleigh, but they shall now serve for an Irish Kern, so commanded him to be immediately tucked up in one of his own neck-bands*. We read of another Irish rebel, but of greater rank, named Brian O'Rourk; who, being afterwards to suffer at the gallows, shewed great concern that it was to be by the common halter; and earnestly petitioned, not for pardon, or preservation of life, but that they would change the instrument of his death; and instead of a rope, let him take his swing in a withy: and being asked, why he insisted upon such an insignificant distinction? he answered, it was a distinction had been paid to his countrymen before him (4).

[D] His conduct, with regard to Lord Roch, is particularly commended.] This happened before the departure of the Earl of Ormond, by whom Lord Roch being much suspected to hold confederacy with some of the chief rebels, Raleigh undertook to bring him and his family before the Earl of Cork. But the design of this hazardous surprize took air among the enemy, and a party of eight hundred men, under Fitz-Edmonds and Barry, were gathered to way-lay the English, either going or coming. However Raleigh, knowing the Lord Roch to be a powerful and popular man, among the Irish, so suddenly commanded all his company to be in readiness, by eleven o'clock that night, and they were so punctual to the hour, that he directly marched away to Bally-in-Harsh, which was Roch's seat, about twenty miles from Cork, and escaped the ambuscade. He arrived there by break of day; but the townsmen were so alarmed, that they soon gathered five-hundred strong. Raleigh drew up, and in such a manner bestowed his men, in the town itself, that he soon quelled and restrained the people there: then selecting half a dozen out of his company, and appointing another little party to follow him, he marched up to the castle. He was met by three or four of Roch's gentlemen, of whom he desired to speak with their Lord; which was agreed to, on condition he would dismiss three or four of his own attendants: to this, with apparent readiness, he complied; but so contrived, that none of them were locked out. Then he gave them directions, which way the rest also without the gates might be admitted, while he should hold the Lord Roch in discourse. This succeeded so happily, that, by degrees, his whole compliment were got within the court-yard; some guarding the gates, others waiting in the hall, each having his piece laden with a brace of balls. The Lord Roch was amazed, and terrified, at so silent and insensible a seizure; but dissembling his uneasiness he would needs have Raleigh, and the gentlemen with him, partake of his plentiful table. Yet the policy of his hospitality did not defeat that of their enterprise; for as soon as dinner was over, Raleigh ingeniously laid open the occasion of his visit. Lord Roch made many excuses, and, in the end, absolutely refused to go along with him. But when the commission was produced, and he found Raleigh inflexible, he chose * Cox's History of Ireland, p. 376.

(4) Lord Bacon in his Essays brings this example to illustrate the force and tyranny of custom.

month of August, the same year, the Lord-Deputy made Captain John Zouch Governour of Munster, with whom Raleigh, and Dowdal, made several journies, to settle and compose the country. And when Zouch, with Dowdal, made that secret expedition, in which he lopped off the third branch of this venomous hydra, Sir John Desmond, he left the government of Cork to Raleigh (g); who, after this reduction, appears no longer in the wars of Ireland. But quickly after his return home, he presently drew the eyes of Queen Elizabeth upon himself, by a piece of gallantry. Her Majesty was taking the air, in a walk, when stopping at a plashy place, in doubt whether to go on or no; Raleigh dressed in the gay and genteel habit of those times, immediately cast off and spread his new plush cloak on the ground: the Queen trod gently over the fair foot-cloth, not less pleased than surprized with the adventure (r). It is a known Court-maxim, that an advantageous admission into the notice of a prince, is more than half a degree to preferment; and accordingly, we shall find, the Queen afterwards rewarded this seasonable sacrifice of a cloak, with many a rich and splendid suit [E]. The truth is, Raleigh always made a very elegant appearance, as well in the splendor of attire, as the politeness of address: having a good presence, in a handsome and well compacted person; a strong natural wit, and a better judgment; with a bold and plausible tongue, whereby he could set out his parts to the best advantage (s); all very engaging advocates for royal favour, especially in a female sovereign. His first State-employment, was among those gentlemen who were appointed to attend the French Ambassador, Monsieur Simier*, as his safe convoy to France. This Minister's errand was to treat about the Queen's match with the Duke of Anjou; and upon the Duke's departure from England, in February 1582-3, after the miscarriage of the match, our young courtier was one of that most splendid retinue of nobles and gentlemen (t), selected to wait upon the Duke to his new government of the Netherlands. They attended him to Antwerp, where making a most magnificent procession, he was created Duke of Brabant, &c. and invested with his charge. But Raleigh seems to have staid there some time after the rest; and through the opportunity of being personally known to the Prince of Orange, was honoured with some special acknowledgments from him to the Queen of England (u). Soon after his return, there fell out another incident, which, however threatening on it's first appearance, Raleigh found means to turn to his advantage. Before he left Ireland, he had a quarrel with Lord Grey; which being referred to a Council of War there, had like to have cost him his life, but was referred to the English Council. And that Lord having resigned the Sword of Ireland, the August preceding Raleigh's last mentioned return from Flanders, the dispute was heard at the Council-board, in the beginning of the year 1583. This proved another occasion of forwarding his favour at Court; for whether he had any advantage in the matter of the cause, or no (w), 'tis certain he had much the better in the manner of pleading it; and so much, that both her Majesty, and the Lords in Council, took no slight mark of the man, and his parts; and from thence he came to be known, and to have access to the Queen, and the Lords (x). It is not improbable, that in his first advancement at Court, he was befriended by the Earl of Leicester (y), apparently in regard to his nephew, Sir Philip Sidney, who is known to be Raleigh's friend. But be that as it will, we are assured that he had gotten the Queen's ear in a trice; she began to be taken with his elocution, and loved to hear his reasons to her demands. In the mean time, whatever second causes might contribute to his rise, 'tis generally allowed, that his own actions and accomplishments were the first (z). And to his honour we find him so far from sinking in the luxuries and vanities of a Court, now he enjoyed the smiles of it, that both his thoughts and his purse were employed in making preparations to leave it, for a very different course of life. Four of the six years period, of Sir Humphry Gilbert's patent, being elapsed, he thought it high time to make a new attempt, in person, at those discoveries he had before failed in. Accordingly having fitted out a fleet of four ships, Raleigh also victualled and manned out a strong handsome ship, which was the largest among them, built too at his own expence, and named Bark Raleigh, of three-hundred tons burden; and in her he set sail, in the quality of Vice-Admiral, to bear his brother Gilbert company, in this his last expedition to Newfoundland. His own ill luck, as well as his chose to do that by consent, which he found he must otherwise do by compulsion. Then Raleigh urged him, to oblige his townsmen, likewise, who had so faithfully risen for his defence, in his neighbourhood, to escort and defend him in the journey; to which Lord Roch also consented, professing he doubted not to clear himself of whatever allegations should be laid to his charge. When his Lordship, with his Lady and attendants, had made themselves ready, Raleigh was for another nocturnal progress. And though the night fell out so very dark and tempestuous, and the ways were so full of hills and dales, rocks and precipices, that many of his soldiers were much bruised by the falls; and one of them so mortified, that he lost his life in the march; yet the veil, with which the rest were sheltered by that obscurity, from the more dangerous ambuscades of the enemy, who had every where bestrewed the passages to intercept them, made sufficient compensation for those disasters. So that by the next morning, early, he presented his prisoners safe to the General, not without raising an universal astonishment, at his dextrous evasion of so many perils. But the Lord Roch, upon examination, was honourably acquitted, and approved himself a faithful subject ever after; and three of his sons laid down their lives in her Majesty's service (5).

[E] The Queen rewarded this sacrifice of a cloak, &c. Raleigh coming to Court after this adventure, found some hopes of the Queen's favour reflecting upon him; whereupon he wrote in a glass window, obvious to her eye; Fain would I climb, yet fear I to fall. Under which her Majesty soon after wrote, If thy heart fail thee, climb not at all (6). An answer worthy of that heroic Queen.

(g) Id. ibid.

(r) Fuller's Worthies of England in Devon.

(s) Naunton's Fragmenta Regalia, p. 29.

• This minister must have been in high favour and confidence with Q. Elizabeth, if there be any foundation for the story of those remarkable freedoms said to be taken with him; for which she is rallied smartly, in a letter from her cousin, Mary Queen of Scots. See A Collection of Burleigh's State Papers, p. 550. Printed this year, 1759, folio.

(t) Among whom were Admiral Howard, the Earl of Leicester, Sir Philip Sidney, &c.

(u) When he delivered his letters to the Queen, he prayed Raleigh to say to her from him, Sub umbra alarum tuarum protegimur, Raleigh's Select Essays.

(w) The particulars of this quarrel are not known.

(x) Naunton, ubi supra, p. 20.

(y) Sir H. Wotton in the Parallel of Essex and Strafford. Shirley in his life of Raleigh says, the Earl of Suffolk had likewise a hand in it.

(z) Naunton.

(5) Hooker's Supply, p. 174.

(6) Fuller's Worthies, as above.

(aa) In Sir H. Gilbert's article. Raleigh returned soon after they failed to Plymouth, his ship's company being seized with an infectious distemper, and Gilbert was drowned in coming home, after he had taken possession of Newfoundland.

(bb) Historical account of the voyages and adventures of Sir W. Raleigh, &c. by Captain Philip Raleigh, p. 3. edit. 1719. 8vo.

(cc) The patent may be seen in Hackluyt's Voyages, Vol. III. fol. 243.

• Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria, Vol. III. p. 254.

(dd) See The Journals of Parliament, by D'Ewes. It was read the same day, and then committed to the Vice-chamberlain Hutton, Secretary Walsingham. Sir Philip Sidney, Sir Francis Drake, Sir Richard Greenville, Sir William Courtney, Sir Will. Mohun, and others.

(ee) Being that day in a committee upon ways and means and a supply, he is there styled Sir Walter Raleigh. Journals of the House of Commons.

(ff) He was younger brother to Sir Humphry Gilbert. See this latter's article, remark [B].

(gg) See Harriot's article, and Hackluyt's Voyages.

his brother's fate, in this voyage, has been already mentioned (aa). But these examples and experiences were so far from discouraging, that they animated him the more to such honourable dangers. We are assured, from family tradition, that the discoveries of the great Columbus, the conquests of Fernando Cortez, the famous Francis Pizarro, and other leaders of the Spaniards; who, under the Emperor Charles, and his son Philip II. had made the greatest and most surprizing additions to their empire, that ever prince received, or subjects wrought, were the favourite histories, that took up Raleigh's early reading (bb). And now having found, by his own observations, that besides the southern and middle parts of America, which only had been settled by the Spaniards, there was a vast extent of land, north of the gulph of Florida, which might be well worth discovering, he resolved upon the enterprize. And as soon as he had digested his proposal, and displayed the manner of prosecuting it, in proper schemes, he laid them before the Queen and Council; to whom it appearing a rational, practical, and generous undertaking, her Majesty was pleased, in the beginning of the year 1584, to grant him full power to enjoy, by her letters patent, such countries as he should discover, according to his proposal (cc). Immediately, upon this grant, Raleigh gave his instructions for an American voyage, to Philip Amadas and Arthur Barlow, two experienced Commanders; and had got a couple of barks, well furnished with men and provisions, at his own expence, in such readiness, that on the twenty-seventh of April following, they departed from the West of England; where, after a successful voyage, in which they had discovered Wingandacoa, now Virginia, they arrived again, about the middle of September; when Raleigh laying before her Majesty the reports of this rich, beautiful, and virgin country, the discovery whereof was, he said, entirely owing to the auspices of a Virgin Queen. She was so well pleased with the honour and advantage it promised, and gave him such encouragement to compleat the discovery, (which he forthwith prepared to do, by another expedition) that she called it herself by the name of Virginia. About two months after, he was elected a Knight of the Shire, for the county of Devon*. The bill for confirming his patent, aforesaid, was passed in this parliament, on the eighteenth of December (dd); and before the twenty-fourth of February, he received the honour of knighthood (ee). About the same time that her Majesty granted him this patent, for discovering remote countries; she seems also to have given him a second, to licence the vending of wines, throughout the kingdom; that he might be the better able to sustain the great charges which the other brought upon him [F]. While the Parliament continued sitting, we find him in some committees; and as soon as it was prorogued, on the twenty-ninth of March, 1585, he appears several ways engaged in the laudable improvements of Navigation. For his brother Adrian Gilbert, of Sandridge, having two years before obtained a patent, for the discovery of the North-West Passage, Raleigh was one of the associates in this enterprize, which produced the discovery of Davis's Straights (ff). But before the first voyage in that search, which was begun this summer, Raleigh had sent out his own fleet for Virginia, which consisted of seven sail; whereof some were his own ships: they departed from Plymouth on the ninth of April this year. He deputed his gallant relation, Sir Richard Greenville, General of this expedition, and Mr Ralph Lane, to be Governor of the colony which they now transported; and having agreed with the King of Wingandacoa for the settlement, a hundred and seven men were left under the government of Mr Lane, to begin the plantation (gg), and continued there for a year, without disturbance. The General weighed anchor on the twenty-fifth of August, and about six days after took a Spanish prize of three-hundred ton richly laden; with which he arrived on the eighteenth of October at Plymouth, where he was courteously received by his worshipful friend †. The Munster Rebellion being absolutely ended, a scheme was pitched on, the latter end of this year, for the plantation of that province: to encourage which, the late Earl of Desmond's large territories in Ireland were disposed of, chiefly to such as had been instrumental in quelling the rebellion. One of the largest divisions, which was twelve-thousand acres, situate in the counties of Cork and Waterford, was given by her Majesty to Sir Walter Raleigh, and his heirs, with certain privileges and immunities, upon those conditions, of planting and improving the same, to which the rest were also obliged (bb). However, by these conditions, the bounty, large and capacious

[F] He obtained the patent for granting wine licences. There being no restrictions mentioned in this patent, from increasing the number of Vintners, in any part of the realm. Hence arose his controversy at this time with the University of Cambridge. For having, by virtue thereof, licensed one John Keymer to sell wine there, he was opposed therein by the University, in regard of their exclusive privilege. Several letters passed between Raleigh and the Vice-Chancellor, &c. and the difference was at last accommodated by the Lord-Treasurer Burleigh, then Chancellor of that University; who, in a letter to Norgate, his Vice-Chancellor, on the twenty-sixth of July, 1585, sent the opinions of the two Chief-Justices, Sir Christopher Wraye, and Sir Edmund Anderfon, upon this controversy, between that University and Mr Raleigh, for the nomination of Vintners, and setting the price of wine there; which opinion, is as follows.—'First, touching the nomination of Vintners there, We think it appertaineth to the University, by usage and Charters from her Majesty, confirmed by Parliament; and that Mr Rawlie*, can nominate none there. For the price, it seemeth they may set prices, so as it be according to the statute, and not otherwise; and if the Vintners set at higher prices, they are to be punished by law, which penalty Mr Rawlie may dispense withal; and yet cannot sue for the penalty, by his patent, against the statute-laws; for therein all liberties to the University are excepted (7).<sup>h</sup> After this, we hear no more of the dispute. However, 'tis certain, this patent helped to render him unpopular.

† Hackluyt's Voyages, Vol. III. fol. 257. Sir Lewis Stucley in his petition to King James, charges Sir Walter with embezzling 1000 l. of this prize, which is not probable, as will appear in the sequel.

(bb) Cox's History of Ireland, where we are told, the whole forfeiture was above 574,000 acres of land.

* So his name is wrote in that letter and opinion.

(7) Oldys, p. xxvii. From a letter in the possession of Hugh Howard, Esq.

[G] Having

as it seems, was rather expensive perhaps at first, than profitable to him: and to that expence may be ascribed, with probability, the delay given to the second voyage of Sir Richard Greenville; who, at his departure from Virginia, had promised the colony to return punctually with supplies, by the following Easter at farthest. And not coming within the time, the colony were obliged, through sickness, and other inconveniences, to take the opportunity, accidentally offered, of coming home in some ships under the command of Sir Francis Drake; and they arrived at Plymouth, July 27. 1586 (ii). Sir Walter Raleigh had in the mean time provided a ship of a hundred ton, freighted with all kind of provisions, for the relief of this colony; but she not sailing till after Easter, the colony was newly departed before this fresh supply arrived at Virginia: so that after some time spent in the country, in search of them, to no purpose, the ship returned with all the provisions to England. About a fortnight after, Sir Richard Greenville arrived at Virginia with three ships more, well stored, for the same company of planters; but he, after much search, missing also of them, and of the last-mentioned ship, left fifteen men at Roanoak, an island upon the coast of Virginia, with plenty of supplies, and made for England; not without some conquests over the Spaniards, at the Azores, in his return (kk). And Raleigh was also about this very time, victorious at the same place; for when he sent the aforesaid ship to relieve the colony, or soon after; he dispatched two more, named the Serpent, and Mary Spark, both of them his own, to the Azores, against the Spaniards. They departed from Plymouth on the tenth of June, this year, 1586, and having taken more Spanish prizes than they could bring home [G], returned to the same port, where they were received with triumphant joy: then proceeding to Southampton, they were met by their owner, who rewarded them with their shares out of the prizes. Not long after this, there was another voyage set out the same year, by the Earl of Cumberland, to the South-Sea, in which Sir Walter Raleigh was also an adventurer, his fine pinnace, named Dorothy, being engaged therein; and though the voyage was performed no farther than the latitude of forty-four degrees South, yet some small prizes being taken (ll), he had, no doubt, his proportion in the profits that accrued from them. We must not forget that it was Sir Walter's colony in Virginia, who on their return, first brought Tobacco to England; and that it was Sir Walter himself, who first brought this herb in request among us [H]; and thereby laid the foundation of that great traffick therewith, which has been of such considerable benefit to his country. Whether Queen Elizabeth, by her own example, did ever recommend the use of this herb, we are not certain; but it is evident, that it soon became of such vogue, in her Court, that some of the great Ladies, as well as Noblemen therein, would not scruple to blow a pipe sometimes, very sociably: notwithstanding it was such an abomination to the refined palate of her Scotch successor, that he not only refused the use of it himself, but endeavoured to rob his Crown of what has since proved one of its greatest revenues*, by restraining his subjects from it also (mm). About the same time our Knight was made Seneschal of the Dutchies of Cornwall, and Exeter, and Lord-Warden of the Stanneries in Devon, and Cornwall (nn). In effect, he was now grown such a favourite with the Queen, that those who had at first been his friends at Court, began to be alarmed; and to prevent their own supplantation, resolved to project his (oo). The Earl of Essex had by this time been near a twelve month abroad, under his father-in-law, Leicester, Governor of the Netherlands, when he went over was but nineteen years of age, being his first engagement in any public action, yet no less than a General of horse; and before that, as he himself says, he had small grace, and few friends at Court (pp). So that it must be now after their return, that Leicester set him up a competitor against Raleigh; as we are before informed by Sir Henry Wotton. There were also some aspersions thrown upon him by the populace [I]. However these were little regarded by him, he constantly attended

(ii) See Hariot's article as before.

(kk) See an account of Sir Richard's voyage in Hackluyt's collection.

(ll) Hackluyt's account of both these voyages, in Vol. II, p. li. fol. 126, and Vol. III. fol. 769.

• See observations on the nature, use, and trade of tobacco, folio, a single sheet, by Mr John Lacey, printed March 1, 1737. The duty upon it at a medium for seven years backwards, from 1731, amounted to 1690791. 08s. 10d.

(mm) In his Counter-blast to Tobacco, 4to. without date; and his warrant in 1604, for laying a duty upon it, of 6s. 8d. a pound, besides 2d. a pound usually paid before, that less quantity might be brought. Rymer's Fœderz, Tom. xvi. fol. 601.

(nn) Hooker in the dedication to his Irish History.

(oo) Naunton, as before.

(pp) Apology of the Earl of Essex, pen'd by himself, in 1598, to Mr Anthony Bacon, and printed in 1663, 4to. and again under the title of the Earl of Essex's vindication of the war with Spain, edit. 1729. p. 6.

(8) While this Sarmiento was Raleigh's prisoner, they were one day surveying a map together, concerning which Sarmiento told him a pleasant story of the Painter's Wife's Island, which Raleigh afterwards ingeniously applied in his History of the World, Lib. II. cap. xxiii. §. 4.

(9) Hackluyt, Vol. II. p. ii. fol. 120.

(10) This rarity resembled a modern muffle in height and width, with a cavity for a

[G] Having taken more prizes than they could bring home.] In one of them was the Governour of St Michael's Island. In another, which they took near the Ile of Graciosa, was the famous Pedro de Sarmiento, Governour of the Straights of Magellan; who was the farthest, and most experienced Navigator, in all Spain (8). They took, also, three other Vessels, but turned two adrift, after having taken out of them what they wanted, because they could not spare hands to man them: and after a fight of thirty-two hours, with two great carracks, and the other guard-ships of twenty sail more, richly laden, they gave over, for want of powder, and returned safe to Plymouth (9).

[H] He first brought Tobacco in use among us.] There are some pleasant stories of this plant, with relation to him; which have been as carefully preserved, as the box he kept it in (10). As Raleigh used at first to smook it privately in his study; 'tis said, his servant, who used to wait on him there, once bringing his Tankard of Ale and Nutmeg, surprized him, as he was intent upon his book, before he had finished his Pipe: and seeing the smoke reeking out of his mouth, threw all the Ale in his face. Then running down stairs, alarmed the family, with repeated exclamations that his Master was on fire, and before they could get up, would be burnt to ashes (11). Stories of such kind of simplicity, are frequent enough in history. The present is not much unlike that of those Virginians; who, the first time they seized a quantity of gun-powder, belonging to the English colony, sowed it for grain, with full expectation of reaping a plentiful crop of combustion, by the next harvest, to scatter their enemies (12).

[I] Aspersions were thrown upon him by the populace.] To this purpose we are told that Tarleton, the famous Comedian of those times, acting his part in a pleasant play made by himself, pointed at Sir Walter Raleigh; and said, alluding to a pack of cards, See, the Knave commands the Queen—And when the Queen, who was present, corrected him with a frown, he had the confidence to add; that He [Sir Walter] was of too much, and too intolerable a power. However, it seems Leicester fell under the same lash; for the Comedian proceeding in the same liberty, reflected on the over-grown power, and riches, of that Earl; and was so universally applauded, by the whole glass or metal receiver, big enough to hold a pound of tobacco, the edge at top of it, being joined to that of the box by a collar, pierced with six or eight holes for pipes. It was in the Museum of the late Mr Thoresby, of Leeds, in Yorkshire. Oldys.

(11) British Apollo, 3d. edit. 1725, Vol. II. p. 376.

(12) Winflow's Historical Rarities, 1668, 8vo.

attended his public charge, and employments, whether in town, or country, as occasions called him. Accordingly we find him the latter end of this year, 1586, in Parliament; where, among other weighty concerns, the fate of Mary, Queen of Scots, was determined; in which he probably concurred with the general opinion of the Houses: but 'tis more certain, that he was of the Committee appointed to confer upon the amendment of some things, whereto the Clergy were required to be sworn; and that some good course might be taken, to have a learned Ministry (99). But the stream of his affection still ran chiefly towards his Virginia; and in the resolution to persevere in planting it, he now prepared a new colony of a hundred and fifty men to be sent thither, under the charge of Mr John White, whom he appointed Governour, and with him twelve assistants; to whom he gave a charter, and incorporated them by the name of The Governour and Assistants of the city of Raleigh, in Virginia. Their fleet, consisting of three sail, departed from Portsmouth on the twentieth of April, 1587; and arriving in three months at Roanok, finding the former colony destroyed or dispersed, they re-established their interest and alliance with the natives; and then the ships, with some few of the company, returned with the Governour to England, for fresh supplies: not without storms, sickness, and death of several of them, by other like casualties, about the latter end of the same year *. Very soon after the going forth of this second colony, we find Sir Walter stiled Captain of her Majesty's Guard, Lord-Warden of the Stannaries, and her Highness's Lieutenant-General of the county of Cornwall (rr). Yet at the same time it somewhat appears, that neither the returns which might have been made, by any merchantable products in Virginia, nor the profits arising to him from any Spanish prizes, which had been taken at sea, were equivalent to the great expences he had been at, in settling this plantation; and farther, that he had received no particular or private assistance in this enterprize, from the Queen (ss). However, upon the account of the state of his plantation, by Governour White, he immediately appointed a pinnace to be sent thither, with all such provisions as he apprehended they might want; and also wrote letters to them, promising that he would prepare a good supply of shipping, and men, with all other necessaries, to be with them the Summer following. This pinnace, and fleet, he accordingly prepared at Biddeford, in the West of England, under the command of Sir Richard Greenville: and all things being now ready, they waited only for a fair wind. When the clamour of the great preparations in Spain, against England, occasioned a Council of War, to be held on the twenty-seventh of November, to consider how to put the forces of the realm in the best order to withstand any invasion by land; Sir Walter was of this council, probably drew up the determinations passed in it †, and was evidently very active in putting them into execution, in the West, where his particular jurisdiction lay. Besides these land preparations, it was thought necessary that all possible defence should be likewise made at sea; in which view most of the ships of war, then in any readiness, received orders from the State to attend in their harbours for the defence of their own country; and Sir Richard Greenville was personally commanded not to depart out of Cornwall (tt). Governour White, nevertheless, laboured so earnestly for the relief of the colony, that he obtained two small pinnaces, called the Brave, and the Roe, wherein fifteen planters, and all convenient provisions, for those who wintered in the country, were transported. They put over the bar of Biddeford, on the twenty-second of April 1588, and the same night came to an anchor at the isle of Lundy; but the company, minding more to make a gainful voyage, than a safe one, run in chase of prizes, and meeting with their match returned home, ransacked, and in a ragged condition, without performing their voyage; to the distress of the planters abroad, and displeasure of their patron at home (uu). But he was not now at leisure, either to repair, or lament the loss; being fully engaged in that memorable sea-fight, with the invincible Spanish Armada; the destruction whereof, is among the most glorious events of the English annals: to these, therefore, we must refer, for Sir Walter's share in that glory; only taking notice that his services herein, were received with so much approbation by the Queen, that she seems, as some recompence for them, to have made this year, a considerable augmentation in his patent of wines, by a grant of tonnage and poundage upon those liquors (ww). This year he also set up another office himself, under the title of an Office of Address [K]; which was no less praise-worthy, than this of wines, was profitable to him. Likewise, to secure the plantation of Virginia more effectually than could be expected from his own single assistance, he made an assignment to several gentlemen and merchants of London, for continuing it; granting to them all the privileges and advantages of trade and merchandises, contained in his patent, except a fifth part of the ore of gold and silver, which he reserved to himself and his heirs †. This assignment is dated March 7. 1588-9, and one principal motive for making it now, was apparently

(99) The Queen had, in this speech at the close of the last session, told the Bishops of some faults and negligences, which if you, my Lords of the Clergy, said she, don't amend, I mean to depose you. D'Ewe's Journal, 1708, folio, p. 413, and 328.

* Hackluyt, Vol. III. folio 208.

(rr) In Hackluyt's dedication of his translation of the voyages to Florida.

(t) Ibid.

† A discourse on the previous consultation touching the peace with Spain. See the list of his books among his political pieces, in remark [DD].

(tt) Oldys, P. xli.

(uu) Hackluyt's Voyages, first edit. 1589, fol. P. 77.

(ww) This patent was one of the most beneficial favours which he ever received of the Queen, and might perhaps exceed the pension which she settled on the Lord Admiral for his conduct and courage in the said overthrow.

‡ See the assignment in Hackluyt, p. 815.

(13) Tarleton's Journals, edit. 1611, 4to.

(14) Observations on the Statesmen and Favourites of England, p. 489, edit. 1665.

house, that her Majesty thought fit to pass it over, with a seeming unconcernedness; but yet was so offended, that she forbid Tarleton, and all her jesters, from approaching her table (13).

[K] He set up an Office of Address.] Mr David Lloyd tells us, it was intended to be in the capacity of an Agency, for all sorts of business (14): and so far it seems to be copied, by our modern offices of Intelligence. But Mr Oldys observed, that by another little hint, that has been elsewhere preserved, we may conceive this office did chiefly respect a more liberal intercourse, than would perhaps admit of all sorts of persons; and such as advanced rather to the improvement of men themselves, than of their means (15). In the former sense, the scheme was first proposed by Montague, or his father (16). In the second sense, Mr Hartlib endeavoured to revive it (17).

(15) Life of Sir Walter Raleigh, p. 24. From a letter written by John Evelyn to Henry, Earl of Clarendon.

(16) See Montague's Essays, lib. i. c. 34.

(17) See Sir William Petty's article.

apparently his engaging in another expedition against the Spaniards: being one of those gentlemen volunteers who assisted the Queen at their own expence, with a hundred and twenty sail of ships, fitted out and manned with fourteen or fifteen thousand soldiers and sailors, in order to restore Don Antonio, the expelled King of Portugal, then in London, to his dominions (xx). The fleet set sail, April 14. 1589, and the achievements of the English in the disablement of the enemy, especially as to their naval powers, so well satisfied the Queen, that she honoured the commanders, and Sir Walter Raleigh among the rest, with a golden Chain (yy). The fleet returned home in the latter end of June, but without Raleigh, who appears first to have touched upon the coast of Ireland; probably to make a short visit to his feignory there, and see some of his acquaintance among the new settlements in the province of Munster. Spenser, the poet, was one of these; he had gone to Ireland Secretary to the Lord Grey, and having obtained from the Earl of Desmond's forfeitures a considerable tract of land, in the county of Cork; the preservation and improvement of it engaged him to settle there: and a pleasant feat he had at Kilcolman, near the river Mulla, which ran through his grounds, and which he has so beautifully described in some of his poems. It was in this retirement that Raleigh now paid him a visit, the circumstances whereof Spenser himself has most agreeably celebrated in a poem; which, about two years after, he dedicated to his friend. The poem is well known by the title of Colin Clout's come home again; and therein, among other things, it appears, that they now entertained each other with some of their poetical compositions (zz); and that Raleigh persuaded Spenser to go along with him into England, proposing to introduce him to the Queen; and that the poet, knowing his interest, embraced the offer. Sir Walter's design was to put Spenser upon publishing the three books, he had then finished, of his Fairy Queen, which were accordingly printed, at London, the ensuing year, 1590, with a letter to Sir Walter; wherein the poet acknowledges that the plan, explaining the general intention of that allegorical poem, was drawn up, by the particular advice of this patron (aaa). It could not be later than this year, and was probably some few years before, that Sir Walter procured a lease for ninety-nine years, of the manour of Wilcomb, from Dr Thomas Godwin, Bishop of Bath and Wells (bbb). This could not but displease the clergy, and he gave further umbrage for that displeasure, by making use of his interest with the Queen, in favour of one John Udal, who was prosecuted for some passages in a book, he had now newly published against the Bishops [L]. We shall have still more matter of complaints against him, from this quarter, presently. In the mean time he had formed an enterprize upon Panama, with a design also of meeting the Spanish Plate-fleet; upon which scheme, having provided no less than thirteen ships of his own, and his associates, well manned, and stored, the Queen added to them two of her own Men of War, named the Garland and Forefigbt, and constituted him General of the fleet. With these ships he departed, in February 1591-2, for the West, where he was detained, by contrary winds, 'till the sixth of May, 1592; when, notwithstanding, a letter of revocation from her Majesty, which were construed by him in a sense of latitude, he continued his voyage 'till the eleventh of May; when, being off Cape Finisterre, there arose a storm which shattered and dispersed his fleet, and had nearly ingulphed himself in the sea. Whereupon, considering the season was too far spent for the enterprize against Panama, he returned home, leaving the fleet divided into two squadrons; one of which he committed to the care of Sir John Burgh, his Lieutenant-General, with orders to lie at the Azores, for the carracks from India; and the other he put under the command

(xx) See General Histories of England.

(yy) A letter to the Privy-Council, by Sir R. Williams; whence it appears that above two hundred prizes were taken by the English, who could not carry above sixty of them home for want of men.

(zz) The Art of English Poetry was published by Puttenham this year; in which some of Raleigh's poems are quoted with great commendation.

(aaa) See more of this in Spenser's article.

(bbb) See his article.

[L] He proteſted Udal, who was prosecuted for Treason, in a book wrote against the Bishops] The book is intituled. The demonstration of Discipline, which Christ hath prescribed in his Word, for the government of the Church, in all Times, and Places, until the World's end. In which, among other things, he had wrote as follows; 'Who can, without blushing, deny you [Bishops] to be the cause of all ungodlines? seeing your government is that, which giveth leave to a man to be any thing saving a sound Christian. For, certainly, it is more free, in these days, to be a Papist, an Anabaptist, of the family of Love, yea, any wicked one, whatsoever, than that which we should be, and I could live these twenty years, any such in England; yea, in a Bishop's house, may-be, and never be molested for it. So true is that, which you are charged with, in a Dialogue lately come forth against you, and since burnt by you; That you care for nothing, but the maintenance of your Dignities, be it to the damnation of your own souls, and infinite millions more.' For these, and some other expressions, he was indicted, tried, and condemned to death, for Treason. But, applying to Sir Walter Raleigh, the Sheriff brought him a reprieve, immediately after sentence; and he agreed to make a submission, in the form proposed by Dr Bond, one of the Queen's Chaplains. But this did not prove sufficient for his pardon; for a stricter form being in a few months required, by Dr Andrews, Bishop of Winchester, he was forced to make further application, not only by the Earl of Essex, but by Sir Walter Raleigh again, and Dean Nowell, against the menaces of the approaching Assizes at Kingston, by which means he escaped those Assizes. But, on the disturbance of Hacket, the Enthusiast, he was discouraged to make further sollicitation, while Lord-Chancellor Hatton lived: after whose death, he sued for liberty to go to church, which was denied him, being a condemned man. However, by the Lord-Treasurer's means, getting a copy of the indictment, and a pardon framed according to it, he was referred therewith to Archbishop Whitgift, yet could prevail nothing with him. 'Till, at last, Sir John Pickering, now Lord-Keeper, applying to his Grace, they both promised to obtain his pardon; and leave to go, as he had requested, to Guinea. But before these were fully confirmed, he died in prison (18). This is not the only instance, of Sir Walter Raleigh's exercise of his power and interest with Q. Elizabeth; for which, however, he was sometimes, at least, very well paid: as, particularly, in the case of John Littleton, Esq; for whose pardon, he had no less than 10000 l. *. In short, he plied the Queen so frequently with petitions, either for himself, or others, that one day having told her Majesty he had a favour to beg of her: When, Sir Walter, says she, will you cease to be a Beggar? To which he answered; when your gracious Majesty ceases to be a Benefactor (19).

(18) Strype's life and actions of Archbishop Whitgift, edit. 1718, folio, p. 343. K. James applied in behalf of Udal, who 'is said was the first man his Majesty asked for when he came into England, and being told he was dead, he replied, By my faith the greatest scholar in Europe's dead. See his letter to Q. Elizabeth, dated from Edinburgh, the 12th of June 1591, in the Cabala.

* See his article. (19) Apothegms of the English nation; printed in Miscellanies: or, A choice Collection of Wife, Sec. sayings, by G. M.

[M] Which

(ccc) He received this honour for his service in defeating the Spanish Armada in 1588. See his article.

* The letter is among the Harleian MSS in the British Museum.

(ddd) It was printed at Lyons with the title of Elizabethæ Reginae Angliæ Edictum promulgatum, Lond. Nov. 29, 1592; and Andr. Philopatri ad idem Responso. This edict was a severe proclamation against the English seminaries abroad. In which Sir Walter Raleigh was joined with several other Ministers of State. And Parsons was particularly struck at in it.

(eee) Osborne's Miscellanies of sundry Essays, in the preface. See also a piece intitled, Sir Walter Raleigh's Ghost, &c. and the tragedy of Sir Walter Raleigh, 1719, by Dr George Sewell.

(20) The sailors boldly confessed they had rather trust their souls to a merciful God by perjury, than their fortunes to the hands of unmerciful men. Camden's Eliz. 1592.

(21) Hackluyt's Voyages, Vol. II. p. ii. p. 194.

(22) Isaack's Antiquities of Exeter, p. 141. edit. 1681. 8vo.

mand of Sir Martin Forbisher (ccc), with instructions to lie off the south Cape, to terrify, and keep the Spaniards on their own coast. In consequence of these orders, Sir John Burgh fell in with, and took that prodigious carrack, called the Madre de Dios, the Mother of God; one of the greatest burden, belonging to the Crown of Portugal. The prize was reckoned the greatest and richest, that had ever been brought to England; and when the news of her being taken arrived, Sir Walter, consulting with Sir John Hawkins, wrote a letter to the Lord-Admiral, for a convoy to bring her to Dartmouth; wherein he declares, it was their opinion, that she could not be worth less than 500000 l. sterling*, which seems to be no over-value [M]. But so much was she pilfered, that the whole cargo, when it came to be landed, fell short, above two thirds of that computation. In the latter end of this year, and beginning of the next, 1593, we meet with Sir Walter in the Parliament House, where he made a distinguished figure also, as is evident from several of his printed speeches, in the debates. Particularly when the bill for granting certain subsidies, i. e. in the modern phrase, for granting a certain supply, to her Majesty, was in debate, and some members were for having it expressly distinguished in the bill, that the said subsidies should be for maintaining a war, impulsive, and defensive, against the Spaniards, that the conquests we made over them might be legal and warrantable, Sir Walter seconded that motion, and was appointed of the Committee for preparing the said bill; which, in the end, was carried agreeable to his propositions. Spain had felt the strength of his arms, in war, for a course of years; and here was an alarming instance of his power, and weight in the Council, against that enemy. The provocation was great, but the fort utterly impregnable by force; recourse was therefore had to fraud, as the only and indeed the more promising method, to work his ruin. The task was undertaken by Parsons, a Jesuit, a man absolutely turned for the purpose; who observing that Sir Walter was no great favourite of the populace, and somewhat obnoxious to the clergy, published a libel this year under the title of a Lover of his Country (ddd); wherein he expressly charged this Minister of State with Atheism; and it was managed so artfully, that the Queen herself is said to have been drawn into the belief of it, and even to have rebuked him for it: so that by his own confession, he was ever after branded with the title of Atheist (eee), though a known asserter of God, and Providence (fff). What might help to sharpen these detractions was another grant, which he obtained from the Crown, about the year 1594, of the manour of Sherborne in Dorsetshire, church-land, belonging to the see of Salisbury. There was, however, nothing extraordinary or peculiar to Sir Walter in this grant, it being a course usual with Queen Elizabeth, to reward such as had performed any considerable services for the State. Yet the practice has been variously censured, according to the humour and sense of the writers upon it [N], and has been a constant theme of obloquy by the zealous part of the clergy, who have not spared to call it Sacrilege; how justly, we leave to the reader's judgment. In the mean time 'tis allowed, by all hands, that Raleigh embellished his Sovereign's bounty, with great magnificence and commendations. He built in the park, adjoining to the castle (ggg), a noble house, which he beautified with orchards, gardens, and groves, of much variety, (fff) See Harriot's article.

(ggg) He first began to build the castle, but altered his purpose. Coker's Survey of Devonshire, p. 124. edit. 1732, folio.

[M] Which seems to be no over-value.] By her lading, according to the catalogue taken at Leaden-hall, September 15. this year, the principal wares consisted of Spices, Drugs, Silks, Callicoes, Carpets, Quilts, Cloth of the rind of trees, Porcellain or China ware, and Ebony; besides Pearl, Musk, Civet, and Ambergris; with many other commodities, of inferior value. The cargo freighted ten of our ships, for London; and was, by a moderate computation, valued at 150000 l. sterling; notwithstanding a large quantity of Jewels were never brought to light; and so much of her other goods was also purloined, by the sailors, soldiers, and officers (20), that at her arrival in England, she drew five feet less water, than she did when she was first freighted at Cochin, in the East-Indies. This carrack was in burden, no less than 1600 ton, whereof 900 were merchandize. She carried thirty-two pieces of brass ordnance, and between six and seven hundred passengers: was built, with decks, seven story; one main orlop; three close decks; one forecabin; and a spare deck of two floors apiece. And according to the measurement of Mr Robert Adams, an excellent Geometrician, she was in length, from the beak-head, to the stern, 169 feet; in breadth, near 47 feet: the length of her Keel, 100 feet; of the main-mast, 121 feet: it's circuit, at the partners, near 11 feet; and her main-yard, 106 feet (21).

[N] Has been variously censured, &c.] Those who have told it, not over-favourably, say; that about the year 1594, the Bishop of Salisbury, Dr John Coldwell, who had been bred a Physician, gave his See a strong purge, by alienating the manour of Sherborne to Sir Walter Raleigh (22). Sir John Harrington, speaks of an ominous preface, to make his tale as affecting as he can to Prince Henry, and insinuates the displeasure even of Heaven, against Sir Walter Raleigh: where he observes, 'That Sir Walter used often to ride post in these days, upon no small employments, between Plymouth and the Court, when Sherborne Castle being right in the way, he cast such an eye upon it, as Ahab did upon Naboth's vineyard; and once, above the rest, being talking of it; of the commodiousness of the place; of the strength of the feat; and how easily it might be got from the bishoprick; suddenly, over, and over, came his horse, that his face, which was then thought a very good face, ploughed up the earth where he fell. This fall was ominous, I make no question, says he; as the like was observed in Lord Hastings, &c. But his brother Adrian, [Gilbert] would needs have him interpret that, not as a Courtier, but as a Conqueror; as prefiged the quiet possession thereof. And this, through the Queen's favour, came to pass (23); for after Dr John Piers was translated to York, this Dr Coldwell was elected to succeed him, in the See of Salisbury; but it lay vacant three years. In which dangerous juncture, for denial, all the Doctor's Church preferments being disposed of; yet before his election was confirmed, Sir Walter Raleigh importuned him to pass Sherborne to the Crown, and effected it; so shot the good old man, as one of them phrases it, between wind and water; though indeed 'tis confessed) a good round rent was reserved to the bishoprick. Then Sir Walter begged the same of the Queen, and obtained it, much after the same method that Sir William Killigrew got the manour of Crediton, from the church of Exeter, by the consent of Bishop Babington (24)'.

[O] Unparalleled

(23) Harrington's brief view of the state of the Church of England, &c. p. 92.

(24) Fuller in his Church History, book x. p. 27, who observes, that among the Acts passed in King James the 1st's Parliament, none were more beneficial to the Church, than that which made the King himself and his successors incapable of any such land to be conveyed to them.

variety, and great delight; so that both in regard to the pleasantness of the situation, the goodness of the soil, and other delicacies, it stood unparalleled by any in those parts (bbb) [O]. Whether he was wholly prompted to make this expence by his taste, which was confessedly of the magnificent kind, or no, 'tis certain he entered into the matrimonial state at this time; and therefore the conjecture may not be thought idle, that some things might be done with a view to his Lady. The truth is, Sir Walter did not live so long at Court, and so much about the dazzling beauties in it, without having the wings of his glory, at length, somewhat singed in the flames thereof. There was among the Queen's Maids of Honour a beautiful young lady*, named Elizabeth, daughter of Sir Nicholas Throgmorton, an able Statesman, and Ambassador. With this lady, Raleigh, it seems, had an amour; and as he was a man of nervous address, won her heart, even to the last favour. The crime of devirginating one of her Maids of Honour, gave so much offence to the Queen, that as soon as it reached her ears, she frowned upon her favourite, who was thereupon under confinement for several months, and when enlarged, forbidden the Court; whence the lady also, was dismissed from her attendance. But Raleigh, very readily, made the most honourable reparation he could; by marrying the object of his affection; and he lived with her, afterwards, in the strictest conjugal harmony (iii). While he lay under this disgrace at Court, he projected the discovery and conquest of the large, rich, and beautiful empire of Guiana, in South America. In that view he sent this year, 1594, an old officer, Captain Wheddon, whose experience he had before tried, on a voyage to that country; who returning the same year, with several confirmations of it's grandeur and opulency, Raleigh determined to go himself in quest thereof. Accordingly in February, this year, 1594-5, he set out on a voyage to Guiana, where he destroyed the city of San Joseph, in the isle of Trinidad, taking the Spanish Governour, Don Antonio de Berreo, prisoner; and entering the great river Oroonoke, he regained the friendship of some Indian princes, with a promise of their assistance in subduing the rest. Having taken possession of the country in her Majesty's name, he returned home, in August 1595, and applied himself to digest the observations he had made in his discoveries, which were printed not many months after (kkk). But though he brought a quantity of gold ore, which he had helped to dig out of the rocks with his own dagger, and was found to be of good value, both by the Assay-master, and Comptroller of the Mint, as well as other Refiners, he could not prevail with her Majesty to proceed in the plantation. However, his advice was not totally disregarded: for that part of it, proposing to drive the Spaniards to a defensive war, upon their own coasts and harbours, was approved of; and Raleigh himself chosen, with other Commanders, to put it in execution. Captain Keymis had accompanied him to Guiana, and the latter end of January, this year, 1595-6, he fitted out that officer with a couple of ships, the Darling and Discoverer; but provided rather to continue the correspondence, and peaceful traffick with the Indians, than to strengthen them with forces and accoutrements, which was what they most desired and expected. Keymis arrived at Portland, from this voyage, in the latter end of June, 1596, when he found Raleigh had been gone out of England, upon a grand expedition, near a month. This enterprize proved the most renowned of any the English undertook, in those days, against the Spaniards; as it ended in the conquest of Cadiz, the richest, and best fortified, city of Spain. Sir Walter had the post and command of an Admiral, in it; and whatever censures were passed upon some omissions in the voyage, for which we refer to the authors mentioned in the margin (lll); yet in general it was agreed, that never was so much riches and renown acquired, with the like Naval success [P]. Well justifying the honours which were paid to Sir Walter Raleigh, both by the authors who dedicated books to him this year, the painters, and sculptors, who have appropriated this sea-fight to his portraits, and those other advancers of the like honorary arts; who, in their discourses of medals and intaglia's, have thought him worthy for this, among his many other actions and excellencies, of that metallic commemoration, which is more usually, among us, confined to princes and crowned heads (mmm). He returned from the conquest of Cadiz, in the beginning of August, this year; and about two months after, we find him making a new attempt to continue the interest and correspondence he had so hopefully begun in Guiana. To that end he manned and stored a handsome pinnace, which had been with him in the late engagement, called after his own name, The Watt; therefore probably one of his own ships. She set sail under the command of Captain Leonard Berrie, in the latter end of December, from

(bbb) Id. ibid. He had also another seat at West-Horley, in Surrey; besides a house in the Strand, probably Durban-house; and a house or apartments in St James's. But of the house said to be his at Islington, there is no good proof. Oldys.

* See a description of her picture by Oldys.

(iii) Camden's Annals, 1595; and Harrington mentions her extraordinary diligence and fidelity to him. Brief view, &c. as before.

(kkk) See the catalogue of his works, in rem. [DD].

(lll) Stow, Camden, Speed, and Monson's naval tracts. Sir Francis Vere's Commentaries, and the Earl of Essex's censure of the omissions in this voyage.

(mmm) See Evelyn's Numismata, p. 99, 160, 161, edit. 1697, fol.

[O] Unparalleled for orchards, &c. by any in those parts.] It has been said the old Orangery, at Beddington, near Croydon, in Surrey, built by Sir Francis Carew, was raised by some Oranges given by Sir Walter Raleigh, his relation, which were the first that were brought into England; and it is also the common opinion of the family, which is now possessed of that seat. Where was preserved, in the house, a fine cabin bed, which was Sir Walter's; having furniture of green silk, and legs in the form of Dolphins, gilt with gold (25).

[P] Never was so much riches and renown acquired, with the like Naval success.] Sir Walter Raleigh at VOL. V. No. 290, terwards exemplifying how little a resolute and experienced man of war will fear to pass by the best appointed fort in Europe, with the help of a good tide, and a leading gale of wind; and how hard a matter it is to stop a good ship, without another as good to encounter it, says; 'The fort St Philip terrified not us, in the year 1596, when we entered the port of Cadiz; neither did the fort at Puntal, when we were entered, beat us from our anchoring by it, though it played upon us, with four demi-cannons, within point-blank, from six in the morning 'till twelve at noon (26).'

(26) History of the World, lib. v. cap. i. §. 19.

(25) Gibbon's additions to Camden's Britannia, p. 166, edit. 1695, fol. And Oldys from information of the possessor in 1735. See an account of this garden in The Garden of Eden, by Sir Hugh Plat, edit. 1655, 12mo. p. 165.

(nnn) So called because armed against the Azores in general; or rather that of Terceira in particular.

* Viz. Sir Francis Vere's Commentaries, &c.; and especially Sir Arthur Gage's relation of the Island Voyage in Purchas's pilgrims, Vol. IV.

† Journals of the House of Commons, by D'Ewes.

(ppp) Oldys, P. cxxx.

(qqq) The disparity between the estates and conditions of George Duke of Buckingham, and Robert Earl of Essex, in Reliquiæ Wottonianæ, p. 190. edit. 1685.

from Weymouth; and having performed the voyage, arrived safe at Plymouth, on the twenty-eighth of June, 1597: And on the ninth of July, following, he set out with the fleet from Plymouth, upon what is known by the title of The Island Voyage (nnn); in which he had the post of Rear-Admiral. But for his share in the particulars of this expedition, we must refer the reader, as before, to the books in the margin *. He scarcely arrived at London, to give an account of it, before the Parliament met at Westminster, on the twenty-fourth of October, and after a short stay in town, he went to his seat at Sherborne, of which he must have had but little enjoyment for two or three years past: yet upon the twentieth of December, we meet with him in the House, and that day the Parliament was adjourned 'till the eleventh of January. When they met again, he appears frequently in committees, upon several bills of the greatest consequence †; but that assembly being dissolved on the ninth of February, he seems not to have continued long in town: for some regulations being made soon after, for the public good of those people, over whom he presided, by his offices of power, in the west of England, we find him celebrated for his exercise thereof, as a very worthy patriot, in several instances [2]. During this interval, the jealousy that had long subsisted between him and the Earl of Essex, grew to a more open rupture. They had laid the blame on each other, of the late misadventures in the Island Voyage; where Raleigh's actions, however, were esteemed more considerable than those of Essex, though indeed by the fewer number. The populace declaring on the side of Essex, spared not to aver, that Raleigh had a regard to his own glory, more than that of his country. But his conduct surely was most approved by the Queen, since he was trusted with the command of a naval expedition afterwards, whereas Essex never was (ppp). Indeed by his contemptuous carriage to her Majesty, in the ensuing year, 1598, he incurred that box on the ear, which sounds so loud in our annals. However, he was in a little time re-admitted into the Queen's favour; and during this last blaze which he made with any credit at Court, he made Raleigh a public object of his opposition; though it ended in his own disgrace, and his relapse into the Queen's displeasure, which he might have prevented, had he kept his word to the Lord-Keeper Ellesmere, and suffered Raleigh to have triumphed alone. This memorable contest seems to have been promoted by him, at the martial exercises, the jousts and tournaments, performed on the Queen's birth-day, which was the seventeenth of November. History has not been very particular about Raleigh's appearance at those assemblies, as by what colour or impresses he distinguished himself; with what success he ran the careers, or what favours he bore away: but as, upon all public occasions, he made a most rich and splendid figure, so we find, upon these days of triumph, none surpassed him in military bravery. On the present occasion, he had resolved to make his appearance, with a very gallant train, gorgeously accoutred in orange-colour plumes. Hereupon Essex being informed of it, by some of his followers, provided a much more numerous cavalcade, and decked them out in Raleigh's colours. Then the Earl himself appearing at the head of all, armed cap-a-pie, in a compleat suit of orange-colour, not only passed for the sole Knight or Champion of that distinction, by drowning all distinction in Sir Walter Raleigh, but thereby incorporated him and his train, only as so many more of his own esquires, pages, and other retinue, or servants, who made up the parade upon these occasions. The Earl of Clarendon certainly points at this malignant stratagem, where speaking of those dangerous indiscretions, which were the harbingers of Essex's ruin, he mentions among them, his glorious Feather-Triumph; when he caused two thousand orange-tawney feathers, in despite of Sir Walter Raleigh, to be worn in the Tilt-yard, even before her Majesty's own face (qqq). But it must have been somewhat surprizing, to see them enter the lists and orange-tawney running against itself. Yet the Earl's ill success, which is also come to light, seems not to have been

[2] Celebrated as a worthy patriot, in several instances.] Of these, the first-mentioned concerns the restoration of certain manours, to their ancient tenure, in Cornwall. Seventeen of which, had taken and renewed their holdings every seven years, of certain commissioners, for near three centuries past; whereby the tenants reckoned a kind of inheritable estate accruing to them. But notwithstanding this long prescription, a bold and busy person, in these times, getting an Exchequer lease of one or two such tenements, called the whole right in question; and though he failed of success, yet another, soon after, resumed the broken title, and prosecuted it, even to a Nisi prius. Hereupon the tenants deputed certain gentlemen to apply for relief to the Queen; who, having been prepared by Raleigh, testified her dislike of the attempt, and expressly ordered the cessation of his attempt. Another example of his zealous affection for these people, appears in his easing them of a burthenome tax, which carried many other inconveniencies with it (27). This was a patent which had been obtained, while he was Lieutenant of the county. Some persons under pretext of restoring a rent, decayed ever since the ninth of King Henry II. had procured a patent, that none should salt, dry, or pack any fish, in Devonshire, or Cornwall, without their licence or warrant; the ill consequences whereof grew so apparent, as being what would have made that patentee an absolute disposer of all the western shipping and traffick, with their sea and land dependants; that the Cornish Justices made suit to the Privy-Council for redress, and through the never-failing forwardness, and backing, of Sir Walter Raleigh, obtained a revocation thereof. Here we may also add Raleigh's good offices, the two following years, for freeing the inhabitants of those parts, from those heavy impositions, upon their Tin trade, occasioned by the Merchants and Usurers who advanced money to the Tinnars; upon whom their encroachments were grown so exorbitant, that Raleigh was importuned to revive the privilege of pre-emption. It had been attempted by others before him, and at a reasonable price offered, but soon cooled again, 'till it received a new life in Michaelmas-Term, 1599; when the matter was debated before the Council, by Sir Walter Raleigh, in behalf of the country, against the Usurers. And he brought it to such a conclusion, that articles were then signed, and at last an effectual stop was put to these impositions, by the time of the ensuing Parliament, when Raleigh appears to have had the power of pre-emption granted to him (28).

(28) This privilege is founded upon a clause in a charter of King Edward the I.; allowing them to vend their tin to their best behoof, nisi nos ipsi mere voluerimus, unless we resolve to buy it ourselves. Ibid.

[R] That

(27) These parts were anciently so much oppressed with tributes to the Earls of Cornwall, that the condition of a Cornish Inhabitant differed very little from that of a French peasant. Carew's Survey of Cornwall.

been much regretted, being so agreeable to the merit of usurpers; insomuch, that it proved Raleigh's feather-triumph in the conclusion. For though the Lord Bacon might have reason not to mention the Earl's name, where he tells us, a gentleman who came to the Tilt, all in orange-tawney, and ran very ill, came again the next day, all in green, and ran worse (rrr): yet another author, instead of this gentleman, names Essex; and goes on, as the Lord Bacon does, with observing, that one of the spectators, hereupon, asking why this Tiltier (who seemed to be known in both habits) changed his colours? another answered, surely, because it may be reported, that there was one in green, who ran worse than he in orange-colour (sss). In 1599, Essex was sent to Ireland; and about four months after his departure there was great apprehensions in England of an invasion. Six thousand soldiers were suddenly raised to guard the city, and the Queen's person; chains were drawn across the streets of London; watches set, and lights hung out at every man's door, for above a fortnight: By sea, sixteen or eighteen ships of the royal Navy were fitted out with wonderful speed, under the command of Lord Thomas Howard, as Admiral; and Sir Walter Raleigh, Vice-Admiral; whence the design against England, be it what it would, was prevented. Another benefit also accrued to the nation, by putting it into this sudden posture of defence, namely, the great dexterity and expedition wherewith it was taught to spring into arms; for the incredible speed and order of the commanders, in raising such a land-army, and fitting out such a royal Navy, was so admired, both by Spain, France, and Holland, that all foreigners confessed, Her Majesty's deeds in war, were not heretofore more dreadful to her enemies, than now her preparations only for it (ttt). Insomuch, that it is said, an envoy was sent by the Archduke, from Brussels with overtures of peace; and though it went no further then, yet the next year, commissioners were sent to Bulloigne to negotiate a peace with Spain. This was in May, 1600; and about the same time, Sir Walter Raleigh was also sent with the Lord Cobham, upon an embassy, concerning the same, into Flanders. They returned home by the fourteenth of that month, and the government of Jersey being vacant, by the death of Sir Anthony, son of Sir Amias Paulet, among the numerous crowd of suitors for it, the Queen thought none so worthy as Sir Walter. Accordingly, about six weeks after, that is, in the latter end of August, his patent was passed; with the grant of the manour or lordship of St Germain, in the said island, and all the lands and tenements therein (uuu). What share he had in defeating the treasonable designs of Essex, for which that once prime-favourite was now in 1600 to suffer death, is treated at large, in our general histories. The following summer Raleigh attended upon the Queen, in her progress, and in that private dispatch of the Marquis of Rosney, afterwards Duke of Sully, related only by himself (www), we find that upon his landing at Dover, where her Majesty then was, he was received by Raleigh, in company of Lord Cobham, Sidney, and others. And when her Majesty left the country, among the ten persons she there knighted, there appears the name of Carew, elder brother to Sir Walter Raleigh*. Soon after the Queen's return from this progress, her last Parliament met at Westminster, on the twenty-seventh of October; Sir Walter was one of the Knights of the shire for Cornwall (xxx); and as the sessions was full of important business, so he appears frequently engaged in it. This Parliament was dissolved on the nineteenth of December, and in the beginning of 1602, appeared Mr Carew's survey of Cornwall, with a dedication to Sir Walter; in which he hath copied forth, with such energy, the most amiable distinctions of Raleigh's mind. Notwithstanding the assignment which he had made, as above-mentioned, of his patent at Virginia, to other undertakers; yet, they making no successful progress, he was so regardful of the English he had planted there, that he sent to them almost every other year, even from the time of that assignment. For besides the five voyages already noted, of which himself furnished the chief expence, for the first plantation of that country; we are well informed of five voyages more set forth thither, for the relief of his countrymen, as well as for further discoveries of those parts, and alliances with the inhabitants: and that the last of these voyages, under the command of Captain Samuel Mace, was made this last year of Queen Elizabeth's reign †. His estate in Ireland having been of little advantage to him, since the late rebellion in that kingdom, he was prevailed upon to sell it, at an easy rate, to Mr Boyle, afterwards stiled the Great Earl of Cork; who calls it the third addition, and rise, to his estate †. About the same time being challenged to a duel, by Sir Amias Preston, he settled the estate of Sherborne, by deed, upon his son Walter*. Thus did our Knight live, in full possession of external honour and felicity, during the life of Queen Elizabeth: But his sun set at her death, which happened on the twenty-fourth of March, the very close of the year. Upon the accession of King James he lost his interest at Court; was stripped of his preferments; and even accused, tried, and condemned for high-treason. Such a remarkable reverse of fortune has not failed to employ several pens, in searching out the causes of it; from whom the following account is extracted. It is observed, first, that the Earl of Essex infused prejudices against him into King James; and after the Earl's death, there are several circumstances, implying, that Secretary Cecil did the like. For though Cecil and Raleigh joined against Essex and his party; yet when these were overthrown, they divided (yyy). Dr Welwood observes, that when King James came to England, Sir Walter presented to him a memorial; wherein he reflected heavily upon Cecil, in the matter of Essex; and vindicating himself, threw the whole blame upon the (rrr) Bacon's Apothegms, new and old, p. 206.

(sss) Apothegms of the English nation, MSS. 4to, p. 11, Oldys.

(ttt) Rapin's History of England.

(uuu) But the Queen struck off 300l. a year from it, which she reserved to her own disposal. An account of the isle of Jersey, by Philip Falle, p. 190. 2d. edit. 1733, 8vo.

(www) In his excellent Memoirs.

* Stow's Annals, p. 797, edit. 1615. fol. Sir Carew married the widow of Sir John Thynne, he fold the two paternal estates of Wyddicombe-Raleigh, and Fardel. Oldys, from a pedigree in the in the possession of Brown Willis, Esq; and the other paternal estate Coleton-Raleigh was fold by Sir Walter. Ibid.

(xxx) John Arundel, Esq; was the other; and Sir Carew Raleigh, brother to Sir Walter, was one of the Burgesses for Fowey, in the same county. Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria.

† Sir Walter in the whole spent 40,000 l. in this undertaking. Oldys.

† See his article.

(yyy) Oldys, p. 148. From Observations on Sanderfon, &c.

* The quarrel was made up without coming to extremities. 13.

(zzz) Notes on Wilson's History of K. James in the second volume of the Complete History of England, edit. 1700, p. 664. It is also observed, that Raleigh wanting strength, though not wit, to be the Treasurer's rival, perished, because not thought to own humility enough to be his servant.

(aaa) Osborne, Vol. II. p. 102, where he mentions Sir John Fortescue and Lord Cobham, as joining Sir Walter in this noble spirit; and to these may be added Holles, afterwards Earl of Clare, who was an intimate friend of Sir Walter's. See his article.

(bbb) Reply to a sheet, intitled, The Magistracy and Government vindicated. By Sir John Hawles, Solicitor-general to K. William. edit: 1639, fol.

(29) Osborne, p. 103.

(30) Observations on Sanderson's History of Mary Queen of Scots, &c. p. 9.

(31) See the trial.

(32) Raleigh's Remains, p. 192. See also Observations, &c. by Hawles; who observes, that Sir Walter made the same plea against this charge, as was made afterwards by Lord William Russell, that he could not help what any fool said in his company.

other: farther laying open, at the end thereof, the conduct of Cecil, and his father also; in the matter of the Queen of Scots, his Majesty's mother; bitterly charging the death of that unfortunate Queen, upon him. But this had no influence over the King, and only irritated Cecil the more, against Raleigh (zzz). But what seems sufficient to have incensed the King, against Raleigh, was his joining with that party of Englishmen, who, in regard of the inveterate feuds between England and Scotland, desired the King might be obliged to articles, with regard to his countrymen (aaa). There were likewise some other particulars, which might render him obnoxious to a person of the King's jealous disposition. For at the time of his Majesty's accession to the throne, the daughter and heir of Basset was his ward, who was to be married to his son Walter; her estate being worth three thousand pounds per annum. She was of the Bassets of Hemberlegh, and Heaton-Court, in Devonshire; who being descended from the Plantagenets, laid some claim, at this very time of the King's entrance, to the Crown of England. However, we are told that the King received him for some weeks with great kindness, and was pleased to acknowledge divers presents, which he had received from him. But his Majesty did not relish that part of his discourse, which was levelled against a peace with Spain: In short, this opposition, and the consequences of it, were perhaps the hinges upon which his whole fortune now turned: But though it appears, there was something of a treasonable conspiracy against the King, yet it never was proved that he was engaged in it: and perhaps the best means to clear him, may be the very trial upon which he was condemned. Wherein the barbarous partiality, and foul language, especially by Coke, the Attorney-General, broke out so glaringly, that he was exposed for it, upon the public theatre: And those who revere the laws of our country have been so ashamed of it, as rather to wish the proceedings have been falsely related, than believe such a sentence could pass upon such insufficient trial (bbb) [R]. He was first examined before the Lords of the Council, at Westminster, on the sixth of July; and returned thence, a private prisoner, to his own house. He was indicted at Staines the twenty-first of September following, and not long after committed to the Tower of London: whence he was carried to Winchester and tried there, November 17, 1603, and condemned to die. After this, he was kept near a month at Winchester, in daily expectation of death; and that he expected nothing less, is plain from a letter he wrote to his wife, the night before his reprieve [S], on the fifteenth of December.

'Tis

[R] That such a sentence could pass, upon such insufficient trial. It is said that some of the Jury were afterwards touched in conscience, as to demand pardon of Sir Walter on their knees (29); and that even Coke, the Attorney-General, himself, being retired into a garden, to take some air, when his man brought him word, that the Jury had condemned Raleigh of Treason; answered, Surely thou art mistaken, for I myself accused him but of imprisonment of Treason: and this relation, says this author, upon the word of a Christian, I have received from Sir Edward Coke's own mouth (30). And, indeed, upon the Trial, Sir Walter being charged by Coke with being privy to some part of Cobham's design, made then no answer to it. On the other hand, after sentence, he craved pardon, for concealing Lord Cobham's offer to him; alleging, he did it out of a confidence that he had diverted that Lord from those humours (31). And in a letter to his Majesty, after his trial, he writes thus, 'Loft I am, for hearing a vain man; for hearing only, and never believing, nor approving. And so little account I made of that speech of his, which was my condemnation, that I never remembered any such thing, 'till, at my trial, it was objected against me.' He concludes this letter, with a desire only to repay a lent life, with love and affection equal to the goodness, wherewith his Majesty should please to bestow it (32).

[S] A letter to his wife the night before his reprieve. This very pathetic letter is in these terms: 'You shall receive, my dear Wife, my last words, in these my last lines. My love I send you, that you may keep it, when I am dead; and my counsel, that you may remember it, when I am no more. I would not, with will, present you sorrows, dear Bess, let them go into the grave with me, and be buried in the dust; and seeing that it is not the will of God, that I should see you any more, bear my destruction patiently, and with a heart like yourself. First, I send you all the thanks, which my heart can conceive, or my words express, for your many travels and cares for me; which, though they have not taken effect, as you wished, yet my debt to you, is not the less; but pay it, I never shall, in this world. Secondly, I beseech you, for the love you bear me, living, that you do not hide yourself many days; but, by your travels, seek to help my miserable fortunes, and the right of my poor child. Your mourning, cannot avail me, that am but dust. Thirdly, you shall understand, that, my lands were conveyed, bona fide, to my child; the writings were drawn at Midsummer was twelve month, as divers can witness; and I trust my blood will quench their malice, who desired my slaughter, that they will not seek, also, to kill you and your's with extreme poverty. To what friend to direct you, I know not, for all mine have left me, in the true time of trial. Most sorry I am, that being thus surprized by death, I can leave you no better estate. God hath prevented all my determinations; that great God, who worketh all in all! If you can live free from want, care for no more, for the rest is but vanity. Love God, and begin betimes; in him you shall find true, everlasting, and endless comfort. When you have travelled and wearied yourself, with all sorts of worldly cogitations, you shall sit down by sorrow in the end. Teach your son also to serve and fear God, whilst he is young, that the fear of God may grow up in him; then will God be an husband to you, and a father to him; a husband and a father that can never be taken from you. Bailie oweth me a thousand pounds, and Adrian six hundred. In Jersey and Guernsey also I have much owing me (33). Dear Wife, I beseech you, for my soul's sake, pay all poor men. When I am dead, no doubt, you shall be much sought unto, for the world thinks I was very rich. Have a care of the fair pretences of men, for no greater misery can befall you in this life, than to become a prey unto the world, and after to be despised. I speak, God knows, not to dissuade you from marriage, for it will be best for you, both in respect of God, and the world. As for me, I am no more your's, nor you mine: death hath cut us asunder, and God hath divided me from the world, and you from me. Remember your poor child, for his father's sake, who loved you in his happiest estate. I sued for my life, but, God knows, it was for you, and your's, that I desired it. For you know, my dear Wife, that your child, is the child of a true man; who, in his own respect, despiseth death, and his misshapen and ugly form. I cannot write much; God knows.

(33) These debts were arrearages, accruing from his wine-licence patent.

(ccc) See remark [R], at the end.

(ddd) At this time much pains were taken to get Lord Cobham to confirm his accusation, but in vain. This accusation was the chief evidence against Sir Walter, though his Lordship had retraced it. See the trial.

(eee) See particularly his letter to Sir Michael H-x, endorsed Nov. 12, 1604.

(ffff) See the grant to John Shelbury and Robert Smith in Rymer's Fœdera, under this year. He was bound for Snellbury in 1501.

(gggg) Carew Raleigh's Brief Relation of Sir Walter Raleigh's troubles, &c. p. 6. edit. 1659, 4to.

(hhhh) Ibid. And Carew Raleigh's case, &c. cited by Oldys, p. 163.

(iii) See Raleigh's letters and discourses, addressed to his his highness.

(14) This is among our author's letters.

(35) He married Margaret Snedale, daughter of Sir Walter's sister Mary, by her husband Hugh Snedale, a commander in the royal Navy. Oldys,

'Tis true he applied by a letter, to his Majesty, for mercy (ccc), which was at length granted (ddd); but he was still kept a close prisoner in the Tower. How he passed his time there, is well worth notice. First, as the affairs of a person who had such various and extensive dealings and commerce with mankind, could not but be somewhat perplexed and embarrassed, upon a fall so sudden and precipitous, so we find him immediately employing agents for collecting in debts, and satisfying creditors (eee): And in that matter, some degree of favour was extended to him; by a grant of his estates, in trust to some gentlemen, for the payment of his debts (ffff). This is said to be much owing to the earnest and unwearied intercessions of his Lady at Court; who, that she might be more serviceable to him, soon after his commitment, petitioned the King for leave to live with him in the Tower, which was granted: and there she brought him another son, christened Carew, within the year. So that after some suits at law, with such of his considerable debtors, as could not otherwise be brought to account, were got over [T], all things appeared for a while, as serene as in such a gloomy state could be hoped for: and he, who lately was upon the very brink of dissolution, had all his offices, lands, and goods, seized on, and himself committed a close prisoner, had not only his life reprieved, and his confinement sweetened with some degrees of latitude, but even his estate also restored to him (gggg). Yet this prospect was soon overcast: for upon the rise of Robert Car, Earl of Somerset, a flaw was found in the abovementioned conveyance of Sherborne to Sir Walter's eldest son; whereupon the estate was taken from him, and given by the King to his minion, in 1608. Moreover, besides Sherborne, and the manours belonging to it, those other lands, which Raleigh himself had purchased, called Pinford, and Rimesley, Barton, and the manours also appertaining thereto, forfeited, with the rest by his attainer, were likewise granted the following year 1609, to the said favourite (hhhh) [U]. But now, or not long after, Raleigh was grown into high esteem with that great hope, and heir of these kingdoms, Prince Henry Frederick, the King's eldest son; who being satisfied of his loyalty, and well informed of his great qualifications, and experience, in civil and military affairs, with his hazardous services, for the honour and defence of his country, no less than his many public spirited adventures, both to enlarge and enrich it, testified not his own merits more, in any one particular, than in distinguishing those of Sir Walter Raleigh; and notwithstanding the many little envious detractions of some undermining courtiers about him, did both encourage his epistolary addresses from the Tower, and send for his counsel and opinion upon several emergent occasions (iii). It was perhaps, one of the brightest rays in the shining orb of this rare Prince's actions, that he never left invading the King with the most persuasive solicitations, that he would bestow Sherborne upon him, with full design to restore it to it's just owner, 'till his Majesty at last, granted his request. But all Raleigh's views were again eclipsed, by the cruel fate of that hopeful Prince, who died on the sixth of November, 1612, not without suspicion of poison; which was much heightened by an unlucky expression of Raleigh's. For when the Prince lay ill, the Queen sent to Sir Walter for some of his cordial (kkkk), which she herself had taken in a fever, some time before, with remarkable success. Raleigh sent it, together with a letter, to the Queen, wherein he expressed a tender concern for the Prince, and boasting of his medicine, stumbled unluckily upon an expression to this purpose, That it would certainly cure him, or any other, of a fever, except in case of poison. The Prince dying, though he took it (lll), the Queen, in the agony of her grief, shewed Raleigh's letter, and laid so much weight on the expression about poison, that to her dying-day she could never be persuaded (kkkk) Nicholas Febure, Apothecary to King Charles II. wrote a book upon it, by his Majesty's command, in French; and published it under the title of Discours sur le grand Cordial de Sir Walter Raleigh, in 1664. 12mo. An English translation was published by Febure the same year, in 8vo.

(lll) He did the same day in the evening.

' knows, how hardly I steal this time, when all sleep;
' and it also is time for me to separate my thoughts from
' the world. Beg my dead body, which, living, was ' denied you; and either lay it in Sherborne, or in ' Exeter church, by my father and mother. I can ' say no more; time and death calleth me away.
' The everlasting God, powerful, infinite, and inscrutable
' God Almighty, who is goodness itself, the true Light,
' and Life, keep you, and your's; and have mercy upon
' me, and forgive my persecutors, and false accusers,
' and send us to meet in his glorious kingdom. My dear
' Wife, farewell; blest my boy: pray for me, and let my
' true God hold you both in his arms.

' Your's, that was,
' but now, not mine own,
' WALTER RALEGH (34)'

[T] After some suits at law. One instance of this, we have in William Sanderfon, the elder, who we are told, was of kin to Raleigh (35): and in the time of his prosperity and greatness was his servant, intrusted with receiving great sums of money for him, out of his office of wines, and his other places; by which means he became in arrears to Raleigh, in divers great sums: these, after his troubles, he sent for, to Sanderfon, who was so far from paying them, that he pretended Raleigh should owe him 2000l. Hereupon Sir Walter, in great anger, commenced a suit against Sanderfon; which was managed by his servant and solicitor, John Shelbury: and Sanderfon being overthrown, and found in arrear to Raleigh, in very great sums, was cast into prison, where he died a beggar (36). Hence sprung all the spleen, and malice, of William Sanderfon, the younger, in his history of King James's reign, toward Sir Walter Raleigh.

The said Sanderfon, the elder, was much engaged among the merchant-adventurers, in Queen Elizabeth's reign, and one of her Commissioners for the Spanish prize goods; he was also of note for the great globes, which, by his encouragement, were brought to perfection (37).

[U] Sherborne, &c. was given to Car. The Lady Raleigh, and her children, earnestly petitioned the King for compassion; but could now obtain no other answer, than he must have the land, he must have it for Car. And she, a woman of high spirit, upon her knees, prayed to God, that he would punish those who had thus wrongfully exposed her and her children to ruin (38). Which was remembered afterwards, upon the fall of that favourite.

(36) Observations on some particular persons and passages in Sanderfon's History of King James.

(37) Sanderfon's History of Mary Queen of Scots, and K. James.

(38) Carew Raleigh's Brief Relation, p. 7. There is a very elegant letter of Raleigh's to Car upon this occasion, dated December 1603. See his letters. And Oldys, p. cxlv.

(mmmm) Welwood's Notes on Wilton's History of King James. James Howell says, Prince Charles was her darling son. Letters, Vol. II. No. 63. edit. 1650.

(nnnn) In his Apology, p. 47.

(oooo) See the catalogue of his works in remark [DD].

(pppp) In Sanderson's History of King James.

(qqqq) Observations on Sanderson's History, &c.

(rrrr) Id.

(ssss) Camden's Elizabeth, under this year. Car, Earl of Somerset, had been then some months in the Tower for poisoning Sir Thomas Overbury, and had many quips and taunts from Raleigh in that time. Sir Fulke Greville's five years of King James, 4to. 1643. p. 67.

(39) See some of these in Bishop Hall's Balm of Gilead, &c. 1652. James Howell's letters, and his Dodona's Grove. Stafford's life of Lord Stafford, 1640. Dr W. Howell's universal history, in the preface. Shirley's life of our author. Echard's Roman History, in the preface; Degory Wheare, de ratione & methodo seribendi historias, §. 6. And above all, Felton's Dissertation of the Classics.

(40) See Hariot's article.

(41) Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 615.

(42) Winstanley's Worthies of England, p. 256. edit. 1666, 8vo.

peruaded from the opinion that her beloved son had foul play done him (mmmm). Whatever was the cause of this excellent Prince's death, Raleigh had no common share in the loss of him, his Highness having but a few months before he died obtained Sherborne, with intention to return it to him, as is already observed: and we are further informed that King James, to satisfy his favourite Car, who was now Viscount Rochester, gave him, instead thereof, 25000l. in money. But now, after the Prince's death, Rochester got Sherborne of the King again; however, as some kind of composition, or amends, his Majesty, we are told by Raleigh himself (nnnn), also gave his wife and son 8000l. for the said estate*. Notwithstanding these avocations, he devoted great part of his time during his confinement, to his studies. In reality, the productions of his pen at this time are so many, and so weighty, that one is more apt to look upon him as a collegian, than a captive; a student in a library, than a prisoner in the Tower (oooo). But how elaborately soever many of these pieces are allowed by others, to have been written, he looked on them only as little excursions or sallies from his grand affair, The History of the World; which he published in April 1614, in folio [W]. The merit of this work is so great, that some have thought his release to be, in a great measure, the reward of it (pppp). But there seems to be little foundation for that opinion, since it is well known that King James expressed some dislike of it (qqqq). We are therefore to seek for some other mediator for his deliverance, and that we shall at last find to be his money. For whatever pity of his sufferings, his merit and fame in learning now began in many; or by whatever means of the French Ambassador, with others of our own Lords, it is pretended in our common accounts, that he got freedom of repairing for his health to his house at St James's, a year or two before he procured his commission for the voyage to Guiana; we are more positively and particularly told, that Sir William St John, and Sir Edward Villiers, half brother to the Lady Villiers, afterwards Duchesses of Buckingham, procured Sir Walter Raleigh's liberty, and had fifteen hundred pounds for their labour (rrrr). And that these used their power with Sir George Villiers, the new rising favourite at Court, and so obtained the King's consent for Raleigh's enlargement, somewhat appears from the letter inserted below, containing Raleigh's acknowledgments to that favourite [X]: A few days after which, viz. March 25, 1615, we find him actually released out of the Tower (ssss). However, 'tis certain, the mine adventure to Guiana was made use of to the King (tttt): and accordingly he was no sooner at liberty, than we find him busy in making preparations for that voyage. To this purpose, he called in the 8000l. which he had lent to the Countess of Bedford, and besides with his Lady's consent sold her estate at Mitcham, in Surry, for 2500l. more †. The whole, amounting to 10500l., was laid out, in putting himself in equipage for this long proposed voyage; a much greater sum than would have paid for his liberty of receding from it now, or for a formal pardon, had he thought it needed, and had gone about to purchase it after he had obtained his Majesty's commission for the voyage [Z]. The commission was dated August 26, 1616; and he set sail for

* It was valued afterwards at no less than 5000l. per annum.

(tttt) The voyage was opposed by Cecil, but after his death Raleigh received his proposal to Sir Ralph Winwood, in which he takes notice, that Queen Anne; her brother, the King of Denmark; and Prince Henry, were all fatished of his innocency, and had moved his Majesty in his behalf.

† Besides this there was 20,000l. or 16,000l. advanced by the other adventurers.

[W] His History of the World, was published in 1614. The merit of this work is too well known, to need any enlargement upon it here. He took no ordinary care to deserve the encomiums bestowed upon it (39). Besides his own knowledge, learning, and judgment, which many would have thought sufficient for any undertaking; he suffered no part of this history to pass his last hand, before some of the most able scholars, whom he assembled, it seems, for this purpose, had debated the parts he was most doubtful of, and they most conversant in, before him. Thus in the Mosaic and Oriental Antiquity, or fainter and more remote footsteps of Time, he would sometimes consult the learned Dr Robert Burhill. In all parts of Chronology, Geography, and other branches of the mathematical science, he wanted not the opinions of the learned Hariot, and the other two of the Earl of Northumberland's three Magi, long his neighbours in the Tower (40). And whenever he scrupled any thing, in the phrase, or diction, he would hear the acute and ingenious Sir John Hofkyns, (some time, also, resident in these confines) who viewed, and reviewed, the said History, as we are told, before it went to the press: and whom Ben. Johnson proud, of calling others his Sons, could gratify that humour, in calling him Father (41). But for the story of the second volume of this history, which, 'tis said, he burnt, because the bookseller told him, the first sold so slowly, that it had undone him (42), it is scarce worth notice; since it does not appear true, that the first part did sell so slowly, there being a second edition of it printed, by that very bookseller, within three years after the first. Besides, Sir Walter has told us himself, in his preface to the first part, that though he intended, and had hewn out a second, and third volume, yet he was persuaded to lay them aside, by the death of Prince Henry, to whom they were directed: and if we should allow his mind might change, yet the course of his life, afterwards, will leave no room for any such performance. For in 1615, two, at least, of his most elaborate tracts were written; and he was also busy, the same year, in writing letters, and making other interests for his release, which he obtained before the expiration of it. And after this, he made himself, too eminently, the subject of modern history, to be any further an author of that which is ancient (43).

[X] A letter to the Marquis of Buckingham 'Tis as follows.

SIR,

' You have, by your mediation, put me again into the world; I can but acknowledge it, for to pay any part of your favour, by any service of mine, as yet, it is not in my power. If it succeed well, a good part of the honour shall be yours; and if I don't also make it profitable unto you, I shall find myself exceeding ungrateful. In the mean while, and 'till God discover the success, I beseech you to reckon me among the number of your faithful servants, though the least able.

W. RALEGH (44).

Dated, March 17. but without the year.

[Z] He did not go about to purchase his pardon, after he had obtained his commission. It has been said, that he laboured much to obtain his pardon afterwards: a belief grounded intirely upon his Majesty's declaration*. Whereas, we find it expressly asserted, in a letter of Carew Raleigh's, that his father had overtures made him of procuring his pardon, for 1500l. by Sir William St John, one of the persons of whom he purchased his freedom; therefore, one whose interest, was the less to be doubted in this particular: But that Sir Walter, conferring a little before

(43) Oldys.

(44) Oldys, p. xcii. From the original in the library of James West, Esq; * Concerning which see the two ensuing remarks [Z] and [A A].

Guiana, from Plymouth, in the beginning of July, 1617; but his design being betrayed to the Spaniards, was defeated: and his eldest son Walter, being killed by the Spaniards, at St Thome, the town was burnt by Captain Keymis (uuuu). Whereupon the Spanish Ambassador, Don Diego Sarmiento, afterwards Count de Gondamore, being informed thereof [Z], made heavy complaints to the King: who, having received an account of the expedition from one of Raleigh's captains in it, on the thirteenth of May, 1618, published a proclamation on the eleventh of June; declaring, that he did, by express limitation and caution, restrain and forbid Sir Walter from attempting any act of hostility upon the Spanish dominions in Guiana; which having been broken by hostile invasion of St Thome, the infraction should be punished in an exemplary manner [AA].
Raleigh

(uuuu) Raleigh's Journal of the voyage. Printed in his Remains.

before his departure from England, with Sir Francis Bacon, (newly made Lord-Keeper of the Great Seal, and not long after Lord-Chancellor) upon this pecuniary pardon, he positively advised Raleigh against it, in these words. 'Sir, the knee-timber of your voyage is money; spare your purse in this particular; for, upon my life, you have a sufficient pardon for all that is passed already: the King having, under his broad Seal, made you Admiral of your Fleet, and given you power of the martial law, over your officers, and soldiers (45).'

But we are told elsewhere, that even for less than half that money, beforementioned, that is to say, for 700 l. the said Sir William St John, and also Sir Edward Villiers, offered Sir Walter Raleigh, not only his full pardon, but liberty not to go his voyage, if he pleased, and that he refused both; the rather, because he was told by Sir Francis Bacon, (as above) that his said commission was as good as a pardon, for all former offences, as the law of England could afford him (46).

[Z] Count Gondamore being informed thereof.] When Keymis took the town of St Thome, mentioned above, he found a large quantity of papers, letters, memorials, &c. in the Governor's study. Among which were four letters, which plainly discovered, not only the whole enterprize to have been betrayed, but his life, thereby, put into the power of the Spaniards themselves: and by whom (even to the breaking of that peace, if any was broken, for which he was afterwards exclaimed against), Raleigh himself has related; for he thought this such black and cruel usage, that he forbore not in a letter, which he wrote about a month after this time, from the island of St Christopher's, to Sir Ralph Winwood, Secretary of State, to shew his sense of it, in these words:

It pleased his Majesty, to value us at so little, as to command me, upon my allegiance, to set down, under my hand, the country, and the very river, by which I was to enter it; the number of my men, and burden of my ships, and what ordnance every ship carried; which being made known to the Spanish Ambassador, and by him sent to the King of Spain; a dispatch was made, and letters sent to Madrid, before my departure out of the Thames.

By the contents of these Spanish letters, it farther appears, that three hundred Spanish soldiers, and ten pieces of ordnance, were commissioned to be sent from their respective garrisons, against the Adventurers, up the Oroonoke. There was also prepared an Armada, by sea, to set upon Raleigh himself, and the ships with him (47). The King of Spain's first letter, sent to Guiana, by a bark of aviso, to arm the Indians against Raleigh's coming, was dated March 19. 1616. at Madrid. The second was dated May 2. 1617, sent also, by a Caravas, to Diego de Palumeca, Governour of Guiana, El Doredo, and Trinidad. The third was sent by the Bishop of Puerto Rico, and delivered to that Governour, the fifteenth of July, following. And the fourth was sent from the Farmer and Secretary of the King's Customs in the Indies, at the same time (48). Others tell us, that these advertisements and preparations were the cause of all the resistance that was made at St Thome; and that Raleigh's whole design, under his own hand, was delivered by King James to Gondamore; and that his own letter thereof to King James, was found in the Governour of St Thome's closet; which letter he brought back, and shewed to the Lords of the Council (49).

It is remarkable, that though Raleigh has charged this matter of betraying him to the Spaniards, in plain terms, both in his letter to Winwood, and in his Apology, one, or both, of which, King James had certainly read; yet this topic is not so much as touched on, in his Majesty's declaration, but intirely sunk in silence.

[AA] The infraction should be punished in an exemplary manner.] As his Majesty here refers himself to the commission, it will be necessary to transcribe so much of that, as concerns any limitation. It begins thus, 'James, by the grace of God, &c. To all, to whom these presents shall come, &c. Whereas Sir Walter Raleigh, Knight, intendeth to undertake a voyage by sea, and shipping, to the four parts of America, and elsewhere within America, possessed and inhabited by heathen and savage people, to discover some commodities and merchandizes profitable for the subjects of our kingdoms, whereof the inhabitants make little or no use, whence may ensue, by commerce, some propagation of the Christian faith, and reformed religion, among those idolatrous people. We have granted Sir W. Raleigh full power to carry, for the said voyage, sufficient shipping, armour, weapons, ordnance, &c. as he shall think necessary, for the use and defence of him, and his company. Besides liberty to exchange, or otherwise dispose of his goods and merchandize: also, to return into this or other of our dominions, with such gold, silver, bullion, or any other wares, for his own use; paying to us—the full fifth part of all such gold, silver, and ore of gold, or silver, pearl, or precious stones;—with all such customs, as shall be due for any other goods whatever.'—Then follows the constituting him Governour of the whole company in the fleet, with power to make captains, and other officers; and a power also of punishing by martial law. After which, it concludes in substance, thus. 'We further command the Wardens of the Cinque ports, Customers, and other officers, quietly to permit Sir Walter Raleigh, and all who shall adventure with him, to pass to the said fourth or other parts of America, possessed and inhabited as aforesaid; and to return with any goods whatever, and dispose of them, paying the fifth part—to us, as afore. And these patents, or the inrollment thereof, shall be sufficient and effectual in law; any law, statute, &c. notwithstanding. Witness ourselves, the twenty-sixth of August, in the fourteenth year of our reign of England, and of Scotland, the fiftieth. Per breve de privato sigillo (50)'. This is the substance of the commission, as it is printed in the King's declaration. But the original seems to have been given under the Great Seal of England, both from Sir Francis Bacon's answer, to Sir Walter, already mentioned (51); and in a letter from Sir Peter Vanlore, a Dutch merchant, to his brother, Sir Adrian Thebaul, at Amsterdam; where it is expressly said, to be under the Great Seal of England (52). And as this letter is dated July 1, 1616, that is, near two months before that in the King's declaration, there must be in one of them, an error in the date. There are authors also who affirm, that in the original commission, King James called him, his trusty and well beloved Sir Walter Raleigh (53). Yet here is nothing said of any prohibition to meddle with the King of Spain's subjects; so that if any such limitation was meant, it is not an express one: and in the most favourable construction for his Majesty, can only be implied, as we were then at peace with Spain*. In reality, Sir Walter was sensible such an interpretation might be put upon the words, by the Spaniard; and therefore, being disabled himself by sickness, he ordered Captain Keymis, if he found any Spaniards near the mine, and they began to war upon them, to repel them. Accordingly, it appears, Keymis was first attacked by the Spaniards, from St Thome, and in repelling them, proceeded to burn that town, which had

(50) Rymer's Fœdera.

(51) In remark [X].

(52) Raleigh's Remains. See also Heylin's Cosmography.

(53) Observations on Sanderson, &c.

* See remark [CG].

had

(43) Carew Raleigh's Brief Relation, &c. However, 'tis certain he had applied, at least he ore the grant of the commission, and been d-med. See his letter to the Marquis of Buckingham.

(46) Observations on Sanderson's History of King James, &c. p. 10.

(47) He escaped this Armada by it's waiting for him in a wrong place. Raleigh's Journal of the voyage.

(48) Raleigh's letter to Winwood in his Remains, last edit. p. 172; compared with some MSS copies in the Harleian library.

(49) Observations on Sanderson's History, p. 13. See also State-Trials, Vol. I. p. 219. and Welwood's Memoirs.

(www) Captain King's Narrative, &c. MS. Cited by Olyds. Manourie's declaration annexed to King James's declaration. And a piece of Sir Lewis Stucley's, intitled, To the King's Most Excellent Majesty, The humbly petition and information of Sir Lewis Stucley, Knt. Vice-Admiral of Devon. &c. edit. 1618, 4to.

(xxx) He answered every particular that had been alleged against him upon this article, in his dying speech on the scaffold, to which we must refer the reader, as too long to be admitted a place here.

† They alleged, indeed, that no person, while under an attainder, could, by the rules of law, be tried for any other crime.

(zzzz) Sir Richard Hutton's Reports, p. 21. edit. 1636, fol.

* Sir Walter, in his letter to King James, after his landing at Plymouth, says, it was new set up within three miles of the mine.

(54) See Raleigh's letters in his Remains, p. 178, 181; and his Apology, p. 39; also Howel's Letters, Vol. II. p. 94, & seq. edit. 1659, and Vol. I. p. 6, & seq.

(55) See the declaration in Harley's Miscellany, Vol. III.

Raleigh landed about the beginning of July, at Plymouth; and though he heard that the Court was exasperated by the Spanish Ambassador, he was firmly resolved to go to London: and in that resolution, as soon as he had settled his affairs in the west, he began his journey to the capital. But before he came to Athburnham, which is twenty miles from Plymouth, he was met by Sir Lewis Stucley, Vice-Admiral of the county of Devon, who arrested him in the name of his Majesty. Though Stucley had no warrant, Raleigh submitted to the arrest, and they returned together to Plymouth. But now he hired a bark to carry him to France, and once attempted to go aboard; yet he afterwards changed his mind, and returned to his first resolution, and wrote a letter in vindication of himself to his Majesty. After this, Stucley receiving a warrant to bring him up speedily*, Raleigh set out again with him on the journey; during which, he wrote his Apology. The particular passages on the journey, may be seen in the accounts of it, cited in the margin (www). We shall only observe, that the nearer they approached London, hearing what a storm his enemies had brewed at Court, he began to regret his having neglected the opportunity he had at Plymouth of retiring; and meditated a second escape to France, which he again attempted after his arrival at London: but being betrayed by Stucley, was seized in a boat on the Thames, August 9, and committed close prisoner to the Tower of London, on the 10th. Two or three days afterwards, a Committee was appointed to examine into his escape (xxx), but all that remains of his defence, is a letter wrote by him to the Marquis of Buckingham, on the fourteenth of October [BB]. After all possible inquiries and examinations, in order to heap up allegations against him, the Council could not think it justifiable to take away his life, for, all that had passed at Guiana †. Therefore a Privy-Seal was sent to the Judges, forthwith to order execution, in consequence of his former attainder. But they demurring upon that, as an extrajudicial manner of proceeding, therefore, on Friday the twenty-third of October, a conference was held by all the Judges, upon the form and manner, how prisoners, who have been attainted of treason, and set at liberty, should be brought to execution. Wherein, the question being put, whether a Privy-Seal was sufficient, being directed to the Justices of the King's-Bench, to command them to award execution against Sir Walter Raleigh, or how they should proceed before execution be awarded; it was resolved unanimously, that he ought to be brought to the bar by Habeas Corpus to the Lieutenant of the Tower, and then demanded if he could say any thing why execution should not be awarded. Upon this resolution, a Privy-Seal came to the Justices of the King's Bench, commanding them to proceed against him according to law (zzzz). Accordingly on Wednesday October 28, he was carried to the King's-Bench bar, at Westminster; and the aforesaid question being put to him, he said, That he hoped the judgment he received to die, so long since, could not now be strained to take away his life, since by his Majesty's commission for his late voyage, it was implied to be restored, in giving him power as Marshal, upon the life and death of others; and since he undertook the same, to honour his Sovereign, and enrich his kingdom with gold, of the ore whereof, this hand, said he, hath found and taken in Guiana. But being told, that his voyage to Guiana was foreign to the purpose, and that his commission could be of no service to him, since treason was not pardoned by implication; he put had been built slightly; probably after Raleigh's first offer to undertake this expedition*: Keymis on his attempting to land again at a place nearer the mine, to which he had been directed by Sir Walter, was again attacked by an ambuscade of Spaniards: And upon these discouragements he returned, without going to the mine. Whereupon, Sir Walter, well knowing this failure would be his own ruin, in the ticklish situation he stood with King James, expressed so much displeasure at it, that Keymis shot himself for grief (54). Accordingly, the consequence proved exactly as Sir Walter had conjectured. For returning without gold ore, it was said, there was none; that the pretence of the mine, was only made use of by him, to procure his liberty; and that Keymis was murdered, to prevent him from discovering the truth. But of this last charge, he seems to be cleared by his Majesty, who has not alleged it in his declaration; where so many frivolous circumstances are amassed and aggravated against him (55).

[BB] A letter to the Marquis of Buckingham. By this letter it appears, that Sir Walter's attempt to make his escape had been contrived by the Marquis, as an injury done to the friendship he had shewn him before. Sir Walter, therefore, here declares, his sole design in that attempt was to let his Majesty know, that his late enterprize was grounded upon a truth; which with one ship, speedily set out, he meant to have assured, or to have died; for the truth of which, he appeals to his keeper, Sir Lewis Stucley: and therefore he concludes, with begging, in the most pathetic terms, for the Marquis's interest to obtain his Majesty's mercy. But this application proved ineffectual, it was now too late, and he had before refused to beg it of Gondamor †; notwithstanding he had the fairest opportunity that could be, with the greatest hopes of succeeding. This offer came from the Earl of Clare, Sir Walter and he had been much bred together, both in Court and Camp; fellow-servants, and fellow soldiers: and being both of choice parts, and spirits, easily took impressions of firm friendship. Accordingly the Earl appeared among those fast friends to Sir Walter, who laboured most to save his life. His Lordship, 'tis said, had some power with Raleigh's profecutor, Gondamor, the Spanish Ambassador; and in the conversations which passed frequently between them, he discovered, as he thought, an inclination in Gondamor to make suit to King James, for Sir Walter's life, in case he would treat him to do it. This the Earl intimated to Sir Walter, by Mr Charles Thynne (56), one of his fastest friends; bidding him withhold, let him know, that there was no other way for his preservation. When Raleigh heard it, he paused a little, and then gave this answer. I am yet neither so old, nor so infirm, but I could be content to live; and therefore this would I do, if I was sure it would do my business: but if it fail, then I lose both my life and my honour; and both those, I will not part with. A resolution, says my author, really not unworthy so famous a person (57). Perhaps he pointed to this, in the epigram he wrote, a little before his end, where, alluding to the light of a candle, he wrote as follows.

Cowards may fear to die, but courage stout,
Rather than live in snuff, will be put out.

[CC] Raleigh

* Raleigh declares, that it was this severe order, and the impatience of dishonour, that first put him in fear of his life, or enjoying it in a perpetual imprisonment, never to recover his reputation lost; which strengthened him in his late resolution of making his escape. Letter to the Marquis of Buckingham.

† This must be before his last voyage to Guiana, since when he returned Gondamor was gone to Spain, and did not come back to England till after Sir Walter's death. Olyds, p. cxi. note (a), where there is a particular account of Gondamor.

(56) Captain Thynne commanded the Bark Raleigh, sent by Sir Walter with the fleet in 1591, when Sir Richard Greenville died so gloriously, in an engagement with the Spaniards. See Sir Walter's account of the fight.

(57) Collins's Historical Collect. &c. edit. 1752, in fol. p. 7c. From a MS of Gervase Holles, in possession of the Countess-Dowager of Oxford.

put himself upon the King's mercy, and sentence of death being passed upon him, he was led to the Gate-House, near the Palace-yard; where a special warrant for his execution was produced, signed by his Majesty, at Westminster; in a manner, as soon as the sentence was over, being dated the same day, and directed to Lord Chancellor Bacon (aaaa), in which his former sentence, of being hanged, drawn, and quartered, was altered into that of beheading. Accordingly he suffered that fate with great magnanimity*, in the old Palace-yard, the day following. His body was interred in the chancel of the adjoining church of St Margaret; but his head was long preserved in a case, by his widow, who survived him twenty-nine years; and after her death, it was kept also by her son, Carew Raleigh, with whom it was buried (bbbb). Thus we have seen how Sir Walter Raleigh, after a shining and conspicuous series of actions against the enemies of his country, and for the improvement of navigation, as well as the enlargement and enrichment of the British empire, under one Sovereign; was deprived of his liberty, his estate, and his life, under another. How Sir Walter Raleigh, who had been one of the greatest scourges of Spain, was made a sacrifice to it. How the services of Sir Walter Raleigh, in camp, in court, by land, by sea, with sword, and pen, were an honour to Queen Elizabeth's reign; and how his sufferings at Winchester, at Westminster, by imprisonment, by law, with slender, and the axe, were the disgrace of King James's (cccc). The dissatisfaction at the proceedings against Sir Walter was so general, and public, that in order to appease it, the King found it expedient to vindicate himself in a printed declaration, setting forth every minute particular that could be urged in his own favour. This paper appeared in public, signed with the names of nine Privy-Councillors; yet did it not prove sufficient to allay the murmurs of the people, several of these particulars being observed to be misrepresented, and others appeared in a great measure aggravated. Hence the cry still continued that Raleigh was sacrificed to the Spaniard [CC]. And indeed that (aaaa) Rymer's Fœdera, Tom. XVII. fol. 115.

* See Sir Richard Holton's account ubi supra; as also his behaviour and speech on the scaffold.

(bbbb) Oldys, p. cxxx. note. (b).

(cccc) Mr Bevil Higgons observes, that Raleigh's death was inexcusable; being more unjust than mean spirited, and one of the greatest blemishes in King James's reign. Short view of the History of England, p. 234. edit. 1734, 8vo.

Monarch

[CC] Raleigh was sacrificed to the Spaniard.] The notoriety of this fact, has extorted an acknowledgment of it from a late writer (58), who has taken much unworthy pains to fix Sir Walter as an odious character in the English annals. But there appears so little candour, or even of good sense, throughout the whole attempt to defame him, that he may be safely left to stand upon his own intrinsic worth, without any danger of being hurt by it. Indeed, to suppose there can be any occasion for a particular or serious defence, against such an affected misrepresentation, would be to add that weight to the injury which it wants. He tells us, that Raleigh, in the former part of his life, when he was active, and lived in the world, and was probably best known, was, through envy, the object of universal hatred and detestation throughout England. And in the latter, when shut up in prison, he became, through pity, much more unreasonably the object of great love and admiration: The conceit and confidence of this very pretty antithesis, is very aptly coupled with the following: that Raleigh's account of his first voyage to Guiana, proves him to have been a man of the most extravagant credulity, or a most impudent impostor: and that this whole narrative is a proof, that he was either extremely defective in solid understanding, or morals, or both. Yet, in order to exclude him from the privilege of this alledged credulity, a heap of no less than seventeen arguments is piled up, to prove him really incredulous, in regard to the mine; the declared belief of which, is allowed to have procured his release from the Tower. The business was now, to represent him more knave than fool; and to that end, we see him charged, in full defiance of all common sense, to have undertaken the voyage, under the King's commission, not to work a mine, as he pretended, but wholly and solely with a design to plunder. In the mean time, this libel is not completed without drawing the King in for a share. His Majesty, says he, released Raleigh out of the Tower, as thinking he had suffered enough for the offence which occasioned that imprisonment. Besides this, he gave him also a power over the lives of his associates; which by natural and ordinary construction amounted to a pardon: yet that pardon in form, was constantly denied, to the most pressing instances for it; and the sentence at Winchester kept thereby in full force, through a persuasion, that though originally unjust, it might become just to execute it in its full extent, as a punishment for any future capital offence; as was accordingly done, and the proceeding censured by the same writer, as unjust and indefensible. On the other hand, the King's weakness is particularly remarked, in taking no better security for Raleigh's good behaviour in the voyage, than that of his associates, but accepting their mutual bonds for each other; and in letting him depart, without a sufficient search and scrutiny into the lading of the ships. A picture, wherein the Knight is thus shewn, consisting of three parts knave, and one part fool, in contrast with his King, who appears to be a compound of an equal mixture, of both knave and fool, can hardly fail to meet with its desert, in raising a loud laugh. But there is a national reflection mingled with it, as an adjunct, which requires another kind of notice. Having mentioned that grounded opinion, which universally obtained among the people, that there was no peace with Spain beyond the Line, he calls it an absurd and ridiculous notion: in support whereof he asserts that Spain would never have consented to such a peace; since the chief hurt they could receive was in the Indies. Any mistake, which is owing to the want of a thorough knowledge, or right apprehension, of the spirit and temper of the English people, and the constitution of that government, carries its own excuse along with it, in the mouth of a foreigner: and this writer may, in candour, be allowed the privilege of that plea, as being born, and bred, and constantly living among a people, and under a constitution of a very different nature, genius, and temper, from the English. But then, no defence is sufficient to avert the foul language of the censure, from recoiling upon the author. In England, 'tis a well known maxim, that whatever judgment or opinion becomes universally maintained by the people, how contrary soever it may be to the inculcated doctrine of their Ministers of State, will be found, upon examination, to be generally well grounded. For the people can feel sensibly, and see clearly, in every point that immediately affects the public, that is, themselves; though less able to express their sense accurately, or elegantly. The instance now before us, with regard to the peace with Spain, is a strong confirmation of this maxim. It is a notorious truth, and not denied even by this author, that in that treaty, no mention is made of Guiana, nor of the disputes about the right to that country. Whence it undeniably follows, that in respect to this particular, things stood in the same state as they did before. So that whatever right the English had to the country, was in no wise prejudiced or altered by this peace; since, in interpreting national treaties of peace and commerce, it is a rule allowed on all sides, that no rights, claimed by either party, and not acknowledged and ratified expressly by the other, in any former treaty, are understood to be comprehended under any general terms, in a subsequent treaty; as evidently appears to be the case, with regard to the treaty under present consideration, which now lies before me. And hereby is discovered the true force and foundation of that admirably spirited remark, with which Sir Walter Raleigh concludes his unanswerable Apology, as follows. I have said it already,

(58) Home's History of Britain under the Stuarts, Vol. I. chap. iv.

Monarch himself, who made him the sacrifice of State, to the enemies and deceivers of the State, soon after Raleigh's execution, began to see how he was, and would be deluded by the Spaniard (dddd). And made one of his Ministers write to his Agent in Spain, to let that state know, they should be looked upon as the most unworthy people in the world, if they did not now act with sincerity, since his Majesty had given so many testimonies of his; and now of late, by causing Sir Walter Raleigh to be put to death, chiefly for the giving them satisfaction. Further, to let them see how in many actions of late, his Majesty had strained upon the affections of his people; and especially in this last, concerning Sir Walter Raleigh, who died with a great deal of courage and constancy. Lastly, that he should let them know, how able a man Sir Walter Raleigh was, to have done his Majesty service. Yet to give them content, he hath not spared him; when by preserving him, he might have given great satisfaction to his subjects; and had at command, upon all occasions, as useful a man, as served any Prince in Christendom (eeee). We must not conclude this memoir, long as it unavoidably is, through the almost unparalleled activity of the subject, without gratifying the reader's curiosity, with some account of Sir Walter's person. By an original picture of him, at full length, he appears to be tall of stature, to the height of six feet, well shaped, and not too slender: his hair full, and of a dark colour, and the features and form of his face such as they appear in the print, before the last edition of his history. We have already mentioned his magnificent taste in dress, both civil and military. Of this latter sort, his armoury was so rare, that we are told part of it was for it's curiosity preserved in the Tower of London; and 'tis certain, he had a compleat suit of polished plates of solid silver (ffff). And there is a picture of him, a half length, representing him in this silver armour, and richly adorned in the skirts; the sword and belt with diamonds, rubies, and pearls. His civil wardrobe was, if possible, still more rich. There is another picture of him, where he appears in a suit of white sattin, which he had beset with jewels, to the value of sixty thousand pounds; and one diamond whereof, worth an hundred pounds, remained in the family, as 'tis said, 'till the late Queen Anne's reign (gggg). The truth is, the richness and rareness of his apparel, was made matter of reproach to him. In which view, we find him paralleled with the Roman Emperors, by an author, who takes notice, that upon some great assemblies at Court, his very shoes were bedecked with precious stones, that exceeded the value of six thousand six hundred pieces of gold (hhhh). In the mean time, how much soever this splendid figure might dazzle the eyes of the beholders, the wearer himself was far from being dazzled thereby. He saw, and was pleased with the distinction; but was so far from making it the end of his ambition, that it seems to have been used by him as an incentive to distinguish himself, by out-shining others, in the intrinsic worth of splendid deeds, as much as he did in the splendor of his outward shew. How much he excelled, both in feats of arms, and in strength of counsel, has been seen in the course of this memoir: and for arts (iiii), we need but peruse the books he wrote [DD], in the poetical, epistolary, military, maritimal, geographical, (dddd) Bishop Burnet observes, that the proceedings against him at first were much censured, but the last part of them was thought both barbarous and illegal. History of his own Times, Vol. I. p. 16, 17, edit. 1724, fol.

(eeee) Rushworth's Historical Collections, Vol. I. p. 9, 10, fol. edit.

(ffff) Several pictures and prints of him are mentioned by Mr. Oldys.

(gggg) Oldys.

(hhhh) Drexelius's Dialogue upon attire.

(iiii) Among other accomplishments of this kind he is said to have some skill in music.

ready, and I will say it again, that if Guiana be not his Majesty's, the working of a mine there, and the taking of a town there, had been equally perilous: for by doing the one, I had robbed the King of Spain, and been a thief; and by the other, a disturber and breaker of the peace. Hence, too, we see, how justly grounded the apprehension was, that no Jury would have brought him in guilty, in case of a trial at common law; since such a verdict, notwithstanding what this author alleges to the contrary, would have been equally unjust, as that at Winchester. And hence, lastly, is discovered the true reason, why Sir Walter was not tried by a Court-Martial, for breaking the King's commission; since the same rule of construction, already mentioned, may be applied to that commission: In which, no express mention being made of Guiana, he could not fairly and equitably be understood to be excluded thereby, from entering upon that country; nor to have committed any unwarrantable hostilities against the Spaniards in so doing (59). If it be alledged, that the King had ceded his right to the Spaniard, by some secret article: the answer is obvious, that no such article having been ever produced, the presumption in equity is, that no such was ever signed*.

[DD] The books he wrote, &c.] These are,

I. Poetical. Poems on Gaccoigne's Steel Glass. The Excuse. The Silent Lover. The Answer to Marlowe's Pastoral. His poems upon Cynthia. Two, on Spenser's Fairy Queen. The Lover's Maze. A Farewell to Court. The Advice (60). A small poem, printed in the London Magazine for August, 1734. Several in the Ashmolean Library at Oxford; namely, Erroris Responsio. Answer to the Lie, &c. Three pieces, written just before his death, viz. The Pilgrim. The Epigram on the Snuff of a Candle; and his Epitaph, printed in his Remains. There is also ascribed to him (61), A satirical Elegy on the death of the Lord Treasurer Cecil, Earl of Salisbury; printed by Osborne, in the Memoirs of King James I. Some of his pieces this way, are wrote in hexameters, after the manner of the Ancients: and the same thing was attempted also by Sir Philip Sidney, and others, about this time: but that measure has since been utterly rejected from the English poetry. Our author's best performance in this way is his Silent Lover; in which the following stanza is deservedly admired.

Silence in love, betrays more woe,
Than words, though ne'er so witty;
The beggar that is dumb, you know,
Deserves a double pity.

II. Epistolary, viz. Letters, of which Mr Oldys says, he had seen twenty eight printed and MSS.

III. Military, &c. Notes of Direction for the defence of the Kingdom; written three years before the Spanish Invasion in 1588. To this treatise was also joined, A Direction for the best and most orderly retreat of an Army, whether in Campaign, or Straits; presented in manuscript to the Privy-Council. One of the chief points in these directions, a little before the approach of the Spanish Armada, being opposed, in A Discourse of the best order for repulsing a foreign Force (62), there was found among Sir Walter's manuscripts, an Answer; which was published by Nathaniel Booth, of Gray's-Inn, Esq; at London, in 1734, 8vo. Entitled, A Military Discourse, whether it be better for England, to give an Invader present battle, or to temporize and defer the same, &c.

IV. Maritimal. A Discourse on the invention of Shipping; printed among his Essays, in 1650, 8vo. Observations

(59) Mr Howell also in the letter above cited observes, that he would have been cleared by that court.

* The contrary suggestion is indeed inconsistent with that encouragement and public invitation, which King James gave to all who should plant in that new discovered part of America. See Purchas's Pilgrim, Vol. IV. at the end of Rob. Harcourt's voyage to Guiana.

(60) These three last are printed in an old collection of several ingenious poems and songs by the wits of the age, 1660, 3vo.

(61) By Shirley in his life of our author, p. 179.

(62) By Thomas Digges, Esq; Muster-Master-General of the Queen's forces in the Low-Countries.

geographical, political, philosophical, and historical way; the number, as well as value of which, is so great, that, considering his continual avocations, it becomes matter of wonder, how he could find time to collect so much force of mind and attention, as was necessary, to write them. But the wonder ceases, when we know the division he made of the day; four hours only of which, he allowed to sleep; and for the rest, he dedicated four hours to reading and study; two to discourse; and the remainder to business, and other necessities (kkkkk). He had an excellent library, which was of use sometimes to Mr Selden, and others of the society of Antiquaries, of which he was a member (lllll). He was survived by his son.

(lllll) Oldys, From a list of the members of this society in a MS in the possession of the late ingenious Mr George Vertue, the Engraver. See more of this in Sir Henry Spelman's article.

(kkkkk) David Lloyd's Observations, &c. p. 489. edit. 1665.

(63) And reprinted in Hackluyt's Voyages, Vol. II. p. 3. p. 169. edit. 1599.

(64) In a pamphlet, intitled, An Essay on Ways and Means to maintain the Honour and Safety of England, by Sir Henry Sherts.

(65) These are mentioned by Sir Walter; the first in the introduction to his Observations and Notes concerning the Royal Navy; and the second in his History of the World. Lib. V. cap. i. §. 6.

* Mr Wood says it is the same with Apophrysmis of State, printed by John Milton, the Poet. In the second edition it is intitled The Arts of Empire, and Mysteries of State delineated, &c. Lond. 1632. 8vo.

(66) This was in the Harleian library, No. 38. book 3.

Observations and Notes concerning the Royal Navy, and Sea Service, dedicated to Prince Henry; printed likewise, among his Essays. A letter to Prince Henry, concerning the Model of a Ship; printed among his Remains. Report of the truth of the Fight about the Isles of Azores; edit. 1591 (63), 4to. The Relation of the Action at Cadiz; published among the Remains, at the end of An Abridgment of his History of the World: 1700, 8vo. Memorial touching Dover Port; edit. 1701, 4to. (64). A Discourse of a Maritimal Voyage, with the Passages and Incidents therein; and The Art of War by Sea; both written to Prince Henry (65).

V. Geographical. Several Discourses and Papers, concerning the Discovery, Planting, and Settlement of Virginia. A Treatise of the West Indies. Considerations on the Voyage for Guiana: the first of these three was in the possession of Sir Francis Walsingham: A sketch of the contents of the second, is given by Sir Walter himself: and the third is in the Library of Sir Hans Sloane, now in the British Museum; a manuscript, in 4to. Discovery of the large, rich, and beautiful Empire of Guiana, &c. Lond. 1596, 4to. Journal of his second Voyage to Guiana, in manuscript; 'tis very imperfect, and was made use of by him in his Apology.

VI. Political. As The Seat of Government, &c. printed among his Remains, in 1652. Observations concerning the Causes about the magnificence and opulency of Cities; printed also among his Remains. The Prince, or Maxims of State; Lond. 1642, 4to. and re-printed, among his Remains. The Cabinet-Council; containing, the chief Arts of Empire, and Mysteries of State delineated; published by Milton, in 1638, 8vo.* A Dialogue between a Jesuit, and a Recusant, &c. published by Philip Raleigh, among our author's genuine remains, as before; 1700, 8vo. A Dialogue between a Counsellor of State, and a Justice of Peace; better known in the printed copies, by The Prerogative of Parliaments; dedicated to King James, and printed at Middleburgh; 1628, 4to and again, in 1642; and likewise, among his Remains. Under this class, are also the following pieces in manuscript: Confutation about the Peace with Spain, and our Protecting the Netherlands (66). The present State of Spain, &c. seemingly a different piece from The present State of Things, as they now stand, between the three Kingdoms; France, England, and Spain. A Discourse on the Match propounded by the Savoyan, between the Lady Elizabeth, and the Prince of Piedmont. A Discourse on the Match, between Prince Henry of England, and a Daughter of Savoy. A Discourse of the Words, Law and Right; in the Ashmolean Library, Oxford. Observations touching Trade and Commerce with the Hollanders, and other Nations, &c. edit. 1653. Doubtful whether our author's or no (67).

VII. Philosophical. A Treatise of the Soul, manuscript; in the Ashmolean Library. The Sceptic, or Speculations; printed among his Remains. Instructions to his Son, and Posterity; edit. 1632, 12mo. and re-printed among his Remains. The dutiful Advice of a loving Son to his aged Father, subjoined to the preceding. A Treatise of Mines, and the trial of Minerals, and A Collection of chymical and medicinal Receipts; both in manuscript.

VIII. Historical. The History of the World; mentioned above, published in 1614; and re-printed many times since. Unus nec pluribus impar. Sir Walter indeed appears to have entertained a design on some part of the ancient English History; in which view, he wrote the following letter to Sir Robert Cotton.

'If you have any of those old books, or any manuscripts, wherein I may find any of our British Antiquities; if you will please to lend them me, for a little while, I will safely restore them, and think myself much beholden to you: or if you have any old French history, wherein our nation is mentioned, or any else, in what language soever.

'Your poor friend,

'W. R A L E G H (68).'

The letter is without a date, and does not evince whether his design, here intimated, was upon some particular subject, or the constitution of his General History. Dr Thomas Smith (69) inclines to the latter opinion; which indeed is the most probable. P

(67) It is bound up with the second edition of his Remains, in 1656, and is ascribed to Raleigh in the Detection of the Church and State of England, by Roger Coke, third edit. 1697. 8vo. But there are several MSS of it, in all which it is ascribed to one John Keymer, possibly the same person that Raleigh licensed to retail wine at Cambridge, as related in remark [F].

(68) The original was in the Cotton library, Julius C. 3. And at the top of it is a list of the old authors Sir Walter refers to.

(69) In Vita D. Rob. Cottoni, folio 25.

(a) He tells us himself, that he was about thirteen years of age at his father's death. See his case at the Committee for sale of delinquents estates.

(b) Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 440.

(c) Carew Raleigh's case before.

* Upon Car's disgrace it had been given to Digby by King James, who created him, on the twenty-first of November 1618, Lord Sherborne. Salmon's Chron. Hist. under that year.

RALEGH [CAREW] was born, as 'is before observed, in the Tower of London; in the latter end of 1604, or beginning of the next year (a). Where he received the first rudiments of his education, is not known; but he was admitted a Gentleman-Commoner at Wadham-College, in Oxford, in 1620 (b), or rather before: for after he had spent five years at the university, he went to Court, in hopes of obtaining some redress in his misfortunes, by the favour of William, Earl of Pembroke, his noble kinsman. But the King, not liking his countenance, said, he appeared to him like his father's ghost: whereupon, the Earl advised him to travel, as he did, 'till the death of King James, which happened about a year after (c). The Parliament being sitting at his return, he thought proper, according to the custom of the land, to petition to be restored in blood, that he might be enabled to inherit whatever lands might fall to him, as his father's heir, or any other way. But after his petition had been read twice in the House of Lords, King Charles sent Sir James Fullerton, then of the Bed-Chamber, for Mr Raleigh; who being brought into the King's chamber, by that Knight, his Majesty, after using him with great civility, told him plainly, that he had formerly promised Sir John Digby, now Earl of Bristol, to secure his title to Sherborne*, it being conferred on him, 14 of Jac. against the heirs of Sir Walter Raleigh: whereupon Digby had given him, being then Prince, ten thousand pounds; so that now he was bound to make good his promise, being King: and therefore, unless he, Carew Raleigh, would quit all his right and title to Sherborne, he neither could or would pass his bill of restoration. Mr Raleigh urged the justice of his cause; that he desired only the liberty of a subject, and to be left to the law, which was never denied any freeman; but the King was positive, and so left him. After this, Sir James Fullerton used many arguments to persuade submission, as the impossibility

- (d) His Brief Relation of Sir Walter Raleigh's troubles, &c.
- (e) See his case delivered to the committee of the House of Commons.
- (f) This settlement being made in her marriage articles could not be forfeited by Sir Walter's attainder. She lived 'till 1647.
- (g) Among the ingenious poems of Thomas Carew, Esq; who was another of those gentlemen. There is a compliment to his cousin C. R. marrying the Lady A. Carew's poem, p. 80. edit. 1640.
- (h) Athen. Oxon. ubi supra.
- (i) See Howell's letters, No. iv. p. 6, & seqq. 2d. edit. 1650. Mr Raleigh's letter appears by Howell's answer to have contained the substance of his Brief Relation of his father's troubles, &c. Ibid. Vol. II. No. xliii. by mistake for lxiii.
- (k) It is yet in MS. Oldys.
- (l) Ibid.
- (m) The whole title runs thus, Carew Raleigh's brief relation of Sir Walter Raleigh's troubles, with the taking away of the lands and castle of Sherborne in Dorsetshire, &c. London 1669, 4to.
- (n) In three sheets, 4to. It was undoubtedly his.
- (o) Athen Oxon. as before; and Whitlock's Memoria's under that year.
- (p) This was sold after Mr Raleigh's death to Sir Edward Nicholas, Secretary of State to King Charles.
- (q) This estate he sold himself.
- (r) Wood, ubi supra. But W. Nicholas, Esq; who resided upon the estate at West-Horsley, in 1736, told Mr Oldys, that he was buried there. Oldys, p. cccxx. note (b).
- (s) Letters, &c. p. 43 r. edit. 1672, 8vo.
- (t) Ubi supra.

[A] Was made one of the Gentlemen of the King's Privy Chamber] A. Wood mentions a kind token which Mr Raleigh was honoured with, on his leaving Hampton-Court, and going into the Isle of Wight, anno 1647 (1). This was no more than a picture of the Lady Stanley, which was Mr Raleigh's own property; therefore the King, among the letters he left on the table, in one of them, desired the said picture might be returned him (2).

[B] He certainly made his court to the Parliament, in hopes of recovering Sherborne.] Both the pieces mentioned above, are penned absolutely in this spirit. He had so much reason to detest the memory of King James, that 'tis no wonder to see him, on this occasion, carrying his resentment against Kingly

Power in general. Yet there is so much decency observed in it, as may serve to shame the extravagant licentiousness of others, on that head, in their addresses to the same Parliament. Thus, for instance, having represented the cruelty of his father's death, he makes the following exclamation. 'Here, Justice was indeed blind! blindly executing one and the same person, upon one and the same condemnation, for things contradictory.' For Sir Walter Raleigh was condemned for being a friend to the Spaniard; and lost his life, for being their utter enemy. Thus King, when they will, do what they please; please not him they should, God; and having made their power subservient to their will, deprive themselves of that just power, whereby others are subservient to them (3). P.

RAMSAY [ANDREW MICHAEL], frequently stiled The Chevalier Ramfay, a polite writer, in the XVIIIth century; was descended from a younger branch of an ancient family of his name, in Scotland (a): and was born the 9th of June 1686, at Ayre, in that kingdom; where he also received the first part of his education. As soon as he was fit for the university, he removed to Edinburgh, and distinguishing himself by his parts, and proficiency there, he was sent for to St Andrew's, in order to attend a son of the Earl of Weems, in that university. Not content with these advantages, of a liberal education at home, he went at length to Leyden in Holland (b); where, falling into the acquaintance of Peter Poirer, the celebrated mystic Divine [A], he became tinctured with him in 1652, he was put apprentice, very young, to an Engraver, who taught him to draw: wherein he succeeded so well, that he drew the picture of Mademoiselle Bourignon, after she had been dead a long time. However he soon quitted both the occupations, and applied himself to literature. At the age of thirteen he began to learn Latin at Mentz; and in 1661, went to prosecute the same study at Buxoville, near Strasburgh;

[A] Peter Poirer, the mystic Divine] As Mr Poirer was perhaps the most celebrated mystic Divine among the Protestants abroad, and had no small share in forming our author's religious principles; the reader will naturally look for some account of him, which is therefore inserted here, as follows. This enthusiastic French refugee was born at Mentz, in 1646, where his father followed the business of a Sword-Cutler: but losing

(a) See an account of the family in Nisbet's Heraldry and Sceptich Compendium.

(b) Communicated by a school-fellow of Mr Ramfay.

(3) Brief Relation of Sir Walter Raleigh's troubles, &c. p. 9.

(2) Dictionnaire Historique Portatif, &c. by M. L'Abbé Ladvocat, &c. 2d. edit. Paris 1755, under our author's article, Vol. II.

with those doctrines (c); and resolved, for further satisfaction, to consult M. Fenelon, the much famed Archbishop of Cambray, who had long imbibed some of the fundamental principles of that Theology (d). Our student, before he left Scotland, had conceived a disgust to the established religion of the country in which he was bred. And in that ill humour, having cast his eye upon the other Christian Churches, he could see none to his liking; he became displeas'd with all, and thence gave into the principles of Deism. During his abode in Holland, he grew more confirm'd in that way of thinking, yet without coming to any fixed determination. In this unsettled state of mind, he arriv'd at Cambray, in the year 1710 [B]. The Archbishop receiv'd him with all that paternal goodness, the fame of which had brought him this visitor; with whose address and conversation he was so much pleas'd, that he took him into his family; heard with patience and attention, the history of his religious principles; enter'd heartily with him into a discussion of them, which continued in various conferences for the space of six months, and, in the end, made him as good a Catholic as himself (e) [C]; accordingly he retain'd a warm affection

(d) Which he had published in a book, intitled, Les maximes des Saints. See an account of it in Histoire de la vie de M. Fenelon, &c. by our author.

(e) Especially in that all-healing sovereign principle, of submitting all his opinions to the decision of the Church.

Strasburgh; where M. de Kirchein Governour of the county of Hanau, employ'd him in teaching French to his children. In 1664, he went to Basil, where he learn'd Greek and Hebrew; Philosophy and Divinity: in the former, chiefly following Des Cartes. From Basil, he went to Hanau, in 1667, and the following year to Heidelberg, where he was ordain'd a minister. In 1670, he married, but had no children by his wife, who died before him, and left him all her estate. In 1672, he was establish'd minister of the church of Anweil, a town in the duchy of Deux-ponts. It was during his residence here, that he began to read the works of Thomas à Kempis, and other Mystics; these inspir'd him with an ardent desire of Perfection; with which he became more inflam'd, by reading the works of Antoinette Bourignon; for whom he conceiv'd, from this time, an esteem which he preserv'd ever after. The troubles of the war oblig'd him, in 1676, to quit Anweil, where he was greatly beloved, he went to Holland, and thence to Hamburg, where he had the pleasure of seeing Mademoiselle Bourignon, as he had long desired. He continued in that town about eight years, wholly employ'd in exercises of piety (1). In 1688, he retir'd to Rheinberg, a town in Holland, near Leyden, where he liv'd in solitude thirty years; that is, 'till his death, which happen'd May 21, 1719 (2). In this last solitude, he compos'd the greatest part of his books, which turn chiefly upon subjects of piety, as appears by their titles, viz. Cogitationes rationales de Deo, anima, & malo, &c. Mémoire touchant la vie, & les sentimens de Mademoiselle Antoinette Bourignon. Monitum necessarium ad Acta Eruditorum Lipsiæ, anni 1686, mensis Januarii—de Antonia Bourignon, &c (3). *L'Oeconomie Divine ou Système universel & démontré des oeuvres & des desseins de Dieu envers les hommes, &c.* La paix des bonnes ames dans tous les parties du Christianisme, &c.* (4). L'Ecole du pur amour de Dieu ouverte à savans, &c. Les principes solides de la Religion, & de la Vie Chrétienne, &c. La Théologie Réelle, vulgairement ditte, La Théologie Germanique, &c. De Eruditione triplici, solida, superficiali, & falsa, libri tres. De Eruditione solida specialiora tribus tractatibus. 1. De Educatione liberorum Christiana. 2. De Irenica Universalis. 3. Theologia Mystica, ejusque auctorum idea generalis, &c. Fides & Ratio collata ac suo utraque loco redditæ adversus principia Johannis Lockii, &c. Idea Theologiæ Christianæ juxta principia Jacobi Bohemi, Philosophi Teutonici, brevis & methodica, &c. Vera & cognita omnium prima, sive de natura idearum ex origine sua repetita, &c. Disquisitio Theologico-philosophica, in qua Spinozismus & Sociianismus tuto prævertuntur, &c. La Théologie du cœur, ou recueil de quelques traités, qui contiennent les lumières les plus divines des ames simples & pures. Le Chrétien Réel contenant, 1. La Vie du Marquis de Renty, par J. B. de Saint-Jure, Jésuite. 2. La Vie de la Mere Elizabeth de l'Enfant Jésus pour servir de modèle à la vie véritablement Chrétienne, & d'Apologie effective, aux maximes & voyes spirituelles de la Vraye Théologie mystique vainement combattue par les Esprits du siècle XVII. Le Saint Refuge, ou la vie & la mort édifiante de Wernerus, mort l'anno 1699. La Théologie de l'Amour, ou la vie & les oeuvres de Sainte Catherine de Gènes. Traduction de l'imitation de Jesus Christ. Posthuma. He also procur'd editions of the works of Antoinette Bourignon, Madam Guyon (5), and other pieces of mystic Divinity, which made a great noise in the world.

(1) Mr Bayle, speaking of him at this time, says, he was a man of acknowledged probity; who, from a warm Cartesian, became such a Devotionist, that, in order to attend better to heavenly things, he brok off almost all commerce with the earth.

(2) Nicéron, Memoires des Hommes illustres, Tom. iv. p. 144, & seqq. Moreri's Diction. edit. 1740. & Diction. Portatif, 2d. edit. 1755.

(3) This was wrote asinist Seckendorf, who return'd a smart answer.

* Translated into English, with the title of Divine Oeconomy: or, System of the works of God, in 6 vol. 12mo. 1753.

(4) This is a very proper book for making hypocrites, and to beget an indifferency with regard to outward worship.

(5) This lady seems to have first infus'd the principles of mystic divinity into M. Fenelon, Archbishop of Cambray, for which they were both afterwards condemn'd as Quietists. See Histoire de la vie de M. Fenelon, by our author, Ramsay, p. 23, & seqq. edit. à la Haye, 1723, 8vo.

[B] In this state of mind he came to Cambray in 1710.] We have an account of this matter from himself, as follows. 'L'An. 1710, J'eus l'honneur de voir M. de Cambray pour la premiere fois, &c. Thus, in English: In 1710, I had the honour of seeing M. de Cambray for the first time. I think myself oblig'd to relate the discours which I had with him upon religion; because they will let us see his way of thinking and shew at the same time, that his piety was so far from leading to a refin'd Deism; and an independence upon all visible authority, as his enemies have insinuated; that, on the contrary, it furnishes the most solid proofs, both of Christianity and of Catholicity.

Born, as I was, in a free country, where the human mind shews itself in all it's forms, without restraint; I ran through the greatest part of the religions there profess'd, in order to find which was the true one. The fanaticism, or contradiction, which I observ'd in all the different Protestant systems, gave me a disdain for all the Christian sects. However, as my heart was not corrupted by the great passions, my understanding could not resist the absurdities of Atheism. To believe that nothing is the source of every thing, which is, that finite is eternal, or an infinite being, only a collection of all finite beings, appear'd to me extravagancies more insupportable, than the wildest doctrines of any sect of believers. I chose therefore to take refuge in sober Deism; which confines itself to a reverence for the Divinity, and the unchangeable ideas of pure virtue, without any concern about mysteries, priests, or outward worship. I could not, however, throw off my respect for the Christian religion; the morality of which, is so truly sublime. My mind was distract'd and overwhelmed with a thousand doubts and difficulties. To plunge at at once into Deism, was, I thought, a bold step; and to take up with any sect of Christians, seem'd a childish weakness. Thus I wander'd, here and there, in the vague principles of Latitudinarianism and universal toleration, without being able to find any fixed point to rest upon. It was in these dispositions that I came to Cambray (6)'. And what was the consequence, will be seen in the next remark.

(6) Ibid. p. 110, 111, 112.

[C] Made him as good a Catholic as himself.] Our author having given the substance of all that was urg'd on each side, in these conferences, concludes in these terms: 'C'est ainsi que M. de Cambray, ne fait sentir qu'on ne peut être sagement Deïste, sans devenir Chrétien, ni philosophiquement Chrétien sans devenir Catholique' (7). 'Twas thus that the Archbishop convinc'd me, that a sober thinking Deist must of necessity become a Christian, and that a Christian cannot reason philosophically without becoming a Catholic.' This conversion, however, it must be observ'd, was not wrought without inculcating that favourite tenet of M. Fenelon's, the pure, unmixed, and distinguished love of God, as the grand fundamental principle of all religion. A tenet which our author had before imbib'd from the writings and conversation of Poiret, though not without some disgust at the extravagancies to which it was there carried. But that rubbish of the Protestant divine, being cleared away by the Catholic prelate, the maxims appear'd in it's full blaze of beauty; irresistibly charming. The disciple was captivated, and embrac'd it with a fervency and union, equal to that of his master. Thus the business of his conversion was three parts compleated; all the Archbishop's reasoning, in order thereto, being laid upon this foundation. Other

(7) Ibid. p. 145, 146.

(f) L'Advocat's Dictionnaire Portatif ubi supra.

(g) Of a peripneumony, or inflammation of the lungs Vie de Fenelon as before.

(h) Yet neither of them came to the possession of it, being survived by Lewis XIV. who was succeeded by his Great-Grandson, Son to the Duke of Burgundy, and now Lewis XV.

(i) Dictionnaire Portatif.

(k) Communicated by his school-fellow, as before.

fection and esteem for his disciple, ever after (f). That worthy and amiable Prelate died in July, 1715 (g); and the pupil, out of a grateful respect to his master's memory, wrote and published the History of his life. The truth is; the province could not but be agreeable to him; since, in explaining and defending his Preceptor's principles, he explained and defended his own. Nor was it his religious sentiments only, that Mr Ramsay drew from this fountain. Whatever he possessed of the sublime in Philosophy, and the beautiful in polite Literature, was owing to the instructions of the same great master: hitherto he had been in the state of a novice; the Archbishop of Cambrai formed the man, and accomplished the scholar. And hence too, the subsequent course of his life received its direction. M. Fenelon had been Preceptor to the Duke of Burgundy, heir-apparent, after the death of his father, the Dauphin, to the Crown of France (h). Mr Ramsay having first been Governour to the Duke de Chateau-Thierry, and the Prince du Turenne, was made Knight of the order of St Lazarus, and afterwards sent for to Rome by the Chevalier de St George, stiled there King of Great-Britain, with the appellation of James III. to take the charge of educating his children. He went accordingly to that Court, in 1724, with a view of entering upon the charge; but the intrigues and dissensions which he found upon his arrival there, gave him so much uneasiness, that, with the Pretender's leave, he presently returned to Paris (i). And from thence, the ensuing year, he crossed the water to his own country; where he was kindly received by the late Duke of Argyle and Greenwich, in whose family he resided about nine or ten years (k). With this noble and generous patron, he enjoyed all that tranquil leisure, which is the sole happiness of a studious life; and he employed it in writing several ingenious pieces, that were well received by the public [D]. In the mean time he received an uncontested testimony of his merit, in an honourable degree of Doctor of Law, which was conferred upon him by the university of Oxford, in April 1730 (l). After his return to France he resided sometimes at Pontoise, a seat of the Prince de Turenne, Duke de Bouillon, with whom he continued in the post of Intendant, 'till his death; which happened on the sixth of May, 1743, at St Germain-en-Laye, where his corps was interred in the parish church; but his heart was deposited in the nunnery of St Sacrament at Paris (m). A little before his death, he wrote two letters in defence of Mr Pope's religious principles [E]. And after

(l) To this purpose he was admitted of St Mary-hall, April 10, 1730. See the buttry-book of that House. The worthy Principal of which, Dr King, presented him to his degree, Communicated by the doctor.

(m) Diction. Portatif.

other part had been effected, at his first introduction to his Grace; who received him with that paternal goodness, as, he himself suggests, immediately won his heart (8). The truth is, such an extraordinary kind reception, of an absolute stranger, will seem, no doubt, a little unaccountable, to such as are unacquainted with M. Fenelon's character, and would be enough to discredit the whole story with them. But all doubts must vanish, and the story remain instated in its full credit, as soon as that comes to be known. To relate all the various instances, of the goodness, sweetness, and benevolence of this worthy Archbishop, would be to write the history of his life; as is evident from our author's attempt upon that subject, to which we refer. It is sufficient to mention here, those particular, and extraordinary attestations, that were given of it, at the very time of Mr Ramsay's introduction to him, by the army of the allies, then victorious in the Cambrisis itself. Under these circumstances, the Duke of Marlborough, Prince Eugene, and afterwards the Duke of Ormond, in respect to that goodness, prevented him with all manner of civilities. They sent him detachments to guard his meadows, pastures, and corn lands. They transported the grain, and escorted it themselves, to Cambrai, to secure it from their own foragers. And when they were informed that he was about to visit his diocese, they sent him word, that he had no occasion for a French convoy, for they would themselves escort him: Even the Hussars of the Imperial troops did not fail to do him that service. Such a commanding power has true virtue over all hearts! And on his side, during the last years of the war, he kept an open table for all the officers, as well Foreigners as French: who resorted to Cambrai, for the sake of his charming conversation (9).

[D] He wrote several pieces.] It will not be amiss to fill up this remark, with a complete list of his writings, as follows. 1. Discours sur le Poëme Epique; A Discourse upon the Epique Poem, prefixed to the latter editions of M. Fenelon's Telemachus. 2. La vie de M. François de Salignac de la Motte Fenelon, Archevêque Duc de Cambrai: And in English; intitled, The Life of M. Fenelon, Archbishop of Cambrai. 3. Essai sur le Gouvernement Civil: An Essay upon Civil Government. 4. Le Psichometre, ou Reflexions sur les differens caracteres de l'esprit par un Milord Anglois: this is, Remarks upon Lord Shaftesbury's Characteristics. 5. Les Voyages de Cyrus, in French; and in English, intitled, The Travels of

Cyrus: this piece hath gone through several editions in both languages. 6. L'Histoire de M. de Turenne, in French and English. 7. Several small pieces of Poetry, in English. 8. Two Lettres in French to M. Racine the son, upon the true sentiments of Mr Pope, in his Essay on Man; printed after the decease of our author in Les Oeuvres de M. Racine le fils, tom. ii. edit. 1747, and tom. iii. edit. 1753; and inserted in the next remark, being mentioned above, as are also the two posthumous pieces of his, in English, printed at Glasgow. One intitled, A Plan of Education, by the author of the Travels of Cyrus. The other, Philosophical Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion, explained and unfolded in a geometrical order. In two volumes, 4to.

[E] He wrote two letters in defence of Mr Pope, against that charge.] As these letters have never been printed in England, and are not common to be met with, we shall insert them here. The first is in these terms.

‘ Quoique charmé que je sois, Monsieur, de votre ouvrage (10), que je viens de lire; il ne convient pas à un étranger d'en faire eloge, & vous feriez peu de cas de l'encens, que vous prodigueriez un inconnu.

‘ Le principal dessein de cette lettre est de rendre justice à mon ami, & à mon compatriote M. Pope. ‘ Il est très bon Catholique; & a toujours conservé la religion de ses ancêtres dans un pays, où il auroit pu trouver des tentations pour l'abandonner. La pureté de ses mœurs, la noblesse de ses sentimens, & son attachement à tous les grand principes du Christianisme le rendent aussi respectable, que la supériorité de ses lumieres, la beauté de son genie, & universalité de ses talens le rendent admirables.

‘ Il a été accusé en France de vouloir établir la fatalité monstrueuse de Spinosa, & de nier la dégradation de la nature humaine. Je le crois exempt de l'une & de l'autre de ces funestes erreurs, qui renversent toute morale, & toute religion, soit naturelle soit revelée. Voici comme j'entens les principes de son essai sur l'homme; & je pense, qu'il ne me desavouera pas.

‘ Il est bien éloigné de croire que l'état actuel de l'homme soit son état primitif, & conforme à l'ordre: son dessein est de montrer, que depuis la nature dégradée tout est proportionné avec poids, mesure, & harmonie à l'état d'un être dechu; qui souffre, qui mérite de souffrir, & qui ne peut être retablir que par les souffrances. Que les maux physiques sont destinés

(10) This was a poem upon Religion in French. It is published in Oeuvres de M. Racine le fils, Vol. III. 2d. edit. 1753.

(8) These are his words: M. L'Archevêque me reçut avec cette bonté paternelle, & infinuante, qui gagne d'abord le cœur. Ibid. p. 112.

(9) Diction. Portatif, ubi supra. And especially Vie de Fenelon, p. 163-165, N B. 'Tis said that Ramsay, in leaving Holland, went first to the allied army, and thence to Cambrai; if so, he was probably introduced first to the Archbishop by some of these officers.

after his death, besides a small piece, in 8vo. intitled, A Plan of Education, there was printed at Glasgow, a capital work, intitled, Philosophical Principles of Natural and Revealed Religion, explained and unfolded in a geometrical order, 1749, in two vol. 4to. The refined ‘ destinés à guerir le mal moral. Que les passions & les crimes des hommes les veritables sont bornés, dirigés & réglés de façon par une sagesse souveraine ; qu’elle tire l’ordre de la confusion, la lumière des tenebres, & des biens innombrables des maux passagers de cette vie. Que cette providence conduit tout à ses fins, sans jamais blesser la liberté des êtres intelligens, & sans produire ni approuver les effets de leur malice deliberée ; & que tout est réglé dans l’ordre physique, tandis que tout est libre dans l’ordre moral : que ces deux ordres sont enchainés sans fatalité, & sans cette necessité, qui nous rend vertueux sans mérite, & vicieux sans crime : que nous ne voyons presentement qu’une roüe detachée de la vaste machine, qu’un nœud tres petit de la grand chaîne, & qu’une foible partie du plan immense, qui fera devoilé quelque jour. Alors Dieu justifiera pleinement toutes les demarches incomprehensibles de sa sagesse & de sa bonté, & s’abfoudra, comme dit Milton, du jugement temeraire des mortels.

‘ Vous avez donné uoe preuve éclatante de la justesse de votre esprit, en avertissant le lecteur (11) que vous n’attaquez pas les veritables sentimens de M. Pope, mais les fausses consequences qu’on a tirée en ce pays de son ouvrage, en confondant l’ordre passager de la nature dégradée avec l’ordre eternal, immuable, & necessaire, auquel l’homme est destiné.

‘ Je connois les coupables auteurs de ces calomnies repandues contre M. Pope, spinosites & increduloes euxmêmes, ils ont cru qu’il leur ressembloit ; persuadés qu’on ne peut avoir de l’esprit, sans penser comme eux.

‘ Notre Homere Anglois bien éloigné de l’erreur Pelagienne, dont Homere & Platon auroient euxmêmes rougi, est persuadé, que non seulement l’homme est deçu & depouillé, mais mortellement blesser ; non seulement blesser, mais encore mort ; non seulement mort, mais encore enseveli dans peché. Desforté que sans une force surnaturelle, sans la Supraus Oeta reconnus des Payens même, il ne peut rien produire de lui même, qui soit conforme à l’ordre eternal, à l’amour souveraine beau pour lui même ; & de tous les êtres subalternes pour lui. Je me flatte, qu’il justifiera un jour ses vrais sentimens, et qu’il imitera votre exemple eo nous doonnant un poème sur la religion, fort supérieur du Paradis Perdu ; dont les images souvent rampantes, sont peu dignes de la majesté du sujet, dont la plan philosophique n’egale pas le genie sublime de poète, ni l’ordonnance symmetrique l’esprit errateur de Milton.

‘ Milton escrivoit son poeme pour confondre l’incredulité de son siècle ; mais, Calviniste outré, il degrada son ouvrage par les injures pueriles & insensées, qu’il vomit contre l’eglise Romaine, aussi bieo que par le plan borné & retréci, qu’il nous donne de la providence & de l’amour universel de Dieu pour ses créatures.

‘ M. Le Chevalier Newton, grand Geometre & nullement Métaphysicien, étoit persuadé de la verité de la religion, mais il voulut rafiner sur les erreurs anciennes orientales, & renouelle l’Arianisme par l’Organe de son fameux disciple & interprete M. Clarke ; qui m’avoua quelque avant que de mourir, après plusieurs conferences que j’avois eues avec lui, combien il se repentit, d’avoir fait imprimer son ouvrage. Je fus temoins, il-y-a douze ans à Londres, des derniers sentimens de ce modeste & vertueux docteur.

‘ M. Locke, genie superficiel, qui a écrit les Elemens de la Philosophie, plutôt que ses principes aprofondis, étoit je crois un Socinien décidé. Quand l’autorité ne guide plus un Philosophe, & que les decisions de l’eglise ne lui servent pas de bouffole, il s’egare toujours.

‘ Je m’étois encore de ma tendre jeunesse dans une incredulité seduisante ; mais egalemeot éloignée, des horreurs de Spinosisme impie, & des excès du Deïsme, qui ne cherche qu’à secouer le joug de la revelation que pour contenter les passions. Je fis ramenè par le grand & sublime Fenelon Archevêque de Cambrai ; qui me fit comprendre non seulement la beauté de la morale chrétienne, mais qui me démontra, que ‘ quoique nos mystères soient incomprehensibles, ils pourtant ne sont pas impossibles : qu’ils ont nne côté obscur qui humilie l’esprit humain, & une côté lumineux qui l’eclairc & le console. Enforte que je puis dire avec feu notre ami M. Rousseau.

‘ Tel aujourd’hui degagée de sa chaîne,

‘ N’ecoute plus que la voix Souveraine

‘ ———— Qui commençant sa carrière,

‘ Ferme long tems les yeux a la lumière :

‘ Je suis Monsieur,

‘ avec, &c.

‘ Le Chevalier de R A M S A Y.’

A Pontoise le 28
Avril 1742.

M. Racine was so much pleased with this account of Pope’s religion, and the manner of explaining his Essay on Man, that he begged leave to print the letter, in the following Address to our Chevalier.

‘ Il est vray Monsieur, Que je n’ai pas l’honneur d’être connu de vous ; mais si votre nom & vos ouvrages m’étoient inconnus, je serois étranger dans la republique des lettres. La manière dont vous expliquez le systéme de M. Pope, est si lumineuse & si conforme à la religion, que je vous demande la permission de rendre votre lettre publique. Elle servira, en attendant que M. Pope explique lui même, & parle aussi clairement que vous le fait parler, à éclairer ceux, qui le font penser bien differemment.

‘ Ce que vous m’ecrivez sur Milton, Newton, Clarke, & Locke, fait voir que l’amour de la verité est plus fort sur vous, que l’amour pour vos compatriotes ; puisque vous ne diffimulez pas leurs erreurs.

‘ Il faut avouer que les Geometres eux mêmes, malgré cette science, qui doit rendre l’esprit si juste, s’egarent souvent dans les veritez les plus importantes ; lorsqu’ils ne veulent suivre que leurs lumières ; parce qu’en pareille matiere la grand justesse d’esprit est la soumettre à l’autorité.

‘ Je suis, &c.’

Soissons, le 16
May 1742.

The expected letter from Pope for Racine (12), coming together with a copy of his Essay on Man with Warburton’s notes, to the hands of our Chevalier, he presently sent the packet to Racine, with the following letter.

‘ Je suis bieo content, Monsieur, & bien persuadé que vous serez aussi content que moi, en recevant la lettre que M. Pope, m’adresser pour vous être remise.

‘ Elle vous fera connoître, que je ne m’étois pas engagé temerairement, lorsque dans la premiere lettre, que j’eus l’honneur de vous écrire, j’ai soutenu hardiment la pureté des sentimens de mon illustre compatriote. Mais ce n’étoit pas assez, qu’il fut justifié par moi : on eut peut croire que l’amitié seul m’avoit fait parler. Le voici, qui justifie lui même. La lettre, en vous prouvant son zele pour la religion, & sa soumission à l’autorité de l’eglise, fermera la bouche à ses accusateurs. Il y joit un livre fait pour sa defense par un celebre Docteur de l’eglise Angloise oommé Warburto. En distribuant lui même cet ouvrage à ses amis, il l’adopte, il l’approuve, & le reod precieux.

‘ Vous soupçonnez contre lui étoient pardonnoables ; vous avez été ébranlé par les faox rapports de ses ennemis. Il en a de plusieurs especes. Soo rare talent lui fait des envieux, Urit enim fulgore suo, &c. Ses liaisons intimes qu’il a eu avec plusieurs grand seigneurs oppoées, ou accredités à la cour, lui en oot fait d’autres. De reste on a des preuves certaines

‘ de

(11) The advertisement was prefixed to Mr Racine’s poem sur la religion ; in which he had attacked those false consequences of the doctrine advanced in the Essay on Man.

(12) See the letter in Mr Pope’s article, remark [M M].

(<sup>n</sup>) Viz. by M. Ladvoat in Diction. Portatif, as before. fined perplexity of this laborious performance, gives some countenance to the character that has been given him of a Pyrrhonist (<sup>n</sup>).

‘ de sa probité & de sa vertu incorruptible. J’ai ouï dire, qu’il a été successivement, & quelquefois en même tems, ami & confident intime de plusieurs ministres. Il auroit pû faire une fortune immense en profitant de la disgrâce des uns pour faire sa cour aux autres : mais son cœur est incapable des ces bassesses.

‘ On m’assure aussi, qu’une Princesse, admiratrice de ses ouvrages, voulut, dans le tems qu’elle gouvernoit l’Angleterre, engager ce poëte, non pas à abandonner la religion de ses peres, mais à dissimuler ; elle vouloit lui procurer les places considérables, en lui promettant, qu’il seroit dispensé des sermens accoutumés. Il refusa ces propositions avec une fermeté inébranlable. Un pareil sacrifice n’est pas celui d’un incrédule, ni d’un deïste.

‘ Ne croyez pas, que les sentimens d’une amitié reciproque m’engagent à parler ainsi en faveur de M. Pope. Ni que j’aye envie de lui offrir un encens adulateur ; je ne songe qu’à rendre un hommage à la justice & à la vérité.

‘ Je suis, &c.’

Le 10 Sept.
1742.

P

RANDOLPH, or RANDOLFE, [Sir THOMAS], an eminent and able Statesman, in Queen Elizabeth’s reign, was the son of Avery Randolph [A] of Badlesmere in Kent, and born in that county (a) in the year 1523 (b). The famous G. Buchanan was his Schoolmaster [B]. But he had his University-education in the new-founded college of Christ’s-church in Oxford (c): where he took the degree of Bachelor of Law in 1547 (d); about which time he was made a public Notary. On the twentieth of November 1549, he became Principal of Broad-gate-hall (e), in his university, and continued so ’till the year 1553 (f): when he was banished into France on account of his religion, and because he would not comply with Queen Mary’s measures (g). But in Queen Elizabeth’s reign he was very much favoured and distinguished; being employed in no less than eighteen embassies. For, he was sent thrice to the associated Lords in Scotland, when they were raising commotions in that kingdom; thrice to Mary Queen of Scots, after her return from France; seven times to her son and successor King James VI: thrice to Ivan Basilowitz Emperor of Russia; once to Charles IX, and again, to Henry III, kings of France (h) [C]. All which is a plain argument of his having been a man of great abilities; for such only, in general, were employed by that wise Princess. The first time he was sent into Scotland, was in the year 1561 (i), on purpose to cultivate a mutual friendship between the two nations; and to advise the nobility to hinder the young Queen, who had newly lost her husband Francis II. king of France, from marrying again with a foreigner (k). In some after-negotiations, he proposed to her Robert Dudley, Earl of Leicester, for a husband: but she thought fit to chuse for herself (l). He used, in his transactions with Scotland, a great deal of Address, or Craft [D], as one expresses it: who adds, That he ‘knew him to be a double-dealer, and a sower of discord;’ and that, ‘in his letters to some of the Court of England, he gloried, that he had kindled a fire in Scotland, which could not be easily

(a) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721. Vol. I. col. 244.

(b) See below his age, at the time of his death.

(c) Wood, ibid.

(d) Idem Fasti, col. 71.

(e) Now converted into Penbroke-college.

(f) Wood, Ath. & Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. l. ii. p. 331.

(g) Memoires of Sir James Melvil, edit. fol. 1683. p. 107.

(h) Camdeni Annales Elizabetae, ad an. 1590.

(i) The Instructions given him by the Privy-Council and Secretaries of State, are among Ant. Wood’s MSS. Catal. MSS. Angliae & Hib. p. 363. col. 2. No. 25.

(k) Camdeni Annales, ad ann. 1561.

(l) Idem, ad an. 1563, 1564. and Melvil’s Memoires, p. 40. See also Strype’s Annals of the Reformation, Vol. I. ed. 1725, p. 442, &c.

[A] Was the son of Avery Randolph.] Besides Sir Thomas, who is the subject of this article, Avery Randolph had another son, named Edward; who was a brave officer; employed in 1563 in the defence of Havre, in France; and afterwards in Ireland, where he was slain in 1567. Mr Camden gives this great character of him. Vir sane nostrâ memoriâ eximius, nec fuit alius qui majorem auctoritatem cum majore charitate apud milites conciliavit. i. e. ‘Never did man deserve a fairer and more honorable remembrance, for the authority he maintained, and the love and respect he deservedly shared, amongst the soldiers (1).

[B] The famous G. Buchanan was his Schoolmaster, &c.] So I understand these words of Mr Ruddiman, in his notes on Buchanan’s life. Thomæ Randolphi Angli, qui a Buchananano humanioribus literis eruditus, eum impensè totâ deinceps vitâ colebat.

[C] Once to Charles IX, and again to Henry III, kings of France.] D. Lloyd says, that he was sent to Charles the ninth, king of France, to discover his design upon Scotland; and to Henry the third, to open a conspiracy of his subjects against him (2).

[D] A great deal of Address, or Craft, &c.] The standing Maxim of Queen Elizabeth, and her Ministry, was, to foment, and keep up, Dissensions among neighbouring Princes, whom she had reason to be jealous of, in order to prevent their giving her any trouble at home (3). This was practised by Mr Randolph in Scotland, who took advantage of the two furious factions raised there; one for the Queen of Scots, and the other against her. ‘Mr Randolph knew the animosities which were among the Nobility, and the nature of every one in particular, by his frequent coming and his long residence in Scotland.

‘ And among the Ladies he had a Mother, and a Mistress, to whom he caused his Queen [Queen Elizabeth] frequently to send commendations, and tokens. He also used his craft with the Ministers, offering gold to such of them as he thought could be prevailed with to accept of his offer, but such as were honest refused his gifts. He gave largely to all such, as he knew were able to serve him in his design of kindling this fire, and his endeavours were so successful, that the two parties were not only stirred up to fight, and shed one another’s blood, but would revile each other with injurious and blasphemous words, and at length fell to the down-casting of each others houses, to which England gave no small assistance, having sent in a number of men of war to throw down Hamilton. This was occasioned by some probability that appeared of a reconciliation of the two Factions, by the endeavours of some of the most prudent Ministers, who did all they could to prevent the ensuing troubles. And they foresaw that this prejudice was done to the Hamiltons, to irrage them, so as there might be no hope of agreement when they should see themselves so far injured. Now as Nero stood upon a high part of Rome to see the town burning, which he had caused to be set on fire, so Mr Randolph delighted to see such a fire by his craft kindled in Scotland, which was in all probability like to burn it up.’—Such is the account given by Sir James Melvil (4): who adds, that of all this Secretary Cecil was the director, and Mr Randolph the executor.—We learn from the industrious Mr Strype (5), that Mr Randolph was Embassador in Scotland in the years 1563, 1564, 1571, 1580, 1581, 1583, 1585, 1586.

(1) Vide Camdeni Annales, ad an. 1563, & 1567, ex edit. Elzev. 1625. 8vo. p. 75, 128, 571.

(2) State-Worshippes, edit. 1679. 8vo. p. 567.

(3) See Rapin’s History, at the end of Queen Elizabeth’s reign.

(4) Memoires, &c. p. 109.

(5) Annals of the Reformation, Vol. I. p. 442, &c. 455, Vol. II. p. 76, &c. 620, &c. Vol. III. p. 3, 162, 304, 390.

[E] Whereby

(m) Meivil, p. 209.
 (n) See an account of it, written by himself, in Hakluyt's Voyages, &c. Vol. I. p. 376.
 (o) Hakluyt, ibid. p. 378, &c. & Camdeni Annals, sub ann. 1569.
 (p) Scrype's Annals, Vol. II. p. 78.
 (q) Camdeni Annal. ad ann. 1590.

'easily extinguished (m).' One of his embassies to Russia, was in the year 1568, for which he embarked the 22d of June, at Harwich (n). He concluded June 20. 1569, a very advantageous Treaty with the Emperor Ivan Basilowitz, whereby he obtained considerable Privileges for the English merchants trading to those parts (o) [E]. In 1571, during one of his Embassies in Scotland, he shewed an uncommon spirit, by sending a challenge to Virac the French Embassador in that kingdom [F], who had invented false reports against Queen Elizabeth, and himself (p). Such were some of Mr Randolph's long and zealous services for his Queen and Country. They deserved considerable Rewards: But the Queen, who was never prodigal of her Favours, rewarded him only with the honor of Knighthood, with the office of Chamberlain of the Exchequer, the Mastership of the Posts [G], and a few small estates: Which the modest man was contented with, though he had great many Children (q) [H]. He dyed, at his house on St Peter's-hill, near Thames-street, London, the 8th of June 1590, aged 67. and was buried the 6th of July following in the church of St Peter's Paul's-wharf (r). From one of his letters, preserved by Mr Camden (s), he appears to have had a religious frame of mind [I]. His Letters and Dispatches must have been very numerous (t); however, very few of them have been as yet communicated to the world [K].

(r) Wood Ath. as above.
 (s) Ubi supra, ad ann. 1590.
 (t) Several of them are in the Cottonian Library, Caligula, B. 9. 10. and the Instructions given to him, when he was sent in Special Ambassage to the French King 2 Apr. 1576. are among Bishop More's books in Cambridge public Library.

[E] Whereby he obtained considerable Privileges for the English merchants trading to those parts. In this Treaty, the Emperor 'gave them free leave to come to traffick in his kingdom to Colmogro, and to the country of Dwina, and to his great city of Moscovia, and to all the cities in his dominions, and through his country to Boghar, to Persia, Cablin, and Charday, and to all other countreys.—And wheresoever they came, there to be and abide freely, and to barter and bargain freely all wares of sale, without Custome of all people. and Merchants strangers whatsoever'—The then Governors, Consuls, Assistants, and Fellowship of the English Russia Company, named in this Treaty, were, Sir William Gerard, Kt. Rowland Haiward, Alderman, John Thammworth, Esq; John Rivers, Alderman, Henry Beecher, Alderman, Sir William Chester, Kt. Edward Jackman, Alderman, Lionel Duckett, Alderman, Edward Gilbert, Laurence Hufe, Francis Walsingham, Clement Throgmorton, John Quarles, Nicolas Wheeler, Thomas Banister, John Harrison, Francis Barnham, Antony Gamage, John Somers, Richard Wilkinson, John Sparke, Richard Barne, Robert Woolman, Thomas Browne, Thomas Smith, Thomas Allen, Thomas More, William Bully, Richard Yong, Thomas Atkinson, Assistants: John Merth, Esq; Geoffrey Duckett, Francis Robinson, Matthew Field, &c. (6).—Mr Randolph obtained also other special Grants, by the Emperor's private Letters, for several English merchants. And, among the rest, 'His Majesty promised his favor to English artificers, and that livings, or maintenance, should be appointed them as they could best deserve. He gave a letter to the merchants that went into Persia, to pass freely without hindrance in his dominions, as also letters of favour to the great Shaugh of Persia. He granted to the company, that at what time soever they sent to the discovery of Cataya, they should be licensed to repair unto his countrey, and have such conducts and guides, mariners, vessels, men and victuals as they should stand in need of (7).—Mr Randolph's Secretary, was Mr George Turberville; a famous poet for those times; who described the persons, manners, customs, &c. of the Moscovites, in some poetical Epistles to his friends, which are inserted in Hakluyt's Collection of Voyages (8). The curious Reader may see an Account of him in Wood's Athenæ (9).—Whilst Mr Randolph was Embassador in Russia, he granted a commission to James Bassendine, James Woodcocke, and Richard Browne, for searching of the sea, and border of the coast, from the river Pechora eastward (10).

(6) Hakluyt, as above, p. 378, 379.
 (7) Ibid. p. 382.
 (8) P. 384, &c.
 (9) Vol. I. edit. 1721, col. 275.
 (10) Hakluyt, Vol. I. p. 382, &c.

[F] By sending a challenge to Virac the French Embassador in that kingdom. The challenge was in these words. 'Monsieur Virac, I have seen, as I am informed, some Writings of Yours, in cipher, containing these words.—Which toucheth me greatly in honour, and, I doubt, the Queen my mistress; as to have trafficked with Mr Ar. D. for the conveyance of the French Ambassador's Letters in England to you. Wherefore this I write and signify unto you by these presents, that if you have written the words abovementioned, you have not done the part of an honest man: and that in so writing, you have lyed fallly in your throat. Which I will maintain with my body against him, you, or any man living, of my quality, or under the same, my charge at this time set apart. For that I never had any such talk with him, or he with me. Answer hereunto, if you think good (11).'

[G] With the office of Chamberlain of the Exchequer, the Mastership of the Posts, &c. Mr Camden calls the office of Chamberlain of the Exchequer, 'a place formerly of great honor';—quod olim dignitatis plenum (12): Which implies, that it was not reckoned for in his time. And D. Lloyd says, that of these two places, 'the first was but a name, and the second then but a noise (13).' By an Abstract of King James the First's Revenue, printed at the end of Truth brought to light by time, written by Fulk Greville Lord Brook (14), it appears, that the Chamberlain of the Exchequer had then for his Fee, only 52l. 3s. 4d. and the Master of the Posts, [answerable to the present office of Post Master general] 66l. 13s. 4d.

[H] Though he had great many Children. Nec ille, etsi plures habuerit liberos, ex continenti cupiditatis moderatione plura concupivit; &c. Mr Camden's account. D. Lloyd asserts, 'he had as many children at home as he had performed embassies abroad (15):' And if so, then he must have had eighteen.—He was married twice (16). One of his wives was sister to Sir Francis Walsingham (17).

[I] From one of his Letters—he appears to have had a religious frame of mind. It is written to his brother-in-law Sir Francis Walsingham; and therein he puts him in mind, 'How worthy, yea how necessary a thing it was, that they should at length bid farewell to the Tricks, he of a Secretary, and himself of an Embassador; and both of them set their minds upon their heavenly country, and reconcile themselves to the divine mercy by a timely Repentance (18).'

[K] However, very few of them have been as yet communicated to the world. Two of his Letters were published by James Oliphant, among G. Buchanan's Letters, 1711, 8vo. and have been inserted since in the Edinburgh and Leiden Editions of that fine writer's works. I. One is to Buchanan himself; and the other to Mr Peter Yonge, Schoole-master to King James VI. This latter being the most interesting, we shall present the reader with it.

'After my verie hartie Commendacions. Beinge lately moud with the remembrance of my Maister, Mr G. Buchanan, by the sight of a Booke of his, De Jure Regni apud Scotos, and callinge to mynde the notable Actes of his Life, his Studie, his Travayle, his Danger, his Wisdome, his Learninge, and to be short, as muche as could be wished in a Man; I thought the Kinge your Maister more happye that had Buchanan to his Maister, then Alexander the Great, that had Aristotle his instructor. I thought you very luyke that had his daily Company, joynid in office of lyke Service, and thanckid God not a litle for my self, that ever I was acquaintid with him. For one that hath so great Acquaintance as he hath with many learned, and companions of his life, and that hath so wel deferuid of the worlde, I maruaille that no man hath written of it: beinge a thinge so common unto all famous personnes, and most peculiar to the best learned. Heerin I might chieflie blame you, my good freind Maister Yonge, so neere unto him, so deere unto him, that nothinge can (11) Scrype, ubi supra.

 (12) Aonal. ad ann. 1590.
 (13) State Worthies, as above, p. 567.
 (14) Printed at London, 1657, 4to. and in pages of the said Abstract, 43, 61.
 (15) Ubi supra.
 (16) Wood, Ath. ut supra.
 (17) Vide Buchanan's Carmichael, inter Miscellan, No. 27.
 (18) Camdeni Ann. ut supra.

‘ can be hid of that which you desyre to knowe. If ‘ you say that tyme yeat feruiteh, and that he yeat
 ‘ liuethe whose Life I wilthe to be fet forth, surelie ‘ yeat I say unto you, that yf it be donne after his ‘ deathe, many things may be omittd that were wor‘ thie of famous memorie, by him to be better known
 ‘ then after his deathe. The cause of the wrytinge ‘ against the Grey Friars is knowen to many, but af‘ terwardes howe they preuaild against him, that he ‘ was faine to leaue his countrey, howe he escapd
 ‘ with great hazard of lyfe at Godes hand, the ‘ Thieues on the border, the plague in the north of ‘ England, what reliefe he found heere at a famous ‘ knights handes, Sir John Rainsorde, the onlie man
 ‘ that maintaynid him against the Furie of the Pa-‘ piftes; none doth knowe so well as himself, or can ‘ giue better notes of his life then himself can. As ‘ he liuith vertuouflic, so I doubt not but he will dye ‘ Christianly, and may be addid, when the former is ‘ perfectlie knowen. This is desirid by many, spe‘ cially lookid for at your handes, that can best doe,
 ‘ and are fittest to traouaile in so worthie a Worke.
 ‘ As I craue this at your handes, so shall you command
 ‘ what is in my power. And thus wishinge unto you,
 ‘ my good Freind, hartely well, I take my leaue.
 ‘ London, the 15th of Marche, 1579.

‘ Your verie lovinge Friende,

‘ Tho. Randolphe.’

II. Some of his Letters are printed in Mr Strype’s Annals (19): and several of his State papers, Instructions, and Dispatches, are published in the same

RANDOLPH [THOMAS], a celebrated English Poet in the XVIIth century; was the son of William Randolph of Hams near Lewes in Suffex (steward to Edward Lord Zouch), by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Thomas Smith of Newnham near Daventry in Northamptonshire. He was born at Newnham [A] the 15th of June 1605, and educated, as one of the King’s Scholars, at Westminster-school. From thence he was chosen into Trinity-college in Cambridge, in 1623, of which he became Fellow; and commenced Master of Arts (a): which degree he was incorporated into at Oxford in the year 1631 (b). He may be said to have been born a Poet, having, as early as at the age of nine or ten, written The History of the Incarnation of our Saviour, in verse, which still remains in manuscript [B]. As he grew up, the ingenuity of his poetical performances, procured him the esteem of all that had any pretensions to wit, particularly of one of the best wits and scholars of that age, the rare Benj. Johnson [C], who adopted him for one of his sons [D]. But his lively and agreeable conversation engaged him into too much company, and sometimes among none of the best or the most peaceable persons. So that once, in a jovial and drunken meeting, a quarrel arising, he had the misfortune to lose the little finger of his left hand. Which accident, it seems, could not ruffle his temper; but rather inspired him with a pretty copy of extempore verses that are printed

[A] He was born at Newnham. W. Winstanley, in his Lives of the English Poets (1), and G. Langbaine, in his Lives of the English Dramatick Poets (2), as also the late author of the British Theatre (3), affirm, That Mr Randolph was born at Houghton in Northamptonshire. But we chuse to follow Mr Wood, who had seen his Epitaph, and seems to have been furnished with the best and most authentic materials.

[B] The History of the Incarnation of our Saviour, which still remains in manuscript. Mr Wood says, that in his time it was ‘ preserved in manuscript in the ‘ Author’s own hand-writing (4);’ and we do not find it hath ever yet been published. It was undoubtedly upon account of that work, that Mr West passes the following compliment upon Mr Randolph.

He list’d wit worthy th’ presse, as if that he Had us’d his cradle as a library.
 Some of these fruits had birth, when other boyes (His elders) play’d with nuts: Books were his toys (5).

[C] Particularly of one of the best wits and scholars of that age, the rare Benj. Johnson. The manner how their acquaintance began, is thus related by Winstanley (6). ‘ Mr Randolph having been at London so long as that he might truly have had a parley with ‘ his Empty Purse, was resolv’d to go see Ben. Johnson ‘ with his associates, which as he heard at a set time collection (20). In one of which, speaking of Esme Steuart, Lord D’aubigny, afterwards Earl of Lenox, favorite of the young King, James VI, he gives this character of him.—‘ He hath continually his ear at ‘ downlying and uprising: A maintainer of Papists, ‘ rebels, traitors, and such as ever served against the ‘ King, and are enemies to all virtue. He brought ‘ over with him a notable personage, called Monsieur ‘ Monberneau, a Frenchman of kin to his wife; hard ‘ favoured, licentious, audacious but not stout, proud ‘ as his nation is, arrogant in his speech, bold and beg- ‘ garly; to be short, of no good condition or honesty: ‘ And of such a life, as when men will speak of a ‘ pocky knave, it is used for a common proverb, He ‘ hath danced in Monberneau’s breeches. This man is ‘ so familiar with the King, that in all pastimes he is ‘ a companion; in all Counsils he is one; in all As- ‘ semblies none more forward or near the King, than ‘ he. The best that his friends can say for him is, ‘ that he is a jester, a cracker, and a man to make the ‘ King merry.—Many other Tatlers and prater- ‘ ers and petty Companions there are: glad when ‘ they can get their word about, be it never so untrue ‘ or to little purpose: Not respecting what they speak, ‘ or of whom; so that either Credit or Profit may ‘ be won at the King’s hands. God amend them ‘ all (21).’—III. Some of Sir Thomas’s Letters, or ‘ Extracts from them, are also printed in ‘ Walter ‘ Goodall’s Examination of the Letters said to be ‘ written by Mary Queen of Scots, to James Earl of ‘ Bothwell, &c. (22).’ IV. And eleven of his Letters are in the Appendix to Dr Robertson’s excellent History of Scotland.

(20) Vol. I. p. 443. Vol. II. p. 76, 77, 620, 621, &c. Vol. III. p. 162, 304, 305.

(21) Vol. II. p. 622, 623.

(22) Edinburgh, 1754, 8vo. p. 201, 212, 215, 222, 246, 247.

(19) Vol. II. p. 78, 79, 624. and Appendix to book 2. No. 26. Vol. III. p. 390.

(a) Wood, Ath. Vol. I. edit. 1725, col. 244.

(b) Idem, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 253.

(1) Edit. Lond. 1687, 8vo. p. 142.

(2) Lond. 1699, p. 115.

(3) Lond. 1752, 8vo. p. 44.

(4) Athenæ, ut supra.

(5) Verses to the pious Memory of our Author, prefixed to his Works.

(6) Ubi supra, p. 143, 144.

‘ kept a club together at the Devil-Tavern near Tem‘ ple-Bar: Accordingly, at the time appointed he ‘ went thither, but being unknown to them, and want‘ ing money, which to an ingenious spirit is the most ‘ daunting thing in the world, he peep’d in the room ‘ where they were; which being espied by Ben. John‘ son, and seeing him in a Scholar’s thread-bare habit, ‘ “ John Bo-peep, says he, come in.” Accordingly he ‘ did, when immediately they began to rhyme upon
 ‘ the meanness of his clothes, asking him, “ If he ‘ “ could not make a verse?” and withal to call for his ‘ quart of Sack. There being four of them, he im‘ mediately replied,

‘ I John Bo-peep, to you four sheep,
 ‘ With each one his good fleece,
 ‘ If that you are willing to give me five shilling,
 ‘ ’Tis fifteen pence a-piece.

‘ By Jesus, quoth Ben. Johnson, (his usual oath) I be‘ lieve this is my son Randolph:’ which being made ‘ known to them, he was kindly entertained into their ‘ company, and Ben. Johnson ever after called him Son.

[D] Who adopted him for one of his sons. Our Au‘ thor wrote upon that occasion, ‘ A gratulatory to Mr ‘ Ben. Johnson, for his adopting of him to be his ‘ Son:’ which is printed among the rest of his po‘ ems (7).

(7) Edit. 1664, p. 17.

printed among his works (c) [E]. The scantiness of his patrimony, or his own extravagance, brought upon him that evil too common to Poets, Poverty [F]. And his irregular, and too free way of living, among his companions and admirers, shortened in all probability his days. For, after he had continued some time at his father's in Little Houghton in Northamptonshire, he went to the house of William Stafford of Blatherwick in the same county, where he dyed in March 1634, aged not quite thirty years. The 17th of the said month, he was buried in an isle joining to Blatherwick-church, among the Stafford-family. And, soon after, Sir Christopher Hatton caused, at his own charge, a monument of white marble leathed about with laurel, to be erected over his grave: the inscription on which, in Latin and English verse, was made by the Poet's friend Peter Hausted of Cambridge (d). He was a man of the greatest good humour, and a facetious companion; his Poems abound with wit; and though generally jocose, he is upon many occasions sententiously grave, and moral [G]. He appears to have been

(c) Lives of the English Poets, &c. by W. Winstanley, Lond. 1687, 8vo. p. 142.

(d) Wood, Ath. ut supra, col. 244, 245.

of

[E] A quarrel arising, he had the misfortune to lose the little finger of his left hand. Which accident, &c. The occasion of that misfortune is somewhat differently related by W. Winstanley, and the author of the British Theatre. The former says, 'That as it often happens, that in drinking high quarrels arise, so there chanced some words to pass betwixt Mr Randolph and another gentleman, which grew to be so high, that the Gentleman drawing his sword, and striking at Mr Randolph, cut off his little finger.'—But the latter affirms, 'He had the misfortune to lose one of his fingers, by a cut which he received in endeavouring to part two of his companions.' Which way soever it happened, the Verses he made upon the occasion, are these (8).

Unto my God, faith, all I have to do
Is to pray them, and glad they'll hear me too.

It concludes thus.

But my last Imprecation this shall be,
May they more debtors have, and all like me.

[G] And though generally jocose, he is upon many occasions sententiously grave and moral. Particularly in his Necessary Observations, or thirty-seven Precepts; which begin thus.

First worship God, he that forgets to pray
Bids not himself good-morrow, nor good-day.
Let thy first labour be to purge thy sin,
And serve Him first, whence all things did begin (12).

The rest is in the like pious strain.

But for a sample of his more serious performances, we shall lay before the Reader the following poem of his, In praise of Women in general.

He is a parricide to his mother's name,
And with an impious hand murders her fame,
That wrongs the praise of Women, that dares write
Libels on Saints, or with foule ink requite
The milk they lent us; better Sex command
To your defence my more religious hand
At sword or pen; yours was the nobler birth,
For you of Man were made, Man but of Earth,
The son of dust; and though your sin did breed
His fall, again you rais'd him in your seed:
Adam in's sleep a gainful losse sustain'd,
That for one rib a Better Self regain'd.
Who had he not your blest creation seen,
An An'chorite in Paradise had been.
Why in this work did the creation rest,
But that eternall Providence thought you best
Of all his six dayes labour? Beasts should do Homage to man, but man should wait on you.
You are of comelier sight, of daintier touch,
A tender flesh, a colour bright, and such
As Parians see in marble: Skin more fair,
More glorious head, and far more glorious hair;
Eyes full of grace and quicknesse; purer roses
Blush in your cheeks, a milder white composes
Your stately fronts; your breath, more sweet than his,
Breathes spice, and nectar drops at every kiss.
Your skins are smooth, bristles on theirs do grow
Like quills of porcupines; rough wool doth flow
O're all their faces, you approach more near
The form of angels, They like beasts appear.

(12) Poems, p. 33, &c.

Arithmetique nine digits, and no more
Admits of, then I still have all my store;
For, what mischance hath ta'ne from my left hand,
It seems did only for a cypher stand.
But this I'll say for thee, departed joynt,
Thou wert not given to steal, not pick, nor point
At any in disgrace, but thou didst go
Untimely to thy death, only to show
The other members what they once must do:
Hand, arm, leg, thigh, and all must follow too.
Oft didst thou scan my verse, where if I mis,
Henceforth I will impute the cause to this.
A finger's losse (I speak it not in sport)
Will make a verse sometimes a foot too short.
Farewell, dear finger, much I grieve to see
How soon mischance hath made a hand of thee.

There is also another copy of verses upon the same subject, in his poems; full of religious sentiments (9).

[F] Brought upon him that evil too common to Poets, Poverty. He cannot forbear complaining of it in his works, especially in two humorous Poems; one intitled, 'A Parley with his empty Purse (10).' And the other, 'On importunate Dunnes (11).' Some stanzas of this last, we imagine, will not be disagreeable to the reader.

Heark, Reader, if thou never yet hadst one,
I'll shew the torments of a Cambridge Dun.
He railes where e're he comes, and yet can say
But this, that Randolph did not keep his day.
What? can I keep the Day, or stop the Sun
From setting, or the Night from coming on?
Could I have kept dayes, I had chang'd the doom
Of Times and Seasons, that had never come.
These evill Spirits haunt me every day,
And will not let me eat, study, or pray.
I am so much in their Books, that 'tis known
I am too seldome frequent in my own.
.
.
.
.
.
.
When I would go to Chappell, they betray
My zeal, and when I only meant to pray

If

(8) See his Works, p. 32.

(9) P. 106.

(10) See his Works, p. 98, 99.

(11) P. 101.

(c) Winckley, and British Theatre, as above.

(f) See among the Copies of Verses prefixed to the Jealous Lovers, one of his which begins thus. Non satis est quod te dederit natura priorem, &c.

of a true poetical disposition, free, generous, and regardless of the world (e). Besides some miscellaneous Poems [H], he was author of six Dramatic pieces, of which an account is given below [I]. His works were collected together by a younger brother of his (f), named ROBERT, who was himself a good poet, as appears from several copies of his verses printed not only at the head of our Author's, but also in several other books. He was a Student of Christ-Church, Oxon. where he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts, February 18, 1627, and afterwards became first Vicar of Barnethy then of Donnington in Lincolnshire: he dyed, at the age of about sixty, and was interred at Donnington July 7, 1671 (g).

(g) Wood, Fashi, Vol. I. col. 236.

If then in bodies where the souls do dwell
You better us, do then our souls excell?
No; we in souls equall perfection see,
There can in them nor male nor female be.
Boast we of knowledge? You have more than we,
You were the first ventur'd to pluck the tree.
And that more Rhetorick in your tongues doth lye,
Let Him dispute against, that dares deny
Your least commands, and not perswaded be
With Samson's strength, and David's piety,
To be your willing Captives; Virtue sure
Were blind as fortune, should shee choose the poore
Rough cottage Man to live in, and despise
To dwell in You, the stately edifice.
Thus You are prov'd the better Sex, and we Must all repent that in our pedigree
We chose the father's name; where should we take
The mother's, a more honour'd blood, 'twould make
Our generation sure, and certain be,
And I'd believe some faith in beraldry!
Thus, perfect creatures, if detraction rise
Against your sex, dispute but with your eyes,
Your hand, your lip, your brow, there will be sent
So subtle and so strong an argument,
Will teach the Stoick his affection too,
And call the Cynick from his tub to woo.
Thus must'ring up your beauteous troops, go on,
The fairest is the valiant Amazon (13).

(13) Poems, &c. p. 113, &c.

[H] Besides some miscellaneous Poems, &c.] They were undoubtedly thrown out to the world at different times; and, after his decease, collected together by his brother Robert, and published at Oxford in 1640. 8vo. Another edition was printed at London in 1652: which is extremely full of faults. Two other editions came out in 1664, and 1668. 8vo. which are better and more correct.

[I] He was author of six Dramatic pieces.] The names are as follows. 1. 'The Muses looking glass.' A comedy. It was at first named The Entertainment; as is manifest from some encomiastick verses upon it by Sir Aston Cokain (14), which he intitles, 'To my friend Mr Thomas Randolph on his Play called the Entertainment, printed by the name of the Muses Looking-Glass.' It is full of good morality; which made Sir Aston say of it.

(14) Choice Poems, edit. 1669, 8vo. p. 98.

True Moralist would be supposed thy foe.

The Stagyrite will be slighted; who doth list
To read or see't, becomes a Moralist.

Reprinted in 1757 under the title of The Mirrour.

2. He wrote, Amyntas, or The impossible Dowry. A Pastoral acted before the King and Queene at White ball.' 3. Aristippus, or The Jovial Philosopher. Presented in a private show.' 4. 'The conceited Pedler, as it was presented in a strange show;' At Cambridge. 1630. 5. 'The jealous Lovers. A Comedie. Presented to their gracious Majesties at Cambridge, by the Students of Trinitie-Colledge.' This comedy was published by the Author himself, who dedicated it to Dr Comber Master of his college, &c. and inscribed it, in some copies of verses, to Sir Kenelm Digbie, Sir Christopher Hatton, Antony Stafford, Richard Lane, his Master Osbaldeston, and Tho. Riley. There are prefix'd to it some commendatory verses by Edward Hide, (afterwards Lord Chancellor) Edw. Fraunces, Richard Benefield, James Dupont, &c.—Mr Randolph apologizes, in the Preface, for those many Dedications and Approbations, in these words. 'That I make so many dedications, think not that I value it as a present rich enough to be divided; but know whom I am in piety bound to honour. That I admit so many of my friends approbations, is not that I itch'd for praise and love rubbing, but that I was willing thou should'st have something worth thy reading.' This play was revived on the stage at London, in 1682. when Mrs Behn wrote an Epilogue for it, which is printed among her works. 6. Mr Randolph translated from Aristophanes's Plutus, a Comedy intitled 'Hey for Honesty, down with Knavery.' Lond. 1651. 4to. but not inserted among the rest of his works. It was afterwards augmented and published in 8vo. by another hand, viz. F. J. (15).

(15) Langbaine, Wood, and British Theatre, as above.

RAY [JOHN] [A], a true Christian Philosopher, whose name is an honour to the English nation, was the son of Mr Roger Ray, a Blacksmith, and born at Black Notley in Essex, November 29, 1628. He received his first education at a school in Braintree [B] near his native place. Then, on the 28th of June, 1644, he was admitted into Catharine-hall in Cambridge, whence in 1646 he removed himself to Trinity-college in the

[A] RAY [JOHN]. He wrote his name Wray, 'till about August 1670, when he dropt the W; of which he gave the following account in a Letter to Dr Lister (1). Videbis me in titulo Catalogi (2), & dedicatione, literam nominis mei initialem W abjecisse, quod ne mireris, fateor tibi, me eam olim, antiquâ & patriâ scriptione immutatâ, citra idoneam rationem adscivisse. i. e. 'You will see that both in the title and dedication of my Catalogue [of Plants,] I have cast off W the initial letter of my name; which that you may not wonder at, I own to you I had assumed it without sufficient reason, changing the antient manner of writing my name, that which had been used by my ancestors.'—Dr Lister thereupon in his Answer (3), says;—'I was pleased with the Derivation of your name whilst V was at it, it agreed so well with a virtue so eminent in you, and which, I am confident, you will never lay aside; however you please to alter the writing of your name: you well know what Wray in French means.'—

[B] He received his first education at a school in Braintree.] This he mentions himself, in a letter to John Aubrey, Esq; (4).—'Neither is your Observation universally true, that the Sons of Labourers and Rusticks are more dull and indocile than those of Gentlemen and Tradefmen; for tho' I do not pretend to have been of the first Magnitude for Wit or Docility, yet I think I may without arrogance say, that in our paltry country School here at Braintree, Ego meis me minoribus condiscipulis ingenio præluxi; but perchance the Advantage I had of my Contemporaries, may rather be owing to my Industry than Natural parts; so that I should [say] studio or industria excellui.'—

(4) See J. Aubrey's Hist. of Surrey, Vol. V. 8vo. p. 402.

(1) Philosophical Letters between the late learned Mr Ray and his correspondents, &c. Lond. 1718, 8vo. p. 72.

(2) Scil. Plantarum, &c.

(3) Philof. Letters, &c. p. 73.

the same university. Having taken the degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1647, he was elected Fellow of the college on the 8th of September 1649; and became tutor to many gentlemen (a). In the year 1651, he commenced Master of Arts (b). Being naturally consumptive and weakly (c), and withal having injured his health by a too intense application to his studies; he was advised, and obliged, to exercise himself by riding or walking in the fields. But as he was of a most ingenious and industrious disposition, he turned that otherwise idle time to profit, by studying Botany: in which science he arrived at a great perfection, as appears by the many learned and voluminous works he published about Herbs and Plants [C], and of which a more particular account will be given in the sequel of this article. His first longest excursion in search of plants, was in the summer of the year 1658, when he rode from Cambridge to Chester; from whence he went into North-Wales, visiting many places, and among the rest the famous hill of Snowdon (d), and returned by Shrewsbury and Gloucester. On the 23d of December, 1660, he was ordained Deacon and Priest by Dr Robert Sanderson, Bishop of Lincoln (e). In the year 1661, he took a second journey, with Francis Willughby, Esq; and others, in search of herbs, plants, &c. into the North of England; and thence into Scotland, through Edinburgh, as far as Sterling; from whence returning through Glasgow, and so into England by Carlisle, they arrived at Cambridge the 7th of September (f). The year following, taking Chester and all Wales in their way, they travelled through Cornwall, Devonshire, Dorsetshire, Hampshire, Wiltshire, Berkshire, &c. and returned to London by Windfor. But, upon the coming out of the Bartholomew-act, as it was called, Mr Ray quitted his Fellowship of Trinity-college, August 24, 1662 (g); because he could not comply with all the conditions required in that act [D]. In the years 1663, 1664, and 1665, he accompanied Francis Willughby, Philip Skippon, and ——— Bacon, Esqrs, in their Travels through the Low-Countries, Germany, Italy, France, &c. embarking at Dover the 18th of April, 1663, and returning thither April 8th, 1666 (h). He published afterwards the curious Observations he had made in those Travels [E]. Upon his return to England, he lived some time at his native place of Black-Norley [F], but mostly at Middleton-hall in Warwickshire, the seat of his most worthy and ingenious friend Francis Willughby, Esq; (i). In 1667, they visited together Worcestershire, and all the western counties. On the 7th of November, 1667, Mr Ray was admitted Fellow of the Royal Society (k). The year following, he visited Kent, in pursuit of his favourite study of Botany; and, for the same purpose, took another journey into the northern parts of England

(a) Dr Edm. Calamy's Continuation of the Account of the Ministers, &c. ejected and silenced after the Restoration, &c. edit. 1727, 8vo. Vol. I. p. 120, &c. Some of the dates are borrowed from the General Dictionary.

(b) From the University Registers.

(c) See Philosophical Letters between Mr Ray and his Correspondents, edit. 1718, 8vo. p. 22.

(d) In Caernarvonshire; reckoned one of the highest mountains in Britain, as being 1240 yards high, according to Mr Caswell's mensuration. See Philosoph. Transact. Vol. XXV. p. 579.

(e) See Mr Ray's dying words, at the end of his Letters, p. 374.

(f) See his Letters, p. 358.

(g) Calamy's Account of the ejected or silenced Ministers, &c. Vol. II. edit. 1713, p. 87, and Continuation of the Account, Vol. I. p. 120.

(h) See Mr Ray's Observations made in his Journey; and Sir Phil. Skippon's Account of his Journey, inserted in Churchill's Collection of Voyages, Vol. VI.

(i) See Mr Ray's Letters.

(k) From some Minutes of his

(5) See his Letters, p. 355.

(6) See his Letters, p. 49, 61, 71, 356.

(7) Calamy's Continuation, &c. Vol. I. p. 120.

[C] As appears by the many learned and voluminous works he published about Herbs and Plants.] The first piece he published in that kind, was, Catalogus Plantarum circa Cantabrigiam nascentium, i. e. 'A catalogue of Plants growing near Cambridge: with an Appendix.' Printed in February 1659-60, Cantabr. 8vo. (5). — He also, in conjunction with Mr Willughby, made, out of Gerard, Parkinson, and Phytologia Britannica, a Collection of rare Plants, whose places are therein mentioned, and ranked them under the several counties. From which he compiled another book, wherein 1. He gives the Names of all Plants found growing in England in an alphabetical order; together with their Synonyma, except such as were mention'd in the above Catalog. whose Synonyma he omits, setting down only one name, and referring for the rest to Catalog. Cant. 2. He annexes a full Index Anglo-Latinus, after the manner of that in the said Catalogue. 3. He puts in the Counties, with the several rare Plants in them, marshalled alphabetically (6). This was published in 1670. 8vo. under this title, Catalogus Plantarum Angliæ, & Insularum adjacentium, tum indigenas, tum in Agris passim cultas, completens. Reprinted in 1677. A third edition came out in 1724. corrected; with the addition of about 450 species of Plants, newly discovered; and illustrated with figures.

[D] Because he could not comply with all the conditions required in that act.] We are told, 'that the true reason of his quitting his Fellowship, was, that he could not by any means satisfy himself to declare, that none were bound by the Solemn League and Covenant, that had taken it, tho' he himself never took it (7).' But that is very imperfectly express'd; for the words of the Declaration in the Act of Uniformity, are, — 'And I do declare that I do hold, there lies no obligation upon me, or on any other person, from the oath commonly called the Solemn League and Covenant, to endeavour any change, or alteration of Government, either in Church or State; and that the same was in itself an unlawful oath.' — Though Mr Ray would not perfectly comply with the Act, yet he was a Lay-Conformist, and frequented the public prayers and Sacraments as long as his health and strength would permit (8). One may conclude from one of his Letters (9), that he was offered preferment after Bishop Wilkins's advancement to the Bishopric of Chester, and refus'd it. His words are, — 'D. Wilkins in episcopalem cathedram evectum, & sui ipsius, & mei, & præcipue ecclesiæ causâ vehementer gaudeo: Me tamen per eum ecclesiæ restitutum iri, stante sententiâ, planè est impossibile, nec enim unquam adduci me posse puto ut Declarationi subscribam quam lex non ita pridem lata Presbyteris aliisque ecclesiæ Ministris injungit. — i. e. 'I extremely rejoice that Dr Wilkins is advanc'd to a Bishopric, both for his own sake, and mine, and the Church's: But, in my present opinion, it is impossible for me to be brought again, through him, into the Church; nor do I think I can ever be induced to subscribe the Declaration enjoyned the Ministers of the Church by a late Law, &c.'

[E] He published afterwards the curious Observations he had made in those Travels.] They are intituled, 'Observations Topographical, Moral, and Physiogical, made in a Journey through part of the Low-Countries, Germany, Italy, and France; by J. Ray. F. R. S. Whereunto is added a brief Account of Fran. Willoughby, Esq; his Voyage through a great part of Spain.' Lond. 1673. 8vo. These Voyages are full of such curious Remarks, as might be expected from the Authors universal Learning; and, particularly, take notice of the Plants in every place. They are inserted in the Second Volume of Dr John Harris's Collection of Voyages.

[F] He lived some time at his native place of Black-Norley.] Dr Calamy, in his usual inaccurate manner, says (10), that Mr Ray, 'after quitting his Fellowship, liv'd sometimes at Chester, with Bishop Wilkins, and sometimes at other places.' But Bishop Wilkins had no relation to Chester till the year 1668, when he was made Bishop of that see: and therefore Mr Ray could not be there with him, soon after losing his Fellowship, and before his Travels, as Dr Calamy's words naturally imply. Mr Ray was with the Bishop at Chester, that we are sure of, only in 1669, and 1671, and made but short visits (11). — For instances of Dr Calamy's numberless inaccuracies, see Bishop Kennet's Register and Chronicle, &c.

(8) Ibid. p. 121.

(9) See his Letters, p. 351.

(10) Continuation, &c. Vol. I. p. 121.

(11) See his Letters, p. 45, 1029

(l) See his Letters, p. 30. He seems to have taken another simpling Voyage into the North in 1671. See his Letters, p. 93.

(m) See the dates of his Letters, 'till 1675 at least.

(n) Ar. Collins's Peerage, ed. 1735, 8vo. Vol. III. p. 404.

(o) Calamy's Continuation, as above; and General Dictionary.

(p) One of them married the Rev. Mr Bower, Rector of Pattifwick in Essex.

(q) See his Letters, p. 120, 129.

England (l). Thence he came and fixed at Middleton-hall, where he continued several years (m), pursuing his studies with great attention; and being quite happy in Mr Willughby's company. The death of that most valuable friend, on the third of July, 1672 (n), sensibly affected Mr Ray; who was in danger thereby of being deprived of his best, if not only, support. But that good man shewed his great esteem for him, by appointing him one of the executors of his will, and guardian to his children, and leaving him an annuity of sixty pounds a year for his life, which was duly paid without any deduction (o). Out of his valuable Collections, Mr Ray digested and compiled two folio Volumes, containing very curious Histories of Birds and Fishes; of which an account is given below in the note [G]. In July 1673, he married Margaret, one of the daughters of John Oakley of Launton in Oxfordshire, Gent. by whom he had four daughters, three of whom survived him. But, though he was very learned himself, he did not give them a tolerable education (p). Notwithstanding his marriage, he continued at Middleton the remainder of the year 1673, and all 1674 (q); but, very probably when his family increased, he removed to Colehill, and Sutton-Cosfield, in Warwickshire (r), where he abode 'till about Michaelmas 1677. Then he returned into Essex, and having lived above a year and a half at Faulkborn-hall, the seat of Edward Bullock, Esq; (s), he settled in a house of his own building at Black-Notley, where he continued the remainder of his days (t). In 1686 he published his great work of the History of Plants [H]; and some lesser pieces published by him at several times, upon the same subject, are set down below [I]. As his chief delight and employment was the general study of Nature, he put out in 1693 a concise but very accurate Account of Quadrupeds and Serpents [K]; free from the errors and fabulous relations of other writers upon that subject. He drew up likewise in the same method, and about the same time (u), a Synopsis of Birds and Fishes [L]; which being

(r) See his Letters, p. 133, 138—142.

(s) He dedicated his Stirpium Europæarum Sylloge, to the Son, wherein he acknowledges his great Obligations to the Father.

(t) From persons who knew him.

(u) Vide Præfat. ad Synopsis methodicæ Avium. See also Mr Ray's Letters, p. 278.

[G] Out of his valuable Collections, Mr Ray digested and compiled two folio Volumes, containing very curious Histories of Birds and Fishes, &c.] The History of Birds was published first, under this title, Francisci Willoughbeii de Middleton, Armigeri, à Reg. Soc. Ornithologie Libri tres, in quibus Aves omnes hætenus cognitæ, in Methodum naturis suis convenientem redactæ, accuratè describuntur: Descriptiones Iconibus elegantissimis, & virarum Avium simillimis, æri incisis, illustrantur. Totum opus recognovit, digessit, supplevit, Joh. Raius. Lond. 1676. fol. Mr Ray made great additions and improvements to Mr Willoughby's materials; 'taking in all the kinds of Birds he found in Books, which Mr Willoughby had not described: and adding a Figure for all the Descriptions, as far as he could procure them (12). He translated this Work also into English, and had it printed at London in 1678. fol. with very great improvements.

As for the History of Fishes, it was published in 1686. fol. under this title, Fran. Willoughbeii Armig. de Historiâ Piscium Libri quatuor, Jussu & Sumptu Societatis Regiæ Lond. editi. Totum opus recognovit, coaptavit, supplevit, Librum etiam Primum & Secundum integros adjevit Joh. Raius, & Soc. Reg. Oxon. By which title it appears, that Mr Ray, besides digesting the whole work, added the two entire First books.—In 1743, Cromwell Mortimer M. D. caused the Title-page of this book to be reprinted; and subjoined, at the end of it, an Index of the Fishes described, or engraved in the Book, with their Names, in several languages. The names were pasted in the prints, at the bottom, or sides, of the figures of the several Fishes.

[H] In 1686 he published his great work of the History of Plants] The title of it, is, Historia Plantarum, Species hætenus editas, aliasque insuper multas noviter inventas & descriptas complectens. Tomi Duo. fol. Lond.—A third Volume, being a Supplement to the two foregoing, with additions from Father Camelli [a Jesuite at Manila,] and Monf. Tournefort, was published in 1704. fol.—Dr Compton Bishop of London proposed, in 1702, to have the Figures of the Plants engraved for these Volumes of Mr Ray's, but the great Charge attending that generous Design, undoubtedly put a stop to it (13).

[I] And some lesser pieces, published by him, at several times, upon the same subject, &c.] Besides, 1. Catalog. Plantarum circa Cantabrigiam nascentium; and 2. Catalog. Plantarum Angliæ, &c. the rest of his smaller pieces upon Botany, were these following, 3. Catalogus Stirpium in exteris regionibus observatarum. Lond. 1673. 8vo. 4. Methodus Plantarum nova, cum Tabulis. Lond. 1682. Eadem emendata & aucta. Lond. 1703. 8vo. 5. Fasciculus Stirpium Britannicarum post editum Catalogum Plantarum Angliæ. Lond. 1688. 8vo. 6. Synopsis Methodica Stirpium Britan- nicarum, in qua tum Notæ generum characteristicae traduntur, tum Species singulae breviter describuntur. Lond. 1690. 8vo. Eadem Synopsis, multis Stirpibus & observationibus curiosis passim insertis, cum Muscorum Methodo & Historiâ pleniore, &c. Lond. 1696. 8vo. (14). 7. Stirpium Europæarum extra Britannias nascentium Sylloge. Quas partim observavit ipse, partim è Car. Clusii historiâ, Bauhini Prod. &c. collegit Joannes Raius. Adjiciuntur Catalogi rariorum Apinarum & Pyrenaicarum, Baldensium, Hispanicarum Grisei, Græcarum, & Orientalium, Creticarum, Ægyptiorum, &c. Lond. 1694. 8vo. 8. Epistola ad D. Rivinum de Methodo Plantarum, in qua Elementa Botanica D. Tournefort tanguntur. Lond. 1696. 8vo. 9. Dissertatio de variis Plantarum Methodis. Lond. 1696. 8vo.

[K] A concise but very accurate Account of four-footed Beasts and Serpents.] The title he gave it, is, Synopsis methodica Animalium Quadrupedum et Serpentinæ generis. Vulgarium Notas characteristicae, Rariorum Descriptiones integras exhibens: cum Historiis & Observationibus Anatomicis perquam curiosis. Præmittuntur nonnulla de Animalium in genere, Sensu, Generatione, Divisione, &c. Lond. 1693. 8vo. i. e. 'A methodical Synopsis, or View, of four footed Animals and Serpents. Giving the characteristical marks of the common ones, and entire descriptions of the more uncommon: with very curious histories and anatomical observations. To which are prefixed some things concerning the Sense, Generation, and Division of Animals in general.' More commodious, and more to be depended upon in general, than the voluminous works of Gesner, Aldrovand, &c.

[L] A Synopsis of Birds and Fishes.] The title of this, is, Joannis Raii Synopsis methodica Avium & Piscium; Opus posthumum, quod virum reconsult & perfecit ipse insignissimus Autor: in quo multas Species, in ipso Ornithologiâ & Ichthyologiâ desideratas, adjecit: Methodumque juam Piscium Naturæ magis convenientem reddidit. Cum Appendice, & Iconibus. Lond. 1713. 8vo. i. e. 'A methodical Synopsis of Birds and Fishes; A posthumous Work of the late Mr John Ray: Which the illustrious Author revised and completed in his life-time. Wherein many Species, wanting in his Ornithology, and Ichthyology, are added: and his Method of Fishes is rendered more agreeable to Nature. With an Appendix, and Figures.' The Figures are contained in four plates; whereof the two first represent Indian Birds about Fort St George, and the two last Fishes lately discovered on the coasts of Cornwall by the Reverend Mr George Iago.—He tells us himself in one of his Letters

(15), what new things are in this Synopsis, that is, such as were not comprehended in Mr Willughby's works. And they are, 1. Hernandez's Mexican birds. 2. Some names and descriptions of Birds out of Nicd-hoff. 3. Frid. Martens's Spitzberg Birds and Fishes.

4. Sir

(12) Letters, p. 121.

(13) See Mr Ray's Letters, p. 319, 320.

left in manuscript, was published afterwards by his learned and ingenious friend Mr Derham. Insects were also the objects of his thoughts and researches (w), and what observations he left upon that point were communicated to the world by his excellent friend just now mentioned [M]. Of his extensive knowledge he made that use, which every true Philosopher, and good Man, will always make; namely, to magnify the great Author of Nature, and to celebrate his most excellent Perfections, which are conspicuous in every part of the creation. For that purpose, he wrote his pious book on the Wisdom of God [N]: and to the same head may be referred his Three Physico-Theological Discourses [O], and his Persuasive to a holy Life [P]. Several curious pieces and observations of his, in Natural History and Philosophy, are inserted in the Philosophical Transactions [Q]. And a few other less things, published by him, are referred to the note below [R]. He continued

(w) See his Letters, p. 236, 321, 342, 343.

4. Sir Robert Sibbald's Whales. 5. Dr Sloane's Jamaica Birds and Fishes. 6. Dr Tancer. Robinson's Birds and Fishes taken out of the Leyden catalogue. And lastly some few things out of Du Tertre.

[M] Insects were also the objects of his thoughts and researches, &c. He tells us himself (16) that he had employed a great deal of time about them. 'As for our English Insects, says he, I think I may without vanity, say, that I have taken more pains about some tribes of them, than any Englishman before me.— I have by me a History of our Diurnal English Papilio's of my own knowledge, which I drew up some years since, they are in number about forty.— Elsewhere (17), he says,—'I have confined myself chiefly to two or three sorts [of Insects] viz. Papilio's diurnal, and nocturnal, Beetles, Bees, and Spiders. Of the first of these I have found about 300 kinds, and there are still remaining many more undiscover'd by me, and all within the compass of a few miles. How many then may we reasonably conjecture are to be found in England, in Europe, in the East and West Indies, in the whole world. The Beetles are a tribe near as numerous as these, and the Flies of all sorts, not fewer. I have now given over my inquiry by reason of my disability to prosecute, and my approaching end, which I pray God fit me for.'—He renews the same complaints elsewhere (18); intermixing these curious observations:—'I admire, that there should be so many distinct Species of Gnats in rerum natura. As for the Cimices they may easily be compassed; but to find out, describe and methodize all the Species of Flies and Beetles of England alone, is the work of a man's life. The *Phalena*e are so numerous, that should I live 20 years longer, and were in condition to search them out, yet I should despair of coming to an end of them, much less of discovering the several changes they go through, from the Egg to the Papilio, and describing the Eruca and *Aurelia*e of each. I am of opinion that the number of Beetles is equal to, if it doth not exceed, that of Papilio's, and they all undergo the like changes with them.'—So it seems he did not complete the History of Insects; but what was found of it among his MSS. was published by Dr Derham; being, Methodus Insectorum. Lond. 1705. 8vo. and, Historia Insectorum. Opus posthumum. Lond. 1710. and 1726. 4to. Mr Ray had some Papers of Mr Willughby's upon Insects; which were returned to his Son Sir Thomas Willughby (19).

[N] For that purpose, he wrote his pious book on the Wisdom of God. The title of it, is, 'The Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation: in two Parts; viz. The heavenly Bodies, Elements, Meteors, Fossils, Vegetables, Animals (Beasts, Birds, Fishes, and Insects); more particularly in the Body of the Earth, it's Figure, Motion, and Consistency; and in the admirable Structure of the Bodies of Man, and other Animals; as also in their Generation, &c. With Answers to some Objections' Lond. 1692. 8vo. The 6th edition in 1714. was revised and corrected by Dr Derham. The 7th edit. in 1717. is the fairest and best printed. There have been two or three editions since. 'Tis dedicated by the author to the Lady Lettice Wendy, sister to his best friend and patron Francis Willughby, Esq; He says in the Preface, that, 'By virtue of his function, he suspected himself to be obliged to write something in Divinity, having written so much on other Subjects: For being not permitted, says he, to serve the Church with my Tongue in Preaching, I know not but it may be my Duty to serve it with my Hand by Writing: And I 'have made choice of this Subject, as thinking myself best qualified to treat of it.'—

[O] Three Physico-Theological Discourses. The rest of the Title, is,—'concerning, I. The primitive Chaos, and Creation of the World. II. The general Deluge, it's Causes and Effects. III. The Dissolution of the World, and future Conflagration. Wherein are largely discussed, the Production and Use of Mountains; the Original of Fountains, of formed Stones and Sea-Fishes Bones and Shells found in the Earth; the Effects of particular Floods, and Inundations of the Sea; the Eruptions of Vulcano's; the Nature and Causes of Earth quakes. Also an historical Account of those two late remarkable ones in Jamaica and England. With practical Inferences.' Lond. 1692. 8vo. And in 1693, Illustrated with copper-plates. The 3d Edition, much more enlarged than the former Editions, from the Author's own MSS. was published, in 1713. by Dr Derham. And there hath been another Edition since, in 1732.'

[P] And his Persuasive to a holy life. First printed in 1700. Reprinted in 1709.

[Q] Several curious pieces and observations of his, are inserted in the Philosophical Transactions. We set them down here, according to the order of time in which they appeared. Observations and Experiments concerning Vegetation, and the running of the Sap, by Mr Willughby and Mr Wray (20). Concerning the Spiders darting their Threads (21). Concerning the acid Juice of Pismires (22). Of spontaneous generation. Of musk-scented Insects. Concerning a Scolopendra seen in the Cloysters of Trinity-college, Cambr. (23). Observations on the Anatomy of a Porpus seen at West-Chester in April 1669 (24). Odd Mulhrooms found in Marton-woods in Craven by Dr Lister. Mr Wray thinks they were the Fungus piperatus albus, lacteo sacco turgens; described by Bauhine—l. 40. c. 6 (25). Observations on the Trochita and Entrochi—and the Asproites—described by Dr Lister (26). Of the use of the Air-bladder in Fishes (27). Concerning the Wood-cracker, or Picus Martinus varius (28). Considerations on the Improvement to be made of Maize, as affirm'd by Sir Richard Bulkeley (29). Of a poisonous root like Hemlock (30). Of the pernicious effects of eating Oenanthe Aquatica succo viroso, i. e. Hemlock-water dropwort (31). Some Remarks on Museo de Pianta rare della Sicilia, &c. by P. Boccone (32). Observations in a course of Anatomy of Signor Marchetti at Padua. Communicated by S. Dale (33). Observations made at Rome on the Comet which appeared in 1664. Communicated by the same (34).

[R] And a few other less things published by him, &c. Such I reckon, I. his 'Collection of English Proverbs Digested into a convenient Method for the Speedy finding any one upon occasion; with short Annotations. Whereunto are added Local Proverbs with their Explications, old Proverbial Rhythmes, less known or exotick Proverbial Sentences, and Scottish Proverbs.' Cambr. 1670. 8vo. (35). In 1678, a Second Edition came out, Enlarged by the Addition of many hundred English, and an Appendix of Hebrew Proverbs, with Annotations and Parallels.' The Hebrew Proverbs were communicated to him by his neighbour Mr Richard Kidder, Rector of Rayne, and afterwards Bishop of Bath and Wells (36). This Book he called 'a Toy and Trifle, not worth the owning (37)'. II. A Nomenclator, or Dictionarium Trilingue, Secundum Loca communes, nominibus usitatoribus, Anglicis, Latinis, Græcis. And a Collection of Proverbs, at the end, in those three languages.

(20) No. 48. p. 963.

(21) No. 65. p. 2103, &c.

(22) No. 68. p. 2063.

(23) No. 74. p. 2219, &c.

(24) Ibid. and No. 76. p. 2274.

(25) No. 89. p. 5116, 5117.

(26) No. 100. p. 6190, and No. 112. p. 278.

(27) No. 115. p. 349.

(28) No. 172. p. 1043.

(29) No. 205. p. 930.

(30) No. 231. p. 635.

(31) No. 238. p. 86.

(32) No. 247. p. 462.

(33) No. 307. p. 2282.

(34) No. 309. p. 2350.

(35) See his Letters, p. 41, 63, 81, 87, 90, 92.

(36) See above the article KIDDER [RICHARD].

(37) Letters, p. 92.

(16) Letters, p. 521.

(17) Ibid. p. 317.

(18) P. 343.

(19) See his Letters, p. 143, 343.

continued his studies as long as his strength would permit him, even to the last, though he complained for some time of great infirmities [S]. At length, after a pious, useful, and well-spent Life, he quietly expired, January the 17th, 1705-6, in the 78th year of his age. According to his own direction, he was buried with his ancestors in the church-yard of Black-Notley; though the Rector of that parish offered him a place in the chancel of the church: which the good man modestly declined. A monument was soon after erected near his grave, with an elegant Latin inscription [T], at the charge of Bishop Compton, languages. Lond. 1672. 8vo. Often reprinted since. III. 'A Collection of English Local words not generally used, with their Significations and Original, in two Alphabetical Catalogues, the one of such as are proper to the Northern, the other to the Southern and Eastern Counties.' Together with, A Catalogue of local Words parallel'd with British or Welsh by Edw. Lhwyd. Glossarium Northhymbricum. An Account of some Errors and Defects in our English Alphabet, Orthography, and Manner of Spelling. An Account of preparing some of our English Metals and Minerals; viz. Silver in Caerdiganthire; Tin in Cornwall; Iron in Suffex, with several Notes of Husbandry; the Wire-work at Tintern in Monmouthshire; the manner of making Vitriol, and red Lead; the Allom-work at Whitby in Yorkshire; The making of Salt at Namptwych in Cheshire, and in Lancashire. Lond. 1674. 12mo. A second edition, augmented with many hundreds of words, observations, &c. came out in 1691. and the last was in 1742. 8vo. IV. He revised and corrected Leonhart Rauwolf's Itinerary, which was translated out of High-Dutch into English by Mr Nicolas Staphorst; adding, at the end, A Catalogue of more rare Oriental Plants, growing in those parts where Rauwolf travelled. But the Notes and Animadversions upon that work were done by Dr Tancr. Robinson (37). Mr Ray added a Second Volume, collected from Belon, Vernon, Dr Spon, Dr T. Smith, Dr Huntingdon, Mr Greaves, Alpinus, Vessingius, Thevenot, &c. The two Volumes were printed in 1693. 8vo. and reprinted in 1738. 8vo. V. He communicated to the learned Editor of the last and best translation of Camden's Britannia (viz. Dr Edmund Gibson, late Lord Bishop of London,) the Catalogues of more rare Plants growing wild in each County in England, which are inserted in that work (38).

To conclude the Account of Mr Ray's works, his worthy friend Mr Derham published his Letters, in 1718, under this title. 'Philosophical Letters between the late learned Mr Ray and several of his ingenious Correspondents, Natives and Foreigners. To which are added those of Francis Willughby, Esq; The whole consisting of many curious Discoveries and Improvements in the History of Quadrupeds, Birds, Fishes, Insects, Plants, Fossiles, Fountains, &c.' Lond. 8vo.—Mr Derham had also fitted for the press, Mr Ray's Travels about England, Scotland, and Wales, with an intent to have published them, with his Life (39). But we do not find that he ever publish'd them.

[S] Tho' he complain'd for some time of great infirmities. In a letter, dated June 24. 1702, to Mr Derham, he hath this passage.—'For my part I am now almost threecore and fifteen years of age, so that it is time for me to give over these Studies and Enquiries; and besides I am so lame, and almost continually afflicted with pain, that I cannot attend any study, being diverted by Pain (40).—The Lameness and pain he here complains of, was occasioned by Sores, or Ulcers, in his Legs (41).—In another letter to the same friend, dated Sept. 6. 1704, he has these words.—'The work which I have now entred upon [the History of Insects] is indeed too great a Task for me; I am very crazy and infirm, and God knows whether I shall over-live this winter. Cold weather is very grievous to me (42).'

[T] With an elegant Latin inscription. It is as follows.

Eruditissimi viri JOANNIS RAYI, A. M.

Quicquid mortale fuit

Hoc in angusto Tumulo reconditum est,

At Scripta

Non una continet Regio:

Et Fama undiquaque celeberrima

Vetat mori.

Collegii S. S. Trinitatis Cantab: fuit olim Socius,
Nec non Societatis Regiæ apud Londinenses Sodalis,
Egregium utriusque Ornamentum.

In omni Scientiarum genere,
Tam divinarum quam humanarum Veratissimus.

Et sicut alter Solomon (cui forsitan unico Secundus)
A Cedro ad Hyssopum,

Ab Animalium maximis ad minima usque Insecta
Exquisitam nactus est Notitiam,

Nec de stantis solum quæ patet Terræ facie,
Accuratissimè differuit;

Sed & intima ipsius Viscera Sagacissimè rimatus,
Quicquid notatu dignum in Universi Naturâ

Descripsit.

Apud exteras Gentes agens,

Quæ aliorum oculos fugerant, diligenter exploravit,
Multaque scitu dignissima primus in lucem protulit.

Quod Superest, eâ Morum simplicitate præditus,
Ut fuerit absque invidiâ doctus:

Sublimis ingenii,

Et (quod raro accidit) demissi simul Animi & modesti.

Non sanguine & genere insignis,

Sed (quod majus)

Propriâ virtute illustris.

De opibus titulisque obtinendis

Parum Sollicitus,

Hæc potius mereri voluit, quam adipisci:

Dum sub privato lare suâ sorte contentus,

Fortunâ lautioris dignus consenuit.

In rebus aliis sibi modum facilè imposuit,

In studiis nullum.

Quid plura?

Hicce omnibus

Pietatem minime fucatam adjunxit,

Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ

(Id quod Supremo habitu confirmavit)

Totus & ex animo addictus.

Sic bene latuit, bene vixit vir beatus,

Quem præsens Ætas colit, postera mirabitur.

On the Table on the East side, is added.

Hoc Cenotaphium

Olim in Coemeterio sub dio positum,

Inclementis Coeli injuriis oblitteratum,

Et tantum non collapsum,

Refecit & sub tectum transposuit

J. Legge, M. D.

XVI. Kal. Aprilis, A. D. 1737.

On the Table on the West side.

J. R A Y { Nat. 29. Nov. 1628.
Ob. 17. Jan. 1706.

Of which the following stiff, and not very elegant Translation hath been given.

JOHN RAY, Master of Arts,
Once Fellow of Trinity-College in Cambridge, Afterwards

A Member

(37) See Mr Ray's Letters, p. 266, &c. 270, 272.

(38) See Bishop Gibson's Preface to Camden's Britannia; and Mr Ray's Letters, p. 276.

(39) See Preface to Mr Ray's Letters.

(40) Letters, p. 317.

(41) See his Wisdom of God, &c. edit. 1717, p. 237.

(42) Letters, p. 343.

Compton, as we have been informed. Of his dying words and behaviour, an account is given below [U]. He was a man of very extensive Learning [W], and withal modest, affable, and communicative: of exemplary piety; dividing his time chiefly between his devotions and studies: of great candour, and strict integrity; remarkably sober and temperate; and charitable to the utmost of his power, having, out of his small pittance, left a legacy to the poor of his own parish, and five pounds to Trinity-college, the place of his education, to buy Books for the Library there. His collections of natural curiosities were considerable; and he bestowed them, a few days before his decease, upon his ingenious neighbour, Samuel Dale, Apothecary in Braintree, who, with the addition of many of his own, made a present of them afterwards to the Royal Society (x). Besides his manuscript Travels about England, &c. mentioned above in note [R], Mr Ray left in his Adversaria many Observations, Inscriptions, Epitaphs, Antiquities, &c. which being collected together, would make a large Supplement to his Observations already published (y).

(x) From the information of a friend. See also the General Dictionary.

(y) Philosophical Transactions, No. 307. p. 228.

A Member of the Royal Society in London;
And to both those learned bodies
An illustrious Ornament.

This Monument beginning to grow ruinous, was remov'd from the Churchyard into the Church, at the expence of J. Legge, M. D. March 17. 1737.

Hid in this narrow tomb, this marble span,
Lies all that death could snatch from this great man.
His body moulders in it's native clay;
While o'er wide worlds his Works their beams display

J. Ray { was born 29 Nov. 1628.
dyed 17. Jan. 1708.

As bright and everlasting as the day,
To those just fame ascribeth immortal breath,
And in his Writings he outlives his death.
Of every Science every part he knew,
Read in all Arts divine and human too:
Like Solomon (and Solomon alone
We as a greater King of knowledge own)
Our modern Sage dark Nature's Secrets read,
From the tall cedar to the hyssop's bed;
From the unweiddest Beast of land or deep,
To the least Insect that has power to creep.
Nor did his artful labours only shew
Those Plants which on the earth's wide surface grew,
But piercing ev'n her darkest entrails through,
All that was wise, all that was great he knew,
And Nature's inmost gloom made clear to common view.
From foreign stores his learning bright supplies,
Exposing treasures hid from others eyes,
Loading his single Mind to make his country wise.

[U] Of his dying words and behaviour, an account is given below ] The Rev. Mr Pyke, Rector of Black-Notley, who attended Mr Ray in his last moments, hath left the following Account of his dying words, and behaviour.—' I am a Priest of the Church of England, ordained by Dr Sanderfon, then Bishop of Lincoln. That I did not follow the peculiar Duties of my Function more, is now the greatest concern and trouble to me. I do here profess, that as I have lived, so I desire, and, by the grace of God, resolve to dye in the Communion of the Catholick Church of Christ, and a true, tho' unworthy Son of the Church by law establish'd in this kingdom. I do think from the bottom of my heart, that its Doctrine is pure, its Worship decent, and agreeable to the word of God; and in the most material points of both conformable to the Faith and Practice of the godly Churches of Christ in the primitive and purer Times. I am not led to this persuasion so much from force of Custom and Education, as upon the clear evidence of Truth and Reason. And after a serious and impartial examination of the Grounds thereof, I am fully persuaded, that the Scruples men raise against joining in Communion with it, are unreasonable and groundless; and that the Separation which is made, may very justly be charged upon the Dissenters themselves, as the blame-worthy Authors of it.' He then desired to have the Prayers of the Church, appointed for the Visitation of the Sick, and the Absolution in particular, read. After which he received the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; which he said was a necessary Viaticum, he thought, for the great journey he was a going (43). Dr Calamy, in his usual invidious way, suggests (44), that this Declaration does not agree with Mr Ray's 'declared sentiments, when in health, and his parts were good.' Of which sentiments he gives one instance, or two, upon the authority of persons he doth not name: viz. That Mr Ray, when he might have had preferment from Archbishop Tillotson, said, Though he made use of the book of Common Prayer, and approv'd of it as a Form, yet he could not declare his unfeigned Assent and Consent, to all and every thing contain'd in it. And that he objected especially against the use of Godfathers and Godmothers in Baptism, exclusive of the Parents. But, might not the good man, in the last period of his life, view Things in a different light from what he had before viewed them in? Might he not seriously and dispassionately consider, what unessential Things, not to call them Trifles, are used as a Pretence for keeping up a Separation?

(43) See at the end of his Letters, p. 374.

(44) Continuation, &c. Vol. I. p. 121.

But what's yet more, he was so MEEKLY great,
That envy unrepining saw his state;
For, rare accomplishment! his humble mind
Possess'd a jewel, which it could not find,
A great descent lent nothing to his fame;
Virtue, not birth, distinguish'd his high name:
Titles and wealth he never strove to gain;
Those he would rather merit than obtain.
His private life in humble shades he spent;
Worthy a palace, with a cell content.
Unwearied he would knowledge still pursue;
The only thing, in which no mean he knew.
What more did add to these bright gifts, we find
A pure untainted Piety of mind.
England's blest Church engross'd his zealous care,
A truth his dying accents did declare.
Thus lost he in retirement his great breath;
Thus dy'd he living, who thus lives in death.
Thus has heav'n call'd his age's glory home,
And the bright wonder of the age to come.

[W] He was a man of very extensive Learning. Dr Robinson justly styles him, 'the best Botanist, and the most accomplish'd Naturalist of this, or perhaps any Age.' And represents him as a man of 'a vast Memory, exact Judgment, universal Knowledge, and extraordinary Talents (45).'

(45) Letters, p. 157, 153, 154.

RICAUT, or RYCAUT, [SIR PAUL], a gentleman employed in several Negotiations in the last century, and author of many useful Books, was the tenth and youngest son of Sir Peter Ricaut, Knt [A], and Mary his wife, without the intervention of a daughter (a). Where he was born, and educated, we cannot find. But his education was undoubtedly a genteel one: for he travelled many years in foreign parts, not only in Europe, but also in Asia and Africa, and performed some public services (b). His first employment abroad, was that of Secretary to Heneage Finch, Earl of Winchelsea [B], sent Embassador extraordinary to the Ottoman Porte in 1661 (c), where he continued about eight years. During which time, he had occasion to take two voyages from Constantinople to London: one of them was by land, through Hungary, where he remained a while in the Turkish camp, with the great and famous vizier Kuperlee, attending to the affairs of the English nation. He published, in 1663, the Capitulations, Articles of Peace, &c. concluded between King Charles the Second, and Sultan Mahomet Han (d). They were very much to the advantage of our Merchants; one article being, that English ships should be free from search or visit under pretence of foreign goods, a point never inserted in any former capitulation (e). After having laudably discharged his office of Secretary to Lord Winchelsea, he was made Consul for the English nation at Smyrna [C]; in which trust having acquitted himself, for the space of about eleven years, to the great and entire satisfaction of the Turkey-Company, and with universal love and respect from all the Europeans in those parts, he obtained leave, at his own motion and desire, to return to England. Here he employed himself in compiling and publishing some Books [D]; living in honour and good esteem, as also in peace and plenty (f). The Earl of Clarendon

(a) Supplement to the Great Historical Dictionary, by J. Collier; in the Continuation, at the end.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Ibid. and Sir William Ogden's Baronage, Tom. III. p. 448. and Mercurius Publicus, No. 12.

(d) They were in the late Or Mead's Library. See his Catalogue, p. 146.

(e) Mercur. Publ. No. 12. p. 189.

(f) Supplement to the Historical Dictionary: and Voyage de Spon & Wheeler, edit. Hays, 1724. Vol. I. p. 184.

[A] And youngest son of Sir Peter Ricaut, Kt.] Sir Peter Ricaut was one of the persons excepted, in the Propositions of the Lords and Commons assembled in Parliament, for a safe and well grounded peace, July 11. 1646, sent to King Charles I. at Newcastle (1): 'among all such of the Scottish nation, as had concurred in the Votes at Oxford, against the kingdom of Scotland, and their proceedings, or had sworn or subscribed the Declaration against the Convention and Covenant, and had assisted the Rebellion in the North, or the Invasion in the South of the said kingdom of Scotland, or the late Invasion made there by the Irish and their adherents.' And it was demanded, that they should 'be removed from his Majesty's counsels, restrained from coming within the verge of the Court;' and disabled from 'bearing any office, or having any employment concerning the State or Commonwealth, without the advice and consent of both Houses of the Parliament of England, or the Estates in the Parliament of Scotland respectively.'—In the Catalogue of the Lords, Knights, and Gentlemen that compounded for their Estates (2), we find, that Sir Peter Rychant of London-Knight paid 1500l. for his Composition. By which undoubtedly is meant our Sir Peter Rycant; that book being very full of mistakes and misnomers.

[B] His first employment abroad, was that of Secretary to Heneage Finch, Earl of Winchelsea.] Whilst he continued in that station, he wrote, 'The present State of the Ottoman Empire, in three Books; containing the Maxims of the Turkish Politie; their Religion and Military Discipline. Illustrated with divers Figures.' Lond. 1670. fol. and also 8vo. 1675.—It was translated into French by Monsieur Besprier, who has added notes and Animadversions. For there were a few mistakes in it; some of which have also been taken notice of by Mr Bayle (3), especially, what he had asserted, 'that the Mahomedan women have no hopes of going to heaven.' Whereas the Turkish women hope, they will be one day admitted into heaven as well as the men.* Sir Paul received an account of many things, inserted in this work, from Hali Beigh, al. Bobovius*.

[C] He was made Consul for the English nation at Smyrna.] During his residence there, at the command of King Charles II. he composed, 'The present State of the Greek and Armenian Churches, Anno Christi, 1678.' Which, upon his return to England, he presented with his own hands to his Majesty: and it was published in 1679. 8vo. In this work he shews a good deal of Learning, and especially a true pious and Christian Spirit (4).

[D] Here he employed himself in compiling and publishing some Books.] The III. of them was, A Continuation of the History of the Turks.—Richard Knolles, School-master at Sandwich, in Kent, had published 'The general History of the Turks,' from the beginning of that Nation to the year 1610. Lond.

1610. fol. (5). And it had been continued by another hand from the year 1610 to 1621.—Our author, Paul Rycant, Esq; continued it from 1623 to 1677. Printed at London in 1680 fol. And again from 1679 to 1699. Lond. 1700 fol. He must be acknowledged excellently well qualified for that work, as he had been so much conversant with the Turks, and Turkish affairs. II He continued Platina's Lives of the Popes, from the year 1471. to his own time. For tho' his name alone appears in the title-page of that book, he informs the reader, that he had no greater share in that work: As is manifest from this part of the Preface. 'The History of Platina of the Lives of the Popes, being redressed into English by an unknown hand, was delivered to me by the Bookseller; and considering that Platina was an Author of good reputation in the world, I often wished that he had lived in that age, in which he might have deduced his History from ancient to the present times; or that some other of our learned men would have continued the same in the language of our country.—But observing that this work was neglected, and not thought worthy the labour of a better pen, I essayed to do it in my own rude and plain style, without affectation or ornament, more than the simplicity of naked truth would afford me; in search of which I have always had recourse to the best and to the most impartial Authors, who have neither disguised the Vices of Men by flattery, nor out of prejudice branded those Actions with shame and obloquy, which might have admitted of a fairer character. Nor have I mixed any thing of Religion in this History, but where the nature of the relation could not subsist without it'—

In the Introduction he says, that 'This Continuation of Platina (the Subject of which is the Lives and Reigns of the Popes) is a Treatise purely historical, collected from several Latin, French, and Italian Authors.'—The book was published in 1685. fol. with this title, 'The Lives of the Popes from the time of our Saviour Jesus Christ, to the reign of Sixtus IV. written originally in Latine by Baptista Platina Native of Cremona, and translated into English. And the same History continued from the year 1471. to this present time; wherein the most remarkable Passages of Christendom both in Church and State are treated and described, By Paul Rycant, Esq; III. He translated from Spanish into English, 'The Royal Commentaries of Peru, in two parts. The first treating of the Original of their Kings, of their Idolatry, their Laws and Government, &c. before the Spaniards invaded their Countries. The second describing the manner by which that new World was conquered by the Spaniards, &c. Illustrated with Sculptures, written originally in Spanish by the Inca Garcillasso de la Vega' Lond. 1688. fol. IV. There goes also under his name, 'The Spanish Critick.' Lond. 1681. 8vo.

[E] Namely

(5) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. I. col. 163.

(1) Printed for J. Wright, July 17, 1646.

Inserted also in Husband's Collection, fol. p. 900, 906. and Parliamentary History, Vol. XV. p. 29, &c.

(2) Edit. Lond. 1695, 8vo.

(3) Dictionary, under the articles Hali-Beigh, and Job.

* Voyage de Spon & Wheeler, as above, Vol. I. p. 154.

(4) See Voyage de Spon & Wheeler, Vol. I. p. 184.

Clarendon being appointed Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland in 1685, made him his principal Secretary for the Provinces of Leinster and Conaght. And King James the Second knighted him, constituted him one of his Privy-Council for Ireland, and Judge of the high Court of Admiralty, which he enjoyed 'till the Revolution in 1688. Soon after this, he was employed by King William the Third, in quality of his Resident with the Hanse-Towns in Lower-Saxony, namely Hamburg, Lubeck, and Bremen [E]; where he continued for the space of more than ten years, to the satisfaction of all that knew him, as well as of the senates and governments of those republics, and of the company of the English Merchants there. At length, worn out with age and infirmities, he had leave, in 1700, to return into England, where he dyed in December that year (g). He was Fellow of the Royal Society, for many years before his decease: and a paper of his is published in the Philosophical Transactions [F]. Besides his own mother-tongue, the English; he understood perfectly the Greek both ancient and modern, the Turkish, Latin, Italian, and French languages (b).

(g) Supplement to the Historical Dictionary, as above.

(b) Voyage de Spon & Wheeler, as above, Vol. I. p. 185.

[E] Namely at Hamburg, Lubeck, and Bremen.] Some of his Letters, written from Hamburg to Sir William-Dutton Colt envoy to the Court of Hanover, are in the possession of Henry Burrard, Esq; Sir William's grandson: One of which, relating to the Sea-fight near Beachy-head, is in these words.

July 16. 1690.

' I cannot but condole with you the unfortunate success of the late Sea-fight against the French, which turned not much to our damage, unless so far as concerns the honour of the nation, but greatly to the detriment and ruin of our allies, who were beaten to pieces, whilst we stood Spectators of their destruction. What loss they sustained you will best see in the letter which Admiral Evertson writes to the States, and what was the cause, that our fleet in general did not fight, was (as this Admiral writes) upon examination, by the Earls Pembroke and Devonshire, who were going from ship to ship to make inquiry into this matter, to discover where the treachery lay; for nothing but that could keep our fleet from engaging: and where to charge that, a letter written from my Lord Nottingham to my Lord Dursley, translated with the consent of my Lord Dursley into Dutch, and inserted into the Courant for the better quieting and Satisfaction of the people, doth plainly declare, and on whom the treachery is to be charged. All I have to comfort myself and all others in this matter, is, that Mr Warre writes me under the 4th instant, that we should speedily have a better fleet at sea than before. And Dr Aglionby writes me on the 2<sup>d</sup> instant from the Hague, that by this letter to my Lord Dursley, and the assurances that Mr Harbord was coming over from the Queen to the States, that the minds of the people were much settled; and that the Government loses no courage, for that the States of Holland on the 19th instant, and so did the States general on the 21st resolve, that a new Squadron with all expedition be put to sea; untill which was done, all commerce was to be suspended. The States of Holland unanimously, and without so much as consulting their principals, came to this resolution. God grant that ' we may correspond in like manner with them in England, God grant also, that there may be no treachery in Ireland, from whence we expect to receive great and good news by the next post.'

[F] And a paper of his is published in the Philosophical Transactions] It contains an account of the Sable Mice, or Mures Norwegici, described by Olaus Wormius in his Musæum.—' In their march they keep a direct line, generally from North east to South-west, and are innumerable thousands in each troop, which for the most part is a square: They march by night, and in twilight, and lie still by day. The distance of the lines they go in is of some ell, and parallel to each other. If they meet any thing that might stop them, they avoid it not, tho' it were a fire, a deep well, a torrent, lake, or morass, but without any hesitation venture through, and by that means many thousands of them are destroyed. If they be met swimming over lakes, and be forced out of their course, they presently return into it again; when they are met in woods or fields and stop, they set themselves upon their hinder feet like a dog, and make a kind of barking or squeaking noise, leaping up as high as a man's knee, defending their line as long as they can: And, if at last they be forced out of it, they creep into holes, and set up a cry sounding like Biabb, Biabb. They never come into any house, nor meddle with any thing that is Man's meat; if a house happen to be in their way, there they stop 'till they die, but through a stack of hay or corn they will eat their way; when they march through a meadow, they endamage it much, by eating the roots of grass, but if they encamp there by day, they quite spoil it, and make it look as if it were burnt, or strewed with ashes. The roots of grass, with rotten wood, and the insects in it, are their chief, if not only food.——During the winter they lie under the snow, and have their breathing-holes upon the top of it, as hares and other creatures use to have (6).—They are described much in the same manner, in the Natural History of Norway, by Bishop Pontoppidan (7), who calls them Læmen, or Lemming.

(6) Philosophical Transactions, No 251, p. 110, 111.

C (7) Part ii. p. 30, &c.

ROE, or ROWE, [Sir THOMAS], a very able Statesman, and Embassador to several Courts in the XVIIth century, was born at Low-Leyton in Essex [A], about the year 1580 [B]. In 1593, he was admitted into Magdalen-college in Oxford: but, before he had staid there long enough to be qualified for any degree, he was taken from the university: and, after some time spent in one of the inns of Court, or in France, or both, he was made Esquire of the Body to Queen Elizabeth, about the latter end of her reign.

On

[A] Was born at Low-Leyton in Essex.] His father was Robert Roe, a younger Son of Sir Thomas Roe, Kt. Lord Mayor of London in 1568, by Mary his wife, daughter of Sir John Gresham, Kt. Which Sir Thomas was son of Robert Roe, citizen and merchant-taylor of London, who was Son to Reynald Roe of Lee in Kent (1).—During his Mayoralty, Sir Thomas laid aside the Midsummer-watch, or musters, in the city of London, which brought great crowds of the worst of people together; and, in the room of it, instituted a substantial standing Watch for the safety and preservation of the city (2). He inclosed the new church-yard in Bethlem with a brick wall; and was a considerable benefactor to the Merchant-Tailors-company (3). He was buried Septemb. 2. 1570. in Hackney-church, where his monument and epitaph are yet extant. Of eleven children he had, six survived him, namely four sons and two daughters (4).

[B] About the year 1580.] Mr Wood says (5), that when entering into his teens he became a Commoner of Magd. Coll. an. 1593, by the indulgent care of his mother, then the wife of ——— Berkley of Rendcomb in Gloucestershire, of the family of the Lord Berkley. Now, if he was entering into his teens in 1593, he must consequently have been born in or about the year 1580.

(3) Ibid. p. 264, and book ii. p. 95, 96.

(4) Idem, Vol. II. Append. I. p. 127.

(5) Ath. ut sup.

(1) Wood, Ath. ut supra. and Stow's Survey of London, with Strype's additions, Vol. II. book v. p. 134, 135.

(2) Stow's Survey, &c. Vol. I. book i. p. 257.

On the 23d of March, 1604, he received the honour of Knighthood from King James the First at Greenwich; and, soon after, was sent by Henry Prince of Wales, to make discoveries in America (a) [C]. In 1614, he was appointed, at the request of the East-India Company, to go Ambassador to Ichan Guire, the then Great Mogul; on purpose to conclude a firm peace between him and the King of Great Britain; to establish a fair and secure Trade, and settle Factories for the English Merchants, as well at sea-ports as inland towns, in his dominions (b). Having therefore embarked in March 1614-15, he arrived at Surat the 26th of September following: and continued at the Mogul's court 'till the beginning of the year 1618. During his residence there, he employed himself zealously in the service of his King, and of the Merchants trading to the East-Indies; as appears by his Journal, of which extracts have been published more than once [D]. He is said to have been the first English Ambassador, that was dispatched to any of the far remote Eastern Princes (c). And he tells us himself (d), that he was dismissed by the Great Mogul with more favour and outward grace (e), than ever was shewn to any Ambassador either Turkish or Persian, or other whatsoever. In 1620, he was elected one of the Burgesses for Cirencester in Gloucestershire, in the third parliament of King James I. which met at Westminster January 30, 1620-21 (f). And, the year following, was sent Ambassador to the Grand Signior [E], which station he continued in, under the

(f) Dr Br. Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria, edit. 1750, Part ii. p. 179.

[C] To make discoveries in America In the year 1609, at his own and his friends charge, he built a ship and a pinnace, for the discovery of Guiana in South-America. Setting sail from Plymouth the 24th of February, he fell in, about the end of April, with the great river of the Amazons, which at the entrance of it is 150 miles wide, and full of islands, and runs with fresh water fifty miles into the sea. This river he first discovered, and went up 200 miles in it with his ship, and then 100 more with boats; and made divers journeys into the main land among the natives, where he found the country well inhabited, and full of good commodities, though not so plenteous as might be, by reason the natives provide no more than bare necessaries. From thence he came along the coast into divers rivers, and entered the country with canoes, and going over the cataracts and hills, passed over thirty-two falls in the river of Wia Poco, now named Caroleigh. Having with great labour and peril, spent thirteen months in this discovery, from the river of the Amazons to the river Oroquoque, and not finding all the West-Indies to be full of gold, as some supposed, he returned by Trinidad, and the Western islands, and arrived at the isle of Wight in July 1611 (6).

[D] As appears by his Journal, of which extracts have been published more than once. The first extract of it was published, in the Author's life time, by Mr Purchas in his Pilgrimes (7), together with some of his Letters to G. Abbot Archbishop of Canterbury, and other great persons. Another-Extract, or rather Abridgment, of it, was printed in Churchill's Collection of Voyages (8); But in this the Language is altered; the Author's sense mistaken in several places; and it abounds with faults; as appears by examining only one page (9), where we find these errors—Col. 1. parcels, for paths—Col. 2. corus, for cocos—both, for bold, &c.—The account Sir Thomas gives of the Mogul's magnificence, is really wonderful.—On his birth-day, he was sitting cross-legg'd on a little Throne, all covered with diamonds, pearls, and rubies. Before him was a table of gold, and on it about fifty pieces of gold-plate, all set with jewels, some very large and extremely rich, others of less value, but all of them almost cover'd with small stones (10).—Upon another occasion, when the Emperor was going upon an expedition, he describes his dress thus. One came, "and girt on his Sword, and hung on his buckler set all over with diamonds and rubies, the belts of gold suitable.—On his head he wore a rich turbant with a plume of herons feathers, not many but long. On one side hung a ruby unfer, as big as a walnut; on the other side, a diamond as large; in the middle, an emerald like a heart, much bigger. His staff was wound about with a chain of great pearl, rubies, and diamonds drill'd. About his neck he wore a chain of three strings of most excellent pearl. Above his elbows, bracelets set with diamonds, and on his wrist three rows of several forts: his hands bare, but almost on every finger a ring.—His coat was of cloth of gold without sleeves.—A footman carried a foot-stool of gold set with stones.—Among other parts of the retinue, there followed about twenty elephants royal, led for him to mount, so rich in stones and furniture, that they glitter'd like the sun (11)."—He made a present to Sir Thomas of a Cup of gold, set all about with small rubies and Turkey-stones, the cover with large rubies, emeralds, and Turkey-stones in curious works, and a dish fuitable to set the cup on. Many of the stones were small; and the greater, which were many, not all clean, but they were in number about two thousand, and the gold about twenty ounces. He sent, at the same time, Sir Thomas word, that he esteemed him more, than ever he had done any Frank (12)—Sir Thomas observes elsewhere (13), that it was the wicked policy of the then Mogul, and his ancestors descendants of Tamerlane, to ruine and dispeople all the ancient Cities, and forbid their being repaired. One of them he saw in that ruinous condition, named Cbitur, which, (says he,) 'shews the 'footsteps of wonderful magificence. There are still 'standing a hundred churches [or Temples] all of 'carved stone, many fair towers and lanterns, many 'pillars, and innumerable houses, but not one inhabitant. There is but one steep ascent cut out of the 'rock, and four gates in the ascent before you come 'to the city gate, which is magnificent. It is in the 'country of Ranna (a prince then newly subdued by 'the Mogul) lineally descended from Porus. Near it 'stands a pillar, erected by Alexander the Conqueror, 'with a great [Q. Greek] inscription.'—Mr Salmon observes (14), That Sir Thomas was not supported with an Equipage fuitable to the Character he bore; nor were the presents, the East-India Company furnish'd him with to that Court, fuitable to the dignity of the Prince he came from, or the Mogul to whom he was sent, as the Indian Court themselves observed; and occasion'd his Voyage to be less advantageous to the Company than otherwise it might have been; for Sir Thomas seems to have been a Gentleman every way qualified for the employment he undertook, and in the circumstances he was, maintain'd his character to admiration.

[E] And, the year following, was sent Ambassador to the Grand Signior. In his passage to Constantinople, he wrote a Letter from Messina to George Villiers Duke of Buckingham, then Lord High-Admiral; wherein he complained of the 'great increase of Pirates in the Mediterranean sea; representing, that if 'they were suffered to increase, they would brave the 'Armies of Kings at Sea in a few years, and attempt 'even the Coasts and Shoars with peril.—And he took the opportunity, of getting thirteen English captives released from the Spanish gallies (15). He arrived at Constantinople the 22d of December 1621.

During his Embassy, he wrote, 'A true and faithful 'Relation represented to his Majesty and the Prince, 'of what hath lately hapned in Constantinople, concerning the Death of Sultan Osman, and the setting 'up of Mustapha his Uncle. With a continuation of 'the same story.' Printed at London 1622. 4to.

And he kept a most curious Account of his Negotiations at the Porte, which remained in Manuscript 'till the year 1740, when it was published by the Society for promoting Learning; under the title of, 'The Negotiations of Sir Thomas Roe, in his Embassy 'to the Ottoman Porte, from the year 1621 to 1623 'inclusive: Containing a great Variety of curious and 'important Matters, relating not only to the Affairs

(12) P. 636.

(13) See Purchas, Part i. p. 541.

(14) Modern History, Vol II. 8vo. edit. 1725. p. 448.

(15) Cabala, edit. 1663, fol. p. 352, and his Negotiations, &c. p. 7. 37. 38.

* Dr Smith's Account of the Greek Church, p. 252.

of

(a) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721, Vol. II. col. 52.

(b) Purchas his Pilgrimes, Part i. edit. 1625, p. 544. and Stow's Annales, edit. 1631, p. 1022.

(c) Stow's Annales, as above.

(d) Journal, in Purchas, p. 542.

(e) 'If he was not flattered by the Christians, that were then at the Mogul's Court; as he observes himself. Ibid.

(6) Stow's Annales, with Edm. Howes's Continuation, edit. 1631, fol. p. 1022. and the Geographical Accounts of those parts.

(7) Part i. p. 535—592.

(8) Vol. I. p. 617.

(9) P. 626.

(10) P. 635. of Vol. I. of Churchill's Collection.

(11) P. 643.

Sultans Ofman, Mustapha, and Amurath the IVth. The English nation reaps to this day the happy effects of his Negotiations at the Porte. For, before his time, the affairs of our Merchants there were in great disorder, and little regard was had to the capitulations and privileges, granted by the Turkish Emperors either to our Nation, or any other. But Sir Thomas, to his immortal reputation, recovered the respect due to Embassadors, which had been utterly lost for several years before, through the audaciousness of a succession of the Turkish Empire, but also to those of the other States of Europe, in that Period: His Correspondences with the most illustrious Persons, for Dignity or Character; as with the Queen of Bohemia, Bethlem Gabor Prince of Transylvania, and other Potentates of different Nations, &c. And many useful and instructive Particulars, as well in relation to Trade and Commerce, as to Subjects of Literature; as Antient Manuscripts, Coins, Inscriptions, and other Antiquities.' fol.—In the Dedication to this valuable Volume; the Printer observes, That 'the Letters and Negotiations of this wise and able-Minister will, on perusal, be found to contain such a fund of Knowledge in almost every useful branch of it; such deep, but honest policies, such a zeal for his Prince, such a love for his country, and such rare abilities to manage the most arduous Affairs, and in the most difficult and dangerous times; that it may be boldly said, the last Century has not produced a more valuable Collection of this kind (16).'

(16) Dedicat. p. iv. —The period they treat of, (from 1621, to 1628) was 'a period so fruitful of great events, that in the first fifteen months of it only, Sir Thomas observes, that he had seen three emperors of the Turks, seven prime visiers, two captain bassas, five aga's of the Janissaries, three great-treasurers, six bassas of Cairo, and other changes in proportion (17).— This able minister contented not himself with giving a bare detail of facts in his letters and relations, but mixes with them such reflections and observations, as, at the same time that they set forth the extent of his genius and capacity, enlighten the readers with the knowledge of the causes and springs of the actions and counsels he describes and communicates. —He made himself thoroughly acquainted with the nature of the Turkish Government, the maxims of their policy, the state of their revenues, the condition of their forces, the situation of their provinces, and the circumstances of the Subjects in all their dominions; and the reader will probably be surprized to peruse his accounts of it, and see on what a precarious footing that empire subsists; how few resources it has in case of considerable disasters, and how likely it is to be overturned in a moment by the effects of a single, if complete, victory over their forces in a general battle.—Sir Thomas made it a rule to share his fortune with the Poor, to whom he allotted a tenth of his Substance. And, at one time, during his Embassy, he procured the redemption of upwards of eight hundred English Mariners, who were compelled to do Service on board the Barbary rovers, and made the most considerable strength of their fleets. This advantage he obtain'd for his country, and prescribed laws to those rapacious rovers, in spite of the utmost opposition they could make to the contrary at the Porte, when those rovers were in the height of their power and insolence, and scoured the seas at their pleasure, not sparing even the Ottomans themselves; and at a time, when they were confessedly acknowledg'd by the Turkish ministers to be the marine bulwarks and defence of their empire! And what is still more wonderful, he found means to enforce and renew these laws, upon that ungovernable race of Pirates, in every change and revolution at the Porte, when no man stood in safety.—Nor ought his conduct to be forgotten in relation to the point of Precedence claimed by the French ambassador at the Porte, over the English; a claim which had too tamely been comply'd with by his predecessors at Constantinople; but to which no art, persuasion, stratagem or bluster, could make him yield. And yet there is no point in which his prudence and moderation were more conspicuous, as it is the interest of all the ambassadors at the Porte, to unite in order to strengthen themselves against the insolences to which they are too often exposed at that proud court. And indeed the superiority of his talents, gave him so great advantage over the French ambassador, that he always frustrated and disappointed his designs: particularly in the affair of the Greek Church, and [Cyrillus Lucaris] the patriarch of Constantinople; both which Sir Thomas defended against the open and secret practices, not only of that ambassador, who acted also as Legate of the Pope in the Turkish dominions; but of the united cabals of the court of Rome, the then newly establish'd congregation de propaganda fide, and the society of Jesuits, combin'd to the destruction of both. And, not contented to disappoint their deep-laid and mischievous projects, he actually procur'd the banishment of that turbulent order from those dominions (18), and that in a manner the most mortifying that could be, to that arrogant and busy ambassador, whom, as he says in one of his letters, he was resolv'd to keep under, during the time of his embassy. He was equally vigilant and successful in his opposition to the intrigues of the Imperial ambassadors, who, from time to time, endeavour'd to bring about a treaty of peace and commerce between Turkey and Spain; which the latter sought with the greatest industry, in order to cut the English out of the Eastern commerce, and to be at liberty in the Mediterranean sea to employ her fleets against the Venetians, and other powers with whom she was at variance: but he found means always to frustrate the applications of both those powers as often as they attempted this design, and turn'd it to the disgrace of both, and that in a most signal manner.—The Senate of Venice with most distinguish'd respect, the prince of Transylvania, the king and queen of Bohemia, the kings of Denmark and Sweden, and other Sovereign Princes and States, besides the king of Poland and the Emperor, all separately did him the justice which his abilities and integrity deserved. The first grandees of Poland, and the ambassadors of that Crown at the Porte, were order'd to take his advice in all their transactions there. The Turkish ministers, tho' so often changed in his time, almost constantly confided in him, and were frequently govern'd by his counsels, even in their own affairs: For they revered his wisdom, and always found him above chicanery or double-dealing. Nor was there in all his time but one prime Visier who insulted him, and dared to avow himself his enemy.—Cyrillus Lucaris, patriarch of Constantinople, a wise and good man, ow'd his preservation to him both as to his life and dignity, more than once, and never undertook any thing of consequence in his time, of a publick nature, without consulting him. He was a stay and a balance to the Dutch ambassador at the Porte, whose sordid temper and inconsideration had otherwise hurry'd him into inconveniencies unworthy of his publick character: He was a support to two Venetian bailo's of great gravity and wisdom. So that when, for the common interest of all, he joined with the Christian residents, they carry'd every thing; and when once, contrary to his advice and exhortations, they would proceed without him, they met with shame and repulse.—Upon the whole, considering the difficulty and danger of his employment, through the revolutions and distractions at the Ottoman court in his time; the variety of affairs under his management; the active enemies who oppos'd him; the faithless and arrogant ministers he had to treat with at the Porte, and their frequent changes, generally from bad to worse; the profound policy and dissimulation of Bethlem Gabor prince of Transylvania, who made himself of high importance to the most formidable princes of that time; and the distracted state of the English affairs, whereby the Crown was disabled to support the vigorous and intrepid genius of it's minister, &c.—these things being considered, we may venture to pronounce, that Sir Thomas Roe was one of the ablest, wisest, most vigilant, and intrepid ministers that ever appeared in that station (19).

(18) See Negotiations, &c. p. 757.

(19) Preface, p. 5—14.

succession of insolent Viziers. And he deserved most highly, not only of the Greek Church by his generous protection of it against those who endeavoured to destroy its very being, but of Christendom in general, and particularly of Poland: which King Sigismund acknowledged with great respect and thanks, in a letter written to him from Warsaw in September 1622 (g). During his residence in the East, he made a large collection of valuable manuscripts in the Greek and Oriental languages; which, in the year 1628, he presented to the Bodleian Library (b). He also brought over the fine Alexandrian manuscript of the Greek Bible, sent as a present to King Charles the First, by Cyril Patriarch of Constantinople; which hath been since transcribed and published by the learned Dr Grabe, and Dr Wigan (i). In the latter end of the year 1629, he was sent Ambassador to mediate a peace between the Kings of Poland and Sweden. He succeeded in his negotiation, and gained so much credit with the great Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden, that he inspired him with the design which he executed in 1630, of making a descent into Germany to restore the freedom of the Empire [F]. In his return from this embassy, he was charged with a negotiation at Copenhagen, in which he had the like success, and in a few days finished a treaty with the King of Denmark, which had been carrying on for several years. He was employed again in another negotiation at that Court, and with several Princes in Germany [G]. As he was likewise at the Congress of Hamburg, removed afterwards to Ratisbon, and Vienna (k). On the 17th of October, 1640, he was elected one of the representatives for the university of Oxford, in the Parliament which met the third of November (l): wherein he shewed himself a person of great eloquence, learning, and experience, as appears by his printed speeches [H]. The 13th of November, he made a Report to the House of Commons, how far the English Commissioners had proceeded with the Scottish, at the Treaty of Rippon (m). In April 1641, he was appointed by the King, to go Ambassador to the Diet at Ratisbon, in order to mediate the Restoration of the late King of Bohemia's son to the Palatinate: whereupon, he requested the House of Commons, 'That, notwithstanding that employment, he might still continue a member of the House;' which was granted accordingly (n). During the course of his negotiations, he offered to make an Alliance offensive and defensive between England and the House of Austria [I]; if the Emperor would give the King his

(g) See Account of the Greek Church, &c. by Tho. Smith, D. D. Lond. 1680, 8vo. p. 252, &c.

(b) Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. Lib. ii. p. 52. & Ath. Vol. II. col. 52, 53. See also Troubles and Tryal of Archbishop Laud, by H. Wharton, fol. p. 44. and Catal. MSS. Angliæ, &c. Vol. I. p. 35—38.

(i) See the Prolegomena to the first volume of that edition; and Sir Thomas's Negotiations, p. 335, 344, 500, 618.

(k) See Preface to his Negotiations, p. 13. and Letters and Memorials of State of the Sidney family, Vol. II. p. 547, 564, 570, 571.

(l) Wood, Ath. col. 52. and Br. Willis, as above, p. 247.

(m) Nalson's Collections, Vol. II. p. 524.

(n) Idem, p. 804.

[F] Of making a descent into Germany, &c.] That king, 'upon gaining the victory of Leipzig, sent Sir Thomas a present of 2000l. and in his letter calls him his strenuum consultorem, he being the first who had advis'd him to this German war, after he had made peace betwixt him and the Poland (20).'

(20) J. Howell's familiar Letters, p. 228.

[G] And with several Princes in Germany.] The 22d of Nov. 1639, he sent notice to King Charles I. that 'the Scots who arrived about Bremen, spoke desperately and traitorously, as if there were very ill resolutions fomented in that kingdom. That Lesley had written to a merchant in Bremen, his principal correspondent in those parts, that he would come thither in March or April for some business, and return with speed. Bremen (adds he) is the only resort now of the Scots, and the only Port from whence they can securely extract all kinds of Arms and Munition.' Upon this advice, General Lesley's sister, and about fifteen Scottish commanders, were taken at sea, and brought prisoners to Berwick; but, a short time after, released, and permitted to go into Scotland (21).

(21) Rushworth's Hist. Coll. edit. 1680, Vol. III. p. 979.

[H] As appears by his printed Speeches.] Such as have come to our knowledge, are, 1. 'Speech, or Report, from the Committee to the Commons house in Parliament,' in 1640: relating chiefly to the Lord-Keeper Finch, and his Speech in Parliament. 2. A Speech in Parliament, wherein is shew'd the cause and decay of Coin, and Trade in this Land, especially of Merchants Trade, &c. Lond. 1641. 4to. 3. A Speech of his, at the Council-table, touching Brass-money, or against mixing Brass-money with Silver, in July 1640, is also printed in Rushworth's and Nalson's Collections (22).

(22) Rushworth, Vol. III. p. 1217. and Nalson, Vol. II. p. 492.

[I] During the course of his negotiations, he offered to make an Alliance offensive and defensive between England and the House of Austria.] This particular we learn from the late learned Mr De Wicquefort, whose account is in these words (23).—'La Ferté-Imbault, que l'on a connu depuis sous la qualité de Maréchal Destampes, étant Ambassadeur en Angleterre en l'an 1642, avoit sceu que Roe, qui estoit de la part du Roy d'Angleterre à Ratisbon, y avoit offert de faire une Alliance offensive & défensive avec la Maison d'Austriche, si l'Empereur donnoit satisfaction au Roy, son maître, touchant le Palatinat & la dignité Electorale, dont il fit des plaintes au Parlement par le moyen du Comte de Hollande. Le Parlement n'avoit jamais pris connoissance de cette sorte d'affaires, & ce n'estoit pas a cette assemblée, que les Ambassadeurs avoient accoustumé de s'adresser; c'est pourquoi le Roy fit écrire a la Ferté, par l'un de ses Secretaires d'Etat, que l'Ambassadeur, qui n'estoit pas bien informé de la negotiation que Roe faisoit en Allemagne, avoit trop legerement crû & publié ce qu'il avoit oûi dire. Il luy fit demander aussy, si c'estoit de l'ordre du Roy, son Maître, qu'il s'estoit adressé au Parlement, ou si cette nouveauté estoit son ouvrage; & ce qui l'avoit obligé a faire cette insulte a sa Souveraineté. La Ferté répondit, qu'il avoit executé le Commandement du Roy, son Maître. Ce fut une tres grande imprudence à ce Ministre, que de produire de cette maniere son Prince, & de le faire l'objet de l'averfion du Roy de la Grande Bretagne; a qui on ne pouvoit pas faire un plus sanglant affront. Aussy écrivit il en France, que si on ne revoquoit incontinent cet Ambassadeur, il en useroit ainsi qu'il le jugeroit a propos pour son honneur, & pour le bien de son service. On le revoqua, & d'une façon qui fit bien connoître, qu'on le jugeoit plus propre pour la guerre que pour la negotiation." i. e. 'La Ferté Imbault, known afterwards by the title of Marshal Destampes, being Ambassador in England in 1642, was told, that Roe Ambassador from the King of England to the Diet of Ratisbon, had offered to enter into an Alliance offensive and defensive with the House of Austria, if the Emperor would give satisfaction to the King his Master concerning the Palatinate and the Electoral Dignity,—and he got the Earl of Holland to complain of it to the Parliament. The Parliament had never intermeddled in such affairs, and it was not to them Ambassadors used to address themselves; wherefore the King ordered one of his Secretaries of State to write to La Ferté, "That not being acquainted with the design of Roe's Negotiation in Germany, he had too rashly believed and made public what he had heard. He ordered him also at the same time to be asked, whether it was by the King his Master's command he had thus addressed himself to the Parliament; or had, of his own head, taken that unprecedented step; and what it was that had thus obliged him to insult his Royal Dignity." La Ferté answered, "That he had executed the Command of the King his Master. It was a very imprudent step in that Minister, thus to expose his Prince, and render him the object of the King of Great Britain's averfion; to whom no greater affront could be offered. Accordingly King Charles wrote to the Ministry in France, his master satisfaction concerning the Palatinate and the Electoral dignity (o). And he behaved in so handsome a manner, as to draw this high encomium from the Emperor, 'I have met with many gallant persons of many Nations, but I scarce ever met with an Ambassador 'till now (p)' After his return home, the King made him Chancellor of the Garter, and one of his Privy-Council: in which domestic, as before in his foreign employments, he shewed himself a man of eminent abilities, and most admirable accomplishments. The calamities of the nation, wherein he could not avoid having a share, deprived him of that agreeable Recess and Ease which he had reason to expect at home; and not only imberthered his life, but served in all probability to shorten it (q). For he dyed November 6, 1644, and, two days after, was privately buried in Woodford church in Essex. An elegant epitaph was made for him by Dr Gerard Langbaine, which may be seen in Wood (r) [K], but was not put over his grave. He bequeathed a fine collection of 242 silver medals to the Bodleian Library. And, besides his writings above-mentioned, he translated a small piece, of which an account is given below [L]. His character is thus given. There was nothing wanting in him towards the accomplishment of a Scholar, Gentleman, or Courtier: and, as he was learned, so was he also a great encourager and promoter of learning and learned men. His spirit was generous and public, and his heart faithful to his Prince. He was a great, able, and honest Statesman; as good a Patriot, and as sound a Christian, as this Nation hath had in many ages (s). The rest of his Character is given in the note below [M].

(23) L'Ambassadeur, &c, as above.

(o) L' Ambassadeur & les Factions, par Monsieur Wicquefort. Haye, 1682, 4to. p. 105.

(p) Wood, A: h ut supra.

(q) July 2, 1642, being imperfect in his health, he craved leave of the Parliament to travel to the Bath, to use all requisite means for his recovery, which was granted accordingly. A perfect Diurnal, &c. No. 49. p. 389.

(r) Ubi supra, col. 53.

(s) Ibid,

' France, that unless the Ambassador was immediately recalled, he would act in such a manner as he should judge most consistent with his honour and interest. He was recalled, but with circumstances that shewed, he was looked upon as fitter for war than for negotiating.'

[K] An Epitaph was made for him by Dr Gerard Langbaine The conclusion of it is in these words.—
' Denum ille tot regnorum, distitorum internuntius,
' dissidentium coagulum; ille foederum interpres, &
' pacis publicæ sequester; ille duorum Reg. Jacobi &
' Caroli, ad quinque Imperatores, tres Reges, legatus;
' depositâ tandem personâ, honorum et annorum satur,
' cessit è Scenâ, propitij numinis indulgentiâ præreptus
' opportunè, ne funestam regni catastrophem, paulò post
' iniequatam, spectaret.'

[L] Besides his writings above-mention'd, he translated a small piece, &c. The translation was in English, and intitled, 'A Discourse concerning the King of Spain's surprizing of the Valtoline.' But we are not inform'd out of what language it was translated, nor when and where printed.

Our learned Author left the two following Books in manuscript. 'Compendious Relation of the Proceedings and Acts of the Imperial Dyet held at Ratibon, in 1640 and 41, abstracted out of the Diary of the Colleges.' It was in the possession of the late learned Tho. Smith, D. D.—'Journal of several Proceedings of the Knights of the Garter.' Often cited by Elias Ashmole, Esq; in his Institution, Laws, &c. of the Order of the Garter (24).

In 1730. Proposals were publish'd, for printing by Subscription, 'The Negotiations and Embassies of Sir Thomas Roe, from the year 1620, to the year 1644. The greatest part design'd by himself to be made publick. To which were to be added many others, which he intended not to publish, as being of too private a nature to be made publick in times of jealousy and distraction. Interspersed with a large account of the Embassies of Sir Robert Anstruther, Sir Isaac Wake, Sir William Boswell, Sir Dudley Carleton, the Lord Scudamore, the Earl of Leicester, the most learned and ever-memorable Earl of Arundel, and other principal Ministers of that time. To which were to be added, authentick Advices, original Powers and Instructions, Treaties of Peace and of Commerce, and many rare and valuable pieces of great use to clear up the History of that important period. All from their original Letters and Papers of State.' It was to be comprized in Five Volumes in folio. But the undertakers not meeting with sufficient encouragement, dropp'd this useful design. And, only the Volume mention'd above in note [E] was publish'd in 1740. But the most curious and interesting part of his Papers still remains in manuscript.

[M] The rest of his Character is more fully given in the note below. Sir Thomas Roe was indeed one of the most sagacious and accomplished Ministers that this Country hath produced. His knowledge of foreign affairs was remarkably extensive, having been acquired amidst a great variety of important Events, and intricate Negotiations; is manifest from this whole article.—So large a sphere of action and business has fallen to the lot of few, even of the most exercised in foreign employments. And we may venture to affirm, that no one could have filled it with more Capacity, Diligence, and Address, which were alike conspicuous, whether he was to pursue his Instructions with a scrupulous exactness, or whether he was to conduct himself by his own lights, as was frequently the case, when Difficulties and Commotions at home gave the English Ministers little leisure or inclination to look into the course of Affairs abroad. His Penetration into the Views and Tempers of those with whom he negotiated, was quick and refined. His Judgment, on points of the greatest moment, solid and comprehensive. His Intelligence of the private as well as publick transactions, of the Courts where he resided, exact, early, and authentick. And his personal carriage happily adapted to conciliate the affection and benevolence of Mankind, without departing from the dignity and gravity of his character. It was no unpleasant saying of the Emperor, after Sir Thomas had prevailed with him to grant Prince Rupert his Liberty, 'That if he had been one of the Fair Sex, and a Beauty, he was sure the engaging Conversation of the English Ambassador would have proved too hard for his Virtue.' But Sir Thomas would scarce have put it to the trial, being as eminent for the piety and regularity of his manners, as for the most consummate political abilities. Nor was the influence of his Piety confined to himself, but extended to the Protestant Interest in general; which he endeavoured on all occasions, to strengthen, by uniting the different Parties upon the most important and fundamental Principles of their Religion. He was, besides, master of a very useful part of Knowledge, for the Representative of a trading Nation, having acquired a perfect insight into almost every branch of its Commerce, during the course of his employment in the East Indies, the Levant, and the Northern parts of Germany. He not only understood perfectly the nature and various branches of Commerce throughout the world; but also the maxims and arts of politics, the different interests and situations of states; and was master of all those different parts of learning and knowledge, which are necessary to enable a person to discharge the functions of an ambassador. He was a man of admirable penetration, and excellent judgment, exceeding happy in discerning the arts and designs of the ministers with whom he treated, and ever guarded himself against all surprizes. His eminent virtues, extraordinary capacity, and approved wisdom, integrity, and probity, gained him credit and procured him the confidence of every court to which he was employed, and the greatest deference was always paid to his judgment. Nor is it less to be admired, that he found leisure, amidst the hurry and agitation of business, to cultivate the politer Arts: In what now passes under the name of Virtu, he was better skilled than most of his contemporaries; and the Arundel Collection, whilst it remained intire, could have shewn some Monuments of his taste in that way (25). From this short sketch of the Virtues and Services of Sir Thomas Roe, the Reader may be inquisitive to know what were the Rewards conferred upon him in return, and (24) See Wood, Ath. col. 53. & Catal. MSS. Angliæ & Hib. Vol. I. p. 330. col. 1.

(25) See his Negotiations, p. 334, 386, &c.

and we make no doubt will be surpris'd to hear, that this great Man, after Forty years employment Abroad, tasted very sparingly of his Master's Bounty, which (as he says himself) overflowed to so many others, over his head. The only Places which the King ever conferred on him, were those of Privy Counsellor, and Chancellor of the Garter, though he would have adorned one of the first stations in the Government (26)."

(26) Note of Ar. Collins, Esq; in Letters and Memorials of State of the Sydney family, Vol. II. p. 541, 542. and Preface to Sir Thomas Roe's Negotiations, p. 6.

ROGERS [Dr JOHN], a late learned English Divine, was born at Ensham in Oxfordshire, in the year 1679. His father was Vicar of that parish, and Rector of Wick Riffington in Gloucestershire; a very worthy clergyman. Our author was bred up at New-college school in Oxford, under the memorable Mr Badger. In January 1693, he was elected Scholar of Corpus-Christi-college: he was the youngest of all the competitors, who appeared more numerous on this occasion than had been remembered; so that his success implies no small commendation of his merit. In this early time of life, when young mens passions often sally out into some kind of extravagance or other, he shewed in one instance an uncommon turn of mind, being at once intent on pursuits in themselves widely different, country diversions and academical studies. It was his singular happiness, amidst all his excursions, to preserve his own innocency, and still to keep the main point in view. For, application in the night-time repaired the defects of the broken day; and, without the appearance of much industry, he made a considerable proficiency in learning (a). With reputation he proceeded to the degree of Master of Arts, on the 13th of March, 1700 (b). He had a remarkable briskness of spirit, such as could contemn and overcome difficulties; and withal, an openness and sincerity of temper, which gained the love and esteem of his contemporaries: a quick apprehension, a large capacity, and an unwearied attention to any point in view: an happy frame of mind which would have rendered him eminent in any profession. But his inclination, as well as the ordinary course of his education, determined him to the study of Divinity. Accordingly he entered into Holy Orders; and not being like to be soon chosen Fellow, he accepted of the curacy of Buckland in Berkshire, about ten miles distant from Oxford, in which he continued between five and six years, most usefully and agreeably dividing his time between the university and his country cure [A]. His preaching and conversation were so acceptable to the parishioners, that they rais'd for his benefit a handsome subscription for a sermon in the afternoon every Sunday. And he us'd to say, that the time spent in this station was the happiest part of his life, tending no less to his own satisfaction and improvement, than the improvement of his people*. Having waited a long time for a Fellowship, by reason of the slow succession in the college, he at length succeeded the very learned Mr Edmund Chishull, in April 1706. The 8th of July, 1710, he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity (c). And in 1712, he was invited to London, and chosen Lecturer of St Clement's Danes. His abilities seem'd to rise in proportion to the exigencies of his station; and he gain'd popularity without courting it. The excellency of his discourses, together with a graceful upright gesture, and a clear paterick elocution; made him, on account both of the matter and manner of his preaching, justly be reckon'd one of the most eloquent and instructive preachers of his time. His reputation in this respect was so well established, that, out of regard to his singular merit, the inhabitants of the united parishes of Christ-Church, and St Leonard's Foster-lane, unanimously chose him their Lecturer. He continued many years in this capacity, all the while beloved and revered by the parishioners, to whom he made suitable returns in a conscientious discharge of his duty (d). In 1716, he was present'd to the Rectory of Wrington in the county of Somerset. The same year he resign'd his Fellowship, and was married to the Hon. Mrs Lydia Hare, sister to the Lord Colerane, who was his pupil in the university †. At his coming to Wrington, he found a ruinous old parsonage-house, and a parish in no small disorder; but he rebuilt the one, and reformed the other: the first being the effect of a good fortune joined with a beneficent mind, and the latter wholly the work of prudence and virtue. Some time after, by the favour of Bishop Hooper, and the Dean and Chapter, he was elected Canon residentiary of the church of Wells; in which he also bore the office of Sub-dean. To this station he did credit in all respects, not abusing the honourable leisure he there enjoy'd in luxurious ease, or ostentatious hospitality, but devoting it to the duties of his profession, especially frequent preaching, and the service of the Christian Church (e). In 1719, he was engag'd in the Bangorian controversy [B], wherein he acquitted himself to

(a) An Account of the Life of Dr John Rogers, prefixed to his nineteen Sermons on several occasions. Lond. 1730. 8vo. p. 16, 17.

(b) Catal. of Graduates.

* Life of Dr Rogers, as above, p. 18—21.

(c) Catal. of Graduates.

(d) He quitted this Lecture Jan. 12, 1723, and preached a Farewel Sermon, which he published. Lond. 1724, 8vo.

† By her he had two daughters, the eldest of whom is married to Rob. Knight, Esq;

(e) Life, &c. p. 23—25.

[A] Most usefully and agreeably dividing his time between the university and his country cure.] The author of his Life makes, upon that occasion, this pertinent reflexion (1). 'From his example I cannot help observing, of how great consequence it is to Clergy-men in his circumstances, to inure and habituate themselves to the discharge of the several Duties of their sacred function, which is the chief end to which all their studies are ultimately to be directed. How far preferable is such an employment to the Life of a Clergyman wholly spent within the college-walls in inglorious Ease, or curious Speculation; till at once he is called out into the world, a learned, unexperienced old man, too regular and severe in life to make allowance for the Infirmary of his people, or too profoundly wise to inform their ignorance.' [B] In 1719 he was engag'd in the Bangorian Controversy.] He published upon that occasion, 1. 'A Discourse of the Visible and Invisible Church of Christ: In which it is shewn, that the Powers claimed by the Officers of the Visible Church are not inconsistent with the Supremacy of Christ as Head, or with the Rights and Liberties of Christians, as Members of the Invisible Church.' Lond. 1719 8vo. The author of his Life, &c. gives the following account of the Occasion of that Discourse (2). 'He had for some time attentively observed the progress of the Dispute: he observ'd, among some other points, certain

(1) P. 21.

(2) P. 30.

to the satisfaction of all disinterested persons (f). On account of his abilities in that respect, as well as of his learning and merit in general, the university of Oxford conferred upon him by diploma, in 1721, the degree of Doctor in Divinity, without his desire or knowledge. He was not only famed for controversy, but also for being an eminent casuist; and as such frequently applied to, in easing scruples of conscience, and resolving points of religion. More especially, he was consulted by persons in danger of being seduced into Popery; for whose use he composed some excellent Treatises [C]. As a favourer of all generous designs, he particularly encouraged Charity-schools, and the Corporation for the relief of Clergymen widows and children; not only by the example of his own liberality, and his application and influence, but also by his eloquent Discourses, some of which he made public [D]. In the year 1726, by the recommendation of some eminent persons, who were desirous to bring him forth into public view, he was made Chaplain to his present Majesty, then Prince of Wales, an honour unexpected and unsought. About the same time, he appeared in Defence of Christianity, against the malevolent attacks of Antony Collins in his Scheme of Literal Prophecy considered, &c. [E] In the same year, having resigned his lecture certain Propositions advanc'd concerning the Church in indefinite terms, of an exceptionable meaning, such as in their natural consequences were apprehended to be inconsistent with the notion of a regular Society. The debate soon grew warm; on one hand the Charge was urg'd home with aggravations; on the other, complaint was made of misrepresentations, and an Answer offer'd, but such, it seems, as did not give satisfaction, or remove the grounds of offence. In these circumstances, some interposition appear'd necessary, in order to reconcile, if possible, this variance; at least to give a just state of the Point in Debate, by considering distinctly the Assertions which had given the Offence, with those Restrictions and Limitations under which they were defended; so that it might appear upon the whole, in what sense and what degree they were true or false; and thus the dispute might be brought to a fair issue. With this view he publish'd his Discourse, &c. not by way of personal controversy, but direct assertions; in which he set forth at large those two distinguishing relations, under which the Church stood, considered; and the several properties which result'd respectively from each. The great end of his writing was to inform and direct the judgment of his readers. Accordingly he has clear'd the subject from those perplexities, in which some had industriously involv'd it; laying down plain principles, and tracing them through a regular series of conclusions; and whenever the point stood in need of a direct and full explication, he never kept himself within the cautionary reserves of a Defendant, but endeavour'd to give all possible satisfaction to the serious enquirer, with openness and sincerity of heart declaring the whole truth. This Discourse was favourably received by the publick, and distinguish'd by the approbation of Dr Fr Hare then Dean of Worcester.

of

The Rev. Arthur A. Sykes having publish'd an Answer to that Discourse; our learned Author wrote, 2. 'A Review of the Discourse of the Visible and Invisible Church of Christ, being a Reply to Mr Sykes's Answer to that Discourse.' "In this work, (as the Author of his Life observes,) he has more fully done justice to his argument, and more explicitly unfolded and supported his principles, pursuing them through their several conclusions, and pointing out their application to particular cases. And with regard to the Cavils and Objections offer'd against his former positions, he has with much patience consider'd, and answer'd them so unexceptionably, as to preclude any farther opposition from those who seem'd ambitious of being thought controversial writers. And tho' the very form of the disputation, as it was a reply to the exceptions of an opponent, and of course contain'd many particularities ad hominem, was such as he was very unwillingly drawn into; yet has he constantly kept the main point in view, being no farther solicitous to confute his adversary, than it was necessary in order to clear up and establish the truth. Upon the whole, he may not improperly be said to have put an end to this Dispute; not only as he was in order of time perhaps the last Writer upon the Subject, but as he handled it in such a masterly and decisive manner, and brought it to that issue, upon which it has rested ever since."

[C] For whose use he compos'd some excellent Treatises. One of them was publish'd by him, under this title; 3. 'Reasons against Conversion to the Church of Rome, in a Letter to his Guardian, a late Convert to that Church; by a Student in the Temple.' Lond. 1726. 8vo. In this piece he treats only of the Infallibility of the Church of Rome; which is one of the main and fundamental supports of that monstrous heap of Superstition. The Argument is manag'd by him in a new and singular manner.

[D] Some of which he made public. One was intitled, 4. 'A Sermon preached before the Corporation for Relief of the Poor Widows of Clergymen, at their Anniversary Meeting in the Cathedral Church of St Paul's Dec. 4. 1718' Lond. 1719. 5. He also preached at St Sepulchre's, on Easter-Tuesday, the Spital-Sermon, at the yearly Meeting of the Charity-Schools, in and about the Cities of London and Westminster, in 1729. Printed in 1730.

And, to mention here in one view the rest of his Sermons that are printed: After his decease, Three Volumes of his Sermons were published, namely, 6. 'Twelve Sermons preached upon several occasions.' By John Rogers, D. D. &c. Lond. 1730. 8vo. The Preface is sign'd T. C. and dated April 10th 1730. 7. 'Nineteen Sermons on several Occasions. To which is prefix'd, The Author's Life, with an Elogium written by John Burton, B. D. Fellow of Eton college.' Lond 1730. 8vo. 8. 'Seventeen Sermons on several Occasions. To which are added Two Tracts, viz. 1. Reasons against Conversion to the Church of Rome. 2. A Persuasive to Conformity, address'd to the Dissenters. Never before printed.' And written for the use of the Dissenters in the parish of Wrington. Lond. 1736. 8vo. 'Being the Third and Last Volume of the Author's posthumous Works.' 9. He writ also a Persuasive to Conformity, address'd to the Quakers.

[E] About the same time, he appeared in Defence of Christianity, against the malevolent Attacks of Antony Collins in his Scheme of Literal Prophecy, &c.] Our learned Author did not at first profess'dly write against the Scheme, &c. But publishing in 1727, a Volume of Sermons, intitled, 10. 'The Necessity of Divine Revelation, and the Truth of the Christian Religion asserted: in eight Sermons;' He prefix'd to them 'A Preface with Remarks on the Scheme of Literal Prophecy, &c.'—This Preface, as the writer of our Author's Life observes (3), being written in much haste, and with an honest zeal for the Defence of our religious Establishment, and on a point which requires some tenderness and caution in the handling, seem'd liable to some exception, or rather to demand a more full and distinct explication. This gave occasion to a letter from his friend Dr Nath. Marshall Dec. 20. 1727. which, with our Author's satisfactory Answer, dated the 1st of January following, was publish'd in the Vindication of the Civil Establishment of Religion; as will be mentioned presently. The same Writer of his Life, is inclin'd to think (4); that, from the Number of these Sermons, (viz. 8.) the Subject matter, and Manner of writing, they were primarily design'd to be preached at Boyle's Lecture; and would have been reckon'd among some of the best performances on that occasion. But to return to the Preface: Antony Collins having written, A Letter to the Reverend Dr Rogers, on occasion of his eight Sermons concerning the Necessity of Divine Revelation, and the Preface prefix'd to them; our learned Doctor published, 11. 'A Vindication of the Civil Establishment of Religion; wherein some Positions of Mr Chandler, the Author of The Literal Scheme, &c. and an anony-

(3) P. 38.

(4) P. 27.

of St Clement's Danes, he retired from London, with a full intention of spending the remaining part of his life in the country, chiefly at Wrington, which he had made very commodious; and where he employed himself in rural diversions and exercises. He seemed to have so much fixed his affection there, that in 1728, during his course of waiting as King's Chaplain; when a Nobleman's Favour gave him reasonable Expectations of further advancement, he declined it; alledging, That as his duty had called him up to the Court, it now called him away to another place, from which no other views could detain him. Accordingly he hastened back into the country (g): but he had not been there many days, when he received so handsome and generous an offer, from the Dean (b) and Chapter of St Paul's, of the Vicarage of St Giles's Cripplegate in London, then vacant by the death of Dr Thomas Bennet (i), that he could not well refuse it. Though he accepted that great preferment with undissembled anxiety and reluctance (k) [F], he was instituted thereto about the latter end of October, 1728 (l). While he was possessed of it, he did not only discharge the duties of his ministerial function with his usual abilities and integrity: but also endeavoured to the utmost to set the perplexed state of that parish's affairs upon a better footing, and to extricate the inhabitants out of some difficulties into which they were involved. A sincere desire to serve them in these respects engaged his continual application, even to the neglect of his own health; and is thought to have hastened his death (m): which happened in the fiftieth year of his age, on the first of May, 1729 (n), after ten days illness, and after he had enjoyed his new preferment only about six months. He was buried the thirteenth of May, in the parish church of Ensham, where a very handsome monument is erected to his memory by his widow (o) [G]. Dr Rogers was a comely person, and to all appearance of a strong and robust constitution. His Religion was pure and unaffected. His piety real and rational; zealous without excess, and temperate without any faulty coldness; free from supercilious reserves, and haughty appearances; but agreeably seasoned with a peculiar liveliness of spirit, as well as all fit urbanity and freedom of converse (p). He was an excellent Writer, though he was never ambitious of being thought a great Scholar: his Learning was for use, not for ostentation: he neither collected nor read many Books, nor was curious in their editions, being persuaded, that a few well chosen, and studied to good purpose, communicate more real knowledge, than a copious slowly-growing Common-place-book. Not to mention others, he appeared more particularly conversant in the writings of the judicious Mr Hooker, and the ingenious Mr Norris, and he made their excellencies his own (q). The rest of his character is given below [H].

(g) Life, &c. P. 46, 47.

(b) Dr Francis Hare.

(i) See above the article BENNET [THOMAS].

(k) Life, &c. as above, p. 48.

(l) Monthly Chronicle, 4<sup>to</sup>. Vol. 1. p. 225.

(m) Life, &c. as above, p. 50, 51.

(n) Monthly Chronicle, Vol. II. p. 97.

(o) Life, &c. p. 59.

(p) Dr Marshall's funeral Sermon on Dr Rogers, p. 29.

(q) Life, &c. as above, p. 44.

'mous Letter on that Subject are occasionally considered. With an Appendix, containing a Letter from the Reverend Dr Marshall, and an Answer to 'the same.' Lond. 1728. 8vo. T. Chubb made some Remarks upon this Book in his Short Reflections on the Grounds and Extent of Authority and Liberty, with respect to Civil Government. 1728.

[F] Tho' he accepted that great preferment with undissembled anxiety and reluctance, &c. So the author of his Life assures us. Which is also confirm'd by Dr N. Marshall, in his funeral Sermon. 'It fell, says he, to my lot to give him that earliest notice of his Invitation to this extensive Cure, which I am morally sure, 'till then he had never thought of, much less sought after, or canvassed for it. His Answer convinc'd me, that his own Choice would have rather fix'd him in a rural privacy, than have enter'd him upon such a public Scene of Action: But a Call so unlook'd for, so utterly unexpected, he esteem'd Providential; as such he obey'd it rather than embrace'd it'

[G] Where a very handsome monument is erected to his memory, &c. The Epitaph begins in this manner. Hic juxta cineres paternas corpus suum sepeliri voluit Johannes Rogers, S. T. P. magni vir animi, ad fortunam omnem, ad munus omne, sive sustinendum, sive ornandum, ita infiguiter composuistis, ut illius qui recensuerit titulos, idem quoque simul laudaverit virtutes. i. e. John Rogers, D. D. desired his body might be deposited here, near his Father's remains: a man of a great mind, so well adapted to support, as well as to adorn, every condition of life, every employment or dignity, that he who mentions his titles and preferments, doth at the same time praise his virtues.'

&c. The rest containing only Facts, already mentioned in this Life, we thought it improper to repeat them again here.—This Epitaph is most wretchedly translated in the Appendix to the Exemplary Memorials, &c. p. 10.

[H] The rest of his character is given below. The author of his Life, gives this further just elogium of him (5). 'No one more attentively examin'd his own Notions, or digested them more methodically; serious meditation effected what could never be attain'd by mere assiduity of reading. His attention and patience in the pursuit of truth, were equal to his quickness and sagacity; and continual exercise strengthened and enlarg'd his capacities. As a mature Reasoner he paid a just deference to Authority, yet admitted no principle implicitly without mature examination, and regularly work'd out his own conclusions. In short, he may be truly said to have built upon his own bottom, being, what few can justly boast of, thoroughly acquainted with the extent of his own abilities, and a compleat master of his own knowledge.——Whether we regard moral or intellectual qualities, he will appear a most excellent Writer, and posterity, by imitating, will praise the good example. We find in him the acuteness of a Critick, the close reasoning of a Logician, the good manners of a Gentleman, and charity of a Christian: On all occasions a true greatness of mind, disdainng every pursuit but that of truth; above all party-views, and personal altercations; and incapable of the common little arts of evasions, dissimulations and misrepresentations: A quickness of wit that gave life and beauty to his compositions; a spirit either insensible or superior to injuries and slander, such as could contemn with silence, rebuke with gravity, or forgive with meekness: In the management of his argument an honesty and sincerity, which few observe amidst the heat of the disputation; an impartiality and candor, which his opponents cannot but allow; a perspicuity of style and sentiment, which they cannot honestly misinterpret; and a strength of reasoning, which they can no more gain-say than imitate'—Dr Marshall gives also this character of him (6). 'I should not mention among the praises due to him, that clear, comprehensive, and strong Understanding God had given him, but for the excellent uses to which he applied it. His Works will praise him, when our lips can no longer perform the grateful office: The infidel and libertine may stand thence corrected or instructed; as the serious and faithful may thence derive a farther support and confirmation in their respective sentiments and practices. Had he been born of a parentage which had easily led him to the highest stations in life, he was amply qualified for sustaining and adorning them; as in a lower figure of life and fortune

(5) P. 41, 45.

(6) Funeral Sermon.

‘ he was equally fitted for improving, or being content with it. A mind so exquisitely form’d for any situation, any posture of affairs, to which the Providence of God might have call’d him; such an indifference toward the honours and profits of this life, with such abilities to have acquired the one, and to have adorned the other, are talents rarely to be met with in the same person, and very hardly to be imitated by any other.—He was an entire despiser of craft and cunning, that ape of Wisdom, the uglier for being so like it; yet with the simplicity and godly sincerity of the honest Christian, with the ‘ harmless temper of the dove, he had such a due proportion of the serpent’s wisdom, that as he would impose upon none, so he was not himself easily imposed upon. Of his public spirit, he has left behind him very costly monuments in the several cures, to which he stood for any time related. He concludes, with calling him, a worthy man, a pious Christian, a vigilant Pastor; in whom Religion in general had lost an able champion, the Church of England in particular a prudent and strenuous defender, and his Parish a discreet, faithful, and watchful overseer (7).’

(7) See also Mr Burton’s Character of our learned Author in elegant Latin verses. Prefixed to his Sermons.

ROOK, or ROOKE, [Sir GEORGE], one of the bravest and most experienced seacommanders Great-Britain ever bred (a), was the son of Sir William Rooke, Knt. of an antient and honorable family in the county of Kent [A], where he was born in the year 1650. His father gave him the education becoming a gentleman; and, when he grew up and fit to enter upon business, put him to a genteel profession. But, as it frequently happens that genius gives a bias too strong for the views even of a parent to conquer, so Sir William, after a fruitless struggle with his son’s bent to naval employment, gave way to his inclinations, and suffered him to go to sea. His first station in the navy was that of a reformade, in which he distinguished himself by his undaunted courage and indefatigable application. This quickly acquired him the post of a Lieutenant, from whence he rose to that of a Captain, before he was thirty; a thing in those days very extraordinary, when no man, let his interest or quality be what it would, was raised to that station, before he had given ample as well as incontestable testimonies of his being able to fill it with honor (b). So far he was advanced in the reign of King Charles the Second. His successor, King James, who certainly had uncommon skill and experience in maritime affairs, entertained so good an opinion and esteem of our young Captain, that he was continued in his post, and obtained the command of the Deptford, a fourth rate man of war. But being too honest to favour the unlawful designs of that Prince, he heartily concurred in the Revolution (c) [B]. About the end of April, 1689, Admiral Herbert distinguished him early, by sending him, as Commodore, with a Squadron on the coast of Ireland; to assist in the reduction of that kingdom, wherein King James had landed with a French army. He arrived off of Greenock the tenth of May; kept the Scots from having any intercourse with King James and his army; and was particularly instrumental in the taking of the isle of Inch in Lough-Swille, and in the relief of London-derry. Soon after, he convoyed the Duke of Schömberg’s army to Carrickfergus; and continued with that General till he had taken the place. Then, by his direction, he sailed southward along the Irish coast; came into Dublin-bay September 16, where he insulted the city, which King James was personally present in, and attempted to take or burn all the vessels in the harbour: but the wind turning, and blowing hard, drove him out to sea. The 18th of September he came before Cork, and sent in some small vessels for intelligence, and to assure the people of their Majesties (d) favour: and, notwithstanding their violent fire from some batteries at the harbour’s mouth, he landed his men, and took possession of the great island; though this was looked upon as the best fortified port in Ireland. He might have done further services, had not his ships grown by this time foul, and his provisions of all kinds very low. By which means being constrained to quit his station, he arrived in the Downs October 13, after having given, by his activity, vigilance, and indefatigable attention to his duty in this expedition, an earnest of the great things, which he afterwards performed (e). In the beginning of the year 1690, he was made Rear-Admiral of the Red, upon the Earl of Torrington’s recommendation (f) [C]: in which station he served at the unfortunate fight off Beachy-head, June 30. But notwithstanding the ill success of our arms, which was indisputably one of the greatest we ever met with at sea, Mr Rooke was, upon examination, found to have behaved well (g). Therefore, he had the command of a Squadron given him; and King William thinking his own presence absolutely necessary at the approaching congress at the Hague, no one was thought so proper to be trusted with the guard of his royal person, in that voyage, as Rear-Admiral Rooke: a thing the more remarkable, because this was the first time of his Majesty’s going

(a) Boyer’s Hist. of Queen Anne, in the Annual List of the deaths of eminent persons, p. 45.

(b) Ibid. Life of Sir George Rooke, Lond. 1707, 8vo. p. 1, 2. Lives of the Admirals, &c. by J. Campbell, Esq; L.L.D. edit. 1750. Vol. IV. p. 292.

(c) Life, &c. as above, p. 2.

(d) King William and Queen Mary.

(e) Life, p. 31. Complete Hist. of the Transactions at Sea, &c. by Josiah Burckett, Esq; Lond. 1720. fol. p. 417, &c. and Dr Campbell, as above, Vol. II. p. 12, &c.

(f) Dr Campbell, Vol. IV. p. 294.

(g) Life, p. 12. and Dr Campbell, Vol. IV. p. 294.

[A] Of an antient and honorable family in the county of Kent.] They were seated at Monks-Horton in that county. And of the same family, very probably, was George Rookes, a person in the service of King James I. who was sent by him upon some special affairs in Sicily, in the year 1604 (1). Sir William, our brave Admiral’s father, was Sheriff of Kent, and Mayor of Canterbury, in 1684 (2).

[B] He heartily concurred in the Revolution.] The author of his life informs us, That ‘ as Captain Rook did not at all favour the designs concerted by King James II. against his country, there was indeed nothing but meer necessity (i. e. the want of good officers) that made the King entertain him and some others in his service. Captain Rook, upon the land-

‘ ing of the Prince of Orange in England, and the success of his arms, coming into the Downs, under my Lord Dartmouth’s command, (King James his Admiral,) there readily concurred to have several officers in the fleet that were known or at least suspected to be Papists to be dismissed from their employments; and indeed this Gentleman in particular, as much affected to the Religion and Liberty of his country as any in the Navy could be, engaged in his station early and heartily in promoting the happy Revolution that ensued (3).’

[C] Upon the Earl of Torrington’s recommendation.] Arthur Herbert, Esq; Vice-Admiral of England, was created Baron of Torbay and Earl of Torrington 29 May 1689.

(3) Life, &c. p. 2, 3.

[D] And

(1) Lediard’s Naval History, fol. p. 403.

(2) Somner’s Antiquities of Canterbury, edit. 1703, fol. P. i. p. 185.

going over to Holland, since he had been King of England. The Admiral failed out of the Downs, January 16, 1690-91, with a squadron under his command towards Margate road: and his Majesty embarking at Gravesend, they put to sea on the 17th. Having encountered great dangers from the ice, on the coast of Holland, the King landed safely a little to the northward of the Maefe. And the Rear-Admiral having faithfully discharged his great trust, and continued on that coast 'till he saw the yachts and small frigates safely in, he returned, on the 25th, with his squadron to Margate-road. He failed again to the eastward on the 15th of March, 1690-91, but returned the 21st of the same month from the coast of Holland; the King not being yet ready to embark, and taking the opportunity of coming back, about the middle of April, with part of the Dutch squadron. However, his Majesty making but a very short stay in England, Rear-Admiral Rooke had the honor to convoy him over the second time, and on the second of May landed him in Holland. The Rear-Admiral, after this, rejoined the grand Fleet, commanded now by Admiral Russell; but all their endeavours to meet with and engage the French fleet proving ineffectual, this year terminated without any memorable action (b). The next proved one of the most illustrious in the British Annals, and was particularly famous for the destruction of the French fleet at la Hogue; in which our brave officer bore a very large part. But we are previously to observe, that, in March 1692, he again convoyed King William to Holland, and was then, or very soon after, promoted to the rank of Vice-Admiral of the Blue; in which station he served in the famous battle of la Hogue, on the 22d of May. He behaved there with great courage and conduct; and it was owing to his vigorous behaviour, that the last stroke was given on that important day; which threw the French entirely into confusion, and forced them to run the utmost hazard, by passing through the race of Alderney, full of shoals and rocks, with a most furious and rolling sea, in order to shelter themselves from their victorious enemies. But the next day, May the 23d, was for him still more glorious. For he received orders to go into la Hogue, and burn the enemy's ships as they lay. There were thirteen large men of war, drawn up as close to the shoar as possible; besides transports, tenders, and ships with ammunition, disposed in such a manner that it was thought impossible to burn them. Moreover, the French camp was in sight, with all the French and Irish troops that were to have been employed in the invasion of England, and several batteries upon the coast well provided with heavy artillery. Vice-Admiral Rooke, however, made the necessary preparations for obeying his orders; but when he came to make the attempt, he found it impossible to carry in the ships of his squadron. Therefore he ordered his light frigates to ply in close to the shore: and having manned all his boats, went out himself to give directions for the attack, burned that very night six three-deck ships; and the next day, May 24, burnt six more [D], from seventy-six to sixty guns, and destroyed the thirteenth, which was a ship of fifty-six guns; with most of the transports and ammunition-vessels; and yet, through his wise conduct, this bold enterprize cost the lives of no more than ten men (i). For his good services in this affair, King William settled a pension of a thousand pounds a year upon him for life (k). About the beginning of July, Mr Rook, in company with Vice-Admiral Callemberg, was sent with a squadron towards St Malo, to bring an account whether the whole, or what number of the French fleet might ride there; and undoubtedly to endeavour to destroy them. He carefully examined the ground and tides thereabouts; and observed, that there were at St Malo's about 35 or 36 sail rigg'd: but not one of the pilots would undertake to carry in any man of war or fire-ships to make an attempt on the French ships. So dangerous were all approaches to that place! He came back, therefore, through very stormy weather, and safely arrived at Torbay on the 13th of July (l). In the spring of the following year, about the middle

(b) Life, &c. p. 12-15.

(i) Life, &c. p. 17, 18. Burchett, &c. as above, p. 467, 468. Dr Campbell, as above, Vol. III. p. 64-67. and Vol. IV. p. 295, &c.

(k) Life, p. 19. and Dr Campbell, Vol. IV. p. 297.

(l) Life, p. 19.

[D] And the next day, May 24, burnt six more ] Mr Richard Allyn, chaplain of the Centurion, gives the following particulars of this memorable transaction (4). — May 23. — At ten or eleven we discovered our fleet about two leagues to the Northward of La Hogue, and at two we anchored by them, they having chased into la Hogue thirteen sail of the French. In the afternoon Vice-Admiral Rooke, and about ten sail of third and fourth rates, by the Admiral's orders weighed, and went in almost within shot of the ships, but the pilots would not carry them farther in by reason of the shoal water, besides several banks which are on that coast. The Vice-Admiral hoisted his flag in the Eagle, and, besides the ships that were with him, he had all the barges and pinnaces of the fleet to attend him, well mann'd and arm'd. In the evening he sent in a fire ship and all the boats to destroy the six ships that lay outmost. The fire-ship ran ashore, but was got off the next day. As soon as the French saw our boats with a fire-ship coming near them, they all quitted their ships. Our boat was the first that got aboard any of the ships. Lieutenant Paul entered a three deck ship, and found no creature aboard, so he ordered the boats crew to cut chips and lay them together in order to set her on fire, which was soon done. My Lord Danby burnt his face as he was blowing tow and oakum, &c. to set another ship on fire, some gun-powder taking fire near him. The whole mob of boats went from ship to ship until they had burnt the six, notwithstanding they were within less than musket shot of the town, and a small fort of about six or eight guns. But as the ships were burning, their guns which were all loaden went off, and the bullets flying all round, so disordered all the men on the shore, that they quitted their posts. — May 24. This morning all the boats and two fire-ships were again ordered in to destroy seven sail more, that were got at least a mile above the town. The fire ships run ashore, and not being able to get off were burnt by our own men; but though the fire-ships had met with such bad success, yet our boats met with better, and did execution even beyond expectation, for they not only burnt the seven men of war, but also at least twenty vessels supposed to be transport ships designed for England, and every thing they met with so far as they went. In the whole action we lost not ten men. They plainly saw King James's camp and standard near la Hogue from their boats.

(4) Narrative of the Victory at la Hogue, 8vo. p. 30, 31.

of February 1692-3, King William went to Portsmouth; and having first viewed the fortifications, and the dock-yard, he afterwards went to see the fleet at Spithead; and going on board Vice-Admiral-Rooke, with whom he dined, he was pleased, as a mark of his royal favour, and the high esteem he had of his services, to confer the honor of Knighthood upon him. A little before (m), a grand naval promotion was made, in which Sir George was declared Vice-Admiral of the Red. Shortly after, he was appointed commander of the Squadron, which was to escort the Mediterranean and Smyrna fleet of merchants. And the rest of the English and Dutch men of war received orders to accompany him to a certain latitude, or as far as they should think proper [E]: then, his instructions were, to take the best care of the fleet he could, and, in case of any misfortune, to retire into some of the Spanish ports, and put himself under the protection of their cannon (n). In the mean time, the French fleet had sailed, from Brest and other ports, for the Mediterranean, about the middle of May, in three squadrons, consisting all together of seventy-one ships of war, besides tenders, bomb-vessels, and fire-ships; and, being joined by the Toulon squadron, and amounting now to no less than one hundred and fourteen sail, were got into Lagos-bay on the coast of Portugal, with a design of waiting for and intercepting the English fleet. Our Admiralty and Ministry, to their great (m) Febr. 8.

See Dr Campbell
tell Vol. III.
p. 86.

(n) Item, Vol.
IV. p. 498.

[E] Or as far as they should think proper.] At a Council of war, on the 15th of May, they came to the following resolution; "That, if the Toulon Squadron was come out of the Straights, and had joined the Brest Squadron; Ten of our men of war, a small frigate, and a fire-ship, would be a sufficient convoy for the Straights and Turkey fleet. And that the separate convoy for Spain ought to proceed with them, and the body of the fleet, accompany them out of the Channel: But that if the French were not joined, it was proper the whole squadron should forthwith proceed with their convoys. On the other hand, if the French fleet was joined, and at sea, it was judged adviseable for the main fleet to proceed with the Mediterranean Squadron so far as a council of war should think proper, when in the Soundings; but if no certain advice could be got of the Toulon Squadron's being come out of the Straights, or where they were, before the fleet sailed from St Helen's, it was determined that the Mediterranean Squadron (that is ten men of war, a frigate, and a fire-ship) should remain at St Helen's till intelligence could be gained. On the 19th of May, the Lords of the Admiralty, in obedience to the Queen's commands, sent orders to the Admirals, to sail in company of the squadron bound to the Mediterranean, and of the Virginia and Bilboa convoys; and, that, after they had proceeded with them as far as should be judg'd requisite, they should order the Straights Squadron to steer such course to Cadiz, as should be thought most safe by a council of war, with respect as well to the Brest fleet, if gone to sea, as to the Toulon Squadron; and then with the body of the Fleet to put in execution the instructions they had received. A council of war being hereupon called, it was determin'd, That the main fleet, and Mediterranean Squadron should proceed together thirty leagues west south-west off of Ushant, and that when the Admirals spread a blue flag at the main-top-mast head, and fired three guns, Sir George Rook, as well as the other convoys, should proceed, according to the orders they had received from the Lords of the Admiralty. The fleet being, on the 4th of June, 30 leagues W. S. W. off Ushant, a council of war of the flag-officers was call'd; when it was determined, That since they had no intelligence of the enemy, the fleet should accompany the Mediterranean Squadron 20 leagues further, and then return to the former station, and take up the cruisers, and from thence proceed to the rendezvous 10 leagues North-west off Ushant; where accordingly they arriv'd June 8. During this time they met with no intelligence of the enemy's fleet; but the Lords of the Admiralty receiv'd advice on the 13th from Sir Lambert Blackwell, consul at Leghorn, that the Toulon Squadron, with thirty-five galleys, were ready to proceed from Marseilles. Some ships being sent to gain intelligence on the French coast, one of them return'd to the fleet the 17th of June, with an account, That she had stood so near in St Matthew's point, as to bring Brest bay open, and that neither ship nor other vessel could be discover'd there, except two or three fishing boats; so that the Admirals determined to sail off of Scilly to look for the enemy, and from thence to repair to Torbay, with the sixty-nine ships of the line of battle they had with them. They arriv'd the 21st in great want of several kinds of provisions. However a council of war was called the 23d upon commands from her Majesty concerning Sir George Rook, being apprehended, tho' too late, that he might be in great danger from the French fleet. By this council it was determined to proceed to Lisbon, and join the Mediterranean Squadron; but it was found upon strict enquiry, they had not sufficient provisions so to do. Nevertheless, since it was judged, that squadron did greatly require the assistance of the fleet, it was resolv'd to proceed in search of the enemy, if in fourteen days time they could be compleated with victuals for ten weeks at whole allowance. About that time, advice came from the English consul at Oporto, dated the 9th of June, and also from other quarters, That the French fleet had been discover'd in Lagos bay the 6th of June, consisting in all of about 120 sail, of which seventy were great ships, besides sixteen fire-ships, and six bomb-vessels, and that twenty of them were cruizing westward. Upon these alarming news, the Lords of the Admiralty did, on the 23d of June, send orders to the Admirals to distribute the expected provisions equally, so soon as they should arrive, and to cause each captain to take on board what water he could, since 'twas probable the service might require the Fleet's continuing at sea a considerable time; and express directions were given to the Commissioners for victualling, to provide as fast as they possibly could, and hasten to the fleet, what provisions were then ship'd off. On the 1st of July, the flag officers submitted it to her Majesty, whether it might be adviseable for the fleet to proceed to Lisbon, for that if the French were join'd and sail'd northward, the coast of England would be expos'd to insults. What had before induc'd them to propose going thither, was for the security of Sir George Rook, and the merchant ships; and to proceed with him further, or accompany him home, as should be thought most proper: But since orders were sent to him to return, they thought it would be very uncertain where to meet him; and they were of opinion, That her Majesty's orders to him were so full, that there was no occasion to give any additional ones: thereby he was directed, That if he was oblig'd to go into the river of Lisbon, and received certain intelligence, during his stay there, that the Toulon Squadron had join'd the rest of their fleet, and were together gone northward from the coast of Portugal, he should leave a proper number of ships, both English and Dutch, to proceed up the Straights with the Turkey fleet, and return himself with the rest, and join the body of our fleet in these seas, and not meeting them in his passage, to make the port of Plimmouth, and there expect further orders. But these orders not being sent away before the 3d of June, they could not possibly arrive time enough (5). This whole Account I have chosen to set down; because it shews the Weakness and Unsteadiness of the measures of our Ministry, and how they were the obvious cause of Sir George Rook's miscarriage. Their Laziness or Cowardise, cloaked under the pretence of our Coast's being in danger, was a weak and ruinous measure; which expos'd our brave Admiral, and the rich fleet under his care, to be attacked by the whole force of France, while we had a superior fleet, riding to no purpose in our chancel (6).

(5) Life, &c. p.
22—23.

(6) This is Dr
Campbell's just observation, Vol.
III. p. 91.

great dishonor, had not taken care to get proper intelligence of the enemy's motions. Sir George failed about the end of May, with a fleet of four hundred merchant-men of all nations; and, besides his own squadron of twenty-three ships, was accompanied with forty-five English, and twenty-four Dutch men of war. These left him on the sixth of June (o), though he expressed to them some concern at the great risque the numerous fleet of merchant-men under his convoy was like to run; as they had not yet any certain intelligence either of the force of the French squadrons, or where they were sailed (p). However, he pursued his course for the Straights, leaving by the way the vessels bound for Bilbao, Lisbon, St Ubes, and other places: but a very brisk gale of wind arising, drove him directly towards the enemy, before he could be apprized of their number, or his own danger. On the 16th of June, several French ships were discovered in Lagos-bay; upon which a council of war being called, Sir George advised, in vain, that they should lye by 'till the enemy's strength could be known. A ship they took, would make them believe that it consisted only of fifteen ships of the line: but Sir George easily counting eighty sail of men of war, resolved to push forward and make the best of his way; 'till considering, that he should thereby leave the merchant-ships exposed to the enemy, he brought to, and stood off with an easy sail, that the Dutch and the heavy ships might work up to the windward. He sent orders, at the same time, to the small ships that were near the land, and therefore not likely to keep up with the fleet, to use their utmost endeavours in the night to save themselves in the neighbouring ports of Faro, St Lucar, or Cadiz: which advice, as it was well given, so it was happily pursued, no less than fifty getting into Cadiz only. However the number of those taken and destroyed was great [F]. But it shewed great presence of mind in Sir George, to provide so wisely for the most distant part of the fleet, when himself, and those about him were in such imminent danger (q). The enemy amused themselves in attacking two Dutch men of war, and some of their merchant-ships; which they pursued, as they made for the shore, and thereby gave Sir George, with the ships that were to the windward and a-head, a fair opportunity to escape. He stood off all night, with a fresh gale: and, the next morning, June the 18th found fifty-four of the merchant-ships, and several men of war about him. The day following, he sent for the officers of the men of war and merchant-ships on board, to get the best account he could of the state they were in, and to concert proper measures for the security of the remainder. Being in want of water, and in hopes of meeting some of his scattered ships, which had steered southwards, he resolved to sail to the Madeiras; whence he departed the 27th of June, and arrived, August the third, at Cork in Ireland (r). In this whole affair, Sir George shewed a great deal of conduct. His whole squadron consisted of no more than twenty-three ships of war; and that of the enemy of one hundred and twenty sail in all, of which 64 were of the line, and 18 three-deck ships: yet Sir George saved all the men of war; for he brought twelve of them to Kingfale, and the other got into Cadiz; and he likewise brought back with him sixty merchant-men. Therefore, while in France the people in general charged their admirals with not making the most of their advantage, and the admirals themselves charged each other with want of conduct and neglect of duty, there was not so much as a single reflection made upon Sir George Rooke's behaviour; but, on the contrary, he was said to have gained more reputation by his escape, than accrued to the French by their conquest [G]. On his return home, the merchants gave him their thanks; and he underwent a strict examination, in the next meeting of the Parliament, when no imputation of misconduct or treachery could be fixed upon him (s). King William was so far from thinking Sir George had any ways been wanting in his duty, that he was pleased to promote him, in February 1693-4, from being Vice-Admiral of the Blue to the rank of Vice-Admiral of the Red; and, in April following, as a further mark of his favour and confidence, appointed him one of the commissioners of the Admiralty; soon after which, he was advanced again from Vice-Admiral of the Red to be Admiral of the Blue. He was not much at sea this summer; but gave constant attendance at the Admiralty-board, where he earnestly promoted all good regulations (t) [H]. In May 1695, he convoyed the King to Holland: and in September, being Admiral of the White, was constituted

Commander

[F] However the number of those taken and destroyed was great.] M. Coetlogon burnt, or sunk, four of the largest Smyrna ships at Gibraltar, and took seven; M. de Tourville and M. Desfrées took two Dutch men of war, and twenty-nine merchant men; burnt an English man of war, and a rich pinnace, and destroyed about fifty merchant ships; and five more at Malaga; and a few more in other places. The value of the cargoes, and of the men of war, were computed at about one Million sterling (7).

[G] Than accrued to the French by their conquest.] This is certain, says Mr Du Mont (8), that they missed the greatest part of the convoy, and that Sir George Rook, upon this occasion, acquired infinitely more honor than those who commanded the French fleet. While the one, though unable to resist such as attacked him in the midst of threatening dangers, by his prudence, dexterity, and courage, saved the best part of the fleet committed to his charge, at a time that others suffered themselves to be deprived, by the superior skill of this Admiral, of a booty, which, if they could have kept it, fortune put into their hands.

[H] Where he earnestly promoted all good regulations.] Particularly one to this effect: 'That whereas the Lords Commissioners had appointed sufficient salaries for their Secretaries, Clerks, and other Officers, they did order and direct, that they should neither demand, take, nor receive any fees, gratuities, or rewards from any person or persons, who might have occasion to apply to the board, upon any pretence whatsoever, upon the penalty of forfeiting their salaries, and being discharged from their respective employments for ever (9).'

[I] Was

(9) Life, p. 43.

(o) About fifty eagles W.S.W. of Ushant. Idem, Vol. III. p. 93. and Life, p. 24.

(p) Life, p. 24, &c. 39. Burchett, p. 482, &c. Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 88 —92. and Vol. IV. p. 298, &c.

(q) Life, p. 26, &c. Burchett, p. 484, &c. Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 92 —96. and Vol. IV. p. 298, &c.

(r) Life, p. 33. Burchett, p. 486. Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 94, &c.

(s) Dr Campbell, Vol. IV. p. 300, 301. and Proceedings of the House of Commons.

(t) Life, p. 42, 43.

(7) Idem, p. 96.

(8) Journal printed at that time in Holland.

Commander in chief of a squadron to be sent in the Mediterranean [I], consisting of a fleet of seventy men of war and merchant-ships. He sailed, in thirty-eight days, from England to Cadiz: and, on the 21st of November, called a council of war, to consider of a proper convoy for the ships bound to Turkey. But his men proving very sickly, and his force much inferior to the French, not above half of what they could bring out; he resolved therefore, at a council of war on the 19th of January 1696-7, to secure his fleet in the harbour of Cadiz, 'till a reinforcement could arrive from England. In the mean time he received orders, dated January 27, to return home. However, to amuse the enemy, he pretended to go to Port-Mahon; but being sensible how inferior at all events he would be to the French, he put to sea about the middle of March, and arrived in the English Channel the 22d of April, 1696; to the great joy and satisfaction of the nation in general, which much feared, lest the French fleet should come up with and overpower him (a). On his arrival, he took the sole command of the fleet; and received orders, May 2, to proceed into the Soundings, and to endeavour to prevent the French squadron, expected from Toulon, from getting into any port of France [K]. These hard instructions he was under great difficulties to perform, by reason of his great want of men [L], and the small strength of his fleet. However he sailed to the coast of Brittany; and receiving certain advice, that the Toulon squadron got, May the 15th, safe into Brest, he thought fit, according to his last instructions, to return to Torbay, where he came the 23d of May. Soon after, our fleet being reinforced to the number in the whole of one hundred and fifteen sail, sixty-seven of them English, and forty-eight Dutch, whereof eighty-five were of the line of battle; he formed the glorious project of blocking up the French fleet in Brest, while ours insulted their coasts, and bombarded their towns [M]. Receiving orders, on the 29th of May, to come to London, and attend his duty at the Admiralty-board, he communicated his proposal to the Ministry (w): but, after many considerations and delays, it ended in the bombardment only of Olonne, and St Martin's in the isle of Rhé, and the ravaging of the small islands of Grouais, Houat, and Heydic, on the coast of Brittany (x). In the beginning of the year 1697, Sir George was appointed Admiral and commander in chief of the fleet; which put to sea, in June, in a very indifferent condition, being but half manned and scarce half victualled. As the French avoided fighting, Sir George found it impossible to do any thing very considerable; and yet this summer's expedition gained him no small reputation; by his seizing a large fleet of Swedish merchant-men, freighted by French merchants, and laden chiefly with Indian goods, that had been taken out of English and Dutch ships; and which, upon a fair tryal, were adjudged to be legal prize (y). The peace of Ryfwick, concluded about this time, gave our brave Admiral rest, the remainder of this, and the two following years, 1698 and 1699. In 1698, he was chosen member of Parliament for Portsmouth; and not voting servilely as the courtiers liked, they endeavoured to ruin him in the King's esteem, and to have him removed from the Admiralty-board, but his Majesty nobly refused (z) [N]. A confederacy being formed, in the year 1699, by the Czar of Muscovy, the King of Denmark, and others, against the young King of Sweden Charles the XIIth, an English squadron, commanded by Sir George, jointly with a Dutch one, was sent into the Baltic (a), to preserve the ballance in the North, and forward a peace: which being signed August 18, 1700, he returned home, about the middle of September. And the States-General were so sensible of his prudent management, that they thanked his Majesty for having intrusted him with the commission (b) [O]. In the spring of the

(a) Life, p. 44
—50.

(w) Life, p. 50
—61.
Burchett, p. 543.

(x) Burchett, p. 546, &c.
Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 160.

(y) Dr Campbell, Vol. IV. p. 303—306.

(z) Life, p. 62, and Dr Campbell, Vol. IV. p. 307.

(a) He arrived in the Sound, about the middle of June. Burchett, p. 583.

(b) Life, p. 61 &c.
Burchett, p. 582, &c.
Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 259.

[I] Was constituted Commander in chief of a squadron to be sent in the Mediterranean.] By his instructions, he was required, To annoy the enemy on all occasions, To prevent their being furnished from these seas with naval stores and provisions; To take under his command the ships of war left at Cadiz by Admiral Ruffel; and if he received certain advice that the French had passed the Straights, with the whole or part of their fleet, to follow them, or detach after them such a strength as might be proportioned to theirs (10).

[K] And received orders, May 2, to proceed into the Soundings, &c.] His instructions were, To proceed with the fleet, and lie in such a station as he should judge most proper, for preventing the squadron expected from Toulon, and their convoys, getting into any port of France; and, according to intelligence of their proceedings, to remove to proper stations, for the effectual performance of that service; and upon meeting them, or his being informed that they were got into any port where they might be attacked, he was to endeavour to destroy them: But if he received certain advice they were got into Brest, he was then to come with the fleet to Torbay, and remain there 'till farther order (11).

[L] By reason of his great want of men.] For he did at that time want Three thousand three hundred men, of the 19500 the allowed complement of his Fleet: which consisted only of thirty-nine men of war.—Besides sixteen Dutch (12).

[M] While ours insulted their coasts, and bombarded their towns.] His proposal was, That the body of our fleet should lie in Camaret and Bertram bays, and a detachment be made to sustain the small frigats and bomb-vessels, while they went in to do what mischief they could. It was his opinion, That thus blocking up the enemy's fleet in their principal port, insulting their coasts, and burning their towns at the same time, would expose them to the world, make them very uneasy at home, and give reputation to his Majesty's arms: And he believed it might be done, if speedily undertaken, with the assistance of some small frigats, which were much wanted (13).

[N] But his Majesty nobly refused.] "When his Majesty was pressed by some of his courtiers, to remove Sir George from the admiralty-board, he answered plainly, 'I will not. Sir George Rooke served me faithfully at sea, and I will never displace him for acting as he thinks most for the service of his country, in the house of Commons.'" An answer truly worthy of a British prince, as it tends to preserve the freedom of our constitution, and the liberty of parliaments (14).

[O] For having intrusted him with the commission.] Therefore, 'when Sir George was so unlucky as to labour under the displeasure of a powerful party in England,

(12) Life, p. 51

(13) Life, p. 61.

(14) Dr Campbell, Vol. IV. p. 307.

(10) Life, p. 44.

(11) Life, p. 53.

the year 1701, Sir George was constituted Admiral and Commander in chief of the fleet; and went on board in the Downs the 2d of July; from whence he sailed to Spithead, where he was speedily joined by the rest of the fleet, consisting of forty-eight ships of the line, besides frigates, fire-ships, and small vessels. He had under him some of the greatest seamen of the age (c), and was not long after reinforced by fifteen Dutch men of war, besides frigates, &c. The whole fleet was obliged to wait at St Helen's until the middle of August for want of provisions; and when he put to sea, was forced again by the high winds to put into Torbay. Towards the latter end of the month he sailed again; and on the second of September he detached Vice-Admiral Benbow with a stout squadron for America. The French expected, that this fleet would actually have proceeded to the Mediterranean; and it was to confirm them in this belief, we had demanded the free use of the Spanish harbours: but this was only to conceal things, and to gain an opportunity of sending a squadron early to America, without putting it in the power of the French to gain any exact account of its strength (d) [P]. A new Parliament being summoned in 1701, Sir George was again elected one of the representatives for Portsmouth. In the choice of the Speaker, he voted for Robert Harley, Esq; in opposition to Sir Thomas Lytelton who was espoused by the court; which exposed Sir George to many severe reflections from that party [Q]. But the clamours that had been raised against him ceased upon the death of King William, which happened on the 8th of March 1701 2. Queen Anne being sensible of his great services and true merit, was pleased, besides the command of the fleet, to confer an additional honour and trust upon him, by appointing him Vice-Admiral, and Lieutenant of the Admiralty of England, and Lieutenant of the fleets and seas of this kingdom (e). He was also made one of the Council to George Prince of Denmark, upon his being constituted Lord High-Admiral (f). War being declared against France on the 4th of May 1702, it was resolved, that Sir George Rook should command the united English and Dutch fleets [R], and the Duke of Ormond the land-forces; designed for an expedition against Cadiz, and concerted by the late King William; in order to prevent the French from getting possession of the Spanish West-Indies, or at least to hinder their keeping them long (g) [S]. The confederate fleet weighed from Spithead the 19th of June, and on the 12th of August anchored before Cadiz at the distance of two leagues from the city, and the next day got into the bay of Bulls. Sir George, according to his instructions, was for protecting the Spaniards, and drawing them, by gentle usage, to declare for the house of Austria [T]: but the land forces proceeded as declared and rapacious

(c) Name'y, Sir Cloudefley Shovel, Sir Tho. Hopson, John Benbow, Esq; and Sir John Munden.

(d) Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 257, 258.

(e) Life, p. 66.

(f) Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 321.

(g) Idem. p. 326.

England, he was known and acknowledged in Holland to be the best officer, and the greatest seaman of the age. This, perhaps, was the reason, that, notwithstanding the difference of parties, king William always preserved a good opinion of this gentleman, and employed him as long as he lived in the most important commands (15).

[P] Without putting it in the power of the French to gain any exact account of its strength] Bishop Burnet, (16) and others, find fault with Sir George Rooke, for his doing so little, when he was at Sea with so great a fleet. But the merit of this admiral was, that he always knew, and did, what was to be done. This was a fleet of amusement; the war was not declared; and, therefore, the longer Sir George could keep the French and their allies in suspense, the greater service he did; though, without this key, hasty people might mistake the thing, and believe he did no service at all. (17)

[Q] Which exposed Sir George to many severe reflections from that party.] The writer of his life justly observes upon this occasion. . . 'Now comes on Sir George his grand crime, and it was such a sin in the eyes of some people, as the Scripture declares shall never be forgiven. The brave gentleman having always the good of his country at heart, and by reason of his long experience in maritime affairs being the more willing and capable to deliver his mind upon this occasion, gave his opinion against Sir Thomas his being put into the chair, not out of any disrespect to the gentleman, whom he knew to be very capable of the great trust; but upon account of his being Treasurer of the Navy, which office required the utmost application and attendance in the war that was like to ensue, wherein in all probability he himself was to act a main part, as indeed it afterwards came to pass (18).—However, this it was that drew upon Sir George so many and so severe reflections, and obscured all the great actions he did. From this period, Bishop Burnet, very falsely and ungenerously, never mentions Sir George Rooke, without the utmost prejudice and meanest partiality.

[R] Should command the united English and Dutch fleets] The English fleet consisted of thirty, and the Dutch of twenty, ships of the line, exclusive of small vessels and tenders, which made in all about 160 sail. As to the land-forces, the English consisted of 9663, including officers, and the Dutch of 4138, in all 13801 (19).

[S] In order to prevent the French from getting possession of the Spanish West Indies, or at least to prevent their keeping them long] But, how getting Cadiz, in particular, could hinder the French from possessing themselves of the West-Indies; is not easily apprehended. Are there not many other ports in the Atlantic Ocean, both upon the Spanish and French coasts, where the Trade from America could be carried on? This was therefore one of the airy Projects, that have abounded in this century; and which have sprung from the Ignorance of our own, and the Enemies, strength.—However, King William's notion was, that the French West-India trade, and their settlements there, might have been ruined, by making ourselves masters of Cadiz, and sending a squadron to the West-Indies, which was to have been followed by another (20).

[T] And drawing them, by gentle usage, to declare for the house of Austria] Bishop Burnet says (21), that Rook spoke so coldly of the Design he went upon before he failed, that those who conversed with him, were apt to infer, that he intended to do the enemy as little harm as possible." But the truth is, He suspected he could do no great good, because this expedition was of a doubtful nature; for, on the one hand, our fleet and army were enjoined to speak to the Spaniards as friends, and at the same time were ordered to act against them as enemies (22). And therefore when his conduct came to be examined by the house of Lords, he arraigned his Instructions with great boldness, and shewed how improper a thing a descent on Cadiz was (23).—This expedition was originally concerted, on a supposition that the Spaniards had a natural affection for the house of Austria, and would join with us in their favour against the French. But when Sir George found the contrary, he thought it madness to expose the lives of the Queen's Subjects where they might be spared to better advantage; and therefore was not over fond of burning towns and cutting throats, to convince the Spaniards of our hearty affection for them (24).

(19) Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 327.

(20) Idem. p. 326.

(21) Hist. of his own Time, Vol. III. p. 564.

(22) See Dr Campbell. Vol. III. p. 328. note.

(23) Burnet, Vol. III. p. 474.

(24) See Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 332.

(15) Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 252.

(16) Hist. of his own Time, ed. 1753, 8vo. Vol. III. p. 400.

(17) Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 258. note.

(18) Life, p. 65, 66.

capacious enemies, which alienated the natives from them, and obliged them to defend themselves to the utmost. Our troops were not landed till three days after their arrival. The Duke of Ormond was very earnest for landing immediately in the isle of Leon, wherein Cadiz stands, in order to a sudden and vigorous attack of the town, where the consternation was so great, that in all probability the enterprize would have been attended with success. But many, especially the sea officers, opposing the Duke's motion, it was resolv'd, That the army should first take the fort of St Katherine, and Port St Mary, in order to facilitate their nearer approach to Cadiz (b) [U]. Accordingly, the 17th, they made themselves masters of a village called Rotta; and, the 20th, took possession of Port St Mary's, a general warehouse or kind of magazine for Cadiz, which had been forsaken by the inhabitants; and being full of wines, and rich goods and merchandizes, was unjustly plundered by our people, contrary to the express orders of the Duke of Ormond. The 22d they became also masters of fort St Katherine (i). Next, they took into consideration how to get into the port of Cadiz, and destroy the French ships and galleys there: and judging it necessary to be first masters of Matagorda, one of the forts that command the entrance therein, they attacked it, without success. Whereupon, at a council of the flag-officers on the 4th of September, it was resolv'd, to take the opportunity of the first fair night and smooth water, to bombard Cadiz, and so on successively, till it were judged that this service was effectually done. But the Prince of Hesse D'armstadt, commander of the German forces, representing, in a letter to Sir George, That the bombardment of the wealthy city of Cadiz, would totally alienate the Spaniards, already sufficiently provoked by the plundering of Port St Mary's, from the confederates [W]; that design was therefore laid aside (k). And, as it was judged impracticable by the general officers, with the land-forces they had, to make an attempt for the reducing of Cadiz; it was thought best, that all the magazines they had at Port Real, Port St Mary's, and Rotta, should be burnt and destroyed; and that the army should re-embark from Rotta as soon as possible. Accordingly they re-embarked the 14th, 15th, and 16th of September; and set sail from Cadiz the 19th. The Duke of Ormond was for having the land-forces put on shore, and wintering, either at Ayamonte, Vigo, or Ponte-Vedra (l). While they were debating about it, Captain Thomas Hardy gave Sir George intelligence, on the 6th of October, that twenty-two Spanish galleons, guarded by thirty French men of war, were arrived in the harbour of Vigo. Immediately, Sir George sent advice of it to the Dutch Admiral, declaring it as his opinion, that they should all directly sail to that place; and fall upon those ships (m) [X]. They anchored in the harbour of Vigo October the

(b) Life, p. 72, &c.
Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 328.
Boyer's History of Queen Anne, fol. 1735. p. 30.

(i) Burchett, p. 622, &c.

(k) Life, p. 81, 89.

(l) By the Treaty subsisting between England and Portugal, we could not be admitted to have more than six ships of war in the harbours of Portugal, at one and the same time. Burchett, p. 624.

(m) Life, p. 100.
Boyer, as above, p. 31.

[U] In order to facilitate their nearer approach to Cadiz. Their reasons are thus given more at large.—

Upon a reconsideration of Sir George Rooke's instructions; the advices and intelligences they had from Mr Methuen, and the Prince of Hesse D'armstadt; and the concurring information they had receiv'd from several fishermen taken on the coast; from which it might be reasonable to conclude, that the enemy had about 4000 disciplin'd troops in the town of Cadiz, besides Barghers, and 1000 horse of old troops, besides the militia, for the guard of the coast; and in regard the fleet could give no other assistance to the disembarkment, than covering their forces in their landing, and bombarding the town; and the impossibility of supplying the forces from the fleet in blowing weather, it was judg'd impracticable to attempt the island of Cadiz, immediately, in these circumstances: But, in consideration, the taking the fort St Catarina, and Port St<sup>a</sup> Maria, might facilitate the access of the fleet into the harbour, and annoying the town with our bombs; getting better intelligence of their condition, and for supplying the fleet with water, which they began to be in want of; and trying the affections and inclinations of the people of the country to the house of Austria, it was resolv'd to land the forces in the bay of Bulls, in order to reduce the aforesaid fort and town, and upon the success of this attempt it might be consider'd what was farther to be done, in prosecution of her Majesty's instructions, and that his Grace the Duke of Ormond should send a summons to the town to submit to their lawful King of the house of Austria (25).—Bishop Burnet observes (26), that 'It is certain our Court had false accounts of the state the place was in, both with relation to the garrison and the fortifications: The garrison was much stronger, and the fortifications were in a better condition, than was represented.'

[W] Already sufficiently provok'd by the plundering of Port St Mary's. The Duke of Ormond had published a manifesto, according to his instructions, by which the Spaniards were invited to submit to the Emperor, and he offered his protection to all that came in to him: But the spoil of St Maries was thought an ill commentary on that text.—Some of the general officers set a very ill example to all the rest, chiefly Sir Charles O'Hara, and Sir Henry Belafis (27), for which they were afterwards put under arrest, and the latter broke.—The behaviour of our people was indeed very violent and unjustifiable. For, the first night, the half famished and thirsty soldiers spent in the cellars of rich wine they had found out. The next day, their licentiousness being heightened by the fumes of the liquor, they proceeded to rifle and pillage the houses in a most outrageous manner, not contenting themselves to take moveables, but breaking and spoiling what they could not carry away. And as this booty would have been of no use to them, unless they could secure it on board the fleet, they called the seamen to their assistance, who from seconds soon became principals, and pilfered whatever they could lay hands on, with more eagerness than the others. Nor did the plundering stop here: For the officers of the army themselves thought it prudence, to share the sweetness and profit of a misdemeanour, which they could not hinder: Nay, some went so far, as to think themselves entitled, by their eminent stations, to engross the greater part of the booty. For which purpose, they set guards on the avenues, and stopped all the meaner sort, that were carrying goods to the fleet, with which they stored their own magazines, and afterwards retailed them for ready money. Some Churches fared no better than private houses, being despoiled of their most precious ornaments. Inasmuch, that the damage done to the enemy was computed at three millions sterling (28).—Sir George Rooke condemn'd this treatment, as contrary to the Duke of Ormond's declaration, and to all Faith and Justice (29).

[X] Declaring it as his opinion, that they should all directly sail to that place, &c. The manner how our fleet came to be inform'd of the arrival of those ships, was merely accidental: and is thus related.—'Sir George Rooke, in his return to England, having sent the Pembroke man of war, with two others, and some transports, to water in Lagos-bay; Mr Beauvoir, the chaplain of the Pembroke, and some of the officers, went on shore. But not meeting with any person that

(27) Burnet, Vol. III. p. 459.

(28) Boyer's Annals of Queen Anne, for the year 1702.

(29) See his Life, p. 77.

(25) Life, p. 72
—74.

(26) Vol. III.
p. 457.

the 11th; the weather having proved so hazy, that the town never discovered them 'till they were just upon it. The French Admiral had taken all precautions imaginable to secure his ships, by drawing them up beyond a very narrow streight, defended by platforms on both sides, and a castle on the one side; and laying a strong boom across the Streight. But our brave Admiral not discouraged with this, observing he could not send in the whole fleet without danger of their running foul of one another; selected a detachment of fifteen English and ten Dutch men of war, and all the fireships; which he charged to use their best endeavours to take or destroy the enemy's fleet. For the better performance of this, Sir George with great zeal and unwearied vigilance, spent almost the whole night, in going from ship to ship in his own boat, to give the necessary directions, and to encourage both officers and seamen to discharge their duty. And so well did they perform it, that the enemy's fleet was entirely destroyed [Z], and an immense booty brought to England (n) [Z]. After this glorious exploit, Sir George set sail from Vigo October 19, and arrived in the Downs the 7th of November (o). During his absence, a new Parliament having been called, he was elected a member for Portsmouth; and when he came to take his seat in the house, the Speaker was directed to return him thanks for his great services [AA]: he was also sworn a Privy-Counsellor (p). But complaints having

(n) Life, p. 100—114. Burchett, p. 627, &c. Boyer, p. 31, &c. and Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 334, &c.

(o) Life, p. 115. compared with Boyer's Life of Queen Anne, p. 32.

(p) Nov. 13. Life, p. 119.

could understand them, they roved for a while from place to place: At length, Mr Beauvoir seeing a gentleman, who by his countenance and garb seemed to be no Portuguese, and addressing himself to him in the French language, he proved to be the French consul; into whose favour Mr Beauvoir so far insinuated himself, that the other offered the use of his house, both for himself, and his friends. They lay there two nights, in which time Mr Beauvoir having an opportunity of several conversations with the Consul, the latter boastfully magnified the power of France, giving broad hints of Mr de Chateau Renaud's being safe, not far off, with the galleons. On the 24th Mr Beauvoir having a more certain and particular account of their arrival at Vigo, from two Letters sent by a messenger from the Imperial Ambassador at Lisbon, he immediately communicated the contents, at his return to his ship, to Captain (afterwards Sir Thomas) Hardy

(30) Anals of Queen Anne, for 1702. and Appendix to Harris's Vol. II. of Collection of Voyages, p. 26. edit. 1705.

Mr Beauvoir was a Guernsey-man; and Sir Tho. Hardy a Jersey-man.

(31) Life, p. 100, 101.

(32) Life, p. 106, 107, 108.

(33) Burchett, p. 627. Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 339.

(30) Upon which, a consultation of the Captains then at Lagos being held, it was resolved, this intelligence was of that importance, that a ship should be sent to acquaint Sir George Rooke with it: And as Capt. Hardy's ship was the best sailer, and He was master of the intelligence, he was ordered to sail a-head to find out our fleet, which he happily effected on the 6th of October. Sir George Rooke immediately imparted the advice to the Dutch Admiral, Callemberg, declaring it his opinion that they should all set sail directly for Vigo. The Dutch Admiral readily concurr'd with Sir George, who, the next day, call'd a Council of Flag-officers, wherein it was resolv'd, 'That in regard the attempting and destroying the French and Spanish ships at Vigo, would be of great advantage to her Majesty, and no less honorable to Her and her allies, and tend in a great measure to reduce the exorbitant power of France, the fleet should make the best of their way to that port, and fall on immediately with the whole line, if there were room sufficient for it; otherwise to attack the enemy with such detachments as might render the enterprize most effectual and successful (31).'

[Z] That the enemy's fleet was entirely destroyed.] Of the French men-of-war, in the harbour of Rodondella—Five were taken by the English; one by the Dutch; and brought home. Eight were burnt, besides three advice-boats. And four were either sunk, or run ashore, and bulged.—There were also three Spanish men of war taken.—And of the thirteen galleons, four were taken by the English, five by the Dutch; and all the rest were destroyed (32).—But, according to other accounts, 5 men of war 2 frigates, 1 fire-ship, and 3 small vessels, were taken by the English; and 1 man of war by the Dutch. Five were burnt; and 4 more taken, but bilged. They make also the number of galleons seventeen: 4 of which were taken on float, and 2 on shore by the English, and 5 by the Dutch. The others were burnt (33).

[Z] And an immense booty brought to England] The cargo of the Galleons was universally acknowledged to be the richest that ever came from the West-Indies into Europe; but, of the real value of it we never had any exact account. According to some, the silver and gold on board was computed at Ten millions of pieces of eight, of which Eight millions only were taken out of the galleons, and secur'd by the enemy, and the rest was either taken, or left in the galleons that were burnt or sunk. And the Goods were valued at Four millions of pieces of eight more, one fourth part of which was sav'd, near two destroy'd, and the other taken by the Confederates: Besides the ships already mention'd, and a great deal of plate and goods belonging to private persons, most part of which was either taken or lost (34).—According to others, the silver and gold was computed at Twenty millions of pieces of eight, of which fourteen millions had been taken out of the galleons and secured by the enemy, at Lago or Lugo five and twenty leagues from Vigo, and the rest was taken, or destroyed by the Confederates. And the Goods were valued at Twenty millions of pieces of eight more, One fourth part of which was sav'd, near two destroyed, and the other taken (35). It is certain, that the Spanish and French ships had been twenty-five days in Vigo harbour, before the Confederates arrived there; in which time, they debarked the best part of the plate and rich goods, and sent them up the country. And, as we were bringing the prizes home, one of the galleons struck on a hidden rock, and foundered. However, Two millions in silver, and Five in goods, were brought away by the English and Dutch (36). The Silver brought to England, was received, and hath VIGO under the Queen's bust, for a lasting memorial of this very remarkable event.

(34) Life, p. 111, 112.

(35) Boyer's Anals of Queen Anne.

(36) Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 339. 340. and note. Burchett, p. 630.

[AA] The Speaker was directed to return him thanks for his great services.] Which he did in the following words. "Sir George Rooke, you are now return'd to this house, after a most glorious expedition. Her Majesty began her reign with a declaration that her heart was truly English, and heaven hath made her triumph over the enemies of England; for This, thanks hath been return'd in a most solemn manner to almighty God: There remains yet a debt of gratitude to those who have been the instruments of so wonderful a victory (the Duke of Ormond, and yourself, who had the command of the sea and land forces). In former times, Admirals and Generals have had success against France and Spain separately; but this action at Vigo hath been a victory over them confederated together: You have not only spoiled the enemy, but enriched your own country: Common victories bring terror to the conquered; but you brought destruction upon them, and additional strength to England. France had endeavoured to support its ambition by the riches of India; your success, Sir, hath only left them the burden of Spain, and stript them of the assistance of it: The wealth of Spain, and ships of France, are by this victory brought over to our juster cause. This is an action so glorious in the performance, and so extensive in its consequence, that as all times will preserve the memory of it, so every day will inform us of the benefit. No doubt, Sir, but in France you are written in remarkable characters in the black list of those who have taken French gold, and 'tis justice done to the Duke of Ormond and your merit, that you should stand recorded in the registers of this House, as the sole instrument of this glorious victory. Therefore this House came to the following resolution: "Resolved, nemine contradicente, that the

"Thanks

having been made in the House of Lords of his conduct at Cadiz, he laid before them an account of his proceedings, and underwent an examination: which ended in this vote (g), That Sir George Rook had done his duty, pursuant to the councils of war, like a brave officer, to the honor of the English nation (r). Early in the year 1703, he proposed a scheme for distressing the enemy, by sailing very early into the bay of Biscay, where he thought, if the French had any men of war without port Louis and Rochefort, they might be surprized and taken (s). For that purpose, he came to St Helen's, about the middle of April, with eighteen ships of the line; and was detained there by a fit of the gout, and in waiting for the Dutch, 'till the 9th of May; when he sailed, and continued cruizing above a month on the coasts of France, putting the whole country into an unspeakable consternation. On the 23d of May he sent in a French East-India ship, worth 100,000 l. and on the 15th of June a French man of war of 36 guns, and a West-India merchant-man worth 40,000 l. But finding that his design had been betrayed to the French, and that most of their squadrons were sailed, he returned to St Helen's the 22d of June, with many prizes (t). He was made choice of, in the beginning of the year 1704, to command the English Squadron employed to carry Charles the Third, the new King of Spain, to Lisbon. And he shewed himself so active and vigilant in that service, that sailing from St Helen's the 12th of February, he arrived in Lisbon river the 25th, after a fine passage (u). Soon after, he sent a Squadron to cruize off Cape Spartell: and himself put to sea the 9th of March, and continued cruizing for a month. In April, he received orders from England, of the 24th and 28th of March, to proceed into the Mediterranean, to the relief of Nice and Villa Franca, which the French threatened to attack by sea. And, by the way, took about two thousand land-forces, to land at Barcelona, where a strong party had promised to declare for King Charles; which, however, was discovered, and prevented. He sailed from Lisbon-river May 11, came before Barcelona the 18th, and steered for the isles of Hieres the 21st. On the 27th they had fight of a French fleet of forty sail, making towards Toulon, which they chased 'till the 29th, in order to prevent its joining their other fleet there: but not being able to prevent it, they sailed back, and the 4th of June passed through the Streights of Gibraltar (w). Two days after, they were joined by Sir Cloudesley Shovel, with a reinforcement of thirty three ships of the line: a council of war then being called, several schemes were proposed, particularly a second attack on Cadiz, or Barcelona, which was soon found to be impracticable for want of a sufficient number of land-forces. However they resolved to proceed up the Streights, in order to be ready to face the French (x). Sir George Rooke being very sensible of the reflections that would fall upon him, if, having so considerable a fleet under his command, he spent the summer in doing nothing of importance; called a council of war the 17th of July, when the fleet was about Seven leagues to the eastward of Tetuan: and, after the proposal of several schemes, it was resolved to make a sudden and vigorous attempt upon Gibraltar, for these reasons; Because in the condition the place then was in, there was some probability of taking it; which, in case it had been properly provided, and there had been a numerous garrison, would have been impossible: because the possession of that place was of infinite importance during the present war: and, because the taking of it would give a lustre to the Queen's arms, and possibly dispose the Spaniards to favour the cause of King Charles (y). In pursuance of this resolution, the fleet came into the bay of Gibraltar the 21st of July; and, at three o'clock in the afternoon, the marines, English and Dutch, to the number of 1800, with the Prince of Hesse at the head of them, were put on shore on the neck of land to the northward of the town, to cut off any communication with the country. The Prince having posted his men there, sent a summons to the governor; which he rejected with great obstinacy. Sir George, on the 22d in the morning, gave orders, that the ships, which had been appointed to cannonade the town under the command of Rear-Admiral Byng, and Rear-Admiral Vanderduffen, as also those which were to batter the south mole-head, commanded by Capt. Hicks of the Yarmouth, should range themselves accordingly; but the wind blowing contrary, they could not possibly get into their places, 'till the day was spent. In the mean time, to amuse the enemy, Capt. Whitaker was sent with some boats, who burnt a French privateer of twelve guns at the mole. The 23d, soon after break of day, the ships being all placed,

(g) Feb. 17. See Boyer, p. 15, 47. Burnet's Hist. of his own time, Vol. III. p. 474. Or Campbell, Vol. IV. p. 313, &c.

(r) Boyer, p. 47.

(s) Life, p. 119. Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 365, &c. and Vol. IV. p. 313, 316.

(t) Ibid. and London Gazette. Burchett, p. 640, &c.

(u) Life, p. 119. Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 390. Burchett, p. 662, &c.

(w) Burchett, p. 679, &c. Or Campbell, Vol. III. p. 391, 393, 395. 397. Our Historians are not exact in their accounts; sometimes following the new, and sometimes the old style.

(x) Burchett, p. 676, 677. Life, p. 126. and Or Campbell, Vol. III. p. 398.

(y) Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 393.

“ Thanks of this House be given to the Duke of Ormond, and Sir George Rook, for the great and signal service performed by the nation at sea and land; which thanks I now return you.”

To which Sir George returned the following Answer. “ Mr Speaker, I am now under great difficulty how to express myself upon this very great occasion. I think myself very happy, that in zeal and duty to your service, it hath been my good fortune to be the instrument of that which may deserve your notice, and much more the return of your thanks. I am extremely sensible of this great honour, and shall take all the care I can to preserve it to my grave, and convey it to my posterity without spot and blemish, by a constant affection and zealous performance in the Queen's and your service. Sir, no man hath the command of fortune, but every man hath Vertue at his will, and tho' I may not always be successful in your service, as upon this expedition, yet I may presume to assure, I shall never be the more faulty. I must repeat my inability to express myself upon this occasion; but as I have a due sense of the honour this House hath been pleased to do me, I shall always retain a due and grateful memory of it; and tho' my duty and allegiance are strong obligations upon me to do my best in the service of my country, yet I shall always take this as a particular tie upon me, to do right and justice to your service upon all occasions.”

placed, the Admiral gave the signal for beginning the cannonade; which was performed with very great fury, above 15,000 shot being made in five or six hours time against the town, infomuch, that the enemy were soon beat from their guns, especially at the south mole-head: whereupon, the Admiral considering, that by gaining the fortification, they should of consequence reduce the town, ordered Captain Whitaker, with all the boats, armed, to endeavour to possess himself of it, which was performed with great expedition. But Capt. Hicks, and Capt. Jumper, who lay next the mole, had pushed ashore with their pinnaces, and some other boats, before the rest could come up; whereupon, the enemy sprung a mine, that blew up the fortifications upon the mole, killed two lieutenants, and about forty men, and wounded about sixty. However, our men kept possession of the great platform, which they had made themselves masters of; and Capt. Whitaker landing with the rest of the seamen which had been ordered upon this service; they advanced and took a redoubt, or small bastion, half way between the mole and the town, and possessed themselves of many of the enemy's cannon. Sir George then sent a letter to the governor, and at the same time a message to the Prince of Hesse, to send to him a peremptory summons; which the Prince did accordingly; and on the 24th the place did capitulate (z) [BB]. As this design was contrived by Sir George Rooke and the rest of the Admirals, so it was executed entirely by the seamen, and therefore the whole honor of it is due to them. After putting as many men as could be spared into the place, the fleet sailed to Tetuan, to take in wood and water. On the 9th of August, when it was returning from thence towards Gibraltar the scouts discovered the French fleet, about ten leagues off, which they resolved to receive and engage. But perceiving, that night, they were for getting away, they followed them the next morning with all the sail they could make. The 11th they forced one of the enemy's ships ashore, which the crew quitted, and set on fire. They continued still pursuing them: and, the 12th, not hearing or seeing any thing of them, our Admiral suspected they might slip between him and the shore. Whereupon he resolved to make the best of his way to Gibraltar: but discovering them about noon, near Cape Malaga, he and his squadron made all the sail they could, and continued the chase all night. On Sunday, the 13th in the morning, the English fleet was within three leagues of the enemy, who formed, and were ready to receive them. Their line consisted of fifty-two ships, and twenty-four galleys [CC]. They were very strong in the center, commanded by the Count de Toulouse, Admiral of France. Our line of battle consisted of fifty-three ships. A little after ten in the morning, our fleet bore down upon the enemy, and began the battle. About two in the afternoon, the enemy's van gave way to ours, and the battle ended with the day, when the enemy went away by the help of their galleys. The next day, both sides lay by, within three leagues one of another, repairing their defects, and at night the enemy filed, and stood to the northward. On the 15th our fleet endeavoured to renew the fight, but the French avoided it, and on the 16th were out of fight. The English bore away to the westward, supposing the enemy would have gone away for Cadiz; but receiving advice that they did not pass the Streights, it was concluded they had been so severely treated, as to oblige them to return to Toulon (a). This plainly discovers that we had the victory, notwithstanding the great Advantages of the French [DD]. But the skill of Sir George Rooke, and

(z) This is Sir George's account, as published in the London Gazette, No. 4045.

(a) Extracted from Sir George's Account in the London Gazette, No. 4054.

[BB] And on the 24th the place did capitulate.] The town was extremely strong, and had a hundred guns mounted, all facing the sea, and the two narrow passages to the land, and was well supplied with ammunition. The officers who viewed afterwards the fortifications, affirmed, There never was such an attack as the seamen made; for that fifty men might have defended those works against thousands (37). One circumstance did greatly contribute to dispose the Spaniards to surrender; which was this. "It being Sunday, all the women were at their devotions in a little chapel, about four miles distant from the Town, so that our men were between them and their husbands; which was a very great inducement to the citizens to oblige the governor to capitulate." This fact is related by some of our modern Historians, as if it was an anecdote to be found only in Burnet's History (38): Whereas it was published before by Secretary Burchett (39).—Gibraltar is of great service to the English Navigation; "situate as it were in the center of our business, in the very narrow of the Streights mouth, commanding from shore to shore, and awing by our cruisers, all the intercourse betwixt East France and Cadiz, &c. all the coasting Trade of both Nations, and the whole French Navigation into and out of the Ocean. And by making it a magazine for all our naval stores, our fleets may there be supply'd, clean, rest, victual, &c. and be dispatch'd without hardly stirring from their station, which is the life of a cruising war. There our sick and wounded men also may be commodiously entertain'd; our trading ships likewise bound up may lye for a wind, and

(37) London Gazette, No. 4045.

(38) Vol. IV. p. 69.

(39) P. 677.

"may take sanctuary in time of distress, either by weather or the enemy; and all the summer long, which is the season of action, when the Levant winds blow almost constantly and with greatest violence, ships may ride and lye quiet as in a calm (40)."

[CC] And twenty four galleys.] These Gallies were so remarkable an accession of strength to the enemy, (as they waited on them; keeping close under their lee, with every needful thing, such as fresh men, stores of all sorts, ammunition, &c.) and of such consequence were they on so pressing an occasion, that the French fleet, thus circumstanc'd, might not be unfitly compar'd to a town besieg'd, and not being quite surrounded by the enemies works, has the benefit of a gate open, whereby to be supported and supply'd from abroad with every thing necessary to their defence (41).

[DD] Notwithstanding the great advantages of the French] "Those who understand maritime affairs, will allow them to be as great as any fleet ever had. For, first, their ships were bigger; they had seventeen three-deck ships, and we had but seven. Secondly, they had a great advantage in their weight of metal; for they had six hundred guns more than we. Thirdly, they were clean ships, just come out of port; whereas ours had been long at sea, and had done hard service. Fourthly, they had the assistance of their galleys; and how great an advantage this was, will appear from hence, that about the middle of the fight, the French admiral ordered a seventy-gun ship to board the Monk, a sixty-gun ship of ours, commanded by captain Mighells; which she did, and was beat off three times, and after every repulse she had her wounded men taken off, and the bravery of the officers and seamen under his command, supplied all defects, and enabled them to give the French so clear a proof of their superiority over them in all respects at sea, that they not only declined renewing the fight at present, but avoided us ever after, and durst not venture a battle on that element during the remainder of the war. It may be therefore justly said, that the battle of Malaga decided the empire of the sea, and left to us and the Dutch an undisputed claim to the title of Maritime Powers (b). Sir George having left 2000 English marines in Gibraltar, with a sufficient quantity of stores and provisions, and 48 guns besides those that were in the place before; set sail the 24th of August, and arrived safely in England the 24th of September (c). He was extremely well received by the Queen his mistress, and the bulk of the people. His conduct and bravery were celebrated in numerous Addresses [EE], and her Majesty was desired, to bestow a bounty upon the seamen and land-forces which had behaved so gallantly (d). But the Whigs, that had now engrossed the management of affairs, could not bear that such high commendations should be bestowed upon a man who was not of their party. Therefore they used him so unhandsomely, that he chose to retire from publick business. Thus, immediately after Sir George Rooke had rendered such important services to his country, as the taking Gibraltar, and beating the whole naval force of France in the battle of Malaga, the last engagement which during this war happened between these two nations at sea, he was constrained to quit his command. Such is the effect of party-spirit in general! Such the unreasonable heat with which it proceeds! Such its dangerous and destructive effects with respect to the welfare of the state! After this strange return for the services he had done his country, Sir George passed the remainder of his days as a private gentleman, and for the most part at his seat in Kent. At last, the gout, which had for many years greatly afflicted him, brought him to his grave on the 24th of January, 1708-9, in the 58th year of his age: and he was buried in Canterbury-cathedral, where a monument is erected to his memory. He was thrice married (e) [FF]. His character is given below, drawn up by a masterly hand [GG].

(40) A Narrative of Sir George Rooke's Voyage, &c. Lond. 1704, 4to. p. 3, 4.

(41) Narrative, &c. as above, p. 10, 11.

(b) Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 402, 403.

(c) Life, p. 134. and Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 411.

(d) London Gazette, No. 4061, and Proceedings of the House of Commons.

(e) Dr Campbell, Vol. IV. p. 325 — 328.

(42) Dr Campbell, Vol. III. p. 402, 403. and London Gazette, No. 4054. and Narrative, &c. as above, p. 2, 5, 6, 11.

off, and her complement restored by the gallees. Fifthly, the French fleet was thoroughly provided with ammunition; which was so much wanted in ours, that several ships were towed out of the line, because they had not either powder or ball sufficient for a single broadside (42)."

[EE] His conduct and bravery were celebrated in numerous Addresses. Particularly in one from the county of Cornwall, wherein was the following paragraph. — "But 'tis not enough that your Majesty triumphs at land; to complete your glory, your forces at sea have likewise done wonders. A fleet so much inferior, in so ill a condition, by being so long out, in such want of ammunition, by taking Gibraltar without gallees, which were of so great service to the enemy: all these disadvantages considered, nothing certainly could equal the conduct of your Admiral, the bravery of your officers, the courage of your seamen, during the engagement, but their conduct, their bravery, and their courage after it, whereby they perfected a victory, which otherwise, in human probability, must have ended in an overthrow; an action as great in itself, as happy in its consequences. May your Majesty never want such commanders by sea and land — (43)."

[FF] He was thrice married. First to Mrs Mary Howe, daughter of Sir Thomas Howe, of Cold-Berwick in the county of Wilts, baronet: next, to Mrs Mary Lutterel, daughter of Colonel Francis Lutterel, of Dunster-Castle in Somersetshire, who dyed in childhood of her first child, in the month of July 1702; and lastly, to Mrs Katherine Knatchbull, daughter to Sir Knatchbull, of Mersham-hatch, in the county of Kent, baronet: By which wives, he left only one son, born of the second, George Rooke, Esq; the sole heir of his fortune (44).

[GG] His character is given below. "He was certainly an officer of great merit, if either Conduct or Courage could entitle him to that character. The former appeared in his behaviour on the Irish station, in his wise and prudent management, when he preserved so great a part of the Smyrna fleet, and particularly in the taking of Gibraltar, which was a project conceived and executed in less than a week. Of his Courage he gave abundant testimonies; but especially in burning the French ships at La Hogue, and in the battle of Malaga, where he behaved with all the resolution of a British admiral; and as he was first in command, was first also in danger. In party-matters, he was perhaps too warm and eager, for all men have their failings, even the greatest and best; but in action, he was perfectly cool and temperate, gave his orders with the utmost serenity, and as he was careful in marking the conduct of his principal officers, so his candour and justice were always conspicuous in the accounts he gave of them to his superiors; he there knew no party, no private considerations, but commended merit wherever it appeared. He had a fortitude of mind that enabled him to behave with dignity upon all occasions, in the day of examination as well as in the day of battle; and though he was more than once called to the bar of the House of Commons, yet he always escaped censure; as he likewise did before the Lords; not by shifting the fault upon others, or meanly complying with the temper of the times; but by maintaining steadily what he thought right, and speaking his sentiments with that freedom which becomes an Englishman, whenever his conduct in his country's service is brought in question. In a word, he was equally superior to popular clamour, and popular applause; but, above all, he had a noble contempt for foreign interests, when incompatible with our own, and knew not what it was to seek the favour of the great, but by performing such actions as deserved it. In his private life, he was a good husband, and a kind master, lived hospitably towards his neighbours, and left behind him a moderate fortune: so moderate, that when he came to make his will, it surprized those who were present; but Sir George assigned the reason in few words, "I do not leave much, said he, but what I leave was honestly gotten: it never cost a sailor a tear, or the nation a farthing (45)."

(45) Dr Campbell, Vol. IV. p. 328, 329.

(43) London Gazette, No. 4074.

(44) Dr Campbell, Vol. IV. p. 330.

(a) At the house of her father, Jasper Edwards, Esq; Welwood's preface to Rowe's translation of Lucan, p. 18. 1713, fol.

(b) Memoirs of Nicolas Rowe, Esq; prefixed to his Miscellaneous Works, by George Sewell.

(c) Dr Welwood, ubi supra, observes, that they came with very little pains, and seemed to flow from his imagination almost as his pen.

(d) Ibid.

(e) It was acted at Lincoln's Inn-fields, and dedicated to the Earl of Jersey.

ROWE [NICOLAS], an eminent poet, was born among his mother's friends (a), in 1663, at Little-Berkford in the county of Bedford. He was descended from the ancient family of the Rowes of Lambertoun in Devonshire, by his father John Rowe, Esq; [A]; who being bred to the Law resided at London, and sent our author first to a private school at Highgate (b), but afterwards placed him under the care of Dr Busby at Westminster, where he was chosen King's scholar, then about twelve years of age. Upon this foundation he made a great proficiency in classical learning, and early discovered his bent to poetry by the happy facility of his compositions (c) that way, several of which, both in Greek and Latin, as well as some in English, were much admired. He was taken from school at sixteen, and entered a student in the Middle Temple by his father, who designed him for his own profession. Accordingly he applied himself to the study of the Law, and made considerable advances in it; and being called to the Bar, lost no reputation by the figure he made there, and had even some particular encouragements to proceed in this gainful employment [B]. But though he had shewn a filial regard to his father's desire, by engaging in a study which was dry and irksome to him, yet no views of gain were able to change his nature, in which a passion for poetry was predominant; and at the age of twenty-five (d), he wrote the Ambitious Stepmother, as a trial of his genius for tragedy. In this performance, the purity of his language, the justness of his characters, and the noble elevation of the sentiments, met with a reception on the stage suitable to their merit (e). Pleased with the success, he absolutely discarded the Law, and fixed his thoughts, where his affections had always been, unalterably upon his darling Muse. He afterwards wrote several other tragedies [C], which all succeeded very well; but his Tamerlane (f) was received with the loudest applause [D]. He once tried his talent likewise

(f) This was his next attempt to the Ambitious Stepmother; he wrote both these plays before he quitted his chambers in the Temple. Sewell's Memoirs, ubi supra, p. 5.

at

[A] John Rowe, Esq; Mr Rowe could trace his ancestors in a direct line up to the times of the Holy War; in which one of them distinguished himself so much as to be rewarded with the arms that the family have born ever since, enjoying a competent estate and a handsome seat upon it. His father was the first of the family who changed a country life for a liberal profession; in order to which, after he had passed through the schools at home he was brought up to London, and entered a student in the Middle-Temple, was called to the Bar, and at length created a Serjeant at Law. He was a gentleman in great esteem for many engaging qualities, had very considerable practice at the Bar, and stood very fair for the first vacancy on the Bench, at the time of his death, which happened on the thirtieth of April, 1692. He was interred in the Temple church May 7. following. He published Serjeant Benloe's and Judge Dalison's Reports, in the reign of King James II. and had the honesty and boldness in the preface to observe, at that time, when a dispensing power was set up as inherent in the Crown, how moderate those two great lawyers had been in their opinions concerning the extent of the Royal Prerogative (1).

[B] He had some particular encouragements. For instance, he had the friendship and approbation of Sir George Treby, Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, who was fond of him to a great degree, and had it both in his power and inclination to promote his interest. Dr Welwood, from whom we have this information, observes, that Sir George was one of the finest gentlemen, as well as one of the greatest lawyers, at that time, and it was to the genteel part of this study that Mr Rowe chiefly applied himself. He told Dr Welwood, he was not content to know the Law as a collection of statutes and customs, but as a system founded upon right reason, and calculated for the good of mankind (2).

[C] Several other tragedies. These are, 1. The Fair Penitent. 2. Ulysses. 3. The Royal Convert. 4. The Tragedy of Jane Shore. 5. The Tragedy of the Lady Jane Grey. It has been well observed, that there runs through all our author's plays, an air of religion and virtue, attended with all the social duties of life, and a constant and untainted love of his country. That his muse was so religiously chaste, that not one word could be found in any of his writings, which might admit even of a double entendre in point of decency or morals. There is nothing in them to feed the depraved taste of nibbling at scripture, or depreciating things in themselves sacred. And it is the less wonder that he observed this rule with his pen, since we are assured that in his ordinary conversation, when his mirth and humour enlivened the whole company, he used to express his dissatisfaction in the severest manner against any thing that looked that way. On the other hand, being much conversant in the sacred writings, it is observable, that to raise the highest ideas of virtue, he has with great art in several of his tragedies made use of those expressions and metaphors in them, that taste most of the sublime. Dr Welwood extends this observation to his other writings (3). To which the epigram on a lady, who shed her water at seeing the tragedy of Cato, may perhaps be thought an exception. One would be apt indeed to conclude thereby, that Mr Rowe, as well as others, was not absolutely without his gay moments; did not this instance plainly appear to be the effect of party-zeal, as follows:

Whilst Maudlin Whigs deplore their Cato's fate,
Still with dry eyes the Tory Celia sat;
But though her pride forbade her eyes to flow,
The gushing waters found a vent below.
Tho' secret, yet with copious streams she mourns,
Like twenty river gods with all their urns.
Let others frown an hypocritic face,
She shews her grief in a sincerer place;
Here nature reigns, and passion void of art;
For this road leads directly to the heart (4).

But to return to his tragedies, in which softness was his characteristic talent (5), and, excepting Otway, he is more moving than any other poet of that age, and his diction is more exactly dramatic, than any other modern author. Mr Cibber informs us, that nobody consulted the dignity of the stage more, nor expressed greater disdain at the introduction of the pantomimes (6). His plays were collected into two volumes, and dedicated to the Earl of Warwick and Holland. Nobody was better beloved by people of all degrees and stations, but his greatest intimacy among the quality was with this nobleman, his wife being so dear to the Countess that they were in a manner inseparable (7).

[D] Tamerlane was received with the loudest applause. Our author, we are told, valued himself more upon this, than any other of his tragedies (8). A poetical genius, inflamed as he was in the highest degree with a passion for liberty, and an abhorrence of slavery, must needs be singularly delighted with writing those scenes in which the happy effects of the former are so beautifully contrasted with the horrors of the latter, under the persons of Tamerlane and Bajazet; and this pleasure became exquisitely complete, by the view which he had of couching under the characters of these two Princes, those of King William III. and Lewis XIV. The play, however, after having kept an uninterrupted yearly possession of the stage, from its first appearance, till 1710, came, it seems, to be discouraged, next to a prohibition, in the latter end of Queen Anne's reign. This being remarked with disdain by our author's apologist, Dr Welwood, who says,

(3) Ubi supra, p. 20.

(4) His Miscellaneous, p. 41. 4th edit. 1740.

(5) Colin's Complaint is another instance of this part of the character of our author's genius.

(6) Cibber's Apology, chap. xiv.

(7) Life of Pope, as before. We need not mention, that this Countess, after the death of the Earl, was married to Mr Addison.

(8) Welwood, p. 20.

(1) Welwood's preface, p. 18, 19. ubi supra, in the text.

(2) Ibid.

at comedy (g); but that essay meeting with a different fate, he had the good sense to push his genius no farther, in a way for which it was not adapted. He was very particularly fond of Shakespear; one of his plays (b) is professedly written in the taste of that author's stile: and he published an edition of his plays in 1709, to which he prefixed an account of the life (i) of that inimitable genius. When the Duke of Queenberry was promoted to the office of Secretary of State, he appointed Mr Rowe his Under-Secretary, and admitted him to a near familiarity and friendship. Our author continued in this employment near three years (k), 'till the death of that nobleman; after which he made his addresses to the Earl of Oxford, from whom, 'tis said, he received a very remarkable instance of coldness [E]. But this was sufficiently recompenced, by the regard which King George the First testified of his merit. Upon his accession to the Crown, he was made Poet Laureat, and one of the Land Surveyors of the Customs in the port of London. His present Majesty likewise, then Prince of Wales, conferred on him the place of Clerk of his Council; and the Lord Chancellor Parker, the very day he received the Seals, made him Secretary of the Presentations (l) without his asking it. Mr Rowe wrote several small original poems, besides some pieces in prose. He likewise translated Mr Quillet's Callipædia [F], from the Latin into English verse, and just lived to finish his most distinguished work, at least in this kind, a translation of Lucan's Pharsalia [G]. Not long

(g) It was called the Biter; it contained three acts, and was introduced on the Theatre at Lincoln's-Inn-fields, but damn'd.

(b) The tragedy of Jane Shore.

(i) See his article.

(k) Life of Pope, Vol. 1. p. 222.

(l) Sewell's Memoirs, &c. p. 6.

says, I leave it to others to give a reason; that reason is observed not only to be obvious, but honourable to those who did it, and indeed is conceded in the Doctor's own remark; that though King William was dead, yet Lewis XIV. was then alive, and the insult here made upon him was justly deemed very unfit to be particularly authorized by any other crowned head, as must be understood whenever it was acted by the royal company of comedians. Nor is that all; this much applauded piece, though it has numbers of exceeding fine verses, is thought by many very good judges (tho' not by the multitude) to be our author's worst tragedy. Besides it's being a flattering picture, unlike a Prince then living, at it's first appearance, and a party-play, the love scenes, between the general Axella and Selima, are very tedious and tiresome, and ill-timed into the bargain; when he should have been in the field at the head of his soldiers, he is making long similes (9), and telling very tender love-stories, even to whining; nay, she is not behind hand with him: they seem to strive to out-do one another (10).

[E] He was received coldly by the Earl of Oxford.] The story is this. Mr Rowe, it seems, going one day to pay his court to the Earl, then advanced to be Lord High-Treasurer, was courteously received by his Lordship, who asked him if he understood Spanish well? He answered, no; but thinking that the Earl might intend to send him into Spain on some honourable commission, he presently added, that he did not doubt in a short time both to understand and speak it: and the Treasurer approving of what he said, Mr Rowe took his leave, and immediately retired to a private country farm-house, where in a few months having learnt Spanish, he waited again upon the Earl, to acquaint him with his diligence; whereupon his Lordship asking if he were sure he understood the language thoroughly, and our author answering in the affirmative: that fathomless minister burst out into the following exclamation; How happy are you, Mr Rowe, that you can enjoy the pleasure of reading and understanding Don Quixot in the original (11)!

[F] Several small original poems, &c.] These were published together in one volume, the fourth edition of which was printed in 1740, under the title of The Miscellaneous Works of N. Rowe Esq;. Among them is an epigram upon the union of England and Scotland, in 1707, couched under the emblems of the Rose and Thistle; which we shall insert as being a specimen of our author's talent in Latin poetry, and for that reason a proper part of the character of his genius.

Dum rosa purpureo suffunditur ore rubore,
Spina gravis rutili floris amore calet,
Protinus armorum posuit pacator iras,
Et jam blanda suæ porrigit ora rosæ.
Ut videt alterius ambas concurrere votis
Quæ regit hortarum, Massica Flora, vices,
Felicis jubet, hinc coëant in fœdera, utrisque,
Unus ut ex uno stemmate surgat honos.
Tu decus æternum dixit, mea, da, rosæ, spinæ;
Et tu perpetuam proteges, spinæ, rosam.

[G] Lucan's Pharsalia] Our author, in his last sickness, having desired Dr James Welwood to take the trouble of publishing this book (12), and the dying request was soon after his decease faithfully executed by that friend; who observes, that it was our poet's great love of liberty that inclined him to undertake this task; and that perhaps he was farther animated to it by the conduct of the French translator, Brabeuf, who had the honest boldness to publish such a work in his native language, so diametrically opposite to the maxims of the Prince then reigning, and that too, when all the other classics were published for the use of the Dauphin, and Lucan alone prohibited (13). It is likewise observable, that the Frenchman in some places, has carried the heat of Lucan further than Lucan himself, and by attempting the fire of his author, has fired himself much more. The performance of the Frenchman is however in the main, admirably well done, especially in one passage, which is too one of the finest in the original, as follows.

(12) It is dedicated to the King by his widow, according to our poet's desire.

(13) Preface to Rowe's Lucan. See also the Freeholder, No. 40. by Mr Addison.

Phœnces primi, famæ si creditur, auri
Menfuram rudibus vocem signare figuris.

Thus, in French.

C'est de luy que nous vient cet art ingénieux,
De peindre la parole & de parler aux yeux,
Et par des traits divers des figures tracées,
Donner de la couleur & du corps aux pensées.

We have chosen this passage because of it's excellent imitation by the first Lord Viscount Moleworth's daughter, mentioned in this work (14), who has been thought to transcend Brebeuf, and even Lucan himself. Thus,

The noble art from Cadmus took it's rise,
Of painting words, and speaking to the eyes;
He first in wond'rous magic fetters bound
The airy voice, and stopp'd the flying sound.
The various figures by his pencil wrought,
Gave colour and a body to the thought.

(14) In Lord Moleworth's article, in remark [G].

Lucan was also translated into English by Mr May, in 1635, but his performance does not reach the spirit or sense of Lucan. The language and versification are yet worse, and fall infinitely short of the lofty numbers and propriety of expression in which Mr Rowe excels*. We have already heard Dr Welwood's remark, that our author undertook this task out of his great love for liberty; and the same thing is alluded to by Mr Amherst, in his poem on Mr Rowe's death, as follows.

Such must he be as Lucan was of old,
His figures strong and his expressions bold;
With the same constant love of freedom charm'd,
With the same passion for his country warm'd.

* Mr Addison recommended our author's undertaking, from some specimens which he had before given the world of it; wherein, says that excellent critic, the fire of the original is not only kept up, but the sentiments delivered with greater perspicuity, and in a tenderer turn of phrase and verse. Freeholder, No. 40. for May 7, 1716.

Whose

(9) And songs like similes in love. They much describe, they nothing prove. Prior's Alma.

(10) Pope's Life, Vol. 1. p. 209, 210.

(11) Life of Michael de Cervantes Saavedra, written by Don Gregorio Magoni et Siscar, his Catholic Majesty's Library Keeper, §. 145.

long before his decease, he also attempted something towards a tragedy, upon the story of the Rape of Lucretia [H]. He was twice married; the first time to a daughter of Mr Auditor Parsons, and afterwards to Mrs Devenish, a gentlewoman of a good family in Dorsetshire. By this first match he had a son, and by the second a daughter, who was married to Henry Fane, Esq; (m). He bore his last illness with an exemplary Christian fortitude and resignation [I], 'till it put a period to his life December 6th, 1718, in the 45th year of his age (n). His corpse was interred on the 19th, in Westminster-abbey, over against Chaucer; and Dr Atterbury, Bishop of Rochester and Dean of Westminster, out of a particular mark of esteem for him as a schoolfellow, honoured his ashes by performing the last offices himself (o). There is a sumptuous monument, with an inscription to his memory, erected in that church by his widow [K]. Mr Rowe's person was graceful and well made, his features regular, and his complexion of a manly beauty. The character of his genius is seen in his Works [L]. He was master of most parts of polite learning, especially the classic authors. He understood the French, Italian, and Spanish languages; spoke the first fluently, and the other two tolerably well. He had a good taste in Philosophy, and made great advances therein, at the times when he retired into the country, which were frequent. He had so early imbibed the principles of liberty, and a freedom of thought, that they seemed a part of his constitution, and appeared in all he wrote. He had a hearty affection for the Established Church of England, without condemning or censuring those of another persuasion (p). His conversation either struck out mirth, or promoted learning and honour, wherever he went (q). Envy and detraction bore no part in his natural temper: whatever provocations he met with at any time, he passed them over without the least thought of revenge, or so much as resentment (r). He had

(m) Ibid. See also his monument.

(n) Ibid.

(o) Sewell, ubi supra.

(p) Welwood, p. 24.

(q) Sewell, ubi supra.

(r) Welwood.

(15) Rowe's Miscellaneous Works, in 1740. 4to.

(16) That is, according to the present style. See Pope's Letter to Blunt, dated Feb. 10, 1715-16. Where Pope also declares, there was a vivacity and gaiety of disposition, almost peculiar to Mr Rowe, which made it impossible to part from him, without that uneasiness which generally succeeds all our pleasures. Pope's Works. Vol. VIII. Warburton's edition.

(17) This subject has been managed so, that we have few worse plays all owning that name. Cibber's Lives of the Poets, Vol. IV.

(18) Welwood, as before.

Whose veins with one unvaried temper flow,
Zealous and active like immortal Rowe (15).

[H] The rape of Lucretia ] Our author was in the country with Mr Pope, in the beginning of the year 1716 (16), and during his stay, which was about a week, their conversation often turned upon the subject for a new tragedy. The death of King Charles I. was first spoken of, but it was thought too recent; that the characters of the present age would be touched in those of their families, then engaged in that affair, and perhaps some offence in the free speeches of the republicans given to the Crown; so that was set aside. The author of that play has, and it was a very good thought, introduced the King's children, taking their last leave of him, which alone moved the spectators, and would have done so, had they not spoke a word. Mr Pope advised him to rescue the Queen of Scots out of the hands of Banks, as he had done by the Lady Jane Grey before, which Mr Rowe said he would consider of, but if he should do such a thing, he would by no means introduce Queen Elizabeth: for he said, where Queen Elizabeth appears, all the Queens and Heroines upon earth would make but a little figure. Other subjects were talked of, but what Mr Rowe himself seemed most inclined to, was the Rape of Lucretia; nor was it any objection, that Thomas Heywood, who was a third or fourth rate poet, and an actor, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth and King James, had wrote on the same plot. It is a very great pity, that his ill health, and short time of life, (for he lived but little above two years after) hindered him from putting his design in execution: probably he might be withheld from his ardent desire to finish Lucan before his death. Some few verses he had wrote for the character of Lucretia, but many of the lines were left unfinished; nor did any of them receive the last correction from his hand (17). Though there might be seen in them what intitles Mr Rowe to the character given him by Mr Amherst, in his poem on the death of Mr Addison,

Of soft complaining Rowe.

[I] Fortitude and resignation.] He kept up his good humour to the last, and took leave of his wife and friends immediately before his last agony, with the same tranquillity of mind, and the same unconcern, as if he had been upon taking a short journey (18): So that his last moments confirmed the justness of his thought in those excellent lines in Tamerlane, speaking of death's dark shades; which, says he, seem as we journey on to lose their horror.

At near approach the monsters, form'd by fear,
Are vanish'd all, and leave the prospect clear.

[K] A monument, &c. ] Not long after our author's death, Mr Pope writes to a friend thus.

' Poor Parnelle, Garth, Rowe,
' You justly reprove me for not speaking of the ' death of the last. Parnelle was too much in my ' mind, to whose memory I am erecting the best mo' nument I can, by publishing, at his request, a select ' collection of his writings; yet I have not neglected
' my devoirs to Mr Rowe. I am writing this very ' day, his epitaph for Westminster-Abbey. It is as ' follows.

' Thy reliques, Rowe, to this fair urn we trust,
And sacred place by Dryden's awful dust.
Beneath a rude and nameless stone he lies,
To which thy tomb shall guide enquiring eyes.
Peace to thy gentle shade, and endless rest,
Blest in thy genius, in thy love too blest.
One grateful woman to thy fame supplied,
What a whole thankless land to his denied (19).

(19) Pope's Letters.

But these lines were afterwards changed for those which we see upon the monument.

[L] The character of his genius.] Several particulars of it have been already remarked in the course of this memoir; for the rest, he is generally allowed to have understood a greater variety, and could change the harmony of his lines more, than any other poet, that ever wrote in our language. We shall give the following specimen of this excellence from Jane Shore.

Such is the lot unhappy women find,
And such the curse intail'd upon our kind;
That man, the lawless libertine, may rove,
Free and unquestion'd through the wiles of love;
But woman, sense and nature's easy fool,
If poor weak woman swerve from virtue's rule,
If strongly charm'd, she leaves the thorny way,
And in the softer paths of pleasure stray,
Ruin ensues, reproach, and endless shame,
And one false step intirely damns her fame.
In vain, with tears, her loss she may deplore,
In vain look back to what she was before.

It is even said (and more cannot be said) that though not in beauty, yet in variety of numbers, he surpasses Mr Pope, who often made use of his friendship; and whenever he receiv'd any of his verses, after they had passed Mr Rowe's censure, used to say, they were then like gold three times tried in the fire (20).

(20) Life of Pope, p. 209.

had a natural sweetness and affability, that it was impossible not to be obliged by something in the tone of his voice, so soft and winning, that every body used to be sorry when he left off speaking (s). He had the openness of a Gentleman, the unstudied eloquence of a Scholar, and the perfect freedom of an Englishman (t).

(s) Life of Pope.
(t) Sewall.

ROWE [ELIZABETH], a lady of distinguished parts as well as piety, whose maiden name was SINGER, being the daughter of Mr Walter Singer, a dissenting minister of a good family, and possessed of a competent estate near Frome in Somersetshire (a); but being imprisoned for nonconformity in the reign of King Charles the Second at Ilchester, was visited there by Mrs Elizabeth Portnel, a worthy gentlewoman of the same persuasion in that town, out of compassion for his sufferings in the cause. Hence commenced an acquaintance, which, after several such charitable interviews, terminated in a marriage, the first fruits whereof was our Poetess, who was born on the 11th of September, 1674, at Ilchester, in which town her father resided 'till the death of his wife; but soon after that removed into the neighbourhood of Frome, where his good sense, integrity, prudence, and piety, notwithstanding his religious opinions, recommended him to the particular esteem of Lord Weymouth, a very good judge of men, and his worthy friend, the devout and truly catholic-spirited Bishop Ken, who lived with his Lordship at Long-Leat, and thence frequently visited Mr Singer, sometimes once a week (b). But his chief happiness lay within the pale of his own family [A], especially the subject of the present article; whose uncommon genius and religious disposition opening even in her infant years, must needs give him the most exquisite delight; and the more so, particularly with regard to the latter felicity, as it seems to have been derived, as by hereditary right, from himself [B], since he was religiously inclined when about ten years of age, and from that time never neglected prayer. Accordingly, the daughter received the first serious impressions of religion probably as soon as she was capable of them. My infant bands, says she in one of her pious addresses to God, were early lifted up to thee, and I soon learned to know and acknowledge the God of my Fathers (c) [C]. 'Tis true, devotion is the characteristic of the sex, and is a species of piety not unfrequently united to some very indifferent qualities in their compositions. But Miss Singer's piety knew no such base alloy; for, though the sprightliness and vivacity of her temper, gave her a full relish of life in the midst of all the enjoyments that could make it agreeable (d); as most tender and affectionate parents, easy circumstances, a good constitution, cheerfulness of temper, the love and esteem of all that knew her, and a rising reputation, yet these never betrayed her into any reproachable follies; her heart felt the force of the obligations to her duty, in the same measure as her opening reason discovered them. However, at the same time, 'tis plain from several parts of her devout exercises, that she struggled with the common passions incident to youth, and that she did not attain that superiority of command over them, which constitutes the essence of virtue, and is the perfection of the Christian life, without going through the preceding stages of the Christian warfare (e). In the mean time, her parts kept pace with her piety; and, as her strongest bent was to poetry, she began to write verses at twelve years of age, which was almost as soon as she could write at all. The same turn of genius naturally begat in her a fondness for the sister-arts of music and painting. She took great delight in the former, especially that of the grave and solemn kind, such as best suited to the grandeur of her sentiments, and the sublimity of her devotion. And as to painting, she was more than an admirer; she took up the pencil when she had hardly strength and steadiness of hand sufficient to guide it, and almost in her infancy would squeeze out the juices of herbs to serve her instead of colours. Her father perceiving her fondness for this art, was at the expence of a master to instruct her in it, and it never ceased to be her amusement

(a) Miscellaneous Works of Mrs Eliz. Rowe, &c. with her life prefixed, p. xxxiii. N.B. Most of the particulars of this article are taken thence.

(b) This must be after the Revolution. See Bishop Ken's article.

(c) Devout Exercises, p. 36.

(d) In a familiar letter to a friend she writes, 'I have ease and plenty to the extent of my wishes, and can form desires of nothing but what my father's indulgence would procure.'

(e) See several parts of her Devout Exercises, published by Dr Watts.

at

[A] His chief happiness lay within the pale of his own family.] Besides our authorefs he had two daughters, one of which died in her childhood, and the other survived to her twentieth year, a lovely concurrent with her elder sister, in the race of virtue and glory. She had the same extreme passion for books, chiefly those of medicine, in which she arrived at a considerable skill. Both the sisters frequently studied 'till midnight (1).

[B] Her devotion seems to be derived from her father.] She frequently pleaded her relation to it, and, as it were, glories in it, in her private devotions: the following instance is a specimen. 'I humbly hope, says she, I have a rightful claim. Thou art my God, and the God of my religious ancestors; the God of my mother, the God of my pious father: dying, and breathing out his soul, he gave me to thy care; he put me into thy gracious arms, and delivered me up to thy protection: he told me thou wouldest never leave me, nor forsake me; he triumphed in thy long experienced faithfulness and truth, and gave his testimony for thee with his latest breath (2).

[C] I soon learned to know and acknowledge the God of my fathers.] She devoted herself to the service of heaven, in a solemn covenant, after the example of her pious mother, to whose sacred engagement of this kind, Mrs Rowe made this addition, which appeared, by the hand, to be wrote in her younger years. 'My God, and my father's God, who keepst covenant and mercy to a thousand generations; I call thee to witness, that with all the sincerity of my soul, I consent to this covenant, and stand to the solemn dedication made of me in my baptism. And to this,

I God's high name my awful witness make.

And thus with the utmost willingness and joy, I subscribe, with my hand, to the Lord E. Singer.'

And beneath, in the same paper, she writes thus: renewed September 1728. 'When I am standing before the judge of all the earth, to be sentenced for all eternity, let this contract be an evidence that I renounce the world, and take the supreme God for my portion and happiness (3).' Thus it appears Mrs Rowe's good sense convinced her of the use and advantage of confirmation, and what was denied by the constitution of her Church, to be done publicly, she performed, in as solemn a manner, as could be done privately.

(3) From a MS. of devotional exercises found among her papers after her death by the writer of her Life.

(1) Life of Mrs Eliz. Rowe, ubi supra, p. ix, x.

(2) Devout Exercises of the Heart, published by Dr Watts, p. 129.

at times all her life. But poetry was her favourite employment, in youth her most distinguishing excellence. It was this which first introduced her into the notice of the noble family at Long-Leat. She wrote a small copy of verses, with which they were so highly delighted, as to express a curiosity to see her; and in this visit there commenced a friendship, which subsisted ever after. She was not then twenty. Her paraphrase of the thirty-eighth chapter of Job was wrote at the request of Bishop Ken, who, as we have already observed, was entertained in that family, and gained her a great deal of reputation. She had no other tutor for the French and Italian languages than the honourable Mr Thynne, son to the Lord Viscount Weymouth, who willingly took that task upon himself, and had the pleasure to see his fair scholar improve so fast under his lessons, that in a few months she was able to read Tasso's Jerusalem with great ease (f). In 1696, the 22d of her age, a collection of her poems on various occasions were published at the request of two of her friends, which we may suppose did not contain all that she had by her, since the ingenious prefacer (g) gives the reader to hope, that the author might in a little while be prevailed with to oblige the world with a second part, no way inferior to the former. Her shining merit, and the charms of her person and conversation, had procured her a great many admirers. Among others, 'tis said, the celebrated Matt. Prior would have been glad to share the pleasures and cares of life with her (h); but Mr Thomas Rowe was the person reserved by Heaven to be the happy man, both to be made and to make happy. How she passed her time during the five years of her marriage, will be related in the subsequent article. As the enjoyment she had in possessing him was exquisite, so the grief and affliction she felt for his loss was equally so, as was also the beautiful and unaffected eloquence of her description of it, both in the poem mentioned in the following article, and in several of her letters; and we are assured that she continued to the last moments of her life, to express the highest veneration and affection to his memory, and likewise a particular regard and esteem for his relations, several of whom she honoured with a long and most intimate friendship. Nay, it was but a short time before her death, that she shewed how incapable she was of forgetting him, by shedding fresh tears on occasion of the mention of his name. It was only out of regard to Mr Rowe, that with his society she was willing to bear London during the winter season; and, as soon after his decease as her affairs would permit, she indulged her unconquerable inclinations to solitude, by retiring to Frome in Somersetshire, in the neighbourhood of which place the greater part of her estate lay (i). When she forsook the town, she determined to return to it no more, but to conceal the remainder of her life in an absolute retirement. However, in compliance with the importunate requests of the honourable Mrs Thynne, she passed some months with her at London, after the death of her daughter the Lady Brooke; and, on the melancholy occasion of the decease of Mrs Thynne herself, she could not dispute the commands of the Countess of Hertford, who earnestly desired her to reside some time with her at Marlborough*, to soften, by her conversation and friendship, the severe affliction of the loss of so excellent a mother [D]: and once or twice more, the power this last illustrious

(f) She seems to be entirely unacquainted with the learned languages. Her father, indeed, took the greatest care of her education, first at home, and afterwards sent her to a boarding-school to complete it in all female accomplishments, which he seems to have thought sufficient, without the languages ancient or modern.

(g) Mrs Johnson.

(h) See his article, and his answer to Mrs Rowe's Pastoral on Love and Friendship, both printed in her Miscellanies. Mr Prior has also done justice to the fineness of her genius, in the dedication of his Poems to Lord Dorset; and our authors wrote in 1734, some admirable songs on his Solomon. Miscellanies, p. 166.

(i) This is referred to in note (a), to shew the situation of Mr Singer's estate. The competency of it appears from hence, that it afforded his daughter ease and plenty to the extent of her wishes; and she seems to have supported a gentleman's station and figure with one half of it, the other half being consecrated by her to charitable uses.

* A seat of the Earl of Hertford, afterwards Duke of Somerset; the house is called the Mount; and stands at that end of Marlborough next to Bath.

[D] To soften her affliction at the loss of so excellent a mother.] How capable Mrs Rowe was of performing this latest part of friendship, is evinced by her much admired elegy on the death of this honourable Lady. We shall insert the concluding lines for a reason which will be seen presently after.

- ' But sacred friendship thy superior flame,
- ' Shall time out-live, and be unchang'd the same.
- ' When all the fond relations nature knows,
- ' When all the ties that human laws impose,
- ' Are cancell'd; when the mighty league expires,
- ' That holds the universe, when yon gay fires
- ' Have wasted all their glory; thou shalt rise
- ' In triumph o'er the ruins of the skies:
- ' Thy power, immortal friendship, then confest,
- ' Shall fill with transport every heavenly breast (4).

(4) Rowe's Miscell. Vol. I. p. 156.

Among other admirers of this excellent poem, the Earl of Orrery ought to be particularly distinguished in honour to our poetess. His Lordship, it seems, had then lately lost his own comfort, whereupon he addressed Mrs Rowe in the following lines.

- ' So sweet you sing, so well your Laura paint,
- ' Weep so pathetic a departed saint,
- ' That with fresh rage my sorrows you renew,
- ' And call my Henrietta to my view.
- ' Before my eyes the charmer stands confest,
- ' Again I see her, and again am blest.

- ' Oh, no—the vision's gone—an airy dream,
- ' Rais'd by the magic of your mournful theme.
- ' But since, by fate, we are alike oppress'd,
- ' Since ling'ring sorrows both our minds infest,
- ' From hence let mutual consolation flow,
- ' And let each breast with newborn friendship glow:
- ' Thus when the tedious race of life is run,
- ' And all our fleeting earthly joys are gone,
- ' Together to the realms of light we'll fly,
- ' You to meet Laura, Henrietta, I (5).

(5) Ibid. p. 158. The verses are dated from Marlston, his Lordship's seat, Dec. 17, 1734.

This generous overture was as generously accepted by our poetess, who, in the same vein, inscribed her acceptance to his Lordship thus.

- ' Immortal friendship, thou unblemish'd name,
- ' Why shou'd I fear t' admit thy sacred flame;
- ' Why with fantastic rules thy force controul,
- ' And damp the noble ardour in my soul?
- ' When thou art banish'd from the human breast,
- ' Envy and rage the gloomy seat infest.
- ' Thy gentle warmth inspires the worlds above,
- ' Those pure abodes of innocence and love.
- ' Then come, a welcome inmate, to my breast,
- ' And be thy power thro' all my soul confest.
- ' When such distinguish'd merit is in view,
- ' The sacred tribute is intirely due (6).

(6) Ibid. p. 160.

illustrious lady had over Mrs Rowe, drew her, by an obliging kind of violence, to spend a few months with her at some of the Earl of Hertford's seats in the country; yet even on these occasions, she never quitted her retreat without very sincere regret; and always returned to it again, as soon as ever she could with decency disengage herself from the importunity of her noble friends. It was in this recess, that she composed the most celebrated of her works, Friendship in Death, and the several parts of the letters moral and entertaining. In 1736, the importunity of some of Mrs Rowe's acquaintance, who had seen the history of Joseph in manuscript, prevailed on her to suffer it, though not without reluctance, to be made public. She wrote this piece in her younger years, and, when first printed, had carried it on no farther than the marriage of the heroine of the poem; but, at the request of her friends (particularly the Countess of Hertford, to whom she could scarce refuse any thing), that the relation might include Joseph's discovery of himself to his brethren, she added two other books; the composing whereof, 'tis said, was no more than the labour of three or four days. This additional part, which was her last work, was published but a few weeks before her death. That grand event, to prepare for which she had made so much business of her life, befel her, according to her wish, in her beloved recess. She was favoured with an uncommon strength of constitution, and had passed a long series of years, with scarce any indisposition severe enough to confine her to her bed (k). But about half a year before her decease she was attacked with a distemper, which expressed herself as well as others, attended with danger: though this disorder, as she expressed herself to one of her most intimate friends, found her mind not quite so serene and prepared to meet death as usual; yet when by devout contemplations on the atonement and mediation of our Saviour, she had fortified herself against that fear and diffidence, from which the most exalted piety does not always secure in such an awful hour, she experienced such divine satisfaction and transport, that she said with tears of joy, she knew not that she had ever felt the like in all her life. And she repeated on this occasion Mr Pope's verses, entitled, The Dying Christian to his Soul, with an air of such intense pleasure, as evidenced that she really felt all the elevated sentiments of pious extasy and triumph, which breathe in that exquisite piece of sacred poetry. After this threatening illness, Mrs Rowe recovered her usual good state of health, and though at the time of her decease she was pretty far advanced in age (l), yet her exact temperance, and the calmness of her mind, undisturbed by uneasy cares and passions, encouraged her friends to flatter themselves with a much longer enjoyment of so valuable a life, than it pleased heaven to allow them. On the day in which she was seized with that distemper, which in a few hours proved mortal, she seemed to those about her to be in perfect health and vigour. In the evening, at about eight o'clock, she conversed with a friend in all her usual vivacity, and not without laughter; after which she retired to her chamber. About ten her servant, hearing some noise in her mistress's room, ran instantly into it, and found her fallen off the chair on the floor, speechless, and in the agonies of death. She had the immediate assistance of a physician and a surgeon, but all the means used were without success, and after having given one groan she expired, a few minutes before two o'clock on Sunday morning, February 20. 1736-7. Her disease was judged to be an apoplexy. A pious book was found lying open by her (m), as also some loose papers on which she had wrote some unconnected sentences [E]. As she was greatly apprehensive that the violence of pain, or languors of a sick-bed, might occasion some depression of spirits, and melancholy fears, unsuitable to the character and expectations of a Christian, her manuscript book of devotions contains frequent petitions to heaven that she might not, in this manner, dishonour her profession; and to her friends she often expressed herself desirous of a sudden removal to the skies, as it must necessarily prevent any such indecent behaviour in her last moments: so that the suddenness of Mrs Rowe's death may be interpreted as a reward of her singular piety, and a mark of the divine favour in answer to her prayers [F]. She

(k) I suppose the small-pox is one of the exceptions here intimated by the word scarce; on her recovery from that distemper, she wrote a hymn of thanks, which is printed in her Miscellanies, Vol. I. p. 94. and there is an excellent ode on the occasion, addressed to her by Mr Standon, dated September 8, 1712, and subjoined to the account of her Life, p. ci, cii, ciii, civ.

(l) She died in what is often called the grand climacteric, that is, the 63d year of her age.

(m) It contained some meditations on religious subjects; but the book was lost, nor could the title be exactly remembered by those who were about her at the time of her death.

The friendship thus commenced, did not fail to continue as long as Mrs Rowe lived, who distinguished his Lordship among those friends to whom she addressed letters to be delivered immediately after her death. That to the Earl of Orrery, begins thus.

My Lord,

There seems to be something presaging in the message you ordered me to deliver to your charming Henrietta, when I met her gentle spirit in the blissful regions, which I believe will be very soon. I am now acting the last part of life.—The nearer I am approaching to immortality, the more extensive and enlarged I find the principles of amity and good will in my soul: from hence arise the most sincere wishes for your happiness, and of the charming pledges your lovely Henrietta left, &c. (7).

[E] Some loose papers, on which she had wrote some unconnected sentences.] These were as follow.

O guide, and counsel, and protect my soul from sin!
O speak, and let me know thy heavenly will!

Speak evidently to my list'ning soul!
O fill my soul with love, and light, and peace,
And whisper heav'nly comfort to my soul!
O speak, celestial spirit, in the strain
Of love, and heav'nly pleasure, to my soul!

There was a few more lines, but so ill wrote, occasioned perhaps by the trembling of her hand, at the approach of death, that no consistent sense could be made of them (8).

[F] The suddenness of Mrs Rowe's death may be interpreted a mark of the divine favour.] This was very well expressed by Mr Grove in a letter to a friend soon after her decease. 'Though her death, says he, be universally lamented, yet the manner of it is rather to be esteemed a part of her happiness. One moment to enjoy this life, the next, or after a pause, we are not sensible of, to find ourselves got beyond, not only the fears of death, but death itself; and in possession of everlasting life, and health, and pleasure: this moment to be devoutly addressing ourselves

(8) Ib. p. xxxviii.

(7) Mrs Rowe's Life, p. xlv, xlvi.

(n) I would lie, says she in her last orders, in my father's grave, and have no stone nor inscription. Life, p. lxxi.

(o) But the left a particular charge that he should not say one word of her in his sermon. Ibid.

(p) That to Lord Orrery has been already mentioned in remark [D]. The rest were to the Countess of Hertford, Mr James Theobald, and Mrs Sarah Rowe her mother-in-law, to Dr Watts, printed before her devotions, and another of a private nature to her brother-in-law, who wrote her life.

(q) Dryden's expressions concerning Plutarch.

(r) The love of solitude discovered itself very early, and never forsook her but with life. Before her marriage, she had only made a short visit to the town of a few weeks, and, after Mr Rowe's decease, she devoted the remainder of her days more strongly to retirement. Life, p. lvi.

She was buried according to her request under the same stone with her father, in the meeting-place at Frome, on which occasion her funeral sermon was preached to a very crowded audience, by Mr Bowden (o). Her death was lamented with very uncommon and remarkable sorrow, by all who had heard of her virtue and merit, but particularly by those of the town, where she had so long resided, and her most intimate acquaintance. Above all, the news of her death touched the poor and distressed with inexpressible affliction: and at her doors and over her grave, they bewailed the loss of their benefactress, poured blessings on her memory, and recounted to each other the gentle and condescending manner with which she heard their requests, and the numerous instances in which they had experienced her unexampled goodness and bounty. In her cabinet were found letters to the Countess of Hertford, the Earl of Orrery, and to some others of her friends, for whom she had an high esteem and affection, which she had ordered to be delivered immediately after her decease to the persons to whom they were directed, and by their permission were communicated to the public by the writer of her life (p). Her friendships were founded on virtue, but not a perfect agreement in those lesser matters, which divide us as Christians and Englishmen; in which she shewed a generous mind, elevated above the mean principles of party and bigotry. She was favoured with the esteem and acquaintance of the Countess of Winchelsea, the Viscountess Weymouth, the Viscountess Scudamore, the Lady Carteret, the Lady Brooke, the honourable Mrs Thynne, the Earl of Orrery, Dr Ken, Bishop of Bath and Wells, Sir Richard Blackmore, Dr Watts, Mr Prior, Mr Grove, &c. But above all she possessed the highest degree of friendship with another illustrious ornament of the age, a friendship which began as soon as ever her Ladyship was capable of this generous passion, and continued without the least interruption to the last moments of Mrs Rowe's life; and it is none of the least testimonies of her virtue and merit, that her life was honoured with the friendship, and her death lamented with the tears of the Countess of Hertford. A life like Mrs Rowe's, passed in almost perpetual retirement, furnishes but few facts. It was not busy with accidents to divert the reader. It was more pleasant for herself to live, than for an historian to describe (q). For this reason the writer of her life has enlarged the more upon her character, which represents what she was every day, and which he thinks could not be shortened without injustice to herself and to the world. It is in substance as follows: As to her person, Mrs Rowe was not a regular beauty, yet she possessed a large measure of the charms of her sex. She was of a moderate stature, her hair of a fine auburn colour, and her eyes of a darkish grey, inclining to blue, and full of fire. Her complexion was very fair, and a natural rosy blush glowed in her cheeks. She spoke gracefully, and her voice was exceeding sweet and harmonious, and perfectly suited to that gentle language which always flowed from her lips. But the softness and benevolence of her aspect is beyond all description. It inspired irresistible love, yet not without some mixture of that awe and veneration which distinguished sense and virtue apparent in the countenance are wont to create. Her acquaintance with the Great had taught her all the accomplishments of good breeding, and without formality or affectation, she practised in a distant solitude all the address and politeness of a court. The labours of the toilette consumed very little of her time. She despised the arts of dress and ornament, yet without falling into the other extreme of indecent negligence. She lived a recluse ascetic (r), without growing austere. On the contrary, she was as exemplary for every social virtue and good nature, as for the exact sanctity of her manners. And though the sins of the flesh attended with less degrees of guilt, than the vices of the spirit, and those of a graver sort. She had such a command over her passions, that it has been questioned, whether she was ever angry in her whole life. No one had reason to wish her wit less. For, together with the most manly genius, she possessed all that gentleness and softness, which gives the sex such irresistible charms. Next to lewd and profane writings, she expressed the strongest aversion to satire; as being usually replete with personal malice and invective. No strokes of this kind can be found in her works, and her conversation was not less innocent of every appearance of ill nature, than her writings. Scandal and detraction, so incident to the sex, appeared to her extreme inhumanity, which no charms of wit and politeness could make tolerable. She had few equals in her excellent turn for conversation. Her wit was inexhaustible, and she expressed her thoughts in the most beautiful and flowing eloquence. Though her wit, beauty, and merit, had even from her youth conciliated to her much compliment and praise, and from such judges of worth as might have made some degree of vanity seem almost pardonable in a lady and an author, yet she retained all the humility of the meanest and most obscure person. She was perfectly untainted with the love of pleasure; she was even ignorant of every polite and fashionable game. She had no relish for novels and romances, and abstained entirely from the entertainments of the theatre. The native grandure of her soul, preserved her from any kind of luxury. She was always to God, or employed in delightful meditations on his perfections, the next in his presence, and surrounded with scenes of bliss perfectly new, and unspeakably joyous; is a way of departing out of life to be desired, not dreaded by ourselves, and felicitated, not condoled by our surviving friends. When all things are in a readiness for our removal out of the world, 'tis a privilege to be spared the sad ceremony of parting, and all the pains and struggles of feeble nature (9).

(9) P. xxxix. Mr Grove was a relation by his mother's side to Mrs Rowe. See his article in Vol. IV. To which we shall add, that he wrote part of Mrs Rowe's Life, and would have finished it had not death prevented him. The Life, p. xxix. note (*).

[G] Sbe

always pleased with whatever she found on her table, and neither the nature of her food nor manner of dressing it, gave her any uneasiness. She despised formal visits; and indeed, except drawing, she had almost an equal distaste for every thing, that bears the name of diversion and amusement, even of the most innocent kind. She had a contempt of riches that has been rarely equalled (s). As she was much pleased with her own moderate fortune, so she never pursued any designs to advance it. She could not be persuaded to publish her works by subscription, or even to accept some advantageous terms offered her by the Bookseller, if she would permit her scattered pieces to be collected and published together (t). She wrote no dedication to the Great, and the name of no minister of state is to be found in her works. She never saw a court. She wrote no preface to any of her works to prepossess the public in their favour, nor suffered them to be accompanied with panegyrics of her friends. She would not indeed so much as allow her name to be prefixed to any of them, except some few poems in the earlier part of her life; and though this was the occasion that a beautiful pastoral of her's was ascribed to another hand, she would not alter the modesty of her conduct [G].—Mrs Rowe was exemplary for every relative duty. Filial piety was a remarkable part of her character [H], and the highest esteem and most tender affection appeared in all her conduct to her husband (u). She was a gentle and kind mistress (w); a warm and generous friend; so generous, that there was not perhaps one of her friends in any rank of life, who did not experience her beneficent disposition, by receiving from her presents of books, pictures, &c. if not gifts of higher value. But her charity exceeded every other principle. The exercise of this god-like virtue was half the pleasure of her life, and she solemnly consecrated half of her yearly income to charitable uses; besides which, she employed her own hands in providing cloaths for the necessitous. Nor was her beneficence limited only to those, who in strict terms might be called poor. She was wont to say, It was one of the greatest benefits that could be done to mankind, to free them from the cares and anxieties that attend a narrow fortune. And in these cases she knew how to heighten every favour, by the ready and obliging manner in which she conferred it. She even studied to spare their blushes, while she softened their adversity. For instance, when one such person of her acquaintance was in some distress, she contrived to lose at play a sum of money sufficient to supply the necessity of the case. This was perhaps the only time she touched a card in her life. 'Tis astonishing how the moderate estate she was possessed of, could supply such various and expensive benefactions; and her own sense of this, once broke out to an intimate friend. I am surprized, said she to her, how it is possible my estate should answer all these things, and yet I never want money! But the truth is, that to enlarge her abilities of doing good, she denied herself what might in some sense be called the real necessaries of life. Mrs Rowe's charity could be exceeded only by her piety, from whence it flowed as from it's genuine principle.

(s) She carried this, poet-like, to excess. She did not know her own estate from others, 'till some motives of prudence obliged her to inform herself when she apprehended she was soon to leave them. She also let her estates under value, as appeared by the considerable advance of the rents after her decease. Life, p. lxvii, lxviii.

(u) See several instances of this in the ensuing article.

(t) The first time she accepted of a gratification from the Bookseller for any of her Works, she bestowed the whole sum on a family in distress. Ibid. p. lxxix.

(w) None of her servants ever quitted the service, except on account of their marriage. Ibid.

[G] She would not alter the modesty of her conduct. Dr Young was the author of the preface to Friendship in Death: and the last of her writings, which, by her consent, appeared in public under her own name, were some copies of verses printed in the miscellanies in 1704. Sir Richard Steele when he published the pastoral mentioned above in his poetical miscellanies, ascribed it to the author of the anonymous verses before the tragedy of Cato. When she intended to publish Friendship in Death, she shewed the manuscript to no more than one person, on whose secrecy she could rely; and after he had, by her order, copied it in his own hand, she sent it to Dr Young, only knowing him by his works, and inscribed her name to the dedication, in hopes, that being published by him, and appearing under the patronage of his name, all her acquaintance would imagine the piece to be written by some friend of that eminent poet. And when the particular beauties of her manner of writing discovered the true author, and this performance began to be universally admired, she still continued to avoid owning it, as far as was consistent with a strict regard to truth. Moreover, when she selected from her manuscript volumes of devotions some exercises of piety, with a view to their publication after her decease, she studiously omitted those parts that would have discovered her unexampled charity, and other virtues, which conciliate the esteem and veneration of the world (10).

[H] Filial piety was a remarkable part of her character. She loved the best of fathers as she ought, and repaid his uncommon care and tenderness, by just returns of duty and gratitude. She had been heard to say, that she could die rather than displease him. In a memorandum relating to his last sickness and death, are these words. 'My father often felt his pulse, and complained that 'twas still regular, and smiled at every symptom of approaching death: he would be often crying out, Come Lord Jesus, come quickly: come ye holy angels, that rejoice at the conversion of a sinner, come and conduct my soul to the skies, ye propitious spirits; and then would add. But thy time, Lord, not mine, is best. When shall I awake, and be satisfied with thy likeness? What is death? I never made the experiment, and nobody about me knows, when persons are dying. I have heard of jaws falling, and eye-strings cracking, but where are the tokens? and yet nature fails, and I am dying. I have seen people die without half so much ado, just lean back, and having fetched a calm sigh, expire.' Hence it appears he was in great pain, and the anguish she felt at seeing him in it was so great, that it occasioned some kind of convulsion, a disorder from which she was wholly free in every other part of her life. He died April 18. 1719 (11). I know divines generally agree in the opinion, that such persons as happily die the death of the righteous, may, and some actually have had some antepasts of their future blessedness, especially on their death-bed. However that be, surely Mr Rowe's behaviour, as here described by his daughter, favours somewhat of the fanatic, which perhaps will be thought not quite so excusable in him, as a divine, as it was in his daughter, who copied his example both by influence and hereditary constitution. This foible is intimated by Dr Watts, who insinuates that her devout expressions are often a little too rapturous; and he has made the best excuse for it, that 'if her style was raised above that of common meditation or soliloquy, it must be remembered that she was no common Christian. As her virtues were sublime, so her genius was bright and sparkling (12), and sometimes she was herself not insensible of it. In a letter to a lady, sent with one of these sacred meditations, she thus expresses herself. 'You will find by the inclosed, how my thoughts were employed in the little fit of sickness which lately confined me. There is, I confess, something so glittering and romantic in this description of a future state, that I am afraid you will think I have been reading the Alcoran, and am become a profelyte to the Turkish religion.'

(11) P. v, vi, and lxxi.

(12) Preface to Devout Exercises, p. 11.

(10) Ibid. p. lxxix, lxxx.

principle. In reality, she seemed born for the practice of sublime and ascetic piety, 'twas the supreme pleasure of her life. Yet she did not set too high a value on strong emotions of the passions, and religious fervors; nor was tempted by the love of devotion, to prefer it to social virtue. She affected no kind of singularity, or appearance of severity, nor presumed to censure those who came not up to that strictness, to which she obliged herself. She possessed a large measure of that serenity and cheerfulness of temper, which seem naturally to flow from conscious virtue, and the hopes of the divine favour. This happy disposition of mind continued to her last moments, and was never interrupted by any of those fantastic disorders, that so often cloud the imaginations of the softer sex; so that excepting the intervals of sorrow, occasioned by her devout and compassionate dispositions, and just affliction for the loss of Mr Rowe, and Mr Singer; her whole life seemed to be not only a constant calm, but a perpetual sunshine, and every hour of it sparkled with good humour, and inoffensive gaiety. Her love of piety was not confined to those of her own party in religion, it was truly Catholic (x), and it is mentioned as an exemplary instance of her Christian moderation, that she continued all the latter part of her life in constant communion with persons who differed from her in some, which she thought, important articles; though she was frequently solicited to an opposite conduct, by persons of a more narrow spirit; and could not escape censure, for her adherence to the charity of the gospel (y). And, as her zeal did in no part of her life degenerate into religious fury, so, towards the close of it, her gentle and charitable dispositions increased, and she seemed to be visibly ripening into the temper of that blessed region to which she was soon to be removed. Though her several works have been occasionally cited in the course of this memoir, yet it may not be amiss to throw them here together in one view, as follows. (1) Poems on several occasions, published in 1696, 8vo. under the fictitious name of Philomela. These she afterwards in her maturer years condemned, as juvenile follies, to oblivion. (2) Friendship in Death, &c. 1728, 8vo. (3) Letters, moral and entertaining, in Prose and Verse; Part I. 1724. Part II. 1731. Part III. 1733, 8vo. (4) The History of Joseph, 1736. (5) Devout Exercises of the Heart, &c. published by Isaac Watts, D. D. Lond. 1737, and again, 1739. (6) The Miscellaneous Works, in Prose and Verse, of Mrs Elizabeth Rowe: to which are added, Original Poems, and Translations, by Mr Thomas Rowe, &c. To the whole is prefixed an account of the Lives and Writings of the Authors. Lond 1739. in 2 Vol. 8vo. (z), [by Mr Theophilus Rowe] who observes, that his sister-in-law's exquisite wit and delicate imagination was scarce any thing indebted to the assistance of art or labour. She read no critics, nor could her genius brook the discipline of rules; and, as the pains of correcting appeared to her some kind of drudgery, she seldom made any great alterations in her compositions, from what they were when the first gave copies of them to her friends: for she did not set so high a value on her works, as to employ much labour in finishing them with the utmost accuracy; and she wrote verses through inclination, and rather as an amusement, than as a study and profession, to excel in which she should make the business of her life (aa).

Such a very extraordinary character, naturally raises a curiosity to know something of that person whom she thought worthy to possess her charms; for which reason we shall give some account of him in the next article. P

ROWE [THOMAS], a gentleman of learning and genius, and a poet too of no inconsiderable rank, was of a genteel descent both on the father's and mother's side, being grandson of William Rowe, Esq; a gentleman of worth and considerable estate, and Alice, a lady of distinguished sense, beauty, and virtue, daughter of Thomas Scott, Esq; Member of Parliament for Aylebury in Buckinghamshire (a): and the eldest son of the Rev. Mr Benoni Rowe, a dissenting clergyman, who, to a very accurate judgment, and a considerable stock of useful learning, joined the talents of preaching, and a most lively and engaging manner in conversation. Our author was born at London, on the 25th of April, 1687. His genius and inclination to literature were conspicuous in his earliest years. He was able to read as soon almost as he could speak; and had such a pleasure in books, as to take none at all in the diversions which children are so fond of: and when he was sometimes prevailed on to make one in the recreations of his companions, his unreadiness and inattention plainly shewed it was not out of choice he engaged, but purely from good-nature, which would not suffer him always to resist their importunity. He commenced his acquaintance with the classics at Epfom in Surry, while his father resided there; and, by the swift advances in that part of learning, quickly became the delight of his master, a man very able in his profession, who, in spite of the natural ruggedness and severity of his temper, treated this scholar with a very particular indulgence. After some time, his father removing to London, placed him under the famous Dr Walker, Master of the Charter-house school (b). His exercises here never failed of being distinguished, even among those that had the approbation of that excellent master, who would fain have persuaded his father to send him to one of our English universities; but this not being agreeable to Mr Rowe's principles, he chose to enter him in a private academy in London, and sent him from thence to Leyden. Here he studied Jewish Antiquities under Witfius, Civil Law under Vitriarius, the Belles Lettres under Perizonius, and Experimental Philosophy under Senguerdius; and established a reputation for capacity, diligence, and

(x) She once resolved to receive the Sacrament in the Church of England, and attended the preceding service with that intent; but the sermon happening to be animated with more zeal against her sect than was agreeable, she would not stay the Communion.

(z) In this collection are reprinted all the poems of her's that had been before inserted in other miscellanies.

(aa) Life, p. liv.

(a) By the maternal side he was descended from the Rowes of Devon, of which some account may be seen in the article of Nicolas Rowe, Esq;

(b) Author of Walker's Particles, a well known useful school-book, which has gone through many editions.

(y) This allusion probably to that schism which broke out in those days among her sect upon the subject of the Trinity, when both parties excommunicated each other, while the cooler heads among them took occasion thence to extol the moderation of the Church of England, in regard to the disputes on the same subject.

and an obliging deportment both among the professors and students. He returned from that celebrated mart of learning, with a vast accession of treasure both in books [A] and in knowledge, and entirely uncorrupt in his morals, which he had preserved as inviolate as he could have done under the most vigilant eye, though left without any restraints but those of his own virtue and prudence (c). In the interim he lost his father, but not before he was fixed in the same religious as well as political principles. Under these influences, he became very uneasy, not long after his return home in 1708, to see the Tories growing into power. To these measures he opposed himself with a zeal, which might have had more influence, indeed, in a higher sphere, but could not have been more honest and open. Being at Bath in 1709, he was introduced, by a gentleman of her acquaintance, into the company of Mrs Singer, who lived in a retirement not far from that city. The idea he conceived of her from report, and from her writings, charmed him; but when he had seen and conversed with her, he felt another kind of impression, from the presence of so much beauty, wit, and virtue; and notwithstanding the disparity of age (d), the esteem of the theorist was converted into the rapture of a lover. Love is the daintiest food of poetry. During the courtship, our innamorato wrote a poetical epistle to a friend that was a neighbour of Mrs Singer, and intimate in the family; a few lines of which are inserted below, as a specimen both of his poetical genius, and the turn of his passion [B], which cannot fail of engaging the attention so much more, as it prevailed with the dear object to gratify it in a marriage, which was celebrated in 1710. On which occasion, a learned friend of Mr Rowe's wrote a Latin epigram, the beauty and elegance whereof deserves a place in this memoir [C]. Mrs Rowe's exalted merit and amiable qualities could not fail to inspire the most generous and lasting passion; and Mr Rowe knew how to value that treasure of wit, softness, and virtue, which Divine Providence had given to his arms in the most lovely of women, and made it his study to repay the felicity with which she crowned his life. The esteem and tenderness he had for her is inexpressible, and possession seemed scarce to have abated the fondness and admiration of the lover. 'Twas some considerable time after his marriage, that he wrote to her, under the name of Delia, a very tender ode, full of the warmest sentiments of connubial friendship and affection [D].—At the same time, and in like manner, his desires after knowledge increased with his acquisitions, instead of abating: all his morning hours, and a large part of the afternoon, were devoted to study. He had a penetration and quickness of thought, hardly to be imagined, so as upon just glancing over an author, to see to the bottom of his sentiments. None of the politer kinds of learning were neglected

(c) Viz. By the constitution of that and all other foreign universities: A fault which is provided against only in our own at home.

(d) He was only 22 years of age, and she 35, an old maid, but had all the vivacity and sprightfulness of youth. See his ode, in remark [B].

[A] A great treasure of books. His library, in collecting which he was assisted by his great knowledge in the best editions of books, consisted of a great number of the most valuable authors; and as he was making continual additions to it, amounted at his death to above five thousand volumes (1).

[B] A few lines of it below ] They are as follow.

- Youth's liveliest bloom, a never-fading grace,
- And more than beauty sparkles in her face;
- Yet the bright form creates no loose desires,
- At once she gives and purifies our fires,
- And passions chaste as her own soul inspires.
- Her soul heaven's noblest workmanship design'd,
- To bless the ruin'd age, and succour lost mankind;
- To prop abandon'd virtue's sinking cause,
- And snatch from vice it's undeserv'd applause (2).

[C] A beautiful epigram in Latin on their marriage. The author of the epigram was Mr John Ruffel, who inscribed it thus.

In nuptias Thomæ Rowe & Elizabethæ Singer.

*Quid doctum par usque tuum sociosque labores
Fabræ & Dacerii, Gallia vana crepas?
Par majus gens Angla dedit, juvenem atque puellam, Quos hodie sacro foedere junxit amor.
Namque ea, quæ nostri Phæbo cecinere docente,
Explicuisse tuis gloria summa foret.*

Thus translated by a young gentleman.

On the marriage of Mr Thomas Rowe and Mrs Elizabeth Singer.

No more, proud Gallia, bid the world revere,
Thy learned pair, Le Fevre, and Dacier;

*Britain may boast, this happy day unites,
Two nobler minds in Hymen's sacred rites:
What these have sung, while all th' inspiring Nine,
Exalt the beauties of the verse divine;
These (humble critics of th' immortal strain)
Shall bound their fame to comment and explain.*

[D] An ode full of the warmest sentiments of conjugal friendship and affection. The following lines from it are inserted, as they serve to shew how sensible Mr Rowe was of the little prospect he had from the weakness of his constitution, to live long in the possession of his charming consort.

So, long may thy inspiring page,
And great example, bless the rising age!
Long in thy charming prison, may'st thou stay;
Late, very late, ascend the well-known way,
And add new glories to the realms of day.
At least, heaven will not sure this prayer deny,
Short be my life's uncertain date,
And earlier far than thine, the destined hour of fate!
Whene'er it comes, may'st thou be by,
Support my sinking frame, and teach me how to die;
Banish desponding nature's gloom,
Make me to hope a gentle doom;
And fix me all on joys to come!
With swimming eyes, I'll gaze upon thy charms,
And clasp thee dying, in my fainting arms:
Then gently leaning on thy breast,
Sink in soft slumbers to eternal rest.
The ghastly form shall have a pleasing air,
And all things smile, whilst heav'n and thou art there.

[E] Eight

(1) Life of Mrs Rowe, p. xxiii.

(2) See the whole epistle in Mrs Rowe's Miscellanies, Vol. II.

neglected by him. He was a good judge in poetry, and had it in his power to have been an eminent poet, for he had actually the most essential parts belonging to that character, the vivid fire, the rich vein, the copious diction: but as poetry was not his predominant inclination, his genius had not all the polishing, which art and constant practice might have added to nature (c). History was his favourite study, for which his talents of a vast memory, and an exquisite judgment, for one of his years, peculiarly qualified him. He had formed a design to compile the lives of all the illustrious persons in antiquity, omitted by Plutarch; and in that view read the ancient historians with great care. This design he in part executed. Eight lives were finished by him [E]; in which, though so young a guide, he strikes out his way like one well acquainted with the dark and intricate paths of antiquity. The style is perfectly easy, yet concise and nervous; the reflections just, and such as might be expected from a lover of truth, and mankind; and the facts interesting in themselves, are made more so, by his skill in relating them. As Mr Rowe had not naturally a strong constitution, so an intense application to study, beyond what the delicacy of his frame would bear, might perhaps contribute to that ill state of health, which allayed the happiness of his married life during the greater part of it. In the latter end of the year 1714, his weakness increased, and he appeared to labour under all the symptoms of a consumption. That fatal distemper, after some months confinement, cut off the fairest hopes of his doing great honour and service to his country, and put a period to his life on the thirteenth of May 1715, when he was but just past the twenty-eighth year of his age. An age when all the faculties, in a state of health, are in full bloom, for relishing the enjoyments of life, and which was rendered exquisite to the highest degree by Mrs Rowe, who, from her entrance into a marriage-state, evinced the highest esteem and most tender affection to him, in all her conduct; and by the most gentle and obliging manners, and the exercise of every social and good natured virtue, confirmed the empire she had gained over his heart. She complied with his inclination in several instances, to which she was naturally averse; and made it her study to soften the anxieties, and heighten all the satisfactions of his life. Her capacity for superior things, did not tempt her to neglect the less honourable, which the laws of decency impose on the softer sex, in the connubial relation: much less was she led, by a sense of her own great merit, to assume any thing to herself inconsistent with that duty and submission, which the precepts of Christian piety so strictly enjoin. Mr Rowe had some mixture of natural warmth in his temper, of which he had not always a perfect command: if at any time this broke out into some little excesses of anger, it never awaked any passion of the like kind in Mrs Rowe: but, on the contrary, she always remained mistress of herself, and studied by the gentlest language, and most soothing endearments, to restore Mr Rowe's mind to a reasonable calmness. And she equally endeavoured, in every other instance, by the softest arts of persuasion, and in a manner remote from all airs of superiority, to lead Mr Rowe on to that perfection of virtue, to which she herself aspired with the truest Christian zeal. During his long illness she scarce ever stirred from him a moment, and alleviated his severe affliction, by performing with inconceivable tenderness and assiduity, all the offices of compassion [F], suited to that melancholy season. She partook his sleepless nights, and never quitted his bed, unless to serve him, or watch by him. And as she could scarce be persuaded to forsake even his breathless clay, so she consecrated her future years to his memory, by honouring his ashes with resolutions of perpetual widowhood, which she inviolably maintained. He died at Hampstead, near London, where he had resided some time for the benefit of the air, and was buried in the vault belonging to his family, in the cœmety in Bunhill-Fields. Where on his tomb were only marked his name, and the date of his birth and death. But an inscription of greater pomp was rendered unnecessary, by the honour Mrs Rowe did to his memory in the elegy she wrote on his death, which is deservedly ranked among the most celebrated of her poetical works. Thus much is observed of Mr Rowe, that he was a perfect master of the Greek, Latin, and French languages;

(c) His poetical pieces are inserted in Mrs Rowe's Miscellanies, under the title Select Poems on Several Occasions, by Mr Tho Rowe, of which two only small translations from the French of Madam Des Houlières were printed in his life time. Life of Mrs Rowe, p. lii.

[E] Eight lives were finished. These were published after his decease by way of supplement to Plutarch, with a preface, by the reverend and learned Mr Chandler. Besides these eight, our author had finished, and fitted for the press, the life of Thrasibulus, which being put into the hands of Sir Richard Steele, for his revival, was somehow or other unhappily lost, and never since recovered. The famous Dacier having translated Plutarch's Lives into French, with remarks, historical and critical, the Abbé Bellenger (3), added, in 1734, a ninth tome to the other eight, consisting of the life of Hannibal, and Mr Rowe's lives, made French, by that learned Abbé.

[F] Performing—all the offices of compassion. We have no account of the particulars of Mr Rowe's behaviour, under his last illness, except his last words to his beloved attendant, which it would be an injustice to both to omit, as recorded by her in the elegy on his death; which, though cloaked in a poetical dress, no doubt, had a proper foundation in truth. They are as follow.

My dearest wife, my last, my fondest care!
 Sure heaven for thee will hear a dying prayer.
 Be thou the charge of sacred Providence,
 When I am gone, be that thy kind defence:
 Ten thousand smiling blessings crown thy head;
 When I am cold, and number'd with the dead.
 Think on thy vows. Be to my memory just,
 My future fame and honour are thy trust.
 From all engagements here, I now am free,
 But that which keeps my ling'ring soul with thee.
 How much I love, thy bleeding heart can tell,
 Which does like thine, the pangs of parting feel.
 But haste to meet me on those happy plains,
 Where mighty love, in endless triumph reigns.
 He ceased. Then gently yielded up his breath,
 And fell a blooming sacrifice to death.

[A] For

(3) Well known, such the Journal des Savans, in the republic of letters, by some works that do him honour.

languages ; and had at once such a prodigious strength of memory, and an inexhaustible fund of wit, as would singly have afforded a stock of reputation for any man to trade upon, and much more to write. This, with an easy fluency of words, the frankness and benevolence of his temper, a readiness to communicate of his learned store, and a life and spirit which nature must bestow, since it can be but poorly imitated, made his company universally courted and prized by those that knew him. 'Twas impossible there should be a drowsy soul where Mr Rowe was present : he animated the conversation, every one was awake, and every one pleased.

RUSHWORTH [JOHN], author of the useful Historical Collections, &c. was born in, or about, the year 1607 (a). His father and mother were both natives of Yorkshire, and of an antient family ; but they resided then in Northumberland, tho' we are not told in what particular place. Towards the end of King James the first's reign, he was a student in the University of Oxford. Soon after, he left it without being matriculated, and entering himself in Lincoln's-inn, continued there 'till he became a Barrister. But his genius leading him more to state-affairs than the common-law (b), he ' began, early, to ' take, in characters, or short-hand, Speeches and passages at Conferences in parliament, and ' from the King's own mouth when he spake to both Houses ; and was upon the stage ' continually, an eye and ear witness of the greatest transactions. He did also personally ' attend and observe all occurrences of moment, during the eleven years interval of Par- ' liament from 1630 to 1640, in the Star-chamber, Court of honour, and Exchequer- ' chamber, when all the Judges of England met there upon extraordinary cases ; at the ' Council-table, when great causes were heard before the King and Council. And when ' matters were agitated at a greater distance, he was there also, and went on purpose, out ' of curiosity, to see and observe the passages of the camp at Berwick, at the fight at ' Newborn, at the treaty at Rippon, and at the great Council at York (c). On the 25th of April 1640, he was admitted Clerk-assistant to Henry Elsyng, Esq; Clerk of the House of Commons (d), by which means he became acquainted with the debates in the House, and also privy to the circumstances of their proceedings (e). The House reposed so much confidence in him, that they intrusted him with affairs of weightiest concern ; and particularly, employed him in the conveyance of their Messages and Addresses to King Charles I. whilst residing at York. And he rode several times between this city and London with so much expedition, that he performed the journey, being 150 miles, in twenty-four hours (f). In May 1641, he was sent by the House of Commons with a message to Hull (g). In May 1642, we find him dispatched with Letters from the Committee of Parliament at York, to both Houses (h). In July following, he was sent by the two Houses post to Beverley ; to acquaint his Majesty, that the Earl of Holland, Sir John Holland, and Sir Philip Stapylton, were coming down with a Petition of both Houses, in answer to his Majesty's message concerning the delivering up of Hull (i). He was likewise, in March 1642-3, one of the Messengers between the two Houses of Parliament and their Committee, for the treaty of Peace at Oxford (k). For these industrious services he was not only rewarded with presents, but also recommended for a place in the Excise [A]. In 1643 he took the Covenant, and sided entirely with the Presbyterians. When his near relation Sir Thomas Fairfax was appointed General of the Parliament-forces, he made him his Secretary ; a place in which he had an opportunity of amassing a large fortune, but did not. During the siege of Oxford in 1646, he was of great service to his master ; and when the treaty for the surrender of that place to the Parliamentarians was depending, he was often posting to London upon intermessages and other fatiguing employments, 'till it was delivered up (l). In 1649 he attended his master, now become Lord Fairfax by the death of his Father, with several officers of note, to Oxford ; where being all splendidly entertained by the then governing members of the university, he was created Master of Arts, on the 21st of May, as a member of Queen's college (m). At the same time, he was made one of the Delegates to take into consideration the affairs depending between the citizens of Oxford and the members of that university. Upon the Lord Fairfax's laying down his commission of General, Mr Rushworth went and resided for some time in Lincoln's inn (n) ; and being then in much esteem, he was one of the Committee, appointed by the House of Commons January 20. 1651-2, to take into consideration what inconveniencies there were in the Common Law, and to reform them (o). In 1658. he was chosen one of the Burgesses for Berwick upon Tweed, to serve in Protector Richard's parliament, which began at Westminster the

(a) This appears from his age at the time of his death, as mentioned below.

(b) Wood, A-hædit. 1721. Vol. II. col. 245.

(c) This is the account given by himself, in the Preface to Part II. of his Historical Collections, p. 4. 9.

(d) Journals of the House of Commons, for 1640. p. 12.

(e) See the aforesaid Preface.

(f) Wood, ubi supra, col. 247.

(g) Parliamentary Hist. Vol. X. p. 484.

(h) See his own Collections, Part III. p. 718, and Parliamentary Hist. Vol. XI. p. 51.

(i) Hist. Collect. Part III. Vol. IV. p. 603. and Parl. Hist. Vol. XI. p. 296.

(k) Parl. Hist. Vol. XII. p. 200. and Hist. Collect. Part III. Vol. II. or Vol. IV. p. 177. edit. 1692.

(l) Wood, Ath. ut supra, and Dr Nelson's Impartial Collect. &c. in the Introduction, p. iv.

(m) Wood Ath. ut supra. & Fasti, Vol. II. col. 80.

(n) Wood Ath. ut supra.

(o) Whitlock's Memorials, edit. 1732. p. 520.

[A] For these industrious services he was not only rewarded with presents, but also recommended for a place in the Excise. This appears from these two articles in the Journals of the House of Commons. ' Wednesday, June 14. 1643. Ordered, That the mare and young horse, belonging to Mr Endimion Porter, lately brought up from Enfield to London, be forthwith delivered to Mr John Rushworth, to be employed in the service of the parliament, in sending messages between this House and the Lord General, and the persons that seized them are hereby required forthwith to deliver them to the said Mr Rushworth. — Tuesday, June 27. 1643. Resolved, That Mr John Rushworth shall be recommended to the Committee of this House for Excise, and to the Treasurers and Commissioners, to be employed in some office or place, suitable to his condition and the commendation of this House, towards a recompence for the several services he hath done for the kingdom.'

(p) Dr Br. Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria. Lond. 1750. Part ii. p. 191.

(q) List of that Parliament.

(r) Bishop Kennett's Register and Chronicle, p. 68, 176.

(s) Wood Ath. col. 848, 849.

the 27th of January 1658-9 (p). He was again chosen for the same place, in the healing Parliament which met April the 25th 1660 (q). And in February 1659-60, was appointed one of the Clerks of the new Council of State. After the Restoration, he presented to King Charles II. several of the Privy Council's books [B], which he preserved from ruin during the late unhappy distractions; for which, however, he doth not appear to have received any other reward than Thanks (r). Sir Orlando Bridgman, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, appointed him his Secretary in September 1667, and continued him in that office as long as he kept the Seals: He had now again an opportunity of enriching himself, or at least of obtaining a comfortable subsistence; but, through his own carelessness or extravagance, he never became master of any considerable possessions. In 1678, he was a third time elected Burgess for Berwick, in the parliament which began March 6. 1678-9; as he was afterwards for that which met the 17th of October 1679; and for the ensuing one at Oxford: he being then, as always before, esteemed no great friend to the Church of England. After the dissolution of the Oxford-parliament, he lived in the utmost retirement and obscurity in the city of Westminster. At length being arrested for debt, he was committed to the King's-bench prison in Southwark, where he dragg'd on the last six years of his life, in a miserable condition; having greatly lost the use of his understanding and memory, and indulging himself too freely in strong liquors to keep up his spirits. At last death released him from his confinement and miseries, on the 12th of May 1690; he being then aged about eighty-three. Two days after, his body was buried in St George's church in Southwark. He had several daughters, virtuous women, of which one was married to Sir Francis Vane of the North (s). He published himself the two first Parts of his Historical Collections, in three volumes [C], and left the others in manuscript, which were printed after his decease [D]. He published also The Tryal of Thomas Earl of Strafford, &c. [E]. His Historical Collections have been highly extoll'd by some, and as much condemned by others [F], according as they were influenc'd by Interest or Party.

[B] After the Restoration, he presented to King Charles II. several of the Privy Council's books, &c.] Upon that occasion the following entry was made in the Council-books. 'June 7. 1660. Upon reading the humble petition of John Rushworth, shewing, that he in the time of the late unhappy wars, did preserve from plunder, and got into custody, several of the Council-Books of his late Majesty of ever blessed memory, containing the Proceedings of the Privy Council, which he did now humbly present to his Majesty: It is this day ordered by his Majesty in Council, that the Clerk of the Council do in his Majesty's name return to the said Mr Rushworth, his Majesty's gracious Thanks for his great care and diligence in preserving and restoring the said Books for his Majesty's service.'

[C] He published himself the two first Parts of his Historical Collections, &c.] The first Part was published in 1659. folio, with a Dedication to Richard Cromwell, then Protector. The title of this first part was, 'Historical Collections of private Passages of State, Weighty Matters in Law, Remarkable Proceedings in Five Parliaments. Beginning the sixteenth year of King James, anno 1618. and ending the fifth year of King Charles, anno 1629. Digested in order of time.' In this first part he had the assistance of John Corbet (1); and also of some manuscripts of Bullfrode Whitelock, Esq; When it was finished, he presented the copy to Oliver Cromwell then Protector: but he having no leisure to peruse it, recommended it to Mr Whitelock; and he accordingly running it over more than once, made some alterations in, and additions to, it (2). It was reprinted, by stealth in 1675, and again in 1682. &c.—The Second Part, in two Volumes folio, appeared in 1680. 'Containing (as the title declares) the principal Matters which happened from the Dissolution of the Parliament on the 10th of March, 4 Car. 1. 1628-9. until the summoning of another Parliament, which met at Westminster, April 13. 1640. With an account of the Proceedings of that Parliament; and the Transactions and Affairs from that time, until the meeting of another Parliament, November the 3d following. With some remarkable passages therein during the first six months. Impartially related and disposed in Annals. Setting forth only matter of fact in order of time, without observation or reflection.' At the end of the last Volume of this Second Part, is an Appendix of Star-Chamber Reports, for the years 1625, 1626, 1627, 1628, &c. and other matters.

[D] And left the others in manuscript, which were printed after his decease.] The Third Part, in two Volumes folio, extending from November 3. 1640, to the end of the year 1644, came out in 1692. And the Fourth and last part, likewise in two Volumes folio, extending from the beginning of the year 1645, to the death of King Charles I. in 1648, did not appear till 1701. All the Seven Volumes were reprinted uniformly together in 1721.—He intended to have carried on the work to April 1653, the time of the dissolution of the Long Parliament (3); but was prevented.

[E] He published also the Tryal of Thomas Earl of Strafford, &c.] It was published in 1680. fol. and reprinted in 1721.

[F] His Historical Collections have been highly extoll'd by some, and as much condemn'd by others.] All that have writ on the Puritan or Presbyterian side, and with a settled aversion to King Charles I. and his whole measures, have highly extoll'd, nay almost idoliz'd them. Such as R. Coke (4), Monsieur Rapin (5), Oldmixon, &c. Others, on the contrary, who were favourers of King Charles I. and his cause, have represented them as extremely partial, and discredited them as much as possible. Nay Mr Rapin owns (6), 'it is certain that Rushworth's aim and design, in publishing his Collections, was to cry down the King's conduct, and favour the Parliament's cause.' But the person who professedly set himself to oppose them, and to ruin their credit, was John Nalson, L. L. D. He published, by King Charles the Second's special command, 'An Impartial Collection of the Great Affairs of State, from the beginning of the Scotch Rebellion in the year 1639. to the Murder of King Charles I. wherein the first Occasions, and the whole Series of the late Troubles in England, Scotland, and Ireland, are faithfully represented. Taken from authentick Records and methodically digested.' The title promised, that it should be brought down to the murder of King Charles I. But Dr Nalson liv'd only to put out two Volumes in folio, Lond. 1682. and 1683. which bring the History no lower than January 1641-2. He professeth, in that work, 'to make it appear, That Mr Rushworth hath concealed Truth, endeavoured to vindicate the prevailing Detractions of the late Times as well as their Barbarous Actions, and with a kind of rebound li- bel'd the Government at second hand (7).' Four capital Accusations he brings against Rushworth: viz. That he does not inform us where he had his Stock; and therefore we have only his own authority for what he relates: That he prints false and erroneous copies of some Papers: That, under colour of epitomizing others, he has not only obscured, but in many places quite corrupted and disguised the sense: That he seems so transported with Partiality to a party, that he has recorded

(3) See the end of the Preface to Vol. II.

(4) Detection of the Court and State of England.

(5) Considerations, &c. prefixed to the XXth book of his History; and throughout the reign of King Charles I.

(6) Considerations, &c. as above.

(7) Introd. p. v.

(1) See Wood Ath. Vol. II. col. 675.

(2) Whitelock's Memorials, p. 666. and Wood Ath. Vol. II. col. 848.

- recorded little but what relates to the Justification of those he favours and their proceedings; omitting what might serve to manifest the King's Innocence (8).
- But those that have most closely sifted Mr Rushworth's Historical Collections, are the Authors of the Parliamentary History of England; whose Criticisms thereupon, having been at the pains of collecting together, we shall here lay before the Reader. And first they observe (9), that Rushworth says, (Vol. I. p. 21) 'Writs were issued forth to assemble the Parliament the 30th of January.' But it appears by the Journals, that this Parliament was summoned to meet first on the 16th of January, from thence prorogued, by proclamation, to the 23d, and then again to the 30th. The Speech he hath inserted there, as the King's to the Parliament, is so different both in style and manner, as renders it justly suspected. The genuine one is in Frankland and Nalton — He says, (p. 23, 24) that the Parliament 'petitioned the King for the due execution of the Laws against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, and Popish recusants;' of which there is not one word in the Journal of this Session (10). — He omits (p. 33) this last clause in Sir Henry Yelverton's case, 'I know well that I suffer unjustly, in my restraint, for my offence, by his Lordship's means: For my heart tells me I was ever faithful to his Majesty; I sought no riches but his grace (11). — And the following words in Lord-Keeper Williams's advice to soften the harshness of the King's Answer, (p. 52) 'For where were the Commons before Henry I. gave them authority to meet in parliament (12)?' — In p. 54, he hath only given a short abstract of the King's proclamation for dissolving the Parliament. 'A very great omission [add the authors of the Parliamentary History] in a Collector of such materials for a just History of those times (13). — He hath much curtailed and abridged, the King's Speech at the meeting of the Parliament Feb. 19. 1623, for what reason we know not: And the Narration of the Prince's transactions in Spain, (p. 115, 119) (14). — In him, (p. 136) the Archbishop's preamble, the parliament's declaration, and the King's answer to them, are widely different from those in the Lords Journals. The introductory speech, indeed, is pretty exact; but the Declaration, in him, is quite a different thing; being the Proposition which was made to the King, some days after this, on his answer to the Declaration. The King's Answer is likewise defective in many places; whole paragraphs being omitted, and others strangely mutilated. The Prince's Explanations of some passages in his Father's speech, were not made at the time when the King spoke it; but when the Attorney-general was ordered to read it again to the Lords. Otherwise, as it stands in Rushworth, it looks as if the King had placed the Prince and the Duke at his elbow, to explain his own meaning to the Committees (15). — In p. 146, these words are omitted in the Speaker's Speech, after—enjoyed this Parliament, 'and in particular for their freedom from arrests (16). — He omits (p. 178,) several lines near the end of the King's Speech (17). And gives but a very lame and imperfect account of the Proceedings of the first Parliament of King Charles I. (18). — In p. 180, he sets down—Copies of Letters, and other papers—instead of Copes, Altars, Chalices, &c. (19). — He omits (p. 186) almost the whole preamble to the Duke of Buckingham's Speech. 'But for what reason [add the authors of the Parliamentary History] we know not, since we have not yet met with a more pathetic one through the whole course of these enquiries (20). — They observe further, that the Report is very incorrectly given in Rushworth; and many omissions made, 'not quite consistent with the credit or character of an exact collector, as any Reader may find who will take the trouble to compare both (21). — In p. 249, after—the said Count Palatine and his Children, he omits these words, 'and for the restoring of the Electoral Dignity unto them.' And likewise (p. 253. l. 5.) after—in his religion—he omits these—'and put into the power of a foreign Prince.' There are several other omissions and errors in those articles. — In p. 357. in the King's Speech, instead of the words—Speeches lately spoken, it ought to be, 'Speeches spoken to you yesterday by way of digression.' And he hath miserably curtailed and mangled the Duke of Buckingham's pathetic Speech against the Commons, (in p. 358) (22). — In Sir Dudley Carleton's Speech (p. 360. l. 12) after—heads of it—he omits this paragraph—'as I never heard the like in parliament before; but I have indeed heard the like when a criminal was indicted or accused at a bar.' And these words, at the conclusion of the same Speech. 'I move therefore for a grand committee to consider of the best remedy to get us out of this strait (23). — (23) P. 161, 162.
- Several of the Speeches of the managers of the house of Commons, in enforcing the charge against the Duke of Buckingham, are put down in his collections in a very different manner from what they are in the Lords Journals (24). — He hath omitted the Scedule of the gifts and grants to the Duke of Buckingham, or to his immediate use; and the Scedule at the end of the Duke's answer to his articles, (p. 356, 390.) (25). — (25) P. 140, 261, 264.
- The Duke's Speech to the Lords house, before he gave in his answer, (p. 375.) is very incorrect, several words and passages being omitted. — He hath left out (p. 477) the beginning of the Lord Keeper's Speech; no less than fifteen lines. (26). — The Speaker's Speech, and the Lord Keeper's answer (p. 482, 485) are extremely incorrect, imperfect, and mutilated (27). — (27) P. 347, 353.
- So are likewise the Debates at p. 499, &c. (28). — In the Debates touching his Majesty's Propositions (p. 519, &c.) he hath omitted several of the Speeches (29). — He says (p. 525) that five Subsidies were resolved on, April 4; but they were not voted 'till several days after (30). — In Secretary Cook's message concerning Supply, (p. 538) and the King's reply to the Speaker's Speech, (p. 545) there are several omissions (31). — He hath given only the Speeches of two of the Judges, in the Debate about the Opinions of the Judges in the King's bench, (p. 509) (32). — And hath omitted the Earl of Warwick's Speech, in the Committee on the liberty of the Subject (33). — He hath very much curtailed and altered Sir Benjamin Rudyard's Speech, (p. 551) (34). — Hath omitted Mr Hackwell's Speech (35). — A paragraph of 18 lines is omitted in Mr Secretary Cook's message, (p. 553) (36). — The Speaker's Speech; the King's Answer; (p. 555, &c.) and his Majesty's letter, (p. 560,) as also Mr Mason's Speech, (p. 564.) are full of faults, as he has printed them (37). — The copy he has given of Rouse's charge against Dr Manwaring, (p. 585) is very imperfect and uncorrect (38). — In the account he gives (p. 606) of the Speaker's commanding the House not to proceed; he hath omitted the words within crotchets,—with tears in his eyes. There is a command, &c. In Volume III. of his Collections, (p. 1131) he hath omitted the King's Speech (39). — In pages 1144, &c. he gives a very loose and imperfect account of the proceedings of the Commons about Innovations (40). — Affirms (p. 1149) that a grand Conference of many extraordinary Subjects was held Apr. 29. but it does not appear so by either of the Journals (41). — He is very faulty in his Diurnal of this Session; setting down facts as done on one day which happened on another (42). — Vol. IV. of his Collections, (p. 238) He hath omitted the following words, in the King's answer to the Petition about Recusants, after—it shall be done according to law—therefore, in this, I shall not be unwilling to have your advice and assistance (43). — He hath represented the Resolution of the Commons, Sept. 1. 1641, in a very different manner from what it is in the Journals (44). — And likewise the Reasons of both Houses for the continuance of a guard, (p. 435.) (45). — He has omitted, the proceedings against Judge Berkeley (46): the Declaration, which precedes the King's Answer to the Commons Petition and Remonstrance (47): the King's Answer to the Commons Remonstrance (48): the proceedings against the thirteen Bishops (49): the Commons Declaration for putting the kingdom into a posture of defence (50): the proceedings against Sir Edward Dering (51).
- For the rest of Mr Rushworth's Errors and Omissions, pointed out by the Authors of the Parliamentary History, the Reader will be pleased to consult the subsequent Volumes of that History (52). In the preface to the IXth Volume, the Authors endeavour to excuse his Mistakes; and think, 'most of them seem to be owing rather to the Negligence and Ignorance of Transcribers, than to any partial intention of his own. Nevertheless, add they, in his Collections, almost all the proceedings of the house of Lords, in the Long Parliament, are omitted, except where they concurr'd with the prevailing party of the Commons.' Mr Rushworth professes great Impartiality, Faithfulness, and sufficient Knowledge and Information, in the Prefaces to his Collections; and gives Himself as an Instance, 'That it is possible for
- (8) Ibid. p. vi, &c.
- (9) Parl. Hist. Vol. V. p. 310, 312.
- (10) P. 338.
- (11) P. 438.
- (12) P. 507.
- (13) P. 516.
- (14) Vol. VI. P. 4, 19.
- (15) P. 103, 104.
- (16) P. 337.
- (17) P. 358.
- (18) P. 373.
- (19) P. 374.
- (20) P. 387.
- (21) P. 394.
- (22) Parl. Hist. Vol. VII. P. 41, 42.
- (23) P. 161, 162.
- (24) P. 44.
- (25) P. 140, 261, 264.
- (26) P. 347.
- (27) P. 347, 353.
- (28) P. 361, &c.
- (29) P. 397.
- (30) P. 435.
- (31) P. 437. See also p. 450.
- (32) Parl. Hist. Vol. VIII. p. 2.
- (33) P. 69.
- (34) P. 81.
- (35) P. 85.
- (36) P. 96.
- (37) P. 145, &c.
- (38) P. 151.
- (39) P. 448.
- (40) P. 450.
- (41) P. 458.
- (42) P. 459.
- (43) Parl. Hist. Vol. IX. p. 241.
- (44) P. 490.
- (45) Parl. Hist. Vol. X. p. 52.
- (46) P. 10.
- (47) P. 101.
- (48) P. 117.
- (49) P. 142.
- (50) P. 206.
- (51) P. 458.
- (52) Viz. Vol. XI. p. 429, 430, 431. Vol. XII. p. 96, 268. Vol. XIII. p. 263, 311. Vol. XIV. p. 310. Vol. XV. p. 466. Vol. XVII. p. 102, 348.

'an ingenious man to be of a Party, and not Partial (53).' However, it is submitted to the Reader's consideration, Whether a man, who was employed as Clerk-assistant to the long Parliament; who was an indefatigable messenger in their Service, and rewarded for it; who submitted his Collections to Oliver Cromwell's perusal and correction; and dedicated them to his Son, could be thoroughly impartial. Was not a man, in those circumstances, under some bias at least to disguise or conceal, and could it be expected that he should do King Charles and the Royalists justice in every respect, especially in his First Part? The Value of his Collections arises, from their having preserved together several detached pieces, which otherwise would have been lost, or grown extremely scarce; and from being the fullest during the period they treat of. But they are far from being compleat: For a very useful Appendix might be added to them, from the Papers printed at the time by one John Wright in the Old Bailey, and many others which escaped his notice and researches. C

RUSSELL [Lord WILLIAM], a gentleman of noble birth, and memorable fame, in the English annals, as the head of that party which asserted Revolution principles, in the reign of King Charles II. He was descended from the ancient and illustrious family of his name, being the third son (a) of William the fifth, Earl, and first Duke of Bedford, by his Lady Anne, daughter to Robert Carre, Earl of Somerset [A]. He was born probably about the time of the breaking out of the Civil War in 1641 (b). In which, as his father sided with the parliament (c), so he took care to breed up his children in the same principles (d). However, Lord William being in the full verdure of his manly youth at the Restoration of King Charles the Second, gave freely into the gaieties of that voluptuous Court for a while; but quitting those irregularities in a few years (e), he entered, in 1667 (f), into a marriage with Rachel, second daughter and coheir of Thomas Wriothesley, Earl of Southampton, and widow of Francis Lord Vaughan, eldest son of Richard Earl of Carberry; and turning his thoughts to business, he obtained a seat in the House of Commons before the dissolution of the second Parliament [B], and continued a member

(a) Memoirs of the family. Collins, in the Peerage of England, Vol. I. under Russell, gives him the 2d place, omitting his elder brother John, who died in his infancy.

(b) His father was married in 1637. See a Letter to Lord Strafford from Mr Garrard, in Strafford's State Papers, &c. dated July 24, 1637, beginning thus: 'My Lord Russell is now at length married.'

(c) He was General of the Horse under the Earl of Essex. See some account of him, together with his character, in Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, Vol. I. fol. (d) Burnet, in the History of his own Time, Vol. I. fol. expresses it thus: That his Lordship was inclined, from his first education, to favour the Nonconformists. (e) Id. ibid. where that writer declares, that after this his life was unblemished in all respects. (f) At his trial in 1683, Dr Fitz-Williams gave in evidence, that he had known his Lordship fourteen years from the time he was married to his present lady, the doctor being then Chaplain to her father. Lord Russell's trial, in State Trials, Vol. II. fol.

[A] By Anne, daughter to Robert Carre, Earl of Somerset.] As the negotiations for this match were very long, made a great noise at Court at the time, and the King himself had a share therein, we shall mention some particulars relating to it, from some letters to the Lord Wentworth, (afterwards Earl of Strafford) then Lord-Deputy of Ireland. In the first of these, dated April 5. 1636, Mr Samuel Garrard, the writer, informs his Lordship, among other news, that the King had lately sent the Duke of Lenox to my Lord Bedford, to move him to give way to the marriage between my Lord Russell, and Lady Anne Carre, daughter to the Earl of Somerset, which he would take well at his hands. 'The love between them, continues Mr Garrard, hath been long taken notice of, though discreetly and closely carried, for his father gave him, as I take it, leave and liberty to chuse in any family but in that. But marriages are made in heaven (1).' Notwithstanding the Royal intercession, the old Earl's consent was not obtained 'till almost a year after, as appears from another letter, dated March 23. in the close of the year. The same correspondent, speaking of the same subject, writes thus. 'The marriage will now shortly, at Easter, be solemnized. —A most fine Lady.—My Lord of Bedford loves money a little too much, which, together with my Lord of Somerset's unexpected poverty, hath been the cause of this long treaty, not any diminution of the young parties affection, who are all in a flame in love: my Lord of Somerset told the Lord Chamberlain, who hath been a great moderator in this business, before his daughter, though one of them must be undone if that marriage went on, he chose rather to undo himself, than to make her unhappy; and he hath kept his word. For he hath sold all he can make money of, even his house which he lives in at Chifwick, with all his plate, jewels, and household-stuff, to raise a portion of 12000l. which my Lord of Bedford is now content to accept. This Lord [Somerset] pretends, that he lent my Lord Goring 3000l. when he was in the Tower, and being now in some straits about raising the portion, he hath sent to the Lord Goring, and demanded it of him; he denies it lent, for he says it was given for real services then done him, which the Duke of Bucks could witness, were he living. This hath made a great noise, and much sifting in the business. My Lord Chamberlain, most fierce to carry it for Somerset, being one night at Salisbury-house, fell into discourse about this 3000l. saying, that it was due to my Lord of Somerset; and that Somerset would ask leave of the King to sue my Lord Goring, and that he would recover it for somewhat that he knew. This he speaking with much vehemence, my Lord Powis being by, spoke to moderate him, especially since it concerned my Lord Goring, who had always been his true and faithful friend: he replied, he loved my Lord Goring well, but he loved a truth better, for one service my Lord Goring had done him, he had requited him with twenty. Powis said, that he did believe further, that my Lord Goring was not able suddenly, if it were due, to pay such a sum; and asked him, whether he would make himself a Solicitor to gather in Somerset's debts? That word, Solicitor, heated his Lordship, he fell then into higher passion, and swore deeply, G—d d—n me, I have seen a letter under my Lord Goring's hand, where he confesseth the debt, and it must be a great curse, must deserve 3000l. It was a gift for a Prince to give, not for a subject. Let my Lord Goring shew, wherein he did ever my Lord Somerset a curse, worth 300l. and he shall quit his 3000l. for which he hath his letter to shew. My Lady Salisbury saying then, If he had such a letter to shew, let him shew it, and the business was at an end. That if, my Lord Chamberlain took worse from her, than any thing spoken before. Would she if, when he had sworn he had seen it? Still she repeated if, and she thought she might say if, to the King, much more to him. She further told him, that in all disputes, he must have his own way, but he should not have it of her; he should not silence her in her own house, she would speak. So she rose up, and went from him and the company into her chamber. But it must not rest so: my Lady Vaux, and my Lady Powys, undertook his Lordship, and he being of an excellent good disposition, they brought him to a better temper, and to more reason; which effected, in they go to my Lady Salisbury's chamber, who now was the angrier of the two. There they made them friends. Powys made them kiss. Sic finita, est fabula (2).'

[B] He was in the house of Commons before the dissolution of the second Parliament of King Charles II.] This is advanced upon the credit of the printed Journals of that house, where Lord Russell appears in a committee on the 24th of October, 1678, appointed for hindering Papias to sit in either house of Parliament;

(1) Strafford's State Papers, by Knowler, Vol. II. p. 2.

(2) Ibid. p. 57, 58.

member in the three subsequent ones of this reign. He presently distinguished himself in that station; and, as his noble birth, added to his eminent worth and abilities, gave him great weight among the Whigs * [C], to which party he always adhered: so when the Privy-Council was new-modelled in April 1679, to please that party, he was taken into it, Lord Shaftesbury being then made President (g). The Duke of York was also sent out of the kingdom with the same view; but his Majesty, on the 28th of January, having declared to that Board, that he would send for that Duke to Court, not finding any good effects from his absence, Lord Russell petitioned to be discharged from his new post, which was complied with on the thirty-first of that month (b). After this, he went in a public manner, attended by some of his party, to Westminster-hall, and, at the King's-Bench there, presented the Duke of York as a Popish recusant. He appeared in Parliament, at the head of the most active of those who promoted the Bill of Exclusion, for disabling the Duke to inherit the Crown, and engaged with particular zeal in all the steps that were taken in the two Parliaments which met in 1680, to bring his Majesty under a necessity of submitting to pass that bill †. This occasioned the dissolution of those Parliaments [D]. After which, no new one being called, his Lordship proceeded to enter into other measures for compassing the same design, and carried them to such a length as was then judged treasonable; and being legally tried and convicted [E], he was condemned

(g) Sir William Temple's Memoirs, under this year.

(b) Salmon's Chron. Hist. under this year.

† See the general Histories of England.

Parliament; and this Parliament, which began May 8. 1661, was not dissolved till Jan. 25. 1678 (3). 'Tis not the method of these Journals, to mention the place represented by the members; perhaps his Lordship might be chosen for the county of Bedford, upon the death of one of their representatives, during that long Parliament. Which may be the reason that no notice is taken of it by Browne Willis, Esq; in whose list we find his Lordship inserted, with Sir Humphry Monnox, as elected for the county, in the three succeeding Parliaments of this reign (4).

[C] He had great weight among the Whigs ] This is taken notice of in the General Histories of England; but there are two letters in confirmation of it, which claim a particular regard. They were sent from Mr Richard Montague, the English Ambassador at Paris, to the Lord Danby, then Lord-Treasurer, and read in the House of Commons, during the debates about the impeachment and trial of that nobleman. The first is dated January 11. 1677-8, wherein the Ambassador communicates the following intelligence to his Lordship. 'The reason of Ruvigny's son's going into England. He is to make use of all the lights his father will give him, and by the near relation he hath to my Lady Vaughan, who is his cousin (5), and the particular friendship which father and son have with Mr William Russell, he is to be introduced into a great commerce with the male-content members of Parliament, and to cross your measures at Court, if they shall prove disagreeable here. While Barillon goes on in his smooth subtle way (6).' In the second letter, dispatched the ensuing week, and dated January 18. 1677-8, the Ambassador writes further. 'The reason of Ruvigny's journey, is to let the King know, that the King of France did hope he was so firm to him, as not to be led away by the Lord-Treasurer; and as for money, if he wanted it, he should have what he would from hence. His instructions are, if this design takes, by the means of Will. Russell, and other discontented people, to give a great deal of money, and cross all your measures at Court.' We see here Lord Russell remarkably pointed at by the Court of France, as a principal leading man among those that opposed the Court in Parliament, at, and before the time of penning these letters; which serves likewise to confirm what is advanced in the preceding remark, that he was a member in this, that is, the second Parliament of King Charles II. We need not observe, that the project here intimated, of gaining him over to the French interest, by bribery, shews their ignorance of the man and his inflexible probity, and could only be formed upon the general presumption of the never-failing force of that engine, when skillfully applied, to which however Lord Russell was utterly impregnable.

[D] This occasioned the dissolution of those Parliaments.] When the bill of exclusion first passed the house of Commons, Lord Russell was pitched upon to carry it up, as he did on the 15th of November, 1680, to the house of Lords, at the head of the greatest part of the Commons; and when the bill was rejected by the Lords, he was so much exasperated, as to declare, That if ever there should happen in this nation, any such change, as that he should not have liberty to live a Protestant, he was resolved to die one, and therefore would not willingly have the hands of their enemies strengthened. He also desired the Lords not to destroy themselves by their own hands; and if the Commons might not be so happy as to better the condition of the nation, he prayed the Lords would not make it worse, by giving money to the King, while they were sure it must go to the hands of the Duke's creatures. Agreeably to this speech, it was proposed in the house of Commons, on the 15th of December (7), to bring in a bill for making any illegal exaction of money from the people, high treason (8). On the 7th of January, it was also resolved there, that until a bill be passed for excluding the Duke of York, they could not give any supply, without danger to his Majesty, and extreme hazard of the Protestant religion. They also resolved, that whoever should lend the King any money upon any branch of his revenue, or buy any tally of anticipation, should be judged a hinderer of the sitting of Parliaments, and be responsible for the same in Parliament. And on the 10th, having notice that the King would prorogue them, they came early to the House, and resolved, (1) That whoever advised his Majesty to prorogue the Parliament, was a betrayer of the King, and kingdom, and the Protestant religion. (2) That the penal acts against recusants, ought not to be extended to Protestant Dissenters. (3) That prosecuting the Dissenters upon the penal laws, at this time, was grievous to the subject, a weakening of the Protestant interest, and dangerous to the peace of the kingdom. After which, the King sent for them up to the house of Peers, and the Parliament was prorogued to the 20th instant, but was dissolved on the 18th, and a proclamation issued for calling another, to meet on the 21st of March, at Oxford (9); where the bill of exclusion being again read in the house of Commons, on the 28th, and a second reading ordered. This Parliament was likewise dissolved the same day, and on the 8th of April, ensuing, anno 1681, his Majesty published a declaration, with his reasons for dissolving the two last Parliaments. Among which were their resolves against any person that should lend him money, or buy any tally of anticipation, thereby endeavouring to reduce him to a more helpless condition than the meanest of his subjects; and their taking upon them to suspend the laws and acts of parliament, by voting against the prosecution of Dissenters. This declaration was ordered to be read in all churches and chapels, throughout the kingdom (10).

[E] Being legally tried and convicted.] The reader will observe, that in these words it is not intended to vindicate the measures taken by the Court, in order to obtain his Lordship's condemnation. Our meaning is only this, which indeed is the whole just import of the words; that his trial and conviction was according to the usual forms, and rules and maxims of law. That is, the jury was legally impanelled, and unexceptionable in law; the witnesses such, as are deemed legal; and the facts sworn to by them, amounted to treason in the law; and lastly, the verdict, whereby he was brought in guilty of the indictment, was legal. Notwithstanding all this, 'tis not denied that the jury consisted of such persons, picked out by the sheriffs, as

(7) 'Tis something remarkable, that the Prince of Hanover, afterwards King George I. arrived in England on the 29th. Salmon's Chron. Hist. under this year, 1680.

(8) They voted, on the thirtieth, that no member should accept any place without the leave of the House, which was a precedent for passing the act as it now stands, whereby their seat in the House is forfeited, by the acceptance of several places under the Crown, but without infringing the privileges of the people, to re-elect them if they think proper.

(9) About the end of the month of January, the Duke of Monmouth, the Earl of Bedford, Essex, &c. to the number of 15 or 16 noblemen, petitioned the King against the Parliament's meeting at Oxford. Rapin.

(10) See the Declaration.

* The nick-names of Whig and Tory prevail especially in this reign.

(3) Journals of the House of Commons, Vol. IX. fol. edition.

(4) Notitia Parliamentaria, Vol. I.

(5) Lady Russell, in a letter to Dr Tillotson, dated Octob. 1685, mentions the small-pox having proved fatal to a cousin of her's, a niece of her cousin german, Mons. Ruvigny. He was afterwards Earl of Galway, and General of the English forces in Spain. Birch's Life of Tillotson, p. 122. edit. 1753, 8vo.

(6) Barillon, Ambassador from France, arrived in England Aug. 29, 1677. Salmon's Chron. Hist. under that year.

condemned and executed in July 1683 (i). But his opinion concerning the doctrine of Resistance being espoused at the Revolution, he was then deemed a martyr for that cause, an act passed to reverse his attainder, and a committee appointed by the House of Lords on the second of November, 1689, to consider who were the advisers and promoters of the murder (so they call it) of his Lordship (k) [F]. While he lay under sentence

(i) He was tried at the Old Bailey on the 13th of July, and being condemned was sent to Newgate, whence he was brought in a coach to a scaffold, erected for the purpose in Lincoln's-Inn-fields, and beheaded there on Saturday the 21st of that month.

were inclined to favour the Court, and for the purpose; and that the principal witnesses, with regard to the most material facts, might be forsworn, as his Lordship solemnly declared they were. His Lordship's chaplain, indeed, Mr Samuel Johnson, is very hot, according to his nature, in maintaining the illegality of this trial. His manner of delivering himself, on the occasion, is highly nettled, and not unentertaining. He was prompted to it by a pamphlet published after the Revolution, intitled, The Magistracy and Government of England vindicated (11). 'Wherein,' says he, the murdering of the greatest Englishman 'we had, for endeavouring to save his country, is still avowed. If these men, continues he, had the trying of causes once more, no doubt we should have our late deliverance arraigned for an invasion, and every brave Englishman, who joined with that unexpected helping-hand from the clouds, indicted, and condemned for a traitor. I shall only say in general, that that Vindication wants another, as much as the magistracy and government which it pretends to vindicate; for there is not one material word of it true. For instance, a consult to levy war, is not an overt act of compassing the death of the King, because the actual levying of war, is often done without any such tendency. as I could instance, over and over again, in former times. But I love to quote what is fresh in memory. My Lord Delamere (whom I mention out of honour to him) did very lately levy war; and when he had the late King in his power at Whitehall, was so far from compassing his death, that he only delivered him a message to remove in peace. And seeing that illegal trial is still justified, I must needs add this. That if there had been law enough left, to have tried a felon in the county of London and Middlesex, that great man had never been brought upon his trial. But because the parties concerned, desire to answer it only in Parliament. I only desire that they may be put to make out, how known unlawful sheriffs de facto, obtruded upon the city of London, against their own lawful choice, on purpose to be instruments of destroying the lives, liberties, and estates, of the best subjects, could be at the same time lawful sheriffs de jure: and on the other hand, it is easy to make it good, that the validity of that trial and proceedings, depending upon the legality of the Sheriffs and Jury, that pretended court was of no authority, and was such another low court of justice, as the black-guard are able to make among themselves every day. Perhaps they may plead ignorance of so notorious a matter, and that they could take no cognizance of it, because it did not come judicially before them, but that cannot be said; for the nullity of those very sheriffs was, before that, brought in that very place, in a special plea, and over-ruled (12). Thus, in reverence to the memory of his truly worthy patron, does this choleric writer lay boisterously about him; whose last argument, however, sufficiently confirms the formal judicial legality of these sheriffs, which is all that is intended at present. How far the constitution was infringed, by too great a stretch of the prerogative in their appointment, is the subject of the next remark. However, we must not omit taking notice of another answer to the same piece, The Magistracy, &c. by Sir John Hawles, Solicitor-General to King William, especially as it will serve to confirm what has been observed in Sir Walter Raleigh's article, concerning the irregularity of his trial; which is cited as a precedent to justify this of Lord Russell. The Solicitor General, in his reply, having observed, that the accusations of Sir Walter did not amount to a legal proof, proceeds thus; 'Not to mention all that might be excepted to, in the trial of the case cited. I would know by what law is the deposition of a person, meaning my Lord Cobham, who might be brought face to face to the prisoner, read as evidence. Would know by what law it is forbidden, that the accuser should be brought face to face, to the accused? I would know by what law Brooke's deposition of what Lord Cobham told him of Raleigh, was evidence against Raleigh? I would know by what law the story Dyer told, of what an unknown man said to him at Lisbon of Don Raleigh, was evidence against Raleigh? I would know by what statute the statutes of the 25th of Edward III. and the 5th Edward VI. are repealed. This trial was so very irregular throughout, that I would willingly believe it was not so, as it is related. But if it were so, I am sure none can defend it; and even for that reason, if any such resolution was in the case, as is cited, I am sure it ought to carry no credit with it; and there is no reason to believe there was any such resolution, there being no occasion for it, the question being only fact, which Sir Walter denied. The circumstances of his trial, in which the court always over-ruled the prisoner, were somewhat like the Lord Russell's: he complained of the ill usage of the King's Counsel, as well as the Lord Russell, and both had reason so to do. Hearsay was admitted to be given in evidence against both. All that either of them said for themselves, though very material, was slighted. The one was put in mind, at his trial, of the death of the Earl of Essex, as the other was of the death of the Viscount Stafford: both, in their dying speeches, vindicated themselves from those aspersions. The principal witnesses, in both cases, had, before the trials, affirmed they knew nothing against them. They were both accused of having heard what other persons had said, in their company, and had not discovered it; they both gave the same answer, that they could not help other mens talk. I think it is plain, at this day, that of Sir Walter's is thought a sham plot; what the Lord Russell's is thought, let the author say.'

[F] A committee to consider who were the advisers of the murder of his Lordship. We see here Mr Johnson was not without good authority, for the use of the word murder, on this occasion. This committee were also to consider who were the advisers of issuing out writs of Quo Warranto, against corporations, and who were their regulators*; implying, that all these were arbitrary proceedings, and unjustifiable. However, surely murder was somewhat too harsh a term for these executions, at least not well suited to the gravity of a supreme Senate. It is, indeed, generally urged, in defence of such methods, that the circumstances of the times require and authorize them. Accordingly, we may observe, that statesmen in recovering and restoring the constitution of governments, when disordered by any violences, to their true frame, generally follow that rule and maxim of husbandry, which teaches to bend a warped tree as much the contrary way, in order to reduce it to a just rectitude. But how necessary soever it might be for the time, to stigmatize the execution of Lord Russell, with the brand of murder; yet such language, upon a cooler reflection, at this distance, is seen to be intemperate. Since it is well known to have been the most received opinion, and espoused in general, both by very great and very good men, that there were no such infringements upon the constitution before Lord Russell's death, as even could be sufficient grounds for those measures of resistance which were avowed, and not denied to have been put in practice by him. This, I say, was then the received opinion among great and good men, however they might change it afterwards, as was the case particularly of Dr Burnet, and Dr Tillotson. After all, it is far from our intention, by any thing that has been said, either in this, or the preceding remark, to derogate in the least from the just reputation of Lord Russell, whose firmness in refusing the only means to purchase his life, from an exasperated Court, by the least retraction of an opinion, of which his conscience was thoroughly persuaded, is undeniably the strongest proof of that integrity and virtue, which gave him so much weight and influence in his own

* Journals of the House of Lords.

(k) See the Journals of that House.

(11) This pamphlet was printed in 1689, in two half sheets in fol.

(12) Sam. Johnson's Works, p. 240. edit. 1710, fol.

tence of death, he made application several ways to obtain his pardon, and even addressed a letter to the Duke of York to that purpose [G]. And, when every attempt of this kind was rejected, as he had before constantly charged his prosecution to the malice of his enemies, so he then wrote a letter to the King, involving his Majesty in the same censure [H]. He also delivered a paper to the Sheriffs upon the scaffold, wherein he declared, he had and did believe, that Poperly was breaking in upon the nation, and that those who advanced it would time, and which have endeared his memory to ours. Upon this account, every particular which serves to illustrate that firmness, is highly worth preserving in the present memoir: we shall therefore insert the following extract from Dr Burnet's Journal. This divine then tells us, that being sent for by his Lordship, on Monday July 16. 1683, he thought by the ground which he had gained, in discoursing on the subject of Resistance, it would be easy to persuade his Lordship, that it was absolutely unlawful; though indeed his Lordship went no further at first, than he did at last. However, the Doctor thinking that step which his Lordship had made, gave further hopes, told the Dean [Tillotson] that he believed his Lordship was convinced of that point. Lord Russell persisting in his former opinion, notwithstanding the endeavours of the Dean and Doctor to alter it, added to the speech he was composing, the following passage, not now extant, in the printed copy, For my part I cannot deny, but I have been of opinion, that a free nation, like this, might defend their religion and liberties, when invaded and taken from them, though under pretence and colour of law. But some eminent and worthy divines, who have had the charity to be often with me, and whom I value and esteem to a very great degree, have offered me weighty reasons to persuade me, that faith and patience are the proper ways for the preservation of religion; and the method of the gospel is to suffer persecution, rather than to use resistance. But if I have sinned in this, I hope God will not lay it to my charge, since he knows it was only a sin of ignorance. This being read to the Dean, on Friday morning July the 20th, he was sorry to find it so defective; but not having then leisure to speak to Lord Russell of it, he returned in the afternoon, and pressed his Lordship to deliver himself more fully in that matter, and gave him a paper concerning it; and as he came out, meeting Dr Burnet, desired him to urge the point home to his Lordship, and either to carry him farther, or strike out the whole paragraph above-cited, since the conclusion of it was so cold; and wished that the first part of it might be quite left out. The Doctor, accordingly, discoursing Lord Russell again upon the affair, his Lordship answered, that he could not say a lye, and he was sure the Doctor would not desire it, and he was sure if he went further, he must needs lye. He said, that he had not leisure now to study politics: that the notion which he had of the laws, and of the English government, was different from that of the two Divines; yet he said, so far did he submit to them, and to the reasons which they had offered him, that he was willing to go so far as he had done, but he could not go farther without being disingenuous. And when at last the Doctor proposed the suppressing of the whole paragraph, he was very well satisfied; and said, that his chief reason for putting it in, was to prevent any inconvenience that might arise to them. So it was struck out. But he said often, that whatever his opinion might be, in cases of extremity, he was against these ways; and ever thought a parliamentary cure was the proper remedy for all the distempers of the nation; and said, that he and a few more, (I think he said half a dozen, or half a score,) had taken much pains to moderate people's heats, for three years together, and had ever persuaded their friends to be quiet, and wait for a parliament (13).

[G] He wrote a letter to the Duke of York. It was delivered by his Lady to the Duchefs of York, being drawn up in these terms.

' May it please your Highness,
' The opposition I have appeared in to your Highness's interest, has been such, as I have scarce the confidence to be a petitioner to you, though in order to the saving of my life. Sir, God knows what I did, did not proceed from any personal ill-will, or animosity to your Royal Highness; but merely be' cause I was of opinion, that it was the best way for preferring the religion established by law: in which, if I was mistaken, yet I acted sincerely, without any ill end in it. And as for any base design against your person, I hope your Royal Highness will be so just to me, as not to think me capable of so vile a thought. But I am now resolved, and do faithfully engage myself, that if it shall please the King to pardon me, and if your Royal Highness will interpose in it, I will in no sort meddle any more, in the least opposition to your Royal Highness; but will be readily determined to live in any part of the world, which his Majesty shall prescribe, and will never fail in my daily prayers, both for his Majesty's preservation and honour, and your Royal Highness's happiness; and will wholly withdraw myself from the affairs of England, unless called by his Majesty's orders to serve him, which I shall never be wanting to do to the uttermost of my power. And if your Royal Highness will be so gracious to me, as to move on my account, as it will be an engagement upon me, beyond what I can in reason expect, so it will make the deepest impressions on me possible; for no fear of death can work so much with me, as so great an obligation will for ever do upon,

' May it please your Royal Highness,

' your Royal Highness's most humble,

' and most obedient servant,

' W. RUSSELL (14).'

Newgate, 16. July, 1683.

[H] He wrote a letter to the King, involving his Majesty in the same censure. This appears from the account given of the letter in Burnet's Journal, where that writer relates, that being with his Lordship, on Wednesday July 18. upon some discourse after dinner, about his writing to the King, he cheerfully resolved on it. For though he always said, he never did any thing that he thought contrary to his interest, yet many railleries and other indecent things, had passed, for which he prayed God to forgive him, and he resolved to ask the King's pardon. And he said, he thought he must likewise let the King know, that he also forgave him; and he himself bit on that expression [of all concerned in his death, from the highest to the lowest]. Accordingly, on Thursday he wrote the letter, to be delivered after his death (15), which is as follows.

' May it please your Majesty,

' Since this is not to be delivered 'till after my death, I hope your Majesty will forgive the presumption of an attainted man's writing to you. My chief business is humbly to ask your pardon, for any thing that I have either said, or done, that might look like want of respect to your Majesty, or duty to your government. In which, though I do to the last moment, acquit myself of all designs against your person, or of altering of the government, and protest I know of no design, now on foot, against either; yet I do not deny but I have heard many things, and said some things contrary to my duty; for which, as I have asked God's pardon, so I humbly beg your Majesty's. And I take the liberty to add, that though I have met with hard measure, yet I forgive all concerned in it, from the highest to the lowest; and I pray God to bless both your person and government, and that the public peace, and the true Protestant religion may be preserved under you. And I crave leave to end my days with this sincere protestation, that my heart was ever devoted to that which I thought was your true interest; in which, if I was mistaken, I hope your displeasure against

(14) This letter was written at the earnest solicitation of his lady; and as he was folding it up, having shewn it to Dr Burnet, he said to him, This will be printed, and will be selling about the streets, as my submission, when I am led out to be hanged. Burnet's Journal.

(15) It was delivered by his uncle, John Russell, then Colonel of the first regiment of foot-guards. He had been a Colonel for King Charles I. in the Civil Wars. Collins's Peerage of England, as before.

(13) Birch's Life of Tillotson, p. 108—110.

would stick at nothing to carry their designs [I]. Though tender in his nature, he met death

' me will end with my life, and that no part of it shall
' fall on my wife and children; which is the last pe' tition will ever be offered you from,

' May it please your Majesty,

' your Majesty's most faithful,

' most dutiful,

' and most obedient subject †,

' W. R U S S E L L.

Newgate, July 19. 1683.

' writ nothing in this that wil displease your Majesty,
' if I have, I humbly beg you to confider it as coming
' from a woman amazed with grief, and that you wil
' pardon the daughter of a person, who served your ' Majesty's father in his greatest extremities [and your ' Majesty in your greatest posts *] and one that is not
' confcious of having ever done any thing to offend
' you [before *]. I shal ever pray for your Majesty's ' long life and happy reign,

' Who am,

' with al humility,

' may it please your Majesty, &c.'

* These words are likewise crossed out.

• This word was also crossed out.

[I] That those who advanced Popery, would stick at nothing to carry on their designs. As these words evidently point at the King and his brother, so the speech being printed made a great noise at Court, and Dean Tillotson and Dr Burnet being the two Divines who, at his own request, had attended him during the whole interval, from his condemnation to his execution; they were both examined before the Cabinet-Council the next day, where were present, the King, the Duke of York, the Lord-Keeper North, the Duke of Ormond, the Lord Hallifax, the Lord Rochester, and Sir Leoline Jenkins. The King asked the Dean whether he had any hand in the paper, which was published in Lord Russell's name? to which he answering that he had not, his Majesty was satisfied (16). Apparently, on account of the Dean's letter, given to his Lordship the day before his execution, in defence of the doctrine of Passive Obedience, a copy of which had come into the King's hands (17). In reality, the suspicion fell chiefly upon Dr Burnet, as he had foreseen, and thereupon had drawn up an account in writing, of all that passed between him and his Lordship, concerning it. He delivered this Vindication of himself to the Council, and afterwards easily obtained of Lady Russell to write a letter to his Majesty, assuring him, that her husband was the real author of that paper delivered to the Sheriff. As this letter is an illustrious proof of the extraordinary talents of that Lady, who was so much beloved by Lord Russell, the reader has a right to expect it here, as follows.

' May it please your Majesty,

' I find my husband's enemies are not appeased with
' his blood, but still continue to misrepresent him
' to your Majesty. 'Tis a great addition to my sor' rows, to hear your Majesty is prevailed upon to be' lieve, that the paper he delivered to the Sheriff at ' his death, was not his own. I can truly say, and
' am ready in the solemnest manner to attest, that [dur' ing his imprisonment *] I often heard him dis' course the chiefest matters contained in that paper,
' in the same expressions he therein uses, as some of those
' few relations that were admitted to him, can like' wise averr. And sure 'tis an argument of no great ' force, that there is a phrase or two in it another uses,
' when nothing is more common than to take up such
' words as we like, or are accustomed to in our conver' sation. I beg leave, further to avow to your Ma' jesty, that all that is set downe, in the paper read to ' your Majesty on Sunday night, to be spoken in my ' presence, is exactly true (18); as I doubt not but
' the rest of the paper is, which was written at my re' quest; and the author of it in al his conversation
' with my husband, that I was privy to, shewed him-
' selfe a loyal subject to your Majesty, a faithful friend
' to him, and a most tender and conscientious Minister
' to his soule. I do therefore humbly beg your Ma' jesty would be so charitable to beleve, that he who
' in al his life was observed to act with the greatest
' clearnesse and sincerity, would not at the point of ' death doe so disingenious and false a thing, as to de' liver for his own what was not properly and expressly
' so. And if after the losse in such a manner of the ' best husband in the world, I were capable of any ' consolation, your Majesty only could afford it, by ' having better thoughts of him; which, when I was
' so importunat to speak with your Majesty, I thought
' I had found reason to beleve I should have inclined
' you to, not upon the credit of my word, but through
' the evidence of what I had to say. I hope I have

It appears from Dr Burnet's account, that his Lordship took extraordinary pains in penning this paper, delivered to the Sheriffs; and employed upon it the greatest part of the time, during his imprisonment, both before and after his condemnation; which as he had always looked for, not doubting, but the Sheriff would take care to return such a Jury as was resolved to condemn him, if the King's Counsel should bid them, so he had been forming in his mind what was fit for him to do in this matter (19). Mr Johnson has observed, that he was at this time practised upon, to bequeath a legacy of slavery to the nation, by acknowledging the doctrine of Passive Obedience; and 'tis evident, that in this paper, his intention was, to leave the nation a legacy of Liberty, by finally avowing the contrary doctrine of Resistance. Accordingly, care was taken to provide the public with several answers to it, which were printed with the following titles. (1) Animadversions upon a paper, intituled, The Speech of the late Lord Russell; consisting of two half sheets in folio. Wherein the author observes, that one motive for his Lordship's drawing up this speech, being to clear his conduct at his trial; where, in pursuance to the direction of his counsel, he had not declared the whole cause of his being present at the meeting, when the treasonable design of seizing the guards was talked of, and charged upon him: therefore in this speech he professes he would declare the whole matter of fact, so far as related to his share in it, plainly, without any reserve whatsoever. In that view he confesses, that the tasting of wine, though one reason, was not the sole reason of his going to Shepherd's house, which was to hear what proposals should be there made, towards carrying on a design of obliging his Majesty by distress to consent to a bill of Exclusion; and that one of these means was the seizing of the guards: But this being only mentioned as feasible, without coming to a resolution to put it in practice, and besides being not consented to by him, the whole of the charge, as to his particular, could amount to no more than misprision of treason; and he hopes nobody will imagine him capable of so mean a thought, as to go about to save himself by accusing others. To this plea, the author of the Animadversions observes, that his being designedly present at these meetings, implies his consent in the eye of the law, which he cannot be supposed to be ignorant of. And as to his honour in not betraying others to save himself, it is answered, that though the discovering it might have been said to be done in order to save himself, by turning informer, (as Lord Howard did) yet for his oath's sake he ought not to have concealed it, as being against his duty both to God and man. In the oath taken by every Member of the house of Commons, pursuant to an act of the third of James I. he swears, 'to do his best endeavour to disclose and make known to his Majesty, his heirs and successors, all treasons and traitorous conspiracies, which he shall know, or hear of, to be against him, or any of ' them.'

(2) Animadversions upon a printed paper, intituled, The Speech of the Lord Russell; being an antidote against the poison of that paper, composed of some Remarks upon the paper printed by the direction of the Lady Russell, and mentioned to have been delivered by the Lord Russell to the Sheriffs, at the place of his execution. This author censures the Speech, as not penned with that ingenuity, sincerity, and plainness, which is suitable to a dying gentleman; and it contains severa pages in folio.

(3) Animadversions

(19) Account of his Lordship's behaviour after condemnation, &c. printed in General Dictionary, under Lord Russell's article.

(20) His Lordship takes notice, that he was cast upon this reasoning, which he calls a fetch, notwithstanding it was alledged, as a ruled point in Law, that whoever comes into an assembly twice where rebellion is proposed, is guilty of high-treason; 'tis misprision the first time.

† These words, though on so particularly solemn an occasion, are evidently used in no other sense, than what is always understood by them at the bottom of an ordinary letter.

(16) Journal of the House of Lords, under the year 1689.

(17) See Tillotson's article.

• These words included in the brackets are crossed out.

(18) It was wrote at Lady Russell's request, and contained an account of all that passed between the doctor and his Lordship, concerning his last speech and paper. It is called the Journal, in the History of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 562. and is printed in the General Dictionary, and again the greatest part in Tillotson's Life by Birch.

death with a good degree of firmness [K], and great decency; being possessed, if we may believe Bishop Burnet, with such a full assurance of his salvation, as has been thought to border upon Fanaticism [L]. His character, as a man of probity, must have been unexceptionable, since it is attested by those who were far from approving his political principles. Sir William Temple, for instance, speaking of the measures taken to exclude the Duke of York from the succession, observes, that ' His [Lord Russell's] setting himself at the head of ' those affairs, had a great influence in the House [of Commons], as being a person in ' general

(3) Animadversions on the late Speech and Confession, of the late William, Lord Russell, 3½ pages in 4to.

(4) Considerations, upon a printed sheet, intituled, The Speech of the late Lord Russell to the Sheriffs; together with the paper delivered by him to them, at the place of execution, July 21. 1683. 4 pages. 4to. To this is annexed, Dr Tillotson's Letter to his Lordship, and his Prayer for him upon the scaffold. The writer of this, was the famous Mr, afterwards Sir Roger, L'Esrange, who was particularly employed by the Court (21).

[K] He met death with a good degree of firmness] Several particulars of this kind, are related by Bishop Burnet, to whom we refer the reader. But there is one instance of this firmness, which deserves a place here, as it rises to a degree of magnanimity. I mean his constant refusal to make his escape, as he might have done, both before his commitment to the Tower, and after his condemnation, while he lay in Newgate. Having intelligence of a messenger's being sent, before he was apprehended, time enough to withdraw, and a proposal, after sentence, made by his cousin Cavendish, to change cloaths with him, that so he might go off in that disguise. But he bravely rejected both: alledging, in the first case, that it would give the Court too great advantage against him, as confessing guilt (22). The very same reason that was given for a like refusal, to make his escape by Archbishop Laud, while he lay in the Tower a prisoner of the long Parliament*, in order to be brought to his trial, on a charge of high-treason, grounded upon quite contrary principles and practices. And this too, while he was as much convinced, and with as much reason as Lord Russell, of the malice of his prosecutors; which had taught him also, as assuredly as it had his Lordship, to look for what followed.

[L] Such a full assurance of salvation, as has been thought by some to border upon Fanaticism.] This censure seems to be grounded, in a great measure, upon Dr Burnet's account of his Lordship's behaviour in Newgate. In which that divine, who was his confessor at this time, relates, that on Monday the 10th of July, his Lordship, among other things, told him, that for death he thanked God, as a man, he never was afraid of it, and did not consider it with so much apprehension as the drawing of a tooth. But that he found the courage of a man that could venture in the heat of blood, was very different from the courage of a dying Christian, and dying in cold blood: that must come from an inward peace of conscience, and assurance of the mercy of God; and that he had to such a degree, that though from the first day of his imprisonment, he reckoned he was a dead man, it had never given him any uneasiness. He added, that God knows the trouble I saw him in some weeks ago, when his son was ill, had gone nearer to his heart, and taken more of his rest from him, than his present condition had done: and he remembered of a colic he had lately, which had filled him with so much pain, and so oppressed his spirits, that he saw how little a man could do, if he came to die in such a manner: whereas he had now all his thoughts perfectly about him, and had no other apprehensions of death, but being a little gazed at by his friends and enemies, and a moment's pain. He said, that though he had been guilty of many defects and failings, (among which, he reckoned his seldom receiving the Sacrament) yet he thanked God he had a clear conscience, not only in relation to the public, (in which he had gone so sincerely, that he was sure he had nothing to answer for but the sins of ignorance, and some indecent discourses, in which he had been generally more guilty by hearing them, and being pleased with them, than by much speaking) but in relation to all his other concerns. He had spent much, but it was in no ill way. He could never limit his bounty, to his condition; and all the thoughts he had of a great estate, that was to descend upon him, was to do more good with it; for he had resolved not to live much above the pitch he was then at. He thanked God, that now for these many years, he had made great conscience of all he did; so that the sins of omission was the chief thing he had to answer for. God knew the sincerity of his heart, that he could not go into a thing he thought ill, nor could he tell a lie. On Friday morning, the Doctor having preached two sermons to him, in which he had taken notice of the joys and longings of some very pious men to die, and be with God. His Lordship told him at night, that what he spake came into his heart, and he believed it was sent to him from God. In the interval, he told me, continues the Doctor, he could not pretend to such high joys and longings, but an entire resignation of himself to the will of God, and a perfect serenity of his mind. He said, he once had some trouble; because he found not those longings Mr Hampden the younger had, of whom he spake often with great kindness and esteem. He had, a few days before his commitment, given him, from Mr Baxter, his late book of Dying Thoughts; and he found many things in that, so pat to his own condition, that he blessed God for the comforts of that book. At night again he talked of his change, how great a change death made, and how wonderful those new scenes would strike on a soul. He had heard how some, that had been born blind, were struck, when by the couching of their cataracts they saw. But what, said he, if the first thing one saw, were the sun rising? On Saturday morning, the day of his execution, he was in the same temper he had always been in, and thanked God he felt no sort of fear nor hurry in his thoughts. We prayed together, says the Doctor, with some intervals, five or six times; and between bands, he often went into his chamber and prayed by himself. Once he came out with more than ordinary joy, and said, he had been much inspired in his last prayer, and wished he could have writ it down and sent it to his wife. The Dean [Tillotson] came and prayed, and spake also with him, we both looked at one another, amazed at the temper he was in. As we were going, [in the coach to Lincoln's-inn-fields, where the scaffold was erected] I observed he was singing often within himself, but could not hear the words. I asked what he sang? he said, it was the beginning of the 119th psalm, but he should sing better very soon. And observing the crowd, he said, be should soon see a greater and better company. As we came to turn into little Queen-street, he said, I have often turned to the other hand with great comfort, but now I turn to this with greater. Thus far his confessor, Dr Burnet, and the whole is sufficiently confirmed by his Lordship's speech upon the scaffold. In which he declared, that in this extremity he had been so wonderfully supported, that neither his imprisonment, nor the fear of death, had been able to discompose him in any degree. ' I have, says he, ' even the assurance of the love and mercy ' of God, in and through my blessed Redeemer, in ' whom only I trust: and I don't question, but that I ' am going to partake of that fulness of joy, which ' is in his presence, the hopes whereof doth so wonderfully delight me, that I reckon this the happiest ' time of my life, though others may look upon it as ' the saddest.—

VOL. V. No. CCXCVI.

Such inspirations, joyful assurances, and foretastes of happiness, in a future state, as his Lordship here pretends to feel, may indeed be well grounded, and consonant to the coolest reason, at the close of a life spent in a course of most eminently distinguished piety and virtue. But how to reconcile it to that temper of mind in which Lord Russell died, studying for a particular phrase whereby he might upbraid the King, in the keenest manner, with malice, for prosecuting him, and constantly calling his death murder, notwithstanding by his own confession he had committed a crime, which by the known rules of law amounted to treason; must be left to the judgment of the reader.

(21) See more of this in Archbishop Tillotson's article.

(22) Burnet's History of his own Time, Vol. 1. fol.

* See Dr Po-socke's article.

(l) Temple's
Memoirs, p.
212.

(m) See his account of the Rye-
House plot, p.
21. edit. 1685.

(n) In his second letter to the Earl of Dorset, dated
March 26, 1689.

(o) Hist. of his own Time, Vol.
I. fol.

(p) Extract of a letter from her
Ladyship to Dr
Fitz-Williams,
dated July 21,
1685, in Birch's
Life of Tillotson,
p. 114. second
edit. 1753.

(q) See his article, and also that of Archbishop Tillotson.

‘ general repute, of an honest worthy gentleman, without tricks or private ambition (l).<sup>s</sup> Dr Sprat also, though he charges him with being carried away beyond his duty and allegiance (m), yet acknowledges him to be a person of great probity, and constant abhorrence of falsehood (n). Hence we may more safely credit Bishop Burnet, who represents him as a man of great candour, and of a general reputation, universally beloved and intrusted; and that he never knew any man of so entire a credit in the nation; that indeed he was slow [of apprehension], and of little discourse, but of a true judgment after sufficient consideration (o). To this we shall add, that he was a most tenderly affectionate husband, and perfectly happy in the mutual love of his excellent lady, the parting from whom he declared was the bitterest ingredient in his cup of death [M]; after which she was a most faithful guardian of his fame. We have one instance that deserves particularly to be recorded. A few days after the defeat and death of the Duke of Monmouth, with whom Lord Russell had an intimate connection, and spoke honourably of him, as detesting, equally with himself, all base designs against the life of King Charles the Second, this lady made use of that opportunity to declare, that she took his Grace's late attempt to be a new project, not depending on, or being linked in the least to, any former design, if there was then any real one, which she was satisfied was no more than, her own Lord confessed, talk; and it is possible that talk going so far, as to consider, if a remedy to supposed evils might be sought, how it could be formed. ‘ He had, continues she with a warmth of expression well becoming her relation to him, ‘ so just a soul, so firm, so good, he could not warp from such principles that were so, unless misguided by his ‘ understanding, and that his own not another's: for, I dare say, as he could discern, he ‘ never went into any thing considerable upon the mere submission to any one's particular ‘ judgment (p).’ Her Ladyship also, in the same affectionate regard to her Lord's memory, after the Revolution, made use of her interest in favour of his chaplain Mr Samuel Johnson, and was very instrumental in procuring him the pension, and other bounties, which he received from that government (q). As she had promised her Lord to take care of her own life for the sake of his children (r), she was religiously mindful to perform that promise, and continued his widow to the end of her life, which did not happen 'till Michaelmas-day, 1723, at the age of fourscore and seven [N], having lived to see her son (s) succeed

(r) These were; a son and two daughters; of whom Rachel, the eldest, married Will. Cavendish, Duke of Devonshire, and Catharine to John Manners, Marquis of Granby, and afterwards Duke of Rutland.

(s) Her son Wriothesley succeeded his grandfather in 1700, became Knight of the Garter in 1702, and died of the small-pox in 1711; was succeeded by his eldest surviving son Wriothesley, who married in 1725, and dying without issue in 1732, was succeeded by his brother the present Duke.

[M] Parting with his Lady was the bitterest ingredient in his cup of death.] The instances of this conjugal tenderness and affection are very interesting, as we have them from Bishop Burnet; who tells us, in a journal which he kept of his Lordship's behaviour in Newgate, that ‘ on Tuesday before his execution, after dinner, when his Lady was gone, he expressed great joy in the magnanimity of spirit he saw in her; and said, the parting with her was the greatest thing he had to do; for he was afraid she would be hardly able to bear it. The concern about preserving him, filled her mind so now, that it in some measure supported her; but when that would be over, he feared the quickness of her spirits would work all within her. On Thursday, while my Lady was gone to try to gain a respite 'till Monday; he said, he wished she would give over beating every bush, and running so about for his preservation. But when he considered that it would be some mitigation of her sorrow, that she left nothing undone, that could have given any probable hopes, he acquiesced. And indeed, says the doctor, I never saw his heart so near failing him, as when he spake of her: Sometimes I saw a tear in his eye, and he would turn about, and presently change the discourse. On Friday, at ten o'clock [at night] my Lady left him, he kissed her four or five times, and she kept her sorrow so within herself, that she gave him no disturbance by their parting. After she was gone, he said, now the bitterness of death is passed; and ran out into a long discourse concerning her; how great a blessing she had been to him; and said, what a misery it would have been to him, if he had not had that magnanimity of spirit, joined to her tenderness, as never to have desired him to do a base thing for the saving of his life. Whereas, otherwise, what a week should have passed, if she had been crying on me to turn informer, and be a Lord Howard.—He said, there was a signal providence of God in giving him such a wife, where there was birth, fortune, great understanding, great religion, and great kindness to him; but her courage in his extremity was beyond all: he was glad that she and his children were to lose nothing by his death (23), and that she had promised him to take care of herself for their sakes (24).’

(23) His Lordship being survived by his father, was never possessed of the Bedford title or estate.

(24) Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, Vol. I. fol. edit.

[N] She died at the age of eighty-seven.] Dr Birch has enriched the public with several of her letters, taken from a large collection of them, all written with an uncommon force of stile and sentiment; and the course of this memoir hath led us to give two specimens of the justice of the Doctor's encomium. But as those were written in defence of her beloved Lord, and perhaps she may be thought to be raised above her ordinary pitch, by that most interesting subject, we shall produce another, which was dictated by nothing more than a sincere friendship and respect, and which sets her talent this way beyond the reach of all objections. Dr Tillotson having informed her, in a letter dated September 19. 1689, that upon his kissing the King's [William's] hand, for the Deanery of St Paul's, his Majesty acquainted him with his design to give him the see of Canterbury, saying, it was necessary for his [the King's] service, and he must charge it upon his conscience, proceeds in these terms. ‘ This hath brought ‘ me into a real difficulty. For on the one hand, it is ‘ hard to decline his Majesty's commands, and much ‘ harder yet, to stand out against so much goodness, ‘ as his Majesty is pleased to use towards me. On the ‘ other hand, I can neither bring my inclination nor ‘ my judgment to it. This I owe to the Bishop of ‘ Salisbury, one of the worst and best of friends I ‘ know: best, for his singular good opinion of me: ‘ and the worst, for directing the King to this method, ‘ which I know he did; as if his Lordship and I had ‘ concerted the matter, how to finish this foolish piece ‘ of dissimulation, in running away from a Bishopric, ‘ to catch an Archbishopric. This fine device, hath ‘ thrown me so far into the briars, that without his ‘ Majesty's great goodness, I shall never get off with- ‘ out a scratched face. And now I will tell your ‘ Ladyship the bottom of my heart. I have, of a ‘ long time, I thank God for it, devoted myself to ‘ the public service, without any regard for myself. ‘ And to that end, have done the best I could, in the ‘ best manner I was able. Of late, God hath been ‘ pleased by very severe ways, but in great goodness ‘ to me, to wean me perfectly from the love of this ‘ world (25); so that worldly greatness is now not ‘ only undesirable, but distasteful to me. And I do ‘ verily believe, that I shall be able to do as much or ‘ more good in my present station, than in a higher, ‘ and shall not have one jot less interest or influence, ‘ upon any others, to any good purpose; for the peo- ‘ ple naturally love a man, that will take great pains ‘ and little preferment. But, on the other hand, if I ‘ could force my inclination to take this great place, ‘ I foresee, that I should sink under it, and grow me- ‘ lancholy and good for nothing, and after a little ‘ while die as a fool dies. But this, Madam, is a great ‘ deal too much upon one of the worst and nicest ‘ subjects in the world, a man's self.’ To this Lady (25) He means the death of his last surviving child Mrs Chadwick in 1687, and his being seized with a fit of an apoplexy soon after. His Life, p. 125.

Russell,

succeed to the Bedford title and estate, and likewise one of her grandsons, whose younger brother is the present Duke [O].

Russell, having first asked the Dean's opinion, in another affair, returned the following answer. ' Now a few words to your own concern, that bears so heavy upon your mind, and I have done. I know not if I should use the phrase, integrity is my idol; but I am sure I admire and love it hugely, whenever I meet it. I do pity you, Mr Dean, and think you have a hard game upon your hands; which if it should happen, you cannot play off your own way, you can do better than a man less mortified to the world could; because if you serve the interest of religion, and the King's, you are doing what you have dedicated yourself to, and therefore can be more regardless of ignorant and wicked censures, for, upon my word, I believe you will incur no other. Your character is above it, if what you fear should come upon you. But as I conceive there are six months yet to deliberate upon this matter, you know the old saying, many things fall out between the cup and the lip. And pray don't fill your head with the fears of a trouble, though never so great, that is at a distance, and may never be. For if you think too much on a matter you dread, it will certainly disturb your quiet, and that will infallibly injure your health: and you cannot but see, Sir, that would be of a bad consequence. The King is willing to hear you; you know your own heart to do good, and you have lived some time, and have had experience. You say well that such a one is the best and worst friend. I think I should have had more tenderness to the will and temper of my friend. And for his justification, one may say, he prefers good to many, before gratifying one single person; and a public good ought to carry a man a great way. But I see your judgment (if your inclination does not bias too far) is heartily against him in this matter, that you think you cannot do as much good then, as now. We must see if you can convince him thereof; and when he is master of that notion, then let him labour to make your way out of those briars, he has done his part to bring you into; though something else would have done it without him, I believe, if I am not mistaken in this, no more than I am, that this letter is much too long.' The King proceeding in October to press the Dean still more urgently on this subject, had prevailed with him so far that he acquainted her Ladyship he did not know how to resist his importunity; to which she returned an answer, in these terms. ' The time seems to be come, that you must put anew in practice that submission you have both so powerfully tried yourself, and instructed others in*, I see no place to escape it. You must take up the cross and bear it. I faithfully believe it has the figure of a very heavy one to you, though not from the cares of it. The King guesses right, you toil more now (26). But this work is of your own chusing (27), and the dignity of the other, is what you have bent your mind against, and the strong desire of your life has been to avoid. Had this even proceeded to a vow, it is, I think, like the virgins of old, to be dissolved by the father of your country.' Though these letters of her Ladyship stand in Dr Tillotson's life (28) to a disadvantage, in contrast with those of so great a master of the epistolary, as well as all other kinds of writing, yet I believe they will be thought not to lose upon the comparison of them. And it may be observed, by the bye, (which was also an additional reason for inserting these extracts from them) that they serve in a great measure to clear Bishop Burnet from a charge reported to his disadvantage, that he had a view himself to the Archbishopric, and that his disappointment therein, was the ground of an incurable resentment against King William, to whom he had been so much obliged. A particular which has escaped notice, under his article in this work.

[O] The present Duke is her grandson ] The genealogy of this noble family, is drawn out at large in the Peerage of England, which being in every body's hands, would be tedious to transcribe here. We chuse rather to employ the present remark in some account of another Lady Russell, who not less than the last mentioned, is the deserved boast of the family. I mean Elizabeth, wife to John, the second son of Francis, the first Earl of Bedford, of this name. She was third daughter of Sir Anthony Cooke, of Giddeshall, in Essex †, where she was probably born, about the year 1529. She was equally happy with her other sisters, in the advantage of a learned and polite education †, and in the progress she made in the learned languages, which gained the applause of the most learned men of that age. Her first husband was Sir Thomas Hobby, whom she accompanied in his embassy into France, under Queen Elizabeth. Where he dying in 1566, aged 36, left this his disconsolate Lady big with child, who brought him honourably home, and having erected a chapel on the fourth side of the chancel of the church of Bisham, in Berkshire, she deposited his and his brother Sir Philip Hobby's remains together in the same tomb, which she adorned with large inscriptions, in Latin and English verse, of her own composing (29). She brought Sir Thomas three children, Edward, Elizabeth, Anne; and had one Thomas, posthumous, who by his extravagance and undutifulness, proved a great trouble to her (2). Lord John Russell was her second husband, who dying before

(26) His Majesty among other motives had used this. ' You talk of trouble; I believe you will have much more cause in it, than in the condition in which you now are.'

(27) He had particularly asked for the Deanery of St Paul's. See his article.

(28) From p. 205 to 209. 202 from p. 222 to 225, inclusive.

† One of the learned tutors to King Edw. VI.

|| She had three sisters, of whom Mildred, the eldest, was married to Sir W. Cecil, afterwards Lord Burleigh. Anne, the second, was wife to Sir Nicolas Bacon, and by her, father of Lord Verulam. And Catharine, the fourth, married to Henry Killigrew, Esq; of Cornwall. Camden Fuller, Lloyd, Strype, Dugdale, Fulman, in notes to the History of the Reformation.

(29) Ashmole's Berkshire, Vol. II. p. 465, 466 to 469.

(2) As the letter she wrote on that subject is a conspicuous proof that she was a lady of spirit and sense, and moreover an excellent economist, which are essential parts of her character, it must not be omitted. It is addressed to her brother-in-law Lord Treasurer Burleigh, in these terms:

' My good Lord,
' Thinking it my duty to present my humble duty to her Majesty, and to send to the Coorte, to understand how her Majesty, in this troublesome tyme doth bear this unnaturall conspiracy ag<sup>t</sup> her self and theyre country: I thought good also to give your self most humble and hartly thanks for your L.'s letters, and to let your L. know, that in my harte I kiss the hand that tooke so much payne with penn. Agayne I found my chyld in Sheppey, and he is now here. The cause of his departure to be, because he should this next tearme by my appoyntm<sup>t</sup> have been placed in Innes of Coorte for his better instruction: where I had taken order, he sh<sup>d</sup> have been placcd at Michaelmas last was a twelvemonth, as Mr Farmer can witness for me; but that in respect of his litteness, Mr Farmer intreated me both in respect of his own credit and the howse, I wold<sup>d</sup> forbear, till he were bigger: for that he should be reputed as a chyld. The boy sayth that by no means he can form himselfe to lyke, or to take that coorse to his owne good and my comfort. On the other syde for travell. The sequell of his brother's travell, and example of Anthony Bacon* doth make me resolute in no wise to consent to his going over-sea. The dawnger most great. I have but two soones. The profit uncerteyne, fryvolous; the languages to be learned, without fyte of countryes, here at home by bookes, with less dawnger than in these days by journey. The certayne fruites dayley fownd of yong men's travelling now a dayes, nothing but pryde, charge, and vanity, in demming better of theyr own conceytes, than wisdom wold. And though I will never be fownd unnaturall, yet will I not, while I live, beggar my selfe for my cradell, if I may prevent it. Now, my Lord, s<sup>i</sup>ns he will not applye himselfe to law, which I greatly desired, the next coorse is to dedicate him to your service, the onlie man, and subject, my selfe doth see much honour, and love as to afford my sonne to serve and weare livery. Yf it please your L. to vouchsafe to accepte him, he shall during your lyking of him, to the honoure of your L. service, cost me yearly an hundredth pounds; if he applye himselfe thoroughly and diligently to please your L. If it please not your L. to accept him, nor to trouble your self with him, assuredly such hath his unnaturall bad nature and insolency ben in suspecting me, with disdayne to serve me, and envying my love to his poore wronged sisters, being infants, joynd with refusal to take that coorse of law which m<sup>t</sup> have in end bredd my comfort and his own good; so with reverence be it spoken to your self only, I am resolute, let him gad to my L. of Leicester, or who living, except my Lord Threasurer's service, he shall never cost me more, than the forty pounds yerly already assured to him; and procured first of mine own inclination with the perswasion of any living or ded: s<sup>i</sup>ns I have so smal thanks for that, I am taught for more. Neather shal eny living, I except none, perswade me during mine owne

* Lord Verulam's elder brother, by our author's sister Anne. See his article in this Work; in which, however, the circumstance of his travels here mentioned is omitted.

* A shrewd hint of the Dean's endeavours to persuade Lord Russell to submit to the doctrine of Passive Obedience.

' owne naturall life, to assure eny more to him, fims he had the face to say to myself, that if that had ben of my doing, it sh<sup>d</sup> not have ben so assured to him. My Lord, thogh I be not so bad a bird as to defyle mine own nest, yet I know my children as well as the wisest shall in tyme, and have not a desire to understand w<sup>t</sup> is further from me to be ignorant of them, that are so nere; and that my naturall inclination hath been by love and reason to procure my children to love and fear me; yet I have not deserved thereby contempt, nor showd my self simple in being ignorant of my due and vawle of my defart. My Lord, I beseech yow think me not passionate, I abhor that humour; but beleive me, the unnaturall hard nature and infolency of this boy hath exceded his brother's. This hath eaten no bread fims his birth, but w<sup>t</sup> my purs hath pay'd for. Neatier hath he grote but w<sup>t</sup> my money hath payd for, neather can he live with more, but by me; or your selfe, that for my sake will do more than wee both can deserve. What his owne infirmities and insufficiency by want of stature, learning, and otherwise be, I know; w<sup>t</sup> of mere love with<sup>t</sup> the persuasions of any, I have done and endured for him, in not yielding his brothers wardship to my Lord Russell, God and my selfe best know. Yf I be an honest woman, fims his father's death and his birth seven thousand pounds have gone owt of my purse for things ment to him, besides his own charge of education; neather could my Lord of B's rage, or my La. Warwicke's malice, or my Lord Russell's want, make me careles to leave him able to live after my death.

' The lease of the parsonages being now two hundred marks by the yere, I have made to him after my death.

' The lease in reversion for 50 yeres being worth 400 markes by the yere; I have made to him.

' Puden being 300 l. de claro yerely, I have made the inheritance unto him, w<sup>t</sup> cost me 35 hundred pownds.

' The Black Fryers inheritance after my life, I have made unto him, purchas and building cost me above 1000 l.

' The 40 l. from his brother out of Lenchwich cost me five hundred pownds.

' Other stuff and plate, boughnt new and ment to him after my death, as himselfe knew before his running away, w<sup>t</sup> hath cost me and must 14 hundred pownds.

' His brother yet was an Heyr able to live with<sup>t</sup> me, had the law of the land to back him, and both most onduifull and monstrous. I mean to fend him to your L. to hamper, thogh to avoyd the opynion of passion my self in choler but coldly have not utter'd a word, whereby my servants m<sup>d</sup> discern my warr between mine own flesh and blood: but in trewth mine own mi fortune doeth sting my very hart with the greatest grief, thogh I smother it. Let himself be examined, if ever I were bitter to him, gave him ill speche, underflooded the left of mislike or want, before his letter sent after his departure. His brother sweareth and voweth, that he knew nothing of his folly; but submitteth himselfe and his service in most dutifull manner. Thus beseeching God to blefs both your hart, band, and your whole selfe with great comfort and long lyfe. Farewell good Lord and most beloved brother. Written from Dunnington this 25 of August, your Lordship's loving sister,

ELIZ. RUSSELL.

' Yf your Ldp here that I mary, think it not fraunge, for I live without comfort of eny living; God and your self excepted: all other I find more cumbrows and dawngerous than comfortable. But my owld man * is fed to be sodaynly ded: I hope it be not so. He was well on Friday after dinner. I received a letter written in his own hand on Saturday, and yet reported on Tuesday, to my L. of Northumberland, as his steward told me, to be ded, and that sodaynly.'

* Mr Nokes of Shuttlebrook.

(30) On a pedestal of black and white marble, made column-wise in imitation of a Roman altar, is seen the statue of a young lady, seated in a most curiously wrought offer chair of the finest polished alabaster, in a very melancholy posture, inclining her head to the right, and with the fore-finger of her left pointing to a death's head under her feet. Crull's Antiquities of Westminster Abbey.

before his father, in 1584, was buried in Westminster-Abbey, where a magnificent monument is erected to his memory, embellished with inscriptions in Greek, Latin, and English, drawn up by this his excellent Lady. She had issue by him one son, who died young, anno 1580, and two daughters, Anne and Elizabeth, the last of whom survived her father but a short time, being said to have bled to death by the prick of a needle, in the fore-finger of her left hand, as seems to be intimated by the figure placed on her monument (30); which is within the same grate with that of her father, and was erected to her memory by her only surviving sister Anne. Lady Russell translated from the French, into English, a tract, called, A Reconciliation of a good and learned Man, teaching the true Nature and Substance of the Body and Blood of Christ in the Sacrament; printed in 1605, with a dedication to her only daughter Anne Herbert, wife to the Lord Henry Herbert, son and heir to Edward, Earl of Worcester †; which begins thus.

' Most virtuous, and worthily beloved daughter, Even as from your first birth and cradle, I was ever most careful, above any worldly thing, to have you suck the perfect milk of sincere religion: so willing to end as I began. I have left to you, as my last legacy, this book, a most precious jewel, to the comfort of your soul. Being the work of a good learned man, above fifty years since, in Germany; after by travayl a French creature; now naturalized by me into English.' Then proceeding to give a reason of her publishing this piece, she adds, that at first she meant not to fet it abroad in print, but herself only to have some certainty, to lean unto in a matter so full of controversy, and to yield a reason of her opinion. But since lending a copy of her own hand to a friend, she was bereft thereof by name: and fearing least after her death it should be printed according to the humours of others, and wrong of the dead, who in his life approved the translation with his own full witness. Therefore dreading, she said, wrong to him, above any other respect, she had by anticipation prevented the work. And then piously and affectionately she concludes, that she meant it for a new-year's-gift: and then farewell my good Nancy: God blefs thee with the continuance of the comfort of the holy Spirit, that it may ever work on, and persevere with you, to the end, and in the end.' After which, she closes the whole with this tetralich.

In Annam filiam.

Ut veniens annus tibi plurima commodet annos,

Voce pia mater supplice mente precor.

Catalogue of Noble Authors, under Essex.

Ut valeat pariterque tuo cum conjuge proles,

Officiis junctis, vita serena fruatur.

Elizabetha Russell, Dowager.

To her daughter Anne,

That each new year, new blessings Anne may bear,

Thy tender mother breathes her pious prayer.

Blest be thy husband, blest thy offspring be,

And all thy days from every ill be free (31).

(31) Strype's Annals, Vol. II, p. 469.

She lived to the age of sixty-eight years, if not longer (32), and was probably buried by her first husband in the chapel at Bisham, which she had founded; there being a very magnificent monument there erected against the fourth wall, and fenced with iron spikes. In the middle is a large arch, raised upon four pillars, under which the statue of this Lady appears in a kneeling posture, having a Viscountess's coronet on her head. On the cushion whereon she kneels, is laid before her the figure of a young infant; and behind, only her three daughters. Westwards, but without the arch, are the statues of two men in armour, likewise kneeling. Eastward (but without the arch also) is the statue of a Lady vested in a robe lined with ermine, and a Viscountess's coronet on her head. On a black marble tablet, placed near the foot of the monument, is this inscription.

MH ΔΑΚΡΥΣΙΝ ΚΟΣΜΕΙ ΜΗ
ΚΛΑΥΘΜΑΣΙΝ ΕΝΤΑΦΙΑΞΟΝ
ΠΟΙΕΙ ΕΙΜΙ ΕΑΡΩΣΑ ΔΙ' ΑΣΤΡΑ ΘΕΩ.

In another tablet are these translations.

Nemo me lachrymis decorat neque funera fletu,

Faxit, cur, rogat? vado per astra Deo.

Nor tears my friends, nor funeral rites employ,

Ask ye the cause? I soar to heav'nly joy (33).

(33) See the Latin verses in Athol's Berkshire, p. 491, where the word rogas is omitted.

Sir John Harrington observes, that if Madam Vittoria, an Italian Lady, deserved to have her name celebrated and transmitted to posterity, by Ariosto, for writing some verses in manner of an epitaph, upon her husband after his decease. This learned Lady certainly deserves no less commendation, having done as much, or more, not only for two husbands, but for her son, daughter, brother, sister, and venerable old friend Mr Nokes of Shuttlebrooke, in the Greek, Latin, and English tongues (34).

(34) Harrington's notes upon Ariosto, p. 314.

S.

SACKVILLE [THOMAS], the first Lord Buckhurst, and Earl of Dorset, was born in the year 1536 (a), at Buckhurst in the parish of Withiam in Suffex, the seat of that most ancient and honourable family (b). He had a manly turn of behaviour in his infancy, which being enlivened with an excellent wit (c), must needs give early hopes of that great man he afterwards proved. From a private tutor at home, where he most probably had the first part of his education (d), he was sent to Oxford in the latter end of King Edward's reign; and, after some stay there, he removed to Cambridge, and took the degree of Master of Arts (e). Early at the universities, he got the name of a good poet, by several performances in that admirable art [A], in which he continued to indulge his genius after his removal to the Inner-Temple in London (f), where he was sent in order to acquire a proper knowledge of the Law; and he proceeded so far in that study, as to be called to the Bar (g), but without any design to practise that profession, his birth and family inspiring other views. Accordingly, we find him in Parliament in the fourth and fifth year of Philip and Mary. About the same time, in 1557, he wrote his poetical piece, intituled The Induction [B], or Introduction to the Myrrior of Magistrates,

(c) Fuller's Worthies, under this article.

(d) See remark [E].

(e) Wood, in Athen. Oxon. Vol. I. col. 347; who supposes he was of Hart-hall, because his son was so. But the Antiquary's expression is too loose, that he was educated in the university in Queen Mary's reign, if he was married in the time of Phil. and Mary, as is said in the inscription upon his lady's tomb.

(f) His father was of that society, and a Bencher from the 1 to 6 Eliz. inclusive. Dugd. Baron. Vol. II. p. 399.

(g) Fuller, as before.

(a) Dr. Abbot, in his Funer. Sermon, observes, that he lived to the age of 72 years, and died in 1608.

(b) They came into England with the Conqueror, being before possessed of the town or seignory of Sackville in Normandy, whence they took their name.

(1) Ath. Oxon. ubi supra; and he is followed by Mr Spenser, in the preface to Gorboduc, Lond. 1736, 8vo. p. v.

(2) Ibid. p. iv.

(3) Mr Warton intimates, that even more than some glimmerings of this genius appear in the history of Grande Amour & la Bel Facul. by Stephen Hawes, in 1505, 21 Henry VII. Observations on the Fairy Queen of Spenser, p. 233, 234. edit. 1754, 8vo.

(4) This is a series of visions, founded on Bucce de Casibus Illustrium Virorum.

(c) Observations on the Fairy Queen, &c.

[A] He got the name of a good poet, &c. We owe this particular to Mr Wood, who tells us, that his Lordship wrote several copies of verses in Latin as well as English while he was at Oxford; but these are all now either lost or not known to be his (1).

[B] He wrote his Induction about 1557. Mr Spenser (2), speaking of his Lordship as a poet, declares, 'that the dawn of our English poetry was in Chaucer's time, but that it shone out in him too bright all at once to last long. The succeeding age was dark and overcast. There was indeed some glimmerings of genius again in Henry the Eighth's time (3); but our poetry had never what could be called a fair settled daylight, 'till towards the end of Queen Elizabeth's reign. It was between these two periods that Lord Buckhurst wrote, after the Earl of Surry, and before Spenser.' 'Lydgate's Fall of Princes (4), says Mr Warton, gave rise to the Mirror of Magistrates. In 1559, R. Baldwine was requested to continue Lydgate's series of the Great unfortunate; but he chose to confine himself rather to our English story. Accordingly, he began with Robert Tresilian in 1333, and ended with Lord Hastings in 1483 (5).'

But the instances were taken here and there from our English history, without any great order. Afterwards there was a design formed of collecting all the examples from the beginning of our history to their own times. It was then that Lord Buckhurst wrote his Induction, which was to have been prefixed as a general preface to the whole; but that design being dropt, it was inserted in the body of the work, just before one of the said stories written by the same hand. The plan of the Induction is a descent into hell. The poet feigns he descended thither in person, as Dante had done. Those unhappy men were to have passed there in review before him, and each in his turn to have told his own faults, and his misfortunes. This piece is written so much in Spenser's manner, abounding in the same sort of descriptions of shadowy beings, and is so much in the same stile, that at first reading, Mr Spenser seeing the two authors to be of the same school (for, says he, there are schools in poetry as distinguishable as those in painting), immediately concluded Lord Buckhurst might be set down as a scholar of Spenser's; but, upon comparing dates, he found, that if one formed himself by the other, it must have been Spenser that was a scholar of Lord Buckhurst, his Induction being written before Spenser was ten years of age, and his Lordship had left off writing before Spenser began to write (6). In the same sentiment, Mr Warton having observed, that, in the Mirror of Magistrates, there was one piece so beautifully drawn, which exhibits a train of imaginary personages, that in all probability they contributed to stimulate and awaken the imagination of Spenser, in forming the like descriptions. This, however, continues he, may be affirmed from demonstration, that Sackville's INDUCTION approaches nearer to the FAIRY QUEEN, in allegorical representations, than any other previous or succeeding poem*. We shall give the reader a taste of this piece in the two following stanzas:

The wrathful winter hastning on apace,
With blustering blasts had all ybar'd the trees;
And old Saturnus, with his frosty face,
With chilling cold had peer'd the tender Greene.
The mantling rest wherein enwrapped been,
The glad some groves that now lay overthrowne,
The tapet torn, and every tree down blown.

The foil that erst so seemly was to seem,
Was all despoiled of her beauteous Hew;
And those fresh flowers wherewith the former's queen
Had clad the earth, now Boreas blasts down blew.
And small birds, flustering in their song, did rew
The wintry months, wherewith each thing defac'd,
In woeful wife bewail'd the former past.

After the Induction immediately follows, as the collection now stands, his Lordship's story of the Duke of Buckingham; which, tho' in Mr Spenser's opinion, does not affect one so much as the former, yet he thinks it may be said to be written in as poetical a manner, and in a

(6) Preface to Gorboduc, p. v. vi.

* Observations, &c. p. 235, 236. and Mr Cibber remarks, that if Sackville did not surpass Spenser, it was because he had the disadvantage of writing first. Agreeably to which, Tasso, on seeing Guarini's Pastor Fido, exclaimed thus: If he had not seen my Amynta, he had not surpass'd it. Lives of the Poets, Vol. I. p. 57.

(b) An old-fashioned title to a set of poems, which were very much applauded in their time. It consisted of examples of eminent bad men, who had come to miserable ends.

(f) Collins's Peerage, under Sackville; and Spense, as before.

(7) Preface to Gorboduc.

(8) Observations on Spenser's Fairy Queen, as before.

(9) In the preface, p. 253. In this edition the title is, A Mirror of Magistrates, being a true Chronicle History of the untimely falls of such unfortunate princes and men of note, as have happened since the first entrance of Brutus into this island, until this our latter age.

(10) Ath. Oxon. Vol. 1. col. 347. From Miles's Catalogue of Honour. He seems to have been at this time detained by the Queen, as a private attendant upon her person. See his last Will.

(11) Spense. But this is said too carelessly, since his imprisonment lasted only fourteen days. See note (k), in the text.

(12) Id. apparently from Wood, who speaks of another edition only in 4to. The title at first was the tragedy of Ferrex and Porrex.

(13) Col. 348. where the Antiquary tells us, with no better authority, that the three first acts were done by Tho. Norton, who turned some of David's psalms into rhyme.

(14) Sidney's Apology for Poetry. Lond. 1595, 4to.

Magistrates, a series of poems (b), which was formed upon a dramatic plan [C], and his Tragedy of Gorboduc (the first scenes that ever appeared in verse), was acted in 1561 [D]. Thus having, by these productions, established the reputation of being the best poet in his time, he laid down his pen, and quitted that character (i). In the first Parliament of Queen Elizabeth, he was elected for the county of Sussex, at the same time as his father was chosen for Kent; and in the second Parliament of that reign, when his father was returned for Sussex, he was chosen member for the county of Bucks. Not long after this, he resolved, notwithstanding (he had been married several years*), to travel into foreign parts. In this resolution, he made the tour of France and Italy, and was in prison at Rome (k), when the news arrived of his father's death in 1566 [E]. Hereupon, he obtained his release, returned * See note (d).

(k) He was detained only 14 days, occasioned by some who hated him for his love to religion, and to his duty to his sovereign. Funeral Sermon, as before.

purser stile, than any other story in the whole collection (7).

[C] The Myrror of Magistrates was formed upon a dramatic plan. Every person is introduced speaking. For instance, Richard the Second is thus introduced: 'Suppose you see the corpse of this prince all to be mangled with blew wounds, lying, pale and wan, all naked upon the stones in St Pauls church, the people standing round about him, and making his complaynt in manner as follows,' &c. Mr Warton allows the plan is capable of admitting some of the most affecting pathetical strokes; but these, however honoured with the commendation of Sir Philip Sidney, are little better than a biographical detail, except Sackville's piece (8). This collection was first printed by W. Baldwyne, in 1559, 4to in an old English letter. W. Higgins published a second edition, with large additions, in 1587, 4to. and a third edition, with still further additions, was printed in 1610, by Richard Nicholls, of Magdalen college in Oxford, who gives this account of our author (9): 'That the penmen of the chronicle being many and diverse, all diversly affected in the method of this their Mirrour, he followed the intended scope of that most honourable personage, who, by how much he did surpass the rest in the eminence of his noble condition, by so much he hath exceeded them all in the excellency of his heroidal stile; which, with a golden pen, he hath limmed out to posterity, in that worthy object of his mind, the tragedy of the Duke of Buckingham, and in his preface, then intitled Master Sackville's Induction. This worthy president of learning, intending to perfect all this story himself, from the Conquest, being called to a more serious expence of his time, in the great State affairs of his most Royal Lady and Sovereigne, left the dispose thereof to Mr Baldwyne, &c.'

[D] Gorboduc was acted in 1561. On the 18th of January, by the gentlemen of the Inner Temple, before her Majesty at Whitehall (10), but it was not then published. Afterwards, while Lord Buckhurst was on his travels, and about the time that he was detained prisoner at Rome (11), some Bookseller here took the advantage of his absence, and published it in a very incorrect manner in 1565. He obtained his liberty, and returned into England soon after, in 1566, to take possession of the immense estate left him by his father; and, when his affairs were thoroughly settled, he published a correct edition of it himself in 1570. It afterwards went through other editions (12); notwithstanding which, for many years past it had been so strangely lost, that Mr Dryden and Oldham, in the reign of Charles the Second, had never seen it (though they pretended to criticize it), both mistaking the very name of Gorboduc for that of a woman; and that so noted an antiquary as Antony à Wood had seen as little of it, appears from his telling us it was written in old English rhyme (13). However, he is right in observing, that this tragedy was esteemed, by the wits of that age, to be the best of its time; of which there needs no other testimony, than what he produces in Sir Philip Sidney. 'Gorboduc, says that noble author, 'is full of stately speeches and well-sounding phrases, climbing to the height of Seneca his stile, and as full of notable morality, which it doth most delightfully teach, and thereby obtains the very end of poetry. Yet in truth 'tis deservious in the circumstances, which grieves me, because it might not remain as an exact model of all tragedy (14).' The defect Sir Philip speaks of is in the unities of time and place, which are both neglected; and, indeed, to these rules of Aristotle, few authors of any age, and none of that, have conformed. Mr Rymer, after Sir Philip Sidney, is high in his commendation of the fable and characters of this play. 'Gorboduc, says he, is a fable, doubtless better turned than any on this side the Alps, in that time, and might have been a better direction to Shakespear and Jonson, than any guide they have had the luck to follow. Here is a King, a Queen, and their two sons; the King divides the realm between his two sons; they quarrel; the elder brother rules the younger, which provokes the mother to kill the elder. Thereupon the King kills the mother, and then, to make a clear stage, the people rise, and dispatch old Gorboduc (15).' Mr Pope, extracting the sense of both these critics, dispenses it in the following words: 'The writers of the succeeding age might have improved as much in other respects, by copying from him a propriety in the sentiments, a dignity in the sentences, and an unaffected periphrasticity of stile, which are so essential to tragedy, and which all the succeeding poets, not excepting Shakespear himself, either little understood, or perpetually neglected.' To which Mr Spense adds, that 'tis no wonder, if the language of kings and statesmen should be less happily imitated by a poet than a privy-counsellor (16). The truth is, Mr Pope, it seems, took a fancy to retrieve this play from oblivion, and give it a run; in which design, Mr Spense was employed to set it off with all possible advantage, and it was printed pompously in 1736. But the defects both in the conduct and management of the plot, and particularly in the want of that magic of Shakespear's poetry, which fascinates so as one cannot see his defects in the unities, hath thrown Gorboduc nearly again into its former state of neglect. In effectuating which, perhaps, the strongly pointed Antirevolutional principles at the conclusion, have had a share. This principle animates the whole last act, particularly the speech of Eubulus, or the good counsellor; who having declared his opinion with the rest for punishing the authors of the rebellion, goes on thus:

And fully with the Duke [Wenard] my mind agrees,

That no cause serves, whereby the subject may
Call to account the doings of his Prince;
Much less in blood by sword to wreak revenge;
No more than may the hand cut off the head.

In act nor speech, nor in secret thought,
The subject may rebel against his Lord,
Or judge of him that sits in Cæsar's seat,
With grudging mind to damn those he dislikes:
Though Kings forget to govern as they ought,
Yet subjects must obey, as they are bound (17).

We must not omit to mention one use of Gorboduc, in respect to the custom of the dumb shew, then in use before every act; which is this, that these help us to a fuller relish of the chemical energy of Shakespear's genius, in exalting this clumsy contrivance into an exquisite entertainment, in his introduction to scene vii. Act III. of Hamlet.

[E] In prison at Rome when he heard of his father's death. As the name of Sackville was generally inverted in reproach of Sir Richard's niggardly and penurious temper, which brought upon him the nickname of Fill-Sack (18); it will not be improper, in the view of setting that matter in a true light, to give a succinct account of him, as follows: Being first put under a severe schoolmaster, he contracted a distaste to learning at fourteen years of age (19). So that he was sent young to Gray's-Inn; where he became such a sedulous student in the Law, that he was chosen Lent reader,

(15) Mr Rymer, as it seems, for the sake of the climax, deviates in this particular from the fable; according to which, the people are supposed to kill both their King and Queen.

(16) Preface to Gorboduc, at the end.

(17) Act V. scene i. p. 50, 51, 8vo. edition.

(18) Nantun's Character of the Court of King James.

(19) Asham's Schoolmaster, in the preface, p. viii. edit. 1711, 8vo.

anno

* He made good use of his travels, in improving himself both in the languages, history, and State affairs, &c.

returned home, and entered into the possession of a vast inheritance, and soon after was taken into the peerage, by the title of Lord Buckhurst *, having been first knighted by the Duke of Norfolk in the Queen's presence the same day, June 8, 1567, 9 Eliz. He enjoyed this accession of honour and fortune too liberally for a while, which, added to some former expences, occasioned by the same profuseness, brought him under some difficulties: 'till being reclaimed by the Queen [F], to whom he was allied (1), her Majesty

(1) His grandfather married a sister to Sir Tho. Boleyn, afterwards Earl of Wiltshire, and father to Queen Anne Boleyn, mother to Queen Elizabeth. Camden Elizabetha, in initio.

received

anno 20 Hen. VIII. a post conferred only on persons of distinguished great learning and knowledge in the faculty. He was afterwards of the Inner-Temple; for which he had so great a regard, that when at the height of his preferments, he accepted the place of a governor, and continued so from the first year of Queen Elizabeth to his death. In 34 Hen. VIII. he was Escheator of Surry and Suffex, and was constituted Chancellor of the Court of Augmentation, 2 Edw. VI. with a fee of 300 marks per annum, and all profits, &c. and was knighted the same year at Westminster; and, in the ensuing year, he was made Custos Rotulorum of the county of Suffex; and, in the fourth of this reign, was empowered, as Chancellor of the Augmentation office, to grant to any of the King's subjects lands or tenements of the revenues of the Crown, for term of life or years, upon letter or bill from the Privy-Council. In June 1552, he was in commission, with other Privy Counsellors, for the sale of Chantry lands (20). Upon the accession of Queen Mary, his patent of Chancellor was renewed, and he was also sworn of the Privy-Council. He was elected for Portsmouth in the first Parliament of this reign, and in the fifth succeeded his father, John Sackville, in his estate. When Queen Elizabeth came to the Crown, she chose him of her Privy-Council, tho' not of her religion *, and constituted him Under-Treasurer of the Exchequer, which office he held to his death. In the fifth of Elizabeth, Margaret Countess of Lenox was committed to his custody, being accused of secret practices against the government. He was elected to Parliament for Kent, 1 Eliz. and in all others, whilst he lived, was chosen for Suffex (21); so that he must have been in a good degree of favour with the people, and therefore, probably, not such a niggard as some have represented him, under the characteristic of a man of a wife foresight.

It is certain he died extremely rich; but it is as certain, he had very great opportunities by his places to amass wealth; so that the large increase which he made to his estate, might be no more than the unavoidable effect of a good economy; the nickname owing it's birth more to the low witticism of it, than to any just cause: at least we have one instance of a disposition very far from illiberality, and which shews his purse was not spared upon a proper occasion. I mean the method that he took for the education of his grandson, concerning which we have the following account by the famous Roger Ascham, to whom Sir Richard applied on this occasion. In 1563, the Queen being at Windsor, Ascham dined one day with Secretary Cecil, where, among others, Sir Richard was one of the guests; when the Secretary told the company a piece of news he had heard that morning, that several of the scholars were run away from Eton school for fear of a whipping (22). Upon this there ensued a discourse about the preference of a mild or severe master, wherein all the company gave their opinions except our treasurer, who said nothing at all then; but soon after, following Ascham into the privy-chamber, he took him by the hand, and carrying him to a window, said, 'Mr Ascham, I would not for a good 'deal of money have been this day absent from dinner; where, though I said nothing, yet I gave as good ear, and do consider as well the talk that passed, as any one did there. Mr Secretary said very wisely and most truly, that many good wits be driven to hate learning, before they know what learning is. I can be good witness myself; for a fond schoolmaster, before I was fully fourteen years old, drove me so, for fear of beating, from all love of learning, as now, when I know what difference it is to have learning and to have little or none at all, I feel it my greatest grief, and find it my greatest hurt, that ever came to me, that it was my so ill chance to light upon so lewd a schoolmaster. But seeing it is but in vain to lament things past, and also wisdom to look to things to come, surely, God willing, if God lend me life, I will make this my mishap some

'occasion of good hap to little Robert Sackville (23), my son's son; for whose bringing up I would gladly, if it so please you, use specially your good advice. I hear say you have a son much of his age: we will deal thus together: point you out a schoolmaster, who by your order shall teach my son and your's, and for all the rest I will provide; yea, though they three do cost me a couple of hundred pounds by the year; and besides, you shall find me as fast a friend to you and your's, as perchance, any you have; which promise, concludes Mr Ascham, the worthy gentleman surely kept with me until his dying day (24).

It appears from the sequel of this discourse, that what is said in the Schoolmaster concerning the right choice of a good wit in a child for learning, and of the difference between quick and hard wits, of alluring young children by gentleness to love learning, was done at the instance of Sir Richard, as well as the special care that is to be had from licentious living (25). 'But expressly, says Mr Ascham, he was most earnest with me to have me say my mind, what I thought concerning the fancy that many young gentlemen in England had to travel abroad, and namely to lead a long life in Italy. His request, both for his authority and good will towards me, was a sufficient commandment unto me, to satisfy his pleasure, with uttering plainly my opinion in that matter. Sir, quoth I, I take going thither, and living there, for a young gentleman that doth not go under the keep and guard of such a man, as both by wisdom can, and authority dare, rule him, to be marvellous dangerous (26). We have given this discourse in the very words it is delivered, because it serves to shew that Lord Buckhurst's going to Italy was against his father's mind, and probably occasioned by debts contracted through a profuse extravagance, which also might not unlikely be the cause of his imprisonment at Rome; especially, since, upon the news of his father's death, he immediately procured his releasement †. Mr Ascham did not finish this book 'till after Sir Richard's death, and not long before his own death, which happened in 1568, leaving it as a legacy to his children.

'I wish also, says he, with all my heart, that young Mr Robert Sackville may take that part of this labour that his worthy grandfather proposed he should have done.' He gives this eulogium of Sir Richard. 'In the midst of outward injuries and inward cares, to increase them withal, good Sir Richard Sackville died; that worthy gentleman; that earnest favourer and furtherer of God's true religion; that faithful servitor to his prince and country; a lover of learning and all learned men; wise in all doings; courteous to all persons, shewing spite to none, doing good to many; and, as I well found, to me so fast a friend, as I never lost the like before (27).'

By his last Will, dated May 22, 1566, he bequeathed to his son Thomas his greatest chayne of gold, charging him, on his blessing, that he should preserve and leave the same to Robert Sackville his heir. He also bequeaths to Queen Elizabeth these poor tokens (as he expresses it). One great jewel of a table emerald, with a mallet of diamonds, a great pearl, and one hundred of great pearls, as also a man of diamonds set in a brooch. Most humbly beseeching her Highness to accept these, according to his faithful heart, and not according to the virtue of the gift; and that it will please her Majesty to be a good and gracious sovereign lady to his poor wife and children (28). Thus wisely did he secure the royal favour to his family, the fruits of which were presently reaped by his son Lord Buckhurst, as is seen in the text.

[F] 'Till he was reclaimed by the Queen.' This is asserted upon the authority of Sir Robert Naunton, strengthened by the internal evidence or credibility of the thing, on account of the general temper and disposition of the Queen, and her particular affection to his Lordship and his family; and therefore not to be impeached by a small inaccuracy, which, as is remarked by Collins,

(23) The great care of the Treasurer, in the education of his two grandsons, is likewise taken notice of by Lord Clarendon. Hist. of the Rebellion, B. 1.

(24) Ascham's preface to his Schoolmaster, &c. p. 1; to VIII. edit. 1711, 8vo.

(25) From this and the foregoing passage it is conjectured, that his son Lord Buckhurst was educated under a private tutor.

(26) Schoolmaster, p. 62.

† The reader will observe, that this conjecture is very consistent with the account of his imprisonment, mentioned above in note (2);

(27) Preface to the Schoolmaster, &c. p. X4

(28) Peerage; ubi supra, from a copy of the original Will in the Prerog. Office, Regist. Durseti;

(20) During this reign, he resided at Derby place, a house of the Earl of Derby near Paul's-wharf, which was afterwards granted to the Heralds at Arms, and is now the place of their residence.

* Camden; who observes, however, that he converted soon after.

(21) Peerage of England, under this family.

(22) This seems to be Nic. Udal, whose severity is proclaimed by Tupper, one of his scholars, in these lines:

From Paul's I went,
To Eton sent,
To learn six ways
The Latin phrase;
Where fifty-three
Stripes given to me
At once I had.
For fault but small,
Or none at all,
It came to pass,
That best I was,
See, Udal, see,
The merc' of thee,
To me poor lad.

(m) Rapin's Hist. of Eng. p. 437.

(n) Perhaps, as Mr Collins thinks, because being a person of fine accomplishments and a tender disposition, he could manage so delicate a point with more address than any other courtier. See Peagee, as before.

received him into her particular favour, and sent him Ambassador to Paris in 1570 [G], to congratulate that monarch's marriage, and negotiate a treaty of the same kind between herself and his brother the Duke of Anjou (m). Three years afterwards his name is found among those peers who sat on the trial of Thomas Howard Duke of Norfolk, for plotting to deliver the Queen of Scots out of prison; and, in 1586, being of the Privy-Council, he was appointed one of the commissioners for the trial of that Queen; and, when the Parliament had confirmed the sentence of death passed upon her at Fotheringay-castle (m), he was made choice of to carry the news to her Majesty (n), and see it put in execution. In the succeeding year, he was sent Ambassador to the States of the United Provinces, upon their complaints against the Earl of Leicester. This was a trust of a nice and hazardous nature, and he discharged it with an unbiassed integrity; and, correcting what had been

may, perhaps, have slipt that author, when he tells us, that his Lordship spent the best part of the vast patrimony left him by his father in his youth; and after all, the critic seems to have given way to the censure too easily, as it seems from that fond humour which is frequently seen in Biographers, of dressing out some eminent persons, like the heroes of a romance, and considering themselves as retained to pump their wits, for colouring to excuse and extenuate all their faults and foibles incident to human nature, whose characters are in reality more liable to be hurt than helped by such shifts. Mr Collins, in order to confirm his criticism, that Naunton's account is taken on trust, urges, 'That if it be considered that his Lordship served in Parliament in the reign of Queen Mary, and that when his father died, his son Robert was five years of age, as is evident from the inquisition taken after his death, he must be then towards thirty ||; so that 'tis likely his profuseness (if any) was in the life time of his father, whereby he was induced to travel: and the Queen's promoting him to the dignity of peerage, on his accession to the estate, and employing him on a splendid embassy, in the fourteenth year of her reign, to his great expence, makes it hardly credible that her Majesty would send him to waste his fortune, had his estate been much impaired, when he was also not possessed of a great part of it, his mother being then living, and enjoying a large jointure (29).' Thus it is suggested, that Sir Robert's account is full of inconsistencies, and therefore the whole story of his Lordship's profuseness, at any time of his life, is built upon no good foundation. But the criticism upon the word youth, made use of by Naunton, seems to be too severe, and, indeed, looks like a drowning person's catching at a twig; since there is no good warrant for limiting the appellation of youth strictly within a certain age, in drawing characters; and 'tis evident Sir Robert, in a courtly manner, extends the term in the present case, to the end of his Lordship's youthful follies, which is no unusual nor improper sense of the word. These are Naunton's words: 'He was a very fine gentleman of person, and endowments both of art and nature, but without measure magnificent, 'till on the turn of his humour, and the allay that his years and good counsels had wrought upon those immoderate courses of his youth, and that height of spirit inherent in his house.' It is not denied, that he run in debt by extravagance before his travels, a scheme that was resolved on some time after his marriage, which therefore had not reclaimed him, so that he spent some part of the estate before he came to it. And the Queen's raising him to the peerage on his accession thereto, and employing him four years afterwards on a splendid and expensive embassy, is consistent enough with his still continuing these immoderate courses, and her Majesty's frequent admonitions to divert the torrent of his profusion; since the embassy could not but be agreeable to his humour, and was such an entrance into business, as would most likely have it's designed effect of turning his thoughts that way*. 'Tis said, however, that his conversion was brought about by other means, and that calling on an Alderman of London, who had got very considerably by the loan of his money to him, he was obliged to wait his coming down so long, as made such an impression on his generous humour, that thereupon he turned a thrifty improver of his estate †. Whatever truth there may be in this story, which is only founded upon common report; yet no time being fixed when the incident fell out, 'tis consistent enough with Sir Robert Naunton's account, who, after the last cited passage, proceeds thus: 'And then

' did the Queen, as a most judicious and indulgent prince, when she saw the man grow staid and settled, give him her assistance, and advanced him to the Treasurership, where he made amends to his house for his mispent time, both in the increase of estate and honour which the Queen conferred on him, together with an opportunity to remake himself, and thereby to shew that this was a child that should have a share in her grace and a taste in her bounty (30).'

(30) Naunton, ubi supra.

[G] He went on an embassy into France.] We have the following account of this embassy by Holinshed. 'This year, about Candlemas, Sir Thomas Sackville, Baron of Buckhurst, was sent in embassy from the Queen's Majesty to Charles the Ninth, French King, as well to congratulate for his marriage with the daughter of the Emperor Maximilian, as for other weighty affairs (31); and, as his embassy was great, so was his charge no less, in furnishing himself and train accordingly, being both in number and furniture such in every point, as did appertain unto his character; and his receiving and entertainment in France, by the King and others, was agreeable thereto: for he was received upon the coast by the governors of the fortified towns right honourably, by order from the King. Among others, the Baron of Bournoisel was one, who being very well mounted and appointed, left not his Lordship before he came to the court, and from thence accompanied back, until his department homewards.

(31) His Lordship mentions this embassy in his last Will, as a matter of great trust and importance, concerning a secret treaty of a marriage betwixt her Majesty and Henry, the third son of Harry the Second of France, begun with her by Katharine de Medicis, then Queen-mother of France.

In the main countries he was accompanied with the governors and nobles of the places about, and in the good towns where he passed, he was presented by the chief magistrates, wherein their good wills were to be thankfully accepted, though his Lordship's rewards far overvalued their presents. At his approach near to Paris, he was encountered on the way, for courtesy-sake, by the two Marquises of Trans and Saluces, this being of the house of Savoy, and the other of the worthy family of Foix. These wanted not such as accompanied them, and the same even of the best sort. At the Lord Ambassador's first audience, which was at the castle of Madril, otherwise called Bullogne near Paris, where the King then lay, the Queen's almain coaches, very bravely furnished, were sent to Paris for him, in one of which his Lordship, with the Marquis of Trans, rode towards the Court, very narrowly escaping from a shrewd turn, and great mischance, by reason the said coach was overthrown by the Dutch waggoners, through negligence, who in a bravely galloping the field, made an over-short turn, wherewith the Marquis was fore bruised.

'The Lord Ambassador, at his arrival at the place, was right honourably received; he was banquetted by diverse, and that very sumptuously; which by him was not left unrequited to the uttermost, and rather with the better; for his liberality unto the French was very large, but his reward at the King's hands was only a chain, weighing a thousand French crowns. At the present, there was a great dearth and scarcity of victuals in France; the river Seine, that runneth through Paris, was not passable with vessels, by reason of the great frosts; and thereby, not only all kind of victuals, but also hay and wood [for firing] hard to come by, and not to be had, but at excessive prices, the country thereabouts having before been fore hurried and spoiled by the civil tumults.' The historian concludes his account with informing us, that his Lordship arrived in England a little before Easter (32).

(32) Holinshed's Chronicle, p. 1224, 1225.

|| It appears without more ado, from the time of his birth setled above, that he must be so when his father died.

(29) Id. ibid.

* He says himself in his last Will, that in his younger years he was, by the Queen's particular choice and liking, selected to a contynewall private attendance upon her own person.

† Fuller's Church History.

been done amiss there, drew upon himself the displeasure of that favourite; who prevailed with the Queen to call him home, and confine him to his house for nine or ten months (o); when his enemy dying, her Majesty's favour returned to him with stronger rays than before (p), and in April following he was elected, without his knowledge, Knight of the Garter, though he was not installed 'till the 18th of December, 1580; being the same year appointed one of the peers for trying Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel [H]. He was joined in several other important commissions this and the following year [I]. But the Queen gave him a most remarkable proof of her favour, when the Chancellorship of Oxford became vacant by the death of Sir Christopher Hatton, in 1591. The Earl of Essex offered himself a candidate for it, and was opposed by Lord Buckhurst: Parties grew warm, and the election became very doubtful. At last it was determined for Lord Buckhurst, through the influence of a letter wrote by the Queen herself in his favour, even against the Earl of Essex. He was elected on the 17th of December, and in the beginning of January was incorporated Master of Arts, in his lodgings in London, by a special commission appointed for the purpose; and, in September 1592, visiting the university, her Majesty honoured him with her presence, and staid there several days, being agreeably entertained with elegant speeches, plays, and disputations, and received a splendid treat from the Chancellor (q). In 1598, he joined with the Lord-Treasurer Burleigh in negotiating a peace with Spain, which so much alarmed the States of the United Provinces, that, to prevent it, they sent over John Duvewood, Admiral of Holland, and others, for renewing their treaty with the Crown of England. Whereupon a new treaty was concluded, and signed by Lord Buckhurst and the said Ambassadors; whereby the Queen was eased of no less than 120,000 pounds per annum, besides other advantages (r). The Treasurer Burleigh lay sick at this time; and upon his death, which happened soon after, Lord Buckhurst succeeded him in that office May 15th this year (s). This was the first post he had in the Establishment, and being not only the most powerful but the most profitable place therein, was given him by the Queen expressly in compensation of the many eminent services which he had done for his country at his own great expence (t). By virtue of this office, he became in a manner Prime Minister, and as such was particularly vigilant both for the publick good and her Majesty's safety; and when scandalous libels were dispersed by the Earl of Essex's faction, insinuating that the Queen and her Council took little care of the government and altogether neglected the state of Ireland, the Treasurer thought himself concerned to vindicate her Majesty, and made sharp reflections on those infamous libels, representing how brave and well regulated an army had been sent into Ireland, compleatly furnished with all manner of provisions; and likewise that her Majesty had expended on that war, in six months time, the sum of 600,000 pounds, which he said the Earl of Essex must own to be true (u). He early suspected this Earl's designs, and observing a greater concourse of people than usual resort to his house, he sent his son [Robert Sackville] to make the Earl a visit, and desire him to be careful of the company he kept; and when that unhappy favourite was brought to his trial, together with the Earl of Southampton, in 1601, Lord Buckhurst sat on that occasion Lord High Steward, and conducted the whole proceeding with eminent dignity, tempered with a just mixture of prudence and humanity (w). He was also in the commission to treat and compound with others concerned in this rebellion, for redemption of their lands, upon paying such fines as should by the commissioners be assessed, and to cause a pardon to be made out for the said treasons (x). The place of Earl Marshal becoming vacant by the death of Essex, the office was put into commission, and his Lordship constituted one of the Lords Commissioners for exercising it (y). The last public commission he received from his royal mistress, was that in 1603, for putting the laws in execution against Jesuits, Seminary Priests, and other Ecclesiastics, ordained according to the order or rites of the Romish Church, and brought up seditiously beyond the seas or elsewhere (z). Upon the decease of the Queen, the administration of the kingdom devolving on him, with other Counsellors, they unanimously proclaimed King James, and signed in Westminster Hall, for diverse practices in relation to his religion, and favouring of the Spaniards; nevertheless he had his pardon for life, but continued prisoner in the Tower 'till his death in 1595, before he had completed the fortieth year of his age. During his imprisonment, he lived in the severity of his religion a most strict and austere life (33).

[H] One of the Peers for trying Philip Howard, Earl of Arundel ] This commission was a consequence of the former, upon the trial of Tho. Howard Duke of Norfolk, father to this Earl of Arundel. Notwithstanding the Duke's attainder his eldest son held this title with the appurtenances, in right of his mother, it having been adjudged in Parliament to be a feudal honour, or local dignity, held by inheritance and possession of that castle only, without any creation; so that by this appellation he sat in Parliament, Anno 23 Eliz. in which Parliament he was restored in blood from the attainder of the Duke his father. But being a zealous Roman Catholick, after the strict laws made against the Papists, he endeavoured to go beyond the seas without leave, and being discovered was apprehended and sent to the Tower of London, Anno 1584. In 1586 he was fined 10000 l. in the Star-Chamber for his misdemeanors, and attempt to go beyond sea; and three years afterwards was arraigned, and condemned by his Peers

[I] Other commissions this and the following year. ] One for instance, to enquire into the goods of the Spaniards concealed in London, with power to call before them such parties as they think proper, and to make seizure, &c. (34). The affairs of the United Provinces being likewise under his inspection, he was one of the council at Greenwich, 7 April 1590, who signed a letter to the States about the keeping of Ostend (35); and in 1591, being stiled Dominus de Buckhurst Magnum Pincernum Angliæ, was one of the commissioners that signed a treaty on the part of her Majesty with Henry IV. of France (36).

(o) He was so obsequious to this command, that in all the time he never would endure, openly or secretly, by day or night, to see either wife or child. Funeral Sermon, by Abbott, printed in 1608, 4to.

(p) He had behaved so warily and discreetly in the Netherland, that no blame could be fastened on him. Ibid.

(q) Ath. Oxon. col. 346. and Fast. col. 141, 142.

(r) Stowe's Annals.

(s) Pat. p. 11. from 21 to 42 Eliz.

(t) Besides the costly magnificence in his embassies, the Queen observed, that on his coming to his estate, he bountifully, on diverse occasions, scaffolded her Highness and her nobles, and foreign ambassadors. At that time, he entertained a band of music of the best hands that could any where be got; his Lordship here excelled to his dying day. Queen Elizabeth's Character of his Lordship, in his Funeral Sermon, by Abbott, as before.

(u) Gen. Hist. of England. Sir Henry Wotton observes, that he counted up 300000 l. which was received by Essex in gifts, besides the fees of his office, and the dispose of great sums of money in her Majesty's armies. Reliq. Wotton. p. 24.

(w) Gen. Hist. of England.

(x) Pat. 43 Eliz. p. 7. m. 43.

(y) Rymer, Vol. XVI. p. 384.

(z) Ibid. p. 446.

(33) Peerage of England, under Howard Duke of Norfolk.

(34) Rymer, Vol. XVI.

(35) MSS. in Bib. Cotton. C23 ligula.

(36) Rymer, # before.

signed a letter on the 28th of March, 1604, to the Lord Eure, and the rest of the Commissioners (aa) for the treaty of Breme, notifying her Majesty's decease, and the recognition and proclamation of King James of Scotland; so that the renewal of his patent of Lord High Treasurer for life was ordered by that monarch, before his arrival in England, and even before his Lordship waited on his Majesty; for he staid to pay his last respects to the memory of the Queen, by seeing her interred on the 28th of April, when he was one of the supporters to the chief mourner, the Lady Marchioness of Northampton (bb). This last duty to his relation being performed on the 28th of April, 1603, he met her successor on the second of May, at Broxborn in Hertfordshire, where he was very graciously received, and confirmed in his post of Lord Treasurer at the seat of Sir Henry Cock (cc). He waited on his Majesty to Theobalds, then the seat of Sir Robert Cecil, Secretary of State; and was one whom the King principally confided and consulted on the measures proper to be taken, as also the choice of his chief officers, which for the most part were then settled, his Majesty staying there four days. On the 13th of March following, he was created Earl of Dorset (dd). As this was a reign in which honours were dispensed with a much less unsparring hand than the preceding, so this new title would, perhaps, be deemed no fresh proof of his extraordinary worth and merit, did not King James herein appear to be, in a very proper sense of the word, executor to Queen Elizabeth. In which spirit also, we find the commission was renewed to the Earl, for executing the office of Earl Marshal at the same time (ee). He was afterwards the first in commission, with four other Lords of the Privy-Council, for mediating and concluding a peace with Spain, which was signed at London the 18th of August, 1604 (ff). The same year he received an order from the King, to warrant and authorize all customers, comptrollers, &c. to demand the sum of six shillings and eight pence on every pound weight of tobacco, over and above two pence in the pound actually paid (gg). This was a consequence of his Treasurer's place, as was also some other transactions the following years [K]. He lived in the highest esteem and reputation, without any extraordinary decay of health, 'till 1607, when he was seized at his house at Horsley in Surry with a disorder that reduced him to such extremity, that his life was dispaired of; which coming to the ears of the King, his Majesty in the beginning of June sent the Lord Haye, one of the Gentlemen of his Bedchamber, with a gold ring enamelled black, set with twenty diamonds, and this message, that His Majesty wished him a speedy and perfect recovery, with all happy and good success, and that he might live as long as the diamonds of that ring did endure, and in token thereof required him to wear it, and keep it for his sake (bb). This was a very comfortable cordial, and raised his spirits, so that he actually recovered this blow; but his constitution was so much broken by it, that he became apprehensive of his approaching end; and under that sense, in August following, he made his last Will maturely and deliberately, declaring occasionally among his friends, that he had settled his soul, and composed it to another world, whensoever God should call for him. Moreover, the last morning of his life he was observed to be longer than usual at his private devotions (ii). But whatever forewarnings he might feel, from any thing amiss within, that he was not far from death; yet the suddenness of the stroke, at the time, was evidently unforeseen and unthought of; for he was attending at Whitehall, as usual, at the Council-table, when he dropt down, and immediately gave out his last breath, surrounded by the first officers of state, the Queen herself being present (kk). This sudden death, which happened on the 19th of April, 1608, was occasioned by a particular kind of dropsy in the brain [L]. He was interred with great solemnity in Westminster-abbey (ll), on the 26th of May following; his funeral sermon being preached by his chaplain Dr George Abbot, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury, wherein he sets forth his character to the best advantage, as may be seen below [M]. We shall here give an extract of what is said

[K] This was a consequence of his Treasurer's place, &c. How much the publick good was affected by this extraordinary duty upon Tobacco, laid to hinder the consumption of that herb, has been already observed in the course of this work (37); and all that can be said in behalf of the Treasurer is, that for ought that appears, his part in it was purely ministerial, this duty proceeding wholly from the King's unaccountable aversion to the plant. As to the other transactions mentioned above, it appears by them, that his Lordship shewed a particular concern for the preservation of the records of the kingdom, and the jewels of the crown. For Robert Earl of Salisbury, Principal Secretary of State, delivered to the Treasurer several treaties and writings specified in an indenture the 9th of October, 3 Jac. I. And in 1606 he was a party to the King's indenture, wherein he annexed diverse royal and princely diadems, crowns, coronets and jewels, of great estimation and value, inseparably for ever hereafter to the crown of this realm, which his Majesty signed by his Lordship's perswasion and advice, and the schedule annexed was drawn by his order (38).

[L] His death was occasioned by a particular kind of dropsy in the brain ] J. Baker informs us (39), that upon opening his head there were found in it certain little bags of water*, which, whether by straining of his study the night before, in which he sat up 'till eleven o'clock, or otherwise by their own maturity suddenly breaking, and falling upon his brain, caused his death.

[M] Dr Abbot's character of him, &c. Having gone through his eulogium by Queen Elizabeth, as a Scholar, Traveller, Courtier, and a Minister, the Doctor proceeds thus: 'Never was there any Nobleman, who with more humble agnizing, with more feeling and affectionate gratefulness, did entertain the favours of his Sovereigns.—And for other parts of moral virtues, how many rare things were in him: who more loving unto his wife, that honourable Lady, the mirror of all true virtue, a worthy testimony whereof he hath recorded in his last Will (40). Who more kind to his children and grand children; who more fast unto his friend? who more moderate

(40) He there leaves her very large legacies, not as any recompence of her infinite merit towards him (which he declares is above all recompence), but as a token of his love, reverence, and esteem, for her virtues of charity, modesty, fidelity, humility, severity, wisdom, patience, and a mind replete with all piety and goodness.

(kk) Dugdale calls it an apoplexy, apparently from the suddenness of it. Baron. Vol. II. p. 399. and he is herein followed by Spenser, in preface to Goebodue, p. iiii.

(ll) However, his corpse afterwards, as Dugdale assures us, was carried to Withiam, and buried there according to his request in his last Will.

* Called Hydatices by the Physicians.

(aa) Ib. d.

(bb) General History of England.

(cc) Chauncy's History of Hertfordshire.

(dd) Pat. 1 Jac. I. p. 12.

(ee) Rymer, Vol. XVI. p. 608. This office did not return into the family of Howard 'till 19 Jac. when it was conferred upon Thos. Howard Earl of Arundel, the collector of Antiquities, and son to Philip already mentioned. Peerage of England, Vol. I.

(ff) Stowe's Annals.

(gg) Rymer, p. 601.

(bb) See his last Will in the Prerogative office, in Registr. vocat. Dorset.

(ii) His Funeral Sermon, by Dr Abbot, then Dean of Winchester.

(37) In Sir Walter Raleigh's article; where the detriment done thereby to the revenue was taken notice of; and it must not be denied, that in this instance our Treasurer was more obsequious to his royal master's pleasure, than careful of his country's good.

(38) Rymer, Vol. XVI. p. 641 to 635.

(39) In his Chronicle, p. 56.

said of him in more moderate terms by Sir Robert Naunton, as follows: ' They much commend his elocution, but more the excellency of his pen; he was a scholar, and a perfon of a quick difpatch, faculties that yet run in the blood; and they fay of him, that his fecretaries did little for him by way of inditement, wherein they could feldom please him, he was fo facete and choice in his phrafe and ftile: and for his difpatches, and the content he gave to fuitors, he had a decorum feldom fince put in practice; for he had of his attendants that took into roll the names of all fuitors, with the dates of their firft addreffes, and thefe in their order of hearing; fo that a frefh man could not leap over his head that was of a more ancient edition, except in the urgent affairs of State. I find not, continues this writer, that he was any ways inured in the factions of the Court, which were all his time ftrong, and in every man's note; the Howards and the Cecils on the one part, my Lord of Effex, &c. on the other part: for he held the ftaff of the Treafury faft in his hand, which once in the year made them all beholden to him. And the truth is, as he was a wife man and a ftout, he had no reafon to be a partaker; for he flood fure in blood and in grace, and was wholly intentive to the Queen's fervices; and fuch were his abilities, that fhe received affiduous proofs of his fufficiency; and it has been thought that fhe might have more cunning instruments, but none of a more ftrong judgment and confidence in his ways, which are fymptoms of magnanimity and fidelity; whereunto methinks his motto hath fome kind of reference, Aut nunquam tentes, aut perfice; as though he would have charaetered in a word, the genius of his houfe, or expreffed fomewhat of a higher inclination than lay within his compafs (mm).* To this charaeter of Naunton, we fhall fubjoin the obfervation of a late honourable author (nn), that few Firft Minifters have left fo fair a charaeter, and that his family difdained the office of an apology for it, againft fome little cavils, which (mm) Naunton's Fragment, Regalia, p. 70.

(nn) Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors of England, p. 162. Vol. I. fecond edit. 1759, 8vo.

Secreta

(41) In proof of this, the testimony of a nobleman is brought, who in a public assembly declared after his death, that in much conversation and concurrence in many caufes of great weight and importance, he never heard him fpeak, or in earneft affirm, that which he found to be otherwife.

† Or rather fifty-one, as it is in the infcription upon her monument in Buckhurst-chapel.

(42) This was in August 1605, when Prince Henry was alfo matriculated in the univerfity, as a member of Magdalen-college, Wood's Fafti, col. 172. Vol. I.

* Viz. After 26 s. 8d. the quarter, when others ordinarily fold for 40s.

to his enemy? who more true of his word (41)? No Nobleman was more given to hofpitality, and keeping of a great houfe, having lived feventy and two years, for fo was his age accounted, and being married more than fifty and three years unto one and the felf fame lady †, he kept houfe for forty and two years in an honourable proportion: for thirty years of thofe his family confifted of little lefs, in one place or another, than two hundred perfons; but for more than twenty years, befides workmen, and other hired fervants, his number at the leaft hath been two hundred and twenty daily, as appeared upon check roll; a very rare example in this prefent age of ours, when houfe-keeping is fo decayed. Who more magnificent than his Lordfhip in folemn entertainments; as befides other particulars, was manifefed abundantly to the world not long before his death, when his Majefty, with the Queen and Prince, together with a great part of the nobility fpend divers days at Oxford (42). Who was ever more defirous to do wrong unto none? His Lordfhip bought no land, but he commonly paid more for it than it was worth, yielding this reafon, that it would be the better profper, and continue in his name and pofterity. In his will, how careful was he that all debts fhould be paid; yea, that there was no fpeciality whereby it might be challenged. The like alfo for wrong done to any one whatsoever, whereof he protefted before the eternal Majefty, that he did not remember any. Unto thefe honourable parts I may add a great many more, as his good and charitable difpofition towards his tenants, of whom ordinarily he took lefs fines by a third part than by other lords is ufually accuftomed; and his farmers held his farms, as is well known to the world, but at reafonable rents: as his relief to the poor, in pinching times of dearth, in the year 1597, which was a time of the greateft fcarcity that ever we did know, his Lordfhip lent into Suffex of his free gift, as much Daniſh rye bought at Billingfgate as coft 154l. 14s. 7d. And this prefent year 1608, his Lordfhip caufed weekly certain quarters of wheat to be carried from his own granary at Lewes in Suffex, and to be fold in the market to the poor at a far lower rate than the price which commonly men did take*. And that this his Lordfhip's bounty might continue after his death, by his laft Will and Teftament he hath bequeathed a thouſand pounds for the erecting of a granary at the place which laft I named, for the ufe and benefit of poor people in thofe parts; and two thouſand pounds as a ſtock for the ſtoring of that houfe againft times of dearth and fcarcity. Unto this he hath alfo joined a thouſand pounds to be beſtowed on the building of a chapel at Withiam, where his anceftors do lie, and where his Lordfhip defired that his body might be interred. Thefe are the fruits of a lively faith, and fo muft be reputed.

But becaufe a right Belief and Religion towards God is the higheft point of all, I may not here omit to fay ſomething touching that. There are arguments moſt evident to demonſtrate unto all men, that his Faith was agreeable unto the word of God, and according to the profefſion of the renowned Church of England. In that famous Univerfity of Oxford, where his Lordfhip for more than fixteen years was our honourable Chancellor, it was his ſpecial care to ſubſtitute ſuch under him as were moſt found for Religion, which the wiſer fort did obſerve, although common men did not mark it. As he kept down with one hand all novelties and humours in opinions, which laboured to ſet trouble in the Church and Commonwealth; ſo with the other hand, to the uttermoſt of his power, he deprefſed the Prieſts and Jeſuits, which have uſed too much to that place; not to the Univerfity, which, God be praifed, is free from all ſuch imputation, but to ſome few of the city, who embrace their old ſuperſtitions. In that place this I can witneſs, that his Lordfhip neither openly nor ſecretly did ever give countenance unto any that was backward in religion. And on the other ſide, that there was never any thing ſoberly and wiſely propoſed, that might forward true piety, which his Lordfhip did not further, as I could by many particulars make plain to whomſoever. Touching the education of thofe honourable plants his grandchildren, his Lordfhip was ever careful that they ſhould be trained up in the truth of religion, far from popery and idolatry. His charge was unto their tutor (as I well knew in his life-time) that as he would answer him in the day of the laſt judgment before the face of Chriſt, that he ſhould train them up in the truth of the religion profefſed now in England. How angry would he be, when he was at his country-houſe, if they came not duly to prayers. He never could endure that they ſhould otherwife be matched, than where there was found religion. Concerning his own ſoul, when the laſt year he was ſick, befides ordinary prayers, he compoſed himſelf to God by receiving at Horſeley the holy ſacrament of the Lord's Supper, when he looked to depart the world.

But two days before he died, devoutly and religiously he heard a ſermon at home, in his Lordfhip's own chapel at Dorſet-houſe; and how holly and chriſtianiſmly in his laſt Will and Teſtament doth he commend his ſoul unto God: ſo it may well be ſuppoſed that he gave him more than ordinary conjecture, or ſuſpicion, that his death was not far from him, &c. (43).†

(43) This Sermon was preached May 26th, 1608, and printed the ſame year. See Archbiſhop Abbot's article in rem. [2].

[N] He

Spretæ exoleſcunt; ſi irafcare agnita videntur (00).

Several of his Lordſhip's letters are printed in the Cabala; beſides which there is a Latin letter of his to Dr Bartholomew Clerke, prefixed to that author's Latin tranſlation from the Italian of Balthazar Caſtilio's Courtier; intituled, De Curiali ſive Aulico, firſt printed at London about the year 1571. His Lordſhip was ſucceeded in honour and eſtate by his ſon Robert, and afterwards ſucceſſively by his two grandſons, Richard [N] and Edward, which laſt is the ſubject of the enſuing article.

[N] He was ſucceeded by his ſon Robert, and his two grandſons Richard, &c. Robert was forty ſeven years old and upwards at the deceaſe of his father: he had all the advantages of education, attained ſeveral languages, and was ſo deeply learned in Greek and Latin, that they became as familiar to him as his own tongue. He had beſides a ſingular knowledge in many ſciences; and in the Houſe of Commons was a leading member, and at the head of ſeveral committees (44), having been elected for the Borough of Lewes, in 31 Eliz. and in all other Parliaments, while he continued a commoner, was choſen for the county of Suffex (45). He lived in the dignity of an Earl not a compleat year, departing this life at Dorſet-houſe, near Fleetſtreet, London, Feb. 27. 1608-9. and was buried at Withiam, according to his directions, where a noble monument is erected to his memory. He was ſucceeded in honour and eſtate by his ſon Richard, who was born 28 March 1589. in the Charter-houſe, London (46). He married the lady Anne Clifford, daughter and heir of George Earl of Cumberland, 25 Feb. 1608-9; and upon his father's deceaſe, two days after, became Earl of Dorſet. In 1611. he travelled into France on a pre engagement to his grandmother, and other of his friends before his marriage. He returned to his ſeat at Knowle in Kent, on the 8th of April, 1612. where he lived with great magnificence and hoſpitality, as he did alſo at his ſeat at Bolebrook in Suffex, and Dorſet-houſe in London, where he died on the 28th of March, 1624. and was interred with his anceſtors at Withiam. Anne, his counteſs, was remarkably religious, magnificent, and diſpoſed to letters. She erected a pillar in the county of Weſtmoreland, on the ſpot where ſhe took her laſt leave of her mother; a monument to her tutor, Samuel Daniel, the poetic hiſtorian, and another to Spenſer. She alſo founded two hoſpitals, and repaired ſeven churches and fix caſtles (47). She enjoyed large poſſeſſions of her own family the Cliffords, which ſhe left to her grandſon the Earl of Thane (48). She was remarried June 3. 1630. to Philip

Herbert, Earl of Pembroke (49), Lord Chamberlain to King Charles I. who left her again a widow in 1650. She was a lady of an admirable judgment, and has left the occurrences of her own life in manuſcript (50), wherein is this account of her firſt huſband, the Earl of Dorſet: 'That he was in his own nature of a juſt mind, of a ſweet diſpoſition, and very valiant in his own perſon; he had a great advantage in his breeding, by the wiſdom and diſcretion of his grandfather Thomas, Earl of Dorſet, Lord High-Treaſurer of England, who was then held one of the wiſeſt men of that time; by which means he was ſo good a ſcholar in all manner of learning, that in his youth, when he lived in the Univerſity of Oxford, there was none of the young Nobility then ſtudents there, that excelled him. He was alſo a good patriot to his country, and generally well-beloved in it, much eſteemed in all the Parliaments that ſat in his time; and ſo great a lover of ſcholars and ſoldiers, as that with an exceſſive bounty towards them, or indeed any of worth that were in diſtreſs, he did much diminish his eſtate; as alſo with exceſſive prodigality in houſe keeping, and other noble ways at Court, as tilting, maſking, and the like, Prince Henry being then alive, who was much addicted to theſe noble exerciſes, and of whom he was much beloved.'

She wrote alſo a letter to Sir Joſeph Williamſon, Secretary of State to Charles II. who having ſent to nominate to her a member for the borough of Appleby, ſhe returned the following answer: 'I have been bullied by an Uſurper, I have been neglected by a Court, but I will not be dictated to by a Subject: Your man ſha'n't ſtand.'

Anne Dorſet
Pembroke and Montgomery (51).

Beſides the two daughters already mentioned, ſhe brought her Lord three ſons, who all dying in their infancy, he left no male iſſue, ſo that the eſtate and honour devolved upon his younger brother Edward (52).

SACKVILLE [EDWARD] Earl of Dorſet, was born in the year 1590. and being educated by a private tutor under the care and direction of his grandſon the Treafurer (a), became accompliſhed by ſtudy and travels ſo as to be early diſtinguiſhed for his eminent abilities. He had not been long arrived to man's eſtate when he entered into a marriage with Mary, daughter and heir of Sir George Curſon (b) of Croxhall in Derbyſhire, Knt [A], and was at the ſeat of his father-in-law, in 1613, when he received a challenge from the Lord Bruce, then at Paris, whom he met, according to appointment, and killed in a duel, betwixt Antwerp and Bergenopzoom in Zealand. The affair made a great noiſe at that time, and ſeveral aſperſions being laid upon him, he drew up in his own vindication a very particular account of the fight, and ſent it to a friend in England, before his return home. This letter, a manuſcript of which is part of the choicest treaſures of Queen's college library in Oxford, ſets our young nobleman's valour, and other accompliſhments in ſo ſtrong a light, that it muſt not be excluded from a place here, as follows.

'Worthy Sir,

'As I am not ignorant, ſo I ought to be ſenſible of the falſe aſperſions ſome authorleſs tongues have laid upon me, in the reports of the unfortunate paſſage lately happened between the Lord Bruce and myſelf, which as they are ſpread here, ſo I may juſtly fear they reign alſo where you are. There are but two ways to reſolve doubts of this nature, by Oath, or by Sword. The firſt is due to Magiſtrates, and communicable to friends;

[A] Mary daughter and heir of Sir George Curſon, &c. She had the ſeat of Croxhall, and a great eſtate in Derbyſhire to her fortune, which the Duke of Dorſet now enjoys. She was a lady accompliſhed with all virtues, and an excellent judgment, being entrusted by King Charles I. with the tuition of the princeſs his daughter; and her conduct was ſo remarkable, that when ſhe died both Lords and Commons ſitting at Weſtmiſter ordered, the 17th of May, 1645. that her funeral ſhould be at the publick expence; and ſhe was buried accordingly with great ſtate and ſolemnity, Sept. 3. 1645 (1).

[B] Testified

(00) Lloyd's Worthies, p. 680.

(44) See the Journals of that Houſe.

(45) Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria.

(46) That houſe was not purchased, till after this time, by Sutton. See his article.

(47) Memoirals of Select Perſons, p. 92, 94.

(48) John Tuſton, who had married her eldeſt daughter Margaret; ſhe alſo brought the Earl of Dorſet another daughter, Iſabella, who was married in 1647 to James Compton, Earl of Northampton. Peerage of England.

(a) See the preceding article, in the two laſt remarks.

(b) This family of the Curſons were alſo enriched by the marriages of the heirs of Brabazon, Ferrers, Cumville, Clement, Hampton, Ruſhall, Preſtwood, Bradbury, and Rookewood; and are lineally deſcended from Rob. de Curſon, who came in with Will. the Conqueror. Peerage of England, under Sackville Duke of Dorſet, Vol. I.

(49) That ſimpleton, with whom Butler ſo much diverts himſelf in his Hudibras; but ſhe was divorced from him in leſs than a year after her marriage. Catalogue of Royal and Noble Authors, ubi ſupra.

(50) The MS. contains an account alſo of her progenitors, ibid.

(51) A collection of periodical papers called The World, Vol. I. No. XIV.

(52) Peerage of England, under this family, Vol. I.

(1) Clarendon's Hiſtory of the Rebellion.

‘ friends; the other to such as maliciously slander, and impudently defend their assertion. Your love, not my merit, assure me you hold me your friend, which esteem I am much desirous to retain. Do me therefore the right to understand the truth of that, and in my behalf inform others, who either are, or may be infected with sinister rumours, much prejudicial to that fair opinion I desire to hold amongst all worthy persons. And on the faith of a Gentleman, the relation I shall give is neither more or less than the bare truth. The inclosed contains the first citation sent me from Paris, by a Scottish gentleman, who delivered it me in Derbyshire, at my father-in-law’s house: after it follows my then answer returned him by the same bearer. The next is my accomplishment of my first promise, being a particular assignation of place and weapon, which I sent by a servant of mine by post from Rotterdam, as soon as I landed there. The receipt of which, joined with an acknowledgment of my too fair carriage to the deceased Lord, is testified by the last, which periods the business [B] till we met at Tergose in Zealand, it being the place allotted for rendezvous; where he, accompanied with one Mr Crawford, an English gentleman, for his second, a Surgeon and a man, arrived with all the speed he could. And there having rendered himself, I addressed my second, Sir John Heydon (c), to let him understand, that now all following should be done by consent, as concerning the terms whereon we should fight, as also the place. To our seconds we gave power for their appointments, who agreed we should go to Antwerp, from thence to Bergen-opzoom, where in the midway, a village divides the States territories from the Archduke’s: and there was the destined stage, to the end, that having ended, he that could, might presently exempt himself from the justice of the country, by retiring into the dominion not offended. It was further concluded, that in case any should fall or slip, that then the combat should cease, and he whose ill fortune had so subjected him, was to acknowledge his life to have been in the other’s hands. But in case one party’s sword should break, because that could only chance by hazard, it was agreed, that the other should take no advantage, but either then be made friends, or else upon even terms go to it again. Thus these conclusions being by each of them related to his party, was by us both approved and assented to. Accordingly we embarked for Antwerp. And by reason, my Lord (as I conceive, because he could not handsomely, without danger of discovery) had not paired the sword, I sent him to Paris, bringing one of the same length but twice as broad; my second excepted against it, and advised me to match my own, and send him the choice, which I obeyed, it being, you know, the challenger’s privilege to elect his weapon. At the delivery of the swords, which was performed by Sir John Heydon, it pleased the Lord Bruce to choose my own, and then past expectation he told him, that he found himself so far behind hand, as a little of my blood would not serve his turn; and therefore he was now resolved to have me alone, because he knew, (for I will use his own words) that so worthy a Gentleman, and my friend, could not endure to stand by, and see him do that, which he must, to satisfy himself and his honour. Thereunto Sir John Heydon replied, that such intentions were bloody, and butcherly, far unfitting so noble a personage, who should desire to bleed for reputation, not for life; withal adding, he thought himself injured, being come thus far, now to be prohibited from executing those honourable offices he came for. The Lord Bruce, for answer, only reiterated his former resolution. The which, not for matter, but for manner, so moved me, as though to my remembrance I had not of a long while eaten more liberally than at dinner, and therefore unfit for such an action (seeing the Surgeons hold a wound upon a full stomach much more dangerous [than otherwise], I requested my second to certify him, I would presently decide the difference, and therefore he should

(c) The same who was afterwards Lieutenant of the Ordnance to King Charles I. at the breaking out of the Civil Wars, and is much commended by Lord Clarendon for his fidelity and diligence in the discharge of that office. History of the Rebellion, &c. Vol. 1. p. 264. fol. edit.

[B] Testified by the last, which periods the business.] Those mentioned above to be inclosed in that of Mr Sackville are as follows:

‘ A Monsieur, Monsieur Sackville,

I that am in France, hear how much you attribute to yourself in this time, that I have given the world to ring your praises; and for me the truest Almanack to tell you how much I suffer. If you call to memory, when as I gave you my hand last, I told you I reserved the heart for a truer reconciliation (1). Now be that noble Gentleman my love once spoke; and come and do him right, that would recite the trials you owe your birth and country, were I not confident your honour gives you the same courage to do me right, that it did to do me wrong. Be master of your own weapons and time; the place wheresoever, I will wait on you. By doing this you shall shorten revenge, and clear the idle opinion the world hath of both our wrongs.

Ed. Bruce.’

‘ A Monsieur, Monsieur Baron de Kinlofs,
As it shall be far from me to seek a quarrel, so will I also be ready to meet with any that is desirous to make trial of my valour, by so fair a course as you require. A witness whereof yourself shall be, who within a month shall receive a strict account of time, place, and weapon, where you shall find me ready disposed to give honourable satisfaction by him that shall conduct you thither. In the mean time be as secret of the appointment, as it seems you are desirous of it.

VOL. V. No. CCXCVII.

E. Sackville.’

‘ A Monsieur, Monsieur Baron de Kinlofs,

I am at Tergose, a town in Zealand, to give what satisfaction your sword can render you, accompanied with a worthy Gentleman for my second, in degree a knight. And for your coming I will not limit you a peremptory day, but desire you to make a definite and speedy repair, for your own honour and fear of prevention, at which time you shall find me there.

E. Sackville.’

Tergose, 10th of August,
1613.

‘ A Monsieur, Monsieur Sackville,

I have received your letter by your man, and acknowledge you have dealt nobly with me, and I come with all possible haste to meet you.

E. Bruce (2).’

[C] Lord

(2) Guardian, Vol. 11. No. 129.

(1) Do not these expressions suggest his having before declined that satisfaction which he now demanded.

‘ should presently meet me on horseback, only waited on by our Surgeons, they being unarmed. Together we rode (but one before the other some twelve score) about two English miles; and then passion having so weak an enemy to assail as my direction, easily became victor, and using his power, made me obedient to his commands; I being verily mad with anger the Lord Bruce should thirst after my life, with a kind of assuredness, seeing I had come so far and needlessly, to give him leave to regain his lost reputation (d); I bad him alight, which with all willingness he quickly granted, and there in a meadow (anle deep in water at the least) bidding farewell to our doublets, in our shirts we began to charge each other, having afore commanded our Surgeons to withdraw themselves a pretty distance from us, conjuring them besides, as they respected our favour, or their own safeties, Not to stir, but suffer us to execute our pleasures; we being fully resolved (God forgive us) to dispatch each other by what means we could. I made a thrust at my enemy, but was short, and in drawing back my arm I received a great wound thereon, which I interpreted as a reward for my short shooting; but in revenge I pressed in to him, though I then missed him also; and then received a wound in my right pap, which past level through my body, and almost to my back. And there we wrestled for the two greatest and dearest prizes we could ever expect, trial for honour and life. In which struggling, my hand, having but an ordinary glove on it, lost one of her servants, though the meanest, which hung by a skin, and to fight, yet remaineth as before; and I am put in hope one day to recover the use of it again. But at last breathless, yet keeping our holds, there passed on both sides propositions of quitting each other’s sword. But when amity was dead, confidence could not live; and who should quit first was the question, which on neither part either would perform; and restraining again afresh, with a kick and a wrench together, I freed my long captive weapon; which incontinently levying at his throat, being master still of his, I demanded if he would este his life, or yield his sword? both which, though in that imminent danger, he bravely denied to do. Myself being wounded, and feeling loss of blood, having three conduits running on me, began to make me faint, and he courageously persisting not to accord to either of my propositions; remembrance of his former bloody desire, and feeling of my present estate, I struck at his heart; but with his avoiding miss’d my aim, yet past through the body, and drawing back my sword repast it through again through another place, when he cried, Oh! I am slain; seconding his speech with all the force he had to cast me. But being too weak, after I had defended his assault, I easily became master of him, laying him on his back; when being upon him, I redemanded, If he would request his life? But it seems he prized it not at so dear a rate, as to be beholden to me for it, bravely replying, he scorn’d it. Which answer of his was so noble and worthy, as I protest I could not find in my heart to offer him any more violence, only keeping him down, till at length his Surgeon afar off, cried out, He would immediately die, if his wounds were not stopped. Whereupon I asked, If he desired his Surgeon should come? which he accepted of; and so being drawn away, I never offered to take his sword, accounting it inhuman to rob a dead man, for so I held him to be. This thus ended, I retired to my Surgeon, in whose arms, after I had remained a while, for want of blood I lost my sight, and withal, as I then thought, my life also. But strong water, and his diligence, quickly recovered me; when I escaped a great danger, for my Lord’s Surgeon, when nobody dreamt of it, came full at me with his Lord’s sword, and had not mine with my sword interposed himself, I had been slain by those base hands; although my Lord Bruce, weltring in his blood, and past all expectation of life, conformable to all his former carriage, which was undoubtedly noble, cried out, Rascal, hold thy hand! So may I prosper, as I have dealt sincerely with you in this relation, which I pray you, with the inclosed letter, deliver to my Lord Chamberlain. And so, &c.

‘ Yours, Ed. Sackville (e).’

‘ Lovaine, the 8th of September, 1613.

Lord Clarendon intimates (f), that this was not the only quarrel of the kind into which our young Nobleman was drawn, through the excessive heat and fire of his temper [C]. The same author tells us, that having a good support for a younger brother left him by his grandfather the Treasurer, and marrying a wife with a fair fortune, he gave full scope to his constitution without restraint, and indulged to his appetite all the pleasures which that season of his life (the fullest of gaiety and riot of any that preceded, or succeeded) could

[C] Lord Clarendon intimates, that this was not the only quarrel he was engaged in, &c.] The noble Historian having observed that the duel with Lord Bruce was upon a subject very unwarrantable, proceeds thus, ‘ Nor did this miserable accident, which he always exceedingly lamented, make that thorough impression upon him, but that he indulged still too much to those importunate and insatiate appetites, even of that individual person that had so lately embarked him in that desperate enterprize; being too much tinder not to be inflamed with those sparks (3).’ We have given the remark in Lord Clarendon’s own words, because they evince, that though he had not been perfectly informed in some circumstances of the duel*, yet he seems to have been no stranger to the cause of it, and it were to be wished, that he had not been restrained, as he apparently was, by some prudential reasons from speaking more explicite upon that subject; and the rather, as Mr Addison, or whoever it was that supplied the account in the Guardian, expressly declares his ignorance in this particular (4). Nor has Mr Collins been hitherto able to throw any light into it.

* Particularly in saying it was fought under the walls of Antwerp, and our cadet’s retiring after it to a monastery near that city; as also that he was then called Sir Edward Sackville.

(4) See the Guardian, Vol. II. No. 531.

(d) This expression seems to confirm the conjecture in note (1) below, concerning the immediate cause of this duel.

(e) Peerage of England, under this article.

(f) History of the Rebellion, Vol. I. p. 60.

(3) History of the Rebellion, Vol. I. p. 60. fol. edition.

could tempt or suggest to him (g). However that be, 'tis certain, that he was in great favour at Court, and at the creation of Charles Prince of Wales (afterwards King Charles I.) on the fourth of November, 1616. he was made one of the Knights of the Bath, to grace that solemnity (b). He was also one of the principal Commanders of those forces sent in 1620, to assist Frederick King of Bohemia, in maintaining his right to that kingdom against the Emperor, at which time was fought the remarkable battle of Prague. He returned with the Earls of Essex, Oxford, and others, the 10th of November the same year (i) [D], and in July 1621. he succeeded Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, as Ambassador to the French King, and having discharged that trust with honour and fidelity, King James I. called him into his Privy Council (k). In the mean time having been elected one of the Knights for the county of Suffex in the two last Parliaments of this reign (l), he became a leading member in the House of Commons. He was elected chairman of a committee to inspect the abuses of the Courts of Justice, March 12, 1620-1. and spoke very learnedly and eloquently on the 17th in the house, in defence of the Lord Chancellor Bacon, then accused of corruption (m). But above all, his speech in the 21 James I. when a supply was asked for the recovery of the Palatinate, deserves a particular notice [E]. At the decease of his elder brother in 1624, he happened to be at Florence in Italy, but came through France into England the latter end of May following (n), when entering into the possession of the title and estate, he found it so much encumbered, that nothing upon the matter was left to support the dignity (o). But though this exposed him to many difficulties and inconveniencies, yet as Earl Richard was honourably disposed that his just debts should be paid, so his brother readily consented thereto (p). After the accession of King Charles I. he was at the head of all national affairs conducive to the interest of his country [F]. And as he had been eminent in the House of Commons, while he sat there, so he shined in the House of Peers, when he came to move in that sphere (q). He [D] He returned home the same year.] This year there happened to be a dispute between the younger sons of Earls, and the Knights of King James's Privy Council, for place and precedence; and the matter coming to be argued with great solemnity before his Majesty, the Earls sons, from a sense of the great abilities of Sir Edward Sackville, and having a knowledge of his learning, judgment, and experience, unanimously deputed him to manage the debate, and speak for them. And by his solid arguments on that occasion, the King declared himself in their favour, and ordered them place and precedence, not only before the Knights Privy-Counsellors, but also before the Knights of the most noble Order of the Garter that were not Barons, or of a higher degree (5).

[E] His speech on the petition for a supply to recover the Palatinate.] On this occasion he assured the House, that he would not sit silent, if he found himself able to say any thing that might tend to unload his country of the heavy burden it then groaned under, by reason of the innumerable number of monopolies, which like so many incubusses and succubusses exhausted the vital spirits, and so pressed down those parts which ought to enjoy free respiration.—That of his own knowledge his Majesty had commanded a select number of Noblemen and Gentlemen, who had been commanders in the wars, to consult together of what number of men an army ought to be composed, which might be able to recover the Palatinate, and protect it from a second invasion. That they had met together, had finished their task, advised the King of the number of soldiers, and given an estimate of the charge (which he informed them of), telling them, that the daughter of their King and country, scarce knew where to lay her head; or if she did, not where in safety. And therefore advised them, as the King called for aid, to give it; which would make his Majesty not only in love with Parliaments, but be the way to recall them home from exile, and again render them frequent. Concluding, that God would be pleased to incline their hearts to do that which might be most for his glory, next for the King's service, then for his Country's happiness (6).

[F] He was in all affairs conducive to the interest of his country.] Besides those mentioned above, his Lordship was in a commission appointed May 30, 1625. to enquire into all new erected buildings within the city and suburbs of London, and prevent them, as they should think proper. The same year he was also in a commission for exercising all spiritual and ecclesiastical jurisdiction in England, Ireland, and the dominion of Wales. Third of Sept. 1626. 6 Car. I. he was in a commission to proceed against all such soldiers and mariners by martial law, as commit murder, robbery, &c. in the county of Suffex, of which he was Lord Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum; and in the 15th of the same month he was made a Commissioner of the Revenues. In January 1626 7. he was of the Committee of Council for the management of affairs in Ireland. The same year he was in another commission to conclude a treaty with the Dutch. In 1629, 5 Car. I. he had conferred upon him the office of High-Steward of the Honour of Grafton. The next year he had a grant of the office of Constable of Beaumaris-Castle in North-Wales, and of the governour of that town for life. The same year, being Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, he was in a commission to order the preparation and state ceremonies at the baptism of Prince Charles, (afterwards King Charles II.) which was solemnized at St James's Sunday 27th of June this year 1630. and on the 6th of July following, he was one of the commissioners for compounding with such persons as did not appear to take the order of knighthood upon them at the King's coronation. And on the 2d of October the same year, he was with some others appointed to survey the records, writings, state-papers, &c. of Sir Robert Cotton. He was also in a commission for executing the office of Lord High Admiral; in another for repairing St Paul's Cathedral in London; and in another for the better planting of Virginia, &c. as also in a fourth to treat and agree for the inheritance of any honours, manors, &c. in Ireland; in a fifth, to exercise all jurisdiction concerning ecclesiastical affairs; and in a sixth, to enquire into the grievances and abuses committed in the several courts of justice, and other inferior courts. In 1634, in the 12th of Car. I. he received a grant of the office of keeper of Grafton-Park for life. Being of counsel to the Queen, he was authorised to put in execution the orders and directions of the King relating to the Queen's courts, the settling of her revenue, &c. He was also in the commission for managing the office of Ordnance; and in another, to compound with all those who held their estates by defective titles. In another, to see so many ships fitly prepared as the Lords of the council should direct; and to ease such counties as could not furnish the same as by the King's writs were required. In another, to propagate the Christian Religion in the colonies; and in another, to enquire again into what new buildings had been erected within the cities of London and Westminster to the prejudice of the King and his subjects. Lastly, He was one of the Commissioners with the Marquis of Hamilton, the Earls of Arundel, Pembroke, and Holland, for treating with the Lords Brederode Aerssen, Heensart, and Joachimi, about a marriage between the Princess Mary, eldest daughter of King Charles I. and William Prince of Orange, which being concluded on the 1st and consummated, she became mother to King William III (7).

(g) Clarendon's History of the Rebellion, &c. ubi supra; where his Lordship tells us, that his elder brother had in a few years, by an excessive expence in all the ways to which money can be applied, entirely consumed almost the whole great fortune that descended to him.

(p) Rymer's Fœdera, Vol. XVIII. p. 722.

(q) Clarendon, as before.

He

(g) Hist. of the Rebellion, &c. Vol. I. p. 60. fol. edit.

(b) Miles's Catalogue of Nobility, p. 127.

(i) Gen. Hist. of England, Vol. II. p. 659.

(k) Ibid. p. 657.

(l) Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria.

(m) Introduction to Sir Francis Bacon's Letters, p. 54.

(n) Memoirs of the family of Clifford. See remark [N] of the preceding article.

(5) Peage of England, from a MS. of Sir Henry St George, Garter King at Arms, in the possession of the present Duke of Dorset.

(6) See the speech at length in Rushworth, Vol. I. p. 131.

† They were married May 24, 1641. Salm. Chron. Hist.

(7) Peage of England, where the several authorities are joined.

(r) Ashmole's Order of the Garter; and by his installation-plate in St George's chapel at Windsor, he appears to be installed Decemb. 13, 1625.

(s) Rymer, p. 82.

(t) Fuller's Church History, p. 122.

(u) Annals of King Charles I. He was also of the committee to adjust the claims of all persons concerning services to be performed at the coronation, p. 230.

(w) Ibid. p. 847.

(x) Rushworth, Vol. II. p. 385, 393, 403, 405. In commemoration of this deliverance, this day is particularly observed in Ireland.

(y) Sanderson's Life of King Charles I. p. 472.

(z) History of the Rebellion, Vol. I. p. 335. 8vo. edition.

He was elected Knight of the Garter, May 15, 1625 (r), having the day before been made a Commissioner of Trade, in the view, as was expressly declared by the King, of raising the credit of that important branch of the administration (s). On his Majesty's marriage he was constituted Lord Chamberlain to the Queen, and he bore the first sword, part of the Regalia, at the King's Coronation on Candlemas day this year (t). He was continued in the Privy-Council, and shewed himself a true patriot both to his King and country. In which spirit he was in the committee of Council for setting at liberty those gentlemen that had been imprisoned for refusing to pay the loan of ship-money (u). He also joined in other orders for redressing the grievances of the subject. And it is remarkable of him, that he was never present in council when warrants were issued for levying soldiers on ship-money; neither is his name mentioned in such orders as infringed on the liberty of the subject, or were contrary to law (w). In 1640. he was appointed one of the Regents of the kingdom, during his Majesty's absence in Scotland, at which time his Lordship having intelligence of the Irish massacre, acquainted the House of Commons with that bloody design, which was to have been put in execution on the 23d of October, 1641. the commemoration day of Ignatius Loyola, founder of the Jesuit's order. By this means the general massacre was prevented (x); and upon the King's return from Scotland, he sent his Lordship on the 28th of December with a message to the Lords, 'That being sensible of the miseries of Ireland, he would, as he hath offered, raise ten thousand volunteers, if the Commons would undertake to pay them (y).' His Lordship had too discerning an eye to be deceived by any artifices and professions made use of by those, whose designs involved us in the utmost confusion, and had the interest of his country so much at heart, as to oppose all their unwarrantable proceedings. In that spirit, when the bill against the Bishops was depending in the House of Peers, and means had been used to bring down a mob to insult them, he, as Lord Lieutenant of Middlesex having command of the Trained-bands, ordered them to fire, which so frightened the rabble that they left the place. Upon which Lord Clarendon observes, that the House of Commons intended to see their friends so used, much inveighed against the Earl of Dorset, and talked of accusing him of High-Treason, at least of drawing up some impeachment against him, for some judgment he had been party to in the Star-Chamber or Council-table; and so giving these hints of their displeasure, that he might have the more care how he carried himself (z), and their not proceeding in earnest accordingly, will be thought a sufficient proof that no matter of accusation could be grounded against him. However 'tis certain, that being made this year, 1641, President of the Council, and Lord Privy-Seal, he made two speeches, advising his Majesty to a reconciliation with his Parliament [G].
And

[G] He made two speeches advising his Majesty to a reconciliation with the Parliament.] In the first of these speeches he takes notice, that though he did not succeed to the Privy-Seal, 'till now upon the death of the Earl of Manchester, yet he had long been possessed of the reversion of it. It appears also by this speech, that the Lord Privy-Seal was at this time Judge ex officio of the court of Requests, which, he observes, was the second court of Conscience in England, instituted by the Solomon of our nation (these are his Lordship's words) for the ease and relief of the subject tired with the tedious process of the suits of Chancery. The speech was made at Oxford, where the court then was, the King having left the Parliament and London; so that his Lordship did not succeed to this post, as he here intimates, 'till it became impossible to it put in execution. In proceeding, he complains greatly of the corrupt practice of the Law-court, No penny, says he, no Pater noster.

*Quantumvisque sua nummorum seruat in arca,
Tantum habet & legis.*

He observes, that the Egyptians in their hieroglyphicks deciphered Justice under the figure of an Elephant, the nature of that beast, for his strength, being aptest to carry great burthens, intimating thereby, that on the back of Justice all the weight of the commonwealth should be imposed, that being the only support of it's welfare; 'the want of which, I was once in mind, continues he, if it had pleased God, that we who are servants to his Majesty had continued at London, to have made it a motion to the high court of Parliament, for passing a definitive sentence, with his Majesty's consent, against these tedious delays of suits. But the more are the times to be lamented, that this, nor any thing else for the good of the subject, can be enacted by reason of these civil uncivil wars, and differences betwixt his sacred Majesty and his high court of Parliament; were these reconciled by a fair and happy unity, I would with much joy and alacrity of spirit enter upon this honourable office, and manage it so, as I would discharge true conscience to God, the duty of a true subject to my Prince, and the honest integrity of a

Judge to those, who have causes depending before me. But I should seem too much my own trumpet, did not yourselves, my Lords, in your candid dispositions believe what I have uttered.'

In the second speech he is more particular in pressing a reconciliation with the Parliament. After acknowledging his Majesty's favour, and expressing his own undoubted and inviolable fidelity, he proceeds thus: 'The councils of kings are in the hands of the Almighty; and those that are of their council ought to regulate their thoughts and actions, so far to the service of their master, as they shall not be esteemed mere politicians, working in the gentleness and suavity of their nature for their own ends, but in perpetuating the common good, which must needs conduce to the good of the Sovereign. Counsellors that are out of this path, are rather to be termed seducers, and such should be punished, being indeed mere Achitophels, crafty and malicious. And I must needs here deplore the present condition of your sacred Majesty, (in my sorrowing for your royal distress, I express my humble gratitude for your bounty) your high court of Parliament, from whom you have departed hither, being of a settled opinion, as appears by their declarations, that all the machines of evil, that like so many furies fly through your Highness's dominions, have taken their original from the persuasion of bad counsellors. If any such there be, or have been, about your sacred Majesty, I shall most humbly pray for their removal, or conversion from such sinister practices; and think myself (mine integrity will gain a remission for my boldness) engaged in duty and conscience to inform your Majesty, that 'till such counsellors be removed from your Grace's ears, there will never be any hopes, that the distractions of your kingdom can be healed, or the wounds, of which it hath so long bled, be embalmed, much less perfectly cured. For how can your Parliament, the grand and supreme council of your kingdom, comply with the desires of your Majesty, when they conjecture, that whatever they shall desire of your Majesty, shall be thrown by and nullified by the intimations of some few private cabinet counsellors; which was the reason, I conjecture, of their late humble address

And in the same spirit, the following year, waiting on the King at York, where his Majesty published a declaration of his peaceable intentions, Lord Dorset was one of those noble Peers who June 15, 1642. subscribed a declaration of their being witnesses of his Majesty's frequent and earnest professions of 'his abhorring all designs to make war upon his Majesty; and not seeing any colour of preparations or counsels that might reasonably beget the belief of any such designs, do profess before God, and testify to all the world, that they are fully persuaded his Majesty had no such intention; but that all his endeavours tend to the firm and constant settlement of the true Protestant Religion, the just privileges of Parliament, the liberty of the subject, and the law, peace, and prosperity of this kingdom (aa).' And when he found a party in the Houses too strong to be satisfied, he then supplied the King with money, attended him in the field, and at the battle of Edgehill behaved with the greatest bravery, leading on the troops that retook the Royal Standard, which had been taken by the enemy, when Sir Edward Verney was slain (bb). The same year the Earl of Essex having deserted the King's interest was displaced, and the Earl of Dorset declared Lord Chamberlain of the Household in his room, and waiting on the King at Oxford, he took all occasions to effectuate an accommodation between his Majesty and the Parliament. In which patriot spirit at the Council-table in February this year, 1642. he made a remarkable honest speech, in answer to one of the Earl of Bristol, for continuing the war [H]. And being afterwards among those Peers assembled in Parliament at Oxford in Jan. 1643, his Lordship had a chief hand in drawing up a letter, and procuring it to be subscribed by them, and directed to the Earl of Essex, 'Inviting him to use his interest for making peace, conjuring him by all the obligations that

(aa) Ibid. Vol. II. p. 655, 656. The Earl of Essex had before shewn a particular regard for him, in addressing his letter to his Lordship, to acquaint his Majesty, that he had a petition to deliver from the Parliament, and to know when he would receive it. Ibid. p. 30.

(bb) History of the Parliaments in England, p. 62.

(8) The act for triennial parliaments passed in Febr. 1640-41. Salmon.

(9) In the title, these two speeches are intimated to be printed, in order to shew his Lordship's good affection to the Parliament, and the Commonwealth of this Kingdom.

addresses for the settling the election of your counsellors in the power of the commonwealth, namely, in the triennial Parliaments (8); that if there have been such counsellors who have formerly incensed your Majesty against your Parliament, by misconceits and glosses, I doubt not now their advices are of no validity in your Grace's judgment. For mine own part, with the tender of my life to your Majesty's service, I prostrate myself in all humility at your Grace's feet for your gracious favours towards me; and crave pardon for my boldness, which I am confident your Majesty will grant, knowing it to be progressive of my integrity and my duty (9).

[H] His speech in answer to the Earl of Bristol. It is in these terms. The Earl of Bristol has delivered his opinion, and my turn being next to speak, I shall with the like integrity give your Lordships an account of my sentiments in this great and important business. I shall not, as young students do in the schools, argumentandi gratia, repute my Lord of Bristol's tenets, but because my conscience tells me they are not orthodox, nor consonant to the disposition of the commonwealth; which languishing with a tedious sickness, must be recovered by gentle and easy medicines in consideration of its weakness, rather than by violent vomits, or any other kind of compelling physick. Not that I shall absolutely labour to refute my Lord's opinion, but justly deliver my own, which being contrary to his, may appear an express contradiction of it, which indeed it is not; peace, and that a sudden one, being as necessary betwixt his Majesty and his Parliament, as light is requisite for the production of the day, or heat to cherish from above all inferior bodies. This division betwixt his Majesty and his Parliament being as if (by miracle) the sun should be separated from his beams, and divided from his proper essence. I would not, my Lords, be ready to embrace a peace that would be more disadvantageous to us than the present war, which, as the Earl of Bristol says, would destroy our estates and families: the Parliament only declares against delinquents; such as your conjecture have misconcelled his Majesty, and be the authors of these tumults in the commonwealth. But these declarations of theirs, except such crimes can be proved against them, are of no validity. The Parliament will do nothing unjustly, nor condemn the innocent; and certainly innocent men had not need to fear to appear before any judges whatsoever. And he who shall for any cause prefer his own private good before the public utility, is but an ill son of the commonwealth. For my particular, in these wars I have suffered as much as any; my house hath been searched, my arms taken thence, and my son and heir committed to prison. Yet I shall wave these discourtesies, because I know there was a necessity it should be so. And as the darling business of the kingdom, the honour and prosperity of the King, study to reconcile all these differences betwixt his Majesty and his Parliament, and so to reconcile them, that they shall no way prejudice his royal prerogative; of which I believe the Parliament, being a loyal defender, (knowing the subject's property depends on it, for if sovereigns cannot enjoy their rights, their subjects cannot) will never endeavour to be an infringer: so that if doubts and jealousies were taken away by a fair treaty between his Majesty and the Parliament, no doubt a means might be devised to rectify these differences; the honour of the King, the estates of us his followers and counsellors, the privileges of Parliament, and property of the subject, be infallibly preserved in safety, and neither King stoop in this to his subjects, nor the subjects be deprived of their just liberties by the King. And whereas my lord of Bristol observes, that in Spain very few civil dissensions arise, because the subjects are truly subjects, and their sovereign truly a sovereign; that is, as I understand it, the subjects are scarcely removed a degree from slavery, nor the sovereign from a tyrant; here in England, the subjects have, by long received liberties granted to their ancestors from our Kings, made their freedoms resolve into a second nature; and neither is it safe for our Kings to strive to introduce the Spanish government upon these freeborn nations, nor just for the people to suffer that government to be imposed upon them, which I am certain his Majesty's goodness never intended. And whereas my lord of Bristol intimates the strength and bravery of our army, as an inducement to the continuation of these wars, which he promises himself will produce a fair and happy peace: in this I am utterly repugnant to his opinion. For grant that we have an army of gallant and able men, which indeed cannot be denied, yet have we infinite disadvantages on our side; the Parliament having double our number, and surely (though our enemies) persons of as much bravery, nay, and sure to be daily supplied, when any of their number fails, a benefit which we can't bestow: they having the most popular part of the kingdom at their devotion, all or most of the cities, considerable towns and ports, together with the mainest pillar of the Kingdom's safety, the sea at their command, and the navy; and, which is most material of all, an unexhausted Indico of money to pay their soldiers, out of the liberal contributions of coin and plate sent in by people of all conditions, who account the Parliament's cause their cause, and so think themselves engaged to part with the uttermost penny of their estates in their defence, whom they esteem the patriots of their liberties. These strengths of theirs, and the defects of ours considered, I conclude it necessary for all our sakes, and the good of the whole commonwealth, to beseech his Majesty to take some present order for a treaty of peace betwixt himself and his high court of Parliament; who I believe are so loyal and obedient to his sacred Majesty, that they will propound nothing that shall be prejudicial to his royal prerogative, or repugnant to their fidelity and duty (10).

(10) This speech is printed, together with that of the Earl of Bristol, in 4to. under the following title: Two Speeches spoken at the Council-table at Oxford; one by the Earl of Bristol, in favour of the continuation of the present war; the other by Edward Earl of Dorset, for a speedy accommodation betwixt his Majesty and his High Court of Parliament. Printed first at Oxford, and reprinted at London, 1642.

that have power upon honour, conscience, or publick piety, that laying to heart, as they did, the inward bleeding condition of their country, and the outward more menacing destruction by a foreign nation, upon the very point of invading it, he would co-operate with them for it's preservation; which address, they declare, they should not have made, but that his Majesty's summons, by which they were met, most graciously proclaiming pardon to all, without exception, is evidence enough that his mercy and clemency can transcend all former provocations; and that he had not only made them witnesses of his princely intentions, but honoured them also with the name of being security for them (cc). After the treaty at Uxbridge, his Majesty proposing to have a personal treaty with the two houses of Parliament at Westminster, his Lordship was nominated, December 1645, among those to whom the King was willing to commit the trust of the militia, for such time, and with such power as was expressed by his Commissioners at Uxbridge, believing them unexceptionable persons (dd). But no treaties taking effect, and the King having put himself under the power of the Scottish army, the Earl of Dorset, and others of the Council, signed the capitulation for the surrendry of Oxford, 20 June 1646, whereby they had liberty to compound for their lands, and not to be rated at above two years revenue for estates of inheritance (ee). When the King was delivered to the English army, and brought to Hampton-court, his Lordship, with the Duke of Richmond, the Marquis of Hertford, the Marquis of Ormond, the Earl of Southampton, and the Lord Seymour, repaired thither in 1647, intending to reside there as his Council; but the army declaring against it they were obliged to leave his Majesty (ff). In the succeeding times there was no room for men of his Lordship's honour and principle; and he took so much to heart the murder of King Charles I. that he never stirred out of his house after wards (gg); nor did he survive this loss many years. He departed this life on the 17th of July 1652, and was interred among his ancestors at Withiam in Suffex*. Lord Clarendon speaking of the Privy-Counsellors, &c. in the beginning of King Charles's reign, gives the following character of him. 'That in his person he was beautiful, agreeable, and vigorous; his wit sparkling and sublime; and his other parts of learning and language of that lustre, that he could not miscarry in the world. The vices he had were of the age, which he was not stubborn enough to contemn or resist, though the streightness of his fortune, occasioned by the extravagance of his elder brother, exposed him to many difficulties and inconveniencies. Yet his known great parts, and the very general reputation he had required, notwithstanding his defects, engaged King James to call him to his Privy-Council before his death. And if he had not too much cherished his natural constitution and propensity, and been too much wrung by an uneasy and streight fortune, he would have been an excellent man of business, for he had a very sharp discerning spirit, and was a man of an obliging nature, much honour, and great generosity, and of most intire fidelity to the Crown (hh).'

His Lordship had issue by his wife already mentioned †, a daughter Mary, who died young; and two sons, Richard his successor [I] in the honour and estate, and Edward, who married Bridget, Baroness Norreys, daughter and sole heir to Edward Wray, Esq; by his wife Elizabeth, daughter and heir to Francis Lord Norris Earl of Berkshire. Edward was with his father at Oxford, and was wounded in the battle at Newbury in 1643. And in 1645, being with a party of the King's forces at Kidlington, three miles from Oxford, he was taken prisoner by those of the Parliament, and afterwards barbarously murdered, leaving no issue (ii).

(cc) Annals of King Charles I. p. 873.

(dd) White-locke's Memorials, p. 191.

(ee) Upon the sequestration of it, they allowed his son Richard a fifth part. Ibid. p. 215.

(ff) Ibid. p. 275.

(gg) Sir Edward Walker's Account of the Knights of the Garter.

(hh) History of the Rebellion, &c. Vol. I. p. 60.

(ii) Peerage of England.

(11) Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria.

(12) Annals of King Charles I. p. 895. and Rushworth, Vol. I.

(13) See the speech, in rem. [H].

(14) White-locke's Memorials.

* See Journals of the House of Lords, for 1660.

(15) Baker's Chronicle, 7th edit. p. 731.

(16) Ibid. p. 738.

(17) Dugdale's Orig. Jurid. p. 158.

* Heylin's Help to History, p. 504.

† Viz. in Rem. [A]. To which may be added, that she was also Lady-Governess of James Duke of York in 1638. See the dedication of a book intitled, Of the Vanity and Mutation of the World.

[I] Richard his successor.] His Lordship was born at Dorset-house, Sept. 16. 1622. was elected for the borough of East-Grinstead in the famous Long-Parliament, which met Nov. 3. 1640. at Westminster, bearing the title [by courtesy] of Lord Buckhurst (11). His name is in the list of those who were posted up with the title of Straffordians in 1642 (12), and was imprisoned for a while by an order of Parliament (13); when his father's estate was sequestered, he was allowed a fifth part of it for his support (14). Succeeding his father in 1652, he lived retired 'till the Restoration, when he was principally concerned in settling the government*, in the Commission made out October 3. 1660. for the trial of the Regicides of King Charles the First (15), and at the Coronation of King Charles II. he was appointed Sewer of England for that day (16). Nov. 3. the following year, he was admitted, in company of his Royal Highness the Duke of York, into the Society of the Inner Temple (17). Upon the whole, his Lordship appears to have had the same publick spirit, learning, and judgment, with his ancestors, tho' he had no other publick employment than Lord Lieutenant of the county of Suffex, chusing probably to decline all others, though he lived 'till Aug. 1677. In his private capacity he was a tender husband, an indulgent father, and a generous friend. He married Frances, daughter to Lionel Cranfield, Earl of Middlesex, and at length heir to her brother Lionel, Earl of Middlesex. He had by her six daughters, of whom three, Elizabeth, Anne, and Catharine, died young. Lady Mary born Feb. 4. 1646, married to Roger Boyle, Lord Broghill, son and heir of Roger Earl of Orrery, by whom she was mother of Charles, late Earl of Orrery, and Lord Boyle, and grand-mother to the present Earl of Orrery and Cork. Anne born 7 June 1650. married to Alexander Earl of Hume in Scotland. Frances, born Feb. 6. 1665. married to Sir George Lane, Knt. and Baronet, created Lord Viscount Laneshorough; and secondly, to ——— Mustian, Esq; Besides these daughters, his Lordship had seven sons, who all died unmarried (18), except the eldest Charles, the subject of the ensuing article.

(18) Peerage of England. P

SACKVILLE [CHARLES] Earl of Dorset and Middlesex, was born January 24, 1637 (a). He had his education under a private tutor, after which making the tour of Italy, he returned to England a little before the Restoration, and immediately after that memorable happy event, his father being living, was elected member of Parliament for the borough of East-Grinstead in Suffex (b). He made a good figure in the House of Commons, and was courted as a favourite by the King (c), to whom his excellent and exceeding good nature early recommended him. But having at this time no turn to business [A] he declined all publick employ. In this humour, and with these accomplishments, Lord Buckhurst was one of the brightest ornaments of that polite Court, when he went a volunteer under his Royal Highness the Duke of York during the first Dutch war in 1665 [B], and the night before the engagement composed that song (d) which is generally esteemed the happiest of his poetical productions [C]. Soon after this, his Majesty took him into a nearer relation in the post of a gentleman of the bed-chamber; and in regard of his distinguished politeness, sent him upon several short commissions and embassies of compliment into France [D]. Upon the death of his uncle James Cranfield, Earl of Middlesex in 1674 (e), that estate devolved upon him, and he succeeded likewise to the title by creation in 1675 (f). His father dying two years afterwards he came into the possession of his paternal estate, together with the title of Earl of Dorset in August 1677. He also succeeded his father in the post of Lord-Lieutenant of the county of Suffex, having been joined in that commission with him in 1670; and he was also made Custos Rotulorum for the same county on the 20th of February 1684, by King James, soon after his accession to the throne (g). The same year, March 7, he married his second wife (b), the lady Mary, daughter of James Compton, Earl of Northampton [E]. He utterly disliked, and openly discountenanced the violent measures of this

[A] He had no turn to business.] On the other hand, he thought of nothing so much as feats of gallantry, which sometimes carried him to inexcusable excesses. For instance, he made one of (1) the triumvirate in that frolick at the Cock Tavern, then a famous house in Bow-street, Covent-garden, when being inflamed in liquor, they all went up to the balcony, where they shewed very indecent postures, and gave great offence to the passengers in the street, by very unmannerly discharges upon them; and Sir Charles Sedley stripped himself naked, and preached to the people in a grossly scandalous language. Hereupon a riot being raised, the mob became very clamorous, and would have forced the door next the street; but being opposed in that attempt, the preacher and his associates were driven from the balcony, and the mob broke the windows of the room into which they retired for shelter. The noise of this frolick was soon spread abroad; and as persons of distinction were the authors, which served to aggravate their fault, they were all upon information summoned to Westminster-hall before Sir Robert Hyde, Chief Justice of the Common-Pleas, where being indicted for a riot they were foundly fined (2). Lord Buckhurst, however, was far from losing the King's favour by this adventure, which perhaps was some years after particularly pointed at by the Lord Rochester, when he said jestingly to King Charles, that he did not know how it was, but my Lord Dorset might do any thing, but was never to blame (3).

[B] He went a volunteer in the first Dutch war, in 1665.] As one of the most remarkable victories at sea, which adorn the English annals, was obtained at this time, it will not be improper to insert the following short account of it. In the engagement, which happened June the 3d this year, eighteen of the enemy's capital ships were taken, and fourteen more destroyed. Admiral Opdam, who engaged the Duke of York, was blown up by his side, with all his crew. The English lost only one ship, but several commanders and men of honour were killed in the action: among the rest, the Earls of Falmouth, Portland, and Marlborough, the Lord Muskerry, and Rear-Admiral Sanfon; and Admiral Lawfon died of his wounds soon after (4).

[C] The song is one of the happiest of his poetical productions.] The singular excellence of this jewel, manifestly consists in that easy and genteel vein of gallantry which animates the whole. It is indeed a string of the brightest jewels, which could not be created but in a mind and imagination intirely undisturbed by any apprehensions of the impending danger. Some have even seen in it that noble presence of mind in danger which is characteristic of the hero, while others have censured it as shewing a levity and gaiety of humour very different from such a fedate composure, which in reality is the true temper of heroism, and in truth was very unbecoming of the occasion. To balance this is alleged his Lordship's youth, a season full of gaiety and spirits, which in him flowed from an honest heart, and a natural easiness of temper; besides, being a volunteer, his thoughts would be more disengaged as not being immediately concerned in planning or directing the operations. It may also be observed, that as far as his subsequent conduct can inform us, he was far from any design to push his fame or fortune in this course of life. He had no particular fondness for the profession of a sailor, and went to sea apparently in meer compliance with the then present humour of the court, where in respect to the Duke of York this kind of gallantry was the general taste, and seeing the commanders put on an extraordinary cheerful countenance to encourage the soldiers, his Lordship might be fired by that example. In this view, a heedlessness of danger, tho' perhaps in itself not strictly defensible, may be as useful, if not more so, than the most sober fearless intrepidity. We must not omit the light in which this part of his Lordship's life is set by Mr Prior, who speaking of it observes, that 'when the honour and safety of his country demanded his assistance, he readily entered into the most active parts of life; and underwent the dangers attending it, with a constancy of mind, which shews he had not only read the rules of philosophy, but understood the practice of them.' To conclude, something must be allowed to the taste of the times, when, as Mr. Pope expresses it,

The foldiers ap'd the gallantries of France,
And every flow'ry courtier wrote romance (5).

[D] Sent upon several short commissions into France.] Among others, he was sent in 1669, to the French King on his arrival at Dunkirk, in return of that Monarch's compliment by the Duchess of Orleans, when she brought to England Madame de Querouille, afterwards created by King Charles II. Duchess of Portsmouth. By this specimen we may know, what sort of business was most agreeable to Lord Buckhurst at this time, as also how capable he was deemed by his Majesty to do honour to the English court, in any thing that was truly polite (6).

[E] He married Mary, daughter of the Earl of Northampton.] This lady was much celebrated for the beauty of her person, and the admirable endowments of her mind. She was, after her marriage, appointed one of the ladies of the bed-chamber to Queen Mary, and left his Lordship again a widower the 6th of Aug. 1691. having brought him a daughter, lady Mary, who was married to Henry Somerset Duke of Beaufort, and dying in child-bed left no issue (7); and an only son, Lionel Cranfield Sackville, who was created a Duke in 1720, and is still living, an honour to this noble family, and has several children of both sexes.

[F] Hf

(a) Dugdale's Baronsage, p. 401.

(b) Will's Notitia Parliamentaria.

(c) Burnet's History of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 264.

(d) Which begins thus: To all ye ladies now at land, We men at sea indite, &c.

(e) See the preceding article, remark [I].

(f) Peerage of England, from his patent, which bears date April 4, 27 Car. II.

(1) The other two were Sir Tho. Ogle and Sir Charles Sedley. Athen. Oxon. Vol. II. col. 1100.

(2) Life of Sir Charles Sedley, in Cibber's Lives of the Poets, Vol. III.

(3) Prior's dedication of his poems to the present Duke of Dorset, in 1719, fol.

(4) Gen. History of England, and Salmon's Chronological Historian, under this year.

(g) Ibid. where we are also informed, that at the coronation of King James II. and his Queen, his Lordship bore part of the Queen's regalia, the ivory rod with the dove.

(b) His first wife was Elizabeth, daughter of Hervey Bagot, Esq of Pipe-hall in Warwickshire, younger brother of Sir Hervey Bagot, of Blithfield in Staffordshire, and widow of Charles Berkeley, Earl of Falmouth. By this lady, the Earl of Dorset, then Lord Buckhurst, had no issue. Dugdale, ubi supra;

(5) Poetical Works of Alexander Pope, Esq;

(6) Burnet's History of his own Time, ubi supra;

(7) Peerage of England.

this reign [F], and engaging early in the interest of the Prince of Orange, he carried on his part of that enterprize in London, under the eye of the Court, with the same courage and resolution as his friend the Duke of Devonshire did in open arms at Nottingham. He was pitched upon to conduct the Princess (afterwards Queen) Anne, out of the reach of any danger from her father's displeasure [G]. The share he had in the new settlement of the crown recommended him warmly to the favour of King William [H], who the next day gave him the post of Lord Chamberlain of the Household, and took him into his Privy-Council, he was also again constituted Lord-Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum of the county of Suffex, having been put out of that commission in 1687. In 1689, he had the honour of standing, with his Majesty, Godfather * to Prince William, son of the Princess of Denmark, and afterwards created Duke of Gloucester (i). The Earl of Dorset was elected Knight of the Garter on the second of February 1691. And attending the King to the congress at the Hague the following year, he had his share in the remarkable hardships of that passage, the effects of which he felt for some time without complaining [J]. He continued in business as long as his health would permit (k), enjoying the peculiar felicity of being the darling both of prince and people: but about the year 1698, his health sensibly declining, and no imminent danger threatening the publick affairs (l), he retired; only appearing sometimes at the Council-board, to shew his respect to the commission which he bore, giving as much leisure as he could to the relief of those pains with which it pleased God to afflict him; and indulging the reflections of a mind, that had looked through the world with too piercing an eye, and was grown weary of the prospect: so that it may justly be said of this great man, with regard to the publick, that through the whole course of his life he acted like an able pilot in a long voyage, contented to sit quiet in the cabin when the winds were allayed, and the waters smooth, but vigilant when the storm arose, and the sea grew tumultuous (m). Indeed he accepted from Queen Anne the renewal of his post of Lord-Lieutenant and Custos Rotulorum for the county of Suffex, which by a long series of appointments thereto was in a manner become hereditary to the family (n). At length being advised to go to Bath he ended his life there, January 19, 1705-6. and on the 17th of February following was interred with his ancestors at Withiam (o). He was a great patron of men of letters, who have not been ungrateful, through any defect, in transmitting his name with lustre to posterity (p), and thereby have done the same for their own, especially Mr Prior [K], whose exquisitely wrought character of this patron gives new pleasure every * Viz. Proxy for the King of Denmark.

(k) He was appointed four times one of the Regents of the kingdom in his Majesty's absence. Collins.

(l) The peace of Ryfwick had been concluded the preceding year. General History of England.

(m) Prior's dedication of his poems to his son, the present Duke of Dorset.

(n) See the two preceding articles.

(o) Peerage of England, as before.

* Burnet's History of his own Times.

(8) General History of England.

(9) Ibid.

(10) Burnet.

(i) This most hopeful prince was born July 24th, 1689; and, to the universal regret of the kingdom, died July 30, 1700. Boyer's History of Queen Anne, under that year.

(p) See the articles Prior, Dryden, Sprat, Congreve, Addison, and Charles Montague Earl of Halifax.

[F] He utterly disavowed the violent measures of this reign. Among other instances of this it is justly given as one, that he appeared in court at the trial of the seven Bishops, accompanied by other Noblemen, which, 'tis said, had a good effect upon the jury, and brought the Judges to a better temper than they had usually shewn *.

[G] He conveyed the Princess Anne out of the reach of her father. This province fell to his share by his marriage with a niece of Hen. Compton, Bishop of London, who contrived the whole method of this escape, and pitched upon his nephew as a person whom he could safely trust with the conduct of it, and was able to provide a necessary guard to secure it; which his Lordship readily furnished, and attending the Princess as far as Northampton, he brought a body of horse thither to serve her as a guard, by which she was conveyed to Nottingham Castle (8).

[H] The share he had in the Revolution recommended him to King William. Among other things, he was one of those Peers who sat every day in the Council-chamber, and took upon them the government of the realm after King James's desertion. In Parliament his Lordship voted for the vacancy of the throne, and that the Prince of Orange should be joined with the Princess in the sovereignty (9).

[I] He felt the effects of that passage for some time, &c. They went on board Jan. 10, 'twas a very severe season; and when they were two or three leagues off Gorce, having by bad weather been four days at sea, the King was so impatient to go on shore, that he took boat, when a thick fog arising soon after, they were so closely surrounded with ice, as not to be able either to make to shore, or to get back to the ship. In this condition they remained twenty-two hours, almost despairing of life; and the cold was so bitter, that they could hardly stand or speak at their landing. His Lordship contracted a lameness which held him some time, and put him to a considerable expence (10.)

[K] Prior transmitted his name with lustre to posterity. The elegant panegyric mentioned above, is to this day esteemed a master-piece in that way; and that he was bound by the strongest ties of gratitude, to exert the whole force of his skill and genius upon the subject, is strongly and beautifully marked at setting out; where he acknowledges, that he scarce knew what life was, sooner than he found himself obliged to the Earl of Dorset's favours; nor had reason to feel any sorrow so sensibly as that of his death. He then proceeds to enumerate the valuable qualities of his patron, in which he indulges his talent at panegyric, so as to keep within the bounds of candid truth without violating it; especially in respect to his Lordship's moral character. He has shewn the picture in various lights, and has not spared to hint his Lordship's errors as well as his graces and virtues. Among his errors was that family one, most incident to good nature when joined to a quick sensibility and apprehension, of giving way to passion. This foible carried him into transports of which he was often ashamed, and during these little excesses, says Mr Prior, I have known his servants purposely get into his way, that they might make a merit of it immediately after; for he who had the good fortune to be chid, was sure of being rewarded for it.— Besides the other elogiums mentioned above, where the writers may be thought to gratify their genius to some little excess, we see others without any such ties no less fond to expatiate in his Lordship's praises. Among these the following elogium by Mr Pope is well worth a place here, as it contains a full and just, tho' short, character of him, in which view it is a remarkable specimen of that poet's peculiar talent, celebrated by his friend Dean Swift, who observes, that he had the art of saying the most in the fewest words of any man in the age (11).

(11) Letters to and from Dr Swift.

Dorset! the grace of courts, the Muses pride,
Patron of arts, and judge of nature dy'd.
The scourge of pride, though sanctify'd or great,
Of sops in learning, and of knaves in state.
Yet soft his nature, though severe his lay,
His anger moral, and his wisdom gay.
Blest satyrisk! who touch'd the mean so true,
As shewed, vice had his hate and pity too.
Blest courtier! who could King and country please,
Yet sacred keep his friendship, and his ease.
Blest Peer! his great forefathers every grace
Reflecting, and reflected in his race.

Where

every time it is read, millies repetita placebit. We shall therefore, pour faire la bonne bouche, to make up the reader's mouth, conclude with the following desert extracted from it. 'The brightness of his parts, the solidity of his judgment, and the candour and generosity of his temper, distinguished him in an age of great politeness, and at a court abounding with men of the finest sense and learning. The most eminent masters in their several ways appealed to his determination: Waller thought it an honour to consult him in the softness and harmony of his verse; and Dr Sprat in the delicacy and turn of his prose: Dryden determines by him, under the character of Eugenius, as to the laws of dramatic poetry. Butler owed it to him, that the court tasted his Hudibras; Wycheberley, that the town liked his Plain Dealer; and the late Duke of Buckingham deferred to publish his Rebearfal, 'till he was sure, as he expressed it, that my Lord Dorset would not rehearse upon him again. If we wanted foreign testimony, La Fontaine and St Ewremont have acknowledged, that he was a perfect master in the beauty and fineness of their language, and of all they call les belles lettres. Nor was this nicety of his judgment confined only to books and literature; he was the same in statuary, painting, and other parts of art. Bernini would have taken his opinion upon the beauty and attitude of a figure; and King Charles did not agree with Lely, that my Lady Cleveland's picture was finished, 'till it had the approbation of my Lord Buckhurst (q).' His Lordship's poetical pieces were published among the works of the minor poets, in 1749, 8vo. [L].

(q) Prior's dedication, ubi supra.

Where other Buckhursts, other Dorsets shine,
And patriots steer, and poets deck the line (12).

In the same sentiment Mr Walpole, speaking of his great ancestor, the first Lord Buckhurst, and Earl of Dorset, observes, that it is almost needless to say, that he was the patriarch of a race of genius and wit (13). Mr Spence also, in a succinct account of the Treasurer, addressed to the present Earl of Middlesex, writes thus, 'I ought perhaps to ask pardon for a custom, which I fall into of naming him, usually by his inferior title: but were one to speak of an extraordinary genius by the name of the Earl of Dorset; every body is so prepossessed at present, that they would be perpetually mistaking it for another ancestor of your Lordship's nearer to our own times (14).'

[L] His poetical pieces, &c. Besides the song mentioned above, these consist of several others of his composing; (2.) A poem to Mr Edward Howard, on his incomprehensible poem called the British Princes. In this piece his Lordship is very satirical upon that author. (3.) Verses to Sir Thomas St Serfe, on his printing his play called Terugo's wives, acted 1668. (4.) Verses addressed to the Countess of Dorchester, Sir Cha. Sedley's daughter, mistress to King James II. and mother to Katherine, late Duchess of Buckinghamshire. (5.) An epilogue to Moliere's Tartuff. (6.) Another on the revival of Ben. Johnson's play, call'd, Every man in his humour. (7.) A satirical piece, intitled, A faithful catalogue of our most eminent Ninnies; written in the year 1683.

The Spectator speaking of Mr Edward Howard's piece, called, the British Prince, observes, that it is an epic poem, which is full of incongruities; or, in other words, abounds with nonsense; and as a specimen of this he quotes the two following lines.

A coat of mail Prince Vortigern had on,
Which from a naked Pist his grandfire won.

Who does not see, says that critic, the absurdity of winning a coat from a naked man. To which we shall add, who does not see, that this smart criticism derives its existence from the Earl of Dorset's poem on the same incomparable, incomprehensible, piece, where his Lordship addresses that author in these lines.

Come on, ye critics, find one fault who dare,
For read it backward like a witch's prayer.

SAINT-JOHN [HENRY], Lord Viscount Bolingbroke, was born in 1672 (a), at Battersea in Surry, the seat of that noble family [A]. During his infancy, his education

[A] His family. The family is conspicuous for its antiquity, dignity, splendor of merit and fortune, and large possessions. It derives its original, by certain authority, as high as Adam de Port, Baron of Basing in

VOL. V. No. 297.

'Twill do as well, throw not away your jests,
In solid nonsense that abides all tests.
Wit like tearful claret when't begins to pall,
Neglected lies, and's of no use at all:
But in it's full perfection of decay,
Turns vinegar, and comes again in play.
Thou hast a brain, such as it is, indeed;
On what else should thy worm of fancy feed.
Yet in a filbeard I have often known,
Maggots survive when all the kernel's gone.
This simile shall stand in thy defence,
'Gainst such dull rogues as now and then write sense.
Thy stile's the fame, whatever be thy theme;
As some digestions turn all meats to phlegm.
He lies, dear Ned, who says, thy brain is barren,
Where deep conceits like vermin breed in carrion.
Thy stumbling founder'd jade cao trot as high,
As any other Pegasus cao fly.
So the dull eel moves nimbler in the mud,
Than all the swift-finn'd racers of the flood.
As skilful divers to the bottom fall,
Sooner than those that cannot swim at all;
So in the way of writing without thinking,
Thou hast a strange alacrity in sinking.
Thou writ'st below ev'n thy own natural parts,
And with acquired dulness, and new arts
Of studied nonsense, tak'st kind readers hearts.
Therefore, dear Ned, at my advice forbear,
Such loud complaints 'gainst critics to prefer,
Since thou art turn'd an errant libeller.
Thou fet'st thy name to what thy self dost write;
Did ever libel yet so sharply bite.

Whoever reads this piece, especially the four lines printed here in Italics, and remembers the plan of the Dunciad, and the Art of Sinking in Poetry, will be apt to think that Mr Pope had some reason, on the score of gratitude, for writing the just cited character of Lord Dorset.

}
}
}

(a) Memoirs of the Life, &c. of Lord Viscount Bolingbroke, p. 21. compared with p. 345, 347.

Hampshire, before the Conquest; whose chief heir-male, William, assumed the surname of St John, and was Quarter-master general of the army of William Duke of Normandy, at the battle of Hastings, where that Duke

39 Q

tion was chiefly directed by the Dissenters [B]; but, as soon as it became proper to take him out of the hands of the women, he was sent to Eton school, and removed thence to Christ-Church-college in Oxford. His genius and understanding were seen and admired by his contemporaries in both these places; but the love of pleasure had so much the ascendancy, as to hinder him from exerting his talents for literature in any particular performance. His friends designed him for publick business, and when he left the university, he was considered as one who had the fairest opportunity of making a shining figure in that way of an active life. With the graces of a handsome person, in whose aspect dignity was happily tempered with sweetness, he had a manner and address that was irresistibly engaging; a sparkling vivacity, a quick apprehension, a piercing wit, were united to a prodigious strength of memory, a peculiar subtlety of thinking and reasoning, and a masterly elocution; but for some years, all these extraordinary endowments were employed in

Duke obtained a signal victory, which put him in possession of the English Crown. The descendant of the Quarter-master, after many generations, Sir Oliver St John, in the reign of Henry the Sixth, obtained the lordship of Blettho, with the manor of Ledyard-Tregoze, by the marriage of Margaret, sister and sole heiress of Sir John Beauchamp, of the family of the old Earl of Warwick. The families of Blettho and Tregoze were founded by the children of this match; the latter of which, being from a second son, gave rise to that of the subject of the present article. This second son, Oliver St John, Esq; having the manor of Ledyard-Tregoze given him by his mother, who by a second match had issue the Lady Margaret, Countess of Richmond, mother to Henry the Seventh. That Lady founding the two colleges of Christ and St John in Cambridge, appointed Sir John St John, son of the aforementioned Oliver St John, one of her executors, who performed the trust with remarkable honour, firmness, and integrity. His grandson, Oliver, became a student in one of the inns of court; but upon a quarrel with one Bell, Captain of the Guard to Queen Elizabeth, having killed him in a duel, he was obliged to leave the kingdom, served in the wars of the Low Countries under Sir Francis and Sir Horace Vere, received the honour of knighthood, and was then sent with his regiment into Ireland; where he became President of Munster, Vice-President of Connaught, and Master of the Ordnance; and April 3, 1616, was appointed Lord Deputy of that kingdom, which exposed him to much envy; but after his conduct, at his own request, had been strictly examined, his royal master, King James the First, pronounced his reputation to be without blemish, and created him some years afterwards Baron St John of Tregoze in England, and Viscount Grandison in Ireland; but dying without issue, the barony became extinct (1), and he left his estates at Battersea and Wandsworth to his nephew by his elder brother, who thereby became the first Sir John St John of Lediard-Tregoze and Battersea, being created a Baronet May 22, 1611, at the first institution of that order; and marrying Anne, daughter to Sir Tho. Leighton in the county of Worcester, she brought him one daughter, Anne, who was married first to Sir Francis-Henry Lea, from which match descended the Earl of Lichfield; and a second time to Henry Wilmot, Earl of Rochester. Besides this daughter, Sir John St John had by her seven sons, three of whom engaging in the civil wars on the King's side, were killed in that service; viz. his second son, William, under Prince Rupert, at the taking of Cirencester in Gloucestershire; Edward, his third son, in the battle of Newbury; and John, his fifth, under the command of the Marquis of Newcastle in the North; The name of the sixth son was Walter, and of the youngest Henry: Oliver, the eldest, married Catharine, daughter and coheirefs of Horatio Vere, Baron of Tilbury; but dying in the life time of his father, the title and estate descended to his only son, who was the second Sir John St John of Lediard-Tregoze and Battersea, Bart. but he dying before he was of age, unmarried, his uncle became heir to the honour and estate. This was Sir Walter St John, Bart. who marrying one of the daughters of the Lord Chief-Justice St John, his Lordship gave him a beneficial office in the Law, which he enjoyed till his death. He was grandfather to our author, whose father was Sir Henry St John, and his mother Lady Mary, second daughter and coheirefs to Robert Rich Earl of Warwick, by whom he had only this son, Henry (2).

The reason of deducing his genealogy in so particular a manner will be seen in the course of this memoir. At present we shall observe from it, that though our author descended from the Chief-Justice St John, yet it was not in the sense that was imputed to him by his enemies in 1714.

[B] His education was chiefly directed by the Dissenters.] At his first entrance into the House of Commons, he expressed himself warmly against the Dissenters, and sided with the Church party. His opponents, therefore, in the four last years of Queen Anne's reign, raised a clamour (by a remark idle enough in itself, but not therefore of less weight among the populace) from the inconsistency of this conduct with his education; having been, as they alledged, bred up from his infancy in dissenting principles (3), and well tutored by his grandmother, and her confessor Daniel Burges (4), in the Presbyterian way. This latter part of the story is, indeed, probable enough, since both his grandparents were inclined to think well of the piety and sanctity of that sect, and both lived many years after he came into publick business. We have also a hint of it from his own pen, by which we may see at the same time, how little relish he had for it even in those years. He is ridiculing the large commentaries upon St Matthew and St John by Chryostom, 'which, says he, puts me in mind of a puritannical parson, Dr Manton, who, if I mistake not, for I have not looked into the folio since I was a boy, and condemned sometimes to read in it, made 119 sermons on the 119th Psalm (5).' But that he was ever tainted with dissenting principles in respect of the Established Church, cannot fairly be inferred from thence, since, though both Sir Walter and his lady were remarkable for sincere piety, yet they were no such bigots to Puritanism as were represented. Dr Simon Patrick, afterwards Bishop of Ely, who was long chaplain, and lived many years in the family, always spoke of them with the highest reverence as well as gratitude. The parish records at Battersea will shew, that Sir Walter was a good though a moderate Churchman, by almost every kind of testimony. He repaired that fabric more than once; erected, in virtue of a faculty from the Bishop, an entire new gallery, and built and endowed a charity-school, all at his own expence. To this last his lady was likewise a contributor, as well as a great patroness to Dr Patrick. And as to her father, the Chief-Justice St John, whatever were his principles concerning religion, he was no bigot; for he preserved the cathedral church of Peterborough, when no body else would have preserved it, and when the Parliament were importuned for a grant of it by Cromwell, in consideration of his services. As to Daniel Burges, though a Dissenter, yet he was undeniably a man of wit and good parts; so that though it should be allowed that our Statesman was lectured sometimes by him, yet he could receive no sourness to the Established Church by those lectures (6). The truth is, that had the tutor been never so sour a religionist, it would not have been in his power to have instilled any part of it into his pupil, whose nature was far from being susceptible of such leaven, of which the following is a proof more than sufficient. His Lordship remarking the usefulness of that little genius, that literal critic and Dictionary-makers are blessed with, expresses himself in these terms: 'I approve, therefore, very much of the devotion of a studious man at Christ-Church [college in Oxford], who was overheard in his oratory entering into a detail with God, as devout persons are apt to do, and, amongst other particular thanksgivings, acknowledging the divine goodness, in furnishing the world with makers of Dictionaries (7).'

(3) Even at this day we see Mr Tindal, in the same view, asserting, that he was bred among the schismatics. Continuation of Rapin, Vol. IX.

(4) His famous meeting house was pulled down by the mob in Dr Sacheverell's trial, but was soon rebuilt. It stands in Newcourt, Cary-freet.

(5) Letter to Mr Pope, p. 526. edit. 1753.

(1) But the title of Viscount Grandison being limited to the issue of Sir Edw. Villiers, Knt. by Barbara St John, niece to Oliver, Lord Viscount Grandison, that honour still remains in the family of Villiers. Life of Lord Bolingbroke, as above, p. 9.

(2) Idem, p. 5, to p. 18.

(6) Life of Viscount Bolingbroke, p. 23. See a sample of this Dissenter's wit in the article of Dr Yalden.

(7) Letter the first, of the Study of History, p. 5.

* He was particularly much addicted to women, and apt to indulge himself in late hours, with all those excesses that usually attend them.
Idem, p. 33.

in nothing so much as finishing the character of a complete rake * of the first genius [C]. In the entrance upon the XVIIIth century, he was married to the daughter and co heiress of Sir Henry Winchecomb, of Bucklebury in Berkshire, Bart. This settlement was in all respects suitable to his birth and expectations [D], and the same year, 1700 (b), he entered into the House of Commons, being elected for the borough of Wotton-Basset in Wiltshire by a family interest, his father having served several times for the same place: so that Mr St John, who was now about twenty-six years of age, took his seat in the English senate, with advantages scarcely inferior to those of any member that sat there [E].
He

(b) It met Feb. 10, 1700; and the session ended June 24, 1701. General Hist. of England.

[C] A complete rake of the first genius. This character is very consistent with seasons of cool reflections and lucid intervals; nay, these are essential ingredients in such a composition: without these, the character sinks into an ordinary and despicable debauchee. The like difficulties and disasters are run into by both, but have not the like effect upon each: the latter, in these circumstances, sinks into an inactive and lumpish stupidity; the former, incapable of standing still, when thus checked in the indulgence of his lower, immediately exerts his nobler faculties. Thus his Lordship assures us, that 'The love of study and desire of knowledge, were what he had felt all his life; and though his genius, unlike the dæmon of Socrates, whispered so softly, that very often he heard him not, in the hurry of those passions with which he was transported; yet, continues he, some calmer hours there were; in them I hearkned to him (8).' Some of these lucid intervals were employed in versifying. We have the following copy prefixed to Mr Dryden's Virgil, in 1697.

(8) Of the true Use of Retirement and Study, p. 206. edit. 1752.

No undisputed monarch govern'd yet,
With universal sway the realms of wit.
Nature could never such expence afford,
Each several province own'd a several lord!
A poet then had his poetic wife,
One Muse embrac'd, and married for his life.
By the stale thing his poetry was cloy'd,
His fancy lessen'd, and his fire destroy'd.
But Nature, grown extravagantly kind,
With all her fairest gifts adorn'd his mind;
The different powers were then united found,
And you the universal monarch crown'd.
Your mighty sway her great deserts secures,
And every Muse and every Grace is yours.
To none confin'd, by turns you all enjoy;
Sated with these, you to another fly.
So, Sultan like, in your seraglio stand,
While withing misses wait for your command.
Thus no decay, no want of figure find;
Such is your fancy, boundless as your mind.
Not all the blasts of time can do you wrong,
Young spite of age, in spite of weakness strong.
Time, like Alcides, strikes you to the ground;
You, like Antæus, from each fall rebound (9).'

(9) His Lordship's coat of arms is prefixed to one of the books of that translation, as a particular encouragement of the work.

(10) Pope's Epistle to Dr Arbuthnot. See Pope's article. Our author also wrote the prologue to a tragedy called Altemira, composed by Roger Boyle, Earl of Orrery. See his article, in Vol. II. remark [R], p. 912.

Mr Pope observed very justly, that his Lordship was the patron, the friend, and the protector, of that great poet in the decline of his age, though not of his parts; for the very last poems of Dryden are his best (10).

I hope what has been said here will not be made use of as an encouragement to rakery; a sprightly poem, a flashing bon mot, or a glittering reply, may be admired, whilst the general conduct of life is condemned; and it is lesson enough, that Lord Bolingbroke lived to-tell us so.

[D] Settled in a marriage suitable to his birth. Sir Henry Winchecombe had a very handsome fortune, that descended to him from a person famous in our old story, by the familiar name of Jack of Newbury. This person, whose name was John Winchecomb, was a Clothier of that town in the reign of Henry the Eighth; it is said, that in those days he kept a hundred looms at work, and that to shew his duty to his king, and his love to his country, he marched with a hundred of his workmen, well clothed at his own expence, to Fludden field, against the Scots; and that being satisfied with having a share in the glory of that victory, which cost the King of Scots his life, he returned with his little army to his native town, and resumed his former station. He was also a benefactor to the church; and, as the people of Newbury formerly shewed his house, so they still point to the pulpit and the tower, which were of his erecting. Mr St John, upon this marriage, had the family estates both of the father and grandfather, in Wiltshire, Surrey, and Middlesex, settled upon him, the good effect of which he felt in his old age, though a great part of what his lady brought him was taken away by his attainder (11).

(11) His Life, p. 36, 37.

[E] Advantages scarcely inferior to any other member. Besides the connections of his family, his grandfather, Sir Walter St John, was still alive, who had represented the county of Wilts in two parliaments in the reign of King Charles the Second, and had the same honour in the second parliament of King William. His father likewise had represented that county, and did not think of producing his son upon the stage of publick life, 'till every method had been tried to reclaim him from libertinism, and the dissipation of thought occasioned by it; and not 'till a competent time had been allowed to wear them in some measure at least away, and the more unruly gusts were blown over †. But after all, the chief advantages he had were seated in himself, and arose from the excellence of his superior abilities. It is true, he continued still to make frequent escapes from morals and good sense, which were a discredit to him; however, by this means he was thrown into an unconfin'd choice of company, and that was of use to him, for every thing was so that he saw or heard; if it was not so for the present, yet it dwelt upon his memory, 'till some fit occasion called it out; and then, at whatever distance of time, he could produce it with all it's circumstances, as if it happened but the day before. He was for this reason more improved by the good, and less hurt by the bad company, he kept. He sited in his hours of leisure, expressions, accidents, events; and what escaped others without thinking, was to him very frequently matter of thought, from which he extracted much more than ever occurred to themselves. Indeed he did not read much, or at least not many books; for which he sometimes gave the same reason, that Menage did for not reading Moreri's Dictionary, that he was unwilling to fill his head with what did not deserve a place there, since, when it was once in, he knew not how to get it out again; since whatever he read he retained, and that in a very singular manner, for he made it entirely his own; and whether he was to speak or to write upon any subject, all that ever he had read in his favourite authors occurred to him just as he had read it; so that he delivered this in conversation, or threw it upon paper, as if he had the book in his hand; a circumstance, without the knowledge whereof we shall be apt to mistake for studied affectation, what was to him, and perhaps only to him, perfectly natural. By an uncommon quickness of penetration, he could happily distinguish the real from the apparent view of Polemical writers, and had a sprightliness and perspicuity in delivering his own opinions, which was sure to entertain even those whom it did not convince. These were qualities, which did not, indeed, only adorn his juvenile years, but grew up with him, and kept him company through all stations, and under all circumstances; to which may be in some measure attributed his being always well received, and quickly gaining an ascendancy wherever he came. As the seasons for reflection returned oftener than formerly, upon account of the occasions that produced them returning oftener; so, whenever he did reflect, there was nothing that escaped him. He saw the fort, and he saw the faible of whatever he was to maintain or refuse, and he had an inconceivable dexterity in displaying

† His father knew the force of passion by a sad experience in his youth, being tried and convicted for the murder of Sir Will. Earlcourt, Bart. in 1684. Bishop Barlow's Cases of Conscience, Lond. 1692, 8vo. in the preface.

He presently chose his party, and joined himself to Robert Harley, Esq; who in this Parliament was chosen for the first time Speaker; and he made himself considerable before the end of this first session [F]. Persevering steadily in the same connection [G], he gained such playing or concealing whatever he was resolved to make apparent or to hide. The great Earl of Strafford is said to have made use of the works of a celebrated Popish author to help him, in making distinctions. Mr St John wanted no such help; he possessed it in that faculty of reflecting, and after a little thought was able to treat any subject in so new and singular a way, that it seemed to be perfectly changed by his method of managing it, so as to become susceptible of new arguments in it's favour, and to be no longer liable to those objections with which it had been formerly opposed. His peculiarity of thinking had not that imperfection with which peculiarity of thinking is commonly attended; it did not at all affect his manner of speaking, which was easy, natural, and flowing. And in this too he very much resembled the Earl of Strafford; for, however strong his thoughts, however nice and refined his distinctions, his language was always perfectly intelligible; and though, upon recollection, his words appeared to be very artfully chosen, yet, in the course of his delivery, they seemed to be such as offered themselves, and the first that rose in his mind. He had, as was observed before, pauses of reflection; but when once his thoughts came to be clothed in words, there was no hesitation, but the discourse rolled like a stream from a perennial spring, full, strong, clear, and filling equally the ear and mind; the sound was so exact an echo to the sense, that you never discovered trivial sentiments veiled in elegant expressions, or were able to discern that the sublimity of his conceptions, through any want of elocution in their conveyance. He had an excellency at improving hints, that for a time gave the highest pleasure, but in the end no less pain to a certain great man [Harley], who loved obscurity too much, and could not bear at his elbow one who was not only able to explain his thoughts when that was what he wished, but to penetrate what he took the greatest pains to conceal (12).

[F] He made himself considerable before the end of that session. No doubt can be made that he chose the party of Mr Harley, from the esteem he had for him; he suggests it himself; and the choice was evidently made against the inclinations of his family. Both his father and grandfather were what was then called Whigs. He gave his vote for the impeachment of Portland, Somers, and Hallifax, for the hand they had in the partition treaties: however, he did not spare afterwards to condemn his conduct at this time. 'I have sometimes, says he, considered, in reflecting on those passages, what I should have done, if I had sat in parliament at that time, and have been forced to own, that I should have voted for disbanding the army [in 1698] as I voted in the following parliament for censuring the treaties. I am forced to own this, because I remember how imperfect my notions were of the situation of Europe in that extraordinary crisis, and how much I saw the true interest of my own country in a half light. But, my Lord, I own it with some shame, because nothing in truth could be more absurd than the conduct we held. What! because we had not reduced the power of France by the war, nor excluded the house of Bourbon from the Spanish succession, nor compounded with her upon it by the peace [of Ryfwiek]; and because the house of Austria had not helped herself, nor put it into our power to help her with more advantage, and better prospect of success; were we to leave that whole succession open to the invasions of France, and to suffer even the contingency to subsist of seeing those monarchies united? What, because it was become extravagant, after the trials so lately made, to think ourselves any longer engaged by treaty, or obliged in good policy, to put the house of Austria in possession of the whole Spanish monarchy, and to defend her in this possession by force of arms; were we to leave the whole at the mercy of France?' A little after he declares, 'he thought the second partition treaty was a step in no wise eligible of itself, but rather unavoidable at that unhappy crisis. I cannot see, says he, what K. William could do in such circumstances as he found himself in, after three years struggle, except what he did: neither can I see how he could do what he did, especially after the resentment expressed by the Spaniard, and the pressing memorial presented by Canales on the conclusion of the first treaty of partition, without apprehending that the consequence would be a Will in favour of France*. He was in the worst of all political circumstances, in that wherein no one good measure remains to be taken, and out of which he left the two nations, at the head of whom he had been so long, to fight, and negotiate themselves and their confederates as well as they could.' (13).

[G] Persevering steadily in the same connections. In the last parliament of K. William, which met Dec. 30, 1701, and which was also the first parliament of Q. Anne, Mr St John was again member for Wotton-Basset (14), and Mr Harley again Speaker (15) Our statesman was charged several years afterwards with voting this year against the Hanover succession (16), which being again urged in 1731 as a thing notorious and undeniable, he published a small tract that year, where he calls it a false and impudent assertion. He observes, that the bill for settling the protestant succession passed before the death of K. William, and therefore in 1701, and not in 1702, as was alleged. He likewise observes further, that the same year a bill was brought into parliament by Sir Charles Hedges and himself, intitled, A bill for the further security of his majesty's person, and the succession of the crown in the protestant line, and extinguishing the hopes of the pretended Prince of Wales, and all other pretenders, and their open and secret abettors; which was passed without any division, after some debates about particular clauses and amendments only. He then takes notice that the division referred to, of 117 to 118, happened upon a clause added by the Lords to A bill for enlarging the time for taking the oath of abjuration, which clause regarded only such persons as had neglected to take the abjuration oath in time; and provided, that if such persons had forfeited any office, benefice, &c. to which any other person had been presented, the former should not be restored by taking the advantage of this act (17). To this answer, at first sight so seemingly full and clear, it was said, it was in reality no answer at all. 'Twas affirmed, that the bill, as it went from the Commons, was framed by the Tories, and calculated to give such as could not hitherto digest the abjuration oath, a year's respite; and the reason he gave for it was, that since the Queen's accession, many were inclined to come in, and take that oath, who declined it before. The Lords added to this bill three clauses: First, That no person who had already lost his post for want of taking that oath, should be restored in virtue of this act, in case his post was possessed by another. The second clause made it high treason for any person whatever, or his or their abettors or assistants, to endeavour to deprive or hinder any person next in succession to the crown for the time being, according to the limitation in the two acts for regulating the succession. The third clause extended the abjuration act to Ireland. The House of Commons divided upon the first of these amendments, when it was carried to agree with the Lords by a single vote as above, that though the main stress of the debates lay upon the second, yet, according to the practice of the House, they divided upon the three amendments in the order they came from the Lords. Therefore, though this famous division actually happened upon the first, yet the Tories only divided upon it, to try their strength; and having lost it, though by the smallest of majorities, were afraid to divide against the rest. To prove this to be fact, there are brought these two circumstances: first, that after the division was over, Mr Granville [a Tory] thus saluted Sir Matthew Dudley [a Whig] How fare ye, Mynbeer Dudley? To which Sir Matthew replied, Fort bien, Monsieur Granville. Secondly, Mr Dyer, in his News-Letter, gave his sentiments of the matter in these words: The Prince of Wales † lost it in the House only by one vote. To this it has been said, that the reply does not fix the charge upon our statesman; since, in such debates, it is highly probable different persons are governed

* The second Partition treaty was made in March 1700, and the King of Spain's Will, wherein he gave the whole monarchy undivided to France, was made in October following.

(13) On the Study of History, Letter 8. Vol. II. p. 18.

(14) Willis's Notitia Parliamentaria.

(15) Salmon's Chronological Historian, under this year.

(16) In 1710 were published two papers, one called The Test, offered to the Electors of G. Britain. The other, A List of the Members of the Hon. House of C—, that voted for and against the clause for the Hanover Succession in 1702. This produced a vindication, upon the principles here mentioned. In reply to which there came out a letter from a member, who then sat in parliament, said to be written by A. Mainwaring, Esq; and is inserted by Oldmixon, in his History of the Stuarts, p. 355. and in the same spirit is the account penned, which we find in Burnet's History of his own Time, p. 142. Vol. II.

(17) See our author's Political Tracts.

† Meaning the Pretender, whose father, King James, was then living.

(12) Life of Viscount Belingbroke, Lett. 2.

such an authority and influence in the House, that it was thought proper to distinguish his merit; and April 10, 1704, he was appointed Secretary at War, and of the Marines (c). As this post created a constant correspondence with the Duke of Marlborough, he became perfectly acquainted with the worth of that great General, and zealously promoted his honour and interest [H]. But when Mr Harley was removed from the Seals in 1707, Mr St John chose to follow his fortune, and the next day resigned his employments in the administration *: he also followed his friend's example, and behaved, during the whole session of Parliament, with great temper, steadiness, and decency [I]. He was not returned governed by different motives, when they vote on the same side. Some who might think the succession not deeply interested in this affair, might be against the second amendment, for two reasons; first, that it was unusual and improper to introduce a clause of the highest importance, enacting a new species of treason, in a bill regarding a matter of far less weight. Secondly, that whether these clauses stood part of the bill or not, the succession of the House of Hanover would still have remained fixed and established by law: in respect to which Mr St John had been undeniably instrumental in drawing up and bringing in the bill that fixed it; whereas, in this case, his opposition was but constructive at the most. Neither will it appear absurd to a man of candour as well as capacity, if we suggest, that very possibly Mr St John, from his conduct in the former point, thought himself the more at liberty to act as his reason dictated in the latter. Upon the whole, I presume it is evident enough, that the great struggle to carry this bill through the House, was far from being the security of the Hanover succession, about which both parties were agreed; but who should bear away the credit of promoting it most. As to Mr St John in particular, 'tis certain, the fame of his abilities in the senate began now to work in raising his fortune at court; a sure sign that at this time his behaviour stood in no such terrible light, as was afterwards endeavoured to be thrown upon it. In the second parliament of Queen Anne, called to meet Aug. 20, 1702, he was chosen a third time for Wotton-Basinet, and in the end of that month, attending the Queen from Windsor to Bath, by the way of Oxford, he had the degree of Doctor of Law conferred upon him, among several persons of the highest distinction. In the parliament which met October 20, and chose Mr Harley a third time Speaker, our statesman voted with the majority against perpetuating the pension payable out of the revenues of the Post Office upon the title of Duke of Marlborough. And in the conferences between the two Houses upon the Occasional Conformity bill, which was one of the most remarkable disputes during this reign, and were managed by the ablest men on both sides, he had his share in that, on the 10th of January, which was maintained on the part of the Commons by Mr Bromley, Mr St John, Mr Finch, Sir Simon Harcourt, and Sir Thomas Powys; and on that of the Lords by the Duke of Devonshire, the Earl of Peterborough, the Bishop of Salisbury, Lord Somers, and Lord Halifax. However, the next session of this parliament, when a motion was made to tack the bill against Occasional Conformity, now passed by the Commons a second time, to a money bill, he opposed and voted against it*; which shews, that though he had hitherto gone with the same party, yet he was determined not to go the utmost lengths, or to perplex the public business of the nation. These facts are here mentioned for two reasons; first, because they have been industriously thrown into shade by his enemies; and secondly, because by these it appears, that he was never held up by the chin, thro' the interest or affection of this or that great man, but made his way by his own merit, and by a display of those talents, which are the most essential and the most valuable in an English gentleman.

(c) Mr Harley had been made Secretary of State a little before. Boyer's Hist. of Queen Anne.

* Salmon's Chron. Hist. der that year.

[H] He promoted the Duke of Marlborough's honour and interest ] It is remarkable, that the greatest events of the war, such as the battles of Blenheim and Ramelies, and several glorious attempts made by the Duke to shorten the war by some decisive action, fell out while Mr St John was Secretary at War. This gave him occasion more than once to set his Grace's conduct in a true light. For instance, in carrying through the House the act for settling upon him the honour and manor of Woodstock, with the pension charged upon the Post-Office; and demonstrating, that besides all the great things he did, he would certainly have attempted, and in all probability performed, still greater, if he had not been restrained by the Dutch Deputies: whence there is good ground to believe, that no body understood the Duke's behaviour better, or was inclined to do more justice to his intentions, as well as his actions, than this gentleman. Yet in that disposition, a spirit of independency appears in setting Mr Philips to write the poem called Blenheim, in emulation to the Campaign of Mr Addison, who was recommended to that undertaking by Lord Halifax. He was 'tis evident, a sincere admirer of that great General: he distinguished himself as such on the present, and avowed it upon all occasions, even to the last moment of his life. He has told us so himself, and in so imitable a manner, that we must not withhold it from the reader 'By his [K. William's] death, the Duke of Marlborough, says he, was raised to the head of the army, and indeed of the Confederacy; where he, a new, a private man, and a subject, acquired by merit and by management a more deciding influence than high birth, confirmed authority, and even the crown of Great Britain, had given to K. William. Not only all the parts of that vast machine were kept more compact and intire, but a more rapid and vigorous motion was given to the whole; and instead of languishing or disastrous campaigns, we had every scene of the war full of action. All those wherein he appeared, and many others wherein he was not then an actor, but an abettor however of their action, were crowned with the most triumphant success. I take with pleasure this opportunity of doing justice to that great man, whose faults I know, whose virtues I admired, and whose memory as the greatest General, and the greatest Minister that our country, or perhaps any other, hath produced, I honour (18). But though he was a sincere admirer of the Duke's merit, yet nothing can be more ridiculous than the charge of his being a servile creature of that great man. This he disavowed when the Duke was in the zenith of his power, nor was he then charged, or ever afterwards, by the Duke or Duchesses of Marlborough, with ingratitude or breach of engagements to them. In succeeding times such charges were brought, repeated, and averred, but without any proofs attending them, and his whole conduct makes them utterly incredible. It has been said likewise, that the night before he withdrew himself, in 1715, he had a private conference with the Duke, and that he took that step in pursuance to the Duke's advice. In answer to this he observes, that he knew the Duke too well to govern himself by his directions (19). He was likewise accused of betraying the councils, while he was engaged with the Pretender, to the Duke, by the canal of his nephew the Duke of Berwick; but he gave such an answer to all those accusations then brought against him as has shamed his accusers (20). Upon the whole, it is evident that his nature was not capable of following any man with implicit obsequiousness. On the contrary, his fault was a too precipitate forwardness to take the lead himself.

[I] He behaved with temper.] He had given a remarkable instance of this moderation in the Parliament which met in 1705, when the Tories, viz. the Duke of Bucks, the Earls of Nottingham, Rochester, and Anglesea, proposed with great warmth the scheme of bringing the Princess Sophia into England. A motion for that purpose being made in the House of Commons, he insisted upon first reading the bill for a Regency that came from the Lords, and by that dextrous management defeated the first motion, without a division or a debate. This method was highly pleasing to the then Lord Treasurer Godolphin; since it did the business, and saved wrangling. In this conduct, however, he voted in conjunction with the Secretary of State, Mr Harley; hence the imputation of his running into violent measures seems to be groundless, since it is evident, from the circumstances of these times, that if

(18) Of the Use of History.

(19) Letter to Sir W. Wyndham, p. 91.

(20) See his answer to the impeachments by the Pretender; as also the last cited letter.

* Memoirs of the Life of Lord Bolingbroke.

returned in the Parliament which was elected in 1708; but upon the dissolution of it in 1710, Mr Harley being made Chancellor and Under-Treasurer of the Exchequer, the important post of Secretary of State was given to Mr St John; and about the same time he wrote the famous letter to the Examiner [K]. Upon the calling of a new parliament

on either of them had been inclined to fish in troubled waters, they had opportunities enough. And as in doing thus, their parts were notoriously applied, as well as their diligence, in preventing things from running into heats, we ought not to give any hasty credit to accusations unattended with evidence. The General and the Treasurer had at this time no such suspicions; and this is a better argument that they had no cause for them, than any that has hitherto been produced on either side (21). Let us hear Bishop Burnet's opinion with respect to such as at this time were intrusted with power. 'It bred, says he, a just indignation in all who had a true love to their country, to see some using all possible methods to shake the administration, which, notwithstanding the difficulties at home and abroad, was much the best that had been in the memory of man; and was certainly not only easy to the subjects in general, but gentle even towards those who were endeavouring to undermine it (22).'

[K] His famous letter to the Examiner.] This periodical paper was set up very soon after the dissolution of the former Parliament, and the calling of a new one this year 1710. The first twelve papers came out before the new Parliament met*. These were supposed to be written by Mr Secretary St John, Dr Atterbury, Mr Prior, and other Persons of distinction, who were equally conspicuous for their great capacities, and their thorough knowledge of the then state of things, which established the reputation of that performance, and enabled it to operate powerfully upon elections: among these appeared a Letter to the Examiner, which was so generally ascribed to the Secretary, that it was commonly called Mr St John's Letter to the Examiner, which shone with superior lustre.

micat inter omnes

Julium fidus, velut inter ignes

Luna minores.

It is indeed an exquisite proof of his keen abilities as a Writer; for in this single short paper are comprehended the outlines of that design, upon which so great an author as Dean Swift employed himself for near a twelvemonth, did his party infinite service, and gave inexpressible disquiet to the friends of the old ministry, who employed Mr Addison first in the Whig-Examiner, and then Mr Manwaring in the Medley ||, to write against the Examiner to little purpose.

It is not easy to name any subject that can be more interesting to a young statesman, than the discussion of this ministerial revolution. There never happened any change more remarkable in this country, or which furnishes either more instruction or better entertainment. Here we see what methods were pursued, to dissolve an administration composed of persons eminent for their abilities, possessed of large fortunes, most of them thoroughly acquainted with business, and knowing how to draw from the posts they enjoyed, all the helps an extensive influence could give towards preserving them. An administration confided in by the Allies, befriended by what was filled the moneyed interest, high in reputation from foreign, and, if we may be allowed the expression, from domestic victories, and secure of the Parliament then sitting. These were difficulties, that men must have very great courage to entertain so much as hopes of overcoming; very great capacities to frame a scheme that had even a probability of succeeding; and very great coolness and presence of mind, not to lose or bewilder themselves in the execution: the very attempting it, was a boldness bordering on temerity; the proceeding hazardous in every respect; and the miscarriage big with so many fatal consequences, that the sole apprehension of them, might very easily have produced a dizziness capable of disconcerting the best adjusted project, since human wisdom can contrive nothing out of the reach of a multitude of unforeseen accidents. This is but a faint picture of the circumstances those men were in, who undertook to bring about this change: from whence it may be understood, how exalted a complement they make to the memory of Mr

Harley, afterwards Earl of Oxford, who affirm that he alone contrived and conducted it in the first digestion, and that others were no more than his instruments. The first point was absolutely to secure the Queen; that is, to fix her in a steady and determined resolution to pursue the measures suggested to her, notwithstanding all the arguments and applications of every kind, that it might and must be foreseen, would be offered to discourage, dispirit, or divert her. Some have supposed that the whole scheme was not opened to her at once, but that she was gradually drawn from one step to another. But the very contrary of this seems infinitely more probable, for, if she had not been promised a total deliverance, it is not to be conceived what could be propounded to balance the hazards she ran in a partial removing of those who were grown disagreeable to her. In order to effect this, she was continually put in mind of the victory gained over her in the affair of Mr Hill's regiment, when by the Duke of Marlborough's going out of town, and the menaces of an address from the House of Commons to remove Mrs Masham, she was constrained by a letter under her own hand, to let his Grace know that she gave up the dispute, and that he might dispose of the regiment as he thought fit. She was put in mind of her being carried to school every day, for that was the phrase given to her attendance on Sacheverell's trial, to hear things that, considering the family from which she sprung, and the sentiments in which she was bred, must be extremely disagreeable to her; and the putting her in mind of these and many other instances of that strict discipline under which she was kept, brought that Princess to recollect many offensive and mortifying passages, to which even these private friends were strangers †. The next thing was to secure the people, and for this purpose the most effectual measures were taken, both by discourse and writing. In the latter, some of the greatest men among those, who aimed at an alteration in the ministry, condescended to employ their pains and their pens, which distinguished them from other performances. And in reference to the former, the bulk of the clergy throughout the kingdom served them with great industry and zeal, from the alarm taken at the affair of Dr Sacheverell. As soon as their success in both these points was thoroughly known to themselves, it was judged for their interest, that it should be no longer a secret to the world. They knew that the reputation of power is power; they knew that the Parliament as it then stood was against them; and therefore to ballance this, they thought it necessary to shew that they had the people. To do that effectually and with eclat, they procured addresses penned in the fashionable stile of the preceding reigns of the Queen's father and uncle: and under pretence of taking possession of a living, the late Criminal, now looked on as a kind of Confessor, made a progress from Oxford to Wales, and was received and caressed wherever he came, in a manner that fed his own vanity, and answered their purpose. Such were the previous steps to this revolution, which were so dexterously managed, that they seemed to rise naturally from events, and consequently were asserted to be the spontaneous sense of the nation, manifested in the fulness of their hearts, and without any management at all, which was denied and disclaimed with the very same warmth with which it was executed. Lord Dartmouth and Mr St John were made Secretaries of State in the room of Lord Sunderland and Mr Boyle; Lord Godolphin removed from the Treasurer's office, which was put into commission, including Mr Harley, who was also made Chancellor of the Exchequer. The Earl of Rochester made President of the Council, in the room of Lord Somers; Sir Simon Harcourt, Attorney-General instead of Sir James Montague, and the Great Seal taken from Lord Cowper, and put for some time into commission. The Parliament rose April 5. 1710, ten days after which the Marquis of Kent's White Staff, of Lord Chamberlain, was given to the Duke of Shrewsbury; yet at the same time the Marquis was created a Duke. This in those days was looked on as an ambiguous measure; but those who were in the secret knew that it was the signal;

† See the Conduct of the Dukes of Marlborough.

(21) Memoirs of Lord Viscount Boilingbrooke.

(22) Burnet's History of his own Time, Vol. 11.

* The former Parliament was dissolved September 21, a new one called on the 26th, to meet Novemb. 25. Salmon's Chron. H. fr. under this year; and the first paper of the Examiner is dated Aug. 3d the same year.

|| See Mr Manwaring's article.

on the 25th of November, he was chosen Knight of the Shire for the county of Berks, and also Burgess for Wotton-Basset, and made his election for the former. This large accession of power put him into a sphere of action that called forth all his abilities: the English annals produce not a more trying juncture, and Mr St John appeared equal to every occasion of trial. He sustained almost the whole weight of the difficulties in negotiating the peace of Utrecht [L]; and, in July 1712, he was created Baron St John of Lediard-signal; accordingly the other projected alterations followed in due time; and the whole was completed by the dissolution of the Parliament, and calling a new one to meet in November. All possible methods had been tried to shake the Queen's resolution: the Governor and some of the Directors of the Bank acquainted her with their apprehensions as to public credit; the ministers of the Emperor, and of the States-General, suggested the uneasiness these changes must infallibly give to her Allies; and without doubt these made some impression, though not so great as was expected. On the other hand, great pains were taken to persuade the nation, that these hints to a crowned head were very high indignities, as they had a tendency to take from the Queen the free choice of her own servants. It is worth while to see this described in the Letter to the Examiner. 'Notwithstanding all the pains which have been taken, says our Secretary, to lessen her character in the world by the wits of the Kit-Kat, and the sages of the Cellar †, mankind is convinced that a Queen, possessed of all the virtues requisite to bless a nation or to make a private family happy, sits on the throne. By an excess of goodness she delighted to raise some of her servants to the highest degrees of riches, of power, and of honours, and in this only instance can be said to have grieved any of her subjects. The rules she had prescribed to these persons as the measure of their conduct, was soon departed from; but so unable were they to associate with men of honest principles than themselves, that the sovereign authority was prostituted to support a faction, and made the purchase of indemnity for an offending Minister. Instead of the mild influences of a gracious Queen governing by law, we soon felt the miserable consequences of subjection to the will of an arbitrary junto, and to the caprice of an insolent woman ‡. Unhappy nation! Which expecting to be governed by the best, fell under the tyranny of the worst of her sex. But now, thanks be to God, the fury, which broke loose to execute the vengeance of heaven on a sinful nation, is restrained, and the royal hand is already reached out to chain up the plague.'

Invisum numen terras cœlumque levabit.

[L] The difficulties of negotiating the Treaty of Utrecht. It is not within the designed compass of these memoirs to discuss the conduct of our Secretary, during the long course of those perplexed negotiations; but we shall exhibit some of the most striking particulars, by which a judgment may be formed of the whole. In the session of Parliament which began Dec. 11, 1711, the Queen acquainted the Houses, that notwithstanding the arts of such as delighted in war, both time and place were appointed for the opening of a treaty. This was too much the language of party; and the Lords, in opposition to it, represented in their Address, that, in their opinion, no peace could be safe or honourable to Great Britain or Europe, if Spain and the West Indies were to be allotted to any branch of the House of Bourbon: upon which the Lords Compton and Bruce were called up to the House of Lords, and ten new Peers created before the end of the month. In the House of Commons, the Commissioners of Accounts charged the Duke of Marlborough with taking a considerable sum annually from those who made the bread contracts, and two and a half per cent. out of the pay of the foreign troops, which sums amounted in the whole, during his command, to upwards of half a million: notwithstanding the defence, that the first was a perquisite never denied to the commander in chief, and that the latter was a free gift from the foreign troops, intended and employed for intelligence, and less than was granted for that purpose during K. William's war, yet it was voted to be public money, and to be accounted for: accordingly a prosecution was directed, and under that colour the Duke dismissed from all his employments. The great trust of managing the affairs of the administration in Parliament was committed to our Secretary, who, to influence the nation in their discontents at the long continuance of the war, and to excite the most earnest desire of peace, employed himself in drawing up accurate computations of the numbers of our own men, that of foreigners, and the sums paid by way of subsidies during the course of the war; which was observed to be such a piece of dextrous and efficacious management, as had perhaps at no time 'till then been attempted in Parliament; being a double edged weapon that cut both ways. After much debate, and the most mature deliberation, the House of Commons attended her Majesty with a Representation, shewing the hardships the Allies had put upon England in carrying on this war, and, in consequence, how necessary it was to come in time at some relief. They set forth, first, 'That the expence of England, in the beginning of the war, amounted only to about three millions, but was now increased to nine millions or upwards, chiefly by being obliged to supply the deficiencies of her Allies; so that the States-General were frequently deficient two thirds of their quota of shipping, which not only increased the charge of the English, but was the occasion of great damage to the royal navy, and the destruction of the merchants ships for want of convoys, the English men of war being employed in other services; and that the Dutch had also been deficient in the Netherlands above twenty thousand men of their quota of troops. That almost the whole burthen of the war in Spain and Portugal had of late been thrown upon the English, the Dutch having every year lessened their troops on that side, and the Emperor, who was most nearly concerned, had no troops at all in pay there 'till the last years of the war, and then but one single regiment: that, on the contrary, the English did not only maintain sixty thousand men in the Spanish war, but the charges of the shipping alone employed in that service amounted to above eight millions sterling: and, in short, that England had expended in the war beyond its quota above nineteen millions of money. All which the late ministry had not only connived at, but in many instances contrived and encouraged upon private views. That the greater our success had been, the heavier had been the burden on the part of England, and that new dominions were daily conquered for the Allies, while they abated their share of the expence; and it could not be expected they should ever be weary of enlarging their territories at the charge of England, especially when even the revenues of the conquered countries were not applied to carrying on the war. That though Great Britain had borne as great a share of the war as the whole Confederacy, no advantages had been stipulated to her; but, on the contrary, the late Barrier Treaty with the Dutch was destructive to our trade, and the putting Newport and other places into their hands, made the trade of the English to the Spanish Netherlands precarious; and the strength of that country, which Britain had so largely contributed to reduce, might hereafter be employed against Britain itself (23). The primary design of this Representation was to justify the new resolutions which had been taken, of obliging the States to compleat their quota of men and ships, by declaring that, otherwise, the Queen would lessen her own forces in a just proportion. Besides, it was calculated to persuade the nation, that the close connexion between the friends of the old Ministry and the Allies, was founded on their reciprocal interests, to which that of Great Britain was sacrificed. It served likewise to justify the new manner in which they pretended to carry on the war, in case the Allies insisted upon carrying it on at all events, by Great Britain's fulfilling her engagements without going beyond them, and exacting from the rest of the Allies, that they should also perform theirs. This scheme being very plausible in itself, and coming to the Queen and † Two famous clubs, consisting of the ablest men in the old Ministry, and their friends. See Boyer's History of Queen Anne.

‡ The Duchesse of Marlborough

(23) Boyer's History of Queen Anne.

Ledjard-Tregoze in Wiltshire, and Viscount Bolingbroke [M]. He was also the same year appointed Lord-Lieutenant of the county of Essex*. But these honours not answering his expectations, he formed a design of taking the Lead in publick affairs from his old friend Mr Harley, then Earl of Oxford [N]; which proved in the issue unfortunate to them and her subjects, backed with so high an authority as the Representation of the House of Commons, gave great countenance and credit to their proceedings, as they carried the air of instructions to those by whom in reality they were dictated. It was some time before this long Representation could reach the hands of the States, and it required some space to consider and frame an answer to it; during which the declarations were made, and the measures taken that were advised therein, and the negotiations between Great Britain and France were carried so far, that the Queen, in a speech to both Houses, communicated the plan upon which a general peace might be made, at the very time this answer from the States-General arrived. It was certainly drawn up with much clearness and candour, and in terms which demonstrated to impartial people, that the States, considered as trustees for their own nation, were very little to blame: yet Mr Secretary St John drew up a short reply to it, with such spirit and address, as intirely enervated it's force. The States had alledged, that by the Alliance, both powers had engaged to exert their utmost force; and that, therefore, they had fully complied with their engagements, in doing all that they could. They enlarged on the great superiority of Britain, in point of wealth and power, which made it reasonable for her to outdo her Allies. They disputed the truth, or rather the method, of some calculations, insinuating that the ships they employed in the North Sea ought to be considered as a part of their quota. They asserted that Great Britain had often exceeded, more especially in the Mediterranean service, in the course of a campaign, the proportions settled at the beginning of a campaign, but that this ought to throw no blame upon them, if their quota was agreeable to the original stipulations; and they insisted, that the revenue arising from the country in which their barrier lay, was very much below what it had been represented. The Secretary extracted from this Answer, such principles as fell in with those of the Representation, as it is visible many of them do, and concluded from thence, that if their High Mightinesses had acted with great prudence and frugality during the course of the war, it was high time for Great Britain to imitate their conduct at the close of it; and dwelt very strongly upon their pathetic remarks as to the weight of that burden which they had sustained, inferring that it was high time for the Maritime Powers, upon whom the whole expence of the war now lay, to think of getting out of it as soon as they could, by a safe and advantageous peace. This may serve for a specimen of the Secretary's conduct, upon whom, at this juncture, the great weight of the business lay; and though it is allowed on all hands, that even at this time he gave a great loose to his pleasures, and availed himself very little of those helps to business that arise from method; yet his very enemies then allowed, and events will prove the truth of it to posterity, that he managed with singular dexterity, and executed the several high employments in which he then acted, with singular facility and capacity. As a Statesman and a Minister, he had prodigious difficulties to struggle with. Most of the foreign courts with which we had any transactions, and of consequence their Ministers, were continually prying into and taking exceptions to his measures, and that with a certain fierceness which sometimes drove him to extremities. The business of Count Gallas, the Imperial Minister, who printed without ceremony whatever papers were communicated to him, and was continually complaining if papers were printed by any body else, made a great noise, and he was at length forbid the Court. The Hanoverian Minister, Baron Bothmar's Memorial, made still more noise, and put the Secretary under greater inconveniences. The letter of the States-General to the Queen, in support of their answer to the Representation of the House of Commons, out-did both these, and was likewise published from the press. With all these embarrassments, the weight of a most intricate and important negotiation lay upon his shoulders; and while his whole time might have been taken up in repelling those attacks upon his conduct at home, he was obliged to furnish instructions for the Queen's Ministers abroad, who could, and who would, do nothing, but in pursuance of his directions. As an orator in the Senate, he exerted every different kind of eloquence; he stated all the great points that were brought before the Houses; he persuaded, he illustrated, he supported, the resolutions that were taken upon them; he answered the objections that were made and maintained by the acutest men in the kingdom; and who, to their great abilities in speaking, joined a perfect acquaintance with business, which affords an almost inexpressible weight to an opposition. As a Courtier too, he had many and very nice affairs upon his hands, and was obliged to enter into, and manage private intrigues, of a very nice and delicate nature, in the midst of his application to public business: so that if you take into your view the whole circle of concerns that occupied his thoughts at this juncture, and remember at the same time that he was not without his foibles and his vices, you cannot but conceive of him a very high and extraordinary opinion; and instead of being surprized at those irregularities and eccentricities, that, upon a very critical search, were discovered in his conduct, you will rather stand amazed at the success which attended his endeavours, and that in spite of those imperfections, which even his friends must acknowledge in his character, he was able to do what he did, and to support himself and his party against such a spirit of opposing, such a weight of influence, and such a torrent of abuse, as at this juncture both they and he sustained. He was, if you please, a Leader of a faction; but he was a very able leader. He was a man of pleasure and indifference, but he was, notwithstanding, a man of abilities. He was, in short, after all that the severest critics could suggest, and after all that envy and malice could invent, a very extraordinary genius, whom, whilst we blame, we must admire, and whom, if any respect be due to parts, to application, and to the power of achieving great things by dint of these, we must commend. His Lordship himself we find, a few years after, declaring that he never looked back on this great event [the peace of Utrecht] passed as it was, without a secret emotion of mind, when he compared the vastness of the undertaking, and the importance of the success, with the means employed to bring it about, and with those which were employed to traverse it (24).

[M] Viscount Bolingbroke. The honours of both the families of St John were united in these titles, that of his own branch in the Barony of Treagoze; and in Bolingbroke that of the elder branch, in the great-grandson of Sir Oliver St John (mentioned in the reign of Henry VI.) whose eldest son, being Oliver St John, Esq; was created Baron St John of Bletho in the 17 of Eliz. and his grandson whose name was likewise Oliver, was in the 22d James I. created Earl of Bolingbroke. 'Tis remarkable, that as the younger branch sided with the King in the civil wars, so the elder joined with the Parliament. The Earl of Bolingbroke was very warm in that cause, and so was his son the Lord St John of Bletho, whom the King had called by writ into the House of Peers, to whom the Parliament gave a commission to raise a troop of Horse, at the head of which he was present in the army of the Earl of Essex at the battle of Edge-hill, and was the only person of distinction killed on that side. 'Tis well known also, how great a share the Chief Justice St John, who was of this branch, had in contriving and executing the political schemes that brought on the civil war. It is true, he was grandfather by the mother's side to the subject of this memoir; but he was not defended from him in the same sense that was objected to his Lordship idly enough about this time (18).

[N] But not satisfied, he intrigued to wrest the Lead from the Earl of Oxford. It must be observed that Paulet St John, the last Earl of Bolingbroke, died the 5th of October, preceding this creation. That by his decease, though the Barony of Bletho devolved upon Sir Andrew St John, Bart. yet the Earldom became

(24) Letter to Sir W. Wyndham, p. 36, 37. edit. 1753, 8vo.

(18) Memoirs of Lord Bolingbroke.

them both. Presently after the accession of King George the First to the Throne, in 1714, the Seals were taken from the Secretary, and all the papers in his office secured [O].
However,

became extinct, and the honour was promised to our author; but his presence in the House of Commons being so necessary at that time, the Lord Treasurer prevailed upon him to remain there during that session, upon a promise that his rank should be preserved to him; but when he expected the old title should have been renewed in his favour, which, considering his services, particularly in that session, seemed reasonable enough, he was put off with this of Viscount; this he resented as an affront, and looked on it as so intended by the Treasurer, who had got an Earldom for himself (19). It is not a little entertaining to see how his Lordship expresses it. 'I continued' says he, 'in the House of Commons during that important session which preceded the peace, and, which by the spirit shewn through the whole course of it, and by the resolutions taken in it, rendered the conclusion of the treaties practicable. After this, I was dragged into the House of Lords in such a manner as to make my promotion a punishment, not a reward, and was there left to defend the treaties alone. It would not have been hard, continues he, to have forced the Earl of Oxford to use me better. His good intentions began to be very much doubted of; the truth is, no opinion of his sincerity had ever taken root in the party; and, which was worse perhaps for a man in his station, the opinion of his capacity began to fall apace. He was so hard pushed in the House of Lords in the beginning of 1712, that he had been forced, in the middle of the session, to persuade the Queen to make a promotion of twelve peers at once; which was an unprecedented and invidious measure, to be excused by nothing but the necessity, and hardly by that. In the House of Commons his credit was low, and my reputation very high. You know the nature of that assembly; they grow like hounds, fond of the man who shews them game, and by whose halloo they are used to be encouraged. The thread of the negotiations, which could not stand still a moment, without going back, was in my hands: and before another man could have made himself master of the business, much time would have been lost, and great inconveniences would have followed. Some who opposed the court soon after, began to waver then: and if I had not wanted the inclination, I should have wanted no help, to do mischief. I knew the way of quitting my employments, and of retiring from court when the service of my party required it; but I could not bring myself up to that resolution, when the consequence of it must have been the breaking my party, and the distress of the publick affairs. I thought my mistress treated me ill, but the sense of that duty which I owed her, came in aid of other considerations, and prevailed over my resentment. These sentiments, indeed, are so much out of fashion, that a man who avows them is in danger of passing for a bubble in the world: yet they were, in the conjuncture I speak of, the true motives of my conduct; and you saw me go on as cheerfully in the troublesome and dangerous work assigned me, as if I had been under the utmost satisfaction. I began, indeed, in my heart to renounce the friendship, which 'till that time I had preserved inviolable for Oxford. I was not aware of all his treachery, nor of the base and little means which he employed then, and continued to employ afterwards, to ruin me in the opinion of the Queen, and every where else. I saw, however, that he had no friendship for any body, and that with respect to me, instead of having the ability to render that merit, which I endeavoured to acquire, an addition of strength to himself, it became the object of his jealousy, and a reason for undermining me (20). We must not omit to observe, that when this letter of Bolingbroke to Sir W. Wyndam was wrote, Lord Oxford had not made his defence against the articles of his impeachment, in which he absolutely disculpates himself in regard to the promotion of the twelve Lords, nor did Bolingbroke at that time in any of his writings ever bring it as a charge against him, though he does not spare his character upon all occasions. And though Bolingbroke here declares, that he had 'till the time of this affront preserved his friendship for Oxford inviolable, yet Oxford in his letter to the Queen, of June 8, 1714, asserts, that in the beginning of February 1710, there commenced a division among those called Tories in the House of Commons, and that St John thought fit to be lifting a separate party for himself, that this spirit was raised in him on the opening of that Parliament in November preceding, when he complained much that Oxford had not acquainted him with the secret of raising money for the current service of the year, and particularly with the scheme for liquidating nine millions of the national debt, alledging, that in so large a sum, the small one of a hundred thousand pounds would not have been missed, and might have been shared among his friends. Whoever reads in Bolingbroke's posthumous and latter pieces (21), how much he claims the merit of having always stuck to the Tories against Oxford's scheme of the coalition, will not be disinclined to believe the first of these imputations. But the second must rest upon the Treasurer's authority, being indeed not so credible in itself, since Bolingbroke's squire, 'tis well known, was not the love of money but of power; nor did he in a political view give that sufficient attention to the former, which was necessary in some degree to support and maintain the latter. The author of the Continuation of Rapin's history, gives us the general opinion at that time. 'The conduct of foreign affairs, says he, lay in the Lord Bolingbroke, who, as he was less reserved in the prosecution of bold measures than the Treasurer, had therefore the largest share of the public odium, without any other advantage than the perquisites of his office, most of which he lavished away in riotous pleasures. Being a man impatient of dependency he had frequent warm expostulations with the Treasurer, who disregarded his complaints; by which the Secretary was still more enraged (22). In the above-mentioned paper of Lord Oxford, addressed to her Majesty, he charges our Secretary with projecting the expedition to Canada, chiefly in the view of cheating the nation of twenty thousand pounds; and at the same time he takes to himself the merit of preventing this from falling, in the next session, under the inspection of the House of Commons; but when this assertion of his was converted into an Article of Impeachment against him, and himself charged with impeding justice by such a concealment, he alledged in his own defence, that the reason he hindered it from coming before the Parliament, was, that upon a close examination the proof was not clear, and he judged that a very improper season for commencing such an enquiry when it could not be fully made out. He further adds, that the papers upon which he grounded his opinion, had been long in the hands of the House of Commons, which impeached them both, and he had not heard that they thought them sufficient foundation for such a charge (23): A circumstance which rather proves his own mistake than the misbehaviour of his competitor. There was another transaction which passed not long after Lord Bolingbroke's being raised to the Peerage, and which helped to increase his animosity to the Minister. In a few weeks after his return from France, her Majesty was pleased to bestow the vacant Ribbons of the Order of the Garter upon the Dukes Hamilton, Beaufort, and Kent, and the Earls Paulet, Oxford, and Strafford. The new Viscount thought himself here again ill used, having an ambition (as the Minister well knew) to receive, as well as to deserve, such an instance as this was of his mistress's grace and favour. Upon the whole therefore 'tis no wonder, that when the Treasurer's staff was taken from this old friend, he expressed his joy by entertaining that very day, July 7, 1714 at dinner, the Generals Stanhope, Cadogan, and Palmer, with Sir Will. Wyndam, Mr Craggs, and some other gentlemen. Oxford said upon his going out, that some of them would smart for it; and Bolingbroke was far from being insensible of the danger to which he stood exposed, but was not without hopes still of securing himself by making his court to the Whigs (24); and 'tis certain, that a little before this, he had proposed to bring in a bill to the House of Lords to make it high treason to enlist soldiers for the Pretender, which was passed into an act.

[O] The Seals were taken from him.] Before his removal, he received a still higher mortification from the Regency, who having made choice

(19) Ibid.

(21) See particularly his last cited letter, p. 20, 21, 22.

(22) Rapin's History of England, Vol. XXV. 8vo. edition.

(23) See the articles of impeachment against him and his defence, in State Trials, Vol. the last.

(20) Letter to Sir W. Wyndham, p. 31, & seq.

(24) Memoirs of his Lordship, ubi supra; and Rapin's Continuation.

However, during the short session of parliament at this juncture, he applied himself with his usual industry and vigour, to keep up the spirit of the friends to the late administration, without omitting any proper occasion of testifying his respect and duty to his Majesty; in which spirit he assisted in settling the Civil List, and other necessary points. But, soon after the meeting of the new parliament, he withdrew, and crossed the water privately to France, in the latter end of March, 1715 [P]. Upon his arrival at Paris, he choice of Joseph Addison, Esq; for their Secretary, gave direction at the same time to the Post-Master-General, to send all letters, and packets directed to the Secretary of State, to the Secretary of the Regency. So that his Lordship was in fact removed from his office, that is, from the execution of it, in two days after the Queen's death; and the chagrin which this must needs occasion, was continually heightened by the daily humiliation of waiting at the door of the apartment where the Regency sat, with a bag in his hand, and being all the time, as it were on purpose, exposed to the insolence of those who were tempted by their own intemperance, or thought they might make their court to others by an abuse of him (25). Upon this sudden turn of fortune, when the Seals were taken from him, he went, as we learn from himself, into the country (26), where, after the arrival of King George I. he received a message to come and be present when the Seals were taken off the door of his Secretary's office; but he excused himself, observing that might be as well done by one of his Under-secretaries; but that if he could be so happy as to have the honour to kiss the King's hand, he would fly to throw himself at his Majesty's feet (27). His Lordship several years afterwards takes notice, that the Queen's servants did the duty of their offices, whilst they were continued in them by her successor, in such a manner as to merit his approbation. This, continues he, was signified to some of them, to the Secretaries in particular, in the strongest terms, and according to his Majesty's express order, before the whole Council of State (28); which made some amends for the indignity of the Regency, or that of the same Council, 'who, he declares, acted like a Council of the Holy Office. Whoever, says he, looked on the face of the nation saw every thing quiet, not one of those symptoms appearing, which must have shewn themselves more or less, at that moment, if in reality there had been any measures taken during the former reign to defeat the Protestant Succession. His Majesty ascended the throne with as little contradiction, and as little trouble, as ever a son succeeded a father in the possession of a private patrimony. But, continues this Lord, he who had the opportunity, which I had 'till my dismissal, of seeing a great part of what passed in that Council, would have thought that there had been an opposition actually formed, that the new establishment was attacked openly from without, and betrayed from within (29).' However the former declaration explains his meaning, where he says, 'that at first many of the Tories had been made to entertain some faint hopes, that they would be permitted to live in quiet. I have been assured, says he, that the King left Hanover in that resolution (30).'

[P] He withdrew to France. The new Parliament met March 17. The King's speech was read the 21st, and the next day the Committee appointed by the House of Lords, reported it as usual, upon which a warm debate arose, chiefly in respect to the following expressions, And recover the reputation of this kingdom in foreign parts, the loss of which we hope to convince the world by our actions, is by no means to be imputed to the nation in general. In this debate, among others, his Lordship made a long speech, wherein he expressed the heartiest and deepest concern for the memory of the late Queen, his most excellent mistress, which he said he would do all in his power to vindicate, that he had the honour to be one of her servants; and if he had done any thing amiss, he would be contented to be punished for it; but that he thought it hard to be censured and condemned without being heard. His Lordship took this occasion to say a great deal in praise of the King, that his Majesty had several times expressed a great respect and tenderness for the late Queen's memory, and was a Prince of so great wisdom, equity, and justice, that he was sure his Majesty would not condemn any man without hearing what he had to say for himself, and that so august an assembly ought to imitate so great a pattern. In conclusion, his Lordship moved that the words recover, &c.

might be changed into those of maintain the reputation of this kingdom, and that the rest of the paragraph might be omitted. To which Lord Cowper replied, that they did not condemn any particular person, but only the peace in general, because they felt the ill consequences of it. That they who advised, and made such a peace, deserved indeed to be censured, but that the words in the Address being general, no private person was affected by them; and that the alteration of the word recover into that of maintain, would signify no more toward the justification of the guilty, than the word recover towards the condemnation of the innocent. The question being put, whether the Address should be recommitted, it was carried in the negative by 66 against 33 †. Any one might see from the nature and issue of this debate, that a resolution was also taken at the same time to carry things to extremity, and in such a case that Lord Bolingbroke would be more particularly in danger. Various reports were spread, one was that a certain noble Person [the Duke of Shrewsbury] who was for pursuing milder measures, and finding himself over-ruled, intimated it to some friends, by whom it came to Lord Bolingbroke's ears: Another report was, that the Duke of Marlborough, to whom he had been for some time reconciled, hinted to him, that of all the Queen's ministers he was like to meet with the least favour (31). But it is worth while to see his own account of this matter. Having declaimed against the proceedings of the Regency under the title of a political Inquisition, he goes on thus:

'In the King's first speech from the throne, all the inflaming hints were given, all the methods of violence were chalked out to the two Houses. The first steps in both were perfectly answerable, and to the shame of the Peerage be it spoken, I saw at that time several Lords concur to condemn in one general vote, all that they had approved of in a former Parliament by many particular resolutions. Among several bloody resolutions proposed and agitated at this time, the resolution of impeaching me of high treason was taken: and I took that of leaving England, not in a panic terror improved by the artifices of the Duke of Marlborough, whom I knew even at that time too well to act by his advice or information in any case, but on such grounds, as the proceedings which soon followed sufficiently justified, and such as I have never repented, building upon. Those who blamed it in the first heat, were soon after obliged to change their language. For, what other resolution could I take? the method of prosecution designed against me, would have put me immediately out of condition to act for myself, or to serve those who were less exposed than me, but who were however in danger. On the other hand, how few were there on whose assistance I could depend, or to whom I would even in those circumstances be obliged. The ferment in the nation was wrought up to a considerable height, but there was at that time no reason to expect, that it could influence the proceedings in Parliament in favour of those who should be accused. Left to its own movement, it was much more proper to quicken than slacken the prosecutions: and who was there to guide its motions? The Tories who had been true to one another to the last, were a handful, and no great vigour could be expected from them. The whimsicalists disappointed of the figure which they hoped to make, began indeed to join their old friends; one of the Principal amongst them * was so very good as to confess to me, that if the court had called the servants of the late Queen to account, and stopped there, he must have considered himself as a Judge, and have acted according to his conscience on what should have appeared to him: But that war had been declared to the whole Tory party, and that now the state of things were altered. This discourse needed no commentary, and proved to me, that I had never erred in the judgment I made of this set of men. Could I then resolve to be obliged to them, or to suffer with OXFORD? As much

† Journals of the House of Lords.

(31) Continuation of Rapin, ubi supra.

* The Earl of Anglesea. I told, says his Lordship, the fact to the Bishop of Rochester, that night, or the next day.

he received an invitation from the Pretender, then at Barr, to engage in his service; which he absolutely refused, and made the best application that his present circumstances would admit, to prevent the extremity of his prosecution in England [Q.] After a short stay at Paris, he retired into Dauphiné (d), where he continued 'till the beginning of July; when, upon receiving a message from some of his party in England, he computed with

(d) Letter to Sir W. Wyndham, p. 99, edit. 1733, 8vo.

‘ as I still was heated by the disputes in which I had been all my life engaged against the Whigs, I would sooner have chose to owe my security to their indulgence, than to the assistance of the Whimficals: But I thought banishment with all her train of evils preferable to either. I abhorred OXFORD to that degree, that I could not bear to be joined with him in any case.’ Nothing perhaps contributed so much to determine me as this sentiment. A sense of honour would not have permitted me to distinguish between his case and mine own; and it was worse than death to lie under the necessity of making them the same, and of taking measures in concert with him (32) The panic here denied by his Lordship is thus described by Tindal: ‘ Lord B---’s heart says, that historian, began to fail him, as soon as he heard that Prior was landed at Dover, and had promised to reveal all he knew. Accordingly that evening his Lordship, who had the night before appeared at the play-house in Drury-Lane, and bespoke another play for the next night, and subscribed to a new opera that was to be acted some time after, went off to Dover in disguise as a servant to Le Vigne, one of the French King’s messengers, and there William Morgan, who had been a captain in general Hill’s regiment of marines, hired a vessel and carried him over to Calais, where the Governor attended him in a coach, and carried him to his house †.’ The next day after it was publicly known that he was gone to France, the following letter, said to have been written to the late Lord Landfdowne, was handed about in print; which being very consistent with his Lordship’s conduct and sentiments †, is probably genuine; at least it was neither disowned then, nor denied since.

Dover, March 27, 1715.

‘ My Lord,

‘ I left the town so abruptly, that I had no time to take leave of you, or any of my friends. You will excuse me, when you know, that I had certain and repeated informations from some who are in the secret of affairs, that a resolution was taken by those who have power to execute it, to pursue me to the scaffold. My blood was to have been the cement of a new alliance; nor could my innocence be any security, after it had been once demanded from abroad, and resolved on at home, that it was necessary to cut me off. Had there been the least reason to hope for a fair and open trial, after having been already prejudged unheard by two Houses of Parliament, I should not have declined the strictest examination. I challenge the most inveterate of my enemies to produce any one instance of a criminal correspondence, or the least corruption in any part of the administration where I was concerned. If my zeal for the honour and dignity of my royal mistress, and the true interest of my country, has any where transported me to let slip a warm or unguarded expression, I hope the most favourable interpretation will be put upon it. It is a comfort that will remain with me in all my misfortunes, that I served her Majesty faithfully and dutifully, in that especially, which she had most at heart, relieving her people from a bloody and expensive war; and that I have also been too much an Englishman to sacrifice the interest of my country to any foreign ally, and it is for this crime only that I am now driven from thence *. You shall hear more at large from me shortly.

‘ Yours, &c (33)

[Q] He applied to prevent the extremity of his prosecution. ‘ In the uncertainty, says he, of what would happen, whether the prosecutions would be pushed, which was most probable, in the manner intended against me, and against others, for all of whom except the Earl of Oxford, I had as much concern as for myself; or whether the Whigs would relent, drop some, and soften the fate of others; I resolved to conduct myself so, as to create no appearance which might be strained into a pretence for hard usage, and which might be retorted on my friends, when they debated for me, or when they defended themselves. I saw the Earl of Stair. I promised him, that I would not enter into Jacobite engagements, and I kept my word with him. I writ a letter to Mr Secretary Stanhope, which might take off any imputation of neglect of the government; and I retired into Dauphiné to remove the objection of residence near the court of France (34).’ But notwithstanding these colourable pretences to his old friends, it seems, this conduct was differently construed by them, as well as the Whigs also, who were no strangers to the motive of his refusing the Pretender’s invitation, which, as he himself assures us, was only because he had no commission from his friends in England, who alone could determine him, if any could, to take such a step; that is, as he before explains it, that the little hopes of the Pretender’s succeeding would have impeached him of weakness in joining it. These are his words: ‘ When I arrived in France, the affairs of England were represented to me in another light, than I had seen them in, when I looked upon them with my own eyes very few weeks before. I found the persons who were detached to speak with me prepared to think that I came over to negotiate for the Pretender: And when they perceived that I was more ignorant than they imagined I was assured by them, that there would be suddenly an universal rising in England and Scotland. The leaders were named to me, their engagements specified, and many gentlemen, yourself among others, were reckoned upon for particular services, though I was certain, you had never been treated with. From whence I concluded, and the event has justified my opinion, that these assurances had been given on the general characters of men, by such of our friends as had embarked sooner, and gone further than the rest (35).’ But, that to avoid the imputation of acting a silly part, was the true motive of his taking this step, is still plain from the tenor of his defence. ‘ This retreat from Paris, says he, was censured in England, and stiled a desertion of my friends, and of their cause, with what foundation let any reasonable man determine. Had I engaged with the Pretender before the party acted for him, or required of me, that I should do so, I had taken the air of being his man, whereas I looked on myself as theirs. I had gone about to bring them into his measures; whereas I never intended, even since that time, to do any thing more, than to make him as far as possible act conformably to their views.’ So far on one side, he then proceeds to the other, as follows: ‘ During the short time I continued on the banks of the Rhone, the prosecutions were carried on at Westminster with the utmost violence, and the ferment among the people was risen to such a degree, that it could end in nothing better, it might have ended in something worse, than it did. The measures which I observed at Paris, had turned to no account. On the contrary, the letter which I wrote to Mr Secretary Stanhope, was quoted as a base and fawning submission, and what I intended as a mark of respect to the government, and a service to my friends, was perverted to ruin me in the opinion of the latter (36).’ It is observable, that his Lordship at this juncture took his measures from the same rule of political prudence, for which he so often and so loudly complains of the Earl of Oxford, as far as their different circumstances would bear. Oxford had some private intrigues for himself at Hanover, so he had at Bar. He was the bubble of one in the end. The Pretender was so of the other; but his whole management in the mean time was contrived to keep up a kind of general indetermination about the succession. Bolingbroke had a private intrigue for himself at the Hanoverian court when removed to England; so he had at Bar. He was the bubble of both at present, and in the end never could recover that by an ill favoured submission to the former, which Oxford preserved himself from losing by a noble and unanswerable defence (37).

(34) Letter to Sir W. Wyndham, p. 100, 101.

(35) Ibid. p. 97, 98.

(36) Ibid. p. 103, 102, 103. When his imprudence was made for by Mr Rob. Walpole who challenged any person to appear in his behalf, General R. had stood us, and said he would appear in his behalf but see referred what he had to say to another opportunity. Continuation of Rapin.

(37) State of Parties, p. 243.

(32) Letter to Sir W. Wyndham, p. 89 to 95.

† See Morgan’s examination before the Secret Committee.

‡ See his letter to Sir W. Wyndham, p. 74, &c. Ibid. p. 75.

* He afterwards very aptly applied to his own case the words of Tacitus, in excuse of his father-in-law Julius Agricola, commissus putabam offensere, quam odisse. Ibid. p. 75.

(33) Continuation of Rapin.

with a second invitation from the Pretender [R]; and taking the Seals of the Secretary's office under him at Commercy [S], he set out with them for Paris; in which

[R] Engaged with the Pretender. We are assured from his own pen, that he had waited for this opportunity of determining himself from the time of his first retirement to Dauphiné, having found it in vain to think of making his peace at home. So that though the correspondence with him was neither frequent nor safe, though he heard feldom, and darkly, from his Jacobite friends in England during this interval, and was entirely ignorant of the measures they took, and of the use they intended to make of him; yet he saw well enough which way the current ran, and therefore was not wanting on his part, to let them all know, that they had but to command him, and he was ready to venture in their service the little which remained, as frankly as he had exposed all which was gone. At length, when these commands came, he executed them in the following manner: 'The person, says he, who was sent to me, arrived in the beginning of July 1715, at the place where I was. He spoke in the name of all the friends whose authority could influence me, and he brought me word that Scotland was not only ready to take arms, but under some sort of dissatisfaction to be withheld from beginning; that in England the people were exasperated against the government to such a degree, that far from wanting to be encouraged, they could not be restrained from insulting it on every occasion; that the whole Tory party was become avowedly Jacobites; that many officers of the army, and the majority of the soldiers were well affected to the cause; that the city of London was ready to rise; and that the enterprizes for seizing of several places, were ripe for execution; in a word, that most of the principal Tories were in a concert with the Duke of Ormond, for I had pressed particularly to be informed whether his Grace acted alone, or, if not, who were his council, and that the others were so disposed, that there remained no doubt of their joining as soon as the first blow should be struck. He added, that my friends were a little surprized to observe that I lay neuter in such a conjuncture. He represented to me the danger I ran of being prevented by people of all sides, from having the merit of engaging early in this enterprize; and how unaccountable it would be for a man impeached and attainted under the present government, to take no share in bringing about a revolution so near at hand, and so certain. He intreated that I would defer no longer to join the Chevalier; to advise and assist in carrying on his affairs; and to solicit and negotiate at the Court of France, where my friends imagined, that I should not fail to meet with a favourable reception, and from whence they made no doubt of receiving assistance in a situation of affairs so critical, so unexpected, and so promising. He concluded by giving me a letter from the Pretender, whom he had seen in his way to me, in which I was pressed to repair without loss of time to Commercy: and this instance was grounded on the message, which the bearer of the letter had brought me from my friends in England. Since he was sent to me, it would have been more proper to have come directly where I was: but he was in haste to make his own court, and to deliver the assurances which were intrusted to him. Perhaps too he imagined that he should tie the knot faster on me, by acquainting me that my friends had actually engaged for themselves and me, than by barely telling me that they desired I would engage for myself and them. In the progress of the conversation he related a multitude of facts, which satisfied me as to the general disposition of the people; but he gave me little satisfaction as to the measures taken for improving this disposition, for driving the business on with vigour if it tended to a revolution, or for supporting it to advantage if it span into a war. When I questioned him concerning several persons whose disinclination to the government admitted no doubt, and whose names, quality, and experience, were very essential to the success of the undertaking; he owned to me, that they kept a great reserve, and did at most but encourage others to act, by general and dark expressions. I received this account, and this summons, ill in my bed: yet important as the matter was, a few minutes served to determine me. The circumstances wanting to form a reasonable inducement to engage, did not escape me. But the smart of a bill of attainder tingled in every vein: and I looked on my party to be under oppression, and to call for my assistance. Besides which, I considered first that I should certainly be informed, when I conferred with the Chevalier of many particulars unknown to this gentleman; for I did not imagine, that you could be so near to take arms, as he represented you to be, on no other foundation, than that which he exposed: and secondly that I was obliged in honour to declare, without waiting for a more particular information of what might be expected from England; since my friends had taken their resolution to declare, without any previous assurance of what might be expected from France. This second motive weighed extremely with me at that time: there is however more found than sense in it, and it contains the original error, to which all your subsequent errors, and the thread of misfortunes which followed, are to be ascribed.—My resolution thus taken, I lost no time in repairing to Commercy (38). His Lordship here ascribes his declaration chiefly to the bill of attainder, in consequence of his impeachment, which he just before (39) says had passed into an Act, during his short continuance on the banks of the Rhone [in Dauphiné]; but this is a slip of his pen, as appears by comparing dates. The message, he says, came to him in the beginning of July, and the act of his attainder did not pass 'till August; nor were the Articles of Impeachment sent up to the Lords till the 6th of that month (40). His Lordship no doubt here intends the vote for his impeachment in the House of Commons which passed in the beginning of June, and from the little or no opposition it met with, the act might well be thought unavoidable, and deemed to have passed in the resolutions of the several members, tho' not actually in the House.

[S] He took the Seals at Commercy. We have hinted already the pique that was taken by his Lordship in not being set at the head of his party in this new engagement; and it will be seen hereafter how it worked within his breast, and gave a bias to all his reasonings, while he continued thus engaged. He declares that the very first conversations he had with the Chevalier, answered in no degree his expectations, and that he began, even then, if not to repent, yet to be fully convinced, not only of his own rashness, but of that of his friends. 'He [the Chevalier] talked to me, says he, like a man who expected every moment to set out for England, or Scotland, but who did not very well know for which; and when he entered into the particulars of his affairs, I found that, concerning the former [England] he had nothing more circumstantial nor positive to go upon, than what I had already heard'—But, continues he afterwards: 'The Duke of Ormond had been for some time, I cannot say how long, engaged with the Chevalier. He had taken the direction of this whole affair, as far as it related to England, upon himself, and had received a commission for this purpose, which contained the most ample powers that could be given. After this one would be apt to imagine, that the principles on which the Pretender should proceed, and the Tories engage in this service, had been laid down; that a regular and certain method of correspondence had been established; that the necessary assistances had been specified, and that positive assurances had been given of them. Nothing less in a matter as serious as this, all was loose and abandoned to the disposition of fortune.—The Duke had asked a small body of regular forces, a sum of money, and a quantity of arms and ammunition. He had been told in answer by the court of France, that he must absolutely despair of any number of troops whatever; but he had been made in general to hope for some money, some arms, and some ammunition: a little sum had, I think, been advanced to him. In a case so plain as this, it is hard to conceive how any man could err. In such an uncertainty it was evident, that the Tories ought to have lain still, they might have helped the ferment against the government, but should have avoided with the utmost care the giving any alarm, or even suspicion of their true design, and have refused or not refused it, as the Chevalier was able or not able to provide the troops, the arms, the money, &c.—Instead of which those who were at the head of this undertaking, suffered the business to jog on merrily. They knew in general how little dependance was to be placed on foreign succour, but acted as if they had been sure of it.

(38) Letter to Sir W. Wyndham, p. 104 to 112.

(39) Ibid. p. 102, 103.

(40) Journals of the House of Commons.

which city he arrived in the latter end of the same month, in order to procure from that court the necessary succours for his new master's intended invasion of England. The vote for impeaching him of high-treason had passed in the House of Commons on the tenth of June preceding, and six articles [T] were sent up by them to the Lords on the sixth of August following: in consequence of which he stood attainted of high-treason, September 10th the same year (e). It is remarkable, that his new engagements had the same issue [U], as far as could be effected in the different circumstances of the two Courts, and that the

(e) Annals of King George I. under this year.

While the party were rendered sanguine by their passions, and made no doubt of subverting a government, they were angry with, both the one and the other, made as much bustle, and gave as great alarm, as would have been imprudent at the eve of a general insurrection. This appeared to me to be the state of things with respect to England, when I arrived at Commercy. The Scots, indeed, he observes, were zealous but wanted power, and with all their zeal, and all their valour, could bring no revolution about unless in concurrence with the English. And I thought, therefore; continues he, that the Pretender's friends in the North should be kept from rising, 'till those in the South had put themselves into a condition to act, and that in the mean while the utmost endeavours ought to be used with the King of France to prevail with him to espouse the cause; and that a plan of the design, with a more particular specification of the succours desired, as well as of the time when, and the place to which, they should be conveyed, ought to be writ for [to England], all which I was told by the Marshal of Berwick, who had the principal direction at that time of these affairs in France, and I dare say very truly, had been often asked but never sent. I looked on this enterprize to be of the nature of those which can hardly be undertaken more than once. I judged that the success of it would depend on timing, as near as possible, together, the insurrection of both parts of the island, and the succours from hence. The Pretender approved this opinion of mine; he instructed me accordingly.—Having thus got the direction, as he thought, to himself, he accepted the Seals, which he tells us, however, was much against his inclination, and not without making this condition, that he should be at liberty to quit a situation, which his honour, and many other considerations, made him think himself very unfit for, whenever the occasion upon which he engaged, was over one way or other (41).

(41) Letter to Sir W. Wyndham, p. 112 to 121.

[T] His impeachment consisted of six articles. They were brought into the House, and read by Mr Walpole August 4, 1715, and were in substance as follows: Art. 1. That whereas he had assured the ministers of the States-General, by order from her Majesty in 1711, that he would make no peace but in concert with them; yet he sent Mr Prior to France that same year, with proposals for a treaty of peace with that monarch, without the consent of the Allies. Art. 2. That he advised and promoted the making of a separate treaty, or convention, with France, which was signed in September. Art. 3. That he disclosed to Mr Mesnager, the French minister at London, this Convention, which was the preliminary instructions to her Majesty's Plenipotentiaries at Utrecht in October. Art. 4. That her Majesty's final instructions to her said Plenipotentiaries were disclosed by him to the Abbot Gualtier, an Emiffary of France. Art. 5. That he disclosed to the French the manner how Tournay in Flanders might be gained by them. Art. 6. That he advised and promoted the yielding up of Spain and the West Indies to the Duke of Anjou, then an enemy to her Majesty*. It must not be concealed, that Sir Joseph Jekyl, a gentleman of the most unbiassed integrity, and great knowledge in the Law, and a member of the Secret Committee, observed, that there was matter more than enough to prove the charge against Lord Bolingbroke, at the same time that he declared his opinion, that they had nothing sufficient to support the charge against the Earl of Oxford. His Lordship, 'tis true, though he allows that they could have hold on no man so much as on himself; the instructions, the orders, the memorials for the peace, having been drawn by him; and the correspondence relating to it, in France and every where else, carried on by him; in a word, his hand appeared to almost every paper which had been writ in the whole course of the negotiation. Yet, speaking of the attainder, which, in consequence of this impeachment, had passed against him, for crimes, as he observes, of the blackest dye; he takes notice, that, among other inducements to pass it, his having been engaged in the Pretender's interest was one. How well founded this article was, has already appeared; I was just as guilty, says he, of the rest †.

VOL. V. No. 298.

† Letter to Sir W. Wyndham, p. 103.

[U] This new engagement had the same issue with the former. His Lordship accounts for this in the following manner. That at his first arrival at Paris, he found a multitude of people at work, and every one doing what seemed good in his own eyes; no subordination, no order, no concert; which run to such a degree, that though he was assured this was always the case on these occasions, yet he could not believe it; that the Jacobites had wrought one another up to look upon the success of the present designs as infallible. Every meeting-house which the populace demolished, every little drunken riot which happened, served to confirm them in these sanguine expectations, and there was hardly one among them who would lose the air of contributing by his intrigues to the restoration, which he took it for granted, would be brought about without him in a very few weeks. Care and hope sat on every busy Irish face. Those who could write and read, had letters to shew; and those who had not arrived to this pitch of erudition, had their secrets to whisper. No sex was excluded from this ministry; Fanny Oglethorpe kept her corner in it, and Olive Trant* was, says he, the great wheel of our machine. The ridiculous correspondence was carried on with England by people of the like importance, and who were busy in sounding the alarm in the ears of an enemy, whom it was their interest to surprize. That by this means the government of England was put on it's guard, so that before he came to Paris, what was doing had been discovered. The little armament made at the Havre, which furnished the only means the Chevalier had for his transportation into Britain, and which had exhausted the treasury of St Germain's, and contained all the arms and ammunition that could be depended upon for the whole undertaking, though they were hardly sufficient to begin the work even in Scotland, was talked of publicly. So that a minister less alert, and less capable than the Earl of Stair, would have been at the bottom of the secret, for so it was called, when the particulars of messages received and sent, the names of the persons from whom they came, and to whom they were carried, were whispered about at tea-tables and in coffee-houses. In short, continues he, what by the indiscretion of people here, what by the rebound which came often back from London, what by the private interests, and ambitious views of persons in the French court, and what by other causes unnecessary now to be examined, the most private transactions came to light, and they who imagined that they trusted their heads to the keeping of one or two friends, were in reality at the mercy of numbers. Into such company was I fallen for my sins! That however he still went on steering in the wide ocean without a compass, when the Earl of Mar's memorial came to his hands by the Duke of Ormond. That by this memorial it was expressly declared, the English would not act without the succours already mentioned from France, and in concert with Scotland. He therefore grounded himself upon this memorial, and procured a French translation of as much of it as was proper to be shewn to the French court, to be laid before that King; from whom he obtained some succours; for instance, the very ship in which the Pretender was to transport himself, was fitted out by Depine d'Anicant at the King of France's expence. But the whole scheme became impracticable by two events, the death of Lewis XIV. and by the coming of the Duke of Ormond some time before to Paris. By the first our Secretary lost all his interest in the French court, and by the Duke of Ormond's carrying on the negotiations there by such tools as were unequal to the work, and becoming thereby the Regent's bubble. That notwithstanding he [Bolingbroke] dispatched several packets and messages for direct on's

* She had been preparing herself to turn Carmelite, when about the death of Queen Anne, she went into England from the Pretender. There she made an acquaintance with the Duke of Ormond. On her return to France, she brought a handsome English woman with her, whom she presented to the Duke of Orleans, and by that means made her court to him; and was afterwards married to the Duke of Bouillon's brother.

the year 1715 was scarcely expired, when the seals and papers of his new Secretary's office were demanded and given up [W], which was soon followed by an accusation branched directions to England, he received no clear answers. That in answer, for instance, to the memorial of Lord Mar, he had drawn up a paper at Chaville in concert with the Duke of Ormond, Marshal Berwick, and De Torcy, which was sent to England just before the death of the King of France, representing that France could not answer the demands of that memorial, and praying directions what to do; a reply to which came to him through the French Secretary of State, wherein they declared themselves unable to say any thing 'till they saw what turn affairs would take on the death of the King, which had reached their ears. That a message came from Scotland to press the Chevalier to order their rising, which otherwise would be too late. That upon this he dispatched a message to London to the Earl of Mar, to tell him, that he understood it to be his sense, as well as the sense of all their friends, that Scotland could do nothing effectually without the concurrence of England. That England would not stir without assistance from abroad, and that he might assure himself that no such assistance could be depended on; begging him to make the inference. The messenger, on his arrival at London, found the Earl of Mar was already set out to draw the Highlanders into arms †. Upon which he observes, that it was his opinion such measures would not be pursued by any reasonable man in the most common affairs of life. That after this, in concert with the Duke of Ormond, he dispatched Ezekiel Hamilton, who got all the papers by heart for fear of a miscarriage, to their friends in England, to inform them, that though the Chevalier was destitute of succour, and all reasonable hopes of it; yet he would land as they pleased, in England or Scotland at a moment's warning, and therefore they might rise immediately after they had sent dispatches to him. That Mr Hamilton returned very soon with an answer given by Lord Lansdowne, in the name of all the persons privy to the secret; that since affairs grew daily worse, and would not mend by delay, our friends in England had resolved to declare immediately, and that they would be ready to join the Chevalier on his landing; that his person would be as safe there as in Scotland, and that in every other respect it was better he should land in England; that they had used their utmost endeavours, and hoped the western counties were in a good posture to receive him, and that he should land as near as possible to Plymouth; that in pursuance to this the Duke of Ormond was sent thither, while the Chevalier waited at St Malo's for notice of his landing; persons were sent to the North, and others to London, to give notice that they were both on the way; and two proper persons dispatched before to the people of Devonshire and Somersetshire, who were concluded to be in arms, to apprize them of the signals which were to be made from the ships, that they might be ready to receive the Duke. He embarked, though he heard before of the seizure of several of their principal friends, and the dispersion of the rest, which was followed by an universal consternation, so that upon his arrival near Plymouth, finding nothing ready for him, he returned to Britany. The Duke made a second attempt but was put back by a storm. In these circumstances the Chevalier sent to have a vessel got ready for him at Dunkirk, in which he went to Scotland, leaving Bolingbroke all this while at Paris, to try if by any means some assistance might at least be procured; without which he observes, it was evident, even to those that flattered themselves the most, that the game was up. That upon the Duke of Ormond's first leaving Paris, in order to go upon the just mentioned expedition to England, Mrs Trant had sent for Bolingbroke to a little house in the Bois de Boulogne, where she lived with Madame de Chaulsery, an old superannuated waiting-woman known to the Duke of Orleans*, and acquainted him with the measures they had taken for the Duke of Ormond, who had never communicated this secret to Bolingbroke, tho' they lodged together in a house lent to this last by one of his friends. That however, finding these female ministers had been trusted, he tried to carry on the negotiations with the Duke of Orleans by the same tools, but perceiving them presently unequal to the work, he procured a message by means of the Duke of Berwick from Orleans not to engage with them, which afterwards this Duke confirmed in a conversation to himself. And yet the Duke of Ormond, upon his return from the coast informed him, that the keeping the negotiation a secret from him, was done at the express desire of the Regent. Our author ascribes this part of the Regent's conduct to a design he had of drawing him from the Pretender's service. In confirmation whereof he observes, that during this secret treaty, two persons of the first rank and greatest credit in that court ‡, when he made the most pressing instances to them in favour of the Chevalier, threw out in conversation to him, that he should attach himself to the Duke of Orleans, that in his circumstances he might want the Duke, and the Duke might have occasion for him. Something continues our author, was hinted of pensions and establishments, and of making my peace at home, 25,000 l. being offered by d'Effiat, I would not understand this language, because I would not break with the people who held it, and when they saw that I would not take the hints, they ceased to give them (42).

[W] The seals were taken from him ] We have an account of this whole proceeding painted by that inimitable pencil, which distinguishes all his political writings, and which strikes us with a fresh admiration every time we view them. As soon as the Chevalier had set sail from Dunkirk for Scotland, Bolingbroke assures his friend that he neglected no means, forgot no argument, which his understanding could suggest, in applying to the court of France. We have seen already what the Duke of Ormond rested upon (43) in this point, and I doubt very much, says he, whether Lord Mar, if he had been in my place, would have been able to employ more effectual measures than those I made use of. 'I may ' without any imputation of arrogance, compare myself on this occasion with his Lordship, since there ' was nothing in the management of this affair above ' my degree of capacity, nothing equal either in extent or difficulty to the business which he was a spectator of, and which I carried on, when we were Secretaries of State together under the late Queen.' He then enters into the detail of these services as follows. 'The King of France not able to furnish the Pretender with money himself, had writ, some time before his death, to his grandson, and had obtained a promise of 40000 Crowns from the King of Spain. A small part of this sum had been received by the Queen's Treasurer at St Germain's, and had been sent to Scotland, or employed to defray the expences which were daily making on the coast. I pressed the Spanish Ambassador at Paris, I solicited by Lawless and Alberoni at Madrid, and I found another more private and more promising way of applying to him (44). I took care to have a number of officers picked out of the Irish troops which serve in that country, their routs were given them, and I sent a ship to receive and transport them. The money came in so slowly, and in such trifling sums, that it turned to little account, and the officers were on their way when the Chevalier returned from Scotland. The reasons for which the King of Sweden in the summer preceding excused himself from transporting any troops to Scotland, being removed chiefly by the Elector of Hanover's having declared war against him, Bolingbroke took up this negotiation again. The Regent appeared to come into it, he spoke fair to the Baron de Spar, who pressed him on his side, and promised, besides the arrears of the subsidy due to the Swedes, an immediate advance of 50000 crowns for the enterprize on Britain. He kept the officer who was to be dispatched I know not how long boot-ed; sometimes on pretence that in the low state of his credit, he could not find bills of exchange for the sum, and sometimes on other pretences, and by these delays he evaded his promise. The French frankly declared they could give us no money, and that they would give us no troops; arms, ammunition, and connivance they made us hope for. The latter in some degree we might have had, perhaps, but to what purpose was connivance, when by a multitude of little tricks, they avoided furnishing the former, and when they knew we were utterly unable to furnish them ourselves? I had formed the design of engaging French privateers in the Pretender's service. They were to have carried whatever we should have had to send to any part of Britain † Marshal d' Huxelles, and the Marquis d'Effiat.

(42) Letter to Sir W. Wyndham, p. 123 to 190.

(43) In remark [U].

(44) Viz. by the Marquis of Monti.

† The message was communicated to Mr Lewis, Steward to the Earl of Oxford, whom his Lordship [Bolingbroke] calls a person of confidence, and that he undertook to send it after Lord Mar.

* She had been maid of honour to Madame, and had contracted a spirit of intrigue, which accompanied her in her retreat. Mrs Trant had been placed with her by the Regent.

branched into seven articles, wherein he was impeached of treachery, incapacity, and neglect [X]. Thus discarded abroad, he resolved to make his peace, if possible, at home

Britain in their first voyage, and after that to have cruised under his commission. I had actually agreed for some, and had it in my power to have made the same bargain with others. Sweden on one side, and Scotland on the other, could have afforded them retreats; and if the war had been kept up in any part of the mountains, I conceive the execution of this design would have been to the greatest advantage to the cause; it failed, because no other part went on. The Chevalier was not above six weeks in his Scotch expedition, and these were the things, says his Lordship, I endeavoured to bring to bear in his absence. I had no great opinion of my success before he went, but when he had made the last step which it was in his power to make, I resolved to suffer neither him nor the Scotch to be any longer bubbles of their own credulity, and of the scandalous artifice of this Court. In a conversation I had with Marshal D' Huxelles I took occasion to declare, that I would not be the instrument of amusing the Scotch, and that since I was able to do them no other service, I would at least inform them that they must flatter themselves no longer with hopes of succour from France. I added, that I would send them vessels, which with those already on the coast of Scotland, might serve to bring off the Pretender, the Earl of Mar, and as many others as possible. The Marshal approved my resolution, and advised me to execute it as the only thing which was left to do, and yet in this very point of time the promise of an order was obtained for delivering those stores of arms, and ammunition of the Chevalier's, which had been put into the French magazines, when Sir George Byng came to Havre. The project was to deliver them to Cajel Blanco a Spaniard, who had married a daughter of Lord Melfort (45), and that he should enter into a recognizance to carry them to Spain, and thence to the West-Indies, that he should appear to hire or buy a vessel prepared for the purpose by Bolingbroke; and that when he was at sea he should steer directly for Scotland. His Lordship concurred in this measure, and in a fortnight the ship was ready to sail, and no suspicion of her design transpired. However, being convinced of the inability of this step (46), he made no alteration in the dispatches which he prepared and sent to Scotland. In these he explained to the Pretender what might be hoped for in time, if he could maintain himself in the mountains without French succours, of which it was vain to expect the least part. He put the Chevalier and his council in a condition to judge what measures to take. But these dispatches never came to his hands: he was failed from Scotland just before the messenger arrived on that coast (47). He landed at Graveline about Feb. 22, and gave orders to stop all vessels bound on his account to Scotland, and I saw him, continues his Lordship, in the morning after his arrival at St Germain, and he received me with open arms. I had been as soon as I heard of his return, to acquaint the French court with it. When the Marshal D' Huxelles told me, that the Pretender ought to proceed to Bar with all possible diligence. This Bolingbroke concurred with as feasible, and better than to go immediately to Avignon, as was by some proposed. But the Chevalier was in no such haste; he had a mind to stay some time at St Germain, and in the neighbourhood of Paris, and to have a private meeting with the Regent. He sent our Secretary back to solicit this meeting, who wrote and spoke to Marshal D' Huxelles. He did his best to serve him in his own way. The Marshal answered him by word of mouth, and by letters, refusing him by both; and assuring him, that the Regent said the things which were asked were puerilities, and swore he would not see him. The Secretary, no ways displeas'd with his ill success, returned with this answer to his master, who acquiesced in the determination, and declared he would instantly set out for Lorraine. His trunks were packed, his chaise ordered to be at the door by five o'clock, and the Secretary sent to Paris at three, to acquaint D' Huxelles that he was gone. He asked me, says Bolingbroke, how soon I should be able to follow him, gave me commissions for some things which he desired I should bring after him; and, in a word, no Italian ever embraced the man he was going to stab with greater shew of affection and confidence. Instead of taking post for Lorraine, he went to the little house in the Bois de Boulogne, where his female ministers resided. There he continued for several days, saw the Spanish and Swedish ministers, and even the Duke of Orleans himself. On Thursday following the Duke of Ormond came to see the secretary, and having first prepared him for the surprize, put into my hands, says he, a note to himself, and a little scrip of paper directed to me, and drawn in the stile of a Justice of Peace's warrant. They were both in the Chevalier's hand-writing, and dated on the Tuesday, in order to make me believe they were writ on the road, and sent back to the Duke, who in the conversation dropped, with great dexterity, all the insinuations proper to confirm me in this opinion. I knew at this time his master was not gone. So that he gave me two very risible scenes, which are frequently to be met with, when some people meddle in business: I mean that of seeing a man labour with a great deal of awkward artifice to make a secret of nothing; and that of seeing yourself taken for a bubble, when you know as much of the matter as he who thinks he imposes on you. In one of these papers the Pretender declared he had no further occasion for the Secretary's service, and the other was an order to give up the papers in his office; all which he observes might have been contained in a letter-case of a moderate size. He gave the Duke the Seals, and some papers which he could readily come at, and sent the rest to the Chevalier. Several of whose letters, continues he, I took care to convey to him by a safe hand, since it would have been very improper the Duke should have seen them. It depended on me to have shewn his General what an opinion the Chevalier had of his capacity. I scorned the trick, and would not appear piqued, when I was far from being angry. As he gave up without scruple all the papers which remained in his hands, because he was determined never to make use of them: so he declares he took a sort of pride in never asking for those of his own, which were in the Pretender's hands; contenting himself with making the Duke understand, how little need there was to get rid of a man in this manner, who had made the bargain which he had done at his engagement, and with taking the first opportunity to declare, that he would never more have to do with the Pretender or his cause (48).

[X] Articles of impeachment.] These were, (1.) Lord Bolingbroke was never to be found by those who came to him about business; and if by chance or stratagem they got hold of him, he affected being in a hurry, and by putting them off 'till another time still avoided giving them any answer. (2.) The Earl of Mar by six different messengers, at different times, before [the * came from Dunkirk, of his being in want of arms and ammunition, and pray'd a speedy relief; and though the things demanded were in my Lord's power, there was not so much as one pound of powder in any of the ships, which by his Lordship's directions parted from France. (3.) The Pretender himself, after his arrival, sent General Hamilton to inform him, that his want of arms and ammunition was such, that he should be obliged to leave Scotland unless he received speedy relief. Yet Lord Bolingbroke amused Mr Hamilton twelve days together, and did not introduce him to any of the French ministers, though he was referred to them for a particular account of affairs, or so much as communiated his letters to the Queen, or any body else. Also, (4.) The Count de Castel Blanco had for several months at Havre a considerable quantity of arms and ammunition, and did daily ask for his Lordship's orders how to dispose of them, but never got any to the hour the * landed in France. (5.) The * friends at the French court had for some time past no very good opinion of his Lordship's integrity, and a very bad one of his discretion. (6.) For at a time when many merchants in France would have carried privately any quantity of arms and ammunition into Scotland, my Lord desired a publick order for the embarkation, which being a thing not to be granted, is said to have been done in order to urge a denial. (7.) The * wrote to his Lordship by every occasion after his arrival in Scotland, and though there were many opportunities of writing in return, yet from the time he landed there, to the day he left it, he ne-

(45) The Game, probably, who was Ambassador at the Court of Rome from King James II. after the Revolution in England. See the article of Robert Nelson.

(46) See the 4th article of the charge against our Secretary, in the next remark, and his first letter in answer to it, in Tindal's Continuation of Nelson.

(47) See the charge, art. 7th.

(48) Letter to Sir W. Wyndham, p. 197 to p. 219.

home [2]. He set himself immediately in earnest to this work, and in a short time, by that activity which was characteristic of his nature, and with which he constantly profecuted all

(49) Continuation of Rapin, Vol. XI. p. 290, & seqq.

ver received any letter from his Lordship. These being sent from London by the agents of the Pretender on the 16th of March, 1716, his Lordship wrote a defence of himself in April, which was answered by Mr James Murray, afterwards made Earl of Dunbar by the Pretender (49). His Lordship refers to this defence in his letter to Sir W. Wyndham, where he adds some other particulars. It was given out, that he had taken to his own use a very great sum of the Chevalier's money; when it was notorious that he had spent a great sum of his own in that service, and never would be obliged to him for a farthing, in which case, says he, I believe I was single. He also gave out, that whilst he was in Scotland he never once heard of his Secretary, though he addressed five expreffes to him during that expedition, which was over in six weeks. 'These lies, says Bolingbroke, (and many others of the same sort) founded on particular facts, were disproved by particular facts. The Queen's Secretary at St Germain's disproved the first, and the persons to whom the dispatches had been sent cleared up the last.' However, the Jacobites still affirming, that the indirect assistance which they desired might have been obtained, he confesses himself inexcusable if that fact be true. 'To prove it, says he, they appeal to the little Politicians at the Bois de Boulogne; I affirm on the contrary, that nothing could be obtained either to support the Scotch, or encourage the English. To prove the assertion, I appeal to the ministers with whom I negotiated, and to the Regent himself, who, whatever language he may hold in private to other people, dares not controvert with me the truth of what I advance. He excluded me formerly, that he might the more easily avoid doing any thing, and perhaps he has blamed me since, that he might excuse his doing nothing. All this may be true, and yet it will remain true, that he never could have been prevailed upon to act directly against his interest in the only point in view which he has, I mean the Crown of France, and against the unanimous voice of all his ministers. Suppose that in the time of the late Queen, when she had the peace in view, a party in France had implored her assistance, and applied to Margery Fielding, to Israel, to my Lady Oglethorpe, to Dr Battle, and Lieutenant-General Stuart, what success, do you imagine, such applications would have had? The Queen would have spoke them fair, she would speak otherwise to nobody: but do you imagine she would have made one step in their favour? Olive Trant, Magny, Mademoiselle Chauffery, a dirty Abbé Brigault, and Mr Dillon, are characters very apposite to these, and what I suppose to have passed in England, is not a whit more ridiculous than what passed here. I say nothing of the ships which the Jacobites pretend they sent into Scotland, three weeks or a month after the Pretender was returned, I believe they might have had my Lord Stair's connivance then as well as the Regent's. I say nothing of the order which they pretend to have obtained, and which I never saw, for the stores that were seized at Havre, to be delivered to Cassel Blanco. You cannot fail to observe, that this signal favour was never obtained by these people, 'till the Marshal d'Huxelles had owned to me, that nothing was to be expected from France, and that the only thing I could do was to bring the Pretender, &c. off.' He concludes this head with observing, that the people of consideration at the court of France, after what he had said at first in his own defence, beat down the clamour against him, and the court of St Germain's was so ashamed of it, that the Queen thought fit to purge herself of having had any share in encouraging the discourses which were held against him, or having been so much as let into the measure which preceded them (59). Upon the whole it is evident, that the same ambition of being at the head of the management, which prompted him to undermine the Earl of Oxford at the Court of Queen Anne, still pushed him to oppose the junto in that of the Pretender, and 'tis certain that the issue in both cases was the same. However, I cannot agree with those, who charge him with betraying the last master while he was engaged in his service. All the proofs offered in support of that imputation, derive their whole strength of probability to the part which his ambition carried him to take; and since all the steps may be fairly accounted for by that ambition which he indisputably assumed, surely it is doing an injury to his memory, to ascribe them to the most odious cause. But this will appear more groundless from the next remark.

(50) Letter to Sir W. Wyndham, p. 226 to 237.

[2] He made his peace at Rome.] It has been already observed, that, upon his arrival in France, he refused the first invitation to engage with the Pretender; that he applied to the Earl of Stair, and Mr Secretary Stanhope, in order to soften his prosecution, and to heal the breach at home; that, in accepting the Seals of the Secretary's office from the Pretender, he made it a condition to be at liberty to quit the post, if the intended invasion did not succeed; that event had now happened, in consequence whereof he was prevented from a voluntary resignation, by a timely discharge from the Secretary's office. This last proceeding furnished him with a new plea for entirely quitting the service, and resuming his first design, and that which he had always most at heart, for making his peace at home. The point was arduous in the highest degree; he knew it to be so, and therefore exerted the whole force of his political genius to compass it. 'I was discharged, says he, in the most provoking manner, and with all the most provoking circumstances; but though the provocation was great, yet I resolved to act without passion. I saw the advantage the Pretender and his Council, who disposed of things better for me than I could have done for myself, had given me: but I saw likewise, that I must improve this advantage, with the utmost caution; I had resolved, on his return from Scotland, to follow him, 'till his residence should be fixed somewhere; after which, having served the Tories in this, which I looked upon as their last struggle for power, and having continued to act in the Pretender's affairs 'till the end of the term for which I embarked with him, I should have esteemed myself to be at liberty, and should, in the civilest manner I was able, have taken my leave of him. Had we parted thus, I should have remained in a very strange situation during the rest of my life: but I had examined myself thoroughly, I was determined, I was prepared. On one side He would have thought, that He had a right, on any future occasion, to call me out of my retreat; the Tories would probably have thought the same thing; my resolution was taken to refuse them both, and I foresaw that both would condemn me. On the other side, the consideration of His having kept measures with me, joined to that of having once openly declared for Him, would have created a point of honour, by which I should have been tied down, not only from ever engaging against Him, but also from making my peace at home. The Chevalier cut this Gordian knot asunder at one blow; he broke the links of that chain, which former engagements had fastened on me, and gave me a right to esteem myself as free from all obligations of keeping measures with him, as I should have continued, if I had never engaged in his interest. I took, therefore, from that moment, the resolution of making my peace at home, and of employing all the unfortunate experience I had acquired abroad, to undeceive my friends, and to promote the union and the quiet of my country. The Earl of Stair had received a full power to treat with me, whilst I was engaged with the Pretender, as I have been since informed. He had done me the justice to believe me incapable to hearken, in such circumstances, to any proposals of that kind; and as much friendship as he had for me, as much as I had for him, we entertained not the least even indirect correspondence during that whole time. Soon afterwards, he employed a person * to communicate to me, the disposition of his Majesty to grant me my pardon, and his own desire to give me, on this occasion, all the proofs he could of his inclination in my favour. I embraced the offer as it became me to do, with all possible sense of the King's goodness, and of his Lordship's friendship. We met, we talked together, and he wrote to the Court on that subject †. The turn which the ministers gave to this matter was, to enter into a treaty to reverse my attainder, and to stipulate the conditions on which this act of Grace should be granted me. The notion of a treaty shocked me. I resolved never * Saladin of Geneva, then at Paris.

† This letter is subjoined to that of our author to Sir W. Wyndham.

all his designs, he procured, through the mediation of the Earl of Stair, then the British Ambassador at the French Court, a promise of pardon, upon certain conditions, from his Majesty King George I. who, on the second of July, 1716, created his father Baron of Battersea in the county of Surry, and Viscount St John (f). Such an extraordinary variety of distressful events had thrown him into a state of reflection, and this produced, by way of relief, a Consolatio Philosophica, which he wrote the same year, under the title of Reflections upon Exile [Z]. He had also this year wrote several letters in answer to the charge laid upon him by the Pretender and his adherents (g); and the following year he drew up a vindication of his whole conduct with respect to the Tories, in the form of a letter to Sir William Wyndham (b). He also took a more substantial method of supporting his spirits: His first lady being dead, he espoused about this time (i) a lady of great merit, who was niece to the famous Madam de Maintenon, and widow of the Marquis de Villette; with whom he had a very large fortune, which was, however, encumbered with a long and troublesome law-suit. In the company and conversation of this lady, he passed his time in France, sometimes in the country, and sometimes at the capital, 'till 1723; in which year, after the breaking up of the Parliament (k), his Majesty was pleased to grant him a full and free pardon. Upon the first notice of this favour, the expectation of which had been the governing principle of his political conduct for several years, he returned to his native country [AA]. And two years afterwards, having obtained an act of Parliament to restore him to his family inheritance *, and enabling him likewise to possess any purchase he should make of any other real or personal estates in the kingdom; he pitched upon a seat of Lord Tankerville's, at Dawley near Uxbridge in Middlesex, where he settled with his lady, and indulged the pleasure of gratifying the politeness of his taste, by improving it into a most elegant villa, finely picturesque of the present state of his fortune, and there amused himself with rural employments [BB]. Thus the tree was replanted, (f) Salmon's Chronological Historian, under the year 1716.

(g) They were printed at London in 1735, 8vo. together with answers to them by Mr James Murray, afterwards made Earl of Dunbar by the Pretender; but being then immediately suppressed, are reprinted in the Continuation of Rastou's History of England, Vol. XI. p. 244, & seqq. in note (1).

(b) Printed in 1753, 8vo.

(i) Memoirs of Lord Bolingbroke. In a letter to Dr Swift, in 1723, his Lordship takes notice, that he had been married many years to and from Dr Swift.

(k) Viz. May 26th, the day after the Parliament broke up. Continuation of Rapin, under that year.

* By his attainder he had lost, besides his honours, an estate of about 2500 l. a year. Memoirs of Lord Bolingbroke, &c.

to be restored, rather than go that way to work; and I opened myself, without any reserve, to Lord Stair. I told him, that I looked upon myself to be obliged, in honour and in conscience, to undeceive my friends in England, both as to the state of foreign affairs, as to the management of the Jacobite interest abroad, and as to the characters of persons; in every one of which points I knew them to be most grossly and most dangerously deluded: that the treatment I had received from the Pretender and his adherents, would justify me to the world in doing this: that if I remained in exile all my life, he might be assured, that I would never more have to do with the Jacobite cause; and that if I was restored, I would give it an effectual blow, in making that apology, which the Pretender has put me under a necessity of making: that in doing this, I flattered myself, that I should contribute something to the establishment of the King's government, and to the union of his subjects; but that this was all the merit which I could promise to have: that if the Court believed these professions to be sincere, a treaty with me was unnecessary for them; and that if they did not believe them so, a treaty with them was dangerous for me: that I was determined in this whole transaction, to make no one step which I would not own in the face of the world; that, in other circumstances, it might be sufficient to act honestly; but that, in a case as extraordinary as mine, it was necessary to act clearly, and to leave no room for the least doubtful construction †. The Earl of Stair, as well as Mr Craggs, who arrived soon after in France, came into my sense; I have reason to believe, that the King has approved it likewise upon their representations, since he has been pleased to give me the most gracious assurances of his favour. We see here what were his Lordship's engagements which procured this promise; and the rest of his letter to Sir W. Wyndham, in which the bigotry of the Pretender is so amply exposed, will abundantly satisfy any body, how well qualified he was to perform them.

† At the close of this relation, there is subjoined an original letter from the Earl of Stair to Mr Craggs, giving a full account of this transaction, which perfectly agrees with this of our author.

(51) Letter to Sir W. Wyndham, p. 243 to 252.

(52) See p. 270, 271. of this treatise.

[Z] Reflections upon Exile. These are printed at the end of his Letters on the Study and Use of History, but said to be written in 1716. In this piece he has drawn the picture of his own exile, which being represented as a violence, proceeding solely from the malice of his persecutors, to one who had, by serving his country with integrity and ability, deserved a much contrary fate, is, by this Philosopher's stone, converted not only into a tolerable, but what appears to be an honourable, station (52).

[AA] He returned to England It is observable, that Bishop Atterbury, who was banished at this very juncture, happening, on his being set ashore at Calais, to hear that Lord Bolingbroke was there, on his return to England, made this remark; Then I am ex- changed. There was undoubtedly appearance enough of such a thing from the circumstances. Bolingbroke's leave to return was granted, immediately after the act for banishing Atterbury had received the royal assent; and this leave was obtained at the pressing instance of Lord Harcourt, who had shewed great warmth in prosecuting the Bishop. We are told also, that Sir Robert Walpole, who was observed not to be particularly engaged against the latter, opposed the return of Bolingbroke very warmly, in a speech at the Council-Board, when the motion for it was made by Harcourt (53). Perhaps Mr Pope alludes to this exchange, in a letter to Dean Swift, where he writes thus: 'The Lord Bolingbroke is now returned, as I hope, to take me, with all his other hereditary rights. It is sure my ill fate, that all those whom I most loved, and with whom I most lived, must be banished. After both of you left England, my constant host was the Bishop of Rochester. Sure this is a nation, which is curiously afraid of being over-run with too much politeness; and we cannot regain one great genius, but at the expence of another (54)'

(53) Tindal's History of England, under this year.

(54) Letters to and from Dr Swift, the letter dated Jan. 12, 1723.

[BB] He purchased Dawley, and amused himself in rural employments. We have a sketch of his Lordship's way of life at this retreat, in a letter to Dr Swift by Mr Pope, who omits no opportunity of representing his Lordship in the most amiable colours. This letter is dated at Dawley June 8, 1728, and begins thus: 'I now hold the pen for my Lord Bolingbroke, who is reading your letter between two hay-cocks; but his attention is somewhat diverted, by casting his eyes on the clouds, not in admiration of what you say, but for fear of a shower. He is pleased with your placing him in the triumvirate between yourself and me; though he says, that he doubts he shall fare like Lepidus: while one of us runs away with all the power, like Augustus; and another with all the pleasure, like Anthony. It is upon a foresight of this, that he has fitted up his farm; and you will agree, that this scheme of retreat is not founded upon weak appearances. Upon his return from Bath, he finds all peccant humours are purged out of him; and his great temperance and economy are so signal, that the first is fit for my constitution, and the latter would enable you to lay up so much money, as to buy a bishoprick in England. As to the return of his health and vigour, were you here you might enquire of his haymakers: but as to his temperance I can answer, that for one whole day we have had nothing for dinner, but mutton broth, beans and bacon, and a barn-door fowl (55).—Now his Lordship is run after his cart, I have a moment left to myself to tell you, that I overheard him yesterday agree with a Painter, for 200 pounds, to paint his country hall with rakes, spades, prongs, &c. and other ornaments,

(55) Dr Swift frequently taxes him with luxurious living at this juncture. 'I never knew him live, says he, so expensively, as since his return from exile.' Idem, Letter 33, dated July 16, 1728.

replanted, took root, and flourished. But still it bore not the fruit that was most desired, and for want of which the owner looked upon it as little better than a barren trunk; he was, in effect, yet no more than a meer titular Lord, and still stood excluded from a seat in the House of Peers. Inflamed with this taint that yet remained in his blood, he entered again, in 1726, upon the publick stage; and disavowing all obligations to the Minister [CC], he embarked in the opposition; and taking that share in it for which he was best suited by his circumstances, he soon distinguished himself by a multitude of pieces, wrote during the short remainder of that reign, and likewise for several years under the present, with great freedom and boldness, against the measures that were then pursued (1). In the height of these political disputes, he found some spare hours for the meditations of Philosophy, and drew up several essays upon the subject of Metaphysics [DD]. Having carried on his part of the siege against the Minister, with inimitable spirit, for ten years; he laid

(1) Besides his papers in the Craftsman, he published several separate pamphlets, which were afterwards reprinted in the second edition of his Political Tracts, and the Collection of his Works.

‘naments, merely to countenance his calling this place ‘a Farm.’ So far Mr Pope; to which I will take leave to add, from ocular testimony, that it was painted accordingly; and, what still makes it more striking, the whole is executed in black crayons only: so that one cannot avoid calling to mind, on viewing it, the figures so often seen scratched with charcoal upon the kitchen-walls of farm-houses. And, to heighten the same taste, we read over the door, at the entrance into it, this motto: Satis beatus ruris honoribus. In the same humour, likewise, his Lordship writes to Dr Swift. ‘I am in my farm, and here I shoot strong and tenacious roots; I have caught hold of the earth, to use a Gardener’s phrase, and neither my enemies nor my friends will find it an easy matter to transplant me again (56).’

(56) Letter 28.

[CC] Disavowing all obligations to the minister. His Lordship’s petition was offered to the House April 20, 1725, by Lord Finch; and Mr Walpole, then Chancellor of the Exchequer, acquainted the House by his Majesty’s command, that the Petitioner had, seven years ago, made his humble application and submission to his Majesty, with assurances of duty, allegiance, and fidelity, which his Majesty so far accepted, as to give him encouragement to hope for some future marks of his Majesty’s grace and goodness; and that his Majesty is satisfied that the Petitioner’s behaviour has convinced his Majesty, that he is an object of his Majesty’s mercy; and he consents that this petition be presented to the House. After which the petition was read, setting forth, that the Petitioner had made his submission to, and given the strongest assurances of, his fidelity and zeal for his Majesty’s service, and the support of the present happy establishment, which his Majesty had been pleased to accept. Then the Commons were sent for to attend his Majesty in the House of Lords; and returning, Lord Finch moved, that a Bill might be prepared, agreeable to the Petitioner’s prayer, which was seconded by Mr Walpole, who, to what he had said before, added, that he was fully satisfied that the Petitioner had sufficiently atoned for his past offences, and therefore deserved the favour of that house, so far as to enable him to enjoy the family inheritance. In the debates, which were warm, Lord William Paulet moved for adding, a clause to disable the Petitioner to sit in either House of Parliament, or to enjoy any place of trust or profit under his Majesty; but this was rejected, being opposed by Mr Walpole. From this circumstance it was supposed, that he had settled that point with his Majesty. In 1731 it was said in the Craftsman, that the mercy of the late King was extended to him unask’d and unearn’d. In answer to this there came out some remarks, the author of which allowing the probability of the latter, maintained, that to say it was unask’d, was a downright falsehood. That the journals of the House of Commons shewed, he had made his humble application and submission, which his Majesty so far accepted, as to give him encouragement to hope for future marks of his Majesty’s favour (57). To this his Lordship made the following reply, ‘That it was unearned, the Remarker thinks probable, and in thinking so gives the lie to all his fellow-scriblers, who so often affirmed the contrary; that it was unask’d, he says, is downright falsehood, &c. In this, continues his Lordship, he exults; but here again the effrontery and falsehood which he charges on others, will recoil on himself. Who drew this ministerial message I know not, nor how far the style of it may be necessary, according to the forms usual on such occasions. But the Remarker might have known, if he had consulted even his pa-

(57) Remarks upon the Craftsman of May 31, 1731.

trons, that his Majesty’s mercy had been extended to this gentleman two years before the seven there mentioned; and that this mercy did not consist in encouragement to hope for some future mark of his Majesty’s favour and goodness, but in a gracious and absolute promise of his favour, in the full extent of which the circumstances of that gentleman required. ‘I may be the more bold in affirming this fact, because the noble Lord who delivered the message I quote, is still alive, as some other persons are, to whom his late Majesty was pleased to own, that this message had been delivered by his order, and to express his gracious intention conformably to it (58).’ In another place, after acknowledging with respect and humility, the late King’s mercy and goodness, he ascribes all the effects he had met with from it solely to the King, affirming at the same time, that he had reason, if ever man had reason, to disclaim all obligations to the minister, to whom, he says, it was owing, that he did not receive all the effects of royal mercy that were intended him. He does not expressly mention what his expectations were (59), but he has given sufficient intimations to that purpose in several places. Thus in his letter to Pope upon the subject of Philosophy he writes as follows. ‘In leading me to discourse, as you have done often; and in pressing me to write, as you do now, on certain subjects, you may propose to draw me back to those trains of thought which are above all others worthy to employ the human mind: and I thank you for it*. They have been often interrupted by the business and dissipations of the world, but they were never so, more grievously to me, nor less usefully to the publick, than since royal seduction prevailed on me to abandon the quiet and leisure of the retreat I had chosen abroad, and to neglect the example of Rutilius, for I might have imitated him in this at least, who fled further from his country, when he was invited home (60).’ In the same temper we shall see him presently (61) complaining, that he was disarmed, gagged, and bound. Who does not see that the principal injury, as he calls it, under which he loudly groans, was the continuance of his attainder by the Act of Parliament, which was never reversed by another act, so that he could never re-assume his seat in the House of Peers, and in consequence of that was utterly excluded from all place and power.

(58) A Final Answer to the Remarks on the Craftsman’s Vindications.

(59) Memoirs of his Life. p. 328.

* He makes the like compliment to M. de Pouilly, the letters to whom are upon the subjects of a Deity, and Natural Religion.

(60) Letter to Pope, printed together with that to Sir William Wyndham; and Reflections on the peculiar State of the Nation, &c. Lond. 1753, 8vo. p. 426.

(61) In remark [E E].

(62) Letter 48. which appears to be wrote in the spring of the year 1731.

(63) Letter 71. dated Septemb. 15, 1734.

(64) See note (60).

(65) Letter dated Nov. 17, 1734, from Swift to Pope.

[DD] His essay upon Metaphysics. These are frequently mentioned in the letters to and from Dr Swift, in one of which his Lordship expresses a fondness for them, as having there started a thought, which must, if it is pushed, as successfully as he thought it was, render all your metaphysical Theology both ridiculous and abominable (62). In another letter to Dr Swift he says, ‘I know how little regard you pay to writings of this kind; but I imagine, that if you can like any, it must be those that strip metaphysics of all their bombast, keep within the fight of every well constituted eye, and never bewilder themselves whilst they pretend to guide the reason of others. In the same letter he had said, he [Pope] talks very pompously of my metaphysics. ‘Tis true, I have writ six letters and a half to him on subjects of that kind; and I propose a letter and a half more, which would swell the work up to a considerable volume (63).’ Some of these he finished afterwards, and the first was published in 1753 (64). By the beginning of which we find, this was undertaken at the request of Pope, and Dean Swift speaking of it, says, he never knew his Lordship fail in any thing which he had the sole management of himself (65).

[E E] Disagreement

(m) His first letter to Lord Cornbury is dated from Chantillon in Touraine, Nov. 6, 1735.

laid down his pen, upon a disagreement with his principal coadjutors [EE]: and, in 1735, he retired to France (n), in a full resolution never more to engage in publick business (n) [FF]. He had now seen through the sixtieth year of his age, and had passed through

(n) He declared himself so resolved, in every one of his pieces wrote after this, that have been since published. State of Parties, p. 230.

[EE] Disagreement with his principal coadjutors. It has been observed, that in the prosecution of this controversy, our statesman found himself obliged from the beginning to recommend the Earl of Oxford's old scheme under the coalition of parties*: the Tories being at this time out of any condition to aim at places and power, except as auxiliaries. And it may be added, that he joined with a person who had shewn the same conduct with regard to Sir Robert Walpole (66), as he had done to the Earl of Oxford. However his Lordship was resolved to push it as far as possible, and when some suspicions began to arise in him of the fidelity of his new friends, Mr Pope says he gave him a hint of it in the first lines of his Essay on Man.

Awake, my St John, leave all meaner things
To low ambition, and the pride of kings (67).

But this had not the desired effect. In answer to that friend's suggestions he writes thus. 'The strange situation I am in, and the melancholy situation of publick affairs, take up much of my time, divide or even dissipate my thoughts; or, which is worse, drag the mind down by perpetual interruptions from a philosophical tone or temper to the drudgery of private and publick business. The last lies nearest my heart. And since I am once more engaged in the service of my country, disarm'd, gagg'd, and almost bound as I am, I will not abandon it as long as the integrity and perseverance of those who are under none of these disadvantages, and with whom I now cooperate, make it reasonable for me to act the same part' (68). Accordingly he read such lectures as still kept people together, and to his credit it cannot be denied as a political writer, that he managed the whole affair with the utmost dexterity, and very happily threw out a system of policy so curiously contrived, that a man might enter into and pursue the publick business of the nation: (if with any propriety a controversy carried on for the sake of power by a set of men in any place whatever may be so called) without deserting, in his own opinion at least, his private notions in government. But when he saw the threads which he had wove together begin actually to untwist, and was satisfied his few friends would shew their party-principles as soon as the line of opposition was cut, then he declared that no shadow of duty obliged him to go further. Plato, he observes, ceased to act for the commonwealth, when he ceased to persuade. And Solon laid down his arms before the publick magazine, when Pisistratus grew too strong to be opposed any longer with hopes of success (69). His Lordship followed these examples; but not without collecting his utmost force to give a parting-blow to the minister, which in reality, of all his masterly pieces, is generally esteemed the best (70). After this he retired to France, where, the following year, he wrote his opinion of these new friends, 'I expect little, says he, from the principal actors that tread the stage at present. They are divided not so much as it seemed, and as they would have it believed, about measures. The true division is about their different ends. Whilst the minister was not hard pushed, nor the prospect of succeeding to him near, they appeared to have but one end, the reformation of the government. The destruction of the minister was pursued only as a preliminary, but of essential and indisputable necessity to that end. But when his destruction seemed to approach, the object of his suecession interposed to the sight of many, and the reformation of the government was no longer their point of view. They divided the skin at least in their thoughts, before they had taken the beast. The common fear of hastening his downfall for others, made them all faint in the chase. It was this, and this alone, that has saved him, or has put off his evil day. Corruption so much, and so justly complained of, could not have done it alone (71). His Lordship at this time, not only fell out with Poulteney, [now Earl of Bath] for his selfish views, but with the Tories too, for abandoning the cause as desperate; averring, that the faint and unsteady exercise of parts on one side, was a crime but one degree inferior to the iniquitous misapplication of them on the other. A little after he gives us the particular incident whence this dissent took its birth. 'It is but a few years ago, says he, that not only the merchants, but the whole nation, took fire at the project of new excises. The project was opposed, not on mercantile considerations and interests alone, but on the true principles of liberty. In Parliament the opposition was strenuously enough supported for a time, but there was so little disposition to guide and improve the spirit, that the chief concern of those who took the lead, seemed applied to keep it down, and yet your Lordship remembers how high it continued against the projector, 'till it was calmed just before the elections of the present parliament, by the remarkable indolence and inactivity of the last session of the last (72). But though he had too much sense to be deceived, he had too high a spirit to despair. He only varied his direction, and sought in a new way what could not be reached by the old; and turning his eyes from the generation that was going off, to that which was coming on the stage, in the expectation of good from them he addresses himself to them as follows. 'Let me therefore conclude, by repeating, that division has caused all the mischief that we lament; that union can alone retrieve us; that a great advance towards this union was a coalition of parties, so happily begun, so successfully carried on, and of late so unaccountably neglected; to say no worse. But let me add, that this union can never be compleat, 'till it become an union of the head with the members, as well as of the members with one another; and that such an union can never be expected, 'till patriotism fills the Throne, and faction be banished from the administration (73). In the same spirit we find him a number of years afterwards, at the conclusion of the last shameful war, first representing the miserable state of the nation in 1749, and then taking courage from the prospect. 'Bad as our condition is, let us not despair. Not to despair of the commonwealth, whatever her condition be, is the principle of a true patriot; that is, of a faithful servant to his Prince and Country; to which purpose he enlarges upon the example of the Duke of Sully, as set forth in his Memoirs (74).

[FF] He retired to France. As this retreat was evidently the effect of disdain, vexation, and disappointment, Dean Swift, in the great simplicity of his heart, when the bruit of this motion reach'd his ears, having a thorough knowledge of his Lordship's high passions, and considering particularly, that his attainer (the tingling of which in his veins had once thrown him into the arms of the Pretender) still continued unremoved; concluded him certainly gone once more to that Prince, as was given out by his enemies. For this the Dean is reprehended by Mr Pope in very high terms; such indeed as, perhaps, shew more, than any other instance of it; the boundless veneration he had for his Lordship. 'You and Lord Bolingbroke, says he, are the only men to whom I write; you are the only men that can write; others are meer mortals. Whatever failings such men may have, a respect is due to them as luminaries, whose exaltation renders their motion a little irregular, or rather causes it to seem so to others. I am afraid to censure any thing I hear of Dean Swift, because I hear it only from mortals, dull and blind; and you should be cautious of censuring any action or motion of Lord Bolingbroke, because you hear it only from shallow, envious, and malicious reporters. What you write to me about him, I find, to my great scandal, repeated in one of yours to ———— Whatever you might hint to me, was this for the prophane? the thing, if true, should be conceal'd; but it is, I assure you, absolutely untrue in every circumstance. He has fixed in a very agreeable retirement near Fountainbleau, and makes it his whole business, vacare literis (75). The truth of this last assertion appears from the piece his Lordship wrote during this retirement; and my Lord himself expressly acknowledges, that Mr Pope had contributed very much to this resolution of retiring (76).

[GG] Letters

* Called then the Broad-Bottom scheme.

(66) 'Tis something remarkable, that the very day when Bolingbroke's petition was read to the House of Commons, Poulteney spoke abt the increase of the Civil List debt to 500000<sup>l</sup>, against Sir Rob. Walpole; and opposed the motion to make good the deficiencies. Tindal's History of England, for the year 1725.

(67) Letter to Swift, dated Decemb. 19, 1734.

(68) Letter to Pope, nbi supra, p. 439.

(69) Ibid. p. 440.

(70) This inimitable piece is intituled, A Dissertation on Parties, published in 1735, 8vo.

(71) First Letter to Lord Cornbury.

(72) Ibid.

(73) Of the Spirit of Patriotism, p. 25, 26, 27.

(74) Reflections on the State of the Nation, p. 363, & seqq.

(75) Letters to and from Dr Swift, No. 82. Aug. 17, 1736.

(76) Letter of Retirement and Study, at the end.

through as great a variety of scenes, both of pleasure and business, in active life, as any of his contemporaries. He had gone as far towards reinstating himself in the full possession of his former honours, as the meer dint of parts and application could go, and was at length experimentally convinced, that the decree was absolutely irreversible, and the door finally shut against him (o). If in the decline of his life he became less conspicuous, he became more amiable, and he was far from suffering the hours to slide away unusefully. He had not been long at his retreat near Fountainbleau, when he began a course of Letters on the Study and Use of History, for the use of a young nobleman of distinguished worth and capacity [GG]. In the mean time it was evident, that a person of so active an ambition as he was tempered with, must lie greatly open to ridicule, in assuming a resigned philosophical air of study and contemplation. He saw it, and to obviate the censure he addressed a letter to Lord Bathurst, upon the True Use of Retirement and Study [HH]; where we see he had no intention, by shifting the scene, to drop the opposition to the minister, but only to change a little the method of attack [II]. This he carried on in several

(s) Of the True Use of Retirement and Study, p. 206.

(77) He carries this method of reasoning into Philosophy after Mr Locke, and builds his metaphysical system upon the same foundation.

(78) Letter to Swift, dated Decemb. 10, 1725.

[GG] Letters concerning History.] The great use he makes of History in these letters is a signal instance of his having a true genius for politics. Those are meer pedants or scholars of a lower form, who endeavour to illustrate general maxims from historical facts, to which they cannot be said so properly to bring as to bend them. Our noble author takes quite another road, and extracts his maxims from history (77), chiefly from our own. In this he follows Machiavel, who did the same in the Roman History; but our author censures him for building general maxims often upon single facts. His Lordship here corrects Lord Clarendon for giving such a character of the first Duke of Buckingham, as is incompatible with his actions; and perhaps he may be found himself warping our history for his own convenience; less solicitous to represent past events truly, than under colour of relating them to point out the secret of some far more modern transactions. A reader therefore ought to take care not to be the dupe of such insinuations, he must keep his eyes open, and his attention awake, remembering always, that whether he adopts or differs from his notions, he is sure of being improved by the perusal. Without such an independent spirit nothing is more dangerous than books of this sort. There is no kind of servitude so despicable as the slavery of the understanding. The same caution is to be observed in reading his Lordship's little stories, visions, and allegories, where, without a due circumspection, you may miss his true meaning; and where you reach that, may not be always in possession of truth. In these letters he takes in ecclesiastical history. Upon which he ventures to give his opinion freely upon the subject of the divine original of the sacred books. Here he sinks among the rabble of authors, and abundantly justifies the truth of his friend Pope's remark made long before. 'Lord Bolingbroke, says that friend, is above trifling, when he writes of any thing in this world he is more than mortal. If ever he trifles, it must be when he turns divine (78.)'

[HH] Letters of the use of retirement and study.] See what he says in his defence to avoid the ridicule. To set about acquiring the habits of meditation and study, late in life, is like getting into a go-cart with a grey-beard, and learning to walk when we have lost the use of our legs. In general, the foundation of a happy old age must be laid in youth; and in particular, he who has not cultivated his reason young, will be utterly unable to improve it old. Manent ingenia senibus, modo permanceant studium & industria. Not only a love of study, and a desire of knowledge must have grown up with us, but such an industrious application likewise, as requires the whole vigour of the mind to be exerted in the pursuit of truth through long trains of ideas, and all those dark recesses, wherein man, not God, has hid it. This love, and this desire, I have felt all my life; and I am not quite a stranger to this industry and application. There has been something always ready to whisper in my ear; whilst I ran the course of pleasure and business. Solve senescentem mature sanus equum. But my genius, unlike the dæmon of Socrates, whispered so softly, that very often I heard him not in the hurry of those passions by which I was transported, some calmer hours there were, in them I hearkened to him: reflexion had often its turn; and the love of study, and the desire of knowledge, have never quite abandoned me. I am not therefore intirely unprepared for the life I will lead. And it is not without reason that I promise myself more satisfaction in the latter part of it, than I ever knew in the former (79).

[II] He changed the method of attack.] What was this new method we have from his own mouth. In answer to the objection, that such a renunciation of all publick business as he pretended to make, was inconsistent with his duty to his country, he writes thus to Lord Cornbury, 'No man has higher notions of this duty than I have. I think that not any age or circumstance can discharge us intirely from it; no, not my own. But as we are apt to take the impulse of our own passions for a call to the performance of this duty, so when these passions impel us no longer, the call that puts us upon action must be real and loud too. Add to this, that there are different methods proportioned to different circumstances and situations of performing the same duty. In the midst of retreat, I may contribute to defend and preserve the British constitution of government; and you, my Lord, may, depend upon me, that whenever I can I will. Should any one ask in this case, from whom I expect my reward? answer him by declaring, to whom I pay the service i. e. to the immortal God, whose will it is, not only that I should receive these blessings from my ancestors, but that I should deliver them to posterity. Deo immortalis, qui me non accipere modo hæc a majoribus voluit, sed etiam posteris prodere (80).' As this last passage is far from being the language of resignation, so the following, which was wrote afterwards, is still farther. 'I speak as if I could take my share in these glorious attempts, neither shall I recal my words. Strip of the rights of a British subject, of all except the meanest of them, that of inheriting; I remember that I am a Briton still; I apply to myself what I have read in Seneca. Officia si civis miserit, homines exerceat. Has a citizen lost his offices in the State, let him instruct his fellow-citizens. I have renounced the world, not in thow, but in reality, and more by my way of thinking than by my way of living, as retired as that may seem. But I have not renounced my country nor my friends; and by my friends I mean all those, and those alone, who are such to their country, by whatever name they may have been or may be still distinguished; and though in that number there should be men, of whose past ingratitude, injustice, or malice, I might complain on my own account with the greatest reason; these I will never renounce. In their prosperity they shall never hear of me. In their distress always. In that retreat wherein the remainder of my days shall be spent, I may be of some use to them, since even from thence I may advise, exhort, and warn them. Nec enim is solum Republicæ prodest, qui candidatus extrahit, & tuetur reos, & de pace belloque censet; sed qui juventutem exhortatur, qui in tanta bonorum præceptorum inopia virtute instruit animos, qui ad pecuniam luxuriamque cursu ruentes prensat ac retrahit, & si nihil aliud, certe moratur, in privato publicum negotium gerit.' For not only he is a useful member of the republick, who sets up and assists candidates for publick places, and defends the unjustly accused, and determines upon the important points of peace and war; but that man, also who in so great a scarcity of good teachers, exhorts and inspires youth with the principles of virtue, who seizes and pulls back such as are rushing into riches and luxury, and if he does no more, is sure to retard their courses; this man, I say, transects

(79) Letter of the Use of Retirement and Study, p. 205.

(80) Letter on Retirement, &c. p. 201.

several pieces, executed with a spirit no ways unequal to that of his former productions. Upon the death of his father in 1724 (p), he settled at Battersea, the ancient seat of the family, where he passed the remainder of his life in such a dignity, as was the natural result of the elevation of his genius, perfected by long experience, many disappointments, and much reflection [KK]; resolving, since he could not obtain his seat again in the House of Peers, never more to meddle in publick affairs. After the conclusion of the last inauspicious war in 1747, the measures taken in the administration seem not to be repugnant to his notions of political prudence for that juncture; and what these were is seen in part, in some reflections written by him in 1749, On the Present State of the Nation, principally with regard to her Taxes and Debts, and on the Causes and Consequences of them [LL]. This undertaking was left unfinished, nor did he survive it long. He had often wished to fetch his last breath at Battersea (q), a circumstance which happened to him on the 15th of November, 1751, on the verge of fourscore years of age. His corpse was interred with those of his ancestors, in that church [MM]. He survived all his brothers (r), so that the estate and honour descended to his nephew, the present Lord Viscount Bolingbroke (s) and St John, whom he constituted likewise his testamentary heir. And, as his lady died many years before him [NN], so the disputes in law about her fortune happening to be finally

(p) He died in April (that year, being 90 years old. Memoir of Bolingbroke,

(q) Idem, p. 346.

(r) They were only half-blood to his Lordship; whose father, after the decease of his first lady, married a French woman. Peerage of England, Vol. IV. edit. 1750.

(s) He was introduced into the House of Peers by this title. Feb. 12, 1754. Idem.

(8) Introduction to the Idea of a Patriot King; at the end.

the business of the publick in a private station (81). These instances shew, that his Lordship did not intend to retire as a hermit into a corner to form conclusions, de contemptu mundi & fuga seculi, upon the vanity of the world, and the wisdom of fleeing from all secular affairs, but like a miles emeritus, who from his experience and abilities was able and watchful to advise those who remained in the field of action, and not to engage himself again, except upon very extraordinary occasions, when the imminent danger of his country renewed it indispensable. Upon the whole, it is very evident, that philosophy was not his nature, but a derivative resort.

[KK] He passed the rest of his life with great dignity. This is described by a very able pen in the following words; having observed that his Lordship had studied the procedure and limits of the human understanding, as exactly as Swift had considered the singularities of the passions in different characters, the author proceeds thus, 'Lord Bolingbroke had early made himself master of books and men: but in his first career of life, being immersed at once in business and pleasure, he ran through a variety of scenes in a surprising and excentric manner. When his passions subsided by years and disappointments, when he improved his rational faculties by more grave studies and reflection, he shone out in his retirement with a lustre peculiar to himself, though not seen by vulgar eyes. The gay Statesman was changed into a Philosopher, equal to any of the sages of antiquity. The wisdom of Socrates, the dignity and ease of Pliny, and the wit of Horace, appeared in all his writings and conversation. The same author speaking of the English language, gives him the first place in the triumvirate to whom we owe that elegance and propriety unknown to our forefathers (82).'

He likewise observes, that the letters from Lord Bolingbroke, which are inserted in the seventh volume of Swift's works, are written with an elegance and politeness that distinguishes them from the rest; 'We see, says he, they were not intended for the press, but how valuable are the most careless strokes of such a pen (83).'

This value is finely painted by Lord Bolingbroke himself in one of these letters, which, as it begins with some kind of censure upon those of Pliny, so it is no wonder that Lord Orrery passed it over in silence, or rather studiously omitted so fair an occasion of mentioning it. Pliny, says Bolingbroke, writ his letters for the publick, so did Seneca, and Balsac, Voiture, and others. Tully did not; and therefore these give us more pleasure than any that have come down to us from antiquity. When we read them, we pry into a secret which was intended to be kept from us. That is a pleasure. We see Cato and Brutus, and Pompey, and others, such as they really were, and not such as the gaping multitude of their own age took them to be; or as Historians and Poets have represented them to us. 'I remember to have seen a procession at Aix la Chapelle, wherein an image of Charlemagne is carried on the shoulders of a man, who is hid by the long robe of the imperial saint. Follow him into the vestry, you see the bearer slip from under the robe, and the gigantic figure dwindles into an image of the ordinary size, and is set by among other lumber (84).'

[LL] Reflections on the Present State of the Nation, &c.] In a letter so early as 1730. he writes thus to Dr

Swift. 'I have sometimes thought, that if preachers, hangmen, and moral writers, keep vice at a stand, or so much as retard the progress of it, they do as much as human nature admits. A real reformation is not to be brought about by ordinary means; it requires those extraordinary means which become punishments as well as lessons. National corruption must be purged by national calamities (85).'

In 1738, upon the eve of the war with Spain, he repeats the same remark; 'It seems to me, that to redeem or save a nation under such circumstances [as beforementioned] from perdition, nothing less is necessary than some great, some extraordinary, conjuncture of ill fortune, or of good, which may purge, yet so as by fire. Distress from abroad, bankruptcy at home, and other circumstances of like nature and tendency, may beget universal confusion. Out of confusion order may arise: but then, adds he, it may be the order of a wicked tyranny instead of the order of a just monarchy. We may be faved by very different means; but this way of salvation will not be opened to us without the concurrence and influence of a patriot King (86).'

This last he ventured to publish in 1749*, when there was so near an approach of this which he calls the most uncommon of all phenomena in the physical or moral world, that he durst openly in print animate his pupil to exert all his talents to wrest the power of the government out of hands, that he declares had employed it weakly and wickedly, ever since it was thrown into them by a silly bargain made in one reign, and a corrupt bargain made in another (87). In the same year, 1749, he began this treatise upon the State of the Nation, &c. (88).

[MM] Interred in that church.] Where there is a marble monument erected to his memory, with the following inscription:

Here lies
Henry St John;
In the reign of Queen Anne
Secretary of War, Secretary of State,
And Viscount Bolingbroke.
In the days of King George I.
And King George II.
Something more and better.
His attachment to Queen Anne
Exposed him to a long and severe persecution.
He bore it with firmness of mind.
The enemy of no national party,
The friend of no faction.
Distinguished under the cloud of a proscription,
Which had not been entirely taken off †,
By zeal to maintain the liberty
And to restore the ancient prosperity
Of Great Britain.

[NN] His second lady died several years before him.] His Lordship speaks of this lady frequently in his letters to Dr Swift, in which we see she had very ill health after his return to England; and by the following passage, in a letter wrote in 1731, 'tis probable she did not long survive it. 'I leave Pope, says he,

(85) Letter 46, in Letters to and from Dr Swift.

(86) Idea of a Patriot King, &c. p. 72; 73.

* See an account of that publication in Mr Pope's article.

(87) Spirit of Patriotism, p. 44.

(88) See the N. B. at the end of it. In it he urges the lessening of the national debt, as absolutely necessary to save the nation from ruin.

(82) Lord Orrery's Letters concerning Dean Swift's Lett. ix.

(83) The number and horrid bits the writers of these letters, as forming a group of such pieces, as have not appeared since the Augustan age, and fit Lord Bolingbroke at their head.

(84) Letters to and from Swift, Letter 45. dat. d April 14, 1730.

† He was restored in blood May 28, 1723, but never to his seat in the House of Peers.

finally determined about the time of his decease, by that lucky event the nephew reaped the whole benefit of his uncle's kindness immediately *. His Lordship left the care and advantage of his manuscripts to Mr Mallet (t), who published three tracts in one volume, 8vo. in 1753, and four volumes more the following year; in which the trustee, it seems, consulted his own profit more than his noble benefactor's fame, as appears from a presentment of the Grand Jury of Westminster, made on the 16th of October the same year, 1754, of these Posthumous Works in four volumes, 'as tending, in the general scope of several pieces therein contained, as well as many particular expressions which had been laid before them, to the subversion of religion, government, and morality, and being 'against his Majesty's peace (u)' Indeed it is almost needless to tell the world now, that, in respect to his religion, he was undoubtedly what is sometimes understood by the denomination of a Theist [OO]. But however this part of his conduct may be censured, yet with all his passions, and with all his faults, he will, perhaps, as the writer of his life observes, be acknowledged by posterity in general, as I think he is by the majority of the present age, to have been in many respects one of the most extraordinary persons who adorned it. In his exterior, he was wonderfully agreeable. He had a dignity mixed with sweetness in his looks, and a manner that would have captivated the heart, if his person had been ever so indifferent. He was remarkable for his vivacity, and had a prodigious memory. He was a statesman, an orator, a leader of a party; was brought into business early, pursued it through the most vigorous part of his life; enjoyed the smiles, endured the frowns, of fortune, and was besides a man of learning, reflection, and wit. With all these qualities, and I think his enemies will allow that he had them all, he could scarce write any thing that did not deserve to be read and to be studied. When this is said, we must confine ourselves to the subjects to which these characters belong; for he sometimes, as we see, made excursions into others, of which he neither was nor could be expected to be a perfect master, and upon them he wrote like other men. In reality, there is not much danger of being misled by him in these matters; the same wisdom that directs us not to take our politics from Priests, exclaims against receiving our religion from a Politician; it is in that character that he excels. We generally, and indeed justly, prefer such writers as have an opportunity of being practically as well as speculatively acquainted with the subjects on which they write. Demosthenes and Cicero were Statesmen as well as Orators. Cæsar was conspicuous for his learning, as well as his abilities, in the camp and in the cabinet: his Commentaries are a proof of it, and the critic spoke truly who said, that he wrote with the same spirit with which he fought. Machiavel was alike versed in business and in books; and that is the true reason, why his merit is confessed even by those who abhor his maxims. In our own country, the writings of Sir Walter Raleigh, and the Noble Historian, are justly esteemed at a higher rate, than those of men who had not the like opportunities of penetrating to the very bottom of the springs and causes of those transactions which they undertook to examine, and to criticize as well as to record. From the very same motives, the works of this ingenious writer have merited, and in all probability will continue to merit, attention and applause. He lived to see the opening of that glorious prospect which he speaks of, at the winding up of his Idea of a Patriot King, in these rapturous terms: 'Those who live to see such happy days, and to act in so glorious

' a scene,

* Monthly Magazine. Mr Voltaire observes, that she had little fortune besides expectation. Hist. of Lewis XIV.

(t) A Scotch gentleman, and a poet; author of the Memoirs of Chancellor Bacon, and other things.

(u) Magazines for that month and year.

(89) Letter 46, dated Jan. 30, 1730-31. See also Letter 45 and 40. by the last of which it appears, that he had attended her to Aix la Chapelle in 1729.

(90) Voltaire assures us, that she had an uncommon understanding. Hist. of Lewis XIV. And her aunt, Madam de Maintenon, says, she was the most sensible person among her female relations. Maintenon's Letters. Lond. 1758, 8vo.

' he, to speak for himself, but I must tell you, how much my wife is obliged to you; she says, she would have strength enough to nurse you, if you was here, and yet, God knows, she is extremely weak. The slow fever works and mines the constitution; we keep it off sometimes, but still it returns, and makes new breaches, before nature can repair the old ones. I am not ashamed to say to you, that I admire her more every hour of my life. Death is not to her the king of terrors; she beholds him without the least. When she suffers much, she wishes for him as a deliverer from pain. When life is tolerable she looks on him with dislike, because he is to separate her from those friends to whom she is more attached than to life itself (89). Her remains were interred in the same vault with those of his Lordship, and her epitaph is inscribed upon the same monument, which is also adorned with both their busts. She was particularly distinguished by an amiable dignity and grace in her behaviour (90).

[OO] He was a Theist.] By this character we understand not a determined Deist, or absolute disbeliever of Revealed Religion, nor even so much as a sceptical Doubter, but one, whose state of mind comes nearest to that of the ancient academy, especially in respect to the immortality of the Soul; which they held to be probable indeed, but so faintly probable, that any little disorder, nay even a cloudy day, would often make them doubt of it. Such a low degree of belief could never become a firm principle of action. That this was his Lordship's character, and his way of thinking in regard to Revelation, may, without injuring his memory, be inferred, as from others, so particularly from that remarkable passage in one of his letters to Dean Swift, wherein he has in a manner translated Tully's famous Euphronema concerning the immortality of the Soul, Quod si in hac erro. &c. (91) and adopts it for his own. 'Whilst my mind, says he, daily grows more independent of the world, and feels less need of leaning on external objects, the ideas of friendship return oftner; they busy, they warm me more. Is it that we grow more tender, as the moment of our great separation approaches? Or is it that they who are to live together in another state (for, vera amicitia non nisi inter bonos) begin to feel more strongly that divine sympathy, which is to be the great band of their future society. There is no one thought which fooths my mind like this. I encourage my imagination to pursue it, and am heartily afflicted, when another faculty of the intellect comes on me boisterously, and wakes me from so pleasing a dream; if it be a dream (92). The same turn of mind too is discoverable in his writings, as we see in those of Cicero. Like that Orator and Philosopher, he delighted to the last in regarding distant prospects, and shut out the idea of dissolution, by contemplating the effects of his political doctrines, in ages beyond his own. In the same way Epicurus comforted himself under a fit of the stone. What his Lordship's thoughts were; with regard to the Christian Revelation in particular, is no where, perhaps, seen in a better light, than in his fifth letter on the study of History. The true state of the Theist's mind, at least, is there precisely and favourably represented, as entertaining a candid, but not implicit doubt; willing to be informed, but curious to examine.

(91) In his tract De Amicitia, Of Friendship.

(92) Letter 43, dated Nov. 19, 1729, in Letters to and from Dr Swift.

‘ a scene, will, perhaps, call to mind, with some tenderness of sentiment, when he is no more, a man who contributed his mite to carry on so good a work, and who desired life for nothing so much, as to see a King of Great Britain the most popular man in his country, and a Patriot King at the head of an united people (w).’ What he meant, perhaps, as a compliment, is become a kind of prophecy, fulfilled in the amplest manner. It may serve as a monumental inscription. If it had been more extended, it would have been a sort of funeral oration of himself upon himself. It seems he delighted to the last in regarding distant prospects, and shut out the idea of dissolution, by contemplating the effects of his political doctrines in ages beyond his own. And it cannot be denied, that while either faction or freedom remains among us, his writings on that subject will have their merit and use. This they always had: but my meaning is, that they will have it now in an advanced and extraordinary degree; Death, in removing him out of the reach of envy, and the rage of jealousy, has extended the utility, and fixed the immortality, of his writings. Their reputation will now rest upon their own merit, without suffering any diminution from the failings of their author: failings he had, and who has them not? Were the ministers he opposed without failings? But these did not infect his writings. Those were products of his cooler hours, and shew us the noble efforts of a great genius, when conducted and supported by experience. They open to us all the secret springs and hidden mechanism, not of our constitution, for that is nobly plain and gracefully simple, but of the executive powers, and the administration of government; how these may be disordered, spoiled, and broken; how they may be discerned from the motions of the MACHINE; and how these errors may be repaired or prevented. While he lived, his testimony was ever impeached, by a suggestion that his aim was to have the direction of the PENDULUM: That can be said no more. All his skill, all his acuteness, all his sagacity, are now useless to the ARTIST: but we are consoled for this, by the consideration, that they may be so much the more useful to us and our country. Such is the elogium given of him by the writer of the Memoirs of his Life (x); who having cast them into the form of Letters to a Young Gentleman, closes the whole in the following words: ‘ My pen has been employed in shewing you this is no panegyric, but a just tribute to merit; and the rest of the world will gradually learn this from the writings themselves, which will be now read with less prejudice and more respect. His writings are the MONUMENTS which he consecrated to posterity; and, though he is now no more, THESE will last FOR EVER (y).’ His Lordship was esteemed, almost to a degree of adoration, by the first poet of our age, who has blazoned his character in the brightest colours that wit could invent or fondness bestow [PP]. The reader will find a list of his writings in remark [22].

(w) Letters on the Spirit of Patriotism, on the Idea of a Patriot King, and on the State of Parties. Lond. 1749, 8vo. concerning which see Mr Pope's article.

(x) In p. 25, 330, 317, 337, 342, 343, 344.

(y) Id. p. 345.

[PP] Mr Pope has drawn his character to great advantage.] That excellent bard, in his Essay on Man, has immortaliz'd both his own fame, and that of his noble friend, by whose persuasion and assistance this incomparable didactic poem was begun and executed.

Come on, my friend, my genius come along,
Oh, master of the Poet and the song!
And while the Muse now stoops, or now ascends,
To man's low passions, and their glorious ends,
Teach me, like thee, in various nature wise,
To fall with dignity, with temper rise.
Form'd by thy converse happily to steer,
From gay to grave, from lively to severe;
Correct with spirit, elegant with ease,
Intent to reason, or polite to please.
Oh! while along the stream of time, thy name,
Expanded flies, and gathers all it's fame;
Say, shall my little bark attend the sail,
Pursue the triumph, and partake the gale.
When statesmen, heroes, kings, in dust repose,
Whose sons will blush their fathers were thy foes,
Shall this thy verse to future age pretend,
Thou wer't my guide, Philosopher, and friend.
That urg'd by thee, I turn'd the tuneful art,
From sound to things, from fancy to the heart.
For wit's false mirror hold up nature's light,
Shew erring Man whatever is, is right.
That reason, passions, answer one great aim;
That true self-love and social are the same.
That virtue only makes our bliss below;
And all our knowledge is ourselves to know.

[22] A List of his Works] Mr Mallet, to whom he left the care of his papers, published a collection of his Works in 1754, in five volumes, 4to. the contents of which are as follow. Vol. I. A Letter to Sir W. Wyndham; Reflections upon Exile; The Occasional Paper, No. 1, 2, 3; The First Visions of Camillick; An Answer to the London Journal of December 21, 1728. This Journal was supposed to be wrote by Bishop Hoadley. An Answer to the Defence of the Enquiry into the Reasons of the Conduct of Great Britain; Remarks upon the History of England; A Final Answer to the Remarks on the Craftsman's Vindication, &c. Vol. II. A Dissertation on Parties; Letters on the Study and Use of History; A Plan for writing a General History of Europe; On Retirement and Study. Vol. III. Letters on the Spirit of Patriotism, and the Idea of a Patriot King; State of Parties in the Accession of King George I; Some Reflections on the Present State of the Nation, principally with regard to her Taxes and Debts; and on the Causes and Consequences of them. N.B This was written in 1749, and left unfinished. The Substance of some Letters written originally in French about 1720, to M. de Pontilly (93); Letter occasioned by one of Archbishop Tillotson's Sermons; Letters or Essays addressed to Alexander Pope, Esq; on Religion and Philosophy; first and part of the second. Vol. IV. The remainder of the second, and two more of the like Essays. Vol. V. Fragments or minutes of the like Essays. N.B. It was principally these Essays, addressed to Mr Pope, that occasioned the presentment by the Grand-Jury of Westminster, mentioned above, and several animadversions were made upon them, particularly by the present Dean of Bristol, besides others. There was published in A Collection of Political Tracts, the second edition of which came out in 1748, 8vo. some other pieces, not inserted in this edition of his Lordship's Works, the titles of which are: On Luxury; Remarks on a pamphlet intituled, Observations on the Conduct of Great-Britain; Of Good and Bad Ministers; Of the Policy of the Athenians; On the Power of the Prince, and the Freedom of the People; The Case of Dunkirk considered.

(93) These letters are written upon the proof of the being of a God, and Natural Religion.

SANCROFT [WILLIAM], Archbishop of Canterbury in the last century, a pious and exemplary Prelate, was born at Fréſingfield in Suffolk, January 30, 1616 (a). He had his education in the grammar-school of St Edmondsbury (b); and, while a youth, was obſerved to be addicted to a great ſenſe of piety and goodneſs, and outſtript the care and inſtructions of his maſters, by the remarkable progreſs he daily made in learning and religion (c). When arrived to the 18th year of his age, he was ſent to Emmanuel-college in Cambridge, and matriculated in the univerſity July 3, 1634 (d). He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts in the year 1637; that of Maſter in 1641; and in 1642 was admitted Fellow of his college (e). His accompliſhments in all human literature became ſurprizing; for he was not only maſter of the whole circle of the Sciences [A], but alſo an excellent Critic, and perfectly well verſed in Poetry and Hiſtory: all which knowledge was free from vanity and oſtentation: a qualification ſeldom found among the learned (f)! In 1648, he took the degree of Bachelor in Divinity (g). It is ſuppoſed that he never took the Covenant, and yet continued unmoleſted in his Fellowſhip till the Engagement was preſſed upon him in 1649; and then he reſuſing to take it, was ejeſted from his Fellowſhip. Upon that he went and travelled beyond-ſea, where he proſecuted however his ſtudies [B] with indefatigable diligence, and became intimately acquainted with the moſt conſiderable of the Engliſh loyalſt exiles (b). About the Reſtoration of King Charles II. he returned to England [C]. May 8, 1660, he was choſen one of the Univerſity-Preachers (i). Soon after, Dr John Coſin, who had known him abroad, being promoted to the Biſhopric of Durham, took him for one of his Chaplains: and collated him to the Rectory of Houghton in the Spring, and to the ninth Prebend in the cathedral church of Durham, which he was inſtalled into March 11, 1661 (k). In 1661, he aſſiſted in reviewing the Liturgy, particularly in rectifying the Kalendar and Rubrick (l). By virtue of his Maſteſty's commendatory letters to the univerſity of Cambridge, dated March 15, 1661-2, he was created Doctor in Divinity (m). The 14th of Auguſt following, he was elected Maſter of Emmanuel-college; which he governed with great prudence, and the moſt obliging deportment towards every one of its members (n). In the beginning of the year 1663-4, he was promoted to the Deanery of York [D]. He held it but a few months, in which time he expended, in building and other charges, two hundred pounds more than he received: and brought the accounts of that church in excellent order (o). But, upon the death of Dr John Barwick in 1664, he was removed, in his room, to the Deanery of St Paul's [E]. Soon after which he reſigned his rectory of Houghton (p), and the maſterſhip of Emmanuel-college (q). At his coming to St Paul's, he ſet himſelf with unwearied diligence to repair that cathedral [F], 'till the dreadful Fire in 1666 employed his thoughts on the more noble undertaking of rebuilding it: towards which he gave 1400 pounds, beſides what he procured by his intereſt and affiduous ſolicitations and endeavours [G]. He alſo rebuilt the Deanery, and improv'd the revenues belonging thereto (r) [H]. On the 7th of October, 1668, he was admitted Archdeacon of Canterbury

(k) Continuation, as above; and Dr Willis's Survey of the Cathedrals, &c. Vol. I. p. 271.

(l) Biſhop Kenner's Register, &c. p. 574, 633.

(m) Id. p. 647.

(n) Remarks on his Life, &c. as above, p. xx.

(o) Le Neve's Lives, &c. p. 199.

(p) See Walkcr, as above.

(q) See Le Neve's Faſti, &c. p. 438.

(r) Walker, as above.

ON

[A] For he was not only maſter of the whole circle of the Sciences, &c.] The Author of the Remarks of his Life and Converſation (1) informs us, That 'within a very little while after his being at the Univerſity, he became maſter of the whole circle of human Literature: which upon all occaſions in public as well as in private, ſhewed itſelf very remarkably. In this he had a peculiar talent, being an admirable critic in all the ancient and Clafic knowledge, both among the Greeks and Romans. He had thoroughly digeſted all their learning in Poetry and Hiſtory, and this without the leaſt affectation of Vanity, or oſtentation of learning. He attained to that perfection in it, that as it was his diverſion, ſo he made it an advancement to his other ſtudies. He made it ſubſervient to the carrying on his unwearied labours in Theology. In this he ſpent the greateſt part of his time, and cultivated the ſoyl, in which it was planted, to ſo great a height, that it became exceeding fruitful.'

[B] Where he proſecuted however his ſtudies.] And 'he was courted and beloved by every one, for the ſingular Modeſty and Affability of his mind and temper, and for his great attainments in all manner of knowledge, that could render him not only an honour to his country and profeſſion, but highly acceptable to all learned and ingenious perſons (2).'

[C] About the Reſtoration of K Charles II. he returned to England.] The Author juſt now mention'd, (3) ſays, that 'ſome time before the Reſtauration, he returned to his native ſoyl, and lived in that privacy and retirement, which was ſo ſuitable to his temper, 'till the place of his Education in the Univerſity became the ſcene of his government.' — But Mr Le Neve (4) acquaints us, from a MS. of the late learned Mr Henry Wharton, 'that in the beginning of the year 1660, Mr Sancroft was at Rome, when K.

Charles the Second returned into England'

[D] In the beginning of the year 1663-4, he was promoted to the Deanery of York.] He was nominated to that Deanery January 3, elected the 23d of that month, and inſtall'd by proxy Febr. 26. following. This Dignity he held but ten months. (5)

[E] But, upon the death of Dr John Barwick, he was remov'd in his room to the Deanery of St Paul's.] He was nominated to it in Oſober, elected November 11, accepted the election Decemb 1. was inſtituted to the Prebend of Oxgate Decemb 2. elected Reſidentiary Decemb. 9. and inſtalled Dean the next day. (6)

[F] At his coming to St Paul's, he ſet himſelf with unwearied diligence to repair that cathedral.] It had greatly ſuffered from the frenetic zeal of thoſe brutiſh Reformers, in the laſt century, who overturn'd all decency and order, during the heat of the civil war: The body of it being turn'd into a horſe guard, ſaw-pits digged in other parts of it, &c. (7) It was neceſſary ſo charitable a perſon ſhould be fix'd in that poſt, in order to contrive ways for the repairing of her breaches, and the decays ſhe then lay under. In order to which, he huſbanded her revenues with a moſt frugal, and yet decent oeconomy.

[G] Beſides what he procured by his intereſt and affiduous ſolicitations.] We are aſſured, that it was he who obtained, by his unwearied induſtry and ſolicitation, the Act which laid a duty upon Coals for the rebuilding of St Paul's. (8)

[H] And improv'd the revenues belonging thereto.] He improv'd alſo ſome of the Livings that were in his gift as Dean of St Paul's: particularly the Vicarage of Sandon in Hertfordſhire; which he augmented with a fee-farm rent of 8 l. a year, iſſuing out of the church of Liehfield; and a rent-charge of 20 l. a year, out of the parſonage and tithes of Sandon. (9)

[I] King

(a) Life, prefixed to his Letters to Mr North.

(b) Somner's Antiquities of Canterbury, with Battley's Additions. Lond. 1703, fol. part 2. p. 160.

(c) Continuation of Supplement to Collier's Dictionary.

(d) Lives of the Proteſtant Biſhops, &c. by J. Le Neve, Vol. I. Part. i. p. 197.

(e) From the Univerſity Registers, and College-books.

(f) Some Remarks of Archbiſhop Sancroft's Life and Converſation, prefixed to his Sermons, edit. 1703, 8vo. p. 12, &c.

(g) From the Univerſity-Registers.

(h) Walker's Attempt towards recovering the Numbers and Sufferings of the Clergy, edit. Lond. 1714, fol. Part 2. p. 144.

(i) From the Univerſity registers.

(1) P. xii, xiii.

(2) Ibid. p. xviii.

(3) P. xix.

(4) Ubi ſupra, p. 198.

(5) Le Neve, ubi ſupra.

(6) Idem. and Newcourt's Repertorium, Vol. I. p. 53, 192.

(7) See Dugdale's Hiſt. of St Paul's, and Stow's Survey of London, with Strype's Additions, Vol. I. b. 3. p. 152.

(8) Le Neve's Lives, &c. as above, p. 220.

(9) Sir Henry Chauncey's Antiquities of Hertfordſhire, p. 83.

on the King's presentation; which dignity he resigned in 1670 (s). He was also Prolocutor of the lower House of Convocation: And in that station he was, when K. Charles II. advanced him to the Archiepiscopal See of Canterbury, [I] unexpectedly, and without the least inclination of his own. He behaved with singular prudence and integrity in the difficult and critical times that ensued. And it was reckoned very happy for the Church of England, that in the furious attacks, made upon her, in the latter years of K. Charles, and the whole reign of K. James II, she had so steady a pilot at the helm. His large revenues he did not profusely waste in luxury and extravagance, but decently bestowed them in hospitality and charity: and also disposed of his preferments with great discretion (t) [K]. On the 23d of August 1678, he published good Directions, concerning letters Testimonial to Candidates for holy orders (u). He attended K. Charles II. when he was upon his death-bed, and made a very weighty exhortation to him; in which he used a good degree of freedom, which he said was necessary, since his Majesty was going to be judged by one who was no respecter of persons (w). In 1686, he was named the first in K. James the Second's commission for Ecclesiastical Affairs: but he refused to act in it (x) [L]. About that time, he suspended Tho. Wood Bishop of Lichfield and Coventry, for residing out of, and neglecting, his diocese (y). As one of the Governors of the Charter-house, he refused to admit pensioner into that hospital one Andrew Popham, a Papist, who came with a nomination from the Court (z). In June 1688, he joined with six of his brethren the Bishops [M], in a petition to K. James II. wherein they set forth their reasons, why they could not cause his Declaration for Liberty of Conscience to be read in Churches (a). For this petition, which the Court called a libel, they were committed to the Tower, and being tried for a misdemeanor, the 29th of June, were acquitted, to the great joy of the Nation (b). This year the Archbishop projected a Comprehension with the Dissenting Protestants, of which some account is given below [N]. On the 3d of October, accompanied with eight of his brethren the

(s) Wood Ath. Vol. II. col. 1176.

(z) N. Salmon's Lives of the English Bishops, Lond. 1731. 8vo. p. 105.

(a) That petition is in Complete Hist. Vol. III. p. 511. The petition, and Declaration for Liberty of Conscience, are also in the Bishops Tryal.

(b) See their Tryal, printed in 1689, fol. and inserted afterwards in the State-Tryals.

[I] K. Charles II. advanced him to the Archiepiscopal See of Canterbury.] He was consecrated in Westminster-abbey, Janu. 27. 1677-8. (10) We are told, that he was recommended by James Duke of York, or promoted by his endeavours. (11) But N. Salmon says, (12) there seems little probability in that piece of secret history.

[K] And also disposed of his preferments with great discretion.] He was, faith the author of some Remarks of his life, (13) 'generally known to be a hearty and faithful friend to all that had any merit to expect his favour, or desire it. He carefully sought out such persons for the service of the church, in those Preferments that fell within his gift, as were of approved abilities, of great learning, and of exemplary lives and conversations. He had a heart enlarged to the greatest Hospitality that could be, and his Charity was diffusive to all manner of objects relating thereunto. He was a constant friend to Learning, to Religion, and to our established Church, and designed to wear away the remains of his life, his estate, and his interest, for the encouragement and preservation of them.' ——— Bishop Burnet, on the contrary, who always gives an odious character of those Divines which had not the same notions as himself; says, (14) that the reason of Dr Sancroft's promotion, was, because he was one 'whom the Court could trust.' And he proceeds to give this unfriendly description of him. 'He was a man of solemn deportment, had a fullen gravity in his looks, and was considerably learned. He had put on a monastick strictness, and lived abstracted from company. These things, together with his living unmarried, and his being fixed in the old maxims of high loyalty, and a superstitious valuing of little things, made the Court conclude, that he was a man, who might be entirely gained to serve all their ends; or, at least, that he would be an unactive speculative man, and give them little opposition in any thing that they might attempt, (15) when they had more promising opportunities. He was a dry, cold man, reserved and peevish; so that none loved him, and few esteemed him: Yet the high-church-party were well pleased with his promotion.' ——— Had he not been afterwards a Nonjuror, he would have met with better quarter from our historical Prelate.

[L] But he refused to act in it.] Bishop Burnet blames him even for his behaviour in that affair. 'Sancroft, says he, lay silent at Lambeth. He seemed zealous against Popery in private discourse. But he was of such a timorous temper, and so set on the enriching his nephew, that he shewed no fort of courage. He would not go to this court, when it was first opened, and declare against it, and give his reasons why he could not sit and act in it, judging it to be against law: But he contented himself with his not going to it (16).'

[M] In June 1688, he joined with six of his brethren the Bishops, &c.] They were, William Lloyd bishop of St Asaph, Francis Turner bishop of Ely, John Lake bishop of Chichester, Thomas Ken bishop of Bath and Wells, Thomas White bishop of Peterborough, and Sir Jonathan Trelawny bishop of Bristol.— Bishop Burnet cannot help applauding our Prelate's conduct in this instance. (17) 'The Archbishop of Canterbury, Sancroft, resolved upon this occasion to act suitably to his post and character. He wrote round his province, and desired that such of the Bishops as were able would come up, and consult together in a matter of this great concern: And he asked the opinion of those whom their age and infirmities disabled from taking the journey. He found, that eighteen of the Bishops, and the main body of the Clergy concurred in the resolution against reading the declaration. So he, with six of the Bishops that came up to London, resolved in a petition to the King, to lay before him the reasons that determined them not to obey the order of Council that had been sent them. ——— The Archbishop was then in an ill state of health. So he sent over the six bishops with the petition to the King, signed by himself and the rest.'

[N] This year the Archbishop projected a Comprehension with the Dissenting Protestants.] The best account of this design is given by the late Bishop Wake, in one of his speeches at the Tryal of Dr Sacheverell. (18) 'The person, faith he, who first concerted this design was the late most Reverend Dr Sancroft then Archbishop of Canterbury. The time, was towards the end of that unhappy reign of King James the Second. Then, when we were in the height of our labours, defending the Church of England against the assaults of Popery, and thought of nothing else; that wise Prelate foreseeing some such Revolution as soon after was happily brought about, began to consider, how utterly unprepared they had been at the Restoration of K. Charles II, to settle many things to the advantage of the Church, and what a happy opportunity had been lost for want of such a previous care, as he was therefore desirous should be now taken, for the better, and more perfect establishment of it. It was visible to all the Nation, that the more moderate Dissenters were generally so well satisfied with that stand which our Divines had made against Popery, and the many unanswerable Treatises they had published in confutation of it, as to express

(16) Burnet, Vol. II. p. 371.

(17) In the same volume, p. 459.

(18) March 17, 1710, at the opening of the second article of the impeachment against Dr Sacheverell.

(g) Le Neve's Fasti, p. 13.

(r) Some Remarks of his life, &c. p. 219, &c. and Antiquities of Canterbury, as above, p. 25.

(s) See the Complete History of England, Vol. III. edit. 1719, fol. p. 359.

(w) Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, edit. 1753, 8vo. Vol. II. p. 281.

(x) See Complete History, as above, Vol. III. p. 452, 455.

(10) Le Neve's Fasti, p. 9.

(11) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721. Vol. II. col. 1164.

(12) Lives of the English Bishops, &c. Lond. 1731, 8vo. p. 62.

(13) As above, p. 216.

(14) History of his own Time, edit. 1753, 8vo. Vol. I. p. 553, 554.

(15) See the article TENNISON [TENNISON] promoted for the same reason.

Bishops, he waited upon the King, who had desired the Assistance of their counsels; and delivered to him very serious and important advice: Among the rest, to annul the Ecclesiastical Commission, to desist from the exercise of a Dispensing Power, to supersede all further prosecution of Quo Warranto's, and to call a free and regular Parliament (c). A few days after, though very earnestly pressed by his Majesty, he refused to sign a Declaration of Abhorrence of the Prince of Orange's invasion (d). The 11th of December, on K. James's withdrawing himself, he sign'd, and concurr'd with the Lords spiritual and temporal, assembled at Guild-hall, in a Declaration to the Prince of Orange, for a free Parliament, security of our Laws, Liberties, and Properties, and of the Church of England in particular, with a due Liberty to Protestant Dissenters (e). But when that Prince came to St James's, the Archbishop neither came to wait on him, though he had once agreed to it, nor did he send any message, importing that the state of affairs was changed, and that he had thereupon changed his mind. He absented himself likewise from the Convention (f) [O]. After King William and Queen Mary were settled on the throne; he, and seven of his suffragans, refused to own the established government, from a conscientious regard to the allegiance they had sworn to K. James (g). Refusing likewise to take the oaths, appointed by an Act of Parliament made April 24, 1689, he and they were, by virtue of that Act, suspended August the first, and deprived the first of February following (h). The Archbishop continued to live at Lambeth till August 1, 1690, when he dismissed most of his servants [P], and broke off the publick hospitality. After the nomination of his successor, he received an order from Queen Mary, May 20, 1691, to leave Lambeth-house within ten days; but resolving not to stir till ejected by Law, he was cited to appear before the Barons of the Exchequer, upon the first day of Trinity-Term, viz. June 12, 1691, to answer a writ of intrusion. He appeared by his attorney several times, but avoiding to put in any plea, judgment passed, upon refusal to join issue, June the 23d. The same evening he took boat at Lambeth-bridge, and went to a private house in the Temple (i), from whence he retired, August 5, to Fresingfield, his native place (k); where he spent the remainder of his days in a cheerful and peaceable retirement [Q]. On the 25th or 26th of August, 1693, being seized with an inter-

(c) Complete Hist. as above, Vol. III. p. 520. He joined in another petition for a free Parliament, Nov. 17. Ibid. p. 529.

(d) Ibid. p. 526, &c.

(e) Ibid. p. 533. Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, Vol. II. p. 542.

(f) Burnet, Vol. II. p. 549, 560. and his Vindication, or Reflections upon a pamphlet, &c. Lond. 1696, 8vo. p. 96.

(g) Complete Hist. Vol. III. p. 552.

(h) Le Neve's Lives, &c. p. 212.

(i) The Palfgrave-head near Temple-bar, says Wood, Ath. Vol. II. col. 872.

(k) Le Neve, p. 213, 214.

(19) See above the article PATRICK [S1-MON.]

(20) Dated July 16, 1688. See Calamy's Abridgment of R. Baxter's Life, Vol. I. p. 385.

(21) Hist. of his own Time, Vol. II. p. 560. See also his Vindication, &c. p. 96, &c.

' an unusual readines' to come in to us. And it was ' therefore thought worth the while, when they were
' deliberating about those other matters, to consider
' at the same time what might be done to gain them
' without doing any prejudice to ourselves. The ' scheme was laid out, and the several parts of it were ' committed, not only with the approbation, but by
' the direction of that great Prelate, to such of our
' Divines as were thought the most proper to be entrusted ' with it. His Grace took one part to himself; Another ' was committed to — Dr S. Patrick.
' (19) The reviewing of the daily Service of our Liturgy,
' and the Communion book, was refer'd to a select ' number of excellent persons, two of which were —
' Dr J. Sharp, afterwards Archbishop of York; and Dr J.
' Moore, Bishop of Ely. — The design was, in short,
' this; To improve, ' and if possible, to enforce our ' Discipline; to review, and enlarge our Liturgy; by ' correcting of some things; by adding of others; and,
' if it should be thought adviseable by authority,
' when this matter should come to be legally considered,
' first in Convocation, then in Parliament; by leaving
' some few Ceremonies, confess'd to be indifferent in ' their natures, as indifferent in their usage, so as ' not to be necessarily observ'd by those who made a
' scruple of them; 'till they should be able to overcome
' either their weaknesses, or prejudices, and be willing ' to comply with them.' — Archbishop Sancroft expressed
' also his generous Tenderness towards the conscientious ' Dissenters, upon another occasion. And that was in a ' Letter to his Clergy, (20) wherein he exhorts them, ' To ' have a very tender regard to our Brethren the ' Protestant Dissenters; when occasion offer'd, to visit ' them at their houses, and to receive them kindly at ' their own. — In the last place, warmly and most
' affectionately to exhort them to join with us in daily
' fervent prayer to the God of Peace for a universal ' blessed Union of all Reformed Churches, both at ' home and abroad, against our common Enemies.' —
' [O] He absented himself likewise from the Convention
' For this cautious behaviour he is severely abused
' by Bishop Burnet; (21) who calls him, ' a poor
' spirited and fearful man; that acted a very mean
' part in all this great transaction.' — ' He resolved
' (says he) neither to act for, nor against the King's ' interest; which, considering his high post, was thought
' very unbecoming. For if he thought, as by his ' behaviour afterwards it seems he did, that the Nation
' was running into treason, rebellion, and

' perjury, it was a strange thing to see one, who was ' at the head of the Church, sit silent all the while ' that this was in debate; and not once so much as ' declare his opinion, by speaking, voting, or protesting,
' not to mention the other Ecclesiastical methods
' that certainly became his character.' — But he ' thought it best and most prudent, quietly to wait for
' so critical an event as a Revolution; and not to engage
' too deep in it, considering his great age.

[P] When he dismissed most of his servants.] One Sunday evening, he thus accosted both his Chaplains
(who were the Reverend Mr Henry Wharton, and Mr Needham) 'Sirs; you have hitherto served me to my ' very great satisfaction; but, I think, the time is ' now come in which we must part.' Upon being asked, why he was pleased to express himself in this manner? his Grace replied; 'Why, there is another
' come into my place; and it will now be dangerous
' to continue with me any longer.' Upon which both the Chaplains agreed to tender him their services afresh, in regard to their personal obligations, though they had happened to differ from him with respect to the publick: Whereupon, with an air of satisfaction, he made them this quick and short return: 'Say you
' so? Then go on in the name of God.' And they did so; continuing to officiate as his Chaplains, after his retirement from Lambeth, 'till near the time of his removal into Suffolk. (22)

[Q] Where he spent the remainder of his days in a cheerful and peaceable retirement.] 'He suffered his ' remove from his possessions and preferments, with ' greater Satisfaction and Cheerfulness than any man ' could take them. It was a smart answer that he ' gave to a person, speaking to him, concerning the ' Revolution, and what were like to be the Effects of
' it; Well! (saith he smiling) I can live upon Fifty ' pounds a year, meaning his paternal inheritance; and
' thereby intimating how little the loss of all the rest
' would affect him, and what an inconsiderable
' inducement the highest Station of the Church was to ' mislead him, and to pervert his Conscience. He ' had no Pride, Ambition, Covetousness, or Luxury
' to maintain, and consequently was secure against all ' assaults, that could come from those quarters. When ' a man hath once brought himself to that pass, that ' he cannot live under So much by the year; when' ever such a posture of affairs happens, that he cannot
' honestly keep his integrity and his incomes too,
' he is in great danger of turning to the left hand, of
' distrusting Providence, and starving his Conscience
' for

(22) Dr N. Marshall's Defence of our Constitution, &c. Lond. 1717, 8vo. p. 163.

mitting fever; after thirteen weeks illness, he dyed November 24th following [R]. The 27th of the same month, he was buried, between eight and nine at night, very privately (as he himself had ordered) in Frefingfield church-yard, on the south side, as near the wall as they could lay him: a place of his own chusing, sixteen years before, when, upon his being nominated to the see of Canterbury, he went and paid a visit to his relations in Suffolk (I). Soon after a Tomb was erected over his grave, with a modest Inscription composed by himself [S]. An account of his Benefactions [T], and of the few things he published [U], are given below in the notes. As for his Character, let it be learned from

(I) A Letter out of Suffolk to a Friend in London, Giving some Account of the last Sickness and Death of Dr: William Sancroft, late Lord Archbishop of Canterbury. Lond. 1694, 4to. and Some Remarks of his Life, &c. as above, p. 32, &c.

(23) Letter out of Suff Ik, &c. as ab ve, p. 21. See also p. 29.

'for to keep warm his Back, and his Belly.' (23) — We are told, (24) that the place of his retirement, as well as of his nativity, 'was the ancient Estate and Residence of his ancestors for above 300 years: There he built a small Habitation, but large enough for his retinue and attendants, which were only two or three servants.'

[R] After thirteen weeks illness, he dyed November 24, following.] The author of the Letter above refer'd to, gives the following account of his last illness.

(24) P. 30.

(24) 'His disease was at first an intermitting Fever; but the Fits were so extream violent that he was very near dying in the second, (25) and lay speechless and bereaved of his senses for some hours; but by the help of the Cortex Peruvianus, [or Bark,] advised and directed by his Physician, a third fit was prevented: But however the stopping of the fits gave some respite, yet it was without any promising hopes; he had some lucid intervals, but recovered no strength; he lay under a general weakness and decay, and so continued wasting to the last period, 'till his spirits and vitals were exhausted, and his soul took wing from a dry and emaciated carcass. 'This distemper from the beginning to the end continued just thirteen weeks.'

(25) 'Tis said in Some Remarkables of his Life, &c. p. 32. that it was in the third fit.

[S] With a modest Inscription composed by himself.] It is in these words:

On the right side of the Tomb.

P. M. S.

Lector, Wilhelmi, nuper Archi-Præfalis:

Qui natus in Viciniâ,

Quod Morti cecidit, propter hunc mûrum jacet,

Atqui resurget. Tu interim

Semper paratus esto, nam quâ non putas

Venturus horâ Dominus est.

Obiit Nov. 24. An. { Nat. Dom. MDCXCIII.
Ætat. suæ LXXVII.

On the left side.

P. M. S.

William Sancroft born in this Parish, afterward by the Providence of God Arch-Bishop of Canterbury, at last deprived of all, which he could not keep with a good Conscience, return'd hither to end his life; and professeth here at the foot of his tomb, That as naked he came forth, so naked he must return; The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away (as the Lord pleases so come things to pass) Blessed be the Name of the Lord.

Over the head of his Effigies.

St Matth. 24. v. 27.

As the Lightning cometh out of the East, and shineth even unto the West, so shall also the coming of the Son of Man be. (26)

(26) Letter out of Suff. Ik, as above, p. 39.

[T] An account of his Benefactions.] 1. He augmented several small Livings. For instance, He settled an Estate in fee-farm rents, to the yearly value of 521 17s. 10 d. ½, on the Vicar of Frefingfield and his successors: charged nevertheless with the payment of 10 l. per ann. to the master of a School which he founded in the said parish; and of 6 l. per ann. to the Parish-Clerk. His Grace likewise purchased a close of an acre and a half, for an addition to the Vicar's glebe; and built a House for the Parish-Clerks. — He granted to the Curate of Maidstone in Kent, all the small Tithes of the boroughs and towns of Week and Stone within that parish, and one moiety of all the small

Tithes within the town of Maidstone. — He obtained an augmentation of 10 l. per ann. for the Vicarage of Lynstead; of 40 l. per ann. for the Vicarage of Doddington; and of 20 l. per ann. for the Vicarage of Eynesford. — He augmented the Vicarage of Poffling, from 30 l. to above 60 l. a year. — Having received a great fine, in 1685, for renewing the lease of the Rectories of Whalley, Blackbourne, and Rachdale in Lancashire, he gave it to purchase lands, and settle annual pensions, for the stipends of the Curates of the Chapels of ease there, before unprovided for. (27) — 2. His Benefactions to Emmanuel College. He gave to that college, the perpetual advowsons of Frefingfield, and Wetherfden, livings, in Suffolk. And settled also on it for ever, some Fee-farm rents in Suffolk, to the value of 23 l. a year, which he had purchased of the Crown. He gave likewise 600 l. towards building the Chapel there, waincotted it afterwards, and erected the rails and altar-piece at his own charge, which cost 400 l. Having put 1000 l. into the Exchequer, which was lost at the shutting of it up, and K. Charles II. having, by way of recompence; settled on him a perpetual annuity of 53 l. to be paid out of the Exchequer for ever; He convey'd that annuity to the Master and Fellows of Emmanuel College, to pay the salaries of the master and usher of a school to be founded at Harleston in Norfolk, whereof they were to be the visitors and patrons. Finally, he gave to that college his valuable Library; consisting of the best Books in every Science, particularly Philology, History, and Divinity; and all of the best editions; which he had been many years collecting, and at first designed for the Library at Lambeth: Referring only such as would make up a Gentleman's Library for his nephew. (28) 3. His other Benefactions. He expended 1000 l. in building the Deanery of St Paul's, when Dean: the rest of that expence was defray'd out of the money brought in by the Coal-act. He gave 1000 l. towards the building of Chelsea-college about the year 1680. He gave 67 l. to the Hospital of St Nicholas Harbledown near Canterbury, to pay certain Debts contracted by them. (29) The learned Dr W. Richardson says, (30) that he gave in his life-time, about eighteen thousand pounds in charitable uses.

(27) Bishop Keene's Case of Impropriations, &c. Lond. 1704. 8vo. p. 304—308.

(28) Le Neve's Lives, p. 219. Some Remarkables of his Life, p. 27, and N. Salmon, as above, p. 49.

(29) Le Neve's Lives, &c. as above, p. 219, 220.

Very unjust therefore is the Insinuation made by Bishop Burnet, (31) when speaking of our Prelate's successor, the excellent Archbishop Tillotson; viz. 'He [Archbishop Tillotson] dyed so poor, that if the King had not forgiven his first fruits, his debts could not have been all paid: So generous and charitable was he in a post, out of which Sancroft had raised a great estate, which he left to his family: But Tillotson was rich in good works.' — Whereas their cases were very different. Archbishop Tillotson was married, and had a family; enjoyed his Archbishoprick only three years and a few months; and upon the whole was no great Oeconomist. Archbishop Sancroft was born to an estate; lived and dyed a bachelor; and continued Archbishop above thirteen years. No wonder therefore that he should dye richer than Archbishop Tillotson, and yet be, as well as him, rich in good works.

(30) Continuat.] Commentar. Fr. Godwini de Præfultibus. Cantab. 1743. fol. p. 165.

(31) Hist. of his own Time, edit. 1753. 8vo. Vol. III. p. 187.

[U] And of the few things he published.] The first was, A Dialogue; composed jointly by himself, and Geo. Davenport, and another of his friends; (32) between a Preacher and a Thief condemned to the gallows. Wherein the Thief throws all the cause and blame of his wickedness upon the doctrine of absolute Reprobation. And, indeed, it is what the maintainers of that absurd doctrine, if they would speak out, must plead in their own defence; as a woman of the Independent persuasion once did to a person who was blaming her son's wicked conduct. 'It was, said she, God Almighty's fault; He should have made her son one of the Elect.' This first book of our Author's his Actions: for if we go for it to the Writers of opposite Parties, it will appear, in different hands, as different as possible. Such is the iniquity of our party-zealots, who sacrifice Truth to Prejudice, and infamous Distinctions! Even Bishop Burnet can say no harm of him, only that he was timorous and reserved. But the author of Some Remarkables of his Life (m), declares, that 'he had all the virtue and qualification, both of a great and of a good man; that he was a wise Prelate, a most learned Divine, an universal Scholar, a just Man, a faithful Friend, an excellent Counsellor, a kind and tender Master to his Servants, a great Benefactor to others, a thankful Beneficiary where he was obliged, himself a zealous asserter of his Religion, against Popery on the one side, and Fanaticism on the other, and (in short) all the single perfections that make many men eminent, were united in this Primate, and rendered him illustrious.' He certainly gave the strongest instance possible of Sincerity, in sacrificing the highest Dignities, and other the greatest Advantages, to what he thought Truth and Honesty [W].

(32) See Dr Birch's Life of Archbishop Tillotson, p. 160.

(#) As above, p. 29.

thor's is intitled, Fur Prædestinatus: sive Dialogismus inter quandam Ordinis Prædicantium Calvinistam & Furem ad laqueum damnatum habitus. In quo ad vitium representantur non tantum quomodo Calvinistarum Dogmata ex seipsis aniam præbent scelera & impietates quasvis patranda, sed insuper quomodo eadem maximè impediunt quo minus peccatur ad vitæ emendationem & resipiscentiam reduci possit. Lond. 1651. 12<sup>o</sup>. It seems to have alarm'd the admirers of rigid Predestination. For, we find this passage concerning it, even in a book of the learned Tho. Gataker, (33) — 'And another of less note in a late Satyrical Libel (for no other it is) intitled Fur prædestinatus, do therein both grossly abuse Calvin, and jeer the Presbyterian, or Genevian Discipline, as such that any debauched person by an Hypocritical disguise of contrition and dejection for his loose and lewd courses might easily both delude and elude.' 2. Our Author published three Sermons, viz. 'A Sermon preached in St Peter's Westminster, on the first Sunday in Advent, 1660, at the Consecration of the Right Reverend Fathers in God, John [Cofin] Lord Bishop of Durham, William [Lucy] Lord Bishop of St David's, Benjamin [Laney] Lord Bishop of Peterborough, Hugh [Lloyd] Lord Bishop of Landaff, Richard [Sterne] Lord Bishop of Carlisle, Brian [Walton] Lord Bishop of Chester, and John [Gauden] Lord Bishop of Exeter.' Lond. 1660. 4to. — 'Lex Ignea: or the School of Righteousness. A Sermon preach'd before the King, Octob. 10. 1666. at the solemn Fast appointed for the late Fire in London. Published by his Majesties special Command.' Lond. 1666. 4to. — 'A Sermon preach'd to the House of Peers, November 13th, 1678. being the Fast day appointed by the King to implore the Mercies of Almighty God in the protection of his Majesties sacred Person, and his Kingdoms.' Lond. 1678. 4to. Reprinted together in 1694, or 1703. 8vo. We are told, that all these Discourses were extorted from him, and made public by the Request and Authority of those before whom he preached, contrary to the (33) Vindication of the Annotations by him published upon Jer. x. 2. against William Lillie, and John Swan, &c. Lond. 1653. 4to. p. 17.

inclination of his mind, and singular modesty, which was indeed peculiar to him, having ever affected a great privacy in his thoughts and writings, being resolved never to appear in print, if he could with any decency avoid the Importunity or Commands of those who requested the publishing of them.' (34) — 3. He published in 1652. 12mo. 'Modera Politicks, taken from Machiavel, Borgia, and other modern Authors, 'by an Eye-witness.' 4. He published Bishop Andrews's Defence of the vulgar translation of the Bible, with a Preface of his own. 5. He drew up some Offices for January 30. and May 29. (35) 6. Nineteen familiar Letters of his, to Mr North, afterwards Sir Henry North, were published in 1757, 8vo. His Grace left behind him a vast multitude of Papers and Collections in MS; and therein more perhaps wrote with his own hand, than any man, either of this or the last age, ever did write. (36) Upon his decease they came into his nephew's hands; and after the nephew's death, they were sold for eighty guineas, (37) and purchased by the late Bishop Tanner, who gave them, with the rest of his Manuscripts, to the Bodleian Library.

(34) Some Remarkables of his Life, &c. prefixed to those Sermons, p. 8.

(35) Burnet's Hist. of his own Time, Vol. I. p. 257.

(36) Mr Wharton's Preface to Archbishop Laud's Hist. of his Troubles and Trial, p. penult.

(37) N. Salmon, as above, p. 49.

[W] To what he thought Truth and Honesty ] That he acted all along out of a truly honest principle, appears from the following relation. One of his former Chaplains, Mr Needham, visiting him in September 1693. a few weeks before his death, found him much weakened by sickness, and confined to his bed. He then gave Mr Needham his blessing very affectionately, and after some other talk, his Grace said thus to him: 'You and I have gone different ways in these late affairs; but I trust Heaven gates are wide enough to receive us both: What I have done, I have done in the integrity of my heart.' Upon Mr Needham's modest attempt to give an account of his own conduct, his Grace was pleased to reply; 'I always took you for an honest Man; what I said concerning myself was only to let you know, that what I have done, I have done in the integrity of my heart, indeed in the great Integrity of my heart.' (38) C

(38) Dr Marshall's Defence of our Constitution, &c. as above, p. 164.

SANDERSON [ROBERT], the learned Casuist, and Bishop of Lincoln, in the XVIIth century, was the second and youngest son of Robert Sanderfon [A], of Gilthwait-hall in the parish of Rotherham in Yorkshire, Esq; by Elizabeth, one of the daughters of Richard Carr of Buterthwaite-hall, in the parish of Ecclesfield in the same county, Gent. He was born at Rotherham September 19, 1587 [B], and educated in the Grammar-school there: at which time he was observed, to use an unwearied diligence in attaining learning; to have a seriousness beyond his years, and withal a more than common modesty; to be of so calm and obliging a behaviour, that he was entirely beloved by his master and school-fellows; and, even then, to dedicate himself and all his studies to piety and virtue (a). When he was arrived to the 13th year of his age, his father came up with him towards London, in order to place him a year, for his farther improvement, in one of the more noted schools of Eaton or Westminster, and then to remove him to Oxford. But an old acquaintance, whom he waited upon, having examined into the young man's parts and knowledge, advised the father to shorten his journey, and leave his son at Oxford. Accordingly

(a) The Life of Dr Sanderfon late Bishop of Lincoln, by Isaac Walton. Lond. 1678, 8vo. It is not pag'd. But that prefix'd to his Works is, and therefore the pages set down in this article, refer to this last.

[A] Was the second and youngest son of Robert Sanderfon. This Robert Sanderfon was descended from a numerous, ancient, and honorable family of his own name. And, jointly with Gilbert Earl of Shrewsbury, was Godfather to Gilbert Sheldon, afterwards Archbishop of Canterbury. (1)

(1) Walton, p. 21

[B] He was born at Rotherham Septemb. 19. 1587.] So Mr Walton testifies: But Dr Browne Willis says, (2) he was informed from Sheffield parish Register, that Bishop Sanderfon was baptized in that Church September 20. 1587; and, as his authority suggests, born there.

(2) Survey of the Cathedrals, &c. Vol. II. 4to. p. 70.

[C] To

Accordingly the father committed him to the care of the learned Dr Kilby [C], then Rector of Lincoln-college; by whom being admitted into that Society about the beginning of the year 1601 (b), he took the degree of Bachelor of Arts January 23, 1604 (c) [D]. On the third of May, 1606, he was chosen Fellow of that college (d); and took the degree of Master of Arts October 20, 1607 (e). He was elected Reader of Logick in his college November 7, 1608; which he performed so well, that he was elected again the year following; and became an eminent tutor (f). In 1611, he was ordained Deacon and Priest by Dr King, Bishop of London (g). In the years 1613, 1614, and 1616, he served the office of Sub-Rector of Lincoln-college. His abilities and behaviour were such in all those employments, that they procured him both love and respect from the whole Society; there being no exception against him, but that he was timorous and bashful: an imperfection, which he could never thoroughly conquer (h). In the year 1614, he stood candidate for the place of one of the Proctors of the university [E]; which, however, he missed. But having published his Logick in 1615, it procured him so much credit, that on April 10, 1616, he was chosen Senior Proctor without any difficulty (i). On the 19th of May, 1617, he took the degree of Bachelor of Divinity (k). The year following, he was presented by his kinsman Sir Nicolas Sanderson, Lord Viscount Castleton, to the Rectory of Wiberton near Boston in Lincolnshire, a living of very good value. But the situation of it was so low and unhealthy, that he resigned it, after a year's possession. About that time he was presented by Thomas Harrington, Esq; to the Rectory of Boothby-Pannel, in the same county, which he enjoyed above forty years; extremely beloved and esteemed [F]. Upon taking this living, he resigned his Fellowship [G] May 6, 1619; and soon after married Anne, daughter of Henry Nelson, B. D. Rector of Haugham in the county of Lincoln. About which time, he was made Prebendary of the collegiate church of Southwell; and, on the third of September, 1629, was installed into the Prebend of Farendon in the cathedral church of Lincoln (l). In the beginning of King Charles the First's reign, he was chosen one of the Clerks in Convocation for the diocese of Lincoln; as he was also in all the subsequent Convocations during that reign: And the debates that had like to arise in some of them, concerning the obscure doctrine of Predestination, made him thoroughly consider that point [H]. At the recom-

(b) Walton, as above, p. 3.

(c) Wood, Fasti, edit. 1721. Vol. I. col. 167.

(d) Walton, p. 4.

(e) Wood, ubi supra, col. 176.

(f) Walton; and Reason and Judgement, or Special Remarques of the Life of the renowned Dr Sanderson, late Lord Bishop of Lincoln. 4to. p. 10.

(g) Walton; and Wood, Ath. Vol. II. col. 318.

(h) Vide Orat. in Schola Theol. 26 Oct. 1646. præfixim Lectoris de Juramenti Obligat.

(i) Walton, p. 5, 6.

(k) Wood, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 206.

(l) Walton; and Willis's Survey of the Cathedrals, &amp;c. Vol. II. p. 185.

[C] To the care of the learned Dr Kilby. This Gentleman was born at Radcliff in Leicestershire, elected Fellow of Lincoln-college January 18. 1577; and in 1590. Rector of the same: As also, some time after made Prebendary of Lincoln. He was a man of so great learning and wisdom, and so excellent a Critick in the Hebrew tongue, that he was made Professor of it in the University of Oxford; and was also so perfect a Grecian, that he was by K. James I. appointed to be one of the Translator's of the Bible. He dyed in 1620. (3)

[D] He took the degree of Bachelor of Arts. At the taking of that degree, Mr. Sanderson's tutor told the Rector of the college, 'That his pupil had a metaphysical brain, and a matchless memory: and that he thought he had improv'd, or made the last so by an art of his invention.' And all the future employments of his life prov'd that his tutor was not mistaken. (4) — 'While he was in the University, he generally spent eleven hours a day in study; which industry of his dispatched the whole course of Philosophy, and picked out in a manner all that was useful in all Classick Authors that are extant; drawing Indexes for his private use, either in his own paper-book, or at the beginning and end of each book. This assiduity continued to his dying day. He disposed himself and time to perpetual industry and diligence; not only avoiding, but perfectly hating idleness, and hardly recommending any thing more than this; "Be always furnished with somewhat to do, as the best way to innocence and pleasure." There was not a minute of the day he left vacant from business of necessity, civility or study.' (5)

[E] He stood for the place of one of the Proctors of the University. His standing for that office, was not to satisfy any ambition of his own, but to comply with the desire of the Rector, and other members of his College; who had not had a Proctor chosen out of their college, for the space of sixty years, namely, from the year 1554. to 1614. For, before the Procuratorial Cycle settled in 1628, by means of Bishop Laud; the Elections of Proctors in the University were generally very irregular, and governed for the most part by the larger Colleges.

[F] Extremely beloved and esteemed. In this parish, "he either found or made his Parishioners peaceable, and complying with him in the decent and regular service of God. And thus his Parish, his patron, and he liv'd together in a religious love, and a contented quietness. He not troubling their thoughts by preaching high and useless notions, but such plain truths as were necessary to be known, believed, and practised, in order to their salvation. And their assent to what he taught was testified by such a conformity to his Doctrine, as declared they believ'd and lov'd him. For he would often say, "That without the last, the most evident truths (heard as from an enemy, or an evil liver) either are not, or are at least the less effectual; and do usually rather harden, than convince the hearer." — And he did not think his duty discharged, by only reading prayers, Preaching, &c. but he practised what his conscience told him was his duty, in reconciling differences, and preventing lawsuits, both in his parish and in the neighbourhood. He also visited often sick and disconsolate families, raising them from dejection by his advice and cheerful discourse, and by adding his own alms if there were any so poor as to need it." — Mr Walton then gives a remarkable instance of his doing good; in prevailing upon a rich landlord to forgive a poor tenant his rent, who had had his crop of hay carried off by a sudden flood. After which he adds, "Thus he went on in an obscure and quiet privacy, doing good daily both by word and deed, as often as any occasion offer'd itself; yet not so obscurely, but that his very great learning, prudence, and piety were much noted and valued by the Bishop of his diocese, and by most of the Nobility and Gentry of that county." (6)

[G] Upon taking this living he resigned his Fellowship. When he left the University, he had compassed with his knowledge the whole circle of the Arts; being exact in propriety and elegancy of Languages; having read ancient and modern Writers; having studied Philosophy, and made himself familiar with all politer Classick Authors, being learned in School-Divinity, and a master in Church Antiquity, ready in the sense of Scripture, Fathers, Councils, and Ecclesiastical History (7).

[H] Concerning the obscure doctrine of Predestination, made him thoroughly consider that point. There was some expectation, that the Points controverted between the Arminians and Calvinists, (the only questions almost in agitation at that time) should have been debated by the Clergy, in that Convocation. This occasioned our learned Author (as it did sundry others) to endeavour by study and conference to inform himself, as thoroughly and exactly in the state of those Controversies, as he could have opportunity. In order where-

(6) Walton, p. 12, 13.

(7) Reason and Judgement, as above, p. 19.

(3) Wood, Ath. Vol. I. col. 453. and Walton, p. 3, 4.

(4) Walton, p. 4.

(5) Reason and Judgement, &amp;c. as above, p. 11.

- mendation of Bishop Laud, he was, in November 1631, appointed Chaplain in ordinary to King Charles I. who expressed a great regard for him (m) [I]. And being thus drawn out of his country privacy, his useful learning, especially as an excellent Casuist, gained him great credit from the Nobility, and greater from the Clergy (n). On the 31st of August, 1636, when the Court was entertained at Oxford, he was, among others, created Doctor in Divinity (o). In 1641, he was employed, with two other members of the Convocation, in drawing up such safe alterations as they thought fit in the Liturgy, and abating some of the ceremonies that were least material, for satisfying the consciences of the Dissenters: but the troubles that ensued rendered this model of Reformation useless. The year following, he was proposed by both Houses of Parliament, to King Charles, who was then at Oxford, to be one of their trustees for the settling of Church-affairs, and allowed of by the King; however, that treaty came to nothing (p). On the 21st of July, 1642, his Majesty appointed him Regius Professor of Divinity in that university; with the Canonry of Christ-Church annexed (q): which place the national calamities hindered him from entering upon 'till October 26, 1646; and he continued undisturbed in it very little more than a year (r). He was, in 1643, nominated one of the Assembly of Divines, but never sat amongst them (s). Neither did he take the Covenant or Engagement; and therefore his Rectory of Boothby-Pannel was sequestered in 1644. But, so great was his reputation for piety and learning, that he was not deprived of it (t). He had the chief hand in drawing up the Judgment of the university of Oxford, June 1, 1647, concerning the Solemn League and Covenant, the Negative Oath, &c. [K] or their Reasons, why they could not take those oaths without violating their consciences (u). When the Parliament had sent Proposals to the King for a Peace in Church and State, his Majesty desired that Dr Sanderfon, with the Doctors Hammond, Sheldon, and Morley, should attend him; and give him their advice, how far he might with a good conscience comply with those proposals. That request was then rejected, but it being complied with when his Majesty was at Hampton-court, and in the Isle of Wight, in 1647, and 1648; those Divines attended him there; and Dr Sanderfon often preached before him, and had many both publick and private conferences with him, to his Majesty's great satisfaction. Who also desired him, at Hampton-court, since the Parliament had proposed the abolishing of Episcopal government as inconsistent with Monarchy, that he would consider of it, and declare his judgment (w) [L]. On the 14th of June, 1648, he was voted out of his Professorship
- (m) Walton, p. 25.
 (n) Wood, Ath. ut supra, col. 318.
 (o) Idem, Fasti, Vol. I. col. 271.
 (p) Walton, p. 16, &c.
 (q) Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. Lib. II. p. 38.
 (r) Orat. in Schola Theol. ut supra, and Walton, p. 18.
 (s) Walton, p. 18.
 (t) Bishop Morley's Tracts, 1633, 4to, and J. Walker's Sufferings of the Clergy, Part II. p. 105.
 (u) Walton, p. 19, and Wood Ath. Vol. I. col. 2.
 (w) Walton, p. 20.

unto, he made it his first business to take a survey of the several different opinions concerning the ordering of God's Decrees, as to the Salvation or Damnation of Men. Which opinions, the better to represent their differences to the eye, for their more easy conveying to the understanding by that means, and the avoiding of confusion and tedious discourings, he reduced into five Schemes or Tables. Having all these Schemes before his eyes at once, so as he might with ease compare them one with another, and having considered of the conveniences and inconveniences of each, as well as he could, he soon discerned a necessity of quitting the Sublapsarian way of which he had a better liking before, as well as the Supralapsarian which he could never fancy (8). Then undoubtedly it was, that he composed his Treatise intitled Pax Ecclesie.

[I] He was — appointed Chaplain in ordinary to K. Charles I, who expressed a great regard for him.] When they became known to each other, the King did put many cases of conscience to him, and received from him such deliberate, safe, and clear solutions, as gave him great content in conversing with him: so that at the end of his month's attendance, the King told him, 'He should long for the next November; for he resolved to have a more inward acquaintance with him, when that month and he return'd.' And when they did return, the good King was never absent from his Sermons, and would usually say, 'I carry my ears to hear other Preachers, but I carry my conscience to hear Mr Sanderfon, and to act accordingly (9).'

[K] He had the chief hand in drawing up the Judgment of the University of Oxford, &c.] When the Covenant, Negative Oath, &c. were sent to Oxford, with a strict injunction that they should be taken by all the members of the University; the chief of that learned Body, who could not in conscience submit thereto, appointed twenty Delegates, to meet, consider, and draw up a Manifesto to the Parliament, containing the Reasons of their refusal. The chief of these Delegates, were, Dr Sheldon, Dr Hammond, Dr Sanderfon, Dr Morley, and that judicious civilian Dr Zouch: This latter was desired, to draw up the law part, and give it to Dr Sanderfon, who was requested to methodize and add what refer'd to reason and conscience, and put it into form. He yielded to their request, and did so. Then after it had been read in a full convocation, and allow'd of, it was printed in Latin; that the Parliament's proceedings, and the University's Sufferings, might be manifested to all nations. Immediately after which, Dr Sanderfon published it in English, that the three Kingdoms might the better judge of the loyal Party's Sufferings (10). The Latin is printed with his Lectures, and the English at the end of his Life by Mr Walton.

[L] That he would consider of it, and declare his judgment.] What he wrote upon that subject was printed, in 1661. and 1673, 8vo. under this title, 'Episcopacy (as established by Law in England) not prejudicial to Regal Power: Written in the time of the Long Parliament by the special Command of the late King.' — At Dr Sanderfon's taking leave of his Majesty, in this his last attendance on him, the King requested him to 'betake himself to the writing Cases of Conscience for the good of posterity.' To which his answer was, 'That he was now grown old, and unfit to write Cases of Conscience.' But the King was so bold with him, as to say, 'It was the simplest answer he ever heard from Dr Sanderfon; for no young man was fit to be a judge, or write Cases of Conscience.' — Upon this occasion, Mr Walton relates the following anecdote; That in one of these conferences the King told Dr Sanderfon, or one of them that then waited with him, 'That the remembrance of two Errors did much afflict him, which were, his assent to the Earl of Strafford's death, and the abolishing Episcopacy in Scotland; and that, if God ever restored him to be in a peaceable possession of his Crown, he would demonstrate his Repentance by a publick Confession and a voluntary Penance (I think barefoot, says Mr Walton) from the Tower of London, or Whitehall, to St Paul's Church, and desire the people to intercede with God for his pardon.' One of them was still living when Mr Walton wrote Bishop Sanderfon's life, and told it him (11). — His Majesty might have added another Error, of as pernicious a consequence as any he committed in his whole reign, and which proved his ruin in the end. And that was, His assenting to the Bill 'to prevent Inconveniences which might happen by the untimely Adjourning, Proroguing, or Dissolving of the Parliament,' in 1641. For that Act rendered in effect

(8) This is our author's own account, in a Letter to Dr Hammond, printed in Dr Hammond's Pacifick Discourse of God's Grace and Decrees.

(9) Walton, p. 15.

(10) Walton, p. 19, 20.

(11) Walton, p. 20, 21.

fefforship and Canonry in Oxford, by the Committee for Reforming the Univerfity (x). Thereupon he withdrew to his living of Boothby, where he hoped to have enjoyed himfelf, though in a poor yet in a quiet and defired privacy; but it proved otherwife. For the foldiers not only came into his church, and difturbed him when he was reading Prayers, but alfo forced his Common prayer-book from him, and tore it to pieces [M]. And fhortly after, he was taken prifoner and carried to Lincoln, on purpofe to be exchanged for one Clarke, Rector of Allington, who had been made prifoner of war by the King's party. He was indeed foon releafed upon articles [N]; one of which was, that the fequeftration of his living fhould be recalled: by which means he enjoyed a mean but contented fubfiftance for himfelf, wife, and children, 'till the Reftoration. But, though the articles for his releafe imported that he fhould live undifturbed, yet he was far from being either quiet or fafe, being feveral times plundered, and once wounded in three places; and yet had no other remedy but patience (y). During this retirement, he was often applied to for Refolution in Cafes of Confcience; fo that his general correpondencies by letters took up the proportion of a day in each week, and more (z). In 1658, the honourable and moft generous Robert Boyle, Efq; having read his Lectures concerning the Obligation of Oaths, fent him a prefent of fifty pounds: which was a very feafonable gift [O], his circumftances, as moft of the Royalifts at that time, being very low. The Reftoration of King Charles II. made a great alteration in them for the better. - And therefore to exprefs his joy and thankfulnefs for that memorable event, he prefented to his Majefty, on the 23d of July, 1660, a congratulatory Addrefs from himfelf and his brethren the loyal Clergy of the County of Lincoln (a). The beginning of Auguft following, he was re-inftated into his Profeforship and Canonry (b). Soon after, at the recommendation of Dr Sheldon, he was nominated to the Bifhopric of Lincoln [P], and confecrated the 28th of October, 1660 (c). As he was then aged upwards of feventy-three [Q], he enjoyed his new dignity but about two years and a quarter; during which time he did all the good in his power, by repairing his palace at Buckden, augmenting fmall Vicarages, &c. [R]

(x) Walker, 23 above, p. 205.

(y) Walton, p. 26, *27.

(z) Idem; and Reason and Judgement, 29 above, p. 12.

(a) Kennett's Register, &amp;c. p. 209.

(b) Wood, Hift. &amp; Antiq. ut fupra, p. 38.

(c) Willis's Survey, &amp;c. Vol. II. p. 70.

In

feft the Parliament quite independent, and arm'd them with legal Power to do all the Mifchief they did afterwards.

[M] But alfo forced his Common prayer-book from him, and tore it all to pieces.] From that time, as long as the Soldiers were quartered in his parifh, he waved the ufe of the Common-prayer, at leaft in the ordinary fervice; not only out of neceffity for want of a book, but for the preventing of farther outrages. Only he read the Confefion, the Lord's Prayer, all the Verfes, and the Pfalms for the day. Then, after the firft leffon in the forenoon, Benedicite, or the hundredth Pfalm; and in the afternoon, Pfalm 98. After the fecond leffon alfo, fometimes the Creed, fometimes the ten Commandments, and fometimes neither, but only fung a Pfalm, and fo to Sermon. After the foldiers departure, he took the liberty to ufe either the whole Liturgy, or but fome part of it, omitting fometimes more, fometimes lefs upon occafion, as he judg'd moft expedient in reference to the auditory; efppecially if any foldiers, or other unknown perfons happened to be prefent. But all this while the fubftance of what he omitted he contrived into his prayer before fermon, the phrafe and order only varied. But fome Minifters of the Prefbyterian gang, as he expreffes it, having made a publick complaint, That he retain'd too much of the Common prayer; a Parliament-man gave him notice of it, and advifed him to confider well what he had to do, for he muft refolve either to adventure the lofs of his living, or to lay afide the Common-prayer. Whereupon he bethought himfelf of fuch a courfe, as might be believed neither to bring danger to himfelf by the ufe, nor to give fcandal to his brethren by the difufe of the eftablifh'd Liturgy. And that was, by tranfpofing, paraphrafing, and otherwife altering the Common-prayers, but ftill retaining the words and expreffions of them as much as poffible. Of which he gives a large and particular account in his Judgment concerning Submiffion to Ufurpers, printed at the end of his Life by Mr Walton.

[N] He was indeed foon releafed upon articles.] The articles were, That Dr Sanderfon and Mr Clarke being exchanged, fhould live undifturb'd at their own Parifhes; and if either were injur'd by the Soldiers of the contrary party, the other having notice of it, fhould procure him a redrefs, by having fatisfaction made for his lofs, or for any other injury; or if not, he to be us'd in the fame kind by the other party (12).

[O] Sent him a prefent of 50 l. which was a very feafonable gift.] Dr Tho. Barlow, bifhop of Lincoln, in a letter to Mr Walton (13), informs him, that he was the instrument, or means, of obtaining that prefent.

— “Discourfing, fays he, with — Robert Boyle, Efq; — about a cafe of Confcience concerning Oaths and Vows, their nature and obligation; in which (for fome particular reafons) he then defired more fully to be inform'd; I commended to him Dr Sanderfon's book De Juramento: which having read with great fatisfaction, he ask'd me, if I thought the Doctör could be induc'd to write Cafes of Confcience, if he might have an honorary penfion allow'd him, to furnifh him with Books for that purpofe? I told him I believ'd he would: and (in a letter to the Doctör) told him what great fatisfaction that honourable perfon (and many more) had reaped by reading his book De Juramento; and ask'd him, whether he would be pleas'd (for the benefit of the Church) to write fome Tract of Cafes of Confcience? He replied, That he was glad that any had received any benefit by his Books: and added further, That if any future Tract of his could bring fuch benefit to any, as we feem'd to fay his former had done, he would willingly (though without any penfion) fet about that work. Having receiv'd this answer, that honourable perfon (beforemention'd) did by my hands return 50 l. to the good Doctör; — and he prefently revifed, finifhed, and publifhed that excellent book De Confcientiâ.”

[P] He was nominated to the Bifhopric of Lincoln.] In purfance of which, he was elected October 17. and confirm'd the 24th (14).

[Q] As he was then aged upwards of feventy-three.] Mr Walton affures us (15), that he had at that age fewer faults to be pardon'd by God or man, than are apparent in others in thefe days, in which (God knows) we fall fo fhort of that vifible fanctity and zeal to God's glory, which was apparent in the days of primitive Chriftianity. — Another author (16) fays, ‘He had this advantage of other men, that when he enter'd upon that employment which lay open to the envy and malice of fo many, his Life was fo fpotlefs, his Integrity fo eminent, that partiality itfelf could not accufe him; he being a man of folid worth, in whom was nothing dubious or dark, nothing various or inconfant, nothing formal or affected; nothing as to his publick carriage that was fufpected, nothing that needed palliation or apology. I never heard (adds that author) of any thing faid or done by him, which a wife and good man would have wifhed not faid, or undone.’

[R] During which time he did all the good in his power.] A friend taking notice of his Bounty, was fo bold as to advife him to remember, that he was under his firft-fruits, and that he was old, and had a wife and children yet but meafly provided for, efppecially if his

(14) J. Le Neve's Fasts, &amp;c. fol. p. 142.

(15) P. 36.

(16) Reason and Judgement, &amp;c. as above, p. 40.

(12) Walton, p. 27, *28.

(13) Publifhed at the end of his Life of Bifhop Sanderfon.

In 1661, he was one of the Commissioners, or rather the Moderator, at the Savoy-Conference [S]. And had a great hand in the revival of the Liturgy [T]. The rest of what he wrote and published is set down below in the note [U]. He dyed January 29, 1662-3, his dignity were considered.' To whom he made a mild and thankful, answer, saying, 'It would not become a Christian Bishop to suffer those houses built by his predecessors, to be ruin'd for want of repair; and less justifiable to suffer any of those that were call'd to so high a calling as to sacrifice at God's altar, to eat the bread of sorrow constantly, when he had a power by a small augmentation to turn it into the bread of cheerfulness: and wish'd, that as this was, so it were also in his power to make all mankind happy, for he desired nothing more. And for his wife and children, he hop'd to leave them a competence; and in the hands of a God, that would provide for all that kept innocence, and trusted his providence and protection, which he had always found enough to make and keep him happy.' — Among other instances of his beneficence, he gave Fourscore pounds, towards the repairing and beautifying of the Cathedral and College of Christ's-Church in Oxford (17).

11

[S] In 1661, he was one of the Commissioners, or rather the Moderator, at the Savoy-Conference ] In the account of that Conference, R. Baxter calls him a very worthy man, and commends his learning, worth, and gravity; but pretends, that injuries, partiality, temperature, and age, had caus'd great Peevishness in him (18): Which he repeats again elsewhere. The Bishop was even with him: For 'tis reported, That Baxter appear'd to him to be so bold, so troublesome, and so illogical in the Dispute, as forc'd him to say with an unusual Earnestness, 'that he had never met with a man of more pertinacious Confidence, and less Abilities in all his Conversation (19).'

[T] And had a great hand in the revival of the Liturgy.] Mr Walton says, he cannot tell, 'How many of the new Collects were worded by Dr Sanderfon; but I am sure (says he) the whole Convocation valued him so much, that he never undertook to speak to any point in question, but he was heard with great willingness, and attention; and when any point in question was determin'd, the Convocation did usually desire him to word their intentions, and as usually approve and thank him.' — He cannot say, Dr Sanderfon did form or word all the three new Offices, for Janu. 30. May 29. and the Baptism of such as are of riper years, 'but doubtless (adds he) more than any single man of the Convocation.' The Preface, which begins thus, It hath been the wisdom, &c. was drawn by him in particular, at the Convocation's desire; and being approv'd by them, was appointed to be printed at the beginning of the Liturgy (20).

[U] The rest of what he wrote and publish'd is set down below.] We shall place it under several heads, for the Reader's convenience. I. His Philosophical pieces. Logicæ Artis Compendium, Oxon. 1615. 8vo. Reprinted many times since. — Physicæ scientiæ Compendium. Oxon. 1671. 8vo. II. Sermons. 1. Two Sermons, on Rom. 14. 3. and on Rom. 3. 8. Printed at London. 1622. 4to. 2. Twenty Sermons. Lond. 1626. fol. among which are the two former. 3. Three Sermons ad Clerum, three ad Magistratum, and four ad Populum. Lond. 1627. 4to. 4. Two Sermons, on 1 Tim. 4. 4. and Genesis 20. 6. Lond. 1628. 4to. 5. Twelve Sermons, viz. three ad Clerum, three ad Magistratum, and six ad Populum. Lond. 1626. and 1632. fol. 6. Two Sermons on 1 Pet. 2. 16. and Rom. 14. 23. Lond. 1635. 4to. Dedicated to Archbishop Laud. The first was preached at St Paul's Cross, London, May 6. 1632. and the latter at a Metropolitan Visitation at Grantham, Lincoln, 22 August, 1634. 7. The above Sermons were reprinted together in 1656. fol. in this order, viz. sixteen ad Aulam, three ad Magistratum, and one, which he entitles Sermon viii. ad Populum; with a large and bold Preface, as Mr Walton calls it (21); it containing many reflections upon 'the Anabaptists, Familists, Quakers, and the whole crue of the modern Sectaries (22).'

'Tis dated Decemb. 31. 1655. The year following he reprinted fourteen Sermons more, viz. four ad Clerum, three ad Magistratum, and seven ad Populum, with a larger and bolder Preface than the foregoing; dated July 13. 1657; wherein he answers the Objections that had been made by the Anti-Ceremonian Brethren against his Sermons. That was the 4th Edition. In 1660. a 5th Edition came out of them altogether, in folio. — And in 1670. a single Sermon of his, 'Preached at a Visitation holden at Grantham, Lincoln: Octob. 8. 1641. was printed at Oxford, in 4to.' The publication of it was occasioned by a false report, spread by a Presbyterian (Chaplain to Sir George Booth) in 1669. 'That Bishop Sanderfon, before his death, repented of what he had written against the Presbyterians; and, on his death-bed would suffer no hierarchical Minister to come to pray with him, but desir'd, and had only Presbyterians about him.' To confute which report, it was thought proper to publish this Sermon, which was fairly written with his own hand, and the last that he wrote with his own hand. But that report was indeed more fully confuted by the Bishop's last will, wherein he gives an account of his Faith in opposition to Papists and Presbyterians. As also by the testimony of his household Chaplain, Mr Jos. Pullen, of Magdalen-hall, Oxon. who was with him in all his sickness, and at his death; and declared, that the said Bishop, as he lived, so he died, a true Son of the Church of England, that no Presbyterians came near him in all his Sickness, that he had no Prayers (besides his own privately to himself) save those of the Church, nor any hut his own Chaplain to read them (23). This Sermon was reprinted in 1681. fol. with the 7th and best Edition of his other Sermons. To which is prefix'd his Life by If Walton. III. Nine Cases of Conscience occasionally determin'd; viz. two in 1658. 8vo. three more added, Lond. 1667. 8vo. Another, Lond. 1674. and another in 1678. Reprinted together in 1678. and 1685. 8vo. The last, which is Of the use of Liturgy, is dated Novemb. 2. 1652. and is the same word for word as what is printed at the end of his life by Mr Walton, under the title of Bishop Sanderfon's Judgment concerning Submission to Usurpers. IV. His Lectures read in the Divinity-School at Oxford, whilst he was Regius Professor; 1646, 1647; being, Oratio habita in Schola Theologica Oxon. cum publicam Professionem auspicaretur 26 Oct. 1646. De Juramenti promissorii Obligatione Prælectiones Septem. First printed at London 1647. 8vo. Reprinted several times since, with, De Obligatione Conscientiæ Prælectiones Decem. Which last was first printed at the request of Mr Boyle, as is above related, and dedicated to him. — The first, namely, Of the Obligation of Oaths, was translated into English by King Charles I. during his confinement in the Isle of Wight (24); and printed at London in 1655. 8vo. The latter, came out in English, in 1660. 8vo. with this title, 'Several Cases of Conscience discussed in ten Lectures at Oxon.' Lond. VI. Censure of Mr Anton. Aſcham his Book of the 'Confusions and Revolutions of Government.' Lond. 1649. 8vo. VII. 'Epicopacy (as established by Law in England) not prejudicial to the Regal Power.' Lond. 1661. &c (25). VIII. Pax Ecclesiæ; about Predestination, or the Five Points. Printed at the end of his Life by Mr Walton, 8vo. Our learned Author seems at first to have been a strict Calvinist in those points. For in 1632. when his Twelve Sermons were printed together, the reader may observe in the margin some accusation of Arminius for false Doctrine (26). But the excellent Dr Hammond having paid him a Visit at Boothby-Pagnel in 1649, convinced him of the Absurdity and Impiety of those Doctrines in the rigid sense. As he did more fully afterwards in some Letters that pass'd between them, and which are printed among Dr Hammond's works: Especially that intitled, 'A Pacifick Discourse of God's Grace and Decrees (27).'

See also, Dr Tho. Pierce's 'Impartial Inquiry into the Nature of Sin;' in the Appendix (28). And his Letter to Mr Walton, at the end of Mr Walton's Life of Bishop Sanderfon. IX. 'Discourse concerning the Church, in these particulars. First, Concerning the Visibility of the true Church. Secondly, Concerning the Church of Rome, &c.' Lond. 1688. about five Sheets, 4to. published by Dr W. Aſhton, from a MS. copy which he had from Mr Jos. Pullen, domestic Chaplain

(17) Wood, Hist. & Antiq. Univ. Oxon. Lib. ii. p. 234.

(18) Life of R. Baxter, fol. Lib. i. P. ii. p. 340.

(19) Walton, P. 38. and Kennett's Register, &c. p. 551.

(20) Walton, P. 38, 39. Kennett's Register, &c. p. 573, 632.

(21) P. 29.

(22) See that Preface.

(23) See Bishop Barlow's Genuine Remains. Lond. 1693. 8vo. p. 634. &c.

(24) Walton, p. 21. See the Hon. Mr Walpole's Royal Authors; under Charles I.

(25) See above, Note [L].

(26) Walton, p. 29.

(27) See Walton, p. 27, &c.

(28) P. 193—200.

in the 76th year of his age; and was buried the third day after, in the chancel of Bugden-church, with as little noise, pomp, and charge as could be, according to his own direction (d). He was moderately tall; of a healthful constitution; in cheerful and mild; of an even temper, and very temperate [W]. His behaviour had in it much of a plain comeliness, and very little of ceremony and courtship. He was endued with great wisdom, integrity, and innocence [X]. His memory was firm [Y], but sometimes could not be duly exerted by reason of his excessive bashfulness, or modesty [Z]. His Learning is univerfally allowed [AA]; and his Writings, for good Sense, clear Reasoning, and a

(d) Walton, as above, p. 42, 43.

Chaplain to the Bishop. X. He wrote a large Preface to the following Book of Archbishop Usher's, which he published; namely, 'The Power communicated by God to the Prince, and the Obedience required of the Subject. Briefly laid down and confirmed out of the holy Scriptures, testimony of the primitive Church, dictates of right Reason, and opinion of the wisest among the heathen Writers.' Lond. 1661. 4to. This book was writ at the special command of King Charles I. XI. He wrote also a Discourse, in defence of Archbishop Usher and his writings: And particularly his notion of the Sign of the Cross in our Office of Baptism. Dated Lond. August 10. 1661. Prefixed to a Collection of several learned Discourses, entituled, 'Clavi Trabales: or, Nails fastened by some great Masters of Assemblies, confirming the King's Supremacy, the Subjects Duty; and Church government by Bishops.' Being two Speeches of Archbishop Usher's, &c. Mr Hooker's judgment of the King's power in matters of Religion, &c. Bishop Andrews of Church government, &c. A letter of Dr Saravia of the like subject, &c. Published by N. Bernard, D. D. Lond. 1661. 4to. XII. A piece of his, being 'Prophecies concerning the return of Poperie,' was printed in a book intituled, Fair Warning: the second part. Lond. 1663. And he left a fragment of 'An Answer to Dr Tho. Bayly's challenge.' — There is also printed at the end of 'Reason and Judgement: or special Remarques of the Life of the renowned Dr Sanderfon,' &c. and at the end of his Life by Mr Walton, — 'Bishop Sanderfon his Judgment in one View for the Settlement of the Church.' By way of Question of Answer.

(28) Ath. Vol. II. col. 322.

But A. Wood informs us (28), that the Questions were form'd by the Publisher. And the Answers are made up of scraps without any alteration taken out of the Prefaces, and of several places of the Bishop's printed Sermons. — We learn further from Mr Wood, that his Lordship had several Treatises lying by him, which were thought most worthy of publication by those who had seen them; but he caused them to be burnt a little before his death. A necessary precaution for all learned Men, whose imperfect Sketches are often published by needy heirs, or covetous booksellers (29), to the great prejudice of the Authors Fame.

(29) Witnesses Bishop Beveridge's, Lord Boringbrooke's, &c. &c.

[W] And very temperate. 'In his apparel none more plain, in his diet none more temperate, eating (as he would say) rationally, only for health and life; one nical a day sufficed him, with some fruit at night: in his sleep none more sparing, eleven or twelve at night being his usual time of going to rest, and five, and very rarely six, the hour of his rising: recreations which his judgement allowed, yet his care and self denial forbid him; ab illicitis semper, quandoque a licitis, was his rule: he would say, Things unlawful we must never do; nor ever lawful things, but with due respect of our calling, and other concurrent circumstances (30).

(30) Reason and Judgement, &c. p. 16.

[X] And innocence. He would often mention with thankfulness, 'That till he was threescore years of age, he had never spent five shillings in law, nor (upon himself) so much in Wine: and rejoic'd much that he had so liv'd, as never to cause an hour's sorrow to his good Father; and that he hop'd he should dye without an enemy (31).'

(31) Walton, p. 43.

[Y] His memory was firm. So that when he was alone, or to a friend, he could repeat all the Odes of Horace, all Tully's Offices, and much of Juvenal and Persius without book; and would say, 'The repetition of one of the Odes of Horace to himself, (which he did often) was to him such Musick, as a lesson on the Viol was to others, when they play'd it voluntarily to themselves or friends (32).'

(32) Walton, p. 33.

[Z] But sometimes could not be duly exerted by reason of his excessive bashfulness, or modesty. Mr Walton gives a remarkable instance of it (33). Whilst Dr Hammond was paying him a visit at Boothby Pagnel, he prevailed upon him to trust his excellent Memory, and not read, but try to speak a Sermon as he had writ it. — At his going into the pulpit, he gave his Sermon (which was a very short one) into the hand of Dr Hammond, intending to preach it as 'twas writ; but before he had preach'd a third part, Dr Hammond, looking on his Sermon as written, observ'd him to be out, and so lost as to the matter, especially the method, that he also became afraid for him; for 'twas discernable to many of his plain auditory: But when he had ended this short Sermon, as they two walk'd homeward, Dr Sanderfon said with much earnestness, 'Good Doctor give me my Sermon, and know, that neither you, nor any man living, shall ever persuade me to preach again without my books.' To which the reply was, 'Good Doctor be not angry; for if I ever persuade you to preach again without book, I will give you leave to burn all the books I am master of.' — And, once in conversation with Mr Walton, he express'd himself thus; 'O that I had gone Chaplain to that excellently accomplish'd Gentleman, your friend, Sir Henry Wotton! which was once intended; when he first went Ambassador to the State of Venice, for by that employment I had been forc'd into a necessity of conversing, not with him only, but with several men of several Nations, and might thereby have kept myself from my unmanly Bashfulness, which has prov'd very troublesome, and not less inconvenient to me; and which I now fear is become so habitual as never to leave me: and by that means I might also have known, or at least have had the satisfaction of seeing, one of the late miracles of general learning, prudence, and modesty, Sir Henry Wootton's dear friend, Padre Paulo, who, the Author of his life says, was born with a bashfulness as invincible, as I have found my own to be: A man whose fame must never dye, till vertue and learning shall become so useless as not to be regarded (34).'

VOL. V. No. 300.

(33) P. 27, 28.

(34) Walton, p. 32.

[AA] His learning is univerfally allowed. Being asked by a friend, what Books he studied most, when he laid the foundation of his great and clear Learning, his answer was, That he declin'd reading many Books; but what he did read, were well chosen, and read so often that he became very familiar with them; and told him, they were chiefly three, Aristotle's Rhetoric, Aquinas's Secunda secundae, and Tully, but chiefly his Offices, which he had not read over less than twenty times, and could even in his old age repeat without book. He told him also, the learned civilian Dr Zouch had writ Elementa Jurisprudentiae, which he thought he could also say without book; and that no wife man could read it too often, or love, or commend it too much; and he told him the study of these had been his toyl (35). — A person of quality having likewise privately enquir'd of him, what course a young Divine should take in his studies to enable him to be a good Casuis? His Answer was, That a convenient understanding of the learned Languages, (at least of Hebrew, Greek, and Latin) and a sufficient knowledge of Arts presuppos'd; there were two things in human literature, a comprehension of which would be of very great use, to inable a man to be a rational and able Casuis, which otherwise was very difficult, if not impossible. 1. A convenient knowledge of Moral Philosophy; especially that part of it which treats of the nature of human Actions: To know what is a human Action (voluntary, involuntary, or mixt, &c.). How the variety of circumstances varies the goodness or evil of human Actions? How far knowledge or ignorance may aggravate or excuse, increase or diminish, the goodness or evil of our Actions? For every Case of Conscience being only this — Is this Action good or bad? May I do it, or may I not? He who (in these) manly and lasting Style, have, and always will be, esteemed. Besides his great knowledge in the Fathers, Schoolmen, and casuistical and controversial Divinity, he was exactly versed in the Histories of our Nation, whether ancient or modern; was a most curious Antiquary, an indefatigable searcher into Records; as also a compleat herald and genealogist (e) [BB]. The worthiest and learnedest of his contemporaries speak of him in the most respectful terms [CC].

(35) Walton, p. 41.

(c) Wood, Ath. col. 319.

knows not how or whence human Actions become morally good or evil, never can (in hypothesis) rationally and certainly determine, whether this or that particular Action be so. 2. The second thing which (he said) would be a great help and advantage to a Casuist, was a convenient Knowledge of the Nature and Obligation of Laws in general: To know what a Law is; what a natural and a positive Law is; what's required to the Latio, dispensatio, derogatio, vel abrogatio legis; what promulgation is antecedently required to the Obligation of any positive Law; what Ignorance takes off the Obligation of a Law, or does excuse, diminish, or aggravate the transgression: For every case of Conscience being only this — Is this lawful for me, or is it not? and the Law the only Rule and Measure, by which I must judge of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of any Action: It evidently follows, that he, who (in these) knows not the Nature and Obligation of Laws, never can be a good Casuist, or rationally assure himself, or others, of the lawfulness or unlawfulness of Actions in particular (36). — By such methods it was, that our learned Bishop arrived at his great Knowledge. — And as to his Sermons, and Manner of Preaching, they were very good, considering the Time he liv'd in. 'There was in his Sermons no improper Rhetorick, nor such perplex'd divisions, as were then too common.' In his there was no want of useful matter, nor waste of words; and yet such clear distinctions as dispell'd all confus'd notions, and made his hearers depart both wiser, and more confirm'd in virtuous resolutions. He lamented, that by means of the irregular and indiscreet Preaching in his Days, the generality of the Nation were possess'd with such dangerous mistakes, as to think, 'They might be religious first, and then just and merciful; that they might sell their Consciences, and yet have something left that was worth keeping; that they might be sure they were elected, though their Lives were visibly scandalous; that to be cunning was to be wise; that to be rich was to be happy, though 'tis evidently false; that to speak evil of Government, and to be busy in things they understood not, was no sin (37).'

(36) Bishop Barlow's Letter, at the end of Mr Walton's Life, p. 53.

(37) Walton, p. 31, 33.

[BB] Was a most curious Antiquary, an indefatigable searcher into Records; as also a compleat herald and genealogist] He had always a natural love for Records, Genealogies, and Heraldry. To these he used to turn, as a pleasant Recreation, when his thoughts were wearied and harass'd with any perplex studies. And his very recreation had made him so perfect in them, that he could in a very short time give an account of the Descent, Arms, and Antiquity of any Family of the Nobility or Gentry of this Nation (38). He left about Twenty MS. Volumes in those Sciences, as Mr Henry Symmons, some time his Secretary, informed Mr Wood: who tells us, he had seen and perused one of these Volumes, a large thick folio, all in Dr Sanderfon's own hand writing, containing Collections from Registers, leiger-books, rolls, evidences in the hands of private Gentlemen, or belonging to Cathedral and other Churches, &c. It was endorsed Cartæ, X (39). One of his labours in this kind, was transcribing the Epitaphs, and monumental Inscriptions in the Cathedral Church of Lincoln, (163 in number,) as they were extant September 10 1641. wherein he seems to have been assisted by Mr William (afterwards Sir William) Dugdale. From his MS. they have been published by Browne Willis, Esq; (40), and since that by Mr Francis Peck, in his Desiderata Curiosa (41).

(38) Walton, p. 34. 40.

(39) Wood, Ath. col. 319.

(40) Survey of the Cathedrals, Vol. II, p. 5, 8, &c.

(41) Vol. II. buck 3. p. 1, &c.

[CC] The worthiest and learnedest of his contemporaries speak of him in the most respectful terms.] Bishop Prideaux calls him, 'that clear and solid man Mr Sanderfon: None states a question more punctually, resolves it more satisfactorily, answers all objections more fully.' — Archbishop Uther styles him the judicious Dr Sanderfon; and that in a case he had proposed to him, he returned a happy Answer, that satisfied all his scruples, and cleared up all his doubts. — 'That stead and well weighed man Dr Sanderfon (says Dr Hammond) conceives all things deliberately, dwells upon them discreetly, discerns things that differ exactly, passeth his judgment rationally, and expresses it aptly, clearly and honestly.' — Mr R. Baxter professes he honoured him for his Learning, Judgment, Moderation, and Piety. — Bishop Hall styles him 'the most exact and faithful Casuist living.' — And Dr T. Fuller, 'a no less plain and profitable than able and profound Casuist.' C

SANDYS, SANDS, or SANDES [EDWIN], successively Bishop of Worcester and London, and Archbishop of York, in the XVth century; and ancestor of the present Lord Sandys; was the fourth son of William Sandys, Esq; [A] by Margaret his wife, daughter and heir of William Rawlinson of the county of York, Esq; (a) [B] He was born at Hawkhead, within the liberty of Fournes-fells, or Estwaite, in Lancashire [C], in the year 1519 [D]. His university education was at St John's-college in Cambridge; where

(a) Peckage by Ar. Collins, Esq; edit. 1756. Vol. V. p. 432.

[A] Was the fourth son of William Sandys, Esq;] This Gentleman was a Justice of Peace, and the King's Receiver for the county of Lancaster (1). He was a Protestant; and, dying in 1548, was buried in the parish church of Hawkhead in Lancashire; where there is a monument to his memory. — According to some Authors, our Prelate was the second son of George Sandys, by Margaret, Daughter of — Dixon, of London (2). — The Family was originally from St Bees in Cumberland, where they lived in good fashion and repute; and the collateral branches spread into the Counties of Derby, Lancaster, Bucks, Worcester and Kent. Of this family was William Sandes, Kt. first Lord Sandes of the Vine, in 1523, and Chamberlain, of the Household to King Henry VIII (3).

(1) Wood, Athenæ, edit. 1721, Vol. I. col. 694.

(2) Strype's Ann. Vol. II. p. 552.

(3) See Strype's Annals, Vol. I. p. 388, 399. and Vol. III. p. 552.

[B] By Margaret his wife, daughter and heir of William Rawlinson, &c.] For this we have the authority of Arthur Collins, Esq; who grounds himself upon the collections of Gregory King, Lancaster herald. He calls her 'Margaret, daughter and heir of William Rawlson, of the county of York, and cousin and heir to Rawlison, Abbot of Furnes (4).'

(4) Collins, as above, p. 432.

But, surely, instead of Rawlson, he means Rawlinson. — Antony Wood says, Margaret his wife was 'daughter of John Dixon of London (5).' And William Dixon, and Miles Dixon, being named by Mr William Sandys, two of the supervisors of his will; That seems to countenance Wood's relation. However, we are forced to leave it doubtful, and undecided.

(5) Athenæ, as above. See also Strype's Annals, Vol. III. p. 552.

[C] He was born at Hawkhead, &c.] The place of his birth is as uncertain as his Mother's name. That he was born at Hawkhead, is positively asserted by the learned antiquary Mr Dodsworth: who alleges, that in token thereof, he built a free-school there, and endowed it with 30l. per annum, for a master and usher (6). But T. Fuller says (7), he was born at Conyby in Yorkshire. And others at London (8). — The father writes himself, in his will, of Estwaite-Furnese (9).

(6) Collect. R. Thoresby de Leeds.

(7) Worthies, in Lancashire, p. 110.

(8) Collins, as above, p. 435.

(9) Id. p. 432.

[D] In the year 1519.] At the time of his death, which was July 10. 1588, we learn from his Epitaph, that he was sixty-nine years of age — vixit autem LXIX. — And that fixes the time of his birth to the year 1519.

[E] He

where he took his degree of Bachelor of Arts in 1539, and that of Master in 1541; but was never Fellow of that, or any other college (b). In 1542, he was junior Proctor of the university. And, on, or about, the year 1547, proceeded Bachelor in Divinity; and was elected Master of Catharine-hall (c). At the time of his father's decease, in 1548, he was Vicar of Haverham (d); and the year following, on December 12, was presented to a Prebend in the cathedral church of Peterburgh (e). The same year, he also commenced Doctor in Divinity (f). In 1552, King Edward VI. granted him a Prebend in the church of Carlisle (g). At the time of that good King's decease, in 1553, Dr Sandys was Vice-chancellor of Cambridge (h). Having early embraced the Protestant Religion, he zealously joined with those who were for setting the Lady Jane Gray on the throne. John Dudley, Duke of Northumberland, coming to Cambridge, in his march against the Princess Mary, required the Doctor, to set forth the Lady Jane's title, in a Sermon the next day before the university. He obeyed [E]; and preached in so pathetick a manner as drew many tears from the audience. And he gave a copy of his sermon to be printed. But he expressed himself with so much prudence and moderation, as abundantly satisfied the Duke; and yet did not violently exasperate the opposite party. The unsteady Duke sent for him, about two days after, to proclaim Queen Mary: which he refused. Whereupon he was deprived of his office of Vice-chancellor, and preferments [F]; and conveyed prisoner to the Tower of London (i). Having remained there twenty-nine weeks, he was sent to the Marshalsea, on Wyatt's insurrection; who, at his coming to Southwark, invited the Doctor to come and give him his company and advice; but he prudently excused himself. After he had been nine weeks prisoner in the Marshalsea, he was set at liberty, by the mediation of Sir Thomas Holcroft, the Knight-marshal. But some whisperers suggesting to Bishop Gardiner, that he was the greatest heretic in England, and one, who, of all others, had most corrupted the university of Cambridge; Gardiner ordered strict search to be made for him. He was however so happy as to escape out of England, and in May 1554 arrived at Antwerp. But he had not been there many hours, when receiving information, that King Philip had ordered search to be made for him, he hastened away to Augsburg: and after staying there fourteen days, he went to Strafburg, where he fixed his abode (k). His wife came there to him, but he had the misfortune to lose her, and one child. Towards the end of the year 1558, he took a journey to Zurich, and lodged five weeks in Peter Martyr's house. Receiving there the agreeable news of bloody Queen Mary's death, he went back to Strafburg, and thence to England, where he arrived January 13, 1558 (l). In March following, he was appointed, by Queen Elizabeth and her Council, one of the nine Protestant Divines [G], who were to hold

(b) Lives of the Protestant Bishops, &c. by J. Le Neve, Part II. p. 21. edit. 1720, 8vo.

(c) Ibid. and Fasti, p. 394. 430.

(d) See his father's Will, in Collins, as above, p. 432.

(e) Dr Br. Wilkie's Survey of the Cathedrals, Vol. II. p. 518.

(f) Le Neve, Lives, &c. as above.

(g) Strype's Ecclesiastical Memorials, Vol. II. p. 531.

(h) T. Fuller's Hist. of Cambridge, p. 130.

(i) July 25. Memorials, &c. by J. Strype, Vol. III. p. 15. and Annals, Vol. I. p. 392, &c.

(k) See Discourse of the Troubles at Frankford, &c. edit. 1575, 4to. p. 23, 99, 101, 103, 161, 174.

(l) J. Foxe's Ecclesiastical History, &c. Vol. II. edit. 1610. p. 1891, &c.

[E] He obey'd. The warning was short for such an auditory, yet he did not refuse, but went into his chamber, and so to bed. He rose at three of the clock the next morning, took his bible in his hand, and earnestly prayed to God, that it might fall open where a most fit text should be for him to treat of. The bible fell open upon the first chapter of Joshua, where he found a text for that time the most convenient he could have chosen, viz. ver. 16, 17, 18. ——— The Duke, with the rest of the nobility, required Dr Sandys to put his Sermon in writing, and appointed Mr Leaver to go to London, and get it printed. Dr Sandys required one day and a half for writing it, and at the day appointed Mr Leaver came ready booted to receive it of him. As he was delivering it, one of the Beadles came weeping, and prayed him to shift for himself, the Duke being retired, and Queen Mary proclaimed. Dr Sandys shewed no concern at what was said, but delivered the Sermon written. The Duke of Northumberland that night sent for Dr Sandys, to proclaim Queen Mary in the Market-place at Cambridge, and told him she was a merciful woman, and that he had sent to know her pleasure, and looked for a general pardon. The Dr replied, 'My life is not dear unto me, neither have I said or done any thing that urgeth my conscience; for what I have spoken of the state, I have instructions warranted by the subscriptions of sixteen counsellors; neither yet have I spoke further than the word of God and the laws of the realm do warrant me; come of me what God will; but be you assured, you shall never escape death, for if she should save you, they that now rule will kill you (lc).'

[F] Whereupon he was deprived of his office, &c.] Mr Thomas Mildmay, being one of those who came to tell him that he was to be carried prisoner to the Tower of London, said to him, He marvelled that a learned man would speak so unadvisedly against a good prince, and willfully run into such danger. To which Dr Sandys replied, 'I shall not be ashamed of bonds, but if I could do as Mr Mildmay can, I need not to fear bonds: for you came down against Queen Mary, and armed in the field, and now return for Queen Mary; before, a traytor, and now, a great friend. I cannot, with one mouth, blow hot and cold after this sort (ll).'

[G] One of the nine Protestant Divines.] At his first return to England he appears to have been a very zealous Protestant, and to have been averse, or at least indifferent, to the use of the Habits: and entirely against retaining any kind of Images in Churches. For, in a letter to Archbishop Parker, he has these words (12). 'I hope we shall not be forced to use the Vestments, but that the meaning of the law is, that others in the mean time shall not take them away, but that they shall remain for the Queen.' ——— And as for Images, he was for burning them all, as the law ordained. Queen Elizabeth was for keeping a Crucifix, with Mary and John, in the most conspicuous part of every church. But Bishop Sandys was so vehement against it, that he was very near losing the Queen's favour, and his bishopric. This we learn from the following passage in a letter of his to Peter Martyr. ——— 'De Imaginibus, jam pridem non nihil erat controversæ. R. Majestas non alienum esse a Verbo Dei, immo in commodum Ecclesiæ fore putabat, si Imago Christi crucifixi, una cum Maria & Johanne, ut tales, in celebriori Ecclesiæ loco poneretur, ubi ab omni populo facile conficeretur. Quidam ex nobis longè aliter judicabant, præsertim cum omnes omnis generis Imagines, in proxima nostra visitatione, idque publica autoritate, non solum sublata, verumetiam combustæ erant: Cumque huic Idolo, præ cæteris, ab ignara & superstitionosa plebe adoratio solet adhiberi. Ego, quia vehementer eram in ista re, nec ullo modo consentire poteram, ut lapsus occasio Ecclesiæ Christi daretur; non multum aberat, quin & ab officio amoverer, & Principis indignationem incurrerem. At Deus, in cujus manu corda sunt Regum, pro temperate tranquillitatem dedit, & Ecclesiam Anglicanam ab hujusmodi offendiculis liberavit: tantum manent in Ecclesia nostra Vestimenta illa Papistica, Capas intellige, quas diu non duraturas speramus.' ——— Bishop Burnet, who

(ll) Ibid.

(12) Neal's Hist. of the Puritans, Vol. I. edit. 1732, 8vo. p. 194.

(lc) J. Foxe, as above.

hold a disputation against so many of the Romish persuasion, before both houses of Parliament at Westminster (m). Also, he was one of the Commissioners for preparing a form of Prayer, or Liturgy, to be laid before the Parliament, and for deliberating on other matters for the Reformation of the Church (n). And being looked upon as one of the most eminent Protestant Divines, who were fittest to fill up the sees vacant by the deprivation of the Popish prelates, he was nominated to the see of Carlisle, which he refused; but accepted of the Bishopric of Worcester (o) [H], vacant by the deprivation of Richard Pates. We are told, that he alienated good part of the revenues of this see (p); and he had a long controversy with Sir John Bourn of Worcester [I]; which grew to such a height, that Bishop Sandys was forced to vindicate his own life and innocence, unhandfomely traduced by Sir John, in an Information, or Declaration, of his to the Privy-Council (q). Moreover, we are told, that he would not suffer Papists to remain in his diocese: and herein he was so earnest, that he would not be persuaded to give them a toleration, by any prayers or intercessions made to him in their behalf (r). He appears indeed to have been of a severe disposition; for, in some of his first visitations, he deprived clergymen, which occasioned warm and expostulating letters between him and Archbishop Parker (s). Being a man well skilled in the original languages, as well as an excellent preacher, he was, about the year 1565, one of the Bishops appointed to make a new Translation of the Bible: and the portions thereof which fell to his share, were the first and second books of Kings, and the first and second of Chronicles (t). Upon the translation of Dr Edmund Grindal from the see of London to the Archbishopric of York, in 1570, Bishop Sandys was pitched upon by the Queen to succeed him at London. He earnestly excused himself a while, but accepted of it at last [K]. In 1571, he was ordered by who hath published this letter, in the Collection of Records at the end of the Third Part of his History of the Reformation (13), hath mistaken the meaning of it. For he translates it (14), as if the Queen was for having the Crucifix, with Mary and John, still in her Chapel only. Whereas it plainly means, that she was for having them in the most conspicuous part of every Church — in celebriori Ecclesie loco. — We must add, that it is very incorrectly printed, especially in the edition of 1753, now before us. For instead of, De Imaginibus, it is printed, Deo Imaginibus; and five lines lower, Quidam ex nobis, instead of, Quidam, &c. — The rest of the Protestant Divines concerned in the Disputation, were, Dr Scory bishop of Chichester, Dr Cox, Mr Whitehead, Mr Grindall, Mr Horne, Mr Gest, Mr Elmer, Mr Jewell (15).

[H] But accepted of the Bishopric of Worcester.] His Congé d'exilire bore date Novemb. 12. 1559. He was elected the 25th of the same month; confirm'd on the 20th of December; and consecrated the next day. And had restitution of the temporalities March 23 following (16).

[I] And had a long controversy with Sir John Bourn of Worcester.] This Sir John had been Secretary to the late Queen Mary. And the first occasion of the difference between them is said to be this: In one of his visitations, the Bishop was informed, that an Altar-stone was left standing in the Church belonging to the parish where Sir John lived. The Bishop commanded it to be pulled down and defaced, according to the Queen's injunctions. But Sir John commanded the contrary, and that it should not be broken and defaced, but preserved; and, in contempt of the Bishop, caused it to be carried out of the church to his own house, where it remained. In some difference afterwards between them, the Bishop complained of it to the Queen's Council. And Sir John falsely alledged in his own defence, That the stone was taken down a year before the Bishop came to the Church, and was reserved and laid aside towards the pavement of one of the isles; but that it was never brought to his house, nor carried out of the Church (17). — However, long before this Sir John had been an enemy to Dr Sandys, of which take this account in the Bishop's own words. — 'I being prisoner in the Tower, suit was made to Queen Mary and the privy-council for my enlargement: and it was reported unto me, the bill of my Delivery was allowed by the privy council, and sent up in the docket to be assigned by the Queen. When it came thereunto, Sir John Bourne hindered that bill, by reporting, what my father was; what my brother was; and how that I was the greatest Heretic in Cambridge, and a corrupter of the university. And so I was stayed until it pleased God to deliver me. — This displeasure long since I had cast out of my mind, and freely forgiven; whereof God will bear me witness (18).' — The chief Imputations Sir John brought against the Bishop, were, That he had partly pulled down, and suffered to go to ruin, his Manor-houses at Grimley, and Northwike: That he had granted leases of the best of his parsonages in behalf of his children: And had granted reversions of farms and leases to others, after forty years and more to come: sold the woods, and timber, belonging to his see, &c (19). — But, at length, Sir John was, by order of the council, committed to the Marshalsey, where he remained six or seven weeks: and was forced to make his submission in writing to the Bishop, in the year 1563. Notwithstanding which he continued to take all opportunities of vexing the Bishop, as appears from the following clause of a letter of his to Secretary Cecil, in 1569. — 'But I have at hand a constant and cruel enemy, who desires nothing more than my destruction. He daily molested me, and maketh me weary of mine office. He will, if he can, work my woe. None love him for himself, but for his Religion (20) many like him (21).'

[K] He earnestly excused himself a while.] Being conscious, as he said, of his own inability for so great a charge, and not caring, perhaps, to be placed so much in the view of the Court, and the whole realm; pleading withal his want of health, and bodily infirmity. He sent up therefore his Chancellor, to lay before Secretary Cecil his unwillingness on those accounts to remove from Worcester. But the Chancellor did his message in such a manner, as if the Bishop was not in earnest, and required only some further sollicitation to accept of that see: which caused a gentle reprimand of him from Cecil. The Bishop, in his Answer, writes thus. 'I shall humbly pray you not to be offended, that thus often with my Letters I molest your Honour. My former and whole suit was simple, my meaning plain; saying of myself as I thought of myself. If my Chancellor hath otherwise insinuated, he did it without commission or knowledge of me. The wants in mind, and the infirmities in body, were the chief causes of my refusal. Yet hearing by my Chancellor, that you were offended with me, and understanding that the Queen's Majesty milked to alter her Highness determination; and being sundry ways advertised of the Clamour of London against me for my refusal, and how that with universal joyfulness the people desired me; this touched my conscience very near, and made me write to your honour in such sort as I did — Sir, if the Queen's Majesty and the privy Council be not otherwise resolved, if you bid me come up, I will, and take that office upon me, whatsoever become of me; and stand to your favour and courtesy — (22).' — Accepting therefore, at last, as I say, of the See of London, he was elected June 2; had the royal assent July 1. the temporalities restored the 13th, and was enthronized the 20th of the same month (23).

(m) Holinshed's Chronicle, edit. 1587. p. 1182, 1183.

(n) Strype's Annals, Vol. I. edit. 1725. p. 81. and Life of Archbishop Grindal

(o) Epistola ad P. Martyrem; in Collection of Records, Vol. III. of Bishop Burnet's Hist. of the Reformation, edit. 1753. p. 639.

(p) Br. Willis's Survey, as above, Vol. I. p. 646.

(13) P. 639, 640, 641.

(14) Page 291.

(15) Holinshed, as above, p. 1183.

(16) J. Le Neve's Fasti, &c. p. 299. Acta Publica, published by T. Rymer, Vol. XV. p. 550, 553. and Bihop Godwin's Catalog. of Bishops, among the Bishops of Worcester.

(17) Strype's Life of Archbishop Parker, as above, p. 78. and Annals, Vol. I. p. 338, &c.

(18) Annals, Vol. I. p. 389, 390.

(q) Archbishop Grindal's Life, by Strype, p. 2. and Life of Archbishop Parker, p. 78. and Annals, Vol. I. edit. 1725. p. 386—404.

(r) Life of Archbishop Parker, by J. Strype, p. 65.

(s) Idem, p. 78. 79. and Appendix. p. 25.

(t) Life of Archbishop Parker, p. 208, 403. and Lewis's History of the Translations of the Bible, 8vo. edit. 1739. p. 236.

(19) Ibid. p. 401, 402.

(20) Popery.

(21) Ibid. p. 401, 403, 404.

(22) Strype's Annals, Vol. II. p. 27, 28. and Life of Archbishop Parker, p. 256.

(23) J. Le Neve's Fasti, p. 180. and Rymer, Vol. XV. p. 683, 684.

by the Queen to assist the Archbishop of Canterbury in the ecclesiastical Commission both against Papists and Puritans [L]. He proceeded against them with vigor and severity, and advised that a national Council should be held to suppress them (u). All which exposed him to their censures and invectives; and in their libels occasioned him to be much aspersed, for the blotting of his good name, and the endangering of his credit and reputation in his ministry. He complained of it therefore to the Queen's chief officers, and desired, that those slanderers might be brought before the temporal magistrate, the council, or the star-chamber (w). We find also, that he claimed to be super-intendent of the Dutch church in London, as his predecessor Bishop Grindal was; which occasioned some uneasiness between him and that congregation (x). In 1576, he was translated to the Archbishopric of York [M]. And, no sooner was he possessed of it, but he had like to lose his manor and palace of Bishop's-thorp; under pretence, that it was fit for the use of the President of the Council in the North. But the Archbishop stood resolute, and would not part with it upon any account (y). His successor in the see of London; Bishop Ælmer, gave him also some trouble about the rents of that bishopric, and dilapidations (z). He visited his province in 1577, but was refused admittance in the church of Durham by William Wittingham the Dean, who had no regular Orders, as having received them at Geneva; and some of the Prebendaries; the see being then void: and so high did the contest grow, that the Bishop proceeded to excommunication. This affair lasted 'till the year 1578 (a) [N]. With his own Dean at York, Dr Matthew Hurton; he likewise had great and uneasy disputes (b). He made it a rule, not to grant the advowson, or promise of any preferment in his gift, before it actually became void, nor ever to take a resignation (c). Not only in his own diocese, but even in the university of Cambridge, he was very diligent and active in finding out Papists, and defeating their pernicious designs (d). In May 1582 [O], as he was visiting his diocese, the most audacious attempt that malice and revenge could possibly suggest, was made, to ruin at once his reputation; namely, by an inn-keeper's wife at Doncaster getting into bed to him; through the contrivance of Sir Robert Stapleton, and other wicked persons (e). A particular account of that infamous conspiracy [P] is given in the note, from authentic vouchers.

The

[L] Both against Papists and Puritans.] What their sentiments concerning those sorts of men were, is manifest from the following letter subscribed by the Archbishop, and Bishop Sandys. 'These times are troublesome. The Church is sore assaulted; but not so much of open enemies, who can less hurt; as of pretended favourers, and false Brethren, who, under the colour of Reformation, seek the ruin and subversion both of Learning and Religion. Neither do they only cut down the ecclesiastical state, but also give a great push at the civil policy. Their colour is sincerity under the countenance of simplicity; but in very truth, they are ambitious spirits, and can abide no superiority. Their fancies are favoured of some of great calling, who seek to gain by other mens losses. And most plausible are these new devices, to a great number of the people, who labour to live in all Liberty (24). — To restrain them therefore as much as possible, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners sent a letter to all Churchwardens, wherein they straitly charged and commanded them, 'That in no wise they suffer any person or Minister to minister any Sacrament, or say any publick Prayers, in any of their Churches, Chapels, or other places appointed for common Prayers, in any other order, maner or fort, than only according to the prescription in the book of Common Prayer, and the Queen's Majesties law published in that behalf. And that in no wise they suffer any person publicly or privately to teach, read, or preach, in any the said Churches, parishes, Chapels, private Houses, or other places, unless such be licenced to preach, read, or teach, by the Queen's highness authority, the Archbishop of Canterbury his licence, or by the licence of the Bishop of the Dioces, &c (25).'

[M] He was translated to the Archbishopric of York.] The congé d'elire was issued out January 19, 1576. He was elected the 25th of the same month: confirmed the 8th of March: and had restitution of the temporalities on the 16th (26).

[N] This affair lasted 'till the year 1578.] The 14th of May, in that year, a commission was directed to the Archbishop, with Henry Earl of Huntington President in the North, Richard Barnes bishop of Durham, and others, to visit the church of Durham, which had undergone great damages, by the insolvency, neglect, and injuries, done by the Dean, Canons, and other officers of the said church; and they were empowered to enquire into the management of the revenues thereunto belonging (27).

VOL. V. No. 300.

[O] In May 1582.] Mr Strype says, it was in May 1581 (28). But the decree for the punishment of the Conspirators in that wicked affair, was made the eighth of May, 25 Elizab. [1583]. And it is therein said, that the affair happened the tenth of May last, or before, viz. 1582 (29).

[P] A particular account of that infamous conspiracy is given here.] Sir John Harrington, who was a contemporary author, hath thus related the affair. — 'There was great kindnesse, and had long continued between Archbishop Sands and Sir Robert Stapleton a Knight of Yorkshire, who in those days for a man well spoken, properly seen in languages, a comely and goodly personage, had scant an equal, and (except Sir Philip Sidney) no superiour in England: for which reasons the Archbishop of all his neighbours and countrey men, did make a speciall account of him. About the year 1583. also he was high-sheriffe of Yorkshire, and met the Judges with sevenscore men in futable liveries, and being at this time likewise a widdower, he wooed and won, and wedded soon after, one of the best reputed widdows in the West of England. In this felicity he failed with ful fails, but somewhat too high, and no lesse the Archbishop in like prosperity of wealth, and friends and children, yet seeming, above all, to joy in the friendship of this Knight, who answered in all good correspondence, not onely of outward complement, but inward comfort. — These two so friendly neighbours and comforts swimming in this calm of content, at last hapned to fall foul one on another by this occasion. The Knight in his great good fortunes, having as great designs; among other things, had laid the foundation of a fair house, or rather Palace, the model whereof he had brought out of Italy, which house he intended to name Stapletons stay; and for that cause invited the Archbishop in good kindnesse to see it, and requested him, for the more credit, and as it were blessing to the house, that his grace would give it the aforesaid name. But when the Archbishop had fully beheld-it, and in his judgment found it fitter for a Lord Treasurer of England, then for a Knight of Yorkshire; He said to him, would you have me call this intended house Stapletons stay. Nay rather let me say to you, stay Stapleton; for if you go forward to set up this house, it will pull you down. How often a man loses a friend with a jest, and how grievous it is for a mans vanity to be croft in the humour! This speech of my Lords that I should think, intended friendly, uttered faithfully,

40 B

(c) Ibid. p. 577, 578.

(d) Ibid. p. 632—634.

(e) Sir John Harrington's Briefe View of the State of the Church of England &amp;c. Lond. 1633, p. 172, &amp;c. J. L. Neve's Lives, &amp;c. Part. ii. p. 36—57. Strype's Annals, Vol. III. p. 98, 108.

(28) Annals, Vol. III. p. 98.

(29) See J. Le Neve's Lives, as above, Part. ii. p. 40, 43, 57.

(u) Strype's Life of Archbishop Parker, p. 329, 330, 433, 434, 437.

(w) Ibid. p. 421, 422, 438, 439.

(x) Ibid. p. 337.

(y) Strype's Annals, Vol. II. p. 424, 425, 426.

(z) Ibid. p. 426, 427, 570—576, and Life of Bishop Aylmer, p. 25—29, 74—77.

(a) Annals, as above, Vol. II. p. 481, 482, 518—525, and Appendix, p. 116.

(b) Idem, Vol. II. p. 574—578, and Vol. III. p. 320—326.

(24) Strype's Life of Archbishop Parker, p. 433.

(25) Ibid. Appendix, p. 101.

(26) Rymer's Acta Publica, Vol. XV. p. 768, 771, and Le Neve's Fasti, p. 311.

(27) Rymer's Acta Publica, Vol. XV. p. 783.

The ground and reason of it, was, that Sir Robert wanted to compel the Archbishop, to grant and applyed even fatherly unto him, he took in so deep disdain and despite, that howsoever he smothered it for the present, from that time forward he sought a mean to revenge it. And wanting neither wit to devise, nor courage to execute his design, he found out, or at least he supposed he had found a stratagem, not onely to wreak this scorn on the good Bishop that mistrusted nothing, but also to make the old mans purse pay for the finishing of the new house. He acquaints him [self] with an officer in my Lords house, some malecontent that had been denied a lease. These two devise, that when my Lord should lie next at Doncaster, where the hostess of the house having been (formerly I suppose) Mistres Sands maid, was bold sometimes to bring his Lordship a cawdle to his beds side (for in charity I may farmise no worse) Sir Robert should also by chance come and host at the same house. This bad wife and her good man are made partakers and parties of this stratagem, her part was but a naked part, viz. to slip into my Lords bed in her smock, mine hoast must sodainly be jealous, and swear that he holds his reputation, though he be but a poor man, more dear than that he can endure such an indignity, and thereupon calls Sir Robert Stapleton, brings him to the Bishop's chamber in his night-gown, takes them in bed together with no small exclamation. The Knight that acted his part with most art, and least suspicion, takes great pains to pacifie the hoast, conjures all that were admitted to secrecie and silence, and sending all to their lodgings without tumult, asketh of my Lord how this came to passe. The Bishop tells him with a great protestation, that he was betrayed by his man and his hoast, little suspecting the Knight to be of the Quorum. The Knight fooths him in all he said, condoles the great mischance, is sorrowful for the danger, and careful for the honour of the Bishop, and specially the Church. The distressed Archbishop distrusting no fraud in him, asketh his advice in this disaster, and following his counsel from time to time, gives the Hoast a peece of money, the false officer a farm, and the Knight for his travail in this matter many friendly recompences. But when he found after all this smoothing and soothing, that he grew so bold at last to preesse him beyond all good manner, for the good Mannour of Soothwell, then he found that in foath all was not well, and was even compell'd too late, to that he might much better have done much sooner, viz. To complain to the Lords of the Council, and to his ancient and dear friend, the Earl of Leicester (for whose father he had almost lost his life) by whose help, he got them call'd to the Star-Chamber, Ore tenus, where they were for this conspiracy convicted, fined and imprisoned.

But a fuller account of this affair having been published by Mr Le Neve (30), from an exemplification of the Decree made in the Star Chamber 8 May 25 Eliz. (preserved in the Harleian Library) we shall give the following extracts of it. That Decree gives a very particular account of the contrivers of this villainy, and sets forth. 'That Sir Robert Stapleton having conceived some secret displeasure and malice against the most reverend Father in God Edwin Archbishop of York, and yet outwardly bearing a dissembling shew and countenance of friendship toward him; Barnard Mawd who had lately served the said Archbishop, and upon sundry great misbehaviours and abuses by him committed, was put out of his service; in respect whereof he was become a malicious enemy against the said Archbishop; William Sysson an inn-keeper, a man of poor and base condition, fallen from some wealth which was left him by his parents into great need and poverty, through his own wastefull and disordered life; Anne Sysson wife of the said William, a woman of a very dishonest and infamous life and conversation, trained in service before her marriage in the house of the said Robert Stapleton, and Alexander Farbis a poor lewd runagate Scot servant to the said Sysson, and chamberlain in his house; with certain other their confederates, namely John Mallorej Gent. and Roger Thornely servant to the said Sir Robert Stapleton; enter'd into a most malicious and wicked conspiracy against the Archbishop of York, the second Prelate of this realm: Who was in May last occupied in visitation of his diocese, and returning towards York by Doncaster was there lodged the 10th of that month. —The conspiracy was,—that the said Anne Sysson should at midnight, when the said Archbishop was in his bed on sleep, find means to come into his chamber, for performance whereof he had before layd sundry ways, and there step into his bed; at what time they also agreed they would be all ready to enter the chamber and take them together, not doubting, but that, being many to one, they might, if they were so enforced, easily bear the world in hand, that the lewd woman had been longer with him before their coming, and was taken with him in adultery; or if the Archbishop, for fear to call his name in question should yield to any mean that the matter might be concealed, that then every of them had thereby opportunity offered to work for their advantage—what every of their occasions required, whether it were for slander of religion, gain of money, credit in the country by the Archbishop's countenance, or some other benefit; and that this device, though long before resolved, as Sysson and his wife confessed, was not to be put in execution but when Sir Robert Stapleton might be present. According to which agreement, the Archbishop being in bed asleep at midnight, was awaked with the sudden terror of William Sysson; who, falsely pretending that he had taken his wife in bed, offered his dagger drawn to the Archbishop's breast, and made shew that he purposed in revenge of his supposed injury to have offered him great violence: and that immediately, upon this occasion, Sir Robert Stapleton, pretending not to have been any way acquainted beforehand with the matter, but that he came thither upon sending for by Sysson, and as called from his chamber by the said Alexander by Sysson's appointment; and putting on the countenance of a singular friend to the Archbishop, whereof he made shew, as well by sending away Sysson and his wife out of the Archbishop's chamber, as by many solemn protestations of his earnest love of the Archbishop, and singular care of his credit and ministry; induced the Archbishop, contrary to his earnest desire, which he then declared, of having this vile and standerous injury offered to him by Sysson and his wife immediately discovered and revenged, to stay until the morning: laying before him many perils and dangers to his name and the credit of Religion that might ensue, if, being one against so many, he would attempt to make any stir in that cause; persuading him, that notwithstanding his innocency, which the Archbishop earnestly protested, and he then acknowledg'd, it were better to stop the mouths of needy persons, than to bring his name into a doubtful question, whereunto he promised his faithful assistance and secrecy. And Sir Robert having, under colour of grave counsel proceeding from a special affection to the Archbishop and his credit, procured the Archbishop to omit the present opportunity to discover that treachery; and from that time forward, by other instances of deep dissimulation, made him believe he was a sure friend unto whom he might give trust: but also by devising from time to time, by the space of seven or eight months, sundry practises and policies, to minister to the Archbishop occasion of fear that his name should come in question by treachery wrought against him at Doncaster, drew from the said Archbishop sundry sums of money, and gave other attempts to have enriched himself with the spoil of the Bishoprick. At length, the Archbishop discovering Sir Robert's malice and treacherous dissimulation, and detesting such horrible treachery cloaked with the holy countenance of Religion and Friendship, he adventured, in confidence of his own innocency, to be the first means himself to bring the whole cause to examination before the Council. When Sir Robert, and his confederates, understood that the matter was to come to a publick hearing, they entered, both at York and at London, into a second conspiracy, binding themselves by oath each to other, that they would never acknowledge they were privy beforehand to any practise or purpose, that Sysson's wife should go to the Archbishop's chamber at Doncaster, but that they were on fudden called thereunto and found them together, not doubting any such matter when they were called. And, after their commitments to several prisons, intelligence and instructions passed from the one to the other, as well by letters as messages, whereby direction and notice was given from the one to the other, what

(30) Lives, &c.
as above, p. 42,
&c.

grant him an advantageous lease of his manors of Southwell and Scrooby [2]. And he even procured the Queen to solicit him to do it; but all in vain (f). The same attempt was repeated in 1587, in the Earl of Leicester's behalf; and likewise without success (g). Endeavours also were used, in 1588, to get from him his Archbishopal house in London: which, however, he would not be prevailed upon to part with (h). In his time, usury was so exorbitant, that it amounted to cent. per cent. He endeavoured to restrain it, by preaching, and by bringing the offenders into the ecclesiastical commission, but met with great opposition (i). After a life full of troubles and contention, owing principally to the iniquity of the times, our learned Primate left this world on the 10th of July, 1588, in the 69th year of his age: and was buried in the collegiate church of Southwell, where a monument is erected to his memory (k). His character is given below [R]: as also an account of his writings [S]. He was twice married; first, to a daughter of

Mr Sandes

(f) J. Le Neve's Lives, &c. as above, p. 58, &c.

(g) Strype's Annals, Vol. III. p. 451.

(h) Ibid. p. 550, 551.

(i) Ibid. p. 320, &c.

(k) J. Le Neve, Lives, &c. as above, Part 2. p. 65, and Epitaph.

had been confessed, what concealed, and what was to be uttered. When they came to be particularly examined upon oath, Sir Robert, and Mawd perjured in their former false-devised and counterfeited tales. But William Sysson with great tears confessed his offence, and both opened his treacherous handling of the Archbishop in his house, which he declared to have been a matter concerted amongst themselves, without any desert or shew of guiltiness on the Archbishop's part, for ought that he could ever hear or see: And also shewed, that their false tales which they had before declared to the Lords, tending to the Archbishop's defamation, were things of their own heads forged and conspired at York, whereunto they had tyed themselves each to other by oath without any matter of truth. Sir Robert and Mawd hearing that Sysson had discovered the whole affair, confessed their own treachery; but Alexander Farbis perjured in his former stubbornness. — In the end, the Archbishop was found and declared entirely innocent of the wicked slanders and imputations raised against him. And Sir Robert Stapleton, Bern. Mawd, William Sysson, and Farbis, were ordered to be committed to the Fleet, there to remain prisoners three years, and further during the Queen's pleasure: — Sir Robert, at the next assizes at York, publicly to acknowledge the Archbishop's innocence, submit to him, ask him forgiveness upon his knees; pay to her Majesty's use 3000 l. and stand at her mercy and pleasure to be degraded of his knighthood. — Mawd, Sysson, and Farbis to stand in the pillory at Westminster, and at the next assizes in York; and Farbis to have one of his ears cut off upon the pillory, at each place: They three to pay the following fines to the Queen, Sysson 500 l. Mawd 300 l. Farbis 100 l. and also publicly acknowledge their own offence and the Archbishop's innocency, and ask his forgiveness. — Also, that before the said Sir Robert, Mawd, Sysson, and Alexander, were delivered of their imprisonment, they should make satisfaction and restitution to the Archbishop, of the sum of 703 l. which they had injuriously extorted and gotten from him. Lastly, that Alexander Farbis should be banished the realm for ever. Sir John Harrington observes (31),

(31) As above, p. 180.

that this iniquitous business was the ruin of Sir Robert Stapleton. For, though he lived to have part of his fine releas'd by his Majesty's clemency; yet he toft up and down all his life without any great contentment, from Wiltshire into Wales, and thence to the Isle of Man, a while to Chelsey, but little to York-shire where his Stay should have been. [2] Of his manors of Southwell and Scrooby.] He writ upon that occasion a letter to the Queen, wherein he excuses himself from parting with those two manors, and gives the following account of the value of them. There pertain to these two manors as members thereof 32 towns, and as it is thought 1000 tenants, poor copyholders for the most part, which have enjoy'd great liberties and customes: All these by this lease may be racked, and, as the prophet saith, the skin pulled off their backs; the cry whereof would sound in your Majesty's eares to your great discontent. The manor of Southwell hath belonging unto it three parks well furnished with deer; by virtue of this lease they may all be disparted, and turned to greater gain. In this lease be all R. granted, which thing within the space of 20 years and less will make the annual rent of these two manors above 1000 l. by year, if the land be racked, and as now a days amongst men is commonly used. The woods now growing are esteem'd worth 5000 l. so that the great abatement of the annual rent before-mentioned, the want of the houses, the cutting down of all the woods, the great liberties and royalties pertaining to these two manors, the great benefit of these R. — with perquisites in courts, felons, and deadans goods, with all other commodities belonging to these two manors and their members, would within the compass of this lease, if it should be granted, be a loss unto the see of York seventy thousand pounds at the least. — A little after he adds, — And that it may appear to your Majesty that I seeke not myselfe, but the good of the Church, I shall most gladly give all the substance that I have as it shall please you to appoint; as also to resign up the whole interest that I have in this Bishoprick to your Majesty's hands to dispose of, or else what thing soever lieth in me to doe, which with a good conscience towards God I may, that shall be ever most ready to your Majesty's command. — It was dard 24 Novemb. 1582 (32).

(32) J. Le Neve, as above, p. 61, &c.

[R] His character, &c.] It is thus represented in his epitaph. — Homo hominum a malitia & vindicta innocentissimus, magnanimus, apertus, & tantum nescius adulari, summè liberalis atque misericors, hospitalissimus, optimus, facilis, & in sola vitia superbus: scilicet, haud minoram quam locutus est vixit, & fuit. In Evangelii prædicandi laboribus ad extremum usque halitum mirabiliter assiduus. A fermonibus ejus nunquam non melior discederes. Facundus volebat esse, & videbatur. Ignavos, sedulitatis suæ conscius, oderat. Bonas literas auxit pro facultatibus. Ecclesie patrimonium, velut rem Deo sacratam decuit, intactum defendit. Gratia qua floruit apud illustrissimam mortalium Elizabetham effecit; ne hanc in qua jacet Ecclesiam, tu jacentem cerneret. — The substance of which is — He was quite innocent against the malice and revenge of the world; courageous, open-hearted, not knowing how to flatter, extremely liberal and merciful, very hospitable and good, easy of access, and harsh only against vice: in a word he lived up to his profession. Assiduous in preaching, to his last breath: You could not help coming away better from his sermons. He endeavoured to be eloquent, and he appeared so. Conscious of his own industry, he hated idleness. He encouraged learning to the utmost of his power. The patrimony of the Church he not only left untouched, but also defended, as a thing consecrated to God. Through his credit with Queen Elizabeth, he saved this church wherein he lieth, from being entirely destroyed.

[S] As also an account of his writings.] Several of his Letters, and other papers, are inserted in Strype's Annals (33); in his Life of Arp. Parker (34); and in his Life of Arp. Whitgift (35); Likewise in Bp. Burnet's History of the Reformation (36); and in other places. — In 1616, two and twenty of his Sermons were collected together, and printed at London, in a small 4to with this title 'Sermons of the most Reverend Father in God, Edwin Archbishop of Yorke, Primat and Metropolitan of England. Some whereof were preached in the parts beyond the seas, in the time of his exile, in the reign of Queene Marie. The residue, in such places of preferment as he enjoyed under her late Majesty, Queene Elizabeth, of famous memorie: viz He was in Anno D. 1559. first consecrated Bishop of Worcester; and thence translated to London in Anno D. 1570, and then removed to York in Anno D. 1576. With a Preface to the Christian Readers of their vfe and benefit; by a most reverend Father now living.' Two of them were preached at Strasburg; four before the Queen; one before the Parliament; five at York; and most of the rest at Paul's cross. His style is good, (33) Vol. I. p. 385, &c. Appendix, p. 80, 86.

(34) Appendix, p. 25.

(35) Appendix, p. 19.

(36) Part II. Collect. of Records, p. 332. and Part III. Coll. of Rec. p. 639.

Mr Sandes of Effex, a gentlewoman beautiful both in body and mind; which dyed at Strafsburg of a consumption (l): fecondly to Cicely, fifter to Sir Thomas Wilford, of Hartridge in Kent, by whom he had feven fons [T], and two daughters. She lived 'till the year 1610 (m). From Sir Samuel, the eldeft fon, is defcended the prefent Lord Sandys.

much fuperior to the generality of the writers of thofe times.

[T] By whom he had feven fons.] Namely Samuel, Edwin, Miles, William, Thomas, Henry, and George. His fecond fon, Sir Edwin, was a learned man; and wrote, 'Europa Speculum, or, a view orurvey of the 'State of Religion in the Wefterne parts of the world. 'Wherein the Romane Religion, and the pregnant 'Policies of the Church of Rome to fupport the fame, 'are notably difplayed.' At his death, in 1629, he bequeathed 1500 l. to the univerfity of Oxford, for the endowment of a metaphyfic lecture.—George, the youngeft, was an excellent Poet, as appears by his tranflation of Ovid's Metamorphofes, his Paraphrafe of the Pfalms, and other Poems.

He alfo publish'd 'A Relation of a Journey begun 'An. Dom. 1610,' or his Travels to the Holy Land, and other places; adorned with cuts, taken moftly from the Devotiffimo Viagio di Zuallardo. Roma 1587. 4to.—He had alfo two daughters, Margaret, and Anne (37).

(m) Ar. Collins, as above, p. 452 —455. Fr. Godwin de Præfulibus, ex edit. Clar. Richardfoni, p. 711. note. p. She was not the wife that went with him to Germany, as is there faid.

(37) Collins's Peerage, as above, p. 454. and Strype's Annals, Vol. III. p. 554.

SAVILE [SIR HENRY], a perfon of great learning, in part of the XVIth and XVIIth centuries, was the fecond fon of Henry Savile [A], by Elizabeth his wife, daughter of Robert Ramsden, Gent. and born at Over-Bradley near Halifax in Yorkfhire, November 30, 1549. In the beginning of the year 1561, he was admitted into Merton-college in Oxford (a) [B]; and January 14, 1565, took the degree of Bachelor of Arts (b), performing his exercifes to the admiration of his auditors: from that time he was efteemed an excellent Philofopher. Soon after he was elected Fellow of his college, in which, as well as in the reft of the univerfity, there were then but very few good fcholars. That imputation he quickly removed, by rendering himfelf eminent in every branch of literature (c). On the 30th of April, 1570, he proceeded Matter of Arts (d); reading for that degree on the Almageft of Ptolemy, which procured him the reputation of a man wonderfully skilled in the Greek language and the Mathematics. In this laft, he voluntarily read a publick Lecture in the Univerfity for fome time. And having now very great intereft, he was elected Proctor for two years together, namely, for 1575 and 1576, an honour not very common (e) [C]. He travelled foon after into France, and other countries; where diligently improving himfelf in all ufeul Learning, in Languages, and the knowledge of the world, he became a moft accomplifhed gentleman. At his return, he was made Tutor for the Greek tongue to Queen Elizabeth, who liked both his parts and perfon. And, about that time, he obliged the world with a Tranflation of part of C. Tacitus [D]. In 1585, he was conftituted Warden of Merton-college (f), which he governed fix and thirty years with great diligence and integrity; making it his chief care, both night and day, to improve it with riches, and all kinds of good literature. For which purpofe, he always made choice of the beft Scholars at the ufual elections of Bachelor-Fellows (g). In 1596, he published a Collection of the beft ancient Writers of our Englifh History [E]. The fame year, Queen Elizabeth made him Provost of

[A] Was the fecond Son of Henry Savile.] This Henry was fecond Son of John Savile of New-hall in Yorkfhire, Efq; (1).

[B] He was admitted into Merton-college in Oxford.] According to the cuftom then prevailing, he had a Tutor assign'd him to teach him Grammar, and another Dialectic or Logic; or elfe one and the fame perfon did both (2).

[C] An honour not very common.] At that time the Proctors were chofen out of the whole body of the Univerfity, by the Doctōrs and Mafters; and confequently none but men of learning, parts, and confiderable intereft durft aspire to that honour. But after the Elections were reftained to particular Colleges by the Caroline cycle, in 1629, as they have been quieter, fo have they been lefs confidered.

[D] And about that time he obliged the world with a Tranflation of part of C. Tacitus.] It was an Englifh tranflation of the Four firft Books of that admired Author's History, and of his Life of Agricola. To which he prefixed an elegant and concise account of the End of Nero, and the beginning of Galba. Printed at London in 1581. fol. This tranflation was highly extolled, as 'the work of a very great Mafters 'indeed, both in our Tongue and that ftory (3).' For if we confider, adds Mr Wood (4), the difficulty of the original, and the age wherein the Tranflator lived, it is, both for the exactnefs of the verſion, and the chaſtity of the language, one of the moft accurate and perfect tranſlations that ever were made into Englifh. — He accompanied his Verſion with excellent Notes, that were tranſlated into Latin by Ifaac Gruter, and published at Amſterdam in 1649. 12mo. And to them Mr Gruter ſubjoined a Treatiſe of our author, De Militiâ Romana, published in 1598. fol. under this title, 'A View of certain Military Matters, 'or Commentaries concerning Roman Warfare.' Which Treatiſe ſoon after its firſt appearance, had been tranſlated into Latin by Marquh. Freherus, and printed at Heidelberg in 1601. 8vo. but was now grown extremely ſcarce. — Mr Savile dedicated his tranſlation to his Miſtreſs Queen Elizabeth; and 'the cauſe why he publiſhed it under her Maſteſty's 'name and proteſtion (befide the teſtification of his 'bounden duty) was [as he tells her] the great 'count her Highneſs moſt worthily held this Hiftorie 'in. — But, adds he, the principal cauſe was 'to incite your Maſteſty by this as by a foil to commu- 'nicate to the world, if not thoſe admirable Compoſi- 'tions of your own, yet at the leaſt thoſe moſt rare 'and excellent Tranſlations of Hiftories, if I may call 'them Tranſlations, which have fo infinitely exceeded 'the originals.' —

[E] In 1596. he publiſhed a collection of the beſt ancient writers of our Englifh Hiftory.] This collection he intituled, Rerum Anglicarum Scriptores poſt Bedam præcipui, ex vetuſtiſſimis Codicibus manuſcriptis nunc primum in lucem editi. And it contains. 1 William, Monk of Malmſbury's, Hiftory of the Kings of England, in ſeven books. The lives of the Englifh Biſhops, by the ſame, in four books. 2. The hiftories of Henry Archdeacon of Huntendon, in eight books. 3. The Annals of Roger de Hoveden. 4. The Chronicle of Ethelwerd, in four books. 5. The hiftory of Ingulph, Abbot of Croyland. — He added Chronological Tables at the end, or, Faſti Regum & Epifcoporum Angliæ, uſque ad Willielmum Seniores; from Julius Cæſar to the coming in of William the Conqueror.

Buz

(2) J. Foxe, edit. as above, p. 1893, col. 1.

(a) Wood, Ath. edit. 1721. Vol. I. col. 465.

(b) Idem Faſti, Vol. I. col. 95.

(c) Wood, Ath. ut ſupra.

(d) Idem, Faſti, col. 104.

(e) Ath. ut ſupr. & Faſti, col. 111.

(f) Wood Hiſt. & Ant. Univ. Oxon. Lib. II. p. 86.

(g) Idem, Ath.

(1) Wood, Ath. ut ſupra.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Edm. Bolton's Hypercritica, &c. publiſh'd by A. Hall.

(4) Ath. col. 466.

of Eaton-college, which Society he made it his business to replenish with the learnedst and most considerable men; as will appear by barely mentioning some of them, namely, Tho. Allen, the ever-memorable John Hales, Thomas Savile, &c. K. James I, at his accession to the crown of England, express'd a particular regard for our Author and his learning, and would have advanced him to a higher place either in Church or State, but he refused it, and only accepted of the honor of Knighthood from his Majesty at Windsor, 21 September 1604. About that time, Sir Henry losing his only son, and having no hopes left of perpetuating his name by a family, he thenceforth devoted his time and fortune to the service and interests of Learning (b). Particularly, he undertook the fine edition of St Chrysostom's Works, of which an account is given below [F]. He also published, in 1618, a book written by Thomas Bradwardin, Archbishop of Canterbury, against Pelagius [G]: And some other pieces of his mentioned in the notes have been published by himself or others [H]: besides what he left in manuscript [I]. Many of the printed

(b) Wood, Ath. ut supra.

But Mr Wharton observes, that the Manuscript of William of Malmshbury's, from which this edition is publish'd, was very incorrect Vir illustris D. Henricus Savilius Historiam illius ex mendosissimo Codice descriptam evulgavit (5). Mr Selden had an ancient MS of this History of W. of Malmshbury, very near Malmshbury's own time; and once belonging to the Priory of St Augustin in Canterbury (6); which it is pity our learned editor did not see. In his Epistle Dedicatory to Queen Elizabeth, he observes, That some parts of our History had been tolerably written by some, but a compleat Body of it by none, with the faithfulness and dignity the subject deserved. For, as to Polydore Vergil, besides that he was a stranger, unacquainted with our Constitution, and a man of a slender genius and learning, he hath often mistaken falsehood for truth, and left us not only a faulty but a very imperfect History. Our own low-bred Historians, while they have attempted to adorn the majesty of so great a work, have defiled it with the most disagreeable absurdities. Whereby it is come to pass, that our most illustrious Princes, who outdid all their contemporaries in Bravery, for want of historians, are neglected and unknown. To remedy which evil, not having Himself leisure, nor being furnished with proper helps and materials, for erecting a suitable and lasting Building from the foundation; he contributed towards it as far as he could by publishing these ancient Historians. Historiæ nostræ particulam quidam non male: Sed qui totum corpus ea fide, eaque dignitate scriptis complexus sit, quam suscepti operis magnitudo postularet, hæcænem plane neminem extitisse constat. Nam Polydorus, ut homo Italus, & in rebus nostris hospes, & (quod caput est) neque in rep. versatus, nec magni alioqui vel iudicii vel ingenii, pauca ex multis delibans, & falsa plerumque pro veris amplexus, historiam nobis reliquit cum cætera mendosam, tum exilitate sane & jejune conscriptam. Nostræ ex fæce plebis historici, dum majestatem tanti operis ornare studuerunt, putidissimis ineptiis contaminarunt. Ita factum est nescio qua bujuse insulæ infelicitate, ut majores tui (serenissima Regina) viri maximi, qui magnam hujus orbis nostræ partem imperio complexi, omnes sui temporis Reges rerum gestarum gloria facile superarunt, magnorum ingeniorum quasi lumine desituti, jaceant ignoti, & deliteant. Cui malo dum medicinam quaerem, neque ita esse vel animo vacuus, vel ab illis subsidiis & quasi instrumentis historiæ scribendæ instructus, ut opus a fundamentis extruerem videtur, scripsitque nepotibus temporum illorum memoriam transmissurum: feci tamen, quod potui, non invitus, ut ex situ, & squalore, pubereque eruerem, & in lucem primus emitterem vetustissimos rerum nostrarum auctores, non illos quidem sacundos, sed fidos rerum gestarum interpretes; eo consilio ut alii, qui & otio abundarent & ingenio, hos quasi ad manum haberent rerum nostrarum commentarios, unde sumerent quæ ad tanti operis exædificationem pertinerent. — Some inferred from this passage, that he intended Himself to write a general History of England, though the words do not really imply so much: Nay it is said, that he had searched the Records in the Tower, for that purpose (7). But if ever he formed any such Design, it is evident from this passage, that he had given it over very early. — This volume of ancient Historians was reprinted at Francfort in 1601. fol. with the addition of an Index; but many errors crept into that edition, especially in the spelling of the English words. [F] Particularly he undertook the fine edition of St Chrysostom's works.] This great Performance is divided into Eight Volumes, folio, printed upon very good paper, and with types nearly equal, in goodness and VOL. V. No. 300.

(5) Prefat. ad Angl. Sacr. Part. i. p. 13.

(6) See Mr Selden's Notes on Drayton's Poly-Glbion, edit. 1622. p. 182.

(7) Wood, Ath. col. 467.

beauty to the elegant ones of the Stephens's. The general title of the whole work, within the middle of a well-engraved copper-plate, is 'S. IOANNIS CHRYSOSTOMI OPERA Græcè, Octo Voluminibus, Editionæ, in Collegio Regali, Excudebat Joannes Norton, in Græcis, etc. Regius Typograpus. 1613.' But each Volume hath also a Greek title in this manner, Τῶ ἐν Ἀγίοις Πατρός ημών ΙΩΑΝΝΟΣ ΑΡΧΙΕΠΙΣΚΟΠΟΥ ΚΩΝΣΤΑΝΤΙΝΟΥΠΟΛΕΩΣ ΤΟΥ ΧΡΥΣΟΣΤΟΜΟΥ τῶν ευρισκομένων ΤΟΜΟΣ — Δι' επιμελείας καὶ ἀναλογατῶν ΕΡΡΙΚΟΥ Τῆ ΣΑΒΙΛΙΟΥ ἐκ παλαιῶν ἀντυγράφων ἐκδοθείς. — In the Preface he informs the Reader, That having visited Himself, about twelve years before, all the public and private Libraries in Britain, and copied out from thence whatever he thought useful for his Design; he then sent some learned men into France, Germany, Italy, and the East, to transcribe such parts as he had not already, and to collate the others with the best Manuscripts. At the same time, he acknowledges to have received the most considerable assistance from the following great Men; Jac. Augustus Thuanus, or De Thou; Marc. Vellserus of Augsburg; George Michael Lingelshelm; Andrew Schott; Isaac Casaubon; Fronton Ducæus; Janus Gruterus; David Hoefchelius; Sebastian Tegnagel; and Gabriel Archbishop of Philadelphia. He professes to have used the utmost exactness, and impartiality. Et quidem ut cætera sint & mea, & aliorum expectatione inferiora, religionem certe in exprimendis scriptis codicibus præstabo: quam minimum indultum conseruris, nihil datum studii partium, nihil auribus cunjsquam. — In the eighth Volume are inserted Sir Henry Savile's own Notes, together with those of the learned John Bois (8), Thomas Allen, Andrew Downes, David Hoefchelius, &c. — The whole charge of this edition is said to have cost Sir Henry in no less than eight thousand pounds, including the paper and printing, and the several sums he paid to the learned men, at home and abroad, employed in finding out, transcribing, and collating the best manuscripts. But as soon as it was finished, the Bishops and Clergy of France employed Fronton Ducæus, above-mentioned, a learned Jesuit, to reprint it at Paris with a Latin translation; which greatly lessened the price of Sir Henry's own edition, and made it much less valuable than it would otherwise have been (9). This edition was printed in 1621, and the subsequent years, in ten Volumes, fol. And a finer Edition hath been since put out by Father Montfaucon, and the Benedictines, Paris 1718. thirteen Volumes, fol.

(8) See above the article BOYSE, or BOIS [JOHN].

(9) Wood, Ath. ut supra, col. 467.

[G] He also published, in 1618, a book written by Thomas Bradwardin—against Pelagius.] The title of it is, Thomæ Bradwardini, Archiepiscopi olim Cantuariensis, de Causis Dei contra Pelagium, & de Virtute Causarum ad suos Mertonenses libri III. Lond fol. He prefixed thereto Bradwardin's Life, compiled by himself. Vita Thomæ Bradwardini Archiep. olim Cantuariensis

[H] And some other pieces of his mentioned in the note, &c.] He published from his elegant Greek press at Eaton, 1. an edition of Xenophon's Institution of Cyrus, Gr. 1613 4to and, 2. of Nazianzen's Stelitictic, 1610. 3. In 1621, he published a Collection of his own Mathematical Lectures: Prælectiones tresdecim in principium Elementorum Euclidis Oxoniæ habitæ. Oxon. 1621. 4to. — 4. A Speech of his before Queen Elizabeth, Oratio coram Regina Elizabethæ Oxoniæ habitæ, an. 1592, was published by Mr (afterwards Bishop) Barlow, in 1658, from the original in